"Okay, great, because I have to open tomorrow," Bucky said. "But if you want to leave my stuff for me, I'll deal with it when I get home. Tim will be in tomorrow afternoon so I may be able to leave earlier if he can hold down the fort."

"Don't worry about it, Love. I'll take care of it and you bring home our bread and butter to feed the family," Steve said. He kissed Bucky's cheek and then led them all out.

Aways down the street, Becca came up by Bucky and shoved her hands in her pockets. "Are you going to tell Mom and Dad on me?" she asked with a frown.

Bucky glanced down at her, confused. "Tell on you for what?" he asked and looked to Steve to see if he knew what she was talking about. The only reason he wanted to go to the cemetery was to tell their parents that they bought their old place.

"For being a bad sister," she mumbled, looking a bit nervous. She had shit on Bucky so hard sometimes when she went to their graves. Becca assumed that Bucky would do the same now that he had the chance.

Bucky stopped walking and snagged Becca's sleeve. "Steve, you and Lilly go on ahead. We will catch up." He waited for them to be off a bit and then looked to Becca again. "Why would you think I'd go tattletale on you to Mom and Dad? I haven't done that since I was sixteen."

"Because I tattled on you," she said. "And I've been pretty shitty to you guys. I mean, I still don't think Lilly should focus more on sports than reading but I didn't have to be so mean about it."

Bucky sighed and pocketed his hands. "Look, Becs, I'm not going to see them to complain about you. I get that you've done that about me and that's fine. You needed someone to talk to about all the shit I pulled and I understand. And I'm really sorry. I don't think, however, it's unfair to ask you to apologize to your sister. You really, really hurt her feelings, and mine."

Becca shrugged her shoulders up and huffed a little. "It's just not fair," she said in a quiet, yet slightly stubborn tone. "I had to lose my parents and deal with you being a mess. Now you clean up and… Now that you're getting better, you're getting kids instead of spending time with us."
That was it. That was the problem right now. Bucky's face fell and he let out a sad sigh in return and pulled Becca in for a tight hug. He held her for a second and kissed the top of her head. "I'm so sorry, Becca. I didn't realize that's how you felt. I just figured you didn't want Christopher or any other babies around because you didn't think I would be able to take care of them and it would be your job. I didn't think of it like that."

Becca tolerated the hug for a few seconds before wiggling free. "At first, I worried he'd be dumped in my lap all the time. But now it's pretty clear you can handle him without my help," she said. "It's not like I don't want more babies around. I... I don't want you spending all your time being a dad instead of a brother."

Bucky nodded. "I know what you mean. I feel like I've been being a dad for five years and have hardly gotten to stop and be the brother again for a bit. You and I used to be really close. Do you remember that? I waited ten years to get a sibling and then I was so happy to finally have you with me. I clung to you and wouldn't let you out of my sight if I could help it. I remember feeling so bad that Mom called me 'Bucky Bear' but didn't have a nickname for you so we called you 'Baby Bear' for a few years when you were a toddler."

Becca rubbed at her eyes, refusing to tear up or cry before they got to the cemetery. "We used to build forts every night and watch Star Trek and pretend we were on the Enterprise," she said. "I used to be afraid that Lilly would replace me when she got old enough to play with you."

Bucky laughed shortly. "Oh my god. You thought you would be replaced? When you came along, I was scared at first because I thought it meant I would go to different parents so you could have mine. I didn't get that siblings were all stuck together. I know that things aren't how they used to be and they never will be again. But we are still together, right? Even after all the times I messed up, I got to keep you. I managed to keep us all together and now look where we are. We just came back home. Finally."

Becca looked over at the entrance to the cemetery and nodded. "Yeah...still together." She stopped Bucky so she could give him a hug. "You did good, Captain Kirk," she complimented with a little smile. She held his hand as they walked into the cemetery.

"Who are you, again? Bones? Spock? Either way. Thanks, Becca," Bucky said. "I love you. You do know that, right?" He squeezed her hand and led her towards the graves where Steve, Lilly, and Christopher were already kneeling and talking.

"Yeah, yeah, I know," Becca said with a wave of her hand.
Christopher sat on the grave and looked between his dad and the stone to try and understand why Steve was talking to a rock. He tried looking behind the stone to see if someone was there.

---

Bucky chuckled and knelt down next to his son and pulled him into his lap. "You look lost, Little Bean," he said. "Is Daddy talking to Gran and Papaw? Here, let's be quiet. Maybe we can hear them, too." Bucky listened intently to the wind and looked up at the sky. Christopher did the same but quickly gave up.

---

"I just finished telling them that we bought a new home together. I wanted to wait until you got here to say which house we ended up buying." He reached out to hold Christopher's little hand. "Why don't you tell them?"

---

"No, me, please!" Lilly interjected. "Let me!"

Bucky shrugged and gestured for Lilly to go on. "I don't mind, Lil. Tell them all about it. Don't forget to tell them what color you're painting your new room."

---

"Bucky and Steve bought our old house!" Lilly exclaimed. Steve let out a little laugh. "I'm painting my room blue," she added with a proud smile. It's going to be beautiful.

---

Bucky smiled and glanced over at his family. "Steve and I needed a bigger place. Our family was quickly outgrowing the apartment we had. And I wanted to get the girls back home and to raise your grandson somewhere that's closer to you."

---

"I don't think Christopher understands who we're talking to. But he will one day and I'm sure he will have plenty to say," Steve said. "We found some stuff left that the other family never touched. I guess it was kept the way you left it, in some ways."

---

Christopher babbled a little to himself and played with Bucky's fingers. "Remember that April Fool’s Day that Lilly and Becca thought it would be fun to hide the silverware?" Bucky asked. "And, Mom, you got so stressed out thinking that someone had robbed us and you couldn't figure out why that was all they took and why they bothered with crappy utensils anyway." He grinned at his sisters. "Lilly found a spoon behind the toilet. I guess you missed some, Mom."

---

Lilly nodded. "We're leaving it there. I don't think anyone would want to use a spoon that's been taped to a toilet bowl for four years anyway."

Steve smiled. "I'm really excited to live in your home. I never got to meet you guys in person, but we all feel closer to you by being there."
Everyone was quiet for a while longer, just sitting and thinking and feeling the breeze. Christopher was messing with the zipper on Bucky’s jacket and making quiet little noises as he went. A few more minutes passed and a couple other people came into the cemetery. Bucky didn't like being here when there were other people. It broke his illusion that his family was alone together again and he had to face where he really was and how his parents wouldn't be able to respond to him. "Is everyone ready to go?" Bucky asked softly and tucked some of Becca's hair behind her ear.

Becca leaned into Bucky. Lilly had been resting her back against Steve as she dozed off. "Yeah, I am. I'm starting to get hungry," Steve said. He picked up a little stone and placed one on each of their graves so they would know they were there.

Bucky gathered Christopher into his arms and got up slowly. "Bye, Mom, Dad. We love you so much." The girls said their goodbyes and walked hand-in-hand towards the gate. Bucky took Christopher's hand and had him wave at the graves before going to follow his sisters with Steve in tow.

As they headed back, Christopher looked around the place curiously and towards the exit, he pointed at a bird. "Ack," he said to Bucky, confusing the bird for a duck like his bathtub toy.

"No, Bean, that's a pigeon." Bucky chuckled. "Close enough, I guess, though." The walk to their new home from the cemetery was shorter than the one to their old apartment. Bucky felt really strange to not be headed to the apartment. He didn't know if he would get used to going back to what he still considered his parents’ place.

"Feels weird not going back to the apartment," Steve admitted, almost reading Bucky’s thoughts. "I bet you I'm going to walk there from the station one day just out of habit," he chuckled. "What are you guys in the mood for to have for dinner?"

"Nothing," Lilly grumbled. She was holding tight to Becca's hand and staring at the ground while she walked. She always got worked up when they went to the cemetery. Lilly was always hungry and high energy but when she went to visit her parents’ graves, she didn't want to think about food and all she wanted to do was sleep in a ball at the foot of her bed covered in a mountain of plush animals.

"Alright. But I'll make enough for you just in case you get hungry later." Steve didn't like to push when it came to Lilly’s mood about her parents. "What about beef stew, Buck? It's been a while since I made stew."
"I like your stew, yeah." Bucky nodded and nudged Steve since he couldn't hold his hand. "I'll work on unpacking Christopher's things while you cook and hopefully his room will be all done by the time he needs to go to sleep."

---

"God, I hope so. I'm happy to have this place to ourselves but moving is a nightmare. I never realized how many boxes of albums you really had," Steve snorted. Once inside, he gave all four of them a kiss before heading into the kitchen.

---

"My collection is a treasure and I'll thank you to treat it with respect," Bucky sassed back and helped Christopher out of his jacket and hat. He worked on putting all their son's clothes and toy and things into the new dresser and shoving whatever else he had into the closet. It didn't take too long and Christopher helped by crawling around and throwing toys wherever he pleased.

---

Raphael ended up joining Bucky and chasing after Christopher to bat at his feet. He never used his claws, so they didn't mind the cat messing with their kid. After about a half hour, Steve called them all down for dinner.

---

Lilly had helped set their table but she left out one spoon. Becca sat down and looked at her place, confused. "Looks like you're going to have to use the toilet spoon," Lilly said and neatly folded her napkin with a grin.

---

Becca swiftly stole Steve's spoon, who then stole Bucky's spoon to replace his. "Bucky gets the toilet spoon," he joked. Christopher laughed at what was going on and threw his own spoon onto the floor.

---

Bucky sighed and took Steve's spoon back to give to his son. "Now we both need spoons," Bucky said tiredly and prevented Christopher from tossing the second spoon to the ground. Bucky got spoons and then Steve said grace and Bucky took the first shift in helping feed Christopher. "So," he said to the girls, "how is the unpacking for you both?"

---

Christopher managed to knock a chunk of a potato to the ground and he let out big belly laughs because throwing stuff on the floor was apparently the funniest thing in the world for babies. Steve couldn't get mad at him. "It's easy," Lilly said. "I just threw everything in a corner. Then I napped," she said proudly.

---

"That sounds productive," Bucky answered sarcastically. "How about you, Becs? Did you just put everything back where it used to be? Maybe we can buy you a bookshelf for your room again so you don't have to stack them in your closet like at the apartment."
"I changed it around. It would be a bit weird to have it how it used to be, you know? Cause it's not the same," Becca explained. "I like it, though. And I'll never say 'no' to a bookshelf," she added.

Bucky smiled at her and nodded. "I'll see what I can do," he said. "And I know what you mean. It isn't the same. But it's nice to be home - to be where Mom and Dad were. I'm glad that you two can have your old rooms again and more space and we don't have neighbors like Dale."

"Thank god, we don't have to deal with Dale anymore," Lilly groaned in relief. "Christ, I can't believe we didn't trash his place before we left like we did to Tish."

Becca smacked Lilly's arm and hushed her. "Shut up, big mouth."

"Excuse me?" Bucky asked and flicked his attention to his sisters. He didn't like hearing that name. Clint had brought her up a few times since the whole ordeal but Steve and Bucky made a point not to mention her at all. "What did you do?"

Steve looked a little alarmed and Lilly shrugged her shoulders up guiltily. She looked over at Becca to see what she should do. "Depends. Are you going to get mad at us if we tell the truth?" Becca asked.

"Depends on what you did," Bucky said and crossed his arms. Not that he was going to really care what they did to the woman but it was still not a good habit for them to get into. Steve hadn't actually done anything with Tish but she did try to steal him from Bucky. So Bucky would probably chastise them a bit but not too much.

Steve was a bit nervous about what the girls did but he stayed quiet. "Well," Becca said. "We waited a few weeks so nobody would get suspicious and we snuck into her house while she was away for the night," Becca explained. "Then Lilly and I took a hacksaw to one of her pipes and flooded her basement. We took all her jewelry and dug it in a hole in her backyard so she thought it was burglars."

Bucky was stunned silent for a while. He just shook his head and stared at the table. He honestly didn't know what to say. He quietly took another bite of his stew and cleared his throat. There was so much going through his mind but the first thing he decided to say was, "Well, I guess there's no doubt that you two are Barnes's. Every Barnes is a criminal in one way or the other. Lilly, I think you hold the record for youngest con, though."
"You flooded her basement and stole-" Steve started but was cut off.

Becca held her hand up and interrupted. "It's not stealing if it never left her property," Becca insisted.

Steve couldn't help but stare for quite some time but ultimately he rubbed his face with a groan. "I can't even be mad at you guys for doing that."

---

"I can," Bucky said. "But I'm far too tired today to do anything about it." He pulled his hair back and sighed. "Just... don't do that shit," Bucky said half-heartedly and waved it off. He looked to Steve to have him add whatever he wanted to his sentiment.

---

Lilly huffed at Becca. "I told you Bucky would get mad," she grumped.

Steve just shrugged his shoulders at Bucky. "Tish is awful and they didn't do any harm to her. I'd go easy on them," Steve said. "And this is coming from a police officer."

---

"I could be a lot more upset," Bucky said tiredly. "I just don't want you two to start your rap sheets this early." He shook his head again and looked to Steve. He wasn't honestly too upset about what they did, just that they did it. He couldn't help but feel like this was his fault. He wasn't a good influence on them in these respects. "How did you know where she lived?"

---

"We tricked Clint into telling us," Becca said with a hint of pride in her voice. Or maybe Clint kind of wanted Tish to get some grief and knew the girls would get off easy if they got caught. Either way, he wouldn't admit it to Bucky.

---

"Dammit, Clint," Bucky said quietly. That man couldn't resist anything that his sisters wanted. "Okay, let's just blow past this whole thing, yeah?" He helped clean up Christopher's face when he got some banana all over him and hoped that everyone else would just drop this.

---

"Beh!" Christopher called to get Becca's attention before flinging his banana peel at her and cackling because he knew he wasn't supposed to do that but throwing things was funny to him.

"Hey!" she complained as her stew splashed on her. Thankfully, there was barely any left. "When is his throwing phase going to end?"

---

Bucky squeezed his eyes shut for a moment and then took Christopher into his arms. "Alright, Bean, bathtime then bedtime. You're not supposed to throw things at your aunts." He looked to Steve and asked, "Do you mind cleaning up in here while I get him off to bed?"

---

Christopher giggled and snuggled against Bucky's chest when he was picked up. "I'll take care of it,"
Steve promised. He cleaned up dinner and was quick to go back to the nursery to finish setting up Christopher's things. He was able to finish just after Bucky got him dressed for bed.

"Okay, he's ready for bed," Bucky said and brought him over to Steve. Bucky's hair was wet from when he got too close to Christopher and the boy had decided that splashing water on his papa's head was appropriate. "I think we should keep our door open tonight so if he gets confused about where we are and starts to cry then we will hear him faster."

"I'm going to miss having him in our room," Steve said, rubbing a hand over the baby's back. "I loved getting to turn over and watch him sleep. Or sometimes I would wake up to him staring at us, waiting for us to get up." He kissed the top of Christopher's head. "I got you a new toy for bedtime, Bean. It'll play music so you won't be so lonesome."

Bucky smiled softly as he watched Steve turn on the toy and place it on top of the dresser. It played quiet gentle melodies that would be perfect to get him to go to sleep. "If you really don't want him out of our room yet we can move the crib to the master. I don't mind. I was just thinking that he will need his own space eventually and we all need to get used to it. Especially if a new baby comes soon."

Steve watched as Christopher listened to the new toy. "How adorable will it be if he gets to share a room with his brother or sister? They can keep each other company so neither has to be lonely," Steve said. "Let's give him a chance to be alone in his room before we move his crib in with us."

"Okay." Bucky smiled and took Steve's hand. "I think he will be fine by himself. I know he's gotten used to us being around but I think he's smart enough to know that we would never leave him." Bucky led Steve back to the master bedroom. They had boxes of their things piled around and all they had managed to get done was to set up their bed. "It's been a long day. But it's been a good one."

Steve collapsed onto their bed with a tired groan. "I'm so relieved that it's over. I've been thinking about sleeping in here with you all day long," he said. "Come here and give me a kiss, Love," he said. "We're homeowners now."

Bucky chuckled and flopped on top of Steve. "We have our own home!" he said excitedly and leaned in to give Steve a kiss. "I love you so much. This was a good decision, I think." He rubbed his hands over Steve's chest and arms and just stared at him.

"I know it was a great decision," Steve said happily. "Now we don't have a landlord to answer to or crappy neighbors. We have more room for more kids. We have a basement. This is the kind of thing
"I've always dreamed about." He cupped the sides of Bucky's face and kissed him slowly. "How're you feeling?"

---

"I'm feeling good." Bucky nodded. "A little worried that Christopher will wake up a bunch in the night, but, otherwise, I'm fine. I am really tired, though. I think we should just head to sleep. I have to be at work early tomorrow and Clint and Tim are both off until the second shift so it's me and Reggie."

---

Steve pouted a little but kissed Bucky's cheek anyway. "Alright. I guess I'll have to wait for another day to make love with my husband in our new house," he said in a teasing tone. "Love you, Sweetheart." He wrapped his arms tightly around Bucky's shoulders and nuzzled him affectionately.

---

Bucky snuggled into Steve and was quiet for a second. "We can make love if you want to," he said softly. "I'm awake enough for that. And it is our first night in the house. Everyone's asleep and we aren't as close to the girls so we don't have to worry that they might hear."

---

"You just said you were tired, Love," Steve said. "I'd rather wait until we both were fully awake." He stroked a hand over Bucky's back and said, "I won't complain if we get naked and fall asleep like that, though." It wasn't so cold out that they needed pajamas.

---

Bucky nodded and yawned. "Yeah, let's do that." He sat up and slowly started peeling his clothes off of himself tiredly. Once he was undressed, he laid back down and waited for Steve to snuggle back to him. "Do you think it's my fault that the girls thought it was an okay idea to break into a strangers house and flood her basement?"

---

Steve undressed and made a happy noise as he got to cuddle skin-to-skin with Bucky. It felt perfect. He closed his eyes and let out a content sigh. "It's not your fault. I wouldn't even blame them for what they did. That woman was an awful friend and an awful person. And they didn't hurt her or steal anything."

---

"They still broke in. And destroyed a pipe. She didn't deserve that," Bucky said. "I just feel like this is step one in them becoming too much like me. I know I'm not always a great influence but, breaking and entering, Steve. That's a big deal. What if they decide to solve all their problems that way?"

---

"We tell them it's not an acceptable way of handling things and we won't stand for them making a habit of this," Steve said. He played with Bucky's hair gently. "They're good kids. They're not going to get in trouble over stuff like this, Baby."
Bucky kissed Steve's neck and hummed in agreement. "Okay. I hope you're right," he whispered. He gently rolled them both over so he was spooning Steve. He tucked his arm over Steve's chest and pushed as close against him as he could. "I love you. Thank you for our new house. Sleep well, Baby."
Steve slept like a log that night and didn't wake up when Christopher started crying down the hallway. It wasn't until morning that he finally roused and looked around for his husband. He threw on a pair of pajama pants and wandered into the kitchen. Nothing. So he went to the baby's room and smiled fondly when he saw Bucky asleep on the floor with all of Christopher's extra blankets and stuffed animals as cushioning. "Dada," Christopher said then pointed at Bucky. "Papa." Steve picked up the baby and placed him down on the ground so he could crawl over to his pop. "Papa!" he said, patting his face.

---

Bucky was startled from his sleep and his eyes worked to focus in on his son. "Christopher? How'd you get out of your crib?" he asked and then looked up to see Steve hovering over him. "Oh, hey, Baby. How long have I been in here? I was just going to wait until he fell asleep but then I fell asleep."

---

Christopher laughed and kissed Bucky's cheek before climbing onto him to get him to play. "I don’t know. I woke up a few minutes ago and wondered where you went off to." Steve sat down next to him and played with his hair. "You looked really cute sleeping down there."

---

Christopher was crawling all over Bucky's chest and arms and giggling as he went. Bucky yawned and looked up to Steve. "I'm surprised you didn't wake up when he cried. Becca stood at her door and angrily glared at me until I calmed him down."

---

"Oh, man, I know that look," Steve said with a cringe as he imagined Becca's pissed look - the one that said she was fed up and she sure as hell wasn’t going to be the one fixing the problem. "Sorry that I didn't wake up. I guess I was super tired last night."

---

"That’s alright." Bucky sighed and sat up. He held Christopher to him as he popped into the hall to check the clock. "I don't have to be up for about two more hours. And the girls need to be up in three. If we can get our boy back to sleep, would now be a permissible time for that new homeowner sex?"

---

Steve smiled brightly and nodded his head excitedly. "I like the sound of that," he agreed. "Alright, Christopher, time to take a nap so your dads can have some private time," Steve said sweetly to their son, who just giggled in response and signed at Steve that he was thirsty.

---

Bucky handed him his sippy cup of water and then eased him back into the crib. "Go back to sleep, Sweetheart," Bucky said and pet Christopher's hair. "I love you." He flicked the lights out again and took Steve's hand to lead him back to their room. "It's so strange not being in our bedroom at the old apartment."

---

"I miss it a little," Steve admitted. "It's where we lived together and started our lives as a couple." He sighed. "We have a lot of good memories there."

---

"We have so many good memories there," Bucky agreed and looked around their room. It was filled with their unopened boxes and their bed. They hadn't brought their dresser in from the hall yet and they hadn't set up their side tables yet either. It was so bare. Also, it was Bucky's parents' old room. He remembered exactly what it had looked like when they lived in it and it kept throwing him off.

---

Steve stroked his fingers over Bucky's jaw lightly when he saw Bucky look around the room. "We are going to have even more good memories here," Steve promised. "I'm so proud of you, Buck, you have no idea." He kissed him gently. "Are you feeling alright? I know it's got to feel a little weird being in this room."

---

Bucky nodded in agreement. "This was their room. The last place they had a good nights sleep." He sighed and looked around at the boxes. This room was still theirs. It hadn't yet become his and Steve's and it probably wouldn't until they were all unpacked. Bucky whined and looked at Steve, "Oh my god, no. I'm never going to be able to have sex in this room - my parents' room - am I?"

---

Steve buried his face in Bucky's shoulder with a pathetic groan. "I was afraid that would be the case," he said. He wouldn't rush his husband or pressure him to have sex there before he was ready, though. Steve kissed Bucky's forehead gently. "We got to make it our room first, don't we?"

---

"Yeah," Bucky agreed and gave Steve's arm a squeeze. "Here, come on," he said and started shoving some boxes where the nightstands would be. He hoisted another box on top and then rummaging in another to find the framed drawing of Christopher asleep on Bucky's chest. "Just make it like how our room at the apartment was. We can drag the dresser in too."

---

Steve chuckled and went to work. He hung up the drawing above where the nightstand would go and started unboxing whatever he could to get the place looking more like they lived in there. "How's that so far?"

---

"Good." Bucky smiled and took out a lamp to place on top of the makeshift cardboard box nightstand. They dragged the dresser in and did a few other things and then sat back on the bed triumphantly. "That's pretty close. Of course, boxes aren't quite as good as our nightstands but I think it'll do for tonight."
Steve nodded and laid back on the bed and crossed his arms behind his head. "I'll get to setting it up properly later," Steve said. "I want to take the time to make sure I get it exactly right.

---

Bucky sighed contentedly and snuggled up close to his husband. "This'll always be my parents' place, but pretty soon it'll be our place just as much. You know? I think the girls have already settled back in. After they have everything unpacked, I think it'll be easy to feel like home once again."

---

Steve stroked a hand over Bucky's back and kissed him a few times. "It'll be the only home Christopher will remember. That's got to count for something. And he will love it here just like you guys did."

---

"I think he's still pretty confused about what we are doing here. It may take him a few days to really get adjusted to being on his own at night and being in a new place," Bucky said. "Anyway, we had plans, I think?" He kissed Steve's neck and rubbed a light hand down Steve's arm.

---

Steve made a small sound of approval and gently stroked his hand over Bucky's ass. "He's a smart boy. He'll catch on," he said confidently and slowly pushed Bucky's pants down so he could touch his now bare ass. "How do you want to do this the first time in our new home?"

---

"I want it calm and slow and perfect and warm," Bucky said with a passionate little smile. "With me on the bed cradled in your arms and you inside me." He licked his lips slowly and tilted his head to the side. "How does that sound to you, Baby?"

---

"I can do that," Steve said with a happy glow all around him. "It sounds perfect." He gently moved Bucky so he was pinned beneath him and he slowly ground his hips against Bucky's while he kissed down his neck.

---

"What's your favorite thing about the new house?" Bucky asked and moved his hands up above his head. "I mean besides owning it and getting to all be here together and all that. I mean, what are you most excited about that we didn't have at the other place."

---

Steve kissed down Bucky's chest and stopped at each nipple to tease it between his teeth. "I like the little garden we have here that I can plant vegetables in," he said. "And the large windows in the nursery so Christopher can see the outside better." Steve placed a kiss on Bucky's hip. "I especially love having all this extra space to fill up with our family."

---

Bucky hummed in approval and squirmed a little underneath Steve. "Guess what Lilly asked when you were helping Becca with her bed? She asked if this meant we could finally get a dog, too. I told her we would think about it but it's not likely."

---

Steve chuckled. "We are getting another baby before we're getting a damn dog," he said. "She already has one animal she doesn't take care of." Steve pet a hand down Bucky's side as he shimmied further down his body. He wrapped his fingers around the base of Bucky's dick and leaned in to tease the head with his tongue.

---

Bucky gasped and bit his lip. His hand went down to hold the back of Steve's head. "We are getting another baby. I want Missy's baby. I know Becca isn't going to be happy but I know I can be a good father and a good brother. I can do it."

---

Steve's eyes lit up and he looked up at Bucky with such a happy expression. If his mouth hadn't been full, he would've said something but, for now, he would focus on making love. He slowly bobbed his head along Bucky's length, taking his time swallowing Bucky's cock and getting him all needy for him.

---

Bucky stopped talking and just watched Steve lick and suck on his cock. He had set the lube up on the pillow and he reached for it and passed it down to Steve as a subtle hint that he should get going. Bucky was getting impatient to have Steve make love to him.

---

Steve took the lube without stopping what he was doing. He coated his fingers with it and pushed two inside of his husband at once. He swallowed Bucky's cock down all the way and looked up at him with dark eyes as he worked his fingers in and out of his ass.

---

Bucky whined high in his throat and desperately pulled at Steve's arm. Steve opened him up for a few wonderful minutes but then Bucky was ready and wanted it. "Come on, Stevie, Baby," he whispered. "Go ahead, I'm ready. Want to feel your cock opening me up. And I need to kiss you."

---

Steve pulled off Bucky's dick with a wet pop and crawled up so he was hovering over Bucky. "You want it bad, don't you?" He slicked up his own cock and lined up to Bucky's ass. "Gonna give you what you need, Love." Steve claimed Bucky's lips in a slow, hot kiss as his dick split him open.

---

Bucky moaned into the kiss and then giggled in his throat. Sometimes he couldn't even fathom how much he loved his husband. It was overwhelming. Steve hadn't moved yet, just held himself inside Bucky and kissed him. They kissed so long that Bucky was left breathless and had to tuck his face into Steve's shoulder to take a breather.
Steve waited for Bucky to look comfortable and ready for him. Then he slowly dragged his dick out before easing it back inside. "I love how good you feel, Baby. Wish I could keep you in here and make love to you all day," he groaned softly.

---

"We can plan a day like that soon if you want?" Bucky asked hopefully. "Your mother did tell me a few days ago that she thinks we have been keeping her grandson from her. And I know Becca wanted to learn how to hem the sleeves on her jacket so she would like to see your mom and get her guidance."

---

Steve let out a laugh at how on bored Bucky seemed for a bit. They could just be so connected sexually and still hold conversations like they were just having a snack. He absolutely fucking loved it and couldn't believe sometimes how perfectly they fit together. He kissed him deeply and gave Bucky's ass a small squeeze as he gave a bit rougher of a thrust. "Consider it done, Husband." He gripped his hip tighter and started rocking his own hips hard enough into Bucky to make the bed creak under their weight.

---

Bucky let a stream of happy little groans escape his lips and he held on to Steve tightly. "You know what I like about - mmm fuck - making love like this? It's purposeful and intimate. And I like talking with you while we make love. It makes it feel so beautifully normal but special at the same time. Do you understand?"

---

Steve wrapped a hand around Bucky's dick and started to stroke him with every thrust. "I understand," he said breathlessly. "I get to say 'I love you' a million different ways when we do this." He took Bucky's hand and guided it down to his hole so he could feel how Steve's dick stretched it.

---

Bucky's heart beat faster and he actually blushed a little bit. "This time last year we had only been living together for about a month. And now all this time later you still make me feel so... I don't know. It's like sometimes you catch me off guard and my whole being is set on fire."

---

"I love it when I make you blush," Steve said sweetly. He cupped the side of Bucky's neck as he nipped at his throat. "That means I'm doing my job as a husband," he said. "You do the same to me."

---

"You're my favorite, you know?" Bucky said with a smirk. "I love being with you. And I'm beyond excited to grow old with you." He reached up and tugged a bit on Steve's hair. "I think I see a grey hair right in here already."

---

"Don't joke like that," Steve gasped, swatting Bucky's hand away and trying to play it cool even though Steve was definitely going to comb through his hair in the mirror to make sure he didn't find any greys. "Talk sweet to me."

---

"What do you want to hear then?" Bucky chuckled and lifted his legs up to wrap around Steve so he could get deeper inside him. "Because I think it's nice to know that I'm pleased about you getting grey hairs but you don't seem too happy about that."

---

"I'm not even thirty yet," Steve lamented. "Compliment me on how hot I am and how spry I am," he tried. He could feel himself getting closer to orgasm and his thrusts became faster and harsher as he tried to hit the angle he knew Bucky loved.

---

Bucky shut his eyes and pushed against Steve's thrusts. "You are twenty-four, Love, of course, you are hot and spry and young and you've got two working hips. You're working them right now." He laughed to himself.

---

Steve pouted a little but he quickly let it drop because he wanted to focus on how perfect it felt being inside of Bucky. He kissed along his neck and teased Bucky's nipples with his fingers. "I want to feel you come," Steve rumbled. He dragged his nails down Bucky's chest and then down to his hole. His finger pressed slowly against his hole so he spread Bucky a little wider as he fucked him.

---

"God, yes," Bucky whimpered and shut his eyes tight. "That feels so good. Another, please, Baby." He pulled Steve closer to him so he could lick into his mouth. He hummed softly and let his hands trail down Steve's back to cup his ass.

---

Steve obeyed. He loved it when Bucky got just overwhelmed enough to lose himself a little. A second finger carefully eased its way inside. "One of these days I'm going to have you on your hands and knees," he growled, rocking his hips steadily. "And I'm going to watch your hole as I play with it and see how much I can stretch it."

---

"Oh, god!" Bucky yelped. Steve really did know how to get him worked up. His chest heaved up and down with each desperate deep breath he took. "I'm gonna come, Steve," he said quickly and leaned forward to clamp his teeth into Steve's shoulder as his orgasm exploded through him.

---

Steve's eyes were dark and focused on every move Bucky made. He watched how his chest rose and fell heavily and how his body wound up right before his release. Steve groaned at the bite but he was more focused on the fucking fantastic tight heat around his cock. Steve pushed forward, grinding into him and taking his husband for a few more thrusts before emptying inside of him.
Bucky was still in the afterglow of his orgasm when Steve flopped on top of him and breathed against his neck. He wrapped his arms around Steve and clenched his ass around his dick a few times to get everything he could from it. "First time in the new house," he whispered.

---

Steve’s body trembled lightly from how good he felt and he laid down on top of Bucky with his softening dick still inside him. "Not bad for our first time, huh?" He chuckled. Steve reached up to play with Bucky's hair with his clean hand. "You're beautiful."

---

"Stop it," Bucky complained lightly and rolled them so he was laying on top now. "You're much more attractive than me. I don't even know why you wanted me in the first place." He was partially joking. He knew how much Steve loved every bit of him, inside and out. And he had grown more accustomed to believing in Steve’s praises as time went on.

---

Steve looked up at Bucky with eyes full of love. "You're the best dad, husband, and brother a guy could ever be," he said with a genuine reverence. "I love watching you with our son. Now I'm imagining you with a baby in each arm, singing to them both."

---

"Well, if that's what you want to see, I need to get to work so we will have the money to afford another kid," Bucky said and kissed Steve a few times before getting up. "I'm going to go in a little early because we have a few crates that need unpacking. The girls will be up in about an hour for school."

---

Steve pouted when Bucky got up and he rolled over to watch his husband as he got ready. "If you must," he said dramatically with a playful smile. "I'll make sure they're up in time and fed." Steve snuggled into the pillows and set his alarm to make sure he woke up from his nap in time. He was all too happy to have dreams of Bucky lying asleep in bed with two babies curled up on his chest, sleeping just as soundly.
A week or so later.

Bucky waited at the door for Missy. He always walked her back to her aunt’s house after every meeting. The baby would be coming in about two months and Missy was pretty big now and ready to get the baby out of her. "Hey, Missy, ready to get going?" he asked and helped her on with her coat.

---

Missy thanked him as she zipped up her coat over her large baby bump. "Yeah, I'm ready to sleep for a year," she said. "I swear, anyone who tells you that carrying a baby is magical is lying to you. It's hell and a half. I sure hope it's cute so it'll at least be worth the trouble."

---

Bucky chuckled and led her down the sidewalk. "My mother always told me that the bravest thing a person could do is carry a baby. Sometimes I thought she was exaggerating the pain but I know I couldn't handle it if I were in her shoes."

---

"I sometimes wonder if I should have aborted it... but it doesn't feel right to me, killing it," she said and sighed. "Did you and Steve move into your new house yet?" she asked, looking like the question was going to lead to another.

---

Bucky nodded. "Yeah, we did. It's amazing. We have almost everything all unpacked." He paused and took a breath. "For what it's worth, I think that a woman should always do what's best for them. But, that being said, I'm glad you choose not to abort this baby... because then Steve and I wouldn't have been able to have it." He glanced at her with a smile. "If you'll let us be the ones to raise it, that is."

---

Missy's head snapped over to him and she stared wide-eyed for a moment to make sure she heard him right. And then a big grin spread on her face and she punched his arm lightly. "I knew it! I knew you guys were scoping out the little sucker when you invited me for dinner! Of course!"

---

"Well, we weren't sure yet about it but Steve wanted to meet you," Bucky said. "At that point, I actually didn't think it was a good idea but I've changed my mind." He gave Missy a gentle hug. "And we will take such good care of this baby. You don't have to worry at all. And I'll have to talk to Steve about it, but I'm okay with an open adoption type thing where you can come visit the baby if you like."
Missy started crying a little because she was so relieved to know that she had a home for her baby. "I know you two will do such a good job. I see how you are with Christopher," she said and then thought for a second. "It doesn't have to be an open adoption. I don't need to see it after it's born. I'm not much of a mother."

Bucky nodded and wrapped an arm around her. "If that's what you want to do, then that is fine with me." He didn't want her to do anything she wasn't comfortable with. "Would you like to come over to our place for dinner? You can see the nursery. And I know Steve would love to talk to you about what we can do to help you with this and to make a plan for when you go into labor."

Missy nodded her head. "I'd really like that. I don't have many friends since the pregnancy and since my parents kicked me out, so nights out are nice." She paused and then asked hesitantly, "Would you still want the baby even if I kind of... fell off the wagon with sobriety?"

Bucky looked at her for a second worriedly. "Of course, Missy. We took Christopher from a dangerous situation. His biological parents were drug dealers and addicts and I don't doubt they were using while she was pregnant. I'd hate to see you lose all the progress you've made so far. I'll do whatever I can to help you with your sobriety. I know you don't have someone as a support system like I do with Steve. Have you been drinking again?"

She ducked her head and was quiet for a moment. "I haven't touched alcohol even though I've really, really wanted to. Sometimes I smoke weed to get through the pain from carrying this kid." Even though she knew smoking wasn't good for the baby. "I was out with a friend from high school and we did some lines of coke," she admitted. "I feel awful about it. But I needed to escape."

Bucky licked his lips nervously and looked down at the ground for a second. "I understand, Missy. I want alcohol so badly sometimes. And yes, I'll admit, sometimes I wish I could do coke again. I think the difference is that I have my family that I'm doing this for. You started to get sober because of the baby and now that it's getting closer to being born, you are getting closer to not having your reason, your motivation, anymore. I don't know how to help find a new one for you but I can be here for you when you feel like using again. You know you can call our house or the record shop or the precinct whenever you might need me or Steve, right?"

"But Steve is a cop. He's going to report me and my friend or whoever else I score coke from if I call him," Missy said. "That's his job." She didn't sound bitter because of it, but she wasn't going to call a narc when she was trying to get high. "You already have so much on your plate. All I got is a job and I'm still fucking that up."

"I want to help," Bucky repeated. "And so does Steve." He led her down the block towards their new place and pointed at it so she knew they were almost there. "I know as well as you do how hard it is to stay clean. If you just try to rely on me a little for this, I can be there for you. You're not alone, okay?" He thought for a second. "You really are just doing this for the baby, aren't you? Once it's born, you'll go back to coke and alcohol?"

---

Missy sighed. "I am," she mumbled. "I'm not a bad person. But I'm not a very good one, either," she said. "I don't really want to stop drugs and booze," she admitted. "It's fun. And I know it'll fuck up my life, but I'm here for a good time. Not a long time. My aunt's nice enough to keep me around because I don't bring my drugs home. But I'm not exactly a pillar of society."

---

"Missy, I won't lie to you," Bucky said and stopped out in front of the door to the house. "If I didn't have my kids and Steve to care for, I'd still be doing all that stuff. I know what it's like. I loved coke. It was... it was fucking righteous. Even though I knew it was ruining me, I didn't care. I didn't care what I was doing to hurt myself. Don't tell Steve I said any of this. But I don't want to pretend that I think you're doing bad things. It's your life. And pretty soon after the baby is here, you won't have anyone but yourself who needs you sober, so I get it. Just, do me a favor. Until the baby is here, call me whenever you think you might use again. Do it for that little life that can't make that choice yet. After that, it's up to you. I'll always be here to help you if you decide later that you want to get sober. But right now, I'm not going to convince you otherwise."

---

Missy looked surprised when Bucky admitted that he felt that good doing drugs. The man was sober as anything now, so she thought that he wouldn't want to touch the stuff ever again. She sighed and rubbed her face. "Alright... alright..." She hugged Bucky briefly and managed to smile up at him. "Thanks for being such a good friend."

---

Bucky hugged her back and chuckled softly. "Of course, Missy. I'm not kidding. I'm here for you whenever, okay?" He unlocked the door and ushered her inside. "Come on, let's go talk to Steve about the baby. He'll be so happy to see you."

---

When they got inside, Steve was singing the alphabet with Christopher - who just babbled along with the tune - as he cooked dinner for everyone. When he saw that Bucky brought Missy over, he beamed. "Hey, you guys! You're just in time!"

---

Bucky went and gave Christopher a kiss and hugged Steve firmly. "Missy and I had a conversation about the baby just now," Bucky said and beamed up at Steve. "Told her that we will take it if she'll let us."

---

"Papa, hi!" Christopher said happily as he waved at Bucky.

Steve's face lit up and he turned to Missy. "Are you letting us? Can we really adopt your baby?" Missy blushed and nodded her head. Steve let out an excited sound and spun her in his arms before rushing over to squeeze Bucky in a tight hug.

---

Bucky laughed and said, "Careful with the pregnant girl!" He held on to Steve and kissed his cheek and neck and lips then picked up Christopher, "You're going to get a little sibling!" Bucky said excitedly to him.

---

Steve gasped. "Yeah, Christopher, you're going to be a big brother! Isn't that exciting?" The baby just made loud noises to mimic his parents. Steve looked over to Missy with the happiest smile in the world. "You want to see the nursery? I always imagined Christopher sharing it with his baby sibling once they were able to sleep through the night."

---

Missy followed them to the nursery and Steve explained how they would rearrange everything to fit in another kid. "I'll have to make another crib," Bucky said with wide eyes. He hadn't thought of that yet. "I have a month and a half to make another crib."

---

Steve put a hand on Bucky's shoulder. "I can help you. I watched you make the other one. I can even take a trip up to Seneca to get more wood from there if you want," Steve offered. Missy put her hand over her belly as she watched the two. "You weren't done with the crib when we had Christopher either," Steve reminded.

---

"I know I wasn't," Bucky said. "And I was stressed and hurriedly finishing it the night we got him." Christopher reached up to stick his fingers on Bucky's mouth. Bucky removed the hand and kissed his son. "Missy, do you know if the baby is a boy or a girl?"

---

"No, I don't know yet. I wanted to find a family who didn't care what it was," she admitted. "But if you guys want to know, I can schedule an appointment to find out." Steve looked at Bucky, not sure if he wanted it to be a surprise or not.

---

"I don't mind waiting to find out," Bucky said. "Steve, what do you think? Regardless, we should think of another boy's name just in case since we have our girl's name but not a second boy."

---

Steve nodded his head. "Should we choose your dad's name? Or give him one of our names?" Steve asked. "I want it to be a surprise, too, but we got to get a boy's name ready just in case."

---

"We can talk about some options later tonight," Bucky said with a smile and turned to Missy. "We will let it be a surprise. We are just so excited that you're letting us be the ones to raise the baby. Steve and I will take such good care of it."
Steve smiled and gave Missy a careful hug. "Bucky's right. We will give him or her the best life we can give a kid," he promised. "And it makes us both so happy to know you're willing to trust us with that little life in you." He paused before asking, "Can I see if I can feel them kicking?"

"Yeah, of course," Missy smiled and took one of Steve's hands and put it on her tummy. "The baby isn't very active. I've only felt a few kicks, to be honest." Bucky put his hand alongside Steve's and waited for something to happen.

"They must be saving their energy, I guess," Steve mused. He stood there for a minute or so but when nothing happened, he gave her a smile and moved his hand. "Thank you for letting me try," he said. "Someone must be shy," he joked.

"The baby just doesn't know you're going to be its dad," Missy said. "That or it's sleeping. Do babies sleep when they are in the womb? I don't even know." She shrugged and held her stomach again. She was getting hungry and so was Christopher. He kept grumbling and signing to Bucky for food.

"I imagine that they got to. Especially this far along," Steve said. When he saw Christopher signing, Steve ushered them back to the kitchen so he could feed them all. Becca and Lilly came in and saw Missy. They looked at each other, knowing what this meant.

Bucky watched his family all sit down at the table together and he tried not to look over at Becca. He knew she was probably not going to approve at all. He really did think this was a good idea, though. He could be a good dad of two and a brother of two. He would work on being good for all of them just like Becca asked.

Missy gave the girls a shy smile. "Bucky's told me all about you two," she said. "He can't say enough nice things about you," she added.

Bucky was quiet and glanced over at Steve for help. He didn't want the girls to be upset or rude in front of Missy but he also wanted to explain to them that, yes, they were going to have her baby and make their family a little bigger.

Steve gave Becca a small look to try and silently tell her to behave. Lilly was more welcoming. "So are we getting another baby? Do I get to be the godmother again?" she asked.
"Yes, we are getting another baby," Bucky said with a small smile. "Missy has agreed to let us adopt her child. As for you being the godmother, we will have to discuss it. Maybe Becca wants to be the godmother this time."

---

Lilly turned to Becca. "You always complained about them getting another. You don't get to be the godmother," she said.

Becca glared. "Maybe I should be. I'll do a better job than you," she countered, just to annoy Lilly.

---

"How about we discuss it later?" Bucky said sternly. He really didn't want Missy to be uncomfortable while the girls were fighting or anything. "Steve, I think after dinner, we should talk to Missy about a game plan for when she goes into labor."

---

Steve nodded. "Good idea. I think we need to set some sort of plan too," he said. He kissed Bucky's cheek and continued to eat.

After their dinner, Steve stood up and cleared off their plates. Missy shifted in her chair and reached for Bucky's hand. "Is there really a big process about going into labor?" she asked.

---

"Well," Bucky started and squeezed her hand gently. "It's a bit of a big deal. And it can last a while. What I think we should talk about is what to do once your water breaks. Like having the phone numbers to reach us, if you want either of us in the room with you or not, what you want us to have ready to bring for you to make it more comfortable. That sort of thing."

---

Missy looked a bit nervous now. She hadn't really thought this through yet. "No offense to Steve, but I would only want you to be there," she said to Bucky quietly. "I don't want a show out of me pooping out a baby," she said with a nervous laugh.

---

"I understand," Bucky nodded. "I wouldn't want a show out of that if I were in your shoes. And if you don't want me in the room either then I don't have to be. Steve and I can both wait outside. Do you want your aunt to be there with you?"

---

"My aunt says she doesn't want to be there unless I want her there. And I don't want her there because I don't want her to feel bad about me giving the baby away. I don't want her to get attached and have to see it go," she said.

---

Bucky looked to Steve and then back to Missy. "Does your Aunt want you to keep it?" he asked and reached for Steve's hand so he knew he could give input or ask questions anytime he liked. This was about all three of them and the baby.
"She wishes I would but I think she's relieved she doesn't have to look out for both me and a baby," Missy said.

Steve nodded. "Do you think you would ever want kids of your own someday?"

"No," Missy said firmly. "I mean, maybe eventually, but I don't think I will change my mind. The way I like to live isn't a good environment for a child to be in, I don't think." She looked to Bucky. She wasn't going to share with Steve what she had shared with Bucky about going right back to coke and alcoholic once this kid was out of her.

"It's not for everyone, I guess. I'm so happy to have Christopher but even he can be a handful sometimes and he's a perfect son," Steve said, reaching over to gently pinch Christopher's cheek. The baby giggled in response.

"So," Bucky said, "I will be in labor and delivery with you and Steve will be just outside in case we need him. What do you need us to bring for you? Do you have anything in particular that will make you more comfortable in the hospital?"

"I don't think I'll be interested in much when I'm pushing out a nine-pound alien," she said. "I think what I really need is to be in and out. The second the baby is out, I want to be gone."

"We can do that," Bucky said sadly. "As soon as you can get out of the hospital, I'll take you home. Do you not even want to hold the baby before you give it to us?" It made him so sad that she wouldn't even want that. But granted, she didn't even want to be pregnant in the first place so it made sense.

Missy shook her head. "Don't look so sad. It's better that you two are the only parents the baby ever knows," she said. "I kind of want this pregnancy nightmare to be over as fast as it can be."

"Okay," Bucky said, squeezing Steve's hand and smiling warmly at Missy. "We will do whatever makes you most comfortable. And if it makes you feel any better, you are pretty tiny and I don't think you will be having a nine-pound alien baby. I'm thinking it'll be smaller for sure."

Missy let out a little laugh. "It feels like it weighs a thousand pounds already," she said. "I bet I'll never be able to fit into my jeans ever again," Missy lamented before pointing at the girls who were sitting on the counter eating on some brownies they had made. "Never get pregnant."
Lilly nodded with wide eyes and Becca hid behind her book. Bucky looked at the time. "It's getting late, I think I should be getting you back home. I don't want your aunt to worry. If you have anything else you want to ask, then go for it. And remember to call either of us if you need anything at all."

---

Missy nodded. "Thank you so much. I really do mean it," she said. She gave Steve a hug and headed out with Bucky.

Once Bucky was back and it was just the five of them, Steve looked to Becca. "You want to do a family day at the museum?" he asked.

---

Becca moved her book down so she could see Steve. "Which museum?" she asked with squinted eyes. There were definitely certain ones she had already been to a million times and didn't care for anymore.

---

"You can choose," Steve said. "It's been a while since we went out and all did something fun as a family that wasn't Lilly's games," he said. "What do you think, Buck?"

---

Bucky was distracted trying to change Christopher's diaper but he looked up for a second and said, "Yes, we should definitely go to the museum. Whichver you choose. And we can go to that Mongolian grill that just opened up."

---

"What's a Mongolian?" Lilly asked.

Becca groaned and murmured a quiet, "Oh my god," in response.

Steve had to hold back from laughing so he wouldn't make Lilly feel bad. Instead, he answered, "It's a place in Asia."

---

"Is it?" Bucky asked and looked from Steve to Becca. "I thought it was like a type of cooking style. You know, 'Mongolian grill cooking.'" He picked up Christopher and set him on the couch next to Steve. "Anyway, we should go there."

---

"Well, I guess it's the way the Mongolians cooked, too," Steve said. Becca did her best to not look completely done with her undereducated brother and sister. Steve reached out to play with Christopher's foot. "Hey there, Bean."

---

"How's that sound, Becs?" Bucky asked and got up from the ground. "Museum and dinner? Maybe a movie? I know it doesn't really make up for everything, but it's a start, right?"
"It's a start. A small one, but I'll take it," Becca finally agree with a sigh. She shrugged and went back to her book, deciding that she had done enough interacting for the day.

Steve snorted and kissed Bucky's cheek. "She's a tough one to please," he said.

---

Bucky sighed and cuddled up close to Steve to speak low and quietly to him. "I think I'm going to have to do a lot to make it up to her. That's okay, though. I won't stop trying."

---

After a bit, Lilly went off to sleep and Christopher started whining and pulling on Steve's shirt like he wanted to go to bed as well. Steve picked him up and kissed his face a couple times. "Looks like someone's ready for bed. Let's get you settled in, Little Bean." He carried the baby to the nursery to change him into his pajamas and get him into his crib.

---

Bucky went to take a quick shower while Steve put Christopher down for bed. He didn't bother with clothes and instead just dried off and then laid in bed with a notepad and pen waiting for Steve. He wanted to get started thinking of names for if they had a baby boy.

---

Steve sang Christopher a few lullabies and stayed with him until he fell asleep. He smiled and tucked him in before going back to their room. "He is such a little angel," Steve sighed happily. "I feel so blessed to have him." He slid into bed and wrapped his arms around Bucky.

---

"He really is perfect." Bucky smiled back at Steve and gave him a kiss on the cheek. "And soon he will have to learn to be a big brother. And since there is a possibility that his sibling will be a baby boy, we have some naming to do." He tapped the notepad and said, "Go!"

---

Steve laughed. "Well, I got to put 'James' and 'George' on that list on principle," he said. "'Clinton' is another," Steve rambled. "Have you thought of any you may want to use?"

---

"I'll put 'George' down, but we have been over this, I don't want a 'James Jr.'," Bucky said. "And I think 'Clinton' is a great option. You'd really want to name our baby after Clint? I'm sure he would be ecstatic about it."

---

"But what if I want a 'James Jr.'?" Steve asked. "And I wouldn't mind naming our son after Clint. He's practically family to us and he does so much for all of us. And I think a part of him is still unsure if I've actually forgiven him for spying on me with the Tish thing. This would be proof that I'm over it."

---

"Oh, I can confirm for you that he definitely thinks you are still very angry at him for all of that,"
Bucky said and wrote down ‘Clinton’.

---

"I've forgiven him, but I do take a little pleasure in knowing that he's walking on eggshells around me," Steve teased. "Don't tell him yet. I like him being overly nice around me."

---

"You're a little bit evil, Babe," Bucky said and chuckled. "If you want a junior, why can't it be ‘Steve Jr.’? Or how about naming him after your father? Or something other than ‘James’.

---

Steve made a face when Bucky wrote down ‘Steven’ and ‘Joseph’. "I don’t know about those names, though. I wouldn't pick ‘Steve’ for my son. And I wasn't close with my dad."

---

"Okay, so no juniors at all. What about ‘Grant’? That's sort of like a junior without it being your first name. What do you think of that? I wouldn't mind a ‘Grant Rogers-Barnes’. ‘Hello, these are our sons Christopher and Grant’."

---

"I can handle ‘Grant’. That's my grandpa's name," Steve said. "My mom told me tons of stories about him." He smiled at the idea because he knew his mom would love the name. "Do we have a good enough list or do we need more names?"

---

"Well, so far it's ‘George’, ‘Clinton’, ‘Grant’," Bucky said. "I think that's a good first name selection. What about middle names? We already used my father's middle name with Christopher. Maybe one of your dad's names could be used as a middle name?"

---

"I don't really want to use my dad's name," Steve said firmly. "I didn't know him that well, and, it's not like I'm bitter about him, but my mom always seems conflicted when he's brought up," Steve explained. "So, uh... maybe it can be the middle name of the doctor that helps deliver him?"

---

"Maybe, but what if that doctor hates gays?" Bucky asked. "Maybe we can let Missy pick the middle name. Although, I don't know if she would even want to. She was pretty adamant about having nothing to do with the baby once it was out of her. Maybe we shouldn't do that then." He thought for a second and then hit Steve's shoulder lightly. "'Francis'? For Father Frank. He's done so much for us. And I think it goes well with any of the three first names."

---

Steve hadn't really considered that. But when Bucky suggested ‘Francis’, he beamed. "That's a great idea!" he said. Steve kissed Bucky's lips gently and smiled. "He will be so happy to hear that." Steve had such respect for Father Frank and truly appreciated all the care he had for his community.
Bucky smiled and set the notepad aside to snuggle against Steve. "I'm glad you like that option." He tugged at Steve's shirt grumpily and said, "Come on, Baby. Let's go to sleep. Off with your clothes. I want to be big spoon tonight and if you wanted to wake me up in the morning with a blowjob, I would not opposed."

---

Steve smirked and undressed for his husband. He snuggled up to him, pressing his ass back against Bucky's body. "You'd never be opposed to a morning blowjob," Steve said fondly.

---

"You got me there," Bucky agreed and wrapped his arm around Steve and held him close. "I love you. I'm so excited to have another baby with you. And I can't wait to have our family day at the museum. I hope little by little I can be what Becca needs me to be."
Steve slept through the night and woke up early so he could check on Christopher. After he changed his diaper, played with him a little, and laid him back down for a nap, Steve went back into their bedroom. He slipped under the covers and started to kiss at Bucky's thighs lightly. Finally, he licked a stripe up his cock.

---

Bucky stirred a little but didn't wake up yet. It wasn't until Steve had the head of his dick inside his mouth that Bucky blinked awake. "Hey, you actually did it," he chuckled sleepily. "I love waking up to you. You know that right?"

---

Steve pulled off briefly and smiled up at Bucky. "I know you love it. You get to come first thing in the morning." Steve slowly sunk his head down on his husband’s dick and reached a hand to palm at his balls.

---

"It's the best way to start the morning," Bucky whispered and shut his eyes contentedly. "I don't know how I lived before you came along. Waking up alone and sad and needy for human contact. But now I have you and you are everything to me."

---

Steve let out a little moan as he worked his mouth over Bucky's dick. He looked up at Bucky to watch his expression as Steve took his time giving him a lazy morning blowjob. He hollowed out his cheeks as he started to tease Bucky's hole with his index finger.

---

Bucky opened his eyes lazily and stared down at Steve. "If you want to, I could go for sleepy morning sex. I kind of want to be inside you. I feel like it's been a while. Only if you want to. Because I'm fine with this if you prefer."

---

Steve snorted. "Please. Like I'd ever turn down letting you make love to me," he said. "I'm not sure how it would feel being woken up to that. But I'm open to trying."

---

"We can try that sometime if you want," Bucky said enthusiastically and pulled Steve up towards him to kiss him. "I'd love to see how far I get before you wake up." He carded his hands through Steve's hair and kissed his jaw. They had pretty much unpacked their room now and the nightstands were set up so it was much easier to grab the lube when they needed it.

---

Steve returned the kiss slowly and then began to nibble affectionately at Bucky's throat. "I have the overnight shift tonight," he sighed. "So don't try it tomorrow morning cause I'll be dead asleep."
You'd probably get all the way without me waking up," he joked.

---

"Okay, fair is fair. I'll make sure you are fairly well rested when I try it," Bucky said and let his hands wander down Steve's body. He stopped at his hips and lightly squeezed. "Where do you want to be? In my lap? On your back? On your hands and knees?"

---

Steve blushed a little and asked, "Can we maybe tie my hands to the bed?" He stroked his fingers through Bucky's hair. "It'd be nice to be able to lay back and watch you, but I'd also like something a little extra."

---

Bucky licked his lips and swallowed. "Fucking yes, of course," he said and hurriedly got up off the bed to get their sex box from the closet. It was significantly less full now. When they were packing to move, Bucky put himself in charge of the sex box. He decided to throw out the plug and Phillip. He hadn't said anything to Steve about it and he made sure he tossed them when Steve wasn't paying attention. Bucky didn't really want to hear the smug satisfaction from Steve at Bucky finally caving and getting rid of his dildo. Bucky had kept the vibrator with the attached remote since Steve had allowed them to use that together before. He was hoping that so long as the toy was smaller than Steve's cock, he could be allowed to occasionally indulge himself.

---

Steve laid himself out on the bed and lazily tugged at his own dick to entice Bucky to hurry up. Also, it felt nice to tease himself a little. "I love how much you've gotten me to open up," Steve said. "It's amazing all that we have accomplished together."

---

"I know," Bucky said with a smile and picked out the velvet ties one by one. "Remember when we first used these ties? I think it was Christmas morning, right?. We had just gotten engaged and we had some time to ourselves. Of course, then I ruined the rest of Christmas, but at least the morning was good." He gingerly slipped Steve's wrist through one loop and started tying it up.

---

"It was still one of the best Christmases I ever had because it was my first Christmas with you," Steve said with a happy smile. That Christmas had certainly been a bit of a ride. But the important part was that they were all a family. He got a little flustered as Bucky tied him up. "This Christmas will be even better. Us and our two babies and your sisters and my mom."

---

"Oh my god," Bucky said quietly and gasped. "I didn't even think about this Christmas being Christopher and the baby's first Christmas ever. My god, we have to take so many pictures." He tied his other hand up and sat back to check out his work.

---

Steve beamed up at him. "They're going to be so cute, Bucky," Steve said. He gave the restraints an experimental tug before nodding his head. "It looks like you did a good job, Baby," he praised.
"Can't move my arms at all."

---

"You ready then?" Bucky asked with a happy grin. "You look amazing. Hold on." Bucky popped up from the bed and went to grab the Polaroid camera they had gotten recently. He snapped a picture of Steve and shook it and waited for the picture to appear. Once it did, he gasped and shoved it towards Steve. "Look how gorgeous you are."

---

Steve hid half his face in his arm shyly when Bucky took the picture and he looked so flustered when Bucky showed off the picture to him. "You're going to hide that picture well and good, right?" he asked, giving Bucky a little look. "I don't want anyone but you coming across it."

---

"I'm framing it and putting it right next to the door," Bucky said with a confused shake of the head like he couldn't believe Steve would suggest any other option for the photo. "I'll let you take one of me to match. It'll be great."

---

"Well, I don't want it to become show-and-tell time with Natasha cause lord knows she finds everything," Steve said. "I want two photos of you," he bargained, giving Bucky a challenging smile.

---

"What are the photos of me going to be?" Bucky asked and set the picture on the nightstand. He crowded in against Steve and rubbed his hands up and down Steve's thighs, making soft little hums as he did so.

---

"Real artsy," Steve said, wiggling a little in anticipation as Bucky touched him. "Kind of like something you see in the dirty magazines, but classy. It won't show anything off, but only just so."

---

"Ooh." Bucky smiled wide. "Racy and sexy and a little weird?" He cupped Steve's balls carefully and lifted them so he could tease at his hole with his pinky. "Are you going to buy me something fancy to wear that you like? Or do you want me totally naked?"

---

"Depends on what I decide," Steve said. He let out a little moan as Bucky cupped his balls. Steve looked at Bucky like he wanted to be fucked already. "I'm thinking about dressing you up like a firefighter. Got to find a way to like those guys somehow."

---

Bucky's eyes got wide. "A firefighter?" He grabbed the lube and quickly covered his pinky and fourth finger and pushed them into Steve together. "You think I'd make a sexy firefighter? I did look pretty good in that velcro police Halloween costume."
Steve closed his eyes and made a quiet sound of approval when Bucky's fingers entered him. "You did look great in that costume," he agreed. "That's what gave me the idea," he said. "Or maybe I can use those paints you got our son and turn your body into a canvas."

"The baby paints?" Bucky giggled. "Those are for Christopher. Not for sexy photo shoots. I'll just ask Monty where he finds body paint." Bucky worked in a third finger and waited, letting Steve adjust. "That reminds me. Monty told me about something we need to try."

"We can buy more. He won't know the difference," Steve said with a pout. His ass instinctively clenched down when Bucky added another finger inside of him. "What do we need to try?"

"Pineapple," Bucky said and stretched his three fingers out as far as he could. "I mean, we've tried pineapple before but Monty said that Evan ate a bunch of pineapple one day and then when he sucked him off later that night, his come tasted amazing and really sweet."

"Oh," Steve said dumbly once he realized where Bucky was going with that. Steve threw his head back and made a desperate sound as Bucky stretched his hole. "Fuck," he swore. "It's worth a shot."

"Worth a shot?" Bucky repeated and started lubing up his cock with his free hand. "Don't you want to know if it really works?" He removed his fingers from Steve and lined himself up. He pushed all the way in slowly and purposefully and leaned down to kiss Steve's cheek as he did.

Steve's hands automatically moved to hold Bucky but when he couldn't make them budge, he made a defeated sound. "I'll believe it when I taste it," he said breathlessly, wrapping his legs around Bucky instead.

Bucky nodded in agreement and held Steve's legs up for him. "Are you good?" he asked and slowly eased himself back out of his husband. Bucky hadn't been inside him for a while - probably a few weeks. Lately, it had been Steve being the top or hurried blowjobs while Christopher was napping. Sometimes Bucky felt like making a schedule to even it out.

"Just go slow," Steve said. He liked it when Bucky was on top even though Steve usually ended up taking control of things. However, he usually required a bit more time to adjust. "I swear you feel bigger every time."

Bucky started pushing in and out of Steve slowly and carefully. "It's just because you don't bottom as much as top and your ass is always glued shut whenever I want to get in there. Although, I'm not complaining about how tight you are because, my good lord, it always feels amazing."

---

"My ass isn’t glued shut. You just don't take what's yours," Steve teased. After a few thrusts, Steve started to really get into it and started rocking his hips to match Bucky's rhythm. "More," he breathed out.

---

"I'll just take what's mine now, then, shall I?" Bucky asked cheekily and held Steve's hips down firmly against the mattress. He gave Steve a wild, hungry look and started to fuck into him hard and fast and needy.

---

Steve cried out when Bucky started to really fuck him. He arched his back off of the bed and tried to rock his hips but Bucky had them pinned down. "Fuck- oh, fuck-" he gasped out. "Don't stop, Buck. So good."

---

Bucky worked into Steve relentlessly and watched the changes of expressions in Steve's face. When Steve tried again to move his hands to touch Bucky, Bucky reached up and intertwined his fingers with Steve. "How are you feeling? What do you need?" he asked softly.

---

Steve gripped onto Bucky's hand like a lifeline and looked up at him with dark, aroused eyes. "Need you," he gasped out. "Make me come, Buck," he said urgently. "I'm so close..."

---

Bucky nodded and pounded into Steve harder than before. He was desperate for release too but he wanted to see Steve come first. He let go of one of Steve's hands and reached down between them to jerk Steve off in time with his thrusts.

---

"Oh- fuck, Bucky, yes!" Steve cried out, throwing his head back and getting really into it. He turned his head into his arm to stifle the sounds he was making as he felt his orgasm get closer and closer. At long last, he finally came hard all over Bucky's hand and his chest.

---

Bucky let out a happy stuttering moan at seeing Steve spill out on his fingers. He also felt his own movements becoming uneven as he offered his fingers to Steve to lick his come up. Bucky only got a few more hasty thrusts in before he was shooting his load far up inside his husband and flinging his head back with a heavy gasp.

---

Steve opened his eyes to watch Bucky finish. He sucked on his husband's fingers greedily and then let out a pleased noise when he felt Bucky come inside of him. He smiled, drunk on how splendid he felt. "You're so perfect."

---

Bucky slipped his arms around Steve's middle and hugged him close. "God, I love you so much, Steven Grant," he said and looked up to Steve with an expression like he just couldn't believe who he was holding in his arms.

---

Steve's heart soared when Bucky looked at him like that. "You make me the happiest man in the world, you know that? I used to pray to meet someone who loved me like you do."

---

"Your god did right by you," Bucky said and kissed Steve on the lips before taking off the restraints. "This has been a whirlwind of a year, my handsome husband. A lot has happened. More good has happened to me in this year than in my entire life. And as much as I wish my parents could have been here to see them unfold, I'm glad we have this house where they might get to see some of the rest of it."

---

Steve rubbed his wrists before wrapping his arms tightly around Bucky in a big hug. "They're watching over us. And at least this house will get to see one Barnes couple grow old together," he said. "We can make sure of that for your parents' memory."

---

"Rogers-Barnes," Bucky said quietly and nestled into Steve. "And one day, hopefully, we can get married by law on top of married in the church. And maybe we can pass this house to one of our kids and their partner and we can go retire out somewhere like Seneca and spend our days in the calm of nature and having old man sex."

---

Steve laughed at the last bit of Bucky's plan. "Sounds like a perfect life to me," he said. "I think Christopher is going to have first dibs on the house... that's assuming that Becca and Lilly don't fight for it too."

---

"No, he will be fine. Lilly will live in someplace downtown over a bakery or a pizzeria. And Becca will move to Long Island as soon as she has kids because she will want them to have some peace and quiet and room to move around."

---

"I suppose you're right. It'll be weird not having them around. I've barely known them for over a year and yet I feel like they've been a part of my whole life, you know?" Steve sighed. "I love those two so much."

---

Bucky smiled and kissed Steve's face several times. "You have no idea how grateful I am that you like them. It's hard to attach yourself to someone who has two dependents. No one else even looked at them twice. Just said 'good morning' and left before they could reply."

---

"Their loss," Steve said. He smiled at the kisses and started to play with Bucky's hair. "They can really get my blood boiling sometimes. But I love them anyway. I imagine even Christopher will make me mad at some point."

---

"That's what kids are best at," Bucky admitted. "They are really good at being selfish and annoying and loud and stubborn and adorable and strong and brave and getting under your skin in obnoxious ways and also in the way where you can't help but need to protect and love them at all times."

---

Steve laid his head on Bucky's shoulder. "I want to have a big family so bad, Buck. I want to be able to see all of our babies grow up into amazing people. Won't it be beautiful to see all the good things they'll learn from you?"

---

"Don't forget you're a parent here, too," Bucky said and smiled. "I'm going to be the laid back, jaded parent who has already done this twice before and just lets the kids do what they want. You're the strict one who will hold their hand when they cross the street even when they are teenagers."

---

Steve snorted. "You're going to be more high strung than that. You'll worry about them right alongside me." He pecked Bucky's lips affectionately before rolling off the bed to get dressed. "And speaking of kids, I have to get ours ready for the day."

---

Bucky whined but let Steve go. "How can I help?" he asked and slipped on his pajama pants quickly. He was too hot for a shirt so he just left it off. "When are you working today?" He picked up the photo of Steve all tied up on the bed and he carefully tucked it away in the nightstand underneath the book he was reading. "Here," he handed Steve the bed ties. "Will you put the box back?"

---

"You can wake our son and read him his morning book while I get breakfast ready," Steve suggested pleasantly. Steve took the ties and went to put them away but then looked confused when the box was emptier than normal. "Hey, did you move Phillip?" he asked. "Wow, there's actually a lot missing..."

---

Bucky's grimaced. He should have put the ties away. He sort of forgot he didn't want Steve to notice. He came up to Steve and peered into the box. "Huh... guess they got lost in the move," he said evenly and with a curious reverence as if this was new information to him too.
Steve gave Bucky a look like he wasn't having him for making stuff up. "You loved that thing, Bucky. There's no way it got lost," he said. Steve set the sex box back in their closet. "You tossed it. Why?"

---

Bucky shrugged and raised an eyebrow like it should be obvious why he dumped Phillip. He turned back to the dresser to get an undershirt, not saying anything to Steve. He was just sort of waiting for the smug click of the tongue and Steve to say, 'Wow, finally, Buck! I knew you'd see eventually that I was never going to let you use it.'

---

The smartass remark didn't come. Instead, Steve looked rather guilty. "Buck," he said quietly with a frown. "I didn't mean to make you throw out your stuff. I'm sorry I made you feel that way."

---

Bucky sighed and went to rest his hands on Steve's hips. "Baby, that's not what it was. I did it because I love you and I know it makes you uncomfortable and since we are in this together forever, it just didn't seem right keeping Phillip around. I didn't want you to feel bad every time you saw him and wonder if I was missing getting to use him or anything. This way, it's gone and it won't bug you anymore and I won't be tempted to ask if I can use him."

---

"I still feel bad," Steve mumbled. "I mean, not bad enough to go looking for him or to buy you a new one... but still, I hate the feeling of you not being able to keep something you bought and owned just because I'm a little jealous over some rubber toy."

---

"He was silicone, but I understand what you mean," Bucky murmured and grasped Steve's face in his hands to give him a quick kiss. "Baby." He smiled and rubbed his thumbs over Steve's cheeks. "I have you. I don't need it. I haven't used it since we met. I don't care that he's gone. Just say 'thank you' to me for throwing it out and let's move on. I need to wake up our son."

---

Steve huffed and leaned into Bucky as he gave him a kiss. "Alright... thank you for being such an amazing husband." He pecked the tip of his nose and dressed before heading out to make breakfast for everyone, still feeling icky about the whole thing.
A couple weeks passed and things were pretty normal for them. They had settled into the house completely and Bucky and Steve returned to their regular routine of work and taking care of the kids. Today was Bucky's day off and he and Christopher were playing together while they waited for Steve to come back home. Christopher had taken to banging on empty containers while Bucky played the guitar. He was pretty musically inclined and Bucky loved that. He was about to put Christopher down for a nap when he got a phone call that Steve was in the hospital.

---

They were supposed to wait for the firefighters but there was a kid stuck inside the burning building and Steve couldn't imagine waiting, unable to shake the thought of 'What if Christopher was in that kid's shoes?'. He went rushing in to find the kid and was able to scoop him up in his arms to carry him to safety. Steve got most of the way to the exit before passing out, shielding the kid with himself. Thank god the firefighters got there minutes before the building collapsed and they were able to get Steve and the child out in time. Steve was sent to the hospital immediately. His mom was the first to be called and, in turn, she called Bucky who came as fast as he could. "He still hasn't woken up," she said. "But the doctors say that he's stable."

---

Bucky, who was a flurry of fear and worry and sadness, held Christopher close to him and slipped his hands with Steve's. "Do you know what happened?" he asked Sarah. He looked down at Steve. He looked mostly okay. He had some scratches and burns but it was nothing that wouldn't heal up and be back to normal.

Christopher looked down at Steve and tried reaching for him saying, "Dada, hi," and making upset little noises.

---

"Your dad's sleeping," Sarah said, hushing the baby. "Shh, sleeping." She didn't want the baby to get anxious and upset. She looked back to Steve and said, "There was a small condo on fire. They saw it while they were on their way back to the precinct. One of the residents said that there was a kid still upstairs. Steve went in to get him. The kid's fine, he's already been released with some minor breathing issues and a few cuts and burns."

---

Bucky sighed and pulled up a chair next to his husband. He sat Christopher in his lap and held Steve's hand tightly. Steve was, thankfully, hardly injured on the outside but he seemed to just not be able to pull himself out of sleep. "Last time we were here, Steve, we said no more hospital visits for us for a year," Bucky said to Steve's unconscious form. "It has not been a year."
"He made it close to a year," Sarah mumbled. "But, I'd prefer no more hospital visits, ever."

After about a half hour more, Steve stirred and looked around. Once he realized what happened, he got a guilty look on his face and stared up at his husband worriedly. "I'm sorry, Buck," he croaked out quietly.

"Hey, Baby." Bucky smiled softly and started crying. He gave him a gentle kiss then held Christopher over him so he could give his daddy a kiss too. "Baby, it's okay. I'm here. I'm not mad. Sarah told me you were just helping. You were doing your job."

"Hey, Bean," Steve said, forcing himself to sound normal. He felt groggy and fatigued and it hurt to speak or breathe. He knew he wasn't burned that much, his skin didn't hurt too much. But, his lungs just killed with pain. "How long have you been waiting?"

"Not that long. About a forty-five minutes," Bucky said and raked his fingers through Steve's hair lightly. "Your mom called us and we came right away. The girls are at school, they don't know yet. How are you feeling, Baby? How bad do you hurt?"

Steve took a breath and coughed heartily for a few seconds. "Tired. Grateful to be alive." He slowly sat up and looked over at Christopher and waved. "With some luck, I can still make us dinner tonight."

"No, you are staying right here and then resting once we get home," Bucky said and kissed Steve again softly. "I need to go call the school and tell the girls where we are. Can you hold Christopher or should you not?"

"I'm fine, Buck, don't worry," Steve said stubbornly. He picked up their son and snuggled him close while Bucky went out to call the girls. While Bucky was out, the doctor came in and explained that Steve was clear to go home, but he was required by the precinct to return to the physician every other day for the next week and he had to stay home from work as well.

Bucky helped Steve get ready to go home and he was really careful with him as they walked. Steve insisted on carrying Christopher and Bucky was cautious of every step they took and making sure that Steve was fine and the baby was fine. They got home after about an hour.

Steve huffed and constantly insisted that he was “Fine, thanks,” and he didn't need Bucky babysitting him with their son. When they got home, Steve set Christopher on the floor so he could wander. "Buck, I inhaled a little too much smoke, that's all. I'm fine."

---

"You don't seem fine. And I'm just trying to make sure you are okay," Bucky said and slipped his arms around Steve. "I'm just trying to make sure my husband is okay. Please just let me be concerned. Please."

---

Steve sighed and gave Bucky a little pout but ultimately nodded and gave him a kiss. "Fine, worry all you want, but I'm still making dinner and I'm still in tip-top shape."

---

"Okay, I will let you, but if you start to feel bad or anything, I need you to tell me. Will you promise me that at least?" Bucky asked and kissed Steve's face and neck a few times. "See? That's a compromise. Sounds good, right?"

---

Steve played with Bucky's hair and nodded. "I promise," Steve swore. He was about to go get the ingredients when he saw Christopher putting a shoe in his mouth. "No! Christopher. That's yucky, iew," he chided as he took the shoe away.

---

"He's done that three times today," Bucky said with a sigh. He picked up his son and placed him on the kitchen table. "You just want to taste everything, Bean. Don't you? Here, Love, I'll get you some strawberries, okay?"

---

"No, Papa, no!" Christopher scolded Bucky as he waggled his finger at him just like Steve would do to him when he was doing something he shouldn't.

Steve couldn't help but smile as he went to grab the chicken from the fridge, still breathing with difficulty, voice still raspy and harsh. "He told you."

---

"What, you don't want strawberries?" Bucky asked curiously. "Sweetheart, strawberries are delicious. Shoes are not." He handed him a couple strawberries and said, "Steve, I think our son might be lactose intolerant."

---

Christopher grabbed one and stuck it in his mouth but he chewed on it with a pout like it had personally offended him. "What makes you think that? You sure it's not because of something else he ate?"

---

"No, every time he has cheese his stomach hurts and he has diarrhea," Bucky said. "You've noticed it. I'm sure. You might not have known what caused it. though. But I'm almost entirely sure that it's cheese and milk and stuff."
"I always thought it was cause I wasn't giving him all the vitamins he needs or that he was drinking too much juice," Steve said. "I guess we can cut out the dairy and see how that goes."

Christopher reached out for Bucky to get his attention. "Papa." He started to sign 'cat'.

"What, Bean? You want Raphael?" Bucky asked and looked around for the cat. "I don't see him," he said. "Yeah, Baby, I think it's a good idea to cut out dairy and just see if that's what's doing it."

Christopher nodded his head and signed for the cat again. "Poor little guy," Steve said. "I looked forward to giving him ice cream when he got bigger." Steve turned his head as he coughed a few times. "Have we heard from Missy at all? She's due pretty soon."

"Yeah, she said that she was going to call me today but I haven't gotten anything yet," Bucky said. "Maybe I should go check on her tomorrow." He really was getting antsy. Missy would be having the baby anytime in the next three weeks. And she had skipped the last AA meeting.

Steve nodded. "Make sure she knows that whatever she needs, we are there for her. I'm sure you told her already, but there's no harm in a little reminder," he said. Steve rubbed his face before setting the food to the side so he could sit down.

"You okay?" Bucky asked tentatively and moved to rest a hand on Steve's back. "You don't look good, Baby. What can I do?" He rubbed Steve's back slowly and watched him breathe. It looked like every breath he took really hurt.

Steve rubbed at his own chest. "It feels tight," he said. "When I breathe, it just stops before I get a good breath in, you know?" He frowned and looked up to Bucky. "Give me a minute and I can go back to cooking."

"Can I please finish cooking?" Bucky asked softly. "Please, let me. You just sit here and work on breathing and I'll finish up dinner. You can tell me if I'm doing something wrong."

Steve frowned but didn't argue only because he promised that he would let Bucky help if he needed it. "I'm not sick," he insisted half-heartedly before motioning so Bucky would know he could go cook.

Bucky started working on dinner, occasionally looking back at Steve to make sure he was still okay.
"You may not be sick, Baby. But you were injured and I really want you to take it easy." Steve was not good at being sick or injured. He became extra combative and grumpy and hated being treated like he was weak.

---

Steve played with Christopher while Bucky made dinner. The baby gurgled and cooed at his dad. "I guess I'll find out when I go to the physician what's going on," he said with a sigh. "How's dinner coming?"

---

"I think it's fine," Bucky said and squinted at a label on a bottle of spices before tossing some in. "It won't taste as good as when you cook but I did do all the cooking for four years so it will be edible, to say the least."

---

The girls came home and tossed their backpacks next to the door. "Why does it smell so spicy?" Lilly complained and then when she turned into the kitchen she murmured, "Oh... Bucky's cooking."

---

"I see how it is," Bucky grumbled and glanced at Lilly. "How was school today?" He checked on Steve again and handed Christopher a piece of broccoli. "Becca, you had that history presentation today, right?"

---

Christopher munched on the broccoli and then waved at his aunts. "Leeee," he greeted Lilly. Becca plopped down and leaned back in her chair. "Yeah. I got an 'A' on it. I'm not surprised."

---

Bucky turned away from them and went back to cooking, sighing softly. "I'm proud of you, Becs. Lilly, how was school for you? I know you had a test about the Jurassic era today that you were trying to make sure I didn't know about."

---

Lilly pouted. "I pretended I was sick so I got to get out of it today," she said. "I'll get a 'B' or a 'C' in it tomorrow. Who knows?" Steve gave her a scolding look but didn't have the energy to say anything.

---

Bucky shook his head and started setting the table for dinner. He was too tired to explain to Lilly why she needed to quit doing that stuff. He had too much in his head at the moment. He was worried about Steve, he was worried about Missy, he was worried about the baby. "Okay," he whispered quietly, defeated. "We will discuss it later."

---

They ate dinner mostly in silence, unable to have much of a conversation because Bucky was preoccupied and Steve would cough every time he would go to tell a story. By the end of the night,
Steve was in a pretty sour mood and asked Bucky to put Christopher to bed for him.

---

Bucky made sure everyone was tucked away and ready for the morning. He sang a couple songs to Christopher to get him to go to bed. After he fell asleep, Bucky trudged back to the master bedroom and found Steve grumpily sitting on the edge of the bed and holding his chest. "Baby? Hey..." Bucky said quietly and came to stand in front of him.

---

Steve looked up when Bucky came in. "Hey," he mumbled. He moved to lay down on the bed and curled up. "I think I'm going to go to the doctor tomorrow." He took a short, slow breath. "I need to know what's going on to heal up quicker."

---

"Okay, want me to come with you? I don't work tomorrow until the close shift," Bucky said and laid down next to him. He traced his hands up and down Steve's arms and sighed. "Do you hurt a lot?"

---

"I'd rather you keep an eye on Christopher." Steve moved away just a little because he felt suffocated as he was coughing every time he tried to breathe. "It doesn't hurt too bad. I just can't take a full breath and it's killing me."

---

Bucky pulled his hand back from Steve and tucked it under his pillow. Steve didn't seem to be in a touchy mood right now. "I can ask your mom to watch Christopher while we go to the doctor if you want me there," he tried again. He wanted to go with Steve.

---

"I'd rather go alone," Steve admitted firmly. He knew he wasn't being very fair to Bucky right now, but he didn't want to have Bucky find out what was wrong at the same time as he did. Steve wanted to have time to process it on his own.

---

Bucky nodded slowly with pursed lips. "Okay." He forced a small smile and tried to not let it show how much it hurt that Steve didn't want him there. "Christopher and I will just wait here then. Maybe we will go get some more paints so you and him can make some more art together."

---

"Yeah, maybe," Steve said but he didn't seem too interested in doing much. He rolled away from Bucky and stared at nothing. "Night, Buck... love you." He didn't sleep well that night. He woke up throughout the night from accidentally breathing too deeply in his sleep and causing a coughing fit. Come morning, he felt even worse. He tried leaving the bed as quietly as possible and without waking Bucky so he could get dressed for the doctor.

---

It took Bucky a while to fall asleep. He was pretty upset. Steve was acting like he didn't even want to look at Bucky or talk to him or be near him. And Bucky didn't know what to do about that. He understood that Steve was always really cranky when he was sick or hurt but Bucky was just trying to help and be there for his husband. The first couple hours of the night were just Bucky staring at the wall and letting his eyes well up with tears and then dry back up again over and over until he fell asleep.
Steve knew in the pit of his stomach that something was wrong. He didn’t know what it was but he had a bad feeling and he couldn't shake it. He left a note for Bucky saying that he'd gone out to the doctor. He wasn't out for very long. Apparently, they knew what was wrong with him yesterday but needed to confirm it. Steve returned less than two hours later in even worse of a mood.

---

Bucky had woken up not long after Steve left and saw the note. He crumpled it up and threw it in the trash on his way to wake up Christopher - he was just a little miffed at Steve still. The baby was still pretty sleepy and a little cranky so after Bucky gave him some breakfast, the two of them lounged on the couch together. They both fell asleep again while watching TV.

---

Steve got home and walked over to them and gently kissed the top of Christopher's head. He stroked a hand down Bucky's arm to wake him. "Bucky, Babe. I'm back home."

---

Bucky slowly blinked his eyes and moved over on the couch for Steve to sit. He cradled Christopher who also stirred from his nap and was sucking his thumb and looking at Steve with big sad eyes like he knew something was up. "Sorry, we fell asleep," Bucky said with a yawn. "How was the doctor's?"

---

Steve lightly tickled his son's side. He looked up at Bucky and his lips were drawn in a tight line. He waited a few seconds and then said quietly, "The doctor said I can only use my lungs to about forty-five percent capacity. That's why I can't take a deep breath."

---

Bucky slowly took Steve's hand and stared at him. "What does that mean then? How long will it take to go back to normal?" He had never been more grateful that Steve wasn't a smoker. That would have probably made it much worse.

---

Steve looked away from Bucky, seeming a bit angry even though he knew Bucky wasn't at fault for having such a question. "See, that's the thing. It won't go back to normal," he said firmly, almost barking it at Bucky.
"It won't?" Bucky whispered cautiously. "You mean you're not going to breathe right for... the rest of your life?" He squeezed Steve's hand and flicked his eyes from Steve to the ceiling a couple times, trying to work out what this actually implied.

---

Steve swallowed thickly and shook his head. "They say my lungs will heal a bit... but I inhaled too much smoke and chemicals and stuff from the fire for them to heal completely." His voice sounded hollow, empty, like he could hardly feel anything right now. "I called the precinct and they're already filing papers to get me out on disability."

---

Bucky was silent for a long minute. He wasn't sure what to say. "Steve..." he gasped and quickly pulled him in and wrapped his arms around him, Christopher sitting in his lap and whining when he was cut off. "Baby, I'm so sorry. Oh my god, Steve. What do we do now? What do you need me to do?"

---

Steve couldn't quite meet Bucky's eyes. He knew that he had upset him last night but he didn't have it in him right now to try and work through an apology yet. "I don't know." The corners of his eyes filled with tears and he coughed when he tried to take another breath. "Christ..." he swore. "All I can do is sit by and wait to see what retirement package they'll give me and pray it's enough to support us. Also, I have to keep going to the doctor to make sure my lungs don't get any worse."

---

Bucky held Steve's face in his hands and kissed him gently and quickly so he didn't leave Steve unable to take a breath for too long. "I'm so sorry. I love you. I'm sorry this is happening. I'm here, okay? Can I go with you next time you go to the doctor, please? I need to. And don't worry about what retirement package or disability you get. I will work more. I'll get a different job, something. It will be okay."

---

"Papa..." Christopher said, grabbing onto Bucky's shoulders so he could try pulling himself up to stand on Bucky's lap, but he was struggling.

"I don't know what else there is to do by being there, but if it makes you feel better, I guess you can come with me," Steve said. "I need to take a walk before dinner."

---

"Want us to go walk with you or do you want to be alone?" Bucky asked and gripped Christopher's legs so he could stand and reach out for Steve. "I don't blame you if you need some time."

---

"Alone," Steve said. Christopher signed for a kiss and Steve gently took his son so he could pepper a few kisses on the baby's face. "I know I wanted to retire to be a stay-at-home dad... but it feels awful that the choice was made for me instead of me deciding for sure."
Bucky's face fell and he nodded slowly. "I understand. And I am so sorry. Go take a walk and I'll be here waiting when you get back." He leaned over to kiss Steve again and give him another hug. "Be careful. I love you."

"Love you too," Steve murmured and gave Christopher one more hug before heading out. The baby fussed and cried a little when Steve left, upset but not understanding why. Steve was gone for a little longer than he meant to be, but when he came back, it was with a bouquet of flowers and a little bag tucked under his arm.

Bucky had spent the entire time Steve was gone just worrying about him and crying a bit and making sure Christopher didn't get into anything he shouldn't. He was being really cantankerous and Bucky was getting tired quickly. Bucky just couldn't help but think what this meant. Steve wouldn't be a cop anymore. He wouldn't get to go on morning runs or play baseball anymore. He couldn't run around with his kids or push himself too much. A lot of things might hurt him or tire him out more than usual. Stairs could pose a problem, running too many errands in a day, having vigorous sex, carrying heavy things. This was going to put a dent in Steve's functionality - his life.

Steve was having a hard time coping with what this meant for him too, but he had stopped at a phone booth to give Father Frank a call to ask for advice and the man told him to focus on his blessings until he found answers from prayer. So Steve did that. "Hello, Love," Steve said in a tone that was clear he was doing his best to be optimistic even when he felt like shit. "I got these for you," he said as he offered Bucky the flowers.

Bucky took the flowers and smiled. "You're so cute," he said and grabbed Steve's hand. "Did you know it's one of my favorite things about you that you bring me flowers sometimes? It isn't an everyday occurrence so when it does happen it's so special and shows that you're thinking about me."

Steve's smile was actually genuine when he got the compliment. "I'm glad that it makes you happy." Christopher started crawling over to him, so Steve passed the bag over to Bucky as well so he could wave at their son. "I got you this, too. I figured we have too many good things coming our way to wallow in the bad." Inside was a coffee mug that said 'Tired Father of Two'. He saw it in a shop and thought it was clever and wanted Bucky to have it.

Bucky removed the mug from the bag and let out a burst of laughter. "Oh, god, that's perfect. I need two of these. Another that says 'Tired Brother of Two Teenagers Who Won't Listen to Me Anymore'. It's not as snappy a saying but it applies. Thank you for this."

"I don't think they have that one in the gift shop. You can just write it on a plastic cup and keep it in the cupboard with that one," Steve joked. He bent down to pick up Christopher and grimaced at how winded it left him. He didn't say anything about it and instead cuddled with his son. "I'm sorry I upset you last night."

---

Bucky showed the mug to Christopher who just tried to take it from him. "It's okay. I know you were upset. I understand that. You just get really distant and cranky when you aren't at full capacity. I mean, you and I both remember how you were when you were shot. We fought about a goddamn sandwich."

---

"I still stand by that I was right back then," Steve defended stubbornly though there was no heat in his voice. Steve could be a mule when it came to sticking to his guns.

---

"Don't push me, Steve," Bucky said with just a small edge of sass. "That was damn near a year ago. And I have the power to withhold the things you like." He gave him a wet kiss. "Like that." He put Steve's free hand on his ass. "Or this." He smiled. "And lots of other stuff I know you can't live without."

---

"Bucky, not in front of the baby," Steve gasped softly, as if Christopher had any idea of what it meant by Bucky putting his hand on his ass. Christopher let out a loud noise to get Bucky's attention. "Has Missy called yet?"

---

Bucky let Christopher grip on to his finger with his tiny hand to satisfy him. "No, I haven't heard from her. She missed Thursday's meeting." He bit his lip. He should probably just go over to her aunt's house and talk to her.

---

"We should check in on her," Steve said. "She seemed to be a bit... I don’t know... weird about what she wants after the baby's out of her. I don't want her to think that we won't be there to support her after we've settled the adoption. You think maybe that's why she's getting distant?"

---

"That could be it," Bucky said. "I think most people just sort of abandon her eventually. She may think that we are just going to do that as well. I've told her that we are both here for her but that didn't seem to ever comfort her."

---

"Do you have her aunt's number? Maybe we can arrange a surprise visit... make her food and bring over some comfy clothes she can fit into once she doesn't have to wear maternity clothes and all that, you know?" Steve hoped that Missy would use their support and find a new path for herself to become more independent.

---

"We can do that. I have the number, yes," Bucky said and went to find it in the kitchen. "I know lately she's just been feeling so bad about herself and wondering how it would have been if she got rid of the baby in the first place. And she keeps bringing up the father of the baby but then not telling me anything about him at all."

---

"I don't usually agree with terminating a pregnancy unless there's some risk involved if the baby stays," Steve said. "But I wouldn't have blamed her if she had chosen that. I see how much stress it's putting on her. I hope one day she finds peace with her choice," Steve said. "Maybe when our kid's all grown up and wants to reach out to his or her birth mom, then she'll know that all the trouble was worth it."

---

"I don't think she want them to contact her at all," Bucky said slowly. "She really, really doesn't even want to see this kid. She doesn't want pictures of them. She doesn't want updates. She doesn't even want to hold it once it's born. I'm thinking even if we show that we want to be there for her even after this, she might just cut us out to avoid the baby."

---

Steve frowned, upset a little by that but he wouldn't push. It was hard for him to imagine not wanting to have her own child in her life in even a little way. "Her loss, I suppose. This baby is going to be amazing. I can just feel it," Steve said. "But I'll follow your lead. You know her better than I do."

---

"I just don't want to upset her," Bucky said. "Or our kid. I mean, I know it'll be hard enough to explain to Christopher one day that his biological parents were drug abusers and dealers and he had to be taken away from that. And for this new baby, it'll be hard to explain that their mother did not want them and we don't even know who the father was. I just would hate for our kid to contact her and get aggression in return."

---

"We, at least, can tell them that their biological mom loved them enough to give them life," Steve said. "Same with Christopher. These babies may not have had the best start, but they were loved enough to be nurtured in the womb and brought into this earth."

---

"Yeah, that's at least something," Bucky agreed, although he didn’t think it was their place to make any sort of judgment calls about any woman's decision about giving birth or terminating pregnancies. He thought that should always be the mother’s decision and no one else should have a say. "And even though it wasn't the best start, they found their way to us. And, regardless of the mistakes we are bound to make, we love them and will love them forever and will actively do our best to give them the best lives that we can. And that's ultimately the only thing that's important here, right?" He looked to Christopher and smiled. "Right?"

---

Christopher smiled all happily when Bucky looked at him and immediately burst into conversation, babbling at his pop. Steve smiled because their son was too fucking cute. "I'm going to go lay down in the living room for a bit. If you don't want to cook, we can order in."
"Go lay down, Baby." Bucky nodded. "I'll see if I can't put something together. I'm fine making food but it seems everyone is steadfastly against it. Maybe you should teach the girls how to cook so on days when you don't want to, they can do it and I won't have to hear the complaining about my food."

---

"Good luck convincing the girls to cook for the family," Steve said with a little smirk. He went and laid down with Christopher to keep him company.

About a half hour later, the girls came home bickering about which Yankee was the best pitcher. Becca really could have cared less but she knew disagreeing with Lilly annoyed her so she was just going for it. Finally, Lilly called out to wherever Steve was, "Steve, when are you taking us to a baseball game so I can prove Becca wrong?"

---

Bucky glared over at his sisters. "Quiet! Please." He had a headache that hadn't even considered going away for a long time. "Steve isn't feeling great right now. Can we talk about a baseball game some other time?" He wasn't sure that would even be a good idea for Steve anymore. And he also didn't know when Steve wanted to talk to the girls about what was going on with him.

---

"What's wrong with him? You said the doctors cleared him to go home," Lilly said with a frown. "Is he going to be too sick to cook dinner tonight?"

Becca swatted Lilly's arm. "Not everything has to be about dinner," she scolded.

---

"I'm doing dinner again today," Bucky said with an exhausted sigh. "But we can just have cereal if that will make you happier." He didn't want to say anything more about this without talking to Steve. He didn't know what exactly he wanted them to know and when.

---

Becca and Lilly exchanged looks because it wasn't like Steve to miss out on cooking two days in a row. Even when he was shot, he found a way to make their food. "Is Steve going back to the hospital?" Lilly asked.

---

"No, no, Sweetheart," Bucky reassured them and went to pull each of them into a quick hug. "He's just not as recovered as we thought he was. I'm sure he's going to talk to you both about it but he's laying down right now." He kissed the top of Lilly's head and squeezed Becca's arm.

---

After Bucky talked to them, the girls went to their rooms to do their own things. Close to dinner time, Becca had poked her head into the living room to spy on Steve before she went back to Bucky. "He's just staring at the ceiling, breathing. Has he been doing that all day? Is there brain damage?"
"No, don't be mean," Bucky said tightly and made sure enough bowls were clean for cereal for dinner. "He's just thinking - concentrating. Steve's got a lot going through his head at the moment."

"Well, if a grown man is staring at the ceiling for hours, it's fair to ask if he has brain damage," Becca said as if it was the most obvious thing in the world.

Bucky put her in charge of setting all the cereals out on the counter while he went to the living room to check on Steve too. "Stevie… Love? We are about to have some dinner. Are you joining us or would you rather stay here?"

Steve slowly stood up with a soft grunt and got to his feet. "Yeah, I'll come with you guys," he mumbled and came to stand in front of Bucky.

Bucky invaded Steve's space for a moment to give him a quick reassuring peck on the cheek then he backed off again. He could tell Steve wanted a bit of space. "Are you going to talk to them about this tonight or later? They are pretty concerned for you. They both show it differently but they are. And they are your kids, too, now."

Steve looked like he was making a concentrated effort to take smaller breaths so he wouldn't cough. "I'll tell them after dinner," he mumbled. "I don't want to worry them."

"Okay, thank you, Steve," Bucky said softly and headed back to the kitchen with him. Lilly looked like she was about to die of hunger and Becca was telling her to just wait for Bucky and Steve.

"Thanks for waiting for me, girls," Steve said quietly, tiredly, as he sat down. He picked up his spoon and ate the cereal without complaint. He was pretty quiet the whole time before he finally decided to come out and tell them what was up. "So… my lungs don't work as well as they used to. So I can't be a cop anymore."

Becca scrunched up her face in confusion. "What do you mean?" she asked. Lilly sat across from Steve wide-eyed and watching him carefully.

"The doctor said that Steve's lungs are only working at like fifty percent capacity," Bucky clarified and rested his hand on Steve's thigh.

Steve nodded. "Forty-five, actually. I won't be able to run or chase down people anymore. Or deal with high-stress situations or else I can damage them more," he said. "That's also why I'm coughing all the time."

---

Becca nodded and looked down at her hands. "And it’s permanent?" she asked. As much as Becca griped and complained about Steve sometimes and fought with him on damn near everything, she did care about him. And she was used to having things go wrong or bad things happen to her family. She was genuinely concerned for Steve and also for Bucky having to go through yet another medical issue with his husband.

---

"Yeah," Steve said in a bit of a defeated tone. "But hey, that means I get to stay home and take care of you and the babies," he said. "It'll be alright. There's going to be a bit of an adjustment period."

---

Becca nodded and looked seriously over at Steve. "I am really sorry, Steve," she said firmly. It was probably the most genuine she had ever been with him. Becca was just born when her father was injured in the war and honorably discharged. She never knew him before his physical disability but Bucky did and so did her mother. Becca was well aware of how hard it was on them at times to see him in pain and not as capable as he was before.

---

Steve was surprised by the tone Becca used. He knew Becca was capable of empathy and all that, but it'd been a while since she was so kind to him. "It's okay." It wasn't. Not for Steve, not right now. But he would live through it. "Now Lilly finally has a chance at kicking my butt in a race."

---

"I let you win before." Lilly shrugged. "I've always been able to kick your ass." She tried a little smile, hoping to make Steve feel better with her banter.

Bucky cleared his throat, "Well, on a practical note, Steve will be getting some sort of retirement or disability package. We don't know what it will be like yet. But I will more than likely be working a lot more for a while. I'll be sure to keep you updated with what we find out."

---

"I plan on getting a job soon anyway," Becca said. "So I'll be able to pay for my own stuff."

Steve smiled and shook his head. "Use your money to save for future goals like college or an apartment, not for stuff me and Bucky should be taking care of."

---

"Steve's right, Bear," Bucky said, pulling out the rare nickname he only ever used when things were far too tough for him to handle. "You know that I want to help you with college as much as I can but I won't be able to pay the whole way so maybe you just put all your money to that and when it comes time, we can combine and see where we are at."
"Well, I'm still getting a job," Becca said with a casual shrug. Christopher flung a handful of cheerios at Bucky and giggled as he signed for his pop to play with him.

---

Bucky gave his son a stern look and brushed some Cheerios off his shoulder. He signed while he said, "Christopher, no throw." It seemed like he always had a new favorite thing to annoy Bucky with every week. This week was food-throwing. It was biting at one point, hair pulling for a while - though, he still did that too.

---

Christopher stubbornly signed 'play' at Bucky when he was scolded. He could be such a headstrong kid sometimes and Steve did his best not to laugh at the attitude he gave Bucky. "Papa," Christopher huffed, signing at him again.

---

"Where has my sweet Little Bean gone?" Bucky asked dramatically. He took Christopher out of his chair and held him in his lap, letting him mess with bits of cereal on the table. He looked to Steve and then at the time. It was pretty early in the evening but Bucky was beat. And Steve was beyond tired and done. "I think I need to go to bed," Bucky yawned.

---

"He's still sweet. He just doesn't know that playtime doesn't really have to be mess time." Steve did his best to remain energetic, but he was genuinely exhausted right now. He insisted on putting Christopher to bed since Bucky had done it the past few nights.

---

"Okay, I'll be waiting for you," Bucky said and slumped off to bed. Becca still had some homework to do and she promised to make sure Lilly got ready for bed in time. In their room, Bucky took the picture of his parents and held it out at arm’s length. "Why him?" he whispered, talking sort of to his parents but maybe also to Steve’s god. "Why this too? On top of everything else…"

---

Steve took a while getting their son to sleep but at long last, he went to their bedroom. He hugged Bucky from behind and rested the side of his face against his shoulder. Steve closed his eyes and simply breathed, his breath having a slight wheeze to it. "Hey, Baby...you okay?"

---

Bucky leaned back into Steve and sighed. "Yes, and also no, but yes," he muttered and nuzzled Steve. "I'm just worried and upset and running through too much in my head and I know you are too and I need to calm down but I can't."

---

"I'm alive," Steve said. "Let's count our blessings. We're together. We have your sisters and our son. And we have another blessing on the way. Any day now we can have Grant or Sarah welcomed to the earth."

---
"Okay." Bucky nodded. "You're right. We have our kids and we have each other and you are still alive and here with me," he repeated and turned to hug Steve. "I love you so much. How do you feel?"

---

Steve leaned into the hug but once it got too tight, he gave Bucky a gentle nudge to ease up. Steve moved to lie on the bed and rested a hand on his chest. "Who knew laying around all day would leave me so exhausted?"

---

Bucky laid down with him and curled up against him so he could just watch Steve breathe and make sure he was fine. "Does it hurt at all? Or is it more just uncomfortable and tight?" he asked and rested a hand on Steve's thigh lightly. Steve had been correct earlier when he said this would be an adjustment period.

---

"It hurts sometimes," Steve said. "When I try to take a breath that's too big. Now, it's like opening up a scab, except in my lungs," he said. "And, on top of that, it's uncomfortable and tight. I want to laugh but I got to take it easy or else I'll cough up a damn lung."

---

"Anything I can do right now that might help?" Bucky asked softly and pulled Steve's hand up to his lips and gave it a kiss. "Did the doctor have any tips to make breathing a little easier?" He sighed. "Man, it's a good thing you don't smoke and I don't smoke around you at all."

---

"Not really," Steve said with a frown. "They said they may put me on an inhaler. And painkillers. But I don't want to." He gave Bucky a look that told him that he wasn't in the mood to argue about it either. "I got to find my own limits."

---

Bucky really wanted to say that he thought Steve should at least give it a try but he didn't want to have another night of Steve sleeping facing away from him and being grumpy. He decided just to bypass the conversation altogether. "I don't think Lilly quite gets what happened, but Becca understands."

---

"I don't think I quite understand, either," Steve said. "I'm still hoping there's some way I can be a coach for Christopher's baseball or soccer team. Or that I can find some desk job on the force," Steve mumbled.

---

"I'm sure you can still coach, Baby," Bucky said softly. "You just won't be able to run with the kids. Lots of coaches are big fat guys who can't run either." He meant it as a joke to help Steve feel a bit better but he wasn't sure it if would come across that way. "And why would you want a desk job at the precinct? You like being an officer. And now that you aren't, you can stay home with our kids like you wanted to."
"I don't want to get fat..." Steve wasn't obsessed with his looks, but after being made of muscle he didn't want to risk losing it early. "And I don't want a desk job, but I hate that being a cop was taken from me. Now, I'm not going to get to see my coworkers as often. And I just got a new partner there who's really great."

"You won't get fat, Steve," Bucky sighed with a little smile. "I'm just saying you can be a coach still. You'll be a big tough muscular coach." He moved his hand up to rest on Steve's stomach and felt it move as he did his best to breathe right. "Who is your new partner?"

"Now, you're just saying that to appease me," Steve said in a mildly grumpy tone. "It's this guy Sam. He used to be in the military but retired to become a cop. He's really nice and told the best stories."

"Sam, okay." Bucky nodded. "Tell me about him. What's he like? Is he friends with Natasha, too? Because we can have them both over more. Clint has been complaining that he hasn't seen Christopher enough and he wants Nat to fall in love with our baby and then want to have a kid together."

"Sam is hysterical. He doesn't take shit from anybody and half the time when he has to put people in their place, they have to think twice about his insult because he's so clever with them," Steve said. "Also, Natasha is never agreeing to a kid. She's told me."

"I'll tell Clint I tried," Bucky said somberly. "Is Sam single? Straight? Gay? Into recently divorced older men who have partial custody of their kids? Because Tim is severely lonely and I'm getting tired of him complaining about how none of the guys at the club are interested in long-term."

"He's straight as far as I can tell," Steve said. "Poor guy needs to have something going for him. He already gets enough shit for being black, he'd have it even worse if he was gay too," he added. "What about the shelter? There's got to be someone nice there for Tim."

"Does he know you're gay?" Bucky asked. "And subsequently about me and our kids? Because I'd like to meet him if you want me to." He shrugged and shook his head. "Yeah, Tim has been flirting with the idea of asking one guy out but he has a pretty complicated situation and he doesn't want to add stress."

"Sam knows that I'm gay and about our family," Steve confirmed. "I can invite him for dinner sometime, I'm sure he'd love it." Steve gently played with Bucky's hair. "What's the complication for the guy he wants to ask out?"
Bucky cleared his throat and looked away nervously. "He may not legally be allowed to stay in America. They might deport him back to his home country. Also, he's a bit of a heroin addict. Tim doesn't want to get attached and then have him taken away or have his addiction get worse or something."

"Oh... yeah, that's pretty complicated." Steve chewed the inside of his cheek and said, "Only he can help himself out with the heroin thing... but I know someone who works for the ACLU. We could potentially find a way for him to not get deported."

"I guess I can talk to him. I don't know his name but I can ask Tim," Bucky said. "Anyway, that's not important right this second. Are you tired? Want to head to sleep or do you need anything? Lilly has popsicles hidden in the back of the freezer if you want one."

Steve shook his head. "I need to sleep but I'm dreading it. My body automatically breathes too deep and I wake up coughing," he grumbled. "May as well get tonight over with, I guess."

"Okay, Baby." Bucky slipped his hand with Steve's. "Let's go to sleep. Wake me up if you need me. Okay? Tomorrow morning I was going to go to Clint's and start work on the second crib before I have to go to the record shop but I can stay instead if you want."

“No, Baby, it's okay,” Steve said and curled a little tighter into a ball. “I would rather you go ahead and start on the crib for our new baby. You don’t have much time to finish.”
A few days after getting the news about his lungs, Steve decided to take some time to visit his mom to fill her in on what had happened since the hospital. She didn't know that he was getting retired from the precinct and he figured she may as well know sooner rather than later.

Bucky was at home and was just trying to get the nursery all put together to accommodate two babies when he was interrupted. The phone at their house rang and when Bucky picked up, a concerned-sounding woman was on the other line. "Hello, is this James Barnes?"

---

"Yes, this is James," Bucky said with an exhausted grunt since he had just shoved the newly constructed crib through the door of the nursery and he was exhausted. This crib took him less time than the other one but it hadn't been made with wood from Seneca. They didn't have time to go get any.

---

"I'm calling from the Brooklyn General hospital and you're listed as the emergency contact for Melissa, uh, Missy Kurtz. She was brought in about a half hour ago," she said.

---

"What? Oh my god. Is she in labor?" Bucky asked and pulled the cord of the phone as far as it could go so he could grab his coat and keys from the hook on the wall. "I'm on my way. I'm coming. Which room is she in?" He was frantic. Missy was supposed to call when her water broke. That was the game plan. Who knew how long she had already been in labor before the hospital called.

---

"Um..." There was a short silence before the woman continued. "She was brought in for an overdose, Sir," she explained in the gentlest tone she could muster. "We are performing an emergency C-section any minute now. But we can't give her any medication without risking the baby's life."

---

"Oh my god," Bucky gasped softly. He stopped and blinked several times, letting his eyes water up. His heart seemed to stop and he couldn't move or speak for a few seconds. "Oh my god. Fuck. Okay, I'm coming. Tell her I'm on my way. It'll be alright. It won't take long for me to get there." He hung up and quickly locked the door behind him. He ran as fast as he could because he figured he could make it quicker on his own than by cab at this time of day.

---

By the time Bucky had gotten to the operating room, he was only allowed to look in from the outside through a small glass window. Missy had a team of doctors and nurses crowded around her and there was a cot to the side of the room with a pristine blue blanket laid over it. One of the nurses saw him run up to the door and she quickly stopped him and put a hand on his shoulder. "Sir," she said gently. "Nobody can enter right now. I'm sorry."

---

"She needs to know I'm here!" Bucky said quickly, desperately. "Please, she can't think she's alone. She needs me." He obeyed when he was told to stand over to the side and wait. He watched intently and worriedly and prayed to Steve's god that Missy and the baby were both going to be okay.

---

The nurse gave him a sympathetic nod and then pushed the button for the intercom. "Nurse Johnson, can you please let Miss Kurtz know that Mr. Barnes is here?"

Her monitor had flat-lined already. But the doctors and nurses waited a few minutes anyway so Bucky would believe that she was around long enough to hear that he had shown up. When the doctor finally came out, he gave Bucky a grim look and shook his head.

---

"What's that mean? What happened?" Bucky asked breathlessly and let tears stream down his face. He already knew. Missy was gone. She was gone. And he hadn't been here for her in time. He hadn't seen her for a few days. He didn't get to say goodbye.

---

The doctor left the nurse to comfort him. "She had slim chances of survival when she got here. She had nearly twice the lethal amount of cocaine in her system. And by the looks of it, she was carrying her dead son in her for at least a week. He had all sorts of drugs in his blood work that wasn't in hers today."

---

Bucky's face drained of color and he stared at the nurse, feeling like he could fall over at any second. "What?" he whispered, barely even speaking. "The baby is gone?" He started to cry in earnest now and he shrank into himself, hugging his chest and shaking his head as he slid down the side of the wall to the ground. His mouth hung open in a silent scream and he took too many quick shallow breaths. "They're both gone?"
The nurse assumed that Bucky must have been Missy's boyfriend and the biological father of the dead child. "I'm so sorry," she said in a quiet voice. "We have grief counselors available..." She trailed off and waited until Bucky was able to breathe. "You can go in and see Miss Kurtz and the baby if you would like. Is there someone I can call for you?"

Bucky scrawled out Sarah's house phone number for the nurse and then followed her to where they had Missy and the baby resting and waiting to be taken away. He took Missy's hand and held it tight. She was still warm but her face looked sunken in, tired, ashen. Her hair was sweaty and matted down around her head and there was a white dusting around her nose of cocaine. "Am I allowed to hold the baby?"

The nurse nodded. "Yes, but I have to warn you, the baby doesn't look very..." She grimaced as she pulled the blanket off the cot. The baby wasn't quite fully formed even though he was nearly carried to term. His skin was deathly pale with a blue-black tinge and his veins were easily visible through his skin.

When Bucky saw the baby, something cracked in him. Something small and imperceptible broke and his reality seemed to shift, his fragile sanity slipping away automatically. He smiled brightly as he picked up the baby so gently. "He's perfect. My perfect boy." He choked on the lump in his throat and rocked the baby back and forth. "Hello, Baby. Hey, my little man." He held him tight and watched him closely, hoping to see him take his first breath or crack open his eyelids and look up at his father.

It was heartbreaking watching Bucky talk to the baby like that. She knew that the baby would never respond and she knew that this was one of the hardest things a person could go through. "I'll leave you two alone and make that call for you," the nurse said softly and left the room as quickly as she could.

When Steve came to the hospital, he was under the impression that the baby was fine, he just maybe was a little sick and had to be on some sort of support for a little while. The lady sounded so calm over the phone. He came as quickly as he could, a teddy bear in one hand and a bouquet of flowers in the other. "Buck! I came as soon as-" his face fell when he sensed the depressive aura in the room and he saw the tears in Bucky's eyes. "Bucky?"

Missy had already been taken away and the nurse had Bucky sign papers having to do with her cause of death and confirming her identity and all that. He promised her when they were taking her away that he would give her a good funeral. Bucky glanced up at Steve and smiled tightly. "Hey, Steve," he said and nodded to the child in his arms. "It's a boy." he added absently and stared down at his stillborn son again. "Come look at him," Bucky said to his husband who was still standing across the room. Something was off about the way Bucky spoke about the baby, though. He had a distant, airy tone and didn't seem too rushed or concerned. It was eerie, to say the least.
Steve put the bear and flowers down on the table and hesitantly walked over to Bucky. The bundle in Bucky's arms was too still and Steve's heart knew what was going on before he got to see past the blankets. "Bucky?" Steve said again, sounding terrified, like he thought he was caught up in a dream and Bucky was going to morph into some monster and attack him. Steve approached slowly, hands shaking and when he saw their son lying dead in his husband's arms, his breath seized. "No... no!" he wailed, gripping at his chest as he desperately tried to breathe steadily.

Bucky looked up at Steve, concerned. “Hey, hey,” he said quickly, eyes wide. “Steve, it's okay. It's okay.” He nodded and smiled. “Here, you want to hold him?” he asked and held the baby out a bit towards Steve. They both were crying now but Bucky had a crazed look in his eyes like he was someone else who was somewhere else doing something else entirely. “Say ‘hello’,” Bucky encouraged him.

Steve was absolutely beside himself. He was hysterical and had to support himself against the wall for a few minutes, but finally, he gathered himself enough to take the baby from Bucky's arms. "How can you be smiling?" Steve asked through his sobs.

"What?" Bucky asked curiously and shook his head in confusion. "We have a new son, Steve,” Bucky said like it was obvious why he was smiling. His tears still came but he shook his head at Steve like he was being ridiculous. "It's good I finished that crib because he is a little earlier than I thought he was going to be. And a bit small, but he will be fine. Christopher was small too but we helped him get healthier."

Steve felt sick to his stomach. Bucky wasn’t there - not really. Bucky didn’t understand. Or he understood all too well and his brain short-circuited to protect him. "Buck... Sweetheart," he said in a broken but calm voice, trying to pull Bucky back to him and to reality. "There's no getting better for him." Steve took Bucky's hand and brought it to feel their son's chest where his heart should've been beating. "We can't take him home. We have to take him to Father Frank to be buried at the church."

The baby was pretty cold. He had been cold the whole time he had been in their arms. The nurse had said he had been dead for about a week but none of that made sense to Bucky at the moment. Nothing made sense. And the lack of heartbeat just seemed like a minor problem they could work out. Bucky shook his head. "No, I can fix this," he said, "He just needs the doctor. I'll go get the doctor." His whole body shook and he tried to get up out of his chair but his legs wouldn't let him.

Steve squeezed Bucky's hand tight when he tried to get up. "There's nothing that can be done, Buck. Our little boy is gone," Steve said quietly, voice cracking and lungs aching with the attempt to breathe through the tears and the pain. "Stay here with me. Please. I need you right now, Bucky."
"No," Bucky said quietly. "No," he repeated and looked at Steve. "You're wrong. They aren't gone," he whimpered, mashed his face into Steve’s chest, and let out a choked scream. He screamed for a minute or so and then just sobbed and whined helplessly into Steve’s jacket. He seemed to snap back to reality then and he looked up at Steve slowly. "They looked so helpless. She was just lying there opened up on the surgery table and she was gone. The doctor shook his head like that's supposed to mean he tried, but he could have tried harder!"

---

Steve wrapped an arm as strong as he could around Bucky's shoulders and he held their son protectively with the other. "They're people, Bucky. Not gods... I wish we could bring them back. I wish our little boy was crying and wiggling and doing all the things a baby should do," he said. "But they don't feel any pain now, Love. Their struggle is over."

---

"I want them here, though!" Bucky whined loudly and growled a little bit at the unfairness of it all. "I want to show him to his big brother and his aunts and his nana. And I want to see Missy get a better job and move out of her aunt's house and have her life again." He looked back at the baby and said desperately and softly. "Please, open your eyes. Open your eyes. Just for a little bit. Just let us have you for a little bit. Come on, Baby, please."

---

Steve pet his fingers through Bucky's hair. "We would've given him such a good life," he said gently, forlornly. "We could've helped Missy get her own life back on track too."

The door opened and one of the nurses came back and looked surprised to see the two sitting so close. "We have to shut the room down and bring the bodies to the coroner."

---

Bucky popped his head up and said, "Not yet. Don't take him from us." The nurse moved closer and rolled the small baby bed close to them so she could put the baby inside. "We need more time."

---

"He's not yours to keep is he?" the nurse said sharply. "She wasn't your girlfriend."

She reached out for the baby and Steve instinctively turned away to shield him from her. "Give us more time, please," Steve insisted.

---

Bucky eyed her nervously and put a protective arm between her and the baby. "He's our son. We need to say goodbye. You assholes hardly let me say goodbye to Missy. You took her away so fast."

---

The nurse glared at Bucky and pulled back. "They died because of you two, you know," she said decidedly. "God didn't want one of his children going to two queers. And they had their lives taken for it." Steve's face drained of color as he saw red and his eyelids fluttered, trying to process what was just said to him.

---
Bucky didn’t react quite the same way. His eyes darkened ferociously and he stood up slowly. "What the fuck did you just say?" he asked in a menacing whisper, his entire body tensed and his hands balled into fists. "What the fuck did you just say!" He shouted this time and kicked over the baby bed, sending it across the room. His soul was on fire and he had never felt so much anger in his life. He forgot Steve and the baby entirely and looked around the room. He didn't want to hurt the nurse but he wasn't going to spare anything else as he kept screaming obscenities at her and crying and breaking anything he could get his hands on and kick over and throw at the walls and smash against the ground. He had just lost a friend and a child and she dared treat them like this.

The nurse cowered back towards the door and yelled for security as Bucky finished ransacking the room with a hardy punch through one of the glass windows. He pulled his hand back and it was ripped to shit and drenched in blood. His body was exhausted as he collapsed on the floor and retched and threw up because of the rush of rage and hatred and grief and adrenaline that had just tore itself through him in forty-five seconds.

---

Bucky acted out the way Steve wanted to, but couldn't bear to do when he had their baby in his arms. He protected the little boy against his chest while Bucky rampaged through the room, screaming at the nurse. When security came bursting into the room, Steve finally snapped out of it and rushed over so they wouldn't touch his husband. "Please, he's grieving. I'm a police officer, just... just, please, don't arrest him. I'll pay for the damages. I promise. He won’t hurt anybody. I’ll pay for what he did. Don’t touch him."

---

Bucky was bawling on the floor with his legs pulled up tight to his chest. He couldn't save his parents, he couldn't save his grandmother, he couldn't save Missy, and he couldn't save his son. He wouldn't be able to save anyone. A scream boiled up inside him and he shook wildly when he lifted his face towards the ceiling and let it come storming out. He couldn't save anything he loved.

---

The guards could tell that Bucky wouldn't do any harm if left alone, so they corralled the nurse out and left the two alone to grieve. Steve sat down on the floor next to Bucky and pulled him over. "I'm so sorry, Buck. I'm so, so sorry you're hurting."

---

After a few long minutes of Steve cradling their boy in one arm and rocking Bucky back and forth as well, Bucky calmed down enough to speak. "Can I hold him again?" Bucky asked with a raspy voice from screaming. He looked down at his bloody hand that had bits of glass stuck in it. "Never mind. I probably shouldn't." He shook his head and looked to Steve. "I'm sorry. I just got so angry. You're hurting just as much as I am. But that fucking bitch just pushed me over the edge."

---

Steve wiped the tears from his eyes. "It's not your fault," he said quietly. He held the lifeless baby closer and kissed the top of his head. He was so cold. "Now I'm afraid for Christopher," he whispered. "Did we really upset God enough to be punished?"

---

"No!" Bucky gasped in surprise. "No, Steve! You would listen to that hateful little woman over your own heart? Over what Father Frank says? Over what you believe God wants?" He locked eyes with Steve. "This wasn't because of who we are. This was because of Missy's addiction and because I couldn't help her get sober and stay sober. This has nothing to do with our relationship."

---

"It wouldn't be the first time he's punished a parent by harming their child," Steve said. Steve looked so hurt and scared for what their future held. "This isn't your fault, either. You couldn't force her to give up her addiction. Only she had the power to do that."

---

Bucky shook his head and looked away. He was entirely broken inside. And he was furious. Both at that nurse and at Steve for even entertaining the possibility that she was correct. "Steve, if that's the type of god you've decided to follow, I think you need to find a different one," he snapped but then softened again. "I don't want to talk about this anymore. It won't be long before we actually have to let them take him. And we have to go back to our other son and our girls." He felt so utterly defeated.

---

Steve looked away and fell silent. He stayed with the baby for a little while longer, singing to him and telling him how much they loved him. He was able to keep it together until they had to give him to the nurses and he fell back into inconsolable sobs.

---

Bucky had no tears left and no fight left inside him. He watched with heavy-lidded eyes as they rolled their son away and he held Steve's hand with his unbloodied one. He stared at the doorway for a long moment even after they were gone. Then a different nurse came back in and quietly walked them out and into the lobby where Bucky had to sign more papers about the cause of death of the baby and give the baby a name and a parentage. He signed his own name on the line for the Father. He never knew who the baby's birth father was and he didn't care. That boy was his and always would be.

---

Steve was handed the pen and he wrote the baby's name as 'Grant Francis Rogers-Barnes'. He would fight anyone who tried to take that name away from their son. When there was nothing left to be done but wait for the paperwork to clear, Steve turned to look at Bucky's hand. "We should go to my mom and have her fix you up. We have to pick up Christopher from her too."

---

Bucky nodded without saying a word. One of the quieter nurses who helped them out came up to them and said in a soft voice, "I am very sorry for your loss, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Rogers." Then she turned and walked off again leaving them once again in horrible silence.

"Where's your mom?" Bucky croaked and looked up at Steve after a few long seconds.

---

Steve could barely get out a thank you to the nurse as she walked away. He tried to take a breath but ended up in a coughing fit. Once he regained himself he said, "At her house. She's waiting for a call to come by... but there's not much use coming by here now. She has a first aid kit at home. I figure
"you would prefer to have her help than to stay here any longer."

---

Bucky pulled Steve in for a careful hug after he made it out of his coughing fit. His kissed the side of his face, not caring who was looking at them. "Alright, we might as well go talk to her now. And fix up my hand. And I want to hold Christopher all night. I don't want him sleeping in the nursery by himself tonight."

---

Steve nodded. "I want him in our room tonight too." He actually probably wanted him in their room for the foreseeable future. He needed to stop a few times for a breathing break on the way there, but eventually, they made it to Sarah. When they got to his mom's house, she could tell by the looks on their faces that something happened. She didn't ask them to explain - she simply gave them each a tight hug before pulling Bucky aside to mend his hand.

---

Bucky sat in silence again and let Sarah pick out the glass with a pair of tweezers. It hurt like hell but he knew it had to be done. He watched Steve feeding Christopher and trying to keep a happy face for their other son but he knew it was hard to. Nothing about this was easy. Nothing was good.

---

After holding a cold, lifeless newborn in his arms, it was surreal to be around a baby so full of life. He answered Christopher every time he blabbered up at his dad but it was hard to stay focused. "Would you like me to spend a few days at your house?" Sarah offered. "Take care of the necessities and all that?"

---

Bucky flexed his bandaged hand and came over to give Christopher several kisses all over his face. He didn't mind the idea of having Sarah with them for a bit but it would be up to Steve. "What do you think, Love?" Bucky asked him softly. "I can sleep out on the couch, the girls can have the master, and you and your mom can each take one of their rooms."

---

"Papa!" Christopher squealed happily. He kissed his pop back and grabbed at his shirt.

"Yeah, we can make that work," Steve said. "Thank you, Mom." He would really need the company when the girls were out and Bucky was at work. To be honest, he was afraid of how he would handle all of this without another person around.

---

"Yes, thank you, Sarah. That would be extremely helpful," Bucky said and forced a smile. He let Christopher chew on his finger a bit and just looked at him. He shuttered out a sigh and closed his eyes. He wanted to go home to his sisters and hold his family together. But he also didn't want to explain what had happened. They would have a million questions and he didn't think he could take it. The headache that had started when he was destroying the hospital room had not let up at all. "What do we do now?" he asked with a heavy emptiness weighing down his words.

---
"We go home," Steve said. All he wanted was to stay in the comfort of his own home and mourn until it was time to bury their son. Sarah packed a bag of clothes and walked with them back to their place.

Becca and Lilly were already home doing their schoolwork at the kitchen table. "Jeez, what took you guys so long?" Lilly asked without lifting her head.

---

Bucky clung to Christopher and held Steve's hand tight. He was right, he couldn't handle this. He couldn't handle explaining this all to his sisters. "Girls..." Bucky whispered to get their attention. He couldn't believe this was happening again. When their parents died, Bucky wasn't in Brooklyn and he thought everything was fine until he got home. Now here he was again, in the same home, with two more bodies to bury. He tried talking but it didn't work. Instead, all he could do was turn and quickly shove himself against Steve with Christopher held at his side. He just hid himself away against his husband and broke down once more.

---

Becca and Lilly both looked at Steve for help when their brother suddenly started bawling. Lilly's attitude went away in seconds and Steve's throat closed up, unable to speak at first. He wanted to be able to grieve, but one of them had to tell the girls and Bucky was already down for the count. "Missy passed away today," he said quietly, "and so did the baby."

---

Becca stared wide-eyed at Steve and then at Sarah, hoping someone would explain this more or say that they were just pulling a terrible, tactless joke. Lilly started in on the questions. "How? What happened to them? Why's Bucky's hand wrapped up like that? What's going on?" She rattled them off and then hushed up with Becca squeezed her arm lightly to indicate to leave it alone for now. Bucky peeled himself off of Steve and held out his arms for his sisters. "Come here," he choked. They both rushed over and collided into a hug with Bucky and Bucky held them so tight and just cried into Becca's hair.

---

When Bucky moved to hug his sisters, Steve stood still as stone, watching the scene unfold without doing much of anything. Sarah walked over and gently held his hand in hers. Christopher, who didn't understand why everyone was crying, squirmed in Bucky's hold and started making upset noises. "Leeee," he murmured, grabbing for Lilly to hold him instead. "I'm so sorry, Bucky," Becca said softly, petting his arm.

---

"Steve?" Bucky said hurriedly and scared, like he thought that in those couple seconds that he wasn't touching him, he had been taken away as well. Bucky handed their first son to Steve and pulled him into the hug, wrapping his arm around Steve and being sure he had contact with each member of his family.

---

Christopher screeched at Bucky when he was passed over to Steve instead of Lilly. Steve wanted to hold his son desperately, but he gave him up so Lilly could cradle him in her arms to calm him down.
Steve pulled his mom into the hug and rested his face against Bucky's shoulders as he silently cried. They all stayed like that for a little while before Sarah gently pulled back. "We should all have some time to ourselves to reflect and mourn," she suggested. "And we can come together again at dinner."

---

Bucky nodded and hesitantly pulled away from his sisters. He looked to his son and held out his arms. "Christopher, Sweetheart, can I please give you to Daddy now?" he asked cautiously and sweetly so the baby would be more apt to cooperate. Christopher giggled and held out his arms for Bucky to take him and Bucky smiled at him gratefully before passing him off to Steve who looked so desperate to hold his son.

---

Steve hugged Christopher close and snuggled their boy tight. "I love you so much, Little Bean," he said. "I'm so grateful you are here all safe and healthy," he said. Sarah corralled the girls to their rooms to give their brother some space and Steve and Bucky sat at the kitchen table together with their son. "How are you about Missy?" Steve asked quietly, carefully.

---

"What do you mean?" Bucky whispered as he pet Christopher's hair. He was convinced that this was his fault. She had told him that she had done coke while she was pregnant. Bucky believed it would be just the one time. He believed she would wait until the baby was born to do it again but she didn't. And it was on him. He knew where she was at and didn't do everything he could to help her.

---

"I lost a son today," Steve said. "But you lost a son and a friend. You've got to be feeling worse than I am right now," he said. Christopher started to squirm and babble at Bucky, sensing that he was upset. "Does her aunt know yet?"

---

Bucky was about to say that he didn't think it was possible to measure quite how much pain they were both in and they shouldn't try to compare but then he realized no one had contacted Missy's aunt yet. "Fuck..." Bucky hissed and covered his eyes with his hands. "Fuck, she doesn't know. She has no idea where her niece is or what happened. Now I have to call her and explain. Jesus Christ, my head hurts so bad." Bucky started crying all over again and just held his head on both sides as if he was worried that it would split open.

---

When Bucky started crying again, Christopher started to cry too, probably worsening Bucky's headache in the process. "Hey, Bean... it's okay, shh," Steve said as he gingerly bounced the baby in his arms to try and cheer him up. "Give your dad a smile, yeah?" Steve put a hand on Bucky's shoulder. "Me or my mom can call."

---

Bucky sniffled and tried to quiet down so Christopher would too. "I need to call Barbara and then I need call Tim and see if he can cover the next couple days so I don't have to come in. And I need to talk to Clint. And we need to set up the funeral for them. And I need to figure out how much I owe the hospital for damages. And I want Grant buried next to my parents but where will we put Missy? Should her parents get to hold her funeral instead?" Bucky rattled off so many problems and questions as quick as his brain could think of them and he didn’t hear Sarah come back downstairs and stop to stand quietly in the doorway.

---

Steve opened his mouth to talk, but Sarah came up and put a hand on each of their backs. "I'll take care of calling the hospital about the damages," she said. "And I'll call Tim for you." She didn’t know him but she could handle asking someone to cover Bucky’s shifts.

"We should let her parents have first say about her funeral," Steve added quietly.

---

Bucky shook his head. "They didn’t care about her. They kicked her out. She didn't have anyone. And I promised her when she was taken away that I'd give her a good funeral." He wasn’t sure what good a funeral would do for her now but if that was the last way he could help her, then he was going to make sure she was laid to rest properly.

---

"They're still her parents," Steve insisted. "And if they won't give her a funeral she deserves, then we will. But, let’s try to not worry about that right this second. We haven’t even talked to her aunt yet.”

---

Bucky tried to listen to Steve but his breathing started to pick up and he felt dizzy and sick and his head felt like it was on fire. "She needed me. She needed me there for her. She needed a friend. I wasn’t there for her when I should have been. Missy needed me and I was too late. Our baby needed me and I couldn't save him!"

---

Sarah took Christopher from Steve’s arms when Bucky started getting worked up again and Steve wrapped his arms around him tightly, holding Bucky’s body together so he wouldn’t melt into a puddle on the ground like he had at the hospital. "This isn't your fault, Bucky. She knew you were there for her, but she chose not to take your help."

---

Bucky sobbed into Steve's chest and his body shook violently. He felt just like he did when his parents died. Hopeless, weak, guilty, small. He hated himself and he felt like dying. The difference now was that he had Steve. And Steve wasn't letting him go. He was holding on tight and whispering about how this wasn't his fault. He hadn't had that before. Before, he had two grieving, screaming little girls who desperately needed him but he didn't know how to help. "I want them all back," he whispered, meaning Grant and Missy and his parents. “I want them back, Steve.”

---

"I want them back, too," Steve said. He rubbed circles over Bucky's back. "Fuck... I just wish he could have opened his eyes. Just once. I wish he got to see the parents that already loved him so much and the beautiful world he was brought into," Steve said tightly. "I wish Missy knew she had a whole life ahead of her. I wish she would have been able to move on from this."
Bucky nodded and pulled back so he could look Steve in the eyes. "Baby, I'm so, so sorry for how I acted in there," he said quietly. "Both the yelling and breaking things and also... how I was when you got there. I don't know why, but, when the nurse let me hold him, something inside me was convinced that everything was okay and I could make it all better."

"You scared me," Steve admitted in a whisper. "I thought... I thought we had a new, little boy to bring home and..." It was a gut-wrenching, earth-shattering way to find out their son was dead. Nightmarish. He'd dealt with trauma victims before so he knew Bucky couldn't help the way he reacted but it still was branded into Steve's brain. "You don't have to try to make things better."

"I know I scared you. And I'm so sorry, Baby," Bucky pleaded. "It just happened and I couldn't get back to reality for a bit. You can ask Becca, it happened before. There was a time earlier on when we were still in this house that I talked to Mom and Dad like they were here. It was a few days until I snapped out of it." He shook his head. "I'm so sorry, Steve. I should've held it together. But then I held him in my arms and my brain thought he had to be okay. He had to be alive."

Steve looked away. "I know you're sorry. I'm not upset with you." Steve knew he was going to have nightmares of it. Nightmares of Bucky standing in their room like that but except a dead Grant in his arms alone, it would be a lifeless Christopher right alongside him. It would take a while for that image of Bucky not to terrify him anymore. "He was a perfect, little baby," Steve said. "I didn't want to let him go. I want to still have him in my arms."

"Me too," Bucky agreed. "I still think they took him too fast," he mumbled something indiscernible and looked up at Steve again, a lot more serious this time. "You aren't still thinking about what that nurse said, right? You don't believe her. You can't."

Steve didn't answer Bucky directly. A part of him wondered if God let them have one kid to appease them, as a little pass so they would be happy even if he didn't approve of their relationship, but trying for any more would result in something like this. "Maybe we shouldn't have more kids," Steve mumbled slowly.

Bucky scrunched up his face in confusion. "You believe her?" he asked with a heaviness that hadn't yet turned to anger. "Really?" He shook his head. "After everything we have been through together. After all the times you prayed to your god and ended up getting what we needed, you believe her?"

Steve got tense. "We have one healthy son. We should count our blessings instead of trying to dig for more," he said. He didn't want God to think they were getting greedy with their luck. He didn't know what he would do if Christopher was taken from them.
"You want a dozen kids," Bucky said sternly. "You've said so. I want that too. We want as many kids as we can handle and that's what we are going to do. We have two now. One just doesn't get to be with us yet. He's with my parents for now." He couldn't believe that Steve was even thinking like this. "And some hateful bitch nurse shouldn't be able to change your outlook on us and your god and our family so easily."

---

Steve's eyes stung with tears and he straightened his back. "I've changed my mind," he said in a clipped voice. "I'm allowed to change my mind and I'm not in a mood to discuss any of this." He let go of Bucky and got up to try to busy himself by cleaning the kitchen. "You don't believe in God anyway."

---

"I believe in what he means to you!" Bucky snapped and stood up too. "And what the fuck do you mean you've changed your mind? You don't want kids anymore? Huh? Too goddamn late because we have kids! And we have this house. This house that we bought so we could have room for more kids. And we've gone through hell and back too many times just to stay together and be able to be who we are and have our family and live our lives."

---

Steve was in the middle of washing a plate and when Bucky raised his voice at him, he reeled his arm back to throw the plate against the wall, but he stopped himself at the last second because he knew that the crash would make Christopher cry and he didn't want the girls worrying even more. "Just shut up, Bucky!" Steve shouted, giving him his back. "I want to be alone."

---

Bucky didn't say another word. He stormed out of the kitchen, went to the nursery, grabbed the new crib, and dragged it out through the hall. He pushed it down the stairs and it tumbled loudly towards the front door. Bucky opened the door and kicked the crib through as best as he could. Once it was down at the sidewalk, he started ripping it apart and throwing it down on the ground as hard as he could. After a few minutes, it was crumpled into several pieces in front of the house, Bucky's hand was bleeding through his bandages, and he was furiously striding down the street, tears flying from his face.

---

Steve frowned and started to scrub the countertops. He heard what Bucky was doing but he couldn't pull away from cleaning because he knew he would do something stupid too. Becca heard the commotion going on outside her window and ran out the door past the broken pieces of the crib to chase after Bucky. She reached out and held his hand, walking swiftly alongside him.

---

Bucky gripped his sister's hand tightly and didn't say anything. The two of them walked for a while until they got to the cemetery. Bucky hesitated at the gate but then took a deep breath and went in. They went to their parents' graves and Bucky sat down in front of them with Becca standing over him. "I lost two more people today," Bucky whispered to them. "And it seems like Steve lost part of himself."

---
Becca stood silently behind her brother and gently braided Bucky's hair as he sat there. "What happened with Steve?" Becca asked, frowning at Bucky. She didn't fully understand how devastating it was to lose a baby that they never got to take home in the first place but she could see how much it hurt them.

---

Bucky sighed. "There was a nurse at the hospital who told us that God murdered Missy and the baby as punishment for us being queers." He held up his bandaged hand. "Then I destroyed everything I saw and punched a hole in a window. And now Steve is entertaining the possibility that that worthless homophobic asshole was right. He said he doesn't want any more kids."

---

"Are you fucking kidding me? Fuck her," Becca snapped right away. Man, she would give that nurse a piece of her mind if they ever crossed paths. "Are you sure he's not just saying that for now because he's hurt?" Becca asked.

---

"You can see it in his eyes." Bucky shook his head. "He's broken. He thinks that God did this on purpose. He thinks it's our fault for being gay. And I think it's my fault for not being more proactive with Missy." He turned and grabbed Becca's hand so she would come sit next to him where he could cuddle her close. "What if he decides he doesn't want to risk it anymore? What if he decides he's just going to leave and not be romantically or sexually involved with anyone so he won't upset God with being gay or whatever?"

---

Becca wasn't much of a cuddler but she wasn't going to turn her grieving brother away. She scowled and leaned into his side. "Steve wouldn't leave us," she said. "He loves Christopher too much. And he loves you too much to hurt you like that." She wouldn't put it past Steve to abstain from romance and sex over this, though. She could see him just wanting his and Bucky’s relationship to move to a more platonic sort of coexistence. But Becca also knew that would destroy Bucky.

---

"He's being ridiculous," Bucky snarled. "We just lost a child. Not a few hours ago, we lost our son. And he's letting his faith be pushed around by a random nurse? And he's saying he doesn't want any more kids. How could he do this today? I need him and he said he wanted to be alone." Bucky gently touched the grass of the spot right next to his mother's grave where he wanted Grant to go. "We lost a baby today."

---

"How could he comfort you if he can't even take care of himself right now?" Becca said, very logical and trying to get Bucky to reason with her. "When Mom and Dad died, you couldn't take care of us right away because you were still grieving. We had to get by on our own, emotionally. I'm not blaming you or anything... but it makes sense." She looked at the empty spot where Grant's grave would soon be. "You're going to get through this, Bucky."

---

"I understand that but why would he listen to someone he doesn’t know over me? I'm his husband," Bucky said desperately. He knew it would take a while for them both to be feeling back to normal.
but it hurt so much to know that Steve didn't even trust in what Bucky was saying. He sighed and looked at Becca. "They didn't let us hold him that long either. We needed more time but they took him away."

"It's not just her. I hear people say that gay people are the reason for everything bad in the world. It's a miracle that he's found some priest that doesn't call him the devil," Becca huffed but decided to leave it for now. "What did Grant look like?" she asked. "Was he cute?"

"He was perfect," Bucky said with a gloss of admiration in his eyes and his tone. "He had been dead for about a week already. So he was sick looking and cold. And sort of blue. But I could tell he would have been amazing. He would have been a happy baby and excited to learn and grow and be with his older brother and his aunts. He was perfect. And he was ours for a bit. He still is, but we just don't get to hold him anymore."

Becca wondered if Bucky would get all proud and emotional over all the kids he would end up adopting...if they ever adopted any more kids after this. He would. She knew he would. Bucky was always emotional about her and Lilly too. It was just how he was. "Did you get to name him? Officially, I mean."

"Yeah, he is officially named." Bucky nodded. "And then I had to immediately sign his official death certificate papers." He chewed his lip and blinked up at the setting sun. He looked back down and squeezed Becca's hand. "Mom, Dad. Wherever it is that you are right now - heaven or someplace - can you go find my boy? Grant Francis Rogers-Barnes. Can you just hold on to him until we get there? And if you see Missy Kurtz tell her that I'll never forget her and I'll make sure her funeral is nice whether her parents are involved or not."

"That's a hell of a long name," Becca teased lightly. "Would have been a pain in the ass to fill that out on college applications." She gave Bucky a hug. "They're looking out for him. I bet they love their grandson already."

"Hey, they named me James Buchanan. If they can handle that, they can handle Grant Francis." Bucky said with the smallest of smiles. He hugged Becca back then stood up. "Guess we should go back. It's going to get dark soon. And I want to be home. I want to hold Christopher."

Becca nodded. "I'm just glad I didn't get stuck with a name as crappy as yours," she joked with a little nudge. "I love you, Bucky. And I'm sorry you couldn't bring my new nephew home." She took his hand and walked back home with him.

They stopped at the stairs to their front door. The crib pieces had been cleaned up and Bucky figured that either someone took them to use the wood or someone was big on stopping littering and cleaned it up. "Becca, I don't want to deal with Steve if he's still spouting nonsense," he said softly before heading inside.

---

"He's your husband, not mine," Becca reminded him lightly before going in to check on Steve. He was lying down on the couch and not responding to anything so she went and got Sarah to talk to Bucky instead.

Sarah had Christopher in her arms and she looked at Bucky with the kindest of eyes. "What can I do to help? Dinner is almost done."

---

Bucky shook his head, "I honestly don't know." He reached out for his son and Sarah passed him over. Bucky kissed Christopher several times and held him tight. "I'll be back in a bit," he said and took his son with him to the living room. Steve was facing the couch cushions and had a heavy blanket draped over him. Bucky noticed in the corner of the room the messily stacked remains of the crib. Steve had brought it back inside. Bucky walked slowly over to the couch and got on his knees. "Steve..."

---

Steve didn't respond at first. He wasn't purposely ignoring Bucky, but instead had been stuck in a world of his own. He turned his head to look at Bucky and there was a deadness to his expression, like he felt like some sort of empty shell. "Yeah?" he mumbled.

---

"Will you sit up so I can join you? Is that okay?" Bucky asked softly and readjusted Christopher in his arms. He didn't want to push Steve if he didn't want to be touched but Bucky really wanted to hold him right now.

---

Steve let out a slow breath, as if it would have been simpler to just lay there forever on the couch than to sit up. He forced himself into a sitting position and made room for Bucky. "I don't think I'll ever feel truly happy again, Bucky."

---

Bucky got up onto the couch and pulled Steve back down so his head was rested in his lap. He put Christopher on Steve's back and the baby laid on his stomach and hugged his dad with a pleased gurgle. Bucky didn't really know what to say. This was Steve's first real loss. Bucky felt the same way about his parents but he did feel happiness again eventually. But he didn't want to say that to Steve and minimize what he was feeling in that moment.

---

Steve closed his eyes and was too tired to stop the quiet tears that came out. "I wanted another baby so bad, Buck," he said in a heartbroken tone. "It would have been perfect. I could have raised them both because I'm home now. We would have sung songs together while we waited for you to get back from work."
Bucky pet Steve's hair and hummed softly as he talked. "I wanted him too," he said and wiped some tears from Steve's face. "We were ready. We were preparing for a while with this one. We had a plan and we had everything worked out."

"I'm sorry I told you to shut up," Steve whispered softly. "I was upset. And I'm angry. I don't want to be the cause of another baby dying. It's not a risk I want to take. What if Christopher is taken instead?" he asked. "I need to see Father Frank."

Steve was getting worked up and Bucky could hear the strain in his breathing. "Hey, hey," he said quickly and picked Christopher up from Steve's back. "Here, sit up. Hold your son. He is here and he is safe. Nothing is going to touch him. Come here."

Steve slowly moved up again, practically dragging himself upright, and he held Christopher in his lap. "Dada," the baby said firmly and then signed 'play' because nobody played with him since he got home.

"You don't know that for sure," Steve said to Bucky.

Bucky sighed and looked at Steve. "No, I guess you are right. I don't know for sure. But what I do know is that we take care of him. And we do everything in our power to make it very unlikely that anything will happen to him. And I also know that even though it doesn't feel like it right now, we will be happy again. And I also know that God didn't want any of this pain for us. If he is like you say he is, there's no way he condones any of this suffering. And I also know that I love you. And I love all our kids - the ones we have, the ones we will have, and the one we lost. And we will survive this and see him again."

Steve's bottom lip quivered and tears started to fall again. Christopher looked over at Bucky and kept signing 'play' in hopes that they would do more than just hold him. Steve silently got up and carried Christopher with him to his blocks in the corner so he could sit there with him and help him build towers just to watch Christopher gleefully knock them down to start all over. "We should call her aunt if we haven't already."

"I'll do that now," Bucky said and stood up. He was so tired. And he was confused and disappointed that Steve wasn't jumping on board to agree with what Bucky was saying about God. Steve was always happy when Bucky agreed that Steve’s god was looking out for them. Bucky went to the doorframe and stood for a second. "What's going through your head right now, Steve? I don't know what you're thinking. I can't tell if you are angry with me. I love you. Do you still love me?"

Steve closed his eyes as he rubbed a hand over his face. "I still love you," he said softly. "But I don't feel it in my heart. There’s nothing there - nothing happy, at least. I feel empty and spent.” He couldn't even manage a smile when Christopher looked up at him for validation as he knocked the tower down again.

---

"Okay," Bucky said tightly and took a shallow breath before turning away so Steve couldn't see how much that hurt - how much that devastated him - so he couldn't see the sting in his eyes and the empty scream on his lips. "I'm going to call Barbara and tell her what happened," he said as flatly as he could and walked with purpose away from his husband.

---

Steve didn't mean to hurt Bucky. But he'd rather be honest than lie. Steve couldn't feel any sort of joy or love. Even right now, he was taking care of his son more out of duty than because he wanted to play with him.

Barbara was, of course, distraught to hear the news but wasn't at all surprised. "She's been struggling for a long time," she said.

---

Bucky sighed, "I know. I should've helped her more once she missed a few AA meetings in a row. But I figured she was just too fatigued with carrying the baby to show up and she knew what she was doing." He didn't have capacity for emotions anymore. He just told it like it was and stared straight ahead at the wall. "I trust I can count on you to inform her parents? I promised her a good funeral so if they don't want to do it, I will. Just let me know. And if they don't have a spot picked out for her to be buried, I'll have her buried by my parents where we are putting the baby."

---

"You did everything you could. There's nothing any of us could have done to stop her from her addiction. She didn't want to stop. I know her," Barbara answered. "I'll let her parents know, but I doubt they'll have much to say about her final affairs. I hope you don't mind that I have her buried in my family plot. The baby can stay in your plot. He was always yours anyway."

---

"Yes, I understand. She goes wherever you would like her to," Bucky agreed. "Is there anything else you would like to know before I go? My family needs me." That wasn't entirely true. His sisters were occupying themselves, Sarah was taking care of dinner and some cleaning, Christopher was focused on his blocks, and Steve had made it clear that he wanted nothing to do with Bucky for the time being.

---

"No, that's all," she said. "I'll be in touch about her funeral." Barbara hung up.

Sarah called them all for dinner minutes later. Lilly had been crying in her room on and off the whole time so her eyes were a little puffy. Becca helped set the table and Steve put Christopher in his chair before sitting down with a blank look on his face.

---

Bucky pulled another chair in for Sarah to sit with them and he hesitated for a moment before taking his usual spot next to Steve. Everyone was quiet for a second and when Steve didn't offer to pray like he always did every night without fail, Bucky cleared his throat and said, "Well, I guess it's me." He sighed and shut his eyes, hoping at least Steve and Sarah would follow suit. "Um... Steve and Sarah's God, thank you for the good things you have given my family and thank you that I still have my sisters and my husband and mother-in-law and one of my sons. Please keep Grant and Missy safe for us. And tell them we can't wait to see them again." He paused for a second then mumbled, "Uh, okay, amen... I think."

---

Steve looked down at his plate the whole time and Sarah looked a little upset that Steve didn't join in for dinner prayer. "That was lovely, Bucky," Sarah said appreciatively before serving them dinner. "I spoke with Tim, by the way," she added as she gave them all their helpings of food. "He says he will cover you as long as you need."

---

"Thank you for calling him. I really appreciate it. And thank you for making dinner," Bucky said then got quiet again as he helped Christopher cut up his food so he could shove it into his mouth. Steve didn't move, didn't eat a thing. Lilly watched him nervously as she ate and Becca kept glancing between Sarah and Bucky hoping for some direction of what to do.

---

Sarah gave Becca a look that silently said to let Steve do his own thing. Steve didn't remember it, but Sarah remembered how Steve got when he lost his father as a young child. He was acting very similarly. "You're my family. We always take care of our family," she said warmly. "I better get a good Mother's Day gift this year," she joked lightly as she reached out to give Bucky's hand a comforting squeeze.

---

"Of course." Bucky nodded and tried to return the smile. Then he remembered Christmas was coming up in a month and a half. This would be Christopher's first Christmas. And they thought it would be the new baby's first one too. He sighed and closed his eyes just thinking about how nice that would have been. Christopher running around the living room as Lilly and Becca opened presents. And Steve sitting curled up on the couch holding a sleeping Grant who wasn't aware of what sort of festivities were happening around him. Christopher whined then and Bucky realized he had been signing for more food and hadn't been given any yet. "Sorry, Bean, sorry. Here you go," Bucky said hurriedly and cut up some more for him. "Here you go, Sweet Little Boy. No need to make noises. Papa has your food."

---

Christopher ate until his belly was full and he looked pretty sleepy after that. Sarah cleaned up their dishes and put Steve's untouched food in a container. "Are there any errands you need me to run tomorrow?" Sarah asked.

---

"I don't know," Bucky said again, feeling entirely unhelpful. "I guess I'll let you know." He nodded and took Christopher from his seat. "Becca, Lilly, Sarah will be here for a few days so she's going to need to borrow one of your rooms. And then Steve is going to borrow the other and you two can stay in the master bedroom. I'll be out on the couch." He sighed. "Steve, Baby," he said gently. "Do
"You want Christopher with you tonight or do you want me to watch him?"

"You can have him," Steve said flatly and gave both Bucky and Christopher a kiss on the cheek before going to Becca's room without another word.

Sarah got the girls ready for bed but instead of going to sleep right away, she went down to the living room where Bucky and Christopher were. "I'm sorry Steve isn't all there right now."

---

Bucky was lying on the couch with Christopher asleep on his chest. He looked up at Sarah and patted the chair next to him for her to sit down if she wanted to. "When we were at the hospital, one of the nurses said that God killed Missy and Grant to punish us because we are queer."

---

Sarah sat down and gave Bucky a sad little glance. "Steve isn't used to hearing that sort of hate," she said gently. "And he doesn't take loss like this very well." Sarah folded her hands in her lap. "I don't believe God is punishing you two. I believe God had a plan for Missy and Grant, but those plans weren't for them to stay on earth. It's an unfortunate tragedy that you have to suffer the loss of their lives."

---

Bucky nodded. "I like that a lot better. Steve believes that nurse. It really fucked him up. I didn't think his faith was that easily shaken but it was. Now he is saying he doesn't want any more kids. And he is scared that something will happen to Christopher next. I'm worried Steve's going to take this too far and he is going to leave us. I know he loves his god more than me and that's fine, but not if he thinks what his god wants is for him to be straight and not be with me anymore."

---

"I don't think he truly believes what she said," Sarah admitted. "But would you bet your son's life on a maybe?" She looked at the pile of broken crib. "Steve loves God. And that's why no matter what, he would never break the promise he made to him that he would stay by your side for all eternity. He also loves you far too much to ever abandon you."

---

Bucky looked at her for a long moment. "Is it unfair that I'd rather he leave his religion behind if it meant that he thought we were wrong? I don't want him looking at me everyday and thinking, 'I vowed to stay with this man so now I'm stuck with him. He's the one who I've been sinning with and he's the reason my son is dead.'" He paused and thought. "Yeah, I don't think he should follow any god that tells him that what we have is unnatural or bad or a sin."

---

"His religion isn't saying that. It's people misinterpreting his religion that are, and Steve is having trouble differentiating between the two." Sarah knew that this wasn't fair for Bucky to have to deal with. But there wasn't much that either of them could do at the moment. "He will come around," she said. "He was so excited for this baby. He will find it in his heart to bring more children into your home. Time and prayer will heal him and he will be a good husband to you again."
"Can you talk to him?" Bucky asked softly and pet the little hairs on Christopher's head. "Or help me get Father Frank down here to talk to him. He knows I don't believe exactly what he believes but I know what it means to him. And I think if someone who does believe like him talked to him instead of me it might help, you know?"

"Of course, I will," she said. "I plan on bringing him with me to church tomorrow. And if he won't go with his mother, then I'll bring Father Frank here." She squeezed his arm lightly. "You are so strong, Bucky. I can't imagine the loss you've suffered today. You deserve a husband that will help bear that sorrow."

"Thank you, Sarah," Bucky said with a little waver to his voice. "For everything you're doing for us." He let her give him a kiss on his forward before she headed up to bed. Bucky watched Christopher sleeping and breathing easy and hoped Steve wasn't having too rough of a time sleeping and breathing himself. He hated that they weren't wrapped up in each other's arms right now like they should be. But it couldn't be helped. It also couldn't be helped that Bucky didn't sleep for a single second during the night. He just had too much on his mind.

Chapter End Notes

Spoiler Warnings for tertiary character death and loss of a child and mental instability resulted from grief.
Sarah got the girls up and ready for school. Everyone had breakfast and she made lunch for them as well. However, despite her attempts at getting Steve out of bed, he refused. So she asked Father Frank to come in the afternoon. He spent nearly an hour talking with Steve and Sarah, but when it was over, he walked over to Bucky and gave him a rosary. "I know you don't believe. But if you ever do want to pray for your son, some of us hold rosary beads while praying. It's a connection to God the Father."

---

Bucky took it gratefully and kept Christopher from putting it in his mouth. "Thank you, Father. How is Steve? Did he tell you that we made Grant's middle name ‘Francis’ after you? We were going to tell you when he was being baptized but that isn't happening now."

---

Frank looked surprised and touched. "He did not tell me," he said softly. "I'm honored, truly." He sat down and gently tickled the bottom of Christopher's foot. "He is still in mourning. There are many stages of grief one has to endure before healing, as you know." The father sighed. "I reassured him that this was not his fault or the fault of your relationship."

---

"Did he believe you?" Bucky asked with doubt and fatigue in his tone. He hoped Steve listened to Father Frank at least. There was nothing that Bucky wanted to do more than to go curl up with Steve and hold him but he doubted that his husband even wanted to see him.

---

"I can't say for certain," Frank said. "But I can say that he is more convinced than before. This was an unfortunate and painful occurrence. God does not condone the hatred that women spewed upon you in your time of grief and need. And God most certainly isn’t punishing you. He is all-loving. Steve will remember that eventually.” He paused and gave a confident smile to Bucky and the wrinkles around his eyes crinkled up. "If we can get him out of the house and brought back into our sermons and community, he will have more people of faith to reassure him. It won't heal his loss but it will at least heal his guilt." Frank paused before asking, "Is there anything I can do to help lift the weight you carry?"

---

"I'm not sure, Father." Bucky shook his head. "I have absolutely no answers at the moment. If you can perform Grant's funeral for us, that would mean the world. I'm not sure if Missy's aunt is holding her funeral or if that will be me as well, but I may need you for that one too."

---

"Of course, I will help lay your son to rest," Father Frank responded with conviction. "You let me know about Missy and if she needs a priest, then I will see her to rest too." He kissed the top of Christopher's head and squeezed Bucky's shoulder as he stood. "I hope you find peace soon," he said gently before heading out.

---
Bucky sat with Christopher for a couple minutes. He really hadn't let go of him much since they got home and he was anxious to move around. "Sarah!" Bucky called and went looking for her in the kitchen. The girls were back from school and working on homework quietly at the table and Sarah was reading from her Bible. "Do one of you mind watching him for a bit? I'm going to go talk to Steve." He set Christopher on the ground and the baby immediately started running circles around the table. "He has a lot of energy that he hasn't gotten to work out for a bit so please just make sure he doesn't bump his head or something."

---

Sarah looked up from her Bible and then nodded her head. "Of course," she answered. She then looked over at Christopher and gave him a big smile. "Wow, so fast!" she praised, getting up to pretend to chase after him.

---

Bucky trudged upstairs to Becca's room, worried about what sort of state Steve was going to be in. He didn't bother knocking - he figured if he asked to come in he would be told 'no'. The state he found Steve in wasn't too surprising. He was curled up in a tight ball on Becca's twin bed and he was staring out at nothing.

---

Steve's hair was flat from lying in the same position all night long and throughout the day so far. When Bucky came in, he didn't move even though his eyes flickered over to see him. "Did Father Frank speak to you?" he asked.

---

Bucky nodded and walked over to the bed. "He gave me this," he said and held out the rosary to Steve. "And I told him that we dedicated Grant's middle name for him. I think he really appreciated that."

---

Steve made a tired noise. "He says this wasn't our fault. But it still feels like it somehow is," Steve said. "Why would something like this happen if we weren't doing anything wrong, Buck?"

---

Bucky stiffened and stared at Steve. He really couldn't do this again. He couldn't have this whole conversation again. It was too much. If Steve really needed something to blame for this then Bucky was going to give him something to blame. It sure as hell wasn't going to be their relationship, though. "Sure. You're right. It happened because I did something wrong. Missy was struggling and skipping AA meetings and wanting to do drugs again and I didn't do everything in my power to help her. She told me about a month and a half ago that she did cocaine with a friend - while pregnant with our baby. Then she asked me if we would still want the baby even despite that mistake. I told her we would and asked her if she would wait until the baby was born to do drugs again. I believed her when she said she would wait." Bucky paused, his breathing picking up and tears brimming on his eyes. "But I also know how addiction works. And I knew the likelihood that she would do it again. And I also made the mistake of telling her how much I miss coke and how much I loved doing it and how great it felt when I did. I screwed her up. It's my fault she is dead and the baby is dead!" Bucky was crying and holding his arms across his chest and staring at Steve, waiting for him to get mad at him.
Steve's jaw dropped. Deep down he didn't blame Bucky but he couldn't help the swell of anger and hurt. "You knew about this? Why didn't you tell me? Fuck, how couldn't you tell me?" Steve covered his face with his hands. "Why would you tell her all that?"

Bucky shook his head. "I don't know. I regret all of it. But I was just trying to relate to her, make her feel like she wasn't alone. I was being honest with her. You should understand that. Your whole thing is honesty." At least it was sort of working. Steve was now mad at him and not mashed into the bed thinking about God punishing them for anything.

Steve looked away from Bucky, unable to bear to see him crying right now. He wanted to just curl up and waste away. "You should've told me," he said again. "We could've changed this. We could have kept them both alive, Bucky!"

"I know that," Bucky said somberly. "She told me not to tell you, though. She thought you'd arrest her. I think she thought that after the baby was born, you would have her arrested and she would go to jail. She liked you but she didn't like that you are a cop. Even though I told her you would never do that." He hesitated. "But this is all my fault. You're right. It's on me and I understand that you are angry with me. I'll just go. I'll leave you alone."

Steve frowned with disapproval and such a heavy heart. Bucky should have known him better and convinced Missy more that he wouldn't arrest her. He wouldn't arrest people in need. "It's not all your fault," he said. "But I do want to be left alone, Buck. I'm sorry."

Bucky nodded. He took a step forward and slipped off his wedding ring. He slowly offered it out to Steve. He hated that they were doing this again but he figured this would keep him distracted from blaming their sexuality on all this. Bucky would take all this blame if it helped Steve at all.

Steve looked at the ring for a moment before sliding his own off and swapping it with Bucky's. He placed Bucky's ring on his finger and curled back up under the blankets. He was done interacting for the day. He was ready to go back to wordlessly staring at the walls in Becca's room and counting to five while he breathed slowly, just to try to keep from coughing.

Bucky spent the rest of the day playing with Christopher in the living room and talking with Sarah. He felt like shit but he needed to take care of the son he still had. The girls just sat on the couch together and watched silently as Christopher worked on a block tower.

After laying in silence for a few minutes, Lilly spoke up. "Bucky? Can you walk with me to the store? I want to get something but I don't have any money," she said.

"Can Miss Sarah go with you?" Bucky asked and looked over at her with pleading eyes. Lilly shook her head. She wanted to go walking with her brother. "Okay, Lil, let's go." He sighed and got up. "What is it you need?"

"It's nothing expensive," she said vaguely, not wanting to talk about it. Once outside, she admitted, "I want to get a blanket for Grant for his funeral."

Bucky took Lilly’s hand and squeezed it once. "Thank you, Lilly. Yes, that's really kind of you. We can find something for him." He sighed and walked on. "Lilly, I don't know how Steve and I are going to move on from this. I'm surprised how well I'm doing right now. Steve's shut down and I know I can't do that to you and Becca again. But I feel so broken."

Lilly gave Bucky a bit of a worried look. "You're not breaking up, are you?" She liked Steve and she liked how much better Bucky felt having him there. Her brother had changed so much for the better in this past year. "He's not talking to you?"

"He's hardly talking," Bucky said quietly. "And he hardly looks at me. I don't honestly know what's going to happen. Every time something comes up, he always reassures me that he would never ever leave and he loves me. But he isn't doing that now. And when I asked if he still loved me, he said ‘yes, but he didn't feel it in his heart'."

"Steve needs to stop being an asshole," Lilly said in a matter-of-fact tone. She was more emotional with her judgments than Becca was. "He's not the only one feeling like shit, but he's the only one shutting everyone else out."

"I'm okay with him being like this and wanting to be alone but I just need to know that we are going to be okay. I need to know that he won't leave and he still loves me and he still wants to try for more children later and he doesn't think that this is some big horrible plot against us because we are gay," Bucky rambled and took a deep breath.

"I can try and knock some sense into him. He's not even playing with his own kid anymore. I don't think he's fed Christopher or changed his diaper even once since you got home," Lilly said, putting her free hand on her hip.

"He hasn't. And it's okay. He needs time," Bucky said. "I just don't want Christopher thinking that Steve doesn't love him anymore as well. Steve can be done with me but he can't be done with his son. Christopher needs him.

---

When they got to the store, Lilly went to the baby aisle and started looking at the different blankets to find one for her nephew. "Do you really think he would abandon Christopher?"

---

"I don't know," Bucky said with a heavy sigh. "I want to think that he wouldn't. But I can't figure out anything going through his head right now. I thought he would never question his faith in us like he did either. He’s so distant right now. Aren't partners supposed to work through tragedy together?"

---

"Well, yeah, that's what they're supposed to do. People are also supposed to not do drugs but they break that rule, too," Lilly said. "Are we going to go to Missy's funeral? Or are only you going?"

---

"I might be holding Missy's funeral. I'm not sure yet," Bucky said and looked at the three blankets Lilly was trying to decide between. "If you want to be there, you can. But I won't make you. I understand how tough it is going to funerals and you'll already have Grant's to attend."

---

"I'd rather be there with you," she said. "You shouldn't have to go alone." Lilly landed on a blanket with little dinosaurs on it. "You think this one is nice? I think he would have liked having dinosaurs on stuff."

---

"I think that one is great." Bucky smiled. "Maybe you can show Steve when we get home. Try to see if he will talk to you. What do you think?" He took the blanket carefully from Lilly and went to set it on the checkout counter.

---

Lilly hugged Bucky and then took the blanket back once it was paid for. "I hope Steve wants more kids. I was kind of hoping for a niece," she said. "I love Christopher, but I want to have a fifty-fifty split."

---

"I hope he wants more kids, too, Lil," Bucky said and started walking back to their place. "That was the plan - a bunch of kids in our new house. I'm just waiting for him to snap out of this and let us grieve together. He doesn't look at me and he hasn't touched me barely at all since we got home and I need to feel loved. I lost people, too, and I feel like I'm not actually getting to mourn."
The morning of Grant's funeral was the most difficult since they had gotten home. Bucky had made sure he got himself clean and dressed in a nice black suit and he got Christopher into the suit that Sarah had gone out and bought him. She had taken care of getting the girls ready and Lilly clung to the new blanket for Grant the entire time.

After a while, everyone was ready except for Steve. He still hadn't left Becca's room. He hadn't showered for days and he hadn't eaten. Bucky held Christopher in one arm and barged into Becca's room, holding Steve's suit with the other. "Steve, come on. I won't make you shower but you have to at least put this on. We have to go soon," he said firmly.

---

Steve had been dreading this day. He felt as if the longer Grant spent above ground, the longer he could hold on to his memory. Once he was buried, then that was that. He looked over and had half the heart to say that maybe he shouldn't go. But he knew he would regret it and Bucky wouldn't forgive him. He dragged himself to his feet and slowly, mechanically changed into his suit. "Do you think they'll let us hold him one last time?"

---

"We can ask to do that before the service starts." Bucky nodded and readjusted Christopher who was pulling at his hair and making soft noises to himself. "Father Frank will be there. I'm sure he will help us with that. He and Tim also worked to put together a memorial lunch at the shelter after the service is over. I'm going to go but you don't have to."

---

"I'd like to hold him before the service." Steve knew that he would be more like a doll than an actual baby at this point. But he needed to hold his son one last time. "And I'd rather go home after the service," he said. Steve combed his hair back to at least attempt to look presentable. "Tell them I said 'thank you', though."

---

"Okay, I will. Do you want to come back alone or do you want Christopher?" Bucky asked. "Because I was planning on taking him with me unless you want him for a bit. He misses you. He's been pretty confused that you haven't been around."

---

"He'll probably be happier with you," Steve said. He looked over at their baby and Christopher smiled happily when he had his dad's attention. "I'll play with him later, once you're back from the lunch."

---

Bucky doubted that Steve would actually do that, but he nodded anyway. "Thank you. Are you ready to go? I mean, as ready as we will ever be. None of this is easy." He fixed Steve's collar a bit and then stopped touching him because he wasn't sure if that would make Steve angry. "Your mom and the girls are waiting downstairs."
Steve had a pretty exhausted, depleted expression stretched over his face, but he did lean a little towards Bucky when he fixed his collar. He grabbed the teddy bear he'd bought for Grant - the one he took to the hospital - and followed Bucky downstairs. He shadowed his mom as they walked to church for the service, still not saying a word.

When they got there, Bucky took a deep breath before holding the door open for his family and then following them in. There were more people than he expected. A lot of the people he knew were there like Clint, Nat, Tim, and another man with Natasha who he assumed must have been Sam Wilson and they were talking with Evan and Monty. There were also plenty of people who he had never seen before but they all seemed to recognize Steve. Maybe they were coworkers or people of Father Frank's church.

Christopher started signing over at Clint when he saw him, remembering that Clint was the one adult who spoke through sign to him the most. Clint managed a smile and walked over to Bucky so he could give him a hug and say hello to the baby. "I'm so sorry, buddy," he said to Bucky softly.

"Thanks, Clint," Bucky said and held on to him in the hug. "Sorry, I didn't come tell you in person. Things have been overwhelming. Thank you for coming today. I love you, man. I really appreciate your support. "He looked over at Steve who was standing a few feet away by his mother and staring at the ground. "I hardly managed to get him out of bed to come today."

"It's okay, Bucky. It's not exactly something that's nice to have to tell people," Clint said. He glanced over at Steve. "He looks like hell," he said. "When's the last time he ate? Doesn't he have health issues he needs to worry about?"

"He hasn't eaten for four days, Sarah got him to have a slice of toast yesterday morning and he has been drinking water from time to time," Bucky said with a tired, guilty sigh. "And yeah, he's kind of sick right now and he won't do what the doctors suggest and he's being really stubborn and unreasonable. His body is all shaky and he can't stay awake for very long." He paused and shook his head, trying to shrug it off for now.

"Four days? Fuck, at this point we need Natasha to shove a sandwich down his throat." Clint sighed. A few churchgoers went over to Steve to give them their condolences but Steve didn't react hardly at all. "If there's anything I can do, let me know. We have enough coverage at the store for a while in case you need more time."

"Alright, I'm going to try to be back next week but I'll let you know," Bucky said. "And I might take you up on that offer to have Natasha knock some sense into him. If anyone can, it's her, probably." Father Frank called for everyone to sit down then and Bucky led his family up to sit in the front row.
He figured he could just ask to hold Grant once they were done. The baby wasn’t going anyway yet so they had a little time. Bucky sat his sisters down and then Steve and hesitated once again before sitting by his husband. He held Christopher on his lap but didn't reach out for Steve's hand like he so desperately wanted to.

---

Throughout the whole sermon, Steve sat still as a stone and almost as if he wanted to disappear from this place until it was all over. He appreciated the support of his friends, family, and community, but he wanted a moment to himself - just him and his son to say goodbye in peace. When it was all over and time to go to the cemetery, he looked over to Bucky, his eyes stinging with tears. "I don't think I can do this."

---

"You can do this," Bucky said and this time took his hand. "You can." He gave Christopher to Becca and walked Steve up to Father Frank. "Father, is it okay if Steve and I hold him one more time before we go lay him to rest?"

---

Frank nodded and pulled them into a private room where the coffin was. Upon seeing the small intricate coffin, Steve made a choked sound and buried his face into Bucky's shoulder, gripping onto his shirt tightly. He squeezed Bucky's hand and gave him a small nudge to take their son out.

---

Bucky kissed Steve's head and then gingerly took Grant from the coffin. He was dressed in a light blue onesie and was wearing a cap on his head. Bucky cradled him and touched his face that had been done up by the mortician to look less blue. Bucky did not appreciate it. He looked like something he wasn't. They were trying to make his son into what they thought he should look like. He was perfect how he was and he didn’t want anyone else to have touched him.

---

Steve saw how Grant had been covered up and his bottom lip quivered. He took the blanket that Lilly had bought for him and dipped the corner in some of the holy water in the basin and gingerly wiped the makeup off so he would look how he had been born instead of what he was expected to look like.

---

Bucky watched Steve and cried as he saw the mess of makeup wash away. Once he was done, he passed Grant over to Steve to hold and then he snuggled up against Steve's side to look at the baby. "Thank you for doing that, Steve. He didn't look like himself."

---

Steve held Grant against his chest and kissed the top of the baby's head. "Your dad and pop love you so much, little man," he whispered. "I can't wait to get to meet you in heaven." He took a shuddering breath and turned Grant towards Bucky a bit in case he wanted to talk to him and say his goodbyes.

---

Bucky kissed his son too and then held one of his tiny hands. A part of him hoped against hope that he would cough and splutter and then start crying and open his eyes. But he knew there was absolutely no chance of that. "Your Papaw and Gran are going to take care of you until we can get there, okay? They are good people and they already love you so much. And so do we."

---

Steve would’ve stayed there forever if they could. But he knew that it was time to let go of their little boy. He whispered words of love to him and sung him a little lullaby before laying him back down. He let Bucky tuck him in with the dinosaur blanket and he adjusted the teddy bear so it was snuggled up against his side. He reached down for Bucky's hand and gave it a squeeze. "Ready to go?"

---

Bucky stared at him for a little while longer and just clung to Steve's hand. "Yes, I'm ready," he said and whispered one more time to Grant that he loved him. Then he let Father Frank lead them back out and tried not to look back at the two church deacons who were closing up the coffin to carry it out to head to the grave site.

---

Steve was a little less distant after that, even though he didn't speak as Grant was blessed one more time before being lowered into his grave. They stood there as the rest of the funeral party left to go back to the shelter. Steve turned to Bucky and gently took his ring off and offered it back to him.

---

Bucky looked down at the ring. He wanted to take it back. He did. But he had too much doubt about this still in his heart. "I'm sorry, Steve. This is a two-way street. We both have to be ready. I need a couple things cleared up first. We can talk when I get home from the lunch at the shelter."

---

Steve's face fell and he looked away so Bucky couldn't see how upset he was. He didn't blame Bucky for needing more time. But Steve was desperate to have a peace between them again. "Alright... I guess I'll see you at home, then."

---

"Still don't want to come?" Bucky asked sadly. "Clint and Nat and your new buddy Sam are going to be there." He planned on just spending his time talking with them and fielding condolences from other attendees and making sure Christopher didn't throw his food.

---

"Not really," Steve said. "I'd rather remember him in peace and quiet than in a crowd." He didn't mean to come off as rude or ungrateful for the memorial service. It was just that his heart was too broken to handle any more of this.

---

"Okay, Love. Christopher and I will be back home later." Bucky squeezed Steve's hand once and turned to go. "The girls and your mom are going home with you, but I'm sure they won't bug you if you want to be alone. See you in a bit."
Steve nodded. "Alright... I love you," he said quietly, tiredly. He kissed Bucky's cheek and then the top of Christopher's head. He held his mom's hand as he and the girls walked back home. As soon as he got back, he took a shower and laid down again, far too tired from the day to do anything else.

---

Bucky wasn't out for very long. He didn't want to be away from the rest of his family too much on a day like that. But he knew somebody had to attend the lunch service and talk to people. When he got back home, he was exhausted. "Sarah, is Steve back upstairs?" he asked and set Christopher on the couch so he could strip off his little suit. The baby had been wiggling uncomfortably in it all day.

---

"Yes, he is," Sarah said in a tone that suggested she was both worried and tired of Steve hiding away from his family. "How are you feeling, Bucky? I know it was a hard day today, but I remember feeling a sense of relief after my husband was laid to rest."

---

"I am mostly just exhausted and ready for this nightmare to be over." Bucky sighed and picked up Christopher who was down to his diaper. "Would you mind putting him in comfier clothes so I can go talk to Steve. I upset him earlier and we have some things we need to discuss."

---

"Dada?" Christopher said to Bucky when he heard him say 'Steve'. He was getting smarter by the day. Sarah nodded and took Christopher. "Yes, Love, your dad's upstairs. You'll get to see him later," she said sweetly as she took him to the nursery to change him.

---

Bucky knocked on the door this time before going in. Steve was sitting up instead of lying down and he was dressed in his pajamas once more. "I was told by just about everyone to give you their condolences and hugs."

---

Steve's eyes flickered to Bucky and he drew his lips into a thin line. "Thank you," he said. A part of him felt guilty not being there at Bucky's side. But he felt like he would've made things worse by being there. "How're you feeling?"

---

"Not great," Bucky said and gestured at a spot on the bed. "Can I sit? I think we should talk about a couple things because we just buried our son and I'm tired of not being able to be in your arms. Also, you need to eat." He pulled a bowl of apple slices from behind his back and handed them to Steve. "Please."

---

"Yeah, sit," Steve murmured. He eyed the apple slices for a moment. He didn't feel like his stomach would agree but he would try to eat for Bucky's sake. He picked one up and nibbled at it lightly. "What do you want to talk about?"
Bucky sat down and pulled his legs up underneath him. "First of all, I want to know if you love me. I mean, actually love me. Because the other day you said you didn't feel it in your heart and that was a cruel blow to my already ripped up soul." Bucky was far too jaded to sugar-coat anything. He was just going to get to the point and get answers out of his husband.

---

"I do," Steve said firmly. "The other day I didn't feel anything. I wasn't happy holding Christopher, my heart didn't soar when I looked at you... It wasn't that I loved you any less, Bucky, it was that I couldn't... couldn't handle anything."

---

"What about now? How do you feel about me now?" Bucky asked and stared desperately at Steve. "Are you angry with me? Do you feel love for me again? Are you going to stay and let us grieve our son together?"

---

Steve reached out to hold Bucky's hand. "I feel blessed to have a husband stay by my side so faithfully when I haven't been the man he deserves," Steve said. "I want to make that up to you, Bucky. I want to be there for you."

---

Bucky held on to Steve's hand tightly. "Okay. Next question." He turned a bit and took Steve's other hand as well. "What do you believe in now? Are you still buying into that crap the nurse said? Or did you remember that your god isn't like whoever it is she's believing in?"

---

Steve looked down and huffed. "I don't know," he said. "Deep down, I don't believe that God would punish us for this. But I can't push out that fear that what if he might? I'm scared of losing you or Christopher."

---

Bucky closed his eyes slowly in defeat and frustration. He let go of Steve's hands and rested his on his lap. He didn't know what to do. He needed Steve to be passed this. He thought he got him sort of past it when he shifted the blame to himself for how he acted with Missy. Steve was acting like he was the only one worried about losing more people. Ever since his parents died, Bucky lived in constant worry that everyone he loved would be taken away.

---

"Buck..." Steve said with a frown. He watched as his husband pulled back and let go of his hands. He blinked and tried to scoot a little closer to get him back to him. "Please don't be mad at me. I don't want to leave you. I'm not sorry that we are together."

---

Bucky rubbed his face and tried not to start crying again. He cleared his throat softly and tentatively took one of Steve's hands again. "When... um... I guess... do you ever think you'll let that thought go? You'll go back to believing the god you listened to before?"
"I don't know. I want to, but right now, I can't shake the fear and doubt. I need time, Buck," Steve said quietly. He squeezed his hand. "I haven't had my faith shaken this bad ever before."

Bucky nodded and looked down. "I understand. You need time. And I guess I'm just going to have to be as patient as I can be. Because I don't have a faith that's part of me like you do so I don't know what this must feel like to you." He was trying his best to keep the conversation on what he could do to help instead of what he wanted Steve to do - that wouldn't be fair of him and it would just make Steve retreat again. "But, I do need to know what this looks like for us while you are working through this."

"What do you mean what this looks like for us?" Steve asked. He wrapped an arm around Bucky and gently pulled him against his side. "Do you think I'm going to leave or something, Buck?"

"I'm always worried you're going to leave when things get tough," Bucky admitted with a sigh. "But I mean, what's this mean right now? You've hardly looked at me or touched me and it's made me feel like you're blaming me because I'm gay and you're gay and we live together and all that shit. Like you just can't stand to look at me." He closed his eyes and shook his head. "I need to know if we are going back to normal. Going to sleep in the same bed, going to give each other morning kisses, and make love, and tell each other what we are thinking, and take care of our first born son together, and work through our grief as a couple."

"It's not you," Steve said. "I can't even play with our boy, Bucky. It doesn't have anything to do with our relationship. It has everything to do with the fact that I'm more depressed than I've ever been. I want to get through this together as a couple, Bucky. But I can't promise normal when I'm not feeling normal. I've never felt like this in my life. I don't know how to navigate it."

"Okay." Bucky nodded and swallowed around the lump in his throat. "Well, I'm going to go back downstairs to Christopher and make sure he is doing okay. I also need to get out of this suit. You can join us if you want. Like I said, he misses you."

Steve nodded. "He doesn't deserve an absent father. I'll go down and spend some time with him." This was the most he'd been out of the room all week. While Bucky changed, Steve went down to his mom and Christopher. His son bounced in his spot when he saw Steve and reached out for him.

Bucky put on some comfortable jeans and a sweater and then came back to the living and saw Christopher clinging desperately to Steve and talking up a storm. "Hey, Sweet Little Bean!" Bucky said excitedly, trying to put on airs for their baby. "Is Daddy back? Did Daddy come to play?"
Steve felt awful at how Christopher clung onto him like he would disappear if he let go. He rubbed the baby's back and gave him his full attention as he babbled. "He's got a lot to tell me," Steve said pleasantly as Christopher kept talking. "I guess I missed a lot."

---

"Tell Daddy all about it," Bucky encouraged him and laid down with his head resting on Steve's thigh. "Tell him about how you've been running all around the house and making your Nana and your Pops chase you down." He giggled and reached up to lightly pinch Christopher's leg.

---

"You're running now? But you were barely able to crawl yesterday!" Steve teased lightly. He tickled Christopher's belly before moving his hand to pet his fingers through Bucky's hair. "You're growing up so fast, Bean. You're going to be a big bean soon!"

---

"Big strong bean!" Bucky agreed with a chuckle. "Pretty soon you'll be able to actually outrun Pops and Nana when we try to track you down." He glanced over at Sarah who was reading in a chair and smiling down at her book as she listened. This felt good. Steve was with him again and they were with their son. It could be better. They could have Grant sleeping in Bucky's arms while his brother played. But this was good.

---

"Beeeeee," Christopher cooed happily, mimicking his parents. Steve let out a laugh and hugged his son. "You're such a good boy," he praised. "You want to play with your blocks some more? I know how much you love knocking them down."

---

Bucky sat up and brought the box of toy blocks over to Christopher and Steve and started putting them in rows on the ground. "Steve, Baby, can I make anything for you to eat? How many apple slices did you have?" he asked it softly and lovingly so Steve would know Bucky was concerned but not feel like he was being nagged about it.

---

Steve sat next to Christopher and helped him set up his little tower. "A few," he said. "I'm not very hungry, Bucky, I'm sorry. I'll try to eat more at dinner," he promised.

---

Bucky nodded and pet Steve's hair. "You don't have to eat much. Just enough so you don't waste away. That's all I ask." He smiled softly and leaned over to gingerly kiss Steve's cheek. "I'm glad you're here right now. I really missed being with you," he whispered and rested his head on Steve's shoulder, just watching Christopher.

---

Christopher could barely wait until the blocks were set up. He smashed them all down and bubbled with laughter. Steve managed a little smile and then turned his head to return the kiss for Bucky. "I love you, Bucky. I do," he said softly. "We can do this together."
"Yeah, we can," Bucky agreed and held tightly to Steve's hand. "I think it's a good idea for you to talk to Father Frank about this again, too. Get some of his opinions and thoughts about all it. He really wants to help us. He cares about you and knows how strong you are. And I know it would be good for you to talk with someone who shares your faith since I don't quite. You know?"

Steve nodded his head in agreement. "Alright," he said quietly. He knew talking to the Father would be a good idea in all regards, so he may as well. "We're lucky to have him, aren't we?"

"Yeah, I agree. He has been really good to us," Bucky said and got up off the ground. "I'm going to go check on the girls really quick and then I'll be back. In the interest of honesty and telling each other what we think, I really wish I could be drinking right now so I'm going to make a bunch of iced tea."

When Bucky checked on the girls, they were keeping themselves busy by playing a card game on the bed. They looked up at Bucky and waited for him to talk to gauge how things were going right now.

Bucky sighed and went to sit down next to Lilly. He pulled her in for a hug and kissed the top of her head. "How are you two holding up? Do you need anything? I was about to get some iced tea in the fridge for later."

"We don't need anything," Becca said. "We're sad Grant isn't around, but it's not like we were his parents or anything. We're mostly sad for you two."

"I understand," Bucky said sadly and looked at both of them in turn. "Thanks for being so helpful and supportive of us through this. I love you both so fucking much. I hope you know that." He kissed their foreheads and then went back downstairs to make iced tea.

Christopher had tottered after Bucky when he saw his pop go into the kitchen. "Papa," he said, then signed for food. Since Bucky was making tea he figured now was a good time to ask.

Steve quickly followed his son inside and scooped him up. "He's insatiable."

"What do you want, Bean?" Bucky asked and opened the fridge to pull out some different types of fruits and veggies. "You only get a little bit because I want you to eat your dinner tonight." Christopher made grabby hands at the blackberries and Bucky handed them to Steve so he could feed his son.
Steve gave Christopher his berries one by one since he couldn't be trusted to not mash them the second he had the chance. "I can't believe how much not being around for a few days affected him," Steve said.

"He's a growing little boy," Bucky answered and started the water to boil. "He needs his support system and he loves you so much. I think he just got pretty confused and nervous. He kept saying 'Dada' every time your mom or I mentioned you."

Once all the berries were gone, Christopher smiled at Steve and reached up to signal that he wanted to be held again. "I don't ever want to be that distant from him again. Or you," Steve said.

Bucky smiled softly into the tea he was letting steep and said, "I think Christopher would agree that he doesn't want you to be that distant again either. And I sure as hell don't." He poured the hot tea into a large pitcher and put it in the freezer to start cooling down. "We really do need you. And we love you so much."

Steve walked over to hug Bucky from behind and gave him a small kiss on his shoulder. "Well, I love you too. So very much," he said with an adoring smile. Steve kissed his cheek again and then stepped back.

"Can we sleep together again tonight?" Bucky asked and turned to lean against the counter. "I can ask Becca if she wouldn't mind sharing her bed with Lilly or taking the couch. The couch isn't too bad, I just want to be with you tonight."

Steve nodded his head. "I'd like that a lot," he agreed. "I miss waking up to you. And getting to hold you all night long." He really did miss out on a lot since they stopped talking.

"I'll talk to Becca later about it. I don't think she will mind," Bucky said and looked over at Christopher. He couldn't believe that they had just buried their second son that morning. Things felt so strange, like he was dreaming.

When it was bedtime, Steve tucked their little boy in and read him a story until he fell asleep. Steve then said goodnight to the rest of his family and snuggled into bed with Bucky. He had a hard time sleeping that night between breathing issues and nightmares about their son. But come morning, he was out like a log.
Bucky woke up before Steve and gently slipped out from under his tangle of arms and legs. He had something he wanted to do today so he wrote Steve a little note. The note said, 'I'll be back soon - maybe an hour or two. Please eat some breakfast. At least a piece of toast if nothing else.' Then he rolled it up and put it on the nightstand for him. He also very carefully took his ring back from Steve's finger and put it on, replacing Steve’s back to its rightful place.

---

Steve slowly sat up in bed when the sun poured in through the windows and woke him. He looked to his side and frowned when he saw Bucky was no longer there. But then he saw his own ring back on his finger and a little smile came to his face. Steve said his morning prayer with Grant's rosaries and then went downstairs to make breakfast. He was feeling pretty okay at the moment.

---

Bucky spent a good hour at the cemetery talking to his parents and Grant and petting the freshly turned earth above his son. It would be another couple weeks before the ground was solid enough for the gravestone to be put in and Bucky knew he would feel uncomfortable and worried about it until it was standing up next to his mother's stone.

After he felt like he wouldn't be able to stay any longer without crying, Bucky got up and headed to the tattoo shop where he had gotten his first tattoo a few months before. In simple script, he had them ink 'Christopher Leland' on his chest over his heart and then 'Grant Francis' right below it. He figured he would just add names under each one as time went on and they had more children - if they had more children.

---

Once two hours had passed, Steve worried when Bucky would be getting back. He didn't panic or call around for him yet. Bucky must have just not noticed how long he had been out. When Bucky did finally end up coming home, Steve was laying on his back on the floor while Christopher climbed over him from side to side, content to use his dad as a jungle gym.

---

"Hey, Little Bean!" Bucky said excitedly and got down on the floor with him and Steve. Lilly and Becca were putting together a jigsaw puzzle on the coffee table and Sarah was once again reading in the chair she had taken to. Christopher jumped into Bucky's lap and reached up to bang his hands on his chest excitedly. "Ow, ow, Christopher, hold on," he said and gently took his son's hands so they wouldn't hit his new tattoo.

---

Steve gave Bucky a curious look when he was hurt by the hit. The baby wasn't strong enough to cause pain like that, after all. Christopher pouted a little and tried to wiggle his hands free. "No! Papa," he insisted in his little voice. He would've signed something at Bucky if his hands weren't restrained.

---

Bucky let go of his hands and said, "But, Baby, it hurts a little because Papa did this today." He lifted his shirt up to show off the tattoo. It was red around the lettering and his chest felt like it was on fire. But he loved it.

---

Steve sat up when he saw that Bucky had gotten a tattoo. He moved closer so he could read it and he felt his chest get tight. Tears welled up in his eyes and he put a hand on Bucky's chest, just under his heart. "That's beautiful, Bucky."

---

"You okay?" Bucky asked softly and took Steve's hand, feeling the ring back on his husband’s finger. He couldn't tell if Steve liked the tattoo or not. It might have hurt too much to see their sons’ names written out together like that while also knowing that their babies wouldn’t get to play and grow up side by side. "Should I not have gotten this?"

---

"No, I think... I think it's a beautiful idea," Steve said softly. "It's just a shame he won't get to see his name on you for a very long time. I think it would be pretty special to know that his papa carries around his name forever now."

---

"I think he can probably see it now. He just can't read. He's too young to you," Bucky said and smiled a little. If he believed his parents were watching over them, he had to believe his son was with them too. "And I figured I'd just add below their names if we have more kids." He looked over at the girls working on the puzzle. "And before you two think I forgot you, I want to do something for you as well but I want your help deciding what it should be."

---

"You're going to have so many names on you, someone's going to think you're a road map," Becca snorted with a fond smile to show that she was mostly teasing.

"Yeah... especially if we end up having the dozen kids we planned for," Steve added. He wasn't completely sold on trying for more kids, but he did want them in theory. He also knew it would make Bucky feel better if he at least let the idea bounce around again.

---

Bucky gave Steve a small, warm smile. He appreciated that Steve was trying to be confident for him. And Bucky hoped that soon Steve really would agree to more kids and put this paranoia behind him. It wasn’t like he wanted to go pick a new baby right that second, he just wanted to know that their future held more kids. Bucky looked to Sarah and said, "Well, Sarah everyone's getting in on writing on my body so now is your chance."

---

Sarah looked up from her book and gave Bucky a sly smirk. "How about you tattoo your grocery list so you don't forget Steve's favorite crackers for the third time." She remembered how Steve whined to her that Bucky always accidentally got the wrong type almost every time he asked for them.
Bucky was taken aback but grateful for the change of pace with such light conversation today as opposed to the days before. "I get you your crackers, right?" Bucky asked Steve. "The ones with the dark green label and the cheese wedge with a face and a top hat," he said, concentration evident on his face as he worked to remember what Steve told him to always look for.

---

"Love," Steve said with a patient smile. "It's the bright blue label and the yellow triangle man with a top hat. They're crunchier than the other ones and they have a little spice to them."

---

"That's the same thing," Bucky defended. "Right?" He tried to think about the boxes at the store but couldn't recall what any of them looked like – the brand made too many different flavors to keep track of and their signature was always something in a top hat.

---

Steve shyly shook his head. "No, Baby. They're not the same," he said. "I've tried to subtly differentiate between them so you wouldn't feel bad for getting the wrong ones. I dug myself into a hole when I donated all the boxes to the shelter and you thought I ate them all so you got more."

---

"Mmm," Bucky hummed absently and crossed his arms. "Anything else I buy that you don't actually like?" He huffed and moved so he was right next to Steve as he helped Christopher put his blocks in color order - which Christopher didn't understand in the slightest but it was fun for Bucky.

---

"No," Steve started to say but Sarah was determined to make her son embarrassed now.

"The cat-shaped brownies and the almond milk," Sarah said pointedly, hardly looking up at them for a second.

Steve puffed up. "Mom!" he scolded grumpily, like a teenager having to tell her not to show his baby pictures.

---

Bucky blinked in surprise and flicked Steve's arm. He was learning so much today. "Well, the cat-shaped brownies were originally for Lilly for lunches but then I realized how much I liked them. They're so cute and delicious. So those are staying. And almond milk is good for you. They say cow's milk can stunt growth when consumed before puberty and can shrink men's testicles. And maybe you want tiny balls but I don't want you to have tiny balls. I like the size they are now."

---

Steve's cheeks went bright red at the mention of his testicles. Bucky could have zero inhibitions about what he said out loud sometimes. "Don't say that in front of my mom, Buck," he muttered.

Sarah just shrugged. "He's allowed to say that. Lord knows your father's balls weren't that big or else I would have had more than one son."

---
"Oh, well, alright then." Bucky looked over at Sarah and chuckled. Sometimes she surprised him with her teasing. He kissed Steve's cheek and said, "But I promise I'll try to get the correct crackers from the store from now one. Not the cheese in a top hat. The other one."

---

Steve covered his face with his hands because his mom and his husband were both embarrassing him so damned much. Christopher watched his dad and then copied by putting his face in his hands too. Steve then pulled his hands away and moved to kiss Bucky's cheek. He decided to change the topic again so as to avoid any more potential mention of anyone’s balls. "You think I should get a tattoo, also?"

---

"Do you want a tattoo?" Bucky asked with a grin and lifted Christopher up and kissed him several times on his tiny hands still covering his face. "What would you get?"

---

Christopher giggled at the kisses and pulled his hands away. "I don’t know," Steve said. "Maybe a shamrock with your names in the leaves. Or a tree. I don’t know. I'm not really a tattoo person so I haven't thought about that before."

---

Bucky held up Christopher in front of him and said, "Bean, what do you think? Should Daddy get a tattoo?" The baby giggled and reached out for Steve. "I think either of those sound nice. Whatever you want." He paused and stood up. "Hold on. I have something that might work." He ran to their bedroom and grabbed the envelope of papers from the hospital. There was a copy of Grant's birth certificate and death certificate and some other official documentation and a piece of paper that had an ink splotch of Grant's feet.

---

Steve scooped up his son and kissed his face all over. He rested his chin on top of Christopher's head and went quiet when he saw Grant's papers. It was just another nasty reminder that they didn't have another son they could be doting on. "His feet?" Steve asked quietly.

---

"Yeah," Bucky said softly. "They gave me this in the envelope when we were leaving. I didn't want to look at it, though. And it didn't occur to me that it could be a really nice commemorative tattoo or something. The nurse said most parents frame these and put them somewhere they can see them."

---

"Makes me wish we got Christopher's feet inked when he was little so we could have that to hang up, too. Then we could have both their baby feet together." Steve sighed and held the paper gently in his hand before giving it back to Bucky. "I think I'll do that."

---

Bucky took the paper back and put it in the envelope for sake keeping until Steve needed it again. "Well, Christopher is still a baby, technically. And he has feet. They are bigger now, of course, but we can just make one ourselves."
"It won't be the same, but it's better than nothing." Steve kissed Christopher's cheek and set him down to run around the room. "Did you go to Grant's grave today?"

"Yes, I did," Bucky admitted. "I spent some time there talking with him and my parents. Sorry I didn't tell you where I was going this morning. I know it probably wasn't good waking up to find me gone."

Steve shrugged. "It's alright. The note helped," he said. "I'd like to go to his grave today. You can come if you'd like but I understand if it's too much for you for one day," he said softly.

"I'll come with you if you want the company," Bucky agreed. "Do you want Christopher to come too or just us?" He ran his hand up and down Steve's arm and paid attention as Christopher picked up each of his blocks in turn and held them up to his parents as if he were showing them off.

"I'd like to bring him. He should be around his brother, you know? Even if he doesn't understand," Steve said and took blocks from his son as they were handed to him. He was happy that Christopher was doing so well right now. He still felt bad for abandoning him for days.

Bucky agreed and smiled faintly at Christopher. "He will understand eventually. It'll be good for him to go with us while he is little so it gets familiar to him. And I'm sure Mom and Dad would like to see the both of you again."

Christopher pushed one of his blocks into Steve's hand, making a loud little screech as he did so. Steve tossed the block from one hand to the next as he waiting for Christopher to go get the next block for him. "I'm glad you're comfortable visiting them now."

"Thanks to you," Bucky observed. "It definitely took a while but I needed the push you gave me. And now I can even go by myself and do mostly okay." He preferred to have Steve there but he also didn't mind the alone time with his parents.

"I'm proud of you, Buck," Steve said and gave Christopher his block back when he started to reach for it. "What do you think about getting Grant's feet tattooed on the top of my feet?"

Bucky nuzzled against Steve and tried to balance one block on top of Christopher's head. "Wherever you want them to go." He smiled as Christopher shook his head to get the block off. "I'll show you the tattoo shop where I've gone to get mine. And I can go with you if you want or you can do it alone. It's your call."

---

"I'd rather you come with me," Steve said. "I don't know anything about tattoos and would rather a tattoo veteran make sure that they're doing a good job."

---

"Sure, Baby, I'll come with you." Bucky smiled warmly at Steve. "Although, I'm sure people with more tattoos than me wouldn't call me a veteran." Christopher rolled on to his back and stared up at the ceiling the way he did when he was getting sleepy and needing a nap.

---

Steve nudged Christopher lightly before scooping him up so he could lay him down. "There's always someone who has more," Steve said pleasantly. "You ready for a nap, Bean? You have a big day so far?"

---

Christopher whined and closed his eyes like he was offended his dad would even ask. Bucky let them get up so Steve could put him in his crib for a bit. He looked around the living room and didn't see the pile of remains from the crib he destroyed. He looked in the kitchen too in case Steve had simply just moved them but they weren't there either. He got up quickly and went to chase after Steve. "Hey, Baby, what happened to the broken parts of Grant's crib?"

---

Steve put Christopher in his crib and sung him to sleep. When Bucky chased him down, he looked over at him in mild surprise. "Oh... I put it in the storage closet. I wasn't sure what you wanted to do."

---

Bucky let out the strained breath he was holding. "Okay. Good. My god, I was worried it was thrown out. I don't know why I decided to tear the crib apart, but I want to keep the pieces now."

---

Steve wrapped his arms around Bucky's shoulders. "I couldn't throw it out. You were hurt and angry, Baby, that's why you broke it. Maybe we can build something nice out of it. Like a play table."

---

Bucky leaned into Steve and watched Christopher falling asleep. "Yeah, we can see what we have and see what can be done with it. Maybe a frame for his feet as well." He regretted breaking the crib but he also knew that he would never be able to put one of his other children in that one anyway. That crib was Grant's and he never even got to use it.

---

Steve laid his cheek on Bucky's shoulder and frowned. "I wish he was here, Bucky. He would have had so much fun living with us and playing with Christopher." Steve would've loved to watch the two of them sleep.

"I wish he was here, too," Bucky said quietly and reached up to touch Steve's hair. "I can see you falling asleep holding Grant while me and Christopher work on the best block tower ever. And we could have put Grant in hand-me-down clothes of Christopher's and have them share toys and stuff." He sighed and wiped at his eyes as they filled with tears.

"He was so tiny, Bucky. Imagine his little voice trying to get our attention. God, it would've been so perfect." Steve dried Bucky's eyes and kissed his forehead. "I'm so sorry he got taken away from us. From you."

"I love him so much," Bucky said softly and shook his head. "I know you do, too." He cleared his throat and nodded, trying to move on from the subject. "I have to go to AA tomorrow. I've missed two meetings now and I'm really feeling the temptation to drink so I have to go tomorrow. I just don't want to have to explain what happened to Missy to our group."

"Would you like me to go with you? At least for the part where you have to talk about that?" Steve offered. "I can ask my mom to babysit one more night before she goes back home. She's really helped us out a lot. We should take her for dinner or something when we are feeling better."

"Your mom deserves far more than just a thank you dinner. I'd give her a kidney if she needed it." Bucky smiled softly. "And let me think about it. I'm not sure if it would be the best idea for you to go. I'll let you know."

"Yeah, but she won't take more than that. Maybe if she needed remodeling on her house or something." Steve ushered Bucky out the door and held his hand tightly as they went back to the kitchen. "Whatever works for you."

"I can remodel her kitchen," Bucky offered. "I know she's complained about her cabinets lately. I can offer to do that for her. What do you think?" He took the iced tea from the fridge and poured a tall glass for himself and offered some to Steve.

Steve took the glass of iced tea and sat down at the table. "I think she'd like it but you would pretty much have to tell her that you're doing it instead of just offering it to her," he said.

"Okay, well then you make sure that's something she really wants and I'll make it happen," Bucky said and slipped his arms around Steve. "And, I don't want to nag, but did you eat at least something for breakfast?"
---
"I did have some toast," Steve said. "I'm going to be upset for a while... but I think laying Grant to rest really helped me heal a little. It'd be better if we could still hold him. But he deserves peace."
---
Bucky squeezed Steve's arm a little bit. "I understand. And I think we both need to just take our time to grieve. Although, am I allowed to be a little proud of myself for how I'm handling it this time around? I've kept it together. I've taken care of my family. I didn't break my sobriety. I didn't do anything rash."
---
Steve kissed Bucky's lips lightly. "I am very proud of you," he said. "You kept it together even when I couldn't. I didn't support you these past few days and I'm sorry. But I'm also proud you were able to stay strong."
---
Bucky leaned into the kiss, desperately wanting to keep that warm loving contact for as long as possible. "I have no room to comment or judge how you reacted to loss. You did so much better than I did when my parents died. You needed space and time to yourself and that's fine. I understand that need."
---
Raphael came up to them then and meowed loudly because he wanted to be fed. "Thank you for understanding, Love," Steve said. "I think I'm ready to let myself heal from this loss." He would still hurt for a long time, though. There was no way around that.
---
"After Christopher wakes up from his nap, we will go to the cemetery. How's that?" Bucky asked and let go of Steve to get food for the cat. It was Lilly's turn to feed him and she obviously forgot again.
---
Raphael brushed up against Bucky's legs as he poured food into his bowl. Bucky was probably his favorite after Becca. They both fed him well and generally let him be unless he wanted petting. Everyone else tried to play with him and he just wanted to sleep in the windowsills. "I like the sound of that," Steve said. "I think I'm going to end up visiting the cemetery daily for a little while."
---
"That's perfectly fine, Steve. Whatever you need to do is fine." Bucky came back and sat down at the table. "All I know is, this time, I'm not staying away from the cemetery for four years. I'm visiting my son and my parents. I'm not going to let Grant think I'm abandoning him."
---
Steve nodded. "I want him to know we love him just as much as Christopher even though we didn't "get to know him yet," he said. "Christmas, birthdays, all that. We'll be there for him."

"Yeah." Bucky nodded and looked away. He hated that he kept crying and he didn't want to start in on it again because then so would Steve and they would both be messes again. After all, he just got Steve out of Becca's room finally. "Uh, can I make you any small snack? Like half a sandwich or some cut up carrots?"

Steve's bottom lip quivered as he reminded himself of what they lost. He wanted desperately to have that little boy in their house. "Maybe some carrots," he said in resignation. "My stomach feels all twisted into knots."

Bucky got some carrots out and washed them for Steve. "Here, just eat one. If you can't manage more than that it's fine. Just at least eat one." He sighed and gently touched Steve's chest. "How do your lungs feel?"

"I've learned how to breathe when I'm awake and inactive so I won't cough," Steve said and took the carrot and nibbled at the end. "I haven't done much activity so I can't say for sure how they'll feel when I'm walking around."

"Okay," Bucky said and ate a carrot as well. "That's good, at least, that you aren't coughing when you're awake. Have you heard from the precinct yet? I know Fury called to give condolences for Grant but has anyone said anything about retirement yet?"

"They called but I didn't answer yet," Steve said guiltily. "I should probably go down tomorrow. It's... it's just I couldn't think of doing anything or functioning outside of Becca's room. I'm sure Fury will understand."

"I'm sure he will," Bucky agreed. "It's been a rough couple weeks for you. I'm guessing he won't mind waiting a bit." Lilly came slowly walking into the kitchen then. She grabbed a popsicle from the freezer then picked up Raphael who was trying to fall asleep by the kitchen sink.

When Lilly came into the kitchen, Steve nudged her. "Hey, you," he said. "You didn't feed your cat today. I'm sure you'd hate it if we forgot to feed you, so please be more mindful, alright?" Steve reminded patiently.

Lilly looked at him for a second like she was going to protest with something or other then she nodded solemnly and said, "Yeah, I'm sorry. I'll remember for next time." She held Raphael up to her face and said, "I'm sorry, little guy. I'll remember to take care of you better."

---

Steve knew that Lilly wasn't having a good day either, so he didn't scold her too much. He reached out and squeezed her shoulder. "Thank you," he said softly. The cat meowed at her and swished his tail back and forth a few times. "Would you like to come visit Grant with us when Christopher wakes from his nap?" he asked her.

---

Lilly looked between the two of them and bit her lip. "Do I have to? I kind of don't want to go to the cemetery for a while now. We've been too much lately. It hurts a lot."

"No, Lil, you don't have to go," Bucky said. "But you are welcome to if you change your mind."

---

Steve felt guilty for making her uncomfortable. He had only been looking to include her so she wouldn't feel left out. "I'm sorry you're hurting, too, Lilly," he said softly. "Is there anything I can do to make you feel better?"

---

Lilly shook her head and silently left the kitchen. Bucky watched her go and then took Steve's hand. "She's okay. This isn't quite the same on the girls as it is on us but it still hurts. And it reminds them of our parents."

---

Steve frowned as he watched her retreat. "I still feel bad for her... We weren't even supposed to get Grant. You didn't even want to have another kid so soon and I pushed."

---

"Baby, hey," Bucky said and leaned forward to bring Steve in for a soft kiss. "Don't think like that. Once we decided to take Missy's baby, I was on board and I was excited as all hell for a second child. And if it weren't for that decision, we probably wouldn't be in this house - my parents' old house. And I know the girls like being back here. We were all ready for Grant and excited to have him."

---

Steve returned the kiss lightly but his mind was distracted. He sighed softly and leaned into Bucky's side. "I guess we did gain a lot from our excitement for our little boy. He changed our lives for the better and we never even got to see him open his eyes."

---

Bucky couldn't help the sting in his eyes and the prickle through his nose. He buried his face in Steve's neck and held him close for a few moments. Christopher started screaming for attention then and Bucky hopped up to go get him, a headache already brewing behind his eyes as he pushed open the nursery door. "Christopher, it's okay," Bucky said and picked up the little boy. "Please stop crying." He bounced him up and down and rummaged in the top dresser drawer for a clean diaper.
"Your dad and pop are going to clean you up, Bean," Steve said to the baby. He took him from Bucky to lay him on the changing table and take his pajamas off while Bucky found a change of clothes.

"So much crying, Little Bean," Bucky said grumpily but still lovingly. "Come on, nothing to cry about. We're taking care of you, aren't we?" He huffed and wiped Christopher's face of tears. "Please stop crying."

Steve took the dirty diaper off and began to wipe up his mess. He kissed Christopher's face a few times once he was all cleaned and tidied. The baby slowly stopped crying when he didn't have a dirty diaper anymore. "There we go, Bean."

Bucky sighed and let Steve hold Christopher while they went back to their bedroom to get some medicine for his headache. "That kid can really scream," Bucky said as they headed back to the kitchen to get some water.

"Yeah. He's got a heck of a set of lungs. Maybe he'll become a singer. Not a classical one, but the kind that screams over loud guitar noises like that group that did 'Back in Black'." Steve chuckled.

"You mean AC/DC." Bucky nodded and then rested his head on his hands. "Steve..." he said cautiously and looked up at him. "We are good parents, right?" he asked and looked at Christopher. Sometimes he felt like he wasn't everything he could be for his son. Especially on days when Christopher was upset and Bucky couldn't handle him or his head hurt too badly.

"What? Of course, we are good parents," Steve answered with a frown. "Why wouldn't you think we are, Babe?" he asked. Christopher started to suck on his thumb and Steve gently bounced him in his arms. "You love your pop, right?"

Bucky smiled weakly at his son and reached out to touch the top of his head. "I love him too. I just feel like I could be so much better for him. You know? I could be so much better than I am now."

Christopher gurgled happily up at Bucky and smiled. "Bucky, you are the best parent he could ever ask for," Steve said. "I love how you are with him, Sweetheart. I admire all you do for him."

Bucky looked at Steve for a long moment and nodded his head in resignation. "Okay, I believe you. I just sometimes feel like you are naturally better at this. I had to learn how to parent quickly but you
"sort of just knew how."

---

"What? You're kidding me. I learned from you. I saw how you took care of your sisters and copied that," Steve said. Bucky had definitely been doing this longer than him and he was very good at it, despite what Bucky thought about himself. "You're a better parent than you think."

---

"Hey," Bucky said softly and pulled Steve in for a kiss. "I love you. Thank you. Sorry for being irrational about it. You know how I get." He sighed and pet Steve's hair. "Are you ready to go to the cemetery? You still want to go?"

---

Steve took a deep breath and then nodded his head. "Yeah... I'll get his coat on." Steve dressed Christopher in warmer clothes and then met up with Bucky in the kitchen. "Alright, I'm ready to go."

---

Bucky and Steve made their way to the cemetery with Christopher babbling about nothing in particular. Once they got there, Bucky had to take another moment at the gate before deciding in to go. Lilly was right, they had been at the cemetery a lot lately.

---

Steve's breath caught in his throat when he saw the little mound of dirt where his son was buried. He slowly sunk to his knees and held Christopher close as he kneeled in front of the earth. "Hey there, baby boy. We miss you already..."

---

Bucky sat down next to Steve and took his hand. He was quiet for a bit, just letting Steve have a moment to talk to his son. "We brought your big brother. He may not understand yet but he will. And he will always love you too."

---

Steve gave Bucky's hand a tight squeeze and leaned his head on his shoulder. "Grant is here, Bean. You never got to meet him, but he's your baby brother," Steve said sweetly to Christopher. "You want to talk to your brother?" he asked, pointing at the mound.

---

Christopher didn't understand but he reached towards the ground with grabby hands. He probably wanted to get his hands in the dirt. "Christopher, can you say 'Grant'?' Bucky asked and repeated himself slowly.

---

Christopher looked up at Bucky because he was using that voice that signified that he wanted something from him. The baby squinted his eyes for a moment and then declared happily, "Papa!"

Steve shook his head with a smile. "I guess it's a little too early for that."
"Well, at least he knows us." Bucky shrugged and kissed the top of Christopher's head. He looked down at the mound of dirt and then over at his parents’ graves. His son had only been buried the morning before and Missy was being buried the next day. "Steve, are you going with me to Missy's funeral?"

Steve stared in silence for a while. "I'm mad at her," he admitted. "I'm so angry she didn't let us help her." He wiped at his eyes. "But... I'll go. I have to forgive her. And I have to let her know she is still loved by us."

Bucky squeezed Steve's hand and rested his head on his shoulder. "Baby, if you don't want to go, you don't have to. I'm not going to be angry or anything. I understand. I just thought I would ask so I knew where you were at with it. But, seriously, you don't have to go."

Steve shook his head. "I want to be there to support you. And I don't want to hold a grudge against someone who needed help. No matter how hurt I am by her decisions," he said.

There was a cool breeze circling around them and Bucky wished they could get picked up and carried away by it for just a little while. "Okay, well it's tomorrow at noon. Barbara called me with the church address. And she will be buried in her aunt's family plot a few neighborhoods over."

Steve nodded and looked sadly down at the grave. Christopher started grabbing fistfuls of dirt and Steve had to pull him back to stop it. "Alright. I'll give the precinct a call in the morning and head over after her funeral."

"I hope you get good news, Steve," Bucky said and tried to smile. Of course, it wouldn't erase what happened to him and it wouldn't fix his lungs or make it possible to be an active officer again. But maybe he could get a good retirement package and be able to help support his family with Bucky being the only one with an income. They also had the settlement money that was still coming in and would be for a long time.

"I hope so, too," Steve said. "I'll work an easy job if I have to. But it'd be good if I got to stay at home with our son. Now, more than ever, I truly appreciate the blessing he is for us."

Bucky got Steve's attention and stared into his eyes. "Steve, don't get another job. Just stay at home with our boy. Do what you wanted to do this whole time and be a house husband." He grinned and looked around them a second before giving him a kiss. "If we really need more money, I'll work more or get a second job."
Steve felt guilty making Bucky work extra hours to make up for his lack of a job. But it really would be amazing to be able to stay home and raise their kids. "Alright," he said. Steve rocked Christopher in his arms and said a few prayers for Grant before deciding they should probably head back.

Bucky said goodbye to his parents and his son and then followed Steve back out through the cemetery. Christopher whined a bit to be put down so Bucky let him walk down the sidewalk a ways while holding on to his hand tightly. When they got to an intersection, Bucky was quick to pick him up again before he decided he wanted to cross it.

Steve smiled as he watched Bucky lead their son down the street. "You two look so cute," Steve said. "I can't believe how good he is at walking. I want him to stay little forever."

"But if he stays little then if we have other babies, he will be their very tiny big brother," Bucky reasoned and nuzzled his nose on Christopher's cheek. "You don't want to be a tiny older brother, do you? You want to be a big strong older brother who protects his siblings just like me."

Christopher blabbered excitedly at Bucky in response. "You'll be a good big brother, right? If God lets us have more kids, you're going to give Bucky a run for his money for brother-of-the-year," Steve said.

"Do your worst, Little Bean," Bucky said excitedly then toned down to look over at Steve with an intent expression. "So... are you saying we can have more kids? That's okay with you again?" He had been so worried that Steve was never going to even consider it again.

Steve ducked his head a little and said, "I need a sign from God first. I want kids, but I need to make sure that God’s plan isn't for us to only have one." Christopher saw the sweets shop and started to tug on Bucky's hand to go over to it.

"No, Bean. You can have strawberries or something when we get home," Bucky said and lifted him up so he couldn't escape Bucky's grasp. "What would a sign from God look like, Steve?" He wanted to know what it was he should be looking for to know if Steve was going to want more kids or not.

Christopher whined. When Bucky didn't head over, he looked to Steve. "Dada?"

Steve ruffled his hair. "Sorry, Christopher. No sweets today." He changed his focus to Bucky and shrugged his shoulders. "Well, it's hard to describe. It could be anything, really."
Bucky sighed. Steve was giving him nothing to work with. "Okay, just let me know if you see the sign you need. Because I'm sure as hell not going to know what it is."

---

"Maybe God will be giving you a sign," Steve said with a playful smile. "He wants to make a believer out of you even though I know better than to bother you about it."

---

"But if I don't know what I'm looking for then how will I know it's him and not just coincidence or something?" Bucky asked back with a soft smile that showed he wasn't trying to be belligerent. He really did believe in what God meant to Steve. He just wasn't sure about whether the big guy was for real or not.

---

Steve smiled. "You'll know," he said. "God finds a way for you to know something for sure. You know that gut feeling you get that you can't explain? It's kind of like that."

---

Bucky sighed, "Steve, my gut feelings always mean something bad is about to happen. I don't really want another one of those feelings for a long while if I can avoid it." They got back to the house and Sarah was getting all her things ready to go back to her own place.

---

"Maybe that's just God getting on you for not going to church," Steve teased as he walked over to his mom so he could give her a big hug. "Thank you so much, Ma. I don’t know what I’d do without you."

---

Bucky quietly and gently joined the hug so Sarah was sandwiched between them with Christopher clinging to Bucky's shirt and whining about being squashed. "Thank you, Sarah. We really needed you this week. All of us did."

---

Sarah smiled and gave Steve and Bucky both a kiss on the cheek before parting so Christopher wouldn't throw a fit. "You know I love you and your sisters. And I'm sort of stuck with this one," she said as she nudged Steve.

---

"Me too," Bucky said with fake annoyance and then gave Steve a smile. "But, honestly, we really appreciate you being here for us. And please know that we are all here for you if you need anything as well."

---

"Of course," Sarah said. She gave her grandson a kiss and said goodbye to them all and then left to head back to her own house.

"She's a saint, I swear," Steve said with a happy little grin. He loved his mother so much.
Bucky locked the door behind her and let out a sad little sigh. "Yeah, she is. It was really helpful having her around. And she's just good to be around too. I know the girls love being with her. She's a good influence on them.'

"She's so happy to have you guys as part of her family. Ever since I moved out, I've always worried that she was lonesome. Even though she insisted I go and start my own life," Steve said.

"Do you think you and her would be happier if she lived with us?" Bucky asked and set Christopher back down so he could run around. He immediately found Raphael and started to grab at his tail. "We could probably turn part of the living room into a guest room and make it work."

Steve considered it. "You know, she might. And, I haven't told her, but I really do worry about her living alone. It's not that she can't get around, but this place isn't exactly free of crime," Steve said.

"Then let's think it over and see how we could make it work to have her here. Then we can talk to the girls and make sure that's fine with them. And then we can bring it up to your mom and see if she even wants to live here," Bucky said.

"I think that's a good plan," Steve agreed. "I'm such a mama's boy, Buck. I love the thought of living with my mom again," he said. "We are going to bicker over who gets to cook, though."

"I know you're a mama's boy, Steve." Bucky grinned. "You don't hide it very well." He took Steve's hand and pulled him towards the living room. "Come on. Let's just curl up on the couch for a bit." After Raphael ran off, Christopher decided he wanted to sit next to his toy box and pull out each toy one by one and then set them on the ground in front of him like a toy army.

Steve cuddled up next to Bucky on the couch and reached his arm over to massage his back. "Look at him," Steve said softly. "He's such an adorable boy. I wonder what he's thinking about doing with them."

"I really don't know," Bucky said and leaned into Steve. He watched Christopher pick up one of the toys and hold it out in front of him for a second. Then he bit it and then returned it to the box. "Clearly, that one didn't make the cut."

Steve snickered. "Not tasty enough. Maybe he's still holding a grudge that mean old Papa didn't let him get all the sweets he wanted," Steve suggested. "Poor baby."
"He doesn't need them," Bucky said sternly. "He was perfectly fine with having fruit as sweets until his daddy let him taste some chocolate. And then his aunts gave him gummy bears and pudding."

Steve smiled guiltily at Bucky. "But he looks so happy when he has junk food. What's the point of being a kid if you don't have unhealthy stuff every now and again?" he defended lightly.

Bucky glanced at Steve and huffed. "I just wanted to push it off until he discovered it himself. Then I wouldn't be able to blame you and the girls for his sweet tooth." Christopher seemed to know he was being discussed. He picked up one of his toys, a small plastic dinosaur, and brought it over to the couch to hand it to Bucky.

"Well, I made the executive decision to let him enjoy life a little earlier." Steve stole the dinosaur before Bucky could get it. "My dinosaur," Steve said playfully.

Christopher shook his finger at his dad. "No, Dada, no," he scolded Steve.

"Steve, that's my dinosaur," Bucky said in exasperation and took it back. Christopher gripped the edge of the couch and tried his best to lift himself up on to it but he couldn't make it. Bucky reached down and brought him up so he could cuddle down with a content little sigh.

Steve watched as Christopher climbed into Bucky's lap. "He sure loves his papa today," Steve said with a smile. He tangled his fingers lightly into Bucky's hair. "And to think I thought I was his favorite."

"You're still his favorite, Baby," Bucky said and glanced over at Steve. "He's just thinking that if he is all sweet to me then I'll give him candy or something else in exchange." He looked back down at his little boy and said, "But that's not going to happen, is it, Bean?"

"He knows how to butter us up already. All it takes are those cute eyes and he's got us wrapped around his little finger," Steve said with a gentle laugh.

Christopher signed 'treat' a few times. "Papa," he huffed.

"Not me," Bucky corrected. "I'm a rock. Look at this kid. He's fucking adorable but he can't have sugar right now. Now, if he wants some fruit, he may have that." Bucky signed 'fruit' and Christopher whined in response.
Steve's heart melted and he pouted a little when Christopher whined. "Hey, Bean, it's okay. You can have sweets tomorrow, okay?" Steve looked at Bucky. "I don’t know how you can say ‘no’ to that face."

---

Bucky kissed the side of Steve's head and smiled. "Steve, you'll have to learn how to. I know it's hard but he can't always have what he wants. You're good at telling Lilly ‘no’ when she wants something unreasonable. Just apply that to Christopher."

---

"But Christopher is my perfect, little baby boy and Lilly is a big mean teenager," Steve joked. He kissed Bucky back and kept his eyes focused on his husband while Christopher called him and begged for sweets.

---

Bucky gently put his hand over Christopher's mouth for a second and said, "No, Sweet Boy." He sighed and snuggled his son close. "How about we do something fun. Maybe do some art or something?" He looked to Steve for help. "What do you want to do?"

---

"I don’t know if I'm in the mood to draw," Steve answered and looked away. Anything he made would be about Grant and he didn't feel like bringing those feelings up. "How about we get the girls and play a board game?"

---

"We could but Christopher can't play board games," Bucky said and looked down at his son who was flopped over in his arms and sucking on his fingers. "You guys can play and I'll just get him some crayons and paper."

---

"We could build a play fort and watch a movie. We can pull the couch cushions and drape a blanket over it," Steve suggested. "That way Christopher can join in."

---

"Yeah, let's do that." Bucky smiled. "I'll get the girls and make some snacks while you all get the fort set up." He handed Christopher off to Steve and got the girls to come downstairs with the promise of popcorn and movies and soda.

---

Steve sang to Christopher and danced around the living room with him while he pulled the cushions off the couch. The baby blabbered happily even though he wasn't keeping the tune very well. "Can we get ice cream?" Lilly asked Bucky.

---

"We don't have ice cream here, Lil," Bucky said and started pulling snacks from the cabinet. "But I guess we could go down to the ice cream place real quick and get some. Go ask Steve if he wants to
"Who has teenagers but no ice cream?" Lilly asked. "Steve! We're getting ice cream, you want to go?" she shouted. Christopher squealed loudly in response followed by Steve saying that he would stay in.

Lilly came back into the kitchen holding Christopher who was bouncing excitedly in her arms. Becca followed after them and said, "Hey, pick me up some ice cream, too."

"No, if you want ice cream you have to go with us," Bucky said to her and went back to find Steve who was adjusting the pillow fort. "Hey, you don't want to come with us? I'm betting if you get Christopher a little bit of something sweet, you'll be his favorite again."

Steve considered it and then dusted himself off. "Alright. I'll go," he said. "Only because I want to make my boy love me more." He grabbed his jacket to put it on again. "So what happened to no more sweets for Christopher?" he teased.

Bucky sighed and put on his shoes before getting Christopher's coat. "Well, if he sees Lilly and Becca with ice cream then he is going to be angry as all hell if he doesn't get something too. And I'm really tired and don't want to deal with the crying and the screaming."

"You hear that, Bean? You finally wore your old man down," Steve said. Christopher smiled happily at his dads. "I'll only give him a little bit," Steve promised.

"Let's see if they have sherbet there or something because I'm still pretty sure he is lactose intolerant," Bucky said and herded the girls out the door. He stopped Steve so he could adjust Christopher's hat. When they got to the ice cream shop, Christopher immediately understood what was happening. He started to screech and tried to get down out of Steve's arms.

Steve laughed and got a better hold on their son. "Whoa, calm down, Bean. We have to behave-" Steve started but Christopher was in no mood to stop trying to get out of Steve's arms. "Christopher," he said in his stern voice.

Christopher stopped wiggling and stared up at his daddy. He looked like he was going to cry but then he just stuck his lower lip out and waited. Bucky huffed and took his son. "Steve, you go get him something and I'll go sit with him so he knows he can't act like this."

Steve felt bad for making his son almost cry, so he was quick to kiss his cheek. "Be a good boy, Christopher," he said gently. "I love you, okay?" he said it for Christopher but the look he gave Bucky told him that he was talking to him as well.

---

Bucky sat back in a quiet corner of the shop and held Christopher to him. He bounced him lightly and tried to get him to smile but he was not having it. "Come on, Bean," Bucky said softly. "Daddy just doesn't want you to get hurt or anything. If you fell, you could have really injured yourself and then Daddy and I would have been so scared and upset and worried. You don't want that, right?"

---

After they all got their ice cream, Steve walked back and Christopher started squirming when he saw that they all had ice cream. "Dadadada!" he shouted, making grabby hands for it.

Steve shook his head at his son. "Christopher, you need to be calm."

---

Christopher looked confused and tried again to reach for the treat. "Love," Bucky said tiredly and turned him around to face him. "Christopher, Sweet Boy, you need to calm down. Calm. I'm going to give you to Daddy. Please just be still so he can help you eat your snack."

---

Steve picked up Christopher and the baby knocked the ice cream right out of Steve's hands. He had just been trying to grab it before Steve had finished adjusting him in his arms. Christopher stared at the ice cream on the floor for a moment before starting to bawl.

---

Bucky groaned and picked it up off the floor. "Jesus Christ," he said softly and started cleaning up the mess. Becca handed her ice cream to Lilly to hold so she could go to the counter to get another one for Christopher.

---

"Becca, wait," Steve said. He gave the worker an apologetic look for the noise. "He was impatient and rude, so he shouldn't get another tonight. He can have a snack from home if he wants something later."

---

Becca sat back down and said, "Are you sure? He's just going to keep crying about it." Bucky tossed the napkins and the mess into the trash and signaled that he was going to go clean his hands in the bathroom really quick.

---

Steve nodded. "I'll take him outside so you can eat in peace," he said. "Stay put until Bucky comes back." Steve walked out with his crying son and tried to pacify him.

---

Bucky came back and found Steve and his son were gone. The employee behind the counter was staring at him and he looked away quickly. "Where did Steve go?" he asked Becca and handed Lilly a napkin to wipe her face.

---

"He's outside with the crying machine," Lilly said, pointing at the window where Bucky would be able to see his boy still wailing at Steve and knocking his fists against his arms. "Babies can suck sometimes."

---

"Hey, no complaining," Bucky said pointedly. "I brought you for ice cream, didn't I? And you were much worse as a baby than Christopher is. I can guarantee that." He pulled his hair back in a ponytail and told the girls not to talk to strangers while he went out to Steve for a bit.

---

Steve had managed to get Christopher's screaming to a manageable whining with crocodile tears still streaming down his face. "I know he doesn't fully understand," Steve said to Bucky. "But I don't want to let him think that was okay."

---

"I understand," Bucky said and offered to take the baby from Steve. "I think he's at that age where he is finally aware of himself enough to be selfish. It won't last forever though and he will learn how to be a good kid."

---

Steve waved him off and kept Christopher in his arms. "If he calms down, should we get him another?" Steve was already backtracking on his decision to not give him any more because he had been fresh.

---

"That's up to you, Steve," Bucky said with a sigh and kissed Christopher's cheek. "My head hurts too much to decide and I just kind of want to give him whatever he wants so he doesn't cry again. So you should make that call."

---

Steve exhaled slowly and looked at Christopher. "You stressed your pop out, Bean," Steve admonished lightly. He bounced him in his arms and then told Bucky he'd be right back. "You got to behave yourself this time, Kiddo."

---

Bucky sat down on the curb and waited for his family. He patted his pockets, looking for his pack of cigarettes. He knew he really needed to stop smoking - especially now with Steve's lungs. But he felt so awful and he figured one was okay.

---

The group of them came out a few minutes later and Steve was feeding a happy Christopher some ice cream. "Bucky," Becca scolded when she saw him with a cigarette. "Come on."
Bucky took one last drag and put it out. "I was just waiting for you guys. It was just one," he said and flicked it into the trashcan by the door. "Is he happier now?" Bucky asked Steve and looked to Christopher who was making little noises every time another spoonful was headed towards his mouth.

---

"So? Steve's lungs are shit," Becca said, interrupting Steve’s chance to answer Bucky before she could get in some more reprimanding.

Steve nudged her lightly. "Don't curse in front of the baby, Bees."

---

Bucky tensed up and looked over at Becca. "I get that. I know. And I never smoke around any of you and I never have. And I've cut back since Steve's had his... accident. But I also haven't had any alcohol for," Bucky took out his chip and showed it to her, "five months! And I just sometimes need something."

---

Becca looked like she had a smart comment to say but Steve gave her a look that silently told her to shut it. "I'm proud of you, Bucky," Steve said instead. "You're doing an amazing job with this. And if the occasional cigarette keeps you from drinking then I can't complain."

---

Bucky was grumpy the rest of the way home but he softened once he saw the pillow fort they had abandoned earlier in favor of ice cream. All he wanted to do was to curl up with his family and watch something shitty on TV. "Here, Steve, I'll go give Christopher a quick bath while you all decide what to watch."

---

Steve gave Bucky a slow kiss as he passed their son over. "I love you, Sweetheart," he said. "You be good for your papa," Steve added to Christopher. He gave his boy a kiss too and started to look for a movie.

---

Christopher was pretty amped up from having a treat so he was extra messy in his bath. Bucky ended up just taking off his own shirt while he bathed him because he kept splashing him so much that he was drenched anyway. The good thing was, this time, at least Christopher didn't get soap in his eyes. That happened more than it should and it always made bath time worse.

