He managed to get back out to the bigger atrium of Hall 1 before he swapped his blades out for sneakers again, and replaced everything into his backpack. He checked to make sure he had a key-card for the hotel room in his wallet before closing the bag to sling over his shoulders again. With all that done, Yuri heaved a pained breath and stood up, looking around the building. On the ice before him, the flag-dancers were spiraling through their big typical circles, carrying flag-less poles as they went through rehearsals. Other skaters wove through them, and though there wasn't any music playing, the choreography looked like something of a party.

In his distraction, he didn't even notice Chris walk right behind him, and he left the complex unnoticed and without a word to anyone. He walked back to the train station, hopped back onto the small city-train, went across the bridge and disembarked close to the Arcotel. No one along the way said a word to him either.

...I generally don't care about what fans think of me...but that doesn't mean it doesn't hurt to realize that people really only notice him.

Both Jiro and Makkachin were super excited to see one of their people come back, but at least Makkachin noticed that this was one less than there should've been, and the poodle looked longingly at the door. His tail wagged swiftly in expectation, but slowed as he felt a hand settle on his back, and he looked to the one human who was there.

"Sorry, Makka...it's just me."

The room stayed relatively quiet and dark as Yuri put all of his things away, grabbed up his MacBook, and crawled under the blankets of the extra-wide bed. With the internet loaded up and both pups snuggled close, Yuri did his best to avoid thinking about what he was missing. It truly didn't take long for that plan to go out the window though.

Yuri groaned sadly and clicked to play it, seeing rather rough-cut footage of the rink he'd just left, and both Viktor and Chris on the ice. Whatever plans Viktor may have had to sort out the Sunday Exhibition had clearly flown out the window...and looked to be having a grand ol' time doing whatever it was that he was doing. The laptop was closed as quickly as it had been opened, and Yuri set it aside, slumping down into the blankets with his arms around his Akita.

He awoke some hours later to the sound of his phone ringing, but half-opened eyes closed again until the chime ceased and the jingle of a new voicemail rang out. He waited a minute before rolling over to reach past Makkachin's frame and find the device. A dread pit grew in his stomach, and he kept the phone face-down on his chest.

...I never thought I'd be so scared that Viktor might call me...
He drew a breath though and lifted the phone up, clicking the screen on to see...a message from one Yuri Plisetsky. It was 10:30pm, nearly pitch-dark, and past the hour when the Russian Tiger's plane was meant to land. Yuri nearly hit his head on the ceiling from the jump, and he quickly loaded up his voicemail box to pull up the message.

"Where the Hell are you?"

Yuri blinked in confusion, and looked at the phone a second time...but sure enough, the recorded message was barely 3 seconds long, and there was no more to listen to. He brow crinkled in anxiety, and he put a hand against his chest as his heart settled down. A confused look crossed his face though.

...Where the Hell am I? Not us? Viktor must've gone to the airport on his own...Yurio would've asked about the both of us otherwise...

He swallowed nervously and loaded up a text window, and started typing.
[Depends.]

Yuri leaned back against the hard leather headboard, curling an arm around Jiro as the pup tried to press against him again. He spotted the moving dots on the screen as a reply was written. It appeared with a bwee'op.

[Look, I don't give one flying rat-turd what happened between you and Viktor, but if you're not right in my face in like 10 seconds I'm gonna kick your ass SO HARD when I find you]

A brow raised, but Yuri could feel the relief creeping in.
[Is he there with you?]
[Yeah him and a guy who ISN'T you]

Yuri was about to start typing again, but stopped and erased the few letters he'd already clicked as another message popped up.
[It's late though and everyone's exhausted, so we're going our own way. I'm pissed that you skipped this.]

Frowning, Yuri typed, [Sorry...] He answered, waiting a moment before typing some more, [Are you heading to the hotel already?]
[Yeah. I gave Viktor all the stuff you asked me to get, and he's heading back to your place with it.]
[...Did he say anything?]
[He didn't have to. He was being a smug prick, like he always does when something's wrong and he's too proud to cop to it. Being around Chris makes it 10x worse.]
[oh..]
[So, back to my original question...where the Hell are you?]

.

Tak tak tak
The Rooms Bed & Breakfast was a small cluster of customized apartments, set up to be rented like Airbnb rooms, but that stood alone like hotel-rooms. The street-facing side looked like the plain white duplex of a regular city apartment bloc; 2 floors high, but clean and modern-looking. The door to the first-floor apartment - built out of the bottom half of a 1900s Viennese house - opened, revealing a tired and ragged-looking skater with one confused dog.

"Y-Yuri!" Minako called, latching onto him rather quickly before dragging him inside, "You had us all worried sick!"

The rest of the people in the apartment came out from their hidey-holes, half with toothbrushes hanging from their mouths. Yurio stood with a shoulder against a wall, and a stern look on his face, hands in the pockets of a pale-colored hoodie. Mikhail came out from the bedroom, directly across from the front door, and ushered them all further into the long space so he could close the door to keep the heat in. Yuri barely had a chance to cuff his sneakers off before he found himself pushed halfway into the kitchen, but once he was in, he set Jiro down on the floor to let him roam and heaved a sigh...not quite of relief, but...a sigh.

"What in the world is going on?" Minako asked, speaking for them all as she helped peel the sullen figure out of his heavy coat, "Yuri...?"

Nikki and Viktoria weren't sure what to say, and just waited instead, watching from the bathroom door in their half-ready-for-bed states. Yuri was nudged by them, until he was in the main living area, and allowed to sit down on the edge of the sleeper-sofa.

"I'm...sorry to impose like this." Yuri started, looking at the dark eyes of his Akita, who had come up to his knees instead of exploring, "I didn't want to be there when Viktor got back...if he was even planning to come back...

"...What happened?"

Yurio slumped back into a reclining chair nearby, "I'm guessing Viktor did something to be a jerk-ass."

"...He started getting mean for no reason when we got to the rink earlier today." Yuri confirmed grimly, "He made fun of my worry about his ankle by claiming everything I said about it was just weird, annoying noises instead. Then he turned our Exhibition practice into...into a PR stunt." He huffed angrily, though at the same time feeling his throat hurt, and his voice cracked, "He went out on the ice without me. I don't even know how long it took for him to realize I didn't go with him, or if he ever did. I went back to the hotel instead, and by the time I got there, Chris had turned up at the rink and they were goofing off. Mila streamed it on Insta. I watched it only long enough to realize I wasn't missed and no one cared, and fell asleep..."

"Figured." The Tiger grumbled, twisting himself on the reclining chair to lean against one arm-rest, and dangle his legs off the other, "Him and Chris were insufferable at the airport."

"...I just thought they were excited to see each other again." Minako added, "But he refused to say anything about where you were." She put her hand on Yuri's shoulder and sat on the edge of the bed next to him, "Even Chris was reluctant to say anything. The best I got was him shaking his head subtly. I could only assume that you were...fine, but somewhere else. Yura was mad you weren't there to see us arrive though."

"...I meant to be there..." Yuri sighed, and rubbed his nose on the back of his wrist. He reached down to pull Jiro up into his lap, "I just...fell asleep suddenly, and only woke up when Yuri texted me. I was worried it was Viktor and didn't even want to look at first..."
"I wonder what crawled up his arse?" Mikhail wondered, shaking his head as he pressed his shoulder to the olive-green doorframe, "Was he like that all week?"

"...It...had its ups and downs..." Yuri answered, keeping his eyes down, "But he was never mean to me until today. He...said he had to put his face on; that fake personality he wears when he's out in public and wants people to think everything is completely fine. It didn't even take five minutes for him to start being rude. I didn't..." He pressed a palm to his forehead, feeling a headache coming on under the faint mark at his hairline, "...I didn't say anything that he hadn't heard before... Was it the hockey-skates? ...The flag-dancers? I...I don't know what set him off, but he took it out on me...saying I was smothering him. But as soon as we started heading for the rink, he was all smiles again, being nice to everyone around us while completely ignoring me. He even went out of his way to keep his hands to himself...even after being so miserable all weekend because he felt like he couldn't touch me at all..."

He could feel his eyes tearing up, but tried desperately to keep them there, "I don't understand what happened... I don't know why he's taking it out on me... What'd I do!?"

"The worst thing you could do, obviously." Yurio answered casually, getting dirty looks from basically everyone, "You took him to a competition he can't compete in, and you're telling him what he can and can't do while he's here. You know the kind of fights him and Yakov go into cuz he'd try to tell Viktor what to do?"

"...That's different though... Viktor and I are supposed to be-

"...You're telling him how and whether he can skate. It doesn't matter who it comes from."

Yuri blanched, staring at the teen in confused horror.

"Jeeze, for being so smart, you sure are dumb." Yurio huffed, pulling on the arm-rest between his knees to sit straighter. He leveled a look over a shoulder, "What's the one common thread in Viktor's life where he's always been at odds with people?"

"I don't...understand..."

"...Oh, vo imja ljubvi Gospodnej." (Oh, for the love of God.) The teen guffawed. He twisted to put his feet onto the floor and stood up, stepping forward just enough to put a finger between Yuri's eyes, "Konstantin, that one Fake-Ass-Girlfriend, Yakov, and now you. What do all of you have in common?"

Brown eyes crossed, but Yuri couldn't think well enough to answer. Mercifully, Yurio didn't give him much time to contemplate it anyway.

"You're all telling him what to do with his skating! He hates that shit!"

Yuri threatened to bite the finger, and Yurio pulled it back, "Viktor's ankle was hurt! If no one tells him to stay off it, then he'll hurt it worse!"

"That's up to him."

"THE OLYMPICS ARE IN A FEW WEEKS!" Yuri barked, about ready to jump up off the bed. Mikhail stepped forward though and extended a hand to keep him down.

"Chill, Yuri." He said simply, "You've both got valid points, but yelling at each other isn't going to solve the problem. It may also get us kicked out...we literally just got here."

Yuri crumpled up in his spot again, hugging Jiro against his chest, "Sorry..."
"It's fine...just settle down a bit." The elder conferred, "There's not really anything that can be done about this kerfuffle tonight...and we need to figure out how six people are gonna fit into a space meant for five."

The two teen girls came into the living-room just then, nervous about intruding, even though it was the space they were meant to sleep in, "Is everything okay...?" Nikki wondered dubiously.

"Viktor's being a butt, so Yuri's staying with us tonight." Mikhail explained simply, "We're trying to figure out how to make room."

"...I'll...just stay on the chair." Yuri said, nudging his head towards the recliner that Yurio had been in a moment before.

"...Are you sure?" The elder wondered, "...I was thinking, the ladies can share the bed in the other room, I can take the roll-away, and you share the pull-out sofa-bed with Yura."

"It'd be like when we were stuck on our own at NHK." Yurio huffed, crossing his arms, "I don't mind."

Yuri lifted his eyes towards Minako and the rest, "...Only...if it's okay with you..."

"I guess it's the least we can offer after Mari and I barged into your room at the Final..." She shrugged, "It's only for tonight anyway."

"...Yeah..."
It was weird enough to wear rented skates, but hockey skates were entirely foreign. Lacking the thin boot-like housing of a figure skate - replaced by what felt like plastic, plated armor - and having no toe-pick whatsoever, they felt like snow-shoes with blades. But, they were a good enough fit that they felt like the ski-boots from earlier in the day, and since Viktor was already used to that feeling, it wasn't so much of a handicap to get used to these new skates.

_I can make these work... It won't be super-fun, and I'm sure I'll have pressure-blisters before the end of the night, but I'm sure it'll be fine. Yuri is getting in tonight with my boots, and then I can skate like normal again._

The fans were spreading out around him to make room, and camera flashes blinked from every corner of the warehouse-like building. There was a growing opening on the ice that he could see himself moving towards, and mentally shrugged, winding up with his right leg out behind himself. The throw was easy, so was the spin...the landing on that right side felt a bit strange, but nothing hurt.

_Not having any flexibility in these boots is a real problem... I don't know if I can do half of my regular moves with these on. There's some wiggle-room, but it's so stiff that there may as well be none._

The cheering felt like a warm blanket, and Viktor looked around, seeing that most of the ice had been cleared by then. Those who had been on it had moved to the rink-wall to stay clear, and behind them, on the other side of the Plexiglas, fans and film-crews were growing in number.

_Seems that the rumor of me being here has spread like wildfire. I don't know why they cheered for that Axel though...I barely hopped. Guess it doesn't matter... I wonder if I can do a backward-entry in these?_

He flipped around and looked back over his shoulder, arcing in a wide curve on his left blade. He straightened out and set one bulky boot in front of the other - left in front of the right - and kicked off. It was a slow double-Loop, but like the single Axel that preceded it, Viktor noted how his ankle felt.

...No pain, no pressure...no tightness beyond the boot-lacing... _I really don't think my ankle was strained as bad as it seemed._

He looked up and back towards the opening in the rink wall, "Yuri, my ankle feels fi-" No one was there, "...Yuri?"

"Viktooooor~!"

Slate eyes moved aside, looking to the one exit from the warehouse, clear across the rink from where he was. The crowd had parted and Chris was there, waving amiably. There was no time to worry, and the slender Russian raised his hand, putting on that wide smile, "Chris~!"

_Damn...now I can't even leave. Where did Yuri go...?_

He gestured his waving-hand across the length of the rink and pointed at the doorway, but scanned every face along the way as he went.
...Did he take off...? When did I even lose him?

Chris seemed to pop up next to him faster than he had any right to, and Viktor was pulled out of his head with a start, "Why in the world are you practicing on this side of things?" The blonde wondered abruptly, circling around, but playfully reached for the Russian's guest-pass. He turned the lanyard around Viktor's neck as he moved, letting it go again only when the man's jacket pulled on it, "You've got rink-access to Hall 3. It's super crowded here."

"...Guess I assumed it was being used. Hall 1 has the OCs practice." Viktor answered, "And I am just a guest now."

"Viktor..." Chris shook his head, and teased a few tongue-clicks in sarcastic disappointment, "What'd I tell you about being the Belle of the Ball here? You could probably get away with going to Hall 3 even without a pass."

"Well, I'm here now, so...

"Seems you are. What are you working on? Exhibition practice isn't till Sunday morning."

The Russian felt a hot rush in his chest, but he just smiled, "Nothing. I haven't really gotten to skate but once since Nationals."

"Fair enough. Have some fun with me then. If you're going to take over the public rink, we might as well give them a show."

"That's what they're here for, isn't it?" Viktor mused, moving a bit faster to catch up with his long-time friend.

It wasn't too long a period of time before the crowd started filtering back out onto the ice to join the two European Champions. The hours passed, and fun with the crowd was had, showing off how to do certain tricks or joining in on pair-displays, even one big game of Red Rover on the ice, followed by tag. A bunch of other professional skaters had trickled in through the afternoon as well. A long session of getting autographs and photos ended the night, and Viktor stumbled out of the arena, feeling his hands and legs shaking from the low blood-sugar.

"Whew...I'm so hungry I could eat you." He teased, slinging himself across Chris' back for the support.

"Yuri might take issue with that suggestion." The blonde quipped, hefting the Russian up, "It's been hours since I spotted you. Where is Yuri?"

"Let's just get something to eat~!"

Chris glared skeptically, but turned his sights to his friend's right hand.

"He's still got his ring on...

"Chriiiisss~! I'm dying~"

"Alright, alright...let's find something. Where are you staying?"

"Too far away. We'd have to take the train. I'll wither away before then."

"It's a 10 minute walk to the Official hotel. There's a pizza place around the corner from it though...it's on the way from here."
"Yay, food."

The Pizzeria Piccolo was a little establishment off the main road, but only a 5 minute walk from the arena. It was a busy little place though, with people even willing to sit outside just to have a seat at all. Waiting to sit inside though, it took another 15 minutes before the skating duo were able to even place an order.

Viktor's stomach growled like an angry leopard, and he hugged his arms around it, moaning a whine as water glasses were set on their small metal table, "...I feel like I haven't eaten for days..."

"When are you going to tell me where Yuri is and why he's not with you?" Chris asked pointedly, taking a sip from the drink.

The Russian just slumped down, "He's just not here. Is that a crime?"

Chris leveled the man a flat look...then reached across the table and smacked him once across the top of his head, leaving silver hair disheveled and a stunned look on Viktor's face, "Quit being an idiot."

Hands went up to cradle the spot, which now stung slightly, "He can be away from me without anything being wrong!" He argued, trying to flatten his hair back into place.

"You know...all these years we've been friends...did it never occur to you that you're an open book to me?" Chris asked grimly, adjusting his wide-framed glasses as he looked down at the pizza menu, "I may not prod you for details, but that doesn't mean I can't tell when you're being a fake-ass."

Viktor grumbled and crossed his arms across his chest, "That doesn't mean anything."

"You haven't said Yuri's name all afternoon, and when I have, you dismissed it like I hadn't. You can't sit there across from me, look me in the eyes, and tell me for a fact that nothing is wrong."

Slate eyes narrowed, then looked away, "I'm not discussing the details of my marriage with someone outside of it, friend or not."

"I just want you to admit something is wrong."

"Fine. Something's wrong."

"Do you know where Yuri is right now?"

"Probably at the hotel."

"But you don't know."

"I don't even know when he left."

Chris nodded, and put on his best smile as a waitress came by to leave real drinks and took orders for the food to come. Once the menus were handed off and she stepped away again, Chris leveled his friend a serious look, "And you're not even worried about confirming that he's safe."

"He's run all over Hasetsu by himself."

"I'm not sure if you're aware of this or not, but...this is Vienna, not Hasetsu." Chris said dryly, "He's never been here before in his life."
"Our hotel is right across the river from here. Walking distance if he were so inclined. It's probably as far away from the arena as the Ice Castle is from Yu-Topia." Viktor deflected, gesturing out as though pointing towards the Arcotel, "He also spent 5 years living in Detroit, one of the most dangerous cities in the States, and the worst thing that ever happened to him there was having a girl hug him unexpectedly. What's the worst that could happen to him here? Vienna is consistently one of the safest cities in Europe."

"...You're going awfully far out of the way to convince yourself you don't need to call and check on him."

Viktor grumbled and settled down again, wasting time with his drink, "...He probably wouldn't even take my calls right now anyway."

"Wow, Viktor...what did you do to that poor soul?"

"What did I do?" The Russian shot back, offended, "Why is it always my fault?"

"Cuz Yuri would literally burst into flames before he ever did anything to hurt you on purpose." Chris pointed out, "And I've seen how he reacts when he thinks he's hurt you by mistake. He wouldn't run from that...but he's not here."

"He ran when he humiliated me in front of everyone the day before the wedding party." Viktor growled under his breath and roughly set his elbows on the table, only to have to back up again right away as the pizzas were set down. The mask went up again and he thanked the waitress happily.

Chris lifted his fork and knife, and started cutting a piece of the pie out in front of him, "Yuri ran off back then because he thought you didn't care about his feelings. You wouldn't even look at him, and then just said you weren't good at dealing with people who cry in front of you. Yuri pointed out that he wasn't crying in front of you because you weren't looking at him, and then he left." He explained simply, "You left, too, and I told people to leave you alone. Everyone else went after Yuri though, because we all knew that he shouldn't be alone when he's that upset."

Viktor just stared at the cheesy disc in front of himself, tapping a finger on the silver fork in his right hand, "...Feels like déjà vu, hearing that."

Chris huffed a half-amused laugh, "Why's that?"

"Cuz Saito said the same damn thing at Nationals."

The blonde held a piece of the pizza in front of his mouth, paused in place, but then lowered it down again to the plate and gave an incredulous look, "Are you saying that you upset Yuri at Nationals, too?"

Viktor grumbled, "I didn't mean to..." He insisted, hacking angrily at his portion, "He was so focused on Saito's feelings though...I felt like he didn't care about mine at all, even after I'd put them aside myself just to avoid burying that guy."

"Dare I ask...?"

The Russian sighed and dipped his head, stopping shy of dragging his bangs through red-sauce, "...Yuri wandered off to take a call, because it came in while I was doing an interview, and it was too loud. By the time I found him again, it had...been after him and Saito had gotten into a huge fight. Some words were said and things were done that...left Yuri vulnerable and upset. I wanted Saito thrown out of the JSF for it, but Yuri insisted he be spared, and I agreed more for his sake than Saito's. I wanted Yuri to feel like he had control of things again, so I left it up to him."
"I see." Chris nodded, but then pointed his fork at Viktor's plate, "Try eating something while you're feeling sorry for yourself. You can still multitask, last I recall."

Viktor grumbled, but started poking at a few of the chunks he'd cut apart in his earlier furor, "...We managed to sort things out with Saito - mostly - but a huge part of that was me trying to suppress how furious I was at everything, just to make it happen. You know how hard it is to try and support a guy who did something so reprehensible!? It's like Saito's problems were more important than the ones he caused. And now he's living in my old room at Yu-Topia, and I'm supposed to keep acting like everything is fine."

"Yuri knows how you feel about all that though, right?"

"Of course he knows. We both thought that whole debacle would be finished when we left Osaka, but then it followed it to Hasetsu a few days later cuz Saito managed to get himself kicked out of his house." Viktor sighed, eating at least a small piece of the pizza, "I'm not sad we got out of there when we did. Leaving Hasetsu to go to Russia was a relief to me, because then I wouldn't have to look at the face of the guy who hurt Yuri so badly. But then the trip to Russia turned into a catastrophe, too, and now we're here and everything's gone to shit again."

"Sounds like the last two weeks have been rather rough on you guys."

"This whole season has been rough on us." Viktor corrected, exhausted, "I wanted to make Euros the event where Yuri and I had nothing but a good time, but I can't manage 5 minutes of peace before I do something to mess it all up again. It's bad enough that I messed up the idea that it was supposed to be me making him feel better...but then he does such a good job making me feel better and I just-"

"What set you off?" Chris asked, cutting the man's words short, "And why are you taking it out on him? Cuz it sounds like he was trying really hard to make things better, and now you're acting like he did all that for nothing."

Viktor sighed and set his utensils down, and leaned back against his chair, "...I was getting some skates to rent...and Yuri started giving me grief about not jumping again. And it just made me so angry, because I'd already gone so far out of the way to fix our Exhibition for Sunday so that I wouldn't be jumping. The whole point of us practicing today was supposed to be so I could sort out the little details that I couldn't think of while cooped-up on the train..." He folded one arm across himself and pinched the bridge of his nose with fingers from the other, "...It was just...getting to me. He knew I'd already caved on what limitations I'd tolerate...but he just jabbed me with them again right as we were going out there. All I could hear was Gracie's voice and I stopped listening."

"...Wow, there's a name I haven't heard in years. I thought it was like a four-letter word to you." Viktor grumbled and nodded behind his hand, but then rubbed his face and reached for the fork again, "...I was getting some skates to rent...and Yuri started giving me grief about not jumping again. And it just made me so angry, because I'd already gone so far out of the way to fix our Exhibition for Sunday so that I wouldn't be jumping. The whole point of us practicing today was supposed to be so I could sort out the little details that I couldn't think of while cooped-up on the train..." He folded one arm across himself and pinched the bridge of his nose with fingers from the other, "...It was just...getting to me. He knew I'd already caved on what limitations I'd tolerate...but he just jabbed me with them again right as we were going out there. All I could hear was Gracie's voice and I stopped listening."

"You know full-well that's not what Yuri was doing." Chris pointed out, "I won't let you suggest that he had some other motive."

"I know he didn't... It was just...a knee-jerk reaction. I couldn't help it." He added, stabbing a piece of the pizza with the prongs of the fork, "I even started doing the wonk wonk thing at him...just like I used to with her when she'd get unreasonable."

"So you treated him like an ex he doesn't know anything about, because he told you not to jump on a bad ankle."

"...I guess I hit a wall with the issue. I thought he trusted me enough."

"You were jumping when I came into the rink, dummy." Chris pointed out, "How's he supposed to feel about that? You promised him you wouldn't jump and then you jumped."

"...I know... But I only did enough to test how it felt... I wanted to reassure him that it wasn't going to hurt. Unlike him, doing quad Lutzes after smashing his skull against the ice, I just did a single and a double, and then I didn't jump at all again for the rest of the afternoon. He didn't even give me the benefit of the doubt."

"He was probably gone by then. I didn't see him when I came in." Chris shook his head, and reached across the table to steal a piece of the cheesy pie that was slowly going cold, "I don't know how much more time you need before you realize that Yuri isn't like the other people you've been with. Gracie was a psycho who treated you like you were her prized property...Sophia took one look at you and ranked you alongside every other dumb jock who ever flirted with her; and there were many. They erected barriers around you - either to keep you for themselves or to keep you at a distance - but Yuri doesn't have that now. The barriers he put up between you and him, all the years he would run away rather than say hi...? Those all came down when you went to be his coach. You can't treat him like you think he can handle your pettiness. He's not petty, so he doesn't have the mindset to know how to push back against it...and if it comes from you, you might as well be hitting him, too."

"...You describe him like you think he's some fragile little dog. He's stronger than that."

"Not when it comes to you." Chris shot back, "He may be more comfortable being around you but that doesn't change who he is. He never wanted to talk to you before because he didn't want you to see his shortcomings, but it goes without saying that he meant he didn't want you to judge him. Everything you think about him has ten times more of an impact than the views of anyone else...so when you treat him like an ex, he feels like you've already broken up with him...and so he runs away, avoiding your judgment, probably thinking you'd be better off without him."

"...He knows that's not true."

"Do you really think he feels that way right now? You lashed out at him because he was worried about you, after everything else you guys just went through. I don't even know all the details of what happened, but I still feel like I should be mad at you on his behalf just so someone is."

Viktor grumbled and leaned over his plate, poking at the crust with his fork.

"We should go to the hotel and check on him."

"...I can't." The silver sighed.

"Why."

"Because I'm still mad. If I go back now then it'll probably just make things worse."

"You can't stay out all night, Viktor."

"I know..." He grumbled, "...There's only a couple hours left before Yurio gets here. I'll go back after that. Maybe Yuri will be at the airport, too."

The Arrivals terminal at that hour of the night was relatively quiet, but the noise on the floor above, where passengers were collecting their bags, gave away the activity. The massive wall-high digital display board had marked the plane from Moscow as 'landed 21:17.' It was only a matter of minutes before the flood of people from the upper level would be coming down towards the exit.

"Viktor!"

He turned towards the escalator and spotted Yurio there, all but jumping off the railing to get to the ground floor. He hauled his things and wedged past other passengers to get down faster, only to get off the moving stairway and realize the second figure was not who he expected to see there.

...Where's Yuri? Did he have to pee all of a sudden?

"Hey." Viktor waved, "Where's everyone else?"

"At the top." He answered, looking around, "Where's Yuri?"

"Oh, didn't you notice?" The Russian teased, gesturing at Chris, "I up-graded. Get it?" He held his hand higher to compare their heights, and the taller figure's extra singular inch over him, "Up-graded?"

Yurio deadpanned him, "...You're an idiot."

"Cousin Viktooooorrr~!" Nikki called out excitedly, waving, and lost her bags on the escalator just as quickly. She scrambled to get them all back before they started bumping into people, face red from the embarrassment of it all.

"I brought your stuff." The Russian Tiger interrupted, drawing slate eyes down again as he opened his big rolling suitcase. The garment bags and gold-bladed boots came out, handed over quickly so he could close the case again, "Hopefully this was everything. Yuri didn't say there was anything extra lying around, so I didn't look."

"No, this is it. Thanks." Viktor shook his head and slung the bags over the back of one shoulder, keeping his skates in the other hand, "I can't wait to get on the ice in my gear again. I've got blisters on my blisters from those awful rentals..."

"Let it be known to all that playing tag was your idea." Chris pointed out, "And then you were it and couldn't catch anyone."

Viktor blanched, "...I can't...argue with that, I guess."

The rest of the group started filtering into the foyer as well, tired as they were, but waved anyway. Minako looked around, "Hey guys...where's Yuri?"

"He's not here. How was the flight?"

The ballerina was stunned, but confused eyes went to Chris, and he just shook his head, staring straight at her...which only confused her further. The pleasantries were strange to watch after that, but when Yurio started to wander away, it seemed that they would be cut short. He was, after all, going to the car rental area, not the train.
"Guess we'll see you guys tomorrow then." Minako said, getting her hugs from the two skaters, "Say hi to Yuri for us, okay? Sorry we missed him."

Viktor nodded, and watched the group move off towards the external doors. He felt a pit in his stomach when he saw Yurio pull his phone out, and stop in front of the automatic doors with only five words to say to the voicemail recorder before hanging up again. He shook his head though and turned on a heel, heading back to the other end of the Arrivals terminal to find the train back into the city.

The awkward silence was starting to turn into a painful one though, and Viktor paused in place, pulling the garment bags back over his shoulder. Other people walked around them, like leaves in a river, pushed out of place by an errant rock or log, but Viktor paid them no mind. His focus was on the bags, and more specifically...the second of the two costumes contained therein.

"You know..." Chris started up again, "It's easy to fool the people who don't really know you...but trying to use those same fake-face tactics on your family is a different thing entirely."

"...I'm aware."

"They saw right through you. Plisetsky can already tell something's off."

"I know."

"So you're going to let the guy that tormented him for all of last year be the first person who talks to him tonight."

Viktor shot him a glare, "...Yuri is his special buddy now. What happened last year is water under the bridge."

"It's the principle of the thing." Chris corrected, crossing his arms, "He's just a kid. You're letting him walk into the middle of a fight."

"Maybe talking to someone else first will make it easier when I do show up." The Russian huffed, "Not that it's helping me much, apparently."

Chris' brow crinkled behind his circular frames, and he exhaled an annoyed breath. Without a second thought, he grabbed Viktor by the collar of his jacket and started dragging him backwards through the Arrivals terminal again, much to the silver's protest. By the time he was ready to let the man go again, they were standing outside the Duty Free shop, and he flipped the Russian around, "Buy Yuri some flowers and something nice. Don't come out again until you do." He ordered, taking the man's skates and costume-bags before Viktor could protest, and shoved him forward with a push of his shoulder.

Viktor was incensed, but looked around cautiously, seeing the crowds still wandering around, thin as they were. He practically marched into the shop, looking around indignantly. The store had everything one could expect to buy for someone arriving from a long flight; alcohol, candy, chocolates, toys for kids, wine, perfume, other assorted fancy gifts, and of course, flowers. Viktor grabbed two individually-wrapped roses somewhat roughly, and glared back at the Swiss man standing outside.

_It doesn't mean the same thing if someone forces you to do it._

Chris just stared back though, and Viktor returned to browsing. His wounded pride slowly started to hurt less as he made his way through and eventually paid, but he felt his heart go back into his throat when he had to go back into the fray.
"If you go back to him acting this entitled and bitter, Yuri is going to come out the other end hating himself, not you. You know that, right?"

"...You're really starting to get under my skin, Chris."

"You don't often have people stand up to your petulance." He pointed out, expression unchanging, "Take all your anger out on me. I don't care. I can take as much shit as you can give. But don't you dare go back to him in a mood like this. He may be your husband, but he's still my friend, and he's technically been such longer than you have."

Viktor just grit his teeth and pushed past.

Chris turned and went after him quickly, "Hate me now...like me later."

Returning to the Arcotel felt like a Death March. Viktor could feel his heart pounding in his throat and head, and his hand shook with the key-card as he stood in front of their door. Eyes were wide and felt dry as he tried to put the card into the lock-slot, but no matter what he did, he couldn't get them to connect.

"...I...I can't do it..." He said quietly, getting a sinking feeling in his gut. He turned to look at the man next to him, "...What if he's hurt himself...? What if he's done something...?"

Chris reached to steady the Russian's shaking hand, and pulled the card from his fingers. He unlocked the door and pushed it open after a tap to knock. He pressed the back of his other hand against Viktor's chest to keep him in the hall for the moment, and stepped inside, door held open by Viktor's shoe. Makkachin was right inside, shaking with excitement...but in the dark, and alone. Chris checked the bathroom just in case, but returned with a shrug, "He's not here."

"...Where's Jiro...?"

"Oh, you brought the pup, too?"

Viktor nodded, and stepped inside, letting the door click behind him before putting the two flowers, a bottle of peach wine, and a box of fancy chocolates down on the counter by the coffee-maker. Eyes went around the room in stunned disappointment...which sank into worry. Even feeling Makkachin's cold, wet nose against his fingers could do little to pull him out of his shock, and he turned to back up against the foot of the bed, "...He...took Jiro with him..."

"Well, we know he came back here at least." Chris pointed out, looking around, "His gear-bag is in the closet, but his coat and shoes are gone."

"...He must've...gone to spend the night with Yurio and the others." Viktor thought aloud, unblinking eyes starting to water, "...He'd...prefer to stay with someone else...than wait for me to come back..." He said quietly, his voice starting to crack, and he lowered his head into his hands, "...I really am horrible..."
Lights were turned off, save for one lamp in the living-room, and voices lowered to the volume of hushed whispers. Yuri lifted up from the bathroom sink, water on his face, and hovered over it as the drops fell into the carved stone bowl. Lifting his face to look in the mirror, he reached forward to wipe away some of the shower-fog, and looked at the unfortunate sight of his reflection. Though his hair was toweled dry, it was still damp, and a number of stringy black strands came tumbling down into his face, well past his reddened eyes. He combed them back into place with his fingers and looked down again.

_Yurio was the only person who asked after me all day. No one else has tried to call... Am I really that invisible here? Maybe so invisible...that even Viktor put me aside..._

He watched the droplets hit the spackled basin, and the warped reflection of his image in the faucet.

_Is the idea of Euros so important to him that he wants to experience it the way he always used to...? I wouldn't be here in the first place if I hadn't followed him...and this is the first time he's been back since he became a coach. Maybe he...wanted to recreate what it would've been like if not for me... He'd...still be in the RSF if I hadn't come into things..._

Yuri hesitated, but then shook his head, eyes clenched shut, and he smacked his forehead roughly.

_No... Why am I thinking like this...? I know Euros was important to him, but he never suggested it was because I was never there before. This has nothing to do with me...it's all the RSF's fault... They went so long without ever suggesting Viktor's life-choices mattered to them. They only dropped him after he gave up a medal..._

He balked then, collapsing against the basin despondently.

_...to give it to me..._

Reaching for a towel hanging nearby, he buried his face into it for a moment. He sucked in a pained breath once he was sure he could avoid crying again, and reached for the change of clothes he'd brought over with him. With black under-shorts and a t-shirt pulled onto his frame, he stepped quietly out of the bathroom, through the back end of the kitchen, and out into the living-room. By then, Mikhail had set-up the roll-away bed that Yurio was originally meant to sleep on, and Yurio himself was surfing the local television channels; they both looked up when Yuri came into the room.

He found his bag on the floor near the edge of the bed, and put away the clothes he'd peeled out of earlier on. Seeing his phone though, and how it seemed to light up on providence, he couldn't help but pull it out.

Chris (10:55pm)
[Yuri please confirm that you're safe and have Jiro]

Viktor (11:15pm)
[Yuri please answer]
Viktor (11:17pm)
[I can understand if you want to ignore ME but don't ignore Chris too]
Viktor (11:21pm)
The knife that had been in his chest all day twisted all over again, and he couldn't look at the screen. He unlocked it and pressed it against Yurio's arm, where the teen was sitting nearby, "...Please tell them I'm fine and then hide my phone."

The Russian Tiger blinked in confusion, but took the phone anyway, looking down to see the Group Chat window with its messages loaded already. He side-eyed Yuri for a moment, but grumbled and crossed his legs before starting to type.

Me (11:35pm)
[This is the other Yuri. He's fine. Leave him alone. Bye.]

Viktor (11:35pm)
[What about Jiro?]

Me (11:35pm)
[Also fine. BYE.]

Yurio clicked the phone off and checked the side to be sure it was set to silent, then tossed it into his own bag. He turned around in place and watched Yuri bury his head under the aforementioned pup, who had since taken to chewing on his fingers and licking his ear, "...I told them." He said simply.

"Fnks."

.

Viktor stared vacantly at his phone, at least until Chris pulled it from his fingers...then he just stared at his empty hands instead. Unblinking eyes dripped with tears, falling to his palms.

"Do you want me to stay over?" Chris wondered, finding a stray phone-charger to plug the device in, out of reach.

"...I don't..." The Russian stammered, lowering his head, "...I can't think... Is this the end of us...?"

"This?" Chris echoed dryly, "No, this is Yuri fleeing a potential confrontation; he doesn't want to fight with you. He's gone to spend the night with people who aren't mad at him."

"...I'm worried sick about him..."

"Wonk wonk."

"Chris, seriously." Viktor snapped, lifting up from his palms, "Making me feel worse about this isn't helping."

"But you're starting to understand how he feels. You have a particularly bad habit of digging deep when you want to make people suffer."

"I didn't want him to suffer! I just wanted him to stop!" The Russian protested, grabbing his nervous poodle and flopping down onto his side with him.

"Then just tell him that next time instead of mouthing off. Make-fun of him at your peril."

Viktor groaned sadly into Makkachin's fluff.

Chris sighed and scratched idly at the back of his head, and moved to sit down across from his despairing friend, "...I know you did your best to not jump into things too fast, but..." He started, reaching across to pat the Russian's shoulder, despite the man's back turned to him, "...I don't think you got to know him well enough before you sprung that engagement on him. Anyone with eyes could see that he was caught by surprise back then."

Viktor didn't answer.

"Maybe there was a part of you that knew Yuri wouldn't say no if you suggested it...and I know you meant it sincerely." He huffed a laugh and shook his head, remembering the previous year, "I started getting jealous of you back then, because you had so-easily given up the ice for someone...even though I thought you were like me; living for the ice. But...at the same time, because I knew Yuri so well, I honestly couldn't blame you for being smitten by him. I feel like...maybe I encouraged the both of you too much. I teased Yuri about the 'special training' you were giving him, as though you were already sleeping together...and failed to warn you about how fragile I knew Yuri was." He explained, shrugging out of his heavy jacket before leaning down to lie on his back. Staring at the ceiling, he cupped his hands over his chest idly, and breathed a remorseful sigh, "...If I had taken the same steps with you as I had with Saito, maybe things would've been a bit less drastic."

The Russian lifted his head, twisting to look over his shoulder at the man behind him, "...With...Saito...?"

Chris nodded and reached up to pull his glasses away, folding them carefully over himself, "Yuri was always naïve...oblivious to the things around him. But I had a dirty mind as far back as I can remember, so I noticed the things that Yuri didn't. I saw Saito's infatuation, but I also saw this...almost desperate, predatory look in him. Not that he would ever hurt Yuri, but that he obsessed over him. It wasn't like how Yuri looked up to or idolized you, and pushed himself to be better at his sport so he could be closer to you, even if impersonally. Saito wanted to possess Yuri. So...I wedged myself in between them. Called him chicken-head, duck-ass, dick-butt...messing with him...whatever it took to keep him at a distance while Yuri was still innocent. ...Under the best of influences, Yuri can be molded into something to be reckoned with. But under the worst...he could become dependent, needy, unsure of himself, and worst of all...willing to take the abuse, and be a prisoner of those who claim to want the best for him. That's part of what makes him vulnerable...his anxiety and self-doubt make him very easy to manipulate...and why he takes it super badly whenever the people he trusts start putting him down. When he gives...he gives all of himself, no holds barred."

"Now you just make it sound like I'm the same as Saito."

"I'm not done yet." Chris corrected, pushing himself a bit further up the bed so he could perch a foot against the edge of it, "...If I had more than just the first two days of Cup of China to figure you two out, before you kissed him, maybe I could've gleaned more of my insights into you about Yuri's sensitivities. You have the occasional mean-streak. No one is perfect. But I know you can - and want - to make improvements so you can be the best person possible...for yourself, and for Yuri. I've seen him come out of his shell more in the last 2 years than I had in all the decade before. You are the best possible person to have a hold over him, if anyone was going to at all." He explained, only to twist over and nudge the Russian in the arse with his knee to get his attention again, "But you are occasionally a bit of a shit. You get impatient and would rather put people down than just say what you mean. You're a master of distraction and deflection...and while that's fine and well for being the world's second-best figure skater-"

"Second-best!?" Viktor flipped over outright then, dragging Makkachin halfway over in the process.

Chris winked, "I'm the reigning European Champion. You're on my turf." He said, and flicked the Russian between the eyes before going back to the prior topic, "As I was saying though...putting on a show is great for the camera and the audience, but not for the people you know. Maybe you've gotten too used to putting on the façade...but you've taken it off for Yuri at this point, and it's not so easy for him to go between the two faces you wear."

Viktor grumbled quietly to himself.

"Lying by silence or omission is still lying...I'll probably give you away without even trying..." Yuri sighed, "I'm no where near as good as you are at hiding how I feel."

"It's especially hard on him to try and read you when you're wearing the mask because you're angry about something," Chris added, "I think it's time to consider refining your approach. Maybe just drop the act entirely."

"Now isn't the best of times to open myself up to that kind of thing."

"Why not?"

Viktor hugged Makkachin a bit closer and spoke into the poodle's fluff, "Aside from the fact that I'm sure people want me to rip into the RSF for firing me...?"

"...Sure?" Chris asked skeptically, rolling over slightly to look at the man more squarely, "What else is there?"

The silver hesitated, "...We...had some problems in Russia."

Attempting to sleep was impossible. The best Yuri could manage was dozing for a few hours, but every time he roused again, it felt like he'd been awake the entire time anyway. The weight of that empty time passing felt heavier with each spell. He had no idea what time it was when he realized that sleep wouldn't happen, and sat up instead, trying not to get too deep into his own head. Thankfully, Jiro was awake as well, and was eager for attention despite the dark.

...I don't know what I'd do if I didn't have you to distract me...

The pup's innocent playfulness was a welcome reprieve from the stresses of everything else, and for a few minutes, it seemed to offer the relief Yuri needed. Jiro was starting to get excitable though, and was starting to make little grunty-barking noises as he wrestled with his human's fingers.

Enough so that a bleary jade-eyed Russian turned over to leer at them.

Yuri gasped in surprise and put his hands over Jiro's snoot to try and keep him quiet, but the jig was up and Mikhail turned over entirely, "S-Sorry...!" Yuri whispered, feeling his heart in his throat.

"...How can you see in the dark like this...?" The elder asked skeptically, looking around in what - to him - was complete blackness.

"...I...I guess I had a minute for my eyes to adjust. It's not a lot, though..."

"Does the puppy need to go out or something...?"

Yuri looked down to the fluff pressed between his legs, and lifted his hands off Jiro's nose to let him
Mikhail rubbed his eyes, "I'm not surprised..." He yawned into his hands, and pushed up to sit, "I always have a hard time adjusting to new time-zones."

"...Sorry..." Yuri sank down again.

"It's fine, really." The elder insisted, moving the plush blankets off his legs so he could stand up. He pawed along the wall until he found the open door, and the bathrobe he'd hung on its upper corner. Threading his arms through it and tying it in front, he groped for the refrigerator and pulled it open, casting a dull light into the long kitchen. Able to see, Mikhail looked back into the room and gestured tiredly for Yuri to follow.

Confused, but curious, Yuri picked up his Akita and shuffled gently out of the bed, hoping not to wake the Tiger next to him. Once he was through the doorway though, it clicked shut behind him, and Mikhail slid the gradient-light switch, and let the circular overhead lamp turn on to a dim level. Yuri watched quietly as the elder went across the room and out through the gap to the foyer just to make sure the bedroom door was closed, and then came back, nodding that it was safe to put Jiro down. The puppy's little nails clacked on the tile floor as he rummaged around.

"They called this rental the 'Fantastic Suite.'" Mikhail started, still quiet but not quite a whisper anymore, and went around to the cabinets where he knew some tea-bags were stored, "It was one of the only places close to the arena that was both big enough for the bunch of us, and not so cheap that I worried about quality."

Yuri felt a bit awkward standing unmoving, but the Russian gestured to the pull-out black wooden table just next to him, and he quietly went about the business of expanding the segmented panels. Once fully extended, it was a table to seat four, and Yuri was able to find a place at one of the square black stools underneath of it. By then, Mikhail had already put on the electric kettle, and two mugs were ready with bags of white tea.

"I considered the Arcotel, but it was already booked out by the time I knew I needed to make changes so my girls could come...and the other Arcotel is taken over by the ISU for competitors and staff, so that was a no-go." The elder continued, leaning against the counter by the glass-top stove as the kettle heated, "It's surprising how few options there are for bigger groups, without having to rent multiple rooms."

As before, Yuri was unsure what to say, if anything, so he just nodded and listened, eyes going down to where Jiro was exploring under the other stools.

"How did the rest of your trip go, at any rate?" Mikhail wondered, casually crossing his arms as he looked forward, "Was everything with Kon okay otherwise?"

Nodding, Yuri leaned his chin into a palm, "...He has a new dog now... I can't pronounce the name, but it means Ghost." He started to explain, "He was out when Viktor and I got there. Scared the Hell out of us by shooting into the air when he got back, thinking we were burglars or something, and nearly ran us over afterwards on that giant horse."

"Even a guy who doesn't have much to steal will defend what he does have." Mikhail mused, finding the image of the scene funny, "Looks like he didn't shoot either of you though."

Yuri shook his head then, "No...Viktor was able to tell him who we were... He didn't seem too thrilled with the fact that we were there. Viktor's love of surprises clearly didn't come from his father."
"Noooope." The elder agreed easily, "He's a slow, steady, and consistent kind of guy...doesn't like change, doesn't like anything new. Everything has its place and knows what it's meant to do or be." He crossed his arms and made a face, "It's super boring...but I guess it worked for him."

"...Staying with Kon was probably the only good part of the whole trip, to be honest." Yuri added sullenly, "Even though it was rough, and stressful, and he didn't seem to like 90% of what we did or said...it was still better than everything else."

Mikhail was oddly quiet for a moment, and looked down at the kettle, watching the spout for steam so he could turn it off before it made any noise, "I can't imagine what could've been worse than spending a weekend with Konstantin Nikiforov."

"...Being too far away from him to protect us." Yuri answered, drawing up the Russian's confused eyes. "Even though he hates everything about us...he still kept trouble away. He tried really hard...I have to give him credit for that, even if it didn't work out in the end." He rubbed his eyes a little, "Viktor said he wanted things to change, so he could get Kon to admit that he was wrong about us...but when Kon said he would rather just let Viktor go than keep trying...it put Viktor in a weird mood. It...was bad enough that we were nearly attacked during our stop-over in St. Petersburg, but then when we got back, we found out that Viktor's old house had been burnt down, too..."

"...Attacked? Burned down?" Mikhail echoed, pulling the kettle away and clicking it off. He poured the piping-hot water into the two cups, and brought them over to the dark-colored table, "What in the world happened...? Why didn't you guys call me?"

Yuri shook his head and looked into the pale caramel liquid, reaching for a tiny spoon to push down on the bag and speed the steeping, "...We think Russia at large has turned its back on Viktor. The Aeroflot crew let Makkachin fly in a crate full of his own waste...so we had to take him to a groomer when we got into St. Petersburg. We went to get the camper while the groomer cleaned him, and when we got back...there were hecklers. I didn't even know until after it was all over, since I took Makkachin into the R.V. while Viktor paid, but they tried to get inside. Makkachin has never growled or bared his teeth, but on that day, he did...and Viktor said one of the people standing outside had a bat. They all threw snowballs at him, but he managed to chase them off... We were outside the city before he could tell me what happened." He said quietly, and rubbed his nose on the back of his wrist as he snuffled, "Someone had recorded the entire thing, but it was such low quality that you could barely tell who was really there. I recognized Viktor only because I knew what he was wearing. I'm sure he's worried that people who know him will see it and know it's him, too...even though Yakov said he got the vid taken down."

"...I haven't seen or heard anything yet."

"...That's good..."

"And the house...?"

Yuri nodded, and pulled the tea-bag out, setting it aside on the small white saucer under the cup, "Yakov said it had been vandalized. Viktor couldn't leave the city without seeing it, and for some insane reason, tried to sneak out in the middle of the night to go look... I barely caught him, and only managed that because I threw myself onto the hood of the car before he could get out of the garage."

"...Yeesh."

"...So after that stressful exchange, we went to go see the house...only to find that it was burnt to cinders." He added, drawing a pained breath, "I...I have my suspicions about what really happened. I saw a tiny section of remaining exterior wall that looked colored, as if by spray-paint... I think maybe Yakov burned it down himself to avoid us ever seeing what was written on it."

"...I see."

"I'm surprised you didn't know about that. Shouldn't someone official have contacted you about it?" Yuri wondered, looking past his tea to the man sitting next to him, "Since you bought it..."

"I'm sure someone should've, but if things are as bad as all that, maybe they chose not to out of spite."

"...Maybe..." Yuri agreed, looking back down to his tea again. He lifted up the small porcelain cup and blew on the hot water before taking a little sip. "Viktor was so stressed out after the incident with the hecklers...but even before that, as soon as we were in Russia, he started getting distant out of fear. He said on the train at the end that he was still worried about being his regular self with me...as though someone would break down the door of our cabin and drag him out at any moment, and throw him into a gulag or worse."

"I don't think you guys should go back to Russia." Mikhail said simply, "Viktor was a national treasure, but all that is gone now...so whatever slights they let him get away with before, are no longer protected."

"I told him the same thing. ...Even though it's been a few weeks since the RSF sanctioned and fired him, I don't think it really sank in what all that meant until we got through the weekend. He's...devastated about it all."

"Yeah, I'll bet."

"Being here in Vienna, for Euros...it's like everything's just gotten so much worse...because he's at the one competition outside of Russian Nationals where he isn't allowed to compete. He was the King of Euros before...but now he's just a spectator..."

Mikhail nodded and sipped at his own tea, "I can imagine... It must feel like coming back from vacation, only to find out you've got squatters in your house, and you're not allowed to throw them out. It's frustrating and takes a long time to deal with, and causes a lot of stress and heartache along the way. It can feel like no one is on your side."

"...I've been on his side though." Yuri pointed out, feeling that pain in his chest and throat coming back. His eyes had been slightly red all afternoon and night, and he could feel the sting in them as well even without the tears, "The whole time...I've always had his back. I was there for him, I comforted him, I gave him space if he needed it...I did everything I could for him...and after all that, after everything we went through, he just belittles me and gets impatient. I don't even know what I did wrong."

The elder listened carefully, and set his small china-cup into its saucer. He looked past his shoulder to the younger figure, "Tell me exactly what was said...and his tone as it changed."

Yuri pressed a palm to his forehead and closed his eyes, trying to remember it, "...We...were standing outside the venue. Viktor was a bit sad about being there as just a guest, but we were supposed to go to the public rink to practice our Exhibition, since he was invited by the Euros organizers to present on Sunday. He had been having trouble figuring out how he wanted to change his part of the program, because of his ankle...and wanted to get in some ice-time so he could sort it in real-time. I thought that getting on the ice would be good for him and make him feel better, but he just-"

"Ah ah...you're getting to the end already. Go back."
"Sorry." Yuri dipped his head, and tried to figure it out as told, "...We were about to go inside, and Viktor said he 'had to put his face on.' I knew what he meant, but I didn't think it was...such a literal thing to him..." He explained, feeling the wrench in his gut as he remembered the imagery of the moment, "He passed his hand over his face, and it was like he became a different person... A version of Viktor that I hadn't seen in a long time...one I barely recognized... He started speaking in that sweet tone like he does with fans and interviewers...but he was still saying things that were his regular self... That if people pried him for details on anything he didn't want to talk about, he'd have to start lying... I told him I worried that I'd blow his cover because I'm a terrible liar, and that I can't hide how I feel like he could. Worse still, I said I was worried that if I gave him away, people would start to think I was the reason he was unhappy, because he was fine before, right...?"

The elder nodded, and turned slightly on his stool to sit facing the younger man.

"He just said that I shouldn't have to lie for him, and that if it came down to it, he'd just do something else to avoid the topic so I wouldn't be put on the spot. Then he abruptly changed topics, and we went inside." Yuri went on, trying to sip at his tea again to calm his aching throat, "We figured we'd go see if we had to check-in with anyone since we were going to be Guest Skaters on Sunday. While inside though, a bunch of people started to recognize him, and we got swarmed. Well, he got swarmed...I was nearly pushed out. I tried so hard to keep hold of his hand so we wouldn't get separated...and I could feel him squeezing, too...so I know he was at least with me then..."

Mikhail lifted his hand and rubbed the skater's back, trying to soothe him in spite of the topic.

"A skater I recognized, Sara Crispino, came up to say hi... She asked about us skating in the Gala, and we told her we were there to practice the altered program. It sounded like she hadn't heard about Viktor's injury, so she asked about it... Viktor was still being dramatic about it then, like he was having fun with it, but then Sara pointed out how Viktor wouldn't have been able to compete at Euros anyway under the circumstances. I guess she was trying to make him feel better about not being in the right league to compete at Euros?"

"Who knows."

"...In any case... Viktor said that if he were able to compete still, it would be because he was still in with the RSF. He sounded a little salty about it, but nothing worse than he had been..." Yuri said, pressing a cheek against the knuckles of his ring-hand, "No worse than I expected he would be, given the mask he was wearing... He said suddenly that 'maybe a lot of trouble would've been avoided' if he hadn't been in Osaka. Sara teased about me fainting then, and asked who would've carried me out if Viktor was in Moscow...so I interrupted and said that I didn't want to think about what All Japan would've been like if Viktor hadn't been with me."

"Right..."

"Sara left after that, saying she didn't want to get in the way of us and practice...so we went to go find some skates for Viktor to rent. We realized the arena only rented hockey-skates, and I said that maybe it was a good thing that's all they had, because hockey-skates don't have toe-picks, so it wouldn't be able to really jump in them..." Yuri went on, swallowing a knot in his throat as he pressed on to the part where it all seemed to fall apart, "...He took it like a challenge though...and then started bringing up all the other risky behaviors we'd done before... My jumping at the Final after hitting my head, the both of us skiing that morning... I tried to tell him that I jumped at the Final because I don't jump on my head, but he just shot it back at me. So I tried to appeal to him by the fact that my injury happened before a competition, and his happened at the end...and if our roles had been changed, I'd have skipped skating the Exhibition, too...but then he just started saying that he couldn't understand me anymore. The words coming out of my mouth were just the incomprehensible honks
"I got it."

"We got into a bit of an argument at that point... He kept wonk wonk’ing me, and I tried to appeal to him by being serious...but he kept dismissing me. By the end of it, he just said that if I had my reasons for skating with a head injury, he could have reasons for skating on his bad ankle, and got short with me when I said I didn't know how to respond. He was like...'well, you put your skates on, and we go practice...' as though I could anymore." Yuri shot his head up, eyes redder than before, "He knows I can't skate when my head's somewhere else. He knows that...and he told me to lace-up anyway."

"Shhh... Breathe..." Mikhail advised, trying to keep the volume down.

Yuri lowered his head again, cringing slightly, "...I was just...so dumbfounded... I told him he was being a smart-ass, and asked why he was being so mean all of a sudden, because I thought he liked it that I worried about him. He just said it didn't feel like I was worrying about him, but that I was doubting and smothering him instead. After that, I was just so hurt that I put my blades on in silence and followed him to the rink. He wouldn't talk to me after that...he wouldn't hold my hand...he didn't even look back when he got on the ice." He slid forward on his elbows until his forehead pressed to his crossed arms, "I don't...even know how long it took for him to realize I wasn't behind him anymore... He started practicing jumps as soon as he got out there...like he was sticking it to me. I...I never bothered to follow him out there. I just left... No one in the crowd seemed to know who I was and... No one even asked where I was... No one tried to reach out until Yurio did...not one person...not even Viktor... I didn't hear from him until after I got here and had showered already...and it was only because I hadn't answered Chris' message..."

"...I see..."

"I don't know what to think or say about it anymore... I feel like Viktor washed his hands of me, and was only checking in after so long because he was worried what others might think if he didn't."

"You could tell him that."

"I c-can't tell him anything anymore..." Yuri lamented, "It's all just 'wonk wonk wonk' to him now...""

"Well, what would you want to say if he did hear you?" Mikhail wondered, raising a hand in an attempt to reset the part in his hair, moving it over his right eye, and flipped the extra hair over the left. Yuri's watery eyes blinked at him, but he shrugged, "I know I'm a poor substitute, but...it worked for Yura back in Bordeaux...so..."

Yuri just rubbed his eyes and shook his head, "...It's...stupid how much you look like him..."

"Maybe it'll help then. You know I won't dismiss what you have to say."

Yuri went quiet though, staring at the half-empty cup of tea before him. Jiro's cold nose sniffled around his toes and grabbed his attention, and he leaned down to pick the puppy up to help with his nerves. With the Akita on his lap, Yuri tried to gather his courage, "...Ehm...V-Viktor..." He started, feeling a little ridiculous at first, "...I don't...understand why you think I'm smothering you...when I've been trying to protect you from your own excessive ambition... You've...practically encouraged me...all this time...especially since we were in Detroit, and you joked...maybe seriously...about how you felt like you'd suddenly become the Beta between us...and how you felt relieved that you could leave things to me... You even said that you liked how I worried about you...and even though you hated being hurt, when I told you to go easy on that ankle...at least until now...I didn't think you hated me for pointing it out..."

Mikhail could feel his heart hurt, but he knew he couldn't say anything. His voice sounded nothing like his nephew's. Even the accent was all wrong.

"You know I wasn't trying to hold you back out of spite... With everything you could stand to lose if you hurt yourself again though...I felt like I... Like I had to be the annoying bug on your shoulder, stopping you from overdoing it..." Yuri continued, lowering his head a little, "...You're always looking to amaze and surprise people... You want so badly to prove to the RSF that they can't stop you... But you...have such a bad habit of making stupid decisions without thinking... And for what...!? You've won the Euros Championships more times than I have fingers...what could you possibly need to prove here? Why can't you just take it easy for once? People are going to understand that you're still recovering from an injury, and they're gonna cheer for you anyway! The Exhibition isn't even being scored! But Four Continents and the Olympics are, and they're right around the corner!" He lifted a hand to rub the wet from his eyes, and pressed it to the front of his sore throat after, "...If you get excited and do something to mess up your ankle again, that could be it for the rest of the season, AND your career."

The volume was increasing, but it was impossible to abort the situation...not that Mikhail would've wanted to anyway. He moved a hand up to pet back against Yuri's hair instead, hoping it would calm him a little and bring it down slightly.

"...And I understand, more than you know, how hard it is to quit this... I made you so mad at the Final because I kept doing the jumps despite hitting my head... But the situation really is different..." Yuri went on, sniffing again, trying to keep half an eye on Jiro in an effort to keep himself calm, "...I was...under so much pressure...all season long... After winning that Gold at Worlds, expectations were so high... Look at how many problems we had because I kept cracking under the weight of what people wanted from me...and despite it all, I managed to pull through and get into the Final with both Golds from my preliminary events... How could I just quit!? I'm the guy that broke your winning streak! To get to the Final, only to have JJ freaking Leroy collide with me...there's just no way... I couldn't show my face again if I dropped out... I'd rather try and be dragged off the ice, than just...give up..." He brought his hand up to cover his eyes again, "I still have so much to prove... With you as my coach, everything I do reflects on you... And I'm having to prove myself as your husband, too...everything is being judged... I hate that you can't understand things from my point of view... No matter how many times I tell you, I still don't think you know what it's like to be the nothing that got to take you off the ice! I used to revel in the idea...but now it's got me so scared! If anything happens to you...it's my fault!"

Mikhail slid forward and off the lip of his stool, and slid his arms around Yuri's shaking shoulders.

"...I'm barely holding it together as it is, because of all that pressure that I feel from the outside... Forcing myself to look at things rationally, and convince myself that things aren't my fault just because other people say they are... But I can't take it when it seems like you're judging me, too..." He went on, letting himself lean into the hug, "So why...why is it so easy for you to go for the jugular with me?" He asked, pausing for a moment to catch his breath, "You did it when you first came to Hasetsu, calling me Little Piggy like you didn't care that it hurt me... You did it at Cup of China, saying you'd resign as my coach if I didn't get on the podium, as if I wasn't already terrified that might happen... You even did it at Nationals, just two weeks ago, accusing me of not caring how you feel, when I couldn't tell what you felt about everything after all the help you gave to Asahi... And now you're doing it again—pushing me away, making me feel like less than nothing—making me wonder if I was ever the person you said I was to you... or if was all just... some... lie... like everything else... That Ch-Chris was right... and you only did this... for the shock-value..."

Jade eyes lifted past Yuri's head, spotting the blur of a faded blonde head passing before the windows in the living-room door. He dared not mention it. It was likely that everyone was awake by then, but as long as they didn't interrupt, neither would he.

"Th-this stupid mask... that you say you have to wear, so people don't try to get too personal with you..." Yuri continued, unaware of the extra ears, "Why does that prospect bother you more than how much you're hurting me when you wear it...? Minako-sensei says you're always nice to your fans... but what good is that when you're nice to them at my expense...? It's like you care more about what they think than you do what I think... It kills me to have to wonder how long it even took for you to notice I was gone today... Minutes? Hours? Did it even bother you? You looked like you were having so much fun without me there." He cried, feeling how the felt of the bath-robe was damp about his face. He drew a few pained breaths, but then lifted up on his own again and coughed, "...I don't... even know what to say or think anymore... Maybe I just... got in over my head... thinking a super-star could love someone like me..."

"I don't want to throw off your train of thought, but I can't stand to hear you depreciate yourself anymore..." Mikhail finally said, "I know for a fact that Viktor loves you more than anything. You're all he talked about and wanted when we were in Russia before NHK. He's a useless lump without you. He really fucked up yesterday, but it's not because he doesn't care about you."

Yuri was a liquid mess as he looked up, but those words couldn't get rid of the fear in his eyes, "...Wh-what... am I supposed to do though...? I can't... face him like this..."

"Let me talk to him first then..." The elder suggested, "I'll take what you said here and tell him... that way he knows what he's walking into when it's time. I should probably talk to him about what happened in Russia anyway... Just... for now, settle down, finish the tea... try to get a little more sleep before the sun comes up. Maybe you'll find it easier, now that you've gotten all this off your chest, right?"

"...R... right..."

Mikhail reached his arms forward to hug the younger man again, "It's gonna be okay. Everyone here loves you, too. We'll take care of this as a family. Viktor needs an education on how those work anyway..."

Yuri nodded against the elder's shoulder, and hiccupped a few pained breaths.
The sliver of light that came through the curtains was an unwelcome sight to tired blue eyes. To Viktor's sights, it just looked like the edge of the knife that had been pierced straight through him since the night before...the same sort he imagined Yuri had sticking out of himself, too. The kind that had his fingerprints all over the handle.

Viktor blinked suddenly and jerked awake; fully and truly awake. The light was gone...so was the knife's edge. The room returned to pitch darkness, and the beleaguered Russian collapsed back down into a heap.

The huge bed felt entirely empty, even with the lumpy form of Chris lying some distance away. Makkachin was lapping at a bowl of water on the floor nearby, but eventually clambered back up onto the blankets, turning in place like a cat a few times before flopping down. It was some comfort to have the poodle in arm's reach, but Makkachin's scratchy fluff was nothing compared to hot velvet skin in the cold morning air.

...Why do I keep doing this to him...? Why do I have such a hard time being gentle when I'm upset...? He's never done anything to deserve it...

Viktor reached an arm across Makkachin's side to rub his eyes, and squinted painfully against the burn.

...But I always manage to make a bad situation worse...like I'm kicking him when he's already down... Is he really just that sensitive...? Or am I...just that jaded towards how others react to me?

He rolled onto his back, keeping his eyes covered against the back of his forearm. One peeked out from under it though and looked up at the dark ceiling.

I'm so used to everyone around me always being 'yes' types... Other than Yakov, or Chris...maybe Yurio to a degree...everyone always did what I wanted, and took the crap I gave them like it was a gift... Have I been unintentionally trained to go to extremes because it's...the only way I've gotten people to react before...? I'm not good at making anyone feel better when they cry around me, because no one ever does...unless I make them...

'Skaters have hearts of glass...I wonder what would happen...if I shattered his...?'

"Yuri."

"...Eh?"

Viktor slid his gloved fingers under his bangs, and moved it over the right side of his head, "...If you mess up the Free Skate and miss the podium...I'll take responsibility by resigning as your coach."

The instantaneous crack could be heard around the world. Yuri's eyes were wide, and shock settled in on his paralyzed face. He looked on in stunned horror, unsure how to respond...or even if he'd heard right.

The coach felt a bit uneasy over it...but then Yuri fell apart. Tears scrawled down that pale face, dripping off his chin, "...Why...would you say something like that...like you're testing me?"

'Ah! It shattered...!' Viktor thought, feeling a tinge rush up his spine, realizing too late that he'd really overdone it.

The same feeling crept up the Russian's back as he laid in bed, but this time, it felt like those shattered pieces of Yuri's heart and psyche were being crushed and grinded into it. He grunted a quiet pained gasp, and twisted slightly, forcing himself to sit up and rub at it as he caught his breath.

...I d-deserve this... I can't keep hurting him...

Makkachin looked up at him curiously, tail thumping lightly against the thick, cushiony comforter. It thumped a bit faster when a hand came down to squish his head a little. Viktor rose up from the warmth then, sliding his legs out from under the blankets, and leaned over his knees as the sharp pains faded away. He stared at the still-darkened corner of the wall, the cool air washing over his clothed skin like ice-water.

...I don't even know what I'm going to do or say to make it up to him... He spent the night away, and had Yurio answer his phone for him...so he obviously doesn't want to talk to me...

Viktor turned back to the other figure on the second of the two mattresses, who sighed a breath in his sleep and continued dozing.

Chris is right though... If Yuri thought he hurt me by mistake, he'd be on the ground begging forgiveness. I've seen that...I know better... Yuri only runs when he feels like I'm judging him... He did it when he blurted out his original motivation for Eros...he did it again when he threw his skates off in Calgary... He just didn't make a scene before taking off this time.

Eyes went back down to the dark corner.

He didn't want anyone to know he was leaving. He...didn't want anyone to go after him... At least, not me.

He sighed and pushed up to stand, heading around the corner to the bathroom. A shower and a change of clothes later, Viktor grabbed up his blades and winter gear - and a pair of sunglasses - and went around the far side of the bed to nudge his friend awake, "Oi, Chris... Chris. I'm going."

Bleary-eyed and still half-asleep, the aforementioned figure looked up, "Yerwuht...?"

"Thanks for staying...but I need to figure things out on my own now. Feel free to use the place before you head out. I'll see you later."

Chris barely registered the sound of the door closing.

It was easier to sleep after the 4am chat, just as Mikhail had supposed, and the accommodating group let Yuri sleep until he woke on his own. They obliged in the task of taking Jiro out for morning relief in his place, and offered an hour or so of play before bringing the pup back inside to warm his nubbins again. When they returned, Yuri had awoken...and had found his phone.

Tired eyes were trolling through YouTube, but glanced up slightly as the crowd came inside through the long kitchen. Jiro was happy to run around on the much-warmer wooden floor, and slid around without a care, yipping excitedly. The noise drew a smile from Yuri's face, but the expression gave more away than even he realized.

Minako took one look at him and pulled her gloves off, "Yuri..." She started, coming over quickly to sit on the edge of the bed closest to him, only to stick both palms against his cheeks, "You look pale and clammy...are you feeling okay?"

Yurio blanched and immediately covered his mouth and nose behind a sleeve, "Damnit...did you get sick!?" He barked, only to get elbowed by both silver teens.

"...Uhm...I mean, I still feel tired, but..." He answered nervously, looking around the room at the worried faces looking back at him. Eyes went to Minako though, who had since pressed the inside of her wrist to his forehead, "...Am I too warm...?" He asked dubiously, dreading the answer.

"Maybe it's just cuz we were outside for a little while, but...you feel slightly hot to me," She explained, looking at him worriedly, "Maybe we can check again in a few minutes, once the rest of us have had a chance to warm up. You do look a bit ragged though."

Yuri nodded sullenly, "...I was out, but I don't know that I got much rest."

"Having a long and painful conversation in the small hours of the morning probably didn't help." She retorted, pushing to stand up again, and watched the dawn of realization cascade over the poor man's face, "...It's not to say that you were loud or anything, but...we were all light sleepers. I think a gust of wind could've woken us up."

"...H-How much...did you hear...?" Yuri blanched, looking to everyone slowly, "...This is mortifying..." He stopped on the Tiger though, "...And...you pretended to be asleep when I came back in..."

Yurio just scoffed, "I thought you'd end up too embarrassed to go back to sleep if you knew I'd been up. You already have enough shit to deal with." He seemed to recoil behind his sleeve then, "If you get me sick though, right before a competition, all my pity goes out the window."

"It's more-than-likely a stress fever," Mikhail reassured, "He wouldn't be contagious. He's just running hot because his engine's been going nonstop for too long. You heard what he's been through."

"You said you didn't get to eat anything after you left the rink yesterday, so you're probably starving," Minako added, looking down at her Yuri again, "Why don't you get dressed. This is a bed and breakfast. You've had the bed...now let's have the breakfast."

The spread was truly Germanic, with an assortment of soft cheeses, breads, jams, and oatmeal. Coffee was welcome, and with it, Yuri felt grateful to his stomach for letting him eat despite how tense and tight it felt. He was still in disbelief though that everyone had heard everything, even if part of him wasn't surprised at all.

"...I...guess I'm glad they all heard me through the doors... I don't have to explain myself again... But I still feel terrible for bringing all this down on them on the eve of their getting here. I'm sure this isn't what they hoped or expected to find."

He looked around the table though, seeing that everyone was still in good spirits despite the cloud hovering over his head.
I can see why Yurio likes to be around them. Having a big family, together like this...it really makes you feel like you're part of something.

"You've stopped eating, Yuri." Minako pointed out abruptly, drawing his eyes up, "You full?"

...Even she's gotten into it, he thought. She's always been kind of motherly with me, but there was a part of it where it felt like she was toeing the line between that and being a big sister. Maybe that's why she gets along so well with Mari-nee-chan. He shook his head and took another bite from the brie and bread in his hand, "I was just thinking." He explained, "Because my family works so hard to keep Yu-Topia going...we never really get to have a lot of times like this...where we just share a meal together or something. Someone is always bussing tables or cleaning up...taking shifts with our own food so service isn't interrupted. As much as I regret the circumstances that brought me here, I'm glad I am anyway. ...This is nice."

"You can stay with us as long as you want." Mikhail agreed, "We were gonna head to the arena after this so Yura can check-in."

"...Practice for tonight's SP will be this morning, too." Yuri added, looking to his younger namesake, "Or is the scheduling different here?"

Yurio shook his head, "No, it's the usual."

"Yeah...so you'll be at the rink for a while." He finished, looking a bit unsettled then, "I feel torn about whether I should go with you or not..."

"Try not to worry so much about anything." Mikhail suggested, "Not yet anyway. If we run into Vikt-"

"He's there." Yuri interrupted, "...I...saw it on my phone earlier. It seems I can't avoid seeing him even when I'm trying."

"If he's still there when we show up, then leave him to me." The elder went on, "You just stick with the rest of the group. You don't have to say anything."

Yuri could only nod.

The Erste Bank Arena was bustling with activity, with competitors, coaches, volunteers and associated staff - and fans trying to get a look at everything - all converging. The street outside Hall 2 was dense with spectators, looking into the rink through the road-side wall of windows. The glare from the sun made it hard to see too far in, but there were still skater-shaped blobs inside that passed within range now and then, and everyone got excitable over it. It was crowded on the peninsula in front of Hall 1 as well.

Yuri kept a surgical-mask on beneath his scarf, hoping not to really get sick while his fever was still going. Everything around him felt that much colder though, even under his layers, and he was as eager as anyone to get inside. Covered from head to toe, wearing his dark-blue pea-coat, a long plush scarf, gloves, and his beanie to top it all off, he was nearly impossible to recognize by anyone who didn't know him on a first-name basis. For the moment though, he was glad of it. For once, even Yuri's Angels was a sight for sore eyes...because at least with them, the Yuri in question wasn't him.

Waiting patiently with the group as Yurio checked-in with event staff and got his badge, as well as helping Minako sign-in as the teen's coach, Yuri focused on keeping his calm. Mikhail was like a watch-dog, keeping an eye out for anything untoward, and Jiro did his own job keeping Yuri's Minako flapped her hands around her head, "Whew...I'm getting so nervous. This is entirely unlike anything I ever did in ballet."

Yuri felt the weight of his eyelids pressing down, but he turned towards her anyway, "...Don't feel bad if you have to ask someone to find Viktor. He agreed to help you out, and I wouldn't want to deny you that."

She blinked at him, but tried to offer a reassuring smile, "That's nice, but I don't think I'll really need him until the SP tonight. It's just the atmosphere I'm getting used to right now." She pressed her hand to the side of her former-pupil's arm, "Honestly though, I'm hoping that by then, you and him will be on better terms anyway."

He just stared at her, brows crinkled above blue frames.

"...Erm..." Minako stammered, feeling a hot rush to her face, "No pressure though."

Yuri had no answer.

"Let's just go." Yurio interrupted, "Hall 1 is being used by the Dual Skaters, and Hall 3 is for Singles."

Minako squished her hands against Yuri's shoulders and started to shuffle him nervously forward. The sound of Jiro's tags jingling on his harness helped keep the man's focus, and he eventually leaned down to scoop the pupper up against his shoulder. With wiggly and excitable Akita twisted around until he could perch on it with both elbows and paws, and watched the world go by in reverse as Yuri walked through the crowd. With Jiro up so high, eyes started turning Yuri's way, but he quickly settled into the idea that those eyes were admiring the puppy, not questioning who was holding him.

Hall 3 was only accessible through an outdoor hall that came out the northwest end of Hall 1, but on that concrete terrace, Yuri could see through a second set of wall-length windows into Hall 2. From so high up, he could see the entire length of the ice, but because of the sun's glare, anything standing on it was little more than a shadow. Yuri's eyes refocused, and he could see his reflection in the glass instead of through it, and felt a hand against his upper back to get his attention. Mikhail was there, nudging his head towards the doors on the other side...but a flash of yellow-orange light through the glass caught his eye, and as he looked up, Yuri looked back.

The glamour was easy to spot, as the light hit gold-plated skate-blades just right. There was only one person at the European Championship who would be wearing those though, and Yuri felt a pit in his stomach.

Mikhail couldn't help but squint and try to see through the glass better, "...Is...he skating with sunglasses on...?" Yuri started to nudge him onward then, "...What a dingus..."

"If sunlight hits the ice then it can cause flash-blindness." Yuri explained, stepping from the blistering cold of the outdoors to the dry heat of the inside, and looked around at the mini-restaurant and catering area, aptly named 'Overtime Eat 'n Drink.' It looked like the kind of cafeteria you could expect to find on an Apple tech campus, with polished and expensive-looking, slick plastic bucket-chairs, a modern-chic counters at the kitchen. Through wall-length glass windows on the far side, Yuri could see the first seats of the Hall 3 rink-side seating.
The group pressed on, making their way through those very doors, and the hollow echo of blades on the ice rushed at them like a gust of wind. There were already a dozen athletes on the ice; Yuri recognized a good number of them, but there were always new faces turning up as teens aged out of Juniors.

...I don't see Chris down there though... is he in Hall 2 with Vik-

"Hey."

Yuri was nearly in the rafters from the surprise, screaming loud enough to get the attention of everyone in the auditorium. He crouched down low to avoid notice as he landed, and buried his face in Jiro's fluff for a moment before standing up again. He looked around quickly at the surprised faces nearby, but then pushed the offending Swiss skater back with a hand in the center of the man's chest, "You scared the crap out of me."

Chris just smiled innocently and threaded an arm over the shorter skater's shoulders, booping Jiro's nose as he went, and pulled Yuri close affectionately. The Akita seemed rather confused about it all, and went about the business of sniffing everything he could reach before coming to judgment about the man, "I'm glad you came out. I was worried you'd keep your head down all weekend."

"...I-it would be boring on my own..." Yuri stammered, still feeling his heart in his throat. He spotted Yurio impatiently gesturing at the ice though. Yuri obliged, starting to move towards the grey metal staircase that lead down to rink-side, dragging Chris alongside, "...Shouldn't... you be with Viktor though...?"

"Shouldn't you?"

Yuri cringed slightly, "Don't mess with me right now, please... I'm... not feeling super good."

Chris shrugged, "I thought it was an honest question, but I understand."

Mikhail stopped them halfway down the stairs and leveled Yuri a serious look, "Do you want to be left alone?" He asked, gesturing slightly towards the blonde for emphasis.

Yuri hesitated, but then shook his head, "I'm not... having a disagreement with Chris. It's okay."

The elder waited a moment in case minds were changed, but Yuri seemed confident in his words, and turned back around to finish following after his girls. He kept an ear out though in case the mood turned.

"We missed you yesterday." Chris started up again, letting Yuri go to walk on his own; he had nothing to say in answer though and stayed quiet. Chris drew a quick breath and tried to dispel the awkward air, "I hope you weren't alone for too long. I was worried about you."

Yuri hesitated, but shook his head, and found a seat on the lower row of stands with Nikki and Viktoria as Yurio sat to swap shoes for skates. He set Jiro on his lap and stroked the pup to soothe his fraying nerves, "...I think... we just narrowly missed each other." He said quietly, "I just went back to the hotel though and fell asleep for a while. I woke up cuz Yuri Plisetsky called, and then went to be with him and the others soon after. I... was technically on my own for a few hours, but I was out for most of it, so I don't know if it counts."

Chris had started to swap footgear as well, but was listening closely, "We kept trying to get away, but Viktor wouldn't move to Hall 3 like I suggested early on, and we got trapped by the fans and cameras. You know how they can get when there's competitor's on the same ice as them..."
Yuri nodded quietly.

"...I hope you don't get yourself stuck in an echo-chamber of your own making, Yuri." Chris added suddenly, more serious than he had been, and set a hand on the skater's knee, "We've been friends for a long time though, and I know that the longer this goes on, the harder it's going to be to sort it out later. Do you want to just cut to the chase and have me clock Viktor for you?" He offered with a huffed laugh, "You know I would. Viktor Nikiforov doesn't dazzle me."

Yuri just blinked at him in surprise, "...He...what? You spent all afternoon with him...didn't he tell you what happened?"

"I dragged it out of him." The blonde nodded, "And I've come to the conclusion that he was in the wrong. He made the ill-conceived choice to taunt you instead of just saying what he really meant, and now he's really paying the price."

Cherry-hazel eyes went down to Jiro, and Yuri hugged the pup a bit closer, "...He doesn't seem all that bothered right now... He's having fun with fans, he's livestreaming, messing around on the ice..."

"That's his comfort-zone. Please don't hold it against him." Chris reassured, "It's the only thing he has any control over right now."

"...I...wish he didn't look so damn happy about it..."

"Yuri, my dear friend," The older skater started, patting that knee again before pulling his hand back, "If you could see how badly he's taking this, you'd know how hard it is for him to put on that smile. But he has years and years of experience, having to put on a brave face even if things aren't going well or he isn't feeling it. If not for that, he'd have to use safety-pins to pull the corners of his mouth up. So...if you take anything that I'm telling you to heart...know that he's really not as happy as he looks right now."

Yuri looked up slightly as Chris rose up to his feet, watching the figure wave at someone on the other side of the rink.

"Ah...my people are here. I have to get going." He explained, leaning down with a hand perched on his own knee, the other coming down to Yuri's shoulder, "I hope you give him a chance to explain himself at some point. Don't let the mask fool you; it's not meant for you. ...The eyes always give him away."
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED EIGHTY FOUR

The venti white chocolate mocha sitting on the rink-wall had gone cold ages ago, but Viktor still sipped at it as he paused to take notes. The thick, sugary syrup had settled at the bottom of the cup. The notepad - with its many pages written-on and flipped away - was put to yet another new page, where more new notes were scrawled by cold fingers. Beads of sweat dripped down the Russian's pale skin, passing under the plastic arms of the dark sunglasses. A thin cord went from arm-to-arm around the back of the man's head, cinched by his hair to prevent the black lenses from flying off.

"How long has he been here...?" Sara wondered, sliding her arms into her Team Italy jacket.

Mila glanced back from where she leaned on the wall, but then turned her attention to the ice again. Viktor had pushed off and was gliding to take position near center, "At least as long as we have...probably since early this morning. They opened the doors for Pairs practice at around 6am."

"Oof...so glad I don't skate Pairs. That's too early."

"Right?"

Sara set her gloved hands on the wall and watched the Russian carefully, seeing the start of a delicate routine. Her eyes moved around the rink though, and its relatively sparse population of spectators, "...He must've been here for ages if the crowd's this thin now."

"I haven't seen him jump once." Mila pointed out, "Maybe people got bored."

"What's with the sunglasses though?"

"Who knows?" She answered, looking to the wall of glass at the far side, "Sun's move off. If the glare bothered him earlier, it shouldn't anymore."

"Staff on the other side are starting to kick people out. I'm sure they'll be coming this way sooner or later." Sara added, looking back the way she came to see if any yellow vests or suits were coming up; there was at least one grumpy-looking figure heading their way, flanked by a rather smug-looking shadow, "Can't let anyone sneak onto the ice for more practice time than they're entitled to."

"Viktor isn't competing though. Would they kick him out, too?"

"Mila, it's time to head out." Yakov called, coming up only far enough to see around the corner. He spotted his wayward skater, then the errant one out on the ice, "...Vitya..."

Their attention was grabbed then by the sound of the overhead speaker-system coming to life, crackling and echoing the end of a murmur before a man's voice spoke with a loud boom, "Das offizielle training für die ISU Europameisterschaft ist jetzt vorbei. Alle athleten, verlassen bitte die Eisbahn." He started, then repeated in English, "Zee official practice für zee ISU European Championship ist now over. All athletes, please exit zee rink."

Viktor came to a slow stop in the midst of cross-overs, and just sullenly glided backwards into open, empty rink, arms falling limp at his sides. He watched the scratches left behind by his blades carry on into the distance. He huffed to catch his breath, but started to overhear the chatter at rink-side, and spotted his former coach there scolding Georgi over something.
...Does that guy still feel threatened by me just because I'm here...? Jeeze...

He turned away and pushed off to head back to the corner with his drink and notes, paying no attention to the rest anymore. His interest in chatting was quite exhausted. It didn't seem to do anything about the dark grey shadow with its bright blue scarf and receding hairline from coming up on his right though. Viktor pulled his jacket off the wall and slid his arms into it, mentally preparing himself for what he was sure was coming.

[You're still spooking Georgi.] Yakov's voice said gruffly, much to Viktor's surprise, though he remained stony-faced about it as he adjusted the way his puffy-sleeved black jacket sat on his shoulders, [He still blabbers on about competing here as though you're on the roster and he's going to beat you.]

[He's never been able to beat me.] Viktor retorted, finding the two halves of the zipper and slid them together, [I've learned to ignore the way he stares at me. I got bored with his burning need for me to 'watch him' beat me a long time ago, since he never comes close.]

[Yeah, there's just no helping it.] The elder agreed, looking back to where Mila was taunting the man in question, and her and Sara went back down the corridor towards Hall 1, [He's letting it go after this season though. Says he's moving on to become a writer.]

Viktor couldn't help but chortle under his breath, but did his best to keep it quiet as he pulled the zipper up under his chin and reached for his blade guards, [At least he has a plan, I guess.]

[Mh... What's yours?]

The silver lifted his head, but with the sunglasses in the way, it was hard to know he was blinking in confusion, [...My plan? I have plans.]

[And?]

[...Be a skating coach? Skate in Gala events? I dunno, whatever else comes up.]

Yakov gave a skeptical look, [Coach to a student who hasn't been seen with you since yesterday...practicing a Gala presentation meant for two, by yourself...]

Viktor grit his teeth, and his hackles were immediately on end as he roughly put the rubber guards on, [Here it comes.]

[People are starting to notice that the Emperor is wearing no clothes, Vitya.] Yakov shrugged, [It's only a matter of time before they start to wonder if he notices.]

The younger Russian hesitated as he stepped through the opening in the rink wall, second blade half-inserted into its shield. Viktor shook his head slightly though and clipped it into place, [Of course I notice. You think I'm wearing these as a fashion statement?] He asked, pointing at the sunglasses strapped to his head, [You think I've been on the ice since 6:30am because I had nothing better to do? I needed to think...find out how my ship got so lost at sea.]

[Vitya, how many times have I yelled at you over the years about the fact that you don't listen?] The coach huffed grimly, [That the only person you ever really think about is yourself.]

[...A lot, but that doesn't mean I haven't changed.] Viktor grumbled in answer, coming fully onto rink-side to get the carry-bag he'd left along the base of the wall, under his ice-cold latte. He withdrew a thick-toothed comb and ran it through his bangs a few times, careful not to snag the cord holding the shades to his face, [I may still have a problem with listening, but I've learned to compromise and put others before myself.]

[...And how's that working out?]

Viktor shot the man a glare, even if the only part of it that could be seen was the salty bend in his crinkled brow, [Look, maybe I'm not as good at it as most other people, but I'm trying.]

[Vitya, you've spent your entire life bucking authority, and banking on the power of your talent to help you get away with everything. Who's going to tell Russia's rising star that he can't stay up late or that he has to study? Genius like yours crops up only once every few generations. You could've gotten away with murder, so long as you kept winning. Why do you think the RSF let you off on so many things they disapproved of, only to throw you under the proverbial bus when you gave up your Gold at the Final?] Yakov pointed out, watching as his former pupil swapped skates for boots, [It's a bad habit of yours to be impulsive and stupid because you never really had a check on your impulses. It's a damn miracle you still grew up to be a decent human being, considering what a spoiled brat you were.] That just earned him a contemptuous look, but Yakov was unrelenting, [But I think that's because being kind and honorable were traits that came naturally to you. You didn't have to be taught to treat people with courtesy because you already knew better. You just took it to the extreme, as you gained in popularity and fame. You were pleasant and charming even when you told people no, or insulted them to their faces...so no one knew whether they should even be offended by what you said, because you smiled and spoke so sweetly when you said it. No one knew how to be angry with you, never mind stay angry with you.]

[Where are you going with this?] Viktor asked suddenly, stuffing the two skates into his bag as he stood up. He looked at the shorter man next to him, waiting for an answer, but then realized...they weren't as alone as he thought they were.

"There are people around you, close to you, who don't know how to process their anger at you when you do or say things that are cruel. You've made the mistake of using that against them." Yakov explained - switching to English - knowing who was there without even looking, "I'm trying to get you to consider the idea, in a way that doesn't directly tell you to do so...because then you won't." He added, turning to step aside a little to finally go catch up with his skaters, "There's someone who is ready to tell you how mad you've made him."

Viktor watched, silently and dumbfounded, as Yakov walked down the long edge of the rink-wall to get to the exit hall's entrance. There, he passed one Rozovsky, and the outstanding Nikiforov, and exchanged a few quiet words with them both before stepping through and out of sight. Nervous eyes came back around as Yakov moved on, looking straight down the length of the rink to where Viktor was still too stunned to move.

Yuri looked over a shoulder towards the windows nearby, and spotted the dwindling crowd of people who were outside, still trying to look into the rink. A few had their hands cupped against the glass, trying to reduce the glare. They waved excitedly, as though expecting him to collect Viktor and bring the Russian to that corner of the building on the way to the exit hall, but he just sighed and looked away again. "Maybe we should've done this somewhere else..."

"Anywhere else is either in open public, or at your hotel room, and you already said that neither was an option right now." Mikhail retorted, "If you want to nip this in the bud, this is the best possible time and place."

Nodding, Yuri drew a deep breath, "Alright... I'm ready."

"After you."
Viktor couldn't hear what they were saying. He just wasn't sure if it was because they were too quiet, too far away, or because the sound of his heart throbbing in his ears was too loud. Every muscle in his body was both paralyzed and shaking, and the sweat from his hours-long practice had become cold like frost on his skin. The jacket helped in no way whatsoever to keep him warm. His blood ran cold, adding to his chill. Even spotting Jiro trotting alongside Yuri's feet did little to quell his dread.

It felt like an eternity, and instantaneous, watching the trio come closer to where he stood...and when they finally did, Yuri reached his gloved right hand forward, fingers closed around something.

"Here." He said simply.

The world went silent.

Viktor's heart shattered, and tears rolled down his cheeks, coming out from under the sunglasses like two thin cascades. He bowed his head forward, managing only a few abrupt breaths before he collapsed to his knees and started sobbing, "...Oh my g-god... Y-you're...giving your ri-...ring back..."

He cried, the bag falling off his shoulder to slide down his arm.

Yuri had nothing to say that Viktor could hear. He just stepped forward and reached down to grab a hand. The tiny item he held dropped into the Russian's palm, and he closed those pale, cold fingers around before letting go again, "It's ibuprofen." He corrected.

Breath caught in the Russian's ravaged throat. He raised up his bare, trembling hand though, and forced his fingers back open again, spotting two white tablets there in place of where he'd thought the gold wedding-band would be. A fresher cup of coffee was offered then, and he looked up through flooded, dark lenses to his Uncle's face, who'd presented it.

"No one is asking for a divorce today, nephew." Mikhail explained, "But there are a lot of really hurt feelings to deal with. And a hurt ankle, and probably a migraine. So, bottom's up."

With neither of the trio wearing competitor's passes, it was an easy thing to pass through Hall 1 without being bothered. They had to go outside though to get to the 'Overtime' venue, and found seats as far away from any doors as possible. With the two pills swallowed and some coffee drunk to chase them down, Viktor felt the heaviness of emotional exhaustion settle in, and he nearly collapsed against the table before him, elbows barely able to hold him up. Even with Yuri rubbing his back with the circular motion of one hand, he still felt as though he was on the edge of a small heart-attack.

Perhaps on purpose, but perhaps not, Yuri stayed on his partner's right side, making it easy for his ring-hand to sit on the table - with the gold band in plain sight - as the left continued on its slow path against a damp black t-shirt. He waited a little while to give the man a chance to calm down again, but once he was sure enough time had passed, he slid his hand up towards the closest shoulder to let the Russian know he was about to speak.

"...I don't...know what was going through your head yesterday..." He started, "In those few minutes after you put on your mask, before you told me to get my skates on... But, there's one thing that I need to tell you straight-up." He explained, watching Viktor's face turn slightly, nervously towards him. Yuri steeled himself, and reached toward the back of his spouse's head, crimping the clip that kept the sunglasses-cord taut, and pulled it down a few inches, "And I don't want to hear any arguments, excuses, or explanations. ...I...don't care." The shades came loose on Viktor's face, and Yuri pulled them up and away, cupping a hand around the man's opposite cheek to pull his sights around. Though those blue eyes he sought were wet, swollen, darkened, red, and closed by virtue of the fact that they were looking down, Yuri pulled the man's face up and over until he could put a hand on each cheek and stared at him evenly, "...Look up, Viktor."

He drew a quick and painful breath, but lifted his eyes. The agony in them was easy to see, and it was as obvious as anything that they'd been in such a state for longer than just the past few minutes; the sunglasses had been on all day to hide the spectacle of them from the world, not to shield against any sun-glare on the ice.

Yuri steadied himself, and swallowed a nervous breath, "...Don't...you...ever..." He started, pausing for emphasis, "...Ever...use that 'wonk wonk' thing on me again. Have I been clear?"

Viktor nodded.

"...Good..." Yuri replied, stroking his thumb once before letting go entirely again, "...That's...all I wanted to say."

Bloodshot eyes turned to jade on the other side of the table, but Mikhail just nudged his head in the youngest man's direction. He retrained his focus on the pup sitting on his uncle's lap then, keeping paws off the table as Jiro looked around inquisitively. A waitress came by a moment later with a coffee carafe, cups, fixings, and a small paper cup of whipped cream, and set it all on the table. She made no mention of the 'corner of despair,' asked if they needed anything else, and took her leave again when told no and thanked.

Jiro sniffed at the 'pupperccino' before sticking his whole snoot into the cup, licking at it eagerly, and came back out with white fluff all over his nose and baby-whiskers. He licked his maw clean though and looked quite pleased with himself for it.

Yuri smiled at the sight of it, feeling a little bit of relief in the midst of all the tension. He turned his eyes slightly towards his spouse though, wondering if any kind of reply would be forthcoming, but it seemed as though Viktor had taken his words entirely literally and had buttoned up. Yuri reached his left hand forward, sliding it over his husband's sleeveless forearm to find a hand and pulled it out. Taking the Russian's thumb into his grasp, and curling his fingers over the back of knuckles, Yuri slid his right hand forward to cup around the back of the one he held to sandwich it between the two, "I've...talked, and cried, and spent most of the night not able to sleep because I was so upset." He started again, quietly, feeling Viktor's fingers curl a little to return the light clasp, "But after all was said and done...it kind of boiled-down to two really stupid and avoidable problems."

"...B-both...are...are m-me..." The Russian attempted, voice raw and haggard.

"No." Yuri shook his head, "I have to take responsibility for my own part in this."

"I d-don't...unders-...stand..." Viktor snuffled, trying to pull some air in, even as he kept his head down.

"If we want to cut to the chase...the problem with you is that it's too easy for you to become someone else. The mask you've cultivated, probably since even before Yakov discovered you. The mask you used to hide your skating from your father, to cover your pain and shame after you left. To fool the whole world into thinking you were happy, well-adjusted, and content, when the truth is that you were miserable, lonely, and afraid." Yuri explained, almost too matter-of-factly, but he continued, "But the thing is...I've...I've done everything in my power to be there for you. I've been trying so hard to make you happy...to become the best skater in the world and make you proud...to fill your heart with happiness and joy as your husband..."
"You have," Viktor insisted quickly, as his strained throat would allow, "I swear you have...Yuri...you h-have..."

"So then why do you still have to put the mask on?" Yuri asked simply, "If I make you happy...if you feel safe, and secure, and everything is going well... If you don't feel like you're alone anymore, and you can count on me...then...just... Why...?"

The silver hesitated, pressing his face down into the crook of his left arm, bending it over his face to hide his wet and stinging eyes, "...I d-don't... I j-just...a-always have... It's...it's what I've a-always done... At e-every competition... In e-every...interview..."

"...You don't need it anymore, Viktor." Yuri explained softly, "The person you are, under the mask, isn't the person you used to be. Your father can't hurt you anymore...and he's shown that he won't, even if he had the chance. He protected us when we went to visit him...so that's all done and gone now. The fans love you no matter what...through quitting competitive skating for half a season to be a coach out of nowhere, through others surpassing some of your World records, through the surrender of a Grand Prix Final Gold medal, through the RSF sanction debacle... signing on with a rival country, and giving up your entire Russian identity to be the husband of the scrub that you quit skating to go find." He went on gently, trying to sound reassuring, despite not knowing if it would help. He leaned aside slightly to press their shoulders together, and gave the hand between his palms a soft squeeze, "Your worst fears have manifested and been overcome. You're safe now. ...The mask...can be put away."

"I'll...I'll tr-try..." "And I'll try to fix my major malfunction, too..." Yuri agreed, kissing the edge of that shoulder before pressing his cheek against it, "...Because I'm still letting the opinions of others...real and assumed...determine my feelings of self-worth."

Viktor lifted his head up slightly, and tried to look at the figure next to him, though it was difficult to see anything more than a wet blur, "I d-don't...understand... I th-thought...you said you didn't c-care what others thought..."

"When it comes to me personally...I don't care what others think." That only added to the Russian's confusion.

"...It's...a conundrum." Yuri added, "...I don't care what they think, but I care that you care what they think... Not a lot has changed since I yelled at you in that parking-garage last year. I still firmly believe that...everything I do...reflects on you. The good, the bad...all of it... But now, we're married, too...not just coach and student...and I feel like I have to live up to this insane standard...because you could have anyone you wanted... Your partner has to be above perfect."

Viktor choked a disbelieving breath, and tried to lift himself up a bit higher, "Y-Yuri...I've..." He started, "...I've never based my opinion of your worth on the op-opinions of strangers..."

"...I know...that's why this is a problem I have to fix..." He explained, looking on sadly at those swollen, reddened eyes, "It's part of why I'm asking you to drop the mask... It's like I told you yesterday, that I worry I'll give you away and people will think I make you unhappy. If you just...quit worrying about putting up a front, and you're honest about things when valid issues arise...then I won't have to worry people are blaming me for it, because they'll know the truth... These two problems of ours feed into each other...and it just becomes a horrible, painful cycle..." He said, and hugged a little closer, pulling one hand free to clasp it around his partner's arm, "...But we both have to agree to let go at the same time...otherwise we'll just end up right back here again..."
"No..." Viktor snuffled, shaking his head, "This can...n-never happen again..."

"So you'll agree to stop putting up a front?" Yuri asked, "...Not that I'm asking you to divulge all your secrets, but...to be free with how you really feel from now on... No more hiding..."

"And y-you'll agree...to take only my opinion to heart...when you w-wonder whether you th-think you're worthy of me... Since I'm th-the only one...who can decide that..."

Yuri nodded, nudging in a little bit closer again.

Viktor moved closer as well, and pressed the edge of their brows together, feeling a rush of relief flow through him, "...I'm s-so sorry...I put you through this... I never want you t-to feel like you have to...go somewhere else...ever again...

"It's okay... I forgive you. We'll work on being better together."
Staying a little while longer in the Overtime seating area, warming up on the fresh coffee and the addition of an actual lunch, Viktor took the time to try and clear the mental fog that had settled in the day before. With grievances addressed and amends made, he slipped the sunglasses back on to hide his eyes again, which by then were even more red and swollen than they'd been before. No one at the table was about to tell him to leave them off by that point though.

"So how long have you been at the rink anyway?" Yuri wondered, surrendering his whole left arm to the clingy-clutches of his ragged spouse, "I'd heard from others that you were here before they arrived, but everyone turned up at different times, so no one was really sure. Earliest I got was 9am."

"...Since the doors opened." Viktor answered quietly, "I...needed to think about everything. So I kind of went into auto-pilot, trying to figure out my revised half of the Exhibition." He nudged his head back towards the jacket behind him, "You should see how many times I redid all my notes because I couldn't focus. My body would go where I wanted it, but I couldn't keep track in my head..."

Yuri hesitated with the rim of a water-glass pressed against his mouth, but took a sip soon after and set the cup down, "So you've been at it hard for the last 7 hours."

The silver was the one who hesitated then, but nodded and avoided making the admission worse by nibbling on the edge of a wedge-fry.

"I was already worried that the last 4 would've been rough enough on you as it was." Yuri went on instead, fishing into the pea-coat hanging on the back of his chair, and withdrew the small bottle of ibuprofen he'd carried. He set it on the table next to his partner's plate, "You'll probably need these again later. Maybe we can see if the sports rehabbers will rub you down tonight so you aren't a wreck in the morning."

Half-shut eyes glanced down at the bottle, "...We didn't bring these with us. Why did you...?"

"Yuri has a fever." Mikhail answered simply, "We went to a pharmacy on the way over here to buy that and try to get his temperature down. When he heard you'd been practicing all morning on your own, he figured he could give you some, too, as a peace offering, so you'd know he was still looking out for you."

Viktor's brow crinkled behind the sunglasses and he lowered his face, "...I..."

"...Really took it the wrong way." The elder finished, offering Jiro a bit of the hamburger meat from his own lunch, which the pup sniffed and licked before eating, "I can only wonder what conversations you've had if the idea that Yuri would give his ring back even crossed your mind."

"...I didn't need to talk to anyone to think that's where this was headed." He answered, letting go of his partner's arm briefly to rub his eyes under the black lenses, "I was already worried that Yuri'd had enough. This is...what...the third time just since the Grand Prix started that we've been reduced to this state...?" He adjusted the frames back into place and looked outside the windows to the cold winter sky, "How many times will it take before it's finally enough...?"

"A lot more than this." Yuri answered, pulling his arm free to slide it behind his husband's back, "There was a little while where I was worried you were ready to end it...but the notion of me leaving was never something I thought about."

Mikhail raised a glass to that and nodded before taking a sip, "I'll attest to the truth of that."

Viktor just felt a pit in his gut, but without an arm to hold onto, he moved his hand down to his spouse's leg, curling his fingers around it gently, "...I wish there was something I could do or say that could convince you that I wouldn't just give up like that." He looked back again, and down his shoulder to where Yuri was resting against him, "...You seemed to trust me more when I wasn't competing. Should...I retire for good...?"

"If you're gonna go that far, you might as well suggest blinding yourself and having your legs cut off, too." Yuri shook his head, "I would never ask you to give up your passion for my sake...and besides, I was the one who wanted you to stay in for one more year. I knew what I was asking."

"...Then what can I do...?" The Russian asked, a pleading tone to his strained voice.

"Just what you already said you would do; be yourself. The rest is up to me... Training myself out of my anxiety is going to be hard." Yuri explained, spooning up a bit of his tomato-basil soup, "Jiro has already helped a lot with that. Trying to stay entirely off of social-media has, too...but it's a double-edged sword."

"What do you mean...?"

Yuri lifted another spoonful before patting his lips on a napkin, "I was so preoccupied with the fact that I was invisible at the rink, that I didn't see how many people were actually asking about me online. I kept getting mad at how many livestreams there were of you on your own, so I shut the internet down and just assumed that no one cared that I wasn't there." He explained, feeling a bit down about it again, "...But then people noticed me in Hall 3 earlier today, and started asking why I wasn't around all afternoon yesterday, and why I was with Yurio rather than you now that I had turned up again... So I went back to all the pages that I'd been mad at, and actually looked at them...and felt really stupid about my fears, because it seemed like nearly everyone asked where I was."

"...And you still think people look down on you as being my partner...?" Viktor wondered, "They'd be saying 'good riddance' if they thought you were unworthy, wouldn't they?"

"That's what got me thinking about everything." Yuri admitted, stirring his soup idly, "I'd gotten so wrapped up in my anxieties that I was making up scenarios and opinions, rather than looking at what was really there. Then I spotted Yakov with Mila and Georgi...and I put your old advice into action again."

"...Hug him and he'll help you..."

Yuri nodded, "I didn't want to put Mikhail into the line of fire again when it had only been a week since you and him sorted things out...and I thought maybe Yakov would have better insight into why you were like this anyway. So...I told him what was going on, and he agreed to help me get your attention."

"...I see." Viktor answered, pausing for a moment to absorb all the new information. His sore eyes scanned the plate in front of him, and the last few wedge-cut fries that were going cold on it...and the interested puppy on the opposite side. Jiro licked his lips and started to fidget as Viktor picked up a fry with a fork and ushered it across the table towards him, and scrambled to get at it once it was within sniffing distance. The morsel dropped off the fork and Viktor pulled his arm back, but he turned his eyes up to his uncle, "...Thanks for keeping an eye on them overnight."
"Sure." Mikhail answered, watching as the Akita in the seat next to him made quick work of the potato-bit. "Who kept an eye on you though? Just Makkachin?"

Viktor shook his head, "Chris stayed with me."

"He's a good friend to you."

That earned a grumble, "...I guess so."

The hotel-room door clicked and whirred, and Makkachin was immediately up from his napping nest, rushing towards it excitedly. His whole body swayed from side to side with the force of his tail-wags, and he jumped up when the two men stepped inside. Viktor crouched down to keep the poodle from going airborne, and Yuri snuck past, unhitching Jiro from his harness before the poodle came rushing up again. With the little Akita set onto the floor, free to run around at his pleasure, Yuri greeted the worried boofer.

"It's okay, Makka...I'm back, I'm back..." He said, hugging the wiggly brown fluff, "I just went to stay with Yurio and the others."

Makkachin seemed satisfied enough with the human-noises he heard, and bounced back towards the door again, pawing at it before glancing back.

"Seems he wants his turn outside." Viktor surmised, pausing his disrobing to start pulling the coat-zipper back up again, "...I'll take him."

Yuri pushed back up to his feet and shook his head, "You'll get sicker than me if you don't shower and change. You've been in damp clothing too long as it is."

One finger lifted up the shades from beneath, and Viktor's stress-ravaged eyes looked out into the dimness of the room, "...Even just to take the dog outside, I feel weird letting you go already..." He sighed, "Last night felt like forever. Hearing someone's breathing in the room that wasn't yours..."

"I can relate." Yuri answered, "I think the only reason I managed to fall asleep at all was because I had Jiro with me. ...It'll be fine though; it's just to let Makkachin out. I'll be back before you're done." He said, reaching to cup a hand across one cheek, and stroked his thumb just under one eye, "...So go warm up. We can't both be sick this weekend."

Viktor sighed and leaned into the palm, and stepped forward to slide his own hands around Yuri's sides to pull him closer, "...After everything we went through last week...I still can't believe I put you through what I did... I don't know how I'll ever be able to make it up to you..."

"You promised with me that we'd both make changes, and I forgave you... I'm not asking you to make it up to me, too."

"I know, but I..." He started again, bringing one hand up to thread his fingers around his husband's, and kissed the ring thereupon, "...I feel like I've fallen far short of being the man you believed me to be. I don't want to think that you fell in love with the mask I wore, since that's the persona you saw from that distance over the years. The one I used so the world would like me."

Yuri shook his head, extending a finger to nudge the Russian's lips, as though to shush him, "I idolized you for your skating. I like to think you showed your true heart on the ice, even if you didn't speak from it. I don't think I ever expected you to expose that much of yourself on camera anyway. I got to know the real you over the months after you came to Hasetsu...and" there usually weren't cameras around. ...And it's not as though the two are really so different...but the mask lets you keep up the image of being happy when you're not."

Makkachin whined and pawed at the door again, tail wagging a bit slower as he looked back at the two nervously.

"I'm coming," Yuri answered. He turned his hand slightly, and gently pinched his thumb and forefinger over his husband's chin as he pulled it back, "Go on. There's nothing to worry about."

Viktor reluctantly nodded and let go, turning in place slightly to watch Yuri and the poodle head back out through the door. The room collapsed into an uneasy silence...but, almost thankfully, Jiro barked to break it up. The pup beckoned for attention, rushing forward playfully to attack the Russian's boots, but Viktor quickly bent down to hoist the Akita up before needle-like puppy teeth could cause damage, "...Those are expensive, little buddy." He said quietly, propping the silver-brindle fluff against a shoulder. A little pink tongue-tip hung out of the pup's mouth, perhaps unknowingly, and Viktor lifted a hand to poke it with a finger, "Blep."

Jiro yipped and wiggled playfully, moving in to lick his silver human's face a few times, drawing up a subdued laugh, but a laugh all the same. He yipped again in that high-pitched puppy voice, paused briefly, and then uttered a very smol 'awoo.'

Half-shut eyes, swollen as they were, looked on at the pup fondly, but like most things that day, Viktor fell back into a slump. He snagged the Akita's fuzzy neck and set the pup back down on the floor, offering a head-pat as he rose back up again, "Thank you for being what Yuri needs when I can't be."

Makkachin burst out of the pet-rest area beside the hotel like a ballistic missile, snow kicking up behind his paws with every bound. The footpath area wasn't quite as occupied as it had been the morning prior, but there was still the odd cold-weather jogger that passed through, splashing a bit of color into an otherwise white, brown, and sky-blue landscape. He sat down on a small section of dry concrete steps just near the back doors and thumbed away on his phone.

[...Yeah, sorry.] He wrote, [We were going to take you out before Opening Ceremonies, but with the way things went...]

Yurio's answer was expectedly disappointed, [...I get it, ugh.]

[So when CAN we go?]

[Tomorrow night? Before the FP?]
[Or would you rather wait till Sunday?]

[I'm more inclined to ask when it would be better for you two idiots because you're both probably going to be sick after today.]

[Sorry...sorry... /dogeza/]
[I'm thinking Sunday then... We'll let you focus on competing and not distract you.]

[So before the Gala.]

[Yeah]

[...Fine.]
[I'm gonna hold you to it though.]
[If something happens and we have to postpone again, I'll just give you my bank card and you can go to the most expensive place you want]

[It's not about getting fancy food, stupid]

Yuri jerked his head back slightly, but was distracted as Makkachin came rushing up to him, big pink tongue flapping around as the poodle panted from his zoomies. He slung an arm over the poodle's back to hold him still and looked back at his phone.

[It was supposed to be about just the three of us getting to hang out, like old times. After everything with the old man, and shit hitting the fan every five minutes, and then all of those things getting mixed together cuz of Saito back in Hasetsu, it's just been hard to pin you guys down. I don't care if we go to Pizza Hut, as long as we just get to do something on our own eventually.]

Yuri felt a pit of guilt in his stomach, and shook his head slightly as he rose back up to stand and started heading towards the door. He kept his eyes down as he typed, but focused his peripheries on Makkachin and the path forward to avoid running into anything, [Well, we have a time in mind, and I don't think Viktor and I will be getting into any new arguments before then.]

[Don't borrow bad luck.]
[You can't afford it.]
[Cya later]

[Laters...thanks Yuri]

Fatigue was settling in heavily by the time he made it back to the room, and he dragged his feet across the threshold. Shoes were nudged off, and Yuri trudged towards the bed, pausing only long enough to listen to the sound of the shower running as he passed the bathroom door. It was only as he sat on the edge of the bed, bent down to lift Jiro up next to him, and pulled his glasses off that Yuri saw the two roses, bottle of wine, and box of fancy chocolate sitting on the night-stand.

Surprised, he moved to set his folded glasses down, and lifted one of the roses in their place.

...Viktor must've gotten this stuff yesterday, thinking I'd be here when he got back.

As if by providence, the sound of the shower cut off as he thought the words, and about a minute later, the light cut off and Viktor stepped out. With a towel tied around his waist and another ruffling his wet, silver-steel hair, he came around the corner and was relieved to see Yuri there as he'd hoped. Seeing the rose in the younger man's hand though, he knew that much-needed nap was still a few more minutes off. He ruffled his poodle's fluffy ears as Makkachin came trotting up again, and then stepped forward to sit next to his husband.

"...I didn't want to get this stuff, to be honest." He admitted quietly, touching his fingers under the clear plastic film to lift the rose towards himself, and smelled it, "Chris made me buy it. I...thought it was kind of tacky."

"I could see that," Yuri agreed, smelling the rose as well, then set it back down next to its twin, "Your style is a bit more extravagant. Go big or go home."

"I wasn't even sure if I should buy anything at all, really." Viktor added, "If I were going to, I wouldn't be buying it from a gift shop at the airport, at very least... But I felt like the idea of trying to buy your forgiveness, in this case, probably wasn't the best plan."

"Chris meant well. But...I agree with you. Apology flowers are best used for other things."

"Like trying to make love in public."
"I thought that huge bouquet was for going in dry." Yuri huffed, thinking back on that banquet fondly, even if it was a pain in his arse at the time.

Viktor scritched the towel against his hair a little more before pulling it away, and tossed it to the desk across from the foot of the bed, "Maybe it was. It's all a bit hazy now." He explained, though he managed a smile at what he could recall, "I mostly remember how squirmy you were when we were waiting at the airport the day after."

Yuri's cheeks went pink at the memory of it, "Yeah...that event ended on a high note, all things considered."

"You think we can salvage this one, too?"

"I see no reason why not. It's barely started." He answered quietly, tugging on the ends of his sleeves to pull his hands back through the cuffs. The thick winter sweater came up over his head then, leaving just his thin under-shirt, "But I think maybe the best way to kick-start things is to catch up on the sleep we missed last night."

Viktor huffed a sad laugh as his husband stood up to unbutton his jeans, and he rubbed his sore eyes, "...We're turning into a regular couple of old-people, you and I. Taking naps all the time."

"Just wait..." Yuri chuffed, sitting back down as he peeled his socks off, and pushed his way back up onto the comforter before turning around to beckon his partner to come closer, "If we get our sleep in now...then we can spend all night enjoying ourselves. It's not my competition so I can drink."

"Are you suggesting we get rowdy?" The Russian wondered, curiosity piqued. The towel around his waist came loose and fell away as he made his way up the bed, but it wasn't worth going back for. He reached instead for the second big blanket behind himself, and gave it a good pull to toss it over both of their prone forms, "Cuz it sounds like you think we should both get drunk again."

"Maybe not completely...but..." Yuri mused tiredly, relishing in the feeling of his husband's hot skin sliding in under his t-shirt to pull him closer, "...Yeah, we should go have some fun."
Like the living alarm-clock that he was, Viktor stirred precisely when he meant to - 2 hours after falling asleep and 2 hours prior to the start of Opening Ceremonies. After the day's earlier revelations though, it wasn't entirely a surprise for Yuri's lithe frame to feel warmer than it should. There were a few beads of sweat dotting the younger man's skin, and his sparse clothing had become damp, along with the pillowcase under his head. Viktor pulled his arm out from under his partner's back and used it to prop himself up on an elbow, and slid the other up to gently move a few strands of stray long hair from his husband's face.

...This is the third time he's gotten so worked up about something that he's caused himself some kind of harm over it... Throwing off his skates in Calgary and running himself ragged until he lost his voice, then the overly-hot water and scratching at himself because of Saito... ...I...never thought I'd be a reason for one of those occasions myself though...

He sighed quietly and lowered down to kiss his partner's brow, but then held there, nose pressed against skin.

I can't ever hurt him again... I don't ever want him to run away from me again... What happened yesterday should never have happened.

"Mmmh...Viktor..." Yuri mumbled sleepily, rolling slightly in place until he could squish himself under the larger frame hovering over him. One arm found its way across the curve of the Russian's bare waist, but he easily fell asleep again once he was there.

Not wanting to bother him, Viktor stayed right where he was, free arm curling around his husband's side to caress his back. It was eventual, however, that the waking antics of the two dogs would pull Yuri from his nap. Makkachin ran up and down the room with Jiro giving chase behind, trying to catch the fluff's ears or tail, nails catching on the carpet. Yuri's eyes opened blearily after the big poodle made one big leap onto the bed to bounce over the Akita's head.

"Guys! Settle down!" Viktor attempted, though it did no good, and Yuri rolled onto his back.

Yuri snuffled and rubbed his face with both hands, realizing easily that he'd worked up a sweat while he slept, "...Mh... I thought my fever would break once we sorted things out... Guess not..."

"Let me get you some of those tablets. Your last dose is probably wearing off, that's all." The Russian offered, wiggling out the back of the blanket-pile so as to keep his spouse covered. His pale frame moved towards the footboard and into the front closet, rummaging for the ibuprofen bottle in his jacket, and returned with both it and a small water-bottle.

Two little white pills went down the hatch, and Yuri rubbed the back of his wrist against his mouth before capping the bottle again, "I guess there's not much time before we have to get to the arena."

"About 90 minutes before the OCs start."

Yuri nodded, barely managing to put the water-bottle down on the night-stand before a yawn settled in, and he reached up high with both arms in a stretch. He slid down the red leather headboard until he plopped back down into the pillows, and held still there. He could feel the blankets and mattress shift a little as a weight lifted up off of them, though he half-expected it to be Viktor wandering off to find some clothes to put on. Instead, that naked frame came down directly on top of him, followed by a ticklish snog and a number of kisses wherever they could find skin. By the end of the wiggle-romp, Yuri found himself plopped up on top of his partner's chest and was laughing. He looked down fondly at his husband's disheveled silver hair, unbrushed since toweling it dry earlier in the day, and then at those crystal blue eyes, less swollen and red than they had been, "...You look like you managed a bit of real sleep, too."

"Maybe a little bit."