---

After much debate and bartering, Becca decided that they would watch Sleeping Beauty with the promise to Lilly that she would get to pick the next two movies they watched some other time. Steve went up to the bathroom to check what was taking Bucky so long. "How's our little bean doing?"

---

"He's really energetic at the moment and I can't get him to calm down for me to finish washing his hair," Bucky said and slumped on the edge of the tub. "You want to give it a try?" he asked and handed the shampoo to Steve.

"Sure." Steve walked over and knelt by the side of the tub so he could hold Christopher steady. He carefully put the shampoo in his hair, only using a little drop so there wouldn't be too much to clean up. "There we go, Little Bean. You're being such a good-" Christopher started squealing happily and splashing everywhere.

"What'd I tell you?" Bucky said with a huff and toweled off Steve's arms and his face. "This is partially why I didn't want him to have any sugar." He gently held Christopher's hands together in his and cooed at him so he wouldn't think something was wrong. "Alright, try now."

"But it makes him happy. He gets so excited for treats," Steve complained. While Bucky had their son's hands busy, Steve quickly washed the shampoo from his hair. "There we go, Love."

"See? Isn't that better?" Bucky asked his son and hoisted him up out of the bath and into the towel Steve had waiting. "Now, maybe you will start to calm down a little bit so we can have a nice easy family movie night."

Steve swaddled Christopher in the towel and kissed his face plenty of times as he went to get him changed in the nursery. Christopher was brought downstairs in his lion pajamas and Steve let him crawl to the fort all by himself.

"Can we start the movie now?" Lilly complained and peaked out from under a mass of blankets. Bucky sat down and scooted Lilly over so Steve could come cuddle up next to him. "You weren't waiting that long. We're here now."

Steve snuggled up with his husband and watched fondly as Christopher made himself comfy by sprawling himself across Lilly's lap. "Why do you like Sleeping Beauty so much, anyway?" Steve asked Becca.

Becca shrugged and put a baby blanket over Christopher. "I don't know. Maybe the animals. They are all pretty cute. I love animals." She didn't even seem too convinced by her answer but that's all she had.

"Beh," Christopher huffed as he shook the blanket off. Steve snorted at the attitude Christopher was giving everyone. "It's a good thing you love animals when you have Lilly as a sister," he joked.
"And Christopher as a nephew," Becca countered with a dry smile. She had taken to being so much gerrier lately to her brother and Steve than she had been. With Steve's new physical ailment and the loss of their son, there was too much going on with them for her to pile on the petty things.

Steve gasped dramatically. "Our son is a perfect human being," he said in a faux scandalized tone.
"You hear that, Bean? Your aunt is slanderung your name."

"Telling it like it is," Becca confirmed with a shrug and pulled a blanket tightly around her shoulders.

They watched the movie together mostly in peace. Lilly fell asleep about half-way through with Christopher still laying on her lap. It took him a bit longer than usual but, eventually, he fell asleep as well. When the movie ended, Bucky shuffled the girls off to bed and then headed for the master bedroom while Steve got Christopher in his crib.

Steve settled their little boy down for sleep before joining Bucky in the bedroom. He wrapped his arms around his husband and kissed his cheek. "Hello, Sweetheart," he said. "How are you feeling?"

"I'm okay. My headache is gone." Bucky cuddled close to Steve and gave him a kiss. "It was a bit of a day, wasn't it? How are you? Anything you need?" He finished up by giving Steve another kiss and holding his hands firmly on Steve's hips.

Steve leaned into Bucky's side. "I need to fall asleep with my husband and feel like everything is okay." Taking care of the girls and their son kept his mind busy, but once left alone, the depressive thoughts threatened to kick back in.

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve closer. "I'm right here, my handsome man. And I love you so much." He kissed a soft trail across Steve's face and then came back to his lips. "Can we cuddle and fall asleep naked?"

Steve nodded and slowly started to unbutton Bucky's pants. "That's fine with me," he said. "I like it when we fall asleep like that. Makes me feel really connected to you."

"Good. Me too. I love just being you and me with nothing between us." Bucky slowly slipped his shirt off and tossed it towards the closet then started to gently tug at Steve's pants. "I love you so much, Steve," he said and leaned in to give him another kiss as Steve took off his pants for him.
Once they were both naked, Bucky gently trailed his fingers across Steve's chest to rest on his heart.
Bucky's new tattoo was still red and burning but he couldn't help but look down at it every couple of seconds.

---

Steve laid down and looked into Bucky's eyes. He saw him looking down at the tattoo and his heart clenched uncomfortably. "He should be here right now," Steve mumbled. "Waking us up every few hours and pissing off the girls."

---

Bucky put a gentle hand on Steve's neck and looked at him lovingly. "I know. Then he would get Christopher up too and we would have to bring them in here with us to fall asleep. Christopher laying on my chest and Grant squirming all over the place."

---

"I want him back so bad. He fit so perfectly in our arms. We probably could have fit him in a stocking for Christmas and taken the most adorable pictures," Steve said. He took a few deep breaths and looked away from Bucky for a few moments. "How long is this going to hurt, Bucky?"

---

"Steve, Baby, this could hurt for a while," Bucky said softly and wiped a tear from Steve's face. "And then it'll stop hurting all the time and only hurt a little each day. Then it'll stop hurting daily and only hurt so often. Then it'll only hurt when we think about it too much."

---

Steve frowned and buried the side of his face deeper into the pillow. "I don't want to hurt but I also don't want to ever forget him," he said. "He deserves better than that."

---

"You'll never forget that precious little boy," Bucky promised Steve with a gentle smile. "I never forget my parents. I think about them everyday. But nowadays it doesn't always hurt. It'll stop hurting all the time, Steve. I promise you that."

---

"He really was precious. I was afraid I couldn't love another kid like I love Christopher but he proved me wrong," Steve said. "I don't want to sleep tonight. I'm afraid of getting nightmares."

---

"I don't really want to sleep either," Bucky admitted and kissed Steve. "We can just stay up for awhile if you want. Find something to do. And, honestly, if you don't want to go to Missy's funeral tomorrow, you don't have to."

---

"I want to be there for you, Baby," Steve said earnestly. "And she doesn't deserve to be alone when she's laid to rest. She deserves her friends and as much of her family there as possible."

---

"I have a feeling it may end up being us, her aunt, and maybe a couple other people," Bucky said.
"I'll be surprised if her parents show up." He shook his head to get the thought out. He was angry with them for the way they treated her when she needed them. He hoped they weren’t there tomorrow because he didn’t think they deserved her. But he also hoped they were there so he could give them a piece of his mind. "Anyway, are we going to sleep or staying up?"

---

"I'm going to try staying up," Steve said. "I hate sleeping now. I haven't gotten a good night's sleep since the fire." It was true. Steve slept for short amounts of time and infrequently and it had just been worse since losing their son. He was severely sleep-deprived and malnourished.
Missy's funeral was small just like Bucky thought it was going to be. Her parents were not there. Bucky thought it was only going to be him and Steve and Barbara until some of Missy's friends showed up and then so did a couple people from their AA group.

---

Steve dressed in his suit for the second time and stood close by Bucky's side. There wasn't as much of a service as there had been for Grant, but a priest still prayed for her soul to be delivered to heaven. After she was lowered into the ground, he looked to Bucky. "Do you want some time to talk with them?" he asked as he nodded to Missy's friends from AA.

---

"No, I'll see them Thursday," Bucky said and stared down at the grave. "I don't want to be here anymore." He had tried to stop himself from crying during the service but it just didn't work. "Let's go. You're going to the precinct, right?"

---

Steve hugged Bucky tightly and snuck in a quick kiss to his cheek. "I'm so sorry, Buck," he said softly. He pulled back and herded him out of the cemetery. "Yeah. Fury will be pissed if I don't show up today."

---

"Okay, I'll head back home unless you need me there with you," Bucky said and stuffed his hands in his pockets as they trudged down the street. "Although, Becca is in charge of both Lilly and Christopher this whole time. I'm thinking she will want me to relieve her soon."

---

"It's okay. I'd rather go on my own. They like you there, but they may be wary of my husband when they're telling me how much they're going to be able to give me," Steve said. "I love you, Bucky. I'll see you later."

---

“Love you, too.” Bucky nodded and touched his shoulder gently before heading home. He hoped Steve would get good news but he wasn't going to get himself too worked up only to be disappointed.

---

In the end, Steve was let go without having to worry about their finances too much yet. He was retired on disability with his health benefits still intact and a large chunk of his pay disbursed to him. He wasn't allowed to work elsewhere for a year, but that wasn't an issue to Steve. What hurt the most was being asked to turn in his badge and uniform and clean out his desk.

---

As Steve was clearing out his things, Natasha and Sam came over and stood close to him but not close enough that it seemed like they were being intrusive. "Hey, Steve," Natasha said somberly and watched him stack up his papers to shred.

---

Steve looked up from his box of files and gave her a tight smile. "Hey," he said. "I was just, uh... taking care of my things. Looks like you won't be seeing much of me around here anymore."

---

"I see you all the time outside of here, though," Natasha said with a smile. "You know how Clint and Bucky can't be apart for too long. More than a day of not working together makes them antsy."

"And I just wanted to say how great it's been working with you, Steve, even if it was for a short amount of time," Sam said with a genuine smile. They had gotten really close in the short amount of time they had been partners.

---

Steve's lower lip trembled in response. He loved being a cop so fucking much and he hated having it being taken from him. He met so many people here and they all would throw themselves in front of a bullet for each other. He hugged Sam tightly and then let go. "Bucky wants you all over for dinner sometime," he said for lack of anything better to say. He was too upset to come up with a decent conversation.

---

"Sure," Sam said with a grin and looked to Natasha. "I don't have much going on at the moment and I'd love to meet your family."

Natasha nodded, "Clint and I will bring you with us next time we go over there, Sam. Clint keeps forcing me to hold their son so I'll get used to the idea of children but I keep telling him 'no'."

---

Steve turned to Natasha and said, "I've already told Bucky to tell Clint that there's no way in hell you're having a kid. The closest he's getting to a son is Christopher."

---

"Don't tell him that because then he will never leave your house," Natasha said. "You'll need to build him his own room or squeeze him into bed with you and Bucky."

---

"We need a bit of liveliness in our house right now anyway. He's welcome," Steve said. "It's been really rough, Nat. You have no idea. Yesterday was the first day I had an actual meal," he admitted. "My mom had to take care of us."

---

"I'm really sorry about your son," Sam said and shook his head. He knew that he was stillborn but he didn't know what exactly had happened. But he understood the pain of loss. He had experienced loss before and he knew what they must have been going through. "I'm here if you ever want to talk."
Steve let out a heavy sigh. "Grant was perfect," he said thickly. "It's going to be hard getting past this... but thank you for your condolences." Steve put together the rest of his files. "I think... I think I'm going to shred these now. I don't have much left to pack up."

---

Natasha and Sam both gave Steve hugs goodbye and let him go about his business. They didn't understand everything he was feeling but they could imagine how hard all of this negative change was on him all at once.

---

Steve carried his belongings home in a little box - pictures from his first day on the job, a few awards for good service, copies of the paper from his first arrest. He arrived home with a heavy heart and went right to their bedroom to hide his things in the back of the closet.

---

Bucky and Christopher were folding laundry. Christopher's job was to toss the laundry around and make Bucky go pick it up. Steve didn't come to them when he came home and Bucky figured he needed his alone time so he would just give him a few more minutes then go find him.

---

Steve came downstairs a few minutes later and took a seat next to Bucky on the couch. Christopher gurgled happily at his dad and threw a sock in his direction. "Hey," Steve said. "Good news is we don't have to worry about our finances."

---

Bucky leaned over and kissed Steve's cheek. "Bad news is that you're no longer a police officer," he said sadly and put one of Christopher's shirts on top of his little head. "How are you feeling? What did Fury say?"

---

Christopher pulled the shirt off and giggled up at his pop. Then he tossed the shirt on the ground. "I kind of feel empty," Steve said. "That place meant so much to me," he mumbled. "I'm on seventy-five percent and disability, which means they pay me seventy-five percent of what I made working there until social security kicks in when I'm retiring age."

---

Bucky sighed and pulled Steve in for a hug. "I'm so sorry, Baby. I know you loved being a cop." He kissed him once then reached to pick up Christopher. "But, now, you can do what you were wanting to eventually do. You can stay home with this precious little boy. And look how happy he is to see you."

---

Steve sighed and looked down at his son who was waving a single sock up at him. He managed a smile and pulled the little baby up and cuddled him. "Hey, Bean. You having a fun time making a mess of the clothes?"
"Tell your daddy how many times I've had to take his underwear off your head or how many times I've folded Lilly's soccer jersey because you tossed it as far as you could," Bucky said to Christopher with an amused albeit slightly tired smile.

---

"I bet that was a lot of times. Are you going to be a good baseball player, Bean? Because of all this throwing you're doing?" Steve kissed his nose and tickled his feet. "Need any help folding, Bucky?" he asked.

---

"No, I'll finish up if you can just keep him occupied for a bit," Bucky said and continued folding. "Steve, Baby, I'm so sorry you had to leave today. Did you have to turn in your badge and gun today too?"

---

Steve let out a heavy sigh and nodded his head. "I'm a civilian now and that means I can't have police-issued property. They're going to send me a retiree badge but I can't have my active duty one."

---

Bucky bit his lip nervously. He knew Steve didn't feel comfortable without having his gun nearby. He wondered if he could just get his own personal firearm to keep in the safe. It had taken Bucky a while to get used to having a gun in the house but now it would take Steve a while to get used to not having one.

---

"What are you thinking?" Steve asked as he held Christopher upside down by his feet, causing the baby to let out big belly laughs that made Steve chuckle with him.

---

Bucky looked over at the two of them and smiled softly. "Just thinking about you. Thinking about how you must feel right now. Trying to figure out how I can help but knowing I probably can't. Wishing I could fix this and make your lungs all better."

---

"I feel pretty terrible about it," Steve said. "But it could be a blessing in disguise, as much as I'm not enjoying it right now," he admitted. "You don't got to worry about me."

---

"I'll still worry about you," Bucky said and reached out to touch Steve's face. "I'm your husband and I love you. It's part of my job to worry. But, I think, eventually, this pain will go away, too. And you'll feel better. Not today, but sometime."

---

Steve leaned into Bucky's hand and gave a nod. "If you say so," he sighed. Steve held Christopher the right way again and kissed his cheek. "What've you been up to besides laundry?"
"Just waiting around for you," Bucky said and stood up to go put the laundry away. "We had a snack earlier and then sat around for a bit then did the laundry. Christopher was angry that I ran out of oranges to give him so he threw a small fit for a couple minutes."

"I'll pick some up first thing tomorrow," Steve said. Christopher was a real fiend with his snacks sometimes. "I'm not allowed to work for a year for legal reasons," Steve added as he remembered that condition. "So I can't run that art group until next year."

"What?" Bucky asked, confused. "You can't work for a year? Why is that a rule? You didn't do anything wrong. You got hurt on the job. That's not right. What if you lived by yourself? How do they expect you to sustain yourself for a full year?"

"It's because they don't want me aggravating my lungs," Steve said. "They expect that I would be able to get by on what I'm getting paid which is seventy-five percent of what I would normally get. And that's a decent wage, Buck," he said.

Bucky nodded and took Steve's hand. "It just doesn't sound fair. I get for liability or whatever that they can't have you hurting yourself more but... I don't know. It just seems really unreasonable to make you wait an entire year."

"It's how long the doctors recommended. They say if I don't injure myself further in a year, my lungs won't degenerate any more than a normal person's would," Steve explained.

Bucky took a shallow little breath and squeezed Steve's hand. "Do you know how often you need to go in to see the doctors about it?" All he wanted to do was pull Steve close and hold him and kiss him and make him feel loved and safe. But Steve didn't seem like he really wanted to be touched too much.

"Once every other week," Steve declared with a little grimace. He hated going to the doctor's and he hated feeling like he was fragile. "And if I don't go, I risk my pension." It wasn't Fury's rules, so it wasn't like he was trying to dick him over.

"I'll go with you every time, if you want. But I'll also not go at all if that's better for you," Bucky said and gestured for Steve to follow him to their room so he could put their clothes away.

Steve held Christopher close and followed Bucky upstairs. "It's okay. I'd rather not bother you with
"I'd love to go for a run," Steve said bitterly. "Or work out." He hadn't done that in what felt like forever. "Can you give me a massage after I lay Christopher down?" The baby babbled at Steve when he heard his name. "I feel wound up."

"Yes, of course, I'll give you a massage," Bucky promised. "And if you wanted to do less strenuous workouts or go for walks, can you do that? Something that doesn't work your lungs too much?"

"Yeah, I'm allowed to go for walks. But that's not the same," Steve said with a dramatic sigh. He shook his head and looked to Christopher, trying to shake this from his mind for now. "You ready for your nap, Bean?"

When Steve left to take their son for a nap, Bucky decided he would light some candles around their room just as a special little something as he massaged Steve. He knew it wasn't going to change the restrictions put on him and how he was feeling but maybe it would show him a little bit more that Bucky would always care for him.

Christopher had tired himself out with the laundry, so it didn't take long for him to fall asleep. Steve went to their bedroom and he smiled a little when he saw the candles. "You're such a sap," he said appreciatively as he took his shirt off.

"Well, you made me this way," Bucky retorted with a warm, loving smile. He gave Steve a kiss before gently nudging him to lay on the bed. He crawled up on the bed too and hovered over him. He loved this man so much and he just wished he could make everything right for him.

Steve laid down on his stomach and closed his eyes. "I don't know what I'm going to do once you're back to working full time," he said. "It's hard not to focus on the bad when I don't have distractions."

"Don't have distractions?" Bucky repeated in surprise. "Baby, you're going to have our son all day. And if you haven't noticed, he is a lot of work sometimes. You'll be plenty distracted by him."
"He takes naps," Steve reminded with a pout. "And sometimes you're not home at his nap time," he elaborated. "And the girls have school."

---

Bucky thought for a moment as he worked his fingers smoothly but firmly across Steve's shoulders. "How about we get you a puppy?" he asked absently and leaned down to kiss Steve's neck once.

---

Steve paused, unsure if Bucky was making a serious offer or just thinking out loud. "Wait, are you joking?" He kind of liked the idea of getting a puppy. It'd be better than a grown dog that may not get along with the cat. But Steve hadn't even considered that as an option.

---

Bucky stopped massaging Steve for a second and tilted his head to look at him. "No, not joking. At least, I think so," he said tentatively then went back to working down his mid back. "You can pick out a little guy and give him a good name and bring him home."

---

Steve let out a little groan when Bucky managed to crack his back. "You would be okay with that? I don't want to make you have to deal with a dog just because I'm lonely."

---

"I don't want you to be lonely while I'm at work," Bucky answered and spent some time on a knot right along Steve's shoulder blade. "I honestly don't think I will mind. You know how I was with Raphael. I swore up and down I wasn't going to like him or feed him or anything but now I love the tiny fluff ball."

---

Steve closed his eyes and imagined having a puppy scampering around the house, playing with Christopher and protecting him too. "I want a German Shepherd," Steve admitted. "Wouldn't that make a great pet?"

---

"That's what we had when we were younger," Bucky said fondly. "Her name was Maisie and she was so good with Lilly when she was a baby. I think a German Shepard would be a great dog to get. What would you name it?"

---

Steve liked that this wouldn't be the first Shepherd in the household. "I don't know what I would name it. I would have to meet it first, you know? I don't know if I would get a boy or a girl either."

---

"Well, you have some time to think it over," Bucky said as he massaged the curve of Steve's lower back. "Just be strong when Lilly wants to name it. She will say it's not fair because Becca named Raphael. But you know Lilly isn't going to help you take care of the dog at all and it'll be your dog mostly anyway."
Steve snorted. "Please. This is my depression dog. She’s not naming it," he said. Of course, he’d raise it to be a family dog but he wasn’t going to let Lilly call it hers especially if she took care of it as much as she took care of the cat - which was practically never.

"Depression dog?" Bucky questioned. "That's sounds so sad. Why can't it be your ‘companion dog’?" He finished up rubbing across Steve's back and he laid down on top of him with his head on his shoulder blade.

"Well, it's the truth," Steve said. "I'm depressed and I'm getting a dog to help stop that depression," he answered. He managed to let Bucky lay on top of him for a minute or so but he began to squirm. "Hard to breathe," he murmured.

Bucky quickly rolled off of him and laid close up against his side. "I love you. And I think a dog will be good for you," he said and slipped his hand in with Steve's. "Sorry for squishing you. How does your back feel now?"

"It feels a lot better. Thank you, Love," Steve said. "Do you want to nap until Christopher wakes up?" he asked. "Or do you want to do something else?"

"Like what?" Bucky asked softly and trailed his hand down Steve's spine lightly, hoping to give him some chills. "I'm really okay with anything you feel like doing, Baby." He was just happy Steve felt like doing something other than stare at the wall.

Steve shuddered pleasantly when Bucky touched his back. "Maybe... maybe we can look in the phone book and call around for people who might breed German Shepherd puppies?"

Bucky grinned and leaned in to kiss Steve's shoulder. "Sure, Steve. I don't really know where to start but we can call some animal shelters and see if they know anyone."

Steve turned over and pressed their lips together lightly. "Come on. Let's go calling around for our new troublemaker," he said as he popped off the bed and hovered over Bucky to wait for him to get up too.

"Hold on. Kiss me again," Bucky demanded and gently pulled Steve back down for another kiss. He felt like they hardly had any contact lately and Bucky was starving for touch and attention. He sighed contentedly and just held Steve close for a bit.
Steve cupped the side of Bucky's face and drew him in for a slow kiss. When they parted, he bumped their foreheads together gently. "You're the best husband a guy could ever ask for, you know that?"

"You've told me," Bucky said quietly. "Sometimes I can't believe I managed to get so lucky to be yours. And coming home to my family is always the best part of my day and getting to see our girls and our son and your beautiful face." It was true, too. He did feel so lucky. But he still felt that he and Steve weren’t completely fine. Steve still didn’t linger too long with his kisses and cuddling was frequently just a means to falling asleep.

“Come on, let’s go,” Steve said with a proud smile. They had a lot of hard times during their year together. But it was all okay when they got to come back together at the end of the day. And now they were going to get a dog for Steve. He nudged Bucky to follow before heading to get the phone book.
They had called around for dogs at different shelters but in the end, it was Clint who gave them the lead. Clint loved dogs. He had to stop to pet every dog he crossed on the street or in the park. He knew the right people to talk to for a puppy for them. Steve had decided to leave it as a surprise for the girls to come home to – puppies were always a good surprise. Steve also decided he wanted Bucky to help him pick one out and they decided on a little girl pup with huge paws she kept tripping over. Steve insisted on carrying her home even though they'd bought a carrier and a leash. "Buck, isn't she just precious?"

---

"She already peed on me and we have had her for less than an hour," Bucky said grumpily but then looked at how happy Steve was holding the tired little puppy close to his chest. "But, yes, she's really fucking adorable and you know I love animals and this is all your fault, Steve, and I want to squish her face with my fingers."

---

Steve nuzzled the top of her head. She still smelled like a baby and she had a huge case of puppy breath. "I want to give her a pretty name," Steve said. "To fit the kind of gorgeous pup she is."

---

"Like what?" Bucky asked and scratched behind the puppy's ears. "Something fancy like 'Cassandra' or 'Gloria' or 'Valerie'?" Bucky looked at her and stared into her sleepy little puppy eyes. He was already getting pretty fond of her.

---

"I like 'Gloria'," Steve said. "That suits her." The puppy was too tired to try to look at all the interesting things around her. In fact, when they got back home, the first thing she did when she was put down was find a comfy place to curl up and sleep.

---

"I guess being carried all the way home was tiring," Bucky said flatly and worked on getting his sleeping son out of his stroller. He had been napping the entire time and missed all the festivities of picking the puppy. Bucky was grateful. He had been worried that he would cause a scene in the pet shop.

---

Steve busied himself with filling up the water and food bowls for the dog. He had a bunch of chew toys littered about for her as well. "I've never got to have a dog before," Steve said. "I've always wanted one."

---

Bucky held Christopher as he started to wake up again. "I'm so happy you get to have one now. You look so pleased with yourself. I love it. But are you really naming her 'Gloria'? I said that one as a joke. I mean, you get to name her, so if that's what you chose, I'll have to deal with it."
"Well, I thought ‘Gloria’ was a nice name," Steve admitted. "The only name I kept thinking of was ‘Princess’," he admitted, and he wasn't sure how Bucky felt about naming their dog ‘Princess’.

"Princess?" Bucky scoffed. "Steve, come on. How did you managed to name two children with good names but can't name a dog?" He sighed. "Fine. ‘Gloria’ it is. So long as it isn't ‘Princess’ then I think everything is fine."

"I don’t know... with the amount you dislike the name ‘Princess’, I kind of want to name her that now," Steve teased.

Christopher saw the puppy lying on the carpet and pointed at her. "Papa." He signed 'cat' at Bucky.

Bucky signed back 'dog' and said, "Dog," to Christopher clearly and firmly and pointed to her. "Steve, Baby, if you name that dog ‘Princess’, I'm calling it ‘Gloria’ anyway. The puppy was sleeping soundly but now Christopher really wanted to go greet her and he was desperately trying to get down from Bucky's arms.

Steve had purposely picked out a puppy that was pretty mellow because he knew that Christopher would be growing up with it. He didn't want a dog that would be rough with a baby around. "I'm going to ask the girls what they think when they get home." He carefully scooped the puppy into his arms and brought her over for Christopher to have a closer look.

Christopher shrieked in excitement and reached out to grab the dog's ears. She just opened her eyes and looked at the baby for a long moment before yawning and licking his hand, which elicited a second gleeful shrill sound. "I think he likes her."

"Oh my god, our son is so adorable," Steve said. The puppy nudged her wet nose at Christopher's cheek and sniffed him curiously. "Are you being a good girl, Princess?" Steve asked, smirking over at Bucky when he said the name.

"Yes, ‘no-name-the-dog’ is going to be a great addition to this family," Bucky said and tried to hold Christopher back from wanting to jump out of his arms. "I wonder how Raph will take to this new animal in the house?"

"Knowing him, he's probably going to avoid her," Steve chuckled. "And reluctantly endure any time she chases him down to play." Raphael loved Becca and Bucky the most. Lilly gave him more treats but the other two weren't so chaotic and loud.
"Maybe they will be friends when they are both sleeping," Bucky offered and reached out a hand to pet the puppy and got a happy lick on his palm. "So, is this dog going to be sleeping in our bed? Because we tried that with Bourbon the plush dog and he ended up in Christopher's crib."

"I'll let the puppy decide where she wants to sleep," Steve decided. "Except Christopher's crib. That's Bourbon's sleeping place."

The girls walked through the door a few minutes later chattering to each other idly. But when Lilly saw what was in Steve's arms, she gasped, "Oh my god!"

Both girls dropped their things and came running over. At first, Christopher thought they were excited to see him so he was pretty mad when they ignored him in favor of the puppy. "Whose dog is this?" Becca asked cautiously, not wanting to think it was theirs and then be told that Steve was just dog-sitting for a friend.

"She's my dog, uh, our dog - the family dog," Steve said. "I'm thinking about naming her 'Princess', but Bucky says 'Gloria' is a better name." The Pup yawned and licked their hands when they went to pet her.

Meanwhile, Christopher huffed out "Beh!" and "Lee!" to get the girls' attention.

The girls both looked at Christopher quickly and said a rushed 'hello' and kissed his head to satisfy him. Then they returned their attention to the dog.

"What happened was, I suggested 'Gloria' as a joke but Steve liked it. Then I poked fun at him for choosing it and now he wants to ruin the dog's life by naming it 'Princess'. Steve, all the other dogs at the dog park will make fun of her," Bucky insisted.

"It's not ruining her life by naming her that," Steve said. "The dogs don't know English. She's going to be fine."

Lilly shook her head. "Both of those names are lame. You got to give her a cool name light 'Lightning' or 'Havoc'."

"Lilly," Bucky started and gave Steve a knowing look because they had talked about how Lilly would do this. "This is a family dog, yes, but it's Steve's dog first. That means he is naming her and taking care of her and all of that. And if he really, really wants to go with 'Princess' then I will have to just find a nickname for her. But, I highly advise against it." He added the last part with a look to Steve.
Lilly made a face and Steve pouted when Bucky continued to lobby against the name. "Well, how about ‘Diana’ after Princess Diana? Or we can name her ‘Eleanor’. Or ‘Rosie’.

---

"I'm fine with any of those," Bucky said and adjusted Christopher in his arms. "‘Diana’ is really nice. But it's up to you, Steve." The puppy looked up at Steve and yawned again before licking the bottom of his chin. "I think she is tired waiting for a name."

---

Steve giggled and kissed her snout. "Alright. ‘Diana’ it is. But I'm still going to call you my princess," he said. He pet her soft head before letting her rest on the couch because she looked worn out already.

---

"Diana," Bucky nodded in agreement and watched Lilly flop on the couch next to the puppy just so she could stare at her. The puppy peeked an eye over at Lilly briefly before going back to sleep. "Becca, do you remember Maisie? And how old she got and how she would fall asleep on dad's legs and he wouldn't be able to get up until she moved."

---

"Yeah, I remember," Becca said with a grin. "I used to put bows on her collar and she would shake them off. Aren't there pictures of me riding her like a horse when I was a baby?" she asked.

---

"Yeah, somewhere there are," Bucky said with a smile. "She was so good with you and Lilly when you were small. And Dad loved taking pictures of you and the dog going on adventures all day. I can try to find those later." Bucky kissed Christopher's cheek. "She was really good at knowing when Becca was about to cry. She would get all up next to her and lick her legs and nudge her and try to distract her from whatever it was that was getting her going."

---

"I hope Diana is just as good with Christopher. He seems to really like her." Steve had to remind their son that the puppy was sleeping every time he fussed to be taken closer to her.

---

Bucky turned again so Christopher couldn't see the puppy. "I think she will be. She seems like she is really mild-tempered so that's perfect for having children around." The puppy's ears twitched and she let out a big sigh but didn't open her eyes.

---

Christopher fussed and started to whine when he couldn't see the dog. Raphael came in just then and his tail swished when he saw another animal. "What are you guys in the mood to have for dinner?"

Steve asked.

---

Bucky looked up at Steve with surprised eyes. He hadn't made their food since Grant died. It might be a small step, but it was a good step in the right direction. This meant Steve was feeling even the slightest bit better. "I'm okay with anything you all want," Bucky said and set Christopher down who immediately ran to the dog.

---

When Christopher went to the dog, Raphael ran in front of him to stop him in case the puppy was hostile. He jumped onto the couch and started to sniff at Diana, who rolled onto her back and pawed playfully at the cat. "Lilly, you have any preference for dinner?" Steve asked.

---

Lilly always had a preference on dinner. "Noodles, but not spaghetti. More like noodles and cheese with chicken but no vegetables," she requested with arms crossed.

Becca rolled her eyes and said, "I'll eat her vegetables. I know what's good for me."

---

Steve smiled, happy to have a little sense of normalcy back. Diana wagged her tail and licked Raphael until he ran off to prevent the pup from messing up his fur. So she started licking Christopher's face instead. "Look, Buck," Steve gasped.

---

Bucky turned to look and saw his son sitting still and letting Diana lick her face. "Oh my god. Camera, Steve, camera!" Bucky yelled and waved him off to go get it as he stood and stared at the two of them and his heart melted.

---

Steve ran to grab their camera and was practically wheezing when he got back. He managed to get a few photos before Diana looked at him curiously, not recognizing the noise and being wary of what it meant.

---

Bucky had forgotten about Steve's lungs in his haste to capture the moment. But he also didn't want to ask Steve if he was okay and draw attention to the fact that his lungs weren't perfect anymore. "Those are going to be great pictures to have when he is older," he said instead and gave Steve a kiss on his cheek.

---

Diana hopped off the couch and stumbled over to sniff at Steve's legs. Steve coughed and held onto his chest until he caught his breath again. "Yeah. It was worth it."

---

"See, Steve?" Bucky asked and pet Diana's head. "She already knows when you're not alright. She's going to be great for you to have around. Diana is just like Maisie was." Even though he was already sure about it before, he was convinced now that it was a good idea to have this dog for Steve.

---

Steve smiled shyly. He knew that he was going to have some pretty rough times ahead and it was comforting to know that Diana was such an attentive dog. "Yeah, we definitely picked a winner," he agreed. "Alright, I better start dinner."

---

"Do you want my help? Or have you - like Lilly - decided I'm never touching dinner again?" Bucky asked and watched Christopher attempt to hoist himself up on to the couch. He gave up after a few tries and flopped down on his butt.

---

Steve walked over to their son and helped him onto the couch. Raphael joined him and bumped his head gently against him, looking for attention. "It's okay," Steve said. "I'd rather take care of it myself."

---

"I get it, I get it," Bucky mumbled. "I can't cook. I know." He took the camera and got a picture of Raphael and Christopher sitting together and then one of Lilly holding Diana. "I'm going to try to work on colors with Christopher while you cook. I think he almost knows which is red and which is blue."

---

Steve went to work in the kitchen for their dinner while the rest of them occupied themselves in the living room. "Can Diana sleep in my room?" Lilly asked Bucky. "I think she really likes me."

---

"No, Lil," Bucky said and brought Christopher to his blocks. "Diana is Steve's dog. He may let you have her in your room occasionally but you'll have to talk to him about that. And especially not right now while she is young because she will need to go out to pee a lot."

---

Lilly pouted. "But she's so cute..." Diana let out a playful bark and squirmed to get down. She was awake now and wanted to explore. "Why did you guys get a dog out of nowhere?"

---

"I suggested it for Steve and he thought it was a good idea," Bucky said simply. He wasn't sure if Lilly needed to know what he and Steve discussed about their lives when they are alone. He also wasn't sure if Steve would appreciate Lilly knowing he was feeling so down about not having a job on top of everything else that he was worried he would be so lost and lonely when no one was home.

---

"I think it's a good idea too," she said. Then she caught Diana going to the corner to pee on the carpet. "Oh no! No, Diana, bad dog!" She scolded. The pup darted under the table when she heard Lilly yell at her.

---

Bucky huffed out a sigh. "Steve!" he called out. "Diana needs to go out. Can Lilly do it?" He didn't want to just have her do it if Steve had some sort of training plan already worked out in his head.

"I'll do it," Steve said. He was a bit possessive over Diana already and he didn't want to give Lilly an excuse to lay claim on his puppy. "Can you mind the pasta while I take her out?" He walked over and scooped her up from her hiding spot.

Bucky sent Lilly to watch the pasta since he was working with Christopher who vaguely seemed to get it. When Steve came back in with the dog, Bucky said quietly so no one but Steve could hear, "Baby, you're going to have to make it super clear to Lilly that Diana is yours. She asked to have her sleep in her room."

Steve let Diana off her leash and watched as she explored her new home. "Isn't one animal she doesn't take care of enough?" he huffed softly.

"She's not going to listen to reason about this, either," Bucky warned. "You're just going to have to be gentle but firm that she can't steal your puppy." His eyebrows were furrowed and he was staring down at the blocks. "Check this out. I think he can do it this time." He got Christopher's attention and said, "Red."

Because Christopher was perfect at not showing off when Bucky wanted him to, he gurgled at Bucky as he tried putting his foot into his own mouth. "Ah, yes. I see he grows smarter by the day," Steve teased.

"Goddammit," Bucky breathed and gingerly pulled Christopher's foot out of the way. "Okay, I'll keep working on it. If you need help with dinner let me know. And talk to Lilly." He moved most of the blocks behind him so Christopher could only see one blue and one red. "Let's try this again."

Christopher made an annoyed noise at his pop which had Steve chuckling softly as he went to the kitchen. He took over the pasta and hesitated before taking a breath. "Hey, Lil?" he murmured softly. "Can I talk to you for a minute?"

Lilly popped up to sit on the counter and slowly started eating pretzels out of the bag. "Yeah?" she asked with her mouth full and her eyes half shut staring at nothing in particular.

"I, um... I'm happy that you like Diana, but she's my dog. Of course, you're allowed to pet her and play with her, but most of the time she's going to be with me. She's not even going to be Bucky's dog - and me and Bucky usually share everything," he said.
Lilly stopped eating and looked to Steve. "I understand. It's not like took her from you. I just wanted to take her outside and stuff." She pouted and put the bag down so she could cross her arms.

"I know," Steve said. "But I'm going to be the person handling all that stuff. I'll walk her and take care of her. You can play with her when I'm doing other stuff, alright?" He drained the pasta and checked on the chicken and vegetables.

Lilly squinted. "Is this cause I asked Bucky if she could sleep in my room?" she asked and watched as Diana stumbled her way into the kitchen and ran around the table a few times.

He separated the pasta into bowls and added meat to Lilly's. "Yeah," he said. "I know she's cute, but she's going to need to use the bathroom a bunch and her bed is going to be in our room," he said.

Lilly was annoyed. She felt like she hadn't done anything wrong. She just wanted the dog to be as much hers as it was Steve's. "I never get to have her to myself sometimes?" she asked. She still didn't get it.

"If I'm not around, you can have her to yourself. But if I'm around, she's supposed to be with me," Steve explained patiently. "Just like how you have plenty of stuff you'd let me use when you aren't using them but that doesn't mean I get to take them whenever I want."

Lilly scrunched up her face and looked down at Diana again. "Well, when are you not going to be around?" she asked and hopped off the counter with a thud. "You don't have a job anymore. You can't work for a whole year. You'll always be stuck here." She flung her hair back and storm out the kitchen to head to her room saying, "And ‘Diana’ is a stupid ass name!"

Steve felt a bit stung. Stuck here. Stuck in the house with no second son to take care of, no badge, no job to keep his mind off things. He lowered his head with a frown and turned back to making all of their food. Diana whined and nudged him for something to eat, so Steve gave her a piece of chicken.

Bucky heard Lilly shout and stomp off so he picked up Christopher and came to the kitchen. "Baby?" he said tentatively and came up by Steve. "Didn't go so well?" he asked and rubbed Steve's back. "Do I need to talk to her?"

Steve was visibly upset but he was holding himself together. "She can be so rude sometimes," he murmured quietly. And she knew exactly what to say to really get to him. She was learning from Becca, it seemed. "I'm not really that hungry anymore, Buck. But dinner's ready."

---

Bucky nodded and set Christopher down. "Here, I'll make Lilly a plate and she can eat in her room tonight. I'll tell her she needs to apologize and then I'll get Becca for dinner. How's that?" He kissed Steve's shoulder and grabbed a plate to start filling up for his sister.

---

"I don't really feel like taking an apology right now," Steve admitted. He wasn't so mad that he wouldn't forgive her but he didn't have the energy to deal with it right now.

---

"Okay, no apology, she will just eat alone," Bucky said and squeezed Steve's arm before heading up to Lilly's room. "Hey, Monster. You really upset Steve. I need you to eat up here by yourself tonight."

---

"Well, he wouldn't be upset if he wasn't hogging the dog," she answered. "We're a family. It's not just him around here." She took her plate and ate a bite moodily.

---

"It's his dog, Lilly," Bucky said again. "Steve needs this puppy. We got it for him. He's going through a lot right now and we all need to support him." He huffed out a sigh. "If you want more food you can come down but then come straight back up." Bucky nodded and closed the door behind him on his way back downstairs.

---

Steve was downstairs feeding Christopher his dinner while Becca patiently waited for Bucky to come back down. "Everything okay?" she asked.

---

"More or less," Bucky answered and sat down to his plate of food. "She's just being unreasonable." He noticed Steve hadn't set a plate out for himself. "Baby, is it okay if I ask you to eat a few pieces of chicken and maybe like one or two bites of noodles?"

---

"I'm really not hungry, Bucky," Steve said. He wasn't trying to be difficult. He just really felt awful right now and he didn't feel like he could stomach anything. "Maybe later if I'm feeling better."

---

Bucky sighed and nodded. "Maybe later," he conceded. He and Becca started to eat quietly and Diana came to lay on Steve's feet under the table. Christopher worked on putting food into his mouth and made little bubbles of noises as he went.

---

After they all ate, Steve made a bowl of puppy food for Diana and then scooped up Christopher.
"You want to help me give our bean a bath?" Steve asked.

---

"Yeah, let’s get him cleaned up. He has sauce in his hair," Bucky chuckled and went with Steve to the bathroom and started the water running. "Steve, I'm really sorry Lilly was so mean. She isn't good at understanding things like this."

---

"You don't have to be sorry for her being mean," Steve said as he helped their squirming son out of his shirt. "It's not your fault. I'm just... I feel so tired and awful, Bucky. I can't stand it."

---

"I know, Love, I know," Bucky sighed and grabbed Christopher's duck for him to play with. "I think she just doesn't know why it is that Diana is going to be so important for you to have around. She just thinks it's another pet."

---

"I know she doesn't understand. I wish I didn't have to explain it for her," Steve said. Diana came bounding up to them then and before Steve could stop her, she climbed over the edge of the tub and got into the water with Christopher. That made the baby squeal and splash around as Steve tried to wash his hair.

---

"Shit, fuck," Bucky gasped as he was splashed by the puppy. He grabbed a towel and wiped off his face. "Steve, is it okay that she is in there or should I get her out?"

---

Diana drank from the water and seemed to have a real good time hanging around in it. Steve quickly pulled her out so she wouldn't get sick from the soap bubbles in the water. "Dada!" Christopher complained.

"No, Love, the puppy will get sick," Steve said as he wrapped her up in a towel.

---

Bucky took the puppy in the towel from Steve and held her close so she wouldn't get cold. "I think Diana and Christopher are going to get along really well. He isn't afraid of her and she doesn't seem to mind him."

---

"Yeah, that was actually really damn cute," Steve admitted. He calmed Christopher down enough to wash the top of his head. "She is such a sweet puppy. I love her already even though she peed on you."

---

"I love her too," Bucky confessed. "And Christopher's peed on me several times before so I suppose I should just be used to it by now." He dried off the puppy's fur and then set her back down, making sure she didn't rush off to the bath once again.
"I think you make a really good target for pee. You should be a toilet for Halloween," Steve teased. Diana tried to jump into the bath again but Bucky stopped her. Christopher waved at her and babbled as Steve finished washing him. "There we go, my clean boy!" he said as he hoisted him up.

Bucky immediately reached to start draining the tub just in case anyone felt like diving in once more. "Okay, Bean, are you sleepy now? Is it bedtime?" He gently dried Christopher's hair as Steve held him.

Steve kissed him a few times on his chubby, little cheek and smiled as he giggled. "Christopher says he wants his papa to sing him his lullaby tonight," Steve said.

"Oh, but which one?" Bucky asked with a happy smile as he took the baby from Steve. "Because Papa has so many options and he doesn't know which is your favorite one, Bean."

"I know my son's favorite lullaby," Steve said in a semi-defensive tone. "He loves 'You Are My Sunshine'. It makes him smile every time."

"But that's the lullaby you sing him, Steve," Bucky corrected softly and brought Christopher to the nursery. "I sing him soft rock ballads and crooners tunes." He smiled over at his husband and reached for his hand.

"It's my lullaby for him so therefore it's his favorite," Steve said in a matter-of-fact tone. He took Bucky's hand and kissed his neck lightly. "How about some Queen?"

"Okay, Queen," Bucky agreed with a nod. "Which Queen, though? 'Love of My Life'?" he asked and pulled out a pair of pajamas for his son who was pulling at the towel he was wrapped in, desperately trying to get free. "That sounds like a good one. Then Daddy and Pops are going to go lay down and sleep because it's been a long day and Pops has to work really early tomorrow."

Once the towel was off of him, Christopher yawned and didn't look like he was going to fuss about getting clothes put on. "I'm going to miss you being home with me all day," Steve sighed. "I love having you around - so does Christopher."

"I love being here with you both," Bucky said and cinched the last button before laying Christopher down. "I would much rather be with my favorite people than be at work with Reggie all day tomorrow. But it can't be helped." He sighed. "And before you know it, I'll be home again."
Christopher was almost asleep by the time Bucky was done dressing him. "Yeah, but at least you've got Clint and now Tim so it's not just you against the stoners." He placed a hand on Bucky's back and leaned his head on his shoulder.

"'Bucky and The Stoners' sounds like a band name," Bucky offered with a chuckle and gave his son a gentle kiss before singing him part of a Queen song until he was completely asleep. He and Steve just stood and watched him breathing for a bit before deciding to leave him be.

Steve leaned over the crib and simply wondered at how amazing his little baby boy was. He watched as Christopher turned onto his side and balled his little fist up against his chin. "We are so blessed to have him, Bucky. He's amazing."

"He's perfect," Bucky agreed and took one of Steve's hands. "But let's let him be. He needs his rest as much as we do." He silently pulled Steve from the nursery and back to the master bedroom. "What are your plans for tomorrow?" Bucky asked once their door was shut. He really needed to take a shower so he just started stripping down and hoped Steve would decide to join him and just be near him in the warm water.

Steve reluctantly left Christopher's room and he followed Bucky into the bathroom after he stripped down as well. "I was thinking of taking Christopher to Grant's grave," he said. "Then doing some painting with him and training Diana when he's down for his nap."

"That sounds like a good day. I think Christopher is missing doing art with you," Bucky said and started the water running. "What sort of training will you do with Diana? Like bathroom training and commands and things? Or do you want her to be able to be like a rescuer dog?"

"I want to have Diana trained in everything. I hear that Shepherds are really smart, so I want to do as much as I can with her," Steve said.

"That's a good idea," Bucky agreed and pulled Steve into the shower with him. "Were you ever one of the guys who got to work with the K-9 unit at the precinct?" He didn't necessarily want to bring up the police station but he hoped talking about some good parts of it would help ease Steve into a lull of comfortable memories instead of pain.

Steve's eyes got sad when Bucky brought up the precinct. "No, I didn't get to. I always got to pet them when they were off duty, though. I can't count how many puppies they brought in there."
"That's pretty special." Bucky smiled and tried to get Steve to come back to him and be a little okay again. He pulled Steve to him so they were chest to chest and he reached around and rested his hands just above Steve's ass. He missed Steve's body. He missed it being all over his and he missed Steve's cock inside him and how beautiful Steve looked when he rode Bucky. He missed being intimate and connected with his husband. But that wasn't happening anytime soon. Bucky was worried it may not happen ever again. But he couldn't think about that right now. So he sighed and let go of Steve to start washing them up. "I think Diana and you will have a lot of fun training together."

Steve leaned into Bucky and nuzzled him lightly. He didn't really have it in him to have sex even though he loved Bucky dearly and wanted to make him happy. Usually having Bucky's hands so close to his ass would have Steve wanting more and more but instead, he gave Bucky a chaste kiss on the shoulder as a weak consolation. "Yeah, getting her was a really good idea, Buck. I owe you for that one."

"You don't owe me," Bucky said softly, sadly, because he knew Steve was so broken inside right now and he wasn't sure when he would be feeling okay again. "I want to make sure you're getting whatever you need while I'm not around and having a companion in Diana was a good option."

Steve washed Bucky's hair diligently. It was the best he could do right now for intimacy. He kissed the tip of his nose when he was done. "I owe you for everything good in my life," Steve said sweetly, managing a little smile over at him.

Bucky nodded and tried to return Steve's smile. He finished washing off and hopped out of the shower to grab his towel. He was pretty quiet as he dried off and waited for Steve to do the same. Once they were all dressed and ready to sleep, Bucky sat on the edge of the bed and stared at the wall for a long moment.

Steve laid down in their bed and was still and quiet. Diana climbed up awkwardly onto the bed and curled up at the foot of it. Steve didn't speak at first but then he finally murmured, "I'm sorry that I'm not good company right now."

"It's okay," Bucky said in a whisper so faint he wasn't sure he said it. "I'm going to go outside for a bit. Just sit in the cool air for a while. I need a few minutes." He got up and tugged on one of Steve's sweaters and put on a hat over his long wet hair.

Steve just stayed there, not moving an inch. When Bucky left, he wept quietly and cuddled Diana to his chest. He felt doubly awful because he knew Bucky was hurting too and Steve wasn't doing much to help. They felt so distant from each other.
Bucky sat out on the steps by their door. He smoked a cigarette and let tears fall down his face. A couple people passed him by and a few gave him sympathetic looks. He felt lost. He was trying so hard to make sure everyone in his family was doing okay that he hadn't even taken a moment to make sure he was okay. He really, really wanted to drink. He hated that he kept thinking that he could just go slip off and get a couple shots at the bar. He couldn't let himself do that. But he wanted it so badly.

Becca came out after a while. She had smelled smoke coming in through her open window and she heard Bucky shuffling around so she decided to go see what was up. "Hey," she said. "You want to talk?"

Bucky looked over at her and sighed. "I'm not sure. I don't even know if I can properly explain in words what's going on right now," he said and reached out to squeeze her shoulder once. "I just don't know what to do anymore, Becca."

Becca reached over and squeezed his hand in turn. "With yourself? Or with Steve?" she asked. "Is that why you guys got Diana? Cause of Grant?" She assumed that they got a puppy to help with the loss of the baby.

"With myself and with Steve," Bucky confirmed. "I keep just going and going and trying to fix every little thing in hopes that I don't self-destruct like I did when Mom and Dad died. But I haven't taken the time to just be upset. Steve got to grieve. He laid up in your room for days. I haven't done anything close to that. And I don't think it's fair. But Steve also has other things going on and he can't work and he's so broken inside and I thought that a puppy might help him not be so lonely and directionless when he is home alone."

"You won't self-destruct," Becca said quietly. "You're better than that now." She crossed her arms and offered, "I can help run the house. Just for a little while so you can have the time you need. I'm a bit of a pro at that by now."

Bucky gave her a weak little smile. "Thank you, Becca. But I don't want you to have to do that again. You had to do it before for a while and I don't want you to go through that stress again. It's my job, my responsibility. I'll have to just handle it."

"Nope," she said stubbornly. "I'm going to handle it. You got to heal. And it's not often I'm in an understanding and generous mood, so take it while it lasts."
Bucky looked to Becca and shook his head with a little grimace of a smile. "Fine. We will do it together." He sighed and stared off down the street again. "Do you have any ideas or advice on how to get Steve to... be with me, I guess? He's so distant and I miss him. He's better now than a few days ago but he still hardly touches me or even looks at me and we haven't had sex since before the fire and I miss being connected and intimate with him."

---

Becca gave Bucky a look that pleaded with him to not dare tell her more than she needed to know about his sex life. "You're asking your little sister who's never had sex how to make your husband have sex with you?" she questioned in disbelief. "Uh... I don't know. Have you tried getting him in the mood? Or doing stuff for him so he doesn't have to be the one starting stuff?"

---

"I am asking you because it's important that you understand that sex can be beautiful when it's with someone who loves you and you love them back. It can be healing and good at bonding two people. It's not always got to be some flashy desperate thing like on TV," Bucky said. Becca was now fifteen and Bucky was worried everyday that she would come home late crying because some boy convinced her to have sex with him and she regretted it. Bucky regretted a lot of the partners he had before Steve and he knew he didn't want that for his sisters or his kids.

---

"I know that," she huffed, getting flustered and embarrassed. "I'm still saying that you have more experience in that field so I don't know why you're asking me. Try talking to him, maybe? Actually, no. He may feel even worse because he's not giving you what you want."

---

"It's not even that I'm trying to get him to make love with me," Bucky said with a huff. "It's more that I'm trying to get him to open back up to me and let me be there with him - physically and emotionally and mentally. Right now, it just sort of feels like he is making himself interact with me so I don't get mad. Like we just... coexist."

---

"So what if he is forcing himself to interact with you?" Becca asked curiously. "That means that he loves you enough to care about your feelings even when he's upset, too."

---

Bucky considered it for a moment. "Yeah, I guess that makes sense. And since I just can't push a button and make him all better then I'll just have to deal with what I can get at the moment." He sighed and pulled her in for a really quick hug and then let her go again so she wouldn't get grumpy.

---

Becca brushed herself off as if the hug was a personal offense to her pristine ego. She gave Bucky a look but eased up shortly. "You've had practice with losing someone important to you. This is Steve's first real loss. It's going to take him longer."

---

"That makes sense too," Bucky agreed. "But that doesn't mean losing Grant hurt me any less than it hurt Steve. I just wish we would have been able to have those few days to grieve together instead of him ignoring us and making it so me and Sarah had to ignore our own thoughts and feelings about this to take care of everything on our own and also worry about Steve."

---

"Yeah, it was shitty he hid for almost a week," Becca agreed. "But I guess we can't change the past. Only what we're going to do with the cards we've been dealt with," she murmured, nudging him.

---

"You're a smart kid. You know that?" Bucky asked and stood up. "You had to grow up pretty quick because of me. And I'm really sorry about that. I wish I could go back and be there for you and Lilly when you needed me to be."

---

"We still need you. Sometimes. Lilly more so than me," she said. "You're here for us now." Becca headed back inside before she said any more sappy stuff and embarrassed herself.

---

Bucky spent a few more minutes staring at the moon and Brooklyn and just trying to work things out in his head. Then he trudged back inside and pulled off his jacket before slipping into bed next to Steve and spooning him close to his body. Steve had calmed down since Bucky left but he fell into an uneasy sleep.

---

Diana wagged her tail when she saw Bucky but she didn't get up. Steve leaned back against Bucky's chest and let out a little whine. His breathing started to pick up until he worked himself up into waking quickly. His eyes snapped open and he looked back at Bucky. "Sorry," he apologized tiredly, thinking that he woke him.

---

Bucky shook his head and caressed Steve's face gently. "Did you have a bad dream?" he asked and kissed Steve's neck. "I just got back in. I'm sorry I was out for a while. Becca and I were talking."

---

Steve nodded. He had consistent bad dreams since the fire. They only got worse after Grant. He kept his gaze lowered so he wouldn't meet Bucky's eyes. "Are you feeling better?" he asked. Steve hoped that Bucky came to peace with whatever made him have to go outside.

---

"A little bit," Bucky confessed and wrapped his arms tighter around Steve. "Go back to sleep, Love. I'm here now. I'll be gone when you wake up in the morning, just so you know."

---

Steve closed his eyes and pretended to sleep just so Bucky would go to sleep as well. But it took him a couple hours before he finally was able to rest. He just couldn’t stop thinking about what he lost and worrying that he was going to lose everything else if he didn’t pull himself together soon.
Bucky and Steve were sitting on a bench inside the tattoo shop waiting for their turn. Steve was going to get his first tattoo today. He brought the ink print of Grant's feet and was clutching on to it tightly as he waited for the tattooist to be ready for them.

---

Steve had still been feeling off. Having Diana helped fill the emptiness when Bucky wasn't around. He visited Grant every day and his headstone would be put in soon. But it was still a lot to handle. "Does it hurt a lot?" Steve asked. "Your skin looked pretty irritated afterwards."

---

"It hurts a little bit," Bucky admitted. "I don't think it hurts as much as some people try to say it does. I think they just want to look tough." He smiled at Steve and nudged him. "Where are you putting your tattoo again?"

---

Steve nodded. He could handle a little pain. "I'm going to put it on the tops of my feet. It's like he's always walking with me," he said. "Or like how I would put Christopher's feet on mine while he learned how to walk."

---

Bucky smiled and wished he could give his husband a kiss. "I love that. He's always with you." The tattooist ushered them back and Bucky gave Steve's shoulder a squeeze and prompted him to give the ink print to Randall. Randall was quiet but kind. He was very nice to Bucky the two times he was here and Bucky was confident in his skills to do the feet properly.

---

Steve took his shoes off and felt a little weird when Randall washed the tops and shaved any hairs off to have a clear canvas. Steve gave Bucky a nervous look when he heard the needle going and hissed when it pierced his skin. "That fucking stings," he murmured to Bucky.

---

"You're doing it, though. You've got it," Bucky said warmly and offered Steve his hand. He figured it wouldn't seem weird if he held Steve's hand while he was getting tattooed. "It'll be done soon."

---

Steve squeezed Bucky's hand and Randall stared for a moment before brushing it off and focusing on his work. It took just over an hour to do, but it looked perfect. Steve was afraid to look at it yet. "How is it?" he asked Bucky.

---

Bucky loved it. It looked exactly like Grant's feet. "It's wonderful, Steve," Bucky said and gently took the ink print back from Randall. "It looks exactly like this." He wanted nothing more than to hug his husband and hold him tight. This was an important moment for them - for Steve.
Steve chanced a look and felt his breath catch in his throat. It was fucking beautiful. He teared up and stared down at the tattoo. "Wow, oh, Bucky... it's just like his feet. It's so perfect," he said and wiped at his eyes.

"I know," Bucky said softly and pulled out the money from his wallet, being sure to tip Randall very well for his work and his discretion about the two of them since they had made it clear by now that they were probably not just friends.

"You should keep your feet uncovered as much as possible so it'll heal best. That means no heavy socks or shoes for a bit. Also, be sure to wash it frequently and gently," Randall warned Steve. Steve thanked him over and over and let him wrap his feet so he could get his socks and shoes back on for now.

Once Steve was ready to go, Bucky handed him his coat and held open the door. "Let's go home, Baby," he said softly and touched Steve's arm as he passed him. "Do you like it? Is it what you hoped it would look like?"

"I love it," Steve assured him. "I'm... I'm so happy you suggested his feet. I'm so surprised with how much it matches the original." Steve was so overwhelmed with emotion that it was hard to speak.

Bucky handed Steve the ink print and zipped his jacket up. "Yeah, Randall did a really good job on it. I really like it. I'm glad you do too. The bummer is now it'll hurt for a couple days and if Diana or Christopher step on your feet that'll be pretty painful."

"Yeah, my feet feel like they're on fire right now," Steve admitted. He was walking stiffly as they left the shop and headed back home. "Diana is starting to understand some commands."

"Oh yeah? Which ones?" Bucky asked. "I noticed she's been sitting at the door when she needs to go out. That's a good step in the right direction. She's only peed inside twice in the past couple days."

"I taught her 'leave it' and 'stay'. I got to make sure that she knows to back off when she has to, you know? And I give her lots of treats when we go for walks so she wants to be outside anyway," Steve explained.

"How have the walks been?" Bucky asked cautiously, insinuating that he wanted to talk about Steve's lungs but also not wanting to push that angle. "Do you just go to the park with her and Christopher or have you been walking on the sidewalk down our street?"

"I take her on short walks sometimes so she gets used to the leash. It's getting harder to breathe with the air being so thin," Steve admitted. "We go to the park every day, though. I keep her by me and I let Christopher wander on the grass. He's too small for the playground."

"I wish I could be there with you," Bucky said sadly. "I'd love to sit and watch our boy explore and find butterflies and bunnies." He smiled at the thought. He hated that he was at work so often. But even with Steve's settlement and his disability pay, they still needed one of them to work. And Bucky did love his job even though he complained about it sometimes.

"Me, too. There's so many times when I'll turn to show you something and forget that you're at work," Steve said. "Christopher started talking to the flowers the other day. He was too adorable," Steve gushed.

"Oh, god, I want to see that!" Bucky whined and pouted. "Is it like when he sits and babbles at Raph while he is taking a nap? Because that's one of my favorite things. He gets so upset when the cat wakes up and walks away."

"I'm thinking about buying one of those JVC video cameras. Only having pictures isn't enough to capture our son growing up. I want to have tapes, too," Steve said.

"I think you should definitely do that," Bucky agreed. "I want to be able to see those videos and show him when he is older." He unlocked their door and found Becca and Lilly hovering over a puzzle in the living room and Christopher passed out on the couch with Diana curled up next to him.

"I thought it would be fun. I'll do video logs and everything." Steve smiled when he saw Diana poke her head up. She flipped onto the floor so she could run up to them quickly to greet them. "Hey, little princess," he said as he picked her up. "Say 'hello' to Bucky."

Bucky leaned in so the puppy could lick his face and he chuckled. "Hello, Diana. It's good to see you, too." He wrapped an arm around Steve's back and said quietly, "I've got something to show you. It's hidden in our room."

Steve perked up a little. "Oh?" he asked. He set his puppy down and Diana sniffed at his feet as if she could tell something was different. "Let me kiss Christopher first." Steve walked over and tucked a blanket over their sleeping son and kissed his head. He said 'hello' to the girls and then motioned for Bucky to lead them.

---

Bucky brought Steve to their bedroom and had him sit down. He still had the ink print and he set it beside Steve so he could go rummage for what he was looking for. Eventually, he pulled out a medium-sized wooden picture frame and brought it over to Steve. Bucky had taken parts of Grant’s ruined crib and made a frame to put the feet in. "I made this," he said and showed it to Steve. "It's made of some of Grant's crib."

---

Steve's bottom lip quivered the second he saw it because he already knew what it was. He gingerly ran his fingers over the frame. "Bucky... it's beautiful," he said softly. He gently placed the ink print into the frame, making sure the glass flattened out the paper so there weren't wrinkles. "Look. Now his crib can still protect him."

---

Bucky nodded and leaned into Steve to give him a kiss. "Where do you want to hang it up?" he asked and sat next to him so he could look at the frame with him. "I was thinking the nursery but it's honestly wherever you think is best. Since I made it, you get to choose where it goes."

---

"I'd like to have him in here for a little while," Steve said. "But then he should go to the nursery. You know, kind of like how Christopher shared our room at first," he explained. Steve kissed Bucky's cheek. "I love you so much, my handsome woodworker."

---

Bucky pulled Steve in to give him a kiss on the lips, needing as much contact as possible right now. "I love you, too," he said and took the frame to set it on their dresser for the time being. "I think he should be here with us for a while, too. Then he can join his brother."

---

Steve cried a little because he missed their baby but only a few tears fell. He leaned down to take his socks and shoes off. "You're so talented," he sighed. "All the stuff you're able to do with your woodworking, it's amazing."

---

"Thank you, Baby," Bucky said with a smile and grabbed a sweater for himself. "I wonder if I could make any money from it. Like work on my whittling and make animal figures for people. Or make cribs or plaques or things on commission. Do you think people would buy them?"

---

"I think loads of people would," Steve said. "But maybe just do whittling and plaques. I kind of like the thought of only our kids getting to have one of your handmade cribs."

---

"Yeah, okay. just for our kids," Bucky agreed happily. That was another indication that Steve was thinking of future children so he was going to take it. "How do your feet feel?" he asked and squatted down to look at the tattoo again. It really did look just like Grant's feet.

---

"They feel sore. But it's a good kind of sore. Cause I know it'll heal and now I get to have our little boy with me everywhere I go. Just like you do," Steve said pleasantly. "I feel better."

---

Bucky invaded Steve's space a little more and pulled him close. "You feel better? What's going on in your head?" he asked and pet Steve's hair. "I want to know what you're thinking, how you're feeling. I miss you."

---

Steve snuggled against Bucky's side and leaned into his hand as he pet his hair. "I've got a lot of stuff going on in my head. I keep looking for signs that Grant is okay and that God is looking over us."

---

"He's okay," Bucky assured his husband. "He is with my parents. They are taking care of him and just waiting for all of us to be able to see them again. I know it. You think I don't believe what you do but some of it makes sense. I don't know about whether there is only one God or whatever but I know there is a heaven and there is someone looking out for us and our family."

---

Steve gave a little smile and kissed Bucky's jaw. "I know you believe a little bit of the same stuff as I do," he said. "And... I'm getting more used to being home on my own. Sometimes it's even a little peaceful," he admitted.

---

Bucky gently pulled Steve down so the two of them were laying next to each other on the bed. "It's good to have some time to yourself. Maybe you can do some drawing and painting and just something for you."

---

"I'm still not in much of an art mood," Steve said as he gently scratched his nails over Bucky's back. "But I'm still doing a lot. I'm cleaning and training Diana and that's about it."

---

"Training Diana is good. But what are you cleaning?" Bucky asked. "The house is pretty much perfect as it is. The only room that needs work is Lilly's but she's not going to clean her room at all."

---

"I'm washing the outside of the house so there's no dirt on it. And I'm trying out a few new disinfectants for the bathroom," Steve said. "And I'm plotting out which plants we can use in the garden."

---
Bucky smiled and brought Steve's hand to his chest and held it close. "That sounds good. What sort of plants are we going to get? Flowers or vegetables or something like that?" He knew Steve liked flowers but he thought it would be good to try to grow some herbs or something too.

---

"I want flowers for the outside. But I've been taking a few trips to the library to scope out some books on growing vegetables. I'd love to be able to grow a few inside the house in containers or something. Potatoes don't need too much sunlight."

---

"Yeah, I agree," Bucky said and smiled at him warmly. "I think vegetables are a great idea and maybe like some rosemary or thyme or something. You love cooking with herbs and spices so that would be a good idea."

---

"That would be so amazing. What would be even better is if Raphael didn't dig in the pots all the time. He loves knocking stuff over." Steve was about to gush more about what he'd learned about growing herbs when there was loud commotion from downstairs.

"Bucky!" Becca shouted when the front door slammed open as a man made his way inside.

---

Bucky shot out of bed and went tearing down the stairs. "Becca! What's going on!" he shouted as he ran, nearly taking a tumble in his haste.

"There's a man in the house!" she shouted back and was followed by Diana howling wildly and Christopher screaming and crying.

---

There was a young man with sunken in eyes and unevenly cut hair looking a little strung out on something coming through the foyer to the living room with his eyes set on Christopher. Steve wished he had his gun. He wished his lungs weren't seizing on him like they were right now. Instead, he grabbed his baseball bat from the closet and held it tight. "What the hell are you doing in our home?"

The boy looked up to Steve and Bucky and pointed at them and said, "You queers took my son!"

---

Bucky wasn't having this shit. The second he tried to touch Christopher, Bucky ran and launched himself on top of the intruder and brought him to the ground in a struggle of fists and legs. Lilly was yelling from the sideline and Becca grabbed Christopher and Diana as quickly as she could and held them close.

---

The kid fought tooth and nail as Bucky tackled him. He was a damned good fighter and wrestled Bucky to the floor but only got two punches in before Steve swung the bat at his middle to get him off. He backed off of Bucky and fell back on the ground. "You fuckers don't get to keep him!" he snarled from his crumpled heap. "He's mine and Missy's!"
Bucky was coughing on the ground and clutching his chest as he tried to right himself. There was blood in his mouth and on his face and rage in his heart. "The fuck are you talking about?"

"I heard she gave our baby to two fags," the boy spit out and held his stomach as he watched Steve's bat closely.

Steve kept a close eye on the bastard as he hurried to help Bucky onto his feet and a good distance away from the boy. "He was never your baby," Steve hissed, tensing up. "Missy wanted us to have him. She trusted us! When was the last time you even saw her?"

"I got scared when she told me she was pregnant," the boy defended and seemed to calm down ever so slightly, ready to make his case. "But I'm ready now and I don't want my kid being raised by you cocksuckers so I want him back!"

Steve was so hurt and angry. He gripped the bat so tightly his knuckles went white. "Well, congratulations, you got your fucking wish that we can't raise him," he snarled. It was rare that Steve swore like that, especially with the girls and Christopher around, but he was enraged. "Missy died from an overdose and so did our son."

Bucky was crying silently and holding his kids together and trying not to get any blood on Becca who was pressed up right under his chin. The kid looked from Steve to Bucky then to Christopher. "I'm not dumb. I see him right there."

Steve placed himself between the intruder and his family. Christopher was beside himself and Diana was caught between licking Christopher's face and barking at the kid. "You can't tell the difference between an infant and a newborn? Christopher is close to a year old."

"Do I look like I spend a lot of time around children?" the boy asked incredulously but then stopped for a moment to think things through. "If that's not my son... then he really is gone?" His face drooped and he looked down at the floor for a second. "They died?" he asked softly and looked back up at Steve desperately. "What happened? She really overdosed?"

"They're gone. Dead. Never coming back," Steve said sternly, angrily. "You ran away from an amazing baby boy and his mother who needed you."

Bucky clenched his jaw and stared at the kid. He was with Steve. He was angry as hell too. But he also understood how the boy must be feeling. "You..." he started and let go of his family to address the boy. "How about you take a seat?" He gestured at the chair by the couch and then lightly pushed Becca towards the stairs, whispering for her to take Lilly and Christopher up to her room and wait there.

---

Steve got defensive when Bucky offered this asshole of a kid a seat after he came in, beat him up, and tried to take their son away. And that wasn't even touching his raging homophobia. "What the hell are you doing?" Steve hissed. "I don't want him here."

---

"Just..." Bucky pleaded with his eyes. "He just learned his ex-girlfriend and her child are dead. He probably blames himself for not being there for her when she needed him, just like I do." He nodded and glanced over at the kid who was still trying to decide whether to sit down or not. "What's your name, Kid?"

---

"The ex-girlfriend and child he abandoned," Steve reminded Bucky. "The child he only wanted because two big flaming queers wanted to give him a good home," he added in a hurt tone. He didn't stop Bucky because the kid wasn't worth the argument even though he felt worse and worse the longer this kid was around.

The boy shifted on his feet awkwardly. "Jason," he answered.

---

"Sit, Jason," Bucky said firmly in the best fatherly voice he could manage. "Steve, please get me a cold rag. I've got blood all over my face." He winced and sat back on the couch as Jason hesitantly sat in the chair and stared at him.

---

Jason sat, too afraid of Steve's bat to do otherwise. Steve went to the kitchen and grabbed a cold rag and a small pouch of ice to help the swelling. "When did she overdose?" Jason asked tentatively.

---

"About a month ago," Bucky answered and tried pulling Steve to sit next to him when he came back. "I don't know why. She overdosed and I was called into the hospital. The baby had already been dead for about a week. There was no way to save either of them."

---

Steve didn't sit down but he stood next to Bucky, bat still in hand because he didn't trust this kid. Jason looked pretty upset to find out that both of them were dead. It was shocking to him so it hadn't processed fully. "Did she say anything about me?"

---

Bucky looked at him and then up at Steve. He sighed and bit his lower lip for a second. "Never," he said softly. "I'm sorry. I asked about who the father was a couple times but Missy always shut the conversation down and I never wanted to pry too much about it."
He wiped at his eyes. "I guess I deserve that. As soon as she told me she was pregnant, I left. I moved to my cousin’s in Jersey so she wouldn't know where I was. Didn't even tell my parents and it worried them sick."

"You were gone this whole time?" Bucky asked and pulled the ice from his face. "How did you even find out about us? Or know where to find us and that we were the ones who were supposed to have the baby?"

"I snuck into her aunt's place while Barbara was at work and went into her room. I found her diary and read that she was giving it to you. I found your number and address as her emergency contact," he explained.

Bucky sighed and shook his head. "Wow, well that's really illegal. Don't do that again. You're going to get yourself arrested." He looked up at Steve who hadn't said a thing. "What, Jason, what did you hope would happen when you came here today?"

"I wanted to get my baby and find Missy and tell her we're going to raise it," Jason said. "I already dropped out of school. I would have gotten a job to buy it diapers and stuff."

"Oh boy," Bucky rubbed his hands over his face. "I'll tell you what you are going to do now. You're going to get back in school, and you're going to stop doing stupid shit and whatever drugs you're on right now or any other given day. And you're going to leave us alone."

Jason didn't look too jazzed to be told to go back to school. But he also wasn't going to try and piss on their doorstep again. He got up and slunk towards the door before asking, "Can you tell me where they're buried?"

Bucky considered for a second. "You can know where Missy is. But the baby was ours. He still is. And, I'm sorry, but you can't know where he is. You need to understand that." He found a piece of paper and wrote down where to find Missy. "You should talk to Missy's aunt about this too."

Steve may have gone nuts if Bucky would have given this kid Grant's location. Jason saw the look on Steve's face and didn't dare push. He took the paper and nodded. "Yeah... thanks..." he murmured and slunk out the door.

Bucky locked the door behind him and pushed on it for good measure. He watched Jason walk
Steve practically erupted. He never yelled at Bucky like this before. "He comes into our house, terrorizes your sisters, tries to steal our son, calls us queers, beats the shit out of you and you invite him to sit down? I don't care if he's young, he abandoned them! He tried to take Christopher! Our boy! And he gave you a bloody mouth and punched you in the face! He screamed disgusting slurs at us and you give him a chair next to you!"

Bucky closed his eyes and let the tears stream down his face. He held himself against the door, arms behind his back and head lowered in submission, and bit his lip to keep it from quivering as Steve yelled. Bucky's whole body shook but he didn't dare open his mouth and inevitably make the whole thing worse.

Steve was panting because he was so worked up and lord knows his lungs wouldn't do much for him nowadays. He felt awful that he made Bucky cry but he was so angry and upset over this kid barging into their home. "What the hell were you thinking?" he shouted.

Bucky shook his head and opened his eyes slowly. He kept himself as far from Steve as he could. He wasn't scared but he was nervous. He didn't want to mess up more and send Steve further into his shell than he already was lately. "He needed help," Bucky whispered.

"No, he doesn't. He's not sorry he left them! He doesn't want to go back to school! He only gave a shit about Grant because he didn't want us to have him. He was only going to go back to Missy because we are together. Not because he loves her! Not every deadbeat kid needs help, Bucky. Some of them will just take and take for as long as they can and they don't care who they hurt," he barked.

"He went to her house before knowing what happened to her or whether she was keeping the baby." Bucky corrected softly. "He cared enough to come back to find out what she was doing then he got mad when he found out the baby wasn't going to stay with her."

"How do you know why he came back? For all you know, he could've been looking to borrow money. Or he needed a place to crash cause his cousin kicked him out. He snuck into her room and read her diary to snoop on her," Steve said in a clipped tone. "He's a fucking homophobe who abandoned his kid before it was born. I swear if he asks her aunt where Grant's grave is and I catch him there I'll beat the ever-loving shit out of him."

Bucky choked on a sob and looked away. He was just trying to help. Jason looked like he was hurting. Even though he came in and fought with them and called them names, Bucky's paternal instincts kicked in and he just wanted to help him.

---

Steve was absolutely livid in a way that Bucky had never seen before. All the emptiness and depression Steve had felt bubbled up into an ugly wrath. Before he said anything that would make Bucky feel worse about himself or do any significant damage to their relationship, Steve ground out an angry, "Go check on the girls," before storming up to their room and slamming the door shut.

---

Bucky slid down the door and sat curled up in a ball and let himself just cry and take in shaky breaths. He knew why Steve was angry but he hoped that someone as giving and gentle as Steve would at least sort of understand. Instead, he just yelled and made Bucky feel like shit.

---

The second the door was slammed, Becca ran after Steve and started screaming at him and banging her hands on the door because he wasn't allowed to talk to her brother like he was. That led into another shouting match that had Christopher crying again despite Lilly attempting to make him feel better.

---

Bucky stayed put. It was his turn to shut down and he was going to. Steve had his time and now Bucky was going to hole himself up somewhere and grieve his son and be angry and be alone. After a minute or so of the shouting and crying coming from upstairs, Bucky yanked on his shoes and slipped out the door. He didn't know where he was headed yet but he was going somewhere.

---

Steve and Becca went at it pretty bad until he pushed her out of his room and went to grab Christopher and Diana. He locked himself in his and Bucky’s room with his crying son and held him until his screaming died down. The baby was miserable even with the puppy around trying to make things better. Becca made dinner that night because Steve was still angry with her. As time went on, he kept checking the clock, wondering and worrying where Bucky went off to.

---

Bucky walked for a while and eventually found himself at one of his old bars. He pulled up a stool and waited for the bartender who used to be a pretty good acquaintance of his. The two of them talked for a while and Bucky fought with himself several times before ordering a drink. The second he finished it, he hated himself and immediately paid and got the fuck out of there before he had any more. He couldn't do that to his family.

---

Steve layed in bed with Christopher until Bucky got home. The baby kept crying whenever he was put alone in the nursery, so Steve kept him company. When he heard the door open, he brought Christopher downstairs with him and he didn't know how, but he got the vibe that Bucky had gone to a bar.

---

Bucky saw Steve and his son and he didn't say a word. He just reached into his pocket, pulled out his six months sober chip and handed it to Steve before going to slump on the couch and stare at the wall, wanting nothing more than to erase the entire day away.

---

Steve's stomach sank when he was handed the chip. Christopher squirmed and reached for Bucky, asking for his pop pathetically. So Steve carried him to the couch and placed him next to Bucky. Christopher immediately crawled into Bucky's lap. "Are you drunk?" Steve asked.

---

"No." Bucky's voice was thick and heavy and low. He wanted to crawl into a cave and hide away for a while. He couldn't stand the expression of disbelief and frustration on Steve's face. "But I had one drink. One. I regretted it right after I had it and left so I wouldn't order any more. But one drink still counts and tomorrow I'm back to day one."

---

"I thought this was a sobriety chip. Not a 'haven't drank since this date' chip," he said. Steve sat down next to him, still mildly angry and hurt but he calmed down considerably over the hours.

---

Bucky nodded but didn't look at Steve. "Yes, it's also Alcoholic's Anonymous not 'Occasional drink when things go to shit' Anonymous." He sighed and glanced over at his husband as he held his son close. "For some people, the chip is for if they get drunk. For others, like myself, the promise we make to ourselves on our first day is no more alcohol at all, ever. So, no, I'm not drunk, but I did break the promise I made to myself and to all of you."

---

Steve put the chip in his pocket with a sigh and he reached out to hold Bucky's hand. "I know you'll be able to go another six months and longer without it, Buck," he said. "I'm sorry I yelled at you. I was really hurt."

---

Bucky shook his head and kept his eyes on Christopher who was tugging on his papa's hair and fidgeting. "It's okay," Bucky mumbled. "You had every right in the world to be mad." He didn't honestly believe it. He understood Steve's anger but he didn't think he needed to be so enraged with him. It did really hurt. Bucky wouldn't deny that. He was just hoping to help. For all he knew, that kid might change for the better and he had a part in aiding that.

---

Christopher kissed Bucky’s cheek and then tried to grab for another handful of hair. "Maybe we can do something tonight. To make you feel better..." Steve wasn't in the mood for sex or to get off. But he knew that Bucky was missing that physical connection so maybe Steve could try to give him a blowjob as an apology.

---

Bucky shrugged dismissively and held Christopher's hands, addressing him, "You, Little Bean, should be asleep right now. Why don't you let Daddy put you down for bed while Pops makes himself some tea and a snack." Bucky just felt terrible about everything and he didn't want to cause Steve any more trouble. He also was still pretty shaken up from being yelled at and he didn’t really want to do anything right now except eat and cry.

---

Christopher whined when Bucky held his hands. Steve picked their baby up and went to lay him down to sleep. Christopher was extra upset and took longer than usual to fall asleep. Steve came back down a half hour later to see what Bucky was doing.

---

Bucky was back on the couch with a mug of chamomile tea and half a sandwich. He was staring out the window at the nighttime street and the people milling about getting home too late. He could feel Steve watching him and he sighed. "I... I just thought I could help him. He seemed like a directionless kid with too much guilt in his heart and too many bad habits. He's just like me at his age."

---

"He's not just like you," Steve said. "When you had to take care of two kids, you stayed. You didn’t run away. You messed up along the way, but the important thing is that you were there." He sat down next to Bucky gingerly. "I've seen plenty of kids like him as a cop. They can't get help until they want to help themselves."

---

Bucky looked over at Steve next to him and adjusted so he was cuddled up against his side, finally giving in a little bit. "Well, maybe what I said will help him get ready to help himself. I just thought about what my father would have done in that situation and he would have calmed the kid down and had a firm talk."

---

Steve looked away. He felt so bad about yelling at Bucky. And he understood that if Bucky was trying to emulate his father, then he really should have tried to be more helpful during Bucky’s talk with Jason. "Well, maybe you did help him start to help himself. But I don't want to see him ever again." He usually was a forgiving and understanding person. But Jason must've been the exception for some reason.

---

"Me either," Bucky agreed. "And we don't have to. I highly doubt he ever wants to see us again. He was clearly not a fan of me and especially not you." He twined his fingers with Steve's and took a shallow breath. "And if you're worried about it, we can call Barbara and make sure she knows not to tell him where Grant is. I don't want him anywhere near our boy or my parents."

---

Steve seemed fixated on how much Jason rubbed him the wrong way. "Who the hell does he think he is, anyway? That he, a teenage drug addict, would make a better parent than us? Just cause we are gay?"

---

Bucky squeezed Steve tight for a moment and kissed his neck. "I'm sorry, Baby. I promise I was mad too. I was more scared for our kids than mad, though. I probably shouldn't have tackled him. My jaw hurts and I think my eye is bruising." He looked down at his hands that were cracked on the knuckles from punching. His one hand was still pretty mangled from when he punched a hole in the glass window at the hospital too.

"You do have a swollen lip," Steve pointed out. "Christopher sounded so scared. I haven't heard him cry like that before. He refused to be put in his crib earlier today and napped all evening with me."

Bucky winced and shook his head. "I don't want to hear him make those noises again. It hurt so bad. I didn't know what to do. I was so terrified when Becca yelled for us. I didn't know what was going to happen."

"I'm going to get a gun permit," Steve decided. "He was just a kid. But we're a somewhat openly gay couple with a growing family and I'm not taking any chances." He didn't want to shoot or kill anyone. But Steve was going to protect his family.

Bucky took a deep breath and nodded in resolution. "I figured you would want to do that. I understand. I know it'll help you feel more comfortable. The baseball bat won't necessarily always do the trick." He squeezed Steve's hand and took a drink of his tea. "We should go to sleep."

"I think I'm going to stay up for a bit," Steve said. "But I'll come to bed with you." He got up and headed for their bedroom with Bucky. "Becca and I fought pretty bad today. She's probably going to be pissed at me for a while."

"I heard you two for a bit," Bucky said quietly. "I couldn't listen to it for too long I had to get out of here. How bad did it get?" He knew that Becca could be very sharp and brutal when she was on the attack. Especially if her siblings weren't being treated the way she thought they should be.

"She told me I wasn't allowed to raise my voice at you so I told her she wasn't the boss of me and that she raised her voice at us all the time and she wasn't having it." Steve closed the door to their room lightly and sunk into the bed. "I respect that she was looking out for you, but I was in a mood."

Bucky stripped off his clothes to get in pajamas. "I understand. Just give her a day or so. I'll talk to her about it too. Jesus, it's just one thing after another around here sometimes. I just want a calm couple of weeks. Christmas is really soon and I want it to be normal and calm."

Steve laid his head down on the pillow. "We can't even spend a year without one of us in the hospital. I'm not holding hope for a normal and calm few weeks," he answered.

---

"I am," Bucky said and pulled on a pair of sweatpants to sleep in. "I have to believe that things are going to be better for us soon. I'll go crazy if I can't hold on to that hope." He considered putting on a shirt but then decided against it as he laid down in bed and wormed underneath the covers.

---

Steve stroked his fingers through Bucky's hair and kissed his forehead. "Well, then, I guess I'll have to hold on to hope if you're going to," he sighed. "Get some rest, Buck. Tomorrow will be a new day. Hopefully, a better day."

---

Bucky nodded and leaned in to give Steve a kiss and then rest his head against his chest. "I love you, Steve. I'm sorry about today," he said in a low gravelly whisper. He sighed and shut his eyes to go to sleep. He hoped tomorrow would be better.
Chapter Summary

Thanksgiving with Sam. Bucky isn't a fan.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

For Thanksgiving dinner, Steve had convinced Sam to spend the evening with them. This was after Sam was at first worried that he was encroaching on family time but Steve repeatedly told him he was welcome with them anytime. Steve had also gotten an adorable turkey outfit for Christopher that the baby kept trying to pull the tail off of. The real turkey was roasting when Sam came over and knocked on the door.

---

Bucky was trying his damnedest to get his sisters and Christopher ready for their guest to come over. He had met Sam previously at Grant’s funeral but he hadn’t spoken more than a handful of words to him. He considered this to be their first real introduction and he wanted it to go well since he knew how important of a friend and partner Sam was to Steve on the force.

When Steve went to get the door to bring Sam inside, Christopher reached for the pile of mashed potatoes and then deposited some directly on Bucky's shirt. Bucky griped and complained as he quickly slipped the shirt off and told Lilly to grab him another. The first impression Sam would get of him was Bucky standing shirtless over his son who had potatoes on his face and seemed to refuse to let his papa clean him up.

---

Sam walked into the kitchen and let out a bark of laughter when he saw Christopher making a mess and Bucky doing his best to keep everything under control. "Potato lover, huh? I see your kid takes after his Irish side."

---

Bucky sighed and looked up at Steve for help. "Hi, sorry, you're Sam. We met vaguely at the memorial service. This isn't really the way I hoped to introduce myself and our son.” Christopher gurgled in laughter happily and Lilly trotted back into the kitchen with a new shirt for Bucky.

---

"It's fine. Now I can see why Steve likes you so much," Sam joked lightly, gesturing at Bucky’s shirtlessness and smirking at Steve.

Steve patted Sam on the back and introduced everyone properly for the first time. "That's Lilly-Bucky's younger sister. Becca is setting the table. Baby Christopher is a mess, and Bucky there? He's my mess," he said in a loving tone.
Bucky quickly buttoned up the new shirt and gently shook his head at Steve. "I wasn't a mess today until your child decided he was going to have mashed potatoes before dinner."

Christopher looked up at Bucky and said, "Papa?" and then pointed to Sam in confusion.

---

"What's the matter, Kid, never saw a black guy before?" Sam teased.

Steve ruffled up Christopher's hair and cooed, "That's Sam, Sweetheart. Can you say ‘Sam’? Saaaaaaam," he tried to get Christopher to mimic him.

---

Bucky extended his hand to Sam to shake. Sam smiled back and then gestured at Bucky's shirt. "You buttoned it wrong," he said.

Bucky looked down and, sure enough, he skipped a button so they were all pulled up one after the other. "Dammit, Steve, I'll be back." He was just going to put on a goddamn sweater.

---

Sam and Steve chatted while Bucky changed. It was obvious that the two had a great chemistry together and they had been perfect partners when they were on patrol together. It made Steve miss it so much more again. When Bucky came back, the two of them were snickering over some inside joke from a stakeout with Natasha. "So what's on the dinner menu?" Sam asked.

---

Bucky adjusted Christopher's Thanksgiving outfit and sat down next to him. Becca and Lilly were waiting patiently for dinner to start and Bucky could tell Lilly was just dying for the turkey to get out of the oven. "Steve made turkey and other typical Thanksgiving food."

---

Steve took the turkey out and smiled when he saw Lilly's eyes get as wide as dinner plates. He carved it and had them all say grace before they were allowed to dig in. Sam kept sneaking scraps to Diana under the table whenever Steve wasn't looking and she happily nudged his legs and snuffled his knees for attention.

---

Bucky wanted Steve to enjoy his time with Sam as much as he could. He also wanted him to eat. So Bucky tasked himself with feeding Christopher before he got anything for himself. His son could normally feed himself now but the potatoes had already posed an issue so Bucky was going to feed those to him instead.

---

"So how's working at the record store?" Sam asked. "Steve tells me it's mostly just you, Natasha's boyfriend, and some stoners," he said. "I miss getting high every once in a while. Used to love toking it up on the weekends," he sighed.

---

Bucky chuckled and glanced at Steve. "Yeah, it's pretty good usually. Clint and I basically run everything and our buddy Tim fills in where he can and does everything else. The other kids just handle the cash and angry customers because they are good with high-tempered people."

---

"See, Steve? We should have a department of officers who get high and settle all the petty shit we deal with when we should be working on cases that matter. Oh crap, I forgot you don't like cursing in front of the kids," Sam said when he saw Steve's little look that he tried to hide.

---

Bucky looked from Steve to Sam. Bucky cursed in front of the kids constantly. And Steve didn't like it when he mentioned drug use at all but he didn't seem to mind that Sam was discussing it in jest. "Right..." Bucky said awkwardly and finally started eating his own food. "Are you seeing anyone, Sam?"

---

"Not at the moment. I'm still kind of new to the area and ever since this guy had to get booted from the force," Sam pointed a thumb at Steve, "I've been working extra. They don't make cops like they used to," he said with a sad sigh.

---

"Well, what are you into?" Bucky asked. "We've got a couple nice stoners of several varieties you can choose from at the record shop. And I also know a lot of regular customers who are single and looking. Might be able to work something out when you aren't too busy."

---

"Well, I don't think I would want to date a stoner," Sam said. "I'm looking for a real woman, you know? Someone who's a responsible adult who can call me on my crap and who loves to cook. Man, I miss my mom's cooking. That was the hardest thing about moving out of her house," Sam sighed.

---

Bucky looked over at Steve and took his hand. He probably felt the same way about leaving his mom's house too. "The only real sort of woman I know is Natasha and Clint is never giving her up," Bucky noticed Steve hadn't really eaten too much. It looked like he had taken a few bites of potatoes and maybe one piece of turkey. Bucky didn't want to vocalize his concern at the table so he just softly nudged Steve and shot a discreet glance at his plate.

---

Steve looked down at his plate and slowly picked at his food. He hadn't quite gone back to his normal appetite even after all these weeks. "That's okay. I'll wait forever for her," Sam said with a playful smirk.

---

"Don't say that around Clint. Those are fighting words," Bucky warned lightly and saw out of the corner of his eye as a tiny potato covered hand reached up and smacked him in the beard. "Oh, Jesus," Bucky murmured and looked over at his wildly giggling son.
Sam saw the hand going over towards Bucky and wondered if Bucky would notice it before it made contact. And then couldn't help but laugh again when he saw Steve's husband get smacked with more potatoes. "Oh, Buck," Steve sighed sympathetically as he leaned over to clean up his face. "Christopher, you're being fresh."

Bucky took the napkin from Steve and cleaned himself off. "Christopher, please behave," he asked his son softly and wiped his hands of potatoes. Bucky sort of felt like his son had decided that he was going to spend as much of his strength as he could to humiliate his pop while they had a guest over.

Christopher kept smiling and cooing at Bucky to get out of trouble but Steve shook his head in disapproval. "You want me to feed him for you, Buck? We should get his plate cleared as soon as possible. For your sake."

"I've got it," Bucky sighed and held Christopher's hands together as he worked on feeding him the last bits of his potatoes so he wouldn't have any left to toss. "I promise he's not usually like this," Bucky said to Sam. "He's just acting out to impress you. He demands a lot of attention."

"Well, he's impressed me," Sam said. "He's a stubborn, little thing. I can already see him eyeing your sister's food for ammunition now that his is all gone."

Bucky pushed Lilly's plate over a bit so Christopher wouldn't be able to get at it. "Steve and I think he's going to be a pitcher one day. He will end up in the major leagues before we know it. I don't know if either of his biological parents were athletic but I wouldn't be surprised."

"Well, they had to have been athletic. They literally ran from the law," Sam said. "Man, his dad was something. He broke the nose and arm of the officer that caught him."

Bucky shrugged and offered Christopher some green beans. "When I was younger and dumber, I was really good at running when the police showed up. Something about the threat of being caught that causes a person to become an Olympic long-distance sprinter."

"Thank god he didn't run when this officer showed up. I'm glad he didn't play hard to get," Steve said, kissing Bucky's cheek. Becca gave a look like she was personally offended at how bad that joke was.

"If anyone played hard to get, it was you," Bucky defended lightly and took Steve's hand. "I didn't think you were ever going to admit you really wanted me." He chuckled and then remembered they had company. He cleared his throat. "Sam, besides being an officer, what do you like to do?"

---

"I was shy and repressed," Steve defended lightly.

Sam looked up from his food and said, "I like going to baseball games and playing sports. I'm a big Red Sox fan."

---

"Red Sox?" Lilly spit out incredulously. "Where are you from? Because if you aren't actually from Boston then it makes no sense for you not to be a Yankees man."

Bucky blushed on behalf of his ill-mannered sister. "Lilly, don't be rude. Sam can like whatever team he wants to."

---

"I'm from D.C. and I'm a Boston fan," Sam said, smirking because it was funny how worked up Lilly got over her team. "It's okay. I've dealt with a lot ruder," Sam said with a little dismissive wave of his hand.

---

"Still," Bucky said quietly and eyed his sister so she would know to behave, please. He looked down at Christopher who had finally given up trying to make a mess and was instead yawning and tugging at his Thanksgiving outfit angrily. "Steve, I might need to put him down for a nap or an early bedtime."

---

Steve pouted. "Christopher, don't tug. It's a cute outfit," he said to his son as he scooped him up. Steve kissed his face a few times and held him to his chest. "I won't be long. I'll get him ready for bed and hope he sleeps through the night."

---

"Oh, you're taking him?" Bucky asked a little nervously. He didn't know if he wanted to be in charge of entertaining Sam while Steve was getting their son to sleep. But he figured he wouldn't argue if Steve wanted to tuck Christopher in.

---

"Yeah, you got to put him to bed last night. Don't worry, Sam doesn't bite," Steve said. He winked and carried their son over to his room, singing pleasantly to him.

Sam watched Steve head out and he gave Bucky an amused smile. "You guys got a cute kid."

---

"Thank you," Bucky said. "I love our son. I'm very grateful to have him. And thank you for coming to Grant's funeral as well. I know Steve was distant that day but I know he appreciated it and he does miss working with you."
“I know Steve was hurting that day, I didn't take offense. And we definitely miss him too.” Sam paused when he saw some sauce on the tips of Bucky's hair and a little piece of potato. "Oh, wow, Steve wasn't exaggerating," he said blankly. "Uh, you got a bit of food in your hair."

"Hmm?" Bucky asked and reached up to touch his hair. "Oh, uh, was Steve telling you about Christopher pulling on my hair or something?" Becca handed him a clean napkin and he worked on getting all the stuff out of his hair.

"Nah, he said you got food in your hair all the time when you ate," Sam said casually. "I thought he was always exaggerating when he talked about it." Becca gave Sam a little cursory look to try and get him to shut up.

"What?" Bucky scrunched up his eyebrows and cocked his head to the side. "That's weird. I don't do that. My son puts food in my hair sometimes." Bucky tried defending himself but Lilly got his attention and discreetly indicated that he also had food on the side of his beard still.

"I think you've got a bad case of denial, Bud," Sam said. "Your son threw potatoes at you, but I don't think he had his hands on the stuffing that made its way to your beard. That's why I'm clean-shaven. I don't have to deal with the surprise food."

Bucky scoffed quietly and wiped at his beard. "Uh-huh..." he said in a noncommittal tone. "Anyways..." He was annoyed. It wasn't his fault that his son made a mess of him. And it wasn't his fault that he got stuff in his beard. He didn't think Steve cared that he was just the slightest bit messy sometimes. Hell, Bucky and Steve both called him a dirty hippie all the time. Now Sam comes in and says Steve's been complaining about him?

"What? You think I'm a jerk now because I pointed out the food in your hair?" Sam challenged, seeing how Bucky immediately shut him down. "Come on, I didn't mean to make you embarrassed or anything."

"No... no, it's just that Steve's never mentioned it before. It's just a little weird," Bucky said and sighed. He hoped this wasn't like a pet peeve of Steve's that he just had been keeping to himself. But Bucky also didn't appreciate Steve discussing him with other people - especially about something they haven't even discussed themselves.

"What? I thought he talked to you about everything," Sam said.
Steve came in right then and stood awkwardly for a moment before sitting down, noticing that Becca and Lilly both looked to him with weird expressions. "What'd I miss?" Steve asked.

---

Bucky cleared his throat and readjusted in his seat. He absently pulled his hair up on his head and tied it back. "Uh, nothing." he said and forced a smile over at Steve. "Did Christopher go to sleep easy enough?"

---

Sam crossed his arms since his food was finished anyway and he wasn't going to accidentally incriminate Steve some more. Steve nodded and said quietly, "Yeah, he did. I think he was really happy to get out of that turkey outfit."

---

"It took you about ten minutes to get him into the damn thing to begin with," Bucky sighed. "Poor Little Bean just wanted pajamas." He smiled over at Steve so he would know he wasn't trying to poke fun.

---

"But he made such an adorable turkey, Bucky. Just wait until you see what I've made for him for Christmas," Steve said. "I've got a Santa suit for him and reindeer antlers for Diana."

---

Bucky shook his head. "My god, Steve. Keep it up. I want to be the favorite parent anyway." He chuckled and glanced over at his sisters who had been having a silent conversation together with their eyes since he and Sam had their misunderstanding.

---

"Hey, quit that. He's going to love having all the adorable pictures when he's older." Steve didn't understand how embarrassing it would be for a teenager to see those pictures. "So, who wants dessert?"

---

"What did you make?" Bucky asked and got up to help Steve clear away everyone's dinner plates so he could put the dessert plates out on the table. Becca couldn't help but fix the things Bucky placed haphazardly.

---

"I made apple pie, rice pudding, and some tiramisu," Steve said. "There's plenty to go around- but we got to save some for my mom, I'm bringing some by tomorrow for her."

---

Bucky finished handing everyone new plates and forks and waited for Steve to set the dishes down. He waited until everyone else had served themselves before he got himself some dessert. But now he was self-conscious and was trying to eat his food as carefully as he could so as not to make a mess.

---
Sam couldn't help but be a little amused as Bucky cautiously ate his food. When a little piece of piecrust fell in his beard, Sam covered his mouth but said nothing. "How is it?" Steve asked. "I added extra sugar."

"It's really good, Baby," Bucky promised and nodded his head. Lilly agreed wholeheartedly and Becca tried to get Bucky's attention so he would know that he had pie on his face. He could pull back his hair, but his beard was not safe.

"Something wrong?" Steve asked when he saw Becca making an odd motion.

She paused and then shook her head. "No," she answered. Sam was practically beside himself trying not to laugh at the scene unfolding in front of him.

Bucky got the hint and wiped off his beard again. That was it. He was shaving tonight. He was going back to baby-faced Bucky for a while. He sighed and put his hands in his lap. Bucky was just going to keep still and fairly quiet until Sam left so he would save himself any more frustration or embarrassment.

When dessert was done with, Steve pressed a little kiss to Bucky's cheek and cleaned up. He bustled about the kitchen, clearly happy to get to be so domestic. After Sam left, Steve went to Bucky's side and nudged him. "Isn't Sam great?" he asked.

"Uh-huh," Bucky said gently but not very meaningfully and pulled away to help Steve finish up the cleaning so they could get to relaxing sooner. Bucky wanted to shower and shave his goddamn beard. He even considered for a second cutting his hair but he could never do that.

Steve frowned, sensing that something was off by the way that Bucky was acting. So he walked up to him and hugged him from behind. "Hey, Love," he said softly. "Something wrong?"

"Nah, man," Bucky said in his hippie speak that he only used when something was actually wrong and he was doing a bad job hiding it. "I'm just pretty tired out. I need to take a shower."

"I know something's bothering you," Steve pointed out but he wasn't going to nag Bucky over it. Hopefully, he would come out with whatever it was and let him know.

"Right now, what's bothering me is how gross I feel. I was chasing Christopher around all day while you cooked and I've been a little sweaty," Bucky said and turned around to give Steve a hug and a kiss. "You need any more help? I'm going to shower if you don't."
"Alright," Steve gave in. "You can go shower, I'll come up once I'm all set." Steve cleaned up the kitchen and put all of the leftovers in containers, shuffling the girls off to bed before retiring to his room again.

---

Bucky showered himself off and shaved his beard so he was all skin on his face. He sighed and looked at himself in the mirror. He didn't look bad, just different. Maybe even a bit younger and cuter and less like the dirty hippie he was. He decided to give his hair just a short trim and he was about to make the first cut, a little shorter than usual, as Steve walked into the master bathroom.

---

Steve went to the bathroom to brush his teeth and looked a bit surprised when he saw Bucky with a bare face. "Hey, I liked that beard," he said softly. "And that's a bit short, don't you think? I thought you liked your hair long, Baby."

---

Bucky sighed and held out the scissors to Steve. "You do it," he said grumpily and sat on the closed toilet lid so Steve could cut his hair. He knew Steve liked his beard and his hair but he also didn't like his mess, apparently. Steve couldn't have it both ways and Bucky already shaved.

---

"Baby..." Steve said as he set the scissors aside. "Love, what's the matter?" Steve asked. "I know you don't want your hair cut that short. I've never seen it that short before."

---

Bucky looked up at Steve and clenched his jaw as he thought. Bucky was still wrapped in a towel from his shower and he adjusted it a bit just for something to do. "Just thought you might like it better if it wasn't so in the way."

---

"What? Bucky, that's crazy talk. I love your hair. And your beard. What would make you think that it was in the way?" Steve asked as he crossed his arms at him.

---

Bucky shook his head like Steve should know. "Because... I'm messy, I guess." He shrugged. "And I get stuff in my hair and my beard like food and stuff. I just thought you'd want me to clean up a little bit."

---

"I don't want you to cut your hair off because you're messy, Bucky," Steve said. He hadn't figured out that Sam had said something. "You have beautiful hair." Steve pet his fingers through it for emphasis.

---

Bucky watched Steve touch his hair gently and he leaned into the feeling. "But I know you hate when I get food in my hair. Sam said so." Bucky sort of felt like he was tattling on Sam. But Sam was sort of tattling on Steve, too, so he thought it was probably acceptable.

---

Steve blushed deeply when Bucky brought up that Sam said something. "I don't hate it," he said, but Steve was a terrible liar. "Look, alright. It bothers me, but not so much that I want you to cut your hair because of it."

---

"Why didn't you say something?" Bucky asked firmly and took Steve's hand. "You could have pointed it out forever ago and I could have been more careful about not making a mess of myself. You know I eat like a wolf, you said so on our first date."

---

"I didn't want you to feel bad," Steve said. "You acted so weird after I came back from tucking in our son, which, I guess, was because Sam told you that you were a messy eater. I never wanted to say anything but I didn't want to hurt your feelings."

---

Bucky gently pushed him out of the way so he could get up to get dressed. "Well, Sam was pretty entertained by the way I eat. Made him chuckle a few times, if you didn't notice." Bucky didn't like being the object of humor. He liked making his family laugh, but being laughed at was different. He hung his towel up to dry and strode naked across the room to get some pajamas on.

---

"Baby, Sam is a good guy. I'm sure he wasn't trying to be mean." Steve followed Bucky out and took his hand again. "Love, please. I'm sorry if I upset you by not telling you. I was just trying to avoid making you self-conscious."

---

"It's fine," Bucky mumbled and scratched at his crotch absently and then wondered if that was another thing he did that Steve didn't like. He wasn't like Steve. Steve was proper and put together and always looked nice and presentable. Bucky was the guy that parents warned their kids not to date – the crass inconsiderate slub with rocker hair and a strong disdain for authority. "Just tell me things that bother you. Tell me, not your friends. I don't like the thought of people watching how I do things and thinking, 'That bugs Steve. Bucky really does do it a lot. I wonder what Steve is thinking. Wow, that is annoying.'"

---

Steve sat on the edge of the bed and looked up at Bucky with a concerned pout. After a moment of consideration, he sighed and let his shoulders drop. "Alright... I'm sorry for not telling you, Buck."

---

Bucky stuffed his hands in his pajama pockets and laid down. "Anything else I do that you don't like?" he asked flatly and pulled the blankets up to his shoulder. "Also, I am sorry for shaving my beard without letting you know. I know you liked it a lot. It'll grow back, though."
Steve snuggled up to Bucky's side closely - much like how Diana would tuck her tail in and snuggle up to them if she was caught doing something wrong. "I can't think of anything else," he admitted. "Do I have any habits that bother you?"

"No, you're perfect," Bucky said genuinely but also sort of grumpily like he was mad he couldn't think of a pet peeve he had for Steve. "Anyway, I think we should try to sleep, okay? I am tired and my face is cold so I'm going to tuck in under this blanket."

Steve blushed at his answer and wrapped his arms securely around Bucky's waist. "Alright. Sleep well, Baby," Steve murmured softly. "I love you so much, alright?"

Bucky fell asleep wrapped up in his husband. Although, halfway into the night he woke up with a hard on that was demanding his attention. He may or may not have had very sexy dreams about Steve and since it had been about two and a half months since they did anything physical at all, he was feeling the need. But he also knew Steve didn't like it when he got off without him so it's not like he could jerk off while Steve slept. Bucky groaned and sat up in bed, ripping his shirt off. He was a little sweaty already. He needed to distract himself so he rolled off the bed and on to the floor and started doing push-ups.

After a few minutes, Steve made a small sound when his personal body heater suddenly wasn't there. He woke himself up from his slumber and tiredly rubbed at his eyes. When he saw Bucky doing push-ups on the floor, he blinked and asked, "What're you exercising for?"

Bucky huffed out breaths through each push-up and glanced over at Steve. "Distraction," he choked out and kept going. He wasn't the best at push-ups but he was already almost to a hundred and he was pretty damn proud of that.

Steve pulled the blankets closer around himself. "Distraction from what?" he asked in an incredibly tired voice. "Come back to bed, Love. It's cold."

"Distraction from this," Bucky said and tilted so he could point at his obvious erection comically tenting his pajama pants. Then he returned to the push-ups. "Got to just sweat it out for a bit."

"Oh," Steve said, sounding a bit surprised. After a long pause, he sighed and said in a whisper, "Just get off if you need to." Which was an uncharacteristic of Steve to be so casual about that and to allow Bucky to take care of himself.
Bucky glared at Steve in the dimly lit room and paused his push-ups. "You hate that, though," he said and stood back up, pressing his hands down on his cock so it wasn't distracting as they talked. "It's just been so long and I'm not good at going this long without sex. We've done this too many times before. With us in hospitals or injured or whatever."

---

Steve rubbed at his eyes again and turned onto his side. "I'm just going to have to live with it," he murmured. "I haven't been in the mood. So it isn't your fault that I'm not doing anything for you. So, I may as well let you take care of yourself."

---

Bucky wasn't so sure. Steve didn't sound like he actually wanted him to touch himself. It sounded more like he was exasperated with Bucky for being so horny sometimes. But, he didn't know if Steve was ever going to let him do this himself again or not and he wasn't sure when they were going to be intimate together again either. So he nodded, went to rummage in his nightstand for his pictures of Steve in compromising positions and then headed to the bathroom.

---

Steve felt sorry and useless for not being able to give Bucky what he wanted. He wished he could've faked being in the mood enough to be intimate. But that wouldn't have been fair to Bucky or himself. Ever since the fire, Steve didn't really feel so attractive anymore and losing his son ruined his mood entirely. By the time Bucky finished in the bathroom, Steve was asleep again.

---

Bucky tiptoed out of the bathroom and laid back down in bed. He didn't feel much better. He may have solved one problem but he didn't solve the bigger underlying issues they had. But he couldn't fix everything in one night. So he rolled to face Steve and pulled him in close to him. "I love you. I really do," he whispered as softly and warmly as he could and hoped it got into Steve's dreams. Steve automatically moved closer to Bucky in his sleep and made a tired noise in response.

---

When morning came, Steve was still snuggled up to Bucky. He was practically glued to his side. He blinked slowly awake and just stared at Bucky for a long moment. Smiling softly at his husband, Steve reached up and gently started to play with his hair.

---

Bucky felt something tangled in his hair and his mostly still asleep brain worried that Raphael or Diana had decided to mess with it. He woke up and found himself looking into Steve's eyes. "Hey, Baby," he said quietly and gave Steve a little squeeze.

---

Steve leaned forward and kissed Bucky's cheek. He took a deep breath and just decided to say what was on his mind. "I'm sorry that I can't be more for you, Buck. I know that we haven't been intimate for a long time... and I don't blame you if you're feeling frustrated."
Bucky sighed and shook his head. "I just... it's fine. I promise. And I've been good and haven't done anything even when I've really, really wanted to. But last night I just couldn't ignore it anymore. But it wasn't the same by myself. It's not that I just want to get fucked and get off. I want to be with you and melt into each other and find our release together as husbands."

---

"I know," Steve said. "I also know that I can't do that right now. I haven't felt aroused or felt much of anything for a while," Steve said. "I mean, I get out of breath if I go too quickly up the stairs. I don't want to have a coughing fit and need to take a break in the middle of sex."

---

Bucky sighed and tucked his head underneath Steve's chin so he could kiss his neck and hide away. "I'm sorry," he said softly. "I know you've been hurting and you've been frustrated and I probably haven't helped you at all. I've been too consumed in myself again."

---

"You haven't been consumed in yourself, Buck. You can't help how you feel just like how I can't help how I feel." Steve kissed the top of his head and hugged him. "I love you, Sweetheart."

---

"I love you, too," Bucky said and then pulled back to see Steve's face. "We're going to be all right... right?" he asked. "I mean, maybe not soon but eventually everything's got to be okay again, right?"

---

"I believe we will be okay," Steve said. "Time heals." He drew Bucky in for a slow, loving kiss before pulling back. "Do you want breakfast before you go to work, Love?"

---

Bucky shifted on the bed to lay back and stare at the ceiling. "I don't want to go to work. I want to stay here with you," he complained but eventually got up to get dressed. "But, yes, it'll be busy today and Tim is already stressing out about it."

---

"Everyone starting their Christmas shopping, huh?" Steve murmured as he got up and got dressed. "How's he doing, by the way? Has he worked things out with that guy he likes?"

---

"No," Bucky sighed in annoyance. "He keeps talking about him but isn't doing anything about it. I know he's been better about his drug use but he still will probably be deported." Bucky was just getting tired of hearing about it all the time. Clint just casually turned off his hearing aid whenever he was done listening. Bucky couldn't do that.

---

Steve gave Bucky a sympathetic look and kissed him before heading out of their room. "Maybe he can find a lesbian he can fake marry to get citizenship and then he could stay here."

---
"That's illegal, Steve." Bucky chuckled and went to the nursery to collect his son. Christopher was standing up in his crib and holding on to the railing with one hand and Bourbon the dog with the other hand. "Hello, sweet Little Bean. You slept very well through the night, didn't you?"

---

Christopher bounced on his feet excitedly when Bucky came over. "Papa! Hi!" he said happily. He reached up to be picked up and the second he was out of his crib, he squirmed to be put down to play.

---

Bucky kissed him a few times as they made their way downstairs before setting him down so he could run to the living room to play. "Okay, after breakfast, I'll need to leave. Please give your mom a hug for me when you see her today. Are you still planning on going to the cemetery? How's your tattoo feeling? It's been a few weeks. It should be healed."

---

Christopher went right to his blocks and babbled excitedly as he played. Diana sat next to Steve, patiently waiting for scraps as he cooked. "I think it's just about healed," Steve said. "It doesn't itch anymore and it stopped flaking." He brought their plates to the table and sat down.

---

Bucky glanced over at Christopher to make sure he was just going to stay put and play while he had breakfast. "I'm surprised he hasn't wanted food yet," Bucky mused and then sat down at the table. "You still happy that you decided to get it?"

---

"He'll make himself pretty darn hungry. I imagine he's got about five minutes before he comes in here whining for food," Steve said pleasantly. "Yes, I'm really happy I got the tattoo. I never would have thought I would want one."

---

"Good, I'm glad you like it." Bucky smiled and reached across the table for Steve's hand. "I think it's really wonderful. Now we both have reminders of him with us all the time."

---

Steve nodded. As if on cue, Christopher came tottering in, whining for food. Steve laughed and gave Bucky's hand a squeeze before pulling Christopher up into his high chair. "Are you hungry, Bean?"

---

Christopher signed for food and whined a little bit. He was getting bigger and smarter every day. He had a nice crop of hair on his head and he was starting to show specific mannerisms and tendencies. He was becoming a real little person and Bucky couldn't help but smile at his and Steve's little boy.

---

"Alright, you want some pancakes?" Steve got him some pancakes and cut them up into itty, bitty pieces for him. He set them on his plate and smiled as he ate. "He's so perfect," Steve sighed. "You know he tries to copy Diana sometimes by barking at her."

---

Bucky whined and looked up at Steve, "No! Really? I haven't seen that. I want to see that." He hated that sometimes he wasn't around for adorable or important moments in his son's life. "Please try to record that."

---

"Record him with the video camera we don't have?" Steve joked. He wanted to save up for a good one. Steve pulled Diana - who was getting really big - into his lap. "Diana, speak." It took a few times of Diana barking for Christopher to look up from his food and give a few quiet 'woof's back at her.

---

Bucky nearly choked on his food. "Oh my god!" he gasped and grinned at his son. "That was too fucking cute. Do it again." He tried woofing back to Christopher in hopes that he would do it again but he just giggled at his pops and mashed a piece of pancake into his face.

---

Steve smiled dumbly because their son was perfect and it was funny watching his husband bark at him. "He's so cute. Sometimes he and Diana will go back and forth for a few minutes. She loves playing with him." He kissed the top of Diana's head and set her back down.

---

Bucky got up from the table and kissed his son on his cheeks and gave him a tiny hug. Then he went to Steve and sat in his lap so he could give him several long kisses interrupted so Steve could breathe. "I have to leave. I don't want to but I have to," he said and sighed.

---

Steve kissed Bucky back gently and stroked his fingers through his hair. "We'll be here for you when you come back. I'll be sure to take plenty of pictures for you, Baby." He sighed and walked Bucky to the door. "I love you. I hope today is a good day. Please don’t forget that I love you."

---

Bucky nodded and gave Steve a kiss and a hug before heading out the door to go to work. He knew that eventually things would have to be okay with them again. But it was just so difficult to know when that would be. And Bucky was getting more and more dejected every day with worry that he and Steve may never go back to how they were.

Chapter End Notes

Also, Bucky's grumps with Sam will eventually ease. We wanted to portray an exaggerated version of how they are in the movies, more directly annoyed and more like Bucky has an unfounded dislike that he's sort of conjured up out of nothing for a bit.
A few weeks went by and Bucky was feeling pretty good in some areas and downright awful in others. This was now his fifth Christmas without his parents and his first without Grant. But it was also his first back in their old house and Christopher's first Christmas. Steve and Bucky took the day to just go spend as much time as they needed getting presents for their kids and whatever else they could want. Steve was in charge of picking out the right things and Bucky was in charge of making sure their son didn't try to run too far away in the store.

---

Steve didn't realize how hellish shopping for toys with a baby would be until he took Christopher out to get presents for Christmas. He giggled with glee as he made his pop chase him around the store. "I tried to tire him out before this, I swear," Steve said.

---

"It's fine," Bucky sighed as he brought Christopher back over to Steve and held him close. "He's just so excited by all the colors and things." Bucky held Christopher with one arm and moved him so he was zipped up inside his jacket with just his head sticking out. If anyone saw Bucky from the side and didn't see Christopher's little face pouting out of his chest, people might think Bucky was very peculiarly shaped.

---

Christopher huffed. "Papa. Papa." He tried to get his attention and he couldn't even point or sign to him because his arms were squished inside the jacket.

"Do you think we should get Lilly another baseball card binder?" Steve asked.

---

Bucky just kept holding Christopher in the jacket and occasionally looking down at him and kissing his head so he would know he wasn't ignoring him but still sort of ignoring him anyway. "Well, you usually help her sort through it when she decides to rearrange it. Is she out of room in the one she has?"

---

"She's got plenty of room, but this one is nicer. Maybe I should just get her replacement pages if she's attached to her old one, but needs to put her cards in pages that aren't ripped." He found a baseball mitt and asked, "Think she would ever want to have a catch?"

---

Bucky chuckled and said, "Yeah, go ahead and get her some baseball equipment. She's been antsy since soccer ended so maybe this will satiate her for a while." While Bucky talked, Christopher managed to wiggle one of his arms up so he was able to shove his hand against the underside of Bucky's chin where his beard was slowly growing back.

---

Steve tried out a few different mitts before settling on one. He tossed it in the cart and smiled as Christopher tried to show Bucky a teddy bear. "Papa," he huffed. "Burr," he said as he tried to say 'bear'.

---

"I see it, Bean," Bucky said and tried tucking his arm back into the jacket. "But you have Bourbon back at home." An elderly woman, who had clearly been listening in the whole time, looked up then in alarm thinking for a moment that Bucky let his child have alcohol. She must have decided against her initial speculation because she shook it off and returned to her business.

---

"Papa," Christopher continued to whine.

Steve snuck in a few toys into the cart for Christopher, including the bear when Christopher wasn't looking. "Do you have Becca’s Christmas list with you? We can hit the bookstore on the way back."

---

"Back pocket," Bucky said and twisted so Steve could see the neat blue envelope that Becca had sealed her book list in. She was very particular this year about what she wanted. Although, she was particular most years.

---

Steve took out the envelope and sneaky squeezed Bucky's ass while he did it. "She even wrote the product numbers on it. I don’t know whether to be impressed or offended that she thought we might get the wrong History of Iroquois Women Part 5 by Lois Lowell," Steve laughed.

---

Bucky scrunched up his face and stared at the list. "Wow, I didn't even know Becca had parts one through four. That's like a textbook, isn’t it? Is she just reading textbooks for fun now?" he asked with just the slightest edge of concern in his voice. She didn't ever go out with friends and she hardly spoke to her study group anymore. Sometimes Bucky worried about her.

---

"Yeah, she's been saving up money to buy these expensive books. I've been paying her to babysit when I want to nap or to go out grocery shopping whenever I'm not feeling well," he explained. "She bought most of the earlier volumes." He shrugged. "Alright, I guess it's time to check out."

---

Bucky kept Christopher zipped up in his jacket when they went back out to the street. It was cold and the toddler was not a fan of the harsh wind. "Steve, you might think I'm overreacting or something but I'm pretty concerned that Becca doesn't have any friends."
Christopher snuggled close to Bucky once they were outside, finally content to be in his jacket. "I don't think you're overreacting," Steve agreed. "But she won't listen if I try to talk to her about it. But she doesn't seem sad right now."

Bucky watched the streams of other cold New Yorkers walking past them and wondered what troubles they all had. "I just know she hasn't gone out with friends since the incident at the party with Nicole. She doesn't talk to anyone much and she hasn't mentioned going to her study group for about three months."

"Maybe you should try talking to her. Or we can try and find some clubs for people that like the same things she does so she could make friends there," Steve suggested.

"Yeah, I probably should talk to her," Bucky decided and held open the door to the bookstore for Steve. "I just don't want to point it out and make her upset or something. You know? She's always had a hard time with friends."

"Do you think that she stopped talking to her friends because of the party?" Steve asked. They were stopped by a few women on their way into the store who told Bucky how adorable his son was. Steve preened proudly as well but didn't say anything so they wouldn't get bothered for being a gay couple with a son.

Bucky awkwardly thanked the women that blocked his way and even let one touch Christopher's head to say 'hello' but then he quickly moved them along because he didn't want a stranger touching his son too much. "I wouldn't be surprised. I know she got in a huge fight with Nicole about abandoning her during the party."

They went into the bookstore and Christopher poked his head out a bit more once they were in the warmth. "She still has had enough time to make new friends. Either she doesn't want to or she's having a hard time doing it."

"I'll talk to her," Bucky said with strong resolve. "If I can help, I want to try. I don't want her being lonely all the time. Constantly reading or doing puzzles with me and Lilly probably isn't too good for her. She needs social interaction."

"I agree," Steve said. "I was kind of hoping that she would make more friends." He pulled a few of the books and tucked them under his arm. "She still hasn't totally forgiven me for yelling at you. I don't want to sound mean but maybe she has a hard time making friends cause she has a hard time letting go when people mess up."

---

"That seems like an accurate assumption." Bucky nodded. "Maybe you should talk to her too," he suggested and found one of the books on Becca's list and handed it to Steve. "You know, to see if she's still harboring anger at you for it."

---

"I'd rather not poke the bear but if you want me to talk to her, I will," Steve said. They were able to find all but one book, which Steve asked one of the shop attendants to call them about once it was in stock again.

---

"I just think it's important for you two to talk out your issues. That's what you'll be doing with our kids and Becca is a good place to start," Bucky urged him gently and readjusted Christopher in his jacket. Christopher was a lot calmer in the bookstore. There weren't as many things that he wanted.

---

Steve paid and put the books in his backpack. "Can I have an easier teenager to practice on? Maybe one less opinionated?" Steve joked. He tapped Christopher's nose lightly and then led them out of the store.

---

"Nope, you've got the ones you've got," Bucky chuckled back at him. "But don't stress too much. If you work on keeping calm when you talk to her then she will be calm too. She mirrors the intensity of whoever she is talking with."

---

"I guess that explains why she was screaming at me the last time," Steve said. "I hope it goes well. I hate it when she thinks she can lord something over me."

When they got home, the girls were playing cards in the living room. "What do you got there?" Lilly asked with interest.

---

Bucky let Christopher down and he immediately ran to Diana. "Christmas is in a week and a half, Lilly. You can't know what we bought," he said firmly and took all the stuff from Steve to go hide it in their room.

---

"It's not like I believe in Santa anymore. Can't I just have it already?" she whined pathetically to Steve. "There's a message on the machine for you guys, by the way."

---

Bucky returned from hiding the presents to find Steve in the kitchen listening in on their messages. Bucky was distracted by his hunger and the tiny hands of Christopher pulling on his pant leg to lift him up. He wanted a snack as well and if Papa was eating then he was eating too.
The message was from Father Frank. His call sounded pretty urgent. "Buck, do you mind if I go down to the church? Father Frank wants to see one of us and I figured you'd want to stay home and play with Christopher."

"No, Love, of course not," Bucky answered with a warm smile and handed Christopher a carrot. "Want me to make dinner? How long will you be?" He munched a carrot as well and watched his son work on gnawing at the end of his.

"I don't think I should be too long," Steve said. He didn't think Bucky should be in charge of dinner because his cooking wasn't exactly the best, but he didn't want to insult. "How about pasta, if you wouldn't mind?" Pasta was easy to make.

"I'm on it," Bucky promised and pulled Steve in for a kiss before he went. Bucky was curious what was going on and he really hoped nothing bad had happened at the shelter. Steve wouldn't be able to handle it if there was another problem to add to his list.

Steve took a train to the church and popped in quickly to the shelter to check in on everyone and see if they needed anything. Thankfully with Christmas around the corner, donations had been more plentiful than normal. He went to the Father's office to see what was going on. "Good evening, Father. I got your message as soon as I got home."

"Steve, my boy," Father Frank smiled and got up to greet him. "Thank you for coming down so quickly. We found something outside about an hour ago that I thought you might want to take a look at. Follow me to the bunks, please."

Steve’s worried expression melted away a little when he saw the Father's smile. He followed. "Hopefully it's a good thing? I know the hate messages stopped when we kept washing them off the sides of the building."

"Yes, those have indeed stopped, thank the good Lord," Father Frank said cheerily and opened the door to the bunks. There were a couple of shelter volunteers and guests lingering over one of the beds and staring down.

Steve's curiosity increased when he saw everyone gathered around one bed. They saw him and the Father and stepped back a little to give them space and Steve's breath caught in his throat. "Oh my god," he gasped. There was a tiny little baby girl swaddled carefully in a blanket and wearing plain pink pajamas that looked like they were straight from the hospital. She was looking around at everyone and blinking a little like she intended to fall asleep. Steve rushed forward and brought her into his arms because she looked so lonely without anyone holding her. "Why?" He turned to Father Frank. He couldn't imagine someone abandoning such a helpless little thing.

---

The baby hiccupped and looked up into Steve's eyes, pleading with him to not let her go. Father Frank sighed and gave him a small smile. "No one but God can know for sure why she was brought here today. We can't know what was going through the mind of her mother or father when the decision was made to give her up. But whoever brought her here knew that she would be protected by us and given a good home somehow. Bringing a baby to a church or shelter like ours is much better than abandoning them elsewhere."

---

She was so small - not as small as Grant - but definitely smaller than the baby Steve was used to holding. He saw the look on her face and he was quick to kiss her little forehead and tuck her closer to his chest. "Was there a note? Or anything?" Steve asked.

---

Father Frank shook his head and reached into his pocket. "This is all she had," he said and held out his hand to Steve. The baby had been dropped off with a small coin from a foreign country and the blanket she was wrapped in now.

---

Steve took the coin and decided he would research with Becca to see where it was from. He rocked her gently in his arms. Maybe this was his sign. Maybe God was bringing a baby to him - to their church, to his shelter - to let him know they could have another baby. "I... need to talk to Bucky. But, can I bring her home tonight? So she has someone to take care of her?"

---

"I wouldn't want it any other way, Son," Father Frank said and squeezed Steve's shoulder. "I know you and your husband have a lot going on at the moment so I understand if she is not in your future. But I thought I would bring you to her before I sought another family."

---

"Thank you. Thank you so much," Steve said. He gave him a hug, careful not to squish the baby. She looked like she had just been born that day, or a few days ago at most. He held her inside his jacket the whole way home, talking softly to her to keep her calm. When he got back home, Diana noticed something different right away and started sniffing at him. He went up to their room and called for Bucky to come over so he wouldn't freak the girls out with their guest.

---

Bucky had fallen asleep on the couch with Christopher on top of him. Becca had to shake him to get him awake. "Steve's yelling for you!" Lilly shouted in his ear.

"Fuck, loud, okay, I'm up," Bucky grumbled and set his son on the ground to play so he could go trudge up the stairs to Steve.
Steve tried to lay the baby down but as soon as he did, she began to tear up, so he held her to his chest again. His back was to the door when it opened. "Buck," he said softly. "I need you to stay calm, alright? I just... I just brought her here because Father Frank says she was left outside the church and she needed a home to stay in," he said as he turned around to show him the little newborn in his arms.

---

Bucky was taken aback and he shook his head in surprise. "What... what?" he asked and looked from Steve to the baby. "How... how are you coming home with a second random baby? It's like déjà vu from when you brought Christopher home. How do you do that?" he asked in awe and took a few steps towards Steve and the baby. "Oh my god, look how tiny she is."

---

The baby looked up at Bucky with big eyes as she snuggled deeper into Steve's arms. "I don't know. I didn't try to." He could feel himself tearing up. "I think this is our sign, Buck," he said softly. "The one I was looking for. And... I know she's not Grant. No one can ever be. But maybe our family can be a little bigger now."

---

"You want to keep her?" Bucky asked quietly and let the baby grip on to his index finger tightly and stare up at him in wonderment and curiosity. "We just lost a child, Steve. They just put his headstone in last week."

---

"I know," Steve said, ducking his head a bit. "But I think God brought her to us. You asked me how we would know what would be a sign and, you know, here it is. She was brought to our church, out of all the churches in the city, just before Christmas. She's his gift to us."

---

Bucky locked eyes with Steve for a long moment and took deep breaths. He wanted to say yes. He wanted to tell Steve that they could keep her. But part of him worried that was unfair to Grant. Would it be like they were forgetting or replacing his loss with another baby? "Can I have a bit to think it over?" he whispered.

---

Steve nodded his head. "Yeah, yeah, of course, Bucky." The newborn turned in Steve's arms and her little hand flailed out because she didn't have much control over herself yet. She still held onto Bucky's finger tightly with her other hand, though. "Would you like to hold her?" Steve asked.

---

Bucky smiled weakly and nodded, sitting down on their bed so he could hold her more securely. He held her up for a moment to take a good look at her and then he brought her to his chest and she just sort of felt like she belonged right there. Bucky couldn't help the small whine that escaped him and the tears brimming his eyes. She was perfect and so beautiful and so attentive and he felt himself falling for her already. "She does look like a Sarah," Bucky said quietly and glanced over to Steve.
Steve sat next to him and wrapped his arms securely around his husband. "I still miss Grant so much, Bucky. I visit him every day. I'll miss him forever," Steve said. "But she's our gift. Our sign. I know she is," he said. He wiped Bucky's tears away and kissed him lightly.

---

Bucky leaned into Steve and watched as the baby blinked slowly and eventually fell asleep. They were quiet together like that for a while, Bucky just thinking to himself about the whole thing. He would never forget Grant but he did want more children and he didn't know when they would have an opportunity again. And Steve had been so hung up on needing a sign and if he felt like this was his sign then Bucky needed to get on board and fast because it was already settled before Steve even got home. Bucky nodded and held Steve's gaze. "I guess I'll be adding to my tattoo soon."

---

Steve watched the little baby doze off feeling safe and comfortable in Bucky's arms. He laid his head on his shoulder and watched her for a little while. When Bucky agreed to keep her, Steve felt the tears fall freely down his face. He felt a rush of emotion - joy, relief, sadness, and loss. He wanted Grant here. He wanted his baby boy here with his new sister. He felt relieved because, at long last, the lingering doubt of being punished by God was lifted. And now, they had a little girl. He hugged Bucky tightly and kissed his face over and over again.

---

Bucky giggled under the onslaught of kisses and love and he checked on the baby who was awake again and looking up at them like she was surprised they dared wake her up so quickly. "Baby, Love, Steve," Bucky said happily and got him to stop kissing him and pay attention. "I don't have another crib yet. I'm really busy at work this week with Christmas coming up. And we don't have any clothes for her." He sighed. "But we have a baby girl. Oh my god, I can't wait to see your mother's face when you tell her what this baby's name is."

---

Steve eased up and gave both Bucky and Sarah an apologetic look. "I still have Christopher's smaller clothes. They'll be a bit big, but it's better than nothing," he said. "I can go shopping tomorrow. Christ, this is going to be a trip carrying two babies while shopping. During Christmas time, no less." He shook his head. "My mom is going to lose it. She'll be so happy. Man, the girls are going to freak out too."

---

Bucky grinned and passed Baby Sarah off to Steve. "Let's go show them," he said and rubbed his thumb on Steve's cheek. "I don't know how they will react but it's not like we can hide up here forever." He gave the baby a gentle kiss on her head and said, "Okay, Sarah May, are you ready to meet your aunts and your big brother?"

---

Steve took the baby back and smiled as she gave a big yawn. He carried her downstairs to find Diana sitting at the bottom just waiting for their return. She let out a single bark that startled the baby and she started to cry. "The hell is that?" Lilly asked as she came running to see what was going on.

---

Bucky quickly hoisted the dog up to keep her from causing too much ruckus and he stared over at Lilly who was yelling for Becca and looking at the bundle in Steve's arms. Becca came around with Christopher on her hip, "What? Why are you all so loud?" she asked and then stopped when she saw the new baby.

---

Diana licked the baby's cheek, which only stopped her crying because the baby didn't know what the dog just did. Steve smiled nervously at the two of them. "This is Sarah May," Steve said. "She was left at the church earlier today, so... she's going to be part of our family now."

---

"You're kidding," Becca said and set Christopher down. He whined and went to pull on Bucky's pant leg. He didn't like not being the center of attention and right now his little sister had all eyes on her.

Bucky put Diana down and grabbed his son to give him a kiss before showing him Sarah. "Look, Bean, this is your baby sister."

---

"I'm not kidding, Becca," Steve said. "She's ours."

Christopher looked over at the little bundle that dared to be in his dad's arms. "Dada," Christopher said in a determined tone before reaching out for Steve to hold him.

"Let your pop hold you, Bean," Steve said patiently. He kissed Christopher's cheek. "I'm holding your sister."

---

Christopher whined and looked to Bucky for help. Sarah yawned again and stuck her tongue out for a second absently. He was still unsure how they were going to pull this off but he knew they were going to figure it out somehow. "Steve, let's call your mom and have her come over. We can surprise her."

---

Steve's heart melted when he saw their daughter yawn again. He knew it would take time for Christopher to adjust to not being the only child anymore, but Steve was confident that he would learn to love his sister. "Alright," he said excitedly. "She's going to be so happy, Bucky." He started to dial the phone and when his mom picked up, he invited her for dinner and she agreed to come by.

---

Bucky held Baby Sarah as Steve remade the dinner that he had been working on earlier. He tried to be sneaky about it but Bucky understood that Steve's mom wouldn't like what Bucky made. He wasn't offended. He knew he couldn't cook. And he sure as hell wasn't complaining that he got to hold their baby girl while Steve was occupied.

---

With Bucky sitting down with the baby, Christopher decided to climb into his pop's lap and lay heavily on top of him to look at the distraction in Bucky's arms. He didn't seem to mind the baby too much so long as he got attention, too. When Steve's mom arrived, Steve had just set the plates out and he ushered Bucky aside so she wouldn't see him right away.

---

Bucky held onto Baby Sarah tightly and watched her sleep. Christopher got distracted when his nana came so he padded over to her quickly so she would give him attention before anyone else saying, “Nana! Nana!”

---

"Hello, my sweet boy! Aw, did you miss your nana?" she asked as she scooped him up to give him plenty of kisses. She gave her son a hug and walked over to greet Bucky as well. But then she saw the little bundle in his arms and immediately started to cry.

---

Bucky gently traded Sarah Christopher for the baby and offered her a seat at the table. "Steve brought her home today. Someone left her at the shelter and Father Frank called to have Steve come see her."

---

"Papa. Nana," Christopher huffed when he had to share his Nana with this little intruder too. "Oh, aren't you so precious," she said softly. "And you're keeping her? I have another grandchild?"

---

"Yeah, you have yet another grandchild." Bucky smiled and grabbed Steve's hand and leaned into him. "Do you want to know her name?" he asked Sarah and looked to Steve so he could tell his mom what their new baby girl was called.

---

Steve squeezed Bucky's hand and kissed his cheek. Sarah nodded and the baby another kiss. "We named her Sarah May," Steve said with a hint of pride in his voice.

Sarah's lower lip quivered. "You didn't!" she gasped, feeling so blessed.

---

Bucky grinned at her and adjusted Christopher on his chest. "I think it's a perfect name for her," he said softly and knelt down on the ground with his son so he could still be with his nana but not in her way.

---

Sarah held the little baby closer. "She does look like a Sarah," she agreed. "I don't know what I did to deserve such an amazing son-in-law. But I thank God every day that Steve found you."

---

Bucky didn't know what to say so he just blushed a little and looked over at Steve and said softly, "Thank you. I'm beyond grateful that Steve found me too. I don't know where I would be without him. He's given me so much."
Steve wrapped his arms around Bucky and nuzzled him affectionately. It was like this baby lifted the dark clouds that hung over him. Baby Sarah stirred and started to fuss and whine. "Crap," Steve gasped. "We don't have baby formula."

---

"Shit," Bucky winced. "Okay, you stay here and I'll run to get some. We need more diapers too." He hurriedly pulled on his shoes and his jacket and then looked around for his wallet. "Babe, where's my wallet?"

---

Steve looked around, frowning. "Do you think you may have left it at one of the stores? I don’t remember you having it out though. Maybe it’s at the record shop.”

---

Bucky went to the living room to look and found it sticking out the top of Christopher's toy box. "Steve," Bucky called and came back to the kitchen. "Your son was hiding it in his toys."

---

Steve laughed. "Christopher, why did you take your pop's wallet?" he scolded lightly. Christopher immediately started to blabber on at him in a defensive tone. "Why is he always my son when he's up to no good, huh?" Steve joked at Bucky.

---

Bucky sighed and tucked his wallet into his jacket pocket. "Because, he just is," he said and gave Steve a quick kiss. "Okay, I'll be back. Baby Sarah needs to eat. We can figure out the crib later."

---

Steve lifted Christopher up and carried him around. His mom managed to soothe the baby by rocking her gently and humming. Steve suspected that she had a new favorite grandchild even if she wouldn't ever admit to it. "Don't be too long or else we'll eat without you," Steve said.

---

"You can eat, that's fine," Bucky said quickly and scampered off to the store. He picked up formula and diapers and a couple pajamas and outfits. He didn't quite know what to do about a crib so he figured the baby might just have to sleep in their room for a few days until he could make a new one.

---

When Bucky was getting rung up, the cashier laughed. "You looked frazzled,” the kid said and eyed Bucky’s fidgeting hands and messy hair.

---

"New baby," Bucky gasped softly and helped them bag up his purchases. "We weren't ready at all. She was kind of a surprise and now I have no crib and we didn't have formula and she needs clothes," he rambled for a minute or so and then handed his cash to the kid.

---
The cashier gave Bucky change and slipped a condom in with it. "So the next one isn't so much of a surprise," he joked with a friendly smile.

---

"Oh, uh," Bucky cleared his throat and nodded. "Thanks." He took his bags and hurried back as fast as he could. When he got there, he passed the formula to Steve and then unpacked the clothes in the nursery and pocketed the condom for the time being. He'd throw it out later.

---

Steve started making the formula, managing to do it with Christopher held against his hip. He filled the bottle and then gave it back to Bucky. "Ma, can you let Bucky feed her? I think he needs some bonding time with his daughter," Steve said.

---

Sarah, albeit slightly reluctantly, gave the baby to Bucky and started helping Becca make sure everything was ready for them all to eat dinner. Bucky sat down and fed the fussy newborn as everyone else gathered around to eat. "There you go, Baby Sarah. That's better. Who knows how long you've gone without eating."

---

Sarah May guzzled down the formula hungrily when the bottle was offered to her. "Oh yeah," Steve said as he pulled out the foreign coin. "Father Frank said she had this with her. I think it's from the country her parents came from, maybe," he said.

---

"Let me see that," Becca said and held out her hand for it. "Huh," she mused and stared at it. "Well, it's definitely middle European. Probably not Soviet. Maybe Yugoslavia."

Lilly scoffed and spoke with her mouth full, "How would you even know it's Yugoslavian? There's about twenty different countries in middle Europe. It could be any of those."

---

"Hey, that's a start," Steve said. "I don't think I even know where Yugoslavia is. Maybe I can go to the library and look up books on currency in countries or something."

---

"I'll go with you!" Becca said excitedly. It was like a treasure hunt to her now. She wanted to uncover the answer and be like an academic detective.

Bucky grinned at Steve and his sister. "I wonder why she was left with that coin. Do you think it's like a ritual or is it more like a family heirloom or like a religious thing. Hell, maybe they just hoped someone would think it was incentive for keeping her?"

---

Steve smiled, always a sucker to have Becca on board with something. "I don’t know. Maybe once we verify what country it's from, we can look into books that talk about the culture and stuff."
"Father Frank didn't see who dropped her off?" Bucky asked, hoping to get a little bit more information. "And she didn't have anything else with her?" With Christopher, they knew exactly who his parents were and they knew his birthdate and all that. With Sarah May, they might not learn anything about her family.

---

"No, he didn't. He says that she only had her blanket and that coin," Steve said. Sarah May squirmed because she needed to be burped. "So your guess is as good as mine. I guess it's a shame we didn't install those security cameras. But we decided not to cause the vandalism stopped."

---

Bucky adjusted the baby and patted her back lightly. "Well, I guess we can just start with the coin then." Christopher, who was being fed by Steve, decided that not enough people were paying attention to him at once so he started banging his fists on the table and whining loudly.

---

"Hey," Steve scolded, tapping Christopher's fists before putting the fork down so he could hold him with both hands. "None of that, son. Tell me what's wrong," he said, trying to get his son to use what little words he had.

---

"No!" Christopher shouted and wiggled a little bit before pointing to Bucky and saying, "Papa, no!" Clearly, it was going to take some time for him to be alright with sharing his parents. Sarah May seemed to get upset because of the yelling and she started to cry and bunch her face up in her distress.

---

Steve looked to his mom for help, but she shrugged. She hadn’t dealt with any of this because Steve was an only child. "Christopher," Steve admonished. "Baby, you can't yell. Shhh, quiet voice." The boy kept pointing at Bucky angrily. "She's your family now, Bean, we love her. Can you love her, Sweetheart?" He kissed Christopher's cheek and carried him over. Steve held his arms so he couldn’t hit her. "Give her a kiss." Christopher looked at Steve like he was crazy for asking him to kiss this crying child.

---

It took a few seconds of Christopher staring down at Sarah May before she decided to stop crying. She quieted down and slowly reached a hand up towards him and made a soft gurgle in the back of her throat in curiosity. "There we go," Bucky sighed in relief. "There we are, Sweet Pea. It's just your brother. No need to be afraid."

---

Christopher gave her an unimpressed look at first. Then he put his hands on her face just because. Sarah May scrunched up her face and Christopher immediately pulled his hands back and looked up at Bucky to see what he was supposed to do.

---

Bucky giggled softly as he watched the interaction. "See, Bean, she just wants to know you too."
She's just as confused and curious as you are right now," Bucky spoke quietly to his son and looked up at Steve a few times. "She's going to love you so much, Christopher."

---

"You're being such a good boy," Steve praised and kissed the top of Christopher's head. Steve gave Bucky such a happy smile as their children interacted. Then Sarah May sneezed which made Christopher jump in his spot, which had Steve roaring with laughter.

---

Sarah May seemed surprised by her own sneeze and looked up at Bucky like he could explain what had just happened. Bucky grabbed a napkin and wiped her nose. "Steve, do you want to hold her for a while? It's getting late and Christopher needs a bath."

---

"Yeah," he said. Steve took Sarah May in one arm and passed Christopher off with the other. "Does your dada love you? Yes, he does," Steve cooed at her as Bucky headed upstairs.

---

After a long time, Bucky came back downstairs with wet hair and a severely grumpy face. Christopher had decided to be as difficult as possible for his bath and wouldn't let Bucky wash him at all for a long time. Eventually, he worked it out, but still.

---

Sarah May had been an absolute angel the whole time and didn't mind being passed around between her dad, her nana, and her aunts. When Bucky came back downstairs, Steve gave him an apologetic smile. "At least you won't feel so bad going to work now," he joked.

---

Bucky sighed and gave his daughter a kiss and then Steve. "When I went to grab his bath duck from the water, he grabbed my hair and pulled it into the tub." He sat down with a frown and looked to Steve. "I want brownies."

---

"I don't like that kind of behavior from him," Steve said. "I thought we taught him better than that." Christopher was still very young, though. "Want me to bake brownies for you, Love?"

---

"He's just acting out for attention. Becca did the same thing as a kid when Lilly came around." Bucky yawned again and slumped his head on the table. "You don't have to bake me anything. I'm just complaining. We should try to sleep soon."

---

Steve passed Baby Sarah off to his mom, who seemed to refuse to leave until she had to because she loved her little granddaughter so much. "Then I'll bake something for you tomorrow for when you get home," Steve said. "Let's get Sarah May some sort of sleeping arrangement and get some rest while we can."
"I was thinking of putting her in Christopher's car seat in our room. That way she is near us but safely in her own space," Bucky offered. He wasn't sure what Steve wanted to do but it was the only thing he could think of at the moment.

Steve nodded. "A car seat will have to do for tonight, I think. Maybe if we at least get her a crib mattress, we can put bumpers up so she can't escape," he said.

Bucky nodded. "I'm planning on buying lumber tomorrow after work and then spending a few nights over at Clint's working on a new crib while you're asleep. And it won't bug Clint because he can't hear me making noise in his cellar anyway."

Steve nodded but couldn't help but let out a little whine. "But you won't spend too many nights away, right? I want to cuddle you." The look on Steve's eyes suggested that he wanted to do a little more than just cuddle.

"I have to make her a crib," Bucky said, not understanding the underlying implications in Steve's tone. As far as he was concerned, he wasn't expecting sex until all his kids were grown up and out of the house, and maybe even then. "I smashed Grant's crib so it's not like we can have her in that one until she had her own. It won't take me long."

Steve made a small face when Bucky didn't understand what he meant by cuddling. His mom saw the look in his eyes and tried not to laugh. "Yeah," he said. "I know you're going to make her an amazing crib, Baby." He turned to his mom. "Would you like to stay the night? It's a bit too late for you to walk home on your own."

"Oh, I may as well," Sarah said happily and gave them both a small smile. "But, I'll just stay on the couch tonight. No need to give up your bed." She didn't want to intrude on their private time if that's what was going to happen tonight. "I'll be sure to make breakfast for Bucky before he leaves for work."

Steve hugged his mom. "Love you, Ma." He nudged Bucky and carried Sarah May upstairs and tucked her into Christopher's car seat. Steve covered the baby in a second blanket to make sure she didn't get cold during the night. He forgot that he had left his house keys in Bucky's jacket so he went to take them out and was confused when he pulled out a condom with them.

Bucky stripped down and took a very fast shower. He was tired as hell but he also felt gross from having frantically run around the city all day. He was in the middle of drying off when Steve came back up to their room.

---

Steve made sure the girls and his mom were nowhere to be seen - and little Sarah May wouldn't know what a condom was anyway - before surveying the condom’s dark blue packaging. Steve unwrapped it and stuck it over the top of his head like a swimming cap. He walked into the room like nothing was going on and waited for Bucky to notice.

---

Bucky glanced into their room when Steve came back and he saw him sitting on the bed casually with the condom on his head. "What in the hell?" Bucky chuckled and put his towel on a hook to go try to pry the condom from Steve's head. "So you found that in my pocket? I meant to throw it out."

---

Steve backed his head away so Bucky wouldn't be able to take it off. "I left my house keys with you," he said. "I found this when I was getting them from your jacket." He dodged Bucky's hand again. "So are you seeing another man?" he joked. "Or did you decide you wanted to last a little longer next time or something?"

---

Bucky grabbed Steve by the shoulder firmly and pulled it off. There was a light red ring on Steve's skin from where it was stretched around his head. "The boy at the cash register asked why I was running around with my head cut off. I told him there was a surprise baby and he gave me this and told me it was so the next one wouldn't be a surprise. I didn’t have the hear to tell him that my husband and I don’t use condoms."

---

Steve was grinning dumbly when Bucky finally got the condom off but he had to cover his mouth to stifle his laughter. "Sorry I can't give you any planned babies," he said. "I hide my pregnancy really well."

---

"Oh no, I noticed you getting a little bigger in the middle but I never thought it was a baby," Bucky joked back and lifted Steve's shirt to look at his perfectly cut abs. "Fuck, I can't even joke about that because you've got no fat on your body anywhere."

---

Steve put his hands on Bucky's waist and pulled him forward so he was laying on top. "Now I've got fat on my body," he teased with an obnoxious smirk.

---

"See, but that's not funny because it's true," Bucky said with a pout. He was still naked from his shower and his hair was wet and sticking to his face. He willed himself not to get too excited because he had a feeling Steve would give him a few kisses and roll him off so they could sleep. And Bucky really didn't want to have to take care of his own erection again.
"You're not fat. But I wouldn’t care if you were." Steve slid a hand down Bucky's back slowly and when it got to his ass, he gave it a firm squeeze. He looked into Bucky's eyes with the biggest 'fuck me' expression he could muster in hopes that he got the hint.

---

A warm rush went through Bucky's body from his chest to his cock. His gut clenched and his face heated up and he knew he must have looked desperate because his eyes fluttered back in his head and he let out a choked little whine. "Remember when you thought I was gaining weight when I was buying pants a size small to show off my ass?"

---

"I remember," Steve purred. He rolled his hips slowly against Bucky's as he pressed slow, hot kisses over his neck. "It did get me to look at your ass," he admitted.

---

Bucky gasped and bit his lip. He leaned in closer and sucked on Steve's neck for a few seconds then pulled back. "Sorry, I got carried away," he apologized and brushed Steve's hair back. "I just miss you and you're so sexy and warm and perfect and I want to be with you again. I want to feel you."

---

Steve let out a little moan and tilted his head back. Steve was hard and his dick was pressing up into Bucky desperately. He sort of thought that would have been Bucky’s clue that Steve wanted him too. "Do you want to be on top tonight? Or do you want me? Fuck, I don't care how we do this, Buck, I just want you."

---

Bucky breathed deeply a few times. He was all the sudden intensely overwhelmed. "Are we..." he started with wide hopeful eyes and with his hips grinding his cock down against Steve's. "We're doing this?" he asked. He wanted to make sure he was actually hearing Steve correctly and they were actually going to make love again.

---

Steve cupped the sides of Bucky's face and kissed him slowly. "Yes," he breathed out. "Yes, Baby, I want you. I'm sorry it took so long, but I want you so bad." He tangled his fingers in Bucky's hair and gave a little tug because he knew he liked that.

---

Bucky let out a low moan and felt his face blushing up even more. "Please, Steve, please," he whispered and shut his eyes. "Please, I need your cock. I want you inside me, please. It's been so long. I need you so bad. I've missed you. Please. Fuck me."

---

Steve shifted their positions and pinned Bucky back down on the bed. He bit and sucked marks all over his neck and collarbone while he took his own clothes off. "Gonna give you-" he had to pause to breathe. "-everything you want."
Bucky nodded and let his mouth just hang loosely open as Steve went. "I love you," he said and felt a lump forming in his throat and tears brimming on his eyes. Steve was back. He was with him again. They were going to be together again and Bucky finally felt like Steve had snapped back and reconnected with him. "God, I love you so much, Steve."

---

Steve gently wiped the tears from his eyes. "Shh, shh, it's okay, Beautiful," he whispered. Steve decided to take his time to practically worship Bucky's body. He worked down his torso, kissing him everywhere and littering his entire body with bites. He sucked marks on the insides of his thighs and when Bucky was aching for it, he grabbed the lube and coated his fingers with it so he could push one inside.

---

Bucky couldn't help but cry silently the entire time Steve worked down his body. He was so overwhelmed with emotion and stimulation. He was beyond elated to have Steve on him again. "I love you," he whispered when he felt Steve's finger ease into him. "I missed you."

---

Steve gently worked his finger inside Bucky's ass and stretched him slowly. He pushed a second one inside once he knew Bucky was ready for it. "I missed you too, Buck," he said softly, kissing the inside of his thigh. "I'm so sorry I didn't pay attention to you like you needed."

---

"You're here now," Bucky breathed and let his hand find Steve's head so he could gently brush his fingers through his hair. "You're here now, Baby. You love me? Tell me how much you love me, please. I need to hear it."

---

"I love you," Steve breathed out. "I love you with all my heart, Baby. I think about you every moment of the day and miss you when you're gone." He pushed a third finger into him and looked up at him. "And I can't imagine life without you."

---

Bucky whimpered and stared down at Steve. "I need you. I need your cock. Please, I want you inside me now," he whispered softly and gently but urgently. "Make love to me. Kiss me, come inside me. Let me feel it. Let me feel you."

---

Steve moved up and claimed Bucky's lips in a slow kiss. He guided his dick into Bucky's ass and moaned at how amazing he felt. "You're perfect," he breathed out. "You're my perfect husband."

---

Bucky gasped loudly when he got Steve's dick seating all the way inside him. He whimpered and his body gave a needy shudder. "Finally," he whined and gripped on to Steve's arms. "It's been so long." He was so happy. Steve was going to make love to him again and he felt amazing. He didn't care if Steve needed to take breaks to breathe. He was going to have to be used to that now for the rest of their lives. He just never wanted this feeling to end.
Steve couldn't go too fast without needing a breather. He rolled his hips steadily into Bucky's ass over and over, spreading him open with his dick and giving it to him slow and deep. "You feel amazing, Love," he gasped out. He kissed down his neck slowly.

Bucky let himself cry again and just feel every point of connection between his body and Steve's. He didn't even care about his own release he just wanted to be intimate with Steve. He was vaguely aware that he was hard but it didn't occur to him to do anything about it. He was so focused on Steve's beautiful face and Steve's gentle, meaningful thrusts.

Steve rocked into him slowly and took Bucky's dick into his hand. He stroked it with every thrust and claimed his mouth again in a kiss. "You're perfect," he said breathlessly. "And mine. You're mine forever, Buck."

"I'm yours," Bucky agreed and dug his fingers into Steve's sides tightly. "I'm yours forever. I'll love you forever. I'll be here for you forever. Whenever you need me, for whatever you need me for, I'll be here for you."

Steve gasped and worked his hips a little faster into his husband. He knew he wasn't going to last long because they hadn't done this in so long and he was a little over eager. "Buck, I'm so close-" he came hard inside of his husband, pushing further up and shaking as he rocked against Bucky through his orgasm.

Bucky clenched his ass down around Steve's dick to milk his come from him. Bucky came seconds later with a happy bubble of surprised and relieved laughter that ended in a choked kiss when Steve's lips found his.

Steve whined softly when Bucky's ass clenched down on him. "Fuck," he swore. Once Bucky was finished coming, he broke the kiss and leaned down to lick the come off of Bucky's chest.

When he was done, Bucky pulled Steve down on top of him and held him close. "Thank you, thank you, Baby. God, thank you," he said quickly and kissed Steve's face and neck over and over again. "I love you. That was perfect. Thank you."

Steve snuggled up against Bucky and hugged him close. "I love you too, sweetheart. I promise I won't wait that long to make love to you the next time," he said.
Bucky sighed and closed his eyes. "How about we give it about an hour then? We have some catching up to do," he offered and slipped his hand with Steve's and brought it to his lips to give it a kiss.

---

Steve laughed. "We should probably wait until Sarah May needs a diaper change and wait until after we put her back to sleep," he said. "We aren't going to get a full night's sleep for a while."

---

"Is that a promise that we can have sex again after she goes back to sleep?" Bucky asked and glanced over at the car seat where Sarah May was curled up tightly in the blankets and sleeping soundly. He got the feeling she was going to be a calmer, easier baby than Christopher. He wasn't sure why but that's what he thought.

---

Steve nodded. "Yeah," he said with a happy smile. He followed Bucky's gaze to the sleeping baby. "She's our beautiful, little daughter, Bucky," he sighed dreamily. "I don't think my mom likes that she has to share her," he chuckled.

---

"Your mother is welcome to visit her every day if she wants," Bucky said happily. "So long as she doesn't run off with her," he added for good measure. Sarah May started to squirm and make upset noises then. Bucky got up and pulled on Steve's pajama pants so he could go to her and make sure she was okay.

---

"Do you still want to ask if she wants to move in with us?" Steve asked and sat up. The baby needed a diaper change and she was also upset that she woke herself up because of it.

---

Bucky took care of the diaper and made sure she was clean enough that she didn't need a bath yet. "If we can think of a good way to convert part of the house into another bedroom for her, I think it would be a good idea to ask her. I don't know if she would even want that but I'd like to give her the option. I think you would like having her here too and I know the girls would." He got a clean diaper on the baby and left her pajamas off for a bit. He knew how important it was for babies to have skin to skin contact with their parents so he laid her on his chest and gently sat down next to Steve.

---

Sarah May whined and let out little, pathetic cries until she was cleaned up and had her diaper changed. Once she was held, she calmed down and pressed her cheek against Bucky's chest. Steve watched her and smiled. "She's so little," Steve said. "She really loves you holding her."

---

"She's so precious," Bucky agreed softly and stared into her huge brown eyes. "I hope you and Becca find out where her biological parents were from. I want to be able to learn about the country and make sure she knows those parts of her life."
The baby looked up at Bucky's face curiously and looked like she was trying to understand what he was saying. "I hope so too," Steve said. "Maybe we could even learn a few words of their language or something." Steve stared at Bucky, unable to help himself from wondering if they would’ve kept her if they had Grant. Would there be two little newborns lying on Bucky's chest right now?

Bucky kissed her soft dark hair and nuzzled his cheek on her head. "I love you, little one," he whispered to her and then looked to Steve with a warm smile. "I'm really happy we have her. I wish all our children were here but I'm grateful for the two who are. And we won't ever forget Grant and I'm going to make sure our kids know about him."

Sarah May yawned and her little tongue poked out just a little as she closed her eyes and tried to sleep. Any time Bucky moved, she made an unhappy sound to make him stay. "I'm happy we have her, too," Steve said. "Father Frank will be so happy to hear she has a home now."

"You know," Bucky said quietly so he wouldn't disturb the baby's sleep, "When Becca was born, she was really, really tiny. My father was so worried that she was sick. He was convinced that something was wrong. And my mother kept telling him that she was fine and he needed to trust her on it. But he wasn't sure because he was used to me as a baby. I was an average baby and was healthy and everything and a good weight. But Becca was so small and he was scared. But Becca was fine. But then when Lilly was born a little over two years later, she was huge. Huge. And my father was worried she was too big and had some sort of disease. He was always worried about something with the babies. Something was always scaring him."

Steve smiled fondly as he listened to Bucky talk about them as children. "He worried because he loved you guys," Steve said fondly. "And in his defense, Becca and Lilly are aliens, I'm sure of it," he joked.

"I think if my sisters are aliens that makes me an alien too," Bucky joked and took Steve's hand. "But, yeah, Dad was always really nervous about us getting hurt or sick when we were young. He used to tie a balloon string around Lilly's wrist when we went to stores so if she ran off he could just follow the balloon."

"I may have to steal that idea from him," Steve laughed. "Christopher has a one-track mind and I can see him going wild once he knows I'm distracted and he gets faster on his feet."

Bucky chuckled. "Yeah, it was effective. He would sometimes yell at the nearest store clerk to stop the orange balloon. And then I'd have to hold Lilly as tight as I could while he checked out so she didn't run off into the street."
"I love how she always was the wild child. I wonder if ours will be the same - Christopher being the chaotic but loving oldest sibling and Sarah May being the quiet type," Steve wondered.

"Sarah May is already striking me as the quiet one," Bucky said and looked down at the little baby girl again. "But I do think Christopher will be the loud attention-seeking child." He sighed and nuzzled close to Steve. "What do you think our other kids will be like? How many will we have? Where will they come from?"

Sarah May balled up her little fist and rested it in front of her face. "I don’t know... I think seven kids is a nice number," Steve said. "Wouldn't it be nice to have twins?" he asked. "I would love that. Maybe they'd be from someone who knows us and don't want to raise kids, but wants their kids to have a good home."

"Ooh, twins!" Bucky smiled at the thought. "That would be perfect." He thought for a second and just stared at Steve, perfectly content in that moment. "You do know that now we need to think of more names. We have three kids and we've used up six names."

"What if we named a girl Rebecca Lilly?" Steve asked, only half joking. "Or maybe we can leave it as a surprise. There's a patron saint for every day of the year. Whatever day we have our next kid is the name we give him or her."

"What if we get like the patron saint of sleeping in too late and our next daughter is called like ‘Snorah’ or something?" Bucky joked back. "But it's a pretty good idea. We can leave that as an option."

"That's not how it works," Steve laughed. "They're bible names like ‘Mary’ or ‘Joseph’ or ‘John’. And if we get a kid that's the opposite gender we can do the other gender version of that name," he said.

"Sure," Bucky said, still thinking he was pretty funny. "Although, ‘Norah’ is a pretty nice name too. How do you feel about that as an option? We are having a lot of kids so we are going to need a lot of choices."

"I think it's a pretty name," Steve agreed. "We need about a dozen names for the kids we have left. By the way, I kind of like always using Sarah's middle name. ‘Sarah May’ is real pretty, you know?"
"Me too, I love it. ‘Sarah May’,” Bucky repeatedly happily. "And it distinguishes between the Saras. I was just going to call her ‘Baby Sarah’ but that won't work once she is older. So ‘Sarah May’ it is."

---

"'Baby Sarah’ is still adorable, though. Little baby Sarah May,” Steve said in a loving voice. He hugged his husband and daughter gently. "She will always be my baby, though."

---

"I guess we won't have to worry about who is a daddy's boy or momma's boy because they only have daddy's," Bucky said and got up slowly to take his daughter back to the car seat to sleep. "I was always such a daddy's boy."

---

Sarah May stirred at first but once she was tucked in, she seemed to be fine with her sleeping arrangement. "I know you were," Steve chuckled. "I can tell by the way you talk about him."

---

"Steve, I wish you could have known him," Bucky smiled and laid back down. "I'll never be near as good a father as he was. He was so smart and kind and calm and loving and he always knew what to do and what to say."

---

"You should give yourself more credit. You're an amazing father already," Steve said. "One of these days, our kids are going to look up to you like you do to him." He kissed Bucky gently. "I wish I got to meet him, too."

---

Bucky nuzzled close into Steve and kissed his neck and his cheek and his lips. "He would be so proud of us," Bucky said and wrapped an arm around Steve's middle and rested a hand on his ass. "I can't wait to see him again."

---

Steve purred at the kisses and pressed himself up against Bucky. "I know, Baby. But you got to take the long road there, got it?" He slowly moved his hand up his torso.

---

Bucky sighed and gave Steve another warm, wet kiss. "Are you ready to go again? How do you want to do it this time? I don't care. I just want to make love again, please," he said and pushed Steve over a little so he was on his back.

---

"Mmm, you're already stretched," Steve purred. "And I don't think I'm ready to be sore while chasing our baby around all day," Steve said. "How about you ride me? So I get a nice view?"
Bucky glanced back to make sure Sarah May was asleep. "Yes, I'll ride you," he said eagerly and worked the pajama pants back off. He then straddled Steve and started grinding down against him to get him hard again. "I knew you had to have missed my ass. I wasn't sure when it would be but I knew you'd eventually have to get back inside me."

---

Bucky was so fucking sexy when he took what he wanted. Steve gripped his hips when Bucky started to grind on him. "Fuck," he swore softly. "I did miss it. Maybe I wanna stare at it while you ride me. I don't know whether I want to see that more now."

---

"Better decide quick because I'm about to get on you. You just got to tell me which way you want me to be," Bucky said and spread his cheeks apart so he could feel the slide of Steve's cock gently between them.

---

Steve was getting hard quickly. "Let me have your back to me," Steve said. "I want to watch your gorgeous ass the whole time, Bucky." He grabbed Bucky's ass firmly and gave it a good squeeze. "And tomorrow you'll wear your tight jeans, right?"

---

"Baby, I'll wear whatever you want me to," Bucky said and gave him another kiss before turning around so Steve could see his ass. "Since I can't see you, you have to talk to me the whole time," he said and held Steve's dick firmly in his hand as he sat down all the way.

---

Steve let out a low groan as Bucky sat on his cock. He instinctively rolled his hips up and he dragged his nails lightly down Bucky's back. "You look so good like this, baby," Steve purred. "You have no idea."

---

Bucky hummed happily and worked himself on Steve's cock. He wondered for a minute if Steve wanted him to ride him like this because he was worried about his lungs. He knew it was going to change things now but he hoped that they could work out what to do together.

---

"God, I wish you could see yourself right now," Steve moaned. "You look so good all spread for me." He reached around so he could stroke Bucky's cock slowly as he rode him.

---

Bucky whined and pressed himself against Steve as best as he could before lifting back up and slamming his ass back down. "Tell me what you need, Baby," he said pleasantly and looked back at Steve. "Tell me what to do."

---

"Go faster," Steve gasped out. "Say my name. I need to hear you, Sweetheart." Steve dragged his nails down Bucky's back as he rode him.

---

Bucky nodded and bounced faster and faster every minute or so on Steve's dick and let out a string of soft but desperate, "Steve, Steve, Steve, Steve," each one getting higher and more strained as he neared his second release of the night. They really hadn't been going for long but they both were ready to come again.

---

Steve grabbed Bucky's hips and pulled him down harder every time Bucky came down on him. He rolled his hips up into him and gasped softly at how great Bucky's ass felt. "I'm so close, Baby. Don't stop, Buck. I need you-

---

The second Steve stopped talking, Bucky came hard in long spurts out across the bed. He had to cover his mouth so he didn't make too much noise. But he also didn't stop riding Steve and made sure he kept up with him so he could bring him to orgasm as well.

---

Steve dug his nails into Bucky's hips, leaving ten little marks in his skin. "Oh, Bucky!" he moaned loudly. He shuddered as he came deep in his ass. Sarah May had woken up at some point and was staring with her big, brown eyes at a colorful picture on the wall from her spot in the car seat.

---

"Fuck!" Bucky swore and quickly pulled off of Steve and covered himself up. "Goddamn it. She's awake," he whispered and looked to Steve for help.

---

Steve laid back and closed his eyes blissfully after he came. But when Bucky said that Sarah was awake, he quickly covered Bucky up and grabbed his underwear so he could be decent. "Don't worry, Buck, she doesn't know," Steve said even though he felt bad. He walked over and watched her as she pointed to the picture for a moment. "Hey, Love, you can't sleep?"

---

Bucky wrapped the blanket around him tightly and scooted off the bed to go clean himself up. He was dripping Steve's come down his legs and was pretty damn sweaty. When he got back, he pulled on pajamas again and laid back in bed to wait for Steve to get Sarah May back to sleep.

---

Sarah May made quiet noises up at Steve, who cooed and sung to her until she drifted back off. Once she was asleep, Steve went to Bucky's side and wrapped his arms around him. "How're you feeling, Baby?"

---

"So good, you have no idea," Bucky said and nuzzled into Steve. "I'm so in love with you it's amazing," he added and gave Steve a few short kisses. He was a little worried that the exertion was a bit much on his lungs.

---

Steve was breathing in short, little breaths but seemed to have a good handle on it so far. "I'm so glad I was able to make you feel better. You deserve the whole world."

---

"You are my world," Bucky said with a smile. He knew it was cheesy but he really felt that way and Steve needed to know that. Steve needed to know that, even though they had gone a while without being intimate, it's not like Bucky was angry about it. He was mostly concerned for Steve the entire time and missing his husband. Not just mad that he hadn't been able to get off.

---

Steve felt his heart swell happily. He kissed Bucky slowly and then laid his head down on the pillow. "I don't know how I'm going to let you go off to work when all I want to do is lay with you all day."

---

"You say that all the time," Bucky said with a chuckle. "But you always do alright when I get back." He snuggled up closer to him and yawned. "If you felt like having morning sex before I go to work I won't be opposed. You can try to see how far you can get before I wake up," he offered and yawned again.

---

"Well, it's still true. I would spend all my waking moments with you if I could," Steve said. He gave Bucky's ass a little squeeze. "If I wake up before you, I'll make tomorrow morning worth your while."

---

Bucky nodded and hummed happily. He looked to make sure Sarah May didn't need him then he buried his face in Steve's chest and fell asleep. He had really good dreams about Steve and him together that night. Everything was okay again for just a little while in that moment.
Steve woke Bucky up with another round of sex. They were able to cuddle for a while before Sarah May woke up, soon followed by Christopher. When Bucky got to work, Clint noticed that he was walking with a bit of pep in his step. "Got laid?"

---

"Three times, motherfucker!" Bucky shouted triumphantly, winning the attention of a startled Tim and a group of teens off by The Rolling Stones records. "God, Clint, it was awesome," Bucky said and flopped down in the chair by the cash register.

---

Clint laughed and tossed an inventory sheet over to Bucky. "Three times? Christ, when did you have time to sleep? I'm shocked you showed up on time."

---

"I was woken up by round three so I wouldn't miss work," Bucky informed him proudly and glossed over the inventory sheet for a second. "Jesus, it had been so long. I was ready to go again almost immediately after we finished the first time. I know I've been complaining about it almost as much as Tim has been complaining lately."

---

"I'm not going to lie, it was killing me having you complaining so often about your husband not giving it to you..." Clint said. "So Steve is feeling better finally?"

---

"You complain about Natasha, too, so don't think you're exempt," Bucky said and started sifting through boxes by his feet to make sure all the new shipment was in. "But, yeah, we had a bit a miracle happen yesterday and it just sort of clicked Steve back into place."

---

"I don't complain as much as you do. I've not had a dry spell with Natasha like you had with Steve," he said. Clint paused and then looked at him with interest. "What miracle is that?"

---

"Oh, uh, we got a baby girl," Bucky said with a shrug like it was no big deal and then shot Clint a big grin.

Tim stopped what he was doing and looked over at Bucky with wide eyes. "What? How?"

---

Clint’s jaw dropped and he had to make sure he read Bucky's lips right. "You're joking! Oh my god!" he said excitedly. "That's amazing. How? What's her name? Is she a cutie?"
Bucky smiled and giggled a little at Clint and Tim's excitement. "Her name is Sarah May. She is beautiful and perfect. She was dropped off at the church and Father Frank called Steve to come see her. And he brought her home and convinced me to keep her and now she is ours."

---

"I'm totally coming over to meet her and play with her as soon as I can," Clint said.

Tim looked happy as all hell for Bucky. "Look at you getting your own brood of children," he laughed. "Kids are the best, aren't they?"

---

"Yeah," Bucky agreed and gave Tim a nudge. He knew he had been doing at least a little better lately now that his divorce had been finalized for a bit and he had partial custody of his kids. All to do was to find him someone to be with. "You both are welcome to come over to see her sometime. I'm sure Christopher misses your faces. I know oddly enough he misses Natasha. He saw a picture of her in her police uniform and started clapping and pointing."

---

"In all fairness, I want to clap and point too whenever I see Natasha in uniform. She's sexy all the time, but exceptionally so in uniform," Clint said. "Let's all have dinner at your place this weekend. I'm sure Steve won't mind the company."

---

"I know what you mean," Bucky said with a wistful sigh. "Steve's uniform was so gorgeous on him. And he has a great ass and I think the precinct purposefully gave him pants that squeezed his butt too much. They knew what kind of assets he was bringing to the job."

---

"I'm sure if we ask Natasha nicely enough she can find a uniform they're about to throw away so Steve can still dress up for you sometimes," Clint offered.

---

"Yes, please," Bucky whined and pulled his hair back. "Although, he may not want to wear it since he isn't an officer anymore. It may just make him upset." He shook it off. "Anyway, yes, Steve would love the company. You both are invited."

---

"Yeah, Steve is a real sensitive sort like that," Clint said, not in a condescending tone, though. He knew Steve was emotional and wore his heart on his sleeve and that was part of what made him such a nice person. "So any other news outside of sex and babies?"

---

"Not that I can really think of," Bucky said with a little smile. "I mean, that's big news. A new baby girl and I finally had Steve's cock in my ass again. Three times, no less."

---

Tim blushed a little and looked away. He was a bit of a flirt but he also never out-rightly talked about sex. But Bucky had no such restraint. Neither did Clint. They were like two horny old housewives talking about their nights with their partners in giggles and raised voices. Tim shook his head. "You're shameless," he said in a tone that somewhat envied Bucky's ability to be so open about his relationship with his husband. "Well, I'm happy for you. And I can't wait to meet your new daughter."

---

"Thank you. She's wonderful. I'll let Steve know that you both are coming and Natasha too and maybe someone with you, Tim?" Bucky asked and raised his eyebrows, fishing for information on the guy he had been interested in for a while now.

---

Tim blushed shyly and shrugged his shoulders. "I don't know if he's safe to be around babies. He's good with my kids, but I don't think he realizes how fragile they are. He accidentally broke my kid's finger throwing the ball too hard when they were having a catch."

---

Bucky shook his head, "Yeah, how about just you then. It would be fine but I don't feel like watching him the entire time. Also, we might as well not because if he still has even a bit of a drug problem, Steve won't want him in the house."

---

Tim got a guilty look on his face as if it was somehow his fault that his crush hadn't cleaned his act up yet. "I'm sure he won't be offended," Tim said. "He understands."

---

Bucky gave him an apologetic look and sighed. "I've just been on thin ice with Steve lately especially with people in the house," he informed them. "And I just got sex back so I don't want to risk anything," he jokingly added then paused before saying, "Grant's biological father more or less broke in."

---

Tim’s eyes went wide. "Wait, what?" Clint had been told this story already so he went about his business. "What the hell happened?" Tim asked.

---

"He came looking for Grant," Bucky said sadly. "He wanted him back. But he didn't know that Grant and Missy had both died. He even confused Christopher for a newborn and tried to take him. He and I beat each other up a little bit."

---

"Jesus Christ," Tim said with a frown. "What kind of idiot mistakes a ten-month-old for a newborn? He sounds like he shouldn't be anywhere near kids."

---

Bucky nodded solemnly. He still believed that Jason could turn himself around. He might end up being a really good man and a loving husband and father. Bucky had to believe that. He saw himself in Jason. "Anyway," he mumbled. "We have been really careful lately because of that."

---

"I get it," Tim said. "Would it be weird if I brought something for the new baby? It's just exciting, you know? You guys are so lucky to have another kid."

---

Bucky smiled again, thinking of his little baby girl at home now with his husband and son. "No, of course not. You can bring her something." He turned to Clint and got his attention. "Also, I need to be at your place for a few nights to build a crib. I'm not asking if I can because you owe me."

---

"What do I owe you for? I gave you a Christmas bonus," Clint joked. "Your kids are spoiled with love, I don't know who else builds cribs for each of their kids."

---

Bucky gave him a look and said, "I don't think you want me to explain in front of Tim why you owe me. I was told to keep it in confidence." He didn't really have much but he and Clint discussed so many things that he was told to keep secret that he kind of wanted to watch Clint squirm to figure out which one it was. "Besides, I won't bother you at all."

---

Clint paused for a moment, going through his mind to think of any dirty secrets he told Bucky lately and there were too many to measure. "You're pulling a mind game on me, I know it," he complained mildly.

---

"But, you are too worried to deny me," Bucky said with a smirk. "Besides, you told me Natasha is working late shifts this week so having me over for a couple of nights will stave off your loneliness a bit."

---

"It won't stave off my loneliness, it'll stave off my jerking off time," Clint said in a grumpy voice but his smirk showed that he was messing around. "Alright, enough gossip. Back to work now."

---

Bucky picked up a large box to start unpacking it and, while Clint was still paying attention to him, said in surprised reverence, "Natasha lets you jerk off by yourself?" Clint knew Steve wasn't fond of Bucky doing anything sexual without him but Bucky didn't know Natasha was okay with it. He figured she was like Steve.

---

"Well, sometimes she gets in a mood where I'm not allowed to do anything without her say so. And sometimes she's in a mood where she doesn't want anything to do with me sexually and she says I'm less obnoxious when I beat off instead of wait for her mood to end," he said.
Bucky nodded as he listened, "Huh... I'm not sure if I would prefer that to my situation or not. They both have pros and cons. Now I'm going to be thinking about this all damn day." He glared down into the box of records and sighed. "Alright, let's get this inventory out."

About halfway through the day, Steve ended up coming by the store with Sarah May in the baby carrier on his front and Christopher strapped in on his back. He had a brown bag with him. "You forgot your lunch, Buck," he said as he greeted him with a kiss on the cheek since there weren't customers around.

"Hey, Baby," Bucky said warmly and took the lunch from him. He gave Sarah May a kiss and then Christopher who was moving as much as he could in the carrier and making nonsensical noises. "Come say hello to Clint and Tim. They are in the back organizing the next round of boxes."

Christopher whined when his papa didn't go right to him. He looked even more offended when both Tim and Clint gasped and rushed to his baby sister. Sarah May's eyes went wide at all the people crowding her. "You should have seen her, Buck. She napped on Diana all morning long."

"You let our baby sleep on the dog?" Bucky asked, a little scandalized. He helped Steve get both kids out of their carriers and Bucky made sure to hold Christopher while everyone was paying attention to Sarah May. He didn't want him to feel left out.

Steve pulled out the Polaroid picture he took as proof of why he should let the baby sleep on the dog. "Look, it was cute."

Christopher hugged Bucky tightly. "Hi, Papa," he said happily. "Play?"

"No play right now, Bean," Bucky said and gave him another kiss. "Papa is at work. But I'll be home later and we can play."

Christopher wasn't too happy about that and he started to pout and reach for Bucky's hair to tug saying, "Play, play, play."

"Christopher," Steve scolded when he saw their son pull Bucky's hair. Sarah May hadn't heard Steve use his stern voice yet and her lip started to tremble a little even though it wasn't directed at her.

"It's okay, Steve," Bucky said softly and yanked his hair back into a ponytail. "Bean, we have been over this. You can't pull Papa's hair. It hurts. Ouchie." He sighed and held his son with one hand and touched Sarah May soothingly with the other to calm her down.
Christopher eased up when Bucky insisted that it hurt. He kissed his cheek and tried to act all cute and coy to get out of trouble. "Can I hold her?" Clint asked. "Natasha needs to see her when we go over for dinner. There's no way she could say no to a baby after seeing this one."

"She said no after seeing Christopher," Bucky said, confused. Steve gently handed Sarah May over to Clint and Bucky watched as she reached her little hand up towards him and kept her big brown eyes locked to his.

"Yeah, but she's smaller and quieter and cuter. Christopher is loud and she doesn't like that noise," Clint said. "Also, he pulled her hair and only I'm allowed to do that." He smiled at the baby and kissed her little hand. "Hello, cutie. You like your new home?"

"Clint, you asshole, don't say one of my kids is cuter than the other. Christopher already isn't sure what to do about Sarah May. He is used to all the attention," Bucky scolded his friend and gave Christopher some loving kisses and adjusted his shirt. "You are just as cute as your sister."

"What?" Clint asked innocently. "I'm not his parent. I don't got to pretend that I love them all equal." Christopher looked at Clint and started to sign to him asking him to play and Clint sighed. "Fine, Fine. You're just as cute." He handed Sarah May back to Steve and motioned for Bucky to put Christopher down and he pretended to chase Christopher, who giggled as he tottered around.

Bucky sighed contently and slipped his hand with Steve's. Reggie was the only one out on the floor at the moment and earlier he had just been holed up in a corner smoking. Bucky knew he needed to get back out there but he didn't want Steve and his kids to leave. "Steve, I was telling Tim and Clint they could come over this weekend for dinner if it's okay with you."

Steve cuddled Sarah May and gave her face a few kisses. "That's great," Steve said. "The more the merrier. Natasha can come too, of course." He looked happy to get to prepare for company coming over.

Bucky smiled a small, happy smile. "You need me to get our son from Clint? I don't know if you need to be going now. Thank you again for bringing me lunch, Baby. I appreciate it." He checked the time and couldn't wait to be back home.

"It's okay, I'll get him," Steve said. "I got to go shopping for some more supplies and some toys for Sarah May. I don't want to try getting Christopher to share his just yet," he explained. "But I'll see you at home." Steve kissed Bucky's cheek. "I don't mind bringing your lunch. It gives me an excuse
"I love you, Baby," Bucky said and gave Steve a kiss and said goodbye to Sarah May. "I'll be home late. I'm going to get lumber and get started on the crib. Clint reluctantly agreed. I might be blackmailing him just a little bit."

---

Steve laughed. "Smart," he said. Steve collected Christopher and brought him back home. He would've stayed out at the park but Sarah May was still too little to stay out that long.

---

Bucky worked hard the rest of the day and then went over to Clint's to get started making Sarah May her own crib. By the time he got back home, everyone was asleep and the lights were all out. Bucky was hungry so he made himself a sandwich and sat out on the couch and turned on the midnight news while he had his food. That's where he fell asleep, with a plate on his lap and some random news channel showing him the scandals of the day.

---

When Steve got up to take care of Sarah May in the middle of the night, he heard the TV going downstairs. After changing her diaper, Steve carried her down and sat next to Bucky. He kissed his cheek and snuggled up close as he entertained their daughter by wiggling his fingers in front of her.

---

Bucky roused from sleep a few minutes later. "Oh, hey, Baby," he said with a yawn and cuddled closer to Steve. "I think I fell asleep." He gently pet his hand on his daughter's hair and yawned again. "What time is it? I was at Clint's awhile."

---

"It's around two in the morning," Steve said. Sarah May smiled up at her dads and snuggled deeper in the blanket Steve held her in. Diana came trotting over and curled up at Steve's feet. "How's the crib coming?"

---

"It's okay," Bucky said and held up his hand with a bandage on it. "Accidentally got a cut but it wasn't too bad." He reached down and hoisted Diana up on to his lap. She was pretty big now but still a pup. He gave her some pets and love and closed his eyes. "I should be done with the crib in a few days."

---

Diana's tongue lolled out of her mouth and she looked happily over at Bucky before licking his face a few times. "Sarah May is going to love it," Steve said. "Are we going to keep her in our room for a little while?"

---

"I think that is probably best," Bucky said. "That's what we did with Christopher and I'm not sure when he will be entirely comfortable with her to have her sharing the nursery." He thought again about Grant. He wondered if he would have agreed to having Sarah May if he was still there with them. That would have been a lot of babies at once. But he also already loved his daughter so much that he couldn't think about not immediately taking her in regardless of how many kids they had.

---

Sarah May cooed and made soft noises up at Bucky as if she was trying to communicate with him. Steve's heart melted. "Maybe once she starts sleeping through the night we can consider putting her and Christopher together. I hope by then he learns that his little sister will be his best friend."

---

Bucky watched her closely and smiled down at her. He really did love her so much. "Christopher will get used to her in time. Becca wasn't fond of Lilly at first but she sucked it up and now they are almost amicable with each other."

---

"These two are a little closer in age. So I'm hoping that they're even closer than Becca and Lilly. I know they will have arguments sometimes, but I hope they are so close it's not a big deal," Steve said. Sarah May smiled softly up at Bucky and made a humming noise.

---

Bucky gasped excitedly and took one of her tiny hands. "Look at those big brown eyes! What do you see, Sweetheart? Do you see Papa and Daddy? Do you see Diana and your new home? I love how surprised and curious you look all the time."

---

Sarah May looked enraptured as she was given attention. "Oh, look at her," Steve said in a soft tone. "It reminds me of Christopher when he first came home. He didn't know what to make of everything."

---

"He was also pretty quiet like she is," Bucky mused. "Man, but he grew out of that incredibly fast." He reached over and pulled Steve close to him to give him a slow gentle kiss. "I'm really tired and I have work tomorrow. Can we go to bed?"

---

"Yeah. It's like he isn't the same baby anymore. He's his own little person now." Steve returned the kiss and held Sarah May close to his chest. "Yeah, we can go. I think this little one is ready to be put back to sleep. Am I right, Sarah May?"

---

Sarah May yawned in response and squeezed her hands into tiny fists a few times. Once they were back in the master bedroom and she was put back to sleep, Bucky changed into his pajamas and flopped down on the bed. "God, it's been a long day. I hauled so much inventory and then lumber."
Steve curled right up with Bucky. "You work so hard for your family, Buck. You're such a great father, you know that? I tell Christopher all the time how much you do for him. He may not understand completely, but, the thought is there."

---

Bucky smiled and gave Steve a kiss. "That's so sweet. Thank you, Baby. I know I complain about my job sometimes and I'm going to work on that. But, it's a good job." He knew now with Steve out of a job and four children in his care, Bucky would never be able to go back to school. It hurt a little to think about since he got his hopes up before but he was just going to have to deal with it. His family needed him and he was going to work every damn day so his husband and his kids could all have safe, comfortable, happy lives.

---

"You're allowed to complain, love. Work sucks sometimes. You know how much I loved being a police officer and there were some days I wish I hadn't shown up for work at all." He pet his fingers through Bucky's hair. "We have an amazing life because of you."

---

Bucky pulled Steve close and kissed him several times. "God, I love you so much. And I'm going to make you all so happy. That's all I want. For you all to be happy and have good lives. And I want to see our kids all grow up and learn and explore and become kind and caring people."

---

Steve wrapped his arms around Bucky and kissed him back lovingly. "I'll make sure of that, Bucky. Our kids are going to be so amazing. I'll raise them right and you'll set a good example of what hard work is and how they always have to set time aside for family."

---

Bucky kissed along Steve's neck and moved on top of him. He was a little too tired for sex but making out until he fell asleep was a good option. "How many kids are we having again? Tell me about them. How many girls and boys? And what are we going to do once we outgrow this house? Are we going to move out to Long Island and have a yard for all those kids?"

---

Steve arched his back and rubbed lazily against Bucky just because. "We are going to have four more. I want to have... two girls and twin boys. Or maybe twin girls? I don't know. But they're going to be the best. And we're never moving out of this house. We can build an extra room and get rid of the little yard. We can take the kids to the park if they want to run."

---

"We are having no yard here?" Bucky asked and grinded back against Steve. "If we just buy out the property next to us then we can tear it down and just expand this house sideways so we still have a little bit of yard."

---

"Buy out the property next to us, huh? You plan on hitting the lotto, Babe?" Steve teased lightly. "How're we going to afford all that land plus all our kids?"
Bucky lifted Steve's shirt up so he could kiss at his chest. "Yeah, I can make it happen. I'll save up. I'll get another job. I don't care. It seems like a good idea so I'll see if I can't make it work. I want the perfect house for our family."

Steve purred when he was kissed and scratched his nails gently against the back of Bucky's neck. "My perfect provider of a husband," Steve sighed dreamily. "I'll help you, too. You deserve to have time to spend in our home with our kids. You shouldn't have to work day in and day out."

Bucky licked over Steve's abs and then kissed his chest again before deciding to give it a rest because he was really tired. He curled back up next to Steve and held his hand. "I think once you are able to work again, you should do the mommy-and-me art classes but that's it. I want you to be able to do all the things that you want to and nothing else."

Steve groaned softly at the lack of contact from Bucky. They were both too tired to keep it up but it still felt good. "I want to do those. I think it'll really take off, especially for all the stay-at-home parents who want creative outlets for their kids, you know?"

Bucky nodded and nuzzled against Steve. "I think it'll be great. I think you'll make friends and do a lot of good for our kids and other kids. Maybe Christopher will become the next Picasso. How does that sound?"

"I like the sound of all that," Steve agreed. "Christopher is going to be the best artist, I bet. He's going to be the best at whatever he sets his mind to. Cause he's our kid."

"We are going to raise a brood of beautiful talented genius children," Bucky said with a warm smile and gave Steve another kiss. "And I'm going to love every second of it." He sighed and closed his eyes. "Okay, now it's sleep time. I'm so tired."
Christopher didn't understand what was going on exactly, but he seemed to know that something exciting was going to happen with the way the house was bustling. Lilly had been the one to wake him up and she had him on her hip as she came crashing through Steve and Bucky's bedroom door. "Wake up! It's Christmas morning!"

---

Bucky immediately groaned and rolled onto his stomach and held a pillow over his head. Sarah May, who now had her own crib in their room, woke up surprised and worried but didn't cry. She just watched with big eyes from where she was laying, waiting to be picked up. "Lilly, I swear to god!" Bucky grumbled. It was last year all over again. He wanted at least another hour of sleep. And he knew Becca was probably asleep still as well.

---

Steve gave Lilly a tired glare and tried to ignore her but Christopher was squealing excitedly and asking for his daddy. He groaned as he sat up and reached out for his son. "Lilly, go wake up your sister like you woke us and see if you still have arms left to open your presents after."

---

Lilly excitedly dashed out of their room to get Becca up. Bucky groaned again and moved to shove his face against Steve's side. "What time is it?" he asked and huffed out a big sigh. "Every damn year with this. Every year. She can't just give me until like ten in the morning? That would be nice."

---

"Next year we should rig the door to dump a bucket of water on her," Steve said. It probably would be worth the cleanup, though if they had done that this year then Christopher would've been caught in the crossfire. "It's eight in the morning," Steve said tiredly. "I want to nap but we already have two babies looking for attention."

---

Bucky sat up and looked over at Sarah May who was quietly reaching her hand out to him and pleading with her eyes to be picked up. Bucky rolled out of bed and tugged on his pajama pants and a jacket that he left unzipped so Sarah May could lay on his skin and calm down. "Hello, Sweet Pea," he said and lifted her gently out of the crib.

---

Sarah May really was such a loving, sweet baby. She always looked to be held even though she didn't cry when she had to wait. She made little noises at Bucky and laid her cheek on his chest. "It's a shame she can't open presents yet."

---

"I don't think Christopher is really going to understand the concept either," Bucky said and sat on the edge of the bed. "He might just shake things and hope for the best." He couldn't believe that it was both of their babies' first Christmas. They had Christopher for a while now and he would be a year old very soon. And Sarah May was about two weeks old today. It was so surreal to him.
"I know but he at least can kind of tear the paper. Right, Bean? Are you going to open the presents Santa brought you today?" Steve asked his son. Christopher nodded his head automatically because Steve was using his excited voice.

Bucky scrunched up his nose and grabbed one of Sarah May's blankets and laid it on her back. "Oh, so we are doing Santa?" he asked and looked to Steve. "Just that we didn't talk about it. But that's okay. We can do Santa."

"Santa is fun," Steve said. "And also a good motivator to scare them into behaving," he added. Sarah May gurgled happily and tried to reach up to feel Bucky's face.

Bucky kissed his daughter's fingers and smiled at her. "Scare them into behaving?" he repeated incredulously. "That's the Catholic boy in you talking. Don't you think they should behave because they love us and know what's right?"

Christopher huffed. "Papa." He sighed that he wanted Bucky to give him a kiss.

"They should behave because they love us. But it doesn't hurt to have some backup," Steve offered.

Bucky nodded and gently set Sarah May down on the bed and leaned over to give Christopher a kiss as well. "Okay, Sweet Pea," he turned back to his daughter. "Let's get you changed and dressed and then we can go have Christmas."

Sarah May gave Bucky no problem being changed into the elf costume that Steve insisted that she wear. Christopher reluctantly wore the Santa outfit and Diana looked downright pathetic having to wear the antlers that Steve made for her.

Bucky sighed and watched his two children and the dog staring up at him like they had no idea what was happening to them. "Steve, these poor babies look miserable," he said and picked up Sarah May.

"No, they look damned adorable," Steve said. Sarah May gurgled up at Bucky and laid her head on his shoulder. Steve had a sneaking suspicion that she liked Bucky more than him.

Bucky shook his head and pulled Steve in and gave him a kiss. "Hey, we got engaged a whole year ago today at a whole different home with only two kids in our care and no dog." He smiled at his husband. "I know the day took a turn for the worse last year but I'm not letting that happen this time. This is our son and daughter's first Christmas," he looked down at Sarah May and then to Christopher. "And Papa is sober and hasn't had any alcohol for five weeks. And Nana is coming over later and your brother is with Granny and Papaw and watching over us all today."

---

Steve smiled widely. "Time flies, doesn't it?" he said. "I love how much we accomplished in a year, Buck. We built our family, got ourselves a house. There isn't a thing in this world we can't do." Becca had made her way downstairs and Lilly started shouting for them to hurry up. Steve snuck in a kiss. "I'm proud of you, Bucky."

---

"I'm proud of both of us," Bucky whispered back and then led them downstairs to his sisters. "Okay, Lilly, okay. Jesus," he whined and sat on the couch next to Becca who was wrapped in a blanket and staring at Lilly like she was going to be her first murder victim. "Lilly, why don't you help Steve get a bottle for Sarah May and a snack for Christopher then we can start."

---

Christopher's eyes went wide when he saw all the brightly colored boxes all around them. Sarah May was interested in the bottle but Christopher completely ignored the snack in favor of walking over to examine the boxes. "Christopher is getting it already," Steve said.

---

"Okay, Bean," Bucky said to try to get his son's attention. "Let Daddy help you open presents. And they aren't all for you." Christopher had already laid his body over top of a large present for Lilly like he was claiming it as his own now.

---

Steve got up and gently lifted Christopher off the large present. "No, Dada!" he whined. Steve laughed and kissed his cheek before picking out one of Christopher's presents - a new set of blocks. "Here, Baby Boy. Let's open this one." He looked up at Bucky to make sure he was watching.

---

Bucky held Sarah May and fed her while he kept his eyes on Christopher as he opened his first Christmas present ever. After Steve showed him how to rip it the paper, he got the hang of it and started tearing it to shreds. He was far more focused on the paper than anything else and hadn't even realized he had new blocks.

---

"Christopher-" Steve started to correct, but his son was loving the paper so he wasn't going to bother. "Lilly, you can open yours now." The youngest Barnes tore at the biggest present immediately.

---

Lilly's breath caught in her throat. Bucky had talked with Natasha and Sam and they managed to pull some strings to get him in to see the coach of the Yankees. He brought a Yankees fan jersey with him and asked the coach if he could get the entire team to sign it. Just so happens that the coach's nephew was in the same company as Sam in the military so he was happy to oblige him. After all was said and done, Bucky had a Yankees jersey signed by the coach and the entire team placed neatly in a glass case for his sister. "You like it, Lil?" Bucky asked softly and grinned at her.

---

Lilly literally screamed in excitement. "Oh, my god! How did you do this?" She would've flung herself at him if he didn't have the baby, so she settled for only half squeezing the life out of him in a hug. "This is amazing!" Christopher started screeching to join in on the excitement.

---

Sarah May and Becca were both startled and annoyed by the noise. Becca shoved her fingers in her ears and pulled her blanket tighter around her. Sarah May looked up at Bucky and quietly pleaded with him to make it stop. Bucky held on to Lilly with one arm and gave her a kiss on the cheek. "Is it a good gift? Do you like it?"

---

"Fuck, yeah, it's a good gift!" Lilly exclaimed. Steve chose not to scold her for cursing because she was so happy. "Sorry, Bucky, but I don't think any of the other gifts you got me could beat this."

---

Bucky gave her a squeeze then let go. "I'm glad you like it. And it's okay that you don't think the others will live up to it. It's probably true." He readjusted Sarah May in his arms and then said, "Becca, are you going to open your stuff or no?"

---

"I had to wait for the banshee to pass so my ears were safe," Becca sassed, giving Lilly a glare. She was more reserved as she opened up her presents, looking pleased but not too overjoyed or else it would ruin her aloof reputation.

---

Bucky looked to Steve a few times as Becca worked through her gifts. He hoped he would get some sort of enthusiasm when she opened her complete history of the Roman Empire, which she had been wanting a while but she just mumbled, "Thank you," and smiled tiredly at the two of them.

---

Steve gave Bucky a hug and a kiss. "Don't take it personally," he murmured softly to him. He passed Bucky a box that said 'From Christopher' on it. Inside was a shirt that said 'My Son Loves Me'. It was cheesy, but Steve wanted to get stuff appropriate from their kids for Bucky.

---

Bucky thanked his son who didn't care about anything but his new toys. "And thank you, Steve," he added. "You really are my perfect dorky husband." Steve helped Christopher open the boxes to his new toys and would bring Sarah May her presents so Bucky could open it for her. It was mostly rattles and pacifiers. Once everyone was done with presents, Bucky handed Sarah May to Becca and said, "Alright, Steve, your big present from me is outside in the lawn so come on."
"Oh?" Steve asked, sounding very interested. "I don’t know if you'll be able to outdo what you gave me last year, Babe." He pushed up close behind Bucky as they walked to the back door.

---

"I can try," Bucky said warmly and opened the back door for Steve. Bucky had gotten him a set of gardening tools both for large plots and for small pots. "I know you won't be able to plant much with the land we have but you can give it a shot."

---

Steve gasped and beamed brightly. "Oh, my god, Buck! This is perfect!" he said as he rushed outside in the cold to look at all the tools. "I can plant tomatoes in these big ones! And herbs in the little ones!"

---

Bucky chuckled and leaned against the doorframe to watch Steve in all his excitement. "You like it, Baby?" he asked and shivered a bit in the cold. "It’ll be awhile before you can use it but at least you have it."

---

"Are you kidding? I'll be able to plant stuff and keep them in the kitchen until springtime," Steve said in an excited tone. He brought the pots inside and kissed Bucky's face a few times. "I love you," he said happily.

---

"I love you, too," Bucky said and kissed Steve back slowly before hearing his kids making noises in the living room. "We probably won't get Christmas sex this year, will we? We have too many kids to keep track of."

---

Steve laughed. "We can try, but I wouldn't hold my breath," he said. "I'm lucky if Sarah May gives you five minutes alone with me. She loves you." He took Bucky's hand and walked inside to see Christopher loudly shouting as he banged the little toy drum he got for Christmas.

---

Bucky held on to Steve until Becca came over to deposit Sarah May back into his arms. She loved her but she was also clearly done holding her. Bucky held his daughter close and kissed her head. "She loves you, too," he said to Steve and held her up to him. "I'm just glad she hasn't yet learned Christopher's trick of hair pulling."

---

Sarah May smiled happily up at her pop and reached up to hold Bucky's shirt in her little hand. "Sarah May got you something for Christmas, too," Steve reminded. Bucky hardly opened his presents.

---

Bucky nodded and sat back down on the couch. "Okay, what did I get, Sweet Pea?" he asked his daughter and waited for Steve to bring him whatever it was he needed to open. He meant to tell Steve not to get him anything this year. They were going to be slightly strapped for cash this month and next month and he didn't think he needed anything at all.

---

Steve handed Bucky a box that had a comfy flannel sweater inside of it and on the cuffs, all three of their children's names were embroidered on it. Steve knew money was tight but he wanted to make this special since it was their first Christmas married and with kids. Also, Bucky needed warm clothes.

---

Bucky opened up the gift and felt the fabric against his face. "Thank you, Sarah May, this is really nice and very soft." He hadn't yet realized what was on the sleeve. "Here, Steve, can you hold her and I'll put this on?" He passed his daughter off and pulled the sweater on then he saw the cuff and gasped. "Oh, hey," he whispered and looked at it closer. "Look at that. Steve, Baby, I love this. This is my new favorite sweater. Thank you. Did your mom sew this?"

---

Steve smiled proudly and nodded. "Yeah. I saw the sweater in the store and knew it was comfy, but I wanted it to be special. I was going to try to do it myself but I didn’t have the skill.”

---

Bucky pulled his husband close to him and gave him a kiss. "I love it. She did a great job. I'll be sure to tell her when she is over later." He smiled and just looked at Steve for a bit then added. "Did you want to go over to the cemetery before she gets here or do you think she will want to come with us?"

---

Steve returned the kiss sweetly. "I think she would want to go with us," he said. "I think she knit something for Grant’s grave. We know the grave keeper will probably end up throwing it out, but she wanted to make it for him anyway."

---

"Okay, then we will wait for her to get here," Bucky said softly and went to pick up Christopher from the ground. "Right now, though, we should get some breakfast. Because I'm hungry and I think the girls are too."

---

"Papa," Christopher whined, grabbing his block just in time and then calming down.

Steve asked, "What would you like to eat, Love? How about chocolate chip pancakes?"

---

"I'm fine with that," Bucky said happily and held Christopher against his chest. "You want pancakes, Bean?" he asked and brought him to the kitchen following Steve. "He should also have some fruit."

---

"Of course," Steve agreed. He put Sarah May in her rocker in the kitchen so he could start on breakfast. Lilly was marveling at the signatures Bucky got, Becca was curled up with Raphael on the couch with her book, Diana was gnawing on her new bone, and both Bucky was occupying Christopher. "We need to do a Christmas card next year."

---

"Who would we send a Christmas card to, Steve?" Bucky asked and cut up some bits of apple for his son. "I mean we can do it but we don't know people and the people we do know already see us all the time." He thought about the types of people who usually got Christmas cards - extended family, old friends, former coworkers. Anyone who he used to know wouldn't know he was married to a man so it wasn't probably smart to go sending his uncle and aunt a card of him and Steve and their kids.

---

"Clint, Natasha, Sam, Mom, Tim, anyone from the shelter who made it back on their feet, Father Frank, Laura, Monty," Steve listed off the top of his head. "All the people in Seneca who know about us."

---

"Okay, fine," Bucky sighed. "We can do that next year." Christopher started shoving apples into his mouth and Bucky had to move them farther away from him so he wouldn't choke. "I got another card from my uncle and his family. It was just as heartless as usual. Just the same, 'Sorry my brother and his wife are dead. Have a good Christmas,' and that's all. I've stopped replying. I figure if they actually cared, they would call sometimes."

---

"Papa," Christopher huffed. He started signing that he was hungry and was making the most pathetic faces up at Bucky for sympathy.

"You think we should send him one, too? I mean, there's not much to lose. You never talk with them anyway," Steve asked.

---

"No," Bucky said firmly and handed Christopher one more piece. "Last time I saw them was the funeral. They were cold and distant and didn't seem to care that my parents were gone. And they used to call but that stopped about three years ago. They don't give a shit about us and I don't really give a shit about them."

---

"Alright," Steve said. It wasn't worth the argument or the headache to try and convince Bucky otherwise. He took everyone's plates and put food on them. "Can you set the table, Love?"

---

Bucky stood up slowly and helped get the table all ready. Then he went and got Becca from the living room and took Sarah May from her rocker. "I just don't want them seeing the two of us and our babies and then calling to tell me how disgusting I am and call us names and, I don't know, threaten to take the girls to California. It'll just be a mess."
"I understand," Steve said. "It's a shame that they're not more involved. If you were my nephew, I'd have done anything I could to help."

---

"Yes, but, Steve, you are a nice person. Uncle Gregory is not," Bucky sighed and sat down. "He never liked my dad too much and we never really knew why. And my cousins liked the girls but never liked me and I don't know why either."

---

"Maybe they've got a thing against good, honest men." Steve kissed Bucky's face a few times before taking his own seat. "Let's hope that he will come around one day, yeah?"

---

Bucky nodded and played with his daughter's soft dark hair. "I guess so," he said and kissed Sarah May gently. He was quiet for a while just thinking about it. He knew he should probably just contact them and decide once and for all if they were going to be a family again or not.

---

Steve ate his food and smiled as Christopher mashed his cut-up pancake bits into his face. "I think we should make some hot cocoa to take to the cemetery with us so it won't feel so cold out," Steve said.

---

"That's a good idea," Bucky said with a sigh and grabbed Sarah May's hand when she reached up at him. "I'm a little worried that it'll be too cold for Sarah May. I mean, it's snowy out and, even if I bundle her up, it still might not be enough."

---

Steve nodded. "We can ask my mom to bring her back if it's too cold for her. Out of all of us, I think she wouldn't mind heading back early from the cemetery." Sarah May let out a big, excited squeal.

---

"What's up, Baby Girl?" Bucky asked his daughter and kissed her hand. "Did you hear that Nana is coming?" He stood up again with her to get the bottle he had waiting. She was probably a little hungry again. "And I don't think your mom will complain about getting to have Sarah May for a while."

---

"My mom would take her home with her if she had the chance," he laughed. A couple minutes later, Sarah knocked once on the door before coming inside even though they knew she had a key. And true to Steve's prediction, the first one she kissed was Sarah May.

---

Bucky greeted her and passed his daughter off to her nana. "Merry Christmas, Sarah," Bucky said and offered her a seat at the table. "Did you walk here in the snow or take a cab?" He hoped she didn't walk. It was pretty far to walk in the weather.
"I took a cab," she said with a shrug.

"Mom," Steve scolded because he knew she was lying. Sarah gave her son a little smirk and then cuddled her granddaughter.

"Nana!" Christopher gasped excitedly and ran over to her.

Christopher tried crawling up into Sarah's lap but couldn't get up. Bucky came over and quickly lifted him up so he could say 'hello' to his nana. "Nana, no!" he grumped and pointed at Sarah May. "No, no," he repeated and tried to pull her hands away from the baby.

"Hello, Christopher," Sarah said sweetly to her grandson, ignoring the protest and pulling as she kissed his cheek. "Can you show Nana what Santa brought? Did you get new toys?"

Christopher whined and looked to Steve for help. Bucky peeled him off of Sarah and said, "Bean, let's show Nana what you got." But Christopher only screamed at being taken away and he squirmed violently in Bucky's arms. Sarah May also got upset at the noise and started to cry.

Becca looked up from her book in annoyance when both babies were suddenly screaming and crying. Steve quickly took Sarah May from his mom and tried to soothe her. Sarah went over to calm her grandson. "What's all the fuss, little guy?"

Christopher clung to his nana and kissed her face. "Nana!" he said eagerly and burrowed into her neck.

Bucky sighed and rubbed his temples. "I'll be right back," he said and trudged off to get some headache medicine with Diana padding after him.

Sarah chuckled and hugged Christopher closer. "Such a fuss just to get my attention! Christopher, your nana loves you both." She kissed the top of his head and Steve managed to calm down Sarah May while Bucky got medicine.

Bucky took some medicine and then got food for the dog before going back to the living room and flopping on the couch. "Steve, Love, why are our children so loud today?" he sighed and closed his eyes. "I just want a short amount of quiet time."

Steve sat down next to Bucky with Sarah May in his arms. "Because this household was never meant to be quiet from the day we moved back here." He smiled and kissed Bucky slowly. "The babies will have to nap eventually."

---

"When will that be?" Bucky groaned and looked at Sarah May who was wide-awake. "You think later your mom would watch the kids so we can have quiet alone time. We don't even have to have sex but maybe just a nap?"

---

Sarah May wiggled happily in Steve's arms. She really was such a cute, little girl. "Sure. I was going to suggest that, too." He used his free hand to play with Bucky's hair. "You want to try sneaking up there now?"

---

Bucky nodded and got up from the couch. "I'm going to go lay down and you come join me when you can," he said and slipped off upstairs. He really was pretty worn out. This Christmas wasn't as stressful as the last Christmas but he was still pretty worked up. His parents and his son should be there. And his one-year-old was acting up and he was just so tired.

---

Steve stayed downstairs for a little bit to make sure the world wasn't going to collapse on itself and then he had his mom look after both of their children so he could join Bucky upstairs. He climbed into bed with him and kissed his face. "You want a massage, Buck?"

---

Bucky hummed contently when Steve started touching him. "Oh, I don't mind. Whatever you want to do. I'm serious about a nap, though. If you don't feel like doing anything then a nap is fine. But if you want to do something I'm good for that too."

---

Steve kissed along Bucky's neck. "Well, how about I massage you and if you get in the mood, we will do more?" He gently started to massage Bucky's shoulders.

---

"Okay," Bucky said and then groaned when Steve hit a knot on his back. "You want to just massage me and then maybe we can do sixty-nine and call it a day?" he asked and let his eyes shut. "That feels good. Thank you."

---

"I like the sound of that," Steve purred. He kissed him a few times while his hands worked over Bucky's torso. "You are such a dad," he chuckled fondly. "Too tired for sex."

---

Bucky winced a little when Steve hit a particularly sore spot. "Normally, I would argue with you but I just don't have it in me," he said with a sigh. "It's a weird phenomenon. It's like, when I got the girls, I became a pseudo-dad with some little hiccups and headaches and then when I became an actual dad it all just intensified."
Steve went easier on the sore spot and smiled fondly at his handsome husband. "It's because the girls were their own people and they were your sisters first. Our kids look to us for everything."

"Yeah, I thought it would be so easy for me to raise babies because I helped with the girls as babies. But my parents really had their hands full and I never realized," Bucky said and reached a hand back to feel Steve. "It's a little different when you can't make the excuse that you have homework to do so you don't have to help two-year-old Lilly to eat her vegetables."

Steve nodded. "I bet your parents have the biggest ‘told you so’ look like right now," he said. He kissed along Bucky's shoulders. "We got to come up with clever ways to trick our kids into liking vegetables."

"Christopher likes vegetables so far. At least some of them," Bucky said and gently rolled over on to his back and pulled Steve down on top of him. "I have a feeling it won't be that much of an issue with him." He closed his eyes again and held Steve close to him. "I could fall asleep."

Steve snuggled in close to Bucky and ran his hands along his sides. "Then how about we forget about sex for now, Handsome? Let me cuddle you to sleep."

Bucky whined and pressed his face against Steve's chest. "Fine, but let me suck you off tonight after everyone's asleep, at least?" he asked and paid attention to Steve's warm comfortable weight on top of him.

Steve laughed and gave Bucky a kiss to his soft hair. "Of course. I can't turn down my husband blowing me." He slid his hand lower on Bucky's body and snuggled in, draping the blankets around them. "Go to sleep, Papa."

"That's ‘Mr. Sweet Ass’ to you," Bucky mumbled and drifted off to sleep with Steve secure next to him and his family safe with their nana downstairs. He savored every second of getting to sleep soundly with Steve for just a bit.

Bucky got about forty minutes of napping in before Christopher started calling for his dad and pop just because he couldn't find them and Nana didn't quite cut it.

Bucky grumbled and rolled over on his side. "Steve," he said quietly. "Steve, Christopher," he mumbled a little louder. There was a gentle knock on the door and Sarah's voice calling out to them. to see if she could come in with their son.

"Yeah, Ma, come in," Steve said tiredly. Sarah opened the door and Christopher came running in, making excited noises as he tried to climb up the bed. Steve hoisted him up and the baby let out wild, little giggles and he crawled over and flopped down between the two of them.

Bucky sighed and rolled to face his son and pull him in to kiss his head. "What's wrong, Little Bean?" he asked and pet his son's light long hair. He was serious about never cutting it. He wanted it to be down to his back and beautiful.

"Play?" Christopher asked hopefully as he wiggled around. He didn't understand what Christmas was, exactly, but he could feel the energy in the house and knew it was exciting.

"The girls didn't want to play blocks with him," Sarah explained.

Bucky sat up, bringing Christopher with him and he pulled his hair back. "Okay, Bean, blocks for a little bit then we are going to go to the cemetery to see you brother and Papaw and Granny."

Christopher smiled up at Bucky and held on to him. Steve rolled out of bed and combed his fingers through his hair. He took Sarah May from his mom and cuddled her. "Should she be out in the cold?" she asked, nodding at Sarah May.

"I was thinking she would be okay for a little bit if we bundle her up nice and warm," Bucky said. "But if you think that's a bad idea, I'll just stay here with her." He kept finding himself looking to Sarah for parenting advice when he questioned himself too much.

"Yeah, Ma, we can bundle-" Steve started to say, but Sarah shook her head firmly.

"I'll stay home with her. She shouldn't be taken outside before she's had her vaccinations. I'm not even worried about the cold so much," Sarah offered.

"I'll stay with her, Sarah," Bucky said and held Christopher against his chest. "I went to the cemetery yesterday with Steve so you should go today. I wouldn't mind a little quiet time with Sarah May anyway."

Sarah wasn't going to argue with Bucky over it. Christopher allowed Bucky to hold him for a few moments before he started to squirm again. "Play, Papa, play," he reminded.
Bucky nodded and took his son downstairs to play. He brought out his new blocks and some toys that crinkled and squeaked. "Okay, Christopher, let's play. Papa is ready to play." He started building up a block tower so Christopher could knock it down as Steve moved to come sit behind them on the couch with Sarah May.

When some of the toys squeaked, Diana came running over, thinking that it was for her. She sat patiently, tail wagging as she waited for the toy. Christopher gleefully knocked down the tower every time Bucky set it up. "I'm a little concerned how much he enjoys that," Steve said, half joking.

"Maybe he will become a demolitions expert," Bucky offered and once again built the tower up as he saw Diana out of the corner of his eye steal a toy from Christopher's pile and then hide off under the couch with it.

"But he makes such pretty pictures," Steve said. "He's got to be an artist."
He didn't notice that Diana ran off with a toy but Christopher did. "Ana, no!" he said, chasing after her. "No."

Bucky grumbled and hurried after Christopher before he could crawl under the couch after the dog. He hoisted him up and plopped him down next to Steve and then reached under the couch to grab the toy from Diana saying, "Leave it. Diana, leave it."

Diana dropped it but started to pace and whine. Her ears pinned back until Steve gave her one of her own chew toys. "Should we start getting him ready for going out? Or do you want to watch both the kids while we go?"

"That's up to you, Babe," Bucky said with a sigh as he got back up off the ground. "I was thinking I would just rest here with Sarah May but if you don't want to take Christopher then I'll keep him too."

"I'll bring him with me," Steve said. "I want him to see his brother today." He kissed Bucky's cheek and picked up their son. "You want to go out and see your brother and grandparents, Bean? You like the outside, don't you?"

Christopher bounced and giggled in Steve's arms, excited about what was going on even if he didn't understand. "Can you make sure he keeps his hat on this time? We lost another one a few days ago when he went to the store," Bucky said.
Steve grabbed Christopher's jacket and started to get him dressed. He kept wiggling, so it was a bit difficult. "Of course," he said. "I haven't lost a hat yet, have I?"

---

Christopher bubbled a laugh at him and Bucky sneered at Steve. "Well, it's difficult to keep track when he wiggles all over the place and yanks it off," he grumped and pet Raphael when he came over to rub on his leg.

---

Steve got Christopher into his coat and he put hat and mittens on as well. This time he had Christopher in a Santa hat. "I think you secretly didn't like the last hat he had."

---

Bucky stared at the hat and rolled his eyes. "My god, that poor child," he said quietly and looked at his son who was already reaching up to try to grab the hat from his head. He got up and pulled Steve in close for a kiss. "Be safe. Tell my parents and our boy I love them."

---

"I will tell them that. And all the good stuff that's been going on," Steve promised. He kissed him once more and herded his family out. Once everyone was gone, Sarah May looked over at Bucky with an expression that conveyed that she was grateful for some quiet.

---

Bucky kissed his daughter's dark curly hair and moved to lay on the couch with her nestled on his chest. He sang to her for a bit until she fell asleep. It only took a couple minutes for him to follow her lead and drift off with his hands holding her securely in place.

---

The house was silent except for the occasional patter of Raphael's paws on the floor. They napped together for a while. It was peaceful and serene up until there was a thud followed by a yelp as Sarah May began to cry from the floor. Bucky’s grip on her must have loosened during his slumber.

---

Bucky jolted up from the couch and his blurry eyes tried to figure out where the noise was coming from until he saw Sarah May down on the ground. "Oh, fuck, baby!" he said and quickly but carefully picked her up and held her close to his chest. "Oh, my god. Baby girl. I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry, Sweetheart. How long have you been there? Are you hurt? Sarah May, I'm so sorry." The baby kept crying as he checked her over for any bumps, bruises, or cuts. "Oh, my god. Let's go to the hospital. I can't tell if you are okay."

---

Sarah May kept crying loudly, sounding more scared than hurt. The cat came bounding into the room to examine the ruckus. The family came home moments later to the scene and Steve rushed over to see what's going on. "Bucky, why’s she crying like that?"
Bucky turned towards Steve, scared and worried. "Steve, she fell!" he said hurriedly and gently bounced her, trying to get her to calm down. "She fell off the couch. She won't stop crying. I don't know what's wrong with her. Please, help me, please!"

---

"She what? Weren't you watching her?" Steve asked in a scared voice as he took her and started to look her over for injury.

Both parents were now panicking and Sarah calmly walked over and gave them both a pinch. "She's probably fine, stop freaking out or else you're going to scare her more."

---

Bucky shook his head and kept panicking anyway. "We were sleeping on the couch and she must have rolled off or something. She just started screaming and I didn't know what to do. I think we should take her to the hospital. We need to make sure she is safe."

---

Sarah took her granddaughter from her son's arms and lightly bounced her while singing and smiling, completely ignoring the two men's concerns. Like magic, Sarah May's crying started to subside and Steve nudged Bucky to take a look.

---

Bucky watched but kept a strong hold on Steve's hand and chewed his lip. "Is she okay?" he whispered and looked to Sarah and then to his daughter. "Steve, I swear I didn't mean to drop her. She just fell. I didn't mean too."

---

It was Steve's initial instinct to want to scold Bucky for falling asleep on parent duty but he bit his tongue because he knew it was an honest mistake. Sarah was able to calm the baby down before she offered her back to her parents. "See? No harm done."

---

Bucky quickly took Sarah May back and kissed her over and over and then apologized a million times to her and to Steve. He felt his eyes watering up and moved to lean into Steve and wait for him to wrap his arms around the two of them and hold them close.

---

Sarah gave her son a scolding look because she could see that initial judgment in Steve's eyes. He sighed and wrapped his arms around the both of them. "It's okay, Buck," he said softly. "Accidents happen."

---

Bucky apologized again and watched his daughter who was now perfectly calm and making fists with her hand on his chest. "She's okay. She's okay. Everything's okay isn't it, Sweet Pea?"

---

Sarah walked over to Bucky and gave his shoulder a gentle squeeze. "Babies are more resilient than you think," she reassured. "God may have made them to need us, but he knew that us humans are prone to little accidents like this."

---

"She was just so scared," Bucky added, nervous again. "She screamed so loudly. I was so worried." He took a deep breath and looked up to Steve. "Baby, I'm so sorry. Are you mad? You're mad. I'm sorry."

---

"Well, it probably was one of the scariest things that happened to her. She's not yet a month old, a lot will scare her," Sarah reassured.

Steve looked down at his daughter. "I'm upset. But I'm not mad at you," he answered.

---

Bucky nodded and sat down on the couch. "Christmas is not my day," he said and stared at Steve. So far this year wasn't as bad as the last year but it was still not great. "At least she's not actually hurt."

---

Sarah May seemed to have already forgiven Bucky. She gurgled and reached up for him so he would play with her hands like he usually did. "It's better than last year. Maybe next year we will have a Christmas without incident," Steve offered.

---

"Or at the very least, maybe next year it won't be my fault. Maybe you'll mess up for once," Bucky said lightly but sort of meant it. He hated always being the one who ruined everything. It was never really Steve's fault. It was always him.

---

"I'd rather that neither of us mess up," Steve said. Christopher came trotting over with a new toy in hand. He wiggled it in Sarah May's direction and Steve gasped. "Are you trying to share with your sister?"

---

Sarah May stared at Christopher and then slowly reached out and tried to grasp the toy. It was too heavy for her to hold so it dropped and Christopher huffed as he picked it up again. "No, Ya-Ya," he said and held it out again. When it dropped for a second time he said, "No, Ya-Ya!" and tried again.

"Is he trying to say 'Sarah'?' Bucky asked and heard Christopher say 'Ya-Ya' again. It hadn't occurred to him that he was going to start to try saying her name. "That's precious. Say it again, Bean."

---

Steve smiled widely. "I think he is," he said happily. Christopher watched to make sure the toy didn't drop again. "You think he's realized she's here to stay?"

When Sarah May didn't use the toy right, he reached up for it again. "Ya-Ya. Play."
Bucky giggled and watched Sarah May look all confused at her big brother. "I think he knows now. He's been pretty good with her for a couple days." He smiled up at his husband and said softly, "Hey... how was Grant today?"

Steve handed the toy back to Christopher, who tried to show her how to get it to make the noise. "Ma made a blanket for his grave," Steve said. "And the grass around him was cut recently. I think they knew people were going to visit more often because of Christmas."

"That sounds nice," Bucky said warmly. "But, how was he, do you think? You think he knew it was his first Christmas? Do you think my parents have been giving him a good holiday?" he asked and thought about how much he wished they all were here with him. He wanted this house filled with his family.

Steve kissed Bucky's forehead. "I think he would be just as confused as Sarah May right now, but I think your parents are giving him the best holiday they could," Steve said. "He knows he's loved."

"Okay, good." Bucky nodded and grabbed on to Steve's arm. "I love you, Baby," he said quietly as another apology for not going to the cemetery and also for accidentally letting their baby drop on the ground. Christmas really was always stressful in some way or another.

"It's alright, love," he said. Steve stroked his fingers through Bucky's hair. He was clearly a little emotional over not being able to have their baby boy here, but he held it in. "We have the rest of our family here, safe and healthy."

"Yeah, safe," Bucky scoffed sarcastically. "Except I dropped our newborn on the ground." He sighed and checked over Sarah May once more just to make sure she really was completely fine. He held her close and changed the subject. "Did you want to talk to your mom about her moving in? We haven't asked her yet and today might be a good day to ask."

Steve held Bucky's chin firmly and pulled him in for a kiss. "She'll live. We probably will mess up plenty more in the future," he said. Sarah May smiled up at her pop and reached up for his face too. "Yes, let's ask her today. She's going to be excited about it. I know it."

"Come on then. Let's talk to her," Bucky said and stood up from the couch with Sarah May. "Where did she run off to? Also, where did Christopher go? Also, where's Diana and the girls? Jesus, there's so many kids and animals to keep track of, my god."
"Probably cooking something in the kitchen. I know she wanted to make us dinner," Steve said. "And wherever food is, Diana is." When they got to the kitchen, Christopher was in his high chair playing with some noisy toys while his nana cooked. "Ma? We got something we want to talk to you about."

Sarah turned to face them and held out a spoonful of something for Steve to taste saying, "Yes, my dears, what is it?" She then picked up another carrot and handed it to Christopher who dropped his toy in favor of the carrot and started gnawing on it.

Steve automatically ate whatever was in the spoon just because he never turned down something his mom made. "Well," he said. "We were thinking, you know how much our kids love you and you're here often enough. We figured, well, if you were interested, we wanted to know if you would want to live here with us. We could turn half the living room into your room."

Sarah stopped what she was doing and looked between her son and Bucky and her two grandchildren. "You want me to live here?" she asked in surprise and gave a small smile. "Really?"

She started tearing up and Bucky reached out and touched her arm gently to show his support. "We would love to have you here if you would like to live here with us and the girls and your grandbabies."

Steve nodded. "I love you, Ma. And so do our kids. And it's silly for you to live all on your own when you've got the rest of your family who loves your company right here." Sarah hugged her son tightly and kissed his cheek before pulling Bucky into the hug too.

Bucky chuckled when he was pressed into the hug and he slipped his free hand around his husband's hips and smiled up at him. "So, you still haven't answered. Are you going to come move in here? Because we all would love to have you."

"Stop being so fresh," Sarah scolded lightly. "Of course, I'm going to live with you." She turned to Christopher. "You hear that, my beautiful grandson? Your nana is coming to live with you!"

"Nana!" Christopher yelled and made grabby hands for her. "Nana! Nana!" he repeated and bounced in his high chair.

"I think he is excited," Bucky said and grinned at his son. "And I think it'll be really easy for me to convert the living room to a bedroom for you really fast. It'll be great."
Sarah picked up Christopher from his chair and snuggled him. "Oh, how I miss when you were this little, Stevie," Sarah sighed. She kissed the top of Christopher's head. "This is the best Christmas present you could've given me."

---

Bucky smiled and pulled Steve close to give him a kiss and hand Sarah May to him. "There's no hurry for you to move in. So whenever you feel ready and comfortable, that works for us. I'll get started on your room as soon as I can and make quick work of it so you can move in whenever you want."

---

"I'll give my landlord notice. Maybe I can be moved in before Valentine's Day. That'll give you enough time, right?" Sarah asked Bucky. "I don't have many things."

---

"That's plenty of time," Bucky said with a nod. "Any certain things you want done for your room? Any specifications? You are getting one hell of a window in there! Becca may be slightly upset about not having a good window to read by anymore but she would get over it."

---

"I just want a nice, private place I can sleep at night. And a dresser to hold what few things I have," she said. "I'm sure Becca will get over losing her spot when she realizes there's another adult to help with the babies so she doesn't have to."

---

"Oh, yeah, I'm guessing Becca will be happy to have you here for lots of reasons including that," Bucky said as the girls came back into the kitchen.

Becca grabbed an apple and said, "What's going on?"

---

"My mom is coming to live with us," Steve said excitedly. "We are going to turn the living room into a bedroom for her. Isn't that great?" Steve was hyping it up a little in case Becca chose to be grumpy over it.

---

Becca surprised them all by being vocally excited about something for once. "You are?" she asked with wide eyes and hugged Sarah. "Oh my god! That's amazing. When are you moving in?"

---

Steve looked at Bucky in shock when Becca got excited. "Well, we were talking about sometime early February," Sarah said as she hugged her back tightly. "I'm glad you're happy to have me here. I love spending time with you."

---

Becca kept a hold on Sarah and said softly so only Sarah could hear her, "It's like having a mom here again." She detached from her then and calmed back down. "I like having you here. I'm glad that you'll be living with us."

---

Sarah looked both touched and surprised that Becca saw her as a mother figure. She hugged her even tighter before letting go. Steve laid his head on Bucky's shoulder and watched his mom wear the biggest smile he'd seen since she found out that Sarah May was named after her. "Alright, you boys have to stop giving me good news for five minutes so I can finish dinner."

---

"I've got nothing else," Bucky said. "Babe, anything else?" he asked Steve and sneakily held his ass.
He was feeling more awake now and wanted that Christmas sex that he hadn't gotten earlier. It probably wouldn't happen but he could try.

---

Steve took Sarah May and kissed her little face. "Nope. I got nothing but a baby." Steve's mom put Christopher back in his high chair and went back to cooking.

---

Once they were done with dinner, Sarah decided to go home for the night instead of staying there.
The girls went to sleep a few hours later and Christopher was bathed and put in his crib to sleep. All that was left was Sarah May. "Okay, time for you to have your bath, Sweet Pea."

---

Sarah May squirmed and kicked her legs excitedly as she was carried to her little bathing seat. "She really loves the water," Steve said fondly. "I think she'd stay in it all day if she had the chance."
Steve walked up behind Bucky and ran his hand over his back.

---

Bucky bathed their baby girl so carefully and cooed at her the entire time. "I can't wait for her to be big enough to go swimming. She'll have so much fun. Won't you, Sarah May? You'll be our little fishy baby!" He chuckled and finished washing her and then wrapped her up in a towel. "Say goodnight to your daddy so we can get you dressed and in your crib."

---

Sarah May seemed to really enjoy herself as Bucky bathed and spoke sweetly to her. Once her bath was over, Steve picked her up and gave her little face a few kisses. "Good night, Sweet Pea. I love you so much!" He passed her back to Bucky and headed to their room so he could change.

---

Bucky got Sarah May tucked into her crib and he quietly sang to her until she fell asleep. He wasn't sure how long she would remain asleep so he quickly slipped back to their bedroom and stood near the door for a couple seconds just admiring Steve. "Hey, Merry Christmas."

---

Steve pulled Bucky into his lap and kissed up and down his neck affectionately. "Merry Christmas, my lovely husband," Steve said sweetly. "You have a good day, even with the chaos?"
"Yeah, it was better than last year," Bucky sighed and wrapped his legs and arms around Steve. "How was your Christmas, Baby?" he asked and gave Steve a kiss on the cheek. "Better than last year for you? At least this year we have our kids and I am sober as the day I was born."

Steve smiled. "My Christmas was amazing. We got to spend it together, married, with our kids. I got pots to plant my herbs in and we got to make my mom very happy. You've been sober for so long now and we may even have sex tonight."

Bucky whined and squeezed Steve. "'May even have sex?'" He repeated. "Come on, don't mess with me on Christmas. It's quiet. Everyone is asleep. I've looked so cute today. And my dick has been so patient."

Steve laughed and pinned Bucky under him so he could kiss down his throat. "You did look pretty damn cute all day," he said. Steve slowly moved his hand between Bucky's legs and gave a squeeze. "You want to be on top tonight?"

Bucky breathed deeply and pulled at Steve's hair a little. "Yes, if you'll have me?" he said and reached back to touch Steve's ass lightly. "I'll spread you nice and open and eat you out until you come and then I'll let you have my Christmas cock. How's that sound?"

Steve moaned softly at the tug. He was getting hard and he wanted nothing more than to be intimate with his husband. He nodded wordlessly and grabbed at Bucky's shirt to pull it off.

"Or do you want me to skip to just fucking you? Because I'm good either way," Bucky said and got off the bed to strip himself all the way and then to start unbuttoning Steve's pants and tugging them down off of him.

"I kind of want you inside me right away," Steve said. "I miss you." Steve wiggled out of his clothes and pulled Bucky back down so he could roll their hips together and Bucky could feel how hard Steve was for him.

Bucky giggled and pushed his cock against Steve's. "Okay, my sweet man. Hand me the lube and I'll get inside you right away!" he said it with the same air as an attendant at a hotel answering a room service call.

Steve laughed. "Stop that, you dope. You don't sound sexy like that." He reached into the nightstand
Bucky took the lube and slicked up two fingers. "You are special. You're so perfect. You're my favorite man in the world. And I love you so much." He gently started teasing his fingers on Steve's hole and popping just his fingertip inside and then back out a few times. "I love the year we have had together since last Christmas. I've loved seeing you as such an attentive and honest and caring father for our kids and guardian for the girls. I've loved seeing you learn and grow with Christopher and work out how to be the best dad you can be."

Steve whined softly and tried to press down to take more of Bucky's fingers. He dragged his nails slowly down Bucky's back and watched his face as he spoke. "You're everything to me," he said softly. "Every day of my life gets better when I have you around. I can trust you with everything."

"I trust you with everything, too," Bucky promised and pushed two fingers all the way inside Steve. "Now you talk. Tell me what you want. Either sexually or as a couple or as parents or anything. Just tell me what you want for the both of us."

Steve let out a pleased noise as Bucky pushed his fingers inside. The stretch stung a little but he loved it. "I want you to make love to me slowly," he breathed out. "And hold me all night while I tell you all the reasons why I love you." He tangled his fingers in Bucky's hair and gave a little tug. "And tomorrow, let me spoil you."

"I'll do all that for you, Love," Bucky said warmly and added another finger. "I'll be nice and slow for you and mean every thrust. How will you spoil me tomorrow, though? I want to know."

Steve spread his legs and rocked his hips some more. "I'm going to wake you up nice and slow with a morning blowjob," he purred. "And then I'm going eat your ass and try to make you come again."

"Yes, please," Bucky whined and removed his fingers. He lined his cock up with Steve's hole and, slow as he could, pushed in all the way as he kissed Steve deeply. He stayed still inside Steve just kissing him for several long moments until he just couldn't stand it and needed the sweet friction of the pull of his cock inside Steve's ass.

Steve's back arched off the bed when Bucky slid inside of him. He let out a low, desperate moan and dug his nails into Bucky's back. "Yes, that feels so good, Buck," he breathed. "Keep going, Sweetheart."
Bucky obliged him and carefully and slowly eased in and out of his hole with a gentle rhythm that matched Steve's already slightly labored breathing. "I hope I haven't said it so much that it doesn't mean anything anymore, but you are so gorgeous."

---

Steve blushed a little at that. After getting injured and then let go from the police force, Steve’s self-image really suffered. "Keep saying that to me," Steve admitted shyly. "I need to hear it."

---

"Oh, Baby, you are so beautiful," Bucky said warmly and gave Steve a kiss on the neck. "You will always be the most handsome man I have ever seen. And as we grow old together, you’ll still be the most handsome. I’ll always love waking up and seeing those gorgeous eyes greeting me and those perfect warm lips giving me morning kisses."

---

Steve practically lit up with the compliments and he smiled happily as Bucky praised him while he made love. Steve wrapped his legs around Bucky's hips and moved with him. He pulled him in for a searing kiss, pouring every ounce of love into it. "I don’t know how anyone could've let you go. You're perfect."

---

Bucky chuckled and stared into Steve's eyes. "They just knew I was waiting for you. So they needed to let me go find you." He grinned and kept a hold of Steve, not wanting to ever stop. "I know I’ve messed up a lot, but you have always been my best decision."

---

Steve felt so fucking amazing and lucky to have someone so perfect to call his husband. "You have come so far, Bucky," Steve said. "I'm proud of the man I married." He reached down and grabbed Bucky's ass firmly while the other hand tugged at Bucky's hair. "Give me more."

---

Bucky was proud of Steve, too. He was proud of the way he reacted to any troubles that came their way and any adversity he faced. He was proud of how natural he was at being a good father. "More what?" Bucky asked. "What do you need, Baby?" He quickened the pace of his thrusts ever so slightly in case that was what Steve was asking for.

---

"More of your cock," Steve gasped out. His ass clenched tightly around Bucky's dick. "I want to come, Buck. I want to feel you come inside of me, too."

---

Bucky nodded wordlessly and slipped his hand securely around Steve's cock to start stroking him. He moved a little faster inside him and hummed. "Tell me if you want me to slow down."

---

Steve threw his head backed and moaned Bucky's name. "Don't slow down," he gasped. Steve dragged his nails up Bucky's spine and angled his hips so Bucky could push in deeper. "I'm so close."

---

Bucky hoisted Steve's legs up on to his shoulder so he was folded in half. He worked in and out on him quickly and kissed Steve through it all. He felt himself nearing orgasm as he pumped Steve. It only took a few more seconds before he was gasping Steve's name and spilling out inside him.

---

Steve cried out and bit Bucky's neck as he went rougher. When Bucky came, Steve did so moments later and his ass clenched around Bucky's cock. He moaned out Bucky's name and held him against his body by wrapped all four limbs around him and keeping him close.

---

Bucky chuckled at Steve monkeying his body around him. He laid down on top of Steve and kissed his neck and made his way up to his lips. "How was that?" he asked softly and sucked in Steve's lower lip for a second before letting go. "You bit my neck kind of hard."

---

"That was perfect," Steve said, sounding thoroughly fucked out. He smiled devilishly and kissed Bucky's sore neck. "I'd be more sorry if you didn't like things getting a little rough," he said.

---

"That is true. I like it rough sometimes," Bucky said and gave Steve another kiss. "Was it a good ending to your Christmas?" he asked before hearing simultaneous crying coming from the nursery at once. "Dammit, they're both up."

---

Steve nodded. "The best ending I could ask for-" he fell silent and chuckled softly. Of course. They had to go back to being dad's now. "Want me to take care of them both, Love?"

---

"No, I'll help," Bucky said with a yawn and got up to tug on some clothes. "Which one do you want?" He asked as he buttoned up a cardigan and tossed Steve his pants. "Here's hoping the girls didn't wake up."

---

Steve cleaned up and threw on some pants. "I'll get Sarah May," Steve said. When they got in, Christopher was crying and pointing at Sarah May's crib to blame her for being woken. Steve picked up their daughter and tried to hush her before they woke Bucky's sisters.

---

Bucky took Christopher into his arms and kissed his cheeks. "Baby Bean, what's wrong?" he asked and bounced his son. "What's the problem? Did you get woken up?" Bucky yawned again and held Christopher close. "Steve, I'm going to take him to our room and lie down."
Christopher immediately started blabbering at Bucky, complaining about all the noise and how he wanted to sleep, probably. "I'll catch up later," Steve said. He sung and cradled their baby girl and calmed her down. Once alone in the bedroom, Christopher flopped onto the bed with his pop. "Leep?"

---

Bucky nodded and snuggled his son on to his chest. "Yes, Bean, sleep," he said and re-buttoned his cardigan over Christopher so he was secure. "Daddy is taking care of Sarah May then he will be back. Until then," Bucky yawned and closed his eyes. "You and I are going to sleep."

---

Christopher snuggled up to his pop and balled his fist up against Bucky's chest. All he wanted to do was go back to sleep, so he was out like a light within moments. Steve came back about ten minutes later after putting Sarah May back to sleep. "Oh, man. You two are so cute."

---

Bucky was right on the cusp of sleep when Steve came back and he grumbled his annoyance just a little bit. "Is Sarah May asleep?" he asked in a gravely tired tone without opening his eyes at all. "Our bean is asleep so that's good."

---

Steve nodded. "She's all changed and ready to sleep for a while." He got into bed and kissed Bucky's forehead before kissing the top of Christopher's head. He stroked his fingers through Bucky's hair. "Merry Christmas, Love. Sleep well."
Bucky was frantic. Steve had sort of sprung the idea of going on a trip earlier that day and now he was packing up all of the things that the babies would need for a week away at Seneca. Neither of the babies had the right sort of winter gear so Bucky sent Steve to the store with Lilly to get what they needed. While Becca helped watch Sarah May and Christopher, Bucky threw tiny hats and gloves into a bag filled with diapers and wet wipes.

---

Steve knew it was last minute, but he got it in his head that he wanted to spend their anniversary in Seneca and, damn it, they were going to do it. He returned from shopping with a bag full of warm clothes for their kids and an extra sweater for Bucky as a little gift. "Buck, how's packing? You almost done?"

---

"Oh, I'm almost done with the kids' things but I haven't even started on our stuff at all. And Sarah May threw up on Becca earlier and seemed very pleased with herself. However, Becca was decidedly not pleased," Bucky said and took the new winter clothes from Steve and put them in the bag before zipping it up.

---

"Well, I guess it's giving Becca even more incentive to wait to have sex until she’s ready to have kids." Steve kissed Bucky's cheek in passing before heading downstairs to pack a bunch of snacks for the ride up. "My mom will be here in an hour. She says she wants to pay for the gas and tolls so we don't have to."

---

"Well, that's not your mother's choice," Bucky said and tossed a few bags towards the front door. "She should just relax and have a good time. I want her to love this trip so she will want to go back with us. And I'm also still holding out hope I can convince you to move out there when we are old."

---

"Yeah, good luck trying to persuade me," Steve snorted. He put the snacks in a little cooler and handed Bucky some water bottles. "Unless you move the city and my ma to Seneca, you're going to have a hard time getting me out there."

---

"I can move your mom. The city has to stay," Bucky said. "And I think that Sarah would eventually side with me if she has a good time and if I can convince her it'll be good for the two of us to eventually move there. She'll be happy to come along. Right? Get her a cabin of her own right next to ours. Our kids can visit their parents and Nana all in one trip."

---

Steve paused for a moment, having just realized something. "Wait, I don't want to move if our kids are staying in Brooklyn. They're our babies, they're going to stay in the city," he said in a pathetic tone.
Bucky exhaled softly and set aside what he was doing to come hover over Steve. "Steve, Honey," Bucky said, pulling out the only endearment he used when he was frustrated. "Work with me here. You really want to live in the city forever? Die in the city?"

Steve looked up at Bucky with a bit of a pout on his face. He knew what being called ‘Honey’ indicated and he decided to get on the defensive fast. "Why not? What's so bad about the city that you don't like it? We all grew up here. At least two of our kids were born here. Grant and your parents are buried here. I don’t know why we got to rush away."

"We aren't rushing away. I'm saying fifty years or so," Bucky said. "You know I love the city and what it's given us so far. But I want to live my last years peacefully and quietly and die the same way. I never used to think I would live past forty years old - figured I would kill myself before then. But now I have you and our family and I want to live as long as possible. And I want us to have a few calm years together before we go."

Steve’s pout got sadder when Bucky spoke about dying or killing himself at a young age. He looked down at him and let out a sigh. He wanted to be in the city. But he also loved Bucky more than this city. "Well, if that's what would make you happy. Then that's what we will do."

Bucky brought their lips together in a gentle but meaningful kiss. "Hey, I love you. You know that?" he asked and held Steve's face in his hands. "I'm not going anywhere. I could never leave you or the girls or our children. Okay?" He sighed and gave him another kiss. "I'm sorry I brought it up. Give me a smile?"

Steve huffed softly and looked over at Bucky. "It's what you want, though," he said with a frown. "You've done so much for me and our family. You're the one who's going to be working hard while I get to stay at home with our kids. If that's where you want to spend our retirement, then you deserve it."

"It's fine, Steve," Bucky said with a tick of disappointment. He did want that and he sort of agreed with Steve that he deserved to have it but he also didn't want to retire out of the city with Steve just doing it to please him. He wanted them both to decide on it. "That's years down the road. We can discuss it when all our kids are married and have lots of children of their own and I'm able to stop working. No need to worry about it now. Let's go on vacation instead."

"What?" Steve asked with a frown, knitting his eyebrows together. He was a bit upset that Bucky was still disappointed even when he was pretty much just agreed to it because he loved Bucky enough to go along with it. It was like he couldn’t win right now.
"Nothing," Bucky said with a sigh and stood up straight. He checked the time. Clint would be coming soon to drop off his mom's big van that they were borrowing for the trip. Steve no longer had a car since he didn't have the cruiser and now they had a lot more people to squish into one vehicle. "I shouldn't have brought it up. We are going to have a lovely time together on the lake in the snow with all our kids and your mom. That's all we should be thinking about right now. Clint said he would be around soon with the van so do you mind watching the kids while we load up? Also, I already packed Diana's travel bowls and food so don't worry about what she needs."

Diana's ears perked up when she heard her name. She was currently sprawled out on the floor, wagging her tail as Christopher tried to mess with it. Steve still looked a little hurt but he focused on their kids instead. He could make a big deal out of nothing sometimes and this was one of those moments. "Yeah, sure," he sighed. Sarah and Clint arrived at nearly the same time, both swarming the kids to say hello to them.

Bucky wasn't surprised that Clint got preoccupied with playing with Christopher and wouldn't help him load. It was pretty typical of him. But Bucky also didn't want to complain about needing help loading because then Steve would try to help and then get hard of breathing and become angry with himself. So Bucky just worked on tying sleds to the roof alone. He wasn't even sure they would be able to use the sleds but Lilly insisted on bringing them.

Lilly was practically bouncing with excitement. "Can we go hunting? I want to catch a bunch of animals." Lilly didn't quite grasp the whole concept of hunting. Her take on it was more like butterfly hunting just with a bigger net. "I'm not going to have to babysit at all, am I?"

"Lil," Bucky grunted from his spot on the side of the van. "Go bother someone else for just a few minutes. Or, actually, no. Go help Becca get Raphael's food and water set up. Clint is going to come take care of him while we are gone. You should go show him where all the cat stuff is."

Lilly huffed and stomped back into the house. She bullied Clint away from the kids to show him where everything was. Sarah took the babies to dress them up nice and warm for the ride and when they all gathered to head in the car, Christopher stared confusedly at it. "Dada?"

Bucky was just pushing the last bag into the back when everyone came out, ready to go. "Okay, pile in. Girls, you are the back row with Diana. The babies are with me in the middle and, Sarah, you are Steve's navigator." He cracked a big smile at his family, proud of the haphazard yet secure way he shoved the van together on his own.

Steve thanked Clint and they were on the road in no time. Sarah May's big, brown eyes stared out the window in wonder and occasionally she would try to reach out at something. "I can't believe we "all fit," Steve chuckled. "Is everyone comfy back there?"

---

"No," all three Barnes siblings chimed at the same time. Becca and Lilly were squished to the sides of the van with Diana - happy as a clam to be going on an adventure - lying out in between them. Bucky was squished with two car seats on either side of him that made it difficult to move. And while Sarah May was content to watch the world go by, Christopher was just discovering if he reached just right he could grab his papa's hair.

---

Sarah let out a laugh. "Well, the two of us are comfy up here," she teased them lightly. Whenever Christopher managed to grab his papa's hair, he would squeal and giggle with delight for managing to succeed in this little challenge.

"How much longer until we get there?" Lilly asked.

---

Bucky sighed and tugged his hair away. He didn't want to put it up because he knew Christopher would start crying and it was too small of a space to have crying children in. It was so loud and he would definitely get a headache. Also, the girls would be incredibly annoyed. "It's a few hours to get there, Lil," he said and rummaged in his bag for a snack and passed it to Lilly, hoping it would satisfy her for a bit.

---

"I wonder how Christopher will like playing in the snow. We haven't had a real good snowfall in the city yet, but we could probably build an entire igloo while we're upstate," Steve said.

---

"I think he's going to love it," Bucky offered as he pulled his hair away again and got an angry grunt in return. He looked over at Sarah May who was still watching the window and opening her eyes slower and slower each time she blinked. Bucky was hoping the both of them would fall asleep in the car and Sarah May was getting pretty close.

---

Christopher stretched as high as he could to grab a fistful of Bucky's hair. Becca couldn't help but snicker. "Still glad you have kids?" she teased. "Just wait until his hair is long enough. Then you can tug on it and see how he likes it."

---

"I won't pull on my son's hair," Bucky said patiently and held both Christopher's hands to prevent him from trying again. "I wish I could magically make him sleep, though," he grumbled and put a pacifier in Christopher's mouth and handed him a small plush bear so maybe he would get distracted and then fall asleep.

---

"Wrap him up in his fuzzy blanket. If he's swaddled and kept real warm, he goes to bed in almost an instant, most times," Steve advised. His mom helped Bucky dig around for the blanket.
Eventually, after being tucked into the blanket and crying because his hands weren't free, Christopher did fall asleep. Sarah May was then wide awake because of the noise but she was content to stare at Bucky and stick her tongue out occasionally when she yawned and got too tired to pull it back in. The trip went smoothly after that and when they arrived at Seneca, Lilly and Becca damn near burst from van the first chance they could.

---

Diana was quick to follow the girls out and she started to prance around the place and shove her nose in the snow to try and sniff out all the new scents around her. Steve carefully took Sarah May from the car seat and grabbed a few bags with his other hand. "Feels good to stretch my legs out again."

---

Sarah was quick to get Christopher and she brought him inside to get him a snack while Bucky started to unpack. Lilly was distracted by chasing Diana around in the snow and Becca was claiming where she was going to sleep in the cabin. Steve had decided to rent a large cabin this time that would fit all of them. "Someone please help me?" Bucky yelped as he was bombarded with all their stuff spilling out the back of the van.

---

Steve set their daughter down in the living room in her carrier and rushed outside to help Bucky. He coughed and panted but continued to pick up the various bags anyway. "I see this vacation is already relaxing for you," he joked.

---

Bucky scoffed and just threw his sisters' bags into the cabin and didn't care if they got annoyed with him for it. "Oh, I'm already planning a nap for as soon as I can," he said and started untying the sleds from the roof of the van. "Do Mindy and Fred know we are here? Or are we surprising them?"

---

Steve kissed his cheek and made a second trip back once he put the bags inside. "I didn't tell them. We can swing by their shop after you've had your nap," Steve suggested. "We can tell them about the kids."

---

"Can we bring the kids?" Bucky asked and slid the sleds out of the way of the van towards the shed. "I'm guessing Mindy would be pretty mad at us if we told her that we brought our babies but didn't bring them to meet her."

---

"If you want to. I just figured you'd want a little break from Christopher trying to pull your hair," Steve teased. He gave Bucky's ass a playful swat. "They're going to love them so much. Our kids are wonderful."

---

Bucky grabbed Steve's hand and pulled him in to give him a kiss. "Well, maybe you can hold Christopher and I'll hold Sarah May. That way my hair is safe." He gave Steve's ass a squeeze back and leaned against him a bit. "You remember how great our trip here last time was?"

---

Steve smiled into the kiss. "I loved the last time we were here. I got to meet the people who knew you growing up. You got your dad's old book and we got to be lazy in the fishing boat. And guess what, Buck? This vacation is going to be even better."

---

"It'll probably have significantly less sex," Bucky said and took Steve's hand and brought it up to his chest. "But that's okay because I get to be here with you and our kids. And we can see Christopher playing in the snow for the first time. And Diana already seems to be having fun."

---

"We can duck out in the woods and have sex with a moose watching us," Steve joked. He brushed his fingers gently over Bucky's cheek. He slid his other hand into Bucky's shirt and touched his back lightly. "Love you."

---

Bucky loved the feeling of Steve's warm hand on his back and he was getting a little antsy. "Hey, you think we could slip off and give each other blowjobs out in the shed? It's cold out here and I've got a nice warm mouth."

---

Steve let out a laugh and nipped at Bucky's lower lip. "I like the sound of that. Just check it for squirrels first, I don't want them going after our nuts."

---

"I'll guard your nuts, don't worry," Bucky said and pulled Steve towards the shed. "Come on. Let's show the squirrels how it's done, yeah?"

---

Steve laughed giddily and ran along with Bucky to the shed. He opened the door and as soon as it was shut, he pinned Bucky up against the wall and started pressing hot kisses down his throat.

---

Bucky hummed and immediately slid his hands down the back of Steve's pants. "God, I love you, Steve," he said and pulled their crotches close together so Steve could feel his already hard dick pushing against his zipper. "Guess what."

---

Steve grinded their hips together and he slowly kissed his lips. "What?" he asked as he unzipped the front of Bucky's pants. "What smart ass response do you have?"

---

Bucky chuckled and kept his gaze locked with Steve's. He wasn't wearing underwear. Steve would soon find out if he looked down. Bucky had packed all his clean ones and didn't have time to wash any laundry so he just went without.

---

Steve blushed when he was met with Bucky's bare cock. "You're such a ham," he laughed, kissing him before sinking down to his knees and pulling Bucky's pants down just a little ways.

---

Bucky giggled back and looked down at Steve. "Hey, I had a good reason for going commando," Bucky defended. "You sprung this trip on me so I packed all my clean underwear and you didn't give me time to do laundry for the rest. It was this or reuse a dirty pair and I preferred this option. And I think you do too."

---

Steve smiled and nipped at Bucky's thighs lightly. "You know, you sound very ungrateful that your loving husband decided to surprise you by organizing a trip to your favorite getaway spot," Steve teased.

---

"You sound like you don't have my cock in your mouth," Bucky sassed back and pet Steve's hair. "Just kidding, I am very grateful. I love that you did this for all of us. I think it's a great idea before the girls go back to school."

---

Steve rolled his eyes at all of Bucky's sass and then kissed lightly along his hard cock. "That's what I like to hear," he purred. He slowly took his husband into his mouth, moaning low as he sunk his head down on Bucky's dick.

---

Bucky whimpered a little bit at the feeling and let his head flop back and hit the wall. "Steve, Baby, your mouth feels so perfect around my dick. I swear, if I could, I wouldn't go a day without having your lips around me."

---

Steve groaned softly as the head of Bucky's cock slipped down his throat. He reached back and massaged Bucky's ass-cheeks lightly as he worked his lips steadily over his husband.

---

Bucky whined again and stared down at Steve. He was so pretty down on his knees taking his cock like that. He couldn't believe that they had been together for a year and a half now and almost been married for a whole year. Sometimes it felt like he had known Steve for a lifetime - that they had been connected forever just couldn't reach each other.

---

Steve looked up at Bucky, drinking in the sight of his husband looking so needy and aroused. He loved having him in his life and knowing that they had an amazing future ahead of him. Steve moaned around Bucky's length as he hollowed out his cheeks and guided Bucky's hand to his hair

---

Bucky grasped at Steve's hair and brushed it from his eyes. "I love you, Steve. I love you so much," he said and kept his eyes locked to Steve's. "Thank you for planning this trip. I'm glad to bring our kids here for the first time."

---

Steve dragged his tongue over the underside of Bucky's cock and looked like he would've said something if his mouth hadn't been occupied. He towed his nails slowly down Bucky's thighs.

---

Bucky groaned and tightened his grip on Steve's hair. "I'm going to come, Steve. Let me come on your face, please?" he asked and pet a thumb over Steve's cheek. He had let some stubble grow and Bucky was loving it.

---

Steve pulled back and aimed Bucky's cock towards his face without question. He jerked Bucky off quickly, thumbing at the head and closing his eyes so he wouldn't get come in them.

---

Bucky came with a deep groan and shaky knees. He shot out streams of hot come all over Steve's face and coated his lips. And the second he was done, he pulled Steve up and started kissing him clean through gasps of Steve's name and deep moans.

---

It wasn't often Bucky asked for that but Steve didn't mind. He kind of liked the way it made him feel like he belonged to Bucky. Because, Lord knows he wouldn't let anyone else do that. He purred and kissed Bucky back happily. "You look so sexy when you come."

---

"Baby, I'm nowhere near as sexy as you," Bucky said thankfully and scratched a hand through Steve's hair again. "I want to get you off now, though. How do you want it?" he asked and tucked himself back into his pants before slipping a hand down Steve's jeans.

---

Steve smiled and leaned heavily against Bucky. He hummed softly and pushed his hips into Bucky's hand. "I want you to make me come any way you want," he breathed.

---

Bucky nodded and used all his strength to hoist Steve's up to sit on the counter in the shed. Then he smiled at him and slowly released his dick from the front of his jeans. He didn't really have many adventurous ideas that they could implement in the shed with limited time and no lube, so he just decided to give Steve head too and hope that it held him over until they could do something else.
Steve laughed when Bucky lifted him up onto the countertop. "My big, strong husband," he complimented. Steve closed his eyes and tilted his head back when Bucky took his dick out. He raked his fingers through Bucky's hair. "Gonna put that pretty mouth to good use?"

"You gonna make me?" Bucky said slyly and gripped the base of Steve's dick a little tightly. He wasn't going to make him beg, though. He got down on his knees in front of Steve and carefully licked a few times around the head before taking the whole thing down at once.

"Please. You can't help yourself," Steve laughed. He moaned low as Bucky took him into his mouth. He gripped his hair tightly and was starting to really get into it when Diana started scratching at the door.

Bucky groaned and popped off of Steve. "Ignore her for a few minutes?" he asked and looked up at Steve, desperate to help his husband come. "I just started. She's fine, right?" he whined and squeezed Steve's leg.

Diana seemed to be trying to get to Steve and was excited that she found where he had went off to. She barked and scratched at it again. "Diana, go lay down, girl," Steve called out.

The dog kept it up for a couple more seconds then whimpered and seemed to settle for a bit. "Okay," Bucky sighed. "I'm going to suck you off before she finds someway inside here," he said quickly and took Steve's dick again as fast as he could as if he was going to get a prize for giving head the fastest.

Steve gave Bucky an apologetic look for his dog but then closed his eyes and groaned when Bucky started to suck him off like his life depended on it. "Fuck. Your mouth feels so good."

Bucky hummed around him and pulled out all the tricks he could to make Steve feel good but also speed the process along before they got interrupted again. Bucky knew that not everyone liked giving blowjobs. He knew some people who hated it. But Bucky really honestly loved it. And he hadn't loved it quite so much until he got to do it with Steve. Everything was better with Steve.

Steve didn't last very long. Blowing Bucky had made him so goddamn hard to start with and it was hard to last when Bucky gave blowjobs like a goddamned champion. He warned him before coming deep down his throat. "Fuck-" he swore.

Bucky sucked off every bit of come Steve gave him and swallowed it all with Steve watched with dark eyes. He slowly moved back up Steve's body and licked into his mouth as he zipped him back up in his pants. Diana went back to scratching at the door and Bucky bit Steve's lip lightly before backing off again.

---

When Diana started whining and scratching again, Steve laughed. "She's our other daughter," he joked as he opened the door for the dog.

---

Bucky sighed and moved out of the way so Diana could come bounding in and pounce on Steve. "No, Steve, I think she thinks she's your protector. Even from me." He felt a rush of cold blow in on the breeze through the now open door. "Alright, I'm cold now let's go see what everyone is doing."

---

Steve scooped his big puppy up into his arms and kissed her snout. Diana panted happily and wagged her tail as Steve carried her inside. Sarah had both of her grandchildren in her lap while Becca and Lilly played checkers with each other on the floor. "Where were you guys?" Lilly huffed.

---

"Looking in the shed to see if we had any ice skates or if I'll have to run out to the store a few miles out," Bucky said and sneered at her like she shouldn't doubt that he was doing just that. He walked over to Sarah and slipped his arms around Christopher and tickled him as he picked him up. "Hello, Bean!"

---

Steve covered his mouth to hide his guilty smile when Bucky seamlessly lied. Christopher giggled and hugged Bucky. "Papa!" he said happily. He pulled back and signed 'I love you'. Steve had been teaching that one to him.

---

Bucky gasped and kissed his son. "I love you too, Christopher!" He said and then signed back to him. "And Papa is so proud of you. And I'm so excited to play in the snow with you and skate on the lake with you and make you really cold hot chocolate so you don't burn your little tongue."

---

Steve smiled proudly at the two of them. Christopher giggled when he saw the reaction it got from his pops. He signed it again and wiggled excitedly in Bucky's arms. "Play?" he asked him.

---

"Yes, play, of course!" Bucky said and pet Christopher's hair. "Let's you and I go get you all bundled up and then we can see if Daddy wants to make some snow angels. Do you think Daddy wants to make snow angels with us, huh?"

---

"Yeah!" Steve said excitedly. "Let's play outside in the snow, Bean!" Steve got up to grab the baby bag and shuffled around for Christopher's warm clothes.
"Sarah, are you good to take care of the baby while we play for a bit?" Bucky asked. "I'm hoping to wear him out so nap time comes easy in about an hour."

"Of course," Steve's mom replied. She let Sarah May grab her finger and pull it towards her mouth. Christopher waved at his nana to make sure she didn't forget he was there. "Hi, Nana!"

"Nana is going to stay here with Ya-Ya for a bit while we play, okay?" Bucky said and nuzzled his son. "Come on, let's put you in warm clothes. Daddy is all ready to help us out. Look at your handsome Daddy, Christopher. Doesn't he look so happy to be here with us?"

Steve smiled and kissed both Bucky and his son. Once he got their little boy bundled up, he ushered them out the door and got a handful of snow to hold up for Christopher. "Look, Little Bean. It's snow!" He held it out to him closer.

Christopher looked at the snow mound for a second and then mashed his tiny gloved hand into it and giggled. "Oh, look at you! You've got it already," Bucky said cheerfully and brushed a few snowflakes from Christopher's hat. "You're so adorable, my precious boy."

Steve threw some more snow up in the air and watched as Christopher laughed hysterically at that. "Oh, he's so cute, Sweetheart," he said. "Look how happy he is!"

Bucky knelt down in the snow and set Christopher down so he could explore on his own for a little bit. Bucky looked up to Steve. "So, do we dare take him out ice skating on the lake or do we think that's got the potential to be too dangerous?"

"I don't think I want to risk him on the ice," Steve said. "He's too little and if the ice is thin I don't want to have him fall through." Christopher sat down in the snow and started to dig in it.

"Okay, I'm fine with that," Bucky said and pulled Steve down to kneel in the snow with them. "If it's thick enough ice then I think Lilly and I will skate. But I figured we should decide about Christopher together, of course."

Steve started to pile the snow onto Christopher's legs and bury him a little. He kissed his son's cheek and then laid back so he could make a snow angel. "You having fun, Christopher?"
When Christopher saw his daddy making a snow angel, he squealed and shook himself free of the snow to crawl on top of him and lay down on Steve's tummy. "Dada! Dada!" he yelled and banged his gloves on Steve's coat.

"Hello, Christopher," Steve said and picked him up. He held him up above him and made airplane noises. "Does your Dad and Pop love you? Yes, they do!"

Bucky laid down and rolled so he was pressed up against Steve's side with a hand resting on Christopher's back. "I think he likes the snow, Babe," he said and kissed Steve's cold cheek. "He's doing pretty well. Doesn't look too cold yet."

Steve turned his head and looked over at Bucky. "He's so cute. I love how much fun he's having. And you look pretty damn cute yourself. Your cheeks are rosy."

"Do I look handsome in the snow?" Bucky looked at the ends of his hair and saw some snowflakes sticking to it and sparkling in the sun. "I haven't played in the snow for probably ten years. When Lilly was young, she and I would make snowmen in the park after school."

"Did you ever make igloos?" Steve asked. Christopher crawled off and started to attempt to run in the snow but he fell because he couldn't lift his feet high enough.

"Oh, Bean!" Bucky yelped and crawled over to grab him. He wasn't crying but he looked stunned and confused by the cold snow sticking to his face. Bucky quickly took off his own glove and wiped Christopher's face clean. "Poor sweet boy." He chuckled and looked to Steve. "No, I've never made an igloo."

Christopher looked too surprised to be upset as his pop started to dust the snow off of his face. "Maybe we can get the girls outside to make an igloo. Wouldn't that be cool, Buck? Christopher will love it."

"How do we do that without ice blocks?" Bucky asked and looked around at the snow he saw around him. "I mean, we can try. Becca probably will stay inside this entire trip but Lilly will help us out." He smiled and leaned into Steve. "How about we go get Sarah May and we go see Fred and Mindy."

"You can make a good enough igloo out of snow. This isn't too fluffy and will hold up," Steve said.
Christopher tried and failed again at walking in the snow, so he settled for crawling. "Sounds like a plan."

"Okay, Christopher, let's go," Bucky said and scooped him up. The toddler immediately started whining and trying to get back down. "Bean, we're going to get your sister and then go meet some very nice people. No need to be upset."

Steve always hated hearing his son whine like that, even though he knew it was how babies pretty much communicated. Steve tried to console him with a bit of snow but Christopher wasn't having it. When they got inside, Becca huffed. "What's he crying about now?"

"He's fine. He just wants to be in the snow," Bucky sighed and passed Christopher off to Steve so he could get Sarah May. "Hello, Sweet Pea, are you ready to go meet some people who I'm sure will be so pleased to meet you?" Sarah May gurgled quietly and reached up for Bucky from her Nana's arms. Christopher calmed down a little when Bucky came back and he grabbed his sister's hand and said, "Ya-Ya, hi!"

Steve's heart just about melted when Christopher reached for her hand. Sarah May smiled over at him and flailed her free hand as if she wanted to say something, but didn't know how to. "You're such a good big brother, Christopher," Steve praised. "You want anything from the store, Ma?"

"Just some orange juice if they have any," Sarah said and got up to make a snack for herself and the girls.

Lilly jumped up and said, "Oh! Can you grab some gummy worms! I've wanted gummy worms all day."

"Yes, I will get gummy worms," Steve promised. He helped Bucky load their kids in the car and then got into the driver's seat so they could get on the trail. "They're going to freak out. Two kids in one year is crazy even for a normal couple."

"We have never been normal, though," Bucky observed and looked back at the babies in their seats. "But I think Mindy and Fred are well aware of that." When they arrived, Bucky carefully took Sarah May out of her carrier and held her close. She was looking around at everything she saw and silently cataloging the world around her. "Which one do you want?" he asked and came around to Christopher's side.

Steve picked up his son from the carrier. "I think I'm going to take my beautiful firstborn," Steve said. He kissed Christopher's cheek. "Look at this handsome boy. He's grown so big." Steve bounced Christopher in his arms as he led the way inside.

---

Fred was distracted reading the paper and Mindy was chattering away at him as if he was listening. When the door shut behind Steve and Bucky, it made a loud enough tinkle sound on the bell that they both looked up. Mindy gasped with wide eyes and came rushing towards them. "Boys, where did you come from? And who are these angels?" she asked and looked into Sarah May's curious eyes. "What are you doing here this time of year? No one but the residents are up here in the winter!" she paused again and slapped her hand on Bucky's shoulder in mock chastisement. "And why didn't you call first?"

---

Steve smiled proudly. Christopher let out a small squeal as if to remind Mindy that he was there, too. "It was a bit last minute... we decided on a whim that we wanted to spend our anniversary here. And Bucky said we should come visit so you get to meet our children."

---

Fred came over and gently shook Christopher's hand. "Now, how did the two of you rascals manage to get two little babies in less than a year?" he asked and let Christopher slap his arm happily. "Took me and Min four years after getting married to decide we were ready to start for Junior. And he waited another whole year to be conceived."

---

"I was on a drugs raid and found this little boy abandoned in the house. His parents went to prison, so I adopted him. And Sarah May was left at our church," Steve explained. "We are very blessed," he said. "We would've had a third baby – Grant. He would have been about two months old now. But he passed before his birth."

---

"Oh, lord..." Fred gave them both a sympathetic look and squeezed Steve's shoulder. "I'm so sorry to hear that, boys. Do you mind if I ask what happened?"

Mindy cleared her throat and looked at her husband sternly. "Fred, Dear, don't intrude."

---

Steve ducked his head and swallowed the lump in his throat. He wasn't really over it. He wouldn't ever be. "His mother was a good friend of ours. She wasn't well and when she passed, so did our son," he said. Steve was still bitter over her choice to harm herself and their boy, but she was Bucky's friend and she carried their baby for what life he had. "It was a tragedy."

---

Bucky leaned into Steve and kissed his neck once. "It's been a really rough couple of months for us. We are beyond grateful to have Sarah May but we really miss Grant. He will always be ours. But it's difficult. I'm sure you understand."

Mindy nodded and gave a small smile. "Well, how about you let me hold this baby girl while you shop for what you need, Bucky?" she said to change the subject.
Christopher watched as Bucky passed his sister over to Mindy. "Ya-Ya," he huffed, reaching out for her. Steve walked closer so their son wouldn't feel left out. "They are both so sweet," he said. "I know I'm biased, but our kids are really amazing."

Bucky picked up a basket and started collecting a few things they may need. Fred leaned back against his counter and said, "I remember being out on the lake one day with Old George and Jamie. Junior had just gotten his first ever girlfriend. I was talking about how I couldn't wait to be a grandfather. And George looked to Bucky and said, 'With the amount this one even acknowledges girls, I'll be lucky to have even one grandchild.'" Fred chuckled. "Boy, if he could see you now. Married to a fine officer of the law and raising two of George's grandbabies already."

Steve chuckled and kissed the top of his son's head. He set Christopher down so the boy could totter around. "What sort of stuff did George say he would want to do with his grandkids? Or things he hoped Bucky would do as a father?"

"Oh, he was pretty typical," Fred said and watched his wife holding Sarah May. "He wanted to do the type of things he didn't get to with Bucky. He was still in the navy when Bucky was a young boy and he was away a lot overseas. George would tell me how much he hated missing Bucky's first words and his first steps. And he didn't get to be the one to teach him how to ride a bike or how to play ball or shave his face when Bucky got a light beard in at age ten. George wanted to get to do all those first time things with his grandson. But he didn't end up getting that either, did he?"

Steve gave Christopher a sad frown. He hated that he wouldn't ever know either of his granddads. After a moment of thought, he said, "He gets to do all of that with Grant. Maybe Christopher and Sarah May aren't lucky enough to grow up with them. But our other little boy will be." He managed a little smile. "And Bucky will be around for our kids."

Fred patted Steve's back and shut up so he wouldn't make things worse. Mindy seemed to have taken to Sarah May and she looked up from her for just a second when Bucky came back. "So, Dears, you two weren't the only ones who thought it was a good idea to come to the lake for New Year's. Junior and his wife brought their kids up as well. Maybe you all can join us tonight for dinner."

Steve gasped. "That'd be perfect! All of the kids can play together. Christopher's never had a playdate before," he said. "And I got to introduce you to my mom, too. It's how Sarah May got her first name."

Mindy smiled and traded the baby for Bucky's basket so she could ring them up. "I would love to meet her, Steve."
"Is Junior still a firefighter?" Bucky asked and adjusted Sarah May's hat. "I haven't seen him for so long. It was great seeing Jesse last year. It'll be nice to catch up with Junior too."

---

Christopher started to get into mischief when he found a few trinkets so Steve was quick to scoop him back up. "He is," Mindy said proudly. "He saved a family the other month. Carried them all out on his own."

---

"Is he still a giant?" Bucky asked, a little distracted remembering when Junior was a teenager and Bucky was an impressionable young man coming of age and finding his sexuality. Junior had been one of his first crushes and he spent so much time trailing him around.

---

"He's six foot seven and all muscle," Fred said proudly. "He got those genes from me. His good looks come from his mom." Fred nudged his wife gently with a loving smile.

---

Bucky cleared his throat and said, "I wonder if he still has that scar on his upper arm. Remember that? I was being a show-off and jumped from that tree into the water. And when I didn't come back up right away, Junior sliced his arm on a log in the water jumping in to get me."

---

"Were you trying to impress the cute boy you hung out with every summer?" Steve teased. "No wonder you swooned for an officer who could come to your rescue."

---

"I like to be rescued by handsome men when I do dumb things, so what?" Bucky defended with a little embarrassed smile and paid Mindy for their supplies. Mindy told them to come to dinner at seven and then she sent them on their way.

---

"Say ‘bye-bye’ to Mindy and Fred, Christopher," Steve guided his son.

Christopher waved his little hand and chirped, "Bye-bye!"

Sarah May squirmed a little when they went back outside in the cold. "Ma will be sad she doesn't get to cook the first dinner here," Steve chuckled.

---

Bucky scoffed with a smile. "I'm sure your mother is more reasonable than that. She'll be happy to be with more people. Your mom is a hostess by nature. Even when she's the guest, she's still entertaining," Bucky said and clicked Sarah May into her car seat while Steve got Christopher settled.

---

"She's going to insist on baking dessert to bring over," he chuckled. As Steve settled Christopher in his seat, he started to wriggle and point, blabbering loudly at Steve. He turned around and gasped when he saw a large deer near the clearing.

---

Bucky looked to see what they were staring at and he grinned at his husband and his son. Steve had only ever seen deer up at the lake and this was Christopher's first time out of the city so it was new to him too. The deer watched them for a couple seconds then Christopher made a loud noise and it turned and ran back the way it came.

---

Steve loved the city but he was a sucker for animals and he loved the variety of creatures here. However, as soon as Christopher made barking noises at it, thinking it was some weird dog, the animal ran. "Aw, Bean. Did you scare the big old deer away?"

---

Christopher whined and looked at retreating deer. He reached for it and glanced at Steve like he could make it come back. "Dada no!" he said and pointed towards the woods. "Dada!" He whimpered and took a few shallow breaths what were usually a telltale sign that he was about to start crying.

---

Steve started to tickle Christopher's sides and started making silly noises in an attempt to distract him. "Hey, Bean! Let's go back to Nana! You want to play with Nana?"

---

Christopher tried to make his sad little upset noises again but he recognized what his daddy meant and he did want to see his nana. "Nana," he agreed quietly and stopped staring at the woods.

Bucky sighed in relief and got into the passenger's side. "Wow, good job. Crisis averted. He never listens to me like that. He always cries anyway."

---

Steve kissed Christopher's face a few times and got into the driver’s seat. "He loves his nana," Steve said. "She's a surefire way to get him to stop crying."

---

"Well, then let's go to her," Bucky said and looked back at his son. "Let's go get Nana!" Christopher bounced happily and sat as forward as he could in his car seat. Bucky turned back around and held out a hand for Steve's. That's what he loved most about Seneca. He could be more publicly open with Steve here. Fred and Mindy loved them and some of the other residents did too or at least didn't mind them. Only a few were against it but they were pretty much outweighed in opinion and power.

---

Steve held Bucky's hand and brought it to his lips to kiss the back of it. "I love you." When they got back to the house, Steve was happy to see Lilly bundled up and building a snowman. "I guess retiring here wouldn't be such a bad thing."
Bucky looked to Steve and squeezed his hand. He didn't want to start another argument like they had that morning. So he just leaned into Steve and gave him a kiss. "We can discuss it later down the road," he said with a smile. "But thank you for considering it for my sake."

Steve nodded and gave Bucky a gentle kiss. He gathered Christopher and held him on his hip. "Lee!" The little boy said happily, waving over at Lilly. "You think we are going to see more deer?"

Bucky grabbed Sarah May who was shivering and walked her towards the cabin. "I think we might. Although, they are probably hiding somewhere warm in all this snow." Bucky reached for Steve to follow him. "Come on, Christopher needs Nana and Sarah May needs some warmth."

Steve took their son inside and he squealed happily at the sight of his nana. Sarah smiled and stood up so she could take her grandson. "Did you boys have a good time?"

"Yes, it was great to see them," Bucky said and laid Sarah May down on the couch so he could wrap her tightly into one of her baby blankets. "They invited us over for dinner tonight. Their oldest son is going to be there with his wife and kids."

"Oh, that's so sweet of them," Sarah said pleasantly. "I'll bake a cake for everyone. It would be rude to go empty-handed. How many people will be there besides us?"

"I'm not sure," Bucky said as he sat back on the couch and held his daughter. She was sticking her tongue out slightly and staring at him quietly. Her dark hair was growing fast and curling up on her head. "It'll be Fred, Mindy, Junior, his wife, and their kids, but I don't know how many they have."

"I'll just assume they have three kids. If I underestimate, you boys don't take any and I'll make you some when we get back," Sarah said.

Sarah May gurgled up at her pop and reached up for his hair. Bucky's eyes went wide and he gasped. "No," he said softly and looked up at Steve. "She's learned her brother's bad habits. Look!" Sarah May was gripping on to the end of a chunk of Bucky's hair and silently humming at him happily.

Steve let out a booming laugh. "And she used to be such an angel. Now she's learning from her mischievous big brother." Christopher was happily singing nonsense at his nana, completely unaware that they were discussing him.
"Don't laugh!" Bucky said, scandalized. He gently pried his daughter's hand from his hair. "There's only two solutions. You grow your hair out so they do this to you too. Or I have to cut mine and I know you like my long hair."

Steve gasped. "You're not being serious, are you?" Steve liked having short hair, but he loved Bucky's long hair more than keeping his own and this wasn't the first time Bucky had threatened to cut his hair. And as much as Steve knew Bucky's hair was important to him, Bucky was also impulsive enough that he just might do it.

Sarah May reached up again and this time actually tugged down on Bucky's hair, hard. "Ow, fuck," Bucky groaned and looked to Steve. "Come, just... come take her so I can have Becca braid my hair."

"Don't swear," Steve scolded. "Christopher can hear you." He hurried over and took a hair band from his wrist and started to braid his hair diligently, gently tugging it from his daughter's hands.

Bucky gritted his teeth and said, "It was an accident." Although, he still didn't see what the big deal was with swearing around the kids. He and his sisters heard swearing their whole lives. But he wasn't in a mood to fight Steve about it.

Once Bucky's hair was braided, Sarah May looked around wildly to see where all of her pop's hair had gone. Thinking it disappeared, or not recognizing him, her eyes started to water and her lower lip trembled.

Bucky looked down at his daughter and then over at Steve. He didn't know what to do. He wasn't going to just give her his hair back. Also, he had a headache. "Please, take her. Steve, please," Bucky said and held her up to him. He hated that sometimes he just didn't know what to do and, if his head hurt, he needed help. It was just like his mom. Sometimes Bucky and she would be home alone with one or both of the girls and if she got a headache, she needed to hide away in her bedroom in the dark and wait it out while Bucky held down the fort.

Steve quickly took his daughter and kissed her face. "Hello, beautiful girl! Do you want your plushie? I know how much you love your bear!" He swayed her gently as he took her to the toy bag and successfully avoided a cry fest.

Bucky quietly sneaked off to his and Steve's room and curled up on the bed. He took some medicine and pulled out his wallet from his pocket. He was back up to two months sober and he kept his chip in his pocket as a reminder. He took it out and turned it over in his hand to try to help calm himself down. He then took out a copy he had made of Grant's footprints that he kept with him everywhere he went.

---

A few minutes later, Steve came inside with Diana at his feet. He had set Sarah May down for a nap with her bear. He walked over and wrapped his arm around Bucky's waist. "Hey, Beautiful," he said softly. "You alright?"

---

Bucky sighed and closed his eyes. "I'm sorry, Steve," he said quietly. "My headaches have been getting worse and more frequent. I'm sorry. That's not how a father should be. I should be able to handle taking care of my own baby girl."

---

"Hey, it's alright, Love," Steve said as he kissed his face a few times. "We support each other. Remember when I couldn't even walk and you were right there with me to get me through the day?"

---

"Yeah, but we didn't have kids then," Bucky sighed. "And you're all better now. I don't know why I get these headaches. It's just that they come on so sudden and then I just get so grumpy and I'm in pain and I can't stop our baby girl from crying because I took my hair from her."

---

Steve massaged the back of Bucky's neck. "Well, what if I couldn't walk tomorrow? I wouldn't be a bad parent because of something I can't control. What's important is that you do your best."

---

"I don't want to think about that," Bucky mumbled and touched Steve's chest. He had already been through so much when he was an officer. Sometimes Bucky forgot Steve had been shot and then he would take off his shirt and he would see the scar. And sometimes Bucky forgot Steve's lung were at half capacity and then he would try walking up a flight of stairs and be breathing heavily by the time he reached the top.

---

Steve eased Bucky to lay down and he laid on his side next to him with his arm wrapped around his waist. "You're an amazing dad, Buck. Our kids look up to you so much. And your sisters do, too."

---

"I could be better," Bucky said softly and grabbed his two-month chip. "I know that I am getting better and I've been more stable and sober now than I've ever been. But I could be so much better as a guardian and a father."

---

"We always can be better. That's what makes us human," he said. He held Bucky's hand and kissed the sobriety chip too. "So strive to be better, just like you do every day."
Bucky nodded and tucked the chip back into his wallet. He pulled Steve in for a kiss and held his hands on either side of Steve's face. He kissed him several times on the cheeks and neck and then back to Steve's lips. "I love you. I'll work on being better. I promise."

Steve hummed softly as Bucky kissed him. He stroked his hand over Bucky's hair, careful not to disturb the braid. "I know, Love," he said. He rested their foreheads together and laid there for a several long minutes before giving him a nudge. "We should probably check on the kids."

Bucky groaned quietly and sighed. "How much headache medicine is a guy my age and size allowed to take because it's not gone. It's better, but not gone," he said and sat up slowly in bed, rubbing his eyes and trying not to get down on himself again.

"Two pills every six hours, no more than six pills a day," Steve said. He had read the instructions on the bottle for each of the different headache medicines Bucky had. "You should get that checked out, you know."

Bucky pulled on one of Steve's jackets and zipped it up. "You've been saying that for a year," he mumbled and checked himself in the mirror. He just hated going to the doctor. He even hated having to be there with his babies and seeing them get vaccines. He knew it was important for their health but it scared him. Doctors scared him.

"I know. Because I want to make sure you're healthy and that this isn't some underlying issue. What if it's something completely curable and you've been suffering for no reason?" Steve asked.

Bucky took Steve's hand. "But, Steve," he looked into his husband's eyes and pleaded with him to understand. "What if it's not curable? What if some doctor tells me I have to live with it for my whole life? At least now I get to pretend it's just an unfortunate occurrence that will fade once my kids are all grown and my life is quiet and peaceful. Or what if it's something curable but they would have to do surgery? I don't want someone digging around in my head, Steve."

"You should at least know what you're up against, Baby. What if it's something that'll only get worse unless you get surgery? Or get it treated. If you won't do it for yourself or for me, then do it for our kids."

Bucky knit his brow and frowned in concern. He didn't like that option either. His mother had those problems until she died. What if she actually had some issue that would have killed her a few years down the road anyway? What if that's what Bucky had too? "I'm scared," he said and flicked his eyes across Steve's face.

Steve gave Bucky a tight hug. "You don't have to be scared about it. It could be nothing. But we won't know for sure unless we see a doctor about it," Steve said gently.

"You have to go with me," Bucky said and gripped on to Steve. "I can't do it by myself. I need you there." He really was scared but he knew Steve was right. And he would do it for his husband and his sisters and his kids.

"Of course I'd go with you." Steve leaned forward to kiss him softly. "How could I not? Besides, it's not like I have a job I have to answer to."

"Okay. When we get home, I'll call and schedule something," Bucky said a little reluctantly and gave Steve a hug before pulling him up off the bed. "Alright, now we can go back out there. We need to wear Christopher out and let him nap before we go to Mindy and Fred's tonight."

Steve sat up and got onto his feet. When they got into the babies' room, Christopher scampered over to them. "Papa!" he shouted excitedly.

"Bean," Bucky said and scooped him up off the ground. "How is my sweet baby boy?" he asked and laid down on the ground with him on his chest. "You want to play? We have blocks. Daddy packed the blocks. Right, Daddy? We have blocks?" He figured he could handle playing blocks with his son right now. That wasn’t as much of a risk of having his headache get worse than some of his noise-maker toys.

"Blahs" Christopher said in an excited, little voice as he tried to say 'blocks'. Steve laughed as Christopher crawled all over his papa's chest. He smiled and pushed the bag of blocks over to them.

Bucky grabbed Christopher's toy bag and helped take out all the blocks for him. "Steve, I don't think we are going to have speech problems with Christopher. He's so smart," Bucky said and looked to Steve then to his son. "Tell Daddy how smart you are, Little Bean. Say 'blocks'!"

"It's cause he gets so much attention and we all talk to him every day," Steve said. "And he really is a smart boy."

Steve watched proudly as Christopher held up a block. "Dada! Blahs!"
Bucky beamed at him and kissed his cheeks a few times. "You're such a brilliant little boy. Look at you!" He helped Christopher build a block tower and tried again to help him with colors. "Okay, Bean, purple," he said and held up a block that was more magenta than it was purple.

---

Christopher threw his hands up and said, "Papa!" in a big voice. Steve let out a laugh. Christopher's brain only went so far. Sarah May looked out of the crib at them and let out an unhappy noise.

---

"I guess that is pretty close to 'purple'," Bucky decided and looked over at Sarah May. "Do you want me to take Christopher to a different room so she can rest a little longer?" he asked Steve and pulled a block from Christopher's hand before he could throw it at his Papa's head.

---

"It's alright. I think poor Sarah May has to get used to a bit of noise. I don't think there will ever be much peace and quiet in our home," Steve said.

---

"No, I'm sure not," Bucky laughed. "With the amount of kids that we are going to have, there isn't going to be silence for decades." Christopher grabbed a different block and starting gnawing on it. "Sweetheart, you're going to hurt your gums."

---

"Papa, no!" Christopher scolded, copying Steve's tone the best he could since he was used to his dad reprimanding him when he misbehaved.

---

Bucky shook his head, taken aback. "Baby, I don't want you to cut your gums on blocks. I don't want you hurting yourself, Christopher."

Christopher just yelled, "No!" again and bit down on a block.

---

Steve didn't like it when Christopher raised his voice like that, so he got up and gently-but-firmly took the block from his hand and started to put them in the bag. "All done, Christopher. We don't yell at our papa."

---

Christopher immediately started crying and trying to pull the bag towards him to get the blocks. He screamed a little and Bucky hoisted him up so he couldn't get to the toys. "Bean, shush, please," Bucky said and tried to calm him down. He pet his hair but nothing was helping.

---

Sarah May turned started to cry at the noise. Steve sighed in defeat and gently took her from her crib and rocked her back and forth. "I'm sorry, Sweet Pea. I'm sorry it's so loud."
Bucky kissed his son and bounced him to try to get him to quiet down. "Steve, can I give him a toy? Please? Just one of his plush dinos or something? He's not going to stop," Bucky pleaded with Steve and felt as Christopher reached back and pulled the ponytail from Bucky's braid and started to tug on it.

---

Steve shifted Sarah into one arm and took Christopher from Bucky and held him in his other. "I'll calm him down," Steve said. "Christopher, you are being a bad boy right now. Don't pull on Papa’s hair."

---

Christopher curled up into Steve's chest and clunked his head on his shoulder and cried. Bucky carefully took Sarah May and held her close. She was looking up at him with big wet eyes and her nose and cheeks were red. "It's okay Sweet Pea. It's okay. You're a sensitive one aren't you?"

---

Sarah May looked pathetic and all sad over the ruckus her brother was causing. Steve kissed his son’s face over and over. "Little Bean, you were being very fresh. I love you so much but I can't have you treating your pop like that."

---

Sarah May reached a hand up and touched Bucky's beard that had grown back in the last month. Sarah May seemed to like his beard. She liked to pet it. Bucky kissed her hand and sighed. "It's fine, Steve, he's just grumpy because he needs to nap. If he sleeps now he can get an hour or two in before we have to go."

---

While Steve tried to settle their son down in his crib, Becca came over to Bucky and looked at the baby in his arms. She was hoping she could get them both to calm down and stop being so loud. Becca pet her hand over Sarah May's hair. "Even though she's adopted, she kind of looks like you."

---

Bucky glanced at his sister. "You really think she looks like me? I always thought Christopher looked like Steve. That kid is definitely Irish. I don't know what Sarah May looks like but she does have darker hair like mine." Bucky looked into her dark brown eyes and smiled. "I can see it. Except her eyes."

---

"He does look like Steve," Becca agreed. "I guess you two really lucked out that you not only got kids, but ones that could pass for your biological ones," she said. "Are you guys ever going to try to find a woman to do that test-tube thing to have ones that have your genes?"

---

Bucky sighed and watched Steve across the room tucking Christopher in. "I'm not sure. We haven't discussed that. I don't know if either of us would feel comfortable doing that. And I know that there are so many kids like these two that need families. I plan on talking to him about it at some point but not yet. We got really lucky with these two and it's still very raw what happened with Grant."
"Yeah, I guess," she sighed. Becca felt bad for her brother and Steve even though she didn't understand what pain it was to lose a child. "If I told the me from a year ago that you'd have two kids I don't think I would have believed you'd be responsible enough for them," she joked.

Bucky scoffed. "Thanks," he said grumpily and looked to Becca. He knew she was just trying to be nice but it was a little annoying to him that she was so dead set on him being irresponsible. He knew it was a trend for years but it was different now. "Do you want to hold Sarah May so I can help Steve's mom make that cake?"

Becca looked at the baby. Usually, she didn't hold them. She typically minded them while they slept or were in their carriers, but she wasn't too afraid to hold her. "Alright." She held her hands out for Sarah May.

Bucky carefully passed his daughter off to Becca and sighed. He kissed Sarah May's head and then went to help in the kitchen. Bucky wouldn't admit it, but his head still hurt and he wanted a little break from watching the kids. Also, his mind was running through too much at once and he could use a distraction of attempting to help make dessert.

Sarah could tell that Bucky was frazzled, so she made him some hot chocolate and insisted that he sit down. "Vacations aren't vacations for parents. It's just watching your kids in a different place."

Bucky smiled weakly at her and took the hot chocolate. "I commend you, Sarah. Being a parent is hard work. I thought I would have this all worked out since I've raised two girls for five years. But it's definitely different raising babies. And when I was helping with my sisters as newborns, I could hide in my room with an excuse of doing homework or something. I can't quite do that anymore."

"Now imagine if you did it on your own and then you'd have a look into my life," she joked softly. "But I'm pretty sure you've had a taste of that already." She placed the cake in the oven. "You'll learn to manage over time."

Bucky laughed humorlessly. "Yeah, there's no way I could do this on my own. I hardly managed on my own with the girls. Just ask either of them... or Steve or Clint or anyone in Brooklyn. I know for a fact I would be a failure if I didn't have Steve. He makes me better. You know that?"

"You would've found a way even if you hadn't met my son," Sarah said. "You two make each other better." She took a seat across from him and gave Bucky a loving smile.
"Thanks," Bucky said and smiled a little sadly at her. "I'm really glad that you're so loving and understanding of Steve. I don't think many parents would be supportive of their son marrying a man. I'm pretty sure my parents would have been okay with it. I think they knew I was gay even though I didn't say anything. But, my point is, you mean the world to Steve and he was so scared about telling you. You remember. And I just want to thank you for being so good to me and my sisters. You didn't have to be. But you were."

"I was hurt at first that he was so afraid to tell me. I thought, what kind of mother am I that my own son can't tell me who he loves? But after seeing what you poor boys have gone through, I understand why he was hesitant to tell me," she said. "You don't have to thank me for anything. I mean, what kind of mother would I be if I didn't embrace my son's family?"

Bucky reached out and gripped Sarah's hand. "It's been really nice having a mother around again. I know it's been great for the girls. Sometimes I try to be my dad and I just can't be as great with my sisters as he was. I think it really helped them when you came along and treated them like your own."

Sarah held Bucky's hand and smiled over at him. "It makes me happier than you know to have such a big family now. Steve was always enough for me. But opening my heart to more children means the world." She then pulled her hand back and gave Bucky a little swat. "Now, go see if your husband needs help with anything."

"Yes, ma'am," Bucky said and stood up. "Thanks for letting me take a break with you." He downed the rest of his hot chocolate and went off to find where Steve had gone with Christopher. Hopefully, he had him down for a nap and they could take it easy before they needed to go out again.

Steve had both children sleeping soundly in their little crib and he was watching both of them. He looked up when he saw Bucky approach. "Hey, Baby. Feeling better?"

"Yeah, I'm feeling better," Bucky promised him and slipped his arms around Steve's middle. "How long have they been asleep? I don't want to disturb them. They might sleep until we have to go."

"About five minutes or so. Once Christopher saw how comfy Sarah May looked, he wanted in on the slumber party, too," Steve chuckled.

"I'm really glad he's warmed up to her so quickly," Bucky said in a soft whisper and leaned into Steve. "I was a little worried. But now he wants to be close to her and tries to teach her what he has learned, either good or bad. And I just love it when he says, 'Ya-Ya' to her."

---

Steve smiled fondly. "We raised him right. He wants to help her, when he’s not in a bad mood," he chuckled. "And, you're right, his name for her is too damn cute. I wonder what Sarah May is going to call him when she first learns how to speak."

---

"I'm not sure but it'll be just as adorable and I'll probably be just as emotional," Bucky said and gave Steve a kiss. "Just imagine the last kid we have might be a baby while Christopher is a teenager. Imagine that baby learning to walk and talk and having Christopher around to show them the ropes because by then he will be an old pro at babies running all through the house."

---

Steve laid his head on Bucky's shoulder. "He's probably going to start asking us to slow down on the kids after the fourth or fifth," he joked. "He's going to be a loving older brother just like you are."

---

"Oh, come on, he will know we want a dozen or more and he will recognize the challenges and rewards in that. Just you wait, he's going to be helping take the youngest to kindergarten and little league practices."

---

"Why would we need him to do that when I'll be home?" Steve asked. "I wonder if he's going to be tall. Or if he's going to be a little guy. It's not like we know too much about where he came from. I'm convinced Sarah May is always going to be tiny."

---

Bucky chuckled softly and held Steve's hand. "Baby, I know you'll be home but what if you've got to do something like a doctor's appointment for one of the other dozen kids and need Christopher to pick up the youngest ones." He nuzzled against Steve and added. "I just hope we can figure out where Sarah May's biological family is from. Maybe we can ask Fred what he thinks, he's a smart guy, well-traveled."

---

Steve shrugged a bit and looked down at their kids. "I guess. I do want Christopher to be a good brother but I don't want him to feel like he's playing third parent, you know?" He shifted his gaze to Sarah May. "Let's ask Fred, sure."

---

"Baby, he's not going to be a third parent. I'll be around. But you know with all those kids, if I'm at work and you have to be somewhere else with one of the others, then he might be our helper," Bucky said. "I helped my mom with the babies when I was younger. Dad was working and Mom had me there to help. It's just how it is when you are a sibling."
"I suppose. I wouldn't know, I guess. Being an only child wasn’t like that," Steve said. Sarah May made a little noise in her sleep and stretched her legs out.

---

Bucky held his breath for a moment, hoping he hadn't woken his daughter. "Let's let them sleep," he whispered to Steve and gently pushed him so he would get going. "Christopher will be a terror at dinner if he doesn't get a nap right now."

---

Steve nodded. He took Bucky's hand so he could lead him out of the room. "They're perfect," he sighed. "Even though Sarah May started pulling your hair."

---

"It's okay. I'll have to get used to it. That'll be my life until all our babies are grown up," Bucky said and squeezed Steve's hand. "I'll just wear my hair in a braid for years and hope that no one else besides those two learn how to pull it out."

---

Steve chuckled. "Yeah, I still can't believe that we have two little babies to raise and we've only been married a year. Talk about luck, huh?"

---

Bucky smiled back and rested his head on Steve's shoulder. It would be three beautiful little babies in a year, but Bucky wasn't going to mention that. "We are just about the luckiest men in the world, I'd think. I know I am. I landed a perfect guy like you and got him to marry me. That's lucky."

---

Steve pet his hands over Bucky's hair. "I'm the lucky one." He pulled back and moved to hover over by the couch. He plucked Becca's book from her hands playfully. "Tell me I'm the coolest brother-in-law ever and I'll give you the book back," he teased.

---

Becca stared at him as she reached into her backpack next to the couch, pulled out a different book, and started reading where the bookmark was. Bucky laughed and took the book back from Steve. "This is why you can't mess with her, Baby. You can't win against that stonewall face."

---

Steve watched in disbelief and then let out an indignant chuckle. "Alright, you win," he sighed. "Sarah May isn't allowed to learn that from her. I need to win against my own kids."

---

"Why do you want to take books from our kids?" Bucky said and pulled Steve on to the other couch with him. "Don't we want them to be smart? Or at least smart enough to pass school and all that. Smarter than me. That's a good gauge for it."
"Well, I want to be able to mess with them sometimes without losing to them because they are being smartasses with me," Steve complained.

---

Bucky giggled and got Steve's face in his hands. "Am I going to have to be the strict parent? Don't make me do that, Steve. You know you're more cut out for that." He kissed Steve and tugged his hair just a bit. "Our kids are going to come crying to me that their daddy is pulling pranks."

---

"What? Just cause I used to be a cop I got to lay down the law in my own home too?" Steve smiled and kissed Bucky's lips lightly. "I want to prank my kids. It means that I love them."

---

"You can prank them if you want but don't be mad at me when the sensitive ones come crying because they don't like pranks," Bucky said. "And you know I hate most pranks so I'll be on their side."

---

Steve smiled fondly. "Well, that's what family is for. They get on your nerves because nobody else is allowed to," he said. "It'll help our kids build character and stand up to bullies."

---

"Okay, whatever you say, Love," Bucky chuckled and then covered up a yawn. "Can we nap while the kids are napping so we will be ready for dinner tonight? Look, Becca is reading. Lilly is still outside in the snow. Your mom is..." Bucky glanced over at Sarah in the kitchen. "...sewing a rip in my jeans. I didn't even pack those pair. Did she take them from the laundry to fix them on this trip?"

---

Steve let out a laugh because that was so typical of his mom. "Yeah, she still refuses to let me throw away any clothes just because there's a hole in them. I swear I planned on mending them when I got back." He kissed Bucky's forehead. "Let's go nap, Baby. I'm sure we will need energy for later."
The babies let Steve and Bucky nap for about an hour before there was simultaneous crying coming from their room. They managed to get the both of them settled down and ready to go to Fred and Mindy's. Shortly after, they arrived at the house with Lilly and Becca behind them and Sarah holding her dessert proudly. Fred and Mindy were excited to see them all again and welcomed Sarah in first since she was carrying a heavy-looking cake. "Looks like we are having a full house tonight, eh, Jamie?" Fred chuckled.

---

"Jamie?" Becca asked curiously and looked to Bucky with a sly smile.

"Shut it," Bucky said back to her before shaking Fred's hand and following him through the hall to the dining room. They owned one of the largest cabins around the lake. They had been in this one since their oldest boy was in primary school. Bucky was about to ask where Junior was when a beast of a man came into the dining area carrying a tray of barbecue chicken for Mindy. "My god, Junior..." Bucky whispered and caught himself looking him up and down. He looked so much like he did when he was younger, just a lot bigger. Bucky was back at age twelve, breaking his leg on a hiking trip with Junior and his brothers and being carried all the way back down the hill in Junior's strong arms.

---

Steve had been standing with a baby in either arm and for once, he felt a tinge of jealousy when he saw Bucky looking some other guy over like that. It didn't help matters that Junior really was a good-looking guy. He coolly walked over and stood next to Bucky with a smile. "Hi, I'm Steve. I'd shake your hand, but my hands are occupied with mine and Bucky's kids," Steve said with a bit of a pointed edge.

---

"Right, uh," Bucky cleared his throat and took Christopher from Steve. "Junior, this is my husband Steve. I, uh, I can't believe you're here. I haven't seen you in about eight years. How's the fire department?"

Junior smiled and shook Steve's hand. "Good to meet you, Steve. I'm Frederick Watkins Jr. so I'm usually just called Junior. And the department is good. I'm the chief of my division now."

---

Christopher hadn't seen someone so tall so close to him before. Even he was staring up at Junior with his mouth open in awe. "That’s pretty young to be a chief already. You must be doing a great job there," Steve said. "Hey, uh, I heard you were bringing your kids around. Can Christopher play with them?"
"Yes, of course," Junior said and gestured towards the door for the kitchen. "Bucky, my wife and kids are in the living room if you want to take your son to meet them. You remember where it is, I'm sure." He smiled and started putting utensils and napkins around all the plates. "And, yes, as a matter-of-fact, I'm the youngest chief in my department's history. Although, don't let that impress you much. I am already thirty-three. The second youngest chief was thirty-five." Junior nodded and glanced over at Bucky who was still pretty distracted.

Steve nodded at Junior. "It's still pretty impressive."

Some kid's laughter could be heard in the other room and Christopher urgently tugged at Bucky's shirt. "Play?" he asked.

"Yes, Bean," Steve said softly. "Buck, can you show me to the living room?"

Bucky snapped back. "Yeah, yes, sorry." He touched Steve's arm and guided him through to the kitchen door. Mindy waved at them from where she was showing Becca how to drizzle some sort of sauce on to a casserole. Bucky walked them through the kitchen to the hall and then pointed where a woman and three kids were sitting in a circle playing with a set of farm animals. "There we are."

Christopher gasped and started to squirm excitedly when he saw the toys. Steve set him down gently and said, "Play nice, Christopher." He smiled over at the woman and waved. "Hello, I'm Steve. My son hasn't really gotten a chance to play with other kids yet. Just his sister."

The woman smiled back at them and held out her hand. "You're the husband?" she asked in a light southern drawl and her red hair bounced as she moved. "Mindy told me about you two. She's very proud of Bucky. Practically considers him a fifth son." She waved Bucky over to join them and shook his hand as well. "I'm Maureen. Nice to meet you both."

Steve smiled. "Yeah, I am. We're here for our anniversary," he said. "It's nice to meet you, Maureen." He shook her hand and took a seat to keep an eye on Christopher, who was, so far, behaving himself. Sarah May stared at Maureen's red hair. "What are your kids' names?"

Maureen gestured to the oldest, a boy of about five or six, "This one is Freddie - Fred Watkins the Third, I'm sure you could guess. Then we have Camilla and then Helene." She patted her stomach softly. "And we have mystery Watkins number four in here."

Steve gave her a big smile. "Oh my god, congratulations!" he said. "How far along are you? Do you know if it's a girl or boy yet?" he asked.
Maureen giggled and said, "Well, I'm about three and a half months along. Junior doesn't want to know if it's a boy or a girl so we aren't finding out this time. But I'll let you in on a secret that you can't share with my husband." She looked past Steve and Bucky as if she expected Junior to be right around the corner. Then she covered Freddie's ears and whispered. "I know it's twins. We haven't gone to prove it yet but I can just feel it. Junior's going to be so excited."

Steve grinned even wider. "Oh, man. That's amazing!" he said excitedly. "Did you hear that, Buck?" Christopher looked up from his playing when he heard his dad get excited and he let out a happy shout too, copying him. "Congratulations."

Bucky nodded and looked over at Maureen, "Yeah, congratulations. Five children is a lot. How many do you and Junior want to have? Steve and I are shooting for something like half the population of Brooklyn."

Steve laughed and nudged Bucky lightly. Sarah May whined at the jostling movement and buried her face in Steve's chest. "I'm thinking five is enough. But I'd love however many children we have. Sometimes things happen that we don't plan for... like twins," she chuckled.

Bucky took Sarah May from Steve so he could hold her still and secure so her daddy could help Christopher play. "That's good. That's just about how we feel. We hadn't necessarily planned for the children we have. They sort of found their way to us in a stroke of luck or a miracle or something."

Steve saw Christopher getting a bit possessive over a toy so he asked Christopher to see it. The toddler surrendered the toy to his dad and started playing with a new one. "I would love to have twins," Steve said. "I bet in a year's time you're going to tell me twins are more of a handful than I can imagine."

"I bet in a year's time we will have twins of our own somehow and we can commiserate together," Bucky said and pet Sarah May's hair.

Maureen chuckled and handed Christopher a plush dog that one of her girls had discarded in favor of a toy car. "I heard you two saw Jesse last year. He and Junior were fishing together a few weeks ago and they discussed you both. Of course, we didn't know then that you already had two little ones. I bet Jesse will be happy to hear it."

"Yeah, I got to meet Jesse the last time we were here. He's a pretty nice guy, I like him," Steve said and watched Christopher wave the plush dog around. "Have you been thinking of names for the future kids yet?"
"We don't know," Maureen said and rubbed her tummy. "If it is twins like I believe, and if they are girls, I would like to name them for the both of our grandmothers."

Junior came in then and Maureen motioned so Steve would know to hush up. Junior bent down and gave his wife a kiss then ruffled Freddie's hair. "Maureen, are you boring these gentlemen?"

"She's not boring us," Steve said. "We are talking babies and I love kids." He tickled Sarah May's feet. "So what's it like once they start talking in full sentences?"

"Overwhelming," Junior said and took a seat next to Bucky on the couch. "It's wonderful and you're so proud of them. But then they start back-talking and it gets a little more complicated than it was when it was just cute."

Steve eyed Bucky to make sure he wouldn't swoon over Junior when he sat down next to him. "Christopher will learn quick that we won't stand for back talking," Steve said. "I want to make sure our kids know respect." He watched as Christopher started a game of throwing the stuffed toy and then chasing after it.

Bucky couldn't really help himself but give Junior another once over as he sat next to him. "Junior, I remember when you were a teenager and you were dating this girl from Paramus and then the second you found out she never wanted kids you were out of there. But now, seeing you actually married with kids is just wild."

Steve huffed softly and gave Bucky a small nudge when he caught him staring. Junior chuckled politely and said, "She was a nice girl. But I wanted kids so bad. I'm glad I was able to meet my soul mate and have a bunch of baby Junior’s and Maureen's."

Maureen blushed and smiled over at her husband. "Only took you a vacation to Alabama to find me," she said happily and picked up her youngest who was trying to crawl under the couch.

Junior nodded and looked to Steve. "And I'm glad Bucky found you. Me and all my brothers are. We were always pretty worried about him. Never thought he would get to find a guy quite like you." He turned his attention back to Bucky, "And, yes, the four of knew where your interests lied even when we were kids. You were just about as subtle as you are now, Jamie."

"I'm lucky to have found him. God made us for each other, I'm sure if it. And he's given us our children because he sees how we cherish each other." He picked up Christopher so he could cuddle him. "I'm glad I'm not the only one who noticed Bucky still eyeing you," he said to junior.
"I..." Bucky started to try to defend himself but couldn't think of a valid response. "Yeah, well, I guess I should thank you for not treating me any different for who I was."

Junior nodded and clapped Bucky on the back. "I kind of liked it. It was pretty endearing to have my own shadow around this place when you and Old George came to town."

"Now you've got three little shadows running after you all the time," Steve said with a nod at the children. Christopher climbed down from Steve's lap to get the stuffed toy. He came back up into Steve's lap and pushed the toy towards his little sister. "Ya-Ya."

Sarah May looked at the plushie for a second and then extended her little hand to try to grip on to it. It dropped when Christopher let go and his sister wasn't able to hold it up on her own. Christopher grumbled but tried again but to no avail. Mindy came into the living room with Becca tucked right next to her so they could call everyone for dinner.

"Ya-Ya," Christopher huffed in frustration as if Sarah May was a lost cause. The little baby smiled over at her brother, amused by him playing with her. "Alright, little bean, it's time to eat." Steve signed 'food' to Christopher and scooped him up into his arms.

Christopher happily signed back to Steve and wiggled in his arms. He was hungry. The rest of them followed Steve to the dining room and sat down together. There were only so many high chairs so Bucky and Maureen both ended up holding their youngest kids.

Before he dug into his own dinner, Steve cut up the food for Christopher and made a bottle of formula for the babies so Maureen and Junior wouldn't have to worry. "Thank you for having us all over for dinner," Steve said. "It's nice to be back."

Mindy, who had been talking up a storm to Sarah about nothing in particular, waved her hand dismissively. "Oh, it's no trouble. We weren't sure when we were going to see you again."

Fred nodded and swallowed a bite of his food, "In the future, a couple of phone calls between visits wouldn't kill you."

Steve gave a guilty smile. "Yeah, I suppose we could have been more communicative," he admitted. "I'll write down our phone number before we go in case you want to call us about something, too."

Fred nodded his thanks and looked to Christopher who was shoving warm noodles in his mouth and trying to talk through it. "Your boy has a lot to say, doesn't he?"
"Yes, he does," Bucky agreed as Sarah May finished up her bottle. "He's really smart too. He can say a lot of different words really well and then others he tries to say but can't quite get there."

---

"Yeah, like ‘Sarah May’. He can't say her name, so he made one up for her," Steve added. He kissed his son's cheek. "Junior didn't talk for ages, but, when he did, he said things right for the most part. I guess he didn't want to do things until he knew how to do it right," Fred said.

---

"Junior has always been that way with most everything," Mindy added. After he knew he was going to marry Maureen, he didn't speak of it until he had the perfect proposal plan. And when Maureen wanted to start having kids, Junior had to read as many parenting books as he could until he thought he was ready."

"Wow," Bucky murmured. "Steve's kind of the exact opposite. Once he feels something, he's set on it until he gets it. It's all very quick with Steve. If you aren't right on board with him, you're going to fall behind fast."

---

"Hey," Steve laughed, giving Bucky a nudge. "It hasn't steered us wrong, has it?" He looked over at Fred. "He talks as if I'm impulsive, but it's not like I brought a kid home out of the blue or anything," Steve joked.

---

"Yes, you did," Bucky chuckled. "Twice! It's not like it happened once and it was a good story for later. That's how both of these babies came into our home. I can only imagine I'll get back from work one of these days and Steve's adopted an orphanage."

---

Steve dramatically crossed his arms. "You hear this guy? He wants a big family and complains when I give him one. What other gay couple do you know who has two kids?" He smiled at his husband to show he was messing around.

---

Bucky huffed and looked to Steve. "Do you hear complaining?" he asked and leaned in a little to Steve but didn't kiss him. He wasn't sure if that would make anyone uncomfortable or not. "I'm just saying, let me try bringing home a baby next time. I want in on the fun of seeing your face all surprised and a little frantic like mine gets."

---

"Oh, man. If you bring home a baby, I'll go nuts," Steve said. "Can you surprise me with a baby? You don't even have to ask me first, just bring them home." He was already getting excited over the thought of it.
Bucky touched Steve's lips with his thumb to hush him. "I'll try my best, Love," he said softly and then turned back to everyone else. "We need more names, though. We have exhausted three names including middle names so maybe we should work on that before I bring home a baby."

---

"You could name the next one after me," Fred suggested shamelessly.

Steve smiled over at him. "I wouldn't be opposed to adding that to the list of potential names," he answered. Steve had a few bites of his dinner before adding, "I love having kids. It's better than I could've ever imagined."

---

Bucky smiled. "It's not very surprising to see Junior with kids. He was always caring and naturally pretty paternal. But I'm guessing it's strange seeing me settled down with kids."

"You were a wildcard," Junior agreed.

---

"Bucky's a great father," Steve said. "He works hard all day but always has enough energy to play with Christopher and Sarah May. And he takes them to the park whenever he can or when I'm feeling sick."

---

Junior nodded. "I remember once when Bucky was really small, maybe seven or eight, he found an injured fox on a hike with us. My brother Michael told him to leave it because there was no way to save it. But Bucky took off his shirt and rigged it up like a sling and brought the fox all the way back to the cabins."

---

Steve looked over at Bucky with love in his eyes. "That's my husband. He's very caring." Steve wasn't as cautious as Bucky and leaned over to kiss his cheek lightly. "You got to tell me more stories about Bucky when he was little. I never get to hear this stuff at home."

---

Bucky shied away and blushed a bit. He was more sensitive and nervous than usual given their company. "Babe," he said softly and looked up at everyone, a little embarrassed. "I don't think everyone wants to hear little Bucky stories."

---

"But I want to hear little Bucky stories," Steve said pathetically. "You don't tell me enough from your childhood so I will try to get that information when I can."

---

Maureen giggled politely at the exchange. "I must admit, I wasn't very sure what to think of two men marrying each other when Junior first told me about you two. It's nice to see that your marriage isn't any different than ours. I'm relieved to know that any initial reservations I had were wrong."
Bucky looked to Steve briefly with wide eyes, worried what he would think or say. "I know it's a bit surprising at first but all love is the same. If it's a consensual, loving relationship then it shouldn't be any different than a man and a woman."

---

"I think so, too. And you too are just lovely together," Maureen said pleasantly, reaching over to hold her husband's hand. Christopher finished his food and then immediately started to sign 'more' at Bucky to make him get more dinner.

---

Bucky checked what Christopher had eaten and then gave him just a little bit more green beans and carrots. "That's it then, Bean, you'll get grumpy if your tummy is too full." While Bucky had his head down trying to discreetly wipe some food out of his beard, Sarah passed some more chicken to her grandson.

---

Steve snickered behind his napkin when he saw his mom spoil their son. When dinner was over, Steve and Sarah insisted on helping clean up. "Buck, can you keep an eye on the kids while I wash the dishes?"

---

"Yes, I've got it," Bucky said and took each of their kids in his arms and went to the living room to let Christopher play with Maureen's kids. Maureen sat on the couch and held her stomach lightly.

---

"It's nice that the both of you take such an interest in your kids," Maureen said to Bucky. "All of my friends' husbands want no part in child rearing. It's a shame."

---

Bucky gave her a sympathetic smile. "I couldn't imagine not being involved with my children's lives. That's just not who I am. Or who Steve is." He paused and smiled thinking of his husband. "Steve is so good with the kids. He knows how to be a good parent from how his mother raised him. And I learned from my mom and dad. I don't know if Junior has told you about Old George or not."

---

"He's told me some stories of him. Sometimes he says that he can't believe an eccentric, wild guy like you came from a stoic man like him," she chuckled. "He sounds like he was a good man and probably the perfect personality to compliment yours."

---

"He was a good man," Bucky said with a weak smile. "He was the absolute best. The best father I could have asked for. I miss him so much." Bucky paused and shook his head. "He and my mother worked really well together. She was energetic and all over the place and he was always calm and quiet and soft. I think I ended up being a mash of the two of them."
"Kids tend to pick up a lot of traits of their parents," Maureen said. "I hope all of my kids pick up Junior's bravery. I'm really nervous but he runs right into things without letting his nerves get to him."

---

"That's how it is with Steve. He's so courageous. Not that I'm not brave at times, but he's a lot like Junior in that way," Bucky said and gently brushed a hand over Sarah May's curls. "Steve doesn't shut down in the face of immediate crisis like I do. His creeps up on him later, like Jesse. Have you heard the story of when Jesse had an entire conversation with a heat-wave hallucination back in '72?"

---

Sarah May smiled and reached up for Bucky's hand, but didn't have good coordination so she missed. "No, I didn't hear about that," Maureen answered. "What happened?"

---

"Oh, Jesse had too little food in his system and basically no hydration and it was one of the hot summers up here," Bucky started. "We saw him laying out in the grass talking to himself so we went to see if he was okay and when we asked who he was talking to he said 'my new friend Jeremy' and just looked at us like we were crazy."

---

Maureen laughed. "Oh, my. I probably would've panicked and called an ambulance for him. I always worry about the worst-case scenario. I've taken so many unnecessary trips to the ER because I think something is worse than it is."

---

"I understand that," Bucky chuckled a bit and nudged Christopher with his foot away from pulling up the carpet. "Steve and I have had enough hospitals and doctors to last us our entire marriage. He was shot, I was beaten half to death, and then after October... I'm sorry. I'm bringing us down."

---

Maureen gasped and covered her mouth. "Oh, my god. That's awful." She gave Bucky a sympathetic, gentle touch on his arm. "I'm so sorry you two had to endure so much in such a short time." She looked a bit uncomfortable even though she was doing her best to be reassuring.

---

"Sorry, sorry," Bucky repeated and wiped at his eyes. "I'm horrible company right now. I'm so sorry, Maureen. I'm going to go find Steve." He felt terrible. He couldn't keep himself from thinking about Grant as he picked up Christopher and held both his children close to him as he went to find his husband.

---

Steve was in the middle of washing out a pot when he saw Bucky coming in with their kids in his arms. He could tell right away that he was upset, so he swiftly dried his hands and went over to him. "Hey, Baby, what's the matter?"
Bucky shook his head and was careful not to squish the babies as he melted into Steve's open arms. He just breathed carefully and shut his eyes. "I'm sorry, I just got worked up. It just came on really suddenly and I just got overwhelmed really fast. I'm sorry. It's okay. I should just take the kids back to the cabin."

"Papa?" Christopher murmured softly, squeezing his shirt in his hand. Steve hugged Bucky and pet a hand through his hair. "You sure you don't want me to come with you, Buck?"

"I don't know," Bucky whispered and kissed Christopher's head. "Can you just watch them for a bit. I'll just go take a break outside and calm down. Maybe that'll help. I'll just take a minute."

"Alright," Steve said. He took their little babies from Bucky's arms and kissed him once more. "I love you," he said. Christopher whined softly when Bucky walked away, but Steve was quick to console him.

Fred came in a couple seconds later with a smile on his face and a laugh in his throat, ever a jubilant man. "Oh, what's wrong, Baby Chris?" he asked and assessed both children. "Where did Jamie go?"

"Well, how can I help?" Fred asked and offered to take Sarah May. "How has he been with his drinking? I remember that being quite a point of contention around our barbecue last May. Just wanted to see how he was making on. Old George used to sit and talk to me about all the times his wife drank instead of communicating and working through things. It pains me to know that Jamie picked that up."

Steve passed his daughter over, who fussed a little but didn't cry. "He's sober," Steve said. "He's been going to meetings for a while now and I'm really proud of him. He's only drank once in months and he didn't even get drunk that one time."

"Good, you don't know how glad I am to hear that," Fred said and rocked Sarah May gently. "She's got some dark eyes," he said, changing the subject. "And she's really attentive. She doesn't stop looking at you except to blink."

"She's a real thinker," Steve said. "I love the way she looks at Bucky. I think she really wants to understand what's going on and can't wait to interact with us." He hugged Christopher closer to his chest. "We would have had three kids," Steve sighed. "And I think that's what's eating away at Bucky. It drowned me for a while, but Sarah May pulled me out of it."

---

Fred looked over at Steve for a few long moments. Sarah May, not getting attention anymore, quietly reached a hand up to touch Fred's cheek. "What do you mean, son?" he asked cautiously and gestured for Steve to sit down with him.

---

"Our son, Grant, was stillborn," he said quietly. "When he died, I was in a bad place. I was forced into retirement from the police force because of an injury. And then our son dies. I thought God was punishing us and I was afraid to do anything with Bucky or else I'd lose Christopher or someone else I loved," he explained. "But my priest called me one day and said a baby was left at the door of our church. I knew it was a sign from God letting us know everything was okay. But because I was so distant, I wasn't there to help Bucky heal."

---

Fred nodded and reached to squeeze Steve's shoulder. "So now Bucky, who had to pick up the slack, keeps having these breakdowns?" He sighed and looked over at a picture hanging on the wall of his family - his wife and all four sons. "Steve, I don't know how it feels to lose a child. I've thankfully never had to experience that. But I know how much I love my boys. And I know how much it hurts me to think about the day I will leave them. And if my pain is even fraction of the pain you both feel... well, I'm incredibly sorry and also extremely proud for how well you two have handled things. I mean, you are still here together, and you've got two children with you. That's very good."

---

Steve nodded, looking a bit guilty. He couldn't help how he felt back then. He was in a better place now and tried to help Bucky but some things were too little too late. "Thanks," he said. "Bucky's been so strong. He amazes me and you'd be so proud if you got to see how he handles everything day to day. He really looks up to you."

---

Fred smiled warmly. "Well, I always did have a soft spot for that kid. And Old George was one of my closest friends even if he was a bit younger and only came around a few times a year. I sort of feel like I owe it to him to keep an eye on his kids, you know? Like George has put me in charge of watching them a bit. I'm sure you understand."

---

Steve nodded. "I'm sorry you lost a good friend," he said. "He sounds like a great person and he left behind a lot of people that loved him. I'm just glad Bucky was able to keep the family together so we could bring everyone up here again."

---

"I agree," Fred said and touched Sarah May's hair. "Although, I'm not kidding about some phone calls every so often. Let us know when you find little Jewish girls on church steps and decide to take them home. I don't want the next time you come up here to be a surprise, either. Give us warning so we can prepare for you two and the kids."

---

"Jewish girls?" Steve asked. "You think Sarah May is Jewish?" He looked over at her. "We found a coin with her, but thought it was from Yugoslavia or somewhere in Europe like that."

---

Fred gave Sarah May a once over and shrugged. "Well, she looks Jewish, doesn't she? The big brown eyes and that soft curly dark hair. That was just my first thought. I assumed you two met at least one of her biological parents. But Yugoslavia could be possible too. Do you have that coin with you?"

---

"Oh no. If she's Jewish then I can't baptize her at our church," Steve said in a worried voice. He would have to find a synagogue to take her to. "We didn't meet her parents. She was left and that was that." He shifted Christopher onto his hip so he could dig the coin out of his wallet - he always kept it with him.

---

Fred gently took the coin from Steve and looked it over. He squinted at it and turned it over a couple times like he was decoding it. "I'm sorry, son, I don't know where this came from. Your little girl could be from anywhere. But I'm sure there are archives at the libraries on currency from around the world."

---

Steve sighed and took the coin back. "The libraries we went to didn't have anything in the archives we could find. We got to find a place that specializes in this kind of stuff." Christopher tried to grab the coin, but Steve put it away.

---

Fred thought for a second and then stood up, gently holding Sarah May in one arm. He rifled through a contact book and found a name. He took a paper and wrote down a name and number. "My second boy - Carlton - was the only one who tried going to college. He wanted to go into history. This is the name of the director of the school he was in at the university. Carl kept her number after he left the university just in case he wanted to go back. She might be able to help."

---

"That's perfect, thank you!" Steve said excitedly. He took the paper and folded it neatly into his pocket. "You're Christian, right? How would you handle it if you adopted a kid from a different religion?"

---

Fred considered for a moment and watched Sarah May's big happy eyes flitting around at whatever she wanted to stare at. "Well, son, I'm not entirely sure," Fred said. "On one hand, having her in the religion of her heritage is a beautiful thing and helps her know where she came from before she was blessed to be given to you. But, adopting her into your family might also mean adopting her into your faith and that way also making her not stick out so much from her siblings or feel different or strange. I'm sure it may be odd if she was getting two different religious influences in her life."

Steve nodded. "I don't want to deny her the culture she was born from," he said. "But she's also a part of our family now and maybe she's too young for a little while to make the choice for herself what she would like," he sighed. "I guess we will find out what she is soon enough and go from there."

Fred slapped Steve on the back again and shook his shoulder. "You'll make the right decision. You're a smart man. And you're a good man."

Bucky came back inside then, wiping his eyes and smelling like cigarettes. He stopped in the doorway and saw his perfect little family sitting with Fred and he tried not to tear up again. He just couldn't stop imaging having Christopher running around in front of them while Grant and Sarah May both wiggled in their arms and watched their older brother. He wanted Grant back so badly.

Steve felt his throat get tight when he saw Bucky come in still upset. He walked over to him and wrapped an arm strongly around his shoulders. He pressed his lips to Bucky's temple lightly. "Hey, Love. You feel like heading home?" he asked.

Bucky nodded silently and gripped on to Steve. "I'm sorry," he said softly and moved to take Sarah May from Fred. "Steve, if you want to go get the girls and your mom, I'll get the kids into their car seats."

Steve kissed Bucky one more time and let him go. He turned and apologized to Fred, promising that they would be back soon and he thanked them for dinner as well. He said goodbye to Mindy, Maureen, Junior, and the kids before gathering the rest of his family to head into the car.

Once they got back to the cabin, Bucky helped get the kids inside and filled up the tub so he could give Christopher a bath. He had Sarah May sitting in a carrier by the tub waiting her turn and reaching down to grab her toes. Bucky wasn't sure what the rest of his family was doing, he pretty much ignored them all in favor of having some quiet time with his babies. "I love you both so much," he whispered to them and started humming a lullaby as he washed Christopher's hair.

Christopher splashed around in the tub a little, giggling as he played in the water. He looked up at his pop and signed 'I love you' to him. He couldn't say the words yet but he understood the tone Bucky used with him. Sarah May smiled and squirmed happily whenever Bucky gave her attention.

Bucky finished washing Christopher and let him run around the bathroom while he bathed Sarah May. When he was done, he opened the door and Christopher shot out in search of his daddy with Bucky close behind him. Steve was sitting in the living room with his mother talking when Bucky and Christopher found him. "Hey," Bucky mumbled and looked to Steve.

---

"Hello, Bean!" Steve said excitedly when Christopher came running over to him. He scooped his son up and kissed his belly, causing the little boy to squirm and laugh. He looked up at Bucky and patted the space next to him on the couch for him to sit.

---

Bucky sat down next to Steve and leaned into him. He sighed and kissed his daughter's head before holding her close so she could warm up after her bath. "I'm sorry, Steve," Bucky said and looked up into Steve's eyes. "I just got a little overwhelmed tonight."

---

"It's okay, love," Steve said. "I miss him, too. And some nights hurt more than others. This will be the first time I'm not seeing him. I've visited him every day since he's been laid to rest."

---

Bucky nodded and kissed Steve's cheek. Bucky had hardly been able to go to the cemetery lately. He had to work damn near every day and once he got home from work he wanted to spend some time with Christopher and Sarah May and the girls before flopping into bed with Steve and sleeping until he had to start the day over again. "I'm sorry, Baby. I know this is hard for you too. I did tell Clint to check on Grant every so often while we are gone and he promised he would. And Tim said he would light candles for him at church on Sunday since you won't be back yet."

---

Steve nodded, feeling better knowing that their friends were taking care of their little boy while they were away. "It would have been so amazing to have him and Sarah May together. They'd be so close in age, all of them could have even been in the same grade at school..."

---

Bucky's lip quivered and looked away. "Can we talk about something else?" he asked hurriedly and gripped his daughter tighter. "Just anything... It was nice seeing Junior again and meeting Maureen and their kids." He pressed his cheek to Sarah May's.

---

"Papa," Christopher murmured, seeing Bucky get upset again. He crawled onto his pop's lap and snuggled him next to his sister. "I think it's great that she's having twins," Steve said.

---

"Junior is going to be so excited. That's so many kids," Bucky said and held Christopher safely next to his sister. "He loves his family. You can tell. Maureen was saying how a lot of her friends' husbands don't participate in the parenting too much. Also, I was worried for a bit that she wasn't going to be accepting of us but she seemed okay with it."

---
Steve nodded. "I'm excited for them. He seems like a really good guy. I got a admit, I wasn't too happy with how much you were staring at him, but I guess I can find it in my heart to forgive you."

---

"I'm sorry," Bucky said with a small bashful smile. "I'd never do anything. I promise. And you're still the most handsome, sexy man I've ever seen. I'm not kidding. It was just a little strange seeing him again after so long. He was my first crush. You know? He was my... sexual awakening." Bucky blushed and looked away.

---

Steve rolled his eyes. "Oh my god, Bucky, you're being so embarrassing," he said fondly. He kissed his husband's cheek. "I know you wouldn't do anything. But I couldn't help but be a little jealous. I miss being strong and able to do anything."

---

"Baby, you're still strong," Bucky said and gripped Steve's hand. "You are. I'm sorry. I shouldn't have been staring at Junior. I didn't realize you were thinking like that. He is a good man but you are a thousand times greater and stronger and you're mine."

---

"I'm not as strong as Junior is. He still gets to save people," Steve huffed. "I wish I could go back to the department sometimes. I love staying at home and raising our kids, but I still miss being a cop."

---

"I know, Love, I know," Bucky said and scooted Christopher on to Steve's lap. "I want you to look into our son's eyes. I want you to look at him and look how young and helpless he is and how much he needs you. Then I want you to try to tell me again that you aren't strong. Try telling him that you aren't strong. Do you think either of us are going to believe you?"

---

Steve looked down at their little boy, who smiled and started to mumble nonsense at him. Steve immediately felt better and signed 'I love you' to his son before kissing the tip of his nose. "You're the best, Bucky. I get it. I do."

---

Bucky held Sarah May up to Steve. "Same thing with Sarah May. Look into those big eyes and try to doubt yourself. Try to tell her that you aren't her big confident brave Daddy who will always be there for her." Bucky nodded and waited for Steve to respond.

---

"Dada," Christopher started to complain when Steve started to give Sarah May his attention. Steve laughed and kissed both of his kids. "Alright, you win, Babies. I'm your big, strong Dad."

---

"My turn," Bucky said and directed Steve's attention to him, a gentle hand on his cheek. "Try telling me that you're not everything I need. Try telling me that you're not still my protector and my perfect lover and the best father for our kids. Hold me and kiss me and make love to me and try to think about anything but how well we fit together in every aspect of our lives."

---

"Buck. My mom is right here," Steve groaned, getting all nervous and embarrassingly hiding his face against Bucky’s hand. "You made your point, I get it. I was being dramatic." He laid his head on Bucky's shoulder.

---

"Your mom understands," Bucky protested and gave Steve a kiss. "She's just happy I'm around to argue my point so you don't keep feeling bad." He got up carefully and went to Sarah so she could say goodnight to her grandbabies.

---

After they settled their kids down for sleep, Steve let Bucky watch over them to have some alone time again. He checked in on the girls since he hadn't spoken to them much today. "How are you two doing? Need anything?"

---

Becca had just been in the middle of lecturing Lilly about picking up her things from the ground. They weren't doing so well sharing a room at the cabin. "We are fine," Becca said and waved Steve off.

Lilly shook her head with wide eyes. "Becca is being mean. Can I sleep in your room tonight?"

---

"I can't tell if you're being serious or not," Steve said. He already was picking up Lilly's things from the floor since he was so used to cleaning up his kid's messes. "But if you genuinely want to sleep in our room, that's fine. Bucky and I are probably going to be asleep soon anyway."

---

Lilly sighed dramatically and helped Steve finish picking up her stuff. "No, it's fine. I might end up out on the couch, though. Don't be surprised," she grumbled and gave a glare to Becca.

---

"Alright. Well, goodnight. You two better not start World War Three by morning." Steve closed their door and said goodnight to his mom before finally turning in for the night. "Today was long," he groaned.

---

Bucky was already half-way to sleep when Steve came in. "Yeah," he sighed and rolled to face his husband. "We both had little breakdowns. We were with a lot of people today." He reached out for Steve's hand.

---

Steve kissed the tip of Bucky's nose. "But it was still a good day. I'm glad we're here and I'm glad you get to have a whole week where you don't have to work. Enjoy it."
Bucky nodded and plastered himself against Steve. "I'm so cold and tired," he mumbled and kissed Steve's cheek a few times. "How much sleep do you think we will get before one of the babies wake up?"

"I don't know. But let me take care of them tonight, love, and you get your beauty sleep, okay?" He pulled the blankets close around the two of them and snuggled Bucky as closely as he could.

Bucky sighed and closed his eyes. "I'm naturally this gorgeous, sleep has nothing to do with it," he murmured and drifted off gently to sleep wrapped in Steve and feeling utterly secure.

Steve fell asleep shortly after and got up all three times their little babies cried. But on the third time on his way back, he shouted a loud “Oh my god!” when he went to the kitchen to get some water and saw Diana proudly sitting, muzzle bloody and head held high, next to a dead raccoon. It must've gotten in through the window or something.

Bucky heard the shout and he quickly rolled out of bed to find Steve. "Baby? What's wrong? Where are you?" He found Steve standing there with Diana looking pleased as a peach. "Holy fuck!" he whispered sharply.

Steve stood there in shock at the sight in front of him. He wanted to praise the dog for protecting the house but he was still amazed that a fucking raccoon got in. "I don't want to touch it," Steve grimaced. "Poor thing." He scratched Diana behind her ears so she wouldn't think that his shock was anger at her.

Bucky grumbled and took an extra trash liner from the closet. He pulled his hair back on his head and then scooped the dead raccoon up into the bag. "We can't put this in the trash outside. We will have all sorts of animals coming for it. I got to go get rid of it out in the woods away from the cabin."

Diana started to circle them and whine once the raccoon was picked up. "I'll come with you," Steve said as he started to bundle up. "It's just creepy. I don't want to go near it."

"I'll hold the very scary dead rodent," Bucky said and pulled on his boots and coat, hoping his pajamas would be warm enough. "Is a raccoon a rodent? Or a marsupial? Or is it something weird like in the bear or fox family?"

Diana followed them out, scouting ahead and very much in protection mode. "Marsupial I think. I don't know. Definitely not a rodent." He shivered when they got outside. "I got to find out how it got in."

---

"Yeah, we can look once we get back. I don't like the idea that an animal could get in and bite one of our kids or your mom or even Diana," Bucky said and held the bag out a few inches from his body. "Although, it is reassuring that Diana has an instinct to protect us like that."

---

Steve nodded. "She's a good girl." Diana would occasionally sniff at the bag to make sure the animal wouldn't magically wake up and be a threat. "It's just a shame the animal didn't get scared off and got killed instead."

---

Bucky sighed and came to a tree he thought was good enough. He dug with his boot in the snow and then dumped the raccoon out of the bag before covering it with snow again. "Alright, do you have any last words for your dog's first kill?"

---

Diana growled softly at the dead animal, so Steve was quick to calm her. "Uh, Mr. Raccoon, I'm sorry you tried breaking and entering into the wrong house. I hope you didn't leave a family behind and that you're having fun in the big trash can in the sky."

---

"Very nice," Bucky mumbled and balled up the trash bag to take back to the cabin. "My balls are frozen. Let's go back." Bucky yawned and watched Diana jump a few feet ahead of them into the snow happily.

---

Steve snorted and hurried back. The cold left him even more short of breath than usual. Once inside, Diana started to sniff around in case of more danger. Steve found the open window above the sink in the kitchen and promptly shut it. "There we go."

---

"Who left that open?" Bucky asked and washed his hands in scalding hot water to get rid of any germs or blood from the raccoon. "We should probably wipe down all these counters just in case."

---

"I don't know. Could have been one of the girls or my mom. I didn't open the window." Steve got a rag and some soap so he could start washing down the counters. "Can you make sure the windows aren't open in the babies' room?"

---

Bucky nodded and rushed off to check on the kids. No windows were open and they were both sound asleep. "Everyone's fine," Bucky said once he got back. "Everyone's asleep."

---
Once the counters were clean, Steve cleaned off Diana's muzzle and praised her softly for her good work. He gave her a hug before standing up. "Thank god," he sighed. "That was an adventure."

---

"Can we sleep now?" Bucky whined and shivered where he stood. "We still have a few hours before the girls wake up and want to do something. And I want to get as much sleep as I can."

---

"Alright," Steve said. Just in case of emergency, he left Diana in the babies' room to watch after them. He was happy to go back to bed and fall asleep with his husband. The day really did just keep going for them and he was exhausted.
The rest of the night was peaceful but the morning started with a cacophony of babies crying and Becca shouting that she was going to rent her own cabin if they didn't stop. Needless to say, it wasn't a good start for anyone.

---

Diana was pacing in the room and whining when Steve came in. He picked up both of his children and laid them on the table to change their dirty diapers. "Hey, beautiful babies, you don't got to cry. I've got you."

---

Bucky walked in just as Christopher was reaching over to grab his sister's little hand and hold it tight. Sarah May calmed down a bit and Christopher stopped crying as well. "Ya-Ya," Christopher murmured and watched her carefully.

---

Steve gasped. "Bucky, look," he said, pointing to their naked little kids, half-changed into clean diapers. "He's holding her hand!" he whispered excitedly.

---

Bucky watched quietly and leaned down to their level. "Did you bring your camera, Steve?" he whispered and pet a gentle hand on Sarah May's soft hair and lightly bopped her nose then did the same to Christopher. "They are so adorable."

---

"Yeah, it’s in the blue duffel bag," Steve said. He got their kids into fresh diapers and tickled their bellies. "Are you being a good big brother, Christopher? I love you so much, Bean."

---

Bucky snapped a few pictures and then set the camera aside so he could pick up his son. "You are such a good big brother, aren't you? Tell Daddy that you love Ya-Ya. You are our sweet little Bean."

---

Steve pointed to Sarah May and signed 'I love you'. Christopher got the hint after a few times and then signed 'I love you' to the baby. "Yes! Such a smart boy, Christopher! Good job!"

---

Bucky praised Christopher and gave him a few kisses. "Okay, Steve, let's go get breakfast ready. I'll feed the babies while you cook? How's that sound?"

---

"Sounds perfect." Steve hurried off into the kitchen to cook. "Hey, Becca," he greeted. "Did you sleep well last night?" Even though the babies woke her up.
"No," Becca grumbled and left in an angry huff for the living room.

Bucky set Christopher up in his high chair and held Sarah May as he made up a bottle for her and cut up pieces of fruit for Christopher. "What are we doing today, Steve?"

Steve sighed, deciding not to bother Becca with her current attitude. "I was thinking maybe making a proper igloo today. Or maybe having a campfire and roasting marshmallows so we can make s'mores."

"We can do both of those things. At least, if we can manage to make a fire in this snow," Bucky said and sat down to feed Sarah May. I was thinking of calling Tim later today to make sure everything is okay on his end."

Sarah May ate her food readily, hungry after sleeping for so long. "Yeah, calling Tim would be a great idea," Steve agreed. "You can tell him about our surprise visitor in the night."

"I'm sure Tim will be very excited to hear about our raccoon problem. He's big on animals, though, so let's ignore the part where it was mauled to death by a German Shepard," Bucky said with a chuckle and Lilly peeked into the kitchen, curious about what they were talking about.

"We can tell him Diana chased him out instead of killed him," Steve decided. Lilly gasped. "Diana killed someone?" she squawked, jumping to the worst conclusion right away.

Bucky nodded and sighed. "Yes. She killed a little old man who got lost and wondered our way. Steve and I buried him out in the woods late last night. It was a bloody ordeal. Took hours. Dragging the body was the worst part. But the digging was bad too."

"That's not funny," Lilly huffed. "What really happened?"

Steve smiled. "Someone left a window open last night and a raccoon got in. Diana made sure it didn't bother any of us in the middle of the night."

Lilly crossed her arms and glared at Bucky. "Would that have been that hard for you to say?" she asked.

"My way was far more fun," Bucky defended lightly and smiled at his sister. "Did I not make it believable enough? Can't see your brother burying a body in the snow?"
Lilly just rolled her eyes and sat down at the table. Steve put a bowl of fruit out and gave Lilly a morning hug. "You want to build an igloo today, Lil?"

Lilly grabbed a handful of strawberries and popped one in her mouth. "How are we going to do that?" she asked and scrunched up her face. "We don't have ice blocks."

"You can make an igloo out of snow. It's just got to last a few hours, it's not like we are going to turn it into a home." Diana came trotting up to Steve, looking for some attention. He pulled the big dog into his lap and got some happy face licks in return.

Bucky finished feeding Sarah May and held her close as she snuggled against his chest. "Later, we are going to try to make a fire and roast marshmallows. How does that sound? We might be able to ice skate as well."

"I like marshmallows," Lilly decided. "But is the ice thick enough for skating?" she asked. "I mean, it's a lake, right? How frozen is it?"

"It should be," Bucky said. "I'll test it out. I've never ice skated on this lake before but I would think it would be okay." Sarah came out of her room then. She made her way to the kitchen and the first thing she did was to hold her arms out to take Sarah May from Bucky. Bucky handed her over.

Steve laughed at how possessive his mom was over Sarah May. He knew that she loved Christopher but their daughter had a special place in her heart. "You shouldn't be the one to test it. We should ask Fred and Mindy what they think."

Bucky shrugged. "It's fine. I'll just be careful about it," Bucky said and handed Christopher apple slices one by one and watched him eat them a little too fast in his excitement for more apples. "Slow down, Bean."

Steve looked to Bucky with a set knit in his brow. "I don’t know. What if you fall through? I don't want you to get hurt, Love," he said with a little frown.

"I won't fall through," Bucky assured Steve. "If I can see that it's too thin, I won't go out. Don't worry, Baby," he reached a hand out for Steve to take and waited patiently for his husband to oblige.
Steve took Bucky's hand and gave him an unimpressed look but he didn't argue the point further. "Dada," Christopher said, demanding Steve's attention. He signed for more food since Bucky stopped giving him apples.

---

Bucky squeezed Steve's hand and gave him a confident little smile. He wasn't sure if they would have time that night to have some private time. They might be too tired. Bucky just wanted to make love with Steve in the place where they had their honeymoon almost a year before. Having babies definitely put a damper on their formerly rampant sex life.

---

Steve leaned over to kiss his husband and then got up so he could entertain their children. He sang to Christopher and played with his hands so he wouldn't get upset that they weren't giving him any more food. After a while, they were ready to get outside. "Should I tell the girls to get bundled up, too?"

---

"Sure, we can all go work on that igloo," Bucky said decidedly. "Do we want your mom to keep both kids with her while we are outside or just Sarah May?" he asked and watched Sarah holding her granddaughter against her chest.

---

"Let's have Christopher come out for a little bit and then we can let him go back in. He needs to experience some good snowfall, you know?" Steve said.

---

Bucky agreed and went to take Christopher to get bundled up. He was being pretty squirmy but eventually Bucky got him all settled. When Bucky set him down so he could himself ready to go outside, Christopher trotted his way out of the room like a little blue silky marshmallow.

---

"Oh my god, look at him!" Lilly cooed, nudging Becca. "He looks so dumb and cute," she said. Becca looked up from her book and snorted at Christopher waddling around.

"Come on, girls, we're going to go build an igloo," Steve said. Lilly was quick to get outside but Becca dragged her feet a little with it.

---

Bucky and Lilly were outside with Christopher waiting for Steve and Becca to be ready. Christopher was having a good time sitting in the snow and watching Lilly attempt to do cartwheels. Bucky was trying his best to get Christopher's hat to stay on but every time he put it on, his son would absently reach up and pull it off, eyes still glued to Lilly.

---

Becca finally was coaxed outside once Steve promised to make her hot chocolate when it was time to go back inside. Steve snapped a few pictures of his family with his camera before heading over to Bucky and Christopher. He knelt in the snow and started to create a mound for the igloo wall.
Christopher hopped up excitedly when he saw Steve building and shouted "Dada! Dada!" and stomped his way across the beginnings of the igloo.

Bucky chuckled and scooped up his son. "Here, Bean, let's you and I let Daddy and your aunts build the igloo and we will work on not destroying it like your block towers."

"Oh, Bean," Steve said, unable to get too upset at his son for destroying the start to the igloo. "I love you," Steve said to the baby as Bucky scooped him up. Becca was a good help with the structure, and soon they had one side looking pretty sturdy. "What do you think, Buck?"

Bucky, who had been working on paying attention to Steve and also entertaining Christopher, beamed at his husband and said, "I think I don't know what you are going to do to make this a real igloo but you look cute doing it."

Steve pouted. "It's going to be a real igloo," he defended. "Look, this wall is holding up just fine," he started on the other wall, putting in extra reinforcement so it wouldn't fall and prove Bucky right.

"I know it is, Steve," Bucky said and laid back in the snow with Christopher on his chest securely. "And besides, I said you look cute. Because you do." He smiled over at him and felt snowfall on his hair.

"You don't get to say I'm cute in the same sentence as you not believing in my igloo," Steve countered. He stole a kiss and went back at it. That is, until Diana went crashing through it as she chased a rabbit across the yard.

"No!" Christopher shouted at the dog and added a hearty 'woof' for good measure.

Bucky sat up and gripped Steve's arm. "Steve, oh my god. I'm so sorry. I jinxed your igloo. Here, let me help you fix it. I'll put our Bean inside with your mom and we can make it properly."

Steve could only sit there in shock as his dog burst through the side of his igloo. Lilly found it a little funny but had the sense not to laugh. His shoulders slumped and he let out a soft sigh. "No," he mumbled. "Don't worry about it, Buck. It probably wouldn't have stayed up for long anyway."

Bucky slipped Christopher on to Steve's lap and used his free hands to pull Steve into a warm kiss to get his attention. "You wanted to build an igloo. Let's build an igloo. I'm sorry for doubting it. Let me help you build a suitable one, please?"
Steve hugged his son, who cuddled into his chest for warmth. He wasn't complaining about the cold but Steve figured that they should get him inside soon. "Alright," Steve mumbled. "She only knocked down one part anyway."

Bucky nodded and picked up Christopher. "Come on, Bean. Let's go to Nana." He took their son inside and quickly stripped him of his snow gear. He set him up with some blocks and plushies to keep him entertained as Sarah held his sister. Bucky went back out and tackled Steve to the ground to give him a deep kiss before they got started on the igloo.

Steve couldn't stay sad when he had such a loving husband there to cheer him up. After about an hour, they were able to build a pretty decent igloo. "Hey, Lilly! Come look! I bet all three of us can fit inside!"

Lilly bounded over and flopped down into the snow in front of the igloo. "No way all three of us fit," she said doubtfully and gave Steve and Bucky both a once over. "Steve, your shoulders are too wide and Bucky's legs take up too much room."

"Excuse you," Bucky scoffed with an offended but humored laugh. "It's tall, I'll just lay on top of Steve or sit in his lap and then you can fit in there too."

"Yeah, look!" Steve said and got inside. It was a little squished but he was able to get in easily enough. "Check it out! The inside is roomier than you would think," he said. Lilly crawled in with a bit of persuading.

"What are you talking about? It's tiny in here!" She complained, her shoulder mashed against Steve’s arm.

Bucky giggled at the two of them squished inside the igloo and he decided to stay outside of it. "Steve, it's a great igloo," he said and reached for his hand. "I told you it would work." He smirked at Steve, knowing that that would earn him some sort of eye roll or smack on the leg or something. He had been quite the nonbeliever about the igloo but Steve did manage to pull it off.

Steve puffed up and opened his mouth to argue but then he realized that Bucky was messing with him. "You're a jerk," he laughed. Diana saw everyone piling in so she stuck her furry head into the entrance. When she couldn't get any further, she barked at them.

"You love me, Punk," Bucky answered and pet Diana with his gloved hand. "Your brave protector doesn't like not being able to get to you, though." He got closer to the dog and said, "I'm not going to hurt him. He's safe in there, Diana, don't worry."
The pup whined when she couldn't fit inside with the rest of them, so Steve let go of Bucky's hand for a moment to pet her snout. "It's okay, girl," he soothed. "Should we go get Christopher and see if he wants to play in the igloo?"

"I'll get him," Lilly said and squeezed past Diana, ready to be out of the tight spot already.

While Lilly was gone, the dog pushed herself inside the igloo and plopped her head on Steve's lap and whined. Bucky pet her back and cleared his throat. "So, uh, do you think we can get some alone time later today?"

Steve rubbed Diana's head and ears gently, loving how much of a little guardian she was. Steve looked over at Bucky with a sly smirk. "What kind of alone time?" he asked innocently but suggestively.

Bucky smiled down at the ground and chuckled a little. "Yeah, Steve, if you want, it can be that kind of alone time," Bucky said and looked back up at Steve a little more seriously. "But, I also have something I want to talk to you about as well. More of a question, I guess."

The sly smile faded because Steve didn't want to tease if Bucky genuinely wanted to talk about something. "What'd you want to talk about?" he asked. Diana's ears perked up when she heard the change in Steve's tone.

Bucky shifted uncomfortably and made a fist with his gloved hand. "Do you want to talk about it now? Or later? Lilly will be out with Christopher soon, I would think. She just needed to get him bundled up again."

Steve looked over at Bucky and saw how he looked uncomfortable. "We can talk now," he said. "We can tell Lilly to play with Christopher by the shed until we're done talking."

Bucky gave Steve a weak smile and nodded. "Sure, yeah. We can talk now. It's nothing bad. I've just been thinking about a question Becca asked me yesterday. And now I have the same question and I don't know where you stand on it so I've been worried about asking you."

Steve squeezed Bucky's hand gently and would've kissed his cheek if he could've reached his face. "What'd she ask?" He was always a little nervous with anything related to Becca.
Bucky took a deep breath and looked at Steve intently. "She asked if we were ever going to have biological kids of our own. Like through one of those places that does the ‘test-tube-baby’ stuff. And I told her that we hadn't discussed it. But now I've been thinking about it." He took a short breath and then continued his ramble. "And I was thinking that maybe you wouldn't want to because there are so many children that need homes already. But maybe you would because you want a mini-me of you and me. But maybe you wouldn't want to because it wouldn't be half you and half me. And then I was frustrated that science can’t just make that happen and I can't give you a baby like that and then I just got tired."

---

Steve was a bit surprised by the question. He looked down at Diana briefly before looking back up at his husband. "How would we even do that? I don't want to have sex with some woman - or for you to - just to have a kid that looks like one of us. And how would that make Christopher and Sarah May feel?"

---

"No, no," Bucky shook his head and looked away for a second. "It's the process with those sperm banks where a woman takes someone else's sperm and her own egg and carries a baby to be a single mother or whatever. She has the eggs, we have the sperm. They put it together and put it back inside her so she can grow the baby." He paused and bit his lip. "So it would be like that. A woman we choose would be a mother for us and our sperm would be put in her and she would carry the baby then give it to us."

---

Steve didn't know how he felt about that. It didn't feel natural. And he was happy with adopting the kids that needed homes instead of making new ones. He did his best to keep a neutral expression because he didn't want Bucky to feel bad. "Well, how do you feel about doing that?" he asked.

---

Bucky whined and scrunched up his face. "I don't know. I was hoping whatever your opinion was would help me figure out what I thought," he said and pleaded with Steve to help him out. He really wasn't sure how he felt.

---

Steve sighed. "I don't want you to feel a certain way just because of how I feel," Steve said. "What's holding you up? What's making you feel conflicted?" Steve asked patiently.

---

Bucky thought for a second and then said, "Well, a part of me likes the thought of having one kid that has the Rogers DNA and one with the Barnes DNA. But I also understand the strangeness of it all and also I wouldn't want our adopted kids to feel any lesser than those two. So I just... I want you to tell me what you feel."

---

Steve shrugged his shoulders up a bit. "I don't know. I mean, yeah, it would be nice, but I don’t know how I feel about making some kids out of a test tube. It's a bit too much like playing God." He gave Bucky an apologetic look. "And I don't want Christopher or Sarah May to even think they may not be enough for us."
Bucky smiled softly again and looked down with a nod. "Yeah, I understand. Then we won't do it." He pet Diana some more and shook his head. "I'm sorry I brought it up. I just have been thinking about it. And I just needed to talk to you or I would just keep thinking."

"Are you disappointed?" Steve asked. Bucky did say that a part of him wanted that and while Steve wasn't enthralled with the idea, he also didn't want to shut Bucky's hopes down in an instant.

"No," Bucky said honestly. "It's not something I was dying to have. You know I've always been more than happy to adopt every child we see that needs us and I've never needed one that was biologically ours. I promise, this isn't a dream of mine. You didn't crush anything. So don't get all mopey on me and think you're taking something from me."

Steve pouted a bit when Bucky told him not to get mopey. Sometimes he wasn’t able to help that. "You can't blame me for wanting to be sure," he said.

He was about to say something else but then Lilly shouted from the porch. "Bucky! Christopher got poop all over his snowsuit!"

Bucky groaned and crawled out of the igloo shouting back, "Well, did you put him in the suit without a diaper?"

There was a pause and then Lilly's returned, "Sorry!"

Bucky turned to Steve in the igloo and sighed, "I'll be back, Baby. I'll clean him up and bring him to you so you can show him the igloo."

Steve's mom loved to take care of the kids but this was a job that she would only do if she had to. Bucky walked into the cabin to Christopher giggling playfully, his snowsuit in utter disarray. "I definitely don't miss this part of parenting," Sarah said sympathetically.

"Well, I'll definitely not miss it once all our kids are out of diapers," Bucky answered and held Christopher out at arm’s length. "If you want to go check out the igloo and talk to your son for a bit, you can put Sarah May in her crib while I clean him up."

"I think I will stay inside where it’s warm," she chuckled. "But thank you for the offer." Sarah looked perfectly content snuggling on the couch with Ya-Ya. "He's been talking about that igloo all since we got here. I'm glad you finally got to build it."
"It's been an ordeal," Bucky said as he tried to get Christopher to stop squirming as he cleaned him up. "Christopher stomped the beginnings of it and once Steve had a wall up, Diana ran through and crushed it. He almost gave up but we got it done together. I hate that sad little defeated look he gets when he decides something isn't worth doing anymore. You know the one."

---

Sarah laughed. "Yes, I know the one," she said. "He is a big baby sometimes. But I love that he's still got his childish side to him." She kissed the top of Sarah May's head. "Are you going skating?"

---

Bucky nodded along and worked on getting Christopher into a new diaper. "I'm not sure. Steve doesn't want me going out to test the ice. So I'm not positive that we will be able to skate. I think I'll be fine but he's worried I'll fall into the lake or something."

---

"Well, he's right to worry a little. It means he loves you," she said pleasantly. Christopher giggled up at his pop and signed 'I love you' a few times because he usually got a big response whenever he did that.

---

Bucky signed back, 'You got poop on you' with a large grin and Christopher just stared back in confusion because he didn't know those signs. "I know he's just being concerned, but I think I can go out on some ice and be fine. I mean, if I take one step and it's starting to crack then that's a no."

---

"You're also dating a city boy that is afraid of anything having to do with nature," Sarah chuckled. "I admit that was my fault. I made him in love with the city life. I didn't even take him to see Long Island."

---

"Married to," Bucky corrected softly. "I think he just likes worrying about me. He gets bored if I'm not turning his hair grey prematurely. You know?" he said and picked up a newly cleaned Christopher. "But it's okay because I worry about him too."

---

"You're doing your marriage right if you still date each other," Sarah reminded. "Makes the romance feel young still, trust me. It'll make your twilight years even better."

Once Christopher was changed, he waved his hands at Bucky. "Woof!"

---

Bucky smiled at his mother-in-law and thought on what she said. "I guess you're right. I hadn't thought of it like that." Christopher barked at his pops again and Bucky looked at him with a fake surprised face. "What? You want Diana? Are you done looking at Papa? You want the doggy? Okay, let's go to Diana and Daddy."
Christopher nodded his head excitedly, wanting to go play. When Bucky carried him outside, he looked around because he could hear his dad talking to Diana but he couldn't see him. "Dada?"

"He's in the igloo, Bean," Bucky said and crouched down to the igloo’s opening and set his son down. Christopher yelped when he saw his daddy and the dog and he flopped himself against Diana's fur. "Okay, Steve, he's all clean. He was a mess."

Steve laughed and held his son against Diana so he wouldn't wiggle too much and bother her. "That bad, huh? I'm glad you were the one to clean it," Steve laughed.

"I only took this one this time because I'm hoping it makes up for doubting your igloo and I'm hoping my skills as a good father are a turn on and I'll get laid tonight," Bucky said and flopped back into the snow so he was sticking half-way into the igloo with his feet dangling out.

Steve snickered. "Everything about you is a turn on for me," he said. Steve played with Bucky's hair and looked happily down at him.

Christopher started to climb all over Bucky. "Papapapapa," he chanted as he moved.

"Yes, Little Bean?" Bucky asked and looked down at his son crawling around his chest. "Am I your jungle gym? I'm not a very good one. There aren't even any monkey bars." He giggled at his own joke because he thought he was pretty funny.

Christopher sat on Bucky's chest and looked at his face. He immediately started to blabber nonsense, happy to have his pop's attention. "I think he's critiquing your joke," Steve responded.

Bucky shrugged a bit and glanced over at his husband. "I guess I should get used to it. I have a feeling this one is going to be snarky. For sure, he's going to be talkative. I mean, he already is." Christopher's blabbering got louder and he mashed his gloves on to Bucky's chest almost as if he was signaling his annoyance at being interrupted.

Steve tickled Christopher's side and said, "Don't be rude, Bean, we were still listening." As soon as their son had the stage, he kept talking to the both of them in his baby chatter. After a while, he seemed to grow tired of talking and tried crawling out of the igloo so he could explore.

Bucky let him get out of the igloo and he knew he wouldn't be able to get too far so he just let him do as he wanted so long as Bucky could still see him. "You're mom and I were talking while I was changing him. She was telling me the importance of still dating even when you're married. I think we should take a weekend soon to ourselves. Have a fancy dinner out together, catch a movie, go to a hotel again and just be us. What do you think?"

---

Diana slunk out of the igloo right away to follow Christopher out and walk circles around the place. "A whole weekend?" Steve asked. He didn't think he could be away from his kids for that long. "Can we try maybe a dinner date first?" he asked. "You know, dinner and a movie. Work up to a getaway."

---

"No night alone together? With nothing to interrupt us?" Bucky asked somewhat incredulously but could tell Steve was going to struggle leaving the babies. Bucky knew that feeling, that's how he felt about leaving the girls anytime he was gone for too long and he probably felt the same about the kids but he hadn't been away from them yet. Steve had to be away from Christopher back when Bucky kicked him out during the Tish debacle. So it made sense that he would be wary of having to leave his babies again. "Alright, fancy dinner and a movie. But you are buying me dessert, Steve. That's non-negotiable."

---

"You know how Christopher was when I was gone for a couple days. I don't think he would understand if we both were gone. And Sarah May is still so little," Steve defended. "But, I'll treat you right, Love. And get you whatever dessert you want. And maybe in a little while, we can do a night away."

---

Bucky nodded and shifted so his head was on Steve's lap. "Okay, Baby, we do what you are most comfortable with. I just want something. I don't want to lose the magic or whatever. Don't want you waking up and seeing my face and for you to say, 'Oh... I see you're still here.'"

---

"What? I could never think that about you," Steve said. "I'm going to wake up seeing your face and thank God I get to have another day with you," Steve said softly. "I love living with you and raising our family together."

---

Bucky smiled up at his husband. "I know you do. And I love living with you and having our family. I just worry. You know me. I get scared that I'm not enough or I'm not what is best for you. And I know you'll say I'm being ridiculous and I know you're right. I'm sorry, Baby."

---

"I'm always right," Steve teased.

"Papa!" Christopher called out. "Woof!" Another deer had wandered by and Diana stood at Christopher's side, debating whether or not to chase it.

---

Bucky crawled over to his son and pulled him into his chest. He also put a hand around Diana's
"Diana, stay," he said sternly and looked back at Steve. "Is she allowed to chase the deer or should she stay put?"

"Don't let her chase it. I don't want to scare the poor thing." It was one thing to attack an intruding raccoon. It was another to go after a deer in its own habitat. Steve crawled out and pet Diana's fur to calm her.

"Dada, loo!" Christopher said, pointing to the deer for Steve to look at.

Bucky let go of Diana once Steve was there to be with her. "You think it's time to head back inside for a bit? Christopher's lips are turning blue. I think he needs a warm bath and then a nap. What do you think?"

The deer traveled on, making its way into the woods. "Yeah, I'll take care of him since you already did the dirty work for today," Steve said. "I should probably wash up Sarah May as well."

"Okay, do you want me to make you a snack or anything while you do that?" Bucky asked and saw Christopher yank his hat off for the thousandth time. "Sarah May ate recently and Christopher can wait for a snack until after his nap."

"Christopher," Steve scolded lightly, putting his hat right back on his head.

"Dada, no," Christopher complained.

"I'll wait until the kids want to eat again. I don't want to have Christopher getting jealous over food." He walked back to the cabin, where his mom already was giving Sarah May a bath in the sink.

Bucky trailed after Steve with Diana close on his heels. He helped undress Christopher and then went with Steve to sit in the bathroom while he bathed their son. "So, guess who I heard talked to Father Frank about getting church married like we did," he said as he reached for a hairbrush to start yanking through his long, scraggly hair.

Christopher splashed happily in the tub as Steve cleaned him. He squealed in delight when his dad tickled his feet. "Is it Monty?" he asked. "Or Tim and his sort-of boyfriend?"

Bucky nudged Steve with his foot. "Yeah, Monty and Evan. How did you know? They weren't going to do it because neither of them are really religious or anything but Evan convinced Monty because Evan wants to marry him anyway once the law catches us."
Steve chuckled. "I was just guessing. That's amazing," he said. "Are they going to have a ceremony that friends and family can go to? We have to get them a wedding present."

"We can get them a present. I'm not sure if it's an open ceremony. Monty just told me about it the other day. They don't know when they are going to do it either," Bucky said and reached out to give Steve's ass a squeeze. "Knowing Monty, he will at least have an extravagant party afterward in his honor."

Steve blushed when Bucky squeezed his ass and went back to bathing their son. Once he was all clean, Steve swaddled him in a towel and kissed his face a few times. "You think they're going to look to have kids, too? It'd be nice to have play dates."

Bucky reached out and gripped Christopher's little hand a moment. "We can ask them. Monty doesn't strike me as the fatherly type. You know? But maybe I'm wrong. I've just seen that boy drunk off his ass and sucking cock in the last stall in the club countless times. But Evan has changed him. And if Evan wants kids, Monty will give that man anything he wants."

"Don't say that in front of Christopher," Steve hushed softly. "Besides, you were a real wildcard for a while and you cleaned up. Now you're going to be raising a baseball team's worth of babies with me."

"Two baseball teams," Bucky corrected. "Then we can each coach our own side and see if Team Pops or Team Daddy wins." He chuckled and pet his son's damp hair. "You get first pick, Steve."

"That's eighteen kids, Buck," Steve laughed. He didn't sound opposed but he also didn't find that doable in their little Brooklyn house. "You can't make me pick which kids are on my team."

"But we need two teams, Steve," Bucky defended lightly and pulled him in for a kiss. "I'm telling you, we can just buy out the houses next to us and build attachments so we have one big mega-house."

"Are you serious about wanting that many kids?" Steve asked. "Cause I would love keeping our doors open forever for any kid that wants parents and a family," he said.

Bucky grinned and shook his head. "I don't know. Maybe. Let's stick to our dozen for now and then we will see how we feel once we get there. I always was worried I would come home to find you adopted an orphanage."

---

Steve gently tapped Christopher's nose once. "Well, it's your turn to surprise me with a baby next time. And you should know me better, Buck, I only bring home one at a time."

---

"I'm working on it," Bucky said with a smirk. "Who knows, our next baby could be being conceived right now. Although, that would be three very young children all at once."

---

"It's kind of weird to think that," Steve chuckled. "But I'm home all day. The only person we got to worry about upsetting by having so many babies is Becca. I think we need to take them out somewhere - or maybe you can have sibling day with them."

---

Bucky nodded and pulled his hair back. "I was considering asking if you thought it would be a good idea for me and the girls to take a weekend trip somewhere. We can just do all the things they want to do. Like we did when they were kids and our parents took them on special weekends away. That or, I know we have talked about them going out to California to see our cousins. I'm just not sure if they would want to do that, though. We weren't ever that close."

---

"I think it would be a great idea," Steve said. He got Christopher dressed in his pajamas now that he was dried. "You really should do it, Buck. You guys deserve some Barnes family time."

---

"But what about you?" Bucky asked and slipped his arms around Steve's middle. "Won't you be lonely without me? Don't you want to be in on family time? We are all a family now."

---

"I think you and your sisters need to have some time with just the three of you," Steve said softly. "I can spend time with our kids and my mom. I'll miss you but I won't be lonely."

---

Bucky kissed Steve's neck and sighed. "If you're sure you will be fine. I'll miss you, too. I don't like not sleeping in the same bed as you. I've only done it a handful of times but each one of those nights has been awful."

---

Steve made a happy sound at the kisses and started to carry Christopher to his crib. "I know. But it'll only be a weekend. And it'll make it so much better when we get to sleep together again."

---

"Maybe I'll just take a bunch of your sweaters with me so I can smell you while I'm sleeping. That might help," Bucky suggested and helped tuck Christopher in. Sarah had already brought Sarah May in for her nap and the baby was sleeping soundly in her little crib next to Christopher's.

---

"Weirdo," Steve teased. Steve laid Christopher down, who thought about putting up a fuss but after seeing his little sister sleeping, he decided that he should sleep, too. "You want to sing to him?" Steve asked.

---

"How am I a weirdo? You're the one who stole a few pairs of my underwear when we were first going out. Don't think I didn't know about that. I've just been too scared thinking about possibilities of what you did with them to bring it up," Bucky teased back and pulled a little wooden chair close to the cribs so he could sing a song to his children so they would sleep soundly.

---

Steve blushed deep red. "I noticed they were getting kind of worn so I got rid of them hoping you'd get a newer set finally. It worked, but I thought you didn't notice me taking them."

---

Bucky let out a disappointed grunt. "Well, that's just nowhere near as fun as the scenarios I have been picturing this whole time. I regret bringing it up and ruining the mystery." He cracked a grin so Steve would know he was mostly kidding.

---

"What were you hoping for? That I secretly have an underwear thing and I was sleeping in them every night when you weren't around?" He pet his fingers through Bucky's hair and drew him in for a kiss.

---

Bucky held Steve close as his kissed him and then popped back off with a little whine. "Yeah, just a little bit. There were other options, but we can discuss those later tonight when we are all alone. For now, let's sing our babies a song and then leave them be for their nap."

---

Steve put his hand up Bucky's shirt and gently scratched his nails over Bucky's back. Christopher looked up at his parents and drifted slowly off to sleep when Bucky sang soft songs and lullabies to him. Once he was asleep, Steve snuggled against Bucky's side.

---

Bucky leaned into Steve and let his own eyes close gently. He hummed softly and whispered, "What do you want to do now? We can play board games with the girls or take a walk in the snow with Diana. Or just be alone for a bit."

---

Steve nuzzled at Bucky's neck and placed a few, gentle kisses there. "Let's be alone for a bit," Steve murmured. He slid his hand up the front of Bucky's shirt and thumbed over his nipple.
Bucky bit his lip and took a shuttering breath. "Is it that kind of alone time?" he asked with a low growl and walked them towards the door. "Or are we going to snuggle and fall asleep? I'll be perfectly honest, I'm fine with either one."

---

"Let's fool around a little," Steve purred. "And then take a nap." Steve was in a bit of a mood to get off with Bucky and he was a little determined to make it happen while they had the chance.

---

"Yep, yes, let's do that," Bucky said and urgently pulled them into their bedroom and shut the door firmly behind them. "What are we doing? Did you have something in mind or no?"

---

Steve backed Bucky towards the bed, nuzzling at his neck and slowly pushing Bucky's pants down. "Maybe just jerking each other off and taking a nap right after?" he asked.

---

"Sure, yes," Bucky said and stuck his hands down the front and back of Steve's pants. "I'll get on the bed. I want your weight on top of me, please. Straddle me."

---

Steve groaned softly and moved over his husband. He kissed him deeply, pressing his body down against his. "I love you," he breathed out. "Entirely. Without question."

---

"I agree. Without question," Bucky said and got at Steve's hard cock and started pumping him. "Steve, I have a question. You remember a while ago you mentioned having sex under the pier at Coney Island? Do you still want to do that? Sounds like a good summer plan."

---

Steve made a soft sound when Bucky started jerking his cock. He dragged his nails down Bucky's front and took his dick into his hand. "I like the sound of that," he said. "We can ride the cyclone. And then we can ride each other."

---

"You know what else?" Bucky said and gripped at the base of Steve's dick for a second tightly. "We should try to go when they have fireworks. Maybe your birthday. Fucking under fireworks sounds like something out of a movie, doesn't it?"

---

Steve thumbed at the head of Bucky's dick as he sucked a hickey onto his husband's neck. "You're being a real romantic here, Buck," he chuckled. "I guess we know how I'm spending my birthday this year."

---

"I guess we do," Bucky agreed and slipped his free hand into Steve's hair. "And what are you doing for my birthday this year?” he asked and quickened his pace as he jerked Steve. "We can't do what we did last year - getting blackout drunk and fucking into oblivion. We still don't remember anything about my birthday."

---

Steve nudged Bucky's hand aside so he could grip both of their cocks and start rutting up against him, grinding their hips together. "Let’s go away for your birthday," Steve said. "That'll be the mini vacation you were asking for."

---

Bucky moaned at the friction of Steve pressed up against him and he closed his eyes for a few moments. "Where should we go?" he asked and then looked back up at Steve. It can't be too far. Manhattan? Maybe."

---

Steve was getting close and it was becoming apparent by the way his hips started jerking erratically forward instead of at even strokes. "Let's do that," he said. "We can be tourists for a day."

---

Bucky nodded and wrapped his hand around Steve's to help encourage him to go faster. "I love you," Bucky moaned quietly and felt his orgasm sneak through him so he was spouting come out on to his stomach and Steve's hand.

---

Steve let out a small groan when he felt Bucky come on him. His orgasm soon followed and he rode it out, happy to have Bucky underneath him. When it was over, he collapsed on top of Bucky, smearing the come between them. He panted, out of breath and needing some time to catch it.

---

Bucky wanted to kiss Steve but he also wanted to give him some time to breathe. He held Steve close and licked and gave little bites wherever he could on him. He also held his hands firmly on Steve's ass and massaged what he could reach.

---

Steve's breath was short and stuttered. Bucky massaging his ass didn't help him calm down, but he loved it anyway. When he finally was able to breathe regularly again, he wrapped his arms strongly around him and kissed his jaw. "That was amazing. As usual."

---

"Meh, sure," Bucky shrugged, trying to pretend like it wasn't wonderful knowing it would get a little rise out of Steve. "How are your lungs? You okay? I bet it's been harder to breathe in the winter air, hasn't it?"

---

Steve's head snapped up at Bucky, looking offended for just a moment before realizing Bucky was messing with him. He huffed and gave Bucky's side a little tickle in retaliation. "I'm fine," Steve insisted stubbornly.

---

Bucky squirmed under the tickling and giggled in such a way that he would deny it later if he was asked. "I'm just asking if you are okay. I know you don't like me asking but you would do the exact same thing if it were me with a chronic injury."

---

"Fine..." he mumbled. "Yeah, it's harder to breathe when the air is cold. But I'm fine now. We jerked off, we didn't run a marathon." Steve was still a bit touchy about the subject. He didn't take illness well.

---

"Okay," Bucky said and held up his hands defensively and shut up about it. "You want to take a little nap for a bit? We can hope that the kids stay asleep for longer than us so we can have a bit of a break. Your mom told me yesterday that vacations aren't vacations for parents, it's just watching your kids at a different location. She's right."

---

"My mom is always right," he chuckled. Steve really was such a mama's boy. He kissed Bucky and snuggled in close. "I love you. Let's catch a quick nap before the kids need us."
Later that day found Steve and Bucky helping Lilly on to the lake to ice skate. "Okay, Lilly, you got this," Bucky said softly and held her hands as she tried to stomp her way carefully across the ice.

---

Steve let out a laugh even though he wasn't much better. But at least he didn't look like Godzilla on skates. He went at a steady pace and watched them from a little distance. "Try gliding instead of stomping," he suggested.

---

Lilly chewed her lip nervously and stared down at the ice. "I'm going to let your hands go now, Lilly," Bucky said and carefully started easing away from her. "You'll be fine. Just shuffle your feet then glide like Steve said."

---

Lilly moved her feet but fell right on her ass. Steve felt bad for her even though it was pretty funny how fast she went down. "Ugh, ice-skating is the worst!" she complained.

---

Bucky helped her back up and said, "You'll get it, Lil. Don't worry. You're the one who wanted to do ice skating in the first place. Just go slow at first." He let her go again and zoomed over to hold Steve's hand. "Come skate to us!" he called out to her and waited.

---

Steve gripped onto Bucky's hand because he also didn't feel incredibly confident being able to stay on his feet, even though he was faring better than Lilly was. After a while of shuffling and trying to glide, she finally was able to skate over to them.

---

"Yeah! You did it!" Bucky shouted in encouragement and held her close to him when she flopped into his arms. He laughed and kissed her head before letting her go again. "You’ll get used to it." They skated around slowly for a few minutes while Bucky just tried to make sure neither of them fell. He felt bad that he had never taken Lilly ice-skating in the city before. He made a mental note to take her to a real rink sometime soon.

Bucky took a few circles around the two of them and then stopped when he noticed Diana sniffing around the cabin intently and sticking her nose in the air to get whatever scent she was looking for. "What's Diana doing?" he asked Steve and pointed at her.
Steve looked over and frowned when he saw that his dog was up to something. He skidded to the edge and took off of his skates once he was on solid ground. "I'll check it out," he said. Becca had been out with Sarah May and Christopher earlier but they all went inside a few minutes before. He figured he’d go check on Becca and see if she knew anything. "Hey, do you know why Diana is acting funny?"

Becca was in the middle of changing Sarah May's diaper and she wasn't quite paying attention to anything else. "She's your dog, Steve. I don't know what she's doing. Isn't she out with you guys?"

"She's looking around like she's hunting," Steve said. He paused for a moment, seeing Sarah May but not his son and Becca didn't seem to notice anything else going on around her. "Becca, where's Christopher?"

"Playing with his blocks over there," Becca paused and looked over to where her nephew had been just a few minutes previously "Christopher?" she questioned and held Sarah May close to her chest. "Christopher!" she yelped and started looking behind all the furniture and under the tables.

Steve's stomach dropped. "You weren't watching him?" Rather than look inside, he darted back outside to Diana to try to find any sign of his son. "Bucky, Christopher's gone!" He yelled out at his husband.

"What?" Bucky shouted across the lake, unable to hear Steve. He turned to Lilly. "Let's go back in, Lilly. I don't know what he said. He doesn't look okay." Bucky came back in with Lilly and took off his skates quickly. "Baby, what's wrong?" he called to Steve as he tromped in his socks towards him.

Steve was able to find a big line of broken snow from someone or something going clumsily through it. "Diana, go get him," Steve urged, pointing the dog in the direction of the trail while Bucky came over. "Becca lost Christopher," he said in a panic before following his dog.

Bucky was very confused but he immediately followed Steve and the dog. "Christopher?" he gasped and started running behind Diana as she sped up now that she had a clear trail to go after. Bucky forgot about Steve's lungs as he sprinted far ahead of him, leaving him shouting after him.

After about five minutes of wandering into the woods, Christopher was cold to the bone. He had gotten snow in his little suit and long ago abandoned his hat. Realizing nothing was familiar, he started to cry, which Bucky was able to hear faintly from where he was. Steve tried to keep up but ended up hugging a tree as he wheezed and tried not to pass out from his lack of air.
Bucky and Diana heard Christopher's screaming and crying and ran to him. The moment he got to him, Bucky dropped down into the snow as fast as he could. He unzipped his coat and jacket and lifted his shirt up to pull Christopher inside next to his warm skin. He popped his little head out of the neck of Bucky's shirt and whimpered against Bucky's collarbone. Bucky zipped his jacket and coat back up quickly and held his shivering boy. "Steve! Steve! We're here!"

Diana barked and whined as she circled Bucky once he had Christopher in his arms. She jumped up and put her paws on Bucky's stomach so she could sniff the bundle. Steve was barely standing by the time he reached Bucky. He was holding onto another tree for support and he was crying.

Bucky heard Steve's shallow panting and rushed over to him to hold him steady against the tree. He pressed close to him carefully to try to combine his and Steve's warmth to help Christopher. "Steve," he said slowly, "I know you just ran out here but we need to get back to the cabin. Christopher needs a warm bath and dry clothes and then needs to be swaddled. We need to go back."

Steve didn't think he could move for a little while. He hadn't pushed himself this much since his injury and he couldn't believe how crippled it left him right now. He wanted to go back and comfort his son, but Christopher needed to get warm. "I'll catch up," he wheezed out.

Bucky was worried like hell for Steve but he needed to get their son to the cabin. "Diana," he said and looked to the dog. "Stay here with him. I'll send Lilly out to you."

He gave Steve a gentle, quick kiss and started off towards the cabin quickly with Christopher saying, "Papa," repeatedly through his tears and shivering.

Diana understood 'stay', so she waited with Steve dutifully. When Bucky got back to the cabin, Christopher was still whimpering and shaking like a leaf. Becca looked beyond distraught when she saw Christopher. "Oh, my god! He went outside?"

When Christopher felt the jacket get taken off from around him, he started crying again. Becca had Sarah May in her arms still, who looked over at Bucky curiously. Becca was just barely holding back tears as she nodded her head. She set the baby in her car seat and buckled it up so she couldn't go anywhere then got her shoes on and hurried outside to tell Lilly to go get Steve.
Bucky tried his best to placate his son as he held him close and got a bath running. He had to maneuver the both of them out of their clothes while he held him so he wouldn't be more upset. After a few minutes, they were both sitting in the hot bath and Bucky was singing softly to Christopher and petting his hair, just waiting for Lilly to get back with Steve.

---

"Papa..." Christopher mumbled, his face all wet with tears. Once he got warmed up, he finally started to relax a little.

Steve finally arrived almost ten minutes after Bucky got Christopher in his bath. "Is he okay?" he asked and came close to them both.

---

"He's okay." Bucky nodded with a sigh and wiped at his eyes. "Get over here, he needs you." He wanted to ask about his lungs but figured that would cause a fight and he didn't want to argue at the moment.

---

"Hey, my beautiful boy," Steve said softly as he knelt down at the side of the tub. "You gave us a big scare. I bet you scared yourself too, Bean." Christopher looked up at his dad and made a noise but wasn't chatty like usual.

---

Bucky felt Christopher make fists against his chest as he stared at his daddy. "I think everyone was scared. Are you okay, Baby?" he asked, trying not to sound like he was asking about his breathing and instead just asking in general. “Where are the girls and your mother? Does someone have Sarah May?"

---

"My mom has been taking a nap all afternoon," Steve said. "Becca has Sarah May and I think we need to talk to her because she's crying about Christopher. Lilly is trying to help her but I don't think it's working."

---

Bucky agreed with a short nod and looked down at his son again. "What happened? Was Becca just not paying attention? Or did he just manage to sneak off? It's not like her to be irresponsible."

---

"She was changing Sarah May's diaper when I came inside. It looked like she was safe to take her eyes off for a few minutes while she took care of her," Steve said. He was upset but knew it was an honest mistake. It wasn't like Becca was trying to be unattentive.

---

"How did he get out the door?" Bucky asked. "He's too short to reach the knob." Christopher squirmed just a bit and started taking slower, deeper breaths. "He's falling asleep."
"I'll have to have a look," Steve said. "Want me to put him to bed? I think our little guy has had enough adventure for one afternoon." He grabbed a towel so they could take him out of the bath.

---

Bucky licked his lips nervously and then reluctantly handed their son off. "I don't want to leave him," he said as he popped the tub cork out to drain the water. He got out of the tub and wrapped himself in a towel, already missing holding his little boy against his chest and keeping him safe like a father should.

---

Steve wanted to hold Christopher and keep him safe - he practically fainted trying to get to him - and he wanted his little boy to know that he would always be there for him. But he saw the look on Bucky's face and passed him back after giving their son a kiss. "Let's put him down for a nap together."

---

Bucky nodded and held his towel tightly wrapped around him as he carried Christopher to the room to get pajamas on and have a nap. He gave the baby back to Steve and picked out clothes for him to dress their son. "I'm going to go put on clothes quickly while you dress him then I'll come tuck him in with you."

---

Steve nodded. Christopher looked up sleepily at him and didn't put up his usual fussing. Steve got him into his pajamas and rocked him in his arms. He didn't want to put him down until Bucky was back. "Hey there, Little Bean. Your Papa and I were so worried about you."

---

Christopher just looked up at his daddy and blinked slowly. Bucky was back in a few minutes and came to stand behind Steve and hold him and their son. He sighed and watching Christopher who was just a few quiet seconds away from being completely asleep.

---

Steve hushed for a little while and once Christopher was properly asleep, he laid his head on Bucky's shoulder. "I was so scared," he whispered.

---

"Me too," Bucky said and watched Christopher's chest and tummy moving up and down as he slept and breathed easy. "It's so cold out there I hope he doesn't get sick. And there are animals and things he could get hurt on. I'm so glad he's safe back home with us."

---

"Diana saved the day again. We have to give her a treat tonight. Maybe make her some chicken to throw in with her regular food." He kissed Bucky's cheek. "I'm so happy you had us get her. She's perfect."
"She's a good dog," Bucky agreed and pulled Steve towards the door saying, "Let's let him have a nap." He knew they needed to go talk to Becca, and they would, but he pulled Steve to their bedroom first. He clung to him, with both hands flat on his chest like he could heal his lungs if he pushed like that. "Sorry, I just need a minute."

---

Steve wrapped his arms around him and tucked Bucky's head into his shoulder. "It's alright," he said. "I need a minute, too." He didn't realize how fucked up he would get over losing his kid for a few minutes. It was awful.

---

Bucky took in a shuttering breath and felt some tears roll down his cheeks. He couldn't think too hard about what just happened and what could have happened otherwise he would start really crying and going to the worst-case scenario. Worst case scenario being, his son lost forever in the woods or something just as gruesome and a second child of his is gone forever. He cleared his throat and shook the fear and morbidity from his mind. "Steve, I know you don't want me to ask, but how are you breathing now? I was scared for you out there too but I needed to get our baby back home."

---

Steve was a bit of a helicopter parent to begin with. But after this, he would find it near impossible to let his kids out of his sight, even when he had another responsible adult watching them. "I don’t know. Ask my doctor." He hated that he got so defensive when Bucky asked about his lungs. And he knew he meant well, but he couldn't help but get a bit angry. Especially when he couldn't get to his own son quick enough and that terrified him.

---

Bucky tensed up noticeably and clenched his jaw as he looked up into Steve's eyes. He waited a few seconds to see if Steve would like to try again or apologize, but he didn't. "Fine. I'll stop asking," he said quietly but grumpily. "Who gives a shit?" he added in a mumble.

---

Steve didn't like upsetting Bucky, but he also couldn't find it in himself to apologize for his answer. Sarah came in with a knock on the door. "Bucky, Becca is crying and she isn't telling me why," she said. "I thought you should know." She was concerned since Becca usually didn't keep stuff from her. All she knew was she woke up from her nap and went to get some tea when she found Becca crying in the living room.

---

"Thanks. I'll come talk to her." Bucky nodded, thankful for an excuse to let go of Steve. He was admittedly annoyed with him at the moment. Bucky went to find Becca who was crying with her head on Lilly's shoulder. Bucky carefully sat down on the floor next to her and pulled her in close to him. "You know, when I was really young and you were about three, we were playing hide and seek. And at one point, you hid so well that I couldn't find you anymore. And I was around thirteen so I should have been able to find you. I was so nervous that you had disappeared. I kept trying to tempt you out saying, 'Baby Bear, I have jelly beans just for you.' But you just kept hiding. When I finally woke Mom up from a nap and she found you, you had fallen asleep on the bottom shelf in the pantry next to cereal boxes and pancake mix."
Becca hadn't let go of Sarah May since she got her from her car seat. She wanted to hold her close and protect her. She looked up at Bucky with a frown and had an ashamed expression on her face. "That was hide and seek. I wasn't playing hide and seek with Christopher," she said, not feeling better by the story. "You didn't let me wander outside in the snow as a baby."

"It was an accident," Bucky said and kissed her head before working on wiping her tears away with his shirtsleeve. "You were preoccupied with one baby already. I understand. Having two little ones under your watch is difficult. Did you just leave the door open a crack or something so he escaped?"

Becca shook her head. "I didn't open any of the doors. I made sure they were -" and then she paused as she looked at the kitchen door that led outside. "He must've gone out the doggy door," she said. Becca looked miserably up at her brother. "What if something had happened to him?"

Bucky looked to the dog door, which was just a perfect size for Christopher to walk right out. "Becca, Sweetheart, we can't think that way. Nothing did happen to him. He is safe. He is warm and asleep in his crib and he's just fine now."

"Can I go see him? I won't wake him up, I promise," she said. Sarah May wiggled in her arms and reached up for Bucky, wanting to go to her papa. The fact that Sarah May wanted out of her arms made Becca feel worse.

Bucky gently took his daughter and held her close. "Of course, you can go to him," he said and squeezed Becca's arm. "He probably won't wake up so don't worry about that. He's pretty tired."

Sarah May gurgled up at Bucky and reached her hands up to touch his face. When they got to the nursery, Becca leaned over the side of the crib and watched Christopher as he slept. "Was he scared?" Becca asked.

Bucky sighed and touched his sister's hair to gently play with it. "Yes, he was scared. But he was out by himself in the woods. You would be scared too. He's fine now. He is safe and all better. He just didn't know what was happening. He probably just wanted to find me and Steve and then got distracted by an animal or something and followed it to the woods."

She sniffled but seemed to calm down after seeing her nephew all safe and bundled up in his bed. She tucked a bit of his hair behind his ear and straightened up. "Poor baby."
Bucky kissed her head and held her close. "Sarah May is beyond grateful that you took good care of her. She knows you could have just called us in to change her diaper and hold her but you did that for her. She loves you and so does Christopher. And now you know what it was like when I was helping mom take care of you and Lilly as babies. I know you don't quite remember our little monster when she was that young, but still."

---

Becca looked over at her niece and reached over to hold her hand. Sarah May grunted softly because she had been in the middle of grabbing for Bucky's hair, but allowed Becca to hold her hand instead. "And he's only just learned how to walk. I don't want to be responsible for him when he's old enough to climb."

---

"That's okay," Bucky said and watched his sister interact with his daughter. "You don't have to be. Steve isn't working. So normally, he will be here for them. I'm sorry if we made you do anything you didn't want to do. I'm sorry if you didn't want to watch out for them. One of us should have stayed here so you didn't have to be in charge if you didn't want to."

---

"It's not that I don't want to take care of them. I like being there for them. It's just... it's scary," Becca admitted shyly. It wasn't often she was proven wrong and she was so used to naturally having a handle on things.

---

Bucky gave her a little smile. "I understand. Being responsible for human lives is very scary. It was bad enough when I was young and Mom needed a break so I was in charge of the both of you. But I knew that if something was seriously wrong I could go wake her up. But when Mom and Dad died... I was terrified. I thought for sure I was going to completely ruin your lives. I had no one else to turn to if I needed help or didn't know what to do. I don't know what I would do without Steve here to help both with you two and our children."

---

"Well, you wouldn't have kids right now if Steve wasn't here," she said. "And I may have filed for early emancipation to try to get a job and my own place if you kept at things the way you were going before Steve." Becca shrugged. "But you got better. So there's that. This is just more proof to me that I'm not having kids until I'm about thirty."

---

Bucky couldn't help but get upset. He looked her in the eyes and felt his own tearing up. "You were considering filing for early emancipation? How do you even know what that is?" he asked quietly and stared at her. He couldn't bear the thought of his sister leaving him. Better yet, she would leave Lilly? He understood her wanting to be rid of him back when he wasn't doing well but it wasn't like he ever hurt his sisters or treated them poorly. He just fucked up his own life a lot.

---

Becca winced, realizing she probably shouldn't have said that. She shrugged her shoulders up nervously and crossed her arms over her chest. "I learned about it from this one girl in my class whose older brother did it. I wouldn't have gone far anyway. And it's not like I actually did it."
Bucky shook his head and covered his eyes with his free hand. His breathing was becoming unsteady and he sort of felt like he was on the verge of a breakdown. "When was this?" he asked, keeping his face partially covered as he wiped at his eyes. "How many years ago I mean?"

Sarah May saw her papa start to look distressed so her face scrunched up and her bottom lip jutted out as she cried softly and quietly with him. "Just forget I said it," Becca said, still looking away from her brother. "It doesn't matter."

Bucky looked back over at her and said in disbelief, "Our parents had just died and you were going to leave us too?" He shook his head and held Sarah May close to his chest. He wanted to add that regardless of all the things that he did wrong, he never wanted to leave his siblings. "I need to go find Steve," he mumbled and turned to leave.

"I wasn't going to leave!" she tried to say in her defense. Moving to her own apartment somewhere else in Brooklyn wasn't leaving them. She huffed and turned back to Christopher when Bucky left. She already regretted talking about this.

Bucky went to find Steve and immediately pressed himself to his chest once he got there. Sarah May was still upset but she calmed down slightly when she had hands on both her fathers again. Bucky just worked on calming down and trying to push the thought of Becca leaving from his mind. He constantly dreaded the day that she would go off to college and not live at home anymore. He hated thinking that it almost happened far sooner than he anticipated.

When Bucky came in upset, Steve was concerned. He didn't think Bucky would forgive him so soon after being short with him but he wrapped his arms around him regardless and kissed his head. "Hey, what's wrong?" Steve asked. "Is it something with Christopher?"

Bucky shook his head. "No. He's fine. He's asleep. It's Becca." He paused and thought over their conversation. "She spent years making me feel like the worst sibling in the world but I never wanted to leave my family. She would leave us. Just leave us and go off on her own when we needed her. Jesus..."

Steve frowned and pulled Bucky to sit down on the edge of the bed with him. "What makes you say that?" he asked. "Is she looking to move out? What did she say?" Bucky had himself put together again and while he knew their kids could be loud, he didn't see why it was so bad that Becca wanted out.
Bucky shook his head and leaned into Steve. "Not anymore apparently. But, at some point, she was trying to file for early emancipation. We just lost our parents and then she was going to up and leave Lilly and me? She's got to know that would have killed me."

---

"What? Are you kidding?" Steve frowned, genuinely disappointed in Becca even though he wasn't as hurt over it as Bucky was. Family was everything to him and to Bucky as well. Becca thought of herself more than the rest of them did. "Why would she even say that to you?"

---

Bucky shook his head and let some more tears build up in his eyes. "I don't know. I have no idea why she thought I wouldn't be upset after hearing that. My god, Steve, I can't lose her too. She would leave us like that? Does she even know what it was like for me to be constantly worried that my baby sisters were going to die just like my parents? I was terrified."

---

"Oh, Buck... I'm so sorry," Steve said softly. "Kids can do stupid, selfish things. And if you try to force her to do something she doesn't want, then she's only going to resent you for it. I want her to stay, too. And I want to help take care of her, too. But maybe we got to let her realize her limits on her own."

---

"But I don't want her to leave," Bucky whined and clutched on to Steve. "I've taken care of her since she was a baby. I was ten when she was born. I held her in my arms when we were in the hospital and I promised to always protect her. And she's hardly even acknowledged everything that I have done for her. Brothers who have done a fraction of what I have can get triple the love and gratitude. She thinks Mom was the one who raised her while Dad was working but it was me! Mom was horribly depressed after Becca was born and Dad was crippled and honorably discharged and working a low-paying job. There were week-long stretches where I would only be able to get my mother out of her room to breastfeed Becca and then she would be right back in bed."

---

Sarah May whined softly when she was squished between them and Steve leaned back a little while keeping his hold on Bucky. "I know, Buck, it isn't fair. I know how much you did for her - how much you still do." He pet his fingers through his hair. "You're such an amazing brother and an even better dad," he said. "One day she's going to realize that, too."

---

"No, she won't. She will never see me the way I would like her too," Bucky said grumpily. "She's always been selfish. And I know I have been selfish at times too but Becca... Becca has consistently been this way. To her, our parents' jobs were to support her through her academics and clubs and study groups so she could grow up to be this genius. And Lilly and I were meant to be her fans or something. We were always second-rate to Becca in her eyes."

---

Steve frowned, upset on Bucky's behalf. "Maybe we should let her start doing things on her own now. And she'll realize all that it is that you do for her, Buck," Steve said softly. "We're supposed to support her, but if she thinks she's better because she gets good grades or something, then we aren't raising her right."

--

"She's fifteen," Bucky said. "She's just wildly immature and self-centered. She would like to think she's all grown up because of her experiences but there is a difference to being hardened for your age having seen too much and being a mature adult."

--

"Most fifteen-year-olds are that way, Love," Steve sighed. "We got to teach her that's not how the Rogers-Barnes family treats each other." He kissed the top of his head. "Maybe my Ma can give us some advice."

--

Bucky nodded and held Sarah May closer. "That's a good idea. We should ask your mom. For now, though, I want to forget it and just move on. I've got a headache anyway and Christopher will be waking up soon, I would think."

--

Sarah May squeaked softly and put her hands on Bucky's face. "Do you want me to hold her so you can have a nap? Or maybe I can watch over while you lay down with her?" Steve offered.

--

"You can have her." Bucky nodded and handed her off to his husband. "I'll just take some medicine and have a nap. But please just stay with me a bit. At least until I fall asleep."

--

Sarah May's face scrunched up and big, fat crocodile tears formed when Bucky passed her over. "Oh, don't be like that," Steve said softly to his daughter as he cradled her close. He sat down next to Bucky's spot on the bed and rocked her. "Looks like you're still her favorite," Steve sighed.

--

"She just wants my hair," Bucky said quietly and pulled a blanket over himself. "Now that she has taken to Christopher's habit, we won't be able to get her to stop, I'm sure." He sighed and held a hand on Steve's thigh.

--

Steve shifted their little girl into one arm and used his free hand to pet his fingers through Bucky's hair. "I wonder if our other kids will be hair pullers, too," Steve said. "Your hair is just that irresistible, I guess."

--

"If we get another hair puller, I'm cutting it," Bucky mumbled as an empty threat and rubbed his hand soothingly up and down Steve's thigh. He added quietly, "Can we make love tonight? We are leaving tomorrow afternoon so I think it'll be our last chance here for a while."
"No," Steve whined softly. He loved Bucky's long hair. But when Bucky asked to make love tonight, he nodded. "That'd be really nice, Buck... maybe we can shower together before. Make a nice evening doting on each other, you know?"

---

"Yeah." Bucky smiled warmly. "I love when we do that. I like just, you know, being together and loving on each other and feeling each other's bodies. After the day we have had, that's exactly what we need. We just need some peace and quiet and alone time."

---

"That sounds perfect," Steve said. "After all, we got to celebrate our first year as a married couple the best way we can." Steve loved the intimacy he and Bucky had. "You mean so much to me, Buck. Everything good I have in this life is thanks to you."

---

Bucky scooted closer and used Steve's thigh as a pillow. "You know I feel the exact same about you. I love you so much. Now, let me rest so I'll be awake when we have sex later, okay?" He chuckled and shut his eyes.

---

Steve laughed and nodded. He gave Bucky some peace and quiet after that. Sarah May dosed off in his arms, too. Steve only got up when it was time to make dinner and his mom was more than happy to take her granddaughter from him.

---

Bucky was so tired. He slept straight through dinner and only woke up when Steve came back into the bedroom and quietly shut the door behind him. Bucky rolled over and sat up. "Hey, what time is it? Are the kids asleep?"

---

Steve sat on the edge of the bed and put an arm around his husband. "It's nine," he said. "I put both the kids to bed and I saved some dinner for you if you want some." Steve kissed Bucky's forehead. "I would have woken you but you said you were tired."

---

Bucky held Steve close and breathed him in. "It's okay. Thank you for saving me food. I'll eat later." He reached up and pulled Steve close for a kiss. "You still want to shower and have sex? Because I do," he pouted a little and widened his eyes hoping to entice Steve.

---

Steve laughed and leaned in to kiss Bucky slowly. "Not even awake for a full minute and you're already looking for some." He ran a hand over Bucky's chest. "Take my clothes off," he purred.

---

Bucky nodded eagerly and reached for the hem of Steve's shirt. "Baby, you know you can get me going with just a look. Just the way you walk into a room can get me hot. Those precious little looks Steve slid his hands down Bucky's body. "I know," he said with a hint of pride in his voice. "Sometimes I like to give you a big pair of bedroom eyes when I know we can't do anything just cause I like to rile you up. I love it when you look at me like you can't wait to get in bed with me."

"I can never wait to get in bed with you," Bucky said and tucked his hands in the front of Steve's pants. "Every minute apart is twice as long as every minute together." He smiled up at him and he shed Steve of the rest of his clothing and started in on his own. "You want to start the shower warming up?"

When Bucky started to undress himself, Steve put his hands on Bucky's to still them and then pressed his naked body to his husband's clothed one as he kissed him deeply. "Feel how hard I already am for you?" He brought Bucky's hand down between his legs. "I'm saving this for later." He tugged Bucky's lower lip between his teeth before hurrying to start the shower.

The second Steve was off of him, Bucky let out a breath he didn't realize he had been holding. He wasn't kidding when he said that Steve still did things to him. "Jesus," he whispered and quickly rid himself of the rest of his clothes before going to join Steve. "Is it warm? I'm so cold. Feel my nose."

Steve got the water just a little steaming so it would help quell the winter chill. He turned and pressed his lips to Bucky's nose. "You're right. Your nose is really cold." He pulled Bucky into a tight hug and nuzzled his neck. "Let me warm you up."

"Yes, please," Bucky said and wrapped an arm around Steve as he kissed his neck and his jaw. "So," he started, letting his hand find its way to the base of Steve's cock. "How are we doing it tonight? I'm good any way you want it."

Steve breathed out and looked down at Bucky with dark eyes as he touched him. "I was thinking of tying your hands to the headboard," Steve said. "And taking you nice and slow from behind. I'll kiss your neck and play with your nipples until you're begging to come."

Bucky whined and bit once lightly at Steve's neck. "Did you bring the ties? Because I didn't," he said and slowly squeezed his hand around Steve repeatedly. He didn't want to stroke him because he wanted him to last so he could get fucked nice and slow like Steve said.

Steve panted softly against Bucky's skin and dragged his nails slowly down his back. "I did," Steve "You think I would come here unprepared?" He gave Bucky a cocky, little smirk. "Quit teasing me and wash my hair," he demanded lightly.

---

"But you usually wash my hair," Bucky combatted but soaped up his hand with some shampoo anyway. He brought only one bottle of shampoo for himself, Steve, and the babies. It was a baby safe no-tear type of shampoo that smelled like grapes. Bucky giggled. "Your hair has purple in it."

---

"I'll wash your hair next, don't worry." Steve smiled and closed his eyes as Bucky washed him. "I can't believe you only packed the baby shampoo," he chuckled. "We really are dads now."

---

Bucky flicked Steve in the side of the head. "It was going to take up too much room to bring our shampoo too. And it's not like this bottle says not to use on adults. And if it gets in your eyes, you won't cry about it," he joked and gave Steve a wet kiss before pushing him under the stream of water to wash out his hair.

---

Steve tilted his head back. "It does smell good," he agreed. "I wouldn't mind using this more often. Less bulk to carry in the weekly shopping if we are only buying one kind of shampoo."

---

"Yes, but, we will have to buy it more often if we are both using it as well as the babies. Right now we use hardly any," Bucky said and handed the bottle to Steve once he was done washing his hair out. "Guess what, Baby."

---

"True, but we only go through a bottle of shampoo a month for each of us and I do the shopping every week." Steve took the shampoo and poured it in his hands. "What?" he asked, threading his fingers through Bucky's hair.

---

"Our anniversary tomorrow is the same day that I have been sober for three months again. I'll get my chip the next time I go in," Bucky said and gave Steve a little kiss. "I'm getting back up there. It was easier the second time around."

---

"I'm so proud of you, Buck," Steve said softly. He massaged his scalp as he worked the shampoo into Bucky's hair. "It may have been easier for you this time, but I still know how hard it was for you to do it. You should be proud of what you've done."

---

Bucky hummed happily and paid attention to the wonderful feeling of Steve's fingers in his hair. "I think I really am proud of myself. It was really difficult to start both times but once I'm on a roll it's so much easier to just think about my family and keep going. I want our babies to never have any memories of me being drunk or even having a sip of beer or anything."

"Our babies won't," Steve said confidently. "Christopher and Sarah May and Grant and all our future kids will only know you as the totally rad Papa that you are," he said sweetly. "You're such an amazing man, Bucky. I'm so happy you're my husband."

It still hurt whenever they mentioned Grant. Bucky figured it would always hurt. He smiled up at his husband and brought him in for a kiss. "You're perfect. You know that?" He slipped his hands over Steve's wet ass and squeezed. "I'm all clean now. And I'm going to be cold when I get out of this shower so I'll need you to warm me up."

Steve didn't like the hurt in Bucky's eyes when they mentioned their second son, but Steve couldn't bear to not include him. He was still their baby boy. "I'll be sure to keep you warm all night long, Love. Every night." He turned off the taps and grabbed a towel so he could wrap Bucky snugly in it.

Bucky felt like a wet puppy wrapped in a towel with a smaller one on top of his head. His dick was focused in on Steve's naked wet body before him and it was sticking out, tenting the green towel comically. "As unromantic as it sounds, I'm ready for your cock."

Steve laughed at the sight of his husband. He loved these honest, human moments with him where Bucky was being... Bucky. He cupped the sides of his face and pulled him into a slow kiss. "You're not ready until I'm three fingers deep, putting you on the verge of coming."

Bucky whined and gripped on to Steve. "Yes, whatever you say, Baby." He quickly dried his hair off and tossed the towels aside. "The kids are asleep, right? I don't like the idea of them crying for us while I'm tied up in bed. Remember last year when we used your handcuffs and we couldn't find the keys at first?"

Steve giggled childishly at the memory. "That was really funny." It was only funny because it didn't turn into a mess. "Yeah, they're asleep, Babe. It's just you and me tonight." He nudged Bucky into their bedroom and gave him a light push onto the bed. "Let me see your gorgeous ass."

Bucky fell back on to the bed and he was quick to roll and get on all fours so Steve could see him. "Are you going to eat me out a little bit before we fuck? I would really appreciate it if you did but only if you want to."

"Well, I wouldn't ask to look if I didn't want to have a taste," Steve hummed. He ran his hand slowly down Bucky's spine before going into the duffel bag. He pulled out a silk rope and some flavored lube. He put the lube on the bed in Bucky's line of sight before getting on the bed as well. He kissed Bucky's wrists and then started to tie them up.

---

Bucky was very compliant as Steve tied him up. He got a good look at the lube and noticed it was a new bottle of a new flavor. "Steve," he gasped and stared at his husband. "Did you go to the sex shop? All on your own? Because I know I didn't buy that bottle."

---

Steve smiled proudly as he tied Bucky's wrist to the headboard. "I did," he said happily. "I told my mom I had to get some last minute groceries. And since you can eat this, I technically wasn't lying." He took the bottle and poured some onto his fingers quickly.

---

"You cheeky bastard," Bucky snarked back at his husband. He couldn't see him at all. All he could see were his arms and the strands of wet hair that were falling in his face. "Can you put my hair up? It's going to drive my crazy if it's slapping all over my face while you rail me."

---

"I can't believe you asked me to do your hair the second after I get lube all over my hands," Steve complained. He wiped his hands clean on a few tissues and got a hair tie out. He pulled Bucky's hair neatly back into a clean ponytail and tied it up. "How's that?"

---

"I didn't know you had lube on your hands. I can't see you at all," Bucky defended and pushed his ass out a little more so Steve wouldn't be annoyed. "But thank you for putting it up. Now it'll be easier for you to grab on to as well, right?"

---

"You're still a pain in the neck," Steve goaded fondly. He lubed his fingers up again and teased Bucky's hole by smearing a little lube around the rim. "You really like it when I pull on your hair, don't you?"

---

Bucky groaned and pushed back some more. "Please, fingers, please," he whined and hung his head. "You love pulling on my hair and you love that it gets me going. Don't even try to pretend you don't. You love my hair. You love my cock. You love my ass."

---

Steve slowly eased a finger inside of Bucky's ass and pushed it in until he was down to his third knuckle. He carefully pulled Bucky's hair to tilt his head back, exposing his throat so Steve could kiss it. He added a second finger and began to thrust them inside and out. "I do love all of that," he decided.

---
Bucky’s breath hitched in his throat and he glanced over at Steve. "You are so handsome when you’re opening me up. You're eyes get this special glow - this hungry need to be inside me. They don't look quite like that any other time. And, god, I love it."

---

Steve smirked. "It's because I know I'm the only person on this earth who gets to do this now." He moved behind Bucky and spread his ass apart so he could stick his tongue between his two fingers and open him up even more.

---

"Fuck, Steve!" Bucky gasped and bit his lower lip. He sort of forgot how good it felt to have Steve's tongue inside of him. It really was one of his favorite things. "How does your new lube taste?" he asked and then quickly added, "Never mind. Tell me later. I don't want you to stop to talk."

---

Steve pulled back to circle the tip of his tongue around Bucky's hole before plunging back in. He moaned low, hard as anything because he knew how much Bucky was enjoying himself right now. He wanted to give him the night of his life. Once he felt Bucky was relaxed enough, he worked a third finger inside of him.

---

Bucky just focused on breathing. He wanted Steve to fuck him into next week but he also wanted to be patient and take everything Steve wanted to give him. He also couldn't move his arms and he so desperately wanted his dick to be touched. "Were you planning on me coming with you in my ass or before?"

---

"I don’t know," Steve said. "We'll see how long you last." He licked a stripe down to Bucky's balls and kissed them once. He spread his fingers wide inside of his husband and asked, "Want me to spank you a little?"

---

Bucky’s voice was a little too high-pitched when he said, "You know I always do," in a desperate, pleading way. He never wanted to directly ask Steve to get rough with him because he didn't want to push him. But if Steve instigated it then he didn't have a problem with asking for a little.

---

Steve didn't like raising his hand to Bucky. But he was willing to experiment a little and it wasn't like he was going to put much heat into it. He still worked his fingers deep into his husband's ass and just as he pushed them back inside again, he gave a firm swat to Bucky's cheek with his free hand.

---

Bucky groaned and shook his head. "You know what would look nice?" he asked. "A bright red handprint with a hickey in the middle. You mark up my neck all the time. Mark up my ass too. Make it last a few days. Show off your work to yourself when I get dressed in front of you. Give yourself something to look at."
"I'm not leaving a handprint on you," Steve answered calmly but decisively as he swatted him again. He gave a little smack to Bucky's balls too, for good measure. "But a hickey I can do." He kissed the small of Bucky's back before biting lightly at the swell of his ass. He kissed the red skin and started to suck a mark there.

Bucky nodded and clenched his fists. He wished he could see what Steve was doing. "So hickeys and bite marks?" he asked and clunked his forehead on the wood of the headboard in front of him. "But no hands? Not that I'm complaining. You do want you feel comfortable doing. I'm just curious."

"Yeah, because those don't require me raising my hand to you any harder than this," Steve said. He moved to Bucky's other cheek and slowly sucked a new mark. "I don't like hitting people." Especially not someone he loved, even though Bucky insisted that he liked it.

"I know. I get it," Bucky said. "Just bite me pretty good then. How's that?" he asked and shut up again so Steve could get back to it. It was getting later and even though they both wanted to enjoy their time together, Bucky worried one of the babies would wake up and need them. But he didn't dare interrupt Steve again. He wanted his cock too much. If there was a problem, he would just wait for Steve tied up like he was. He would just deal with it.

Steve took his time and went back to eating Bucky's ass out and making his hole sloppy with spit and lube. He bit a few marks onto his ass and his upper thighs to lay his claim on his husband. Finally, it was too much and he couldn't handle waiting any longer to be inside of him. The second he pulled his fingers out was the same second he was pushing his cock deep into him, stretching him wider and filling him up until he was balls deep in his ass.

Bucky gasped and moaned and bopped his head on the wood of the bed again. "Fuck," he whispered and pulled at the restraints, wanting to get to his hard leaking cock. "Your dick feels so nice. I'm so warm and full. It's amazing. Please, fuck me. Go slow at first, let me feel the drag."

Steve grabbed Bucky's hip with his hand and did just that. He slowly pulled his hips back so his cock drew Bucky's hole outwards as he pulled away. Then he pushed back just as slowly. He panted against the back of Bucky's neck, desperate to go faster but holding back because Bucky wanted him to go slow.

Bucky groaned a little loudly and had to bite a corner of the pillow in front of him to stifle the sound. "How good does that feel?" he asked and tried his best to looked back at Steve. "I bet it looks pretty damn amazing too."
"I wanna fuck you into next week," Steve answered back in a low voice. He pulled back to watch Bucky's hole move with his dick. It looked fucking amazing. "Wish I had my camera in reach. You look so hot."

Bucky giggled a little deliriously and sighed. He squeezed his ass around Steve's dick then said in a low growl, "Then fuck me. I can tell you just can't wait. Give it to me good."

Steve reached over to hold onto Bucky's hair and wrap it around his fingers. With his other hand on Bucky's hip, he held him steady as he tore in, practically jackhammering himself into his husband's ass. He knew he couldn't keep this pace up for very long at all but, god, it was satisfying.

"Christ!" Bucky yelped and clenched his fists in the restraints. "Don't stop, Baby. Please!" he said and arched his neck back as Steve pulled on his braid. "Kiss me. Kiss me," he begged and shut his eyes tight.

Steve's balls slapped against Bucky's skin as he pounded his ass, gasping for breath with each thrust. He leaned down and gave him a deep, searing kiss as he fucked him. "You feel so good, Buck."

Bucky nodded and panted as well. "Hold the base of my dick. I don't want to come too fast. I want to last with you." he gasped a few times and felt himself getting close to orgasm already which he didn't think was very fair.

Steve let out a breathless laugh and grabbed Bucky's dick. He held it firmly as he rocked in and out of his ass. He leaned down and bit Bucky's shoulders, marking him wherever his mouth could reach. "We can always have round two."

"I'll fuck you in the morning before anyone is awake?" Bucky suggested. The need to come passed slightly as Steve held his cock. Steve also needed to slow down a bit because of his breathing and Bucky was content to let them ride it out a little slower.

"Deal," Steve answered. Because he had to go slower now, Steve let go of Bucky's hair and started to push a finger inside Bucky's ass next to his dick. "How's that, Love?"

"Feels perfect," Bucky said and unclenched his fists. "Can my arms be let down so I can hold you?" he asked softly and looked back at Steve. "Want to touch my husband. Want to see his beautiful eyes."
Steve sucked one last mark onto Bucky's neck before reaching up to untie his husband's hands. He helped Bucky onto his back and covered Bucky's body with his. "You look so good under me."

"You look so good above me," Bucky said and carded his fingers into Steve's hair. "God, I fucking love you. Make love to me. Slow and calm and passionately. Love on me and split me open and make me yours. It's been a year married but we have so many ahead of us."

Steve was out of breath but determined to keep going. He buried his face in Bucky's neck and rolled his hips slowly into his husband, savoring each moment. "We are going to have so many good years spent together, Bucky. It's going to be beautiful." His thrusts started to become a bit erratic as he found his orgasm building up. "I'm so close, Buck," he breathed out.

"Come for me," Bucky whispered and held Steve close, his own dick waiting impatiently between them. "After you come, can I jerk off over you so I'll come on your chest, please?"

Steve thrust in a few more times before he came deep in Bucky's ass. He rode out his orgasm and collapsed next to Bucky, panting in short breaths. He made a vague gesture with his hand to show he was fine with Bucky doing whatever he wanted on him.

Bucky rolled so he was straddling Steve's chest but hovering over him so he wasn't crushing his lungs. He could feel Steve's come leaking from his ass as he hurriedly pumped himself to orgasm and shot streams of hot come over Steve's neck and chin.

Steve breathed out as Bucky came on him, kind of loving how Bucky laid his claim on him. "Take a picture," Steve purred, feeling pretty sexy at the moment and knowing it would be good material for Bucky to look at later.

Bucky nodded and quickly got off of Steve. He rummaged in his bag for the Polaroid, thinking that was better than using the one they would need to develop. He came back and hovered over Steve once more. Snapping a picture of his husband covered in his come, Bucky giggled and gave Steve a little pinch to his side. "Here, I'll get you a towel." He handed the photo to Steve to wait for it to show up as he hopped to the bathroom.

Steve blushed at the sight of himself like that. "I'm going to look at this when I'm seventy and be jealous of the body I have today," he said. He set it aside and crossed his arms behind his head. "We are starting to grow a pretty big collection of dirty pictures of us."
Bucky giggled and lay down next to Steve, grabbing the camera to snap a picture of them laying together. "I think one of your new hobbies should be scrapbooking. You can make one for each of the kids and make new ones as everyone grows up. And you can make a special secret one of just shots of us in compromising positions. It'll be like our own personal porno mag."

Steve smirked over at Bucky. "Just wait until you see your birthday gift." Steve had secretly been taking loads of pictures of Christopher and now of Sarah May as well as Becca and Lilly whenever they were in a good mood so he could make a scrapbook for Bucky. "We got to find a good way to hide the secret scrapbook because the kids will get smarter as they get older. We can't afford them finding that."

"We will just hide the secret scrapbook in with our sex box in the closet," Bucky suggested and rolled to snuggle close to his husband. "I have a pretty good anniversary present for you tomorrow. At least, I think it's good. I hope it's good... Shit, you're going to hate it."

"We got to find a better hiding spot for that, too. I have a feeling Christopher is going to be a curious, adventurous one." Steve looked curiously over at Bucky. "And why would I ever hate anything you gave me?" Steve asked.

"Well, because now I'm worried it isn't a good enough gift," Bucky whined and gave his husband a kiss on the cheek. "Also, it's at home so you'll have to wait until tomorrow evening. But if you hate it you have to at least pretend it's okay and then I'll get you something else later."

"I know I'm going to love it, Buck," Steve said. "I'm excited to give you yours, which is also at home," he laughed. "The girls and babies may not be a fan of it. But I think you will be."

"Oh? Now I'm curious," Bucky said and held Steve's hand. "We still need new baby names by the way. How do you feel about ‘Cornelia’ or ‘Claudia’ for a girl? I know they are a little fancy but I like them. And ‘Daniel’ for a boy?"

Steve smiled fondly and kissed Bucky's neck. "I thought you wanted to take a break from babies because we already got two," he teased. "How about whatever baby you bring home, you pick the name. Whatever you want." He slid his hand up Bucky's chest.

"You don't mean that," Bucky said. "You know you want a part in naming every kid that comes into our life. And there is always the chance that you're going to be the one who brings another baby home before I do."
"You're right. I don't. I was trying to be nice," Steve said with a little laugh. "All of those names are nice, Buck. It's just a shame I can't make a baby with you. Then again, we'd have a million if we were able to make babies because of sex."

Bucky chuckled. "Let me once again say how happy I am that I'm not the one who has to produce these children." He squeezed Steve's ass gently. "Any names you have in mind? Any Irish names we should put on the table?"

"Like I've said before, you'd have one after the other," Steve snickered. "'Sean' and 'Colleen' are good Irish names," he suggested. "Ma says I would have been 'Colleen' if I was a girl."

"I like 'Colleen'. Do you like 'Colleen'?" Bucky asked. "I could see Sarah May helping her little sister Colleen on her first day of school. That's adorable." He smiled up at his husband.

Steve nodded his head. He thought it was a nice name and it would make his mom happy, too. "We can put 'Colleen' on the table. You want to go to sleep now? Get a few hours of sleep before round two tomorrow morning?" He yawned and pulled the blankets up over them. But as soon as he did, he heard Sarah May start to cry, which meant that Christopher would start to cry. Steve let out a sigh and started to get dressed. "I'll get them settled."

"You need my help?" Bucky asked but couldn't keep his eyes open anyway. Before Steve was done getting dressed and could answer, Bucky was almost asleep and curled up waiting for Steve to come cuddle him once again.
Bucky woke up before Steve. He stretched and got up out of bed to use the restroom. A winter storm was starting up outside and Bucky could see out the window at the snow falling quickly. It was a perfect anniversary morning. He finished wiping his thighs of Steve's come and then checked himself in the mirror to make sure he looked as handsome as he could before going back to Steve.

---

Steve rolled over in bed when Bucky left and he opened his eyes soon after. He made a soft sound and sat up, stretching. He stifled a yawn and smiled when he saw Bucky coming back over. "Hey, Love. Good morning," he said. "It's a miracle. Both babies slept through the night."

---

Bucky grinned at Steve and stood in the bathroom doorway in all of his naked glory. "Morning, my sweet husband. A year and several hours ago you dragged me all the way to a church and you married me for better or worse."

---

Steve drank in the sight of his gorgeous husband. "I know," he said. "It was the best decision I ever made. I was so happy when Father Frank agreed to marry us. With all the rejections, I was afraid of losing hope."

---

Bucky moved over to the bed and crawled on top of Steve to sit in his lap. "I love you so much. This has been an amazing year. One year, three babies, a bunch of AA meetings, and opening up the shelter."

---

"Don't forget Diana," Steve laughed and ran his fingers through Bucky's hair. "You make me a better person, Bucky Barnes," he said in a loving voice. "I couldn't do it without you."

---

"Rogers-Barnes," Bucky corrected and gave Steve a long kiss. "And I could never forget Diana. Hell, she destroyed a raccoon in our cabin and I had to bury it in the woods. She's not forgettable."

---

"Rogers-Barnes," Steve agreed. "Yeah. She's one hell of a dog. She also sniffed out our son who wanted to go on a little snow adventure."

---

"Oh, god, don't remind me," Bucky groaned and wrapped his arms around Steve. He let a hand trail down to hold Steve's flaccid dick while he slowly started to grind his own against Steve's leg.

---

Steve let out a little hum when Bucky started to feel him up. "Mmm, got plans for me this morning."
Husband?" He rumbled low, knowing the answer already.

--

--

"Yes," Steve purred slowly. "I want to feel your nice, thick cock deep in my ass. I want to make it so you got to give me breakfast in bed cause I won't be able to sit at the table, I'm too sore."

--

Bucky moaned and licked at Steve's throat. "I'll fuck you well, Baby." He let go of Steve's cock and grabbed the lube to start fingering Steve open. He teased around his hole and slowly pushed his pointer finger inside of him.

--

Steve arched his back and let out a soft moan as Bucky opened him up. "Shit, god," he breathed out. "Been a while since you fucked me. I miss feeling you on top of me. Looking down at me with dark eyes and making me feel like the hottest fella alive."

--

"You are the hottest fella alive," Bucky promised and worked a second finger inside, quickly following with a third not too long after. "I just love having your cock up my ass and I forget how much I love being on top and getting to see your gorgeous face as I split you open."

--

Steve blushed deeply. "You know how to get me going," he rumbled low, burying a hand in Bucky's hair to give a little tug. "Fuck me now, Love. I want to feel you inside me finally."

--

Bucky nodded and removed his fingers. He slicked up his cock and tucked the head against Steve's hole. He slowly pushed in, trying his best to go as slow as he could and feel every inch. "Your ass feels so amazing, Baby."

--

Steve gasped and let out a soft whine as he was entered. His toes curled and he took little breaths so he wouldn't get overwhelmed. "Thanks, my mom gave it to me," Steve joked with an obnoxious smirk.

--

"Oh! Come on!" Bucky grumped and sat all the way back so his cock popped back out of Steve. "Don't bring up your mother during sex." He whined and pinched Steve's thigh.

--

Steve threw his head back and laughed heartily at Bucky's reaction. He wanted his husband's dick back in him but the joke was well worth it. "Quit whining and get back inside me before I finish myself off," he laughed.

---

"I don't think you deserve it after that nonsense," Bucky said and laid back. "Maybe I will just let you finish yourself. I'll just wait here for you to decide." He knew he was being a bit of a brat but he liked it and he knew it would get Steve a little.

---

"No," Steve whined, climbed on top of Bucky. He kissed and nuzzled at his neck. "You were just saying how nice my ass felt, Buck, don't you want to put your dick back in again?" He rubbed his body up against Bucky's slowly.

---

Bucky hummed happily and laid back with his hands behind his head. He pointed at his dick and said, "Sit," while staring at Steve. "Show me you deserve it. Show me that you belong to me as much as I belong to you."

---

Steve gave Bucky a stubborn look, almost tempted to refuse because he was a mule like that and it was usually him who pulled this kind of stuff, not Bucky. However, he also was really fucking aroused and wanted Bucky inside of him. He straddled Bucky's hips and slowly sank down on his cock, letting out a satisfied moan as he filled him up again.

---

"Oh, man, I can see it on your face. That took a lot of humility from you to do, didn't it?" Bucky chuckled and started fucking up into Steve. "But, lord, you look so good like this."

---

"Shut up and rail me," Steve huffed, a little annoyed that Bucky could see how much Steve wanted to protest. He wasn't willing to admit how bad he wanted it. He closed his eyes and rocked his hips in rhythm with Bucky's thrusts.

---

Bucky nodded and held on to Steve tightly as he started to really pound into him as best as he could from his position. "You love me? I love you," he said through panting breaths and looked up at his husband.

---

Steve rocked his hips and brought his hand down to stroke himself as he rode Bucky's dick for all he was worth. "I love you," he gasped out. "I do, Buck, always."

---

Bucky groaned and watched Steve like it was the last time he was going to see him. "You are so beautiful," he whispered. "My god, I can't believe you are who I get to wake up to every morning. You're perfect in every way, Steve. Inside and out."
Steve's muscles clenched down around Bucky's cock as he nearly came but stopped himself by grabbing the base of his cock tightly. "Show me how much you love me," Steve gasped out. "Let me feel it, Bucky."

Bucky nodded quickly and sat up to hold Steve to his chest as he flipped them so he was back on top. He gave Steve a warm, wet kiss before taking Steve's cock in hand and pounding into his ass much harder now. "Like this, Baby?"

Steve cried out when Bucky tore into him and he buried his face in his husband's neck. Within moments, he was shooting messy spurts of come between them. "Fuck," he swore. "So good, baby."

Bucky kept railing Steve through his orgasm and sucked the come from his fingers. It took him another several minutes before he was ready to come too. He bit down on Steve's shoulder and came hard and fast up into his husband, happy that he held out for longer than Steve this time.

Steve took what Bucky had to give him and when it was over, he let out a satisfied breath and laid boneless on top of him. "That was awesome," he breathed out.

Bucky wrapped his arms around Steve and sighed contentedly. "Happy anniversary," he said and kissed Steve's head. "This was a good way to start the morning. Sex with you always is."

"I agree, though I'm still a little grumpy that you pulled out of me," Steve chuckled, running his fingers gently over Bucky's jaw. "I think we got to spend the mornings of each anniversary just like this."

"You got what you wanted in the end anyway," Bucky observed and pet Steve's hair. "I'm really happy we get to have our anniversary morning where we had our honeymoon. And I'm glad all our kids got to come this time."

Steve got a sad look in his eye for a moment because that wasn't true since Grant wasn't there. He didn't push the point and instead drew Bucky into a slow kiss. "This place is special to you. And now it's special to me."

"I can't wait to bring Christopher here when he's old enough to learn to fish. It'll be so much fun. I'll tell him everything my dad told me." Bucky grinned thinking about it and pushed the both of them up on the bed so he could get up to get dressed.
Steve grinned. "He's going to look up to you just like you looked up to your dad," he said. "You're going to be his best friend and know all the tricks of the trade. And then you can point to the forest and tell him about the time he scared the hell out of us."

Bucky chuckled and pulled on his pants. "You might think that, but just watch, he will end up being all about you. Daddy's boy, making art and staying in the city. I'll have to rope a different kid into coming to the lake with me."

Steve wanted all their kids to think he was pretty cool, but he knew that Bucky was really the fun one between the two of them. "Maybe kid number six will be your outdoorsman," he joked.

"With my luck, none of them will come out here until kid number twelve," Bucky said and tossed Steve his clothes. There was some commotion coming from the nursery so Bucky went to go get the babies.

When Bucky got to the nursery, Christopher was flinging his stuffed toys out of his crib to Sarah May's delight. Each time he threw one out, she would squeal happily, so he would throw another out.

"My god, babies," Bucky breathed and picked up Christopher's toys. He tossed them all into his crib and then picked him up. Steve came in and got Sarah May from her crib and held her close. Bucky stared into her big brown eyes and leaned over to kiss her hair. "I wish we knew where she was from. We really need to figure that out as soon as possible."

"Fred gave me the name of someone who may know," he said. "I was thinking about calling her when we got home. I'm kind of worried because Fred said she looks like she could be Jewish. What if we got to raise her with a different religion to respect where she's from?"

Bucky traded babies with Steve and held up his daughter above his head. "Are you Jewish, baby girl?" he asked and kissed her cheek. "Would it be so bad, though? I mean, we need to make sure she knows about her culture and stuff. Especially if she is Jewish, there is a lot to make sure she knows. I mean, my family is partially Jewish on my mom's side but we never knew anything about the culture at all which is sad. And I want Sarah May to know about that stuff no matter what culture she is from."

"It wouldn't be bad, Buck, it's just... I don't know if it'll make her feel different if I take her to synagogue while everyone else goes to church," Steve said in concern. "I don't want her feeling left..."
out.

"Well," Bucky started and held her back down against his chest. "What if I take her to synagogue while you all go to church?" he asked softly and made sure not to make eye contact with Steve. He had never made any indication of wanting anything to do with their children's religious upbringing.

Steve looked at him, a little surprised. Christopher squirmed in his arms until Steve gave him one of his stuffed toys. "Are you sure?" he asked. "How do you feel about that?" Steve wanted to be involved still. Even if they were going to be a multi-faith household, he needed to have them all be involved with each other in some way or another.

Bucky let Sarah May tangle her hand in his hair gently as he looked down at her. "Well, it's important to you for them to have religion in their lives and I can handle taking any Jewish kids we have to synagogue so they can be with their people."

Steve didn't know what he did to deserve such a perfect husband to help raise their children together. He pulled him close and kissed his lips. "I love you," he said softly. "Alright, but when we adopt in the future it's either got to be a Jewish baby or a baby that can be raised Catholic because we don't have a third parent to take them to their place of faith. When they grow up, they can practice something else if they want but only after they can take themselves," he joked.

"I don't think that'll be a problem," Bucky said and pulled Steve in for another kiss. "There aren't many other religions in Brooklyn than Catholic and Jewish." He stopped and looked at both of their kids. "I wonder where the next one is going to come from."

Christopher pressed a kiss to Bucky's face as well since he was close enough. Steve insisted on kissing Christopher's little face at every opportunity as a part of helping their son would grow into an affectionate, little man who wasn't emotionally stunted. "I don't know. But they'll be perfect no matter what." He nudged Bucky and headed for the kitchen.

Bucky followed him happily and chattered to his daughter as they went. He stopped when Steve stopped and they both stared at the sight waiting for them in the kitchen. There was a small cake that said 'Happy Anniversary' and pancakes and fruit all prepared on the table. Sarah was pouring orange juice and Becca and Lilly were setting the table.

Steve stopped and gasped when he saw his family at the table already and breakfast made. "Oh, my god, you guys!" Steve said excitedly. Christopher knocked on Steve's chest and pointed at the cake, knowing exactly what he wanted to eat.
Bucky gasped in surprise and pulled his sisters in for hugs careful not to squish his daughter. "You did all this for us?" he asked and looked between them and Sarah. "This is so thoughtful. Thank you."

Lilly, never good with tact, said, "Yeah, I'm hungry and I wanted to wake you up sooner but Becca said you guys were having sex and I had to wait."

Steve blushed a bright red and gave Becca a small glare. "Becca!" he accused. He didn't know why she had to be so crass about that stuff.

"What? It's not like you guys were exactly being quiet," she said back.

"Yes, I was!" Bucky defended. "I thought I was doing pretty well being quiet on this trip." He looked to Steve who was still bright red and glaring at him now. He cleared his throat and added, "We are here now. Time to eat, right?"

Steve hated when Becca had to talk about their private life with Lilly, who he thought was too young for this stuff. He took a seat after putting his son in his high chair and cutting up his pancake into bite-sized pieces. Sarah could tell Steve was a bit embarrassed because he usually got quiet and moody, so she kissed the top of his head before sitting down. "I'd like to go to the shop one more time before we leave," she told him.

Bucky nodded and went straight for the cake, bypassing any real breakfast. "Yeah, we can do that. I want to say goodbye to Fred and Mindy before we head home," he said and took a bite of cake before grabbing some fruit as well so it wasn't like he was only having cake for breakfast.

When Christopher saw his pop eating cake, he let out a loud noise to get his attention. "Papa!" He signed some attempts at words, looking pathetic as he begged for the cake.

Steve shook his head. "He's a menace," he said fondly.

"It's my fault," Bucky chuckled and cut off a small piece of cake and fed it to his son. "Although, you were also the one who convinced me that it was okay for him to have sweets. Remember that?" Bucky asked and leaned in to give Steve a little kiss.

"Well, that's because I'm determined to give my son a good life," Steve joked.

After Christopher got a mouthful of cake, he pointed to his baby sister. "Ya-Ya," he said, trying to get his papa to give his sister some cake.
Bucky pet Christopher's blonde hair which was growing out down below his ears now. "I don't think Ya-Ya is old enough for cake, Bean," Bucky said. "I know she's growing up fast but cake comes later."

"Steve, can you get the syrup?" Becca asked. Steve shook his head and motioned for her to get it herself. Becca looked kind of shocked that Steve didn't spring into action to help her like usual.

Becca slowly got the syrup and then adjusted back in her chair, shooting Bucky a questioning glance which he didn't pick up on as he was distracted by Sarah May. "She's so strong. Isn't she, Steve? Christopher was sick and weak when we got him but Sarah May has been a lot healthier so far."

Steve was still really upset with Becca for hurting Bucky's feelings by saying how she had considered emancipation and now with her comments this morning about sex, he had some more ammunition and reason to be a grump at her. "Yeah, that's cause we got her from the start and we were able to make her big and strong. Okay, not big, because she really is tiny. But strong. Maybe she will be a gymnast."

"Maybe her aunt Lilly will help her with sports, huh?" Bucky asked and looked to Lilly hopefully.

Lilly nodded and talked through a bite of cake. "Fuck yeah, I need someone to work out with. I'll train her to be so good at sports, just wait."

"No swearing in front of the babies," Steve said patiently to Lilly. He would've been more upset if she hadn't just been talking about how she was going to spend time with her niece. "Papa," Christopher said to get Bucky's attention. When Bucky looked, he signed 'I love you' and then 'more' before pointing at the cake.

Bucky signed back that he loved him too but didn't hand him anyway cake. "Have some more fruit before cake," Bucky said and handed Christopher a strawberry as he ate one himself and smiled to try to intrigue his son into wanting fruit too.

"I think he's starting to learn how to butter us up," Steve said. "He thinks he's so cute. He's right. But I have a hard time saying no to that adorable face." He finished up his breakfast and stood up before going to wash up.

Bucky took Christopher and held him in his lap. He let him have just a few more bites of cake and then set him on the ground to run off his morning energy. "Baby, should we give them baths before we go or just wait until we get home?"

---

"I don't trust them to stay clean on the ride home, I'd rather bathe them before bedtime," Steve answered. Christopher looked up at Bucky with a big smile and then tottered off to go find Diana to play with. "You want to do anything before we start packing up?"

---

"No, all I want to do is make sure we say goodbye to Fred and Mindy. Also, I wouldn't mind seeing if Junior and Maureen are still around. We can say goodbye to them too," Bucky said and wiped Sarah May's mouth with his sleeve.

---

Sarah May scrunched her face up and turned her head when Bucky wiped her mouth. Steve chuckled and cleaned up the rest of the dishes. "We can call the shop before we go and see if they can swing by so we can see them too."

---

"Okay that sounds good," Bucky said and reached for the phone. It wasn't capable of making calls outside of the cabin grounds but you could call to other cabins or to the shops. He dialed for the tackle shop and waited for Fred to pick up.

---

"Seneca Tackle Shop, Fred speaking," Fred greeted in his pleasant customer service tone. Steve overheard him using that voice and couldn't help but giggle because it was far from how he spoke among friends.

---

"Fred, it's Jamie," Bucky said with a chuckle. After he finished on the phone he hung up and said, "Steve, the four of them are going to be at the tackle shop in a few minutes to say goodbye. So if we want to go we should head over now and pick up anything we will need on the trip back."

Lilly piped up with, "I need more gummy worms!"

---

"Jamie," Steve whispered under his breath. He went to go get the babies' jackets so they could be bundled up for the trip. Christopher seemed unwilling to get dressed. "Lilly, get your nephew in his hat and I'll buy you gummy worms," Steve said.

---

Lilly quickly complied and worked on getting Christopher all set to go outside. "He doesn't want to wear the hat, Steve," she said and glared at her nephew. "Do you have a different hat that he likes better?"

---

"I don't know why he doesn't like that hat. His nana worked so hard knitting it for him," Steve said and kissed his son's head. "Maybe we can give him one that doesn't cover his ears?" he suggested.
Becca came over and gently pushed Lilly out of the way and took the hat saying, "Give me that." She then rolled the bottom of it once and put it on Christopher's head so it wouldn't cover his ears. "There."

"Let's see if that will last," Steve said. Sarah May was a lot easier to handle. She let her parents dress her without complaint. "Should we walk or take the car? I don't know how the roads are going to be."

Bucky looked outside and checked the roads. "Well, how much do we need to get from the store? Because if it's a lot, we should take the car. What do you think?"

"I don't think we need all that much. And worst comes to worst we can make a pit stop along the way," Steve said. "I'll empty the duffel bag and take it with us."

"Okay, that sounds good," Bucky said. "Sarah, you're coming with us, right?" He looked to the girls as well. Becca was back on the couch reading and Lilly wasn't paying them any mind as she started putting Christopher's toys back in the bin they brought.

"Yes, of course," Sarah said as she got her coat on. She picked up her grandson. "Becca, Lilly, get dressed. We're all going to say goodbye to Fred and Mindy." Sarah thought it would be rude if the girls didn't go.

Becca wanted to protest but she didn't dare be rude to Sarah. And Lilly hadn't even realized she was invited. Once everyone was ready, they headed out. It was about a seven-minute walk to the shop and Bucky had Sarah May tucked into his jacket by the time they got there because she was so cold.

There was a surprising amount of deer in the nearby woods, probably looking for food to scavenge. Christopher barked at every one even though Steve reminded him that they weren't doggies. When they arrived at the shop, Mindy exploded with excitement at seeing the babies again.

Bucky looked around and noticed that there were a lot more people in the shop that he didn't recognize than the day before. It made him a little uncomfortable. Fred and Junior both came up to Bucky and clapped him on the back with a resounding, jovial, "Jamie!"

Steve went over to Maureen to say hello since Mindy was gushing over his son and insisted on holding him. "How've you been?" he asked. "We're going to be leaving around midday, but it's great
Maureen gave Steve a short hug and said, "Well, honey, we weren't going to let you go without a goodbye. Junior insisted. He said that he used to worry about Bucky but now that he has met you, he knows that he is going to be okay. I think Junior sort of felt like Bucky was one of his brothers back in the day."

Steve smiled. "Bucky is such a good man. You have no idea what a pleasure it is to be around him all the time." He pulled out a pen and notepad from his pocket. "Can I have your address? I'd love to send a care package for you after the new babies are born," he said the last part a little lower so Junior wouldn't hear the news of it being two kids.

Maureen grinned and wrote down their address. "Thank you, Steve. Be sure to put a return address so I know how to reach you as well. And please don't let it be long before our families get together again. I think the brothers are planning a get together this summer. You all should come along too. You can meet whichever ones you haven't yet."

"Let me know which dates they're coming. I'll add our phone number in the package. I'm sure Bucky would love to come up here again if he can get out of work for it." Lilly came up to Steve then, holding the biggest bag of gummy worms he'd ever seen.

"Steve?" Lilly asked with wide eyes and held up the bag so he could see it. "This will last me like the entire trip home and then maybe another day. I promise I'll be so quiet in the car and I won't bug Becca this time and I'll braid Bucky's hair so the babies don't pull it."

Lilly was in his good graces today, so he sighed and handed her money to go buy it. "I don't know what I'll do when Sarah May turns her age," he said to Maureen. "I don't want her to grow up too fast, but you're always curious to find out who they're going to be, you know?"

Maureen nodded and watched Lilly run off. "I know exactly what you mean. And I just love those little moments you get as they grow up. First time they crawl, first word, first laugh. It's so great. I might just keep having Junior's kids just so I can keep seeing those firsts."

Steve nodded in agreement. "Bucky keeps saying that he's glad he doesn't have to carry all the babies that I want to have. I don't blame him, pregnancy looks like a lot of work."

"It is a lot of work," Maureen agreed. "And you've seen my husband. He's a big guy. His babies don't come out small. And now that there are two in here, I'm a little worried I'm not going to be able to move at all in a few months."

---

Steve patted her shoulder and gave a little smile. "I don't envy your job." He excused himself because he found some dog treats Diana would love. "Bucky, you want anything?" he asked as he brought it to the register.

---

Bucky, thankful for the distraction from being regaled by Fred and Junior with stories of how obvious his childhood crush on Junior was, came over to Steve quickly and picked up a bag of pretzels. "I wish I knew how to drive so you could be in the back with all the hair pulling this time."

---

Steve smiled and put an arm around Bucky's shoulder. "I could teach you, you know. If you want to move up here, I can't be the only one with a license," he teased. "It's not so bad once you get used to it."

---

"I'm twenty-six. I'm pretty sure it's hard to teach adults how to drive," Bucky said and tossed his pretzel bag into the basket Steve had. There was some whispering behind them and Bucky glanced back to see a few men talking to Fred and pointing their way. Bucky looked back ahead and gripped Steve's arm and whispered. "Baby, we may have a problem in a couple of seconds. Keep a calm head."

---

"Adults learn new stuff all the time. You're no different, you can do it." He smiled at him but then followed Bucky's eyes over to the men talking to Fred. Problem was, Steve didn't know how to keep a calm head. He dropped his arm from Bucky and walked over. "Is there a problem, gentlemen?"

---

"Steve!" Bucky tried to grab him but he was already gone.

Fred held up his hands as Steve came over. "Son, I've got this handled. You two just get what you need and head on back." Junior slinked up next to his father in case he and Steve needed his help with anything.

---

"I saw them pointing over at us," Steve said to Fred. "I appreciate the help, Fred, but whatever these fellas have to say, they can say it to my face." Steve was geared up for a fight, like usual, right until Christopher came up to him with a little toy whistle he found.

"Dada!" He waved it up at him and Steve frowned, backing off so he could pick up his son.

---

Bucky came over and held his hand on the back of Christopher's head, just protecting him a little more. "Junior," he said with a nod. "You are your dad got this? Steve and I should go. Come on,
Babe, we need to go. Let's pay Mindy.

---

Steve shot the group of other men a dirty look and then managed a smile as he looked back at his son. "I see the toy, Bean. Do you want it?" He went over to Mindy again so he could pay her what was owed. He still felt a deep anger in his chest, but he couldn't do anything with Christopher in his arms right now.

---

Bucky kept a hold on Steve while he paid so he wouldn't just turn around and start a fight. Once they were all ready to go, he cast one more look to Junior and Fred who were having a heated but whispered conversation with the men. Then he gave Mindy and Maureen hugs and promised Mindy that he would call when they got home so she knew they were safe.

---

"I have half the mind to go back in there," Steve growled under his breath as they walked out. "Who do they think they are, thinking they can point at us like we're some sort of sideshow?" Christopher happily blew on his whistle while Steve talked.

---

Bucky's heart was heavy. He wanted to fight for them too but he didn't dare start something in front of the kids or in Fred's shop. "Steve, if you did go back, you'd end up having to throw some punches. Then your lungs would give out and I'd have to step in for you and I just don't feel like getting beat up today."

---

"Oh, yeah, my lungs, great," Steve scoffed bitterly. "Guess now I'm just another fag who's not man enough for a fight." He passed Christopher over to his mom because the whistle blowing right in his ear was agitating him even more.

---

Bucky gritted his teeth and followed after Steve as he quickened his pace towards the cabin. "Did I say that?" he asked with an edge. "Did I say you were a fag who couldn't fight? No! I'm just trying to be rational so you don't have another episode like the other day in the woods where you were so out of breath you couldn't move."

---

"It's just throwing a few punches, it's not bolting full speed in the woods, worrying whether or not my son is alive and safe," Steve ground out. "Just forget it, Buck. I guess we just got to grin and bear it, right?" He snorted and rolled his eyes.

---

"Jesus Christ, Steve!" Bucky groaned. He was pissed off now and all rational thought was gone. "It's like every time I show concern for your health, I may as well have insulted you instead. I may as well have said you were a weak fag who can't defend his family. That's what you feel like I did. I may as well have said that my husband, the man I married, the man I love, the light of my life, my everything, is a sick old queer now! I may as well just stop caring, huh? You seem to hate it when I show concern! I may as well just stop giving a shit about your well-being, right, Steve?"

---

"Every single thing that I can't do or you think I can't do, it's because of my lungs. I won't die if you stop hounding me over them. I get it. They don't work normal." Sarah May started to fuss and cry when she heard the raised voices several feet ahead of her.

---

Bucky looked at his daughter and lowered his voice but not the tone. "I'm your goddamn husband, Steve!" he whispered harshly. "I'm not hounding you. I'm making sure you don't make them worse! I'm allowed to be scared that you're going to hurt yourself. I'm allowed to worry about you. You worry about me all the time. Don't tell me you don't."

---

"I worry about you, but I don't tell you that you can't do stuff. I don't say that like you can't make us breakfast because you don't cook as well as I do. And I don't guilt you about your lungs when you go for a cigarette," Steve countered.

---

Bucky shook his head. "Steve, that's low. You know I smoke because, if I don't, I will drink. And you don't want me to drink, so I am in AA and doing everything I can to make sure I don't relapse. And it's not like I tell you that you can't do things, I just try to make sure you don't overdo it and hurt yourself."

---

"Well, stop trying to curtail how much I do. I know my lungs better than you and if I want to push myself, then I'm going to do it. The worst that's going to happen is I got to take a break," Steve said.

---

Bucky shut his mouth and glared up at Steve. "Fine," he spit out. "I'll stop giving a shit about your fucking lungs. You're welcome." He wanted to be done with this so he sped up ahead and tossed his hair so it was falling into his face as he walked, hopefully hiding the way his eyes were gleaming with tears.

---

Steve was getting worked up and upset but he didn't look at anyone else. When they got back to the cabin, he immediately started to pack up everything they wouldn't be using for the rest of the day just to make it easier when they left.

---

Instead of helping, Bucky headed for the shed. He locked the door behind him and sat on a stool in the corner and pulled out a cigarette. He hated himself for needing one after what Steve had said but he just couldn't help it. He just smoked and cried and screamed into his arm, angry as hell that this happened on their anniversary.
Sarah had Lilly look after the babies for a little while so she could go out and check on Bucky. She could tell by the smell of the cigarette smoke where he was and she knocked on the shed door. "Bucky, it’s Sarah. Can I come in there?"

---

Bucky put out the cigarette, wiped his eyes, and unlocked the door, gestured for her to come in. The second the door was closed behind her again, Bucky pulled her in for a hug and choked back a frustrated sob. "I just want to make sure he is safe."

---

Sarah wrapped her arms around him. She wasn't as strong as Steve but she still gave pretty tight hugs. "I know, Bucky. I know Steve is being difficult with you," she said. "You're not doing anything wrong. You're being a good husband to my boy."

---

"He acts like I'm not his husband. He acts like I'm his chief or his father or something. He's such a baby sometimes," Bucky said and looked into Sarah's eyes which were the same as Steve's. "Was he like this when he was a child and he was sick all the time?"

---

Sarah nodded. "He was worse. That boy was practically dying of a fever and he still tried to sneak out to go to the movies. I caught him passed out on the sidewalk once." She sighed and rubbed a hand over Bucky's back. "I won't say he'll come around on this. But I will say that one day when he pushes too far, he'll be grateful that you worried enough to help him."

---

Bucky sighed and pulled away. He grabbed another chair and offered it to Sarah as he sat back down on the stool. "I just don't get it. It's like he is perfectly fine with taking care of me all the time but he hates it when I try to do the same. Like he only is happy if I'm worse off than he is."

---

Sarah took a seat. "I don't think he sees it that way," she said. "He's fine with taking care of other people, but he doesn't like it when he's anything but healthy. I bet you he wouldn't complain if you helped him with whatever project he was struggling on, but if it’s health-related, he has zero tolerance."

---

"But when it's health-related I worry about him. He's the one who said we are going to live to be one hundred years old. He's the one who helped me realize I could live a long happy life with someone. He's the one who got me to vow to myself that I would never try to take my life again and I would put in the effort in AA to become sober. But I can't be concerned for his life?" Bucky asked in disbelief.

---

"You married a mule in that aspect, I'm sorry to say," Sarah said. "What you've done for yourself is amazing, Bucky. And I'm so happy you're making those changes for your family." She squeezed his shoulder lightly. "I can't change who he is, but I can at least tell him to be nice to you on your anniversary. He knows better than to go against his mother."

---

Bucky gave a little chuckle. "Thank you. I appreciate that. I hate that sometimes things can be going so well and then one small comment or choice and then we are like this." He looked around the shed. "I've wondered a few times since his accident, and since losing Grant, if Steve should see a therapist a few times through this. I don't think he has really grasped what happened to him in that fire. And Grant was the first death in his life that affected him like this. I know you lost your husband but Steve never really knew him, right? So it's not quite the same."

---

Sarah didn't seem to look like she approved of her son going to a therapist. She didn't think someone outside of the family had any business in knowing about their home life and her son's personal life. "I don't know if he would go for that. And what would he get there that he wouldn't get from his talks with me?" she asked.

---

"I don't know. It's just a suggestion," Bucky said softly and looked away nervously. "I wouldn't think of it if Steve doesn't suggest a therapist for the girls and I all the time. And I used to always tell him no but now I'm thinking that maybe we all could use some help. I know my sisters and I haven't healed from losing our parents. And I can hardly even think about Missy and Grant."

---

Sarah was more private than Steve. She didn't think an outsider had any business in their lives. She didn't think that Bucky or the girls should go see a therapist either. She figured that family and God were the only resources that would need for healing. "Well, it's your decision to make," she said patiently. "I'm not going to stop you from trying to do the right thing."

---

Bucky sighed and rubbed at his eyes. "Sarah, I don't know what the right thing to do is. I feel like I'm trying, you know? I think I'm trying really hard. I go to AA twice a week. I keep my job at the record shop and pull my weight and everyone else's. When I'm out, I constantly look for things that Steve or the girls or the babies might like so I can bring it home to them and see their faces light up. I try to be the best brother I can be and the best father any kid could have. And I'm trying to be the husband Steve deserves but he keeps getting angry with me. I'm just so confused."

---

"You're doing the right thing," she insisted. "If my son is getting angry at you for caring, that's on him. That's not a reflection of your commitment," she said. She cupped his chin so he would look at her. "You are the best person my son could ever marry," she said firmly. "And he needs to understand that caring about his disability isn't a personal offense."

---

Bucky nodded along with her as she spoke and then got up to pull her in for another hug. "Will you talk with him sometime? Try to help him realize I'm not trying to antagonize him about this. I'm not sure if he will stop believing it but he may act better and that's a step in the right direction."
Sarah nodded. "Of course, I will. I can't have my boy giving my son-in-law a hard time, can I? I raised him better than that." She gave Bucky a reassuring smile and hugged him one more time. "Come on. I'm sure Lilly needs help with your kids by now."

---

Bucky sighed and opened the door of the shed. "I guess you're right." He didn't really want to go back inside but he had no choice. When they got to the cabin, Lilly was trying to hold on to both babies at once and Christopher was pulling at her hair. "Hey," Bucky said and pulled his son off of his sister. "Where's Steve?"

---

Christopher gurgled up at his dad and then started reaching up for his hair. "I don't know, he's been back and forth pack- oh, there he is. He just went into the bedroom," Lilly said as she watched Steve move around down the hallway.

---

Bucky sighed and watched his husband go to the bedroom and shut the door. "I guess I'll leave him alone for a few minutes. He doesn't look like he wants to talk to anyone."

Becca shuffled around the cabin, picking up little things and putting them away. "I keep hearing him coughing. But I didn't dare ask about it."

---

"Yeah, asking him about his coughing is a one way trip to being on his shit list," Lilly answered as she ate her gummy worms by the handful. "Seriously, what's up with that? He's so rude."

---

"Lil, eat one worm at a time. You're going to choke," Bucky said and pulled the bag down from her mouth. "And let's not get too frustrated with Steve. He's going through a lot. And his mother is going to give him a kick in the pants so that's nice."

---

Lilly looked up at Sarah with a few worms hanging out of her mouth, which made her look like an octopus. "Really?"

Sarah laughed. "Yes. He's going to get a talking to."

---

"Until then, I may as well go talk to my husband," Bucky said with a little sigh and put Christopher down on the ground. "Lilly, start packing your stuff up, okay? Becca's cleaning up out here and you need to do your part too. Sarah will watch the babies."

---

Christopher took off as soon as he was put on the ground and laughed wildly as he explored. When Bucky got to the bedroom, Steve was sitting on the edge of the bed, looking a little out of breath.
Bucky brought with him one of Sarah May's socks that had been laying in the hallway. Steve must have dropped it as he was packing the kids' things together. Bucky closed the door behind him and leaned against it. "It's amazing that something so small, that has a foot tiny enough to fit in a sock like this, can grow up to be an adult with passions and problems and relationships and decisions. And we get to raise those tiny little things. That's pretty amazing, Steve."

---

Steve looked over at his husband, who was holding the little sock. "You used to be that small once," he murmured. "We're going to raise a lot of little owners of little socks like those." He scratched the back of his neck, knowing that probably Bucky wasn't too pleased with him right now. "She's going to grow too fast."

---

Bucky gave a small smile as he put the sock in with the rest of the babies' clothes. "So, are we going to discuss it or push past it for now?" Bucky asked, implying without directly vocalized their argument. "I'm okay with tabling this until after our anniversary is over."

---

"Let's push past it for now." Steve clearly was going to try and push past it for as long as possible. He looked over at his husband and managed a little smile. "We got to keep the smiles going for our anniversary."

---

"I don't think the smiles count if they are forced, Steve," Bucky said lightly and worked on folding his clothes and putting them into his bag. "If we are pushing past it, we need a new conversation so I forget about it for now."

---

Steve nodded and ran his hand through his hair. "Before we go home, I'd like to get pictures of all of us in front of the cabin," he said. "I want to do one every time we come here, especially with the babies."

---

"That's a good idea," Bucky said and zipped up his bag. "Are we going to try to get our son back in his snowsuit or just let him take a few pictures in his normal clothes since he's going to want the suit off before we go home."

---

"No snowsuit. We'll make it quick. I don't want to wrestle him and put him in a cranky mood for the road trip," Steve said. "Sarah May, too. Just a quick in and out will do."

---

"Okay, well, Sarah May is going to want to sleep soon so I'm thinking now is a good idea," Bucky said and pulled on a jacket. "Want me to wear anything in particular or just this?"
"We don't got to wear anything special," Steve said. "We only got to stand in the same place every year." He stood up and went back to packing. "Do you want to lay her down to nap or should I?"

---

"I've got her," Bucky said and pulled Steve away for a second to give him a firm kiss on the lips. "I love you," he said pointedly and hugged him tightly. "I hope you know that. I love you so much." He sighed and pulled away again. "Happy anniversary."

---

As Bucky walked out of the bedroom, Sarah walked in looking like a woman on a mission. She closed the door behind her so she could talk to her son. Becca and Lilly were chatting and giggling to each other behind their hands because they'd never seen Steve get in trouble with his mom before.

---

"Can it," Bucky warned his sisters and grabbed Sarah May from Lilly. "Come on, Ya-Ya, it's nap time for a little bit. Oh, my sleepy girl, you can't keep your eyes open." He gave her a few kisses on her head and made sure the girls would take care of Christopher while he put her to sleep.

---

Sarah May stared sleepily at her pop and was out in seconds. She didn't even try to stay up in her crib. Diana followed in and laid at the foot of the crib, which she did sometimes. After a little while, Sarah emerged from the bedroom and went to find Bucky so she could give him an 'I gave him an earful' sort of look.

---

Bucky nodded once to Sarah and gave a grateful little smile. He figured it was best to leave his husband alone for a while so he pulled up a chair next to Sarah May's crib and just watched her sleep. She was so little and Bucky was so happy that she was in his life. He watched her chest rise as she breathed and hiccupped a few times in her sleep.

---

"They're amazing when they're this little, aren't they?" Sarah sighed. "She's got you wrapped around her finger. And she sees the world so differently from the way we do."

---

"I love her so much," Bucky whispered and gently touched his daughter's hair. "How is Steve? Is he moping?" he asked and let Sarah May squeeze his finger tightly as she yawned and wiggled around.

---

"Of course, he's moping. Who likes getting scolded by their mom, especially as an adult?" She shrugged her shoulders. "He will get over it. He's not that upset over it."

---

Bucky looked around the room, absently trying not to think too much about his parents. "I don't know. I wouldn't mind getting yelled at by my parents just about now. Or maybe get some marriage advice or parenting advice. I miss them everyday. I can't believe they haven't gotten to meet Steve or
"Yes, I guess you're right," she answered. Sarah gave Bucky an apologetic look and then sighed. "They're looking over you. I'm sure they're proud of you and the family you've built. I guess I got to love these kids extra to make up for your parents not being on this earth."

Bucky smiled and reached over to squeeze her hand. "I'm very grateful to have you here. Steve loves you so much. And the girls respect and admire you. And your grandkids just adore you. And you're going to have so many grandkids, Sarah."

"I'm counting on it. I don't want you guys to stop bringing home little ones for as long as I'm around. I always wanted to have plenty of babies, but I couldn't marry another man after Steve's father," she said.

"I understand what you mean," Bucky said. "I know I shouldn't, but I worry all the time that Steve is going to be taken away from me. Just like my parents. And I would never be able to even look at another man the way I look at Steve. He's my everything. He really is."

She nodded in understanding. "My husband wasn't perfect. But he was my soul mate. I hope you never have to experience losing your other half." Sarah sighed. "Steve is stubborn. There's no way this world will take him prematurely."

"That's a good point. He is very stubborn and he loves his family too much to let anything take him away. Hell, he's survived a gunshot to the back and a house fire in one year alone," Bucky said and stood up slowly. "I should probably go talk to him."

"You should. I think I wore him down a little so he knows to suck up to you a little." She made a shooing motion to have Bucky go talk to his husband. She wanted to stay here and watch over her granddaughter.

Bucky went to the kitchen and cut off a piece of the cake from breakfast and grabbed a fork. He brought it to the bedroom and came in slowly, holding it out as an offering. "You can't have all this. I want some, too. But I figured we could share it. I'm not afraid of your germs."

"I would hope not. You lick my asshole," Steve snorted. He gave Bucky a little glance and then kissed his cheek lightly. He was hoping to get a laugh out of Bucky or something.
"There's a sexier way to say that, Steve," Bucky murmured and took a bite of the cake, looking up at him with a cautious glance like he wasn’t sure yet where Steve was and how he was feeling.

---

"Well, I wasn't looking to be sexy, ass-licker," Steve snickered. Like he was one to talk. He'd eat Bucky out any day of the week. "I'm sorry I got upset at you before, Buck. I shouldn't have hurt your feelings like that."

---

Bucky looked away for a moment and then back at him with a little frown. "You just got to realize that I'm not saying it to make you feel small, I'm just concerned about you and I'm trying to be the husband you deserve."

---

Steve stole a bite of the cake as he gathered his thoughts. "It makes me feel small. Even though that's not what you mean to do." Steve sighed and placed a careful hand on Bucky’s thigh. His husband’s body was warm and the sweats he had on were soft.

---

Bucky nodded and wrapped an arm around Steve. "Okay, I acknowledge that. And I'll try to keep that in mind. But please meet me halfway here, Baby. This has to be a give and take. I'll listen to you about how you feel and work on making sure I don't make you feel that way anymore and you listen to my concerns and know where my heart is at."

---

Steve leaned into Bucky's side. "I'll try," he mumbled. "Only because I don't like seeing you upset and I don't want my mom to get cross with me again. She's a scary woman when she's mad," he said. "She completely took your side on this. I was blindsided by that."

---

Bucky chose to ignore that comment. He thought he was being the logical one and Sarah realized that. "Steve, I have an idea but I don't know if you'll like it. But it's kind of your idea anyway and you say it all the time."

---

Steve was so used to his mom backing him up on everything so it was weird to have her back his husband up instead. "What is it?" Steve asked, grimacing a little because he wasn't sure what Bucky was getting at.

---

"Therapy?" Bucky asked softly and offered Steve the last bite of cake. "You always say that the girls and I could use some help and I think you're right. And I think you could, too. We might want to consider having some appointments set up."

---

Steve was about to take the last bite but he pulled his head back with a frown. "Therapy?" he repeated. Steve didn't seem to be sold on the idea. "I don't need it," he answered. "I'm fine without it."

---

Bucky took a deep breath and looked away from Steve. He needed to keep as calm as he possibly could while discussing this with Steve. They didn't need another fight. "You did say yourself that the girls and I might benefit from a therapist, right?" Bucky asked softly and slowly. "You've said it a few times."

---

"Well, you would," Steve said. "But I'm not an ex-drug addict or an ex-alcoholic or a teenage girl who lost both my parents at a young age." He didn't mean it in a harsh way. He just thought they went through more than he did.

---

"Mhm," Bucky hummed vaguely and bit his lip to keep from snapping at Steve. "You lost a part of your health and your son. And you don't think you could benefit from just a few sessions with someone who wants to help you?"

---

"I don't need it," Steve said again firmly. "I have you and my mom to talk to. I don't want to go to a stranger about my problems that I can solve with the people in my own home," he insisted.

---

"But it's okay for the girls and I to go?" Bucky asked, trying not to get offended. "I get it. I'm a former addict and a recovering alcoholic. I've lost my parents and my son and a friend. But I believe you have just as much cause to get help as I do."

---

"I'm not going to therapy, Bucky. I don't want to and you can't make me go, just like I can't make you and the girls go," Steve said evenly. "If I need outside help, I'll go to Father Frank."

---

Bucky huffed out a frustrated little sigh. "I'm trying to tell you that I'm open to it now. AA is sometimes like therapy and I'm used to that so I'm not so scared about going to a regular therapist. And I think the girls would do it if we asked. And it's your idea anyway and it could help you and us."