"Your internal clock is going like we have to be there to get ready." Yuri countered, sliding a leg across to pull himself over, so he was directly over his spouse's broad, pale chest, "...I know it's hard to shake the disappointment of being at an event that you were originally scheduled to compete in...but try not to think of it that way... " He suggested, sliding down off his elbows to extend his hands and arms around his partner's head, putting them within inches of nose-tips, "And not just because you'll be competing at 4Cs instead, but...next year, the ISU is probably going to work harder to make sure our little PodiumFam isn't going to be competing against one another at all in the GP Series. So...if we go with Yurio to his events, especially if you end up choreographing for him, then...we'll be at all 6 events, and neither of us will be competing in at least 2 of them..."

Viktor inhaled a long breath, sliding fingers under the edge of his partner's t-shirt, "...I appreciate that you're trying to help...but I need to make peace with this in my own way. This is all just...really hard."

Yuri nodded meekly, lowering his face down to press his nose down to the Russian's collar-bone. He took meager comfort in feeling Viktor's hands slide further inside the back of his t-shirt, and the slow stroke from shoulder-blade to hip and up again.

"...And it's no excuse for the way I treated you yesterday." Viktor added quietly, "So...right now, I just want to focus on us... Euros is nothing compared to that."

"...I really didn't mean to scare you earlier...when you thought I was giving my ring back..." The younger figure commented quietly, "If I knew your mind would go there I would never have gone about it that way. It just...seemed like you were having so much fun without me that...it was like you didn't care I was gone. I thought I was going to have to win you back..."

"I wasn't having fun." The Russian answered simply, raising his arms up into a clutch around the smaller man's frame, "...Far from it...that was the performance of a life-time, to keep people from thinking something was wrong. I even had to fool Chris, and he knows when I'm hiding something, even if he doesn't know what it is."

"...Well, you've known him for over 10 years now. I imagine it's harder to pull one over on him."

"He does have more practice than most." Viktor agreed tepidly, "I didn't tell him what was going on until he forced me to after we left the rink yesterday."

"What'd he say?"

He hesitated to answer, and instead, rolled them some to flip their positions. Viktor pulled his arm out just enough to hold himself up, and leaned up onto his side, pressing his free hand down onto his spouse's chest, feeling the rhythmic thump of the man's heart just inches below, "...Plenty of things. Most of which I didn't want to hear, but probably had to."

"...I see..."
"Apparently my prominence on the world stage has made me somewhat callous towards the idea of listening to people." He tried to explain, "And so when people try to force me to, I get...a bit prickly." He said, and lowered down to wedge himself against his husband's shoulder, forehead pressed to raven hair, "...I know I have a long way to go. To train myself out of the idea that being Viktor Nikiforov means I'm above reproach. After spending the first 12 year of my life having absolutely everything controlled by my father, only to be thrust into stardom...and get the ultimate freedom to do absolutely anything I wanted... It got into my head that if anyone tried to control me again, I'd react badly..."

"...I thought you said it was a relief that I took the lead on things?" Yuri asked nervously.

Viktor just turned his head back and forth a few times, "That's different. Being the responsible one between us isn't the same as putting limits on me."

"...So then all of this is because I tried to stop you from jumping."

"...Yeah..."

Yuri brought up one hand to pinch the bridge of his nose, "...I was just trying to watch out for you. The competitions coming up are so important... If your ankle went out again, you could risk the entire rest of your career."

"And what about your head injury was so much less important that you went all-out in spite of it?" Viktor shot back, "The stress you put me under, having to watch you compete even after staying in the hospital for so many hours because you wouldn't wake up..."

"I know, it makes me a huge hypocrite..." Yuri admitted sullenly, "...Maybe I...took advantage of you, too." He sighed, turning his head to stare up at the ceiling, "...Because I already knew you didn't know how to deal with someone who's crying. Not to say that I turned on the water-works on purpose - I really was upset about the whole thing - but I guess...I had hope that you'd cave if I was upset enough about it. I just...couldn't stand the shame of dropping out when I'd worked so hard to get to the Final. I was under so much pressure... I didn't think I would ever skate again if I quit then."

Viktor turned over onto his back then and stared at the popcorn-texture above them as well, "...I should've pushed harder to pull you out."

Yuri lifted up onto his elbows, "But I won Silver..."

Slate eyes turned, "I should've gone in front of everyone and told them I was withdrawing you from the Final. It was my responsibility, and I let you go out there anyway..."

"Viktor..."

"The doctor even told me that your injury might cause permanent personality changes...and I'd already gone through a worst-case-scenario at Worlds last year when you dropped and woke up with amnesia... I was so reckless with you..." He carried on, "I'm so used to not letting anyone tell me 'no' that I don't even know how to tell others 'no'...even if it could mean life and death, or worse..."

Yuri just laid back down again, unsure how to argue that.

"...I have to learn how to be a real spouse...not just a live-in friend with benefits." Viktor said, throwing Yuri off slightly, "I have to place limits, and I have to accept some in turn... I also have to stop treating you like I can get away with whatever I want just because I know you're a fan of mine."
"...When did everything become so complicated...?" Yuri sighed.

"Love is complicated."

"...Yeah..."

The winter sun had fallen below the horizon by the time the Ladies Singles event finished, and an intermission was called to clear the ice and ready the stage for the Opening Ceremonies. The venue was cleared out, and those who had already been there, spectating the previous two events, were regrouped on the concrete peninsula outside. Headlights from parking cars and street lamps sparkled in the dark, with everyone heading towards the arena.

Without staying at the Official Hotel, Yurio had to wade through the crowd to get to the barricaded walkway where other competitors were being dropped off by the shuttle. Being who he was though, it didn't make any difference whether he was recognized or not, and simply tugged down the front of his hoodie as Minako walked nearby. They made it to the start of the walkway with the Rozovksy trio in tow without too much fanfare; it helped that Yurio had put on a plain winter jacket on top of his skating garb to slip under the radar until they were ready. Once they were by the shuttle drop-off though, they paused and prepared to go their separate ways.

"Good luck, Yuri," Mikhail started, extending a hand forward before pulling the teen close into a quick hug, "We're pulling for you. No drama to keep you down this time."

"...Only as long as what you said about Viktor and katsudon is true."

"Why would I lie about that?" Mikhail answered, making a face as he stepped aside towards Minako, "I'm sure they'll be here any minute, then you'll see for yourself that they made up."

Yurio huffed and shook his head, but then shrugged out of his scarf and winter jacket, handing them off to Nikki mere seconds before she glomped over his shoulders, "Good luuuuuck~!" She cheered, "And have some fun out there! Don't be so serious!"

The blond allowed himself to hug back with one arm, but then pulled away again, "...I'll try."

Viktoria just waved and smiled, "Udači." (Good luck.)

Yurio quirked a brow, "I thought you didn't know any Russian."

The older teen just shrugged, "I asked pipaw what to say. So...go go Team Russia. Do good in the skirmish. Score the goal unit." She teased.

Yurio just shook his head and turned back to the two adults in the group. He could hear the start of a cheer rising in the crowd further off as a few fans started to realize he was there, "Let's get going."

He suggested, "I don't like it when they scream right in my ears."

"Just a second," Mikhail answered, and turned back to Minako. He pulled both of her hands up between his own and kissed her fingers, then her ring, then her brow, "No pressure. No stress. It's just like a ballet thing, just on the ice."

"Thisisnothinglikeaballetthing." She retorted nervously, "OohhhhhmygodI'msonervous."

"Settle down-"
"Ahh you don't understand!" Minako lamented, "All those years I bothered Yuri just for room numbers, I've kept my distance! Just a fan, admiring from afar! Now I'm going straight into the wolf’s den-"

"Wolf's den...?" Yurio chortled, "Please. Most of these guys have been hanging around like bugs on a hot day."

"Most?" Minako retorted, grabbing Mikhail by both arms to shove him out of the way like a big sack of rocks, "Try three..."

The teen just cocked a brow at her. Before another word could be said though, the recognizable shrieks of the far-off crowd were noted - distinct from the ones Yurio had heard a moment before from his fan-group. Heads turned, and eyes squinted against the mass of people. From that distance, it was difficult to see what the commotion was over, but a part through the crowd gave Mikhail a good view of two particular dogs...and one silver-haired head with a pair of shades on.

"Oh, there they are. Right on the corner." He said, pointing, then raised that same arm to wave instead, "Look for the dingus wearing sunglasses in the dark."

Yurio looked back again, and sure enough, the crowd was starting to coalesce around two central figures. It was easy to recognize Viktor then, since he waved back - or at least lifted a coffee cup in their direction - and he leaned down slightly to the bundled-up mass of coats, hats, and scarves next to him. Like before, practically nothing of Yuri could be recognized given how much of him was covered by something, but the puppy he held up against his shoulder was easy to sort out.

The pair started skirting the edge of the road to get around the crowd, camera-flashes following them like glitter. Yuri set Jiro down to walk on his own again, and the pup trotted happily alongside, sniffing at everything as they moved. It was odd to see Makkachin on a leash for once, but the poodle seemed to take it in stride, and jumped right up onto Nikki when they got near enough, sniffing her face before going back down to the ground.

Yurio was more relieved than anything, and pushed his way to the front of the group to look the pair over. He couldn't help but linger on Viktor though, and cocked his head up, "...Why are you still wearing sunglasses? It's pitch dark outside."

The silver Russian just moved his coffee cup over to the leash-holding hand and used those free fingers to lift the shades. His eyes were still a bit red and puffy, as though he were having severe allergies, and he lowered the frames again in front of them, "I'll take them off later."

Yuri tried to pull the surgical mask off his nose, but couldn't quite get a finger to hold onto it when both his hands were full. Viktor quickly reached over to pull the second cup from his partner's hand, and the mask came down easily after that. He hooked it under his chin and drew a quick breath of the cold night air, "Guess we got here just in time. We had to walk all the way here. The train guy wouldn't let us on with Makkachin."

"...Isn't it gonna be a problem to get him into the arena then?"

Yuri pulled the edge of a letter out, "We brought the doctor's note just in case. We wanted to see how Makka would handle being in a noisy place like this while we were both available to manage whatever happens. If it's too loud or rowdy, we can take him back without worrying about anything. But..." He paused and pulled up the second of two scarves he was wearing, "We brought an extra to cover his ears. I think he'll be okay though. Makka's been to the Ice Castle without problems."

Viktor looked a bit sheepish then, "I didn't want to leave him behind again, cooped up by himself when we're bring Jiro with us."

"We should let these two get going." Mikhail pointed out, gesturing towards the doors, "Yura skates third so he needs the time to warm up."

"Sure." Viktor agreed, moving forward to offer a cheek-kiss to Minako, "Good luck. Message me if you need me to come down early. Otherwise I'll just show up during the second performance."

"Thanks. I think I'll make it till then." She answered, giving the Russian's arm a gentle squeeze of reassurance, "I'm just glad to see you and Yuri talking again."

"Same." Viktor agreed easily, "I had some big plans for tonight that would've been a real shame to have to cancel."

"Eh...?" Yuri quipped, confused, "What big plans?"
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED EIGHTY SEVEN

The arena slowly filled back up again; hundreds filtered into Hall 1, soon becoming a few thousand. Flags and banners were strategically placed over railings and walls, some thick like books, each layer ready to be peeled back according to whichever athlete was on the ice at the time.

It was something of a strategic endeavor to find seats with a good view of the ice, but without a row of seats behind to contend with. After a bit of difficulty getting through the excited crowd - dozens gathering like a congested mob to get a close look at the former multiple European Champion - a row of seats was found at the back of the lower section, along the middle of the long-side of the rink, nearly directly behind the judges. Viktoria sat on one end, followed by Yuri with Jiro, then Viktor with Makkachin at his feet, Nikkita, and then Mikhail on the other end. The section in front and beside them was packed thick with fans, most turning around in their seats with camera-phones out.

Yuri heaved a sigh of relief to himself to finally be inside and sitting down, but kept his surgical mask up, leery of getting sick. He kept his eyes on Jiro instead, watching the pup taking in the sights all around them.

He's so serious, Yuri thought, seeing those triangular ears twist and turn, Most puppies are goofy and energetic, but Jiro is super chill. He looked then to the poodle wedged between their knees and the backs of the seats in front of them, Makkachin doesn't look certain about this. Hopefully he'll relax a bit once the fanfare dies down, and people start paying attention to the rink rather than to Viktor.

The aforementioned Russian just panned his gaze across the entire arena from behind his wide sunglasses, looking down only when he felt his poodle's head nudge under one hand, in an effort to rest it on his knee. He rubbed the pup's head and ruffled an ear slowly, hoping to calm Makkachin's nerves, "Uspokojsja. S toboj vsë budet horošo." (Relax. You'll be okay.) He cooed.

"You think he'll make it to the end?" Yuri wondered.

"He's been in big crowds before, but never in the stands of an arena." He answered, squishing his free hand up and down over the poodle's fuzzy head, "I'm sure he'll be fine though."

It wasn't terribly long before the lights in the arena started to dim, and the ice was covered in a cool blue light. The audience simmered down to a low hum as well, with eyes turning towards the focus of spotlights. A small podium was set-up at rink-side, surrounded by dark royal-blue carpet and curtains, flowers arranged behind, and the logo of the ISU in thin white lines in the center. A polite applause rose up from the blackened crowd as a small group of people came out from behind the display, and one approached the podium itself.

The usual greeting-and-gratitude speech was made, first in Austrian-German and then again in English. Yuri had heard such speeches a thousand times in the many years of competitive skating he'd endured. As such, he tuned most of it out, looking around the arena instead as his eyes adjusted slowly to the dark.

Eventually, he turned his sights from Jiro's fuzzy outline on his lap, to where Viktor held his hand on the armrest between them. Beyond the clutch of interlaced fingers, Makkachin panted softly, head still being lightly pet by his human's free hand. The bright epicenter of light on the podium reflected off of Viktor's ring, and Yuri's eyes were drawn back between them.
...I know that things between us are better...but part of me still feels a bit like I'm in shock that any of it had to happen in the first place. Trying to be strong, to get my point across... Something about this still feels wrong though.

The polite applause rose up again as the speech was concluded, and the absolutely ancient-sounding ISU orchestral anthem played overhead. By then, Viktor had at least taken the sunglasses off, shielded from prying eyes by the dark in the stands. He watched the colors on the ice changing in an array, with a big ISU logo manifesting in the middle via some huge projection machine somewhere in the rafters. The entire white backdrop of the frost was like a theater screen, with giant blade-scratches carving swiftly across its surface, accompanied by the echo of their sound-effects.

The rink then went dark though, and the scratches moved to form a wide circle around the center, speeding up until the lines formed a ring. It suddenly burst down though, as though a massive vortex of sparkling light had formed through the bottomless hole that replaced the rink. The audience cried out in surprise and awe, and watched as the vortex moved around the entire space, giving the illusion of swift movement through a long tunnel.

For a few moments, the optical illusion was enough to startle Yuri from his thoughts, and he sat up a bit straighter as he looked on at it. A low hum of noise was noted rising from the background, felt as though it were the low rumble of some apex predator. It made everyone feel a bit uneasy, but it faded out soon after, making the arena go eerily quiet. It was the perfect time to start playing something entirely different, and the techno-pop electric noises of the OC's opening song started to play.

['Dragostea Din Tae' - O-Zone, 2004 DJ Ross Extended Remix]

The tunnel of light faded, replaced by a singular ring with a bar going through it, as though displaying the wave form of the music across the ice. A clamor of excitement started to rise, the song feeling familiar even if not immediately recognized. Heavy beats reverberated through the entire arena, and the energy of the audience climbed with it, ending on a particularly thick note at the end of the song’s first 30 seconds...then cheering sounded.

Maya... Maya... Maya... Maya...

The lyrics were known, and most of the audience sang out with them, even though the song faded the tailing lines out as though one were hearing them from under water or behind a door. That didn't stop the karaoke of it though. The hectic joy of 2000 Austrians and a number of foreigners singing along to that well-known song just made the arena shake even more than the bass did. Skaters were able to slip onto the ice almost unnoticed.

Differently colored lasers shot beams into the rafters, jolting in and out of focus in time with the beat of the music. An array of disco-lights circled around the audience, swirling like glowing snow in every direction. Even the skaters who had come out were starting to light up, their costumes made up of fiber-optic sheets that morphed through a kaleidoscope of shades.

All at once though, another big beat dropped, and the arena was lit up entirely in a burst, and the voice above was crystal clear.

[0:55]

Maya-hii, maya-huu, maya-haa, maya ha ha...
Maya-hii, maya-huu, maya-haa, maya ha ha...

Skaters swarmed around and through one another, their outfits practically crawling with color from cuffs and hems - or skirt-bottoms as the case may be - to shoulders. The tempo picked up, and the lights dimmed down again, every stanza filling with more energy than the last.

[1:10]

The performers suddenly slowed and stopped in place, with a second group coming out from the different doorways at rink-side. The new group was all ladies, and each of them carried a long baton with an arcing ribbon of LED lights attached at each end. They found their places, scattered across the entire surface of the rink, while the music sounded subdued.

[1:22]

With the overhead sound fully returned, the light-show really began, with the motionless fiber-optic skaters taking off again, swirling in streams around the amorphous blobs of light created in the dark by the swirling batons. Still, the audience sang along.

[1:37]

Tempo picked up again, and everyone on the ice was moving around then, trailing a 'mist' of glowing color in their wakes. All the while, the light-show projected onto the ice itself became dizzyingly complex.

Yuri was baffled by the participation, though not so much until he saw Viktor apparently taking part as well. The Russian really seemed to get a kick out of the whole thing, and new all the lines, just like nearly everyone around them. Yuri glanced aside to the only person he knew who wasn’t singing, "I don't get it." He whisper-yelled, trying to be heard over the rush of techno, "I feel like I'm missing out on something huge."

"I don't get it either." Viktoria whisper-yelled back, "Must be a European thing."

"I kind of know the song, but I've only ever heard it in tiny bits, like when people use it to make fun of someone."

"Oh, like the Numa Numa Kid?"

"Yeah."

"That's about all I know it from myself."

Yuri sat normally again and returned to solitary confusion. The song went on, the audience continued singing with it, and the light-show of color danced along. Towards the second half, the flag-dancers joined those already on the ice, replacing the LED-ribbon-bearers. The cheering crowd was rowdy and clapping by the time the music ended though, and the ice returned to a singular color of light blue for a moment while the last of the fiber-optic skaters made their way to rink-side.

The flag-bearers collected on the inner edge of the rink-wall, catching their breath for a moment while the audience tapered down from their excited adulations. The ice then morphed colors again, bearing the bold red-white-red bars of the Austrian flag, with all of it moving as though on the surface of water. A bit more light came on over the rink then, making it easier to see the colors of each flag-bearer, and soon, they were all circling the inner edge of the wall together, their flags waving proudly above them. In the background, a new song started to come into focus, fading in from quiet as the Austrian flag coalesced and morphed into the ISU logo.

['Despre Tine’ - O-Zone - Prezioso Remix]
A pair of announcers spoke overhead, audible over the music as one spoke the German names for each of the competition's participating countries, followed by the English. The flags changed on the ice, and the flag-bearers skated across as their nations were called. They made it through the first six before Yuri spotted movement out the corner of his eye, and saw those sunglasses going on again before the lights could fully come on. A chill ran through him that was distinct from one caused by the cold, and he started to wonder if finally figured out why everything still bothered him so much.

Eyes went up in confusion as Yuri rose from his seat, holding Jiro up against his shoulder. He kept hold of his partner's hand though and nudged his head towards the nearby stairs, giving the not-so-subtle suggestion that they should go out together. Perplexed, Viktor rose up as well, but coaxed Makkachin up to occupy his seat instead of dragging the poodle along in the near-dark, and then followed the younger man out.

It was much easier to leave than it had been to get in, since it was harder to see who they were in the dark, and the halls outside were much less crowded with everyone already inside and seated. They didn't go far though. Yuri set Jiro down on the floor and backed himself up against a nearby wall, pressing himself against it before reaching up to pull the surgical mask under his chin. Breathing in the cooler air was refreshing, but it did little to quell the nerves that had fired up over the last few minutes.

"How come we're out here?" Viktor wondered, looking around, "When you got up, I thought you were wanting to go to the prep-area or something. Bathroom maybe...?"

Yuri shook his head, staring down past his partner's legs to the floor just behind him. He squeeze his hand a little tighter, and looked up to spot Viktor lifting those shades up with a free finger, revealing the still-red and sunken eyes they'd hidden.

"...Did I...break us...?" He asked suddenly, forcing Viktor to gape a little in surprise, "...I feel...like it's different now. I can't even enjoy the OCs because it feels like a betrayal of how bad the last 24 hours has been."

"...It's a bit of a shift, yeah," Viktor agreed, "The mood, I mean. It's like EuroZone in there."

Yuri pressed his hand to his face, and went under his glasses to pinch the bridge of his nose, "...I don't know what that is..."

"Doesn't matter, I guess..."

Awkward silence fell between them, punctuated by the thumping of the music on the other side of the arena's inner walls. Viktor was entirely at a loss for what to say, and stayed in nervous quiet where he stood, feeling each tightened and loosened grip on his hand. He didn't know what else to do but look around idly, getting more confused with every silent second that passed. Eventually he turned though, about to ask why they were out there, but Jiro's whines caught his attention first, and he looked down at the puppy, spotting the little Akita looking up at his human, as though with worry.

"...I sh-should never have left yesterday..." Yuri started, quickly drawing Viktor's attention back, "...I should've just...stopped nagging you...and gone out onto the ice like you did... Walking away was the worst thing I ever did..."

"I...don't want to linger on something that we've worked through already..." Viktor attempted, "It's fine..."

"How can it be fine though...?" Yuri asked, lifting his head, "We haven't shared a kiss
...since yesterday...and you're keeping your distance, like you don't even know if you're allowed to be near me anymore. If I had just...trusted you to know your own limits, like you did with me in Detroit...we wouldn't be in this situation..."

"You can't take all the blame for what happened onto yourself." Viktor explained, stepping closer at least to lean against the wall as well, and moved his free hand up to pull the sunglasses away entirely, "If I hadn't gotten so conceited then you wouldn't have felt like you had to leave. It's my fault for pushing you away. I..." He hesitated slightly, but sucked in a breath to get his courage, "...I treated you like someone I didn't even like. It was horrible of me. Instead of just telling you that I planned to take it easy and test my limits gradually, I started acting out like a damn brat instead. In all my supposed genius, apparently I'm too stupid to even notice when I'm..." He paused slightly, feeling a knot in his throat, "...No...I knew what I was doing...and I did it anyway..."

Yuri hiccuped a breath beside him.

"I let myself fall into a class of pettiness that I haven't thought about in more than a decade...and I became the person that took everything for granted, and never listened." Viktor sighed, "I singled-out your greatest anxiety about me, and then turned it against you...and for what? Three or four seconds of feeling superior...? It took so long to convince you that I wasn't just using you as a platform for my own fame...and it took two words to destroy everything." He looked aside slightly, towards Yuri but unable to look at him, "...I haven't tried to kiss you because I don't feel like I deserve to. This...isn't just something I can say I'm sorry for and everything is okay again. I hurt you enough to make you want to leave...and I didn't even start to feel bad about it until I got back to the hotel room, and saw that you weren't there, either. It...made me realize something that no one else has been able to inspire in me."

"...I wasn't...trying to make you realize anything." Yuri said quietly, keeping his eyes down on Jiro, "I j-just...couldn't face you..."

"I know..." The Russian nodded sadly, "But it...forced me to come to terms with the fact that I can't get away with everything anymore. There are limits to the things people are willing to put up with. I've had glancing-blows from people whose opinions didn't matter that much to me...my father, my uncle at times...but nothing really stuck...until it was you. You mean everything, and I still acted out. I...can't accept that you've forgiven me."

"I made you think I was giving my ring back. The pain I've c-caused you is a thousand times worse than what you did to me yesterday."

"You didn't mean it though." He shook his head, "...In the heat of the moment, when I used those words on you...even though I knew better...I did." He drew another pained breath, and pulled his hand free so he could slide his arm over his partner's shoulders instead, "If I hadn't realized the gravity of the mistake I'd made...I don't know that I would've thought you were giving your ring. I...think I deserved to believe that you were...because it's given me an appreciation for everything that I didn't have before. In a big way...this is even worse than how it felt in Detroit...thinking you'd gotten killed, or put into some unending coma. Because this would've been you choosing to leave me, and then going on with your life without me."

Yuri wasn't sure what to say or think. He kept quiet for lack of an answer.

"...I said it earlier...and I really do mean it... I can't ever let myself do something to hurt you like this again. I have to be better than this." Viktor went on, twisting around on the wall to put both arms over his husband's shoulders, "I just...I feel like I'm slipping. Every time I think we've recovered from the last big problem, something even bigger happens. I'm tired of everything being so damn difficult... I just want to give up and go home sometimes... To crawl under the blankets and hold onto you until the world turns to dust all around us..."

"...I know...how you feel..."

"This was supposed to be the weekend when we reset, and I was able to make you feel better again after everything else that happened this season. Instead, you got stuck trying to make me feel better, and then I turned it all right back around on you, and threw it in your face..." The Russian lamented quietly. The thunder of the music tapered out within the arena, "...I let myself become cynical and couldn't even appreciate that you were watching out for me. It's like I've completely fallen out of sync with you, and I'm struggling to find that rhythm again...so I'm turning back into the awful person I used to be... Feeling like I'm alone when it's me who's pushing you away..."

"...I haven't...made it easy on you..." Yuri attempted, "I've meddled in things I had no business getting involved with...and I've had complete meltdowns over the stupidest stuff...and about a thousand other things..." He snuffled and buried his face against one shoulder, "You'd think I'd grow some thicker skin by now..."

"I should've learned to have a softer touch anyway... I'm the one who showed up out of nowhere... I should've adjusted and been more accommodating."

"I'm the one who drunkenly invited you..."

Viktor pulled back slightly, giving quite the look through his tears, "...You really need to let me take the blame for something."

"...Can't we just blame someone else...?"

"...Like who?"

They each paused for a moment, thinking back...and then both said the same name at the same time.

"Celestino."

It was enough to draw a few laughs, pained as they were. Yuri pulled one hand back to rub under his glasses again, trying to dry his face, "...I thought I was going to be the one who turned into a big mess out here... I thought I made such a huge mistake, and overreacted again..."

"At some point, my love, you're going to accept that I'm a bit of a shit sometimes." Viktor hoped, doing much the same to clear his own eyes, "I'm not as perfect as your dreams would have you believe."

"Only your skating is that perfect."

Viktor hesitated then slightly, surprised, but then nodded and managed a smile, "I can accept that."

Yuri heaved a relieved breath and dipped his head forward, pressing his brow to his spouse's scarf and neck. He hugged tight, and then tighter still when he felt it returned, feeling his feet lift up off the ground for a moment. When set down again, he snuffled another hard breath and pulled back enough to see his favorite blue eyes, "...Let's never fight again...this is exhausting..."

"Agreed..."

He waited a moment, bringing his right hand closer to cup his palm against pale skin. His frame felt lighter, and Yuri was sure that Viktor's gaze seemed to become kinder; less distant and guilt-ridden than it had been. He felt the man nuzzle into his palm a bit, and the aura around them changed, feeling more familiar and affectionate, like it had been before everything got wrenched out of place so suddenly...and so did the kiss that Yuri finally allowed. Viktor's relief was palpable even through their layers of winter clothes.

Tense muscles unclenched, and everything seemed soft and warm again.
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED EIGHTY EIGHT

The six minute Group 1 warm-up was in full swing, and it would be another likely 15 minutes before Yurio's turn on the ice.

A quiet spot was found in the main foyer, and the last bits of lingering unease were put to bed with a little bit of puppy-play. Beside one of the glass walls, Viktor sat on a simple bench, and Yuri crouched down in front of him on the floor, flicking a coin on the tile to spin like a top. Jiro was fascinated by the sight, watching it for a moment before jumping around, then watching again. He swatted at the coin and knocked it over, and Yuri set it up to spin once more.

With the pup's attention occupied, Yuri leaned back a bit, lifting his elbows up to rest them on Viktor's legs where they parted on either side of him. The Russian leaned down over him, arms wrapping around the front of his frame as he moved to nuzzle at his neck. There was comfort in the quiet - relative as it was - and the sparse number of people wandering through the foyer didn't bother them.

When the sound of the first skater's introduction being announced could be heard, the duo knew that time was running short. Yuri twisted around where he sat and leaned forward, threading his arms through the front of Viktor's open coat to hug around his mid-section. He held there for a little while, breathing in his partner's scent; like ice, a very light cologne, and the wool of the suit he wore. Hands moved up and down his back, but then paws smacked against it, too, and Yuri pulled his head out from the dark within the coat. Eyes turned back over a shoulder to spot Jiro cocking his head slightly. The pup seemed to know that it was time to get up and move again...or perhaps he just wanted to. Yuri wasn't sure. He turned his face forward again, and looked at the spot where the suit-jacket folded over itself, then up at the loose loops of Viktor's thick scarf.

"You look like you're ready to take another nap." The Russian commented quietly, watching those brown eyes turn up towards him, "You sure you'll be awake enough for later?"

"For your super secret plans?"

Viktor nodded.

"I'm sure I'll get my second wind at some point." Yuri answered, feeling a yawn coming on anyway. He pulled his right arm from the warmth to hide the yawn behind a hand, but once it passed, a few fingers came up under his chin, lifting his face upward. He opened his eyes only enough to see the shadow approach, and felt the touch of a nose against his lips. It moved to make way for the warmth of a kiss, and Yuri could feel himself melting into it, savoring the length and gentleness of it.

Viktor held for a moment, then turned to kiss again from the other side, and back again after a while. Pressing their brows together, he nosed his husband's lips again.

"It's been a while since you've kissed me like that." Yuri commented idly, feeling the small smile against his cheek, "It's nice."

"Ironic that it took going to a competition to find some quiet time." The Russian added, pulling back slightly to look at his spouse's face, "Everything's just been so hectic or stressful for so long... It's hard to just find a moment to breathe. I've thought we had time...but looking back, it was more like the eye of a storm passing overhead..."
"We should slow down...focus on just us for a little while. We've put everything we had into other people for so long that it's like we've forgotten to think about ourselves."

"Well..." Viktor started, tone moving towards an aside, "...We still have Minako to think about. At least, for a little while."

"Minako-sensei is an exception." Yuri pointed out, sliding his right hand up to cup over his partner's cheek, and curled his fingers through silver hair around the back of his neck, "She's...not exactly the emotional vampire we've been dealing with lately."

Unable to stop himself from laughing at the description, Viktor stymied himself by finding another kiss instead, "That's an apt way of putting it."

"It's true though."

"The others have had an annoying habit of sucking all the life and love out of us..."

"Time to reclaim our L-words."

Slate eyes looked on quietly as those words echoed through Viktor's head. He closed them though and lowered his gaze, oddly overcome for a moment, "...I can't remember when it was the last time that I spontaneously fell in love with you. It feels like such a long time ago..." He said quietly, turning to press his mouth to the open palm aside his face, and curled his fingers around that hand to gently hold it in place, "...I feel like I've been on such...heightened alert since the Final... The fall, then Saito getting too close...then the almost-attack in St. Petersburg... I don't know that I've been such a good husband or lover to you. I've been replaced by this bundle of nerves and tension...and worry...so focused on watching for the next thing to come after you that I stopped giving you the attention you need. And all the while, you've been doing so much for me instead... You're the only thing that's kept me sane and grounded all this time." He said, kissing the palm, then the ring from that side, "I just...feel at a loss for how to turn this around."

"...It just takes time." Yuri reassured, rubbing his thumb over the fingers that curled around near to it, and shifted in place to sit up onto his knees. Rising up to be eye-level with his spouse, Yuri leaned forward to put both arms over and around Viktor's shoulders, and hugged him tight, "You know I love you no matter what...through thick and thin."

Viktor breathed in his husband's smell, and clung tight in return, "I love you, too...through the good times and bad."

"Mawooh!"

Both figures turned to look down...and spotted Jiro there demanding attention, tail wagging. Viktor pulled a hand free to scoop the pup up and brought him up between them, "And we love you, too."

"And Makkachin." Yuri added, snogging the pup a little.

"The goodest boi."

.

Using ever fiber of her being to maintain something of a professional decorum, Minako found herself stiff as a board. Eyes darted around the prep area, oogling every skater, coach, choreographer, and assorted attaché that could be seen.

There's so many people, and so many new faces! I feel so out of place here!
"If you stare like that, people are going to think you're lost." Yurio chided, glowering at her from a doorframe he was leaning on, one leg pulled straight up into the air against himself. "The badge won't mean anything then."

Minako blanched and let out the breath she'd been holding onto, "I know but I can't help it."

"Try to. You're embarrassing me."

She sighed and slouched, about to give 'acting natural' another go, but suddenly spotted a moving shape out the corner of her eye, through the door her athlete was using as a stretching post. She leaned back to get a better look, and spotted Viktor and Yuri there, with Jiro trotting out in front on his harness. It was a relief to see more faces of people she knew, and she waved, "Hey guys."

They both waved back as they got closer, then reached those same arms forward to pull the duo into a greeting hug, "Is that the first or second guy out there?" Viktor wondered as he let the ballerina go.

"That's the second."

"Oh good, so we got here right in time."

Minako quirked a brow, "...Didn't you intend to come down during the second skater?"

"Yeah, but we left the arena earlier and meandered around for a bit. In any case though, we're here now...how are you holding up?"

"...Nervous."

She answered, "I feel like an impostor down here."

Viktor offered a well-meant smile, "Well, me too, so...let's go be impostors together." He said, extending an elbow as he stepped forward. Minako took it, feeling reassured, and let the Russian guide her over to the curtain to rink-side.

Yuri shook his head and sighed a smile as he watched them go, and turned his attention to the Tiger next to him, "How about you?"

"Same as always, I guess." He answered with a shrug, "Viktor knows he's not using his sunglasses, right?"

"Probably not, but I'm not about to remind him." Yuri huffed, putting his hands into his coat pockets, "It probably looks more suspicious than the condition his eyes are in anyway."

Yurio held quiet for a moment, watching as his older counterpart made it to the curtain with Minako, "...At least he seems normal again now. What'd you say...?"

Yuri was the quiet one then. Minako peeked out through the curtain, looking nervous as she kept her grip on Viktor's arm. He sighed quietly and turned his eyes towards the Tiger nearby, "I...made him think I was giving my ring back. Not intentionally...I was giving him some pain tablets, since he'd been skating so hard all morning, and I thought he'd be hurting...I didn't expect he'd take it so wrongly. All I could do was give him the tablets and prove his fears wrong as quickly as I could. I honestly feel like I damaged us with that, even though I entirely didn't mean it. We...have a lot of stuff to work through."

"You're going to be okay though, right?"

Yuri looked a bit surprised, but his shock softened into a smile, "You're worried about our relationship? Yuri...a year ago you were ready to jump off a bridge to get away from us."
The Tiger shrugged, "If it was anyone else...I'd say I'm only asking because you two would both be incredibly irritating if you broke up. But since it's just you? Yeah. I'm worried." He said, twisting on one blade-guard to face the older skater directly, "You two are my closest friends. I don't like watching either of you in this much pain. I've seen enough already over the last few months - wrong done to you by outside sources - that it'd be a real shame if you ended up tearing each other apart at the end, after surviving through all the rest."

"...Yeah..." Yuri nodded solemnly, thumbing his ring a little in his coat pocket, "Other than supporting you and Minako for this weekend's competition, Viktor and I have agreed that we need to focus on ourselves for a while. Fix the damage that's been done."

"He's as broken as I've ever seen him." Yurio commented grimly, "He was barely getting his shit back together when we finished at the Final, and then the RSF kicked him when he was already down. But..." He said, starting to step towards the curtains, "If there's anyone who can help him get back to himself, it's you."

"...I don't know that I'll be able to help him with all of it." Yuri admitted quietly, moving to catch up as the teen moved off, "Being here as a spectator instead of a competitor is really hurting him."

"He'll get over it." The young Russian said curtly, "It's only been a month, and you've only had one competition. At some point, the feeling of novelty will wear off, and he'll start to take his place on Team Japan seriously."

"...That's just the thing though... I don't...think this is a novelty to him." Yuri pointed out, forcing the Tiger to pause and look back again, "There's never been a non-Japanese person on the Japanese team before. It's not like America or Canada where people from any and all nations can come be a part of things...Japan has always been very homogenous. As much as I try to make him feel like he's really a part of things - his coming citizenship and our family registry, among other things - I think Viktor still sees himself as an outsider. He was thrown out of the only world he ever knew, and doesn't see himself fitting into this new one. I don't know how to make him feel comfortable with it. I don't...know that it's something I can even do..."

"Then just keep doing what you've been doing."

Yuri lifted his gaze in confusion.

"Remember what I told you about him, way back at the very beginning - he had the whole world in his hands. His aim in life was to be able to surprise people, but was starting to feel like he couldn't do it anymore. Now, he's the one who's been surprised. The eyes of the world are on him, wanting to see what he'll do in response to what's happened. There's opportunity here...to help him redefine himself...not as someone who was sanctioned and thrown off Team Russia - but as a guy who's finally taken his rightful place on Team Japan."

"...His...rightful place...?" Yuri echoed, unsure of the meaning.

Yurio cocked his head back, knocking the hood off his long blonde hair, lips parted as he was about to speak...only to be interrupted.

"Die Punktzahl für Gabe Fernandez...62.91."

The arena cheered excitedly, the roar of their applause echoing back through the halls and into the prep area under the stands. Yuri's eyes had raised as he listened, but lowered again, spotting Viktor and Minako waving at him to hurry up, then lower again to the Russian Tiger standing before him.
"...Viktor stopped being a part of Team Russia the day he got on that first plane to fly to Hasetsu. Coaching you to Grand Prix Silver and Worlds Gold, and onward into this season. He's given everything he has to you, including the medal that he denied to Russia when he gave it to you, too. To Team Japan." Yurio explained, "This is just the way in which his efforts are finally being recognized officially. He's having trouble adjusting because it happened behind his back. Don't doubt for a second that he wouldn't have jumped on the opportunity to join your team if it were offered to him from the start."

"Yuri! Come on!" Minako called, pulling the curtain back, "They're about to call you onto the ice!"

Yurio turned away again and started stepping off, leaving Yuri in stunned silence. The audience's cheers started anew when the Tiger stepped into the light at rink-side, and Minako followed him through, leaving Viktor behind the curtain.

"...Yuri?"

Eyes refocused, and Yuri shook his head to recapture his thoughts so he could move forward. Shoes shuffled along the floor until he was close, but instead of going through the doorway as offered, he threaded his arms around his partner's frame. Viktor's free arm came around him as the other held the dark-blue fabric up, only to lower down for a moment.

"You look unsettled suddenly." The Russian commented, "Everything okay?"

"...You know that feeling you get when someone else tells you something you already knew, and maybe have even said, but for some reason, it makes more sense coming from them than it ever did coming from yourself?"

"Sure."

"That happened...just now, with Yurio." He explained, lifting his face up from the scarf and coat, "...It's just weird."

"...Is that a good or bad thing?"

"Good, I think. It's...helped me understand you a little better." Yuri answered, rising up onto his toes for a moment to sneak a kiss, "Come on, let's go through so we can wish him good luck."
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED EIGHTY NINE

The audience's cheers washed over the small group as the last stragglers came out to rink-side. The volume rose up to a new height though when that silver-haired head became visible, and just as had happened at Rostelecom the year before...and at the end of a certain performance at the NHK Trophy a few weeks earlier...that slow chant of a name soon overtook the arena.

"Viktor...Viktor...Viktor...Viktor...!

Yurio scoffed as he pulled his blade-guards off, and shot a look back at the man for whom the crowd was cheering, "You would steal the lime-light at an event you're not even competing in."

"Don't feel bad," Yuri attempted, looking anxious on the Tiger's behalf, even as Viktor waved at the crowd over his head, "He stole everyone's attention more than once when he was just coaching."

"Sorry," Viktor laughed, bringing his arm down again, "If I could yell loud enough, I'd tell them to chant your name instead."

"Weiter auf dem Eis, Russland repräsentierend... Next on the ice, representing Russia... Yuri...Plisetsky...!"

The cheers changed again, and the Tiger glided out into the rink, reminding the audience who they were supposed to be applauding. He could hear the small section where Yuri's Angels had gathered, and waved at them before turning back to get a final word from his 'staff.' He adjusted the placement of the gloves on his uniform-like outfit, took a breath, and set his palms down on the rink-wall.

"You're gonna kill it, don't even worry." Minako started, "Just stay loose and try to have fun."

"Just remember, this may be the only international competition you'll stand a hope of winning Gold at for a few years." Viktor teased, pulling Yuri out in front of himself and rubbed the man's shoulders as he loomed over one side, "This one has promised never to let a member of the RSF get Gold again so long as he skates."

Yurio just cocked a brow.

Yuri flailed his hands back and forth defensively, "N-no pressure! Just do what you do!"

"...It must be weird as Hell for you two to be down here, wishing me good luck, even though I'm still skating for the people who threw Viktor under a bus." The teen huffed.

"Would you feel better if we said 'boo, do bad, skate the worst, come in last'?' Viktor wondered glibly, leaning his weight against his partner's back until he, in turn, leaned further forward, and those slate eyes could leer more closely, "Hm?"

Yurio lifted one hand and flicked the elder Russian's nose to make him back off, "Just for that, I'll score higher than you did at your last Euros, jackass."

"Oh! ...Do you even remember what it was?" Viktor mused smugly, even as he rubbed the sting away from his safe spot behind his husband's frame.

The teen just stared indifferently, but then shook his head and smiled, leaning over the wall to pull the pair down into a hug, "No, but wish me luck anyway."

Both pairs of arms came around the skinny figure, and offered a 'Davai' and 'Ganba' in quick succession before spinning the skater 'round to send him off. Yuri leaned back against his partner’s chest and heaved a sigh of relief, "...Is it weird that I'm glad that we sorted things out in time for his sake?"

"No, I feel the same." Viktor agreed, sliding both arms back around his husband's lithe frame, and started to walk them back towards the wall, "It may not have been as serious to him as his grandpa's heart attack last year, but it's never easy to deal with friends who are fighting."

"The rest of us are relieved too you know." Minako quipped, looking back at them over her shoulder, as Yurio moved towards center beyond her, "After we saw you at the airport yesterday, Mik said it felt like there was a disturbance in the force. Even before Yura got hold of Yuri, it was as obvious as anything that something was horribly wrong."

Viktor made a face, but before he could answer, the music above them boomed through the arena and cut him off.

['Inner Universe' - Origa (Long version: 0:00-0:11, then 0:23-1:55, then 2:06-2:42, then 4:25-4:48)]

Yurio kicked off to the side, his thin frame a blur of swift movements. The bass of the music thundered through the arena, making it vibrate. As the lyrics began, the teen thrust into a backward-entry camel spin, and grabbed his black blade with one hand, then both, to lift into a Biellmann.

Angely i demony krujili nado mnoy
Rassekali ternii i mlechnye puti

The momentum of releasing the boot helped him hop through a foot change, and he dipped his head low in a fake-out illusion spin before continuing with his hands behind his back.

Ne znaet schast'ya tol'ko tot,
Kto ego zova ponyat' ne smog...

Cross-overs morphed into a backward-entry twizzle, and he moved diagonal across the ice before setting both blades down for an outside spread-eagle, and lined up for the first jump.

Mana du vortes, mana du vortes
Aeria gloris, aeria gloris

The right leg kicked out, and Yurio vaulted forward into a triple Axel, landing with grace.

Yuri felt Viktor's arms clench around him a bit tighter in silent celebration, but his eyes went over towards Minako, who looked more nervous than her student. He wiggled to lean forward, and reached an arm forward to tap the woman's shoulder.

She seemed to startle a bit when he felt it, but when she spotted that hand offering the nylon loop of a leash, she looked past it to the man holding it out.

"Hang onto Jiro for a bit. He has a knack for being able to calm anyone who holds him."
Minako blinked, but then looked down at the pup, who was glancing up at her in turn with a few tail-sways. She bent down to hoist the little Akita up against her shoulder, and immediately felt the effect Yuri had alluded to; her heart-rate settled a bit, and she was able to breathe. Eyes then turned out to the ice again, ready for Yurio’s next - and most difficult - jump.

Aeria gloris, aeria gloris

The Tiger stepped through a 3-turn, kicked his right blade out behind himself as he leaned on the inside edge of the opposite foot, and jammed the toe-pick down as hard as he could before launching.

I am...CLAK...Calling,

The audience cheered, and Yurio slid backward on his right outside edge, mentally celebrating the landing as much as the crowd was.

Calling out!
Spirits, I am calling!

"...He's really owning that jump now." Yuri deadpanned, trying to smile despite his nerves, "It's going to be really hard keeping him off the top of the podium next month..."

Viktor had much the same expression, "...I feel so torn..."

Soboy ostat'sya dol'she...

Yurio pushed through a series of stars, kicking a leg up through a traveling camel-spin before finally stalling in place to toss himself up into a scissor-kick, and landed in a stationary sit-spin.

Calling, Calling, in the depths of longing!

Spinning on his right blade, Yurio curved his body inward to increase his speed, then reached around to grab the dragging left blade, and raised his free hand up above himself. Both arms then raised together behind his back for a few spins, then moved down under himself to switch feet. The right leg went out in a twist-variant, and he brought both arms back toward himself.

Soboy ostat'sya dol'she...

As he finished out the spin, he rose back up to his full height, and paused with the right toe-pick on the ice to stop his movements.

Mana du vortes,

Rotating on the pick, Yurio dragged the left around himself in a full circle, then shifted his weight onto that toe-pick.

Mana du vortes

He repeated the motion from before, dragging the right toe-pick around himself.

Aeria gloris , Aeria gloris...

Pushing off, he picked up a little bit of speed before raising his arms up to the rafters, and lowered himself down again, right leg dragging behind him as he glided forward, head bowing lower and lower as he moved.

Mana du vortes, mana du vortes
Aeria gloris, Aeria gloris...

He rose back up to his feet, and swung his free leg around before moving backwards down the center of the ice. His frame swayed to the tapering lyrics, arms rising and falling as he moved, until the line faded out entirely and the tempo of the music changed.

Stand alone, where was life when it had meaning?

Finding himself returned to the center of the rink, Yurio gestured out to the audience as he rotated in place, dipping down slightly as one leg extended to draw a circle around himself in the frost. He nudged off once he returned to center, and started gliding forward.

Stand alone, nothing's real anymore, and...
Besgonechnyj beg...

Viktor's eyes followed the Tiger across the ice, thinking back to that first time he'd been tasked with choreographing for him.

Back then, neither of them knew enough about themselves to be able to define their own image...but they've both really come into their own over the last year and a half. The audience doesn't see them as a kitten and a piglet anymore. They've both become forces of nature, something to be reckoned with and watched closely...

He looked down from the rink to the back of his husband's head where the younger man was still leaned up against him.

...It's weird to think that I'm the one who can't pick his image now. I don't even know what it is at this point...I'm not even that same person anymore.

Poka zhiva... The music continued.

Yurio's step-sequence had taken him to the far end of the rink, and he twisted around backwards to line up his last required jump element; the power of his program was ramping up along with the energy of the song. He wound himself up and launched into the quad Salchow, landing with the archetypical low sit-like landing position, then launched again for the triple Loop.

...Ya mogu starat'sya na letu ne upast'

Landing the second jump, he immediately twisted into the start of his combination spin, entering backwards for a camel-spin, arms out to the side before leaning back into a layover variant.

Mana du vortes, mana du vortes

Yuri glanced up over his shoulder, spotting the oddly serious look on his spouse's face. That unblinking stare that both watched the show on the ice, and yet cut completely through it at the same time.

Aeria gloris , Aeria gloris...

The combination spin ended with a broken-leg sit variant, and with the last lyric of the song echoing into silence, he stopped in place. Sweat rolled down his skin, and he heaved for air as the audience started cheering.
Minako cheered and waved before handing the puppy back to his human, and clapped as she walked back towards the wall.

Yurio bowed and acknowledged the audience, but eventually started to return to the doorway, passing through the shower of soft-toys and flowers that were tossed towards the ice. Strangely though, when he did finally return, he looked anxious...more so than he had any reason to be. He kept his eyes down even as Minako showered him in compliments, and took the blade-guards silently, putting them into place before stepping off the frost.

Yuri felt Viktor's arms relax around him slightly, and glanced back again briefly as the Russian moved to push off the wall. He followed along for a moment as the group headed towards the kiss-and-cry; something was off, but he couldn't tell anymore if it was the same melancholy he'd felt from his husband earlier on, or if this was in reaction to Yurio's mood. He only felt himself distracted from the wonder when Minako handed Jiro back.

Viktor and Minako sat on either side of the teen on the bench as they awaited the skater's score. It wasn't unusual for Yurio to be silent as he waited, but it was slightly out-of-keeping that he didn't give off an aura of smug confidence. Nothing really changed even after the announcer called off his score; 96.2, firmly cementing him as a front-runner even that early in the competition. Viktor offered a well-meant pat on the back, but Yurio didn't seem to notice. He lead the group back towards the curtain as the next skater stepped through, keeping his eyes down the entire time.

Yuri hopped up next to his partner as the noise of the arena was dulled by the walls, and curled his fingers around the man's arm to get his attention, "Doesn't he seem off to you? He should be happy with his score, but he looks mad."

The Russian kept quiet, but pulled his arm free to drape it behind Yuri's back, and brought his free hand up to curl a finger over his mouth, "...I wonder..."

Ahead of them, Yurio had made it a few paces away, but suddenly paused, spotting the sponsor-logo backboard where the press was waiting to do his post-skate interview. They all looked towards him, ready to get started, but the Ice Tiger couldn't make himself move.

"What's the matter?" Minako wondered, coming up beside him, "Don't you want to go talk to them?"

"...I...can't..." He answered reluctantly, "...I can't focus."

"How come? Your program was practically flawless. No stumbles or falls, spins were clean..."

"Everything feels so tight...like my clothes are all 2 sizes too small for me..." Yurio admitted quietly, a bead of sweat rolling down his cheek, "...And my feet hurt, like I skated that program with brand new boots, even though I've had these same ones all season..."

Minako blinked, but before she could say a word, Yuri and Viktor came up around the teen's other side. Yurio looked up at them with a pleading, worried look on his face.

"...Is this it? Is this...really when my body's finally decided to change...? Right now?" He asked, a hint of desperation on his voice, "It didn't feel like this before... It's only been a month since the Final, when everything felt perfectly fine... Nothing really felt unusual at Nationals either... But now!?"

"Don't think about it too much," Viktor advised, "I grew pretty quickly too when I was about your age. Don't forget, Yuri fit into a costume I wore when I was 16...and now I'm way bigger than that."
It's entirely possible to keep going without having to take time off—"

"The Olympics are a month away! If it only took a month for me to get to this point, I won't even be able to wear this ensemble by then!" The teen shot back anxiously, clenching his toes like it was the only way there was enough room. "This is going to ruin everything."

"Don't borrow bad luck," Yuri suggested nervously, "The fact that I, at age 23, could wear a costume of Viktor's from when he was your age, is a testament to the fact that I didn't get much bigger than a 16 year old. Maybe you won't grow as much as you think. It could just be a quick burst and then you're done." He added, slipping forward to pull the teen into a one-armed hug, keeping Jiro up in the other, "You'll be fine. We'll get your outfit adjusted and you have a whole month to break in the boots that you'll get as soon as we're done here...and you'll have room to grow, so they won't feel tight at the Games."

"Don't the feet and hands get bigger faster though!?" Yurio asked, twisting around to cling to his friend, "I'll just be tripping all over myself if I have to get boots big enough to compensate...!

"Not if we make sure your same-sized blades get moved to the new boots." Yuri explained, rubbing the teen's back, "And we'll make sure to practice every day so you never get surprised by anything. It'll be okay."

"Yuri's right." Viktor added, putting a hand on the Tiger's shoulder, "And despite the changes you've noticed since the Final, you were still able to land that quad Flip, too. Your boots and costume felt a bit tight, but you didn't suffer for it. Just take a deep breath and keep your focus on the moment. Nothing dramatic can or will change between now and Sunday night, so if you can tolerate how things felt during your SP, you should be able to finish out the Free Skate and Exhibition without trouble."

"Yeah, just focus on this competition. The rest can be looked at after."

Yurio held for a moment longer, but then nodded and pulled back, taking in a quick breath to steel himself, "...Okay...okay, sorry... I freaked out..."

"You've been dreading these changes for a while. We'll do whatever it takes to mitigate them." Viktor reassured, "So go do your interview. You skated really well in spite of everything. We'll meet up with you again after."
Chapter 490

CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY

Watching the interview from a small distance, but sure to stay close enough if help was asked for, Viktor and Yuri hung back and waited for the chatter to come to its natural end. Yurio flashed a few fake smiles, bad at is as he was, looking more and more nervous as things went on.

Yuri couldn't help but laugh quietly at it, and sigh, shaking his head slightly as he drew in closer to Viktor's side, "He reminds me of myself, back when you first turned up at Yu-Topia."

"How's that?" The Russian wondered, bringing his arm up behind the younger man's shoulders, and eventually up to his head, sliding his fingers through gelled black hair, "Because he's a bag of anxiety?"

"Well..." Yuri huffed, making a face for a moment, but then looked ahead normally again, "I just imagine what's going through his head...and it's probably just like how I thought of myself in those early days. When I was still a bit of a chunk. I mean, I've seen the video of myself doing 'Aria,' and I know I wasn't that bad...but anytime someone brought up my weight, or I thought they were judging me, I'd always imagine myself 10x heavier than I really was. That my shirt couldn't come all the way down or my pants wouldn't fit. But Yurio probably imagines that his legs are so long now that his costume only comes down to his knees, and there's all this skin visible before his boots start...and maybe his toes have burst through the front of the boot itself."

Viktor chortled and kissed the side of his husband's forehead, "Such a vivid imagination. I don't think I ever had that problem."

Yuri cocked a brow as he turned his head, "Yeah?"

"Mh. I went through my growth spurts with grace and calm. Having the odd pimple was probably the most devastating thing I ever went through, but I learned how to conceal them pretty quickly."

"Is that a fact."

"Mhm."

Yuri paused for a moment, hearing the clock ticks in his head as he waited... Tick, tock, tick, tock...

Viktor's hands suddenly slid up casually to thread over the crown of his head, "Yep, that was definitely the only thing."

"Are you sure about that?"

"Absolutely."

"I see." Yuri mused, sensing that growing tension in his husband's frame. He couldn't help himself though, "I'm seeing Franciscan monks, with their egg-bald heads above a ring of short-cut hai-"

"Thaaaaat's enough of that." Viktor coughed, quickly bringing his hands down to cover his partner's mouth instead, "I'll never get that image out of my head now."

Yuri just laughed as well as he could, and snuck his own hands up to press his fingers to the spot the Russian had been trying to hide, "Oh, what's this? It's all bushy up there. Can't feel an inch of skin."
"But it's getting super thin."

"It's so thick and luxurious, so soft, so silky..."

Rivers were practically dripping from Viktor's eyes suddenly, "Don't lie, even just to make me feel better!"

Yuri pulled the man's head down slightly and kissed the obviously-not-bare spot at the crown, "I wouldn't lie about something that important to you. I'd probably be the only person on this earth that would have the guts to tell you if it was getting thin."

"...Really?" Viktor asked, surprised, and the water-works ceased, "...Why though?"

"Because I feel like you'd want to do something about it as early as possible." He explained, combing his fingers through silver bangs to put everything back into place, "You've already entrusted me with all your other fears and secrets...what good would I be if I didn't try to guard you from exposure?"

"...You don't think it's just a little bit thin...?" Viktor asked quietly, reaching a hand up to rub the spot again like he had to feel it just to be sure nothing had changed in the last 30 seconds.

"You can't see the top of your own head without help, and I think the fact that you can't see it makes what you feel up there seem so much worse than it really is." Yuri explained, pulling his phone out, "But you constantly poke at the very end of your part, where your hair kind of grows out in all directions rather than to either side, like it does everywhere forward from there." He added, lifting the phone up to take a photo of the dreaded area, and pulled it down to show it off, "You see? Even though it looks like an empty space compared to everywhere else around it, it's not even that easy to see down to the scalp at this epicenter." He said, spreading his fingers out across the screen to zoom in, "And it looks exactly the same as it did last year, when I took that photo of the top of your head when we were at the airport in Helsinki."

Viktor eyeballed the photo intensely, but after careful consideration, sighed and nodded, "...I guess it does feel worse than it looks."

"You got the biggest chunk of your looks from your mom's side, and Mikhail isn't balding even at his age." Yuri offered, clicking his phone off to put back into his pocket, "I remember you testing him over it when he turned up at the rink in St. Petersburg...you wouldn't let him say anything until you'd been able to check if he still had hair on top or not."

"Well," The Russian suddenly started, putting a finger against his lip in thought, "In retrospect, I wonder if he's just been able to hide it well. With the kind of money he apparently has, he could afford getting some pretty convincing plugs... No one would ever know better."

"Viktor he's not going bald and neither are you." Yuri deadpanned.

The Russian just perched his elbow onto his husband's left shoulder, and leaned in close with a smirk, staring straight into those hazel eyes, "Are you sure about that?" He asked, poking a few fingers up under his partner's chin.

"Absolutely sure."

"..."

"..."
"Love you."

"Love you too."

Viktor just huffed a quiet laugh and closed the gap between them to steal a kiss, then moved back to his husband's side to wait out the remainder of Yurio's interview. To his surprise though, just before it ended, he caught sight of Yakov moving through on the far side of the hall, heading into the prep area with Georgi. He lifted his head and raised a hand to wave, but Yakov moved on without responding; Viktor wasn't sure if the man had seen him, or was just unwilling to reciprocate.

"Whew," Yurio's voice came up, "That was even more harrowing than actually skating the damn program."

"True story," Minako agreed, fanning herself with both hands.

Viktor turned his attention back to the group, but it was his spouse who spoke, "I'll bet you want to change into something more comfortable for the rest of the night."

"Yeah, probably should," Yurio agreed, "Every step I take makes it feel like my costume is shrinking."

"Viktor! Viktor Nikiforov!" Other voices called, drawing the eyes of the group back towards the media. One of the men in the group was waving nervously, "Viktor! Would you be able to do an interview between competitors?"

Those same eyes then went up to the aforementioned athlete, but he just looked back at them, surprised, then towards the people who had called to him, "...What...? Oh, me?"

The herd of sportscasters that corralled the former champion, splintered off from the main group, and moved away from the bustle of the main competition hall to someplace less noisy. That took them back out into the main foyer of Hall 1, where the skating duo had spent their last minutes prior to Yurio's Short Program.

Viktor looked around for a reasonably-lit area where he could sit down, and found a spot where there was a bench flanked by two potted ferns in front of a painted wall. He made his way there, but glanced back over his shoulder as he felt his hand pull back with some resistance. Yuri looked around, uncertain of what to do, but Viktor nudged his head towards the bench.

Yuri was still reluctant, "...They asked to interview you, not me. It'd be weird if I'm in the shot but not saying anything."

"I want you to be there though."

Still feeling nervous about it, Yuri nervously stepped towards the bench, and pulled Jiro up into his lap as they sat down. The media personnel around them set up a bit of extra equipment, but in short order, they were ready to go, and cameras were focused on the one newscaster who'd brought them all out that way. Yuri could feel the butterflies in his stomach starting to flutter wildly.

I can already tell what they're going to ask him about, he thought, looking aside towards Viktor, who looked as calm as he always did in front of cameras, I wonder if he's expecting the same as me. He doesn't look nervous at all. Maybe he's trying to parse out what his answers are going to be so he doesn't look unprepared...?
"Welcome back to the ISU European Championships; we're here for an exclusive interview with the former five-time consecutive European Champion, Viktor Nikiforov, who surprised us all with an appearance here in Vienna." The man spoke into his mic, looking at the main camera, and gestured over towards the duo sitting on the bench. The cameraman panned around and lowered down to record from knee-height, and focused on the silver-haired skater. The newscaster stepped up next to the cameraman and looked towards the duo, "Skater Nikiforov, firstly, thank you for giving up some of your time to speak with us."

"It's my pleasure." He answered easily. He pulled his hand slightly-free from where Yuri held it, and moved it to curl his fingers around the younger's man's leg, nudging Jiro's puppy nubbins out of the way to get there. Yuri barely managed to retake that hand before the Akita laid down right on top of them.

"It's been an entire month since the skating world was shaken by your sudden sanctioning by the RSF," The man continued, "But this will be the first time, to our knowledge, that anyone has properly asked you about it. Would you be willing to say a few words to that effect?"

"I'm not really sure what there is to say about it." Viktor surmised, "The RSF put me to pasture, and the JSF offered me a spot on their team, which I accepted gladly. I guess I wasn't ready to retire for real."

"So it wasn't your decision to resign your spot with the RSF?"

Viktor hesitated then, giving his partner's thigh a gentle squeeze, as though using it as a mooring to keep him steady, "...Well, not exactly." He admitted, "I sort of found out about it after the fact. We had landed in Fukuoka, and were getting ready to greet the JSF and all the celebrations after Yuri had gotten Gold."

"After you forfeited it."

"Ehm...yes." He stumbled anyway, "...Yuri worked exceptionally hard all summer and throughout the Grand Prix Series. He deserved to win that Gold. I had enough of my own anyway."

"So how did you find out about the sanctioning?"

"My old coach, Yakov Feltsman, told me over the phone. It was originally framed as a sanction for the rest of the season...but it was clear that it was the end of my career, especially when the RSF started to make subtle changes to my profile on their website."

Yuri was surprised at how candid and truthful the man was being, and gave that hand a squeeze of reassurance beneath Jiro's fluff.

"I actually didn't think much of it at the time. Yuri took it much harder than I did initially. We had come home with five Gold medals for the full Grand Prix, and had plenty to celebrate despite what happened. I didn't want to ruin the night by being mad or resentful of it all, so I put it on the backburner." Viktor went on simply, "The JSF was extremely excited about Yuri's many victories so far this season, and there were a lot of fans who'd come to the airport to cheer his return. We were even given Jiro here as a gift," He explained, reaching his free hand over to scratch the pup's head, and got a few licks in return, "Our friends and family didn't bring it up though. They actually thought we hadn't heard yet, because neither of us said anything. I only lasted until that night though. I cracked when the town leaders in Hasetsu put on a big fireworks show in Yuri's honor, playing his Free Skate music from last year."

"Why do you think they did it?" The newscaster asked, "After all the wins you achieved for Russia, and all the coming events, it was almost foolish to sanction you for the entire rest of the season. You were their best shot at winning more Gold medals."

Viktor shook his head reluctantly, but stayed silent for a moment. His eyes were cast down, first towards the reporter's shoes, then to Jiro on Yuri's lap. He could feel his heart race a little, but he felt another reassuring squeeze, and he drew a breath, "...I've never spoken openly about the things that Yuri and I have been dealing with since we've been together." He started hesitantly, getting the full attention of everyone in earshot, "About how angry it's made me that my reputation and skill as Russia's Champion was being questioned because of choices I made in my private life. About how much it hurt to know that Russian newspapers and film were being edited so our rings were never easily seen...or that Russian presenters continued to refer to Yuri by his previous name, Katsuki, even after he'd legally changed it to mine." He lifted his eyes and looked straight into the camera, as though daring the entire Russian Federation to try shutting him up, "...His name is Yuri Nikiforov, and he's my husband, whether anyone likes it or not." He said firmly, "Er...sorry, that came across aggressively."

"It sounds like you've had to go through a lot."

"That would be an understatement," Viktor smiled sadly, and drew in a deep breath before he continued, "I've never once questioned my love and commitment to Yuri. He's my rock, my heart, and my soul. But the way the RSF...and Russia itself, really...have continuously and unashamedly attacked me over it...has made me question how I could've ever been proud to skate for them. It was never my choice to be born in Russia...but I did my best for it as long as I could. If my accomplishments meant so little to them that they could throw me out as easily as they did...then I clearly made the right choice. I needed Yuri in my life, as much as I need air to breathe. The skating will come and go...but he'll always be there."

"So you think it was your controversial marriage that caused the RSF to act this way?"

"...I think they put up with it as long as they could." Viktor shrugged, "But giving my Gold medal to Yuri at the Final was the last straw, I guess. Even though I wouldn't have been able to do so again at Euros, since Yuri can't compete here, or at the Olympics, where I would've been barred from even being his coach, if I'd chosen to compete on Russia's behalf. What I did at the Grand Prix Final was a one-off. He's given me enough grief on his own...I'd be sleeping on the couch if I tried it again."

Yuri smiled nervously, but the rest of the crew took the joke for what it was, and even Viktor laughed a little bit before continuing.

"Yuri asked me in Barcelona, to stay in competitive skating with him for another year. I told him that, in exchange, he'd have to win five World Championships for me." He explained, leaning aside to nose his partner's cheek adoringly, and kissed there for good measure, "He's already made good on one. He'll win another in a few months...and another next year, and the year after that, and the year after that for the fifth. I have no doubt in my mind that he's the best skater in the world, and it's truly my honor to be his coach. I wouldn't give it up for anything...even my place on the Russian team, and every medal I won while part of it."

"V-Viktor..." Yuri stammered, his face going red.

"Don't be modest, my love." The silver retorted, bringing his free hand up to tap a finger against his husband's nose, "You asked me once to be yours until you retired, and I told you that I hope you never do."

"Do you intend on going back to coaching exclusively after this debacle with the RSF?" The reporter asked.
"Not for a little while," He answered, looking at him again, "The Japanese Skating Federation has generously offered a spot to me on Team Japan for the Winter Games, and I had intended to skate for fun next year, just to see how far I can go even if I'm not pushing myself as hard as I have been up until now. After that, I'll be satisfied with the finale of my skating career. I won't mind retiring on my own terms at that point. It's just a bit hard to take when someone else makes that choice for you when you're not actually ready, you know?"

"So you intend to give up your Russian citizenship in order to skate for Japan?"

"I have to, don't I?" Viktor smiled sweetly, even if there was a hint of sadness in it, "It hasn't been easy to adjust to all these changes. I'm still Russian, even if my paperwork changes. My roots are back there, in St. Petersburg...and a part of me will always yearn for it. But my home is where my husband, my dogs, and my family are...and those things are all in Hasetsu now. Russia has changed...or maybe I did, and I'm just now becoming aware of a side of the motherland that I never had to see before. Whatever it is...I have to do what's best for me," He said, turning to press his chin and nose to Yuri's shoulder, "...for us... And if that means walking away, then that's what I will do. I have a bright and promising future with the JSF, and they've accepted me into their ranks, already knowing my relationship with Yuri. Even though Japan is still fairly conservative, they still asked me to join them, and I intend to do whatever I can to make that worthwhile. If it's skating competitively, or coaching, I'll do it."

"Does that mean you're open to coaching other people from Japan?"

"Right now?" Viktor blanched, "Er...ah... Not yet. As long as I'm still competing, I can only coach one other person, and that person right now is Yuri."

"That's fair. Being a coach and competitor at the same time must stretch you fairly thin."

"It does, yeah. I don't want to short-change anyone by taking on additional students, only to fail them because I can't give them the attention they need."

Yuri deadpanned, but couldn't stop himself from interrupting anyway, "...Viktor's coaching methods with me are unique. I don't think I could tolerate it if he coached someone else if I'm still competing."

Viktor brought a hand up in front of his mouth, "Yuri~! Wow~!"

The younger man doubled-down though, "So...I guess I'll dash everyone's hopes until further notice. I need Viktor all to myself until I retire."

The reporter looked between the two, but settled on the Russian, "Coach Viktor, what say you?"

He just smiled though, "If hubby says no, then it's a no, I'm afraid. He has the final say on things like that."

"Do you mean to say that, even though he's your student, he's also your manager?"

"Quite the conundrum, wouldn't you say?" He laughed, "It makes sense to us, at least."

"The skating world has been quite cross with Yuri since he took you off the ice last year. But I suppose they'd be willing to forgive him a little if it's true that he's the one who also brought you back." The reporter mused, "But let's bring things back to Vienna. Since you're not competing for Russia anymore, what brought you to Euros?"

Viktor pulled his hand off that warm thigh and slid behind his husband's back, clinging to the backside of the nearest shoulder as he let himself relax a little, "We kind of wanted to come anyway.
Yuri Plisetsky has become part of the extended family in Hasetsu, so we wanted to show him our support, too."

"Even though he skates for the RSF?"

"In spite of it." Viktor nodded, then rested his chin down on that shoulder again, "We don't judge him for the colors he wears. He's still our friend. I've even agreed to choreograph for him next year, and he has a new Japanese coach, too. You saw her earlier. Minako Okukawa."

"Where did she come from? She's never been a skating coach before."

"Oh, she's a ballet instructor in Hasetsu." Yuri chimed in, "She's been a friend of my family's since my mom and her were in school together. It was actually her suggestion that got me into figure skating in the first place. Yuri Plisetsky is in capable hands with Minako-sensei."

"Are you considering the idea of pulling him into the JSF as well?"

Yuri and Viktor blinked in confusion, and looked at one another briefly, then back at the sportscaster who'd posed the question. They each smiled nervously, and shook their heads, "No way. That's poaching."

"One final question then... If you could give one message to the RSF, what would it be?"

Yuri side-eyed his partner quietly, and Viktor gained a look of consideration, humming to himself in thought. The Russian waited a moment though, carefully choosing his words, then looked to the camera and smiled, "Ty požalees' o tom, čto sdelal." (You'll regret what you've done.)
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY ONE

Equipment was disassembled and hands were shaken, and the media group slowly made their way back into the competitor's hall to re-take their places for post-skate interviews. Viktor and Yuri held back in the foyer, close to where the interview had been done, watching the group move away from them.

It was oddly quiet once the gaggle had gone away.

Viktor exhaled a long breath, and slumped forward a little, "...I can't believe I did that..."

Yuri waited a moment, but couldn't hide that smile, "I'm...oddly proud of you for what you said."

"...You are?"

"Mh." He nodded, pulling his hand from a coat pocket to sneak it into his husband's, and threaded their fingers together therein, "I asked you not to put the mask back on...and you didn't. You answered their questions with honesty, and you didn't even get nasty about it. It was classy, polite...but on point."

"You don't think it was too much?"

"I think you said just enough. There was a hint of venom where it needed to be, but I think you're entitled to that." Yuri reassured, nudging in a bit closer, and kissed the back edge of his husband's shoulder. He turned slightly though and looked up at the man's eyes, seeing at least one through a part in silver bangs, "What did you say at the end though...?"

Viktor drew a deep breath, "The only thing I may regret later."

"...What do you mean?"

"I told the RSF, in no uncertain terms, that they may come to regret how they handled me." He explained, feeling a bit of a chill down his back, "I just...couldn't stop the words from coming out. It's like I was being compelled."

"Well, it's not like what you said wasn't true."

"I spotted Yakov earlier, when Yurio was finishing up his interview." Viktor explained, turning slightly to face his partner, and brought his free arm up over Yuri's shoulders, "He was looking our way, and I waved at him, but he didn't respond. He just walked off like I wasn't there."

Yuri made a face, "It's not entirely out of keeping with him." He offered, "Remember how prickly he was at Cup of China last year? You were just asking if he wanted to go to hot-pot with us, and he actually said it made him sick that you were 'pretending' to be a coach, and not to talk to him unless you were ready to beg for your spot back as an athlete."

"...I know, but...it's been a long time since then. He stopped punishing me for being a coach by the time we got to Rostelecom. He wouldn't have agreed to take you on - so I could go back to Hasetsu - if he was still mad at me over everything."

"...I guess that's true..." Yuri sighed, pulling back slightly so he could look at the Russian's expression, "Is that what set you off?"

"...I wanted to say what was on my mind anyway, after we talked. I was ready. Maybe I just...gave myself permission to be a bit nasty at the end because of it." Viktor answered, casting his eyes down slightly, and brought his hands up to idly flatten-down Yuri's scarf, and tuck it back into the front folds of that dark-blue pea-coat he wore, "I don't even know if the RSF had anything to do with it...but I feel like there's a chance. They've done so much to try and undermine the core of who I am...denying my marriage by denying you proper recognition, editing out our rings, or just not showing them at all, questioning my qualifications because of what I'm doing off the ice...not to mention, the underhanded way that they changed things online. Trying to force me into their chosen narrative by making claims about my career that weren't true."

"...They did already eat their words on that though." Yuri pointed out, "While they were saying 'enjoy your retirement,' you were joining the JSF. Your fans were pretty dubious about it all, too, and made the RSF suffer the indignity of seeing your All Japan scores at Russian Nationals, as though you were still there."

"Oh..." Viktor laughed, "Yeah, they did do that, didn't they?"

"Your fans are loyal. They know when something doesn't smell right."

The silver Russian nodded, and moved one hand up from scarf to cheek, rubbing his thumb across it lightly, "I do feel a little nervous for Yurio though. I'm worried he's going to get caught in the middle of a feud I may have just started."

Yuri shook his head, "The RSF already made a big mistake with you. Yurio is their only shot at staying relevant for the next several years. If they do anything to try and punish him for associating with you, they may not have a Champion at all."

"Do you really think Yurio would drop the RSF over something like this though?"

He hesitated a moment, "If there's anything about Yurio that I know for a fact is true...it's that, one, he cares about the both of us, and two, he's vindictive. He'd never join the JSF...he'd probably join Skate Canada or something."

Viktor quirked a brow, "...Skate Canada? Why them?"

"To stick it to JJ. Also because Mikhail's established in Canada, so it would be an easy transition. They could sponsor his citizenship the same way I am for you."

"...You're sponsoring me as a spouse."

"...Okay maybe not exactly the same way, but you get the idea. It's a family thing. Mikhail could formally adopt Yurio."

Viktor nodded, thinking on it...but then cracked a smile, and huffed a quiet laugh. He found a few kisses between them, and scrunched his hands against his husband's shoulders, "I love your brain. You're so smart. Could you imagine it though?" He wondered, bending down quickly to pick up Jiro, "Yurio as a Rozovsky?"

"I don't know that he'd go that far." Yuri mused, taking his partner's elbow, and followed alongside as Viktor started walking, "When it came to sharing a name with me back in the day, he was ready to fight me for the right to be the only Yuri in Seniors. I think he counts on people recognizing his true name. He has nothing to gain by confusing people with a change."
"You didn't mind."

"I became a Nikiforov though. It's different." Yuri teased, "How many fans get to marry and take their idol's name anyway?"

"Touché."

Hasetsu, 2:30am

The air practically shimmered with frost, cast in the light of lamp posts. Yu-Topia's front door slid quietly and carefully open, and a white dog jumped out, paws crackling the brittle ice that caked the parking lot in sheets. Hana rushed out about half-way to the shrine-like arch by the sidewalk, sniffing at the ground, but then stopped and looked back, watching her human carefully bring one last small box outside.

Asahi slid the door shut again, determined not to make a noise, and then grabbed up the box again. He carried his guitar on his back in its case, and had bundled up to shield against the cold: jacket, hood, scarf, ski-goggles. Enough to stay warm, and avoid recognition, even by anyone crazy enough to be awake and outside at that absurd hour.

Hana trotted alongside Asahi's legs as he moved under the arch, and slipped across the street to a nearby parking lot. There, the motorcycle he'd purchased online, with its attached side-seat, and a rented trailer hitched to the back. He put the box on top of the rectangular trailer and unlocked the case, put the box inside, and closed it again. Hana had her paws up on the edge of the side-seat chassis, sniffing at the fabric within. Asahi moved over and shook out the thick blanket he'd bundled into that spot, and coaxed the Hokkaido-ken to jump in, then wrapped her up and buckled her in securely.

Goggle-covered eyes looked back towards Yu-Topia, and both hands came up, pressing together in front of the figure's face.

I can't begin to thank you enough for all of your hospitality and kindness. But with everything else that's happened...and Yuri's looming return...I just...can't stay any longer. My presence will only be a burden, and I don't want to make anyone uncomfortable.

His eyes clenched slightly, and his brow furrowed under the bulk of his hood.

...And I don't want to be uncomfortable... I know Yuri doesn't live at Yu-Topia anymore, but it's still his childhood home, and he's entitled to go there whenever he wants. I can't do what I need to do if I'm constantly paranoid about the next time I'll see him unexpectedly. ...I'm just...not strong enough.

Eyes opened reluctantly, and Asahi's hands moved down to his sides as he bowed forward.

Please forgive me for leaving like this.

Hana whined behind him, and Asahi rose back up to his full height. He pat the pup's head through the blanket and slid a leg across the seat of the motorcycle. The ignition was flipped and the engine came alive. A single headlight poured luminescence into the street, and Asahi put his hands on the handlebars. He looked over at the dog. [You ready?]

She whimpered and fidgeted slightly, but made no effort to escape the non-binding straps.

[Let's get going then. I don't want to be on the road too long in these conditions.]
The motorcycle revved and roared, though hopefully far enough away from any sleeping bodies that no one was awoken by it. Asahi slipped out onto the road and slowly started making his way towards the river, and the bridge that lead under the Ice Castle, leaving Yu-Topia behind.

Makkachin was the first to spot the duo returning, and nearly jumped out of the seat he'd been warming to greet them faster. Viktor quickly hugged him from the walk-way behind that last row though, calming the poodle down slightly, then helped Yuri climb over the back of the seat. Yuri held tight to both Jiro and the hand, and helped Viktor over the same way.

"What took you guys so long? I was starting to worry." Mikhail commented, watching the duo reclaim their seats, "Minako and Yura have been in the stands for a little while already."

"Viktor got asked to do an interview after Yurio's was done." Yuri explained, "It took a little time to let the crew set up since we moved away from the designated post-skate interview area."

"An interview?" The elder echoed, "They didn't bother you unnecessarily, did they?" He wondered, jade eyes lowering to look at his nephew.

Viktor shook his head though, and leaned back from where he'd been giving Makkachin some attention, "Unnecessarily? No...it was probably necessary."

"Can we see the interview?" Nikki wondered.

"If you find it. I'm not sure when they'll air it." He answered, "Was Makkachin on his best behavior while we were gone?"

"Oh...yeah, he was fine."

"So what was the interview about?" Mikhail wondered, feeling a bit nosy.

"You think the European division of the ISU is going to let me float around without asking how I feel about not getting to compete as of a month ago?" Viktor huffed, "This is the first time I've been to a European Championship since I took time off to coach Yuri. If not for the fact that I was barred last year, I'd probably be watching someone usurp my winning streak, and suffer the anxiety of not being able to defend it, even though I'm here."

"...Why were you barred last year?"

"I didn't skate at Russian Nationals." The silver answered simply, turning his eyes down towards the skater on the ice. Vivaldi's 'Winter' played all around them, and a teenaged skater glided across the ice.

[Four Seasons - Winter' - A. Vivaldi] - 3:35 duration clip on channel 'legusas ', starting at 0:38

"To get a spot at Euros, I would've had to place high at Nationals, but since All Japan is always held on the same weekend, I had to be with Yuri." Viktor explained, "I basically gave my spot up."

"...How did you manage to get to Worlds then?" Mikhail asked.

"Placement at Worlds depends on your standing the previous year. I won my 5th consecutive Gold there at the time, so I got 3 spots for the Russians. I went, and so did Yurio, and Georgi." Viktor answered, "The RSF could've chosen not to send me if they were being petty about it, but it was my big return to competitive skating at the time and they were kind of shoe-horned into letting me go. It would've been psychotic to tell me no when so much hype had built over it."

"Psychotic like saying you're barred from skating for the rest of the season?" The elder quipped, "The RSF seems to have run out of good ideas."

"Right?"

"All those names that went to Worlds last year though...you guys were all sharing the same coach." Mikhail pointed out, "Does Russia have no other good skaters?"

"Yakov is the eminent coach in Russia, at least for the Men's Singles." Viktor explained, idly squishing the fluff on Makkachin's head as he watched the performance below, and the combination spin that would finalize that skater's Short Program, "He'll start scouting the students he wants to bring to St. Petersburg, if he isn't getting referrals already. With me fired, Georgi retiring this year, and Yurio transferred to Hasetsu...he'll need fresh athletes. I'm sure he'll be fine. It's easiest to start with new students after Worlds, so he's probably just waiting."

The music faded out, and applause rose up in its place. The young blonde skater bowed and moved towards the kiss-and-cry, waiting on baited breath for his judgment.

"Die Punktzahl für Benjamin Müller...78.12."

The teen looked excited, jumping up from the bench with his hands together as he thanked the crowd for their support.

Viktor scanned the crowd for the area where athletes were watching from, and spotted it just near to curtain that lead under the stands to the prep-area. Yurio had changed by then, and had his sneakers up on the back of a seat as he leaned into the one he was sitting in. Minako was sitting with him, but just as soon as Viktor spotted her, she got up and started heading off somewhere, disappearing into a doorway.

"Looks like Minako-sensei is ready to come back." Yuri commented suddenly, pulling Viktor's attention away, "I dunno where she's going to sit though."

"You and I could always go sit with Yurio." Viktor suggested, "Maybe we'll find Chris in the prep-area along the way."

"Should we bring Makka with us this time?"

"Sure." He agreed easily, and started to push up out of his chair, "Uncle Mik, we're gonna go down again. It looks like Minako is going to come up here so we'll take off so she has somewhere to sit."

"You guys are allergic to being in the audience," The elder shook his head and huffed a quiet laugh, "I guess we'll see you at the end then when we pick up Yura."

The pair of non-competing skaters lumbered back over their seats, and Makkachin hopped over with them, excited as ever and panting happily. They started heading towards the stairs behind the row like before, though Viktor found himself pausing suddenly. Mikhail had pulled off his flatcap to scratch a spot behind one ear, and slate eyes had zeroed in on that crown, like a hawk that had spotted a vole.

Yuri paused as well, realizing his husband had stopped, and looked back just in time to spot the Russian loom directly over his uncle, "...Viktor...?"

Mikhail felt eyeballs on his scalp and quickly put his hat back, staring directly up, with his fingers still holding the hat's brim. He made a face at the one looking down at him, "...What?"

Viktor's eyes narrowed slightly, "...I can't tell."

"Can't tell?" The elder repeated, confused, "Can't tell what?" He wondered, only to hear Yuri suddenly crack up laughing. The whole thing was so strange that he squished his hat down harder on his head with a hand on top of it, "Why are you guys being weird? What's going on?"

"Weiter auf dem Eis, Tschechische Republik repräsentierend... Next on the ice, representing Czech Republic...Emil Nekola!"

Yuri tugged on his husband's hand, but was still sporting a bit of a smug grin from before, "Don't worry about it, Uncle Mik. It's nothing important."

It did little to dissuade the elder's confusion, but he could do little more than watch the pair and their dogs head down the stairs all over again. The audience was cheering as Emil slid out onto the ice, and Mikhail simmered in his bewilderment. He grimaced when his youngest daughter leaned against his arm.

"Maybe you're balding, papa." She teased.

"Me!?" He harped in surprise, "I'm not balding at all! My hair is thick!"

"Well, he said he couldn't tell, right?"

"...This is so unfair...now I'm paranoid...!"
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY TWO

[‘Blue (Da Ba Dee)’ - Eiffel 65]

Almost as soon as the music began, the sound of it became muffled by the walls of the under-arena hallway. Back on flat flooring, Yuri set Jiro down to walk alongside his bigger counterpart, and rose back up to the feeling of an arm sliding across his shoulders. Returning the gesture in kind, he slipped his own arm behind his husband's back, and they slowly made their way through the arena.

Yuri casually leaned his head up against the arm perched behind his neck and tilted slightly, "So can you give me even the slightest hint about your grand plan for later?"

Viktor just offered a sly grin, "Only that it starts at around 9pm and goes until 5am."

"Oof..." Yuri winced, "Why so late?"

"Honestly? I have no idea." The Russian mused, rubbing the shoulder under his palm a little, "And that's just when the doors open. The actual stuff doesn't start until 10."

"...I guess it's better than having everything start before we even have a chance to get there. We'll have to drop the dogs off first, right?"

"Yes, and change into our spiffy duds."

"...Spiffy duds?" Yuri echoed skeptically, "All I brought was a suit for the Banquet at the end..."

"Don't worry; I took care of it." Viktor reassured, turning their path slightly as they neared the doorway to the prep area, "I didn't pack so many suitcases just for me."

Brown eyes narrowed slightly, "...You busted into your slush fund again didn't you?"

"It's the only way I can spend money without you knowing." Viktor teased, offering a wink as well, "How else will I be able to surprise you?"

"Well, your motto was always 'do the opposite of what people expect,' and you surprise me plenty even without spending money."

Viktor huffed a laugh, "It's a bit harder to do things the way I used to when I'm sharing a bank account with the person I'm trying to surprise. Purchase memos on our statement don't leave much to the imagination, and you track everything."

"It's a habit I formed in Detroit," Yuri sighed, pulling his badge and lanyard out of his jacket to let it hang in front of his chest, "Had a lot of moments out there where I couldn't understand why I had no money...turns out I was nickel-and-dimming myself to death with a thousand little purchases. Who knew eating out all the time would be so expensive?" He laughed at his own expense, "Now I'm just paranoid, especially since our income isn't consistent or guaranteed anymore. Back then, I lived on what my parents sent me every month. Now it's just us...and a lot has suddenly changed."

Badges were flashed to the staffer who stood by the entrance to the prep area, and the little group moved through, dogs keen to smell at everything they could. Instead of continuing to move forward towards the gaggle of skaters and the televisions they were focused on though, Viktor nudged Yuri Turning slightly and moving in front of his partner, Viktor flipped around to walk backwards, and continued to pull his spouse down the side-hall, "I don't want you to think you have to watch everything so closely." He said quietly, both wrists hooked over his husband's shoulders, fingers loosely woven together behind his neck, "I'm may be spontaneous, but I like to think I'm not as reckless as I used to be."

Yuri was quiet, unsure what to say in response. He just let the man continue to pull him slowly down the corridor, until deciding to pause and lean against the white-painted stone-brick wall. Hands moved from the front of Viktor's shirt to slide around his sides, through the open front of the coat, and clasped loosely behind his back.

"You're looking at me like you're not sure whether to believe me or not."

"Er..." Yuri stammered, confusion switching to surprise, "I don't...uhm...I mean, I believe you, I just also think there's been plenty of reason to feel apathetic about stuff like that lately. Maybe I'm just projecting though...my eating habits are slightly self-destructive when I'm depressed. You stop eating though. Maybe your coping mechanism is spending too much from your slush fund..."

Viktor just hummed a smile, and pulled his right hand back to brush the edge of curled fingers against his partner's cheek, "My love, there are too many things in this world to be worried about already. My spending habits shouldn't be one of them."

Yuri quirked a brow, "...You took us into a side-hall just to tell me not to worry? Worry is my default setting. If I have nothing to worry about, I'm worried about not being worried."

"I know, but no," He laughed, "I did this so I could have a moment alone with you. I just happened to have had a few other things to say beforehand."

"I see... So my rambling is holding you up."

"Maybe a little bit." Viktor mused, leaning in closer, "But I know just the remedy."

Yuri felt the hand that was still sitting beside his neck slide down behind his back, fingers pressing between his shoulder-blades to nudge him closer. His own fanned out and pressed palms to Viktor's back, slowly sliding down to perch on the Russian's hips. The kiss was warm and welcome, with the subtle tingle of a few hummed laughs behind them.

"This must be the real reason you wanted to leave the audience," Yuri commented between passes, "You just used Yurio and Chris as an excuse."

"Well," Viktor started, "My 'to do' list does frequently have you at the top."

"At the top and on top."

Viktor's face went a bit red in his surprise, but that just left him open to getting pushed slightly sideways until his back was pushed against the wall. He smirked a little as Yuri pressed up against him for another few kisses, and slid both arms over the younger man's shoulders, "I thought you didn't like making racy jokes in front of people though."

"There's no one here but us and the dogs."

"Really."
Yuri's left eye twitched in sudden concern, but it didn't stop the shadow that snuck in from behind him. Jiro started barking as well, but before Yuri could do anything, something slid over his elbows to clasp over his hands where they were still perched on his partner's waist, and a body cozied up behind him, moving his hands down and around to cup behind his husband's rump.

"You have him all to yourself and you don't even take advantage."

Viktor smiled innocently, albeit slightly worried, and lifted his arms up just a few inches as he could feel Yuri's frame tense up under them. He was a bit stunned to see Yuri flip around as quickly as he did though, practically falling back against him as hands flew forward, shoving the looming figure backward with a start and half a shriek. The Russian's eyes were wide, and rubber blade-guards thumped on the tile floor to regain balance. He quickly lowered his arms again and clutched his hands across the younger man's shoulders to keep him still.

"Ch-Chris!" Yuri barked incredulously, looking a bit more irritated than spooked like he normally would be. He felt all the blood drain from his face, and Jiro continued barking, giving his human a little bit of puppy-courage, "Don't sneak up on me like that! You just about gave me a coronary!"

"Sorry." He mused, looking down to hold his leg out slightly as the little Akita tried going for one skate, "I'm glad to see you two getting along so well again. I have a feeling this baby nugget is going to hold a grudge against me though." He smiled nervously, "Do a friend a favor?"

Yuri steeled himself and pushed up to standing normally again as Viktor helped nudge him up from behind, and crouched down to pick the pup up, tugging on one skate lace briefly as Jiro rose. He settled the puppy against a shoulder and tried to soothe him with a few pats, "Easy, little dude, it's fine. He just scared me."

Viktor pushed off the wall to wrap his arms around his husband's sides, and set his chin over the opposite shoulder from Jiro, who had taken to growling a little instead of barking, "You've incurred the wrath of an Akita. I don't think he'll ever forgive you."

"I guess it could be worse." Chris shrugged, looking to Makkachin instead, who was panting away and just watched the whole scene calmly, "At least he still likes me."

"Makkachin likes practically everyone though."

"Except for those guys in St. Petersburg, right?" Chris teased, though spotted the gaunt look on Yuri's face as soon as he said the words.

"...Erm...sorry, Yuri," Viktor started nervously, "I had to tell him what happened so he could understand what was going on..."

"I'm not mad that he knows." Yuri sighed, "I just don't like thinking about what happened. I was just finally starting to feel safe, and now my teeth are on edge again like before."

"Sorry." Both older figures said in tandem.

"Ugh, it's fine... Shouldn't you be getting ready to go out there though?" Yuri huffed, trying to change the subject, "You have your skates on, so you're done stretching at least..."

"I'm first up in Group 2." Chris explained, sliding his hands into the pockets of his red and white team jacket, and turned on the heel of one blade-guard to start walking back the way he came, "I just thought I'd come bug you two since I saw you come in. Seems I stepped in at a bad moment though."
Viktor offered an innocent smile as he watched his friend move back towards the main foyer of the prep area, but then slowly looked back at Yuri next to him, "...Sorry."

"...How come you didn't warn me that he was standing right there?" He sighed quietly.

"I honestly didn't see him until you turned my back towards the wall." The silver Russian explained, "I guess he was quiet enough that even Jiro didn't notice him until he was inches away. Chris does have an eerie knack for sneaking up on people..."

Yuri held quiet, stroking his hand down his pup's bristled back.

"...Are you okay...? You shoved him pretty hard." Viktor wondered, feeling the hair on the back of his neck prickle a little in unease, "...Yuri?"

He just sighed and shook his head, "Maybe I'm just over-thinking it, or feeding off of Jiro's reaction...but I wish Chris wouldn't do stuff like that."

"...I don't follow."

Yuri's brow furrowed slightly, but he turned to lean a shoulder against his partner's chest. He felt a hand slide up behind his back to hold his other side, "Normally I wouldn't care that he gets so close, because I know him and I know he's just teasing. I think I'm just over-sensitive to people getting into my personal space right now though. All Japan is still too fresh."

"I can talk to him if you want."

"...I don't want to make a mountain out of a mole-hill. Telling him to stop doing what he's always done would be like telling him to stop being himself." Yuri said, and shook his head, looking down the corridor in the direction the blonde had gone, "He already probably feels like he stepped in it. Don't need to make it worse."

"I don't think Chris will take it personally if I ask him to stop sliding in on your backside." Viktor pointed out, "But it'll work out better if I ask him while this is still fresh."

Yuri hesitated to answer, pressing his face to Jiro's fur instead. He held there a moment, breathing in the smell of the pup, but then shook his head uncertainly, "...I'll leave it to you to decide."

"That's fair. Let's go find Yurio then."

"...Wait..." He said quietly, causing the silver to pause and look back at him. Yuri just stepped forward and offered a quick peck to his partner's lips, "Sorry I make things so difficult."

Viktor smiled though and gave a second kiss, "My love, nothing worthwhile is gained without effort. Come."

By the time they stuck their heads out at rink-side to find the way up to the athlete's observation area, Emil had been long-finished and the next competitor was on the ice. Performing to 'Tanguera' by Mariano Mores, a tango whose tune had been the inspiration for Moulin Rouge's 'Roxanne,' the Euro's lone Estonian skater was hitting all his marks.

Viktor stuck his head out from the sectioned hallway that only competitors could access, and looked over to the seating area, spotting a half-dozing Yurio slouching in his seat. He looked back to his husband and pointed the way, and offered Makkachin's leash and another quick kiss before going back down the stairs and into the prep area on his own. Yuri watched him go, but turned back to the arena and started heading towards the still-unaware Russian Tiger.
Yurio barely noticed Makkachin coming before the poodle practically threw himself across the teen's lap, and he all-but-jumped in surprise. Bright green eyes looked past the rim of his hoodie to spot Yuri coming up next with Jiro still against one shoulder, "...Yuri!" He huffed, reaching under his hood to pull off one side of his head-set.

"Sorry to sneak up on you like this."

The teen eased Makkachin off his legs and pulled them down from where his feet were perched on the spot ahead of himself, putting his shoes on the ground, "...It's fine. How come you're over here though?" He wondered, reaching an arm up to return the greeting-hug that his older counterpart offered before sitting down, "Where's Viktor?"

"Right behind me. We thought we'd come down to keep you company since Minako-sensei left."

"Oh." The Tiger nodded, sitting up more normally than earlier, only to stick one foot against the back of the seat ahead himself again anyway, "Yeah, the nerves got to her."

"...Too many skaters to fangirl over in one place?"

"Maybe. She said she was feeling a bit overwhelmed so she went to get away from everything."

Yuri set Jiro on the floor and lifted his eyes to the audience, trying to get his bearings to find the spot the rest of the family had set up. It took a moment, but he found them, and realized the two seats he and Viktor had occupied were still empty, "...Hm. We thought she was gonna go sit with Mikhail and the others. That's part of why we came down, too...there wasn't a seat available for her with us there. We left to make room."

The music came to its end a few seconds later, and the audience broke out into applause. Eyes went down to the ice, watching the young Estonian wave to the crowd and bow in appreciation before pushing off to find his coach and blade-guards.

"She's been gone for like 15 minutes then." Yurio pointed out, "What do you wanna do?"

"Did she say she was going to come back?"

"She just told me to stay here."

"We should go make sure she's okay." Yuri said, standing up again, "Come on."

The teen grumbled but stood up as well, following after the older skater and the two dogs. He watched as Yuri rounded the corner, only to pause as he seemed to bounce off something behind it.

"Oh." Viktor's voice countered, surprised to see them, "I just got done talking to Chris," He started, feeling Yuri flipping him around on his heels to face the way he'd just come, "...Aaaand now we're going back...?"

"We're gonna find Minako-sensei."

"We are?" He asked, looking back over his shoulder as Yuri continued nudging him forward and down the stairs, "Where?"

"Don't know yet. Halls, bathrooms maybe."

"I'm texting her." Yurio commented from the back, thumbing at his phone as he barely watched his step, "Maybe she'll just tell us where she went."
"Is something wrong...?" Viktor wondered dubiously.

"Yuri said she wasn't feeling good, so I just want to check on her, since she isn't in the audience with Mik and his girls." Yuri explained, waiting a moment at the bottom of the steps as Jiro finished clambering down after them, "Maybe it's nothing. Doesn't hurt to find out."
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY THREE

Viktor quickly hopped back down the stairs and into the open space beneath the audience, looking around for the blonde Swiss skater. He spotted him a short distance away with his coach and SSF entourage, biding his time with varying arm stretches. The Russian drew a sharp breath and pressed on towards the man, sliding his hands into his coat pockets as he glided through the open space. He kept his eyes forward even as he passed Yakov and Georgi, though the two didn't see him to notice; they were watching the performance on one of the wall-mounted televisions.

A subtle tingle crept through Viktor's frame, getting more intense with every step closer towards his friend. Chris seemed to have felt him coming though, and turned his face over a shoulder to watch his final approach.

"Just you?" The younger figure huffed, "I must be in trouble."

Viktor just smiled and moved in closer, "The worst kind."

"How mad is he?" Chris wondered, letting his arms go limp at his sides.

"You told me about the things you thought you had to do to keep Saito away from Yuri when they were younger," The Russian started casually, speaking quietly so as to not be heard by those for whom his words were not meant, "Would it surprise you to know that I felt the need to do the same thing when I met him?"

"Jeeze, he's still at it?" Chris sighed, "That guy doesn't give up."

"In his defense, I can't blame him...Yuri is perfect. I told Yuri what I thought was going on with Saito while we were at Harry Potter World, but instead of heeding my advice to keep a safe distance, Yuri ended up confronting him."

Chris' brow furrowed, "...I don't like the sound of that. Yuri's no fighter."

Viktor lowered his gaze sadly, but then shook his head, "No, he's a lover...Saito's the fighter, and Yuri lost."

Lime-green eyes widened, looking the Russian up and down skeptically, then with growing concern, "...You don't mean to say that chicken-head actually...?"

The silver raised one hand to stop the thought from being worse than it was, "Saito kissed him. Roughly." He explained simply, then returned his hand to its pocket, "Yuri stepped away while I was doing my post-SP interview, because Yurio called and he couldn't hear over the echo in the hall. He bumped into Saito entirely by accident. Yuri felt like it was meant to happen, so instead of leaving, or even letting Saito escape - which he did apparently try to do - Yuri trapped him and told him how he felt. All fine and good in theory, I suppose...Yuri wanted to let Saito down gently. It didn't go over well." Viktor said, pausing for a moment as the memory of that pain crept in again, "He wouldn't tell me what happened until we got back to the hotel and he'd scalded himself under hot water, scratching red lines into his own skin with his nails to try and make the dirty feeling go away."

"...After your SP but before leaving..." Chris echoed, thinking back on the event, "So when Yuri passed out in the audience..."
“Panic attack. Bad one.” Viktor confirmed, "In any case...Yuri's been pretty rattled since then, and I've gotten rather protective. I wasn't there for him and he got hurt. We both know and trust you, Chris, but...I'd avoid sneaking up behind him from now on, and quit the provocative touches. Yuri needs time to feel comfortable in his own skin again."

"You guys really can't catch a break, can you?"

The Russian offered his best smile, “I suppose there's some aspect to the fact that we're a couple now that makes otherwise-non-issues suddenly be issues.” He agreed, turning on his heel slightly, "But it has been hard, yeah... We can only do our best."

Viktor glanced back over a shoulder as the little group moved back through the prep area again, and spotted the same faces from earlier. Eyes were fixed on the televisions though; the Estonian skater was about to get his score. He turned back to those nearby then, feeling a hand with a nylon strap over it cupping against his own. Looking down, it was just Makkachin's leash looped around Yuri's palm. Viktor curled his fingers around it and pulled the hand into his coat pocket to warm it up.

Yurio kept his eyes down on his phone as he followed the duo and their pups from behind, though quickly found himself next to them as Yuri slowed down to let him catch up.

"Anything?"

"Not yet.” He answered grimly, putting his phone away, "There's only so many places she could be in this place though. Should we split up?"

"We can't just waltz into the ladies' bathrooms." Viktor pointed out, looking around dubiously, then down towards the two pups waiting and watching him in turn, "...Hm."

"You think she's feeling sick again?” Yuri wondered, clutching his free hand to the front of his pea-coat nervously, "Maybe that's why she isn't answering. She's too busy praying to the porcelain gods to notice she's even been messaged..."

Yurio shot him a smug look, "You sound like you speak from experience."

That just made Yuri's face go red, and he looked aside sheepishly, "That would probably be a story to hear from Phichit-kun...if I drink too much, I black out and don't remember..."

"Yuri, do you have anything of Minako's by your gear?" Viktor wondered suddenly, drawing up the eyes of both figures, only for the older to realize quickly that the 'Yuri' being sought after wasn't himself, "I have an idea."

"Oh...uh..." The teen grimaced, "Maybe...?"

Quickly finding their way over to the bench with the Tiger's gear-bags, Yurio rummaged for anything that might not be his own. Under his winter coat, he found Minako's purse though, and he handed it to Viktor.

"This is all hers."

"What are you planning...?" Yuri wondered, watching his husband rifle through the bag.

Viktor paused after a moment, "Well, this explains why she wasn't answering." He said, lifting the woman's phone up to show it, then put it back inside again. Half a second later though, he found her gloves, and pulled them out entirely, "Here we go...these should work."

"Do you make sense ever?" Yurio quipped. He watched as the older figure went down with the garments, offering a sniff to an eager poodle.

"...Oh! That's a great idea!" Yuri said excitedly, suddenly realizing, "Makkachin can find her by scent!"

The Tiger guffawed, "You know that sniffer-dogs take actual training to do that...wh-hey! Wait up!"

Makkachin was off towards the stairs again, nose to the floor, tail wagging as the rest of the group trailed behind. Viktor quickly put the gloves back in the handbag and buttoned it up, slinging the straps over his elbow as they moved. The poodle moved halfway up the stairs, snuffling at each ledge, then moved over to the other side and came back down again, moving across the floor towards the gear-bench they'd just come from...almost. A few feet away from it, Makkachin veered off again in a different direction, heading into a side-hall.

Yurio paused at the entrance to that corridor and looked at the signs posted next to it, then shook his head and sighed before hopping to catch up again. As he suspected, the poodle stopped outside a swinging door, pawing at the baseboards and whining.

"You think she's in here...?" Yuri wondered, gently pulling Makkachin's harness to get the poodle out of the way.

Viktor stepped up in the pup's place and knocked the back of a knuckle against the door, leaning in close to listen, "Minako?" He asked, nudging the panel open a little, "Minako, you in there?"

Makkachin wiggled free and wedged his snoot into the open space, then pushed all the way in before Yuri could stop him. The leash had a few feet of slack before he got too far away, and Yuri was yanked halfway into the bathroom, leash still looped over his wrist and hand, "M-Makkachin...! You can't just-" He stammered, stumbling through the door-frame. Viktor helped him regain his footing, and he repositioned his glasses over his nose, but as he looked up, he spotted the brown boofer standing proudly in the middle of that first open space, tail wagging, and those dark brown eyes looking back at him. Yuri looked to the side though, to a darker shape against the pale wall, and gasped, "M-Minako-sensei!"

Hearing it, Viktor immediately pushed the whole door open, and sent Yuri stumbling inward all over again.

Yurio's brows were raised skeptically, "...I can't believe that shit worked."

Makkachin barked triumphantly, his booming voice echoing loudly through the small space.

"Shhh!" The ailing woman pleaded, reaching one hand forward towards the poodle. She sat alone in the small bathroom space on a lone plastic chair with a wire frame, a stack of wet paper towels pressed to her forehead. She recoiled again though once the echo faded away, and lifted the dangling side of the damp 'cloth' back into place.

The skating trio moved in softly then. Yuri handed Makkachin's leash back to Viktor before crouching down in front of his former teacher's knees, with Jiro coming up around his side as well, "You okay? What's wrong?" He asked quietly.

"...I don't...feel good..." She answered in a mumble, "Lightheaded..."
Viktor stepped closer, but stayed standing, bending down to place one hand on the back of Minako's shoulders, "How long have you been down here? Since leaving Yuri in the stands?"

Minako could only nod slightly.

"Have you eaten recently...?" Yuri asked, "Is it low blood-sugar? Does anyone have a juice-box or something?" He looked up and at the other two, but knew it was pointless, and they each shook their heads.

"It's...not that... We ate an hour before coming up here..." Minako tried to explain, "I was just...walking down the stairs. I felt a bit nauseated, so went looking for a bin, just in case...but then I started feeling dizzy... I came here to try and cool off, but my head is still spinning..."

"Do you still feel sick at all?" Viktor wondered, rubbing his hand across the woman's back, "I could probably carry you back out if you don't think you can walk on your own."

She huffed a sad laugh, "I may have to take you up on that just so I can say 'I got carried off by Viktor Nikiforov.'"

"Sounds like I should then," Viktor mused, handing off Makkachin's leash to his husband again, and Minako's purse to Yurio, though he guffawed in surprise when it fell into his arms. Viktor moved to crouch down in front of the dizzy ballerina, and balanced carefully as she slid forward onto his back. With a bit of effort, he rose up to standing again, hoisting the woman up with him, "Okay...all set?"

"Viktor, are you su-" Yuri started, only to stop himself as slate eyes turned his way, "Uhm... You practiced really hard this morning...is your ankle feeling okay?"

Relieved, Yuri nodded, and reached a hand over to hold the door while Viktor carried the ailing woman back into the hall. Yurio followed out after, then the two pups, and finally Yuri at the back. He stepped beside Makkachin to offer an extra pat, "You did a good job." He commented, looking up just in time to avoid running into the back of Yurio's stalled frame. He jumped back with a start, "Y-Yuri! Why'd you stop?"

The teen kept his eyes forward, watching Viktor and Minako continue down the corridor, "...It's going to be a problem if she's always sick like this."

"...It's not always..." Yuri countered, trying to sound reassuring as he stepped up next to him, "But I can see your point."

"What if it never gets better?"

"...It's impossible to know. There's only two other competitions after this though. We'll figure something out if things don't improve...and by next year, well, it'll be done and over anyway."

"Will it though?" The teen asked skeptically, his tone low; he kept his eyes straight ahead.

"...What do you mean? She can't be like this forever." Yuri countered, taking a step forward as the two antsy dogs seemed eager to catch up to the others, "If she's only a month into things, then she'll be done with it by...uhh..." He looked upward slightly, counting in his head, "...August-ish? September?"

"Babies don't raise themselves, stupid." Yurio harped between clenched teeth, "It's a full-time job."
Yuri hesitated in surprise, but then smiled, "Minako-sensei isn't alone in this though. She's got a secret weapon."

"...Hah?"

"Well, two I guess... Mikhail is particularly invested in this...and then there's my mom. She practically adopted Viktor within hours of him showing up at Yu-Topia, calling him Vik-chan and all that. Can you imagine her with the equivalent of a grandkid?" He explained, looking back to nudge his head and make the not-so-subtle suggestion that they try to catch up, "I imagine this'll be a village effort anyway. That kid's gonna have a huge family; you included."

Yurio's face went red, but his eyes went down to the side, no clue how to answer. He just took a few steps forward to follow after the older figure and his little pack. By the time they'd gotten back to the main foyer of the prep area, Viktor had settle Minako down on the bench by Yurio's gear bags, and he turned slightly towards the duo as they approached. He raised a hand to wave them over, and slid it across his partner's shoulders as the younger man came in close.

"Should we call Mikhail down?" Yuri wondered, "He'd probably want to know if you're not feeling good, Minako-sensei."

"He's already on his way." Viktor explained, "I stuck my head out the door to the audience and waved at him to come down. He should be here any second."

"Oh okay."

"...Ughhh...being like this sucks..." Minako whined, rubbing a few fingers over one eye, "...I don't recommend it."

Yurio set the hand-bag down next to its owner, "Are you sure you're up for this coaching thing?"

Yuri shot the teen a look, but he ignored it. Viktor glanced between the two curiously.

"I've been a dancer for decades, and I've taught dancing for half of them. I can coach figure skating." She argued, "I just...need to get used to this other thing... I'm sure there's just something about it that I'm fighting against or don't understand. I will figure it out."

Yurio just grumbled quietly. Movement out the corner of his eye caught his attention, and he looked over to spot the rest of the clan coming in through the doors from the public area. He turned back to look at Minako for a moment, then up to Yuri again, and finally lowered his gaze downward. The commotion of the reunion seemed to go right through him.

I'm not the only one who's counting on her to get to these competitions, he thought bitterly, But I feel like I can't even mention it because Yuri might take it badly. What a shit situation...
The group moved out to sit in the athlete's section of the stands just as the final skater of Group 1 was getting his scores. All together, rather than scattered throughout the arena - or in transit from one spot to another - the atmosphere around them felt more relaxed. As had been the case earlier, and was typical, Mikhail took his spot at the end of the row, putting himself between the stairwell and the seats the rest of his family sat in, with Minako next, then Nikki, Yurio, and Viktoria beside him on the other end. Sitting in the stairwell, Viktor perched on the longer, level step that lined up with the row of seats. Makkachin leaned up against his human's back, resting his head over one shoulder. Yuri sat on the step in front of his partner, using the legs that parted around him like arm-rests for his elbows, and snuggled back against his husband's chest, arms protectively around him. Curious as ever, Jiro wandered up and down the steps to the limits of his leash, then returned and found somewhere else to explore.

"Gruppe 2 beginnt nun mit einer Aufwärmphase von 6 minuten... Group 2 will now begin a 6 minute warm-up period..."

The audience clapped and whistled as the skaters set down onto the ice, a few of them donning their newly-minted Olympic team jackets. Even Chris finally donned one; an all-scarlet ensemble with 'SUI' on the left arm, and a small white plus-sign - the lone symbol on the country's flag - on the right.

Yurio scoffed and rolled his eyes as teammate Georgi came out as well, being way too proud of himself. He leaned forward in his seat and set his elbow on his knees, "Ah, Viktor...get a load of that guy." He said, thumbing at the ice, "He thinks he's super hot shit now cuz he has that jacket."

Viktor huffed a laugh against Yuri's crown, "Cut him a little slack. It was his last shot at going to the Games and he finally made it."

Yuri made a face as he watched the skaters going around the ice, and focused on the lone Russian, "...Come to think of it, he's never been there, has he?"

"Nope." His husband smirked, "He would've had the same red and white track-suit I had before if he'd gone."

"He probably would've slept in it like pajamas." Yurio laughed, leaning back into his seat again.

"Shouldn't you be cheering him on instead of making fun of him?" Nikki wondered, eyebrow raised.

"Why?" The blonde wondered, still looking a bit smug, "He's on Team Russia, but that doesn't mean he isn't ridiculous."

"Well, he's confident, just like Cousin Viktor."

Both Yurio and Viktor coughed in a fit at the same time, gaping at the young silver incredulously.

"That's not confidence," Yurio stammered, "Viktor is extra, but Georgi is extreme."

"He's simmered down a little bit, Yuri," Mila's voice came suddenly; she and Sara Crispino emerged from the covered part of the stairwell nearby, "Remember last year?"
"No." He answered simply, eyes narrowed like he wasn't sure if the Ladies' skater was about to trap him in a joke or not.

"What was wrong last year?" Yuri asked; the voice of tempered reason in the group.

The two women took seats in the row ahead of them, and Mila twisted around, hooking an elbow over the back of her chair to see the duo more easily, "His whole theme last year was 'heartbreak;' his ex-girlfriend had already hooked up with another guy and it was eating him up inside. It had been months since they broke up though...but his Short Program played out like he was still angry and desperate. He went from crying at the start, to being on the attack. It was actually a little scary."

"...He made it to Worlds though...his scores were still really good, even if he didn't get to the GP Final. How come he's never made it to the Olympics?" Yuri wondered, "He's good enough."

"Being good enough isn't always enough." Viktor explained, slowly rubbing his cheek against his husband's ear, "When Russia picks its people to represent them at the Games, they do so with the idea that the people they send are likely to get on the podium. Sending someone who's 'good enough' to qualify, but not 'good enough' to medal, stands to serve as an embarrassment. Georgi has never made it to the Final, nor earned a medal at Worlds. Euros and Nationals aren't enough."

"So why send him this time?"

"Maybe Yakov asked." Viktor shrugged, "As the premier coach for Russian skaters, he's kinda hurting for representation."

"I'm going!" Mila protested, pulling on her own Olympic jacket to puff it out for emphasis.

"Yakov's bread-and-butter has always been the Men's Singles group though." Viktor pointed out, "It would be weird if he wasn't there for it...kind of like if Russia wasn't being represented at the Games at all."

"You shouldn't say stuff like that." Yuri pointed out, leaning his head back against his partner's chest to see him better.

Viktor looked down slightly, "Well, if Russia wasn't going to be allowed to go, don't you think the IOC would've said something by now?"

Yuri gave a skeptical, if not worried look, "...What you said before, when we were at the doctor for your ankle...about how the RSF offended you..."

Slate eyes were unmoving for a moment, but Viktor then glanced aside, "...I don't know why that could come up now."

"...How did the RSF offend you?" Mila wondered suspiciously, "Er, I mean, other than the super obvious."

Viktor seemed reluctant to answer, but he could feel all eyes on him by then. He drew in a sharp breath and held his husband's frame a little tighter, "They had the gall to ask me to cheat at the Sochi Games. I told them there was no way. Back then, I was in the middle of my last winning streak...I didn't think I needed help, and I didn't want it. They were forced to let me go anyway for various reasons, but it still got under my skin that they'd even make the suggestion."

Mila and Yurio exchanged nervous looks, and the Tiger spoke up, "...What kind of idiot would risk their career by cheating?"
"The kind desperate to win." Viktor answered, his voice in subtle monotone, "A Russian-hosted Olympics without Russian medalists would’ve been unthinkable."

"It wouldn't be the first time the Russians would've been caught doing something like that," Mikhail chimed in, "Way back in the 80s, when the Summer Games were held in Moscow, it was actually jokingly referred to as the Chemists' Games by some, because no one believed the Russian medalists got on the podium without help."

"...Wow." Yuri commented quietly, looking down towards the rink again, "...How do you even go about proving you didn't do something like that if accused?"

"Not sure you can." Mikhail answered grimly, "The kind of drugs that have been used before can get into and out of someone's system in a matter of weeks."

"The ISU makes medalists give samples for testing at every event though. Doesn't the same thing happen at the Games?"

"Sure." The elder nodded, "That doesn't mean people can't cheat at that, too, though. Other countries, including Japan, have requested that Russia be banned from Olympic events before, unsuccessfully, because Russia is a big superpower and a valued participant of the Games. The IOC has a brittle spine on punishing cheaters, to the point where it's said that 'not everyone pees in the same specimen cup.' There's lots of hot air about being serious, but usually little action is actually taken to punish those caught in the act."

"...Oh."

Awkward silence fell over the group for a little while, as most watched the remainder of the practice with blank minds. It took the booming voice of the announcer calling for the last minute of the warm-up for them to be jarred out of their stupor.

Yuri pulled in his elbows, and curled his fingers around the arms that came around him, looking down at his knees. Viktor could feel the mood shift, and leaned down to whisper, "Why do you still seem worried?"

He grumble-whined a little, "Because of that news segment in Detroit that I told you about, the one that made me believe the RSF would be mad at you for giving me your Gold. The anchors were also talking about the doping scandal from Sochi... They were speculating, suggesting that maybe you cheated to get it, and then gave it to me to avoid being tested."

"You know I got checked anyway. I still won the thing in the first place."

"...Yeah, but...if what Mik said is true-"

"I would've been caught a long time ago if I were doing something dishonest to win." Viktor reassured, "Five straight years of Gold-medal victories at every single competition...by year 3, I was getting blood tested, too, just in case I pulled a 'Lance Armstrong' over on them. Someone would've found something if I was cheating, but no one ever has, because there was nothing to find. You couldn't find a more all-natural free-range Russian chicken if you tried."

Yuri leaned back with a sigh to hear those words, "That's a relief then."