---

Steve shrugged. "If you think it'll help you and the girls, then that's great. But just because it may be the right decision for you doesn't make it automatically the right decision for me," Steve answered.

---

Bucky was silent. He looked to Steve then back at the ground then to the door. He wasn't going to win with Steve today. It had been Steve's suggestion and now he was too good for it? Or was it that Steve thought only Bucky was messed up enough to need help. Bucky didn't care anymore. He was going to just drop it for now. He stood up and headed for the door. "Maybe we should take that family picture now and head home."

---

"We don't have the same problems, Bucky," Steve said as he stood. "I'm not saying it because I mean any harm by it. I'm saying it because what works for you doesn't always work for me." He grabbed his jacket and started to bundle up.

---

Bucky sighed and laced his shoes again. "Let's forget it for now. You said smiles. So let's go have some smiles on camera," he said and left the bedroom to go get their children. Sarah May wasn't too bothered when she was woken up but Christopher was very annoyed that he was being taken away from his blocks.

---

Steve tried to get Christopher to cheer up but all they got was pictures of them with a grumpy son and Bucky giving a half-smile and dead eyes. Steve was kind of ready to go home, upset that he couldn't seem to keep Bucky in good spirits today. As they piled into the car, he looked over to Christopher. "Wave bye-bye to the cabin, Christopher."

---

Christopher just started to cry and try to get out of the car seat. He usually loved car rides but right now he didn't want to have anything to do with it. Sarah May fell back to sleep quickly and was perfectly fine with being in the car. Bucky quickly took some headache medicine before getting in. He pulled his hat down over his eyes and leaning back.

---

After a little while, Sarah picked Christopher up from his car seat and held him in her arms. "What's the matter, Christopher?" she asked.

Lilly looked miserably over to Bucky. "Why is he crying?" she asked.

---

Bucky shrugged. He was shutting down. His head hurt and the light from outside was too bright. He had not had a good day and it sucked that this was his first marriage anniversary with Steve. He just wanted to be alone but he couldn't be just then and it wasn't like he could drive and just pay attention to the road.

---

When they finally got home, Steve helped Bucky unpack the car while his mom looked after the babies. When everything was out, he walked over to his husband and held him. "How about I give you your anniversary present and maybe that'll lift your spirits."

---

Bucky stared at Steve for a few seconds. He wanted to say that he was just going to go lay in bed for a bit. But he decided he should at least try to make the day better. "Sure," he sighed. "Your present is wrapped up and hiding in the closet."

---

"Let me give you yours first," Steve insisted. He went to grab the guitar case from under the bed- it was an American Fender Strat. Steve knew that Bucky usually played his acoustic but the guy at the guitar store said that the model he picked was a good one and Steve wanted to give Bucky something new for his music. "I didn't know what amp to get with this, but maybe we can go shopping for it together."

---

Bucky gasped and opened the case to reveal a sleek black guitar with a perfect pearl finish. "My god," he breathed and picked it up out of the case and held it close. "This is beautiful. Why did you get it for me, though? I have a few guitars already and amps are so loud. Won't it annoy you?" Bucky set the guitar down again and pulled Steve in for a hug and a soft kiss. "Thank you. I love it." He gripped Steve's hand then let go to get Steve's presents. "My gifts to you aren't anywhere as good as this but, I mean, at least I got you something."

---

"I'm glad you like it, Buck. I want to support your hobbies, so please don't feel like playing guitar will annoy me." Steve sat down on the bed with one of the presents Bucky had for him. "I'm sure I'm going to love it," Steve said as he opened it up.

---

Bucky had bought Steve two books. The first was a memoir and advice book about a single mother who ran a wedding dress company from her home while raising five kids. Bucky figured it could help give Steve some help with how to start his 'mommy-and-me' painting class when he finally did. The second was a book of sign language that he bought so Steve could learn more and also teach the kids.

---

Steve thumbed through the first few pages of the book to have an idea on what it was and then beamed when he realized what the story was about. He was also excited for the sign language book because now he didn't have to keep waiting for the library to have one available. "These are perfect, Bucky. Thank you."

---

Bucky sighed. He looked down and mumbled, "Sorry, I know they aren't great or anything. It was all I could think of and all I could afford with my own money. I've been putting cash away from my own pay for a while so I didn’t have much loose spending money."

---

"Baby, you got them for me, which makes them great," Steve said. "You work so hard and you help keep the roof over our heads, Love. I don't care how much money you spend on me. So long as you're here for me and our kids, that's all I want."

---

"I am here. I'm always here. And I always will be," Bucky said and glanced over at the books again.
"And that's... that's why I think you all deserve more. And I think I can give you more. But not right now. Not with what I'm doing." Bucky paused and took both of Steve's hands in his. "The money I've been putting away is so I can pay for college. Eventually. I want to go to school and get a degree and be more for you than just a record shop employee."

---

Steve gasped and his face lit up. He squeezed Bucky's hands. "That's amazing, Bucky," he said. He sobered up after a few moments and smiled. "Baby, you are enough exactly as you are, working where you are, but it makes me so happy that you're going to go back to college."

---

Bucky sighed in relief and melted against Steve. "I just want more for you than what you have right now. And if I have a degree, I can do something really good that'll pay better. I can buy a place downtown where you can have an art studio and teach in the back. And I can start some sort of company or something. Maybe I'll go for law school or something like that."

---

Steve smiled broadly at him. "Look at you being all smart," he said. Steve kissed his cheek. "You know I don't need you to spoil me like that, right?" He pet his hand over Bucky's arm. "I can start saving to help you. You don't got to do this alone."

---

Bucky nodded. "Only if you want to. I purposefully am pulling from my pay so all the money you get goes to our family and not to me. I can do it. I can save up." He gripped Steve and pulled him over towards the bed. He was still pretty tired and wanted to sit.

---

Steve took a seat next to him and gave him a gentle look. "I'll spend smarter," he said. "So we can save up more for your college. I want to help you any way I can." He kissed along Bucky's jaw. "It'll mean a lot to me."

---

"Thank you," Bucky said and leaned against his husband. "It's all for us. I just want you to have the perfect life. As perfect as I can make it." He pressed his forehead to Steve's and kissed his cheek. "Can we start over today? Can this be our restart? Let's let the rest of the day be just like this. Us being us."

---

Steve moved over Bucky and laid him back on the bed. "Sure," he said. He kissed along his jaw and down his neck. "I want to make you happy on our anniversary. Because one year just flew by."

---

Bucky gripped on to the back of Steve's shirt and tangled their legs together. "Just, just..." he paused and gently pushed on Steve's chest. "You know I'm just trying to figure out how to help you, right? You know I'm not trying to make you angry. I love you. I love you to the moon and back. The moon, Steve. That's so fucking far."
"I know you're trying to help," he said. Steve smiled over at him and pressed their lips together. "You make me feel loved every day. There isn't a second that I doubt how much you adore me, Bucky. I just get frustrated and I can work on that."

"Really?" Bucky asked nervously and stared up at Steve. "Sorry, sorry, I'm just getting self-conscious. You know me. I'm sorry. I'll stop." Bucky shook it off and shut his eyes and groaned. He couldn't just let things go. "I just hate seeing anything but happiness in your eyes."

"Of course, really," Steve said gently. "Baby, I know that there isn't a thing in the world you wouldn't do for me." He pet his fingers through his hair. "What makes you think I don't believe you?"

Bucky just wanted to cuddle up with Steve for a while until it was time to make dinner. And he didn't want to discuss it anymore. "Nothing, it's fine. It doesn't matter. I'm being paranoid and unreasonable like usual."

Steve didn't push. Instead, he simply kissed Bucky's forehead once more. "Alright... I love you, Sweetheart." He snuggled up on the bed with his husband and without even meaning to, he fell asleep on top of him.

Bucky was going to strike up a different conversation with Steve but then his husband was breathing as best as he could against his neck and was sound asleep. Bucky chuckled but let him stay that way. His weight on top of him felt so warm and familiar and perfect. It was so comforting. After a bit, Bucky fell asleep as well, content to hold Steve and feel their heartbeats together.
For the next couple weeks, Bucky had been pretty busy catching up on work. But, at long last, they were able to book a doctor's appointment for him. The babies were left with Steve’s mom and the girls so it would just be the two of them. As they sat in the waiting room, Steve gently nudged Bucky. "You're fidgeting. Relax, it'll be okay."

---

"I'm scared out of my mind," Bucky murmured back and stared straight ahead at the door, waiting for the nurse to come take them back. "What if I'm dying?" he asked and gasped like it had just occurred to him that he could be seriously ill. "Oh, my god. I'm dying."

---

"You're not dying, Buck," Steve said. "You probably have some minor thing. Like asthma but with your brain," he tried to pacify him. He wished he could hold Bucky right now but he didn't want the doctors and nurses treating him poorly or turning him away because he was gay.

---

Bucky's breathing picked up rapidly like he was starting to hyperventilate. He kept whispering, "Oh, my god, oh, my god," as he stared at the door. He hated going to the doctor's. He was so uncomfortable. He wanted to run out of the building and go straight home but he couldn't. He pulled his hair back nervously and tugged on it like it would help to ground him.

---

It broke Steve's heart to see his husband this upset. He was about to try to talk to him more when Bucky was called to enter the exam room. Steve stood up and offered Bucky a hand to help get on his feet. "Come on, we can get this over with quick."

---

Bucky shakily took the hand and managed to get on his feet. He wanted to keep a hold of that hand the entire time but he knew he couldn't. So he dropped it and tried his best to walk tall into the exam room with the nurse leading and Steve behind them. He wasn't going to be able to handle this. He wasn't going to survive. He knew they were going to take some x-rays of his skull and measure some body functions and brain waves or whatever. But he was terrified of all of it.

---

The doctor arrived in the room with the nurses and shook both of their hands. "Hello, Mr. Barnes. I'm Dr. Farmer. I hear you've been having some chronic headaches?" he asked, speaking in a friendly manner to get Bucky to open up a bit.
Bucky nodded nervously and looked over to Steve to make sure he was still there. "Yes, Sir. They used to be just every so often but now they are frequent and strong. It started getting bad about three years ago but it's been a lot worse over the past year as well."

"Alright," Dr. Farmer said. "So, what I'm going to do is give you a regular physical first because it looks like you haven't gotten one in a while. Once we're done with that, we will set you up in the MRI and we can look in that noggin of yours."

Bucky gasped softly but nodded. He was so beyond nervous. The nurse handed him a cotton gown and said, "Go ahead and get dressed down to this. You can keep your underwear and socks on," she said kindly. "The doctor and I will wait outside." She turned to Steve. "Sir, would you like to wait in the lobby until Mr. Barnes is ready to leave?"

Bucky looked to Steve and shook his head. He needed him here. He couldn't do this if he left him now. It was bad enough he wouldn't be able to go back to the MRI with him. But at least he could stay until then.

Steve gave the nurse a gentle smile. "I'm his moral support. Don't worry, I'll make sure he won't escape through the window," he joked. Once the two were out and the door was locked, Steve gently ran his hands over Bucky's chest. "It's okay, Baby. It's going to be alright," he said softly. "Give me a kiss and tell me that you believe me."

Bucky took a few uneven and scared gasps of breath but then pulled Steve in for a gentle kiss. "It'll be okay," he stammered and nodded. "I'm trying to believe it. Not that I think you're lying but I'm just worried it won't end well." He slowly started stripping down and then pulled the gown on. He felt way too exposed and vulnerable.

Once Bucky was in his gown, Steve cupped the sides of his face and held him for a moment. "I love you," he said firmly. "It'll be done soon enough and we can go back to our babies and your sisters and my mom." He hugged Bucky before going to get the doctor.

The doctor and the nurse came back in and Steve sat down again. Bucky was sitting on the exam table and nervously swinging his legs. But Steve was right, he had to keep telling himself that he just had to get through this and then get home to his family. He just had to keep breathing and try to think about his babies and his sisters and Steve and his home and his family.

The doctor had Bucky go through all the routine exams, took his culture, drew his blood, took his pressure and reflexes. He pulled out a chart and started scribbling things down. "I've got to ask some health questions, Mr. Barnes. Firstly, are you on any medication?"
“Um… yeah, I think so,” Bucky muttered and looked to Steve. He didn’t actually know if he was on anything that wasn’t available over the counter. “I take pain medicine for my headaches but it’s just Advil. You know, ‘used to take Aspirin, used to take Tylenol, but now I take Advil. Advil: Advanced medicine for pain’… Right? Like the commercials?” Bucky mumbled, all awkward and nervous and blabbering.

“Right, yes,” the doctor said disinterestedly as he wrote on Bucky’s chart. “Do you smoke, Mr. Barnes? Are you sexually active? Do you use protection?”

Bucky huffed a sigh and locked eyes with the doctor for a second like he was mad that he was asked those questions. "Yes, I smoke. Yes, I am sexually active. But, no, I do not currently use protection. I have in the past, though. But I've been tested about a year and a half ago and I'm clean."

Dr. Farmer checked off a few more boxes. "Have you and your girlfriend been exclusive to each other since you were last tested? It's advisable to get tested again if not," he reminded. "Do you have any allergies?"

"Yes, exclusive on both our parts," Bucky said with a tick of annoyance. "And no, I don't have any allergies. Just seasonal stuff with some pollens that show up in the parks. Oh, and this one brand of laundry detergent that we don’t use anymore anyway." He sighed and looked to Steve. He was jumpy and now was getting worked up.

Steve gave Bucky a gentle look to try and calm him down. After a few more questions, the doctor told Bucky that they would go in for their MRI scan now so they could try and find the root to his headaches. Bucky was led to an adjoining room and was told to lay on the curved white tray.

Bucky did as he was told but his anxiety spiked the second he couldn't see Steve anymore. He knew he was on the other side of the window watching him but when they put him in position, he could only look up at the ceiling. "I feel like I'm in Coma. Michael Douglas movie, 1978. I think some French woman played the lead, I can’t pronounce her name.” Bucky said, trying to keep his cool, and glanced over at the doctor. “I don't want to do this, Doctor," he said quickly and tried to sit up but was pushed down gently by the nurse. "I know nothing's wrong. I want to go home."

"Mr. Barnes, this will not take long," he said. "You have to get this checked out if it has been something persisting for so long," the doctor warned. "Close your eyes and don't open them until I tell you. It'll make it go by quicker."
Bucky's body shook and he wished he could hear Steve's voice or see his face or know what he was thinking. He relaxed as best as he could and shut his eyes. There were noises happening around him and he was trying not to freak out too bad the entire time. It, thankfully, didn't take as long as he thought but it wasn't speedy like the doctor would have had him believe either.

---

After the scan was done, the nurse helped Bucky back to his feet. "That wasn't so bad, was it?" the doctor asked with a smile. "You can go ahead back to the room and get changed while we look at the results."

---

Bucky nodded followed the nurse back to his exam room. Steve was back in the room with him and the door was shut behind him. Bucky turned and gripped Steve, collapsing into his arms and bopping his head against his shoulder. "Steve," he whispered and tried to get his heart to stop beating so fast.

---

Steve wrapped his arms strongly around him and kissed his face a few time. "Hey there, Love. You were so brave. You did such a good job in there." He smiled down at his husband. "Look, it’s over now. Let's get you dressed."

---

Bucky worked on calming down as he pulled his clothes back on. Once he was settled he sat back on the exam table and continued to focus on trying to regulate his breathing. "What if something’s really wrong?" he asked. "What if I'm really, really sick and we just didn't know it. What if it’s a tumor or something, Steve?"

---

Steve ran his hand over Bucky's arm gently. "Nothing is going to take you away from me, Bucky," he said. "Whatever it is, you are going to get through this."

---

Bucky's lip quivered but he nodded and got quiet as he waited for the doctor to return. When he did, Bucky sat up a little straighter and tried to read his face. He couldn't tell if he was bringing good news or bad news. The doctor smiled at him and the nurse handed the doctor Bucky’s file.

---

Steve was a safe distance from Bucky when the doctor came in and he looked over at him hopefully. Dr. Farmer reviewed the file one more time like he was just making sure he wasn’t missing anything before looking up at Bucky. "Mr. Barnes, from what I can tell based off the scans and the x-rays and your other tests, you have what is called Chiari Malformation," he said. "It's a defect present since birth that basically causes a gap in the base of your skull so part of the brain tissue is sitting on top of the spinal canal. For some people, it can be quite the non-entity. They might not experience symptoms bad enough to question that anything is out of the ordinary. But others, like yourself, have more severe effects like your bouts of headaches, nausea, or dizziness that you get so often. And I'm sorry to say that there is no real cure, but there are ways to treat it. I could put you on stronger medication to help relieve symptoms as a start and we can check back with you in a few months to see how you are progressing.”
"What..." Bucky breathed and touched the back of his head. "I have a birth defect?" He was partly relieved that it wasn't something like cancer but he still figured that a malformation was a big deal. "Um, so what? I'm just going to be like this forever?"

The doctor nodded. "Yes, barring some miracle. Most people are able to live normal lives with it. It's only in rare, extreme cases that it becomes an issue and only because of other health problems adding to it. And only some extreme cases can be fatal, but I'm not worried about that with you."

"Do other health problems include being a former drug addict and alcoholic?" Bucky asked and looked from the doctor to Steve. The nurse handed him a pamphlet and Bucky scanned over it. It looked like there was no conclusive evidence that it was hereditary but some cases of parent and children pairs both having it were recorded. His mother could have had the exact same thing.

"No, it's more like health problems surrounding bone, nerve, and spinal damage. But it looks like you haven't been in any accidents or anything of the sort. And other than your migraine symptoms, you aren't experiencing other nerve issues like numbness or immobility, so you don't have to worry on that front," Dr. Farmer explained.

Bucky nodded and clutched on to his pamphlet. "It says in here that there are spinal injections? Could I do those? Do they hurt? They sound like they hurt. It's got to hurt. I mean you're stabbing between my spine." His breathing picked up again and his heart rate increased as he got scared all over again.

The doctor nodded. "Yes, there is an injection of sorts that could help. Its purpose is to get any fluid build up out of there so it relieves the pressure that causes pain. That's the main reason for them. But several doctors will do that and then actually inject a steroid to help but it's not a once and done sort of fix either," he said. "It is one of the more popular treatments to alleviate the symptoms, however."

Bucky looked to Steve. They would have to discuss what they thought was the best course of action to take with this. But right now he was so tired and on edge and he wanted to go home. "Is there anything else I need to know for now? I would kind of like to get out of here."

"Well, nothing now. I'll call you after your other test results are in. But, for now, you are free to go." Dr. Farmer gave Bucky a pat on the back and a kind smile, hoping he wasn’t too freaked out about this whole thing.

Bucky thanked the doctor and the nurse and followed Steve closely as they exited the building. He was so overwhelmed. He didn't know where to begin or what to say. He was scared. This could get worse, probably. And he was nervous about the thought of getting injections. But it sounded like they could help ease his pain.

---

Once they were out of the office, Steve nudged Bucky. "It's not a tumor! And look, now you can understand what's going on. I... I know it's not as nice as being told nothing's wrong with you, but now we have answers."

---

Bucky looked up at Steve then down at the ground to wipe at the tears in his eyes. "Let's get back home. Okay? Let's just get home. I want to lie down. My head hurts and I'm trying to process this and not think about it at the same time."

---

Steve's heart broke to see his husband so upset. He hurried them home, feeling like it took entirely too long to get there. Once they were back, he greeted Diana briefly and let the girls know they were back before ushering Bucky into their bedroom.

---

Bucky collapsed on the bed and started to cry in earnest. He curled up in on himself and just shook with frustration and from the pain in his head. He wished his mother were here. He wanted to know for sure if this is why she had problems too or if it were something else. He reached down and grabbed his family album that he kept next to the nightstand and he opened it to a picture of his mother beaming brightly and holding a small baby Bucky in her arms, proud of herself for just birthing her first born.

---

Steve laid down behind Bucky and wrapped his arms strongly around his husband. He pressed his lips to the back of his neck and let Bucky cry. When he picked up the picture, Steve looked curiously at it. "You think you two have the same thing?"

---

Bucky shook his head and handed Steve the pamphlet. "It's anyone's guess. It says there is no definitive proof that it can be hereditary but there are recorded cases of parent-children pairs with the same condition. But we will never know because my mother is dead and I can't talk to her about this. I can't talk to her and ask her how bad her headaches really were. Or ask her why she let me practically raise the girls for her instead of going to get help to try to ease her pain. I can't ask her anything about this."

---

Steve gently rubbed his hand up and down Bucky's side. He slipped his hand under Bucky's shirt so he could feel warm skin on skin. "Maybe she was even more scared of going to the doctor, Baby. It took a lot of convincing to get you to go."

---

"I did it for you and our kids. I did it for my family," Bucky said and put the photo album down on the mattress. "She couldn't have done the same for us?" He cried some more and tried to find comfort in Steve's warm body around his. "I'm sorry. I'm just so frustrated about this," he added, apologizing to Steve but really more like apologizing to his mother.

---

"It means she raised you right. She raised you to make better choices than she did, just like you're going to raise our kids to make better choices than you have." He kissed his shoulder gently. "You are such a good dad, Bucky."

---

Bucky wiped his snotty nose on his sleeve and buried even further against Steve. "Do you think the girls are freaking out? All they saw was me storming up to our room crying. I don't want them to think I'm dying. And our babies probably miss us."

---

"They're probably worried. But maybe because I was calm they'll know that it's nothing threatening," Steve said. He kissed Bucky's temple. "Maybe holding our son and daughter will make you feel a little better."

---

"Maybe," Bucky agreed and wiped at his eyes again before sitting up in bed. "Can you go talk to the girls and your mom about this and just give me a few minutes? Then I'll come down and be with everyone."

---

Steve nodded and pressed a few kisses to Bucky's face before standing. "I love you," he said warmly, then he left to go seek out the rest of their family.

---

When Steve came downstairs, both girls were sitting at the table with Sarah discussing in whispers what they thought was going on. Sarah noticed Steve first and gave him a sympathetic, worried look, assuming the worst. Lilly jumped out of her chair and said quickly and softly, "What's wrong with him, Steve?"

---

Steve walked over to Lilly and pet his hand over her hair. "He's alright, Lilly, just a little shaken. We found out why he has his headaches. He was born with a condition that puts pressure on his head right here," he said, tapping the back of her neck. "There are a few treatments for it, but they're a little scary."

---

Lilly's eyes were wide and terrified. She didn't really understand. All she knew was that her brother was upstairs crying and when Bucky cried it was because things were not okay.

Becca looked to Steve and quietly asked, "Chiari malformation?" She had been researching on her own the various things that could be causing his headaches since he was a kid and why they got worse with time.
Steve hugged Lilly tightly. "Your brother is going to be fine. He doesn't even need those scary treatments necessarily. There's easier stuff out there." He looked over at Becca, a little surprised that she knew already. "Yeah, how'd you know?"

---

Becca nodded and crossed her arms. "Steve, you know me. You really think I haven't been researching possibly diagnoses?" She stood up and went to get a glass of water and a small bowl of fruit for Steve. She understood that he probably needed some comfort as well. His husband was hurt and upset and he couldn't fix it.

---

Steve would've been a little more annoyed at Becca for not pushing the subject about her brother's help to him more if she knew a possible cause, but she was being sweet so he let it go. "Do you know different ways he can help treat the symptoms?" he asked.

---

"Honestly, Steve," Becca said and lowered her voice so she wouldn't scare Lilly who was listening intently. "From what I know about it, the spinal injections are the best thing for it. It hurts but it'll help the most to relieve the pressure. I think that's your best bet. Medicines may help the headaches not hurt as much while they are going on but the injections will prevent them from coming so often anyway."

---

"I barely got him to go in to get examined. I don't think he's going to buy into the injections until he's got no choice but to," Steve said. "And I don’t know what to do to make him feel better. He's upset because your mom's not around for him to talk to about it."

---

Becca sighed but nodded. She knew her brother. She knew he was so scared about the doctor's and anyone messing with his body like that. And she understood how he must be feeling and why he wished he could talk to their mom. "We have to try," she said finally. "We have to try to convince him to do the injections. It's going to be the best for him."

---

"We can try, but I'm not about to force him into anything he's not ready for. You wouldn't like it if I tried to shove a decision on you," Steve said back kindly but firmly. "He was shaking in the exam room. I felt so bad for him and I don't want to put him through too much."

---

"Then we take it slow," Becca decided. "I do want to help, Steve." She reached out and grabbed his arm and squeezed it. "He's my brother and I love him and I don't want him to have this pain anymore."

---

Steve paused but did end up nodding at her. "Alright," he sighed. He gave her a brief hug before stepping back. "Why don't you go up there and try to cheer him up? I'm sure it'll mean a lot to him."

---

Becca agreed and grabbed a few cookies to take to Bucky. The second she was gone, Lilly yanked on Steve's arm and pulled him closer to her, so she had his attention. "What spinal injections? What are they going to do to him?" she asked hastily and squeezed his arm too tight.

---

"Don't worry, Lil. They won't do anything to your brother that he's not okay with," Steve said. "There's a medicine that can be put into his spine that will stop the headaches from happening so much and so strong. But getting stuck in the spine is kind of hard to handle for a lot of people."

---

"Bucky's not going to die, is he?" Lilly asked softly, her eyes still looking scared. "He will be okay? What if they mess up the injection and hurt his brain? Steve, you can't let them hurt him like that."

---

Steve was quick to answer. "No, no, he's going to be just fine. This isn't something that kills people." He kissed the top of her head. "I won't let anything bad happen to him. I promise." There was faint crying coming from upstairs and Steve pushed Lilly's shoulder. "Come on, Lilly. Let's go take care of the babies."

---

Bucky heard the babies and he and Becca went over to get them settled down again. Lilly and Steve came a little after them and Bucky was holding Christopher who was clinging to his pops neck and blabbering at him. Becca had Sarah May and she was crying softly and needed a diaper change. "Steve," Bucky said softly and held their son. He was still pretty emotional but hearing his baby boy talking to him was helping.

---

Steve took Sarah May from Becca and started to change her diaper. "Are you telling your pop a good story, Christopher? Listen close, Buck, he's getting to the best part."

---

Bucky chuckled kissed Christopher's cheek. "He says that he wants someone to play blocks with him." The girls both left so Steve and Bucky could be alone again and Bucky gave them each little kisses on their heads as they went.

---

Steve picked up their daughter once she was changed and held her up. "How do you like the sound of that, Ya-Ya? You want to try to play blocks?" Steve asked in an excited tone. The baby cooed and reached up at her dad in response. "I think that's a yes, Bucky."

---

"Blocks it is!" Bucky said happily, trying to be okay so his babies didn't see him so upset. "And maybe a snack for Papa because he is feeling lightheaded and a little sick," he added and looked to Steve. "And a little bit like I could collapse at any second but I'm fighting through it."

---

"You want me to take care of them for you, Love? If you're not feeling well, you should get something in your stomach." Steve walked them all downstairs to the toy chest to get Christopher's blocks. Their son started bouncing in Bucky's arms excitedly when he saw them.

---

Bucky nodded and set Christopher down. "I'll get some food and water and then join you in a few minutes. I'm just feeling a little shaky again. It's still a lot to process." He sighed and watched his son grab a block and hold it up proudly to him.

---

"Your pops will be right back, Bean," Steve said. He sat down with Sarah May in his arms and placed a block on her tummy next to her hand. She made a surprised sound and pushed it on the floor, then stared at it.

---

Christopher picked up the fallen block and held it out for his sister again and said, "Ya-Ya, blah!" and tried to get her to hold it. She dropped it once more and then giggled a little because it made a nice thump sound against another block.

---

Steve's heart melted at the sight of them playing together. This was what he dreamed of. The two kids made each other laugh by Christopher handing over the blocks and Sarah May dropping them. "Are you two being silly?" Steve asked them. He wished Bucky could see.

---

"Ya-Ya, play!" Christopher said excitedly and looked to Steve, proud of his sister. "Dada, play!" he said and handed him a block as well. "Papa, play!" he added and turned to try to find Bucky but didn't see him anywhere. "PAPA!" he yelled loudly for him to try to get his attention.

---

"Oh, bean." Steve laughed as he waggled the block. "Your papa will be right back," he promised. "Let me see that block," Steve said as he reached his hand it for the one Christopher had in his hand for Bucky.

---

"No, Dada," Christopher said and pushed Steve's hand away. "Papa," he added in finality so Steve knew that this block was not for him.

Bucky came in a few seconds later and sat down between Christopher and Sarah May. "How are my babies?" he asked, holding a pile of carrots.

---

Steve leaned in and gave Bucky a kiss on his cheek. “Christopher doesn’t want me to have that block. It’s for you, not me,” he informed with a little smile.
Bucky traded Christopher the block for a carrot and grinned at his son. "So, only I am worthy of this block?" he asked and held it up. "I don't see what's so special about this one other than the fact that it is blue." He giggled and set the block on his knee as he ate some more carrots and offered one to Steve.

Steve took the carrot. "I guess Daddy can’t have that particular blue block," he chuckled. "Your son loves you so much. Isn't that right, Christopher?"

Christopher was distracted then. He had a carrot sticking out of the side of his mouth as he worked on putting blocks on top of each other. He was definitely getting better at figuring out how to make them stay. "I love him, too," Bucky said warmly and watched his son. "And I love you, Ya-Ya," he added and pet his daughter's hair.

Sarah May reached out for the tower Christopher was building, trying to get to it to no avail. But Christopher clearly didn’t approve of her trying to mess with his little tower so he let out an unhappy screech that startled her and she began to cry.

Steve held her close, rocking her slightly to calm her. "It's okay, Sweet Pea. Your brother just really likes his block towers. Please stop crying, my sweet girl."

Christopher looked at Bucky to see if he was in trouble. "Bean, you have to be gentle. Use your quiet voice, shh," he whispered. "Ya-Ya didn’t do anything wrong, Bean."

Sarah May calmed down fairly quickly until she wasn’t crying anymore but sniffling. "Poor girl. She doesn't understand," Steve sighed. "She was just trying to play."

Bucky breathed a sigh of relief. "I think she's just a pretty sensitive little kid. She likes peace and quiet." He rubbed her head and hummed to her softly. "And our Bean likes noise and commotion."

"She's such a sweetie. I love everything about her," Steve said softly. "And I love you too, Christopher." He kissed his son's head and gave him a playful nudge. "I was thinking about calling that professor Fred was talking about."

"Yeah?" Bucky asked and took Sarah May from Steve. "The one who can help with the coin? Maybe you should take Ya-Ya with you to meet her. Seeing her in person might help the professor know if she is correct."
"Maybe," Steve said. "How does that sound, Sweet Pea? Do you want to go on an adventure with your dada to see where you're from?" He reached out so he could hold her hand. "She will probably like how quiet an office will be," he chuckled. "After being here all the time."

---

"I think she will like that. And it'll be important to get to know where she is from. I want to make sure we give her a life that involves her heritage. I'll even read about the country or religions or anything just so I'm prepared," Bucky said.

---

Steve loved being able to raise their little kids. He laid down on his stomach and helped Christopher put some toy animals around the tower. "You're a great dad, Bucky. She's lucky to have you."

---

"You say that all the time," Bucky said with a little grin. "You know they have two dads, right? You know you're a great dad too, right?" Christopher got bored with Steve and the animals quickly and he stood up and started toddling over to Diana who was napping in the corner. Ever since they finished making half the living room into Sarah's room, Diana was spending a lot more time moping in the corner and missing when it was bigger and easier to run around.

---

Diana's ears flicked once and she huffed softly. She tolerated Christopher tugging lightly at her tail but didn't look to be very pleased about it. "I'm good, yeah, but you're better at it than I am." Steve paused and then told their son, "Christopher, be nice to Diana."

---

"That's a lie," Bucky muttered with a little scoff. He gave Sarah May to Steve and crawled over to his son. He gently scooped him up and tickled him to distract from being taken away from the dog. He needed to learn to leave her be while she was napping. The poor girl wouldn't get any sleep otherwise.

---

Diana's tail thumped once in gratitude when Bucky took Christopher away and she flopped onto her side with a tired sigh. "It isn't. You're so good with them, Buck. And as much as you work, you're never too tired to give them love," Steve protested.

---

"Can we just agree that we are both equally as good fathers?" Bucky asked, cutting to the chase. "My head still hurts a little and I don't want to argue about this with you." He sighed and looked at Christopher in his arms and got solemn again. "I just... I can't even wrap my head around what exactly is going on."

---

Christopher wiggled in Bucky's arms and blabbered at him some more. "Becca seemed to know a bit about it," Steve said. "She did some research apparently. And she was able to name it before I could tell her what it was."
Bucky sighed and tried to smile at his son but it looked more like a grimace. "Did she say if there’s any way best to fix it? Like go in and move a part of my skull so there isn't pressure? I would rather do that one big surgery once than do injections all the time, I think."

"She thinks the injections are the best bet for you," Steve said honestly. "She didn't mention the surgery, but both options seem to have their pros and cons," he said. He kissed Sarah May's cheek, which made her smile all big and bright. “But, I don’t really think you would like doing surgery, Baby.”

Bucky nodded and sighed deeply. "Do you mind watching them?" he asked and set Christopher down on the ground by his blocks before getting up. "I'm going to go take a shower and lay down." He was so beat. He just wanted some time to himself – time to just think and be alone and try to be okay.
A few weeks later, Steve found himself set up with an appointment to meet with Fred's contact, Dr. Callahan. Steve kissed Bucky goodbye and left Christopher with his mom so he could take his daughter on the train to her office. When they arrived in the waiting room, Sarah May was looking around with big curious eyes. Occasionally, she would point at something and gurgle at him. She was always so interested in new places.

---

Dr. Callahan came out of her office and ushered the two of them in. "Hello, Mr. Rogers," she said with a smile and stuck out a hand to shake. "My secretary told me you have some questions of genealogy for this little one?"

---

Steve shook her hand. "Yeah, thank you for meeting with us," he said. He took a seat and cradled his little girl in his arms. "My daughter here - she was left at our church and we adopted her," Steve explained. "So, my partner and I wanted to raise her knowing her culture, but we don't know what her culture is."

---

"Right," the woman said and nodded to Steve. "Well, let's have a look at that coin you've brought me, yes? I have a bit of practice in international currency and I have read several books on the subject."

---

Steve fished around in his pocket and produced the coin. "Here it is," he said. "We thought it was maybe from Hungary or Yugoslavia. Fred thinks she may be Jewish. I don't really know."

---

Dr. Callahan looked over the coin and even pulled out a little magnifying device and took a closer look at the words there. "Well, it isn't strictly Hungarian but it is European. It isn't German. Maybe Bulgarian, Austrian, Belgian. It's definitely older but not old, if that makes sense." She grabbed a book and leafed through it then looked up at Sarah May over her glasses. "She does appear to have similar features to the Jewish that is certain."

---

Sarah May reached up to try and grab her glasses, but Steve gently redirected her hands to stop her. "I was raised Catholic – recently, I've been attending a more nondenominational church - and I'm raising my son to be in the Christian faith as well, but my partner is willing to take Sarah May to synagogue so she can learn her religion if she is Jewish," Steve said. "Have you come across many multi-faith households?"

---

"No, I can't say I have," Callahan said with a shrug and looked back down to her book. "This looks somewhat like a schilling, but not a modern one. And at first glance, it has similarities to a forint but it isn't that either." She hummed and flipped to a different section in the book she had out. "I think it's Austrian. It seems to be an older sort of Austrian schilling. I think your safest guess now is that she came from there," she concluded and looked up at Steve. "Austrian-Jewish also seems highly likely considering this symbol here towards the bottom of the coin is a Hebrew marking. Here's a coin very similar to that one." She turned the book around and showed Steve the picture and compared it to the actual coin. "Unless you can find more information about your daughter, I think you can rest easy in the assumption that her birth parents were at least of Austrian-Jewish descent. It's very possible her grandparents came to America to escape the Nazis." Dr. Callahan gave Steve a gentle smile. "Sounds like she will have to be taking this one to synagogue. Is she Jewish? Your partner?"

---

Steve beamed down at his little girl. "You hear that, Sarah May? You're Austrian and Jewish. Isn't that fantastic?" he said brightly to her. Steve looked up at the picture, seeing how similar it was to the coin as he added, "My partner is atheist, or agnostic, I'm not entirely sure. But they're willing to go so our little girl can learn her religion. I guess I'm going to have to study up on Judaism as well," he chuckled.

---

Callahan nodded and passed the coin back. "There are several good sources at most libraries that would help you learn about the religion and the culture. Let me write down some of my favorite authors’ works for you. And you might even be able to access some archives detailing immigration into New York back around the time of the war. Maybe if you see some names and some pictures, something might jump out at you."

---

"That'd be amazing. Thank you so much for your help, you have no idea how much it means to us." Steve hugged his daughter close and kissed her hair. She started to whine softly because it was almost lunchtime for her and she was getting a little antsy.

---

"Of course," Dr. Callahan said and handed the list to Steve. "Do you and your little miss have any other questions?" She asked and reached out a hand to shake Sarah May's tiny outstretched one. She had been trying to point to the ceiling fan but was cut off.

---

"Nope, you've answered them all. Thank you again. I'm so happy to know more about our daughter, even if it's hard to know exactly for sure," Steve said. He thanked her once again and headed out of the office. Once Steve got home, he quickly made up a bottle for Sarah May and then sought out Bucky to tell him what he learned.

---

Bucky was holed up in the master room with his photo album open to the same picture of his mom and a pile of tissues surrounding him. He had talked to Becca and they concluded that he really should give the injections a try. Then he got emotional and had been crying and talking to his mom for about an hour when Steve found him.

---

"Buck! Bucky?" Steve's tone went from excited to concerned when he saw his husband crying. "Oh, Love, what's wrong?” he asked. He sat down next to him and dried the tears from his face. "Hey, Baby, I love you. I'm sorry I wasn't here sooner.”

---

Bucky hiccupped and shook his head. "Nothing. It's fine. I'm fine. I'm just a little upset," he said and closed his photo album. "What did the professor say? Do we know where Ya-Ya is from? Or was she unable to work it out?"

---

"She figured it out," Steve said. "We are the proud parents of an Austrian-Jewish little lady. Or at least, it's incredibly likely," Steve said. "She even gave me a list of books we can read about it."

---

Bucky's face lit up and he brought Steve and Sarah May into his arms and gave them both kisses. "Sweet Pea, you are Jewish! I guess it makes perfect sense. And Papa will take you to synagogue so you can be with your people. And we will learn about Austria because I know nothing about Austria." He giggled and sniffled back tears again. "So, are you thinking she was born here after immigrant parents came over and couldn't take care of her?"

---

Sarah May smiled at her pop and reached so she could hold onto his shirt. "I think so,” Steve offered. “I wondered if her parents immigrated here recently. But Dr. Callahan made a good point that their parents might have come over during the holocaust. It would make sense why they would leave her at a church instead of a synagogue since they've seen how Jewish people have been persecuted."

---

"That does make the most sense. If my family was persecuted I would probably want to try to get my little girl somewhere so maybe no one would know she was Jewish." Bucky sighed and wrapped her up in a blanket with him. "But there isn't any worry about that now. She is ours and we love her and we will make sure no one hurts her for who she is."

---

Sarah May, sleepy from drinking her bottle so fast, was quick to close her eyes once Bucky swaddled her in warmth. "Yeah," Steve said. "She's our perfect, little daughter. And we are lucky to have her." He laid down next to Bucky and played with his hair. "Feeling better?"

---

"Oh, I'm better now that you’re here,” Bucky said and let their daughter fall asleep on his chest. "I just keep thinking about my mom. Keep wishing she was here so she could help me figure out what to do. Becca and I basically decided that we should try to do the injections. But I'm just so scared."

---

Steve kissed along Bucky's shoulder and looked at him gently. "I'm sorry you can't go to her for advice. It would've been nice to have someone understand what you're going through," Steve said. "What if we find other people who do the same treatment? They can talk you through what they went through."
Bucky shook his head. "That might just make things worse. I don't want to be more scared by what they say." He squeezed Steve's leg and said quieter, "Can we leave it for now? I'm going to cry again. And I just want to look at this sleepy baby girl for a while."

Steve nodded. "Right, okay, whatever makes you happy, Love," he said. He rubbed Bucky's back lightly. "I had to hold back with the professor. She kept referring to my partner as a 'she' but I didn't want to risk being thrown out."

Bucky sighed and gave a weak smile. "It's okay. You did the right thing. I mean I don't know if you noticed but I had to tell the doctor about my long-time girlfriend who I don't use protection with when we have sex." He took a breath and looked back to Sarah May. "It hurts not be open but, it's just safer that way."

"Yeah, you and your long-time girlfriend must be popping babies out every nine months," Steve teased and tickled Bucky's side playfully once before going back to doting on him. "I understand. Sometimes it's worth being open and other times? Not so much."

Bucky nodded solemnly and adjusted so he was pressed to Steve's side. Sarah May was asleep now and he just watched her breathe and occasionally squirm on his chest. "She's so beautiful. Isn't she just the sweetest thing? I can't believe we were lucky enough to have this precious little baby come to your church."

Steve looked over at their daughter and smiled. "Yeah, she's our little blessing," he said. "We are so fortunate to have two healthy kids running around. " They would've been luckier to have Grant here too, but he didn't want to mention him right now and make them both upset. "I love her so much."

Becca came in then like a whirlwind and deposited Christopher on the bed. He was wearing two different socks and no pants and a shirt that had a dark stain on the front. "I'm sick of him trying to yank out all my hair. And he doesn't want to wear his pants. Please, I can't take this anymore. Please."

Steve was surprised to have Becca come in so suddenly. He set up and reached for his son. Christopher sat innocently on the bed and sucked on his thumb but crawled to Steve when he saw his dad’s open arms. "I got him, Becs, you don't have to stress," Steve said. "Let's get you changed out of that dirty shirt, son."

Becca left with a huff as Bucky sat up slowly with Sarah May. "Well, I guess we don't get much down time around here, do we?" He sighed and held his swaddled daughter to follow Steve to the nursery.

---

Sarah May whined quietly when she was moved but didn't raise a ruckus. "I guess that's parenting life for you," Steve sighed. He wrestled Christopher into a new shirt and pants then put a matching pair of socks on him. After making a bit of a fuss, Steve calmed him down with some plush animals.

---

Bucky did love being a parent. But sometimes he wished things were just slightly quieter. But he knew that it came with raising two babies. "How about after dinner, we put them down for bed a little early and just have some us time for a while."

---

Steve was able to get Christopher giggling as he paraded animals in front of him, making silly noises in the meantime. He paused to answer, "Of course, Love. I'll tire Christopher out so he will go right to sleep."

---

"Okay," Bucky smiled softly. "I know your mom already had plans to make dinner so I'll put Ya-Ya down and go help her. She said that there is a lot of vegetable chopping that needs to be done. She also said something about it being a French meal her friend suggested so I don't know what it is we are trying tonight."

---

"Ya-Ya," Steve chuckled softly. "I can't believe Christopher practically renamed our daughter," he joked. Christopher looked over and waved at his sleepy sister. "I like it when Ma tries out new recipes. They're always so good."

---

Bucky carefully put Sarah May in her crib and made sure there were no loose blankets or anything she could get tangled in. "I just like using 'Ya-Ya' around Christopher so he knows he did well in learning that that's his sister. Isn't that right, Bean? You know your sister, don't you?"

---

"Ya-Ya," Christopher repeated and waved at his baby sister.

Steve kissed Christopher's cheek. "Let's see if we can have you skip a nap, Bean. So you will go to bed tonight nice and worn, yeah? Maybe you'll sleep until the sun comes up, too."

---

"Until the sun comes up!" Bucky said excitedly to his son and gave him a kiss before heading down to help Sarah make dinner. Steve was usually pretty good at getting Christopher to play a lot instead of wanting his nap. Maybe they could actually pull this off.

---

Steve was able to keep their son occupied and once dinner was ready he woke Sarah May up to come sit with the family. He had both babies in his arms as he came into the kitchen, Christopher squealing excitedly. "Smells good, ma."

---

"Thank you, Steven," Sarah said and turned to help get the babies in their seats. Bucky was stirring a pot of sauce that was supposed to go over the dish. He had some sauce in his hair that he hadn't noticed and he had been given apron because he made a mess of his shirt.

---

Steve took a wet cloth and cleaned up Bucky's hair. He kissed his cheek lightly. "Want to watch the kids and I'll take over, Love?" Steve asked, rubbing his back.

---

"I'm almost done here," Bucky said with a frustrated huff - not at Steve, but at the sauce. "Someone just taste it and tell me if it's done then I'll pour it on the food." He was no cook but Sarah let him help more than Steve did. He liked to help if he had direction. From Steve he got more of, 'It's okay, Baby, just sit down. You don't have to help.' Which Bucky felt like translated to Steve not wanting any help.

---

Steve nodded and kissed his husband once more before going back to entertain his kids. Every time Christopher looked a little sleepy, Steve would start talking to him in excited voices. Sarah came over to test the sauce and gave a nod of approval. "It tastes fantastic, Bucky." Sarah was a lot more patient in the kitchen than Steve was. She wanted to share her expertise with Bucky since he wanted to help out.

---

Bucky nodded sharply and, with Sarah's supervision, poured it over the dish. He felt a weird sense of pride at having helped make a dinner that tasted good. He brought it over to the table and called the girls in who happily trotted over with the promise of food. "After Steve prays, he has some pretty cool news to share."

---

After their prayers, Steve held Sarah May's hand lightly and looked to the rest of his family. "Today, we found out that Sarah May is Austrian and Jewish."

---

"Austrian," Becca murmured and squinted at Sarah May. "How come I never considered Austrian?" Becca really liked to be right. She liked to know everything. And he hadn’t figured this one out before someone else did so it made her a little annoyed.

“Like you really knew,” Lilly mumbled sarcastically.

"So, I will be taking Sarah May to synagogue while Steve takes Christopher to church. We talked about it and decided that we want her to be with her people," Bucky said confidently.
Steve bit back a laugh at Becca and Lilly, not wanting to exacerbate things. Lilly giggled when Bucky said he would take Sarah May to synagogue. "You sure the place won't burn down by your presence? You don’t believe in any of that," she teased.

---

"It very well may," Bucky said with a humored nod. "If so, I'll just rebuild the place, no hard feelings." He smiled over at her and pinched her arm. "And if we have any other children that are Jewish then I will take them as well."

---

Becca groaned and interjected, "You're not going to have more anytime soon, are you? I don't think I can handle another baby crying around here. I really can't, Bucky."

---

"We make no promises," Bucky said quietly and took a bite of food. "It is apparently my turn to bring home a baby. I don't know how Steve keeps finding children around Brooklyn that need him but I guess I need to step up my game eventually."

---

"Yeah, Steve's got you beat by two," Lilly snorted. "He's got a magical ability to find babies. Like a bomb-sniffing dog, except, instead of bombs, he finds babies, and, instead of being a dog, he's your husband."

---

"That's a very weird analogy," Bucky said and shot a little glance to Steve. Dinner went like usual with Becca and Lilly talking about something with school and then getting into an argument about something unimportant. This time it was about whether Becca's shoes or Lilly's shoes were better in the snow. But once they were all cleaned up, the babies were ready to have their lullabies and go to sleep.

---

Diana barked few some scraps and Christopher barked back out of habit. Steve chuckled at his boy and his dog and picked his son up into his arms to take his kids up to the nursery. Once he had both of their little ones to sleep, Steve walked out of the nursery and put a hand on Bucky's shoulder. "How're you feeling?"

---

Bucky smiled warmly at his husband and tugged him into their room. "I feel okay right now. I feel like I haven't seen much of you lately since I worked so much this week. And I feel like maybe we should fix that. Wasn't it one of your '86 New Year's resolutions to have more quiet time with me?"

---

Steve followed Bucky without complaint into their room and ran his fingers through his hair. "It was. It's a harder resolution to keep with two babies running amok," Steve said. "But we have tonight. Let's make the most of our quiet time now."
"Candles?" Bucky asked and slipped off his shirt preemptively. He went into his nightstand and grabbed a bag of chocolate he kept there. He offered some to Steve and then went to get the candles. "There was an early Valentine's sale and Clint bought too much so he gave me some the other day. Be careful, though, it's an assorted bag. Some have cherries inside and they are not good."

---

Steve kissed Bucky's cheek and helped light and place the candles. "What's wrong with cherries? I like the gooey stuff they put in the center of those chocolate covered cherry things."

---

"Then you can find all the cherry ones for yourself and give me all the caramel ones," Bucky suggested and finished on the last candle before flipping out the lights so it was just a soft warm glow. "Also, I want you naked. We can lay around and eat chocolate and make out for a bit but I want you naked while we do it."

---

"Pushy," Steve snickered as he laid back on the bed. He slowly undressed in front of his husband, doing his best to make a bit of a show of it, but it didn't work all that well because he was a huge fucking dork. "Come here and give me a kiss," he hummed happily.

---

Bucky worked off the rest of his own clothes and piled all of their discarded garments into the hamper in the closet so it wasn't messy in their room. He then went and laid down next to Steve, kissing him as he grabbed another piece of chocolate. He pulled away from Steve and took a bite. It was cherry. He took the other half and fed it to Steve.

---

Steve happily ate the other half of Bucky's chocolate. He ran his fingers slowly up and down his husband's body, loving how lucky he was to have a man like him at his side. "Tell me more about how your week went, Buck. I want to hear."

---

"Well, it was okay. Clint was hardly there because he was so sick so Tim and I had to hold down the fort. Reggie found that if he smoked weed in the women's restroom then I wouldn't find him as fast. But it's hard not to smell it regardless." Bucky chuckled and took another chocolate. "And one of my AA group mates had to bring his son in with him and the kid decided to piss in the corner of the room and it was just a big ordeal."

---

"I should stop by and bring Clint soup," Steve said, making a mental note of it. He was home anyway and could make a run for soup while he was taking the kids around in a stroller. He also couldn't believe that Reggie still had his damn job with the amount of weed he smoked at work. "How old was the kid that peed?"

---

"Around seven. Old enough to know not to piss in the corner of a meeting," Bucky said grumpily. "But anyway. That was my week. Enough of that though, I want to make out with you. You look so beautiful and the candles are glowing around your face and I want to be all over you and inside you.

"Better to piss in the corner than in the middle of the meeting," he teased. Steve leaned in to kiss Bucky slowly. He trailed a few kisses lower and lower down his chest. "You're such a romantic," he sighed. "How are you so amazing? How did I ever deserve you?"

"Because you're perfect and you deserve someone who knows you are and wants to praise every bit of you," Bucky said confidently and moved to push two fingers against Steve's lips so he would suck them. "That's how."

Bucky could still make his heart flutter like it was their first date all over again. Steve locked eyes with Bucky, smiling over at him before slowly taking his fingers into his mouth. He bobbed his head and worked his tongue around his fingers, making a show of it.

"You're so hot," Bucky breathed and pushed his fingers in just a bit more before taking them out. "Suck my cock for a while?" he asked, putting his hand on the back of Steve's head. "Then I'll open you up and make love to you. How does that sound?"

Steve was still blushing a bit and he nodded his head. He moved down Bucky's body, kissing him as he went. He looked up at his husband through hooded eyes and gave a few little licks at the tip before slowly taking a little into his mouth.

"Yes, thank you, Baby," Bucky gasped and massaged the back of Steve’s head as he worked down his cock. He took another chocolate from the bag - a caramel one this time - and popped it into his mouth, happy to have thought to grab them. It felt like a pre-Valentine's day treat with the chocolate and the candles. He loved it.

Steve hollowed out his cheeks as he worked his tongue along the length of Bucky's cock. He was slow but made little noises every time he came off with a wet pop to take a breath. He reached over to play with Bucky's balls, palming at them while he sucked him off.

Bucky smiled down at his husband and let him keep going for a few more minutes. Eventually, though, he gently pulled him off of his cock. "Come on, let me have your ass. Want to lick you open. But you got to do something for me." He grabbed the new flavored lube he got and shimmied so he was close to Steve's ass. "You never sing for me. I want to hear you sing something for me."
Steve was really blushing now. It wasn't like he was embarrassed to sing in front of Bucky but it was so intimate right now and he loved it. He laid back and spread his legs for his husband. He thought for a moment and asked, "You want something Irish?"

---

"I would love something Irish," Bucky said sweetly and kissed a line down Steve's inner thigh before working back up and licking at his hole. He put a drop of the flavored lube on his tongue and then pushed around his rim before sticking just the tip inside and back out.

---

Steve let out a soft moan and arched his back off the bed, wanting more. He started to sing an old Gaelic hymn to Bucky, one of his favorites, but it was clear that Bucky eating him out was affecting his singing.

---

Bucky hummed happily and looked up past Steve's body up into his eyes. It was a good choice of song. It had a lovely melody from what he could hear. But he definitely didn't understand the words being sung in a language he knew nothing about. Bucky got a little more lube and spread it on two fingers before pushing them in alongside his tongue and fucking in and out of Steve.

---

Steve wasn't able to finish the song. By the time Bucky added his fingers inside of him, Steve was moaning Bucky's name instead. He tugged at his hair and scratched his nails down his back. "So good, Buck."

---

Bucky chuckled and moved to kiss at Steve's thighs before taking his cock into his mouth. He sucked on it for a while and added a third finger into Steve's ass. But then he just got impatient and wanted to be inside of him already so he moved Steve's legs up so his ankles rested on his shoulders and then he lubed himself up before easing inside with a breathy groan.

---

Steve dug his heels into Bucky's back as he felt his husband enter him. He closed his eyes and tilted his head back with a satisfied sigh. "Tell me all the things we are going to do in our quiet time this year, Bucky," he breathed out.

---

Bucky held Steve steady and picked a slow, deep rhythm. "There will be more of this. And more candles. And more talking about how we are doing. We don't get many private moments anymore to just be us and catch up. I want to try to fill all our time with good memories and love and touches and sex like this."

---

Steve moaned and squeezed his muscles around Bucky's cock. He loved how full he felt with his husband seated deep inside of him. "I like the sound of that," he groaned. "We should try something new maybe," he said. "I can try to be a little more open-minded."
Bucky gasped and stared at Steve. He loved when Steve suggested something new. "New how?" he asked tentatively and picked up his pace ever so slightly. He wanted to make love so good to him but he was getting slightly excited.

"Oh, my god, you're like a dog with a bone," Steve laughed. He had to pause to breathe because Bucky was doing such wonderful things to him that took his breath away. "I was considering a previously-banned object."

"You mean the previously banned object that I threw out in the move?" Bucky asked with a little grunt as he pushed in a little harsher. He supposed if Steve was serious, he could get a new one. But he liked Phillip. They went through a lot together.

Steve nodded. "I've felt awful about it ever since you threw it out, Buck," Steve said. He blushed deeply and said, "I already bought one. Back when I got the flavored lube." He had hidden it away until he had been ready to bring it up.

"What?" Bucky's movements stopped almost completely. "Am I dreaming? My husband bought a sex toy? There's no way." He was honestly having a hard time wrapping his brain around the fact that his husband bought a sex toy. That was just so incomprehensible to him. "I don't believe you."

Steve blushed even deeper and swatted Bucky's chest. "Don't stop," he complained. "I'm an adult. I can buy any amount of sex toys for us as I want," Steve insisted, trying to make Bucky stop making such a big deal out of it.

Bucky started moving in and out of him again and shook his head. "Sure, you're an adult. And adults can buy sex toys. But you're Steve Rogers-Barnes, my husband. And you don't buy sex toys. I'm just in a bit of shock. I'm allowed to be shocked."

"Would you prefer if I stole it instead of bought it?" he joked. Steve let out a satisfied sound when Bucky started to finally move in him again. He curled his toes and closed his eyes. "I'm getting close, Bucky"

Bucky shook his head and grabbed the base of Steve's cock. "Not yet," he growled softly and kept going inside him. "I just can't believe that after so long of being so against it, you are suggesting it and bought something. Has sex with me gotten boring or are you doing this cause you think it'll make me happier?"
Steve whined when Bucky held the base of his cock. He wanted to come so bad but he didn't try and force the issue. "What? Sex with you could never be boring for me," Steve balked. He almost sounded offended at the insinuation. "I wanted to make you happy."

"You do make me happy," Bucky said and let Steve's dick go again. "You make me beyond happy. And you didn't need to buy a sex toy to make that happen. It was my choice to get rid of Phillip because I thought it would make you happy. And I knew it didn't need him to be completely satisfied. I have you." His words were shrouded in breathy gasps and light moans and he noticed that he had picked up again and was getting just about close to coming. "If you want to try using the new one, I am more than happy to. But you have to be sure. And not just because you think I want it. I want it to be your choice."

Steve genuinely was grateful that Bucky was being sweet and making sure this was something he was definitely okay with, but all Steve wanted to do was for Bucky to make them both come and let them talk about this later. Sometimes, Bucky could just get so distracted during sex and that was starting to get to Steve. He reached up and gave a little tug on Bucky's hair. "I'm a grown man, Buck, and I'll use a sex toy if I want to. Now, shut up and make love to me, you dope."

"Of course, Baby," Bucky said and leaned in to give Steve a kiss, bending him in half and pushing his cock even deeper inside. "I really fucking love you," he whispered and stayed close to his face while he rolled his hips in smoother, longer movements, concentrating on the sounds of Steve's breathing and the feeling of his ass holding him inside.

Steve cupped Bucky's face and drew him in for a slow, messy kiss. He whimpered Bucky's name softly as he came, shooting hot spurts of come on his chest while his ass reflexively clenched down around Bucky's cock.

A smiled of relief ghosted over Bucky's face when Steve came. He was worried that he had killed the mood enough that Steve wasn't going to come at all. "Feels so good, Baby," he whispered and reached between them to collect Steve's come and suck it from his fingers. "Can I fuck you a little harder now?" he asked and pleaded with his eyes. He really wanted to just go for it until he finished inside of his husband.

Steve moaned at the sight of Bucky licking his come off his fingers. That man was sinfully sexy. He nodded and the second Bucky picked up the pace, Steve's nails scratched down Bucky's sides as he did his best to keep quiet and keep stable on the bed.

Bucky fucked into Steve so fast and well. He could tell the sensitivity from just having come was getting to him. Bucky put his arm in front of Steve's mouth. "Bite down if you need too. I don't want to wake anyone."

---

Steve ended up sinking his teeth into Bucky's arm without thinking in order to stifle the noises he was making. It wasn't hard enough to break skin but it would probably bruise a bit. His thighs shook and he took what Bucky had to give for a little bit but finally, he let go of Bucky's arm and gasped out, "Too much."

---

"Okay, I'm coming, I'm coming," Bucky said breathlessly and his body arched back as he shoved into Steve one last time and released his load firmly up inside him. He slowed his breathing and then pulled out, sticking a finger in to get some of his come and then offered it to Steve.

---

Steve's hands moved to the mattress and he gripped the sheets. He didn't know how long it took for him to catch his breath but when he opened his eyes and saw Bucky holding his finger up to him, he lifted his head and licked it clean, too hazy to speak.

---

Bucky wiped the rest of Steve's come off his stomach and moved to curl up right next to him. "I love you so much," he breathed and kissed Steve's chest and neck. "That was amazing sex. You feel so good around me, Baby. And the faces you make just ruin me."

---

Steve buried his face in Bucky's shoulder, feeling a little clingy and wanting his husband's arms around him. "Keep talking sweet to me," he murmured. "I like it when you sweet talk me, Buck."

---

Bucky held Steve close and kissed his cheek and his forehead and his lips. "You sang so well for me. It was beautiful. I loved every second of it. And you're body is just so handsome and it's all mine and I'm so glad it gets to just be you and me forever."

---

Steve smiled, loving the praise and looking up into Bucky's beautiful eyes. "I'll always be yours, Buck. I can't see myself raising my family and spending my days with anyone besides you. I don't know how I managed before I knew you, Baby."

---

"I love you so much it's ridiculous," Bucky said and tugged the blanket up over Steve before getting up to blow out the candles and come back. "Now, it's time to sleep. I have work early tomorrow and I think you need to find me a synagogue."

---

Steve chuckled softly and kissed him a few times. "Yeah, looks like, eventually, you're going to be helping our little sprout find her roots. You're the best husband I could ever pray for." He closed his eyes tiredly and soon found himself drifting off to sleep, warm against Bucky's body.
Chapter Summary

First half of Christopher's first birthday.

When February finally rolled around, Steve and Bucky prepared to celebrate their son's first birthday. They were lucky enough to have gotten Christopher's birth certificate reprinted from the hospital after the adoption paperwork went through. They weren't so lucky to know when Sarah May was born so they just had to make a good guess and stick to it. But today was their oldest baby's birthday and everyone was very excited.

---

Steve couldn't stop talking about Christopher's birthday the whole week leading up to it. He made plenty of decorations to dress up the house and Sarah found the perfect recipe for his cake. When Steve woke up that morning, he nudged Bucky awake. "Buck. Bucky, wake up. It's Christopher’s birthday!"

---

Bucky slowly opened his eyes and blinked up at Steve. Then he remembered what was happening and he sat up quickly. "Is he awake?" he asked and hastily pulled on a pair of pajama pants and a jacket. "Have you gone in there yet? Get the camera."

---

"Not yet. I didn't want to go in without you," Steve said. He kissed Bucky's cheek and got up so he could get the camera. "I can't believe he's already a year old, Baby. It feels like yesterday I was bringing him home and hiding him away in our bedroom."

---

"I love him so much. We are so lucky," Bucky said happily and gave Steve a kiss before dragging him to the nursery.

Christopher was sitting up in his crib and looking over at his sister saying, "Ya-Ya," repeatedly and trying to reach his hand through the bars to get to her.

---

Steve was able to sneak a picture of Christopher standing in his crib before the little boy noticed his parents walking in. Sarah May was still sleeping, so Steve didn't get too loud. "Hey there, Bean! It's your birthday today! You've been on this earth for a whole year. Isn't that amazing?" He picked him out of his crib and gave him a kiss.

---
Bucky immediately pressed himself to his husband and son and planted kisses all over his little face. "Sweet boy, you are a year old!" He pet his long hair and looked up at Steve excitedly. "Our boy is growing up."

---

Christopher smiled and hugged Bucky's neck. Steve snapped another picture because their boy was so darn cute. "Papa," Christopher said to him. "Ya-Ya play?" He pointed at the crib with his sleeping sister in it.

---

"Ya-Ya is sleeping," Bucky said quietly. "Dada is going to check your diaper and take you downstairs for breakfast and I am hoping to try to pick up your sister as carefully as I can so she doesn't wake up. And then we can play all day. Okay, Bean? And then later Uncle Clint is coming over with Aunt Natasha and Tim to have dinner and cake and bring you new toys and things!"

---

"Oh, Dada gets to change the dirty diaper?" Steve snorted. He took his son from his husband but Christopher found it an opportune time to practically shout at his papa and babble at him because he was getting excited at all the talking Bucky was doing with him. Sarah May, thank god, still slept.

---

"Shh, Bean," Bucky chuckled and gave him a kiss. "I know it's your birthday but let your sister sleep a little longer." He hovered over Sarah May and slowly scooted his hands underneath her back and head. Then he lifted her up and tilted to put her on his bare chest before zipping up the jacket around them both. "There we go," he sighed happily.

---

Sarah May made a quiet noise but didn't wake up. She looked so damned adorable swaddled up in Bucky's jacket and Steve took a picture of that too. He set the camera and the pictures down and turned so he could change Christopher's diaper and sing to him as he did so. When he brought him downstairs, his mom excitedly greeted her grandson and wished him a happy birthday as well.

---

The girls were already downstairs helping Sarah make pancakes. Lilly had been shunned to a corner of the kitchen to cut fruit quietly by herself and she looked very unhappy about it. But she brightened up with she saw her nephew and came to give him a happy kiss to which he screeched, "Leeee!" and banged his hand on her shoulder.

---

Steve smiled proudly at his son. Lilly was usually more fun to him than Becca so Christopher usually had a big reaction to seeing Lilly. "Why the long face before, Lil?" Steve asked. "Don't like cutting fruit?"
Lilly huffed and held up a hand with a bandage on two of her fingers. "I burned myself on the skillet," she mumbled. "So they thought it was better that I cut fruit instead."

Bucky held Sarah May and looked at his sister’s bandage for a second. "Well, maybe next time then. And Christopher will be so happy you cut fruit for his birthday since he loves fruit."

---

"Aw, I’m sorry," Steve said. He hugged her with his free arm. Just as Bucky said that Christopher loved fruit, their son started to reach for the strawberries Lilly had cut.

"Leeeee," he whined before signing that he was hungry.

---

Lilly gathered a few strawberries into her hand and gave one to Christopher who grabbed it and shoveled the entire thing in his mouth. Sarah and Becca started setting the table and Sarah said, "Okay, boys. Tell me the plan for the day. I know your friends are coming over this afternoon to celebrate and I know Steve has been decorating. I've got the cake covered and Bucky is ordering pizza later. So what else do we need to do?"

---

"Well, I was thinking we should go to the cemetery to celebrate with Grant and Bucky's parents, too. And maybe we can go to the zoo at some point," Steve offered.

---

"That sounds like a good plan," Sarah said with a smile at her son and her grandbaby. "But isn't it a little too cold for the zoo? You'll only see a few indoor animals. What if you took him to the ice rink? I think they have a small children’s rink that you could go in."

---

"But Christopher loves to go to the zoo," Steve whined.

Lilly snorted. "Just do the ice rink, Steve. I want to watch Christopher try to skate. He'll probably be a goofy clumsy mess. It’ll be adorable and hilarious."

---

Sarah May started to squirm in Bucky’s jacket and Bucky unzipped it so she could see what was going on. "Steve, Baby, we have time for both today if you want to do both. It won't take long at the zoo since it really will only be a few animals and then we can skate for just about an hour."

---

Steve walked over to kiss their daughter good morning. "We can do both. I wanna do as much as we can with your little boy on his first birthday," Steve said. "Isn't that right, Bean? Are you gonna have a big day?"
"Dada!" Christopher yelped and bounced in his arms. "Dada, bay," he pointed to the strawberries and repeated himself, trying his best to say 'berry' but getting nowhere with it.

---

Steve gasped. "Berry? Do you want another berry, Sweetheart?" he asked, getting all excited over the new word. He gave his son a berry as a reward and looked to Bucky and his mom to make sure they heard.

---

"Ooh!" Bucky's eyes went wide and he kissed his son and praised him. "Berry. Good boy, Christopher. You talk so well. You're going to be such a genius child. I just know it."

Becca finished setting cups on the table and said, "Sure, he still has a hard time saying 'Beh' for me but 'Bay' he can get."

---

Steve chuckled as he set Christopher in his high chair. "That's cause berries make him happy and you boss him around," Steve joked. "Becca is a hard name. The 'k' sound is one of the toughest for young ones to get out."

---

"Yeah, you remember Lilly calling us Bessa and Bussy for about three years," Bucky said and got Sarah May situated in her chair before helping her with her bottle. She was almost at the age where she could start having a few solids but they wanted to wait it out with her for a little longer since sometimes she didn't even want her bottle.

---

"Bussy," Steve snorted in amusement. Sarah May drank down her bottle while the rest of the family ate their breakfasts.

"I'm so happy for you two," Sarah said. "I love the big family you've given me. And my wonderful grandchildren and my favorite girls," she continued.

---

Bucky nodded and looked to Christopher who was happily shoving pancakes into his mouth. "I love my family so much. That includes you, Sarah," he said. "And I can't believe that this Little Bean is a year old. We won't have even had him for a year for another few months. But he is ours now and we get to have this day with him."

---

Sarah smiled and looked around at her growing family. Her friends complained she was hanging out less with them, but she loved her family so damned much and loved spending time with them. "You are such a good father to your children, Bucky. They're lucky to have you."
Steve whined. "What about me, Ma?"

---

"He's alright," Bucky agreed jokingly and gave Steve a little smile.

Christopher jumped to defend his daddy by tossing a syrupy covered bit of pancake at him and yelling, "Dada, Dada!" excitedly.

---

Steve looked at the pancake bit that flopped onto his plate and then picked it up to feed his son. "Yes, Bean, your dada loves you so much. I'm good to you, right? Almost as good as your pop," Steve defended.

Becca finished up her breakfast and put her plate in the sink. "If we go skating do I have to skate too?"

---

Becca had been acting up a little bit the day before, complaining about how the house was going to be too loud for Christopher's birthday. It had escalated into a fight with Bucky and they hadn't really resolved it yet. "I don't care if you just stay here all day," Bucky said with a twinge of annoyance. "Your nephew might want his aunt around for his birthday but he also won't remember today so I don't care what you do."

---

Becca gave Bucky an annoyed look. "Fine, then I'll go to a friend's house all day. I think I'll sleep over there, too. Since you don't care." She crossed her arms and headed out of the kitchen and back up her room.

Sarah gave Bucky a small frown. "That went well," she said calmly.

---

"She doesn't care about him so why should we try to make her interact with him?" Bucky defended lightly. "She's just dealing with us until she can leave and then we won't see her hardly ever again. It's better for Christopher if he learns that his Aunt Becca isn't going to be around much."

---

Lilly stared up at Bucky with a frown. "Becca isn't going to leave us," she said.

Steve didn't have high hopes for Becca being around the family much once she had her freedom, but he also didn't want Lilly to get upset. "She loves us, Lilly. Don't worry. You're gonna see your sister as much as you want."

---

Bucky thought it was best to just stay out of it. This was Christopher's birthday. He didn't want anyone to fight or cause a bigger scene. So he just sighed and got up to give Lilly a kiss on her head as he went to get some more juice in Christopher's sippy cup.

---

Steve shook his head and squeezed Lilly’s arm. "She's just upset right now. It'll be fine. She’s not leaving right now. How about you give Christopher some more fruit and that will make him happy," he suggested.

---

Lilly nodded and tried to push the worry from her mind as she gave Christopher some more strawberries and a piece of cantaloupe that he rejected by spitting out back into her hand. "Eww, Christopher," she giggled. "Don't spit up in my hand."

---

Steve snorted. "It's his birthday. He can do whatever he wants," he said. "Once he's full, we should all get ready for the big day ahead of us," Steve said before going to Bucky.

---

Bucky was cleaning up the table and putting things away. He sighed when Steve came over and brought him into a tight hug. "It's our baby's first birthday," he said really quietly and gave Steve a sad little shake of the head. "And his aunt doesn't even care."

---

"His aunt is being a dumb teenager," Steve answered and kissed Bucky's cheek. "I disagree with her. I think she's wrong for what she's doing. But she will come around one day. There were plenty of things as a teenager you did that weren't good, but you've gotten better."

---

Bucky nodded and sighed. "I just want her to be with us again. To be my little sister like she used to be. To be Lilly's confidant again. To be a good aunt for our kids." He glanced over at Lilly who was holding Christopher on her hip and trying to clean Sarah May's face up at the same time.

---

Steve sighed and played with Bucky's hair lightly. "Sweetheart, it will happen. I promise." He kissed the top of his head. "Not as soon as we would hope, but it'll happen." Then he whispered, "Look at Lilly. She's changing. Look how much she tries to take care of our babies."

---

"Yeah, I guess you are right," Bucky said softly and watched his sister and his kids. "She is really good with them. And they love her." He turned and finished cleaning up and shook his head. "Anyway, I need to let it go for now. Let's get ready to take our boy for a great birthday."

---
Steve nodded. "Go get dressed for the day. I'll get our babies ready," he said. Steve turned to Lilly and thanked her for looking after them before telling her to wash up and get dressed. Next Steve would have to wrestle Christopher into his clothes and a damned hat.

---

Bucky got ready quickly and took over the responsibility of watching Sarah May. Steve had had no problems at all getting her ready to go out. But he was currently trying to carefully wrestle their one-year-old into his coat as he screamed, "No, Dada, no!"

---

"Sweetheart, I hear that you don't wanna wear this," Steve said as he fought one of Christopher's arms carefully into the sleeve of his jacket. "But you will get sick if you don't wear this. This is so you stay healthy and strong on your birthday."

---

"Here," Bucky said and grabbed the little dinosaur plushie that he had gotten for Christopher. "Hold this so Daddy can put your coat on. You love Dan the Dino. And Dan wants you to be all cozy so we can take you out. You can even take Dan with us. How is that?" he asked and let his son take the plushie.

---

Christopher waggled the toy and started to babble at Bucky, eyes locked on him as he had quite a story to tell. Steve laughed once he got him all zipped up. The second he tried putting on the hat, Christopher snapped his head at his dad. "No!" he said firmly.

---

"Hey," Bucky mumbled to Christopher and pet his head. "Come on, Bean. Daddy needs to get the hat on. Let's be good for Daddy." He looked at the back of Christopher's coat and saw it was the one that had a detachable hood. "Steve, where's the hood on this one?"

---

"Diana chewed it up when she was a puppy," Steve groaned. "You think we can button a different hood to it?" They had a few jackets with removable hoods for Christopher.

---

Bucky grumbled and shook his head. "Of course, she did," he set Sarah May into her crib and went to try to find a different hood. "Here. Try this one. It's the same size but a different color. It may work."

---

Steve tried it out and sighed with relief when it mostly worked. "Why do you have to fight the hats, Christopher? They keep you warm." Christopher seemed to ignore Steve in favor of watching his pop walk around. "Can you watch them while I get changed?" Steve asked.
"Yes," Bucky said and took Christopher. "We will go put on shoes downstairs while we wait." He held Christopher on his hip and grabbed Sarah May from her crib and took them both downstairs to get their shoes and found Sarah waiting in her room with the door open looking at pictures of a baby Steve.

Sarah looked up when she heard Bucky pass. She hurried over to show him a picture. "Look! I just found it. It's Steve on his first birthday. I don't think you've seen a picture of his dad before, but that's him," she said. In the picture was a young man proudly holding his son in his arms. Steve was sleeping soundly and the man had a cigarette hanging from his lips. "If it wasn't a cigarette in his mouth, it was a bottle," Sarah sighed with a little laugh.

Bucky looked at the photo and then up at his mother-in-law. He hated that, because of him, Steve knew exactly what it was like to have a husband like Joseph Rogers. He had worked so well in AA and was doing really well but he still smoked. He needed to work on reducing his smoking but it was so hard. He just looked back at baby Steve and his father. "He looks a little like him. I mean, I think Steve's got a lot of you in him. But he looks like his dad, too."

Sarah truly did miss her husband. After his time in the army, he became an alcoholic, but, before that, he was an absolute dream. "I'm glad Steve looks more like me than him. My husband was very handsome, but I would be mad at God for making me carry a baby for nine months, give birth, and have him be a copy of what his father looked like when I did all the work."

Bucky chuckled and gave her a little side hug. "I understand. You made him. You put in the time and energy. The man's part in reproduction isn't difficult at all. My mother used to complain about how she was never comfortable when she was pregnant. Something was always wrong. And she said to my father that he had to do what he could to make himself uncomfortable too. So for a whole week, he slept with a bag filled with ping pong balls under his side of the bed."

"Sounds like your dad did his best to support her," Sarah said. "I wish I could have had more children with my husband, but I suppose one pregnancy is enough torture." She hugged Bucky and went to set the picture back down. "Let me get my coat on and I will be right out."

Bucky let her be and went out to wait in the hall for everyone. He imagined what it would have been like if Steve had younger siblings. How much younger would they be? How many would there be? Would they love and support him like their mother? Would they love their nephew and niece? Would Bucky have gotten the sibling talk - 'If you hurt him I will end you'?
Steve came down a few minutes later dressed up all nice for their outing. "Hey, Love," he greeted. He kissed Bucky's cheek and gave him a hug. Everyone except Becca piled up to the door. "Alright, are we all ready to go? Lilly, can you let Becca know that we're leaving?"

---

Lilly glanced to Steve then to Bucky. "Yeah, sure, I'll be back," she shucked off her coat and ran upstairs to talk to Becca. She was gone for a long time but when she came back, she was followed by Becca dressed up to go outside and looking resigned about the entire thing. But she was at least there.

---

Steve was worried why it was taking so long but when Becca emerged with Lilly, he smiled. "I'm glad you decided to come." He held Christopher, who wiggled in Steve's arms and sung softly to himself as they all filed outside to have their outing. "Zoo or skating first?"

---

Bucky wasn't sure what had changed her mind but he wasn't going to ask and risk her turning right around and heading back home. He just pulled her in to kiss her head and then let her be again. "I think the zoo first. Are we going to the little one here or are we going to go on a day trip to Manhattan?"

---

"Let's stay close to home," Steve said. Once they were outside, Christopher tucked closer to his dad's chest. "Told you that it was cold out, Bean," Steve chuckled. "Do you think they'll have the petting zoo open? Christopher loved it last time but it's not always there."

---

"Probably not," Bucky said and kept a hold on Sarah May who was so bundled up there was no way she could feel any of the cold. "I mean, I guess it's possible but don't hold your breath. I think we will be lucky to see a few cold-climate animals who are still around."

---

"Aw, man," Steve sighed. "No animals for Christopher to pet today. I guess Diana will have to do, right, Bean?" He kissed his boy's cheek. When they got to the zoo, the crowd was very light. There were only a few exhibits available for viewing. "Look there's penguins! See, Baby?"

---

Christopher squealed and tried desperately to get down from his dad's arms. "Dada! Dada!" he yelped and got a few looks and giggles from the other attendees of the zoo and their children.

"Bean, Shh," Bucky chuckled and felt Sarah May tap the palm of her hand on his cheek and whine softly.
Steve laughed. "Yes, I know. It's exciting." He let Christopher go down so he could go to the glass barrier. Christopher didn't seem to realize there was something between him and the penguins and he trotted face first into the glass and fell back on his ass.

---

Christopher didn't cry. He just looked up at his dads with wide confused eyes and a pouty lip. "You're okay, Christopher," Bucky said softly and squatted down by him with Sarah May still in hand. "Get up, Baby. You can watch the penguins but you can't get to them."

---

Becca and Lilly hid their laughter behind their hands. Steve kissed his son's cheek and pet the top of his head. "You got to be careful, son."

A worker saw what happened and rushed over. "Is he okay?" she asked worriedly.

---

Bucky sat down on the ground near Christopher and held Sarah May in his lap. "Yes, he's okay. Thank you. He just gets way too excited sometimes. It's his birthday. And I think he knows that something special is happening." He checked Christopher's head and hoped that he didn't get a bruise.

---

She gasped and then waved at Christopher. "Happy birthday!" she said excitedly. After a moment of consideration, she said, "Don't tell anyone else, but I'm closing this section down in a half hour to feed the penguins. I can let you guys pet one, if you want. Birthday treat."

---

"Bean, did you hear that?" Bucky asked excitedly. "The nice lady is going to let you see one of the penguins. You have to be good, though. Can you do that?" He knew Christopher had no idea what was going on but he could try to get him to understand a little bit.

---

Christopher nodded his head because he could hear the excited tone and wanted whatever his papa was offering to him. The woman laughed and said, "Alright. Enjoy the other exhibits for the time being. The seals are always friendly to visitors."

---

Bucky thanked her and then got up from the ground. He stretched a little and then let Sarah May have her hat off since it was a bit warmer where they were. "Steve, you think it'll be okay for him to touch the penguin? I don't want him to freak out."

---

"Buck, when are any of us ever going to get that close to a penguin again? We should give it a try,"
Steve said. "If he freaks out, we won't let him go near it. Simple as that." Sarah smirked because she knew Steve really wanted to touch the penguin too.

---

"Okay, yeah, yeah, let's let him see the penguin. I'm sure he will be okay. And Ya-Ya might even want to touch it," Bucky said.

---

They headed over to the seals and Christopher stood with his hands on the glass. "Ya-Ya. Ya-Ya, loo!" he said, staring at the animals that swam by. "Woof," he added. Every animal was a dog to him right now.

---

Sarah May only stared at her brother and made fists with her hands uncertainly. She made a quiet little gurgle of a noise and crinkled her eyebrows. "I would tell him not to woof at the seals but I don't know what noises they make," Bucky said.

---

"Don't they make dolphin noises?" Steve offered.

Becca rolled her eyes. "Seals don't make dolphin noises, dolphins make dolphin noises," she answered.

"They make noises like this-" Lilly said, before making an 'arf arf' sound to try to imitate what she had heard on a movie before.

---

Christopher thoroughly enjoyed the seal sounds that Lilly made. He laughed incredibly loudly and tugged on her pants excitedly wanting to be picked up. The worker came back around then and said quietly to Bucky, "If you want to follow me. I'll take your son to see the penguins."

---

Lilly picked up her nephew and continued to make seal sounds at him quietly. Steve perked up when they were approached and quickly nudged Lilly to go follow her. "Oh boy, Bean. Are you going to see the penguins?"

---

Christopher still had no idea what was happening but he loved how eagerly his dad spoke so he nodded and giggled and held on to Lilly tightly as everyone trailed into a large feeding room behind a door marked 'Trainers Only'. Bucky had Sarah May tucked close to his chest and she looked around curiously but also a little nervously because she was unfamiliar with what was happening.

---

The worker had the penguins swarming her because she had a huge bucket of fish. She tossed a few to the birds and after they calmed down, she was able to pick up a baby one since it was easier to manage. "See? He's a baby just like you," she said as she held him out to Christopher.

---

Christopher moved in Lilly's arms frantically trying to get to the penguin. Lilly was fine until he started whining and she promptly handed him over to Steve. Christopher giggled excited and said, "Dada, loo!" And pointed at the baby penguin before gingerly petting its head.

---

"I see, Bean! You're being so nice to the penguin. I'm proud of you. Can Daddy pet the penguin?" Steve asked. Christopher had all eyes on the bird and he shook his head, wanting to keep petting it by himself.

---

"Christopher, can Ya-Ya pet the penguin?" Bucky tried and got Sarah May a little closer to the animal. "Can you show her how, Baby Boy?" He held Sarah May's hand out and reached to have her touch the penguin’s flipper. She was confused but intrigued and made a little whine in her throat but let her Papa direct her hand.

---

Steve stepped back so Sarah May could touch the penguin. "Isn't she so cute? Look at her go," Steve said.

The worker smiled. "She's adorable," she said. "How old is she?"

---

Bucky smiled at his daughter and held her up a little more. "She's around a little more than three months. We aren't sure when she was born exactly. And Christopher is one year today." He glanced up at the worker and saw only kindness in her eyes. She didn't seem off-put by the fact that these kids were his and Steve's together. But maybe she didn't realize they were a couple.

---

"Oh, is she adopted? But she looks just like you. Her hair is so similar." the worker said. She looked at Christopher and to Steve then back to Bucky, seeming to finally put the pieces together. "Oh! You're not two families, are you?" She didn't seem upset or disgusted by it. She seemed surprised and a little excited over seeing a new kind of family.

---

Bucky chuckled nervously and looked to Steve then their son. "Yeah, this is our family. Our kids." He smiled over at Steve then the woman again. "And my sisters and Steve's mother." He introduced them in turn and hugged Sarah May closer as she turned to get away from the penguin, decidedly uninterested in it anymore.
"It's so nice that you have such a big family," she said. "I can't believe you have kids. I mean... I don't think there's anything wrong with it. But I've never heard of it happening before." The woman smiled softly. "It looks like your daughter isn't as big of a fan of penguins."

---

Bucky nodded and reached out his hand to shake hers. "Steve and I are very grateful for our family. And I appreciate you letting us come see this penguin. Christopher really likes it. Don't you, Bean?"

---

"Hey, a birthday is only once a year. We all got to do our part to make it special, right?" She smiled. "I got to scoot you guys out of here, though. I'm sorry. We have to open the exhibit back up for everyone else."

---

Bucky thanked her again and they were shown back out to the main hall. Bucky leaned over to Christopher to give him a little kiss and then he handed Sarah May to Lilly. "That was pretty amazing, Steve," he said and gave him a nudge. "I think the kids liked it."

---

Steve was grinning from ear to ear. He cuddled his son against his chest. "That was amazing!" he agreed. "And you guys were all ready to skip past the zoo. I don't think the skating rink will be able to beat petting penguins. Penguins! Can you believe it?"

---

Lilly gave Sarah May back to Bucky after he got his coat zipped back up. She yawned and reached up for Bucky's hair, tugging gently. Christopher giggled and bounced in Steve's arms, reaching towards his sister. "I think it was a good call to come here."

---

Steve moved closer so Christopher could grab his little sister's arm and babble at her excitedly. He seemed to realize more day by day that Sarah May was going to be his best friend around here. "Do we want to see anything else here or should we go skating?"

---

"I'm ready to go skating," Bucky said and looked to Lilly and Becca. "You two want to go skating?"

Becca shrugged but Lilly was very much for it. "Yes! But can we get hot chocolate at some point? I know we have cake for Christopher's party later but hot chocolate sounds so good right now. Don't you think?"

---

Steve played with Christopher's little hands. "I don't know. I'm not really feeling like hot chocolate. The weather isn't right for it," Steve said in an aloof tone, clearly messing around with Lilly just because it was fun. Sarah smirked because she used to do the same with her son.
"That's fine, Steven," Lilly said and turned her nose up. "I made ten dollars selling some books at school so I'll have enough for hot chocolate for the next week and a half."

Becca squinted at Lilly and said, "No, you have five dollars. Because you owe me five from those days you forgot to grab your lunch and had to buy school lunch."

"Spoilsport," Lilly complained.

Steve chuckled and gave them both a small nudge. "We can get hot chocolate on our way home, but first we are going to the rink to skate," Steve said. He walked back outside and as soon as a gust of wind blew by, Christopher let out a shudder and pressed against Steve.

Bucky looked over and saw Christopher's hood was halfway off again. "Steve, his hood," he chuckled and pointed at it. "You know, Bean, you wouldn't be so cold if you just wore a hat instead. Look at Ya-Ya. She lets us put hats on her." Sarah May looked up at him from her place tucked into his jacket. She was perfectly warm how she was.

Steve started to put his hood back on and Christopher whined and pushed it off. "Dada," he huffed out softly. Steve let out a resigned sigh and instead used his free hand to cover the back of Christopher's head from the cold. "This kid is quickly getting a stubborn mind of his own."

"He picks it up from you, Babe," Bucky muttered with a little smile. When they got to the ice rink, Bucky gave Lilly the money to get skates for everyone and they all waited next to some heating vents inside the rental place to get warmed up. "Steve, I think we need to buy some of those baby carriers. You know the ones that go on your chest? Because more often than not, Sarah May needs to be in my coat and it would be easier if I didn't have to hold her steady."

Steve looked over to their little girl and nodded. Steve preferred to hold them with his own arms but he agreed that it would be easier to move about and multitask when they didn't have to hold them steady. And on top of that, the kids would only get bigger and heavier and would tire them out. "Sure," he said. "I'll get one for them next time I'm shopping," he agreed.

"Thank you," Bucky said. "I know you're taking Christopher into the toddler and parent rink. I don't think Ya-Ya should go in because she can't even stand. So I'll just sit on the bench and watch you guys. How's that?"
Steve cuddled his little boy. "I'll do that. But we should trade off, Buck. You deserve to have some fun with Christopher on his birthday and I'll sit with Sarah May for some of the time, too. Wouldn't that be better?"

---

"I'm more than happy to let you skate with him, Steve," Bucky said. "I'll just hog him later during his party. You know Clint is going to want to keep him to himself so I'll just be the pushy father who steals my son back from my best friend." He grinned and watched Lilly come over with several pairs of skates slung over her shoulder. "Is Sam going to be able to make it?"

---

Steve wasn't going to argue. He wanted to spend as much time with his son as possible. He kissed the top of his head. "Yeah, Sam is coming but he's going to be late. I think I'm going to take a tally of how many times Christopher goes between you and Clint. Almost as many times as he's going to hint to Natasha how much he wants kids."

---

"Hey, if Clint wants to hold our children, then he can come over and visit more. I want to hold my boy on his birthday," Bucky said. Sarah May hiccupped and yawned and burrowed farther into Bucky's coat. "I think Nat could handle a baby who was quiet like Sarah May. Christopher is a little much for her but she at least will hold Sarah May sometimes."

---

"Problem is you can't tell if a baby is going to be quiet or not. Christopher was silent as anything when he first came here. Now he has a heck of a lot to tell us. Steve set their son down so he could get him into his skates. Christopher sat there watching his feet curiously.

---

Bucky nodded. "I just know that Clint loves Natasha so much but he also wants to have a child. I'm guessing he would be fine with adopting a baby but, even then, Natasha would have to be on board with it." He sighed. "But let's not think about that right now because I'm going to get bummered out."

---

Steve put his skates on his own feet. Christopher tried to stand but he couldn't with the skates on and he babbled up at Steve as if to ask what the hell was going on. Steve snorted and picked him up. "Yeah. We will let them figure that out. Alright. Let's go, this is going to be adorable."

---

"You got it," Bucky said. They all made their way out to the rink. Lilly and Becca headed towards the normal rink with Sarah. Bucky took up residence on a bench near the toddler rink, waiting patiently to see Christopher's first step on the ice.

---
Steve helped Christopher into the rink. He held him up by his hands and made sure Christopher kept his balance. He kept trying to walk normal but would slip and slide. He would've fallen if Steve hadn't been holding on to him. "Dada?" he asked in a confused and slightly distressed tone because he didn't understand.

---

Bucky laughed even though he felt bad about it. He could tell that Christopher was going to take a minute to get used to skating. He watched Steve’s smile get bigger and his heart clenched with how much he loved him and their kids. "Steve, you two look great!"

---

"Look, Bean! Slide your feet!" Steve said, guiding his legs so it would hopefully make a little more sense. Christopher didn't quite get it but he didn't seem as upset as before. "I think it's going to be a while before he does this on his own," Steve said as he skated closer to Bucky.

---

Bucky got up from the bench and came closer to the edge of the rink to lean on it with Sarah May on his hip. There was no one else in the toddler rink with Steve and Christopher so Bucky wasn't nervous to come up and speak openly. "He's doing okay, though." He grinned and watched Sarah May reach out to touch Steve's arm. "I think she wants you," he said. "She hasn't had much Daddy time today."

---

Steve's heart melted when his daughter reached out to him. He picked Christopher up and then leaned over to kiss his daughter's cheek. "Hello, Beautiful! I promise I'll hold you lots today when your papa has your brother," he said sweetly. "It's incredible, Bucky. I can't believe how much they trust us."

---

"They are our babies. Of course, they trust us. We take care of them and we love them and make sure they are safe and happy," Bucky said warmly and let Sarah May bring his finger to her mouth to suck on it. "And this one is hungry."

---

"I know, but still... it's amazing that we get to be the people that give them their world until they learn to make it on their own." Steve set Christopher back down. "Let's skate some more, Bean. But don't be too cute for a little while, your pop has to go feed your sister."

---

Bucky left to go back inside. He got their bag and some baby food and applesauce that he brought with them. "You are such a strong girl, Ya-Ya. Yes, you are. And Papa is so proud of you. And so is Daddy. And you can be with Daddy all evening, okay? I know you want him."
Sarah came over to Bucky when she needed a break from skating. "Look at her," she said fondly. "Soon enough she's going to be feeding herself. And then what are you going to do?" She chuckled. "Want me to hold her so you can skate?"

---

"Once that happens, we will get a new baby. I don't think Steve and I could handle not having an infant that we need to care for like this," Bucky said. He let Sarah take his spot and he gave his daughter a kiss. "Okay, Ya-Ya, be good for Nana while I skate with your aunts."

---

Sarah laughed. "Babies can be a little addicting. I was always a little sad whenever Steve passed a milestone that meant I wouldn't be able to take care of him like I did before." She cuddled her granddaughter while Bucky went to spend some time on the ice.

---

Bucky went out and found his sisters. "Hey!" he shouted and zoomed past Lilly. "Bet you can't beat me three rounds around the ring, Lil!"

"You're on, Buck!" Lilly shouted back and skated faster, easily catching up to Bucky. Since they got back from Seneca, she had been going to skate when she could and got really good at it really quickly. Bucky wasn’t that surprised since she picked up other sports pretty easily.

---

“You two are children!” Becca shouted and took her time as her siblings raced each other.

"You're not as fast as you used to be," Lilly said with a challenging smirk. "Raising babies is making you an old man, Bucky," she snickered as she smoothly glided past him.

---

"I've been an old man since the day you were born then, Lilly!" Bucky shouted back and tried to speed up. But in the end, Lilly did win. As much as Bucky liked to think he was faster, Lilly was far more agile and athletic in comparison.

---

Lilly let out a triumphant shout that made a few people turn their heads when she beat her brother. "Hah! Take that, Bucky!" she said as she punched the air.

---

Bucky stopped and leaned against the edge of the rink, just watching Lilly's victory lap. Becca was going slow and just skating casually. Bucky could tell she liked it even if she originally hadn't wanted to be there. He also figured that Lilly was the one to convince Becca to come with them. Bucky was just glad she was there. He slowly made his way out of the adult rink and over to the toddler rink where Steve and Christopher were still the only ones around. "How is our sweet boy doing? Your mom has Sarah May."
Christopher seemed to understand at this point that he couldn't walk like normal when he was on this strange floor but he still couldn't skate on his own. "I think he's having fun with the challenge," Steve said. "Isn't he adorable? Look at how hard he's trying."

Bucky watched his son as he was being held up by Steve. He moved his feet ever so slightly and stared at Bucky with curious but no longer nervous eyes, as if he figured that his dad didn't have the answers as to what's going on so maybe his pops did. "Have you tried letting him move on his own? He may be able to take a step or travel a few inches."

"I don't want him to fall," Steve said with a pout. But after a look from Bucky, he carefully let go of Christopher's arms. As soon as he realized he was standing alone, Christopher started shouting and bent his knees before straightening up to try and move but he didn't budge an inch.

"There you go! See, he's fine. Good job, Bean," Bucky said and carefully got into the rink and squatted down across from his son. "Come on, Christopher, skate to me. You can do it." He reached out his arms for him and waited with an excited face. Their boy was growing up and he couldn't believe it.

Christopher got excited when he saw his papa come into the rink. He tried to run to him in his haste and almost fell forward but Steve caught him. Their son giggled and tried again but would maybe get a few inches closer before Steve had to catch him from falling.

Bucky kept his arms out for his son. Steve would right him every time he almost face-planted but then, eventually, Christopher made it to Bucky and he jumped right into his arms and squealed. "Oh, good boy! Look at my strong bean. You made it all the way to me!"

Christopher burst out into big, belly laughs when he finally made it to Bucky. "Papa!" he shouted excitedly and then hugged him around the neck. "He's so darn cute," Steve said.

Bucky held him close and kissed his cold cheeks. He saw Becca out of the corner of his eye head back inside. "You think we should head out soon? I know Lilly is still going but I can always bring her back some other time. The babies will need naps soon and we still want to go visit Grant and my parents."
Steve put his hand on Christopher's back and kissed the top of his head. "We should, yeah," he said. "I don't want to have to cut Grant off short. He deserves to see his big brother on his birthday." He stepped out of the rink and started to unlace his ice skates.

---

"Okay," Bucky said. "You want to call our monster back in? She will get less mad at you for telling her to stop skating than she will if I tell her." He sat down on the bench next to Steve and sat Christopher beside him as he took off his skates and then his son's tiny skates.

---

"Sure thing," Steve said. He gave Bucky's shoulder a squeeze because that was the closest thing to kissing he could do in public. Steve went over to the other rink and told the Lilly that she had to come in. Lilly complained and whined but eventually made her way slowly to the door.

---

A little while later, they got to the cemetery and went over to the graves. Grant was protected right next to Bucky's parents and he knew that his son and his parents were happy to see them. Then Bucky noticed a set of fresh flowers on Grant's grave. It wasn't the kind that Steve usually brought when they visited. They were bright pink and yellow and looked like they had only been there about a day since they weren't covered in snow.

---

Steve was surprised to see the flowers there and he looked to Bucky. "Do you think Natasha and Clint stopped by?" he asked. Steve usually got white or blue flowers for their little boy and he knew that Bucky had been too busy with Christopher's birthday to visit. "Who else could've visited today?"

---

Bucky shook his head. He had no idea. Then it occurred to him that Missy's birthday was in February. He didn't know what day it was but he knew it was February. "Steve..." Bucky whispered and looked up at him. "Missy's birthday in this month. Her aunt must have come by." Missy's grave was in a plot on the other side of town, nearer to her aunt's house. Bucky needed to go visit her sometime for her birthday. But he was surprised that her aunt would come this far just for Grant.

---

Steve gave Bucky a surprised look. Of course. Barbara was a good woman who did her best to try and give Missy a second chance. At first, Steve had been bitter and upset over Missy self-destructing and taking their son with her. But now he felt it all was an awful tragedy. He felt himself tear up a bit and he rubbed at his eyes. "We should visit her."

---

"Hey, hey," Bucky shook his head and pulled Steve in for a side hug so he wouldn't squish Sarah May. "It's okay, Baby. I was planning on visiting her and you can come along if you want but you don't have to." He knew Steve was still angry at Missy at least a little bit. Bucky had been too but he also understood how addiction worked. He was more angry with himself for not being able to help.
Steve rested his cheek on Bucky's head. "I want to go. I want to do it for her and for her aunt," Steve said. He knelt down at his son's grave. "Hey, Grant, hey, Baby Boy. I hope you're having fun with your Granny and Papaw," he said softly. "Christopher turns one today. He's growing up so fast."

Bucky smiled softly at his husband and then took Christopher from Sarah in one arm so he could kneel down next to Steve with all their children together. "Grant, I have your brother and sister. Christopher is very excited today. Ya-Ya isn't quite yet aware of what's happening so she's a little more tired. I'm betting Papaw and Granny have been cherishing every day they have gotten with you. And Daddy and I can't wait to get to see you again."

Steve sniffled a little. He still cried pretty much every time he came here. He couldn't help it. He wished he had all three squirming little babies in his arms. Grant could've been a big, chubby baby. Or maybe he would've been tiny like Sarah May. People could've confused them for twins since they were so close in age. After a little while, Steve had to stand and pace a few feet back because it hurt too much to see his name on the grave.

Bucky watched Steve move away and he decided it was best to let him have a couple moments to himself. "Baby Boy," Bucky started and wiped his eyes. "You would be five months old here pretty soon. You and Ya-Ya would have made the same milestones together. We would have to have taken an even bigger car to Seneca to fit everyone and the dog. Oh, Grant, Baby, you would love the dog. I hope you aren't allergic. She's really playful and gentle."

Sarah went to go comfort her son while Becca and Lilly were talking to their parents but after a few moments Lilly walked over to Bucky and sat down next to him. She rested her head on his shoulder. "Are you okay?" she asked.

"No," Bucky whispered. He still had both babies in his lap and Christopher was getting restless as Sarah May was falling asleep. "I want them all back," he added a little louder. I want Mom and Dad celebrating their grandson's birthday. I want Mom to be holding Sarah May as she sleeps and Dad is helping cut the cake because I've got to make sure Christopher doesn't throw his food and Grant just won't let Steve put him in his high chair cause he wants his Daddy." Bucky started openly crying then and he squeezed his kids closer to him. "I want Missy back, too. I want her coming to AA and NA and getting better and asking for my help. I want to see her get a job and an apartment and be her own person again."

Lilly started to tear up as well because she wanted her parents back, too, and she hated seeing Bucky this upset. She sat up on her knees so she could hug him around his shoulders and she kissed his cheek. "I want them back, too," she said softly. "I wish I got to meet Grant. It would have been really loud with three babies but I know he would've been really good."

---

"He was so beautiful," Bucky said and choked on a sob. "Such a precious little boy. He just wanted a home and to be protected and cared for." Bucky touched the gravestone carefully. "Your Daddy and I would have kept you safe. We love you so much and not a day goes by that we don't miss you. I see your little face when I sleep sometimes. And I hear the..." his voice broke and he looked away. "...the monitor flat-lining and I see Missy and you on those beds. Just calling out for me to bring you back but I can't."

---

"He would have loved living with us," Lilly said, trying her best to be supportive. "I could've shown him how to play ball. Steve wants his baseball team, right?"

Steve came over when he saw his husband crying and he stood behind him so he could stroke his hair. Christopher whined and tried to climb up Bucky’s chest but all he was doing was annoying Sarah May and making her whine.

---

Bucky sniffled and nodded. He loved his family so much. He loved how supportive they were. And he loved those he had lost too. And one day he would be back with them. And everyone would be back together again. He just wished it could be now. He sighed and gently touched the flowers. "Grant, Baby, we need to go. Daddy and I will be back in a few days. I'll see you and Papaw and Gran then. Okay? Be a good boy for them, please."

---

Steve picked up Christopher so he would stop bothering his sister, who was about two seconds from crying. "I'll bring some pretty flowers to make your bed look even nicer," Steve promised. He kissed his son's cheek and bounced him lightly in his arms. "Come here and give me a hug, Buck," Steve said softly to his husband.

---

Bucky wiped his eyes and gently held Sarah May as he got up and pressed himself to Steve. He just clung to him and let himself cry. He wasn't sure if there were other people in the cemetery but he didn't really care at the moment. He just hugged his husband and then looked up into Steve's own red, tearful eyes and gave a weak little smile.

---

Steve wrapped his arm around Bucky and gently pet the back of his head. "I love you, Bucky. I miss our boy, too. And I'm sorry you're missing your parents and Missy," he said.

---

"I love you too," Bucky said. "I know you are missing our baby boy. And we will come back in a few days. We can go to Missy and then come to Grant and just stay a while and talk to him. Just the two of us. But, for now, I think Ya-Ya needs a nap and Christopher is dying for us to pay attention to him again."

---

Steve nodded and kissed Christopher's face a few times and promised that they would play when they got home. Christopher recognized the word ‘play’ and stopped fussing so much. "When we get home, I can put Sarah May down so you can focus on the birthday boy," Sarah offered.

---

"Thank you, Sarah. I'll take you up on that," Bucky agreed and held his daughter close. She was already asleep in his arms and he didn't want to jostle her too much on their way back home. "She might need a diaper change so I can do that first if you want me to."

---

"Don't worry about it," Sarah said. She didn't mind doing diaper changes and she knew that Bucky and Steve weren't feeling their best right now. "I'll take care of that too. You just focus on Christopher for now and giving him a good birthday."
Chapter Summary

Second half of Christopher's birthday.

When they were finally home again, Diana barked and excitedly pranced around at their arrival. Bucky handed Sarah May off to Steve's mother. Then he took Christopher from Steve. "I'm going to get him a snack and then we are going to play a bit. Can you call Tim and make sure he brings Christopher's shoes that he found at work. He took them home and forgot to bring them to me the other day."

Steve nodded and went to call Tim. Christopher exploded into conversation with Bucky and got even more excited when he realized that it was snack time. "Papa," he said and then signed that he was hungry a few times. Christopher was almost always hungry.

"What do you want, Bean?" Bucky asked. "Carrots or strawberries or banana bits or broccoli or oranges?" He smiled and nodded every time he sat a new piece of food in front of his son. "Which one do you want, Little Bean? Whatever you don't want, I'm giving to Daddy because he needs snacks too. And whatever Daddy doesn't want, Papa will eat." He spoke like he was just so excited to have a snack with his son. And he loved the giggles it got out of Christopher.

Christopher focused really hard when he saw Bucky hold up the bananas for him. "Ba....bana," he babbled at Bucky, reaching for the fruit. Steve came in just after and stood behind Bucky so he could rub his shoulders lightly.

Bucky peeled the banana and ripped off bits for Christopher. He leaned back into Steve and felt strong hands rub his tired, tense shoulders. "He picked the banana. What do you want? I want the strawberries if you don't."

Christopher mashed the bananas in his fingers before eating it as messily as possible. "You can have the strawberries. I'm more in the mood for grapes." Steve was fine with either and would prefer Bucky to be able to have what he wanted right now.

"Okay," Bucky said and tilted his head back to look up at Steve. "Kiss me," he requested and smiled.
up at him. "And then help me clean up his face because that child can't eat bananas without covering himself in them."

---

Steve leaned down and pressed their lips together. "I love you so much, Handsome," he said. "And I'm so happy we can celebrate our son's birthday." He rubbed his hand up and down Bucky's side once and got a wet paper towel to clean Christopher's face.

---

Christopher was a little grumpy about having to have his face cleaned but he let his dad do it anyway. "Dada, no, no, no," he grumped the entire time and then let out a little huff of annoyance once it was all done.

---

"Yes, yes, yes," Steve said with a laugh. "You have to get that mess off your face, Bean." He kissed his cheek once it was clean and let Bucky pick him up.

---

"Let's go play while Ya-Ya is napping. Soon some friends will be over and Nana will have dinner and cake all made up for your party," Bucky said and squeezed Christopher's little hand in his for a moment.

---

Steve gasped excitedly and said, "Is Papa gonna play blocks with you? Are you gonna build with your pop and then knock them all down?"

---

"Yes, we are!" Bucky said and went to the living room. He started setting blocks up on the ground. Diana came over and laid down behind Christopher. "Bean, can you ask Daddy if he wants to play?"

---

Christopher made himself comfy on the floor with his pop and was about to play. But then he picked up a block and went tottering over to Steve. "Dada!" he called up at him before handing the block over. He tugged on his pant leg and Steve pretended to not understand for a moment until Christopher said 'play'.

Steve sat down next to his husband and placed his block on top of another. "He's getting so smart, Buck."

---

"He is so smart," Bucky agreed and lined up three different colored blocks. "Christopher, red," he said and waited to see if he had gotten any better at colors yet.

Christopher looked up a second and then down at the blocks and then hoisted up one red block.
Steve gasped. "Good boy, Christopher. You are so smart!" he said proudly to his son, who laughed and wiggled the block in the air.

"Papa!" he repeated again and held the block out for Bucky to take.

Bucky took the block and held it close. "For me? Thank you, Bean. Can you give Daddy the blue block?" he asked and pointed to Steve. "Blue, Christopher."

Christopher thought for a second and then lifted up the green block and thrust it out to Steve. "Dada!"

“Oh, maybe the red one was a coincidence,” Steve laughed when Christopher held up the green one. "Thank you, son. I love green," he said. He picked up the blue block and handed it to Christopher. "Here, have the blue block. Blue." He smiled over to Bucky. "How did we manage to get such a perfect family?"

"I don't know," Bucky said and started building a foundation for a block tower. "I'm thinking it's got to do with how much we were made for each other, and how much we wanted this life, and probably a little of your god helping us out."

"And now we may have Sarah May's god's blessing, too. Even though, they're kind of the same person, right? Or is that not correct?" Steve wondered and tried to remember what he had learned about other religions when he was in school. "Well, regardless, doesn't hurt to have an extra deity looking down on us."

A few minutes later there was a knock on the door as Natasha and Clint arrived, causing Diana to prance and bark. Bucky got up and picked up Christopher. "Come on, Bean, let's go great your guests. Are you going to be a good host? Gonna invite them in?" he asked and looked to Steve. "Do you want to get Ya-Ya while I let them in?" He gave Steve a kiss and then went to open the door.

"Sure thing," Steve said. When Bucky opened the door, Natasha and Clint greeted Christopher excitedly. The little boy squealed and waved at the two of them. He signed hello to Clint because it had become second nature to know that Clint liked signing over talking.

"Hey, guys," Bucky said warmly. "Come on in. Steve is getting Sarah May." He led them into the kitchen where Diana decided to jump on them and bark repeatedly with her tail wagging so hard she hit Bucky's leg pretty hard. Raphael was, naturally, hiding out of sight. Clint reached for Christopher and Bucky sighed and handed him over. "You may hold him, you may not keep him. You and me and Tim are all going to be fighting over him tonight."

---

"I'm keeping him," Clint said decidedly. "Isn't that right, Christopher?" Clint started to sign over to Christopher and smiled down at him because he loved the little guy so much.

Steve came downstairs with their daughter. Diana followed along Steve's side and nosed at his leg. "Hey, Nat," Steve greeted. "Want me to put your coats away?"

---

"I got it, Baby," Bucky said and picked up Natasha and Clint's coats. "Tim should be here soon. And Sam is still coming later, right? Should we wait to have dinner until he gets here? I don't know if Lilly could handle that."

---

"Yeah, Sam is coming but he's not going to be able to do dinner," Steve said. "Once Tim shows up, we can have dinner." He kissed Bucky's cheek.

"So what have you done today?" Natasha asked Bucky.

---

Bucky turned to Natasha and said, "Well, we went to the zoo and a trainer let us into the feed room and we all got to pet a baby penguin. Christopher was very excited. So was Steve. Sarah May was confused about the whole thing, I think. Then we went ice-skating. And then we visited Grant and my parents. Steve and I shared a breakdown and then we came home and we've been playing with blocks and waited for you guys."

---

Nat glanced over at her boyfriend and the birthday boy before looking back at Bucky. "Sounds like someone had a good day so far. It's a shame they don't remember stuff when they're this young, you know? I guess you have to wait until three or four, yeah?"

---

"Yeah, it would be nice if he got to remember his first birthday. But that's okay. He will have tons more birthdays," Bucky said with a little grin. "I'll go ahead and help him set the table. Tim should be here soon."

---

Tim arrived a few moments later and after greeting everyone, went to go find Raphael since he loved cats. It took a few minutes to get him to come back to the kitchen with everyone else. The house was loud but full of life and Steve looked so happy to have everyone here.

---

They all couldn't fit around the table so they just sort of moved whatever chairs they could into the kitchen and had everyone sit down. It was cozy and intimate. "Okay, Steve, do you want to pray then I'll read the Jewish prayer." He had gotten a few things from a rabbi and had been practicing learning how to say them so he could do that for Sarah May. It was difficult to get the words right but he was getting better as time went on.

---

Steve took his usual spot next to Bucky and squeezed his knee. He said a prayer, thanking God for the food and for bringing them all together in good health. He rubbed Bucky's back encouragingly as he recited a Jewish prayer, incredibly proud of Bucky for being so involved in Sarah May's heritage.
Clint was the first to dig into his dinner once the prayers were done.

"Bucky," Lilly asked, "Becca says that babies can't remember stuff until they're like...five. Is that true? Because I feel like I remember stuff from when I was three."

---

"Well, I don't honestly know the answer to that, Lil," Bucky said. "I guess if Becca says they don't remember until they are five then that's probably right."

Becca squinted her eyes at Lilly and shook his head. "What do you even think you remember from three years old?"

---

Lilly turned casually to Becca and said slyly, "I remember you picking your nose so deep it was like you were scratching your brain."

Becca blushed and shot her an annoyed look. "You're making that up," she accused and got even huffier when Lilly started mimic picking her nose.

---

"Alright, alright, gross, stop it," Bucky said and reached across Steve to pull Lilly's finger down.
"Becca was five when you were three. I think that excuses the nose-picking. Also, Lilly, I saw you pick your nose like three weeks ago while you were watching TV."

---

It was Lilly's turn to blush and Becca snickered. "I see Bucky pick his nose every day," Clint joked.
"He thinks no one can see him in the back room. But I see all." Christopher mashed his dinner into his face as he chatted baby babble to join the conversation, not wanting to be left out.

---

"Yes, Clint, the difference is that I'm not ashamed," Bucky said with a sly smile and took his napkin to start wiping off Christopher's face. "I may have married a perfect gentleman, but not even he can tame the dirty hippie that I am and always will be."

---

"Papa," Christopher said in mild frustration. He was perfectly happy to wear his dinner and didn't want to be cleaned. Steve rubbed his hand over Bucky's back. "I know I married a dirty hippie and I'm proud of it. He's the best guy I could ever ask for."
"Thank you, Baby," Bucky said happily and kissed Steve's cheek. He looked over to Tim then and made eye contact. "Alright, Timmy my man. You haven't been around lately and I haven't worked with you for weeks. Somehow I always get saddled with Reggie." He glared at Clint for a second. "Anyway, tell us how it's been with that guy... um, Joel, is it?"

Tim smiled shyly. "Things are going okay. We are still together and he's cleaning up. He's still struggling, though," he answered. "I wish I could bring him down to meet you guys but I don't want to have him around kids yet, you know?"

Bucky nodded and gave an apologetic and understanding little smile. He knew how hard it was to let go of addiction. He had had his fair share in that department. "Well, we appreciate it. Right, Steve? And we are more than happy to meet him when you believe he is ready. It's really important that you support him so much. I admire you for not giving up on his care."

Steve held Bucky's hand. "Yeah. We would be happy to meet him. Maybe we can go out to dinner sometime so we can get to know him in a setting that doesn't have kids," he suggested.

"That could work," Tim said and gave a thankful smile. "I think you guys would like him. He just needs some extra patience and understanding. I haven't told my kids or my ex-wife about him yet, though. I'm too worried what will happen. It was hard enough to get the custody I got."

"Yeah," Steve said. "I'm sorry you can't tell your kids about him, but I don't blame you." Steve remembered how heartbreaking it had been to be away from his son for the couple days that Bucky kicked him out of the house. Tim had dealt with much worse than that.

Tim shook his head and smiled. "Anyway, that's not really a pleasant thought for right now. It's a birthday! Christopher should be telling us about something. How about it? What's on your mind, little one?" Christopher just reached a food-covered hand towards Tim and burped. "Good story, Kid," Tim replied.

Steve let out a laugh at his son, who smiled up at them because he knew he did something cute judging by their reactions. Sarah tried to clean him up again but Christopher pulled his hands back and complained at his nana. "That boy is going to make such a mess to clean up," Steve chuckled. "Taking after his papa."

"I've got to have some messy kids," Bucky said and pet his son's hair. "It wouldn't be fair if all of them are neat like you. I don't want to be outnumbered. I'm used to living with messy Barnes' all my life. Don't want my kids and husband to take over."

"Yeah, Steve takes over everything," Lilly agreed. "Who takes their shoes off at the door? I don't want to walk barefoot all the time. It's cold."

Steve pouted. "That's what the slippers are for."

Sarah turned and explained to their guests, "My boy thinks that just because I raised him one way, that way must be the only right way. It's endearing but it causes some arguments."

"Baby, those slippers are embarrassing," Bucky said and squeezed Steve's leg. "That's why Becca hides them when you aren't here."

"That's why Becca hides them when you aren't here," Bucky looked back over to their friends and grinned at Clint. "I mean, I'm not a mess all the time. I'm really organized at work. Right, guys? I make sure the store looks great. I mean we all spend most of our time fixing what Reggie and those other two mess up."

"But the rabbit ears are adorable," Steve whined under his breath. He really did have a bad habit of picking out horrible clothes just because they had animal ears or faces on them.

"Yeah, the store looks great," Tim agreed. "Until the customers put everything out of order."

Natasha spoke up and looked to Steve. "So, Steve, you'll never believe what happened at the precinct the other day. You remember Richard? He's the one who arrested Clint and Bucky last year in May because they looked like those burglars we were looking for."

Sometimes Steve avoided hanging out with Natasha or Sam because he missed being a police officer so much and he didn't want to feel that pang in his stomach when something happened that he would've usually known by now. "Yeah, I remember. What happened?" he asked, keeping his face neutral.

Natasha grinned and set her fork down so she could lean in a little closer. "He came out. Stood up in front of us after a briefing and said he figured out he was gay. He told us he felt confident telling us because of you. You were kind of his inspiration. And he admitted to me later that you were part of the reason he questioned his sexuality to begin with and he had a big crush on you."

Steve certainly hadn't been expecting that. He looked over to Bucky in shock and then to Clint to confirm that she wasn't joking. "Wait... really?" Fury must have been having a field day with being the chief to the gayest police force in the city – first him, then Susan, now Richard. "Did he always have a crush on me?"

Natasha nodded and sat back again. "I'm not joking. It happened. Fury glared at him for a long moment and said, 'Alright, kid, come to my office so I can give you the same speech I gave Rogers.' He looked terrified. But everyone responded to him pretty well. You sort paved the way after you came out. I don't how long he was crushing on you but he was. Still is, apparently. Says he misses you."

---

Steve laughed. He remembered the talk Fury had with him and, while he had been nervous for that talk as well, everything went much better than he thought it would. He felt a bit proud of himself for being open with who he was because now other people wouldn't feel the need to hide. "You can tell him that he's welcome to come to events at the shelter. Maybe he'll even meet someone he likes there."

---

Bucky's head shot up and he looked to Natasha, shaking his head. "Tell him the husband says he is allowed to come to events at the shelter if he doesn't still have a crush on Steve or if Steve isn't there. That or he should be prepared to face me if he flirts. He put my ass in jail, I'm not letting him hit on my husband too."

---

"Buck-" Steve said, getting a bit flustered. He supposed it was fair for Bucky to get defensive about making sure someone wasn't crushing on his husband - especially when that someone arrested him wrongfully. However, Steve couldn't help but be a bit sensitive over it and Bucky's jealousy after the whole Tish thing.

---

"I'm just saying," Bucky said defensively but quietly back. "Of course, he's welcome to come to the shelter. That's why we have it. And I'm sure he will make friends. Maybe even meet someone nice like Tim." He shrugged and hoped Steve would move on. He felt sort of bad about his outburst but he also felt his concern was justified. Too many people wanted Steve.

---

Clint looked a bit guilty because he was the one who helped feed into the misunderstanding that Steve was cheating with Tish. It was partly his fault Bucky's paranoid jealousy issues got worse.

"We should do some sort of social event there," Steve said. "Make it so that it can be a bunch of people from both in and out of the shelter can get to know each other."

---

Tim piped up happily. "Yes! I was sort of hoping you would think so. I was thinking of a gay dating event. Maybe. Get a lot of people in and have three to five-minute mini date things and have snacks and drinks and stuff like that. What do you think? It's your shelter."

---

"Dates?" Steve asked. He wasn't sure if he wanted to have dating involved with an event run outside of a church. "Maybe... five-minute friendly conversations, no romantic dating? And if they get a date out of it, then so be it. There are some younger kids there who may want to get to know other people like them, but I wouldn't want them set up on a five-minute date with an older adult."
"Oh, yeah, that's true," Tim said, a little embarrassed he even brought it up. "We can just think of something else. I'll help how I can."

Bucky could tell that Tim felt ashamed. For all his charm and boldness at first, he was also easily shut down and he felt guilty about everything. He had a hard time taking criticism at work. He would just start apologizing for everything and not make eye contact. He was like a puppy.

Steve caught on to the fact that Tim was embarrassed. "I think it was still a good idea," he said. "We just got to modify it to make it more age-appropriate. You should write down more of your ideas when you get them so we can do more future events. You know the best out of everyone what the people in the shelter need and what would make them happy."

Tim nodded awkwardly and Clint clapped him on the back before saying, "I think we have all pretty much finished with dinner. Is it time for cake now, finally? I heard Mrs. Rogers was making the cake and you know how much I love your cake, ma'am."

"I had to make two cakes since there were so many of us," Sarah said happily. She never looked old and tired but Steve noticed she looked a lot younger and livelier ever since she moved in with her big family – today, especially. Steve helped her clean up and she put the cakes on the table. "We have to sing happy birthday to Christopher first. Bucky, you and Steve have to stand next to him so I can take a picture of all three of you."

Bucky obediently and happily got up and stood next to his son, leaning down to give him a kiss and fix his hair. "Steve, Baby, can you hold Ya-Ya so she's in her brother's first birthday pictures, please? I don't want her to be forgotten about."

Steve picked up their daughter and cuddled her close. "We need one with everyone first," Steve insisted. It was a tight squeeze but Sarah took a picture of the whole table, then Becca took a picture of the babies, their parents, and Sarah, and then Sarah took the camera back. When everyone started to sing happy birthday, Sarah May looked at all of them in surprise and Christopher started to squeal, knowing that all eyes were on him.

Bucky spoke softly to his son as everyone sang. He wanted him to know that he was such a good boy and this day was all about him. "Yes, Bean. It's your birthday. Everyone's here for you today, Christopher. Isn't that amazing? And you get cake from Nana and some presents. And Papa is going to sing you some lullabies tonight, Baby."

Christopher smiled brightly up at Bucky and squirmed in his seat. He got this way when he didn't know what to do with all the energy he had. Steve counted to three and tried to get Christopher to blow out his candle, but in the end, he had Lilly blow it out for him. Sarah then cut the cake and started to dish them out to everyone. "Thank you for being such an amazing parent to our boy," Steve said softly, kissing the curve of Bucky's jaw. Sarah May reached her hand while Steve was distracted to grab a handful of her brother's cake.

---

Bucky hummed and leaned into Steve. Then he noticed his daughter and he gasped. "Ya-Ya, Honey," he started and gently took the cake from her hand. "You can't have cake yet, Sweet Pea. This is for your brother. I'm sorry. Soon you can have more solid food. But cake comes much later." He wiped her hand and then kissed her cheek so maybe she wouldn't get too upset with him.

---

When Bucky gasped and had a concerned voice instead of his happy voice, her bottom lip jutted out and she started to cry a little. "Aw, look at what you've done," Natasha scolded Bucky teasingly. Sarah May stopped crying within less than a minute because when Bucky kissed her, it was a good enough distraction.

"When can she eat real food?" Lilly asked.

---

Bucky sighed and took Sarah May from Steve to hold her so she knew he didn't mean to upset her. "She doesn't have any teeth yet," Bucky said and ran his fingers over her dark hair. "And I don't think sugar this early is a good idea either. I didn't even want Christopher to have sugar when he did but Steve won out on that one."

---

Steve smiled guiltily at the mention of sugar. Christopher, meanwhile, was diving headfirst into his piece of cake. "Can she eat mushy things like baby food and applesauce?" Lilly asked. "Cause the other day I didn't want to finish my applesauce and Becca told me I couldn't give her the leftovers."

---

Bucky looked over to Lilly and sighed. "Is it sugar-free applesauce?" Lilly shook her head. "Then, no. If you don't want it just save it and I'll finish it." He put Sarah May back into her high chair and sat down to have his own piece of cake. They were just enjoying themselves for a while before the door rang and Sam finally arrived. Bucky internally groaned. He and Sam were still not entirely friendly. He wouldn't dare mention that to Steve, but he still got a little grumpy whenever he was coming over. Which he knew wasn't fair. Sam was so good with Steve and the kids and he cared about them all. But Bucky was good at holding a grudge and this one he had a hard time dropping.

---

Steve got up and smiled brightly when Sam arrived. He gave him a big hug and even Diana seemed to like Sam a little more than everyone else. It was probably because Sam always brought over a dog treat. "Hey, how's the birthday boy doing?" Sam asked as he approached Christopher and gave him a pat on his head. "Did you guys do presents yet?"

---

"Hello, Sam," Sarah said brightly and stood up to give him a hug. She would never admit it, but Sam was her favorite of Steve's friends. His life experiences as a trained military medic were similar to hers as a nurse and they liked to swap stories. "No presents yet. We are just now having cake if you would like any?"

---

Sam gave her a hug back and took a seat. "Great! I was afraid I was going to be too late. Cake would be terrific," he said.

Natasha smirked because she knew that Bucky wasn't fond of Sam. She didn’t get it either. Everyone else loved him. But she did enjoy watching Bucky try to handle being around him. "So did you guys pick out a birthday for Sarah May?" she asked.

---

"Not yet," Bucky said and looked to Steve. "We know she was born around two weeks before Christmas. So we just need to decide on a day around the thirteenth to the sixteenth. But we need to research to see if any of those days are bad choices. Like a ruthless dictator was born then or something."

---

"What if you find out her real birthday somehow and it's Stalin's birthday. Would you celebrate her real birthday or the birthday you chose for her?" she asked, mostly joking around.

---

Bucky thought for a second and blinked a few times like he hadn't even thought of that. Becca, who seemed to finally be interested to join the discussion, piped up. "Oh, my god. Stalin was born on the eighteenth of December." She looked to Natasha like she wasn't sure if she purposefully said that because she knew or if Natasha was just psychic or something.

---

Natasha knew that Stalin had a birthday sometime at the end of the year but she didn't know the exact day. If she didn't know Becca and how big of a bookworm she was, Natasha would've been more concerned why she knew that. "So yeah. What if you find out that Sarah May was born on the eighteenth?"

---

"Well, it's not likely that we will ever know Sarah May's actual birthdate or anything else about where she comes from," Bucky said and looked to his daughter who seemed to be getting a little sleepy. "So, I just suppose we won't pick the eighteenth and we will stick to whatever birthday we give her."

---

Steve stroked his hand over Sarah May's hair once and kissed her cheek. He would probably have to put her to bed soon. "If one day of Hanukkah last year was between those dates, we should have that be her birthday," Steve suggested.

---

"Oh, my god, Steve!" Bucky said with wide worried eyes as realization hit him. "It was her first Hanukkah and we only celebrated Christmas! Oh, my god, we missed her first Hanukkah.” He looked to his sleepy little girl and watched her big eyes shutting slowly as she looked up at him. Of course, it wasn’t their fault. They hadn’t even had the thought of her being Jewish until they talked to Fred after the New Year anyway. But he still felt awful.

---

Clint and Natasha exchanged looks because these guys really were huge goobers when it came to things like celebrating and making memories with their kids. "It's okay, Buck, we didn't know she was Jewish back then. And Hanukkah may have already passed by the time we got her, right?" Steve said and looked to Becca. “Becca, can you look up when it was last year?"

---

Becca shrugged and pushed around a bit of cake. "Yeah, I'll check my calendar from last year," she said and gave Steve a nod.

Bucky calmed down a little and ran a hand through his hair. "Okay, yeah. We can check. Baby, do you want to put Ya-Ya to sleep and then we can do presents or do you want her to stay up?"

---

"The poor girl is falling asleep where she sits," Steve said. "I'll put her to bed and then we can do presents." He cradled his daughter against his chest and sung to her softly as he carried her to the nursery. She went out like a light and Steve returned barely five minutes later.

---

Bucky had all the presents set out on the table by the time Steve came back. Christopher was whining and trying his best to grab a present that was almost in his reach. "Steve, he's really impatient," Bucky said and moved the present further from his reach.

---

"Papa!" Christopher complained. He had learned from Christmas that the bright boxes meant fun times were coming.

"Which one should we give him first?" Steve asked.

---

"Do we want him to have ours for or let his aunts and uncles go first?" Bucky asked and gestured at the large box that Clint was holding tightly to his chest. He seemed proud of whatever was inside. "I know one of these are from Monty and Evan because they couldn't be here so they dropped it off at the record shop."

---

"Let's let everyone else give him theirs first." Steve was excited for Christopher to get their presents, but he figured it was polite for guests to go first.

Since Clint was still holding onto his present proudly, Sam pushed his towards Christopher. "Whatever Clint has looks like it's better than mine, so I don't want to follow up after his," Sam laughed. Inside the present was a little bear dressed as a policeman.
Christopher pulled the bear out with a little help from Steve and when he got his little hands on it, shook it and yelled loudly. "Dada! Loo!" He shoved the bear up near Steve's face and squeezed it, discovering it made noises.

"Wow!" Steve said, loving how Christopher's reaction to anything interesting was to make his Dad see it too. "That's so nice, Christopher! I love your new bear. Say 'thank you' to your Uncle Sam."

Christopher looked where Steve was pointing and reached a hand out to Sam. He thought for a second and then finally said, "No!" as he smiled and held up the bear.

Sam chuckled and gave Christopher a tiny high five. "No problem, Christopher. I'm glad you like it, little man."

Steve laughed and told his son to be polite but he also knew he had a limited vocabulary and couldn't say much. "Clint, do you want to go next?" Steve asked. Christopher was having a grand old time squeezing the bear to make noises come out of it.

"Yes!" Clint said and set his box down on the table near Christopher. He helped him open it up and toss all the paper aside. He opened it up to reveal a giant rocking elephant that Christopher could sit on and ride around the house.

Christopher tore at the paper as best as his little hands could manage. When he saw the large elephant, he pointed at it and squealed. Steve set the elephant on the floor so he could put Christopher on top of it. "Your uncle Clint is so good to you, Sweetheart! What a great elephant you have!"

Christopher was incredibly confused at first by how he was meant to use the elephant. He just sat on it and stared up at Steve for a long second. Bucky grabbed for a few of the presents that he and Steve got for Christopher and said, "Baby, should we just open the presents that are clothes and things? He isn't going to be interesting in them."

"But the puppy outfit is so nice," Steve said pathetically. Becca and Lilly both rolled their eyes at him. "Maybe he will get a little excited over that at least."

Sarah laid a hand on her son's arm. "Steve, Love, he won't."

Bucky gave his husband a sympathetic little kiss and then started opening up all of the presents that weren't toys. After a while, he nodded to Natasha and Tim. "You two can go ahead and give him your presents if you want to. He may be a little distracted, though."

---

Tim went a little overboard with his present - not as much as Clint - because he was nostalgic of when his kids were babies. He got a bunch of different noisemaking toys and a few more blocks to add to his collection. "This boy is spoiled," Steve laughed as he watched Christopher try and decide which toy he was going to play with.

---

"Thanks, Timmy," Bucky said. "He's going to have so much fun with these new toys. I'm hoping he wears himself out soon." He leaned in and lowered his voice so only Tim could hear and Clint could read his lips, "He better wear himself out because I want to jump his daddy's bones at some point tonight."

---

Clint smirked and started signing back at Bucky using some of their own coded signs that Steve couldn't understand, 'As if you needed your son's birthday as an excuse to jump his bones.' Steve was too busy playing with their son to notice Clint signing anyway.

---

Bucky nodded and signed back, 'No, but let's be honest, he looks so sexy when he is taking care of our child. It's such a turn on to see him being a good father.'

"No, no fair," Tim complained. "No secret signs. I don't know the secret signs! I'm still learning regular signs, you guys."

---

Clint turned to Tim and said, "Bucky is going to fuck his husband tonight because he's turned on by him being a good dad." He made sure to speak quietly enough so the girls and Sarah on the other end of the table at least wouldn’t hear.

Tim laughed. "He does have that appeal, Bucky. I bet he thinks the same when you're taking care of them, too."

---

Bucky grinned shamelessly and nodded. "I mean, fatherhood is the sexiest thing to happen to Steve and that's saying something because that man is fine as all hell." He looked over at Steve who was currently slumped over trying to get Christopher to play with his new plush toys instead of blocks.

---

Steve tickled Christopher and made silly noises at him, totally caught up in how much he loved his son. "I wish Natasha loved kids like that," Clint said since Nat was currently off in the bathroom. "I wouldn't break up with her for it, of course. But I wish we could have kids."

---

Bucky nodded solemnly and reached out to squeeze Clint's shoulder. "I wish you could too. Maybe things will change. Maybe you can adopt at some point. That could be really great. There are tons of babies who need homes. Maybe she would be willing to do that later.”

"Wait. You mean to tell me that you plan on letting there be kids left over for other couples to adopt?" Clint asked in mock shock, smirking over at Bucky. After adopting three kids in a year, Bucky and Steve had a reputation of being baby magnets.

"Don't be fresh," Bucky sassed back and flicked Clint in the head. "We don't adopt every baby we see. We just adopt most babies we see. There is a distinct difference, I believe." Although, it was pretty likely that they would never pass up an opportunity to adopt a child in need.

"Name one baby you came across that needed a home and you didn't adopt it," Clint defended, shooing away Bucky's hand after he flicked him. "Oh wait, that's right, you can't. Cause you took them all in."

"We are stopping at eighteen at the most. That way we have our baseball teams. Team Daddy against Team Pops," Bucky said and watched Christopher chuck a block across the room like he was already trying out for his spot on the team.

"You're lucky you've got a stay-at-home parent to keep track of your baseball teams," Tim laughed. Sam went over to Christopher and gave him the block again to throw. "So what don't you like about him? He seems nice," Clint asked, nodding at Sam.

Bucky gave Clint a sharp look and then signed, 'It's not that I dislike him. He just rubs me the wrong way. He's always got something to say about how I do things. The first time I met him, he brought up the fact that Steve complained to him about how messy I am.'

‘Rude,’ Clint signed back. ‘Maybe he's one of those well-to-do snobs. Does he come from a rich family or something? Do you know?’ Clint frowned as Sam picked Christopher up and pretended he was an airplane.

Bucky shook his head and signed, 'Not sure. I just don't think he likes me very much. Sometimes I think he believes that I'm not the best person for Steve. But Steve loves being his friend and Natasha thinks he is great, too, so I can't say anything about it to Steve.'

'If he thinks that, then he's an asshole,' Clint signed to Bucky.

Sam came over to them with Christopher in his arms. "Hey, Bud, I think someone needs their diaper changed." Clint felt like it was almost like he went out of his way to make Bucky handle a shitty diaper so Steve didn't have to.

---

Bucky sighed and took his son from Sam. "Alright, Bean, did you shit on your Uncle Sam?" he asked and held him up to check. "Yep, you did. Let's go get you cleaned up so Daddy can talk to his friends. You might even need to go night-night soon."

---

Christopher was having way too much fun to go to bed. "No nigh," he said patiently to his pops. "Play." He snuggled close to Bucky and laid his head on his shoulder, trying to win him over.

---

When Bucky went up to change Christopher's diaper, Clint and Tim went to Steve. They were Bucky's best friends and they were with him at work all the time. And they were very good at meddling. "Hey," Tim started and he and Clint pulled Steve aside, all serious faces and concern. "You got to talk to Bucky before he starts spiraling again. You know how insecure he is. He thinks Sam doesn't like him. I don't see any issues with him; he seems lovely. But Bucky's got it in his head and you know he's not good at letting things resolve without some help."

---

"What?" Steve balked. "Sam thinks he's great. Why would he think-" Steve started to say but then he huffed. Logic usually didn't work with Bucky in these situations, love and attention did. He went to the nursery quickly and came to stand behind his husband and he put his hands on his waist. "Look at you taking care of our son like that," he hummed, kissing the back of his neck. "Have I told you how hot you are?"

---

Bucky chuckled and glanced back for a second, pushing against Steve as he finished getting Christopher into a fresh diaper. "Yeah, you have said. But I won't blame you if you want to say it again," he requested and grabbed for Christopher's pants again. "Did you leave all our friends to fend for themselves down there with the girls?"

---

Steve slid his hands up Bucky's sides. "They can handle themselves for a few minutes. All I wanted was a little alone time with my perfect husband," Steve said. "We're totally going to celebrate together after everyone goes to bed, right?"

---

Bucky nodded and turned around in Steve's arms, holding Christopher. "Yes, I was planning on it," he said and glanced to Sarah May who was asleep soundly in her crib. "Ya-Ya probably won't wake up and Christopher will be too sleepy here pretty soon after we p-l-a-y some more with him."

---

"Good," he said. Steve pet his fingers through Bucky's hair and kissed his cheek. "He's going to have a real good time. He already is. I can't believe how enthusiastic he's getting over all his toys. He's starting to catch on, I guess."
Bucky gave their son a kiss on his cheek and Christopher giggled. "I'm not kidding when I say that he is the smartest little baby I have ever met. Smarter than Becca and Lilly were at his age, definitely smarter than me." He sighed happily and leaned in to give Steve a kiss. "He's our perfect Bean."

"You hear that, Christopher? You're our smart, little peanut." He kissed Christopher's cheek and then put his arm around Bucky's waist. "Let's bring him back down to play with his aunts and uncles. I'm sure Clint wants to hold him some more."

"Clint would gladly take him home for a week," Bucky said and handed their son to Steve so he could double-check that Sarah May was sleeping still. He watched her breathe for a few seconds and then adjusted the plush giraffe she had tucked next to her.

"As if he'd be able to take him past my mom. He's never getting babysitting duty if she has a chance to watch him. She's a bigger baby hog than Clint is," Steve said. Sarah May made soft, sleepy sounds as she laid in her crib. "How's she looking?"

"She looks good," Bucky whispered and pet their daughter's hair. "She looks like she doesn't want us to bug her." He watched her for a few more seconds and then started heading back downstairs where Tim was saying goodbye to everyone, ready to head off.

Steve would've loved to cuddle his daughter but he was in no mood to risk upsetting her and waking her up. He walked over to Tim and gave him a big hug. "Thank you for coming over. It means a lot that you celebrated with us," he said.

Bucky gave Tim a firm hug as well and saw him out, telling him to call once he was home. Pretty soon it was just Sam left and he and Steve were talking as Bucky played with Christopher. The girls and Sarah had started watching a movie together in Sarah's room. Bucky just helped Christopher build block towers and mash them back down with a bright pink ball gripped in one hand.

Sam and Steve chatted amongst each other for a little while, but, ultimately, he gave Steve a hug and headed out as well. "I got to head back, Bud. I'll catch you later." He waved at Bucky and said, "See you later, hippie. Happy birthday, Christopher!"

After Sam left, Steve laid down on the floor next to his two favorite men. "You guys having fun here?"

Bucky watched Sam go and just sort of stared after him for a few seconds before looking over at Steve and going for a smile. "We are having fun, yes," Bucky said and pet Christopher's hair. "But someone is looking a little bit sleepy now. And he keeps tugging on his toes for some reason."

---

"Are your little feet tired, Bean?" Steve asked as he tickled the bottom of Christopher's foot. He let out a tired whine and pulled his foot back from his dad's finger. "Do you think something's wrong?" Steve asked.

---

Bucky knit his brow and carefully grabbed Christopher's ankle. He slipped his sock off and didn't see anything wrong. Then he slipped the other one off and found nothing on that foot either. "Are you just being grumpy about your feet, Baby Boy?" he asked and checked the feet again before getting a loud, angry whine from Christopher again.

---

"Maybe he's in a mood right now. I'll keep an eye on it tomorrow and I'll take him to the doctor if I think anything is up," Steve decided. He leaned over and kissed Bucky's cheek. "Let's sing him his lullabies and get him to sleep before he gets really grumpy."

---

Bucky agreed and picked up their son as he got up slowly. He pushed the toys over with his foot and felt Christopher curl up against him tiredly. "Oh, yeah, this is a sleepy little boy. He can't keep his eyes open at all." He chuckled and kissed his son. "Your first birthday was a big deal, wasn't it?"

---

Steve quickly picked up all of the toys and put them in Christopher's toy chest. Raphael lifted his head when he saw them pack up because this meant that, at long last, there wouldn't be commotion in the house. "He looks so cute cuddling you. Just imagine when he's three or four and he's practically a little monkey clinging onto you."

---

Bucky whined and looked to Steve with big eyes. "No, no, don't say that. I don't want him growing up too fast. He's already a year old. That's already one year done, Steve. A whole year done." He held tightly to his son and pouted up at his husband.

---

"I want him to stay little forever, too." Smile smiled. "But he's going to be more and more amazing with every day he's here to grow up and learn from us. One day he's going to be helping us at the shelter or helping stock the back of the record shop because you know Clint will totally give him a job there if he wants."

---

Bucky sighed and walked up the stairs with Steve in tow. "Stop it. You're going to make me cry," he said, mostly teasing. "It's hard enough for me that in a few months, Becca will be able to get her first job. I can't think of this little guy working too."
Christopher was already half asleep in Bucky's arms. It was goddamned adorable. "Becca is going to hoard all of her money for college and probably graduate without a single penny of debt to her name," Steve said. "Maybe it'll teach her patience with others after working for a while."

"That would be nice," Bucky mumbled and set Christopher on the changing table. "Will you grab some pajamas for him?" It was a lot easier for him to get Christopher out of his clothes when he was sleepy and wasn't going to put up too much of a fight. Bucky was just grateful that he grew out of his phase of not wanting to sleep in anything but his diaper.

Steve picked out some adorable dinosaur pajamas with little dino prints at the bottom of the feet. "He's so loved, Buck. And not just by us. He's such a lucky little guy." Steve pet Christopher's cheek lightly while Bucky changed him. "Are you ready for your papa to sing you some bedtime songs, Bean?"

Christopher just stared up at them, eyes drooping and his breathing slowing down. Bucky laughed quietly. "I think that's a yes." He let Steve pick up their son and put him in his crib. He was very compliant and let his daddy lay him down and tuck Bourbon the plush dog down next to him. "Okay, Bean, night-night," Bucky said quietly and started singing a lullaby to him.

Christopher was so ready for bed. Sometimes he fought to stay up but nights like these were a godsend for parents. He snuggled with the doggie he'd had since the day he came home and fell asleep within minutes to his papa's singing. Steve watched their son fall asleep and squeezed Bucky's hand. "Happy birthday, son," he said to their boy.

"Happy birthday, Christopher," Bucky repeated and quietly lead Steve out of the nursery. He checked to make sure that both girls were in their rooms and at least close to going to sleep. Then he shut out the hall light and brought Steve to their room, quietly pulling him over to the bed.

Once inside their bedroom, Steve fell onto the bed with his husband and held the sides of his face. "Our family is amazing and you helped bring us all together, Bucky. Thank you for being by my side since the day I met you."

"I love you, Baby," Bucky answered and giggled just a little bit. "You ever find yourself confused as hell as to how this even happened to us? It's like this miracle just appeared and we had to get on board because it wasn't waiting. And now we have a house and three kids and one of them just turned a year old."

"It's because God had a plan for us. He brought us together and not only are we happy, but we're helping other people. There's almost two dozen people at the shelter finding refuge there. Cops at our precinct are able to come out. You helped get Tim a job and get back on his feet. We were able to help those people because of a little bit of faith and a lot of dedication to each other," Steve said.

---

"I think it's pretty great that other officers can come out now because of you," Bucky said. "But why did it have to be the guy who arrested me and locked me in a cell all day without food or bathroom access? And I had to listen to Clint's whining the entire time. At work, I can tune it out, but, in a cell, it's a little more difficult."

---

"He was an ass, I know," Steve agreed. "I nearly decked him that day." He shrugged. "But we got to stick together, us gay officers. At least enough to be civil to each other." He pressed a few kisses to Bucky's face. "Come on, Love. Let's talk about something nicer."

---

"Okay, you're right. It's in the past. And maybe he was working through stuff at the time," Bucky offered and rolled them so he was on top of Steve. "I wanted to ask if we could talk about something. It's not too serious. I just want to know where we stand."

---

"Well, he was still a jerk, even if he was going through some stuff," Steve said casually. He leaned up and kissed Bucky's cheek once he rolled on top of him. "What do you want to talk about, Sweetheart?" he asked.

---

"You mentioned recently that you bought a sex toy?" Bucky asked as quietly as he thought possible. "And you were considering using it with me? I just want to know what's been going through your head. Because I threw mine out because I didn't think you'd ever change your mind. So I want to know if you did all this because you are interested or if you just felt bad."

---

Steve blushed brightly and nudged Bucky off so he could dig a shoebox out from underneath their bed. Inside it was a dildo that was as close to Phillip as he could remember, a vibrating plug, and a few other small sex toys he didn't know all that much about but the shopkeeper suggested it to him and he was so flustered he just bought them so he could get out quicker. "I felt bad," he admitted. "But, I really want to have an open mind and I know it would make you happy. And I want to make you happy."

---

Bucky sat up and gave Steve a little sympathetic smile. He noticed that the dildo was actually bigger than Phillip and, despite his best attempts to quell the curiosity, he still really wanted to know if he could get all of it in. "Steve, Baby, I didn't mean to make you feel bad. I just didn't want you to think that I was holding on to it as an off-chance that we broke up. I didn't want you to feel like that at all. You're stuck with me for life."

---

"I know you didn't mean to make me feel bad. I just... I want to be the sort of husband that does his best to do what makes you happy and what makes you feel good. Even if that means trying things I otherwise wouldn't have," Steve said. "It's not about why you kept your toys. It's about why you threw them away. And that's on me."

---

"Baby," Bucky said softly and reached out to tug Steve close to him. "I love you. And I love that you did this for me. And I would love to have you use those toys on me. But I only want you to if you want to see what it's like. Don't do it because you want to see me happy. I don't want you to be upset later. I want you to do it because you want to know what it's like to pleasure me like that. And I also want you to know that if you do try it and you do end up hating it, then we don't ever do it again. I don't want you to be upset."

---

Steve huffed, getting frustrated with himself. "I don't have any interest in these things, Buck," he complained. "I don't get the appeal. I don't see what makes these better than the actual thing," he ranted. "I bought these for you. If you won't use them with me, then at least use them for when I'm not around and you want to get off."

---

"Steve, Baby," Bucky said with surprise and a little hurt in his voice. "Why are you getting mad? I'm trying to explain to you that I recognize your concerns about me using toys - concerns and aversions that you've had since the beginning of our relationship. I just... you know what my concern is? You know what I'm worried about? I'm worried that I'll use them and you'll change your mind and get angry. You'll see it as a form of cheating or something because it's not you inside me like you want. Or I'll just keep them around and you'll be paranoid that I'm using them all the time and you'll be worried that you aren't good enough."

---

"I just wish you'd let me use this stuff with you because I don't want to be the husband that makes his husband throw things out just because I don't like it," Steve said quickly in explanation. He knew it wasn't a good reason to justify experimenting with something that Steve clearly didn't have an interest in but it was the only reason he had. "I don't know how I'm going to feel if you use these or keep them around. But right now, I know I don't feel good being the asshole that made you throw out your own property."

---

"Oh, my god," Bucky breathed out in exasperation and stared up at the ceiling for a few seconds. "Honey," he said and looked to Steve. He hadn't yet realized that in married life he had developed a habit of using 'honey' with Steve when he was frustrated. "You are not an asshole. You did not make me throw out my property. You know that right? It was my choice because I wanted you to be happy. And now you're making choices because you want me to be happy. And now I need you to make one more choice. You either decide right now to use one of those toys on me tonight or you decide not to and we will forget it for now. I'll do whichever you decide."

---

Steve had caught on to the 'honey' thing and immediately scowled because he knew he was on thin ice right now. He looked down at the box. He was fucking determined to prove that he wasn't a stuffy husband but he also wasn't ready to use the dildo on Bucky either. So he shoved his hand into the box and pulled out one of the toys the shopkeeper harangued him into buying. "Let's use whatever these are," he said, placing a set of anal beads between them with a stubborn look.

---

Bucky stared at the anal beads for a second then looked up to Steve and nodded. "You got it, Baby," he said and gave a little smile to him for reassurance. "Those are anal beads. You might end up liking how my ass looks when you pull them back out. Looks pretty nice." He hoped Steve would get some enjoyment from this entire venture.

---

"Pull them out?" Steve looked down at the things for a moment and then back at Bucky, putting two and two together. "Do I pull it out like I'm trying to start a lawnmower? Or am I supposed to do it slow?" he asked as he put the shoebox away.

---

"No, god, please don't yank it out," Bucky said hastily. "You just go one at a time. You can go really slow or moderately quick so long as it's smooth and I'm well lubed up. You just work them in so all of them have disappeared and then you bring them all back out again.

---

Steve nodded and then slid his hand up Bucky's shirt to stroke his lower stomach. "I'm sorry I was being difficult, Love," Steve apologized. "Let's start this night over. How's that?" He was still apprehensive and frustrated but he figured he made a decision and making a decision was better than continuing this argument all night. And he didn’t want to end such a good day like this.

---

"Yeah, let's start over," Bucky agreed. "It's my fault, Baby. I looked a gift horse in the mouth. I should have just let you do it. I'll let you be in control now. I promise. I'm here. I'm yours. I love you so much. Okay?" He settled back on the bed and lifted his arms up over his head so Steve could easily slip his shirt off.

---

Steve drew Bucky in for a slow kiss and then started to take his husband's clothes off. "I love you too, Baby. You don't have to be sorry for anything." He kissed up his bare stomach and chest before sucking a mark onto his neck.

---

Bucky went quiet and just let Steve touch all over him. He still felt bad for upsetting him but he figured if Steve wanted to try this out even just to please Bucky, he should let him. And Bucky wasn't opposed at all to having some toy play again after so long. He just wished they both were going into it with a mutual interest. But if trying this even once would help Steve felt less bad about Bucky tossing his things.

---

"I love you, Buck," Steve said gently as he pressed his hand between Bucky's legs. "I want to make you feel how much I love you. Everything you do excites me and makes me feel so happy, Sweetheart."
Bucky whimpered just slightly and spread his legs for Steve. He loved when Steve praised him or talked about how much he loved him. Luckily for Bucky, Steve was very liberal with his praise and love. He didn't ever go very long without hearing it.

Steve slid Bucky's pants down his hips. "I love how you give it all up to me. I love it when all I got to do is kiss you or say I'm in the mood and you're here for me, ready to make us both feel good." Once he had Bucky naked underneath him, he licked up Bucky's shaft, careful and slow and teasingly.

"Steve, Baby, you know I'm literally always horny for you," Bucky agreed and lifted his legs just a bit. "Sometimes you just have to look at me and I'm ready. Or," he chuckled and looked down at Steve. "Sometimes you just do little things that really get to me for some reason. Like once, you were in the kitchen cooking. And I just happened to walk by when you had a tomato in your hand. You just like looked at it like you were confused as to what it was even for and I thought you looked so damn cute and I wanted to jump you right there."

Steve got the lube and started to pour it on his fingers. "A tomato?" Steve laughed, finding it so fucking perfect that Bucky would still have the hots for him when he was looking at a tomato. "I was confused because I usually don't buy that brand and some different brand was on the sticker," he explained.

"Oh, okay, I see," Bucky said with a giggle and relaxed himself to let Steve's fingers in. "There was also this one time you were picking up Christopher's toys before bed and you stubbed your toe on the couch and swore pretty loud because no one else was around. Kind of wished I could have fucked you on the couch and made it all better. But with my luck, the girls would have come downstairs."

Steve remembered that time too and groaned. "I was so proud that I didn't step on a single block and of course I had to go and slam my dumb foot," he remarked. Steve eased a finger inside his husband as he leaned down to kiss his shoulder. "I had half the mind to jump you at work because your hair was in a messy bun that day and you were in the middle of telling Reggie off for sneaking into the back to smoke again."

Bucky moaned a little at even the one finger. "You know, that might be fun. You could surprise me at work and fuck me in the office. We'd give Clint something to talk about. But we would have to make sure Tim wasn't there because the poor guy embarrasses easy and he would have a heart attack."

"I'd do it," Steve purred, curling his finger inside Bucky. "I'd love to pin you against the wall or over the desk and fuck you quick. We can give Clint Christopher as a distraction. It'd give us enough time that he won't even know what we're up to," he said.

---

"Fuck," Bucky whined and nodded his head enthusiastically. "Yes, please. Let's do that. I want to be pinned over the desk and fucked hard." He reached down and started tugging on his cock. "Maybe Reggie will come back there and he'll be so fucking high he won't have a clue if it's real or not."

---

Steve snorted and shook his head. "Keep Reggie out of my fantasy of fucking you at your job, Buck," he said. Rather than inserting another finger, Steve pushed in the first and smallest bead into Bucky's ass.

---

Bucky was going to apologize but then he felt the first bead go inside him and his whole body arched off the bed as he gasped and quickly stifled his moaning with a pillow. He hadn't had toys inside him in so long. It almost felt new.

---

Steve was shocked by the response. That was definitely new. Just to test how the beads worked, Steve pulled the first one out of Bucky's hole before pushing it back in again. Then he worked to push in a second. "Look at me, Bucky," he said softly. "And tell me how you feel."

---

Bucky was so grateful that Steve decided to try the beads out. They felt so good and he couldn't wait to have them all inside and feel Steve pull them one by one from him again. He looked at Steve with wide eyes and opened his mouth, trying to speak but a strained moan was all that came.

---

"Very informative," Steve sassed at him, smirking. He kissed Bucky's hip and watched with fascination as he pushed another bead inside. They were starting to get too big to put in without more lube, so he began to pour a little on each bead.

---

Bucky stared at Steve and focused on breathing. He tried again to talk and just managed to say, "Feels... so good..." he felt Steve work a larger bead in and he had to relax himself a little more so it was able to slip in with a gentle little pop of his hole that he could feel. "How many are left? How big does it go?"

---

"Three more," Steve said. "It's a little bigger than a golf ball. You have to let me know if you want me to stop. Or slow down." Steve kind of assumed that Bucky would have told him to stop by this point if it had been too much. "You look so good like this."

---

Bucky's heart skipped a beat. Steve thought he looked good like that. Bucky assumed that had to mean that Steve thought Bucky looked good with anal beads hanging from him. He wanted to comment on it but he didn't want to ruin it by drawing attention so he just decided to save it for later. He would just get off like this and then have Steve fuck him and then they could talk.

---

Steve was slow and patient and loving as he filled Bucky up with the last three beads. He couldn't believe how much Bucky fit inside him. He leaned down and licked around the stretched rim of Bucky's asshole. "You ready for me to pull them out?" he asked.

---

Bucky whined high in his throat and just clenched around the beads several times before answering. "Uh-huh. But I want your cock ready to push in. Once the last one is out, I want you to start pounding me. And I want you to watch every one leave my ass. It'll look so good. Wish I could see."

---

Steve nodded and leaned back a little so he could get a good view of Bucky's ass. He had to admit, Bucky was right. It did look fucking amazing to see Bucky's hole slowly give up the beads, stretching outwards before it popped out. A few times, Steve would only tug it partially out before letting it slip back inside. But when the last one came out, Steve was so ready. He pulled out his cock and pushed it inside his husband right away, immediately thrusting deep as he could go.

---

"Ah, fuck!" Bucky yelped and his body contorted once Steve was inside. He felt so goddamn good and he wanted Steve's come so bad. "Fuck me, Baby!" he said desperately and locked eyes with Steve. "Fuck me so I can't walk right tomorrow. Fuck me so I'm sore at work. Mark me up. Show me I'm yours."

---

Steve's hips slammed into his husband's as he fucked Bucky as hard and fast as he could. His hands gripped his hips with bruising strength to keep him from being pushed further up the bed. Steve leaned down and covered Bucky's lips with his own in a searing kiss. "Mine."

---

Bucky's mind short-circuited and it was all he could do to stay in reality with Steve. He just wanted to slip into some unknown space where his husband was fucking hard and deep and fast for all eternity. He wanted to be at a constant brink of orgasm and only allowed to come when Steve said so. He wanted to never let a minute go by with Steve not knowing that Bucky was so ridiculously unfathomably in love with him.

---

Bucky was perfect. Steve couldn't help but think of how lucky he was to have met a man who complimented him so amazingly and who was such a goddamn beautiful human being. Steve wanted to give him everything he wanted and then some. Steve didn't know how much time had passed, but when his orgasm came, it was earth-shattering to him and Steve cried out Bucky's name as he fucked Bucky through his orgasm. He was so hazy that he hadn't realized when he came over his stomach several minutes later.

---
Steve gasped and moaned and tried to keep his breathing steady but fucking Bucky this hard felt like running a marathon nowadays. “Baby, fuck, Bucky,” he groaned and a little loud as he picked up faster because his orgasm was coming quick. “So close!” he whined and felt a heavy warm jolt go through his body as he came deep and thick inside of Bucky with a shout and eyes squeezed shut.

---

Bucky had come a little before Steve and was laying in post-orgasm bliss for a bit. But Steve's yelp and spurts of hot come brought him back and he shot out a hand to cover Steve's mouth. "Don’t wake the house, my love," he said with a giggle and rolled his hips just a bit and clenched down around Steve's cock to get everything from him.

---

Steve looked down in confusion when he felt Bucky's hand cover his mouth and he felt his face heat up in embarrassment. He hadn’t noticed how loud he was. He groaned softly at the feeling of Bucky's muscle squeezing around his sensitive dick. "Sorry," he apologized bashfully when Bucky pulled his hand away. "Couldn't help myself. You do things to me."

---

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve down on top of him so he could snuggle his husband. "It's okay. I don't think I hear anyone awake," he listened for a second and then kissed Steve's arm and chest and neck. "That was so good. So good. I loved that. You fuck me so well every time."

---

Steve took a minute to catch his breath and then he kissed Bucky some more. "I'm glad that even a year later, I still get to tire you out. Hell, I'm ready for a nap," he laughed. Steve bit Bucky’s neck affectionately.

---

Bucky hummed happily and let his eyes shut. He needed to shower. If he didn't do it now, he was going to forget to wake up early enough to do it in the morning. "I need to shower," he mumbled and looked to Steve. "And I want to ask how that was for you but I'm not sure if now is the time."

---

"Let me join you," Steve said. He got up and offered his hand to his husband. "Let's talk about it another time. Right now, I want to take care of my perfect husband." He was in a loving mood right now and wanted to dote on him as much as Bucky would allow.

---

"Okay, another time," Bucky agreed even though he really wanted to know. He let Steve take him to the bathroom and get him in the shower. It felt wonderful to have the cool water rush over him and he contently pressed himself to Steve and took a deep breath.

---

Steve dutifully washed his husband, playing with his hair and kissing him every few seconds as he washed him up. "I wouldn't mind doing something like that again," he said. "You look so beautiful when you get all riled up like that."
Bucky whimpered softly and closed his eyes. "Can I please ask about what you liked about it?" He really wanted to discuss it now. He wanted to know if Steve liked seeing his ass around the beads and seeing them come back out. He wanted to know how much Steve got out of it.

"You were practically jumping off the bed when I first started putting them in you," Steve explained. "I like seeing you loving what I'm doing to you. I like knowing that I'm able to pleasure you that much, even if it's not me that's inside you."

"Was it okay for you?" Bucky asked. "Knowing something else was inside me, I mean. You didn't get upset?" He just didn't want Steve to be pushing through for his sake. "Did you at least like seeing my ass taking them? It's hot, isn't it?"

"It was really hot to see," Steve admitted. "I still... prefer doing things the normal way," he said shyly, still a bit disappointed in himself for not finding toys as much fun as Bucky did. "But I wasn't upset by this." He supposed anal beads weren't as much of a threat of being a replacement for his dick like a dildo was.

Bucky grinned happily and pulled Steve in for a kiss. "I love you. Thank you for doing that for me. I'm sorry I caused an argument about it earlier. I really appreciate you and how much you want to do to make me happy. I just need you to know that you and your body are perfect. Nothing could ever be as good as you are. You need to believe that. Hell, I didn't come until you were fucking me. You're still always what I need."

Steve didn't like to admit it but ever since his injury from the fire, he had issues with his confidence. Without being able to work out like he used to, his muscles hadn't stayed as big as what he would have liked. Having Bucky reassure him like this meant the world to him. He leaned in and kissed his cheek. "Thank you," he said softly. "It means a lot to hear that."

Bucky held on to Steve in a close hug as the water poured over them. "My perfect, handsome husband," he murmured and kissed Steve's chest. "I love you so much that sometimes I miss you even when you're sitting right next to me because I know I'll have to go to work or help the girls or the babies or something eventually and I'll have to be away from you for even a moment."

Steve pet his fingers through Bucky's wet hair and smiled at the kisses. "We have the whole night together, Baby. You don't have to miss me tonight." He leaned in and kissed him slowly. "For the rest of our lives, we are going to have each other. And our whole family is going to stay close, too. Everyone."
Bucky was so excited when he got home from work and checked the mail. They had just gotten official documentation that Sarah May's adoption paperwork had gone through. Steve was now officially her father and Bucky was the secondary guardian. They had been waiting so long for this, it seemed.

Bucky had gotten home while Steve and the babies were at the store. And the girls were at school so Bucky was all alone. It was just him sitting on the steps with Diana, staring at the door and waiting for everyone to come home.

---

Getting Sarah May's adoption official was harder than with Christopher since she didn't have a birth certificate or any known parents. However, with Father Frank's help, they were able to have the process ameliorated a little. Steve came home that day with his arms full of babies. Christopher's arms were full of flowers Steve had picked up from the store. They got into the door and Steve was surprised to see Bucky sitting on the steps. "Hey," he said worriedly, thinking something was the matter. "What's up?"

---

Bucky got up quickly and came over with the envelope in hand. He kissed Sarah May and then Christopher and then Steve. "We got it," he said and held up the paperwork for Steve to see, Diana whining at his heels for Steve's attention. "She's ours. Look!" He giggled happily and even bounced a little bit. "She's ours."

---

Steve gasped and then turned to Sarah May. "Look at that! You're officially part of our family, Sarah May," he said happily to her. Sarah May smiled quickly because all eyes were on her. Christopher seemed a little less enthused about his sister getting all the attention.

---

"Can I hold her?" Bucky asked and reached for Sarah May. He hadn't seen his babies all day and he wanted to love on them a little bit. "Ya-Ya, you want to come to Papa? Can Papa hold you, Sweet Pea?"

---

Steve was busy snuggling their daughter but he couldn't hog her when Bucky was all excited, too. He passed their baby girl over and immediately she reached up to try to grab at Bucky's hair. Diana sat up on her hind legs and whined louder until Steve reached down to pet her. "Let's celebrate tonight, Buck. Let's all go out to dinner, please? Or we can have their aunts and uncles come over."

---

Bucky was so happy to have Sarah May be officially theirs that he didn't care in the slightest that she was pulling his hair. He just wanted to hold her and kiss her and make sure she knew that she was loved. "I think going out is a great idea. Do you want everyone to come? Or just some of them? It may be a bit much if it's all of us and Nat, Clint, Tim, and Sam."
"Papa," Christopher whined.

Steve was quick to grab one of Christopher's favorite toys and traded the flowers for it. "Play with your dinosaur, Love, your papa is playing with your sister right now. You will have your turn soon," he said softly to him. Steve looked over and smiled. "I think just us would be enough if we are going out. We can hang out with our friends another night."

Bucky held Sarah May close and leaned in to kiss his son's head. "I love you, Bean. Don't worry. Papa will give you extra hugs later." He adjusted his daughter and reached to touch Steve's cheek lightly. "Just us then. Let's go someplace other than the diner this time. I know you love it, but we always go there."

Steve pouted when Bucky ruled out the diner. He loved that diner. "What about the Italian place?" he asked. He usually wasn't big into Italian food but he knew the girls liked that place and he wanted them to be excited for a little celebration.

Bucky chuckled and shook his head. "Are you going to eat this time or just keep asking for bread and taking tomatoes from my plate?" he asked, knowing that Steve was, in general, not a fan of most Italian food. He said he didn't like the way spices were used and stuff was too drowned in sauce.

"Bread and tomatoes, unless Italians come up with better food," Steve said. He set their boy down and watched as Christopher tottered over to Diana and hung his arms around her neck. "Should we have the babies nap for a little before we go out?" Steve asked.

Bucky shook his head but knew his husband wasn't going to budge on it. Bucky would just ask for extra tomatoes. "Yeah, let's have them go ahead and nap. Maybe even give Christopher a bath. It looks like he has strawberry jelly in his hair."

"He got into something at the florist," Steve explained. "I don't know what it is but all I know is I had to pay to replace it," he laughed. Steve couldn't get upset at their curious baby boy, but he certainly told him he had to be more careful and not grab at things while Steve was talking to the adults.

Bucky stifled his chuckle and rubbed at the gunk in his son's hair. It was pretty typical of him. And he would probably get worse with having messy influences like Lilly and Bucky around. "What are the flowers for?" he asked curiously and saw an array of roses and baby's breath. He assumed they were for him but he could be wrong.
"I bought them for you," Steve said. "I had a good feeling about today and wanted to make you feel special. Guess my gut feeling was right." He beamed proudly. "I can't wait until we can tell the girls and my mom. She's going to be thrilled."

---

Bucky took the flowers in his free hand and headed to the kitchen to put them in a vase. "Christopher, Bean, do you want a snack?" he called so he would follow him to the kitchen. "Steve, you have no idea how happy I was when I saw the letter. Diana and I waited on the steps for an hour. We played a game where she tried to eat my sandwich and I threw bits of ham across the hall for her to pick up."

---

Christopher sure as hell knew the word 'snack' by now and did a complete turn around to follow Bucky into the kitchen. Steve followed as well, which meant Diana came too. "Why would you make my perfect princess run to pick up scraps of food?" He knelt down next to his dog and kissed her head. "You deserve better than that," he cooed at her.

---

"She was having fun!" Bucky defended. "She was barking and skittering to get the ham bits and then she would come back and stare at me until I tossed another." He huffed half-heartedly and put Sarah May in her high chair before doing the same with Christopher.

---

"That's cause she doesn't know any better. Diana deserves to be hand fed," Steve answered with a pout. He picked his large puppy up and held her like a baby. Sarah May heard Christopher talking to Bucky, so she tried to mimic the noises he made even though it came out as unintelligible blabber.

---

Bucky watched Steve and shook his head. He loved that big doofy dog so much. "You think you can maybe give her some food in her bowl and then help me feed your children? There is formula made up on the counter if you want to take Sarah May."

---

"Sure," Steve said. He kissed Diana again and the dog panted happily as she was set back on her feet. Steve filled up her food and water bowl before going to get the formula. When Bucky moved away to get something, Sarah May started to cry.

---

"What?" Bucky gasped and looked to his daughter. "What, Sweet Pea? Papa is trying to get your brother some food. What's the matter?"

Christopher scrunched up his face and reached for his sister saying, "Ya-Ya, no!" And when he couldn't get to her, he started to cry too.

---

With two crying babies, Steve had to abandon the formula and instead, pick up his baby girl and pass her to Bucky before picking up Christopher, too. "There, there. Don't worry, Bean, I know you tried."
No need to cry. It’s snack time. Don’t you want your snack?"

---

Christopher calmed down a bit and wiped his eyes with the back of his hand before pointing towards his small pile of grapes and whining. Sarah May took a little longer to stop sniffling and whimpering but eventually, she stopped and just pressed her face to Bucky’s neck. "She's unusually needy today. Has she been like this all day?" Bucky asked.

---

"I think she's been missing you," Steve answered. "She hasn't been like this with me, so I'm kind of suspecting she's tired of seeing my dumb face," he said, half joking. Sarah May seemed to notice more than Christopher when Bucky wasn't around.

---

Bucky shook his head and kissed Sarah May's hair. "But, Ya-Ya, your daddy has such a handsome face," he said and set her down for a second so he could slip his shirt off and then hold her again. She immediately spread her arms out like a starfish and rested her cheek against Bucky's bare chest. "Is that what you needed, Sweet Pea. You needed some connecting time with Papa?" Bucky felt a tug and looked down to see Christopher was trying to get his shirt from his hand. "Oh, you want my shirt?" he asked and let go of it. "There you go, Bean."

---

Steve chuckled at how Sarah May sprawled out on her papa's arms and how Christopher grabbed for his shirt. "Man, these kids are taking everything from you," Steve teased. He leaned in and kissed him. "Look at her, Bucky. She knows she's ours now."

---

Bucky giggled happily and held his little girl. "Oh, she was always ours. She just knows that no one can take her now." He looked to Christopher so had bunched the shirt up in his hands and was sucking on the collar, having a merry old time doing so.

---

Moments later, Sarah’s arrival was signaled as Diana went bounding over to the door and started to bark. She came through the door with her arms full of groceries and a huff of a sigh. "Yes, Diana, I know. I know. I'm home," she hushed the dog softly. She looked up and saw her boys in the kitchen and smiled. "You two look happy."

---

Bucky grinned at his mother-in-law and pushed some things off of the counters so she could put the groceries down. He was a little embarrassed to be shirtless in front of her but he figured she would understand that he was trying to connect with Sarah May. "Steve, Babe, you want to tell her?"

---

Sarah had spent a few decades as a nurse and having Bucky shirtless in front of her certainly wasn't the worst thing she'd ever seen. Things like that didn't even phase her as he waited for the news. Steve practically burst out with it. "We got Sarah May's adoption papers in today!"
Sarah yelped excitedly and held her son for a few seconds before coming over to Bucky and Sarah May and hugging them as well. "I'm so happy! My third grandbaby is official now," she said and kissed Sarah May's head gently. She thought for a second and then snapped her fingers. "I should make a cake!"

Steve grinned. He loved how involved his mom was in their lives and it was so typical of her to want to bake. "We're going out to dinner tonight, too, Ma."

Sarah turned back. "Oh, are we going to the diner?"

"No," Bucky said and blinked a few times. "Italian... but we don't have to. I guess if you both really want the diner then we can go to the diner again." He shook his head. "That'll just mean that Steve owes me a really good date at a really fancy restaurant and then some very nice sex afterward."

Steve blushed. "Bucky!" he scolded.

Sarah just laughed and pet Steve's shoulder. "Don't worry, Love. Enjoy the fruits of your sex drive while it lasts," she encouraged, knowing full well that she was thoroughly embarrassing her son.

Bucky chuckled and said, "Baby, you should really be used to this from me by now. Besides, it's no secret to your mom that we have sex." He sort of liked when he could conspire with Sarah to get Steve all embarrassed and red in the face like that.

"We never had sex, what are you talking about? I'm still a virgin," Steve said, messing around a little bit himself.

"Steven," Sarah laughed. She kissed his cheek and then started to pull out the supplies to bake anyway. "I'm still making a cake," she said. Raphael jumped onto the counter, so she gave him a little treat.

"Steve, you keep lying to your mother and I'll have to show her some proof," Bucky threatened with a cheeky grin and took a seat at the table with Sarah May gnawing on his fingers happily. That had been a new development. She had recently started trying to munch on things and Bucky expected her first teeth to pop through in a month or two.

"You wouldn't dare," Steve said in a scandalized tone. Christopher got his attention again by waving Bucky's shirt in the air to show that he was tired of it. Steve took it from him and set it aside. "If you let Ya-Ya do that now, she's going to expect you to still let her do it after she's got teeth," he warned.
Bucky knew he was right but he didn't really mind. "She's our official daughter today, I don't care if she started chewing a hole through my arm. She can do whatever she wants right now." He sighed happily and watched her. "Did you see the new birth certificate? It has the date we chose. It says 'December 15, 1985'." He beamed at Steve happily. They had doubled checked and found that December fifteen had been the last day of Hanukkah so that's the day they picked.

---

Steve gasped. "Really? No way." He rushed over to check and sure enough, it was right there. They had an official birthday for their little girl. "That's amazing!" Christopher started to wiggle so he could get down, so Steve set him back on the floor so he could wander. "I love it. They're going to be able to go to school together in the same grade since they're born the same year."

---

"Do you think they will want to do that?" Bucky asked and removed his hand from Sarah May's mouth and replaced it with the bottle. "I mean, I don't know of many kids who aren't twins who want to be in the same grade together."

---

"Why wouldn't they?" Steve asked, watching Christopher closely as he followed his nana around the kitchen. "They're going to be best friends. And they can look out for each other and help each other with their homework."

---

Bucky chuckled and heard Christopher whine for his nana to pick her up as he tugged on her pant leg. "Well, we can think about that once they are going into school. You're still wanting to homeschool for a few years, right?"

---

Steve nodded in response. "Yeah, I want to teach them good habits and skills and all. So I want to homeschool until they get into middle school, you know? I'll be bringing them to enough playgrounds to have them get social with other kids their age," he said.

---

Sarah May finished up her bottle and yawned before clunking her head back against Bucky's chest. "By that time, they may be so sick of being educated together that they will want to be in different classes," he said and grabbed his shirt to gently drape it over his daughter like a blanket.

---

Steve pouted. "But what if one of them doesn't feel challenged enough? Just because they're in the same grade doesn't mean they got to be in the same class. Maybe different schools entirely? I don't know. We've got plenty of time," Sarah May closed her eyes, looking so happy to be where she was.

---

Bucky shook his head and tucked the shirt a little tighter around his daughter. "We can do the same school, Babe. They may even be fine with the same class. That's a while from now, though. For right now, I think it's family snuggle time because she's already almost asleep. Christopher should be ready for a nap soon too so maybe we can just lay in bed with them for a bit?"
Steve nodded. "Sure." He loved it when they got to snuggle with their babies. Steve took Christopher from Sarah and followed Bucky upstairs.

"Play?" Christopher asked.

Steve laughed and shook his head. "No play, Bean. Sleepy time. Look at your sister, she's ready for naps," he said sweetly to him.

Christopher tried again with a half-hearted, "Play?" but he was just too tired to keep it up and he slowly molded himself against Steve and yawned.

Bucky gently laid down on the bed and pulled a blanket over himself and Sarah May. "Steve," Bucky started and looked over to his husband. "I think I'm going to schedule to have my first injection for my headaches. This medication hasn't been helping. I think it's time to try it."

Steve laid down beside his husband and cuddled Christopher to his chest. He stroked his hand over the baby's little back and marveled at how lucky he was to have them. He looked over at Bucky and gave him a concerned look. "Are you sure? Do you want me to go with you, Baby?"

"Yes, I'm sure," Bucky said with conviction. "I've been thinking about this for about a week now. I need to just do it. I know it hurts but it's supposed to help. And I most definitely need you there. I can't do this by myself. I can't even call a doctor to schedule anything without you being near me just in case."

Steve nodded. "You know I'll spend every second that I'm allowed to at your side. We can give the babies to my mom to watch for the day and we can hide away in the bedroom all day so I can cuddle and take care of you until you're feeling better."

Bucky took a little breath of relief and nodded. "Thank you. I love you," he said and smiled at Steve, albeit a little pained because of his fear about going for the treatment. "There's another thing," he added and scratched his hand through his hair, giving Steve time to respond.

"I love you too," Steve promised. Then he kissed Christopher. "I love you three," he said and then kissed Sarah May. "And I love you four." He smiled and laid his cheek on Bucky's shoulder. "What is it?" he asked quietly so he wouldn't wake their daughter.

Bucky looked at Steve for a few long moments and said slowly, "I am going to try... to quit smoking. I've been thinking about what you said when we were in Seneca. And even though I smoke to help with my need to drink, I think my drinking problems have stemmed off enough that I could work on cutting back on smoking now."

---

"Wow, really?" Steve was surprised and impressed. He reached over to stroke Bucky's jaw gently. "With every day you make me prouder and prouder to be your best friend and husband," Steve said gently. "You're doing so well at everything you put your mind to."

---

Bucky tried to smile but he really couldn't. He was scared that it wouldn't work. He was scared that he would quit smoking and it would just make his alcoholism come back with a vengeance. And he also couldn't really smile because he sometimes felt like he did so much to try to be better for his family and Steve didn't. It wasn't that Steve had a billion things he could improve on like Bucky did. But Bucky still thought it would be better for Steve and everyone if Steve saw a therapist or somebody about his sensitivity about his lungs. He snapped at anyone who suggested he take it easy and he almost refused to acknowledge that he wasn't as capable as he had been. But Bucky didn't say any of this, not wanting to ruin a good day. Instead, he just said, "Thank you. I'm going to try."

---

Usually, that sort of praise would have Bucky smiling and kissing him or snuggling him in some sort of manner. He could tell that something was on Bucky's mind and his face fell a bit. Typically, if Bucky was keeping something to himself, it was because he knew Steve wouldn't like what he had to say. "What?" he asked, already a little on the defensive side.

---

Bucky shook his head and looked to Sarah May sleeping happily on his chest. He didn't want to have an argument on her special day. So, he would just try to bypass the conversation for now. "It's nothing. Well, it's not important right now." He paused a second then added, "You'll have to give me some patience and understanding just like you did with the drinking. I'm going to have to just start slow and maybe only smoke a few times a week. Then down to once a week. Then be done entirely. But I'll probably slip up at times."

---

Steve didn't look too convinced but he got distracted by the topic change. "Of course, I'll give you patience, Bucky. The smoking is a heck of a lot smaller of an issue than your drinking was. I can't believe that it's already been almost a year since you started seriously cutting down. And now look at you."

---

"Yeah, look at me," Bucky said, letting himself give a bashful little grin. He was proud of himself for being able to get a grip on his alcoholism. Only a year before, he was still coming to terms with being able to accept that he was an alcoholic. And then AA helped so much and so did his family. "I won't lie to you and say that it's easy now. It's still really difficult sometimes. And if someone in my group falls off the wagon, we all want to as well. It's just hard to move past the dependence."

---

"I bet you're an inspiration to all of them, though. I'm not saying you were irresponsible or a mess or anything when I met you, but you've grown so much and changed for the better to support your family." Steve cut himself off and got quiet as he realized something. "I haven't grown for my family, have I?" Was that what Bucky was thinking?

---

Bucky was going to joke that Steve was allowed to say Bucky was an irresponsible mess before him because he sort of grew out of it when he met Steve anyway. But then Steve hit the nail on the head and he didn’t know what to say. He just chewed his lip and hoped Steve wouldn’t make him answer.

---

Bucky's silence confirmed it and Steve looked hurt and worried. "But I’m a good dad, aren’t I?" Steve asked in a quiet tone, now suddenly afraid that he wasn't good enough for their children. And now he was thinking of all the things that the girls and Bucky complained that Steve had insisted was for the greater good, like slippers in the home and designated spots for backpackers or parenting tactics he refused to waver on even if Bucky opposed them.

---

Bucky was quick to console his husband. He reached out and took Steve's hand and squeezed it. "Baby, you are a great dad. You're naturally good at being a caretaker. You have been since I met you. I mean, you're just twenty-four and you've got a husband and a total of five kids to take care of. And you love us so much and you do so much good for us. And we all love you."

---

Steve gave Bucky a frown and squeezed his hand back. "I know you all love me. But I haven't made myself any better for you guys. I've just taken over and assumed that everything I did or wanted was right. The backpacks, the matching shirts in our family pictures, the stupid costumes I buy for the babies, insisting we do everything the way my mom does it…"

---

"Baby, I don't really know what to tell you," Bucky admitted. "I'll be honest that some of the changes you made when you started living with the girls and I were hard for us to adjust to. But we quickly recognized that it's just who you are. You like to be in control. And that's fine. You're that way with most things. I just think sometimes when you can't be in control, you get a little too angry and you tend to lash out or think it's some sort of personal attack on you." He sighed and scooted closer to Steve, being sure not to wake his daughter. "A lot of what you do is helpful and good and a major improvement to all of our lives. But sometimes it's okay to not take over everything. You remember when we talked about how you are very sexually controlling? You remember how apologetic you were? And you have been working to get better about that. You've been easing up a little and exploring more. And I noticed you don't harp on Lilly about her messes as much as you used to. You've let her take back some of her control of her own things and you only really step in if it's just too big of a mess and it becomes an inconvenience for the family."

---

Steve looked a bit ashamed of himself. Here he was, thinking he was being the best he could for his family, but, in reality, Bucky was doing ten times more than Steve ever had. He listened to Bucky and seemed to reluctantly understand that certain things would have to go, even though he believed that those things made the house a better and cleaner place. "What else should I do? Besides easing up on my control issues?" he asked.
Bucky watched his husband's face carefully and kicked himself for bringing any of this up and making Steve feel bad about himself. "I'm not sure, Love," he said after a while. "There's just a lot that I didn't want to do but I did anyway because it was what was best for our family or it was what you wanted." He stopped drinking, he went to AA, he picked up more hours at work after Steve's retirement, he gave up once again on his thoughts of going to school when Christopher came around, he compromised sexually quite a lot, he went to the doctor at Steve's request multiple times, and he was going to work on quitting smoking. He didn't know how to ask Steve again to seek some sort of help for his anger about his lungs and his body image problems without making Steve angry.

---

Steve got a little tense and he looked down at Christopher, who was now dozing off on his chest. He must've fallen asleep a few minutes ago. Steve bit his bottom lip and was quiet for a moment before looking back over at his husband. "Can you write things down for me? I guess... I guess I react too strongly when you tell me to my face. Maybe if you write it down and give me time alone to process it, I can react better."

---

Bucky was once again quick to acknowledge and validate Steve. "Yes, Steve. I can give that a try. I'll do my best. You know I'm not great with words, especially writing words, but I will do what I can for you. My perfect, sweet husband." He kissed Steve's hand and smiled up at him with sympathetic eyes. "I hope you know that I'm not angry at you. And I hope you know that you are so perfect and nothing is wrong with you. I just want you to be happy. And when I see you getting unhappy, I want to try to do what I can to fix that."

---

Steve pet his hand over Christopher's back again and looked between both of their children. They looked so peaceful and comfortable relaxing on their dads' chests. If Steve did things right, he would fix his mistakes before their memory was formed enough to remember them. "I know you're not angry at me. I guess I'm mostly disappointed in myself for not growing as a person like you have."

---

Bucky sighed and tried to smile again at Steve. "It's not a contest, Baby," he said. "I wasn't even going to say anything about it. You're just really good at reading me. But it's not like it's always on my mind. Just sometimes. And I was going to try to figure out a calm way to discuss it sometime with you."

---

"I know it's not a contest. But when you've done as much as you have while I haven't done anything, that means that there's a problem and I don't want to be that problem," Steve explained. "I want to be the best person I can be for you, your sisters, and our kids."

---

Bucky nodded and reached to touch Steve's face gently. He thought Steve was already pretty wonderful and a great guardian and father and husband and son. "Okay. Then I'll help you wherever you want help. How's that? I know you like doing things on your own so if you don't want help then I'll stay out of it. But if anything comes up that you need me for, just ask."

---
"Sounds like a plan to me," Steve said soft, sweetly. "I love you, Bucky. Thank you for being patient." He snuggled close to him as best as he could with the kids on them. Steve's heart melted as he watched Sarah May give a big yawn. "She's so beautiful. I wonder what toys she's going to like best. Or if she's going to follow Christopher everywhere as they explore the house."

---

Bucky watched his daughter readjust on his chest. "I have a feeling she's going to be looking to him for a lot of things as they grow up. She's already sitting on her own and Christopher is already so attached to her." Bucky yawned as well and checked the clock. The girls would be back soon and they all could go to dinner. But he was so tired already and wouldn't complain about having a short nap himself.

---

Steve grinned. "Sometimes I catch Christopher turning around to show Ya-Ya something and he forgets that she's off taking a nap," he said. "If you want to sleep, I'm not tired. I'll stay up and make sure you don't roll over on our girl or something." Bucky probably only had about a half hour or less before the girls got home anyway.

---

Bucky let his eyes blink slowly a few times and he yawned once more. "That would be nice. Thank you, Babe. If you need to do things around the room you can put Christopher next to Sarah May and I'll just hold them both."

---

Steve stroked his fingers through Bucky's hair and kissed him a few times along his jaw. Once he felt that Bucky was properly loved, he let him go nap. He looked so peaceful finally. It was hard not to watch him and the kids. And it was hard not to worry about what other things he needed to work on for his family.
Chapter Notes

Second half of the day with Sarah May's official adoption.

Not much later, the girls arrived home. But Steve felt like Bucky deserved a little longer to nap so he gave him a few extra minutes before he giving him a gentle nudge. "Love," he said softly. "It's time to wake up."

---

Bucky blinked awake and found Sarah May staring at him from her spot on his chest and Christopher sitting next to his head and messing with his hair. "I don't want to wake up, Steve," Bucky complained and smiled weakly at his kids. "But I guess I don't have much choice. These two won't let me sleep any more, I'm sure."

---

When her pop woke up, Sarah May grinned and made little pleased baby noises at him. "Hi, Papa," Christopher said, as if he was waiting for the second that Bucky's eyes opened to say it.

"Christopher is going to ask you to p-l-a-y the second you sit up, I bet," Steve said.

---

Bucky chuckled and kissed both his kids. "Well, we can't p-l-a-y. We have to go to d-i-n-n-e-r," he said and hoisted himself up from the bed, holding Sarah May close and picking Christopher up with the other arm. "You want food, Bean?"

---

Christopher's head snapped up at the question. He said, "Eat?" and had an adorable, curious expression on his face.

"As if you got to ask our big guy twice." Steve stood up and smoothed out his shirt. Christopher kept signing at Bucky even if some of the signs were pure nonsense.

---

"He's a little like his Pops and his Aunt Lilly, isn't he? Always ready for more food," Bucky said and handed Sarah May to Steve and set Christopher down. He pulled on a shirt and a sweater and then picked up his son again. The four of them made their way back downstairs to the kitchen where the girls and Sarah were hanging around. "Is everyone ready to go for dinner?"

---

Lilly gasped. "We're going to dinner?" Sarah hadn't told the girls about the adoption papers yet since she figured it was news that Bucky and Steve should share. "Did we run out of food here? Why are we going out? Is it because I got a good grade on my math test?"
"Did you get a good grade?" Bucky asked excitedly and looked to Becca to confirm that Lilly wasn't just blowing smoke.

Becca nodded and set her backpack down on the table and said, "Lilly got an eighty-three percent." She smiled at her sister and then to Bucky. She had really been working on being proud of her siblings when the chance arose and not just tearing them down when they weren't like her. She was doing pretty well so far even though it didn’t come naturally to her yet.

Lilly hurried to grab her backpack so she could show it off. "I studied really hard," she said. "I pretended I was a teacher to Sarah May and explained how it all worked. She had no choice but to sit there and listen to me so that's how I studied," she explained.

Steve grabbed a magnet and put Lilly's test on the fridge. "This is great, Lilly, we're so proud of you. Look at that. You got a B on a math test. That's so amazing."

"Yeah, we are so proud," Bucky said and kissed his sister's head. "I guess that means we are celebrating two things tonight. The other being that Ya-Ya's adoption papers went through and we got them today. She's officially Steve's daughter and my fourth dependent. No one can take her now."

Becca smiled but it was Lilly who had the bigger reaction. "Yeah!" she said, punching the air. "That's right. Suck on that, Government!" she yelped.

Sarah May's eyes went wide, startled by the ruckus Lilly was making. Christopher added to it by shouting, "Leeee Leeee!"

Bucky chuckled and held Christopher out for Lilly to take him as he fidgeted relentlessly. "We were thinking about going for Italian food, but what do you two think? Steve isn't big on Italian, so if you want something else, that might be better."

"I got the good grades, I should decide," Lilly said.

Becca looked physically pained to swallow what she was about to say but she somehow managed. "I want Italian," she said.

"You want spaghetti, Christopher? You're going to make a big mess, aren't you?" Lilly asked and kissed his face.

"No. No spaghetti," Bucky said and glowered at his sister. His son made way too big of a mess with spaghetti. "He can have something much less of a disaster to clean and something easier for him to eat." He looked to Steve to back him up on it.
"Yeah, spaghetti is a parent's nightmare," Steve agreed.

Lilly huffed and made a face. "Fine. He can have... tortellini!" she said. "Yeah, Christopher! Italian food!"

Sarah set the cake in the fridge to cool and then washed up her hands. "Are we all ready to go?" she asked.

"Yes, let's go," Bucky agreed and worked to get Christopher into his coat as Lilly held him. "Here pretty soon it'll be springtime and I won't have to wrestle a one-year-old into wearing a damn coat out in the cold."

"But then next winter we'll be wrestling a two-year-old into a coat and it'll be even harder," Steve laughed. Christopher put up such a fight it was ridiculous. Sarah May let her parents dress her warmly without a fuss. Thank goodness. Once they were all ready, Steve led the way out of their home.

Once they got to the restaurant, Bucky settled Christopher into a highchair next to him. Lilly seemed to be starving already as she glared at the pictures in the menu. "Can I get two meals?" she asked and looked up at Bucky and Steve.

"You're not going to finish two meals, Lilly," Steve said patiently. "How about you order one and I order another and then we can split it." Steve didn't plan on eating his anyway but at least Lilly wouldn't feel entitled to two full meals.

Bucky gave Steve a little exasperated look because whatever Lilly didn't eat was going to come to him since Steve wouldn't want it anyway. "Fine, Lil, order two meals. I'll take what you don't finish," Bucky said and glanced back at Steve. "You're trying to get me to put on weight. You miss the little stomach pudge I had while I was drinking."

Steve looked over at his husband. "I can't be the only one gaining weight here. I need you to pack on some winter pounds just like I am," he joked.

Christopher smacked his hands a few times on the high chair to make noise. "Papa. Papa, play?" he asked.

"What winter pounds?" Bucky asked and poked Steve's side. "You haven't gained a single ounce since I met you." He turned to his son and held his hands together so he wouldn't make noise. "No play, Bean. Dinner time. Play later."
"I have," Steve protested. "I lost muscle mass and gained some fat. I may weigh the same but it's not of the same stuff," he complained.

"Well, I haven't noticed a difference. I think you're sexy as all hell regardless," Bucky said absently and gave Steve's back a little rub before checking over the menu.

"I noticed," Steve said pathetically with a little frown.

A waiter came over and forced a smile at the family before him. "Hello, everyone. What can I get you all tonight?"

Lilly was first to order and she went ahead and got two meals like she wanted. Becca got a half plate of spaghetti and Bucky went with chicken fettuccine. Steve didn't order anything but asked for extra bread to be brought to the table. "Sir, do you have any sort of kid's menu for him?" Bucky asked and pet Christopher's hair.

"We don't have a kid's menu, but we offer any of our regular platters in a smaller size for half price," the waiter explained. "Is there a smaller-sized plate you would like for him? Or would some more bread and sauce be appropriate?"

"Oh, um..." Bucky looked at the menu again. "Can you just do noodles and cheese and some bread? I don't think sauce is a good idea," he said and looked to Steve to confirm. He didn't know if that was best or not.

Steve nodded. "What he said," he confirmed. Once the waiter was gone, he kissed Christopher's cheek and pet his hand over his head. "You're eating such big boy food, Bean. Soon you're going to have to share with Ya-Ya." He looked back to Bucky with a happy smile. "It's such a relief that she's legally ours now."

"Steve, I'm so beyond happy that we got those papers," Bucky said and watched Sarah May as she looked around the restaurant and stared at people occasionally. "She's going to be as old as Christopher before we know it."

"It's going to be so amazing watching them grow up together. She's such a perfect, little girl. You think she's going to take after her Aunt Lilly or Aunt Becca more?" he asked, looking over at Bucky's sisters.
"Becca, for sure," Bucky said and nodded once. "She's going to be like Becca and you. Christopher is going to be like me and Lilly. I just know it."

"Well, someone's got to take after me," Becca said. "I mean, Christopher is definitely not it."

---

"Christopher can be just as smart," Steve said. "That's like taking after you. Most one-year-olds don't know as many words as he does."

The waiter came back with their dinners and set them down. "Let me know if you need anything else," he said.

---

Becca scoffed and crossed her arms. "I didn't mean he wasn't smart. I meant that he is loud and messy," she said and smiled at Christopher and pet his hair. She was also working on showing her love for her nephew and niece instead of ignoring them and pushing them away like she tended to do.

---

"All babies are messy," Steve said. Just as he said that, Christopher grabbed a handful of his food and practically covered his face with it as he attempted to eat it. "It's the way he shows his love. The bigger mess he makes, the more he loves you. Why do you think he poops so big when you're watching him?"

---

"I think it's because you feed him too much before I have babysitting duty," Becca said and glowered at Steve for a second then looked to Bucky. "Also, you still owe me from last time you went to the doctor's and put me in charge."

---

"He loves food. I can't say no to him when he asks for strawberries. Look at that face," Steve said, gesturing to Christopher's messy, cheesy face. He looked at Bucky when Becca accused him of owing her. "Oh? Did you leave Becca with a messy diaper to change?"

---

Bucky shook his head. "I left Becca with both babies and Lilly and the dog. Remember? We went to get my medicine while your mom was grocery shopping? Apparently, it didn't go well at the house for the solid forty-five minutes that we were away."

---

"That sounds like hell for Becca. At least we know that she won't be inclined to have babies of her own anytime soon after learning what it's like to put up with ours," Steve offered. "So how do you want to cash in the favor we owe you?" Steve asked.

---

At that comment, Becca glanced from Steve to Lilly and then to Bucky, keeping her head down. It caught Bucky's attention and he stared at her for a second. She was hiding something. But she shook it off and said, "I wouldn't say no to a bigger bookshelf."

---

Steve was well trained to spot tell signs like that. He didn't want to push at dinner, though. "That's a tall order for 45 minutes," Steve said in a bargaining voice. "However, I have noticed the effort you've put into being more supportive to everyone. So I think we can make that bookshelf happen."

---

"How about," Bucky started. "You help me make the bookshelf? That way it will be as big as you want it to be. And we will have put effort into it. And it'll be a project for just the two of us? What do you think of that?"

---

Steve worried that Becca wouldn't take it but, instead, she nodded. "Can we carve a cool design into it and stain it so it looks dark and old like the shelves in Trinity Library?" she asked, her tone picking up a little bit.

---

Bucky smiled brightly back and nodded. "We can certainly try. I think we should be able to get that to work. We can have Steve help draw it on and then we will carve it." He was so grateful for Becca's recent campaign to be a more understanding member of the family. It felt more like before they lost their parents. He felt like Becca was able to let loose a little bit. She was able to show that she loved them again. It was getting closer to how they used to be together - the best of friends and siblings.

---

Steve was happy to be included in the project as well. He knew it was going to be something special between Bucky and Becca, but it was nice to have a part in it as well. "Sounds like a great plan to me," he said.

"Papa," Christopher said. When Bucky looked at him, he signed for more even though there was plenty of food scattered around his plate.

---

"Bean, you can pick them up," Bucky said and brought a noodle to his son's mouth. "There you go. You got it." He looked at Sarah May to make sure she was doing okay as well. "Did she drink her whole bottle or just part of it?"

---

Christopher opened his mouth to eat his noodle and then signed again for more. "She only drank half," Sarah answered. "She will let us know when she wants more," Sarah brushed her thumb over the baby's cheek. "You'll never guess what I found at the store today," she said to strike up a new conversation.

---

Bucky stared at Sarah May for a few seconds, wishing she would eat more. But she looked far too distracted by what was happening around her to even remotely care about eating. "What did you find?" Bucky asked, turning back to Sarah.

---

"I found a doctor play set. You know, with a stethoscope and lab coat. But it was directed at girls instead of all the little sets for boys. I wanted to get it for Sarah May but it was ages five and up and hopefully in five years' time, there will be more things like that for her," Sarah said.

---

Becca and Lilly nodded and Lilly said, "Yes, oh, my god. Get that for her."

Bucky grinned at his sisters and then his daughter. "That's really good. Teaching girls they can be doctors and other things like that is important. And, heaven knows there isn't enough of that encouragement right now. I want my babies to know they can be anything."

---

"What, I should get it for her and put it in storage for five years?" Sarah asked with a smile. "I mean, it's not like I didn't do that before with Steve when I found a cute shirt he wasn't big enough for yet," she mused. She didn't buy lots of things for her grandkids because she wasn't the material sort but she took them anywhere that she could.

---

Compared to the Rogers side of the family, the Barnes' were hoarders. They kept a lot of stuff that was useless just to have it. They hated throwing out anything with the slightest bit of sentimental value. Now that they were financially stable and didn't have to sell important family things for money, they just didn't get rid of a single thing. "I'm sure they will have something similar when she's old enough," Bucky said.

---

"Yeah, I would hope so. That and more." Sarah turned to Ya-Ya and said sweetly, "you're going to become a doctor and save lives and make so much money that you'll be able to buy whatever house you want." Of course, she wouldn't be disappointed either if Sarah May didn't find an high-paying career. She just hoped her grandkids ended up better off than she and Steve were when he was growing up.

After their dinners were finished, the waiter gave them the check and Steve's mom insisted on paying. Bucky tried to get her to back down so he could pay but it was usually useless to argue with Sarah. Steve definitely got some of his stubbornness from her.

---

Once they were back home, everyone was beat. Lilly took up residence in the middle of the hall as she laid down by Diana and slowly pet her coat. Becca immediately went to her room. And Sarah held her granddaughter until she decided it was time to head off to sleep as well. "Steve," Bucky said quietly and pointed to Christopher who had been building a block tower but was now asleep on the ground surrounded by blocks with Raphael curled up at his feet.

---

Steve gasped at the adorable sight. "Oh, my god." Rather than grabbing his camera, he picked up his sketchbook and sat on the couch so he could draw it. "Look at our little boy, Buck. Have you ever seen such a perfect little boy? He's so beautiful." Steve glanced up at his husband. "Can you get me a glass of water, Love? I think I'm going to be drawing for a while."

---

Bucky went and got Steve some water then came to sit down next to him. He watched Steve draw for a while and then carefully touched his leg. "You are so talented. I love your art. When are you going to be allowed to start your Mommy and Me art class?"

---

Steve blushed at the compliment. "I can't do it for another few months. But what I've started doing is coming up with lesson plans and class ideas so I'll be ready by the time I'm allowed to start them. I've tested a few out with Christopher."

---

"Oh yeah? I didn't know about that." Bucky asked excitedly and looked to his sleeping son. "How did that go? I'm guessing Sarah May hasn't been able to participate quite as much as Christopher can."

---

"No, but she still has fun mushing the baby paints in her hands," Steve said. "I've tried different types of things for Christopher to paint on - canvas, paper, cardboard, old shirts. I'm trying to see what sort of crafts we can make out of all different materials."

---

Bucky nodded and rolled his eyes. "Mushing things in their hands is just about our babies' favorite," he said and watched Steve finish up his drawing. "I think it's time to get our Bean back to the nursery. Ya-Ya is already asleep in her crib."

---

"But he's so cute," Steve complained but he knew the crib was a lot safer for Christopher. He would get up to trouble if left loose in the middle of the night. He set his book aside and gently scooped their son into his arms. Raphael meowed softly and sulked off to curl up on a warm spot of the couch.

---

Bucky went up to the nursery with Steve and hovered over the cribs as he tucked in Christopher. "Maybe they will actually sleep in a little bit so we can sleep in a little bit. What's the odds of that happening?"

---

Steve snorted and looked over at his husband. "Babe, we are on track for a stream of children. We aren't going to get to sleep in until the new millennium," he joked. Steve had always been a morning person anyway, so he didn't mind waking up early for the babies.
"Well, then maybe some of them will be good sleepers for me so those of us who want to wake up at noon can do so and then you all can wake up at five in the morning," Bucky said and took Steve's hand. "Come on, let's let them sleep, Baby."

---

"The only baby that is a good sleeper is one that's been given sleeping medicine and we don't want that," he said. Steve took Bucky's hand and led him to their bedroom. Once inside he said, "Thank you for being honest with me today. I know I make it hard to tell me things I don't like to hear."

---

Bucky was quiet for a moment then said, "Yeah, Baby, just a little bit." He tried to be as calm and understanding as he could be as he said it. "I know..." he huffed out a sigh and slipped his hand on to Steve's cheek. "I know you're angry about your lungs and about Grant and about the way we have been treated. And so am I, believe me. But you've got to try to let me in a little more. Remember how much you worked to get me to talk to you about the things I hated talking about? This is like that. I don't try to make you upset when I'm being concerned about you. Please understand that."

---

Steve could feel himself tensing at the mention of his dumb lungs and their deceased child and he knew he was proving Bucky's point exactly. He was far too defensive and didn't handle those topics in a healthy manner. He knew it was only a matter of time before Bucky suggested that he go to a therapist. "I still don't want to talk to a stranger about my personal life," he said. "What alternatives do I have outside of a therapist?"

---

"I don't know," Bucky said softly and leaned into Steve for a hug. He was still frustrated that Steve seemed to think it was okay for his family to go see a therapist but he was too good for it or something. But Bucky didn't want to argue right then. "We can think about some other options. I just think talking to me about it seems to get you too worked up and I don't want to make things worse."

---

Steve kissed Bucky's cheek when Bucky hugged him. "Yeah... I don't mean to get worked up, I just do." He sighed. "What if I talk to Sam about everything? He was my partner and he has a psychology degree," Steve suggested. It seemed like a good compromise in his opinion. "And he volunteers at the VA to help with counseling there when he has free time."

---

Bucky looked into Steve's eyes and tried to hide the hurt in his own. It hurt that Steve felt more comfortable talking to Sam than him. But Bucky was also aware that his problems with Sam were not rational. He and Sam just got off on the wrong foot. Sam was a really amazing man who cared so much for Steve and their kids. And Steve and Natasha both trusted him so much. Bucky's insecurities just made him worried that Steve would complain about him to Sam again. But that wasn't Sam's fault. "Steve, Baby, if that is what you want, then you should try that."

---

Steve could tell that Bucky was upset. "Baby," Steve said. "It's not that I can't talk to you about it. It's just it always ends up in an argument when we do. And that's not your fault. I don't want to argue with you, Bucky. I'm not married to Sam. If we end up arguing, we get to go back home and cool off. But if me and you argue? I have to see my husband upset and feel rotten because I was the one who upset him."

---

"Yeah, I understand," Bucky said with a sigh. "It's just me being dumb and insecure like I always am. Maybe I need to talk to someone about that, huh? About being more confident. Because I can put up a front of charm and togetherness when I need to but you know the truth. And, in some ways, I'm still the same wreck that you found a year and a half ago."

---

"I think you deserve a break from self-improvement so I can catch up a little, Handsome," Steve said. "But if doing that will make you happier, then I won't stop you," he said sweetly. Steve leaned in to give Bucky another kiss. "You're not a wreck. You're the perfect man I fell in love with a year and a half ago."

---

Bucky hummed against the kiss and then lead them to the bed and started to undress Steve. He was a little too sleepy to be intimate but he wanted to be naked with his husband. He loved that. "I just know I need to work on it. Maybe my AA group will have advice."

---

Steve smiled when Bucky started to undress him and he helped by taking off his own pants. "That's a good idea," he said. "I'm glad you're able to find a lot of comfort with them. And I bet you set a great example and make them all proud every week."

---

"They are all very good people. They just lost their way. Just like me. And we all have been working so hard for so long. We have really grown close," Bucky said happily and pulled Steve's hands to his hips so he would help undress him now.

---

Steve nibbled at Bucky's neck affectionately. "You know they're welcome to the shelter any time. I know that a few people there are struggling with alcohol abuse but they're too afraid to go to AA. Maybe it would be a good outreach to do if anyone felt up to it."

---

"Maybe," Bucky said softly. "They don't know I have a husband. I don't talk about my home life with them. I'm too afraid of them treating me poorly because of it. They know I have kids and that's it." And they all knew about Bucky taking Missy's baby and then her and the child both passing. And they all missed her as well. But Bucky didn't bring that up.

---

"You haven't told them that?" Steve sounded a little surprised even though it wasn't all that shocking. He just assumed that if they were able to accept people who had addiction problems then they'd accept someone who loved another person of the same gender. "Then maybe we won't bring anyone to the shelter yet."
"That's probably best," Bucky said and pulled Steve up on the bed a bit so they could curl up under the covers. "But maybe I can come talk to the people at the shelter with alcohol problems and try to convince them to seek some sort of help."

Steve nodded. He wrapped his arms around him and pressed their naked bodies together. "That may work," he said. "I'm thinking about trying some of Tim's ideas. Do you think I'm wrong for making it not about dating and more about making friends?" he asked.

"No, Baby, I think you should do what you think is best. You know Tim. He gets excited about things so easily and then worries that he fucked up if no one else agrees with his excitement. He will be fine," Bucky said and shut his tired eyes for a second. "Talk to him about some of this other ideas. He has a lot."

Steve pressed his lips to the top of Bucky's head. "Alright. I'll let you get some sleep, Love. We had a busy day today." He closed his own eyes and drifted off to sleep faster than he expected he would.
Steve had planned Bucky's birthday for weeks. While Bucky was out doing a morning shift and the girls were at school, Steve decorated the house from head to toe with streamers, celebratory banners, and love notes all over. He and his mom spent forever baking a cake in the shape of a guitar preparing Bucky's favorite dinner. When Bucky finally got back home, Steve was waiting on the stairs with Diana and the kids – both of whom were wearing shirts that said 'I love my Papa."

---

Bucky was pretty bitter about having to work on his birthday. He would have much preferred to be with his family. But Reggie was sick and Tim was out of town and the other two slackers were unhelpful as usual so it was just him and Clint that day. He took the morning shift so he could at least have the afternoon and evening with his family.

After his shift was over, he rushed home quickly. He didn't expect a whole bunch for his birthday this year. The year before had just been he and Steve drinking and fucking until they fell asleep. Neither of them quite remembered his twenty-fifth. So Bucky anticipated a quiet night with some cake and then making love with Steve and moving on. But, instead, he walked into a house that had a birthday explosion all over it.

---

Steve felt bad about not remembering whether or not he gave Bucky a good celebration outside of the booze and sex so he tried to make it up by going twice as hard on the birthday stuff this year. "Happy birthday!" he shouted brightly, standing as Bucky came in.

Christopher let out a big "Paaapaaa!" to try and shout over Steve's voice.

---

Bucky gasped and looked around the house and at his family. "What is all this?" he asked and came up to them. "Baby, did you do this for me?" He bent down and picked up Christopher and looked at his shirt. "Where did you find these shirts? They look so cute. I love it."

---

"It's for your birthday, dummy. Of course, I did this for you," Steve sassed. Christopher hugged Bucky and gave him a wet kiss on the cheek. "I had the shirts custom made. I figured they could wear it any day but why not wear it first on one of the best days of the year?"

---

Bucky grinned so wide and looked around. "It's so much. The entire house is in birthday chaos. You didn't have to do all of this." He pulled Steve a little closer and kissed Sarah May who was in Steve's arms and looking up at him. She had grown bigger in the last month. She was getting closer and closer to making sounds that could pass as some sort of communication. But Bucky got the feeling she wasn't going to speak as fast as Christopher had.

---

"I didn't have to, but I wanted to. You should have heard me try and get Sarah May to say 'Papa' all week. I was hoping for a genius baby miracle or something. She's probably sick of me right now," Steve joked. He kissed her cheek and passed her over so Bucky could hold both of their kids. "Just wait until you see your cake."

---

Bucky held his kids in his arms and felt two tiny hands simultaneously reach up to grab his hair. "Steve, hair tie," he requested and turned so Steve could pull his hair up really quickly. "I don't really want to lose any hair on my birthday. I feel old enough already."

---

Steve barked out a laugh and pulled his emergency hair tie from his wrist and did Bucky's hair up just before their kids could yank it too bad. Both of them turned to Steve with an offended look. "You're not much older than I am."

---

"Yes, but you are young and cute and sexy and virile. And I slept funny on my back last night and made Clint carry boxes around today because it hurt too much," Bucky said and pushed into Steve's space and pouted his lips at him. "Kiss me, Baby."

---

Steve blushed at all the compliments that Bucky gave him and shook his head. "I can give you a back massage, complete with whatever sexual act you can want to top off your birthday," Steve promised. "Come on. I want to show you Christopher and Sarah May's presents to you before the girls get home," he said.

---

"Like you weren't going to give me lots of good sex anyway," Bucky chuckled but followed Steve. "What did the babies get me? Did they take all their money and buy me something nice? Or maybe they made something for me? I mean all they really can make is poop so I hope it's not that."

---

"They both made something for you," Steve said. He showed Bucky to a box on the kitchen table. Inside was an album where Steve preserved all of the paintings Christopher had made so far. Then, beneath it was a scrapbook Steve had kept since they adopted him full of pictures and journal entries Steve wrote with all of his milestones.

---

Bucky sat his kids carefully in their high chairs and then sat down in between them. He looked through all the paintings and told Christopher how talented he was. Then he saw the scrapbook and he flicked through the first pages of a very young, very tiny Christopher. "Oh, my god," he whispered and started to tear up as he read a little journal entry about the first time their son had tried a strawberry. "This is so beautiful," he said and looked up to Steve with watery eyes. "Baby, I love
Steve smiled proudly. He knew that Bucky was upset that he had to miss so many days with their son because he was working extra at the record shop, so he wanted to give him something so it wouldn't be as bad. He drew him in for a kiss and smiled. "I'm glad you like it, Love."

---

Bucky gasped and buried his face against Steve's neck and kissed him over and over. "I love it. It's perfect. Did you start one for Sarah May?" he asked and looked up at Steve again. "I have my photo albums all in a box in our closet but I think we will need a bigger box if you plan on doing these for every kid."

---

Steve smirked. "Well, you have to open your present from her and see." Inside was little handprint impressions framed in a neat black square from her paint adventures as well as another scrapbook of just her, as Steve had done for Christopher.

---

Bucky bit his lip and tried not to start crying too much. He kissed Sarah May's cheek to which she just babbled some quiet nonsense. "Thank you for all this, Steve. These are the best presents I could have asked for." He pulled Steve in close for another kiss and hugged him securely, just holding him for a while.

---

Steve kissed Bucky's temple and smiled warmly. "Don't thank me. Sarah May and Christopher made these for you, remember?" He rubbed his hand along Bucky's back and smiled. "Just wait until you see what I got you, though. That has to wait until later."

---

"Oh?" Bucky asked and grinned at his husband. "There's more? This is kind of a whole lot already, Steve," he said and glanced around again. "I mean you went all out this time. Twenty-six isn't a landmark birthday that I'm unaware of, right?"

---

"It doesn't matter if it's a landmark or not. It's the day the most amazing man in the world to me was born. That's enough reason to go all out," Steve answered. He kissed him deeply until Christopher swatted his hands at his dad's arm so he would make room for him to get to Bucky better.

---

"Looks like you're going to have to compete for my attention today, Baby," Bucky giggled and nuzzled Christopher back. "Are we doing anything special tonight or just being together as a family until it's time to sleep and then I'll get to jump your bones."

---

"Christopher!" Steve laughed. "Don't push your daddy." Christopher ignored him and kept acting cute for Bucky’s attention instead. "I’m making your favorite for dinner and we are going to have a nice night indoors. I won’t promise a quiet night indoors."

---

Bucky grinned and picked Christopher out of his high chair so he could hold him. "You have plans for me tonight, Baby?" he asked and gave Steve a suggestive little look. "We fell asleep so fast last night we didn't get to do anything."

---

Steve laughed. "I was thinking about a toy possibly making an appearance. Since you liked it so much," he said. "What do you say, Handsome? You want me to do that with you? Or do you want something different?"

---

"It's my birthday. I don't want to make decisions. I think you should call the shots, Steve," Bucky said and yawned just a little, trying to hide it so Steve wouldn’t think he was already exhausted. "You know I like when you're in control anyway. That way you can decide if you want to use toys or not."

---

"What happened to me being too bossy in bed, huh?" Steve teased fondly. Sarah May tried getting her papa to look at her now by making unintelligible baby noises at him and bouncing a little around. "Oh, she's telling you quite the story," Steve said.

---

"Oh, Stevie, you're still bossy. I never said I didn't like it a lot of the time, though," Bucky said and turned to pay attention to his daughter. "Ya-Ya, are you trying to speak? You can't quite do that yet, Sweet Pea. But you are very good at your babbles."

---

Sarah May smiled and reached for Bucky's ponytail. "Ah, now I see what she was trying to get all along," Steve laughed. Just then, the girls came home in an explosion of noise from their bickering on about which is a better movie - Rocky or Raging Bull.

---

Bucky knew this argument had to have been going on for a long time given how fired up they both seemed about it. "Hey, girls, how was school today?" he asked in hopes to try to break up their argument before it turned into a boxing match in the living room.

---

"It was good. We had an assembly today so we only had classes for half the day,” Lilly said and dumped her bag on the ground.

Both girls came over to him to wrap him up in a hug. "Happy birthday, Bucky," they said together.

---

"Thank you," Bucky said happily and grinned at his sisters. "Alright, I have a question for you both.
How come Christopher and Ya-Ya only pull on my hair? You both have longer hair than I do but they never pull yours. How do you do it?"

---

"Because I put them down in the corner whenever they grab my hair. Negative reinforcement. I read about it in a book," Becca answered.

Lilly shrugged her shoulders and answered, "I just shout real loud when they do it and it scares them off."

---

"You scare my babies?" Bucky asked Lilly with wide eyes. "No wonder Sarah May likes Becca better. She doesn't do well with loud noises." He kissed his daughter's head and handed her part of a strawberry. She had been working on eating some solids. She didn't have any teeth poking in yet but she could mash small bits of food.

---

"Well, not all the time. It's just when they're doing something they shouldn't. Stops them in their tracks," Lilly said proudly, as if she had personally discovered some sort of cheat code for raising babies.

"I don't think you'd like it if we made a loud noise every time you did something wrong," Steve observed with a furrow in his brow.

---

Bucky scoffed. "He's right. You wouldn't. And I prefer calm correction," he said and looked to Steve. Although, he knew he didn't have any room to talk. He had yelled at the girls a lot over the years and was very bad at staying calm sometimes.

---

Lilly walked over to Christopher and picked him up so she could bounce him on her hip. Since he was her godson, she favored him more. It worked out since Sarah May liked Becca better anyway. "Whatever. When's dinner?" Lilly asked. "I'm starving already."

---

"She's been complaining since we left school," Becca said and gave an annoyed little look to Bucky.

Bucky sighed and handed Lilly a banana. "Eat this and calm down. Steve is making dinner tonight. If you want it to be faster, you can help him out."

---

"I'm not hungry enough to help out," Lilly said with such blunt honesty that it made Steve laugh.

"Fair enough. I'm figuring dinner for a little before six. Hopefully, the banana will last you until then," Steve answered.

---
Bucky sent the girls off to work on homework and he made sure the babies were situated in their high chairs with toys in reach. He got up and leaned against the counter so he could see the kids but be close to Steve. "So, you want to hear about the new project we are doing at AA?"

---

Steve reached out to hold Bucky's hand and brought it to his lips to kiss. "Tell me," he said. He was interested in the things Bucky did with his life and he wanted to be extra supportive when it came to do with things from AA.

---

"We started volunteering for a half hour every other meeting at the orphanage down the block," Bucky said. "We go in and spend time with the kids and help them with school projects and things like that. There’s this one girl - Steve, you would love her - she will be four next month. And she calls everyone 'Miss'. It doesn't matter if you are a grown ass man. So I'm 'Miss Bubby' because she can't really do sharp consonants that well."

---

Steve barked out a laugh. "Oh, man. She sounds sweet. So would I be Miss Steeb?" he asked. He brushed his fingertips over Bucky's arm. "Is she your favorite one there? What's her name?" Bucky was great with kids. Steve bet that they all flocked to him whenever he came by.

---

"You probably would be something similar, yes," Bucky said with a big grin. "She is my favorite. As much as I hate to admit picking favorites at an orphanage, she is. Her name is ‘Adriana’ and she is so sweet and loves to play hide and seek Although, there isn’t many places to go so she has to repeat all the hideouts a bunch of times."

---

"Oh, my god, she sounds so precious." Steve’s heart melted. His kids weren’t old enough yet for true hide and seek and he was looking forward to that day so much. "Could I come with you guys some time to help out?"

---

Bucky thought for a second and wished he could think of an easy way to make that happen. "I'm not sure, Baby. I would have to talk to our group supervisor who set up the program with the orphanage. And I really don't know if I'm ready to have everyone at AA know that I have a husband. Let me think it over."

---

"I could just be a well-meaning ex-cop friend of yours who loves kids," Steve said. But then again, he never was good at keeping his hands off of Bucky and had to keep his hands in his pockets often in public. He couldn't keep himself away from his husband when there were kids to play with. It would be too difficult not to act just like themselves at home with their own kids.

---

Bucky nodded. "I will think it over. I promise. I would love for you to see all the kids. They are really great. Some of them just need some care and attention. They don't really get too much of that on a daily basis."

---

"Those poor babies. At the very least, let me bake some cookies for them so you can bring them in next time. They deserve something baked at home with love," Steve said. He stole one more kiss and then went to go start dinner.

---

Bucky watched Sarah May as she worked to figure out how to make a small plush toy squeak. And he saw Christopher holding a ball close to his mouth and drooling all over it. "You are more than welcome to do that, Baby. I'm sure the kids would love that."

---

Steve loved the domesticity he had here - their kids playing in their high chairs, his husband relaxing and having idle chatter while dinner was being made. He could hear Becca and Lilly watching TV in the other room when Lilly definitely should've been doing homework. Sarah came home a little before dinner from her walk around the park and hugged Bucky hello. "Happy birthday, dear."

---

"Thank you, Sarah," Bucky said and hugged her back firmly. "Steve said you helped with all this birthday nonsense around the house. Thank you for indulging him."

Christopher and Sarah May both started making noise in their high chairs and reaching out for her as Christopher said, "Nana! Nana!"

---

"I have to make my son-in-law feel special on his birthday, right?" she said and gasped at her grandbabies and scooped them both up. "Hello! Are you two excited to see your nana? I'll never get over how cute you are," she cooed.

Dinner was placed on the table and everyone took their regular spots, including Diana beneath Steve's feet to be fed scraps and Raphael by Lilly's feet for the same reason.

---

Bucky sat next to Steve and scooted just a little closer to him tonight. He wanted to be right next to his husband all evening. Dinner went over smoothly. The girls gave Bucky their present which was a large blanket that they had made together with Sarah. It was Bucky's favorite colors and it had his name weaved carefully but a little messily on one of the corners.

---

After dinner was over, Steve and Bucky headed up to their room while Sarah watched the babies. She even said she would put them to sleep for them that night. Steve excitedly gave Bucky a shoebox. He purposely didn't wrap it so it would confuse Bucky a little bit. Inside were tickets to the Ramones concert in June and a hotel reservation. Even though the concert was local, he was going to make a little getaway out of it. "I've been dying to give this to you all day."
Bucky ran his hand over the box for a moment and then shook it. "These are those light shoes, Steve," he said and then popped the top off. It took him a couple minutes to figure out what the papers inside were telling him but then he understood and his eyes went wide and he couldn't help but grab Steve and mash their lips together.

---

Steve watched with excitement as Bucky opened up his present. Once his husband realized what it was, Steve was enveloped in a kiss. The force of it knocked him back a little but then he laughed and returned the kiss happily. "I knew I had to get it as soon as I saw the ad. I called up and told them I needed to get two tickets or else my best friend wouldn't have the best birthday ever."

---

"We're really going?" Bucky asked hastily and looked back at the tickets. "Seriously? I'm going to see the Ramones in concert? I can't believe this. Baby, this is amazing. Thank you so much." He was so excited. He wasn't going to be able to think of anything else until the concert. He was too worked up about it already.

---

"Yes!" Steve said, beaming. "Those tickets aren't for decoration, you big dope." He pulled Bucky's hair free from the ponytail and ran his fingers through his long mess gently. "I love you, Sweetheart. I can't wait to go to the concert with you and have an incredible time together."

---

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve in for another firm, wet kiss as he tugged at the bottom of his shirt. "Sex, now," he demanded lightly. "You know me so well. Those concert tickets make me want you to bad." He stuck Steve's hand to his hip and waited a moment. He had managed to go to the tattoo shop on his way home and had them add in Sarah May's name below their sons' names on his chest and he wanted Steve to see it after he undressed him.

---

"Bossy," Steve accused playfully. He loved it, though. He loved knowing that he could still have Bucky be crazy for him. Steve hastily took off Bucky's shirt and was about to start on his pants when he saw his tattoo and gasped. "When did you get that?" He loved the dedication Bucky had to their children and loved seeing their names written together in a row like that.

---

"Few hours ago. On my way home," Bucky said and stretched a little to show off his body to Steve to entice him. "I figured now that she is ours and we have her birth certificate, I needed to get her added to the tattoo." He chuckled and pulled Steve a little closer. "Imagine what my chest is going to look like once we have all our kids. I'm going to look like an attendance sheet."

---

"You're perfect," Steve sighed happily, kissing his chest a few times. "You're going to have half of the population's worth of kids' names tattooed onto your chest. I hope you're ready," he laughed. Steve took off his own shirt before starting on Bucky's pants. "We are going to have the best family ever."
"We already have the best family ever," Bucky said happily and let himself gently fall back on the bed so he was spread out for Steve. He liked being on display for him like that. And he knew Steve liked it too. "Our kids are perfect and I love them so much. We've done really well for them."

---

Seeing Bucky lay back like that sent a wave of arousal right to his dick. He grabbed the lube from their nightstand and started to coat his fingers with it. "We have," he agreed. "They're going to be such amazing people. And I love that I get to raise them with you."

---

"I wouldn't pick anyone else to help me father my children. You're the best husband in the world. And you're the greatest daddy. I hope you know that, Steve," Bucky said warmly and extended his legs out so Steve could get to his ass easier. "And you're gonna fuck me really nice on my birthday, aren't you?"

---

Steve reached his hand between Bucky's legs and entered him with two fingers at once, knowing Bucky loved that. "Yes, I am. I'm gonna fuck you so good and thorough you'll need me to carry you around tomorrow morning," he purred. "How's that sound?"

---

"That a promise?" Bucky grunted as he relaxed himself to take Steve's fingers easier. "You going to call and tell Tim that I'm too fucked out to come in for work? I'm sure that'll make him blush to his toes." He chuckled and reached a hand down to grip at his cock.

---

"I'll do it, I don't care. He's a friend and you two probably gossip about everything anyway. He'd find out about it sooner or later be it from my mouth or yours." Steve worked his fingers in and out of Bucky quickly. While still fingering him, Steve reached down to the sex box he had pulled from the closet to under the bed earlier. He pulled out the anal beads and laid them over Bucky's chest. "Put the first one in yourself. I want to watch."

---

Bucky glanced down at the beads and then at Steve. He was really just beyond amazed with Steve. He was willing to use the beads again and he even wanted to watch Bucky use them. That was such a difference from when they first started going out. Bucky took the first bead in hand and pulled the toy down to his hole and carefully pushed the first one in alongside Steve's fingers.

---

"I didn't mean with my fingers still - fuck, that's hot," Steve groaned. He pressed on the bead inside Bucky with the pads of his fingers and groaned. He withdrew his fingers so he could slowly push in a few more beads instead. "You're a menace."

---

Bucky's mouth fell open and he just stared up at the ceiling, letting desperate little moans come out of him. "How am I – ah, fuck - how am I a menace? I was just following orders," he said and pulled his knees up closer to his chest and he tried to watch Steve as he was working in the next bead.
Steve pushed the beads in with one hand while the other massaged his balls, working him over while he filled him up with the toy. "You weren't supposed to do it with my fingers still inside. Are you looking to kill me with arousal, Baby?" he asked with a pout.

Bucky chuckled and shook his head. "I'm just looking to get fucked by my husband and feel his hot come spilling out of me. And if that means getting you a little more worked up than you thought then so be it. You love this ass so you can't complain too much."

"Fucking Christ," Steve groaned. Once he pushed the last bead into him, he sat back to admire his husband's full ass. "How does that feel?" he asked. "You think maybe I should jerk off on my own and make you wait until I can get it up again to fuck you?" Steve asked.

Bucky whined loudly and pouted at Steve. He didn't hate the idea. He wanted to be fucked by Steve but the idea of him leaving Bucky like that with a tight, full ass was also incredibly appealing. And Bucky was always excited when he could get Steve to come more than once in a night. It was like a special treat only for the horniest of evenings. "You promise to fuck me once you are ready again?"

Steve nodded. "I promise," he said. "But I did change my mind a little. I want you to jerk me off instead." He leaned down to kiss Bucky and tugged on his lip on the way back. "I want to sit back and kiss you for a little bit. And it feels so much better when it's your hand on my dick."

Bucky nodded eagerly and moved his legs to accommodate Steve's body pressed against him. He felt the beads moving around inside him and he gasped at the way a big one was rubbing against his prostate. "Kiss me, Baby. I'll take care of you," he said lovingly and gripped Steve's cock in his hand.

Steve kissed his husband deeply and moaned against his lips when Bucky gripped his cock. "I bet it's maddening having those beads all crammed inside of you," he hummed. "Just imagine how it's gonna feel as I pull them out one by one, Baby. I'll even eat you out after if you want."

"You ass," Bucky groaned and sped up as he jerked Steve off. "It is maddening but you don't have to remind me. I'm having such a hard time not just pulling them out myself and then just fucking the big one in and out until I come too." He moaned again and gave Steve a kiss. "You better eat me out and you better let me come. I need to come for you."

Steve rocked his hips into Bucky's hand and kissed along his neck. "Patience is a virtue. Don't be so quick to move them out when I have plans for you," he said breathlessly.
"I'm really not going to be able to go to work tomorrow," Bucky said and thumbed at Steve's head. "If I'm all full of your come and my own balls are empty and my ass is sore, there's no way I'll be able to do anything around that place."

"You're lucky I don't have a set to keep inside of you during work hours." Steve's breathing hitched and his hips stuttered forward. He was pretty close to orgasm. "Regardless, you'll still manage to do more than Reggie."

"That is true," Bucky agreed and rolled his hips up as he kept pumping Steve. "I think Tim would be grateful I'm not walking around work with a toy up my ass. The poor guy would have a heart attack from embarrassment if he found out."

Steve gripped at Bucky's shoulders as he stroked him to orgasm. He let out a low moan, breath stuttering as he came. He looked at Bucky with dark eyes before kissing him deeply. "You're perfect," he whined.

Bucky chuckled into the kiss and wrapped his arms around Steve, feeling Steve's come squish between them. "You're my handsome husband and I love you so much," Bucky whispered and kissed him again. "Now, am I going to get to come or not?"

Steve laughed and kissed down Bucky's neck. "So impatient." He scooted down lower and nudged Bucky's legs apart. He bowed his head and pulled one of the beads out halfway and licked around Bucky's stretched hole.

Bucky moaned and let his head fall back, just feeling the pull and stretch. "How do I look?" he asked, breathless and desperate to have more touch, contact, more of Steve all over him. "You want to take a picture? I'd like to see it and we can put it with our others."

Steve let go and allowed the bead to go back inside. "You look so good. I want to take a bunch of pictures-" he hurried to get their Polaroid and started snapping away, first with Bucky's ass left alone, then with him pulling a bead out, then him eating out Bucky's ass as he pulled another out. "Fuck, you're amazing."

Bucky moaned and moved around a bit as Steve pulled and licked and massaged. He was in so much pleasure he didn't know what to do with himself. "Let me see?" he asked and reached for the photos that Steve was shaking.
Steve pulled back so he could look over the pictures. Once they were developed, he passed them over to his husband. He lazily pulled out another bead as Bucky looked them over. "This is probably one of the better photosets."

Bucky grunted in response and stared at the pictures before setting them on the nightstand. "Are you going to make a photo album of our sexy pictures too?" he asked and sat up so he could see Steve. "And you could go ahead and suck on my cock if you wanted."

"If you want me to. I will have a hard time finding the time to create it with no one else around." Steve set the camera down and kissed down Bucky's stomach. "Hmm... do I want to suck on your cock?" he mused playfully.

Bucky whined and reached his hand down to stroke himself. "I mean, it's your choice. But I might just jerk myself off if you don't do it. And I know you like sucking my cock." He thumbed at the head and clenched down around the beads in his ass.

"You know me too well," Steve sighed dramatically. He licked from the base to the tip of Bucky's cock before swallowing him down easily. He looked up at his husband with hooded eyes, bobbing his head as he slowly pulled the beads out one by one.

Bucky watched Steve with big eyes. He literally never got tired of Steve's mouth around him. Once all the beads were out, he tugged Steve's hair lightly and said, "Fingers, please, need something in me." He was just so desperate to be full and stretched.

Steve obliged and put three fingers in Bucky's ass right away. He fucked his husband like that while he pressed his tongue on the underside of Bucky's cock. He looked so fucking amazing like this, all fucked out and needy.

Bucky took in several sharp breaths and chanted, "Gonna come, gonna come, gonna come," until he was gasping and shooting his load right down Steve's throat. He covered his mouth with his hands as he moaned and felt Steve's fingers still pumping him through it.

Steve sucked Bucky through his orgasm and swallowed his come down dutifully. He pulled back and wiped his mouth and smiled lazily at his husband. "It's been a while since I swallowed your load," he chuckled, voice rough. He pulled his fingers out of Bucky so he could start stroking himself, hoping to rebound fast tonight to get to come again for him.
Bucky nodded and let his tired eyes close. "It's been about a week since we have done anything," he observed and clenched his ass down around nothing. He also hadn't realized Steve was gearing himself up to go again.

Steve leaned down and kissed Bucky's neck softly. He was close to getting it back up but needed a little more time. "I'd like to say I was saving it all up for tonight, but it's hard to make time with two babies keeping us running around all the time," he chuckled. "We didn't have any time as a couple before we had kids to raise. We got to wait until we retire."

Bucky was quiet for a minute or two, just resting a little bit and letting his breathing get back to normal. After a bit, he agreed and wrapped his legs around Steve. "We have to try everything once we are older. Old man sex like no one has ever seen before. And we are going to be able to get it up until the day we die." He may have also been holding out hope that Steve would get kinkier in his old age.

"You're going to be buried with an erection," Steve joked. "They'll have trouble closing the coffin on you," he snickered. Steve knew that the two of them would never stop being attracted to one another. It took a little bit longer but then he was ready for Bucky again and he claimed Bucky's lips in a kiss as he slid his dick in slowly.

Bucky was going to give some sort of snarky response back but then Steve's lips were on his and he hadn't been paying attention so he gasped and groaned at the surprise of having Steve's cock ease inside him. "You got ready again fast," he said and looked down at his own spent cock that probably needed a while still.

Steve pushed in steadily until he bottomed out in Bucky's ass. "God took half my lungs away, he had to let me have something above average to keep me happy," Steve joked. He sucked a mark onto his shoulder and started to steadily rock his hips in and out of him.

Bucky nodded and carded his hand through Steve's hair. "God blessed you with a lot of parts that far exceed average. Your ass, your cock, those beautiful eyes, your mouth, and tongue. And that's just on the outside."

Steve blushed. He kissed him over and over, panting against his lips as he made love to him. "Speak for yourself, Gorgeous. I could stare at your beautiful body all day." He reached a hand between them to stroke Bucky's cock.
"That's what the pictures are for," Bucky said. "You can take those with you. I can't follow you around naked all day." He chuckled but then winced at the overstimulation over his dick. "Too much," he whispered.

---

"You can follow me naked all day when we retire," he laughed. Steve pulled his hand back and held Bucky's hip instead. "Sorry, Baby. Want me to keep going slow and steady?"

---

"No, you can go ahead," Bucky said. "Do what you want to, Baby. I don't think I'll be able to come again right now. You know this medicine makes it a little difficult for me to get hard again for hours." He smiled at Steve and pulled him in for a kiss.

---

"It's alright, Baby. We have all night to ourselves," he promised. Steve tangled his fingers in Bucky's hair and tugged it so Bucky's head tilted back. Steve bit a little mark on his exposed throat. "So beautiful," he sighed happily, staying slow in the hopes that maybe he could help Bucky get it up again before this was over.

---

Bucky hummed happily and rocked his hips to try to get Steve further into his ass. "Tell me how much you like making love to me?" he requested and moved to suck at Steve's neck in turn and bite softly at his collarbone. He wanted to mark him up too.

---

Steve smiled and angled his hips a little differently so he could push in just a little bit deeper. "I love that I'm the only one that gets to have you like this forever. I love that you bare everything to me and trust me to give you every little bit of love you deserve. Being inside of you feels amazing and it takes everything I have not to try and rush because it feels so good."

---

Bucky nodded along as Steve spoke and continued to suck deep red marks on his skin. He was so in love with Steve. He always had been and he always would be. They had been through so much together and he figured that more hardships were going to come. And he was confident that they would be able to get through anything together.

---

Steve lifted Bucky's hips a little so he could fuck him nice and slow at an angle he knew Bucky loved. He kissed all over his chest and muttered words of adoration to him. He kept at it and at long last, he finally spilled himself inside his husband with a low moan. He collapsed on top of him, his dick still inside of him.

---

Bucky pulled Steve closer and wrapped his arms around him. He kissed Steve's shoulders and neck repeatedly as Steve got his breath back. "I love you, Baby," Bucky said and closed his eyes. He was so tired and so ready to sleep. "Are you going to fall asleep on me like this? Because you make a nice blanket."
Steve laughed. "I do, huh? Well, if you want me to then I guess I may as well," he said. Steve kissed along Bucky's neck. "And just so you know if the babies wake up tonight, I'll take care of them. You deserve a full night's rest on your birthday," Steve promised.

Bucky gave a little smile, already almost asleep. "Thank you, Love. But if they get to be too much, come get me," he said and reached to flick off the lamp on the nightstand. "Sleep well, my handsome husband."

Bucky fell asleep first and Steve kissed his face a few more times before going to bed as well. He nuzzled him affectionately and drifted off. He was interrupted twice by crying babies and after the third time, he decided to stay up and went into the kitchen so he could make everyone breakfast.

Becca was sitting at the kitchen table with a cup of coffee and a large bowl of ice cream covered with chocolate syrup and whipped cream. When she noticed Steve coming in, she wiped her eyes and pulled the hood of her sweatshirt up over her head and stared down into her bowl.

Steve was surprised to see Becca up so early in the morning but it didn't take much to see that she was upset. "Hey, Becs," he said gently, squeezing her shoulder as he walked past to get the milk. "What's the matter?" He didn't want to come on too strong and dissuade her from talking to him.

"Nothing," she mumbled and shoved a big spoonful of ice cream in her mouth. But she wasn't quite done. She swallowed her bite and looked up to Steve with a sad fire in her eyes. "Why are guys such assholes, huh?" she blurted out and sniffled.

At first, Steve thought he wasn't going to get anything out of her but she spoke up much quicker than he anticipated. "Because we… get used to what we wrongly think is the way we are allowed to behave. I guess. There's more to it, but yeah," he answered. "Was some guy a jerk to you?"

Becca looked down and started crying again. She wasn't usually this transparent with anyone but she was so upset. She got up slowly and went over to Steve. She looked up at him for a second then flopped onto him in a hug.

Steve's arms immediately went around her to hug back. He gave her a little squeeze and kissed the top of her head. "Whatever he did to you, you didn't deserve it. And whoever he is, he doesn't deserve you," Steve said firmly.
Becca clung to Steve and gasped through her tears. "It was going so well. We were having fun. He was my first kiss and I was his first kiss. At least that's what he said. But I don't know anymore." She hiccupped a little then kept going. "I was going to tell you guys about him after a while. But then I was at his place and his parents were gone and he wanted to have sex with me." Another hiccup. "And I told him I would think about it. But then the other night he asked again and I told him I didn't want to and he said it was fine. He told me it was fine. But then he leaves me this note in the mailbox yesterday and he broke up with me."

---

This was a bit more personal than Steve expected and although he felt like Bucky had a right to be told first, he was thankful that Becca was comfortable enough to open up to him. He tensed when she brought up the boy wanting sex but was glad to hear that she didn't give in what she wanted under his pressure. "You're right. He is an asshole," Steve said sternly. "He's probably some desperate, little kid trying to prove he's cool, but really, he's going to be washed up and ignorant and horrible all his life."

---

Becca looked up at Steve and whimpered. "I liked him a lot," she said softly. "We were good together. We had fun." She shook her head. "And I know that even if I had sex with him instead, he would have just left eventually. I know now that he didn't care about me. It's just so unfair!"

---

Steve stroked her hair and gave her a sympathetic look. "I'm sorry you're going through this, Becca," he said gently. "You know, it's rare that people stay with their high school sweethearts anyway. So anyone you meet this age has to make you feel super extra special for it to have a chance to last."

---

"He was the first guy to show any interest in me," Becca said and detached herself from Steve to go back to her ice cream. She knew it wouldn't have worked out and she may not work it out with anyone at this age. But she had been so excited to have a boyfriend and learn how to kiss. She was thankful she didn't have sex with him but she was just so hurt regardless.

---

"He won't be the last," Steve promised. He got out a piece of Bucky's birthday cake from the night before and put it on a plate in front of her. "It's going to hurt for a little while. But you'll be alright," Steve promised. "Me, Bucky, Lilly, and my mom are all here for you. We always will be."

---

"Thanks," Becca said and took off some of the icing and ate it by itself. "Don't tell Bucky about all this, okay? He will just get upset and angry. He will want to know who the guy was and want to go beat him up or something. And I don't want him to lecture me about safe, responsible sex again. Coming from him, it's a joke. And I already know about safe sex."

---

"What are you talking about? Bucky's always had safe, responsible sex. He's never made any regrettable choices in that area," Steve said, trying to sound serious but then he couldn't keep a straight face. "Don't worry. I won't tell him. But I do think you should tell him about this one day when you're ready."
"When I'm ready," Becca said and tugged her hood farther over her face. "Maybe don't say anything to Lilly either. She's got a big mouth. It was my mistake to tell her about him the first time he asked for sex. She will just be a nightmare now if she knows what happened."

Steve nodded his head and crossed his heart. "I promise," he swore. He turned to go back to making breakfast once more. "You're being a lot more supportive to everyone, Becca. I've noticed that lately," he said. "How's that feel?"

Becca shrugged and drank some of her coffee. "I don't know," she murmured. "Guess things around here feel more like before. You know. More like when Mom and Dad were around and we were all happy." Becca hadn't been happy in a long time. But she was finally letting herself figure out how to get that back.

Steve nodded. "I know me and my mom can never replace what you've lost. But we're doing our best to give you a happy, stable home to live in. You don't have to be the responsible one anymore. Not unless we need you to babysit for an hour," he said with a grin.

Becca sniffled again and got up from the table. "I just miss my parents so much," she said. "But I do love you and your mom and the babies. Even if I get annoyed with them sometimes. And I know Mom and Dad would have loved you too. And they would have been amazing grandparents." She nodded to herself, just thinking about it. "Thanks for talking with me, Steve. I'm going to go lay in bed for a while."

It made Steve feel good to know that Bucky's parents would've liked him. He knew that their kids would've loved to have them as grandparents, too. "Any time, Becca. I'll call you once it's breakfast time. I love you," he said, then went back to focusing on not burning the pancakes.
On the day of the concert, Bucky was beyond hyped up. It was the middle of the summer and the girls were off of school. Sarah May was getting some teeth in and Christopher was doing better with his sign language as the days went on. Steve had booked them a hotel room close to the venue even though they weren't leaving Brooklyn. And they were there now just waiting until they needed to head out for the show. Bucky could hardly keep himself calmed down.

---

Sarah had to practically kick Steve out the door because he couldn't keep away from his kids. Even though Steve and Bucky talked about going on date nights, they never spent a whole evening away from both of their kids. But, with some encouragement, Steve got himself ready to go out. He had tried to dress the part of a punk enthusiast by borrowing Bucky's clothes but he still looked like a narc no matter how hard he tried. "Okay. I think I'm ready," he said.

---

Bucky giggled and pulled Steve in close to him. He reached up and messed up Steve's perfectly brushed hair. "You got to look more like a dirty hippie. Just pretend you're going as me for Halloween," he said and gave Steve a kiss. He was wearing a pair of tattered jeans that flared nicely over his boots and a black t-shirt that he cut in the middle so it showed his abs and stomach. And then he wore his leather jacket over top. He had stared at albums covers for the Ramones to try to figure out the exact right look to emulate them.

---

Every time Steve thought he was becoming less conservative, Bucky's sense of fashion reminded Steve how much of a grandpa he really was. He didn't mind Bucky going out like that but he knew that he could never go out in public the way that Bucky was dressed. "You look like you could pose with them for a magazine cover and no one would be able to tell the difference. You could go on stage and they wouldn't even doubt you belonged there," he chuckled. He stole one more kiss before nudging him out the door.

---

Bucky bit his lip and followed Steve. "What's the odds of me actually being pulled on stage?" he asked, letting himself bask in the fantasy for a bit. "I mean I'm not a hot girl so I know it's a low percentage but come on."

---

"Maybe one of them is bisexual," Steve said. "Or they see your long flowing hair and are confused just long enough to pull you up," he added. "Just keep your back to the stage. They won't be able to tell," he teased.

---

Bucky chuckled and ran a hand through his hair. That was pretty accurate. Bucky could pass off as pretty feminine if no one looked at his shoulders too much and he stood just the right way. "Maybe everyone will mistake me for a woman and I'll be able to kiss you and hold your hand during the show."

"That would be nice," Steve said. "They'll probably be too busy looking at the band to notice two guys kissing anyway," he added. "Did you want to stop anywhere first? Or did you want to get to the venue early? I've never been to a real concert before so I don't know how this works."

"No, we can just go. It's standing room so I want to be able to get up close," Bucky said. "I want to be able to feel the sweat from the band." He didn't mention that a concert like this could get a little wild. He was worried of course that there would be a lot of drugs around. He just knew he was going to have to be careful. It wasn't like he was going to do anything, but he just needed to be aware of his surroundings.

Steve headed towards the venue. "When was the last time you went to a concert again? It's had to have been a while. At least not since I met you. I wonder what it's going to be like. Probably loud. Do they play all of their popular songs or only the new stuff?" Steve asked.

"It's been since before my parents died," Bucky said. "The last concert I went to was a little one-man band playing in Manhattan. He had a bit of a following and my boyfriend at the time wanted to go." He adjusted his shirt that was riding up even higher. "And, yes, it will be loud. And hot. And they will pretty much play whatever. I feel like they will want to play a little of everything."

In other words, Bucky was long overdue for this concert. Steve felt like his husband really deserved this night out. "Did you have fun at the concert? Did you like the singer too or was it more your boyfriend's thing?" Steve asked. He wished he could've held Bucky's hand as they walked.

Bucky shrugged. "Honestly, I don't remember it much. I was pretty high the entire time. All I remember was that he had a good time and he kept buying me drinks. I blacked out at some point and woke up back at his place in bed with his sweater on."

"Well, let's hope for a more memorable concert this time around," Steve said. When they got to the venue, there was already a line. Steve took his place in it beside Bucky. "What if I put you on my shoulders? You think that could get you on stage?"

Bucky chuckled and nudged Steve's arm. "They would kick me off for sure. Besides, I'd rather be glued to your side the entire time. This is a night for us after all." He really wanted to hold Steve's hand and kiss him but he didn't dare do it out in the open light of day.
Steve smiled. "Well, I would think it would be about you since this is your late-delivered birthday present," he said. He leaned into Bucky's side since that was the most they could do in public.

"Yeah, it's my birthday present but it's still a day for both of us," Bucky said. "I mean, I'm going to have a great time with my husband at a concert for one of my favorite bands. And then tonight, at our hotel room, I'm going to fuck you so nice and deep as a thank you that you'll want to take me out every weekend."

Steve blushed but was very interested in the night they would have at the hotel. When it was their turn to show their tickets, Steve passed them over and gave Bucky an excited smile. The venue was called L'Amour and the doors opened up to let people in. It wasn't anything special on the outside but it started as a disco club and now it played host to bands from all around.

Bucky squeezed Steve's arm and led him into the building. It was a lot bigger than Bucky thought it would be. He was immediately overwhelmed by all the people and he saw large groups of them already congregating up front close to the stage. Bucky put his hand on Steve's lower back to help push him up towards the stage as fast as they could go.

Steve followed Bucky to the crowd and as soon as they got some standing room, people began to fill in and press up against them to get even closer to the stage. "Wow, I'm only used to being the one monitoring these events. Who would have thought I'd be involved with it?"

"You've never been to a concert because you wanted to be there?" Bucky asked. He was able to slip his hand with Steve's and hold it tight because all the people were so squished up against each other that no one was going to notice at all.

Steve shook his head. "There's so many people. I had to arrest a bunch of kids causing trouble and picking fights. I figured I'd watch the footage of the concerts on TV to enjoy them, instead," Steve answered, brushing a thumb over the back of Bucky's hand.

"Are you going to be okay this close?" Bucky asked and looked at Steve with concern. "We can scoot back if you want. It might be less crowded back there once it starts up and everyone pushes up here." He really wanted to be close but he also wanted Steve to enjoy himself.

"Sweetheart, I love the Ramones but I'm going to be just as overwhelmed in the front of the crowd as I will in the back. We may as well be where you want to be and you can pamper me when we get back to the hotel," Steve said, squeezing his hand again.
Bucky nodded and gave Steve a warm smile. "Yeah, I will do that, I promise. But if this gets too much, we don't have to stay for the entire show. I'm anticipating getting a headache at some point. I was just going to push through it but if you want to go later, we might go once I start to have pain."

"Of course. I'm following your lead here," Steve began but the crowd started to cheer when the opening band came on stage. He hadn't really expected the interest in the opener to be that wild but everyone seemed ready for a show.

Bucky was only semi-interested in paying attention to the opener. But he moved along with everyone else and kept his hold on Steve as he did. After a few songs, Bucky looked around the hall to see just how big it was. And then his eye was caught on one of the police officers stationed on the outskirts for the show. His eyes went wide and he shook his head. "Son of a bitch," he murmured and pulled Steve down to his level so he could whisper in his ear. "It's goddamn Richard."

Steve was enjoying himself listening to the music and was confused when he was pulled down and then looked around to where Bucky was pointing. He let out a laugh. "What, afraid he might arrest you again, Babe?" he teased. "You're criminally attractive right now."

Bucky shook his head and glared up at Steve. "I just think the universe thought it was pretty damn funny to schedule him for this concert. I mean it could have been Sam or Nat or someone we don't know but, no, we get Richard." He scoffed and moved Steve's hand to rest on his ass. "And, I'm always going commando when that guy is around. Maybe it's the universe trying to tell me that I need to wear underwear."

"I think it's pretty damn funny, too," Steve said. "But what if I was able to flirt with him a little and have him convince security to let us get in backstage after the concert?" Steve wasn't the type to do something like that but to make his husband happy, he'd bend his morals just a tiny bit.

Bucky's eyes flashed and he looked up at Steve. "You flirt with him and I withhold sex," he said and leaned into Steve's hip a bit so he could feel his body closer to his so he wouldn't want to risk it. "And I am going to be so grateful tonight for this gift that I'll give you so much pleasure, Baby."

Steve laughed and nodded. "Alright, alright. I won't flirt," he swore. He grabbed Bucky's ass stealthily. "I can't risk the amazing time you're going to give me tonight over backstage access to the Ramones. I'd rather you have backstage access to me."

Bucky giggled and bit his lip, wanting to kiss Steve so badly. "How long have you been waiting to use that line?" he asked and wrapped an arm around Steve. Steve did look very nice. Even if he looked a little like he had no idea what he was doing.
"Ever since I said 'backstage access' the first time," Steve laughed. He glanced back over to Richard but he didn't seem to notice they were there. He kind of wanted to say hello after the show. A second opener band got on stage then and Steve focused back on the music even if he really didn't like it as much as the first guys.

Bucky actually got way more into the second band than the first. Although, It might just have been the hype since he knew that the Ramones would be coming on next. He also kept seeing a bunch of people with tour shirts and he wanted one. "You think we can get a tour shirt on our way out?"

"I think we can," Steve said loudly into Bucky's ear. "I've specifically been saving all of my change in a jar and I've put aside a little bit of money every week to help save up for your college. I'm sure you can spare a few dollars for a shirt." They didn't want for anything but Steve had been more frugal than usual over the past few months.

Bucky stopped and looked up at Steve. He hadn't thought about college for months. He was saving up too but he was still not sure he could ever do it. But he didn't know Steve was saying his money too. He shook his head and pulled Steve in for a quick kiss on the lips. He knew no one was paying attention to them and everyone was way too high or drunk to care if they did notice Bucky was actually a man.

Steve smiled at the kiss and gave Bucky a small nudge when he looked surprised. "You don't honestly think I wouldn't do everything I could to help you achieve your dreams, do you?" He was proud that they were so supportive of each other. There was suddenly an explosion of noise as the lead singer of the Ramones got on stage and greeted them all. Steve’s head snapped over to the stage and he cheered with everyone else.

"Oh, my god!" Bucky shouted and reached his hand up towards the stage as everyone else did the same. "That's Joey!" he shouted at Steve and then stared as Johnny, Dee Dee, and Richie all made their way out to the stage and set themselves up.

Steve was thrilled to be so close to the band. Joey went to the front to run by people quickly touching every hand he could - including Bucky's. Steve grimaced at how squished everyone made him. The singer called out an introduction over the microphone and everyone screamed in response.

Bucky immediately freaked out the second he was touched by a Ramone. He felt like he was on another planet and when Richie started doing an intro drum riff, the entire crowd lost their minds. Everyone cheered and screamed and clapping as the drum riff turned in to the beginning of "Eat That Rat". And the show had started.
Steve beamed at his husband. "He high fived you!" he shouted over the crowd. Things got a little wild volume-wise once the music started playing. Steve started getting jostled around and he tried to focus on how much he liked the music to get over how cramped everything was.

---

Bucky was on the moon. Sure, he was sweaty and he was pretty sure someone who wasn't Steve kept squeezing his ass and he had a headache already. But he was just so happy to be there and he was singing as loud as he could and swaying with the crowd. It was a perfect birthday present.

---

A few times, Steve felt like he couldn't breathe but he didn't want to be the reason they headed out to the back early. Every time he felt overwhelmed, he took a sip of water. When his bottle was empty, he sang along to one of the songs instead. Every so often he would look over to Bucky and smile because his husband looked so happy to be here.

---

By the end of the setlist, Bucky was ready to go. His head was hurting worse now and he could tell that Steve was just about done. It was such a good night, though, and he would love having this memory with Steve. When the final song started, "I Don't Wanna Walk Around with You", Bucky started to pull Steve out of the crowd so they could beat the masses on their way out. They stopped to get t-shirts and Bucky got one for Lilly as well before waiting near the door for the song to end and for the band to retreat back off the stage.

---

Steve held Bucky's hand through the crowd and was buzzing with excitement to finally be able to take a breath without inhaling sweat from the person in front of him. Once they were out of the venue, Steve let go and slung an arm around Bucky's shoulders. "You looked like you were on cloud nine, Buck."

---

Bucky's eyes were still wide and he was shaking his head like he had no idea if he was really there anymore. "That was amazing!" he yelled and looked to Steve excitedly. "Amazing!" He loved every second. "Shit, I don't know how to get back to the hotel." He chuckled and turned out to look at the L'Amour house again and then got his bearings.

---

"I know, Buck! I'm so glad I got to go to my first concert for real with you." Steve knew how to get to the hotel easy so he led the way. "What was your favorite part?" he asked.

---

"I don't know," Bucky said. "It was all so great." He honestly couldn't tell what part was the best. "I mean, getting touched by Joey was righteous. And Dee Dee looking right at me, man. Right at me!" He looked down at himself as they walked and noticed that he had gotten so sweaty that his cut-off shirt had curled with the moisture and ridden up even further.
Steve grinned. "That was pretty amazing," Steve agreed. "They really knew how to work their crowd." The hotel wasn't far and as soon as they got in, Bucky got a few stares at the state he was in as well as his clothes. Steve had almost told Bucky he needed a shower but, after the way some of the hotel patrons looked at him, Steve decided against it.

---

Bucky was oblivious to anything that wasn't Steve or thinking about the Ramones. He followed Steve up to their room happily and gushed even more the second they were up there. "God, and they just did so well. They sound so good live. I mean, some people just don't do well live but they did. Steve, it was so perfect. A perfect present."

---

Steve was so happy that Bucky enjoyed his birthday present. He couldn't wait to get Bucky to himself. Once they were in their hotel room, Steve reached down to grab Bucky's ass as he kissed him. "I love you so much, Baby. I'm glad you liked your present."

---

Bucky giggled and sucked at Steve's lower lip for a second. "Looks like you're getting ready for your present now that I've had mine," he said and pressed his crotch to Steve's. "You remember how I was so turned on when we saw Top Gun last month with Monty and Evan? Cause it was like porno and I haven't seen porno in so long. I'm gonna fuck you tonight even better than I did that night."

---

Steve moaned softly when Bucky pressed himself against him and he looked even happier when he brought up the movie night they had with their friends. That was a good fuck that night. "You going to let me wear your tour shirt while you fuck me tonight?" Steve asked as he started to take Bucky's pants off.

---

Bucky gasped and nodded. "Oh, my god. If you want to. That sounds so hot," he said and shucked off his leather jacket. The tour shirt was neatly rolled up and tucked in his back pocket and he turned so Steve could grab it.

---

Steve took off his shirt. "How about you put that shirt on me before you take the rest of my clothes off?" he suggested, running a hand down Bucky's chest while looking at him with the biggest bedroom eyes he could muster.

---

Bucky whimpered and took in Steve's naked chest and abs. He didn't understand how Steve felt like he wasn't as attractive as he used to be. Bucky was still week in the knees every time he looked at his husband's body. It didn't matter how long they had been together or if Steve happened to have lost some muscle mass. He was the sexiest thing Bucky had ever seen. "Jesus, Baby," he whispered and pulled him close so he could pop the shirt over Steve's head and down around his body. It was a little tight on him since it was Bucky's size.
Steve was still somewhat confident in front of Bucky but he didn't go shirtless as much as he used to. He wouldn't go in public pools anymore either. He did his best not to play with the hem of Bucky's shirt that clung to his belly. "I think I may stretch it, actually... are you sure you want me to wear it?" Steve asked.

"You make it look so good," Bucky assured him and gently nudged Steve on to the bed. He started to go for Steve's pants and leaned in to kiss at his hips as he worked the pants off of him. "Baby, how do you want it? You want to be on your back?"

Steve laid back on the bed and lifted his hips up to help Bucky with taking his pants off. "I want to start on my back and end on my hands and knees. I don't want to risk staining your brand-new shirt," Steve said. He reached up and stroked his fingers through Bucky's messy hair.

Bucky chuckled low his throat and licked a line up Steve's inner thigh. "You got it, Baby," he said and moved to kiss at Steve's balls. Both he and Steve were pretty sweaty from the show but Bucky didn't mind. Steve smelled so good to him and he just wanted to be inside him as soon as he could. "Where's the lube?"

"Duffel bag. Should be by the closet," Steve said. His mom had walked in on him when he was packing and saw the lube. He was embarrassed like usual even though he knew his mom knew he had sex with his husband. He really needed to work on not letting that get to him.

Bucky nodded and quickly scrambled off of Steve to get the lube, shedding the rest of his clothing as he went. He came back hastily and flopped on top of the bed close to Steve's ass. He lifted Steve's legs and tucked them up over his shoulders so he could get to him better. "You ready, Love?"

Steve was so, so ready. He wanted his husband inside him, making love to every inch of him. "Yes. Please, Baby, I want you. Been thinking about you all night," he said. "I was half-tempted to grind against you at the concert."

"Jesus, I wouldn't have minded that a bit," Bucky said and warmed up the lube on his fingers. "We could always go have a night at the club again sometime. You can dance up on me like that. It'll be so much fun. No one is going to care when we kiss. I think that sounds fun."

Steve usually wasn't a club sort of person but, god, he wanted to be somewhere public and not have to worry about keeping his hands to himself. He watched Bucky warm up the lube with hungry eyes. "Yeah, let's do that, Buck. I want to kiss you and let people know that you're mine."
"Okay, as soon as we can get another night to ourselves," Bucky promised and pushed his first finger into Steve's ass slowly. "We will just hope there are no ex-boyfriends waiting to jump me in the bathroom like last time." He added a second finger and started pumping them in and out.

---

"Let's not bring up ex-boyfriends as you're fingering me, Love," Steve said sweetly. He breathed out happily as Bucky opened him up with two fingers. Steve scratched his nails slowly up Bucky's back. "One of these days we will be able to do whatever we want in public and not have to worry."

---

"One of these days we can be married by law," Bucky added and leaned closer to give Steve a kiss. He slowly worked in a third finger and kept his lips on Steve, moving from his mouth to his neck.

---

Steve nodded. He would love that. Their kids could come and see what a real wedding looked like between two people who were made for each other. "Bucky," he said breathlessly. "I'm ready for you. I want you inside me already."

---

Bucky hummed softly and pulled his fingers out of Steve. "You're pushier than usual, Baby," he observed lightly and lubed up his cock. "Not that I'm complaining," he added and eased himself on the way into Steve's ass slowly. "You good?"

---

"Because I've been waiting for weeks to be able to have my way with you at a hotel with no kids to interrupt us and now it's finally here," he laughed. Steve closed his eyes and arched his back as Bucky entered him. He let out a little moan as he gripped onto Bucky's shoulders. "So good," he answered.

---

Bucky nodded and kissed at Steve's neck as he pulled out and gently pushed back in. Steve was right. It was sometimes very difficult to have private time when they had two teenagers and two babies around the house. Not that Bucky would trade his kids for the world. But their previous rampant sex life had definitely dwindled to rushed fucking while they hoped the babies didn't wake up. "You want it hard?"

---

Steve nodded. "Please," he said thickly. "I want you to ram me into this mattress, Bucky. And then give me a nice, loving massage after you clean us up." Usually, Steve didn't ask for massages but after spending all evening in the crowd of people, he wanted to have a good way to wind down for the night.

---

Bucky hissed out a tight breath and shook his head. Steve hardly ever asked for rough fucks either but, by god, he was going to give it to him. "I love you," he whispered and then pulled back just to slam in again. "I love you, Steve," he repeated and started up a fast and powerful rhythm.
Steve cried out and arched his back off of the bed. "Fuck - yes!" he yelped out. He squeezed his legs around Bucky's hips and pulled in him. "Fuck me, fuck me," he babbled out mindlessly as his nails dug into his shoulders. "Just like that, Bucky."

Bucky's breathing picked up as he went harder and harder on Steve. He gripped his hands on the sheets up by Steve's head and jackhammered down into him. He was sweating within minutes. "Want... on your knees... now," he said through stuttered breaths and pulled out of Steve to wait for him to get where he wanted him.

Steve made a helpless sound when he was suddenly empty and he wanted Bucky's dick back inside of him right now. He shakily turned over, thighs trembling and the lube leaking down as he got on his hands and knees. "Hold my hands behind my back," he said, wanting Bucky to have total control here.

"You sure?" Bucky asked tentatively and kissed Steve's ass and lower back. "That's not really like you," he added. Sure, Steve liked to be tied up sometimes but they didn't usually do a position like this where Bucky was behind Steve and it usually wasn't coupled with Steve having his arms back too.

Steve had thought that giving total control to Bucky would make things feel even better since Steve was usually the one trying to be in control. But he lost his nerve and got a bit embarrassed so he just braced himself on the bed instead. "Never mind," he said shyly. "We don't have to. It was a silly idea."

"No, no, Baby, it's not silly," Bucky assured and kept kissing up Steve's side. "I just wanted to check because I'm not usually being more dominant over you. I wanted to make sure this was what you actually wanted - what you were okay with. If you want it, I want it." He felt bad for making Steve shy away. He just wanted them to be on the same page.

"I want to feel what it's like letting you control me," Steve said softly. "I want to switch my brain off for a few minutes and feel what you do to me." He blushed a bit as he looked back at Bucky. "Is that okay?" He sort of sprung it on Bucky and he knew it wasn't like him to do that.

Bucky leaned forward and pulled Steve in for a soft kiss to his lips. "Yes, my beautiful husband, that's okay. I'll make you feel really good. Just let me know if you need me to ease up or stop," he said and went back behind Steve again. He prodded at his hole a few times with his cockhead as he eased Steve's arms back behind him so he could hold them. Then, without warning, he pushed all the way inside of Steve once more.
Steve felt a little bit better at the reassurance. He moaned softly as Bucky teased him with his dick, wanting more. But all of a sudden, Bucky was inside him all the way. His arms jerked a little in response and he threw his head back. "Shit!" He swore, closing his eyes. "Goddamn, Bucky. Don't stop."

Bucky fucked him hard once again. He kept his hand around Steve's wrists but didn't hold him too tightly. "Baby, shh, don't get us a noise complaint," he warned with a chuckle and then saw his underwear on the edge of the mattress. He grabbed them and brought them to Steve's face. He knew they smelled like his body and he hoped Steve would want to do this but he wouldn't be surprised if he said no. "Bite down on these to keep yourself quiet."

Steve automatically opened his mouth and bit down on it for a few seconds until he realized what it was. "Bucky!" He scolded after spitting them out. He squirmed until Bucky let go of him and then put his hands back down on the mattress. "Go slow," he said, closing his eyes as he tried to get back into it again. Having Bucky's underwear in his mouth killed the mood a little.

"Sorry, sorry, Baby," Bucky responded quickly and eased his movements down to just a rolling pace. More like when they were making love and less like when they fucked. "I'm sorry. Thought I would give it a try. I'm sorry," he had been with Steve long enough to know that he wasn't into a lot of things that Bucky was. But he had been so adventurous lately that Bucky sometimes tried to push his luck. Although, the last time he pushed his luck, he slapped Steve's ass a little too hard and Steve shut the whole thing down for about an hour.

Steve reached down between his legs and started to stroke himself in time with Bucky's movements. "I don't like that," he said. If he wasn't so desperate to have Bucky's dick inside of him he probably would've asked for a break. "Go slow enough so I don't make noise anymore." If Bucky was afraid of a noise complaint then they shouldn't fuck. It would have to wait for another time.

Bucky nodded, feeling like complete shit. He always did this. He always fucked up a good thing when it came to Steve. "Can I at least touch your cock?" he asked and hovered his hand next to Steve's. He wasn't going to do anything without Steve's go-ahead right now. "Or if we need to stop, we can. I'm sorry, Love. I'm sorry."

Steve moved Bucky's hand onto his cock and rocked his hips steadily to meet Bucky's slow, gently little thrusts. "No. Don't stop, I want to come with you." Usually, Steve was on top and he didn't mind by any means, but he also loved the feeling of his husband coming inside of him and he wasn't about to miss the opportunity for it.

"Okay, Baby, I won't stop," Bucky said and carefully jerked Steve as he picked up just a little. "You want to be on your back again? Or you... you might not want to look at me right now. I don't blame you. But I could go hard again if you would like that and you could bite down on my arm instead?"

---

This was just snowballing to nowhere good. When Bucky said that Steve probably didn't want to look at him right now, he felt incredibly hurt by that. "Okay, stop," he said firmly pulled himself away a bit so Bucky's cock slipped out of him. He felt empty without Bucky inside of him but he couldn't continue with Bucky feeling that way about himself. He pulled Bucky down to lay next to him face to face and his eyes were locked with his husband's even though he looked on the brink of tears. "Why would you ever think that I wouldn't want to look at you?" he asked.

---

Bucky looked at Steve but pulled a hand up to his face to cover as much of it with his fist as he could, eyes barely peeking out to see Steve. He used to do that a lot as a child when he was in trouble. He would hide behind his fists and pretend he was invisible. He rarely did it with Steve. "Cause I messed up," he mumbled behind his hand but managed to keep his eyes on Steve's.

---

"Bucky, Sweetheart..." Steve pulled Bucky's hand from his face and kissed his knuckles gently. "So what?" he asked. "You're more important to me than any plans we had for tonight. Or for any other night." Sure, Steve was disappointed that things didn't go the way he wanted but that didn't mean that he blamed Bucky or that the night was over. "I could never be that upset with you."

---

"But, I always do this," Bucky said hastily. "Things are always going so well and then I ruin it. Our first Christmas. The first day of our honeymoon. That night after Lilly's championship game." He didn't even touch upon the Tish debacle. "I mess it up. I always do this. And it's always when you've planned things out and gotten everything ready to go. And I come in like a tornado and destroy it."

---

"You don't always mess things up, Baby. And what's it matter if you mess up sometimes? I mess up, too. And you do so many things right. You helped me plan so many great things for us and you took me out on all those dates that you chose and they went just fine," Steve insisted.

---

"I mess up more than I should," Bucky said and bit his lower lip. He had improved a lot on his self-confidence over the time of being with Steve. But, sometimes, he still wondered if Steve would be better with someone else. Sometimes, he still thought that Steve was always so much more than him. Steve was a better father, a better husband. He was smarter and more handsome. He was more understanding and kind. And sometimes Bucky just couldn't get those thoughts from his head.

---

"You don't, Buck. You really don't," Steve said. He laced Bucky's fingers with his and held his hand to his heart and looked at him desperately. "Would I ever lie to you? I mean it. You're the most thoughtful, amazing person I've ever met in my life. Even if you messed up all the time, I would still love you and I still would want to face you every day, every night, and every time we make love."
Bucky gripped Steve's hand and nodded slowly. "You would never lie to me," he said and touched his forehead to Steve's. He felt a little better but still felt like an idiot and still felt like he could be better for Steve. He could always be better. He could always improve. He could always be more for him. And he wanted to do that in all aspects of his life.

---

Steve cupped Bucky's face and drew him in for a slow and tender kiss. He could tell that Bucky was overthinking, so he tried to give him a new directive. "How about tomorrow, you wake me up by fingering me open. And once I'm awake, you fuck the daylights out of me. How's that sound? I think that sounds delightful."

---

Bucky nodded again and leaned in for another kiss. "I would love to do that, Baby," he said softly and pressed his face to the side of Steve's neck and kissed him a few times on his shoulder. "I'm sorry, again. For everything."

---

Steve cupped the back of Bucky's head and kissed his temple. "Baby, please don't be sorry. I love you so damn much. I'm happy with you and I really did have a good time tonight. It's a memory I'm going to treasure," he promised.

---

Bucky let himself smile shyly. "We did get to be at an amazing show tonight. And it was perfect in spite of Richard being there," he joked and pressed himself flush against Steve. "And I know your mom probably had a ball being in charge of all the kids. But, lord save me if I find out she gave Sarah May sugar for the first time."

---

Steve wrapped his arms around his husband. "It was almost like Richard was never there. He didn't bother us or notice us," he insisted. "Only I'm allowed to christen our children with the hellishly amazing thing we call sugar. Oh, man, I can't wait to give her ice cream for the first time," he sighed.

---

"Not yet," Bucky said firmly. "She hasn't even eaten solid foods besides baby food yet. And she barely has teeth. She's a lot slower to grow than Christopher was. Don't you think? I mean by now he had two little teeth in all the way and he was working on crawling."

---

Steve pouted even though he agreed with Bucky. "Christopher is also a bit of a fast-growing baby. I don't know any other baby that knew as many words as he did when they turned one," Steve said. "Maybe we were spoiled a little by how fast he progressed and Sarah May is going at a normal baby's pace."

---

"That might be true. The girls were definitely not as advanced as him. And since all of ours will be adopted, some will probably have genes that are faster growers than others. You know?" Bucky said and brushed his thumb over Steve's lips. "Hey, on a different note. You want to hear what Adriana
Steve nodded. He wondered what their future babies would be like. Would any of them need extra help to catch up with other kids their age? Would any excel at one thing but not so much at others? Steve kissed the pad of Bucky's thumb and asked, "What did she do?"

Bucky giggled and said, "Steve, she's the cutest. She came running up to me and said, 'Miss Bubby! I made you a drawling.' And she held it up all proud. It was her holding a balloon and standing next to me holding what looked like a burger but I was told was a turtle. She likes turtles a lot."

Steve smiled, imagining an adorable little girl totally loving Bucky and having him as her favorite visitor. "Oh yeah? When am I going to get to meet her, huh? I got to see my husband's littlest-but-biggest fan."

Bucky grinned and tucked some hair behind his ear. "I'm not sure. I guess I can ask the orphanage if I can come sometime outside of the group. The two of us can go together. Or maybe we can talk to her case manager about spending the day with her. Her case manager is very kind."

Steve gasped when Bucky mentioned spending a day with her. He didn't even consider that and just assumed he would have to go to the orphanage. "We can take her to the aquarium to see the turtles," Steve said excitedly. "She would love that, right?"

"Yeah, she would. She loves turtles. They are her favorite," Bucky said excitedly and gave Steve a kiss. "I'll see what I can do. I'll talk to Karen next time I'm there. A day out for the three of us could be a lot of fun. Of course, Karen will be there too. Her caseworker goes with her any time she leaves the orphanage without orphanage personnel."

"That's fine. Could we bring the babies too or should it be a day for just her? I guess as an orphan she doesn't get to have too much time where she feels special, you know?" Steve wondered out loud.

"I think that could be a little overwhelming. She's out-going but meeting new people can be scary and I think one new person at a time is best," Bucky said softly and nuzzled his nose on Steve's cheek.

"Yeah," Steve agreed. "Let's do that, Baby. I'd love to give her a fun day out." He kissed Bucky's temple gently. "What happened to her parents. Do you know?" he asked. "Was she abandoned or did something happen to them?" He wasn't sure which answer would be worse.
Bucky looked away and then gave a sad little sigh. "Her mother died in childbirth and her father was so upset that he killed himself two weeks later." He closed his eyes and shook his head. He knew how upset he would be if Steve died but he couldn't think of killing himself when he had children to take care of. Granted, he did know the feeling. He tried the exact same thing when his parents died. But now he didn't feel that way at all.

Steve frowned and made an upset little noise. Likewise, he couldn't imagine ever abandoning his kids, even without having Bucky at his side. He loved his babies too much to do that. "Does she know what happened? Or only her caseworker?" Steve asked.

"I don't think she knows. But I don't think she would understand even if she did know. She doesn't quite get that most kids have parents to take care of them. Unlike some of the other kids, she never talks about hoping to be adopted," Bucky said.

On one hand, it was better for her to not be depressed over not having parents. On the other, it was sad that she didn't know that she could have a loving home one day. Steve had that look in his eyes as he was considering asking Bucky if they could foster. "Maybe it's for the best that she doesn't know any better for a little while."

Bucky sniffled and wiped at his eyes. He got a little emotional thinking about Adriana being all alone in the world. He was an orphan too. Of course, he was lucky enough to have known his parents and was lucky enough to have both his sisters still alive. "Yes, it might be for the best," Bucky said after a bit. "And at least she doesn't hate the orphanage like some of the older kids. It's all she has known for four years."

Steve kissed Bucky's cheek swiftly when he saw him wipe at his eyes. "Hey, it's alright, Baby. You make her happy and brighten her day when you're there. Even if she doesn't have the life she deserves, you're doing everything you can to make her life better," he reassured.

Bucky nodded and closed his eyes. He just wanted to help more. But he couldn't. And especially not right that moment. "You think we should head to sleep, Baby? I know I killed the mood so I can just clean your ass up and we can rest."

Steve nodded. "I still had a good night with you, Bucky. Don't worry, please. And we get to enjoy sleeping in and not being woken up by our babies." After they cleaned up, Steve snuggled under the blankets with Bucky with his arms wrapped around him. He muttered a few words of praise and love to him before finally drifting off to sleep after a few minutes.
By the way, the concert in this was the Ramones concert at L'Amour (Rock Capitol of Brooklyn) on June 27th, 1986. Some parts of the concert might not be one-hundred percent accurate because I couldn't get a definitive setlist or member line-up anywhere. Some online sources said Richie was there, some said it was Elvis actually. So, I'm not totally certain. The setlist did include popular hits like 'Teenage Lobotomy', 'Blitzkrieg Pop', 'Rock N Roll High School', 'I Wanna Be Sedated', 'Loudmouth', 'Sheena is a Punk Rocker', 'Surfin' Bird (Trashmen Cover)', and 'Cretin Hop'.
This date - May 30th, 2018 - marks a full year since I started posting this story. Happy Anniversary to this monster of a fic. Thank you all for reading and commenting and showing so much support. You all are so wonderful to me and K and we appreciate you so much! Writing this fic with K has made my life so much better this past year and a half and I'm so glad to be able to share it with you all.

Bucky woke up a lot earlier than Steve and took his time just lounging around for a few minutes before deciding it was time to wake Steve up. He pulled the blankets away enough so he could crawl under them and lay himself down by Steve's ass. There was still some lube but Bucky added some more before prodding gently with his first finger.

---

Steve slept easily through the night and looked so damned relaxed on the mattress and fluffy blanket. When Bucky pushed a finger inside of him, Steve didn't wake right away. He groaned softly in his sleep and mumbled something unintelligible.

---

Bucky chuckled quietly to himself and kissed Steve's thighs as he worked a second finger in and then soon had a third in. He was surprised Steve wasn't awake yet so he slowly and carefully pumped his fingers as he pushed his tongue in alongside them and felt around Steve's rim.

---

Steve started to stir finally. "Mmm, Bucky-" he breathed out quietly, dreaming of him as Bucky opened him up. Steve started to wake up and, for a moment, he was confused if he was still dreaming. "Fuck," he swore quietly. "This is the hottest thing I've ever woken up to." He groaned, his voice still low and grumbly from being half asleep.

---

Bucky bit Steve's thigh lightly. "Let me work," he said, although it was muffled from the blanket on top of him. He pushed his tongue in again and stretched his fingers out as far as he could go. He kind of wanted to see how much Steve's ass would take that morning. So he poured more lube over him and stuck in his pinky and started to pump in and out of him a little faster than before.

---

Steve's dick was already hard as anything and he gripped onto the blanket as his husband opened him up. It'd been a while since he stretched him out like this. He let out a low moan and arched his back as he felt Bucky push another finger inside. "Don't stop, Baby," he said, spreading his legs. He wished he could see Bucky's face as he worked him open.
Bucky carefully worked the four fingers in and out and watched Steve's ass take them so well. He hadn't ever successfully fisted Steve and he wanted to see if he could. "Stevie, you want to give it a shot? I'm really close to getting my first in you. Remember how far we got last time?"

---

The stretch hurt a little, but it was a good ache and the mental image of Bucky under the blankets with his hand almost entirely in his ass was goddamned sexy. "I want to," he said, pressing back onto Bucky's hand. "Please, I want to try, Buck. I'm so goddamn needy for you right now."

---

"Okay, Baby, I've got you," Bucky said hastily and kissed Steve's thighs over and over again. "Relax yourself. Relax everything. Let me get my thumb in. Don't worry. If it hurts, tell me to stop and I'll be done. Just work on keeping yourself open."

---

Steve's muscles tensed just a little before he took a slow, deep breath and relaxed. He eased his legs further apart to give Bucky more room and he pulled the pillow closer to himself to hug it as Bucky worked his fingers in him. "Just keep talking to me, Buck..."

---

Bucky had four fingers and just the tip of his thumb inside Steve. "Of course, Stevie, Baby. I'll talk to you," he said and moved the hand in and out, each time getting the thumb further inside. "You can't possibly know just how handsome you are. I mean, every day I wake up to that gorgeous face and I just want to kiss you so much and thank any god listening that you are mine. And then I get to watch you take off your pajamas nice and slow and tiredly, not even realizing you are giving me a bit of a show. Then you're naked standing there looking for clothes for the day and I want to kiss up your back and your sides and your chest. I want to pin you down and suck marks anywhere I can get to."

---

Steve's body shook a little from the intensity of it all. He was so hard it ached and he wanted this so bad. He wanted Bucky to be able to open him up and have him as vulnerable as ever. Having Bucky talk to him like that helped ground him and any time he almost felt overwhelmed, he was brought back by Bucky's voice. "And how do I look now, Bucky? How are you feeling?" he asked shyly.

---

"Oh, Baby, I am feeling wonderful," Bucky said and kissed Steve lower back. "And you look just absolutely... to die for. And your ass is taking my hand so well. I have my thumb in now, Steve. Can you feel that? Feel all of my fingers in you? I'm going to keep working the rest of my hand inside you, okay? Just tell me to stop if you need to. You are so handsome. I love you so much."

---

"I can feel it," Steve said, sounding absolutely wrecked in the best way possible. "Am I going to be too loose for you to fuck me? I want it to-" he paused when Bucky's knuckles pressed against his prostate and let out a low moan. "I want it to be good for you, too."
"Steve, this is already so good for me," Bucky promised and gently moved his hand in tiny thrusts. "You look so good. It's so hot. You're taking it so well. I'm almost to my wrist. You're doing so well, Baby. How do you feel? You need me to stop?"

---

Steve's ass clenched around Bucky's hand and Steve moaned Bucky's name into the pillow. "Go slow, Love. I don't want to come until you're fucking me," he said. "It feels so good. I want to stay here all day with you, Buck."

---

Bucky went slow and poured some more lube over Steve's hole and his hand. He pushed in as slowly as he could but just kept going and going. Eventually, his hand pushed all the way in and Steve's hole tightened up around his wrist. "God, Baby, that looks so good. This is the first time this has worked."

---

"I don't think I'll walk ever again," Steve lamented with a groan. Each movement Bucky's hand made inside of him was earth shattering and it was the perfect way to make Steve's brain short-circuit and let him simply relish in the sheer pleasure. "God, oh, Bucky. Please fuck me now. I want you more than anything, Sweetheart."

---

Bucky nodded and looked up at Steve. He wanted to fuck him. His cock was angry and pushing against the mattress wondering why it wasn't inside Steve's ass already. "Okay, Baby, I'm going to pull out my hand. You ready?"

---

Steve whined softly, knowing it was going to hurt a little and he would feel so empty afterwards. He moved a little and threw his head back with a soft shout when he shifted Bucky's hand inside of him to press on his prostate firmly again. "Fuck!" he swore again. Steve sucked in a breath and pressed his face into the pillow to muffle any sound he made. "Ready."

---

Bucky kissed Steve's thigh gently over and over as he ever so slowly eased his hand back out of Steve. He let it take a good minute before he was completely out. Then he wiped his hand on his discarded shirt from the night before and held open Steve's ass to look at it. "My god, you're so loose and open and wet for me."

---

Steve trusted Bucky thoroughly and didn't doubt that he would go easy pulling out of him. When he finally got his hand out, Steve shuddered and winced a little as he pushed himself up properly on his hands and knees for Bucky. He looked back at him with a deep blush. "Do you like it?" he asked bashfully. "You want to take a picture?"

---

"Uh-huh," Bucky muttered and just watched Steve for a few seconds. "Did you pack our camera? Which bag?" he asked and glanced around frantically. This was a very important, very hot moment to capture. Steve took his entire hand this time.

"Duffel bag," Steve said. "I wrapped it in a shirt for protection," he explained. Steve brought his camera everywhere. You could never be too sure when you would need it and Steve didn't regret bringing it this time either.

"Here," Bucky said and touched Steve's hands. "Hold your ass open for me nice and pretty. I'll get the camera and take a few snaps of you open and waiting for my cock. How's that sound? You can watch them develop while I start to fuck you deep and hard."

Steve's face burned a bright red at the suggestion. He swallowed thickly and nodded, dutifully pulling his cheeks apart as wide as they would go for his husband. A year ago, Steve would probably be scandalized at himself for what he was doing, but right now, it was the hottest idea ever. "It's open and ready for your dick, Bucky. It's just waiting for you to make an even bigger mess inside of it."

Bucky whined as he got off the bed to grab the camera. "Baby, keep talking like that. I want to wreck you. See you covered in come and shaking and needing me to clean you up." He snatched the camera up and came back, taking a careful shot of Steve holding open his ass and then placing the photo on Steve's pillow as he posed for a second picture. "I don't think anyone has ever seen anything as beautiful as you are. And I don't think anyone has ever felt as good as you make me feel."

Steve closed his eyes and bit his lower lip nervously as Bucky took his pictures. When he saw the developing picture on his pillow, he felt his heart do flips. "You're just as beautiful, Bucky. I remember how amazing it was when I was able to fit my fist inside of you. I need to do that again, Baby. But right now, I need your cock more."

"You got it, Steve. Of course," Bucky said hurriedly and set the camera down on the nightstand. Steve was still holding himself open and it was all too easy for Bucky to slip right into his hole and immediately start up with a firm and quick pace.

Steve lost his balance a little and fell forward into the pillow but he didn't mind. He wanted to be fucked into the mattress. He held himself open still and moaned Bucky's name desperately as Bucky immediately started a fast pace. "Yes, just like that, Bucky. Let me feel you."

Bucky nodded even though Steve couldn't see him. He held Steve's hips as steady as he could and railed him. He wanted to be rough enough to satisfy Steve's need but he also wanted to be gentle with him so he didn't push Steve too far. He kept his movements fast and deep and kept his hand on his hips tight. But he also reached his free hand up and carefully and soothingly scratched through Steve's messy hair.

---

Steve was already so close from being fingered awake and fisted. He could barely hold himself together and he gripped one hand onto the base of his cock to keep himself from coming too soon. "You're perfect," he gasped. "Best sex imaginable. Love you so damn much," he panted. "Look at my ass while you fuck it."

---

Bucky gasped and panted while he fucked into Steve with everything he had. He stared at Steve's ass taking his cock happily. And he could hear the bed creaking beneath the two of them. He really wouldn't last very long either. "Love you, Steve," he answered and trailed his hand from Steve's head down his spine lightly.

---

A thin layer of sweat built upon his body and once Bucky started petting his spine, Steve was done. He cried out as he came onto the sheets beneath him. He gripped his pillow tightly, sensitive as all hell after his orgasm but still loving every second of it. The edges of his vision blurred and he begged Bucky to come for him.

---

Bucky reached down and felt the puddle of come under Steve and he licked some off his fingers as his movements got more unpredictable. "I'm almost there. I promise. I so close. I'm." He leaned his chest over Steve's back and bit his neck as he came deep inside his husband in long hot spurts for several extended moments.

---

Steve arched his back when Bucky bit him and he couldn't stop the low moan that came out. He collapsed onto the bed and dragged Bucky down with him. His body shivered a little and he clung onto his husband tightly. "Holy shit," he breathed out. "That was incredible, Baby."

---

Bucky curled up on top of Steve and flung his arms and legs over him protectively like he was worried someone would come in and snatch him up when he was so vulnerable. "Give... give me a minute," he breathed and closed his eyes, feeling like he could fall asleep right on top of his husband.

---

Steve loved how protective Bucky was. He needed that security a bit today. He was still recovering from the intensity and was grateful that Bucky made him feel looked after through every step of the way. Steve's eyes were half closed but he still admired his husband as he too was catching his breath. Steve reached up to play with his hair. "Can we stay another night?"

---

Bucky peeked one eye open and watched Steve. "I'm not sure. I would say that of course, we should but we have four kids and your dog at home. I know your mom could handle it but I don't know if the babies would let us be gone for another night."
As soon as Bucky brought up their kids, Steve got that look on his face and knew that there was no way he could spend two days away from their son and daughter. "You're right. I miss them already. I don't know how I'm going to face them tonight knowing instead of waking them up with kisses, I was here with your fist in my ass," he snorted.

Bucky scoffed and gave Steve a little kiss. "Well, it's not like you have to confess to them," he said. "Save that for the priest." He chuckled and rolled so he could grab the room service menu. "Breakfast? I'm so hungry."

Steve shook his head. "I'm not telling Father Frank that," he said. God, that would be awful. He was still stiff and sore so Steve had no intention to move from where he was. "Order me everything," he said dramatically. "I could eat a horse right now."

Bucky squinted at the menu and said, "Huh... well they don't have horse. But I can order you a western omelet," he offered and picked up the phone. He ordered their food and then yawned as he rolled back over onto Steve and kissed his neck.

Steve slung an arm lazily around Bucky's shoulders and looked adoringly over at him. "What do you think Christopher and Sarah May are doing right now?" Steve couldn't take his mind off their kids now.

Bucky thought for a moment and looked at the clock. "Well, they probably just woke up and someone is definitely having a crying fit and it's probably Christopher. Because Sarah is probably paying more attention to Ya-Ya and he is very upset about that. But Lilly is probably trying to calm him down and Becca is trying to ignore them all."

Steve smiled fondly. That sounded like a typical morning. "I know my mom loves them both to the ends of the earth but she does such a bad job at hiding that Sarah May is her favorite. Maybe we shouldn't have named her after my Ma so Christopher had a fighting chance," he chuckled. "Should we bring something back for them?"

Bucky chuckled and pet his hand through Steve's hair. "Yeah, but 'Sarah May' is such a good name for her." He looked around and shrugged. "We can always just take those small shampoo bottles with us. Other than that, there isn't much."

"It is a good name for her," Steve agreed. "But I was thinking more of picking up some candy or a little toy on the way home. I know they were taken care of, but I still feel bad for leaving them for a whole day," he explained. "We can get stuff for your sisters as well."

---

"There's a baby store on one of the bus routes. It'll take us a little away from our neighborhood but we can just hop a different route to get us home," Bucky offered. "And we can find something for the girls on our way. I think there are some stores around there where we could find something."

---

"Let's do that," Steve decided. "I want to bring home a little surprise." He smiled as he thought of what they could get their kids. There was a knock on their door to signal their breakfast was here. "I'm not getting up," Steve whined softly, nudging Bucky to get their food.

---

Bucky chuckled and slipped on a robe quickly. "Can you even get up right now?" he asked and went to open the door, smiling to himself because he loved knowing he wrecked Steve like that.

---

"I can't, no," Steve snorted. He wasn't going to attempt for a little while. Every time he shifted he felt a sharp twinge in his lower back telling him to stay where he was. His stomach gave a hungry growl and he looked up at his husband. "What was it like after the first time you got fisted?"

---

"Like how my body felt?" Bucky asked and brought Steve's omelet over to him and laid the plate on Steve's stomach. "I was sore for a day or so. I mean, when your ass takes an entire human hand, it's a bit of a strain. It feels so good but you are a little sore afterwards. You feeling sore, Baby?"

---

"A whole day? But I have to play with our kids..." Steve whined and lazily picked up his fork and started cutting up his breakfast. "I'm so sore. I don't know if I could walk right now if I wanted to," he said. "But I don't want to take a cab, either. Hell no."

---

"I'll carry you," Bucky said and took a bite of his toast. "Now I feel bad. I should have just fucking you and saved the fisting for some other time. But I had to get overeager again," he mumbled and grumpily shoved some eggs in his mouth. "I'm sorry, Steve."

---

"What?" Steve's head snapped over to Bucky with a frown. "Baby, I wanted you to do that to me. Don't feel bad. It's my own fault for being sore," Steve answered. "Please don't feel bad, Love. This isn't your fault at all. I liked it."

---

"I'm really sorry, Baby," Bucky said and chewed off some more of his toast. "I could have made this entire stay a lot better for you." He sighed and finished up his eggs quickly and got up to get dressed.
"Bucky, stop," Steve said firmly. "Stop it, I'm not upset. You know how I like to over complain at silly things. This is no different. I'm so glad we got to do that today. It felt amazing, Buck. I'd make the same choice if I had the chance to do it all over again. Don't let my dumb complaining get to your head."

---

Bucky rubbed his beard and looked away. "Yeah, I know. And you know how I get insecure about silly things. I'm just worried I'm not being good for you. You know?" He sighed and tugged on his pants. "I know I've been better about not getting so... you know, me, about things. But sometimes I just... still worry."

---

Steve sighed as he watched Bucky dress. "I know you worry. But all of those doubts buzzing in your head are wrong, alright? You are so, so good for me. And you make me a better person. If I didn't meet you, I'd probably be reading some boring book all alone in my apartment right now."

---

Bucky's head was trying to tell him that Steve would have probably met someone else who would have been better and Steve would be happier. But Bucky shook it off and tried to get his brain to shut up. Steve loved him. Steve loved him with everything he had. He wouldn't give up Bucky or their family for anything. He nodded and came over to the bed to give Steve a kiss. "Sorry I let the doubts get too loud."

---

"It's okay, Bucky. It just hurts to see you do this to yourself. You are the most amazing man I know and I'm so blessed to call myself your husband. Can you think of many couples who have a marriage as great as ours?" Steve reached out and squeezed Bucky's hand. "Not many, right?"

---

Bucky sighed in relief and sat down next to him. "Just my parents," he said and gave Steve another kiss. "But I even think we do better for each other than they did. Not that they weren't great for each other. But Dad tended to overlook Mom's bad habits like her drinking and just hope they went away. And Mom liked to shut out my dad a lot when things didn't go her way. They loved each other. But I think we communicate better than they did sometimes."

---

Steve smiled when he heard that. Of course, it wasn't like this was a competition, but it made him feel good to know that their relationship was so good that the potentially surpassed Bucky's parents and those two set the bar pretty high. "So, there you go, Love. The proof is in the pudding. You're perfect for me."

---

Bucky smiled and rested his head on Steve's stomach. "I love you. And you have no idea how glad I am to be your husband. You're the light of my life. I'll keep working on getting my brain to shut up." He sighed contentedly and then got up again. "Now, finish up your breakfast and let's head out. Our babies will be missing us."
Steve ate his breakfast and didn't leave a single piece on the plate. It took him a while but he finally got out of bed and got dressed in his clothes after he took a shower. "There we go. How do I look? Do I look like a normal person who didn't just get fisted?"

---

Bucky looked Steve up and down and smiled. "You look amazing. Just like always. You look a little worse for wear but maybe people will just think you are really tired." He shrugged and looked at himself in the mirror. He looked spry and ready to go.

---

Steve swatted Bucky's arm with a smile. "Quit that you're just saying that to make me feel better." Steve walked stiffly but was able to amble on at a decent pace alongside Bucky. "We need to do another date night before school starts," Steve said. "Maybe we can go to the beach together."

---

"We are. In about two weeks. Remember? Coney Island on your birthday?" Bucky asked. "We are going have sex under the pier while the fireworks are going off. It's going to be really romantic."

---

"Yeah, but I want to go to the beach just because. Not because of my birthday or some other celebration," Steve said. He gave a wave of his hand and eyed the stores that they passed for anything the kids might like. "But I am looking forward to birthday sex."

---

"You better be," Bucky said. "I'm planning on wearing something cute that makes my ass look irresistible." He grinned at Steve and pointed to the end of the block where the baby store was. He knew Christopher would like some new toy but Sarah May probably needed a new blanket.

---

"Your ass always looks irresistible, Dear," Steve said patiently. He entered the baby store and went right for the bedding section. He gasped when he found a blanket with elephants all over it. "Won't this be good for her? It even comes with matching pajamas." Steve was a sucker for that sort of stuff.

---

Bucky looked it over and found a pair that had dinosaurs on it. He was much more fond of dinosaurs. But Steve looked so pleased about the elephants. "It'll go with the plushie that Sam got her," he said and gave Steve a happy grin. "And she desperately needs a new blanket."

---

"Yeah. She's puked on hers too many times to count," Steve sighed. "How about you pick out the toy for Christopher since I chose this?"

---

Bucky nodded and went to look over at the toys and plushies. Christopher had a lot of plushies so he veered off and looked at the noise-makers. "How about this little drum?" he asked and held it up to Steve. "Or maybe not. It might break."
"I think he would like that one but break it right away. Is there another that's maybe sturdier?" He asked. Sarah May might hate them a little for giving her older brother more ways to make noise in the house, though.

Bucky hummed softly and looked around. There really wasn't anything else. He did see a small colorful object with a crank on the side. He turned the crank and it started to play a song like a music box. "Ooh. This one!" he said excitedly and looked to Steve.

"That great for him. Let's get that," he agreed. Steve headed to the counter and paid for their items. He had Bucky do the carrying since Steve was still a little uncomfortable with walking. "Now for your sisters."

"Becca was talking about some documentary about the migratory patterns of whales," Bucky said and shrugged. "I'm not sure what it's called but we can see if the video store has anything like that."

"Yeah. And while we are there we can find some sports thing for Lilly. Or we can stop somewhere else as well," he said. Steve wanted to get back to their babies as soon as possible but he also didn't want to half-ass Lilly's surprise just to save a trip to somewhere else.

Bucky agreed and lead Steve to the video store. It only took a little bit for him to find a documentary about sea creatures that he figured would be good for Becca. It wasn't the exact one but it was close enough. "You think Lilly would want something about like... oh, god, I don't know."

Steve looked around and pulled a few tapes. "Well this one has a bunch of interviews from the '75 Yankees... this one is a documentary on football... and I found one that's got a bunch of different music videos from the '70's."

Bucky hummed in contemplation and looked them over. "You choose because I'm not sure which is best. Just not the football one. That's the one sport Lilly does not like," he said and read the list of bands in the music video compilation video. There were some ones that Lilly liked a lot so that might work.

"Let's get the music one. It'll go well with the theme of us going to a concert," Steve said with a smile. He had Bucky pay and they headed out. "Alright. I think we're finally ready to see our kids again."
Bucky held the bags and watched Steve walk a ways down the sidewalk for a bit. "You're moving a little funny still," Bucky said. "How do you feel?" He was worried he really hurt Steve and he just didn't want to say anything about it.

---

"Of course, I'm moving a little funny, I don't think anyone's ass was meant to fit what you put in it this morning," he said quietly with a little smile. "I'm still really sore. I may guilt you into giving me a massage later," he said. "I feel like once I lay down I won't want to get up."

---

Bucky nudged Steve lightly and said, "Baby, of course, I'll massage you. You can just lay on the ground when we get home. The babies will play on top of you. Hopefully, Christopher will figure out his new toy we got."

---

"He's a smart boy. He will figure it out," Steve assured him. When they got home, Diana barked excitedly and ran circles around Steve's legs until he reached down to pet her. Christopher looked up from his spot in the living room with his blocks and let out an excited squeal before toddling over to them.

---

Bucky gasped and got down on the ground with his arms spread out and waited for his son to collide into his chest. "Hey, Bean. We're home! Are you happy to see us? Daddy and I are happy to see you, sweet boy. Where's Ya-Ya?"

---

Christopher ran smack into his papa's chest and hugged him, laughing excitedly at having him back. He babbled up at Bucky to tell him everything that happened while they were gone for what felt like forever. Sarah came over to greet them with Sarah May in her arms. The baby wiggled and smiled, reaching out for her parents.

---

"Oh, there's my girl!" Bucky said happily as he grabbed Christopher and stood up. He kissed Sarah May on the cheek and adjusted his son a little better. "Were they okay for you, Sarah?" he asked and handed Steve the bags of gifts.

---

Sarah May made baby sounds up at him, clearly trying to form the word 'papa' but all that came out was soft nonsense. "They were little angels," Sarah said. "I got to hog my grandbabies for an entire day. Usually, I have to share them, so it was nice to get to do that."

---

"Good. I'm happy you had a good time with them," Bucky said and gestured for them to head to the living room together. "Steve and I have gifts for the kids. Where did the girls get off to?" he asked, not seeing them anywhere. "They can't still be asleep?"
"They're awake," Sarah said. "They could not stop bickering all morning so I told them I'd give them each five dollars if they behaved themselves until you got home. Their solution was to go to their own rooms and mind their own business," she laughed.

---

Bucky sighed. "Well, I'm not surprised." He set Christopher back down on the ground and gave Sarah May another kiss. "Steve, if you want to get the babies waiting on the couch, I'll get the girls and we can give out presents."

---

"Dada," Christopher said, reaching up for Steve the second his pop set him down. Steve laughed and stiffly bent down to pick him up.

---

Bucky went and got the girls and brought them right downstairs. "Okay, present time, you guys. Sit down," he said and noticed Steve's pained looking face. "You okay there, Baby?" he asked and offered the recliner for him to sit down.

---

Steve took the recliner and relaxed, insisting to his mom that he slept funny and it bothered his back. Christopher reached his hands out at the bag to try and see what was inside. Lilly would've done the same if she thought she could get away with it. "So what'd you get us? Is it another baby?" Lilly joked.

---

"Yes, I have a grow-your-own-baby in here. You just add water and it's a newborn," Bucky joked back and pulled out Lilly's gift first and handed it to her and then grabbed Becca's and gave it to her. "There you, Monster. How's that?"

---

Lilly wasn't going to complain when she was getting a gift for no reason. It also just so worked out that she also loved her present. "This is great! I'm going to watch this now!"

Becca snapped her head. "No, you're not. I'm watching mine first!"

---

Bucky shook his head and stopped Lilly from running to get her tape in first. "Lil, I think Becca's would be better for now because I'm sure it'll be a lot quieter than yours." He paused and kissed her head. "And Becca should wait for the babies to get their gifts first anyway."

---

The girls both huffed but waited patiently for the babies to get their toys. When Steve gave Christopher the crank toy, he tried to get it to work by shaking it a little and yelling at it. Steve cracked up laughing and then pointed at the crank. "No, baby boy, use that."

---

Christopher looked at the crank and then slowly put it in his mouth and gnawed on it. "Oh, Steve, show him how," Bucky said with a chuckle and pulled out the blanket and outfit for Sarah May. He handed the blanket to his daughter and she just curled up on the couch on top of it, rubbing it on her face.

---

"Bean," Steve laughed. He took the toy and started turning it so the music would play. Christopher was upset at first that the toy was taken but when music played he suddenly was pacified again. Steve looked up and melted at the sight of his daughter with her new blanket. "Looks like that's a winner."

---

"Yeah," Bucky agreed and scooped up Sarah May from the couch to hold her in her blanket on his chest. "Now let's hope she likes the pajamas too so it'll be all matched up." He turned to his sisters and said, "You guys would have loved the concert. They played all the best songs and it was so much fun."

---

Steve was having a blast watching their son play with his new toy. Every time he got it to play more, he would look up and make sure that Steve was watching him. "How close were you to the stage?" Lilly asked. "Did you get any autographs? What about a record? That would be so cool!"

---

Bucky shook his head. "No, Lil, we didn't get autographs or anything. We were close enough that Johnny touched my hand and Dee Dee looked right at me. It was surreal. It was amazing. I brought you home a tour shirt too."

---

"What? No way! Which hand was it, I want you to high five me with that hand right now!" Lilly said, getting all worked up and holding up her hand for Bucky to high five. She got as excited over this sort of stuff as Bucky did and it had Steve grinning like a doof at the two of them. He wished she could've gone but it was better that she didn't. Bucky deserved a date night.

---

Bucky laughed and gave her a crisp high five. He loved that she was as into these bands as he was. Becca loved them too but she was more reserved about it. "God, Lilly, they were all just as cute in person. And I made sure I was dressed as much like them as I could be and I think I did a good job."

---

Diana crawled up onto the armchair and tried to sit in Steve's lap next to the baby but she couldn't fit and started to whine when only her top two paws could get up. "Next time they're nearby can I go with you? I'll be old enough by then, won't I?" Lilly asked, pouting at him.

---

"Sure, we can do that. We will just keep an eye out during their next tour. Okay?" Bucky agreed.

Becca huffed a sigh and held up her tape. "Can I please play this now? You said after the babies got their presents. Besides, Christopher might like watching some of the ocean life."
"Go ahead," Steve said. "If you can get Christopher to watch a documentary with you, I'd be impressed." Christopher heard his name and waved at Becca for her attention.

"Your kid is going to love this, Steve. Just you wait," Becca said and popped the tape in and started it playing. "I mean, he loves animals so he will love watching them too."

Bucky sighed and settled in, still holding Sarah May. "Maybe he will fall asleep and Steve and I can nap while the babies are napping."

Steve rubbed Christopher's back gently and encouraged him to watch what his aunt Becca was doing. He watched her put the movie in and he absently sucked on his thumb as he watched the screen. Steve wasn't big on having his kids watch tv, but if the family was watching as well he didn't mind. "We slept in how late and you're looking for a nap?" Steve laughed.

"I'm tired," Bucky defended and felt Sarah May reach up and touch his cheek with her little fingers. "We had an eventful night. And you know after they have a snack in a bit, they will want to nap. So, I figure I can too." Sarah May yawned and pressed her face on her Papa's neck. "See? Ya-Ya is already sleepy."

Steve smiled at the way their daughter cuddled with Bucky. He tried to cuddle with Christopher but the baby just squirmed until Steve let him sit on the floor with Diana. He huffed and then agreed, "Fine, I suppose we may as well get sleep while we can."

Bucky yawned and saw Sarah May yawn again after him. "Well, you and Christopher don't have to nap. I think we are going to, though. I've got the early shift tomorrow so I would like to get some extra sleep. And look at your daughter. She looks like she hardly slept with us gone for the night."

Steve stiffly got up so he could stand by Bucky and Sarah May. He rubbed her back gently and nodded. "She missed her papa singing her the lullaby she loves," he said. "Do you want me to keep an eye on you two so you can sleep in the bed with her?"

Bucky smiled tiredly up at Steve. "Sure, Baby, if you don't mind. You know I like having her fall asleep on me." He held her carefully and stood up. "You can cuddle us if you want to. I'm sure she would like that. And Christopher is pretty occupied watching fish."

"Yeah, looks like Becca won this round of 'I told you so','" Steve admitted, watching their son look up at the tv while Becca watched, drinking in the information. Diana would've followed them but Christopher was holding onto her so she stayed put. Once in their bedroom, Steve pulled the blankets out so Bucky could lay beneath it.

---

Bucky got all curled up under the covers with Sarah May lying carefully on his chest. He sighed happily and watched her for a minute, in awe once more at how much he loved his children. "She will be crawling any day now. I know she's not been as fast as Christopher but she should be getting there now."

---

"I see her pushing herself up sometimes. She wants to follow her big brother and she'll cry if he goes too far from her." He laid down next to his husband and put an arm around his waist. "I hope she does it when you're home. I know you have to work and all. But I hope she waits for you."

---

Bucky sighed and looked to Steve. "Yeah, so do I. But she will do it when she feels strong enough," he said. Sometimes he got a little jealous that Steve got to be home with the babies all the time. But then he had to remind himself that Steve had been severely injured on the field and that's why he was able to be a stay-at-home dad so soon.

---

"Sarah May, you got to wait until your pop comes home to be big and strong, got it?" Steve said to their almost-asleep daughter. He then smiled over at Bucky. "There we go. She didn't argue with me, so I think she agrees that she should wait for you."

---

Bucky chuckled and gave Steve a quick little kiss. "Alright, I'll have to take her word for it then," he said and nestled himself against Steve a little better. "For now, though, I want a little nap. Wake me up when she gets up. Or in two hours, whichever is sooner."
When Bucky came home and said that he'd arranged with Adriana's caseworker to take her to the aquarium, Steve was over the moon. The day of the outing, he got into busy-bee mode and made lunches and snacks for everyone and even made his own scavenger hunt for her to help her learn more about the animals there. He had Becca help him with the facts since she knew more about marine life than he did.

He filled a little backpack with pencils and paper for her and carried it as he walked to the orphanage with Bucky. "So, what relation did you tell them I was to you?" he asked.

---

Bucky glanced at Steve and then straight ahead again. He cleared his throat and said quietly, "I- I was honest. At least, just with her caseworker. And Karen was really kind and supportive and didn't have a problem at all. She's a good woman. I think you'll like her. She said she will just sort of hang back as we go through the aquarium. She wants Adriana to know that she is there if she needs her but she also wants her to have a good time."

---

Steve was pleasantly surprised. He hadn't expected that answer. "Wow, really? And Karen still gave the okay?" He smiled. Today was even better. He had already been happy to give an orphaned kid the day out she deserved but to know that he didn't have to hide who he was to the person in charge of her made him feel even better. "Did you get to tell Adriana that she's going to the aquarium or is it a surprise for her?"

---

"No, she knows," Bucky said. "My guess is she's waiting at the door for us right now. She's very excitable. And she wants to see turtles so let's hope there are some there for her to watch for a while. She's never seen a real turtle."

---

"I can't wait to see her. Can you imagine what it'll be like once Christopher and Sarah May are old enough to come running to the door when we're taking them on little trips?" When they got to the orphanage, Steve let Bucky lead the way since he was more familiar with this place.

---

"I can't wait for them to wait at the windows with their faces pressed to the glass just staring at me when I come home from work," Bucky said. He said hello to some of the kids he knew as they walked to the office. Karen was waiting with the orphanage director who sent an assistant to fetch Adriana.

---

"It's going to be adorable. Especially when there's a whole row of kids waiting at the window for you. Plus Diana. Raphael won't let you know that he missed you." When the assistant came back, Adriana came bouncing in and immediately hugged Bucky's leg. "Miss Bubby!"
Bucky gasped excitedly and bent down to hug the little girl. "Adriana! How is my favorite little ballerina today, huh?" he asked and pointed up to Steve. "This is Steve. Can you show Steve the dance move that Kari taught you? I'm sure he will be impressed."

---

She giggled at him and shyly hid against his leg when she saw Steve at first. Then she stepped away and did her best hop and turn. Steve clapped excitedly. "Wow, that was so good!" he praised. "Are you a professional dancer?"

---

"No," Adriana whispered and glanced up at Bucky then back to Steve. "I just like it. I want to be a ballerina."

Bucky nodded and stood up again. "Yeah, and one of the older girls is naturally good at dancing so she shows her how to do new dances a lot."

---

"Well, if you keep dancing like that, you'll be on the stage in no time," Steve said with an encouraging smile. "So, are you ready to go to the aquarium, Kiddo? Bucky tells me that you like turtles. It's possible that we could see one there." Steve had called ahead to make sure that there was still an exhibit open with turtles in it.

---

"Yes, I'm ready, Miss Steeb," Adriana said and then gasped. "Wait, I need Lulu!" She ran upstairs and grabbed a plush monkey that doubled as a backpack. Then she came back and grabbed Bucky's hand.

"Are you ready now, Adriana?" Bucky asked and checked to make sure the monkey was secure on her back. He knew she would be devastated if anything happened to it.

---

Bucky was right. This kid was too damn cute. Steve loved his daughter as she was but he was even more excited to see her grow up to be around Adriana's age and talking with them and being excited. Once they were ready, he led the way towards the aquarium. "What other animals do you like, Adriana?" he asked.

---

Adriana, who was still clutching to Bucky's hand, said, "I like 'turtles' and monkeys and 'dawphins' and sharks and lions and jellies and worms." She smiled proudly up at Steve and nodded.

Bucky chuckled and said, "Adriana, do you remember when we chased those pigeons in the park a few weeks ago?"

---

When Adriana said 'turtles', Steve gave Bucky a look to try to convey just how cute this kid was. He then looked back down to Adriana. "I like those animals too. I think dogs are my favorite, though."
Adriana was a bit shy to respond to anything more than a question from Steve, so she answered Bucky instead. "Yeah! Their wings were like this!" Then she flapped her arms real big.

"Yeah, they did that!" Bucky responded happily. "There were a lot of them. Good thing we didn't get pooped on." He squeezed her hand lightly and glanced back to make sure Karen was still with them. "Steve, do you want to tell Adriana about your dog?"

Adriana giggled. She looked over to Steve and waited for him to talk. "Well, we have a big German Shepherd named Diana who loves cuddling and giving kisses. She makes me feel better when I'm sad and she's fun to play with," he explained.

Adriana nodded but looked just a little confused. "I don't know what that dog is," she said, having never seen a German Shepherd before. "How big is your doggie, Miss Steeb?" She seemed to be getting a little more engaged with Steve, being less shy and more comfortable.

"Here, I have a picture of her in my wallet," Steve said. Of course, he would. He took his wallet out and showed her a picture of Diana standing next to Christopher, who was giggling at the camera. "She's almost as tall as me when she stands on her hind legs. She comes up to my chest."

Adriana's eyes got wide and she stared at the dog. "That is a big dog," She said in disbelief and looked up at Steve. "There's a baby too," she added as if trying to ask whose baby it was without seeming like she was being nosy.

"She is a big dog," Steve agreed. "I used to be able to carry her in one hand when she was a puppy." He then pointed at the baby. "That's my son, Christopher. He's a little over a year old now. Almost a year and a half. How old are you, Adriana?"

Adriana shyly held up four fingers. "My birthday was two months ago. Miss Karen got me ice cream and a new coloring book."

They got to the aquarium and Bucky held the door open for everyone as they filed in. Adriana had let go of his hand and excitedly but patiently waited behind Steve in the line to get their tickets.

Once they were inside, Steve handed Adriana the backpack. "There's some activities in there we can do, like a scavenger hunt and coloring. Bucky and I can help you read if you don't know what the words are," he said.

Adriana took the bag and immediately started pulling the contents from it and looking over them. She seemed disinterested in anything with words on it since she couldn't read yet. She opened up the pack of crayons to make sure every color was there and then she carefully tucked everything back into the bag. "What's a 'scavenger' hunt, Miss Steeb?" she asked and looked to Steve curiously.

---

The stuff with text took the most time for Steve to assemble so he was a little bummed to see her completely ignore it. "A scavenger hunt is a list of stuff you have to find to get to a big prize at the end. It's kind of like a treasure hunt," he explained.

---

Adriana squinted in thought. "What's the prize?" she asked. "And what do we look for?" She seemed more interested now.

Bucky took the paper with the list on it and looked it over. "It looks like Miss Steve wrote out a lot of different animals to find. And there are turtles on the list. Maybe we can ask Steve to help us read the list."

---

"Yeah, you look for animals. Every time you find an animal, we learn something about it and we get a clue for the next one. At the end, I heard that there's a plush turtle toy," Steve said, speaking in a hushed tone as if he was letting her in on a secret. "We don't have to do it if you don't want to, though."

---

"What's the first one?" Adriana asked and tugged on Bucky's arm to get to the paper. She looked at it for a second then seemed to remember that she couldn't read so she handed it to Steve. "I used to have a little 'tuttle' but then Joey took it."

---

"The first one is a penguin," he sounded out the word again for her as he ran his finger along the page. "They're birds that live by the ocean. They can't fly like other birds, but they can swim just as good as fish." He handed her the paper for her to hold on to. "Why did Joey take your turtle?" he asked.

---

"Ping-gwin," Adriana repeated and then shrugged nervously. "He's a meanie. He took it when he was picked up."

Karen stepped forward and put her hand on Adriana's head softly. "What she means is that Joey was adopted and took the turtle with him when he went home with his new parents. It was actually his toy but he let her cuddle with it at night."

---

Steve nodded, understanding it now. "Joey sounds like a nice boy to me. Sharing is nice," he said patiently to Adriana. "But I am sorry you don't have a turtle anymore to play with. Maybe we can change that today. What do you say, Kiddo?"
Adriana nodded shyly. She wanted a turtle but she wasn't sure if she was allowed to ask for it. But she just thanked Steve and then took Bucky's hand again as they went to look for the penguins. Once they got there, Adriana slipped away from Bucky to press herself up against the glass and stare at them. Bucky tugged on Steve's elbow and brought him close. "She's so great, isn't she?"

---

Even if Adriana didn't want to do the scavenger hunt, Steve would've gotten her the turtle anyway. But he wanted to try and get her to engage with the animals and ask questions as well. He wanted her to have fun and learn. "She is," he agreed, leaning into Bucky a little. "She's such a little sweetheart. I can see why you liked her right away."

---

Bucky chuckled and watched the little girl as she gasped and squatted down to see the penguins dive under the water and pop back up again. "She's a little shy at first but she will open up a little more eventually. I didn't know about that Joey thing, though. I wonder if she feels bad because he was adopted and she wasn't? I knew she doesn't really get the concept but she's got to understand when people start leaving."

---

"How hasn't she been adopted yet? She's such an adorable kid," Steve said. He knew people typically went for babies but she was a baby when she first went into the system. He smiled when she saw her watching the animals. "I guess it's hard for her to make friends if they keep leaving... poor kid."

---

"I think it's very hard to make friends in an orphanage. And I think it just gets harder every year to be adopted. Older kids get ignored more," Bucky said and sighed. "But she's such a good kid. She just wants to be loved. And she's so happy. She just frustrated and sad like anyone else but she still finds things to smile about."

---

Steve nodded. Adriana started following some of the penguins along the tank, trying to keep up with their swimming. "We don't really have much room right now," he started. "But maybe we can work the basement into a proper room, if, uh... you were thinking about it..."

---

Bucky hesitated for a second and then slowly looked over at Steve and then back at Adriana. He had been thinking about it. He just hadn't been sure how to make it work yet. They had so many people under one roof as it was. Hell, they made half the living room into space for Steve's mom. They were sort of running out of places to put their children. "I have been thinking about it, to tell you the truth - since about the second I met her," Bucky admitted and looked back at Steve. "But I didn't want to ask until I had a plan. But I think you just made my plan for me." He grinned and nodded at his husband. "Becca would probably be more than happy to take a room in the basement if we can finish it off like that. It would be sort of like she was in an apartment. She can stay there until she is old enough to get her own place and wants to go. I think that could be good for her - to let her have some space. I mean, she's sixteen now."
Steve smiled a little when Bucky admitted that he'd been thinking about adopting her. He imagined what it would be like for her going from the orphanage to having a big family. It would be a huge transition for her. "We should probably make the basement available for her regardless. Becca likes her peace and quiet and she has been a lot more understanding lately. She deserves us to try to work with her on that."

"That can be a project for the three of us then. Just like when we did her bookshelf," Bucky said. "She might not want to help with some of the bigger stuff and I might have to even hire some guys to help me finish the ceiling and drywall. I know I'm pretty good but I don't think I could do the ceiling."

"I could try," Steve said. "I'm tall and handy. The babies could hang out with my mom for an hour or so at a time while I try to finish it up." It probably wouldn't be good with the state of his lungs but he wanted to help make their home more habitable for the kids. And Becca would benefit from it as well.

Bucky chuckled and licked his lips as he looked up at Steve. He wanted to kiss him really badly. "Sure, I'll hold the ladder and make sure you don't hurt yourself. If we can't figure it out between the two of us then we will call someone in." He sighed happily and then looked back to Adriana who was now seated on the ground with her head in her hands watching a small penguin do flips. "You do want to adopt her, right?" he asked. "You aren't just saying it to make me feel better? I mean, we could give her a great home, but I know we are a little overpacked right now."

"Of course, I do," Steve said immediately. "You know how much I want to have a bigger family," he said. "And sure, I love babies. But so what if we missed out on Adriana being as small as Christopher or Sarah May? She needs a family. And we can make it work so we can be that family for her. Maybe one day soon she'll like me as much as she likes you," he said. Steve squeezed Bucky's arm and went close to Adriana again. "What do you think of the penguins?" he asked her.

Bucky smiled happily and then looked back at Karen and nodded. They had already discussed this possibility together and he was going to have to let her know that they were both on board and would be ready soon.

Adriana looked up at Steve and then pointed at the little one. "This one's doing flips!" she said with wide eyes so Steve would know just how amazing that was. "And his mommy is over there watching. You see that?"

"Wow, that's so cute!" Steve said, kneeling down so he could see the flipping penguin. "Yeah, I see his mommy watching. I bet she's making sure that he doesn't get hurt." He pet her hair carefully. "I got to pet a penguin once," he said. "What do you think a penguin feels like?"
Adriana thought for a moment and then looked at the penguins. She was confused because they looked like birds but they also swam so maybe it felt like a fish? "Is it like a squishy bird?" she asked and then added, "Sort of like a wet bird?"

"It's kind of like how your hair feels after you take a bath. But also squishy," Steve explained. "That was a very good guess you had, Adriana. You're so smart," he said, nudging her lightly. "Do you want to see some other animals or do you want to watch the penguins a little longer?"

Adriana grinned at the compliment and handed Steve the scavenger hunt paper. "We can go see more animals. Which one is next?" She looked around and seemed to notice Bucky again. "Miss Bubby likes jellyfish. We colored in my book once and he picked the jellyfish."

"Well, it says here that after the penguins, we have to find an underwater animal that also breathes air. Do you know what kind of animal that is? Maybe we can ask one of the workers here for help," Steve suggested. "I don't think a jellyfish breathes air but maybe we will see one along the way. It's thoughtful that you remember that Bucky likes jellyfish."

Adriana got up from the ground and reached up for Steve's hand as she went through her knowledge of underwater creatures. "Polar bears?" she asked and ran her free hand through her hair. "They go underwater, don't they? Oh, but they are bears. I don't know."

Steve looked at Bucky with a big grin when she reached up for his hand. He gave her little hand a squeeze. "That's a very good guess. Polar bears go underwater but I don't think they live underwater. What do you think, Buck? Can you think of an underwater animal that breathes air?"

Bucky's eyes went wide and he shook his head because Steve put him on the spot. "Um... whales?" he asked and hoped it was what Steve was looking for. "Cause they have the holes in their heads to shoot out the water? That's how that works, right?"

Steve gave Bucky an apologetic smile. "Whales do breathe air, yeah," he said. He looked down at Adriana. "You want to find some whales? This place is pretty big, maybe they'll have one." He gave her a little tug. "Have you seen a whale in a picture book before?"

"It was a pink one!" she said excitedly and looked up to Bucky. "Miss Bubby colored it in. But I did the ocean parts." Adriana grinned and walked with Steve as they went to see if there was a whale anywhere.

"Steve, I'm going to hang back and talk to Karen. We will be just behind you two," Bucky said and squeezed his arm.
"You did, huh?" Steve asked. "What's your favorite color?" he asked. Steve gave Bucky a little smile and a nod. Maybe talking to Karen would be good since they would need to start the paperwork if they really were going to go for this. "Oh, look," he said, pointing at a tank. "Look at that, that's a beluga whale. Isn't it cute?"

"His head is funny," Adriana said and placed her hand on the glass. "That's not the kind of whale that we colored." She looked up at Steve and then back to the whale. "He looks a little lonely. No one else is with him. Where's his family?"

"That's how all beluga whales are. I wonder if their heads are hard or squishy," he said. Steve didn't really know how to answer her question. "Maybe he got lost," he offered. "Why do you think he looks lonely? Is it because there aren't any other whales like him around?"

Adriana just nodded and tilted her head slowly as she looked at the beluga. "The penguin had a mommy watching him. But the whale doesn't have anyone to love him. He's just swimming around by himself." She sighed and let go of Steve's hand so she could press her face closer to the glass.

"Just because he doesn't have a mommy doesn't mean he doesn't have people that love him," Steve said. He pointed to the workers there. "See? Those people work hard every day to bring him food and make sure his tank is nice and clean. They love him a lot."

Adriana was quiet for a minute and then looked up at Steve. "What's his name?" she asked and squished a little closer to Steve. "Do whales have names? Can they understand us?" She looked back to see Bucky and Karen, almost making sure that no one had left her.

"I don't know what his name is, but I bet one of his caretakers can tell you," Steve said. "Whales don't speak human, but they can tell who's friendly," he explained. "Come on, let's go ask one of the people what his name is."

Adriana took Steve's hand again and walked with him over to a short kid probably only in high school who was standing around just so people could ask questions. Adriana hid behind Steve's leg and clung to his pants as she stared up at the kid. She had definitely warmed up more to Steve already.

Steve smiled and gently picked her up so that she was sitting on his shoulder, now taller than the kid.
"Go ahead, Adriana. I'm sure this nice worker will be happy to answer your question," he encouraged. "Go ahead and ask what the whale's name is."
Adriana looked down at Steve and then the now much shorter employee. "Um... Miss Worker... what is the 'begulas' whale's name?" She bit her lip and then rested her chin on the top of Steve's head.

The worker looked up at her and smiled. "Her name is 'Princess'."

Steve gasped. "I almost named my dog that! He convinced me otherwise," Steve said, pointing his finger over at Bucky and then turning his head to give him a pout.

"Princess," Adriana repeated and looked down at Steve. "Can we write 'Princess' in on our scavenger hunt?" she asked, ready to move on to the next animal. She was still pretty sad that Princess was all alone in the tank.

"Sure, we can," Steve promised. "Why don't we wave goodbye to Princess first," he said. He set Adriana down and wrote 'Princess' next to the picture of a whale and waved to the animal. "Do you want to ride on my shoulder or walk on your own?" Steve asked.

Adriana waved to Princess and then sniffled a little. "I can walk," she said and tugged Steve's hand down so she could look at the next clue. "What's the next one?" she asked. "Is it 'turtles'?" She looked up at Steve with curious eyes. "Miss Steeb, what is your favorite animals?"

"I think the turtles are very soon," Steve assured her. "It says here we have to find an animal that has a shell. You think maybe it's a crab?" Steve smiled at her and said, "Dogs are my favorite animal. I've always wanted one and now I have my doggy named Diana."

Adriana thought for a second. "'Turtles' have shells. But crabs do too. But I think starfish do too," she said and scrunched up her face. She also reached up for Steve's hand again and asked, "Can I see your doggy?"

"You're right. Both turtles and crabs do have shells," Steve said. "I don't think starfish do." Steve gave her hand a squeeze. "Maybe if Karen says it's okay we can go on another outing and I'll bring Diana with me so you can play with her," he said.

That seemed to be a good idea to Adriana so she nodded and walked with Steve past some river fish before she found the turtles. She gasped and slipped out of Steve's grasp to run up to the tank and gawk at them. "Look at the 'turtles', Miss Steeb!"
"Woah! Look at how big they are!" Steve said in an over-excited tone. He smiled widely when he saw the little girl rush up to the tank. "How many turtles are there, Adriana? There's so many of them." He looked over at Bucky and gave him a big grin.

---

Bucky noticed that Adriana had found the turtles so he paused his discussion with Karen about the home visit they need to set up before he can file to adopt Adriana. He came over to the tank and bent down and picked Adriana up and held her close so she could see the turtles better.

Adriana pointed a finger out and started counting. "Seven, Miss Steeb."

---

"Seven. Wow, that's a lot of turtles," he said. Steve looked over to Bucky and asked, "How's chatting with Karen?" Steve didn't want to get too into detail in front of Adriana but he was curious to know if they had a chance in hell to adopt her.

---

Bucky nodded softly and smiled. Karen thought it would be plausible. They would just have to have Bucky be the adoptive father and Steve could file for secondary guardianship later. They would just have to pass some checks and the home exam and do some other things before they could have her. And, of course, they would have to talk to Adriana to make sure she even wanted to be their kid.

---

Steve beamed when Bucky nodded his head. He couldn't believe the luck that they had. He playfully tugged on Adriana's foot since it was dangling as Bucky held her up. "Which one is your favorite turtle?" he asked. "If you had to name it, what would you call it?"

---

Adriana hummed as she looked at all the turtles until she found her favorite. It was a grumpy looking older turtle who moved a little slower than the rest and seemed to have an injured leg. "That one," she said and looked up to Bucky and then Steve. "I would name it 'Puddles'," she said.

---

Steve laughed. "Puddles, huh? That's a good name for a turtle." He pointed over at one of the workers. "Do you want to ask him how old he is? Do you know how long turtles can live for? Some of them can live even longer than humans do."

---

"Yeah, I want to know how old Puddles is," Adriana said and pressed a hand to the glass when Puddles came swimming back around closer to her once again. "Can 'turtles' understand us, Miss Steeb?"

---

"They don't speak human either. But they're able to tell what kind of humans are nice and who isn't nice," he said. Steve walked over to one of the employees and asked her to come over to answer the question for Adriana.
"That turtle is eighty-seven years old," she told her politely. "He was brought here fifty years ago from another aquarium that closed down."

---

Adriana was getting a little annoyed that none of the animals were able to understand 'human', as Steve called it. But she was amazed that the turtle was so old. She couldn't even wrap her young little brain around just how old that was.

Bucky listened to the worker and added, "Well, Adriana named that one 'Puddles' and he is her new favorite turtle. So, we might be coming to visit him a lot."

---

Adriana's head snapped to look at Bucky like a dog having a treat dangled in front of them. "Are we coming back to see the 'tuttles' again?" she asked right away. This was the first proper outing she had that wasn't with the other kids from the orphanage so she had just assumed that it was a once in a lifetime sort of thing.

---

"If you want to," Bucky said and gave her a little smile. "I like coming here and so does Steve so you can come with us." He looked to Steve and then added. "I think it's time for lunch. And I think the cafeteria is close around here. Maybe we can talk about some things while we eat."

---

Steve nodded. "Adriana, maybe we should give the turtles a quick rest and we can come back after lunch and see them some more," he suggested to her. "Aren't you hungry?"

---

"Yeah, I am," she admitted, a little sadly. She just wanted to watch the turtles for a little longer. "I only had eggs for breakfast because Marci wanted my toast so she gave me her orange juice for it." She sighed and then let her head flop down into the crook of Bucky's neck as they headed to the cafeteria together.

---

"We'll come back to see the turtles, don't worry," Steve reassured. "You can pick out whatever you want for lunch so long as Karen says it's okay," he said. He smiled and led the way to the cafeteria. There was a special line for kid's meals so Steve headed there first.

---

Once they all got their food, they sat together at a table off in the corner where it was a little quieter. "Adriana, Sweetie, you remember when I told you about my sisters and my kids? We were coloring together out on the picnic tables outside."

---

Adriana was more interested in digging into her chicken nuggets at first. But once she swallowed down some food, she said, "Yeah, your sisters are big girls. They go to school and everything."
"Yeah, that's right," Bucky said and opened her milk for her. "Do you remember me telling you about my babies? Remember I was saying about how I have a little boy and a little girl and I'm their Papa?"

"Uh-huh. You got them cause their mommies and daddies couldn't take care of them." She sipped at her milk and asked, "What were your babies' names again?"

"Christopher and Sarah May," Bucky said with a happy little smile. "Can you say those names, Adriana?" He looked over to Steve and grinned happily. Of course, he knew that Steve knew how great she was already. But he was still excited about the prospect of adopting her as well.

"'Christuffer' and Sarah May," she answered. She paused in thought and she pointed at Steve. "That's your son's name, too!" She realized. "How come they have the same name?"

Bucky nodded to Steve and gave him a reassuring nod. He already knew what to do. "You know how some kids have mommies and daddies? And then some only have a mommy or only have a daddy? Well, some kids have two mommies or two daddies. Christopher and Sarah May have two daddies - me and Miss Steve."

Adriana looked confused. She stared at Bucky for a very long time because she had never heard of anything like that before. "That's allowed?" she asked curiously. She turned to Karen for confirmation. "Oh," Adriana said. She then shrugged her shoulders. "When will I get a mommy or a daddy?"

Bucky looked to Steve and then reached out to squeezed Adriana's hand for a second. "Well, Sweetie, I don't know," Bucky said honestly. He didn't want to get her hopes up just in case this didn't work out. "If two mommies or two daddies would want to be your parents, would that be okay with you?"

Adriana frowned and rested her face in her hands. "I just want to have a family. And my own room. And a 'tuttle'," she said sadly. She didn't seem to care what the makeup of her parents were so long as she had parents. "I like Miss Karen. But she says she can't be my mommy."

Bucky looked to Steve and then wiped his eyes so Adriana wouldn't see him tearing up. "Well, are you okay with having siblings? And other animals with the turtle? Like a cat and a dog?" He really wished he could hold Steve's hand.
Adriana didn't know about the siblings but she heard 'turtle' and 'animals' so she nodded her head. "A 'tuttle' can be my mommy and daddy, Miss Bubby?" she asked. Steve squeezed Bucky's knee under the table because she really was so adorable.

Bucky chuckled and shook his head. "Well, Adriana, the turtle would be your animal. And you would have parents that aren't animals. And some little siblings and some aunts. Does that sound like something you would want?"

Steve smirked. He knew that there was no way they could say no to getting her a turtle but he thought it was funny how Bucky was offering that chip up right away. "I want parents. But parents don't want me," Adriana said and slumped her chin down a little.

Bucky blinked a few times and looked to Steve as his eyes misted up again. "Sweetie, Adriana, someone is going to want you. Someone is going to get you real soon. You'll have a family. Okay?" He glanced over to Karen to make sure he wasn't overstepping. He couldn't just tell Adriana that they were going to adopt her. They had to pass house inspection and all that before telling her.

Adriana didn't look entirely convinced. Steve decided to try and smooth her feelings over. "I don't know if you believe in God, but I do. And I know that he made parents for you. There's a lot of people in this world, but only one you. It's Karen's job to help find the parents God made for you."

Bucky nodded and smiled softly at Adriana. "I know that it doesn't always seem like it, but things will work out. And I know that it's hard to believe that." She had been alone at the orphanage for four years after all. "But Steve is right. You will get the parents you are supposed to have. And they will love you so much."

Adriana sighed. And poked at her mashed potatoes with her fork. "Do you promise that, Miss Bubby? I really want to have a family," she said. "I've been a good girl. Right, Miss Karen?" she asked, looking over at the woman nearby.

Bucky looked to Steve desperately and then covered his face in his hands for a second to compose himself once again. "Adriana, you are so good. You are a very good girl. You haven't done anything wrong. Do you know that?"

Steve's heart broke for her. He held Bucky's hand under the table once Bucky had composed himself. It made him grateful to know that their two babies wouldn't have to suffer the same way that Adriana did. Would it have been possible for them to go so long without being adopted?
"Yes, you have been very good," Karen was quick to praise.

Steve nodded his head. "Yeah," he agreed. "I'm really happy that I got to meet you and spend time with you today."

---

Adriana looked between Steve and Bucky and then back down at her food. "No one has taken me out by myself before. Other kids get to go have fun and then they get to go home with them. I just stay put." She sniffled and looked up at Bucky and just changed the subject. "Can we go back to see Puddles again?"

---

"Well, Bucky and I can take you out again if that would make you happy. It would make me happy and my dog Diana would love to meet you," Steve said. "Let's have one more bite of your potatoes and we can go back to Puddles. I bet he misses you already."

---

Adriana nodded and reluctantly finished off her potatoes before getting up and trotting over to Steve and holding out her hand for him to take.

"I'll throw the trash away," Bucky mumbled quickly and collected their trays, scurrying off so he could have a few moments to keep himself from crying and blurring out to Adriana that he was going to be her Papa if everything worked out.

---

Steve gave Bucky a worried look when he saw him run off to throw everything out. He knew that Bucky had such a big heart and he was probably hurting so much for what Adriana went through. Steve was only keeping his composure because he was certain in his mind that there was no way that Adriana wouldn't come home with them soon, so there wasn't a need to feel too sad when things were going to be okay soon. Steve took Adriana's hand and led her back to the turtles.

---

Bucky came back over to them slowly and just stood back a bit and watched them. Steve was so good with Adriana already and she seemed to like being with him. He gently touched Steve's back as he moved to come stand next to them. "Adriana, are we going to finish the scavenger hunt? Or do you want to finish it next time and we can just watch Puddles and his friends for a while?"

---

"I want to watch Puddles and the others," she said. She pressed her face to the glass again and Steve smiled fondly at her. He nudged Bucky away a few steps so they could talk. "Are you alright, Baby?" he asked. He saw Bucky get a little emotional before and, in all honesty, he didn't blame him.

---

"Yeah, yeah, I am," Bucky said and squeezed Steve's upper arm. "I just want us to be her parents so badly. And I hate how sad she is that she doesn't have a family yet. I want to tell her that we want her but it would crush her if it didn't work out."
Steve nodded. "I want to be her dad, too. We're going to make this happen, Bucky. I can feel it," he said. "We are going to start having to worry about which kid we are going to call our oldest," he joked, nudging him.

Bucky's lip quivered just a little bit and he nodded, looking away from Steve. "Yeah?" he asked softly. "It's going to work? Right?" He looked over at Adriana again and then to Steve. "I just... I just don't want another kid to be in our lives and then to be taken away. I can't handle that again. I want her to be our daughter."

Steve looked around to make sure no one else was watching and he kissed Bucky's cheek quickly. "She's going to be our daughter and no one will take her from us," he promised. "She's going to be a part of our beautiful family and everything will be perfect," Steve said. "Maybe she will become our little marine biologist."

Bucky nodded again and wiped his eyes. "I'm going to cry. I can't think about this right now. Let's just finish our day with her and then we can talk it out later and get things started with Karen. And we can get the basement started for Becca." Bucky turned back to Adriana and said softly, "Okay, Sweetie, what do you want to do now? Want to see a couple more animals then we can go get you a plushie from the shop and then take you back to your home?"

"I want a plushie," she said right away. "Then we can see more animals. I don't want to go back home today." She was having so much fun, she didn't want to have to go back into the orphanage forever. Steve gave Bucky a quick glance, unsure how to respond.

Bucky sighed and pet Adriana's hair. "Well, Sweetheart, you'll have to go back tonight. But I can visit you tomorrow when I'm done at work. How does that sound? Maybe Miss Steve can come with us." That would work out perfectly because he could sign whatever he needed to sign with Karen to start the process.

Adriana got a little teary-eyed and cried silently even though she was doing her best not to cry about going back home to the orphanage. "O-okay, Miss Bubby," she said quietly, then hid herself against Bucky's side.

Bucky gasped softly and held Adriana close against him. He looked up to Steve and could feel his own eyes glistening with tears. He wanted to tell her that they were going to adopt her. He wanted to so badly. But he couldn't yet. It wasn't a done deal yet. "It's okay, Adriana. You can cry. It's okay. I've got you, Sweetie."
Steve knelt down next to her and gently pet her hair to calm her while Bucky spoke to her. The little girl took a little while to calm down but, finally, she rubbed her hands over her eyes. It wasn't even the sort of breakdown that Christopher threw when he didn't get his way. Steve's heart broke because Adriana genuinely was sad and was doing her best to be good despite that. "Hey, let's see that smile again. You're going to get a turtle plushie, right?"

---

Adriana nodded slowly, lower lip still stuck out in a pout. But she was at least happy to get a plushie. "Yes," she said and looked between the two of them as her lip quivered.

Bucky picked her up again and started heading towards the gift shop so they could get her a turtle. "You and I can pick out your turtle and Miss Steve can talk to Miss Karen about something important while we do, okay?"

---

Steve caught the hint. He and Bucky may have only been married for a relatively short time but he also knew how to communicate with him without needing to say a word. Steve dropped back to walk alongside Karen. "Hey," he said nervously to her. "Do you... do you know when we would be able to set up a house visit? We've adopted kids before, but... never from an orphanage. I don't know the process for this exactly."

---

Karen smiled warmly at Steve. "Well, I am Adriana's case manager. All the kids have case managers and all adoption processes go through us and not the orphanage. It's just the way we do it. Not all places are the same. And only one of you will legally be able to adopt her but Bucky tells me you are familiar with that and the process of gaining secondary guardianship."

---

Steve nodded. "Yeah... Bucky's going to be the one to be her legal parent. I've already become a legal guardian for Bucky's sisters, so I can do the same for Adriana." He looked over at the two of them. "We'd love to bring her home as soon as possible. Bucky couldn't stop talking about her at home and now I can see why."

---

"Yes, of course, Mr. Rogers-Barnes," Karen said with a pleased little smile. "I'm very happy to hear that the two of you want to be her parents. She has been waiting a long time for a family and I think she had to wait so long because she was waiting for the two of you."

---

Steve smiled happily when she used their married name on him. "Oh yeah?" He looked over to Adriana. "Is she usually more headstrong than this? We've got a little boy at home. Thinks he's the boss of everything." He sighed happily. "She's such a cute kid. I don't get why someone hasn't seen that before."

---

"No," Karen shook her head and watched Adriana as she stared at all the plushies with Bucky. "She's not generally stubborn or headstrong. She's a very polite kid. She doesn't throw too many tantrums. She gets upset and she angry - just like every kid. But she's sort of grown up with so many other children that she has learned - like many of them do - that acting out won't get them very far."

---

Steve nodded. "When we first got our baby boy, he wouldn't cry or make a sound at all. But now all he does is blabber at us or let us know when he's not happy," Steve said. "Of course, I'd love for her to be as polite as she was today every day... but I also wouldn't be surprised if she got a little bit more comfortable with acting up more when she knows her family situation doesn't depend on how well she behaves."

---

"Hopefully, she will adjust well and not feel as stifled as she does at the orphanage," Karen said. "She's a very fun little girl but she just doesn't get to express herself very much in there." She sighed and looked to Adriana then back to Steve. "Well, Bucky tells me you stay at home with the kids and you should be the one to decide when to do the home visit so it's most convenient for you."

---

"Could you come by tomorrow? Bucky will be at work and his sisters will be at school, but my mom and I will be home. Then we could go to the orphanage together and deal with any paperwork that we have to," Steve said. He was eager to get the ball rolling for her adoption.

---

"Tomorrow works," Karen said and wrote it down in her day planner. "How about eleven? It'll only take about an hour maybe an hour and a half. I mostly have to make sure it's a physically safe house and make sure there will be a place for Adriana and make sure that any animals are up to date on vaccines and the like."

---

"That's fine. Sarah May will be taking her nap at that point. I take Diana and Raphael - our pets - to the vet periodically to keep them up to date on everything. Also, to get their teeth cleaned. I don't like dog breath," Steve chuckled.

---

Karen marked that there were two pets in the house. Bucky came back over with Adriana on his back. She was holding tightly to a big plush turtle. Bucky looked to Steve and said, "We couldn't decide which was the best one so there are three more turtles in her backpack."

---

Steve turned to Bucky and Adriana when they came walking over. "Wow, that's a big turtle you got there?" It was no surprise that Bucky spoiled her a little. Steve would've done the same. "How many turtles did you get?"

---

Adriana held up four fingers and then showed Steve the one she was holding. "This is Puddles!" she said excitedly and kissed its head. "Just like the 'tuttle' in the tank! I haven't named the other ones yet."
She was so goddamned cute. "That was so nice of Miss Bucky to get you four. That's one for every birthday you've had," Steve said. "You want to walk around and look at more animals? Or are you tired out?"

---

Adriana shook her head but she was yawning as she went. She was at an age where she still had nap times and she was way past hers. Bucky felt her settle in closer against him and he smiled softly. "How about we head out for now. We can come back a different day."

---

Adriana frowned, not wanting to go back but she also was really tired. "You promise that you're going to come back?" she asked, not wanting to say yes until she knew for sure that she was going to have company again.

---

Bucky nodded and then looked to Steve. "After work is over tomorrow, Sweetie, I'll come over to see you. You can name your turtles and tell me all about them when I get there, okay?" he assured her and reached in his pocket for a little granola snack for her to munch on as they headed out of the aquarium.

---

Once back at the orphanage, Karen gently prompted Adriana to say thank you. She let out a little sigh because she was not happy that she had to go back inside and go back with all the other kids. "Okay, Miss Bubby. I have to go home now. Thank you for the plushies."

---

Bucky nodded and wiped at his eyes. He didn't want to leave her either. He wanted to take her home now. "Okay, Sweetheart. I'll see you tomorrow. Don't miss me too much, Adriana. Can you say goodbye to Miss Steve too?"

---

She tiredly turned to Steve and waved to him. "Bye bye, Miss Steeb. Thank you for the games," she said, playing with the straps of her monkey backpack. She gave each of them a hug. "Don't forget your doggy tomorrow, Miss Steeb."

---

Karen came over and took Adriana's hand. "Well, he can't bring the dog here but you can go meet it at their house sometime." She gave her an encouraging look and then thanked Bucky and Steve for the day out with Adriana and took her back inside.

---

After Karen and Adriana were inside, Steve turned to his husband. "We have a home visit tomorrow," he said. "Karen and I talked about it, I told her we wanted to adopt her as soon as we could." They would have to make quick work out of finishing the basement.
Bucky sighed with a happy little smile and stared up at Steve. He was going to get too emotional if he kept thinking about it. "Let's head home, okay?" he asked and looked at Steve's lips for a long moment. "I want to hold you."

---

"I want to hold you too, Love," Steve said. "And give our kids a big hug." He couldn't imagine where their kids could be right now had they not adopted them. He walked them home. "How're you feeling?"

---

Bucky wiped his hands over his face and shook his head. "I'm okay. I've just been seeing her for so long now and it just breaks my heart every time I have to leave her. She's supposed to be our child. I know she is. And it's so hard for me to leave our little girl every time."

---

Bucky was such a good parent. And it took a special kind of loving person to already consider Adriana their child even before the paperwork started. "I know, Baby," he said softly. "That just means we have to work extra hard to bring her home sooner."

---

Bucky nodded and sniffled. He just wanted her home now. He wanted her to meet her new siblings and her new aunts and nana. He wanted her to have her own room for the first time in her life. He wanted her to be able to have all her plushies out on her bed and not be worried that someone would take them. He wanted their new daughter to come home.
When they got home, they were greeted by Diana running up to them, barking excitedly. Christopher came tottering over with his arms stretched out for his daddies, squealing with excitement. "Hey there, Baby Boy!" Steve said. He scooped Christopher up and then leaned into Bucky so he could hold their son too.

---

Bucky smiled brightly at Christopher and kissed his head and his cheek. "Hello, Bean! Did you miss us?" he asked and received a sneeze and then some coughing in response. "Oh, Christopher, are you getting sick?"

---

Christopher laid his cheek on Steve's shoulder and looked up at his pop with a wide smile. He had a bit of a sniffle when he breathed. "It sounds like he's coming down with a cold. I guess I have to give him some medicine to nip this before it gets worse."

---

"It's because he insists on putting everything in his mouth. He's such a germy little kid," Bucky said with a shake of his head. "We better give Sarah May some medicine too, just in case. Because if he's got something, she will have it soon."

---

"Alright. Speaking of, where is our little girl?" Steve walked into the house some more and found Sarah May sleeping in her nana's lap while she read a book.

"Hello, boys," Sarah greeted. "Was it a good day out for you two?"

---

Bucky nodded and came over to give Sarah a gentle hug and then carefully pick up his sleeping daughter. "It was a very good day. We had a lot of fun." He saw a sparkly gleam in Sarah May's hair and he looked at it more closely. "How come she has glitter glue dried in her hair?"

---

"Your wonderful son got his hands in the craft bin and had a go at being a hair stylist with her," Sarah snorted. "It took forever to clean up. I must have missed a spot."

Steve looked down at Christopher and gasped dramatically. "Were you a bad boy for nana, Christopher?"

---

Christopher simply giggled and reached up to touch Steve's face. "Dada! Play!" he said happily and mushed his hands on his cheeks a few times.

Bucky sighed and tried picking out the leftover glue from Sarah May's hair. "Baby Bean, you need to be careful with Ya-Ya. She's got all these dark little curly hairs and we don't want to hurt them. They're so cute."
Steve couldn't stay upset at his son when he was so adorable. And it wasn't like he messed up his sister's hair on purpose. "You want to play, Bean? But Dada is tired. Sleepy. Nap," Steve said then faked falling asleep. Christopher looked over to Bucky for help as he swatted Steve's chest lightly to get him to wake up.

"She's going to have such nice curls as she gets older," Sarah said. "I can tell already."

Bucky chuckled at his son and kissed his head. "Oh, I know," Bucky said and sat down with Sarah May in his arms. "Her hair is going to be amazing. She's beautiful. She always will be. All my children will be beautiful and wonderful." He tried to smile again but he ended up having to cover a little whine because he wanted Adriana there too.

When Christopher didn't get any help from Bucky, he mushed Steve's face together and said loudly in his face, "Daaaadaa!" Steve was quick to play along and be awake because he didn't want Christopher waking up Sarah May.

"So, when is my next grandchild coming home?" Sarah asked. She saw the look in Bucky's eyes and she had heard them chattering about an orphanage.

Bucky sniffled and looked up to Steve and then Sarah. "I... well, hopefully soon. She's four. She's so amazing. She's just so energetic and fun and she just needs a home so much. And we can do that for her. We can be her parents. And she would love living here with all of us."

Sarah smiled over at him. "At this rate of the kids you're adopting, Steve will have his baseball team before your fifth anniversary," she teased. "Well, I can't wait to meet her. What's her name?"

"That's sort of what I'm shooting for," Bucky said with a chuckle. "Her name is 'Adriana'. Her mother died in childbirth and her father killed himself not long after out of grief. She's been in the orphanage for her entire life. I can't believe no one has wanted her yet."

"That poor girl," Sarah said, frowning with concern. "When are you going to start-" she started to ask but then Steve interrupted.

"We have a home visit tomorrow from her caseworker. Then we are going to the orphanage after Bucky's done with work."

Bucky nodded and watched Sarah May slowly wake back up again. "We need to talk to the girls first, but we want to make the basement into a space for Becca and put Adriana in Becca's old room. And it'll give Becca some more privacy and she's always looking for more privacy."
"Hello, Sweet Pea," Steve said softly, playing with Sarah May's foot when she woke up.

Becca and Lilly had just come into the living room and Becca overheard the last bit. "Who the hell is Adriana? And am I really getting the basement all to myself?"

Bucky looked up at Steve and took a deep breath. "Baby, do you want to take this one?" he asked calmly and stood a little closer to his husband for support from the potentially aggravating discussion with the girls. This could go many ways depending on how they reacted.

"Um..." Steve adjusted Christopher on his hip nervously.

Becca frowned. "It's not another baby, is it?"

"She's four, actually..." Steve offered.

Becca seemed more amicable to the fact that their next niece wasn't another baby that would cry in the middle of the night and wake them. "But you're going to stop for a while after this, right?" she asked. "The house is barely big enough for us."

"Well," Bucky shrugged and shook his head absently. "I guess we will have to. You're right. We won't have much room." He squeezed Becca's arm for a second. "And we wanted to offer you a new room in the basement. We can finish it up all nice and it'll be like your own little apartment in the house. Rent-free. We can put a mini fridge down there and put shelves mounted to the walls for all your things."

"Hey, why don't I get the basement too? There's enough space for both of us and maybe I want some peace and quiet," Lilly argued.

Becca shot her a look. "The day you want peace and quiet is the day you're being lowered into the grave, Lilly." Becca was warming up to the idea of another kid here only because it benefitted her greatly.

"Alright, alright," Bucky said hurriedly to shut off whatever argument might start between them. "Lil, Becca is sixteen now. She needs some space. And she will be moving out before you do. So, when Becca moves out of the house and has her own place, then you can move into her basement bedroom." He looked to Becca and added, "Of course, Becca will stay here for at least five more years, right? You're not going to leave your emotional big brother too soon, right? Because I won't be able to handle it."

"If you give Becca the basement, she's never going to want to move out," Lilly groaned. Becca smirked because she was definitely getting her way with this and it was awesome. She was already imagining all of the books she could read in peace and quiet. "I can't promise you five years if I go to an out-of-state college. But if I go somewhere local, then yes."

---

Bucky blinked and thought of all the great schools right in the city. "At least apply to the local colleges first. That'll make me feel better." He moved Sarah May over on his chest a bit and then pulled Becca in for a hug and a kiss to her head. "So? What do you think? You want to help us make the basement into your room?"

---

Sarah May tried to get her papa's attention by raising her little hand up and patting his chest lightly. Becca glanced off in the direction of the basement and said, "Hell yeah, I do. I've been saving up money from the jobs I've been doing around the neighborhood. I can buy some stuff to help decorate."

---

Bucky smiled warmly and gave a little sigh of relief. "You can decorate it however you want to, Becs. It's going to be your space. It shouldn't take long to get it fixed up. We just need to cover the hole beneath the stairs, paint the walls, finish the ceiling, and then we should be able to move you down there."

---

"This is rad," Becca said brightly. Lilly looked a bit sour but she knew that arguing wasn't going to get her anything.

"You guys are going to love Adriana," Steve said. "She loves turtles and coloring and is the cutest four-year-old I've ever met."

---

"She really is," Bucky said and looked between his sisters hopefully. He wanted them to love her as much as he did. "And she needs a home and a family and I think we can be that for her." He wasn't necessarily looking for permission from them but he wanted them to be somewhat on board with the whole thing.

---

"You guys need to lay off the kids and let the other gays have a chance," Lilly said. "But I like that we are getting another girl around here. After you got Christopher I thought it was going to start to be a boy takeover. But now we still get to outnumber you."

---

Bucky shook his head in confusion and held Sarah May up towards Lilly. "Did you forget someone?" he asked and then kissed his daughter's hair. "But, I know what you mean. We might have to cool it for a little bit. It'll be hard to raise two teens, one small kid, and two babies."

---

"Sarah May doesn't do anything yet, she doesn't count until she can talk back at you," Lilly answered. She trotted over and took Sarah May from Bucky and cuddled her. "You have to show Christopher who's boss, little girl," she said affectionately to her niece.

---

Bucky scoffed as his sister took his baby from his arms. "Come on. She counts. She's a happy healthy little baby girl. And I would like her back please." He held out his hands for her again. "Besides, Christopher is a good boy. He will be the best big brother. He will be a better brother than I ever was or ever will be."

---

Lilly reluctantly let Bucky take Sarah May from her arms and she snorted as she flopped in the armchair that usually was Steve's. Christopher reached for her from where he was and gave her shirt a tug. "Ya-Ya, play," he insisted. Christopher started to whine a little bit and wiggle in Steve's arms. Sarah May just sort of tilted her head towards her brother and then yawned a little and stuck her tongue out of the side of her mouth.

Steve smiled at his son. "Look, Bean, your sister is sticking her tongue out at you." He blew a raspberry at Christopher and kissed his chubby cheek. "Ma, would you mind keeping an eye on them a little longer? Bucky and I would like to lay down for a little while."

---

Sarah nodded her head. Bucky thanked her and set Sarah May down by a stack of blocks and plushies. She had been working on crawling lately and she immediately started towards Bucky again, a little upset that he had put her down. "Ya-Ya, stay put with Nana. Your daddy and I want to rest a little."

---

Sarah May had the biggest pout on her face and her bottom lip jutted out. Steve felt bad for her but Christopher distracted her as soon as Steve put him down because he went right over to her and waved his blocks. "Play!"

---

"Okay, good, they've got each other for a bit," Bucky said quietly and took Steve's hand. "Let's sneak away before they notice we are walking off." He smiled down at his babies playing together and then pulled Steve towards the stairs.

---

Steve squeezed Bucky's hand and walked quickly with him. "Sarah May is going to be your little shadow once she's able to walk. She's already crawling after you whenever she can," Steve said. He pulled Bucky into the bedroom and gave his cheek a kiss.

---

"I'm perfectly fine with that," Bucky said and slipped his arms around Steve and leaned into him. "So... it's really okay that we adopt Adriana? I know we already talked about this but I want to make sure." He didn't want to say that he was worried about adopting so many kids after losing Grant. It hadn't even been a full year since they lost him and he just didn't want him to think they were forgetting him.
Steve smoothed his hand over Bucky's chest, letting it rest over where his tattoo was. "Of course, it is," Steve said. "I want to give her a home. And you know how much I want a big family." Steve lifted his hand to play with Bucky's hair. "I guess we just have to start on expanding our home sooner than we planned."

---

Bucky nodded and gave Steve a slow kiss. "Thank you," he whispered and just stared at his husband for a bit. "I do think we will need to slow down for a while though, just until Becca is moved out. We really will run out of room."

---

Steve pouted. "But I love babies..." he said. However, he knew logically that they couldn't adopt anyone else for until they had the space. Besides, they needed to drag it out so they didn't have a million kids going to college at once - assuming, of course, they wanted to go to college.

---

"I know you do, Steve. So, do I," Bucky assured him. "But, we already have two babies who fight for attention from us and we are about to have another little kiddo." He smiled softly and looked over to the framed ink print of Grant's feet. "Do you want to go talk to him tomorrow after we get back from the orphanage? I haven't been down there for about a week. He and my parents should know about Adriana."

---

Steve followed Bucky's gaze over to the print and he felt his heart clench. He still visited Grant daily, usually early in the mornings before the babies woke or right after Bucky left for work. "Yeah... after," he agreed. "I don't want to go to the orphanage with a heavy heart."

---

"I think that's best," Bucky agreed and moved to lay down on their bed with a flop. "I do think it gets just a little easier every time I go, though. It hurts just a little less and I get just a little more excited that I will get to see him again one day."

---

Steve sighed sadly and snuggled up against Bucky. "I wonder if he would be crawling after Christopher right now. Or if he would like laying on the couch being cuddled like Sarah May," he mumbled.

---

Bucky held Steve close and rubbed his back. He wished he had the answer. He wished he knew what kind of baby their son would have been. "All I know is that he would have loved his big brother and little sister. He would have loved to play with them and be with them. He would have loved to grow up with them."

---

Steve felt his eyes get a little wet and he buried his face in Bucky's shoulder. He let out a heavy sigh as he wrapped his arms tightly around his husband. "Yeah..." he murmured softly. "Grant would have been incredible," Steve said. "He still is." He was thankful that their kids wouldn't know him enough to go through the heartbreak they were going through.

---

Bucky let Steve hug around him as he pulled a blanket up over the both of them. "I love you, Baby," he said warmly and flicked out the lamp on the nightstand. "Let's get a little bit of sleep. The babies will want us up pretty soon. And you know Sarah May will be up all night tonight now that she's teething." He sighed and gave Steve a few soft, gentle kisses. "Love you..."
Sarah came into the kitchen where Steve was furiously cleaning the counters. Both babies were sitting in a playpen in the corner and Christopher was trying to get Sarah May to play with him but she was preoccupied with chewing on a teething toy and staring at her daddy as he cleaned up to get ready for a home inspection from Adriana's case manager. "Steve, my sweet son, the house looks perfect. You should sit down for a little bit. Rest up until she gets here."

---

Steve turned to his mom. "I need to make sure that there's nothing wrong. I haven't even finished wiping down the walls of the basement yet," Steve said. "I can't mess up Adriana's adoption process because I didn't do a good enough job on the house." He couldn't do that to Bucky.

---

Sarah laughed softly and crossed her arms. "Why in the world would you need to wipe down the basement walls?" she asked and moved over to the babies to check on them. "I think you've done everything you need to do."

---

"Because if I tell her that we are moving Becca in there and it isn’t presentable, she may think poorly of how we treat the kids here," Steve said. Sarah May reached up for her nana as soon as Sarah came over. "What if she says no?"

---

Sarah picked up the baby and gave her a kiss. "You said that she likes you both already, right? I don’t think she will say no. She will see how much you care for your children and for Bucky’s sisters. Steve, I think you need to take a few minutes to calm down. Everything will be okay."

---

Sarah May giggled and babbled up at her nana. "But still... it’s on my shoulders to make sure this house visit goes well," Steve insisted. He only sat down on the couch once his mom gave him that look and immediately Diana curled up in his lap.

---

“Steven, my boy,” Sarah said softly and reached to pick up Christopher in her other arm. She brought them both over to the couch and sat down with them. "Why did you schedule the house visit while Bucky was at work? You could have made it when you were both available so this wasn’t all on you."

---

Steve pulled Christopher over and cuddled him. “I wanted to get the process going as soon as possible,” he said with a pout. “You should’ve seen her, Ma. She wants a family so bad and we can be that family for her. And Bucky loves her so much already.”
“I’m sure you two will be able to adopt her. I’m sure that Karen will have no problems with the home visit and it’ll all go smoothly.” Sarah pulled her son in and gave him a hug. “Don’t worry about it. God has blessed you and your family so much. He knows that you two will be the best parents for Adriana. Just take a few breaths, say a prayer, and listen to your mother.”

---

Steve leaned into her hug and let out a huff. “Alright, Mom...” It was unlikely that Steve would have a breath of relief until the adoption papers were finalized. He tried to lay down but the second he did, Diana hopped off his lap and Christopher smacked his chest lightly.

“Dada, play!” he insisted. Steve smiled and sat on the floor with his son, playing blocks with him until Karen showed up.

---

Karen knocked at the door and waited. She heard Diana’s curious bark and heard Christopher’s indignant whining when Steve got up to answer the door. When the door was opened, Karen smiled and took in how Steve looked put-together and respectable but also like he was on edge and anxious. “Hello, Mr. Rogers-Barnes. Nice to see you again.”

---

Steve left Christopher with his nana to go open the door. Diana barked once more and wagged her tail hopefully before Steve stepped aside. “Hi, Karen,” he greeted anxiously. “You can come in. Uh... would you like anything to drink?”

---

“No, no thank you, Sir. That’s not necessary,” Karen said and smiled at him as they walked into the house. “This must be the dog that Adriana’s so anxious to meet,” she added and bent down to scratch at Diana’s head. “How is she with the children? The dog, I mean.”

---

“Diana is great,” Steve said. “She lets the babies sleep on her all the time. She doesn’t like it when they pull on her tail or ears but she walks away if they won’t leave her alone. They can’t climb stairs yet so she goes up on the second floor for some peace,” he said. “Do you want to meet Christopher and Sarah May?”

---

Karen nodded as Steve spoke and jotted some comments down in her book. “Yes, I would love to meet your children. I assume that the older girls are at school? It would be good for me to meet them at some point. I like to interact with every member of a household before anything is decided.”

---

Steve looked more nervous as she wrote things down. “Um... yeah. They get home sometime between three and five depending on the day,” he said. He brought Karen to the living room where his mom was looking after the babies. “Karen, this is my mom - Sarah. And these two are Christopher and Sarah May.”

Christopher waggled his block over at Karen. “Who da’?” he asked his dad.
Karen went to Sarah and shook her hand, “Hello, Ma’am, I’m Karen Willick,” she said. “It’s good to meet you.” She then got down on the floor and knelt in front of Christopher. She extended a hand for the block carefully. “Hey, Buddy, are you having fun with your blocks?”

Christopher held the block towards her for a moment but then pulled it away and giggled wildly. Steve smiled proudly. “He likes to play around,” he said. Christopher stood up and walked over to Steve and handed him the block instead. “Thanks, Bean,” Steve said, taking it. “You want me to put it on your tower?” Steve placed it on Christopher’s pile of blocks.

“So, when do I find out if you’re letting me have another grandchild?” Sarah asked.

Karen gave a patient little laugh and stood back up. “Well, ma’am, it could be a few days to a week before the final decision is made. I will need to do a few things like background checks and making sure the orphanage has Adriana up to date on vaccines and any medical needs she has. And then I need to consult with two other case managers in my firm. Essentially, it’s just for a second opinion to make sure others agree that this will be a good home for Adriana.”

Steve looked scared when Karen spoke about a second opinion. He knew Karen didn’t mind them being gay but that wasn’t universal. “Are you going to tell them about... about me and Bucky’s relationship?” he asked. “It doesn’t affect how we parent. Christopher and Sarah May are great kids. We read to them every day and take them on outings.”

Karen thought for a second, understanding Steve’s concern. After a minute, she took a breath and cocked her head a little to the side, “Well, I suppose since Bucky is the only one being the adoptive parent then I don’t see why I need to specify that you two are a couple. I will have to explain it more vaguely, I suppose.”

Christopher noticed that Steve wasn’t playing with him and began to whine. Steve quickly picked him up and bounced him gently on his hip to satisfy him. “What sort of things do you look for in a home visit?” Steve asked. “Does everything look okay? We’re still arranging to get Adriana’s room ready.”

“I’m mostly here to check that there isn’t anything dangerous around the house that needs addressing. I also want to make sure that Adriana will have a place and won’t be going from one home where she was just a number to another.” Karen walked back out to the hall and pointed up the stairs. “Are the bedrooms up there? May I see where Adriana will be?”

"Yeah, sure,” Steve said. He carried Christopher with him over to Becca’s room. “Bucky’s younger sister is in here right now. She’s sixteen, so we are finishing the basement for her so she has more privacy and Adriana can have her room,” Steve explained. “Becca is the meticulous one. Lilly isn’t as clean.”

---

Karen made more notes in her book. “So, Adriana will be here. Becca is in the basement?” She made a note that Adriana would be close to the master bedroom just in case she needed Steve or Bucky. “And this is Lilly’s room and then the nursery is over here?” She peeked into the nursery and saw the two cribs. “Do you and your husband have any trouble waking up if one of the children need you?”

---

Steve nodded. “Yeah, that’s the plan. Eventually, we want to build extra rooms for the house but we have time for that. Christopher and Sarah May won’t need their own rooms for a couple more years.”
He kissed Christopher’s cheek gently. “And I don’t believe we have any problem there. I know we’re up at least twice a night. If we ever slept through anything, I’m sure Becca would have something to say about having to listen to babies cry all night,” he joked.

---

“That’s good. Adriana might have a rough few nights at first. She might need some extra attention and some help falling asleep or staying asleep,” Karen said and made more notes. “In my experience with children her age, the shock of a new family and a new house can be a lot to handle. Don’t be surprised if she is emotional or tearful for no apparent reason or has some rapid mood changes.”

---

Steve nodded. “Of course,” he said. “I understand. I know it’s not the same, but going from living on my own to having Bucky and his two sisters took getting used to. Now I have to amplify that transition by a thousand to understand what Adriana is going through,” he said. He paused and asked, “Has she mentioned to you things that she wants? Like how many plushies for her bed or what color blankets she likes?”

---

Karen wasn’t really sure. Adriana was so used to not really getting anything special that she hadn’t mentioned anything to her. “Well, you know that she likes turtles. And she likes monkeys well enough. She will be bringing all her things with her, of course. Some clothes and toys and books. I do know that she tends to be cold most of the time, even sometimes in the summer. So, with the fall finally coming in, you might want to make sure she has enough jackets and coats and blankets.”

---

Steve nodded. “Yes, of course,” Steve said. “I guess a nice big quilt would be nice for her to keep her warm. I was thinking about painting turtles on her door to make her feel really at home. I’m pretty good with art so it wouldn’t be very hard. I plan on starting an art class soon for other stay-at-home parents to draw with their kids. I’m excited to get it going. I’ve been playing with ideas with Sarah May and Christopher to see what goes over well with the young ones.”

---

“Oh, that’s lovely,” Karen said enthusiastically. “That sounds like a very fun job.” She marked some more things in her book and then looked down the hall to the master bedroom. “If it’s okay with you, I need to see the master bedroom as well. I know it’s yours and Bucky’s private space but I just need to make sure you don’t keep anything dangerous in areas that the children could get to. No weapons or toxic material anywhere they can reach. I know you were a police officer. Do you still keep any firearms in the house?”

---

Steve led her over to their bedroom. "I don’t have a license to carry now that I don’t have my badge anymore. I want to, for safety reasons, but I also am hesitant for the kids’ safety reasons,” Steve said.

---

Karen looked around a bit. She opened the drawers that were low enough for children to reach. She checked around the closet and looked in the bathroom as well. “What sort of ‘safety reasons’ do you have that you think warrants a firearm in your home?”

---

Steve shifted his feet nervously. “Well, both Bucky and I have been physically attacked for being gay,” he explained. “Never seriously in the home or anything, but if someone were to follow us, I wouldn’t want my kids being at risk because of some person who can’t handle two men who love each other.”

---

“That’s understandable to want to be cautious,” Karen said evenly. “But I’ll tell you that it is concerning to me. Have any of your children - the babies and the older girls - been targeted because of you and Bucky’s sexuality?”

---

Steve’s face fell a little. “That’s not going to stop us from being allowed to parent Adriana is it?” He asked in an upset tone. “It’s only happened once. But Becca and Lilly took care of it. Lilly had been teased at school once but not anymore. Not that I know of, at least.”

---

“May I ask what happened?” Karen said softly and walked back out to the hallway. She didn’t want to linger in the master bedroom too long. She found that prospective parents were often the most uncomfortable having her in their private room.

---

Steve crossed his arms defensively. “Lilly got bullied a little. She may have gotten pushed, but that was it. It was mostly verbal. Becca stood up for her and I wrote a strong letter to the principal and that was that. If it got worse I would have paid a visit to the school.”

---

“Okay,” Karen nodded but didn’t write anything down. “Thank you.” She went back down the stairs and then headed for the basement door. They did some more inspecting around down there and then back up in the main floor until she had seen every room. “I think that’s everything I need for now. There are more questions, of course. But these would be better handled with Bucky since he is the potential adoptive father. Is he still planning on coming to the orphanage this afternoon to start some preliminary paperwork?”
“It wasn’t a bad visit was it?” Steve immediately worried the worst of the visit even though he and Bucky genuinely were good parents who ran a loving home. “Yeah, Bucky and I want to visit her again and do the paperwork.”

Karen gave a soft little smile and a reassuring touch to Steve’s arm. “No, Sir, it wasn’t a bad visit. I have minimal concerns. I can see that you and your husband are both responsible and very loving to your family. I also like that, while you are a stay-at-home dad, you have your mother here as well. Two babies and a four-year-old can prove to be a bit much and it’s reassuring to me that there are three adults in the house. I also see no immediate threats or dangers in the house itself or with the animals.”

Steve let out a breath of relief when he had her tentative seal of approval with the way that their household was set up. He knew it wasn’t definite but it was a good start. He smiled brightly and nodded as he guided her towards the front door. “That’s great. My mom’s amazing and she’s such a great nana to our kids. Bucky and I will definitely be over today.”

Karen thanked him once again and then left. Sarah came up to Steve, holding her granddaughter on her side. She was quiet for a few seconds and then tilted her head to the side and looked to her son. “Did it go well?”

Steve set his squirming son down next to his blocks and Diana came over so she could nuzzle up against Steve’s legs. “Yeah, I think so,” he said. “She said that she likes that there are three adults around to take care of the kids,” Steve answered. “So, thanks for moving in with us,” he teased lightly.

Sarah laughed and shook her head. “It’s not like you needed me here. But I appreciate that you let me move in. I don’t know what I would be doing if I wasn’t around my grand-babies all the time. It was hard enough not seeing you very often.”

Steve smiled brightly. “I love having you around, Ma. I knew I had to get my own place and be independent but it’s so much better having you here to talk to. And everyone loves you here, too.” He sat down and gave her a hug. “Would you want to come to our next visit?”

“To meet Adriana?” Sarah asked, adjusting Sarah May carefully. The baby was close to falling asleep again even though it hadn’t been long since she had a nap. “I would love to come with you two. If you think that’s a good idea. I don’t want to overwhelm the girl.”
“Going today would be a bit much for her. But I would want her to meet you too. We can introduce her one by one to new members of the family so it’s not such a shock when she moves in,” Steve said. “You’ll love her, Mom. She’s so sweet.”

---

Sarah loved how much Steve cared about his family. She was prouder of him every day. She never would have thought she would be so lucky to have a family as big and wonderful as the one that Steve was giving her now. “You’re such a good boy, Steve. You always have been. I couldn’t have asked for a better son.”

---

“Who would’ve known that your only child would grow up to be a big, gay mama’s boy,” he chuckled. Steve kissed her cheek before focusing his attention on his sleepy daughter. He rubbed her back gently until she fell asleep. “Sometimes I worry not having a mom around would be a downside for our kids somehow. But with you here, I don’t think I have to be afraid of that.”

---

“Oh, Sweetheart,” Sarah said sadly and shook her head. “No. There’s no way. Your children have two great fathers. They aren’t missing out and they aren’t going to be wanting a mother or anything. You were only raised with a mother once your father was gone. And Bucky’s sisters are spending their most difficult adolescent years with their brother to parent them.”

---

“But Becca and Lilly had a mom and dad to remember. And, I don’t remember dad much, but at least I knew I had one,” Steve said. “I guess I’m just worried about them. I know we are doing the best we can for our kids but there’s always that nagging doubt, Ma.”

---

Sarah was silent for a second. She understood why it worried Steve but she just didn’t think that it would be a problem for the babies to not have a mother. And she knew that Steve must not have discussed this with Bucky. She had gotten to know Bucky pretty well through living at the house and from what Steve told her about him. And she knew that Bucky would just pop in anger and frustration if he knew Steve thought that way. “Do you believe that you and Bucky are good fathers? And that you both are doing everything you can for your children?”

---

“I know we are good fathers and do everything we can,” Steve answered. “But sometimes our best isn’t enough. Even when you did your best, we still went to bed hungry some nights.” Steve knew his mom struggled to keep a roof over their heads while Steve was growing up.

---

“Steve, my son, that was different,” Sarah said softly. “I was a widowed mother who was underpaid and I had a very sick boy. There were much different circumstances for me then. You and Bucky have built up a strong life together. Bucky has a steady job, you have settlement money and disability pay. You always put your children before yourselves no matter what. Bucky has made such changes in his own life to make sure that the life he gives you and your babies is the best it can be. I think this family is in a very good place.”
Steve didn’t respond at first and it was clear that Steve was thinking and trying to see his mom’s side of things. In the end, he still had his doubts but he at least was reassured by his mom giving them her seal of approval. “Alright, yeah. Thank you, Mom.”

Sarah decided not to push it any more. She kissed her granddaughter’s head and then laid her gently in her rocker by the couch to sleep. “Steve, be a dear and hand me that basket of yarn. I’m going to start on a blanket for Adriana.”

Steve smiled brightly and got up so he could grab some for her. “So, have you caught Sarah May trying to speak at all? I’m trying so hard to get her to say ‘Papa’ so we could surprise Bucky one day when he gets home. But she isn’t much of a talker.”

“No, I haven’t,” Sarah sighed and looked to Ya-Ya in the rocker. “But she has been slower than Christopher. I mean, she’s only just started crawling. And she hardly makes any noise anyway. She has to be really upset before she starts crying and she only babbles if she thinks she hasn’t gotten enough attention.”

Steve tickled Christopher’s feet and smiled as his son let out big belly laughs. “I know she’s going to talk in her own time. I guess Christopher spoiled us by learning so early on so we got to hear more about what he’s thinking than we get to with Sarah May,” he said. “When did I start talking?”

Sarah picked out the colors she wanted to use for Adriana’s blanket and she set to work getting it started. “Oh, you were around fourteen months when you started saying a few words. It was mostly simple things like ‘mama’ and ‘hi’ and ‘no’. But sometimes you tried to say ‘food’. You were also one of the crankiest sleepers. You would get so tired and wear yourself out so much that you would be red-faced and whining pitifully for a solid hour until you finally fell asleep.”

“No fourteen months?” Steve sounded shocked. Christopher was babbling at them before he even turned one. “I must’ve really made sleep hard for you. Sometimes Christopher puts up a fight to go to sleep but it’s because he wants to p-l-a-y a little longer,” Steve answered. “I don’t know how you were able to do it all on your own.”

Sarah nodded and chuckled softly. “You were a bit of a challenge at times. But I learned what it was that you liked the most and ways to get you just a little calmer before sleep. You liked to lay on my chest with your head right next to mine. You would still whine and complain but it was quieter and more like you were just getting it out of your system.”
Steve chuckled. “I was always a mama’s boy, huh?” he asked with a smile. Christopher patted Steve’s chest and then pointed at his sister. “Ya-Ya play?” he asked. Steve shook his head. “Not right now, Bean, she’s sleeping.” He looked back to his mom. “I bet Christopher will love having an older sister to play with.”

“Do you think he will adjust well?” Sarah asked. “He is used to sort of having command over things like your attention and play time.” She knew that it wasn’t that Christopher was aware of the idea of him being the big brother but she knew he was at least aware that he was able to do more - like walk and talk - than Sarah May was. She just worried that he would get territorial when Adriana came.

“I think he will. He loves to play and always asks Sarah May to play blocks with him. He will have Adriana to do his games with. Unless Adriana starts bossing him around, I think all will be well,” Steve said. He looked over to his son, now curious if he would do as well as Steve believed he would.

Sarah, who was busy with her knitting, nodded along as Steve talked. “That’s good then. I think he should be fine eventually. Besides, even if he gets a little cranky about it, he will have to learn eventually that he has to share. You and Bucky are trying to father your very own country. So, he will get the picture sometime.”

“Baseball team, Ma. All I need is my baseball team,” he said with a playful wink. “We got half of one already if Adriana comes in.” He shrugged his shoulders and stood up so he could occupy his son because Christopher looked like he was ready to bother his sister. ”Come on, Baby Bean, let's build something together.”
It took Bucky so much longer than he expected to get back home. And he was beyond tired when he got there. The girls were both doing homework in the kitchen and Sarah May was crying so much because of her teeth. “Steve!” Bucky called out. He was slumped against the front door and holding his pounding head. “Where are you?”

---

Steve had been desperately trying to calm down their screaming daughter when Bucky came in. He kept trying to give her teething toys and cold things to eat so she could be soothed but she was beside herself. Steve carefully turned her towards his shoulder to try and muffle her crying. “Buck,” he said, looking worried. “Are you alright? Should I put Sarah May in the nursery for now?”

---

Bucky shook his head. He was a little bit on the verge of tears himself. He had made the decision to try the spinal injections months before but his fear and worry had him pushing it back indefinitely. And most days, any kind medicine just didn’t cover it. He was almost considering asking Steve to knock him out and take him to the doctor to get the first injection done while he wasn’t conscious.

---

Steve knew having Sarah May screaming next to Bucky wouldn’t help, so he hurried to hand her off to his mom instead and he returned to his husband’s side. He cupped the sides of his face and kissed his forehead. “Baby, I’m so sorry you’re not feeling well,” he said with a frown. He massaged his head. “Maybe you should lay down for a while, Love, you look pale as a sheet.”

---

Bucky blinked slowly a few times and looked up at Steve. “No. We have to go to the orphanage,” he said quietly but let himself sort of fumble into Steve’s arms for support. He hated this. He hated that he was so incapacitated by his headaches so often. He remembered his mother spending full days in her room alone because of the pain. He swore to himself that he wasn’t going to let this get so bad that it took time away from his family.

---

“Babe, it’s a walk to the orphanage and you’ll worry Adriana if she sees you upset,” Steve said. “Are you sure you want to go out still? I’m sure Karen will understand too, the visit went well in her books today. You can’t get penalized for feeling sick,” Steve said. “We can go again soon.”

---

Bucky was crying just a little now and he wiped his eyes, trying to shield them from the light and brush away the tears. “I don’t feel sick. My head just hurts. And Adriana will be so upset if we don’t come see her today. We told her yesterday. I promised. I promised I would be there.”

---

Steve took a breath and chewed on his lower lip. “I have some Vicodin left over from when I was shot,” he said. “I can let you have some, just this once, if your head is hurting you that bad.” He knew how some people could get addicted to painkillers and with Bucky’s past, he was hesitant to introduce something like that.

---

Bucky gritted his teeth and thought for a long moment. He couldn’t. He couldn’t risk it. He knew himself. He had done so well for so long but he knew that if he caved a little bit, he was going to collapse right into it. “Just give me a little time to see how it is. Maybe it’ll calm down enough that I can handle going out again.” He really didn’t want to disappoint Adriana.

---

Steve nodded and took Bucky by the hand. “Alright. Come on, Baby, let’s go to bed and lay down for a half hour or so. I’ll give you a head rub and we can keep the lights on low so your headache isn’t so bad,” he said.

---

Bucky followed Steve quietly up to their room. Once he was there, he stripped off his clothes that were so hot from work and he just curled gently into a ball on his side of the bed. “If I don’t feel better in two hours, you have to go visit her. I can start paperwork a different day but at least one of us needs to go see her today.”

---

Steve moved up behind his husband and kissed the backs of his shoulders. He started to work his fingers through Bucky’s hair and massage his scalp. “Of course, I’ll visit her,” Steve promised. “Maybe you can write her a card so she won’t feel upset over anything.”

---

Bucky agreed quietly and reached for one of Steve’s hands. He tangled their fingers together and held them over his chest securely. “I’m so sorry,” he whispered after a silent minute. “I said ages ago that I was going to take care of this. It just scares me so much.”

---

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” Steve reassured. He kissed his neck. “It’s a big step. But it’s going to be worth it, Buck, I know it. And I’ll be by your side the entire time,” he promised. “You won’t have to do this alone and you’ll be happier for it.”

---

There wasn’t much else to do. He needed to just... do it. “I’ll call tomorrow and schedule an appointment,” Bucky said and rolled so he was facing Steve. He stared into his eyes for a while and then gave him a light kiss. “I need you there. You’ll be there?”

---

Steve nodded. “Of course, I’ll be there, Bucky,” he said. He cupped the sides of his face and kissed him slowly. “I promise, Baby. I’ll be there.” He went back to massaging Bucky’s head. “You want me to call out of work for you?”

---

“No, no, I’ll be fine,” Bucky said and closed his eyes again. “It’s getting a little better. Has Ya-Ya been crying all day? She’s been worse about her teeth than Christopher was. I’m worried about her. I don’t like that it hurts her so much.”

---

“She has,” Steve said. “I took her to the doctor for it the other day but he says that she doesn’t have any sort of condition. He says that she must be more sensitive to the pain than Christopher was,” he said with a frown. “I was thinking about trying some ice pops to soothe it but I don’t want it to be too sugary.”

---

“We can make ice pops with their orange juice,” Bucky offered as he sat up slowly and reached for some Advil. “We can just try to set it in a cup or something with a popsicle stick inside.” He knew Christopher would be mad if he didn’t get one as well so they would have to make several.

---

Steve chuckled. “We have to start teaching him that just because his sister gets something doesn’t mean that he does.” An ice pop wasn’t the place to start but Steve didn’t want his son thinking he was entitled to everything.

---

“I know,” Bucky said sadly. “But he is going to cry. He loves ice pops.” He was a little better now. He got up from the bed slowly and went to the closet to pull some fresh clothes out. He was going to go see Adriana. His head still hurt but it was better enough that he could just push it away and ignore it.

---

“I know, but I’m talking about in general. He was giving me such crocodile tears when I gave Sarah May her formula and had the audacity to not give him baby formula as well,” he chuckled. Steve stood up and helped Bucky by tossing his worn clothes in the hamper.

---

Bucky pulled on some pants and a loose T-shirt and one of Steve’s jackets. “Yeah. I guess you’re right then. We will have to start teaching him to share better and know that he can’t just have anything he wants. It’s just difficult when he gets so grumpy about it. He’s also been pretty territorial lately. Have you noticed that?”

---

“I’ve noticed,” Steve sighed. “I’ve been trying to get him to share and play nice. I don’t think it’ll be easy to reason with him until his vocabulary has gotten bigger. So, it’s really just becoming me trying to show him what’s right and then telling him ‘no’ when he’s not playing along.”

---

Bucky nodded and sighed. He really wished he had a good answer for how to help Christopher learn what was good behavior. “I’m going to talk to Tim. He’s raised children. Maybe he will have some advice or something.
“Good plan,” Steve said. He led Bucky downstairs and thankfully Sarah May had stopped crying so loud and was just whimpering and whining. “We’re going to the orphanage for a bit, Ma,” Steve said. “Want me to pick you up anything on the way back?”

Sarah smirked. “Get a nice present for your mother for babysitting your children a lot more than normal the past few days,” she answered.

---

“I’ll buy you anything you want, Sarah,” Bucky said and gave both his kids a kiss. He went to Lilly and brushed a hand through her hair. “Please, please, for the love of all things holy, clean the litter box while we are gone. Raphael is going to start shitting on the floor. And Becca has done it the past seven times.”

---

Lilly huffed but nodded her head. “Alright,” she whined, but she knew that Steve already cleaned it this morning so she could take the credit for his work. Diana groused when the two left but didn’t put up her usual fuss because she could sense that Bucky wasn’t feeling well and Steve promised he would be back soon.

---

It didn’t take very long for them to get over to the orphanage. Bucky was still in pain but he was happy with himself for being able to come to see Adriana. And she was so happy to see them. “Miss Bubby!” she exclaimed and came bounding over to him. She clung to his legs and stared up at him with big eyes.

“Hey!” Bucky said with a gasp and bent down to pick her up. “How are you, Adriana? You see I brought Miss Steve?”

---

Steve smiled wide at how happy she was to see Bucky. “Hey, where’s my hug?” Steve teased, giving her a little nudge.

Adriana reached over from her perch on Bucky to give Steve a little hug too. “Miss Bubby gets his hugs first,” she said in a matter-of-fact tone.

---

Bucky giggled and pet her hair. “See? I get hugs first, Stevie,” he said and grinned at his husband. He then looked to Adriana again and said, “Do you mind hanging out with Steve for a few minutes? I need to go talk to the caretaker and Karen for a bit. Is that okay, Adriana?”

---

She pouted because she liked Bucky but she supposed that Steve was pretty nice as well. “Okay,” she said. “But you got to come back so we can play!” Adriana allowed herself to be passed over to Steve.

Steve smiled down at the little girl and asked, “Did you name your other turtles yet?”

---
“Yeah, you want to see them?” Adriana asked and pointed down the hall towards the room she shared with three other kids.

Bucky watched them go off down the hall and then he turned to head to the office. It didn’t take him very long to get some papers signed and talk to Karen about how the home visit went. She went through her thoughts with him about it and then told him that he should expect to hear from her in a week or so about whether or not he was going to be allowed to adopt Adriana.

---

“Of course, Kiddo,” Steve said brightly. He carried her into the room and looked around, feeling a little bad at how small the space was for the kids. He had an urge to adopt them all but Bucky would kill him for that. Not as bad as Becca would, though. He set Adriana down onto her feet. “Let’s see them,” he encouraged.

---

Adriana was in the middle of showing Steve how she could stack her turtles on top of each other from biggest to smallest when Bucky came back in. “Hey, you two,” he said and came over to sit on the ground next to Steve. “Have you been having fun?” He looked to Steve and gave him a little nod and a careful smile so he knew that everything was going smoothly so far.

---

Steve searched Bucky’s face for any hint of being upset and when he saw that Bucky looked relatively positive, he had a good feeling that the meeting went well. Adriana nodded her head. “I’m telling Miss Steeb about all my ‘tuttles’. Do you wanna see?”

---

“Of course, I want to see,” Bucky said enthusiastically and watched her move to grab some other toys from under her bed. “Adriana, do you like to color? Because Steve can draw. Maybe he can draw you some turtles and you can color them.”

---

Adriana forgot her toys when she heard that. “You can draw, Miss Steeb?” She hurried to grab a box from under her bed with some old notebooks and half-broken crayons. “Can you draw me a ‘tuttle’?” she asked.

Steve picked up the box. “Of course, Kiddo. What kind of turtle do you want?”

---

Adriana considered for a moment and then picked up the smallest little turtle. “Can I have one like this one?” she asked and pet the turtle gently. “He’s got the little spots on him and I like that best.”

Bucky took the turtle from Adriana and held it up for Steve to work on drawing it. “Adriana, do you like making art?”

---

“She looked over at Bucky and nodded her head. “Yeah,” she said. “I like drawing flowers and writing letters. Miss Karen told me how to write the letter ’A’.”

“Oh yeah?” Bucky asked and got another notebook and a crayon “Will you show me? Can you write your name out yet?” He figured it was too early for her to get her entire name but a few letters maybe. Most of the kids in the orphanage learned their basics slower because there wasn’t someone helping each of them one-on-one. “What’s your middle name, Adriana?”

Adriana took the crayon and drew a very squiggly shape that sort of resembled an ’A’. “I don’t know how to spell my name. But I can write an ’A’, see? I did an ’A’, ” she said. “I don’t have a middle name. Maybe you can help me get one?”

“Oh, honey, you don’t have a middle name?” Bucky asked and then looked to Steve with big, sad eyes for a quick moment. “Of course, Adriana, we can give you a middle name. Can you give us a few days to think of it? Is that okay, Sweetheart?”

She shook her head. ”Can you give me one tomorrow? That’s too long of a time.” Steve would’ve laughed at her pressing if he hadn’t been so sad that she didn’t have a full name. Lord knows he and Bucky would think over many options for one.

“Yeah, yes. Definitely. Tomorrow,” Bucky said and gave Steve another look. He knew what they were going to do tonight. He really wanted to tell Adriana about the adoption but it wasn’t time yet. “Steve, are you done with the turtle for Adriana?” he asked, just wanting to talk about something else so it didn’t slip.

“I’m almost done. I just got to make the shell outline,” Steve said.

Adriana stood over Steve as he drew. “Wow! That’s a really good ’tuttle’, Miss Steeb,” she gasped. Steve smiled brightly and passed the paper over to her. “You ready to make it even better and color it in?”

Adriana nodded and took the paper carefully and then grabbed some crayons. She wasn’t great at staying in the lines but she was at least having fun. “Miss Steeb,” she started. “When can I see your doggy?”

Steve gave her a little smile. “If Miss Karen says it’s okay, we can go out to the park to play and I can bring Diana with us so you can see her. She loves it when you throw a ball or a frisbee for her to fetch.”
Adriana was satisfied enough with that option. She gave a little nod and went back to coloring. Bucky squeezed Steve’s arm and added. “And my sister Lilly loves to run around the park, too. She would join you and Diana. Lilly can play catch with you.”

---

“How old is Lilly?” Adriana asked. She didn’t take her eyes off of the paper as she colored. Steve smiled fondly and leaned into Bucky’s side a little. “She can’t run faster than me, can she? I want to be the fastest.”

---

“Well,” Bucky said and chuckled a little as he looked to Steve. “She’s fourteen now. So, she’s ten years older than you. She is pretty fast. You might have to work hard to be faster than her. But I’m sure she would love to run with you whenever you want.”

---

“Mm, I don’t know,” she said. “I kinda don’t wanna run with someone who’s gonna beat me,” she said casually. “I’ll play with Miss Steeb’s dog. Or maybe I can color with your sister. How did you get sisters?”

---

Adriana was so cute and a little bit competitive like some of the members of their family could be. “My mommy and daddy gave me sisters,” Bucky said and handed her some more crayons. “They had me and then about ten years later they had my sister Becca and then two years after that they had Lilly.”

---

Adriana messily colored in the outside edges of the paper blue once she had the turtle colored in. “How come your mommy and daddy didn’t give you a brother?” she asked. “Were they out of boys?”

---

Bucky took Steve’s hand in his and leaned into him a little. “Some mommies and daddies don’t get to choose what babies they get,” he said. He wasn’t sure how to attempt to explain the difference between parents that make their children and ones that adopt.

---

Steve squeezed Bucky’s hands. “Yeah. My ma wanted a girl but instead she got me,” he laughed. “But she was happy anyway. I don’t have any brothers or sisters because she believed that she couldn’t make a kid more perfect than me,” he joked.

---

“Sure, yeah,” Bucky said with a little smirk and gave Steve a nudge. “So, for Steve and I, we didn’t know who our babies were until we got them. Christopher was a surprise and so was Sarah May. We have another baby who wasn’t so much a surprise but he is in heaven.”

---
Adriana finished her drawing and gave it to Bucky out of habit. “Did you get your babies in the mail? Or were they from an orphanage like me?” She asked. At some point, she was told that babies get delivered and she had assumed it was in some sort of package. “Where is heaven? Miss Karen says that’s where my mommy and daddy are, too.”

---

Bucky took the drawing and held on to it for her. “Our babies found us. They didn’t come in the mail but they weren’t at the orphanage either. And, yeah, heaven is pretty far away. But we are going to go there eventually and I’ll see my baby boy and my mommy and daddy. And you can see yours too if you want. But that’s a long while until you can go.”

---

Steve’s face drooped both because of Grant and because neither Bucky nor Adriana would see their parents for a long time and that was hard to handle. “How far away is it?” she asked. “Why’s it gonna take so long, can’t we go there? In a car or a bus?”

---

Bucky wasn’t really sure how to answer. “We can’t drive there. That’s not how you get in. You get in a different way.” He tucked his hair behind his ears and looked to Steve for a second. “A few years ago, I tried to get there. But I didn’t get there. It turns out it wasn’t my turn to go. We have to wait for our turn. And it’s actually a really good thing that we have to wait because that means we get to spend time here waiting with people who love us and we get to have great memories with them. Sometimes we have such a great time that we forget what we are waiting for.”

---

Steve’s bottom lip quivered and he turned away so Adriana couldn’t see him getting emotional. He knew that he wouldn’t be able to hide that from Bucky. “I wanna see my mommy and daddy,” she huffed, not satisfied with Bucky’s explanation at all. “It’s not fair.” She climbed up onto her bed and laid down, burying her face into her pillow dramatically.

---

Bucky blinked a few times and looked over to Steve who was looking away anyway. He reached a hand out and pet Adriana’s hair gently. “I know you want to see them. I want to see my parents too. But we have to wait. I know you don’t want to but we have to.” He paused for a second and just let the silence filter through the room. “Would it be easier for you to be able to wait to see your parents if you had another set of parents here that will wait with you?”

---

Adriana was a little upset but she was being a bit more theatrical than she actually felt right now. She had already had this explained to her by Karen that heaven was a far way away but she never gave specifics. “Nobody wants to get me,” she said, frowning at Bucky. “I’m never going to have parents like the other kids.”

---

Bucky took a deep breath. “Adriana, Sweetheart, that’s not true. I have wanted to adopt you from the moment we met,” he said softly, unable to keep it to himself anymore with Adriana so upset. “But I needed to make sure that Steve was okay with that. And yesterday when we went to the aquarium, Steve told me that he wanted to adopt you too. He and I want to be your new parents. And Miss Karen is working on making that happen.” He paused again. “Would you want Steve and I to be your new daddy and papa?”

---

Steve wasn’t sure if they were allowed to be talking about this but, god, he hated hearing Adriana think that she was unadoptable and unwanted. He nodded his head in agreement when Bucky explained that they both wanted to adopt her. Adriana’s head shot up and she sat up on the bed, tearing up a little. “Really?” she asked in a soft, little voice. “You really want to get me?”

---

Bucky nodded and let a few tears fall himself. “Yes. We want to be your parents. So much. If you’ll let us. We are working on making you a room all for yourself. It’s right next to Lilly’s room. And it’s down just a little bit from Steve and I’s room.”

---

Adriana practically flung herself at Bucky and buried her face into his chest. She nodded her head vehemently but she was still crying because she was overwhelmed and couldn’t believe that she was getting a real family. Steve moved over so he could hug the both of them.

---

Bucky laughed and cried at the same time and held Adriana tightly to his chest. He rocked her a little bit. “Steve and I are really happy to have you join our family. And, you know, this means you get two little siblings too. And a Nana and two aunts. And there’s a cat and a doggie at home.”

---

It took Adriana a long time to calm down. Even when she stopped crying she was still having a hard time believing that she was actually going to have a home. “What’s a 'nana'?” she asked.

Steve gave her hand a small squeeze. “That’s my mom. A 'nana' is your dad’s mom. She’s kind of like another parent, except even better.”

---

Bucky sniffled and wiped at his eyes. He hoped he hadn’t made a mistake by telling her before everything was final. But everything couldn’t be final without Adriana’s approval anyway. “So, sweetie, you do want to be our daughter, right? You like us? You want us to be your parents?”

---

Adriana nodded her head again. “Yes. Please, I want you two to be my daddies, Miss Bubby,” she said. “My new 'turtles' can come with me, right? And my crayons?” She wasn’t sure if she had to leave all of her belongings behind or not. “When can I go to your house?”

---

“Yes, of course, your turtles and crayons can come with you. All your things can come with you,” Bucky said. “And you’ll get to come home with us soon. A few people have to do a few things first then you can come home with us.”
Steve nodded. “Yeah. We have to get your room all ready for you first. We can’t have you coming home and not have a room, right? Diana can stay in your room for a little while when it’s bedtime so you can have some company,” he said. “You’ll meet her next time.”

---

“Diana is the doggy, Miss Steeb?” Adriana asked for clarity.

“Yes, that’s the doggy.” Bucky nodded and said, “Adriana, I also want you to know that you can call Steve and I anything you want to, Okay? You don’t have to call us ‘Daddy’ and ‘Papa’ like the babies do. If you are more comfortable calling us ‘Steve’ and ‘Bucky’ that’s fine. I want you to call us what you want to.”

---

Adriana thought for a moment and said, “Well, I don’t want to be different. I want to call you ‘Daddy’ and ‘Papa’,” she said. “Am I going to be a big sister? Mary Beth and Margaret are sisters. They sleep in those beds,” she said as she pointed at two empty beds. “Will I be like them?”

---

“Yeah,” Bucky said happily. “You’ll be a big sister just like Mary Beth is. And you’re going to have a lot of little siblings over the years, okay?” He brushed her hair from her eyes and gave her a big smile. “I’m really excited to bring you into our family.”

---

Adriana smiled. She kind of was a little jealous that she had to share her new parents with other kids but sharing parents was better than no parents. “How do I be a big sister?” she asked. “Can you teach me how?”

---

“Well, I don’t know if you can be taught how to do that,” Bucky said. “You learn how to be a big sister as time goes on. I had to learn how to be a big brother. And I’m still learning.”

---

“That’s a lot of learning,” she said flatly.

Steve smiled and patted her back. “You’re going to be a great big sister. Having a family to love is the best. I can’t wait for you to meet the rest of us.”

---

Bucky nodded in agreement and touched Steve’s arm lightly. “And we both know that it might be scary at first being in a new place with new people. So, if you need anything at all, you just ask us, okay? Steve is home all the time with our kids so that includes you now. I work but I’m home when I’m not there. And your new nana will be around most of the time too.”

---

Adriana nodded. “I’m excited to go home, though,” she said. “And to have a room and my ‘tuttles’.”
Steve chuckled. “Yes, you will,” he agreed. “We’re excited to take you home. We just have to work with Miss Karen a bit longer.”

---

“But, we are going to be as fast as we can to get you home, okay?” Bucky said and felt himself tearing up again. “And we can play games and have dinner as a family and you can go on walks with Steve and the dog.”

---

“How many wake-ups before I go home,” she asked. She climbed up and stood in Bucky’s lap, now a little more energetic and finding it hard to keep still. “Two wake-ups? Four?”

---

“Well, Sweetheart, it could be more wake-ups than that,” Bucky said and held her hands so she was steady. “But, we will come get you as soon as we are allowed to. And Steve and I will have your room all ready for you.” He really needed to make sure they got the basement ready for Becca as soon as possible. He figured it might end up being a couple long nights for him while he fixed the ceiling and painted the walls.

---

“You’re going to have such a cool room,” Steve said. “It looks like Bucky and I are going to have to work extra hard to get it ready for you. While you wait, can you do something for us?” he asked. “It would be very special to me if you drew us pictures to put in your room so we can decorate it.”

---

“Yes, please do that,” Bucky said enthusiastically and took her crayons off her bed and put them neatly in their container. “That would be great to have your drawings up on the walls. If you need more crayons or paper, we can bring it to you.”

Adriana thought for a second and then nodded. “I can do that. What should I draw?”

---

“You can draw anything you want,” Steve said. “I’m sure whatever you draw will be wonderful.” He pulled her back down so he could hug her. “Me and Bucky love you so much. We can’t wait to take you home with us.”

Karen came in a minute or so later and knocked on the open door. “Hey, you guys. It’s time for the kids to have dinner.”

---

That meant that Bucky and Steve had to go. Bucky was pretty reluctant to leave but he gave Adriana another hug and then said goodbye. By the time they got home, Bucky was already planning every aspect of Adriana’s room and how to fix up Becca’s new room.

---

Steve hugged her goodbye and promised that they’d be back for her as soon as they could. At home, they were greeted by Diana and Lilly whining for dinner in their own way. He turned to Bucky and said, “Do you want to handle the room situation while I handle dinner?”

---

“You always handle dinner,” Bucky observed and waited for Sarah May to crawl her way over to him to be picked up. “I think the only things we really have to do in the basement is finish the ceiling, paint the walls, and put in carpet. So, I’ll get started on figuring out the ceiling. But I do really think I might have to call in some guys to do it.”

---

Steve watched proudly as their daughter crawled over to them. He loved how much their kids liked being around them. Christopher must have been really tired to not be toddling over at this point. “Whatever you need, let me know. I’ll do my best to help and maybe I can call in a favor from a few old coworkers.”

---

“That might work,” Bucky said as he picked up Sarah May and gave her a kiss. “No Richard,” he added with a look. “And it’s not just because he has a crush on you. He arrested me and I never got an apology.”

---

Steve covered his mouth as he hid a dumb smile. It wasn’t nice for Bucky to have been wrongfully arrested and Steve had been pissed at the time but looking back, the situation was a little amusing. “Fair enough.” He kissed Sarah May’s head and then kissed Bucky before going to the kitchen to make food.
With the help of Natasha, Steve managed to get a small group of his buddies from the precinct to come over to help finish up the basement. So, late one afternoon, Bucky found himself covered in grime with his hair pulled up on his head, wearing a shirt that was a little too short, and trying to figure out how to cover up the ceiling.

Natasha decided that she didn’t want to help with the ceiling so, instead, she started painting the walls. And Clint had decided that he should be in charge of playing with the babies instead of helping at all. So, on ceiling duty, it was just Bucky and Sam and - much to Bucky’s frustration - Richard. Steve had made a point to tell them that Bucky didn’t want Richard over but that must have gotten lost in translation. He was just as surprised by the officer showing up with the crew.

---

Sam had a fair amount of experience with this sort of thing, so he gave Bucky a nudge. “Hey, pass me the spackle. I can get this ceiling done quick. I just need you to help me move the ladder.”

---

Bucky stared at the toolbox for a second and tried to figure out what was the spackle. He was only familiar with the tools that had to do with building furniture. He was good at making and assembling furniture but anything else was a little beyond him. He picked up something that was more like an ice pick offered it to Sam.

---

Sam stared at the tool and then broke out into laughter. “Nice joke,” he said, thinking Bucky was trying to be funny instead of genuinely not knowing what it was. He picked up a white bucket full of thick goop. He got a triangular, flat tool and started to use it to spread the spackling paste onto the ceiling and smooth it out. “So how’s the adoption process coming along?” he asked.

---

Bucky set his tool back down again with a huff of a sigh and then glanced over at Richard as he went to help Natasha paint. “Well, uh, it’s been okay. It’s all been pretty fast. We’ve just been trying to get this through so we can get her home with us. She’s really excited to have a family. And every day that she is there instead of here, just makes me so sad. You know?”

---

“It’s great that you’re not having any hiccups from the orphanage over this,” he said. “Adriana is going to be so happy when she comes here, but don’t take it personally if it takes her a while to adjust. I’ve dealt with a few adopted kids during my line of duty.”

---

“I know,” Bucky said with a little tick in his brow. “Her caseworker already talked about it. And Steve and I let Adriana know that she can come to us with any problem. I mean, her room will be just a few feet from ours. But I think she will be fine. She likes us a lot and she wants a family so much.”
Sam worked on the ceiling with ease, finishing all the holes and scars fairly quickly. It probably would’ve taken Bucky at least four times as long to do what Sam just finished. “Becca sure is making out like a bandit with this room. It’s practically an apartment down here,” he said.

“Yeah, it really is,” Bucky murmured and scrutinized the ceiling looking for any mistake that he could point out. But, like usual, there was nothing. He sighed and looked over to Natasha and Richard who had two walls done. “You, uh...” he said quietly and looked to Sam and tried to give him a friendly smile. “Do you want to come upstairs with me to get the carpet?”

“We should probably wait until the walls are done to lay out the carpet. It would suck to get paint on it before Becca steps foot on the thing,” Sam said. “Rookie mistake. I did that the first time I remodeled a room. Won’t let it happen again.” He gave Bucky a friendly smile and helped Natasha and Richard paint the other two walls. Once they were done, he headed upstairs to grab the carpet. However, since Natasha and Richard were already helping Bucky with it, he decided to check on the babies and Clint.

Bucky let Sam go upstairs and he let out a big frustrated groan before flopping down in the corner near Natasha to help get the carpet lined up with the staircase. “Can I ask you something?” he asked and cocked his head to the side, looking at her and hoping that she would get the hint that he needed some attention. Richard was otherwise occupied cleaning out the paintbrushes and rollers.

Natasha looked over at Bucky when he came over all dramatic and upset. “You just asked me something,” she said slyly. But she reached over and gave Bucky’s shoulder a nudge. “What’s on your mind?” she asked.

Bucky gave her a look and then slumped even lower. He really was being dramatic. “I guess... I just... Well...” he sighed and blinked a few times, trying to get his thoughts together. “What are your opinions on Sam?” he asked, trying his best to be vague. He really should have had this conversation with Clint.

Natasha shrugged. “He’s nice,” she said. “Very helpful, kind of cute. He hit on me before he knew I was with Clint and he’s been apologizing ever since,” Natasha explained. “He’s the guy everyone in the precinct calls if they need help and he’s there. Why? What happened?”

Bucky rubbed his eyes. Natasha was no help. He really should have talked to Clint instead. “No... no. That’s just about what I expected,” Bucky mumbled. Sam was great. He really was. There was no legitimate reason for Bucky to dislike him. But he really did. And it was all just pettiness lasting since the first time they had a real conversation. Maybe it was because Bucky felt like Sam was better than him in certain regards. Or he was jealous that Steve had confided in Sam about things having to do with their marriage. Which, of course, wasn't Sam's fault in the slightest. But Bucky didn't want to admit he was the one who was the asshole now.

---

Natasha gave Bucky a look. “What, is he obnoxiously too nice for you?” she asked. “Because that’s what your husband is, too. Sometimes Steve used to drive me up the wall for no good reason, so I understand a little if that's what it is about Sam.”

---

“No, that’s not it,” Bucky said and pulled a sour face because that might actually be part of it. “And Steve isn’t obnoxiously nice at all times. And neither is Sam.” He had experienced rude Sam a few times. It was the Sam that pointed out how Steve hated how messy Bucky was and then laughed when he got food in his hair. But at the same time, Sam thought that Bucky knew. So, it wasn’t meant to be rude. He was just having a conversation, not trying to antagonize Bucky. “I don’t know...”

---

“Some people can rub other people the wrong way. Doesn’t mean either of you are jerks for it,” Natasha observed.

Sam came running down the stairs just at that moment with Sarah May in his arms, looking excited. “Hey, Bucky!” he said excitedly. He bounced the baby lightly in his arms. “Say it again. Just like you did before,” he encouraged.

Sarah May smiled and reached for Bucky and yelped, “Papa!”

---

Bucky’s eyes went wide and he took his baby girl from Sam. “Oh, Ya-Ya, look at you!” he gasped and gave her several kisses as she repeated ‘Papa’ a few more times. “Did Steve hear this?”

---

Sam shook his head. “No, I was watching her while Clint went to the bathroom and she started asking for you. At least, that’s what I assume she wanted since she was crawling around mumbling ‘Papa’ to herself.”

---

Bucky blinked and looked at Sam. He just stared for a second. Sam had been the first person to hear his daughter’s first word. Which, again, wasn't Sam's fault. But it really just made Bucky mad. He cleared his throat and turned to go upstairs with Sarah May so Steve could hear her talk.

---

Steve had been in the middle of helping Becca organize her boxes of things to make the move easier once the room was finished. “Hey, Buck,” he said brightly. “How’s our little girl doing?”

---

“Steve,” Bucky said happily and came up to him with Sarah May. “Ya-Ya, who am I?” he asked and pointed to himself. “Who’s this? Papa?”
Sarah May stuck her hands on Bucky’s cheeks and said, “Papa,”

---

Steve gasped and smiled brightly at Bucky. “Oh, my god! She said it!” He kissed her cheek. “Oh, you’re so smart, baby girl! You know who your papa is,” he praised and gave her a kiss on her head. “She’s so amazing. This is amazing. I’ve been trying to teach her that for weeks to surprise you.”

---

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve in for a kiss. “Has she said ‘Dada’ yet?” he asked hopefully. He knew it was probably a little easier to say ‘Papa’ with the soft sounds but maybe she was getting ‘Dada’ as well.”

---

Steve shook his head. “Not yet,” he said. “I’ve been saying ‘Papa’ over and over while we were home alone. I probably looked like a crazy person,” Steve laughed. “Looks like it finally caught on.”

---

Bucky felt Sarah May start to squirm around a little in his arms. Now that she was crawling around, she didn’t like to be held as much. “I’m going to take her back down to Clint. We are almost done in the basement. We just have to finish the carpet.”

---

Steve looked proudly down at their daughter. “Alright,” he said, wishing that they had time to play more with her. “We are almost done up here, too. The books are going to be the worst to carry down.”

---

Bucky looked over to the very tall stack of boxes filled with books. He wasn’t really one to judge, though. His boxes of records took up what was left of their living room and the spare closet in the hall. “We can just have an assembly line down to the basement with those.”

---

“That’s a good idea,” Steve agreed. “Can I carry her downstairs? It feels like forever since I got to hold her. Or Christopher for that matter, too,” he said and reached out for her hopefully.

---

“Of course, Baby,” Bucky agreed and handed Sarah May off to Steve. “We’ve been pretty busy for the last few days with getting the house ready. We haven’t really had much time with the babies.”

---

Steve snuggled his daughter close but Sarah May grunted and wiggled because she wanted to crawl. Steve sighed and walked down the stairs with her and Bucky. “We should have you take a day off from work when this is over so we can have a family day.”
“I can talk to Clint about it. I’m sure he’s fine with that,” Bucky said. “Maybe I can take a few days. I want Adriana to feel settled here and she’s going to meet both my sisters and your mother and the babies all at once. It might be good if the two of us are here for her for a few days.”

“Yeah, you’re right. I’m also not going to complain about you spending more time with the family at home,” he said. Steve smiled happily. “She’s going to love it here.” He set Sarah May down in the baby pen where Christopher was playing with his toys.

“I won’t complain about that either,” Bucky said happily and pulled Steve in for a quick kiss. “You want to come see the basement?” he asked and looked around for Clint and found him with Lilly eating cookies.

“Yeah, let’s have a look. I’m excited to see how far it’s come today. It feels like things were taking forever when it was just us working on it one thing at a time,” Steve said.

“Yeah,” Bucky agreed, a little indignantly. “I still think I could have gotten it. At the very least, Natasha and I could have done it.” Meaning he didn’t think Sam and Richard were necessary. Except that without Sam, the ceiling would have taken forever.

“I already said I was sorry that Richard showed up. I didn't plan that,” Steve countered. “But hey, maybe this is his way of apologizing for arresting you. He just spent all day painting and remodeling our basement. That counts for something, right?”

Bucky gave Steve a little scoff. “Could have something to do with the fact that he thinks you’re sexy,” he said and slipped a possessive arm around Steve for a moment and rested his hands on his ass. “He hasn’t spoken to me once since being here.” He shook his head and nudged Steve towards the stairs.

Steve blushed red and shook his head. “It’s not my fault that he likes me.” When they got down to the basement, they already had the carpet laid out. It didn't cover all the way to the walls. It gave about four inches around the perimeter. But that was mostly what they had wanted.

Bucky looked over the carpet and adjusted one of the corners so it laid flatter. It would probably take a bit for them to settle in. They could just put some boxes of books on the corners to weigh them down for now.

Sam came over to Steve and patted his shoulder as they looked around the room. “This place doesn’t look so bad anymore, does it?” he asked.

---

“It’s looking really good, Sam. Thank you for helping us out,” Steve said. “I bet Becca is never going to want to leave to go to college outside of the city with all this space here,” he added confidently. “What do you think, Buck?”

---

“That’s the goal,” Bucky murmured from across the basement. It really was like an apartment down there. “She can stay as long as she wants. And I want her to stay for a while. I don’t want my baby sisters leaving me so fast.”

---

Steve knew how much Bucky loved his sisters and for Bucky’s sake, he wanted them to stay around as well. He made his way over to him and wrapped his arms around Bucky’s shoulders and kissed him. “I know, Buck. They are growing up.”

---

Bucky whined softly thinking about his sisters getting older. “Yesterday, Becca was ten years old. Now she’s sixteen and thinking about college applications.” He took a deep breath and shook his head. He couldn’t think about it too much. He wasn’t going to cry in front of Sam and Richard - or Natasha for a third time.

---

“Alright, you two, do you want us to start bringing everything down?” Natasha asked. “We can probably have everything moved in less than an hour and then Becca can decide where she wants it all.”

---

“Sure,” Bucky agreed and detached from Steve. I guess we can just pile up most of it in the middle and push it around once the paint dries. Some of her boxes of books might have to stay upstairs for the time being. She does have a lot. Maybe I can even convince Clint to participate in this.”

---

“I’m sure if you promise him more baby time after, he would say yes to just about anything you ask him to do,” Steve chuckled. The trick would be getting Christopher to allow Clint to leave.

---

“Just so long as that’s all he wants. Last time I need him to do something for me, he told me he wanted the babies every other weekend,” Bucky said. “Apparently, he wants to take them to meet his mom.”

---

Steve laughed. “Who takes his friend’s kids to meet their parents? Is he trying to convince her that they’re his or something?” he asked. He could see Clint pulling some sort of shenanigans like that.
Bucky lowered his voice and said, “It’s all one big ploy to get Natasha to agree to children. I would bet good money on that. Because his mom loves Natasha and I think he’s hoping she will convince her to have babies.”

---

Steve sighed and leaned into Bucky’s side. “Natasha really doesn’t want kids,” he said. “You know I love that they’re together but I worry that this is going to be something that splits them apart.”

---

Bucky nodded and watched Natasha and Clint come back down the stairs carrying one of Becca’s empty bookshelves. “I know... it’ll devastate him if she leaves him.” He sighed and looked to Steve and gave him a quick but loving kiss. “Thank you for being my perfect match.”

---

Steve leaned into the kiss and put his hands on Bucky’s hips. “Thank you for being mine,” he responded with a loving smile. “I’m happy to raise our family together with you.”

---

“I love you,” Bucky said and gave Steve one more kiss before letting go. “Let’s get moving. The sooner this is done, the sooner I can get you alone. If you get what I’m saying.” He grinned and raised his eyebrows as if Steve wasn't already on board.
In less than two weeks, Adriana was cleared to go home. Steve made sure that the whole family would be home when they brought Adriana back from the orphanage for good. She clung onto Bucky's hand tightly as they walked and Steve had Diana on her leash to walk with them. “Are you excited to see your room, Adriana?”

---

Adriana was skipping a little as they walked and she had the last of her things stuffed in her backpack that was carefully strapped to her back. She was also wearing a hat that had little ears and button eyes so it looked like a raccoon. "Yes! I get a whole room to my own!"

---

“You’re going to love it. The whole family worked on it all week just for you.” Steve smiled brighty at her. “Everyone loves you so much, Adriana. I can’t wait for you to see your room,” he said. “Where’d you get that hat? It’s so cute,” he complimented.

---

Adriana looked up at Steve and then pointed to Bucky. “Bubby got it for me,” she said matter-of-factly and stopped walking so she could hold her arms out to be picked up. Bucky couldn’t stop grinning because he was bringing his daughter home today. He bent down and picked her up and held her close to his chest.

---

“He did, huh? He has good taste,” Steve said. He kissed Bucky’s cheek once they were at the stoop and he opened the door. The girls, his mom, and the babies were all waiting inside and shouted a ‘Welcome Home’ when they walked through the door.

---

Adriana gasped in surprise and gripped a little tighter to Bucky’s shirt. Her eyes were wide and she looked like she was going to cry because she finally, finally had a family. “Welcome home, Adriana,” Bucky asked and nuzzled her cheek as tears fell from his own eyes.

---

Steve hugged both Adriana and Bucky together for a moment. “I know, Kiddo. It’s a lot,” he said. Diana whined and nudged at Adriana’s feet when she saw that she was crying. Lilly looked to Bucky for direction on what she should do.

---

“It’s okay, Sweetheart,” Bucky said and wiped his eyes. “Come on. Let’s get you a snack. I know your nana made cookies. And then you can see your room and we can get you settled, okay?” He gave an encouraging little smile to his sisters and Sarah so they would know it was fine.

---

“Dada!” Christopher said, reaching for Steve. “Who da’?” the baby asked, pointing to Adriana.
“That’s your new sister, silly boy,” Steve said sweetly. “Let’s go get her some cookies.” He walked to the kitchen and set up a plate of cookies and a glass of milk for Adriana.

She looked pretty shy about having all this fuss made for her but she also kind of liked the attention. “What kind of cookies are these?” she asked.

---

Bucky sat down next to her and helped her off with her coat and her hat. “They are chocolate chip cookies. See those little gooey bits?” He took a cookie for himself and then handed one to Lilly who was hovering over him. “These are my favorite cookies, Adriana. And your Aunt Lilly’s favorite, too.”

---

“Oh, good. I was afraid they were raisin,” she giggled. Adriana bit into her cookie happily. Christopher squirmed in Steve’s arms until his dad gave him a cookie as well.

“So, Adriana. Do you like sports or books?” Lilly was already trying to be the favorite aunt.

---

Bucky saw Steve give Christopher a cookie and he shot him a look and whispered, “Just one.” He still didn’t like Christopher having too much sugar.

Adriana, who already had some chocolate mess on her cheeks, said, “I like picture books with ‘turtles’ and other things.”

---

“Turtles are cool,” Lilly agreed. “I’ll show you my baseball card collection. It’s kind of like a picture book,” she said. Steve smiled fondly and went to get some cut-up fruit for Christopher because his cookie was done with and he was whining for more.

---

“Okay,” Adriana said tentatively and looked from Lilly to Bucky.

Bucky nudged Becca’s foot under the table and said, “Your Aunt Becca has some really cool videos about ocean animals. Maybe there is something about turtles in them. I’m sure she would watch with you if you want to sometime.”

---

“Yeah. There’s one I have about whales that talked a little about sea turtles,” Becca said. “I’ve got a lot of homework tonight. But we can watch it over the weekend,” she suggested.

Adriana nodded her head shyly. “Yes, please.”

---

Bucky kissed her head and then got up from the table. “Steve, should we go show her her room now?” he asked and helped Adriana down from her chair.

Christopher watched Bucky for a second and then shouted “Papa, up!” and held his arms out for him. He wasn’t liking that he wasn’t the center of attention. Sarah May was still asleep in her nana’s arms so she didn’t mind.

---

“Yeah, let’s,” Steve agreed. When Bucky didn’t pick Christopher up right away, he started to cry. Steve held Adriana so Bucky wouldn’t feel like he had to choose between the two of them and he hoisted her up on his shoulders. “See that? You’re not going to get much peace and quiet so long as your brother is awake,” he teased.

---

Bucky picked up Christopher and gave him several kisses as he held him to his chest. “Unfortunately, that’s true. But at least your sister is quiet for the most part.” Bucky had discussed with Steve the day before about reinforcing to Adriana that this was her family and that included everyone. “And your brother just learned how to climb stairs,” Bucky added at the top two steps and set him down so he could crawl up the last ones. “It took him a while because he got scared of the height.”

---

“Do they know that I’m their sister?” Adriana asked. “Christopher doesn’t know a lot of words,” she pointed out. Steve smiled. “He may not understand yet, but he will. He learned that Sarah May is his sister. He’ll learn that you are too.” Adriana’s door had little block letters hanging on the outside spelling out her name. The inside of the door was painted like an ocean with turtles on it. They made sure it was neat and with plenty of space to put the belongings she would eventually acquire.

---

Bucky held open the door for Steve and Adriana and watched as her face lit up and her eyes got wide. She gasped and pointed at the door. “Look at the ‘turtles!’” she said and touched the door gently. “It’s so pretty.” She looked around the rest of the room and went to hop up on the bed that had lots of colorful pillows and blankets. “This is all just my room?”

---

“Yeah, Kiddo. This is all yours. Bucky asked Miss Karen about your favorite colors and we made it up just for you.” Steve leaned into Bucky’s side. “Do you like it?” he asked. “Is the bed comfy for you?” He wanted her to be comfortable here.

---

Adriana nodded and looked over at her new parents. “I like it,” she agreed and flicked on the lamp on her nightstand and then flicked it off again. “Do I have to sleep with the door closed? Mary Beth liked having it closed but I don’t want it.”

---

“You don’t need it closed if you don’t want it to be,” Steve said. “You can sleep with the light on or the light off. It doesn’t matter to us,” he said. Steve sat down on the corner of the bed. “You get to be the boss about little things like that. But if Bucky and I tell you that you have to do something a certain way, it’s because we’re making sure to keep you safe.”

---

Adriana scooted closer to Steve and leaned a little against him. “When am I allowed to call you my parents?” she asked as she looked up at Steve with those big eyes. She still wasn’t sure if she could just start saying ‘Daddy’ and ‘Papa’ immediately.

---

Steve’s eyes teared up and he wrapped his arms around her. “You’ve always been allowed,” he said softly. “Because you’ve always been our daughter. It’s just that we didn’t get to take you home until today. But now you’re going to be our daughter forever.”

---

Adriana stood up on her bed and gave Steve a hug and nuzzled against his neck. “Thank you for picking me, Daddy,” she said quietly.

Bucky’s heart clenched as he watched the two of them together. Adriana was finally with them. He came over to the bed and bent down by Adriana with Christopher still in his arms. “We love you so much.”

---

Steve’s heart soared when she called him that. “I’m so happy Bucky met you and brought us all together.” He wrapped his other arm around Bucky and held them both close. “Thank you for letting us be your new parents.” Christopher reached over for Adriana’s hair once he was in arm’s reach of her.

---

Bucky chuckled and set Christopher down on the bed by Adriana. He immediately crawled up next to her and tangled his hand in her hair. “Be careful, Bean, no tug,” Bucky said softly and Christopher looked to him and gave a semi-understanding nod.

---

Adriana smiled and carefully held her little brother. “Hi, Christopher,” she said. “I’m Adriana. We seen each there before and now I’m your big sister,” Adriana continued. “This is my room. But you can play in it sometimes, too.”

---

Bucky couldn’t help the smile, bright and big on his face as he watched his kids together. “See? Honey, you’re already a good big sister. And see how he’s looking at you. He’s curious about you. He’s trying to learn about you.”

---

“He’s curious about me?” she asked. Adriana looked briefly over at Bucky before turning back to Christopher. “What do you want to know? I’m four. When I grow up I want to be a dolphin. I like cookies and jump rope,” she rattled off to Christopher, who was just happy to have someone talking to him.

---

Christopher gurgled happily and pat his hand on Adriana’s face. “Hi, hi,” he said excitedly.

“Oh, Bean, what a good boy,” Bucky said. “You’re being very good to your sister.” He touched Adriana’s arm and said, “If at any point you want some alone time to settle in, just let us know.”

---

Adriana scrunched up her nose but laughed. “I think I want to play with Christopher,” she said. “When it’s bedtime, I will be alone. I’ll have my own room myself,” she said with a victorious smile. “Christopher, do you want to play with my animals?”

---

“Adriana, he might try to put the turtles in his mouth. So just try to ask him for them back, if he does. If that doesn’t work, I’ll get it from him,” Bucky said and sat down on the floor so there weren’t too many people on Adriana’s bed being overwhelming.

---

Adriana grabbed her smallest turtle and showed Christopher. Their son behaved for the most part until he thought it was a fun idea to throw the toy. Adriana gasped and ran to scoop the turtle up. “Christopher, you hurt him!” She frowned. “That’s not nice. He has a boo-boo now.”

---

Bucky got up quickly and picked up Adriana and sat her in his lap. “Can I see the turtle?” he asked and waited for her to hand him over. He turned it around in his hands to show her that nothing was broken or ripped. “See, Sweetheart? He’s okay. He’s safe and happy. Nothing is hurt. Christopher didn’t know that it would upset you if he threw your turtle. But we can work on having him play without throwing. Okay? He’s just a little guy and he never meant to hurt him.”

---

Christopher babbled innocently at Adriana to plead his case and looked upset that she wasn’t playing with him anymore. Steve picked their son up to cuddle him. “How come he wants to throw it?” Adriana asked, not entirely upset but still sad for her turtle. She took it back from Bucky and pet its shell.

---

“I think Christopher is used to throwing things and then having the doggy bring them back,” Bucky said and rocked her back and forth a bit. “Diana plays fetch with him so he probably thought that’s what we were doing.”

---

“She does?” Adriana looked interested in playing that with the dog later. She leaned into Bucky’s chest and held onto his shirt. “Can we go downstairs and have more cookies?” she asked. “I’m hungry.”

---

Bucky pet her hair and got up with her in his arms. “Well, Sweetheart, if you are hungry then we can get you some food. Let’s save the cookies for a little later. Steve and your nana make delicious food. Would you like a sandwich or something like that?”
Steve scooped Christopher into his arms and tickled his little feet. He couldn’t believe he got to have such a big family already. “Can I have a sandwich and a cookie?” Adriana asked, having her heart set on cookies but not enough to get in trouble over it.

---

“Yes. But just one more for now,” Bucky said and followed Steve down the stairs. “You want the cookies to last for a few days, right? So you can have a cookie or two every day as a treat, okay?” He looked to Steve to confirm that he agreed.

---

Steve nodded in agreement with Bucky. “Yeah, we don’t want you to get a stomach ache from too many sweets,” he answered. “That would be no fun.” Adriana understood. “What kind of sandwich would you like?” he asked.

Their daughter looked confused as she responded, “I get to pick?” They weren’t treated poorly at the orphanage, of course, but it was rare that they had options.

---

“Yes, of course, you can pick,” Bucky said and set her down on a chair at the table. “We can do turkey or ham and cheese. Or peanut butter and jelly. What kind sounds good to you, Sweetheart?” Sarah May was awake again and she was fussing in her nana’s arms. “Papa, Dada,” she mumbled and reached out for them. She had recently gotten a lot better at saying ‘Dada’. That one had taken her a little longer than ‘Papa’.

---

Steve’s heart melted when he saw his daughter reaching for them. “Hello, baby girl!” He held her in his other arm so he had a baby in each. He kissed their heads and looked back at Adriana.

“Um... can I have peanut butter and jelly?” Adriana asked, wiggling excitedly in her chair a little.

---

Bucky nodded and worked on her sandwich for her. “Adriana, Honey, just so you know, I’ll be here for a few days with you and Steve and the babies and your nana. But then after a few days, I’ll have to go back to work. That means you’ll be home with your siblings and Daddy. Okay? But I’ll always come home at the end of the day. And if you need to call me, you can have Daddy call the record shop and I’ll talk to you.”

---

“You mean we can’t be together to play when I wake up?” she asked with a little frown.

Steve sat down with the babies and answered, “Me and your nana will be here. And Bucky will always make sure he plays with you before you go to bed. If your pop doesn’t go to work then we won’t be able to buy food or pay for the house.”

---

Adriana moved back and forth a little, just thinking about it for a minute. She didn’t really like the idea. She thought having parents would mean she had them with her all the time. “Why’s he got to work but you stay here?” she asked curiously. “How come it’s not you trade it every day?”
“That’s a very smart idea but that’s not how our jobs work. Usually, people have to work every day except for Saturday and Sunday,” he explained. “I used to be a policeman but I got hurt and now I can’t work anymore. I’m sad about that sometimes, but now I get to spend all my time at home with our kids.”

“So... Bubby has to work every day but two?” Adriana asked and gave a little sigh. “Okay...” she sniffled and bit into her sandwich.

Bucky looked to Steve and gave a weak little smile. It killed him that he didn’t get to spend as much time with his family as Steve did. He wished he could be with them all day and have fun with them and go to the park and play. He just missed so much and he would miss so much more.

Christopher pulled at Steve’s hair but not hard enough for Steve to stop him. He wondered if every now and again he could take a shift for Bucky so he could stay home with the kids instead. It almost was a year since he was let go on disability. He planned on bringing it up once they were alone.

After she finished her sandwich, Adriana went off to play with some of Christopher’s toys and Diana. “How’re you feeling?” Steve asked Bucky.

“Doing good,” Bucky mumbled as he glanced in the living room to see Christopher and Adriana playing with the dog. He nodded to Sarah who was working on the last part of Adriana’s new blanket and watching the kids. Bucky followed Steve back into the kitchen and sat down with him. Bucky was still holding Sarah May since she was being a little needy for her parents. “I think she’s adjusting okay so far.”

Steve played with Sarah May’s feet idly and smiled. “Yeah... I don’t expect it to always be this easy, but at least she’s happy.” He leaned over to kiss Bucky’s cheek. “So, uh... I was thinking. What if you trained me a little on how to work at the record shop? That way if you wanna spend a day home with the kids, we could swap.”

Bucky gave a tired little look to Steve and chuckled softly. “Baby, I’m not going to ask you to do that,” he said and adjusted Sarah May so he could take Steve’s hand in his. “I just get a little sad. You know? Just that... all our babies are here and you are here. And back when it was just me and the girls, I went to work and they went to school and we saw each other when we could. But now that I have all of you here at home during the day, it hurts to go to work sometimes.”

“I know, Buck, but I want you to not feel sad that you’re missing out.” Steve kissed him gently. “Sometimes it’d be good to get out of the house for me, you know? It could benefit us.” Sarah May cooed up at her papa and tugged at his shirt.
Bucky kissed his daughter’s cheek and said, “Baby, you’re going to be starting your art class soon. And I know how much you want to do it. I think that should be your focus. Besides, I don’t want you to have to work there and lift heavy boxes. It’s not going to be good on your lungs. And customers smoke around us all the time. It’s just not a good place for you.”

---

Steve looked away, feeling that knee-jerk reaction when Bucky mentioned that it physically wasn’t a good place for him. He swallowed it down because he didn’t want to prove Bucky right that he should talk to a therapist. “Fine,” he mumbled. “It was just a suggestion.”

---

Bucky had been with Steve long enough to know what most every little bit of his body language meant. He sighed and shook his head slightly, frustrated with himself for how he put it. “I didn’t mean it like that. It’s not that I think you couldn’t do it. I just don’t think you should. It was a good suggestion. It was. And I’m so grateful that you want to offer to help so I can be home more. But I’m fine. I promise. I’ll try to work something out with Clint.”

---

Steve reached over to put his hand on Bucky’s knee. “I wish I could do more financially to help.” He had a good check coming in from the settlement but a large portion of that went to the shelter. “It’s upsetting to know how much you’re missing out on watching our kids grow up and being able to spend time with your sisters.”

---

“Steve...” Bucky sighed and looked into Sarah May’s big brown eyes. She was trying her hardest to get her Papa’s fingers to her mouth so she could chew on them. “Most households have two working adults who both spend all their time at work and then come home in the evening to have maybe three or four hours with their kids before it’s time for bed. We are lucky enough to be able to give you time with our kids all day. And that makes me so happy. Because you wanted to be a stay-at-home dad and you are so good at it and I know our babies love that you are here for them.”

---

Steve sighed but nodded. “Alright...” he mumbled. “If you say so.” Steve knew they were lucky enough to not only have a stay-at-home parent, but a grandparent as well. “Look at her,” Steve said with a fond smile at their youngest daughter. “She’s growing so fast. I wonder if the orphanage has any baby pictures of Adriana.”

---

“We can always ask,” Bucky said and let Sarah May flop against his chest and grab at his hair. “Ya-Ya, you’re being pretty clingy today. Is something wrong, Sweet Pea?” he asked and looked from her to Steve. “Or did you just get tired of being with your brother for so long?”

---

“Papa,” Sarah May responded with a big old smile.

Steve said, “I think she’s glad to be getting some attention. Maybe she’s finally realized what she’s got to do to get you all to herself.” He chuckled.
Bucky nodded and gave his daughter several kisses all over her face so she was giggling wildly. “I guess that’s it. Just wanted some Papa time. When we have too many kids to count, we are going to have to make sure we spend time with each of them. Like take them to their favorite restaurant and out to the zoo or something just us and one of them at a time.”

“Oh no, spending more time with our kids? How ever will we manage?” Steve joked. “I love that idea. And maybe it’ll be nice to start doing that one on one, also. Kind of like you and your dad up in Seneca,” Steve suggested.

Bucky chuckled and pulled Steve in for a kiss. “I don’t think we can manage to have special trips for all the kids. We will really have no money around here.” He did want to take all his kids up to Seneca at times. But it would probably end up being more of a family trip. “I can’t wait to raise all these babies with you. I love the ones we have and I love being a father so much.”

“Ah, sorry, I didn’t mean a trip like that. I meant like you and your dad had something that you did together. Just like each of us can have our special days with our kids with just us. I can stay home with the rest while you go out with one and vice versa,” Steve explained. He smiled happily and leaned forward to kiss his husband. “You’re such a good father, too, Baby. I can’t believe how far we’ve come, Buck.”

“We have come a long way. And we’ve done so much and built this family together,” Bucky agreed. He brushed his fingers over Steve's jaw and smiled.

"And you’ve come farther than I have," Steve said. "I know I haven’t done as much for our family as you have... but I’m trying. I know it’s not the same as having a therapist, but I have been meeting with Sam to talk to him."

Bucky flitted his eyes between Steve and the wall a few times, just thinking. He wasn’t sure how he was supposed to respond because he didn’t want to say the wrong thing and upset Steve. And even though Bucky would much rather Steve talk to a therapist or even him than talk to Sam, at least it was someone. “Is it helping?”

"Not really," Steve sighed. "Cause I know it’s not enough," he admitted with a grimace. He didn't like having to say that but he wasn't going to lie to his husband and pretend that he was getting appropriate help.

Bucky nodded slowly and licked his lips in thought. “Do... do you still want that letter I wrote you?
Remember how you suggested I write it down because it might be better for you to read it instead of have me talk to you about it? I did write it. I just didn’t give it to you because the last time we breached this subject we had a really, really bad fight so I put it away.”

---

Steve didn't look too sure that he wanted to know what Bucky wrote to him when they were upset with each other but he also had a duty to his husband and to the rest of their family to be the best version of himself. "Yeah," he answered in a somewhat defeated tone. "I don't exactly look forward to reading it, but I want to be better for you."

---

“Oh... uh,” Bucky started and looked away from Steve. “You really don’t have to read it. If it’s just going to make things worse... just...” he sighed and reached a hand up to touch Steve’s face again gently. He just wanted him to feel better. He wanted him to be happy. He wanted him to be able to talk about what happened and talk about his disability. He didn’t want their kids asking Daddy why he couldn’t breathe only to get snapped at like he did to everyone else. He wanted him to be able to cope with this.

---

Steve was conflicted. On one hand, he wanted to give Bucky what he was looking for and on the other, he didn't want to touch the issue with a ten-foot pole. "Can you give me the letter when I have time to be alone?” he asked. He figured it'd be better if Bucky was out with the kids or something so Steve could process it on his own time.

---

“How about I just give it to you now and then you can read it whenever you decide to... or not read it,” Bucky offered. “Your choice.” Bucky was a little exasperated with the whole thing already. He just got tired of having this conversation over and over. “You know it’s important for us to talk to each other about anything. And even though this isn’t one of our favorite topics, it’s still good that we are talking.”

---

Steve could tell he was wearing down Bucky's patience a little. "Sorry," he apologized again anyway. "How about you have a nap and I can make us dinner?" he suggested.

---

“If you want some time alone from me, you can ask,” Bucky mumbled quietly. "I can help with dinner if you want. But I can also go take a nap if it's better that you're alone for a bit."

---

Steve had assumed that Bucky was the one who would've wanted some space. He pulled Bucky into a tight hug and he kissed his temple gently. "I didn't mean it that way, Buck," he explained. "I always want to spend time with you."

---

Bucky wrapped his arms around Steve and rested his head on his shoulders. He just got pretty worn out easily. He had a lot going on and he never really stopped and he never really spent any time just to himself to think. Maybe he should spend some time alone. “I just want you to be happy again.”

---

"You make me happy," Steve said. "So does my family. We have a new daughter we get to love and share our lives with. Our whole family is healthy... that's worth being happy for," Steve answered. "I need to remind myself to count my blessings."

---

“Mhmm,” Bucky hummed and looked up at Steve with watery eyes. He took in a deep breath and added, “I know, but it just seems like you’re only temporarily happy. Like you’re just waiting for the moment you feel bad again and the times in between are just like... filler.” He shook his head and got up. “I just want you to be okay again. And I want you to be confident in yourself. And I want you to know that you’re as beautiful as the day I met you and I love you more and more every single moment. And I just worry about you.”

---

It hurt to hear that - that his happiness with taking care of his family was just 'filler'. He knew Bucky was trying to make things better and strengthen their relationship but it didn't make Steve feel immediately any better. "I know, Buck," he sighed. "I love you."

---

Bucky nodded and passed Sarah May to him. "I'll be right back." He went upstairs and rummaged in his things for the letter and finally pulled out an envelope with Steve’s name on it. Bucky came back down and gently held the letter out to him. “Here.” He wasn’t sure if Steve was ever going to read it. But at least now he had it. “Come wake me up when dinner is done.”
The next few days went pretty well. The house was a little hectic as they all got used to another person and Bucky and Steve realized all the things they didn't think about buying before having a new four-year-old around. There were a couple late night runs to the store to get something Adriana needed that they hadn't accounted for. But today was quieter. It was a Saturday and the girls were out with Sarah seeing a movie. Adriana and Christopher were both down for naps and Sarah May was the last to get sleepy.

Steve focused on Sarah May and he stroked her curly hair gently. “You want to have a snack and go nap time, Baby Girl? We can get you in your jammies and everything.”

---

Bucky gasped excitedly and looked to his daughter. “Oh, Ya-Ya, doesn’t that sound great. You want a snack? Snacks and sleepy times?” he asked and brushed her hair back from her eyes. It was really growing in and curling all around her face. Bucky was trying his best to slowly learn some Jewish words and prayers and things. He wanted to be able to teach her so much about her culture. Just anything he possibly could.

---

Sarah May smiled and kicked her legs out excitedly at the tone that Bucky was using on her. “I’ll get her some applesauce,” Steve said, standing up to get some food for their daughter.

“Papa,” she said to Bucky before waving her hand over at Steve as he walked away.

---

“What, Sweet Pea, you want Daddy? He’s getting you a snack. But he can hold you while you eat it.” Bucky nuzzled his nose on her cheek and then gave her a big kiss to get a laugh out of her.

“You’re my sweet precious baby girl. Yes, you are! And I love you. And Daddy loves you. And Nana and Lilly and Becs and your siblings love you.”

---

Steve came back with a jar of applesauce and a spoon for his daughter. “Look at what a happy girl you are!” he exclaimed softly. “Are you going to eat your snack up? You’re growing to be so big and strong.” He got a spoonful and held it to her lips.

---

Sarah May opened her mouth for the spoon and then pouted her lip out. She whined and reached out for Steve, wanting to be held by him now. “Dada, mmm,” she whined and made grabby hands for him.

---

“Oh? You like your dada more right now?” Steve passed Bucky the spoon for a moment so he could take their daughter. He held Sarah May in his arm and used his free hand to feed her. “It’s amazing to hear her talking to us now.”
“She’s a little more mumbling than Christopher. Did you notice? She sort of sounds like she isn’t sure that anything she is saying is actually correct,” Bucky observed and held one of Sarah May’s hands as she focused on the spoon.

---

“Maybe she’s more careful. Christopher kind of runs into things without much self-consciousness. You think she isn’t sure whether she should copy our talking or her brother’s?” Steve gave her another spoonful and caught some before it fell off her lip.

---

“Maybe,” Bucky mused and watched her closely as if he could figure it out somehow. “I mean, it could be as simple as it just being the way she talks. Maybe she is just mumble-y.” He kissed her hand and then let it go so he could get her some juice. “I do know that she isn’t picking up on sign language very well.”

---

“Or she’s picking up everything as fast as any normal baby but we’re comparing her to Christopher, who picks things up faster than average,” Steve suggested. Which could be entirely possible. Christopher spoiled them in that aspect.

---

Bucky nodded and handed Sarah May her sippy cup of orange juice. “That’s true. He is very quick. My guess is he is going to be very academic like Becca. Like by the time he is seven he will have surpassed all my knowledge of anything.”

---

Steve helped Sarah May drink from her cup and once she was done, he set it on the table. He cradled her and rubbed her back to help burp her. “Give yourself some credit. I think he will be eight when that happens,” he teased.

---

“Okay, eight,” Bucky corrected. He kissed Steve’s forehead and then Sarah May’s. After the applesauce was all gone, they went upstairs to put their daughter down for a nap.

---

“Look, she’s already nodding off. I love it when our babies are like clockwork sometimes,” Steve said as he lowered her into the crib and made sure the corners were tugged down.

---

“Just got to give her some food and she’s ready to sleep for hours,” Bucky whispered and brushed Sarah May’s hair back from her face. “And lucky for us, she likes to eat.” He smiled down at her and watched her eyes open less and less frequently until they stopped opening back up altogether. “There we go, my sweet girl.”

---

“Christopher likes to eat but he doesn’t sleep like she does after,” he sighed. He stood there watching her for a little while, simply marveling in how perfect she was. He finally tore himself away so he could lead Bucky silently to their bedroom.

---

Bucky followed Steve into the bedroom and closed the door behind them. Now that all the kids were napping, they had the house to themselves for a bit and it was peaceful and quiet and cozy. Once the lights were off except for one of their lamps, Bucky took over. He pulled Steve down on the bed and immediately went for his pants to gingerly unbutton them.

---

Steve grinned brightly when Bucky got right to business. They needed to take opportunities like this lately otherwise they would never have any time alone. He was quick to pull Bucky’s shirt off so he could touch his bare chest and shoulders. “Looking good as ever,” he purred. He gave Bucky’s hair a gentle tug. “How are you looking to do this today, Beautiful?”

---

Bucky hummed happily and shed Steve’s pants and underwear off all the way before getting his shirt off as well. He took a few long moments just to stare at Steve’s body and slide his hands up his thighs and sides to rest under his arms. “I want to be inside you. I want to see this gorgeous body of yours on top of me as you ride me. I want to see the blaze in your eyes and your hard cock ready for attention.” He sighed happily at the thought and let his eyes close for a moment. “If you want that too, Babe.”

---

Steve groaned and blushed a bit as Bucky slid his hands up his bare legs. “Do you want me to give you a show?” he asked. “Make you watch me as I open myself up for you?” He loved how Bucky was looking at him and he wanted to do everything he could to keep Bucky’s undivided attention.

---

Bucky nodded quickly and gasped. “Ye-Yeah, yes. I want that if you want that,” he said and touched over Steve’s nipples and then down to his abs. They didn’t usually do things that way. Steve didn’t like Bucky opening himself up and he usually didn’t want to do it to himself either. But Bucky wanted to see him touching himself so badly.

---

Steve typically preferred working each other open but today he was desperate to make Bucky look at him like he couldn’t stand to wait a second longer to be inside of him. He spread his legs open and shivered at the way Bucky touched him. “Get the lube for me,” he said breathlessly. “And I’ll give you something worth watching.”

---

“Baby, you’re worth watching right now,” Bucky said as he dug in his nightstand for the lube. He misplaced his reading glasses months ago but at least he always knew where he kept lube. “You’re just the most handsome, sexy, beautiful man I’ve ever laid eyes on. Or even imagined. You’re my everything.”

---
Steve blushed at the compliments as he uncapped the bottle. “And you’re my everything. And our kids’ everything,” Steve responded. He spread the lube over his fingers and shifted higher on the bed. Arching his back, he lifted his hips off of the bed to give Bucky a good view of him as he pushed a finger inside. His dick was hard and laying over his stomach. “It takes all my willpower not to touch myself when I'm home alone and I miss you and the babies are asleep and I have nothing else to do.”

---

Bucky whimpered and felt a rush go down his spine and to his cock. “You know I don’t mind if you do,” he whispered and gently touched Steve’s calf as he watched him intently. “You can just tell me all about it when I’m home. Or even take some pictures to show me.”

---

“It’s worth the wait when you come home and I have you touch me once we get to bed,” Steve answered. “Nothing I do to myself can compare to what you do to me.” Steve closed his eyes and let out a steady breath as he pushed a second finger inside of himself.

---

Bucky almost reached out to add his own fingers to Steve’s hole but he held himself back. “Baby, do you know how indescribable you look right now? Just absolutely perfect. I want to take you and claim you and mark up your body.”

---

Steve looked over at Bucky, smiling when he saw the way that his husband was looking at him. “Soon,” he promised. “All I can think of is how good you’re going to feel when you’re inside me. I love it when it’s like we’re one,” Steve said.

---

“Uh-huh,” Bucky said and let his hand slip up Steve’s leg a little more. Steve was propped up on the pillows and Bucky was just sitting in front of him watching. It felt so strange - like they were nervous high schoolers trying to figure out how to do this together. But it also was so hot to see Steve with his fingers inside himself, eyes half-closed and cock bright red for him. This wasn't a sight Bucky got very often – only a handful of times in their relationship.

---

Steve worked a third finger inside of himself and by that point he wanted nothing more than his husband inside of him right that moment. He pulled his fingers out and gave Bucky his best bedroom eyes. “Feel how ready I am for you, Baby,” he said low in his throat, guiding Bucky’s fingers to his hole. “I’m ready for you, Buck.”

---

Bucky pressed his fingers inside of Steve and groaned a little too loudly at the feeling. He pulled them out again and nodded eagerly. “I want you to ride me. Do you want to ride me?” He laid down on his back and pulled Steve towards him gently but purposefully because he couldn’t wait anymore.

---

Steve wasted no time once Bucky laid down. He grabbed Bucky’s cock, lubing it up and holding it steady as he sank down on top of it. Steve threw his head back and his mouth opened in a silent yelp, managing to cut off the sound and not raise suspicion. “Fuck,” he swore, circling his hips once Bucky was balls deep inside of him. “I fucking love you, Bucky Barnes.”

---

Bucky gasped too and let his hands quickly reach out to grab Steve’s hips. “Rogers-Barnes,” Bucky corrected him softly and stared up at Steve sitting so beautifully on his dick. He loved getting to see him like this and watch his cock disappear in his ass over and over. It was one of his favorite things. He loved being inside his husband so much.

---

“Rogers-Barnes,” he repeated with a dopey smile. He rocked his hip steadily, drawing out each movement as much as he could and not lifting up so much that he never had less than half of Bucky’s dick inside of him at any given time. He placed his hands on Bucky’s chest to brace himself and he rubbed his thumbs slowly over his husband’s nipples. “You look so good, Love, I wish I could record you right now.”

---

Bucky shook his head and massaged his hands over Steve’s thighs. “I was just thinking the same thing about you, Steve. Thinking about how we could get a home video camera and we could make a tape of us together. And hide it away so no one found it but we could watch it sometimes when we are feeling just a little extra kinky that day.”

---

“Yes,” Steve said breathlessly, eagerly. “Please, can we do that? I want to make a tape just for you. Something you can watch if I’m ever away for some reason or if you go on a trip and I got to stay home with the kids.” He paused and let out a low moan when Bucky’s dick hit him at just the right angle. "I'll never get tired of this."

---

Bucky chuckled deep and fucked up into Steve as he bounced on him a little slower now like he was savoring his time. “Of course, we can do that. Although, I don’t know of any occasion where either of us will ever be away. Unless you’re planning a career as a traveling salesman.”

---

Steve threw his head back with a soft cry as Bucky rolled his hips up into him. “I'll be a traveling nanny,” he joked. He rocked his hips desperately, picking up the pace once again, wanting every inch that Bucky had to give him. His muscles clamped down around Bucky’s cock and Steve loved the feeling of being stretched by his husband.

---

Bucky grunted and bit his lip, eyes closing for a few seconds before springing back open because he wanted to see his husband. “Yeah, you’d never leave our babies to go feed someone else’s baby.”

---

Steve guided one of Bucky’s hands to his dick to try and encourage Bucky to keep touching him. “You’re right. I wouldn’t,” he gasped out. “Still want to record that tape, though. It’ll be hot.”
Steve’s hips moved faster, making the bed creak and groan. He was grateful their walls were thick enough that it was hard to hear any noise coming from their room. They still tried to be pretty quiet just in case, but it took a bit more for any significant sound to get out. They learned that after they had a shouting argument a few months into living in the house and Becca came to inform them it was definitely audible.

---

Bucky nodded and gripped Steve’s cock tightly as he pumped him. “Yeah, Yeah, let’s do that,” he said quickly before sitting up a little and wrapping his arm around Steve. “I’m gonna flip us,” he warned and then tossed Steve back firmly so he was on his back. He wasted no time in pounding into Steve’s ass as hard as he could and jerking him just as quick. “I’m close, Babe. You close?”

---

Out of habit, Steve covered his mouth with his hand to muffle the noises he was making when Bucky pounded into his ass. “Ooh, Buck!” he cried, body arching off the bed again. Steve buried his face into the side of Bucky’s neck and bit at it. “I’m so close, Bucky, I’m gonna-” before he could finish his sentence his orgasm crashed over him. He came hard over Bucky’s hand and stomach, breathing heavily. His own hands gripped at Bucky’s shoulders; nails digging into his skin lightly.

---

Bucky brought his come-covered hand to Steve’s mouth and slipped two fingers over his lower lip, waiting for him to suck it clean. He was still going strong for another long couple minutes until he was finally pressing up into Steve as deep as he could get and coming in quick hot bursts until he was finished. He held Steve for a few seconds just like that and then let himself gingerly collapse on top of him with his cock still inside.

---

Steve tilted his head back as he felt Bucky fill him with his cum. Steve needed a minute to catch his breath but, once he did, he had a dopey smile on his face. “I love you,” he giggled as he pet his back. “Always just as magical as our first time.”

---

“I love you, too,” Bucky breathed out and gave Steve a wet kiss. “You’re so sexy, Baby. You get me going with just a look. You’re just as cute when you come as you were that first time too. The little surprise in your eyes and your scrunched eyebrows like you couldn’t believe you just had sex.”

---

Steve laughed and swatted Bucky’s arm lightly. “I was an innocent, catholic virgin when I met you. I was a standup, straight cop and then you converted me,” Steve teased. “How could you?” He kissed Bucky’s face all over.

---

“Oh, Stevie... the way you looked at me when we first met... there was nothing straight about you,” Bucky protested back and held Steve’s face in his hands so he could kiss him some more. He knew he was going to have to pull out and clean them both up eventually but he just wanted to stay put for as long as possible. They probably had another twenty minutes before one of the kids woke up.

---
Steve laughed. “I guess I couldn’t help it. Nothing gets me like long-haired hippies with lost sisters,” he said. He lazily kissed his husband and let out a happy sigh. “So much has happened since then.”

---

“Well, I’m still a long-haired hippie. A lot has changed but that still stays the same,” Bucky said and brushed Steve’s hair back from his eyes. "And you're still the love of my life, Steve Rogers-Barnes."
Adriana was settling in pretty damned well to her new home. As expected, she did need more attention than the average kid but Steve was happy to give it. Today, Steve had been due to take the kids to the pediatrician for their checkups but when he was about to leave, he got a call from a hospital in Jersey. His mom had been involved in a fender bender and although she was in good health, she had been too shaken to drive and had a concussion, so Steve had to make the trip with all three kids to go to the hospital to pick up his mom. It took longer than Steve hoped for and his stomach sank when he realized the time. He got to a pay phone and dialed home.

---

Bucky answered the phone. He was nervous as all hell because, in about a half hour, he was supposed to be at the doctor’s for his first spinal injection for his headaches. He had just gotten home from work and he expected Steve and the kids to be back from their appointments but he was greeted by Lilly and Becca doing homework at the kitchen table alone. When Bucky heard Steve’s voice through the phone, a little bit of his worry melted off of him. “Baby, where are you? I thought you all would be home by now. And I thought your mom would be home from visiting Ruth but she’s not here either.”

---

Steve felt awful. "I'm in New Jersey right now, Buck, I'm so sorry," he said. "Mom got in a little car accident... she's okay, but she can't drive home. I missed the kids' doctor's appointment so I could pick her up." He took a deep breath. "I want to be there for you so bad. I didn't realize how long it would take to get here."

---

“What? Wait...” Bucky mumbled and looked to the girls to see if they had any idea of what was going on. “Wait a second, what happened to your mom? You’re sure she’s okay?” he asked and saw Becca shake her head, she had no idea about this. “I can reschedule the kids’ appointments so don’t worry about that. Um, and I can just call and cancel my appointment today. Is everyone okay? Your mom, the kids? Are you okay, Baby?”

---

"She got a concussion," Steve said. "Not a bad one, but she feels too dizzy to drive. Someone rear-ended her on the turnpike and then her car bumped into the one ahead." Steve glanced over his shoulder to check on his family. Luckily the kids were behaving. "The kids are surprisingly good right now. If you want to reschedule yourself, I understand...but are Becca or Lilly there? Maybe they could go with you this one time. I swear I'll be at the next one."
“No, no,” Bucky said hurriedly into the phone and shook his head. “No, Steve, I can’t do this without you here. I can’t go. I’m scared enough as it is. You were going to have to drag me into that exam room.” He paused and looked at the time. “There’s no way you’ll be back in time?” he asked, already knowing that Steve was too far away to make it home in time.

"Baby, you’re stronger than you think. I’m so sorry this happened. Maybe you can call the doctor and see if we can push it back an hour. I can leave right now and come back home as best I can, but I know I won't make it there as it is right now," Steve said apologetically.

Bucky sighed and rubbed at his already pounding head. “Okay, I’ll see what I can do,” he said and then gave his goodbye to Steve so he could call the doctor. As it turned out, the doctor was full up all day and the next available reschedule was for four months out. Bucky just couldn’t wait four more months. “It looks like I have to go now. But I cannot go alone. Can one of you please come with me?” Bucky asked and squatted down next to his sisters at the table to beg a little bit.

"I’ll go," Becca said immediately. "Lilly, you should stay home in case something happens. Who knows when Steve and Sarah are getting back." She looked over to Bucky. "Why isn’t he here? He knew how important this was.”

Bucky sighed and pulled Becca in for a quick hug and a kiss to the top of her head. “He would have been here but Sarah got in a car accident. He is in New Jersey with her and the kids. She’s fine - just a little concussion. I’m sure they’ll be back soon. But I have to be at the doctor’s even sooner.”

Becca still seemed annoyed that Steve wasn’t around for her brother but as far as excuses went, she supposed that was the most forgivable. "Looks like it's going to be a sibling day," she said, putting on a tiny smile for her brother - she knew how nervous he was. "Let's get this show on the road.”

Bucky was still terrified of going through with this but he was beyond grateful to his little sister for being willing to help him and be his support. “I love you. You know that?” he asked, looking at Becca intently and then giving her another quick hug. He also gave Lilly a goodbye hug and told her to be good.

Becca allowed the hug but then squirmed after a few moments. Although, she did reach out and squeeze his hand as they walked out the door. "If it makes you feel any better, imagine Steve trying to handle two babies and a four-year-old on the train by himself today," she joked.

Bucky chuckled and shook his head. “No, it just makes me wish I was there to help.” He sighed and tucked his hair behind his ears. “I hope they are all okay. I don’t like the thought of Steve having to watch all three kids and his mother all alone when I can’t easily get to him. He still won’t listen to me about learning the boundaries that his disability puts on him. I just don’t want him to push himself when he has three kids to keep track of and wind up in a bad situation or in more pain. You remember when Christopher ran off into the woods in Seneca. Steve’s body wouldn’t let him keep up at all. And this city is so busy all the time. I just worry about him.”

---

Becca had a guilty look on her face when Bucky brought up Seneca because that had been her fault – or, at least, she felt like it was. ”I like Steve and all. But you're doing a lot for him but he's not doing a lot for you,” she complained. "He's getting everything he wants. I mean, sure, he stayed by you when you weren't at your best. But now what?"

---

“Becca...” Bucky said in a light chastisement. But he honestly couldn’t tell her she was wrong. He felt similarly. Of course, this feeling was combated by his desire for Steve to have everything he wanted and to be able to do what would make him happy. But that tended to mean a lot of sacrifices on Bucky’s end. “He’s just been really upset this year. You know? I mean, this time last year he was just being let go from the force because of his injury. And then we lost Grant. Steve lost his job - a job he loved - and part of his physical health and then a child all in a few weeks time. He’s... recovering.”

---

"Recovering for a whole year?" Becca asked with a look. "Grant... Grant, I understand. But it's not like he lost his legs or whatever. He was talking about quitting being a cop so I don't get why he's being a big baby over getting let go and getting paid for it still," she said. Becca was a bit ruthless about this now.

---

"I know. I know it seems like he would be fine since he was eventually going to leave to be a stay-at-home dad. But I think the problem is that the choice was made for him,” Bucky said as they turned the corner. “And not being able to breathe... that’s got to be beyond aggravating and discouraging.” Bucky felt like he was just saying all the things to Becca that he told himself every time he started to feel like the balance between him and Steve was becoming unfair to him. After a while, the words and reasons just started sounding more like noise to him.

---

"Still. You had problems and you went to therapy to fix them. What's he done? If he takes care of it now, the kids won't even know what happened. If he doesn't do anything then they'll learn eventually that something’s wrong," she said. Becca sighed.

---

“I didn’t do therapy. I did AA,” Bucky corrected, although therapy was a large part of meetings anyway. “And, there is always compromising in a marriage. But, I know what you mean about the kids. I was thinking about that the other day. Steve snaps at me and gets angry whenever I bring up his disability. Even if it’s to make sure he is okay. He hates it. I can see in his eyes how much he wishes I would shut up about the whole thing. I don’t know what I will do if I ever see him give one of our babies that look because they ask their Daddy why he’s not breathing right.”
"Steve waits until he has to change something before he does anything. It's never preventative, you know?" she answered. "If he doesn't do it for you, he's totally going to do nothing until one of the babies are hurt over it. It's a health hazard, too. If they don't know what's wrong and how to help him, he's going to push himself to a breaking point."

Bucky knew Becca was right. This whole thing with Steve was just going to get much worse before it got better at all. “You know... I was about to go back to school before we got Christopher. I’m not saying that I regret any of my babies. It’s just that Steve didn’t even ask me about school when we were discussing him being at home after he was discharged from the force. He used to love telling me how good I would do in school. And now it’s just off the table.”

"You should still go back to school," Becca said. "You're going to want more kids and you've said you're going to take a break now that there's Adriana. Soon would be the best time. You have Steve here, Sarah here, and me and Lilly," she reasoned. "You've got I'm a lot of people around to help."

“I know there’s a lot of people to help but the issue is money,” Bucky sighed. “College costs a lot and if I’m in classes all the time then I won’t be able to work and bring home money to take care of all of you. Besides Steve’s settlement and disability checks, I’m the sole wage earner for the house again and now I have eight people in total to care for and two animals.”