"...I feel like you were doubting me for a second there."

"Not you. Never you." Yuri answered easily, "...Didn't you hear about why it was a scandal?"
"Maybe at some point, but I didn't pay attention because I knew I was clean and had nothing to worry about."

"...I've looked into it a little bit since I saw that news segment. The scandal arose because some whistleblower said the Russians were tampering with samples...switching them out with clean specimens, or giving athletes someone else's to claim as their own." He explained, "But if the ISU took your blood themselves, then the RSF couldn't have done anything to it. There's no chance your word could be doubted because your victories were scrutinized by someone who had no reason to protect you. Proving someone's innocence can be harder than proving their guilt, and it would kill me if anyone ever doubted you. It wouldn't be enough that no one could definitely prove you had done anything wrong. I...think it's important that you're able to avoid any specter of plausibility."

"...I guess I hadn't thought of it like that before."

"Die Aufwärmpphase ist beendet. Alle Sportler verlassen bitte die Eisbahn. The warm-up period has ended. All athletes please exit the rink."

Viktor had looked up as the announcer's voice echoed through the arena, but then looked down to the ice again and watched as everyone started heading towards the door. Chris moved around to find his coach, undoing the front of his bright red jacket. The Russian nosed his partner's hair a little, "...I'm sure it'll be fine. If the JSF had any inclination about my track-record being tainted, they would have been more critical of me before bringing me in."

"...Yeah, that's my belief as well." Yuri agreed. He pushed to sit up a bit straighter and turned in place, lifting his hands up to cup on each side of his spouse's face, "Let's not borrow more bad luck then. I think we've had our fill." He suggested, kissing brow, then lips, "Time to enjoy the skating."

"Erster aus der Gruppe 2, die Schweiz vertritt... First to perform from Group 2, representing Switzerland... Christophe Giacometti!"

The audience cheered excitedly as the tallest skater of the Men's Singles pushed away from the rink-wall and slid around the ice-field.

"Ganbaaaaaa!" Yuri called out.

"Davaaaaai!" Viktor added after him.

Chris looked up and around to the source of the voices, and realized the duo had relocated from where he'd expected them all. Glad to hear Yuri's voice between them, he felt a bit of a relief, and he waved at them specifically with a slight bow of his head. Blades turned him in place so he could take his starting pose, and bent his head down again, leaning his frame slightly forward with the left hand arced behind his back, the right held forward, and the right leg crossed in front of the other.

[ 'Broken' - Lifehouse ]

The sound of the guitar began, and he raised his head, looking up high towards the darkened windows wrapping around the far end of the rink, and the huge Jumbotron screen hanging in front of them. Twisting in place, then pushing to the side, he moved across the cold frost through a smooth mix of long, sweeping gestures and mini-cross-overs.

The broken clock is a comfort, it helps me sleep tonight,

He dipped down as his frame rocked, swerving his path from side to side. Arms came up around himself, then came up under his cheek with palms pressed together.
Maybe it can stop tomorrow...

He leaned forward and started thrusting himself across the ice in a series of star-maneuvers.

...from stealing all my time.

The last star vaulted into a butterfly jump for a flying-entry camel spin.

And I am here still waiting though I still have my doubts,

Hands clasped behind his back for the standard spin, followed by the right reaching down to clasp the blade of the left boot for the donut variant. When he let go, the leg stayed nearly in place as his hands went out to the side, and the right came up over his chest for a layover.

I am damaged at best...like you've already figured out.

Chris pulled himself upright again with the free leg still held out, now perpendicular to the rest of his body, and kicked it behind himself to add thrust to his breakaway. He made his way towards the short end of the rink, picking up speed as he went, spun through a quick twizzle with the left blade coming down on its outside edge, and flared both arms widely to the side.

I'm falling apart,

He glided through an outside spread-Eagle, leaning backward slightly into the momentum of the curve. His frame twisted over to kick his right leg forward as the gap in the lyrics pressed on, and landed the triple Axel before the next lyric began.

I'm barely breathing.

As he glided out of the landing, his hands clasped over the ruby starburst over his heart, and blades cut a serpentine swath across the ice as he moved through the start of his step sequence.

With a broken heart that's still beating.

In the pain, there is healing,

Viktor slowly rocked back and forth in time with the music, pulling his husband alongside, eyes following the quick-footed hustle on the ice.

Chris dipped down at the end, hands clutched over his head as he glided backward on one blade in a circle, but then rose back up, sliding forward, hands coming together to cut ahead and then spread out to the sides.

In your name, I find meaning.

As the blonde moved across the rink, he picked up speed again, flipping around backward with a 3-turn before edging back on the outside of his left blade.

I'm hangin' on...

He jammed the toe-pick of his right skate down and vaulted, spinning four times for his trademark quad Lutz, and landed in the gap between the lyrics with both arms outstretched to either side.

...Another day, just to see what...you throw my way.

He glided backward towards the middle of the rink, and twisted himself sharply into a tight, backward-entry corkscrew scratch spin, with the left arm raised up, and the right blade grinding frost in a circle beneath him. The left leg stayed curled over the other for a few spins, then slid up, heel brushing over the man's thigh as he reached down to grasp the blade with both hands for a cannonball variant. A few rotations after, both blades were on the ice for a fraction of a second before the right blade came up for the foot-change, and he continued on the spin, looming over his free leg, holding both hands to his ankle for a high-rise shoot-the-duck spin.

And I'm hanging on to the words you say...

As he rose back to standing up straight again, his free leg curved around for one last quick rotation, then touched down to the frost to slide away in a wide arc. He swerved backward, then forward, then backward again on his right back outside edge. His body wound-up, and the left blade came down, kicking off the ice for the quad Toe-loop.

...you said that I will...

He landed deftly, and jammed the left toe-pick down a second time for the triple Toe-loop.

...will be okay.

The broken lights on the freeway...left me here alone,

Chris continued sliding backward out of the landing, arms out to the side for balance.

Yuri watched the older skater go into something of a choreographic sequence, still feeling the subtle sway of his husband's frame behind him.

I may have lost my way now, haven't forgotten...my way home.

Lime-green eyes settled on that one section of the audience where the gaggle of not-skating skaters were watching from, but more than anything, on Yuri himself.

"You told me about the things you thought you had to do to keep Saito away from Yuri when they were younger," The Russian started casually, speaking quietly so as to not be heard by those for whom his words were not meant, "Would it surprise you to know that I felt the need to do the same thing when I met him?"

"Jeeze, he's still at it?" Chris sighed, "That guy doesn't give up."

I'm falling apart

Chris lunged forward, sliding a number of yards on his knees towards the rink-wall, hands sliding from his chest to expanding out beside him, frame leaning backward to face the ceiling.

I'm barely breathing...

The right blade came out and carved a circle in the ice as Chris started to rise up again, using the momentum of the slide to stand into an inside spread-Eagle, then glided out in a few twizzles.

"...Yeah, Chris, I've settled in okay." Yuri said, pinning his phone to his ear, "I think the hardest part about leaving was having to say goodbye to Vik-chan. I couldn't bring him here like I used to bring him to Imari."
“It's always hard to leave a pet behind. My cat would probably murder me if I couldn't train from home.” He mused, "Speaking of Imari though...did you hear from dickbutt? Is he being weird still?"

Yuri paused his unpacking and sat back, lonely in the middle of his box-filled but otherwise-empty room, "...I haven't checked, to be honest. I didn't tell him I was leaving. He probably just found out I'm gone..." He sighed and slouched over his crossed legs, "I just want to forget about it all... This is the worst thing I've ever done."

"You have to do what's best for you." Chris pointed out, pulling his free arm out from under the back of his head as his aforementioned cat jumped up onto his bed. He stroked the cream-colored feline's back, and waited for her to lie down in her usual spot, nestled into the crook of arm and side, "Just tell all the people you know to message you at a different email. Block Saito's number on your phone so he can't call or text you. Put him out of your mind and-"

"I can't avoid him if he's going to be going to competitions." Yuri pointed out, "Nationals especially..."

"That's still a long time away. Things may be different by then."

"Maybe..."

"Is there anyone with you in Detroit that you can distract yourself with? A cute girl? Someone who you can be friends with?"

Yuri's face went a bit pink, and he scoffed lightly, "I didn't come all the way out here to socialize. I do want to get my skating game up to snuff. Now that I'm in Seniors, I have to get way better than I am. I'd hate to go into my first event and then Viktor sees nothing but a joke in me."

Chris smiled, "I've known him a little while. I wish you'd come hang out with us some time."

"I c-can't! I'd make a complete fool out of myself!"

"You'd get used to him. He's actually a giant goofball. You'd probably have a lot of fun." The blonde teased, "Maybe have some drinks with us and loosen up."

Yuri's entire head was practically glowing red, "You know I can't drink too much before I lose all sense of myself."

"That's the point though." Chris laughed, "Tell you what... The next competition we're at together, I'll figure out a way to get you two into the same place at the same time an-"

"No way! Don't set me up like that!" Yuri protested, holding his phone out in front of himself like he could see Chris' face in the screen, "I..." He looked down slightly, nervous, "...I'd rather he notice my skating first... If he doesn't even know who I am from competition yet, then meeting him will be pointless, because then I'll just go out there and embarrass myself and him, and then he'll never want to talk to me again."

"I really don't think Viktor picks his friends based on how well they skate."

"...S-Still... Everything I've done on the ice has been to get to this point. I...I have to do this my way..."

"Alright..."

"Anyway though," Yuri shook his head and put the phone back against his ear like before, "If...if I gave you my email password, could you go into it and delete anything Asahi might've sent me...? And block him, or...something... I don't want to inconvenience everyone else I know just because of this...but I..." He breathed a nervous sigh, "I can't face seeing his name in my inbox. I don't want to know what he said if anything's there, or that anything is there, if there is..."

"You know you can count on me."

With a broken heart that's still beating
I'm holdin' on (I'm still holdin')...

Chris was in the middle of his final required element; arms were clasped loosely behind his back as he descended from a camel-spin to a sit spin. Hands moved out over his bent knee as the arena spun all around him, and he rose up to standing, arms traveling up the sides of his body as he moved into the scratch-spin.

I'm barely holdin' on to you...

His arms flared down and extended out, elbows slightly bent as the rotation of his spin slowed. His free leg extended out slightly, toe-pick dragging around him, leaving a circle carved into the ice. As the lyrics faded, he went down to one knee, wrapped his arms around himself, and leaned back slightly with eyes closed...and the music faded.

The audience's roar of applause thundered through the arena, and Chris let himself fall down to his back, splaying out to catch his breath. As his chest moved up and down with each heave, he tilted his head to look into the stands again, straight towards the duo who were now as close as ever. One arm extended, and gave a lazy thumbs up. Yuri and Viktor both clapped and returned with their own thumbs up.

I'm sorry I let you down by being the very thing you'd been scared of... He thought, throwing his arms forward to help hoist himself up again, I wish I knew what had happened. I would've never teased you like that... He lowered his head for a moment, but then forced himself up to his blades and started his bows and waves to the audience to show his appreciation, I'll have to make it up to you somehow.

As the athlete made his way to rink-side, and the small legion of young skaters poured out to clear the ice of fan-thrown gifts, Viktor settled his arms down again, and nuzzled against his husband's cheek, "It's like he was skating for you this time rather than me."

"...You...think so?"

"Mh." The Russian nodded, hugging tightly, "When I talked to him earlier...I told him what happened at Nationals, so he'd understand why I was asking him to back off of his teasing."

Yuri had no response, save the slight furrow of his brow.

"He actually feels really bad about it. He had actually been trying to protect you from Saito even back in Juniors."

"...Chris was my sounding-board back then." Yuri admitted uneasily, "I...bet he saw more than I did though. Being friends with Asahi was never a problem until it started to become obvious that we were going to be splitting up for Seniors. Maybe I was really lucky...but after I went to Detroit, I always had someone around that I could use as an excuse to...be somewhere else. If it wasn't Chris, then it was Phichit-kun, or even Celestino. It got so routine that I almost forgot Asahi and I had even known each other at some point...I guess that's why I barely registered when he stopped turning up at events. He just kind of faded from my memories."

"I can only wonder the kind of things that go through your head when it comes to him now." Viktor commented, rubbing the side of his jaw against his husband's raven hair, "I know you're trying to do what you think is right, but...maybe eventually you'll tell me the rest."

Yuri's brow crinkled and he turned in place, looking up at the man incredulously, "...You think I'm not telling you the whole story...?"

Viktor shook his head, "Not on purpose." He explained, placing the flat of his hand against the younger man's chest, feeling that heart pounding swiftly inside, "I think you've just been so good at walling Saito off that you aren't consciously sure what to think. You've been taking it all one day at a time, doing what you always do because you're a good person; kind, generous, forgiving... I don't think you've really allowed yourself to be honest with yourself. Maybe because you think it's dangerous to let yourself think clearly about him when he's living at Yu-Topia and has Minako as his new coach."

"I don't want to be angry all the time." Yuri explained sullenly, leaning into his partner's frame, sliding his right arm into the man's jacket to wrap around the small of Viktor's back, "I'm worried that if I think too much about it, I'll just...always be as high-strung as I was when him and I got into that argument in the changing room."

"Holding onto that anger isn't helpful either though."

"...You held onto anger..."

"And it nearly broke me when I did my rage skate at NHK." Viktor pointed out, "You didn't want to be around me when I was in that mood, and that just made it feel even worse. But...you're a gentle soul. Feeling anger isn't something you let yourself experience too much. That's part of why I didn't want Saito around once I keyed into things; I felt like you'd sooner accept his awkward behavior than upset him by getting mad and telling him off."

"YOU WOULD'VE KEPT ME IN A CAGE!"

Yuri blinked hard and shook his head, "...I guess I just wish I could understand why he's fixated on me like he is. ...Was?"

"Is."

"...Yeah."

"By the time we get back home, it'll have been over a week since we saw him last." Viktor started again, "But I don't want you to think you have to brace yourself. Hasetsu is supposed to be our place. I don't want you to feel like I did when we went to Russia."

"...I don't want to think about it yet." Yuri grumbled, and turned to face the kiss and cry by rink-side.
"Die Punktzahl für Christophe Giacometti..."

All eyes were on the scoreboard as the voice of the announcer echoed through the arena. Yurio tried to look unconcerned about it, but his tightly-crossed arms betrayed him slightly.

"...97.61!"

Cheers replaced the pregnant silence, and Chris blew kisses to the audience. He and his coach rose up from the bench in the kiss and cry, rejoining the rest of the Swiss entourage as the next athlete came up to the rink entrance.

Yurio slouched back into his seat, slightly relieved...at least for a moment.

"Wow~!" Nikki teased, poking his shoulder with a finger, "He just barely scored higher than you! Jealous? Worried?"

"No." Yurio huffed, "The Free Skate tomorrow is where it really counts. I'll bury him."

"Ooooo them's fightin' words!"

"Weiter auf dem Eis, Russland repräsentierend... Next on the ice, representing Russia... Georgi Popovich!"

The dark blur pushed out into the field of frost; a form-fitting ensemble of black, blue, and purple, with sheer sashes coming off his hips. The dark feather boa around his shoulders shimmered with the silver steaks of tinsel throughout, hanging slightly behind his lace-covered back. More lace wrapped around his arms; windows cut through the sleeves in a snake-like path that wrapped around, and ended with long sheer tails hanging off the wrists. He glided around in a wide arc, waving at the audience before coming back to the wall for some final words from Yakov.

Viktor kept his eyes on his former coach for a moment, but broke his line of sight just a second before Georgi nodded and pushed off, looking up into the stands where the rest of Team Russia - current and former - was watching from. Viktor turned his attention to his husband's neck instead, nibbling lightly to distract himself. He felt that Yuri could use the distraction as well, given the topic only a few minutes earlier, and it was a relief to hear the younger man quietly laughing under the tickle of kisses and the tips of silver hair.

['El Tango de Roxanne' - Moulin Rouge OST]
[Use the Lyric video on channel 'martin varela' for correct timing - Start 0:28-1:40, 3:15-4:38]

A strong choir of cellos and violins burst into hearing, strumming powerfully as a single higher-tension violin joined them. Georgi strutted forward on his toe-picks in the exaggerated walking style of a tango, using the flare of the sheer sashes hanging from his frame to emphasize his movements.

Mila couldn't help but chortle a bit, though Sara was a bit confused beside her. The red-head turned towards Yuri and Viktor on the step just behind her, "Neh, Viktor...do you think he did this because of Yuri's 'Eros' last year?"

Yuri's face was already a little pink from his partner's flirtations, and he glanced between the two in quiet confusion. A Spanish guitar joined the orchestra, and its tempo became more serious.

Viktor just sputtered a little, "I hope not. 'Eros' was so Yuri could seduce me."

Mila just laughed again, "You know how Georgi obsessed over you all those years...trying to get one over on you just once because you were always one step ahead of him."

"I barely noticed." The silver smiled sweetly.

Will drive you...will drive you... will drive you... MAAAAAAADDD!

Georgi slid across the ice on one knee, fingers dragging behind him.

Roooooooxxanne...

He rose up quickly, hands coming in towards his sides, then thrust the right out towards the audience on the X. He looked down the length of his arm, spotting Viktor in the stands, as though sitting in the palm of his open hand, See me from there, and watch as I become Russia's Champion...!

Cameras flashed in the outer hall while Chris stood in front of the sponsor board, towel slung across his shoulders as he gently dabbed the side of his neck and face. The boom of the music was dulled by the walls, but it could still be heard playing in the background of the interview.

"Chris! As the reigning Euros champion, how do you feel about your performance?"

The blonde lifted his eyes carefully, and smiled, "Well, I'm in the lead at the moment, so I feel fairly good about it all."

"Do you still feel as competitive given that Skater Viktor isn't in the listings with you?"

He sighed and shook his head dramatically, but kept that smile going, "I've finally gotten over the heartbreak of Viktor leaving me for another man." He laughed, taking hold of the towel on either side of his chest where the ends hung down, "And even though he's not competing, it's good that he's here to watch. When I win Gold, I can rub it in his face in person rather than over the phone later."

The crowd of media-staffers laughed as well, "What about defending your title from Yuri Plisetsky? You and him are neck-and-neck now."

"It's a bit daunting to have such a serious challenge from someone a decade younger than I am, but I guess I just have to look at it like one of those Indiana Jones switch-outs...swap one Russian for another." He mused in answer, "He's really trying hard to out-do Viktor's legacy. We'll all have to be careful of him. The Free Skate is what's important though, and I can still pull one over on him there."

"And Georgi, the skater on the ice right now?"

"...99.21!"

The audience cheered excitedly, and Georgi's eyes lit up in stunned disbelief, looking at the numbers on the scoreboard in front of him and his coach.

"...Getting onto the podium in PyeongChang is going to be impossible if you can't stop focusing so much on one-upping Viktor." Yakov scolded dryly anyway, staring into the cameras in front of the kiss and cry with his arms crossed, "People in the stands are too much of a distraction for you. You have to focus on yourself and your technique-" He went on, twisting slightly in place to look at his skater...only to realize the man was doing something of a celebratory dance and wasn't even listening, "...On the ice! Not right here!"

All eyes of the athlete's section were on Yurio, and he did everything he could to pull his hood down over his face as they teased.

"He almost broke 100 this time!" Viktor joked, holding one hand up to his mouth so his voice would carry over, "You'll have to step it up tomorrow!"

The Tiger just shot a one-eyed glare from between long strands of blonde hair, "His Free Skate batting average is 150! I'll bury him and Chris!"

Yuri smiled through the jeers and laughs around him, but didn't want to add to the torment, so he kept quiet. He turned his gaze back to the ice and waited for the next skater to come out, watching Georgi move off with Yakov towards the curtain that lead under the stands.

I still need to ask him about the house in St. Petersburg... He thought, catching himself starting to clap automatically as he heard the rest of the audience start up again. Maybe I can catch him tomorrow....I kind of want to ask Mik to help with it, too, but I don't know how to do this without upsetting Viktor. I need to know though...

"Chriiiissss~!" Viktor hollered, swaying his frame with his exaggerated wave.

Yuri looked aside slightly as he spotted the figure stepping out from the lower stairwell, coming up onto the landing just ahead of the group. As a blur of vivid color against the bright white backdrop of the rink, Chris looked like a scarlet candle with a bright, glowing yellow flame. The older skater came into focus though as Yuri's eyes adjusted, and he felt a tension in his legs as the man started to turn around to face them.

"Good job out there!" Viktor continued, looking a bit smug then, "You're almost in first place, Mr. Best Skater in the World."

"Yeah yeah, rub it in." Chris sulked, brows raised skeptically. His expression softened though as he watched Yuri rise up to his feet, pulling right out of the Russian's grasp in the process.

The whole group seemed to simmer down a little as they spotted Yuri moving down a step or two and pause there, looking at the taller figure nervously.

Chris hesitated a moment, unsure if he should say something, but the look on the younger man's face was enough, and he bowed his head, "Sor-"

"Sorry." Yuri said, a bit louder, cutting those words off in the process. He watched as Chris lifted his gaze again in confusion, and brought his hands in front of his face, palms pressed together, "...For shoving you earlier. I just..." He paused in the middle of his sentence, opening his eyes to spot Chris' hand covering both of his, gesturing for them to go down. Hazel eyes lifted in confusion.

"You have nothing to be sorry for." Chris explained, "I more than understand why it happened. I'm the one who's sorry."

"...You've been teasing me like that for nearly ten years though. I've never reacted like that before..." Yuri said sullenly, lowering his eyes, "I even heard your voice...I knew it was you, but for some reason I just...went crazy for a few seconds, I guess."
Chris' eyes followed Yuri's body-language carefully, looking beyond him to Viktor in the back, still sitting on the step beside his uncle. Viktor looked rather serious, all things considered. Mikhail watched the scene carefully as well, as did the rest of the group, even those who had no idea what had inspired the discussion or why it was such a stiff moment. Chris finally broke the odd silence, even as the music of the next skater started playing above them, and leaned forward, pulling Yuri into a one-armed hug. He was careful to keep his hand around the middle of the younger man's back, but was equally careful to speak only loudly enough to be heard by Yuri himself, "I'm sorry about what happened to you at Nationals." He started, forcing cherry-hazel eyes wide against his shoulder, "I thought that the years would've calmed Asahi down...but I was wrong."

"...I...don't hold it against him." Yuri answered, "He's gone through a lot since back then. He was hurting, and...lost. I've forgiven him."

"Have you though?"

Yuri's gaze lowered as Chris let go, and he turned slightly to watch as the older figure settled into a seat opposite Mikhail, and leaned against the armrest, hanging slightly into the stairwell. Chris' eyes were focused on the rink though, and the performance taking place upon it. Not knowing what else to say, Yuri looked forward as well, only to feel a tug on the back-bottom hem of his pea-coat, then a stronger pull, making him step backward in response. Viktor's shoulder came up under him like a chair, catching him before he could stumble, and he gripped quickly to the upper corner of Mikhail's seat before he fell head over heels, "V-Viktor..."

"Can't watch the show when you're standing there, my love." The Russian answered, "You make a great door, but not a good window, I'm afraid."

"...Oh, sorry."

Viktor gently rubbed the side of his head against his spouse's leg, then turned and kissed the same spot before looking up, "Come cuddle again. My front is getting cold."

Yuri hesitated a moment, looking at Chris again briefly, but then nodded and slid back down between his husband's legs. He crossed his own as he sat on the step, and pulled Jiro up into his lap before leaning back into expecting arms. Makkachin laid down on his elbows, paws dangling off the step by his human's knees, and set his chin down on that thigh to Yuri's right, earning himself a nose-boop for his efforts. Yuri settled down again though, moving his hand back down into Jiro's fluff to warm his fingers.

"You doing okay?" Viktor wondered quietly, leaning down over a shoulder as he pressed in behind his partner's shoulders, "You look stuck."

Nodding slightly, Yuri turned his face to nuzzle against one cheek lightly, "...Chris apparently thinks I have unresolved issues with Asahi, too." He answered, keeping his voice low as well, "I don't know what either of you guys are talking about though. I thought I dealt with it all."

"Sometimes the lies we tell ourselves are more convincing than the ones we tell others." Viktor suggested, unwrapping one arm from his spouse's frame to smooth a few strands of black hair back down, "Or so I've heard, anyway. Try not to worry about it so much. Maybe the both of us are just projecting onto you, and there's really nothing else there."

"...But if there is...how do I even know...?" Yuri wondered, "I mean, I can let myself get mad about stuff that's happened recently...though I don't want to...I've gone out of my way to forget the rest."

"Why would you want to do that though? You've both emphasized how harmless and benign he was
"...Maybe it was nothing he did." He suggested ponderously, lifting his knees up a little bit to pull Jiro up against his chest for the warmth, "...Maybe it was me."

Hundreds of people stood on the peninsula of the arena as the end of the Short Program ushered everyone back into the outdoors. The moon was nearly full and especially bright in the clear, cloudless sky, illuminating the ground in a dull, pale glow. The SkateFam hung around for a little while before breaking off to head back to their different hotels.

As before, the dogs were disallowed on the tram back to the Arcotel, but the walk back wasn't terribly long. Feeling the warmth of the indoors, apart from the chill of a skating rink, was a welcome change. The room itself felt almost too hot by comparison.

Yuri let Jiro off his leash as soon as they stepped in, and peeled his jacket off before finding the pair's doggy dinners. With the pups occupied, Yuri flopped to the pillow-top on his back and splayed his arms out, legs dangling off the edge, and closed his eyes. He drew in a deep breath, listening to the sound of Viktor putting their jackets into the closet. It was hard to hear the sock-steps through the sound of Makkachin's vacuum-like appetite, but Yuri cracked one eye open as he felt the bed shift on either side of him.

Hands were pressed to the comforter beside his waist, and Viktor clambered up onto the high top, walking his hands further up until he could slide them under the back of his shoulders. One knee went beside his own, then the other, and the exhausted figure slowly collapsed down on top of him with a heavy exhale. Yuri lifted his arms up to hug around Viktor's back, combing his fingers through silver hair, "After spending all night wondering if I would be too tired for tonight...should we actually be worrying about you?"

Viktor huffed a hot breath against Yuri's shirt, "No... I'm looking forward to tonight." He explained, turning his head slightly to set his chin down in the place his cheek had just been, "I just wanted to lay down for a minute."

"Get me too warm and comfortable and I may fall asleep anyway. You'll have to carry me to where we're going."

"I have a limo coming to pick us up." The Russian teased, rising back up onto his knees to sit over his husband's lap, and offered his hands to pull the younger man up to sit under him, "Everything's arranged... It's going to be amazing."

"A limo, huh?"
"Mh." Viktor nodded, eyes shining in the amber-lights of the room. He slid the palms of his hands up his partner's chest and over his shoulders, feeling a pair going around his waist and back in turn, "Where we're going tonight isn't just some regular thing."

"Regular plus?"

"Super extra regular plus." He laughed, wiggling in a bit closer to sit higher on that lap, practically looming over his partner from that vantage. He leaned down and nosed him adoringly, "It'll be like nothing you've ever seen or experienced before. When people arrive, it's like a red-carpet event...photographers taking pictures of everyone... High-society people go, local celebrities, misfits like us who happen to be able to afford to go... It's all rather incredible, actually."

"Something you've done before?"

"No... It'll be my first time, too. But I've been looking into it for a long time. You can only do this kind of thing in Vienna...it's the chance of a lifetime." He explained, sliding his hands up from Yuri's shoulders to the sides of his neck, tracing the sides of his thumbs lightly against his jawline, "And I can think of no one better to share it with than you, my love."

"I feel so uncultured suddenly. I hardly know anything about this city, even though I poked around a little for stuff that we could do."

Viktor just smiled in that seductive, eyes-half-lidded way, and pressed in close for a long kiss, with another quick one after for good measure, "One of the perks of spending most of my life living next-door to Europe is knowing all the little things about the different cultures. This one though...this is special. I think you'll be really impressed."

"I think my heart's starting to race already just from the anticipation of it."

"That's good." The Russian smiled wider, "Then let me show you your spiffy duds."
Yuri stayed sitting on the bed, eyes closed - and covered by a pillow-case pulled over his entire head just to be sure - as the rustling noises of Viktor's digging sounded around the room. A hard plastic suitcase was unclipped and pushed open, and the telltale crinkle of thin plastic tickled Yuri's ears. He turned his head to follow the sound as Viktor carried each of the two garment bags from the suitcase to the end of the bed. One eye cracked open inside the pillow-case, 'looking' towards the spot where he felt the blankets moving a bit by his leg. The plastic crinkle could only suggest that Viktor was pulling the sheeting away to put the garment on display.

"...Okay." The Russian said quietly, stepping up to take his husband's hands, and pulled him gently forward to find his feet on the floor. He guided his partner around and turned him in place, holding to the sides of his shoulders, and slid his fingers under the edge of the silken fabric covering Yuri's head. Palms covered the younger man's eyes, "Pull the drape away."

Confused but curious, Yuri did as told, and reached up for a corner of the covering. He could hear the subtle crackling of static as the cotton shifted over the top of his head and came away, leaving strands of his coal-black hair to tumble forward over the fingers curled around his eyes.

"You don't know how long I agonized over these outfits," Viktor teased, "Though the cities that these competitions are held in are chosen a year or two in advance...after I decided to take a break from skating to be your coach, I couldn't be sure I'd attend this one. That day in Hasetsu, when I told you that I'd regained so much of my inspiration...that I could create a thousand new programs and never be able to decide which I'd skate. This place, this city...it was among the many things I started dreaming about. Then, when you told me about your dreams...of the trees with leaves the color of fire, and flowers, and lanterns rising into the sky...I knew there was no chance we could miss this."

"So this wasn't a last-second thing you decided on after we had such a bad time at Nationals."

"Oh no, I've been plotting this since summer." Viktor laughed, "As soon as we got those professional measurements taken for our costumes this season, I sent them off to a suit-maker as well. Being fired by the RSF was devastating in more ways than the obvious."

"...The idea of not having reason to come here anymore, since you wouldn't be competing..."

"Mh." The Russian agreed and nodded, "It would've been a real tragedy to have gone through all that planning, only to have it wasted...or used on some flimsy Plan B scenario. It would be like re-gifting an unwanted fruit-cake at Christmas."

Yuri turned his head around, managing to peek one eye out from under the right hand, "Fruit-cake...?"

"You'll understand when we get to where we're going. Anything but that would seem unworthy of these outfits."

"So can I see them then?"

Viktor nodded, and watched his husband turn back around within his still-cupped hands,
"...Okay...one, two...three."

Yuri felt the hands come away, and slowly opened his eyes, looking down onto the bed. A tingle and a flutter rushed through him as he beheld the 'spiffy duds' directly before him; a pure white tailcoat tuxedo jacket with golden, fern-like embroidery woven delicately from shoulder to lower hem. Beneath the folds of the lapels was a black vest, then a white shirt, and a black bowtie at the neck. White pants were folded neatly within, through the bar of the hanger that poked out the top. Yuri's eyes were wide, "...Wow...!" He looked back over his shoulder to Viktor's beaming face, then back again, unsure if he could even touch something so richly fancy, "...I can't believe I'm the one who's supposed to wear this. I...I don't even know what occasion it could be for. What are we even doing tonight? Meeting royalty?"

"We are the royalty." The Russian mused, rubbing his spouse's shoulders for a moment before stepping aside, and moved the blanket that he'd folded over the second garment bag to hide it from sight, "It was hard to decide which of us would wear the black suit tonight, but...I figured I would, since I know what I'm getting you into." He explained, showing off the dark twin to Yuri's ensemble, with the silver embroidery on a dark field, "There are at least a few rules to follow."

"R-Rules...?" Yuri balked, "How am I going to be abl-"

Viktor raised a finger to quiet those lips, "Shush," He cooed, "There's absolutely nothing to worry about. It's not rules like knowing which fork to use first or how to bow or curtsy...it's dress-code rules."

Yuri went slightly cross-eyed as he looked towards the finger just in front of his nose, but then straightened his sights out to look up and forward, "...I can't even imagine right now."

"Let's get ready to go then. The limo is just the first thing."

With the pups put up for the night and the lights turned out, the duo made their way down to the lobby and then outside, long coats and scarves covering their elaborate ensembles beneath. The long silver limousine was already parked out front and waiting when they came through, and the door was opened to the passenger compartment by the attendant driver.

The Viennese cityscape passed by under a dazzling display of street-lights, illuminating the regal architecture of the last half century. Every building leading up to Vienna's City Hall was like a huge bank or hotel, with multiple stories of quaint square windows built into tall stone faces. The lower floors were decorated by sweeping archways and tall pillars; all meticulously reconstructed after the devastation of the last World War.

City Hall itself was like a gothic castle; two-floor-high arches, narrow and pointed double-windows in various designs, elaborate stonemasonry with decorative pillars. The entire outside of the building was illuminated with multi-colored lights, accenting every nook and cranny of the building's face, giving it an almost Notre Dame-like aesthetic in the dark. The towers of the clock spires at the back were lit up in yellow, with the main floors ghosted by light-blue, and the ground-level arches in red, purple, and green. By the time the limousine pulled up to the side entrance, it was impossible to see the upper edge of its roof without getting out.

Dozens of other people were moving towards the main doors; huge wooden panels with detailed metal-work designed around and into it, set slightly back from the edge of the street, through a big arch that was flanked on either side by black, wrought-iron gates.
The limousine door was opened, and Viktor stepped out first, offering his hand to help his husband out after. When Yuri stepped out, he found himself gob smacked by the entire sight all over again.

"...This is incredible..." He commented, his voice barely audible, "It looks like we’ve stepped 200 years into the past, attending some big royal coronation or wedding or something."

"Close." Viktor confirmed, extending his hand out towards the vertical banners that had 'Blumenball' written on them in big white font, "Vienna is known for a number of things...but one of the most exciting is Ball Season."

"...Ball season?" Yuri echoed, pausing for a moment...then his jaw slackened, "We're at a ball!?"

"Mh." The silver nodded excitedly, pulling the long tickets out from the inner pocket of his long black jacket, "Blumenball means Flower Ball in German." He mused, gesturing towards the open gate towards the small line of people standing outside the doors, "Shall we?"

Still shocked, but starting to get excited about what to expect inside, he nodded eagerly and took the offered elbow, following his partner towards the ticket check-in. He looked around at every possible sight as they passed through, their tickets were scanned, and they were allowed through, walking under a series of outdoor hanging chandeliers. Some ball attendees just within were paused to take photos as they went by, heading into an inner courtyard that was flanked on each side by the daunting, high walls of the building. Yuri looked up through the square cut-out of the yard, seeing the sky for a moment, then the gothic ceilings again as they passed under another roof. Ahead, another set of huge wooden doors that actually lead within the Hall.

Jackets and scarves were removed and given to a concierge attendant, and small tickets were handed back for their return at the end of the night. The walls were white marble and stone, elaborately carved into pillars, ledges, and the frames of huge windows...the same windows that seemed so narrow and small from outside. Red carpets were laid out on the floors, trimmed in gold lines, and turned the corners that lead to the stairs to the upper floors. The duo moved to the base of one, and watched as each group or pair went up the stairs at a time, being videoed or photographed as they went.

Yuri just marveled at the entire thing, clinging close to his spouse while taking in the sights all around, "...This is absolutely incredible... There's nothing like this in Japan... Even in the USA, you won't find something like this unless you go into a state's Capitol Building, or some huge New England church."

"There's sights like this in St. Petersburg, but I guess I was just so used to it that it wasn't magical anymore." Viktor explained, stepping forward as the cue moved on, and another pair moved up the red carpet stairs, "But this is all as new to me as it is to you...something to mark on my bucket list."

"I can only wonder what else is on that list." Yuri mused, "This place is just blowing my mind."

"And we haven't even gotten to the Flower part of this ball."

A minute or two later, and it was their turn to head up the marble staircase. Though an odd sight - two men rather than one with his lady - the fact of their profession and the presence of the European Championship preceded them, and a number of people recognized them, leading to a cordial and relaxed atmosphere.

At the top of the stairs, another cue was waiting outside the doors to the main ball room. There was a second set of doors a few meters away where another set of stairs was letting people arrive from a different ground-floor entrance, and between them, a wall of flowers set up like a mural. Some people took advantage of the wait and took photos in front of the display. The crowd slowly moved forward though, and Yuri got his first good look at the big main hall that the event was being hosted in.

The entrance was packed with people, with many more trying to file through, past the open bar on the right and the numerous tables set up everywhere else. Across the field of moving heads, the metal frame of the orchestra stage could be seen, decorated with vines and flowers.

"Yuri, this way," Viktor commented, pointing to the far side of the stage, "I've reserved a table flanking the dance floor."

The big hall was easily 200ft long, and perhaps 30ft across between the outside wall and the archways close to the inner wall, with another 15ft of space between them where more tables were arranged. There were hundreds of people, practically swarming the place. More faces looked down from the second floor, peering between the pillars where the arches curved to their points above them. White marble decorated with gold leafing and trim, with dozens of big-bulb, double-level chandeliers hanging in rows from the high vaulted ceiling. The dance floor itself was polished wood, flanked on the orchestra side by a raised platform where more tables were set up in view of the huge gothic windows.

With a bit of effort, trying to get through the crowded room without being able to cut across the dance floor, the pair were finally able to find their numbered table, and Viktor helped Yuri sit first, gently pushing the chair in behind him before taking his own seat. Their view of the dance floor was pristine; not one singular person or table blocked their view.

"...This is really something else." Yuri commented, finding one of his husband's hands on the tabletop to hold onto, "And you said this is a season of events?"

Viktor looked over excitedly and nodded, eyes shining, "Mh! This is just one of hundreds of balls that happen. The biggest ball of the season is the Vienna Opera Ball, which takes place next month and is hosted at the State Opera House. There's also other themes like the candy or Bonbon Ball, the Doctor's Ball, Lawyer's Ball, the Vienna Philharmonic Ball, even a New Year's Eve Ball at the Vienna Imperial Palace."

"Wow..."

"This place is actually going to transform from a Flower Ball to the Viennese Ball of the Sciences next week, so if you randomly see displays that look like they have beakers or instruments, that's probably why."

"...So how does all this work anyway?" Yuri wondered. The answer was paused as he and Viktor watched as a second pair approached the table and took the other seats across from them.

"Bonsoir," The lady said; an older woman with an immaculately styled midnight-blue evening-gown, with silver and blue jewelry, and a dark sash across her shoulders. Seating her was an equally older gentleman in a traditional tail-suit tuxedo with black bowtie.

"Bonsoir," Viktor replied amiably before turning his attention back to his partner, "So...given the size of the tables and the number of people who are coming here as pairs, most tables are set up to accommodate multiples. Bigger tables are arranged for larger groups to reserve so they can all try to sit together." He explained, then gestured his head out to the empty dance floor, "In a little while, once the noise of everyone's arrival has settled down, there'll be a number of dances performed by practiced teams...kind of like an opening ceremony. There's a few waltzes and some ballet. Then the floor opens to the rest of us, and it kind of becomes a sea of chaos; a mass of people who know how to dance, and those who don't."

"We know how to dance."

Viktor smirked, "Yes we do. And the neat part about all this...is that this room isn't even the only place where we can dance."

Yuri lifted himself up a little, "There's more?"

"There's theme rooms."

"Oohh! Like what?"

"Disco, salsa, swing, I think there's a country room...lots of themes. But first thing's first..." Viktor explained, "In a short while, they'll bring out the food and alcohol."

"I can't even imagine how much it would take to organize food and drink for this many people...there must be thousands crawling all over this place." Yuri surmised, looking around as more people were taking their seats, and others were starting to crowd around the other side of the dance floor, held back only by a velvet rope-barrier.

"All that was arranged ahead of time." Viktor answered, reaching towards the center of the table where a corked bottle of sparkling water was sitting, and turned over two of the glasses on his and Yuri's side of things, "There's a brief, 4-item menu that you choose in advance and they make those items according to the numbers."

"Oh...what did they offer?"

"There's usually a meat-based dish with different sides and desserts, and a vegetarian option. Neither of us is vegetarian though so I got one each of the former, so you can pick which sides you like best."

"That's so great," Yuri said dreamily, wishing he could smell it already, "I can feel my stomach starting to grumble..."

Viktor rubbed his thumb across his husband's hand, but then reached over with the other to pinch his fingers lightly over the younger man's chin, "This is just the start, my love. It's going to be a night to remember."

"This was a really great choice," Yuri agreed, feeling the gentle nose-rub against the tip of his own, "And I really do see what you mean about the fruit-cake now." He laughed, stealing a quick kiss before looking around at all the sights again, "This really is something else."

Chapter End Notes

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uHt5jEOwtpk - Video of the 2018 Blumenball if ya'll wanna see what it looks like beyond my descriptions.
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY SEVEN

The constant hum of excitement grew over the course of the first hour, with more people pouring into the main ballroom than one might think could even fit. The small orchestra tuned their instruments quietly, creating a quiet chorus of strings and horns under the clamor of chatter, laughter, and clinking glasses.

Yuri looked around in utter amazement at the flower decorations around the huge room, listening idly to the small-talk at the table - though having no idea what was being said, as it was entirely French. He understood a few familiar words like figure skater, Olympien, and the description of the Championnat d'Europe, but the rest was largely lost on him. He let his husband speak for the both of them, occasionally feeling a light grip around his hand tightening affectionately, but otherwise, the sights of the ballroom were too exquisite to overlook. The white polished stone with gold trim, arched pillars, the overhanging second floor with its balcony edge, and of course, the thousands and thousands of flowers. Different arrangements were set against the base of the walls; taller displays that towered over even the tallest standing person, smaller ones that were set in the center of each table, and the spaces between the windows that were adorned with fence-like wooden slats, flowers and grasses woven throughout into elaborate colored patterns.

Just as Yuri's eyes caught sight of what looked like the beginning of a distinctly professional-looking line - young men with matching tuxedos and their lady companions wearing white dresses - his attention was pulled back to the table. As if by unseen hands, the dinner assortment that Viktor had described earlier suddenly appeared, and its rich smells filled the air.

The main dish was braised pork loin with bacon and potato soufflé, with a saffron sauce around the rim of the plates. One of the two sides was a beef soup with chives and fried meat, and the other was zander terrine - a big sashimi-like fish roll - sliced and set onto its side on a bed of lentil salad, with yellow daisies and a turmeric cream. A sparkling elderberry wine was poured and set out as well, and the remaining bottle placed in a bucket of ice on the table.

"Wow...everything is so fancy..." Yuri commented, eyes wide with awe. He spotted a hand coming over to lift a wine glass though, and so he reached to lift his own as well.

"There's still so much we have to do this season, but..." Viktor started, looking from the deep purple-red liquid to the man sitting next to him, "Maybe tonight can be a reset for everything yet to come. The three biggest events of the year are still coming up, including one of the most important competitions that any athlete can hope to be part of."

Yuri rubbed his thumb against the fingers curled around his hand, "It's still hard to believe sometimes..." He said quietly, looking at his reflection in the wine-glass, "I used to aspire just to go to the same ISU events as you...but now I'll actually get a chance to compete on Olympic ice against you..."

"Well, you said you had the chance before, but-"I know, I turned it down... It was too much for me to handle." Yuri smiled nervously, "My anxiety would've gotten the better of me, considering how I never placed all that high even at Worlds before you came along."

"Ah, if only you could understand French... I've been bragging about your last Worlds scores, and how far you've come in such a short time."

Yuri's face went bright red to hear it, "W-well...bragging about what I've accomplished is more a testament to you than anything."

"Don't sell yourself short. You always had the potential...I just pulled it out of you." The silver Russian insisted, turning slightly in his seat to face his partner more evenly, "But I would never have scored so high myself if I didn't feel like I was facing such strong competition. I was satisfied with my 330 averages; no one else could come close. You lit the fire under my butt to get into the 340s though. You and only you."

"...I never thought scores like that could even be achieved." Yuri added, "It's going to be so hard to see those numbers again."

"We're going to have to push each other harder than ever."

Yuri drew a quick but deep breath, and nodded, moving his wine-glass closer to his partner's, "...No more warm-up mode."

"Four Continents will be the proving ground." Viktor agreed eagerly, "The Nikiforov winning streak is going to continue on and dominate straight into Worlds."

"And every year thereafter until I fulfill my promise to you."

"Five World Championships."

Viktor nodded, "Then a toast...to a fun and challenging rest of this season, and to all the Gold medals that no one else is going to be able to wear because of us."

"And all the Life and Love we can experience along the way."

Klink

The food was melt-in-their-mouth savory, and every flavor unique and new. The distraction of the spread made it easy for the cue of ballroom dancers to file onto the dance floor for the opening ceremonies. Each pair was immaculately dressed, shuffling by in lockstep as a second line approached them from the opposite end of the hall. They met in the center, directly in front of the music stage, and turned a corner to start walking out into the middle of the room. Within a few minutes, the entire dance floor was occupied, with the dancers waiting for the music to begin.

Yuri looked up, marveling at the multiple rows of men, then women, and repeated across the room, all facing the north end of the hall. Eyes turned to the small orchestra then, and the conductor that stood at the front of it, looking about for the signal that the festivities were ready to begin. An unseen grant was given, and the conductor turned back to the musicians, raising his thin white baton.

[Fächer-Polonaise, Op. 525' - Carl Michael Ziehrer]

The music was strong from the start, with the boom of the instruments echoing off the high walls. The dancers all held their position for a moment, then turned to face their partners, hands held up and out between them...and the Polonaise began.

Yuri could feel the power of the music thumping straight through him, vibrating the chair and table. Finishing the dinner suddenly became markedly more difficult than before, as neither skaters could completely sit still with the dancing going on so closeby.
The next song was extremely tame compared to the first, and the dance had more bounce to it than before. It seemed the perfect transitionary piece from waltz to ballet, with the ladies springing around their male partners at a faster pace. The song was also much shorter though, and the long group danced their way to either ends of the hall, making way for the next group that was going to take the stage.

The final course - dessert - was brought out as the music faded out. One was a 'cooked cream' called Panna Cotta with Italian Amarena cherries, sitting above slices of mango. Another was a rich chocolate mousse above a bed of berries. There was no way to pick which one to take, so Viktor scooted his chair around to be on Yuri's same side, and they squished up together, shoulder to shoulder, and took little tastes from each as the show went on.

The final show of the ball's opening ceremony was a full-on ballet, with five different pairs of dancers that entered, merged, and departed the stage at various times throughout. The ladies, all dancing on point, wore flowery summer-style dresses to match the name of the song. Their male partners wore suits of crushed velvet, each one a solid color of scarlet red, wine purple, rose pink, tulip orange, and finally, a bright, verdant green.

With both desserts polished, and some more of the elderberry wine to cap the meal, the pair sat back to relax and just enjoy the ballet while everything settled. The standing section on the opposite side of the dance floor looked eager for the moment that everyone could pour forward.

"I can imagine you doing stuff like this," Yuri teased, rubbing his thumb across his husband's leg where he held it, "Back in your show-ballet days."

"Didn't you ever do ballet recitals?" Viktor wondered, one arm draped across the younger man's shoulders.

Yuri just shook his head, "Nah, the only performances I ever did were skating. Ballet lessons were always background stuff for me."

Viktor smirked, putting the rim of his wine-glass to his lip, "At some point I'm going to have to ask Mama Katsuki about photo albums of you in your youth. I've really only seen that one photo of you with Vik-chan on the shrine..." He took a quick sip, and turned to nose his husband's cheek, "And the tease of photos in Imari."

Yuri's cheeks flushed, "...I'm almost positive my mom has copies of all that stuff...somewhere..." He started, only to slow himself and look nervous, "...Actually...now that I think about it, I think the photos she has of me were from when I wasn't skating...like, the time I was at home between competitions or something. The actual memorabilia from the skating would...either be in Imari, or with Celestino."

"You didn't keep stuff for yourself...?" The Russian wondered, a bit perplexed, "Even a little bit?"

"I was never exactly put on the cover of sports magazines or did modeling photo-shoots." Yuri quipped, "I was no super star. I had a few good photos from some of my better performances, but those were official shots that the JSF took. You've seen those."

Viktor just pouted, "I just find it so hard to believe that there isn't something more... As though there's maybe some huge cache of amazing stuff out there that maybe even you don't know about."
"Maybe there is." Yuri shrugged anxiously, putting on a brave smile, "I wouldn't really know where to look though. I mean, my family was never that into my hobbies...you were there when the triplets gave them the first real explanation about how skating works that they've ever gotten."

"Minako told me that she used to go to most of your competitions. Maybe she'll have something."

"She went with me, but she was no photographer."

Viktor set his wine-glass down and rubbed his chin in thought, "I guess I'll have to go with Plan B."

"...You have a Plan B...?" Yuri wondered skeptically, making a face at the man's ponderous look. Before he could think though, Viktor already had his phone out and had snapped a quick selfie of the two of them. The Russian's arm came up from behind his shoulders so both thumbs could type, "...W-what are you...doing...?"

"Calling...on...all...fans...of...my dearest...hubby, the...love of...my life...Yuri Nikiforov." Viktor mused, reading aloud as he wrote, making Yuri's face go redder with each word, "I am...in need...of...help. It would...appear...that...there are no...good...pics...of him...from his...earlier...skating days. Please...photo-dump...everything you...have. Arigatou~"

"Hm...not 'spasibo'?" Yuri deadpanned, an awkward smile frozen on his face.

Viktor shook his head as he wrote out his hashtags, "For the sake of you and my new country, I need to make a bigger effort towards speaking Japanese. I'm only getting a pass for now because of my athletic history, but eventually I'm going to have to pass those tests like everyone else." He explained, posting the new content to his Instagram, then pocketed his phone back into the breast pocket of his suit coat. He leaned aside to lift his arm up again and slid it back over his husband's shoulders to retake the place he was resting in before, and then moved in closer to offer an adoring peck to one cheek, "But that's chatter for later. We can figure it out when we're back home."

"I guess that's fair." Yuri agreed, looking out to the ballet performance again. It was the longest planned show of the night at nearly 10 minutes, and it was only slightly more than half over by then. The different dancers were moving by them with grace, a blur of different colors moving through the pale golden glow of the ballroom. He couldn't help but think on those last-spoken words though, and his eyes drifted from the show to his husband again.

Viktor was watching the show still, relishing in its exquisite beauty and precision. His attention was suddenly compelled away though as he felt Yuri twisting around under his arm, and a pair of legs went up across his lap. Before he could even look to see what was going on, a hand went around the side of his head to pull him down, and he felt a warm pair of lips under his ear. Tense at first from the confusion, he let himself relax, and eased into the long kiss and nuzzle on his neck.

"You know that I appreciate everything you've done, and are doing, right?" Yuri wondered, speaking quietly into that nearest ear, "The huge sacrifices you've made...both willingly and unexpectedly... Everything you've given to me...even though I've had hardly anything to give to you in return..."

Viktor slid his free hand up onto the pair of thighs that were draped across his lap, and turned his head to look into the cherry-hazel eyes that were looking back at him.

"...Even though I feel like I've known you my entire life..." Yuri went on, "I still sometimes catch myself realizing that I really don't know what I can do for you...to make it all worthwhile."

"It's been worthwhile since you said yes." The Russian replied simply, "Because all I ever wanted was you. Not your stuff. From the moment you wrapped your arms around me and sang your drunken song about coming to Hasetsu, I knew my life would never be the same. My greatest joy was getting to see you again, and it's been a dream ever since. Just because you don't have a giant pile of cash to surprise me with doesn't mean I'm not getting what I need from you."

He gave a reluctant look, but nodded.

"Yuri, my love, you don't need to buy things to make me happy." Viktor rephrased, "All told, this ball wasn't even that expensive. The suits were, sure, but that was my choice; it's what I like to do for myself."

"...Because...you're 'extra.'"

"Mhm." Viktor nodded a smile, "And it's another reason why I don't want you to measure you're ability to please me by how much money you're spending. I've had most of my lifetime to be lavished with fortune and gifts...nothing on that end really impresses me that much anymore. What makes me happy with you is experiences. I get to share with you all the things that I couldn't do when I was alone, and seeing you enjoy it all gives me joy. Your happiness, excitement, curiosity, wonder...all of it...it's contagious for me." He explained, reaching up with his free hand to take hold of the hand that had pulled his head down before, and kissed into its palm, "It's become clear that nothing in this world makes me happier than making you happy...and I would do absolutely anything to that end. It just happens to be my great advantage that you haven't had the same life that I have. If you were as much of a superstar as you're always describing me to be, then there would be nothing I could do to impress you. You'd have seen and done it all already."

"It's not like I wouldn't have fun even if I had done all these things before already..." Yuri retorted, "No matter what it is, doing things with you is a whole different experience. I just can't shake the feeling that this situation the RSF has put you into is a bridge too far... It's forced you to do things that you should've been allowed to decide for yourself, in your own time..."

Viktor pressed his husband's curled fingers to his lips, and breathed out a long sigh against them. He kissed them, then his partner's brow, then his lips, but then shook his head, "It's been one of the most challenging things I've ever had to endure, that's true...but it's been easier because you've been with me. And I know that everything will turn out fine in the end, even if there are still some hard days ahead of us."

"What else could there possibly be...?"

"...The day I actually sign-away my Russian citizenship. Even though - realistically speaking - it's just paperwork at this point; I've been living in Japan for almost two years now...I'm still Russian by every other measure. Being here at Euros...even though I can't participate, and maybe to a degree because I can't...has really just made that fact super obvious." He explained quietly, letting his husband's hand go so he could pull the man closer. He took solace in the hug being returned, two arms going over his shoulders, "But I can get through this because I have your strength to lean on when I stumble. I don't think any of this would be working out if I thought anything less of our relationship. I would've thrown my hands up and called everything off, and gone back to St. Petersburg with my tail between my legs, if there was any thought in my mind whatsoever that being with you wasn't what I wanted."

Yuri could feel his breath catch in his throat, "...So...there was never a moment where you had...second thoughts?"

Viktor lifted his head and rested it on his partner's shoulder, and shook it 'no,' "I've had moments of shock, disappointment, and a sense of injustice about it all - it was an unpleasant surprise - but it never once crossed my mind that I should fight back or resist it. In the end, all this means is that Russia finally accepted that you and I aren't going to change for them. Maybe they thought this was just a phase..." He huffed, "The latest in a long string of eccentric choices I've made over the years. They must've been just as surprised as everyone else when they realized this was probably the first time I've ever really been serious."

"...Yeah, dropping everything to go be a coach to some scrub in Japan was...ehm...well, sudden and unexpected." Yuri agreed nervously, "It was definitely in keeping with your drive to surprise people though."

"Yeah...but for once, I did it for me, not for the show." Viktorted, "I honestly was never that concerned with how other people felt about it. The only person whose opinion mattered was yours. If you hadn't been looking for a reason to get back on the ice at that moment...and had decided, finally and absolutely, that you were moving on from the sport...I'm not sure what I would've done."

"Yeah that would've been awkward..." Yuri agreed hesitantly, "I'm sure we would've figured something out though. Skating with you was the whole point of my career to that point...it would've been psychotic to say no when you showed up at my doorstep to do just that."

Viktor hugged a bit tighter then and smiled against his partner's neck, "It was meant to be."

"And look...good timing." Yuri added, pointing to the ballroom dance floor, and the final bow of the ballet troupe; clapping was starting to resonate through the grand hall as the music faded down.

Viktor lifted his head to look around, and reluctantly let go so he could just in the clapping.

Yuri clapped as well, but then just took hold of his spouse's arm with both hands, "If it's like you said, then it'll be time for the rest of us to finally get out there. You ready for it?"

"The meal was light enough...my stomach's settled. You?"

He lifted his legs from their warm spot on Viktor's lap, and set his feet on the floor, "I'm ready."
Hundreds of pairs were clamoring at the edges of the dance floor as the ballet troupe made its way off of it. There was a literal hum of anticipation vibrating through the excited crowd. As the last of the colorful danseurs fled for the proverbial safety of the back halls, all eyes went onto the maestro. The man almost seemed to relish in the anxiety of the wait, but he didn't torment the crowd long. He waved a hand to gather more attention, and spoke those highly-anticipated words.

"ES IST ZEIT! ALLE TANZEN!"

Feet couldn't hustle fast enough onto the dance floor. From the mezzanine, watching people spill into the open space was like watching flood-waters set loose from an open dam. Soon, the entire area was awash with eager waltzers, and the music began to play for them.

['Frühlingsstimmen Op. 410' - Johann Strauss II (Voices of Spring Waltz)]

Booming with power, the orchestra went full-tilt, and the dance-floor came alive with movement. Though a bit disorganized and chaotic at first, by a few minutes in, the glittering horde was twirling in the same counter-clockwise direction. Some dancers were, of course, more experienced than others, but there was laughter in the absurdity of not being able to dance at a ball, but their best efforts were good enough for fun.

The Nikiforovs were a white and black spinning blur in the crowd, moving in time with the more seasoned ball-dancers near the middle. Their waltz was swift, moving with the expert grace that years of figure skating had imparted onto them. Like with figure skating though, by five minutes in, the fatigue of that big burst of exertion lead to tired but funny exhaustion. When the last minute finally passed, and the music faded out with an epic finale, Viktor practically draped himself over his partner, heaving for breath as the rest of the dancers clapped their appreciation.

"Oh boy, that was the longest Free Program ever." He laughed, "My legs are going to be a ruin tomorrow morning."

"I'll do my part tonight so we don't have to call Minako-sensei over." Yuri offered, feeling the Russian's weight pull off him again as Viktor stood on his own, and the next song began.

['Waltz No. 2' - Dmitri Shostakovich]

Feet moved again, but by the mercy of the music, they were allowed to go a bit slower.

Viktor couldn't help but grin throughout, "You'll do your part, hm?"

"Mhm." Yuri nodded, legs moving him around in the traveling circle as they made their way around the room again, "In the absence of those huge automatic leg-massager pant things, you'll have to make do with the not-so-automatic ones."

"It sounds like you're going to spend half the night rubbing my legs down with your hands, my love."

"Sounds about right."

"Oh, now I'm torn..." Viktor teased, keeping half an eye on the other dancers nearby as they cavorted through the hall, "We've only just begun but I already can't wait to get back."

"Better wear yourself out completely then," Yuri suggested, giving a sly look. "Then I can rub more than just your legs."

Pink flushed hot across the Russian's face, he smiled broadly, "Oh my, Yuri... You have such a mind tonight."

"Well, no one's gonna sneak up on my butt this time."

"Ah, yes, that's true." Viktor agreed, pulling his husband a bit closer as they moved, "I'll sneak up from the front."

"You can sneak up from any direction you want."

"Don't tempt me; we're in public."

Yuri chortled a laugh, and the waltz continued through to its end. Another round of applause resonated up from the dance floor as everyone took a moment to catch their breath. The hall felt a few degrees warmer, and the first switch-outs began. Most who departed after the high-energy prologue moved over towards the open bar by the door, and Yuri's interest went in that direction as well. He kept a hold on one hand and started leading the way through the crowd as the next song began around them.

["An Der Schöön, Blauen Donau, Op. 314" - Johann Strauss II (By the Beautiful Blue Danube)]

Though they were waiting for their turn at the front of a crowd that loosely resembled a number of lines, the duo did their best to dance along with the music anyway. Viktor slid in close against his partner's back, hands sneaking around the younger man's waist and under his arms to weave fingers together in front of him. Yuri folded his hands over them and leaned against his husband's chest, going easily into the sway from side to side. It took nearly to the end of the song before they finally got to taste their drinks, but the wait was worthwhile.

["My Sweet and Tender Beast" - Eugen Doga]

To cool the body and titillate the senses, Yuri sipped on a raspberry sgroppino; a frothy, frosty mix of vodka, raspberry sorbet, and prosecco, an Italian version of Champagne. Viktor chose a Roman Holiday cocktail; a mix of prosecco, amaro, lemon, honey, and a rosemary sprig for flair. They meandered back through the crowd to nurse their drinks at the comfort of their table, and recharge for the next round on the dance-floor.

Yuri found his perch sitting across his partner's lap, one arm draped behind Viktor's shoulders, and a nose behind one ear, "This is all really amazing." He said quietly, lifting his face up to look around again, then back at his spouse, "I can hardly believe stuff like this still happens in the world. I'm surprised you were able to keep it secret all this time."

"Well...keeping secrets is kind of a skill of mine."

"I know I know, but I don't mean like that!" Yuri huffed, squishing their cheeks together for a moment, "This is just so much fun! I'd have been bouncing off the walls if I knew something like the Flower Ball was on the horizon."

"I'm glad you're liking it so far."

"The dancing, these suits you commissioned..." Yuri went on, taking another sip from his raspberryvodka smoothie, "This place...it's all just absolutely incredible."

"Just make sure you pace yourself," Viktor teased, nosing his partner's neck lightly, "We still have the whole rest of the night to enjoy ourselves."

"Oh don't worry, this is the only thing I'm going to get. I want to make sure I remember every detail of this place." Yuri reassured, setting the drink on the table beside him, "When we're done recharging though, do you want to go find some of those theme rooms?"

The halls were swarming with people; some standing still to get photos with the floral displays, others making their way through the building on their own private adventures. The duo insisted on taking photos themselves, conscripting random strangers to hold their phones so they could be in a few shots together.

They eventually found their way down to the first of the ball's themed dance rooms; the disco. It sported a wide open space in a rather large would-be meeting room, with a metal stage-skeleton in the center in shape of a cube-gazebo, with different flowers woven through the four pillars. Above it, the glittering disco ball, shining its colored lights all over the room in a dazzling array of blinking spots. The floor, beneath the square shape of the display, a light-up mat had been rolled out, and its dozens of square colored tiles shone brilliantly. None too many people were brave enough to get right into the middle of things, but the music was speaking to the figure skaters, and the bit of alcohol made it easy to change things.

['Earth, Wind, & Fire' - Boogie Wonderland]

Yuri was the first to make a complete fool of himself, but he did so with enthusiasm, hitting the dance floor like he'd been dancing to that music his whole life. Colored light bounced off his white suit, making him a living canvas trimmed in black. He had his fun for half the song before Viktor jumped in to steal to spotlight for a little while, upping the ante in that way he always did, but then extended a hand towards his partner and dance-rival. Yuri took it, and they grabbed the attention of the whole room with their antics, gathering a small crowd around that little space for another two songs.

Water was urgently needed after that, and they took off for the next room on their grand tour. A familiar sound emanated from the second theme-room, and Yuri stuck his head in immediately,
"...This is Minami-kun's music!"

"Oh, yeah, you're right. Smol nugget would love this." Viktor mused, "Shall we?"

"For sure."

They sauntered in as the current song, Sing Sing Sing, came to its end, and the next one started up.

['Crazy Swing' - DelaDap]

Pairs on the wood-laminate dance-floor were as energetic as ever, bringing the feel of the 1930s and 40s to life even if to music made in more...recent years. Chairs were found to hold suit-jackets, and more foolery was had. Viktor was slightly more in-style in that case, and took the occasion to teach his eager partner the moves of the rhythm. Before long, they were at least improvising well enough that no one could tell they weren't carefully choreographed swing dancers. Yuri took to the style easily, and then spent another four songs in the room, before breaking off again to find the next one.

"It's nearly 1am already." Viktor huffed, "Time is flying."
"Still not even half done. We'll be fine!" Yuri insisted, searching for the door to the next space. He spotted what looked like a sign on a door, and pointed down the marble stairs, "There's one! I think it's...tango?"

"Oh my god yes."

They couldn't get down to the next floor fast enough, and burst in just as the room had burst with the sound of clapping. A pair of dancers caught their breath in the center of the room; dark, and illuminated by a few strategically placed - and rather large - floor-lamps. Like the swing room, another large wood-laminate floor had been rolled out in the center.

Yuri looked on at it, a bit intimidated, but feeling brave anyway. He reached up to undo the bowtie around his neck, letting the loose ends hang down. His partner did much the same, and shimmied up next to him.

"You ready, or need a breather?"

"Oh I'm ready." Yuri insisted, raising his hand up, and Viktor took it keenly, "I didn't spend an all-nighter with Minako-sensei learning how to move in feminine ways just to leave Eros behind at the end of last season."

"Is that how you broached the subject with her?" The Russian teased as they made their way around the crowd, "Knocking on her door at midnight to ask her to teach you to dance like a lady?"

"Feminine ways, Viktor." Yuri corrected, "Just like you did back in Juniors when you last wore that same outfit."

"Ah yes, imparting the imagery of both the feminine and masculine natures." He reminisced, "Maybe I should take lessons from you then."

"Why's that?" Yuri wondered coyly, standing near the edge of the dance-floor, "You jealous of my slick moves?"

Viktor scoffed dramatically, "Me? Jealous?"

"Are ya?"

"Maybe a little bit." He laughed, "Educate me then, my love."

Yuri nodded eagerly, "Gladly."

['Libertango' - Astor Piazzolla]

More dancers came forward with them, finding space on the big square stage. In keeping with the same spicy themes of Yuri's prior Short Program, the music above and around them came to life with passion, lighting a fire in the hearts of all who heard. The singular guitar that seemed to bring out both excitement and a forlorn, distant sadness, paired with the accordion to create an entirely new feeling. Every dancer on the stage had their own interpretation of the song, and the Nikiforovs were no different. Cerebral as they were with their moves, it looked as though they were choreographing a whole new Pairs version of Eros right there at the Flower Ball.

The sight of two men dancing a tango so eagerly drew eyes and interest, and soon, it was just them on the dance-floor, entirely oblivious to the crowd as the music changed.

['Tango Santa Maria' - Gotan Project]
Viktor kept the lead between them, and expertly twisted, swiveled, and lifted his spouse, keeping those keen blue eyes on him alone. All the months of practicing programs together made the dance easy to maneuver through, even if they were largely making it up as they went. Alluring sweeps and deep dips, lowering Yuri down close to touching the floor, only to be brought back up again seductively close, drew in the crowd even more as the dance went on.

A slight pause about half-way through though, as Yuri leaned far back, held up only by one hand against his lower back; a rose came forward from the dark off-stage. Confused at first, it was too perfect to ignore, and he quickly took it in his extended fingers, coming up to place it between his teeth.

Viktor hesitated in that moment of confusion as well when he saw it, but that look on his husband's face spurred him on, and he smirked before continuing on. It became a game of playful keep-away as the music carried them forward, with Yuri trying to keep the rose for himself, teasing his partner with it. In the end though, Viktor managed to swipe it in their last move of the dance, leaning Yuri back again with one arm as the other held the rose up high victoriously.

The crowd clapped and whistled for them, and only then did they become aware of all those watching eyes. Surprised at first, Viktor ate it all up, even if Yuri backed down slightly in rosy-cheeked embarrassment. They both bowed though, and Yuri nodded appreciatively at the group before slinking off to give the stage back to them.

Viktor caught him before he could go too far though, and spun him back around to face him, "Getting cold feet suddenly?"

"No way, I just-" He stammered, only to stop mid-thought to catch a breath in his throat. He let his frame relax and he leaned into his spouse's embrace, "I guess I got a bit carried away."

"It's a good thing. You're having fun without any worries."

"...I know. That's why I'm worried." Yuri laughed nervously, "Remember what I said about being worried because I'm not worried? I'm waiting for the 'but' to come up..."

"Sure, but this is a night for merry-making, not for thinking too hard."

"Maybe I'm too used to being so worried, that letting it go and cutting loose feels weird." He suggested, "I'm really loving this though. Let's keep going!"

"Where do you want to go next? Something a bit lower-energy?"

"Oh that's a great idea! ...I wonder if they have slow-dancing somewhere?"

"Let's find out."
CHAPTER FOUR HUNDRED NINETY NINE

It was nearly 2:30 in the morning as the dancing duo made their way around Town Hall in search of the slow-dance room. They'd found another several different dancing themes, including freestyle, line and country, and even classy, Viennese version of a rave...but no slow-dance. Finding themselves back at the huge doors to the main ball room, Yuri couldn't help but sigh, looking inside to see the same waltzes taking place as before, just with far fewer people still sober or awake enough to dance.

"We could always do our own thing in spite of the music," Viktor suggested, sliding his hands up over his partner's back and shoulders, rubbing there slightly before leaning in over one side, "There's plenty of space now."

"Yeah...looks like most people have settled down into a half-inebriated stupor." Yuri agreed, "Maybe we can stop by the bar again."

"Oh, feeling thirsty again?"

"May as well. I don't think the other one stood a chance, given I'd eaten right beforehand."

"Alright."

As Viktor moved around to stand beside him, Yuri slid an arm around his lower back, and they stepped into the huge hall with eyes on the bar. The line was only a few people long, and within a few minutes, two new drinks were gathered and taken back to that lonely table near the small orchestra. Tailcoats were hung over the back of their chairs as they moved in to sit down, and Viktor gently pushed in the chair for his partner before taking his own seat beside him.

With an iced Irish Coffee and a White Russian at hand - cold espresso liqueur drinks - the pair settled in for a little bit of the lazy man's time-honored sport; people-watching. Interesting characters were given grand stories; dancers weren't just locals looking for fun, they were Dukes and Duchesses from faraway lands, or a Maharaja's daughter on a secret tour of the world. Their drinks gradually emptied and the ice melted, and the duo's previously sleepless night soon started creeping in on them.

"Why don't we see if anyone's posted any of those pics you asked for?" Yuri suggested, draining the last of his flavored ice-water before leaning back in his seat.

"Oh...yeah, why not." Viktor agreed, twisting around to get at the pockets of his cast-off tailcoat. When he found his phone, he also found his husband leaning against his back, and without a second thought, he turned the rest of his frame to get more comfortable with him there.

Yuri perched his chin on a shoulder, and slipped his hands around either side of the Russian's waist, and watched as his spouse unlocked the phone. He felt a flutter in his stomach at the prospect of all the ancient photos that may resurface; events he'd entirely forgotten, places and people lost to the fog of his memories.

"I remember when we looked at Phichit's photo galleries when we waited for our plane to taxi last year," Viktor mused, clicking into Instagram, "Of all your Detroit days, and the crazy stuff you two did together while training together."

"Detroit was my first real taste of freedom." Yuri explained, "Away from the regimented expectations of Japanese society, away from the constant of Yu-Topia...and all the things that bothered me there."

"Ah, ah...no thoughts on sad topics." Viktor chided, turning his head to nose his partner's cheek affectionately, "Only good thoughts tonight."

"Oh...yeah, for sure." Yuri balked, smiling nervously before creeping back down behind a shoulder, "There was lots about Detroit that I really liked. I could talk about it for days. It's hard to remember most of it just because though... Maybe someone posted photos from then."

The silver Russian smiled as he turned back to his phone, and saw a number of new notifications from the past few hours. He checked his DM's first, and one of the many new messages contained a link to the first of many small photo-dumps.

Yuri scanned the thumbnails, unable to recognize anything on such a small screen, but when Viktor expanded one to start flipping through the gallery, Yuri's face turned red and his eyes widened, "Oh wow...these are pics from my Senior debut..."

"Do you remember the music?"

Eyes went down to the Russian's shoulder for a moment, "Eeehhhmm..." He grumbled, wracking his brain, "...It was a really obscure song. I'd know the tune if I heard it, but the name escapes me."

"You stayed in Juniors for a few extra years, right? So you were what...18 here?"

"Yeah, about there, depending on what part of the season it was. At the very start I was still 17."

"Tsh...a baby."

"So long ago...when I was young, and new..."

Viktor chortled a laugh, and zoomed in on the first photo he'd loaded, trying to see some of the better details. The petite figure in the picture wore a costume that only Celestino could've picked; a green, pillow-sleeved tunic with white figure-hugging pants, "Oh you poor, innocent thing... Ciao Ciao did such terrible things to you."

"He got me to a point where I was ranked as one of Japan's best...even if there were a bunch of us at around the same level." He answered, "Keep going...maybe there'll be a group shot of us. This looks like it was from All Japan."

Viktor did as bid, and flicked a finger across the screen to shuffle through the different photos. There were a few from the actual skating program; jumps, spins, other elements. A dozen or so shots into the gallery, a picture appeared that included five different skaters, standing in front of a large map of Japan that had been painted on a wall behind them. The bunch of them were all pointing rather dramatically at Kyushu, including a rather uncertain younger Yuri at the bottom in the middle, pointing both fingers up at the bottom of the island.

"Oh jeeze... I look like I'm about to make a break for it there." Yuri sighed, "I don't even remember any of their names."

"Who are they?"

"Back then, the Kyushu Region's Senior Men's division. All of them were quite a bit older than me...they're all retired now."
"Hm..."

"Hm?"

"Saito's not there." Viktor pointed out, "But I digress..."

"Oh." Yuri stammered, squinting his eyes as he tried to think back, "Uhh... I...don't think he was there, actually. I can't remember him being around at all."

"This would've been your first Japanese Nationals after moving, right?"

"Yeah I think so."

"Maybe he couldn't face you."

"Who knows. I don't remember him skating either though."

Viktor had no answer to that and continued on through the small gallery, finding a new costume from what looked like the same time period. That one was a little more elaborate than the first; black elastic dress-pants, and a shimmering navy blue top with a crimped purple fringe that went all around from right hip over left shoulder and back again, and a V-cut neck that went down to a point just above the center of the younger skater's chest.

"Oh, I definitely remember that one!" Yuri said, "I did that program two years in a row. It was my old Free Skate, done to The Sorcerer's Apprentice. I thought if I did the same program long enough, I'd master it and come out on top at the end."

"Did you?"

"Nah. I didn't really get good at anything until well into Seniors. I was too insecure about my jumps. I was good with my triple Axels but I refused to try any quads until I was nearly 20."

"So you put everything you had in the safer stuff like footwork and spins."

"Yeah...if I fell while doing those, it wouldn't hurt as much."

Viktor smirked, "I guess so." He turned to offer an adoring nuzzle, "You're a Jump King now though."

"I had to learn to do a quad Salchow from a 15 year old." Yuri huffed, giving a wry look in return, "And I only learned that last year."

"My love, my dearest, don't be so hard on yourself. You were just a late bloomer. Think of yourself like Superman, drawing power from the glow of a yellow sun. Under any other, he'd wither. You just needed your yellow sun." He explained, leaning his head back far enough against Yuri's shoulder that he could speak the words against his partner's skin.

"My silver sun."

"Oh, that sounds mysterious." Viktor teased, finishing his words with a kiss to the cheek in front of him.

"It's true though." Yuri insisted, cocking his head back slightly so he could turn it enough to face the man, "The silver sun with the Midas Touch that turns everything to gold."

"Nah..." Viktor said, rocking his head back and forth slightly on that shoulder to shake it 'no,'
"Well...okay, maybe a little bit."

Yuri smirked a little, looking into those slate eyes, so close to his own. With the phone forgotten, he pulled his left hand free and brought it up and around his husband's shoulder, brushing the back of his curled fingers against Viktor's pale skin.

There's so many things that I wish I could say...but there aren't words strong enough to describe how much he means to me... He thought, extending his fingers to cup his palm to that same cheek, and rubbed his thumb there softly. Viktor seemed to relish in it, half-closing his eyes. I want to be so much more for him.

"You look rather lost in thought suddenly."

"...In thought...in your eyes...in this moment." He explained, "I've told you a thousand times how much I love you, cherish you...even earlier, how much I appreciate you and everything you do. But for some reason, it's like I can't convince myself that I'm saying it right, because it always falls so short of how much I mean it. ...Does that make any sense?"

"It's the story of my life." Viktor answered easily, twisting slightly where he sat, keeping his head on his husband's shoulder but putting one shoulder to the man's chest as he sat sideways in front of him. He set his phone on the table and reached both arms around Yuri's thin frame, "Remember at Nationals last year, when I told you how much of a relief it was to finally have someone at the top of the skating world with me, to see it from my same point of view?"

"Sure. I would never believe it, coming from anyone else."

"Having you in my life has lifted me up in so many other ways, but I often find myself thinking that the skating is really the only thing I've been able to offer you. I count on you for almost everything outside the rink. It's...kind of embarrassing, really."

"I like that you can rely on me for easy stuff like that though." Yuri reassured, threading his fingers through his partner's hair, and returned the hug with the other hand, "It's the least I can do, considering how much you've sacrificed for me. Those five World Championships just seem like such small change compared to what you've lost..."

Viktor hesitated a moment, but he drew a quick breath and lifted up off the shoulder he'd been perched on. He turned completely around in his chair to face his mate, lowering his head as he took Yuri's hands in his own, carefully and gently, rubbing his thumbs across them. When he raised his eyes, there was something of a forlorn look in them, "I gave it away."

"...Viktor..."

"People were asking me what my plans were for the next season, when I was doing my last interviews at Worlds in Japan two years ago. I didn't have any. I was at the end of my rope; none of my ideas really meant anything anymore. What I thought about, and had been thinking about since the December prior, was how I was going to get back to you. How do I explain that to the skating press? That I wasn't even thinking about skating anymore. I was thinking about my life, and what I really wanted to do with it. With all the talk around me about my age, and whether I was going to keep going, or retire...everyone wanting to know now, now, now what my plans were. It just...got so easy to tell them nothing." He explained, moving his right hand up to slide around the side of Yuri's neck, pulling his head down to set his brow against it, "I know it was my fault that no one knew anything about me outside of skating. It was my entire world for over a decade. It's the one thing I was ever good at...but figure skaters shine bright for only a short period of time, and my blaze was burning out quick. I was really getting worried about what I'd do after...and I've told you about those fears.”

Yuri nodded wordlessly.

"When I saw that viral video of you skating Aria, I had that epiphany about what I knew I had to do. I went to Hasetsu and reached out for the thing I'd been calling out for... After you agreed to let me coach you, all the ideas I'd had before that suddenly made so much sense. Aria was about longing for love, and the other programs I'd been working on for the next season?"

"Eros and Agape..."

"The different kinds of love I was so desperate for. Heh..." Viktor dropped his head down again, "I felt so stupid when I started skating those two shows at the Ice Castle... It was so obvious why I made them at a time like that... My skating knew more about what I needed than I did, but I didn't have either in my life, and that's why I was having such a hard time finishing either of those programs before. It became clear what I needed to do to complete them when I finally had both right in front of me. You already embodied agape, but I wanted your eros, too...so that's why I had you skate it. I told you to skate that show like you were trying to seduce me, but in a roundabout kind of way, it was a tool that I used to try and bring you closed to me. You convinced yourself to think of katsudon...but I had hoped you'd eventually think of me."

"I'd been thinking of you since the start." Yuri confessed, "...I just...didn't have the nerve to admit it, even to myself. It seemed too absurd. I didn't want to let myself think about you that way because I didn't want to get hurt when you backed off. I finally had you, even as just a friend, and I didn't want anything to put that at risk. It took...so long to let myself get past that barrier. And the way you always seemed to know what my limits were...it's like you knew I was wrestling with my own feelings over you, and you didn't want to push me too hard."

"...I knew you were struggling, yeah." Viktor nodded, lifting his face to kiss his partner's brow, "I didn't know how though, so all I could do was wait for you to meet me where I was at. Kissing you in China was the moment when I knew you were there with me."

"...Everything changed after that."

"You say that we never really had a phase where we were just dating...but I think, the whole time between China and Spain...that was it." He went on, "The rings...that was proof. Asking you to marry me afterwards was just an unconventional way of getting the both of us on the same page about how to move forward. I never wanted to lose you. I couldn't stand the thought... Hearing you say that we should end our arrangement after the Final...was the closest to a worst case scenario I could ever imagine."

Yuri could see the tears falling past the silver bangs that hung over his husband's face. He could feel them forming in his own eyes just as quickly, and he reached both arms over Viktor's shoulders to hold onto him, "I never wanted to hurt you... I thought I was doing the right thing. I'm sorry..."

"Don't ever be sorry." Viktor insisted, holding tight as well, "Not for that... It just made me realize how much I wanted to fight for you, and how far we still had to go. Now look at us." He said, snuffling a wet laugh against Yuri's neck, "Trying to find a way to describe how much we love each other, when words fall short."

"I don't think we'll ever find a way. It's just too much to say." Yuri answered, pressing into the soggy spot he was making, feeling more tears fall from his eyes as his heart felt like it was full of light, "Guess we'll just have to fall back on our skating, like always."
"It's a language we both speak fluently, even when we don't know what to say. It gets the point across in a way that words fail at."

Yuri nodded a wet laugh as he pulled back from Viktor's shoulder, trying to find a fabric napkin to rub his face with.

Viktor spotted one first and reached for it, drying Yuri's eyes himself, "We're completely hopeless." He teased, snuffling anyway, "Crying in the middle of a ball..."

It was almost providence that the lights dimmed slightly after those words were spoken, and the duo looked up. The ambiance of the hall shifted with the lowered brightness of the huge space, and soon after, the low, quiet trill of a single piano filled the entire space.

['Slow Dance Music, Piano' on PolygonMusic channel]

Viktor smiled at the sound and looked back, taking both of Yuri's hands into his own, "It's like this is just for us. Shall we?"

He could only nod through more tears, and let his partner pull him up to his feet, following as Viktor walked backwards onto the wide, near-empty dance floor. His hands were guided around the Russian's waist as Viktor's own went up over his shoulders in turn, and he raised his eyes.

"Let's remember this night forever, Yuri."

The words nearly caught in his throat, but Yuri nodded again, trying to smile despite the mess he'd become, "...O-okay..." He managed, moving his hands up from where they'd settled on his husband's lower back, until he was practically clinging. He lifted himself up on his toes quickly though, and pressed in for a much-needed kiss, just as Viktor began their slow sway. It was eagerly returned, and their slow-dance began, moving across the open floor like a gently-rocking upright cuddle.
Chapter 500

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED (omg)

The night waned on, and the closer the hour drew to dawn than midnight, the more the population at the ball dwindled. Many politely slipped out, and a few were less dignified in their stumblings, but all could agree that the night had been a grand success by most measures.

Standing on the outskirts of a small group, waiting to get their jackets returned, Viktor held his partner close - and upright. Yuri half-dozed where he stood, paying little attention to what was going on around them until he had to look up and watch where he stepped. He half-registered the sound of his spouse's voice as their garment tickets were returned and their jackets brought back to them, and stood on his own for a moment while they were collected.

"I know you're tired, my love, but-" Viktor started, putting his own jacket into the crook of an elbow as he used both hands to swing Yuri's jacket over the man's shoulders, "There's one last thing I want to show you."

"...There's more?" He wondered blearily, looking up as he rubbed one eye.

The silver nodded, "Just one more thing. It's a bit of a walk to get there, but I promise, it'll be worth it."

Yuri nodded through a yawn, but then found his husband's hand again and let Viktor guide him right back into Town Hall. They stayed on the ground floor though, passing the remnants of the theme rooms they'd danced in earlier, and a few other flowery displays, before finally arriving at what could ostensibly be called the back door. What greeted his eyes outside was enough to make all thought of bed disappear.

From just beyond the edge of the bottom step, and extending hundreds of meters out into the park behind Town Hall, an outdoor skating rink came into view; two, in fact. The first rink was near as wide as the building was, though was narrower than a competitive rink. Extending beyond it on the right side, to their sights, was a looping, meandering path of ice with wooden walls, giving it the feel of a garden walkway, or even a bobsleigh chute, gloriously lit by dozens and dozens of lamps as it wound its way through a small forest. Four huge loops all joined together to connect the front rink to the second smaller one in the rear, and between them more directly was a full - and large - outdoor patio, complete with food stalls, a skate rental kiosk, and a bridge that went over the ice-path entryway.

"...Wow." Yuri said breathlessly, looking slowly around, taking in all the colors; blues and purples on the rink before them, warm yellow on the looping corridor. There were a tiny handful of people who were skating at that late hour, and Yuri suddenly felt his heart sink, "...We didn't even bring our skates."

"Didn't we?"

"...Eh?" Yuri balked, looking back towards the Russian standing beside him. He could hardly believe the sight of a bag in Viktor's opposite hand, "...You brought our skates? I thought that was just extra warm clothes or something!"

"Well, I brought some of that, too, but...yes, I brought our skates." Viktor teased, "This may be the only chance we have to skate in this place, at this hour, and have most of the rink to ourselves. I couldn't pass it up, even on the risk that you or I might be too tired to want to keep going."

Yuri gave a wry look, "Would you still have come out here if you were too tired?"

"I would've told you about this much earlier and hoped to get my second wind." He answered easily, then gestured out to the rink-wall, "Shall we skate?"

"Uhhh...yeah!"

Dress shoes were hurriedly removed, and a brief moment was taken to rub sore dancing feet before slipping them into those well-worn boots. The gloves Viktor brought were also put on, and the night's below-freezing temperatures were kept at bay. Their 'spiffy duds' were kept covered as well by their long-coats, with long scarves hanging from their shoulders. Yuri stepped out onto the ice first, golden blades bathed in multi-colored lights, and bouncing off the glossy white suit he still wore. He couldn't help but be somewhat lost in the gothic architecture of the Hall, looming over them like a castle from a dark fantasy novel. He paused in the middle of the rink to gape at the whole sight, eyes drinking in the palette that reflected off every intricately detailed tower. Five of them in all, with the clock-tower in the middle, highest of them all, looking out over Vienna like a silent sentinal.

It completely entranced him, to the point that he didn't hear the sound of icy scratching approaching from behind. Only the artificial camera-shutter that followed finally pulled him out of it, and he turned quickly to spot Viktor crouched on a knee with a phone up, pointed towards him.

"A perfect shot." Viktor teased, rising back up to his full height, and slid in closer to show off the photo.

Yuri looked at the phone screen, and beheld the image, showing him from behind from an ant's point of view, and the clock-tower illuminated behind him, shining high in the sky like a beacon, "...Wow, that does look really good."

"We could make a whole new photo-book with pictures we've taken over the course of this season." Viktor explained, "I have a folder just for them."

"...I can't remember taking many pictures other than in Paris."

"Oh I took plenty." Viktor mused, "I don't ever want to miss an opportunity to save a memory. I've seen and done so many incredible things in my life, sometimes it can be hard to remember every bit of it just from my own head. Pics like these are good for jogging the memory."

"And you are somewhat forgetful anyway."

"Somewhat." He agreed, nudging himself backward a bit so he could take another photo, this time of his husband looking directly at him, and Town Hall in the background. Yuri gave his best tired smile, and saw the dazzling flash, but then approached for a bit of warmth. Viktor drew him in easily while setting up the pole of his selfie-stick behind the younger figure's frame. A few seconds later, he moved slightly to put them both cheek to cheek facing the camera, and snapped another photo, pulling in the blue and purple lights on the ice into their background, "You know, this is the first time the both of us have been on the ice together since we left Hasetsu."

"Feels like such a long time ago, with everything else that's happened." Yuri agreed, watching his partner put the phone and stick away. They took each other's hands and started meandering on the long, thin rink, passing the tiny handful of other people who dared to be out at that absurd hour with them, "Going to Russia, spending a few days with your father...and...all that entailed. The train ride out of St. Petersburg and again out of Moscow...and the long ride here to Vienna."

"I really hoped this trip would turn out better than it did." Viktor said solemnly, "It just seems like we stumbled from one awful situation to another."

"The time we spent with Kon wasn't the worst thing ever." Yuri shrugged, "All things considered, it was probably the highlight of all the Russian stuff."

"Being the best of the worst doesn't necessarily make it good though."

"Maybe not, but it actually went pretty good...I think, anyway." He said, rubbing his thumb gently across the fingers curled around it, "I know you didn't really get what you wanted out of it, but I think you still got closure."

Viktor was quiet for a moment, but then sighed and shook his head, "I didn't get what I wanted, no...I think...I got what I needed instead." He explained, watching the ice as it moved towards and under them, then up towards the wooden bridge that went over the rink, "The terrors and nightmares that bubbled up again after my mother's death...all the things I'd made myself forget, just so I could have something resembling a normal life."

"Hmph... As normal as the greatest skater of our generation can have, I guess."

Viktor smiled slightly as the pair headed through to the looping ice-paths, "Yeah, all things considered...as normal as I could get. I got to live in the city, spend time with people who shared my interests, and finally found open encouragement to pursue the things I wanted to have for myself. I dread to think of the kind of life I would've had if it hadn't been for Yakov showing up at my house the day he had."

"Don't borrow bad luck." Yuri advised, looking to his partner's visage, glowing softly golden with the lights of the lamps passing behind him, "But I'm sure I would've found reason to fall in love with you anyway, no matter where your path in life might've taken you."

Viktor made a face, "If I'd gotten stuck back in that little awful town, I would probably never have come onto your radar."

"I doubt you would've been content to stay there forever." Yuri pointed out, "Mikhail escaped. I know you would've done the same at some point. Maybe we would've met under different circumstances, but I'm completely sure that we would've met somehow, eventually."

"Do you think you ever would've gone on to competitive skating if not for seeing me on the television?" Viktor quipped, giving something of a wry, smug look.

"I think I would've done whatever it took to find you, whether or not I knew that's what I was doing."

"...Really?"

"You've called us soul-mates before." He answered, "I read the timelines of our lives and I tend to think that you're probably right. Sometimes it seems like we each had a small list of things we had to do before the stars aligned that put us together."

"...A list of things?" The Russian echoed skeptically, "Relationship things?"

"Maybe not just that." Yuri shook his head, and let the hand go between them so he could slide his arm around his husband's back, feeling the opposing arm come up over his shoulders in turn, "You had to find your destiny, and become a World Champion, to make the earlier suffering make sense. You didn't really climb so high and hold onto that achievement until you cut ties with other people holding you back. Whether you like it or not, I've been an anchor on you, dragging you down and holding you back."

"...I don't think of you that way."

"That's why I prefaced it with 'whether you like it or not.'" Yuri teased, nudging against him slightly before skating forward normally again through the winding curves of the icy path, "But if not for me, you'd probably be a six time World Champion right now, getting ready to skate your next Olympics for Russia."

"I'm not even sure that's true." Viktor shrugged, "It was super easy for me to drop everything to be your coach because I already had no real drive to compete anymore. Maybe I just would've helped coach Yurio instead."

"Water under the bridge," Yuri huffed, "My point though...is that your life was far less complicated before you came to me. But, in spite of how hard certain things have been since you blew into Hasetsu that fateful April two years ago...I like to think it's been worth it."

"...I'm just hoping that what happened yesterday and this morning is the last awful thing that happens to us for a long time." Viktor added, "I never want to feel like that again."

Yuri paused in thought for a moment, listening to the sound of their blades scraping across the uneven ice beneath them. As they rounded the loop of a second track, he shook his head and sighed, "...I took for granted how upset I thought you were over the whole thing. I really thought that you'd react the same way you did when I went off on you at Yu-Topia before the wedding party."

"That was different."

"I know, but in my head, I thought it was more likely that you'd...be basking in the afterglow of your righteous indignation."

"I have no idea what that means."

"That you'd feel justified being mad at me, like you'd thought I was being immature by leaving because you made some dumb noises at me." Yuri clarified, twisting around so he'd glide backwards in front of his partner. He slid his hands down the man's arms until he found his hands and pulled them forward in his own, keeping his eyes low for a moment, "I know I've come a long way from the anxiety-crippled coward that I was before... I've gone from running away at the sight of you, to making love with you in public places. But you're still my hero, and I don't like thinking badly of you, even if it means blaming myself for the things you legitimately did wrong. It's just my nature...to think of myself as an unworthy speck, bumping up against better men."

"You're literally the current World Champion and record holder, Yuri..." Viktor attempted, but found the younger man shaking his head anyway.

"Because of you." Yuri insisted, "It's like that old saying, of dwarves thinking themselves tall because they're standing on the shoulders of giants. I didn't get that score and title because of Celestino, or the years of practice and heartache of losing and trying again...I got it because of you. You're the key that unlocked me. Because of that, I'll always have a certain reverence for you."

"...I thought we were more equal than this."

Yuri shook his head fervently, "It's not like that at all. I'm trying to say...even if I'm standing with you, it's because you pulled me up. The admiration, the higher respect, the deferment... It's because you broke that ground ahead of me, cleared the path, and made it easier for me to come after. It's a reverence formed out of gratitude. You've done more for me just by believing in me than anyone else in my whole life. It's just like we said before...you're the King on the Ice, no matter what else happens."

Viktor pursed his lips slightly, but nodded in understanding, "As long as you accept that you're the King at Home."

"Oh of course." Yuri laughed, reaching one hand up to pinch his husband's cheek, "You're hopeless on your own."

The Russian's brow crinkled slightly even as his face was tugged on comically.

Yuri let it go and rubbed his gloved thumb across the spot, "I already forget what point I was trying to make with all that... Sorry. I must've gone on some weird tangent."

"...You were trying to explain why you didn't think I'd be upset about what happened between us."

"Oh...right." He stammered, turning to take his place at the Russian's side again as they started skating forward, "Because it's easier to think problems are my fault than yours. You're sometimes a bit stand-off-ish when we disagree about something. The confidence you have in your position is enough to convince anyone that you're right, even when you're not. And I'm still a bit of a push-over."

"You know that you can tell me when I'm wrong."

"I do...but that doesn't mean I like doing it, or that it gets easier." Yuri countered, looking up through the naked trees to the sight of Town Hall as it came into view again, the loop of the course turning them back the way they came, "Overall, I think we communicate better now than we did in the past. We'll never be able to read each other's minds, but we've been pretty cerebral in most of our thoughts. Like how much the colors on the ice in the main rink-"

"...Reminds me of 'Duetto.'" Viktor said, finishing the sentence before looking aside, "Right?"

Yuri blinked, but then nodded brightly, "Exactly."

"I have the song on my phone. Maybe we can skate a bit of it for old time's sake before we head back?"

"One of our greatest hits. Stammi vicino."

Viktor smiled, "Non te ne andare."
Eyes and ears raised to the sound of the door-lock whirring and clicking, and light poured inside the quiet, dark space. Makkachin got up to his feet and hopped down off the far end of the bed, approaching curiously as two tired figures stepped inside, and the light from the hall was replaced by the dull yellow light of the entryway. Though happy to see his people, Makkachin was half-asleep by any standard, and his usual excitable jumping and wiggling was more of a calm greeting, tail swaying side to side behind him. He got his head-rubs and then sat back to watch the pair disassemble from their winter garb.

Long-coats were removed and hung in the closet, and dress-shoes placed on its floor.Scarves were folded and put away, and gloves followed. The bag of skates and extra gear was stored last before the closet door was pushed closed again.

Yuri stepped into the main part of the room, and found Jiro still on the bed, sitting upright but too tired to move much farther than the warm nest-like dip he'd formed in the comforter. He bent down to rub the pup's cheeks and ears, and kissed his fluff, "Were you good tonight?" He asked quietly, leaning up again to see Jiro's curled tail wag a few times before the little Akita yawned widely, "That's what I figured. You're always good."

Rubbing his eyes as he turned back around, Yuri didn't see his partner's approach, though he seemed peripherally aware of it. He stood still, feeling the hands that slid into the open front of his pale tail-coat. It was pushed off his shoulders and drifted down his arms, pulled free and folded before being set neatly on the bed nearby. Deft fingers pulled buttons through button-holes, and the black vest came off next, followed by the white bow-tie, threading out from under the folded edge of his shirt-collar. He opened his eyes as the buttons on the front of his shirt were starting to come undone, and looked up to the tired-but-pleased expression on his spouse's face, "I have a feeling tomorrow's going to be a 'don't even set an alarm to wake us up' kind of day." He mused quietly.

Viktor nodded, going down his husband's chest, one button at a time, "Sounds about right. We only have one chore to do before the Free Program."

"Finishing touches on the Exhibition."

"Mhm." He hummed, pulling the bottom of the glossy black shirt out from Yuri's white slacks so he could undo the last button, "Hopefully you still have the muscle memory of our practice from the summer. We expected to have another few months to go over it."

"A few practice runs tomorrow afternoon should be enough...then we can fine-tune on Sunday morning."

Viktor nodded again, sneaking his hands inside the folds of the shirt to push it off his young husband's shoulders, feeling every inch of skin that he could along the way. As the garment came loose, he withdrew again, and turned the figure around where he stood so he could gently tug the sleeves from Yuri's arms. Once it was free, it was loosely folded and placed on the pile with the coat and vest. Before Yuri could turn around again though, Viktor leaned forward, pressing his chest to the smaller figure's back. Arms came forward and around, pressing palms flat against his spouse's exposed frame, feeling that hot, silky skin.

Yuri relaxed into the Russian's embrace, feeling the heat of a yawn against the side and back of his neck, morphing into a kiss that traveled up to the bottom of his ear. He leaned his head aside to make room, and rested his hands over Viktor's wrists, "...You know..." He started quietly, eager for each press of lips on his skin, "...Before Barcelona...even before Beijing...there were occasions when you'd hug me, just like this...and I'd wish you did what you're doing now..."

"There was one time when I tried." Viktor pointed out, sliding his hands across to wrap his arms around his partner's core a little more tightly, and pulled the man back against his skin, "But you pulled away right before I could."

"...I remember."

Viktor lifted his head in surprise, "You...remember...? You noticed?"

"Mh." Yuri nodded, and wiggled in place in an effort to turn around. Arms loosened their grip just enough to allow it, and hands settled on his bare waist when he finished, looking up the few inches to those slate eyes, "I was slowly starting to realize how I felt about everything...but my fear that you didn't feel the same way was enough that I avoided even giving the opportunity to find out if you did."

"I didn't think I was being that subtle." The Russian said, giving an odd look, "But if you knew what I was going to do and pulled away...?"

Yuri shook his head, and brought his hands up between them, watching his fingers trace over the contours of his partner's partly-exposed chest, "I thought you might've been like that with everyone. The fear that you didn't mean it the way I interpreted it, if I let it happen, and took it the wrong way...the idea that you'd have to find a way to let me down easy was the worst, so I buried it deep, hoping it wouldn't get away from me. I would've rather gone on never knowing, than risk you leaving because it got awkward."

"...That sounds a bit familiar." Viktor grimaced, quirking one brow.

"Good thing you just went ahead and kissed me then." Yuri teased, looking up with a sultry expression, "Though I do sometimes wish I'd said yes when you asked if you should."

"Oh, in the garage?"

"Mhm."

The Russian leaned closer to offer an adoring nuzzle, "I wonder what your skating would've looked like then."

Yuri slid his hands up to push the undone shirt and vest off his partner's pale shoulders, "I think we would've needed to rename the program." He laughed quietly, tracing his fingers down the Russian's collar-bones back towards center, "There's no way 'Yuri on Ice' would've made any sense if I never touched it."

"We could've called it 'Yuri floating on Ice.'" Viktor suggested, reaching behind himself to tug at the cuffs of the tumbling shirt, and leaned over to add it to the fancy pile.

"You got me addicted pretty early on, to be honest, even though I didn't dare indulge." Yuri pointed out, getting a confused look in response, "Over that summer, when we'd mess around on the beach. Chasing Makkachin around and scooping up handfuls of the surf to throw at each other. I never really wanted anyone touching me before that...but you found a way to get into my space, and make me want it."
"Well, I had the one advantage no one else did."

"Ungodly levels of patience?"

"Yes, but no." He mused, nudging foreheads together as his hands came forward on his husband's hips, tracing the edge of the white slacks that still clung to his frame, "Something else."

"Knowing that you always get what you want?"

"Mmmh...yes, but no." Viktor laughed, fingers finding their way to the button and clasp at the front, loosening the waistband.

"Finding out early-on that I admired you and didn't want to disappoint you?"

"That did help, and it gave me hope...but no." He went on, letting the garment slip down his husband's legs, and gently ushered the younger man backward, until the edge of the tall bed forced him to sit.

"Swooping into Hasetsu right as I was trying to figure out how to get my love for skating back, and then became that reason?"

"I brought the storm of ice and snow, to remind you of how much you needed to skate...but no. Not that either." Viktor teased, crouching down on a knee to pull the pants off each leg and foot. He folded them neatly over one arm, and gazed up at his partner from the lower vantage, "Keep guessing."

With not but socks and underpants left, Yuri huffed a smile, "Being my coach?"

"That was a vector, so...yes, but no."

"Getting me to skate 'Eros' so I'd be more open to the idea of...stuff?"

Viktor snorted a laugh as he rose up again, putting a hand on the bed on either side of his partner's legs, and leaned in close, "That helped...but again, yes, but no. You're getting closer though." He explained, brushing nose-tips together.

Yuri balanced precariously as he was nudged backward, but he managed to find his spouse's waistband, and hooked a finger into each side, bringing them down towards the front, "Telling me to skate like I'm seducing you."

"Closer, but still no." Viktor answered, just barely louder than a whisper. The pitch-dark slacks were loosed, and fell down the Russian's milk-white legs, collapsing into a pile around his ankles. He stepped out from one side, and used his foot on the other to lift the garment up, putting both pairs of pants onto the pile without ever taking his eyes off the face in front of him. He leaned further forward then, forcing Yuri backward on the top of the bed, "One more guess."

Yuri paused, having backed up enough that only his ankles dangled off the blankets. The teasing look changed slightly, a tiny bit more serious, and he raised a hand to curve it around Viktor's cheek and neck, "There was a crack in the wall I built around my heart...and you found it...and spent months, and months...and months...slowly chipping away at it, until there was a hole big enough to squeeze through."

"Ooh~! That's volcano-hot, my love." Viktor mused, "Keep going."

Yuri paused to think, and bought himself a bit of time by turning around to fish for the far end of the blankets and pulled them away from the pillows at the headboard. He reached down to push off his thin black socks, then scooted backward into the freshly-opened space, and looked forward to offer a hand, "After you managed to get in, you saw that the walls inside me were plastered with images of you. Like the posters I tore off my bedroom walls so you wouldn't see, I hid my heart under a barren and boring exterior, keeping my real feelings so far under the surface that even I didn't...wouldn't know what they were. But you made it in, you made me see...and you pulled out an Eros that could - and was - meant only for you."

"I could only let you skate for your love of katsudon for so long." Viktor laughed, taking the offered hand to draw in closer, "Though admittedly, watching you become that pork-cutlet bowl that seduces men was amazing."

"You liked that, huh?"

"I did. Immensely." He answered easily, twisting from side to side to pull the blankets and sheets up over his back. He felt feet and ankles slide past his bare waist and hook around him, pulling him nearer his husband's nearly-naked frame, "The summer-long practice of those programs was like a slow crawl as you learned to like yourself, and get more comfortable around me, but by competition season...you were running hard and fast."

"You jumped out of the way though." Yuri quipped, poking a finger into the center of the Russian's chest.

Viktor just took it with one hand though and raised it up, kissing the center of that palm, "You were bleeding at the time, but...I've let you bleed on me since."

"Hmm...maybe."

"I've let you get other fluids on me, too." Viktor teased further, slipping between the legs that had parted 'round to pull him closer.

"On you...in you..." Yuri added, face going red as he spoke the words, much to his partner's interest.

"We should do that again. Right now."

"Right this second..."

Viktor moved in quickly, one hand sliding around his husband's waist to hold his back, the other going around Yuri's neck, pulling him into a long kiss. Legs wrapped around him urgently, and arms went over his shoulders, fingers pressing to his back. Hot velvet skin contrasted with the cool air and sheets, and every inch was felt and caressed. Viktor moved from mouth to neck, kissing his way down to his husband's chest, backing up slightly under the blankets as he went. He felt a few kisses on his own shoulder as Yuri tried to keep after him, but soon he was out of reach, clinging to the younger man's core as fingers combed through silver hair. He placed a few more kisses onto Yuri's chest before pulling up, and slid his hands down the man's legs where they were still tightly wrapped around him. The gentle stroke loosened their grip, and he pushed them back just enough to pull that last vestige of clothing away, tossing it away before lifting up onto his own knees. Thumbs went into his waistband and pushed the dark bikini-briefs down, getting lost somewhere in the blankets after being pulled off his ankles. Viktor went immediately back to their prior position, pulling those soft but athletic legs around himself again.

Yuri hissed a breath as he felt skin touching skin, dropping his head down against the pillows, feeling his hair pressed up against the headboard. Every kiss moved lower against his chest, nibbling and licking at each little ridge, soon latching onto one nipple. He gasped each breath, feeling the rub of a rough tongue over that sensitive nub, leaving it wet and hard as Viktor moved to the other side to offer that same attention on the second. Electrified heat shot through him from his core to the tips of his limbs, getting more intense with every brush of excited flesh pressing against his own.

Viktor seemed to slow down then though, walking his kisses back up from Yuri's stomach to his chest, and back under one ear, feeling the needy wiggle underneath himself. Hands that pressed to his back were sliding towards his shoulders, then over them, and disappeared between them. The back of knuckles brushed against his chest, and fingers opened up to curve around his ribs, palms feeling for every bit of ridged skin they could find. Viktor moved his kisses from under an ear to the tip of his husband's chin, finding his favorite eyes watching him for every move he made. It was odd though. There were tears in those eyes.

"...You okay?" Viktor wondered abruptly, rising up a little, and pressed his hands down into the sheets to hold himself up.

Yuri nodded easily, but brought both his own hands up to his face, rubbing over the whole of it before finally trying to dry it, "...I think I'm a bit...over-tired, and delirious from lack of sleep. I'm just really emotional right now?" He laughed at himself, "The front of my head is all tingly, and I just want to feel you on every inch of me... I had this weird...almost instantaneous internal panic attack over how stressful the last few weeks have been, and right after that hit me, I felt this weird cold rush go through me from the top of my head to my toes... It was like this big relief that all the badness was all finally over, even though it seemed like I'd only just allowed myself to realize just how bad it had really gotten for a while..."

Viktor was stunned and dumbfounded, but brought his hands back up to peel his husband's from the side of his head, moving them back over his own shoulders to hug around him. As Yuri clung, Viktor wedged his hands under the younger man's back, partially lifting him up off the bed to keep him close, "...I think I know how you feel. Putting off the emotional baggage of feeling the misery of the moment, until you think you're safe enough to let it all go... Then it just comes in one big uncomfortable wave."

Yuri nodded where he'd pressed his face against his partner's shoulder, "I didn't realize how worn down I was..." He said quietly, bringing his knees up against the Russian's ribs, "And I don't know why it's hitting me just now..."

"Let me do my best to make you feel better. I'll wear you out so completely that you can sleep easy."

The almost-wet snuffle-laugh that followed was enough to confirm Yuri's agreement, and he let go, lowering back down to the pillows and blankets behind him. He slid his hands over those broad shoulders and pressed his palms to Viktor's chest, looking up at him with a vulnerable look in his eyes, "...You always know what to do." He started, watching the love of his life lean over him and lower down to get closer, and nuzzled at his brow, "You always seem to know where I am in my head and how to find me there."

"That's because I love you. Now let me make love to you."

Yuri just huffed another laugh, "Ah, take me, Viktor..."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWO

With those proverbial marching-orders given, Viktor pulled the blanket back only far enough to lean towards the side of the bed. The drawer on the one bed-side dresser opened and he pulled out the small velvet dice-bag that contained their fun-time items, returned to his place, and loosened the cords on the satchel. With the bag open, he offered it forward, and Yuri reached in, as though pulling the number for competition skating order out. Instead of a number though, he found one small bottle, put it back, and then grabbed another, "This one."

"You do like your warming liquids." Viktor teased, pulling the strings up again and setting the bag aside. Turning the bottle bottom-up, he squeezed a dollop into the palm of his hand, dropping the little container before rubbing the liquid between his palms.

Yuri snagged the bottle before raising both arms up above his head, pressing the back of his forearms against the red leather headboard. His back arched as he felt the first slide of those slick warm hands against his skin, spreading that warm fluid from hip-crests to his collar bones, gliding over primed pink nubs as they went. He relished in the slow feelings of those hands sliding across his frame, up and down, teasing and touching at every space. As the warming fluid started working its magic where it had been spread across his chest and stomach, Viktor's hands moved to his legs. A little more of that slippery liquid was dribbled over the younger man's frame, and eager hands slathered through it, moving it to the thighs that yearned for it. Each time wet fingers came tantalizingly close to center, Yuri's legs tightened around his husband's frame, pressing ankles to the Russian's lower back in an effort to pull him closer. Neither of them needed to look to know how arousing the oil-play had been.

With every inch of exposed skin slick and shiny with the warming liquid, Viktor slid his fingers along his husband's arms, leaning further over the younger man's smaller frame as he went. He circled his palms around the ends of each elbow before sliding them back down again behind Yuri's shoulders, kissing the man's chin, nose, and lips, as his hands went under Yuri's sides. Lowering down, Viktor pressed his chest down to his spouse's and the heat of the warming liquid intensified the heat of their skin.

Between the slippery feeling, and the need to feel more, Yuri started to wiggled in place as well as he could, trying to feel as much of his spouse's arousal as he could, and the little electrical jolts it caused in his own. The hands that had circled around his back came to his sides again, the right caressing down to his waist and the crook of hip and thigh. He gasped aloud as Viktor pressed against him, sliding up and forward firmly, then down again. The easy slide of lubricated skin, the firmness of excited flesh, and the heat of both bodies and warming fluid, made every bit of pressure that much more obvious, and sent an electrical storm of pleasure from their cores to the tips of toes and fingers.

Yuri tilted his head back against the pillows, and the tease of kisses moved to his neck, even as the slow, firm slide continued over the rest of him. Knees weakened, and toes curled and flexed, as each push against him drove him further into the ecstasy of the moment. He narrowly opened his eyes as he felt his husband's frame tilt off slightly to the side. One perfect hand slid across his chest as the other snaked its way up to the space between his head and the headboard. He moved his own nearest hand down to meet it, weaving fingers together to hold tight.

"Yuri..."
Both eyes met for a moment, even as the slow grind continued lower down. They smiled and huffed a laugh each before Viktor leaned into a kiss, sliding his free hand up and down the side of his husband's thin frame. When he slid it between them, and took hold of what he found there, he relished in the sound of his husband's gasp. Yuri's unheld hand came down against his upturned shoulder, squeezing it with each twist and stroke. It slid inward, curling around the back of his neck before grasping and pulling him down again into another kiss.

Pulling his other hand free, Yuri held the Russian's head close with both, and tilted his hips upward against the man's stomach. The urgency of that need to move on wasn't subtle, and he was relieved to feel Viktor reaching around him for the satchel again. Though he held onto the kisses, he paid close attention to every blind movement going on around him, and his legs twitched slightly when he felt the cool sensation of more lube dribbling onto his skin. His husband's length slid through the cleft of his back end, spreading that new liquid around, pressing firmly against him with each push. There was a brief pause in the kisses as Viktor pulled up slightly, right hand going down to try positioning himself. Yuri uttered a quiet vocal gasp with each tease of penetration, and he tried to wiggle his hips into better position for it.

Viktor wasn't ready to let it happen so quickly though, and huffed a laugh against his lover's lips, "Slow down...there's no hurry."

"...I need you though..."

"I know; I need you too...and I'm here."

"V-Viktor." Yuri gasped, voice more urgent in its need.

"Alright, alright...if you insist."

Desperation gave way to relaxation, and Yuri let his frame go limp in the blankets. He drew a long, deep breath as he felt his husband's flesh press against him, and slowly go in.

Carefully as Viktor usually did, he entered a little, withdrew again, and pressed in a little further the next time, repeating until he was sure his husband's body was relaxed enough to accept his full length. He cast his eyes down onto the younger man's posture, watching for Yuri's arched back to loosen, and hesitant breaths soften. Once Yuri unclenched and exhaled, Viktor slid in the last few inches, and pressed their hips together. He leaned forward to offer a nuzzle to his husband's brow, and hooked Yuri's knees around his upper arms to tilt him into better position. Hands came up on both sides of his head, fingers threading through his silver hair, and the gentle press of a relieved kiss found his lips.

"...It's so weird...that I feel like I finally have you back...even though you never left my side." Yuri whispered, feeling those exhausted tears springing up again, "This feels so different than it has for so long..."

"Maybe we just needed to hit a breaking point. A lot has happened."

"I never wanted to make you think I was going to leave... It should never have had to come to that... We talk so much better than we used to...why did this happen anyway...?"

Viktor lowered down to wedge his arms under his husband's back, pulling him up slightly into a tight hug, and pressed his hips in further as legs wrapped around him, "...I don't really know..." He sighed, kissing where he could against his partner's neck, "But I know that we're stronger together, and I love you more with every passing day."
Yuri snuffled and rubbed his eyes against the Russian's shoulder, and nodded, "I love you too...so much...more than I knew was possible for a person to feel..."

Pulling back slightly, Viktor pressed their brows together and nuzzled slightly, half-opening his eyes to see his reflection in the cherry-hazel orbits looking back at him. As he felt his husband's hands slide down behind his shoulders, he leaned into another kiss, and slowly began to rock his hips, feeling a sharp breath drawn against his cheek. He clung to that feeling for a little while before turning his hands around under his spouse's back, and pressed down to push himself up slightly. Silver bangs dangled down, swaying slightly with every new push, breaths becoming more vocal as every movement added to the intensity of the feeling between them.

As Viktor lifted higher up, Yuri's hands slid further up the man's back, until he could only hold on by lacing his fingers together behind the man's neck. He unhooked them and pressed his palms to his partner's chest as the thrusts became more forceful, pushing him up into the pillows with each push. His knees slowly slipped down the Russian's arms as they went on, until Viktor let them go entirely to plant his hands into the sheets against Yuri's waist, lifting himself up just slightly until the comforter shifted off his back.

They kept up that pace a bit longer, until Viktor was practically holding onto his husband's waist to keep him from getting knocked away by the force. He paused suddenly and withdrew as he scooted backward. Yuri didn't need any hints to know to turn over, and just as he managed to get one leg over himself, he felt hands on his hips to help him finish, lifting him up in the process. He clambered for the headboard, and pushed up to press his back to his husband's chest, feeling hands roaming all over him as they guided him backward onto stiff and needy heat. Feeling that flesh enter into him again made him gasp, and his back arched forward, fingers clenching into the red leather in front of him. One hand slid up from his hips to his stomach, moving further to his chest as lips went down onto his right shoulder. A gentle bite followed; enough to get his attention, but not enough to hurt at all. He looked over to see a coy smirk on his husband's face, with the added fun of a wink and a few huffed laughs against his skin.

Viktor's hands slid down again, fingers pressing into the grooves where his partner's legs bent, pulling those hips back against his own. He started rolling forward into them, pushing as far inside as he could go with each rhythmic push. Hearing his spouse's breathy grunts spurred him on, especially as each thrust made him lose the strength to hold himself up. Soon, he saw Yuri press the top of his head to the leather, one hand still holding onto it as the other went down between his own legs. Though he couldn't see, he could feel his spouse's self-stroking as fingertips reached down low and brushed against his legs. That just wouldn't do. Viktor leaned towards the left side and pulled his husband up again, sticking his head under that arm as Yuri's thin frame backed up against his shoulder.

"V-Viktor...?"

"I want to see~!"

Yuri's face went right red, but he wouldn't deny his partner the show he wanted, and once he'd balanced himself out again, he started moving his right hand again. It was odd to feel eyes so intently on him stroking his own arousal, but knowing how much his husband liked to watch him do it spurred him on.

Viktor did his best to match the pace, but the odd way he was bent and tilted made that a bit difficult. As though Yuri had thought the same thing, Viktor felt the younger man pull off of him, and in blur, had turned around in front of him, nudged him backward, and followed after to straddle over his hips. He was completely transfixed, watching his perfect husband guide him back into its warm, wet place, lowering down to sit flush against his skin. Sultry brown eyes were gazing down at him, and Yuri licked his lips.

"You can watch better if I'm in front of you."

"Wow~!"

Finding a bit of courage, and tapping into those vast reserves of his Inner Eros, Yuri did his best to please his partner. As he rocked his hips, he slid his hand up and down his own flesh, slowly gasping each vocal breath as his own senses were excited. Electricity flowed through him; every ridge of his husband's member moving inside him, every tug on his own, drove him further forward to the edge. He went on as long as he could, feeling the hips under him starting to help, until it was all he could do to hold himself up. He dipped his head down and tried to catch his breath, letting his own arousal go, seeing it twitch slightly with every heartbeat through it.

Viktor slid his hands up his partner's thighs, thrilled and impressed by the whole sight of the younger man's display. Moving his hands back down again towards Yuri's knees, he pressed up onto his elbows, and then scrunched up his core to sit up the rest of the way, hugging his husband tight, "You are so incredibly hot. I'm an exceedingly lucky man to be the only one on this earth who gets to see it."

Still catching his breath a little, Yuri lifted his head and smiled tiredly, "I wish...I could control it better...so I could go on longer for you..."

"Every second is precious." Viktor mused, squishing their faces together as he pulled the man down over his chest, "One of these days, I'm going to get to watch you do it when we aren't already in the middle of sexy time."

Yuri pushed up slightly, putting them nose to nose as he gave quite the embarrassed look, "...What...you mean you want me to just whip it out when we're watching television one night and stroke off?"

"Sure." Viktor grinned widely, "Would you?"

"Would you?"

"Absolutely." He laughed, starting to rock his hips again, pushing slowly upward into his husband's heat, "If I didn't think I'd traumatize you somehow."

Yuri groaned loudly as he dropped his head down again, much to his husband's amusement. As the upward thrusts increased and got faster, he moved his arms under the Russian's neck, clinging to the man's head, crying out quietly with each hesitant gasp. He pressed his forehead down to those silver bangs, opening his eyes just enough to see the blue looking back at him. One particular thrust hit him just right, and a loud cry escaped him. Hands went down to the blankets on either side of his partner's head, and he pushed up frantically, feeling loose strands of his hair swaying past his face with each new push.

With the intensity of the feeling getting stronger and stronger with each passing second, the pair redoubled their focus. When Yuri started lowering down again, losing that renewed strength in his arms, loose hair tickling Viktor's skin, Viktor sat them both up. He reached aside to grab for one of the stiffer pillows in the pile, and made the motions for his partner to lay down over it, quickly climbing over top of him once he was there. With the pillow keeping Yuri's back end upward, Viktor slid in easily again, and wedged his hands and arms under the younger man's stomach to keep him close as he started to move. Vocal gasps became whimper, cries, whimper again, reluctant moans into the sheets, and desperate hands reaching forward to clamber for anything within reach. Viktor knew he was pressing against that perfect spot when he saw his husband's reaching hands pull back again, and every muscle in the man's body started to tense up. Every fiber of his being wanted to make that feeling last as long as possible, slowing down to focus on kissing his husband's back and shoulders for a little while, then rolled his hips again.

Yuri twisted around, pushing Viktor away until they were both on their sides, and he could wrap his arms around that same pillow that had held him up a moment before. His right leg was lifted by a hand behind his knee, and the thrusts picked up again. Between desperate gasps, and an arched back, Yuri reached around to grip the side of his husband's hip, as though trying to slow him down as he neared the edge. It didn't do much though, and he could tell that Viktor was getting close as well, trying his best to time the end to be in tandem. He felt the hot breaths behind his shoulder, and Viktor's hands pressed against his chest, holding him in place as those thrusts hit their fever pitch. Yuri pulled his free hand back and held the one that was pressed over his heart, feeling those fingers curl around his own.

Just as Viktor pressed in hard, holding there, deep, Yuri felt the first of those strong electrical jolts that shot out through his entire body. He let go of the pillow with his other arm and reached down to take hold of himself, trying to ricochet the feeling from the front as well. Every muscle clenched, and his back arched tightly as soon as he touched it. Viktor held onto him, making sure he didn't just jump off, and pushed in hard again, slower, going just as deep as before. A gasped cry uttered behind his shoulder, and he felt the tremble of release against his skin, his own feeling prickly as the aftershocks of his climax shot through him.

They each did their best to catch their breath, even as Viktor continued his pushes at a slower pace. When he finally came to rest, they were heaving for air. Taking a few moments to get their wind back, Yuri twisted in place, daring not to pull off his husband's member. He could feel it still pulsing slightly inside him. He looked back over his shoulder, spotting a few wisps of silver hair, "...That...that was great..." He said between pants, his body still shaking slightly.

"Amazing...completely..." Viktor agreed, heaving his breaths against the younger man's back, "The best...so far..."

The seconds pressed on, and their breaths slowed as their lungs gathered what they needed to stop going so heavily. Viktor slowly let go, flopping to his back as the blackness of welcome sleep started to creep in. Yuri twisted in place to curl up against him, and settled in with his head on the front of one shoulder, hand coming up over his chest as one leg curled over his own.

"...So...who's...gonna get up to...turn the lights out?"

Viktor just closed his eyes and groped for the edge of the blanket, pulling it up over them both, "What lights?"

"...Ah...there they go... Night night..."

"That's what I thought..." He mused, turning just enough to wrap both arms around his husband's smaller frame, "Love you."

"Luvyu." Yuri managed to mumble, and drifted into sweet oblivion.
"Yuri, time to wake up." Mikhail's voice said, quiet but loud enough to be heard. He nudged the splayed-out teenager in the ribs, "Yuri!"

"Five more mi-"

"This was the five minutes. It's time to get up! The girls are coming out soon."

Yurio groaned, yawned, and felt the blankets get pulled right off him, leaving his lightly-clothed frame exposed to the colder air of the open room. Like a caricature of the living dead, he sat up stiffly at the waist, and looked around the living-space. Mikhail had already put away the extra bed and looked antsy to get the fold-out couch reset. Emerald eyes went down again with another yawn though, and Yurio examined himself instead.

Though he felt like his body looked the same as it always did, his mind's eye was making him think his feet and hands were cartoonishly big all of a sudden. He shook his head, and everything looked normal again, but it didn't make the nervous pit in his stomach go away. Instead of letting himself focus on it though, he reached for his phone, charging on a table nearby, and pulled it near. Instagram was lit with activity. Of course, the chatter was about someone who wasn't part of the European Championship, but that wasn't what surprised him.

'Viktor Nikiforov gives stark warning to Russia.'

'Former Russian Champion gives candid interview about leaving RSF.'

Yurio slowly blinked, and his eyes narrowed as he watched story after story slide by on his feed. All thought of his growth spurt seemed to vanish, and the hollow pit in his stomach was replaced with what felt like hot water splashing around his insides. He couldn't even look up as he felt Mikhail hoist him up to his feet by his shoulders, and just stood there in surprise, still staring at his phone as he heard the pull-out bed get folded and put back into place under the couch cushions.

"There we go." The elder huffed, dusting his hands off. He turned back to the teen, "What's gotten you so transfixed this early in the morning?"

"...Viktor did an interview yesterday." He answered, keeping his eyes down, "It was posted online late last night. By the way people are reacting, it sounds like he said a lot that no one expected from him."

"Do you have it?"

Yurio scrolled and clicked on a few links, "Yeah. It's here."

The rest of the small apartment's temporary tenants slowly made their way out as the video played, walking by curiously as the sound of the interview resonated from Yurio's phone. By the time it ended, everyone except Viktoria was looking over or around shoulders to see what was going on. She just shook her head and went to find her coat.

The very last line of the interview was only understood by the two Russians listening to it, and they side-eyed one another as the interviewing network's logo faded over the video before the screen went black.
"Did I miss the subtitles? What'd he say?" Minako wondered, "Was it bad?"

Mikhail rubbed his chin, elbow propped on Yurio's shoulder still, "He said Russia would regret what they did to him. I can't tell if that was supposed to be taken as a threat though?"

"He'd never make a threat so openly." Yurio huffed, crossing his arms, "He probably just means that he plans to win Gold for the JSF and that Russia would feel stupid for firing him."

"Apparently Viktor has an uncanny ability to make predictions about things." Minako pointed out, "Maybe he thinks there's something coming down the pipe."

"He's one of the best skaters in the world still. It could well be a self-fulfilling prophecy if he thinks he can keep winning." Mikhail shrugged, and moved his arm down to pat the teen on the back, "Go on and get dressed. We'll get some snacks before your FP practice and then get brunch after."

The blonde nodded and started moving off, setting his phone back down on the table before heading towards their luggage to find a change of clothes and go shower. Once he'd left the room though, Nikki let out the breath she'd been holding onto.

"Bit dramatic for first thing in the morning, innit, sweetie?" Mikhail mused, spotting his oldest daughter leaving through the front door at the end of the hall. He stepped off casually, offering a greeting-nuzzle to his lady love as he passed.

"I didn't even know an interview was out there," Nikki answered, holding up her own phone, "I guess it's cuz I only watch Cousin Viktor's personal page, not all the skating pages. Apparently him and his Yuri went to a really swanky party last night. She turned the device around in her hands, and showed off a photo of the pair in front of a wall of flowers, "See? Cute, right?"

"It was probably one of those Viennese Balls." Mikhail called back, sliding his arms into his black long-coat.

"How come we didn't go?" Minako huffed, crossing her arms and giving a daring look.

 "Cuz they start super late and run super late." He explained, buttoning the jacket up, "If Viktor just posted those pics a couple hours ago, it's probably because that was the first chance he had; on the way back to their hotel. We'd be super deceased if we tried to go to a ball like that while following a competition schedule."

 Minako's nose crinkled, "You and your logic."

 "I'll bet Cousin Viktor had to make plans for this pretty far in advance though." Nikki added, looking through the photos again, "Maybe even so far back that he was still part of the RSF at the time."

 "Viktor's nuts though." Yurio commented from the background, hand on the bathroom doorframe, "He used to go out drinking all night, wake up for practice, and then go back to bed, sleeping until right before he was supposed to perform."

 "That sounds reckless."

 "Not like he had any other responsibilities, less so here and now." Yurio shrugged, "I'll be done in a few."

"I'll be right back, too." Mikhail added, sticking his flat-cap onto his head, "There's some coffee made already if you want any." He explained, nudging his head towards the electric java-maker on the counter with a pot of hot black liquid in it. After adjusting his coat collar, he pulled the door open and stepped outside, heading into the cold winter morning air.

Looking around, Viktoria was nowhere in sight, but her tracks in the remaining snow gave her trajectory away easily enough. Jade eyes went to the sky for a moment, watching thick grey clouds starting to roll in, practically splitting the heavens in half, clear blue beyond it.

Looks like a cold-front coming through. Might only be a couple more hours before it starts to snow. The temperature's already quite a bit lower since yesterday.

Looking back down again, he started to follow the footprints that went to the B&B's back yard and pool area. That time of year, the pool was empty, but the picnic tables were still there, covered in what snow hadn't melted off of them the day prior. Viktoria was sitting on one of the benches, looking at her phone, half-oblivious to the sound of footsteps crunching their way closer to her.

"You've always been the quiet type," Mikhail started. He leaned down to brush off the crusty remnants of ice from the spot next to his daughter, and sat back against it, "Wise beyond your years, always observing...but I don't think you've ever walked off before."

"I'm just over it all." She answered stiffly, keeping her eyes down, "There's already too much stuff happening with us to add Viktor to it, too."

"We jumped into their world, honey." He tried to explain, "The whole reason we're here is cuz of him."

"We're here because of Yuri." She corrected, "Viktor isn't even a competitor this time. I don't get why everyone still has to make such a huge deal out of him. Oohh he did an interview! Whatever, I don't care."

"I know you don't..." Mikhail nodded, crossing his ankles as he stretched his legs out, "But he's pretty famous in these circles. These folks do care."

"I feel like we're getting swallowed up." Viktoria sighed, locking her phone before putting it into her coat pocket. She crossed her arms on the table and pressed her chin into them, "From the minute we get up to the minute we go to sleep, everyone's talking about him. How is it even remotely possible that with as much publicity as that guy gets, that you didn't know what he was doing all these years?"

"I never followed sports." He shrugged, "My focus was work, and you girls and Sergio."

"Hmph...in that order..."

Mikhail blinked, and smiled nervously, "Well, it's hard to show where my priorities were after your mother put me out. I did my best with the options I had."

"And now that you're around all the time, it seems like we're still playing second fiddle to something else." Viktoria shot back, "If it's not Viktor, then it's Yuri. If it's not Yuri, then it's some random homeless guy."

"...Asahi."

"I don't care. The only person who has a good excuse for getting so much attention from you is "Minako. I can accept being in second place to her. I can't accept being fifth or sixth after strangers."

"...I don't understand why you feel like that. Haven't I done everything I can to make this a soft transition? I found those tutors to work with your existing school curriculum, got you all those workstations..."

"It's not about the stuff, dad!" The silver teen protested, "I feel like you're just handing us off to be raised by an iPad or something! It's not the same as being with you."

"...It's going to take some time for everything to settle out. It's big change for me too, you know?" Mikhail sighed, looking at the toes of his shoes, "There was no chance to really ease into things. Things basically went from ambulance to airplane."

"My mom died in our house and no one knew for hours. Sergio then tried to keep it all under wraps because he didn't want you to come in and make changes. He got lucky in the end, and got to stay where everything's familiar. Nikki and I? We got dragged out by our ears and taken halfway across the planet." Viktoria growled, "We've been with you for what, a little over a month? I don't feel like we've spent more than a few days in any one location before we have to leave again. I'm just..." She lamented, words drifting. She buried her face into her folded arms, "...I'm just tired of moving around so much... Maybe Nikki's handling it better than I am, but I'm tired... Not just from jet-lag either... Jumping into the middle of these relationship problems that everyone seems to have, on top of all the competitive stuff... The drama is wearing me down..."

"...And this all just came to a head this morning because Yuri and I saw that Viktor did an interview...?"

"I don't care that he did an interview. I care that it seems like what he said in the interview is going to dominate the conversation for the rest of the weekend. We can't just be here for Yuri anymore. Viktor won't let us."

Mikhail stayed quiet for a moment, but then reached over to rub his daughter's back, "I know all these big changes are hard to process in such a short period of time, and it seems like I'm miles away even when I'm right next to you. Don't take it out on Viktor though. He was famous long before we came along."

"...I'm not mad at him directly." Vikki grumbled, brow furrowed as she stared forward at the snow stuck to the other side of the table, "He's just...a vector. A thing you focus on, in your weird, never-ending quest for his approval."

"...I don't focus on him that much, do I?"

Jade eyes shot a look at the elder, "You spent all weekend wondering what he was doing and how things were going in Russia, only to nearly have a coronary when his Yuri called you outta the blue. Yes, you focus on him too much."

"But Konstant-"

"I don't care. It was his choice to go out there."

"And it was dangerous."

Viktoria twisted in place and poked a finger against her father's cheek, "He's a grown-ass man who can do whatever he wants without other grown-ass men doting on his every move."

Mikhail's brow crinkled, but he didn't argue.
"We barely had mom, even though she was around... I don't want to do all that again with you..."
Viktoria went on, taking hold of his arm as she pulled her hand back, "But right now it just feels like...you might as well still be on the other end of a Skype call... Cuz your focus is miles away... I don't even really have my friends anymore, because they're all back in Canada...so I'm stuck following you around everywhere, even though I'm not really part of anything..."

Mikhail grit his teeth as those words cut deep, and he shook his head at himself.

"...If we have to keep doing this...can you at least be my dad while we're doing it?" Viktoria pleaded, "Not just my chauffer..."

"...Does Nikki feel like this, too?"

Viktoria shook her head and shrugged, snuffling a little from the cold as much as from the topic, "...I think she's distracted enough by Yuri and her online boyfriend that she can get by."

Mikhail's brain went two different directions, "...Online boyfriend...?"

"That guy Yuri knows. The one we saw in Detroit. She has a huge thing for him. Didn't you notice...?"

He could only snort a breath grimly, "...I knew they were talking but I didn't..." He started, only to pause and sink like a turtle into his jacket, eyes narrowed, "Mnhhh..."

"Relax..." The teen sighed, looking away again, "I don't think he's noticed."

Mikhail just grumbled again.

Viktoria pulled her father's hat away before the jacket's upturned collar could knock it off, "...I think...I'm gonna keep this for a while." She started, "I'll give it back when I think you've shifted gears."

Mikhail's eyes went up towards the empty space beyond his bangs, "...But now my head's naked..."

The hat just went up onto the teen's crown, "Better get to work then."

The elder sat up normally again and leaned forward on the bench, turning in place to extend his arms around his daughter's small frame, and pulled her into a hug, "I'll work hard. I promise to do better."
Once Yurio had (finally) finished washing - and he was made to completely dry his long hair, so as to avoid catching his death from a cold outside - the odd blended family stepped out into the cold morning, carrying an assortment of items with them. It didn't take too long for folks to notice the hat-switch, though no one was particularly sure whether to ask about it. Instead of dwelling on it though, they just dutifully followed Yurio the short distance to the rink. He'd even resurrected the black and red jester's hat from the Final, matching the black and purple Nikki had on.

Arriving at the venue, they went in through the front doors and followed the hallways that lead to Hall 3. Hall 2 was in use by the Ladies Singles, and the main area in Hall 1 by the Pairs and Ice Dancers.

"...How come everyone's practicing at once? It wasn't like this in Detroit or Moscow..." Nikki pondered, looking at the proverbial swarm as they made their way through, "These aren't even spectators...everyone's got a badge..."

"Euros is a competition for everyone, not just Seniors." Yurio explained simply, trying to watch where everyone was going, "The competition actually started 4 days ago."

"Ehh? Why!?"

"The Juniors all got their stuff out of the way early. The ISU breaks it down so the Seniors compete on the weekend. There's still a literal crap-ton of us though, so even if only the best 24 from the SP made it to the FP, we all need our ice time for practice." He answered, pushing the door open to get to the outdoor cross-over area between Hall 1 and Hall 3. He held it until Mikhail took over for him, keeping the panel outside as the rest of the family went through, then caught back up with his younger 'sister,' "Nationals were broken up the same way, but the Junior segment was held the following weekend rather than in sequential days, so that's why you didn't see any of them. We also only had some 17 or something skaters in my group, rather than over 30, so there wasn't as much need for time. The Final in Detroit was only the top 6 in each group, which made it really easy."

"Oh... So then this place is super crowded because there's 75-ish sets of competitors here all at the same time."

"Basically." He nodded, reaching for the handles of the next set of doors; the ones that led through the small café above the rink. Like before, Yurio held the door open until another set of hands took his place and he moved on.

"Papa said he met you at the World Championships last year. What's that like?"

"Same as here, plus a few extra. It's still only the top 24 that make it to the Free Skate though."

"...There's way more countries to represent at Worlds though. How are there only the 'same' number of entries?"

"Oh, Worlds qualifications is based on how well each country did the previous year. Whoever won Gold last year gets to bring 3 competitors this year, 2 for Silver, 1 for Bronze."

Nikki made a face, "...So then how do countries who don't medal get to skate ever?"
"Podium placement just guarantees representation the next year. People who score well enough can still qualify without it."

"Oh okay."

Yurio opened the last door to get to the rink, passing by a number of people who were waiting in the small restaurant. The noise of the practice below resonated through the small group as they made their way out into the stands. For another 20 minutes or so, it was a chaotic sort of freestyle warm-up to whoever wanted to be on the ice, but after that, the official practice warm-up would begin. Yurio spotted the placement coordinator near the entrance in the rink-wall, and turned to the rest, "I'm gonna go find my spot."

"We'll just find somewhere to sit." Minako answered, taking the half-emptied backpack as the blonde removed his skates from it.

Nikki pondered a moment before giving chase, and hopped down the stairs a few paces behind, waving off her father's call to be careful and keep in their sights. Once she'd caught up though, she looked out into the rink at all the other competitors who were already out there. Chris was easy to spot, sticking out brilliantly in his scarlet track-suit, but he was the only person other than Yurio that she recognized.

Yurio himself had his arm elbow-deep in a tubular sack, rummaging around for something as the coordinator held onto the edges of it. When he withdrew his hand again, he held a token with the number 12 on it, and handed it to the man holding the bag up, then turned back to his silver sibling, "How come you're down here? You'll be by yourself."

"Oh, are you going out right away...?"

"There's a while till this thing officially starts. I was going to try and get my bearings."

"...Does it really feel that bad?"

Yurio blinked at her, and glibly looked aside, "...It's...probably mostly in my head. I've been dreading this day for a year and a half. It couldn't happen at a worse time."

Nikki immediately stuck her mittened hands on the Tiger's face, forcing him to look at her again, and she smiled brightly, "You're gonna win anyway!" She explained happily, "You got thrown off yesterday cuz it was the first time you'd skated in your costume since Nationals. Going into the competition tonight, you'll already know what to expect. We'll get some mole-skin stickies so you don't have to wear two pairs of socks, and free up some boot space for your feet. Your other outfit is also pretty loose, too, so you may not even notice the same tightness that you felt in the one from yesterday."

Yurio just blinked at her from behind his squished cheeks, "...Maybe..."

"Nice headgear, Plisetsky." Chris teased as he glided by.

Nikki looked over in surprise, but suddenly felt her 'brother' pulling loose, and saw both of his skates get hurled into the rink like a deadly knife-boot snare. Chris' legs got caught up and he toppled over comically, landing face-first with his arse in the air, smoke fizzling out above his head in frustration.

"THAT'S WHAT YOU GET FOR MAKING FUN OF MY HAT, JACKASS."

Mikhail looked out to the commotion in the rink as the hapless 'victim' of the skate-flail started to untangle himself from the laces, getting teased by other skaters who passed by. He shook his head,
"Can't leave that one alone for five minutes." He huffed, and turned back towards his lady love, watching as she sat down and took the big white and blue thermos that Viktoria had been carrying. "You guys want to snack now or wait?"

"I could nibble a bit," Minako answered, trying to get the grooved twist-lid off the thermos. Once it came free, and Mikhail slung off the small pack from his shoulder, she poured some of the contents into the cup that she'd popped off the canister. It was just hot cocoa, but in the cold of the rink and winter weather, it was a welcome warmth. She smelled its aroma before passing the thermos over to Viktoria, "I don't normally drink stuff like this but it's really appealing now for some reason."

"You've expanded your horizons beyond beer, starlight." Mikhail teased, pulling out a white paper bag from the small backpack, "Croissant? Egg-biscuit?"

"Didn't you bring those cheesy pigs-in-a-blanket?"

"Yeah, here." He answered, reaching deeper into the bag to pull out the individually-wrapped snack, "You want one, Vikky?"

"I'll get the egg-biscuit thing."

Another foil-wrapped breakfast snack was handed off, and Mikhail finally took his own seat.

"How's your back been doing on the roll-away bed, hun?" Minako wondered, peeling back the wrapping from her food, "I don't think the girls would mind switching around sleeping arrangements if you want to be in the bedroom. Right?" She turned to Viktoria next to her, "Better just one bed-mate than two."

"Just as long as it's Nikki and not that one." She nudged her head at Yurio, who was sliding across the ice in his sneakers to get his blades back, only to find that it wouldn't be so easy as Chris started to get his revenge; skating away from him with boots in-hand.

"What's wrong with him?" Minako wondered.

"He's a boy." The teen and her father both said in tandem.

"Oh, right. I thought you were worried that he snored or sleep-walked or something." Minako said tepidly, only to look back at Mikhail, "But, there you have it. The girls will get the pull-out bed in the couch, Yuri can have the roll-away, and you can come sleep with me."

"Almost sounds like you're trying to get used to the idea of married life," The elder Russian teased, making the ballerina's face go red, "Practicing for when we get the house?"

"Th-that's not even why I thought about it."

"Ah, you just want an excuse to use your torture-mitts on me then."

"Pfft." She scoffed, "As if I need to find an excuse. I can lay you out anywhere."

"Keep it Rated G, would you?" Viktoria interjected, giving them both a judgy but teasing look, though they laughed anyway.

"I'm being entirely innocent." Minako insisted, "I just miss my cuddle buddy."

Mikhail's face was the one to go red then, "...I...don't think I've ever been called that before."

"...Really?"
"Ahh...my late ex-wife wasn't one for nicknames." He explained hesitantly, wary of Viktoria's reaction on Minako's other side, "That was more my thing...cuz it's a Russian thing..."

"Russians do nicknames?"

"Oh for sure," He nodded, "Like when Yakov would call Yuri 'Yuratchka,' it's a pet-name based on his real name. Same with 'Vitya.' Then there's whole dictionaries just for the silly things lovers call each other. Tat and I had our own that our parents called us, but they weren't as refined."

"What'd they call you?" Viktora wondered curiously.

"...Er...well, in English it's like...'my little chickens' or 'my darling potatoes.'" Mikhail answered nervously.

Both ladies were choking back laughter.

"We were four. It was okay back then." Mikhail insisted, feeling his phone vibrating in his pocket. Feeling a bit of relief for the potential escape, he reached for the device and looked to see who was calling, "Oh...it's Yuri's parents."

PFFT. Hot chocolate blew out like fine mist.

"Yuri's parents!?" Minako started, trying to find napkins to wipe her face, "How do they even have your cell number!? We practically went running from his mother, and we never even met his fath-

"Not that one. Viktor's Yuri's parents. The Katsuki clan."

"...Oh." She deadpanned severely, "What do they want...? It's practically mid-day for them by now."

"Yeah, they must've been waiting until now to call. Hold on, I'll find out." He said, sliding his thumb across to answer, "Mushi mushi." (Greetings.)

Both sets of eyeballs were watching curiously, wondering what was being said on the other end. They watched the man's face for a reaction, but he seemed aware of it and went stony just in case.

"...No, I haven't. Why?" He asked, pausing to let the answer come, "...I see. How long have you known?" Another pause, and he nodded, "That's fine. No, I'll figure it out. Thanks for letting me know."

"That didn't sound good." Minako commented quietly, "What's wrong?"

Mikhail clicked the screen to disconnect the call and put his phone away again, "Asahi left."

"...Eh?"

"Mama Katsuki doesn't know when it happened. Her and Toshiya just kind of realized they hadn't seen him or Hana in a while. They went to check if he was just hiding in his room, but they found it had been emptied of his things, and the key was left in the lock."

"...That...doesn't make any sense." Minako said, dumbfounded. She turned her gaze down to the rink, too stunned to keep her head craned to the side, "...I thought he was doing okay."

Mikhail grumbled, "I should've had someone there watching him. I should've expected he'd use this chance to get out while we were too far away to stop him."

"Why would he leave though?" Minako wondered, "He was supposed to train with me and Yuri."
The whole point of him being in Hasetsu was because he had nowhere else to go and no other resources. Where is he going to go...?

"Well, he has resources now...the ones Viktor and his Yuri helped him acquire." The elder Russian explained, slouching a little in his seat. He glanced aside, past Minako's stunned expression, looking to Viktoria. She slumped back into her own seat and huffed quietly. He could see the subtle crinkle of her brow by looking at how her eyes narrowed slightly, but it was only because he knew what to look for.

"It's no use... I half-expected this would happen. Asahi's his own person and can make his own choices. He...he knows the risks, doesn't he? He's been sheltered for most of his life, and super naïve-

Mikhail clenched his eyes for a second and shook his head, and pushed to sit up straighter in his seat.

No... He's not my responsibility.

"I'll check on him later. I'm sure he's fine. He complained about feeling like a burden so it's no surprise that he bolted."

"He's never been on his own though." Minako half-protested, "What if he does something stupid?"

"We all learned how to get on in the world, one way or another, at some point or another. Plus, he has Hana to think about. She's counting on him to be responsible for her." Mikhail offered, reaching over the narrow arm-rest between their seats to pat the woman's knee reassuringly, "He's near as old as Viktor though. He can't cling to anyone's apron anymore."

"...I hope you're right. The things he said in Osaka..."

"...He made it through that, and confronted a lot of his demons already. Sudden as it is, this is the logical next step." He said simply, "We'll just...see if he can handle being treated like an adult. No more training wheels."

Minako reluctantly nodded, and let out a sigh, "I still think he's vulnerable... And what do we tell Yuri? They were starting to become friends..."

"No sense worrying him about it now."

"...I guess so..."

Mikhail nodded, and leaned aside to kiss the edge of his partner's shoulder. Beyond her, Viktoria seemed to relax a little, letting out a whisper of a sigh of relief before going back to the breakfast snack she'd been nibbling on.
Though no alarm had been set, the whining of hungry dogs was enough to act as a substitute. Since only Makkachin had the height to get up onto the bed though, the focus of the begging was on Viktor, and one fuzzy brown arm reached forward to tap rough paw-beans against the Russian’s frame. A few pats and a clear whine roused him enough to roll over, peeling himself off his husband’s frame, and gave the poodle a head-scratch to simmer him down for a few moments. Jiro squeaked a bark, but Viktor shushed him with a finger to his lips, and the small Akita settled to a much-quieter pup-mutter.

Sleepily reaching for the nearest phone, Viktor checked the time, seeing that it was just after noon. Eyes moved up to spot both dogs being antsy at the door, and despite his haze, Viktor resigned to getting up. With hair disheveled, he rummaged around quietly for something warm and comfortable to wear before hooking both dogs up to their harnesses and leashes, and took them outside.

The park behind the hotel was fairly empty, Viktor noticed. Bleary blue eyes scanned the frozen lake, spotting those same swans from the days prior, though now they’d found a patch of cleared water to wade in. The sight of them brought a smile to the sleepy Russian's face, and sat back on the park bench that he’d found Yuri using that first morning. Like then, Makkachin ran roughshod through the snow, leaping and darting over as much space as he could cover. Viktor cut Jiro loose, and the wary puppy started rooting around nearby, but soon got caught-up in Makkachin’s contagious joy and started chasing after him.

"Feeling a bit more confident since that first adorable nope on the bridge back home, huh?" Viktor teased, catching the Akita's attention for a moment, "Guess you're starting to realize you come from a long line of mountain dogs. Your ancestors fought bears, you know?"

Jiro quirked his head as he glanced back, barked, and then jumped awkwardly before trying to catch up to his big poodle brother. The sight of it made Viktor laugh, and he settled in to let his two fuzzy sons burn off some energy for a while.

Everything feels so much lighter now... He thought, looking up into the sky, Even though it's getting cloudy, the snowstorm that's coming kind of feels like a welcome thing. The kind of weather that makes one want to snuggle up with a loved one in front of a fire, make s'mores, and sip on hot chocolate. Or in our case...maybe fine a fancy Viennese cafe and sip on coffee, admiring the work of latte foam art made by the baristas, while we watch the snow fall from wall-length windows.

Makkachin rushed by Jiro, getting as close as he dared so as not to get caught, and ran wide circles to come back around. He paused after one big turn and went down on his chest, tail wagging and tongue hanging, steam panting from the dog's mouth. Jiro rushed to catch up, but Makkachin just jumped clear over the little Akita and took off again.

Viktor pulled out his phone after a while and recorded a short video of the dogs' antics, getting some good footage of their snow-play before turning the phone around on himself. He put a finger over his lips and winked at the camera, "Letting our sons run loose for a bit to let off some steam while hubby gets some well-deserved rest. See you all tonight at the Euros Free Skate. Ja ne~"

He clicked the recording off and made his way to the 'Pups of Nikiforov' page to upload it. By the time is finished, Viktor knew it was time to wrangle the dogs back up and head inside. With one good whistle, Makkachin's ears lifted off his head at attention, and he let Jiro catch him before herding the puppy towards their human. The two eagerly followed after Viktor's lanky legs, not even needing their leashes reattached to know to trail him back into the Arcotel.

Softly and quietly, Viktor opened the door to the room, and the two canines tippy-tapped inside. The door gently closed after, and Viktor was pleased to find that Yuri was still out cold, nearly still in the same position as he'd been left in, even though it had been almost 45 minutes. Viktor did his best to put food and water down without making so much noise, and despite the rattle of kibble in metal bowls, Yuri stayed blissfully asleep.

Within a few minutes, Viktor was able to disassemble from most of his clothes, and climbed back into bed with just a t-shirt and sweat-pants remaining. Blankets were pulled up and then back over again, and the Russian's cold frame cozied up to the heat of Yuri's toasty-warmth.

A soft quiet fell over the room as the two pups finished their breakfast, and Viktor let himself drift into a dozing snooze, listening to his partner's easy-going and long breaths. It got even easier when Yuri rolled onto his back, and Viktor could set his head down on the man's chest. Listening to that slow rhythmic heartbeat lulled the Russian into sleep again for a little while. It was impossible to know how much time had passed when he drifted awake again, but he could see that Makkachin and Jiro had curled up on a seat-cushion for a mid-day nap, and were well-asleep.

Viktor turned his attention back to his husband's slumbering frame. He knew intuitively that it was probably close to 2pm by then, and so waking Yuri up wouldn't be the cruelest thing he could do. To blunt the devastation of being made to rouse him, Viktor decided to go about that delicate task in a way only he could.

Soft whispers of kisses were placed on Yuri's brow, moving slowly down to cheek, neck, and collar-bone. Keeping himself propped up on his left side and elbow, Viktor slid his right hand over his husband's bare frame, softly sweeping across velvet skin as the younger man's body disappeared under the blankets. It wasn't long before Viktor himself vanished under them, too, trailing kisses down Yuri's chest and stomach. In the darkness under the sheets and comforter, the Russian followed the contours of his partner's athletic but relaxed core, past the naval, and eventually found what he was after. He gently pressed his lips to the tip of that hot length of flesh, finding it half-aroused in the midst of its normal slumbering practice.

Yuri mumbled something, but seemed to still be asleep, turning his head over on the pillow. Viktor smiled as he gently nibbled his way down the length of the member, doing his best to bring it fully to attention. Once he got to the base of it, small kisses became sucks and licks, and he moved slowly back to the tip again, lathing his warm, wet attention over every inch. By the time he got to the end of it, Yuri had roused enough to gasp slightly, tilting his head back into the pillow. Confused at first at the feeling of it all when he'd just woken up, Yuri's arms curled up over his chest, and he sucked in a sharp breath. Hands moved up over his face, rubbing over it in an effort to wake up a little more, slowly becoming aware of what was going on, "V-Vik...tor..." He gasped, crying out a bit louder in surprise as he vibration of a hum against his skin resonated through him like the song of a newly-struck tuning-fork. Whatever had been going on before he woke up, it had been enough that the big lump under the blankets started bobbing slowly up and down, and Yuri felt the wet heat engulf him. He squeaked another gasp as his frame tightened in surprise, one knee bending up under the blankets. His back arched when he felt fingers come up under him, massaging and kneading the squishy and more delicate bits between his legs.

Every twitch of his husband's muscles made Viktor smirk as he continued at his task, licking and sucking and nibbling and kissing with all his focus. Yuri's hips started to roll slightly under his attention, and he felt a hand come down over his head through the blankets, grasping gently but eagerly. Still leaning against his left arm though, Viktor couldn't reach for anything but what was in front of him. To remedy that, he momentarily left the aroused flesh alone, and pushed up onto both his hands to slide his entire frame over and between his husband's legs under the blankets. He could see the light from outside come into that dark space, but he lowered down again to close the gap, and hooked his elbows over the crook of his husband's hips and thighs. Both hands free now, he slid them forward over his partner's waist, moving them up over the man's stomach until his fingertips poked out from under the sheets.

Yuri huffed a laugh at the sight of them, but quickly returned to his breathy gasps and quiet moans, feeling the long hot lick from his root to tip. His fingers and toes flexed and curled with the growing intensity, and he reached to find the hands that were roaming over him under the blankets. When he found them, they clasped his fingers in return, and for a moment, Viktor paused in his focus to come up for air.

With a ruffle and a wiggle, the silver-haired head popped out from under the blankets, and Viktor smirked at the face looking back at him, "...Happy morning-afternoon-time."

"Vik...tor..." Yuri gasped, pulling one hand back to try straightening out the blanket-mussed hair. He moved a few erratic silver strands out of the way and saw those clear blue eyes behind them. With his focus allowed to wander, Yuri realized something he hadn't before, "...Oh...I can feel your clothes...? Did you get dressed?"

"Only to let the kids out for a bit." Viktor explained, rising up enough to lean forward and offer a greeting kiss, and another, "I came back to bed for a small nap, and when I woke up again, I wanted to surprise you, so I went about a certain business to get your attention."

"Oh you have it."

"That's perfect then~" He laughed, giving another kiss before moving back down again, pecking a few more kisses to his husband's chest as he went, and disappeared under the blankets once more.

Yuri quirked a brow, tilting his head in an effort to see, but Viktor was gone quick and had gone back to his work so quickly that he didn't even blink first. He gasped in surprise and fell back down to the pillow, feeling his partner's eager efforts sliding up and down on hard and needy flesh. Viktor's nigh-professional efforts brought him to the edge rather quickly after that, and both hands went up to comb through his own hair, elbows pressed together above his face. Fingers clamped down as fireworks started sparking in his core, legs pressing against the Russian's form, getting tighter with each suck. Knees rose up so high by the end that they lifted the blanket, and he got to watch his husband handiwork through a gap in the folds. His eyes clenched shut though as those fireworks burst out, sending hot fire through every limb, to the tips of fingers and toes and to every hair on his head.

Viktor kept on going though, easing off only slowly, feeling the waves of clenching and relaxing muscles all around him. Listening to his partner's cries and gasps was the ultimate reward, and the subtle twitches of skin and the limbs under it as Yuri was desperately trying to catch his breath. He came out from under the covers to admire his achievement, sliding up further between the younger man's legs until he could press his elbows down against Yuri's sides, holding his chin up in the palms of his hands, "Sounds like you enjoyed it." He mused, meaning into the left palm as he let his right hand slide over his husband's chest.

"I don't...know how you...do that so well..." Yuri said between breaths, arms splayed out across the wide mattress.

"I did promise to get better at it just for you. I'm glad I'm doing it to your liking."
Yuri just made a face at the ceiling, "...I...need to step up my game then..."

Viktor laughed and pushed up on his hands, gazing down on his spouse's perfect form, "You're only about a year into this. Give yourself more time. There's still a lot you should be allowed to get used to at your own pace."

"...I guess so..." Yuri answered, his voice a quivered gasp as those jolts still shot through him. He managed the strength to put his elbows down and push himself up a little, but Viktor had to help him the rest of the way, hugging around his lower back to pull him closer. Yuri nosed the man fondly, letting his arms dangle behind the Russian's back, and offered his own kiss. "Thanks for being patient with me."

"It's absolutely worth it." He answered easily, "It means I get to enjoy your innocence a while longer this way."

"...I think I just fell in love with you all over again."

"Really~?"

Yuri leaned in again for an Eskimo kiss, "Absolutely."

The shower was hot and steamy, and especially soothing to tired muscles from the exertion of the day before. Yuri rinsed the conditioner from his hair, lifting his face up towards the corners of the tub space, and opened his eyes as the hot water rushed through his hair. For a moment, he just looked up, and savored the feeling of the wet rushing down his body. He closed his eyes again though and combed his fingers through his hair, leaning back under the spray to finish rinsing.

As he came back out into the main room, toweling his hair as he went, he spotted Viktor on the bed in another of the same white bathrobes provided by the hotel. Viktor had his MacBook Air open and was clicking through something online.

"More picture galleries from Instagram?" Yuri wondered with a huff, sitting on the edge of the bed.

"Mh." The Russian nodded, "Most of these are from your time in Seniors, but there's a few from Juniors popping up."

"...I have a small confession to make."

Viktor looked up immediately, "...Eh?"

Yuri ruffled the towel against his hair a bit more, but then turned to sit properly on the bed, and crossed his legs, "...Last night, when we were dancing our disco, and later our tango..." He started, looking down at his hands where they'd folded over his lap, "...I didn't think much of it at the time, but for some reason, it all felt really familiar. Like déjà vu almost."

"...Okay...?" Viktor said weirdly, confused.

"Does...this pose mean anything to you...?" Yuri wondered, cheeks getting slightly pink in his embarrassed wonderings. He brought both arms up, curled his small and ring fingers under, and stuck the others out, bringing them both up on either side of his head, elbows up.

Viktor deadpanned him with an awkward smile, "...Well, uh...sure... It's the 'bull' you did in Sochi... I was your matador. I used my suit jacket." He explained, "...I showed you pictures of all that... you're probably just remembering that because the dancing reminded you of the slideshow."

"...I thought that too at first, but I'm... seeing it from my point of view, not from the photographer's." Yuri retorted, bringing his arms down again as he went deep into thought, "...I remember this odd dance-shuffle that we did... We practically did a tango back then... right?"

"...Well... yeah..." Viktor answered, more hesitantly than before. He pushed up from his lazy lounging position and sat up a bit straighter, a concerned look on his face, "Even though you were drunk as a skunk... you still danced sure-footed. You pulled me in pretty quick with your moves..."

"...I... feel like I'm remembering... how easy it was to follow you..." Yuri added, "It was like we'd practiced before... because we were so in-sync..."

"But we'd never even really spoken before that night."

Yuri closed his eyes and rubbed his wet hair with both hands, "... I feel like I'm right on the edge of something... like a word on the tip of my tongue that I just can't speak..." He looked up, brow furrowed, "... What am I trying to remember...?"

Viktor looked on nervously, "I'm not sure. A lot happened that night. Do you remember the striptease with Chris...?"

Yuri's face went bright red, "... Oh man... I think I do..."

"How about the dance-off against Yurio...?"

"... I... think so...?"

Viktor pushed the laptop lid down and put the whole thing aside, hoisting himself over to sit cross-legged in front of his partner, and took the man's hands in his own, "What about after all that? After you hugged me and told me I should be your coach... anything...?"

"... Is there something that happened that you're trying to make me think of...?"

"Well, I'm just..." He started, shaking his head, "I mean, if you do remember... that'd be pretty great, wouldn't it? All the things we did that no one caught on camera..."

"The stuff you talked about when we were in Detroit..."

"You told me all about Hasetsu, in so much detail that I could find Yu-Topia without knowing the address..." Viktor explained, feeling his heart race, "... Does anything ring a bell...?"

Yuri wracked his brain, trying desperately to follow the vague memories through the fog of the alcohol that had enshrouded them.

"... I told you back then that I'd come." Viktor said suddenly, stopping the memory in its tracks, "I said, after the season was over, I'd find you, just like you asked me to. I just... After the night ended, and when I saw you again the next morning, and you didn't remember a thing... I thought the offer was off the table. I wanted to find you at the next competition, but you never came..."

Yuri gave a thousand-yard stare, making the silver feel like he was being looked through instead of at.

"... Do you remember that?"

He shook his head, eyes still wide, but his face lowered and Yuri stared at his husband's hands where
"...What's wrong?" Viktor asked tepidly, "You look like you just got punched in the gut."

"...I..." Yuri stammered, "...I remember...but... Not that..."

Silver brows crinkled in confusion, "...I don't understand. What do you remember?"

"...The...things you just said...right now... Oh my god..."

"Yuri, what is it?"

Yuri lifted his head again, but fear and shame were written on his face, "...I...I told him the s-same thing..."

"...Hah?"

"A-Asahi..." He answered, voice quieter, "...The day he...asked me to go with him to Tokyo... It was all such a chaotic blur...he was saying things so fast... I d-didn't know what to say, so I just agreed to everything, thinking I could sort it out later..."

Viktor was giving a dubious look, but he held onto those hands reassuringly.

"It was practically in the same breath..." He went on, eyes starting to get wet as the memory broke loose, and the despair it wrought came with it, "I didn't even realize what had happened until after, and he was so happy...so I didn't... At the time..."

"Yuri, deep breaths... It's ancient history. Whatever it is can't hurt you anymore."

"I know, but I... No wonder he can't get over me... He's... He must be fixated on the fact that...he asked me to go out with him, and I said yes-

"Shh."

"I told him yes because I panicked and I didn't know what else to do, and he was just so happy; I'd never seem him smile like that before...he even laughed... I was so overwhelmed." Yuri explained hectically, "...I felt like I was just agreeing to something about Tokyo still, but as soon as I said I go there to train for Seniors, he instantly brought up the rest...and I just, I said... He said...he'd arrange it so we'd have the same dorm together, and it all got so out of control..."

"No wonder you kept your plans about the US secret." Viktor said quietly, rubbing his thumbs across his partner's fingers.

"Everything happened so fast..." Yuri said again, snuffling a little where he could feel his nose starting to run, "It didn't even really sink in what I'd agreed to until the next day, when he brought me a gift. I'd gotten myself worked up to tell him that I'd agreed to something I didn't really mean, and that I was sorry... I don't even remember what he got me anymore, but seeing him hand it to me, and just being so thrilled about it all... He suddenly hugged me, and I was just absolutely paralyzed..."

He said, holding tighter to the fingers that were curled around his hands, "And I remember feeling so wrong and...and horrible... I was so scared to tell him off after that, so I just... I avoided him... I ran away, back to Hasetsu... Made excuses to not be in Imari unless I absolutely had to be there... It was a miracle that I'd been trying to find somewhere outside Japan already for Seniors, because of everything happening with Yuko...and that Asahi was making trips to Tokyo for his own stuff... But by the time I got to Detroit, and escaped...I'd... I'd never actually told him that I never meant to agree to...being with him..."
Viktor offered a nervous smile, "Well, I guess that explains why he just abruptly asked if you're gay when we saw him at Nationals, rather than at least saying hi first..." He suggested, pausing for a moment as he felt his husband's hands starting to shake. He let go and reached forward, pulling the younger man into a hug, and leaned back against the cushioned headboard, "My love, don't let that memory bother you. I know it's hard to think about it after so long, but it really is ancient history. It's not your fault."

Yuri clung to his partner's bathrobe, burying his face against the man's chest, "I had _never_ been so freaked out by people touching me before then...but after that hug...I didn't want anyone _anywhere_ near me..." He explained, voice cracking from the stress of it, "I _kept people away, and forced_ them off, like Tess, when they got too close... It was like I was trying to keep _him_ off me all along..."

"Shh..." Viktor cooed, petting his partner's hair gently, "You don't have to feel bad about all that. You have the right to choose your relationships, and not be tricked into them. What he did was an ambush. Maybe he meant well, and got carried away, but he didn't take your feelings into consideration, and took advantage of your good nature. Just like he did at Nationals when he went after you."

"...I... I didn't realize how much I'd made myself forget... How deeply I'd buried that..."

"You don't always find what you're looking for when you go digging. Sometimes you find things that you can't predict. It's okay." He added quietly, rubbing his cheek across the top of his spouse's damp head, "You have nothing to be upset about. You did what you had to so you could get out of a situation that made you uncomfortable and scared."

"But what else is in my head that I don't know about?" Yuri asked, pushing up a little to look his partner in the eyes, "Is there anything _worse_ in there?"

"I think you'd have become a different person if something worse had happened." Viktor reassured, rubbing the man's back.

"...L...I always liked how it seemed like I'd found my soul-mate on the first try... What if... I mean, does this mean I didn't...? Does what happened back then..."

"It doesn't count." Viktor cut the thought off, "Not even close. Saito could've spent the last six years firmly believing that you and him were together, and it _still_ wouldn't count because you _didn't agree_. Does that make sense?"

Yuri hesitated.

"What we learned just now doesn't change anything. It just paints a clearer picture of things" Viktor went on, bringing up his other hand to rub his fingers across his husband's cheek, "We have a better understanding of what happened. That's all. You're still the same beautiful, kind natured person I fell in love with. I found you when you were ready, and you didn't run away."

Still holding quiet, Yuri looked down. Despite his furrowed brow though, and the sunken feeling in his stomach, he still managed his best attempt at a smile, "...Well, _except for that one time_..."

"What time?"

"...When you first got to Yu-Topia, and we'd gotten all your stuff to your room. You crouched down beside me, and took my hand, getting really close to me...saying to tell you about myself..."
Viktor blinked and looked aside, but then the light came on, "Oh yeah, you backed outta the room so fast...!" He laughed, hugging even tighter, "You can't blame me though...after dancing with me in Sochi, I didn't think you'd mind..."

Pulled so close, Yuri breathed a sigh of relief against his spouse's chest, and gripped the bathrobe a little tighter, "...You...helped me learn to trust again...to let people in..."

"And to relax, and like yourself."

"...You've done so much more for me than I even realized."

"And I'll keep doing that forever."

Yuri swallowed a lump in his throat, and looked up again, seeing the warmth in the eyes looking back at him. He could feel his own starting to water again, but this time for joy instead of regret. He found his smile, and pressed his eyes to his husband's neck, "Forever."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED SIX

At the corner of Schwarzenbergstaße and Kärntner Ring, the Café Schwarzenberg was tucked into the first floor of a five-story gothic white brick building. The same tall, rectangular, narrow windows that were set into the walls like dominos were facing out from each story above the first, with the café’s big wooden arches rounding out the ground floor. The front door was framed within one of those same arches, shielded by the elements by a long, extended, retractable awning, under which were a number of outdoor tables and chairs, with a few brave cold-loving Austrians enduring the winter chill with their coffees.

Within, the high vaulted ceilings with boxy wooden pillars between the windows, and the cozy booths beside them, and curtains above. Chandeliers hung from above, circles of crystal with smaller rings around the circumference like dazzling moons orbiting a brilliant golden-white Saturn. Beneath them were a row of small, paired rectangular stone-top tables, with four wooden hemi-circular chairs at each, upholstered in leather and metal studs. Small idyllic paintings hung on the walls, facing the pastry bar on the other side of the room. Under the curved glass, different slices of cake were lined on long display plates, marked expertly with their white name and price tags. Dark wooden walls decorated the back of the café, going around a corner to another section of the floor where a cozy nook came to form the front of the building. Bussing the little L-shaped facility were tuxedo-wearing waiters, drifting through like pleasant coffee-wraiths, moving between tables and chairs to clear and replace plates and cups with only a whisper to say they were there.

In a booth at the front of the café, sitting next to one of the store-front’s big windows, sat two particular world-class figure skaters. Beneath the table, licking at small bowls of whipped cream or nibbling on slices of ham, were their two dogs.

"Wow~!" Viktor sang, looking at the fancy lunch-spread in front of him; a plate of grilled pork tenderloin with oyster mushrooms and potato croquettes, a side of house bread with whipped butter, and a bowl of mixed-leaf salad. On the other side of the table, Viennese fried beef with onions and gravy, with roast potatoes and gherkin (small pickles,) and a bowl of the café’s famed clear broth soup with liver dumplings. Blue eyes trailed up from the lunch offering to the figure sitting in the seat opposite him, "What do you think? Yuri~!"

"This is great." He answered simply, reaching slowly for the small plate that held a butter-knife and fork over a napkin. A sudden growl from his stomach betrayed the serious look on his face, but that just made Viktor laugh a little.

"You've been so serious since coming out of the shower." He commented, pulling the salad in front of himself to start, "You're physically here but your mind's a thousand miles away."

"In Imari, I'm afraid." Yuri admitted sullenly, cutting up the fried beef into smaller pieces, "I just...have this persistent nagging feeling that I'm forgetting something important."

"Has anything else from the Sochi Banquet bubbled up?" Viktor wondered, hoping to keep things positive despite the theme, "You were pretty toasted at the time, but memories usually come up like movies...even if you don't know what's going to happen next, once you start remembering, the film plays on."

"...Some has." Yuri answered, looking at a morsel of the beef with an onion clinging to it, "I think I remember Celestino coming to get me... I think I argued with him?"
"Sure did. You were pretty convincing...but I suppose I have a slight bias."

Yuri's face flushed a little, "...Did I...try to tie myself to you somehow? With my necktie...?"

Viktor lifted his eyes up, and chortled a quiet laugh into his salad, "Yeah."

"Jeeze..."

"It would've worked," He went on, "But you tried to tie it around our torsos. If you'd tied our hands together instead..."

"I can't claim genius when under the influence."

"You put up a valiant effort."

"...I don't remember what you did though." Yuri admitted, finally putting the piece of beef into his mouth.

"I just kind of stood there, grinning like an idiot." Viktor answered, pouring a vinaigrette over his first course, and used a fork to mix it all together, "If I had any sense, I would've held onto you in place of the mismanaged necktie. Alas...I had none."

"Oh..." Yuri said quietly, brow furrowed a little.

"I was trying to go easy on you." The Russian explained, skewering his first bite of the mixed salad, "It was our first formal meeting and I'd been watching you since you came into the room. You didn't come happy. If I'd put an effort in to make Celestino leave you in my care, I'm afraid you might've regretted how you awoke the next morning."

"...Eh?" Yuri deadpanned him severely.

"Oh, I don't mean that it would've been naughty." Viktor mused, "But I imagine that even just being in my same room would've freaked you out. Your years-long habit of trying to get away from me was something of a running joke between Chris and I. I liked you, quite a bit, to the point where I was ready to agree to be your coach already, and had even tacitly agreed to find you in Hasetsu after Worlds like you'd suggested. I wasn't ready to scare you off so severely that you'd never show your face again. I thought I'd get you the next morning on the way out."

"...I only remember the migraine I had..." Yuri admitted grimly, "I only became aware of my surroundings again sometime long-after we'd been on the plane back to Detroit."

"Yeah, you drank like a fish, that's for sure."

"...How could I have forgotten that you'd agreed to come though? I mean, that should've been branded to my brain."

"Maybe I wasn't loud enough. Who knows?"

"What did you even say?"

Viktor looked up in thought, eyes squinting in the light as much as from concentration, "...I think you were actually still dry-humping me..." He started, making Yuri's face go bright red in humiliation, "But you'd looked up at me with that sad but hopeful drunken look on your face, tie around your head, no pants on... It was right after the video ended; the one I showed you right after the Final last year. I'd said something like, 'Yeah...sure, okay!' Then Yuriio had a bit of a fit, and I'd told him to not ruin the moment. I guess no one thought I was being serious at the time. You'd gone back to snuggling against my chest by then so I'm not even sure you heard me. I didn't bring it up again."

"...This is devastating..."

"See?"

Yuri sunk into his lunch for a few minutes, finishing the broth and liver dumplings and half the fried beef before pausing again. He tapped his fork against the cut-up bits that were still there, "...You said before that Chris was around for most of the night...what would he say happened...?"

"A hypersexualized exaggeration of the truth, just to see your face go red." Viktor answered with a small chuckle.

"...Yeah, you're probably right." Yuri sighed, "What about Yurio?"

"He'd complain about the gross display."

"...Celestino?"

"Uhhmmm..." Viktor looked up again, tapping a finger against his chin, "He actually wasn't around for everything. Once he saw that you were socializing, he kind of wandered off somewhere until it was ready to leave. I only remember seeing him again when he came to collect you."

"And I was sitting on your lap at that point, right?"

"Mh."

"...And you're sure I didn't do anything inappropriate...?"

"Other than dry-humping me in front of everyone?" Viktor teased, watching his husband's ears go red.

"Y-Yeah..."

"No, nothing worse than that. You mostly sat side-saddle on me."

"...Mostly?"

"Well, you straddled my knees at one point, and leaned forward with your hands on my thighs, but it's not like you slid forward."

"...Why was I doing that?"

"Ahhhh..." Viktor said as he thought back, eyes squinting again, "...I think it was the part where you were saying how perfect it was that Worlds was being held in Japan, because then we could go right to Hasetsu from there... You were talking all about how we'd take the train from Tokyo and that you'd show me the way to Yu-Topia, and all the things we'd see along the way. I think you'd forgotten that I'd said I'd go by then, or you never heard me in the first place, because the way you talked about it was like you were still trying to convince me."

"...All that was before I bombed at Nationals though..."

"Thinking back on everything," Viktor said a bit more seriously, "After the dream I had on the plane to Moscow...I'm convinced that if I'd tried to say something to you at the hotel check-out, you would've done fine."
"...Water under the bridge."

"I know. I just kind of feel a bit responsible for it."

"Why though? It's nowhere near your fault."

"I could've done more to cheer you up when I saw you." Viktor explained, "I truly regret that I didn't. Shot myself in the foot as much as I let you down."

"...Don't feel like that...please." Yuri insisted, looking up from his dour posture, "I let myself down. And besides...if I hadn't bombed out like I did, I may have never skated your 'Aria.'"

"...I guess that's true. You would've been too busy training on your own programs." Viktor nodded, "But...then you would've been able to go to Worlds."

"And you would've worked your magic on me there?" Yuri teased, trying to feel better.

"Oh, if I'd talked to you in the lobby in Sochi, I'm fully convinced that my dream is how it would've gone." Viktor explained affirmatively, "It's established head-canon now."

Yuri smiled and looked back down into his food, "I'm glad you're so sure of it. Your dream sounded pretty nice."

"You've said that I have an uncanny ability to make predictions. Maybe I was actually seeing an alternate reality. One where I'd done the right thing."

"You did do the right thing, Viktor." Yuri said pointedly, "It just came at a different time. You did still come and save me, and now we're here, in this moment, enjoying lunch at a fancy café in Vienna with our two sons."

Viktor glanced up, but then turned his eyes down again and laughed, "Yeah, you're right. We still made it. But...don't forget that you saved me, too."

"See? Then there's nothing to regret. We each made the right moves at the right time, and it all worked out in the end."

As lunch gave way to the after-meal coffee and dessert, the tuxedo-wearing waiters cleared the table and replaced the used dishes with new ones, laden with a small assortment of cakes and pastries. Two fancy coffees were brought out as well, one dusted by cinnamon over whipped cream, and another sprinkled with chocolate curls and almond bits. They each took a good long smell of their drinks, breathing in the sweet aromas, and had their first sips.

Viktor gave a happy sigh and leaned back against the booth, holding up his cup with both hands, "Vkusno~!"

"Oishi~!" Yuri agreed.

"I was just thinking about doing something like this earlier this morning." Viktor explained, taking another sip from his drink, "Thanks for indulging me. I know you want to get to the rink."

"Well, the rink isn't going anywhere..." Yuri answered, "I kind of like that we have a chance to take things a bit slower and just...relax."

"Right? Feels a bit weird to not be in a rush over something."
Yuri nodded in easy agreement, taking another sip as well. He felt a nudge against his knees though, and looked down from his cup to see two black eyes looking up at him from under the table. Jiro tapped his leg again before giving a gruff little puppy-whine. Yuri blinked, but then scooted out on the bench-seat, and stepped out just far enough to take a knee, "C'mere," He said, beckoning his Akita closer, and picked the pup up when he came. Makkachin watched closely, but was content to stay where he was, lying at the base of his human's seat, legs cast over him at an angle under the table. When Yuri stood up again, taking Jiro with him, he boop'd the little dog's nose...and then hesitated to take his seat again. Contemplating for a moment, Yuri then decided to sit on Viktor's same side, keeping Jiro on his lap as he scooted closer.

"Hey little buddy," Viktor greeted, giving the pup an ear-scratch before lifting that same arm across his husband's shoulders, "Welcome to the other side of the table, love." He mused, kissing the side of Yuri's brow, "What brings you over?"

"Just felt like it." He answered, sliding his hand down Jiro's back a few times. He watched his partner's free arm go across the spread to retrieve his coffee and saucer, bringing it closer for him to set it down again, "Thanks."

"My pleasure."

A little while passed in the quiet of that moment, with Yuri keeping his eyes down on the Akita on his lap. The pup seemed focused on him for some reason, watching him in spite of the movement of Viktor's arm reaching out across the table periodically, to sample at the different pastries and cakes that were on offer.

"He's feeling you out," Viktor said, pulling Yuri out of his almost trance-like stare, "He's sensing something."

"He's just looking for attention."

"Jiro could've looked for that anywhere. His eyes have been fixed on you for a few minutes though. I think he can sense you drifting again."

"...Drifting?"

"Back to where you were before," Viktor said simply, "I tried to pull you out by having you focus on Sochi, but you didn't stay with me there for long."

Yuri sighed the breath that he'd been holding, and looked down again, "...I didn't even notice."

"Why are you so worried?" The Russian wondered, "What compels you back to Imari?"

"...I...can't help it." Yuri answered quietly, trying to hug his puppy, but not so much that Jiro would start to squirm, "I..." He started again, the words stumbling as they came forward. He shook his head and leaned a bit into his husband's side, "I feel safe. But...I'm scared anyway, and I don't know why."

"Do you think there's more you've forgotten?"

"...I guess so." He said, nodding a little as he massaged one hand around Jiro's shoulders, "For some reason, I'm not thinking so much about Imari as I am about...something you said..."

"...What'd I say that's bothering you so much?" Viktor turned his head in dubious wonder.

Yuri hesitated, and reached his hand forward for the finger-loop on his coffee cup, though he didn't lift it yet, "...Back in Osaka, right before I told you what Asahi had done..." He started reluctantly, "You were trying to figure out what it was...and you asked if he'd raped me."

Viktor didn't say a word in answer. He lifted his own drink back to his lips and held the ceramic there against them, staring past the melting whipped cream to the booth on the opposite side of the table.

"...What if I'm blocking it out? What if-"He didn't." Viktor said firmly, "Trust me on that much. I only thought of it in the moment because I considered that you might still be in shock. Enough time has passed though and I can safely tell you that you don't act like someone who's been attacked that way. Not in Osaka, and not in Imari either."

"...But the way I kept everyone away from me. The way I freaked out about a simple hug, and our toy... Stupid things that shouldn't make me feel so bad but did anyway."

"My love, a lot of people have anxiety about stuff like that. You've told me all about the body image problems you had growing up, being taunted by Nishigori over your weight, being rejected by the girl you liked for the guy that tormented you. Finding out, on top of it all, that your friend wanted more from you than you were willing to give...and then to be tricked into it anyway..."

Yuri pulled his finger free from his cup, and set it down on his partner's leg instead, holding onto it like it was all he could do to stop himself from sliding off the bench and under the table, "...I just...can't shake the feeling that there's more that happened than I'm able to remember though... It's following me like a darkness out the corner of my eye, disappearing beyond sight when I try to find it."

"Your anxiety is fed by your doubts and worries. Jiro can sense it; that's why he got your attention. He could see it before you noticed."

"...He...can see the shadows bounding around in my head..."

"It's no different than the creeping darkness that followed me around after I left home with Yakov." Viktor explained, rubbing his husband's shoulder where he held it, "But your darkness is one you're creating on your own."

"...I just don't trust my own memories right now." Yuri said quietly, crossing his ankles against Makkachin's ribs, trying to find some mooring in the poodle's warmth, "Because I remember things now that I didn't before...and I don't know what else might come up later..."

"What exactly are you so worried about?" Viktor wondered, pressing his cheek to the crown of his spouse's head, speaking into his hair, "I know you feel guilty about abandoning him by going to Detroit...but in doing that, you were saving yourself, and that's the most important thing."

"...I just..." Yuri stammered, trying to find a breath, "...What if Osaka wasn't the first time he'd kissed me...? What if he got that first from me instead of you...? What...other firsts did he get that I thought you did?"

"I don't think he got any."

Yuri looked up abruptly, "How can you know though...?"

"Because he didn't react when Minako explained to him about how he'd ruined the fact that I'm the only person you'd ever kissed before that day." The silver explained, looking into those anxious brown eyes, "He's normally stone-faced, but in that moment, he wasn't. There's no doubt in my mind..."
that he would've flinched somehow, or given off some other kind of tell, if he knew he'd kissed you back then. I don't think he did. He didn't ruin that for you like he ruined hugs."

Jiro licked at the side of his human's wrist, offering what comfort he could with that soft pink puppy tongue. He rested his chin over it soon after, eyes looking back.

"...I just...wish I could be sure..." Yuri sighed, struggling, "I buried all that so deep that I didn't even think of it when I was having that fight with him... Why wouldn't he mention it...? Shouldn't he have...? In that angry state, he could've used the fact that I'd agreed to go out with him as a weapon against being with you..."

"I may not like Saito much because of what happened, but I don't think he's stupid." Viktor attempted, "I think he's smart enough to know that it didn't count, and that you really didn't mean it when you said yes. I mean, you said you avoided him afterwards, and then spirited yourself away to Detroit as soon as you had the chance. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to know what kind of message you're sending."

"...It...couldn't have been more than a day and a half...before I went back to Hasetsu to get away from it all." Yuri said, trying to piece together the fragments in his head, "I feel like...at the time, being around Yu-chan and her newborns was easier than being around him."

"Did you ever confide in Coach Nagisa back then?"

Yuri shook his head adamantly, "No, absolutely not. I never told anyone anything. I didn't even tell Chris...at least, I don't remember telling him... I know I asked him to help me block his contacts and clear out my email...but not that I told him anything that happened specifically."

"Do you think you would've if there was something else to say?"

"...Honestly, I'm not even sure. I never really told anyone anything. Not even Phichit-kun knows. In the years before Asahi disappeared, I don't think either of them met at all. I don't even think he knows I know Asahi. At all. I completely put Japan in the rearview mirror when I left."

"I remember you other rink-mates in Detroit saying that was the case. Getting to know you at all was really hard for them."

"I wanted things to be better... I have memories that didn't make me so anxious. Being in Michigan was like starting a brand new life. I could take the things I liked and leave all the rest behind."

"...Does being in Hasetsu now cause you trouble?"

Yuri shook his head, "No; I have you there with me. Hasetsu is our place. Asahi never touched it, and the struggle I had because of Yu-chan back then is just a weird memory now, not a bad one."

"...And I guess it helps that her kids helped get me to you." Viktor suggested, nuzzling his partner's hair again, "I'll be forever in their debt for that."

"Yeah, same." Yuri nodded, snuffling a pained breath. He drew a sharp one after that and slumped a little where he sat, "I want to believe that nothing worse happened than that hug... I just don't know how to be sure..."

"Lean on the faith you have in me." Viktor suggested, "Despite the fact that you said that you like it best when I use my hands on you, your disgust with being touched before that was driven largely by the fact that Saito invaded your space. You pushed off Tess when she tried to comfort you at that hospital, and you even recoiled from me at first. I had to earn your trust before I could touch you without your skin crawling...and so now I'm asking you to rely on that trust, and believe what I'm saying that I know to be true about you."

Yuri looked up again.

"Saito may have hugged you, but I got all your important firsts. I'm the first person you really hugged, I'm the first person you kissed, and got kissed by. I know this because I know you. And you've said it yourself..." Viktor went on, bringing up his free hand to cup it over his husband's cheek, gently stroking his thumb across it as he gave a little Eskimo kiss, "...I know where you're at in your head, and I meet you there. There was nothing about our first kiss that ever made me think you were repulsed by some prior bad experience. You were all smiles, and you even kept your arm over me. I want nothing more than to see you smile like that, all the time. You deserve to be happy."

"And I am happy... I hope this mood of mine doesn't make it seem like I'm not..."

"Nah," Viktor said easily, brushing his thumb against his partner's lower lip, "You're just reacting to something that happened. I'm just glad you're remembering some good things, too. The Sochi Banquet, where all this craziness between us started... Those are worthwhile memories to have, even if you went into it under less than ideal circumstances. We still had fun there together. Right?"

The worried look on Yuri's face started melting a little, and he nodded again, relaxing into a forehead nuzzle. Trying not to move out of it much, Yuri turned the rest of himself towards his husband as well, lifting his legs up to drape them across the Russian's lap, and slid his hand up the man's chest, up to his neck, "I remember having a lot of fun with you, yeah." He agreed, "It was the best thing that ever happened to me, up to that point. I hope I remember more about that night. I want to remember more about how good it felt that I was able to have that time with you, without being overcome by my fears."

"The start of our whirlwind romance." Viktor teased, feeling the relief of relaxation in his partner's frame again.

Yuri nodded, taking a quick breath as he looked at his roaming hand, coming back down to his husband's chest like before. He could feel the slight tap of the heartbeat underneath, and pressed a bit harder against it. Looking up again, feeling each thump against his palm, he looked into those crystal eyes and smiled. Learning forward, he stole a quick kiss, "I don't know how you do all that... It's like you know exactly what to say to make me feel better."

"It's a far cry from that garage in China, right?" Viktor laughed nervously, "Back when I didn't have a clue how to handle you when you're upset."

"We've both come a long way since back then. Seems like such a long time ago now."

Viktor reached for his coffee mug again and lifted it up, "A toast then, to forging a happier path forward than the one we walked on to get here."

"And to getting out of this first rough year of marriage."

"Oh yeah, year two is going to be way better." He agreed, clinking their cups together as Yuri lifted his own, "And we'll start it off right with an amazing fancy second wedding."

"Kanpai."

They each took a sip from their drinks, and relaxed again in their little booth by the window.

"Oh, Yuri."
"Hm?"

"You've got a little something there..." Viktor teased, leaning forward suddenly to lick the whipped cream from his partner's nose. He huffed a quiet laugh and smiled at the younger man's stunned reaction, and turned up to the big window beside them, "...Look... It's starting to snow."
"Uuhhh..." Yuri looked up at the swarm within the supposedly 'not being used' rink.

"Hm." Viktor concurred, eyes scanning across the same.

"Is Euros supposed to be like this?"

"This one is, I guess."

Yuri sighed and shook his head, "I don't think I realized how many more people there were in the European division than the rest." He said in a more normal tone, "It's pretty stark when I see them all in one place like this... At Worlds, we all kind of blend together."

"Well, Europe had a head start in ice sport as compared to the rest of the world." Viktor pointed out, "I remember 4C's last year, and how most skaters were in the Singles competition. Hardly anyone skated in Pairs or Ice Dance. One could be forgiven for believing that there was no pair sport."

"Yeah..." Yuri agreed sullenly, but then looked from the crowded rink to his spouse, "So what do we do? We won't be able to practice now."

Viktor turned his eyes to the schedule boards on the wall behind them, and put his free hand over his mouth in contemplation. He scanned the lists and times, "...It looks like they're putting two events up at the same time. The Ladies Singles Free Skate in Hall 1, and the Pairs in Hall 3. Hall 2 is the overflow rink where people are able to do their warm-ups between Groups and ice resurfacing." He huffed with impatience and frustration, "I should've paid more attention. Not being a competitor has turned me into a slacker."

Watching the analysis percolate through Viktor's brain, Yuri stood by quietly, looking down instead to check on their pups. Makkachin sat by his human's knees and looked around normally. Jiro was a bit more dubious, sitting on one of his own human's shoes as he gaped at the mass of people at rink-side - cued skaters and their coaches - warily.

"It doesn't look like tomorrow's going to be as much of a rat race." Viktor added, "Just the Free Dance and then a bunch of technical meetings before the Exhibition. Halls 2 and 3 are being set aside entirely for Exhibition practice."

"So we're stuck without until tomorrow..."

"Are you worried?"

Yuri gave a nervous smile, "Any time I skate with you, I'm worried. I can't think of a worse thing that could happen than falling or forgetting what I'm supposed to do in the middle of a pair skate."

Viktor piffle-snorted, "You just skated your Free Program from last season for my father, after not having skated it for months. You'll be fine."

"...Ehh...sure, but...I practiced that show until I could do it in my sleep. This Exhibition...? Not so much...especially not with our roles within it switched."

"You sounded so sure of yourself before..." The Russian worried, trying to smile anyway, "I'd hate to think you're starting to doubt yourself."

"...I thought we'd have more time."

"I'm sure it'll be fine. I drilled my part down pretty hard yesterday morning. Whatever happens, just follow my lead." Viktor reassured, releasing the hand he held between them and slid it across his partner's back instead, "We will have time to practice tomorrow, for sure. What time we lost today was worth the time we had last night. Right?"

Returning the half-hug, Yuri nodded eagerly, "Oh, absolutely. So what should we do instead then?"

"We could go see if anyone we know is still here?"

Yuri scanned the board briefly for the Men's practice, but then shook his head, "They'd be long gone by now. Let's just text them and see if we can't meet them where they're at now. Make it easy on us."

"Hm." Viktor hummed, looking up at the quaint little cottage-like B&B, "So this is where you stayed the night before."

"Yeah, pretty cute, isn't it?" Yuri mused, "Tucked away in an area where most tourists would never think to go. It's the perfect place to get away, even though it's within walking distance of the arena."

"Well, lead the way I guess."

"Yeah, it's just around the side here." He explained, nudging his head around the corner as he started walking. Jiro and Makkachin followed closely, sniffing around the walkway as their little group moved to find the front door. Once there, Yuri paused before it to knock a few times, and they waited. They quickly heard the sound of the knob being jiggled on the other side, and locks undone, and Yuri waved, "Hi Vikki."

"Uhm..." She stammered, looking out at the pair in surprise, then down at the dogs in more surprise, "...Hi...?"

"Oh, didn't Yuri say we were coming?"

"...No."

"Viktor and Yuri are coming over." Yurio's voice hollered from inside.

The duo outside smiled nervously, but Viktora stepped back and presented the indoors, hiding the perturbed expression until they went past her. She pushed the door closed after them though and moved off, heading through the narrow hall and kitchen area before disappearing through the olive-green door into the living-room. Yurio came back through it though, veering off in the kitchen to snag a towel from the bathroom, and then came the rest of the way, handing it to Viktor as Yuri gave him their usual greeting hug.

"How'd practice go?" Yuri asked, pulling back to finish removing his jacket.

"...I fell on every jump, but whatever." The teen grumbled, looking over to where Viktor was wiping off Makkachin's paws to dry them off. Once the poodle's nubbins were cleaned, the Russian bent down to get Jiro's, and cut the two pups loose from their leashes.

"Were you in costume...?" Yuri wondered, finding a coat-hanger for his jacket, and put it in the closet, and did the same with his husband's after, "Or were your boots too tight?"

"No and no." The teen sighed and shrugged, "We're working on fixing my outfit right now, at any rate. My boots are fine for now."

"So then what happened?" Viktor wondered, following Makkachin towards the main room.

"Psyched myself out, I think." Yurio shrugged indignantly, "It's not the growth spurt that's causing the problem. It's my anger about it happening now."

"Yeah, I get that. It's like breaking a toe on the morning of the first event."

"Better a broken toe than a broken skull." He retorted, flicking a finger against the subtle white lines barely visible from Yuri's hairline, "It's still a goddamn miracle you pushed through that one."

Yuri just rubbed the spot, deadpanning the Russian Tiger as they went into the main space, "I don't skate on my head. It wasn't as bad as people seem to think." He grumbled, entirely unaware of the proverbial 'war flashbacks' rushing through Viktor's head as he followed behind. Eyes followed where Viktoria had moved to the spot she'd gotten up from earlier, settling in for the television again, then over to the only other person in the room, "Oh, hey Nikki."

"Hi~!" She sang back, sitting cross-legged on the couch with Yurio's costume pants lying across them. They were inside-out, and she'd dissected the high hems at the ankles with a seam-ripper tool, carefully pulling the broken threads through so as to leave the outside of the fabric as undisturbed as possible.

Yuri looked around the room as Yurio retook his spot on that same couch, "Mikhail and Minako-sensei aren't here?"

"Minako felt tired and went to take a nap." Nikki explained, starting to fold out the previously sewn-together cuff, "Papa went out to buy some stuff for tonight. He should be back soon though."

"Ah okay. So what are you guys up to in the mean-time? Just hanging out?"

Viktor scanned the room for somewhere to sit, but at least for the moment, there wasn't anywhere easy to drop into. Nikki's sewing supplies took up a good amount of space, and other than the wooden seats from the kitchen table, there were no spots available. That failing, he pressed a hand to his partner's low back and nudged his head towards Yurio's side of the couch.

"Nikki's making some last-minute adjustments to my Free Skate outfit." Yurio explained, watching the duo come closer, "Otherwise, yeah. We were told to avoid the arena until it was actually our turn to be there. Is that where you two came from?"

"Yeah. It's a zoo." Yuri answered with a glib sigh. Viktor turned around in front of him and sat down with his back to the front of the couch, and Makkachin came over quickly after, slumping down to rest against his human's side. When Viktor's hands came up to beckon, Yuri let them guide him down, and he sat between the Russian's legs, "We slept in way too late to make use of any available ice-time this morning." He explained, fidgeting until he was comfortable, and leaned back against his partner's chest, "We didn't think they'd use all three rinks at the same time."

"Or have two events taking place at the same time either." Viktor added, sliding his left hand around his partner's side while the right draped over the poodle next to him, "Did you realize this was only a four-day event, Yuri?" He wondered, tilting his head back to glance at the Tiger behind him.

"Only four? I thought it was six."
Nikki looked up from her work, "Yeah, Yuri said it was practically all week, getting the Juniors out of the way early so they could flaunt the Seniors for the ratings or something."

"Nope, only four this time. I saw it on the schedule board before we came here." Viktor shrugged and looked forward to the television again, "I was trying to figure out why the lists were so dense, and realized this thing started on Thursday rather than Tuesday like last year. It's a wonder we had any time on the ice before."

"Oh, I think I know what happened..." Yuri chimed in, looking at the breakdown on his phone as Jiro came up between his knees beyond it. He reached a free hand forward to squish the fur on the back of the pup's shoulders and neck, "They did the novice Short Programs early, but they're doing everyone for the Free together. The top 24 all skating in a unit like normal. The Ladies Singles and Pairs are starting in about a half hour, and then Men's will cap the night starting at seven."

"So what the Hell was with that ominous-sounding threat at the end of that interview? Hah? Viktor."

Yurio asked dubiously, poking his older counterpart in the back of the head for emphasis, "Saying Russia will regret firing you? What are you gonna do about it? Poison Georgi?"

Viktor just laughed at that, "Are you saying that you haven't already?"

"Of course not. If I poisoned him, I wouldn't be able to see the look on his face when I thump him tonight." The teen retorted, slumping back into his spot, "So did anyone ask you about it when you were at the rink?"

"Nah. We snuck in and snuck out again."

"Ridiculous." Yurio huffed, slouching into his corner with a knee up, "It's practically the only thing people talked about all morning."

"Really?"

"People think you're aware of something that's going to happen that no one else knows about." The teen explained, "Do you?"

"What could I know about? I'm not even in Russia anymore." Viktor huffed dismissively, "People are just making things up. I was only referring to the fact that I'm gonna keep winning on my new team, and then when I'm officially retired from competition, Yuri will keep winning, and then anyone else that I coach after that."

"What's that supposed to mean? You'll never coach me so long as I skate for the RSF?"

Both Yuri and Viktor blanched, but Viktor just smiled sweetly, "I hadn't thought about it that much. Yuri did say I wasn't allowed to coach anyone else so long as he was still competing, so..."

"I thought he only meant strangers. It's just me though."

"I meant everyone." Yuri said, turning in place to put his shoulder into the warm spot his back had just been in, and looked over to the Tiger, "Viktor's mine."

Viktor leaned forward to offer a few nibbling kisses to his husband's cheek, "I love it when you're possessive of me."

Yurio just rolled his eyes and groaned, "Dear Lord, this shit again..."

"Be glad when you see that kind of thing, Yuri." Minako's voice suddenly sounded, and the woman herself appeared leaning in the olive-green doorway, "It means everything's okay in the World of Nikiforov."

"Doesn't stop it from being obnoxious." He grumbled, trying to focus on the television instead.

"Oh you'll understand it one day, don't you worry." The ballerina teased, going back as she waved a hand, "Hi kids."

"Minako-sensei-" Yuri called after her, scooping Jiro up against his chest as he pushed up to his feet, "I'll be right back." He said to his partner, and quickly hopped through the door. Spotting Minako at the counter, rummaging in the cupboards for tea, he closed the wood and glass door and stepped closer, into earshot of his quiet words, [...Could I talk to you for a minute...?] He asked quietly in Japanese, hoping to obscure their conversation in any way he could.

[Yeah, of course.] She answered easily, playing along, though feeling a tingle go down her spine, [...Is something wrong after all?]

[Not with Viktor. Him and I figured everything out and we're great again.] Yuri explained, keeping his voice down as Minako went back to making her drink, [This...actually just came up earlier, right before we left to go find brunch.]

[Oh?]

He nodded, and turned around to put his back against the counter as he listened to the sound of water being poured into the electric coffee-pot. The tea-bag was unpackaged and set into the glass pot, and placed onto the hot-plate before the machine was turned on, [Last night, Viktor took me to the Flower Ball. We had such an incredible time...and something about it felt familiar enough that I actually started to remember stuff from the Sochi Banquet.]

[Oh...like from the pictures we saw in Barcelona that one night?]

[Yeah.] He nodded, eyes down on Jiro to help ground him, [But those memories weren't the only ones that started to bubble up. I've talked to Viktor about the Sochi memories that are fading into my mind, and he's been able to confirm most of them...but there's a few that are just so outrageous that I'm embarrassed to ask. The problem I'm having though...is the memories from right before I went to Detroit.]

[...Before Detroit?] Minako echoed in confusion, [How could you forget any of that? It was a whirlwind in Hasetsu. You spent the last two weeks there before you moved. It was so crazy with the triplets being newborns that you were practically jumping onto the train to get away from it all.]

[...The stuff that happened in Hasetsu isn't the only thing I was trying to get away from though.] Yuri pointed out nervously, feeling his heart in his throat, [Was there...ever a time when I came back from Imari and you thought I was...acting weird?]

She narrowed her eyes and raised her brows at the question, [...Weird.] She repeated, [Well, you were weird all the time after the triplets came. But to me, it was nothing unexpected. You were 17 years old and acted as I imagined most boys that age would act in that environment.]

[...So...you thought I was basically normal...?]

[Normal for you, I guess, but sure. Why?]

[I...remembered some things about Asahi that I made myself forget when I moved.] He answered hesitantly, [...I have no one that I can ask to confirm them or tell me I made them up.]
[Why not ask Asahi himself?]

Yuri lifted his head and shot her a dubious look, but then looked away again, down to Jiro. [I can't. I don't...trust him.]

Steaming water started to sputter from the coffee-maker, and the liquid started to pour down from the empty filter basket to the little glass pot underneath, dripping onto the tea-bag.

[I've forgiven him for what he did to me in Osaka.] Yuri started again, [But...I don't trust him. I can't face him alone and ask these questions. If he said the memories were right, I'd hate him. If he said I made them up, I'd think he was lying.]

[...What are you saying you remembered?]

He drew a sharp breath, and lifted the puppy up higher onto his shoulder, [Right before I found out that I'd been accepted at the Detroit Skate Club, Asahi asked if I'd try for Tokyo with him. He said he was sure he could get a spot for me if I wanted it. I was hedging my bets at the time, just in case Detroit fell through...Tokyo would still be far enough away from Hasetsu that it'd be inconvenient to come home often. I'd have an excuse to stay away. So I told him sure, to go ahead and ask. He was...] Yuri's words tapered, and he hugged Jiro a bit closer, feeling the pup's warm belly against his neck, [Asahi got so excited that I'd said yes...that he...Uhm... He started this excited rant about all the great things we'd be able to do there together. Tokyo's amazing for all sorts of reasons, right?]

[Sure.]

[We'd be away from home, away from parents and familiar faces...we could do whatever we wanted. Stay up late, sleep in late...share a dorm to reduce costs... All this stuff that I got excited about, too, and that made logical sense... But then he suddenly asked if I'd be his boyfriend and I was so caught by surprise that I said yes like I'd been saying to everything else to that point...] He said quickly, bringing his other hand up over his mouth to hide his trembling voice a little, [I was just... Back then, I was still so unsure of myself, didn't know how to speak my mind, and was...just so beaten down by the years of doubt and bullying and body-shaming by Nishigori...I feel like he did it to keep me away from Yuko, and then he got her instead...because I was too ashamed of myself to ask her...]

Minako listened quietly, brow furrowed as much from the worry for Yuri's current state of mind as she was from the tsunami of confessions.

[Being around them and the triplets was torture. Leaving was my only hope. Tokyo would've been just fine...so when Asahi threw that last wrench into the mix, it just stopped me in my tracks. I know that he hugged me... It was long and awkward, and I remember wishing he'd stop... But I just can't stop myself from wondering if anything else happened...?]

[...I see.]

[When I came back home for those two weeks, it was an effort to avoid him. I didn't...have the courage to tell him that I didn't mean it. That I had no idea that he had those feelings for me whatsoever, and that I didn't return them at all, and that I was sorry. I didn't mean to say yes; he caught me by surprise, and I didn't want to upset him when he was already so happy about all the rest. Going to Detroit was my way of escaping everything. But I just can't shake this feeling that something other than that hug happened before I got back to Yu-Topia.] He went on, raising his hand to cover his eyes instead, [I don't know if it's a memory I'm seeing, or just my anxiety making me imagine things that I hope to God aren't true...]

[I don't...] Minako started, wracking her brain for those days and weeks for any details she could recall, [...I really don't know...but I can't think of anything that might've suggested you'd been that involved with someone. You wouldn't have been agreeing to anything, clearly, so I feel like you would've given yourself away if something had happened. You're not all that great at hiding when you're upset about things...] She said, hoping her words were reassuring even if odd to say, [I think you got out before anything else happened.]

[...That's what Viktor said, too. I just can't stop these images from going through my head though, and feeling so guilty about it, because it would change everything I think about myself...] He explained, [All the firsts that I gave to Viktor because I thought I'd never given them to anyone else...]

[I think you're worrying yourself over imagined events.] Minako attempted, leaning forward where she'd pressed her back to the counter, trying to see the front of Yuri's face, [When you came back to Hasetsu, you had the mental space to feel annoyed only by the stuff with the Nishigoris. When you got word that you'd been accepted at the Detroit Club, you were over the moon about it. I don't think I'd ever seen you as excited about anything before. There was nothing about that time that ever suggested to me that you'd been hurt or spooked.]

[You're...you're sure?]

[I've known you for almost as long as you've been alive. I like to think that between your mom and I, one of us would've noticed if you acted like something was that wrong.] She pointed out, putting a hand on the man's shoulder, [So if you don't trust the images in your head...trust your family and friends. I'm positive you came out of Imari intact. Not only because I believe from you that it's the case...but because when Viktor and I mentioned to Asahi how important it was to you that Viktor was the only person you'd ever kissed, Asahi didn't react as though he knew better. He was in such a bad place mentally at the time that I'm sure he would've said something if what we said wasn't true.]

[...Viktor mentioned the same thing. That Asahi didn't react when you guys brought that up.]

[Try not to imagine those horrible scenarios anymore, okay?] Minako advised, [Your loyalty to Viktor is so unquestionable that you're giving yourself nightmares over something you're scared may have happened. But don't be scared. We're both sure that you're in the clear on this. That awkward hug was the worst thing that happened. The rest is just your imagination getting away from you.]

[...I hope so...]

[Don't dwell on it. Go let Viktor love on you a little bit and feel better.] She recommended, turning around to find a mug in the cabinet, [Or think about Sochi some more.] She teased, offering a smile, [From what I remember about those pictures, you had a Hell of a time at that Banquet.]
The door cracked open and Yuri stepped through, glancing back over his shoulder one last time to nod to his former teacher...only to stop in his tracks.

All eyes in the room were on him.

"...What?"

As though a machine that had gotten hung up for a moment, everyone suddenly went back to 'acting natural,' leaving Yuri to deadpan them all rather severely. Sighing and shaking his head, he stepped forward, feeling the subtle swish of Jiro's tail going back and forth across his arm. He found a hand coming up for him like before, and as he did then, accepted it and descended, retaking his spot against his hubby-shaped pillow.

"Get what you needed?" Viktor wondered quietly, bending his left knee upward as it looked like Yuri would be leaning against him sideways.

"...I think...I'm at least satisfied for the time being." He answered, pressing his shoulder down to his partner's chest as he carefully avoided squishing Jiro. He drew in a long breath, looking around the room for a moment, then back to the blue eyes watching him, "I just needed a corroborating witness to my youth."

"And?"

"She said the same thing you did, almost word for word."

"But it's only enough 'for the time being'?"

Yuri hesitated to say anything, but then just shook his head and brought a hand up against his husband's cheek, and leaned in for a kiss to soothe his frayed nerves, "In my heart, I know that what you guys are saying is right...but convincing my head to stop manufacturing false memories will take longer."

"Listening to you two whispering in the middle of a room full of people is totally not suspicious." Yurio taunted, nudging the back of Viktor's head with his toes, "You wanna share with the class?"

Yuri's eyes moved between the two, but Viktor's were darkened. Suddenly, one lanky arm reached up and behind, grabbing the Tiger around one leg and completely yanked him off the couch. Makkachin scrambled before the teen could land on him, and Yurio flailed in stunned surprise as the room went bottom-up and his head thumped the ground.

"Wh-what the Hell, Viktor!?"

The eerie visage morphed into a sickly-sweet smile, though he didn't let go, keeping Yurio suspended by his leg, "Are your feet in the right place right now?"

"None of me is!" Yurio argued, "Let me go!"

"Stinky toes belong on the floor, not in my hair."
Yuri smiled nervously at the tangled pile of Russian Punk next to him, but then just twisted around to avoid the teen's gaze, and slid down until his arms hooked over his husband's legs and the back of his head rested on the man's sternum. Jiro spread out over his stomach, head set down on Yuri's chest as the pup tried to doze a little bit. Yuri clasped his fingers together over the small Akita's back and settled in, watching the television past his upturned knee. The cherry on top of it all was feeling Viktor's hands come sliding over his collar-bones to clasp fingers together across his chest.

Yurio grudgingly got untangled from himself and crawled back onto his place in his corner of the couch, and kept his feet curled underneath himself to avoid a second thumping. A flash of silver caught his eye and he looked aside, watching Nikki pull the last cut threads through the ankles of his show-pants.

She seemed to be aware of his attention and glanced up at him in return, "You wanna help?"

"Er... Y-yeah, sure. What should I do though?"

Yuri glanced backward to try and see what was going on, keeping silent through his observation. He followed Nikki's arm as she lifted it to point to a small object nearby.

"There's a mini iron right there. If you put a few ounces of water in it, and plug it in, it'll heat up and I can get the folds out of the fabric." She explained, unfolding the denim outward, "Whoever made these for you had your looming growth spurt in mind, and gave a lot of extra material to compensate. There's nothing I can do about the waist-band, but I think this extra length in the legs should hold you over tonight."

As Yuri had seen a dozen or more times with Yuko, Lilia on occasion, and even with Minako, Yurio took instruction from the ladies in his life in stride, and moved without complaint. The blonde hopped off the couch and grabbed the little half-sized iron, examining it to find the water access point as he headed out through the door. When the kitchen faucet turned on, Yuri tilted his head back against his husband's chest and smirked, putting one hand on the pair threaded together under his chin, "Wish he'd listen to us like that, right?"

Viktor huffled a laugh in response and nodded, "I wonder if he realizes how differently he reacts to women."

Within the kitchen, Minako was getting to take the first sips of her hot green tea. She'd scooted down the counter to make room, and was watching Yurio figure out the mini-iron out the corner of her eye. Smirking into the mug as she watched the little machine over-flow with tap-water though, she took a quick sip and reached back to turn the faucet off, "It's an iron, not a water bottle." She teased, "You'll need to drain some out."

"How come?" He wondered, one eyebrow quirked, "What's wrong with filling it up?"

"Turn it down like you're about to use it."

Confused, Yurio tipped the iron over, and saw the puddle form immediately. Through the colored transparent plastic, he watched the water bubbling out through the open hole at the front where he'd filled through. He just grumbled at it forlornly, "Well that's a stupid design. Why would someone put the hole at the front like that if all the water's just gonna come out when someone uses it?"

"To give something for people like me to laugh at." Minako answered, smirking into her drink again. Before she could take another taste though, she heard the tapping and thumping of something on the other side of the front door, "Oh, that must be Mik." She surmised, putting the tea-mug down for a moment to go help the man in.

Yurio watched her go for a second, but then sighed at the watery mess on the counter and went looking for paper towels.

The ballerina-turned-skating-coach went around the corner and into the forward hall, hearing the fumbling noise outside even louder than before, "What in the world is he doing out there? Why doesn’t he just open the-" She asked herself, reaching for the old Venetian doorknob, and plucked it open, "...door?"

"Ohhey." Mikhail greeted starkly, covered in snow, but carrying way too many bags for just himself, "Brr."

"Oh." She blanched, "Hey hun. What are you...?"

"Don't ask. Long story. Arms are tired."

Minako quickly stepped back and the hapless older man stumbled through, bringing in enough snow to make the front room seem like it had no roof. He shivered again and started trying to put the bags down, only to find his fingers not cooperating too quickly, so Minako stepped around to close the door behind him and then tried to help with the inventory, "...What did you buy? Half the grocery store?"

"Not quite. I just made the mistake thinking I was only 30 years old." He explained, feeling the straps of bags coming off his hooked fingers, "Ow ow ow..."

"Go thaw out. You're frozen solid." Minako advised, putting those first bags onto the counter in the walk-through kitchen.

By then, Yurio had finished cleaning the puddle, and waved at the older Russian on his way back to the living-room, "Hey."

"Hey kiddo." Mikhail answered, trying to keep his teeth from chattering. Slowly but surely, he peeled out of his now-damp coat and frost-coated dress shoes, and ruffled his hat-less head. Just as he turned to head into the kitchen after his lady love though, he found himself suddenly screaming instead.

Viktor's hair blew back from the sound of it, but he stayed where he was, leaning against the doorframe to the shoe-hall, blinking in surprise, "...What the-"

"Cyka blyat." Mikhail hiss-whispered, trying to stop his heart from popping out of his chest, "You scared the literal Hell out of me."

"Hi." The younger answered, sticking a pinky finger in one ear and trying to yawn to make the drums pop and feel normal again, "Man, for a Russian, you sure don't dress for the weather."

"What are you even doing over here?"

"I invited them over." Yurio called from the other room.

"'Them?'" Mikhail echoed, only to spot both Makkachin and Jiro trotting after their silver human to investigate the child-like shriek, "...There's one pup missing."

He wasn't missing long; a pair of skinny arms came threading forward around Viktor's frame, and Yuri propped his chin on the man's shoulder, "I'm here. Hey Mik."

"Ah, there's the fourth." The elder said, peeling himself off the wall he'd flown into from his earlier fright. Both men smiled nervously at him, but he just laughed at his own misfortune and shook his head, "Sorry for my less than mature reaction. Viktor just took 10 years off the top with that one though."

Yuri smiled anyway and reached his hand forward, feeling gesture returned as Mikhail stepped closer to go past, "We'll try to give them back."

"Ah, it's all good. By all accounts, I should've been dead before I was born with the number of times someone's scared me like that." He retorted, using cold red fingers to turn the kitchen faucet back on. Though the water was cool to everyone else, to Mikhail, it felt comparatively hot, and he let his frozen digits thaw out for a little while, "So what brings you two over? I thought you'd be practicing by now, given how late you were awake at that ball last night." He commented, "Super jealous, by the way."

Viktor smirked, walking Yuri backwards across the kitchen floor in an exaggerated slow march, with hubby's feet dragging along the tiles between his legs. Their pair of dogs followed close behind, "As well you should be. It was a great time."

"The rink's a zoo." Yuri explained, holding onto his partner's frame as the man made his way through with that odd waddle, "There was nowhere for us to skate so we left. We figured we'd try to find someone to hang out with after that, and I remembered that this place was pretty close, in case you guys were here."

"We'll go tomorrow morning and pound the ice till we drop." Viktor added, trying not to trip over Makkachin as he got to the olive-green doorway again, "I went at it pretty hard yesterday morning too so I just need to catch Yuri up on the minor tweaks."

"Why tweaks?" Yuri and Mikhail asked in tandem, though Yuri more in surprise than the other.

"Well, I don't have clearance to jump right now, so there's that... Plus, Yuri and I have tried to swap spots for Death Spirals and I'm too heavy, so I had to readjust some things." Viktor explained, waiting in the doorway.

"...What's a Death Spiral...?" Mikhail wondered, brow quirked. He reached for a towel to dry his warmed and thawed hands.

"It's a pair spin where one person stays in the middle and holds the hand of the other, who goes around really low to the ice in a circle."

"Oh that thing. I thought it was that other move..." The elder said, moving off to help unpack his wares, "The one where a guy holds a lady's ankles and swings her up and down so her head gets close to the ice."

"That's a banned move." Yuri said, "Thankfully. He added, giving his partner a wry look, "At least in official competition. Some pair skaters still do them for Exhibitions though...but there's no way I'd ever get myself into something like that. I've bumped my head one time and that was enough. Don't need to add 'Viktor was holding onto my ankles at the time' to it." He said, putting up air-quotes for emphasis.

Viktor just brought his hands up to hold his husband's head still and kissed the two pale scars coming down his forehead, "No more head-bonks. Once was too many."
"So what'd you buy anyway...?" Yuri wondered, squirming to try and get a better view through his partner's arms.

"Uhhh... Some stuff." Mikhail answered vaguely, looking at the growing pile to try and find a place to start. He reached for a small package to toss at the pair, and Yuri caught it with some effort, "Those are for Yura."

"What is it?" Viktor wondered, trying to look back over his shoulder to where Yuri's hands were holding the item.

"Mole skin. Nikki's idea."

"Oh yeah, to make room in his boots." Yuri nodded, and felt the waddle-march begin again to go into the next room. He twisted in place though once they were in, and spotted the aforementioned teen ironing the untethered hems. He looked further aside though and tossed the package in Yurio's direction, "You know what to do with those, right?"

"Probably better than you do." He quipped, catching the little plastic item, "I bet I put more miles in the ballet studio than anyone in this room."

"Pfft." Yuri sputtered, "I spent more time in Minako-sensei's ballet studio than I spent at home when I was a kid."

"Spending time there doesn't mean you learned anything."

Viktor chortled a laugh, "Don't you know? Yuri learns by osmosis. Just put him in the middle of a room and he absorbs everything."

"I do ballet just fine thanks."

"You could never do the splits though even with years of trying." Minako betrayed him, looking past Mikhail where they were still putting groceries away.

"I can too do the splits!" Yuri protested, "Viktor quick, hold my leg-" He harped, spinning in place to give his partner the ankle of his right leg, "Just pull it straight up."

"You can only do it on one side and you haven't even warmed up yet." The Russian pointed out, "If I just yank your leg up, you'll start making inappropriate noises like you did in the onsen that one time..."

"But I have to prove I can do it now."

The Russian's visage suddenly took an ominous look, "Your inappropriate noises are for my ears only though."

Yuri's face went red, "...V-Viktor."

"Hey, if you two are gonna be sticking around for long, make yourselves useful." Mikhail asked, moving towards the expanding kitchen table with a pair of cutting boards and knives, "There's some stuff that needs cutting. Would you, please?"

The duo glanced from the cutting boards to each other and back again, but Yuri quickly pulled his leg down again, "Yeah, sure. We'll be right there." He said, and started nudging his partner towards the bathroom just behind. Once through the door, the table-top blue-marble sink greeted them, and Yuri turned the spigot to let the water flow, "Didn't think we'd be helping make dinner." He teased, feeling the flow over his fingers, "It's kinda nice though."

"This is all so foreign to me." Viktor pointed out, finding a bar of lavender soap on a shelf under the basin, "I've cooked with your mom a few times but that was in an industrial kitchen. This is totally different."

Yuri glanced up, but then down again as he felt the water come up to temperature. He reached behind himself to pull the door closed to the little bathroom, "I know you're still slightly apprehensive around Mikhail, but you're doing better now, right? This visit is okay?"

Viktor nodded and reached for his partner's hands, cupping the soap between the younger man's palms and slid them under the warm water, "There's a sliver of me that's still worried he'll try lording over my life again, but he's been okay. Since it's not just him and I alone though, I think it's fine. I feel like I owe it to Yurio and the girls a little that I should try to get along with him and forgive."

Yuri lathered his skin for a moment before handing off the soapy bar, "I feel like Mik's settled down a lot since NHK and the Final. He made some poor choices back then because he got excited, but knowing how much it upset you...and then having to take his kids in suddenly...his focus is spread out more."

Viktor looked at his reflection in the mirror as he wet and lathered his hands as well, "His kids... I have so many questions but I have no idea how to ask without sounding insensitive."

"...Eh?"

"I remember how much it upset you last year...when I told you that finding out my mother had died didn't make me feel anything. I wasn't sad about it, I wasn't happy about it either...I just...didn't care." He explained, watching the soap bubbles on his skin, "But they actually had theirs, right up until the end, and yet they seem so well adjusted. Does everyone in my family have trouble connecting to their mothers or something?" He wondered, keeping his voice low against the water, "Thinking back on those really early days, I can't remember much about my grandparents, either...Mikhail and my mom's parents, that is. I don't even remember what they looked like. I feel like their existence was a footnote, kind of like how my father was just a shadow lurking in the background of my memories."

Yuri rinsed his hands and reached for a green fuzzy towel under the sink, but just listened.

"Is that just...how things always turn out for this bloodline?" Viktor went on, rolling the bar in his hands, "Do we all become estranged from one another after a while? ...I feel like I have a stronger connection to your parents than I do to anyone I'm actually related to."

"My parents are steeped in the hospitality industry though... Yu-Topia didn't come out as the last man standing on luck alone." Yuri pointed out, "And there's a lot of hurt in your background. You still kind of hold a grudge against Mikhail for things that happened when you were just a kid, same as how he's trying to make up for it, even though the both of you are trying to forge a relationship in the present, as your current selves."

Viktor nodded quietly.

"...And I know you're still disappointed by how the trip to see Kon turned out. It's...hard to figure out what exactly you were hoping to get from it... Calling him 'papa' even though you didn't care if he loved you or not." Yuri went on, using a finger to nudge the soap from his partner's hands, gathered it up, and put it on the dish on the under-basin shelf, "I mean, I heard what you said you wanted, but..."
"I thought I'd see what could happen." Viktor answered, moving his hands under the warm water stream, "In a way, I thought...my father had lost everything he had before. Everything he worked his whole life for. I guess I felt sorry for him. He lost my mom and is all alone out there...would he appreciate me more if I was all he had left? Could he put aside the things he doesn't like about me if it meant getting me back in his life?" He said, reaching to turn the faucet off, and took the towel from his spouse's hands to dry his own, "It hurt a lot to be told the answer was no. It made me question my own worth for a little while. I'd achieved so much and risen so high...but in my father's eyes, it meant less than nothing. Like giving pearls to swine, you know?"

"Yeah."

"But now, I'm seeing my situation with my Uncle through similar eyes... Is what he's doing enough for me to forgive what bad happened between us? ...Then I think, 'wow, I really am just like my father, feeling so justified in my anger that I can't appreciate what's right in front of me,' and the breath catches in my throat. I don't...want to end up like him. I want to have love in my life, and family...all these things that I didn't know could be, until I had you." Viktor explained, folding the towel and casting blue eyes on his husband, "You practically dared me to want more for myself, when you said to give him a chance last year. Maybe I've been keeping him at arm's length too long..."

Yuri's brow furrowed, dubiously hopeful, "...So you're...saying you forgive him...?"

Reaching for the doorknob, Viktor pushed the panel out, and looked around, as though with new eyes.

"...There they are." Minako teased, "We thought we were going to have to send a search party after you two."

Yuri practically tip-toed out behind his partner, and looked past him to spot Mikhail on the other side of the expanding table, setting down a bowl of tomatoes, cucumbers, and onions, and an empty salad bowl to put it all into. A pair of peelers had joined the knives and cutting boards, and the elder looked up at the pair coming towards him.

"Do you guys want the chairs or nah?"

"Dunno yet." Viktor answered, stepping up to one 'station', "We'll sort it out. Thanks, Papa Mimi."

Yuri's eyes went wide, and he glanced aside to the equally-stunned older man standing nearby, who looked back at him in turn.

Mikhail just pointed at his nephew though, "Did he just-"

"Don't question it!" Yuri whispered, finding his place on the opposite side of the table, heart aflutter in his chest. He grabbed for a cucumber and a peeler, and looked down at the two items in his grasp.

He couldn't help but smile.
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED NINE

The big bowl on the kitchen table slowly started to fill with the finely cut bits of the ingredients that had been set out. Small cucumbers, about the size of large pickles, and multicolored and oddly shaped tomatoes; it was eventually discovered that they were all heirloom vegetables, bought from a small local store that specialized in 'fancy' varieties of top-quality goods. It didn't take long for the wine to come out, and four glasses were poured and spread out among the eldest of the group.

"Okay, so..." Minako started nervously, "Fifteen eggs, plus three extra yolks, 750 grams flour, and a bit of salt...mix together..."

"It should be soft enough to move with gravity but not run." Mikhail explained, grating a brick of Emmenthaler nearby, "Don't be afraid to really get into it."

"Mix it good."

"Mix it good." He laughed.

"What are you guys making?" Yuri wondered, tipping a bottle of balsamic over the cut salad, splashing the dark liquid all over it while Viktor waited with two mixing spoons.

"Kӓsespӓtzle." The elder answered proudly.

"...Kaysuh-what?" Yuri echoed in confusion.

"Austrian mac 'n cheese."

"Oh neat!"

"And you bought eighteen eggs?" Viktor mused, "You weren't expecting to feed so many but it looks like you're prepared anyway."

"I meant for the eggs to last into breakfast tomorrow." Mikhail explained, tapping the cheese grater to dislodge the bits stuck to its underside, and reached for the bigger main block of cheese to cut off another smaller, easier-to-manage chunk of it, "I'll have to go buy some more at some point. Maybe tomorrow morning before everyone else starts to get up."

"Early enough to walk to a store, buy stuff, and get back? That's a lot of trouble to go through." Viktor pointed out, gently mixing the balsamic around, watching Yuri tap some salt and pepper in as he went.

"I take my responsibility as an athlete's dad very seriously." Mikhail mused, starting to grate the next chunk of pale cheese, "No processed foods, no sugary things, no soda, no 'convenience' foods that are full of salt. Just good carbs and hydrating veg. I try to avoid eating out much, too, to avoid the potential of stomach upset. It's like how the Windsors have an outright ban on anyone eating shellfish."

"...The Windsors?" Yuri repeated.

"The British Royals." Viktor explained.

"Oh." He deadpanned, "Why? What's their major problem with shellfish?"
"The potential to get sick. There's a higher likelihood of getting food poisoning from it than other foods." Mikhail answered.

Both skaters glanced at each other, but they couldn't help but chuckle a few laughs to themselves, as if reading one another's minds.

"What's so funny...?" Minako asked, looking back at them as she continued to work the noodle dough.

"Last year." Yuri explained, "When Viktor and I were in China... Phichit-kun found us at a hot-pot place and invited Celestino. He got super sick on the drunken shrimp Viktor ordered."

Mikhail blanched a little, "Drunken shrimp...? You ate them alive?"

"It was a one-time thing." He half-defended, half-reassured.

Yuri looked a bit sheepish, "...I thought it was weird, too, but...I was able to blame the alcohol they marinade in as the reason why I wouldn't eat them. I don't drink before competitions." He explained, reaching into the salad bowl to steal a piece of tomato, "I didn't want to get sick either though. I thought maybe your Royals had allergies or something."

"Nah." Mikhail shook his head and went back to cheese-grating, "No one's allowed to eat garlic in the Queen's presence either because she hates the smell of it. Onions have to be used sparingly. Meat has to be cooked medium-rare or better. She doesn't like rice or potatoes either."

"Blasphemy." Yuri huffed, "That's a crime against good taste."

"Food crimes, Mimi." Viktor added, "She's committing culinary felonies."

"I didn't make the rules." He laughed, tapping the grater again before putting the bowl of cheese bits onto a kitchen scale, "But I agree. Life in prison for those offenses." He added, reading the weight before putting the bowl aside and sticking a plate over-top to cover and protect the contents. He glanced over to Minako's side, "That looks about done, starlight. We can let it sit now."

"What's next?" She asked, pulling her hands from the mix to go wash them off, "You said that this stuff rests for about half an hour, right?"

"Yeah." He nodded, reaching for a frying pan. He set it on the cook-top and turned the heat on, "We'll melt some butter in here and then sauté a few onion slices. Just enough to brown them, then set them aside."

"How do you know how to make this stuff without looking up a recipe?" The ballerina wondered, rinsing her fingers before cutting the water off and toweling dry, "I feel like I've barely seen you cook ever, yet you seem to know this like you've made it often."

"I know a few things," He teased, grabbing a new cutting board and knife before returning to the ingredients pile to grab an onion, "This is really easy. I've made it for the kids in the past. Cheese, flour, eggs, butter, onions, done...and those last two ingredients are optional extras."

Minako slid her rings back into place, "What else do you know how to make?"

The elder Russian gave a sly look, "Get me a panini grill, and I make a mean chipotle grilled cheese sandwich."

"As loaded as you are, I'm surprised you don't have a personal chef." Viktor huffed, taking a sip from his wine glass as Yuri wandered around the table to his side, "You seem to go without a lot of things that most of us peasants assume rich people have by default."

"I guess so." Mikhail shrugged, slicing up rings of onion from the bulb, watching butter starting to melt in the pan, "I have some things, scattered across the face of this earth, but not much by the metric of other people in my income bracket. I guess everything just happened so fast that I never really adjusted. I still act like a guy who only makes a few million every year."

"...It is a really strange thing to think about." Viktor commented into his wine glass before taking a sip. His eyes went over to follow Yuri coming around the side of the table towards him, "When I last saw you as a kid, you were just as poor as the rest of us, and knowing how old everyone was when everything happened...you must've been no older than 34 when you left, cuz mom was 29 when she had me. Then you somehow had time to float around in the Ukraine for a while, and then get to Canada, where everything took off somehow?"

"Yeah, it was a whirlwind of lucky breaks and lightning striking twice. Right place, right time sort of stuff." Mikhail agreed, using the knife to help lift up the onion slices and dropped them into the pan to start sizzling and browning, "I started my way a lot sooner than when I left though. Your father and I were both stuck joining the Soviet army back when we were young, even though I did my time way sooner than he did. Part of my early instruction was at the Saint Petersburg Military Engineering-Technical University, or VITU for short in Russian. I carried that on when I got back home and started working in that god-awful steel mill. It wasn't as bad back then, since it was a busy place and people respected it, but that was before the Union collapsed and everything went to shit."

"...I see."

"My major was in construction mechanization, and I was good at it." Mikhail went on, watching the onions browning in the butter, and he stirred them around frequently with a flat-tipped wooden spoon, "When I did eventually leave, I already had nearly a decade of experience building and installing heavy machinery at big refineries. The one by our little town wasn't the only one I worked on. It was the only one that survived until now though."

"So what did you do in the Ukraine then...?" Viktor wondered, holding Yuri against himself as he slouched in his seat, "I'm guessing you weren't there too long."

"Nah. Two years, then I moved on. It was lousy there." Mikhail confirmed, reaching across the counter for some paper towels and made a small towel with a few sheets stacked together, and tipped the pan over them to dump the caramelized onions, "I got there in '91 or '92, in the aftermath of the Ukrainian declaration of independence from Russia. It was a complete shit-show out there though. I tried for a long time to get established but I could never really get a foot-hold. The economy was collapsing like a star and corruption was rampant. One of the buildings I lived in even burned to the ground, and I lost everything. If it hadn't been for the Canadians being involved with Ukraine at the time, I may have been stuck. But...after independence, the Canadians were there trying to free Ukrainian scholarship from Soviet orthodoxy, and a bunch of Ukrainians went to study in Canada because of it. I ended up going, too, which is why I ended up there."

Viktor looked down in thought, pressing his mouth to Yuri's shoulder where the younger man stood in front of him, "...So I guess you were already in Canada when you said you tried to come back for me. I'd just turned 11 when my father made me burn the skates, and you said you'd come just a few weeks after that."

"Yeah, that was in the late spring of '99." The elder confirmed, reaching for his wine glass, "I was pretty well established by then. My then-wife, Mylene, was pretty pissed at me for that trip though.
Viktoria was only 2 months old at that point and Mylene didn't want to be left alone. I promised her I'd only be gone for the weekend, and I came back as expected...but the second plane ticket I had for the ride back went unused."

Viktor's brow furrowed slightly. Yuri reached a hand up to pat the man's head gently.

"I hadn't even told Mylene what my plan was. I didn't want to give her the chance to tell me no."
Mikhail admitted sullenly, swirling the white wine around in his hand, "I'd insisted on giving Viktoria your name, and then I'd gotten the chance to actually bring you home with me...two Viktors under the same roof... It would've been crazy." He shook his head and took a sip, "Since we also had Sergio and he was only barely a year old by then. Maybe it would've been too much to ask of her, to care for an older displaced kid who didn't speak a lick of English and had just come out of a rough situation, as well as two young babies. But...I thought we could manage..."

"Didn't you help with anything?" Minako deadpanned him.

"Of course I did." He answered, giving her the same look back, "I loved being a dad. I still had my day-job to go to, but I was very active and attentive when I got home every night. By the time I had the option of being a stay-at-home dad, Nikki was a toddler, and I made the most of it. It was all I could do to stop myself from thinking about what Viktor's fate had been. It would be more than another decade though before I'd find out what had really happened...and it'd only be after the divorce that the business took off. It's amazing how things start to happen when you have nothing else to do." He said, though sadly, "...I'd really rather have been with my kids. The money meant nothing when it was just me. It...was a pretty hollow consolation prize for having lost everything else."

"...I guess I can relate to that." Viktor agreed, hugging Yuri a little tighter, "After Sophia dropped me like a bad habit, I had nothing to do but focus on the skating...and as much as that focus helped me with my sport, it was pretty lonely. Dropping everything to go to Hasetsu was easy because of it. I felt like I'd gotten something back that I'd lost for a long time."

"And having it is so important-"

"...That you'll do anything to get it, even putting your old life on hold for a year to work on it." Viktor finished, nodding behind his husband's shoulder, "I guess I understand you a little better. We really do have a lot in common."

"More in common than you had with Kon." Yuri pointed out, looking back, "Maybe this is how things were meant to be all along."

Viktor held for a moment, but then loosened his arms and leaned back in his seat, sipping at his wine again, "...I guess so."

"You guess so?" Yuri quipped, turning in place and leaning back against the edge of the table, "You came out of the bathroom calling him Papa Mimi, after stonewalling him for weeks. The last time you called him Papa, it was only a joke and he nearly ran us off the road because of it."

"Yeah you can't tease me with stuff like that." Mikhail added, staring over the rim of his wine glass at the two, "Not after hearing all the stuff Kon brought up in Sapporo."

Minako looked around in confusion, "What are you guys talking about? What did he say in Sapporo? When did he say it?"

Viktor drew an uncomfortable breath, but Yuri seemed more at ease, "It was when I called him and Mik into the back hall during the Exhibition. I wanted to dispel all the tension so Viktor would skate like he used to, rather than being held back by his nerves, and I intended to do it by confronting Kon about the elephant in the room...me."

"Oh." The ballerina blanched, cheek twitching slightly under one eye, "...I can't even imagine how that conversation went."

"It actually went well, all things considered...but it brought up a lot of stuff I hadn't even thought of." Yuri explained, sliding his left hand over his husband's knee, and rubbed his thumb against it, "It turned into this big beef that Kon actually had with Mik all along."

"...Define 'beef.'" She replied, eyes going towards the nervous man standing next to her.

"...It's because of how much time I spent with Viktor when he was a young kid." Mikhail started to explain, "Kon apparently felt like I'd tried to steal Viktor from him."

"...Oh, that stuff." Minako sighed.

"Kon made him admit it in front of all of us." Yuri added, "It was pretty tense."

"Well, if Kon had actually acted like he gave a damn, maybe it wouldn't have been so easy to slip in." Mikhail pointed out, "That bear didn't have a fatherly bone in his body. I'm not even surprised that Viktor followed me around like he did back then. I was the only person who paid him any attention besides his mother, so what was I supposed to do? Push him away?"

"You don't have to defend yourself to us, hun." Minako hushed, "We know what kind of person you are. You wanted to do the right thing."