"That money that Steve gets still is a lot. Doesn't he get like... most of his police pay? And that settlement pay was so much. I couldn't believe it," she said. "I'm taking a finance class in school. Maybe I can have a look at your expenses and we can create a budget for you to save some more money so you don't have to work as much."

Bucky glanced at his sister in surprise. He wouldn’t have imagined that his little sister would be helping establish a budget around the house. “Most of the money Steve gets goes to the shelter and the rest into a savings fund. It’s for medical expenses, college tuition for you and Lilly and the babies, home improvement expenses, things like that.”

"Lilly's not going to college. You may as well put that money towards yourself," Becca said. "No offense to her. But I mean, she hates school. She probably will hate having a job, too, but at least you're not paying for her to hate something," she reasoned.

“That’s not the point,” Bucky said softly. “I want you all to have the opportunity to go to school if you choose to. That includes Lilly. I want her to have the option to decide later down the road if she changes her mind. I don’t want her to tell me in a few years that she wants to go to college and I have to tell her that I spent it on something else.”
"Still. Lilly and I will be adults by the time we graduate high school. We should work to get our tuition covered instead of relying on you. I plan on paying rent as soon as I'm 18 and working," she said in a matter-of-fact tone. "Lilly should do her part, too."

“That's not really the point either. I want you to be able to have me as your support system including financial help until you are sure you are ready.” He shook his head and pointed to a building a couple blocks down, indicating where they were headed. “Back to what we were saying before, the point is that I try to give and sacrifice and compromise all the time. And I feel like Steve isn’t always the same.”

Becca headed in the direction of the clinic. "Maybe you should try to put your foot down a little?" she said. "Lilly and I don't always listen but when you get mad and lay down the law, we make sure we do it." But, they were also kids and not Bucky’s husband.

“I’m not going to put my foot down with my husband,” Bucky said sadly and rubbed his face with his hands. “And I know he’s still so upset about a lot of things and especially his lungs. And I just think he should go try to talk to someone for help who isn’t Sam. Even if he doesn’t want to talk about his injury, maybe he can talk to a grief counselor about Grant and then get comfortable with the idea of therapy and then try to open up about what happened with his lungs.”

Becca walked into the office building and held the door open for her brother. "I hope he changes his mind about things. You’ve done too much for him to not do anything to be better," she said. "Maybe you can guilt him a little with the whole ‘missing your appointment’ thing."

Bucky hesitated for a second outside the office, seeming to remember why they had walked all this way. He took a deep breath and led them into the office and waited for Becca to be back at his side. “He had to go help his mom. It's a valid reason for not being here. I just got to keep trying my best to get through to him. He loves us all too much to risk losing us. And I think once he realizes how much this hurts and how much I just want to see him happy, he will at least give it a try.”

Becca kept close to her brother, knowing how much he needed her by his side today. She gave his hand a squeeze and decided to let the conversation drop since she doubted that her brother wanted to talk much more about his husband like this. "So, uh, should I be doing anything else besides stay here with you?"

“Not sure,” Bucky mumbled and went to check in with the receptionist for his appointment. “I think just helping me stay grounded," Bucky added and found two seats for them to wait at. There was no one else in the lobby so he figured they wouldn’t have to sit there for long. “Talk me down when I start to freak out and say that I can’t do this.”
"I can do that," she said. They barely sat down before a doctor came into the waiting room.

"Mr. Barnes?" Bucky was one of the last appointments of the day and the doctor must have been antsy to go home.

"Yeah, yes, Sir," Bucky said nervously and stood up. He hesitated again for a little longer and had to force his feet to just move to the door. He had to do this. And he was going to have to get used to it really fast since these injections were supposed to happen every couple of months for him. He just needed to get past this first one. "I’m so scared," he whispered to Becca as they followed the doctor back to an exam room.

"You can do this," she reassured. "Remember who you're doing this for. You won't miss out playing with Christopher and Sarah May and Adriana because of your headaches," she reminded.

They got inside and the doctor looked over at Becca, not expecting to have an audience. "Is she immediate family?" he asked.

Bucky nodded and pulled Becca a little closer like he was afraid the doctor would take her away. "My baby sister. She’s here to help me. I’m pretty nervous and I need her support.” He looked from the doctor to Becca. “I know it’s supposed to hurt a lot and I just don’t do well with medical things at all really.”

The doctor wasn't entirely approving of it but he, at least, wasn't a jerk about it either. "Alright," he said. "But I need her to keep out of my way. It can be a frightening sight to see and it would do more harm than help if she tried to stop the procedure while I was in the middle of it," he explained.

"Uh-huh," Bucky muttered, eyes wide and face going a little too pale. The doctor’s comments weren’t helping him feel any better about this whole thing. And he was worried that he was going to chicken out or the doctor would talk about him being too much of a wimp or something. And he just wished Steve was there. He was grateful beyond belief to have Becca but he also knew that Steve was good with doctors and Steve always knew what to say.

The doctor went through his usual procedure making sure that Bucky was in good health and ate a good meal today. Once the basics were done, he made a broad gesture with his hand. "I am going to ask you to remove your shirt, Mr. Barnes. I will first give you a very, very low dose of an oral painkiller to help ease you. Then I will apply a local anesthetic before starting the injection."

Bucky’s leg started to shake and he looked to Becca quickly and just stared at her for a second. This was getting real. He was down to the very last wire. He sniffled and slipped his shirt off, handing it to Becca before taking her hand in his and gripping it tightly. He looked down at the tattoo of the wedding dates and told himself he was doing this for Steve and because his mother never knew how to help her own headaches. He also looked at the names of his children over his heart. He had just recently added Adriana. They had decided to make her middle name ‘Winnifred’ after his mother so her name was now scrawled underneath Sarah May’s with a red glow around it since it was still healing.

---

The doctor gave Bucky a pill and some water before setting up the table. It didn't look very comfortable. It was just a hard mat with paper stretched over it and the thinnest of pillows over it. "The actual injection itself won't take more than a few moments. But, there is a process before the steroid to remove any fluid pressure around the base of the skull," he explained. "But, it'll be over before you know it." His bedside manner wasn't the best, but it was to the point.

---

Bucky didn’t respond. He just kept his eyes locked to Becca’s and tried his best to keep from crying in front of this doctor. Becca knew Bucky was just getting more worked up so she draped his shirt over his shoulder and took his other hand in hers and held them both together. “Over before you know it,” she repeated. “Then we can go home and I’ll make you some tea.”

---

"I know it may seem like a scary thing, but I'm sure you've had plenty of other pains worse than this. You survived those ones just like you will with this one," the doctor said and circled behind them to rub a cold gel over Bucky's neck. He had to move his hair out of the way and even took a small shaver and removed just a tiny square of Bucky’s hair under his skull where the needle needed to go. "So, are those your kids' names? On that tattoo, there?"

---

Bucky gasped when the doctor was behind him. He couldn't help that his breathing picked up and his palms started to get sweaty. He wanted to burst into tears when he felt a small patch of his hair being shaved away. But he was grateful for the welcome distraction to talk about his kids. “Yes, those are my kids’ names. We just adopted our fourth.” He took a few quick breaths and blinked away tears forming on his eyelids. Becca squeezed his hand tighter.

---

"A fourth? No wonder you have headaches," he joked. He seemed to be taking pity on Bucky after seeing how worked up he was getting over all this. "I have two at home. My wife deals with them more than I do and sometimes I want to shove them back where they came from."

---

Bucky wasn’t sure how he was supposed to respond. He loved his children with all his heart. He would never wish that he didn’t have them. But he didn’t want to say anything to the doctor because he didn’t want him to get upset and hurt him. “I work a lot so I’m not with my kids as much as I would like to be. I know raising children is so tough on the stay-at-home parents, though.” He thought that was neutral enough.

---

"Well, it’s better that way. Us men are meant to take in the money and the women’s work is at home." Becca's head snapped over at the doctor and she glared like she wanted to tell him off but was holding back for Bucky's sake. "We fund the future of America and our wives raise them," he chuckled. "Close your eyes. You probably don't want to see the needle."

---

“Okay...” Bucky muttered nervously and squeezed his eyes shut. He gripped Becca's hands as tight as he could without hurting her. He didn't agree with this doctor at all on his views of women and parenthood but he wasn't going to argue with a man who was about to shove a very large needle into the top of his spine.

---

The doctor gave Bucky a small warning that he was going to start removing the fluid pressure before slowly pushing the needle inside. It was important to get anything out that wasn't supposed to be there before injecting the steroid.

---

When the needle entered his skin and he could feel it right on the base of his skull, Bucky squeaked and snapped his eyes open. He made sure not to scream or move but he wasn't able to stop any of the tears that cascaded down his face immediately. Even with whatever pain medicine or numbing stuff or whatever it was the doctor gave him, it still hurt like crazy and it was uncomfortable and it was scary. But in a long two minutes, it was finally over and the doctor was pulling the needle out and then Bucky was pulling Becca to his chest so he could hold her and bury his face in her shoulder.

---

Becca immediately hugged her brother close. The doctor wiped up his neck and cleaned the gel away before placing a large bandage over it. He disposed of the needle and patted his shoulder. "Hey, it's all done now. That wasn't so bad, was it?"

---

Bucky just held himself to his sister and cried and worked on calming his breathing down. He didn't know if he could do this every few months. This was incredibly stressful to him and the thought of having to do it again was too much for him right now. He just wanted to go home. He gave himself another minute to calm down and then he took his shirt back from Becca and pulled it on, wiping his wet eyes on the sleeves.

---

The doctor just sighed, deciding that Bucky would simply come down eventually on his own. Once Bucky took his face out of his sister's shoulder, he gave him a paper to sign. "If you sign this and bring this to my secretary, she can approve you going back home," he said.

---

Bucky took the paper and signed it. He shook the doctor's hand and then led Becca back out to the lobby to talk to the secretary. He didn't schedule the next injection yet. If he could find a different doctor to do this, that might be better. He didn't want to have the same conversation with that man about his wife and kids. And Bucky wouldn't want to pretend to agree with him. "Let's go," he mumbled to Becca once they were all set.
As soon as they were out of the office, Becca practically exploded. "What a jerk! If he didn't have a needle going into your brain, I would've given him a piece of my mind. 'Womens’ work’, my ass. For all that education, he sure is a dumb loser," she said.

Bucky was still all worked up from being so afraid and he could feel his himself starting to let the adrenaline of the moment dissipate again. His body felt so weak. His mind was fuzzy. He wanted to tell Becca that he thought that doctor was a loser too but he couldn’t speak. He just had to find the nearest place to sit and plop himself down so he didn’t fall over or pass out.

"I don't know how you were able to stay quiet. Here you are, doing all this for your family and he was talking smack about his," she continued. Becca seemed to notice that Bucky was moments from giving out so she quickly led him over to a bench. "Do you need water or juice or something, Bucky?" she asked with a worried frown.

Bucky shook his head and looked down at his feet. “Don’t need anything. Just give me a minute.” Their place was really close but Bucky was considering hailing a cab to take them back just because he felt so incredibly fatigued all over. “I’m fine, Becs. I’m sorry. And I’m sorry that guy was such an ass. I would never feel that way about my family let alone talk about them that way. Especially about his wife. If that’s how he thinks of women then I’m surprised he managed to get one to marry him.”

Becca rubbed his back as she stood there next to him. "Don't be sorry. I know you'd never treat your family the way he does. You love your kids too much for that. Also, I'd beat you up if you ever were like that," she added with a little smirk. "With Lilly as backup."

“If I ever say anything about women or my family like that guy did, I give you permission to pummel me into next week,” Bucky said and worked on getting himself calmed down some more. After a bit, he felt better and was able to stand back up. “I want to be back home, let’s go.”

Becca took his hand again. "What if Christopher somehow becomes a jerk? Can I beat him up too?" She joked as they continued on back to their home. "Give him a good old one-two then tie him to a chair and read feminist books at him."

“My son won’t be a misogynist jerk. He’s being raised by Steve and me and he has his incredible aunts around to guide him,” Bucky said and kissed Becca’s head. “How’s the basement apartment been working out for you? I noticed you and Lilly like to hide out down there when things upstairs get hectic. I know things are a lot louder and messier now that it’s not the three of us.”
"I love it. It's like having my own place," she said. "Sometimes it's annoying when Lilly tries to make it her space but she's been following the rules I gave her about being in my room, so I don't mind all that much. And it's not like we don't like the babies. We will like them more when they don't shout and cry as much."

---

“Yes, well, does that surprise you? Lilly tends to take over everything,” Bucky said and leaned a little more on Becca because he was feeling tired again. “I know you both love the kids. I don’t doubt that. And they love you so much too. But it is a lot. There are a lot of them and they are pretty loud and upset sometimes - mostly Christopher. But they will mellow out. Lilly was the loudest baby I have ever met and even she calmed down as time went on.”

---

Becca snorted. "Lilly is still pretty loud. Not as loud as when she was a baby, but still very intense," she said. "Christopher follows me around everywhere. He won't stop trying to get me to play your guitar ever since he saw me try it once."

---

“It’s because he loves his Aunt Becca so much. He just wants to spend time with you,” Bucky said as they finally turned the corner to their street. “You used to follow me around everywhere. Of course, that might have been because I was the one who fed you the most.”

---

"I purposely don't feed him unless I have to for that reason. I used to be your little shadow,” she said with a smirk. "Whenever he's annoying me I tell him to go find the cat because I know Raphael can run away from him every time and Christopher can't keep up."

---

Bucky only ever had to feed Becca that much because their dad was at work a lot and their mom had bad days and then Bucky was in charge of watching the baby. “Becca, you send him on impossibly tasks? My poor Bean. He probably thinks you want him to bring the cat to you.”

---

"It's harmless. Christopher gets some exercise and Raphael has a little more excitement in his life," she said.

When they got back to the house, Steve still hadn't gotten back yet but Lilly waved a note in the air that she had written down. "Steve's cab is stuck in traffic. He had time to hop out and call before they moved any further. And Sarah is still too dizzy to walk any."

---

Bucky’s stress levels immediately skyrocketed when Lilly handed him the note. There was no way to contact Steve and no way of knowing where they were exactly or how long it was going to take until they got back. And Bucky wanted his husband and his babies safe at home. But he couldn't fix it. “I... I am so tired and in pain still. I’m going to go upstairs and lay down. Wake me up if Steve calls.”

---
The whole house was uncharacteristically silent until Steve came home an hour later with Christopher whining in his arms, Sarah May asleep in his mom's, and Adriana crying because she was hungry for her overdue dinner.

---

Bucky was still asleep upstairs, unaware that anyone was home. Becca jumped up from her homework and came over to take Christopher from Steve so he could take care of Adriana. “What took so long?” she asked and kissed her nephew a few times in hopes that he would stop his grunting and whining.

---

Steve picked up Adriana once Christopher was out of his arms. He apologized to her and promised she could have snacks before dinner tonight to hold her over. "There was another accident on the highway," he said. "It took forever I wish I still had my cruiser so I could've put on the lights and came right home. Where's Bucky? Is he okay?"

---

“Pretty sure you’re not supposed to use the lights for that kind of thing, Steve,” Becca mumbled quietly and handed Christopher part of an apple and offered the other part to Adriana.

Lilly spoke up then, “Bucky is upstairs. Has been since they got back. He looks like shit. He’s all pale and sweaty and tired.”

---

Steve went through the cabinets and started to get some mac and cheese ready. He preferred cooking better things but tonight he was more concerned with getting food on the table quickly. "Can you keep an eye on the macaroni until I get back down? I want to check on Bucky."

---

“No, Steve, just leave him. He’s asleep,” Becca said and set Christopher down next to Diana. “He’s really tired after the appointment. He was stressing out so much that his body just sort of gave out on him when we were done. He’s fine right now.”

---

That just made him want to see Bucky more. His husband was stressed and upset and he never slept well when he went to take a nap after being all worked up. But Steve just sighed and went back to stirring the pot. "Do you know anything about the letter Bucky wrote to me?” he asked.

---

Becca blinked and shook her head. She didn’t know of any letter in particular but she knew that, at one point, Bucky was working on a letter to Steve but she didn’t know what about. “I sort of know about a letter. Why?”

---

"No reason," he said. "Was just wondering what you knew about it, that's all. Did he give you any details?” Diana let out a soft whine when Christopher wouldn't stop tugging on her ears so Steve had to stop to pick him up to give his dog a break.
Diana immediately scampered off to go hide under the couch for some much-needed alone time. “All I know is that I saw him writing a letter one night at like three in the morning when I came up to the kitchen to get some water,” Becca informed.

Steve bounced Christopher on his hip until it was time to drain the pasta. At that point, Steve put him in his high chair so he wouldn’t get near the hot water. "Alright... thank you," he said, slightly disappointed that she didn't know more. He was hoping she could give some insight before he opened it. Maybe he should read that letter tonight. It had been weeks now since he had gotten it.

“Uh-huh,” Becca mumbled and took a snack with her and headed back down to her room, telling Lilly not to follow her. To which Lilly complained that she wanted to have her own basement room too. She would have grumped her way back up to her room but she really wanted some food.

Steve poured everyone a bowl of mac and cheese but wasn't in the mood to eat, so he spent the whole time feeding Christopher and the barely-awake Sarah May. "Did Bucky really look that bad?" he asked Lilly.

“Oh, yeah, pale and gross and his hair was matted down like he’s been messing with it. You know how he does that when he’s all anxious sometimes,” Lilly said as she shoveled food into her mouth. “He could like hardly stand too. Barely got in the door and had to go lay down.”

Steve grimaced. He sighed and stood up once he had both babies finished with their dinners. "Can you do me a favor and not push Becca's buttons tonight? I know you like going into her room but I need as peaceful of an evening as I can get." He was anxious to go see Bucky but he had to take care of their kids and check on his mom. After what felt like an eternity, he had their children in their beds to sleep and finally made it into their bedroom quietly.

Bucky was still asleep. His sleep was light and troubled and he was aware of someone coming into the room but he couldn’t pull himself back to consciousness yet. But he knew Steve was there now, safe and sound. And his whole being relaxed just a little more. His family was home. Steve and his babies were back. He could tell.

Steve carefully brushed the hair from Bucky's face and kissed his forehead gently. "I'm so sorry I wasn't there for you, Baby." He tucked him in and then went to the drawer to pull out the letter. Finally, he sat down at the desk in the corner so he could read it. It was about time that he started pulling his weight.
Bucky stirred slightly a few minutes later. But when he opened his eyes, he saw Steve off by himself finally reading his letter to him. Bucky kept his mouth shut, not wanting to interrupt him. So, he just closed his eyes again and snuggled further into his pillow. Hopefully, Steve would read it through all the way and Bucky’s attempt at explaining his concerns would make sense. He wasn’t the best writer.

---

Steve was quiet for a long time after reading the later. He sat there and reread it a few times, hoping to interpret it some other way or try and think of some other compromise. He put it away and laid back down in bed, so caught up in thought that he didn't even notice that Bucky was awake.

---

When Steve laid down next to him, Bucky let his eyes open back up and he looked up at his husband for a few seconds. Steve’s eyes were tired, frustrated. Maybe seeing everything written down that Bucky had been trying to tell him for so long was just too much. Having to look at it all at once must have been overwhelming. But Steve couldn’t yell at a letter and storm away. Steve had to read and listen and finish it. And he did. And that was at least step one completed. “Baby...” Bucky whispered to get his attention.

---

Steve didn't meet Bucky's gaze at first but he did look up when he talked to him. "I'm not going to snap at our kids," he said quietly but stubbornly. He didn't want to talk about the letter but he also didn't want to ignore his husband. "How are you feeling? Did the clinic go well?" he asked, reaching out for Bucky's hand.

---

Bucky let Steve take his hand but he didn’t respond to him. He was so incredibly tired. He had such a rough day and the first thing Steve said was fighting back about something Bucky voiced concern about in the letter. He knew he should answer him but he just felt this wild rush of anger come over him and he had to bury his face behind his arm because he didn’t want to look at Steve right now.

---

It stung when Bucky looked away. Steve had a shit day, too, although, it wasn't as emotionally taxing as Bucky's. The last thing he wanted was a fight. "Why would you think I would yell at our children over it? We fight, Buck, but we're adults." He found himself arguing anyway. "I'm willing to do something about it, Bucky, but I really don't think therapy is the right choice for me."

---

Bucky sighed dramatically and rolled to sit up. His head was swimming a little bit and he could feel the bandage on the back of his neck pulling at his hair that was still around the little spot. “My concern wasn’t that you would just yell at them. My concern is that they are going to realize something is wrong and then ask you about it and you’re going to snap at them like you do to the rest of us. And I don’t see what us being adults has to do with it. You snap at the girls when they show concern too and they aren’t adults yet either.”

---

"You guys know what's wrong with me. They don't. I won't snap at them for asking about what they don't understand," Steve said. He huffed and buried his face into the pillow like Bucky had. "I don't know what else to do, Bucky. There has to be another option other than therapy," he said. "You changed on your own terms. I'll have to, too."

---

Bucky shook his head and got up off the bed. He pulled his shirt off and tossed it into the hamper. He needed a shower. He felt so gross. "Okay, so what about when they are older. Maybe in a few years when Adriana is eight. And she knows then that you have a problem breathing. And she sees you pushing yourself too much and says, 'Daddy, you have to go easy on yourself.' If any one of us says something like that to you, you lose it. You yell about being capable or when we were at Seneca and you wanted to fight those guys and you got mad at me and accused me of acting like you were some weak faggot who couldn’t protect anyone anymore. What are you going to say to our babies, huh?" He paused to rip off the bandage from his neck, bringing some of his hair with it. "And, no, I didn’t really change on my own terms. I changed for my family and I did what you wanted me to do."

---

Steve clearly didn't want to hear what Bucky was telling him, which was a telltale sign for Steve knowing that Bucky had a point. "I shouldn't have to hear you guys telling me to take it easy," he said. "I don't get what's so hard about just letting me deal with it. Maybe if I keep pushing myself a little bit every day, it will get better. It's like a muscle. It'll get worse if you don't use it."

---

"No, Steve, no," Bucky said firmly and crossed his arms. "It’s not like a muscle that needs exercise or whatever. It’s an injury. An injury that will not heal. You know that. You were told that from the beginning. This lung capacity you have right now is the best it’s going to ever be." He hated himself for being so harsh with Steve right now but he was just so fucking tired of this. And he just had an appointment where a giant needle was stuck inside his spine to help with a chronic issue he had too. "And there are plenty of reasons why it’s important for us to not just ‘let you deal’ or whatever."

---

"The doctor could be wrong. There were doctors who said that I wouldn't survive when I was sick as a kid. And people didn't believe me when I said I was going to be a cop." Steve was grasping at straws here. "What if I go to physical therapy?" he asked. "That's a kind of therapy. If I can get better, I will. If I can’t get better, I'll at least know my limits under the supervision of a professional."

---

“Fine, whatever. Whatever, Steve, I don’t give a fuck,” Bucky said as he angrily kicked his pants off and hovered in the doorway to the bathroom. “I don’t see why it’s better for you to go to Sam instead of a real therapist. But when your family tries to show you that you have limits, you’re only going to listen to a physical therapist after a doctor has already told you what is wrong. Whatever, I’m done.” Bucky waved his hand dismissively. “I had a massive needle in my spine today that hurt really bad and my head still feels awful at the moment and I’m not in the mood for this again. I’m going to shower and then sleep. I’m done with today.”

---

Steve glared daggers at his husband. He angrily turned over and went to sleep, too stubborn to be awake to talk to Bucky. He was aware that Bucky made some valid points. And he was aware that he probably could have handled this way better, especially since he hadn’t been there for Bucky today and didn’t even check in on him about it before he went off about the letter. But he was mad and Bucky was mad and he didn’t want to handle it right now either.
The next few days were pretty tense. Steve and Bucky barely spoke outside of catching each other up on their days and anything that needed to be done for the house. Almost a week later, Bucky came home to Steve taking his jacket off as if he had just gotten back from somewhere, which wasn't his usual schedule at this time.

“Hey,” Bucky mumbled as he locked the door behind him. “AA was terrible today. We have this new guy in our group who-” he turned around then and saw Steve with his jacket partly off. “Oh, are you heading out somewhere?” He asked and gestured to the door. They had hardly talked since their fight and Bucky felt really bad about it. But every time he went to try to apologize, something inside him pulled back and told him to walk the other way. So, he always did. They hadn’t even given each other kisses but a handful of times in the past week and they were more like greeting and goodnight kisses.

“Um... no, I just got back,” he said. Steve hung up his jacket and pet Diana, who came running up to them with her tongue lolling out of the side of her mouth. “What did the new guy in AA do?” he asked. Steve was a little more open than the past few days so something must have happened.

“He just takes over every session and everything always has to be about him,” Bucky grumbled as he slipped off his shoes. “And he’s always got it worse. You know? Someone tries to explain that they had a relapse because their kid is sick in the hospital and then he has to interrupt with, ‘Oh, yeah, my last relapse was way worse. I just got fired and then my girl dumped me and I drank for like two days straight’. It’s just obnoxious.”

"He sounds like a pain in the ass," Steve said. "I guess it's something that he's going to AA, even if he isn't a pleasant person to be around. And it's not like you can turn someone away for being annoying." Christopher came running over to his parents and hugged his arms around Bucky's legs. Moments later, Sarah May could be seen slowly crawling over to them, making excited baby noises.

“Little Bean!” Bucky gasped and picked up his son. He gave him kisses and then noticed how the babies looked at them both like they had been gone for an eternity. “How long were you out? They look like they haven’t seen you all day. I just figured you went to the bodega for something real fast.”

"Papa!" Christopher squealed happily, giggling at the kisses. Steve picked up Sarah May and cuddled her to his chest. "About two and a half hours," he said. "My ma was keeping an eye on them. Adriana is still under the weather and she was sleeping when I left. She's probably still napping now."
“Oh, okay,” Bucky said. He sort of hoped that Steve would volunteer information as to where he had gone. But if he wasn’t saying, then maybe there was a reason he didn’t want to say. “I should go check on her so she knows we are home. I know she gets nervous if we are gone for too long.”

---

Steve nodded. "I'm going to make some chicken soup for her. She hasn't had much of an appetite today but she was a trooper about her preschool course today. She's finally starting to get a hang of writing her name out."

---

“Oh yeah?” Bucky asked with a pleased grin. “Did she finally stop putting a second ‘n’ in there?” Adriana said that she liked the little swoop up top on ‘n’s so sometimes she wrote out a couple extra just for fun. Lilly had also been trying to teach her how to best color in the lines but she really didn’t like that.

---

Steve nodded. "It was getting to the point where I was considering legally changing her name to have two n's," he joked. "But she's got it now."

"Papa," Christopher said, waving at the living room. "Play, Papa."

---

“Okay, yes, play time, Bean. Let me just check on your sister, okay?” Bucky asked and set him back down on the ground. “I’ll be right back, Christopher.” He squeezed Steve’s arm and pointed up the stairs. “I’ll be back. I just want to make sure she isn’t awake in bed and can’t yell for us or something.”

---

Christopher made pathetic, whining noises and sulked over to his dad to try and get him to play instead. "Go find the kitty-cat, Bean. Kitty-cat wants to play," he said, having taken Becca's idea with that one. Adriana, meanwhile, was upstairs in her bed playing groggly with her turtles.

---

Bucky knocked on her door and quietly peeked inside to see Adriana half-way sitting up and surrounded by plushies and blankets. “Hey, Peanut. Daddy said you’re not feeling well,” Bucky came over and sat carefully next to her. “But he also said that you did so well with writing your name today!”

---

Adriana laid her head down in Bucky's lap with a tired sigh. "My tummy hurts," she said with a pout. "But, I wrote my name real good. Look," she said, pointing to the wall where Steve tacked the paper that she had written her name correctly on.

---

“It looks great, Peanut,” Bucky said and pet her hair. She was a little sweaty like she had a fever coming and going. “Daddy is going to make you some soup. Do you think you can eat some soup?” He grabbed her water bottle from her nightstand and held it out to her. “Also, I want you to drink some more water, please.”

---

She whined quietly and mumbled something about not being hungry or thirsty. However, after a bit of persuading she finally sat up and leaned into Bucky's side so she could sip at her water bottle. "Maybe only a little soup..." she gave in.

---

“Okay, Sweetie, just a little soup,” Bucky said and kissed her head. “I’ll let you rest some more and then Daddy or I will be back later to bring you some soup. You try to sleep some more.” He helped tuck her back into her blankets and gave her a fresh cold rag on her head before going back out quietly. He was a little cold so he went to snatch one of Steve’s big sweaters and then go back downstairs. “Steve, Adriana says she will have a little soup. But she seems like she’s sick enough that we might not want to risk much more than a few ounces.”

---

Steve was almost done with the soup when Bucky came by. "I need to take her to the doctor. I haven't had the chance to get her checkup done since we had to miss her last appointment," he sighed. "Does she have a temperature?"

---

“Yeah, a little bit,” Bucky said and came to stand over by Steve, a little closer than they had been for a past few days. “Everywhere but the urgent care is closed right now but we can call tomorrow morning and schedule something.” He leaned against the counter and tucked his hands in the pockets of Steve’s sweater, sort of hoping that Steve noticed he was wearing it.

---

Steve pulled the pot off the stove and turned to Bucky. He gave him a little smile when he saw his husband dressed in his sweater and he leaned over to kiss his cheek. "I'll make sure she sees a doctor within the next day or two," he said. "Regardless if her fever breaks or not.” He turned and poured some soup into a bowl. While his back was turned, he mumbled, "I saw a therapist today."

---

Bucky grinned down at his feet when Steve kissed his cheek but the second Steve mentioned the therapist, his head shot back up and he stared at Steve’s back. He didn’t want to get his hopes up though, so he asked cautiously, “Physical... therapist?” That was what Steve had been thinking about doing anyway so he wasn’t sure. Either way, Bucky needed to play this cool.

---

"No, a, uh.... therapist-therapist," Steve answered. He felt a little defeated for having gone there and giving in. It was like he stopped believing that he could get better. But he also knew how important it was to Bucky for him to do something about his problems.

---

Bucky gasped softly and reached out a gentle hand to grip Steve’s forearm. He turned him around so they were facing each other. He bit his lip and nodded. “Uh... even after I yelled at you so bad? Which, I’m so sorry about that. I am. I’m really sorry. I shouldn’t have been so angry. And I keep giving myself excuses about it like it was just a rough day and I’ve just been trying to talk about this for too long. But none of that matters because I still shouldn’t have yelled at you like that.”

"No, because you yelled at me so bad," Steve said with a wry laugh. He didn't feel bitter towards Bucky about it. He knew he had a problem. "Today's session didn't really go well," Steve said. "My therapist suggested that my first step to healing was to leave you and find myself a wife," he said with a grimace.

“Okay, so you find a different one,” Bucky said with determination and slipped both his hands with Steve’s. “This is New York. We have enough therapists for the entire Western Hemisphere. We find a new one. And we keep finding a new one until you find one you like. And I’m going to help. Or... only if you want. The people who run the AA meetings know lots of therapists. We are always told to come ask if we are looking for one.”

"And then what? Keep hopping from person to person until I find one that isn't homophobic? How many is that going to be?" Steve said. "I haven't told my mom about it yet," he said. "I want to wait until it feels like it's helping me before I do." His mom, like him, didn't really believe in going to strangers to help with this sort of stuff.

Bucky gripped Steve’s hands a little tighter. “Yeah. Yeah, Baby, you do. You keep going. You keep trying. This... this could be really good for you. I know it could. And I know you won’t talk to me about any of it so you need to find someone else who you are comfortable talking with instead. When my dad was discharged from the army and came home, he was stuck in the hospital for months. They thought for sure he was going to be paralyzed. But they had a veteran’s therapist come in once a week and encourage him and talk to him. They think that’s part of the reason why he was finally able to get out of that bed.”

Steve didn't feel reassured by the story about Bucky's father. In his mind, the situation was apples and oranges. At this point, he wasn't going to therapy because he believed it would help, but because he trusted Bucky's belief that it would help. "I'd rather not talk about this," Steve said. "What's important is that you know I'm doing what you asked."

Bucky didn’t really think that was what was important. To him, what was important was that Steve was getting help. He appreciated that Steve was thinking about him but he didn’t want this to breed any resentment towards him. “Okay...” he sighed and gripped Steve’s hip, pulling him in to hug him. “You know I love you so much, right? And I am sorry I yelled. You had a bad day. I had a bad day. I shouldn’t have added to it.”

"I know you're sorry, Buck. And I won't hold it against you. I know why you yelled at me and you had every reason to," he said. "I love you, too. And I always will." He kissed his temple and leaned into the hug. "Now, I need you to save the rest of this hug for later. I have to bring soup to our sick daughter."

---

“Okay,” Bucky said and pulled away from Steve again. He kind of felt like Steve should apologize for that night too. But he wasn't going to say anything right that second. “But you have to come back for a hug later. Adriana first, of course. Maybe we can have some family time later if she is feeling better. We can watch a Disney movie and cuddle on the couch.”

---

"I hope she feels better. She loves family movie time." Steve stole one more kiss and then went upstairs to their daughter. "Hey, Peanut. I got some yummy soup for you. It's just the right temperature for eating," he said gently.

---

Adriana sat up in bed and sniffled. “Don’t want it,” she muttered and stuck out her bottom lip. “My tummy hurts real bad.” She had taken another one of her sweaters and pulled it halfway on her body and then draped the blanket that Sarah made around her shoulders loosely. “It’s too cold in my room.”

---

Steve put the soup down and climbed into her bed so he could hold her and share their warmth. "We already have the heat up. Do you want me to bring Diana here so she can keep you warm?" he asked, petting her hair gently. "I can bring more blankets, too."

---

Adriana thought for a second as she snuggled up against her dad. “Yeah. I want Diana,” she said finally and wiped her eyes. “I want to be not sick anymore. Please.” Her sad little whiny was too much.

---

"Oh, Peanut... I know you want to feel better. But your body can't fight what's making your tummy hurt if you don't give it the energy it needs," he said softly. "If you want to feel better, you have to eat something so you can fight it." He turned his head and whistled. Moments later, Diana's paws were scrambling up the stairs and she delicately climbed into bed with them.

---

Adriana waited for Diana to flop on top of them and then she wrapped her arms around her and held her close. She sniffled again and looked up to Steve. “Daddy, can I ask something?” she waited a second then said, a little softer, “How come sometimes when Papa gets home, he hides in his room?” She had noticed the days he came home with headaches and needed to be alone for a bit. “Sometimes he's crying. Was I bad?”

---

Diana gave Adriana a lick on her cheek and patiently laid down with her. Steve's heart broke when Adriana thought that she’d been bad. "Oh, no, Sweetheart," Steve said. "You haven't been bad at all, peanut. Your papa and I are very proud of you. Sometimes his head hurts so bad that he needs to lay down and be alone. That's not your fault."
Adriana wasn’t entirely convinced. “Why does his head hurt?” she asked, petting down Diana’s back gently. “I never seen his head hurt before I came here.” Bucky had always tried to make sure he went to the orphanage when he was at his best. And to a little kid, it just made sense that now that she was seeing her Papa in pain like that, it had to be because she was here now.

"He has a problem with his spine and his head. That’s the part of your body that pretty much holds everything together. He’s had it all his life but you haven’t seen it because he only went to the orphanage when he was feeling okay," Steve explained patiently. "Your papa loves you so much. You don’t give him headaches."

“Can I fix it?” she asked. “Can we give him a new spine? I don’t know where they come from but we can try. Maybe we can make one.” Adriana was determined to find some sort of solution for this. “I don’t want Papa to hurt.” She didn’t like seeing anyone in her new family crying. Even when it was Sarah May just crying because she was hungry, Adriana would try to distract her so she would feel better.

“You’re so thoughtful," he said with a proud look. "A spine is hard to make. He’s going to a doctor to help fix the spine that he has." Steve sat up a bit more and picked up her bowl. "It will make Papa very happy if you had your soup. And it would make me happy, too. And when you’re feeling better, maybe we can draw a card to make your papa feel better as well."

Adriana sighed but slowly took the spoon and ate some of her soup. It was at delicious so she was glad for that. “Okay, we can draw for him. What animals should we do this time? Last time we ‘drawed’ monkeys.”

"We can draw whatever animal you want, Peanut." Steve kissed the top of her head. "You want to try drawing some doggies?" he asked. "Maybe a bunch of Diana’s?" he suggested. "Does that sound good?"

“Yeah, we can draw doggies,” Adriana decided and sat up again. “Should we go ask The Bean if he wants to draw with us.” Adriana had a hard time with Christopher’s name so she had taken to calling him ‘The Bean’ sometimes.

Steve thought it was so damned adorable how Adriana referred to her brother. "Yeah. He loves drawing. Did you know I’m going to start drawing classes soon? You can draw with me and Bean and a bunch of other parents and their kids."
“Those other kids aren’t staying with us are they?” Adriana asked nervously. She just got her parents and she didn’t feel like sharing them with even more people. She carefully slipped Diana off of her and dropped down off her bed so she could get her sweater fixed and gather up some drawing supplies.

---

"No, Peanut. One day, Bucky and I will adopt more kids, but not until you’re a lot older," he said. "You don’t have to worry about sharing us with other kids for a while." Diana huffed softly when she was nudged away. "You feeling better?" Steve asked

---

“Guess a little bit,” Adriana mumbled and handed Steve a box of crayons. “But I wanna color with you and Papa and The Bean.” She yawned as she got her notebooks from her art box and held them to her chest. “Can I have some juice too?”

---

Steve took the crayons and smiled fondly at his daughter. "Okay. Papa's going to be so happy that you're feeling better. Do you want to watch a movie after we color?" he asked, leading the way downstairs. "You can have all the juice you want."

---

“Yeah, we can watch a movie,” Adriana said nonchalantly as if she wasn’t excited for it. They didn’t get to watch a lot of movies because Steve and Bucky liked to limit the amount of TV time the kids had. “What movie are we watching? Last time we watched the one of elephants.”

---

"Do you want to watch a Disney movie?" Steve asked. "Like Bambi or something like that?" He scooped her up into his arm and carried her down the stairs. "Or do you want to watch one of Becca’s movies?"

---

Adriana clung to her daddy and nestled her face against his neck. "Um... ‘Sleeping Beauty’? The one with the pretty fairy ladies.” She sniffled for the millionth time and wiped her nose on Steve’s sweater. "Or maybe the space one?" She had recently watched the first ‘Star Wars’ and she had a habit of requesting to watch it over and over again.

---

Steve hadn’t have thought he would be this used to having his kids use him as a large tissue. "I think everyone will like the space one," he said. "Let’s watch that one." He brought Adriana into the living room. "Buck? Look who’s feeling good enough to draw with us,” he said.

---

Bucky was holding Sarah May on his lap and Christopher was standing up next to him and trying his best to pull Bucky’s braid apart. “Hey, Adriana!” he said excitedly to his oldest. “You’re feeling better, Sweetie? Your siblings are trying to make your Papa crazy!” He looked up to Steve and then back at Christopher. “What are we drawing, Peanut?”
"Aah! Na!" Christopher said to Adriana, which was his way of saying her name when he was excited. He giggled as he continued to try and wrestle his papa's braid apart.

"I'm going to draw Diana," she said. "You are going to draws puppies."

"Puppies. That's a great choice." Bucky reached his arm around and pulled Christopher around to his chest. "Okay, babies, I need you both to stop pulling on me," he kissed Christopher and Sarah May and hoped that they both understood.

"Papa!" Sarah May squealed, reaching her hands up to grab at his shirt.

Steve laughed and put the drawing supplies on the table so they could set up their workstation. "You guys can get started. I'm going to get Adriana her juice."

Bucky held open his arms for Adriana and got a hug with all his babies at once. "Okay, Adriana, let's get our things ready. Maybe Daddy will bring me some iced tea, please?" He called out to Steve as he went to the kitchen. "And some carrots!" Diana padded into the living room then and jumped up on the couch where Lilly was curled up on the arm.

Steve ended up bringing back a tray full of snacks for their family and a drink for everyone. "Diana, are we going to be drawing you?" he asked his dog, who's big ears perked up and she let out a little whine in response. "Buck, I'm thinking the kids need to be put to bed early tonight." Which was pretty much Steve-talk for wanting some alone time with his husband.

Bucky helped Sarah May drink some juice from a sippy cup and then set it down next to her on the ground. "Sure, Baby, did they not take naps today?" Bucky asked, a little oblivious as to Steve’s intentions like he could tend to be. "Ya-Ya has been crawling around everywhere in the last half hour so I’m guessing she will be asleep quickly."

"They did, but I still think they should be put down about thirty minutes early," Steve said, a little slower this time. When Bucky still didn't get it, he groaned softly. He couldn't say any innuendo in front of Lilly. "So, we can go to bed early, too" he elaborated and gave him a pleading look to try and get him to understand.

"I mean, I don’t have to go to bed early. I go in tomorrow at-" Bucky started and then he got it. "Oh! Oh, yeah. We should go to bed early. That’s a good point. I didn’t think about that.” He nodded and grabbed a crayon for Christopher and a piece of paper. “After a movie?”
Steve was about to give up but then Bucky finally got it. "Yeah, sounds perfect." Christopher grabbed the crayon from Bucky and he babbled mindlessly at Adriana as he colored. Sarah May whined to get in on the activity too even though she couldn't do much.

---

“I want to watch the space movie,” Adriana said. She was patiently waiting for Steve to finish drawing Diana for her to color in. “With the robots and the boy,” she added for clarification in case Bucky wasn’t sure. “Where’s Nana?”

---

After Steve finished a rather good drawing of Diana - because he drew his favorite pup all the time - he passed the paper over to his daughter. "Nana is out with one of her friends right now," Steve said. "I promised her once I came home from my meeting, she had the night to herself to have fun with her friends."

---

“Oh,” Adriana hummed in disappointment. “When will she be back?

Bucky reached over and squeezed Adriana’s hand lightly. “By the time she gets here, you will be asleep. But you’ll see Nana in the morning.” He touched her forehead to check her fever and then looked to Steve. “I’ll call a doctor in the morning too. So, they all can get check-ups.

---

"What's a check-up?” Adriana asked. "Are those like push-ups? I can do lots and lots of those. Lilly 'teached' me how,” she said.

Steve laughed. "What's Lilly teaching you how to do push-ups for?"

---

“I’m going to coach her for the soccer team. She has potential,” Lilly murmured from the couch absently.

"Adriana, it's 'taught'. 'Lilly taught me how',” Bucky corrected gently. She was getting the hang of things still and, at the orphanage, she didn't have someone constantly helping her learn what was correct. Bucky glanced back at his sister and squinted. “Soccer? She’s four years old.”

---

"Mozart was writing his music stuff at age five. I can see some real potential in my niece. As her aunt, it's my duty to foster that growth into pure ass-kicking potential," Lilly explained.

Adriana nodded. "Aunt Lilly says I can kick asses, Papa."

---

Bucky’s eyes were wide and he looked from Steve to Lilly. The was the first time any of their kids had sworn and he knew Steve was going to have something to say about it. “Well, Peanut, you are very strong and can do whatever you want to do when you grow up.”
Steve's jaw dropped and by the way her parents reacted, Adriana could tell she'd done something wrong and her eyes filled up with tears. Lilly knew she was going to be in trouble with Steve at least. Even with Bucky's positive response, she was still nervous. "Are you sure?"

---

“Yes, Adriana,” Bucky said and scooted close to her to wrap her up in a hug and kiss her face over and over. “Your Daddy and I want you to be able to follow your dreams. So, if you want to do soccer, you can.” He looked to Steve again and then added, “And your daddy and I love you so much.” He hoped that would help to dispel her tears.

---

Steve nodded, deciding to save the language talk for another day. "Yeah," Steve said. "Even if you want one thing now and something else later, that's okay. You're able to do whatever you set your mind to," he encouraged. "Do you want to watch the space movie now, Peanut?"

---

“Uh-huh,” Adriana said and looked down, still pouting. She went back to her coloring and Bucky got up to put the tape in the player.

“Lilly, how about you and I go ask Becca if she wants to join?” Bucky asked and gestured to the doorway, hoping Lilly would just follow.

---

"Why do both of us have to go?” she complained.

Steve understood the hint Bucky was going for, so he gave her a little look. "Just follow your brother," he said with a small look. He wasn't the happiest with her right now so Lilly figured she was less likely to be scolded by Bucky than by Steve.

---

Bucky waited in the hall for Lilly to catch up. He then stared at her for a second and said, “Lil... we can’t swear in front of the kids. We’ve gone over this. I know it’s not how we usually do things but Steve doesn’t want any swearing around the babies. For this reason in particular, Steve doesn’t want them swearing this young.”

---

"I didn't think she would repeat what I said," Lilly complained. "Christopher and Sarah May don't. I got used to not having to worry because the babies don't know how to say big words like that yet," she said. "It won't happen again anytime soon. It was just an accident."

---

“Well, Christopher can say ‘apple’ so I think he would be able to say ‘ass’,” Bucky said, arms crossed. “I know it’s hard. You know I mess up all the time and swear when I shouldn’t. We just need to work on it. And I suggest apologizing to Steve before he talks to you. Show him that you know it was a mistake. Don’t make him come at you all grumpy and huffy.”

---
Lilly sighed. She didn't like apologizing but she liked it even less when Steve was righteous with her or scolded her. "Fine, I guess," she groaned. "Why can't the babies stay small and dumb? I like them that way," she said. Lilly paused and then asked, "Wait, are we actually getting Becca or did you bring me here to scold me?"

---

"Did I scold you?" Bucky asked, exasperated. "I'm just asking you to work on it. But, yeah, we do need to go talk to Becs and see if she wants to join us or not." He opened the door to the basement and added, "And don’t call my babies dumb. They are very smart. They just don’t know words."

---

Lilly rolled her eyes. "Becca! Movie time!" she called down the stairs. Becca started complaining because Lilly ruined the best moment of the album she was listening to.

---

Becca reluctantly made her way back upstairs with her siblings, claiming that she was only staying to have some snacks and then she was going to go back to her room. “Steve, I’m going to get some popcorn and pudding for the girls. You need anything?” Bucky asked and brushed Steve’s hair back a few times.

---

As soon as Bucky got close, Sarah May started to reach out to him and whimper to be held. "I'm good, Love," Steve said, smiling at the touches.

Adriana put down her juice and patted Sarah May on the back. "Don't worry, Sarah May. Papa will come back soon."

---

"Adriana, what kind of pudding do you want? We have chocolate and vanilla and I think like one butterscotch," Bucky asked and picked up Sarah May so she would stop fussing. “And, Steve, should I let the babies have some? They will just complain if they aren’t getting snacks. Maybe I can split one cup into two for them to share.”

---

"Vanilla," Adriana answered.

"Splitting is a good idea, but Christopher is going to be a hog. Maybe put them in two separate cups so he thinks he's having a whole one?" Steve suggested. He pulled Christopher into his lap and tickled his sides.

---

"No, Dada!" Christopher grumped at Steve and tried to grab his hands.

Bucky nodded and went to get snacks for everyone with Sarah May propped on his hip. He came back and distributed the pudding cups and popcorn and sat next to Steve. “Here, Baby, this one is for Christopher," he said and handed him a cup that was almost full of pudding. He decided to give his son a little more than Sarah May. She wasn’t going to mind and she was too young to have too much sugary desserts.
When Bucky came back with the snacks, Christopher's eyes went wide and he stood up in Steve's lap to get his cup quicker. "Let Daddy help you eat, Sweetheart," Steve said, helping Christopher with his spoon. "We have the best kids," Steve sighed happily, giving Bucky a smile.

"I know we do," Bucky agreed and helped Adriana peel the top off her pudding cup before feeding Sarah May her bit of dessert. "Halloween is in just three weeks. I was thinking we should trick-or-treat this year since Adriana is with us. She told me she wants to be a turtle scientist."

"Mmm," Sarah May mumbled after she was fed her dessert. Steve gasped when Bucky brought up trick-or-treating. "Bucky, I've been meaning to show you the costumes I've made for Christopher, Diana, and Sarah May," he said. He looked down at Adriana and smiled. "You finally decided on your costume?"

Bucky looked to the dog who was still curled up sleeping on the couch. They were lucky that she loved Steve so much because otherwise that dog probably would have ran off by now with all the clothes or hats Steve liked putting on her. "What did you make them, Baby?" Bucky asked and brushed his fingers gently through Sarah May’s curls.

"I made a mane for Diana to wear so she could be a lion and then I made a bear costume for Sarah May and a tiger costume for Christopher," he said. "They're going to look so adorable. I was afraid I'd only be able to take pictures in here but now that we can go trick-or-treating we can show off how cute our animals and turtle scientists are."

Bucky chuckled and pulled Steve in for a kiss. "I love how excited you get about this stuff. And I love that you’re such a dweeb sometimes. You’re the best father I could have asked for my babies to have." He gave him one more kiss and then went back to helped Sarah May attempt to use crayons. "Are you dressing up too? Or just the kids?"

Steve blushed at the compliments. He really did love spending time with their kids and also doing dorky things like make costumes for Halloween. "Should it?" He looked to Adriana. "Do you think Papa and Daddy should dress up too?"

“Oh, no, no, I said ‘Daddy’ not ‘Daddy and Papa’. Papa will be wearing jeans and a jacket and nothing fancier than that,” Bucky corrected and gave Steve a little look. He would do it if Steve and Adriana really wanted him to but he was going to put up a little fight.

"But if everyone is dressing up, you should too," Steve whined. He knew that Bucky wouldn't be likely to say yes to him so he lobbied Adriana against him. "Wouldn't Papa look so cool in a costume, Peanut?"

---

Adriana looked to Bucky and squinted her eyes like she was scrutinizing his Halloween potential. She looked to Steve then and asked, “I don’t know. He could be a princess or a witch cause of his hair. What are you gonna be, Daddy?”

---

"I think your papa will look great as a princess," Steve said with as much sincerity as he could muster. "Should I go as a prince?" he asked, giving Bucky a big old smug look. One thing he was really having fun with lately was poking fun at Bucky through their kids.

---

Adriana shrugged and stared at the TV. “Daddy, if you wanna be a prince, you can,” she said absently, wanting to be focused on the movie now.

Bucky leaned over to Steve and bit his shoulder lightly. “Are you going to make me be a princess for Halloween? Going to let Adriana put glitter glue in my hair again? It’ll be on you to wash it out. Remember how annoying it was last time?”

---

"Maybe,” Steve said. "But no glitter glue this time. That stuff was on our pillows for ages," he groaned. Christopher whined because Steve wasn't helping him with his pudding, so Steve quickly gave him some more. "Or maybe we can do a cute couple's costume that isn't royalty. We can be Jekyll and Hyde."

---

“Jekyll and Hyde?” Bucky asked with a bark of a laugh. “How is that a couples costume? And which one of us gets to be a normal looking doctor and which gets to be a scraggly maniac with a hunchback?"

“You’re the scraggly maniac, Bucky, always,” Becca murmured from the couch and poked him with her toe.

---

"Well, we're married, that's as close as being the same person as you can get," Steve said. "We can swap it around. You can put your hair up all nice and I'll be the one hobbling around, spooking all the kids," he joked. "I wonder how the babies will handle us looking different."

---

“Uh, well, maybe we should do something a little less scary this first time around just in case,” Bucky offered. “I don’t want Christopher and Ya-Ya crying when they see you like that.”

Adriana jumped up and pointed at the screen when she saw Luke Skywalker. “Papa, you could be Space Boy!” She had a hard time remembering all the names of the characters so Luke was ‘Space Boy’, Han Solo was ‘Gun Man’, Leia was ‘Alien Princess’, and Chewbacca was ‘Big Bear’.
Steve pouted because he wanted to be spooky but it wasn't worth it at the expense of his kids. "Oh, that's a good idea, Peanut." He looked over to Bucky. "How about that one? You can be Luke and I can be Han Solo," he said. "Maybe Lilly can be Leia... or Becca if she goes with us." She was getting a little old to go trick-or-treating with the family.

Bucky could live with that. And if he had to go in a costume, he would much prefer to go as Luke. “Okay. Fine. We can be Luke and Han. Just know that this means I’m finding you a brunette wig.” He leaned back and tossed a pillow at Lilly to get her attention. “Lilly, do you want to be Alien Princess?”

"You can see whether or not you're attracted to me cause you love me or because I'm a cute blond," Steve joked and kissed his cheek.

Lilly considered for a moment before saying, "I kind of wanted to go as a soccer player because I already have a uniform so it's easy, but I guess I can be Alien Princess," she said.

“Well, Monster, you can be whatever you want. Just so long as you’re helping me keep track of the babies, I don’t care what you go as,” Bucky said and looked to Adriana. “Do you think Aunt Lilly should be a soccer player, Peanut?”

Adriana looked over at Lilly and then stood up so she could climb her way over to Lilly's lap. "Auntie Lilly I think you should be Alien Princess!" She said with a big smile. "Look! There she is!" she said, pointing at the screen again.

Lilly pulled Adriana close and snuggled her. She wasn’t necessarily extremely happy about the idea but she conceded. “Fine. I’ll be Leia.”

Bucky looked down and noticed that Sarah May had fallen asleep at some point. “Steve, I’m going to go put her to bed. We might have to finish the movie tomorrow. It’s getting late.”

"Papa," Adriana said with a small pout when she heard that they may finish the movie another night. "Can we watch until the good part is all done?"

Steve looked over and asked, "When is the good part all done?"

Adriana shrugged. "When the letters are all over the TV."

“Sweetheart, that’s the credits. That means it’s over,” Bucky said as he carefully got up with Sarah May held to his chest. “You can have ten more minutes. But the movie still has about an hour left so we can watch the rest tomorrow. I promise.”
"Yeah, the credits," Adriana mimicked. She took Bucky's spot on the couch when he stood up. "How many minutes is an hour? Is it five minutes?"

Steve tickled her side lightly. "I taught you today how many minutes there are in an hour. Do you remember?" he asked.

"Mmm, a hundred?" Adriana asked and scrunched up her face in thought, hoping she was right.

Bucky shook his head. "Try again, Peanut," he said and then gave her a little kiss on her head before going to put the youngest down to sleep.

"That's how many pennies there are in a dollar, but that was a good guess," Steve said, giving her a kiss on the cheek. By the time Bucky came back to the couch, Christopher was sleeping in Steve's arms and Adriana was looking like she was close to falling asleep as well.

Bucky saw his family all curled up together and he quietly went to get their camera and take a picture. "Looks like it's bedtime," he whispered and slowly went to turn off the movie and then scoop Adriana up in his arms.

Steve smiled when Bucky took the picture. He knew that they would fawn over their scrapbook of memories in the years to come. He carefully stood up with Christopher nestled against his chest. Steve pressed his lips to Bucky's. "And none of them put up a fight over it."

"Oh, yes, Baby, but you forget that tomorrow is a new day full of crying and tantrums and diapers and biting," Bucky joked as he followed Steve upstairs to tuck in their kids. "I'll clean up the snacks from the living room before we go to sleep. I don't want your mom to think that when she goes out for the night, I become a total slob."

"You do have a point," Steve agreed. He laid Christopher down a little reluctantly because he loved holding his son. When all the kids were in bed, Steve started to run his hands over Bucky's back. "You do that and then we can have some alone time, yeah?"

Bucky hurriedly cleaned up all their messes and then hustled his way back up to his and Steve’s room. "Baby, I forgot to tell you earlier, I think we should plan a little friend get-together or something. Tim’s ex-wife remarried and is pregnant again. While he doesn’t really miss being with her, he is really upset that this baby won’t be his. You know? It’s his kids’ little brother but it’s not his son. He needs a distraction."
Steve huffed because he hadn't expected them to have a conversation right now but he didn't want to push what he wanted if something was on Bucky's mind. He pulled him down onto the bed and into his arms. "What do you think would take his mind off of it?" he asked. "Would a movie night be good? Or maybe board games. It'll be harder to get his mind back on it if he's got to do something."

---

"Yeah, let’s have a board game night," Bucky agreed and snuggled up against Steve’s side. “We can have Clint and Nat and Sam, too. It’ll be fun.” He hummed softly and rolled on to his back and started pulling off his shirt. “But we can plan it out later. You wanted to have sex, right?”

---

"That sounds fun. We'll have to figure out a way to keep the kids from wanting in on everything," Maybe they could pay Becca to babysit in the basement. Steve's face lit up a little at the question and then he nodded eagerly. "Ever since that jerk therapist suggested that I leave you, all I could think about was getting you in my arms and loving you even more."

---

“Oh, Baby, I’m so sorry you had to deal with that asshole,” Bucky said and crawled on top of Steve and hovered over him. “But, I am so happy and proud and grateful that you gave this one a try. And I can help you find a new one to try. I just love you so much.” He whined a little and brushed his thumb over Steve’s lips and pushed his knee gently against Steve’s crotch. “But for now, let’s show that bastard just how important our marriage is.”

---

Steve pressed his hips up into Bucky, moaning softly when Bucky pressed his knee against him. He kissed him deeply and scratched his nails up Bucky's back. "It's like when those sad commercials come on with the dogs in shelters. It makes me want to give Diana a big hug." He nipped at Bucky's lower lip. "Now take my clothes off, Gorgeous."

---

Bucky chuckled low in his throat and set to work undressing Steve quickly but deliberately. “Are you calling me an unwanted puppy?” he asked and leaned in to bite Steve’s neck lightly. “I know what you mean, though. Some of the people in AA aren’t allowed to see their kids until they clean up. And it hurts me to know that I was almost at that point and then I just want to make a big hug puddle of all my kids - no matter how much Becca will try to squirm out."

---

"Maybe," Steve said with a playful smile. His hands moved to pull off the rest of Bucky's clothes, kind of desperate for the both of them to be entirely naked on each other. "You'll never have to go without seeing your kids, baby. You've done so well for all of us."

---

Bucky nodded and finished pulling Steve’s pants and boxers from him. “I'm trying, Baby. I am. And the beginning of next month will be a year sober again," he said and nosed against Steve’s abs and chest as he made his way back up to his lips. He didn’t want to mention why he drank last time. He knew Steve remembered that boy Jason invading their home and beating Bucky up.
"I'm so proud of you," Steve said, grabbing Bucky's ass and pulling their bodies flush together so he could rut up into him. "You're such a perfect dad and husband. I'm such a lucky man," he said in an adoring tone. "You want to ride me tonight, Baby? Or do you want to be inside me?"

---

Bucky pushed back against Steve to create friction. “Oh, I don’t mind,” he said and licked the side of Steve’s neck. “You pick because I’m content either way. We haven’t had sex in a week and a half and that’s my fault so you pick.”

---

"I want you to ride me," Steve said, as if he'd been imagining it all evening. "It isn't your fault, Baby..." Steve reached for the lube in their drawer and made a show of taking his time to coat his fingers with it. With his dry hand, he pulled Bucky down for a searing kiss. As they kissed, he started to tease his hole without pushing his fingers in just yet.

---

Bucky moaned against Steve’s lips and pushed his ass back on Steve’s fingers, desperately trying to get them inside him. “Come on, Baby, more. Push me. Give it to me. I see it in your eyes, Steve. You want to own me tonight. I’m all yours.” He hoped to god that Steve would get the hint and just take him. He sat back a little and brushed his hands over his nipples gently. “It’s been a week and a half. Maybe I forgot just who it is who gets to have my body. Remind me.”

---

Steve was all too easily goaded by his husband. He pushed a single finger in and started to move it freely inside of his ass, barely meeting any resistance until he pushed a second finger inside. "We need to make a habit of finding more time for this," Steve said, looking up at Bucky with dark, wanting eyes. "You look so good right now, Baby." He curled his fingers and started to massage Bucky’s prostate.

---

Bucky whined and gasped and let his body move and react to Steve’s touches freely. “I know, we do. Maybe we should make a chart. Some sort of schedule?” he joked and leaned in for another quick kiss. “Or you need to just drag me into this bed when you want me so I won’t have to guess. I’ll know exactly what you need.”

---

"If you collect enough good behavior stars, you get to be on top," Steve joked. He had started Adriana on a chore chart where she would get rewards if she did enough chores and it was working out pretty well so far. Steve pushed a third finger inside of his husband. "And what do I need right now, Baby?” he asked.

---

Growling just slightly down at Steve, Bucky took Steve’s free hand and moved it to rest over his heart. “You need to be in control. You need to take me. I mean really take me. In a way that shows that you will make sure I get what I want while you get what you want. You want to pin me down and fuck me into next week. You need to see me open and ruined by you, leaking your come, and bright red with the effort of it all.”
Steve groaned as Bucky painted the image for him. He abruptly pulled his fingers out and flipped Bucky onto the bed so he could move over him now. "You're like a goddamned mind reader," he said. Steve took one of Bucky's hands and pinned it above his head. He lined his cock up with Bucky's hole and slowly pushed inside of him.

"Just when it comes to sex," Bucky teased and relaxed himself so Steve could push himself all the way inside his ass. "And you happen to show on your face just what kind of sex you are wanting that night. It's true. It's in your eyes, Babe."

Steve let out a soft moan as he felt Bucky's hole stretch to accommodate his dick. He buried his face in Bucky's neck and started to kiss and bite at the skin as he eased into his husband inch by inch until he was balls-deep inside of him. "I want to fuck you so hard you'll have Clint wondering how you're managing to stay on your feet tomorrow."

"Uh-huh," Bucky gasped and turned his head to the side so Steve could get at him better. "Bite me," he added as an after-thought. "I mean, actually hard on my neck. I want to feel it. And I want to see it tomorrow too. I want to have to wear my scarf inside all day because I'm so covered in marks from you, Stevie."

Usually, Steve would have been more reserved about marking his husband in such a way, but he was a little more desperate than usual tonight. As soon as Bucky requested it, Steve's teeth sunk into Bucky's neck and he let out a low, possessive growl. His hips moved in tight circles that shook the bed beneath every movement. He pulled back and soothed the bruise over with his tongue.

The breathy high-pitched gasp of pain and pleasure from the bite had Bucky begging for more. He tangled his hand in Steve's hair and bared the other side of his neck for him. "Please," he requested softly and held his husband close to him as he wrapped his legs up around his middle, pushing up with every thrust from Steve.

Steve was nearly feral at this point. Whatever Bucky wanted, he would get it. He thrust his hips faster and gripped onto Bucky's hand tighter as he bit another mark onto his husband's neck. "All mine," he purred. "Let me hear you say it, Sweetheart. Tell me that you're mine."

"I'm yours, Steve," Bucky whispered and gripped onto his husband's hand as tightly as he could. He brought his other hand up as well and grabbed the headboard. "My body is yours. All of it. Only yours. And my heart and my life are yours. You've got control, Baby. My body is all yours. Fuck me, use me."
Steve gripped Bucky's hip with a bruising hold and just fucking railed him. He grunted and panted against Bucky's neck in effort as wet slaps permeated through the room as Steve fucked him into the mattress. The more Bucky spoke, the harder Steve's hips pounded into him.

---

Bucky was quickly reduced to loud gasps and moans. His body writhed and moved with Steve’s and his heart was pounding in his chest. “I love you,” he gasped and noticed how Steve’s breathing was labored and shallow as he fucked him. He wouldn’t say anything unless Steve did, though. He didn’t want to make him feel bad.

---

Steve was barely able to keep his breath up with the pace that he was fucking his husband at. Luckily for his lungs, Steve's orgasm came pretty quickly. He wanted to last longer and keep fucking him but he was losing stamina fast. It was only about a few more minutes until the waves of pleasure crashed over him as he spilled himself inside of Bucky. He wheezed as he collapsed on top of Bucky, trying to not breathe too deeply and bother his lungs.

---

Bucky’s own breath was knocked out of him as Steve finished inside him and flopped on top of him. He curled his limbs around Steve and breathed heavily in his ear. “God, Baby, you are so good. That was amazing.”

---

Steve closed his eyes and snuggled against Bucky. "I love you so much," he said softly. He couldn't talk much for a minute or so longer until he finally caught his breath. He looked up at his husband with a small pout. "You didn't finish, though. Let's do something about that.

---

"You can in a minute," Bucky said and held himself tighter around Steve so he wouldn’t go anywhere. "Just hold me like this for a little bit." He sighed happily and closed his eyes. “You know I love having your weight on me and your cock inside me like this. Makes me feel secure.” He would stay just like that for days on end if he could. Steve’s strong body on top of his was all he needed right now. “How do your bite marks look?” he added sleepily and stifled a yawn against Steve’s shoulder.

---

Steve did as he was told. He kissed along Bucky's jaw affectionately and kept his arms wrapped around him as strongly as he could. "They look like they're going to be pretty dark tomorrow," he said with a little frown. He always worried himself over nothing. "You're definitely going to need a scarf."

---

Bucky hummed happily and gave Steve a kiss. ‘Good. That’s what I want. It felt amazing, by the way. You biting me. I loved it.” He kept his eyes closed and his breathing slowed down as he started to fall asleep. “I love you, Steve. I love my wonderful husband. You’re my life.”

---
Steve ran his hand over Bucky's chest and he kissed his husband's cheekbones then his forehead. "I love you too, Baby. You make me a better person and I'm so happy that we were brought together." He smiled. "I love all the things you do for our family and to make me happy. And I love that even when I'm stubborn, you still stand your ground when I'm wrong."

---

“I knew what I was getting into when I married you. I learned pretty quickly that the Rogers family was a stubborn one,” Bucky said with a cheeky little grin. “But, I’m used to it. I’ve lived with Becca and Lilly all their lives.” He sighed and moved Steve just slightly. “No matter what we argue about or what we get angry at each other for, I need you to know that I love you and I’m just trying to make sure you have the perfect life that you deserve to have.”

---

Steve smiled and cupped the sides of Bucky's face. "I know, Love," he said. "I know you do." There wasn't a second that passed where Steve doubted Bucky's commitment and feelings for him. He kissed him slowly, enjoying the feeling of his husband tucked against his side. "So, am I going to get to put my hands on your dick tonight or what?" he asked with a doofy smile.

---

A bubble of laughter popped from Bucky’s lips and he tangled his hand into his hair to pull it out of the way. “If you want to, Baby, you can,” he said with a tired smile. “I’m just about falling asleep as I am. You took it out of me with that rough fucking, Steve. Not that I’m complaining in the slightest.”

---

"Well, if you fall asleep before I finish you off, I'll just have to wake you up with a morning blowjob," Steve said. He walked his fingers down Bucky's chest, down his belly, and then he took hold of his cock to stroke it slowly. "How’s that sound?" Steve asked.

---

Bucky moved his leg out of the way so Steve had better access to him. He really was sleepy so he figured it might fall asleep. “That sounds fine, Baby. I love when you do that. Maybe we can have some morning sixty-nine before I go to work? That’ll hold you over for the day until I get home, I would think.”

---

"I like the sound of that,” he purred. Steve thumbed the head of Bucky's cock and kissed his neck affectionately. "Whatever you want, Love. When you're taking in the dough to support our family, you get whatever you want in the morning."

---

Bucky chuckled and gave Steve a face. “Oh, is that how this works? You’re gonna suck me off in the morning so I keep providing for you? Not because you just want to?” he joked. “I’m hurt. I thought you liked having my cock in your mouth.”

---

"You jerk," Steve laughed. "I like having your cock in my mouth and you deserve it." He stroked Bucky a little faster and moved his other hand down to cup his balls. "I like that thick dick of yours on my lips."

---

"Uh-huh, I know you do," Bucky said and scratched his fingers on Steve’s shoulders. "That feels nice. Can you stick some of your fingers in my ass while you jerk me off, please? I feel empty without you inside and I can feel your come down there."

---

"So needy," Steve joked. He teased Bucky's hole a little bit by tracing the tip of his finger around it before carefully pushing two in at once. "How's that? You want some more, Handsome?" he asked as he slowly moved them in and out of his ass.

---

"Yeah, more. I can take it," Bucky murmured and sat up just a little so he could watch Steve. "You make me crazy. In all the best ways, of course. But you do. You make me crazy." He shook his head and reached out to touch Steve’s cheeks and lips gently. "God, I love you so much."

---

Steve pushed in a third finger just like Bucky wanted. He looked at him with all the love in the world as he slowly fingerfucked his husband while jerking him off. "I know, Baby. I can see it in your eyes," he said. "You don't even have to say it and I know."

---

"I know, but I think it's important to say it," Bucky said, "What about those days when you feel so down and just want to hide away? What if you forget that I love you and I haven’t told you yet that day? So, I got to make sure I’m letting you know as often as I can."

---

Bucky was the sweetest man on the planet. Steve couldn't help but kiss him deeply because any moment not used to love on his husband was a moment wasted. "You bring my spirits up every day," he said softly. He pressed his fingers to Bucky's prostate and massaged it as he stroked him faster.

---

Bucky gasped and whined and covered his face with his hands for a few seconds. He was getting closer to orgasm, the rough fuck earlier having pushed him really close already. "I’m almost there. I’m close. Fuck, Baby, you feel so good. I love having you on me, in me, just touching me everywhere."

---

"I want you to come for me, Buck," Steve purred. "I love seeing your face right before you do, all desperate and needy. It's fucking gorgeous..." Steve gave Bucky's dick a small squeeze. "Come on. I wanna lick you clean after you've made a mess of yourself."
Bucky nodded and thrust his dick up into Steve’s hand. He was silent except for moaning and gasping and then he took a deep breath and held it as he came over Steve’s hand and his stomach for several long moments. “Shit... that like shoved its way out of me.”

---

Steve stroked Bucky through his orgasm and licked his hand clean once he was done. He ducked his head down and gave Bucky’s dick little kitten licks until there was nothing left to lick up. ”There we go.” He kissed his husband’s limp cock for good measure.

---

Bucky relaxed back on the bed again while Steve licked him clean. He shut his eyes and moved his hair out of his way again. He wanted to say something and thank Steve or just praise him or something. But before he could form any words to speak, he was fast asleep

---

Steve stayed awake a little longer because Bucky looked so goddamned peaceful. Steve pet his hair and murmured soft words of love to him for a little while before finally settling down next to him. At long last, feeling happier than he did all week long, he fell asleep with his husband in his arms.
S5: E19

Chapter Summary

Grant's First Birthday and Memorial.

Bucky knew things weren’t going to be easy with Grant’s birthday coming up. The tone of the house was sad and contemplative during the week leading up to his memorial. They were going to go to the cemetery together and visit him and then throw a little dinner back at their place with their family and their close friends. It wasn’t going to be a lot of people, of course, but Bucky still had a lot to do. First on the list was to get Steve out of bed. He was the last one to get up and everyone else was already dressed and having breakfast together. So Bucky, dressed in a nice professional black outfit with his hair pulled into a neat, tightly slicked back bun, went to sit on the edge of the bed next to his husband again. “I know you’re awake.”

---

Steve knew he wasn't the only one hurting. He wasn't the only one that lost someone they loved that day and Bucky lost even more than that. Even so, Steve was finding it impossible to get out of bed. Having a dinner to commemorate their second son had seemed like a good way to remember him but now Steve was dreading it. He didn't respond at first when Bucky spoke but when he did, his voice was small. "I don't want today to happen,” he mumbled.

---

Bucky couldn’t blame him. He didn’t want today to happen either. If he could, he would poof his son and Missy back into existence and make everything okay again. But he couldn’t do that. So, he had to see this day through. “On the first anniversary of my parents' death,” Bucky started slowly and quietly. “I kept to myself. I stayed in my room and I drank and cried. I ignored my sisters and they had to grieve on their own and fend for themselves. And a few weeks later, once I realized that I shut out my living family to mourn my dead family, I hated myself a little more. I was so angry at myself for not holding my sisters and crying with them and helping to make our pain feel a bit more manageable with us all together like that.” He sighed and took Steve’s hand. “It’s your choice, Steve. If you really want to stay in this bed today, I won’t do anything about it. But I really think you will regret it later if you don’t spend today with all the people who love you and love Grant.”

---

Steve didn't want to admit it to Bucky - because he knew how hard it was to break his addiction - but Steve kind of wanted to get drunk and be alone all day. He knew he would later regret ignoring his family like Bucky said, but he also felt entitled to make bad decisions once in a while. "I don't want our kids to see me like this. Or our friends," he groused quietly. "Adriana looks at my feet sometimes and she hasn't asked what the tattoo is but I dread answering her.”

---

Bucky nodded and took a deep breath. “So, just to clarify, you’re staying in bed today?” he asked, trying to sound as neutral as he could and not give away that he was disappointed. He had just promised he wouldn’t say anything about it if Steve decided to stay put in bed. He needed to let Steve make his own choices about this regardless of how he felt.

---

"I'm skipping breakfast, at least," he said. Steve didn't want to bow out on the rest of the day officially just yet. But he also didn't have it in him to leave the bed. His bottom lip quivered and he hid the side of his face in the pillow to avoid looking at Bucky because he knew he was making it harder on his husband. "Let me know when you're heading out."

---

“Okay,” Bucky said simply and pet his hand over Steve’s hair and his neck. “Love you,” he added in a desperate whisper and then got up and quickly hustled out of the room so he didn’t start crying again. He already started the morning that way when he woke up and he knew it was going to happen again. He just rubbed his face with his hands and made his way back downstairs to the rest of his family who all needed him today in their own ways.

---

The babies were making their usual ruckus that morning but everyone else was more reserved. Even Adriana knew something was up. When Sarah saw that Bucky came down alone, she gave an upset frown and excused herself from the table. There was a small, indistinguishable commotion from upstairs that sounded vaguely like Sarah reprimanding Steve and then minutes later, her son was trudging down the stairs with her, dressed but looking like he was barely holding himself together. Sarah wasn't going to let her son have Bucky face today alone.

---

Bucky watched Steve trail into the kitchen behind Sarah and he sighed. He really wished she would have just left it. Steve didn't want to get out of bed and, while Bucky was upset about it, it was still his choice. And he just sort of figured things would be worse today if Steve wasn’t allowed to do what he chose to do. But maybe it was more likely that Bucky just didn’t have the strength to do what Sarah did. Regardless, Bucky was wound tightly and feeling anxious about everything. "Steve, there’s some waffles and scrambled eggs left over if you want them.”

---

When Christopher saw Steve walk into the kitchen, he reached his arms out. "Dada!" He squirmed in his high chair and when Steve didn't greet him with his usual enthusiasm, his bottom lip jutted out. Steve sighed and picked him out of his chair so he could sit at the table with their son in his lap and feed him. "It's alright, Buck. I'm not hungry," Steve muttered.

---

“Okay,” Bucky said and turned away to clean up dishes in the sink. He hated how Steve picked up Christopher and held him like it was a burden. Steve had just sighed and flopped in his chair like spending time with his first son was a nuisance and the last thing he wanted to do.

Bucky heard Christopher humming and then rattling off the colors he had finally learned. He couldn’t pronounce them very well but at least he could distinguish yellow, blue, green, pink, and red fairly easily. He still struggled with telling the difference between yellow and orange and blue and purple.
Adriana looked nervously over at Bucky because she'd never seen Steve like this. He was doing his best to try and be normal, but Steve felt like absolute shit and he didn't even want to be out of bed right now. "Good boy, Christopher," he praised when he went on about colors and pointed to objects in the room even if they weren't the correct color. "Is the spoon blue?"

Becca looked over at Bucky and asked, "Would you rather I babysit while you and Steve go to the cemetery today?"

---

"Boo!" Christopher shouted and gripped the spoon. "Boo!" He didn't seem to get that something was wrong with his parents today.

Bucky wasn't really sure what he wanted. He already had everyone dressed and ready to leave once they all finished eating. And he thought it would be important for everyone to visit Grant. But he also didn't like that Steve would hardly make eye contact with anyone, including Christopher. Maybe Steve really should just stay home. He would be less angry if he got to do what he wanted and nothing else. And Bucky wouldn't want to shake him and tell him to at least smile and tell his babies that he loves them all. "Uh... I guess... whoever wants to go, can go. If you don't want to go, then don't feel obligated." It was mostly meant for Steve.

---

Christopher's enthusiasm managed to draw the tiniest, tired smile out of Steve for just a moment. "Yes, that's a blue spoon," he said flatly as he rubbed Christopher's back. "You're a smart boy. Do you want more food?" Steve heard Bucky's response but he didn't feel like he had a choice to stay back. Everyone else voiced that they wanted to go, either because they wanted to visit the people buried there, or as emotional support. "I'll go," Steve conceded.

---

Bucky took a deep breath and held it for a while. "Okay," he finally muttered in defeat. His whole body felt like it was on edge. His very being, his soul, everything felt like it was being pulled as tightly as it could be pulled today. "Everyone, get your shoes and coats on then we will go. It's pretty cold outside so wear something warm."

---

When Steve went to get Christopher dressed, the little boy squirmed and protested. "No, Dada," he insisted, trying to run and play with Diana instead.

"Christopher, please, we need to keep you warm." Steve pleaded. It took longer than usual but he finally wrestled their son into a jacket and Christopher looked very angry for it.

He stomped up to Bucky and put his hands up. "Papa. Off."

---

Bucky bent down and picked up Christopher and held him tight to his chest so he wouldn't squirm as much. "Sorry, Bean, you have to wear the jacket until we get back home." Bucky looked around to make sure everyone was all set. Becca was holding Adriana's hand and Lilly was holding Sarah May who was already snuggled down on Lilly's chest to keep warm. "Okay, Adriana, put your hat on your head, not in your pocket, then we can go."

---
Adriana sighed and put her hat on. Steve wondered what was wrong with their kids that they were opposed to being reasonably dressed for cold weather. Steve decided to put Diana on her leash because everyone else had his kids and he needed something to keep him distracted. She gave a bark and wagged her tail before leading the way out of the house.

---

Bucky took a deep breath again and then corralled all his family out the door. He locked up behind them and stuck Christopher inside his coat and zipped it up so he would be warmer. Steve was leading the way only because Diana wanted to be in front. And Bucky was trailing several feet behind everyone and just working on keeping his tears back for now.

---

About halfway to the cemetery, Steve had Diana slow down and he fell in line with his husband. Usually, he was more reserved about affection in public but he could tell that Bucky needed it. He reached over and laced his fingers with Bucky's to give his hand a small quick squeeze. "I'm sorry."

---

Bucky glanced down at Steve’s hand in his and he gave it a squeeze back before letting it go. He didn’t want to deal with anyone’s homophobia on his son’s birthday. He looked up at Steve and tried to keep himself from screaming at him that this whole thing wasn’t fair. But he just sniffled and said, “For what?” For not wanting to leave the bed? For coming along just because Sarah told him to? For shutting down once again and putting everything on Bucky?

---

Steve looked a bit taken aback when Bucky asked why he was sorry. He looked away with a glower, angry and upset. They shouldn’t even have to be going out here. They should be all home, celebrating their second son’s birthday with a house full of children, including Grant. "I don’t want an argument, Buck," he said tiredly.

---

“I’m not looking for an argument,” Bucky said sternly back. “I want to know.” He squared his shoulders as he walked to try to seem more put-together than he was right now. Steve always had the physical advantage with his height and build and weight but Bucky would always try to puff himself out just a little to even things up as much as he could.

---

Steve huffed and gave Bucky a look when he leveled up to him in such a bombastic and clearly intentional way. He had very little patience to begin with today and he was trying to save it so he could be more emotionally available to his husband but all he felt was anger. "I'm sorry I'm not supporting you the way you need me to."

---

“You could have stayed home. I said it was your choice. I wasn’t going to say a thing about it if you chose to stay in bed,” Bucky responded and held Christopher close to his chest and kissed his head. "You would have been happier.”
"Ma yelled at me, I didn't have much of a choice with her," Steve reminded. "And you wouldn't have been happier having to do this on your own." Christopher snuggled up to his papa's chest and babbled something into his coat.

---

Bucky kissed Christopher a few more times and covered his face a little more with his hat. "Your mom doesn’t control what you do. And just doing what she wants you to because she yelled doesn’t make anyone happy.” He paused and wiped at his eyes. "And I don’t know what would have made me happier. I know what I had hoped for today but I didn’t get it. And I wasn’t even hoping for much.” All he was asking was for Steve to make this time be an equal effort on both their parts.

---

Christopher was satisfied with the kisses but he moodily pushed the hat back up. Steve felt like he got a punch in the gut when Bucky expressed how disappointed he was. "Can I try again?" Steve asked. "Can I try to make it up to you?" He didn't deal with grief well but he wanted to try for his husband.

---

Bucky sighed and reached out for Steve’s arm and stopped them just outside the cemetery gates. The rest of the family was headed inside but Bucky held him back. He looked up into Steve’s eyes and relaxed his body a little bit in a show of compromise. “Today is about all of us. Okay? You can’t shut down again. I didn’t get to properly mourn our son and my friend last year. I can’t be made to hold all the burdens again this year too.”

---

Diana gave a little tug to follow the rest of the family inside but Steve held her back with him and Bucky. He looked back into his husband's eyes and nodded. "Alright... I'm sorry, Bucky. I'll be better this year," he promised. "Want me to carry Christopher?" He was hoping that would be a good starting point.

---

“You can be upset. You can be angry. You can scream about how unfair it was that we had to lose our son,” Bucky said and let the tears fall from his eyes. “But you can’t forget that the rest of us feel the exact same way. You can’t forget that our family needs us. You can’t forget that this affects all of us. And you... you can’t forget that I love you and I love our babies and our girls and your mom. I love this family. And I need my family together today.”

---

Steve's heart broke when he saw the tears come from Bucky's eyes. He brought his hand up to dry them and Christopher whined a little when he saw his papa cry. His bottom lip jutted out and a few big messy tears came out of him, too. Adriana came running back to Bucky when the rest of the family got too far ahead. "Papa, are you coming?"

---

Bucky transferred Christopher over to Steve and then covered his face in his hands. “Yes, Peanut. Give me a few minutes,” he said softly and gestured at a bench a few feet away that had a light dusting of fallen leaves on it. “I need to sit. I’ll come meet up with you all in a few minutes.”
Steve cuddled Christopher close once he was passed over. "I love you, Buck. I'll see you soon," he said. He held Christopher with one arm and handed Bucky Diana’s leash. He walked with Adriana to catch up with the rest of their family. Diana sat down next to Bucky and she laid her head down on his lap while she waited for Bucky to say what to do next.

Bucky curled his arms around Diana and just cried in her fur. She was a little past a year old as well. They got her when she was about three months. He was grateful every day that they decided to get a puppy for Steve. Diana had really been helpful for him and she was so good with the kids too. “You’re a good girl, Diana,” he whispered and sat up to watch Steve and Adriana walk up to the headstones and plop down next to Becca and Lilly.

Steve sat down on the ground and had all three of his children in his arms - Christopher and Sarah May in each one while Adriana sat in his lap. He’d taken them here often, so Adriana knew of this place even though she didn't understand why they were celebrating a birthday when her brother never was here but went right to heaven.

Bucky took a few more minutes and then got up off the bench and let Diana lead him over to the rest of the family. The girls were talking with their parents and updating them on what happened since the last time they had come to visit. Bucky kissed the top of both his sisters’ heads and then squeezed next to Steve and wrapped an arm around him. “Did you explain that it’s his birthday?”

Steve nodded. As soon as Bucky came over, Sarah May reached her little hands out for Bucky. "Papa," she said in her little voice.

"I don't get it," Adriana said to Bucky. "How come it's his birthday if he was always in heaven? Why's he here?" she asked, pointing at the gravestone.

Bucky took Sarah May from Steve and he tucked her inside his jacket and zipped it up like he did with Christopher before. “Well, Adriana, it’s pretty complicated. Are you ready to hear a complicated story?” he asked with a weak little smile and poked her nose.

Sarah May stopped fussing once she was in Bucky's coat. Adriana leaned into Steve for warmth and Steve wrapped his arm around her now that it was free. "Okay," she said, looking up at him. "What's 'complicated' mean?"

“Complicated' means that it could be confusing at first, but if you pay attention, you will understand,” Bucky said and gently rocked side to side to try to get Sarah May to maybe sleep for a little bit. “So, you’ll have to be my big girl and listen really well to Papa.”
Adriana considered for a moment before she nodded her head. "I can be a big girl, Papa," she agreed. Christopher squirmed to get down and Steve watched as he toddled over to the gravestone and looked at it curiously. He had been here plenty of times and recognized it, but still didn’t know what to make of it.

"Okay, Big Girl," Bucky said and smiled at Adriana. "So, you see, Grant is our son, your brother. And even though he isn’t around anymore, that doesn’t mean he stops being our son and your brother. He will always be those things. And Daddy and I want to celebrate his birthday with him and with all of you. We want you to grow up knowing that your brother, even though he isn’t here, loves us and we love him." He paused and wiped his eyes of tears. "And the same thing with your Granny and Papaw. They are still your grandparents even though you never met them and they are in heaven too. And we can come down here and talk to your grandparents and your brother whenever you want to."

Steve reached out and rubbed Bucky's back reassuringly while he spoke. "Grant was born not too long before Sarah May was. He probably would’ve been about her size right now," he explained with a thick voice. "Maybe even smaller. He was really little when he was born."

Adriana looked at the two of them. "But how come he's in heaven already?"

"Um..." Bucky’s lip quivered and he had to turn and shove his face in the crook of Steve’s shoulder as a few breathy sobs escaped him. Sometimes, the images of seeing Missy on the table and Grant cold and still would burn so brightly behind his eyes. He could still feel his son in his arms as he tried to pretend that he was fine. He heard his own shouting and angered roars as he tore the hospital room apart. He knew he would never, ever forget those things. And today was the strongest that those memories had been.

Steve remembered how scary it had been, seeing Bucky holding their lifeless, little boy in the hospital and insisting that he was going to wake up. If only Bucky had been right. "He was very sick when he was growing inside of his mommy's belly," he said. "He wasn't able to live on earth, so God took him up to heaven so he could live there."

Adriana thought about it and reached out to grip Bucky’s hand to comfort him. But she was still confused. "If it’s a good thing that God took him to be in heaven, why is everyone crying about him being there?" No matter how much they tried right now, she wasn’t going to be able to understand this whole thing.

"Because we miss him," Steve explained. "You miss your papa when he goes to work, so it's kind of like that. We wish he could be with us even though we know that he can't be." He somehow managed to hold the tears back as he explained.
Christopher knocked on the headstone like he was knocking on a door. "Hi?"

---

“Oh,” Adriana hummed and looked to her brother who now had his ear pressed to the headstone to try to hear something. “So, he isn’t gonna come home? Not like Papa comes home from work?”

---

Steve shook his head. "No, Peanut. He isn't," he said quietly. "We have to wait until it's our turn to go to heaven to see him again. But that's going to be a long, long time."

---

“Oh...” she said again, seeming to finally understand the gravity of it all just a little better. She leaned back against Steve’s chest again and just watched Christopher for a bit. Bucky tried to decide whether he should stop his son from trying to get an answer from the headstone or if he should just leave him.

---

After a few unsuccessful attempts at getting an answer, Christopher went over to Bucky and tugged at his shirt. "Papa." He pointed at the headstone with a confused look. His parents would always talk to it but Christopher never heard it answer back.

---

“I know, Bean, I know,” Bucky breathed and pulled Christopher on to his lap next to Sarah May. “He can’t say ‘hi’ back. But Granny and Papaw are watching out for him and giving him a good first birthday. And I’m sure they are loving seeing all of us today.”

---

Adriana stood up and gave the headstone a little pat. "Happy birthday, 'Grand'." She said. She wasn't good at T's at the end of words.

Steve grabbed onto Bucky's hand tightly and made a sad noise. "You're such a good sister, Adriana. Do you want to give Granny and Papaw love, too?"

---

Adriana nodded and moved over to pat the headstones of her grandparents. “Hey, Peanut,” Bucky said and pointed to his mother’s name. “You see that? It says ‘Winnifred.’ Do you remember that was the name that Daddy and I picked for your middle name?”

---

"Winn-I-Fred," she repeated deliberately. Then she giggled. "Papa, I can't read that good. That's a long word," she said, pointing at the headstone.

Steve managed a little smile at that. "But, you're getting better and better at reading every day."

---

“It’s okay, Adriana,” Bucky assured her and looked at his mother’s name again. “You’ll get it soon. You’ll be able to read and write a lot of things before you know it. Daddy and I are already so proud of the words you know.”

Becca knelt down close to Adriana and pulled her in for a hug. “And your papa took way too long to learn his alphabet. You’re already way ahead of him.”

---

Steve said, "Yeah, you're a fast learner." Adriana had been a little behind kids her age based on the books he read about it but she was really taking to learning new things and was quickly catching up.

Adriana smiled and hugged her aunt back. "Papa didn't know his alphabet?" She sounded shocked that her papa hadn't always known everything.

---

“No, no, he didn’t know his alphabet,” Becca confirmed and gave a cheeky little grin over at Bucky. “He also didn’t know how to tie his shoes. He finally learned to tie them when I was learning how to tie mine. He still does it the 'bunny ears' way.”

Bucky scoffed and shook his head at his sister. “This is defamation, Becca. How rude. Also, the 'bunny ears' way is just easier than the adult way.”

---

Adriana giggled, not believing Becca for a second. "No," she said. "Papa is smart." Steve thought it was goddamned adorable that Adriana thought that Bucky was the smart one in the family over Becca. Becca probably didn't hear that one often.

---

“I am smart. Thank you, Adriana,” Bucky said. He felt a little lighter - a little better. His family was together and that was everything to him. He wished they weren’t hovering around gravestones, but he couldn’t change that. So, he thought he may as well embrace whatever he could get. He needed this.

---

Becca waggled her finger at Bucky. "Enjoy it while it lasts. One day she's going to turn into a snobby teenager just like us.”

Steve said a prayer in front of Grant's grave before doing the same for Bucky's parents. He saw Diana sniffing around like she had to use the bathroom. "I think we should head out. I don't want her going on someone's grave."

---

“Okay, Baby, good idea. Let’s go home.” Bucky gathered Sarah May and Christopher into his arms and stood up before passing his daughter off to Lilly again and making sure Becca was holding Adriana’s hand.

---

Steve took Diana by the leash and had to pause on the way home to clean up the mess she made on a tree outside the bakery. Steve was feeling a little less heavy-hearted after visiting Grant with the family even though every fiber of his being ached for him to be here with them.
Once they got back to the house, Bucky felt the weight of everything fall right back down on him. Now that they were home again, he figured Steve would go straight to their room and sulk. He knew that the kids would need snacks soon and naps. Then, he also needed to get stuff ready to have their friends over for a memorial dinner. And he and Sarah were going to make food but suddenly Bucky felt like he could just collapse.

Steve wasn’t feeling good by any means but he was at least able to think of someone other than himself now. He saw the way Bucky carried himself and he walked over to him so he could wrap him up in a big hug. He pet his fingers through his hair and nuzzled him gently. "How about you lay down with Diana and the babies and I can take care of snacks and cooking?"

Bucky pressed himself against Steve and squeezed his arms around him. He appreciated the gesture but something in him worried that Steve would shut down in the middle of it and nothing would get done. Bucky shook his head and stood up straight. “It’s okay. I’m okay. I can handle it. I’ve got it,” he sounded as determined as he could in that moment and he might have gotten away with it if his body wasn’t visibly shaking so badly.

Steve wasn’t convinced with Bucky moving the way that he was. "Baby... you're not okay," he said softly. "You're shaking like a leaf." Steve ran a hand up and down Bucky's arm. "Would you prefer it if both of us went upstairs with the babies? I'm sure they wouldn't mind napping on our bed with us."

“What about dinner? Our friends are coming over tonight and we need to have the chicken marinating just about all day. And the girls still have class tomorrow so they need to do homework and I don’t want to make your mom do all the work,” Bucky rambled and looked around wildly as if he was expecting a group of cooks and assistants to appear out of thin air.

"We can order in food," Steve said. "They'll understand if we weren't feeling up to cooking today." He felt bad that Bucky was stressing out over this. "We can order from the diner and bring it all back for everyone," Steve suggested. "We still have the cake we baked, so they'll still have something homemade."

Bucky’s breathing picked up as Steve talked and he could feel his body reacting to anxiety too strongly. He needed something. He needed liquor. But he couldn’t have liquor. Maybe a cigarette. But he was already three months without a cigarette. And he just couldn’t get himself calmed down. His over-active brain immediately assumed he was having a heart attack.

Steve slid his hand down to lace their fingers together. "Baby, breathe," he said gently but firmly, locking his eyes with Bucky with an intensity that silently demanded Bucky to focus on him and what he was saying. "Take a deep breath in. Okay, now exhale..."

---

Bucky whined in the back of his throat but he stared into Steve’s eyes and pulled a shaky breath into his lungs and then pushed it back out. He did this a few more times and squeezed Steve’s hands tightly until he felt like he was calming down again. After a couple minutes, he buried his face in Steve’s chest and just cried. He had just gotten so worked up for a couple seconds and he didn’t know what to do.

---

When Bucky started to sob into his chest, Steve held him tighter. "Oh, Bucky..." he said softly, giving him a heartbroken look. "I'm so sorry, Love." He kissed the top of his head and stroked his hair slowly. "I'm here for you, Bucky." Steve closed his eyes to stop any of his own tears from falling. He was going to try to be there for everyone today.

---

Bucky just stayed there for a bit and then eventually peeled himself away from Steve to stare up at him. “Okay...we... we will order food. I can call Tim and have him pick it up. It’ll just be a quiet night. It’ll be calm. I can be calm.” He tried his best to smile at Steve but it didn’t really work. “I-I can handle it.”

---

Steve opened his eyes once he felt Bucky pull away from him. "Alright," he said. He kissed Bucky's forehead.

Christopher came over and tugged on Bucky's hand. "Papa," he said with a bit of urgency. Once he had Bucky's attention he began to sign the word 'hungry'.

---

“Oh, Bean,” Bucky said and bent down to pick up his son and give him a little smile. “What do you want to eat? Make it a good one because after you have a snack, it’s nap time and Papa really needs you to sleep for a bit.” Adriana came skipping in then too and pulled herself up on to a chair at the table. “Okay, I’m missing my other daughter,” Bucky observed and looked around for Sarah May. “Who has Ya-Ya?”

---

"No nap," Christopher said distractedly as he looked over to the jar of cookies on the counter. "Mm," he grunted hungrily, pointing at the jar. Adriana ran back to the living room and led Sarah May into the kitchen by wiggling her pacifier in front of her as Sarah May crawled towards it.

---

Bucky set Christopher in his high chair and then watched Sarah May work her way over to him. “Okay... taking her pacifier is a little unconventional, but that’s okay,” Bucky murmured and picked her up to put her in her chair too. “Steve, Baby, can you get juice in their sippy cups. I’m going to make Adriana a sandwich and the babies can have deli meat and tomatoes.”
Steve went to get everyone their juice. "I told Adriana she's not allowed to pick up the babies without an adult watching," he said. Adriana liked to hold her siblings but after Steve had seen her hold Sarah May pretty precariously while trying to climb onto the couch, he had to set some limits.

---

Bucky got half a sandwich made up for Adriana and he put it on her favorite green plastic plate. “I just don’t want Ya-Ya to bite her. She’s been doing that lately when she’s upset.” He set the plate down in front of Adriana and then set to work getting bits and pieces of meat and vegetables for the babies.

---

"Ya-Ya bit me tomorrow," Adriana said.

"Yesterday, Peanut," Steve corrected patiently. He couldn't help but wonder if Grant would have been a teething terror like Sarah May was right now.

"Papa!" Sarah May whined, getting impatient when she saw the food.

---

Bucky eyed both his daughters and then looked to Steve. He guessed if Adriana didn’t make a big deal out of it, then she was okay. He sighed and set food down in front of the babies. “Adriana, are you going to take a nap after your snack? The babies will, but if you’d rather stay down here with Nana, that would be okay.”

---

"I think I want a nap," Adriana said. She liked having one-on-one time with her nana but she was also kind of tired. "Can Diana sleep with me?" Adriana could be a dog-hog sometimes but Steve was happy to share his good dog with his kids.

---

Bucky gave her a kiss on her forehead and then went to get himself some food. “That’s up to Daddy. But I think Daddy and I are going to have a nap, too, so he probably won’t mind if Diana is with you this time.”

---

Steve nodded. "You can have Diana for your nap," he said. "I think she really likes cuddling with you. She tells me you give the best hugs." Steve sat down next to Bucky and leaned into his side a little. After their kids were done with their snacks, Sarah May looked tired but Christopher didn’t look ready to sleep at all.

---

“Bean, can you try to sleep?” Bucky asked and squished his son’s face with his hands gently, playfully. “Please. That’s all I want from you today. Just an hour of sleep. An hour, Christopher.” He waited for a response and all he got was two little hands reaching to grab his hair and pull it from the tight bun.

---
Christopher giggled wildly. "Papa, play," he insisted.

Steve cleaned up the plates and rubbed Christopher's back. "Sweetheart, you have to take a nap. Aren't you tired? Ya-Ya is having nap time. Don't you want to sleep like Ya-Ya?"

---

“Christopher, I'll let you sleep on my tummy. You like that. Daddy and I will let you nap with us in the big bed,” Bucky said, trying his best to convince him. “Nap on Papa, Bean?” He looked over and saw Sarah May was asleep in her high chair and Adriana was already on her way up to her room with Diana in tow.

---

Christopher didn't entirely understand what his pop was saying to him but he could tell that it was some sort of compromise in his favor. He raised his arms up so Bucky could pick him up. Steve stood up and very gingerly picked their sleepy daughter up into his arms. "I'll tuck our girls in and you get Christopher?"

---

“We will come up to bed in a second. His face is messy,” Bucky said and worked on wiping Christopher’s cheeks and mouth before heading back upstairs to lay curled up in bed. Christopher allowed his papa to put him on his chest and he waited there patiently for Steve to show up again. He really wasn’t in the mood to sleep and he kind of wanted all the attention from his parents right now.

---

It was easy to put Sarah May and Adriana to bed. Steve sang them each a lullaby even though Sarah May was already asleep. When he got to their room, Christopher was talking to Bucky and showing no sign of tiredness. "He's giving you one heck of a time right now, isn't he?"

---

“He’s not having any of this,” Bucky said and looked up at Steve. “I just need one hour from him. That’s all I want. Help.” He reached out for Steve and Christopher crawled up further on Bucky’s chest to snuggle up under his chin. “I think he’s trying to get more attention than his siblings. He’s getting more stubborn about napping and letting us be anywhere without him.”

---

Steve laid down next to them and reached out so he could pet his hand over Christopher's little back. "I try so much to have each of them get one-on-one attention during the day but it's hard," he said apologetically. "Bean, don't you know you're going to be grumpy if you don't sleep?" he said to him. Steve looked back at Bucky. "Maybe if we sing to him he'll sleep?"

---

“I know you do, Baby. He just thinks he deserves more time because he was here first. He’s just not convinced that his siblings are just as important as him,” Bucky said and gently took Steve’s hand. “Maybe singing will help. Or maybe if we fall asleep, he will decide that he wants to sleep too.”

---

Steve chuckled. "Yeah, I can imagine he's a little annoyed that he's not the only shining star in our sky anymore.” He kissed Christopher’s cheek and then Bucky’s. He snuggled closer, draping an arm around his son and his husband and sang a hymn quietly.

---

Bucky hummed softly with Steve since he knew this one and brushed a finger down Christopher’s nose. It was something his parents did all to time to make his sisters sleep. It was just a distraction to have the baby watch the finger go down to his nose and his eyes would close every time until they stopped opening again. It only sometimes worked on Christopher.

---

Christopher fell into the trap a little and looked like he was about to sleep but he whined and pushed his hand away. He knew what Bucky was trying to do. However, the damage was already done and Bucky had made him sleepy. Christopher ended up reluctantly falling asleep not long after. "Such a stubborn kid,” Steve said fondly. "How are you feeling, Buck?"

---

Bucky sighed in relief once his son was asleep on his chest with his hand partly in his mouth. “I’m tired, Steve. I’m so tired. But I’m tired a lot nowadays. Today, in particular, is just really bad. But, of course, it is. This day is always going to be difficult.”

---

"Is there anything I can do to lighten the load? You do so much for us and I hate that you don’t get to spend as much time here as you want to,” Steve said. "I know there isn’t anything that can make either of us feel better today. But how can I help you tomorrow?"

---

Bucky didn’t really know how to respond. There wasn’t really anything that Steve was able to do to make things a little better for Bucky. It was all either things Bucky needed to do for himself or things that were out of their hands anyway. He was just quiet for a while and then decided to bypass the question for now. “In four weeks, it’ll be a year since I last drank. I’ll get my one-year sober chip. And that’ll also mark four and a half months without a cigarette.”

---

“I know, I’ve been counting,” Steve said, rubbing a hand over Bucky's arm. "I'm so proud of you, Baby. You're going to keep earning more and more as time goes on. I know you can do it.” He kissed his cheek. "Our babies are only going to know their perfect, loving pop. And that's thanks to the work you've done.”

---

Bucky sniffled and let some tears build up on his eyes. “God, I hope so. I worry every day that I’ll mess up again. Or I worry that I’ll be like the old guys who are in AA because they quit and were sober for decades and then something happened and they broke down again. I’m worried that I’ll be around people who are drinking and I’ll think that, you know, one beer will be fine. I’ll be fine. And then I’m passed out in the Bronx or Staten Island with no idea how I got there or something. Did you know Clint bought a second fridge for his beer and it’s hidden so I can’t find it? Because he doesn’t want me to even lay eyes on it when I’m at his place.”

---
“That's just Clint being a good friend. I know that he knows you're strong enough to resist, but why make that extra work for you?” Steve said. "If you knew Clint had a painkiller addiction, wouldn't you keep your medicine out of sight just in case?” Steve squeezed his hand. "I know your addiction won't get the better of you again.”

---

Bucky nodded and brought Steve’s hand up to kiss it a few times. “I'm going to try my hardest not to let it. And if Becca is still living here once she’s old enough to have alcohol, if she decides to drink, I’ll have to just ask her not to bring it in the house or to not tell me if she has it. I doubt she will drink, though, after dealing with me – and our mom, somewhat.”

---

Steve nodded. "See? This is why you're not going to relapse. You're so conscious of it and you have everyone here ready to support you. You have so many friends and family members ready to do anything to help." He kissed him. "And you have four extra reasons not to pick up a drink," he added, nodding at Christopher to show he was talking about their kids.

---

“I know. I know I do. I have so many people who need me. And I'll just keep getting more people added to it. I won't relapse. I'm not going to let myself,” Bucky said, slightly more determined now, a little less nervous. “I can do it. I didn’t think I could quit in the first place and I did. I didn’t think I could give up cigarettes but I did. I’m doing this.”

---

Steve smiled encouragingly. "Our kids have such a good role model to look up to. It doesn't matter what you used to do. What matters is that you had the willpower to change.” He kissed him gently. "I admire you so much, Buck. I hope our kids will see how amazing their papa truly is.”

---

Bucky let himself cry again because he really needed encouragement today and he was going to take any help Steve gave him. So he cried and stared at his husband and snuggled Christopher and hoped that his parents and Grant were as proud of him as Steve was. “I love you, Steve Rogers-Barnes.”

---

"I love you too, my perfect husband." Steve pet his hair. "Get some sleep, Love. You've had a long day already and we have company coming over later." As heavy of a heart Steve had today, he was able to ease the pain by channeling his focus on making Bucky feel better. He could do this.

---

Bucky nodded and gently scooted closer to Steve so he was cuddled up against him and Christopher was cocooned in the crook of their arms together. “Just an hour. I promise. Then you can wake me up and I’ll start getting things ready. Okay?” He was so tired he wasn’t able to wait for Steve’s answer before he was asleep with his hand bunched in Steve’s shirt.

---

"Okay," he said. Steve didn't end up sleeping. He stayed up, admiring how perfect his husband and their son looked sleeping cuddled up next to him. After an hour passed, Steve gently pet Bucky's hair. "Hey, Buck... it's been an hour, love, it's time to get up."

---

Bucky slowly woke up and saw that Christopher was still asleep. "Oh, hey!" he whispered excitedly. "Look. He’s still out. Let’s try to get him to his crib without waking him up and then I’ll go clean up downstairs. Becca said she would help me get things all looking more presentable."

---

Steve smiled as he looked at their sleeping son again. "Alright," he whispered back. "I'm going to lay down just a little longer. I didn't sleep," he explained. All he needed was a few minutes to close his eyes. And a little bit of alone time before everyone came over would definitely help.

---

Bucky nodded and gave Steve a little kiss before gently getting off the bed so he could go get Christopher to his crib. He left Steve alone for a long while, just letting him rest. And he must have fallen asleep at some point or another because he still hadn’t come down by the time Tim had arrived with food and condolences.

---

Steve only woke up when Adriana and Diana came running into the room at the sound of company coming over. She didn't want to go downstairs to see who it was until she had her papa or daddy with her. Steve woke with a start and felt pretty damned groggy and worn out, but he scooped up his daughter anyway and carried her downstairs.

---

Bucky and Tim were in the middle of setting food out in bowls and plates on the counter so everyone would be able to just walk through the line once the rest of their friends got there. "So, how are your kids handling their mom being pregnant again?" Bucky asked.

“They are indifferent, I think,” Tim said and then turned and noticed Steve in the doorway looking grim. “Oh... hey, Buddy.”

---

Adriana looked less shy when she recognized Tim. "Hi, Mister Tim," she said, hugging Steve as he carried her. Steve walked over to give Tim a one-armed hug and thanked him for coming. "Do you two need help setting up?" Steve asked, shifting Adriana onto his hip so he could sort of free up his second hand.

---

“I've got it handled,” Bucky said and glanced over at Steve. “Tim is going to make coffee and some sort of iced raspberry tea that he likes and then we should be ready.” He was a little bit frazzled, he would admit. “Clint, Nat, and Sam will be here soon if you want to go get the girls from the basement. They have the babies.”

---

"Sounds like a plan. That just means I get to play some more with our favorite peanut." Steve tickled Adriana's sides and she squealed with laughter. Steve was hoping that hearing her giggle would lift Bucky's spirits a little. "You want to help me get your aunts and your siblings from downstairs?" Steve asked her.

---

Adriana clung to Steve and pressed her face to his shoulder for a second. “Okay, Daddy. Then we can get Nana. She’s sewing. Lilly ripped her sweater so she’s fixing it for her.” She sighed and looked up at Steve and added quietly, “Nana’s been sad today. Papa too. Everyone’s quiet... and I don’t know why.”

---

Steve pet her hair as he walked out of the kitchen and hugged her closer when she spoke. "Peanut, it'll probably be a while before you understand. But everyone is really sad today because we all miss Grant," he explained patiently. "You didn’t get to know your mommy and daddy but you miss them too, don’t you? That's what it's like for us and Grant."

---

“No,” Adriana whispered and looked up at Steve. “I don’t miss them. They left me alone. You and Papa are my Mommy and Daddy. You wanted me.” She stuck her bottom lip out in a pout and a few tears fell down her face. “You wanted me.”

---

His face fell and he gently put Adriana on her feet so he could crouch down in front of her at eye-level. "Oh, Sweetheart... your mommy and daddy loved you," he said. "I know you're hurt, but your mommy and daddy wanted you, too." He gently dried her tears. "Me and Papa love you so much, too. And we are so lucky that you get to be our daughter."

---

“You’re not gonna leave me too?” Adriana asked just to be sure and reached out to touch Steve’s face. “I wanna be a family. I love you. And I love Nana and everyone. And I don’t wanna go back to the orphanage.” She didn’t really think she would ever have to go back to the orphanage but she wanted to double-check.

---

Steve hugged her tightly. "No, you're never going to go back there and we aren't going to leave you." Steve picked her up and wrapped both arms around her so she would feel secure. "Everyone here loves you so much," he said. "You make us happy."

---

Bucky walked out into the hall to get another chair from the closet and he saw Steve on the ground holding Adriana close. “Oh, hey,” he said softly. “What - what’s going on?” He came over and knelt down with them. “Adriana, Sweetie, are you okay?”

---

Steve looked over at Bucky and said quietly, "She doesn't want us to leave her alone like her other parents did. She doesn't want to go back to the orphanage." He gave Adriana a kiss and said, "Go let your papa give you a hug. He's going to say the same thing I did. You don't have to worry about being alone anymore."
“Oh... oh, Peanut,” Bucky pulled her in for a hug and gripped her close. “No, never. You’ll never be alone again. We are your family now and we will always be here for you. Adriana, we love you so much. We love you to the moon and back. You’re our little girl. You’re our precious little girl.”

Adriana sniffled and pressed her face into Bucky's chest. "You promise?" she asked. Even though they’d promised her dozens of times already, she still needed that reassurance. She didn't know how she could handle going back after having a family.

“I promise, promise, promise,” Bucky said and emphasized each word with a kiss to her forehead. “Now, go help your Daddy get the rest of the kids up here so we can be together. Sound good?” Adriana nodded and followed Steve. But now Bucky’s mind was thinking too much. What would they do if the both of them died just like his parents had? Obviously, if Sarah was still around then she would get all the kids. But what if she was gone too? Bucky couldn’t possibly ask Becca to take all their kids - no matter what age Becca was at. And Lilly wasn’t responsible enough to take care of a cat, let alone be solely responsible for all their children. Now he was more stressed, standing in the doorway, watching Tim fold napkins.

Steve wrapped his arms around his little girl and kissed her face a few times before standing up and carrying her towards the basement to round up all the others. Christopher was the loudest, squealing, "Dada!" As he squirmed in Becca's arms.

Tim saw the stressed look on Bucky's face. "What's wrong?"

“Too much...” Bucky admitted quietly and moved closer to Tim so he could speak without being overheard. “Today is hard enough, of course. And I’ve still got college on my mind ever since Becca and I talked about what other options I could have for school. And I’m constantly worried about Steve because he’s still looking for a good therapist. I need to find a new doctor to do my spinal injections. And now... now, I’m thinking about having my will rewritten and who is going to take my kids when I die.”

Tim had a lot of issues on his own, but he also didn't envy Bucky's problems either. They both were up shit creek in their own way and he could empathize with him. However, Bucky's latest worry seemed like a simple fix for him. "If Clint doesn't, I would," he said. He knew Clint loved kids and Natasha might make an exception in this far-fetched case. "What makes you think something’s going to happen before they're old enough, though?"

“Tim, Buddy, you're not going to want to take our baseball team of children,” Bucky said and flopped down in a chair at the table. “You have your own kids and your own life.” He could probably talk to Clint but he wasn’t sure how well it would be received by Natasha if Clint preemptively assuming responsibility of a bunch of kids in the case of their best friends both dying at once. “I’m just worried. My parents were young when they died. I was young when they died. And then I had two kids. People die unexpectedly all the time. And, Lord knows it would be just my luck for it to happen with me and Steve.”

---

"I wouldn't have my kids right now if it weren't for you and Steve making that shelter. I love being a parent. No, I'm not going to pretend that taking care of your army of children would be easy, but it's something I'm willing to do. I won't be offended or anything if you, uh... don't want me to. But I want to give back to you the help you've given me," he said. "I still think you and Steve are going to have a long life and die an old, ripe age."

---

Bucky blinked back his tears and stood up to pull Tim into a tight hug. He kissed his cheek and squeezed him a little bit. “You’re a great friend. You’ve helped the both of us with so much. And Clint loves you to death. Maybe I’ll write in that you both get the kids. You two can share them.”

---

Tim smiled and gave Bucky a tight hug back. "If we share them, I call Sarah May," he said. He loved all of their kids but Sarah May was his favorite. As if fate was trying to spite Tim for what he just said, Christopher ran over to him, waving his hand up at him. "Hi!" He signed Tim's name and then waved some more.

---

“Oh, hey! Looks like you have a little fan, Tim,” Bucky said and watched his son try to scale the side of Tim’s leg to get up to him. The doorbell rang and Becca welcomed the rest of their friends in. They were all dressed nicely in dark shades and Clint brought some extra food with him. Bucky smiled at his friends and went to take Steve’s hand. He decided it was time to celebrate the fact that they were able to be a family and they were able to love Grant and be his parents even though he wasn’t there. He needed to focus on something good today.

---

Clint was quick to take Christopher from Tim once he arrived. Steve's mom had Adriana now, which left Sarah May in Becca's arms. Steve wasn't feeling as awful about having people over as he was this morning. He turned to Bucky and said, "I'm still far from feeling okay, but I'm glad we have our friends and family here. And I'm glad we can face this day together."

---

“I think I feel worse than I did earlier. Or maybe it was just that I didn’t let myself feel anything earlier and then it all came crashing down,” Bucky said. “But we have our kids and our friends and your mom and the animals and we have food. Let’s just be with people who love us and try to focus on all the really good things we get to have.”
When Halloween finally arrived, Steve was more than ready. The whole house was decked out in spooky decorations that the babies constantly got into mischief with. Adriana bugged Steve hour after hour about when they could go trick-or-treating. He told her she had to wait until most people would be home from work. Besides, they had to wait for Bucky to get home as well.

---

Bucky wasn’t great with Halloween. He just got stressed out by all the people running around and the costumes. Also, crime was always up on Halloween. There were lots of parties and drunk people. It was just a lot. And tonight, Becca was going to go to a party with her friends and Bucky was so worried about her. And Lilly decided not to go with them but instead to go to the arcade with her friends. The rest of his kids were going to be with him and Steve out walking around Brooklyn. He was just convinced something was going to go wrong.

---

Steve had fashioned a little bag with paint to look like a fish tank so Adriana could cart around her candy through the neighborhood. Diana was miserable at first to have her costume on but soon accepted her fate. When Bucky came home, Steve rushed over to give him a kiss. "Hey, Baby," he said. "We're going to have a good time tonight, yeah? Your sisters are going to be fine."

---

Bucky pouted and looked up at his husband who was in such a good mood. Bucky really needed to get happy quick because Steve was so cute and excited and Bucky didn’t want to ruin that. “I told them to call home and check in with Sarah at least three times tonight... Becca told me to fuck off.”

---

Since Bucky hadn’t been in much of a festive mood, especially after learning what his sisters were doing, Steve wasn’t going to push for the couple's costume. Steve was now dressed up as a kangaroo.
specifically so he could use a pouch for extra storage for whatever their kids picked up that night. He only looked a little ridiculous. "I don't get what's so hard about calling a few times," Steve said. "Becca's being a teenager, I guess."

---

"I just want to make sure they are okay," Bucky agreed and then finally got a good look at Steve as an animal. That’s not what they had planned. And he knew Steve had the Luke and Han Solo costumes in the closet. He saw Steve perfecting them about a week ago but since then they haven’t come up. “Why are you a deer?” he asked and looked to see his kids all dressed and sitting in the living room playing together with Diana watching over them

---

"Um... It's a kangaroo, not a deer. It was a bit last minute, but I was afraid you wouldn't be in the mood to dress up so I had to come up with a backup plan," Steve said. Wearing his Star Wars costume without Bucky could've seemed like he was trying to push the matter. "The tail kept ripping so I had to throw it out."

---

Bucky laughed and pulled Steve in for a kiss. “Baby, I’m not in the mood to dress up. You’re right. But I’m also very much in the mood to see you happy and having a good time. And I’m a little in the mood to see you in your Han Solo costume and that brown wig.” He grinned and felt around on Steve before he found a zipper. He tugged it down a little and started pushing Steve towards the stairs. “Come on, go take that off. You can be a deer next year.”

---

Steve's face lit up when Bucky agreed to do the costume together. "Yes!" he gasped, shaking his hands excitedly and giving Bucky a kiss. He ran up the stairs and tore off his costume so he could change into the Han Solo one he made. "You're the best. You know that? And I'm sorry your sister was a jerk to you."

---

“It’s Becca. I’m used to it,” Bucky said with a sigh and worked his clothes off so he could put on the Luke costume. “I’m sure our kids will tell me to fuck off at some point in their lives. I’ll be so ready for them as teenagers since I already have experience.”

---

"I don't want our kids to grow up and be bratty teenagers," Steve whined, putting on his wig. "I want them to stay perfect forever. Adriana spent all day yesterday working on writing a letter to me to tell me how much she loves me. I need to show you when we get back. She’s not great with some letters still but she’s trying."

---

Bucky nodded and sat down on the ground to pull the boots on. It was a little difficult. “I know, Baby. But they might. Teenagers have so many hormones and stress going on inside them that they will probably be bratty sometimes.” He glanced over at Steve and saw that his Han Solo pants were very tight.
Steve walked over to Bucky and ran his hand over his back. "I think our kids will be different. They're special and I'll pray to God every night for good teenagers," Steve said. "You look good in that costume, by the way."

"It's not fair that you got Han Solo. Your costume is tight and sexy. Mine is loose and flowing." He stood up and spread out the fabric to make himself look tiny. "I feel small." But he also knew that Adriana would love that they both dressed up. And Steve did look really amazing as Han Solo and Bucky never tried to hide the fact that he thought Harrison Ford was sexy as hell. After all, his second date with Steve was at the movies to see Indiana Jones and he fawned over Harrison Ford the entire time.

"You wanted me to be Han Solo deep down because you wouldn't feel bad having a crush on him in the movies if you have the excuse of me wearing a costume as him once," Steve said. "You still look gorgeous anyway, Buck. You really know how to work a Jedi robe." He winked at him. "Come on, let's show our kids how cool their parents are."

Bucky sighed and headed back downstairs. "The wig is a little strange, I got to say. I thought maybe I would like it but you look different with brown hair. Don't look as much like my husband." He supposed that was kind of the point, though. He wasn't supposed to look like Steve Rogers. He was supposed to look like Han Solo.

"Well, I guess that's a compliment to the hard work I put into my outfit," Steve said. When Sarah May saw Bucky standing next to someone that didn't look like her dad anymore, she started to cry and reach for Bucky. Christopher and Adriana looked at her, not knowing what was her deal.

"Oh, hey! It's okay, Sweet Pea." Bucky said hurriedly and picked up Sarah May and held her close to his chest. He reached over and lifted Steve's wig up. "See? Baby, it's still Daddy. See, Ya-Ya? It's just Daddy being silly. Silly Daddy playing dress-up."

"No," Sarah May mumbled as she wiped her hands over his eyes. "Dada!"

Steve kept the wig off in an attempt to keep Sarah May calm. "Look, Sweetheart! It's me, it's Daddy." He leaned down and kissed her cheek. She pulled her hands away from her eyes and Steve gave her a big smile. "Hey, Cutie." She seemed to be less upset now that she could clearly see that Steve was here but she was still crying quietly. "I guess it was a really good call to not do spooky costumes," Steve said to Bucky.

"She just gets scared so easy. Remember when she screamed at Diana's tail sticking out from under the couch?" Bucky asked and let his daughter wipe her nose on his costume and whine softly in his arms. "She's probably okay now. You can put the wig on again if you want. I'll just hold her so she knows she's okay."
"Yeah," Steve said with a little laugh. He didn't mean to laugh at his daughter's expense but it was kind of funny that such a little thing gave her a start. Steve put the wig on again in front of Sarah May and the baby still had a big old jutted lip but she wasn't crying anymore.

"Can we go?" Adriana asked, trying to be patient but was way too antsy to be calm anymore.

“Yes, Adriana,” Bucky agreed and pulled a stroller from the closet. He was in charge of Christopher and Sarah May and Steve had Adriana and the dog. He set Sarah May in the stroller and got her buckled up before grabbing Christopher and doing the same, much to his annoyance. “Adriana, Peanut, you remember what we talked about? Hold Daddy’s hand until we get to a house and then wait for Daddy to let you go up to get candy then come right back to hold his hand. Okay?”

"I remember!” she said, but she also was just saying it so they would get going. Steve took her hand and made their way out of the apartment. Adrianna dragged Steve up to the first stoop they came across. "Do you say 'trick-or-treat', Daddy, or am I supposed to?"

Bucky was a few feet behind them with the stroller and he was watching Adriana and Steve very closely. He wasn’t going to let them out of his sight. “Go ahead, Peanut. Knock on the door and wait for someone then say ‘trick-or-treat’. You’ve got it.”

The woman in the first house recognized her right away and she gave Adriana a little extra candy because of that. Adriana let go of Steve's hand to run up to Bucky and show him her little hoard. "Look! This is so much candy already!"

“I know, I see,” Bucky said and took her hand so she couldn’t walk off again until Steve could come get her back. “Do you want me to put it in my bag for you? Or are you going to carry it?” She did look very cute with her scientist outfit on and she had little turtle stickers that Becca got her all over her arms.

"I'm a big girl. I can carry it," Adriana said. "Aunt Lilly says girls don't need boys’ help."

Steve stifled a laugh because she was so damned adorable. "You're right. You don't need help because you're a girl, but everyone needs help sometimes because we’re human."

“And I’m not just some boy, Sweetheart, I’m your Papa. There’s a difference. And I’m going to want to help you all the time, no matter what. And that’s the same for Ya-Ya who is a girl and Christopher who is a boy,” Bucky said and let go of her hand once Steve had her other one. “Ready to go to the next house?”
Adriana skipped from house to house gathering up more candy. "You think we should surprise Clint?" Steve asked. "I bet he’d love our costumes and would love to see the kids all dressed up," he continued. Really, he wanted to show off their adorable kids to everyone they knew.

"Yeah, I’m guessing he would like to see them," Bucky said as he stopped to give the babies some carrots to snack on. "He and Tim are closing the shop tonight if you want to swing over there to see them. It'll be Adriana’s first time in the record store."

"That would be cool," Steve agreed. Christopher happily munched on the carrots given and kept asking for more. "You want to see where your papa works, Adriana? He works with Uncle Clint and Uncle Tim at the record shop and they sell lots of music."

Adriana was currently squatting down next to the stroller and looking into the haul of candy in her bag. She was excited for it, but it had also gotten too heavy for her. But she was determined to carry it as much as she could. “Where is the store?”

"It's nearby," Steve said. "We can stop at all the houses on the way there."

Adriana was satisfied with that. As they stopped at more houses and gathered more candy, she was having a tougher time carrying her bag. Also, at one point, Christopher insisted on walking up to a few doors with them. "Papa?" Adriana asked as they walked along a stretch that only had shops. "Why do some people look at us funny?"

“Look at us funny?” Bucky asked, confused, and glanced down at his daughter. “What do you mean, Sweetie?” He had hardly been paying any attention to anyone behind the doors. He kept his eyes on his family and made sure that nothing happened to them. There could have been former presidents behind each door and he wouldn’t have noticed.

Adriana finally gave in and put her bag of candy underneath the stroller. "Some ‘peoples’...” she thought of how to describe it. "They look for a really long time. Daddy says it isn't polite to stare. How come they stare?"

Bucky gave a look over to Steve and shook his head. He knew this was going to come up with Adriana eventually. He just hated that it had to be tonight while she was supposed to be having fun. “You’re right, Adriana. It isn’t polite to stare. Peanut, has anyone ever said anything to you about me and Daddy? Has anyone said anything rude to you?"
Steve's heart sank a little. He was afraid of what would happen once the kids would go to school. Sure, Steve could keep it contained better while homeschooling them but that wouldn't last forever. "Nope. Just stares," Adriana said. "Do they like our costumes?"

---

"Oh, I’m sure they love your costume, Adriana. You are such a good turtle scientist," Bucky said firmly and leaned down to pull her in for a hug and a kiss to her hair. “We are really close to the record store. How about when we get there, Daddy and I can have a talk with you while Uncle Clint and Uncle Tim watch the babies."

---

"Okay," she said, going back to skipping. When they arrived at the record store, she gasped. "They have lots of music just like us!" She said, pointing at the records.

Tim looked up from his spot at the register and beamed. "Hey, you guys. Happy Halloween!"

---

Adriana ran off towards a big tower of records and nearly knocked over an entire table of cassettes on her way. “Adriana, please no running, Baby!” Bucky called after her. He knew he would have to fix in the morning whatever she ruined tonight. "Hey, Tim. We wanted to stop by so you and Clint could see the kids’ costumes. Where is he? In the back?"

---

"He's in the back, yeah. He's probably aware that you guys are here. Adriana stomps around like a dinosaur for someone so small," Tim laughed.

Clint came out of the stock room just at that moment and beamed happily over at them. "Oh, my god! You guys are so cute!" he said to the kids. "And your parents are big nerds!"

---

Bucky flicked Clint in the head and then helped get the babies out of their seats so they could run around too. “Clint, you know you would love to be our Leia right now,” Bucky said. Sarah May, who was doing really well with walking a few feet at a time, started a journey towards Tim the second she was on the ground. Christopher tried to run past Clint to get to a box of records but Clint caught him.

---

"My hair isn't long enough. Maybe I could borrow Steve's wig. Or better yet, you be Leia and I'll be Luke. That makes more sense anyway" Clint teased.

"You got any candy here, Clint? Our kids are kind of expecting it," Steve asked with a little grin.

---

“Register,” Clint murmured and plopped down on the ground to be with Christopher. “Although, if you could leave the Reese’s that would be great because those are my favorite and I plan on eating a lot of them tonight. Also, steer clear of Reggie’s joints hiding out there.”
"How's business been tonight? Has anyone been causing any trouble?" Steve couldn't help his law enforcement instincts and he was protective over where Bucky worked. And he knew kids could cause trouble and graffiti businesses and Halloween was a big night for that.

---

“No, everything has been pretty average around here,” Tim said and brought Sarah May over with him to help Steve get some candy from their bowl. “It’s pretty quiet since everyone is out with their kids or at parties.” He leaned in to whisper to Steve, “Also, I don’t get Adriana’s costume. What is she?”

---

Steve hid the Reese's away so his kids wouldn't go after them. Sarah May wasn't a candy-eater yet but she was interested in the bright-colored wrappers. "She's a turtle scientist," he whispered back to him. "If you compliment her on it, you'll make her day."

---

“Turtle scientist...” Tim mused and looked back to Adriana who was happily mixing disco in with jazz in no particular order. “Adriana, I think your costume is my favorite. Your daddies look pretty good and the babies are pretty cute. But you are an amazing turtle scientist. You’re the best one I’ve ever seen.”

---

Adriana beamed happily up at Tim. "Thank you!" she said excitedly. "I wanna be a ‘tuttle’ scientist when I'm all grown up!"

While everyone as distracted, two men walked into the shop and started to look around. Diana, who had been quietly at Steve's side up until that point, let out a little growl that put Steve on alert.

---

Bucky glanced over at the men and then over to Steve. Steve looked tensed. Maybe he knew these guys and not in a good way. Maybe he had arrested them at some point. All Bucky knew was he didn’t like the look on Steve’s face or the growl from Diana. “Steve?”

---

Steve glanced back to Bucky. "Get the kids in the back, just in case," he whispered quietly. "I don't know what they're up to, but Diana doesn't like them." Which was enough of a tell-sign for Steve that these men weren't the kind of people he wanted around their kids.

---

“Shit,” Bucky whispered and quickly picked up Christopher and signed to Clint to grab Adriana. He paused by Tim and took Sarah May from him. “Tim, stay with Steve. I don’t know what’s going on. Make sure he keeps his head. If there’s some sort of ruckus, he is going to want to over-do it on his lungs.”

---

Tim gave Bucky a thumbs up. Clint was confused why they were going in the back but he wasn't going to cause a fuss with a room full of little kids. The two men meandered like normal but then they took an armful of records and started to walk out of the place without any shame. Steve looked to Tim to make sure he was seeing the same thing. "Hey," he said firmly. "What do you two think you're doing?"

---

Tim, Clint, and Bucky had established a set of secret stomps to use as a sort of code in case of emergencies. They just used the Morse code but it worked. Tim stomped out a Morse ‘P’ to alert Clint and Bucky to call the police from the phone in the back.

The men turned and gave Steve a once over and just started to laugh. “This is what I love about Halloween. Jackasses like this you put on a costume and think they can be a hero.”

---

"Come on, there's no need to act tough. Besides, it'll make things even more embarrassing when this jackass in a costume gets the better of you," Steve answered. "So how about we pay for those albums or put them back?"

One of the guys pulled out a, comparatively pretty small, knife on Steve and opened his mouth to say something, but Diana lunged at him. Her mouth clamped down on his wrist and she dug her paws into the floor as she tugged. The man dropped the knife in shock and started to shout in pain. The other guy took off like a bat out of hell.

---

Tim didn’t really act the part but he was no stranger to physical confrontation. He immediately jumped on the man and brought him down to the ground. He would have gone after the escapee but Bucky told him to stay with Steve. “Got him,” he grunted as he pulled the man’s hands around to his back and dug his knee into his spine. “Police should be headed over.”

---

Steve wanted to go after the one that fled but he didn't want to leave when his husband and babies were just a room away. Diana let go of his wrist once Tim was on top of him, but she paced back and forth in front of him anxiously, whining and growling at the man on the floor. When the police came, Steve called her off and helped Tim up. "Thank you, Buddy," he said. "I didn't realize you were able to do that stuff." He gestured vaguely at Tim, suitably impressed by his ability to tackle a bastard.

---

Tim pulled Steve in for a quick hug and then let out a low chuckle. “Bucky never told you I used to be a street fighter?” he asked and shook his head. “I spent about a decade fighting in the Bronx in an underground competition. I only stopped when I met my ex-wife. I wasn’t half bad.”

---

"If he did, I must've forgotten," Steve said. "Or maybe I was still an officer at the time and I didn't want to know about any illegal activity for my job's sake," he chuckled. He gave him a nod. "Thank you for helping out." Diana rushed into the back once everything was all clear and started to sniff and investigate the kids to make sure that they were well and safe.

---
Tim gave Steve a little doubtful look and said, “Steve, Buddy, most of the people Bucky knows have done illegal stuff. Everyone who works here for sure. Reggie and Bucky with drugs, me with fighting, Clint was a petty thief as a teenager. Natasha knows. She fingerprinted him on their first date apparently.”

---

"I've gathered as much," Steve said with a long tone of awe because he always knew Bucky made claims like that but he didn’t realize he hadn’t’ meant just some drug use or misdemeanors. He didn’t mind all that stuff, he wasn’t mad. He was still very impressed with Tim right now. "But I'm not a cop anymore so now I don't got to pretend my husband surrounds himself with troublemakers." He gave Tim a little nudge to show that he was kidding. "It doesn't surprise me that Natasha would do that. I'm glad that Clint passed her test." He excused himself to go see how everyone was doing in the back.

---

When Diana came to them, Bucky knew it must have calmed down. He was currently down on the ground with her, letting her lick his face and bark softly at the kids in gratitude that they were okay. He looked up and saw Steve and shook his head. “Baby, what happened? We heard Tim stomp and I called the police.”

---

Luckily all of the kids didn't seem to know that anything went on. "They tried to steal a bunch of stuff. When I confronted them, one pulled a K-N-I-F-E on me. Diana bit him but the other got away. Tim held him down until the police came." He spelled out the word so Adriana wouldn't get worried. She didn’t know that word’s spelling yet.

---

“What!” Bucky gasped and got up from the ground quickly. He pulled Steve to the side and checked him over for any injuries. He lifted his shirt up and felt around his neck, half expecting to find a stab wound somewhere. “Jesus...” he whispered and pulled Steve in close. “Why does this always happen?”

---

Christopher walked over to Steve and started to look him over just like Bucky was, wondering if his dad was hiding candy that his papa was looking for. Steve wrapped his arms around Bucky and kissed his cheek. "It's alright, Buck. We live in a city. It happens a lot. I'm just glad we are all safe and unharmed."

---

“It happens too much,” Bucky mumbled into Steve’s shoulder and gripped him tight. He still wanted to move out of the city eventually. He figured he would just retire out in Seneca if he could. He was still trying to convince Steve to do that. But maybe being out of the city sooner could be good. They could get a house in the suburbs or something - somewhere safer than Brooklyn.

---

Steve held the sides of Bucky's face. "It does... but we are all here and that's what counts. Also, you're going to have to check inventory carefully tomorrow because that other jerk may have gotten out with a few records," Steve sighed. "Come on. We should probably head home soon."
Bucky nodded and looked back at Clint who was still holding Sarah May and Adriana. He quickly signed to him about what happened as Tim was coming to the back room. “Okay, the police took him. They have a couple guys out looking for the other one. They also said that it wasn’t a surprise that Nat’s boyfriend and Rogers were in the middle of this. I have a feeling they are going to let her know all about this little debacle later.”

"At least it wasn't Richard who responded to the call or else he may have arrested the wrong guys again," Steve joked. Steve picked up Christopher and kissed his cheek. The toddler giggled and hugged Steve back. "Do you want us to bring you guys back anything before we head home?" he asked Clint and Tim.

“I hate that guy,” Bucky and Clint mumbled at the same time at the mention of Richard.

Tim shook his head and helped get the babies back into the stroller. “No, we should be okay now. You guys should finish out your Halloween.”

Steve snorted with laughter at the two voicing their dislike for Richard. "Point taken," he said.

Christopher signed goodbye to Clint when he was put into the stroller. Sarah May looked up at Tim and said a quiet "bye-bye". Because they were safe here, Steve decided to give Bucky one more kiss before they headed back outside.

They all headed back out into the dark evening and Bucky held a very tired Adriana while Steve pushed the stroller and held Diana’s leash. “Steve, I know everyone’s tired but we are so close to the precinct. I was wanting to stop by tonight anyway to have the candy checked. I don’t want anything dangerous to be in there. And Natasha is there tonight so we can have her help us out real quick.”

Steve nodded and looked down at Adriana. "You hear that, Peanut? We're going to see Aunt Natasha and she's going to check your candy to make sure it's ready for eating," he said, smiling down at her. "You get to see other police officers too and where your daddy used to work."

“Hopefully not Richard, though,” Bucky murmured and lead them around the corner and towards the precinct. “And then, Adriana, I promise, you can have some candy. But remember, Daddy and I said five pieces of candy tonight and then save the rest. Okay?”

"If I'm a good girl, can I have six?" she asked.

Steve shook his head with a smile. "That's a good try, Sweetheart, but you can only have five or else your belly will ache. We don't want that, right?" When they got to the precinct, they were ushered to Nat’s office. Diana wagged her tail and tried to prance over to a police dog, but it gave a snappy bark at her to back off and she sulked back to Steve's side.

---

Natasha came in a few minutes later with her arms crossed. “Decker told me that there was an attempted robbery at the record shop? Why didn’t you call my direct line?” She dropped a pile of cases on the top of her desk grumpily and stared at Steve and Bucky. “Is Clint okay?”

---

"It wasn't a big deal, Nat, it's fine. They didn't have guns on them," Steve reassured. "Clint is okay. He's out of a few copies of The Beatles, I think, but, otherwise, nothing's changed."

Adriana walked up to her shyly. "Aunt Nat? Can you check my candies, please?"

---

Natasha really wanted to add some more colorful sentiments to the discussion but then Adriana was staring up at her and holding her big bag of candy. “Yeah,” she sighed and took the bag. “I’ll be right back.”

Bucky watched her go and then turned to Steve. “That’s weird... Clint always checks in with her. With these new hearing aids, he can use the phone better. He always calls her.”

---

"I don't know. You think they're okay?" Steve hoped that they weren't in the middle of some sort of fight. "I assumed she didn't answer because she was on some other call."

Adriana hugged Bucky's leg. "Papa? Is Aunt Nat mad at me?" she asked sadly.

---

Bucky never knew with those two. Natasha was a closed book and Clint sometimes couldn’t even read her. “I don’t know either. Maybe something is up.” He bent down and picked Adriana up again and kissed her cheek. “No, Peanut, she just had a long day. You know when Aunt Becca gets a little short with you after she has a long day? It’s not your fault at all.”

---

She leaned her head on Bucky's shoulder. "Okay," she mumbled. Adriana rubbed her eyes, starting to get a little tired but she was determined to stay awake to eat her candy.

Steve wrapped an arm around Bucky's waist. "Maybe you can ask him about it at work tomorrow," Steve suggested.

---

“I can try,” Bucky agreed and leaned into Steve’s touch. Both babies were asleep in the stroller and Adriana seemed to be headed that way. “I bet it looked pretty cool facing up to those guys in your Han Solo costume though.”

---

Steve chuckled. "If anyone questions the police report, I shot first," he joked. He rubbed his hand over Bucky's back. "The guy called me a ‘jackass in a costume’. Diana didn't take too kindly to that. God, I'm so glad we have her, Buck. She was the best idea you've had."

---

“Ooh, you’ve come a long way with your Star Wars knowledge, Baby,” Bucky said and gave him a little kiss. “But I don’t think your dog was my best idea. I mean, deciding to have babies together, agreeing to marry you, letting you take me out for drinks that first time. I’m kind of full of great ideas.”

---

“Wait, hold on. I’m pretty sure all of those things were my ideas,” Steve protested with an indignant scrunch to his face. “I proposed to you. And I’m the one who asked you out in the first place. I think it’s thanks to me, really.”

---

Bucky squinted at Steve and made a doubtful little noise. “You took a chance asking out a beautiful young college drop-out with zero prospects in life. And it was my terrific idea to let you buy me things and cook for me,” he joked back. They both knew it was an intense mutual attraction from the beginning.

---

Steve laughed. "Alright, alright. So, you were totally my type and I couldn't keep my eyes off you." He smiled. "We should tell the kids how we met as a bedtime story. I love thinking back to our first dates together. Going to the movies and trying to figure out if the other was actually gay."

---

“You still wondering?” Bucky asked with a cheeky grin and set his hand on the back of Steve’s neck and whispered in his ear, “Cause I can give you some definitive proof tonight once everyone is asleep.” He thought for a second and then added, “But after we get out of these costumes. I don’t want to have sex dressed like Luke and Han.”

---

Steve blushed and nodded eagerly. "What? You don't want to wear these through the night? I've been told this wig is very flattering on me," Steve said. Adriana walked over to the door to try and peek and see how long it would take for her candy to be ready.

---

“I’d rather make love to my husband than Han Solo or anyone else,” Bucky said and took Steve’s hand in his.

Natasha came in a few minutes later and handed the bag of candy back to Adriana. “It’s all fine,” she mumbled and moved to sit on the edge of her desk. “Now, get out of here, you guys, I have a lot of paperwork to do before I can go see Clint.”

---

Steve glanced over at Bucky once and then looked back to Natasha. "Is there anything I can do to help your paperwork? I still remember how to fill all of that stuff out," he offered. He could spare a half hour or so if Bucky didn't mind putting the kids to bed on his own.

---

“You don’t work here anymore, Steve. You aren’t allowed to do that,” Natasha said back and propped her hands up on her hips.

Something was definitely up. Bucky would have to talk to Clint about it. There was a problem between them that he and Steve didn’t know about yet. “Okay, Steve, Baby, let’s just head home and get out of Natasha’s hair.”

---

Steve frowned and tried not to take it personally. "Oh... alright, okay," he said. "It was good to see you, Nat. Thank you for checking the kids' candy." He turned to their babies and said, "Say bye-bye to Auntie Nat." All three kids waved and Christopher was the one who said goodbye the loudest as they walked out.

---

“Something’s up,” Bucky said as the made their way back down the street. “I’ll talk to Clint tomorrow and see if I can’t figure out what happened. I mean, you never know with Clint. He’s not very predictable. He could have done any number of things to piss her off.”

---

"You think it has something to do about kids?" Steve asked. "That seems to be one of their biggest points where they butt heads." He hoped that whatever spat they were having would pass soon. The two of them made a good couple together and he wanted them to be happy.

---

Bucky shrugged. He honestly couldn’t say for sure. It could be kids or marriage or even something as simple as not replacing used up soap bars. “Could be. Let’s not worry too much right now, though. There’s nothing we can do anyway. Let’s get everyone home and sleeping.”

---

"Yeah, I guess you're right," Steve said.

Adriana tugged on Bucky's shirt. "Can I snuggle in your room tonight, Papa?" she asked quietly. Steve looked over at Bucky with pleading eyes, silently begging for Bucky to answer in a way that wouldn’t disappoint their daughter but still allow them to have sex tonight.

---

Bucky noticed Steve’s look and he nodded and held up a hand. He’s got this. He was a pro at negotiating Adriana’s snuggle times. “How about I snuggle in your bed until you fall asleep and I’ll also let you have seven candies instead of five? Or, Nana has been saying that she has had a lack of Adriana cuddles so maybe she would want to snuggle tonight.”

---

Steve's eyes lit up. Bucky was good. Better than good, actually. Adriana mulled it over. She really wanted candy, but she also didn't want her nana feeling sad. "I can snuggle with Nana tonight. I love her lots," she ultimately decided.

---

“Okay,” Bucky said happily and gave her a kiss to her forehead. “And I’ll even let you have six candies because you have been such a good girl today. How about that?” He glanced over to Steve to make sure he was okay with that. Adriana would still sleep and that way he didn’t feel so badly for not letting her cuddle with them. He would let her sleep in their bed the next night if she wanted to.

---

Steve nodded. He was alright with damned near anything if it meant that he got to have sex with Bucky tonight. When they got home, Sarah greeted them all warmly. "I missed you all. The house has been so quiet," she said as she gave each of her grandbabies a kiss. "Did you have fun?"

---

Bucky, being the worrying mother hen that he was, immediately glanced around to see if the girls were home. Although, it was still early in the night and they probably wouldn’t be back for a while. “It was... interesting,” Bucky said honestly as he got the babies out of the stroller and started taking Diana’s costume off. The second the costume was off, the dog started running around and rolling on the floor to celebrate her freedom.

---

"Oh yeah? That sounds like the sort of interesting I'm afraid to hear about," Sarah said.

Steve nodded. "Yeah, I'll fill you in tomorrow. The good news is that Adriana wants to cuddle with you tonight."

---

Adriana nodded tiredly and plopped down on the floor to start picking out her six candies from her bag. “Here, Papa, I picked them,” she said finally and held up the bag for Bucky to take.

“Okay, thank you, Peanut,” Bucky said softly and took the bag back from her. “How about you let Nana help you get your costume off and get a bath then you can pick your pajamas and your blankie and come cuddle. Daddy and I need to get the babies ready for bed.”

---

Steve knelt down so he could give his daughter a hug and kiss. "I love you lots, Adriana. I'm so happy we got to have our first Halloween together today." He gave her one more hug before sending her off with his mom. Christopher and Sarah May were both out still, so Steve carefully picked up one baby while Bucky took the other so they could put them to bed.
Chapter Summary

Second Half of Halloween

It was a pretty quick, painless process to get the babies in their cribs that night. They didn’t wake up while they were changed from their costumes into onesies and they only woke up for a few seconds when Bucky accidentally smacked his knee on the dresser too loudly and let out a grumpy swear. But once they were all set, Bucky turned off the light and stealthily pulled Steve back out of the nursery and into the hall.

---

Steve kissed both Christopher and Sarah May's foreheads when they were both nestled in. After leaving the room, he rubbed Bucky's back and looked at his knee. "You alright, Love? That was a hard hit your knee took," he said with a worried frown.

---

Bucky waved him off as he flicked off the lights in the hall and Adriana’s room. “Oh, it’s fine. Just stings a little,” he assured Steve and headed into their room. “But I am worried about the girls. I know Lilly has two hours before I told her to be home and Becca has four hours but I’m still nervous.”

---

Steve closed their door quietly behind them. "I know you are. I can stay up with you to keep you company until they get back. Or, rather... I can keep you up for the next four hours." He gave Bucky a suggestive wink as he ran his hands over Bucky's chest.

---

Bucky bit his lip and giggly softly at Steve. “I don’t think we can go for four hours,” he said as he wrapped his arms around Steve’s middle and pulled him closer. He also reached up and took the wig off and brushed his hand through Steve’s hair. “That’s better. You look like my Steve.”

---

"If you don't have a little faith in yourself then we certainly won't last four hours," he joked. Steve put his hands on Bucky's hips and leaned in to kiss the tip of his nose. "You still look like Luke. I think I need to take those clothes off you."

---

Bucky was already pulling the two of them towards the bed and once the back of his knees hit the edge, he flopped on the mattress and pulled his arms up over his head. “Come on then, Baby. Undress me while I try to think of good jokes about you eating my dick instead of Halloween candy.”
Steve slowly pulled Bucky's shirt over his head and kissed his neck. "But we didn't have Natasha check your dick out to make sure it was safe for consumption," Steve chuckled. He ran his hand over the front of Bucky's pants. "Nice lightsaber you got there, Luke."

"Oh, come on!" Bucky whined and pulled his legs up so Steve couldn’t get to him. “I’ll give you the lightsaber one because that is pretty good. But Natasha? That’s as bad when I complimented your ass and you said your mom gave it to you.”

Steve pouted and knelt in front of Bucky when he pulled his legs up. He laid his cheek on Bucky's unbruised knee. "But it was a funny joke. All of those were," he complained. He tried to nudge Bucky's legs apart but it seemed like Bucky wasn't convinced yet. So, he gently whispered to Bucky's crotch, "Open sesame."

"Oh, my god!" Bucky groaned and rolled his eyes. He tucked his arms around his legs and rolled in a ball over on his side. “I’m gonna put you on sex probation if you don’t stop.” He glanced back at Steve so he knew he was at least half-way serious about this.

Steve threw his head back and cackled. However, he sobered up at the look Bucky gave him. Steve crawled into bed behind Bucky and wrapped his arms around him. "I'll stop, I promise," he said, grinding his hips against Bucky's ass. "I want to make love with my perfect husband and suck his dick dry."

Bucky whined softly and couldn’t help himself from pressing back against Steve. He wanted that too. He couldn’t keep this game up any longer. They only had sex every so often now that they had three kids. Whenever they could get it in, they had to get it in quick. “Fine. But one more bad joke and I’m putting tape over your mouth.”

"Why put tape over my mouth when you can put your cock in it instead?" Steve slowly slid his hands down Bucky's chest and tummy. When he got to Bucky's crotch, he gave a firm squeeze and rubbed up against his ass some more. "I want you so bad, Buck. Can I take your pants off now?"

Steve did have a point. That was usually the best way to get him to stop talking. “Fine. Undress me and suck my cock,” he said with a sort of faux resignation as if it was more of a nuisance to him than anything. “But if you want this to last a while, you might want to take it easy on me. Bring me close and then let it go away. And then finger me back to the edge and then stop altogether. You owe me some good teasing after that nonsense.”
Steve slowly stripped Bucky's pants off and then took his time rubbing Bucky's cock through his underwear before taking that off as well. "How many times do you think I can get you close before you lose it? Three times? Or maybe you're gonna shoot off like some horny teenager on the first attempt anyway."

---

"If you keep your mouth running, I just might," Bucky conceded and watched Steve with dark, needy eyes. Tonight also felt like a good night to be just slightly kinkier. It was a rare treat that they used anything from their sex box. Halloween was the day for treats, after all. "Can we mix things up a little bit? Even if it's just a blindfold? Please?"

---

Usually, Steve needed more cajoling to use one of their sex toys, but tonight he wanted to take Bucky's mind off worrying about his sisters. "What were you thinking of doing?" Steve asked, running a hand along Bucky's thigh slowly. "I'm open."

---

"Uh... um," Bucky hummed in surprise and gazed up at his husband. This was definitely a rarity. But he didn’t want to ask for something too much out of Steve’s element and risk him deciding against the whole thing. "Baby, you... I want you to pick. I want you to like it too. And I’ve been told I’m very cute with my hands tied and my eyes covered with a nice silk blindfold."

---

Steve kissed Bucky gently and then got up so he could grab their sex box from the closet. He deliberately laid out the toys they’d accrued since moving in just to drag things out a little. He put aside the cuffs and blindfold by Bucky’s request. After a bit of consideration, he settled on a small, vibrating plug. Steve had gotten it because the thing was so tiny that he knew it couldn't compare to being penetrated by an actual dick.

---

Bucky was hot all over. He was excited about Steve using a toy on him and tying him up. And he was more excited that Steve was going to try to edge him a few times before presumably letting him come with Steve’s dick inside him. And that was always the best because it felt amazing, it made Steve feel good, and that particular brand of orgasm face was Steve’s favorite too.

---

Steve put the box aside and crawled over his husband so he was straddling his hips. "I'm going to enjoy taking my time with you tonight. There's no way our kids are waking up anytime soon with the amount of trick-or-treating we did to tire them out."

---

“Good. Because Papa is long overdue for a night alone getting fucked by Daddy,” Bucky said with a chuckle. So often, they had to have sex quickly because they knew someone was going to need them at some point. And it was all well and good but getting a night of pampering to take their time was always welcome.
Steve peppered kisses over Bucky's chest while he spoke. He ran his hands up Bucky's arms and murmured softly about how beautiful he was. Steve took the handcuffs and secured one link around Bucky's wrist. He hooked it around a notch in the headboard and then cuffed Bucky's other hand. "That's not too tight, is it?"

---

“No, it’s good,” Bucky confirmed and stretched his body down the bed so he was showing himself off just a little bit. Since he stopped drinking, he lost weight in his stomach and his hips. He never had too much to begin with, but the little he had when he first met Steve was gone and he liked to showcase his hipbones for Steve. Although, sometimes he missed his pudge. He always liked how his body looked and his rounder, softer tummy was pretty cute. “You know what sounds fun?”

---

Steve sat back on his heels as he watched his husband flaunt his body off to him. That was fucking arousing as hell, knowing that Bucky was doing this just for him and only him. Steve had just gotten the blindfold in his hands when Bucky spoke up again. "What?” he asked curiously.

---

“I think you should paint me,” Bucky said and trailed one foot up his other leg. “And I don’t mean make a painting of me. Although, that would be really amazing and I would love if you did that. But I mean, you could paint on my body. It would tickle a little bit but I would get over it. And you could make some sort of beautiful piece on me and then take photos to capture it. The art would be the painting and the photography.”

---

Steve looked very interested in that. "I still have the body paints," he said. Steve got up and went through his spare supplies box and got the paints out. "Do you want to be blindfolded while I paint on you and I can reveal it when it’s all done?" he asked, already coming up with ideas.

---

Bucky nodded and let his mouth hang open just slightly as he turned his hips so his cock was pointing up at Steve. “Yeah, how about you blindfold me, keep me tied, but let me have the vibrator so it’s just a little bit of something else while you’re painting me. Is that okay?”

---

"I'll let you have the vibrator if you behave yourself," Steve said with a cheeky smile. He put the paints on the sheets for now and grabbed the blindfold again. He leaned in to give his husband a sweet kiss. "I love you so much, Sweetheart," he said before tying the blindfold on him.

---

Bucky relaxed back on the pillows again and let Steve blindfold him. He really did like this. He liked that his husband was just right there and he was going to touch him but Bucky couldn’t know how he was going to touch him until he felt it. “I always behave, Baby,” he said and lifted his knees so his ass was on display for Steve.

---

Steve ran his hand over Bucky’s ass and admired the way Bucky looked all tied up and ready for him. He took a paintbrush and dipped it in one of the colors. "You are full of good ideas, Buck. We should do this more often. I want to have an entire album full of paintings on you."

---

Bucky hummed his agreement and just let his body stay so relaxed, regardless of how much he wanted to be touched. “We can do that. We can do whatever you want, Baby,” Bucky agreed. “We hardly get any chance to be so wild. Now that we have all the kids, it’s been pretty different. Not that I’m complaining about our kids, obviously.”

---

"Yeah, when Adriana asked to cuddle I felt so bad saying no. I’m glad you figured out a way around that." He kissed Bucky's jaw as he stroked the brush over his chest. "She is being such a good big sister. I want to do something nice for her but I don’t want to spend too much money on it with Christmas coming up."

---

Bucky agreed. Adriana was amazing and deserved so much. “I’m letting her sleep in here tomorrow night. I’ll change the sheets before I go to work and then she can snuggle here with us at bedtime.” He also wasn’t sure how the holidays were going to go over. Steve and he hadn’t decided what to do about having Hanukkah and Christmas. Because they knew they wanted to celebrate both in their own ways but he didn’t know how they were going to do it yet. He also had a lot to learn about Jewish history and practices too.

---

"She’ll love that," Steve said. "I guess we can just tell her a little extra how proud we are of her and how much we love her." Christopher was going to need extra attention soon after if he caught sight of his big sister snuggling with their parents without him, so they’d have to be stealthy about it. "What do you think I’m painting on you? If you guess sort of right, I'll give you the vibrator."

---

Bucky hummed and thought about it for a second. He shook his head and said, “I don’t know. It’s Halloween, so maybe pumpkins and ghosts and stuff? Or maybe you’re being rude and just drawing a bunch of dicks on me. Regardless, I think I should get the vibrator because I’ve been so good so far and I know you want to see me getting red and flustered and desperate to have my cock touched.”

---

Steve pouted. "You know me too well," he complained. He'd been painting Diana in a pumpkin patch. He pulled the paintbrush away and grabbed the vibrator. It was small enough that Bucky didn't need to be fingered open for it to fit in. It was just a little thing, hardly bigger than Steve’s pinky. He coated it with lube and pressed it to his hole. He switched it on, letting it vibrate against his ass but he didn't push it in yet. "I love how hard your dick is right now."

---

Bucky was about to ask which one was he painting - Halloween or dicks - but then Steve pushed the vibrator up against his ass and let it just tease him. He gasped and grunted and pulled involuntarily at the restraints. “Come on, Steve,” he whined and wiggled his ass a little against the vibe. “Please, Baby. Please. I want it. My dick is so hard because of you and I want to show you how long I can hold off coming no matter how much I want to. I can do it.”
Steve sat back and watched Bucky’s beautiful reaction. He ghosted a fingertip over Bucky’s cock and then pressed the tip of his finger against the slit. "Hmm... I guess you deserve it now. And I know how good you’re going to be for me." He slowly eased the vibe into Bucky’s ass and tapped the base gently once it was in.

Bucky whined grateful when he finally got something inside him. He relaxed again just slightly and whispered his thanks in breathy air. “I’m so hard it hurts just a little too much,” he said and lifted his hips up off the mattress for a second trying to get more of Steve’s touch again.

Steve went back to painting on Bucky’s chest. "If it hurts, do you want me to kiss it better?" he asked, reaching one hand down to pet the insides of Bucky’s thighs delicately. "Because I may know something that can help you out with that."

“Yes, just a little bit,” Bucky whined and opened his legs a little more. “I just don’t want to come without you. I want to come with you inside me, okay? That’s always my favorite. Your hot thick cock fucking up inside me, pushing against my prostate, balls hitting my ass. Baby... fuck... that’s the best.”

"God, keep talking like that," Steve groaned. He massaged the insides of Bucky's thighs with one hand as he worked on the painting. It took another few minutes to finish it but he was happy with how it looked after. "Give me a second, Babe," Steve got up so he could take a few pictures with their Polaroid.

Bucky heard the clicks from the camera and he moved just a little bit every time to sort of put on a show for the photo shoot. But he was getting a little needy. It felt really amazing to have his body painted by Steve. It was just a little ticklish and cold like he thought it would be, but now he wanted to get fucked. And Steve was taking his sweet time. “Babe... my handsome husband... please,” he whined and pulled at the restraints. He moved his head to the side so his neck was bared for Steve. “Please...”

"Soon, Love." Steve really wanted to ravage his husband but he needed to let them drag it out a bit more so Bucky would have less time to worry about his sisters. He pet a hand down Bucky's arm. "First I have to let you see what I painted. And then I have to clean you off. Only after that, can I give you what you want." He kissed Bucky gently and lifted the blindfold to his forehead so Bucky could see the painting.

Bucky groaned, a little grumpy about it, but he looked down at himself and saw the painting all over him. “Is that your dog?” he asked and looked up at Steve. “Can I see one of the photos? It’s hard to see my own body upside down like this.” Steve was always such a great artist that he didn’t doubt it looked amazing. He just wondered how it looked with the whole ensemble - the art, the blindfold, the restraints, his cock hard and needy, the vibe in his ass.

---

Steve nodded. "It's Diana in a pumpkin patch," he said. Steve sat next to Bucky and held up a few of the developed pictures. "Look at how gorgeous you are," he said. "I could stare at these pictures all day." Steve leaned in to nibble affectionately at Bucky's neck.

---

Bucky stared at the pictures. He did look really hot, he had to admit. Bucky knew he was attractive - he always had. He also knew that it wasn’t the politest thing to compliment himself. So, he didn’t do it too often but he couldn’t help it this time. “Fuck, I do look good,” he said and then stared over at Steve. “We are the single hottest couple in the world. I’m convinced of it.”

---

Steve chuckled. "You really are the sexiest man I've ever laid eyes on, Bucky." He kissed him carefully before setting the pictures back down. He also pulled the blindfold back over Bucky's eyes. Steve grabbed a rag and wet it with some water from a leftover cup on his nightstand and began to clean Bucky up.

---

“Steve,” Bucky complained and poked him with his toe. “You’re cleaning me off when you should just be fucking me. Please. I just want to have sex with my husband. I can’t imagine that you’re not hard for me too. I mean you love when I’m like this.” He wasn’t above begging. He would beg Steve to finally touch him if he needed to.

---

"I don't want to get paint all over the sheets," Steve complained. To give Bucky something to work with, he reached down to fondle his balls just slightly while he cleaned him up. "I'm hard as anything for you, Baby, but I got to clean you up first.” Once he had Bucky cleaned, he grabbed the lube and poured it into his hand and started to get his dick slick. "Besides, I have to finger you open more first.”

---

“Yeah, more would be good,” Bucky said and felt sweat running down his back because he was so desperate. “You're much bigger than the vibe but I do like the stretch so you can just do it a little more and then you can stretch me with your dick, Baby. But maybe hurry up a little bit or I’m gonna bite you.”

---

Steve got two fingers slick. "Bite me, huh? Is that supposed to be a punishment?” Steve replaced the vibrator with his fingers and easily worked them inside of Bucky as he leaned forward to give him a searing kiss. "I love how you look right now. You're fucking sexy, tied up and desperate for my dick."

---

The fingers were a welcome replacement for the vibe but they just weren’t enough. “Yes, I’m gonna bite you. Maybe it’ll be the motivation you need to get going.” He squeezed around Steve’s fingers and let his breathing pick up. “I need my ass filled with your come. And I need my gorgeous husband’s beautiful cock now.”

---

Steve started to open up Bucky in earnest, scissoring his fingers to spread him wider. "You'll get what you want, Love. I'm gonna give you what you want." Steve fumbled a little as he pulled his fingers to line up his cock with Bucky’s hole. His hands shook a little with how much he wanted him. Steve slowly eased himself inside and let out a low moan at the feeling. "Fuck, yes...

---

Bucky wasn’t completely stretched for Steve’s dick so it opened him up and burned just ever so slightly like he liked sometimes. He gasped and pulled harshly at the handcuffs to try to get to Steve. “Fuck, Baby, that feels so good. You feel amazing. I missed your cock. I love your cock. It’s my favorite and I hate that I don’t get it as much anymore. Please don’t make me beg anymore, though. Please fuck me now. Hard.”

---

Steve bit at Bucky’s neck to stifle his moans as he steadily rocked in and out of his husband. "Shit, Baby, I know. I shouldn’t have made you wait so long.” Eager to give Bucky what he wanted and desperate to fuck his husband, he gripped Bucky’s hips and pulled him down with every thrust, getting just that much reaper inside of him.

---

Bucky moaned loudly and let his body be maneuvered all around on the bed from Steve’s thrusts. “Feels so good. Ah, Steve, I love you. You’re amazing.” He had to stop talking so he could focus on breathing in sharp breaths with every hit to his prostate. He hoped he looked as gorgeous to Steve right now as Steve was making him feel.

---

Steve drank in every noise Bucky made and watched him with an intensity that he only had when he was railing his husband into the mattress. Bucky commanded his attention so easily and Steve loved it. He reached a hand up so he could tug at Bucky’s hair, holding his head back so he could bite his neck again while he slammed his hips forward over and over.

---

“God, fuck!” Bucky yelped and squeezed his eyes shut. He loved when Steve got going like that. “You’re perfect,” he whispered and wrapped his legs around Steve’s middle. “I need more. Kiss me. Touch my cock. Something, please. I need more of you.”

---

Steve moved his hand from Bucky's hip to his cock and jerked him off quickly as he fucked him so hard that the bed creaked quietly under them. "I fucking love you, Bucky. You feel so damned good, Sweetheart, I love being inside you,” he gasped out.

---

Bucky nodded and groaned as Steve talked to him. It wasn’t long until he was coming in a harsh burst over Steve’s fingers and his stomach. It was one of those orgasms that he had to wait so long for that it hurt just a little bit. “Steve,” he muttered and clenched his ass down around the cock deep inside him. “Baby...”

---

Steve cried out when Bucky's ass gripped his cock tightly. "Fuck, oh, fuuuck, Bucky," he moaned, arching his back. He saw stars for a few moments and eased up how fast he was going so he wouldn't hurt his husband. "I'm close, Bucky. Please, can I keep going?"

---

Bucky nodded once sharply. “Don’t you dare stop,” he commanded and did his best to keep his body tight and engaged with Steve. But he was so tired from the whole experience and his orgasm took the last bit out of him. He was going to fall asleep before Steve even came.

---

Steve grabbed onto Bucky's hips and steadily fucked him slow and deep. His eyes were focused entirely on the beautiful man beneath him and just when he came, he leaned down to claim Bucky's lips in a deep, hot kiss.

---

Bucky didn’t have a chance to take a breath before Steve kissed him. It made the kiss sloppy and desperate as he parted for just enough air before going back. His body was bent in half as Steve’s cock was as far inside him as it could go and he could feel the hot burst of come coating inside him. He shut his eyes and kissed all over Steve’s mouth and cheeks and panted out exhausted grateful breaths.

---

Steve was left gasping for air, as well, when he was done. As soon as he caught his breath, he pushed the blindfold off of his husband and he raked his fingers through his hair heavily, locking eyes with him. "I love you so much. You were amazing. That felt damn good."

---

Bucky’s eyes opened slowly and he took in the sight of Steve hovering over him looking pleased and tired and sweaty. And he also saw his own legs pushed up close to his chest since Steve’s body still had him folded up on the headboard with a cock inside him keeping him together. “Love my Steve... gorgeous fucking husband Steve,” he blathered out incoherently.

---

Steve chuckled and held the sides of Bucky's face so he could kiss him again. "Thank you for having us spice Halloween up," he said. He took the key and freed Bucky's hands so he could lace their fingers together. "You want me to clean you up so you can sleep, Love?"

---

Bucky held tightly to Steve’s hands and let his eyes shut for a few moments. He may have even fallen asleep but then his brain remembered that the girls were still out and he forced his eyelids to keep themselves wide open again. “I can’t sleep, Becca and Lilly aren’t back. And if they don’t get back on time, I’ll have to go look for them. I can’t fall asleep until they’re home and safe.”
Steve had been hoping that Bucky would sleep so he wouldn't worry. He planned on staying up himself until both girls were home. "Okay, Baby," Steve said. "I'll help you stay awake. Do you want me to make another painting on you? You can tell me what to draw."

Bucky shook his head and wiped at the sweat on his body. The air was making him cold and he wanted to be dressed again. "Let's get cleaned up and then we can go downstairs and play a game together or something. We can make some coffee or tea to wake up."

"How about Scrabble?" Steve asked. He slowly got out of bed and offered a hand out to his husband to help him up. "It's been a while since we have played, since we can't play with the babies around." Christopher loved to pluck the letter chips from the board and Sarah May tried to eat them.

"Sure, yeah, let's do Scrabble," Bucky said. "It'll be nice to play without Becca. This time, I won't get a lecture about how Adriana spells better than I do." Bucky got up and went to the bathroom to clean himself of all the sex mess. He was sticky and sweaty and had come all over him. But a few minutes later, he was mostly cleaned up and dressed in Steve's pajamas. He yawned and rubbed his eyes but then immediately shook it off and yanked his hair back into a ponytail and told himself, "Stay awake, Bucky."

Steve dressed in thick, comfy pajamas. It wasn't winter yet, but it was still chilly. "Adriana really is getting smart, though. She may start spelling better than us soon." He put a hand on the small of Bucky's back and guided him down the stairs. Raphael greeted them and started rubbing up against Bucky's legs to be fed.

The cat mewled at them when Bucky picked him up and held him close. "Hey, Raph. Did Lilly forget to fill your bowl?" he asked and went to the kitchen to find that it was empty. "You would think she would know by now." Bucky grumpily got the cat all squared away and pet him as he munched on his dinner. "Alright, Steve, do you want some tea? I'm going to make some for me while you get the game."

"He's getting kind of fat, Bucky, I don't think it's because Lilly didn't feed him. I think it's because he knows if he complains to you, he always gets extra food since you assume Lilly didn't take care of him," Steve said. "I'll have some tea, though, please." He grabbed the game from the closet and brought it into the kitchen to set it up on the table.

Bucky rolled his eyes and started on the tea. He disagreed. Raphael was just a little poofy. He wasn't fat. "You have to admit that, at least two days out of the week, she forgets," Bucky said and looked back to his husband. "She also never gives him any treats. She will give Diana treats all day but the poor kitty doesn't get love."
"She does forget. But we're getting a bit of a chubby cat. I think we need to get him some more toys to have him play more," Steve said. "And Diana always begs for treats more than Raphael does. She loves—" he started but turned his head when Diana came trotting over at the word 'treat'. "See?"

Bucky sighed and reached up on top of the fridge to get Diana a treat. “Here you go, good girl. Sit,” he said and waited for her to patiently sit before opening his hand for her to take the treat. He shook his head and pet down her back before sitting at the table with Steve and their tea. He yawned for the millionth time and glared at Steve. “You fucked the lights of out your husband.”

"I only did it because you asked me to, Handsome," Steve teased. "You looked so good, too. I love it when you're overwhelmed and desperate. It's goddamned gorgeous." He spoke quietly, used to having to keep his voice down.

“I did ask,” Bucky conceded. “You got me there. Next time, though, I get to be the one to tease your orgasm until you’re about to cry.” He helped Steve get their pieces all set for Scrabble. He changed his tone then and said softly, “Adriana got so distracted in the record shop that we didn’t talk to her about the way people were looking at us.”

Steve leaned over the table to kiss his Bucky's cheek. "How do you think we should explain it to her?" he asked. "I want her to understand but I don't want her to be self-conscious about it."

Bucky had no idea how to explain to their daughter that a lot of people didn’t approve of two men or two women together as a couple - even less so, raising a family together. “I... I don’t know, Babe,” he admitted and reached to take Steve’s hand in his for a moment. “Because I don’t want her to be self-conscious either. And I don’t want her to feel like our family is strange or anything. And I definitely don’t want her to worry about our family.”

"She is going to notice that most couples have a woman in it, though," Steve said. "I take them out enough to the playground. She's asked me a few times why there aren't any other daddies at the playground and only the mommies take their kids," he explained.

Bucky wanted to try to convince Steve to make some sort of case to Adriana that maybe some of those mommies have other mommy partners who go to work just like he goes to work while Steve stays home. But he knew that would probably complicate things. And he didn’t want Adriana asking those women where their wives were. “Well, you remember when we got her and she was surprised that parents could be two daddies. But she wasn’t confused for long. She just accepted it. Maybe if we explain that two daddies or two mommies are a rare thing then she will think it’s more like the special prize in her cereal boxes instead of the occasional burnt pieces that taste bad.”
“We can think it over some more later. I don’t have any ideas right now.” Steve placed down a word on the board and gave Bucky a stupid smile. “Thank you for being the prize in my cereal box,” he said sweetly. Diana laid her head down in Bucky’s lap and gave a pathetic whine for another treat. “What should we do for her for Christmas?” he asked. “I want to make it extra special.”

“You dork,” Bucky said under his breath and pet Diana so she knew he wasn’t ignoring her. “Christmas is on you, Daddy. Because Papa has been figuring out how to do Hanukkah.” They hadn’t talked about the holidays yet but he knew they were going to have to coordinate so they were celebrating the Jewish holidays too. They both wanted Sarah May to grow up with that in her life.

“I was wondering how we were going to make Christopher not cry every night in Hanukkah when Sarah May gets something and he doesn’t. And vice versa for Christmas,” Steve mused.

“Well,” Bucky started and thought. “Would it really be that bad to give everyone a Hanukkah gift every night and then give everyone Christmas gifts too? It’ll just be like a spread-out Christmas. And then when Ya-Ya is older, she and I can sing the prayers together for everyone. It’ll be her special thing but the gift part can be for everyone. I just don’t want her to miss out on her heritage.”

"I like that idea," Steve said. "We can decorate for both. I've had Father Frank tell me about some of the rabbis that he's friends with if you wanted to try speaking to them," Steve added. "I think it would be really nice to have her involved in Hebrew school as soon as we can enroll her."

“Hebrew school?” Bucky asked curiously. “Is that a daily thing? Because we’re homeschooling the kids. She’s going to feel left out if she’s the only one going to school. And I’ve been learning. I can teach her what I can. I mean, I’m going to take her to synagogue when she’s a little older. I mean, Adriana’s the only one who goes to church with you right now because Christopher is too rowdy.”

Steve shook his head. "No, it's only an hour or two once a week, kind of like religion classes at churches for Christian kids," he said. "She would learn the language there, too." Steve sipped his tea. "Even though I can teach them all religion, I still plan on taking Christopher and Adriana to classes at the church so they can be with other kids."

“Oh, okay. That sounds fine to me then. Hebrew school,” Bucky agreed and played his next word in Scrabble, hoping it wasn’t misspelled. Bucky was still partially resistant to having religion be such a part of the kids’ lives. He sort of felt like a once-a-week attendance at church and synagogue was good enough. But, he knew this wasn’t something Steve would negotiate. And Bucky wanted to respect how important it was to him. “We can do that. Will you ask Father Frank to get me in contact with someone? Hopefully, a rabbi who is gay-friendly like he is.”
Bucky’s word on the board was indeed misspelled. Steve didn't correct him. "I don't think he would have given me their names if he didn't think that they were open-minded," Steve said. "I love how much you're willing to do for our kids, Bucky. I think you're an amazing parent."

Bucky scoffed and shook his head. “I’m just doing what is best for you and them. Sarah May and any other Jewish babies we might have will need someone to be able to help them with all the things they will learn and I want you to be able to take our non-Jewish babies to your church with you. This is just how families work. We learn how to be the best we can for our kids. Which, in a few years for me, will involve attending a religious gathering on a weekly basis. Who would have thought.”

"And if we get a baby who isn’t Christian or Jewish, we may need to enlist your sisters or my mom to take to Islam or Hinduism to make sure the babies have a chaperone,” he joked. Steve brushed his foot along Bucky's leg gently and jumped when Raphael pounced on his sock under the table.

“I'll just find a third husband to join the mix,” Bucky joked back with a shrug and then gave Steve a little smile at the touch on his leg.

"Hell, no," Steve answered back right away as a knee-jerk reaction even though he knew that Bucky was just messing around.

"But... speaking of school... I need to talk to you about something.” Bucky looked down and played another word. He played an obvious one, an easy one just because he knew he could get it right.

Steve smirked as he took his turn and placed a word on the board where 'J' fell on a triple word score booster. "What about school?" he asked.

Bucky saw the ‘J’ as Steve put it on the board and he grumbled, “Shit. That was a good word.” He looked over his options and saw absolutely nothing worth very much at all. So, he just placed a piece just so he could get something. “I’m going back to school,” he said definitively and looked up at Steve. It wasn’t a question, it was a declaration. It was a decision. Bucky had been on the fence for so long trying to decide and every other day it seemed like he was saying ‘yes’ to school and then right back to ‘no’. But this time, he was sure. He was doing it.

Steve grinned at him. "I think that that's a great idea, Baby," Steve said. He reached out to take Bucky's hand and lace their fingers together. "When do you think you're going to start? I'll help any way I can," he said. The last time they spoke about this, Steve had a good feeling that Bucky would end up coming around to this decision.
“Well, I’ve actually got it all planned,” Bucky said tentatively. “Becca and I got it worked out. She and I are going to go together. It gives us about two years to save up for both of us and we are going to go to the same school. She’s going to try to live on campus, though. It’ll at least make me feel a lot better about her going off to school because I’ll see her a lot even if she’s not living with us. But if I wait until then, the babies will be a little older and I’ll be able to save up more and decide what to get a degree in. At least, that’s our tentative idea for now.”

Steve gave Bucky's hand a tight squeeze. "I think that's perfect," he encouraged. "I can't imagine the two of you laying out a better plan." It also meant that they didn't have to worry about any immediate changes to Bucky's schedule since things were already hectic as it was. They would have time to prepare on all levels.

Bucky let out a relieved little sigh and he got up so he could go squish himself against Steve in a hug and kiss all over his face. “The problem now is figuring out a major. Because the whole reason I’m doing this is to start a path towards a job where I’ll have better pay, set hours during the day and not evenings, and opportunity to advance. I’m doing this so I can spend evenings with my family and bring home more money and take care of all of you.”

Steve wrapped his arms around him and held him tight. "Well, you've got two years to figure it out. Are you still thinking about doing business, Baby?" he asked. "Whatever you end up picking, I know it's going to be the best decision to make for yourself and our family."

“I’m not sure,” Bucky said with a huff. “I just don’t know if I would be able to fit in with the stuffed suits and the cropped hair and ties and wearing underwear every day.” He moved Steve out from the table a bit so he could sit in his lap and wrap his arms around Steve’s neck. “I have a notebook with every option I’ve been thinking about and reasons why each one would be a good pick and reasons it would be a bad pick.”

"I think most jobs require that sort of stuff. You've just been spoiled having an awesome job with a good boss who doesn't care if you wear underwear or not." Steve took his turn behind Bucky's back and then wrapped his arms around him again. "Which other options are you thinking about?" he asked, leaning up to kiss his jaw.

Bucky hummed happily and caught Steve’s lips in a kiss after he settled into him. “There’s a lot. Accountant, some sort of teacher, physical therapist, realtor, investment liaison. I could go into political science or child psychology. I could get a history degree like my dad always wanted and teach at the high school level.” He sighed and rested his head on Steve’s shoulder. “I don’t know. I just know I’m not going to be smart enough for half those things anyway.”
"Hey, what makes you think you're not smart enough for any of that?" Steve said. He slipped a hand up the back of Bucky's shirt and scratched his skin lightly. "I think you'd make a great teacher. You're so good with kids," he said. "And you tell really good stories, so you can turn all of the lessons into something fun."

---

Bucky pet his hands gently over Steve’s cheeks and neck. “Yeah, but teachers are supposed to be smart. They are supposed to know how to spell everything correctly and know how to write properly. I’m just so much further behind than I should be. I’ll have to take some basic English classes and probably work on stuff that I should’ve done better in high school. You know? I wasted my schooling by being a degenerate and now when I need those skills and knowledge, I’ve got shit.”

---

"You are smart, Bucky," Steve said. "And you'll get better at spelling during college. If you want, I can help you out with that. You've got two years to boost all the little things you didn't learn as well earlier so you'll be super prepared when it's time for you to start," he encouraged.

---

Bucky laughed and brushed Steve’s hair back out of his eyes. “Good, so while my husband is teaching our babies the alphabet, he’s going to be teaching me how to spell,” he said. “Adriana and I can just have lessons together.” But he was grateful for all of Steve’s support on this. “Thank you, Steve. I’ll do everything I can to make your life and our kids’ lives better. All I have to do now is decide what I’m going to do.”

---

"We can use Scrabble as a way of testing your spelling," Steve said with a wink. "And I bet Adriana would have a lot of fun learning with her papa. We can even let her pretend to be the teacher sometimes. They say that the best way to learn is to teach it to someone else," he said. Diana came over to them and put her front paws up on Bucky's lap and leaned up to lick his cheek, as if to complain that Bucky was sitting in her spot on Steve.

---

Bucky pet Diana and let her lick his face a couple more times. “Your dog still doesn’t get that I’m the husband and I take precedence of getting attention from you.” He gave Steve another kiss and then heard the door open. Diana jumped off of them and went to go see who was there.

Lilly came around the corner and saw Steve and Bucky perched together on a chair. “Oh, gross. There’s a reason you guys have a room all to yourselves. Go make out in private.”

---

When Lilly came home and complained about their kissing, Steve started giving obnoxiously loud kisses against Bucky's cheek. "Oh, Bucky! I love you so much! I want to kiss you in the kitchen all night!"

---

Bucky giggled and grabbed Steve’s face in his hands and kissed him on the lips several times. “Steve, Baby, I love you so much too!” he gasped dramatically and then gave a look to Lilly.
“Stop it, stop it,” she griped and thwacked Bucky over the head. “I should have stayed at the arcade.”

---

Steve cackled at Lilly's reaction. Diana whined and jumped up on her, putting her paws on Lilly's shoulders and licking her face too. Steve pulled his hand out from under Bucky's shirt and gave him one soft kiss on his cheek. "How was the arcade?" he asked, waving his hand to tell Diana to come down.

---

“It was good,” Lilly said as she gave Diana a reassuring pet to her head so she knew that everything was okay. “Cara and I are really close to beating the top scores on three different games. It’s all the same person too - ‘TNT’ - like a bomb. I asked around and, apparently, it’s someone named Taylor. But we are going to kick Taylor down to third.”

---

"That's great, I guess," Steve said. "Which games are those? I can play a mean Pac-Man or Space Invaders." Sometimes when it was just him and Christopher or Adriana he would stop at the arcade briefly so they could each play a game. Christopher loved to mimic the sounds some of the machines made.

---

“Donkey Kong, Gauntlet, and Dragon’s Liar,” Lilly said and rummaged in the fridge to get some orange juice. “I’m going to do it, though. I’m getting really good.” She tucked her hair behind her ears and came to give them both a hug. “Alright, I’m going to go shower. When’s Becca getting home?”

---

"I'll give you a dollar if you get the top score on all three of those games. I'll give you two dollars if you get the top score on your next test," Steve said slyly. "Becca should be home in an hour. Bucky and I are waiting up for her."

---

Lilly scoffed. “Steve, I don’t get out of bed for less than ten,” she said. “Alright, well, don’t count on Becca for at least another two hours. She’s not going to be back before her curfew.”

Bucky’s eyes went wide with worry and he looked to Steve quickly for reassurance. He was already nervous as hell about having Becca at a Halloween party. He knew she wasn’t going to drink or smoke or anything because years of living with Bucky made sure she hated that stuff. But the last big party she went to ended in her lost in an unknown part of the city with a lot of hookers outside a bar.

---

Steve was genuinely upset when he heard that, but he also wasn't going to shoot the messenger here. "How do you know that?" he asked calmly. "Did she say something to you?" Steve reached out to squeeze Bucky's hand in reassurance. He knew how worked up his husband got over his sisters and how much he cared about their wellbeing. Being out so late on Halloween was inviting danger.
“She just said that she thought having a curfew was dumb and she didn’t think she should still have that. She’s sixteen and stuff, you know?” Lilly said and then gave them both a nod. She was going to take her leave before this got worse. “Night.”

---

Steve almost argued that at sixteen she still deserved a curfew, but that was a conversation for another day. Once Lilly left, he turned to Bucky and huffed. "So, how do you think we should handle this when Becca gets back?" he asked. Steve knew how he wanted to deal with it, but Becca was Bucky’s sister.

---

Bucky let out a heavy sigh. He wasn’t sure. He was too tired for scolding. “I think step one is just to wait to see when she decides to show up. If it’s within curfew, then we don’t say anything about it. But if we have to talk about it, maybe we should wait until tomorrow. It’s so late already and I’m so tired. And she will just be angry.”

---

Steve nodded. "Alright," he said. He'd follow Bucky's decision on that one. "Well, it looks like we've got possibly two hours to kill. Do you want to watch a movie? Or maybe we can groom Diana and Raphael? That'll take a good amount of time."

---

“No. Movie,” Bucky grunted and shook his head. “We can groom the animals tomorrow. Let’s just relax for a bit.” He moved off of Steve’s lap and rubbed his head. Even though his headaches were much less frequent, they weren’t gone completely. Bucky had only gone in for two injections so far and he had another scheduled for the middle of November. He found a different doctor who was a lot better and she didn’t make him as uncomfortable as the first guy. But he sort of wished the headaches would have been a lot better by now.

---

“What do you want to watch, Bucky? You want a space movie with the space princess? Or do you want the deer movie?” He tended to refer to movies now by the descriptions that Adriana gave them instead of their actual titles. "Or something else?" He reached his hand up to massage Bucky's head.

---

“We watch the kids’ movies all the time," Bucky complained lightly. “Let’s watch something we can’t watch with them. I still have Clint’s copy of The Thing. That might be fun. It’s a little scary. We also have Terminator and Indiana Jones. And you know the second it’s available, I’m getting Top Gun. That movie was a gay man’s dream.”

---

"Let’s watch The Thing. I'm fine with having extra excuses to hold you when scary parts come on." Steve smiled and nudged Bucky to get up. "Let's set up a blanket fort. Something that'll make Becca jealous that she missed out on such a good time."

---

“I think blanket forts would make Adriana or Lilly jealous. Maybe not Becca so much,” Bucky said but amended his statement with, “But we can still make one,” when he saw Steve pull a sad face. “Do you want to go sneakily check on the kids while I get the movie set up or do you think they are okay?”

---

Steve really just wanted a blanket fort for himself. “I'll check on the kids,” he agreed. He went upstairs and carefully crept into the nursery to check on their two youngest. When he opened the door, Sarah May was already awake and she locked eyes with Steve with a look on her face that promised crying if he dared to walk out without her. To spare Christopher waking up, he carefully pulled her out of her crib and then went downstairs with his pleased daughter in his arms.

---

Bucky had started in on the blanket fort and he looked up when Steve came in. “Oh, hey, look who is up,” he whispered. “Is she going to join us?” He got up and came over to nuzzle Sarah May’s face and give her a kiss on her cheek. “Maybe you will fall asleep on Daddy and then you won’t be so tired tomorrow, Ya-Ya.”

---

"She was awake when I walked in," he said. Steve smiled as Sarah May reached out to hug Bucky. Steve cuddled her close and kissed the top of her head. "I'll keep her facing me so the movie won't scare her," he said, running a hand along her back.

---

“Of course, Baby,” Bucky agreed and gestured for Steve to sit down in the blanket fort. “Just so long as you have room for both of us to snuggle you, please. It’s not often that we get time alone with just Sarah May. It’s nice for them each to be able to have time alone with their daddies. And Christopher and Adriana definitely get more of it than she does.”

---

Sarah May looked pleased as punch to be able to snuggle with her dads during some quiet time. Steve tucked himself under Bucky's arm and kissed his cheek. "I'll always have room to snuggle you," he said. "Ya-Ya says thank you for letting her watch the movie with us."

---

Bucky chuckled and adjusted himself to Steve. “Anytime, Ya-Ya,” he promised as the movie started playing. “I see she’s favoring you over me tonight. That’s not like her.” Bucky didn’t really mind, though. He loved that his kids were very affectionate with the both of them. He could never be upset with seeing Steve holding their babies in his arms.

---

"That's because I'm keeping her up against my chest and she doesn't have object permanence yet. If she doesn't see you, she doesn't realize you're still here," he chuckled. Steve kind of was a little sad that he hardly got to hold Sarah May. Usually, she wanted to be around Bucky or her nana.

---

Bucky shook his head and squeezed Steve’s side. “Oh, come on. She knows I’m here. My baby knows I’m here. She can hear me, she can smell me, she can feel my presence. She’s just perfectly content to be with her daddy tonight. Because she loves you and wants to be with you.” Bucky wondered if maybe part of the reason Sarah May tended to want to be with him more was because when she was a newborn, he had more skin to skin contact with holding her on his chest than Steve did. But Maybe it was simply because Bucky was quieter sometimes. Or she liked his hair.

---

"Oh, she can definitely smell you," Steve teased with a snicker. He pet his fingers through her dark curls and stared adoringly at their little girl when she stretched her arms out and yawned. He pecked Bucky's lips innocently before relaxing into his side to watch the movie.

---

Bucky sighed and shook his head. “Yeah, Yeah, I know. You married a dirty hippie and I smell,” he chided back. Sarah May fell asleep within the first ten minutes of being snuggled up with her dads. She made quiet little noises while she slept and squeezed her fist in Steve’s shirt repeatedly. They were about an hour and a half into the movie when Becca finally got home, past curfew.

---

Steve was so happy to be curled up on Halloween night with his husband and their baby. But when Becca came home, Steve didn't say anything, just watched her come in. He didn't want to risk accidentally saying something that would put her on the defensive. Instead, he just turned his head to Bucky to take his lead.

---

Bucky heard Becca come through the door and he gave a little sigh and kissed the side of Steve’s face. “I'll go talk to her. Can you take Sarah May upstairs and then come back? Maybe Becca has a good reason to be late and cause me all this anxiety.”

---

"Alright. Love you, Baby." Steve kissed Bucky's cheek and carefully stood up smoothly so he wouldn't jostle the sleeping baby. He carried her up the stairs and gently sung in her ear as he lowered her into her crib. After he tucked her in, Steve left the nursery to wait in their bedroom for a bit.

---

Bucky found Becca in the kitchen getting a late-night snack. “Hey,” he said from the doorway, arms crossed but voice gentle. He wanted to give her the benefit of the doubt. Maybe she was out late for a reason. “You’re about an hour late, Becs.”

---

Becca looked over to him briefly before turning back to the fridge. "I know," she said. "I lost track of time and it took longer to get home than I thought," she said unapologetically. "You didn't need to worry. I didn't need a curfew to begin with," she answered. "It wasn't like I was drinking."

---

Bucky sighed softly. He knew this was going to happen. And he knew it was going to be somewhat about him. She wouldn’t have given a comment about drinking if it wasn’t. “Becca, I’ve been worrying over you since the day you were born,” he said gently, hoping that if he kept his cool then so would she. “And I know you don’t drink. But I assume other kids at that party were drinking. And the curfews won’t end until you’re eighteen and you’re an adult.”

—I’m more of an adult now than you were at eighteen. It's just a number, Bucky," she said with a roll of her eyes. "I hardly go out this late. I shouldn't be told when to come home just because I happen to be two years younger than what New York State claims is legal adulthood." She pulled out a sandwich and started to munch on it.

—Yeah, eighteen is a number. But it’s an important number. And, I don’t know, I was eleven when the age of majority went down to eighteen. Maybe I thought I still had a whole ten years to be a stupid kid or something. But, whatever. There are things that you can’t do at sixteen. And I’m your guardian, Becca. There’s stuff you have to listen to me about for just another year and a half.” Bucky moved out of the doorway and came to sit next to her at the table. “I have a right to worry about you. Even if it’s nothing you do wrong that gets you in trouble, there are tons of people in this world that could cause trouble for you.”

—Becca huffed and gave Bucky an annoyed look. "Come on, can't you let it go?" she asked. "You've got your own kids to parent now. I don't need you hounding me over coming home an hour late because I was having fun at my friend's house. There are jerks out there twenty-four hours a day. Coming home an hour late won't change that."

—Coming home later than curfew makes me worried that one of those jerks did something bad to you,” Bucky said slowly but firmly. “When we set curfews it’s so I have a timeframe of when I’m allowed to start worrying that you’re in trouble. It’s a timeframe so I know when I can call Natasha or Sam and say that you haven’t gotten home yet. Steve and I agree that after two hours, we call the police. Because I don’t want to waste a second if my sister is out there somewhere hurt or in need.”

—"Well, maybe if you didn't want to worry about what time I was getting home after curfew, you should let me get a beeper," she said stubbornly. Bucky hadn't been against the things, exactly, but he wasn't expediting the matter either. In most situations, the family didn't need them to know what was going on. The first time she had asked, Bucky has dismissed it as just a trend for doctor’s but not something anyone else would actually need. But, Becca had been seeing more people in New York with them who weren’t just doctors. Although, a lot of those people were in business or on Wallstreet, so it made sense for them.

—Bucky rolled his head back and forth and rubbed his eyes. “Fine. Fine, we can get one. I’ll have to find the money in the budget and adjust some things. With Christmas and Hanukkah coming up, everything has already been planned tightly. So, give me a couple days on it, okay?” He was hoping desperately that this compromise would be enough to satisfy her for now even if he thought it was pretty much a useless desire for her to want a beeper.
"I've already started saving up for one. I almost have enough to pay for my own." Becca finished her food and stood up. She was done with this tonight. "Good night, Bucky," she said on her way down the stairs.

---

“Yeah, okay... night,” Bucky called back softly as he watched her disappear. He shook his head and laid his head down on the table. He knew Becca was just going to keep having these problems with him - not listening to his rules, throwing his own past shortcomings in his face. He wasn’t sure how he could get it to stop but he wanted it to. He wanted her to love him again. Because he just didn’t think she did. But for now, all he could do was get a cup of water and head back upstairs to his husband and hopefully have a good night’s rest.
Chapter Summary

About two weeks later.

Bucky had barely gotten home from work and greeted his husband and kids when Becca pulled him aside. She had a file full of papers in her hand. "Hey, I've been looking over your finances for a little bit and there's a lot of money not being accounted for," she said.

---

"Wow, hey, what the fuck are you doing going through my financial records?" Bucky asked and snatched the folder from her hands. "This is just for me and Steve. Did you rummage in my stuff to get this? I don’t go through your stuff, Becca."

---

Becca crossed her arms and glared. "I told you I could help you with your finances to help you save up for college. You seemed to like the idea then, so I just went through with it," she defended. "Don't worry, it's not you that's overspending anyway," she said with a wave of her hand.

---

“When was that? I don’t remember that,” Bucky said with knit brows. He kind of thought that he might have agreed to that at some point but he was juggling so much that he probably forgot about it entirely. “What’s, uh, what’s going on? We’re overspending?”

---

"You're overspending just a little on toys for the babies, but not so much that it's putting a dent in your budget," she said. "And you eat out too much from that Greek place." She turned to a page that showed Steve's bank statements. "But look at this. There's practically two hundred dollars here that is missing on Steve's side."

---

“Steve likes getting them toys and eating there,” Bucky mumbled and looked at the lines Becca pointed to. He only wore his reading glasses sometimes but he could really use them now – the words were so small. But Becca was right. And Bucky wanted Steve to be able to get whatever he wanted but they really did need to stay in the budget. “Okay, so these withdrawals here are two hundred in total that we don’t have a reason for? There’s no receipts or invoices or anything?""

---

"I triple checked the receipts. I understand if it's a few dollars but this is two hundred. I don't know what he's spending it on but if it's a normal thing, that's some over two grand a year lost in your records," Becca said, pretty proud of herself for finding this.
Bucky took another look at the papers, as if he could conjure up the answer by giving it one last try. “Yeah, I can’t afford two thousand missing dollars a year. I mean, I assume he’s using it for something. I’ll just have to ask him once he is done with bath time. He should be on the last kid by now. He might just have forgotten to put the receipts in here.”

"Just figured you'd want to know. Also, for a finder's fee, maybe you can get me that expensive notebook I've been eyeing at the bookstore?" she fished, hoping that Bucky would give it to her. She was going to buy it until Bucky gave the go-ahead for the beeper so now she had to save her money for that.

Bucky tucked all the papers back into the folder and held it against his chest. “How about you put that on your Christmas list? You might get it earlier than that too since this year we start doing Hanukkah. And it’s already November. I’m going to start shopping for you all soon anyway. I’ll need ideas.”

Becca sighed dramatically. "Fine," she said, not putting up more of a fight than that. "I'm going to be doing in the basement if you need me," she said.

Soon after that, Steve carried their freshly-bathed children in with one in each arm. "You want to help me tuck them in, Buck?"

Bucky set the finances folder down and took Christopher from Steve gently. “Oh, look how sleepy they are. Sleepy little babies. Are you going to rest all through the night tonight? Or are you going to wake up Papa at four in the morning and then not go back to bed last you did last night?” He kissed Christopher’s head and watched his eyes slip shut. “Where’s Adriana? With your mom? It’s almost her bedtime too. Is she clean too or not yet?”

It was one of those rare nights where both babies were ready for sleep. Steve had run them ragged with a trip to the park, a little extra playtime, and playing games outside in the tiny backyard. By the time they came inside to a warm bath, they were ready for sleep. "She was washed first. She wanted some time to play with her toys before we tucked her in," Steve said.

“Okay, let’s give her some time to herself then,” Bucky agreed and carried Christopher to the nursery. He heard a very quiet ‘Papa’ followed by a tired whine. “Very sleepy Bean. This never happens with both of them at once.” He slowly lowered his son into his crib and got him all tucked in. Christopher brought his thumb to his mouth and curled his legs up to the side, just about a few seconds from sleep.

Steve always thought their kids were the cutest when they were all sleepy and cuddly with their parents. Although Christopher was easily put down, Sarah May insisted on being rocked to sleep in her daddy’s arms before she was put in her crib. With both babies put to bed with ease, Steve grinned over at Bucky. "Piece of cake, huh?"

---

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve in for a kiss. "Yeah, nice and easy tonight," he agreed and slipped his arms around Steve’s middle. "Let’s go so they don’t wake up again." He pulled Steve out of the nursery and shut the door carefully. “I haven’t had a chance to really talk to you today. How was your day?”

---

Steve leaned into Bucky’s arms and turned his head to give him a kiss. He walked into their bedroom so they could sit and chat for a little while before putting their oldest daughter to bed. "It was nice," he said. "I was able to teach Christopher some new animals today. He's still calling deer ‘doggies’, though."

---

“That’s okay. He will get it eventually. I mean, Adriana can list off hundreds of different animals and yet sometimes she has to ask me to remind her what her middle name is,” Bucky said with a shrug. “I’m glad it was a good day. The kids all seem to be pretty happy right now. I think Ya-Ya likes the colder weather. She likes to snuggle up in her sweaters.”

---

"That girl loves her animals. I'm looking into some summer programs for her that take kids on nature walks, but most of them are for kids a little older than her," Steve said. "I've been thinking about having my mom teach me to knit so I can make Ya-Ya baby sweaters or little slings so she could cuddle with us while we're doing other stuff."

---

That was a good idea. She loved being held by them as much as she could be. Maybe a sling for her would be good so then she could nap there with them. “Sure, Baby, I think that’s smart,” he said and then took Steve’s hand in his. “Hey, can I ask you something?” he started and reached for the financial folder he left on the bed. “Becca found a discrepancy in our finances and we are trying to figure out what happened.”

---

Steve looked concerned when Bucky used that tone with him - the 'I'm not sure if I should worry yet or not' tone. He looked at the folder with a frown. "Why’s she looking at our finances?" he asked. "It's just another excuse for her to be smug about something if she thinks we're spending our money wrong. What did she find?"

---

“Apparently, I agreed to let her help me manage it all,” Bucky said softly and handed Steve a few papers and pointed to the lines that Becca had marked. “We’re missing about two hundred dollars over here on your expenses. We tried to find receipts or something but we couldn’t. And I’m not trying to be like some uptight stingy stooge husband but we did agree that I would be in charge of finances.”
Steve pouted a little when Bucky pointed it out. He considered trying to dance around it but he knew that it would nag at the back of Bucky's mind until he got an answer. He turned and got a shoebox out from underneath his side of the bed. He opened it up and showed Bucky stacks of money stuffed inside of it. "It was a surprise," he said. "For the past few months, I've been putting money away for your college tuition."

---

Bucky riffled through the box. There was close to fourteen hundred dollars already there. Steve must have been putting aside any spare change he had left over from shopping days on top of the two hundred that was put aside monthly already. "Steve..." he said quietly and looked up at his husband. He chuckled softly and shook his head. "Baby, you should have figured that you can’t surprise me like that when I’m the one who looks at all our expenses all the time." He reached out and pulled Steve close to him again, kissing his lips and cheek repeatedly. "I love you. And I love that you wanted to do this for me."

---

Steve smirked and proudly said, "Well, I was able to hide it from you for half a year. It took your sister being nosy for you to finally catch on." He pressed their lips together. "I know it's going to be tough for you when you go back to school. So, I figured if we save up for tuition and for some safety money since you'll probably have to cut your hours, it'll be helpful."

---

"Yeah, it is helpful. Thank you, Baby," Bucky said and moved the folder aside so he could slip his hands on Steve’s neck and kiss him more. He tilted them both so they were laying on their sides on the bed. "You know that sometimes I wake up and see you still asleep next to me and all I can think is, ‘Oh, my god. I get to be married to Steve. I get to have the most kind, loving, handsome, thoughtful, gentle, sexy, passionate husband in the world.’ And then I have to just take a second to look at you because I can’t even believe it."

---

Steve blushed deeply at Bucky's professed love for him. "You're such a dope, Babe," he said lovingly. "You're the best husband ever, Bucky. Even better than I am. I can't imagine how crappy my life would've been if I never got to meet you," he said with a little pout. "You're my world, Buck. You and our kids."

---

"I know. I know and you’re my world," Bucky assured him and rolled them so he could spread himself out on top of Steve. "And in two years, I’ll be in school again and it’s thanks to you. Then I’ll have some sort of other job and I’ll be able to provide for my family better. It’s going to be great."

---

Steve smiled. "You'll be raking in all the dough so we can have the other half of our baseball team," he said with a wink. "And then our kids will be able to see their papa more often because he'll have a steady job with normal hours and vacation days," he said sweetly.

---

"That’s what I want," Bucky said with a pleased little smile. "I want to spend time with my family. I never get enough time with you all." He brushed his hands through Steve’s hair and added, "How about tonight you let me suck you off in the shower and then once we’re done, I’ll take you to bed and fuck you on your hands and knees with that beautiful ass up in the air. Maybe I’ll get another orgasm from you.”

---

Steve looked very interested in that. He locked eyes with his husband and gave him a bright smile. "Yes," he said excitedly. "Let's get Adriana tucked in, make sure the animals are fed and walked, and then we can spend the night alone together.”

---

“We better get going then,” Bucky said and rolled off of Steve. I’ll get Adriana. You get the animals? We will make quick time of it? I want you as soon as I can have you. I want you now and forever. I want to be inside you and fucking into you so deep and fast.”

---

Steve blushed shyly. No matter how much time passed, Bucky would always be the more outgoing one when it came to talking about sex. Raphael demanded attention and Diana took forever to do her business outside but at long last, Steve returned and was ready for an evening with his husband.

---

Adriana was so sleepy and she curled up in her bed without any arguments. Bucky read her a bedtime story and then set her night light on and headed to check on his sisters and kiss them goodnight. Once everyone was accounted for, he went back to his and Steve’s room and stripped down. He tidied up just a little bit and then went and waiting naked in the bathroom, sitting on the counter, one foot up on the wall across from him so he was on display, and a towel wrapped up and draped around his neck like he just finished a workout. It was a little ridiculous but Steve would like it.

---

Steve walked into the bathroom when he didn't see Bucky in the bedroom and was taken with a pleasant shock when he saw Bucky sitting on the counter on full display for him. He blushed deeply and walked over to his husband so he could run his hands along his thighs. "You're cleaning the counter now that your naked ass has just rubbed itself all over it," he teased fondly before kissing his husband deeply, trailing his fingers along his dick.

---

Bucky kissed Steve back, wrapping one leg around him a moment and biting lightly at his bottom lip. “Are you saying that my bare ass is dirty? I’ll have you know that I clean it almost once a week. And sometimes I even use the good soap,” he joked with a little sour expression as if horribly offended by Steve’s insinuation.

---

"Yes, I am. I think I'm going to have to lick it clean," he joked. Steve hummed in approval when Bucky bit his lip. "So, are you going to undress your husband or are you going to make him have to do it himself? He's had a long day taking care of all the children you've hounded him into having."
“I hounded?” Bucky asked. “I think that’s a little bit off. I’m pretty sure you’re the one who said we should have as many as possible. And then I’m pretty sure you like taking care of our babies too, by the way. I could be wrong, though,” he slid off the counter and stood in front of Steve, naked and horny and, as always, just a little shorter than him so he had to look up into his warm eyes. “I also was going to help undress you but then you called me dirty. So, maybe I should get in the shower and get a head start on cleaning up while you undress yourself.”

---

"Nah, you totally were the child-pusher. I wanted to have a solitary life with just me and my husband but you had to bring in this whole parenting business," Steve said with a dumb smirk. He ran his hands over Bucky's shoulders because he couldn't keep his hands off of him. "How about I apologize for my comment and you undress me."

---

“Such bullshit,” Bucky scoffed and brought his hips forward so he was pushing his cock against Steve’s leg. “You apologize and then I’ll consider helping to undress you,” he said, his hands already holding Steve’s ass firmly. There was no way he was going to be able to keep this up. He was going to cave so fast.

---

"I’m sorry I called your ass dirty. It is, in fact, the cleanest ass I've ever had the pleasure of touching. It is the ass that you work off every day to provide a comfortable life for me and our family," Steve said, touching Bucky's hip lightly. "It is the ass that is attached to the person I love so, so much."

---

Bucky scrunched up his face and chuckled before waving Steve off. “Okay, Okay, I get it. Stop that. It got odd fast. Just give me a kiss and then you’ll be forgiven,” he said. He moved Steve’s shirt collar aside so he could lick a line over his collarbone and then nip gently at the bend in his neck.

---

Steve looked ready to compliment Bucky's ass for another few minutes but he grinned when Bucky had enough of it and started to undress him. He pecked his lips affectionately and then tilted his head so Bucky had better access to his neck. "Tell me more about how much you love me," he purred, stroking a single finger over Bucky's dick.

---

“Oh, I love you, Baby,” Bucky said, a little impatiently as he slid down Steve’s body and sunk to the floor so he was kneeling in front of him. “I love you more than anything. But do you want to hear it right now or should my mouth show you how I love you?” He looked up at Steve and then pressed his face to his crotch. Steve was wearing jeans with a snap button and a short zipper. It was easy enough to use his teeth and tongue to get them undone. He nosed the open fly aside and kissed Steve’s clothed dick a few times before reaching up to pull pants and underwear from Steve at once.

---

Steve threaded his fingers in Bucky's hair when he sunk down in front of him. He loved how sexy Bucky was and how he could do damned near pornographic levels of foreplay with him. "Fuck," he swore, aroused as hell when Bucky used his mouth to get his pants off. He whined and tightened his fingers in Bucky's hair as he continued to tease him. "You're right. I'd rather you show me."
Bucky grinned up at Steve and licked a line up from Steve’s balls to the tip of his cock. He sucked the head into his mouth for a second just to wet it and then he popped off again. “Shower. Let’s go,” he grunted softly and stood back up to pull Steve into the shower with him. He turned on the water and stood under the stream so Steve could see his body get drenched and his hair get matted down around his face and neck. He knew he liked that.

Steve was already hard and aching, so it felt a little awkward walking into the shower with his dick waving everywhere. He pressed himself against his husband, once in the shower, and gently fixed Bucky’s hair so it neatly fell down his back and shoulders. “Your hair is getting pretty long, Baby.”

“Yeah, it is. Do you want me to cut it?” Bucky asked curiously and touched the ends of his wet hair.
It was about three inches longer than he normally kept it. He just hadn’t taken the time to trim it up in a long while. He was always so busy that he just sort of forgot. And since they didn’t cut the kids’ hair, he hadn’t remembered to cut his own for months.

“No, Baby. I think it looks beautiful.” Steve liked combing his fingers through Bucky’s long hair.
Christopher’s was getting on the long side as well but Steve wouldn’t dare suggest cutting it. He kissed Bucky’s forehead and smiled warmly. “You can cut it whenever you want. But I like it when it gets long.”

Bucky nodded and pulled Steve in under the stream of water with him so he could press their lips together. He held them like that for a few moments and then finally popped off of his husband.
“Want me to suck you off now like I planned? Or do you want to wait until we are in bed?”

Steve considered and said, “Let’s do it here. It’s been a while since we fooled around in the shower.”
He teased one of Bucky’s nipples with his thumb. “I’d love to see my dick on your lips with water pouring down on you too. You look extra nice with your body all slick and wet...”

Bucky let out a hot sigh of a breath and gave a tick of a grin. “Uh-huh, you got it, Babe,” he agreed and once again sank down Steve’s body so he was facing his cock head-on. “Tell me what you want me to do you tonight, okay?” he requested and licked along Steve’s dick. “I want to know everything you want.” He kissed Steve’s hips and then gently but swiftly took his entire cock down his throat and held it for a few moments before starting to pull back.

Steve opened his mouth to start telling Bucky what to do but all that came out was a moan. “Oh, fuck, Sweetheart.” It took him a moment to recover and, when he had the sense to talk again, he said,
“I want you to draw it out. I love seeing you suck me off with your gorgeous lips.”
Bucky hummed along the shaft and pulled himself all the way off until he had just the head sitting nicely cradled in his mouth. He looked up at Steve and held eye contact as he once again slowly took the whole thing down. He felt it hit the back of his throat and he just stayed like that for a bit, hands trailing up to hold Steve’s ass. He pulled back just enough so Steve would have somewhere to go and then he pushed him forward so he got the idea that Bucky wanted him to fuck his mouth.

---

Steve cupped the side of Bucky’s face and rubbed his thumb over his cheek. His eyes were focused on his husband and his husband, alone. “God, you’re amazing,” he breathed out. His hips pressed forward just a bit. “Can you tease my ass?” he asked, blushing a bit. “Just one finger. I want to want more.”

---

Bucky nodded as much as he could with a cock in his mouth and ran one finger in between Steve’s cheeks to start teasing his hole. He had such a firm ass. It was incredible. And Bucky often forgot since he spent more time being the bottom, it seemed. But, god, when he got his hands on Steve... it was electric. And Bucky could touch and kiss and lick and bite and praise Steve’s body until the day he died and it still wouldn’t be enough for him.

---

Steve threw his head back but forgot how close he was to the wall and knocked it a tiny bit. “Fuck,” he swore, rubbing his head with a bashful laugh. “See what you’re doing to me?” He leaned his head back easier this time. “I love you. God, Buck, you’re perfect. A perfect husband who can suck dick perfectly too.”

---

Bucky pulled off so he could take a breather and he chuckled and looked up at Steve. “Well, that is all that one has to look for in a husband,” he joked as he eased the tip of his finger more firmly against Steve’s hole. He wanted to watch his face while he did it. Bucky brought his mouth back to Steve’s cock and licked lightly around the head and the slit, tucking his tongue around every dip and hill and every throbbing vein.

---

Bucky sucked dick like a goddamned champion and it had Steve writhing in his spot and whimpering Bucky’s name because it felt so good. He was hard, aching, and leaking heavily into Bucky’s mouth as he sucked him off. And when he came, damn, Bucky could bring out the best orgasms ever. Steve gripped Bucky’s hair tightly and held his head steady as his hips jerked forward, spilling himself down his throat.

---

Bucky’s mouth was so full of Steve’s cock and his warm come shooting right down his throat felt fucking amazing and made his own hard cock twitch and plead for attention. He liked to keep going after Steve came just to see how much Steve could take before it was too much for him. He kept his mouth on Steve’s cock and licked a line up to the head. Pressing his tongue on the underside, he hummed deeply.

---

Steve’s back arched and his thighs shook. “Bucky, Baby,” he moaned helplessly, jerking a little every time Bucky’s tongue swiped at the head of his dick. It was all too much but he also loved it when Bucky pushed him like this. He finally had to call it quits a few minutes later. Steve pulled back abruptly, his entire body trembling from the work Bucky’s mouth did on him. “Jesus Christ—” he gasped out.

---

Steve pulled off of Bucky so quickly that Bucky fumbled forward a little in the shower and had to catch himself before planting into the ground. He sat back on his legs so Steve could see him down on the ground for him under the cascading water. “You taste just as good as the very first time,” he said and reached out to brush his fingers encouragingly on Steve’s thigh.

---

“Sorry,” Steve apologized. “It was so much.” He was still catching his breath. He looked down at his husband with an appreciative groan and finally squatted down in front of him. He cupped Bucky’s face and drew him in for a slow and tender kiss. “I love you so fucking much, Baby,” he said. “If you sucked me off like that the first time I think you would’ve made me cry from how good it was. I’m glad you took it easy on me back then,” Steve chuckled.

---

Bucky gladly kissed Steve back and hoped he could taste himself on Bucky’s mouth. “I know, Baby. I wanted to build you up to a lot of things. But, some time, I bet I could still bring you to orgasm so well that you will cry. Maybe I’ll fist you again soon and just massage your prostate endlessly until you’re so overwhelmed with pleasure you need a break.”

---

Steve leaned heavily against his husband’s chest even though he was the bigger one out of the two of them. He groaned as he kissed Bucky’s cheek. “You trying to make me come again?” He joked. “We should give that a try the next time we have the day to ourselves. There’s no way I’m going to want to do a thing if your fist has been inside of me.”

---

Bucky nodded his agreement and slipped his arms around Steve and ushered him to stand up again. They did need to shower, after all. And he had just gotten this special new shampoo that was supposed to help long hair stay soft and brush-able near the ends. He really needed it. The ends of his hair were badly split and severely unmanageable on most mornings.

---

Steve stood up right after and grabbed Bucky’s new shampoo. He poured some in his hands and started to massage it into his scalp. He sighed happily. “Have you ever thought about coloring your hair?” he asked. “Even if it’s just temporary. I bet the kids would get a kick out of it if you had blue hair for a day or something.”

---

Bucky turned his head to stare at Steve for a second. “Are you kidding? I can’t tell if you’re kidding,” he said quizzically. He loved his hair just the way it was and didn’t know how he would feel about changing the color like that. But maybe he could give it a try if it was really only for a day or so. Maybe the kids would like it. Just so long as he was brunette again very soon after.
“I’m being serious.” Steve laughed. “Imagine what Christopher would do if you showed up one day with silly new hair dye done up in a mohawk or something? You’d look even more like a rock star than you already do.” He smiled adoringly at his husband. “Sarah May might think that you’re weird, though.”

“A mohawk?” Bucky asked incredulously. “Steve, Baby, I’m not a high-schooler or some wannabe new age teen rocker who wants to fight hair bands. I’m a Ramones man. I won’t let the sleek seventies die because kids these days don’t know how good they’ve got it with music right now. Glam is at its peak. And it doesn’t include mohawks.”

Steve playfully held a lock of Bucky’s hair up. “I don’t know, Buck. Looking like a big old peacock may be a good look for you. You won’t know until you try,” he tempted, smiling dumbly at his husband. “Or maybe we can get you a bald cap and pretend you shaved it all off.”

“You’re the worst,” Bucky said with a sigh and gave Steve a little kiss. “You would hate seeing me bald, even if it was fake. And I don’t want to make Sarah May cry like you did on Halloween. And she would cry. The babies love pulling on my hair so they will be very upset if it’s all gone.”

“I didn’t even mean to make her cry,” Steve said. “She’s such a sensitive little soul.” He washed out the shampoo from Bucky’s hair. “Admit it, though. You’d love to have a little break from having your hair pulled. Even though you’ll miss it when they’re older and want nothing to do with their lame parents.”

“Yeah, it would be nice to have a break from the hair-pulling,” Bucky admitted. “But it won’t stop forever because even when Christopher and Sarah May will be teenagers, we will have another baby pulling on my hair anyway.” Their baseball team of children were probably all going to be hair-pullers.

“And once those babies become teenagers, our older ones will be having grandkids.” Steve ran his hands down Bucky’s arms and stopped at his hands. He laced their fingers together. “You like it when I pull your hair, at least,” he said, winking at Bucky.

Bucky chuckled and leaned into Steve’s touch. “Yeah, but that’s different. You pull all the hair at once. You don’t grab a dozen strands and yank them all out. Also, it helps that, usually when you are pulling my hair, your cock is inside me too. It’s a good combination.” He reached over and shut the water off, ringing his hair out as it trickled to a stop. He was ready to give his cock some attention now and he did want inside Steve tonight. He was also fairly confident that he could get him to come again.
When they got out of the shower, Steve grabbed a towel and wrapped it around his husband. He made sure to brush his fingers lightly against his cock as he tied it around Bucky’s waist. He wrapped a towel around himself right after and commented, “nice tent you got there.”

“It’s yours if you want it,” Bucky countered with a grin and went to look in the mirror a second to check his hair. “I was planning on getting you on your knees and fucking you well enough that you can’t walk in the morning. But if that doesn’t appeal to you then I don’t have to do it.”

“Please. It’s been mine for years now,” Steve teased. He toweled off and walked over to their bed and slowly climbed onto it with his legs spread for Bucky. “That sounds like a good plan to me. But first, how about you let me have a taste of it if you think you can last,” he purred, looking back at Bucky.

“Ooh, Baby,” Bucky growled low in his throat and sauntered over to Steve with his cock pointed directly at him, ready to have contact with his husband finally. “I can last. Help me get my cock nice and wet and ready to fuck you.” He grinned and captured Steve’s lips in a long, warm kiss before popping off with a gasped, “I fucking love you.”

Steve loved it when Bucky was like this. He was admittedly pretty overeager to have Bucky inside of him. He held the base of his husband’s cock and looked innocently up at him as he lapped at the tip. After a few little licks, he wrapped his lips around the head and slowly sunk down a few inches with a pleased groan.

Bucky watched Steve intently with his mouth open in an undignified gape and his eyes only able to keep half open. He was so hard and so ready for Steve. “You’re spectacular,” he whispered and watched how smoothly his dick disappeared into Steve’s mouth and then came right back again. He brushed his hand through Steve’s hair and gingerly caressed his temples and his cheeks. “You are the single most beautiful sight in the world.”

Steve’s eyes closed halfway as Bucky praised him and touched him. He dipped further down on Bucky’s cock, moaning low as he bobbed his head on the beautiful dick presented to him. As he pulled back, he dragged the tip of his tongue firmly along the underside while his hand reached up to caress Bucky’s balls. He hummed in appreciation, letting their weight rest in his palm.

“God, Steve,” Bucky breathed, letting himself pay attention to the light fondling from Steve’s fingers and the drag of his tongue. “Fuck, Baby... you’re the greatest man anyone could ever have. You’re the sexiest and the sweetest. I’m so lucky to get to love you, to get to kiss you, fuck you, hold you, talk to you, wake up to you. I want to be inside you now, please. Let me get inside your wonderful ass, Baby. I’ll be so good to you.”
Steve had been enjoying the taste of Bucky’s dick on his lips but he wanted Bucky to make love to him. He wanted to feel Bucky take him apart and put him back together again. He pulled off of Bucky’s dick with a wet pop and sat up to give Bucky a hot, dirty kiss. “I want you,” he said between kisses. “Please, Buck, give me your cock.”

Bucky nodded eagerly and kissed Steve again as he reached to get the lube from the nightstand. He kissed Steve’s forehead and then his cheek and gestured for him to get down on his knees for him. “Ass up, Baby, please,” he requested and waited for Steve to show himself off on all fours. “Gonna give you two fingers to start, okay? You want two fingers, Love?”

Steve turned and got on his hands and knees with his ass up in the air on display for his husband. He was aching for it. “Yes. Yes, that’s perfect, Buck,” he said. “Don’t go too fast. I want to feel everything you do.” Steve closed his eyes, relaxed and ready for his husband to open him up.

Bucky gave Steve a gentle kiss on his ass cheek as an answer as he slowly, carefully pushed two heavily lubed fingers into his husband. “There you go, Steve. That’s it,” he whispered and started to pump in and out of him firmly and steadily but not too fast. “If I go slow with you right now, can I ram you once you’ve got my cock?”

“Ohh,” Steve groaned softly in satisfaction. He dropped his head, relaxing even more despite the penetration. “Yeah, Buck, that’s fine,” he said. “Can you do me from behind when you’re ramming me?” he asked. “I want you all over me. I want to feel like only me and you exist.”

“That was the plan, yes,” Bucky admitted and gave Steve’s ass another few kisses before working in the third finger. “I want to rail you. Have you biting the pillow, and groaning and squeezing my cock as you come all over the bed. Gonna bury my dick up inside you and coat you with my come. Then once I’m done, I’ll trade my dick for fingers and fuck you with my hand until you’re about to pass out from the intensity of pleasure.” Bucky wasn’t usually like this. He was just feeling wild today and wanted to go a little wild on Steve too.

Steve groaned and arched his back when Bucky started to work another finger in. “I’m going to save up every damned penny for your college if this is what that gets me,” he said. He did it because he loved Bucky but having amazing sex was another huge perk to consider. “I’m ready for your dick, Buck. Give me your cock, baby, I want it so bad.”

“Baby, I’ll give this to you whenever you want it. Just give me the signal and I’ll be on you,” Bucky growled and rolled his hips against Steve’s body for a second. He kept two fingers still inside of Steve and lubed up his cock with his free hand. Bucky carefully lined up to his hole and pushed in all the way to his balls, right next to his fingers. “God, fuck, tight.”
Steve hadn’t been expecting Bucky to keep his fingers inside of him. When he felt his husband’s dick bury in right next to his fingers, Steve threw his head back and cried out. “Ohh, fuck!” he swore. “Bucky, oh, baby, don’t stop,” Steve gasped out, gripping the sheets tightly.

“Yeah? This is okay?” Bucky double-checked and leaned his body over him to kiss Steve’s back and shoulders. “I’m going to move now, Baby. And, unless you tell me to stop, I’m going to move fast and hard. Okay? I’m taking you apart tonight. I’m showing you what I can do.” He punctuated his declaration with a sharp thrust of his hips. “Just tell me if it’s too much,” he said and then pulled his cock out to the head and then slammed right back in, bracing his hands on Steve’s hips before setting his immediate brutal pace that had him starting to sweat in seconds.

Steve’s body jerked at the hard thrust and he threw his head back with another moan. “Go ahead, Baby,” he said breathlessly. “Show me what you got.” And Bucky did just that for him. The pace was more than Steve was used to and his mouth hung open in a silent moan as Bucky railed him harder than ever before. He scooped the pillow up towards his face and bit it so he wouldn’t wake the babies up with the noise he was making. Every muscle in his body was tightly wound up like a coil ready to spring and Bucky was already making his dick want to get hard again.

Bucky kept his hard thrusts into Steve but he slowed them down a bit so he could work a third finger back into his ass. Bucky loved stretching Steve like that. And, for a second, he wished he had two dicks so he could get them both inside Steve. But that wasn’t how human anatomy worked. “You are so pretty, Steve,” Bucky said softly and reached his free hand around to clutch on to Steve’s cock. He pulled himself almost all the way out of Steve and then slam back in to pick up his initial pace once again.

Steve whined and writhed beneath Bucky. He had a blush that went all the way down to his chest and his whole body trembled with pleasure. He squeezed his eyes shut and let out a helpless moan into the pillow, crying out Bucky’s name over and over in pleasure as his husband wrecked him in the best way possible. It was clear that Steve wasn’t going to last very long.

The sounds Steve was making was spurring Bucky on more and more and he pumped Steve’s cock in time with his thrusts and even leaned in to give him a few bites to his shoulder and neck. He knew he only had maybe a few moments left in him before he was going to shoot up inside of Steve but he was going to savor those moments until he did. “I love you, Baby. I love you so much. You’re such a good handsome husband and you’re all mine.”

Steve was gasping for air and he felt close to passing out between the way Bucky was fucking him and how it felt like he couldn’t take a full breath into his lungs. When he came again, a little by surprise, he couldn’t see straight and he practically screamed Bucky’s name into the pillow as his ass clenched around his husband’s dick.
Bucky pushed up as far into him as he could get and exploded his come deep inside Steve’s ass. “Fuck!” Bucky yelped. His whole body shook and he pulled his fingers out of him so he could reach his arms around and hold Steve up. “Baby, you okay?” he asked and just stilled them for a moment to give Steve time to breathe and calm back down after his orgasm.

Steve fisted the blanket sheets desperately, wheezing a little as he tried to gulp air thickly into his lungs. His thighs trembled and he looked back at Bucky, barely able to move. “Overwhelmed,” he managed to get out softly. He reached his hand down to place over Bucky’s.

“Okay, I’ve got you. I got you, Baby.” Bucky assured him softly and held him close and securely. “I’m sorry. I think I pushed you too much. Two orgasms in a short time like that and being so rough was probably too much.” He knew Steve more than likely enjoyed himself but Bucky wasn’t typically so wild and harsh when fucking Steve and now he had overwhelmed his husband. “I’ve got you, Baby. I love you.”

Steve slowly turned in Bucky’s arms and buried his face in his husband’s chest. It took a little while for him to talk but at long last, he mumbled, “I liked it.” Steve wasn’t sure how often he’d be able to do something like this but it was more intense than anything they’d done before - even fisting - and Steve was very much in need of being cuddled. “Was it good for you too?”

“Oh, Babe, it was phenomenal for me,” Bucky said emphatically and laid down mostly on top of Steve so he could wrap him in his arms. “That was perfect. You are perfect. Every second was bliss. Trust me.” He kissed Steve’s neck and cheek and lips and then looked into his eyes and gave him a gentle little smile. “You make me feel invincible. You make me feel infinite. It’s cheesy, but it’s true, Steve. And I love you to the moon and back and then back again and again and again.”

Steve soaked up the love and praise that Bucky gave him. He wrapped his arms around his husband and pulled him in even closer, wanting Bucky’s full weight on him. “You wrecked me good,” he said with a breathless laugh. “If the babies wake up in the night, you’re getting up to take care of them.”

Bucky chuckled and squeezed Steve a little tighter. “I will, Love. I’ll take care of all of them. And I’ll take care of you, too. I’ll make you breakfast in bed tomorrow if you want. And I’ll give you a massage. You can sleep in as much as you want because I don’t have to work until late tomorrow.” He sighed contentedly and kissed along Steve’s jaw. “Baby, I can’t stop kissing you and touching you. You’ve got me so hooked. I just want to be attached to you all the time, Love.”

Steve tilted his head to give Bucky more room to kiss his jaw. He kind of wished they were dressed appropriately to have the babies in here because Steve wanted maximum cuddling. He gave Bucky puppy eyes and reached up to play with his hair. “Call in sick tomorrow?” he asked in an extra pathetic voice to get Bucky to agree with it. “Spend the day with us tomorrow.”

---

Bucky was such a sucker for Steve’s begging face and he loved having his hair played with too. He just wanted to make Steve happy all the time and hold him like this forever. “I guess I can ask Tim to do it. I’m only supposed to be in from around two to eight. And Reggie will be there and Tim actually gets along really well with him.”

---

Steve beamed and gave Bucky a big kiss on the cheek. “Thank you,” he said happily. “I want to spend all day with you. And Adriana will be so happy to have you around, too.” He scratched his nails lightly up Bucky’s back. “I love you so damn much.”

---

“I love you too, Sweetheart,” Bucky said and worked on pulling a blanket up over the two of them. “I did promise Clint I would talk to him tomorrow so I might have to blame you for neglecting him when I see him next. I finally figured out what’s up with him and Nat.”

---

Steve relaxed back into the mattress and closed his eyes. “What’s going on between those two?” He was still really worried, and had been. He didn’t want either of them to not be happy in their relationship.

---

Bucky sighed and relaxed next to Steve too. “Well,” he started and found Steve’s hand to lace their fingers together. “It kind of turned into this whole big thing. Because Clint decided to ask Natasha to move in with him. And she wasn’t so sure. So, he said that it would be great because his place has an extra bedroom that could be Nat’s office or den space. And then she asked why it was that she would have to move to his place and not the other way around. And then he said that it was because his place was bigger and it was his mom’s and he has the little cellar. And then she said she liked her place better and it is closer to the precinct. Then it kind of snowballed.”

---

Steve ended up laughing a little at that. In all honesty, Clint’s place was the better choice but he knew how stubborn Natasha could be and how it would inconvenience her to move further from the precinct. He gave Bucky’s hand a squeeze. “That sounds like something she would put up a fight over,” he sighed. “Where are they at now?”

---

“I’m not sure,” Bucky admitted softly. “To be honest, I don’t think Natasha wants to move in with him yet. She knows what his desires in life are - marriage and children. And since that isn’t hers, she doesn’t know what to do. Because she doesn’t want to lose him but she probably won’t change her mind about those things either. I just think they are at a bit of a crossroads and they can’t figure out what to do.”

---
“Do you think that he would change his mind about it?” Steve had been worried for a while about that issue as well. He knew how much Clint loved kids and if Bucky had told Steve he didn’t want kids at all, it would have been a tough pill to swallow. But Steve also didn’t want Natasha and Clint’s relationship to end. He loved that they were together.

---

Bucky took a few moments to think. He really wasn’t sure how this was going to play out. “I don’t know, Baby. Because Clint really does love her. And she loves him too. But Clint has always wanted to be a father. I guess now he needs to figure out which is more important to him. And that’s not going to be easy. Especially, because what he really wants is to have a life with her and their children but he can’t have both.”

---

Steve started to look all sad and emotional over their friends’ relationship being rocky. His lips turned down into a frown and although he really, really wanted Bucky around the house tomorrow, he said, “Do you think Clint needs you around to talk to tomorrow? I don’t want to take you away if he needs you.”

---

“Oh, hey, come on,” Bucky muttered and brushed his thumb over Steve’s frown. “Where did my happy man go? It’s okay, Steve. Clint and Natasha are going to have to be the ones to work it out. Clint can talk to me about it all he wants but I’ve already given him the advice I can give. And it’s on him now to really think about this thing. It’ll be okay. And he can spare me for a day. He will have to get used to me not being around all the time once I start college anyway.”

---

Steve squeezed Bucky’s hand and he sighed dramatically. “I don’t like this. It’s so sad. I don’t wish I could fix it. Talk to me about something else, Buck. Tell me what we’re going to do tomorrow.”

---

“Baby, things happen. You know this. Relationships go through tests like this. Ours has recently gone through its share,” Bucky assured Steve and then gave him a kiss. “Tomorrow we can do whatever you want. It’s getting colder out so the zoo and the parks would probably not be a good idea. The girls have school and your mom is going to Manhattan with some friends. We could do an art day with the kids. Or do some home science experiments. I saw an article about making bouncy balls with baking supplies.”