"He was such a cute and endearing little kid, too." He went on, heaving a sigh and shaking his head, "I could never understand why Kon was so emotionally unavailable. He doted on Tat, but Viktor got nothing, and that poor kid was starving for affection." He explained, his tone sounding frustrated, "There were so many times when Vik was just a baby where Tat would have to come find me because Kon just wouldn't help her with anything. Apparently he thought doing the work of caring for an infant was beneath him...it was a woman's job. His job was to provide for them, to put food on the table and a roof over their heads, not to change diapers or give baths. But...Tat needed a break sometimes, and she knew she could always come to me, and she did. Frequently. I'll bet that's part of where those stupid rumors came from, about how Vik was actually mine, because Tat and I raised Viktor together more than Kon did. A big chunk of me wanted to be, after all the hours I'd put in... Kon just never stepped up."

"Well, he told me himself to bugger off in the end, so I guess it was a long time coming." Viktor sighed, "Even if he wouldn't tell me to my face."

"...I really don't know that there was anything you could've done to win him over." Mikhail offered, "You looked and acted nothing like him. He even told me at NHK that, up until that moment after the medaling ceremony when you told him all the stuff you'd done, he basically saw you as if you were me, and he resented the shit out of you for it. It wasn't until you'd actually shown him what you're like when you're happy that he could comprehend that you were someone else."

Yuri's brow furrowed, "Wow..."

"...Kon wanted a bear cub, not a wolf pup." Mikhail continued, voice a little quieter as he lowered his gaze towards the ground, "Someone he could turn into a little version of himself. Instead, he got a mini-me; a kid who, in all but name, is a Rozovsky. The day that your brown baby-hair turned silver, the change in Kon's demeanor took a palpable turn. It's like he thought you came out wrong."
The room was quiet for a moment, save for the soft sound of the television from the other room.

Viktor shook his head and sighed, "I'm not surprised by that, honestly." He said grimly, "My father reminded me often that he valued strength above everything else...and I was just this skinny little wimpy kid. Considering how all your kids came out though, I doubt Konstantin would've ever gotten an offspring that took on his traits. Those Rozovsky genes are stronger than his, and mom was exactly the same as you."

"...And I think he understood that, on some level, even if he didn't say so."

"He sort-of did, once..." Viktor corrected, "...That time we all went out there. When I was alone with him in front of mom's headstone. He touched my face and said I looked just like her."

"Hm... Yeah. That's as close as you'll probably ever get."

"...Water under the bridge now." Viktor shrugged, taking another sip from his drink, "I hope he's happy with whatever he thinks he has. He probably thinks that he's effectively surrendered me to you, after all these years, as though admitting that you won."

Mikhail looked aside to Minako briefly, but then shook his head, "You don't belong to me, Viktor. You never did."

"I hope not." Yuri quipped, pulling up his partner's right arm, "It'd be awkward to have to explain why his matching ring is on my hand."

In rare fashion, Viktor's cheeks gained some color, but he smiled and buried his face against his partner's side, feeling an arm go behind his shoulders to return the hug.

"If you want to keep calling me Papa Mimi though..." The elder added, "I could be convinced to play the part."

"...Well, I didn't say it to torment you." Viktor pointed out, looking up from the odd tangle of a hug he'd gotten into, "I think, maybe, you were that person to me all along. It just...sucks that you got forced out when you did. There were a lot of times growing up that I needed you."

"I'm not going to leave again, that I can promise." He answered easily, "There's finally no more obstacles standing between me and the people I care about. I feel like I have a lot to make up for and I intend to do just that."

"Just don't get carried away. Again."

Mikhail deadpanned forward, and blew bubbles into his wine, much to Minako and Yuri's amusement.
"Hee... I'm feeling tipsy already..." Viktor laugh-whined, holding to his partner's shoulder for the stability, "...I shouldn't be drinking before eating..."

"That's some strong wine." Yuri agreed, face flushed from it all, "Maybe we should sit somewhere before we fall over."

"I thought we were sitting."

"You only have half a butt-cheek clinging to the edge of a high wooden stool." Yuri explained, reaching a wobbly hand towards the nearby doorframe, though he missed grabbing it the first time. Behind him, he could hear the hazy, immature laugh of his husband.

"Hehehe...you're talking about my butt."

"Only half of it." Yuri teasingly corrected, reaching one hand back towards the man, "Come along, husband, bring it this way."

Leaving the empty wine glasses on the table, Viktor took the offered hand and went after his spouse, letting Yuri guide him into the next room and around the heavy wooden table in the middle of it. They passed Viktoria in the single-person recliner, eyes on Yurio where he clung territorially to his corner of the couch.

"We're gonna sit." Yuri warned mischievously, "Better look out."

"Don't you even dare. I was here first."

"We're gonna sit..."

"Why don't you find another spot!?" The teen barked, clinging to the cushions.

"Viktoria's spot is too small for us both and Nikki has sharp-pointy things. So...we're gonna sit...here."

"NRRRGGGGHHHH!" Yurio protested, using both feet against Viktor's arse to keep him from lowering down much further, "THIS IS...MY...SPO-hrk..."

Nikki couldn't help but chortle a laugh under her breath, pulling up the half-sewn pants to hide her face. All she could see under the pile of skaters was Yurio's twitching right hand and leg.

"It's a bit bumpy here, my love." Viktor pouted comically, "I think I sat on something."

Yurio hollered and squirmed, but his voice was muffled by his older counterpart's bulky frame. Viktor eventually leaned to one side and Yurio yanked himself free, but his spot was then gone, and he could only watch in annoyance as the older figure twisted in place to put his back into the corner, and Yuri came down to sit against him, both facing towards the flat-screen just past Nikki. Yurio could do little but sit indignantly, squished between the older skaters' upturned legs, and a perceived force-field around Nikki's workspace.

"I guess all that stuff you guys were talking about explains why I'd never heard of you until this year." The silver teen suddenly commented, trying to go back to her task, sewing zigzag patterns into the new, lower hem of the pant-legs, "All the big stuff happened before I was even born."

Viktor and Yuri, despite their buzzed haze, both looked a bit surprised to hear those words. But, a few seconds later, they both relaxed.

"So since papa was never able to spring you from Russia, what did happen to you?" She wondered further, "...I thought I heard something about your dad burning yo-"

"He was never my dad." Viktor corrected sharply, "That's a title he never earned."

"Oh...uhm..." Nikki stammered, still a bit surprised by the interruption, "...Your...father then?"

"Let's just stick with his name," Yuri suggested, "Call him Kon."

"...R-Right..."

Viktor shook his head, pushing up against the couch's arm-rest to sit a bit higher against it, and returned his hands around his partner's skinny waist to clasp his fingers over it, "He made me burn my skate...the ones my old coach, Yakov, had gotten me earlier that winter." He explained, still feeling the sting of it, "He hated skating as much as a person could hate something, and it was pretty hard when he found out my mom was helping me do it in secret. Papa Mimi said my mom had called him soon after it happened, and then he came a few weeks later, apparently looking to take me away from that place. I wasn't there to see it, so I didn't believe it at first. I spent as much time as I could away from home after the incident, using my tank playground to keep me occupied in the wood."

"...Tank...playground?" Nikki echoed skeptically.

"We don't know how long they were there for," Yuri explained, "There were trees and roots growing through them...so maybe since World War 2. We were out there last winter for something, and I got to see the tanks myself... Viktor actually found an old backpack in one, that he'd hidden away with his first skates as a kid. They turned out to be the ones Kon used when he was young. They were these bent old antiques that you tie to your shoes."

"Oh..."

"...We...actually also found the skates that Kon had forced Viktor to burn." Yuri went on, clasping one hand over where his partner's were folded together against his side, "They were burnt beyond use, having been in that old wood-stove for some fifteen years. Kon said he didn't realize they were still in there, but I doubt that."

"Yeah..." Viktor agreed, "There's no way he could've known they were in there."

"Seriously..." Yuri nodded quietly.

"We tried to put the whole thing to rest by burying those old burnt blades in the woods by those tanks. My father said he'd plant one of mom's rose bushes on top of them once the ground thawed out and the roots could take hold of something. Whether he does or not...I doubt I'll ever know. I won't ever be going back there."

Yuri had nothing to say against it. He just nodded again, feeling the latent despair that had followed them out of Russia, and the relief that had bound it to the border.

"You were twelve when Yakov got you onto the team." Yurio finally chimed in, trying to get a little comfortable in his small wedge of the couch, and leaned against the upturned knees Yuri had propped up near to him. Putting one elbow across them, he turned to look at Viktor, "Right?"
"Yeah." He answered simply, "The skating season had already ended when my father made me burn those boots, and so when the next one rolled around, Yakov noticed I wasn't coming to the rink like before. He came to our house to find out what was going on...and the next thing he knew, he was my new guardian and we were driving back to St. Petersburg. I didn't go back again until last year when my mom died."

"Oh... I'm sorry..." Nikki said quietly.

"So you lived with him back then?" Yurio wondered, "Does that mean you lived with Lilia, too?"

"Yakov had just finished his split from her, so his house was pretty empty. Might be the only reason he was able to take me in at the time." Viktor explained, "I'm entirely not sure how things would've worked out if she'd still been there."

"If she was the same back then as she is now, probably the same, but with more arguing." The teen huffed, "She means well but she's pretty bossy; an absolute slave-driver. Living with her was like being in a military barracks, I swear."

"You wouldn't know a military barracks if one dropped from the sky and bit you in the butt." Mikhail teased, leaning against the doorframe, "Lilia was a Saint compared to the sergeants and drill-masters I dealt with."

"It was regimented as Hell!" Yurio protested.

"Oh no, structure!" The elder teased and laughed, lifting his half-drained wine glass to his lips, "How horrible!"

The Tiger was shrinking into a tiny kitten, and he sulked where he leaned against his friend's knees, laughter coming at him from most sides of the room.

"Hun come back, something's weird." Minako's voice called, and the snickering elder Russian turned back find her. What he found was Minako standing over a pot of semi-boiling water with what looked like a big-holed cheese-grater across the top, and a square-shaped porcelain box on top, full of dough. She just gestured at it, "You said this stuff would go down and get cut into bits, but...it's not even doing it now. It'll just smear back and forth without making the little noodle-dumpling things."

Mikhail blinked at her, then at the pot and spätzle-maker above it, and with one finger, nudged the square holder forward. The dough lowered down by an inch in the dish by the time it slid to the other side of the grater, and Mikhail could almost hear the click in his partner's head.

"Okay you can go away now." She said instead, nudging him back, "Go, be gone. Nothing to see here."

He chortled quietly into his wine, and rubbed the ballerina's back before he returned to the doorway. Jade eyes went down to where it looked like Nikkita had finished her work finally, as she held up the show-pants and shook them out.

"Here," She started, turning to hand them over to the kitten next to her, "See if these come down far enough."

Yurio perked up and looked the pants over, "...Why zigzags?"

"Zigzag stitches offer flexibility in material that stretches. If I did just a straight line across, the thread would either break or the cuff would have no give. Go, go! If I have to make adjustments, I don't have lots of time to do them!"

Yurio hopped off the couch and darted around the table as told, squeezing past Mikhail in the doorway to find the bathroom just around the corner. The light clicked on and the door closed behind him.

Once gone, Nikki stretched her legs out and yawned, then started putting her supplies onto the big wooden table in front of the couch. She leaned back against the couch and looked at the television briefly, watching a few seconds of some random program her sister had found, but then rolled her head back the other way to look at the duo in the opposite corner, "What if you were a girl instead?" She blurted unexpectedly, staring at her cousin.

Viktor just gaped at her, "...If...I was a girl instead?" He repeated, "There were a lot of things that would've been different if I had been. What difference does it make?"

"Well..." Nikki looked up again, "When Kon came to Nationals with us, the way he acted towards Vikki and me was super different from how he treated papa or even Yuri. Right?" She looked towards her sister, who had been entirely silent to that point.

"Huh?"

"Kon, in Russia. He was really sweet and protective towards us."

"...I guess so."

"Yeah, he even picked us up and tried to shield us from the snowstorm." Nikki went on, "I was a bit nervous around him at first because of what I'd heard about him, but he was really nice."

"And serial killers always turn out to be the guy no one suspected." Mikhail huffed, "Never judge someone based solely on how they treat you when you're in public. Everyone has their dark side, that they only show to certain people or in certain places."

Nikki just gave that naive young teenaged look, "What's your dark side?"

"Business Mode." Viktoria answered for him, rising up from her chair as though impatient or frustrated, "But I don't think you've seen it."

"...Business Mode?" Nikki and Viktor echoed in tandem, turning their eyes towards the nervous-looking figure in the doorway, "What's that?"

Mikhail coughed, "Erm...well. It's when I stop being fun?"

Viktor deadpanned him, "Oh, like the time you argued with me about the car keys?"

The elder grumbled, "I wasn't arguing. You being difficult about something dumb and I was trying to get you to be reasonable."

"That's Business Mode for sure." Viktoria clarified, breaking up the tension, "Be glad he didn't do the hair-thing, too, cuz then he's really insufferable."

"...Hair-thing?" Everyone echoed back at her.

Pale hands pressed against Mikhail's frame to push him back into the kitchen area, just as Yurio came back through with the new pants on. Viktoria just kept moving until she was through as well and disappeared from sight, leaving the living-room in an awkward silence, save for the television.
Yurio blinked open doorway, pointing at it as he looked back at his friends.

They both shrugged in confusion. "The pants look good though."

He looked down towards his feet and examined how the hem went past his heel, bunching up just under it, "Yeah, this'll work. ...I guess I'll just...sit in them for a bit..." He said, ambling slowly towards the seat Viktoria had abandoned.

"Does this t.v. get the channel showing the event?" Yuri wondered, leaning far aside for the remote control, "I wanna see how Mila and Sara do."

Within the kitchen, Viktoria went up to the stove to see what the food-status was, and looked into the big pot to see Minako stirring the still-melting cheese shreds, "How long? I'm starving."

"Just a few more minutes. You wanna help?" Mikhail answered, setting his now-empty wine-glass down before reaching to open a nearby cabinet.

The teen glanced out past the door, hearing the sound of what could only be figure skating coming back through from the television, "...Yeah, may as well."

"You okay?" The elder wondered quietly, starting to pull small bowls down, "You did the thing again."

"What, walking?"

"...In so many words."

Viktoria took the first stack of bowls and moved over to the kitchen table, reaching for one of the salad spoons that had been left next to the big bowl, "I guess I'm just curious."

"What about?"

"Why you skipped the whole section of your life about how you met mom and why you even married her." She answered, stirring the salad idly, pulling up the balsamic that had settled on the bottom, "It's important, isn't it?"

Mikhail got a nervous tingle in his gut, and he glanced over at Minako briefly before going back to the table with the last few bowls, "Of course it is...but it's not always the best idea to talk about old love in front of new love."

"So mom's just off limits now..."

"She's not. If you want to talk about her, we can."

Viktoria was quiet for a moment, but unstacked the first bowl and fished out the first spoonful of the salad into it, "...I'm not even sure what to ask now. You skipped over her so fast that it's like you didn't want to bring it up anyway."

"If you're asking whether or not I'm bitter, then sure, I'm super bitter." He explained, "She kept you guys away from me, like she held you hostage. I missed out on some of the best years of your young lives, and the only reason I got you back was because she died. That's miserable."

"She told us that you didn't want to be there."

"...Well, that's a crock if I ever heard one." He huffed indignantly, "Did I ever give you the impression that what she said about me was true?"
The teen hesitated, but then went around her father's back to push the door closed to the living-room. With her hand still on the olive-green panel, she looked back, "I'm not sure what to believe from her. The stuff she said made sense, but...it was like finding two puzzle pieces that seem to fit together at first, but the further you go, you realize they don't fit at all and you have to reexamine everything."

"...You were really young. Not even ten yet. Your mom changed a lot, even to me, and I knew what was going on."

Viktoria raised her right hand and pushed a few colored strands of her silver hair over her ear, "...It really sucked... Sergio was so attached to her, and mad at you for leaving. Nikki didn't know better; she was too young to understand. But there I was, in the middle...you were gone and mom was losing her mind... And all those years, I wished you were around, and then when you finally came, you brought other people with you." She said quietly, looking at the salad in that one little bowl that she'd put together, "...But now I hear all this stuff about how desperate you were to get Viktor...how you lied to mom, went to Russia to get him...all these things you were ready to do to bring him back with you, and it doesn't seem like you fought even half that hard for us..."

"I can tell you everything you want to know." Mikhail said, pulling his daughter into a hug, "But there's a lot to say, and I wouldn't be doing you any favors to start now, only to stop in 30 seconds because dinner's ready and then we have to go. Can I get a rain-check until after Yuri's thing is done? Then we can talk until we're blue in the face."

"...Promise?"

"Yeah absolutely. We'll make it a date." He nodded eagerly, and pat the teen's shoulder, "Let's finish serving this stuff up then. It's best when it's fresh."
Sorry for the delay. I had a pretty acute case of writer's block about halfway through this chapter and couldn't think of what to do. I'm still a bit unsure what to write so I apologize if the second half of the chapter seems kind of aimless. I may alter it later.

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED ELEVEN

Staring at the closed door, Nikki tilted her head, first out of curiosity, then out of impatience. With sewing box in one hand and the mini-iron - now cooled - in the other, she put her knuckles to her hips and banged her forehead against the textured translucent glass, "Augh, what are you guys doing in there!?

"Just come in." Mikhail hollered back, voice muffled by the door.

Finagling her things to one arm, the youngest of the group managed to get her fingers around the handle, pull it down, and pulled the door open. The smell of the food was like a Heaven Send to an empty stomach, but Nikki was on a mission, and in nearly comical fashion, grabbed the door from the inside to pull it closed again.

When the latch clicked, three pairs of eyes glanced at each other.

"...Is it always like this?" Yuri asked, stretching his legs out before rolling over where he was, going chest-down on his partner's larger frame. His feet flopped against the other arm-rest, and he let his right arm dangle over the edge of the couch, the left curled up in the wedge of space between Viktor's side and the seat-cushion.

Yurio gawked at him, "Always like what?"

"Where it seems like Viktoria is bothered about something."

The teen snorted a breath and stared at the door, "She hardly ever talks. No one seems to think it's weird though so it must not be new. I don't get it though. It's like she's always waiting for someone else to ask her what's wrong because she won't speak up on her own."

With fingers nearly dragging on the floor, Yuri waggled them until Jiro came up, and rubbed that warm round puppy belly when the little Akita flopped onto his back. Makkachin was quick to occupy the newly-vacated space on the couch, too, lying down right on top of Yuri's legs, though he slipped between them like sand through a sieve. Satisfied with the 'this space was made for me' sort of snugness, the poodle repurposed one of the man's thighs as a pillow and looked quite pleased about it. Yuri looked back over his shoulder at the brown fluff, smiled, and set his head back down onto his partner's chest, feeling a hug come up under his arms and around his back. He closed his eyes and hummed a happy sigh, "This is the best."

"You two don't make any sense at all."

"Why's that?" Viktor wondered, settling into the cuddle, stretching his own long legs out.
"All this..." The teen started gesturing at them, "...This. Don't you ever get tired of crawling all over each other?"

"Nope."

"You don't know what it's like cuz you've never let anyone get that close to you." Yuri explained, retracting his arms until he could slide his hands into the small space under Viktor's back where the arm-rest rose from the seats, and hugged tightly, "...There was once a time when I couldn't stand the idea of anyone touching me. Now I think it's great...but only with Viktor."

Jiro whined a bit as he scrambled back up to his puppy nubbins, rising up onto his back paws to poke at the arm that had just abandoned him. Viktor reached down to scoop the pup up and deposited him onto Yuri's back, only for Jiro to roll into the U-shaped gap between Yuri's side, Viktor's hip, and the back of the couch. Little legs flailed for a moment, but Jiro settled there soon enough, sniffing at Makkachin's floppy ears when the poodle looked over to investigate.

"The correct terminology for this sort of thing is a 'cuddle pile.'" Viktor explained, returning his arm to the snuggly hug around his smaller partner, "It's highly technical."

"A 20-second hug reduces the impact of stress and lowers blood pressure." Yuri affirmed, "A 10-second hug can ease depression and fatigue, and even fight infection by boosting the immune system. But it only works if it's with someone you trust. If you hug a stranger that long, it just gets awkward."

"Mrph..." Yuri grumbled, leaning back into his single-person seat, dropping the side of his jaw into his palm.

Yuri turned his face up to spot the irritated Kitten, "Babies who don't get affectionate touch can actually die, even if they get all their other needs met. Maybe you didn't get enough hugs when you were really young."

Yurio just piffle-grumbled into his hand and looked the other way.

"You should try hugging your sisters more."

"Pfft."

"I know Nikki hugged you at the Final before our triple-skate...maybe she coul-"

"I don't need more hugs." Yurio argued.

Yuri just smiled innocently, "I can see from here that your Anger Organ is starting to fill up again...though it has been at historic lows... I don't think my hugs are enough."

Before the Russian Punk had a chance to retort again, ears caught the sound of the kitchen door jiggling and clicking, and finally pushed into the room, "Dinner tiiiime~!"

Dog heads popped up immediately, and paws scrambled for the hardwood to see what was being brought in. Mikhail came in first, carrying a wide wooden tray with stacked plates and bowls, followed by Viktoria with another tray with the series of smaller salad bowls, and napkin-rolled utensils. Minako came third, pausing in the doorway briefly to look back for the fourth member of their little group, and stepped aside to let Nikki through before coming in after her.

"Right, so there really aren't enough proper spots to sit at the table with so many people, but I think we're safe enough out here." The elder explained, watching as Yuri quickly tried to move things out of the way on the big coffee table to make room, "Ah, thanks."

Viktor pushed up into the corner of the couch to sit normally, and dragged his legs off the edge. He drew in a breath, smelling the aromas wafting through the room, but it was his partner who spoke the words on the tip of his tongue.

"Smells really good."

"The best food is the kind we make together."

Yurio sunk into his chair a little bit, but his meekishness didn't go unnoticed.

"You're on clean-up duty." Mikhail teased, handing him the first bowl with a plate covering the top, "Or would you rather change first?"

The Tiger blinked, but shook his head, and took the offered bowl, watching quietly as everyone else got their own in turn. The smaller salad bowls were spread out on top of the long coffee-table. By the time everyone had their share, Nikki and Viktoria had squished onto the couch, and the two chairs from the kitchen had been brought in for the two oldest members of the group. Everyone got as close to the coffee-table as they could.

"I know this is nothing compared to the fancy stuff you're used to at Yu-Topia, but I hope this at least tastes alright." Mikhail said, taking the small plate off the top of his käsespätzle bowl, and watched the steam rise from the cheesy dish.

Everyone else followed suit and unlidded their own, breathing in the smell of the afternoon's efforts. Even the two pups got their own small portions as treats.

"Bon appétit."

The snowfall that had begun earlier hadn't let up, leaving a good few inches on the ground already, fluffy and light. Makkachin leapt right out the door and into the flurry, jumping in the air to try catching big chunks with each pass. Jiro was content to try and pin each snowflake down as they landed, only to lift his paws, unable to find the bit he'd squashed. Both canines looked up curiously when the herd of humans went by, like a procession of shadows through the white swirl, and pranced through the cold to catch up.

Shoes moving through the snow weren't quite like the crunches on hard-pack, but more like a wet, velveteen squish. A line soon formed, moving away from the door as it was locked behind them. Yurio took the lead, the ends of his twin-tailed hat swaying behind him with each step. Trailing behind him, his two 'siblings,' each with their phones out as they walked elbow to elbow. Behind them in turn, the SkateHusbands with their pups, and at the back, the proverbial - and in some cases, literal - parents of the whole group.

"You've been strangely quiet for the last hour or so," Yuri commented, keeping his voice low as they walked through the new snow.

"We were eating." Viktor answered with a slight shrug, rubbing his thumb across his partner's where he had both their hands in his coat pocket.

"As if having your mouth full has ever stopped you from talking." Yuri teased. He felt the fingers come away from his own as the Russian's hand withdrew, finding its way up behind his back to rest on his shoulder, pulling him inward.
"Hopefully you won't suddenly knock me in the head again if it happens in the future."

He just offered an innocent smile, keeping his fingers hooked into that pocket, "It was entirely unintentional. ...But seriously, you have been pretty quiet."

Viktor leaned back up to his regular height, and loosened the tight grip he had on his spouse's shoulder, "I've just been thinking."

"What about?"

Slate eyes scanned the trio ahead of them, being aware of the pair behind them without needing to look, "...I haven't quite figured that out yet."

Yuri made a face, "...Is that good or bad?"

"Neither?" The Russian answered, his uncertainty confusing even himself, "I'm not really sure. I feel like my brain just dumped out a puzzle box, and every piece is a different thought. I'm working on putting it together into something that makes sense."

"...Was it because of what I said about hugs...?" Yuri offered, "That's what I was talking about when I last remember you saying anything."

"Mmhh..."

Yuri pulled his hand out of his partner's pocket and slid that arm behind the man's back, "I'll just let you keep thinking about it then. You'll tell me when you sort it out."

"Yeah..."

The sun had already been low in the sky when the group left to walk to the arena, but the quickly sinking winter sky had gone entirely black by the time they'd arrived. Snow still fell all around, blanketing the city in a thick white glaze, and raising a fog that turned everything into a greyish, out-of-focus soup. Lights twinkled through windows and on the tops of lamp posts, giving the night a sort of enchanted, mysterious ambiance.

Arriving at the arena felt much like it had the night before, with a large crowd loitering on the peninsula of intersecting streets. Yurio's distinctive and colorful hat had gotten the attention of the people, and the usual excited cheering and flashes of cameras followed him to the participant's entryway, where his own little fanclub was parked and waiting for him. The blonde paused when he spotted their signs from a slight distance, before they'd caught sight of him in turn, and let out a slightly annoyed sigh.

"What's the matter? I thought you were used to them." Nikki wondered, coming up on his side, "Yuri?"

"...I've thought for a long time that they were kind of annoying." He admitted, his voice a slight monotone, "They've been following me to all the competitions they could for a few years now. Back when I first noticed them, I felt entitled to their praise...because I was younger and dumb and pretty arrogant. I always kept my distance though. They were part of the audience, and I was part of the event...always a wall between us, even when I walked by them at the airport or in the hotels, and places like this."

"...But now...it's different?"
"I can't help but wonder if they'll still be around when I get to the other side of this physical change I'm starting on." He admitted quietly, "Or if I'll wind up like many of those child stars who suddenly get unpopular when they become adults."

"Well, if they stop liking you because you've grown up, then they aren't really fans, are they?"

"I know, and I've told myself that...but it's still a bit daunting. I'm having to face the reality that I'm not entitled to their cheers at all...I actually do have to earn them, and I can lose them."

"Gasp!" Viktor's voice suddenly interjected, "Is that the sound of Yuri Plisetsky growing up!?"

The teen grit his teeth and spun around on his heel, spotting the cheesy grin on his older counterpart's face, "Wh-... V-Viktor!"

"I never thought I'd see this day come." The older Russian went on, wiping away fake tears with a finger, "Our beautiful SkateSon is becoming a man."

Yuri stood by with a nervous smile on his face, "He's being so dramatic." He shook his head though and tried to look more normal, "Do you want us to come with you?"

"If you want to, you can." Yurio grumbled, mentally weighing the levels of annoyance he'd be inflicted with, between Viktor's sarcastic cajoling and the screams of a group of girls wanting to put cat-ears on his head for fun. He looked beyond them though, at the still-weird sight of Viktoria wearing her father's hat, to the taller figures behind her; his sort-of-but-not-quite parents. It was impossible to hear what anyone was saying beyond the small circle standing around him, but he could tell the pair were speaking to one another. His attention was grabbed though by arms suddenly going around him, and the brief flash of concern that he didn't know who it was.

"I'll go with you!" Nikkita said, effectively revealing herself as the culprit, "I won't draw near as much attention as those two would, being down in the prep area." She added, thumbing back at the skating duo behind her, who were trying to look innocent within the growing dazzle of camera flashes.

"She has a point...people are starting to notice we're here." Yuri agreed, looking around to the circle that was forming around them, "We don't want to steal the show since we're not skating."

"Not tonight anyway." Yurio huffed, "But...this is fine. I better go. I'm supposed to do a pre-program interview since there wasn't time for one after the SP yesterday."

"Yeah, I'll bet Chris and Georgi are already inside for it, too." Viktor nodded, looking 'normal' again as he scanned around the area, "This event is sure packing things tightly, aren't they? Doing that session when the FP is starting."

"This arena doesn't honestly seem to be built like a place that leaves a lot of room to make things easy." Yurio shrugged, "Maybe this is the best they can do." He looked up at the pair and nodded, "I'm gonna get inside so they know I'm here."

Yuri and Viktor both nodded in agreement and stepped around to offer one big hug, even squishing Nikki in the middle for good measure, "Davai, Yuri~" They cheered, pulling off as Minako stepped up, shaking her head and smiling at them.

"Don't squash him too hard." She mused, "He still has to be able to skate later."

"Gbff..." Yurio huffed as he was given space again, and reached up to adjust his hat, "I feel like I need to be re-inflated like a tire."
"Skate with all you've got." Yuri added, "And don't forget, we have a fancy thing to do tomorrow. Win Gold so you're in a good mood."

"I'll win Gold." The Tiger said, his usual confidence starting to creep in under the anxiety of his prior thoughts, "Then I'll have something to taunt Otabek with when I see him at Four Continents."

"Pfft, Otabek doesn't get jealous like that." Nikki chortled, latching onto her 'brother's' arm, "He gets even."

"You've watched him compete one time. How would you know how he normally acts?" Yurio guffawed, feeling Minako starting to nudge him towards the competitor's entryway. He could see the remaining members of the group waving as he went, until they disappeared into the constantly-moving crowd.

"It's not like a competition is the only place where people show off their personalities." She retorted, stepping up into the more open pathway for coaches and skaters to walk unhindered to the doors, "You know I talk to him online."

"...Maybe you shouldn't?" He grumbled, hearing the start of the excited cries of Yuri's Angels as they got closer.

"Why not? You jealous?" Nikki taunted smugly.

Yurio just gaped at her with brow furrowed, "He's like...six years older than you."

"So? My mom was eight years younger than papa."

Minako's left eye twitched slightly, "Robbing the cradle...sheesh."

"It's different when you're both already adults." Yurio tried to explain, though feeling a sting in his gut, "It's just weird when you're 14. Why are you even making a comparison between you two and your parents? Do you have a thing for him or something? Is that why you always talk to him?"

Nikki's face went bright red, but she just let go of Yurio's arm and punched it lightly instead, "I don't. Quit making stuff up."

The sting became a freezing liquid rush, "Oh my god you do."

"I just said that I don't."

"Come along, kids, we can't just stop walking." Minako interrupted, stepping between them and taking both their hands to make them keep up, "Keep your eyes on the prize, Yuri. No distractions."

"This is a really big distraction."
Chapter 512

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWELVE

Hearing the tag end of the trio’s banter, both Yuri and Viktor smirked nervously, feeling the prickly air around Mikhail standing just behind them. Yuri glanced back first, looking at the elder like the man was ready to start lecturing his youngest daughter even though she wasn’t there anymore.

"Well, I'm not surprised." Viktor laughed, finally breaking the awkward silence in their little group, "Otabek's the 'dark, handsome, and mysterious' type. I bet he's swamped with ladies."

"My baby girl isn't a lady yet." Mikhail stammered, "She needs a few more years to grow up."

"She's turning 15 in a week." Viktoria said flatly, "A couple hundred years ago, she'd already be a mother of two with a third on the way."

"This isn't a couple hundred years ago. She's still a kid."

"Then all the better that she likes a guy who lives nowhere near where we do."

"Yeah, Otabek went back to Almaty in Kazakhstan last year." Yuri chimed in, "He's actually a pretty nice guy though. Quiet, but nice."

Mikhail loomed over, giving Yuri the same creeping terror that Minako had when she'd been on the verge of finding out what had happened to his 'figure skater's body.' "I'm a father. No man is good enough for my girls." He said eerily, only to then deflate and look rather anxious, "...I can't believe this is already happening... It feels like just yesterday that she was learning to walk."

"And tomorrow, you're gonna wake up and realize you can only get around with a walker with the tennis balls on the bottom." Viktor teased, "And you'll wonder where all the time went."

"I already wonder where all the time went." Mikhail whined, reaching up to his head, only to find that the hat he was going to tug on pitifully wasn't there. He kept his hands there, and looked to Viktoria, who simply turned on a heel and started heading into the crowd, towards the doors, and with his hat.

All three watched her go, but it was Yuri who dared to ask the question, "What's up with her lately? Is she mad...?" He wondered, looking back to the teen's father.

Mikhail's brow furrowed, and he flicked the snow off his hair with a few finger-swats, "She's a bit annoyed with me."

"...Really? How come?"

The elder was quiet for a moment, formulating how to parse his words, but then shook his head, "...She resents me for being gone as much as Viktor did. The circumstances were different, and I did still talk to them a lot, but...it doesn't change the fact that I wasn't physically there for the day-to-day. She must've heard me whining about Nikki being my 'baby girl' and thought, 'well, no shit, Sherlock, the last time you were really there for us, she was a baby.'" He explained, looking even more deflated than before, "I have so much time to make up for, with everyone it seems..."

"You seem to have really bad luck with stuff like this." Viktor surmised, giving a nervous smile, "Hopefully the third time's the charm."
"...If Minako gets tired of me, too...I don't know what I'd do."

"Well at least she can't take your kids away." Viktor appraised, only to get shot a look, and he hid behind Yuri for safe measure, "...Mmmmmmost of them."

Mikhail kept the look on his face for a moment longer, but then sighed, "...I don't want to count my chickens before they've hatched. As much as I hate admitting my age, Minako and I are both pretty old to be doing this. Honestly, I worry every second of every day that something's going to happen... It's taking every ounce of will-power not to smother her. She'd hate me if I hovered like I want to..."

"Yeah, Minako-sensei likes her breathing space." Yuri agreed quietly, looking past Viktor's arm to where the competitors were going inside, though Yurio and the rest were already in and beyond sight. He turned back to the anxious older man in front of him, "She'll tell you if something's wrong though. Of that much, I'm certain."

"What makes you so sure?"

"Experience." He shrugged, leaning back into Viktor's frame, "She's always been pretty expressive. There's no question about it when she's upset about something. Everyone knows it."

Mikhail still looked unsettled though, and sunk a bit into the upturned lapels of his black long-coat, "...This is so different from everything else though. When we're alone, I get this feeling from her, like she thinks her body betrayed her, and that just means...that I did, too, technically. Or I helped, anyway."

"That may well be the case." Yuri agreed, casting his eyes downward for a moment to watch Jiro and Makkachin still exploring their immediate surroundings, and eyeballing anyone who walked nearby, "But I seriously doubt she'd carry on with this if she wasn't sure about it, in her own way. Unlike Viktoria, where getting an explanation may be as hard as squeezing water from a rock, Minako-sensei is pretty forward."

"...I guess so."

"The doors are open." Viktor chimed in, "We can go find seats...and Viktoria."

"I'll leave the seat-finding to you kids." Mikhail said, "I'll find my daughter and catch up with you."

Yurio scanned the large room, looking over the press huddle and the camera crews on the sides, and a good sized chunk of the Men's Singles group in the seats in the middle. There was a woman at the front of the room with a long velvet sack in her hands, and seated at the table just behind her, with the Euros banner-board behind them in turn, was one older woman with a microphone and a man sitting to her right.

"Looks like we got here just in time for the order drawing." Minako surmised, "Let's find somewhere to sit before they start calling people up."

"...Why do I get this feeling like we're behind the curve on everything this weekend?" The Tiger asked aloud, following Nikki through the center aisle in the seating area, "We're following the schedule, aren't we?"

Minako pulled her phone out, "Yeah. I don't get it either. I'll ask if there was a new program put out that we somehow didn't get." She said, leaning forward to put her hands on both teens' shoulders, "Stick together and don't wander off. I'll come right back. Save a spot for me."
"Yeah, of course." Nikki answered, watching the woman veer off from them, then turned forward again. As she and the skater following her found their chairs, other skaters were getting called up to the front by name and nationality. They reached into the long sack held by the woman walking the floor in front of the big table, withdrew a number, and the rank was called out and recorded, "Oh...isn't that your old coach?" Nikki wondered suddenly, looking to the other section of the seating area, and pointed, "The one with the hat and the cranky look on his face."

Yurio leered over, "...Yeah, that's Yakov."

"He doesn't talk to you anymore. How come?"

"He's got his own athletes to worry about. He barely talked to Viktor last year at all when he was being a coach." The Tiger shrugged, turning to face forward again, "Yakov just focuses on whoever he's actually here for. He'll talk to you if you go up to him, but he won't go out of his way to return the favor when he's on the clock."

"Oh... Do you miss him?"

"That's a funny way of asking if I miss getting yelled at."

"Do you?" She prodded, "You trained under him for a long time, didn't you? Papa said you even lived with Yakov and your choreographer last year."

"...Yeah, I guess." Yurio leaned away slightly as Nikki pressed in closer, "I don't know, Yakov and I weren't exactly close. He was just my coach. Skaters trade coaches and training facilities all the time. It's not a big deal."

"Oh..."

"...From Russia, Yuri Plisetsky." The announcer called into her mic, scanning the room for the blonde to rise up.

Yurio pushed up to his feet and squeezed back through the row, picked his rank, groaned at it being 22nd, and went back to where he'd started, hoping his seat wasn't cold already when he retook it. The rest of the ranking session went by in a blur, being done in only five minutes. Minako still hadn't returned though when the athletes all started bailing from the room, trading places with the press and photography corps as most headed for the practice rink. Yurio stood off to the side with his younger sister, looking around for his coach, but spotted only Georgi, Yakov, Chris, and Josef coming their way. He cringed under his hoodie and pulled it down over his eyes in an effort to avoid the bunch of them.

Extra bubbly and super-social Nikki, however, waved at them excitedly, "Hiii~!"

"Is this your new coach, Plisetsky?" Chris mused, patting the tiny silver on the head, "One to match your size?"

"You know damn well she's not." He shot back, glaring out from between thin blonde strands.

"Hm, feisty." Chris shook his head, and leaned down to whisper to Nikki, "If he's mean to you, you have my permission to hit him."

She just snickered behind one hand, "Oh I don't wait for permission."

"Better to ask forgiveness?"
"Every time."

"You could get away with murder." Yurio taunted, "The old man dotes on you like you're some princess."

"I'm his princess." She teased, throwing her arms over the cranky Tiger's shoulders, "And it's 'papa,' not 'old man.'"

"That's just what you call him." He grumbled, trying unsuccessfully to wiggle out of the girl's grasp.

"...Well, we only call him 'dad' when he's in trouble."

Stoically proud but weirdly quiet, Georgi just watched them out the corner of his eye, waiting for the event coordinators to give the three of them the clearance to head up to the table. He found himself getting nudged backward though when Minako finally returned, squeezing past the skaters and the far edge of the press corps.

"Jeesh, that took way longer than it had to." She complained, "Sorry I was gone so long. I found out why we didn't have the current program though."

"What happened?" Nikki wondered, finally letting Yurio go.

"Some chuckle-head put my email all in caps, but missed the 'I' in my name, putting a lower-case 'L' instead. ...In any case, things were shifted around a little bit, but only by about 30 minutes, so we got here just in time." She explained, sliding a few loose strands of hair over her ear with a finger, then looked around, "So what rank did you pull? Close to the start?"

"Fat chance. I'm practically last." Yurio answered grimly, seeing the wave from the staffer guarding the tables as everything was being changed out, "Stay here. This'll be a few minutes."

The Tiger stepped forward with the other two skaters - the top three out of the Short Program. Since Georgi came out in first, he found his place in the middle, with the other two on either side. Yurio grit his teeth as the call came for the pre-conference photo-op, and he had to allow Georgi's arm to go over his shoulder in a show of solidarity. It was a relief though when he got to sit; his chair was a good four feet away.

The sports press was quick to get to business, even with the sound of cameras clicking and papers shifting all around in the small space, "We would now like to begin the press conference for the Men's Singles event, following yesterday's Short Program. My question to all three skaters is, how do you feel about your performances in the SP, and what motivations do you have going into tonight's Free Skate?"

Finding seats for themselves, their dogs, and two extras for the pair who would come later on, Yuri and Viktor plunked down close to the center of one long side like they had the day before. The usual shock and awe from those sitting nearby, spotting them as members of the audience again rather than going down to the participant's viewing area, lead to a number of photos and requests for autographs. Sociable as always, Viktor was quick to happily oblige all the fans that approached.

Yuri, on the other hand - though better than he used to be - was still a bit stiff and, although polite, was to-the-point to get it all over with quickly. One conversation with Viktor was entirely in Russian though, leaving Yuri with not much to do but watch the ice and crowd, occasionally checking for signs that Mikhail and Viktoria were on their way over. With nothing to see, Yuri resorted to checking Instagram, keeping Jiro plunked onto his lap, phone against that warm puppy-belly.
Other than a few late posts about Viktor's unscheduled interview, the feed was largely benign, showcasing photos of the previous night's event, a few new posts from the triplets, Yuko offering well-wishes to Yurio, and unrelated posts from Phichit and others gearing up for Four Continents. The butterflies in Yuri's stomach swirled in a maelstrom as he read that Phichit had, at long last, conquered the quad Loop.

"Ne, Viktor-" Yuri started, nudging his husband's arm with the side of his wrist. Slate eyes turned towards him, and the Russian leaned back in his seat, curious. Yuri held up his phone, "Phichit-kun figured out the quad Loop finally. He's gonna be even tougher to beat in Colorado now."

"You're still going to win Gold, my love."

Yuri made a face, "And what are you going to win?"

"Gold, clearly." Viktor laughed, squishing a kiss to his partner's cheek, "That's the way it always goes."

"We're going to have to live at the Ice Castle for the next few weeks to get into fighting form. We've been slacking so badly..." Yuri sighed, looking down slightly, seeing Jiro looking back up at him with a slight tail-wag, "I bet I'm getting a pooch again...all the rich foods we've been eating, and barely any exercise..."

"Noses to the grind-stone when we get home. That's a 10-4." The Russian nodded, "By then, I'll get clearance to start jumping again."

Yuri paused for a moment, but then nodded and offered a wry smile, "I do appreciate that you're taking the ankle thing seriously."

Viktor slid his hand across the arm-rest and offered his spouse a gentle squeeze on the leg, "I may act like I don't think it's a big deal, but I do think pretty long-term. After what happened at the Final, especially...I have a new appreciation for taking it easy when hurt. Seeing how hard you struggled to keep going was a real eye-opener."

"...If nothing else, for the sake of my heart, I'd certainly be happy if I never see you get taken off the ice on a stretcher."

"It hasn't happened yet and I don't plan on it happening anytime in the near future." Viktor reassured, settling into his seat, giving Makkachin beside him a few head-scratches, "It's been kind of nice to take it easy though."

"Sort of."

"Sort of, yeah." He laughed in agreement, "I worked a lot out of my system yesterday morning; I'd been feeling pretty antsy for not skating in a while. I've really got an itch to go back to coach-mode, too. So...it'll be long, hard days in Hasetsu after you recover from your jet-lag."

"I'm actually looking forward to it."

"Only two more sleeps till we're home."
With the rink in the 'spare' hall being used for practice, once the Free Program got going, it was right down to business in a flash. The top 24 of the Short Program were ready to hash it out for the podium, and the first athlete of the night slid out into the rink. His program went by in a blur of spins, jumps, and fancy footwork, set to one of the Classics.

[FRA] Benard, REMY - 71.25 - 156.28 - 227.53

The second skater came out, impressing the crowd with a much more energetic show, dancing to the more up-beat sounds of a techno selection.

[DEU] Fritz, LEON - 73.19 - 166.82 - 240.01

[2][FRA] Benard, REMY - 71.25 - 156.28 - 227.53

The third, and the fourth skaters also dazzled the audience, one using a song from a movie soundtrack, the other skating to a more traditional ballet piece.

[DEU] Fritz, LEON - 73.19 - 166.82 - 240.01

[EST] Ivanov, KASPAR - 68.87 - 169.31 - 238.18

[3][FRA] Benard, REMY - 71.25 - 156.28 - 227.53

By the time the fifth competitor glided out onto the ice, a particular pair of eyes was less interested in what was going on within the rink than they were in the absence of something outside the rink.

"Where are they?"

"...You think he can't find us?" Yuri wondered, "I haven't gotten any texts."

"Me neither." Viktor added, "Maybe him and Viktoria went down to hang out with Minako."

"...He said to save them seats though. That means we're on the hook to keep them until they show up."

"Yeah..."

"I'll text him." Yuri offered, clicking his phone on as Viktor settled back into his seat. Jiro had decided to snooze on his human's lap, head tilted against Yuri's chest so the pup would always be looking in his direction, and those dark eyes cracked open slightly when Jiro felt hands settle on his hip. They closed again though as Yuri started typing a quick message, "Who knows if he'll even see this, but..."

"Maybe he still hasn't even found her." Viktor wondered, slouching slightly in his seat, and leaning until he felt his shoulder press against his partner's, "...I don't know why I'm worried. It's none of my business."

"Well, you're on good terms with Mikhail now, so it makes sense that you're empathetic to what he's going through." Yuri pointed out, turning his elbow on the arm-rest to hold his hand out, and curled his fingers around the hand that found it, "I think it's just...more confusing right now than anything. Because Viktoria's barely said more than two words to or around either of us, it's impossible to really
"...Teenage angst over all the changes in their lives recently? Maybe it's only just really hit her. Everything happened so fast. Being with Mimi must've just felt like a sudden vacation, and the fact that they're not going back to Banff is only now sinking in."

"That's my bet." Yuri agreed. He felt one of Viktor's fingers starting to slide softly against his own, curling and threading idly. It was like a little finger dance, and Yuri moved his own in turn, offering what soothing touch he could.

"...Maybe this is my fault. I wonder if they're mad that I'm not more social with them." The silver wondered, eyes on the ice even if he wasn't paying close attention, the overture of Carl Maria von Weber's 'Der Freischütz' playing all around them, "I just don't know the first thing to say to them."

"You're taking on some of my bad habits; don't borrow trouble by finding a way to make it about how you may be what's wrong." Yuri advised, "I don't think either of them would be ornery because you don't talk to them much anyway. At least, not unless they've tried to talk to you first, and you rebuffed them somehow."

"...I wouldn't if they came to me."

"I know. You'll talk to anyone who approaches you. You're a really nice person."

"When I'm not being the worst person."

"Pfft." Yuri sputtered, turning his head around to look straight at the man, "Viktor."

Cool blue eyes turned slightly back, but Viktor just squinted slightly and made a face.

"You're the most amazing person I know, but nobody's perfect. That's what makes us all human."

"I feel like I'm slipping a bit, though." Viktor sighed, "Do you think I'm projecting?"

"Mhhh... Maybe a little bit. Give yourself some time to recover from these past few weeks. You've had a lot of negative stuff suddenly heaped onto your shoulders all at once, and it's been really stressful." Yuri recommended, pushing up slightly in his seat so he could reach far enough to peck a kiss to his husband's cheek, "We'll go back to Hasetsu and back to being us. The Exhibition tomorrow will be our big kick-off to normality."

Viktor seemed to agree for a time, nodding as he let himself watch the conclusion of the program on the ice.

[1][DEU] Fritz, LEON - 73.19 - 166.82 - 240.01
[2][ITA] Ricci, ALESSANDRO - 84.25 - 155.54 - 239.79
[3][EST] Ivanov, KASPAR - 68.87 - 169.31 - 238.18
[4][FRA] Benard, REMY - 71.25 - 156.28 - 227.53

The audience was still clapping at the results when Yuri glanced over. Viktor had barely offered the bare minimum applause before resting his elbows down again, looking in the direction of the rink, but with that thousand-yard stare that made it plain he was looking through the ice, not really at it. Yuri twisted around in his seat, trying not to bother his snoozing Akita, and reached his right hand around to nudge his partner's face towards him, "What else?"

"...What else?" The dumbfounded Russian echoed.
Yuri brushed his thumb against his husband's cheek, "Your thoughts are like a stream, but I get the sense there's a rock in the middle of it. What else?"

"...It isn't really normal back home." Viktor blurted, his eyes serious.

"...Well, we'll need a bit of time to get used to Yurio being around again, but I-" Viktor interrupted, pulling his hand up from Makkachin's fluff to gently take his partner's fingers off his cheek, and kissed them, "Yurio being around was already normal for me. I'm talking about Saito."

Yuri was quiet, brow furrowed slightly, knowingly.

"I've been far kinder, and more tolerant of him, than I ever needed to be." The Russian explained, "And I'd be lying if I said it didn't make me nauseous to know he's going to be at Yu-Topia when we get back. The only thing stopping me from chasing him into the hills with a torch and pitch-fork is knowing how much worse things would be if I did. If he's still going to Four Continents and the Games, it's far easier to be on good or neutral terms with him than to be enemies. ...But, mark my words, he is my enemy."

"But it was my fault-"

"No." He said firmly, cutting Yuri off entirely. He let go of his partner's fingers and slid his and forward, curling his fingers behind Yuri's head and neck to pull him closer, and kissed his brow, "You started the fight, but he alone chose to put his hands on you. Nothing I've learned about what's happened to him, and nothing he's said or done since, will ever get me to forgive what he did to you...and while you may have gotten me to stop putting on the mask that I wear for the public, the one I wear for him is all that stands between peace and a declaration of war."

"...So then why are you actively helping him so much...? I calls you senpai now because of it..."

"Because if he gets help from me, he won't seek comfort from you. He'll have no excuse to get close to you. I can control how the interactions go and I can keep him a safe distance away."

Yuri frowned, and lowered his head until only his nose hooked over the edge of Viktor's shoulder. He looked down and sighed.

"Him kissing you was just the first violation." Viktor went on, rubbing his cheek against his partner's forehead, "His complete disregard for your feelings was another. He caused your panic attack in the audience, he caused you to pass out from the stress. But worse than those things, he made you run away from me when we got back to the hotel. He wormed his way into the middle of our relationship, made a giant mess, and then left, using the excuse that he didn't think he'd be around to see the damage he'd done. His actions forced me to wonder if you'd been raped, and I had to go looking online for help on what to do if you had been. I had those images going through my mind, and hearing what really happened did nothing to make me forget what I'd imagined. To me, it doesn't even matter what he did or didn't do...he hurt you, and for that, I will never forgive him. Watching you starting to remember things that you'd buried all those years ago, just makes my hatred for him go deeper. It even makes my appreciation for Chris go up, because he was trying to protect you back then, too."

"...I don't want you to carry around those kinds of feelings though..." Yuri protested, barely audible over the next skater's music, "It was hard enough when I knew you were doing it because of Kon...and he was a thousand miles away. Asahi is in Hasetsu. Any little thing he does might set you off, and it'll be like watching you do your Rage Skate all over again, except it'll be all the time."
Viktor look on, forlorn, but before he could say anything, a puppy-nubbin squished against his cheek, and both men turned their eyes to look at the culprit. Jiro had stretched both arms forward, the other paw going over Yuri's opposite shoulder, as though the toe-bean swat to Viktor's face was entirely incidental. The pup yawned widely, and stood up just enough to get his snoot between the duo, giving them each a few licks before settling down again, the offending paw sliding down a few inches. Viktor's brow furrowed, "...I wish he was fully grown, and that we'd taken him to Nationals in the first place. Maybe he could've protected you while I wasn't there."

"Please don't carry that albatross around your neck. It's not your fault."

"It's no use, my love." Viktor said, giving a morose smile, "You'll never be able to convince me that it wasn't. I made a vow to protect you and keep you, and I let you go off on your own in a place where I knew danger was stalking. People do get put in jail for murder even if their method was negligence or disregard."

"...You weren't being either though... You were doing an interview and I was trying to talk on the phone. You make it sound like you may as well have been standing outside the changing room, holding the door closed."

"I tend to think of it more like that I let you jump into shark infested waters and then walked away. You then came back to me with a chunk bitten out of your side...and you're telling me not to blame myself for it."

"Your analogy still admits that I jumped on my own, knowing the sharks were down there."

"But you jumped with the mindset that I had an eye on you."

"...I knew you weren't there." Yuri grumbled, "But now you have me all worked up about what bad's going to happen when we get home."

"I don't want any bad to happen. I just feel like I'll always be on edge with that guy around. We can't even go enjoy the onsen anymore because he lives there." Viktor pointed out, arms going up in his frustration.

Oddly, the skater's music ended at that same moment, and the audience started their applause, leaving Viktor stuck in the moment with a confused look on his face, as though his gesture had actually caused it all to happen.

Yuri reached to lower the nearer arm down, and held onto it, "You're getting yourself worked up over something that hasn't happened yet."

"Saito already lives at Yu-Topia. That has happened."

"But he hasn't done anything...and-"

"We left the day after he moved in. He hasn't had a chance yet."

"...You've given him the impression that you're empathetic to his situation."

"I do. I am. But that's entirely distinct from my overall opinion. I can feel bad for a serial killer who was hit by his dad as a kid but that doesn't mean I think it's enough to forgive him from killing 15 people as a grown man."

Yuri quirked a brow, "From sharks to serial killers...your opinion of Asahi is rather morbid."
"...Maybe I should talk to Mimi and put my foot down about Saito.” Viktor suggested, mostly to himself, bringing his free hand up to put a finger over his lips, "If he wants to spend all this money on yet-another stray, he can do so by sending Saito somewhere else, and support him from a distance."

Deadpanning severely, Yuri turned his eyes towards Jiro, and resigned to stand up, "Come on, let's go..."

"You don't want to watch the skating?"

The audience started cheering again; somehow, they'd missed the announcement of the score. Yuri looked out to the big screen though, and saw footage of the skater and coach cheering from the kiss and cry, with his score and rank shown at the bottom.

[2][AZE] Pashkevich, SERGEI - 82.4 - 157.51 - 239.91

Yuri looked back down to his partner again, "We haven't really been watching anyway. Your mind is wandering, and I'm less invested because neither of us are competing. Let's just...go find Mik and sort this stuff out. We'll figure out why he hasn't come back yet, too."

Viktor suddenly felt a bit guilty, but the offer was too good to let go, and he nodded before pushing himself up to stand. Makkachin got down off the seat next to him, and the small group made their way out to the stairs in the aisle. A few sad faces watched them go, but nothing was said in protest. Soon, the duo and their pups were out of sight, and the sound of the announcer seemed clear as a bell.

"Weiter auf dem Eis, Russland repräsentierend... Next on the ice, representing Russia... Georgi...Popovich...!"

Both skaters looked back into the arena over their shoulders, and for that one moment, neither could help but laugh, "...Of course we'd walk out right before his Free Skate."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED FOURTEEN

Mikhail waved the phone in his hand loosely, unsure whether to answer or what to even say. Yuri's earlier text was still on the screen, until the phone was clicked off and put away. He'd found Viktoria some time earlier, but at that point, he'd just been following her around, until eventually ambling outside again, right back to where they'd been originally. It was less crowded on the sidewalk-peninsula by far, but that didn't mean there were any new places to go out there.

Exhaling a mildly-frustrated breath into the fog, Mikhail stopped where he was on the long declining stairs, "...Honey, are you going to talk to me at some point, or am I just going to follow you around aimlessly until I have to go back inside?"

"You never had to follow me in the first place." She answered simply.

"...Oh, yeah, no problem. It's just a city neither of us has ever been to, in a country whose language neither of us speaks, and you're wandering off alone. No worries."

Viktoria twisted around on the heel of her boot and shot her father a look, "I'm 17 years old, I have a phone with a map on it, and I know where we're staying. It's right around the corner from here."

Mikhail just blinked at her, before quietly, slowly, pulling the keys from his pocket, and jangled them once for emphasis.

Jade eyes just sneered, and Viktoria turned back around, heading towards the sidewalk with more purpose than it seemed she'd had before.

"What are you gonna do when you get there, then? Sit outside in the snow until you're freezing and have to come crawling back?" Mikhail called after her.

"Would it kill you to stop being sarcastically passive-aggressive and just say what you mean for once!?"

"What am I supposed to say when you're leaving?"

What few people were loitering outside were starting to look in the duo's direction, even as Viktoria got further and further away, kicking up snow as she went.

"Viktoria!"

A light-brown blur when rushing by, chasing after the silver teen in her retreat, leash flapping behind. Surprised, Mikhail quickly looked behind, surprised-but-not to see the rest of the poodle's pack stepping outside through the long row of glass doors. He quickly looked away again though as he heard Viktoria's startled squeak-scream; Makkachin had caught up to her, tail wagging like always, but slowing as he realized his presence seemed largely unwelcome.

Viktoria sucked in a breath and let her heart calm for a second, but then leaned down to ruffle the poodle's ears, "Don't scare me like that. You came up on me like a ghost."

Makkachin's spirits seemed to rise, and his tail started to wag again, and he perked his head up over Viktoria's arm as footsteps came rushing up in his wake.
Makka, you can't run off like that. There's streets right here; you could get hit by a car—] Viktor chided in Russian, fumbling for his dog's harness so he could find the lead and pull it up from the ground, regaining control of the pup before he could run off again, "Sorry." He stammered, backing off from his cousin, "He doesn't normally chase people like that."

Yuri stood back with Mikhail on the long steps, Jiro standing on his own at his heels.

"How'd you know to come out here?" The elder asked quietly, "I never answered your text."

"We thought to let the dogs out for a minute. It's just odd luck that we found you at the same time." Yuri explained, "Seems we walked into the middle of something."

"...The end of something, I guess."

"What happened?"

"She won't tell me anything."

"...Is that typical?" Yuri wondered, brows furrowed slightly, "She's always been super quiet."

"Apparently I don't have the experience to know that." Mikhail grumble-sighed, sticking his hands deeper into his pockets, "I really don't know what to do for her. My way of speaking pisses her off before I can even say anything."

"Way of speaking? Like her father?"

Mikhail shook his head, "Like a wiseass."

"Oh."

"No, it's none of your business." Viktoria's voice suddenly rose, stepping back from Viktor and Makkachin, and catching the attention of the rest in the process. Viktor looked a bit surprised, but Yuri was unimpressed.

"You don't have to be rude." He started, heading down the rest of the stairs with Jiro close behind, "He's just trying to help."

"It's none of your business either." She argued, looking at both of them rather bitterly, "You don't even know what he said."

"I don't have to know what he said. I know him." Yuri countered, "And you're being unnecessarily mean."

"Because you're butting into something that has nothing to do with you."

"Don't take your anger out on them, Vikki." Mikhail finally said, coming up behind Yuri as the younger man took position in front of Viktor, "If it has nothing to do with them then you have no reason to be snarky at them while they're collecting their dog."

The teen just watched him come and turned around again, trying to make her retreat while she could. Mikhail looked on helplessly, "Vikki! I can't do anything if you don't tell me why you're mad!"

"Maybe you should've been paying more attention then!"

Viktor slumped against his partner's back, clinging to one shoulder, "...I don't know what just happened but I feel bad about it anyway."

"...I'm really sorry," The elder said, "...If I knew teen girls were this complicated, I would've studied more."

Yuri felt Viktor's chin move through his jacket, and immediately had a hand up to cover the man's mouth. He could do nothing for Mikhail though; Yuri knew he was gonna get it.

"You really think this is because I'm a girl?" Viktoria said, dark and grim, back still turned to them, though she had at least stopped, "Are you starting to worry that Nikki's gonna be just like me when she's older?" She asked, louder than before, and she turned to look at the man sideways, "Huh!?"

"That's not what I sa-"

"...You have all this great experience and insight to draw from," Viktoria went on, ignoring him, "All your worldly travels, all your different lives... Not being a girl hardly the reason you're so clueless right now."

Viktor chortled a cough, but tried to keep quiet. Mikhail just shot him a look.

Viktoria was hardly impressed with them, "...It's because you've never been the middle child."

The elder Russian just looked entirely baffled, "...I don't follow... You're not the middle child right now. Sergio's gone; you're the olde-"

"Oh I'm sorry, was I mistaken when I heard him call you papa Mimi earlier?" She gestured at her much-older cousin, "This guy who you basically consider your first kid? The one you missed so much that you named me after him? The one whose shadow I now live in?"

"...I thought this wasn't about him." Both Yuri and Mikhail muttered in tandem.

Viktor stared blankly.

"It's not about him. It's about you. It's always been about you." She explained in frustration, pointer-finger turning towards her father then, "I don't even have memories of a time where I was ever the focus of anyone's attention, for anything. I was too young to remember what it was like to be the new and shiny thing in your life, because as soon as I was old enough to be able to remember, Nikki was born and she was the new and shiny thing. Sergio was the test case for you, and whatever experience you got from making mistakes with him just washed downstream... I always got the shit he deflected off, and Nikki could do no wrong."

All three just stared in silent confusion.

"But now you've adopted all these stray cats since you couldn't get him at first," She went on, pointing at Viktor again, "And you're so damn focused on making things better for them that...once again, and as usual, I've practically become a side-thought."

"...Where'd all this come from? I thought we had an understanding earlier."

"That was about mom."

"...Okayyy soooo can't we come to an understanding about whatever this is?" Mikhail pleaded, "I really don't want to make all my kids mad at me in one day...but we did come to this place for Yuri..."
"He's not your kid." Viktoria barked, "He's a stray cat, just like that other guy in Japan right now."

"...We asked him to help Yurio." Yuri chimed in, "If you want to be mad at anyone for that, then be mad at Viktor and I. Your dad would never have gotten involved if we hadn't asked him to."

Viktoria just looked on indignantly, "You asked him to help, not to adopt. He did that on his own. Yura and that other guy are just the most recent new and shiny things he's focused on...and now that he's got his first son back finally, that'll be what he focuses on next."

"He tried that already and it blew up in his face." Viktor countered, "I won't let him do it again."

"Viktor doesn't need your dad's help, either." Yuri added, "The others did. Don't scorn him for being generous."

"...Great, now you're all just going to gang up on me. Typical..." The teen grimaced, turning away from them.

"It probably just feels like he's giving out special attention because they're getting so much from him all at once..." Yuri continued, "...But you and your siblings had that the whole time, so you're used to it. You've lived it. He never wanted to make you think you were less loved because of it. If you need more from him then just tell him. He's not psychic."

"You think I haven't tried?" She asked, "Every time I'm about to talk to him though, it seems like some other thing has come up. With everything building up so heavily, there hasn't been any room for me... And now he actually has a good reason for being distracted...so what am I supposed to do? Be mad at him for stepping up?"

"...It kinda seems like you...are...anyway?" Mikhail pointed out, ignoring the nervous side-glances he was getting from the younger duo.

"I'm not mad that you're doing what's expected of you." She harped, "I'm mad that it seems like you've forgotten the rest of us in the process. We're just being dragged along on everything. At least Nikki has the illusion of feeling like she's part of things because you made it her job to make Yuraless of a raging butthole."

The peanut gallery could only nod in quiet acknowledgment of her point.

"And now you're all worked up about this stupid long-distance crush she has-"

"...He's not going to be so long distance in two weeks." Mikhail pointed out, "And then two weeks after that, for nearly a whole month, and then again two weeks after that."

"Ugh, there you go doing it again... Ignoring the point by blaming something else!"

"I'm not blaming anything." He countered, "I'm trying to explain why I'm acting that way. If you were pining after a guy 6 years your senior I'd be up in arms over that, too."

"But you and mom-"

"...Were already adults when we met. You two are kids, Nikki especially. You guys don't realize how fast things change when you're teenagers." The ruffled Russian tried to explain, though feeling mildly uncomfortable about the whole topic, "You and your sister are only two-plus years apart, but anyone can see that she is still more a child than a young adult...and yet you are more young-adult than child right now. I can't make any mistakes in this range. If something happens, it could haunt you into adulthood."
Yuri felt a jolt go through him as he heard the words, and he pulled his hand up over his chest.

"I'm just not really sure what exactly you want me to do to fix whatever's gotten so bad. I'm just doing my best to keep up with everything right now. You're not the only one whose whole world just got turned upside down..." Mikhail went on, "I try not to think about what happened in Banff before I found out about what happened in Banff. The idea that your mother was too proud to tell anyone she was sick again, and ended up leaving you kids all alone like she did...it just..." He tried, feeling his fists clenching in his pockets, "...It makes me furious. She deliberately kept me in the dark about how bad things were getting just to avoid the possibility that I would come get you guys before she passed."

"...She didn't think she was going to." Viktoria pointed out, "She was so convinced she was going to be fine that she wouldn't let it slip that anything was wrong. If she started feeling bad, or it hurt, or something else went south, she'd blame it on something else. Anything else...and of course, Sergio bought the whole story...Nikki and I weren't allowed to question it."

"So your mother shut you down...and now that you're out of that mess, you just feel like I'm doing the same thing."

The silver teen was quiet for a moment, seeing the cogs finally turning in her father's head, "...Not exactly the same..." She muttered, looking down slightly, "...We were made to go along with things under the threat of a big fight before. Now it just...feels like we don't matter. We're just the extra bits, tagging along on Yura's big adventures." She lifted her gaze again, starting to feel nervous, "...And I'm not going to lie about how boring I think this all is. The cold isn't fun anymore because it's always cold now. The rink, the arenas, the walks and drives to get there...I'm freezing. ...And I'm tired of feeling like this... I don't want to be dragged to these events anymore like it doesn't matter what I think. I'd...actually rather stay in Hasetsu. At least there, even if I'm stuck working, it's warm, and I'm actually doing something..."

Mikhail kept his eyes forward, but looked aside briefly to the pair of skaters nearby, then back to his kid, "I never wanted you to think I was making you come to these things. I just didn't want you to think I didn't want you to come."

"...Figure skating isn't for everyone." Viktor chimed in with a meager shrug, still holding onto his partner's skinny frame, "My father hated it. I wouldn't be surprised to learn your dad doesn't care for it either. He would've known where I was years ago if he cared even the slightest bit about the sport, and looked at the Olympics results in the news. He's just here because Yurio and I are involved, and he's trying to be supportive." He nudged his head towards his uncle, "Right?"

Mikhail looked a bit stiff, "I neither confirm nor deny the claim."

Viktor huffed a laugh, "Yeah, that's what I thought. He's here because he's a dad, not because he's a fan. No one will think any less of you because you're not a fan either."

Looking on, Viktoria ruminated, unsure what else to say. She backed out of her aggressive-looking forward stance, and turned slightly away from the group, "...Thanks."

Mikhail stepped past the pair and their pups, and glanced back slightly over his shoulder, "I'm gonna walk back to the rental with her. I'll see you guys later."

A bit more surprised than anything, the skating duo nodded, and Viktor waved slightly as he pulled off of his spouse's back, "Yeah...see you."

Yuri exhaled a long-held breath as the Rozovsky pair got further and further away, but kept his fingers curled around the inner fold of his jacket's lapel, where he'd held it since he felt the ping through his chest, "...I don't know if he's going to come back before the night's over."

"I can't even remember what we came out here for in the first place anymore. I wasn't expecting all that." Viktor commented, scratching the side of his head uncertainly, "Are extended families normally this...uhm..."

"...Conflicted?"

"In so many words..."

Yuri let go of his jacket and used that hand to find his husband's, threading their fingers as he moved them both into Viktor's coat pocket, "No... Well...maybe?"

"That's super clear."

"It's hard to explain." Yuri muttered, looking down to where Jiro was, looking back up at him in turn, waiting, "I'm just glad she was finally able to say something. That must've been bubbling under the surface for a while, maybe even before Mikhail and Minako-sensei went out there to collect them all."

"Hopefully she gets it all off her chest. Keeping quiet can be more problematic than just letting it go."

Yuri turned slightly towards the man next to him, "Are you speaking from experience?" He teased.

"I may be an old people but I'm still capable of learning new things." Viktor answered simply, leaning forward to kiss brow, nose-tip, and lips, "Let's go back inside. Maybe I'll remember why we came out."

"It was for Makka and Jiro."

"Oh...right. Finding them was an accident." The Russian said, only to pause, feeling a thought suddenly come loose from where it had been jammed-up in his brain, "Cyka blyat... I was supposed to talk to him about kicking Saito out of Yu-Topia."

Yuri just deadpanned, "...We're not gonna ask to kick Asahi out. Sheesh."

"Well what would you call it?"

"Helping him be independent."

"Away from Yu-Topia."

That just earned another slightly-unimpressed look.

Viktor shrugged, "I know you don't like being the badguy. You already saved him once from the worst consequences of what he did. That's why this is all on me. I have to do what's right for us...not just as a couple, but as individuals. I need to feel like I'm protecting you, and you need to feel safe in your own head." He explained, bringing up his free hand to gently pat his husband's head, brushing back the slicked-back strands that had fallen in front of his partner's glasses, "Home is where we're supposed to be able to relax...and he's getting in the way of that."

"...I know..." Yuri sighed, "I just can't help but feel bad for him anyway. It's not his fault I never returned his feelings. I just feel like we're causing him a lot of grief."

Viktor was quiet for a moment, but then shook his head as he reached that free arm over his partner's shoulder to pull him closer, and pressed his cheek to Yuri's brow, "Not as much as he's caused us. If he has any shame, he'll understand why it has to be this way."

"...I guess so..."
Chapter 515

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED FIFTEEN

A few minutes passed after Mikhail had followed his kid away from the arena. Neither Makkachin nor Jiro seemed at all interested in doing what they'd been brought outside for, and with the deepening evening chill starting to settle in, Yuri was ready to go back into the arena. He pushed off the edge of the last doorframe he'd been leaning against, and looked down to his wary Akita, "I've made a decision." He said, as though speaking to the pup. Jiro turned his head around and looked up, tail wagging uncertainly.

"Have you?" Viktor answered in the puppy's place.

"Since this was supposed to be the fun weekend, I've decided that I'm going to lay down a rule that'll last until we get back home."

Confused but curious, Viktor tilted his head, "Oh?"

"No one's going to say one single word more about Asahi. It makes me feel bad and I don't want to think about it until I have to." Yuri explained, steadfast in his conviction, "I do enough to make myself feel bad with these made-up memories that I'm still sorting through, so the last thing I want to worry about is the stuff that hasn't even happened yet."

"But if we don't-"

Yuri squished his hands to his husband's face, "Nope."

"Bhurt Yureh-"

"Nope." He insisted, moving opposite hands up and down and warping the Russian's cheeks in the process, keeping him from speaking, "You wanted this time in Vienna to make me feel better about all the crap we just went through before, but we ended up just bringing the crap with us. Let it go for now. You'll have plenty of time to ruminate on the hour of your attack when we get on the plane. I just want to have the rest of this weekend with you to enjoy the end of the competition and do our Exhibition. I don't want to lose the good memories we've already made because I'm so nervous about the negative stuff that came up."

"Desh fihn...I gesh..."

Yuri smiled and let go of Viktor's mug, "I'm glad you were able to see things my way."

The Russian just padded his cheeks until they felt normal again, "I'm glad you were able to see things my way." The Russian just padded his cheeks until they felt normal again, "It's hard to argue when you when you're right." He muttered, his pride a little hurt, "But that just means I'm the one who dragged you down."

"Not a chance." Yuri insisted, stepping closer to his partner's frame, and took the scarf and lapels of the man's jacket between his fingers, "There is nothing about you wanting to protect me that I don't love and appreciate. But I went out of my way to forget Asahi before, and for the last 2 weeks, he's all I've been allowed to think about. You need a break from my anxiety about him as much as I do. So let's just go back inside and enjoy the rest of the competition...maybe get something to drink later...and have an easy, restful night that we remember for being positive."

"...Then what about Viktoria?"
"Mikhail's problem."

"She called me out though."

"Cuz of Mikhail." Yuri explained, feeling a pair of hands come around his waist to settle on his lower back, pulling him a bit further forward, "The thing about family living close together like ours does now, is that you may be aware of all their problems, but you're not responsible for most of them. Mikhail's going to have his work cut-out for him now that one of his kids is starting to react honestly to everything that's happened; it may cause a chain-reaction. But it's none of our business. Just like our problems are none of his business."

"Alright...alright..."

"Deep breath." Yuri suggested, "Inhale..."

Viktor sucked in some air and held it.

"And let it all out."

"Phoo..."

"And kiss."

Chu~

"Let's go cheer on Yurio. Hopefully he didn't skate while we were outside."

The ice was being resurfaced when the duo returned and tried finding seats, only to discover that their original spot had been taken over by others. Not wanting to bother anyone though, they resigned to take their chances in the prep area. Not being competitors came with the chance that they wouldn't be allowed through, but it was difficult to refuse the Skaters Nikiforov when they asked to go by.

The air in the competitors' area seemed to change with them in there, too. Even without Viktor being in the line-up, just being there where he would've been seemed to give the place a bit of electricity that it otherwise didn't have. Watching on the same televisions as the others also let Yuri get a bit more invested than he had been while watching from the audience. It felt like one of their own events from the previous year then, with Viktor there playing at being a coach.

Another similarity to the previous year's events, Chris found himself struggling to get motivated without Viktor in the ranks. Not wanting to be one-upped by the Russian Tiger though, especially after being the only skater at the Final to not break 300, he mustered up what inspiration he could and found his place on the ice.

"The Short Program is where people can catch some easy points...but the real competition is in the Free Skate." He said, when asked at the earlier conference about the challenges facing him later that night, "Anyone who thinks they've got this in the bag from just the SP will end up losing."

"You do tend to surprise people by coming from behind." Viktor teased, following his friend to rink-side, along with Yuri, their pups, and Chris' professional entourage, "But you're neck-and-neck with the others right now."

"The others' being a kid whose luck is running thin, and a guy who thinks he's finally going to beat you simply because you're not competing here."

"Weiter auf dem Eis, Schweiz repräsentierend... Next on the ice, representing Switzerland... Christophe Giacometti!"

The usual excited applause echoed around the arena, and Chris bent down to pull his blade guards off before sliding out. He threw his arms out to the side and greeted the crowd before gliding back to rink-side for a few final words with Coach Josef and a hug. Those lime-green eyes turned to his rival though, "Just when I'm starting to get used to the idea that you've left the ice, Yuri brings you back, and then you manage to get yourself booted."

"It wasn't intentional." Viktor defended with a lazy smile, half-leaning on Yuri as they waited nearby, "We'll compete against each other in South Korea. For now you have to defend your title. It's been a few years since you were last the reigning champion."

"The last time I had it was right before your winning streak."

"It was the first time you had it, too." The Russian teased, "With me out of the European division though, you have a chance for your own winning streak."

Chris smiled, but it was tinted by a forlorn backdrop, "It somehow doesn't mean as much if I didn't beat you for it."

"Try not to make him feel bad." Yuri chimed in, "It took enough time to get him used to the idea that he's skating for Japan instead. Coming here like we'd planned to, but doing entirely different things, made him super melancholy the whole way into Austria."

"Well, you had other reasons beyond just that... But, I'm off." Chris said, and pushed off the wall with a wave. The audience cheered anew as he made his way around, and took position in the center of the rink.

'[Courtesy Call' - Thousand Foot Krutch (Nightcore remix)]

Yurio watched the show starting on one of the televisions in the prep area, one leg held straight up in the air in a split as he stretched. His eyes squinted though at the silver-headed blob just out of focus behind the rink-wall in the background, and he let his leg go. Edging forward, he finally realized what it was, "That's Viktor out there. How long has he been down here?" He glanced to Nikki, "Did you see him?"

She shook her head, and deferred to Minako, "You?"

The ballerina-turned-coach looked up from her phone, "Sorry?"

Yurio grumbled, "Never mind."

"I wonder why he doesn't just come down here from the start instead of going into the audience." Nikki asked aimlessly, "It seems like he always ends up down here anyway, and he just leaves papa and Vikki alone out there."

"Why would that matter?"

The silver teen buttoned-up slightly, but offered a nervous smile soon after, "Papa made himself like figure skating because everyone he knows is into it...but Vikki isn't that interested at all. She just doesn't want to make anyone feel bad by saying so, even though she gets headaches cuz she's bored."
"And you know this because...?" Yurio glowered at her slightly.

"She was texting me about it on the way over here." She answered meekishly, "I bet Cousin Viktor and Yuri are down here because papa and Vikki aren't here."

"...He wouldn't leave like that." Yurio defended, pulling on an arm to stretch his back under the Russian Olympic jacket.

"He would if he thought there was a good reason for it. Like finding out that Vikki doesn't want to be here."

Emerald eyes gave a stern look, but Yurio turned his gaze up towards Minako, "Do you know if he's here or not?"

"Yup."

"...And?"

"He's having a hard time deciding which child he wants to disappoint." She answered, "He's not going to win, no matter what he does tonight."

"Well then just tell him that I'm up nearly-last so he can be here just for that and the medaling ceremony."

"I'm working on it." Minako explained, "But he's already left with Vikki to walk her back to the room. He's trying to sort out whether and if he can get back without Vikki thinking he doesn't care."

Yurio could feel the 'what about' in his throat, but he swallowed it down and stayed quiet, turning instead to watch the second half of Chris' Free Skate. It would easily be another hour before he himself got to go out, but that only left him with time to brood on the sudden turn of events. His eyes couldn't focus on the program, and instead looked down to the knuckles of his right hand, looking at the pale scar where he'd split the tendon at Worlds the previous year, punching the bathroom wall.

...All that time he spent with me last year, it was like he had no one else to think about in the world. I completely forgot the idea that he even had kids somewhere...

He flexed his fingers a bit, observing the subtle difference in the cascade as he made a fist, the middle finger sticking up slightly higher than the rest.

_I wanted him to be here to watch me win. It kind of felt like when grandpa would watch. ...But the more I learn about him and his real family, the more I wonder if he spent any time with them at all last year._

He looked back at Minako, "Tell him to just stay with her."

"Hah?"

Even Nikki was a bit surprised to hear the words, but she said nothing.

"If he's already left, then there's no reason why he should haul his ass all the way back to the arena." Yurio elaborated stiffly, "It may not be far but it's cold and it's getting late. I'll just...show him my Gold when we get back after we're done."

Minako couldn't help but give a wry smile over the top edge of her phone, "That's awfully mature of you."
"Don't say that, or I'll change my mind and drag him back here myself."

With the program ended, Chris caught his breath, holding his last position for a few seconds longer before letting his arms swing down for a moment. Sweat dripped down his cheek, jaw, and neck, until it faded into the collar of his costume. He waved though and bowed to the crowd, returning to rink-side for his water, jacket, and blade-guards. He caught a few encouraging words from his coach as the small group moved over towards the kiss-and-cry, and to his surprise, found Yuri and Viktor both piling in onto the bench with them.

"Everyone suck it in, make room." Viktor laughed, squishing himself up against Chris's side while Yuri clambered for the edge of the seat, "Actually, better just take a knee..."

Yuri blinked in confusion, looking aside briefly as both dogs waited for him to move...and he rose up from his precarious perch, and lowered down again onto one knee next to the bench instead of on it.

Viktor just gaped at him, "...What are you doing...?"

"You said to take a knee, so..."

"Take my knee." He clarified, gesturing at it with both hands as Chris laughed quietly beside him.

"OH." The younger figure stammered, rising back up again to step forward those few inches and side sideways on that half-lap, and he leaned against his husband's shoulder, arms going around him, "Sorry, I feel really dumb now." He admitted sheepishly, face a bit pink.

"I'm truly shocked that you think I'd make you sit on the floor," Viktor said dramatically, "Shocked I say."

"It's the kiss-and-cry! And it's not even our kiss-and-cry!" Yuri protested, "I thought I'd take up too much space if I couldn't sit on the edge of the seat."

"It is a bit crowded in here." Chris mused, squashed in the middle as Coach Josef clung to the other side, using one leg out to the side to wedge against the athlete, "But I guess it's okay, as long as Jiro doesn't go for my boots again."

"Don't go fondling my husband again and you'll have no problems." The Russian laughed, and looked down to the offending Akita, "Right, little dude?"

"Roaf!"

"He's gonna be a giant one day." Viktor went on, "I'm scared and excited all at once."

"Don't be scared." Yuri suggested, "He's the most chill puppy I've ever seen...he'll be like that as a large boi too."

"A large boy with a big appetite." Chris pointed out, "Better keep your blades stored safely before he starts teething, too."

"Here we are at the Euros kiss-and-cry for the Free Program, and you three knuckleheads are talking about a puppy's mouthing habits." Coach Josef interrupted, shaking his head, "Figure skaters."

The trio laughed anyway, but turned their attention to the score-board and waited.

When those expectant numbers finally appeared though, Chris was stony-faced for a moment.
"...He is currently in first place."

"Whew." The blonde heaved, finally letting himself be happy about it all, "The math-gerbil of my brain totally fell off the wheel for a second there."

"You scored over 300. I think you're safe from Georgi." Viktor teased, "Welcome back to the club. It's been half an epoch...when was the last time? Worlds?"

"...Sochi."

"Sochi!" The Russian repeated and laughed, only to elbow his friend annoyingly, "Better get cracking on your work-outs. Yuri and I are going to score over 350 and shatter our Worlds records from last year."

"You two are absolute monsters."

The group eventually got their acts together and departed from their little victory stage, heading back towards the prep area with pups in tow. As they moved under the curtain to get back-stage, Yuri looked around at the crowd that was clapping for Chris' rise to 1st place. It wasn't difficult to spot the dark cloud hovering in a far corner, and Yuri caught sight of both Georgi and Yakov there, looking at a television with rather serious - and disappointed - looks on their faces. Still holding to Viktor's arm, Yuri pressed in closer to be heard over the crowd, "I'll be right back. Don't go too far."

"Okay."

With Jiro following closely, Yuri stepped away and started heading for the dour duo. He carefully approached from behind, and cleared his throat to get their attention. Georgi glanced back over his shoulder, but turned back towards the television, expecting mockery and wanting none of it. Yakov knew Yuri better than that, though.

"What is it?"

"...I don't know if there's ever going to be an appropriate time or place for a question like this, but...before I do, I wanted to say thanks, for helping me sort things out with Viktor yesterday." Yuri started, looking back towards his partner, and the man's goofy antics with his rival, "He told me once that if I ever needed help, that I should just hug you and you would. That's been true since the start...so, I really am grateful."

"...What are you getting at?" Yakov wondered dubiously, "What's the question?"

Yuri gathered his courage and stepped a bit closer so he could speak a little quieter, "...Were you the one who burned Viktor's old house down?"
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED SIXTEEN

The little three-room apartment was oddly quiet with just two people coming inside, dark from the lack of light, until bathed in a dim glow from the hall where the pair removed their shoes. As before, Mikhail had to dust the snow that had landed on the top of his head, while Viktoria kept ownership of his flatcap.

"So how mad is everyone?" The teen wondered, pulling her arms out of her padded white winter coat, eyes fixed on the phone her father still held out in the open.

Mikhail blinked between the two, "Mad...?" He echoed, "It hasn't come up."

"Disappointed then. Annoyed."

"...They're actually being surprisingly understanding." He explained, sliding his phone into his back pocket as he pulled his own jacket off, "And that's only regarding me. They accepted the explanation on your end without issue."

"You didn't have to walk me all the way back here."

"I have the keys, remember?"

"You could've let me have the one to unlock the door."

"I wouldn't have been comfortable with that."

She furrowed her brow, "Why? Don't trust me to be here when you're all done?"

"That's not it." Mikhail said, putting his coat into the closet and closed it after, "Vienna is considered one of the safest cities in Europe, but that doesn't mean it's danger-less. I'd be paranoid about something happening to you on the way here, leading to an outcome where you never arrive."

"...So then now that we're here, you can go back."

"My liege lord has already given his blessing that I stay, such as it is." The elder mused quietly, watching his kid head through the long kitchen towards the olive-green door to the living-room, "Unless you'd rather be alone."

"...I'm already doing what I'd rather do." She answered, pausing in the doorway, "So if you want to go back, I won't stop you."

Mikhail watched the teen disappear beyond the wall, and heard the sound of her frame slumping down on the couch, clicking the television on. The light of the screen illuminated the dark room, casting darker shadows onto the walls, flickering brighter and dimmer with every movement. He sighed quietly to himself and followed through, clicking on one of the few small lamps in the room to prevent himself getting a headache from just the light of the television. Viktoria had squished herself into the same couch-corner that Viktor had been in earlier in the day, so Mikhail found himself a spot in front of her, leaning back into the back-cushions to avoid being in his daughter's line-of-sight to the t.v. screen. He turned his head to the right to look at the imagery for a minute or so before his neck started to cramp and he was forced to look forward again instead, "...I'm just gonna sit here until you're ready to talk." He started, "You don't have to say anything right now...but I won't leave until you do."

Yuri looked on with a steady gaze, but eventually nodded, and bowed his head, "Thanks."

Yakov watched the young skater turn away from him and start heading back towards the gaggle surrounding Chris and Viktor, with that small but growing Akita puppy following dutifully at his heels. He drew a breath and exhaled quickly, shaking his head slightly as he turned back towards the television. Georgi had already lost his spot at the top of the podium, but there was still one skating prodigy waiting to take his turn, and the top-3 line-up was yet to be settled. Still, the attempt to refocus on their reason for being in Vienna failed, and Yakov couldn't help but look aside again.

Yuri had returned to the group by then, sliding into the fray as though an opening had been left just for him to sneak into. If he had any reaction to the words he'd heard, Yuri didn't give it away on his face, which, to Yakov, was the eeriest thing about it.

Asking me a question like that and then wandering off like the answer didn't matter, The elder coach considered, I wonder what he'll do? Yakov grimaced slightly, deadpanning the skating prodigy rather severely as the expected 'you've been gone for 5 minutes, I nearly died' snogging started, Vitya... Genius on the ice...not so much off it...

Yakov just shook his head and turned back to Georgi. At least, that man's morose aura made some sense.

Viktor pulled Yuri further into the skating gaggle, hugging him close, "So what were you up to over there? Telling Georgi not to feel bad?"

"You know I'm not the sort to rub it in." Yuri retorted, "I went to talk to Yakov."

"Oh." The Russian looked nervous then, glancing over his partner's head to spot the gruff older man slightly in the distance, and looked away again, "I guess it would be safe for you to talk to him... Why would you need to though? Cuz of yesterday?"

"Sort of. It's not important right now." Yuri answered, looking to the television closest to the group, and the triple Lutz that the current athlete had just landed, then back to his spouse, "Let's go find Yurio; check on him and Minako-sensei."

"I guess that's as good an excuse as any." Viktor nodded, turning instead to look at Chris, "Hey, we're gonna leave you to it. Have fun with your interview."

"Oh, yeah. I'll catch you guys again after." He answered, peeling off from the group as well, "See ya."

"Byeeee~!"

All told, the competition went by rather...normally. Despite the hiccup of having the wrong schedule, there was precious little else about the event that was perceived as negative, as many before it had been. There was no clan upheaval, as had been noted at the Final, nor the tension at the lack of a Nikiforov at Russian Nationals. There had been no melt-downs over not being watched by certain eyes, as had been the case at Skate Canada, nor the distraction of fractured friendships like at Trophée de France. For once in a long while, Yurio was able to wait for his turn without worry.
Watching the other skaters go through the motions and fill out the ranks was rather peaceful. The top spots had rarely changed out, seeming firmly positioned after the Short Program's leaders each took their turns. The only thing that was still a question was whether Chris would retain his title as the European Champion, or if Yurio would usurp it from him.

Scoring over 300 is never easy, but with a strong Short Program, it's easier than otherwise, Yurio thought, watching every interim performance with blurred interest, forgetting each as soon as it was over, I can easily take the top spot on the podium if I just stay focused.

Easier said than done, given the company he kept. Lacking a competitive mind-set, Yuri and Viktor were slightly less than serious. Waiting for the end of the Free Skate was almost boring without the anxiety of worrying about other peoples' scores coming close to their own. Minako appeared to be doing well with the waiting game anyway, and so the antsy duo scampered off with their dogs again.

"Just text us when the guy before you goes up." Viktor explained as they wandered away, "We'll come back right away."

Yurio just grumbled quietly and turned back towards the televisions, "...Waiting for my turn has never felt like it took so long."

"That's cuz everyone you're really worried about has already gone up, and you're getting impatient." Nikki teased, looking up at him from a seat she'd found, over the top of her phone, "Have you ever just watched an event?"

"Of course I have." He scoffed, almost offended, "It's hard to avoid."

The silver teen just pointed her phone at him like an accusing finger, "Aha! You admit it. Watching other competitors is a chore for you."

"There's nothing to be gained from watching people who aren't as good." Yurio defended, nudging her phone back down with the flat of his palm, "I only watch the people who are as good or better. There aren't a lot of them."

"Wow..." Nikki gave him quite the look, "How do you manage to fit your head through the doors in these places when you walk through? It's huge."

"Do you like watching amateurs and novices?"

"It's not about that." She retorted, "Sometimes it's just about showing support to people who are doing the same thing you are now...watching the people who are as good or better than they are. Or, if not showing support...at least giving the impression that you aren't looking down your nose at them."

"It's not like I'm friends with any of them. Whether I watch is irrelevant."

"Maybe you would be if you watched them more."

Yurio just gave her an impatient sigh, "What makes you think I want to be?"

"Cuz there's only two kinds of people you know from these events, from my observation."

"Short-lived as its been."

Nikki smiled sweetly, "...There's the people you don't know at all, and the people you do. You don't have acquaintances...it's either friend or foe, ally or enemy, with no in between." She explained, hopping up from her seat as she put her phone away, "Maybe that's why your perception of Asahi flipped around so drastically."

One brow quirked above one emerald eye, "Explain."

"Well..."

Minako listened quietly, but didn't interrupt. There were only two other people in Vienna who knew about the developments in Hasetsu, and she knew such information could be a distraction more than it was worth. She just kept her eyes on the scoreboard and the television, trying to enjoy the performances as a fan even while standing around in the cue as a coach.

"You were openly hostile towards him for the first little while that he was around." Nikki explained, "But then something changed and you were friendly with him. There was no transition where you went from hating him to just not caring, and then being friends. You just went from zero to sixty in ten seconds flat." She went on, loosely threading her fingers together behind her back, and leaned in against her adoptive brother's side, looking up at his distant expression, "And all that happened while you on your own with him. You didn't have the bias from Yuri and Cousin Viktor tainting your opinion."

Yurio's eyes flinched slightly, but he turned towards the younger teen, "What's that supposed to mean?"

"They both left within days of Asahi getting sanctuary at Yu-Topia, after spending a weekend dealing with him in Osaka. Yuri went through a trauma that no amount of forgiveness will ever really fix. It really wasn't that long ago either that he was hurt." She pointed out, thinking back on their time in Detroit, "It's kind of weird to think about it, but...the only thing I've ever really known about either Yuri or Cousin Viktor has been when they're suffering. When I met them for the first time in Calgary, Sergio had already picked a fight and made Viktor mad, and Yuri had to step between them to get them to quit fighting. I remember how hoarse his voice was back then, so it's clear he'd either been sick or upset beforehand."

"...I wouldn't call that a fight..." Yurio contested, eyes moving away again to stare in the direction of the television, even if he wasn't specifically watching what was happening on it, "There were some warning shots, but that wasn't even an argument. That was Viktor being smarmy."

"Call it whatever you want...point was, things with us didn't get off to a smooth start. They've both done their best to be friendly with us since papa had to take us in, but it's obvious that there's still some distance there. When we showed up in Detroit, it was already after Yuri had been hurt, and so instead of seeing him okay but without his voice, he was in the hospital and barely awake from his bounce off the ice."

"What are you getting at with all this? I thought you were talking about Saito."

"They're being amiable with him because they don't want problems, the same way they were being amiable with Vikki and I." She said, framing it rather simply, "I'm a bit nervous about how they're going to feel when they find out you're actually friends with someone that hurt them."

Minako stepped in a bit closer behind the pair, "Maybe the pending apocalypse isn't the best topic of conversation before a Championship event?"

Nikki craned her head back, "You think it'll be that bad?"

"I don't know...not anymore, anyway." She shrugged, "Asahi isn't there anymore."
Both teens swiveled in place, "He's what...?"

"Yuri's parents called us earlier, while you were doing official practice."

"Where did he go?" Yurio added, "Why'd he leave? Why didn't he tell anyone?"

"Not sure on any of that." Minako said, a pang of worry to her tone, "I was really hoping he wouldn't use our absence at Euros as an opportunity to escape, but...I can't say I'm surprised by it either. What happened at All Japan was bad on all sides, not just for Yuri and Viktor. There's no excuse for what he did, but I have a hard time being angry at Asahi after finding out so much about his background."

"You've known Katsudon all his life. I'm surprised you didn't try breaking Saito's neck for what happened." Yurio huffed, leaning back on one skate where he stood, "Why didn't you?"

"...I guess, because Viktor was already mad enough for the both of us. We took care of the problem as professionally as we could, but then afterwards...I guess my anger about what he'd done devolved into morbid curiosity for why he'd done it." She explained somberly, shrugging up her shoulders a bit as she squished her hands deeper into her pockets, seeking warmth for her fingers, "By the time I got done with him, I thought that being angry at him was just going to make things worse than they already were. I started to see Asahi as being a victim, too, but more than that...as someone who deserved a chance to fix things. Not that I'm keeping score, but Viktor's made Yuri cry more than Asahi has, so I try to keep things in perspective."

"...Yeah..." Yurio nodded slightly, "My gut reaction with him was wanting to kick his colon into his throat...but he dodged and we ended up exchanging words instead of blows."

Nikki chortled a laugh under her breath, drawing a look, but nothing more.

"By the end of it, I just thought he was some dumbass who screwed up." Yurio went on, shaking his head at the absurdity of it all, "I thought back on how Viktor and Yuri both said they didn't want me to be mad at him on their behalf, when they'd done enough to try and handle it the way they wanted to... Maybe it was the wrong move to end up being friendly with him. I couldn't help but see him as some wounded animal. Wrong place, wrong time...bad outcome."

"He didn't have to put his hands on Yuri." Minako said, "He chose to do that."

"Bad decision in the heat of a bad moment. I've done my own share of those." Yurio pointed out, flexing his right hand openly, and rubbed the knuckle of his middle finger with his thumb, "If I hadn’t been given the chance to get my shit straightened out, a lot of things today would be very different."

"I wonder where he went." Nikki said quietly, "He already seemed pretty lost even when the bunch of us were around, and had papa's help. Being on his own..."

"Well, he's not entirely on his own." Minako interjected, "Maybe having Hana around will keep him on the straight and narrow. Your papa's been trying to get in touch with him since we found out he'd left, too."

"Yeah, hopefully he hasn't done anything idiotic." Yurio added.

"I hope he's okay..." Nikki half-whispered.
"Wow, you really worked this thing over yesterday..." Yuri marveled, watching his partner's shoe-on-tile recreation of their revised Exhibition, "And you weren't tempted even once to jump?"

"You kidding? I was tempted the entire time." Viktor laughed, shuffling closer in place of a long glide, "It's hard to maintain limits when you feel fine, but you know that."

"I may have some minor experience with that..." Yuri smiled nervously, feeling a hand slide into his own, and raise it up to spin him 'round in place once before extending him out to the limits of their reach. He walked around slowly in a big circle as his partner stayed where he was, following the path of a death spiral, "Do you still feel like my personality's changed since then?"

"At the time, I thought so...but the longer we are from then, the more I think I just saw a side of you that I was told existed, but hadn't really seen yet." The Russian explained, pulling his spouse closer as the spiral would've as it concluded. He kept hold of the younger man's fingers, but spun him one last time to bring Yuri's back to his chest, bringing up their still-clasped hands as his left went around Yuri's waist, "I'd been warned before that you really hate losing. You may not know how to handle winning, but you're fiercely competitive anyway."

"...I don't know how I make any sense that way." Yuri laughed nervously, letting his husband rotate them in place. He knew they were moving much slower than they would be on the ice, but there was no hurry in the side-hall they'd borrowed. Two pairs of dark eyes watched them curiously from the base of a nearby wall, leashes tied loosely around a support pillar, "I hate losing but I'm paranoid of winning. It's a conundrum."

"No worse than being scared of another person's touch, only to say you like it most when I use my hands." Viktor teased, kissing his partner's neck where he could, "We all have traits that make no sense." He said, warm words against cool skin, "I'm sure there's things I do that just break your brain sometimes."

"Less than you think, probably."

"Oh?"

"I think the only thing that really messed with me about you was...well, realizing you wanted me." Yuri explained, cheeks going a bit pink in spite of everything else, "Complete subversion of expectations, to be sure."

"I forgive you for not noticing what I was trying to do." Viktor mused, "Would it have made it anymore obvious if I'd been with some other guy before?"

Yuri just guffawed and turned in place, putting them each chest to chest. He slid his hands through the loose open front of his partner's jacket to hug around his lower back, "I'm sure there would've been some benefit, but I've no doubt it would've mean complications in other ways."

"Complications...?" The Russian echoed, "Why would that make things complicated?"

Glancing around for any nearby ears, Yuri looked up at that confused pale face, "Remember how I made a point to avoid getting a toy that looked or felt like a woman...? Because I was worried you'd feel it and miss it, and I wouldn't be able to satisfy you anymore."

Viktor gave an uneasy smile, "Ah...yes, your ability to worry about things that I'd never even think of. You'd be scared that I'd always be comparing you to someone else."

"I already worry about that to a degree, but not for the same reasons." Yuri huffed, "But, yes, in a nutshell..."
Viktor quirked a brow and stared for a moment, but then closed his eyes and smiled, leaning forward to kiss his partner's nose, "The fact that you're not an insatiable horny-toad is probably for the better for both of us." He started, making Yuri's face glow red for his choice of words, "But it's like I've been telling you since the start; I think you're perfect exactly as you are. Your tempered modesty is enough to keep me in line, and I like it that way. You give me enough of what I want to placate me, and yet hold back so I keep wanting more. On the rare occasion that you're as thirsty as I am, it comes as a fun surprise."

"...You have a way with words, sometimes."

"My love," Viktor started again, as though a different train of thought. He stroked his partner's hair with both hands, one sliding down after the other, until those raven-black strands were slick and flat, "You already know this innately...but maybe it'll sound more convincing when it comes from someone else. There is so much more to being with someone than just the creative ways we touch each other. It's just one more layer of things added on top of all the other reasons why we're meant to be. We just connect." He explained, ceasing the smooth stroking to squish both hands together on top of Yuri's head, looking the younger man squarely in the eyes, "That's what's going to keep us together when we're both too crippled to skate anymore, and our bodies start to fail us in bed. So...while I hope that day is centuries in the future, it's still only a small part of us. Don't worry so much about how you compare to my past partners...I never got on with any of them well enough to marry them. Only you got that far. Think instead that you're the only one who could satisfy me...because you've been the best of them all."

Yuri's brows furrowed under the hands that still held his head still, but he managed an awkward smile anyway, "Viktor..."

"Exactly." The Russian mused, stealing a kiss while he was close, "Now...I just felt a buzz in my pocket. I imagine that's Yurio sending out the summons. Let's go see if Chris can hold onto his title."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED SEVENTEEN

The kiss-and-cry was named as such because of the often-restricted range of emotions one expressed while sitting inside it. It was either excitement or devastation...usually nothing in between. However, the muted expression on the face of the Finnish skater barely seemed to change when he heard his 6th place score called out. Stoic but satisfied, perhaps, he stood up with his coach, nodded to the camera at the edge of the rink-wall, and departed.

"Wow~" Viktor mused from afar, leaning on the wall with his chin resting in one palm as his other hand helped Makkachin look over the ledge, "I can't tell if that guy's happy or sad about his score."

Yuri glanced over, but then turned his attention forward again towards Yurio, who was talking his Olympic team-jacket off, "How do the adjustments feel that Nikki did? Are you more comfortable now?"

"A bit, yeah..." The teen answered, not noticing his pseudo-sibling's sagely nodding next to him, "Boots are still a bit tight though, but it's not as bad as it was yesterday."

"We'll sort out your skates first thing after we get back home." Minako suggested, taking the jacket and blade-guards from her athlete, "You'll have time to break them in before the Games. For now, try not to let yourself get distracted by it all. You've only just noticed the feeling. It's nothing anyone else can actually see though."

"Yeah..."

The announcer's voice echoed through the arena, and all eyes were up at the big screen, watching the cameras panning onto them.

"Davai, Yuri." Viktor teased, swiveling his position behind his poodle's frame as he looked back to where the teen was standing.

"Fight the good fight, Yuri." Came a less-expected voice.

Yurio practically spun to look behind himself, and spotted a familiar face on a small screen - tired, but awake enough to watch the event live anyway, "O-Otabek."

Nikki smirked deviously behind where she held her phone up in front of her nose, "He said he was watching, so... Good luck!

He just about had a coronary event just from the sight of it, but Yurio stammered an acknowledgment and then poured onto the ice like an angry pile of clothes spilling out of an over-full closet.

Yuri just watched him go in surprise, arms half-up but lowering as he realized his offer of a send-off hug had been missed, "...Oh...okay... I guess I'll just...stay here."

"Are you trying to sabotage him?" Minako scolded, looming over the silver, "You know he doesn't know what to think of you talking to his friend."

Nikki just looked surprised, and glanced at her phone quickly before muttering something and closing the FaceTime window, using the cover of the cheering crowd to keep her words a mystery.
She put the phone away again though and looked up innocently, "If Yuri had his own phone on him, Otabek would've called him on it instead. This was the only way he could say good luck. I don't see why everyone's making such a big deal out of it. I thought I was being nice."

"Yura already thinks you have a crush on Otabek. This just reinforces it." Minako explained, about to continue, but found her words cut off before she could speak them.

"I already told him that I don't-"

"Me thinks the lady doth protest too much." Viktor hummed, still holding Makkachin up with one arm as he raised the other, and slid behind his husband's back as Yuri approached. His words just made Nikki's face go red, "But...maybe it's not actually you. It's probably late in Almaty, right? But he's still awake. Maybe it's him."

"Quit making stuff up."

The skating duo just laughed and looked out into the rink where Yurio was taking position.

"He's at a nightclub right now being a DJ-person! He'd be awake anyway!" Nikki went on, even though her words went largely unheard by then. The music of Yurio's Free Program rattled through the arena like a crack of thunder, violins breaking through the cheers. The teases just left her fuming in her tiny helpless frustration.

By the end of the Free Program, only three things that were certain.

One, that Chris would successfully defend his title, and claim European Gold for the second year running. Two, that despite the upset of a sudden growth spurt, Yurio did secure his place on the podium. Finally, three, one should never presume to know what every athlete's capabilities are, else you'll find yourself standing in the Bronze position by half a point to an unexpected new Personal Best.

Yurio could only sulk indignantly where he stood on the lowest tier, holding his flowers and Bronze medal by its royal blue lanyard as the first round of photos were taken. Next to him on his left, Chris stood proudly on the central tier, and on the opposite side, surprising practically everyone, was Emil, rather than Georgi. The Czech skater was especially proud of himself, and once the three of them were motioned to crowd together on the top level for some closer group-shots, Yurio resolved to let the crankiness go and just be glad he was up there at all. He still didn't look terribly happy about it, but he wasn't being a sourpuss anymore.

Once the medaling ceremony was done and the victory lap taken, a few more big photos were done on the ice itself, and finally, the last word from the event hosts was announced so everyone could take their leave. Yurio rubbed his socked feet once he got his blades off, trying to unsquash his toes and calm the red and shiny marks - soon-to-be blisters - at the corners of his heels.

"We're gonna start heading back," He heard Yuri saying somewhere nearby. Yurio looked up to see him and Viktor talking to Minako; Jiro was collapsed into sleep against his human's shoulder, "Are you guys okay to walk to the rental on your own?"

"It's practically around the corner," She answered, reaching up one hand to rub the pup's noggin lightly, "We'll go whenever Yura's ready and packed-up."

"Have a good night then, everyone." Yuri added, hoisting Jiro up a bit higher against his shoulder. He glanced over at the two teens, and raised his one free arm up to get his goodbye hug from the first of them, "Congrats again on your medal. We'll see you tomorrow night."

Yurio rose up to return the gesture, "Thanks." He started, looking over to Viktor then as well, "You two still owe me a fancy dinner. Don't forget."

"We won't. We'll text you." Viktor reassured, squishing his tired poodle's cheeks before he rose back up to his full height. He watched a moment as Yuri pondered extending the invitation for a goodbye hug to his cousin, and wasn't surprised when it eventually came, though Nikki seemed to be. She jumped in for the quick exchange - cheered up a bit from the prior mean teases - and waved goodbye to them as the pair started to move off.

The air outside in the late night had become colder, but the sky had cleared, taking the falling snows with it. Even with all the light-pollution from being in the middle of a huge city, many of the stars could be seen. Yuri watched them for a little while as they walked across the long bridge, far enough away from any other pedestrians to avoid being harangued by fans, but close enough to hear the crunch of their boots on the snow and the whisper of private conversations.

"It's been a while since I've been so absent-minded about a competition." Viktor commented, drawing his partner's attention away from their surroundings, "I can barely remember much about it at this point."

"Coming into it the way we did, I'm just glad we could enjoy any part of it." Yuri agreed, "In spite of the hiccups though, this really was a lot of fun. I'll be thinking about the ball for a long time after we leave here, and all the touristy stuff we got to do that wouldn't have been possible if you were competing." He said, offering a light nudge with one elbow, "Knowing that you planned for that ball when you were still in the RSF though, I can't imagine how you planned to compete after staying up until nearly dawn."

"Don't forget so easily what I told you in Moscow last year," The Russian answered, "The frequent pre-competition naps we've taken this season have never been rare for me."

"Ah...yeah, I remember. You said you used to always sleep until right up to the last minute." Yuri recalled, "My mind was elsewhere at that particular moment though."

"Oh? Where was it? You were barely coherent at the time."

"Mired in the existential panic of the fact that you were lying on top of me at the moment." Yuri laughed, "And that you hadn't set an alarm so we wouldn't just sleep through the competition. Mostly that you were on top of me though."

Viktor smiled, "You were comfortable. I couldn't pass up the opportunity."

"I couldn't pass up an opportunity either." Yuri said, though his tone seemed to change a little as he spoke the words, "I want to say something...and make it be the last unsettling thing either of us has to deal with before we go back home."

The Russian's attention was laser-focused, "...I have a feeling I won't like where this goes."

"It's about the house in St. Petersburg."

"Ah..."

Yuri paused for a moment, shifting Jiro's weight from one shoulder to another; the motion made the pup grumble a little before closing his eyes again. Trying to find the right words, Yuri eased on as gently as he could, "When you snuck out of our room that night to go see it, and I made you take me with you if you had to see it at all...I was pretty nervous about what we'd find. I didn't want you to have to see it on your own, whatever it was."

"Mhm?"

"Seeing the whole place burnt to ash and charcoal was pretty hard to take. I'd already seen a lot of terrible things since we first moved to Russia last year...I was starting to wonder how someone could come out of the place with such an optimistic view on life like you did. Russia was amazing to you, right up until the minute it wasn't. It really broke my heart. For a while, I internalized it, like it was my fault...but you've told me so many times not to feel that way, so I really tried not to. But that old paranoia came back anyway, and I started to see details in that wreckage that made me start to question the whole thing."

Viktor nodded wordlessly, clasping his hand a bit tighter where it cupped over his husband's opposite shoulder.

"It was already absurd that it burned down at all, but I gave it the benefit of the doubt, since it had been unoccupied for so long...maybe something short-circuited." Yuri continued, "Dwellings are supposed to protect their internal structures from the elements by always having the inside be a certain warm temperature. No one was there to keep the heat on, and no one was there to let the faucets drip during freezes. There's plenty that could've gone wrong while no one was looking."

"...Why though? It survived all that time before." Viktor wondered, "Mimi went there to check on it after NHK and reported nothing awry."

"NHK was before the Final though. That just adds to why I think someone put it to the torch." Yuri explained, "But the thing that really made me question whether it was an accident or not, was the fact that I thought I could see the color of spray-paint on one of the exterior walls, where the fire hadn't burnt it all away."

"...I see."

"But that just made me question it further. Why would someone vandalize your house, only to burn it down after? I always thought that the point of vandalizing something was, in itself, the defacing that was intended. Destroying it defeats the purpose of mocking it with graffiti."

Viktor could feel his jaw clenching a little. The lights of the Arcotel on the other side of the road did little to make him feel better.

"But the more I thought about it, the more I started to wonder...what if the fire was meant to get rid of the vandalism?" Yuri offered, pausing a moment to let his partner catch up mentally, "Maybe someone set it ablaze to stop you from ever having to see what was there before."

"What are you suggesting?"

"We were harassed and heckled before we ever left the city. The people who came after us didn't really get much out of it though. They couldn't get into the camper where I was, and you chased them off anyway. Maybe they took out their frustration on your house, and messed it up the way they couldn't mess us up."

"...Oh."

"No one has said anything about it though. No one knew we had gone to Russia until we told Chris on the way out...and Yakov."
"You're not suggesting that Yakov burned my house down."

Yuri's brow furrowed a bit. "That's exactly what I'm suggesting."

"When would he have even had time though? How could he have known to bother looking?"

"He told us... He said he recognized you in the video, and was already trying to get hold of us before we even got back into town. He knew we were in Russia, he saw the welcome we got there...maybe he considered what those hecklers would do after getting sent packing."

"You must've asked him about it earlier. You already know the answer then... There's no 'maybe' he did anything."

Yuri sighed, a fog of breath escaping from him, "...You're right... I did ask him about it. And...I was right... My hunch is exactly what happened."

Viktor slowed his steps until he'd stopped entirely, eyes cast down towards the walkway, "What was written on my house that was so bad that Yakov had to burn it down? Why was he so sure he had to?"

"He wouldn't tell me what was on the walls." Yuri explained, "He said that if he told me, it would defeat the purpose of making it disappear in the first place."

"...Right."

"He just said that he had a feeling you'd want to see the place before leaving. Knowing what happened to us, he went to see it himself, before we could. He..." Yuri said, his words trailing a little, "...His fears were confirmed when he got there. The neighbors were talking about it outside when he showed up, complaining about the incident having happened earlier on. The police took so long getting there that the vandals were gone already, so they just left it alone to deal with later. Yakov decided to deal with it himself...and since he had your spare keys from forever ago, he let himself in. He set a few really small fires on the wood floors and hoped one would take, but long enough after he'd left that no one would suspect anything. By the time anyone noticed and called the fire department, the place was already too far gone. The water blasts finished what the fire didn't... It was already gone before we ever went to meet with him."

"I see."

A cold chill breezed through. Makkachin whined a little, yawning sleepily.

"He did it to spare you." Yuri tried to explain, "He may have to place a two-face now, since he still works for the organization that cut you out...but he still cares a lot about you. You know he'd do anything for you if he had the power to make a difference...like helping me get through to you after our fight."

"I guess so..."

Watching the look on his partner's face change from confusion to concern, then to not knowing what to feel, Yuri wanted to do something. He nudged his puppy into a hazy state and put him down onto the ground to free up his arms, and wedged them under Viktor's to hug him, "I wanted you to know... I don't know if it...makes things better or worse. Maybe you would've preferred that I never brought it up. I'm sure there's a thousand other things you'd rather think about than what we left behind."

"Sure..." Viktor agreed tepidly, returning the hug over his spouse's shoulders, "But I guess, if I'm going to know about it at all, it makes sense that you'd tell me now. Late enough to not spoil the competition, but not so late that we take it home with us."

"Our Exhibition tomorrow can fully prove to Russia that nothing they've done to us will bring us down...because we know exactly all the things they've tried. They can't beat us. They have no power over us, either."

"Yeah." He nodded, turning his face inward to feel the warmth about his partner's neck, and drew a long breath there. He didn't care about the people walking by periodically. When he pulled up again, he pressed their brows together for a few seconds, and then nodded and pulled back, "Hopefully that'll be the last time anyone tries to stick it to me like this. I'm at a point where their efforts are making me numb to the disappointment. This is just...getting petty now."

"The best way we can get them back is to always show a united front. Being happy together in spite of everything else would just burn them severely."

"I think we can manage that." He agreed, giving a tired smile, "Especially since it's real, rather than just some show we're putting on."

"Exactly." Yuri said, feeling brighter already, "Let's finally get back then. I'm frozen solid and I need my Viktor to warm me up."

"We should hurry then~"
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED EIGHTEEN

The cold of the winter night and the remnants of the rink were peeled away with each layer of scarf, jacket, and glove. The pups were quick to settle in and go to sleep, sorting out their blanket-nest on the floor - spinning in place like cats at times - before finally lying down and closing their eyes. Jiro had long-ago passed out, but his tiny body made the motions anyway, as though unconsciously going onward via autopilot.

With winter gear stowed away for the night, and shoes kicked off, Yuri plunked down onto the foot of their wide bed, rubbing his eyes in the heels of his hands. Viktor stowed the backpack with their unused skated into the closet, and slid forward to lift the glasses that had been left next to his partner's hip where he sat; he crawled over top of the bed to set them on a nearby nightstand instead. When he came back, Yuri had only halfway realized his glasses had even been moved, but just yawned instead of asking questions.

"Are you even awake enough for a night-cap?" The Russian wondered quietly, turning to sit sideways against the edge of the bed, left leg crossed to curve around the younger man's seat, the right going straight across Yuri's lap. Viktor leaned in to kiss the edge of his husband's shoulder as he slid his hands forward, clasping his fingers together over the subtle curve of the man's waist, pulling him closer, "Or did our late-night adventures throw off your sleep-cycle?"

"No worse than if we'd just slept in all day." He answered, tilting his head against Viktor's shoulder, eyes closed, "If you want to pull out a bottle of the stuff we brought with us though, I'll have a glass."

"You're making me rethink it anyway...I'm already comfortable."

Yuri huffed a laugh and looked up slightly, "Same. I still feel the chill from outside. It's like the cold went right through me."

"I can tell." Viktor mused, relaxing for a moment with his cheek to his husband's brow, "Even your clothes are still cold. Better get rid of them." He suggested easily, lifting up and giving Yuri's tummy a few pats, "Come on then; up."

Only somewhat grudgingly, Yuri sighed and agreed, pushing off of his comfortable warm-spot so he could raise his arms over his head. Viktor tugged at every few inches of his sweater and pulled it up carefully, hearing a few crackles of static as it came away. His undershirt came next, and between the two, Yuri's hair was left rather fluffed. Viktor's skin was still quite cold though, and Yuri's thin frame squished into itself a bit when those fingers pressed to his stomach again. He laughed at the absurdity of his big flinch, and felt that hand warming up against him, sliding up the front of his chest until it cupped around his neck and jaw, pulling his head to turn slightly. The warmth of a kiss met him there, and he hummed his relief into it, feeling the rest of his tight frame relaxing.

"Mh... You're really tense." Viktor commented, sliding his hand back down again, fingers curling around ribs as his thumb settled into the groove beneath his partner's sternum, "You can let it go. There's nothing left to stress about."

"Seems like there's always something to stress about..."

"Maybe, but-" He countered, pressing into another soft kiss, speaking the words against his husband’s lips, "There’s nothing to stress about here. Let me melt your worries away along with the cold."

"Hmm... Maybe I’ll need a bit of that wine after all then."

Viktor smiled, "Something to warm you from the inside out, while I’m warming you from the outside in?"

"Sounds pleasant." Yuri huffed a laugh, and briefly mourned the feeling of his spouse disassembling from him to stand up. He drew a long breath as he watched Viktor move back towards their many suitcases, and rummaged around in one until a particular green-glass bottle was found, as well as a white box with four wine glasses packed inside.

Viktor pulled two of them out, and put the box back where he’d found it before taking the glasses to the bathroom. A quick wash, drying them with one of the new and unused towels, he then returned and collected the bottle once again, taking the three items to the bar-like counters nearby. He quickly uncorked the wine with a corkscrew from a drawer, prying the bit of spongy wood from the glass neck until it popped, and the bottle let out a subtle fog from within. He lifted his eyes from the small circular opening when he saw Yuri moving around in his peripheral vision, lunging clumsily for the remote control to the television. He smiled as the sound came on, and Yuri turned it down a little just to give the room a bit of ambiance before standing up to start turning lights off.

The room dimmed from its original brightness to just half of it, and with one more lamp turned off, was more dark than lit. With the pale glow of the television coming into and out of brighter imagery, the walls flickered as though in white fire-light.

"Trying to set the mood?" Viktor wondered, pouring some of the Riesling into their glasses.

"The silence was deafening." Yuri answered, pulling back the blankets before taking a moment to stretch. Slate eyes were keen onto his pale frame and wine nearly overflowed, but Viktor caught it just in time, gulping a big swig to even the two levels out. Yuri heard the sudden slurp and glanced over, but didn’t quite see what had happened before his eyes opened, "Did you just drink half your glass?"

Viktor puffed a breath, "Of course not." He explained, a twinkle in one eye as he handed a glass forward, "I drank half yours."

"Well, that’s hardly fair." Yuri quipped, accepting the offered cup with one hand, and reached forward to take the second in the other.

Viktor blinked at him, still holding his hand up as though the glass were perched within it, and watched as his partner back-ended the flute until half of it was gone, and put the cup back where it had been a moment before...only to then drink half of his own right after. Yuri coughed slightly as the bubbly and bitter aftertaste suddenly caught him, and Viktor gave a nervous smile, "You haven’t eaten anything in a few hours. Drinking like that is going to leave you tipsy in two minutes flat."

"Maybe that’s how I want it." The younger figure answered, clearing his throat before taking another big sip from his wine, "This much won’t leave me brain-blinded, but I want to be able to loosen up... I don’t want to take anything negative home with us. There’s enough waiting for us to deal with as it is."

"...Can’t say I disagree with you." Viktor agreed, cocking his brows up a bit before raising what remained of his glass, "A toast then, to a better tomorrow, and some fun tonight."
"Kanpai."

Both drinks were finished with one last big sip, and Viktor took the two glasses to set aside. His sweater, and the t-shirt he wore under it, quickly came off as he followed his husband to the uncovered part of the bed. Standing beside it though, rather than getting in right away, the Russian slipped his hands to his partner's waist and held him there. He pulled Yuri closer, pressing the warmth of their exposed skin together, and noped the man's lips gently, slowly, before kissing them. Yuri's hands slid up the length of his arms, then over his shoulders to hug around them loosely, pressing in closer for the heat, and the taste. Viktor wanted more of it though, and he opened his mouth a little more, coaxing his husband's tongue out. With a bit of a nibble and a light suck on it, he could still sense the flavor of that wine from a minute before. Hands pulled back, fingers grazing the crests of each hip before slipping within Yuri's waistband, deftly undoing buttons and zippers to let the denim material fall away. Before Yuri had a chance to return the favor though, Viktor pulled him in closer again, delving deep for that sweet flavor as his hands slid under the black elastic, gripping at a palm-full on each side.

Yuri felt himself rise up onto his toes, practically lifted up by both of those hands on his backside. The simple reminder of what it felt like to have someone else's skin pressed against him there made the remnants of his clothes feel itchy and bothersome. Without a second thought, he lowered his arms from his husband's shoulders and pressed his thumbs into the elastic band, pushing the material away entirely before the back of his legs touched the bedside. He moved quickly, between new kisses, to be rid of Viktor's remaining clothes as well, wanting nothing more than to feel the heat and velvet-soft frame pressed against his own. It was a slightly awkward maneuver to be pushing clothing away while still wanting to keep on kissing at the same time, but before long, Yuri was rewarded for his efforts by the feeling of those warm hands lifting him up, pulling him against his partner's athletic core, and then hoisted up onto the open bed. Viktor's weight was a welcome pressure over him, in the immediate absence of two certain appendages that were still working on rising to the occasion.

"...I'm starting to feel it..." Yuri commented, "The wine's already gone to my head..."

"I told you," Viktor laughed, kissing at his partner's chest and neck as he worked his way back up again, "Two minutes flat."

"In another two, I'm going to be a lump...totally relaxed and one with the moment." Yuri added, gasping a vocal breath as he felt his husband's frame line-up with his own, pressing into him rather deliberately, "I want to feel everything..." He whispered.

"You're super sensitive when you're tipsy." The Russian commented, relishing in the sight of his partner's reactions to him, even as he moved off slightly to the side so he could hold up his weight on one elbow rather than both.

"And a bit more courageous."

"Oh?" He huffed a laugh and pressed in for another kiss, letting his free hand slide down the younger man's waist and hip, pulling that leg over himself so he could wedge his own between them. He gave one more kiss before pulling up to reach for the blankets, and grabbed them to bring them over, settling in again once they were covered, "What kind of courage do you still need to drum up with me?"

"Every kind."

Getting back to the pseudo-apartment was, in its own weird way, more harrowing that taking the ice earlier on had been. Phones had gone quiet, and Yurio wasn't even sure if at least his performance had been watched. He put a hand on the front of his chest, feeling the Bronze nestled under many layers of sweater, hoodie, and winter coat. Seeing the lamp posts light the way back only seemed to be like a count-down to that moment, too. He huffed a cold sigh into his scarf and squished himself inside the coat.

"You're super quiet." Minako commented, looking over at the blonde, Nikki between them, "I hope you're not brooding about the turn-out of the competition."

"No point." He answered grimly, "I couldn't have done any better than I did, in this condition. Giacometti and Nekola skated better than me. That's all there is to it."

"Well, this whole motley crew could respect your headspace a bit better." She retorted. Though not specifically at Nikki, the teen did catch the hint and lowered her eyes a bit, "I'll talk to Mik about how we can help with that. I don't think we'll make Viktoria come with us to the Winter Games, so that should avoid some upset when we're there."

"It's a month-long competition. You can't possibly be there the entire time anyway. I bet even the competitors get tired after a while. They probably just come for their events and then leave again."

"If only that were such an easy suggestion." Minako countered, "All athletes are expected to be there for the Opening Ceremonies, for the big parade...and then, at least for figure skating, you have events scattered all throughout. The Short Program and Free Skate are several days apart. The Team Event is in there somewhere. Then you have the Exhibition towards the end, and the whole Olympic Closing Ceremonies, too."

"I know. We talked about it already."

"We didn't make any decisions about it though." She explained, "We really need to. It's only a few weeks out."

"If the old man can really get us onto that fast-travel pass so we don't have to spend half our day in customs each time we get on a plane, then we'll just come back between events. Make each competition a day-trip or something."

"You don't want to stay and see any of the other stuff that goes on?"

"Of course I do, but I'm suddenly not entirely in control of my own schedule anymore." Yurio countered, "I can only make suggestions now."

"Well, what do you think you'd be doing if you were still training with Yakov?"

"I'd be there from start to finish, whether I liked it or not. He's got more events to be there for than I do."

"And did you ever ask Viktor and Yuri what their plans were?"

"No. Why would it matter though, really?" Yurio wondered, crossing the street while it was clear, "They both play for a different team. They'll be staying in different housing. Maybe I could stay close to Otabek, but definitely not them."

"Why not?" Minako quirked a brow.

Yurio just gave the woman a look, "Cuz they have sex with each other. Often. They're probably doing it right now."
The ballerina deadpanned him, but it didn't stop the rose color manifesting on her cheeks anyway. "Fine, so you can't spend the night with them. I'm sure they have plans to go see the countryside or something. There's going to be plenty of people they know around, like at the Final or Worlds. They'll all be hanging out together at some point or another."

Emerald eyes gawked back through the cold, "I can't tell if you're trying to pawn me off onto someone so you can leave me there."

"I'm trying to think about how we can let you attend the Games the way you want." She retorted, "It's just hard to know what our options are when so many other people are involved. In a way, it's just not the right other people."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

They turned into the small road that lead into the walkway to the door.

"If you were still with Yakov, I'd know who was supposed to be keeping an eye on you all the time. But you're with me now, and I have a bunch of things to consider beyond just you. Asahi already says he plans to stay the whole time, but that doesn't really solve any of our problems. You and him may get along with each other, but he seems to like being alone, so I can't exactly ask him to be your chaperone if you stay when the rest of us go back to Hasetsu. You already made your point about Yuri and Viktor, and we don't know Otabek's plans--"

Yurio shot a look back at Nikkita, but she squeaked and looked away to avoid it. She pulled the front of her hat down over her eyes after that, taking hold of Minako's arm to guide her the right direction as they approached the door.

Minako grumbled slightly, "Nikkita Rozovsky, do you know Otabek's plans for the Olympic Games?"

"NOPE. NO SIREE BOB. SURE DO NOT."

Both older figures just cocked a brow at her in disbelief, and Yurio shook his head as he turned to grab for the doorknob. Almost expectedly, it was locked, and he pounded on the panel to let the occupants know to let them in. It seemed that Mikhail was already on the way, as the door clicked open just two seconds later, and the awkward trio stepped inside.

"So how'd it go? Did you win?" The elder wondered, closing the door again behind them to lock it again, "Yuri?"

"I'm taking a shower and going to bed." He answered curtly, barely kicking his shoes off before taking everything else into the bathroom with him.

Mikhail looked at him go until the door closed and the sound of the water started running, and he looked back at the ladies next to him still disassembling from their winter assortments, "...Was it that bad?"

"He got Bronze, papa." Nikki answered quietly.

"Oh! That's still really good! Why doesn't he look happy about it? He was so worried about not winning anything at all before." The Russian wondered, glancing between them, "...Anyone?"

"I'm kind of tired, too, hun." Minako said, "I think I'm going to change. If the girls want to stay up, we can just put the roll-away into the kitchen and close the door between them. That's still the plan, right? That all the kids stay together tonight?"
"Yeah, but-

"That's good." She said, not meaning to cut him off, but didn't back off when she realized she had. She just put her coat away and gave a lazy sliding hug as she moved around him to the bedroom, "I'll come out again in a minute."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED NINETEEN

Viktor fell back into the pillows, hair askew, and stringy from moisture. He panted for breath, beads of sweat clinging to his frame, and he looked up to the figure looming over him. One of his legs was lifted and moved, twisting him partly onto his side, while the other was partly sat upon. He felt the back of his thigh press against his partner's chest, but then his knee bent and changed his whole posture. The expected pressure came against him after that, but he could still feel that almost-universal hesitation behind it.

Towels had been laid out over the bedsheets after an accidental over-squeeze on one of the lube bottles. They found it impossible to take the cap off and put some of the excess back inside, especially as buzzed as they both were, so instead opted to just use it everywhere. Yuri enjoyed a long, slippery back massage, and returned the favor afterwards, until Viktor flipped around underneath of him and began the more 'sexy' part of their sexy-times. Yuri had completely relaxed by then though, as he'd intended to be when he started to imbibe. Drinking on an empty stomach had done more than just help Yuri feel more at ease though; it put him right to sleep.

Viktor glanced up in confusion when he sensed that Yuri had stopped moving. Hands that held his leg up started to slide down, and even though their collapse had jarred Yuri awake again slightly, it wasn't enough to keep him there. The Russian watched his exhausted partner fall asleep at the wheel and crash. Yuri's head started to slump down, bobbing once or twice in a well-intended effort to rouse again, but he lost the fight and started to lean as well. Viktor sighed a sad smile and pulled free, pushing upright to guide his spouse down against his chest, "Come here, my love," He whispered, hands on his husband's shoulders to turn his back towards him, "I'll help you finish another way."

"Mmmmbiktoru..."

"Ah, now I know you're fading fast...your accent is slipping."

"S...sorrimasen..."

Viktor shook his head slightly at the Englipanese being mumbled to him, and helped find a more comfortable position. He kissed his partner's neck and nibbled lightly at the nearest ear as his hands roamed.

"What about you...?" Yuri managed to ask in his haze, "I was...trying to..."

"I finished a little while ago, my love." Viktor answered, "That's why you went to prop my leg against yourself. I think you intended to finish the same way."

"...Oh...hic..."

"You like it better this way though, right?" He wondered, "When I use my hands."

"M-mhmm..."

Viktor smiled again as his husband flinched and gasped, feeling fingers go around him. Though Yuri's eyes had closed again, his breaths and muffled gasps kept him awake, until his exhausted body gave over to the Russian's touch and surrendered. It was hardly the explosive end that Viktor had been hoping for, but Yuri didn't seem to have the energy for such anyway. The younger figure grunted slightly between clenched teeth, but then relaxed again, slumping his head back as sleep came for him again.
"...I don't...want to come to Euros again..." Yuri mumbled quietly, and nodded off.

Viktor stopped himself as he was wiping his hands on one of their many towels, blinking at his spouse in confusion. Yuri was officially down for the count though, and offered no explanation or follow-up to his half-conscious confession.

It left Viktor rather awake though.

The livingroom had been reassembled and rearranged for the night, moving the big wooden table aside to make room for the couch to become a pull-out queen-size bed, and the roll-away. Yurio's normally-golden hair was now a greyish dull straw color where it laid out on his pillow, still wet from his earlier shower. Nikki's was more like liquid steel than silver where it poked out from the towel wrapped around her head. She listened to the sound of the shower going in the room next-door, eyes on her phone screen as the noise cut out and the water started to drain away.

Otabek:
Yuri doesn't hate you. He used to be mean to everyone, even his fans. It's part of his personality.

Me:
'Used to be' is the problem though. He hasn't been like that in a while. Every time your name comes up though, he gives me this look like he wants me to drop dead.

Otabek:
I can talk him down if you want. He's just jealous and territorial, and a bit immature still. I've had to protect him from his worst impulses in the past, but it's not so easy if I'm not actually there.

Me:
I'm not even sure if he'd listen to you, BECAUSE you're not actually here.

Otabek:
So what would you have me do?

Me:
...I really don't know. I hadn't really thought about you doing anything at all. It's not your fault. I didn't think he'd care if I stayed in touch with you after he introduced us all at the Final.

Otabek:
It's part of him being territorial and immature. I'm almost certain he would've been like this after Viktor decided to stay in Japan. He complained bitterly last year when Viktor returned to Russia with Yuri-then-Katsuki. I guess he thought things would go back to how they were 'supposed' to be once Viktor was home. Plisetsky doesn't adapt to change very well.

Me:
No kidding... There's this guy in Japan that papa was helping and Yuri got really mad about it, like the other guy was stealing from him.

Otabek:
Not surprised. Yuri kind of operates under this idea that 'what's mine is mine and what's yours is mine, too.' He's not used to sharing or being a member of a group. He always has to be the outsider...better than everyone, more important, and everyone else is a worthless peasant. I'm sure he'll settle down. You said he just started a growth-spurt so that's probably weighing on his mind, and he's taking out his frustrations on the easiest thing.

"Oh my god are you still talking to him?" Yurio grumble-barked, twisting over on his singleton bed to gape at her from the other side of the table, "I can hear your thumbs tapping on the screen from here!"

Nikki didn't say a word. She stared over the top of her phone for a moment before setting it down, and reached to untie the knot holding the towel like a turban on her head. With her steely hair tumbling loose, she pushed up from the edge of the bed and left the room, passing through the olive-green doorway and into the kitchen.

Yurio gawked until the teen was out of sight, then roughly fell back down to his pillow, staring daggers at the wall in front of him.

Fingers started combing through the rope-like grey-black waves, but Nikki could go no further with the door to the bathroom still closed; her comb was on the counter inside. She sighed and turned around, looking at the chairs tucked neatly under the pull-out table up against the wall. Just before reaching for the back of one though, the bathroom door behind her opened, and she turned back around to spot her father coming out, one towel still lazily set over his head, his frame garbed loosely in a plain t-shirt and ultra-dad-mode plaid sweatpants. She saw the surprised look on his face to see her right there, but she just made a B-line for the counter to find her comb in an effort to make a hasty escape.

Mikhail wasn't that clueless though, and caught her easily with a single arm as she tried to squeeze past him, "You're wiggly, but not that wiggly." He mused.

The comb was just out of reach, but Nikki relented under the lasso-like arm around her small frame, "I just wanna get my thing so I can-"

"You've been acting weird since you all got back," The elder noted, looking at the top of his daughter's head over one shoulder, "What's the matter?"

She held still for a moment, but then made a quick lunge to grab her comb finally, and found herself free of the snare. She grabbed the bundle of damp hair from behind her back and pulled it forward, half-intending to brush it out, but stopped, "...I used to have tons of friends. Now I barely have any, and the few I do have are causing me problems." She explained, "Why can't I just be friendly with someone without everyone coming up with stupid stories about it or getting angry?"

Mikhail gaped for a moment, but then pulled the towel off his head to hold it around his shoulders instead, leaving his hair unkempt and stringy, "...Beka again?"

She nodded reluctantly.

"Sweetie..." He started quietly, reaching forward to slowly take the comb into his own hand. He looked at it briefly, but then moved to his daughter's side to start coming her hair out for her, "I can't speak for everyone, but...you're entering into a period of your life where the relationships between ladies and gents gets a bit complicated. Most guys can't just be regular-friends with girls anymore. Unless it's in an entirely professional setting, or there's a significant age gap, or the guy is gay...there's usually something more bubbling under the surface of any male-female interactions. It's also unfortunately true that guys don't mature as fast as girls. Most of us are effectively braindead until our 30s. I know I was. But, because I know that about myself, and that it's true for most other guys, too, as a father, I'm hyper-vigilant of any testicle-owners you talk to. You're cute and super smart, and any man will be lucky to have you, but the first one is always an experiment, and at least for my sake, barely-15 isn't the best time to be hitting-up older men."
"But I'm no-"

"I know, I know, he's like 21 or something...not really an older man but older than you by a good chunk, and slightly inappropriate at your age. And by 'slightly' I mean 'super.'"

"I don't even mean that." She protested, turning in place as much to see her father as to let him have easy access to the other half of her hair, "He's just...nice to me. Cousin Viktor and his Yuri are always doing their own thing, and..." She stopped for a moment, choosing her words carefully, "Our Yuri is either practicing or he's with us, so it's different. I can talk about stupid stuff with Otabek and he doesn't make fun of me or say I'm stupid. It's hard to do that with everyone I knew back in Banff cuz we're on the other side of the planet from them. I'm always playing catch-up, replying to messages they sent while I was asleep and vice versa. Otabek's awake at the same time though. He's...the only friend I have now. I wish people would stop giving me such a hard time about it."

"Beka was Yura's first real friend." Mikhail explained, still keeping his voice down, "It must feel like he's competing for the guy's attention now that you're talking to him, too."

"He seems to manage just fine with other people whose attention is split." Nikki argued glibly, frowning at the marble bowl that acted as a sink, "And I'm not the only person Otabek talks to, either."

"But you're the one Yura sees doing it. Maybe try including him in your conversations or something." Mikhail recommended, hand following after each comb-pass, flattening damp silver hair as it started to curl at the tips, "Even if he declines a group-chat invitation, you can't say you didn't try."

"Yeah..."

"And it'll bring my heart-rate down a bit to know that it's a group thing."

"He was dating that Russian lady before. I talked to him then, too."

"And if I remember right, they're not dating now."

Nikki grumbled slightly, and puffed a loose strand of hair away from her eyes, "Nothing I say will convince you we're just friends."

"Nope. Sorry. It'll always be at the back of my mind." He answered, handing back the comb now that the teen's hair was all sorted out, "I'll try not to be intrusive. Remember that I'm just trying to watch out for you. I'm not trying to ruin anything. I'm just...like the goofy dog in the picture you showed me the other day. A labradog labradoing what a labradog labrado. Or...labra-dad in this case."

"...Right..."

"Go on and try to get some rest then. You're not doing anything wrong. It's just life." The elder suggested, sliding a hand behind his daughter's shoulder to usher her back towards the olive-green door, "Try as you might, you can't please everyone...though you do a pretty good job anyway."

"I'm not used to anyone being upset at me like this..."

"And that's why it hurts." Mikhail nodded, "All things pass with time and understanding. Try what I suggested at some point and see if that doesn't help alleviate tension."
"Okay..." Nikki agreed tepidly, turning in place to give and get a goodnight hug, "Thanks papa. G'night."

"Night, honey." He replied, watching her go back to the livingroom. He waited for the last lamp to turn off before following the walls to the other side of the kitchen, and into the antechamber where the door outside and the door to the bedroom were. He checked the lock for the 18th time to make sure it was activated, and then finally went to the bedroom itself, finding Minako there in bed on her phone, "Anything interesting?" He wondered.

Grey-blue eyes peeked past the device as the door closed and the room fell to silence, save the Russian's shuffling where the heels of his pants dragged behind each step, "Normally I'd say sure...but it isn't like it used to be for me." She answered, shutting the phone down before leaning forward against her upturned knees, "I just feel strangely detached from it all now. Like I can't be a fan the way I used to be." She sighed, resting an elbow on the crook between her knees, and rested her jaw in her palm. She watched her partner climb under the covers next to her, "Am I weird?"

"Maybe it's different because you got a look behind the curtain." He suggested, "You're working in it now, not just admiring from afar."

"...I guess so." She nodded, pivoting on her palm to look at the phone in her other hand, "I thought it would be like the ballet."

"The players are a bit different in figure skating than ballet, I bet." Mikhail offered, wiggling down until he could pull the blankets up under his chin, and then turned onto his side to look up at his partner, "Do you want me to look for a coach to take over? Someone who doesn't mind relocating to Hasetsu."

Minako hesitated for a moment, but then shook her head, and turned to put her phone on the charger on the nightstand, and cut the lights. When she turned back, the room was pitch dark, and she couldn't see an inch in front of her face. Fingers brushed against her cheek lightly, and proximity came back to her, "I want to think I can manage. That I'll get into the right frame of mind and not be distracted by wanting to be a fan still. Both of the skaters I'm supposed to be responsible for have just had a bunch of upheaval in their lives and I want to be the thing that helps settle everything down. But all the mistakes I made this weekend, getting the schedule wrong and not knowing what to do until practically the last minute...I just feel like I'm making things worse. I can't be a liability to him - them - going forward."

"So far, just him. I haven't heard back from the other one."

"I hope he's okay..."

"I'll keep trying."

"How'd things turn out with Viktoria?" Minako asked, eyes starting to adjust to the dark.

"Unresolved. I told her we should talk but she never had anything to say." Mikhail answered, his tone a bit forlorn, "I don't know if I'm doing it wrong or if she just doesn't have anything to tell me. She won't give me my hat back until she feels like I'm being her dad right though, but I don't know what to change if she's unwilling to tell me. I feel like I only have half the picture."

Minako huffed a laugh as she slid an arm forward, dangling it to rest her elbow in the crook of the Russian's waist, "Kids are that way sometimes. They sometimes think everyone should know intuitively what's wrong because, to them, it's so obvious."
"I feel clueless."

"It's frustrating. Maybe you're just out of practice handling your kids' problems. You'll get there."

The hours passed into the late night, and then into the early morning. Viktor half-dozed, eyes facing the television even if they weren't really watching what was going on upon its screen. Yuri had been asleep for half an age by then, using him as a pillow, and occasionally as a drooling-mat, as the case may be. Viktor just gently stroked his partner's hair idly, until the weight of his own eyelids was too much to resist anymore. He sighed quietly to himself and twisted to reach for the remote control on the nightstand behind him, and clicked the television off, plunging the room into abrupt darkness. He settled back in as gently as he could and closed his eyes.

_Yuri's always been an honest drunk_, he thought, eyes cracking open slightly as he stared into the black. _But that doesn't always mean he makes sense._ ..._I don't know what he meant by half of what we said since we got back._ ..._I wonder if he even knows...?_
The sheets tugged and the bed shifted slightly, but when awareness dawned in Viktor's sleepy mind, it was obvious that the source of the rummaging was his poodle. The fuzzy pup rooted with his nose like a boar in the woods, but eventually laid down, tail patting lightly near his human's knees. The room went to silence again, save the occasional close-up snuffling of Makkachin's nose by Viktor's ear, and the hazy Russian lifted an arm over the pup and tried to go back to sleep. It was still rather dark at that point; the only light sources in the small space were the digital displays on the front of the cable-box and an alarm clock. Makkachin licked the tops of his paws for a little while, nibbling the back of his wrists with his tiny front teeth as dogs do when they're itching something, but eventually set his head down.

The hollow, far-off sound of a flush, and the spray of a tap, sounded-off quietly in the background. Viktor was already nearly out when the door clicked, and soft footsteps padded across the short-fiber carpet. The sound of Jiro's squeaky whine was enough to catch the Russian's attention though, and he listened closely thereafter. He heard, but couldn't understand, a few soft whispers being spoken to the puppy. It sounded like the pup was lifted up after that, too. The bed shifted a second time, slightly further away than when Makkachin had come up. For a moment, there was nothing else, but then the bed reset to its original position and was replaced by the nearly-negligible indentations of Jiro walking along the foot-end, and then stopped. The footpads continued their quiet shuffle across the carpet though, followed by the crinkle and zipper-noises of suitcases being rummaged through. The odd sound spurred Viktor to move then, but whatever noise he made was ignored or unheard, as was evident when the sudden bright spot-light shone down on Yuri's naked frame and made him squeak in surprise.

He turned in place where he was crouched on his knees by their luggage pile, and brought up a hand to block the intensity of the light, "V-Viktor...?"

"What are you doing?" The Russian asked in confusion. The softer light of his phone beamed closer to his face and he checked the time, "It's nearly 4:30 in the morning. Why are you even awake?"

"Can you cut the flashlight so I can see?" The younger man pleaded, squinting severely. The bright laser-light went out a second later, and Yuri rubbed his eyes, still seeing red and orange spots on the back of his eyelids, "I couldn't sleep." He explained in a hushed voice, "I think I've been awake for an hour or so. My head's pounding and I feel a chill. I was trying to find my meds from the other day...ideally without waking you up, too."

Viktor blinked at the darkened silhouette crouching on the floor, but then shook his head, "Shield your eyes, I'll turn a lamp on."

Yuri could hear the blankets rustling and Makkachin being made to move, but the click of the lamp followed soon after and the room lit up in a dim yellow glow. As he rubbed his eyes, trying to adjust still after the blinding sun-like pin-light from his partner's phone, he heard the man get up and walk behind him. He could see again just in time to find Viktor unzipping a small satchel in the bathroom, and withdrew a small white bottle with a blue label. It jangled with the sound of the tablets it contained, a couple tumbling into Viktor's palm before he put the cap back and filled a nearby glass with a bit of water.

Returning, Viktor ushered his spouse up to his feet and back to the foot of the bed, sleepily offering both, "This will help more than your ibuprofen...which I think is actually still in your jacket."
"Oh, right." Yuri answered simply, eyes still slightly squinting as he took the offered items. Two Aleve tablets went down the hatch with a water chaser, and Yuri pressed his now-empty palm to the top of his head, "I regret everything." He grumble-whined.

Viktor pressed the underside of his wrist to his spouse's forehead, "You're hot again."

"I feel cold."

"Wait here."

Jiro clambered closer over the big piles of blankets, and plunked down next to his human's hip as the Russian moved back towards the bathroom. Yuri wasn't sure which of them to pay more attention to, but just as he'd settled on the one that was right next to him, a pale blur returned to his periphery and a luke-warm wash-cloth spread across his skin. A bit surprised, but liking the cool sensation on his hot skin, Yuri closed his eyes to let his face be wiped down, followed by his neck, chest, and arms. Viktor climbed up onto the bed to get behind him, and used the other side of the same wet cloth to wipe his back.

"I worry about you sometimes."

Yuri glanced back hazily over one shoulder, one hand still on Jiro's little frame, "What I do...?"

"Drinking too much on an empty stomach, saying cryptic things, making yourself sick again..."

"I know... In hindsight it was a bad idea, but I thought better of it at the time. I forget on occasion that wine is as potent as it is." Yuri tried to explain, feeling every inch of cool skin, damp from the cloth and drying in the open air, "All I wanted was to let go for a bit, but I don't even remember how it ended."

"You fell asleep."

Yuri sat up straighter and turned his whole core, gaping, "You're kidding. I didn't..."

Viktor shook his head and leaned back on his hands, offering a meager smile, "Sorry, my love. But you did"

"Shimatta..." Yuri said aghast, dipping his head down, "How embarrassing..."

"It happens to everyone eventually. You're pretty worn out, I guess. I haven't helped a lot on that end. I've kept you up too late even though you were already feeling sick, and before that-"

"It was worth it." Yuri said, cutting off the thought, "Don't ever think otherwise. I'd come all the way back here anytime to go to another one of those balls."

"...Just so long as it's not during Euros, right?"

Cherry-hazel eyes looked on in confusion, "I don't think it matters. Neither of us is going to compete at a European Championship, so..."

"...Right..."

"Mmmnhh... That came out wrong." Yuri said, slight panic in his voice as he rubbed the back of his neck.

"It's not untrue." Viktor shrugged, "I just turned 29 a few weeks ago. My skating career has gone beyond dusk and into twilight. Even if something insane happened and I was put onto another European team, I may never compete at Euros ever again. I've already made my plans clear that I intend to treat next year as a personal challenge, rather than a real one... If I'm even chosen to go to 4C's next year, I'll be surprised."

Yuri made a face, "You're head-and-shoulders above most everyone else in this sport even when you're not trying."

"Most everyone else, but not everyone else." Viktor corrected and shrugged again, looking to the damp cloth in his right hand, "Chris has another few years left. Yurio's literally just getting started. Then there's all the others...and most importantly, there's you. You're not just Japan's rising sun, you're it for the whole Asian bloc, as well as for the non-European side of things. Coming here after everything else..." His words trailed, but he pushed up from his hands to lean over his half-folded legs, elbows resting on his bare thighs, "It was a mistake."

"I don't know why you'd think that. Other than that one hiccup, I've had a lot of fun here."

"You said you never wanted to come to Euros again."

"...Eh?" Yuri stared blankly, one eye twitching slightly above a puckered cheek, "When did I say that?"

"In your amnesia phase, I guess." Viktor answered, "I can't blame you though. How can something like this be fun when we arrived like refugees?" He asked, looking rather disappointed by the whole thing, "This event was ruined before we even got here. I made us go on a stupid side-quest to see a man who's made it evidently clear since the start that he didn't like us being together. We should've cancelled the whole trip and just stayed home. At least Saito is a Hell I can control."

"...But then we never would've gone to that ball."

"I'm sure I could've figured out another reason to use those suits."

Yuri furrowed his brow, unsure what to say at first. He turned in place where he still sat on the edge of the bed, his bent knee coming to rest over his partner's, and he reached his right hand forward to slide it across the man's shoulders to pull that silver-haired head closer to him, "I think it's important that we got to go. It wasn't just the eye of some storm that's still raging all around us...it was the first glimmer of sunlight coming through the clouds. There may still be some thunder coming, but the worst is behind us. We needed that ball." He explained, rubbing his cheek slowly against the crown of his husband's head, thumb against his opposite shoulder, "We've barely had time to relax and unwind this whole time. Every little moment we've had was rushed, or there was some shadow looming over it. The ball was the first time I felt like the rest of the world could just bugger off for a while. No one we knew was there, no one bothered us, no one made us feel bad, and we even got to skate a little at the end. It was entirely perfect, and I'd come back to Vienna in a heartbeat to do it again."

Viktor nodded in quiet agreement.

"...But...me saying...that I don't want to come to Euros again..." Yuri went on reluctantly, "I'm not sure what inspired me to say that so randomly, but... All the worst things that happened because of this trip happened at Euros. I don't think we can come here as just spectators; too much about this event has become tainted. It would be like going to Russian Nationals."

"...It wouldn't. Nationals would be much worse."

"I... Yeah." Yuri tepidly agreed, trying not to think on it too much, "But my point is, even though the Euros organizers still want you to be part of things, being here after being fired by the RSF just carries too much baggage. Skating in the Exhibition is neat, but it feels hollow when you were supposed to be in the competition beforehand. They should be calling you out to skate as the European Champion, not as just some guest skater."

"That's all I'm going to be at some point."

"But you'll have gotten to that point voluntarily." Yuri corrected, "I may never fully understand exactly how you feel about all this, but try as you do to be optimistic and not let anyone see you down, I can still feel the difference. This is nothing like going to competition as just a coach last year, when everyone was giving you grief about how you should quit mucking around and come back as an athlete. This...feels even worse than when I fell apart, and was avoiding watching the competitions on t.v. because I didn't want to see what I was missing out on. We're in a place we're not supposed to be and there's a hint of that in the air every time we go into that arena. In some ways, it can be fun, because fans are excited to see you...but knowing they're excited because they expected you wouldn't be here kind of ruins it. Then, of course, we had that fight while attempting to practice for the Exhibition that we weren't supposed to be part of. I just..." He said, his words trailing for a few seconds. He turned in place a little further and brought his other arm up, weaving his fingers through his husband's hair to cup his hand around the back of the man's head, "I want to do our show, and stick it to the RSF, but then I just want to go home and put it behind us. Putting on a brave face is tiring. I'm exhausted to the point where even wine and sexy-time isn't wearing me out enough to sleep. I don't think I'll get much more than naps until we're finally in our house, and in our bed."

"...I guess I understand." Viktor sighed, lifting his head up just enough to squish his brow to the side of his husband's neck, "I'm sorry I'm putting you through all this."

"You didn't do this on your own..." Yuri reassured, such as it was, "I had hope things would work out with Kon, since he'd come so far... I had hope that being part of the JSF would be enough to put the RSF at the back of your mind. When you said at All Japan that you wanted to use the Euros trip to cheer me up, I didn't want to spoil it by saying we shouldn't go. I'm in this neck-deep with you."

The silver Russian nodded tiredly, and glanced up at the cable box for the time, "...Is there any point in trying to go back to sleep at this point?"

"Dunno. I'm pretty awake now..."

"Yeah..."

"I could use a cuddle though."

Viktor lifted his head up, but offered his best smile, ",...I may pass out...but that sounds perfect."

The two pups were left to their own devices in the hotel room when dawn broke and their humans had to get down to business. Skates were packed up again, a quick and simply breakfast was grabbed, and they made their way to the Erste Bank Arena. First to arrive for the Exhibition Practice, they had Hall 2 all to themselves for the first three hours. Even when the trickle of other athletes started, most didn't arrive until after the Free Dance ended around 11am and the sports-complex was turned over to just the competitors. With three rinks available, there was plenty of room and time for those who would be part of the Gala later that night.

Many observers were still disappointed that Viktor would not jump, even as a few teased an attempt to goad him into it anyway. He just waved and smiled as he always did, and reminded them that he couldn't before moving on with the practice.

They heard some of the usual banter between Emil and the Crispinos, and later spotted a broody and tired Yurio stumble through, only to turn around and leave to find a different rink to practice in. Chris turned up a little while after that, having slept most of the morning away after celebrating his 2nd year Gold into the early hours.

"You look as tired as we feel." Viktor teased, taking a break on the inside of the rink wall as Yuri continued to hone his role. He pulled up a gold-bladed boot onto one knee to brush some of the frost off the metal, and repeated it with the other, "Who were you even partying with all night if not us?"

"No one that I knew, per se." He answered, watching Yuri as he leaned on the wall, "My taste isn't quite as cultured as yours."

"Pfft. I've gotten shitfaced at some shady places before." The Russian guffawed, then leaned in to whisper behind one hand, "I actually spent all night at a ramen stand in Hasetsu when I first got there, after Yurio showed up."

"I wouldn't call a ramen stand 'shady.'" Chris said, brow quirked.

"It was after I got done with it." Viktor laughed nervously, and leaned onto the rink wall on his elbows more casually, "Had to drown my sorrows into something after he got there."

"Drowning your sorrows in Japan...?" The blonde teased, batting his eyelashes, "My dearest friend, are you suggesting that he was cockbl-

"No, no no." He huffed, putting a finger over Chris' mouth to shush him, "It was never like that. It was more like...being friend-zoned by proxy; Yuri's attention was scattered. Yurio was just a handful. I mean, I still had fun with it however I could, but it's not like I expected him to show up out there."

"I see." Chris nodded and looked back into the rink, "Two adults trying to have a serious relationship and suddenly this angry teenager throws a brick into the middle of it."

"Exactly." Viktor laughed, turning around to put his back to the ledge instead, "Why don't you get your practice done? We've been here since before the sun came up. We could get lunch together after."

"I suppose I could be convinced." Chris said, pushing off the wall to stretch his arms up.

"Perfecto~"
Chapter 521

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWENTY ONE

Hot water sprayed down like needles from the unrefined commercial shower-head in the changing room. It was an open area with a number of the same shower-heads lined along the upper rim of the walls, with small white tiles interspersed with black for a pattern that went all the way around and onto the floor, until the pattern circled the brass drain-cover in the center of a slight dip. Soapy water flowed down legs and pooled at the drains, floating until they dissolved and disappeared.

"So are you feeling alright about the Exhibition now?" Viktor wondered, raising his face into the spray to rinse the shampoo from his eyes. He lowered it again and let the water rush through his hair, "You went at it even harder than I did."

"I didn't have to choreograph it at the same time." Yuri answered, rubbing the crown of his head with his fingertips to get the conditioner out completely. He turned in place and let the spray go down his front, closing his eyes to avoid the spray of the hot mist. He rubbed his hands over his skin to help push the soapy residue away, "I think I feel okay about it though. I was worried about the music, but it seems to have come through, too. You can hardly tell we had to re-record the last line, least not that we did it with a smartphone."

"Well, there's nothing terribly fancy about putting a screen of some sort between your mouth and the microphone. The hotel room was a pretty good audio-booth, too, all things considered."

"Yeah."

"So what do you feel like eating?"

"Probably something light if we're supposed to go out with Yurio again before the show later. Just enough to take the edge off for a few hours."

"Yeah, that's smart..." Viktor agreed, reaching for the bottle of conditioner to squeeze some of the creamy pale-yellow goop into his hand, "Or we can split something."

"Sure." Yuri nodded, stepping back slightly to open his eyes. He glanced casually around the shower area, seeing the occasional other athlete go through, though none were needing the showers thankfully. Seems they're all just getting here now to do Exhibition practice. Guess it pays to pack it all into the other days. Today can be a bit more relaxed. Thinking about the very concept of relaxation made Yuri's eyes shutter a little, half-closing as though he were ready to fall asleep on his feet. He shook the feeling away and ignored the heaviness on his eyelids, and turned instead to spot Viktor with his hands in his wet hair, lathering the conditioner through as it sat and soaked for a bit. For once in a rare while, Yuri actually let his eyes wander a bit over that pale frame, watching the bubbly water cascade over every shapely ridge and curve.

Viktor ran his fingers through molten silver strands, feeling the prickle of water-spray contrast with the softness of his hair. One hand, then another, combing through until all the conditioner was washed away, and he could open his eyes again. Just before he did though, he felt another set of hands slide over his form, starting at the outside edges of his thighs and moving slowly up. Water-warmed skin pressed velvet-soft to his back, and lips went to the far side of one shoulder, hands still inching their way vertical. Viktor cracked one eye open to peer at his partner there, but didn't dare interrupt him. Hands trailed up over the crest of each hip, turned to point fingers upward to move up his flank, then twisted to go sideways as they lowered again. Viktor was surprised to feel those palms caress over the curve of his hind-end, even if only for a moment before moving on.

Yuri pressed in a bit closer then, turning his cheek to replace the spot on his husband's back where his mouth had been before. His fingers guided the new path forward and over the inward curve of the Russian's waist, feeling the subtle ridge of every muscle until they finally slid over the man's chest and pulled him gently backward against himself, "Don't mind me." He said casually, coiling his arms a bit tighter to just hug the man where he was.

That one slate eye that was looking already smiled and closed again, and Viktor lowered one hand to give his husband's a knowing pat before going back to his rinse. A handful of people went by as the last bits of conditioner were rinsed away, giving the occasional odd looks - mostly of surprise until they realized who the pair were - as they moved through toward the rink area. Viktor kept half an eye on things; there was still something to be said about the odd European openness of the shower-area floorplan, leaving it entirely visible to everyone who was going through. But, nearly 2 years of being on display at the Yu-Topia onsen had dulled was little modesty the Russian still had. It was his delicate husband's modesty he was being vigilant for; even that 'proud son of a hot-spring resort' still happened to be Japanese - tinted through 5 years of systemic American shame - and all that entailed.

He penguin-stepped to turn the both of them around slightly, making it easier to reach for the wash-cloth in their travel-size shower-caddy, as well as the liquid soap bottle it came with. Limbs and neck were lathered first, and Yuri quietly moved his arms up or down so the Russian's chest could be soaped-up next. Viktor leaned back into him for balance while he washed his long legs, and suddenly found himself without a way to get his own back. He looked at the cloth in his hands, and back over his shoulder to the raven-haired figure clinging to him still.

Realizing the pause was because of him, Yuri gave one last squeeze with his hug before letting go, and reached his hands forward to take the small square of rough, soapy fabric. Without hesitation, he flared it out and squished it to his husband's pale back, moving it methodically across every inch. By the time he'd finished, Viktor was turning around in front of him. Yuri looked up through the spray, able to see the pale silver blur on the other side, but what was crystal clear were the two long arms that came up on either side of him, palms pressing to the white tile wall behind him. Viktor himself came through the water a moment after, head drenched to momentarily hide the grin beneath the run-off.

"It's a shame this is such a public place. Things could go very differently from here if we were home."

Yuri's cheeks flushed, but he smiled anyway before squashing the wash-cloth to Viktor's face to nudge him back. He could hear the laughter even through the hiss of the shower, and he followed through as well, feeling his husband's hands come down on his head.

It wasn't quite the same as the summer beaches of Hasetsu, where the outdoor shower stations lead to a number of exciting water fights, but a bit of playful fun in a Viennese locker-room was a welcome reprieve from the stresses of competition season anyway. Every shower-head in the wide open stall was on by the time Viktor was done with them, carefully darting to the nozzle of each before moving off to avoid the initial cold splash. He laughed with each yelp or shriek from his husband, chasing him carefully from behind, and getting the ice-cold water on his feet with each pass. They made it around the room twice - plenty of time for the water to get hot and fill the space with a thick fog of steam - before Yuri finally caught the man...or Viktor let him, it wasn't clear.

Yuri squished against his spouse's chest, and Viktor backed them both up against the same wall where they'd started. Blue eyes met brown for a moment, and Yuri stepped up onto his toes to steal a quick kiss...which Viktor insisted be a longer kiss. They each turned again, pressing shoulders to the wall as those laughing kisses continued in the steamy space.

"I'm starting to believe the mist is because of you two rather than all the showers being on."

Yuri blanched, eyes wide at the sound of the voice. Viktor looked up, but then smiled and waved before returning his hand to the small of his husband's naked back.

"Is there even any hot water left?"

"It's pretty warm in here." Viktor mused, "We're done; we were just messing around. It's all yours, Chris."

The blonde cocked his head back in a single laugh, "You two are just going to leave as soon as I arrive? I thought I was about to get a show."

"'Fraid not. Just some shower pranks." The Russian explained, reaching around to finally cut the water from the spout just by him. He reached for one of the many folded towels on the shelf lining the top of the wall, just above the shower-heads, and threw two onto Yuri's frame before getting two for himself, "Have you thought about where you want to eat?"

"...It still feels like a kick in the arse that you were here this whole time but not really." Chris sighed, taking a sip from his small glass of white wine, "Worse than last year, to be honest."

Viktor looked across at the man with an innocent smile, though his brows were raised suspiciously, "I can't help what happened. I had plans here though and the tickets and everything else were already paid for."

"I know."

Restaurant [VERANDA] was upper class and rather contemporary in its design. The walls were white, textured like the folds of a fan or accordion, with large glass-covered paintings hung upon it. A booth seat lined the lower half of it, velvety and dark green, with dark-wood square tables and wrap-around cushioned chairs opposite. A white runner laid over the table in place of a full tablecloth, with a lit candle sitting within an arrangement of pink flowers, and red flower petals arranged in a pattern on the table itself. There were small chandeliers hanging from the ceiling, and large, heavy curtains tucked into the corners where it looked like each wing of the seating area could be made private if they were pulled across. During the daylight hours though, the sun came in with a yellow glow, leaving a sleepy golden haze over the whole dining hall.

"It just doesn't feel like much of a victory to get Gold again if I didn't win it because I took it right out of your hands." Chris continued his complaint, "You know how long I've waited to see that look on your face? That you've been beaten?"

"I've seen that look." Yuri chimed in mischievously, raising one hand up slightly above the edge of the table. That just earned him a grim look of sarcastic contempt from the man across the table, and he laughed quietly to himself before going back to the bread he'd been tearing apart above his small plate.

"Then beat me at the Games next month." Viktor offered, "It'll mean more than beating me at Euros anyway. The whole world will see it."

Chris grumbled again though and sat back in his spot, mouthing the edge of the wine glass before taking another small sip, "You've robbed me of opportunity for too long. I thought we were friends."
"We are friends." Viktor shot back, reaching for a slice of pumpernickel from the bread basket, and a dollop of butter from the small cups next to it, "I'm as disappointed that I couldn't compete this weekend as anyone. If not for what the RSF did, I wouldn't have broken my leg two weeks ago either."

"You didn't break your leg." Both Yuri and Chris retorted.

He ignored their corrections though, "But it's not like I'm entirely out of competition. It's exactly one less event for you to try and fail to beat me at each year. There's still Worlds and the Grand Prix Series and Final, and a host of weenie events throughout."

Chris just narrowed his eyes, brows raised high, "You wound me, Viktor. You haven't even been to any of those weenie events since you moved to Japan. Even Plisetsky went to the Golden Skate last year before the Final."

Viktor smiled, "I've been busy." He explained simply, raising one hand up to rub across his husband's back, "But you know as well as anyone that part of why I took off like I did was because I wanted to spend more time with Makkachin. He's getting older and I've been away so often because I've competed in so many events...I've lost a lot of time with him. Going to Japan to be a coach was as much an excuse to be available for Makka as it was to seduce Yuri."

"You came all this way with Makkachin though and he's still cooped up in your hotel room." Chris pointed out, grabbing for a small wedge of Pecorino, "Same with Jiro, much as my skates are glad of it."

Yuri felt a pit in his gut, "We're gonna go back after this to check on them. We just couldn't square bringing them to the rink when we were both practicing at the same time. It would be too distracting to constantly look over the rink wall to make sure they were okay and not being bothered by fans who know they're ours."

"Things are better with Papa Mimi again though...maybe we can ask him to watch the pups if we run into something like this again later." Viktor suggested, "Besides, part of why we got permission to bring the dogs to competition in the first place was so Jiro could hedge your anxiety." He pointed out, sliding his hand up the younger man's back again, then down to rest it there casually, "Most of the time, one of us will always be available to watch them. It's just impossible when we're practicing a pair program."

Yuri nodded in agreement, "Euros isn't a normal situation at all, really... Other than the obvious, getting invited to skate the Exhibition at the last minute left us scrambling to figure out what program to use. Neither of us has practiced the one we're doing tonight since September or so..." He looked aside to his partner, "We could've picked one that we'd skated more recently, but...this one means something, so it was worth the trouble."

"Even on that broken leg of his?" Chris wondered dryly, nudging his head at the Russian.

"Even with his Grade 1 ankle strain that he's probably going to get clearance on as soon as we're home again."

"I'm surprised they even asked, given the whole world was freaking out about it." Chris said, nibbling little bits at a time of the cheese he held between his fingers.

"Viktor's pointed out a number of times this weekend that he's the only one who knows how his body feels. The event organizers know that, too. I'm sure they considered it. Better to offer and be turned down than to not offer at all under the assumption that they'll be turned down. In this case, it worked out...Viktor's taking it easy and he still gets to skate."

"Hmph... Much to the Russians' chagrin." Chris shrugged, leaning forward towards the table's edge. He crossed his elbows over it and spoke a little quieter, "After Popovich lost his spot on the podium, things got grim in the RSF's corner. I doubt Plisetsky noticed since he's not hanging around the Old Guard anymore, but anyone who walked by them could feel the tension. Popovich got a pretty stern talking to by someone higher up than Yakov. Even Mila looked a bit flustered by it, and she's usually pretty cool about everything."

Viktor's expression looked a bit more grim than before, but he shrugged and tried to let it go, "It's not really my problem anymore. The RSF can scold Georgi all they want. He was never their most solid shot at a podium anywhere though. They should be focusing on Yurio; even with his growth spurt hitting right now, he's still their best shot at winning medals for Russia."

Chris smirked behind his fingers, "Oh, is that what happened?" He wondered, mostly to himself.

Yuri made a strange face at the mention of the Russian Tiger, "Maybe they did..."

"What do you mean?"

"He totally blew us off this morning at practice. Didn't even say hi. Just looked into the rink, spotted us, looked kind of deflated and left for a different rink." He explained, "I thought maybe it was residual shame from last night, since he lost the Silver by such a narrow margin...but maybe it was cuz the RSF caught him on the way in."

"I don't want to speculate on things the RSF may or may not have said to Yurio." Viktor said dismissively, "He may just still be salty cuz of the thing with Otabek last night."

"Why would he avoid us because of Otabek though?"

Viktor reached up his free hand and boop'd his husband's nose, "Stop saying things that make sense. You're killing the hope I have that this is explainable by simpler means."

Yuri crossed his eyes as the finger came near, but then focused on the bread basket again, keeping quiet.

"You guys have a lot of work to do before Four Continents now." Chris said, changing the topic slightly, "Once you get your ankle cleared, I imagine the next two weeks are going to be grueling."

He added, pointing to the silver across from him

"If not for that, then for the Games after." Viktor agreed, "It's actually kind of annoying that we have to share the Ice Castle with so many other skaters. We actually have to think about splitting time into shifts so we can all have fair time."

Chris puffed an incredulous singular laugh, "So many? Viktor, my dear friend, there's four of you. Most of us practice on rinks that are shared by whole clubs, not just locals."

"Maybe I'm spoiled then," The Russian shrugged and leaned back against the booth, "Up until two weeks ago, Yuri and I had free reign of the rink. Then skating got more popular in the city and more people wanted skating lessons. That's all fine and well...they have their set times during the week and we can bugger off to do something else. But now we have two whole other Olympians training on our turf, and I only like one of them."

Yuri sunk a little where he sat, but said nothing. He just moved one hand under the table to set it on his partner's leg, giving the subtle reminder that he didn't want to hear about that issue. Viktor acknowledged it with a few quick rubs of his thumb where his hand still pressed to Yuri's low back and waist.

The whole issue seemed dropped for the moment anyway as a waiter came by with their lunch orders, setting down a spread of assorted soups, salads, new breads and a cheese plate.

Chris looked at the soup in front of him; thick and green, but looking like a rather small portion given the comically miniature-sized bowl in the middle of the really wide lip. It looked like an upturned summer hat...for someone with a really small head. Chris just reached to unravel the cutlery from its cloth napkin, spread the fabric neatly over his lap, and dipped a spoon into the liquid. "Honestly speaking, I'm not at all thrilled that Saito is back in your life, Yuri." He said darkly, making the youngest member of their trio feel on-guard, "Never mind that he's literally on your doorstep now. You never invited him back home for a reason, even when you were friendly with him."

"I'll be dealing with it." Viktor assured, taking a sip from the soup-spoon of his own appetizer, "There's nothing to worry about."

"You should've put the complaint through to the JSF." Chris scolded, looking at the Russian again, "I know there was a point to why you didn't, but I can't help feeling like that was a mistake anyway."

"It wasn't his decision to make." Yuri said firmly, "That was my choice, and it wasn't a mistake."

The blonde looked a bit surprised, but his brow came down again, "I feel like you've forgotten how upset you were about things with him before. That one thing practically changed your entire outlook on life."

"It didn't..."

"I've known you since Juniors, Yuri. Give me some credit."

"It didn't." He repeated, "I've always been who I am. I just felt more or less inclined to express it at various points in time."

Chris raised a brow, and looked slightly over at Viktor again, who just seemed entirely helpless and out of his breadth for the topic. He put his spoon down, dipping the mouthpiece into the green soup again, "You went from being open and friendly to timid and paranoid."

"You went from being open and friendly to timid and paranoid." He explained sharply, "Chulanont is literally the only new friend you've made since you were 18 years old, and that may only be because you were roommates."

"...Don't I count?" Viktor grimaced nervously.

"No." The Swiss answered, putting the Russian down slightly, "You were his hero and now you're his lover. It's entirely different. If you hadn't bulldozed your way into his life and refused to leave, he would've never spoken two words to you, out of sheer and utter terror of what you'd think of him if he said more."

I never talked to you because I didn't want you to see my shortcomings.

"I think it would be wise for you to find a way to send him somewhere else."Chris advised, "You were reunited with him for all of 24 hours before whatever he did made you pass out at rinkside. You got a reprieve of what...two days? Before he rang you guys up for help? And now he lives at Yu-Topia."

"We don't though, and it wasn't us he called." Viktor pointed out, "And trust me; half of why I'm so annoyed at the arrangements at the Ice Castle is because half of that is to avoid putting those two in
"I wish the both of you would stop talking about him like he's going to murder me if he can't have me." Yuri grumbled, "And even worse, that you're entirely blaming him for what happened when it was my fault."

Chris looked at the younger man carefully for a moment, but then cast his eyes to Viktor, and bore a look more serious than most he'd already given, "Get Saito out of Hasetsu as quickly as you can."

"What?" Yuri gaped and sat up straight, "What the literal Hell, Chris? Why are you being like this? Asahi's got his own problems to worry about! He's already capering at Viktor's feet, and his whole motivation for getting back into things was because of Riku, not me. Viktor made sure of that.

"If that guy weren't dead, then I'd give it the benefit of the doubt." He answered pointedly, "He'd have someone around to actively distract him. But Riku's dead and Asahi's got nothing to think about but you again. I'm saying this as your friend...Viktor should've ignored you when you said that you didn't want to file the complaint with the JSF. That was a mistake. But the lid's off this Pandora's Box, and as long as you want to keep saying that it was your fault that things went south the way they did...then for your sake, Saito has to go."

Yuri stared for a moment, and let out a sharp sigh of wordless frustration, furrowing his brow to look away. He eyeballed the bread-basket again.

"Yuri..." Chris' voice continued, not that he wanted to hear it anymore, "You're one of my closest and oldest friends. There's aspects of you that I know better than your own family does, and in some ways, better than even Viktor. He came in and turned your whole world upside down, but I know what you are under the new confident person you've become. Deep inside the walls of 'Fortress Nikiforov' is 'Cabin Katsuki'...and inside those flimsy wooden walls is a guy who would rather hurt himself than anyone else. I hate to put it this bluntly, but maybe it's the only way you'll take it seriously... Yuri, you can't be trusted with Saito. 'Cabin Katsuki' is well protected when you let it, but there's a quick-escape hatch that leads you outside those fortified walls. You walked right in the Mouth of Madness when you confronted Saito at Nationals, and you're still licking your wounds now. Saito may not have intended to hurt you, but you opened yourself up to it so easily... You have to be protected from yourself as much as him."

Viktor's silence was louder than any spoken agreement could've ever been, and it rang in Yuri's ears like a bell. He could do nothing but scowl at the bread, not even wanting to look up again. Whatever else was said over the course of that lunch was lost to him, like the hollow sound of bubbles under water. He heard what he thought sounded like distant laughter after a while, and vaguely tuned in, hearing Viktor prattle on about the work they'd done over the summer to make a different Exhibition for each competition, and in particular, how proud he was of the one they were going to perform that night. Yuri lost interest in hearing it though, and tuned out again, mindlessly watching the comings and goings of lunch plates.

"...So, most of the point of why I wanted to bring this one forward is because it seems so appropriate, you know?" The Russian explained, "I mean, it would've been neat to do it at Worlds anyway, and that's why our outfits are so decked, but I just couldn't pass up doing it here after the RSF made it so I can't compete. None of our other Exhibitions say the same thing this one does."

"You changed the end of the song, too."

"Yeah...that was a last-second edit." The Russian explained, "Feels more hopeful this way. In a sense, maybe it should've been changed since the start, but...better late than never."
"Yeah, the message is super unsubtle at this point. I'm sure there's gonna be a storm on Twitter and Insta as soon as people realize what you're skating to."

"Right?" Viktor laughed, "I feel so inspired now. I thought I lost it for a little while, cuz the whole crazy thing was such a shock to the system...but I'm slowly starting to feel like myself again." He explained, picking up a fork, "Russia kind of beat me down on all sides there for a bit...but I'm getting over it. If not for Yuri and the JSF, I'd probably go missing for months. I guess it's a risk we have to take when we climb so high...the impact when we fall can be worse than it would be otherwise." He elaborated, taking a quick breath before looking down to snag a bite of the plate that had been set down a few minutes ago.

Except it was empty.

So was the bread-basket, the cheese plate, the soup he'd gotten as an appetizer that he'd forgotten about, and basically everything else.

Viktor could only look in confusion from the missing food to the quiet figure sitting next to him.

Jiro and Makkachin were blurs of excitement and whole-body wags when the duo finally returned to the hotel room, each of them jumping up and bark-whining their urgent need for attention. There was still a bit of kibble and water in their bowls, so Viktor quickly knew it wasn't hunger that made the two so adamant, but he calmed them down as gently as he could before reaching for each of their harnesses and leashes. Before the last clip was hooked, Yuri was down on the bed, feet dangling off the edge like he couldn't have fallen asleep sooner.

Viktor blinked at the man, and frowned slightly, but his stomach growled and changed his train of thought. Wordlessly, he moved closer and bent down to kiss his unconscious spouse on the head, and took the two wiggle-boofs out of the room to let them loose outside.

Makkachin zipped around like he had before, overcome by an acute case of the zoomies. Jiro tried to keep up, but like usual, the long-limbed poodle ran circles around him. Viktor bit down on the edge of a pre-packaged sandwich he'd bought in the hotel on the way out, but then looked at it as he chewed. No words came to mind...only imagery, floating to the surface like dead logs from the bottom of a lake. Imagery of those early days, when he was still just getting to know the basics about the man he'd fallen so hard for a few months earlier.

His eyes went up to the pups again, spotting Jiro coming back towards him, as though crying out that Makkachin was being too rough on him. He pulled a small bit of ham-slice from his sandwich to offer the Akita, and it quickly made the whimpers fade. He finished his unexpected alternative lunch with Jiro sitting next to him on the bench, and Makkachin spent the rest of his energy on chasing ducks and the odd swan.

When they all finally returned to the hotel room, Yuri hadn't budged from where he'd collapsed on the freshly-made bed. Housekeepers had been though while they were at practice, and everything in the room was put back to like-new condition. Fresh water was put down, which was lapped up eagerly, and Viktor went to peel himself from his cold-weather gear. After pushing his partner's shoes off, he clambered up onto the high bed and wrapped one arm around the man's sleeping frame, hauling him a foot or two further up the bedding before letting him down again. Viktor curled up tightly against Yuri's prone form, arms wedging under one side and wrapping around the other. He pressed his nose into freshly-washed raven hair, the smell of the shampoo still lingering slightly, and closed his eyes for a brief moment...only then to look absently forward rather seriously.
Chris is right...
Though it had only been the better part of an hour, Yuri awoke feeling like it had been half a day. His eyes scanned the blurry haze of the room, though he faced the wall and couldn't see much more than that except the small bar area and the hall to the bathroom and exit. Arms around him were loose, and he moved as gently as he could to turn himself around, wiggling little by little until he was facing his husband's chest and could roll the man to his back instead. Able to see the rest of the room, he could see the light from outside through the cracks in the curtains, and the curious tail-wags of the only one of their two dogs that could see over the edge of the bed. Yuri lowered his head down again, squishing his cheek against Viktor's chest, and sighed slightly.

If it's daylight out, then it's either way past our departure flight time...or it hasn't been nearly as long as it seems since we got back.

Jiro whimper-barked from somewhere beyond the edge of the mattress, and Makkachin's slowly-waving tail moved around the perimeter like a submarine scope, until it and Jiro's noises were coming from closer-by than before. Yuri could still feel the heaviness of his eyelids, but he eventually pushed himself up, and reached down into the crevasse between the bed and the wall to scoop up his puppy. Makkachin jumped up quickly after, rooting around for a moment before coming to rest next to his human.

The motion caused Viktor to rouse slightly, and he turned his head to look around blearily before dropping it down again and covering his face with both hands, "Ugh, I was out." He mumbled, letting his arms go loose to fall where they may beside him and against Makkachin's side. He turned slightly to look at his partner though, who was sitting a bit away from him with his back turned, "Yuri?"

Half-closed hazel eyes looked back for a moment, but Yuri turned forward again, simply moving one hand over to pat the Russian's shin before taking it back again. Jiro wiggled on his lap, but generally stayed put there, mouthing at the fingers of his person's other hand playfully.

Confused, but perhaps mostly because he was still half asleep, Viktor wasn't sure what to make of the gesture. He glanced for a moment to Makkachin as though the poodle might be able to explain it to him, but all the pup could do was look back at him with those big dark eyes, panting softly. He ruffled the poodles head as he pushed up to sit, before scooting forward to lean against his husband's back, nosing his way through raven hair to find skin and press his lips to it, "My love..."

"My headache is coming back..." Yuri answered simply, keeping his eyes down.

"...Okay."

Yuri felt the Russian peel off his back and watched the man get up off the bed, turning around as he passed to kiss the crown of his head. Viktor went to the bathroom like he had that morning, and returned with the Aleve and another glass of water.

"I can call room service to bring some peppermint tea to help settle your stomach." He offered, but Yuri shook his head and downed the tablets. Slate eyes went to the alarm clock and saw that it was only 3:32pm, "There's still a few hours left before we meet up with Yurio. We could watch a movie."
"...That's okay..."

Viktor made a face, though Yuri wasn't even looking at him to notice. Eyes moved to the side as the Russian considered his options, but all that came to him was that odd sense of déjà vu. He hummed a breath to himself and then went for the closet, grabbing Makkachin's harness and then Jiro's, tossing the smaller one next to Yuri's lap, "We're going for a walk."

"I don't-"

"One of you two is going to be wearing that thing in a minute. Best figure out who."

Yuri grimaced slightly, but there was no arguing that look.

Jiro trotted along contentedly, sniffing at the odd leaf or twig as he passed them by on the snow-cleared path. Makkachin had been allowed to free-run nearby, so long as he kept close. Yuri was kept on a much tighter leash than either though, clasped to his human by a harness no man could hope to escape from; Viktor's hand.

The Arcotel was somewhat in the distance behind them as they made their way around the partly-frozen lake. Brown and grey reeds poked through the ice along the banks. Trees with black and brown bark dotted the field through which their path wound. Yuri kept his eyes down though, barely able to keep focus on the sight of footsteps that came before them.

"...I know it was hard to hear him say all those things." Viktor said quietly, giving his husband's hand a gentle rub with his thumb, keeping it secure in his jacket pocket, "But he said it all because he cares about you."

Yuri's brow furrowed, "You didn't even try to stop him."

"...I wanted to hear what he had to say."

"I didn't."

Viktor could feel every muscle in his partner's hand tighten where he held it, but he didn't let go, "I'm-"

"I even squeezed your leg so you'd get the hint to stop him, but you didn't." Yuri went on, speaking partly through grit teeth, "What was the point of giving me my agency back if you and Chris are just going to take it away again yourselves?"

Viktor was puzzled, and paused in his tracks, "It wasn't even your idea to have him live at Yu-Topia. How would either of us be taking your agency away by asking Mimi to find somewhere else for Saito to live?"

"It may not have even gone that far if I hadn't said it was okay! That's why she told us before they left, isn't it!?"

Viktor grimaced slightly, bringing a hand up to scratch the side of his head, "I don't remember it being like that... She just told us what was going on to be nice, not asking permission."

"And then the both of us actively helped coordinate getting him to Yu-Topia. I remember you saying he could stay there as long as he wanted!"
"...Until he could get on his feet again. It was the only thing I could think of to control the situation. He probably would've ended up there anyway, even if I hadn't said anything." The Russian retorted, "And he ended up moving into my old room in the end. I practically shat a kitten when I found out, remember?"

"You don't make any sense at all with all this."

Viktor shook his head, "What would you have done if Sophia forced herself on me at Trophée de France?"

Yuri blanched a little and retreated slightly, staring at the ground again, "...I...don't know."

"I know it's not in your nature to want to hurt people." Viktor went on, stepping a bit closer and leaning down to try and get into his partner's line of sight, "There's nothing about this situation that's fair to anyone. Saito's got a rough life, and nothing's been easy for him...but I cannot and will never forgive what he did to you, no matter who was at fault for putting you two into the situation. I've tried to work with him given how you didn't want to file that complaint. The best I could do was keep an eye on him; the enemy I can see is safer than the enemy I can't."

"He's not an enemy."

"He's my enemy." He corrected, "I get that you don't want to be the reason he suffers more hardships...but at this point, Papa Mimi has probably given him enough of a leg-up that he can manage on his own anyway. He just needed time to get his shit together and transfer all the donations we helped him source at Nationals. You don't have to even say anything. When I talk to Papa Mimi, I'll just phrase it like it's a good idea for Saito to get his own place. The fact that I'm trying to keep him away from you doesn't even have to come up."

"But I know that's why you're doing it."

"Am I not entitled to that...?" Viktor asked pointedly.

An uncomfortable breeze blew between them. Jiro looked up at the two in confusion and whined slightly.

"It was your right to decide whether to file that complaint against him at Nationals. You chose not to. I'm at peace with that." Viktor started again, reaching his free hand up to cup his bare palm against his partner's beanie, though Yuri still wouldn't look up, "But I feel like I should have a right to do what I can to keep you safe."

"...He wouldn't hurt me..."

"You thought that when you closed the door to that changing room..." The Russian explained calmly, waiting a moment before going on, "...He may not have pinned you to the ground and forced himself on you, but he pinned you all the same, and took from you something he wasn't entitled to. Your mental well-being has suffered terribly since then...and so has mine. And now, half a world away, he's gotten between us again, right before a performance where we're supposed to show Russia that they can't even do that."

Yuri could only feel the sting in his eyes. No words came to him.

"...You practically fled the country to get away from him seven years ago." Viktor started again, "Of all the reasons why you left Japan to train in Detroit, he's the only one you went out of your way to forget. All those memories about him that started bubbling up...they've brought all those negative emotions back with them. It hurts me to see you suffering like this over him."
"...You guys can't keep treating him this way though." Yuri answered quietly, "Every move against him makes me feel like I'm doing it to him, and I'd ne-"

"You're going to have to decide at some point, my love..." Viktor's voice cut him off, his words ringing like shots fired through the sky, "About whose well-being means more to you. His, or your own. ...I can't give back what he stole from you. Your sense of security, safety, peace of mind...your uncorrupted loyalty. Hell, even that Silver medal, if you ask me. All those things he took away, replacing them with an iron vice around your neck. He's not even here and he's causing problems. What's going to happen when he's right in front of you again?"

"Hopefully nothing because we told him we'd support him!"

"So you're worried this feels like we're reneging on our word."

"Obviously!"

"We haven't." Viktor pointed out, trying to offer some comfort with a gentle squeeze of his hand, "And asking Papa Mimi to help Saito move on doesn't change that."

Yuri looked to Jiro, unsure what else to say.

The Russian watched his partner for a moment, looking aside briefly as Makkachin sent some ducks fleeing for the air, "...I'm not going to do this because I want to make Saito's life difficult." He attempted, "But if we ever mean to go back to Yu-Topia and actually hope to enjoy ourselves there, he can't still be there." He said, stepping closer to thread his free arm over Yuri's shoulders, pulling him close against himself, "In a way, because you were always so shy, this is basically the first time you've really had to deal with the sordid consequences of unrequited love. Everything with Saito happened so fast, and then you went to Detroit right away, so you didn't have to deal with the fall-out of whatever his reaction was. ...You kind of let Chris do that for you."

Yuri's eyes widened slightly where he had his brow pressed to Viktor's jacket, and he quickly jerked his head back up again, "Oh no..." He said quietly, voice slightly panicked, "What if that's why Chris brought all that stuff up...? I told him to never tell me what Asahi sent, or even that he'd sent anything at all...what if it was bad?"

"It's something to consider. I don't know what good it'll do for Chris to tell you now though. We were all different people seven years ago...you and him were still kids." Viktor answered, only for his brow to furrow, "...But who am I kidding? After all this time I've had with you, I should know that letting you imagine what might've been is often worse than what really was. You're not going to be able to relax until you know what was sent, now that everything else is coming to a head."

Yuri groaned a sad sigh and dropped his forehead down again, "I'm so sorry...that I'm like this... I'm such a pain in the ass..."

"Nothing worth having is ever easy to get." Viktor explained, rubbing his cheek against the edge of brow and beanie, "And I had to work harder to get you than literally everything else. I intend to keep you, even if I had to fight for it." He added, feeling the tension starting to melt off even through their many layers. Makkachin barked at some of the water fowl that eluded him, and Viktor looked over, "The only question then is whether you want to know right now, or if you want to wait until we see Chris again in person."

"Let's wait..." Yuri suggested, words a bit muffled where he'd pressed his face to his husband's scarf, "Let's...just enjoy the rest of the walk instead. I have a feeling Chris won't be the only one with something to say about Asahi before the night's over."
"Oh?"

He nodded into the fabric, "We promised Yurio that we'd tell him what we did on our trip... He'll probably have a thing or two to say about what he did while we were away, too. He had almost a week after we left. Maybe it'll help us figure out what we're going to walk into when we get back home tomorrow."

"Maybe...but we don't have to ask. Yurio would've complained by now if something wasn't sitting right with him."

Yuri nodded again and pulled his head back up, keeping his eyes low for a moment longer as he drew a shaky breath, "...I never realized how difficult this sort of thing could be. I thought if I just made it clear that we'd never be, he'd get over it and move on, like I did with Yu-chan..."

"Rarely in life is anything that simple...least not love." Viktor explained, "But there are the occasional few people who make it even harder than it has to be."

Yuri blanched slightly, "...I hope you don't mean me right now."

The Russian just smiled and shrugged, leaning in to steal a kiss while his partner was baffled, "We'll sort it out, sooner or later, no matter who the difficult one is."

"You totally mean me right now."

"Come along, my love." He laughed, turning to start walking again, "...And don't forget, we still have to get back afterwards."
The Clementine restaurant within the Palais Coburg was one of at least three such businesses within the aptly-named Coburg Palace. The huge building was like Versailles in the city, surrounded by a huge and thick brick wall, with black wrought iron fencing to top it. The property architecture bore small gardens and pools, double-winged stair cases that curved from ground to entry-way, and at the front of it all, a hotel check-in desk under modern blue-glass walls, like a chunk of aquamarine cut to fit inside a wheel of brie. All it lacked were the horse-drawn carriages pulling-up out front, and the sword-armed guards at the gates.

Within, the Palais Coburg was every bit the palace that it claimed to be, with huge vaulted ceilings, white walls elaborately marked and edged in gold-leaf, and little statues of paired cherubs watching from high above. As the name suggested, within the restaurant itself, there were a number of decorative Clementine trees, growing in their huge ceramic pots. Tables came in square and circular flavors, with medium-brown wooden trim surrounding a black laminate center. Chairs were glossy black wood, booths colored similarly to match the brown wood trims. Bulbous black iron lamps hung from above, and all around, the walls were empanelled glass like a greenhouse. In the grand central rotunda, a portrait of Princess Clémentine de Orléans, clad in a flowing and fluffy white dress, watched over the guests as they basked in the scattered light coming down from a glorious crystal chandelier.

"He says he's here." Viktor said, looking at his phone casually; he and Yuri wore a set of suits for the occasion, though not near as fancy or bedazzled as the ones they wore to the ball the night before. He waggled his extended leg where it was crossed over the other knee, looking around, until uncrossing his legs to sit up straighter. He squinted slightly to try and focus his sights, and eventually spotted what looked like a fancy version of the Russian Tiger. Viktor raised his arm to get the teen's attention, but when Yurio waved back, an awkward-something-else became visible behind him. The Russian squinted even more, "Oh...he brought someone."

"Eh?" Yuri looked over, trying to see around their neighbors by leaning back against the booth, "Oh...you're right. That's not going to be a problem, will it?"

"It's unexpected, but no, I'm fine with it." He answered, pushing to stand up as the pair came closer.

Yuri stood up as well on his own side of the table, but instead of staying where he was, he took a sliding step forward to offer his greeting hug to the blonde, then to the young silver who followed, "We weren't expecting more than him, but it's good to see you anyway, Nikki."

"...I hope it's okay." She answered meekly, "I didn't know I was coming either until you guys texted Yura about where to go."

"His idea?"

"Papa's."

"He sent you unexpectedly to a place like this?" Viktor commented, brows slightly slanted in concern.

"Mikhail Rozovsky sends his regards." Yurio huffed, flicking out a bank card before sliding it down onto the table, "The whole thing is on him, not just her part."
The older pair glanced at one another, but each shrugged and smiled, "Guess we should take advantage."

"He's not trying to bribe one or all of us, is he?" Viktor wondered as they all started to find their seats, "Or is he up to something?"

"If he is, he didn't cop to it." Yurio explained, waiting a moment to push in Nikki's chair behind her before taking his own spot opposite his Slavic counterpart, "At least not to me."

Three pairs of eyes turned to the solitary female in the group, and she blinked back at them nervously, but smiled, "...It's cuz him and Minako are taking Vikki somewhere. They know I'd probably have more fun with you guys than them, so...papa hoped if he sent his card with us, you'd forgive him for the extra baggage."

"So it is a bribe." Viktor laughed, "No problem; I am quite bribable."

With seats taken and focus turning to the point of being in such a place, drink orders were placed, and eyes started to scan the menu for the night's fancy fare. They didn't scan for long though before curiosity got the better of both Yuris and they each peered over the tops of their leather-bound tomes, "So are you going to-

"Oh, er..." Yuri stammered and leaned back again.

"What?" Yurio huffed.

"No you, you go first."

"Uh...sure... You know what I'm gonna ask though. What were you gonna ask?"

Yuri cleared his throat, "We were wondering if everything was okay from earlier today. We saw you come into the rink-side area during Exhibition practice but you practically turned on a heel and left like you didn't want to be there after all."

Yurio looked slightly nervous, "...Oh."

Nikki looked over at her older sibling, "...You want me to tell them?"

He shook his head and huffed a breath at the same time, but then gestured over anyway before falling silent again. Yuri and Viktor both watched in confusion, but then deferred to the youngest member of their table.

"There's two reps from the RSF at Euros." She started, making all three feel a stick in their guts, "One of them was here to evaluate the coaches, the other was here for the athletes. After the Free Program, they kind of ganged up on Yakov and Georgi. I don't know what they were told, but when they found Yura..."

The blonde had his fists clenched against the edge of the table; the whole topic made him grind his teeth, "...They're blaming my lackluster results on the fact that I changed coaches. They're demanding that I move back to Russia and 'get with the program'," He added air-quotes for emphasis, "And train under Yakov and Lilia again."

"You didn't move to change coaches though. You changed coaches because you moved." Viktor surmised, "What are they going to do if you don't?"

"...They...didn't say openly." The Tiger felt deflated, "I think they're going to try and get me to cheat.
They said...it would be embarrassing for Russia to go to an Olympics and not come back with Gold, and that if us athletes are going to sabotage our chances 'like this,' they'll have to do something drastic.

Viktor quirked a brow suspiciously, "How are they gonna make you cheat? None of their lab people are on staff in PyeongChang. They won't be able to swap samples like before."

Nikki's eyes went wide and she covered her mouth in shock, "You didn't-"

Yuri reached across the table to pull her hands back down, and gave a reassuring squeeze, "He didn't. He was as offended as you are at the very concept."

"Something that can't be checked on urine samples, probably." Viktor considered, putting a fingertip against his chin, "Something that isn't a drug, hormone, or steroid...something that leaves the body quickly...or degrades." He pulled that finger away and pointed it at the teen skater in front of him, "I bet they want you back in St. Petersburg because they want to do blood doping."

"Blood what?" Yurio asked, incredulous.

"Suppose you move back to St. Petersburg after Euros." Viktor started, "They draw a unit of blood from you. Then, they keep it on ice for a few weeks, and take it to South Korea. So you have your own blood, and you've recovered the supply they took from you, then they add that back, and you have a ton more red blood cells to carry oxygen to your muscles during competition. It's impossible to test for that on a urine sample, and even if they did check your blood, it's hard to prove that you added anything because everyone's volumes vary naturally. One could argue that a Champion is born with more blood cells than other people, and that's why they consistently outperform everyone else."

"Is that true though?" Yuri wondered skeptically.

Viktor shrugged, "I'm a figure skater, not a scientist. I like to think I'm successful because I work hard and I push myself, not because I have a bunch of extra little floaty-thingies in me."

"...You're so open about knowing that Russia cheated before..." Nikki commented, "...Isn't it risky to just blurt out what you know they did?"

Viktor smiled, "I don't skate for Russia anymore. It doesn't matter to me."

Yurio glared at him, "You stupid idiot, just because you don't skate for Russia now doesn't mean you can't be accused of cheating when you did."

"Oh..." The older Russian blanched slightly, "Right. Yeah."

"You're lucky that being a skater doesn't mean you have to be smart, too...goddamn."

"He didn't cheat. He didn't have to." Yuri defended, "And he's plenty smart."

Yurio slouched slightly and gestured at Viktor, who was innocently reaching for a cup of iced water, "You do realize this is the moron who routinely forgets his promises and makes dumb last-second decisions, right?"

"Yes but he's my moron."

Viktor coughed into his glass.
"Why do you think he married me?" Yuri went on, sitting back against the booth seat. He slid his hand up his husband's leg as he went, and kept it there, "I'm the paranoid responsible one between us that over-thinks the consequences of all the dumb stuff we do."

"Like your Russia trip?" Yurio huffed, one brow quirked.

Yuri twitched slightly, "Ehh...maybe not all the consequences...?"

"In his defense, I didn't really give him much of a choice in all that." Viktor pointed out, sliding his arm along the booth-back to settle behind Yuri's shoulders, "And honestly speaking, seeing my father was the least worst part of that trip. Being with him was comparatively pleasant."

"How much worse can it get than spending a weekend at Kon's?"

Yuri rubbed his thumb softly against his partner's thigh, "You or me?" He wondered.

"Feel free."

Nodding, Yuri looked back across the table to the pair of green eyes watching him expectantly, "Well...it started with a rather messy arrival at Pulkovo Airport..."

"...By the end of it all, finally getting off the train here in Vienna was like landing on a completely different planet."

"Wow..." The two teens both said, picking at the last bits of their dinners.

"We'll be doing whatever we can to avoid going to Russia again." Viktor commented, using a fork in the last piece of venison to wipe up the remnants of its own juices, "So we'll be avoiding Rostelecom, and I guess we'll have to skip Worlds if it's held there."

"I think you'll be lucky enough to not have to worry about it." Yurio shrugged, looking at a cut sprig of asparagus on the end of his steak knife, "At least the next four aren't held there. Unless plans change, it's Milan, Tokyo, Montreal, and then Stockholm."

"Oh...Japan again...? It was just in Saitama the year before last."

The teen shrugged, "I don't decide where we go. I just get there."

"Guess you better be sure to win all four of the next Championships." Viktor teased, nudging Yuri with his elbow, "Wouldn't want to be forced to go to Russia the year after you planned to be retired."

Yuri quaked slightly, "Don't say that, now it's gonna happen!"

"Just become a five-time consecutive Champion like you promised."

"You've practically jinxed me."

"Nonsense." Viktor laughed quietly, "The only one who can beat you isn't going to be competing for real after this year."

Yurio nearly choked on the asparagus sprig, eyes watering as he pounded the front of his chest.

"You're still competing for real this year! And even if you don't push yourself next year, you're still going to be really hard to beat!" Yuri whined, "Even you ought to know that you'll never be able to skate without meaning to go for the Gold... It's practically not in your DNA to accept anything less."

"I'm just skating for fun next year though."

"Fun for you is getting up on the top tier of the podium so you can laugh at all the plebs down below!"

Viktor hesitated, thinking on it slightly with a quiet hum, "...Yyyyeah you're right." He laughed, "You know me too well."

"Everyone knows that." Yurio grumbled, face slightly red from the prior vegetable assault, "One look at your dumb gold-plated skates would give you away."

"I like my gold-plated blades, thanks very much." The elder Russian contested, "But you're right...I suppose I do project a bit."

"...Yuri had golden blades too though." Nikki pointed out, "What does that mean?"

"Oh...those were a late wedding present from Viktor last year." Yuri explained, cheeks colored slightly at the memory of unboxing them, "He said that I should skate on Gold if I intended to win Gold."

"Has it worked?"

"...Shockingly, yeah...at least until 2 weeks ago." He sighed, "Bronze got me."

"You were robbed." Viktor commented with a huff, "Just like Otabek at the Final last year. Totally robbed by a lesser athlete."

"Yeah I'm still not sure how JJ managed to get on the podium that time..." Yuri agreed, "I'm just glad I was up there at all. ...I wonder how he's doing now? He's going to miss all the biggest events this year."

"I'm not sad about it." Yurio commented, "Good riddance."

"Yuri." Nikki chided, but he just shrugged. She turned instead to the 'more mature' members on the other side of the table, hoping for backup.

Viktor just chewed the bit of venison extra slowly. Yuri looked a bit uneasy.

"Someone say something!"

"...I never found JJ all that interesting before." Viktor explained, swallowing. "Then he nearly killed my husband, and he moved into a category of reprehensible people that will have my eternal scorn."

Jade eyes turned to Yuri instead, but he looked uncertain, "...I never really knew what to think of JJ before the accident. Now I just feel sorry for him. By all measure, I got hurt worse, but the location of JJ's injury means he won't be skating again until long after the season's over. If he doesn't seriously rehab that area, it'll get stiff and inflexible, and he may never skate competitively ever again. But...skating is his passion, and we all know how hard we'd work to get back on the ice if we were in his same shoes." He turned his head slightly to glance at his spouse, "Thankfully, most of us haven't really gotten that hurt during our careers. Skaters tend to burn-out hard and fast."

"Really? How come?" Nikki wondered, looking between the three.
"Jumps put a lot of torque through our backs, and the landings are bad for our knees." Yuri explained for them all, "There's been some rumblings in the skating world that the ISU may change the scoring system at some point, to reduce the pressure on skaters to jump, and bring the focus back to artistic expression and choreography."

"In which case, you'll definitely be the reigning Champion," Viktor surmised happily, "Even before I came along, your step sequences and spins were top quality."

Yuri smiled sheepishly, "It's the only way I could compensate for my lackluster jump repertoire, and regain lost points from falls."

"But now you're super well-rounded." The Russian continued, beaming for his pride and joy, "And with your stamina, you're the only skater on the planet who can do the quad Axel so consistently, and put it at the end of your programs for massive bonus points."

"The Axel was already my favorite jump...I guess that made it easier to go for the quad."

Yurio grumpily pointed at them with his fork, "The fact that either of you can do that jump is ridiculous. It should be impossible."

"A hundred years ago, a Ladies skater was reprimanded severely because a single Salchow caused her costume skirt to rise above her knees, which people thought was practically pornographic for the time. It took until after World War 2 for a triple to be landed, and until the late 90s for the first quad to be recognized." Yuri explained, "We push the limits of what we think is possible every few decades. By the time you retire though, quads may be seen as newbie jumps."

The Tiger just scoffed, "I doubt it. Quint jumps actually are impossible."

"Don't say that." Viktor scolded teasingly, "Yuri will end up doing it next year, and I'll be left on the sidelines wishing I wasn't so old so I could keep breaking records before he can."

"You're not old." Yuri huffed.

"I'm an old people. I'm nearly 30; practically dead."

"I dare to wonder what you'll think of yourself when you're 60."

"Held together by little more than necromantic magik and duct tape..."

"Papa's nearly 60 and he doesn't need duct tape." Nikki teased, "Can't claim certainty on the necromancy though. You never know for sure with him."

"Right? See? She gets it." Viktor gestured at his cousin, "I see Mimi and I know my future."

"He's not even balding." Yuri countered.

The Russian guffawed dramatically, "We don't know what he's done to keep his hair from thinning. Maybe he got plugs."

"He didn't get plugs."

"How do we know for sure though?"

"You poked the crown of his head when he first showed up at the rink with Kon, like you were testing him by his level of baldness for whether or not you'd trust him. I'm sure he would've told you if it was artificial."
Viktor paused for a moment, but then leaned closer, "Are you sure about that?"

"He wanted you to like him. Why would he mess up and risk your ire by lying to you about something so minor?"

"Reasons, Yuri. Reasons."

A single hand shoved the man back with a laugh, "You're impossible."
A concierge clerk approached from behind the desk with a large duffle-bag and a smaller backpack, and put them up onto the counter to remove the identity tags. Viktor lifted them both and pulled them towards himself, and started heading for where the rest of the group waiting by the glass doors. Everyone had gotten their jackets back by then, and Yurio had his own gear-bag slung over one shoulder. The taxi to take them to the arena was still on its way.

"...Hard to believe this is really the last thing we're gonna do before we leave." Yuri commented idly, looking back as the silver blur at the edges of his vision came into focus, "In a weird way, it feels like we just got here."

"I think our timing is all messed up because we only really just skated today for the first time." Viktor suggested, "By our measure, that's the first day of practice before the Short Program the next night."

He added, leaning down slightly to set the bags down on the ground.

Yuri pulled a jacket off of where he'd had it hanging over his forearm, and held it up for a pair of hands to slide through. As it lifted up and Viktor shuffled it over his shoulders, Yuri stepped back to make room, "It'll be nice to just skate for fun tonight though. Exhibitions were always my favorite part of events, even if I rarely got to perform in them myself."

Viktor nodded as he adjusted the way the jacket's lapel sat around his shoulders and neck. Satisfied, he slipped his hands forward, pulling his partner into a quickly grateful Eskimo kiss, "Skating for fun and love is always the best."

"What are you guys skating to tonight?" Nikki wondered, leaning back a bit to see behind Yurio at them, "A duet right?"

"Mh." Yuri nodded, turning in place to put his back to his spouse's front, "It's pretty uncommon for us to do Exhibitions on our own now. Not since Four Continents last year when we premiered the duet version of Viktor's 'Aria.'" He turned to look at Yurio next, "What about you? What's your Exhibition?"

"...Honestly, I'm not even sure I want to do one at all anymore." He answered sullenly, "I can't get the bad taste out of my mouth from this morning."

"...And you're absolutely sure they intend to ask you to cheat?" Yuri asked, "Do you want us to tell someone?"

"No...and no." The Tiger said, shaking his head slightly, "I'll figure something else out... If the IOC caught wind that the RSF was asking its athletes to dope up, Russia would be banned from competing. I don't want to remember this as the first time I got my Olympic jacket, only to have to send it back because the RSF is a bunch of sore losers."

"Did they give you a time-frame for when they expect you to be back in St. Petersburg...?" Viktor wondered, "What about Minako? Did you tell her what they were suggesting?"

"I didn't tell either of them; her or the old man." Yurio sighed, eyes down towards the base of the sliding glass doors, "I didn't want to upset her, since the RSF goon-squad is basically accusing her of being bad at her job. It's not her fault though."
"So how'd Nikki know...?" The elder wondered, pointing a finger at his cousin.

"She laid siege to my silence until telling her was the only way I'd get some peace." He explained, much to Nikki's stained amusement.

"He's actually pretty awful at hiding when something's wrong." The aforementioned silver teen teased, "I'm sure papa suspects, but he may be keeping his head down for the same reasons Yura did. I don't think he was close enough to overhear the conversation though."

"Conversation?" Yurio echoed sarcastically, "It was more like a one-sided talking-to. Being lectured in no-uncertain-terms that I suck and my coach sucks and that every decision I've made for myself since the Final was a mistake is hard to swallow, especially when it's coming from my bosses. I just...wish I knew what they really wanted from me. I can't even fight back because they never actually said anything. I'm just guessing."

"They'd wait until you were back in Russia before divulging that sort of thing." Viktor pointed out. He nudged Yuri closer to the younger skater and leaned down to speak quieter, "Maybe hedge your bets and do like I did...tell them you're too good to risk on something like this. You compete clean and win clean, or you don't compete at all...then Russia will really be up Shit Creek."

The Tiger still looked deflated though, "...Seems to me like they're willing to toss me if I don't bend over though."

"They're crazy then. You're the youngest skater to ever win Gold at the Grand Prix Fin-" Yurio turned his head sharply, "And I've been garbage ever since. I haven't won a single Gold."

"...You did get Nationals Gold the last two times." Yuri pointed out hesitantly, but the look he got for it made him regret saying anything. He retreated a bit deeper into Viktor's arms. It was a small mercy that their taxi pulled up in front of the doors almost immediately after, and thoughts - at least for the moment - turned towards their travels.

Bags and backpacks were picked up and carried outside as the driver exited the vehicle to confirm his passengers. Yurio called shotgun pretty easily, and Nikki sat behind him, with Viktor next to her, and Yuri on the far side behind the driver. The ride to the arena was awkwardly quiet. Even after finally arriving, little more was said than was necessary to pay the cabby and move on.

Yurio lead the way along the front of the building as the cordoned-off section gave easy access to the arena's front doors. They followed through, past the cheering voices and camera flashes, until they finally made it through to the athletes-only section inside. Yurio made a hasty exit before anyone could even turn to realize he was sneaking off, awkwardly leaving Nikki with the two older skaters.

"Well, that's rude." She complained, crossing her arms, "What was that for?"

"That's typical of him." Viktor pointed out, "He used to always leave Yakov with the gear so he could wander around on his own. He'd also take off if he spotted his Angels fanclub."

"But I don't-" Nikki started, only to spot the group with their banners through a gap in the crowd, "Oh..."

"Don't worry about it." Yuri reassured, "It'll work out somehow. Russia's had to give up medals before because of bad behavior...I don't think they want to be seen as cheaters."

"Let's figure out where Mimi and the others are so we can safely hand you off." Viktor added, "Yuri and I need to get ready."
Yurio weaved through the crowd, annoyed at how everyone was so much taller and how tightly they pressed in around him. Trying to avoid his fan-club was tiring, but he really wasn't in the mood to feign interest, much as he'd always been encouraged to do in the past. Hiding his hair under the hood of his jacket made sneaking around unrecognized a bit easier, but all he could do was try to get to the changing rooms.

...I don't even want to skate tonight because of this shit, he thought, pushing through to the crowded restroom. It was a mercy that he found an unoccupied stall and pushed his way inside, past the others who were putting on makeup at the mirrors or adjusting their costumes. He hadn't noticed whether Chris or Emil were in there, but he wasn't watching for them either. He just put the lock into place from the inside and sat back against the toilet-seat, backpack on his lap as he stared blankly forward. If I decide not to skate, people are going to ask why...but if I do skate, they'll see something's wrong with the performance... I don't know what to do... Why is the RSF being like this!? If they were that concerned about not winning then they shouldn't have thrown Viktor out!

A quick text and a brief wait made it easy for a meet-and-trade, and Mikhail was soon reunited with both his kid and his bank card. He approached the trio with a nervous but well-meaning smile, "I guess everything went okay then."

"Yeah, everything was fine." Viktor answered, holding the plastic rectangle between his fingers. Just as the elder went to take it back though, he flicked the card out of the man's reach, getting a confused look, "But warn us next time. Our reservation was for three. It would've been problematic if they didn't have room."

"Was the table set for four when you got there?"

"Sure, but-"

"That's because I called ahead." Mikhail explained, "They would've cleaned up the fourth spot when you arrived if there was no one using it."

Viktor deadpanned him, "You messed with our reservation?"

"Just to say that your guest was bringing one of his own. If they'd said that wasn't allowed then I wouldn't have pushed it." Mikhail pointed out, finally swiping his card back, "In any event, I hope you guys all had a good time. Yura needed some cheering up."

Viktor and Yuri exchanged glances, but Yurio's words rang through their heads like an echo. Instead of just spelling it out though, Viktor simply put one hand on his uncle's shoulder and moved in to speak next to the man's ear, "Talk to Nikki about it. We told him we wouldn't tell, but she didn't."

"...Tell me?" He mumbled back in confusion, but Viktor pulled away again without another word. There was something of an unspoken understanding though after that, as Viktor nodded at him before resuming his usual friendly affect.

"We're going to go get ready. Thanks for tagging along, Nikki; it was fun."

"Are you guys all going to the Banquet after?" Yuri wondered, half-turning to follow his partner back the way they came.

"We're planning to." Minako answered, "It'll depend on how long this one manages." She thumbed at the young teen next to her, but promptly got a look for it, which just made her laugh, "We'll be there. We may just not stay all night long. Keep half an eye on Yura though, would you? Where is he right now anyway?"

"Avoiding being noticed." Viktor answered with a shrug, "As per usual. We'll track him down. Jane."

The two guest-skaters started moving away from them again, but Mikhail just gave a lazy wave while Minako and Nikki were a bit more enthusiastic. His eyes went down to the bank card in his hands, and the words that Viktor had whispered to him.

I knew something was off this morning...didn't think it would be like this though. I those two openly agreed not to tell though...maybe Nikki won't either. I'll have to coax it out of her somehow.

He reached into his jacket to pull out his wallet, put the card away, and slipped the wallet into its fold again as he turned towards the pair, "I'm sure the Gala's opening ceremony is going to start before we find seats. Shall we?"

Making their way back towards the changing rooms, Yuri couldn't help but be hypervigilant. Eyes checked the faces of everyone they passed, scanning the crowd for the teen they'd lost a few minutes prior. Viktor gently tugged him along though, keeping him on track even if his eyes were everywhere but forward.

"Please don't add him to your list of worries, my love." Viktor pleaded, pausing slightly with a hand on the door to the big bathroom, "Whatever happens, Mimi will take care of it. That's his job."

"I'm not thinking we can do anything about it." Yuri answered, looking at the man before him, "But I can't help but feel like this is déjà vu, in a weird way."

"Because of last year?"

"Yeah." He nodded, "Yurio wouldn't do what Yakov wanted, so Yakov booted him. Would the RSF really be so brazen? Wouldn't it look even worse if they lost their best two skaters in such a short period of time, right before the biggest event in the world?"

"If love is the death of duty, pride is the death of common sense." Viktor explained, "I can't explain the lengths to which Russia will go to prove themselves. I got lucky...but Yurio is much younger, even younger than I was when my first Olympics came up...and he may not have the ability to stand up for himself when he's had such a hard time of late."

"And you're telling me not to worry." Yuri said, making a face like the suggestion was preposterous on its face.

"I can ask." Viktor smiled, "I may not be able to stop you but at least I've tried."

The door was pushed open and the pair went within, greeted by the sounds and smells of a Gala changing room. Yuri felt slightly out of place, despite knowing several people within, or at least being familiar with them if he didn't know them by name.

It's kind of like Rostelecom last year, where Yurio and Viktor were really the only people I had to talk to... I'm a stranger in a strange land.

By providence, it seemed, they bumped into Chris, who had just finished putting himself together for his Gold performance, "I was wondering when you two would turn up." He commented, pulling his scarlet Olympic jacket over the dark costume. Yuri could vaguely make out what looked like a scaled pattern in the one-piece, each one being the size of a silver dollar, but diamond-shaped, giving off an iridescent blue-green color before going to black, "Did you just get here?"

"Sort of, but not exactly?" Viktor answered, looking around to see if there were any open changing stalls, "We were out to dinner before coming, and had a guest to give back to her father, so we just got back from that. Seems this place is still pretty packed though."

"You and him were just prancing around naked in a shower this morning, and now you're worried about being watched while changing clothes?" Chris teased, "You make no sense at the best of times."

"I have nothing to hide about myself," Viktor explained, "But I'm an artist and I don't want people to see my work until I'm ready to show it off."

"I know, I know..." The Swiss mused, flaring his jacket's collar a bit, but then leaned closer to his silver friend, "Maybe try that one close to the end on the right." He whispered behind a hand, "Someone's been in there for fifteen minutes and not come out."

"Someone?"

"Someone you may know."

"I see." Viktor smiled, and stepped forward to get up behind his partner, placing his hand on Yuri's lower back, "My love, we may have found Yurio."

"Why are you whispering?"

"Shh!" Viktor hushed, putting a finger against his lips for emphasis. He offered a wink and nudged his head towards the door that had been pointed out to him, "Stealthy now."

Yuri moved forward in confusion, but didn't question further. They just slowly scanned each stall for doors that were ajar or closed, until eventually coming to that last one on the right. The door was closed, and the gap between it and the next wall was tight enough that one couldn't peer through. Viktor leaned back to see if he could spot feet, but he saw nothing in the small open area under the walls. Instead, he pulled out his phone, set it to record a video, and quickly peeked it over the top edge of the door, avoiding the flash of a camera or the noise of a fake shutter clicking. When he pulled it down again, and reviewed the footage, it was indeed the Russian Tiger within, clutching his backpack and unwilling to move.

"Jeesh, he reminds me so much of myself when I was really young." Viktor huffed quietly, closing the feed to put his phone away again. He looked up though, and then aside, realizing that the huge handicapped stall capping the end of the row was being vacated. He nudged his head as the unfamiliar athlete went by them, and he and Yuri took it for themselves. Setting their bags down and hanging up their winter jackets, Viktor looked up at the edge of the dividing wall as he unbuttoned the cuffs of his dress-shirt.

"Do you think he knows we're here?" Yuri wondered, unbuttoning his vest, "He's had to have heard us by now..."

"Even if he has, we've been quiet since we talked to Chris. It's impossible to see between the doors and walls though so unless he paid particular attention to what our shoes looked like tonight, he wouldn't be able to tell its us by looking at our feet shuffling by." The Russian answered, "I have an Yurio checked the time on his phone, and grit his teeth. It's practically show-time... I have to tell them I'm not going to skate...

A rustle and thump caught his attention to the right, but looking down gave nothing away. There were no shoes poking under the gap at the base of the plastic wall. Another thump, and the light above him seemed to dim somehow. He turned his eyes up and spotted the unexpected and unlikely face of Yuri Nikiforov there, peering down at him, "What the shit-

"Yuri!" He called down, "Chill, it's just me...can you-" He stammered, and looked back, "What do you want me to say? I don't even know why I'm up here!" He said to someone behind and below him. He grumbled and looked back over the wall, "Why aren't you changed...? You're up almost first..."

"...I can't stomach skating right now... It just makes me sick. I was getting myself ready to tell the organizers to skip me."

"Skip you? But you won Bronze. You earned your place."

"Weren't you listening to anything I said tonight? I feel like I've just lost my spot in the Games no matter what I do..."

"All the more reason to skate the Gala tonight. You got your spot in the line-up fair and square, without outside help." Yuri explained, choosing his words carefully given the number of people still nearby, "It's not like you'll be skating against people you don't know in the Olympics. We already skate against the best figure skaters in the world. The only real difference with the Games is how many people are watching, and how many other events are going on at the same time. There's nothing for you to worry about."

"How can you say that, knowing what I'm up against?" Yurio protested, gripping his bag a bit tighter, "I feel like everything I've accomplished is being questioned... That none of it matters suddenly. All the choices I've made are coming back to haunt me."

"No...you made the right choices. We may live for the ice, but it's not everything."

"...If the RSF tells me to move back to St. Petersburg and I tell them no, they're going to take my jacket back."

"We don't know that for sure. And besides...Viktor's right; Mikhail's the one to take care of all that for you. Your job is to skate. So let's all get ready and show the whole of Europe why Team Hasetsu is going to be on the podium in PyeongChang next month."

"...Team...Hasetsu?" Yurio echoed, looking up in confusion, but all he saw was the hopeful look on Yuri's face, "...You don't mean that...

"Why wouldn't I?" He asked, "I'm literally sitting on Viktor's shoulder right now, talking to you over the edge of a bathroom stall. When you and I first met, it was under similar circumstances...and I didn't doubt your sincerity back then."

The Tiger's face twitched, and he looked down again, unsure whether his skin had flushed or not, but hiding it anyway just in case.

"C'mon, Yuri...skate the Gala with us. This is supposed to be when we have fun and let loose. It's also the last time you'll get to skate until the Games. Make the most of it! Forget the rest until something actually happens."

"...It's really weird...hearing from you that I shouldn't worry about something..." The teen grumbled, but then unfolded his legs from their perch on the front edge of the toilet, and set his feet back onto the tiled ground, "But maybe you're right... I'll...let Mikhail deal with it. Whatever it turns out to be."

"That's the spirit. Now let's all hurry...I'm sure the OCs are already starting."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWENTY FIVE

The flag-dancers were already on the ice - performing again to the Euro-Zone-style remixes of the same two O-Zone songs they'd skated to in the Opening Ceremonies - when seats in the audience were found and occupied. Mikhail's preference for sitting on the end-cap was thwarted that time, but he made due, sticking Nikki between himself and Minako. He pulled out his phone briefly, keeping its lighting dim to avoid bothering others, and sent one last message to his event-in-absentia daughter.

[Hey, just letting you know that we're going dark now. Buzz me if you need something, but otherwise, have a good night.]

He kept his eyes on the screen for a few seconds before closing it down and putting it back into his jacket's breast pocket, leaning slightly towards his youngest as he did so, "So did you have fun with the boys or was it super boring?"

She looked aside at the man, confused for a second, but then shook her head and smiled, "No, it was fine. They were really nice. Yuri and Cousin Viktor told us all about what happened on their trip to see Kon... Apparently Viktor's old house burned down at some point, too."

"Yeah, I'd heard about that."

"Really? When?"

"The other night, when Yuri came to stay with us. He and I had a long conversation about a lot of things. Their trip and the house was part of it."

Nikki's brow furrowed, but she looked back to the ice, only to wiggle closer slightly and take her father's nearest arm into her hands, "What are you going to do...? That's a lot for them to have to deal with."

"The house was technically mine anyway." Mikhail explained, patting the teen's mitten hands, "I bought it off Viktor last summer, when he moved to Japan permanently. I thought I'd restore it as a vacation home for whoever wanted a Russian getaway, but...I suppose there's a list of reasons why that's not going to happen. ...I guess I'll just have the remains bulldozed and sell the plot...or just sell it as it is."

"I could tell that Cousin Viktor was still upset about it." Nikki commented, barely audible over the music, "Even though he chose to move away, the place still had meaning to him."

"Memories of the times he liked being in Russia, before everything turned against him..." The elder nodded, "Maybe it's for the best that he has nothing left to return for. All of us, really."

The teen made a face, unseen in the dark, but the unconscious squeeze of her fingers gave her away.

Mikhail looked towards her, "Is there something going on?" He wondered; hoping.

"...Maybe our Yuri will have to go back for something." She answered vaguely.

"What for? Everything of value that he had there is in Hasetsu now. Even his cat moved."

"...Ehm..." Nikki hesitated, hearing Yurio's worried voice echoing through her head. Her father's eyes were on her though and that was a force to be reckoned with, and she caved, "...The RSF told Yuri this morning that he should move back to train with Yakov again. He thinks they're going to ask him to cheat at the Games." She blurted quickly, only to then cover her mouth, trying to get the proverbial horse back into the barn, though it had galloped away already.

Minako heard the verbal deluge, and looked over in surprise, "...They want him to do what?"

"I didn't say anything." Nikki protested, burying her face into the wedge of space between her father's arm and the back of their seats, refusing to say another word.

Mikhail's eyes moved back to the rink though, focusing on the flag-dancer bearing Russia's colors. His brow furrowed slightly as he moved his arm around his daughter's slim frame.

'Chemist's Games,' indeed... Russia, when will you learn?

Yurio took a deep breath as he looked at his reflection in the mirrors at the front of the changing room. Yuri and Viktor weren't long behind him, coming out of their big stall with their Olympic track-suits on to cover the costumes beneath, save for their long jackets, which they kept in their opaque garment bags. Emerald eyes looked back towards them, golden hair long and loose around his shoulders.

"You're not tying your hair back?" Yuri wondered, approaching the long vanity with a small container in his hand. He pulled his glasses off and popped the cap on one of the two compartments of the container, fishing for a lens, "Are you going to be able to see?"

"It should be okay."

"I'm glad you decided to skate." Viktor added, dressing his hair to curve over his left eye rather than covering it, "I'm actually pretty excited to see what you do."

"I'll just be glad to get it done..." Yurio sighed, "I've never dreaded to skate before, but..."

Yuri blinked purposefully a few times as the second contact lens was placed, and he started cleaning the case they came in, "I know that feeling." He explained, rinsing the small plastic container before shaking it dry and putting it away, "But you're way more head-strong than I am. Just looking at your outfit, I'm guessing this show's going to be up the alley of 'Welcome to the Madness,' right?"

"I guess."

"Use it to let out your frustration then, like Viktor did at NHK." He recommended, "We don't know what the RSF really meant when they talked to you this morning. For all we know, they really only meant to say you should get back with Yakov and Lilia. Minako-sensei is unknown in the figure skating wor-"

"So was Lilia before Yakov brought her on." Yurio pointed out.

Viktor pressed down on the spritzer of a small hairspray canister, "Lilia has cred now, and she worked with Yakov, not in place of him."

Both Yuris gave him a confused look, "How is that supposed to help?"

"Minako has only been on the job for like two weeks," He answered, "I don't know that she was ever a Prima like Lilia was, but she has dancing experience and credentials. Right now, while she's learning how to teach figure skating rather than ballet, she's getting by on the coattails of the work you did while you were still with Yakov and Lilia."

"Yurio's left eye twitched, and side-eyed Yuri next to him, "When is he going to make sense?"

"Your guess is as good as mine." He answered, shrugging helplessly.

"The RSF is lashing out." Viktor said, looking at himself in the mirror. He put a finger on his lip and a hand on his hip, but then turned slightly and gave the duo a wink, "Every coach and every athlete is under heaps of pressure in the run-up to the Games. Does Russia even have a third guy to send to PyeongChang right now?"

"...No..." Yurio admitted.

"So the zeal of doing well is being put onto the shoulders of two instead of three. You're feeling more pressure because there's more to go around than there would've been if I were going for Russia." Viktor went on, watching as his partner pulled blades out of their bag, "Not only that, but the RSF is embarrassed that they tried to force me into retirement, only for me to come back swinging for Japan instead. On top of that, you moved to where I live, putting you at risk of being unduly influenced. I'm surprised they haven't told you not to talk to me or Yuri."

"What makes you think they haven't?"

Yuri stopped what he was doing, one skate on and laces half-tied. Eyes went from Yurio to Viktor, but Viktor just gave an uneasy laugh.

"What, have they?"

"Yakov, too." Yurio confessed quietly, "Even Georgi, and Mila... We've all been told to avoid talking to you."

Viktor was quiet for a moment, but breathed out a sigh, "For how long?"

"...Nationals."

"Well, that hasn't worked out." Viktor supposed, "Pretty much everyone still talks to me... What about Yuri?"

"He doesn't matter to them." Yurio explained, keeping his eyes forward to avoid the gaze from those around him, "...They think he's a joke. That he's nothing without you."

Yuri choked a surprised cough, but just went back to tying his laces, even if he was a bit rougher with them then.

"...But that's exactly why I keep hanging out with you two." Yurio explained, turning to face them both, "And why I still moved to Hasetsu, even knowing the RSF was shitting themselves over it. If I let them police everything I do, then I've lost."

Viktor hummed a breath, curling his fingers around his lips and the point of his chin. Both hands went down to his hips then for a moment, before he stepped forward and put them onto Yurio's shoulders instead, and pulled him into a hug, "And that's all the reason you need to skate tonight." He said, "Make a stand. Show the RSF that they don't have a choice in whether they let you go to the Games or not; without you, they've lost."
The arena was dark and musical when the trio finally arrived in the prep area, being the last to leave the changing rooms. Yurio veered off from them early on, finding some space to stretch and put on his blades before his time on the ice. In the rink was the Bronze Ice Dance duo, performing to a shortened version of Tchaikovsky's 15-minute long 1812 Overture.

Viktor sauntered along until they both got the televisions, pulling Yuri behind by a few fingers. Yuri's eyes were looking dubiously around the area, scanning faces, wondering if those two RSF officials were there with all the competitors. He didn't see anyone that stuck out though. It was just the regular event staffers, mostly those keeping things orderly around the sectioned-off area where the curtains blocked the entrance to rink-side, keeping the lights down in the dark arena.

"It's going to be such a long wait..." Viktor complained, though still in good spirits, "I'm practically itching to get out there."

"You didn't even put your skates on earlier." Yuri pointed out, coming back down to Earth from where his mind had been floating.

"I know. I still have to loosen up."

Yuri turned his eyes towards the television mounted high on the wall, looking over the heads of the others who had gathered in front of it. There were a few other t.v. stations around the hall, and other small crowds in front of each, but Yuri couldn't spot Mila, Georgi, or Yakov anywhere. To that end, the Crispinos weren't obviously around either, nor was Emil.

_Are they at rink-side already?_ Yuri wondered, _I'm not even sure what medal Mila won...but she's always been really good... Sara's probably with her. Wherever Sara's at, her brother is sure to follow...and Emil is usually hanging out with them. Maybe Yakov is there, too...wherever they are._

The music in the arena started getting rather energetic, and Yuri looked back to the screens, seeing the Ice Dancer's kicking it up into overdrive to keep pace. The thunderous crack of cannons firing could be felt even _under_ the arena. He pulled his fingers free from Viktor's loose grasp, drawing a look of confusion at first, but he stepped up behind the Russian instead. Yuri perched his chin behind Viktor's right shoulder, and slid his hands around each side, hugging close to his partner's back as he watched the show continue on ahead of them.

"Am I going to have to ground you tonight?"

"Huh?" Yuri blinked and lifted his head up again, spotting the one blue eye that was looking back at him, "Ground me?"

Viktor smiled and settled his one free hand over Yuri's where it had come to rest on his front, "You tend to fall when there's something on your mind." He reminded, "Your head's so far up in the clouds that you forget where your feet are."

"Oh." Yuri answered, pressing his lips and nose to that shoulder again. He looked down slightly, not really looking at anything in particular, but his fingers clenched around the fabric beneath his palms, "I'm looking out for those RSF officials."

"You'll get yourself worked up."

"...I just want them to watch." He explained, "I want them to see _exactly_ how much of a joke I am."

"You're not a joke, my love. You're a Champion." Viktor reassured, rubbing his cheek against the side of his spouse's forehead, "And last I checked, you were still in command of the highest total score in history...and you did it without cheating. You got into the rink by yourself and earned those marks from your own strength."

"...I was never out there alone." Yuri contested, "You were always out there with me."

"But I was never pulling your strings, making you move in ways you wouldn't be able to on your own." The Russian pointed out, "No one can ever take away what you've achieved. That's yours forever."

"I know... That's what I want them to see. That you're physically right next to me, and I can keep up with you on my own." Yuri added, "I have enough trouble dealing with the doubt I put on myself. I don't need a whole other country dismissing me like that, too."

"We'll both show them. Hell, all three of us will."

"...We've gotta figure out how to tell Mik about what Yurio said." Yuri said, voice a bit lower, and a more serious look on his face, "I know he's scared he'll lose his spot at the Games if someone says something, but-"

"He'll find out without us." Viktor explained, "I honestly wouldn't be shocked if he knows by the time we see him again."

"Nikki?"

"Mh."

The Gala was a blur of fun and exciting performances. Distraction was easy to come by, watching so much unstructured creativity on the ice. The missing skaters that Yuri had been looking for made themselves known when Sara went out to skate her Ladies Bronze show, and Yurio reappeared to skate his own for the Men's.

['Through The Fire And The Flames' - DragonForce (3 minute version)]

On a cold winter morning, in the time before the light,
In flames of death's eternal reign, we ride towards the fight...

When the darkness has fallen down, and the times are tough alright
The sound of evil laughter falls, around the world tonight...

High-energy and faced-paced, memories of the previous year's Free Program were quick to the audience's mind. Yurio quickly felt himself freed-up from the dubious confines of the words he'd heard earlier in the day, letting them get cut away from him like the ball-and-chain they'd come to be. He wasn't even annoyed anymore that it was the Bronze skate he'd performed in, and seeing Emil go out a little while after him was like watching any other skater, not someone who'd bested him.

['I-2-I' - A Goofy Movie]

Got myself a notion, and one I know that you'll understand,
To set the world in motion, by reaching out for each other's hand...

Maybe we'll discover, what we should've known all along, yeah,
One way or another, together's where we both belong...

In-keeping with his other programs that season, Emil's tug on the nostalgia-levers was in high-gear;
he even wore a bright yellow costume like the performer in the movie for whom his show gave life. Much of his choreography was pulled right from that fictional stage, minus the giant electrical exploding spheres and back-up dancers, but with the new finesse of being played-out on the ice.

['Remember When It Rained' - Josh Groban]

Wash away the thoughts inside, that keep my mind away from you, No more love and no more pride, and thoughts are all I have to do...

Ooh, remember when it rained, I felt the ground and look up high and called your name, Ooh, remember when it rained, in the darkness I remain...

The iridescent scales of Chris' costume bounced with light in the rink, looking like water pouring over oil, reflecting the multiple different colors that shone down from the rafters; blue, then green, then magenta. Given the loud and boisterous nature of most of Chris' usual programs, and lacking the liquid sexuality of the others, everyone paid close attention to this new display. Viktor was particularly interested, not having seen such a thing from his long-time friend before.

Soon though, it was time for those last two performers to get onto the ice. The energy of the anticipating was vibrating through the arena. Yuri and Viktor slipping inside the box-like quarantine of curtains that stood between them and the rink, slipping into their immaculately detailed jackets while letting their eyes adjust to the dark.

Clapping was persistent outside that little temporary room. The chaos of it - perfectly emulating the sound of the rain that Chris had just been skating in homage of - coalesced into a more coherent organized noise. Yuri felt a chill go down his spine as he heard the unmistakable sound of that chanting begin, and he felt his shaking hand taken by Viktor's. Fingers clasped tightly - partly out of sheer nervousness, partly out of excitement.

"Don't forget to breathe, my love."

"They're chanting for you..."

"No, Yuri." Viktor corrected, "They're chanting for us. Listen closely..."

Under the loudness of the clapping, the full sound of the audience's chorus was hard to discern at first. Yuri was certain they were hollering his husband's name. But, he listened...

Vikuturi...

Vikuturi...

Vikuturi...

Someone on the outside pulled the curtain back, and they looked through the opening to the colors swirling beyond them. The announcer was already starting the introduction in German, but when it repeated again in English...

"Ladies and Gentlemen... People of Austria, Europe, and the whole world... It is the distinct pleasure and honor that we at the Österreichischer Eiskunstlauf Verband - Skate Austria - welcome our dear friend and his husband to the ice for a very special Guest Performance at our Exhibition Gala."

The applause was enormous, and Yuri squeezed Viktor's hand harder than before, swallowing nervously. He felt Viktor stepping forward though, and quickly made himself move with him, blade-guards already off as they approached the opening in the rink-wall.

This is it... He thought, seeing the spotlights converge on the frost just within the doorway.

Viktor tugged on his partner's hand to draw those eyes up, and he smiled in the faint light, "Let's go make history."
Though it was hardly the first time Yuri had stepped into an Exhibition Gala at Viktor's side, stepping into the rink for this one felt very different. It was the European Championship; an event Yuri had never been to. They were there as guest skaters; previously, at least one of them was an official competitor. They were there by invitation, flying directly in the face of Russian sanctions that should've put Viktor to pasture under any other circumstances; by all accounts, even just announcing Viktor as a 'dear friend' of the European bracket, and Yuri as 'his husband,' was a direct snub at Russian sensibilities.