---

Steve considered the options for a little while. “Let’s do art in the morning and then science in the afternoon. Lilly may have fun with the bouncy balls,” he said. Or at least, she would potentially enjoy that more than art so he would save that for later just in case she was interested. “Christopher doesn’t seem to have much of an interest in creating. He just likes to create messes,” he sighed.

---

“Maybe that’s his form of creating art,” Bucky offered and shifted a little so Steve was more cradled in his arms than underneath him. “He’s just going to be more of an abstract artist, Babe. He’s not our Da Vinci. He’s our Picasso.” He smiled and gave Steve a little kiss on the lips. “Sarah May will probably be our Da Vinci. She’s really precise and not so chaotic. The jury is still out on Adriana, though.”

---

“That girl has no natural drawing ability, I’m sorry to say. But she does love to color,” Steve chuckled. “So long as she’s enjoying herself, I’m happy.” He kissed Bucky’s cheek. “I’m thinking Adriana’s going to be our little science nerd or maybe she’s going to be good at music. We can get her into piano soon maybe.”

---

Bucky nodded and thought about whether Adriana would even want that or not. But maybe Steve had talked to her about it already. “We can try that. But for right now, I’m sleepy and everyone else is asleep and it sounds like we have a big day planned tomorrow. So, give me a kiss and let’s fall asleep together.”
Chapter Summary

First Half of the Day.

The next morning, the two of them were woken up by a knocking on their bedroom door. Adriana was rapping her knuckles on the door over and over with a small sense of urgency. “Daddy, Papa! Wake up! Christopher is doing something he shouldn’t,” she said through the door. “Daaaddy, Paapaaa,” she whined obnoxiously to wake them up.

---

Bucky groaned and blinked open his eyes as he rolled off of Steve. They were still naked and sticky but Adriana was insistent. “Steve, clothes,” he muttered and nudged Steve’s leg. Although, he did suspect that Steve was probably pretty sore this morning and he should just take care of this on his own. He yawned and tugged on his pants and a big T-shirt. “Yes, Peanut, what’s wrong?” he asked, as he slipped carefully out of the room in a way so Adriana wouldn’t be able to see inside to Steve.

---

Steve groaned and rolled onto his side. He made a motion to make Bucky go take care of things because he was still feeling pretty wrecked. He curled up under the blankets once Bucky left.

Adriana took Bucky by the hand and led him stealthily to the nursery and pointed at the slightly open door. Christopher had climbed out of his crib and was standing at the side of Sarah May’s with his arms up, trying to coax her to escape as well. “Here, Ya-Ya! Here!”

---

“What? How did you even do that?” Bucky asked with wide eyes and bent down to scoop Christopher up in his arms. “Christopher, how did you get out?” He looked at the crib and it didn’t look broken or anything. Christopher must have carefully climbed over and slid off. But he didn’t understand how he did that anyway. But Bucky did make sturdy cribs and that probably made for an easy escape without it wobbling at all.

---

Christopher didn’t think he had done anything wrong so he simply giggled when he was scooped up because he wanted someone to play with. “Papa, Ya-Ya,” he said, pointing at his little sister for Bucky to take as well. Sarah May hadn’t seemed interested in leaving her crib until Bucky showed up and she started to bounce excitedly.

---

“Oh, dear heavens,” Bucky sighed and set Christopher down on the ground by Adriana. He had been working on saying things around the kids that weren’t swear words. “Okay, Sarah May, Papa is here. Up we go!” he said as he hoisted her in the air and then snuggled her close.
Their youngest daughter immediately cuddled close to Bucky when she was picked up, much to Christopher’s jealousy. “Papa! Me,” he said with a low pout he had to have learned from Steve.

Adriana added to the swarm by tugging on Bucky’s shirt lightly. “Papa, can I have a story before you go to work?”

---

Blinking a few times tiredly, Bucky looked to all his kids and let out a deep breath he was holding. “Okay, okay... Papa can do this,” he said to himself and picked up Christopher in his other arm. “Adriana, honey, I need to make breakfast. And I’m not working today. So, we can have story time after we eat. Will you help me watch the babies will I cook breakfast?”

---

Of course, with Bucky’s luck, Sarah May whined and gave Christopher a little push when he got too close to where she’d been cuddling her papa. “No,” she said to Christopher, who looked taken aback.

Adriana was the only one cooperating. “Yes. I’m a big girl now,” she said, as if that was enough explanation that she could mind her little siblings.

---

“Ya-Ya, no push,” Bucky said sternly and moved them apart as best as he could. “Thank you, Peanut. Papa is going to make eggs and waffles. Is that okay?” he asked and gave her a pleading look. He wasn’t sure what time it was or even if the girls were gone for school or not. “Are your aunts still here? Is Nana still here?”

---

Sarah May looked offended by the tone Bucky spoke to her in and just whined in response. “I like waffles,” Adriana approved. “Aunt Becca and Aunt Lilly ‘leaved’. Nana is sleeping still,” she reported. “Can I have extra waffles?” she asked as she followed Bucky out and down the stairs to the kitchen only to find Raphael had knocked the bowl of dog treats onto the floor and Diana was cleaning them up by eating them.

---

“Your aunts ‘left’,” Bucky corrected softly. He wanted to help her learn when she was saying the wrong things but sometimes he worried he was hurting her feelings by correcting her. She was behind other kids her age so Bucky was making a point to get her caught up.

Bucky groaned when he saw Diana vacuuming up all the treats before anyone could come stop her. He needed Steve. He needed someone. He wasn’t good with taking care of all of this on his own. “Okay, Diana, leave it.” He looked her in the eyes and said it again. He was going to do this without Steve. He could do it. “Diana, sit.”

---

Adriana pulled a sad face when Bucky corrected her but she didn’t comment back on it. She climbed up into her usual chair and wiggled in her seat a bit. Once Bucky told Diana to sit, the dog plopped on her ass and looked over at Bucky with big, pathetic eyes because he made her stop eating.
“Diana, go to Steve,” he said and pointed upstairs. “Go to Steve.” He figured that Steve would like some snuggles with his dog anyway and this would be a good way to get her out of Bucky’s hair so he could clean up the mess. “Adriana, Peanut, I’m going to put the babies in their high chairs, can you just watch them for me while I clean this up?”

---

Diana slunk up the stairs with her ears pinned and tail low. “Do you want me to clean it?” she offered, getting out of her chair. “I’m a good cleaner. I need two Good Helper stars and then I can get a toy,” she said, pointing to the chart on the wall. Steve used it as an incentive to have Adriana take on little tasks.

---

“Peanut, if you help clean this mess for me, I’ll give you two stars and we can tell Daddy later that it’s time for you to have a new toy,” Bucky promised and gave her the trashcan and a broom. “Try to put the leftover treats into the box first. And then we can sweep up the messy bits all over. Thank you for being my big girl and helping me.”

---

Adriana was practically tripping over her own feet to clean up the mess the pets made. Steve usually was a bit stricter when it came to dishing out stars, so she was eager to get two at once. “The store has jellyfishes,” she said excitedly as she salvaged any remaining treats. “I want to get the pink one.”

---

“Ooh, a pink jellyfish?” Bucky asked as he started pulling out eggs and waffles and bacon. “I think that would be a great choice. What will you name your pink jellyfish, Adriana?” He glanced over at the babies who were sort of quietly playing with the plush animals that Bucky brought downstairs for them. He would be lucky if he got two more distracted minutes out of them before they demanded something else.

---

“Peanut Butter,” she answered. She clumsily scooped the crumbs into her hands and dumped out the remaining dog biscuit bits. “All done!” she declared proudly. Sarah May waved at Adriana to get her attention and Adriana dutifully walked over and climbed onto her chair to sit next to her. “When’s Daddy coming down?”

---

Bucky looked at the now cleaned up mess and he gave Adriana a big grin. “Wow! Thank you so much! You did so well, Sweetheart. Let me get your stars.” He found the sheet of stickers and peeled two off to put on Adriana’s chart. “There you go, Adriana. Two stars.” He held out his hand for a high five and then went back to making breakfast. “Daddy will come down later. I can go check on him once Nana is awake.”

---

Adriana preened at the praise she received from Bucky. She was a bit needier than the other kids when it came to having her parents’ approval. “Thank you, Papa.”

Just as breakfast was put on the table, Sarah came in the kitchen dressed in her pajamas. She kissed each of her grandkids good morning. “I seem to be missing a son. Is he being lazy this morning?”
she asked.

---

Bucky gave Sarah a morning hug and handed her a mug of coffee. “Well, he had a tiring night so I’m letting him sleep in and rest for a bit,” he said, knowing he wasn’t discreet enough for Sarah not to understand. “I’m going to take him breakfast in bed if you don’t mind watching the kids for a few minutes?”

---

“The poor dear…” Sarah muttered sarcastically under her breath, though she knew that it probably wasn’t the worst way to be tired out. “Of course, I’ll watch these little troublemakers,” Sarah agreed as she stood between Christopher and Sarah May so she could play with their hair. “They all remind me of Steve when he was little. Stubborn, needy, but thoughtful. Although, I suppose most children are that way to some extent.”

---

Bucky smiled warmly and watched his kids with their nana. He loved that they got to have her around all the time. “Thank you, Sarah. You should have Adriana tell you about how she just got two new stars. She was a big helper for Papa this morning.” He gave his oldest a kiss on her cheek and then hurried back upstairs with food for Steve. “Baby, I brought you breakfast,” he said quietly once inside the master bedroom.

---

When Bucky went into the bedroom, Steve was cuddled up the dog and Diana lifted her head up at the sound of the door. Her tail thumped but she didn’t move from her spot. “Smells good, Love. What was going on before?” he asked.

---

“Your son figured out how to climb out of his crib,” Bucky said and came over to gently place Steve’s food on his nightstand. “And then he was trying to get Ya-Ya out of her crib. I’m still not sure how he managed that but I got them all squared away.” He pet Diana’s fur and sat down by them. “And the cat knocked over a box of Diana’s treats and she ate as many as she could before I got to her.”

---

“He did what?” Steve was a mix of worried and proud. Christopher was an adventurous, little boy and it was pretty impressive that he was an escape artist but that also posed some safety issues for him. “It sounds like you had a hell of a lot to deal with on your own. How’re you feeling?” Steve asked, carefully sitting up with a grimace so he could eat.

---

“It’s okay. I took care of it. Papa handled it. Papa took care of all of it,” Bucky said and let out a heavy sigh. “I don’t know how you do this every morning. The babies, the animals, breakfast. It’s a lot to deal with. Adriana was my saving grace. She was so helpful with the babies and with cleaning up Diana’s treats. I gave her two stars, just so you know.”

---
“Two stars just for treats? That’s barely one star’s worth. You must have been really desperate for help this morning,” Steve chuckled. “Adriana is such a good big sister. So long as she’s got something to work towards, it’s so easy to take care of her. The babies are a little more difficult. But it’s the kind of difficult I like to deal with.”

---

Bucky sighed and gave Steve an impatient little look. “I don’t know your sticker system, Steve. She needed two more for a toy and she helped with the babies and with the mess. I figured that could be worth two stickers.” He really wasn’t good with doing all of the house stuff by himself. Steve was much more cut out for all of this. He was better with all the kids all at once and all the animals and making food and making sure everyone was okay. He sighed again and rubbed his eyes tiredly. “You’re so much better at this than I am.”

---

“It’s okay. It sounds like she was being an angel to you all morning so she probably deserved it anyway.” Steve cut up his food and started to eat it. “I have more practice than you do. If you stayed home and I went out to work, then you’d be better at the baby stuff than I am.”

---

“Yeah, I mean, I just feel so bad about not being good at this. I get so overwhelmed and then I feel bad about not being a good dad,” Bucky said and reached to brush Steve’s hair from his face. “I’m just glad that my headaches have been a little better lately. I just know that Adriana is going to start to notice that I’m bad at this.”

---

“You’re an amazing dad, Bucky. Adriana adores you and she looks up to you so much,” he said. “This morning, not only did you take care of our kids, but you spoiled your husband with breakfast in bed, too.” He smiled over at him and reached out to hold Bucky’s hand. “And Adriana is always asking when you’re coming home from work when it’s just us here.”

---

“I just should be able to do this better but I can’t,” Bucky said and leaned in towards Steve. “But, I know. I did do it this time. And I brought you breakfast instead of making you come do breakfast. Your kids want to know where you are. Your mom also knows that I broke you last night because I’m not good at being discreet. So, I’m sorry about that.”

---

Steve blushed brightly. “Bucky,” he groaned. “Why’d you have to tell my mom?” Steve got really embarrassed over stuff like this even though his mom, as a nurse, had dealt with far more embarrassing things. He set aside his empty plate and gave Bucky a pout. “I’ll be down soon. I’m going to have to find a way to face my mom, knowing that she knows that you railed me so hard that I can’t eat breakfast with my kids.”

---

Bucky moved Steve a bit and invaded his space, crawling over his legs to give him a kiss. “I didn’t mean to tell your mom. She asked why you were being lazy. And I said that you had a tiring night and she just knew what that meant.” He gave Steve another kiss and nuzzled his neck. “It’s not like your mom doesn’t know we have sex. Your mom has had sex before too. How do you think you got Diana scrambled onto her feet and started licking Bucky’s face when he moved over Steve. “As far as I need to know, that’s the only time my mom had sex and I don’t want to hear otherwise,” Steve said, putting a hand up to Bucky to show that he didn’t want Bucky to argue.

“Regardless, you can face your mother,” Bucky insisted and tucked his cold hands against Steve’s neck for a second. “I’ll go wait downstairs. You get dressed and then come be with your children. They miss you. And Adriana wants me to read some stories but you know I don’t read out-loud as well as you do.”

Steve scrunched his shoulders up to push Bucky’s cold hands away. “Buck, cold,” he complained. Steve got out of bed slowly and put on pajamas. “You’re good at reading stories. You don’t give yourself enough credit.” He walked out of the room shortly after Bucky and smiled when his kids all greeted him once they realized he was downstairs.

“Daddy!” Adriana gasped and jumped out of her chair to go tackle Steve in a hug. “Look at my stars! Look at them! I have enough for a toy,” she said and tugged him over to her chart. “I did it. I helped Papa real good today.”

Christopher certainly didn’t want to be ignored so he started to bounce in his high chair and yell, “Dada! Hug!”

“I heard all about it, Peanut. I’m so proud of you!” Steve said. He scooped her up in one arm and kissed her cheek. He then turned to Christopher and picked him out of his chair. “You want hugs? Then you’ll get all the hugs you want.” He snuggled them both close, full of energy and cheer for his children. “And where’s my littlest girl? Where’s my Ya-Ya?”

Bucky looked around and didn’t see Ya-Ya or Sarah. “Adriana, where did Nana go?” he asked and looked around into the living room to find Sarah changing Ya-Ya’s diaper. “Steve, they are in here,” he called back and then came over to brush Sarah May’s big curly hair out of her eyes. “Thank you for changing her. I could have gotten it when I came down.”

Steve bounced both kids in his arms and rushed over to his mom so he could kiss both her and his daughter. “There’s my favorite baby girl and my favorite mom.” He would have held all three of them if he could. “I hear you want story time, Adriana? Which book do you want your dad and pop to read you?”

Adriana slipped down from her dad’s arms and ran over to the toy box. It was part of her job to keep it nice and neat. And she had all the books stacked up on one side and all the toys and blocks on the other. She came back with a book about a lion cub getting lost and having to go on an adventure to get back to its family. “This one, please?”

---

“Of course, Peanut. If you let Daddy get the babies ready in their play area, your papa and I will read it to you together.”

She smiled wide. “Can Papa read it and you make the lion noises?” she asked, looking over at Bucky with big eyes as well. Bucky may not have thought that he was a good reader but Adriana hardly ever got to hear stories from him so she wanted him to do it this time.

---

Bucky bit his lip and looked from Steve to Adriana. “Can... can Daddy read to you, Sweetie? I can do lion noises really well.” He wouldn’t fight her on it if Adriana insisted but he would at least try.

Sarah helped Steve get the babies all set to play and she said softly, “Steven, my son, you are wincing with every move you make. Do you want me to get you some medicine?”

---

“But I want you to read to me,” Adriana said with a sad pout. “Daddy reads all the time. You never get to read to me...”

Steve’s face went a bright red as he placed Christopher down in the playpen with Sarah May to play blocks. “I’m... I’m fine mom, I slept a little funny. That’s all.”

---

“Okay, honey, I’ll read to you,” Bucky said eventually and just gently took the book from Adriana and picked her up to go sit on the couch together. “Let’s wait for Daddy.”

Sarah shook her head and said, “Well, would you like medicine for that?” She gave him a little challenging look as if to say that regardless of the reason for his soreness, she knows that medicine will help.

---

“I’m fine, Mom,” Steve said tensely when he saw the challenging look in her eyes. “But thank you anyway.” Even when frustrated, Steve had the incapability of losing his temper with his mom, something he had yet to learn with Bucky.

He took a seat on the couch with Bucky and their oldest. “You tell me when I make the lion noises, okay?”

---

Adriana snuggled down between her parents and rested her head against Bucky’s side so she could see the book as he read. Bucky was a pretty good reader. But reading out-loud was difficult and it always made him nervous and shaky when he had an audience. He cleared his throat and started as best as he could. “Every day, Layla and her mommy... w-walked down the path to the... watering hole...”
Adriana had been used to Steve reading books and he usually did voices and read with such confidence that it was surprising to hear Bucky stammer. Her head turned around to look at Bucky in confusion. “Is your voice not working, Papa?” she asked, thinking maybe Bucky had a sore throat or something.

“Um, Adriana...” Bucky started and felt an embarrassed blush creep up his neck. “Papa doesn’t really read so well,” he admitted and looked to Steve for help. “I can keep reading to you, Peanut, but it won’t be as good as Daddy reading to you. Is that okay?” He didn’t want to disappoint her but he didn’t know how he would feel if she decided she didn’t want him to read.

“It’s Okay,” Adriana said. “I’m not good at reading, too.” She patted Bucky’s arm gently just like she’d seen Steve do whenever Bucky was sad. “I want you to read,” Adriana said, snuggling closer to her pop. “But you have to do the silly voices for the ‘elephants’,” she said.

Steve tickled her side. “Elephants,” he corrected gently.

Adriana sighed and gave Steve a little side glance. “El-e-phants,” she said slowly and then looked to Bucky to keep going.

“Okay, Baby, I’ll try,” Bucky agreed and started back up again at the elephant’s first line, doing his best to make a bumbling sort of tone to his voice that he hoped would be something she liked.

Steve felt bad for correcting her so he didn’t comment on the bit of attitude she gave him. Adriana enjoyed the combined attention of her parents during their story time. The second Bucky finished reading the first story, she darted off and ran to find another book. “One more, please?”

Bucky thought he was scot-free when the book was done but then Adriana brought over another one. He took it from her and looked at the length. It was a little shorter than the other one. But the first took him so long to begin with. “Sure, Adriana, but just this one, okay?”

Steve almost laughed but, instead, he kissed Bucky’s cheek. “Your kids love you.” He adjusted Adriana and snuggled her. About halfway through the story, Steve had to get up to stop Christopher from trying to escape the playpen and he sat in there with the two babies to keep them behaving.

Bucky finished up the story eventually and then held Adriana close so she couldn’t spring up and find another book. “Okay, Peanut, that’s it for now. Maybe Daddy can do a story tonight before bed. But, how about we do something with the babies now? We wanted to make some art, right, Daddy?”
Adriana looked over at Christopher and Sarah May for a moment and decided, “I think I want to watch TV with Nana.” She had been around for the chaotic morning and she knew how Christopher could get with a paintbrush in his hands.

Steve opened the door to the pen so Christopher could make his way out and Sarah May followed slower after him. “I think they’re just about ready for art time.”

---

Bucky nodded and let Adriana go to her Nana saying, “You can watch TV until Nana leaves to see her friends. Then I would like for you to take a TV break please.” They tried to regulate her TV time so she wasn’t always stuck in front of it. She liked the TV a lot and they preferred when she watched nature documentaries but sometimes she wanted to watch cartoons all day.

---

Adriana promised she would do just that. Steve had to chase Christopher down, who squealed with laughter when he saw his dad coming after him. Steve scooped him up and held him upside down to kiss his belly. “Dada, no! No!” Christopher said through his laughter.

Steve held him upright and put him in his high chair. “You want to get Ya-Ya?” Steve asked Bucky.

---

“Got her,” Bucky said and picked up his giggling baby girl who was doing her best to toddle away from him too. “Her first birthday is in a month, Steve. Just a month. I can’t believe it. Christopher’s second birthday is in three months. And Adriana will be five in the summer. How is this happening so fast?”

---

Steve started to break out the art supplies so the babies could finger paint and make the messes he knew they loved to make. “I’m going to be so sad when they aren’t our cuddly, little babies anymore. Sarah May has to stay little forever. Somebody has to,” he said.

---

“I will be sad, too. But I’ll also be so happy and proud to watch them grow up,” Bucky said reassuringly as he got Sarah May into her chair. “And we will get more babies. We will have tiny little cuddly bears all the time. And we can have family snuggle puddles with all of us and the girls. Becca will hate it but I don’t care.”

---

Steve took off the kids’ shirts so they wouldn’t ruin them with the paint. It was child-safe and washable, but they still left a small stain that Steve would rather avoid. “Dada, blue. Blue please,” Christopher said, reaching for the paint until Steve gave him the blue container.

“I like the sound of snuggle puddles,” Steve approved. “Imagine how big a puddle with seven or eight kids would be. It’d be a lake,” he laughed.

---

“I like the thought of seven kids. We already have four. That’s over half-way. But seven still isn’t a baseball team,” Bucky said as he helped set up Sarah May with the orange paint. “Ya-Ya, Orange.
Can you say ‘orange’? Orange.”

Sarah May poked her fingers in the paint and started to brush them over her paper. “Papa,” she said and gave him a smile. She was still trying to get the hang of speaking.

---

Steve stood next to Bucky and wrapped an arm around his waist. “She knows which color is blue, but that’s about it. She also doesn’t say it quite right yet, the best I’ve gotten out of her is ‘boo’,” he chuckled. Sarah May wasn’t as much of a talker as Christopher, but she was learning a lot of words because of him.

---

“That okay. It’ll click for her eventually,” Bucky said and leaned against Steve for a moment. “I need to go call Tim. He’s going to be just a little angry with me. I’ll have to make it up to him. He’s been pretty upset about things since his ex-wife had her new baby. His kids have been spending more time with her and he’s not allowed to even meet the baby. He’s just really sad.”

---

“I feel so bad for Tim. He’s just now been getting close to his kids again. I don’t know what I’d do if I were taken from my family. I think I’d go crazy,” he said. The time Bucky kicked him out of the house was one of the worst lows of his life and it wasn’t even for that long at all. “Do you think that there’s anything we can do to help?”

---

Bucky shook his head and gripped Steve a little tighter as he watched their babies paint. “No, I think we need to just be supportive. He has been going on dates and trying to find a partner but I know it’s been difficult. He’s older than all the guys he goes out with, sometimes by twenty years. And most of those guys aren’t looking to settle down with a forty-something who has four kids.”

---

“You think he’d like Richard?” Steve asked. “Sure, he’s young. But he’s a cop with a steady job. And I think I remember him mentioning having a family someday and... you know, it’s kind of hard for people like us to have kids. We’ve just been blessed with good fortune.”

---

Bucky grumbled and looked at Steve. He sighed and then looked back to the babies. “Yeah... I was hoping you wouldn’t suggest that.” He rolled his eyes and then shoved his hands in his pockets. “It’s a good idea. And I thought about it like a month ago but I just don’t want him to date Richard. But I actually think they would be good together. Tim needs someone like Richard – no-nonsense and self-assured. I’m just mad about it.”

---

“I know you don’t like Richard, Baby, but we should think about what would make Tim happy,” Steve offered. “What’s the harm that’ll come from it? The best-case scenario is that you brought some happiness into your friend’s life,” he said. Steve moved behind Bucky and leaned on him in a hug. “Won’t it feel good knowing that you helped them out?”

---
Bucky mumbled something indistinguishable under his breath about Richard but nodded his head anyway. “I know. You’re right. It would be good. That way Tim has someone and Richard will stop looking at you whenever we see him.” They really didn’t see him that often but they certainly saw him more than Bucky would like to. “I’m just bummed because I know that it’ll probably work out and then Clint and I will see that guy all the time, Steve. All the time.”

---

“I know, he’s a jerk,” Steve said, nuzzling Bucky’s neck gently. He really didn’t think Richard was a bad guy at all. But, it was best to side with Bucky at least somewhat on this. “And I am upset that he never apologized to you and Clint. But, think of it this way: what better payback is there than being even nicer to someone who’s wronged you? Then they’ll feel like an extra jerk for doing something bad when you’re so nice.”

---

“Steve, that might work for you but I like the pettiness,” Bucky said and turned in Steve’s arms to give him a kiss. “However, it is more important to me that our friend is happy. And if setting him up with... Richard, of all people, will make him happy, then I’ll do it.” He sighed and pouted his lip out. “I hate that you’re right. I guess, maybe we can have a dinner here soon with everyone and invite Richard.”

---

“We have to let Richard know that you don’t plan on poisoning his food. I’m sure he thinks that you still hate him. And he’s right.” Steve pressed their lips together gently. “Also, now you can find something new to be petty about,” he observed. “Maybe you can have a little war with the mailman who keeps crushing the edges of our packages.”

---

“He doesn’t do it to anyone else’s on the street! He only does it because your dog peed on him when she was a puppy,” Bucky said grumpily and then refocused on the current matter at hand. “Right, well, you can tell him that I don’t plan on killing him this time but I make no promises for later. Is Sam seeing anyone? He’s welcome to bring someone if he is.”

---

“Diana was just a baby. She doesn’t deserve to be held accountable for that,” Steve defended. “Sam’s got a new girlfriend, yeah. She’s really nice from what he’s told me of her but I haven’t met her personally.”

Sarah May picked up her paper and waved it at Bucky and Steve. “Dada! Papa! Loo!”

---

Bucky detached from Steve to go back over to their kids. “Well, then tell him to bring her,” he said and gently touched Sarah May’s hair as he looked at the paper which had lots of orange lines and big sweeping marks. “Oh, Ya-Ya! That’s so pretty. Wow, Sweet Pea. You are so good at this. Show it to Daddy.”

---

“Dada!” She wagged the paper over in Steve’s direction.
Steve smiled brightly. “Wow! How beautiful! You did such a good job, Ya-Ya,” he praised.

Christopher, like normal, got jealous over the attention his sister got. “Dada. Papa! My paint. Look!”

---

Bucky kissed Ya-Ya on the cheek and then moved over to give Christopher attention. “Baby Boy, you really don’t like sharing us, do you?” he asked and sat down next to the high chair. “Oh, Bean! You made beautiful art too!” he gasped, making a big show to appease his son. “You did so well. Come look, Steve, before he gets grumpy.”

---

Sarah May looked offended when Christopher stole the spotlight once again. Her bottom lip jutted out and big old tears formed in her eyes as Steve started to praise their son. When he glanced back at Sarah May, he saw that she was upset and carefully picked his messy daughter up. “Oh, Ya-Ya. I’m sorry. Did we hurt your feelings, Love?” He kissed her forehead.

---

“Oh, Sarah May, you’re fine. We didn’t forget about you,” Bucky said and tickled her foot. “I thought you two had started to get over the jealousy stuff. Remember? You tried to make a break for it together this morning.” He chuckled and brushed Christopher’s hair out of his eyes. “I’m wondering if I didn’t make the crib walls tall enough.”

---

“I think they get on well so long as they’re not competing for our attention,” Steve said. “And I think the walls are plenty high. The problem is that our son is a little extra adventurous. I’m going to have to ask my mom what she thinks. She’s got more experience with babies than we do.”

---

Bucky nodded and wiped some paint from Christopher’s cheek. “When the girls were babies, they never tried anything like. I don’t think I did either. Christopher is just already so athletic. He really is going to be our baseball star. Isn’t he?”

---

“No, Papa,” Christopher whined. He wiped his hands off on his face with a little cackle as he made more of a mess of himself.

“He could be. He’s really smart, too. Maybe he’ll manage a team once he’s done playing the sport,” Steve mused with a happy smile at their messy boy.

---

Bucky gave Christopher a stern look and pulled his sleeve over his hand so he could properly clean off his face. “No more mess, Bean. No mess,” Bucky said firmly. “He can be whatever he wants to be. Just so long as he is happy and safe then I’ll be happy.”

---

Christopher grunted and squirmed to try to avoid being cleaned but he couldn’t escape Bucky. “Agreed,” Steve said. He paused and said, “You know, I’m really glad you read to Adriana today. I know you’re self-conscious about it, but all she wanted was her papa to read to her and you did it. It didn’t matter to her if you stumbled or not.”

---

Bucky grunted in response and just shrugged. He wished he read as well as Steve. Steve was so good at the things the kids loved most. Sure, Bucky was better than Steve at a lot of other stuff but things like reading stories to their kids was so important. And Bucky just felt inadequate. “It took me a half hour to get through the first book and it’s only supposed to be about a seven-minute read, it says so on the back.”

---

“That means that Adriana got to spend extra time listening to her papa. And it means that you had even more quality time together. Being there for her is so important, Bucky, and you’re doing that,” he said with a loving, soft tone. “What if you turned it into a song and played it for her instead?”

---

“What, the lion book as a song?” Bucky asked curiously. He could probably do that. He had been working on some songs for the kids as memory tools to learn with Steve. But turning her stories into songs could be good. “I... I can try that.”

---

“Yeah,” Steve encouraged. “I bet she would get a real kick out of it. She’s almost old enough to start trying some sort of musical instrument. How nice would it be to have her papa make up songs just for her so she could sing along with you?” He kissed Bucky’s cheek. “And then you can sing it to Christopher and Sarah May when they’re older.”

---

“Yeah. Okay, yeah,” Bucky agreed with a happy little nod. “Yeah, that’s a good idea, Baby. Thank you. I’ll do that. That would be so much easier than reading it. And it can be like a family tradition. Maybe we can make up new stories too.” He let out a content little sigh and leaned in to give Steve a proper kiss. “Steve, you’re clever.”

---

“Every now and again, I have a good idea,” Steve agreed. “I’ve got to come up with something good after making you have to set up our friend with a guy you can’t stand.” He cuddled Sarah May in his arms. “You hear that? Your pop is going to make up songs for all of you little ones. You’re so lucky, right? And we are really lucky that Papa is staying home all day today.”
Bucky was absolutely worn out by dinner time. He loved that he got to be with his kids all day today since that rarely happened. But there was just a lot of running and chasing and screaming and giggling. And between three kids, two animals, and a husband, they all really wore Bucky down to his last grasps of energy. “Baby, it’s no wonder you’re so sleepy by bedtime.”

---

Steve couldn’t help but be at least a little amused at how tired his poor husband was. “It’s harder than it looks, isn’t it?” he chuckled. “You got to keep the energy high all day or else they won’t have as fun of a time and then they won’t be as sleepy at the end of it.” He pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair. “Do you want a bath and a massage tonight?” he offered.

---

Bucky nodded and yawned as Adriana came over to him and started to climb up into his lap. “Oh, hey, Peanut. Are you getting sleepy too?”

Adriana shook her head. “No, I’m not sleepy. Can we go get ice cream? Aunt Lilly said she wants some. I do too.”

---

“Isn’t it too cold for ice cream?” Steve asked.

Adriana shook her head again. “No, it’s not,” she said in a determined voice.

He pulled her onto his lap and tickled her sides. “I think your Aunt Lilly needs to stop putting silly ice cream ideas in your head. But if your pop says it’s okay, then it’s okay. If he says no, we have to respect his decision.”

---

“Oh, Papa has to decide?” Bucky asked and looked between Steve and Adriana. “How about I send Aunt Lilly and Aunt Becca to the store and they can buy a tub of ice cream and bring it back to share. Is that okay with everyone?” He wasn’t sure if Adriana would go for that because she usually liked getting mountains of sprinkles on her cones. But at least that would mean that he wouldn’t have to bundle up any children to go outside.

---

Adriana was ready to compromise but it was Lilly who groaned. “Bucky, but I want the good ice cream,” she said. “I can run to Carvel really quick if you give me money,” she said. “I’ll have my cone and Adriana can have hers in a cup,” she bargained. Adriana turned her head to her papa to see what he would decide.
Bucky looked from Adriana to Lilly and then over to Steve. He sighed and then got up to get some money for Lilly. “Fine. Take Becca. Get whatever you two want and Adriana’s and just one scoop of chocolate for the babies to share.” He handed Lilly some money and tussled her hair.

---

Adriana waved at Lilly. “Aunt Lilly I want vanilla with lots and lots of sprinkles. So many sprinkles!”

Steve pulled out his wallet and added a few more dollars. “And can you get something bigger for me and Bucky to share too? Thank you,” he said. Steve was in a mood for ice cream now.

---

Jesus, you guys. Becca and I can’t carry all that shit,” Lilly complained but took the money anyway. “Fine. We will be back. Don’t wash my laundry yet I need to put a blanket in there. Raphael threw up on it.”

"Gross. I’ll take care of it,” Bucky said and made sure Becca was following their sister out the door.

---

“Was it a hairball Or is he sick-” Steve started to ask, but they were already out the door. He sighed and shrugged up his shoulders. He rubbed his hand over Bucky’s back and asked, “Is there anything I can do for you? You want to lay in my lap and have me give you a head rub?”

---

That did sound pretty appealing. Bucky liked sitting in Steve’s lap and he loved having his head rubbed. “I should go get the laundry started. I’ll go find the blanket and clean it up. But later, once everyone is asleep, we can sit on the couch and watch the news and cuddle? And you can massage my head then?”

---

“Sounds like a plan,” he said. Steve liked discussing affection with Bucky in front of their kids because he wanted them to grow up in a household where they saw their parents in a healthy relationship. He wished he got to witness his mom and dad in their prime. “Let’s hope there’s something positive on the news tonight.”

---

Bucky shrugged and gathered up bits of discarded carrot ends from Sarah May’s high chair. “I’m sure we can find something that won’t bring us down. If not, the Christmas specials have already started so we could watch a bit of something before we get tired.” He went over to Steve and pulled him in for a kiss, lingering for just a few moments. “Okay, I’m going to go find the puke blanket.”

---

“Ooh, I really want to watch some of those Christmas specials now,” Steve said as he watched Bucky turn to go.
As it turned out, Bucky didn’t have to worry about the puke blanket because Diana ate it up and the only evidence of it was Diana sitting next to the blanket, licking her lips with a guilty expression. Steve liked to think that she was the smartest dog ever, but sometimes she was still a typical dumb dog.

---

“Oh, dammit! Come on, Diana! Gross,” Bucky gasped and shooed her away. He rolled the blanket up and grabbed some of Lilly’s socks off the floor and took them down to the laundry. “Steve! Your dog ate Raphael’s puke,” he called out to him as he shoved the blanket in with all of Lilly’s clothes to be washed.

---

“No, she didn’t,” Steve defended right away. His perfect dog could never do anything wrong. Diana slunk away and curled up with Adriana, who wasn’t listening to either of them and let Diana give her kisses on the face. “Raphael probably ate it when he was done puking it up.”

---

Bucky shook his head and showed the blanket to Steve. “Diana’s hair everywhere. Look, everywhere,” he said. “She’s pretty disgusting sometimes, Steve. She will eat anything she can find. That’s how dogs do things.” He shoved the blanket into the washer and then headed to the kitchen to wash his hands. “Last time I trimmed my beard she tried to eat the hair in the sink before I could clean it up.”

---

“I think you’re over exaggerating. She gets fed all the time, I don’t see why she would jump up to eat your stubby, shaved beard hairs.” Steve rubbed a hand over Bucky’s back. The babies were in the playpen behaving themselves and Adriana was relaxing on the couch, so he didn’t feel like he had to hover over them at the moment.

---

“Fine. Don’t believe me,” Bucky muttered and headed back to the laundry room to check on the dryer. “Just watch her next time.” They had way too much laundry to do nowadays. It went from Bucky and the girls doing maybe one load of laundry a week to the household doing at least one load every day. Becca liked to do her laundry separately from everyone else’s, though, so Bucky didn’t bother helping with hers.

---

Diana came trotting over to the two of them with Adriana following along. Steve scratched his dog behind her ears and praised her discretely for being a good girl and not deserving to be called gross. “Adriana, you want to help your pop with the laundry? You have to read and see which button says ‘on’,” he said, lifting her up to look at the top of the machine with the controls.

---

Adriana looked around at all the buttons over the dashboard of the washer. But then she found a large button with ‘On’ written on one side and then ‘Off’ on the other. “Uh, that one!” she said and pointed to it. “Flip it, Papa.”

Bucky reached to the knob and clicked it over to start the washer. “Good job, Peanut. Can you read any other words on the machine?"

---

Adriana looked over the other buttons. “Um, that one says ‘wash clothes’. That one says ‘dry clothes’. And that one says ‘fold clothes!’” She rattled off, obviously not having a clue what any of the other buttons said but she was having a guess.

Steve turned his head away to hide his smile. He liked her attempt and didn’t want her to think that he was laughing at her. She was just too darn cute all the time.

---

Bucky nodded and surveyed the buttons as if he was double checking her answers. “That was really close, Adriana. This machine does wash clothes. But we have to put the clothes into the other machine to dry them. And then Papa has to do all the folding himself. There isn’t a machine to help me with that.” He shrugged and added, “Maybe someone will invent one someday and I won’t have to worry about folding anything. That would be nice.”

---

“Why doesn’t Daddy fold the clothes?” she asked.

Steve smiled and kissed her cheek. “Sometimes I do. But sometimes Papa does the housework, too. We share a little bit of everything so neither of us has to do more work than the other. That’s how we make sure things are fair. But since Daddy cooks a lot, Papa tends to clean a lot.”

---

Becca and Lilly came through the front door just then and at that point, all Adriana cared about was the ice cream they brought back. “Ice cream! Daddy, let me down, please,” Adriana said, wiggling in Steve’s grasp. “Aunt Lilly, did you get sprinkles for me?”

Bucky intercepted Lilly from giving Adriana her ice cream. “Okay, Peanut. What do you say to Aunt Lilly and Aunt Becca for getting you a treat?”

---

Adriana shifted her weight from one foot to the next excitedly as Lilly held the ice cream out for her. “Thank you!” she said hurriedly and reached up for the ice cream again.

“Papa!” Christopher called from his playpen. “Me too! Give me!”

---

Bucky watched Adriana zoom off to the kitchen to get a spoon and sit down with her treat. Christopher was already waiting with his hands on the fence of the playpen, shaking it a little bit. Bucky gathered the babies and brought them to their high chairs as Lilly set out the other ice cream cups and took the lids off. “Okay, Steve. I’ll feed to the babies. And you feed me,” Bucky said with an exasperated little sigh and grabbed spoons and an extra bowl to split the chocolate ice cream for the babies.

---

“‘Fank’ you,” Christopher said when he was given some of the ice cream. Steve took his and Bucky’s and uncovered it. He let Bucky have the first bite of it before having some for himself.

Lilly came over to sit next to them. “Bucky? Can I borrow Sarah May for my home-ec class?” she asked.

---

Bucky shook his head in surprise and looked over to his sister. “What? Um... what?” he asked and blinked a few times. “Explain yourself. Why do you want to borrow my daughter?”

“You can borrow me, Aunt Lilly,” Adriana offered, ice cream and sprinkles all over her face and hands.

---

“The school wants to give us a creepy mechanic baby doll over the weekend to take care of so we see what it’s like to be a parent or whatever. But the doll creeps me out. So, if you let me take care of Sarah May all weekend, then I don’t have to take the doll home,” she said. “It’s a win-win. I don’t get creeped out and you don’t have to change her diapers or feed her or stop her from crying all weekend.” She turned to Adriana and said, “It’s got to be a baby. You’re too old now, unless you want to pretend to be a baby.”

---

“Um... Lil, I don’t know,” Bucky said softly and gave Steve a glance to see how he was reacting to this. “I mean, it’s nice that you want to help out and that you will be learning. But the mechanical doll is supposed to be the practice doll because that means you can’t hurt it or anything. And you’re supposed to take care of the doll all by yourself but you know Steve and I are going to be hovering over you all weekend if you have Sarah May. Plus, she’s going to be crying a lot if she doesn’t get to have her daddies at all.”

---

Steve was a bit wary of the situation as well. He trusted Lilly to babysit but not to be responsible all weekend, even with their help. “Yeah, I think you’re going to have to deal with the doll. I don’t think I could go a whole weekend without taking care of our little girl. I’m sorry,” he said, giving Bucky another spoonful of ice cream.

---

Bucky nodded in agreement and looked to Sarah May. He gave her a kiss on her cheek and told her that he loved her in Hebrew. He was getting better at memorizing the pronunciation of some phrases. He couldn’t write anything out but if he heard it, he could repeat it after some practice. “Lilly, I had to use one of those dolls in school too. Even though I helped raise you and Becca. They still made me use it. And it’s only for the weekend. You will be okay.”

---

Sarah May didn’t understand the words but she heard the tone in Bucky’s voice and smiled at him and said, “Papa,” with her little sticky hand out. Steve’s heart melted at the sight. Bucky really was an amazing parent.

“I hate the dolls, though. It’s going to give me nightmares. Why do I have to take it home anyway?” Lilly started but then got an idea. “You know what? I’m going to write a strongly-worded letter to the principal saying I want out of this project and it’s sexist to force me to mother a doll.”
“Lilly, you know I support your strongly-worded letters to fight the power,” Bucky said, straight-faced and sincere. “But, everyone has to parent the doll for a bit. The boys do it too. It’s not just a mother thing. It’s a parent’s thing. If you want to make your letter about the assumption that everyone is supposed to grow up, get married, and make children, you can do that. You can even throw in some commentary about how women are pressured to be housewives instead of joining the workforce. But it might not get you out of this.”

Lilly ran out of the room to grab her notebook and came back to jot down notes on what Bucky said. Steve didn’t exactly approve of her trying to get out of class responsibility, but he also supposed that writing a letter was good academic practice regardless.

“People don’t have to get married?” Adriana asked curiously. “How else can grown-ups get to be grown-up?”

“Well, Sweetheart, being a grown-up just means that you are old enough to take care of yourself and have your own home and life and things. You can choose things like whether you want to get married or not. Or if you’re going to have kids or not. Or which presidential candidate you want to vote for. And you hope you don’t get stuck with a Reagan... twice.” Bucky shook his head and passed a look to Becca who was nodding in agreement with Bucky’s disdain.

Adriana hummed in thought. “Does that mean Aunt Becca is a grown-up cause she makes food and cleans her room and washes her clothes and gets ice cream?”

Steve laughed and gave Bucky another spoonful. “Close. It means she’s almost an adult. She needs a job and to be a little bit older. I mean, there’s a lot of things that make a grown-up.”

Adriana nodded and looked back at Bucky. “What’s wrong with President Reagan?” she asked. Steve had recently taught her about the president and government a little bit. It wasn’t much but she thought the word ‘president’ was fun to say.

Bucky blinked and shrugged casually like he didn’t have lots of problems with the President. “Papa just doesn’t like President Reagan. It’s like how you don’t like the man at the video store because he doesn’t like turtles.” He hoped that was a valid enough explanation. He sort of forgot that politics wasn’t a field that children were quite aware of at her age.

Adriana threw her hands up in the air. “Who doesn’t like ‘turtles’?” she exclaimed, still fired up over it.

Steve laughed and kissed the top of her head. “I know, Peanut. Turtles are pretty cool,” he soothed. When the babies’ ice cream was all done, they leaned back in their high chairs looking satisfied and sleepy.
Sarah May was already settling herself in to fall asleep in her chair. But Christopher was tugging at the tray trying to get out. “Sleep, Papa,” he mumbled and reached to grip Bucky’s arm.

“Are you a tired boy, Christopher?” Bucky asked and gently slipped him from his chair. “I know, Bean. It’s been a long day. Let’s get you and Ya-Ya upstairs. Adriana, you have about a half hour until bedtime.”

---

Steve sent a silent, quick prayer upwards because it was looking like this was another night where both babies went to bed without fuss. He got up so he could pluck Sarah May from her chair since Bucky had Christopher.

“Story?” Christopher asked hopefully up at the two of them. Usually, they sang him something, so he considered lullabies and stories the same thing.

---

“Yes, Christopher,” Bucky agreed and snuggled him against his chest and brought him up to the nursery. “Lullabies and then sleepy times.” They made short work of getting the babies into pajamas and then into their cribs. Sarah May immediately curled up on her side and closed her eyes. But Christopher stood up and waited for his lullaby.

---

Steve tucked Sarah may in and kissed her cheek before going to grab Bucky’s acoustic guitar because he loved it when Bucky used it to sing to their kids. “Here, Buck. You’ve got two adoring fans waiting to hear your latest hit.”

---

“Oh, okay, I suppose I can let them have a free show,” Bucky said with a goofy little grin as he sat down in the rocking chair with his guitar. “It’s close to the holidays. How about a soft Christmas song to get you two sleeping?” He thought for a second and then decided to do ‘Silver Bells’ since it was already pretty calm.

---

Christopher flopped onto the bed to listen to his papa sing. Sarah May was already out, but Christopher watched Bucky with big, blue eyes that started to droop the more Bucky played. Finally, he was sleeping soundly in his crib. “You play so well, Papa,” Steve said fondly, kissing Bucky’s temple.

---

“Thank you, Baby.” Bucky caught Steve for a proper kiss. “Daddy really should sing with me next time, though. They would love that.” Bucky took his guitar and quietly started to play another Christmas song as he and Steve made their way down the stairs. “Maybe one day I’ll write a real album and be a rock star for a bit. Maybe I’ll be a one-hit-wonder on the radio and our kids can say, ‘Oh, yeah, that’s my father.’ And all the other kids will be amazed that Bucky Barnes is their friend’s dad.”

---

“My voice isn’t as good as yours. I love the way you sound when you sing,” Steve said. He kissed him and carefully stepped around a block one of their kids left on the stairs. “If our kids’ friends have any sense, they’ll be amazed at you either way.”

---

“So, what?” Bucky asked, giving Steve a sideways glance. “I don’t read as good as you but I read two whole books this morning because you said my baby girl would like it. And I think you’re singing is perfectly good. And the kids would like having their dads do a duet.”

---

Adriana came scampering up to them and gave them a hug, accidentally knocking into Bucky’s guitar a little. “Can you sing me a song, Papa?”

---

Bucky lifted his guitar up a bit after Adriana bopped it and he let her hug on to his legs. “Sure, Peanut, I will sing you two Christmas songs and then it’s bedtime for you. Sound like a deal?”

---

“Okay!” she said. “Can I take out my ‘tuttles’ and dolls so we can have an audience?” she asked.

Steve ran his fingers through Adriana’s hair and bent down to kiss the top of her head. He thought it was a bit too much of a production but she really had been a good girl today. “Sure, Peanut. That’s fine with me,” Steve said.

---

“Okay, wait, Adriana,” Bucky said and stopped her from running up to her room to get her things. “How about you get all ready to sleep and then get your turtles and dolls on your bed with you. That way you are ready to sleep after the songs.” Bucky knew that if she had her toys downstairs and wasn’t ready to sleep, she would try to get them to let her play for longer. “And let Daddy help you brush your teeth, please.”

---

Steve picked their daughter up and carried her to the bathroom. He sang her a little song about brushing teeth and why clean teeth were so important as he helped her brush and wash up for the evening. He carried her into her room and helped her into her pajamas before allowing her to set up her toys and dolls.

---

Bucky got himself an apple to snack on and said goodnight to the girls and Sarah who were all headed to their rooms for quiet time before they went to sleep. Sarah and Becca both liked to read before going to sleep and Lilly had taken to making mixtapes when the house was quiet. But then Bucky headed back upstairs with his guitar and the bongo drums that Clint got for Lilly. “Okay, Steve, Baby, you’re going to keep my rhythm for me,” he said and showed Steve a simple one-two pattern. “I won’t even make you sing this time. Just hit the drums.”

---

Adriana was sitting in her bed with a big smile on her face. Life was so amazing for her now that she had two parents who were more than happy to give her a mini concert before bed. Steve followed the pattern Bucky gave him and decided to sing along anyway, even though he messed up with the drums a little because it was hard to focus on both at once.

---

They sang two Christmas songs for Adriana and then gave her one more song which Bucky had to do by himself because it was a Sinatra song that Steve wasn’t familiar with. Once they were done, Adriana was pretty tired and she let Bucky put her dolls and all but one turtle back in their box and then give her an extra blanket. Now the entire family was either asleep or at least in their respective rooms and Bucky and Steve could have the kitchen and living room to themselves.

---

Once they got quietly back downstairs, Steve pulled Bucky onto the couch and started to kiss his face affectionately. “Today really was something special, Buck,” he said. “I can’t remember the last time both of us were able to spend every second of the day caring for our kids.” He kissed Bucky’s cheek once more. “Every day that passes, I’m more and more thankful that you brought Adriana home to us. She’s so happy here because of you.”

---

Bucky hummed happily with the kisses Steve gave him and he moved so he was cuddled up to him, legs resting over Steve’s lap. “I loved today too. I hope Clint and Tim aren’t too mad at me for calling off. But maybe they will forgive me since it was for a good reason.” He gave Steve a few kisses on the lips and ran his hands through his hair. “I’m really happy we got her too. She’s so perfect. She’s so bright and enthusiastic and loves to learn and she loves it here, Baby.”

---

Steve threaded his fingers in Bucky’s hair and kissed his nose. “I don’t think they can get that mad when you tell them about how awesome of a day you had with your kids. And with your husband whose ass you wrecked the night before.” Diana came trotting over to curl up on the couch with the both of them, sort of taking up some of Bucky space on Steve. “Has she talked to you at all about Christmas yet?”

---

“Oh, yeah, I’m sure that Clint will want to know how good I railed you but Tim is shy about sex. He doesn’t like when Clint and I discuss you and Nat,” Bucky said, partially joking but mostly serious. “Who talked to me about Christmas? Adriana?” Bucky asked and reached to pet Diana. “Diana, go curl up with Adriana. Let me have him by myself right now.”

---

“No, don’t talk too much about me there. I don’t want them to know what I’m in to,” Steve complained with a pout. Diana rolled onto her back and whined in protest about Bucky trying to shoo her away. Steve laughed and pet her belly. “Go on, good girl. Go get Adriana,” he urged with a pat. Diana barked once just to be moody and whined all the way upstairs. “I was wondering if the orphanage got her anything in past years. Or if they pushed the whole Santa thing.”

---

Bucky watched Diana head off and he shook his head. She was such a dramatic dog sometimes. But at least she listened because Bucky just wanted all of Steve’s attention right now. He wanted all of Steve’s affection too. “I don’t really know. I know the kids got a few presents each but I don’t know if they ever talked about Santa with them. But she’s so young that it won’t matter either way. You’re wanting to do Santa, aren’t you?”

---

Steve thought that Diana’s little tantrum was cute and funny. She was a good dog and listened in the end, but she also was a living creature with wants and emotions. Like Bucky, she also wanted cuddle time. But Bucky knew his husband really needed it right now. He was drained. “I do want to do Santa Claus. I figured we can tell Sarah May he still brings stuff for her because, regardless of religion, she was a good girl all year.”

---

Bucky nodded and tucked his hair behind his ear. He remembered that they were going to put on a Christmas special so he reached for the remote and flicked through the channels to find something while he talked. “Yeah, Baby, I know. I think we could make it work that way. I mean, Santa isn’t usually a religion-specific thing. I just have my reservations about it. But I know you want to. I can see it in your eyes how much you want to do Santa with the kids. So, I guess we can do it.”

---

“There’s just something so magical about it, Bucky. Leaving cookies out for him and his reindeer, getting presents delivered under the tree. Besides, it’s a great tool to nudge the kids into behaving,” Steve said. “I bet you will be thanking me for pushing Santa when you stop Christopher from throwing a tantrum because Santa is watching.”

---

“I like the magical things about it,” Bucky caved slightly. “The cookies and the stories and the presents appearing. That’s all good. But I don’t like the behavior thing. I feel like our kids should want to behave because they know what’s right and wrong and they love and respect us and not being a big bearded guy is going to come give them coal if they mess up.” That part of it felt too much like fear-mongering to Bucky – which was another issue he had with religion too. Sometimes, it was a wonder he and Steve could find middle ground on issues like this.

---

Steve was with the kids more and although he agreed with Bucky about the respect thing, he also got a little desperate sometimes when it came to child management. “If you can give in on the magic thing, then I can give in on the behavior thing,” Steve said. Because having the magic of waking up to presents under the tree was worth it to him. “I won’t say a word about Santa bringing coal to naughty children. Promise.”

---

Bucky nodded. He could handle this bargain. “So, we are doing a ‘Christmas Compromise’, a ‘December Deal’, a ‘Santa Settlement’, a ‘Reindeer Resolution’, a “Kris Kringle Contract’?” Bucky laughed to himself and shook his head. His humor had changed a little since getting Adriana. Her books had a lot of word puns and rhyming and he found himself making terrible jokes now because of them. “Anyway, what’s the Santa plan then, Babe? Because I know it’s important to you.”

---

Steve snorted at Bucky’s joke. He loved dumb humor like that, which meant they both had successfully transitioned into becoming fathers. He leaned in to kiss his husband. “Santa Settlement,” he decided. “Let’s have the kids watch a movie and tell them that Santa is going to do a pre-Christmas visit tomorrow night and to leave cookies out for him. We can eat the cookies and put fake footprints on the floor for them to wake up to. That way they can learn about him a little.”

---

Bucky sighed and leaned in to hold Steve a little closer and kiss him a few more times. “You’re going to make me dress up as Santa this year, aren’t you?” It would be easy enough to put some sort of snow in a can spray on his beard and hair. And it definitely seemed like something Steve would want Bucky to do for the kids to keep up the whimsy of Santa.

---

“Well, I was thinking of maybe asking Tim to do it,” Steve admitted. “He doesn’t get to spend time with his kids, so I thought he might like having ours fawn over him more than normal for an hour or so. Then he can stay for dinner or something.”

---

Bucky immediately nodded in agreement. That was perfect. That meant he didn’t have to do it and Tim would get to do something fun and goofy and that man needed more fun in his life. “Yeah, he will love that. I’ll ask him in the morning. We might even convince Clint to be an elf if we ask super nicely. And... when we talk to Tim about that, we can mention our dinner party with... Richard, of all people.” Bucky was still reluctantly on board with the whole thing.

---

Steve made sure to massage Bucky’s head extra nice after he mentioned bringing Richard into their home for Tim’s sake. “If we promise a nice bottle of scotch for Clint in exchange, I think he will do it. I’m sure he’ll be happy to have it to squirrel away for special occasions.” He grinned. “Our kids are going to have the best Christmas ever.”

---

“Okay, but don’t buy him like too good of a scotch. Because I’ll get jealous that I don’t get nice scotch,” Bucky said, trying to be light about his continued work on his sobriety which had officially passed a year now. He had a nice shiny chip and he carried it around proudly everywhere he went. But there were still hard days where he wanted to give in.

---

“Why would you want scotch when you’ve got Bourbon in Christopher’s crib?” Steve tried to joke. “I’ll make sure I’ll give him a perfectly adequate, slightly-above-average scotch,” Steve promised.

---

“Well, if I tried to take that dog, I would have a very angry, very loud, crying Baby Bean on my hands,” Bucky said, slipping his fingers gently up Steve’s shirt. “Just get him Highland Park. It’s above average but it’s not going to be an entire month’s salary or anything.”

---

“Christopher loves that dog. It was the first cuddle buddy he had in his crib. Oh, Bucky, remember how small he was the first day we had him? He was such a tiny, quiet thing.” Steve was so thankful that he was growing up healthy and full of energy. “I miss how little our boy was.”

---

Bucky smiled and rested his forehead to Steve’s for a bit. He loved having this quiet, private moments with Steve. They weren’t rushed. They didn’t have anything splitting their attention. It was just them. “He really was small. Sarah May wasn’t even as little as him in her first month as he was at four months. I think all it was is that he needed actual nutrients and love - neither of which he had before coming to us.”

---

“I can’t believe his aunt didn’t want him. He’s such a perfect, little boy who loves attention.” Steve understood that she had her own life, but Steve would drop everything to help a family member in need. “I’m so glad he was too young to remember any of that. I just... couldn’t believe that a baby would be brought up in such awful conditions. But I guess that’s what drugs can do to people sometimes.”

---

“I’m fine with her not wanting him. It wasn’t something she could do. And besides, that means we got him. And I know you, Steve. I know you fell in love with him the second you laid eyes on him.” Bucky brought his hands up further in Steve’s shirt to massage his fingers over his chest. “You’re right. Drugs have the potential to ruin people. I know it. I’ve lived it for a while. All we can hope is that his biological parents can find help and get sober in prison and come out of there as people they are proud to be.”

---

Steve knew he would’ve been heartbroken to have to give up Christopher even though at that point he’d have only known him for a few hours. He was also glad he was able to rename him. ‘Christopher’ was such a good name for him and both he and Bucky hated the name ‘Rocky’ for him. Steve smoothed Bucky’s hair down when a few strands went astray. “I admire you so much,” Steve said. “It’s harder to get out of an addiction than it is to say no in the first place.”

---

Bucky sighed and nodded. “Well, yeah, but, I did it the stupid way. I didn’t like give into peer pressure at a party or something. I saw a way to get closer to someone I liked and did what I could be part of his group. That’s dumb. I was very dumb, Steve. I’m still pretty dumb. But that was, I think, my worst decision. I guess I thought I wouldn’t get addicted. But I did.” It wasn’t like this was the first time Steve was hearing this. He knew this story front and back. They had discussed it and other antics of high school Bucky a lot.

---

“Hey, it’s not the end of the world, right? And if you’re willing to do something so dumb for some guy you had a crush on in school, that means you’d do anything to make the people you love most as happy as you can make them,” Steve said, trying to put a good spin on this for Bucky right now. “I love you, Buck. Even if you relapsed. All that matters is I have you and we have our family.”

---

“Oh, Steve,” Bucky whispered quietly and took his hands out of Steve’s shirt so he could hold his face gently. “Baby, listen to me, because I’m serious,” he started firmly. “If I ever, ever go back to cocaine or start drinking again, you kick me out of this house. Okay? I’m serious. I don’t want any of our kids to see that. And it’s not fair to you to deal with it. You tell me to get my shit straight before I come home. And you tell Natasha and Sam not to go easy on me if they find me doing something like that. Promise me.”

---

Steve frowned at Bucky. “I can’t do that to you,” he said. “Your family is everything to you, Bucky. I can’t force you away from that. And what will the babies and Adriana think when their papa doesn’t come home for a long time? If I kicked you out, I’d worry day and night about you.”

---

“Steve, I’m not kidding,” Bucky repeated. “I have thought about this. After Missy...” he paused and took a deep breath. He still blamed himself for Missy’s relapse. And he worried that he would do the same thing one day. And he knew that he couldn’t put his family through that. “I did a lot of thinking after that. I talked to my AA group about it. I decided a while ago that if I ever relapse to either of my addictions, I don’t get to be with you or my sisters or the kids anymore. Not until I get things put back together. The house is in your name, you have secondary guardianship of the girls and Adriana. And Christopher and Sarah May are your adoptive kids. It would be, legally speaking, totally in your right to kick me out. And that’s what I want you to do if, God forbid, I ever relapse.”

---

Steve shook his head. “I’m not throwing you away just because I’m legally allowed to,” he said. “You’re important. And kicking you away from everything you love is only going to make you more hurt and depressed. If you relapse, we will find a way to help you together and without hurting our kids.”

---

Bucky just stared at Steve for a long while. He really had thought this through. He believed that this was the best thing to do. And it was all hypothetical anyway because he didn’t have any plans to relapse. This was all one big ‘just in case’. But it did mean everything to Bucky that Steve was so adamant about keeping him and helping him if he did ever mess up. He felt the lump form in his throat and his nose tingle with the tell-tale sign that he was going to cry. “I love you, Steve,” he whispered and pulled him tighter into a hug, kissing his neck and just holding him. “I am the luckiest man alive to have found you.”

---

Steve wrapped his arms tightly around Bucky’s shoulders. “I mean it, Baby. You’re going to stay right here and have the love and support of everyone in this house.” He knew that Bucky wouldn’t do anything that would hurt their kids and Steve was home all the time anyway, so he wouldn’t let Bucky accidentally neglect them while high or drunk. “I’m luckier to have found you,” he responded with a smile.

---

Bucky pressed his lips to Steve’s and then pulled back to look into his eyes again, intently. “And I promise, Baby. This is just in case. I don’t want to relapse. I don’t. I don’t want to do that to you. But I think it would be good to have this plan if that ever did happen. But I swear, Steve, I’m doing really well. I am. I mean, I’m up to a year without alcohol.”
“I know, Babe. I have full faith in you that you’re not going to relapse and I am so, so fucking proud of you being a whole year sober,” Steve said. “I know how proud you are to have that chip. I see you playing with it all the time.” He squeezed Bucky’s hand. “You set such a good example for our kids.”

Bucky nodded, letting a couple tears fall down his face now. He was proud. He never thought he would get this far. And it really was all thanks to Steve. He couldn’t have done this without him. “It’s all because of you, Steve. The house, our kids, my sobriety are all because of you. Also, at this point, if I would have stayed the way I was, I might not even have my sisters anymore. Becca would have filed for early emancipation and then I would have gotten worse and Lilly would have been taken. Everything I have right now is because I have you.”

Steve’s stomach turned at that thought. He knew that Becca would’ve done just that and although he wanted to say that Bucky would’ve powered through, he knew it would’ve been a lie. It would’ve destroyed Bucky to have Becca gone. Steve dried his husband’s tears and kissed his lips. “Fate made sure that you wouldn’t have to suffer that heartbreak,” Steve said. “We were meant to find each other when we did.”

“Yeah, yeah we were,” Bucky said, licking his bottom lip before leaning in to kiss Steve again. “I love you,” he whispered and moved to straddle Steve’s lap. “I love you so much, Baby.” He kissed from Steve’s mouth across his jaw and down his neck, desperate but passionate and so loving. “You’re my everything, Steve. My whole world. I know I say it a lot but I mean it so much.”

Steve slid his hand up the back of Bucky’s shirt and smiled up at him. He closed his eyes and leaned up into the kiss, practically bursting with happiness over having such an amazing marriage with the man in front of him. “I know you mean it. And every time I hear you say it, it makes me a happier man.” He kissed the curve of Bucky’s jaw. “Our kids are so lucky. They’re going to see what it’s like to have a healthy, happy relationship. So, they know not to settle for anything less.”

“Don’t settle for anything less,” Bucky agreed quietly. He knew he wasn’t a good role model for relationships and sexual partners in his life but he was hoping that the fact that Steve hadn’t been promiscuous - and the added benefit of seeing their parents together - would help their kids learn how to traverse romance and sexuality safely. Bucky whined softly and let his hands trail down Steve’s body, just feeling him. “Baby...” He slipped his fingers into the waistband of Steve’s pants and tugged softly.

Steve smiled fondly at his husband. He loved how much Bucky still wanted him, even after being together for so long and spending most of their time tiring themselves out for their kids. “Yes, Dear?” Steve asked innocently. “What do you want?” He pet Bucky’s hair gently. “Are you tired?” He then gave Bucky’s hair a firm tug. “Or do you want me to take you to bed?”
Bucky whined again and rolled his hips against Steve as an answer. He locked eyes with him, all lust and hot need coming through his stare. He wiggled his hand further into Steve’s pants and brushed his hand over his cock. He palmed at his length and gave a couple soft huffs of air against Steve’s neck as he went, getting ahead of himself already. “Take me to bed, Steve.”

Steve loved it when Bucky was all hot and desperate. It sent a wave of arousal right to his dick and all he could think about was giving Bucky exactly what he wanted. Steve groaned softly when Bucky grabbed at his dick. Steve quickly moved so he could grab Bucky’s wrist and pull it away. He then pinned Bucky beneath him on the couch and he gave a slow, deep roll of his hips to slowly grind against Bucky. He kept him pinned there, rolling his hips in slow circles to get Bucky writhing beneath him. “I don’t think I heard you say ‘please’,” he purred in Bucky’s ear before biting it lightly.

“Oh, fuck, Baby, please,” Bucky said quickly, breathlessly. “Please. Please, let me touch you. Let me have your cock, Steve. Please.” He wrapped his legs around Steve and relaxed where Steve was holding him down. He kissed him and massaged Steve’s thighs with his toes, trying to engage their entire bodies and get Steve going so much he couldn’t stand it.

Bucky’s reaction was sinfully beautiful. He couldn’t believe how hot his husband was and it didn’t take Steve long to pull Bucky off the couch and lead him upstairs. As soon as they were in the bedroom, Steve held the sides of Bucky’s face firmly and kissed him deeply and possessively. He held Bucky’s head in place and he moaned against Bucky’s lips. “Take your clothes off.”

“Yes, Sir,” Bucky whispered back and fumbled with his belt for a second before finally getting it tugged off and discarded at his feet. It didn’t take long for him to be naked and hard and waiting in front of Steve. He scratched over his chest and down to his abs, letting his warm hand feel his own body just as a show for his husband. “I’m ready for you, Baby. I’m yours. Take me, Steve.”

Steve watched Bucky undress with dark eyes and licked his lips. Bucky looked so goddamned delectable right now, Steve could barely contain himself. He slowly took off his clothes in front of Bucky, article by article, and once he was completely naked, he eased Bucky back onto the bed and moved over him.

“Baby, you’re fucking gorgeous,” Bucky declared as Steve’s body hovered over him. “I’m reminded every morning when I wake up to you and every day I come home to you. I want to run my tongue all over you, Steve.” He pressed his hands to Steve’s stomach and abs and pushed lightly. “Starting here, then going up and then down your sides and your ass and on your inner thighs and your balls and dick. Let’s start every morning like that.”
Steve felt his face heat up at the admission. “Well, if you quit sleeping in so much, we can make that into a habit.” He grabbed the lube from the nightstand and coated his fingers with it. He wiped a little down Bucky’s abs just because and trailed his finger around his balls and down to his hole. “You’re going to wake me up like that tomorrow, right?”

---

Bucky hissed in an excited breath through his teeth when he felt cold lubed fingers on his balls. “Of course, I’ll wake you up that way tomorrow,” he promised, resting his hands under his head. “You know, if I’m ever sleeping in too much and you want me up, you can always wake me up with your mouth on my cock. Or tongue in my ass, fingers all over me. I don’t care, Baby. You can pick. I’ll wake up for sure and I’ll be damn happy to see you.”

---

“It’s hard to wake you up when you look so beautiful and peaceful when you’re sleeping,” Steve said. He eased a finger inside of his husband and looked down at him with all the love he possessed. “But I bet it would be equally as hot waking you up with a morning blowjob or fucking you nice and slow with my fingers.”

---

“Yes, please,” Bucky whined as the first finger pushed slowly inside. “Please do that sometime - fingerfuck me awake. That would be amazing. I can just imagine how hot it will be to blink back to consciousness and to have your fingers spreading me open.” He sighed happily at the thought. “And just when I’m brushing the sleep from my mind, you can slide your cock in and take me apart.”

---

“I’ll do that for you, Beautiful,” he said. Steve worked his finger steadily in and out of his husband. “It’ll feel so good. I’m going to love making sweet, slow love to you as you wake up to the day,” Steve purred. He eased a second finger inside. “I like knowing that it’ll make a great start to both of our days.”

---

“Yeah, it will. Waking up to you is always the best start to my days,” Bucky said and moved to wrap his arms around Steve. “More fingers, please,” he whispered, a little impatiently. “I want you now, Steve. Hurry just a little.” He knew he was being demanding but it had been at least a week since he had Steve’s cock inside him. And every time he went more than three days, he got very cranky about it.

---

Steve laughed lightly and got more lube on his fingers before easing one more inside. “You know, sometimes even when I want to be inside you, I hold off a day or two because I love how demanding you are when you’re extra desperate for me to fuck you.” He smirked and bit a little mark onto Bucky’s throat. Before Bucky could argue back, he pulled his fingers out and slowly lined his cock up. He bit his neck again sharply and pushed himself all the way inside Bucky’s ass.

---

“Steve! You-“ Bucky was going to chastise his husband but then he finally had Steve’s dick inside him and he couldn’t remember what had made him mad. He gasped and threw his head back, hand reaching for his own warm cock. “Good, finally. Steve, you tease. Letting your husband hang for that long.”

---

Steve moaned with pleasure at the feeling of Bucky’s tight, hot ass enveloping his cock. He started to thrust steadily inside of him, making sure to fuck him nice and deep. He brought a hand up and played with Bucky’s nipple as he fucked him. “The longer the tease, the better the sex,” he said.

---

“More like, the longer the tease, the grumpier the husband,” Bucky corrected. But Steve was right. It was usually pretty amazing sex when Bucky was so desperate and they hadn’t helped each other come for a while. But he would take Steve’s cock inside him every night and be just as happy. “You got to make it up to me now. Really prove it’s worth all the trouble to keep me waiting.”

---

Steve grabbed Bucky’s wrists and pinned them above his head. “Someone’s being pushy. Am I going to have to put you in time out for being fresh, Love?” He claimed Bucky’s lips in a quick, searing kiss, starting to rock his hips faster so that his balls smacked heavily against Bucky’s ass with every thrust.

---

“Oh, you love it when I’m a brat,” Bucky said but whined softly when Steve picked up his speed. “I’ll be good now. Promise. You can even come on my face tonight if you want to.” Bucky loved that. He liked watching Steve’s cock spill out over him. And it was usually followed with Steve licking him off and he loved that too.

---

Steve’s eyes lit up a little at that. He had a bit of a possessive side and although he loved getting to come on his husband, it was something he only did if Bucky suggested it because he didn’t want Bucky to feel demeaned in any way. “Yes... god yes, please,” Steve groaned, kissing Bucky’s neck messily.

---

Bucky chuckled and tilted his head so his neck was bared for Steve. “Am I forgiven for being difficult?” he asked and let out a few strained moans while he got his ass pummeled a little harder by Steve. “Or are you gonna give me my punishment with your come all over me?”

---

Steve let go of one of Bucky’s hand so he could stroke his husband’s cock. He snapped his hips roughly, making Bucky’s body scoot a little higher up the bed. “A little bit of both,” he gasped. “God, Baby, I’m so close. Are you going to let me take pictures of you before I lick you clean?”

---

“You can always take my picture.” Unlike Steve, Bucky wasn’t very shy about his picture being taken. He loved that they had a large collection of sexy Polaroids of them. They had regular ones as well but the naked shots were always the most fun to photograph.
“Good,” he said softly. Steve didn’t last much longer. When he felt his orgasm approaching, he pulled out of Bucky’s ass and then straddled his stomach. He started to jerk off over his husband. He panted heavily, having difficulty keeping his breath as his hand moved fluidly over the length of his dick. He let out a long moan as he came and spurted thick strands of come onto Bucky’s face.

---

Bucky missed Steve’s dick the second it was out of him but he quickly got back on board once Steve was hovering over him. He kept his mouth open and got a bit of Steve’s come on his tongue but most of it landed on his cheeks and neck. He giggled happily and pushed Steve off of him carefully so he could grab his own cock and pump. “Take pictures of me while I jerk off.”

---

Steve moaned softly at the sight of his come painting Bucky’s face. He kissed his temple and hurried to get the Polaroid and started to take picture after picture of Bucky at all different angles. “Man, you could’ve been a model or a porno star in another life, Baby,” he said. “You’re so gorgeous.”

---

Bucky chuckled as he kept pumping himself with one hand and brought Steve’s come to his mouth with the other. “Maybe that’s what I should do instead of school? There’s good money in either of those jobs. If I have a natural talent, I might as well use it.” He knew that would get a rise out of Steve. He was joking entirely but he still wanted to poke at the beast a little by joking. Besides, Steve hadn’t ever really watched porn.

---

Steve turned the camera towards both of them as he swiped his tongue across Bucky’s cheek to lick some off and then took another picture as he pressed a few open-mouthed kisses to Bucky’s face. “Not in this lifetime,” Steve chastised immediately in response.

---

Bucky giggled and took the camera to set it down. He rolled them so he was straddled on top of Steve, stroking his cock over him. He shimmied up his chest a little more and rested the head of his cock against Steve’s lips. “Open up, Baby,” he whispered and gasped at the feeling of his orgasm bubbling through him to shoot out into Steve’s mouth and on his lips.

---

Steve smiled when Bucky moved over him and he squeezed Bucky’s ass in response. “Mmm, let me taste you, Buck,” he purred softly. When he saw the telltale signs of Bucky about to come, he parted his lips and allowed Bucky to coat his face as well.

---

“Ah, fuck, Baby,” Bucky gasped and relaxed his body once he was finished coming. “You’re so gorgeous. I love you, Steve. Goddamn.” He moved off of him again so he could grab the camera and take one picture of Steve before going in to kiss the come from him. “You’re so cute. You look amazing. And you taste so good too. You taste like us.”

---

Steve pulled Bucky in tight for more kisses. “I can’t believe all you’ve convinced me to do, Bucky Rogers-Barnes. You’ve turned me into a little heathen.” He ran his messy hand through Bucky’s hair, not even realizing he was getting lube in it.

---

Bucky grinned from ear to ear. He loved that he got the name right this time. Steve so often just said ‘Barnes’ and Bucky always corrected him. “Well, Steve Rogers-Barnes, I think you always were one. You just needed someone like me to show you how good it could be to be a little bad. You know? Just don’t tell Father Frank.” Bucky didn’t like to think that there were whole groups of people out there who thought two men and two women together were going to hell and all that. But he knew Father Frank definitely didn’t think that. Although, he probably didn’t want to know what Steve and Bucky got up to in their own home.

---

“Hell. No. There’s no way Father Frank is going to hear a word of this. He may be liberal but he’s still a man of God and I’m not letting him know I like your come on my face.” He swatted Bucky’s ass lightly. “So, how do I look?” he asked, needing a little confidence boost from his husband.

---

Bucky nodded in understanding but gave Steve a little smirk anyway. “Oh, my sweet handsome husband, you look absolutely mesmerizing,” he assured him and slipped his hands over Steve’s chest and neck. “You’re beyond breathtaking. I love you so much. You’re my favorite. You’re handsome, Steve. But you’re also cute and sexy and adorable and hot. It’s amazing. You can be this incredible sex magnet for me but also the damned cutest thing I’ve ever seen. God, Baby, not a second goes by that I don’t want to touch you.”

---

Steve smiled happily at the praise, even though that praise required just the tiniest bit of fishing. “I love you too, Bucky,” he said. “I love how you make me feel. And I’m so happy that you still think I’m the hottest thing in Brooklyn.” He smiled dumbly and hugged him close. “Come here and sleep with me, Buck. Fucking you wore me out.”

---

Bucky snuggled down against Steve and wrapped his arms tightly around him, keeping him secure and close. “No, Baby, you’re not the hottest thing in Brooklyn. You’re the hottest thing in all of New York, and America, and, you know, the universe. All those sexy aliens have nothing on you, Steve.” Bucky worried pretty often about Steve’s self-image problems. He used to be much more confident, but since his injury, it went downhill. He hoped that Steve never once thought that Bucky had eyes for anyone else. Because he didn’t. He was only ever focused on his husband. “Night, Baby.”
Steve had spent the whole day cleaning up the house. But with three kids and two teens hanging around the place, it was like trying to keep water from passing through his fingers. He did his best and managed to cook a delicious Italian recipe that had the whole house smelling great. Diana was stationed at Steve’s side, waiting for scraps of meat Steve would give her on occasion, as usual. Steve had tried to cheer Bucky up by buying him a new gold glittery guitar pick but it did little to brighten his mood about Richard.

---

Bucky, to his credit, had done what he could to keep the kids out of Steve’s way. He played with them for a while and read a few books to them to make them sleepy. He had been consistently reading at least one book a day to Adriana to work on his reading out loud. But now they were all on the couch sleeping in a row with Sarah May using Adriana’s tummy as a pillow and Christopher tucked under her arm. Bucky, who was dressed in the outfit Steve had chosen - his nicest black corduroys with a button down and sweater number, was sitting in the rocking chair and lazily playing his guitar, staring out the window like a moody teenager.

---

When a knock came at the door, it was a miracle Diana didn’t bark and run to see who was there. But that was only because she was in the middle of gobbling down a meatball. Steve answered the door and smiled when he saw Tim. He ushered the man in and Tim gasped when he saw all three kids cuddled up. “Oh, my god, look at how precious they are!” Tim gushed.

---

“Tim! Buddy!” Bucky said excitedly, careful to not be too loud to wake the kids. “How are you?” He set his guitar aside and came to pull him in for a hug. “Adriana asked me earlier if ‘Big Tim’ was coming over. She decided that, since you’re the tallest, that’s what you’re called now.” He grinning and took Tim’s coat from him. Sarah and Becca came upstairs then and went to carefully gather the kids. They had set up a few sleeping bags and cushions in Becca’s basement so all of them could have a movie night with Nana on Becca’s tv. That way it would be just couples’ upstairs.

---

Tim gave Bucky a bear hug even though they saw each other pretty regularly. Tim clearly loved how adored he was by Bucky’s kids even though it wasn’t the same as getting to see his own. “I don’t mind being called that. It makes me feel important,” he said. “So, uh... how do I look?” he asked Bucky nervously.

---

“Hey, you look great,” Bucky assured him, hand resting on his shoulders. “You look handsome and dignified and older but in a really sexy way. Don’t worry.” Bucky looked over at Steve and said. “Tell him that he looks amazing, Baby. Timmy is all anxious.” Bucky knew how much Tim disliked being called ‘Timmy’. But Bucky and Clint had taken to using it recently as a way to distract him from thinking about his ex-wife and the new baby. Tim had been especially upset when she named the baby ‘Brandon’ even though that was always the name Tim wanted for their next boy but she never liked it until now.
“Yeah, Tim. You look like you’re a real catch and you’ve got the personality to back it up,” Steve assured him. “You’re going to knock his socks off when he meets you.”

Richard arrived a few minutes later dressed in a moderately well-to-do fashion and carrying a bottle of wine. “Hey, guys,” he said in a friendly tone. “Thank you for having me over.”

Bucky was so occupied with keeping Tim from freaking out and leaving that he didn’t notice Richard come in at first. He glanced over and saw the officer standing with Steve and holding a bottle of red wine - and a really good one too. His jaw clenched and he looked from the wine to Steve and then up at Tim. He blinked and tucked his flyaway hair behind his ears. Steve had insisted that he braid it for tonight. He said that a braid looked really nice with the sweater. Bucky didn’t buy it. But Bucky did his best to make nice as he walked over, pressed himself to Steve’s side possessively and shaking Richard’s hand. He was regretting all of this already.

Richard could tell that Bucky was seething under the surface but he pretended not to notice so that they didn’t end up with some sort of blowup. “I brought this. I figured we could have something nice to go along with the dinner you made, Steve,” Richard said, offering the wine out to them.

Steve wrapped an arm around Bucky’s waist in support. “That’s very kind of you, Richard. But, unfortunately, none of us are wine-drinkers. We appreciate the thought, though.”

“Maybe you can give it to someone else to take home or something.” Bucky gave a tight little smile and nodded. He was trying his best to be polite but he was very miffed already. He was going to add something to it but then there was another knock on the door and Clint and Natasha had arrived. The second Clint came in the door, Bucky grabbed his hand and dragged him into the kitchen, out of the way of anyone else to hear them and see him signing to Clint that, “Oh, my god, Clint. I knew this was a bad idea. Richard brought alcohol. Of course, he did. He’s trying to sabotage me. Why did I ever agree to this? You know, he still hasn’t apologized for arresting us.”

Clint scowled at the news and signed back at Bucky. “He probably didn’t know better. But he’s still a fucking asshole for not apologizing.” Clint didn’t know whether or not someone had told Richard about the whole alcoholism thing. “Do you want me to flip out on him for no reason just like he did to us?”

“I’m just mad. Everyone else knows I’m in AA. I mean, Sam and Nat must have told him, right?” Bucky asked, hands angrily signing as he went. He didn’t really need to sign with Clint much anymore with his new hearing aid but he still did most all the time. “I just can’t imagine them not warning him once he was invited.”

“Maybe they told him. I don’t know. I can ask,” Clint signed back. “Maybe he forgot. Maybe it’s a misunderstanding. Or maybe he’s just trying to show off to Tim that he can afford to buy some fancy wine, which is still a douche move but not done to sabotage you.” He gripped Bucky’s shoulder for a second. “Do you need me to do anything to help you keep the temptation down?”

---

Bucky sighed and rubbed at his face. He wasn’t so much worried about drinking. He was more just looking for any and all excuses he could get to still be pissy with Richard. He was fairly certain that Richard didn’t have a crush on Steve anymore. And he did think that he and Tim could be really good together. He just liked to hold on to his grudges. He only recently stopped being sassy to Sam out of dislike. Now he was sassy in a much friendlier way.

---

“Come on. We can probably find a petty way to get back at him that’s satisfying. Maybe we can have Diana lick his spoon without him knowing before we give it to him,” Clint suggested. “Or we can talk in sign the whole time and not translate so he can’t join in on any of our conversations.”

---

Bucky chuckled at Clint. He was the greatest friend that he could ask for. “Yeah, well, if we sign then Steve, Nat, and Tim - to some extent - will know what we are saying and then will just translate anyway. I don’t know, I’m just going to try to stick to Steve and let Richard interact with Tim. That’s kind of the whole point after all. And, also, Sam is bringing a woman he is seeing too so many I can just get to know her instead of even acknowledging that Richard is here.”

---

“Let’s hope that Richard and Tim are distracted with each other,” Clint said. He nudged Bucky and gave him a reassuring smile.

Steve walked over finally and put a hand on the small of Bucky’s back. “Why don’t you have a seat and relax, Baby?”

---

“I am relaxed,” Bucky muttered through gritted teeth and glanced up at Steve. He slipped his hand in with Steve’s and held him very close to him. He didn’t really want to be away from Steve at the moment. “Is Sam getting here soon? Is he still bringing his girlfriend?” Regardless of the issues that sometimes cropped up between him and Sam, Bucky did have to admit that Sam was really good at dissolving tension. He was charismatic and humorous and always told the best stories. Bucky hated this too, but he was actually pretty fond of him now.

---

“He said he was going to be a little late, but here before dinner.” Steve went back to finishing up the cooking after giving Bucky a sweet kiss on the lips. Raphael hopped into Bucky’s lap the second he sat down and bumped his head against him.

After a few minutes, Richard came over to Bucky. “This is a really nice house you’ve got here. Thank you for inviting me over.”

---

Bucky scooped Raphael into his arms and pet him gently so the cat would purr and settle comfortably with him. When Richard came to sit by him, Bucky glanced over at Clint who was occupied with talking to Tim and Nat. And Steve was still cooking. It was just him and Richard for now. “Yeah, uh, thanks. It was my parents’ place.” He decided to ignore the comment about having invited Richard.

---

“That’s got to be cool, living in your childhood home and getting to raise your kids here,” he said. Richard looked around the place. “So, where are your parents living now since you’ve got this place? Did they go to Florida? That’s where my parents went once they retired.” He was utterly clueless but trying to make conversation.

---

Bucky looked at Richard for a long moment. He knew that Richard couldn’t possibly know his entire story but he figured that he would have at least known that his parents were gone. Why else would he have his little sisters living with him? He nodded slowly and said, “Uh, yeah, Florida.” He wasn’t really sure why he lied but he did. Maybe it was because he didn’t want to talk about his parents with Richard. Or maybe he just didn’t want this man to know anything about him at all. Whatever the reason, he gave another little smile and then moved the conversation along. “So, did you introduce yourself to Tim?”

---

Richard shrugged his shoulders shyly. “Not yet. I don’t really know how to start without something to say to him. I’m not really good at making conversation,” Richard admitted. Judging by how awful this conversation was going, at least he seemed a little self-aware.

---

“Well, I don’t know, man,” Bucky said, a little sigh escaping his lips. “I don’t hardly know you either but you came up to talk to me.” Raphael jumped off of Bucky’s lap then, having had his fill of petting. “Tim’s personal hobbies are reading, keeping up with politics, candle-making, and swimming. Start there.”

---

“Well, it’s easy to talk to people I’m not attracted to,” Richard said, then he immediately realized how that sounded. “I, uh, mean... not that you’re ugly or anything. You’re not my type. Sorry,” he corrected. Richard got up and slunk off to grab a drink and attempt a better conversation with Tim.

---

Bucky rolled his eyes and got up to go find Steve. His husband was still putting the finishing touches on dinner and he had a crease in his forehead like he was focusing way too hard. “Hey,” Bucky said and nudged him gently with his foot. “I think I just found the one gay man in Brooklyn who doesn’t think I’m hot.”

---

Steve looked over at Bucky and lightly kissed the tip of his nose. “Oh, yeah? Well, that man certainly isn’t me,” he said. He passed Bucky the spoon to make him stir the pot while he cut up the appetizers. “Did Richard say you were unattractive? Because he’s dead wrong if that’s what came out of his mouth.”

---
“No, he just said that he wasn’t attracted to me. Apparently, I’m not his type,” Bucky said, stirring obediently as he went. “So, a tight ass, chiseled features, bright eyes, and perfect hair isn’t his type? I’m everyone’s type, Steve,” he murmured more to himself than to his husband. He wasn’t mad about the fact that Richard didn’t find him attractive. He sure as hell didn’t want to have anything to do with Richard. But Bucky just wanted to have things to be upset about right now, so this was just the next one to complain over.

---

Steve laughed and gave his husband a hug. “Sweetheart, you’re fucking adorable when you’re grumpy.” He kissed Bucky’s cheek and pet his hand over Bucky’s arm once before he went to the door to answer the knock. Sam was there with his new girlfriend, who was dressed in an outrageously neon outfit, which was a funny contrast to Sam’s modest colors.

---

Bucky followed Steve, glad to have the distraction of their last guests’ arrival. He shook Sam’s hand and then nodded to the woman. “Groovy outfit,” he said and gestured to himself. “I’m Bucky. Steve’s husband. Can I take your coat, Miss...?” He trailed off, waiting for her name. He was also sort of mesmerized by how bouncy her hair was. It seemed to jump up with every little move she made.

---

“Thank you!” she said. “It’s my first time wearing such a loud outfit, but I felt like standing out a little today,” she admitted. “I’m Mary, by the way. It’s very nice to meet you.” She went straight for a hug instead of shaking Bucky’s hand and she walked in to greet the rest of the dinner guests.

“She’s an outgoing one, isn’t she?” Sam said proudly, a smile spreading over his face.

---

The hug startled Bucky a little but he didn’t mind it. Mary was very friendly and he kind of needed someone like that right now. “Yes, she is. I like her,” Bucky said, nodding to Sam with an impressed reverence. “You keep her.” He turned to Steve and said, “I’m going to go help Sam introduce Mary to anyone she might not know, so Clint and Tim probably, and you just holler for me when you need help bringing dinner in.”

---

The only person who didn’t take to Mary right away was Natasha, who didn’t like being hugged by strangers. Steve loved her energy and grabbed Bucky’s arm before he could turn to walk away. “Babe, it’s ready now,” he chuckled. “Help me carry the plates over? Be careful cause they’re a little hot,” he warned.

---

Bucky nodded and went to grab a plate. Steve wasn’t kidding it was very hot. “Ow, fuck!” he gasped and set it down again. “Jesus, that was hot, Steve.” He blew on his hand and then tucked his sweater sleeve over it to grab the plates without having to touch his skin. He carefully took the plates over to the table and then got everyone in to sit down. They didn’t have much room to move around and everyone was very intimately cushioned together but it worked for the most part.

---
“Baby, I warned you,” Steve said with a worried pout at his husband. He gave Bucky’s hand a kiss after they were all settled in. Diana took her spot next to Steve since he was the one who always gave her table food.

“So, how are the kids doing? Have they been asking about Santa since they last saw him?” Tim asked.

---

Bucky tried to shoo Diana off but there was no budging her while Steve had food on his plate so he gave up. He tucked any loose hair behind his ears because he wasn’t about to have another dinner where he was told he had food all over him. “Well, not so much Sarah May and Christopher. They don’t really get what’s going on. But Adriana understands and she’s very excited about Christmas and Hanukkah this year.”

---

“Well that makes Adriana my favorite for now,” Tim joked. He had a new favorite after every visit, though, so him changing his opinion was nothing new. “It’s the best when they’re around her age. They’re still practically babies but they’re not old enough to try and logic their way out of everything you want them to do.”

---

Richard, who was seated next to Tim, cocked his head to the side just a little and asked, “Do you have kids?” in a gentle and intrigued sort of tone. Natasha was told to give Richard a little bit of a background on Tim before tonight so he already knew he had kids and an ex-wife. Richard had also looked up his record to see if he had been arrested for anything. All he found was a parking violation that was paid in plenty of time. Thankfully, he had never been caught during his underground street fighting days. That would have put a flag up for Richard automatically.

---

Tim didn’t know what Richard had been briefed about, so he answered as if Richard didn’t know a thing about him. “Yeah, but they live with my ex, who just had another baby with her new husband,” he said. “I want to be happy for her, but she’s keeping my kids from me.” He awkwardly cut up his food. “I wish I could see them more.”

---

“Yeah,” Richard said and nodded, already on Tim’s side about the whole thing. “I’m sorry about that. You should get to see them whenever you want.”

Bucky jumped in so Tim wouldn’t have to keep discussing it. “Well, his partial custody lets him see them every other weekend but his ex-wife’s lawyers are reviewing a possibility to change it to every weekend and every other Monday.”

---

“Tim’s a great Dad,” Steve said. “I’m glad that the lawyers are considering giving him more visitation. He didn’t do anything wrong to deserve the divorce in the first place.”

Tim blushed at Steve’s defense. “Too bad my wife doesn’t like anyone like us or else you two would be my character witnesses,” Tim said shyly.
Bucky gave a little sigh and then shot Tim a little smile. “I’ll go to bat for you any day, Buddy.” He ripped a dinner roll in half and gave one side to Steve. He sort of figured that a change in pace for the conversation might be good so he turned to Mary. “So, Mary, what do you do? Or what’re your hobbies and things?”

“I’m a school teacher,” Mary said. “And don’t tell my third graders’ parents, but I also DJ at a nightclub on Saturdays.” She seemed to be well put together and polite but also had a bit of a wild and fun side. “Sam met me when he was at the club, as much as he hates to admit that he still goes to them,” she chuckled.

Bucky laughed too and gave a look to Sam who held up his hands and said, “In my defense, the night we met, I was there because of a birthday party for a friend of mine. So, it wasn’t actually my choice to be there... that night.”

“Okay, so that’s not accounting for the other nights then?” Clint asked, giving a mischievous smile over at Bucky and then to Mary.

“He thinks that nightclubs are for college kids who don’t know responsibility. I mean, he’s not far off. But there are plenty of responsible adults who like to dance the night away too,” Mary said.

Sam waved his hand. “I’m not that uptight about it. All I’m saying is that if I’m looking for fun, I want to be able to talk to people instead of shout over the music.”

Tim gave Bucky a discreet little glance. He had definitely been going to clubs a lot lately even though he was much older in comparison. And he knew Bucky went to clubs basically up until the time he found Steve. “Not to give myself away or anything, but nightclubs can be lots of fun even if you aren’t an irresponsible college kid. I’m with you, Mary.”

Mary raised her hand up to give Tim a high five. “Alright! That’s two of us,” she said with a grin.

Steve smiled. “Don’t worry, Sam. I’m on your side here. Though it can be fun to go to a club if you’re with a good friend. I wouldn’t go on my own or to look to meet new people.” He wrapped an arm around Bucky as he discreetly gave Diana the rest of his bread roll.

Bucky nodded and leaned into Steve a little. “Yeah, well, I think it’s fun. I haven’t gone to a club in almost two years. Our last attempt didn’t turn out too well,” he said and looked to Steve with a little apologetic glance. “We had a run-in with an ex-boyfriend of mine and it wasn’t very pretty.”

Steve grimaced. “Yeah, that night really sucked. More for you than for me, but I still was pretty scared.” He squeezed Bucky’s hand.

Richard set his fork down. “Tim, you said you like going out to nightclubs?” he asked conversationally.

---

“Oh, uh,” Tim started and looked to Richard with a blush over his cheeks. “Not particularly anymore. For a while, I was trying to meet someone at places like that. But I figured out pretty quickly that the guys I was interacting with weren’t looking to settle down with a father-of-four who is at least a decade older than them.”

---

“I’ve never been,” Richard admitted. “Mostly because a lot of the people I have arrested either went or had a close buddy who went to nightclubs often and I didn’t want to risk running into someone I pissed off. That’s also why I never want to go to jail.”

---

“Oh,” Tim said with wide, amused eyes. “Well, I guess that does make sense. I don’t shop at my old grocery store because I don’t want to run into my ex-wife.”

Bucky gave a look to Clint across the table and quickly signed, ‘Sure, he doesn’t want to go to clubs and piss off people he’s arrested but he will come to the house of one of them and bring alcohol too.’

---

Clint snorted and hid his dumb grin behind his drink as he sipped at his glass. Dinner was going pretty well with nice chatter and fun stories from Mary. Eventually, Richard, trying to salvage what little friendship he had with Bucky and Steve, asked, “So, how are your kids doing? I didn’t get to see them today.”

---

“They are good. All the kids are downstairs with Steve’s mom watching a movie. We didn’t want to have to try to keep track of all the little ones while we had so many people over,” Bucky said and gave an actual smile to Richard. He was a sucker for people asking about his babies. “Adriana just learned how to braid hair and she is very proud. She braided mine tonight but then Steve redid it so it wasn’t so messy.”

---

Richard loved kids and it was just a bonus that it was the only thing he said ever that had Bucky smiling. “Aw, that’s a shame. I mean, Steve did a good job with your braid but it would’ve been nice to see her handiwork,” he said.

Tim shook his head with a laugh. “She’s got a bit of practicing to go before she styles like Steve. It kind of looks like a wild bush when she does Bucky’s hair.”

---

“Yeah, it does,” Bucky agreed. “Clint and Tim have seen my hair in lots of different styles and messes from my kids.” He squeezed Steve’s hand and gave him a little smile. Things were okay at the moment. He wasn’t currently ready to rip Richard in half. “Tim, maybe when you come be Santa again you can bring Adriana glitter glue that won’t stick in my hair. She thinks it makes me look pretty but I think it sticks to all my clothes and my pillow.”

---

“If I brought you glitter glue that didn’t stick, it’d just be called glitter,” Tim answered with a smartass grin.

Steve laughed at that. “Which, in my opinion, makes an even bigger mess. Glitter gets everywhere and takes forever to clean up,” he said.

---

Bucky huffed and looked at Tim and Steve. They only joked because their hair was short and Adriana didn’t want to make it ‘pretty’ with glitter. He got up and started gathering everyone’s finished plates. “Steve made a dessert. But he has to put some special glaze over it that is chilling. So, if you all want to go hang out in the living room and talk, we will clean up. Natasha, you know where the board games are to pick one. If we don’t have any for eight people, we can play in pairs.”

---

Diana followed Steve around the kitchen the whole time, waiting for more scraps. Tim picked out that they all should play charades on teams, which ended up being a lot of fun, especially when Richard got ‘brushing teeth’ and accidentally made it look like giving a really bad blowjob.

---

Charades went really well for a while until Clint and Bucky were exposed for using coded sign to cheat. No one would have known either until Tim finally noticed that Bucky’s fingers weren’t just restless but making fast signs that only he and Clint knew. But then there was a light-hearted time out for the cheaters which just lead to them all sitting about and talking again - this time about a case that Sam and Richard were working on involving meth dealers working out of an abandoned public swimming pool of all things.

---

When his two friends started talking about police work, Steve wrapped his arm around Bucky and held him tightly, feeling that familiar pang of missing his old job. “Did you have a look at Redford’s files? I remember him working on a case like that in ‘81,” Steve suggested.

---

“Yeah, we did,” Richard confirmed with a nod and a look to Sam. “My first thought was some sort of copycat group but after Sam did some re-con it turns out it’s some of the old guys who weren’t caught and convicted the first time. It’ll just be a matter of warrants before we can do something about it.”

Bucky noticed the gleam in Tim’s eyes that gave away how impressed with Richard he was - and how attracted to him. Bucky hated that he and Steve had been right about Richard being a good match for Tim. “Your job sounds dangerous. Are you ever scared?” Tim asked with what could only be equated as words that sounded like honey. He was smitten already.

---

Steve was pretty pleased with himself for figuring out a cause for who it was without being in the force for over a year. He squeezed Bucky’s arm gently and nudged him to see how Tim’s expression was all lit up and fawning over Richard. He knew Bucky didn’t like Richard in the slightest but it was still nice to see their friend so smitten.

“I’m scared sometimes, but more for other people than myself,” Richard said. “There are a lot of kids who get caught up because the wrong people are teaching them and getting them into trouble before they can make decisions on their own.”

---

Tim made a soft little hum and gave a little smile to Richard. Bucky was pretty sure that Tim would have started making out with him if they would have been alone. But they were surrounded by other people so Tim just reached to squeeze Richard’s arm for a second and then pull back slowly.

Bucky also noticed how much Richard sounded like Steve when he talked about helping people on the force. That was always Steve’s favorite part. Seeing their similarities helped soften Bucky a little more to Richard. He might actually be able to be indifferent to him pretty soon and then eventually maybe even a friend. “Well, you guys, the night has been very nice. I’m glad you all came over. But if I’m going to open the shop tomorrow, I need to sleep. You all can stay if you want but I’m going to start getting the babies ready for bed.”

---

Steve felt a little burst of pride for being able to play matchmaker with Richard and Tim. Sam and Mary bid everyone a good night but the other adults wanted to stick around to say goodnight to the children. Which, of course, led to Christopher and Adriana wanting to play and chatter to everyone. Steve looked at Bucky with a sympathetic smile. “I can put them to bed if you want to go to sleep.”

---

Bucky had Sarah May tucked against his chest, sleeping soundly and gripping her hand tightly into his shirt. He would have taken Steve up on that but he didn’t want to put her down yet when she was like this. “Oh, it’s okay. Let’s give them a few more minutes and then we can do it together once everyone leaves. Adriana is only halfway through telling Clint each one of her turtles’ backstories.” Bucky noticed Richard hovering near Tim while he played with Christopher. So, Bucky made his way over and peeled him off from the crowd. He figured he should try to set up some form of a truce with him. “So, Richard...” he started slowly. But he wasn’t sure what to say. “If you offered Tim that nice bottle of wine. He would probably invite you over to his place. You should give it a try.”

---

Richard bit his bottom lip nervously. “You think so?” he asked. “I don’t want him to feel obligated to invite me back just because I gave him fancy wine. You think he really wants to hang around me already?”

---

Bucky fought back his natural inclination to say something tart back to Richard. He was trying to smooth things over, after all. “Yeah, man. I think he does. I know Tim pretty well now. And he has two modes of flirting. The first is when he’s overly suggestive and blunt about compliments. That’s just for when he finds someone attractive but doesn’t want it to go further than something physical.” Bucky had experienced that Tim first hand back when he first met him. “But when he gets all shy and nervous and does those little glances and touches like he has been doing with you all night, that means he actually wants this to be something important. And Tim has been looking for a while now for a man to invest in. He’s considering giving that a chance with you.”

---

A bit more emboldened by Bucky’s reassurance, Richard nodded. “Okay, thank you, Bucky. I’m really happy I got to meet him here.” He gave him a nervous smile and went to grab the bottle. He was about to offer it to Tim when Christopher laid his eyes on it and made grabby hands.

Tim was distracted by this and laughed as he scooped him up in his arms. “No, Sweetheart. That’s not for babies. I’m sorry.” After Tim gave Steve his son back, Richard successfully managed to get invited back to Tim’s place.

---

Clint and Natasha were the last ones left after that. And Adriana wasn’t going to let them leave until she had finished discussing every turtle. But Clint didn’t seem to mind too much. Natasha didn’t either but she did look a little tired. Bucky wanted to know how things were going with them and their fight about moving in but he would just have to ask Clint later. “Steve, Baby, I’m going to go get Ya-Ya and Christopher ready for bed if you want to wait for Adriana to be done,” Bucky said and held out his free arm to transfer their son over to him.

---

Steve pouted but gave Christopher a kiss before passing him over to Bucky. After, he headed over to Adriana and knelt down. “Hey, Peanut,” he said softly. “I know you want to tell Aunt Nat and Uncle Clint all about your turtles, but Aunt Nat is pretty tired. We have to be respectful of how she feels and we can tell them more about it another time, Okay?”

---

Adriana whined and held up the last turtle. “Daddy, this is the last one. And it’s the littlest one. She won’t take long. Promise!” she pleaded and reached out to Clint and gripped his arm to keep him there. She was a fan of most of her daddies’ friends but Clint was decidedly her favorite. Christopher had picked a new favorite in Natasha for some reason. And Sarah May tended to waddle her way over to Sam the most.

---

“Peanut, how about you tell me about your littlest turtle and you can tell them later. It’s their bedtime now, Love, and they need to go home.” Steve kissed her cheek and gave the two of them a nod as if to silently give them permission to leave if they wanted. He loved how patient both were with his kids but he didn’t want to test their patience further at all.

---

Adriana gave another soft little whine but collected all her turtles up into her arms. She huffed out a sigh and started walking away from them to head to her room. “Bye-bye, Aunt Nat. Bye-bye, Uncle Clint,” she murmured and then tromped her way up the stairs, dropping a turtle a few times and picking it up again.

---

Steve followed her upstairs. “I’m really proud of you for understanding, Adriana. I know you’re upset that you couldn’t finish your story. Do you want me to read you a long story tonight since you were such a good girl about letting your aunt and uncle go home?”
Adriana just shrugged and nudged her door open with her foot. She started putting all her turtles away and getting clothes out for bedtime. “I just wanted to tell them about my ‘tuttles’,” she said solemnly, looking up at her daddy to garner some sympathy points and maybe guilt him a little bit too. “Can you cuddle with me until I fall asleep, please?”

He knew what she was doing to him and it was kind of working. “I know you did, Kiddo. But you got to tell them a lot about all of your other turtles.” He helped her change into her pajamas. “But, yes, I’ll cuddle with you. I love cuddling with my little peanut,” he said sweetly, scooping her up and putting her on her bed.

Adriana was fairly tired and she easily molded against Steve’s side and closed her eyes. “I love you, Daddy,” she said softly and closed her eyes. It didn’t take too long for her to fall asleep.

Bucky came in a few minutes later looking for Steve and he grinned over at the two of them all cuddled up. “Baby, the little ones are asleep. Time to get ourselves ready for bed,” Bucky whispered and gestured for Steve to follow him. “Your mom and I already got the babies settled and cleaned up most of our mess from our dinner.”

When Bucky came in, Steve finally snuck away from the bed. “You guys are the best,” he said quietly. “I’m going to go say goodnight to Mom and then I’ll meet you in the bedroom.” Steve leaned in to kiss him.

Bucky gave Steve’s hand a squeeze and then went to get ready for bed as well. He brushed his teeth and took his hair out of the braid before getting into a set of warm Christmas pajamas with little snowmen on the pants. He snuggled under the covers and waited for Steve to get back, eyes having a hard time staying open for very long.

Steve gave his mom a hug and kiss goodnight and brushed his teeth before finally joining his husband in bed. “Hey there, Beautiful. We had a pretty good day today, didn’t we?” He grinned. “Playing matchmaker, being with our friends. I wonder what kind of night Tim and Richard are having right now.”

Bucky yawned and pressed himself up against Steve for more warmth. “My guess is they had some of that wine and deep discussions on Tim’s couch. Then Tim initiated a make-out session. He probably asked at some point if it bothered Richard that he’s about a decade and a half older and has kids. Just because Tim is so worried that is a big turn off. And then the night was probably pretty respectful and mild. He won’t jump right into sex if he actually sees a future with someone, I don’t think.”
Steve smiled. “I think Richard is a fan of kids, so I think they’re going to get along just fine. He was surprisingly nervous about making a good impression with Tim. I remember him being a really steady kind of cop. Usually, rookies are jumpy and afraid to make calls on stuff but he was the exact opposite.” He drew Bucky closer. “I hope they make each other happy.”

---

Bucky hummed and gave Steve a couple tired little kisses. “Yeah, I hope so too. I’m still mad about it and annoyed with him in general. But if he ends up making Tim happy then I’ll have to quit complaining. At least now I know he isn’t going to have a crush on you or anything anymore,” Bucky said with a little shrug and then added, “And not me either because, apparently, I’m not attractive to him. Which is such bullshit because I’m sexy as hell.”

---

“It is bullshit,” Steve agreed. “You’re the sexiest, most attractive man I’ve ever laid eyes on. I’m always afraid I’ll have to listen to some guy hit on you any time we go to a gay-friendly place.” Steve played with Bucky’s hair. “Adriana asked me to cuddle her until she fell asleep tonight. She was trying to make me feel guilty since I let Nat and Clint leave before she could finish her story about her turtles. I’m so glad that she still wants to cuddle. I’m afraid of the age that they’ll want to be on their own more.”

---

Bucky preened and puffed up a little when Steve acknowledged his sexiness. Steve’s opinion was the only one that Bucky actually cared about after all. “She’s very clever. I think she learned that little guilt trick from Becca. She’s overheard too many conversations with Becca guilting me into letting her stay out later or do what she wants.” He sighed and tangled his fingers in with Steve’s. “I don’t think you should worry about when they grow up like that. They will still be plenty interested in cuddles and hugs and being with their daddy.”

---

“Becca needs to stop teaching her such dirty tricks. I can’t have my baby girl trying to guilt trip me so soon.” Steve squeezed their hands together. “I want to have my toddler cuddle pile one day. Sarah May is still too small to safely sleep with all of us.” She probably would hate sharing the bed with her daddies and siblings, though.

---

“She is getting bigger. Just give her some time. She’s just a pretty little one,” Bucky said and let his eyes slip closed. “Ya-Ya’s birthday is soon. We have less than two weeks and then our youngest baby will be a year old. Then Christopher will be two in February and Adriana will be five this summer. They really are growing up fast.”

---

“She is,” he agreed. “But she’s still our little Sweet Pea who’s the tiniest of the bunch.” Steve kissed the top of Bucky’s head and settled in to go to sleep at long last. “I already have some big plans for her birthday. Let’s talk more about it tomorrow. I’m sure the both of us are just about ready to sleep.”

---

Bucky fell asleep very quickly and slept soundly for a few hours until he heard a soft paddle of feet by his bed. They kept their door open half way most nights in case Adriana needed them. He rubbed his eyes and sat up. “Adriana? Honey, is that you?” he asked and looked down to see Christopher trying his best to hoist himself up near the foot of the bed. “Christopher? Did you escape your crib again?”

---

Christopher had big, fat tears rolling down his face and he was whimpering as he scrambled unsuccessfully to get on top of the bed. “Papa!” he wailed, reaching up for him.

Steve woke up almost immediately at that and, still half asleep, naturally reacted to their son and pulled him up into their bed. “What happened?” he slurred sleepily to Bucky.

---

“I don’t know, Baby,” Bucky said softly and reached to touch Christopher’s face and wipe his tears away. “I don’t know. He just came in. He must have gotten out of his crib again.” Bucky scooted closer to them and wrapped an arm around Steve and Christopher, cradling them as best as he could. “Bean, are you hurt?” he asked. “Did you fall, Baby?”

---

Christopher clung a hand onto each of their shirts and made scared, little noises. “Bad, bad doggy,” he said. Steve looked confusedly over at Diana, who’d been laying in her bed up until Christopher came in. “Doggy eat Ya-Ya,” he said in an absolutely wrecked tone before crying again.

---

“Oh, Bean. Oh, Christopher. Did you have a nightmare, Sweetheart?” Bucky asked, pain and sadness just washing over him at his son’s distress. “My poor baby boy. I’m so sorry. You’re okay now. It’s okay. I’ll go get Ya-Ya.” He slipped carefully off the bed and went to scoop Sarah May out of her crib and brought her into their room so Christopher could see. “See? See, Bean? She’s okay. Ya-Ya is just fine.”

---

Sarah May was a bit annoyed to be woken from her sleep but when she realized she was having special time with her pop, she eased up. “Ya-Ya!” Christopher gasped when he saw her. He scrambled off of Steve’s lap so he could go hug his sister. Sarah May grunted and squirmed a little.

---

Bucky gathered both babies into his arms and let Christopher hold his sister close. She tried getting out but then gave up after a bit. He sat down by Steve again and leaned against him. “I guess he’s starting to remember his dreams now. I don’t think kids usually do that until around two years old so that makes sense.” He sighed and looked to Steve for help. “I need to figure out how to change his crib so he can’t climb out.”

---

Steve rubbed Christopher’s back and gave him a sympathetic look. It must have been awful dreaming about his baby sister getting eaten. His heart broke even more when Christopher kissed her cheek and said, “Love, Ya-Ya.” Steve gave Bucky a look because their children were so precious. “At what age is he supposed to get a bed?”

---
“Around two and a half or three,” Bucky said as he gently brushed his fingers through Ya-Ya’s dark curls. “And since Adriana is so far used to being in her own room, we can have his bed in the nursery for a little longer. Becca will be moving out in a couple years anyway so he can have Lilly’s room then when she goes downstairs.” Bucky still hated thinking about his sisters and his kids all growing up. But he was getting better about handling it.

---

“Maybe we can... I don’t know, put some sort of cage over the top?” Steve asked with a nervous laugh because it sounded so dumb and a little medieval.

Christopher calmed down a lot now that he could see that his little sister was safe. He made himself comfortable in his papa’s arms. But then he turned to Diana and patted the bed. “Doggy, up.” Always ready for cuddles, Diana leaped onto the bed and forced her way between Bucky and Steve to curl up in a spot too small for her.

---

Bucky grumbled at Diana but moved away from his husband a little so she could snuggle down by Steve. “Yeah, I will have to figure out something. It just worries me that he could trip down the stairs in the dark or something like that. And I don’t like shutting their door because I can’t hear them as well.”

---

“I agree. But we do have the stair blockers to keep them from going up and down the stairs without us. Unless he decides to climb over those too.” He laid down and draped an arm over his family. “Are you causing us trouble, Bean?” Steve asked gently to their son.

---

Christopher wasn’t sure what Steve was saying so he just nodded and sniffled and pressed his cheek against Sarah May’s. She wasn’t too happy about being squished in her brother’s arms but she gave a little huff and then left it. “Should we try to get them back to their cribs? Or do you think Christopher isn’t going to let us take them back?”

---

“We should at least try to get him back. You think Sarah May would let him share her crib tonight?” He figured that would be a good compromise to get Christopher back to sleep but he also worried about having them sleep together without supervision. “Or maybe I can stay awake and let them cuddle with you while you sleep.”

---

“Um, well, I am really tired and I don’t mind having them sleep here on my chest tonight,” Bucky said with a little yawn. “But if you don’t want to stay up for a bit then we can put them back. I just don’t want Christopher to start screaming and crying the second we walk away. And he looks pretty comfortable staying right here. Ya-Ya is almost asleep again too.”

---

“You can go to sleep, Buck. I’d be getting up soon anyway, so I can stay up.” Steve pressed his lips to Bucky’s and then kissed his kids and then his dog. “Love you, Baby.” He rubbed his kids’ backs gently to get them to fall asleep.
“I love you too, Steve,” Bucky said quietly and pulled his babies a little closer to him. He checked to make sure they were both securely situated and then he pulled a blanket over their legs and held them safe as they both drifted off. He followed after them shortly and had dreams of Steve getting a second puppy and Lilly bringing home a stray cat.
Sarah May's First Birthday.

The morning of Sarah May’s first birthday on December fifteenth was loud and chaotic and messy - which was Sarah May’s least favorite environment. While Bucky dealt with Christopher crying and yelling because he couldn’t have any of Adriana’s food, Steve dealt with cleaning up the spilled orange juice and pancakes and syrup that were pushed to the ground during the start of Christopher’s tantrum. Adriana, to her credit, tried her best to help Steve mop up the juice with paper towels. And Sarah May sat grumpily in her high chair with her hands over her ears, glaring at the lot of them.

---

Usually, Steve was better at the whole damage control thing, but Christopher was an absolute terror today. His mom was out to do some grocery shopping for dinner later, so she wasn’t there to help calm her grandson with nana kisses. “I know, Sweet Pea, I know,” Steve said sympathetically to Sarah May. He picked her out of her chair and cuddled her in one arm while he cleaned with the other. “This isn’t a good start to your birthday, is it?” He looked up at Bucky. “Do you think you could try and calm him down in the nursery?”

---

“I can try,” Bucky grunted and glanced over at Steve for a second. Christopher was flailing his arms and screaming and Bucky wasn’t sure he could even get him out of his chair like that. After a few attempts, Bucky got his hands on Christopher’s arms and hoisted him up and close to his chest where the toddler pummeled his fists against him. Thankfully, Becca and Lilly were already at school. Bucky wouldn’t have been able to handle all this and Becca complaining about how annoying the babies could be.

---

“Christopher,” Steve said in a disappointed tone when he continued his tantrum and hit Bucky as he was lifted. “You can probably let him have his fit if you put him on the carpet in the nursery. If there’s nothing close by to hit, it’ll subside sooner,” Steve advised over Christopher’s wailing. He threw out the napkins and cuddled Sarah May with both arms. “Don’t worry, baby girl, you’re still going to have a fun birthday,” he promised her softly with a kiss.

---

Bucky nodded and quickly went up to the nursery with their son. Once he didn’t have much of an audience anymore, Christopher stopped hitting and trying to get free and just kept up the crying and wailing. Bucky cradled him for a little bit, just letting him cry against his chest and say, “Papa, why?” a couple times through hiccups. After that, he had tired himself out so much he fell asleep in Bucky’s arms.

Bucky put him down in his crib so he could have a little bit more time to sleep. Maybe he just hadn’t gotten enough sleep in the night and that’s why he was so grumpy. “The set of lungs on that boy...”
Bucky mumbled as he came back to the kitchen. “Adriana, Honey, thank you for helping Daddy clean up. Do you need some more breakfast? More juice?”

---

Steve had sorted out the kitchen and brightened Sarah May’s mood by bouncing her on his hip and singing some of her favorite nursery rhymes. “Papa!” Sarah May squealed excitedly when Bucky came back and she started reaching for him.

Steve passed her over to Bucky and snuck a kiss onto his cheek. “He gets that screaming thing from you.” Steve winked.

Adriana was sitting diligently in her seat. “Can I have some more pancakes?” she asked hopefully.

---

Bucky held Sarah May up close to his face so she could touch his mouth and cheeks. She liked feeling his beard and long hair. It’s what made Papa different from Daddy. “Yeah, Peanut, I think you can have some more pancakes,” Bucky said and brushed a hand through Adriana’s hair as Sarah May grabbed a chunk of his own. “Daddy, can Adriana have some more pancakes?” he asked Steve and pointed to their daughter’s pleading face.

---

“You had enough for breakfast but I suppose a little extra treat is fine since you were such a good helper,” Steve said. “I can’t say no to those eyes.” He pulled out the extras he’d made for leftovers so they could heat them up quickly. “Buck, do you think you could keep the kids occupied after lunch today? I’m making a special dinner for our baby girl’s first birthday.”

---

Bucky gave Adriana a kiss to the top of her head and sat down with Sarah May so she could cuddle up to him for a bit. “Yeah, I can do that. Do you need us out of the house? Because we can go somewhere for a bit. Maybe we will go to the pet store and get some new toys for the animals. Diana ripped through her Bear you got her and Raphael has lost all his jingle balls.”

---

“You don’t have to go out of the house, but I won’t say no to spoiling our other children,” he said. “You know how much I love Raph having his little jingly things,” Steve said. When Diana heard her name, she came trotting up to Bucky, wagging her tail, totally expecting a treat of some sort. “I got Ya-Ya plenty of presents for her birthday but maybe she can pick something else while you’re out.”

---

Bucky reached to scratch Diana’s head and brush his thumbs over her soft ears. “Good girl, Diana,” he said and received a happy lick to his hand. “Yeah, we can do that. I’ll take them to the pet store and then the toy store or something. They can each pick something they want. How’s that sound, Adriana? You want a new toy today?” He knew that they were spending too much of their budget on new toys and things but he thought it would be okay today since it was a special occasion.

---

Diana’s tongue lolled out of her mouth happily at the attention. Bucky didn’t spoil her as much as Steve did - and Steve set that bar pretty high, so it was tough to beat. Any time she got positive attention out of Bucky, she loved it.

“I get a new toy even though it’s not my birthday?” Adriana asked excitedly. “Yes, please!”

---

“Sure, Baby, you can have a new toy today,” Bucky said and reached to tuck her hair behind her ears so she wouldn’t get it in her syrup. “But then tonight will be Sarah May’s birthday so she is going to get more gifts, okay? But when it’s your birthday you are going to get lots of gifts too. So, don’t be sad when she gets more of them tonight.”

---

“That’s okay. Daddy already told me only Sarah May gets presents today.” Adriana said. Steve gave her the pancakes at long last. “What’s Sarah May getting for her birthday?” she asked curiously. “Is she getting ‘turtles’ like mine?”

---

“No, Peanut, she’s probably not getting any turtles,” Bucky said as he gently played with Sarah May’s curly hair. She didn’t like when Christopher yanked on her hair to get her attention but she did like when her daddies brushed through it carefully. It was pretty soothing. Bucky could relate. “She’s getting some toys but also some new clothes and some other things. She’s not old enough to really have any ideas of what she wants for presents so we have to just get her what she needs until she can decide on her own.”

---

Adriana looked sad that Sarah May wouldn’t have turtles to play with her turtles. “When can she pick out her own birthday stuff?” she asked. “Can I pick out my own birthday stuff? Can we go to the penguin lady again?” Adriana asked hopefully. “And see the ‘turtles’ at the zoo?”

---

“You’re old enough to know what you want to ask for, yes,” Bucky said. “When it’s your birthday, you can just give me and Daddy a list of what you want and we will get some of it. And we can go see the turtles at the zoo soon. I promise. But, for right now, after you finish eating, let’s you and me go check out your brother and grab any towels for the laundry.”

---

Adriana scrunched her nose up. “But what if Christopher still is loud? I don’t like Christopher when he’s so loud.”

Steve laughed and moved to kiss the top of her head. “We still have to take care of our family even when they annoy us. But I am sorry that he is loud sometimes. He’s still learning and doesn’t know how to act like a big boy if he’s upset.”

---

Adriana nodded but still gave a little pout. “Back at the kids’ place, we had to be quiet. Yelling wasn’t okay unless we were outside or it was playtime.”

Bucky looked from Adriana to Steve with a worried glance. She didn’t usually mention the orphanage. She hadn’t brought it up for a long while. This was her home and her family now. He hoped she wasn’t upset or anything because it was Ya-Ya’s day and she wouldn’t be getting as much attention as her sister.

---

Steve leaned down to kiss her forehead. “I understand, Peanut,” he said gently. “Christopher shouldn’t be yelling unless it’s playtime, but we have to help him understand why yelling isn’t appropriate instead of simply knowing that it isn’t allowed. It’s hard for the people at the kid’s place to be able to do that when they have so many kids and babies to look after. And I can promise you that if you do something you shouldn’t do here, we will help you understand instead of getting you in trouble for doing it.”

---

Adriana looked up into Steve’s eyes and leaned into his chest for cuddles. “Is Christopher in trouble?” she asked curiously and looked over to Bucky.

“Well, he’s not in big trouble,” Bucky said. “He’s just in a little trouble for making a mess and for hitting me a little bit.” It wasn’t like he was hurt at all but Christopher needed to know he wasn’t allowed to pummel his Papa’s chest when he was angry.

---

Steve pulled her in close and kissed her cheek a few times. “Christopher is still a baby, so we have to be patient with him. I’m so proud of you for being such a good girl and helping out. When Christopher gets bigger, he’s going to help you out, too. It’s what family does.”

---

Adriana considered it for a moment like she wasn’t sure Christopher could be trusted to help. But then she nodded and leaned more against Steve. “Yeah, I guess so,” she said and reached to take Steve’s hand in hers. “Daddy, are we going to have cake?”

---

“Yes, we are,” Steve said with a smile. “Do you want to bake the cake with daddy tonight? I’m making it from scratch so it’s extra special for Sarah May’s birthday,” he said. “I bet she would love it if you helped decorate it,” Steve suggested.

---

Adriana’s eyes got wide and she nodded. “Yes, please. I want to help make it!” She wasn’t always enthusiastic about helping her dad make food but when it came to dessert, she was all about it. She and Christopher had strong sweet-tooths. Bucky still wished they would have waited for a bit to give their son sweets.

---

Steve grinned and picked her up. “Perfect. I’ll be sure to call you when it’s cake time.” He kissed her cheek before setting her back down. “Why don’t you make a birthday card for your sister? You can write something that you love about her. What do you think, Buck?”

---

“Yeah, I like that,” Bucky said with a happy smile to Adriana. “You can write what you can and maybe have Daddy help with what you don’t know.” He passed Sarah May over to Steve and added, “And, while Daddy stays down here, Papa is going to go try to get Christopher again. Hopefully, he isn’t a menace anymore.”

---

Steve cuddled their birthday girl and pet his fingers through her hair. “Good luck, Papa,” Steve said with a little laugh.

When Bucky got up to Christopher’s room, their boy was already awake, escaped from his crib, and was going through the dresser drawers and casually making a mess as he explored what was inside.

---

Bucky had hoped that their boy was still asleep and being his peaceful Little Bean once again. But he was not. “Christopher...” Bucky sighed. “Why?” There were baby clothes all over the ground and blankets and plushies peppered around as well. It was official. Christopher was starting his terrible two’s a little early. It took him a second but he eventually wrangled Christopher up from the ground and into his arms. “Steve!” he shouted downstairs. “He’s made a mess of the entire nursery. I’m going to have to figure out a new thing for his crib because he keeps climbing out.”

---

“Play,” Christopher said innocently. He started to squirm and whine. “No, Papa. Down. Down!”

Steve came upstairs with Sarah May in his arms and groaned at the amount of clothes and blankets that were on the floor. “No... oh, Christopher,” he groaned in dismay. “Do you want me to watch the kids while you take care of this? Or do you want me to clean up?”

---

Bucky sighed and shook his head. “To be perfectly honest, Steve, I kind of just want to leave it for now. I want to try to wear him out as much as possible so he’s not so high strung when I take them to the store. He can nap when we get home and I’ll just clean it up as he’s falling asleep.”

---

Christopher stopped squirming so much when he saw his sister in his daddy’s arms. “Ya-Ya!” he said excitedly. “Play, Ya-Ya!” He was trying to talk over Bucky to make sure that he was heard. Sarah May knew that word by now and was getting antsy in Steve’s arms.

“Alright, let’s bring them downstairs and I’ll make sure he doesn’t rip something else apart,” Steve offered.

---

Bucky helped Steve get the kids all settled in the living room with things to play with. But his head was hurting now. “I’m going to go get some medicine, Baby. His screaming really got to me earlier. Also, I think he’s going through a phase. He keeps having these tantrums two or three times a week.”

---

“Do you think we need to give him time-outs whenever he throws his tantrums? I’m afraid he’s going to feel isolated,” Steve said with a concerned frown. Once the playpen and toys were set up,
Christopher and Sarah May happily started to occupy themselves, thankfully leaving their parents with some peace and quiet.

---

Bucky wasn’t really sure. He didn’t want their boy to feel like he was being punished unfairly or anything. He also wasn’t sure he would understand what a time-out really meant. But he also needed to learn he couldn’t act the way he did. “I don’t know. Let’s ask your mom and maybe also Tim.” Those were the only parents he knew. He wished he could ask his parents but he also kind of knew what his parents would have done. Whenever Becca or Lilly had tantrums as babies, they sang to them or played with their hands gently until they got too distracted to be upset anymore. It was effective for Becca but not always for Lilly.

---

Steve nodded. “That’s a good idea. I’m going to ask Mom what she thinks once she gets home from the grocery.”

Christopher came running over to the side of the playpen to wave a block at Bucky. “Papa! Look!” he said to get his pop’s attention and once Bucky looked over, he giggled and ran back to his little tower of blocks.

---

“I see you, Bean. I see your blocks. That’s a really good tower,” Bucky assured him and gave a little smile. “But I’m still upset that you punched me, Christopher,” he mumbled more to Steve than anyone else. He looked to Steve and shook his head. “I don’t want that to become a trend at all. Once he’s strong enough, that will hurt a lot.”

---

Steve nodded. “I want our boy to learn how to express himself in words, not fists... but as smart as he is, maybe he doesn’t know how to tell us why he’s upset so he resorts to acting out. After all, wouldn’t you get frustrated if you were upset but nobody understood you?”

---

“Yes, you know I get frustrated when people don’t understand. That happens a lot to me,” Bucky said, a little short because he was remembering all the times he and Steve fought because of their miscommunications or lack of understanding. “Do you think it’s because his biological father was such a fighter that he tends to have physical reactions to his anger?”

---

Steve frowned at the thought of Christopher inheriting traits from his father. He was such a sweet and loving boy. There was no way he could have inherited something like that. “I... I don’t think so. I mean, they never spent time with him. How would he know what they were like? Or if it’s in his genes... we can help him learn better.”

---

“Yeah, well,” Bucky said softly and leaned into Steve so Adriana wouldn’t hear him say, “Genes can have a lot to do with stuff like this. Even if I hadn’t seen my mother’s drinking problems, I would have still probably gotten there. Tendencies toward addiction can run in families and so can things like favoring physical power to handle things over rational thinking.”
Steve glanced over at Christopher, who was reciting what little of the alphabet he could to his sister for as long as she was willing to listen. “Well, we’ll help him if it comes down to that,” Steve said. “I hope he won’t have to struggle with that, though. For his sake. But, we can teach him and help him.” He didn’t know what he would do if Christopher had an addiction issue too and hurt himself from it. Heaven knows both his parents did. But, he guessed it was good that Bucky understood addiction so he could help if that ever became an issue either.

“Yeah, of course, we will help him,” Bucky promised and gripped his hand on Steve’s arms. “He’s our boy. He always has been and always will be. And we will do what we can to teach him what is right and we will do what we can to help him if any of these problems show up. I’m a good example of how things can get better. We know we can help our babies through anything that might happen in their lives.”

Steve was confident in their ability to support their son. And Bucky really was the best parent to have if they were going to have to help a child with addiction problems. “Okay, I love you, Bucky,” Steve said softly and gave him a quick kiss. Sarah came in through the door then with her arms empty, which confused Steve. “Mom? I thought you went shopping.”

Sarah grinned. “I did and you boys won’t believe what happened. Come outside!” Sarah had won a month’s worth of free shopping – with certain exclusions - and upon realizing that she could get a lot of food, she went a little crazy and had to get a taxi to fit all of what she bought. The poor driver was sitting in the seat with packages of meat spilling forward into his lap.

“Ho-ly fuck,” Bucky said and stared at the taxi driver who looked like he was three seconds from just driving off if they didn’t get all their stuff out soon. “Steve, Sarah, go back in and watch the kids and the animals. I’ll get all the stuff.” He shook his head and headed to the cabby window, holding out some extra cash. “I’ll make quick work of it, man. Thanks for waiting.”

“Papa go bye-bye?” Christopher asked in confusion when he saw Bucky go outside. Steve and Sarah were able to effectively calm the kids down from their little level of excitement. Although, Diana was very curious about what was happening.

“You mother is crazy,” the driver said as he took the money. “The bottom of the car was almost scraping the goddamn road from the weight of the food. Who buys three full hams?”

“Yeah, well, she’s Irish. She’s like to stock up on food when she can. And our meals tend to be really large anyway. This whole car of food will last us about four days.” Bucky gave a little sympathetic smile to the driver. He must have had a tough time dealing with all Sarah’s bags. “I appreciate you driving her home, though. Other cabbies might have passed her by.”

“I would’ve if I’d known how much she was bringing. The old bat waved me down and said she left
‘just a few things’ in the store. Just a few things, my ass.” He was about as annoyed as he was astounded at the sheer amount of food she stuffed in the car. When Bucky finally got everything out, the driver gave him a wave. “Merry Christmas, man.” And then he drove off.

---

Bucky stood in the snowy grass with piles of bags surrounding him. He sighed and shook his head and started hauling it all in saying, “Sarah, I hope there’s another fridge in one of these bags because we won’t have any room for all of this stuff in ours right now.”

---

“Bucky Rogers-Barnes, It’s December. Our backyard is our new fridge,” Sarah said in a matter-of-fact tone. “And you can expect plenty more where that came from. I plan on using my all-you-can-shop this month to get us enough non-perishables for at least a year and to stock the shelter for just as long.”

---

“Okay, well, Sarah Rogers, don’t expect me to help you pull Diana off your backyard hams when she goes out to pee,” Bucky said back. “But I do think stocking up the shelter will be a good idea. I can see about getting them a second fridge too. There might be room in the budget.”

---

“That’s what I’ve got Steve around for,” she answered smartly, patting her son’s shoulder.

“Whatever we would’ve spent on food will afford us a pretty good used fridge,” Steve said. “And that way maybe we can separate the living area into two spaces in the future, like older people and younger people or men and women. With two fridges, they can have their own separate spaces.”

---

Bucky agreed with a little nod and started putting food into categories of frozen, refrigerated, and cupboard food. “Sarah, do you think you got enough cracker boxes?” Bucky asked, pointing at the pile of close to fifteen different cracker boxes on the table.

---

“Give me all the sarcasm you want. You’ll be thanking me when you realize how much you won’t need to spend on groceries for the foreseeable future,” she said as she scooped up Christopher into her arms because he wouldn’t stop calling out for his nana.

---

“I am grateful. I promise. I’m just amazed by the amount of crackers you bought. I don’t think we will eat this much before they go bad.” Bucky held up a box of some fancy black pepper garlic cracker. “I mean, who is going to eat this one? I don’t like garlic and you and Steve aren’t big fans of black pepper.”

---

“I have a few friends that like those ones, so I’ll be bringing that to them the next time I go over,” she said. “I may be a food-hoarder now but I’m not a food-waster.” Sarah nodded.
Steve shook his head. “You’ll never win with my mom, Buck. I’ve had to learn that the hard way.”

Bucky didn’t consider himself quite as competitive or stubborn as the two Rogers’ but he did like to win sometimes. “Yeah, well, I’ll win one day,” Bucky muttered with a shrug and handed an apple to Adriana to munch on. “So, are we having a feast tonight for Ya-Ya’s birthday dinner?”

“Baby, you can win against me... sometimes,” Steve said with a guilty smirk because he knew he was stubborn. “We definitely are,” he added. “I was going to originally have it be just the family. But if you want to invite Clint and Nat over, since we have all this extra food to spare. Hell, even Tim and Richard. And Sam and Mary. Oh, man, it’s going to snowball - we can’t invite just one couple and not the others.”

“Okay, Steve, Honey,” Bucky said, hands up to stop him for a second. His head was still hurting and, while he was grateful that Sarah brought home so much food, it was kind of adding another stressor to him trying to figure out what to do with all of it. “First of all, I’m not certain if Tim and Richard are an official thing yet. Second, we can’t possibly have the eight of us plus two animals plus the six of them all in the kitchen to eat. That’s going to be way too many. It worked last time when we had the kids all downstairs but I don’t think we could manage fourteen people and Diana all crowded around the table.”

Steve pouted. “I think you’re going to have to make us a nice, big table for when we have friends over. Or when we have more kids.”

Adriana appeared seemingly out of nowhere and tugged on Steve’s pant leg. “Aunt Becca says no more babies right now,” she reminded - also because she wanted to have her parents’ attention as much as possible.

“I know. I’ll work on something, I guess,” Bucky said tiredly and hoisted Sarah May up from the ground and into his arms. “What do you want to do for her birthday? Because for Christopher’s we had our friends over but it was only four of them then. And we only had two babies. But if you really want to, we can maybe just have some people eat in the living room?”

“No, it’s okay... Ya-Ya doesn’t like big fusses so we may as well keep today quiet for her sake. But maybe once we get a bigger table going, we can have bigger dinner parties.” Steve directed his attention to Adriana and kissed her head. “Don’t worry, Peanut, we won’t have any more babies for a while,” he promised.

Bucky nodding and rested his cheek on Sarah May’s head carefully. He loved his babies so much. And he was so happy it was Sarah May’s first birthday. He was just feeling overwhelmed. Whether it was merited to think like this or not, Bucky had sort of subconsciously taken on the role of the head of the house. He was the one who was working and the one who was in charge of the finances. and he tended to be the one who had to refocus Steve when he had huge ideas he wanted to do that just weren’t going to work. Something inside him knew it wasn’t fair to assume that he was the leader now - especially since Steve did all the work of being a stay-at-home dad and tending to the kids, cooking, and most of the housework - but that’s how he felt.

---

Steve noticed that look in Bucky’s eyes but he didn’t understand what was bothering him, so Steve kissed him gently. “Hey, Love. Would you like to have some cuddle time with Sarah May while me and my mom start sorting out dinner?” he suggested. “I’m sure our little girl will love having some special time with her pop.”

---

“Uh, yeah, sure,” Bucky mumbled and looked to Steve for a second. “But I still need to take the kids out to the store for a bit. Even if I don’t get anything else that I was thinking about, we did promise Adriana a new toy today. And you needed them out of the house for a little while anyway.”

---

“You can still go to the store. There’s plenty of time before dinner. But now I’ve got so many options, I may not go with my original plan. You’ve got at least a good hour to relax before you have to think about going shopping with our beautiful kids.” Sarah May snuggled up against her papa’s chest.

---

Bucky kissed his daughter and held her close so she could feel safe and warm. “You can nap if you want to, Ya-Ya,” Bucky said and brushed her curls back from her eyes. “Okay, Baby, I will put on Becca’s ocean tape for the kids and sit with them for a bit.” They really liked the documentaries that Becca had about animals or the earth.

---

Sarah May cuddled with her papa and had a peaceful nap until Adriana came in to snuggle too. It woke her up but Sarah May didn’t mind since Adriana was quiet. Sarah into the room after a while and said, “Steve says that he’s going to start cooking soon. Do you want me to help get the little ones dressed to go out?”

---

“Yes, thank you,” Bucky said and got up with the birthday girl still clinging to him. “If you will help Adriana, I’ll get the babies. Christopher made a mess of all the clothes and things and I haven’t cleaned it up yet. So, I’ll have to take care of that while I dress them.” He sighed and gave Sarah a pat on the shoulder before heading upstairs.

---

“Don’t worry about cleaning up. You get the babies dressed and I’ll clean their nursery while you take them out,” Sarah said back as he walked away. She loved playing an active role in the kids’ lives, even if it meant cleaning up their messes. She took Adriana to her room and picked out a cute outfit for her to wear. She helped her get dressed and then bundled her up warmly for the outing. “You be a good girl for your papa, Okay? I’m sure you will be anyway, but your nana always has to make sure.”
“Nana, I’ll be good,” Adriana promised, moving her arms a little in her big puffy coat, looking like a purple marshmallow. “Papa said I could get a new toy.” She shuffled out of her room and to the nursery with Sarah following behind her. “Papa! Nana got me ready,” she said and then looked up at her. “Would you like a new toy? I can pick you one.”

Sarah smiled lovingly down at her granddaughter. “That’s very sweet of you, but I don’t need any toys. What I would like is for you to show me whichever toy you picked out at the store today, alright? Nana loves hearing about your day.” She kissed Adriana’s cheek and then walked over to Bucky. “Do you have everything handled here? Anything else I can do to help?”

Bucky had managed to get the babies both dressed and sitting in their cribs to wait. He had started to clean up what he could and also found some of Diana’s dog treats in the closet where it looked like she had decided to make a little nest and hoard things. “No, I’m okay. I’m going to take them to the store and then I’ll be back once Steve is done cooking. Are you sure you don’t need anything?”

“No, Papa. ‘Dat’s’ doggy’s,” Christopher corrected from his crib as Bucky cleaned out Diana’s hoard of stuff. Clearly, she had witnesses to her little habit.

Sarah smiled and shook her head. “I’m sure,” she said. “Stay warm. It’s cold out there. And don’t be too late. I don’t want our birthday girl tired out too soon.”

Bucky gathered all his kids and got Sarah May and Christopher in a double stroller with Adriana walking close beside them. They were out for a while, going to a few stores and then briefly to the park so Adriana could feed some old bread to the winter birds. By the time they got back, Adriana was tiredly waddling into the house, clutching to a plush dinosaur that was about three-fourths her size. Christopher was, thankfully, asleep and snuggling his new toy. And Sarah May was happily, quietly babbling to Bucky the best that she could about whatever was on her mind. “Steve, Baby, we’re back,” Bucky said softly once they were inside.

“Perfect timing! I just put the bread in the oven, dinner will be ready in about thirty minutes,” Steve called out from the kitchen. He walked over to greet his family and gasped when he saw Adriana with her new toy. “Wow, Peanut! Your papa really treated you to such a nice toy!”

Adriana was so sleepy from their day that she could only muster a little smile and a nod. Bucky helped her out of her coat and let Steve work on getting the babies out of the stroller. “We had a pretty reasonable day out,” Bucky informed Steve. “They actually behaved really well in the toy store and Christopher didn’t try to get out of the stroller too many times. I was flirted with by a couple ladies at the cafe when I was getting coffee. So, that was interesting.”
“I can see why you were flirted with,” Steve said as he ran a hand over Bucky’s back. “You’re a gorgeous man and it’s always a turn on to see someone being a good parent. What did they say to you?” he asked out of curiosity.

---

Bucky chuckled and gave Steve a quick kiss before pulling back again to take off his coat. “They said ‘Oh, your kids are so adorable.’ So, I thanked them and they asked where their mother was. I told them they didn’t have a mother and then I got simultaneous remarks of, ‘Oh?’ with sly grins to match.”

---

Steve laughed. “Already jumping into your non-existent wife’s place,” he said with an amused huff. He sidled closer to Bucky and moved to kiss his neck a few times but Sarah May started to whine quietly when her dad was stealing her pop’s attention from her.

---

Bucky hummed at the warm, gentle kisses from Steve. But their daughter wanted him and it was her birthday so he pushed Steve back just the slightest bit. “Sorry, Baby. Ya-Ya wants me right now. And it is her birthday. But, tonight, once everyone is asleep, you can pick up from here, okay?”

---

Steve pouted but he couldn’t get upset when their baby girl wanted some love. “Papa,” Sarah May said then snuggled against his chest.

“She’s such a little cuddle bug,” Steve said. “I’m going to go check on the bread and set the table.”

---

Bucky snuggled his daughter and whispered to her in as much Hebrew as he could manage to tell her how important she was to him. It wasn’t long until dinner was all set on the table and they were ready to eat. Bucky had himself situated between Christopher and Sarah May because Christopher kept trying to push his sister around. He was getting upset that she was getting more attention than him. “Christopher, you need to calm down. You’re not going to get cake if you keep this up.”

---

Adriana may have been a little upset over Sarah May getting all the attention, but she had her new dinosaur plushie to distract her. “He’s getting worse with his temper tantrums,” Becca said with a bit of disapproval. “Is he going to grow out of it or is it something he has to be taught to stop?” Christopher threw his spoon on the floor with a big pout when Bucky used his not-happy tone with him.

---

Bucky sighed and rubbed his eyes before picking up the spoon and setting it away from his son. “I’m not sure. We are working on it. He’s almost two. The ‘terrible two’s’ isn’t just a joke. You and Lilly both went through it. I’m guessing he is going to just be difficult this year and hopefully, he will even out.”

“Spoon! Papa! Spoon!” Christopher yelled and reached out as far as he could to try to get the spoon.
Sarah May’s lower lip jutted out at the constant yelling and her eyes started to tear up. Steve quickly grabbed the spoon to calm Christopher down before Sarah May would get upset more. “I’ve been trying to get him to be more patient. But asking a toddler for patience is like asking the sun to stop shining. It just won’t happen,” Steve said.

“Even the sun is hidden behind clouds sometimes,” Becca muttered and stared at Christopher for a second.

“Yeah, well, he’s a baby, not a planet. The same rules don’t always apply,” Bucky said back with an exasperated sigh. “Bean, please, just be calm for a couple more hours on your baby sister’s birthday. Please.”

“The sun is a star, not a planet,” Becca corrected under her breath.

Christopher waggled his spoon at his dad as he squirmed in his high chair. “No, Papa, play. Playtime.” Steve looked conflicted on what to do and turned to his mom for help.

“I would give him exactly what he wants. Sit him in his pen and let him play on his own. He’ll realize soon enough that the rest of his family is having a better time than he is,” Sarah said.

Bucky ignored Becca and looked from Sarah to Steve and then nodded to his husband. “Yeah, sure. Let’s try that,” he said and got Christopher out of his high chair. “Steve, you want to take him? Ya-Ya has been trying to get more noodles from me for about five minutes. She’s getting pretty grumpy as it is with Christopher making so much noise.”

“Sure.” Steve felt a little bad about isolating their son but they were only a room away. He stood up and picked up their son so he could carry him into the playpen in the living room. “Alright, Bean. You’re going to have to play on your own over here because you’re being rude,” he said. “When you behave yourself, you can come back and have fun with Ya-Ya and your aunts and your nana.”

Christopher seemed far too distracted by his toys to really care that his dad left to go back to dinner. He would realize soon enough that he was alone and then he would whine to get out but for now he was satisfied. “Okay, Steve,” Bucky started when he came back. “Should we do Sarah May’s presents while Christopher isn’t in here to try to take them from her?”

“Definitely,” Steve said. He had a sad look on his face because Christopher wasn’t with the rest of the family but it was definitely better to not have a screaming, angry toddler around during present time. “Are you ready to open up your presents, Sweet Pea?” he asked his littlest daughter gently. He kissed her cheek. “And then we can have cake!”
“Yay, cake!” Bucky said happily to his daughter so she would get the idea that it was exciting. “Okay, let’s start with some of the fun ones since you aren’t going to really care about the clothes you’re getting.” He grabbed a squishy present and handed it to the baby. “Here we go, Baby. Can you open it?”

---

Sarah May grinned happily when her papa used his excited voice with her. She looked curiously at the present on her tray and carefully picked it up. “Who?” she asked. “Papa, who?” She pulled lightly at the paper and gasped when it tore. After a little while, and some help from Bucky, she got the hint and unwrapped the plush doll. She ooh’d and hugged it close.

---

“Oh, look! Look, she loves it.” Bucky said, pleasantly surprised about how his normally mild-mannered daughter’s face lit up. “Steve, she likes it.” Sarah May was so enamored with the plushie that she sort of ignored the other presents that her dads were trying to give her. “Maybe we should just open them for her. We can make a pile of her toys so she can see them later.”

---

Sarah May smiled at Bucky as she waved the new toy around. She seemed to really like soft things even though she usually ended up playing with blocks because that’s what Christopher wanted. “Can I open up her presents for her?” Adriana asked. “I like opening up stuff.”

---

“Yeah, Peanut, of course,” Bucky said and handed her a few that he knew were just clothes. He wanted to open the toys so he could show them to Sarah May. “Adriana, Baby, have we told you how we got Sarah May? It’s a good story. I’m sure your daddy would love to tell you.”

---

“Did you get her from the kid’s home like me?” Adriana asked.

Steve shook his head. “Nope. We got Sarah May in a very special way almost a year ago. Your pop and I were still very sad over losing your little brother, Grant. I thought that God didn’t want us to have kids anymore. But, one night, I got a call from Father Frank asking me to come down to the church. As it turns out, a little baby girl was left at the door of the church and he wanted to know if we could open our home to her.” Steve looked to their birthday girl and smiled. “Not only did God want us to have more babies, but he wanted us to have a home of different faiths. One of your Grandpa’s friends helped us find a professor who knew where Sarah May came from. That’s how we know she’s Jewish and that’s why your pop speaks some Hebrew to her.”

---

Adriana nodded and looked to Sarah May. She was familiar with the concept of people leaving babies on the doorstep. It had happened a few times while she was at the home and she overheard the adults talking about it. “What’s Jewish mean? Am I Jewish?” she asked and looked down at herself and then to her sister to look for anything glaringly different.

---

Steve held back his laughter when he watched Adriana compare herself to her sister. “No, Honey, you’re not Jewish, as far as we know,” he explained. “We know where she comes from, so we want her to know the culture that her mommy and daddy came from. Culture means what kind of traditions a group of people have and things like that.”

“So, why’s Papa say things to her that I don’t get?” Adriana wondered. She had been working with Steve to learn sign language and they were both improving but she wasn’t sure why she wasn’t learning Hebrew too. “I want her to talk to me too. I want to speak like her,” she said, thinking Sarah May was only learning Hebrew and not English.

“Sarah May can still talk to you, Peanut. She’s going to learn English and sign language just like you and Christopher,” Steve said. “But if you want to learn Hebrew, too, so you can share her culture, then I’m sure your papa won’t mind. I’m okay with that.”

Bucky nodded and reached to give Adriana a kiss on her forehead. “Of course, you can learn it too, Peanut, if you want to. I’m still working on learning, but I can teach you what I know,” Bucky said and looked back to Sarah May. “Or, if you want to learn a different language, you can. We can see about some classes for kids to teach Spanish or French or something.”

“Some of the kids at the home ‘spoke’ Spanish,” Adriana said. “How hard is it to learn Spanish?”

Steve was a bit nervous to get them classes outside of the home but he didn’t think it was a bad idea. Having them get classes outside of school would let them learn how to study with kids other than their siblings. But he really wanted to do homeschooling only for as long as he could.

Bucky gestured with his hand vaguely as he said, “They spoke Spanish, Adriana. Not ‘spaked’.” He knew she got a little upset sometimes when she was corrected but he also wanted to get her to learn the right words so he figured it was better just to do it. “I think learning Spanish would be pretty easy. You are just a kid and still working on English and sign language so I think adding another language wouldn’t be too hard.”

“No, Papa, it’s ‘spaked’. You’re supposed to add ‘E-D’ at the end when you already did it,” Adriana said stubbornly, a little annoyed by the correction. She really was a little extra sensitive to having her grammar corrected. “Maybe I should learn Spanish and not English anymore. Then no one will tell me how to talk,” she added, voice louder and grumpier.

Bucky looked to Steve and then squatted down by Adriana so he was looking up at her in her chair. “Adriana, please don’t raise your voice at me,” he said firmly but not harshly. “It is ‘spoke’. Some words don’t have ‘E-D’ when you already did them. Sometimes it’s different. I only tell you when it’s wrong because I want you to get better at it. And any teacher you might have to learn Spanish will do the same thing.”
Adriana looked a little hurt when Bucky was firm with her. She didn’t like being in trouble but, unlike Christopher, she knew that she was in trouble because of something she did instead of thinking that her parents were unreasonable. She also took any sort of scolding a bit too hard. Adriana got quiet and didn’t say anything for a little while but then asked, “Can I go to my room now?”

---

Bucky sighed quietly and brushed Adriana’s hair back from her face. He knew he had made her sad but he also knew she would bounce back quickly. He would just let her have some time and then talk to her later to make sure she knew he wasn’t angry with her. “Yes, Peanut. Tell your sister ‘happy birthday’ and give your Daddy a hug then you can go to your room for a while.”

---

Adriana slid out of her chair. “Happy birthday, Ya-Ya,” Adriana said half-heartedly. She went over to give Steve a hug.

Steve kissed the top of her head and whispered, “Your papa and I love you lots. We’ll save some cake for you.” He frowned with concern as Adriana went upstairs.

Once she was out of earshot, Lilly crossed her arms. “She’s so dramatic. She gets that from Steve’s side of the family,” she half-joked.

---

“Can it,” Bucky mumbled and shot his sister a look. “You’re not so good on taking correction yourself. Matter-of-fact, I don’t think anyone in this family is. She’s just getting tired of being told she’s saying things wrong.” He was getting pretty frustrated at how the day turned out. It was pretty amazing that Sarah brought home all the food that she did and it was nice that Sarah May was happy with her new toys. But Christopher acting out and Adriana walking off made him pretty upset. He also didn’t think Steve was giving much input on how he was handling their kids and Bucky just didn’t want him to say anything later about how Bucky should have handled it differently.

---

Sarah May was starting to get a little bored of her new doll and started wiggling to try and get Bucky’s attention again. Steve could tell that Bucky was getting worked up, so he quickly moved to pick up their youngest and passed her over to Bucky. “She probably wasn’t corrected at the orphanage like that and it can be a little embarrassing for her. She gets upset at me, too,” Steve reassured, giving Bucky a kiss on the cheek. “She’s going to be fine soon enough.”

---

Bucky held Sarah May close and rocked her gently. He knew Steve was probably right. The orphanage probably just did their best but having so many kids around would have been difficult for a structured learning environment. He just hoped she realized that he didn’t say it to be mean. It was just to help her. “It’s okay, Steve. Thanks,” Bucky said quietly, trying to dismiss the whole thing so he didn’t dwell on it. “Let’s have cake and then I think it’s bath time for the kids.”

---

Sarah got up so she could get the cake out and spare Bucky and Steve from having to juggle yet another task. “It’s also common for kids who didn’t have a stable environment to have low self-confidence,” she said. “She’s only lived here for a few months and she needs time to adjust before she’s able to handle criticism in a healthy way.”

---

“Uh-huh, I understand,” Bucky murmured and rested his head against Sarah May’s. He kissed her curly hair and waited to be handed a small slice of cake and a fork to feed her with. “Okay, Sweet Pea, birthday cake time. But this is all you can have and then it’s bath time.” He looked to Steve as he was helping pass cake to the girls. “Should we let Christopher have cake or no?”

---

Steve turned to look at their son, who was standing at the gate of his playpen, watching them from afar to see what they were doing. As soon as Steve locked eyes with their son, Christopher waved. “Daddy,” he called over.

Steve walked over to scoop up their little boy and cradled him on the way over to putting him in his high chair. “Isn’t it so nice to be with your family, Bean?”

---

The rest of the evening seemed to go by pretty much without incident. Christopher behaved and ate his cake without getting too messy and all the kids sat through their baths pretty well. Adriana was the only one who was still upset by bedtime. “Steve, I’ve tried everything to get her to be happy again. She’s still so upset with me,” Bucky whispered to his husband a few feet away from Adriana’s door. “Can you please go try?”

---

Steve felt bad for Bucky and he nodded his head. “Sure thing, Babe,” he promised. He walked into Adriana’s room and took a seat on the edge of her bed. “Hey, Peanut,” He said gently. “You want to snuggle with your daddy for a bit? We missed you tonight. There’s still some cake for you that you can have tomorrow.”

---

Adriana was curled up in her bed with one big turtle under her arm and the side of her face mashed into her pillow. She wore a big pout and seemed to pretend not to hear Steve for a bit. But after a few moments, she sat up and wiggled over to lean against Steve. “Can I have cake for breakfast?”

---

Steve worried at first that she was too upset at them but he smiled when she gave in and snuggled. He wrapped an arm around her and kissed her head. “You can’t have cake for breakfast, but you can have cake after breakfast,” he said. “How come you didn’t want to have cake with the family today, Peanut?”

---

Mumbling something indiscernible, Adriana burrowed further into Steve’s side and stayed there for a while. She didn’t cry but she did tear up a few times before eventually emerging again to gasp in air softly and whisper, “Papa thinks I’m stupid.” She rubbed her eyes and squeezed her turtle harder and pet her hand down its soft back.
Steve was quick to try to dry her tears. “Oh, Peanut. Papa does not think you’re stupid.” He cuddled her closer and nuzzled the top of her head. “You’re still learning, Kiddo, he was just trying to help. Just because you made a mistake talking doesn’t mean you’re stupid.”

“He yelled at me,” Adriana said with a sniffle and looked up at Steve. Bucky hadn’t really yelled, he wasn’t much of a yeller at all. But to a child, even firm tones could come across as anger. Adriana was used to being in the orphanage and pretty much being ignored unless she did something really bad. Here, however, she had two dads, a nana, and two aunts watching her near constantly. She was still getting used to everything she did having corrections or consequences or something like that.

“He didn’t yell, Peanut, he was only correcting you,” Steve said. He pulled her onto his lap and kissed her cheek. “We’re going to correct you if you make a mistake talking, but that’s so you can get even smarter than you already are. Turtle scientists have to know so much! And it’ll be easier to read and understand if you know how to say all the right words,” he said. “I bet if I called your papa in here right now he’s going to agree that you’re so smart.”

Even though she was doing really well in her new home, it was still somewhat of a transition period for her. She was comfortable in her family and she trusted her dads more than anything. But from time to time, she wanted some peace and quiet and some moments alone. She struggled a little in Steve’s lap to adjust, not wanting to be held so much at the moment. “I want to sleep now, please.”

Steve’s heart sunk a little when he failed to get Adriana to feel better about herself. “Alright, Peanut,” He said. Steve let her go so she could wiggle her way under the blankets. “Do you want me to get Diana to come in here so you can cuddle with her? Or do you want to sleep with just your turtles?” he asked as he stood up.

Adriana thought for a moment and then moved some turtles over to make a place for the dog. “Yes, ‘turtles’ and Diana,” she said and gingerly pulled her blanket up over her shoulders and gave a little sigh. “I love you, Daddy,” she added as a little apologetic afterthought. “Night, night.” She was sorry for leaving family dinner but she also needed some time by herself.

Steve tucked her in and kissed her forehead. “I love you too, Peanut. Hopefully, your papa and I can make tomorrow better.” He called in Diana and got the dog settled before heading out to catch up with Bucky. “She was still down in the dumps, but I think she just needs a little space.”

Bucky had waited out in the hall for Steve. He hadn’t really heard anything they said but he could tell from Steve’s face that it didn’t really go well. “Should I have just let her be?” he asked, his voice heavy and gruff, frustrated at himself for making Adriana so upset on a special day like Sarah May’s birthday.
“Yeah. I think she’s a little overwhelmed. She went from having barely anyone giving her attention to a houseful of people guiding her,” Steve observed. “She feels like you raised your voice at her, but I think she doesn’t know better and is a little sensitive right now. Tomorrow can be a better day.”

---

“Should I go... should I go say anything to her?” Bucky asked tentatively. He just wanted her to be okay. He hated when any of his kids were upset at him for something like this. He used to get really mad at himself when he first got guardianship of the girls because he would often do something his parents wouldn’t have to discipline and it would backfire and cause a big scene with his sisters.

---

Steve shook his head. “If you want, maybe you can sneak a little ‘I love you’ note under the door. But I think she wants to be alone. She didn’t even want to cuddle with me,” he said. He cupped Bucky’s face and drew him in for a kiss. “Don’t feel too bad, Buck. If she doesn’t learn now, it’s only going to get harder.”

---

Bucky nodded and wrapped his arms around Steve. Adriana might not want to cuddle but Bucky certainly did. “Okay, yeah, I might do that before she wakes up,” he said and gripped his hands in Steve’s shirt. “The babies are asleep. The girls are watching a movie and doing a puzzle. And your mom is doing something to prep dinner for tomorrow. Apparently, the roast needs to sit in the crockpot all night.”

---

Steve leaned into Bucky’s chest and nuzzled his neck affectionately. “Do you want to talk to my mom at all about Adriana?” he asked. “She’s going to be a while with prepping and she may appreciate the company.” It would be nice to get her perspective on what a good plan to take would be.

---

All Bucky really wanted to do was lay in bed and just stare at the ceiling. He didn’t feel good and his head hurt a bit and he was ready to fall asleep. But Steve probably had a good point and Sarah had more experience raising her one son his whole life than Bucky and Steve had yet with their kids. “Yes, sure. Let’s go ask her. You’re right. She might have good advice.”

---

Steve took Bucky by the hand and walked him back down to the kitchen. Sarah was in the middle of swearing at the crockpot for giving her trouble and looked a bit embarrassed that they walked in on her in a moment without composure. “Oh... I apologize, I didn’t see you there,” she said primly.

---

Bucky’s eyes flashed and he had to hide behind Steve a second so she wouldn’t see his big grin. He never saw her disgruntled or frustrated. She was the definition of decorum, in his eyes. It was pretty humorous to hear her swear. “Sarah, do you want me to help you?” he asked and gestured at the crockpot that used to belong to his mother. It was old but it was still doing its job. It was just a bit difficult to work with.
“Please,” Sarah said in a resigned voice. “I’ve never met anything so stubborn since my son.” She flicked the outside of the pot and stepped aside to give Bucky room to take care of it. Steve leaned his hip against the counter and nodded at Bucky as if to silently tell him to ask his mom a question.

---

Bucky concentrated on the crockpot for a second and then looked over at Steve and gave him a look that he should ask Sarah instead. Bucky had a hard time going to her for help, occasionally. He tried to pretend he didn’t, but it just reminded him that he couldn’t ask his own parents. Also, he was focused on the crockpot right now too.

---

Steve was mildly offended, but that was a conversation for another time. “Ma, what did you used to do when I was mad at you for something that wasn’t your fault?” he asked.

Sarah looked over and shrugged. “I’d try to make you understand and if it didn’t work, I’d try to not let it get to me too much. But it usually ate away at me until you were happy again.”

---

Now that the conversation was opened up, Bucky felt comfortable enough to join in. He got the crockpot started and set the lid securely on top so it would heat all night. “I think I’m going to have a hard time learning to not let it get to me,” Bucky admitted as he turned back to face Sarah again. “Adriana is still sad about earlier. And I know I wasn’t mean to her but it feels like I fucked up.”

---

Sarah gave Bucky a sympathetic glance. “Our kids have a magic power that makes us feel invincible but also as awful as you’ve ever felt. Our hearts lie in their care just as much as theirs lie in ours.” She reached out and squeezed Bucky’s shoulder. “You didn’t mess up. What you did was right, but she’s going to feel the way she feels and you have to let her come to her own senses sometimes.”

---

Bucky nodded and reached to take Sarah’s other hand in his and give it a grateful squeeze. “I just worry so much. You know? I’ve been helping raise kids since Becca was born but I’ve never felt like I’ve figured out the right way to handle anything. I just feel like I’m going to ruin their lives.” It wasn’t anything he hadn’t said to Steve a thousand times. He was pretty open about his fears with him. He just knew it wasn’t getting any better as time went on.

---

“Only a bad parent would think that they hold all the right answers to parenting and raising their children,” she said. “You are doing so well, Bucky. And I’m so proud of the person you’ve become for your family. Your children will see that, even if they don’t always show it.”

---

Bucky nodded and tucked his hair behind his ears. He understood that Sarah was right. And he did believe her. It was just that he could do so well for a while and then one misstep or unforeseen outcome could cause him to doubt all of it. He sighed and pulled Sarah in for a hug. “Thank you,” he said and pulled back after a few seconds. “I think I just need reassurance from time to time.”
Sarah hugged her son-in-law back and gave him a kiss on the forehead. “Everyone does,” she said. “I would bother my coworkers all the time since I didn’t have my husband or my parents to talk to. I would write letters to my dad, but it would take weeks to get advice, so that never really gave me the timely solution that I needed.”

---

Bucky wasn’t sure what it was but hearing Sarah talk about how alone she was with raising Steve made him well up with tears. He had been in a similar position with his sisters except that they were older than Steve had been when Sarah lost her husband. But Bucky understood the feeling of not having someone to go to for help so immediately. And he wished all the time that he could have his parents around to help him learn how to do this right. He was a young dad and so was Steve. There was so much they needed to know. Bucky sniffled and wiped his eyes, feeling far too emotional to really say anything else except a choked, “I’ll be in bed, Steve...” before he turned to leave.

---

Steve frowned when he saw Bucky get upset. “I’ll be there soon, Buck,” he said softly, giving Bucky’s hand a squeeze. He would let him have a bit of space before he went to join him. He lingered in the kitchen with his mom for a bit before heading up to see Bucky “Hey, Babe. You alright?” he asked.

---

Bucky’s initial thought when he went upstairs was to pull his photo album out and look at pictures of his parents. But he knew that would just make him more upset. He just wanted to move past it for now and get some sleep. So instead, he just laid down on the bed and stared up at the ceiling, trying to drain any and all thoughts from his head. “I’ll be okay in a bit,” Bucky replied quietly, glancing over at Steve for a fleeting moment.

---

Steve stripped down to his boxers and slid into bed with Bucky. He wrapped an arm around his middle and pulled his husband against his chest. “I’m sorry you’re having a rough night tonight, love,” he said gently. “Today was supposed to be a fun day and it kind of got mucked up, didn’t it? We have bad luck sometimes, but we also have been so blessed as well.”

---

Bucky was more than happy to mold to Steve the second he got him close. He nestled his head in the crook of Steve’s neck as he took in a shaky breath. “I wish they were here,” he muttered and let real, big tears fall down his face. He just wanted his parents around too so he could ask their thoughts on everything as well as Sarah’s. It wasn’t even that he disagreed with what Sarah suggested, he just wished he could hear what Old George would have had to say about it. He probably would have wanted to try to have a deep discussion with Adriana about Bucky’s intentions in his teaching and inevitably bore her. That was his style.

---

Steve held Bucky strongly against his chest and kissed the top of his head. “I know, Sweetheart,” he said. “I’m sorry that your parents aren’t here for you in person. But I know that you’d be making them proud every day. Your dad would have loved taking you and Christopher off to Seneca for the weekend just for some quality time with the boys. And I’m sure your Ma would have been fast friends with my mom. Although, that would be quite a lot of people in own house so I’m sure we would all bicker from time to time.”

“They would have loved you and all our babies. It would have been perfect,” Bucky said softly, a little gasp on his lips. “They would still be in this house with the girls. But we would probably be at a new place because our apartment was too small anyway. Your mom would still live with us and the kids. It would be a challenge to keep my dad from spending all day at home with you and the babies while I’m at work. He wouldn’t want to be away from his grandchildren for longer than a day at a time.”

“I bet your dad would’ve been able to make Christopher calm even on his most hellish days,” he said. “Your dad seems like such a level-headed and calming person from all the stories you and other people have told me.” Steve pet his fingers through Bucky’s long hair. “Our kids have so many people who love them.”

That was definitely true. Old George never raised his voice and he was always quick to reassure his kids and get them calmed back down. Even after he got injured and had his disability, he was still the first one up out of his chair to go find the crying baby and fix the problem. “You two would have really gotten along. And he knew me so well, too. I think he would have liked being able to pass along his stories and knowledge and advice about me to you. He definitely would have been a big help when you were trying to get me to stop drinking.”

“I would’ve loved to be the new keeper of adorable baby Bucky stories,” he said. “Sometimes I’m a little jealous that you don’t have a secret older sibling to give me those kinds of stories,” he said. “I know how much you miss your parents and you know how much I’d love to have them here, but... you got through your drinking without them. Which means you’ll be able to face whatever challenge you have without them, too.”

Bucky shook his head and gave Steve a little kiss to hush him up. “Steve, I got through my drinking because of you. I wouldn’t have been able to be sober without you helping me and pushing me when I wouldn’t push myself. My dad got me through my cocaine problems and you got me through my alcohol problems. I wouldn’t have been able to kick either of those by myself.”

“I helped, but only you had the power to change,” he said. “I know that you would’ve been able to do it. I have so much faith in you as a person, as a father, as a husband... and you deserve every last ounce of that faith.” Steve drew Bucky in for a slow kiss so his mouth would be too occupied to argue with him.

Bucky would have argued too if it weren’t for how meaningful and warm the kiss was. He hummed against Steve and pushed him over on the bed a little so he could crawl over him just a bit. It was so cold out right now and the house wasn’t much better that Bucky couldn’t really get out from under the warm blankets. But he was going to lay on Steve as best as he could with what he had.
Steve held Bucky close and snuggled his husband until they both fell asleep. He loved him so fucking much and it broke his heart that he had to suffer through parenthood without his own mom or dad to ask for advice. Steve didn’t know what he would’ve done if he didn’t have his mom to go to for support and help. And it was a damned shame that their kids never got to meet them, either.
When it came time for Christmas Eve, Steve had managed to wrestle a collar onto Raphael that had jingle bells on it and Diana was wearing little antlers with a resigned look on her face. Steve had their little babies dressed as elves and Adriana was wearing a cute, red dress with white trim and a black belt to resemble Santa Claus. Dinner was cooking and Steve had a Christmas record playing to really set the mood. “Buck?” he called out from the kitchen. “Can you help me prepare the cookie dough?”

---

Bucky had been trying his best to keep the animals and Christopher from taking ornaments off the tree. They specifically put baby-safe ornaments on the bottom half but he was still worried that something would happen and a glass one would shatter and hurt someone. “Becca, watch the tree, please,” Bucky muttered and tossed her the box of fudge as incentive before heading over to Steve. “What kind of cookies are you making?” he asked and looked around the kitchen that was full of food and, frankly, kind of a wreck.

---

“Christopher, those aren’t toys!” Becca scolded as she stole back an ornament from her nephew, who went running to his nana instead.

“Sugar cookies,” Steve said. “With extra vanilla flavor. I’d have done it, but this turkey has become a bit of a nightmare to cook. I haven’t cleaned up at all and Tim’s going to be here any minute with Richard.”

---

“Okay, Baby, I’ll help with the cookies. Do you want me to ask Lilly to come clean up?” Bucky slid up behind Steve and wrapped his arms around him in a big hug. He kissed his neck and hummed happily. “I love you, Steve. You’re a fantastic cook, too. So, I’m sure all of this will be perfect.” He decided that in light of how stressed Steve seemed about his kitchen - and the fact that it was Christmas Eve - he should probably not complain about how much he wished Richard wouldn’t show up.

---

Steve scoffed and stared at the turkey and then his piles of green beans and potatoes that were steaming slowly. “It’s never going to be perfect. God, I need more time. And I really want this to be the best Christmas ever. Adriana hasn’t had a proper Christmas really and this one needs to be special. It’s her first one here with us! What if it’s not good?” Steve was getting more worked up every second. He just needed all his efforts to pay off in the end.

---

“Hey, hey, Baby,” Bucky said and held up his hands to try to calm Steve down a bit. “Look at me, Steve. It’s already perfect. It’s already everything it needs to be. Adriana’s going to be so excited to see Santa again and to have her presents in the morning. Trust me. This is perfect, Steve.” He let go of him and called Lilly in from the living room. “Steve, let Lilly at least start to clean up. She’s capable. Whatever she doesn’t do to your standard, you can fix. And, Lilly, you can pick your reward for helping. Either an extra present to open tonight or you can lick the frosting bowl for the cookies. Something.”

---

Steve pouted. He liked Lilly and he trusted her with certain things. But domestic things were not on that list. He looked over to his younger sister-in-law, who scoffed at the look on his face. “I cleaned my room last week. I can clean up a few dirty dishes,” Lilly said with a wave of her hand. “And I’m totally licking the frosting bowl.”

---

“See, Steve? She can do the dishes,” Bucky said and nudged her towards the pile in the sink. He then went to the recipe for the cookie dough and started putting it together as he said, “Baby, are you going to be able to enjoy yourself at all today or are you going to be too high-tension? Because I want you to have fun today. And this is the first task you’ve given me. I can handle some more, Steve.”

---

Steve would believe that Lilly could do the dishes once he saw her actually complete the task. He started to stuff the turkey now that it was finally out of the oven. “I know you could handle more, but you were having fun with the babies and I didn’t want to take away any quality time from you.”

---

“And that’s really nice of you, Steve. Thank you. But I also really want you to have a good time too. And if having my help will make that possible, then please, give me things to do.” Bucky looked up from his mixing bowl and locked eyes with Steve. He wasn’t sure how else he could help him be less stressed today. “Everyone is going to be so happy today. You don’t have to get too worked up about all of it.”

---

Steve leaned over and kissed Bucky’s cheek. “Thank you for trying to help,” he whispered. “When you’re done with the cookie mix, could you make sure the floor is swept one more time and then set the table with the Christmas-themed dishes? I bought them last year after they were discounted after the holidays. They should be in the back of the cabinet.”

---

“Yes, Baby, of course,” Bucky agreed with a happy little smile, pleased to have gotten Steve to let up a little bit. “I think I know which ones you’re talking about.” He finished up the cookies soon enough and passed them off to Steve to be put in the oven. Then he swept the floor and set the table. It wasn’t a minute too soon, either, because there was a knock on the door then. “Santa is here!” Bucky called out as he opened the door for Tim and Richard.

---

This was the first time Adriana beat Diana to the door. “Santa is back? I want to see him!” she said excitedly as she gripped Bucky’s pant leg.

---

Richard was dressed in a set of clean navy slacks and a police-issued black sweater with his precinct title on the chest. He looked like a cop trying to fit in - which was sort of how Bucky saw him anyway. “Richard,” Bucky said firmly and mechanically extended his hand to him. “Couldn’t have at least been Santa’s elf or something?” he asked and watched Adriana drag Tim to the living room, his bag of presents slung over his shoulder.

---

“I’d rather not invite trouble. Nobody will give Santa trouble, but the elf is a magnet for it.” Richard looked over at Tim as he sat on the couch and pulled Adriana onto his lap to talk to her. “He’s so good with kids,” Richard admired. “I’m so grateful you introduced me to him. I want to be better with kids, but I’m still kind of new to it. Maybe for Easter I’ll have to dress up as the Easter Bunny. Give this whole thing a try, maybe.”

---

“Please, god, don’t do that,” Bucky requested as he shoved his hands in his pockets. Steve was still working in the kitchen which meant he had to be at least somewhat amicable with Richard. He already wasn’t doing a great job at it. “Tim is a great guy. And he... he likes you a lot. I don’t know what you plan on this relationship being but I know he’s already really invested.”

---

Richard seemed a little embarrassed when Bucky shot down the idea. He was genuinely trying even though his attempts were coming up short. “I want to ask him to move in with me after the holidays,” he admitted. “But I’m afraid he’ll feel like we’re moving too fast. And I don’t want to give his ex any more reasons to make sure his kids don’t visit him.”

---

Bucky nodded and reached out to squeeze Richard’s arm as a sign of temporary truce. “Well, she legally has to let him have them every other weekend. He is still working on getting Monday’s added, but I don’t know if he is going to win that. But, I wouldn’t worry so much about it. She’s at a bit of a disadvantage with this new baby. Tim’s lawyer is sighting her split attention between the older kids and the baby as reason to give Tim more time.” He shook his head and leaned against the wall, still watching Adriana and Christopher climbing around Tim. “I think that if you asked him to move in with you, he would do it. He would probably actually be very excited about that.”

---

“I know, but I still worry. I know how much his kids mean to him and I don’t want to risk any of that on him.” Richard laughed as Christopher tugged on Tim’s beard, almost causing the ruse to be lost. “I’m going to wait until after Christmas,” he decided. “He’s already worried enough making sure he gives his kids a good one.” Richard glanced towards the kitchen and asked, “Should I go help Steve?”
“If you want to attempt to help him, you can,” Bucky said and gestured towards the kitchen. “He’s a little particular about his kitchen but maybe he can put you to work doing something.” He moved over a bit so Richard could pass and then he grabbed his shoulder for a quick second to stop him. “Try not to stress him out any more than he is already. Got it?” He was joking around but there was a sliver of a threat to his voice as if he wanted to intimate him a little if he could.

---

Bucky successfully intimidated Richard out of helping, but he also wasn’t such a pushover that he wasn’t going to stick up for himself. And he got the feeling Bucky was still worried he was going to hit on his husband or something. “Listen, I know we got off on the wrong foot in the beginning, but I don’t know what else to do to make you see me differently.” His feathers were effectively ruffled as he pulled his shoulder away and went to help Tim manage the kids. Despite Richard’s best attempts, Christopher wasn’t really having it.

---

It wasn’t like Bucky was blind to how much of an ass he was to Richard. But he had made this bed already and he didn’t want to admit that he didn’t hate him as much as he used to. He didn’t want to admit that he was actually glad that Richard was dating Tim and making him happy. He didn’t want to officially forgive him. But it was Christmas and he really needed to lay off, if only for Tim. He just really liked holding grudges. Bucky sighed and popped back to the kitchen quickly. “Hey, Babe, are you almost done? You should go watch your babies and Santa. They are having so much fun.”

---

Bucky happened to come in when Steve had his hand all the way inside the roasted turkey, looking like he was fisting the damned thing. “I lost my wedding ring while stuffing the turkey,” he whined. Everything else looked ready - the table was set and the food was out and waiting to be eaten. The only thing left was the turkey.

---

Bucky blinked and stared at the scene in front of him. It would have been comical if it weren’t such a problem. “Oh, Steve...” Bucky mumbled with a sigh and came over to his husband slowly. “Okay, Baby, are you sure it’s not just somewhere else in the kitchen? Maybe it came off when you washed your hands. Maybe it fell and one of the kids picked it up. Are you sure you didn’t take it off when you started cooking?”

---

“I never take it off,” Steve said. “My ring is definitely up this turkey's ass.” He pulled his hand out with a grimace and passed Bucky the bird. “Should I just cut it open? I don’t want to ruin the presentation of the food, but I don’t want it at the risk of someone eating my wedding ring.” He went to the sink and washed his hands off. “God, this is a nightmare. It shouldn’t be. But it is. I can’t wait to sit down and eat and relax,” he complained, burying his face in Bucky’s shoulder.

---

“First of all,” Bucky started and turned around to face Steve. “Give me a kiss and take a few deep breaths.” He pulled Steve close into a hug and brushed his fingers through his hair before giving him a gentle kiss. “It’s going to be okay. You have an entire bowl of extra stuffing. So, here’s what we are going to do. Let’s cut the turkey up and put it all in a heap on a fancy plate. Then we can scoop out the stuffing with an ice cream scoop and make and circle of stuffing around the turkey. It’ll look like how they present food at a fancy restaurant.”

---

Steve’s look of complete distress was washed away when Bucky laid out the plan, which was a pretty damned good plan. “Right… Yeah, that’s actually perfect. Let’s do that,” he agreed. He drew Bucky in for another kiss and started to slice up the turkey, already looking hopefully inside for his ring.

---

Bucky stayed right by Steve the whole time as he did surgery on the turkey. He was watching closely to see if he spotted the ring. “You know, Babe, you should have called me in here before you started feeling inside the turkey. You know I’m better at fisting than you are, I might have been able to find it faster,” he joked and glanced up at Steve to make sure he wasn’t in so much stress that the joke just pissed him off instead.

---

“Yeah, but you don’t fist my ass looking for treasure,” Steve snorted, smiling a little. He let out a great noise of relief when he finally found his ring packed deep into the stuffing. “Thank God!” he gasped. Steve crossed himself and sent up a little prayer. “From now on, this ring goes in my pocket when I cook.”

---

Bucky chuckled and leaned over to kiss Steve’s cheek, grateful beyond belief that they found the ring quickly. “Get yourself cleaned up. I’ll do the stuffing,” he said and grabbed the ice cream scooper to start making round blobs of stuffing around the turkey. It wasn’t the most attractive looking dish but it would suffice. “How about when you cook, you give your ring to me, Love? You don’t usually let me cook with you so I’ll keep it safe.”

---

“Well, we’re supposed to give our rings to each other when we’re mad. I don’t want to confuse being mad with needing to cook,” Steve said. “Don’t worry. I promise I won’t lose my ring in our food ever again.” Steve called everyone in for dinner once it was on the table. Santa had to excuse himself to go visit other houses and Tim came back a few minutes later.

---

Bucky played it up when Tim came into the kitchen with a big laugh and, “Hey! Buddy! You made it. You just missed Santa. That’s too bad. Maybe next year, huh?” Adriana seemed to buy it and she said hello to her Uncle Tim without any sign that she had figured it out yet. “Steve spent all day cooking so I’m guessing this is going to be the best Christmas Eve meal any of us have ever had,” he added, trying to build Steve up a little after the ring fiasco.

---

“Aw, man! I missed Santa? But I wanted to tell him what I wanted for Christmas,” Tim said in an overexaggerated huff, shaking his head. “Maybe next year,” he agreed. He took a seat and wrapped an arm around Richard.

“My stomach has been growling since I walked in because it all smelled so good,” Richard complimented. Steve blushed at that and settled down next to his husband, finally ready to relax.
Bucky tucked his hair behind his ears and looked around the table to make sure all his kids were present and those who needed high chairs were secured in them safely. “Go ahead and pray, Steve. Lilly and Richard both look like they might disintegrate if they don’t eat soon.” Bucky smiled over at Richard, hoping that his attempts at being friendly were coming across that way.

Steve made sure his prayer was quick so everyone would be able to dig in right away. “Papa,” Adriana said. “Is Santa going to come back later? He didn’t eat any of the cookies we made for him.”

“Well, Peanut, he’s got to go visit some other kids. But while you are asleep tonight, he will come back and eat the cookies and bring more presents,” Bucky said. “He won’t forget to eat the cookies. Don’t worry. He also said that you all get to open one present tonight. Just one. Tomorrow morning you can have the rest.”

Tim smiled fondly at Adriana. “Do you want to tell your dads what you asked Santa for Christmas? I heard it was a good one.” She shook her head shyly. Tim winked at Bucky to let him know that he had a good story to tell him later.

Bucky eyed Tim and then Adriana, wondering what she was so shy about asking for. If it was another dog, Bucky was going to need a lot of convincing first. “Well, Adriana, Santa might be able to get you whatever it was,” he assured her and split a dinner roll into bits for Sarah May to eat. He couldn’t believe that a year ago they got this beautiful baby girl. It felt like he had known all his kids for eons. “Steve, I don’t think Richard knows how we got all our babies, if you want to tell him about it.” He was trying to start a conversation with Richard, sure. But he also really just wanted to reminisce too.

Sarah May waved her hands excitedly as she saw Bucky get her food ready. “Well... first was Christopher. I was on a narco call to do a bust and we bagged these repeat offenders that’d been giving us a hard time for a while. But they left behind a little baby boy that wasn’t even hardly ten pounds and he was a couple months old at that time,” he said. “His next of kin didn’t want the responsibility, so she signed him over to me officially.” He turned to Christopher and playfully ruffled his hair. “Finders keepers.”

Bucky loved that when Steve talked about past cases or anything having to do with his time as an officer, he always spoke the way he would have then. He got to see him slip into that version of himself that was still so raw and familiar to him. He knew Steve missed that life.

Richard listened intently and nodded as Steve spoke. “I think I heard about that from someone. The guy socked Bertinelli in the mouth, right? Broke his nose and his jaw?”
Steve nodded. “That’s the one. He and his girl are serving a life term, so I packed up little Christopher into the police cruiser and took him home. He was quiet as a mouse and so tiny. I was afraid he’d grow up sick and timid, but all that worry was for nothing.” He smiled happily at his son. “Maybe you’ll find yourself a baby one day the same way. Once we got Christopher, we kind of... snowballed. It was nonstop babies after that.”

---

“That’s kind of a miracle,” Richard said and looked at each of the kids in turn. He wasn’t going to say it out loud, but he wanted kids of his own. He hadn’t really brought it up with Tim yet. He wasn’t sure how he would feel about it since he already has his own kids. But Tim was ten years older than him and he might not want to do the entire family thing again. “Tim says you guys want a dozen kids. Is that true?”

---

“It is,” Steve said. “Grant came next after Christopher and... It’s a bit of a sad story that I don’t want to tell right now. Sarah May came along soon after that. She was a baby left at our church and Father Frank there called us to take her in. That was an easy yes from us.” He tickled Sarah May’s foot. “I wouldn’t say no to a dozen kids, but I’d settle on nine, I think,” he said casually. “I love all of our little people in the house.”

---

“Nine kids. That’ll be impressive. You’re going to run out of names.” Richard did know about Grant. He had gotten the low-down on the whole thing from Tim and Natasha both. Adriana, who had been patiently waiting for her daddy to get to her story, looked to him with big, pleading eyes. She wanted to be talked about and for Richard to call her a miracle too.

---

“There’s plenty of good names out there. We’ll be fine,” Steve said with a big smile. “And that’s all the stories I have,” he said jokingly but when Adriana squirmed in her chair, he nodded like he just remembered. “I’m just kidding, Peanut. With Adriana, Bucky was volunteering at a kid’s home several months ago. One day he came back to me and says, ‘There’s this kid you have to meet. She’s so sweet and you’ll love her’. So, we took her to the aquarium and I knew he was right. She was the sweetest, smartest girl in the whole home. Her caseworker helped us through the process of adoption and not long after that, we were able to bring Adriana here.”

---

Adriana nodded enthusiastically and looked to Richard with her big eyes as she said, “I finally got a family.” She looked over to Sarah who was sitting next to her and she leaned against her for a second before adding, “The other kids got mommies and daddies and I had to wait forever. But then I got two daddies and a nana and aunties and Christopher and Ya-Ya. And my ‘tuttles’.”

---

“And Diana and Raphael,” Steve added with a smile. “We all love you so much.”

Lilly nodded her head. “Adriana became my favorite today. She asked Becca why reading was so important and I think Becca had an aneurysm.”

Richard smiled at Steve and Bucky’s family. “You two really are an inspiration. I would’ve never thought people like us could have normal sorts of family lives.”
“Of course,” Bucky said quickly, a little defensively, as if Richard weren’t gay and in the exact same position that he was in before he and Steve were married. He shook his head, softening as he reminded himself that they were very similar and Richard wasn’t a straight man trying to start something. “We can live wonderful, happy lives with our families just like everyone else. And, I know that if I got to have my perfect family - someone as tumultuous as me - then any other gay or lesbian couple can have their perfect family too.” Bucky knew that Richard knew a little bit about him and how he was a bit of a fuck-up for most of his life. So, he hoped the language conveyed that without clueing Adriana in to what he was getting at. He doubted she knew the word ‘tumultuous’. The word definitely went over Adriana’s head but she nodded anyway just so she could stick around in the conversation.

“My parents asked me if I was quitting being a police officer when I told them I was dating a man,” Richard said. “They thought that if I was gay, then I wasn’t able to do ‘masculine’ things anymore.”

Tim reached to grab Richard’s hand in his and he squeezed it tightly. He hadn’t met Richard’s parents yet. But he had gotten pretty upset after Richard told him what they said to him. “It’s not like you’re any different now than you were before you told them. You didn’t suddenly morph into a new person. You’re still Richard,” Tim said, eyes locked to his for a heavy moment. “I know you know that. I’m just still angry.”

Any doubts Bucky might have still been harboring about Richard and Tim’s relationship finally fizzled out of existence when he saw how deeply and intensely his friend looked at the younger man. They had so many differences between them - age, relationship history, family dynamics, job experience. But none of that mattered because the stuff that counted, they shared. Bucky knew this wasn’t going to end. Tim had finally found his match.

Richard, who was a sworn public defender, liked to have a partner that was willing to defend him, too. He looked a bit shy at first but then he smiled and leaned in to give Tim’s cheek a little kiss. Steve turned to Bucky and smiled at the sight of the two of them. “Kind of reminds you of us when we first started dating, doesn’t it?” he asked. “They’re all starry-eyed. I miss it when you used to look at me that way. I haven’t seen that look since about... five minutes ago.”

Bucky was about to be offended because he definitely still looked at Steve that way all the time but then Steve was joking around. He pinched Steve’s arm and leaned in to whisper, “Yeah, Babe, who helped you retrieve your wedding ring and was the calm one in a crisis for once?” He gave him a pointed look before going back at Tim and Richard who were still only really looking at each other. “Tim, Buddy, I know it used to be tradition for your family to go to Vermont for New Year’s to see your ex-wife’s parents. What are you doing now instead?”

“Well, my parents are pleased to hear that I will be spending the holiday with them this year,” Tim said happily. “It’ll Just be them, me, my sister, and her kids. I was going to invite Richard, but someone has to be working a New Year shift and only has a few hours to spend with his own parents.” Tim wasn’t giving Richard a hard time over his job, but he could give some playful poking about it.

Sarah nodded. “I remember Steve having to work those,” she said. “He’d come home in his uniform and I’d make him wash up quick before he sat down for a meal. He always had some story to tell from it. Police work on the holidays is never normal.”

Richard gave a little grimace and apologized to Tim. They had probably had this conversation before a few times. Tim was very understanding about it but Richard still felt bad. “At least I have Valentine’s Day off,” he offered hopefully. “I have a really nice day planned for us. It’ll make up for the days I missed.”

“I know but we won’t get to celebrate New Year’s together. Who am I kissing at midnight?” Tim said while giving Richard big old sad eyes. “At least we have Valentine’s Day for you to spoil me.”

Adriana looked over to Bucky and asked, “Do all of your friends not like mommies?” She’d never seen Clint and Natasha be exceptionally affectionate since they’ve been in a rocky rift for a little while.

Bucky didn’t understand what Adriana was asking. He thought she meant they didn’t like their moms. “What do you mean, Peanut? Tim likes his mommy. I like my mommy. Daddy likes his mommy.” He eyed a spot of mashed potatoes that had fallen on Adriana’s shirt and he moved to gently clean it up. He wondered if his kids were just abnormally messy eaters or if that was just how all kids were.

Adriana shook her head. “I know you like your mommies. But you like daddies.” Then she pointed at Steve. “You like daddies.” And then she did the same for Tim and Richard. “If you like daddies then can you only be friends with other daddies who like daddies?”

Steve leaned over and whispered in Bucky’s ear, “She means: are all of our friends gay.”

“Oh!” Bucky got it now. He turned to his daughter and said, “Okay. So, Daddy and Papa are gay. Tim and Richard are gay, too. But Uncle Clint, Aunt Nat, and Uncle Sam are not gay,” he said and brushed her hair back from her face. “Gay people don’t have to be friends with only gay people. We just got lucky to know some really amazing friends who happen to be gay too. Does that make sense?”

“Oh,” she said, sitting back in her chair and looking like she was sad her theory was thwarted even though she didn’t personally care if her dads and their friends hung out with men or women. “Am I gay?” she asked innocently. Steve didn’t mind answering these questions but he gave his friends an apologetic look for this coming up during Christmas eve dinner.
Bucky tried his best not to chuckle. He knew this would happen eventually - probably with all of his kids. But it was just so cute now innocent and curious his daughter was. But he also knew she was being serious and laughing at her question might make her upset and he didn’t want that at all. “Well, Baby, it’s one of those things that you will feel. You’ll be able to tell eventually if you are gay. If you grow up and want to hold hands with boys then you are not gay. But if you want to hold hands with girls then you are gay. And if you want to hold hands with boys and girls then that’s bisexual. We can discuss it more later if you want.”

---

Adriana considered what her papa said and then she said decidedly, “I’m ‘bisepsual’ because I hold you and daddy’s hand. And I hold Aunt Becca and Aunt Lilly’s and Nana’s hand.” It was a small miracle that nobody at the table, including Lilly, didn’t burst out into laughter.

---

Bucky nodded and grinned at Adriana. She was very smart and very kind and just so eager to learn. “That sounds good, Peanut,” Bucky said and touched Adriana’s hair again. He didn’t really want to get into the minutia of what ‘gay’, ‘straight’, and ‘bisexual’ all actually meant. So, he decided to leave it for now. “We want you to be yourself and love yourself. That’s all any of us care about.” He leaned into Steve for a second and beamed up at him, hoping that Steve thought he did a good job handling this with her.

---

Steve gave Bucky an affectionate look to let him know that he did a good job. Richard excused himself from the table and when he came back, there was a wrapped box in his hands. “Tim and I got you something as a thank you for all of the dinners you guys host. And, um... Merry Christmas.” He passed it off to Bucky. Inside was an ornate cutlery set - the sort people only used on special occasions.

---

Bucky thumbed lightly over the bright green ribbon. He hadn’t really expected to get any gifts from Tim and Richard so he was a little thrown off and frustrated that he didn’t have a gift to give them in return. “Oh, uh, thank you,” he said with a surprised grin as he gently pulled the ribbon free. “Steve, Baby, you want to rip the paper?” he offered and leaned against him as he tore open the wrapping. “Woah...” Bucky mused when he laid eyes on the intricate design of the utensils. “That’s fancy.”

---

Steve gasped quietly when he saw what was inside because he was a sucker for any sort of home-related present, especially for the kitchen. “Wow! These are really great, you guys.” He beamed at the two of them and got up so he could hug them both.

Tim smiled but he could tell that Bucky felt a bit off so he said, “you guys spend so much time and money every time you invite everyone over for dinner. It’s the least we can do.”

---

“Yeah, but, Tim,” Bucky protested lightly and pulled his friend in for a hug too. “I don’t have a Christmas present for you yet - or Richard. I don’t have any presents yet for any of our friends.” He and Steve were usually very on top of gift-giving with their friends but the holiday seemed to have snuck up on them this time. They did have more on their plate this year with adding Adriana and doing Hanukkah for the first time but Bucky still felt bad.

---

“Buck, it’s fine. You’ve got a million kids to look out for here and it’s your first year celebrating two holidays this time. Presents don’t matter, it’s the company,” Tim reassured.

Steve gave Bucky’s hand a squeeze. “It’s fine, Sweetheart. Tim and Richard aren’t offended.”

Adriana piped up with, “Yeah, and Santa is still bringing them presents.”

---

It was in these warm, domestic, pure moments that Bucky had to stop and remind himself that this was his life and this was real and he really was truly this blessed. It surprised him every time that two and a half years changed so much in his life. And it was all because Steve found his way into his life. “Stop it, you guys. I’m going to start crying.” He knew it might have seemed like an overreaction but if being with Steve had taught him anything, it was that taking stock of important moments was invaluable. And if he cried, then he cried.

---

“Don’t cry, Papa.” Adriana got out of her chair so she could sit on Bucky’s lap and comfort him. Christopher got a little jealous of that and waved his spoon from his high chair. “Ana, no! My papa.”

---

Bucky helped Adriana adjust so she wasn’t sliding off. He sighed and tucked his hair behind his ears for what felt like the millionth time today - his hair was the longest it had been in his life. “Christopher, Bean, I’m Adriana’s papa too. Would it help if Daddy held you for a while?”

---

Steve picked up Christopher from his high chair and kissed his cheek. Christopher still had his eyes on Bucky but Steve started to bounce him gently on his knee, which made him giggle and forget that he wanted to sit on Bucky’s lap. “When can we open our one present?” Lilly asked.

---

Sarah May, who was usually quiet about her frustrations, decided she wanted to be held too and she whined softly and reached a hand toward Steve desperately. “Dada,” she whispered and sniffled for added effect.

“After our guests leave, Lil. Then we can open the one Christmas Eve gift. Just one,” Bucky promised and gestured to the kitchen counter where there were two pies - apple and chocolate. “We haven’t even had Steve’s dessert yet.”

---

Tim smiled when he saw all of Steve’s and Bucky’s kids looking for attention. He got up so he could pick Sarah May up from her chair and hope she didn’t mind not getting to be with her dads just then. “How will you guys manage your dozen kids with only four arms?” he teased them. Sarah got up so she could clear the table from dinner and start setting out the dessert plates.
“I’m guessing that by the time we have any more, these ones will be at least old enough to sit in their own chairs and not necessarily want to be on us all the time,” Bucky offered. “We can’t have another until the girls are independent in their own places. We don’t have enough room.” He looked to Steve for a second and added, “I also once joked to Steve about me getting another husband to have around but he did not find it funny.”

---

“We don’t need another person around when we can handle them all on our own.” Steve adjusted Christopher and added, “And with Mom’s help, of course.” They really would be lost without Sarah sometimes. “It’s a good thing we started having kids so young, Buck. By our last kid, we’re going to be almost seniors.”

---

“That’s true. Although, I started a lot younger with parenting so I’m already kind of feeling like a senior as it is. Barnes girls aren’t easy to parent,” Bucky said and felt a smack on the back of his head as Becca walked by to help Sarah. “Steve, you might regret your refusal of a second husband once I’m back in school. It might get pretty busy around here while I’m in class.”

---

Christopher tried to reach over to Bucky to grab at his hair but Steve quickly leaned away so their boy couldn’t reach. “I’ll manage. I’ve got my mom and two perfectly good sisters-in-law to take advantage of for babysitting,” he said in a teasing tone.

---

“One sister-in-law,” Becca corrected and set a plate of pie in front of Lilly. “Remember, Steve, Bucky and I are going to school around the same time. And I’ll probably be in an apartment by then.”

Lilly nodded. “And I’ll be living in the basement which Bucky said is like an apartment for us so maybe I’ll just lock the door,” she said through a bite of chocolate pie.

---

Steve feigned a scandalized look. “But what if your little nieces and nephews want you to change their dirty diapers and clean up their messes?” he joked. He kissed his babies’ heads.

“I don’t wear diapers anymore, Daddy,” Adriana said, proud of herself for being well past her diaper age now.

---

Bucky chuckled and squeezed Adriana in a hug. She had just conquered toilet-training and graduated out of diapers a few weeks before she was adopted and she was loath to hear her daddy suggest she ever had a dirty diaper around here. “That’s right, Peanut, you’re a big girl. And you’re also working on brushing your teeth yourself too,” Bucky encouraged, although, she still struggled with her teeth most nights.

---

“My kids took forever to get out of their diapers. They almost were banned from starting school because they weren’t potty trained yet,” Tim chimed in. “I felt bad for them. I thought that they would’ve wanted to get out of diapers on their own, but as it turned out, they preferred to go in diapers than to put a pause to play time."

---

Adriana grabbed Bucky’s shoulders and pulled herself to stand up on his lap so she was more a part of the conversation. “Miss Newman said I couldn’t play with the upstairs kids if I didn’t learn to go by myself,” she said, once again bringing up anecdotes from the orphanage out of the blue. “But I was only with the upstairs kids for a little because then I came here.”

---

“Oh yeah?” Steve wanted to encourage Adriana to talk about her past. The orphanage wasn’t exactly the best upbringing, but she at least was looked after as best as her caretakers could’ve managed. “At least you got to meet new friends, right? That had to be fun.”

---

Adriana shrugged and let out a little disappointed sigh. “I guess. They were the old kids and some of them were mean.” The orphanage cut off at age twelve. That’s when they were transferred into the foster system and also moved to a different home outside of the city until they were placed with families. “Susie A and Susie R were both locked in the closet by the big boys. And someone cut off Midge’s hair when she was taking a nap.”

---

“That wasn’t very nice of them,” Steve said. “I’m glad you didn’t have to spend too much time with them. But I hope all the mean kids learn to be nicer. Life is better when you’re nice to people.” Christopher pointed at the pie on Steve’s plate and signed ‘please’ to ask if he could have some. Steve nodded and let him take fistfuls of dessert.

---

“Steve, oh-” Bucky gasped and reached out a belated hand to try to stop Christopher but it was too late. He sighed and withdrew his hand to just watch his son get covered in cake. “I could have helped make that less messy,” he whispered to Steve as Adriana started up with her next story. “I help Papa and Daddy a lot,” Adriana mused, trying to think about a good instance to talk about. “Sometimes Daddy sleeps in and Papa is with us for breakfast and he has me watch the egg pan while he cuts fruit. And I’m supposed to yell when the eggs bubble up.”

---

“Wow, those are very nice things to do, Adriana.” Tim smiled at her. “Your parents must be very proud of you.” Richard reached over and gave his hand a squeeze, loving to watch him interact with kids.

---

“We are so proud of her,” Bucky said and kissed Adriana’s head. “Aren’t we, Steve? Our kids are the best and the cutest.” Bucky looked over to Lilly who was pushing around pie crust on her plate and looking way too bored. “Lilly, fine, your sad face is killing me. The Christmas Eve presents are in a bag in my room. Go get them and put them on the coffee table. We can open them in a few minutes.”
Christopher squirmed to get down off of Steve so he could run into the living room and play with his toys. “We can head out if you want to have some family time,” Tim offered. “Richard and I didn’t have any plans on how long we were going to be here.”

Adriana hopped off of Bucky’s lap and followed Lilly to get the Christmas Eve presents. Bucky, now free to move around, got up to get some hot chocolate started. “If you two want to head out, you can. But I don’t have a problem with you staying around if you don’t mind that the kids are going to open a gift and play until they are tired out,” Bucky said. “And I don’t know about Steve, but I plan on sleeping as soon as the babies do because we will be woken up early tomorrow.”

“It’s my ex-wife’s turn to have the kids on Christmas this year, so it’d be nice to at least see someone’s kids get to be in the Christmas spirit,” Tim admitted and passed Sarah May over to Steve. Sarah May couldn’t care less about presents. She was loving that she got her daddy’s full attention now.

Steve smiled as he hugged her with both arms. “Do you mind taking some pictures, Buck?” Steve asked. “Somebody is stealing all of my love right now.”

Most of the family had moved to the living room already and waiting patiently for Steve and Bucky so they could open presents. “Yeah, I’ll get pictures, Baby,” Bucky promised and leaned in to kiss Steve. “Ya-Ya, will you let Daddy get to the living room? I promise you can cuddle him the whole time, Sweet Pea.” He looked up at Tim and Richard and said, “With so many people around here vying for Steve’s love and attention, it’s a wonder if I get to have him to myself for three minutes.” He loved how much the kids loved their daddy, though. He would never trade that.

Sarah May hid her face in Steve’s chest with a silly smile when Bucky started talking to her. It made Steve laugh and tickle her side lightly. He took his usual armchair and kept Sarah May tucked against his chest. Diana seized the opportunity to lay her head in Steve’s lap.

“The biggest one has to be mine. Is it mine, Bucky?” Lilly asked. “All Becca asked for was books.”

“Lilly, that big one is yours,” Bucky confirmed. “But just remember, this round of presents is only your Christmas Eve gift so the best stuff is saved for the morning.” He passed the presents around to the kids, giving Sarah May’s to Steve and Christopher’s to Sarah. “Okay, you can open them now. But one at a time so I can take pictures!” Becca’s was a book, of course, a fictional one this time. Lilly’s big box had a new giant jigsaw puzzle inside. Adriana got a plush turtle that had a blanket attach so she wouldn’t have to bring blankets and turtles downstairs when they watched movies, she could just bring one thing. And the babies both got big soft plush cats - one was orange and one was a black and grey tabby.

Ariana squealed with delight when she saw her present. Christopher wasn’t as excited about his but he let out an equally loud shout to mimic her. Meanwhile, Sarah May hugged her cat quietly and drooled a little on its head. Tim ended up taking the camera from Bucky to take pictures so he could focus on spending time with his kids. “Wow, Adriana, what do you have there?” he asked.

Lilly shook her puzzle with a grin. “This is gonna take forever to do. I’m totally going to put this together in Becca’s room.”

---

Adriana wrapped her blanket around her shoulders and hugged the turtle tightly. “It’s a ‘tuttle’, Uncle Tim, with a ‘blankie’. See?” She rubbed one corner of the soft blanket on Tim’s arm so he could feel the material.

Bucky kissed her head and got up to get another set of presents. “One more round. This one isn’t as fun, though. It’s not toys this time.” He pulled out five new sets of matching Christmas pajamas that Steve and he had picked out when they were trying to get new shoes that Sarah May wouldn’t try to kick off her feet. “There’s one for each of you. Becca, I know you probably hate this but I only request that you wear yours for tonight so we can have Christmas morning with you all matching.”

---

Becca groaned when she saw the pajamas but this was one of the highlight of Steve’s Christmas. He loved corny shit like this as if his life depended on it. “I made sure to pick ones that are fashionable. I could’ve gone with the snowman ones, but Bucky convinced me not to,” he answered.

---

Bucky nodded and pointed to his sister. “You should be very happy. The snowman ones were horrendous. You would have burned yours immediately.” He knew Steve liked them a lot but these were simpler - pine trees with snow and a couple red bulbs. Simple and lovely. “Steve, do you want to get the babies to sleep or help clean up down here? I’ll do whatever you don’t want to do but I do think it’s bedtime for them.”

---

Christopher didn’t want to accept that it was bedtime. He was currently trying to climb up into Richards lap so he could get him to play with the cat doll. Richard awkwardly kept his hands near him to make sure he wouldn’t fall. “You can tuck them in tonight. I know I usually hog them for myself.” Steve kissed his daughter. “Good Night, Sweat Pea. Your papa is going to get you to bed tonight. I love you.” He passed her over to Bucky.

---

Once Bucky was gone with Sarah May and a very reluctant Christopher, Richard offered to help Steve clean up the kitchen while Tim played with Adriana for a bit. Richard mostly just wanted to talk to Steve in private for a moment. “Hey, Steve. Can I ask you for some advice? Because, I’m new to having a relationship with a man and I want to do things right by Tim. I want to ask him to move in with me and I intend on spending my life with him if he will let me. But I don’t know where to even start.”

---

Steve was thankful for the help. He’d been in the middle of washing up the counter when Richard said that and Steve’s head snapped around with a gasp. “Are you going to ask him to marry you?” he asked in a quiet but excited voice. Steve had a stupid grin on his face. “Well, um... it’s no different than how you would ask a woman, I think. I never had a real relationship with a woman, so I can’t say for sure. But I imagine it works the same way. Have you guys talked about living together at all?”

Richard flushed a deep red and looked down at the pile of dessert dishes he was holding like they were the most interesting plates he had ever seen. “I don’t know. I haven’t gone that far. And he’s been married before so I’m not sure.” He shrugged it off and scooted closer to Steve so he could talk softer. “We have discussed living together a couple times but always briefly. I think he wants it too. This has just been going so well so far. And I... I love him.” he hadn’t said that out loud yet to anyone - including Tim - but it was the honest truth.

“You should tell him, honest and clear, that you want to live together. Tell him why you want to and how you’d be able to make each other happier that way. Bucky and I moved in and married pretty quickly. I mean, we sort of put our relationship on fast forward and ended up with four kids,” he said. “If it feels right, then you need to follow what your heart is telling you.”

“I don’t think I’m really ready to fast track things the way you guys did,” Richard said. “But I do want to live with him and be with him. He makes me better. And I just think that we should always be in the same bed and wake up to each other every morning and get to have all our days together from now on.” He sighed, a little distracted thinking about Tim. “I know it all sounds dumb and cliche but I haven’t felt this way before and I’m a little blind-sided, Steve.”

Steve thought that this was the most adorable thing to happen to one of his friends. He hugged Richard tightly because he was happy for him and Richard looked like he needed one. “It’s not dumb or cliche. It’s the truth, bud.” He pulled back so he could get a towel and dry off the countertop. “Tim is head over heels for you. I know that you two are going to work out. Just know that if you two move in together, I’m expecting you to host at least one dinner party.”

Richard was definitely grateful for the hug. Steve and Bucky both had been good support systems. Sam also had good input when he asked him so many times at work that he finally got annoyed and sat Richard down to tell him what he thought. “I don’t know about the dinner parties but I can do my best,” Richard agreed. “I just hope he wants what I want. You know?”

“It’s what anyone in your situation would hope for,” Steve said fondly. He began to put the dishes away since they were now already clean and dried. “Ask him tonight,” Steve prompted. “What’s the difference between asking him sooner than waiting a few days and beating yourself up over it every waking moment?”

Richard shrugged and bit his lip, already getting more nervous as the minutes ticked on. “Well, Steve... I don’t know. I’ve never been so nervous in my life. I’ve been at gunpoint and threatened by just about everyone I’ve arrested - including your husband, which I’m still very sorry for, by the way
- but I haven’t been this scared before. I’ve never done this.” He sighed and shoved his hands in his jacket pockets. “But maybe tonight is better - like a Christmas present of sorts. And he’s in a good mood after spending time with your kids so maybe that’ll help.”

---

“I know the feeling,” Steve said. “Moving in together wasn’t so much of a scary step for me because... well, I kind of was over Bucky’s place more often than my own at that point,” he admitted. “Proposing had me even more nervous.” Steve squeezed Richard’s shoulder with a reassuring look. “Tell us how it goes. We’re both rooting for you.”

---

Richard thanked Steve again for the advice and dinner before collecting Tim and heading out. Bucky got the babies in their new pajamas and in their cribs fairly quickly. It was just the falling asleep which took a bit. And then after that, Bucky was so tired that he fell into a semi-unconscious daze on his bed when he was trying to decide whether he should shower or wait for Steve to come upstairs.

---

Steve tucked Adriana in at the end of the night and spent a small amount of time with his mom to plan the next day and then he finally made his way to bed. Steve crawled in next to Bucky and slid his hand beneath his shirt. “Hey there,” he purred. “Somebody is tired. You want a massage to help put you to sleep?”

---

Bucky whined quietly at Steve’s gentle touches. He would never get too many touches from him. “That feels nice already. Might fall asleep like this,” he mumbled, eyes closed and hands lazily reaching to find Steve’s shirt to grab on to. “I should get up, though. I don’t want to sleep in these clothes from dinner. That’s not comfortable at all. I’m just so tired.”

---

“I’ll undress you,” Steve said in a suggestive tone. “And then I’ll put on the Christmas pajamas.” He kissed along Bucky’s jaw affectionately. “Did you know that Richard wants to ask Tim to move in with him? He came up to talk to me while I was cleaning up the kitchen,” he said in a hushed, excited tone.

---

“I did know, yes,” Bucky said just as quietly and lifted his arms up over his head to indicate that Steve could undress him now. “Tim is going to be happy. I know he is. He will be surprised and excited. I think he loves Richard.” Bucky’s eyes flitted open every few seconds so he could pay attention to Steve while they talked. He also felt like he hadn’t had much time alone with him over the past few days and he missed him.

---

Steve grabbed the pajamas for Bucky and himself before going back to the bed. He slowly and carefully took his shirt off and kissed over his collarbone affectionately. “Richard definitely loves him,” Steve said. “He was a nervous wreck about it and told me that he wanted to spend the rest of his life with him. It was kind of adorable.”

---
“They remind me of us,” Bucky said it like he and Steve were much older and wiser and more experienced. He said it like they hadn’t been in the exact same position a couple years prior. “I miss you, Steve. I don’t get to see you as much lately. And we haven’t really been intimate for a while either. I’m not saying that I need to have sex to feel close to you. I just miss how close it does make us. You know?”

---

“We’re the gay elders now, Buck. We’ve graduated from just being the token gay couple.” Steve pulled Bucky’s pants down, pausing so he could run his hands over his legs. “I know,” he said guiltily. “It’s just... being a dad is so awesome. But I miss being your husband, too,” he said. Steve put on the pajama bottoms for Bucky. “Do you think we had too many kids too fast?”

---

“No! God, no. I love all our kids so much. I wouldn’t change that,” Bucky assured Steve quickly. “I just miss having time for us. We get it occasionally but just not enough. I want to touch you and hold you and make love to you and talk and laugh and just be us. I don’t know what’s been going on in your head for about two months now. We haven’t stopped to catch up with each other.”

---

He breathed out a sigh of relief. Steve stepped back to change into his own pajamas and then snuggled up with his husband again. “I know. It used to be a lot easier in the beginning, coming up with places to go since we didn’t have the responsibilities we do now.” He nuzzled Bucky’s neck. “Tell me about your week.”

---

Bucky whined softly and pushed himself as close to Steve as he could. He wanted to be glued to him tonight. “Well, Baby, you were with me a lot this past week doing holiday preparation. But work was really busy. A few days ago, I had to kick out this kid who was trying to steal cassette tapes. He had a backpack and he found a hidden spot that he could duck under and put them in his bag. I figured it out when he walked by me and I heard the clattering of the tapes bouncing together. It really wasn’t the most clever way to try to steal.”

---

“Thieves tend to be either really crafty or really dense. There’s no in between,” Steve said. He’s dealt with plenty in his old line of work. He kissed along Bucky’s jaw and said, “Sarah May has been talking to me more when the other kids aren’t around, but it’s still only a couple words here and there.”

---

“I worry about her. Do you worry about her?” Bucky asked. He touched his fingers gently in Steve’s hair and brushed it back. It was pretty long for him right now but Steve hadn’t said anything yet about needed to trim it up. Maybe he was wanting a shaggy look for a while. “She’s so quiet. She hasn’t been learning words as fast. She lets herself be squashed by the other two for attention. She’s so shy and nervous a lot of the time. It’s like she’s got toddler anxiety or something.”

---

“I do sometimes,” Steve said. “But she’s always given love every day. And even if she doesn’t get the spotlight with the others around, me you and Ma always make special time for just us and her. I think she’s still too young to understand to stick up for herself. Maybe in a few months.”

---

It made sense for her to act the way she did because she had two older siblings with such big, loud personalities. Bucky just worried that she would grow up always being shy and nervous. “Do you think it’s just because she doesn’t have the vocabulary yet to compete with the commanding presence of Adriana and Christopher and even the girls sometimes? Maybe she wants to interject but she can’t yet so that’s why she doesn’t try?”

---

“Christopher just made loud noises to interject if he didn’t have words,” Steve observed. “I don’t think it’s a lack of vocabulary... she knows ‘no’ and ‘all done’,” Steve continued. “Maybe if we pretend to stop each other talking politely so we can talk, she can copy us?” he asked. “Sort of like pretend but she doesn’t know we’re pretending?”

---

“You mean like between who’s talking we can make a show of switching who has the floor?” Bucky asked. “That might work. We can always try. I just think part of the problem is that she is so quiet and knows she can’t compete with them just with volume. She covers her ears if someone laughs too loud around her. She’s very sensitive and easily overstimulated. One of my cousin’s was like that as a baby. He was very uncomfortable with noises and lights that were loud or unusual.”

---

“I did notice that,” Steve said. “Sometimes I want to try and put little earmuffs on her to help muffle incidental noises the other kids make but I don’t want her to miss out on learning new words because of it.” Steve sighed. “What did your cousin’s parents do to help them?” he asked curiously.

---

Earmuffs didn’t sound like a terrible idea. They could just muffle sounds a little if she was getting worked up. It might help calm her down before she got so bad she had to cry. “Nothing, really. They took him to the nursery for a nap if it got back enough that he was too upset. Mostly, they just waited for him to grow out of it. They didn’t really know what to do.” He was getting even more tired now as he snuggled with Steve. He wished he could stay up longer to talk but he was fading fast and Christmas morning would come soon and he needed to be up before the kids so he could put the rest of the presents under the tree to create the Santa illusion.

---

Steve hoped that Sarah May wouldn’t have an issue with this for too long - not because Steve was unwilling to help, but because he didn’t want her to be uncomfortable. He kissed Bucky gently until he fell asleep and Steve was out soon after that.
Steve woke up very early in the morning. He disentangled himself from his husband to go down and set up the presents so Bucky could sleep a little longer. Diana didn’t help with his goal to be stealthy since she pranced around the room following Steve. Once the presents were all there, Steve snuck into the nursery to steal the sleeping Sarah May from her crib and snuggled back into bed with Bucky, their daughter now resting on his chest.

---

Bucky, to his credit, really was planning on getting up and helping Steve. But he was just so tired and that didn’t happen. He even roused from sleep when Steve got up but he fell back asleep before he could even call out his name. He woke up, sometime later, to Steve’s hand gently brushing through his hair and the quiet mumbling of Sarah May near his face. He blinked open his eyes and focused in on his daughter who had a big morning smile for him once she realized he was up. “Oh, hey, Sweet Pea. Did Daddy get you for cuddles or have you learned how to get out of your crib too?”

---

“Papapapapapapa...” Sarah May mumbled with mild determination as she crawled over from Steve to Bucky. She snuggled her papa and grabbed a fistful of his hair to hold.

Steve laughed at her little betrayal and turned on his side. “I figured we could give her a little extra attention before the whole house wakes up,” he said.

---

“Of course,” Bucky said happily and kissed her cheek. “Just Daddy and Papa and Ya-Ya.” He wrapped his arms carefully around her and let her tug his hair because she was much gentler with it than Christopher was. “I can’t believe the littlest baby is a year old now. And she’s getting bigger now, Steve. Her hands are finally growing into her arms.”

---

“She’s growing too fast. I miss how small she was and how she used to tuck right into my arm,” he sighed. “Now she’s a two-handed-hold baby.” He tickled her feet and then smiled over at Bucky. “Ya-Ya, can you tell your papa that you love him? Say ‘I love you!’” he cooed at her.

---

Sarah May was getting better at saying some things but all she could really manage this morning was a soft, shy, “Lah, Papa.” She then promptly hid her face against Bucky’s chest and sighed like she was embarrassed with her attempt.

“She is definitely a two-hand baby now,” Bucky agreed and moved her closer up his chest so he could hold her better. “But she’s still our little girl. She’s our precious Sarah May. Aren’t you, Sweet Pea?” He yawned and reached for Steve’s hand. “I think you should give me a kiss and then we should go make sure everything is ready before we get the others up.”

---

Steve smiled proudly at their little girl and leaned over her and kissed Bucky slowly. He brushed his thumb over Bucky’s hand and rolled out of bed. “I can take care of it if you want to snuggle with her more.”

---

“Here, I’ll wear the jacket she likes and zip her up against my chest so she’s still snuggling,” Bucky said and gestured at a jacket laid over the dresser. “That’s the one. And then she and I will just follow you around while you get ready. And we can sing Christmas carols at you too.”

---

Steve grabbed the jacket for Bucky and passed it over. “I love that idea,” he said. He was a sucker for anything cheesy, especially around the holidays. “Can you sing ‘Silent Night’ for me? It’ll be nice and calming before everyone—” he started to say, but he could already hear noise coming from the nursery of Christopher shouting for his sister.

---

Christopher was still going through a phase of anxiety and possessiveness over Sarah May. He didn’t like when he couldn’t see her and he definitely didn’t like waking up to find her gone. He even sometimes wouldn’t let people touch her. He almost bit an old lady in the park who went to touch her curls. “Fuck. Okay. It’s okay, Christopher,” Bucky said hurriedly and skipped his way to the nursery quickly so he could show Sarah May to him. “See? She’s fine, Bean. She’s perfectly safe with Papa.”

---

Christopher was halfway out of his crib by the time Bucky got in but he hastily scurried back inside of it to try and prevent from being caught by his pop. The attempt was poorly-executed. He stood up on his feet and waved at his sister. “Ya-Ya!” he yelped, calming down once he saw her.

---

“Christopher, you have to stop trying to escape your crib,” Bucky said firmly and lowered Sarah May down into the crib so Christopher could give her a hug. “I mean it, Bean. It’s dangerous and it scares Papa. I’m going to put really high bars on your crib, Baby. And you’re not going to like it.” He sighed and crouched down so he could watch his kids as Christopher hugged his sister and messed with her hair. “Maybe Daddy and I should discuss when you should get a big boy bed.”

---

Sarah May whined a little when she was taken out of the jacket but when Christopher hugged her, she calmed down and snuggled with her brother. Christopher looked innocently up at Bucky as he was scolded for another attempted escape. “Play, Papa?” he asked. He let go of Sarah May to grab his new cat plushie and waved it at her. “Play, Ya-Ya? Look! Kitty!”
“No, Bean, Christmas time,” Bucky said and brushed his hand gently over Christopher’s blonde hair. “Your hair is getting long, Christopher. It’s passed your little chin, now.” He chuckled and pulled Christopher out of his crib and set him on the ground before taking Sarah May back into his arms since she was still wanting to be cuddled. “Christopher, let’s go get your Daddy. He’s in our room, Baby. Let’s get him!”

---

At Bucky’s prompting, Christopher scampered off to the master bedroom with an excited squeal. Steve was waiting just inside the room and surprised him by scooping him up as soon as he ran into the room. Their son let out a loud shout and started giggling wildly as Steve held him upside down and blew raspberries on his belly. Diana came bounding in and licked Christopher’s face all over.

---

Bucky watched his husband and son and smiled over at them as Sarah May whined and pushed her hand against his neck. “Oh, my precious boys,” Bucky sighed contently and adjusted Sarah May in his arms. “You’re very cute but you’re going to wake the whole house with your giggling. And I’m hoping to get another hour of sleep for Becca so she doesn’t destroy all of us.”

---

Steve put Christopher down on the bed and smiled as he scrambled onto his feet so he could fling himself at Steve, who caught him. “It’s late enough in the morning for Becca to wake up. It’s eight thirty.” That wasn’t the nicest hour to wake at, but it wasn’t ridiculously early, either. He felt like she could handle it.

---

“Yeah, Steve, it’s eight thirty, but it’s also Becca,” Bucky said firmly and stopped Christopher for a second to fix his pants that were falling down a little bit. “How about you get the babies some juice and fruit and I’ll get Adriana and Lilly up. We have a long day ahead of us. But maybe if we do this right, the kids will all be asleep early tonight and the girls will be occupied and I can finally have some private time with my husband.”

---

“Fair enough,” Steve said. “I have a good feeling about tonight. I asked Santa for s-e-x with my husband tonight for Christmas.” He carried Christopher downstairs and let him run around the kitchen with the baby gate up so he couldn’t get to the tree. He set out a fruit salad that he’d prepared and poured drinks for everyone while he waited for the rest of the family.

---

It took a little while for Bucky to get Adriana up. She was awake but very comfortable in her bed and didn’t yet want to get out. This was her first Christmas in her new home and she wasn’t aware of just how many presents and activities they had for her downstairs. But eventually, Bucky got her and Lilly to the kitchen with Steve and Sarah. “Lilly, will you go get Becca, please? Tell her I’m making her some tea.”

---

Lilly complained about having to wake up Becca because she knew that she was going to give her an attitude. But she went to take care of it anyway. Adriana caught a glimpse of the Christmas tree on the way to the kitchen. “Papa, are all those for us?” she gasped in awe. “Or are those for other
“No, Peanut, those are for you and your siblings and your aunts,” Bucky said. “So, a part of those are all for you. And Daddy made sure to help Santa find really good gifts for you. And Santa said that he thinks you are really going to like your Christmas.” Bucky still wasn’t horribly thrilled about doing Santa with the kids. But he was going to do his part, especially because it made Steve so happy.

“That’s still lots of presents just for us,” Adriana said.

Steve picked up their son as he ran past and put him in his high chair. “Come on, Peanut. The sooner you have your breakfast, the sooner you can see what Santa brought you,” he said. Steve was so appreciative that Bucky allowed him to play the Santa game. It was so damn cute he couldn’t resist.

Adriana stared out at the Christmas tree for a couple more seconds but then finally turned and came to sit down with her siblings. “It’s all so pretty,” she mused quietly and looked up at Steve as if she was making sure this was all still real.

Lilly came tromping up the stairs then with arms crossed and an aggravated tick in her face. “Becca isn’t coming upstairs. She says she’s too sick. She said she threw up last night and doesn’t feel good.”

When Lilly came back with news of Becca being sick, Steve shook his head and chewed his lip for a second. “Oh no...” Steve was up in a moment and he made a bowl of fruit and a glass of water. “You sit down and eat, Lil, I’ll go bring this to her and I’ll see if she needs anything.”

Becca, who was prone to being a miserable mess, was even more so that morning. She was huddled in the corner of her bed with all her blankets wrapped around her and a winter hat pulled down over her eyes. She peeled out from under it when she heard Steve coming. “I’m sick,” she mumbled and looked up at him, eyes watery and nose dripping. “I think I have a fever, Steve.”

Steve set the food and water down next to her bed before sitting on the edge of the mattress and pressing his hand to her forehead. “You definitely have a fever,” he agreed. “I’m sorry you’re sick, especially on Christmas. Do you want me to get you anything?” he asked.

“I don’t know,” Becca said and reached a shaky hand out of her blanket pile to grab the cup of water. “I want Christmas, Steve. I know I made a big deal about it being too loud this year because of all the kids, but I love Christmas.” She sniffled and blew her nose on a tissue that seemed to come from nowhere. She had been cradling a box for most of the night. “Is this the flu? It feels worse.”
He brushed back some of her hair that was sticking to her face. “We’ll find a way for you to still have Christmas. Don’t you worry about that,” Steve promised. “I’m going to get my mom down here. She’s a pro with this stuff.” He tucked her back in and hurried upstairs. “Becca’s running a fever, Ma,” he said. “Do you think you could figure out what it is? You’re the nurse.”

Sarah was in the middle of trying to get Ya-Ya to eat some more banana slices - which wasn’t going well - so she was happy to pass off the job to Bucky to go see about Becca. “Let’s go, Steve. Grab the thermometer from the drawer, please.” She and Steve went back downstairs and Sarah took Becca’s temperature which was well into fever range. “Becca, dear, I think you just have a very bad flu,” she concluded after a bit more examining and questioning Becca. “It’s just awful it happened on Christmas, though.”

Steve was disappointed that Becca had the flu but also relieved that it wasn’t anything worse. “How about I bring Diana and Raphael here to keep you company for now? I’d say I’d bring everyone down here to open at least one present with you, but I can’t risk the kids getting sick. Their immune systems aren’t that good yet, I’m sorry.”

“Also, I don’t like everyone in my space. You know this,” Becca whined and pulled her blankets tighter around her. “You guys can have Christmas and then maybe just you and Bucky and Lilly can come down here with my presents. It’s not as fun but at least it’s sort of okay. That way the kids won’t get sick and Bucky and Lilly won’t be sad I wasn’t at Christmas.”

“That Sounds like a good plan, Becs. Bucky, Ma, or I will check in every half hour down here to make sure you’re alright. I hope you feel better soon.” He grabbed an extra blanket for her just in case and draped it over the bed.

Becca thanked them both and flicked off her lamp, ready to try to sleep again. Everyone else waiting upstairs was still at the kitchen table but Christopher and Lilly were both getting particularly antsy to start Christmas. “Papa! Please!” Christopher yelled and pointed out to the tree from his high chair. “Please!” He was a couple seconds away from crying and screaming but then he saw Steve coming upstairs to he directed his efforts at him with a solid, “Dada, Please!”

Eager to avoid a tantrum, Steve plucked their son from his high chair. “Do you want to open presents, Bean?” he asked and kissed his cheek. “Come on, let’s go see what Santa brought.” He moved the baby gate out of the way and found a present for each of their kids so Adriana and Christopher wouldn’t tear away at the first one they came across. “Becca has the flu, Buck,” he said as he set Christopher down near his pen with a present. “We should save some of our presents to open downstairs with her.”

“Damn, a sick Becca isn’t anything anyone wants,” Bucky sighed. “We can save a few, yes. How bad is she? Has she started crying yet or is she sleeping now? She has stages. Sleeping comes before the crying stage. And the crying stage is not good.”

“No good,” Lilly agreed and she sat down with her first present in hand. “When Becca is this badly sick, it’s a roller coaster for the entire house. She’s like a snotty hurricane.”

---

“She’s in the sleeping stage. She turned the lights out as we were heading back up,” Steve said. “I feel bad for her, though... even if she is going to be a bit of a terror later.” Steve hated seeing anyone he cared about feeling less than healthy.

Adriana was patiently waiting for permission to open up her present. Steve sat down next to her and pet his hand over her hair. “You’re allowed, Peanut.”

---

“Am I supposed to wait my turn or do we all open together?” Adriana asked and moved to lean back against Steve.

Bucky put himself in charge of Christopher and gave Sarah May to her nana. It was very convenient right now to have an adult per kid. “Adriana, Baby, you can go ahead and open your gift. We will want a picture though. We did grab the camera, right, Daddy?”

---

“There’s no turns on Christmas, but your papa is right. We need to have pictures of you opening your first present on Christmas day!” Steve ran to get the camera and, when he came back, he was a little winded. “Okay, Peanut. You can open it now.” By this point, Christopher already tore his open and Sarah May was picking at the corner of hers.

---

Adriana nodded and ripped through the front of her present. There was a box underneath that Lilly had to help her open but inside was a policewoman action figure doll. Bucky had been pretty happy with the find. They had talked to her recently about how Steve was a policeman for a long time. He also wanted to get her dolls that ranged from princesses to civil servants. She liked having dolls and action figures but he didn’t want her to think that little girls were only allowed to be princesses and all the boys were the hero dolls. “Adriana, look at her! Wow! She’s a police officer! Just like Daddy.”

---

Adriana gasped and held it up once Lilly helped her get it out of the box. “She’s not like Daddy. She’s like Auntie Nat.”

At first, Steve’s heart sunk because he thought that Adriana was saying that it wasn’t like him because he wasn’t a cop anymore, but then he understood because it was a policewoman. “What do you think you’re going to name her?” he asked.

---

“I don’t know. Something strong!” Adriana said and held her up for Steve to see. “Like Detective Macy Jones! That’s good, right?”

Bucky tried his best to contain Christopher but he was now very interested in going to get his hands on Adriana’s new toy. “Bean, that’s your sister’s police officer. You just opened new toy keys. Are you not even slightly intrigued by this?”

---

“I like that. That’s a really great name,” he agreed. Steve went over to Christopher and tried to get him interested in the toy keys. “Wow!” he said in the most excited tone he could muster. “What are these, Bean? These are so colorful!” He jiggled the key ring to try and entice Christopher to want his present instead of his sister’s.

---

Christopher was not having it. He was almost two years old and was apparently done with baby toys. “Want ‘dat!’” he yelled and pointed to the officer again. “Please!”

“No, Baby, it’s not yours,” Bucky said and grabbed another present from under the tree. “Here, Christopher. Here. This is yours. Maybe this will be better for you.”

---

Adriana hugged her doll protectively because she knew how Christopher could get with toys. Christopher started to walk over to her but Steve blocked the way and kissed his head. “Look, Kiddo! Look at what your papa has!” he said brightly. “Does he have another present for you?”