The RSF is bound to feel slighted by all this, Yuri thought, lowering his eyes for only a moment as he and his spouse stepped out onto the ice, But since it's the Europeans doing it, maybe the RSF will think twice about being so brazen in the future...at least, for Yurio's sake.

"Friends, fans, and family of the ISU...please, give a warm welcome to Japan's own Viktor and Yuri Nikiforov!"
The audience was alive with cheers and clapping as the pair moved out into the rink, golden blades gliding on blue-white frost. Jackets glittered with a rainbow of dazzling light, spotlights shining down on them slowly fading into and out of different colors as they moved. Circling around widely, waving at the audience hidden behind the curtain of shadow beyond the rink-walls, they slowly made their way towards center for a few last words.

Viktor skirted around as they came to a stop and reached to take Yuri's other hand, holding them both between them with a gentle stroke of his thumbs, "Well, that intro was sure one way to tell the RSF to take a walk." He mused, blue eyes turning purple and green and lavender as the lights around them continued their kaleidoscopic shifts, "How are you feeling?"

"Nervous." Yuri answered easily, smiling awkwardly, "But...I'm pretty sure I'm ready for this. You?"

"Probably more nervous than you are." He said, fingers clasping a little tighter, "All this fuss and drama because I married the most perfect person in the world."
"With a set of objectionable dangly bits."

"I like your dangly bits though. And all your other bits."

Yuri's face flushed, hard as it was to see under the magenta lights. He lifted his eyes with confidence though, and laughed a bit as Viktor leaned forward, nuzzling their foreheads together affectionately, "I love you."

"Hmmm...I love you, too." The Russian agreed quickly, "Let's show the world how much."

Yuri nodded and the two of them turned their backs to each other, holding onto the last fingertips of touch for as long as they could. A magenta-pink light descended over where Yuri moved to, a few paces between himself and his partner, making the purple-red velvet of his jacket glimmer. The blue light over Viktor did the same with the green-navy velvet of his own coat. The arena fell to anticipatory silence, fans waiting behind the veil for the performance to begin. Yuri bent his head down slightly, right toe-pick clicked into the ice by his left boot, hands on his hips and elbows flared. Viktor stood more normally, feet slightly apart, right arm loosely wrapped around himself as a finger from his left hand curled just under his nose, and he closed his eyes.

['Rewrite the Stars' - The Greatest Showman]

You know I want you...

The lyrics began, and Yuri lifted his head. There was a pregnant pause in the music, the silence lingering for several seconds.

It's not a secret I try to hide.

He turned in place slightly, eyes fixed on the cool hues ahead of him, sparkles blinking in and out of focus. The extra-long pause pressed in again, and Yuri nudged forward, gliding restlessly towards Viktor's back, raising his hands to gently press them around the side of his husband's arms.

I know you want me...

Viktor lifted his head and turned around, acting as though that touch was oddly unexpected. He pulled away slightly, leaving Yuri to only hold the hand that had unwrapped from around his front as his blades cut the ice. The twist moved him away a little bit, forcing his arm to extend slightly where Yuri still held his fingers.

So don't keep saying our hands are tied.

Viktor pulled his hand back and slid away, spotlights following him as Yuri watched him go. The music's pace started to pick up to its normal pace, and Yuri gave easy chase.

You claim it's not in the cards; fate is pulling you miles away...and out of reach from me.

As the Russian moved about the ice, he kept his gaze down, doing a bit of a step sequence as though dancing to an entirely different song; ignoring what was coming after him. Yuri kept pace though, keeping up the chase, reaching to the man until they both slipped into some crossovers, moving backwards around the short end of the rink.

But you're here in my heart, so who can stop me if I decide that you're my destiny?

Yuri reached for Viktor's hand, held up for balance, and pulled the palm to his chest as they straightened their paths. Blue eyes fixed on hazel, a surprised look on his face, but he didn't pull his hand back. Instead, they glided out towards the center of the rink, slowing gradually, until Yuri could place his other hand on his partner's cheek, and Viktor curled his fingers around it, tempted by the moment.

Why don't we rewrite the stars? Say you were made to be mine...

Yuri pulled his hand back from that pale skin, and cast it in an arc towards the rest of the arena, as though presenting the world. His expression was hopeful, and he turned to look at Viktor, wondering if he shared in that fleeting feeling. He placed his hand on the man's waist and drew nearer.

Nothing could keep us apart. You'd be the one I was meant to find.

In something of a quick inside spread-eagle, Yuri glided around in a small circle, turning Viktor in place as he moved. When his back faced the longer expanse of the rink again, he started moving backwards, pulling his partner forward.

It's up to you...it's up to me. No one can say what we get to be!
They started skating in tandem, matching each others' moves, further tempted by the possibilities. Steps got faster and more confident, moving together with a hand held tight between them.

So why don't we rewrite the stars? Maybe the world could be ours...

Viktor pulled Yuri closer, left blades gliding side-by-side as they twisted and turned together. Hands went to Yuri's waist, and they each bent their knees; Yuri flew.

His frame spun through the air, Viktor's hands following from the throw, and golden blades landed and glided away.

Tonight...

As Yuri moved off, sliding backwards in a curve, he reached both hands out, gesturing for Viktor to follow. However, as they slid into the brighter lights, Viktor braked hard, frost flying from his blades. Yuri straightened out in confusion, coming to a slow stop on the opposite side of the rink.

You think it's easy?
A male voice sung the lyrics rather than a female, and the audience cheered with realization; it had been them singing all along.

Viktor bowed his head as he turned away, spinning elaborately, his body moving sharply in frustration.

You think I don't want to run to you?

He slid in a diagonal across the frost, both hands reaching forward, only to pull them away again as Yuri reached back.

He twisted around and veered away, forcing himself through a powerful step sequence, legs and blades swinging with purpose.

But there are mountains, and there are doors that we can't walk through...

Yuri tried to catch up, but Viktor was barreling down the rink as though on a war-path. Just as he reached the man, Viktor spun around in a single twizzle, rounding out with his front facing the rink-wall in a wide outside spread-eagle, one hand reaching back as the other guided his curved path.

I know you're wondering why, because we're able to be just you and me, within these walls...

Yuri was able to take that hand, and synched their moves again. He found Viktor pulling him in, putting a hand behind his waist and rotating them as they glided, as though in one long ballroom sweep. Viktor pressed their foreheads together, blades still moving over the frost.

But when we go outside, you're gonna wake up and see that it was hopeless after all.

Viktor pulled away again, letting go with one hand, leaving Yuri to slide away on his own in surprise. They both came to a stop, facing off again with a distance between them.

No one can rewrite the stars...

As Viktor tore off in the other direction, Yuri ran on his toe-picks to go after him, reaching with one hand.

How can you say you'll be mine?

Though Yuri made it across the distance quickly, Viktor kept out of reach, holding his hands out just inches away from his partner's grasp.

Everything keeps us apart, and I'm not the one you were meant to find!

Viktor twisted out of his path with a quick turn, leaving Yuri to fly right by him. They each banked around in a wide curve, mirroring one another's movements as they moved closer and then past one another again.

It's not up to you, it's not up to me, when everyone tells us what we can be...

The last curve moved then within arm's reach, but they moved around in a circle, reaching into the center between them without being able to touch. They then twisted away from each other, twizzling into a new path that lead them to opposite sides of the rink.

How can we rewrite the stars? Say that the world can be ours...tonight

They continued to mirror each other's movements from far away, ducking through opposite corners of the rink through an elaborate step sequence, coming back towards center.

All I want is to fly...
They leapt past each other with a death-drop entry, passing with just feet between the crowns of their heads in mid air.

...with you, all I want is to fall with you...

Flying entry camel-spins rotated next to one another, dipping down into a twist-variant sit-spin, hands reaching up above themselves.

So just give me all of you!

They came back up to standing, moving swiftly through a fast scratch-spin, braking just to reach for one another again.

It feels impossible...

Viktor broke off.

It's not impossible...
Yuri reached.

Say that it's possible...!

Viktor looked back, and they stared into one another, giving each other a knowing look.

How do we rewrite the stars?

They broke off again, this time together, moving in perfect sync like their tango, nights before.

Say you were made to be mine! Nothing can keep us apart, cuz you are the one I was meant to find!

Viktor lifted his husband up, spinning him in the air before catching him again and setting him back down. They danced around the rink with speed and grace.

It's up to you, it's up to me...

Leaning back, Yuri let himself be pulled backward in a circle.

...No one can say what we get to be!

They clasped hands and Yuri widened the gap between them, starting to lean, until only Viktor was holding him above the ice as he spun around in a wide circle.
So why don't we rewrite the stars? Changing the world to be ours!

The music started to fade down from its climax, and after a few more rotations, Viktor pulled his husband back up to standing, and brought him close. They continued to spin together where they stood, Viktor's arms curled around his partner's sides, hands pressed to his chest as they looked at one another.

You know I want you...

The song continued, quieter than before and more solemn. Yuri moved his hands aside, sliding them from the silver Russian's chest to his arms, and down to his elbows.

It's not a secret I try to hide...

Hands moved back up again; their slow stationary rotation continued. Viktor pulled his spouse in a bit closer, fronts flush against one another.

And now I have you...
The crowd immediately noticed the change in lyrics, and started cheering before they even knew what else was coming. Yuri moved his fingers over his husband's collar-bones and shoulders, resting his forearms there.

The world is watching...

They both stopped on their toe-picks; Yuri rose up onto his...and they kissed.

Their eyes...are wide... man's head with his cheek adoringly. Once he set Yuri down again, he reached for his partner's right hand to bring it up, and kissed the ring thereupon before finally letting him go again.

"We did it..." Yuri said, still catching his breath from the whole event, "All the anxiety about the lead-up, but we did it..."

"Perfectly..." Viktor agreed, "I can't wait to see what it looks like on video."

The colored lights around them dimmed slightly before coming back as white, and the audience's continued cheering was merged with the sound of new music. Over the volume of the crowd, one could only hear the beat of the song, and it only continued as the rest of the Gala's skaters came back out onto the ice for the end of the Exhibition. They swarmed out into the rink, going to every side, circling around the two that were still standing together in the middle of it all.

Yuri watched a few go by, seeing their own applause as they went by, and he turned his eyes back to his husband. No more words need be said between them. The satisfied looks on each of their faces was enough. Instead of wasting breath on words they each knew intuitively, they put their lips to better use and kissed again, hugged, and joined the rest of the skaters for the Gala's closing ceremonies.
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWENTY SEVEN

With just enough time between the end of the Exhibition and the start of the Banquet to change into all their fancy duds, athletes and coaches switched from business-mode to social-mode. Yuri mulled over whether or not to bring Jiro with them for the late party, but eventually decided to spare the pup. His goodboi job of being an anxiety specialist wasn't necessary outside of competition. At the Rozovskiy Clan rental, things were a tiny bit less simple.

"That's a different look for you," Minako commented, slipping her arms into her thick winter coat. She watched Mikhail buttoning the cuffs of his dress shirt as he came out of the bedroom.

"I don't have my hat to keep my head warm," He explained, keeping his eyes down on the buttons.

Minako quirked a brow, "Most people don't use their hair to keep their heads warm... Why not just ask for your hat back?"

Viktoria came into the kitchen through the olive green door, the aforementioned hat still on her head. When she spotted her father though, her brow furrowed, and she ducked down to the edge of the kitchen table where her siblings were sitting, "Why does he look like that? What's going on?" She asked warily.

Nikki wasn't sure how to answer. She just balled her hands up and pressed them against her mouth, keeping her silence.

Yurio looked between them in confusion, "What the Hell does it matter how he does his hair?"

"I guess you'll find out." Viktoria finished grimly, returning then to the room she'd come from.

Still confused, Yurio turned his attention back to the adults for a moment, unable to hear the quiet murmuring between them as they finished putting themselves together to venture outside again. At a loss, he turned once more to the girl next to him, "Well?"

Nikki blinked open at him, but she was steadfast in keeping her mouth covered. Yurio just rolled his eyes and slumped back against his chair, resigning to that age-old game of 'hurry up and wait.'

The upper floor of the official Arcotel had been taken over by the ISU, decorated with flowers and hanging lights, as though trying to emulate the Blumenbal for those who hadn't been able to go. Yuri paused in the hall, pulling his partner's attention back along with his hand.

Viktor glanced over in confusion, "What's the hold-up? You want to bring Jiro after all?"

Yuri shook his head and stepped forward, just enough to get in front of the man. He pulled up the hand he held and kissed the ring on it, then let it go, and reached both hands up to idle them by adjusting a perfectly good bowtie at Viktor's neck. He could literally feel the eyeballs of confusion on him, and he flattened his palms against the front of his spouse's shoulders, "Promise me..." He started, making Viktor's eyebrows go way up, "No matter what happens, no matter how curious or interested you get in it...no matter how badly you want to bring it up yourself... No talk about Asahi tonight."
"But we were going to ask Chr-

"None." Yuri restated, "We're going to have breakfast with him before we leave anyway. You can ask him then."

"It was supposed to be for you though."

"And I don't want to hear it tonight. It's the Banquet. This has to be fun. So if he or Yurio or Mikhail brings it up for any reason, even Minako-sensei, or absolutely anyone...please help me out and shut it down. If Asahi is my fight, then I'm the one who's going to choose the battlefield... The last thing I need is to fight it when he isn't even here. At least, tomorrow morning, it makes a little bit of sense to bring it up, because we're going to where he is. But he's not here. He's not at Euros, he's not in Vienna, he's not in Europe, and he's not at this Banquet."

Viktor made a face at him, lips squished together in a grimace and brows scrunched in the middle.

"Promise me."

The Russian held for a moment longer, but then let out a dramatic exhale and slouched, "Ugh fine, I promise."

"And you absolutely cannot forget. We're only here for a few hours."

Blue eyes gaped down, mildly irritated, "...If I can't bring it up tonight then you have to promise not to have any weird panic attacks or brainstorming sessions about what Chris might know about those emails." Viktor started, bringing his hands up to start counting fingers, "No brooding, no staring off into space, no worrying, no nightmares later tonight, no hesitation in talking to our friends because you worry I might bring it up anyway, none of it." He finished, flashing all his fingers out as though it all somehow added up to ten, "Okay?"

"Deal."

"But you have to let me ask tomorrow morning."

"Tomorrow morning, you can ask whatever you want."

"Alright."

"Are you two going to go in or just stand in the doorway all night?"

Both sets of eyes widened in surprise and glanced back towards the sound of the female voice, spotting Mila there giving them a sarcastic look. She had her arms crossed, bare shoulders poking out the top of a cute little sleeve/strapless dark red dress. Behind her, a huge stylized bow gave the illusion of small wings, and the tails of it went down to her ankles, "People are going to be climbing over you to get in and out."

Viktor matched her sarcastic grit and leaned in her direction, "Aren't you supposed to avoid talking to me?"

"Who says?"

"The RSF?" He answered, letting the young lady go by. He slid his arm over Yuri's shoulder - feeling one going around his lower back in turn - and the duo followed her in, "We heard that you guys were getting dirty looks from the bosses for associating with me."
"It's a delicate issue, yeah." Mila agreed, but looked back over her shoulder and offered a Viktor-esque wink, "But the RSF and the JSF have a friendly history-"

"...If you can call it that." Yuri quipped.

"They put up appearances at least." Mila agreed, "They've asked that we avoid you in competition, where the public can see or cameras are rolling. In places like this though," She explained, spreading her arms out as though presenting the Banquet itself to the pair, "They can bite me."

"I guess I feel a little better." Viktor commented, "Still kind of sad though."

The redhead turned on a heel, knuckles on her hips. Eyes went from Viktor to his partner though, "I know it's a bit early but can I borrow him?"

Yuri blanched slightly - mostly internally - but shook his head and pulled his arm back. As though offering his most prized possession over, Yuri took his husband's forearm and gently presented it, "Be careful. He's delicate. I need him back in the same condition I gave him to you in."

Mila just laughed, taking the arm into her palm, and clasped the other overtop of it, "Worry not. I may be young and reckless, but only on the ice."

Viktor could only smile, thoroughly enjoying the whole thing. Reality came crashing back though and he found himself tugged gently along, and he looked aside as Yuri faded further and further behind him. Thankfully, he spotted Yurio and co. stepping in soon after, and Yuri seemed to notice them as well, avoiding the awkward state of being alone at the Banquet. Viktor let himself look back at Mila again, and she dragged him towards the far side of the room.

The wall was lined with a buffet-style display, plates sitting on top of ice, with a wide assortment of appetizer-style dishes to choose from. Different salad greens and associated toppings, with glass bottles containing vinegars and oils on a shelf above, and more 'normal' salad dressings in small jars sitting in the ice near the greens. Further on, different salads such as potato, Waldorf, fruit, caprese, and coleslaw. After that, pickled peppers, hand-rolled mozzarella balls, tomato slices, asparagus, and other cold prepared vegetables. Then, after that, assorted soft and hard cheeses, sliced and placed neatly onto plates like tiles, with Genovese, Soppressata, and Hungarian winter salami. To crown the whole thing, a leg of prosciutto, with a small plate nearby for prepared thin slices, and a wheel of Parmigian-Reggiano, newly cut.

Mila snagged a clean plate from a stack, and handed a second to her kidnapped friend, "I distinctly remember warning you a year ago that you'd have problems back home because of Yuri." She started bluntly, pulling Viktor out of his distraction, "Do you?"

"Of course I remember. I told you it would be fine." He answered, feeling the gurgle of temptation as Mila started moving by the salad bowls, "And it mostly has been."

"Remind me whose Olympic jacket you're wearing now?"

"I'll have you know that I'm actually pretty happy about this turn of events now."

"Now, he says." Mila teased in echo, spooning some of the Waldorf salad onto her plate, and stole a taste of one of the pineapple bits, "Truth be told, I'm a bit envious."

"You are?" Viktor lifted his head in surprise, "You considering jumping ship?"

"Not exactly, but I could see the appeal. Sometimes it's a bit much to represent a country which is obsessed with not being humiliated." She explained, moving over to the slices of cheese and salami,
"A collision of worlds...the new modern fun and loose athlete crashing against the old rigid Soviet managers."

Viktor quirked a bow as he used a pair of small metal tongs to pick up a mozzarella ball, "Were you even alive when Russia was still Soviet?"

Mila laughed once, "No, but neither were you, really."

The elder guffawed dramatically, "I'll have you know I was born and raised in Soviet Russia."

"Did you even notice it collapsed?"

Viktor paused with his mouth open, but then deadpanned her, "...No."

"And there you have it; you're part of my people, Viktor. Us kids are leading the charge into a strange new world, and the old people are having a hard time with it. They're trying to hold us back, desperately trying to make us just like them."

"Is this what you had me abandon my husband for, Mila?" Viktor wondered then, stealing the cheese tongs from her hand as she shimmied down the line.

"I hardly see you at all anymore, Viktor. Forgive me for getting caught up." She answered, fishing for a knife and fork from the round bins on a separate table, "Especially since the higher ups are being such sticks in the mud about you."

"Do tell."

"As I was saying a minute ago..." Mila started up again, watching as Viktor found his utensils after her, "I represent a country that is obsessed with not being humiliated...and you, dear sir, have humiliated it."

"They did it to themselves. I was just being me."

"Oh I entirely agree; if they had just left you alone, they would've been fine. But, this is Russia we're talking about, and when did something that make sense to us ever make sense to them?"

Viktor nodded and started looking around for a table, "Have you heard anything about them asking for my medals back?"

"No. I think you're safe there. Yakov would've blown a gasket if they even suggested it."

"So they're hoping to just ignore me into obscurity?"

"There's no chance they'll ever manage that without pulling the FSB into it." Mila explained, nudging her head towards an empty round table near to where they'd been earlier, "But I don't think your crimes go far enough to warrant their involvement."

"Wouldn't that be something." Viktor commented idly, "If they considered my coaching Yuri to be on the same level as selling state secrets, and sent someone after me?"

"Pravda."

Slate eyes blinked in confusion, [Oh, are we speaking Russian now?]

Mila just laughed again and took a seat, but shook her head as Viktor sat next to her, "Nyet. It's a joke I've heard in the last few weeks, since you got thrown out on your ample arse. Pravda means truth in our tongue, but to the rest of the world, it means lies. What the RSF has said about you since cutting you off..."

"Pravda."

"Exactly. Everyone worth their salt knows what anything Russia says about you now a days is probably a crock. So, in retaliation, they've told us peasants to pretend you don't exist. 'He's on Team Japan now; let them put that old cow to pasture.'"

Viktor choked a little and sputtered, "Old cow!"

Mila was practically howling, "Oh my gosh you should see your face right now." She said, wiping a few tears from her eyes. She caught sight of Yuri giving her a dirty look from the other side of the room though and waved happily at him to ease his concerns, "Ahh I miss having you around...you and Yuri both. Things were fun when you were both in St. Petersburg. The other Yuri, too. Seeing the both of you tormenting him with your PDA was always a joy."

"A simpler time." Viktor agreed, "But...it's like our Exhibition tonight made clear. We could only really be ourselves when we were in the rink. As soon as we stepped out, it wasn't so easy. I feel a little bad that I never really noticed how obvious I was being back then. It's like night and day in Hasetsu. Out there, people think something's wrong if we aren't climbing all over each other everywhere we go."

"Well, I'm glad you've found your piece of happiness." Mila surmised, "And don't ever let what the RSF says get you down. It's just marching orders. We're all still on your side, even if we're supposed to give you the cold shoulder when we're on the clock."

Viktor nodded, and reached over slightly to clasp her nearest hand with his own in gratitude, but the look on his face when he let go gave him away a little.

"What's the matter? Is there something else?"

"I'm worried about how this is going to pan out for Yurio." He explained, looking up to where the two Yuris had been mingling, "The RSF is apparently making demands that he move back to St. Petersburg, and cut his losses in Japan. He thinks they're going to ask him to dope at the Games somehow."

"All the more reason for him to stay in Hasetsu."

"Are you worried?" He wondered, "Or have they not said anything yet?"

"All I know is that they've made Yakov super ornery." She answered, leaning slightly closer until her shoulder touched her friend's, "Just between you and me though, I think they're waiting until we're back in Russia before they say anything out loud."

"You sound pretty not-worried." Viktor commented, surprised at her.

"Why worry about something that isn't going to happen?"

"...Are you really that sure?"

Mila nodded, "After the problems Russia faced because of Sochi, and all the issues before that, I'd be shocked and amazed if they were brazen enough to suggest we cheat again. Russia's going to get itself banned from the Games entirely if they keep up that old pattern of behavior."
"Mh..." Viktor hummed, "Wouldn't that be something."

"Hm?"

"Nothing." He reassured, pushing his seat back so he could stand up again, "Thanks for telling me about how things are back in St. Petersburg. I feel much better now. I'm going to meander back to Yuri though. I'll see you later."

"See you around, Viktor~!"

He walked his now-empty appetizer plate to the 'returns' section of the plate area, putting it into a bin with a few used forks and spoons already inside. He made his way around the perimeter of the table hall after that, snagging two flutes of white wine as he went. Yuri easily spotted him coming.

"Everything good?" He wondered, threading both arms around his husband's frame, forcing both hands to go up with the wine to avoid spilling.

"For sure." The Russian answered easily, offering one of the flutes, "Here's to representing Japan at the Games."

Yuri was confused for a moment, but went with it anyway, clinking their glasses together, "To Japan. Kanpai."

They each took their sips, but Viktor's eyes soon drifted to the two elders in the group he'd joined. One was looking particularly serious, "You've only been here a few minutes, Papa Mimi, but you already look like you're not having fun."

Mikhail twisted back, craning his head over a shoulder, looking quite odd to his nephew with his hair slicked back, "Oh, hey...yeah."

Viktor looked around at the others; Viktoria and Nikki looked a bit dour. Yurio was subdued, but mostly annoyed, even if (for once) he didn't make any loud declarations about it. "What'd I miss?" Viktor wondered, looking around skeptically.

"Those two goons from the RSF showed up." Yuri answered for them, half-whispering into his wine glass, "Everyone's been on edge. You could practically watch the hairs on the back of Mik's neck stand on end."

"...Does he know?"

Yuri shrugged lightly, "I'm not sure...but I think he's up to something. Yurio insists no one's told him. Mik always seems to know everything though, so maybe no one had to."

"Yeah."

"What are you two old ladies whispering about?" Yurio grumbled, trying to break up the odd atmosphere, "Not me, I hope."

Yuri just smiled, "I think we're just wondering how long it'll take for those two guys to cause trouble. They saw Viktor and Mila hanging out, now Viktor's here with you. If Georgi and Yakov do the same..."

"They won't." The teen insisted, "They've both walked away from you before, even way before this crap started."
Both Yuri and Viktor smiled nervously, "Yeah, that's true." They mused, "Why don't we go find a table instead of standing around?"

Minako turned towards them and nodded in agreement, "No sense standing on ceremony." She said, putting a hand on her partner's arm, "Let's go sit down, hun. You'll have all night to give them the stink-eye."
Chapter 528

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWENTY EIGHT

As the rest of the Banquet's attendees filtered through those grand doors, the field of big circular tables filled up. A meager attempt at organization had been made with little flags on each table denoting which team it was for, but with such an uneven number of people in attendance, it quickly became a free for all, with everyone sitting alongside friends rather than segregating themselves per nation. Table Hasetsu was no exception, with both Teams Nikiforov and Okukawa, their associated family, and eventually Switzerland's sole athlete, as well as his coach and single-man entourage.

People went over to the appetizer bar in small shifts, with Yuri deciding to follow after his Russian namesake and in-laws. They'd barely made it to the far end to collect their plates before Yurio seemed to veer the whole adventure off on a tangent.

"Would one of you two please explain already why you're so uptight over the old man's hair?" He blurted, drawing all three sets of eyes towards him. He pointed a finger at the table, and - more specifically - the patriarch sitting at it, "He's way over there and can't hear you criticizing him. Is he hiding a bald spot?"

Yuri nearly choked, but coughed and cleared his throat, "Ahem...Y-Yuri...you shouldn't say st-hack-stuff like that."

"Well you try dealing with them being all wound-up and quiet!"

"He only does his hair like that when he's in a certain mood." Viktoria said, trying to get their small quest-group back on track, and started moving slowly down the buffet behind some others who'd been there already, "It's not a good mood. Even though it's been a few years since pipaw was around all the time, even Nikki knows what it's like."

"Hard not to..." She chimed in, reaching for the tongs to grasp baby spinach from the big iced bowl in the first display, "PTA meetings were intense."

"PTA?" Yurio echoed in confusion.

"Parent-Teacher Association meetings." Viktoria answered, spooning over some coleslaw, "Every few weeks, or at least twice a year, there would be these big Open House events where kids would go to their schools with their parents in the evening and have sit-down conversations with all the different teachers. Kind of like an in-person progress report."

"Teachers liked having that connection to the parents of the students they're in charge of. It basically gives both sides a chance to address set-backs or encourage talent." Nikki added, "But papa always took it super seriously. And he'd..." She said, words lingering a little as she looked back over her shoulder towards her father, "...He'd look like that."

"So he took school seriously. Most parents do." Yurio huffed, making a mess as he scooped the potato salad onto his plate, "I wish mine did, but it was never a priority."

Nikki gave a reluctant, nervous smile, "Maybe it's better that you didn't. There's a point where taking something seriously becomes scary. He intimidated our teachers and the other school faculty. If it wasn't already a thing that he was rich and well-connected, making them all think they were practically vassals of his, then he put that look on and basically glamoured them into subservience."

"Glamoured...?" Yuri echoed, "Like...literally charmed them? Isn't that the opposite of scary?"

"You'd think, but when it's coming from Mikhail Durovich Rozovsky, it's just kind of terrifying." Viktoria answered, moving on down the line, "I actually felt bad for our teachers. They went through him three times because of us. It didn't help that Sergio was a brat when he was younger."

"He's still a brat." Nikki quipped, which made her sister smile for a moment.

"Yeah...but anyway. Since Sergio was always a momma's boy, and since she dealt with school stuff the most earlier on, if it ever came to having pipaw come to the school for something, everyone paid attention. He'd give off this aura like he didn't want to know his kid was being a shit, and one teacher actually tried to claim Sergio had ADHD or something and said he should be medicated. Pipaw-"

"Oh, that sounds like it's going to be bad." Yuri said, unintentionally interrupting, but needing a moment to pause for brevity, "The idea that any of his kids are defective must have rankled his superior Soviet sensibilities."

"Seriously!" Viktoria agreed emphatically, "Nikki was probably too young to remember, but we were all there...the look on pipaw's face when he heard those words could've killed someone. His reply probably took a few year off that teacher's lifespan...if not, it put some grey in her hair."

"What'd he say?" Yurio wondered skeptically, one brow quirked.

"It doesn't sound scary coming from me, but from him, hearing 'my son doesn't need to be medicated so your job is easier' was." She explained, rummaging around in the fruit salad bowl for just the strawberries and pineapple, "You could've heard a pin drop on the other side of the room. Two days later, Sergio was in a hockey class, and pipaw went with him to make good and sure he did what he was supposed to. Turns out Sergio was just bored; he needed something beyond recess to burn off his energy. By the next PTA meeting, everything was different...except pipaw. The teachers started to realize he was on their side when they were right, but it wasn't any easier to tell him when or if we were doing something wrong."

Yuri nudged Yurio with an elbow, "Looks like this is going to be your PTA meeting." He teased.

The blonde just grimaced, "Why would it need to be." He said, less a question than a statement, "I haven't done anything wrong."

"They have though." Nikki pointed out, nudging her head towards the sparsely-populated Russian table; Yakov and Georgi where there with those two RSF officials, but Mila looked like she was vying for an escape route, "What they're doing is no different than that teacher who said Sergio needed Ritalin."

Yurio's face contorted into a grim sneer, and he looked back at the appetizer line, trying to avoid the gaze of the Slavs behind him, "I haven't said anything to him about it because I don't plan on being around for them to bother. No sense making trouble."

Nikki looked nervous again, but didn't reply. She just moved on to take her sister's place at the fruit salad bowl, and fished for blue and blackberries.

"He deserves to know," Yuri chimed in, "Even if nothing comes of it. Keeping it a secret will just make him anxious when he does find out. You know he's going to."
Yurio barely had a second to turn towards his friend before Nikki squeaked and dropped the serving spoon onto the floor, sending berries and chunks of honeydew melon sprawling. She whined and went down to her knees trying to find them before anyone could squash them into the carpet, but Yurio ended up crouching down next to her to help find them, though he did so with a sigh and a head-shake, "You've been acting weird since the Exhibition. Why are you so jumpy?"

Yuri watched quietly, but a nervous twinge went through him, She told him...

Viktoria looked over at the pair on the floor, "Better leave it; it's not your job to clean up. We're holding up the line."

Big jade eyes couldn't keep the secret anymore; she burst into tears and dropped all the bits of lint-covered fruit she'd already collected, "I'm sorry I couldn't keep it a secret!" She blurted, dropping her head down, much to both Yuris' chagrin; Viktoria deadpanned and quirked a brow, more wary of public staring than anything, "I told him what you said!"

"Nikkita-" Yurio harped between clenched teeth, dropping the fruit he'd picked up, "You weren't supposed to-"

"I couldn't help it!" She protested.

A curious murmur had started around them as people gawked at the display. Mikhail's head popped up above the crowd from the far side of the room; dad-senses were tingling even from over there.

"I wanted him to know! It was the right thing to do!" Nikki went on. Yuri went around to try helping her up by then, and Yurio grudgingly followed.

"If he gets involved in this then the RSF might just kick me off the damn team entirely!" He argued, "You should've left well-enough alone!"

"Let's step out of the way at least-" Yuri suggested, half-nudging the duo out of the buffet line. He nodded to Viktoria to let her keep going, "We'll be right behind you."

"Oh sure, this isn't awkward or anything..." She quietly sassed to herself, but carried on without them.

Yurio watched for a moment, but then looked back at the young silver in front of him, and felt hamstrung slightly by her ample tears, "What did you say to him then? How much does he know?"

"I told him everything, stupid!" Nikki harped back, "He's my papa and he always fixes things. Why would this be any different!?"

"Because this is different from everything else he's ever had to deal with!"

"How!?" She argued, "He's been helping you with your skating stuff for almost an entire year now!"

Yurio could hardly contain his frustration; all he could do was gesture at Viktoria on the other side of the room, "Because this is the Russian Skating Federation! Look what they did to him!"

Yuri glowered uncomfortably, "That's not the same..."

"It's exactly the same!" The teen shot back, brow rankled severely, "They threw Viktor out like last night's trash!"

It was awkward to hear that very Russian laughing at something suddenly; him and Chris were having a grand ol' time despite the conversation the rest were having about him.

Yuri hummed a nervous breath to himself, "Viktor embarrassed them. If he hadn't already flirted with the idea of retiring to be a coach, they probably wouldn't have done things this way. It might've been much worse."

"Yuri!" Another voice called suddenly; it was a familiar one, and it sent a cold shiver down the teen's back, "Yuri! Počemu by tebe sjuda ne podoji? Neprijatno, čto vy nas izbegaece."

"...Y-Yakov..." Yurio said under his breath. Yuri and Nikki were already looking at the Russian table when Yurio finally turned; the whole group of them were staring straight in their direction, but eyes were only on him. Mila looked a bit wary, but Georgi looked completely defeated. Yakov didn't look particularly impressed either, but he was maintaining some level of professional decorum. Yurio barely managed a smile, fake as it was.

"What'd he say?" Yuri wondered quietly.

"He wants me to come sit with them."

"My ved' esë komanda, verno?" One of the RSF officials asked, trying to sound pleasant but making Yakov's eye twitch. The pair were scrawny and tall, even when sitting at the table, but both were clean-shaven and pale. One had thin grayish-blond hair, sitting stringy over his forehead like the legs of a cheap Halloween decoration. The other was well-balding, but had a strip of thin gray-brown hair wrapping around the back of his head. Somehow, the balding man looked younger than the one that had hair, though they were easily both in their mid to late 40s.

"...I better go..." Yurio said, resigning himself to the idea; he picked up his half-forgotten plate and started moving towards them.

Yuri and Nikki watched anxiously, but something else had suddenly caught their attention. Given how Yurio was keeping his face tilted down though, they were sure he hadn't noticed it.

[Your performance at the Exhibition reminded us of your victory in Barcelona.] The younger, balding man commented as the teen approached, [We were wondering if you plan to skate like that at the Games.]

[Maybe you should try to condense that program to under three minutes and use it for your Short Skate?] The other 'suggested,' [Your record-breaking SP helped you win Gold back then. You could do it again.]

Yurio came up behind one of the chairs, but his eyes were still downcast, [I hadn't considered it...I-]

[We were talking to Coach Yakov about ideal training conditions for the next few weeks.] The second official interrupted, [We had come to an agreement that bringing all of Russia's Olympic skaters to St. Petersburg would be best, including the speed skaters. They'll all be heading that way over the next week. When can we expect you to arrive?]

[He won't be.]

Yurio finally looked up, head practically jerking in its quick movement. On the opposite side of the table, he saw those jade eyes, but unlike their warm counterpart, these were steely and full of contempt. He hardly had a second to process it before he felt a hand against the back of his shoulder, and his feet were compelled to move aside, stepping around the table with two shadows on his heels. When he finally regained some sense of his surroundings, Yurio looked back to see it had been Yuri pushing him along, and Nikki was flanking him on the other side. They brushed past Mikhail, who stood like a sentinel between them and the Russian table.

[Yuri just moved to Hasetsu to be with family. He'll be training there for the rest of the season.] The elder said firmly, [He is well taken care of.]

[Respectfully, we disagree.]

Viktoria had reclaimed her seat at the family table by then, and her father's voice cut through the noise of the crowd like a hot knife. Though she stood by her place, she couldn't make herself sit, and her awkward standing posture caught Viktor and Chris' attention. They looked up at her, then in the direction she was looking, and each spotted the strange stand-off taking place.

Mikhail hadn't budged; with hands in his slacks pockets, jacket looking sharp enough to cut someone, he stared at the two RSF officials, and at Yakov beyond them at the circular table, [Who are you to decide what's best for him?]

[More than 100 years of Russian skating prowess supports us.] The stringy-haired older man said, standing up from his place at that round table, [We know what's best for our athletes.]

[Your athlete; my son.] Mikhail corrected, [And as long as he's under my care, he trains where I say he trains. He's happier in Hasetsu, so that's where he's going to be.]

Tensions rose with each exchange, but neither were ready to back down, [The quality of his programs has suffered since he left St. Petersburg. He should return to his original coach.]

Yurio could feel his head starting to spin, and he blinked forcefully a few times trying to clear it. He didn't notice when Minako and Viktor helped sit him down in the chair Mikhail had abandoned. All he could hear were the hollow noises of the Banquet around him.

I'm going to lose my spot at the Games... I'm going to get kicked off the team because of this...

[There is nothing Yakov taught Yuri that he's forgotten in just two weeks. He just needs time to adapt to these changes.] Mikhail continued firmly, [He's still your best and only hope for a spot on the podium.]

Yakov grunted a huff, but Georgi sneered slightly. Mila listened intently, but her eyes kept wandering over to Viktor to see what he was doing. All she could see through the bodies standing in the way though was that Viktor had sat back in his seat, and it looked like Yuri sat sideways across his lap, but she wasn't entirely sure. If Chris' serious-face was any indication, Viktor was paying close attention.

[All the more reason for him to return home. If he plans to skate for Russia, he should train there with his own people.]

Mikhail's eyes twitched slightly, and he lifted his face a little, [Maybe it's for the best that he stays away until the season's over. Training on the same rink as the world record holders will do him better than any help that you can provide right now. You shouldn't get in his way like this.]

The two officials seemed to find something about those words funny, and they snickered between each other before gesturing their heads in the other table's direction, [Two world record holders...] [One who's past his prime and should retire, and another who would never have gotten this far without being carried by his betters. We don't need their influence on our athletes.]

Viktor could feel the insult viscerally, and immediately put his arms under his partner's back and knees to lift him up, stand, turn, and put him into his own seat. Yuri was utterly perplexed, but the way the immediate area seemed to go a bit quiet suddenly made him stay where he was without protest. Chris set a hand on his shoulder to settle him there as Viktor joined his uncle.

"Ne umničaj so mnoj, ja predupreždaju tebja." He said angrily, held back by Mikhail's arm, but not meaning to go much farther anyway.

"Would all of you old women sit down already?" Yakov said, pushing up as he smacked his hands down on the table, "Yuratchka isn't going to move back to St. Petersburg. There's no point. If he doesn't get on the podium at the Games then yell at him afterwards. For now, trust him to know what's best for himself."

The four tense figures just stared at each other for a few seconds longer, but expressions contorted into confusion as Viktor uttered an almost mocking laugh, "...It's almost like they're more worried Plisetsky will win because of me than they are that he'd lose if he doesn't go back to St. Petersburg."
He shook his head, "Pathetic... It just burns them so badly that I'm not skating for them anymore... and that I put a non-Russian on the podium, and married him."

"Seems so." Mikhail agreed, wondering if the pair had any idea what was being said. The contemptuous looks they got from them conferred that the RSF duo at least understood they were being ridiculed. Yakov loudly sat back down again though, jolting the officials out of the stare-down, and they grudgingly returned to their seats as well.

Viktor hesitated, but when his uncle turned and pat his chest, he let go of the breath he'd been holding onto and followed after the man back to their own table. They each reclaimed their spots - Viktor picking up his smaller partner again before sitting and setting Yuri back onto his lap - and huffed at the absurdity of it all, "Well, that was unexpected."

Mikhail gave a quiet laugh, but threaded his fingers together under his chin and smiled, satisfied, "I was expecting it. I came prepared."

"...Prepared?" Viktor echoed.

A finger rose from the weave to point at slicked-back silver hair, "I save this for special occasions; 'no-fucks-given' mode."

"Language." Nikki scolded suddenly, making her father laugh again.

"Sorry, sweety. I had to defend your brother's honor." He mused, "But since that's out of the way, maybe now we can have some fun?"

Eyes turned to Yurio, who still seemed catatonic, "...Y-yeah... Fun..."

Chapter End Notes

Počemubytebejsjudane podojit? = Why don't you come over here?
Neprijatno, čto vynasizbegaete. = Hate to think you've been avoiding us.
Myved'ešekomanda,verno?=We'restillateam,right?
Neumničajsomnoj,ja predupreždajutebja. = Don't get wise, I'm warning you.
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED TWENTY NINE

Despite how tense the situation had been for those involved, the rest of the attendees of the Banquet hardly noticed the strange little Russian stand-off in their midst.

A few more chairs had been brought over to accommodate the number of people who had come to sit at Team Hasetsu. The atmosphere relaxed again, and at least between Chris and Viktor, an attempt was made at bringing laughter back.

The ISU officials made their usual announcements of congratulations to the event's victors and brought out the celebratory cake and gift-bags. Photos were taken, flowers were given, and eventually, the trio were allowed to go back to their tables. Throughout the whole thing, at least of the Men's winners, Yurio did his best to vanish into the background of the medalist's gaggle, and when each were finally allowed to return to their seats, he did so quietly. Mila practically evacuated from the Russian table and went to join Sara and the others at their own, where things were much lighter and fun, even with Michele being salty over Emil's Silver. The Canadian pair skaters, the Spanish ice dancers, and all the other winners surrounding that one icy table in the middle of things, were like glowing moons around a dark joyless void.

Yurio had lost his appetite ages ago, and resigned to just cross his arms on the tabletop, leaning his chin against them, staring forward aimlessly. Minako tried to ease his nerves, but nothing she said or did seemed to stir him. On the teen's opposite side, not even Yuri could do anything, nor Viktor beside him. Yurio couldn't retain anything going on around him. In one ear and out the other, as it were.

Minako sighed and leaned slightly to her left side, and set her hand on her fiancé's forearm, "Hun,"
She started in a hushed tone, "He's not handling this well at all."

Mikhail nodded and set down his flute of bubbly, eyes on the reluctant figure on his lady love's other side.

"I don't think I've ever seen him this withdrawn before." She commented.

"Switch spots with me."

Nodding, Minako pushed her seat back and stood from it, stepping aside as Mikhail passed in turn, and each sat in the other's spot. Mikhail made a few adjustments in his new place, moving the plates and silverware out of the way before unexpectedly sliding his elbows down over the tablecloth to emulate the Russian Tiger next to him. He was sure to cozy-up next to the teen, until he could nudge the round of his shoulder against the side of Yurio's head.

Despite the press, Yurio didn't respond. He just turned his gaze ever-so-slightly further away.
Mikhail just became more obvious then, squishing that whole side of himself against the teen, even hooking his ankles around the legs of the chair to move it closer. Still, Yurio refused to acknowledge him. Jade eyes went past the blonde, looking for backup.

Yuri had been watching curiously, half-listening to Chris and Viktor yammering about Euros-gone-by like they had been earlier, but nudged his partner subtly to get his attention. When Viktor turned, Yuri gestured silently at the situation beside him, and Viktor nodded. Like his uncle, he moved a few plates and such out of the way before sliding down to lay his chin into his crossed arms, scooching inward until one elbow prodded the back of the teen's right arm. Yuri joined in after that, crossing his arms over both Viktor and Yurio's backs, forcing the teen to finally gawk up at them.

"What are you idiots doing?" He growled, burying his face instead.

"Trying to get you to quit moping." Viktor answered, "Why are you so pent-up? I thought you'd be glad to get saved from having to sit with Yakov and those old farts."

"I am glad I don't have to sit with them," Yurio answered, voice muffled some, "But now all I can think about is how long it's going to take for them to tell me I'm not going to the Olympics."

"They're not going to kick you off the team." Mikhail reassured, pushing up slightly to prop himself up onto his left elbow, putting the right on Yurio's shoulder to give it a reassuring pat, "They've already given you your jacket. Take-backs aren't a thing. And I told them you're not going back to St. Petersburg, so you don't have to worry about them trying to pressure you into doing anything untoward."

"Mila and Georgi, and all the others though..."

"You have to let them deal with it themselves."

"Mila's strong-headed." Viktor chimed in, "You know she'd be loud in her protest, or she'd feign cooperation and then just not go through with it."

"Besides..." Mikhail added, "Given how bad the cheating was at the last Summer Games as well as Sochi before that, I'm certain that Russia is under the microscope by the IOC anyway. You're way too young to have been involved in something scandalous before, so you'd be a safe bet to send to PyeongChang. Mila, too. Georgi...maybe not so much, but-

"Georgi and Viktor are the same age but for a single day." Yurio pointed out, lifting his eyes above his arm enough to see the Russian next to him.

Mikhail didn't seem fazed, "And Viktor's been a medalist at literally every event he's gone to since before Sochi. Georgi hasn't; he'd have a much harder time proving he has a clean history. His tests at Russian Nationals would practically be dismissed, too; everyone is clean when tested by the same state running the doping scheme."

"Try not to worry about it so much," Yuri suggested, "Whatever happens, we'll stick by you. The RSF has to go through both Minako-sensei and Mikhail to get to you, and they'll both make sure you're kept out of trouble. Being in Hasetsu makes that really easy."

"The Games are only a month away..." Yurio sighed, pushing up a little, "So much can still happen in such a short period of time."

"Yet that doesn't leave a lot of it for them to scheme, either," Viktor explained, "And it's like you said earlier anyway...anything that the RSF does wrong will fall back onto both of us. You won't be the only one dealing with the fallout. So...until then, focus on your training. If the Games fall
"Because if the RSF doesn't send me to the Games, they'll still send me to Worlds." Yurio echoed dryly, "Seriously, how does that make sense?"

"Because I'm 99% certain that if something happens with the Games, it'll be because of someone higher-up in the pecking order than the RSF," Viktor pointed out, nudging the blonde again as he rose back up to sit normally, "Besides, I think you have more important things to consider."

"Like what?"

"Like the fact that Mimi told those goons that you were his son, and they didn't question it." Viktor mused, ruffling that blonde mess of hair as he stood up with Yuri, "Congrats. You graduated. We're brothers now."

Yurio was taken aback, a lot aback, and he turned around red-faced despite his disheveled appearance to gape at the other Russian sitting on his other side. Mikhail just smiled.

"C'mon, Chris." Viktor added as he and Yuri started moving off, "We're gonna go mingle and drink and dance a little."

It was nearly 4am when the hotel-room door finally opened, and two half-conscious pups roused from sleep to greet the pair coming inside. The fluffy bois stayed on the bed though, tails thumping the blankets as their bleary, half-opened eyes watched one blurry figure step closer to them.

Yuri was the first to greet their canine sons, bending forward and give each one a kiss on the noggin and a quick head-rub. He went back to the entry hall to disassemble from his winter layers, passing on each item to his partner to be put away. By the time he was untying the thin laces of his dress-shoes, Viktor was halfway out of his suit already.

"I think tonight went pretty well, don't you?" The Russian wondered casually, "The RSF thing got done so early that I almost forgot it even happened by the end."

"I didn't even notice when they left." Yuri agreed, grabbing both leather shoes by their heel-cups to slide them into the bottom of the coat closet, and rose up to start unbuttoning his blazer, "I'm sure they only hung out for a really short while though. I didn't have this weird feeling like someone was watching me."

"Ditto."

"What did they say that got you all upset though?" He wondered after a fashion, putting the blazer onto a coat-hanger before putting some slack into his tie to pull the loop over his head.

Viktor glanced back from where he'd stepped into the bathroom, tap on as the water warmed, fingers under it to check the progress, "Oh, nothing that's worth repeating." He answered vaguely, turning his eyes back down to the running water.

"Something worth getting up for though."

A tired look came out of the bathroom, but Viktor shook his head, "You made me promise not to talk about Saito all night, because you didn't want to deal with the conflict it would inevitably spawn. I got up just to make a point that I wouldn't tolerate their rhetoric. I think Mimi and I both knew that the Banquet wasn't the place to start a fight over it though. I bet he would've had a lot more to say if "...Not that I knew what he did say." Yuri huffed sarcastically, "I wish I could wrap my head around the Russian language. It just kind of sounds like English in reverse though; so many impossible sound-combinations that only make sense the other way around."

Viktor blinked at him in confusion, but then looked at his reflection in the mirror as he thought about it. He couldn't help but shake his head and laugh slightly at it, "I guess you're right." He said, feeling the water finally achieving a warmer temperature. He lathered the small bar of soap in his palms before rubbing the suds onto his face. He listened to the sounds of his husband's clothing rustling and being put away as he finished washing his face, but just as he counted to 30 in his head and went to cup his hands together to gather water for rinse, he felt a presence come up behind him. First it was fingers, gently sliding over his still-clothed legs, then came the press of a hot bare chest to his back, followed by a cheek, the ticklish brushes of a few loose strands of hair, and finally, those hands sliding up and under him, arm coming around his trunk to hold there for a moment. Hands full of water, Viktor just smiled and rinsed his face, splashing the clear liquid onto his skin. Yuri kept hold even as he finished, reaching for one of the small hand-towels on a roll-rack nearby. As he folded it and put it back though, Viktor twisted in place to flip around, and lightly touched his fingers to his partner's bare shoulders and neck to get those eyes to open and look up, "I'm not going to tell you what was said." He teased, "No matter how much you try to seduce me into revealing it."

"Who says I'm trying to seduce you into a translation?" Yuri countered, eyes half-lidded, "Maybe I just want you because I can."

"Oh, that's actually the best reason to have." Viktor purred, leaning down into a kiss, even as Yuri huffed a few breathy laughs into the effort.

"I'll find you again in a few minutes," The younger man said, getting one last good feel of his husband's broad back with his splayed hands, "But if you fall asleep before I'm back, I'll forgive you."

"I'm tired, but I'm not that tired, my love." Viktor reassured, tracing a finger down Yuri's jaw until he could lightly pinch the point of the chin with two fingers, "I'll warm the bed for you though. Don't keep me waiting too long."

"If I take too long you'll just jump in with me." Yuri retorted, reaching around the marble-tile wall for the shower nozzle.

To that, Viktor hummed a laugh to himself and went back out into the main room, stripping down from the last bits of his Banquet attire in preparation for sleep. The hiss of the shower faded as Viktor moved away from the bathroom door and pulled the big blankets up, sliding into their coolness. Makkachin got up just enough to wander closer and flopped down again into a heap next to his human's side, and Viktor was all too happy to cuddle the poodle for a few minutes. With arms around the brown boofer's fuzzy frame, Viktor whispered into Makkachin's fur, "I feel bad bringing you all the way out here, only to leave you in the hotel-room half the time anyway. I have to wonder if it was worth it..."

The poodle seemed to comprehend - at least in some way - what was being said, and lifted his head all the way back to offer a lick to his human's cheek. Half-rolled-over by that point, and with all four paws in the air, Makkachin just stayed that way and closed his eyes again.

"We're flying home with Air Japan, so there's no way you'll be treated so badly in-transit again. I promise," Viktor added, squishing his brow to the pup's head, "I'll never let what happened, happen to you ever again. No matter what I've done to deserve what's come down on me, none of it
A slight rustle came from beyond Makkachin's softly-beating tail, and Viktor soon felt the cold-wet of another nose, then the warm-wet of a tongue licking the back of his wrist. He lifted that arm and reached into the dark, finding another pupper-noggin there needing some pats. Jiro squeezed in as close as he could before settling down again, chin lifted up at an angle against Makkachin's tall chest, and Viktor slid his hand down the pup's curved back soothingly.

The minutes wore on, and the spray of the shower was like a lullaby, dragging Viktor closer and closer to sleep. It didn't help that the two canines had already passed out again already, and their snoozing was becoming contagious. It was an odd feeling to close his eyes for what felt like just a blink, only to feel Yuri climbing into bed right away like he'd somehow teleported there. The Russian jolted with a start, surprised by the sudden presence, but settled back down again when Yuri whispered a reassurance.

"Sorry...didn't mean to startle you."

"I fell asleep anyway..." Viktor half-whined, feeling one hand slide across his upturned hip and under the arm beside it. He lifted that arm and helped pull Yuri's palm towards his chest, threading their fingers together when it found its place against his skin, "This is a rare treat; it's not often you curl up behind me."

"Normally it's the other way around." Yuri pointed out, pulling the blankets over himself as he curled up along the curve of his husband's back, "By morning, we'll have switched places. That's how we always end up." He teased, kissing the bare skin in front of him, "It's how you used to sleep with Makkachin, too."

"Seems like such a long time ago...and yet, like it was yesterday." Viktor added, voice trailing slightly as sleep called to him again, "Love you."

Yuri smiled and pressed closer, "Love you, too."

It wasn't a long sleep, but staying up late came with its consequences sometimes, and this was one of them. By 9am, Yuri's phone-alarm was beeping, and the day had officially begun; Yuri crawled out from the pretzel of limbs Viktor had tied around him from behind, just as Yuri had predicted.

Viktor was dead on his feet, needing constant guidance to get ready, dressed, and packed so they could go, but all the while, his eyes were closed and he yawned throughout. Even when they were outside in the cold, frosty morning, letting the pups do their morning business, Viktor practically fell asleep again, this time perched on Yuri's back, standing upright only with his arms clinging around Yuri's thin frame and a shoulder to prop his head on.

"Is he going to make it?" Chris wondered, laughing at the sight of it as Viktor continued to dose when they met for breakfast.

They sat in a booth at the hotel's restaurant, with Chris on one side and Yuri with Viktor on the other. Jiro and Makkachin were close-by, leashes tied to the bottom of the table so they wouldn't wander off to investigate the smell of food. Their own would be arriving soon enough anyway.

"I think he just needs his coffee," Yuri mused, patting his husband's head where it was still propped up on him, "He was moving around a lot last night though. Woke me up a few times."

"Is that abnormal?"
"A little." He nodded, lifting his head as he spotted the outline of a waitress coming their way with a tray of breakfast drinks and a basket of croissants. Once it was all set out, Yuri reached for the coffee carafe and did his best to doctor his partner's preference, "Well, maybe it isn't. I normally don't wake up. If he tosses and turns, maybe I just haven't noticed until now. ...To be honest, I'm dreading this breakfast a little, so maybe I was a light sleeper this time around and he was being normal."

"Really? Why?" Chris wondered, a brow raised behind circular lenses, "It's just me." He gave a nervous smile.

"Yeah but when this one wakes up, he's going to start up a really uncomfortable conversation, and I promised that I'd let him." Yuri explained, lifting the small white cup to his lips to taste the light-brown coffee. Satisfied, he tried to nudge Viktor a little, "Hey, wakey wakey...coffee's here." He said, holding the cup under the man's nose to try and let the smell catch him. It worked well enough, and after a few seconds, hazy blue eyes finally opened, and Viktor took the cup carefully.

"...Mmm...I'm super not ready to adult yet..." He whined quietly, but took a grateful sip anyway.

"What would you be doing otherwise?" Chris laughed in wonder.

"Sleeping."

"...Oh boo, you're supposed to respond with a pun, Viktor."

"I'm just kidding."

"...You are?"

"Yeah." Viktor nodded into his coffee, "Get it? Kid-ing? Instead of adult-ing?"

Yuri groaned, but Chris shook his head, "I guess that'll do."

"It's the best I can manage with only half a brain to work with." The Russian explained, "I'll be more fun later."

"Yuri says he's dreading breakfast with me." Chris managed, "Maybe we can get the not-fun-stuff out of the way, so we can get to the better part of the day at the same time that you become fun."

Viktor blinked at him slowly in confusion, "...Dreading? Why?"

Yuri smacked his face, "...You forgot."

"I'm sure I didn't." The hazy Russian contested, taking another sip from the little white cup. He then set the cup down so he could reach for the croissant basket, "Chris, did you look into the thing like I asked?"

The Swiss figure lifted his head up, and glanced between the pair across the table from him, but the realization was creeping in quickly, "Oh...I see, that's why Yuri's anxious." He said grimly. He lifted his glass of orange juice though and leaned back against the booth with it, "There wasn't really much to look at. I only have my memories. I never stole any of Yuri's emails. I didn't think you'd ask about it with him around though."

"Why wouldn't I?"

"You sent the request as a text message when I was sitting next to you both, that's why."

Yuri shot his silver a look, "I think that counts against your promise not to talk about Asahi at the
"I didn't talk about him. I didn't even mention his name, actually." Viktor reassured, dubious as his point may have been. He reached into his coat for his phone and unlocked it, pulling up the message he'd sent as proof, "See? Can you look into the email arrangement you and Yuri had back when he first left for Detroit?" He read aloud, only to realize Chris had sent a reply, "Wait, I didn't see this... 'You mean the ones from Saito?'"

"Viktor-"

Chris shook his head again, "Like I said, I never took any emails out of Yuri's inbox. I did exactly ask he asked; I deleted what Saito sent him, and blocked his address. I camped out in Yuri's email for about 2 weeks, just to be sure messages didn't come from a different account to get around the block. I forwarded everything else to a temporary account Yuri had made so he could still correspond normally."

"So Saito did message him."

"Of course he messaged me." Yuri said despondently, "We were friends back then, and I didn't tell him I was leaving. I expected he'd at least ask where I was, even if I didn't want to answer."

"He already knew." Chris explained, taking another sip from his juice before setting the glass down, "Apparently he'd gotten back to Imari after a meeting in Tokyo where he'd gotten approval to let you call dibs on the next available spot in the camp, and when he couldn't find you, he went to your coach. She told him you went to Detroit, so his first message was asking if you'd already left Japan or were just working your way up to it. I'm a bit confused on the timeline... he said something about how it had been a month since you left when he found out?"

Yuri groaned and thought back on those days, "...It'd muddled in my head. I didn't compete in the adult Grand Prix Series until I was in my 20s. I was 18 when I went to Detroit though."

Viktor leveled a flat look, "I thought you said you'd only agreed to be with him for like a week before you took off. How'd he not notice for a month?"

Chris was the one giving looks then, "...You...did what with him?"

"I said my memory was bad about the timeline!" Yuri harped at them both, "I made myself forget! I don't even trust that what I do remember is right, okay?" He said defensively, crossing his arms and leaning against the back-rest, "I could've sworn that it was summer, cuz he was around a lot... Maybe I thought it was the off-season. I don't know. The Junior Grand Prix starts in August so everything's all weird in my mind."

"Yuri got spooked and cornered by Saito once, and basically agreed to go out with him." Viktor explained reluctantly, almost impatient, "He said that he thought it was only for a few days, a week at most, before he was able to bail to Detroit in secret. But Saito's emails said it had been a month before finding out...?"

"I don't remember." Yuri grumbled, "And I really don't want to remember, either."

Chris sighed loudly enough for them both to hear and pulled out his phone, "There's only one way to find out where he was, maybe." He explained, typing into the search field. A few moments later, he was thumbing the screen to scroll, and held the phone closer to his face to read, "...Ah, okay, this explains it a little. Yuri moved at the end of that November, and Saito said he didn't find out until nearly a month later. Nearly a month would be when Japanese Nationals happens, and it looks
He explained, waiting a moment again as he searched and scrolled, "Yeah, you were both at that competition. He would've been able to talk to you about it then because you were in the same place. He must've found out right before that."

"So he was probably in Tokyo then for that month." Viktor surmised, "Was he in the GP Series?"

Chris nodded as he tapped his phone again, "Yeah, Rostelecom and Trophée Éric Bompard, so he would've been done until Nationals since he didn't go to the Final. Tokyo really isn't that far away from Imari...it's easy to guess he went back home a bunch when he wasn't at a competition, especially if he was trying to get Yuri to join the Tokyo Club. That month he was away must've been right in the middle of crunch-time for those two events, and he went back to Imari when he was done, only to find Yuri had left already."

"...I must've kept up the charade longer than I thought." Yuri said quietly, staring at the croissant that Viktor had set on his plate earlier, "I definitely wasn't with him in person for long though. There's no way."

"He could've been in Imari right before the Senior season started, asked you to be his boyfriend, and then had to leave for competition." Viktor surmised, "That would explain why you could be mostly sure that nothing severe happened between you."

"Severe?" Chris echoed, "What, like sex?"

"Oh, no, Yuri, trust me..." Chris said, his tone reassuring as he reached across the table to pull one hand down with his own, "If anything like that had happened, I'm certain I would've found out. Even though we hadn't shared competitions in a while, since I moved up to Seniors before you, we still corresponded a lot. I could more-or-less tell you when you ceased being an innocent, even though I teased you about Viktor at Cup of China last year."

Brighter red than he'd already been, Yuri gaped, one hand still on his face, "How in the Hell can you tell something like that?" He asked, feeling defensive again.

"Now I have to know...when do you think it happened?" Viktor asked, super curious.

"Sometime between Nationals and Four Continents. That span of weeks when you skipped events despite your big come-back declaration." Chris explained to the Russian, as though he frequently thought about it and had the information at the front of his mind, "I suspect that you two hadn't yet been intimate even in Barcelona when we found out about the rings...but it definitely happened before the next time I saw you two again in person at Worlds in Helsinki. Living together in St. Petersburg must've really made the difference." He teased, leaning back to sit normally again, "Being alone in a house, with no shared walls for family to listen through."

"...As if the shared walls stopped him." Yuri chastised, giving his husband a slight look.

Viktor just smiled though, "It didn't stop me completely. Do I have your consent to tell him if he was right?"

Embarrassed, Yuri looked away, but flicked his one hand forward in a gesture to go ahead.

"Our very first truly intimate moment - beyond kissing - was the night before Japanese Nationals last year." Viktor explained happily, "At very least, it was the first time he let me do some heavy petting."
"Fascinating." Chris said, smiling eagerly, "Go on. Please."

"Ohmygodhe'simaginingitrightnow." Yuri quietly groaned.

"It was a few more weeks before anything progressed from there." Viktor explained, feeling his husband's hackles rising like skyscrapers with every word, "But without going into too much detail, I can confirm that, yes, it was between Nationals and Four Continents. Our first real sexy-time was in the days before Euros, actually."

Chris seemed pleased with himself and nodded, and turned his eyes back to the super red Yuri, "So you see? I can tell. Rest assured in the knowledge that nothing severe happened between you and Saito before you went state-side."

Viktor's expression changed to one of judgment after that, "Now that I think about it though, if the timing was really that compact, it was kind of stupid for Saito to drop that bomb on you when he did, not yet knowing if you'd get to join the Tokyo Club at all. What could he have possibly been going for? A long-distance thing? What would the point of that even be?"

Yuri finally looked over, "Says the guy who dreamed-up a whole different origins narrative for us, where we were going for it long-distance for months before we finally started living together."

"My dreams can skip the filler-weeks where we aren't together." The Russian defended, "You'll note that the real me came to you as soon as I realized something was possible. I didn't even bother warning you I was coming. That's how seriously I took it."

"How could you have warned me you were coming?" Yuri asked skeptically, "It's not like we'd ever exchanged numbers."

"I could've asked Chris for it. Or I could've DM'd you over Instagram."

"I didn't post on Instagram back then. You would've had a hard time even being able to find me on there."

"Not important." Viktor shrugged, still smiling even though his spouse was giving him a rather serious look, "The point is...I came to you as soon as I could. That's how I am. I did the same thing with Sophia back in the day, remember? Moving to France despite Yakov complaining about it."

Yuri just looked at the man incredulously before rankling his brow and scooting towards the edge of the boot, "...I need some fresh air."

Viktor looked on in confusion, "Yuri?" He asked, watching the man go, "Yuri?"

"...You have a habit of over-sharing." Chris said, smacking his hand against his face before shaking his head in disbelief.

"...But I was just giving evidence for-"

"He doesn't care about that." The blonde explained in an exasperated tone, "If you never mention her name again to him, it'll be too soon."

"But-"

"Tut." Chris silenced, smacking his palm forward to cover his friend's mouth, "You mean well, but you're an idiot."
Blue eyes stared on in stunned shock from behind those fingers.

"A precious, beautiful, talented, loveable idiot, but still an idiot." Chris went on, making Viktor sink with every adjective, "Never say her name in his presence again. Never speak of any of your past relationships to him again. It took him years just to stay still long enough in your presence to say hi to you. No doubt, he thinks you're comparing everything he says and does to every past girlfriend you've had. It's traumatizing to him just to think he might not have been as innocent as he believed when he got together with you."

"Mphrmphbt..."

Chris shook his head 'no' again, "In many ways, Yuri is stronger than either of us...but in a few key areas, he's not. He doesn't know how to just have a fling or 'try someone out' for a little while. He can't comprehend either of us in that way because of it, and it really hurts him to think about the fact that you have that in your history. So even if you wouldn't think less of him if it did turn out that he'd been intimate with Saito before, the very threat of that possibility has wounded his view of himself."

Viktor's brow furrowed and he tried to explain himself again, but under the muffler of Chris' hand, it was pointless. Chris just leveled him a look, and Viktor sank into defeated silence again.

"When you two did your wedding at the Shinto Shrine in Hasetsu...there was meaning behind why you wore white that day." The blonde explained, "You came to him as a clean soul, untouched, untainted by the past...pure. He accepted you exactly as you were, knowing you'd been with others before him; to him, you were still perfect. You gave him your last name, but he gave you his colors. This whole unfortunate situation with Saito has made him think he was tainted this whole time, and he had no idea. Am I wrong?"

Viktor hesitated, but with the hand still covering his mouth, he could only shake his head.

"Now he has the confirmation that he, in actuality, was exactly what he claimed to have been all along. Pure. ...And then you threw Sophia at him again."

If not for his head being pinned to the cushion of the booth, Viktor would've slid under the table from the shame. He just closed his eyes and sighed out through his nose, and felt Chris finally let him go again. Viktor stayed put with his guilt for a little while before pushing to sit up normally again, eyes downcast, "...When Saito kissed him at Nationals...after we got back to the hotel, before he told me...he took a shower that was too hot, and clawed at his skin with his fingernails, like he thought it was the only way he could feel clean again. Even though he wouldn't let go of me until we got back, as soon as we did, he suddenly wouldn't let me touch him at all. I had to convince him that it was okay. That I still wanted him, even though Saito had put lips on him. I...did this whole, elaborate, ritual cleansing with him, hoping that if I were the one to clean him, then in Yuri's head, he'd feel clean again. Maybe I'm the one who was dirty all along."

"He knew that going into it though." Chris pointed out, "He just didn't want to hear-"

"-The details." Viktor interrupted, looking further down, "The first time I tried to tell him, he shut me down...and every time I tried to help him with his 'Eros' performance by telling him to draw inspiration from a relationship he'd had, he'd shut me down again, because obviously he didn't have that experience. I don't know why I keep running my mouth like I don't know that. I do know."

"You and he are alike in your opposite-ness." Chris said, drawing a look of confusion, "In the same way that he can't comprehend being in a relationship with someone where he isn't giving 500% of himself, you can't comprehend someone who hasn't had a few practice relationships before finding the one. You have to make a better effort to remember and respect that about him. He's not
"I've tried... I guess, I just..." Viktor grumbled, pausing in a moment of introspection before suddenly moving to the edge of the booth, "I'm an idiot..." He said, finalizing his prior thought, "I'll be right back."

Makkachin and Jiro both tried to go after the man, but found their paths cut short by their leashes catching. They both whined and looked at Chris, but he shook his head, "Don't worry. He won't be long. He's just had a breakthrough about himself that was a long-time coming."

Viktor followed the open space of the UNO Restaurant until it lead him outside. There was a big white city-bus with red trim parked out front, and a number of people getting off so those waiting on the side-walk could get on. For a split second, the Russian worried his husband was in that crowd trying to get away, but he forced himself to be rational and look away. When he turned to look all the way to the left, to the concrete street-side entrance to the path that lead into the park behind the Arcotel, he spotted two benches. Yuri was sitting alone on one of them, facing the street, looking at the open phone-booth and a singular skinny tree next to it. Relieved, he started walking quickly over, feeling the chill creeping in; he hadn't grabbed his jacket at all. Neither had Yuri though. When he got there, Yuri was looking at him, but neither were sure what to say. Instead of stammering nonsense though, Viktor rubbed his arms through his thin sleeves and moved to sit on the little metal bench beside his partner.

"You're freezing," Yuri commented, worried, "Normally you don't chill this easy."

"I normally have 15 layers of ego to keep me warm." Viktor answered, "Shame doesn't keep me warm at all though. I'm sorry I upset you with my...uhm...dumb and unnecessary commentary. I thought I was offering proof about my habits, but it came out wrong."

Yuri shook his head and huffed a single laugh, but then pinched the bridge of his nose between the tips of his thumbs, elbows resting on his knees where he leaned over them, "...I wanted to come outside anyway. I've been so worried about what Chris would say about those stupid emails that I forgot how he could put my mind at ease, too. I guess I was just thinking the worst..."

"Expect the worst, always, then you'll be pleasantly surprised when it doesn't come to pass." Viktor surmised, "Right?"

"Yeah."

"So then why did you want to come outside...? You didn't bring your coat. It's freezing. The sun isn't even that high...so it's like being in the shade, too."

Yuri looked past the edge of one thumb to see his spouse, and sat upright. The bus screeched and puffed as it departed and entered the roadway, drawing both of their attention for a moment. Yuri stood up though as the street quieted again, and stepped in front of his partner, offering his hands. Viktor took them unquestioningly, and let himself be pulled up to his feet again, hoping for his confusion to be lifted sooner rather than later. He felt those thumbs rubbing over his fingers, but didn't dare make a sound. He just waited for Yuri to speak in his own time.

A few more seconds of quiet passed before Yuri stepped closer, letting go of his husband's hands as he guided them over his shoulders. He wrapped his arms around Viktor's back and pressed his face to the crook of one shoulder, drawing in a long, deep breath, holding tight, "...I just needed a little space to recover from the embarrassment of the topic. It's...hard to explain how profound my relief is right now...to hear from Chris that he knows I was spared back then because he could tell when things got serious between you and I... I just... It's hard to explain."

"Well, you told me point-blank not to talk about our private-life with anyone, so...when you told me to go ahead earlier..."

"Thank you." Yuri added, "For saying enough, without saying too much."

Viktor managed a wry smile, "...Well, I'm an idiot...but I'm your idiot, like you said. Eventually I'll do the right thing, even if I don't understand it sometimes."

Yuri breathed a laugh and lifted his head up again, looking at that dumb innocence on his uneasy partner's face. He leaned forward though, nosing the man's lips lightly before allowing a kiss. Hands moved back over his shoulders to cup the sides of his face, and he opened his eyes to see Viktor looking back at him, as though examining him. He smiled nervously though, "...Sorry I'm like this...I make things difficult."

"You deal with things in the only way that makes sense to you. I can't be mad at you for that. I just have to learn how to cope with it, without making you feel worse." Viktor explained, brushing his thumbs across his partner's cheeks, "You and I see the world, and the people in it, very differently. That should've been obvious to me from the start...but in some ways, I'm a really slow learner."

"...It's okay... You've been really patient with me. I couldn't ask for more."

"Well, you should anyway." Viktor mused, leaning in to kiss lips and forehead before giving another tight hug, "I have to be held to a higher standard. You're too important to me."

"I'll try..."

"Good. Let's head back in then."

"Yeah..." Yuri agreed easily, "I need to know what the Hell I was doing for a month before I told Chris to moderate my inbox."
Makkachin barked loudly at the sight of his two humans returning to the indoors, and both he and Jiro paced anxiously as the duo got closer. They got a quick greeting from their people to calm them down, but both pups went under the table to lean on their humans’ legs once they were sitting, just to be sure they didn’t leave again so soon.

"Everything okay?" Chris wondered, though already sure of the answer given how quickly they’d returned and how neither seemed to be in distress.

"Yeah...sorry." Yuri answered, retaking his place on the booth bench, "I thought I'd die of embarrassment with Viktor telling about our...erm...stuff. I needed the cold air to cool me down."

"Your secret's safe with me." Chris mused, "The waitress brought the rest of breakfast over right after Viktor went out after you, so dig in before it gets cold."

Yuri nodded and turned the plate before him around a little bit, putting the eggs and sausage at the front for easy cutting, but before he could get his fork and knife out to start, he put his wrists against the edge of the table and looked across, "...Did you read all the emails before deleting them or did you just toss them?"

"I read everything, in case Saito said something stupid." He answered, taking a bite from a half-eaten bagel with creamcheese. "I felt like some of the things he wrote were particularly off-putting, but I guess it makes sense in the context of him believing you two were together at the time."

Cheeks were red, but Yuri felt guilt more than embarrassment, "He must've thought I lead him on."

"Truly."

"...I feel really bad about how I did things back then." He went on, lifting his arms again to start cutting the sausage links into smaller pieces, "I really didn't want to hurt him. He didn't do anything wrong, he just...fell for someone who didn't feel the same way back, and was too cowardly to be honest about it."

"I'm not sure that 'bravery' is the word I'd use when describing a person capable of shooting someone down." Viktor commented, pouring maple syrup over his waffle.

"Weak, then."

"Ehhh..."

"Being compassionate isn't a sign of weakness or cowardice." Chris pointed out, licking a bit of stray creamcheese from the corner of his mouth, "But it can cause people to take advantage of you, even if they don't mean it. Mercy is a strength, so long as others aren't so vindictive that they'd use it to trick you."

"Asahi isn't vindictive..." Yuri defended, "After everything I've learned about him since Nationals, I think it's a freaking miracle that he managed the courage to ask me out in the first place. Besides the risk of rejection, he was putting his life at risk... He must've only found the courage to speak the words because he'd had a taste of freedom in Tokyo beforehand."
"...A miracle? What was so wrong with him before?" Chris wondered, swapping his bagel for a fork to poke at a bowl of fruit cuts.

"His parents are hyper-religious, and his father brought it to Imari from a childhood spent in America. What did he say the practice was? Southern Baptist?"

Viktor shrugged, "I can't remember."

"In any case," Yuri went on, "He was treated poorly growing up because of what he is. Thinking back on it...I should've noticed how he changed after moving to Tokyo. He was really guarded and stand-off-ish before, but then he found some kind of weird energy after leaving. He must've thought it was safe to approach me only then, because he could've kept us a secret if we lived in another city altogether, like he did with Riku."

"That makes sense." Chris nodded, popping a bit of cantaloupe into his mouth, "His emails make sense now, too."

"How so?" Yuri asked, finally putting the butter-knife away so he could start eating the morsels he'd been cutting.

"In all the messages he sent that I read, he never once actually put it into writing that you two were together in any sense." Chris started, fishing for a grape with his fork, "To me, it read like a guy that was obsessed, but no worse than I thought he already was for the few years before that. The worst thing he said was that you betrayed his trust, and that was before Nationals."

"It got that bad before Nationals?" Yuri questioned, feeling a nervous pit in his stomach. He rested his fork on the edge of his plate and pressed his other hand to his brow, "I can't remember any of it... Not the emails, I mean, but Nationals itself. That would've been my first competition with Celestino as my coach, right?"

"If you moved at the end of November and weren't in the Junior Grand Prix Final, then yeah." Viktor nodded.

"...It's so weird...I remember certain aspects of the competition, but none of it has to do with Asahi."

"Maybe it's because I told you to stay close to your coach." Chris surmised, draining the last of his orange juice, "You must've already intended to, given how you were already avoiding Saito online by then. You focused on your sport, just like you should have."

"I do remember being with Ciao Ciao that whole time..."

"Did you read any emails from before Yuri told you to watch his inbox?" Viktor wondered for them both, "In those few weeks where Saito thought Yuri was still in Japan?"

"I did. A few." Chris answered, pushing his glasses up a little higher on his nose with the tip of one finger, "Just to kind-of get a good baseline for how they talked to each other normally. I guess it wasn't that normal after all, if Saito was talking to someone he thought he was dating."

"...What was he saying?" Viktor asked warily.

"Mostly about the progress he was making on getting Yuri a spot in Tokyo. The first email I read - the most recent one Saito had sent before Yuri gave me the login credentials - was that he had a surprise. He wanted to tell Yuri in person."

Yuri felt himself go cold, and shook slightly, "That must've been it... The moment I knew I couldn't "run and hide from it anymore."

"Eat while you think, my love." Viktor advised, rubbing his hand over his husband's back.

Chris watched for a moment as Yuri did as asked, slowly chewing on the small bit of egg he'd picked up, "I recall thinking that Yuri's replies in those weeks were really short and simple." He started again, "But to my thinking, it was entirely in-keeping with how he always wrote stuff. Short, sweet, and to the point. He was always really bad at being a presence online."

"I'm a lurker." Yuri corrected, "I was present."

"You did get a bit more subdued after that though." Chris surmised, "You were never really that active online anyway, but after the debacle with Saito, it was harder to track you down. That's around the time I had to start texting you to get an answer. Thank goodness for Phichit though."

Viktor laughed, "Right?"

"He came in at just the right time, and was everything Yuri needed; a good friend with no weird motivations, and had a big presence online. He helped make up for the lack of participation on Yuri's end." Chris dramatized, turning his eyes to the younger of the two on the other side of the table, "It was suddenly so much easier to keep tabs on you when he popped up in Detroit."

Yuri nodded and gave a sigh of relief, "I felt so much better out there when he came. He was always fun and cheerful...it was hard to mope with him around. The best part was how he never really prodded me for information...so I never had to tell him anything about Asahi. He just thought it was my personality that I was quiet and weird. Phichit-kun made it possible for me to be silly again. He took my mind off of everything back home."

"Your skating improved dramatically, too."

"You think so?"

"Absolutely." Chris affirmed easily, "You went from being adorably average to good. Don't you remember? Celestino threw you head-first into Four Continents and Worlds, and then made you do the GP Series the next year, along with a zillion other smaller events. I remember distinctly how competitive you got, and how hopeful you became that you'd finally be good enough to compete against Viktor, not just be at the same event."

"...I don't get it." Viktor stammered, looking vacant, "If you were at the same events as me then we were competing against each other."

"In my head, there were always two different competitions happening." Yuri explained, "There was the good skaters' event; the top 15 or so. Then there was everyone else. People like me, who had no name recognition because we never stood out. People who never made it to the Grand Prix Final."

"Then you got to Sochi."

"And that's when you noticed me."

Viktor blanched slightly, "...I noticed you before that. You just...made a name for yourself as someone who always ran away."

"I still feel like I should take part of the blame for that," Chris sighed as he smiled, "I should've thought to get you drunk years ago."
Yuri coughed, "...I think I like how things turned out. Who knows how badly it could've gone under any other circumstances."

"I do have one confession to make." Chris added suddenly, making both Nikiforovs pay close attention, "I know you told me not to engage Saito if he emailed you...but on one singular occasion, I did."

"Uh oh..."

"Right before I gave back the keys to your account, I sent him one message." He started to explain, making Yuri swallow a nervous gulp, "I didn't tell him who I was, but since I knew he couldn't reply...I told him one simple thing."

"...What did you say...?" Yuri asked pensively, brows crinkled behind his glasses.

"Six simple words: 'Yuri isn't gay. Leave him alone.'" Chris revealed, "That would've been a week after Nationals."

Viktor gasped, and smacked one fist into the palm of his other hand, "That explains it!"

"Explains what?"

"The first words he said when we saw him at All Japan!" He answered, reaching one arm across his husband's back to grasp both shoulders excitedly, "He didn't even say 'hi' first, he just asked, 'so you're gay now?' Remember?"

"Uhm..." Yuri stammered.

"He really said that...?" Chris asked, quirking one brow, "For real?"

"Yeah!" The Russian exclaimed, "I mean, not that it makes a difference in the end, but I guess it explains his way of thinking."

Yuri rubbed his face with both hands, "...I made a complete fool of myself."

"Eh?" The older two looked at him.

"Don't you remember how I answered him then?" He went on, turning to look at Viktor.

"Of course I remember. You said you went gay just for me!" The Russian answered proudly, pointing himself before throwing both arms around his partner, squishing him energetically, "I'm the luckiest guy on Earth!"

Yuri's cheeks just went red again as he was jostled around, "My face is going to hurt by the end of this..." He muttered, covering it again with the hands he'd slid aside a moment before, "Is there anything else that I need to know about before we go back and face this guy again?"

Chris thought back, resting with a finger curled around his chin.

"Other things I agreed to but didn't mean to? Dumb stuff I said or did that I shouldn't have?"

The blonde laughed at that, "It wouldn't be fair for me to spout-off a list of things you've said or done that were dumb, because you and I have very different views of the world. I would've had no problem breaking Saito's heart in half to make him go away, but you're not like that. You want this thing solved without hurting him. In that regard, you're a better man than I am, Yuri." He explained, skewering a piece of pineapple with a blackberry from the nearly-empty fruit bowl, "The past is ancient. You can't fix things that happened when you were 16, or 18, or even when you were 23."

"...When I was 23?" Yuri echoed, perplexed.

"Forgetting Sochi."

"Oh." He deadpanned, much to both other men's amusement.

"Point is...don't dwell on what happened before. There's nothing you can do to change it. You have to fix things in the here and now." Chris explained, lifting his fork to examine the bits of fruit he'd picked up, "You have time to think about how you want to handle it, but whatever you decide to do, make sure you're at peace with it ahead of time. This has to be the last time it comes up. Saito has to accept that you aren't available to him, and he can't loiter around you on the hope that you and Viktor fall apart so he can swoop in and steal you away... More importantly, you aren't interested in him. You never were, you never meant to make him think otherwise, and that's never going to change. You and he are not compatible. He has to move on."

"We helped him get sponsors for his skating. Maybe we can get him signed up on some dating site."
Viktor mused, only to get a displeased shove from beside.

"Honestly, he should probably do that on his own." Chris chimed in, sparing his friend from further torment, "You two should be hands-off with him. Viktor explained that his uncle is dealing with things now...let him finish."

"I already mean to ask Mimi to help Saito move out of Yu-Topia. We may not live there anymore, but the family still does, and I don't want either of us to have to steel ourselves just to visit." Viktor added, "And I definitely don't want there to ever be an opportunity for Saito to share the onsen or showers with Yuri, on purpose or by accident."

"What's the plan for Four Continents then?" Chris wondered, picking up his bagel again, "Saito and Plisetsky share a coach now. He'll be around a lot in Colorado."

Yuri felt a hollow pit open up in his gut, and a nervous look crossed his face, "...All this time, I've been worrying about the Olympics, I didn't even think about Four Continents..."

"Let's solve one problem at a time," Viktor suggested, "Once we know how the expulsion from Yu-Topia goes, we'll have a better idea how to address the next competition. I'm sure Mimi is already on top of it anyway."

"Yeah, just tell him what you hope to see happen and let him figure out how to make it so." Chris agreed, "That way it comes to Saito from a neutral party and it just seems like a push towards independence, not a nudge out the door."

"...Yeah..." Yuri agreed reluctantly.

"All Nippon Airways flight 8563 to Tokyo-Haneda International Airport is now boarding. Please approach the boarding tunnel as your section is called and present your tickets for scanning."

Viktor looked up and over from the waiting area, but then turned back and reached to unplug his phone from the charging-tower behind him. Yuri lifted his head when he felt it, and pulled out one of the ear-plugs he'd used to keep the noise out while he tried to take a nap. Jiro was in his carrier on the seat next to him, though the top was open so he could get fresh air and look around.
"Time to go. They'll be calling us up any second." Viktor explained, putting his charging-cable away first, then his phone, and moved over to put the lid securely down on the carrier. He smiled as Yuri stretched like a long cat next to him before finally standing up sluggishly, "Just a little bit longer and you can go back to sleep, my love."

"I don't know how you're not as tired as I am..." Yuri commented in the midst of a yawn, pulling out the other ear-bud to secure them both in a pocket, "You moved around so much last night that I'm surprised you slept at all."

"Oh don't worry, I'll be out like a light once we're airborne." Viktor reassured, kissing his partner's forehead and patting his hair affectionately, "Tell me more about how much I moved around though. Does that happen a lot?"

Yuri couldn't help but yawn again as he rubbed his eyes under his glasses, "I'm not sure...I normally sleep through the night. I'm just looking forward to getting a good night's sleep at home again. We've been gone a long time."

"Agreed," Viktor nodded and started moving towards the terminal, taking their carry-on luggage while Yuri picked up Jiro in his dog-box, "At least this first leg of the flight back is non-stop to Japan. We'll get to Tokyo around 7am, hang out for a bit of a layover, and then be back in Hasetsu by noon-ish."

"Did we find out when the others are getting back?"

"They have two layovers so they'll be back around dinner-time. Mimi said it was the best he could do, given how he had to buy a bunch of new tickets after he got his kids after NHK." Viktor explained, waiting in the crowd of other first-class passengers who were cueing for their rows to be called, "I feel a little bad for them. They have to stop in Moscow, then Taipei, then Fukuoka."

Yuri felt a chill at the mention of Moscow, "I don't know if it was providence or luck that we decided to buy these tickets like we did, not having a layover in Russia on the way back. But, I'm glad it turned out this way."

"...Truthfully?" Viktor commented, "If I'm not flying to Russia, I don't go through it. It was like that even before this kerfuffle with the RSF."

"Oh..."

"Because Aeroflot is always late." He went on with a laugh, "And for a guy like me, who is impulsive and likes to do things quickly, getting a bug to go somewhere gets hampered pretty seriously when the damn plane won't go. Right?"

"That makes sense."

They fell to silence for a little while as the first few sections were called, then their own, and they made their way forward. The eventual sight of their seats was welcome, and Yuri quickly plunked down next to the window, and gently set Jiro's carrier down on the floor in front of his feet. Viktor put their carry-bags away in the overhead compartment before taking his own seat, and let out a long exhaled sigh.

"Well..." He started, "In spite of the sad hiccups we had, I think being in Vienna was pretty good. But...I'm super glad we're finally going back." He turned his head against the cushion behind him, and held up his hand, feeling Yuri's fingers slide through his own before bringing them to his lips to kiss them, "I am sorry for the mistakes I made. I was supposed to make you feel better after Nationals, but I messed up."

Yuri was a bit surprised to hear the words, but he turned in his seat and leaned in closer, adding his own kiss to the finger-threads, "You still made me feel better in the end...and I forgave you anyway." He explained, reaching around with his other hand to press his palm to one pale cheek, "We'll just be careful not to do anything super stressful again. It's not fair to either of us. ...Maybe we should've known better, but after all the times last year where I pushed you to try to be more open to the idea of your family, I couldn't back out. Especially since Kon said he'd been proud of me, a little. I had the same hopes that you did."

Viktor nodded, and turned his face into the palm, kissing it as he brought up his free hand to hold it there. He waited there for a moment, drawing another long breath against Yuri's skin, "...The high cost of needing to know."

"And now we do, and we'll be better off for it."

"Yeah..."

"Mom said the first year of marriage is the hardest. We're still two months out from the anniversary of our eloping to Barcelona." Yuri continued, nosing his husband's forehead and a few strands of silver bangs, "So while I hope the worst is finally behind us, we still have room for a few troubles. We can get it all out of the way before we go on our German vacation in the summer."

Viktor smiled at that, "There's so much stuff I want to see and do, all the beer I want to try..."

"Only three competitions to go."

"Only three, and a second wedding."

"Exactly."
The 'Flight of the Nikiforovs' was still hours from starting when the second half of Clan Hasetsu started making their way to the airport. The winter morning was still dark when Mikhail rose to begin the difficult task of waking everyone up despite having only just gone to bed 6 hours prior. First though, he had to wake himself up, and that was half the battle.

7am... He thought grudgingly, turning off the vibrating alarm on his watch. The room was pitch black without the glow from his wrist, but Mikhail knew his way around well enough. His first wake-up victim was Minako, sleeping soundly just inches away, but he spared her the imminent moment for the time being. Carefully, he slipped out of bed, found the fleece bathrobe hanging on the back of the door, and quietly made his way through the door.

Proximity to the front door made the square hall between the bedroom and the kitchen a lot colder than the rest of the space, but Mikhail passed through it quickly, keeping the robe close to his pale skin. The olive-green door that lead into the room with the three teens was still closed, making it easy to flick on the bathroom light in the kitchen without bothering them. Within a few minutes though, coffee was being made, and five mugs were set out on the counter, so he returned to the dark bedroom to begin the dreaded 'wakening.'

"Starlight," He whispered, sitting on the edge of the bed on Minako's side. One hand went forward to stroke her hair, and nudged a shoulder, "Hey, time to get up."

"I don't wanna..." She mumbled, rolling slightly onto her side to 'escape' the threat of consciousness. She clenched her eyes shut as she felt the weight next to her shift a little, with another heavy spot manifesting in front of her. One eye cracked open and she spotted the dark outline of an arm that had reached over her waist, and the hand at the end of it that had planted itself in the blankets.

Mikhail leaned over her, and his free hand came against her back to stroke slowly, "C'moooooonnnn..." He teasingly pleaded, lowering down to kiss her upturned shoulder, "Coffee's almost ready."

"Trying to bribe me already..."

"To tempt you. Come...join me in caffeinated bliss."

Minako huffed a few quiet laughs, but finally turned onto her back enough to look up at the man. She loosely curled her fingers around his forearm, "What time is it even?"

"Morning o'clock. Dark-early time. That evil hour..."

"Yikes, is it before 6?"

"Nah..." He shook his head, "It's about 7:15."

Minako couldn't help but yawn and shake her head, "Glad we cut out from the Banquet when we did... Any later and we would've slept through our flight."

"It won't be like this again; I promise." Mikhail assured, going quiet for a moment as he looked on at his lady love, almost studying her. Her odd expression wasn't lost on him.

Chapter 531
"I feel a bit like a bug under glass suddenly," She commented quietly, eyes adjusting to the dim lighting so she could see the man's expression, "What's up...?"

"How are you feeling?" He asked instead of answering, pulling his left hand back from where it had been pressed into the blankets by Minako's waist. It came to rest on her stomach over the comforter, "...I know you're not the biggest fan of this turn of events. I'm...trying to temper the excesses of my excitement, so I'll just...casually check in with you from time to time, if that's okay."

Minako's confused expression morphed to disgruntled concern, and she pushed up onto both elbows, "I hate that you think you have to ask permission to ask me how I feel." She grumbled, "Of all the people, you should be able to just ask..."

"Can I though?" He asked pointedly, "Our first appointment is Friday. I've been told that, despite absolutely everything else, it didn't really become real for some ladies until they heard that heartbeat."

Brows raised, and Minako pursed her lips slightly, "...A lot of ladies, huh."

Mikhail managed an uneasy laugh, but he lifted both hands defensively, "Easy, easy...I took parenting classes the first time around. I wasn't the only student. Worked with a doula and everything."

"A what...?"

"Doula. It's like...a midwife. It's Greek for 'women's servant' though, so you can take your pick which meaning you like better."

Minako just gawked, "...I prefer neither." She huffed and flopped back down, closing her eyes for a moment before opening them again to stare at the ceiling, then back at the man still watching her, "You've been pretty quiet about this all weekend. Are you feeling sentimental or is something about to happen that I won't like?"

Mikhail deadpanned, eyebrows going up, "...How do you find out about these things?"

"You're projecting." She grumbled in answer, grabbing his nearest shoulder to help pull herself up to sitting, "What hair-brained thing are you about to do?"

"Expensive chores." He explained with a vague sigh. His arm went around her frame again, but this time as just a hug, "We have a layover in Moscow. I need to go to St. Petersburg."

"...Why?"

"Viktor's old house. I'm responsible for the remains."

"You can't let someone else deal with it?"

"If it were any other house, in any other part of the world, sure...but I feel like I owe it to this one to put my own eyeballs on the rubble."

Minako leaned into the hug and raised her arms over the man's shoulders, "How long are you going to take? We haven't even told anyone about the fact that Asahi left. I'm sure everyone's going to be up in arms about it, one way or another. They'll want you around. I'll want you around; we were helping him together."

"Just a day." He answered easily, "I'll be there by dinnertime on Wednesday."
"I wish you'd ask before you just do stuff like this. ...But, I imagine Viktor gets it from you. Still."

"I'm worried that if I leave it any longer than it's already been, I'll start racking up fines, or the city will bulldoze what's left and send me an enormous bill."

Minako huffed a sad laugh and pulled back again, pressing her palm to one cheek before patting it, "I love you, but sometimes it's annoying that you have an answer to everything."

"An answer to everything, except the question I asked you earlier." He retorted, "Set my mind at ease... If you don't think you can manage on your own, I'll forget the whole thing."

"No...no, it's fine." Minako insisted, waving a hand dismissively, "So long as you do only take a day. I don't want to have to throw Yuri into a suitcase so I can bail you out."

Mikhail just guffawed and made a sarcastic gesture at himself, "I'm shocked; you make it sound like you think I'll end up in prison if I go back."

"You better not have your nephew's knack for prophecy." The ballerina warned dryly as she scooted around him to get to the foot of the bed, "I've heard the stories."

Watching her rise up to stand, Mikhail pressed a hand down to push himself up as well. He followed quickly behind, held up her fleece robe, and stepped out in front of her as he pulled the ties around to loop them for her, "Minako..."

"I'm okay." She finally answered, "But please don't take more than that one day. Yuri finally feels like he's a part of our merry little band, and your girls need you. I'm only 50% of this partnership, and 50% by any measure is a failing grade."

"You're doing much better than you think. But...I promise. Only one day. I'll keep you abreast of everything I learn."

"I'll do the same."

Mikhail could feel eyeballs on him, as though being watched by a pride of hungry lions...lead by a tiger. The wait at Sheremetyevo had suddenly become rather complicated, given how the teens hadn't quite 'approved' of their father's announced departure. Viktoria kept her proverbial vice-grip on the flat-cap.

"It's only one day." The elder repeated, "You'll hardly even notice I'm gone."

All three raised brows and glanced at one another, then back at him skeptically.

"...Okay, maybe you'll notice a little bit." Mikhail said, scrunching his shoulders up, "It's just one day. I'll be on a red-eye flight to Japan overnight."

"Explain one more time why you have to do this?" Yurio questioned, "You have that hub of your company in St. Petersburg that kept Viktor's car until you shipped it to Hasetsu. Just let them deal with Viktor's old house."

"It's the principle of the thing, Yuri." He answered, looking across the aisle to the seats opposite him and Minako, "Sometimes you have to go yourself."

"It's just a house though..."
"It's the site of a hate crime." Mikhail corrected, "That house didn't burn down because of faulty wiring."

"But what can you do about it?" Nikki wondered, sitting in the middle of the older two, "It's not like someone's going to walk up to you in the street and volunteer a confession."

"I'm not looking to figure out who did it. As far as I'm concerned, it was Russia at large. Once I sort out that house, I'll be putting plans into motion to move operations to Moscow. I only set-up shop in St. Petersburg because of Viktor anyway." The elder shrugged, "He's never going back, so I have nothing to go there for either."

"What about to see Kon?" The youngest retorted, putting her father to stunned silence for a moment.

"Well...ehm..." He stammered, "I mean... He doesn't exactly make it easy to just drop in. He lives 2 hours away from the nearest major city...and since he basically disowned Viktor, there's not really much reason for even me to go out there. A big part of why I kept going back after my sister died was because she had hoped us three idiots could reconcile, and I was trying to make that happen. There's no point in trying anymore, now that the bridge between Kon and Viktor's been burned."

"Oh..." Nikki sank a little.

"Aeroflot-Russian Airlines flight 38 to St. Petersburg is now boarding..." The announcer called with a heavy Russian accent, repeating in Russian soon after and again in English.

Mikhail looked up as he heard it, and rose up from his seat, "That one's mine. I better go."

The three teens and one fiancé stood up as well, with each one coming in close for their parting hug, even Yurio. Minako came in last, getting her longer hug and quick kiss, "Be careful, hun." She said quietly, "I'll come meet you in Fukuoka when you're on your way back."

"Alright." He agreed, and reluctantly pulled back to turn back to the gaggle of teens again, "Vikki, you're second in command. Please help Minako if she needs it." He asked, getting a nod from her. He breathed a loud sigh and bowed his head, "Sorry again everyone. I'll make up for it when I'm back with you in Hasetsu. Be safe until we meet again."

The group turned as Mikhail started padding slowly away, disappearing down the terminal's long departure hall. Yurio turned to look back at Minako though, "Was there any other reason he told you for why he wanted to stay here an extra day?"

"No." She answered simply, looking rather serious all of a sudden, eyes still following the terminal like she could somehow still see the man, "But there are a lot of things he could find along the way. As long as he gets on that plane like he said he would...and doesn't fall off a damn roof again."

Nikki managed a giggle at that, "You're never going to let him live that one down, are you?"

Minako tried to smile as she turned towards the trio, and moved to sit them all back down again for the remaining 30 odd minutes of their layover, "Someone has to be there to chronicle all the dumb things your father does. I have a feeling no one else has."

"I could give a list a mile long." Yurio pointed out, only to get a sarcastic pat on the head.

"A list of grievances isn't the same as a list of dumb things he's done." Minako corrected, "He's doing his best as he juggles all these different things that have come up, and all the people who've arrived in his life. I think we can forgive him the times he's messed up; he's still learning. We all are."
"I can't wait to get back to Yu-Topia." Nikki said, trying to veer the conversation in a more positive direction, "Sitting in that hot-spring after all this travel...and getting to see Mama Katsuki again, too!"

"Ah, yeah...she'll be happy to see us all back."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY TWO

Ever the predictable one, Mikhail saddled-up in his favorite rental car - a blue Prius - and headed out into the early St. Petersburg afternoon. No luggage weighed him down, but there was a light snow starting to fall from the city's grey sky. Stopped at an intersection in the middle of the city, Mikhail leaned over the wheel to look up, and shook his head.

_Hopefully this doesn't get any worse before tonight. I'd hate to have my promise broken by the damn weather._

It took nearly 45 minutes to get through the city to Viktor's old home-district, and cut through some narrow back-streets to find the way away from other drivers. If Russia was ever known for anything in the world - other than for the KGB and that one time a nuclear power-plant exploded and poisoned half the planet - it was for its notoriously bad roads and terrible drivers...and the dash-cam footage to prove it to everyone.

When he finally arrived at the site though, it was a bit peculiar. For one, Mikhail couldn't even see the house - he expected that - but a strange little crowd had gathered at the site of it. The wrought-iron fence was still standing, acting as a good barrier to keep people out, but it wouldn't be long before the heavy equipment that was standing by would knock all of it down. Parked in the skating legend's former driveway was a massive metal bin for all the burnt remains.

Mikhail parked a little ways down the street and walked up, getting a good look at a number of faces before stepping too close. One of those faces, hidden in the cab of one of the equipment delivery trucks, was a familiar sight. Mikhail crossed the street, climbed up on the far side of the cab, and gave the glass a few quick taps, his eyes barely coming up over the edge of the door.

"...Boss?"

"Unlock the door for a sec, would you?"

The man inside clambered over the center console and flicked the lock-pin up, grabbed the inside handle, and pushed the whole panel out.

Mikhail stayed on the foothold outside but held the door open with one arm, "Hey Benson...hope you haven't been sitting around too long." He said, leaning forward to rest an elbow on the passenger seat, "You're not stalling because of the crowd, are you?"

"Nah," The man shook his head, "I need Lopez out here with the excavator to start. Have to rip the fence up so we can get the rubble out. What are you doing out this way? Thought you'd be flying back to Japan by now."

"Felt like I owed it to my nephew to look at the place before reducing it to a vacant lot." The silver answered, "What's the ETA on the excavator?"

Benson looked at his watch, "About 10 minutes ago."

"...Figures." Mikhail shook his head, "Alright, I'm gonna walk around." He said, getting ready to hop down again, only to pause, "All the permits were given, right? No trouble there from City Hall?"

"Nope, it's all done. Paperwork is in the glove-box if you want it."
"Nah. I left you in charge for a reason." He laughed and closed the door, straightening out his black long-coat before going around the cab to cross the street again.

The iron gate that lead up the yard was partly hanging off its hinges, and as Mikhail made his way through the onlookers with their smart-phones, the damage came more and more into view. When he stood in the entrance, the sad, charred husk of the house was easy to see, even if difficult to look at. Two more steps forward, and people were starting to wonder who he thought he was, while others tried to follow, as though the prospect of wandering through the corpse of that once-home could be fun.

Mikhail twisted on a heel though on the snow-laced concrete walkway and shot the followers a look, [Stay behind the fence. It's not safe in here.]

[...Who the Hell are you? Some city inspector?] One of the men asked.

[Worse.] He answered, [I'm the guy who owns this pile.]

[Viktor?] Someone else asked; a woman's voice this time, older and motherly-sounding.

Mikhail turned his eyes and spotted a plump elderly lady approach the fence from the other side, donning a flowery parka and a scarf around her weathered head; she looked every part the legendary Russian babushka. He stepped over the crunchy winter snow towards her, but kept a small distance inside. The older woman put one hand around one of the bars, looking something like a prisoner from her side of the fence.

[No...you're not Viktor...]

[I'm his uncle.] He explained, [He sold me his house last year when he moved away.]

[He's been gone such a long time now... The neighborhood's changed since he left. How's he doing? Is he safe?] Mikhail was a bit surprised by her concern, and stepped a bit closer to the fence, [He's doing really well actually. He lives out in Japan now.]

[Oh, with that student of his?] The babushka asked, [They weren't here that long. I did warn Viktor that he can't throw his warm-weather friends into the middle of a Russian winter. It needs working-up to.]

He never told them, Mikhail thought, feeling a bit of a twinge in his gut, but he feigned a smile, [Yeah, they decided to go back. It was getting crowded here. They have the ice almost all to themselves now. They're both going to the Olympics next month.]

[That's so good to hear. Viktor will win Gold for Russia again, I'm sure of it. He always does.] [...Yeah...] He nodded weakly, and slowly turned away as the babushka took her hand back from the fence. He stepped up closer to the rubble pile and scanned every inch of the exposed structure, burnt as it was, but even there in the middle of it, he could hardly believe it. He shook his head and pulled out his phone, getting some photos where he could as the snow continued gently falling all around.

"Boss!" Benson hollered, catching his attention.

Mikhail glanced back and spotted the next big hauler, carrying the excavator needed to get things started. As the truck's huge brakes screeched and slowed down, Mikhail stepped in front of the gathered crowd, [Everyone, please be sure to stay back. The rubble will send up dust, and we have to rip out the fence just to get in here.]

Within about 30 minutes of the last hauler's arrival, the excavator was on the street, and welders had clipped the iron bars into segments. The big, toothy bucket at the end of the excavator's arm was lifted over the wrought iron. Mikhail stood back and watched sadly as the first tug bent and twisted the barrier, making a terrible noise as it was warped out of its original position. The concrete bases were torn right out of the frozen ground, too, and the whole front segment peeled away. It sounded even worse as big chunks were getting dropped into the dumpster nearby. Mikhail breathed a foggy sigh into the early afternoon breeze and slipped into the cabin of the nearby truck again.

He rubbed his ears a bit to warm them up before pulling his phone out again to send his promised update to Minako. Thumbs were tippy-tappying as the hollow noise of the operation went on outside.

'Things look like they're pretty wrapped up here,' He wrote, 'Maybe I should've just sold the house instead of keeping it around in case anyone wanted to come out this way for a visit. Oh well.'

He lifted his eyes from the bright little screen and looked out again across the street. The excavator was moving into the yard now, reaching its long arm to start pulling charcoal away from where the garage once stood. Cars that had cued behind the heavy machinery were starting to filter through; jade eyes caught sight of a black Mercedes sedan. It was just one of millions that poured into Russia after the fall of the USSR, but this one made Mikhail keep looking for some reason. He watched it until the hood disappeared beyond the rim of the driver's side window, and turned his glance back down to his phone, hitting 'send' before hopping out of the cabin again.

Shoes crunched on the snow-caked sidewalk, and the elder stepped out in front of the truck, waiting there between the grill and the back of another work-truck as the clean-up continued ahead of him. The crowd that had gathered was staying a reasonable distance away, but with the excavator being far less exciting to watch than they'd hoped, many started peeling off to walk back home. Mikhail spotted the babushka from earlier; she, too, was starting to move on, walking alongside two young boys, presumabley her grandsons.

For a split second, Mikhail let himself believe that the sight of them meant that not all bad happened in Russia...but then a darkness came into his peripheries, and all thoughts of peace were gone.

"What are you doing here...?"

Confused and shocked, Mikhail shook his head and blinked hard a few times, but there was no denying the fact that Yakov was standing there, "What am I doing here...?" He echoed, looking around at all the equipment with 'Rozovsky' written on it, then back again, "What are you doing here?"

"Going home."

"This is a bit out of the way for going home."

"You don't know where I live."

"No, but unless you live around the corner from here, this way is out of the way." Mikhail shot back, stuffing his hands and phone into his pockets, "I'm cleaning up a mess. You just..." He started, getting a stern look back from the coach, "...Look like someone attending the funeral of a guy you murdered, just to see everyone else's reactions."

"That something you're familiar with?" Yakov retorted with a grunt, "Attending funerals of people you've killed? Just to see their reactions?"

Mikhail sighed loudly and turned around, facing the pile across the street again, "Even though we're close to the same age, I always feel somehow like you're my father, scolding me for something that takes too much effort to argue against."

"You saying I wear you out?" Yakov wondered, taking a step next to the man to watch the scene unfold from that safe distance, "I'm surprised to see you here, in any case. You didn't need to come all the way here just to watch some burnt wood get dropped into a dumpster. Why are you really here?"

Hesitating, Mikhail shifted his weight from one foot to another, but kept his eyes forward, "I had thought about storming the ROC Headquarters in Moscow to give them a piece of my mind, but considering how utterly terrified Yuri is that he's going to get thrown off the Olympic Team because of me, I thought better of it. Instead, I took a plane here to avoid giving in to temptation." He explained, "I'm hoping that by refusing to let Yuri come back here to train before the Games, he'll be kept far away from whatever insane bullshit those morons are trying to force on the athletes."

"Say that in a tone any more accusing than you already did and I might think you suspect I'm in on it, too." Yakov huffed, giving a stare from under the brim of his hat, "I'm not. But those goons that came to Euros are trying to use me as cover."

"...Cover?" Mikhail echoed, looking back at the shorter man, "How? Why?"

"Making everyone come to St. Petersburg to 'train' at my rink for a few weeks before the Games start. I have the best track-record of all Russian skating coaches; more of my athletes have stood on the podium than all the others. They think that if everyone comes to train with me for a while, it'll somehow lessen the suspicion if all the skaters do really well." Yakov explained grimly, "I think it's idiotic, but really, coming out of this place, what can you expect? When the Soviet Union collapsed, it's not like Russia was rebuilt with a pantheon of fresh new faces. It was mostly the same people, with a new coat of paint, and some new letters on the buildings...minus a few countries. They still had all the same flaws that they did in the first place though, putting yes-men into positions of authority while actual professionals were merely consulted on the side. I'm one of those professionals. Those goons in Vienna were the yes-men."

"So you're saying they fully intend to make the competitors cheat somehow, despite how much trouble Russia's been in before for that exact thing?" Mikhail was surprised, yet not, "Unbelievable."

"Something's going to happen." Yakov added, "I can feel it. An ill omen. It's going to be bigger than Viktor being thrown out of the RSF when it happens."

"What, like Russia being thrown out of the Olympics altogether?"

"The ROC was put on probation in early December, in the middle of the Grand Prix, pending an investigation." The coach explained, "But it's all been kept on the down-low so far. The IOC is spineless...most of what it does is going to be for show, and it won't have any teeth. But...mark my words; when the IOC makes its move, it's going to seem like a big deal. Be ready when it happens...Yuri being in Japan isn't going to help."

Jiro snoozed soundly in the nook of space between Yuri's curved frame and the arm-rest of the big, booth-like seat. With the chair reclined half of its full way down, Yuri opted to lay down on his side, back to the window-wall, one elbow on a pillow as that hand held up his head, the other resting on the Akita's soft back. The cables to Yuri's earbuds connected to the console between the two seats, and a movie played on the wide flat-panel ahead of him. In the next seat over, restless as he'd been the night before, Viktor tried to sleep, though it seemed like he rolled over every other minute. Half an hour had gone by that way. Viktor rolled onto his side again, back to the center divider as he gave out an obviously-annoyed sigh. Yuri looked over quietly, but then pulled out one of the ear-buds to let the cable dangle, and reached across, putting his hand over the curve of his husband's waist.

"Can't sleep?" He asked quietly, giving a few soft pets.

Viktor twisted slightly so he could look back, and lifted the eye-mask with his thumb to look out tiredly, "...I can't get comfortable." He grumbled, letting the mask smack back into the place as he dropped his head down to his pillow again.

"Weird. You normally just pass out, comfortable or not."

"I know...this is frustrating...and I'm super tired, too..."

"Is it because it feels like you're sleeping alone...?" Yuri wondered, starting to look around their arrangement for ideas, "These seats are a lot narrower than some we've flown in...we both wouldn't fit into one..."

"Yeah." Viktor grumbled more. He went limp in another attempt to make do, paying little attention to the noise going on all around. The constant hiss of the plane's engines, the clatter of cups being lifted and set back down by other passengers, even the far-off crying of a child in Economy Class. The crying bothered him the most, even though it was the quietest of all the sounds he could hear, and he roughly tried to fold his pillow around his head to block it out.

"Why don't you try listening to something?" Yuri wondered, seeing the man's frustration.

"...If I'm on my side, the bud squished into the pillow makes my ear hurt." He answered, pillow still wrapped around him uselessly. He let the one side go, and it folded outward into its normal state again.

"Lay on your back,"

Viktor lifted his head and the mask again, but gave a weird look, "Why?"

"Because then the ear-buds won't hurt." Yuri retorted, offering the white cables attached to his phone, "If I can get you to fall asleep quick then you won't care whether you're on your back or on your side. Maybe you can keep dreaming about the alternate origins story you invented for us."

Confused, the Russian grudgingly twisted onto his back, and fumbled his hands into the empty space ahead of himself until he could feel the soft rubber-coated wires. With the mask straightened and buds in his ears, he drew a long breath and waited.

"Non-Eternal' - Max Richter"

Ethereal, ghostly sounds started to sound in his ears, making his mind feel as though it were being swayed in the gentle roll of warm waves. A haunting voice hummed in from the distance, melting into the harmony. The sound of the airplane vanished entirely, even the overbearing hiss of the plane itself. Viktor exhaled and felt himself relaxing, brow furrowed under the mask like it was somehow a shame that he wanted to sleep. He could feel the soft rustle of the blanket over his legs being straightened out, halting the progression of a few cold-spots that had emerged from his turning, but he then felt a hot press of fingers against the skin of his abdomen.
Yuri slid his arm under the blanket and the shirt, offering what soothing touch he could before lying on his own pillow where he'd set it across the center console, and set his head down onto his husband's chest. Jiro moved a bit to sort out his own sleeping-spot again with all the movement going on, but eventually settled, propped up against his human's front, and closed his eyes. Yuri watched the pup for a moment, but then looked 'up' again, feeling Viktor's one free hand come up from the far side to rest on top of his own where it was still under the blanket. It held on for a little while, even through the fleece, but slowly it slackened. Yuri could hear that his partner's heartbeat had slowed, and his body seemed more like a lump than a tense ball of nerves. When he felt the man's head tilt slightly behind him, he knew Viktor had finally drifted off, and pulled his hand out from under the blanket to hold onto the fingers that once sought for it.

You're stressing yourself out needlessly... Yuri thought, slowly stroking his thumb over his husband's fingers, Try not to... There's so many more important things to worry about than how quickly you can get Asahi to leave...

With the worksite clean-up well underway, Mikhail found himself with less to do than he thought.
He checked his watch, saw that it was barely 2:30pm, and huffed an impatient sigh. Yakov had left a while ago; the suspicious black Mercedes had vanished with him. With nothing else to manage, Mikhail waved at his crew-boss and went back to his car.

Why are you really here?

St. Petersburg was replaced by woods and wilderness. Roads became more treacherous, but at least it wasn't snowing north of the city. The sky was still bright, and despite all the madness of what had been going on, Russia's uninhabited places still felt peaceful, even if they protected hidden dangers.

It was just about 5:20pm then. The sun was getting low in the dark-blue winter sky. Familiar breaks in the woods lead the way, and before the sun completely vanished, the little blue Prius pulled up at the bottom of a certain hill.

As Mikhail got out, he looked around the area. It looked like there hadn't been a soul around for days; even the little village with its one tavern looked abandoned.

I wonder if everyone packed up and left with the mill closure? Most people would stay because this is the land their ancestors settled on...but maybe these folks aren't so attached.

Eyes went up the hill and to the left to spot the graveyard, and its one angel statue close to the center.
Mikhail frowned sadly at it, and started to make his way up the worn path. There hadn't been a fresh snowfall in a few days at least, making the walkway easy to navigate, but that didn't make it any warmer. Dress-shoes weren't made for frolicking in the country.

BANG BANG BANG

Mikhail stepped back a pace or two to avoid snow falling on him from pounding on the door.
Seconds passed without an answer, sound, or whisper. The silver looked around skeptically, "Kon!"
He called out, "Ty ignoriruēš to, čto ja govorju?" [Are you ignoring me?] He asked, stepping back again to look at the house more broadly. He could hear a dog barking, but nothing else, "Otkroj dver' i vyjdi ot tuda!" [Open the door and come out here!]

Still nothing. Mikhail shook his head and sighed impatiently, and went instead for the barn next to the dwelling. The big black truck was parked at the bottom of the hill, but that never stopped anyone from taking a horse out. He stepped up to the big door and pulled it open, half-expecting the place to be empty...but there within was the statue-like form of a behemoth black draft-horse.

"What in the Hell is going on...?" Mikhail asked himself, stepping inside. He came up to the edge of the animal's stall, content at least to see the beast still on its feet, but when he looked over the big wooden wall, he could see that there was no feed and the water was frozen. The horse barely moved, lifting its head slightly, but was clearly too cold to do much of anything, never mind break the stall down to go after the hay above, "Damnit, Kon...where the shit are you?" He asked grimly, looking around for anything at all that he could use to warm the barn up. He could still hear a dog's bark, but it wasn't getting any closer, so he ignored it for the moment. He found a massive horse-blanket and pulled it down from where it had been hung, and stepped into the stall to toss it over the animal's back as well as he could. With some effort and persistence, the blanket was tied into place, and several squares of hay were forked down from the storage space in the loft. With the horse showing interest, Mikhail pat the animal's massive neck, "I'll go warm some water for you. Just stay here and eat your fill. I'll find out where your idiot went."

Leaving the barn, Mikhail went back to the house and banged on the door even harder, knocking some snow loose from the roof. It fell all around him, but still, nothing inside stirred. The door was locked, as one could expect. The silver stepped into the deep old snow and went for a nearby window, not even bothering to look inside, seeing the curtains were pulled closed before he got there. Fingers fumbled around under the sill until he found a hidden key, and he went back, unlocking the door and forcing it open with a bang of his shoulder.

It was freezing cold inside.

Eyes went to the stove-heater, but found that it had been out for some time. Attention switched quickly as scuttling and a whine replaced the bark from before, and a shaggy Rottweiler-point Caucasian Shepherd came nervously out of the kitchen. Her tail swooshed across the floor like a duster, but was kept low as she crawled closer, unsure and nervous.

"What happened here? Where's Kon?" Mikhail asked naïvely, as though the dog could answer. He offered the pup some affection before turning his attention to the household again. Cupboards were open and there was a mess; the canine had clearly done what she had to to survive, finding bits of raw food here and there. A worried pit sank deep in the man's gut, but he pressed on, rounding the corner through the livingroom, past the bear's giant reclining chair, and looked to the main bedroom door. He swallowed a painful lump in his throat and stepped forward, the Shepherd at his heels, anxious as he was, "Kon?" He asked warily, "Ty v porjadke?" [Are you okay?]

The door was freezing cold to the touch, but he opened it anyway, turning the brass knob. He was completely horrified to hear the cracking and breaking of ice from the inside of the wooden frame, and backed off a little as little crisps of it fell to the floor. The room was even colder than the rest of the house somehow; as cold as the outdoors. When Mikhail looked up, the first thing he saw was the open window, and the frost-licked curtains that hung beside it. The next thing he saw was a massive figure on the bed. Shadows obscured most of the form, but there was enough light still to make out an arm and half a frostbitten face.

Prizrak whined again, practically squished up against Mikhail's leg as he looked on in muted horror. For a minute, he could only stand and look, unable to blink, let alone move. When it was clear that what he saw wasn't a dream or a mistake, he made himself take a step closer. He sat on the far side of the bed, farthest away from the big man in it, and just stared at the bottom of the wall.

"...When I said that one day, I'd come here and find you frozen...it wasn't meant as a damn suggestion..." He said bitterly. He didn't expect an answer, but the lack of one still hurt...and all he could do to stop from yelling was to lean over his knees, and press his face into the palms of his hands.
Without wanting to disturb the house more than he had to, Mikhail took Prizrak out to his car and put the pup inside where it was warm. He returned a moment later with a steel bowl of kibble from the barn, and a second bowl meant for water soon after. Inside the tomb-like house, the pipes had frozen and no water came through, forcing Mikhail to restart the antique wood-burning stove-furnace. With a big pot sitting on top and a huge chunk of snow in it, he stoked the fire until it roared inside and the door could be closed to heat up.

Mikhail had closed the door to the bedroom, but his eyes were on it as he sat back on the couch. With nothing to do but wait for officials from the nearby town to show up, he surveyed the scene and put his mind to task doing the one thing he was at least somewhat good at...figuring out how things work.

He was in bed with the window wide open in the middle of January...with the door closed, and the dog stuck in the main area. The horse was in its stall, brushed and well cared for, save the fact that it was slowly freezing to death there, no food in reach, no liquid water. ...But aside from how disturbing the whole thing is on its face...it can't have been for more than a few days. Viktor and Yuri were just here.

Jade eyes looked around the big C-shaped living space, with the kitchen on the far side, curving towards the dining area, doorway, through the living-room and back towards the bedrooms. The master bedroom where Kon had been was at the very back of the house, with Viktor's childhood room just off to the side of it, with the bathroom separating the two, and the kitchen walls up against them in turn. In spite of the mess the Shepherd had made trying to find food while trapped, there wasn't a lot of waste to be spoken of on the floor. It was too cold inside for there to be much of a smell; the musty scent of Kon's house was always a bit barn-like anyway, to Mikhail's nose.

Kon was many things, but an abuser of animals was never one of them. They were probably the only living beings he could ever call friends of his, especially after Tat died. He took better care of them than he did himself.

He pushed up to stand again and walked over to the wood-fire stove to check on the progress of his snow-melt; there was a trickle at the bottom of the pot, but still had a long way to go. Mikhail moved back to the master bedroom then, grabbed the knob, and paused, shaking his head in resignation before pushing in again. He looked at the morbid mound on the bed, covered by yet another blanket, then turned to the window. He dared not touch it, but leaned in close to inspect what he could, looking for damage.

I can't tell just by looking at it if it's too damaged to stay closed on its own...

Grumbling, he pulled his hands out of his coat pockets and just did what he had to, the rest be damned.

The politsiya aren't going to put so much effort into this that they dust the window for prints. Who am I kidding? People freeze to death in the woods all the time.

Testing the window for proper latching and a good seal around the edges, Mikhail could find nothing specifically wrong with it, and could only surmise that it had been opened on purpose.
Would Kon really be so ready to join Tat that he'd sabotage his own chances of survival by letting himself freeze to death? Even knowing his animals would be left to die from the elements and neglect...? No... I can't believe that about him... He would’ve arranged for someone to stop by on a planned visit, and be dead before they get here, but he had no one to call except me...and he didn't.

He eyeballed the covered body, brow furrowed in worry.

Did something happen to you...? Viktor didn't say you were off at all... Would he have even noticed though?

Mikhail flicked his arm to see his watch, and spotted 6:55pm on its face. He looked around the room one more time in case something stood out, but it was all as normal as it had ever looked. A few things on the long solid-wood dresser were clearly Tatiyana's, like a silver comb and a little jewelry box, but Mikhail wasn't ready to disturb more than one ghost that day, and let it all be.

Moving back out into the main room, a thin steam was rising up from the pot, and half the snow had been melted into water. A canister with more snow was dumped in on top of what was there, and Mikhail made his way back outside to get another scoop from the ground. He looked down the hill towards his Prius and the dog inside, then up and through the trees as he saw headlights coming through them, getting closer.

Looks like two...three cars...?

He reached down to get the scoop of snow and went back inside, stirring the half-frosty slurry to help melt it faster. Within a few minutes, the snow was warm water, and Mikhail carefully poured some of it from the pot to the same canister he'd carried snow in, and went for the door again. As he stepped outside, the first group of politsiya were coming up the hill, using big flashlights to figure out their way up the path.

[Are you the one who called in the death?] One of the officers asked, shining the light at Mikhail, putting a massive black shadow of him against the barn.

Mikhail squinted, "Da." He answered, [Master bedroom. Where's the groom?]

[Coming. You said the horse was huge so he's got to get the big trailer.]

The silver nodded, [Go on inside. This water's for the horse. I've got the dog in my car.] He said, turning and heading the way he'd meant to go. He could hear the men sounding off orders at one another as they went to the front door, and let themselves in. Going inside the bard, the horse had already eaten everything that had been put in front of it, ready for more, but first thing's first. Mikhail let himself into the stall and kicked over the rubber bucket, breaking out the ice before replacing it with the heated water. That was gone in a flash, too, with Čužak nearly knocking the whole thing over in a bid to drink too quickly. Mikhail narrowly avoided getting splashed, and ran his hand down the behemoth's withers, back, and hindquarters as he went around it to leave without being kicked. More hay was forked down from the loft, and the silver made his way back to the house.

The half-dozen officers who had responded to the scene were swarmed all over the hill, checking all the same things Mikhail already had; looking for signs of an accident, or a note being left behind...anything to indicate why there was a corpse inside. Mikhail just went by them to the pot, and poured more into the canister to take to Prizrak.

[So how long ago did you get here?] One of the politsiya asked, watching him pour the snow-melt.
[Just over an hour ago.] Mikhail answered, keeping his eyes down on his task, [I was passing through St. Petersburg on business before heading home, and thought I'd come by to see him before my plane departs.]

[Ah, so he wasn't expecting you.]

[No. Kon's usually outside anyway. It would've been pretty pointless to call ahead. He doesn't have an answering machine.]

[When was the last time you heard from him?]

[About a week ago. His son was here visiting and they called me.] He answered, putting the pot back as the canister was full enough for one dog, [There was nothing unusual about what was said or the mood. Nothing to suggest anything was wrong.] He explained, heading back towards the door, [I'm going to water the dog.]

[Sir,] The officer interrupted, stepping closer and rifling around in his pockets, [Would you mind if I got your details first?]

Hesitating a moment, Mikhail shrugged ambivalently, [If you can walk and ask questions at the same time then just follow me down.]

Another hour or so passed before all the questions that could be thought of were asked, and the groom with the extra-large horse trailer arrived to pick up the destrier. Mikhail made sure to get every ounce of information about the man's stables before allowing anyone to enter the barn. His nerves about letting his eyes off the animal were put at ease when he saw how well Čužak tolerated a stranger leading him out.

Maybe he's just that happy to be out of the barn though...

The hollow thud of hooves echoed off the trailer ramp as the horse entered, and the gate was closed behind it. The groom came around the other side to head to the truck in front, but Mikhail hollered out to him one last time, [I'll be in the country for another six hours. If you need anything, call before then. That horse should want for nothing.]

[Everything's in order at least for the night, Mr. Rozovsky. We'll get the vet and farrier out tomorrow to take a look at 'im and let you know.] The thin, elderly man called back, long beard keeping his face warm as much as the ushanka-cap did his ears. He hopped into the passenger side of the truck, and the trailer was soon pulled out of site.

[What do you plan to do with the dog?] An officer asked, coming up beside the silver.

[...Not really sure, to be honest.] Mikhail answered, looking at the pup again as she watched him in turn, [My nephew's got a couple dogs that she's met. I'll figure something out.]

[We have an ambulance on the way if you want to go. There's nothing left for you to do here except watch.] The officer explained, [We'll have a coroner's report ready in a few days.]

[Just a few days?] Mikhail huffed, [I thought it would be weeks out here.]

[Any closer to spring and it would be. Dr. Legashov is leaving soon, heading to St. Petersburg like everyone else. Pretty soon, this whole region will be empty, except for the old ladies that won't go. This guy will probably one of the last that he takes care of before his office is closed.]

[...Yeah.] He nodded to the politsiya and started heading down the hill again, back to the Prius and his unexpected companion. He pulled the door open and slumped in, exhausted and half-frozen. By comparison, the inside of the car was pretty hot, making his joints hurt a little as they warmed back up again. He eyeballed the time on the dash; 8:12pm. Prizrak stuck her head between the two front seats curiously, and Mikhail offered a scratch to her noggin, "What am I going to do? All I really came here for was to talk to Kon about what really happened out here and now I have you."

She just whimpered at him anxiously.

Like zombies, shoes shuffled around the ground, but unlike zombies, the shoes were trailed by luggage and paw-pads. Makkachin barked excitedly and ran around the red Audi, parked in the covered driveway by the front door, while Yuri fumbled for the key. By the time it was in and turned, and the door was pushing inward, it seemed like everyone and their things were falling in rather than stepping.

"...We...we're so close..." Yuri whined pitifully, one outstretched hand reaching out from the people-pile, yearning for the interior.

"Are we...really home...?" Viktor asked, eyes closed like he was worried they'd still be in an airport if he opened them, "I'm scared to look...!"

Suitcases and carry-bags tumbled, but Makkachin jumped over the whole bunch of them and trotted around happily, nails clacking on the tile and hardwood as he went from one room to the next. Jiro was quick to go after him, halted only by the leash still hooked to his harness. He whined and looked back, and Yuri lazily pulled his hand free from the nylon loop so the Akita could run freely. With Jiro trotting off, Yuri finally managed the strength to push himself up and over to his back, splaying his arms out to the side as he stared at the hall light directly above him.

"We're...really here... After so long..."

Viktor was a tangle of arms, legs, a scarf, and the straps of one bag, but he eventually pulled himself out of the knot he'd made of himself and flopped to the floor on his side. He looked ready to fall asleep there in the hall. Instead, he just rested his eyes for a moment before pushing up to sit, pulled or shoved the last bits of luggage into the entryway, and nudged the door closed with his foot. That done, he dropped back down again, and stared up at the ceiling, too.

"My arms feel like lead weights..." Yuri complained, but laughed as well as he could at the absurdity of their situation, "I can hardly move..."

Viktor looked aside at him, managing a smile despite his exhaustion, "...I need...a shower..."

"Wait..." Yuri pleaded, lifting his arms just a few inches off the ground before they dropped again, which just made him sigh loudly, "I...need a hug...but I can't move..."

That earned a laugh, and Viktor did his best to roll over and drag himself across the foot or so of flooring before he let himself collapse again, this time with one arm slung far enough across his husband's frame that he could lay his head down on the man's chest.

Through the bundles of thick coat sleeves and scarves, Yuri managed to lift his arms up around the well-bundled mass that was his partner. He hummed happily as he held on, feeling Viktor's arms squish against his sides as well as they could to return the gesture. He kissed the crown of that silver head, "You're heavy." He teased, drawing those blue eyes up. It was easy to see that what little sleep Viktor had managed, it wasn't enough, but Yuri smiled anyway, "Let's forget the luggage for now "That...sounds perfect..." Viktor agreed easily, lowering down for an Eskimo kiss before he pushed himself up again, and offered his hands to help Yuri after him. Though it took some effort, and bumping into one wall as their balance faltered, they did eventually get up to their feet. They fed and watered their fuzzy sons before making their way to the stairs, looking up the long flight as though it went on forever.

Shoes were left on the ground floor, and coats came off after them, being discarded on the stairwell as they moved slowly upward. Gloves, Yuri's beanie, scarves, sweaters and undercoats, it was a path of tossed clothes to the second floor. Around the corner, and on the landing towards the bedroom door, went shirts, pants, undershirts, underpants, and just inside the bathroom door, socks were finally cast off. The hiss of water in the shower was a welcome sound, and just as it warmed up enough to be tolerable on their skin, they both shimmied in and sat side-by-side on the tiled ledge of the covered soaking tub. Yuri pulled the glass door shut behind them, and they both heaved a sigh of relief before laughing again, water spraying at them from the wall behind.

"I can't believe how tired we are."

Viktor nodded and twisted in place, "Don't ever let me suggest doing another trip like this right after 6 weeks of Grand Prix competitions."

"Next year will be easier. We know what went wrong and how to fix it." Yuri supposed, watching Viktor reach for the pump-bottle of shampoo. He expected the suds to later on Viktor's own head, but found those hands coming down on his, massaging the foamy liquid into his travel-matted black hair. Having no reason to complain, he just turned slightly and bowed his head down to make it easier to reach.

Viktor's mind went blank as he lathered the shampoo, simply giving in to his exhaustion, and wanting nothing more than the simple joy of washing his husband's hair. His arms hurt and felt heavy, but he pushed through, feeling their relief fading in with the warm rushing water over his skin. Black hair was almost completely lost under the white froth, and he reached for the hand-held shower-head to rinse it all away slowly. Conditioner came after, turning the mess of wet black frizz back into a silky smooth state. He ran his fingers through it, combing it back until it was away from Yuri's eyes again.

Instead of just turning around to switch positions though, Yuri gestured to the tile step at the base of their make-shift bench, and Viktor easily understood. He went down from the higher ledge and sat on the lower one, and Yuri sat behind him, knees bending down beside the back of his shoulders. Instead of going straight for the shampoo though, Yuri pressed his palms down on his partner's upper back, and slid them forward until he could knead his fingertips against the back of the man's neck and shoulders. He could feel the knots in that tense muscle, and worked gently to rub them out, slickening the skin with liquid soap, "Try to relax more...you're still really stiff."

"If I relax any more than I am now, I'll drop." Viktor mused, eyes closed and head bent down, elbows propped on his knees loosely, "You'll have a hard time waking me up again once I fall asleep here, and I'd rather not wake up in the bottom of the shower stall."

"I'll be there with you, don't worry." Yuri laughed, understanding the feeling all too well, continuing to work his fingers into that tense flesh. A few pressure points made Viktor wince, but a slower pace flattened them out until they didn't hurt anymore, and one last wide sweep let Yuri believe he'd found the worst offenders. Shampoo then came to the Russian's silver crown, frothing into a white lather before it all washed away. Conditioning his husband's hair was always Yuri's favorite part, as the slick silver strands moved like liquid platinum through his fingers as it rinsed out.
Viktor lifted his head up after a while and leaned back against the ledge between his partner's knees, using one hand to slick his hair back out of his eyes before opening them and looking up. He didn't have a chance to get a word in before he felt hands slide down over his shoulders to roam over his chest, and lips came down against the side of his neck. He just let himself relax a bit into that new space and let those hands go wherever they wanted. Those soft kisses moved as well, going from the crook of shoulder and neck to the edge of a collar-bone, then back up to just under an ear, then to nibble on the earlobe. Viktor pressed his hand through raven hair, water cascading all around them, steam fogging up the glass. With one snuffled breath against an unexpected rush of water, Viktor laughed, feeling it ticklish against his skin, and he turned to look at Yuri's stunned expression.

"...I think water got in my nose." He half-complained, laughing as he tried to clear it. Viktor had turned in place on that step though and had snaked an arm around behind him, resting back against his left knee.

"I'll forgive the break in your attention if you come back to it." Viktor offered, reaching a hand up to help guide his young partner down towards him again.

Yuri came easily, worrying less about the water and more about the kisses, closing his eyes as he found those lips press to his own. He could feel Viktor moving around in his embrace, until it was clear that the man had perched his knees on the step and was facing him. The stream of water from the showerhead was moved aside then, and Yuri wiped the trickle from his eyes so he could see, only to close them again as Viktor came up under him for another kiss. Hands moved all over him, sliding over his shoulders and down his chest, around and over his waist, then down his legs until they could go no further, and back up again. Thumbs traced over the inner part of his thighs as one hand stayed cupped over his right hip, and the other came up to press to his cheek, holding him in a long, deep kiss. He could feel the tingle of arousal manifesting. Viktor hummed into that last kiss, drawing a light suck on the end of his tongue before pulling back slightly to kiss the tip of his nose. He heard a pleasant huff of a laugh and opened his eyes again, seeing Viktor rise up to stand, offering hands to help him up.

"I guess I found my second wind." The Russian teased, "Hopefully you can indulge me?"

"You have to ask?" Yuri asked, taking those hands to let them help him up. Viktor pulled him closer, and away from the wall, back into the spray of the hot water. Those hands then slid around to his back, one going up as the other went down, moving soft as silk over every ridge and curve. Yuri moved his own over his husband's shoulders, holding on tight to that slick frame as those heated kisses returned...
Chapter 534

Author's Note: Gonna finish-out the sexy time sequence from last chapter. If you're not in the mood, skip to the dot.

CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY FOUR

Viktor wasted no time in his advances, one hand against Yuri's back to keep him near, the other roaming down against the man's backside, fingers sliding through the cleft as they came up again, then again as they slid down. There was no mistaking his needs, and he felt the whole area open up a bit as Yuri parted one leg away, perching a foot on the step beside them. Fingers explored further then, pressing and stroking every inch, palms grabbing and squeezing gently.

As the Russian went about his worship of Yuri’s frame, Yuri himself returned to the little traveling kisses against his husband's neck and shoulder, sneaking in under one ear and staying a while. The warm rush of water continued to cascade against him from above and behind, soaking his hair and leaving long wet tracks to travel down his figure. He kept his eyes closed for it, imagining the way every touch looked like as he felt hands move over him, until Viktor seemed to move around him much further than he had been to that point. He spotted one hand rummaging, "What are you looking for?"

"Sexy-shower-time fun-juice." Viktor answered with a laugh, turning bottles around in their shower-caddy until he found the one he wanted. With both arms still hugged around his spouse's thin frame, he squeezed a bit of the liquid into the palm of one hand, capped the bottle, and nudged the shower-head to spray slightly away from them. He pulled back slightly then, getting a better look at the younger man's face as he rubbed his hands together, seeing the rosy flush starting to creep across those pale cheeks. He smiled and leaned in again, nuzzling his husband's brow adoringly as he put his hands to task again, feeling hips press against his own eagerly. They both laughed a little into a new string of kisses, each of them exceptionally well aware of how aroused they were both becoming with every passing moment.

Yuri slowly pulled his hands back, gently sliding his fingers against the sides of his husband's neck as his palms moved softly over shoulders and collar-bones, down the front of the man's chest and felt every curve and contour. He felt one hand slide down the round of his backside, continuing down on his left side until Viktor was pulling that whole leg up and against one hip. The second hand stayed at the small of his back to help him keep his balance in that preciously slippery spot, hips sliding and pressing against each other. Yuri moved his own hands lower, pausing briefly to slide up again against Viktor's chest, then going down again and through the gaps between arms and ribs as they traveled around.

As a reward for Yuri's slowly-building bravery, Viktor gave an obvious push when hands slid down from his flanks to grab at his ample skater-bum. Lips curled into a smile through their continued kisses, "Mmh..." He mused, "Such a rare treat."

"I'm...still learning how to appreciate you physically." Yuri answered, somewhat embarrassed, "Of all the things we've done together, this is the one area my anxiety still has trouble with."
"It's always amused me that the one thing you still struggle to overcome is the one thing you like the most from me." Viktor teased, speaking the words to the corner's of his husband's mouth, nipping the tip of his chin as he moved back to look into those nervous eyes, "But...maybe it's a side-effect..." The words trailed as Viktor moved in for another deep kiss, briefly nibbling on his partner's lower lip before seeking for the man's tongue again. Yuri's frame clung tighter to his own as one slick finger pressed a bit harder than before and slipped inside, gently probing as every muscle around it seemed to clench in surprise. The leg that he'd perched against his hip grabbed a bit tighter, and hands went flat to his back to hold on. He hummed a laugh against his spouse's lips and cracked his eyes open a little, "I remember well how you jumped when I did this to you the first time, too."

"Is that all the same side-effect?" Yuri wondered, words broken up slightly by the little breathy catches in his voice as that finger slid further in and then pulled back again, only to repeat.

"You'd neglected this whole part of your body because you'd never let yourself think to love another man." Viktor explained, sliding his hips up against his partner's front at the same time as his finger continued to tease, "And yet, this is such an important part of you..."

"Forgive me, it's a bit difficult to wax philosophical when you have a finger in my butt." Yuri huffed, though his word-choice just made Viktor laugh.

"So literal." He mused, withdrawing the digit, "Maybe you'd prefer something else in there." He supposed, putting his hands on his husband's waist to turn him in place, and pressed in against his back afterwards. He slid his hands all over Yuri's front, gliding effortlessly from chest to tuts to tummy, then further down to the crook of each thigh, and pulled the man hind-end against his hips.

Yuri's back arched slightly, and he hissed a breath as fingers moved to tease a touch between his legs, not quite grasping anything, but moving it around all the same. His head pressed back against his husband's shoulder, feeling a few nibbles against his own, even as those hands continued to tease and push and tug. He gasped when those fingers finally took hold of him, wrapping around firmly and sliding forward, his own hands going back to grip at whatever they could find. Viktor continued to tease and lick at the side of his neck, and he could feel the man's smile against his skin. He couldn't hold in the needy breaths as each slide against his arousal came in tandem with a push of hips from behind him, "V-Viktor...ngh..."

"Mmhh... You're so sensitive today." The Russian commented happily, arms pinched against his husband's sides as both hands moved down to center to titillate the younger man's flesh. The left kept a steady slide and tug motion on the length of him, but the other went right between Yuri's legs, offering gentle squeezes to the pair of tender orbs, massaging them with palm and thumb as fingers went further back, pressing to a sensitive button of skin found there. The hard length of his own arousal slid by with every press of hips, but after a few more pushes, Viktor curled his fingers around it to bring it up, and held it there in place to slide firmly against his husband's skin. To his surprise, Yuri actually pinched his legs closed around it, making the space tighter to push through, but glided easily.

With the growing need to feel more, Yuri couldn't help but lean forward, reaching one arm over the covered soaking-tub to press his palm to the wall. Viktor's kisses went to the upper part of his back then, but continued the slow thrusting slide between his legs, hands holding him firmly in place. The right hand came back though, sliding around the hip and over Yuri's back before coming down again on the outside of the man's right leg, moving around to the inner side from behind to pull it away. Viktor moved it to prop a knee on the edge of the tub, and then backed up, moving his hand gently up that leg again. Fingers played in the new space, two pressing where one had entered before, but then sliding down and under to push against the button of smooth skin nearby. To Yuri's surprise, Viktor pushed his thumb inside, and pinched with his fingers from within and without. He squeaked slightly to feel it, hand sliding down the wall as his head bowed down.

The simultaneous internal and external massage was slowly building-up the sense of intensity, and Viktor carefully watched every twitch and quake of his husband's thin frame. Whether Yuri's back arched down or up, how high he picked up his head before lowering it again, the way his fingers pressed and curled where he could see them on the wall before they vanished entirely to help hold the younger man up. Blue eyes watched all of it, reading it carefully, feeling the tension around his thumb tighten or ease up. When he could feel his partner had relaxed enough, Viktor pulled his thumb away and stepped up to center himself behind him. He offered a few reassuring slides, and pressed his chest to his husband's back before using his fingers to guide himself into place, and pushed in gently. Yuri rewarded him with a breathy gasp, but was quickly up on his toes. Hands resumed their exploring on the younger man's front, trailing up and down and everywhere as Viktor pushed in further slowly, backing out a little before trying again. Once flush to his husband's back end, Viktor held there, hugging his partner close to his chest, and slowly started to roll his hips into him.

Yuri cried out quietly, unsure what to do with his hands; keep them down, hug around his spouse's arms, both? He tried everything, feeling each roll of the Russian's hips getting more needy, pushing in deeper. A few kisses tapped against the back of his shoulders, and Yuri lowered his heels back down to the tile, relaxing into the slowly building rhythm of his husband's pushes. He melted into the warmth, savoring the pressure, and the jolts of electric pleasure it sent through him. Viktor hands went under his chest though, and pulled him slowly upright, withdrawing to turn him in place and step in front of him. A teasing guide of kisses put Viktor between him and the edge of the soaking-tub, until the Russian let a playful lick to the tip of Yuri's nose before sitting down.

Following easily, Viktor guided his partner closer, hands curling around the younger man's waist as he rose to sit over him, with parted knees on either side. Yuri lowered to sitting on the man's tummy, and slowly slid back down into his lap, directly over the aroused length of flesh that had just been inside him. He paused there for a moment, bringing his hands down from where he'd pressed them against the walls beside him, curling one around the back of Viktor's neck and head, thumb by one ear as he lowered down into a new kiss, the other hand resting on the Russian's shoulder.

Viktor perched the balls of his feet against the step, raising the tilt of his knees so his partner didn't risk sliding right off the end of his legs. Yuri started sliding in the other direction though, pressing his hips forward to glide against him, then back down again. He repeated this, soaking up the warmth of kisses all the while, relishing in the feel of both of Viktor's hands sliding against his body. Hazel eyes cracked open slightly, looking down onto the wet, pale face under him, fingers feeling the softness of Viktor's neck and jaw, and touched the tip of his nose lightly to those pink lips. He slid up the Russian's front again, this time further than before, and on the descent, pushed the member out behind him. Eyes were locked as Yuri reached back, guiding the aroused flesh against himself again, humming a breath against those lips as he felt the heat going back inside him.

Yuri sat back against his husband's lap, pushing up with his hands balled against the Russian's chest. He looked into those intrigued blue eyes, and slowly started to rock, lifting up just slightly on his knees with each pass before sitting again. He could feel hands sliding up his thighs, teasing thumbs pressing close to center as they passed on their way up. Yuri moved his arms out of the way as he continued his shower-wet grind, hands going out to the sides to press against the walls so Viktor could get his eyeful. Watching the way every muscle crimped and stretched with every one of his movements, and feeling them under his skin as hands roamed all over him...and then roamed down, encircling the member left near-forgotten on that athletic core.

A gasp uttered, and Yuri looked down, watching those fingers pay their tribute as he continued to roll his hips. It was harder to keep focus with Viktor's fingers knowing exactly where to go, but as his rolls began to slow, Viktor knew to take over again. He leaned forward just enough to get Yuri to raise his knees up for balance, hooks his elbows under them, and stood up, carrying the surprised younger man with him. With a slight twist, Viktor pushed his husband's back against the side wall, and gave his partner a deviously innocent smile.

"Y-You sure you're not gonna slip...?" Yuri asked nervously.

"I have traction." Viktor reassured, leaning in close to nibble at his spouse's neck a little.

Yuri held on tightly as those thrusts began again, pushing him up the wall with each press forward. The spray from the shower-head was pointing near to him, sending a wash of warm water behind him, heating the tile to make it pleasant against his skin. With Viktor's arms busy holding him up though, Yuri could do little more than press his back to the wall, and pulled his hands back from where they clung to his partner's shoulders. Viktor had already put him close to the edge already, and each new push nudged him closer than the last. He drew a hissed breath as a surge jolted through him, "...V-Viktor...I'm...nhgg..." He struggled to say, toes clenching where his feet were suspended in the air, fingers tight around himself as he tried to hold off the end for his partner's sake.

"Don't hold it in." Viktor told him though, "I'm about t-

"I w-wonoo don't finish before I do, you'll pull out-

"I w-won't!" Viktor insisted, though he did slow down considerably as the shockwaves went through him. He couldn't help but laugh at the sudden speed to which Yuri was trying to catch up, legs literally clamping around his arms to prevent him from letting go as that expected post-coitus fatigue settled in. Viktor held in admiringly though, continuing his upward pushes until he felt that final tense clamp of those legs around his arms, and the guttural gasp of release. He slowly let the younger man go to stand on his own again, reluctantly withdrawing from the warmth. But, feeling Yuri's arms go around his chest, and his heavy breaths against his skin, made the trade easy. He twisted slightly and nudged the shower-head to spray towards them again, letting the heat of the water warm them up.

Yuri drew a long breath, and exhaled a satisfied sigh against his husband's neck, turning his face towards it to avoid the spray. He slid his right hand closer again, pressing it to the center of Viktor's chest, and stroked his fingers there a few times, "We're gonna be out for hours." He commented with a laugh and a headshake. He looked up to see Viktor smile back.

"It'll take days to recalibrate to being on home hours." The silver agreed, "But if it means we'll get to sleep a lot, I'm okay with that."

Yuri's phone rang out with that typical iPhone ringtone, half-startling him out of the coma he'd been in. The loud ring just kept going though, and he peeled himself off his husband's chest to reach for the device on the nightstand. Too tired to look at the screen, and feeling those protective arms trying to pull him back under the covers, Yuri put the phone to his ear without looking at the caller-ID, "...Mushi mushi..." He mumbled.

"Getting over your jet-lag?"

"OhheyI'llputyouonspeakers..." Yuri mumbled back, barely coherent enough to click the button as he'd said he could, "Heeyyyyyyyyy..."

"You're both jetlagged? Isn't that against the rules?" Yurio's voice resonated out of the phone, lost somewhere in the sheets already, "Viktor, how did you get so worn out?"

"I think I'm still tired from leaving in the first place." He answered, trying to get comfortable as he pulled Yuri back to where he'd been before, re-wrapped his arms around his husband's thin frame, and squished his cheek against Yuri's upper back, "What's up...?"

"We're pulling into Hasetsu on the train right now." The teen answered, "Minus one, but still."

"...Minus who...?"

"Name starts with M and ends with stupid."

Viktor lifted his head and blinked slowly in confusion, "Huh?"

"It's the old man. Mikhail. He's the one who's MIA." Yurio grumbled, "You guys are boring when you're tired."

Both sleepy heads lifted then, staring in the direction of the phone's glow, "...Why is he not with you?"

"He said he had to do something in Russia and ditched us during the layover in Moscow. He swore he'd only be delayed by a day though." Yurio explained, "I can see the castle from here now. You guys gonna come to the resort tonight or are you too dead?"

A moment of consideration was given, but Yuri's stomach roared and betrayed their silence, deciding for them, "...I guess we need to eat."

"If you leave now, we should get there at the same time. See you then."

The phone clicked and went dark a moment later, and though comfortable and warm, Yuri twisted around to face his partner. He pulled one hand up and brushed a few strands of slightly-damp silver hair behind one ear, "Mnhh... Ready or not, here we go..."

Makkachin and Jiro were asleeep on the couch when the duo came down, collecting their discarded clothing as they made their way. Though both pups lifted their heads, Jiro was too sleepy to keep it up, and fell asleep again soon after, unsuspecting of the humans' intentions. Once they heard the jangle of keys though, both heads were up, but the bipedal pair escaped outside before either of the two canines could get off the couch.

The engine of the Audi came alive, and the car backed out of the driveway to start making its way towards Yu-Topia. It was just about 7pm when they left, and they waited in the car where they parked. Tired and hungry, but wanting to go in as a big group rather than just themselves, they kept half an eye out for Team Okukawa while they sat.

Yuri kept a hand firmly on his husband's leg like he always did when they drove, eyes closed behind his glasses as he dozed in his seat.

"So what are we going to eat?" Viktor asked, trying to break-up the quiet, "Katsudon? We haven't had that in a while."

"Oh...sure." Yuri answered tepidly, eyes opening slightly.

"Yuri,"
His head turned slightly, catching sight of the outline of silver hair in the street lights.

"My love, look at me." Viktor said, twisting in place to lean against an elbow perched on the center console. Brown eyes came up, but there was an obvious anxiety in them, "Tell me what you're thinking right now."

"That...I'm scared, and ashamed...guilty...doubting everything..." Yuri sighed, sinking slightly where he sat, "Everything I've said since we left, how sure I was about how I wanted things to go...how sure I was about how I felt about everything... Now we're here, and all I can think is...how stupid I was...

Viktor frowned slightly, but moved his free hand over to cup the side of his husband's face, turning those eyes towards him as he brushed his thumb gently over one cheek, "You are many things, Yuri, but stupid has never and will never be one of them."

"...Being too scared to go into my own childhood home isn't too alpha of me." He retorted dubiously, looking extremely unsure of himself, "I feel like such an omega right now... The bottom of the pecking order, counting on the mercy of others just to survive..."

"You haven't lost your place just because of a moment of fear." Viktor reassured, "But, this is the sort of thing that I've been expecting, much as you've argued with me over it."

Yuri reached up and pulled his glasses off with a sigh of frustration, leaning into the palm of his partner's hand, "I just feel so weak... In my head I know exactly how I feel...but it's like my heart and body are run by a completely separate system... My heart's racing and I can't entirely blame my tremble on having low blood-sugar..."

"There's nothing wrong with feeling the way you do."

"Then why do I feel so bad about it...?"

Viktor didn't answer immediately. Instead, he leaned forward and offered what soothing balm he could with a kiss, and then another just for good measure, "Just like how your head is telling you a different story than your body is...I think you've used your big brain to downplay the impact of what happened to you. You had your purest reaction in the hours immediately after the fact, and you've been rationalizing it away ever since."

"...I don't know how to stop feeling like this."

Knock Knock

Viktor turned as Yuri looked up, seeing fingers pulling back from where they'd tapped against the glass. Yurio bent down to gape at them from outside, "C'mon, we're here."

Heading to the resort's front doors, the ladies of the little group were waving and gesturing the way forward. The pair raised a hand each to wave back, but Viktor turned to Yuri again before opening the door, "Just give yourself time. There's no deadline."

"But-"

The door clicked open, and the car started to beep, but Viktor turned back, "But what...?"

Yuri grumbled a sigh, "What if I make a mess of things...?"

"I'll be right next to you the whole time. Everyone here knows what happened, and no one expects you to be completely okay right away. You have the right to feel wounded for a little while, so don't feel guilty that you do. But this is still your first home, and you should be able to go inside without feeling like you're walking into an ambush...so all of us will go in first, and you'll come in after me. Okay?"

Yuri nodded, and let out another sigh, "...Okay..."

"Just think about all the katsudon we're going to be eating soon. That's the most important thing right now anyway."

"...Yeah..."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY FIVE

The coast was clear on the first floor. Greeting to Parents and Sister Katsuki were given as everyone went through, and Viktor all-too-happily put in the order for two of Yuri's Special Katsudon to be ready when they came down from the 3rd floor. The duo followed after Yurio to the narrow hall that lead behind the common-room and towards the stairs, while the ladies took their things to the big rented resort room they were still using.

For once, Yurio even carried his own luggage, though he did struggle with the last flight to the top floor. Once there, he heaved a breath and looked down that last hall towards the door to his newly-obtained bedroom. The door to it was open though, meaning Potya was likely running around the resort somewhere, but the door to the repurposed banquet hall was expectedly closed. Yurio passed it by as Viktor and Yuri held back by the stairs, and the pair listened for a moment as luggage was hefted around and opened.

Yuri's grip on Viktor's hand was like a vice, but the Russian didn't complain or even wince. He just returned the tight squeeze, relieving some of the discomfort of the crush. Moving forward, Viktor lead Yuri towards the latter's old room, and let the younger man go inside to the familiar comfortable space while he stayed back in the doorway.

Yuri looked around the room as Yurio dug out all his dirty laundry from the trip and threw it to a pile on the floor. "It's weird to think that this space is being used by someone other than me." He commented, overlaying the way it used to look in his mind's eye; the posted of Viktor, his MacBook Air on the desk, his huge suitcase with all the Hasetsu and poodle stickers tucked behind the bed...all of it. But none of it was there anymore. Yurio hadn't started decorating yet - and maybe he wouldn't - but the realization that the room wasn't Yuri's anymore was really strange.

"I probably won't be in here long. I'm just a visitor." Yuri commented, finding his skates in the midst of all his poorly-packed items, "Mikhail isn't going to want to stay in this place too long, not with his kids around. I don't know what the status is on him finding or building a house here, but I'm sure there's something going on. There has to be, right?"

Viktor had kept his eyes on the banquet-room door the whole time, half-listening to the pair behind him talking. He turned his head when he heard the far-off cries of an excited cat, the 'myaa'a'a'a'a'aaaaa' of the ragdoll's voice jumping as she went quickly up the stairs. When the fluffy beast finally came around the corner, she was practically running down the hall, pausing only to rub the side of her body against the doorframe in front of Viktor's legs.

"Potya!" Yurio called out happily, going down to a knee with his hands forward. The feline easily went towards him, sniffing his fingers and then turning in place so only her tail-fluff would touch his hands. Never being easy, Potya maintained her aloofness until Yurio leaned forward to scoop her up, then she smelled his cheek and rubbed her own against it.

Smiling at the reunion, Viktor watched them for a moment, then looked back at the banquet door. He dared to take a step forward, wondering if Asahi was even there, Maybe he's at the Ice Castle? He thought, turning his head slightly in an attempt to put his ear to the panel, I'm sure Hana would've barked or something if they were here.

Just as Viktor was about to listen though, he spotted the sight of the lock at the panel's edge...and the key-chain hanging from it; one in the lock, the spare hanging behind it from a key-ring. Viktor's brow ruffled, and without a word, put his hand to the wood and slid it quickly open.

Yuri and Yurio both looked up at the sound of the shuffle, but neither made a move to look. They could see Viktor's shoulder and arm through the doorway, and read his body-language for whatever was going on.

"I thought Saito moved into this space." The Russian commented flatly; the two Yuris could just imagine the unimpressed look on Viktor's face.

"He did. Mikhail had a lock put on the door for him and everything." Yurio explained, staying put, "Why?"

"There's nothing here."

Brown and green eyes looked at one another briefly, but they both stepped towards the exit to the hall, and looked into the same banquet room that Viktor already was. Just as he'd said, there was nothing within. The walls were bare, the floor-space unused, the bed disassembled to the bare-bones frame and mattress.

"Now what am I going to do with all my righteous indignation?" Viktor asked, right before he heard a thump on the floor...and a snore to follow, "...Yuri?".

Yuri wasn't sure where he was when his eyes cracked open again. Everything was a blur without his glasses. He could tell he was lying down, and the dark space just next to him was probably the underside of a table. The walls looked vaguely familiar though, and he was mostly sure that his head had been supported by a leg. There was a hand resting on his upper chest, just below his chin, and a thumb was gently stroking back and forth. He could hear voices, and when he turned his head to the left, he looked past the end of a knee to see the crossed legs of about a half-dozen other people under that table.

<My head hurts...>

"Oh, he's awake." Viktor's voice sounded, drawing the younger man's gaze up again. He smiled and looked down at those squinting eyes, "Welcome back, my love."

Yuri blinked slowly a few times, but then pushed himself up to sit, only to feel an arm snake around his side to pull him back against Viktor's. He didn't resist though; instead, he looked around to figure out where he was and who was around him. Viktor offered him his glasses back, making the analysis easier, and Yuri realized he'd been stretched out along the base of a wall in the common-room, keeping him out of the walk-way in the center aisle, using Viktor's thigh as a pillow while he was out. There were a handful of strangers in the space - other patrons who were there for the after-dinner beer - but the nearest table was occupied by Team Okukawa, minus one.

"...How long...was I out?"

"About an hour." Viktor answered easily, seeing his husband's expression sink, "Don't worry. Mama Katsuki was able to put our dinners on pause until you came to. If you're up to it, they can have the food out in a few minutes."

"...Yeah..." Yuri mumbled in answer, his mind too clouded to process the words into anything more complex than 'food yes' or 'food no.' He heard Viktor calling out for it to be brought to them, but all he could think about from that moment on was his growing headache. He lifted his hand and pressed it to his forehead just above his right eye, feeling the two lumpy scars where they were most obvious beyond his hairline. It was a jarring pain right underneath of them, like a knife being stabbed into his brain, over and over with every heartbeat pulsing through the area. If anyone was speaking to him, he couldn't hear or understand their words, and instead did the only thing he could comprehend; he backed up until he was sitting directly behind his husband, slid his arms around the man's waist, and buried his face between Viktor's shoulder-blades where he made the man lean forward.

"You okay?" The Russian wondered quietly, looking back over one shoulder, but all he got were Yuri's glasses handed back, which he took in confusion. He folded them carefully and set them down again, and brought that hand back to rest it over where Yuri's had clasped together in his lap. He offered a gentle squeeze, but didn't push the issue, content to just have the younger man rest.

Dinner seemed to come and go, but all Yuri was really aware of was that, in one moment, he was starving, and in the next, he wasn't. He thought he heard something about the onsen, but he blinked and was in the car heading home again. He looked to the dash and saw that it was after 11pm, I lost 4 hours...?

"You've been unusually quiet, my love." Viktor commented, "Does your head feel better?"

"...Yea, but... I...don't remember saying anything about it."

"You didn't. You kept pawing at your forehead - the spot where you'd cracked your head like a nut - so we gave you some Excedrin and made you eat."

"Oh..."

"Do you remember anything about tonight?"

Yuri hesitated, but then shook his head, "Nothing specific, after we went to my old room."

"Do you want to hear a summary?"

"Summary of what...?" Yuri wondered, suddenly becoming aware of his hand as Viktor gave it a squeeze; on the man's leg, where it usually was, but he felt bad not knowing if he'd put it there himself or if it had been brought there.

"Saito. Or rather, the lack of him."

"...You seem pretty chipper, despite me." Yuri commented, looking down at the glove-box above his knees, "He's gone, I suspect."

"I can't help but feel a great sense of relief knowing he's not at Yu-Topia." Viktor explained, rubbing his thumb reassuringly, "I was a bit annoyed at first, because it meant we'd been worrying all weekend for basically nothing...but once it sunk in that he was gone, I felt better."

"Where did he go...?"

"No one knows." The Russian answered, "He left no note, he told no one he was going. No one's even sure how long he was gone before someone realized the room was empty. Your mom called Mimi because he was taking responsibility for him, but for various reasons, no one thought to tell us."

"...I did make a point to not talk about him. Maybe they didn't bring it up because the topic - on a whole - never did."

"Probably." Viktor agreed, flicking the turning signal with his free hand as they came up to their last turn, and then rotated the wheel, "Yurio actually mentioned early on that he'd suggested Saito move out. He thought that Saito just ended up agreeing, and left on his own after everyone else had gone to Austria."

"...Where did he go?" Yuri asked; again, for some reason, as though he'd forgotten he'd already posed the question.

"No one knows." Viktor answered after a moment, and shrugged, taking it slow down the narrow street that lead to their house, "Minako said that Mimi had been trying to get hold of him, but there hasn't been an answer. Saito hasn't updated Insta since his parents disowned him though, so it's hard to know what he's up to, or where."

Yuri groaned a quiet worried sigh.

"Please don't feel badly about this, my love." Viktor reassured, pulling into their covered drive-way, and clicking the brake on, "You ditched him yourself for much less. This had to happen. I'm sure that once Mimi gets back, he'll figure out pretty quick where Saito went. He's just been busy in St. Petersburg and hasn't really had time to think about it."

"Did anyone explain why he's staying out there?"

"The old house." He answered, pulling the hand up from his thigh to kiss the fingers, "Let's get inside. I'll explain more."

Yuri nodded quietly, and rubbed his thumb once over the fingers holding his hand before he let go to get out of the car. The pups were excited to see them home, wiggling to get their greetings as the doors opened and closed. Winter ensembles were pulled free and hung up, but the pile of luggage remained in the front hall, only attended to long enough to be put out of the way until the next day. Yuri eventually plunked down onto their couch, and found himself buried at the bottom of a canine cuddle-pile while Viktor attended to something in the kitchen. The aroma of wine, star anise, orange peel, and cinnamon gave away the man's intentions though, and he joined the pile while the concoction simmered.

A documentary was playing, showing the history of Japanese achievements in past Winter Olympics. Footage for many of the very historic games was grainy and the audio equally distorted, but it was still clear what was going on. Yuri kept his eyes on the big flat-panel television, but he wasn't paying too much attention to what was on it.

"I bet we're both going to be in this thing towards the end." Viktor commented, "Since we're both competing for Japan in a month."

"...Maybe."

The Russian made a face, but then sighed and moved to wiggle his way through the pile until he could turn around and put his head against his husban's tummy, and looked up at him from his upside-down vantage, "You're taking the fact that Saito left rather personally, aren't you."

He said, "If not for his morbid behavior at All Japan..." Yuri answered simply, "This whole complicated mess is specifically because of me. He left because of me. He's missing because of me. I have his awful feeling that if no one else can figure out where he went, I'd be the one person he'd answer...which makes me feel responsible for him, more than I think I should have to..."

"He's older than you are, Yuri. You can't be his minder. He has to take responsibility for himself...and if he left because of you, then it's clear he understands that he has a responsibility to be a better man than he has been so far. I'm sure we'll eventually be in contact with him again. He's going to Colorado and South Korea...can't avoid us when he's a competitor."

"I know..." Yuri sighed, "I just... The more this all sinks in, the more I wonder...why didn't he ever mention what happened before? Even when we had that fight, he never said a peep about how I'd agreed to go out with him before. You'd think that would've been the first thing he'd mention. I would've."

"There may just be some things in life you never know, my love." Viktor tried to explain, lifting his legs a bit so Makkachin could wrap himself around and rest that floofy head on his stomach, "The inner workings of Saito's brain are something I don't fully understand either."

"But how's he going to get to Four Continents and the Games if he ditched Minako-sensei?" Yuri contested, "Where is he even living? Did he go back to Imari...? He can't have given up on everything just to avoid being around me, right?"

"So far as we're aware, nothing else has changed. He probably went back to his other coach since she's right there south of us. It's the most logical thing. You can't protect him from the choices he makes for himself...and you can't live in a state of perpetual guilt over him, either. Healthy boundaries include you knowing when to back off. This is that moment. Saito left, he didn't want anyone to follow or find him, and that's just how it's going to have to be. Let it go."

"If I had just been a better frie-"

"Yuri, let it go," Viktor repeated, "Saito himself has made it impossible for you and him to just be friends. You fled the country, in part, because of how things were. You have to give yourself permission to move on. You have me now, and this whole crazy dumb family we've made...you don't owe Saito a slice of your happiness. He has to find his own."

Yuri's brow was still furrowed, but his husband's words made more sense than anything he could think of on his own. He drew a deep breath and quickly exhaled, but then sat up a bit straighter, squishing his partner's head where he rose, "...Yeah... I can't keep letting him make me unhappy. I don't think that's his goal anyway. If anything, he did this because he's running away... I can't do anything to make things better except let him vanish into his sunset. Doing anything more will just give him the hope that I'll eventually come around, and that's just not true...so it would just be cruel to try."

Viktor lifted himself up a bit and turned back, "Exactly. Letting him go is a mercy."

"...Yeah..."

"Switch places with me." The silver suggested then, "I'll rub your back until the mulled wine is done, and then we can have a quiet, calm, peaceful evening. Tomorrow, we get my ankle cleared and we can get back to doing what we love. Training and working-out again will do your brain good, as well as your body."

"You're right..." Yuri agreed quietly, and reached to pick up Jiro so he could switch places.
Yurio sat up into the night, restless and tired all at once. Potya snoozed on the bed-space next to him, content to have her person back to cuddle with. However, all Yurio could do was stare at the ceiling.

It's just about 8pm in St. Petersburg right now...I wonder if Mik's already on a plane? Nah...he said it was a red-eye flight...he's probably loafing around at the airport or something.

Curious fingers were never idle, and the teen couldn't help but call the man. However, the dial-tone rang on for a while and there was no answer, which was mildly annoying but not entirely unprecedented. When the voicemail finally answered, all Yurio could do was stumble through a message, "Uhhh...hey...it's me. Was about to go to bed but I figured I'd holler. Uhm...Saito's not at Yu-Topia anymore. Took everything and ditched. Not sure if Minako told you or not. Anyway...I guess I'll get to sleep. Bye." He finished, closing out the call and watching the black screen change back to white.

He clicked out and found his past text messages, seeing the window from when he'd originally exchanged numbers with the missing skater. The content wasn't even voluminous enough to warrant a scrolling bar on the side.

[Hey, this is Yuri Plisetsky. Okukawa told me to message you so you'd have my number, since we're training together.]

[ok]

Yurio made a face at the screen, sitting up to type a new message, but then halting after writing only two words, [wtf stupid]

He grumbled and looked at the message, wondering if it was even worth sending.

'Now what am I going to do with my righteous indignation?' Viktor had asked, only to suddenly change gears as he heard a body hit the floor and start snoring loudly, '...Yuri?'

'What the Hell was that!?' Yurio barked, running around to his friend's side on the floor, 'What'd he drop like that for!?'

Viktor made a face and knelt down as well, 'Didn't expect he'd do that right now, but...I guess I should've.' He shook his head, moving his husband's limbs around to make it easier to pick him up, 'He does this when he's mentally overloaded and then something just cracks. Like that time he realized you'd heard us making-out because of the score-cards we walked into.'

'And at Nationals?'

'No, that was a faint. You could call this something more like panic-induced narcolepsy?'

'Isn't that the same thing?' Yurio deadpanned, watching Viktor rise back up to his feet with the unresponsive Yuri in his arms, 'They're both unconscious in the end.'

'Maybe in physiological terms...but Yuri does different things depending on whether he fainted or just dropped like he did now. If he faints, he doesn't snore. This here is just lights out. No warning, no light-headedness, no feeling a hot flush, or seeing dark at the edges of his vision. It's just...Yuri.exe has stopped working, system crash, blue screen of death.’ Viktor explained, walking towards the stairwell, 'He'll wake up after a nap has given him a minute to cool down and reboot.’

“You seem oddly okay with this happening to him.’ Yurio huffed, following ruefully, 'Shouldn't you be more worried?’

'I am, but if there's nothing else I've learned from dealing with Yuri, it's that panicking or making a fuss over something just makes it worse when he comes to.’ Viktor said curtly, looking carefully down the stairs to make sure he knew exactly where his feet were going, 'I plan on having him talk to my doctor tomorrow when I get released to jump again. I've been wanting him to see someone anyway; he never got checked out again after the Final. I should've pushed harder for him to follow-up with someone, but we were so blindsided by the RSF firing me that I couldn't think straight for a while.’

'Your doctor is an orthopedics guy, not a head guy.’ Yurio pointed out.

'He's a Sports Medicine specialist...concussions are part of his area of expertise.' Viktor retorted.

'Still, if Yuri dropped because of all the crap about Saito, you should have him see a head guy. This could be a serious trigger and mess him up in the rink.’

'One specialist at a time. If my doctor says Yuri needs to see a head guy, then we'll go, but it doesn't hurt to ask him first.’

Yurio still stared at his phone, and the half-typed message...but then deleted it and put his phone back on the charger. He stayed sitting-up in bed, arms crossed over his chest and a frustrated look on his face.

I feel bad being friendly with Saito when I know that what he did to Yuri still hurts this much. I don't know what to do... Yuri's one of my best friends, but Saito really does feel bad about what happened. Viktor's never going to forgive him though... It would just complicate things for them if I was talking to him.

He dropped down to his pillow, arms still crossed, and stared towards the rim of the window.

...I won't interfere. Yuri is my friend; Saito is just an acquaintance. I'll leave it to Mikhail and Minako to sort out. He's their project anyway.

Yuri woke up a few seconds before his phone-alarm could do it for him; he reached out of the warmth of blankets and arms to turn it off, and looked at the hour; Wednesday, 9:30am. Viktor was resisting the call to consciousness as well as he could, but Yuri kissed him into waking. With nowhere to be until just after lunch, it was easy to come to a wordless agreement that a leisurely morning romp was on order.

Yuri reached for his favorite warming lube and brought his partner's arousal to full tilt; an easy thing to do given that the male anatomy was typically at half-mast in the waking hours anyway. With a session of rubbing, hand-roaming, and gentle kisses, Yuri stayed on top for the first bout, rocking against his husband's hips at a steady, but just-woke-up kind of pace. Watching eagerly, Viktor got in his daily worship of his partner's perfect self, offering teasing strokes against tender flesh to coax him to go a little faster before flipping their positions. Viktor kissed the inside of his husband's knees as they came up over his shoulders, and soon after brought them both to climax. They heaved happy breaths against each other until they were able to come to an accord on getting out of bed.

Though showering in shifts, they ended up in their soaking tub together, with Yuri's knees comically poking up above the water for lack of room. He twisted sideways though in the small space, resting his side against his partner's front while hooking his legs over the rim. No words need be said between them; the calm, quiet, soothing relaxation of the atmosphere was enough. Words would've just corrupted it.

Breakfast was just as tranquil. The pups came excitedly for their own, and each got their bowl of morning wet-food, with a few sweet-potato treats afterwards. A quick nap was in order while the humans slowly went through the motions of eating their own food and getting their morning coffees.

When all were done and dressed to meet the day, Jiro was fitted with his leash and harness, and everyone piled into the little red Audi. They drove down to the beach-head, and Makkachin lead the way for their first true morning walk since leaving for Russia. Yuri contemplated letting Jiro off the lead, and eventually cut the pup loose to chase after his big poodle brother.

He retook Viktor's hand, and they slowly followed after their canine sons. Viktor, of course, pulled it back into his jacket pocket, keeping it warm there.

"You seem to be feeling much better this morning than you have in a while." The Russian commented, giving his husband a nudge with an elbow, "You haven't said a word, but I can feel it."

"It's hard to explain, but I...just feel free suddenly." Yuri answered, "I chalk it up to finally getting a good night's sleep though, and being home again. Even though I still have some of my worries...I feel like I can handle them better from here than I could abroad."

"Here I thought it was the mulled wine from last night." Viktor teased, earning a laugh and a playful shoulder-bump, "I'm just glad for it, whatever the cause may be. Does your head feel better, too?"

"Mh." Yuri nodded, reaching up with his leash-hand to rub his fingers against the two faint scars, "It was throbbing something fierce last night, but it went away. You could probably thank the wine for that...it made me pretty sleepy, and I didn't wake up at all during the night."

"I was going to ask if I tossed and turned again, and bothered you, but I guess that answers the question. Even if I moved, you were too asleep to notice."

"I was out." Yuri laughed again, "I think I was ready for it. I was so on-guard going to Russia, then trying to be strong for you when we were leaving...and then that stupid fight we had...and then dealing with whatever Asahi was going to throw at us when we got back..." He sighed and shook his head, watching his foggy breath evaporate in the cold winter air, "Now that it's all over, and we're finally, truly safe...it's like I can let my guard down again. I can just be me, and focus on the three things I love best in this world. Our dogs, our sport..." He started, and paused in place, drawing blue eyes towards him, "And most of all, you."

Viktor's eyes shone in the morning sunlight, but he laughed and leaned forward, cupping his husband's cheek with one palm as he touched their brows together, "Ah, I think I just fell in love with you all over again for saying all that."

"And in saying so, I can sense that you're okay again, too." Yuri commented, sharing a quick nose-nuzzle before they started walking after their pups again.
"It's just...strange, you know?" The silver went on, "Maybe I'm just living vicariously through you, or maybe there's something in the air here...but for some reason, I feel the same as you; free. And it's not just Saito being gone either...there's something else." Viktor added, "Something I felt before we even knew what happened. It was subtle...at the back of my head, like it was in a queue, waiting for something else to happen before coming forward. Maybe it was just waiting for you to start feeling better."

"I'd hate to think that my anxious nature puts a damper on you."

"Not at all. I couldn't figure out what it was anyway. You just put the words in my head and made sense of it... It really just...feels like something gave way." Viktor elaborated, watching Makkachin play keep-away from Jiro, carrying a bit stick in his mouth as he trotted down the rocky beach, "I haven't felt like this in a long time. The air feels fresher, our coffee earlier tasted better, my joy for everything seems unimpeded... Do I make any sense at all right now?"

"I think we're both on the same page right now about all that." Yuri agreed easily, "It's like a shadow just lifted off of both of us."

Viktor nodded as they continued walking, keeping up his slow thumb-stroke where he still held their hands in his pocket.

Viktor flexed his toes slightly as the doctor finished his exam and let the appendage go. With sock and shoe being put back into place, the surgeon finished writing his notes and gave a nod before extending his hand.

"You're officially cured. Well done."

The Russian took the hand excitedly and shook, "Arigatou." (Thank you.)

"Dou itashimashite." (You're welcome.)

"Before we go though, I was wondering if you might look into something." Viktor started unexpectedly, drawing up the doctor's eyes in curiosity. Viktor pointed at his husband sitting nearby, "That one cracked his noggin open on the ice about a month ago, and was unconscious for hours after."

"Vikto-" Yuri started, only to get a look from the physician that made him simmer down again.

"He's been getting headaches, and his memories come and go sometimes. Just last night, he lost 4 hours to the abyss of amnesia, and he didn't even drink." The silver went on, crossing his arms, "Should I slash we be worried about this? He didn't have a seizure or anything, but do we need to make an appointment to look into it?"

"Hard to say, just from that." The older man answered, flipping his visit-note over to write on the back, and wrote Yuri's name at the top in Kanji, "Since the incident, have there been bouts of lost consciousness?"

"Yeah."

"In response to things." Yuri argued defensively, "I don't just drop for no reason."

"You mentioned the memory problems...does that happen any other time than when you pass out?"
"Err... I mean, I don't think so..." He said, unsure.

Viktor still had his arms crossed, swiveling slightly in his stool, "He's had memories coming back that he'd completely forgotten about before; some I can confirm as being true memories, not just him piecing together events as told by other people. That's all on top of not remembering new things that've happened."

"Nausea, vomiting, dizziness?" The doctor asked, looking to Yuri, but he just shook his head, "Sensitivity to light or sound?"

"Only if I've had a migraine at the time."

"Mood changes?"

"...Only as a reaction to things happening. Nothing unprovoked."

"What about your anxiety? Is it changing?"

Yuri hesitated slightly, but shook his head, "No, it's been better since we got Jiro, and Viktor's also gotten a lot better at managing me when my anxious side comes out. There's just been a lot of things going on lately...external things that are getting the better of me. If I didn't react, I'd be worried."

"How often do you get those headaches?"

"...Since coming back from Detroit, not that often at all. I think just twice, but I was really stressed at the time."

"And how's your sleep been?"

Yuri made a face, somewhere between a deadpan and worry, "I get jetlagged really badly. We've been traveling a lot. My rhythm will even-out once we've been home for more than one night."

The doctor finished writing his notes, and turned to Viktor, "Loss of consciousness after a head injury can lead to post-concussion syndrome...it can last up to three months, but it may never completely go away either." He explained, then turned to Yuri and pointed the end of his pen at him, "You should wear head protection when doing any rough physical activity, and expect that every headache you ever have from now on to start or get worse under the spot you impacted."

"So you don't think he should get a scan...?" Viktor wondered, "What if he had a brain bleed that's-"

"Knowing it's there won't change that it's there." The doctor explained, "He's not showing any signs or symptoms that he had any kind of major trauma. I suspect that, aside from the concussion, he might've suffered a minor brain contusion. Those go away in time, like any bruise. There's nothing we can do to speed it up. It's not like our skulls can be tapped for fluid like maple trees."

Yuri chortled a laugh, but Viktor remained rather stoic, "So you don't have any recommendations."

"Avoid using NSAIDs for pain, take Acetaminophen instead. Use a helmet." The elder suggested as he stood up, "And if it's still a problem in another two months, then come back. For now, expect some lingering pain and brain-fog. All you can do is wait it out."

When the door clicked closed again, Yuri couldn't help but shake his head and laugh, "Like maple trees...jeesh..."
"It was worth a shot." Viktor grumbled as he pushed up from his stool, and offered his hand to take, "I'm just relieved he doesn't think it's serious enough to having lasting effects. Where to from here, my love?"

"Ice Castle. My core isn't as strong as it should be. We both need to really hit the ground running to get back into peak condition."

The silver nodded and brought up his husband's hand to kiss his ring, "Ice Castle it is then."
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY SEVEN

Off-ice training was always more intense than on-ice training was. From the bare-bones-basics like angled crunches, push-ups, star-jumps, and rope-skipping, to more specific things like pulling heavy weights over long distances as quickly as possible, grapevines, throwing medicine balls against a wall and doing sit-ups to grab it and toss it again, and practicing the various jumps from one-foot standing on regular floors. Actually getting onto the ice meant practicing routines and fine-tuning the character of the art-form. Finishing the day's work-out with ballet, emphasizing flexibility, balance, and strength in motion.

The final cool-down was a welcome affair. Sitting on pool-chairs in the ballet room, watching the television for a little while, the exhausted duo sat in a pants-like pair of leg massagers, with back massagers behind them for good measure.

"Ugh...I hurt so much..." Yuri whined comically, sagging severely where he sat, "I shouldn't have let myself go so much..."

Viktor was just as bad, slouching with both arms hanging off the sides of his deck-chair, listening to the whirring of the little motors that moved the massagers up and down his legs. For once, he was too tired to care that his hair was all over the place, "I can't move."

"We have to sit in the onsen tonight." Yuri said, managing to turn his head enough to see his spouse, but being able to do little move, "It's decided."

"No question." The silver answered, letting his head drop to that same side so he could look back, "But how are we gonna get there?"

"...Eventually..."

"How, my love, not when."

"Yes." Yuri heaved, laughing as well as he could.

Viktor whined a little as he sighed, "We really overdid it. I thought we'd be okay since we made it through the Exhibition...but I guess not..."

"Five minutes is nothing to five hours." Yuri suggested, "You think we should bring Yurio with us to work-out next time?"

"No reason why not." He answered, pausing for a moment before looking up at the television again. He laughed quietly and closed his eyes, "Unless you think it's helping the enemy."

"Helping him struggle for Bronze isn't too bad, I don't think." Yuri huffed, "I'm honestly not sure who I want to see with us on the podium. Chris, Phichit-kun, Yurio...even Otabek deserves it. Maybe some underdog will come out of nowhere and take it."

"As long as we're on top, the Bronze can go to anyone." Viktor shrugged, just being happy that 'Asahi' wasn't a name coming off his husband's lips for once in a blue-moon. I'm not about to ask why he didn't name that one... He thought. As the automatic leg-massagers continued to inflate and deflate around his sore limbs, Viktor turned his head again, "You ready to hobble over to Yu-Topia then?"
Pushing the sliding door aside, Yuri caught sight of his father first, the window open to his little registrar’s office on the side of the entrance hall. Toshiya waved and pointed the way into the common room where the Nishigoris had turned up. After a quick bout of being mobbed by the growing triplets, fawning over the apparently-still-going viral video of the duet Exhibition, the Nikiforovs peeled away to go soak their sores away.

"I promise, we'll talk all about it when we come back." Yuri promised, a child on each arm while the third stood in the middle with her phone out, "Viktor and I were working really hard today so we need to sit for a minute."

"You won't just sneak out when we're not looking, right?" Lutz asked skeptically, "The exit is closer to the onsen than it is to here."

"We're not gonna ditch." Yuri emphasized, turning to look at Viktor behind him desperately, "Back me up!"

"We won't leave." The Russian reassured, leaning against the doorframe to amuse himself at the sight of his partner being lavished with attention, "We're going to have dinner here. We just want to soak for a little while."

"Don't soak too long! You'll turn pruny!" Axel called after them.

"We'll be right back!"

The duo moved back out of the common room and headed towards the onsen entrance, grabbing their share of towels as they started to disassemble from their sweaty work-out clothes. Viktor pulled a mesh laundry-bag from the backpack he carried with him, and all their smelly garb was kept safely apart from the cleaner clothes they brought to change into after.

"It's kind of nice to know that our stuff still surprises people after a year." Yuri commented, stuffing his sweatpants and loose socks into the bag, "I guess seeing two men pair-skating is still unusual enough."

"I did tell you once that I'd gotten ideas to last forever, right?" Viktor mused, pulling the cord tight to seal the bag with a clip, and set the pile into a bottom-level drawer of the cubby wall, "Being here with you pulled all the cobwebs and dust off of my creative machinery."

"I remember. Even just thinking back on when you first suggested 'Duetto' feels like yesterday in some ways, even if it feels like a thousand lifetimes ago, too."

"This past year has been busy..."

"What are we going to do for Worlds now that we've used that show already?" Yuri wondered, putting his folded glasses on top of the small pile of folded clean laundry set aside in a higher cubby, "Something we've already practiced or something new?"

"I'm ashamed to admit that I hadn't thought about it yet." The Russian answered with a sad smile, though he stepped forward to nudge Yuri through to the shower room, a towel over his shoulder for later, "Aside from Euros being the focus for the last little while, the Games are overshadowing the rest. There's so much more to consider there than at any regular ISU event."

"...Why?" Yuri wondered, though he suddenly shook his head and made a face, "Well, obviously I know why, but...why...?"
"Costumes."

"...Eh?"

Water started to spray from two of the stalls, and Viktor pulled his from the holster to spray over himself quickly, "I know that when I say that the world is watching us when we compete, it's true...but that's just the figure skating world. At the Games, it's the entire world. People who don't watch us any other time will watch us then and there. People who don't know who we are or whether we're any good, people who don't know the difference between a Lutz and an Axel, if they can even remember the names after the show is over. News articles will be written that go on the front page, temporarily set free from the confines of the sports section. For one entire month, the Olympics is a truly world-wide event. ...Do we want to just wear the same outfits we already used? Or re-imagine them as something more?"

Yuri paused in thought, half-covered in soapy froth, "...I...don't know."

"Me neither. Therein lies my dilemma."

Memories of the past year flooded through Yuri's mind. The humble beginning and evolution of 'Yuri on Ice,' before it became the record-shattering program it had blossomed into at the end of its run in Helsinki. The dark purple-blue jacket with its cut-out section around the sides and back, dazzled in gemstones and other fine details, the purple shirt, the dark pants. He blanked after that though and looked sheepishly at his spouse, "I...can't think of a way to make my old outfit look any better than it already does."

"Yeah I can't either." Viktor mused, "They all already look really good anyway. Adding stuff to them would almost seem like sacrilege."

"Kind of like that time I nearly had us switch which finger our rings went on."

"Well..." Viktor paused, sudzing his hair until he could make a silly shampoo-mohawk out of it with his fingers, "It wouldn't be entirely uncalled for it we did... It's not like we were ever married in Russia's eyes, so keeping it on our right hands is...ehm..." He stammered, the bigger spikes of his wet hairdo flopping over to splat against one cheek, "...You know."

"It's where we put them." Yuri finished, "Moving them over would be like saying we did it wrong or something."

"Yeah."

"And it's less to do with Russian tradition than it does with what we wanted them to mean to us anyway."

"Exactly~!"

"Now that I'm thinking about it though..."

Viktor looked over, showerhead above his crown, pouring water everywhere as he looked through, "...Eh?"

"Nikki was the one who pointed it out originally. I didn't see her or Viktoria or Yurio when we passed through. I wonder where they are?"

"Maybe they went with Minako to go pick Mimi up."
"Mimi's the one probably picking them up."

Viktor blinked through the water cascading off his head, "Wha...?" Math equations went flying through his mind, "...But he's the one at the airport...and they went there to...get...him...?"

"Minako-sensei and the others came back on the train." Yuri pointed out, "But they went to the airport originally in one of those new cars Mikhail bought. Unless he makes Minako-sensei drive, he's technically driving them home even if he's the one who just arrived."

Another long blink and a confused look, but Viktor then just smiled and nodded, "It's kind of late. The few parts of my brain that help me pretend to be as smart as you have long-since shut down already."

Yuri made a face at him, "You don't have to pretend. You're plenty smart." He pointed out, trying to ignore the goofy look being returned to him.

"Not as smart as you, Dr. Nikiforov."

And with that, the 'doctor' was aglow.

.

Soaking in the hot mineral-water up to their ears, the quiet calm of the onsen-proper was just what was on order. They both hummed a contented sigh as they waded in that pool of liquid relaxation. Their heads bobbed in the gentle ripple of the little space, and they listened to the ambiance of their outdoor surroundings; the cascade of water from the fountain nearby, the soft rustle of naked tree branches in a little breeze, and the far-off barking of a dog.

Though largely unaware of their slow movements around the hot-pond, being pushed about by the subtle currents under the water's surface, when Viktor found himself between Yuri's back and the rim of the nearest ledge, he made the most of it. He pressed the back of his head to his husband's shoulders and hooked his ankles onto the stone ledge, and hung between them like a long hammock, clasping his fingers over his stomach. Yuri couldn't help but smile, and reached one hand back to pat the man's silver head as he anchored his heels to prevent from sliding away.

.

CRASH

Viktor splashed and flailed as Yuri jumped, and both were gargling for air amidst confused yelling and the sound of shoes screeching to a halt on the deck.

"YURI-KUN."

Brown eyes rose from the water, and Yuri looked to the door that had just been smashed open unexpectedly. There, standing in front of the big red demon mask, was one Kenjirou Minami.

"...What in the world...?"

"YURI-KUN!" The teen barked again, looking like a confused mess between losing-his-shit excited and utterly-humiliated dishonor. The stars in his eyes disappeared as he suddenly went down to both knees and started bowing dramatically in his deepest apology, "AHHHHH!"

Viktor sputtered to get the water out of his nose, but when he caught sight of the display on the deck, he couldn't help but laugh and clap his hands together, "Wow~! He's doing a dogeza, too, like you used to do!" He said happily, looking at his perplexed husband.

"...But why is he here!?"

"Yuri-kun!" Minami belted a third time, pushing up onto his hands as he crawled meekly to the ledge of the pool, "I'm here to tell you that I'm coming with you to Four Continents!"

"...Oh." Yuri blanched, pushing his sopping-wet hair back with one hand, but looking rather confused, "...That's...great? It'll be like last year."

"No!" The blonde corrected, sitting back like a samurai before his daimyo, hands pressed neatly over his thighs, "I'm going as a competitor this time!" He bowed down, pressing his forehead to the stonework, "It'll be my first time competing at an international competition! I heard the news and came straight here!"

Yuri couldn't process it, and brought both hands up above the water to count, "...Me...Viktor...Asahi...uh..." He looked at Minami with brows furrowed, "Did we somehow get allotted four spots?"

"Saito Asahi-kun withdrew!" The teen explained, much to the duo's surprise, though Viktor was clearly pleased rather quickly even if Yuri still looked like none of it made sense, "So I've been selected to go in his place!" Minami finished, bringing his hands up under his face, balled in excitement, "This isn't going to be like Nationals! I'm going to take it super-duper seriously!"

Yuri's eyes squinted, and he turned his head to look at Viktor, whom he found nodding approvingly.

"Four Continents is going to be a lot of fun now." The silver chirped.

"None of this makes any sense at all." Yuri sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose. He sighed and gestured to the over-stimulated skater on the ledge, "Let us finish our soak...and then explain to us what's going on."

"Oh well you see we-"

"Soak first. Explain after."

"O-Oh! Hai!"
CHAPTER FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY EIGHT

It was like a spectator spot with how many people were sitting at the one table, while Yuri and Viktor were trying to have their dinner; the Nishigori parents, the Nishigori triplets, and Minami. Everyone was eager to speak, but every time someone tried to open their mouth to say something, one of the two Nikiforovs would either give them the stink-eye or would shuush them.

"What in the Hell is-"

"Shhhhh!" The whole group chided on the duo’s behalf, holding a finger up to their lips to quiet the unexpected Tiger, who’d appeared in the common-room doorway despite no one knowing he was ‘home.’ Confused, he joined the others, taking up a spot next to Yuko, silently wondering why Minami was there and why everyone was so quiet.

The silent watch began anew. Eyeballs followed every movement of chopsticks from bowl to mouth and back again.

Nikki and Viktoria were soon coming along, too, one yawning as the other gaped at the odd sight, "...What in the world."

Yurio joined in on the shushing that time, and the two silver teens joined the table, looking around in confusion at all the silent watchers. With a few more minutes passing that way, the meal came to its eventual conclusion, with both Yuri and Viktor finishing off the last of their clear onion soup at the last. They set their bowls down quietly, put their chopsticks and other dishes into a polite pile for pick-up, and quietly looked at one another before nodding.

"We've decided." Yuri spoke for them both as he threaded his fingers together at the edge of the short table, "...That Minami will be the first to speak."

"Tell them all what you told us first." Yuri cut him off.

"Yeah, why are you here?" Yurio huffed, leaning back against the nearby wall.

"Who is he?" Nikki asked out the side of her mouth, leaning towards her brother. The blonde just shrugged.

"He's Smol Nugget." Viktor explained, "Smol Nugget, meet Nikki and Viktoria Rozovsky, my cousins, and Yuri Plisetsky."

Minami waved nervously at the trio on the opposite side of the table, and at least Nikki waved back. He waited a moment though before attempting to speak again, "Ehem...well... I'm going to be competing at Four Continents, in place of Saito Asahi-kun."

Yurio would've spat his drink if he had one, but instead he just half-choked on air at the surprise. He hit his chest with the thumb-side of his fist until it cleared, "Y-You're what? Why?"
Minami was a bit intimidated by the younger but more aggressive skater, "...Ah... I don't know the reason for it, but Asahi-kun withdrew from the competition. Just this morning, I'm told. I've been on a train all day trying to get here so I could tell Yuri-kun in person."

"Why don't you just call like a normal person?"

"Because he's Smol Nugget." Viktor explained, patting the teen's head like he was a pup.

Yurio just squinted his eyes in annoyance at them both and went quiet.

"So far as I know," Minami went on, "He hasn't withdrawn from going to the Olympics at this point. But, he's definitely out for Four Continents. So, as the next best skater in our bracket, I'm going in his place."

Murmurs arose on the Nishigori side of the table. Yuri crossed one arm across himself to perch an elbow, and curl a few fingers around his chin in thought. He couldn't help but think out loud, "I wonder if he joined up with a new team and just doesn't have time to get ready."

Loop stood up and crossed her arms, "We've been looking ever since we found out he wasn't at Yu-Topia anymore. We haven't seen a single photo of him on any of the Japanese team pages, not even in the backgrounds. Wherever he is, he's off the radar."

"...He must've gone back to Imari." Yuri said, but was pulled out of his thoughts by an unhappy grumble from next to himself. Eyes turned and he spotted an unimpressed Viktor looking at their stacks of dishes, "...Something to say?"

"Nothing I haven't said already." The silver moped, "But I have this strange feeling we'll be going south soon."

"You did get upset that you didn't get to see the pictures of me from my younger skating days at the Imari rink." Yuri pointed out with a wry smirk, "You chased me into the Ice Castle because of it."

The Audi came to a screeching halt in the middle of the parking lot, and Viktor turned dubiously, leering over the edge of his arm towards the suddenly-nervous man next to him, "...Did you just say...there's pictures of you in that case?"

"Y-Yes...? Probably?" He answered, spooked, "I did skate for that rink during Juniors..."

"There's pictures of baby Yuri standing on a podium, in that case?"

"Well I wasn't a baby back then, maybe 14 or something...?" He dismissed, clicking off his seatbelt. Viktor's affect looked dark, eyes shining through like a cat's, "Yuri."

"Ye-y-esss...?" He was practically backing into the door then, pawing for the handle.

"Why did you let us leave the city without letting me see those pictures first?"

"Su-sumimasen."

klA-KlunK

Yuri tumbled out backwards with a thud, backpack falling after him, and he rolled arse-over-head away. Like some kind of ninja, he kicked the door shut and took off running.

"Yuri!"

"You'll never take me aliiiiivveeee!"

"YURI!"

"Consider it incentive to go." Yuri said, poking his partner's shoulder affectionately, "Or a silver lining, or the cherry on top...whatever you want."

Viktor couldn't believe the quagmire he'd suddenly found himself in, and just crossed his arms, muttering something about 'baby Yuri' under his breath.

"Don't your parents have pictures like that?" Yurio asked for them all, as though it were so obvious that even Viktor should've thought of it.

"Maybe, but they're really old, so they're probably in a banker's box somewhere in storage." Yuri shrugged, "Besides, Viktor was more keen on the fact that those pictures were in a display case than anything. Right?" He looked back.

"...Pictures of baby Yuri..."

"Ah jeeze, we'll go tomorrow." He shook his head, "If we find Asahi, then at least we can figure out why he's dropping things."

"Can I come?" Yurio asked meekly, drawing perplexed eyes over. He just pressed harder against the wall and pulled his knees up as a defense, "Don't look at me like you forgot that I said we'd sorted things out while you were gone!"

"We didn't forget." Viktor huffed, resting his jaw in the palm of one upturned hand, leaning against the table, "Just surprised you'd want to come."

"Mik's probably going to want to be part of this, too." Yuri pointed out, "I had hoped they'd be back soon enough for me to ask if he would."

"Not even gonna give him a minute to sleep?" Viktor wondered, feeling even more exhausted on his uncle's behalf, "We don't all have your boundless stamina, my love."

"I wasn't planning on going at the crack of dawn." Yuri defended nervously, "Maybe after lunch. Though..." He paused, turning to the triplets and their parents behind them, "Did you guys notice anything off about Asahi before he vanished? Did he say anything?"

All five shook their heads in unison. Yuko looked a bit disappointed, "No, sorry... He barely said a word to anyone." She turned her attention to Yurio though, "He talked to you some."

The teen looked a bit cornered, "Erh...well, I mean... He helped me with the snow-shoveling a bit. We had some words, sure, but-"

"What'd he tell you?" Yuri wondered.

"Christ." Yurio muttered under his breath, "Of course he'd ask." He cleared his throat and lifted his head again, "About a bunch of things. I made him show me his post-Halloween liquidation sale costumes, after he got an eye-full of your outfits."
"Ours?" Viktor asked, eyes narrowed slightly in dubious skepticism.

Yuri nodded, and rested his wrist over one upturned knee, "I had to bring the Exhibition suits here before we left, and Saito was in the banquet-hall at that point, so he was right next-door to me. I wasn't going to be a dick and tell him he can't look at some clothes." He explained, "Okukawa is...er...I guess she was working on getting Saito into some proper outfits for the upcoming competitions. His outfits were literally cobbled together from whatever he could find. He might as well have been using duct-tape and a prayer to keep them from falling apart. I'm shocked he hasn't had any wardrobe malfunctions yet."

Yuri's brows raised anxiously, but before he could let his worry get the better of him, Viktor snaked an arm around his waist and pulled him back to rest against his chest. Yuri drew a breath and exhaled quickly, focusing on the feel of his husband's body against his back, He's his own person...and he's older than I am... He thought to himself, echoing the words in his head like a prayer of his own, and held his fingers loosely to Viktor's arm where it crossed over him, I can't have so much of my worry piled up for him that I have none left for Viktor or myself.

"Anyway," Yuri carried on, "I tried to pry out of him a reason for why he had never been mentioned before, but he was slippery about it and wouldn't answer. The best I got was that he thought he scared you, and that's why you left for Detroit." He nudged a finger towards his friend, "But he never actually explained anything about what that meant. What the Hell's he talking about?"

Grimacing slightly and muttering a grumble to himself, Yuri held a bit tighter to Viktor's arm, practically folding both of his own over it to keep it lodged in place, "...He..." Yuri started, stumbling slightly on how he wanted to phrase it, "...He thought we were more than friends for a bit. I already had a thousand other reasons for wanting to train abroad, but he just...got a bit overbearing and zealous for a minute. I got spooked and wanted to put everything about Japan in my rearview mirror, including him. Being in Detroit was such a distraction that Asahi got buried deep at the bottom of my brain." He explained, pausing a moment in his thoughts before going on, "...What I did to him was the worst thing I've ever done to anyone. The guilt over it, and especially as I was starting to remember the things I'd repressed, was starting to eat me alive. Even now, there's this gnawing at my soul, like I have to try and put him back together after I broke him right in half all those years ago." He sighed quietly, "I'm having a hard time not blaming myself for all the things he's suffered since I abandoned him. If I'd had more courage back then...I would've told him that I didn't mean to lead him on, and that I was sorry. But I never did. I still haven't. I...think that's why I keep wanting to help him. I'm still the same weak coward I was back then...too scared to admit to him what wrong I'd done, and apologize for it..."

"You're not a coward." Viktor challenged, twisting slightly so he could lean down and kiss his husband's brow. He brought his other arm around to hug him with both, "You're the strongest and bravest person I know, and I'm not just saying that because I love you. That's the truth. You inspire me every day."

Yuri managed a smile, but it was short-lived, "I'm stronger because I have you...but when I see Asahi, the guilt makes me frail. I can only imagine how it feels for him to see me now, especially since I hurt him so badly before when I left, because I was so sure I wasn't into guys...only to show up with you on my arm..."

"Anyone who's known you since you were about 12 would understand why you'd be with Viktor if you got the chance." Nishigori pointed out, "You and Yuko would never shut up about him back then. I wouldn't be surprised if you'd been in love with him that whole time, not just since he showed up."
Face beat red, Yuri looked aside with puffed-out cheeks for a moment, but Viktor gave him a gentle squeeze to bring him back.

"Maybe that's part of why you rejected Saito so soundly." Nishigori went on with a shrug, "Your heart already belonged to someone else, even if you didn't know it yet."

Hazel eyes briefly scanned past Yuko, but Yuri looked away quickly, melting into his soulmate's embrace to avoid the thought, "Whatever it was...I knew I didn't want to be with him. I don't think I'll be able to completely stop worrying about it now that I remember what I did to him in the end. It's like a black spot on my conscience. ...This is what I've been scared to confront all this time...and part of it is because I know how much it's going to hurt him to have to go through, too...I just...don't want to keep hurting him. He never did anything to deserve it back then. And now..."

"You gotta tear that bandage off at some point, Yuri." Yurio pointed out glibly, "It'll never heal if you don't let it breathe."

"I know, but-" Yuri contested, pausing a moment as he felt his heart pounding in fear as he thought about it. He grunted a sigh and forced himself to breathe and calm down, closing his eyes for a moment, "...He's suffered so much since I left. He finally found some happiness and freedom, and right as he was about to break off the chain that held him to his parents, his happiness was ripped right out of his hands. I have a really hard time squaring the idea of having to cause him so much pain again when he's still recovering from Riku's death." He explained, "Confronting what I did to him, and making amends, may be better for me in the end...but I feel like...my mental wellbeing is almost not worth how selfish it would be of me to attain it. I can't stand it. It's tearing me apart."

"Have you considered that he may actually be able to handle it?" Viktor chimed in curiously, "It's a sore spot for him, sure, but he's survived so much already...maybe hearing one person say they're sorry would actually help him more than hurt."

"I support whatever you think you need to do to feel comfortable in your own skin again. I don't want you to carry this monkey on your back forever. It's not fair to you, and it's not fair to us." He explained, "When we have our second wedding, I want your conscience to be clear."

Feeling a flutter in his chest, Yuri couldn't help but let his eyes water a little, "You don't know how happy it makes me to hear that."

"I know it seems chaotic that I waffle from adversarial to agreeable when it comes to Saito, but my primary motive has always been to do what's best for you." Viktor explained, rubbing his cheek against his spouse's hair affectionately, "If this is what you think you need to do to finally have this cloud go away...then I'll help you through it, like I've always done."

"...Who would be arriving here this late at night?" Minami wondered quietly, looking towards the door to the foyer. His eyes went back to Yurio as the Tiger stood up.

"We're two idiots short of a fun-house." He explained, heading through the opening in the wall to look. Peeking through, he spotted the expected last pair of people that would complete their little clan, "Yeah, it's them."
Viktor and Yuri looked aside, as they could hear the sound of the front door closing even if they hadn't heard it open. The round thumping noise of shoes being kicked off and tired feet shuffling across the hardwood was easy to pick-out after that, as was Hiroko going out to greet them, drying her hands on her apron.

"Are you guys hungry?" She wondered, "We've closed down the kitchen here, but I can make you something upstairs if you want."

Minako shook her head as she shrugged out of her winter coat, "We're actually so late because we stopped to get something to eat before coming back. Needed some time just on our own for a bit."

"Ah yes," Hiroko smiled, "Having time away from the kids is always important."

"...It's...not actually because we wanted time away." She explained reluctantly.

Exhausted, Mikhail quietly stepped by them, coat hanging across his arm as he made his way towards Yurio, "Is my nephew here?" He asked quietly, bags under his eyes.

The Tiger nodded wordlessly and stepped aside, the aura around his 'father' feeling heavy and ominous. Emerald eyes went into the room to spot the nervous look on Viktor's face for having heard his name. All eyes were focused on Mikhail though for the moment.

"Viktor," The elder said simply, "A moment."

No one said a word as the silver stood up, bare feet tapping on the ground as he followed his uncle out of the room, glancing back briefly before vanishing behind the doorframe. As they made their way through the hall that lead to the overnight area of the resort, Viktor slowed his pace a little, "Mimi...?"

The sliding door to the big rented room was pushed open, and Mikhail gestured inside, following after as Viktor went in. He pushed it back into place after, and blinked slowly, eyelids heavy.

"...Have you slept at all?"

"Mmno." The elder answered grimly, "I'm still wearing the same clothes I left Vienna in, too. I probably smell awful."

"...Can't say I'm worried about it. What's going on? Did something happen with the house?" Viktor wondered, his sense of trepidation growing with every confusing second that passed, "Did you get attacked like we did...?"

Mikhail shook his head slowly, but worked up the strength to look his nephew in the eyes, "...Viktor... Your father...he's..."

"...Gone."

Jade irises were wide for a moment, but Mikhail could feel himself slouch slightly to hear the word, "...Yeah."

Viktor was surprisingly pragmatic about it, "How?"

"It's being investigated. I'll probably get a call in a couple days."

"Why were you even out that way? I thought you were just poking around St. Petersburg because of my old - your new - house."
Mikhail waited a moment, his brain a bit foggy from lack of rest, "I wanted to check on Kon after that last phone conversation I had with him and Yuri. It's not every day you lose your son twice, right?"

"Sure...but that was his choice."

"I know." The elder nodded, crossing his arms loosely over his chest for lack of knowing what else to do with them, "But I thought I'd check anyway, since I had a lot of hours to wait for my flight. I...found him at home. I don't know when he passed. He was in bed. It looks like he just went to sleep and never woke up, but...you never know with these things."

"And his animals?" Viktor asked simply.

"A groom came to pick up the horse. A vet and farrier are checking him out today." Mikhail explained regimentally, "The dog..."

For a moment, a pang of worry shot through the younger's chest, "Is she okay? Was she hurt?"

"...She's in the car." Mikhail answered, huffing an uncomfortable half-laugh as he ran a hand through his hair, "I didn't know what to do with her. I don't even know her name, if she had one..."

"Prizrak."

"...I can see that. Well, I named her Scruffy for the travel paperwork. I don't know if you and Yuri would consider adding her to your pack, or-"

"We'll take her. I hold no grudges against dogs; they're innocent." Viktor answered easily.

"...That's good." Mikhail nodded, feeling some relief to know the pup had somewhere to go, "Are you going to be okay?"

Hesitating a moment, Viktor stepped forward, and put both arms over his uncle's shoulders, giving what comfort he could, "There was no love between my father and I. I gave him a chance to see me for who I am, and to be a part of that, but he rejected it. My concern is you. You're the only one left."

"...Yeah..." The elder agreed quietly, patting his nephew's side before Viktor let go, "...I guess I am, aren't I?"
It seemed like ages passed. The group in the common-room had fallen to an uneasy quiet. Minako stood like a sphinx in the foyer, a dubious look on her face while she waited. All the uncertain waiting and confusion, the silence and watching, hoping anyone would speak up to break it up, went unanswered.

And then, it all suddenly came to a crashing end.

"Yuri, we're going." Viktor called suddenly, and all the sound of the resort came back to their hearing.

Yuri blanched in surprise, watching Viktor go by to find their jackets and bag, "We're not even going to change...? We're still in our spa robes."

"No time. Minami, you're coming too."

"Eh?" The teen gasped, jumping up to his feet.

Viktor was pulling his coat-sleeves on his arms as the younger pair came out, and he grabbed his husband's as soon as his hands were through, tossing the garment over to its owner, "Come. We don't have time to wait around. The store's closing soon."

"Store!?" Yuri echoed, "Why are we worried about going to a store?"

"Why is he going instead of me?" Yurio suddenly asked, thumbing at Minami.

"Because you have a family to spend the night with, and since he came here to see Yuri, that makes us responsible for him." The elder answered, also thumbing at the confused teen, "I don't want to make Mama Katsuki get everything ready for a new overnight stay when we have a guest room we can plunk him into."

Still confused, Yuri pulled his jacket on, hyper-aware of the parts of his legs that were about to be painfully exposed to the winter night air, "Viktor, can you please slow down and tell us what's going on? What's so important that I can't even take a second to put some pants on?"

"We have a new puppy to get ready for."

Yuri's eyebrows did something weird as he struggled to comprehend why that was such an emergency, but he clenched his eyes shut and shook his head, "Minami isn't a puppy, no matter how much you like to toy with him like he is."

"Not him, a real puppy. Come on, I'll show you."

The doors to the parking lot slid open and Viktor bid his cohorts out. Watching them go, Minako felt Mikhail's presence slide up quietly beside her, "...I thought you were going to tell him."

"I did. Rather, he figured it out." The silver elder answered tiredly, "He's being surprisingly practical."

"He's acting like he doesn't care."
Mikhail hesitated a moment, looking to his gaggle of kids all watching from the doorway, wondering what was going on, "...I don't think he really does." He said simply, then stepped out into the light and ushered his brood back into the common-room, "Gather 'round...I'll tell you what happened. I just wanted to tell Viktor first."

Outside, Viktor went straight for the still-running vehicle, and the lights on inside. Though the Shepherd wasn't visible yet, when the door was pulled open, the pup jerked up from where she'd been curled up on the back seat and flattened her ears against her head with a whine. Viktor offered his hand forward, squeezing it through the space between the edge of the door-panel and the front passenger seat, "Bud' horošej devočkoj, vot tak..." (Be a good girl, like this...) He said soothingly. Prizrak sniffed his fingers pensively, and Viktor smiled when he saw her tail thump nervously against the leather seat. He reached further to grab for the leash that was lying around the dog's paws, and clicked the seat to bend and slide forward so she could jump out.

Yuri deadpanned the whole thing, looking rather serious with part of his coat covering the bottom half of his face, and his hair slicked back, "...Why are you talking to a dog in Russian...?"

The anxious fluffy boofer jumped out of the car, looking up at Viktor first and then at Yuri and Minami next to him. Her tail continued to sway, but she held it low against her legs, still as nervous and skittish as ever.

The red-flags were suddenly flying in Yuri's mind, "...Russian language, Caucasian Shepherd, came with Mikhail, who just came from Russia..." He said, putting it together. Eyes went up dubiously to his husband then, "Is this Prizrak?"

"It's Scruffy now, apparently." Viktor answered, pushing the door closed again.

"Viktor Nikiforov, what the Hell is going on? Why is Prizrak in HASETSU? Is Kon about to jump out a bush or something!?" Yuri barked, making the pup go down to the ground, tail pressed between her legs.

Viktor paused, surprised by the use of his first and last name, but once it passed, he shook his head, "My love, Konstantin isn't going to jump out of a bush. He's not here. He's not...anywhere."

Minami stayed quietly by, listening in confusion, but not wanting to interrupt just to ask for an explanation. He turned his eyes to his idol, and watched the dawning of realization rise on his face.

"...He's...gone?" Yuri said, his voice barely a note above a whisper, and he looked down, "...So these past few days... And when you said...that you felt free..."

"The shadow that's been cast over me since back then...it lifted. It went with him when he left this world." Viktor nodded solemnly.

"...How did he...?"

"Mimi doesn't know yet. He's waiting on an answer." He answered, "All he knows is what he saw himself. My father passed at home in his own bed. It's...probably the best way anyone could ask for."

"...Are you okay?" Yuri wondered, brows raised anxiously, "I mean, after all the effort you put into trying to have a relationship with him..."

"'Tried' being the operative word. My effort lead to nothing. All in all, after everything that's happened...I think this is probably the most appropriate way this whole thing could've ended. I don't ever have to worry about him suddenly deciding to try and reconnect again in the future, Mimi doesn't have to go out there to check on him anymore... That whole saga is over. He's at rest, and I can rest." Viktor explained, suddenly feeling bad for having dragged Minami into the middle of that kerfuffle, "...Sorry, Smol Nugget. This must all seem like insanity to you."

"Ehrr... Well...I mean, it's not like I told anyone I was coming... Anything could've been going on when I got here." The teen defended, "I feel a bit like I'm intruding now though."

"No, it's fine." The Russian reassured, and looked back to his partner, "...Yuri?"

He sighed slightly and shook his head, turning on a heel, "...I'm going back inside to change. There's nothing Prizrak needs that can't wait until tomorrow, and my ankles are frozen solid. ...Minami-kun, come on."

Viktor watched the two go back towards the door, confused at first, but then nodded to himself in understanding. With his head bent down, he looked to the dog lying down by his legs, "...Horošo, Prizrak, pojdem vnutř." (Alright, Ghost, let's go inside.)

Though everyone else had been ferried back into the common-room and were getting the news about what happened still, no one was deaf to the sound of the front door sliding open again. They went quiet a moment to hear footsteps, shoes being kicked away, and more footsteps that lead to an unseen door.

Yuri paused there, and looked back to Minami still standing in the foyer by the cow-skin rug, "...I'll be right back. My clean clothes are in here. Just hang out a second and then we'll go."

"...Okay..."

Viktor came back in as well a moment later, and slid the front door closed behind him. Prizrak shook the outdoor chill off and sat down to look around, staying close to Viktor's side. He spotted Minami watching him in turn, and suddenly felt a bit guilty, "...Uhm...sorry again." The silver started, reaching his free hand up to rub the back of his neck, "Everything leading up to what just happened is kind of a long story..."

"You don't have to tell me anything if you don't want to..." The teen answered, "I get the feeling I walked into a few big...things."

"Oh, the Saito issue? Yeah, I guess you did walk into that one. That's complicated...but we're going to try and sort it out tomorrow. Yuri's on a mission, and I'll follow him wherever he goes." Viktor answered, "Though I am personally relieved that Saito's not going to Colorado with us, I'm hopeful that he doesn't drop from the Olympics, too. There's room enough in PyeongChang for all of us. He's earned his spot there."

"I see..."

"Tonight it going to be pretty light though, Yuri willing." The silver went on, "I worry that he'll take the news of my father's death worse than I have." He shrugged though, "My father was...difficult. We were estranged for some 20 years. We only started talking again because my mother died last year, but it hasn't been the easiest reunion."

"So you're probably not sad at all that he's gone now."

Viktor paused a moment, but then smiled forlornly, "...Not really. I gave it my best shot to make amends and figure things out with him, but we'd grown too far apart and our values were irreconcilable. In a way, I'm actually kind of glad he's passed away...not for myself though. He was completely alone out there. In a weird way, he's free now, too, and he can go to my mother knowing he tried, for her sake."
"Yeah..."

Quiet fell between them after that, and they waited in that silence for Yuri to return. It was thankfully only another few seconds before the door to the men's changing room opened and the aforementioned skater came back out, fully dressed and warmed-up from his earlier chill. He pulled his jacket over his arms again, eyes staying down for a moment, but then raising to the concerned dog staring back at him.

"...You go quiet when something is on your mind, my love." Viktor commented, bending down slightly to try and catch a glance.

"I...don't really have words right now." Yuri answered, pulling the zipper up on the front of his coat, "I just want to go home."

"Maybe I should stay here..." Minami suggested quietly, "I don't want to impose. It seems like you guys have a lot going on."

"No, it's...fine, really." Yuri insisted, trying to shake the weird feeling he had, "I mean, we were just in the middle of a pretty stark situation anyway, learning that Asahi quit Four Continents...and now this comes up. It's a lot to take, but it'll be okay. I'd be glad if you came to stay with us tonight."

Hearing those words lifted the teen's spirit, and he nodded once emphatically, "H-Hai!"

"Alright...give me one second then, and we can go." Yuri added, patting Minami's shoulder as he side-stepped to go back into the common-room for a moment. He was only gone for a few seconds, and when he returned, he pulled his shoes back on and made his way forward to the big sliding door. Viktor caught his hand before he could push it open though, and he looked up at those blue eyes.

"I'm sorry." He said quietly.

"...What for?"

"I'm not sure yet, but I still am."

Yuri hesitated, a little confused, but shook his head and pulled his hand free, pressing his palm over the center of his partner's chest before rising up onto the toes of one foot to offer a kiss, "You have nothing to be sorry for. Let's go."

.

The guest room on the second floor was illuminated by the gentle glow of a table-lamp, and Yuri stepped out of the way to let Minami through, "Hopefully this'll serve. I know your parents are both doctors though, so I'm sure you're used to much nicer digs."

"No no, this is great! Perfect!" Minami insisted, looking excited regardless, "I'm a bit embarrassed that I didn't think about what I'd do after getting to Hasetsu. I guess I was just overwhelmed with excitement. I mean...I made my Senior debut last year but I didn't get to go to any real big events until just now."

"Yeah, the limited number of spots available for each country makes going to big events a bit complicated, when there's a bunch of good skaters on the same team. I'm really glad you're getting to come this time though, as an athlete. I'll introduce you to Phichit-kun. You'd fit right in with him, Leo, and Guang-Hong." Yuri explained, feeling a little more relaxed now that he was at home again. Jiro had followed them upstairs but was snuffling around in the master bedroom, "Make yourself at home. We're gonna relax downstairs for a little while if you want to join us."
Minami nodded again, and turned excitedly to go into the room. Yuri went looking for his wayward puppy, shuffling into his bedroom to spot the Akita's rump sticking up in the air where he'd tried to get under. Bending down, Yuri picked the pup up, and put Jiro against his shoulder with a finger-boop to that cold nose, "What'er you up to, little dude?"

Jiro just playfully licked and nibbled at the finger while it was close, tail wagging back and forth under his human's arm. Yuri smiled and turned back around, clicking off the light to head back downstairs. He found Viktor on the couch with Makkachin, watching a silly Japanese game-show with a cup of reheated mulled wine in his hand. When he came around the side of it, he found his partner's hand coming up to find him, and he reached back to take it. He kissed those fingers as he came around the front, and apologized to the poodle as Makkachin got up to make room. With a yawn, Yuri set Jiro down, and the puppy trotted off, passing Prizrak where she'd curled up on the floor near the back door on his way to the water bowl.

"How's she doing so far?" Yuri wondered, looking to the long-haired Shepherd as he sat down, cozying up against his husband's side. One of Viktor's knees was perched upward, and Yuri wrapped an arm around it.

"She hasn't barked, but she did eat some, so that was good to see." He answered, switching his wine mug from one hand to the other, and reached his newly-freed fingers forward to paw at the side of his spouse's neck and shoulder, "I feel like you've been holding back your true feelings on things. My love, please don't..."

"Maybe I have a little bit... I guess I needed a second to process things." Yuri admitted, pressing into the feeling of those fingers brushing against his cheek, "We were just there, and he was fine...and now he's gone..."

"I know..."

"I didn't want to think the worst, but without knowing what Mik saw, I couldn't even begin to speculate. I had to go back to ask him before we left, if Mik thought your father had...done this to himself on purpose somehow..."

"I considered the same, but Mimi is certain this wasn't a self-destructive act." Viktor explained, moving his fingers further up to brush a few stray black hairs behind an ear, "He thinks my father went to bed one night, and something happened. Maybe a heart attack like Yurio's grandpa...maybe a stroke...? He said that the only thing he couldn't figure out was why the window in the bedroom was open. The door was closed, and Prizrak was left alone in the front rooms, but because she was inside, and Čužak looked well-cared-for, Mimi doesn't think this was planned. Everything to him looked as though Kon had planned to get up and go back at it the next morning. He just...didn't get to."

"...I can't stop myself from thinking this had something to do with how we left things." Yuri commented, "I know that it was his choice how we parted ways, but...still. The timing is just..."

"I know. It's hard not to think they're connected." Viktor agreed, "But try not to stress about it. Mimi will tell us what the Russians find out about how Kon passed."

"What about a funeral...?"

"My father would never want to be buried anywhere but next to my mother. The ground is still frozen though. They'll have to wait for a thaw."

"...Would you want to go?"
"No."

Yuri was stunned slightly by the immediate answer, but as it sank in, he nodded in understanding, "Okay."

"I hope you don't think less of me for that."

"No, I...I get it. Going back to Russia wasn't supposed to be something we had to think about again, unless one of us got assigned to Rostelecom. I don't want to go back, and I don't want you to go, even on your own...especially not on your own." He corrected, shaking his head as he drew a nervous breath, "This is all just so shocking still. I wonder if he just lost the will to live...? Next week will basically be the anniversary of your mom's sudden passing. Maybe he just couldn't do it anymore. Between that, choosing to cast you out for good, and then the mill closing...it was just a constellation of bad luck for him."

"Yeah. It's possible. I have to believe he never meant to cause his animals to suffer though. Even when he came to NHK on short notice, he got something arranged so Čužak would be looked after until he got back." Viktor pointed out, taking a sip from his hot wine.

Yuri reached a hand up, silently asking for a sip of his own, and Viktor passed the mug over easily. Having a taste or two, Yuri looked into the dark purple liquid, "Are you going to be okay with all this?"

"My concern is for Mimi." He explained, "I mean, it's weird to think that I'm technically an orphan now, but since I'm grown, it doesn't bother me so much...I already have a life established, and a new family. But Mimi is the last man standing from that group. He was basically as estranged from them as I was, and technically it was for more years, but...he really tried to reconnect with Kon when he got back. It must've been really hard to find things in the condition they were. I think this'll hit him harder than anyone."

"Yeah..."

"For now, the only thing we can really do is move forward on your plan to go to Imari tomorrow." Viktor said, changing the topic, "I'll get to see the pics of you in that display case, and with any luck, we'll figure out what's going on with Saito...and you can finally get your peace from him."

"Maybe going south will help Mik, too. It could at least serve as a distraction while he waits for that call."

"Yep. One thing at a time."
Despite having been home for a day and a half already, no groceries had been bought yet still. The orange peel for Viktor's mulled wine had been dried months back, kept in air-tight jars in a neat line - with his other favored ingredients - on the back of the counter. Still, there were enough non-perishable dry snacks around that the evening wasn't without something to nibble on. A bunch of brainless television was watched until people started dropping, and Viktor was the last one still awake.

Yuri had curled up around his frame like Makkachin used to, legs curled under upturned knees until he could rest his head on his partner's chest, one arm draped across his front. Minami had taken up residence on the edge of the kotatsu, and had fallen asleep leaning against it. Jiro and Makkachin had made a nest in the opposite corner of the couch from Viktor, squeezing in between Yuri and the cushion, keeping Viktor's feet warm. Blue eyes wandered to the time on the cable box though, reading nearly midnight, and he quietly resigned to the idea that it was probably time to go to bed.

"My love," He started whispering, trying to nudge his husband awake so he could unravel himself, "We should go upstairs."

"Mnnnh..."

Viktor began the delicate task of wiggling free, and helped his partner sit up normally again as he rose to stand next to the couch. He offered Jiro and Makkachin some pats as well before he looked around the room for the newest member of their pack. He didn't spot the lady-critter until he looked over the back of the couch and found her lying curled-up, half-underneath, with her nose pointing towards the back door. Viktor wasn't sure if that was a sign of her starting to relax, or if that's just how she'd always been. Knowing she'd basically been found in the woods as an abandoned pup made him question whether it was possible for her to be a normal happy dog. Without a second thought, he went around the end of the couch and sat on the floor next to the dark-colored creature, offering a few soft strokes over her head.

"Znaju, èto neprosto." (I know it's not easy.) He said quietly, "Dela pojдут лучье, обещаю." (Things will get better, I promise.)

"Everything okay?" Yuri wondered, adjusting his glasses a little.

Viktor glanced up, then back to the Shepherd, "I can't tell if this is just how she is, or if she's in shock or depressed or what. My father didn't really have her for a very long time, but he was all she had. I don't know if she understands what's going on."

"I'm sure she knows..." Yuri suggested, "She may have been stuck in another part of the house, but she would've been able to smell the change. We'll take her on a walk tomorrow and see how she
"...Are you okay with this...?" The Russian asked suddenly, looking up again at the face watching him from higher up, "Having her?"

"...Well, if I had my way we'd change her name at least. I have a hard time pronouncing it."

"What would you call her? Not Scruffy, I hope..."

"No way." He answered, shaking his head, "...I'd have to think about it. You should think of something, too."

"Maybe just Ghost."

"Oh...yeah, sure." Yuri agreed easily, yawning after. He turned away after that and moved towards Minami, nudging the teen's shoulders to wake him up, "We're all going to bed now, Minami-kun."

"Hokaayyyy..." He answered hazily, lifting his head slightly to look around with bleary eyes.

Makkachin and Jiro were both up then, sensing the transition, and they hopped down to start trotting towards the back door. Viktor rose up to slide the glass frame across, and the two pups went out for their midnight wee. The back yard was a small space, enclosed by a high wall of bushes that blocked the view to and from the street, but it was enough for the dogs to root around a little bit and get their business done. To his relief, Ghost got up as well and went out after the others, shuffling along with her tail and head down.

Viktor watched her go curiously, and rubbed his chin as he wrapped his arms around himself to shield him from the cold night air, "...She walks like she's 15 years old." He commented, "You'd never know she was barely a yearling if you hadn't been told."

Yuri looked back from where he'd helped usher Minami to the bottom of the stairs, and wandered back to the open doorway, rubbing one of his partner's arms as he got near, "I'm sure she'll be alright. This is a big change of scenery, even without the rest."

"We need to get her to the vet as soon as we can." The silver commented, pulling his spouse closer with an arm over his shoulders, "My father thought she was about 6 months old. She could have a heat cycle at any time if we don't get her fixed. I doubt he did it."

"Yeah..."

Jiro was the first to come back inside, and Yuri bent down to scoop him up like the wiggly bean he was. A towel was quickly procured and wet nubbins were dried before they were allowed to set down on the floor again. Viktor was sure to do the same with Makkachin as he came back through the doorway. Ghost submitted to the pat-down as well, though it was clear to see she was confused and uneasy, as Yuri could see the whites of her eyes when she looked around. With all three dogs accounted for and their twelve collective paws dried off, the door was closed again and the duo made for the stairs.

Keeping the lights down, they changed and got ready to sleep, but before Yuri could lie down, he pulled his MacBook out. Sitting in bed with it, he did a quick search for Caucasian Shepherds, and was notably surprised at what he found.

"What is it?" Viktor wondered, pulling the blankets up on his side as he got in, stripped to just his underpants...for Minami's sake, he at least wore something.
"...Although certain breeds are more vicious than others, they are often very aggressive and territorial towards other dog." He answered, reading off the screen, and leaned back as a terrifying image of a snapping and lunging adult Shepherd displayed, "...Maybe she's dangerous."

Viktor paused a moment, but then scooted closer, and looked over one shoulder to read the screen, "...The breed can be a good family dog, if it is well trained and socialized."

"I'm not sure about this." Yuri sighed, slouching where he sat, "I mean, she seems to be pretty sedate right now, but when she settles down and starts to show her real personality...?"

"Akitas are bad with small kids and other dogs, too. But they're being exposed to those things - and each other - really early on. As long as we consistently reinforce that we are the pack leaders, they will fall in line."

"Look at how big these guys get though..." Yuri pointed out, clicking over to a picture showing an adult standing next to a rather burly-looking mountain man, "...I already thought she was big, since she's bigger than Makkachin... But an adult... It's like a damn bear."

"And Akitas are bear-hunting dogs."

Yuri looked to where Viktor had perched on his shoulder and made a face, "All this talk of Akitas but not a peep about poodles."

"Makkachin will be the peace-maker. Poodles are pack dogs and are extremely social, with people and other dogs. He's got seniority between the three of them and the other two will learn to behave based on how he does. He's the example to follow." The silver explained, using one hand to push the laptop's lid down. He kept his husband's eyes on him alone as he moved to pull him down to the sheets and pillows, and slid in slightly over him with a kiss.

Yuri could feel hands roaming, and the laptop slid off his legs as they stretched out. He sighed a breath into one long kiss, and slid his hands up to curl gently around the back of his husband's neck, "...This could get R-rated in a hurry."

"I'll be good. You're still over-dressed though." Viktor pointed out, nuzzling the tip of his partner's nose adoringly, "I understand why, but..."

Pausing in the moment, Yuri huffed a disquieted grunt at himself and wiggled out of his t-shirt, casting it aside as Viktor lowered down to his skin for another kiss. The heat of it was welcome after standing in the cold doorway for so long earlier, but Yuri was too aware of Minami being down the hall to want it to go too much further. Somehow, either because Viktor said he would or because the man could read mind, Viktor backed off naturally, kissing the tip of his nose before lying down on his side.

"Is it weird that I want you more when I know I can't have you?" The silver laughed quietly, reaching up to find and place his pillow.

Yuri had reached down to find and secure the MacBook so it wouldn't get knocked off the bed while they slept, and he eased into his husband's embrace as he returned to his spot. The hot velvet skin of that chest against his bare back was better than the warmth of any blanket, and the hands that pressed to his chest and stomach were like the comforting pressure of a thunder-shirt, warding off all the evils of the world. He exhaled a relaxed sigh as Viktor spooned against him, and tried to look behind his shoulder, "If it were possible for either of us to be that quiet..."

"We could try." Viktor teased, giving a very deliberate push with his hips.
"And people say I'm the inappropriate one." Yuri harped with a laugh, but settled down again and reached for his own pillow to pull it under his head, "Sorry I fussed at you earlier." He added, sliding one hand against the forearm that came around his side, and held to the fingers pressed to his chest, "I guess I was just tense because I was waiting for the other shoe to drop."

"It's fine." The silver answered, kissing the back of one shoulder, "Maybe that's what I apologized for earlier. Not having that other shoe. It's done and over...I have no other feelings about it."

"You sure it's not just going to creep up on you later, like the firing did?"

Viktor didn't hesitate to shake his head no, "Not likely. I gave my father a chance for my mom's sake, out of the things I remembered about her later on. I tried, too, but I never quite got to the point where I liked the man. I left because he caused me pain, and he did it again when we reunited... The fact that he put his hands on you, and made you think you had to protect me...that was unforgivable. I just put those feelings away while I gave him a chance to figure out his priorities." He explained, and kissed that skin in front of him as he paused a moment, "He did apologize for some of the things he'd done, but he never went past that. He never tried to create something positive with me. Not hitting us isn't good enough. So..."

"...Yeah."

"I love you."

Yuri turned his head back again, and felt another kiss against his shoulder. Unable to twist so far around to return it though, he opted to pull his partner's fingers to his lips, and kissed them instead before putting the hand back to its favored place, "I love you, too."

Feeding Minami and putting him on a train back to Fukuoka Prefecture was the first task of the next morning, and he was a ball of energy the entire time. By the time he excitedly promised to win Gold in Colorado, Yuri and Viktor were ready for a mid-morning nap. But, there were chores to do yet, and they hopped back into their red Audi to go back home and pick up the pups. Makkachin was quickly let into the back seat, and his harness was resized and fitted around Ghost's excessively fuzzy frame before she, too, was lead into the back of the car. Yuri kept Jiro on his lap in the front passenger seat, though at about 12 weeks old, he was easily twice the size he'd been when he'd been gifted after the Grand Prix Final...and Yuri's legs felt the difference.

Getting to the beach-head though, Jiro quickly hopped out on his lead, and snuffled around the parking lot as the other two canines were brought out of the back. Makkachin was well-trained and stayed close by even without a leash or harness, but Ghost had developed a sort of gravitational paralysis since the harness had gone on. Viktor had to lift her up to get her out.

"Whew...okay then." He huffed, straightening out his coat and scarf, looking down at the nervous Shepherd, "I'm gonna speak in English from now on cuz basically everyone around you will, too. I know you've never been on a leash before but we aren't in the deep woods anymore, so leashes are a necessity until you learn to stay close like Makkachin does. Right!?" He called, turning to shout the word at his poodle.

Makkachin lifted his head from the frozen sand, ears flopping from the inertia, "Boorf!"

"Exactly." Viktor mused, looking back to the pup in front of him, whose tail was wagging slightly at the tip, "Alright then, let's get moving. If you get used to the leash quick enough, we'll turn this into a morning jog."
Ghost felt the tug on the back of her harness, but looking up to see the humans and two other dogs moving away from her were what got her to rise up and follow. Like the night before, she kind of shambled along like an arthritic old boofer, tail sunken low and head held down. After a few minutes though, and with a few encouraging pats on her head and shoulders, started to let herself get curious about the beach.

"Oh, Yuri, look!"

"Eh?"

"Her tail's up!"

Yuri looked behind his spouse and saw that the words wrung true, and the Shepherd's tail revealed itself to be near as curly as Jiro's, swaying back and forth, dragging long thick hairs across her back with each wag. He looked down to Jiro then, "You ready for this? We're gonna go."

The pup tilted his head curiously, but caught on quickly when he saw his two humans picking up the pace. He chased after them until he caught up, galloping alongside them as well as he could with his comparatively-short legs. Makkachin barked when he spotted them starting their slow run, and seemed to lead the way down the beach, checking back now and then to make sure no one had gotten lost. After several minutes, Yuri had to stop and go back to pick up Jiro, but then rushed to keep going again, carrying the tired puppy like a sand-bag in his arms.

By the time they'd made it nearly back to where they'd parked the car, Ghost's curiosity about the area lead them into the Niji no Matsubura Pine Grove, a strange stretch of woods between the beach sand and the road going along the coast. Within, the narrow trunks of the trees were twisted and gnarled, as though they grew along paths set by oddly-bent wires. Yuri found one that grew at a diagonal with a twist that made it an easy seat to collapse into, and fought to catch his breath. Jiro had regained his stamina by then and was sniffing around the area.

"What a strange forest." Viktor commented, looking around in every direction, "I know where we are but you can't see the road or the beach from in here. Kind of spooky."

"Y-Yu-chan and I...and Nishigori...used to come here...during the summer..." Yuri commented, still slumped against his tree-seat, "We'd...run all up and down...these woods."

"As little kids? You were allowed to do that?"

Yuri looked over, turning his beanie-covered head on the bark, "Y-Yeah...why not...?"

Viktor shrugged and smiled, "Guess you guys weren't as worried about getting lost. I had my spot in the woods to go to and stayed there. I got lost one time back then, and my dog had to come find me, so I didn't wander far after that."

"Oh..."

Looking at his phone, Viktor checked the time, "It's nearly 11am. We should head back to the car."

"Nearly 11am already? Yeesh...time flies..."

"Right?"

"Alright then..." Yuri huffed, throwing his arms forward to hoist himself back up to sitting. He looked down at Jiro, "You're walking the rest of the way. You're heavier than you look."
Viktor crouched down to Ghost's side and scritched one floppy ear, "Just as soon as you get to trusting us, we're about to betray it and take you to the vet. I assure you though, it's all for the best. They saved Makkachin's life once, and they've helped other dogs, too. I don't know how Mimi got you into the country without a rabies certificate but we'll be sure to fix you up properly."

"Don't say the V-word, she'll learn to know what it means." Yuri teased, stepping closer on the frost-crunchy sand.

"V, E, T, that spells walk." Viktor answered, rising back up again. He turned to find his poodle darting through the grove, and whistled as he reached for his husband's hand, "Makka! We're going!"

"Wu-worf!"

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!