---

Christopher looked at the present and then over to the doll again before deciding on the present. He plopped down in front of Bucky and held out his hands for the squishy package. “Good boy, Christopher. We don’t want to take from Adriana. Let’s open this one.” He helped Christopher rip the paper and revealed a shiny, soft, moldable bag filled with little shapes and animals with glitter painted over them. “Look, Baby, each of these glittry animals can go in your water at bath time and they grow with the water.” They were essentially made out of sponges but kids liked them a lot.

---

Christopher looked at the animals but he immediately put it on the ground and made grabby hands at his papa. “More!” he said loudly.

Sarah covered her laugh as she got up to grab Sarah May a present and keep her occupied. “Looks like you two underestimated how much he grew this year,” she teased softly. “Steve did that to me a few times.”

---

“Oh, Christmas really is going to be long this year, isn’t it?” Bucky asked and pulled his hair back into a ponytail. “Steve, Love, should we just let him have all his presents at once and he can just tear through them? Last year was so much easier, he needed help opening gifts and he wasn’t such a grump.”

---

“We should and hopefully he will like one enough to play with it while the rest of us open our presents like civilized folk,” he chuckled, hoarding Christopher’s presents and placing them in front of him before getting another for Adriana. This one was a picture book about all sorts of marine wildlife.
Christopher laughed wildly and surveyed his presents, like a tiny little king. Bucky sat and supervised him just to make sure he didn’t get a paper cut or try to eat the wrapping. All in all, it went pretty well. And eventually, he had all his gifts opened and was more than happy playing with a toy piano. “I’m glad he’s finally satisfied but I’m regretting the toy piano now. It’s so loud,” Bucky said over the noise.

“But look at how cute he is playing it,” Steve said softly. “He’s a little Mozart. I can’t wait until he’s old enough to play music with his dad.”

Adriana snuggled in Steve’s lap as she opened up another present. “Can I play music when I’m grown up?” she asked.

“No, he’s not a little Mozart. Mozart was a prodigy of composition. Christopher sounds like he’s trying to find the perfect sound for his next prog rock album and he just can’t get it,” Bucky said, his head starting to hurt a little. Lilly had already taken Sarah May up to her room with her because she wasn’t having the noise. “Adriana, you can be a musician if you want to. What instrument do you want to play? Papa needs a bassist.”

“Then he is a rock Mozart,” Steve muttered to himself. He felt bad for Sarah May but he knew she was happier off playing with her aunt somewhere quieter.

Adriana was now suddenly very interested in playing music now that Christopher had his toy piano. “What’s a bassist?” she asked. “I’ll be one of those.”

Bucky got up from the floor and went to pick out his bass from his cabinet of guitars. There were only four guitars there but it made him feel like a real rocker because he had them hanging up so nicely. “This is a bass guitar. It’s got only four strings and sounds really deep. This particular one is from the seventies so it’s not very old. It’s just a standard sort of bass. Doesn’t look like much. It’s nothing like that Steinberger Spirit. Man, that’s a wicked looking instrument.” Bucky went on, getting ahead of himself a little bit, “I mean, some people only focus on the sound of the guitar for quality, but I think there is some degree of importance in appearance. There’s a reason that all the best rock gods have photoshoots with their instruments on display.”

Adriana marveled when the instrument was brought over. “But that’s bigger than me, Papa. I can’t play that,” she said sadly. “Do they make little ones like Christopher’s piano?”

“They make smaller instruments, yeah,” Bucky confirmed and put the bass back. “When you’re a little older we can get you a smaller bass to start out with.” He came back over with one of his ukuleles. “Or you can start learning on this first and see if you like it. You’ve heard Papa play on the ukulele.” He started to strum and sway and winked over to Steve.
Adriana danced with Bucky and Steve smiled and walked over so he could kiss his husband’s cheek. “My talented music man,” he said in a loving hum. “I think the ukulele is perfect for you to start with, Peanut,” he said.

“And I have three of them,” Bucky said. “So, you can have this one as a Christmas present, Adriana.” He handed the ukulele to her and bent down to kiss her head. “We can practice sometime together.” He pulled Steve in close to him and gave him a warm kiss. “Tell I’m handsome, Baby?”

Adriana gasped and jumped in excitement. This was probably going to be her most favorite present this year because it was something that used to be her papa’s. Steve’s heart melted and he wrapped his arms around Bucky. “The most handsome, most thoughtful man in the world,” Steve said. “And the best father.” He kissed Bucky’s face a few times, laughing as he heard Adriana start to strum awkwardly as Christopher banged on the piano.

“We’re going to need to soundproof our living room,” Bucky mumbled and leaned more against Steve and swayed them back and forth a little. “I love you, Steve. The holidays are making me lovesick and romantic. I just want to sweep you away for a sexy private weekend somewhere together.”

Steve nuzzled Bucky’s neck affectionately and he kissed over his jaw. “Well, why don’t you wait and see what Santa brought us this year before you get too forlorn about us not having much time together lately,” Steve said. He pulled back a little to smile at his husband.

Bucky was going to comment about how if Santa brought them sex stuff then that was a little strange, given that Santa, in their case, was Tim. But he decided not to be a killjoy. “Fine. I’ll wait,” he grumbled and gave Steve’s side a little pinch. “Do you want to gather Becca’s gifts and go have Christmas with her while the kids are distracted?”

“Let’s do that,” Steve agreed. Sarah said that she would keep an eye on everyone upstairs while they had their mini Christmas with Becca. “Let’s save a few smaller presents for when she’s feeling better so it’ll be a nice surprise, though,” he said. “Nothing big. Just something for her to enjoy when she’s in better spirits.”

“You sure? Don’t you think it would be nicer to have them now? She needs cheering up,” Bucky said and gathered boxes into a laundry basket to take downstairs. “At least, if it were me, that’s what I would want. But maybe you’re right. Ask Lilly what she thinks.” Bucky had definitely not been spending as much time with his sisters lately as he would have liked to. They were each just so busy with school and extracurriculars and he was always at work. Plus, Becca worked at the library two days a week after school for a couple hours so he didn’t see her at all those days. He missed them.
“I’ll ask Lilly. Let me go get her,” Steve said. He wanted to cuddle Sarah May anyway and give Lilly a break from watching her. His daughter reached up for him as soon as she saw him, so he gathered her up in his arms. “Hey, Lilly. Your brother and I are going to open some presents with Becca,” he said. “Do you think we should save a present or two for when she’s feeling better?”

“What do you mean ‘save’?” Lilly questioned from behind the barnyard farm set she and Sarah May had been playing with. “Because if it were me, I would mad if I found out you didn’t let me have all my presents on Christmas. But Becca might like it if you make a big deal out of it. Like maybe give her one every day she’s sick so she knows we aren’t trying to ignore her while she’s like this.”

“I guess we could give her all of her Christmas presents and get her little things every day until she feels better,” Steve said, giving in a bit too easily. “Can you help us bring her stuff downstairs? I’ll bring Sarah May to my mom and then carry the rest of the presents downstairs.”

Lilly nodded and picked up the barn to take to Sarah too. She helped Bucky carry down the first laundry basket of gifts and then got more cold water and some toast for Becca who complained about the type of jam Lilly chose. She also complained about being too hot and too cold at the same time and how she had a terrible headache. But eventually, Steve came down with the last presents and she shut up.

Steve knew that Becca would be huffing and rolling her eyes at anyone who was bellyaching as much as she was right now, which made him all the more eager to help her get better to put her out of this misery. “Are you done complaining now that we have all of Santa’s presents here for you?” he teased fondly as he brought one over to her.

“Santa’s not real, Steve,” Becca said flatly and pulled her first present into her blankets. “And Bucky thinks it’s going to be an issue down the road when your kids find out the truth and think you guys are liars. He’s only playing along because you made a big deal of it.” She was very cavalier as she talked and ripped open the paper to find a fancy new journal with her name monogrammed on the front. “Thanks. It’s lovely,” she mumbled.

“Or our kids will understand that we did it to bring a little magic into their lives and realize that their parents went through all that work to make life a little extra special to them,” Steve said patiently back to her when he got the chance. “You’ve got snot dripping out of your nose, by the way.” Steve passed her and Lilly a present he had bought them. He always got them something matching every year and this year it was a bracelet that had ‘World’s Best Aunt’ engraved on the inside and the birthstones of all of his and Bucky’s kids on it.

Becca grabbed a tissue and wiped her nose furiously. “Of course, I have snot dripping out of my nose. I’m sick.” She and Lilly opened the bracelets together. Lilly put hers on, but Becca managed to turn the words around so it was just a silver bar with two birthstones on each side. Evidently, she didn’t like the saying.

“Steve, Baby, don’t poke the bear,” Bucky whispered and kissed his cheek. Steve had only seen Becca this sick once before.

---

Steve’s shoulders slumped a little when Becca pointedly hid the words. He gave Bucky a look that silently promised a rant about his sister-in-law later. He was going to pass another present to Lilly but he kind of needed to feel better, so he gave Bucky a card instead. Inside the card was a little love note and two tickets to go see David Bowie at Madison Square Garden the following September, which also meant they were probably going to stay overnight in a hotel, too.

---

Becca was preoccupied with opening a gift from Lilly so Bucky went ahead and opened his card. “What’s this, Steve?” he asked with a smile and pulled out the tickets. “Oh, my god. Another concert? David Bowie! Fuck, yeah. Thank you!” He pulled Steve in for a kiss and gripped his hand tightly in his hair to keep him close for a second. “You know how much I love Bowie. God, Steve, you’re incredible. I’ll read the letter later, I promise. It looks long and important and if I’m going to cry, I don’t want it to be in front of grumpy ass Becca.”

---

Steve knew that Bucky would love the present and he was beyond happy it went over well. He wrapped his arms around Bucky’s shoulders and kissed him deeply. “It’s okay, you don’t have to read it now,” he said. “I know that we don’t get to spend much time together, so a weekend getaway in Manhattan would... you know, solve that a little. Also, it’s David Bowie. How could I pass that up?”

---

“I can’t wait for a weekend getaway. It’s been months. The last time we had even twelve hours alone was the Ramones concert in June,” Bucky said and gave Steve another warm, slow kiss. “I love you, Steve Rogers-Barnes.”

Becca made a noise then and got their attention. “Hey, this isn’t make-out time. It’s present time. I didn’t get to have normal Christmas because I’m dying.”

---

Steve’s spirits were lifted right back up. “I love you, too, Buck.” He purposely made out with Bucky just a little while longer to annoy Becca. Eventually, as a peace offering, he passed Becca a present. Inside was an acceptance letter to a local college program where she could take a class for college credit while still in high school. “I thought you might want to get one of your prerequisites out of the way so you can fill your schedule with classes you like when you’re going to college for real.”

---

Becca, for all her poise and icy bravado, couldn’t keep her emotions about this from showing on her face as she read through the letter. She knew the implications of something like this, she could get through college much faster and probably manage more than one degree at a time. She hadn’t even seriously considered this as an option and she worried about the added cost of those classes. “This says that the school will cover half my tuition? How did I get a scholarship like that?"

Bucky, who had helped Steve make the application for Becca, said, “Well, Becca, we sent them your grades from the past few years and I wrote a letter about how dedicated you are to your education and just the general need to pursue knowledge.”

---

Steve squeezed Bucky’s hand when he saw Becca get excited. Steve hadn’t ever gone to college, so the whole application process was a bit beyond him. Bucky helped a lot in that aspect. “We’re paying for a class so you can take it before you graduate high school. You don’t have to go to this college when it’s time to go, but at least you know that you have a scholarship here if you do choose this one.”

---

Bucky nodded and handed Becca another tissue. “Exactly. And if you choose a different school then I’m guessing you can apply for other scholarships too. You’re really smart and you have the proof in your grades. And any college will be lucky to have you attend. They will be dying to say that Rebecca Barnes is their alumnus.”

---

Steve laid his head on Bucky’s shoulder with a smile. He knew by now that it was hard to get a positive reaction out of the elder Barnes sister, so he treasured moments like these. He turned to grab a card and he handed it to Lilly. He bought the three of them tickets to the first Yankees home game of the season. He still had to go to a game with Bucky, but the three of them also deserved to have a sibling day together.

---

Becca kept blowing her nose and trying to pretend it was just because she was sick and not because she was crying while Lilly attacked Steve in a hug, almost knocking him to the ground. “The Yankees! Oh, my god,” Lilly yelled and clung to Steve. Lilly and Bucky reacted to exciting news quite similarly. “Are these good seats, Steve?”

---

Steve got the wind knocked out of him when Lilly hugged him but hugged her back but coughed as soon as he tried to take another breath. “I got you decent seats,” he said. “We kind of have a lot of kids under this roof and I didn’t want to go bankrupt come January,” Steve chuckled. “But they’re not in the back, I promise.”

---

“I’ll take anything. I don’t care. I’m actually going to Yankee Stadium,” Lilly said energetically and blew hair out of her eyes. She gasped and looked to Bucky with wide eyes. “I’m gonna see Don Mattingly! With my own eyes! I don’t know if I can handle that.”

---

Steve kissed the top of her head before letting her go and grinning at how excited she was. He snuggled up shyly against Bucky because, even now, he still got flustered whenever the girls had a big reaction to something he did. “You’re going to have to take lots of pictures while you’re there, right?”
“Will they let me?” she asked and looked to Becca since she usually knew things. “Don’t I have to be with the newspaper or TV to bring a camera in?”

Bucky thought it was okay but now he wasn’t sure. Some places charged people to take pictures with the players so maybe no cameras were allowed. “Well, even if you can’t, you and Steve will just have to pay close attention to the game. And eat like six hot dogs each.”

Steve looked surprised and pouted a bit. “Oh, Buck, I’m not going to this one. I got these tickets for you and the girls so you can have a nice day together.”

“Uh-uh, no, you’re going,” Bucky said and shook his head. “You bought the tickets, you thought of this. And you’ve been wanting to take Lilly to a baseball game for two years.” He would love to go. He would love to have a siblings’ day together with his sisters. But he also thought it was just as important for Steve to have a day with his sisters-in-law.

“It doesn’t matter that I bought the tickets, Buck. What matters is you spending time with your sisters,” he said, petting Bucky’s chest lightly. “I know how much you want to spend time with them and how you don’t have a lot of time together like you used to.”

Bucky hummed softly and smooshed his face against Steve’s neck for a moment to kiss him there. “I know, Baby. And I’m so grateful that you’re thinking about that. But I want you to go. And Lilly would much rather go with you. You will know more of what’s she’s talking about. Me, I would just be staring at the uniforms. You remember how distracted I was at your NYPD game.” It was partially a joke, but they also both knew it was very true.

Steve’s shoulders slumped a little. Of course, Steve was going to be a little more dramatic than necessary, but that was kind of his thing at this point. Lilly rolled her eyes when she saw him. “Come on, Steve. It’ll be fun! Bucky won’t be any help at the game. All he’s going to do is go new-husband-shopping with his eyes.”

“Listen to Lilly,” Bucky agreed and leaned his head against Steve again. “You three will have fun. And it’ll make me happy to know my husband is having bonding time with his in-laws.”

Becca sniffled and offered quietly, “Besides, you’re the one who always helps Lilly redo her trading cards so it only seems fair that you get to go as a reward.”

“Alright,” Steve finally gave in. He turned to Bucky. “Then that means you’ve got to stay home that day and watch the kids so you get to have a day with them. My mom will probably help, Of course.” She loved her sons and her grandbabies too much to let them run their parents ragged all day.
“I’ll stay home, of course. I love being with the kids. It’ll just be a Papa day. Maybe we will go to the aquarium. That would be nice.” Bucky snuggled himself close against Steve and wrapped his arms around him. Becca kept opening her gifts - most of which were books and a couple VHS tapes of documentaries that Bucky had to mail-in to order. But by the time she was done, she was so tired again and wanted to nap in peace.

“They’ll love being able to spend time with you. Adriana always asks every hour how long before you get back from work,” Steve said. He followed Lilly and Bucky back upstairs once Becca went to sleep again.
Chapter Summary

Second Part of Christmas '86.

Chapter Notes

Also, I don't know if anyone but me noticed (Because I have been waiting for it), but this work is now the longest SteveBucky fic on AO3 (at least currently as of Halloween 2018)! As a footnote, it is the longest SteveBucky ONLY fic. There is one fic, a multi-ship fic, that is much longer - it has SteveBucky in it as well as others that Steve and Bucky are individually part of, so I feel like it holds it's title but this one holds the title for non-multi-ship SteveBucky.

“I think we did well for Christmas this year, don’t you? Everyone got something they really liked,” Steve said. He was happy with how the morning was so far, besides Becca feeling so sick and upset.

---

Bucky agreed and pulled Steve aside for a second. “You haven’t gotten your gift from me yet,” he said and pulled Steve’s hands up to hold his against his chest. “It’s not as good as concert tickets. And it wasn’t too expensive. But it was fun to make and the kids helped and I think you’ll like it. It’s just maybe not as good as last year’s gift of all the gardening stuff.”

---

Steve smiled and leaned into his husband. “I put that gardening stuff to good use. Did you see the amount of herbs I was able to grow?” he asked proudly. He kissed Bucky’s cheek and added, “it doesn’t matter how expensive it is, Buck. You got it for me, so I know I’m going to love it.”

---

“I did see your herbs, yes. The garden was perfect for you,” Bucky agreed and pulled out a large flat wrapped package from the hall closet. “This needs a little backstory. Um, so last time you were at the doctor, your mom was out with friends so it was just me and the kids. I had Adriana watch the babies for a minute so I could go pee and I came back to all three of them in a pile of the clothes I had just folded. Adriana was wearing a sweater of yours, Sarah May had one of my hats on and Christopher was in your light purple button down. According to Adriana, it just happened and she had nothing to do with it. I don’t really believe her. But it gave me the idea to do this.” He handed the package to Steve and indicated that he could open it. It was a framed photo of the kids all together on the couch in Steve’s clothes with Diana wearing a T-shirt and resting her head on Adriana’s lap. It had taken Bucky about twenty minutes to get a picture where they were all looking at the camera. “I made the frame too. I just figured if I can make a frame then why should I buy one? And it gave me some time to do some woodworking which I haven’t done in a while.”
Steve’s eyes welled up with happy tears as he looked at the beautiful picture in his hands with a frame crafted by his most favorite man in the world. His heart soared and he touched the glass gently. “Oh, Bucky, this is so perfect. Look at how beautiful they all are. You even included my furry kid, too.” Because Diana was not-so-secretly his other child. “Thank you... thank you so much for this.”

Bucky let out a little sigh of relief and gently brushed his thumb over Steve’s cheek. “I know it’s not something fancy and it’s not like it’s expensive or took forever to make, but I thought you’d like it. And I thought it would be a good picture to have over our dresser or by the closet or something. We have the wall space.”

“I love it,” he said, hugging it to his chest. “I love you.” Steve leaned into Bucky’s side and kissed his cheek a few times. Diana trotted over to them and leaned against Steve’s legs, which was her usual when she wanted to be pet. Steve chuckled and he reached down to scratch behind her ears. “What would you like to do now, Sweetheart?”

“Are you asking me or Diana?” Bucky joked and carefully took the picture back and held it while Steve paid attention to the dog. “Are we wanting to take the whole family with us to the cemetery today? Or should someone stay here with the kids? I’m just a little worried about how much Christopher has been acting up.”

“Well, I was talking to Diana,” he joked back. “But the whole family should go,” Steve said. “I know that Christopher hasn’t been behaving lately, but he’s not going to learn if we leave him here to get special attention instead of socializing with the rest of his family.”

“I guess...” Bucky sighed and tucked his hair behind his ears. “I just don’t want him to be screaming and trying to run around at the plot. Christmas usually brings a lot of people to that cemetery and I don’t want him to be a nuisance or anything. And I don’t like when he tries to push over the headstones like they are giant blocks. It makes me anxious and tense.”

Steve’s shoulders dropped a little. “Maybe we can feed him before we go so he’s sleepy from eating?” he asked. “I don't know, Bucky. I agree with what you’re saying, but it doesn’t feel right to leave him behind. I feel bad enough that Becca is going to have to stay back.”

“Yeah, she’s not going to be happy about that,” Bucky said forlornly and touched Steve’s chest. “I guess we can try, with Christopher, I mean. Let’s go after lunch so he’ll be less energetic. But let’s leave Diana with Becca. Christopher will think it’s park-time if Diana is there.”
Steve didn’t look too happy to leave Diana behind but he also couldn’t fault Bucky’s logic for it. Besides, if it came between having his son or the dog there, he wanted his son with their family. “Alright,” Steve gave in. “I really do hope he behaves. He’s such a smart boy. I don’t know why he’s resorting to tantrums lately.”

---

“It’s a phase,” Bucky assured Steve. “Kids do this around two years old. He will grow out of it just in time for Sarah May to start hers. Apparently, I was pretty horrible during my terrible twos. My dad claims I was worse than Lilly but I can’t believe that.”

---

“Sarah May is too sweet to have terrible twos.” Steve had also said that about Christopher, though. “I could see you being a pain in the butt toddler, wanting to play the cool guitar at the store but throwing a fit when your parents said no. Or refusing to have that hair of yours brushed.”

---

Bucky shook his head and kept rubbing his hands over Steve’s chest and sides. “No, she will have it. It might just be different from Christopher’s is all. And I definitely, definitely didn’t like brushing my hair. I still don’t most days, you know this.” He gently touched the ends of his hair and grinned. “It’s getting pretty long right now. I really do kind of look like a rocker.”

---

Steve leaned into his husband and nuzzled his neck affectionately. “I like your long hair,” he said. “It’s going to be fun to pull later when we get some alone time.”

---

Bucky growled quietly and wrapped his arms around Steve. “You’re a tease,” he complained. “But I can’t wait. I miss your strong body on mine, Baby. And I’m going to make sure I’m really awake so we can take our time. I’ll drink some coffee and eat sugary desserts so I’m energetic and maybe needing a little manhandling to calm down.”

---

“I’ll keep you pinned under me for as long as you want,” Steve said softly. He pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair and kissed him a few times. He got a look in his eyes like he was about to suggest that they sneak to their room now for a quick something but Adriana came over and tugged on Bucky’s shirt.

“Papa, will you play with me?” she asked and held up her new policewoman.

---

Bucky was all ready to drag Steve upstairs with him and at least just suck him off for a bit. But the kids were more important. So, he sighed quietly and squeezed Steve’s arms before turning to Adriana. “Yes, Peanut, let’s play until lunchtime. But then I’ll have to help Daddy make food for everyone, okay, Love?”

---

Adriana climbed up Bucky’s leg like a little monkey and hugged him. “Okay,” she said happily.
“Can you use your silly voice for the dolls too?” Steve smiled as he watched the two, so happy that Bucky brought her into their lives. She was so much better off here.

---

“Oh, I suppose,” Bucky said with an exaggerated sigh so she would know he was joking around. They played together for about a half hour until Adriana got bored of playing with dolls and decided to have some coloring time instead. Bucky took that as a good time for him to go help Steve make lunch. “Sandwiches today, Baby?”

---

Steve spent the afternoon sitting with his mom and chatting about her friends. They spent time together most days, but they mostly talked about the kids instead of what was going on with her life. When it came time for lunch, Steve went to the kitchen to start working. “I was thinking of making soup since Becca isn’t feeling well.”

---

“Oh, okay, sure. Soup,” Bucky mumbled and looked down as Christopher came running into the kitchen and waited patiently next to Bucky. “I did promise Christopher he could have a peanut butter and jelly sandwich. He kept saying, ‘Jelly, Papa, jelly.’ And signing ‘sandwich’ at me.”

“Jelly sammy!” Christopher yelped and raised his hands up over his head.

---

“Oh.” Steve looked down at Christopher, who was behaving himself even if he was being a little loud. “Did your papa promise you a sandwich? Well, we can’t have you missing out on that, Bean!” Steve turned and kissed Bucky’s cheek. “I’ll make the soup and get out the peanut butter and jelly. Maybe you can take a head count on who wants soup and who wants sandwiches?”

---

Bucky went around the house and consulted with everyone as to what they wanted to eat. “Adriana wants a sandwich too and Lilly wants both. Becca said she would try to eat a little soup. Your mom is fine with soup. I’m fine with soup. Sarah May can have a little bowl of soup and maybe a fourth of a sandwich.” He hoisted Christopher up into his high chair and asked him to wait patiently. He also gave him some grapes to hold him over. “I’ll make the sandwiches.”

---

“Alright,” Steve said and gave Bucky’s ass a playful swat as he moved around the kitchen. “So, the concert isn’t until a while, so I know it’s not going to be an immediate Christmas present. I was thinking we should have a date night doing something more local in the meantime.”

---

“What kind of date night?” Bucky asked as he put peanut butter on a stick of celery to chew on. “I think we’re too much of a pair of fathers to go to the club again. Plus, it’s just not really that intriguing anymore.” He also wasn’t so sure they should rent a hotel because they really needed to budget those expenses.
“No, not the nightclub. We’ll be like grandpas there,” Steve said. “I was thinking more along the lines of a museum or a free show and then having dinner somewhere quiet,” Steve answered. “You know, something to get us out of the house.”

---

“We wouldn’t be grandpas. We are still young. I’m only going to be twenty-seven in March,” Bucky said and then shook his head. “Twenty-seven, oh, my god, I am old. Oh, my god, museums and quiet dinners... we are grandpas, Steve. Damn. In a year and a half, Becca is going to be looking to move out. Then Adriana is going to be old enough to buy cigarettes and Christopher is going to be dating and Sarah May will be in college. Oh, my god, Steve, my life is spiraling before my old grandpa eyes.”

---

“You’re old, Buck. It’s time to face the music,” Steve said with a playful smile. He poured soup into bowls for everyone. “Adriana isn’t going to ever buy cigarettes,” Steve complained. “She’s going to stay our little princess forever and Christopher will never be potty trained and Sarah May will want to snuggle us every day of the week.”

---

“If I have to face the fact that I’m growing older every year, then you have to face the fact that our kids will grow up too,” Bucky sassed back and pressed up behind Steve to wrap his arms around him. “God, you’re warm. And you smell so nice.” He hummed and kissed the back of Steve’s neck. “I want you so bad, Baby. I can’t wait for tonight. I want to bite you right now, I’m so impatient.”

---

“I’ll never face that fact,” Steve countered with a little smile. He leaned back into Bucky’s chest and snuggled him. “How about you give me a little bite, then? No one is watching.” Christopher was too busy eating his grapes and everyone else was in the living room. “Make me more impatient for night to come too.”

---

Bucky chuckled low in his throat and reached a cold hand up to pull Steve’s shirt back from his neck. “I love you, Baby,” he whispered and licked a line across Steve’s shoulder up to his neck before biting down probably a little too hard for a few seconds.

---

Steve had to cover his mouth to stifle the little moan that came out when Bucky bit him. He didn’t even care that Bucky’s hands desperately needed some warming up. He turned in his husband’s arms so he could claim his lips in a deep kiss. “If only you knew the things that are running through my head right now,” he rumbled quietly.

---

“I want to know,” Bucky whispered and moved one of Steve’s hands up to tangle in his hair. “It’s Christmas, Steve. Give me a little present. Tell me what you’re thinking. We can always sneak off for a few minutes while everyone is eating and we can make out. I might be able to suck you off real fast.”
Steve pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair nice and slow. “I’m thinking about how beautiful you’re going to look with bite marks and hickeys all over your body,” he purred softly on his ear. “And how nice you’re going to feel underneath me when we’re making love. I’m going to fuck you nice, slow, and deep.”

---

Bucky whined quietly and tightened his grip on Steve. He loved his husband. He always had, of course. But sometimes it would hit him again just how amazingly lucky he was to be married to Steve. “I’m so crazy in love with you,” he said and slotted his lips with Steve’s for a wet, passionate kiss that he wished could go on forever.

---

Steve closed his eyes and let himself get lost in the kiss. He held the sides of Bucky’s face to keep him there and then his fingers slid back to hold the back of his head as he dipped Bucky down a bit. He finally parted and put a hand on Bucky’s chest to keep him at bay as he caught his breath. He gave Bucky a shy smile once he was able to breathe regularly again. “Come on, Romeo. Let’s feed our family.”

---

Bucky slumped forward and reached to give Steve one parting touch to his arm before gathering up the sandwiches and bringing them to the table. Once everyone but Becca was ready for lunch, Bucky cut up Christopher and Sarah May’s sandwiches into bite-sized pieces. “Lilly, Becca won’t be able to go with us to the cemetery today. She’s too sick. It’s entirely your choice if you want to come with us. I thought I would give you a heads-up.”

---

Christopher made his usual mess in his high chair before starting to eat his food. Sarah May insisted on having her papa feed her and would whine whenever she finished her current mouthful and Bucky didn’t have another piece of sandwich ready. “I don't know,” Lilly said. “I think I want to stay home today.”

---

Bucky knew Sarah May was perfectly capable of eating her own food but he had a hard time getting her to do it herself. She often would hand him food just so he could feed her and would only do it herself if it was clear she wasn’t going to get her way. “That’s fine, Lil. You don’t have to. I kind of thought you might want to stay here with Becca.” They both knew it was better for someone to stay around when Becca was sick. He was going to stay if Lilly had decided to go.

---

Steve wasn’t too happy that Lilly wouldn’t be with them either. He wanted his family altogether. “If you’re staying here, then you have to check in on her and actually make sure she’s alright,” he said.

---

“Steve, I’ve been helping with sick Becca for much longer than you have. I’ve got it,” Lilly assured him and poured out a bowl of soup to take downstairs for her sister. “She’ll be fine.” She grabbed a bottle of cold medicine and stuck it in her jacket pocket before filling up a glass of water and heading downstairs.
“Sarah, are you coming with us?” Bucky asked as he handed orange slices to each of his kids.

---

“I’d love to go with you boys, but I’d feel much more comfortable staying here to make sure Becca is fine. I don’t like the thought of no adult supervision when someone isn’t feeling well,” she said. Steve’s shoulders slumped a little more since half the family wasn’t going now.

---

Bucky felt totally fine with leaving the girls alone. He left them alone a lot even before he had Steve in his life. They knew how to take care of themselves. But he didn’t want to stomp on Sarah’s motherly and nursing instincts to take care of Becca. “Steve, Baby, since everyone else is staying here, maybe we should just leave the kids and go by ourselves. If it’s just me and you, we can spend more time talking with Grant than keeping the other kids in check.”

---

“Bucky,” Steve said with a frown. “The kids need to see their brother on Christmas. And how do you think he will feel without his whole family there for him?” Steve started to tear up a little even though it was a little silly of him. He knew that the kids would all need looking after and with the two of them outnumbered, it was unlikely that they would get much time talking to their second son.

---

“Okay, okay, hey,” Bucky started and reached to hold his hands on Steve’s face. “Okay, I’m sorry. I get it. We can take the kids. It is important for them to be with Grant on Christmas.” He shook his head, hating himself for even suggesting that they could leave the kids. He hated making Steve cry. “I’m sorry, Love.”

---

Sarah was a little more practical than her son was, so she gave Bucky an apologetic look because she knew that between their three kids, at least one of them was going to kick up a fuss. Steve leaned into Bucky’s hands and wrapped his arms around his husband. “It’s okay,” he mumbled. “I’m going to get the kids bundled up.”

---

“Alright,” Bucky murmured and watched Steve get up and take Sarah May and Christopher with him, Adriana trailing after them. He sighed and rubbed his face before looking over at Sarah. “It’s hard to say no to him. And he always looks so sad, too. I hate that. I hate making him sad.”

---

“Try being a poor, single mom and coming home to that face,” she chuckled, though it was obvious she still had her own guilt for not giving Steve everything he deserved as a kid. “It’s not your fault, Bucky. I think the kids should stay home today, too, but I know why it’s so important to him. He still goes there almost every day for a few minutes.”

---

“I know,” Bucky sighed again. “You know, it’s interesting to me the similarities and differences in the ways he and I react to loss. When my parents died, I avoided the cemetery, pretended they were still alive, and spiraled into self-destruction and neglect. And he goes to the cemetery every day. He worries about the kids constantly - even if he hears one of them sneeze, he might think they are ill. He’s putting no attention into his own health and always worries over everyone else.”

---

Sarah stood up and gave Bucky a hug. “If you average the two of you out, you would probably make one human being that deals with loss in a healthy way,” she teased fondly. “I’d like to say that it’s just because he’s still a new parent, but we both know he’s going to worry about those kids until the day he dies.” Sarah let go and stepped back. “Steve will be fine. Eventually.”

---

Bucky nodded and looked up at Sarah with big pleading eyes for her to help him figure out those parts of Steve that he still couldn’t unlock. “He stopped looking for a therapist. He tried two people and both of them were homophobic so he just... stopped looking. And I know he only gave those two a try because I wanted him to. But I think he needs to try another. I think it’ll help him.”

---

Sarah was even more against Steve finding a therapist than Steve originally had been. But with the way Bucky was looking at her and knowing how important it was to him that her son find help, she supposed that she would put a little faith in Bucky. “If that’s what you think, then I’ll look to find someone I think would be a good fit for him.”

---

There was a long, soft moment of silence between them as Bucky took in the fact that even Sarah was budging a little on her opinion about this. He hadn’t expected that at all. She tended to think she always knew what was best for Steve, more so than Bucky. And sometimes she was right about what she thought Steve needed and other times Bucky was right. This was important to Bucky and Sarah recognized that. “Thank you,” he whispered and stood up to pull her in for a hug. “Thank you, Sarah. I just want him to feel better.”

---

It was still tough for Sarah to let someone else look after her son’s welfare when she was his sole line of support for so long. She hugged Bucky again and gave him a reassuring smile. “I know you do. And so do I.” She looked up when she heard Diana scrambling around the foot of the stairs, which meant Steve had the kids all bundled up now and she was hoping to get in on the walk as well.

---

Bucky’s eyes softened and he smiled when he saw his husband and his kids. The babies looked a little annoyed to be in their snow clothes and Christopher had already removed his hat and was dragging it behind him by the pompom on top. “Bean, you have to wear your hat,” Bucky said with a chuckle and bent down to put it on his head.

“No wanna hat!” Christopher grumped back and pulled it off again. “No, Papa.”

---

Steve was used to this fight since he tried taking Christopher out the most during his walks to wear him out for nap time. “But if you don’t wear a hat, Bean, the cold will freeze your ears off,” he said. “You want to keep your ears, don’t you?” He shifted Sarah May in his arms and tried to get the hat back on to Christopher’s head.
“Ears?” Christopher asked with wide eyes, his pronunciation sounding more like a ‘w’ than an ‘r’, which always made Bucky grin.

Bucky knelt down on the ground and took the hat from Steve to try it again. He even tied the strings together so maybe Christopher would just give up. But he just pulled it back off his head and let it dangle like a hood. “Oh, Little Bean. Please just cooperate on Christmas.”

Adriana decided it was her turn to help so she pulled off her hat and offered it to her brother. “Here, Christopher, you wanna wear mine? I have a hoodie so I don’t need my hat.”

Steve sighed when Christopher took the hat off again anyway. He also refused Adriana’s hat by hiding behind Bucky when she offered her hat out. “No, Ana! No hat.”

Steve gave her a little hug. “Thank you for trying, Peanut. That was very kind of you.”

Adriana wasn’t done yet. She was determined to get Christopher to at least try her hat. “Christopher, my hat is pretty and purple. And it’s soft. Feel,” she said and carefully moved his hand to touch the hat. “It’s purple,” she added again for emphasis and let go of it once he was holding it.

“Puwlpuwl,” he repeated mindlessly as he looked the hat over. He squeezed the fabric in his hands and tried to put it on but was having trouble with it. Christopher then held the hat up to Bucky for help. “Papa?” he asked. Steve had to contain his excitement so he didn’t scare Christopher out of wearing the hat.

Bucky nodded and adjusted the hat on his son’s head. It was a little too big and he had to roll the front of it up so it wasn’t in his eyes. “Look at you, so adorable in Sissy’s purple hat,” he cooed and gave Christopher a kiss on his cheek. “Can you thank Ana for letting you wear her hat, Bean?”

Christopher toddled up to Adriana and smooshed against her in a hug. She giggled happily and hugged her brother back. “You’re welcome.” She felt very accomplished for being able to help her dads out.

Steve put her hood up and held her hand. “You ready to head out, Peanut?” Diana ran and grabbed her leash from her basket and sat at the front door with it hanging out of her mouth, whining at Steve and Bucky.

Bucky looked down at Diana and then up at Steve. He really didn’t think it was a good idea for her to come along today, especially since now it would be just Steve and Bucky with the kids. And Steve had said he was okay with leaving her home this time. But she also looked really excited about the thought of going out. “Diana, stay. Sorry, girl. You have to stay this time.”
Steve felt bad for her and let go of Adriana’s hand for a moment to pet Diana. “Tomorrow, Diana. I promise.” Diana gave them the most pathetic look before slinking off to the living room once the door was closed.

“Do you know if Grant likes me?” Adriana asked as they walked down the street. “I ‘brought’ him flowers the last time.”

“Brought. ‘I brought him flowers the last time,’” Bucky said carefully. “And, yes, he does like you. He loves you, even. He loves you a lot. So, do your Granny and Papaw. They are all really happy to have you in their family, Baby.”

Sarah May wiggled against Steve’s chest and said, “Papaw,” tentatively, like she was trying out the word to see if she liked it.

Adriana huffed when Bucky corrected her but Steve gave her hand a small squeeze to calm her down. He smiled at Sarah May when she spoke up. “Yes, Papaw,” he praised. “We’re going to see Granny and Papaw today,” Steve said to her. He looked over to Bucky with a happy smile. “Why don’t you tell the kids a story about your dad?”

“Hmm,” Bucky hummed and thought about what story he could tell that wouldn’t come out too sad or confusing for the kids. “Well, Adriana, when I was your Aunt Lilly’s age, and your Aunt Becca was your age, Papaw loved to play games with us when he came home from work. He really liked doing jigsaw puzzles most. And one day he took a small puzzle and hid it somewhere in the house. And he gave Becca pieces of paper with letters on them that spelled out where it was hidden. She worked so hard to put the letters together in the right place, with some help from me on the wrong ones. But after a while we had the word, she sounded it out, and we found the puzzle in a cabinet in the kitchen. He was so proud of Becca for getting it all worked out.”

“Becca wasn’t good at reading?” Adriana assumed that Becca had been born knowing everything already just like she had assumed about her parents. It was an adorable mistake to make. “Can you do a puzzle like that for me?” It sounded like fun and now that she was getting better at reading, she also had more fun with activities like that.

“She had to learn and figure it out just like you do, Peanut,” Bucky said and gave Adriana a smile. “We can definitely do something like that with you. Maybe we can get Aunt Becca to help set it up. Would that be fun?” He figured Becca would be more interested to help with something like that than some of the other stuff that he had asked her to do with the kids before.

“That would be so fun!” Adriana said. Aunt Becca didn’t play with her as much as Aunt Lilly and her nana did, so Adriana was extra excited whenever Becca was involved. Steve loved how much she looked up to her aunts even though he knew that Becca didn’t have the patience sometimes for all of their kids. “If I do puzzles can I go to college like Becca?”

---

They were nearing the cemetery and that gut resistance that he always got when he saw the gate kicked in like usual. He had to take in a breath and clear his mind for a second so he wouldn’t start thinking on all the reasons he used to not come to the cemetery and then want to turn around and leave. “Y-yeah, Baby. You can go to college if you want. You don’t have to do puzzles to do that, though. It’s just your choice. But that’s a long while off from now.”

---

Steve let go of Adriana’s hand briefly so he could rub Bucky’s back in encouraging, able to sense that Bucky wasn’t feeling his normal self once inside. Steve understood. Sometimes, he dreaded seeing his son’s name written on the tombstone. “Papa,” Christopher said, wiggling in Bucky’s arms. “Down.”

---

Bucky carefully set Christopher down but kept both his hands in his just held over his little head as he walked. He was not in the mood for Christopher to try to run off from him. He nodded towards a corner section of headstones by a big tree. “When my parents were first buried in this cemetery, none of those headstones were there. It was just that tree and there used to be a bench,” Bucky said quietly to Steve. “Makes me sad to think that in six and a half years, something like thirty people have been buried in that section alone.”

---

Christopher jumped as he walked, which made walking a bit more cumbersome for Bucky, but Steve slowed down to accommodate their son. “These people could’ve gone of old age after living long, fulfilling lives,” Steve suggested. “There’s going to be a day when we’re better off in heaven than in the physical world. And that’s not something we have to be sad about. Death can be a beautiful part of life when it’s not brought too soon.”

---

“Yeah,” Bucky mumbled and took a shaky little breath, already getting worked up about being here. He could feel himself about to cry already. He didn’t mention how the people in his life hadn’t died of old age but were taken from him much too soon. Steve, obviously, already knew that. “Steve,” he whispered when he saw their family come into view just past the tree. For some reason, this was a lot harder today than usual.

---

Steve frowned with concern and wrapped an arm around Bucky’s shoulders. Adriana was disappointed that her dad let go of her hand again, but she noticed that her papa was upset so she moved around Christopher so she could hug his leg. “It’s Christmas, Baby,” Steve said gently to Bucky. “It’s going to make them so happy to see you today.”

---

“I know, I know,” Bucky said with a little nervous nod. “I know. I’m sorry. It’s just more difficult today than normal. Christmas without them... is just really tough.” He bent down and picked Christopher up again so he could be contained for at least a few minutes. “Sorry, I’m fine. I’m fine. Promise.” He just wanted his parents and his baby boy here with him on Christmas. He wanted his family complete again.

“Don’t be Sorry, Buck. I miss our son, too. And I know how much you miss your parents,” Steve said. He walked over to the plot and sat down in front of Grant’s headstone. He cuddled Sarah may against his chest and Adriana sat in his lap too.

“Papa, when I’m in heaven, am I going to have my own rock here, too?” she asked.

Bucky looked down at Adriana’s curious little face. She was so young and was already so exposed to loss and death and that just really got to Bucky. He couldn’t think about the fact that all his babies and his sisters and Steve would all be gone one day. It was too much right now. “Um,” he tried to answer but then a gasp of a sob popped out of his mouth and he hid his face behind Christopher for a moment.

Adriana’s face fell immediately because she thought she did something wrong. Her bottom lip quivered and she whimpered as tears started to fall. Steve wished he had more arms to hug everyone but he settled for hugging his daughters in each arm and laying his head against Bucky. “Do you want some time alone with your parents, Buck?” he asked softly.

Bucky felt horrible for making Adriana cry too. She was so sensitive about thinking she had done something wrong and he wished he was better at schooling his own emotions so she wouldn’t have to guess about why Papa was so upset and wonder if it was because of her. “No, Steve, it’s okay. I’m sorry. I’m sorry, Adriana. I’m so sorry, Peanut. Papa is just really sad. It’s not your fault, my sweet girl. It’s not you,” he reached to brush tears from Adriana’s face and hoped to god that she believed him. “I’m sorry, Peanut.”

Adriana hid away in Steve’s chest when Bucky tried to reassure her. She was certain that Bucky was only saying that to try and make her feel better. Steve pet a hand down her back. “Hey, Peanut, your pop is telling the truth. You didn’t do anything wrong.” She still kept her face hidden in his chest but she turned away from their reassuring touches. Steve looked up at Bucky with an apologetic expression. “It’s not your fault, either,” he reminded.

Bucky just cried more. He tried again to get Adriana to look at him but she wouldn’t. He wasn’t sure what to do. “Adriana, Sweetie, I promise it’s not your fault that Papa is upset,” he said again and scooted a little closer to them with Christopher in his arms trying to wiggle out. “Peanut, you want to know why I’m so sad? Here, let me try to explain.” He nudge her side and pointed at the headstones. “You know that your brother is here. And your Granny and Papaw. But Granny and Papaw are my mommy and daddy. Just like Nana is Daddy’s mommy. And sometimes, like on Christmas, it’s really hard for me to think about my son and my mommy and daddy all being here instead of at home with me and you and everyone.”
“Why are you sad? There’s no room for them in the house,” Adriana mumbled. Steve didn’t mean to laugh but he did. Adriana was still a bit mad about being left alone so she wasn’t so sad about her birth parents being dead. She didn’t quite understand how sad Bucky was over his parents and son.

Steve nudged her over gently so she finally hugged Bucky instead. “Peanut, your pop loves everyone here very much. You would be sad if me or Papa went to heaven and couldn’t spend Christmas with you.”

---

Bucky clung to Adriana once she hugged him and he kissed her hair gently. He wasn’t sure how long it would take for her to understand, but he hoped it would be soon. He didn’t like having to explain every time what it was like not having his parents and his son anymore. Adriana’s birth parents died before she knew them and then she got new parents to take care of her so it was a different kind of loss. But he decided to focus on a different part of this right now - instead of trying to talk about how young his parents were when they died and how much he wasn’t ready. “Adriana, we wouldn’t be living in that house if Granny and Papaw were alive. We would have a different home.”

---

Sarah May wiggled to get put down and since, she usually was a trustworthy baby, Steve let her wander on the ground. “What house would we live in?” Adriana asked. “Would we live in Big Tim’s house?” Sarah May fell on her butt a few steps into walking towards the headstones and chose to sit there looking up at a bird in a tree.

---

“Uh, no, Baby, we wouldn’t live with Tim. We would just live in a different house,” Bucky said. “Aunt Lilly and Aunt Becca would live in our home with Granny and Papaw and your siblings and you would live with Daddy and me at a different place - probably with Nana.”

---

“But I like living with Lilly and Becca,” she sighed. Adriana looked at the gravestones. “Who are the people buried there?” she asked, pointing at the next plot over. “Do they know it’s Christmas or do they need us to tell them?”

---

Bucky followed to where Adriana was pointing and looked down the rows of graves. They weren’t the only family here today. There were four other groups he could see in the cemetery but they were all too far to hear them. “No, Baby, they know. It’s okay. I’m sure the rest of the people here will have family coming today and tomorrow to talk. It’s very nice of you to be concerned about them though. Right, Daddy? Adriana is very thoughtful.”

---

Steve nodded. “Yes, you are a very kind and thoughtful person, Peanut.” He was about to ask her to come closer since she had been wandering over towards the other plot, but he got distracted when Sarah May started to make scared little noises. An aunt was crawling around on her pant leg and she couldn’t shake it off.

---
Bucky looked over at Sarah May too as she lifted her leg up towards Steve and cried and made nonsensical noises for help. “Ya-Ya, it’s just a little bug,” Bucky said calmly so maybe she would calm down too. But then she noticed more ants coming from a little hole between the gravestone and the snow and she yelped louder about it.

---

Steve calmly brushed the bug off and pulled her into his lap. “Hey, it’s okay, Sweet Pea. They’re just little ants. They won’t hurt you, Love.” Christopher saw the onslaught of insects and ran over to stomp and jump on the hole. “Oh, no, Bean, don’t do that-” Steve groaned.

---

Apparently, once Steve had removed the little ant and showed Sarah May that they weren’t harmful, she immediately became endeared to them. Because when Christopher stomped on the hole, she screamed and reached both arms out trying to stop him. Bucky was quick to pluck Christopher off the ground and hold him in a ball to his chest. But now Sarah May was crying and pointing at the spot where the ants’ escape was covered up.

---

“Oh, no,” Steve said with a concerned frown. “Oh, what a mess we have, little one! I’m sure Your gran and papaw are having a laugh at us right now,” he said to his crying daughter. “It’s okay. Um...” he looked around for an unearthed ant and let it crawl on his finger. “Look, Ya-Ya! Look, it’s okay! See, it’s crawling around just fine.”

---

Sarah May’s bottom lip stuck out and she mumbled to herself as tears kept coming down her face. But she watched the little bug crawl around Steve’s finger and it seemed to do the trick somewhat because she was sniffing back her tears and getting quieter.

Bucky sighed in relief and let Christopher down again. But then he noticed Adriana wasn’t with them anymore. “Adriana?” He looked around and couldn’t see her. “Steve, where did she go?”

---

Steve’s immediate mode was to internally panic when he couldn’t find one of his kids right away. He hastily put the ant back down and passed Sarah May to Bucky so he could go run and find her. They’d only taken their eyes off her for a few seconds. She couldn’t have gotten that far. Steve moved over the slight curve of a hill and was grateful to find her crouched in front of a headstone, sounding out the name under her breath. “Adriana!” Steve said in a scolding tone. “What were you doing wondering off like that? You scared us.”

---

Adriana looked up at her daddy and then back to the headstone. From where she was, the ground bowed just enough that she could still see the top of Bucky’s head. She had thought they could see her too. “I was... just reading. This grave says ‘Jo-Ann Morris’.” She could see the fire of worry in Steve’s eyes and she looked down at her feet, feeling for the second time today that she had really messed up.

---

Steve scooped her up and counted to ten in his head so he wouldn’t lose his temper with her. He took her hand and placed it on his chest so she could feel how fast his heart was beating as he walked her back to Bucky. “I’m proud that you could read that, Peanut, but do you feel how fast my heart is beating? That’s what happens when we can’t find you. When we’re outside, you have to be close enough to hold our hand, always.”

---

“I feel it,” Adriana murmured and refused to look directly into Steve’s eyes. “I could see you, Daddy. I could get back.” She was close to crying again but she was determined to keep it in this time.

---

“I know you could get back but it’s safest to be close to your dads or your nana, okay? But you’re back with us now and that’s all that matters, so chin up.” Steve kissed the top of her head and hugged her tighter.

---

Bucky was waiting with both babies in his arms and he smiled warmly when he saw Steve with Adriana. He hadn’t worried like Steve had. He assumed she was probably around and he would have only started to worry if they couldn’t find her in the cemetery. After all, it was all fenced in, so he figured she hadn’t made it out. “There’s my girl. Where did you go?”

---

Steve sighed in relief once they were all reunited again. “She went to go read some of the tombstones,” he said and pet his hand on her head a little more to be reassured she was still there.

---

“Oh, yeah? What did you learn, Peanut?” Bucky asked, a little absently as he prevented Christopher from taking off his gloves. “Steve, Baby, should we say what we want to and then head back? The babies are getting a little annoyed at being contained so much. And Christopher might be winding down for a nap.”

---

Adriana didn’t answer because she still felt upset over making her dads worry. Steve looked at all three of their kids looking more miserable by the second. “Sure,” he sighed. He knelt in front of Grant’s grave and said a prayer for him, then told him about their day so far and how much he missed him.

---

Bucky listened to Steve talk to their son and let him have his time in peace and quiet. Once he was done, Bucky added his piece to it and then gave a much shorter sentiment to his parents than usual since he knew the kids were ready to get out of here. He knew his parents would understand. And he would be back soon enough to talk some more. “Ready, Steve? If you want more time, I can take the kids back. It’s not that far, we will be fine.”

---

Steve really did want to spend more time with Grant, but he also didn’t want to have Bucky walk alone with their kids. They should all be together, really. “It’s okay, Buck. But thank you,” he said.
“I should get started on dinner anyway. Do you have any requests? Please, no spaghetti, though. My mom bought so much of it and that’s all she’s making lately.”

---

Bucky nodded and headed towards the gate with both babies still in his arms. Christopher was already blinking slowly and resting his head on Bucky’s chest. “We still have salmon. We could cook that and have mashed potatoes and green beans. The kids can have those frozen chicken nuggets instead of fish.”

---

“I like the sound of that,” Steve said. Nobody was watching them, so he leaned over to kiss Bucky’s cheek. “I love you,” he said softly.
Chapter Summary

Final Part of Christmas '86.

Their walk home from the cemetery was uneventful. Although, Sarah May made a point to tap Bucky’s shoulder at every dog they saw and go ‘woof’ to make sure he saw the dog too. “Did Christopher teach you that, Ya-Ya?” Bucky asked and kissed her cheek. Her brother was asleep in Bucky’s other arm and breathing heavily against his neck. “Your big brother has always loved to bark at the doggies too.”

The second they were back home, Bucky took the babies upstairs and put them down for a nap before returning to Steve and slowly wrapping his arms around him and letting out a content sigh. “I’m really sorry for being too emotional at the cemetery. I didn’t mean to make Adriana cry too.”

---

Steve set Adriana up to play with her new dolls in the living room before waiting in the kitchen for Bucky. “Babe, it’s not your fault. You have every right to be emotional.”

---

“I know. But I could have held it in a little. I know how sensitive she is about thinking he’s doing something wrong. I didn’t help that at all,” Bucky said softly and ran a thumb over Steve’s lips. “Christmas is the roughest day to be at the cemetery still. It’s been years without my parents and our second Christmas without Grant but it’s still too much.”

---

“No, Baby, you didn’t have to hold it in at all. Adriana has to learn that sometimes she might say something that isn’t bad even if it upsets us, we still love her and it’s not her fault or anything.” They just had to be extra patient when she was in her sensitive moods. “Christmas would be perfect if they were all here,” Steve said sadly. “I bet your dad would love wrangling Christopher and your ma probably would’ve liked Grant or Adriana the most. My Ma already has claim over Sarah May,” he said.

---

“Your mom does have claim over Sarah May,” Bucky agreed with a gentle smile. “My mom would have liked Adriana a lot, I think. She’s a lot like I was as a kid - curious and passionate but easily confused and often in tears.” His earliest memory was of being four years old and skinning his knee at the park and his mom used water from a public foundation to clean it out and then she told him that the reason people cry when they are hurt is because tears hold all a person’s strength, so the body is just trying to send some strength down to his hurt knee.

---

Their kids already had so many people to look out for them and love them, but they would have been even luckier to have Bucky’s parents around to dote in them. “You still are easily confused,” Steve accused fondly as he kissed him. “Even though you’re so smart.” Steve pulled Bucky along to follow him as he started up dinner.

“I am still easily confused,” Bucky agreed with a huff and gave Steve another kiss to his cheek. “Good thing I’ve got you to explain to me.” He grinned over at his husband. “Can I help with dinner? Or should I stay away from it like usual?” He was sometimes allowed to help if it was something Steve felt like Bucky couldn’t mess up.

“It’d be nice to cook together tonight,” Steve admitted. It was a rough trip to the cemetery and Steve wanted to have Bucky’s constant company right now. He pulled out the chicken nuggets so Bucky could take care of those. “How were you able to stay calm when Adriana ran off?”

Bucky smiled and nudged Steve’s side with his before taking the bag of chicken nuggets. He really liked when Steve let him help in the kitchen. “Well, I knew she couldn’t have gotten too far,” Bucky said. “The cemetery has a fence all around it and she’s too short to open the gate. It’s also too heavy for her to push. I would have gotten worried if we couldn’t find her in the cemetery anywhere.”

“Yeah, but what if a stranger could’ve taken her or what if she tripped and hurt herself?” Steve asked. “Trouble can happen in seconds. I’ve seen plenty of that happen when I was on patrol,” Steve sighed. He prepped everyone else’s food while the oven heated up.

“Sure, that could happen. But I consider the cemetery to be a fairly safe place. So, that’s not my first thought. It would have been my first thought if you came back without her,” Bucky said. “So, if she and I were at the store and I turn around and she’s gone, then my first thought would be that she was taken. Because I don’t consider the store to be safe.”

Steve nodded. “I understand. I guess it’s harder for me to keep calm like that.” He kissed Bucky’s cheek and started to boil water to make some rice. “She’s trying to read everything nowadays. Soon we won’t be able to spell words to work around saying things we don’t want her to know about.”

“I know you worry. It’s okay to worry. Hell, Steve, you know I’m always worried about everyone. But I think I’m less worried now than before I met you. I think it’s been good for me to have another person I can depend on to help me. You know? Now, when something’s wrong like that I can usually get myself to rule out the most likely answer before I get dizzy with what-ifs. And I struggle sometimes, but I’m a lot better about it now. Now, I can give it a critical look first.” He really did attribute that to Steve being with him. Before they had any kids, Steve was always good at getting Bucky to calm down when he was worried about the girls.

Steve nodded. It made sense, really. If he took a step back and ruled what was possible before focusing on what was also probable, then he would have an easier time not worrying about the possible-but-improbable. “I’m lucky to have you here,” he said. “I’d go nuts over everything.” Once the food was cooking, he walked behind Bucky and gave him a hug.

---

“I know, Baby,” Bucky said as he leaned back against Steve and held the arms that wrapped around him. “But that’s why we’re together. We’re better together. We’re supposed to be together.” He hummed happily and nodded, agreeing with himself as he closed his eyes and just let them sway slightly back and forth. “I want you. The kids’ bedtime needs to be early tonight so I can get to you faster.”

---

Steve smiled as they swayed together. He kissed his husband nice and slow with a low purr of approval. “I’ll make sure to tire them out after dinner,” Steve promised. Because nobody was around, he slid a hand down to cup Bucky between his legs. “My mouth will be all over this tonight.”

---

Bucky let out a quiet, breathy moan and shook his head. Steve was so sexy all the time. He always knew the right thing to do to him. “Baby, you’re making me blush,” he whispered and just let his weight fall a little bit more on Steve. “Is tonight going to be pretty typical for us or are we going to spice it up a little? We haven’t used the bed ties in a bit.”

---

“I know I am,” Steve said with a fond smile, leaning in to nibble Bucky’s jaw as he slipped his hand down the front of Bucky’s pants to fondle him. “How do you feel about using the bed ties and the blindfold?” he asked quietly, just in case his mom or one of the girls was walking by.

---

Bucky whined high in his throat at the gentle, warm touches Steve was giving. He knew this was a slippery slope because he was easily aroused and didn’t want to pop a boner in the kitchen but he also loved being held and touched by his husband so he wasn’t going to complain. “Yeah, both is good. Do you want to... never mind.” He shook his head and reached a hand up to touch Steve’s neck.

---

Steve smiled brightly because he knew exactly what he was doing to Bucky and he was also loving every second of it. “Talk to me, Sweetheart,” Steve said sweetly as he kissed down Bucky’s throat. “What were you going to ask?” He didn’t want Bucky to feel like he had to hide his wants from him.

---

“Um,” Bucky started and had to stop to take in a soft desperate gasp. “You’re amazing,” he mumbled before picking up again. “Well, we have new tapes for the video camera and we haven’t taped ourselves yet even though we’ve brought it up a couple times. Maybe tonight would be a good one. I look pretty cute today and you look perfect like always.”

---

Steve paused in thought but it really wasn’t that hard of a decision. “I like the sound of that, Baby.
You really do look cute today. More so than usual, and you’re gorgeous even on the average day.” He smiled at him and pecked his lips innocently. “Get one of the longer tapes. I don’t want to half-ass this one.”

---

“Long tape, got it,” Bucky agreed. “Maybe I’ll go get the camera set up right now while we’re waiting for dinner to cook. I need a couple minutes to calm down after the touching.” He gently pulled away from Steve, going slowly so Steve could adjust as they went and let him go. “I’ll be back. If dinner is ready before I’m done, then come get me.”

---

Steve washed his hands and finished up making everyone dinner. Thankfully, the kids behaved themselves well enough and Steve was able to get them to bed at a reasonable hour. He had Bucky do one last check on Becca while he helped his mom set her new alarm clock for the morning so she could go meet with some friends.

---

Becca was still horribly sick but she was able to take some medicine and fall asleep again. Bucky even gave her permission to use her and Lilly’s walkie-talkies to call for him in the night if she needed it. But then soon enough he was making his way back upstairs and slipping his arms tightly around Steve with a low, sultry, “Hey, Sexy. Come here often?” followed by a giggle that ruined the game just a little.

---

Steve looked over to Bucky with a smile, puffing his chest out a little without realizing it when Bucky called him sexy. “I do, actually every night. Sometimes in you, sometimes on you, sometimes in my hand,” he joked. Steve led Bucky over to the bed and gave him a little nudge to push him back onto it.

---

“Wow, how cheeky,” Bucky mused and flopped back on the bed, immediately spreading his legs wide as an invitation. “You forgot my mouth. That’s another place you come. And it’s a pretty important one.” He slipped his hand in his shirt and pulled up so he was revealing his tummy and his chest but he didn’t remove it yet. He figured Steve would want to remove his clothes for him. “Camera’s all ready. Just click record.”

---

Steve licked his lips when Bucky spread his legs for him. He hurried and pressed record on the camera. “Look at you, so beautiful and adorable at the same time.” He slid a hand up Bucky’s shirt, eyeing his exposed tummy. He pushed it up so he could kiss him there before taking the shirt off entirely. “Would this still be as sexy if I was wearing those Christmas pajamas?” he asked.

---

Bucky chuckled and reached out to run a hand over Steve’s arm slowly. “I think I would still think you’re sexy but it wouldn’t make for the best video. We want to watch this later and be turned on because we are just so good at fucking, not laughing because you have Santa and reindeer on your ass.”
Steve kissed up Bucky’s neck affectionately. “But what if I get turned on by Santa on my ass?” Steve’s hands moved to the waistband of Bucky’s pants. “I don’t need a video to get turned on by you. You’re so sexy and amazing and all I want to do is put my hands all over you all the time.” He slowly pulled Bucky’s pants and underwear down, freeing Bucky’s cock.

“Baby, if you’re turned on by Santa, we have different problems,” Bucky joked and maneuvered easily as Steve stripped his bottoms off. “And I know we don’t need a video to be turned on by each other. I just really want to have it. And it’s so hot knowing that we can capture our intimate moments like this. And it sort of feels like we’re being watched and I kind of love that right now too.”

“Well, we kind of are being watched by our future selves at this very moment.” Steve turned to the camera and said, “Love you, Bucky” and then he turned back to the Bucky that was underneath him. He dove right for his neck again, sucking a mark there as he rolled their hips together. Steve worked his own clothes off in no time. “Put your hands over your head, Beautiful.”

Bucky gasped and moved his head back so Steve had better access to him. He obediently moved his arms up and wiggled a little beneath Steve as he did. “I love you, Steve,” he said warmly to his husband and then looked to the camera. “You too, Future Steve. I hope I make you come then like I’m gonna make you come now.”

Steve grabbed their little box of sex supplies and found the blindfold, some lube, and handcuffs that they had acquired recently. “You’re under arrest,” Steve said as he clipped a cuff around one of Bucky’s wrists. “For one count of being too sexy and one count of getting hard in the kitchen.” He cuffed the other wrist after hooking the chain around the bedpost. “How do you plead?”

Bucky’s eyes flashed and he split a huge grin. He liked this. He tugged on the cuffs and moaned to entice Steve. He knew he had to look just perfect like this. He for sure knew that Steve looked delicious as well. He wanted to bite him. “I’ll plead guilty to the account of being too sexy. Anyone with eyes can see that. But you have no case for my kitchen boner. Your evidence won’t stick.”

Steve felt kind of proud of himself for coming up with this little play. Once Bucky’s hands were cuffed, Steve teased Bucky’s nipples. “Well, I have an incident report from a Mr. Steve Rogers-Barnes,” he said in a serious tone. “And he claims that he had tactile confirmation of an erection before dinner.” He leaned down and nipped at Bucky’s throat. “Do you change your plea?”

Bucky growled softly at Steve and raked his eyes down his body. “Fine. Fine, you caught me. I’ll take whatever sentence you feel necessary. Just be merciful, please. I did it out of love.” He blinked his eyes a few times and stuck out a pout. The camera probably wouldn’t see that too well but he knew it would look cute to Steve right now.
Steve cupped the sides of Bucky’s face and kissed him slow and deep. “You are hereby sentenced to one night of sex, followed by a morning of cuddling,” Steve decided, grinning like an idiot because Bucky was so goddamned adorable and this was cheesy as hell but he liked it. He reluctantly pulled back so he could grab the blindfold and start to slip it over Bucky’s eyes.

“Thank you, Sir. I’m more than happy to do my time,” Bucky said with just the slightest giggle as Steve blindfolded him. “I can’t promise I won’t misbehave and need that morning cuddling to turn into giving you a wake-up blowjob and then cuddling.” He hoped the kids slept in a little. He knew it was asking a lot since they went to sleep earlier but he could always hope.

Steve got off the bed to grab the camera off the stand and held it in one hand as he moved between Bucky’s legs. He focused it on Bucky’s waist as he massaged little circles over Bucky’s thighs. He’d tease his dick here and there in passing but didn’t do anything with it yet. “I think that’s a minor offense I can look past.”

“How kind of you,” Bucky mumbled. He couldn’t move himself very much and he couldn’t see, so every moment was so tantalizing. He could feel that Steve was over him and each new touch sent a jolt of desire through him but he couldn’t grab Steve and make out with him. He was totally at Steve’s hands and he loved it. It was the best kind of impatience and he loved to beg for it. “Baby, you keep passing up my cock. It wants you.”

“Are you sure?” he asked as he gave Bucky’s balls a little squeeze. “Because it’s looking like it’s doing just fine without me.” Steve ghosted his fingers over the length of Bucky’s cock before grabbing it at the base. He focused the camera on Bucky’s face as he started to stroke it. “Like this?”

Bucky’s mouth fell slowly open like it was waiting for something to suck on. He moved his head a little to the side to bare his neck more and because his whole body was squirming so much right now with anticipation. He gasped in a small desperate breath and let out a groan that sounded very close to Steve’s name.

“You look so goddamn sexy, Buck.” Steve thumbed at the head of Bucky’s dick. “Keep making noises like that, Baby. The camera loves it and so do I.” He leaned down and kissed up Bucky’s torso and smiled lovingly down at him. “How’re you feeling?”

Bucky whined and moaned more as Steve praised his body with kisses and touched him with his gentle hands. He loved his husband beyond anything and his whole being wanted to show him how much. “I feel like the sun,” Bucky said, a little delirious from arousal already. “Hot and powerful and important. You make me feel like I’m everything.”
Bucky’s response had Steve grinning like an idiot. It was just the sort of nonsensical yet important sentiment he needed to hear. He continued to tease Bucky’s dick with the camera focused in on it but he wanted to get the show on now. He put the camera back on the stand and grabbed the lube to coat his fingers. “You are everything,” he said at long last as he pushed two fingers in slowly at once. “Nothing in this world can compare to you.”

Bucky bit his lip hard. Steve knew how much he loved the stretch of two fingers to start and it made his whole body tighten up for a moment before he worked to relax once again. “I want that good dick of yours, Baby,” he murmured and writhed for him as much as the restraints would allow. “I love having you inside me. I want your come. I want to feel you taking me open, fucking me open. I want to hold my husband’s come inside me all night and sleep soundly cuddled up to him. I want you, Steve. My love.”

Steve learned by this point how to get his husband going. He’d be a shitty partner if he didn’t pick up on those kinds of things. He felt his heart burst with happiness at all of the sweet and dirty things that came out of Bucky’s mouth. “You’re going to get all of that, Baby. I’m going to fuck you nice and deep tonight. Maybe I should try fisting you first, if you think you can wait that long before I give you my dick.”

Bucky groaned a little while he thought it over. He really wanted Steve’s dick. But he also loved being fisted. “That would be good for our video,” he observed. “But I do want your cock. But it’ll feel really overwhelming in a good way if you fuck me after you’ve made me come from your fist.” He murmured his options before nodding. “Your choice, Love.”

Steve worked Bucky’s ass open with steady thrusts of his fingers. “How about we save the fisting for the next video?” Which meant that Steve was totally alright with them being filmed. Only they were going to see it, after all. He kissed the inside of Bucky’s thigh before giving it a little bite. “I think I want to try to be a little rough tonight,” he admitted softly. “If that’s okay.”

“I love rough,” Bucky gasped and reflexively pulled the restraints again. “Do what you want with me, Baby. I trust you. I love you. I want you to be rough with me. Ruin me, please.” He whined and bared his neck for Steve. He sort of wished he could see him but he also loved having no idea what Steve was about to do. He loved this.

Steve sunk his teeth in a little deeper on Bucky’s thigh as he pushed in a third finger. He let out a little possessive growl. As much as Steve was a baby about pushing too much during sex, he also really loved the way it made Bucky react. Seeing Bucky bare himself for him shot hot waves of arousal right to his dick. He kissed up Bucky’s chest and licked a stripe up Bucky’s throat. “I’m going to kiss your neck,” he said softly. “And I want you to tell me when I get to a spot you want me to bite.”
Bucky’s heart was pounding so strongly in his chest and his dick was red and needy and desperate for touch. His body was on fire in all the best ways. “What if I want you to bite everywhere?” Bucky asked as Steve moved up under his jaw for a moment. “God, Baby, I love you, Steve.” He couldn’t see through the blindfold but he knew the lights were on so the camera could see and he hoped they looked as good as he thought they might. And he could smell in the air the intense combination of their arousals and sweat and precum. This was definitely going in their top ten fucks.

Steve pulled his fingers out to get more lube on them. He stealthily slicked up his cock before going back to fingerling his husband. “Then I’ll bite you everywhere, Handsome.” Steve didn’t hold back and he marked up Bucky’s throat with little teeth marks as he bit him methodically inch by inch down his neck. Just as he got to his collarbone, Steve slipped in his dick at the same time he pulled his fingers out and pushed in balls deep.

Every kiss and bite had Bucky squirming and moaning and mumbling little notes of gratitude to Steve. He was a complete mess of a man by now and he was getting ever closer to his release. It came as a surprise to him when Steve stuck him with his cock smoothly and deeply. He gasped and squeezed his hands into fists. “Ah, my god, thank you, Steve,” he said with clear need heavy in his voice. “Fuck me. Now.”

Steve didn’t waste a second. He grabbed Bucky’s hips hard enough to bruise and started to rail him into the bed. He snapped his hips forward, causing his balls to slap against Bucky’s ass with every thrust. Steve leaned forward and bit Bucky’s shoulder with a possessive growl. “Say my name again.”

Bucky whimpered like a wounded animal and let his body move with the power from Steve’s thrusts. “Steve,” he croaked. “Steve, my perfect husband.” He gasped in air and tried not to think about how Steve’s own lungs must be handling such a strenuous pace. But, out of the two of them, Bucky’s body was taking more of a beating. But definitely in a good way, in the way he loved and longed for. Being taken apart by Steve and his dick was always Bucky’s favorite thing.

Bucky was moving up the mattress with every few thrusts and Steve had to tug him back down to get his ass snug up against his hips again. Steve moaned at how great the tight, hot friction was against his cock and, god, Bucky sounded so good. He turned Bucky over just a little onto one side so he could give his ass a sharp smack. “Tell me how you’re going to come from my dick alone.”

“I’m so close already,” Bucky admitted immediately. He hadn’t expected that slap to his ass and it really helped bring him closer. Steve knew how much he loved that and he so rarely did it. Oh, but when he did, Bucky savored every bit of it. “You’re the best, Baby. I’m so lucky to get to be fucked by you. I love you. I love this.” He knew he sounded a little bit like he was buttering Steve up, trying to boost his ego, but he really did feel like Steve was the perfect man and that he got so lucky to be with him.

---

Steve was finding it difficult to breathe but he didn’t want to stop with how much Bucky was reacting to all this. He sounded so good and it felt amazing to be able to fuck his husband into the mattress. He grabbed one of Bucky’s legs and threw it over his shoulder so he could hit Bucky at just the right angle. He gave Bucky’s ass a few more smacks since this new position had it exposed just that much more. “That’s what I like to hear,” he said breathlessly. “Now come for me.”

---

With his leg up like that, Bucky’s prostate was much easier for Steve’s cock to get to and every strong thrust had him whimpering and biting into the side of his own arm so he didn’t cry out and wake anyone up. “I love-” he tried his best to talk but nothing was coming out of him after he felt those tantalizing, perfect stings on his ass. He wanted more but he was coming before he could try to stop himself and hold off. He could usually last a little longer but the combination of everything had him right at the edge at the start.

---

As soon as he felt Bucky’s ass clenching and spasming around his dick, Steve slowed down. He gasped for air and felt the blood pounding in his ears. His hips slowed and he braced himself against Bucky’s chest as he tried not to pant too heavily and set Bucky’s alerts off. He looked down at his amazing husband, who looked so damn good all tied up with a mess on his stomach. “I love you,” he said. “I’m so close, Bucky.” He wanted to see Bucky’s beautiful eyes, so he reached over to take the blindfold off.

---

Bucky’s eyes were only open ever so slightly. He was worn out and it was hard for him to stay alert as Steve slowed down. He tugged his arms out of an instinct to hold Steve but he couldn’t. “Please come in me, please,” he whispered so softly and glanced over at the camera. He had actually forgotten for a few seconds that it was there watching them. And he knew his fucked-out, perfectly used up body was going to look very nice later.

---

Steve didn’t have all that much left in him, but it was easy to be aroused more than anything when he had his wonderfully ruined husband underneath him looking at him like that. “Yes,” he murmured. “I will.” He leaned down and kissed the corner of Bucky’s mouth before resting their foreheads together. He looked into Bucky’s eyes as he steadily and slowly circled his hips. His orgasm wasn’t earth-shattering, but it was intimate. His lips parted and he didn’t break eye contact as he felt himself spill into Bucky. Exhausted, he used the last bit of energy he had to uncuff Bucky’s hands.

---

Bucky was spent. He was vaguely aware of Steve releasing his arms and he just flopped back on the bed with a thud. Steve was still inside him and his body was draped over him like he loved. He could feel Steve’s come inside him and he smiled tiredly. “Baby, that was fucking amazing,” Bucky said breathlessly. “I love you. God, Steve, I love you. You’re everything.” He brushed his fingers in Steve’s hair and held him close. “You’re so good to me.”

---
Steve closed his eyes and snuggled up to Bucky, too exhausted to move or pull out of him. “I love you too, Buck,” he murmured tiredly. He placed a few kisses on his neck. “You’re the best husband I can ever ask for. I’m grateful for every Christmas and every new year I get to spend with you.”

---

“The camera,” Bucky mumbled. “We have to stop the recording.” He was so tired now. And he knew Steve was too. But Bucky didn’t want someone to come in with an emergency and see the camera and know they recorded themselves together. He also wanted to go ahead and take the tape out so no one went for the video camera later to record sometime and found their video.

---

It was rare that Steve got grumpy over being asked to do something and this was one of those times. His chest ached from breathing too hard and all he wanted to do was sleep. He was so close already to passing out on top of Bucky. He let out a dramatic huff as he got up to shut the camera off and shove it under the bed for now.

---

Bucky was awake enough to realize Steve was a little miffed. It wasn’t hard to tell with the way Steve sort of stomped around the bed and clicked the button a little too hard. Once he was back in bed, he prodded his side with his knuckles and whispered, “Hey. What was that?” He wasn’t trying to start anything, he just wanted to make sure Steve wasn’t in pain or mad at him for something.

---

“I’m tired,” Steve complained. He plopped into bed right next to Bucky like dead weight and laid his head on his shoulder, eyes closed already. “Just wanna go to sleep,” he murmured, wrapping his arms around Bucky again and stubbornly pulling him against his body.

---

Bucky let out a little surprised grunt when Steve pulled him in like a teddy bear to cuddle up with him. He wanted to ask if he was feeling okay and how his lungs felt but he decided he shouldn’t push his luck. So, he let Steve fold him up in his arms and tuck his head under his chin. “Okay, Baby. Sleep well. I love you. Merry Christmas.” He sighed and kissed wherever he could get to on Steve. He felt a little bad that Steve did so much for him that night with the video camera and being rough and tying him up and then it took all Steve’s energy right out of him. “I owe you, Steve,” he promised in a whisper and nuzzled closer to his husband.
A few weeks after Christmas.

The next few weeks for the Rogers-Barnes family were busy but fairly uneventful. Becca was sick through New Year’s Eve but she got better just in time for a head cold to go through each of the little kids. It wasn’t the best way to start 1987 off as a new year but it was over before they knew it.

Steve was finally able to get a start on his painting classes with mom’s and their kids. There weren’t too many people, but it was a start. Christopher sure loved to mash his hands into the paint, too.

Steve had just been in the middle of arranging his notes for the next class when there was a ringing of the doorbell.

---

Bucky was working pretty much daily and today was no exception. He still had several hours left and wasn’t at home when a man with two luggage bags came to their door. He rang the bell and waited for someone to answer and was eventually met with Steve. “Oh, hello,” he started. “I’m looking for James Barnes. He goes by ‘Bucky’. He’s got two little sisters. I thought they might have moved but I wasn’t sure. You must be the new resident. Do you happen to have his new address?”

---

Steve looked at the man in surprise. He didn’t recognize him. And he also couldn’t help but laugh a little. “Oh, I know Bucky,” he said pleasantly. “They’re all here. What’s your name? I don’t think he was expecting any visitors.”

---

“They still live here? That’s nice.” The man nodded and looked around the outside for a second, noting some of the differences since the last time he had visited. “My name is Gregory. I’m his uncle. I would have called or something but we stopped trying to call a long while ago after Bucky just stopped answering us. I figured our Christmas cards had been showing up here for some other family for a few years but maybe he just ignored those too.”

---

Adriana and Christopher came scampering over and they hid behind Steve’s legs as they peered to see who was at the door. Steve scooped Christopher up with a smile and stepped aside to let Gregory in. “Well, things have been hard on him over here. I wouldn’t take it personally,” Steve said to defend Bucky a bit. “He has told me about you. It’s good to meet you.”

---

“Hello, there, little ones,” Gregory said as he came into the house with a ‘thank you’ to Steve. He held on to his two bags of luggage and looked to his new host. “I’m sorry. How rude of me. I didn’t ask your name. Are you a friend of his or subletting part of the house?” he asked and gave Steve a warm smile. Greg didn’t look much like the Barnes siblings except in the smile. His eyes were darker. than theirs and he had a balding patch that didn’t hit the line from Old George who had a full head of hair from when he was born until the day he passed.

---

“I’m his husband,” Steve said confidently, keeping things friendly but also saying it in a way that made it hard to question. “These are two of our kids. The youngest is in the living room with my mom.” He closed the door just in time to keep Diana from sniffing around on the stoop. “Are you hungry or thirsty? We have plenty of food.”

---

“What?” Gregory asked with a snort of a laugh. He thought it was a joke at first. But then why would this Steve be claiming they had children if he was just trying to make a joke. “I ate on the plane, thank you,” he murmured quickly as he tried to get his next words together. “Excuse me, but I don’t understand. That’s impossible.” He gave Steve a once over like he was trying to see if maybe he missed the fact that this was just a very large, very tall, very mannish sort of woman who accidentally called herself a ‘husband’ instead of a ‘wife’. But no, this appeared to be a man.

---

Adriana looked up at Steve and then over to Gregory. “It’s not impossible,” she defended. “Daddy and Papa Love each other. Sometimes kids have two daddies like me and Christopher and Sarah May,” she explained patiently.

Steve was impressed with her but was a little worried about her getting upset if Gregory pushed. “Very smart, Peanut,” he praised. “How about you go play with Nana and your sister while Daddy helps Uncle Gregory settle in, Okay?” He kissed her head before ushering her away. Steve sent Christopher off with her too and pretended to chase him for a few steps. The toddler giggled and run away faster.

---

Gregory wasn’t the type of man who could be mean to children. He never had been. He smiled politely as she talked, thinking all the while how confused that poor little baby must be. And he waited for the kids to be out of the way before he gave a much icier look to Steve. “You want to explain to me what’s going on here, Buddy? Where’s my nephew? Or the girls?”

---

Steve straightened up and stood his ground as Gregory gave him that look. “I already explained what’s going on,” he said with a surprising amount of patience. “I’m married to your nephew and we have a family together. He’s currently at work, Becca is in her room, and Lilly is staying after school for lacrosse.”

---

“Son, two men can’t get married. Two men can pretend all they want that what they are doing is fine. But you’ll never actually be married to him. This country isn’t governed by lawless hippies,” Gregory said in a cool, smooth tone. He was saving his yelling for Bucky. “Maybe I should just to talk to Becca then. Until the other two get here.”
“We have God on our side, Greg. I want to get along, I truly do, but I’m not going to tolerate you questioning mine and Bucky’s relationship. You’re a guest and you’re Bucky’s family, so I’m not going to kick you out of here. But I’m a retired police officer and you don’t want to push your luck with me.” He stood even straighter and puffed his chest out. “I’ll take your bags up to Lilly’s room and we can have her sleep in Becca’s so you have a place to stay,” he said, offering a hand out to take his bags.

---

Gregory let out a mirthless laugh. He felt like he was keeping himself pretty calm given the circumstances. He also was a generally polite man with strangers so he wasn’t about to attack Steve directly. He would have a talking to with Bucky later but only because he felt like he had authority there as an uncle. “God’s a myth, boy,” he said as he handed his bags to him. “There’s no one to save you. Evolution made men and women together to breed. Two men can’t breed. It doesn’t add up. It’s not natural.” He wasn’t going to fight him but he did feel like he needed to get his piece in there first. Also, he wasn’t threatened in the least by a former cop. In his youth, he had been arrested several times for various minor infractions. Like Bucky always said, every Barnes was a criminal in one way or another.

---

Steve knew that reasoning wasn’t going to work with this man, so he did the next best thing. Try to get under his skin, albeit in a way that was unusually petty for him. “I’m sorry, I missed what you said there,” Steve said casually yet exaggerated as he headed up the stairs with the bags. “I was too busy thinking of all the times I’ve seen your nephew naked.” He deposited the bags in Lilly’s room before going downstairs to get Becca. “Becs. Your uncle decided to drop in for a visit and he’s being an ass.”

---

Gregory followed after Steve as he went and shook his head. “Oh, I’m the ass. Even though you’re talking to me about your sex with my nephew like he’s some seventeenth-century French whore.”

Becca stood when Steve and her uncle came down to her room. She stared on in surprise and ran her hand through her hair nervously. “Uh. Hi. Uncle Greg, it’s been a few years. Um... Steve?” She looked to Steve in hopes that maybe he could fill her in on what was going on. No one from their family had been to see them for at least four years now.

---

“I never talked about sex, only about seeing him naked. I think you owe him an apology for calling him a whore,” Steve responded. He crossed his arms over his chest and gave Becca an apologetic look. “He showed up a few minutes ago. I’m as surprised as you are,” he said.

---

Gregory wanted to say something about Steve being the one who made Bucky into a whore. Because he had already decided that this was all Steve’s fault. But he also didn’t want to start in on this in front of Becca. He smiled and gave her a hug, seeming for a second to have forgotten Steve entirely. “Hey, Becca, Sweetheart. I’m sorry we haven’t seen much of you and your sister in a while. I also wish I was here for better reasons.” He paused and squeezed her arm. “Your Uncle Dewey died. Just before Christmas.”
Becca’s face fell at the news. She hadn’t seen Dewey in a while, but they had always got birthday and holiday cards from him and they spoke over the phone once in a while. She was too stubborn to cry but she probably would have her moment in private later. “How did it happen?” she asked with a frown.

---

“Apparently, his heart wasn’t the best,” Greg said softly. “He had a heart attack last year and he was doing better lately but then one day he didn’t wake up. And the doctor said his heart must have simply just stopped while he was asleep. Cardiac failure. But at least that means he wasn’t in pain, which is good to know.” He sighed and glanced over at Steve almost like he was challenging him to start something up again now that he knew why he was here. “Anyway, you know how Dewey was a hoarder. And we found a lot of your dad’s things in his house while we were cleaning. I shipped them to post the office. We can pick up the boxes tomorrow.”

---

Steve pretended not to notice the glance back at him as he started to pick up all of the empty bottles of water and soda that Becca brought down and always forgot to bring upstairs to throw out.

“What kind of stuff?” she asked. “I dunno if Bucky is going to want to sort through that,” she said. She wanted her dad’s things but was also conscious of how her brother could get. “Maybe me and Steve’s mom should go pick it up instead so you and Steve can keep Bucky busy.”

---

“Oh, that’s okay, Sweetie. I’d rather go with you. Lilly can come too. You know, we can have family time. Maybe we can go to lunch first and you can tell me how you’ve been,” Greg suggested with a warm smile. He loved the idea of reconnecting with them. But he also really liked the idea of not spending any unnecessary time with Steve. “There’s some old books. Photographs, a few trinkets, some of your father’s medals from his service. And some stuff of Dewey’s that you all are welcome to if you want it - some journals and stuff.”

---

Becca didn’t want to give her uncle any opportunity to talk about Bucky’s relationship behind his back and try to get Becca and Lilly’s support, so she wasn’t in any mood to spend any time with him when she didn’t have Steve or Sarah around to back her up. “No, I think it should be me and Steve’s mom,” she said with polite firmness. “We can have family time at dinner. You can meet our nieces and nephews.”

---

Gregory was silent for a moment but then nodded in resignation. “Sure, of course. If that’s what you want, Becca,” he said. “The kids do seem lovely. It’s been a while since there have been young ones around. My youngest is already twelve. Maybe it’ll be a nice change of pace to talk with them.” For all his issues with the context of Steve and Bucky’s marriage and children, he wasn’t going to blame the kids for anything. It wasn’t their fault who was raising them. And if Bucky was their dad then that meant they were his family now too so he might as well get to know them. He just knew for certain he wasn’t going to get to know Steve.

---

“Come on. I’ll introduce them to you,” she said. Becca gave Steve a look that silently told him to let her handle this bit. While Becca showed off her extended family to her uncle, Steve stole away to the telephone so he could call Bucky at work. The least he could do was give him a heads up. When Tim answered, Steve asked if Bucky was around to talk.

---

Bucky had been dealing with a much smaller crisis at work but he came to the phone with an exhausted yawn. “Hey, Baby. So whatever sickness everyone is getting must be going around. Reggie threw up earlier. And he didn’t make it to the bathroom so I’ve been scrubbing our carpet for about an hour trying to get the smell out. I’m about three minutes from just taking a knife and cutting out the circle and calling it a day.”

---

“You may just want to stay longer at work because cleaning up puke all day may be more appealing than what’s over here,” Steve said with a groan. “Your Uncle Gregory is here and he’s being nice enough to the kids, but he’s being an utter ass about us,” he said. “If he wasn’t your family, I’d deck him.”

---

Bucky was quiet for a second, confused and concerned. “Fuck,” he whispered and rubbed his face. “What gives? Did he say why he’s here? We haven’t seen him in so long. The last time I actually communicated with them was about three years ago, maybe four now.” He grumbled and tried to think of something he could say when he got home to make him leave. “Well, Okay. I’ll be home in a couple hours. Try to just not talk to him. He’s good with kids so don’t worry about them just, you know, worry about keeping him from you.”

---

“I’ll tell you why he’s here when you get home,” he said. Steve didn’t think he should give news of their dead uncle over the phone even though Becca didn’t seem to be extremely upset over it. “I’ll keep away as much as I can, but I’m spending time with our kids and if he’s around them, then that’s not my fault.”

---

“I know, Baby. I get that. You don’t have to ignore them. Just maybe keep Becca talking so you and him can’t talk,” Bucky suggested and checked the time. “I know that’s a lot to ask of Becca. But Lilly should be home in a half hour and she’s nothing but words. Just give her some snacks when she gets there since she’ll be a little tired.”

---

“I don’t want to put it all on Becca,” Steve groaned. “She’s going to use it as leverage to get whatever she wants for at least a month.” Steve sighed and looked over in the direction that everyone else was. “I’ll take care of things until you’re back, Baby,” he said. “I love you so much.”

---

The shop was pretty busy and, with Reggie out of the picture for the day, Bucky really didn’t want to leave Tim by himself until Clint got there. But the second he could go, he hustled back home. He came stumbling in and went first to find Steve in the kitchen. “Baby, hey,” he whispered and came up next to him quickly. “Is he with the kids?” He noticed Steve was cutting up fruit so he expected the babies got hungry.
Gregory was absolutely insufferable all day and even Steve’s Mom was having a hard time being cordial. While Steve was in the kitchen, she made a point to sit with Becca and the kids with him. “He is,” Steve said. “He makes it sound like he’s ready to yell at you about something,” he warned. “Probably about being with me. And I swear if he does, I’m not keeping quiet, Buck.”

“It’s... it’s fine,” Bucky said, already feeling a headache rearing up. He was mad about that too. His injections had really been improving it but some days it couldn’t be helped. “Yeah, just...” he sighed and smacked his hands on his face lightly. “Let me try to handle it first. He’s my uncle. He’s my nuisance. If I need you to jump in, I’ll let you know.” He pulled Steve in for a kiss and lingered for a bit, holding him close. “Where do you think would be the best place for he and I to talk where the kids won’t be able to hear?”

“You’re my nuisance, so that means he’s our nuisance to share,” Steve said to him. He stroked his fingers through Bucky’s hair and gave him a look. “I don’t want you to be alone with him for long, Buck. I’ll give you five minutes before I check in.” Steve considered and then suggested, “You should probably go to Becca’s room.”

“He’s not going to hurt me, Baby. He’s not a violent man,” Bucky assured him. “I can take care of myself sometimes. I’ve done it before. Let me try to see what I can do.” He was grateful that Steve wanted to be right there with him as much as he could and be protective of him but Bucky felt like he needed an opportunity to try to prove himself, to prove he could handle this. He gave Steve a nod and went to the living room to find his uncle playing with the kids and helping Sarah May build big block towers. “Greg,” Bucky said sharply as a greeting. “Basement. With me. Now.”

When Bucky called for Greg to follow him, Adriana looked up in surprise because she knew that was her papa’s serious voice and nobody was supposed to question the serious voice. Greg gave Sarah May a pat on the head and then got up to go along with Bucky. “Hey, ‘Buckle’,” he greeted. “Not even a ‘hello’ for your uncle?”

“Hello,” Bucky said flatly and gestured down the stairs. “Go on. We have to talk.” He steeled himself and gave a parting look back at Steve before descending the stairs after Greg and flicking on the lights and Becca’s two lamps. “What the hell do you think you’re doing?” he asked immediately. “What kind of shitty game is it to come to my house and be vile to my family?”

Greg frowned at the attitude that Bucky took with him. “Vile?” He said incredulously. “Is it vile to speak the truth when my nephew is clearly delusional about his little game of house? I love you, Bucky, but this illusion has to end. You need to find yourself a wife and settle down with her before it’s too late.”
“I am settled down!” Bucky hissed back and shoved his hand out towards him to show off his ring. “I’m married. To Steve. And he’s the best thing that’s ever happened to me. And, no, it’s not like the government sees it as a real marriage but we do and he believes that his god does and, quite frankly, I could give a shit about what you think.” He paused only so he could take a breath. “Why the fuck are you even here? We haven’t talked for years. No one asked you to come.”

---

“Anyone can buy a ring and call themselves whatever they want, it doesn’t make it true. Just cause I can put a crown on my head doesn’t mean I’m Queen Elizabeth,” he said. “It’s one thing to fool yourselves about it, but it’s not fair to drag those poor kids of yours into this mess,” Greg continued in a disappointed tone. He leaned back against the wall and said solemnly, “Dwight passed just before Christmas and we found a lot of your dad’s stuff when cleaning his house.”

---

Bucky was charged up with much more to say but hearing about his other uncle dying put a stop in that. “Dewey’s dead?” he asked curiously. “That’s terrible. He’s young. He’s only three years older than Old George. So he’s, what... fifty-six? Damn. What happened?” Bucky was never extremely close to either of the brothers. Dewey played favorites. He preferred George over Gregory and he preferred Becca and Lilly over Bucky. It was just about the one thing that Bucky and Greg had in common.

---

Gregory nodded. “Cardiac failure. He’s been having health issues for a little while now and I guess his heart couldn’t keep up anymore.” Greg was a lot closer than Bucky was, so it still stung a little to talk about it. “I was going to pick up your dad’s old things with Becca, but she insists that she goes with the other lady that lives here.”

---

“Steve’s mother. Sarah. Don’t call her ‘that lady’,” Bucky warned. He wanted to ask about what things of his dad’s were there but he knew they weren’t done yet. “And don’t you dare talk to my babies about how you feel. They don’t need you coming into their home and spreading your hatred. Those kids are the most special children in the world and I won’t let you fuck them up with your nonsense!”

---

“I’m not saying a word to your kids. Whatever brainwashing they get from everyone in this house isn’t going to get undone by me in a few days. But shame on you for letting this all happen. These kids should have a mother and father, not some queer circus, Buck. Did you ever finish college? You should be doing more than working retail for the rest of your life.”

---

“Oh my god!” Bucky yelled angrily. “What is this? You’re picking at every part of my life right now? My husband, my kids, my education, my job? Are you going to tell me to get a haircut, next? Work out more? Eat less mayonnaise?” His fists were bunched together and he really wanted to fight him. But Gregory really wasn’t a physically violent person. Bucky could be, but Greg wasn’t. And right now that pissed Bucky off a little more. “And by the way, Greg. I couldn’t finish college because my parents fucking died and I was left in charge of two little girls! Did you forget about that? How can you question my family values when all the help you gave us was coming to the funeral, giving me a check for two hundred dollars and then going back to California? That’s not in the family spirit, Uncle Greg!”

---

“Bucky, I’m sorry, but your parents have been gone for years. How long are you going to let yourself be held down? You should be working your way up the ladder now. The girls aren’t that young anymore. If you need money to get your leg up again, then I’ll give it to you. It’s not my fault I had a family to take care of on the other side of the country,” Greg said, keeping calm despite his nephew yelling at him.

---

Bucky shook his head and pointed vaguely up. “We have money. Steve and I do. We have more than enough income right now and we have a plan for my education later. I’m taking care of all of them. I have five children, a husband, and a mother-in-law. And I’ve gotten really good at budgeting. And we don’t need any help. Becca is on track to get into college early and she’s got scholarships already.”

---

“Bucky,” Greg said seriously. “I’m glad that you’re in a more financially stable place, but you need to find yourself a wife. Your kids deserve to have a mother. This... this Steve guy and his mom aren’t what you or your kids need. It’s not natural for two men to be together. It’s never been done this way because it’s not right.”

---

“First of all, Greg, it has been done this way before. Numerous times. People just want to ignore the successful gay parents,” Bucky snapped back. “And if I married some poor woman, that marriage would be a sham. I love having Steve’s cock up my ass and I love giving him mine up his!” He fumed a little and pulled back his sleeve to show his tattoo of his and Steve’s wedding date along with his parents’. “We’re happy together. We are married and have been for two years now. And Mom and Dad would have loved Steve if they were here!”

---

Greg got angry when Bucky got vulgar. “It’s Uncle Greg to you, Bucky,” he reminded. “And a pig is happy as anything when it’s rolling in shit. That doesn’t mean it should drag other things into its shit pile with it. Having your ‘wedding’ date next to your parents’ is an insult to their vows and an insult to their upbringing of you. They maybe would’ve liked Steve just because at least he was only one person you’re sleeping with instead of whatever junkie you happened to get your hands on that weekend.”

---

“Fuck you, Greg,” Bucky spit. “Steve makes me a better person. The only reason I’m who I am today is because of him. He helps me, he loves me. He gave me my kids, he helped me get back to my home, he helped me keep my sisters, he loves us like no one else does. He’s there for us! You... you hardly talk to us and then come marching in here like you have any authority over me.”

---

“What the hell was I supposed to do when you ignore my calls?” He snarled. “You could’ve written to us any time you wanted. Communication is a two-way street, James, and I took the hint after you didn’t call anyone back!” He turned to head back upstairs. “George would be ashamed of how you treat your family. If it took bringing a fairy stranger into your home to take care of your sisters, then maybe I should have taken them in the first place. Maybe it is for the best that we keep our lives separate.”

---

The door to the basement slammed before Bucky could shout anything back about how ignorant he was and how rude he was being and how he shouldn’t ‘James’ him like he’s a toddler that won’t listen. “Fucking hell,” Bucky whispered as he collapsed slowly into a heap on the floor, tears streaming down his face. He wasn’t sure when he even started crying but he figured it happened at some point during the argument. But he wasn’t thinking of that now. All he could think about was his dad. And how much he missed him. And how much he wished he was here. Old George would have kicked his own brother’s ass for talking to his son that way. He would have comforted Bucky and told him there was nothing wrong with him. But all he had right then was the carpet beneath him and a little ant making its way to the coffee table.

---

Steve had heard a bit of raised voices in the basement and waited for Gregory to leave before he rushed in to check in on Bucky. His heart broke at the sight of Bucky curled up on the floor and he hurried over to scoop him into his arms and cuddle him to his chest. “Hey, Hey... Baby, I’m here for you. Whatever your uncle said, he’s dead wrong. I don’t know what he said, but I know for sure that he has no idea about us.”

---

Bucky curled against Steve’s chest and shook his head. “I just want my dad back,” he whispered. He wasn’t sure why, but it felt like he was reopening the wound of his parents’ deaths. He knew Greg was wrong about everything he said. He knew that. But it still hurt so much. And he had this overwhelming need for his dad to be there to help. It was his little brother after all. He would have been good at handling him. “He said that George would ashamed of me. And I know my dad would have gone off at Greg for talking to his kids this way. My dad is proud of me, of the both of us, Steve.”

---

Steve stroked Bucky’s long hair. “Your dad would have absolutely been proud of you. He would love each one of his grandkids and he would be so proud of how you kept this family together. You did that, Buck, nobody else.” Steve gave Bucky a serious look. “I mean it. What you did was incredible and your uncle is an idiot for not being anything but amazed by you.”

---

“I want my dad back,” Bucky pleaded again, hands holding a little too tightly on Steve. He knew he must sound like a child but he just wanted his dad there. “Greg is such an asshole. He kept saying that I needed to get out of this fantasy and find a wife. He couldn’t get past the things he doesn’t agree with to see that I’m better than before. He doesn’t care that I’m a better brother now, or that I’m a good dad, or that I’ve been sober for so long now. He doesn’t care that I have someone who loves me. He just cares that I’m not doing things his way. But what the fuck kind of authority does he have to tell me what to do? My dad wouldn’t have cared that I married a man. My dad would be happy I found someone who cares about me. He’s not my dad. Why does he think he can tell me what to do?”
It hurt to be held as tightly as Bucky was holding him, but Steve didn’t complain because he knew Bucky was hurting more. Steve wished desperately that Bucky didn’t have to suffer this heartbreak. “He doesn’t have any authority over you, but some people think that just because they’re older, they can boss you around.” He sighed. “How about I take care of things for a little while, Buck? I don’t want Greg to keep upsetting you.”

Bucky’s crying slowed down a little and he eased up on Steve, more just letting himself be cradled by him. He nuzzled Steve’s neck and gave him a gentle little kiss. “I love you so much. No matter what he says to you or whatever he tries to do. I love you, Steve. You’re my husband forever. You’re my world. I’m so sorry he’s being so terrible to you.” He sniffled and shakily pulled himself off the floor. “I... I’m just going to go upstairs for a bit. I don’t want you to deal with him alone. Make sure you have Becca with you when I’m not. I don’t want him talking to you.”

Steve helped Bucky onto his feet and put his hands on his hips to keep him steady. “I know you love me, Buck. I could never doubt that... and I know it’s not ideal, but if Greg keeps being awful to you, you can always spend a night with Father Frank at the shelter and be able to vent with other people going through similar problems.”

“No, I don’t want to leave you here,” Bucky said quickly and gave Steve a possessive kiss. “Thank you for offering, but I can’t be away from you.” It occurred to him then that Greg would probably be even more angry if he found out they named their shelter for gay people after his brother George. Bucky didn’t want to deal with that conversation either. He didn’t want to hear again his uncle bringing in his opinions on what his father would think. “Don’t tell him about the shelter. Greg, I mean. That’s more ammunition for him.”

“I won’t tell him, I promise,” Steve swore. “How about I set you up in the nursery with the babies? I’m sure Christopher and Ya-Ya will love to have some alone time with their papa and I can have Adriana help me get dinner ready. I think she’s really enjoying playing chef with me,” he suggested. “And after dinner, me and you can cuddle all evening until we have to put the kids to bed.”

Bucky thought for a moment but he wasn’t sure he could handle taking care of the babies right now. He was too upset and, if he was crying, then Sarah May would start crying. “Um, I... I just want a little alone time. My head is killing me. And I don’t want the kids to be worried.” He nodded slowly and gave Steve another slow, meaningful kiss, complete with his tears dripping on to Steve’s cheeks. He was a mess. “I’ll come down for dinner. I don’t want you to have to do that alone either.”

Steve cupped the sides of Bucky’s face as they kissed and then he desperately tried to dry the tears from Bucky’s cheeks so he would look a little less miserable. “I’m sorry you’re hurting, Baby. You’ve done nothing wrong and maybe Greg will turn around and realize how wrong he was about us.” Steve held Bucky’s hand firmly and led him towards Becca’s bed. “Maybe here is the best place to rest so you don’t have to walk past him to get to our room.”

---

“But, my photo album,” Bucky said pathetically and started to pull back to the stairs. “My pictures of my parents are upstairs. I want to be in our room, Steve.” He knew he would have to run past Gregory on his way, but he didn’t care. He could comment on his crying if he wanted to, call him a sissy. He didn’t care. He wanted his and Steve’s room, he wanted his pictures, he wanted his own safe space. “Besides, he won’t come into our room to try to get to me. He wouldn’t be afraid to come down here, though. But our room is where we are gay together after all.”

---

Steve stopped walking towards the bed. When Bucky spoke in a voice like that, how could Steve not listen? He wrapped his arms around Bucky’s shoulders and held him still a moment. “Okay, I’ll walk you to our room. And just so you know, I’m going to make it clear to Greg that you and I have been very, very gay in every room of this house. I want him to be uncomfortable everywhere he goes in here until he gives you an apology.”

---

Bucky nodded and wiped the back of his hand across his eyes, mirroring Adriana when she didn’t want them to know she was crying. “Uh-huh, okay,” Bucky said quietly and gripped Steve’s arm. Steve walked him upstairs and, thankfully, Greg didn’t say anything or stop them. He was distracted talking to Lilly who had just gotten back home. Once they were upstairs, Bucky let go of Steve and immediately went to grab his family photo album filled with pictures of his parents and himself and his sisters as kids. He let out a little sigh of relief. He always felt closer to them when he could look through their pictures.

---

Steve whistled to get Diana to follow. He knew that she wasn’t as much of Bucky’s favorite as she was Steve’s favorite, but she was still a very comforting companion to have when feeling down. Steve pulled down the sheets and patted the empty spot on the bed to get Bucky to sit. Diana hurried over and curled up where Steve usually slept.

---

Bucky sat down on the bed and opened the photo album to a picture of his dad and him in Seneca. He was holding a big fish and his dad was standing behind him with a huge smile. Fred had taken the picture way back when. “I’m okay, Baby. I promise. You don’t have to worry. I just need some time alone up here, away from him. Please tell the kids not to worry. And hug the girls.”

---

Diana nuzzled her way closer to Bucky once he sat down and patiently laid her head in his lap and relaxed. “I’ll take care of all that,” Steve promised. “I love you, Buck.” He pressed their lips together and headed out of the room and to the living room with the rest of the family to scope out how things were going.
When Steve got back to the living room, Lilly was crying. She has just been told about Dewey. She didn’t know him too well but he had always been nice to her and she was so sensitive about death - anyone’s death - that this was hurting her the most of the Barnes kids. Becca was holding her and whispering softly, “Hey, but tomorrow we can look through the boxes. That will be good. We can see what things of Dad’s Uncle Dewey kept. And we can look through some of Dewey’s journals. Yeah, Lil?”

---

Christopher had been trying to get Lilly’s attention to ask what was wrong but Becca was keeping her too distracted to notice her nephew. Steve scooped his son up in one arm and used his free hand to squeeze her shoulder gently. “I’ll get you some water and an Advil, Lilly. I’m sorry to hear about your uncle.” Steve always got a headache after crying and he assumed Lilly may get the same. He disappeared for a minute but then came back with two pills and a glass of water. Lilly was still crying and she hid her face away in Becca’s shoulder. Steve sighed and put the pills in Becca’s hand. “Can you make sure she takes those? I’m going to make dinner.”

---

“Thanks, Steve. Yeah, I’ll get it,” Becca assured him and managed to get Lilly to drink some of the water.

Greg decided to follow Steve into the kitchen and he leaned on the counter next to the fridge as Steve started to gather what he would need. “Okay, Buddy, let me make you an offer. I’ve got money. How much do you want in exchange for leaving my nephew and his family alone?”

---

Steve was so floored by the deal Greg tried to strike with him that he was almost certain that he must have heard him wrong... but no, Greg definitely just tried to pay him off to abandon his family. It was so outlandish that Steve was too astonished to get angry. “Whatever you’re willing to offer me, would you be willing to leave your wife and kids if I gave you double?”

---

“No, I wouldn’t,” Greg said matter-of-factly. “But I’m a different man than you. I’ve got morals and integrity. I know what’s right. I married a wonderful woman. I didn’t seduce a confused, depressed young man into being with me.” Greg was staunchly in favor of the idea that this was all Steve and Bucky was coaxed into it by brainwashing or something. He knew Bucky’s tendency towards promiscuity, alcohol, and addictions. He just decided that those things were a symptom of his pain and Steve chose to monopolize on Bucky’s vulnerability.

---

“Well, if you have morals and integrity, then you know it would be impossible for me to abandon my children, the person I swore to support in all aspects of life for as long as I live, and two amazing girls who I’ve had the honor to watch grow up.” He started to chop up the vegetables after putting Christopher in his chair. “You know, for someone who hates gay guys so much, you sure love having that stick up your behind.”
Gregory scoffed and folded his arms tightly against his chest, building a wall. “You sure have a big mouth. Bucky, too. You both have said some foul and disgusting things today. I can’t believe the way James spoke to me. He was like a rude teenager. I always warned George that not keeping a check on his language around the kids would bite him in the end. And now Bucky talks freely about homosexual sex to his own uncle.”

---

Steve put some cut up carrots in a bowl to give Christopher while he entertained himself in his high chair. “You’re both adults. If you feel entitled to be rude to him and belittle him, then he’s more than entitled to talk about something he enjoys,” Steve answered evenly. “You know, the swearing issue is one thing we can agree on. I don’t like cursing around the kids.”

---

Greg let out a humorless laugh and mumbled something about their common ground being pretty thin ice. “George and Winnie were always cursing around these kids. Just all the time. They thought it wasn’t good to treat kids any different than adults. Did you know they let Bucky drink alcohol when he was fourteen?” It seemed like Greg was temporarily satisfied to not argue with Steve if he at least got to complain about something.

---

“I wouldn’t want my kids drinking that young, but I’d rather them be safe and do it at home than to go out and sneak some behind our backs,” Steve said. “I think Bucky came out just fine, even though he had some bumps along the way. He’s an amazing father and an excellent role model to them.”

---

At the mention of Bucky being a father and the insinuation that he was a father alongside Steve, Greg flared up again. He made a discontented noise and said, “I don’t know about that. He has always been a train wreck. He goes through phases of seeming to be okay but he will crash again. And you, boy, are part of that crash. All I can hope for is that when he rights himself again, it’s with a wife to support him and those lovely kids.”

---

“I’ve known him for years now, and he’s been perfect. He’s sober, he’s got a stable job… Bucky has been a stellar parent and brother. Even if he hadn’t been, I would still love him and raise our children with him. If he crashes, I’m going to be there for him.” Steve focused on making food to try and calm his nerves. “And I really wouldn’t call me a boy, Gregory.”

---

Greg was about to add to that but he stopped. There was the distinct sound of running water coming from above them. Bucky had decided to take a bath. Actually, Bucky found a pack of hidden cigarettes and caved. Even though he hadn’t had a cigarette for several months by then. He had gently pushed Diana out of the bathroom and closed the door so she wouldn’t breathe any of the smoke. Then he curled up on one side of the tub with the water rising slowly around him, a lit cigarette on his lips. He also brought a picture of him and Steve in bed on a lazy morning and a picture of his parents asleep together on their couch with baby Bucky in their arms.

Becca and Lilly came into the kitchen then and distracted the attention of both Steve and Greg.
“Steve, Lilly’s got the hiccups from crying. And she says she wants hot chocolate.”

---

Steve glanced up towards the second floor when he heard the bath start to run but then went back to what he was doing. “I’ll make it for her right now.” Steve usually made not chocolate with water so it was healthier, but today, he made it with milk and whipped cream and extra marshmallows. He followed them back to the living room as an excuse to get away from Greg for a moment. “How are you holding up, Lilly?”

---

Lilly sniffled and hugged Steve’s middle from her spot on the couch and just buried her face against his stomach for a moment. It wasn’t that she was too horribly upset over Dewey specifically. It was just that death scared her and made her sad and she couldn’t think of Dewey being gone without thinking about her parents being gone, just like Bucky was doing. “Thanks for hot chocolate,” she said through a few hiccups.

---

Steve placed his hand on top of her head and stroked her hair. “Any time, you know I love you and I’m sorry that you’re hurting. Did you take your medicine yet?” He sat down next to her and wrapped an arm around her. “Your nephew is worried about you. He kept saying ‘Ann Lee’. Maybe you can give him a hug when you’re feeling better.”

---

Lilly squished right up against Steve and hugged him tightly. “I took the medicine,” she said quietly. “Where is Bucky? I haven’t seen him yet. Is he okay?” She looked over at Becca who was standing strong and watching over her. Lilly knew she was hurting inside at least a little. But she was also very good at keeping herself firm for everyone else.

---

“He’s upset right now, but you don’t have to worry about him,” Steve reassured. “Worry about yourself feeling better. If you need any help, you know your family is here for you.” Steve wasn’t going to get into Greg being an asshole when she was grieving over the loss of her other uncle. Steve looked back at Becca and asked, “Could you finish chopping up the vegetables for me? I’ll get back to dinner in a few minutes.”

---

“Sure, Steve. I’ll take care of it,” Becca promised and gave Lilly another quick hug before heading into the kitchen. She was trying to be as helpful as she could right now.

---

“Thank you.” Steve hung around with Lilly for a little while longer before going back to dinner duty. Sarah kept the kids occupied because she could see the concerned look on Adriana’s face. When Steve got back to the kitchen, he gave Gregory a stern glare. “You’re welcome to have dinner with us, but if you’re going to say things that upset me or Bucky, I’m going to have to ask you to eat in a separate room. I can set up a tray in the living room for you.”
“I’m not allowed to eat with my own family?” Gregory asked and looked at Becca. He wanted to put up a fight about the need to say what he believes. But he also didn’t doubt that Steve would try to forcibly remove him either. And he really did want to spend time with his nieces and the kids. “I’ll be quiet,” he said eventually, “I don’t want to argue around the children anyway.”

---

“You don’t have to be quiet and you don’t have to eat on your own. What you do need to do is be respectful of what you do say. None of us want to hear about what you think of our marriage, but maybe they’ll want to hear about how their cousins have been doing,” he said. Dinner was almost done, so Steve started to set the table.

---

“I can talk about my kids at dinner,” Gregory agreed with some grit to his words. “They haven’t seen each other in a while. It would have been nice to bring them but they have school. And I wasn’t sure I was going to be able to find Bucky anyway. I think it’s rude that he hasn’t even tried to correspond for four years.”

---

“Like I said, Bucky had a rough few years and I wouldn’t take it personally that he didn’t correspond.” Steve said. “Maybe he’ll be more open to talking with family if things go over well this visit,” he suggested as a little dig to try and make Gregory act on his best behavior.

---

Greg gave Steve a glance, ready to argue again, but he let it be. “It’s just sad. He loses his parents and then won’t even try to talk to his remaining family. I know we weren’t able to be here to help but I couldn’t leave my family to come help him get on his feet. And I couldn’t move my family back to New York. But if he needed help with money or parenting the girls, he could have called or written letters. But he just didn’t.”

---

“I don’t blame you for not dropping everything to come here,” Steve said. “Bucky was young. He had a lot of stress to deal with. I’m sure you weren’t as smart as a teen as you are now.” Steve put the food onto the table, kind of proud with how the steamed vegetables came out and the pasta smelled delicious with his mom’s recipe for tomato sauce. “I’m going to get Bucky and the rest of the family.”

---

Gregory seemed to have decided to call a temporary truce between himself and Steve. He figured he could be cordial around the rest of the family so as not to upset the children and the girls. So he just nodded and helped Becca pour water and juice.

Bucky was still sitting in the bathtub. It had run cold now and he had goosebumps up his arms and legs. He also went through six cigarettes and sang a few of his dad’s favorite songs as he let himself calm down and stop crying.

---

Steve asked his mom to take care of getting the kids at the table. He had a feeling that Bucky would take some time on his own but he wasn’t sure how much convincing Bucky was going to need.
Steve frowned in concern when he saw Bucky in the cold bath and the whole room reeked of cigarettes. “Baby,” he said softly. Steve knelt at the side of the tub and kissed his wet cheek. “Do you want to join us for dinner?”

---

Bucky slowly looked up at Steve and sniffled. He wasn’t quite shivering but he was cold and Steve’s warm kiss had felt really nice. “Do I have to, Steve?” he asked quietly and ran a hand through his damp hair. “I don’t want to deal with him right now. I just want him to go away, Baby, please. I can’t listen to him talk anymore. I can’t listen to him talk about you or about what he thinks my dad would think of me.”

---

“You don’t have to, Love. But I did get him to agree to only talk about nice things when we’re having dinner.” Steve stroked his fingers along Bucky’s jaw and kissed him again. “It would make me happy to have you with us, but I would rather that you feel comfortable. I can make you a plate, but you have to at least get out of this cold tub.”

---

“But I don’t want to get out of the tub,” Bucky said petulantly. He knew he was being unreasonable. But he also knew that if he left the bathroom then he would have to actually face life again. And he did not want to do that. “How are the kids? And the girls? If they need me then I’ll come down for dinner.”

---

“Tough. Come on, I’ll wrap you up in a nice, fluffy towel and then we can get you under the blankets so you’ll feel safe and warm,” Steve encouraged. “The kids will be fine, but you should see them before bedtime so they don’t start to worry too much about you.”

---

Bucky grumbled quietly but eventually stood up and got out of the tub. Diana trotted over and started to lick his legs as Steve wrapped him in a towel and patted him down. “I’ll talk to the kids before bedtime. Maybe we can have their story in here tonight? You can read and I’ll hold them so they know I’m still here.”

---

“Diana, you silly goose,” Steve chided, petting Diana once before shooing her away from Bucky’s legs. Steve wrapped one towel around Bucky’s waist and then draped another over his shoulders. “We can do that. The kids love it when they get to spend time in our room for some reason, anyway.”

---

“Yeah, it’ll be nice,” Bucky agreed in a whisper. “And I can talk to the girls too. This is probably bringing old feelings back. And especially if tomorrow we really get some of my dad’s things... that’ll be wonderful but I think maybe make this hurt worse. You know?” He sighed and leaned against Steve’s chest with his ear to his heart to listen to it beating. He knew Steve must have noticed the cigarette smell but he was grateful that he hadn’t so far brought it up.
Steve wrapped an arm around Bucky’s shoulders and stroked his wet hair with his other hand. “I’ll be there for you every step of the way, Baby. Even if it’s the worst kind of heartbreak, at least you’ll have someone there for you - a shoulder to cry on.” He rocked Bucky a little in his arms before nudging him to lay down in bed. “Diana is looking for a cuddle buddy right now,” he said with a smile as Diana sat on the bed watching the two of them.

---

“She can cuddle me,” Bucky said and smiled over at the dog. “Come here, girl.” He reached out his hand and scratched her head gently. “Steve, if he says anything else tonight...” he wasn’t sure what he would do. He wasn’t sure he could manage to actually have another argument right now. He could throw some fists but that wasn’t likely to happen anyway. “Just... come get me if things get bad again.”

---

Diana laid with her body stretched out right alongside Bucky’s with her head on his chest. “I will, but I don’t think it’ll have to come to that.” Steve didn’t plan on troubling and upsetting Bucky even if Greg did try to start things. “I’ll see you soon, okay? I’m going to serve dinner and then come right up here.”

---

“Okay, Baby,” Bucky agreed and pulled Steve in for a kiss. His mouth tasted like cigarettes but he wanted to kiss Steve so much. He wanted to hold Steve. He wanted to tell him to stay put and let Bucky cuddle him until they fell asleep. But the rest of the family needed someone right now. And Bucky was down for the count.

---

Steve kissed Bucky slow and steady, not giving a damn about the taste of cigarettes because he loved his husband and he was going to kiss him, damn it. “I’ll see you soon, Buck. I love you.” He closed the door behind him and went downstairs.

Christopher looked around when he saw Steve but no Bucky. “Where Papa?”

Steve walked over to kiss his head. “He’s sleeping, Bean.”

---

“No nap, dinner!” Christopher protested and pointed at the table. “Papa have food!” He looked to Sarah and then to Becca like he was just double checking that he was being reasonable that his Papa should eat.

Becca handed Christopher half a bread roll and said, “Christopher, he’s okay. Papa is okay. He just needs sleep. Here, we can eat and then you and Daddy can take Papa food later.”

---

Sarah May was a bit of a papa’s girl still and she started to babble nonsense at Steve to back her brother up. Steve gave Becca a grateful look before sitting down. “Aunt Becca is right. Papa will eat later and he will have story time with you later too,” Steve promised. “You like story time, right?” he asked his son. Steve started to pass around the food and then served the youngest kids their portions. People were well into their own meals by the time Steve cut up the food into bite-sized pieces for the babies.
“Is Papa going to read to us?” Adriana asked hopefully. “He never reads. I have to ask a lot for him to do it.”

Lilly, who was still pretty upset but had shifted from sad to mad, was showing it by being a grumpy, angry ball on her seat mumbling, “Yeah, that’s because he can’t read for shit. Even I can read better than him.”

---

Steve’s head snapped over to her. “Lilly!” he scolded harshly under his breath.

Adriana was similarly upset. “Nuh-uh! Papa is a good reader and he does the silly voices. You don’t do silly voices, Lilly,” she fired back.

---

“Well, it’s hard to do a different voice for every animal. Some of your books have too many animals,” Lilly defended.

She was going to talk some more but Becca squeezed her arm firmly. “Lil, maybe we should eat downstairs. We can watch a movie on my TV. It doesn’t have to be a documentary.” She really was trying to hold things together right now.

---

“There’s not too many,” Adriana said, getting a little worked up. “Daddy can do them, too.” Steve was upset that their family dinner was turning into fragments.

Desperate to try and keep them all together, Steve said, “That’s a good suggestion, Becs, but let’s see if we can listen to how your cousins are doing in California.” Maybe Lilly would be done eating by the time Greg finished talking.

---

“Oh, uh,” Greg looked up at Steve. He had been trying his best to stay neutral and not involved like he had promised. But he had been given permission to talk about his kids. “Right, yes. Well, we wish we could see you all more often. Your cousins are doing well. Two of them play lacrosse still, Lilly. I know you play.”

---

Steve was grateful that Greg wasn’t being an asshole and was actually sticking to the guidelines. Lilly, however, was still in a sour mood and gave an utterly uninterested, ‘That’s nice,’ in response. Steve ran his hands over his face with a groan and then continued, “Lilly has been trying out for a travel team on Long Island, but the competition is pretty tough. How about your kids?”

---

Gregory wasn’t too pleased to be talking to Steve more so instead of Lilly, but he sucked it up and said, “My oldest - Miles - is on the varsity team even though he’s just a freshmen. Tina is helping start the girl’s lacrosse team. And Cory, my youngest is just really getting into it now.”
“That’s great,” Steve said. “Becca and Lilly are both into the feminist thing. I bet that they’d have a lot of fun getting to hang out with Tina.” Since Lilly was being a pain, Steve looked over to Becca. “Did you used to be close with Tina back when you guys were younger?”

---

“Steve, don’t call it ‘the feminist thing’,” Lilly scolded with her arms crossed. “You sound ignorant.”

Becca shook her head and squeezed Lilly’s arm again. For once, she wasn’t being the one to argue every point out of Steve’s mouth. “I sometimes talked to Tina. But I was a shy kid, I didn’t really talk to many people. And then they moved away when I was about seven anyway.”

---

“It doesn’t sound as ignorant as if I called it the ‘bra-burning party’ or the ‘man-hating movement’,” Steve pointed out unhelpfully. Sarah May whined for more food and since she usually didn’t have a big appetite, Steve was quick to give her more. “Do you think you would maybe want to talk to her over the phone?” Steve suggested to Becca.

---

“It’s not either of those things,” Lilly murmured grumpily and took a big bite of pasta.

Gregory nodded and looked to Becca. “Tina would love that. She would be happy to talk to you. Even if you did letter-writing. That’s cheaper and it’ll be just as good.” He smiled to her and hoped that he was being helpful enough that Steve was satisfied with his behavior and wouldn’t want to kick him out.

---

Becca didn’t like being put on the spot, but she also didn’t want to upset her uncle. “I can do letter writing... I don’t want to run up the phone bill,” she said.

Adriana looked over to Greg and asked, “Can I write letters to Tina? I can spell my own name. And I can write the days of the week. Even Wednesday. And some other things.”

---

“Sure, Adriana. I’m betting Tina would love to see your writing - even the days of the week,” Greg said. His initial instincts wanted him to bring up again that he wished that happy little girl and her siblings had a mother. But he glanced over at Steve and then shook his head to keep himself in check. He would argue his case further with Bucky tomorrow.

---

Adriana turned to Steve. “Daddy, can I go write my letter now?”

Steve appreciated her eagerness but pointed at her plate. “Finish your dinner first and you can stay up ten extra minutes tonight if you spend time writing your letter,” he said. Lilly finished up her plate and got up without a word so she could drop her it in the sink. Steve would’ve usually argued about the rudeness but he was picking his battles wisely tonight. “I’m sorry,” he apologized to Greg. “She’s upset. Usually, she’s a lot more engaging to talk to.”
“I’m sure this isn’t reminding them of good things,” Greg offered. “It’s only been six years since George passed and now Dwight. It’s a lot to handle for everyone. Even in the past couple of years, Dewey secluded himself more than usual so no one really saw him much. But it’s still painful.” He reached a hand out to Becca and said, “Tomorrow we can go through those boxes together. Maybe it’ll be a good way to heal to discuss your dad and Uncle Dewey.”

---

Becca accepted Greg’s hand. “I think I may want to go through them alone with Lilly and Bucky. No offense to you, it’s just... kind of a personal thing,” she said, lowering her gaze to her food.

---

“Are you sure, Becca? Bucky doesn’t seem too keen on this and Lilly is very upset,” Gregory said. “I brought the stuff with me because I wanted to see my family again after all this. I’m sorry we haven’t been around but we do care about you. I miss your dad all the time.”

---

“We know each other the best. It’s going to be something that’s hard to sort through but we have to do it. We may as well do it just us together,” she said. “We can still hang out after, Uncle Greg. Maybe we can go get ice cream or something.”

---

Gregory took a second to think it over but then finally decided if that was what Becca wanted then he couldn’t argue about it. He nodded and sighed. “Okay, we can get ice cream later tomorrow.” He wasn’t sure what he was expected to do while he waited. He sure as hell didn’t want to talk to Steve or really to Sarah. And they were bound to be around the children so he wouldn’t really be able to be around anyone without dealing with them.

---

Steve plucked Christopher from his chair and got out a few toys in the living room so he could entertain himself in the playpen. When he got back to the kitchen, he helped Sarah May with the last of her dinner before cleaning her up. “Greg, is there anything that you need while you’re here?”

---

“Uh, how do you mean?” Gregory asked as he helped Becca clear the table. Steve was already well aware of what he wanted while he was here. He wanted Bucky to listen to him and get rid of Steve. But that wasn’t really something Steve was going to help with, now was it? “I brought my toothbrush and all that. My wife even packed me a blanket just in case. If that’s what you’re asking.”

---

“That’s what I meant,” he said. “Or I could pick up some cereal if you liked a certain brand. Stuff like that.” Once the plates were off the table and leftovers were put in containers, Steve picked up Sarah May to entertain her since his mom volunteered to help clean up the dishes.

---

“No, I think I’m quite alright. I won’t be here for long. I’ll leave day after tomorrow,” Greg said and stood awkwardly in the door frame. “Where am I sleeping? I think I’m going to turn in. It’s been a long day.” He mostly just didn’t want to hang around if Becca and Lilly were going to go off by themselves. He was too tired to give Steve another lecture at the moment.

---

“You’ll be in Lilly’s room,” Steve said. “Becca can show you where it is.” Steve would’ve done it himself but he could tell that Greg had less than zero interest in spending any time with him – the feeling was mutual.

---

Becca took Greg upstairs and got him set in Lilly’s room. She also grabbed some stuff Lilly would need and took it down to her room. “Long day,” she mumbled as she came back to the kitchen to Steve and Sarah May. “I asked Uncle Greg not to disturb Bucky. Told him his headaches are pretty bad. So, he promised he would keep to Lilly’s room.”

---

Steve set Sarah May up in her high chair with some finger paints and a lot of paper. “Thank you, Becca. It really means a lot that you’re helping me out on this. I don’t know what I would do if I didn’t have you in my corner right now. He’s not a bad guy but... he says such horrible things.”

---

“Yeah, well, someone needs to help and Bucky’s not here so,” Becca said and plopped down next to Sarah May and pet her hair gently. “I’m sorry Greg has been rude to you. I don’t really know how to help. He’s not going to change his mind just from being here for a few days. And I can’t really think of much more to say to him that you haven’t already.”

---

“Hi,” Sarah May said pleasantly to Becca. She used a paint-covered hand to try to pass a sheet of paper over to her.

“I’m not expecting him to change overnight, but I do expect him to stop trying to lecture Bucky and make him feel awful,” Steve said. “Why’s that so hard to do?”

---

Becca carefully took the paper from Sarah May and set it down so she wouldn’t get messy. “Thank you, Ya-Ya,” she murmured and gave the baby a small smile. “He’s set in his ideas, Steve. He thinks he knows what is right. And he’s not going to change his mind about it. Even though Bucky is happy with you and clearly couldn’t be with a woman if he tried.” She sighed and shook her head. “I’m not trying to defend the message of his words at all. I just know that he’s stubborn and holds strong beliefs about this. You can understand that, right? You’re one of the most stubborn people I’ve ever met.”

---

Sarah May was happy that Becca took it. Steve found that she enjoyed sharing with everyone except Christopher, but that was probably because Christopher had a habit of trying to take her things. “I know you’re not trying to defend him... but I wish he would stop and consider how Bucky feels, you know? It’s the polite thing to do and I’m doing my best to make him feel welcome here.”
“I understand. I’m with you on that, too,” Becca said with a solemn nod. “He’s not thinking that way right now, though. I don’t know why. Maybe it’s a selfish thing. He can’t see past his own beliefs to think about other people. Because it’s not very hard to see that Bucky is a mess right now. But maybe he can’t see what the problem is with how he’s talking to him.”

---

“I’m not going to talk to him about it because I know that all he sees me as is a problem that needs eradicating,” Steve said sadly. “All I can do at this point is try to comfort Bucky and hope that Greg doesn’t do any more damage.” He ran his fingers through his hair once and looked at his daughter, who cooed happily at him and lifted his mood a little.

---

Becca nodded and looked up at Steve with a sad little smile. “This is really tough,” she whispered. “Dewey dying and Greg causing a mess. I’m mad that he upset Bucky but I’m going to let you focus on that. I need to focus on Lilly, I think. She’s thinking about this too much in the context of our parents being gone too.”

---

Steve gave her shoulder a squeeze. “Let me know if there’s anything I can do to help you out with her. I know it’s hard to have so much responsibility on your shoulders.” He gave Sarah May a new set of papers once she thoroughly covered all of her current ones in paint.

---

“It’ll be fine. But thank you,” Becca said quietly. “If I keep focused on Lilly then I won’t get upset about all this too. I think we are going to have a hard enough time tomorrow going through the stuff Uncle Greg brought.” She sighed and got up slowly. “I think I’m going to take a shower and see if Lilly wants to watch a movie before we go to sleep. She’s already curled up on my bed anyway.”

---

“Alright. And I’m here for you, too. You know that.” Steve gave her a quick hug because he knew that Becca wasn’t really the hugging type that often. It was time to get Sarah May cleaned up anyway, so he laid the papers out to dry and picked up his paint-covered baby. “Are you ready for your bath, Ya-Ya?”

---

Sarah May looked at the paint for a second like she wanted to keep going but then she decided against it with a soft “Yis,” and a little nod. Her curly hair was starting to take over her face and she brushed it from her eyes leaving a smudge of blue on her forehead. She snuggled up on Steve and gave a happy smile. With all the rest that was happening that night, it was good that at least someone wasn’t putting up a fuss.

---

Steve loved it when Sarah May talked to them since it was usually her older siblings dominating the conversation and she only knew a handful of words. “Okay, Sweet Pea. We’ll get you all cleaned up and ready for sleepy time.” He called for Adriana to let her know she had a half hour before it was bedtime and then took Sarah May for her bath. After she was all clean and dried off, he took her into their bedroom to check on Bucky. “Hey, Baby. It’s almost story time for the kids.”
Bucky had gotten up at one point and found the sweater Steve got him the Christmas before. It was the one that Sarah had sewn all their kids’ names onto the cuff. She added Adriana when Bucky added her name to his tattoo. He tried not to wear the sweater too much because he didn’t want to wear it out too early. He wanted it to last forever. But he needed to wear it tonight. “Hey, Baby...” he said softly and reached out for Sarah May. “Come here, Sarah May. Let Papa hold you.”

Sarah May leaned over towards Bucky and grabbed him as soon as she was in his arms. “Papa, ‘yis’?” she asked, understanding at this point that it was almost time for bed so that meant cuddling. Steve sat down next to Bucky and kissed his temple. “She was such a good girl tonight. She made lots of paintings and didn’t fuss when it was bath time.”

Bucky hummed happily and kissed Sarah May’s hair and whispered in Hebrew that he loved her. “Were you a good girl for Daddy? Didn’t cry during bath time?” His eyes were focused on his daughter but they were a little tired, a little lifeless at the moment. He wanted to be engaged right now as much as he could though. But he knew the second his babies were asleep, he was going to be right back to staring at the wall with Diana slumped over his legs.

Their little girl murmured softly and snuggled Bucky closely. Steve could see how tired Bucky was and he stroked his fingers through his hair. “I’ll go get the rest of the kids and a couple books,” he said. “Then we can all get to bed.” He leaned in to kiss Bucky’s cheek before going down to get Christopher and Adriana, allowing them each to pick out a book.

Bucky waited patiently for Steve to get back. He rocked Sarah May and listened to her softly babble at him. She wasn’t much of a talker still but when she was alone with her parents, she was more likely to take some time to say something. When Steve got back, Adriana jumped up on the bed and wiggled close to Bucky. “Daddy picked out some books, Papa. He got my favorite ones to read.”

Christopher climbed onto the bed with a bit of effort and laid down with his head in Bucky’s lap. Between Diana and the three kids, Bucky was surrounded. Steve felt his heart clench thinking how perfect it would’ve been if Grant was there. “Alright. Now, we are only going to read two books tonight and then it’s bedtime. Do you want the Hungry Caterpillar or Brown Bear first?”

“Bun Bur!” Christopher said quickly and pointed at the books. “Bur, please!” Adriana agreed and pulled Christopher into her lap so he was a little closer to them all. Bucky couldn’t really move too much from all the kids and the dog.

“Baby, will you grab a blanket for us and come cuddle up?” Bucky asked and nodded to their basket of folded blankets near the closet. “Not the blue one, though, Diana likes to chew on that one.”
“Brown Bear, Bean? Okay, we’ll read that.” Steve set the books down and went to grab the blanket. Diana’s ears perked up when Steve grabbed the blue one but then he swapped quickly for the gray one. He draped the blanket over Bucky and all of their kids before sidling up next to them and going under the covers as well. “Okay... ‘brown bear, brown bear, what do you see’?” he read.

---

“Red bur,” Christopher said quickly and tried to reach to turn the page for Steve but he couldn’t make it that far. “See red bur.” He looked up at Steve to make sure he was right and then rubbed tiredly at his eyes.

Bucky brushed his hair from his son’s face and leaned back against Steve more, pulling the babies in closer to him. He kissed Steve’s neck and sighed contentedly. This was what he wanted, his husband and their babies all together tonight. He wished the girls were there too but he understood they wanted to be alone as well.

---

“That’s right! He sees a Red Bird...” Steve continued through the book, allowing Christopher and Adriana to go through the animals since he read it so often that they remembered the order. He closed up the book and tickled the bottom of Adriana’s foot. “Are you ready for the caterpillar story, Peanut?”

---

Adriana nodded. “Yes, please, Daddy,” she said and gripped Steve’s hand for a moment. “Can we read the dolphin one too? After the caterpillar? Please. I’ll be good and go to bed right after,” she pleaded. Christopher agreed and tried again to reach for the book from Steve again.

---

“I can read you that one in the morning, Peanut. Your dad and pop are very tired tonight, so we need to get some rest.” He gave her hand a small squeeze. “You’ve been a very good girl today. If we weren’t so tired, I would have been happy to read you an extra book.” He felt bad for saying no, but he could see how exhausted Bucky was.

---

Adriana sighed and looked up to Bucky like maybe he could convince Steve to change his mind. But her papa’s eyes were barely open and he looked tired like her daddy had said. So, she left it. “Okay, in the morning, then,” she conceded and carefully poked Bucky’s cheek to see if he was really awake.

“Mmm, hey, sorry,” Bucky mumbled and kissed her head. “I’m listening, Adriana. Go ahead with the caterpillar, Steve.”

---

Christopher giggled and poked Bucky’s cheek as well. Sarah May grumbled when her siblings got into her space but didn’t complain more than that. Steve read through the book and had Adriana try a few pages, patiently helping her sound out the words. When the book was done, Adriana looked like she wanted to read more, so Steve offered to let her take the book into bed with her.

---
Adriana took the book from Steve happily and headed to her room to wait to be tucked in. Bucky held the babies and followed Steve to the nursery to help get them settled. Once everyone was accounted for and ready to sleep, Bucky slumped his way back to their bed and curled up in a heap on the pillows with a quiet huff. “Come cuddle me,” he murmured and held his arms open for Steve. “Please.”

---

Luckily the babies didn’t put up a fuss getting to bed and Adriana was pretty easy once they promised her again that they would read her the dolphin book in the morning. Steve kissed her cheek and pet his fingers through her hair once before following Bucky to their room. He slipped in beside him and wrapped his arms strongly around his middle. “Talk to me.”

---

Bucky sniffled and moved closer to Steve to give him a soft, slow kiss. He held his hands tightly in Steve’s shirt and whimpered against his lips. He didn’t want to cry again but he felt like he might. “I hate him for talking to us that way,” he whispered and pressed his forehead to Steve’s for a moment.

---

Steve stroked Bucky’s cheek and looked into his eyes with concern. He gave Bucky a kiss back, but he was more worried about Bucky than anything else. “He doesn’t understand,” Steve said. “I hope that one day he does - because he’s your family and I want you to have a relationship with the family you have left.”

---

“I don’t want to have a relationship with him,” Bucky said quickly, firmly. “I don’t give a shit. If he can’t care about you and me together then I won’t care about him or his family either.” He shook his head slightly and took in a deep breath. “My dad would have told him off. He would be so angry. He would be furious that his brother is trying to guilt me by claiming my dad would be disappointed.”

---

Steve frowned. “I know you’re mad and I don’t blame you for being mad... but what if he does change one day? Do you think you’d be able to forgive him?” He pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair and leaned in to press his lips to the tip of Bucky’s nose. “I wish he didn’t say those awful things.”

---

“He won’t change,” Bucky said and wiped his tears on Steve’s shirt. “I don’t care, though. He can stay that way so long as he stays away from us. Once he leaves, that’s it. I don’t want to see him ever again. I don’t want him trying to pry us apart or dropping in for visits again or telling our babies that we shouldn’t be together or trying to get the girls on his side. I don’t want it.”

---

Steve nodded his head. “Alright. If that’s what you want, Buck, then I’ll help you see that happen.” He kissed Bucky’s face a few more times. “He won’t be able to win the girls over or pry us apart,” Steve promised. “We have built such an amazing family. I don’t know anyone else as lucky as we are and there’s not a thing in the world that can take that from us.”
“Uh-huh, yeah,” Bucky said and nodded again as more tears came. “I can’t stop crying.” He didn’t even know why. He was angry but it wasn’t the angriest he could be. He was sad but it wasn’t the saddest he had ever been either. Maybe he was just overwhelmed. “I can’t stop thinking about my dad, too. And how much I miss him.”

Steve moved a hand down to lace his fingers with Bucky’s. “I know, Baby, I’m sorry he’s not able to be here for you. But sometimes if you think hard enough, you’ll be able to see him in your dreams. Have you had any dreams with your dad in it lately?”

Bucky shook his head. “No, I haven’t,” he said quietly. “Lilly dreams about Mom and Dad a lot. I don’t so much. I think my brain is keeping me from them for some reason.” He sighed and rubbed his thumb on the back of Steve’s hand. “Remember how she was still having those bad nightmares when we met? I’m glad those are mostly gone. I won’t say completely gone because one crops up occasionally.”

“Do you think you’re not ready for them?” Steve asked. “Maybe your heart is telling your brain that it’ll hurt more than it’ll heal if you see them right now.” He gave Bucky’s hand another squeeze. “I remember the nightmares she had. I don’t know if they went away because she was getting older or because she was feeling safer and more stable.”

“I don’t know, maybe. But it’s been six and a half years since my parents died. It still hurts like crazy but I think I’m ready to handle things like that. Right?” Bucky asked. “I think it had to do with moving back here. They started to come less often once we came home. I think it’s been good for her to be back. And I mean... they started because she found me after I tried to kill myself. So, maybe it’s been better now that I have you and she knows I’m nowhere near that place anymore.”

“You’re such a loving and emotional person - and I mean that in a good way. But unfortunately, that also means that your heart hurts easily, too,” Steve said. “Do you want me to send a prayer asking for your parents to visit you tonight? I can’t promise God will be able to grant that, but at least he will hear it.” He moved closer in towards Bucky. “You’ve come so far.”

Bucky pressed in as close as he could to Steve and nuzzled his face against his neck and kissed his collarbone. “You can try. Thank you,” he said. “But I would kind of prefer if you pray to ask that Gregory shut his fucking mouth. That’s a bigger problem right now.” He sighed. “If I do see my dad tonight, I hope I can ask him if he is proud of me. I hope he can tell me Greg isn’t right and he’s not disappointed.”

Steve couldn’t help but snort a little at Bucky’s remark. He gave him a hug and said, “I know he’s proud of you, Baby. I hope you get to hear that tonight, too.” Steve settled down against the pillow.
“Now get some sleep, Love. It’s late and you’ve had a long day.” He closed his eyes, though still keeping Bucky held protectively against his chest.

---

“I love you, Baby,” Bucky whispered again and gave a few lazy, slow kisses to Steve’s neck and shoulder before closing his eyes too. “Sleep well, Steve.” He sniffled again and tucked himself to his husband and didn’t take long in falling asleep. His body seemed so exhausted that he didn’t even dream and he didn’t wake up in the night at all even when Sarah May cried and Steve had to go to her on his own, Bucky just slept.
Bucky woke up with a startled memory. He saw in his head a two-second flash of his parents in their car and then he heard the sounds of crashing that must have been what it was like that night. He wasn’t there, no one was there but the other drivers. But it felt real to him now. It felt like he was seeing them in that last moment. Bucky yelped and pushed his arms out from his body instinctually, shoving Steve in the chest on accident. “Fuck, fuck,” he panted, feeling completely disoriented.

---

Steve had gotten up to tend to the babies in the night and was just about to doze off again when he was suddenly pushed. He nearly fell off the bed with how alarmed he was. Steve’s hands shot out to grab Bucky’s to steady him. “Buck- Christ. Bucky, It’s me. It’s Steve...” he said. “What’s going on, did you have a nightmare?” he asked.

---

Bucky blinked and his body shuttered as he took panting breaths. He shook his head and looked into Steve’s eyes like he was trying to figure out if Steve was really there for a second. “Steve?” he whispered. “I-I don’t know. Don’t know what that was. It wasn’t a nightmare.” He trying to think of it again but he couldn’t quite conjure up the exact experience again. “It didn’t work... I didn’t have a dream with my dad,” he added in dismay.

---

Steve kissed the back of Bucky’s hand and then let go so he could wrap his arms around him. He could tell that Bucky was a little more coherent right now. “I’m sorry you didn’t get to see him. I’ll keep praying,” he said. “Is there anything I can do for you, Baby? Do you want me to get you some water or something small to eat?”

---

Bucky pressed himself close to Steve again and inhaled deeply just to smell him. Part of him felt like he was in a bit of a dream still. But he was coming out of that feeling quickly. “Maybe some water and some apples or something?” Bucky asked. He pet Steve’s face and gave him a soft kiss. “Did I push you?” He wondered, getting clarity back about the whole thing. “I was trying... to stop a car.”

---

“I’ll get that for you,” Steve said. “You pushed me, but only a little. How about you tell me more about it once I bring up the water and apples, okay?” Steve had a sinking feeling about what Bucky’s nightmare was, but he didn’t want to have Bucky talk about it until he had a little bit of food.

---

Bucky nodded and let go of Steve so he could get out of bed. “I’m sorry I pushed you. It wasn’t on purpose, Baby.” He sighed and pulled his hair up in a tight ponytail and rubbed his tired face. He looked at the cuffs of his sweater again and saw all four of his babies’ names all neatly stitched. He smiled a little and calmed himself down some more by thinking of them.
“I know, Buck,” he said. Steve left so he could go get what Bucky wanted.

While he was gone, there were a few hesitant, little footsteps from down the hall. Then, Christopher peered his head into the doorway and then giggled when he saw Bucky. “Morin, Papa!” He hurried inside and struggled to climb up onto the bed.

---

“Oh, hey there, Bean!” Bucky said, trying to be excited for his son. “Do you need help up? Want up?” he asked and held out his arms for him. “Did you escape again? Is it almost time for Daddy and Papa to get you a big boy bed? Should that be your birthday present next month, Christopher?”

---

Christopher held up his arms so Bucky could help him up. He immediately stood up on the mattress and bounced on it until he fell back with a giggle. “Playtime,” he said. “Hungry time,” Christopher added, rolling around on the bed, clearly needing to let off a bit of energy.

---

“How long have you been up? You’ve got too much zoomy energy right now, Love,” Bucky said and tried to get his hands on his son to calm him down but he was too slippery out of his grasp. “We will get breakfast soon, Bean. How’s that? Do you want breakfast? You can have orange juice and waffles.”

---

“Waffle,” he answered. Christopher giggled as he continued to evade Bucky.

Steve came back with a glass of water and an apple. “Oh! Did you get him from his room?” Steve asked as he sat on the edge of the bed. “Or did you sneak in here, Christopher?” He passed the apple and glass over so he could hold their son and keep him steady.

---

“No, he escaped again,” Bucky said with a relieved sigh. He drank some of the water and reached into his nightstand for his medicine. He didn’t have a headache yet but, given the day before and how that one felt, he decided to prepare for it now. “I think he needs to graduate to a regular kid’s bed. We have to decide if we are moving him in with Adriana or keeping him in the nursery for a bit.”

---

Steve thought that it was a bit too soon for him to have a bed, but he escaped from his crib often enough that they may as well give in. “I think he should stay with Sarah May for as long as possible. I don’t want Adriana to have to share a room when she’s finally got some space to herself,” he said.

---

“I understand,” Bucky said tiredly and laid back in bed, propped up on the pillows. “We can get him a bed for his birthday and set it up in the nursery for now.” He closed his eyes and took a breath. “I think everyone is probably pretty hungry, Baby. Maybe we should go start breakfast. I can cook eggs.”

---
“Let me try to convince him to stay in his crib for a few more minutes so you can tell me more about what you saw in your dream,” Steve bargained. He felt bad and wanted Bucky to be able to get it off his chest if he wanted to. He leaned in to kiss his cheek. “I’ll only take a minute to lay him back down.”

---

Bucky let Steve take Christopher back to the nursery and he waited patiently for him. He ate some more of the apple and changed out of his pajama pants into a pair of Steve’s sweatpants. He left the sweater on, though. He also figured he should try to be helpful as much as he could today so he made their bed and then sat back down on the edge.

---

Steve was able to convince Christopher to stay by giving him a few stuffed animals from Sarah May’s bed and was only able to get away with it because she was still sleeping. He walked back into their bedroom and took a seat on the edge of the bed. “Hey... sorry, Babe. Do you want to talk a bit now?”

---

Bucky took Steve’s hand in his and ran his thumb over the back of it. “I don’t know,” he admitted. “I kind of want to forget it right now. I don’t know why it was there and I don’t really want to think about it.” He knew what it had meant. He knew why it was there. He just couldn’t deal with it right now so he wanted to ignore it completely.

---

He pulled Bucky closer and rested his chin on the top of his head. “Alright, Baby. I’m here if you do want to talk. For now, I’m happy to cuddle you until one of our million kids starts demanding our attention,” Steve said. “Christopher is playing with one of Sarah May’s dolls right now and she won’t be pleased when she wakes up.”

---

“Oh, good,” Bucky muttered. “She’s going to cry too much and then have the hiccups for the rest of the day.” He massaged his hands up and down Steve’s chest and side slowly. He knew he hadn’t been very useful the day before and he felt bad about that. He was going to try to keep his sanity today if possible. “Hey... I know you know I smoked a few cigarettes yesterday. I just want to tell you I’m really sorry. It was an impulse thing. I found some ones I had hidden that even I forgot about.”

---

Steve played with Bucky’s hair and shook his head when Bucky apologized. “It’s okay,” he insisted. “I know you’re not smoking anymore and... well, there’s worse things you could’ve used as a crutch and I’m glad you chose cigarettes out of all of them,” he reassured.

---

“I know. It’s better than going to something I’ve had addictions to. I get that. I’m just sorry. I gave up smoking after your lungs got hurt and I promise I’ll get rid of the rest of those. We can throw them out.” Bucky hadn’t wanted to give up cigarettes but it just made no sense after a while, given how Steve’s lungs were and given the fact that the girls and Steve and Sarah all said it was a bad idea. And he didn’t want his sisters or his babies to smoke one day either.
“My lungs won’t collapse because you smoked one time,” Steve answered. “We can throw them out, but I don’t want you to beat yourself up over it, okay? I’m more worried about how you feel than how much you smoked last night.” Steve gave Bucky’s cheek a kiss. “And the kids are too young to know the smell of smoke so they won’t know the difference.”

Steve didn’t seem too upset so Bucky decided to take it for now since that wasn’t always the case when he relapsed in some form or another. “Okay, Steve, thank you. I was worried you would be angry,” he said as he held Steve’s face in his hands and kissed his lips softly. “I don’t know if I’m okay. I can’t really tell. I feel too many things right now. But I’m more present than I was last night. I just don’t know how long that might last.”

Smoking a cigarette once in a blue moon was definitely something Steve could live with. If Bucky had decided to have a drink, that was another story and more cause for caution. “I’d be a jerk if I got mad at you for that,” he said. “Today is a new day. Let’s try and start it off on a good note and if your uncle is an ass, then you can hide away up here again. Do you want to get the kids and make breakfast together now?”

“Yeah, let’s get them some food. Christopher might try to eat Ya-Ya’s doll if we don’t,” Bucky agreed. “I’m hoping today Greg won’t fight us again. It’s going to be hard enough to see what things he’s brought from Dewey’s house. And I want to try to be there for the girls as much as possible. I don’t want him ruining that.”

“I hope so, too. But I’ll be there for you and the girls if he does be rude to you and upset you,” Steve promised. He leaned in and gave him another kiss. “Let’s go get our kids ready for the day. Ya-Ya isn’t crying yet, which means we still have time to take that doll back from Christopher,” he said, giving Bucky a little nudge.

Sarah May wasn’t yet awake when Steve and Bucky got to the nursery. She was curled up carefully and breathing against her tiny fist. “Oh, look at this sweet baby girl, Steve,” Bucky said quietly and touched his daughter’s curls on her head. “Our babies are the best in the world. I love them so much.”

Steve smiled, looking even happier by how in love Bucky looked with their kids. “They are the best,” he agreed. Christopher jumped in his crib, so Steve quickly scooped him up. “It almost makes you not want to wake her up cause she’s so adorable right now. Why don’t you go take a picture?”

Bucky went to get their camera and snapped a quick Polaroid of Sarah May. “Here, Christopher, shake this,” Bucky said and offered the photo to him. “And I’ll trade you for Ya-Ya’s doll.” He carefully took the doll from him and laid it back in the crib. “Should we let her sleep a little more, Steve? Or should I try to get her out gently?"

---

Christopher happily traded and started to wave the photo frantically in the air with a laugh. “You should get her up. She might be grumpy, but she’s going to be happy that she gets to be carried by you for a little while. Maybe you can sing her awake she likes that.”

---

Bucky nodded and started to whisper to the baby as he reached in her crib to scoop her up. She whined a little and squirmed until she opened her eyes and saw who it was that was bothering her. “Papa,” she mumbled and closed her eyes again.

“Ya-Ya, up!” Christopher yelped and grabbed her arm. “Wake up!”

---

Steve swiftly pried Christopher’s hand from Sarah May’s arm so he wouldn’t bother her too much. “Hey, Bean,” Steve said in a hushed tone. “We have to be quiet for Ya-Ya, shh,” he said. He kissed Christopher’s head. “Let’s be a good boy for your sister. We don’t grab without asking, okay?” Steve hugged him right after.

---

“But, Ya-Ya, play!” Christopher tried again and wiggled in Steve’s grip. “Please!” he added, hoping that would get him further.

Bucky leaned over and kissed his son’s head. “Bean, let’s have breakfast and then someone will play with you. Adriana will be up too. Maybe she can play. Okay, Christopher? Let’s let Sarah May sleep a little more.”

---

“No! Ya-Ya play!” Christopher began to screech as Steve pulled him away from his sleepy sister. Steve groaned and gave Bucky an apologetic look as he walked away with their boy so he could have his tantrum away from his sister. “Christopher, I’m having none of that,” he said sternly. “You need to behave like a big boy.”

---

“Play!” Christopher tried again and let big crocodile tears flow down his cheeks. “Want play,” he said and touched Steve’s face carefully with wet hands. “Please.” He was getting more clever about playing on sympathies to get what he wanted. Bucky was pretty easily swayed but Steve was more immune and Christopher hadn’t figured that part out yet.

---

Steve knew this ploy all too well at this point. He kissed Christopher’s cheek. “Why don’t you play with Daddy? We can play blocks. Or we can play choo-choo trains or dolls,” he offered as he walked down the stairs to go set him up in the living room. Even with Christopher carrying on, Steve continued as usual.

---
Bucky came down a few minutes later with Sarah May and Adriana. Sarah May was wide awake now with no hopes of going back to sleep. And Adriana was holding Bucky’s hand, blinking awake little by little. “Hey, Baby. I have two more hungry kids for you. Also, I heard Gregory moving around in Lilly’s room so he will probably be down in a bit.”

---

Christopher stood at the wall of his pen and waved at his sisters. “Ya-Ya! Ana!”

Steve pet a hand over Christopher’s hair, loving how energetic he was when he saw his siblings. “Do you want to keep an eye on them while I cook?” Steve asked. “He’s stopped carrying on now.”

---

“Yes, I’ll watch them,” Bucky agreed and pulled Steve in for a slow kiss. “I think I’m going to grab some gummy vitamins for them really fast. That always keeps Christopher satisfied for a little bit before breakfast.” He held his husband for a moment longer before peeling off to get the bottle of gummies. “Here, kids, you want some gummies?”

---

Adriana tugged on the hem of Bucky’s shirt. “I want a gummy, Papa,” she said excitedly. Christopher jumped up and down in his pen, squawking wildly at Bucky to make sure he knew that he wanted one as well. Sarah May whined in response to the noise and pressed her face into Bucky’s chest.

---

“Oh, okay,” he said calmly, trying to get his son to be patient. “Here, Adriana, here’s some gummies. Will you give those to your brother, please?” He handed one to Sarah May and gave her a little kiss. “We need to get you tiny earplugs for the mornings when you’re still waking up. You’re like me when I used to get hangovers.”

---

Sarah May’s lower lip jutted out and she started to cry. Apparently, today was not her day. “Oh no!” Adriana gasped. She patted Sarah May on her back. “It’s okay, Ya-Ya,” she said. “Don’t cry. Do you want to cuddle together?”

---

“Adriana, sit on the couch and you can hold Ya-Ya for a little bit,” Bucky said and got her set up. “Daddy is making breakfast now so we can eat soon. And, today, I’m home from work all day, okay? Papa doesn’t have to go anywhere but right here with you. Does that make you happy, Peanut?”

---

Adriana climbed up onto the couch and wrapped her arms around her sister. She stroked her hair just like how she saw her daddies do it and Sarah May ended up calming down after a little while. “Can you read me lots of stories today? That makes me very happy.”

---

Bucky couldn’t help but melt at how precious his kids were. He loved that they were all at an age where they liked each other for the most part and any problems could be pretty easily resolved with some cuddles. “I can read you the dolphin book after breakfast,” Bucky agreed. “But, Papa and Aunt Lilly and Aunt Becca have to do some stuff today too. We have to look through old boxes. They are important boxes so it might take a little while for us to finish.”

---

Adriana liked having her time alone with her parents, but Steve had taught her that her siblings were always going to be there for her, so she had to make sure that she was there for them. She kissed the top of Sarah May’s head before nodding. “Can you read before breakfast? You and Daddy didn’t read lots last night. Only a little bit,” she bargained.

---

“Baby, Daddy is working really hard right now on breakfast. He will be done soon. And you know that I don’t read as fast as him,” Bucky said gently and adjusted some of her soft fly-away hair. “Daddy is making some really tasty food for us. Aren’t you hungry, Adriana?”

---

She pouted. “I like when you read to me,” she insisted. “I don’t want food. I want the dolphin story.” Adriana made sure to look extra sad to try to convince Bucky to read to her. She didn’t think that Bucky read slow and she wasn’t able to tell when he got the words wrong.

---

“You’re going to be hungry in a little while if you don’t eat at breakfast,” Bucky tried again. “Those gummies aren’t enough for food, Peanut.” He looked over at the playpen to make sure Christopher was still occupied. Sarah May had fallen asleep on Adriana and she was mumbling a little to herself. “Don’t you want to eat with your family? After we eat, you and I can read your book. Okay? I promise, Sweetheart.”

---

Adriana huffed. “Why can’t I eat a little later? You never read to me,” she said, getting a little upset now. Luckily, Adriana was more of a crier than a temper tantrum-thrower, so she didn’t raise her voice. “I’m not hungry. I don’t want breakfast,” she insisted. “I’ve been a good girl.”

---

Bucky blinked and took in a worried little breath. “Okay, Adriana, Honey, I know you’ve been a good girl. You are such a good girl. I’m not disagreeing with that.” He saw her starting to tear up already and he was trying to figure out if she was actually upset or just trying to get him to feel bad. “We don’t have to even read with your siblings. It can just be me and you and Daddy.”

---

The promise of having both of her parents to herself was enough to make the tears stop. She looked over at Bucky and considered before nodding her head. “Okay... but only if you read. I want you to read,” she said, hugging Sarah May close to her chest and rocking from side to side to comfort both herself and her sister.

---

watch your brother and sister for just one minute here so I can go check in on Daddy to see how breakfast is going?” he asked and kissed her forehead. “And I need to see if Becca or Lilly are awake. But I can do that in a little bit,” he added to himself.

---

“Okay, Papa,” Adriana sighed. She gave Sarah May a little hug and turned her gaze over to Christopher, who was happily building up a little tower of blocks. He was undoubtedly going to knock them down immediately after.

---

Steve almost had their breakfasts all made, but there was a large volume of it since they had so many people in the house right now. Bucky quickly came up behind him and gave a quick kiss to his cheek. “Hey, Baby. Just wanted to check in. I think I heard your mom getting up. When she’s out here, I’m going to have her stay with the kids so I can go see if the girls are going to get up. I told Adriana I would be right back after getting an ETA on breakfast.”

---

“I’ll be done in about ten minutes,” Steve said. “If you see my mom first, let her know that Beth called again. She’s been trying to get in touch with my ma for days now.” He went to the fridge to start pulling out drinks. “Are the kids behaving themselves for you? It seems pretty quiet in there.”

---

Bucky nodded and pulled his hair from its ponytail to brush it all back again. “Beth called again? Is your mom dodging her or something?” He sighed and helped Steve get cups on the table. “They are fine. Sarah May fell asleep on Adriana. Adriana almost had a little breakdown but she’s fine. And you and I need to read her dolphin story with her after breakfast. And Christopher is playing with block towers like usual. Except, this time he’s been trying to put animals on top first.”

---

“She’s just busy and Beth doesn’t know how to wait between calls,” Steve said. “She’s clogging up our answering machine,” Steve complained. “At least the kids are being relatively good, yes? Adriana is such a good big sister. I feel bad having her do so much sometimes.”

---

Bucky sighed and rolled his eyes. “Well, if Beth wants to buy us new tapes for the recorder, she can. Otherwise, she will need to just learn how to wait,” he said grumpily. “And I don’t think you should feel bad, Baby. We aren’t having her do everything. She’s just being a big sister and she’s learning responsibility and how to share and be patient.”

---

“I know she’s being a good big sister and sharing, but I don’t want her to think that she can’t have stuff for herself sometimes. She did come from a home where she used to have to share everything and hardly had any belongings for herself,” Steve said. “That’s all.” He shrugged his shoulders.

---

“She can have things to herself,” Bucky said, protesting against Steve a little bit. “She goes up to her room when she gets overwhelmed. She asks for time alone with us. I promised her we would read alone with her after breakfast. She knows she doesn’t have to share her turtles with the babies. She’s okay, Steve.”

---

“Alright, alright, you win,” Steve said as he waved Bucky off. “Now, go be right somewhere else,” he teased. Steve paused what he was doing so he could press their lips together to show that he had only been messing around with him. “I love you.”

---

Bucky was still grumpy about it but he let Steve give him a kiss. “Love you, too,” He sighed and went to go check in on the kids again. Sometimes he worried that he wasn’t being as in-tune with the kids as Steve was because he wasn’t home with them as much. He hated thinking that maybe there were problems he wasn’t aware of. Maybe Adriana was feeling like she wasn’t getting enough individual attention. Maybe she was unhappy helping out with the babies when Bucky asked her to. But he couldn’t deal with those thoughts right now either. There was too much else happening and both Sarah and Greg were headed to the kitchen now for breakfast.

---

Adriana smiled happily as her papa walked back into the room. “Look!” she said, pointing at Christopher. “He made a big tower. It’s so good, Papa.” Christopher clapped his hands and grinned as Adriana showed off his work.

---

“That’s great, Christopher. It’s a good tower.” Bucky took Sarah May from Adriana and gave her a kiss as she woke up again. “It’s breakfast time, okay, Kids? Let’s go to Daddy.” By the time breakfast was on the table, Sarah called Beth back and Greg had already given Steve a few underhanded comments. Steve didn’t have the most patience right now but he did his best to put a smile on as they all gathered for breakfast. Bucky had Steve get the kids in their chairs as he got the girls up from Becca’s apartment and finally, he was sitting down next to his husband and trying not to make eye contact with his uncle. “Okay, Steve, we’re ready to pray.”

---

Steve took his usual seat and held hands with Bucky and his mom, the rest of the table followed suit as Steve said grace. “Thank you, Lord, for blessing us with good health and good food. Thank you for seeing that we all are together and thank you for bringing us one more family member to join us for breakfast today. Amen.” He let go and started to help Bucky cut up the food for their kids. “So, did you hear of the ‘straightedge movement’, Buck? Clint was telling me about it the other day. Apparently, it’s been around for a bit now but I haven’t really heard of it.”

---

Bucky could tell that Steve was doing what he could to sort of kill Greg with kindness at the moment. And he hoped it would work. Although there was a scoff from his uncle when Steve began to pray anyway. He wasn’t a religious man. He thought it was all bullshit. “Yeah, is that the thing that kids are doing right now to make sobriety the cool the thing in schools?” he asked tentatively and glanced around the table and landed on his uncle.

---

Steve nodded. “Yeah, that. You know, I’ve always mildly liked all of the punk stuff just because you were into it and the music is nice to listen to. But I think I may get more into it if that’s where the punk movement is starting to gear itself towards,” he said.

Becca laughed and remarked with good-humored, “You’re so lame, Steve.”

---

“Can it,” Bucky mumbled and shot her a warning glance. “Yeah, I mean, it’s a good thought. I think it would be great if they got it to work, but I don’t really see that happening. It’s hard to just convince everyone to stop intoxicating themselves and having sex all at once. You know?” He wasn’t sure where Steve was trying to go with this conversation but he wanted to get out ahead of it in case it was going to come back to bite him in the ass.

---

“I know,” Steve said. “I just think it’s a nice thought. It’d be cool if I didn’t have to worry about any bad stuff being around at concerts if our kids want to go to one someday. I mean, I’d still worry regardless. But I’d worry a lot less. I guess I’m just trying to make some conversation here.”

---

Bucky sighed and squeezed Steve’s thigh under the table. “Well, we can just teach our kids not to want to do that stuff,” he said half-heartedly.

“Yes, because that worked on you,” Greg said flatly but with a challenging tone as he stared down Bucky. “Your dad always told you not to smoke or drink or do drugs. Although, that was hard to take an example from him when your mother drank all her meals.”

---

Steve’s head snapped up at Greg. That was seriously uncalled for. He’d expected comments about being gay, but Bucky’s drug abuse shouldn’t have been brought up. Nor his mother’s issues. Before Steve could say anything, Sarah stepped in. “Gregory, that television show you said you liked is on now. You could watch it in the living room. I think you would better enjoy your breakfast there,” she said in a tone that suggested hell if he didn’t get up from the table.

---

Bucky felt himself starting to shut down again just like the day before. But when Greg looked to Sarah and decided to concede to her wishes and get up, a new spark exploded in Bucky and he got up too. “No, you know what, stay, Greg. Sit down. Please explain in front of my entire family what you think about me and my mother. Please, go on about the shit you disapprove of, huh? Try to tell me again that my dad would be disappointed in me. Try to tell me again that I’m not a good father to my babies and to the girls!”

---

Steve grimaced a little but didn’t dare try to interject. It was hard not to when Bucky swore in front of the kids. Adriana gasped and looked a little uncomfortable since she’d never seen her papa raise his voice like this. Sarah May and Christopher were both too busy eating to notice anything yet.

“You’re being overdramatic,” Gregory dismissed. “Just because you don’t like the truth I’m telling, doesn’t make me the bad guy here.”

---
“I’m not being overdramatic at all!” Bucky snapped back. “This is how people react when cranky unwanted relatives show up and try to cause chaos in their lives. You’re the one who’s trying to exploit every mistake I’ve made as a reason that I’m not good enough. But do you even care that I haven’t had any alcohol for over a year now and I go to AA twice a week? Do you even care that after my dad helped me get clean, I didn’t fall back into a coke addiction?”

There was a small gasp from his left from Becca and Lilly. “What coke addiction?” Lilly asked hurriedly. They both knew he had alcohol problems and Becca was aware that he had dabbled in various drugs at different times in his life but they had never had a conversion together about a drug addiction. Becca wasn’t surprised but Lilly was entirely caught off guard.

---

By this point, Sarah had gotten up to set up some TV trays downstairs in Becca’s room. She wanted to usher Adriana downstairs to eat with her and keep her occupied. Steve put his fingers over his lips and looked at Becca and Lilly, giving them an expression that promised that he would talk with them about everything later.

“You shouldn’t have had any addiction in the first place. You don’t deserve a pat on the back for not doing what you should’ve done anyway with keeping away from that stuff,” he scolded, keeping an even voice. “None of my kids are ever going to go down that path. I’ve yet to meet an addict who didn’t turn back to their old ways at one point or another. That’s why you need a stable wife to support you instead of a fake marriage so you have a fighting chance to stay clean long enough for your kids to be grown.”

---

Bucky couldn’t handle this anymore. He had held himself together for as long as he could right now. He let out an angry, irrational yell and yanked his hands through his hair, pulling out a few small chunks. “Fuck off, Greg! Let’s go outside. Come on! I’ll kick your ass back to California and laugh while doing it. We don’t need you here! My family has been doing just fine before you stuck your ugly nose into everything!”

---

Sarah May startled in her high chair and started to cry. Greg scoffed. “You see? This is exactly what I’m talking about. All you need is a small nudge and you go from calm to over the edge. You don’t have any self-control.”

Steve quickly stood up and placed himself in front of Bucky. “Buck, nothing good is going to come from this. How about we both sit down now or we can go upstairs.”

---

“He’s insulting me, Steve. And you!” Bucky protested again and tried to push against Steve to get to Greg. “How can you say it takes one nudge to push me over the edge when you’re the one who’s been shoving me to the cliff since the moment you got here!” He huffed and shook his head. “How could you think you’re helping any of us when all you’ve done is drop in on us unexpectedly, brought us bad news, and then decided to torment me every second you are awake!”

---

“I know he’s insulting us, Bucky,” Steve tried again firmly. “But our daughter is crying and yelling will only upset her more.” Becca got up from her chair so she could take Sarah May from her high chair. Lilly got Christopher and they both carried them up to the nursery so they could avoid any more of the argument.

“I’m not tormenting you every second, Son. I’m being real with you. Somebody has to be honest with you around here,” Greg pointed out.

---

Bucky faltered when he turned to look at his kids and found that everyone was gone except him and Steve and Greg. He hadn’t even noticed any of them leaving. He was so consumed with being angry that he didn’t realize it was upsetting his family. “Fuck,” he gasped and staggered backwards a few steps. “Fuck. Dammit, Greg, can’t you just keep your mouth shut? I just wanted a normal breakfast with my family! Steve even tried to welcome you in and be polite this morning. Now, look what happened!”

---

“I won’t keep my mouth shut because I’m not going to sit around and watch my nephew make poor life choices for himself and everyone around him. I give a damn about you and the girls and now your kids. They need a stable life and he-” Greg pointed at Steve, “Isn’t ever going to give you or your kids what you all need.”

---

“First of all, Uncle Greg,” Bucky sneered, being a little too childish with his response and not helping his case. “Steve is more for me and my family than I could have ever hoped for. He’s my world. He’s the only person I want to do this with and I trust him and love him and it’s your issue if you can’t see that. Secondly, how the fuck do you know what I need? You can’t just show up after four years and think you know me or my husband or my kids!”

---

Greg snorted and rolled his eyes. “You’re so delusional, it’s sickening. I’ve had enough of this.
Becca and I are going to pick up your dad’s shit and I’ll be out of here tonight,” he growled before heading upstairs, leaving his half-eaten breakfast behind.

---

Bucky watched him leave with rage still in his heart. He was relieved for a moment that Greg would be leaving soon but he also wasn’t sure it would be that simple. He figured this fight wasn’t over.
They still had the entire day and he would be surprised if he heard the last of his uncle once he went back to California. “What a prick,” Bucky breathed, arms folded across his chest and hair wildly cocooning his face. “Goddamn asshole thinks he has any authority here. Suck my dick, Greg. This is my house. This was my father’s house.” He mumbled some more to himself as he picked up his uncle’s plate and shoved the rest of the food into the trash bin.

---

Steve’s smoothed his hands down Bucky’s arms and looked at him seriously. “Bucky. Babe, look at me.” He sighed when Bucky moved away to toss the food in the garbage. Diana sat patiently at the table still, hoping to be given somebody’s leftovers. “You have every right to be angry, but yelling will just give him more satisfaction.”

---
“What am I supposed to do right now?” Bucky asked, hands up in the air holding two cups as he worked to clean up the table. “He wasn’t going to stop. He wasn’t going to just let things go. We would still be stuck in an argumentative loop at the table right now if I didn’t fight back like that.”

---

“You could’ve let him leave when my mom told him to bug off,” he said. Steve tossed some toast over at Diana and helped clean up. “Maybe you should spend the day with the babies. Me, Mom, and Becca can keep him away for the most part so, hopefully, he won’t pick any fights with you for the rest of the day,” Steve suggested.

---

Bucky knew Steve was right. He should have just let it be. But he was still in a fired-up, combative state. “I can’t do that. We are going through my dad’s and Dwight’s things today. I want to be with my sisters for that. It’s hard enough already but I know getting those boxes of Uncle Dewey’s is going to make things far more painful again.”

---

“Well, someone has to watch the kids and, out of the two of us, Greg argues with me less. He won’t try to fire me up like he does with you. He likes to pretend that I don’t exist. It’ll be easier if I’m there instead of you. And who says we have to go through it all today? We can wait until he leaves before we take care of it.”

---

Bucky thought about it for a few moments while he finished off his orange juice. Steve had a point. It would be better if Bucky wasn’t with Greg all day. And it would do him good to spend the days with his kids. He probably already made Adriana upset again from all his yelling at breakfast. “Shit...” he sighed, thinking about it again. “God, I’m stupid, Steve. I let him get under my skin again so easily.” He shook his head and reached out for Steve to come to him. “You’re right. I’ll just try to avoid him today. I’ll watch the kids and you can be with the girls and Greg. I’m sorry. You’re right.”

---

Steve walked over and wrapped his arms around Bucky. “You’re not stupid, Sweetheart. He’s bringing out the worst in your decision-making, but that doesn’t make you stupid and you don’t have to be sorry.” He kissed Bucky’s cheek. “I’m sure Adriana wants to be read to, so let’s get the dolphin book so we can read to her before I go out with the girls.”

---

“I’m sure Adriana is angry as hell right now,” Bucky said worriedly and leaned against Steve. He kissed his neck and nuzzled him as well. He was trying to be so calm and gentle and loving right now to try to make up for his outburst before. “Let’s go get her. Let’s hope she isn’t prepared to throw a tantrum at me since I gave a bad example in that too.”

---

“You haven’t given her any reason to be angry, Buck. She hasn’t been waiting a long time and she may not have even finished her breakfast yet.” Steve leaned into the affection and ran his hands up Bucky’s back. “I love you,” he reminded. Steve kissed him and then went to grab the dolphin book so they could read to their daughter.
Bucky followed after Steve to Becca’s room to get Adriana from Sarah. Sarah had popped a VHS in Becca’s player to keep Adriana distracted for a while. Their little girl was sitting on the couch, munching idly on her toast, and watching rainforest animals. “Hey, Peanut,” Bucky said cautiously and knelt down beside her. “How are you, my sweet girl?”

Adriana looked over at Bucky and she eyed him carefully to make sure that he wasn’t still upset. Once she deemed that he wasn’t going to blow up on her, she put her toast down and hugged him. “Are you okay, Papa? How come you were sad?”

Bucky let out a soft little sigh of relief and he wrapped her up securely in his arms. He rocked her back and forth slowly and kissed her hair. “That’s my girl. I’m sorry, Adriana. I’m so sorry. Papa got too upset, didn’t he? It was too much.” He shook his head and looked up at Steve, so relieved that she wasn’t angry with him now.

She snuggled Bucky eagerly, just so pleased he wasn’t angry anymore. “Uh-huh,” she agreed. “It was scary. How come Uncle Greg made you mad? Was he being bad? The teachers used to yell at us when we were bad at the home,” she said. Steve ran a hand up and down Bucky’s back to comfort him. He knew that Adriana wouldn’t be mad with Bucky. She wasn’t really like that.

“Well, Peanut, Uncle Greg and Papa were both being bad,” Bucky said. “Uncle Greg shouldn’t have been saying things to me that he was. But I shouldn’t have reacted so angry and scary like I did.” He reached a hand back to pull Steve down to hug the both of them. “I’m sorry for scaring you, Adriana. I really am. Papa never wants to scare you.”

Steve wrapped his arms around his husband and daughter. She felt safe being held by both of her parents like that. “It’s okay,” she said. “Can you read me the dolphin book now? I’ve been waiting forever,” she said dramatically, making Steve laugh a little.

“Uh-huh, yes,” Bucky said firmly and kissed her forehead before lifting her up. “Let’s go read. You have waited so patiently. Is the book upstairs, Daddy? Or in the living room?” he asked Steve and touched his side, not really wanting to be away from him right now at all. He was just going to keep some sort of touch of a tether to Steve as long as he could today.

“I brought it down here,” Steve said. He passed the book over to Bucky and leaned over to kiss his cheek and snuggle up closer so he could give Bucky as much support as possible.

“You have to do the voices,” Adriana reminded.
“I know, Peanut, I will,” Bucky said and adjusted his daughter more comfortably. He had been reading to her more often lately and had gotten a little better with reading out loud. It was still difficult and he definitely took much longer than Steve, though. But by the time they were done with the book, Adriana was calmly snuggled to Bucky and gently playing with his long hair and just loving having alone time with her parents. “That’s the end, Adriana.”

---

Even though Bucky was self-conscious about his reading, Steve didn’t think that Bucky did a poor job by any means. Not only that, but having Bucky read was like having a special treat in Adriana’s eyes. It happened less often than Steve reading, so it was extra important to her. “Can you read it again?” she asked.

Steve looked over to Bucky with a smile. “You’re taking my job from me here,” he joked.

---

“Again?” Bucky clarified with a tight smile. “Wouldn’t you want Daddy to read something to you now? You can pick another book. Something you really like Daddy to read.” He wouldn’t argue if she asked again but he just got through the book once. He was counting pages as he went while reading it the first time.

---

Adriana sat up and leveled Bucky with a look. “How come you don’t like reading?” she asked him point blank. “Daddy never complains about reading. I like reading, but I’m not so good at it. So how come you don’t?” She had clearly noticed how Bucky was always hesitant to read to her.

---

“Baby,” Bucky started and brushed her hair back from her eyes. “I’m not very good at it either. I get caught on the words. Even if I know the words, my mouth doesn’t want to say what my eyes see. It’s hard to get past them and then I go slow. It’s embarrassing for me to read, Peanut. Do you understand? Do you know what embarrassment is like?”

---

“But you’re very good at it,” she insisted. “You’re lots better than me. Is it cause Aunt Lilly says you’re no good at it?” She stood up in Bucky’s lap so she could talk face to face with him. “Cause Lilly is wrong. You’re the smartest.” Adriana gave a small huff and said, “Yes, I know what ‘embarrassment’ is.”

---

“Adriana, Sweetie,” Bucky said with an amused little sigh. “I am so grateful that you think I’m smart and that you want to stand up for me. But being smart doesn’t mean being a good reader. And I just really have a hard time reading. And I know it’s not fair that you don’t get to have me read and it’s not fair to Daddy that he always has to read. But it’s a lot for me to handle. I am trying, though. Just for you.”

---

Adriana didn’t look entirely happy with the response but she also was able to tell that she wasn’t going to get her way with Bucky either. She sat back down and snuggled Bucky a little bit. “Then I don’t want reading time. Can we watch a movie?” Steve felt a little insulted that she didn’t want him to read for her but he kept it to himself.

---

“No, Adriana. It’s the morning,” Bucky said and looked up at Steve. “We can’t watch a movie in the morning. And Daddy and I have things we have to handle today. For now, I’m going to have you go with Nana to your room and get on day clothes. Then I’ll wash your pajamas, too.” He wasn’t sure how much of the day he was going to be with the kids, but, regardless, there was stuff to do. And he figured he should try to help with as much as possible until he had to see himself out of the situation and let Steve handle it all.

---

Adriana’s shoulders slumped. She sighed and slipped onto the floor in a dramatic heap. “I’m not allowed to watch anything ever,” she complained.

Steve chuckled and picked her up. “Behave for Nana, Peanut. You can watch a movie later. Now go on before Sarah May grows up and starts stealing your clothes.”

---

Adriana obeyed but she was decidedly grumpy about it as he stomped her way upstairs. Bucky followed a little bit behind her and got the babies from his sisters and started to get them changed. Lilly and Becca found Steve while he was cleaning up. “Steve,” Lilly said firmly. “What is going on right now?” she asked, trying to be calm even though everything about the morning and the day before was confusing and frustrating her.

---

Steve pat Lilly’s shoulder, feeling bad for her because of the morning she had. “We are going to go pick up the things that Greg had mailed to us,” he said. “Then we’re going to wait for him to leave so you, Becca, and Bucky can go through everything in peace.” Steve took a step back and asked, “Are you okay? I know it hasn’t been an easy couple of days.”

---

“No, I’m not okay,” Lilly answered sharply. “Greg is fighting with you and Bucky every chance he gets, Bucky can’t hardly keep his head on for more than three minutes, our uncle is dead and we have more stuff to go through, and I still don’t know what they were talking about with Bucky having a coke addiction.”

---

“The issue with Greg is going to be solved soon when he leaves and Bucky will be better after that, too,” he reassured. Steve grimaced a little when Lilly brought up Bucky’s addiction. “That was a long time ago, Lil. He’s been sober from cocaine for even longer than he’s been sober from alcohol. You don’t have to worry about that.”

---

Lilly stared hard at Steve. She was not satisfied with that answer. “I am worried about it. How come I was never told this? Even Becca knew he had experimented in drugs before. Why do people not tell me things?” she pressured again. “Is it because I’m young? Because I’m almost fifteen now, Steve. I’m not a little kid anymore!”
“At the time, it was because you were young, but it was also a long time ago. I know that you’re older and more mature now,” Steve said. “This was years ago, we’re talking about, even before your parents died. I wouldn’t want Sarah May to know if her older sister had a problem like that if Sarah May was only seven or eight.”

“Wait, when was it?” she asked again, pushing a litter hard. “How long before they died? How bad was it?”

Becca looked over to her sister and reached out a hand to pet her hair. “Lilly, maybe we should leave it for now. It’s a tough morning as it is.”

“Lilly, he hasn’t used drugs for so long now,” Steve said patiently. “But he was using when he was at least in his late teens. It’s in the past now, though. I know it’s stressful to learn that, but it’s all done and over with,” Steve reassured. “Do you want me to make you anything else to eat or drink?”

Lilly felt like Becca and Steve were trying to shut her down right now. She wanted to talk about this and ask more questions. But they both were looking at her like they were so tired they might die if she asked anything else. “Fine,” she grumbled and stormed off to Becca’s room.

Becca waited for a long minute and then sighed and looked up at Steve. “I think I know why this is such a big deal right now to her.”

Steve didn’t mean to make Lilly feel like she couldn’t ask anything, but he genuinely felt like this wasn’t something she had to concern herself with. At the very least, she should worry about feeling better about her uncle first. He looked to Becca and asked, “What do you think?”

“Steve,” Becca started slowly. “She found Bucky when he overdosed on pills. She thinks about that all the time. She still has nightmares even if they aren’t as often.” She sighed and tucked her hair behind her ears, looking a lot like Bucky as she did. “This is entirely new information to her. She knows Bucky had pill problems around our parents’ deaths and had alcohol problems for years. But a coke addiction even before anything went to hell... I mean, that’s too much for her to handle right now.”

“I know she did,” Steve said. “That’s even more reason why I don’t want her worrying about Bucky and drugs,” he remarked. “If she keeps thinking about it, then she’s going to have the nightmares more often.” Steve crossed his arms over his chest and let out a heavy sigh. “I’m just trying to protect her from working herself up too much.”

Becca nodded and gave Steve a weak little smile. “I understand. You’re just trying to keep all of us sane and safe during this mess. I get it. And I’m trying to help. I am. I know it’s not easy when Bucky gets unmanageable like he was this morning. And when Lilly is added to it, it’s... almost impossible.” She closed her eyes for a second and then shook her head. “It’s fine. Everything is fine. Tell me the plan for the day again and then let’s get going. If we occupy Lilly and Bucky then they won’t have time to get upset again.”

---

“You don’t have to worry so much about being an adult here,” Steve said. “I know he’s your brother and you care about him, but I don’t want you to feel like you have to help ‘manage’ him. He’s upset and rightly so. Greg is being incredibly rude,” Steve said. “We’re going to pick up the stuff from the post office and wait for Greg to leave so we can sort through them.”

---

“I know Greg is being terrible to you two. But Bucky still needs to try to calm down. He scared Adriana a little bit and he was louder than he usually ever is so Christopher and Sarah May got confused and upset,” Becca said gently. “He’s not used to having someone in his home, his safe place, being so negative about his sexuality and you. It’s invasive for him.”

---

“He’s already apologized to Adriana,” he said. “I’m not saying that I approve of his behavior, but I understand and I don’t want to scold him too much over it. So, maybe we should give him a little break, yeah?” He squeezed her arm. “Can you do me a favor and let Greg know that we won’t need him to pick stuff up from the post office?”

---

Becca nodded and went off to talk to Greg, leaving Steve to have a few minutes to himself. After a bit, Sarah and Adriana came to find Steve. “Steven, should I take Adriana up to the nursery to spend time with her siblings and her Papa?” Sarah asked as Adriana started to peel the banana she had been holding on to since Sarah took her downstairs.

---

“I think that might be best, Ma,” Steve said. “The more kids that are around him, the less likely Greg will try and single Bucky out. Would you mind staying nearby while I’m out with the girls? I don’t want Bucky to have another meltdown and end up upsetting the kids.”

---

“Of course, Steve,” Sarah promised and pulled Steve in for a tight hug. “I’m sorry this is difficult for you.” She pulled back enough to hold his face in her hands and squish his cheeks like only mothers do. “It’s always something with our family, isn’t it? But, Dear, let’s count our blessings and thank God through trying times. Right?”

---

“Mom-” Steve said, getting embarrassed when she squished his cheeks. He wiggled his way out and stood a little taller as if to try to keep his face out of squishing range. “I know, I know. We are lucky to have a big healthy family that’s all together. I’ll be luckier if you don’t squish my face again.”

---
Sarah scoffed and folded her arms. “Steve, don’t you know that it’s good luck when your ma squishes your face?” She gave him a smile and squeezed him in another hug before taking Adriana upstairs.

Becca came back then and huffed a sigh. “Okay, Steve,” she said. “He isn’t happy about it, but I convinced Greg to let me and Lilly handle this on our own. He might think it’s just me and her going out to the post office so he will probably be annoyed when he realizes that you went with us.”

---

“I’ve gotten past the point of caring if Greg is annoyed or not,” Steve said. “I’m going to get my shoes and then we can all head out. Thank you for talking to him for me.”

---

“No problem,” Becca murmured and went to drag Lilly out of the basement. It took a few minutes but they were both ready to go and waiting with their hands in their pockets. Lilly was still grumpy and not really getting any better and Becca was trying her best to keep up a smile for her. “Steve, should I go tell Bucky we are leaving?”

---

“I let him know already what the plans were,” He didn’t want to risk having to walk past Greg if they could help it. Steve clipped a leash onto Diana because he liked taking her on walks at every opportunity. “We’ll be in and out, hopefully. Let’s go.”
S6: E15

They walked to the post office together slowly. Lilly stood a few feet away from Becca and Steve. She was mad at them both. But once they got the boxes that were shipped to them, she softened a little. “Some of Dad’s stuff is in here,” she remarked and hoisted one box into her arms. “Uncle Greg said Dewey had some of Dad’s medals. We can put them on his uniform later.”

---

“Do you know anything about the medals?” Steve asked. Bucky had told him plenty about his dad in the past, but Steve didn’t get half as many stories from the girls. He slipped the loop of Diana’s leash onto his wrist and then loaded up one of the heavier boxes in his arms.

---

There were four boxes in total and Lilly was able to stack two and carry them on her own. “There’s a medal of valor,” Becca said. “At least, I think that’s what it is. He got it because his command stayed on enemy lines for three weeks in hiding and gathered intel. And I assume his Purple Heart is in there. They gave that to him when he got injured and they honorably discharged him. And we are missing a few bars on his formal uniform so maybe Dewey had those.”

---

“Three weeks? That’s incredible. I was scared out of my mind for the five minutes I was in a firefight in my own city. I can’t imagine what was going through his mind the whole three weeks he was there,” Steve said. He shook his head in disbelief. “He seems like such a good guy. Someone with that amount of discipline had to have a lot of patience to raise a rebel like Bucky.”

---

Becca nodded enthusiastically in agreement. “You’re telling me,” she said. “Dad was always really calm and patient and clever. He didn’t get upset or raise his voice or freak out. He was so methodical. I’m guessing that, during the war, he was so focused and seemingly unaffected that he was a clear choice to be a leader. Especially given how good he was at calming down our mom or Bucky when they got too worked up. He was probably the best around antsy soldiers.”

---

“I bet he was,” Steve agreed. “Has Bucky ever reached out to any of the soldiers your dad knew? Maybe they have some stories that you never knew about him,” he suggested. Steve would be willing to do a bit of digging in order to unearth some new things for Bucky to hold on to.

---

Lilly shook her head and shrugged. “I’m guessing not. Dad talked about a few of his buddies but he didn’t usually mention his command by name.”

Becca nodded and added, “Mom used to say that it was hard for him to talk about the guys he led because so many of them didn’t make it and he hated having to think about that. He felt like he failed the ones who died under his orders.”
“I understand,” Steve said. There were plenty of people who were hurt when he was trying to save them and, though it wasn’t as bad as dying, Steve understood that dreadful responsibility. “Who knows. Maybe there’s a journal laying around in one of these boxes and we can find out then.”

---

“We can see, yeah,” Becca agreed. “I’ll just be happy to see his medals.” She paused and looked over at Lilly to check on her. “Did Bucky ever tell you why he has Dad’s uniform?” she asked and looked back to Steve. “At least, his formal uniform. We don’t have his fatigues or anything that he actually fought in.”

---

Steve shook his head. “I don’t like to ask too much about him. I let Bucky tell me what he wants as he goes,” he answered. Steve never knew what question could dredge up all sorts of bad memories for Bucky and he didn’t want to accidentally ruin his husband’s day with a single question.

---

Becca nodded and stopped so she could switch the way she was holding her box before continuing on. “Well, a lot of people are buried in their uniforms. Dad went to a few funerals of people he knew and they were all buried in them. Our grandfather was buried in his uniform,” she said. “It’s pretty common. I’m sure Dewey was too. But we buried Dad in the suit he wore for his wedding. It still fit and everything. Uncle Greg was pretty angry that we did that. He tried to fight us on it. But Mom and Dad always wanted to be buried in their wedding clothes. Mom is in her dress too. Mom said it was because their lives didn’t really start until then and it was only fitting that they be put to rest the same way.” She shook her head and took in a shaky breath. “I wonder sometimes if they knew they were going to die together.”

---

Steve had always wanted to be buried in his uniform since he became a cop, but now he was having second thoughts. Their wedding was the happiest day of his life and Steve thought that it would be nice to have his eternal rest reflect that. He would’ve hugged Becca if his arms hadn’t been full. “I know it was hard for you. But maybe that’s the way it was always meant to happen. I hope Bucky and I don’t die for a long time, but I would want to go together, too.”

---

“I know what you mean,” Becca agreed quietly. She was feeling pretty sentimental today and it seemed like Bucky’s absence as a mature helpful presence was unlocking that side in Becca that had a hard time showing up. “As I get older, I’m figuring out that there isn’t any way I can get them back and maybe our lives were always supposed to be this way. Because everything would be different if they hadn’t died. Bucky might still have problems sleeping around and drinking and who knows what else. I might’ve alienated my siblings from me even more than I used to. Bucky never would have met you and I wouldn’t be an aunt or know your mom. And as much as I’ve been a pain in the ass sometimes, I do love you all.”

---

Steve wished that Bucky and the girls had their parents in their lives and that they still could’ve ended up knowing each other. But chances were that things would’ve gone a lot differently. Steve felt his eyes get wet with tears when Becca told him that she loved their new family. “You really mean it?” He was the sort of idiot who wanted to hear it again.
Becca glanced over at Steve and rolled her eyes. She was used to him by now, though. She knew how emotional he could get. He was a good pair for Bucky in that way. “Yeah, Steve. I mean it. Don’t make it weird,” she said and nudged her elbow against his. “Let’s just get home and hope that no one had any fights while we were away.”

“It’s my job to make it weird,” he said, wiping his eyes on his shoulder. When they got home, he shifted the box into one arm so he could open the door. He had to let go of the leash immediately because Diana went running inside like a bat out of hell. He carried the box into the kitchen and set it on the counter with a relieved huff.

Bucky had almost made it through without any hitches the whole time Steve was gone. But then Adriana and Christopher both wanted some orange juice and he ran into Greg in the kitchen where Greg tried again to talk him into kicking Steve to the curb. He even offered to help pack Steve’s things and to help Bucky find a nice motherly woman to date. So, now Sarah was watching the kids in the living room and Bucky was in his room with the doors locked, acting like a teenager who was told they couldn’t go to the movies because they didn’t bring up their grades or something.

Diana pranced around Steve’s feet and he gave her a dog treat to calm her down. He frowned when he saw his mom with the kids - that meant that something happened with Bucky. Steve sighed and headed up into their bedroom to check on Bucky. It was locked – another bad sign. He knocked on the door and said, “Buck? It’s me. Can you unlock the door?”

There was a pause and a shuffle as Bucky got off the bed and came to unlock the door and open it for Steve. He mumbled an acknowledgment and then crawled back up on the bed. He was shirtless and sitting on an unmade bed with his sweater in his hands. He had a sewing kit and was trying his best to embroider Steve’s name over the chest. The letters were messy and wild and looked nothing like the neat careful embroidery of the kids’ names on the cuffs. But he didn’t care. He wanted Steve’s name over his heart and he was going to wear this sweater forever.

Steve walked back inside and locked the door behind him. He saw what Bucky was doing and his heart clenched. God, he loved this man. He sat down next to Bucky and gently took the sweater and the needle from his hands so he could place it neatly on the nightstand. He laid Bucky back on the bed and started to kiss his neck and chest. “I love you.”

Bucky whined about being interrupted but he laid back and relaxed under Steve anyway. “Baby, I wasn’t done,” he said quietly in protest. “It only says ‘Stev’ right now.” He carded his fingers in Steve’s hair and brushed a thumb over his cheek, trying to relax and feel Steve’s touches on him as well. “Did you get Uncle Dewey’s stuff?”
“You can finish it later, Sweetheart,” Steve said. He brushed his thumb over Bucky’s nipple as he sucked marks onto his skin to make sure Bucky knew who he was married to. “I did. Becca and I had a heart to heart. I was embarrassing, as usual,” he said with a little smile.

---

Bucky let out a short moan and draped a leg over Steve’s hip. “You cried, Babe?” he asked, although he already knew he did. Steve was prone to getting emotional especially when Becca gave him anything at all to work with - since she was such a closed book, usually. “Hey, are trying to distract me with hickeys? Come on.”

---

“Only a little,” he chuckled. Steve continued to kiss his husband affectionately. “So, what if I am? Is it working?” he asked. Steve pet his hand down Bucky’s side and gave him a loving smile. “I’ve barely gotten to kiss you all day. I’ve got a little pent-up love waiting to be released.”

---

Bucky whined again and wrapped both legs around Steve’s middle. It was working to distract him. But he also was such a grump right now and wanted to finish his sweater and go flaunt it around Greg and start another fight. Which, now that he thought about it, was all such a bad, irrational idea. “Fuck,” he mumbled and glanced over at the sweater. He ruined it. He should’ve just asked Sarah to do it if he really wanted it. Instead, he tried to do it himself and now it looked terrible. He shook his head and pushed Steve’s chin up to get him to look at him. “I love you. Come kiss me. I’m sorry I haven’t been with you much and you have pent-up love. Come on, let me touch you. Come here.”

---

Steve knew that Bucky was thinking over the sweater again. That glance at it told him all he needed to know. “We can fix the sweater later. My mom is magical with that kind of stuff.” He kissed Bucky a few more times and smiled softly at him. He laid on top of Bucky and cuddled him close. He wanted to make Bucky forget about all the awful things Greg said to him. “Don’t be sorry. We’re busy dads doing busy dad things.”

---

Bucky nodded and held Steve close. He was so grateful he had him here to pull him back every time he went drifting too far. “I know. We’re busy dads. But right now, Greg is making me just feel like an angry sixteen-year-old Bucky who couldn’t fight off any of the other people who told me I was disgusting and wrong. I’m not thinking like a dad and a husband and a brother right now. I’m only thinking about myself.”

---

Steve nuzzled Bucky affectionately. “You can do it, Buck. You can go out there again. And if Greg gives you a hard time, we can kick him out. We aren’t obligated to host someone who refuses to respect you,” he said. “I’ll just grab his bags, put them out on the stoop, and call him a cab,” Steve reassured.

---

“It’s only until tomorrow, right?” Bucky asked. “He did say he only needed to get the boxes to us and now we have them so he should be gone in like twenty-four hours give or take.” He hoped like hell that was accurate. He couldn’t handle much more. “You know, he’s just doing this because he feels like he’s supposed to parent me now that my dad is gone. And he was always the one who Dad had to protect growing up. Dwight wasn’t very nice to him and he wasn’t as athletic as his brothers. Greg wasn’t in the military either and he’s always been bitter that Dewey and Old George had that shared experience. He had a heart condition as a kid and even the draft didn’t take him. I guess bad hearts run in the family...” Given how Dewey died and Greg’s boyhood condition, Bucky wondered if he should watch out for that. And he also must have hurt his heart with drugs and drinking so that wasn’t good at all. Now, he was worried.

“Tomorrow, the latest. I’m hoping that he’s out by tonight,” Steve said. He ran his hand over Bucky’s chest gently. “You don’t need him to parent you and it’s not your fault that he had trouble growing up. He’s got his own kids he can be a dad to. He could be an uncle to you and our kids if he quit being such an asshole.”

Bucky nodded and nuzzled against Steve. He sighed and squeezed his arms tighter around him. “Let’s not talk about him anymore, okay?” he said quickly and brought his lips close to Steve to give him another kiss. He reached down and stuck his hands down the back of Steve’s pants and gripped his ass. “Let’s just be together right now. Your mom has the kids and Greg was looking at a photo album the last time I saw him.”

“I thought you said not to talk about him anymore,” Steve teased when Bucky said his name again. He groaned softly when Bucky felt his ass and he returned the kiss happily. “I like that plan,” he said. “I’m glad I’m keeping your hands occupied or else you’d still be busy murdering my name on your sweater.”

“Murdering?” Bucky asked with a faux offended key to his voice. “It was romantic. Sort of. It would have been romantic if I was any good at sewing like that,” he corrected and wiggled a finger in between Steve’s ass and poked gently against his hole. “It came across more crazy than romantic, didn’t it?” He sighed. “It’s okay. I’ll just have ‘Stev’ over my heart from now on if your mom doesn’t think she can fix it.”

“It is romantic,” Steve agreed with a little grunt at the touch. “But it would’ve been more romantic if it didn’t look like Christopher did it,” Steve chuckled, giving Bucky a smile to show he didn’t mean it. He genuinely did think that it was sweet of Bucky to do, regardless of how it came out. He gasped softly and then leaned down to nip Bucky’s neck again. “Do you want to ride you?”

“Yes. God, yes, please,” Bucky whispered back quickly and pushed his hips up against Steve to get some more friction. “I love when you do. You always look so handsome. Like an angel hovering over me and pleasuring yourself with my dick. So hot.” He shook his head and pulled his hands away from Steve’s ass so he could unbutton his pants and start to push them off.

Steve reached for the lube from the drawer and pushed it into Bucky’s hand. “I want you to finger me open,” he purred. “And keep sweet talking to me while you do, because I’m loving it.” Steve ran his hands slowly up Bucky’s chest and gave his nipples a small pinch.

---

Bucky nodded and obediently lubed up two fingers heavily and prodded at Steve’s newly exposed ass again. “I’m going on with two,” he warned and then slowly but steadily pushed two fingers all the way inside and watched Steve’s face as he did. “Wow, that’s tight. It’s been a bit since I’ve fucked you, hasn’t it? The last couple times were me on bottom, right? Fuck, I shouldn’t be so selfish that way. You deserve to get fucked in your ass just as much as I do. And I know you love it so much. And I love treating you so good.”

---

Steve bit his bottom lip and arched his back when Bucky pushed two fingers in at once. He let out a little whine, his eyebrows knitting together in brief discomfort before the slightly overwhelming intrusion turned into pleasure. He laid his cheek on Bucky’s shoulder and mouthed at his neck. “I love getting to do anything with you,” he said. “So long as our dicks are out, I’m not complaining.” He nipped at Bucky’s neck. “Tell me how you’re going to fuck me next time.”

---

Bucky hummed in thought as he fucked his fingers in and out of Steve and spread him open to be able to take a third. “Maybe next time it can be a little more involved,” he offered and brought Steve’s face close to give him a chaste kiss. “I’ll come home from work one day and just whisk you upstairs. Push you back on the bed and rip your clothes off. And I’ll tie your arms down and your knees up to your chest so your ass is open and on display for me. And I’ll eat you out and fist you open until you’re dying to come. And after you’ve had your release, I’ll pound you so hard you’ll feel me for a week.”

---

Steve looked at Bucky with dark, needy eyes as he listened to Bucky talk about what he would do. He licked his lips and gave Bucky’s throat another kiss. “Please? Can we make that happen?” He asked in a soft voice. “We can get a hotel for the night and order in breakfast in the morning. We can take our time with it and not have to worry about interruptions.”

---

“Yes, we can,” Bucky agreed as he slid a third finger inside Steve. “We can make a hotel reservation and order in their fanciest room service and just hide away together. And I’ll buy you heart-shaped chocolates. It’ll be adorable.” He giggled and bit Steve’s lip lightly for a moment. “And we can pick up some of that non-alcoholic sparkling grape juice so it seems fancy.”

---

Steve arched his back when he was spread open by three fingers. He moaned Bucky’s name and clenched down on the intrusion. “Perfect... all of that is perfect, Bucky,” he said. “You pick the place. Pick somewhere nice with a good view.” He leaned down to bite at Bucky’s throat. “I’m ready for your cock, Baby.”
“I’ll plan it all. Don’t worry. It’ll be our little getaway trip,” Bucky promised and slowly eased his fingers from Steve before lubing up his cock for Steve. “Come on, Baby. Come sit down. Feel how happy my dick is to be inside you.” He moaned quietly up at Steve and pulled his hips forward so he would come get on him.

---

Steve was eager and desperate for Bucky’s cock. He grabbed the base and held it steady as he positioned the head against his hole. Steve sank down on it slow and steady, giving a satisfied groan when he felt his ass press against Bucky’s hips. He dragged his nails down Bucky’s chest. “I love how your dick feels stretching me open, Buck, Baby.”

---

Bucky stuttered out a moan and gripped Steve’s hips firmly. “You feel amazing. So tight and hot,” he said with a loving reverence. “You’re so handsome. So sexy, Baby. God, I could lay like this and look at you all day.” He shook his head and started to move his hips under Steve a little to get some sort of a motion going. “But I can look at you while I fuck you.”

---

Steve rocked his hips steadily, circling them teasingly whenever he pulled out almost all the way. He let the tip of Bucky’s cock move at his entrance before dropping back down. “I’ll ride you any day of the week when you talk to me sweet like that,” Steve purred. “God, your dick is so good. I forgot how much I loved it.”

---

Buck let out a low chuckle and ran a hand up Steve’s abs and chest to settle on a nipple. “My dick missed you, Steve,” he said and bit his lower lip for a second as he focused only on the sensations and heat around his cock. “You’re the best husband in the world. And the absolute cutest man who’s ever lived. I love you so much. You’re my sweet Steve and I love you.”

---

Steve clenched down on Bucky’s cock to reward Bucky for being so sweet on him. He leaned down and nipped at Bucky’s lip too. “I can’t be the cutest because you are,” he said. “You’re also the sexiest with hair that’s perfect to pull on when I’m fucking you from behind.”

---

“I do really love that,” Bucky agreed and gave Steve a quick kiss back. “It’s real long now too. My braid goes to my shoulder.” He thrust his hips up in rhythm with Steve and gasped a little when Steve’s ass squeezed him. “Fuck, Baby. God, you’re so hot and tight. Fuck! Wanna do this all day.”

---

“I don’t think my ass will agree with us going at it all day,” Steve chuckled. He moved Bucky’s hand to his cock and curled his fingers around it. “Jerk me off. I want to come all over you,” Steve said. He was getting a little breathless and had to slow down a little.

---

“You got it, Love,” Bucky agreed eagerly and pumped him quickly and steadily, thumbing at his slit every few seconds. “Come for me, Sexy. Come on me then I’ll come in you.” He smiled happily and licked his lips. “Want you to have my come all day. Okay? Want you to walk around with my come deep inside your ass, Baby. Sound good?”

---

Steve whined needily when Bucky started to stroke his cock. “Yes, just like that,” he said thickly. “Fuck... give it to me. I want to feel your come in me, Buck.” He loved the idea of being full of Bucky’s come, walking around the house, taking care of the kids, while Greg couldn’t say a damn thing at him without someone jumping down his throat. “Almost there- shit!” He moaned as his orgasm coursed through him and he spurted hot streams of onto Bucky’s chest.

---

Bucky giggled and pumped Steve through his orgasm until he knew it would be too much stimulation. He then gripped his hips tight with his hands and fucked up into him fast and hard and deep for a minute or two until he was coming as well with a strained, “Steve - fuck!” He gave him a few more slow thrusts and then stopped with a grunt. “God, Baby... thank you so much.”

---

Steve’s arched his back when he felt his husband fill him up, showing off for him. He slowly eased himself off of Bucky’s cock and collapsed next to him, panting to catch his breath. His eyes were fixated on his husband until he was finally able to speak again. “I’ll never get tired watching your face when you come.”

---

Bucky rolled over on his side to face Steve. He looked down at his stomach when he felt Steve’s come slipped down his skin. “Fucking you is my favorite thing. You’re so good to me, Baby,” Bucky said and scooped up some of Steve’s come and brought his fingers to his lips gently. “You felt amazing. And you cheered me up, so thank you.”

---

Steve smiled breathlessly up at his husband. “I’m happy to hear that I lifted your spirits as well as your dick.” He moved over Bucky and licked up his stomach to clean off some of the come. “We should make ourselves decent soon. My mom is currently outnumbered by children downstairs.”

---

“I know. But I don’t want to,” Bucky admitted and groaned as he sat up in bed. “How many boxes did you get from the post office?” he asked and used a tissue to wipe off the rest of the come from his skin. Then he reached over gently and pulled Steve legs further apart so he could dab at the lube on his thighs. He probably wasn’t cleaning him much but he wanted to help. “Do the girls want to open them?”

---

“Three or four,” he said. “I only carried one.” Steve smiled as Bucky cleaned him up, finding the gesture sweet. “I don’t know. They seemed to not be upset at having to wait until Greg leaves, but I could bring them up here so you could do it today before he notices that you’re opening them without him,” Steve suggested.
Bucky shook his head and got up from the bed. He grabbed his pants to pull on again. “It’s okay. Maybe we should just go see how they are right now. If they want to open the boxes today then we can. And if Greg insists on being part of it then I can just look through the boxes later. It’s okay.” He wanted to go through them with his sisters but he was also too tired right now for another fight. He wasn’t really in an argumentative mood anymore. “I don’t really want any of Dewey’s stuff. I just want Dad’s things. Greg said his medals are in there.” He smiled and pulled on his sweater so the messy letters of ‘Stev’ were haphazardly over his heart. “I want his medals.”

---

Steve eased himself up off the bed. He used a few more tissues to gingerly clean himself up before getting dressed. The poor embroidering job brought a smile to his face and he leaned over to steal a kiss. “You look good,” he complimented. “And I know you want the medals. Becca and Lilly were talking about them on the walk home.” He pulled on a different sweater and nudged Bucky to follow him out the door.

---

Bucky followed Steve and reached out for his hand and slipped their fingers together. “You look cute, too,” he said and kissed Steve’s neck a few times as they walked.
Sarah was with the kids in the kitchen getting some snacks together for them all. She looked up when they came in and her eyes immediately went to the sweater. “What happened there?” she asked with a humored little laugh as she handed Steve a bowl of carrots and celery to give to the kids.

---

Steve was so lucky to have a husband that treated him like gold every day. He let go of Bucky’s hand so he could carry the bowls to their kids. “Bucky tried his hand at embroidery, but forgot how to spell my name,” he answered.

Adriana raised her hand. “I know how to spell your name! It’s D-A-D-Y!”

---

“Good job, Adriana,” Bucky said and gave her a little kiss and a hug. “And, no, I didn’t forget how to spell his name. He just didn’t let me finish it. So, for now, he is ‘Stev’.” He sighed and came a little closer to show Sarah the sweater. “I’m going to need your help to fix this. I ruined my favorite sweater. But Steve said you could get the thread out without making it worse.”

---

Sarah leaned in to look the sweater over with her eyes squinted. “My son has high regard for me. You did a real number on this sweater... but I know that with a bit of time and patience and a new flower pot, I’ll have it fixed.” She gave him a little smile. “Raphael knocked my last one over and I’d like to avoid going out to the store in the cold.”

---

“I will get you a new flower pot,” Bucky agreed and gave her a quick hug. “Was it the one from your windowsill? Because he does really like sitting there. I don’t know if he will stop doing that.” The cat was even then walking along the kitchen counters and just narrowly avoiding making a mess of the row of cereal and bread.

---

“It was,” she said. “It’s the third one he’s knocked over and I was hoping to not lose my favorite spot for my flowers to the cat,” Sarah chuckled. “They can be such rude animals, but if that’s the worst complaint I have of him, then I’m fine. It’s not like he’s biting and scratching.”

---

Bucky and Steve had the same problem with Raphael for a while where he would come into their room and knock over his pictures of his parents on his nightstand. He decided it had been enough when he knocked the lamp over and bent the shade. Raphael was no longer allowed in the master bedroom. “Maybe you can glue some magnets or metal weights in the bottom of the pot so it’ll be harder for him to move it at all.”

---

“I have a feeling he’s going to be stubborn about it,” she said. She reached out to give the cat a pet.
“What does ‘stubborn’ mean?” Adriana asked through a mouthful of carrots. “Everyone uses that word a lot.” Steve couldn’t help but laugh because they really had a bunch of mules in their family who refused to budge.

---

Becca glanced over at Adriana and said, “It means that someone isn’t going to change their mind or budge.” She nodded and pointed to Lilly. “Do you remember the other night when Lilly wanted to order pizza and your Daddy said he had plans to make chicken? Remember how Lilly argued about it until your Papa stepped in and just agreed to pizza so she would stop whining? Lilly was being stubborn. She wouldn’t give up.”

---

“Oh. Then that means Christopher is stubborn,” she said. Christopher looked up at her and, even though he didn’t have a concept of what it meant, huffed out a ‘no!’

Sarah smiled at her grandbabies and gave each of them a kiss on the cheek. “They certainly are your kids,” she said fondly to the two of them. “Do you boys need help with anything else for now?”

---

Bucky shook his head and waved dismissively. “No, thank you, Sarah. We can handle this now. Thanks for watching them.” He felt bad that he had made her be in charge of them for so long but he did feel a lot better right now. “Becs, do you know where Uncle Greg is?” He hadn’t seen him in a while and that could either be a really good thing or be a really bad thing depending on what he was up to.

---

Sarah walked out so she could go back to watching her soap operas. Becca had been eyeing one of the boxes from the post office curiously but didn’t move from her spot. “He’s still in Lilly’s room. I haven’t heard him come out for a while. Maybe he’s packing his things up or something,” she answered.

---

“Alright, well, I guess we will just leave him be for now.” Bucky figured it was better to let him be by himself for as long as possible instead of seeking him out and then causing more of a problem. “What do you two want to do about the boxes? Are we waiting until he goes back home to open them?” he asked as he leaned a little against Steve and wrapped an arm around his middle, just wanting him close.

---

Steve slid his hand up the back of Bucky’s sweater so he could touch his back. “I think we should wait,” Becca said. “I... I really want to open them. But I don’t want to risk the blowup if uncle Greg catches us. He did make the trip all the way out here to do that with us. He might get upset,” she reasoned.

---

Bucky nodded and looked to Lilly who hadn’t been talking much. She wasn’t doing too well with any of this. Another death in the family too soon, finding out about Bucky’s past drug problems, dealing with Greg fighting everyone. And she just wanted whatever it was of her dad that was brought back to them. “Lil, are you in agreement with Becca? We will wait until he leaves?”

---

Lilly looked up at her brother and then back at the floor and shrugged. She didn’t want to wait and she didn’t like having to avoid her last uncle. Sure, he was being a dick to everyone else but they didn’t have much family left. She didn’t want to shun what little they had now. However, everyone else in the household seemed to have their mind made up already.

---

“Oh-Kay,” Bucky sighed, elongating the word in defeat. He looked over to Becca to see if she knew what was going on in Lilly’s head. “I guess that’s a ‘yes’. We will just wait.” He detached himself from Steve and went to lean over Lilly in her chair and squish her a little bit. “We can watch a movie tonight. It can be your choice so long as the kids can watch it too.”

---

Becca had tried speaking to Lilly earlier, but all it got her was a punch in the arm for not leaving her alone. Now, Lilly pushed at Bucky with an unhappy grumble, trying to get him to give her space. “I don’t want to,” she said. “Once Uncle Greg leaves, I want to go to bed. In my own room.”

---

Bucky backed off of her but stayed next to her chair for a moment. “Okay, I understand. Do you want me to do the laundry before you do so your sheets and blankets are all cleaned?” He knew he loved having fresh clean bedsheets when he wasn’t feeling good. And after having someone else be in her space for a bit, she might want to clean up everything and make it hers again.

---

“That’ll take too long,” she said. “You can do it tomorrow when I’m at school or something.”

Steve gave Bucky a concerned look because it was rare that Lilly got in a mood quite like this. Usually, she got angry if she was upset - not in a depressive, shut-down way like this. “You let me know when you want them cleaned and we’ll have it done for you,” Steve offered.

---

This was definitely new behavior for Lilly. He had seen something like it in her before but not really of a scale like it had been right now. He assumed that being in her teenage years had something to do with it too since that was such a difficult and aggravating time anyway. And for a kid who had to deal with so much tragedy early on, it probably just made everything feel so much worse. “Yeah, Lilly. We can get it done for you soon.” Steve glanced up in the direction of Lilly’s room, debating whether or not he should ask Greg to relocate so Lilly could relax.

---

Lilly nodded and didn’t say anything else after that. Instead, Christopher was the one to try to get Bucky’s attention. “Papa. Papa, up,” he said, lifting his arms up. “Up?”

---

“Sure, Bean, up.” Bucky agreed and hoisted his son in his arms. “Christopher, you are getting heavy. You know that? You’re almost two now.”
Christopher nodded and giggled. “Heavy,” he agreed even though he didn’t really know what that meant. “Down, now.” He was done with snack time. It was playtime again and now both his parents were paying attention to him which is what he wanted anyway. “Dada, play now?”

---

Steve ruffled up his son’s hair affectionately. “Yes, Bean, playtime. Go get your toys and Daddy will be right inside.” He gave him a gentle nudge towards the living room. Christopher was happy to scamper off. Steve turned to Bucky and laced his fingers together. “Should we maybe ask Greg to go in Becca’s apartment for a bit so Lilly can go lay down?”

---

“Maybe,” Bucky said after a few moments of thinking. “Maybe we can just ask Becca to let Greg have her room tonight and Lilly can have her own back. Becca might be okay sleeping on the couch. Or I can ask my wonderful husband if he would sleep on the couch and Becca and I can have the master tonight. That way, Lilly gets some normalcy back and a place to hide away.”

---

“I’ll sleep on the couch,” Steve said immediately. “I don’t want Becca to be put out at all,” he said. He ran a hand over Bucky’s back and then looked over to Becca. “Are you alright with that, Becs?” he asked.

He apparently was also taking too long to get into the living room because Christopher came running back with one of his toy dogs. “Dada! Playtime,” he reminded.

---

“Yeah, that’s fine. It’s just tonight,” Becca agreed and grabbed Lilly by the arm to take her upstairs so they could talk to Greg.

“Can we still watch a movie tonight even though Aunt Lilly doesn’t want to?” Adriana asked as she slipped off her chair at the table to go with Steve and Christopher into the living room to play.

---

Steve led Bucky with one hand and carried Sarah may in the other as they went to the living room. “Sure, we can, Peanut. But we should let Becca pick the movie if she watches with us because she’s giving her room with Uncle Greg tonight.”

Christopher sat down in the middle of the room with his toy dog. “Ana. Ana, Woof!” Christopher said. He then waved the dog at Bucky. “Papa, Woof!”

---

Adriana gave Steve a troubled look but then let out a sigh and nodded. “Okay. Do you think she’s going to pick a good one? The last three movie times have been animal movies and in one there was a lion chasing a deer and I don’t like that.” She usually liked the nature documentaries that Becca watched but the last one was a lot to handle. Bucky promptly removed her from the living room once the lion got close enough to get the deer. He told her that the lion was playing tag and the deer lost but she wasn’t buying it.
“I’ll tell Becca that she’s got to pick a cartoon movie that isn’t Bambi,” he said. Steve had considered trying to explain the food chain to Adriana but Bucky had convinced him out of it with one look since it had been hard enough to keep her from crying at the last documentary.

“Did we watch Bambi before?” Adriana asked.

---

“No Bambi!” Christopher yelped and mashed a toy truck into the leg of the coffee table, startling Sarah May who was trying to build a block tower.

“He, Christopher.” Bucky shook his head and tucked Adriana’s hair behind her ears. “It was the one with the rabbits that Papa and Lilly don’t like. You didn’t like it either. And, apparently, neither does Christopher.”

---

“Oh, inside voice, Bean,” Steve cautioned gently. He sat next to Christopher and played with his long hair. “We have to be nice to the table, Kiddo. Can I see your truck?” he asked.

Adriana nodded. “Okay. Then no Bambi. Can Becca choose Lady and the Tramp?” she bargained, trying to get her to pick a happy movie.

---

Christopher handed the truck off to Steve and picked up the dog again. “Here,” he said quieter now and rubbed the plush dog’s soft fur on Steve’s cheek.

“I think we can probably ask Becca if she might want Lady and the Tramp, sure,” Bucky offered. “But we can’t be angry if she doesn’t want that one. We can find one you both want. Okay, Peanut?”

---

“Thank you, Bean.” Steve made truck noises as he rolled the toy on the carpet, trying to show Christopher how to be gentle when playing with toys that weren’t stuffed animals.

“I can be angry if I want to be,” Adriana said. “Daddy says it’s important to talk about how I feel. If I want to feel angry, then I’m gonna be angry.”

---

Bucky gave Adriana a blank stare for a few moments and then looked over to Steve. It made sense. He wasn’t mad. He was mostly impressed that she articulated it so well back to him. “Well, Daddy is right. It is very important to talk about how you feel. Did Daddy also tell you how important it is to talk in a calm way about it? And to listen to others feelings too? Because you can be angry if Becca chooses a movie you don’t like. But if you are, let’s you and I try to explain why you are angry.” He knew Adriana was still getting a handle on her new home and sometimes she did get pretty mad at some of the people in her family. It was a normal response. She probably did the same thing in the orphanage with the other kids.

---

Steve couldn’t help but be impressed even though she was using his lesson to justify throwing a small fit over not getting to watch the movie she wanted. “He did,” Adriana sighed dramatically.
“But I can’t feel calm if I’m angry!” She waved her hands around as if that would help Bucky understand more. “Angry is when my feelings are too big for my chest,” she continued. “Like when Christopher ruined my book.”

Bucky caught her hands gently and brought them together to give them a kiss. “I know, Sweetheart. Anger is too big for your chest. I know,” he sighed. He really wished this talk had come on any other day and not amongst all the nonsense with Greg. Both himself and Greg were not showing good examples of how to calmly handle conflict through anger. “Papa isn’t very good at keeping calm sometimes, is he?” he asked and pulled her closer to give her a tight hug.

Christopher walked over to Sarah May so he could help her build up her tower, but he was apparently doing it wrong judging by the face she made when her brother started building with her. Steve moved over to help mediate between them.

Adriana leaned into her papa’s hug. “Sometimes,” she agreed. “But your chest is bigger.” Which explained why it was easier for him to control his emotions. Or that’s how Adriana reasoned it.

“Yes, but I need to work on my anger too, Peanut. I do,” Bucky said and scooped her up right to his chest. “I need to be calmer. You don’t deserve to have an angry Papa.” Bucky had been working so hard on his sobriety so his kids would never have to see him drunk. But he didn’t think about how much his kids might see him get angry and that wasn’t any better really.

“Okay,” Adriana agreed. “I’ll try to not be very angry.” If her Papa could try, then she could try, too.

Sarah May walked away unevenly from her blocks and went to Bucky. “Papa,” she whined, pointing at Christopher. “Papa, no,” she added, hoping that he would make Christopher stop. Bucky usually babied her more than Steve did.

“Hey, Sweet Pea, what’s wrong?” Bucky asked and moved Adriana to sit on one of his knees so he could pick up Sarah May and sit her on the other. “Are you done playing with Christopher? He’s just trying to be with you, Ya-Ya. He wants to play with you, Love.” He kissed her forehead and messed with her big curls that were taking over her face now. “What if Adriana and Papa played some blocks with you? Is that better?”

Sarah May leaned into Bucky and looked up at him with big, brown eyes. “Papa, play,” she agreed quietly. “Play ‘blots’.” She couldn’t quite get used to the ‘k’ sound yet.

Christopher looked sad that his sister left, but Steve quickly distracted him by reeling him in to tickle his belly. “It’s a real balancing act, keeping them happy,” he chuckled.
Bucky chuckled and lifted both his daughters up and deposited them back gently on the ground by the blocks. “It is, yes,” he agreed and nudged Steve with his elbows. “I think it’s just because Christopher’s personality can be too much for Sarah May sometimes.” Bucky handed Sarah May one block at a time and watched Adriana help her build a better foundation than she was doing before.

---

“All he wants is to love on his little sister but he’s such a bull,” Steve chuckled. He blew a raspberry on Christopher’s stomach as he held him upside down. “Do you not know how to play gentle, silly boy?” He chuckled. Steve laid him down on the floor before holding his arms out for a hug.

---

Christopher wiggled on the ground for a second and then mushed up against Steve in a hug. “No,” he giggled and knocked his head into Steve’s chest and giggled again.

Bucky sighed and passed another block over. “Oh, Baby, I don’t want to go to work tomorrow. I want to be here with you all. But I know Clint is going to want me in and Reggie didn’t show up twice last week so I don’t know what’s happening there. And Tim is on vacation with Richard starting tomorrow.”

---

Steve kissed Christopher’s head lots of times when he mushed up against him. He couldn’t help but shower his baby boy with love for as long as he would let him. “At least you’re honest,” he chuckled to his son. He lifted him up and had him sit up on his shoulders. “I can always go in for you,” Steve offered. “I feel bad that you don’t get as much time with the kids as I do. I know how much you love them.”

---

“Steve, you would hate it there,” Bucky cautioned. “I know you. You wouldn’t be able to deal with the obnoxious customers being unruly and rude. And if Reggie does show up, he will be smoking weed in the back like every half hour. Clint will definitely be moping because he and Natasha are still having a disagreement about moving in together. I don’t think it’ll good. Thank you for offering, though.”

---

“Come on. How bad can retail be after having people shoot me and make me chase them down alleyways?” Steve said. “And smoking weed is nothing - my disagreeable coworker had me shot, so I can deal with unhelpful people in the workplace,” he joked. He pet his hand down Christopher’s back. “Look at our son’s face. Don’t you want to see him all day?”

---

Bucky looked at Christopher and the toddler stuck his tongue out happily at him. He would love to be home with all his kids instead of work. “You really want to go in tomorrow?” he asked and gave Steve a doubtful look. “If you really want to go in for me, then you can give it a shot, Babe.” He wasn’t sure how it would go over for him but he wouldn’t stand in the way if Steve wanted to try.

Adriana looked up at Bucky and then looked over to Steve with a quizzical look. “What does it mean that you were shot, Daddy?”
He looked over at Adriana. “I’ll tell you when you’re a little older, Peanut. You don’t have to worry about that.” Steve wasn’t ready to share that with her. “I do,” Steve agreed, turning to Bucky. “I want you to be able to spend time with our kids. Whenever you can’t take off from work but need a day home, I can go in for you. It’ll probably be good for me to get out of the house once in a while.” It wasn’t Steve’s ideal job, but he wanted to support Bucky and let him have some time off.

“You have to tell me if you hate it, though,” Bucky said. “Promise. Because I don’t you being miserable over there. Okay?”

Adriana was definitely not satisfied with Steve’s answer and she stared at him with a grumpy face and said, “But I wanna know now!”

Steve set Christopher down and grabbed Adriana’s favorite book from the shelf and came back over to her. “How about we read you a story?” he tempted. Steve didn’t want Adriana to worry about how her dad almost dying before they even met each other.

“What?” Adriana asked and put her hands on her hips. “No. I don’t want to read.” She was getting more aware of when people were trying to redirect her. She was growing up fast. She would be five in just a few months. “What does it mean?” she asked again, looking up at Steve with a stubborn, determined face.

Steve tried not to smile when she put her hands on her hips. He kind of loved it when his kids pushed a little to try and get what they wanted. It was better to reason than to deal with a tantrum. “Would you still want to know what it means, even if knowing it may make you feel sad?” he asked.

Adriana looked down at the ground, thinking on it for a minute or so. She wasn’t sure she wanted to know anymore if it was sad. She didn’t like being sad. But she also was very curious and didn’t like that she didn’t know something that happened to her dad. “What day would I be older?” she asked, trying to get an estimate on when Steve would explain if she didn’t keep asking now.

Steve tapped her on the head very lightly with the book. “You’ll be older when you can drive a car,” he teased softly. But then he knelt down next to her and said, “I’ll let you choose when you’re older, how’s that? When you feel ready to listen to a story about your daddy that may make you sad, that’s when I’ll tell you. But I think right now, it’s best for you to feel happy.”

Adriana scuffed her foot on the ground and glanced over at Bucky. “Papa can’t drive a car yet and he’s old,” she muttered and looked back up at Steve. “I will have to get back to you on it,” she said with a nod, repeating what her Nana said on the phone a lot when she was talking to her friends.
Steve covered his mouth to hide his laughter when she mimicked Sarah. “Of course, Peanut.” Steve went quiet when he heard footsteps coming down the stairs. Greg was finally out of Lilly’s room and had his arms full of things as he carried them down to Becca’s.

---

Greg gave them all a fleeting look when he walked past the living room. He just sighed and shook his head and went downstairs. Becca came after him a few seconds later and sat down on the couch. “He’s going to stay in my room tonight. And Lilly is in her room again. We had some old sheets in the closet so I helped her remake her bed with those for the time being. I think she’s a little better now.”

---

“Thank you for taking care of that for us, Becca,” Steve said. Christopher tottered over to the couch and grunted softly as he climbed up onto it and laid down across Becca’s lap. He was starting to understand that the only way he could get attention from Becca is by doing something to demand it but not be too obnoxious about it.

---

Becca nodded and ran her fingers through Christopher’s soft blonde hair gently. “It’s okay,” she said and looked from Steve to Bucky. “It’ll be good when this is over and we can go back to normal. Uncle Greg isn’t a bad guy, he’s just pushing his opinion too much and it’s grating on us all now. And Lilly’s really... just difficult right now. I’m hoping going through the boxes will help. Maybe if she has something new of Dad’s she will feel a little better.”

---

Christopher’s eyelids drooped a little when Becca played with his hair. He sucked on his thumb as he looked across the room at his dads. “I hope she feels better soon, too,” Steve sighed. “I’m just glad she isn’t throwing a fit or acting out. She’s handling this all in a mature way.” They all had their moments when they were at the end of their rope and lashed out a bit.

---

“Sort of mature,” Becca corrected. “She has been really grumpy and snarky.” Lilly was nowhere near as bad as Becca had consistently been for years on end. It was only lately that she was mellowing out.

Bucky shook his head. “I think she’s okay. I mean, I know she’s upset. But after a few days, she will be fine. And I also think she’s got as much a right to be grumpy and short-tempered as any of us right now.”

---

“I wonder what it’s like to deal with a snarky teenager. It sounds awful,” Steve joked. He moved over to Sarah May so he could play with her curls while she played with her sister. She didn’t even stop to look up from her little tower. “Hopefully, this’ll blow over once Greg leaves. Who knows? Maybe we’ll get surprise good news for a change.”
After a little bit more play time with their parents, the babies were ready to take a nap. Steve took them up to the nursery to get them to sleep and Adriana decided to help sing to them so she went with her Daddy. There wasn’t much going on at the moment so Bucky went to the kitchen and started to update their fridge calendar. Their lives were busier now than ever and they liked to keep track of who was going to be where and when. Bucky was just adding in his next appointment to have another injection done in his spine when Greg came back upstairs.

---

Greg waited for his next opportunity to get Bucky alone and, when he heard the kids with Steve in the nursery, he sought Bucky out. He tapped him gently on his arm. “Hey. How’re you holding up, Kiddo?”

---

Bucky looked up from the calendar and gestured to the seat next to him as an offering for Greg to sit down. He was wary of being with him but maybe if he kept a calm head then so would Greg and it would be okay. “I don’t know, Greg. I guess I’m fine,” Bucky said with a sigh. “This distraction is helping.” He tapped the next square in the calendar and then wrote in ‘Steve Noon New Therapist’ in green pen. “Next week is going to be busy. Becca has some sort of debate team thing in Manhattan, I have another doctor’s appointment, Sarah May has her one-year check-up, and Steve has therapy. And I’m hoping this new one is a good fit because he’s reluctantly tried four and I can tell he’s about to give up.”

---

Greg took a seat and listened to Bucky talk about the goings-on of his family. He was genuinely interested in everyone except Steve. “That sounds pretty big. Is Becca looking at colleges yet?” he asked. “She can always stay with us if she likes one in California,” he offered. He was about to ask about Sarah May when Bucky brought up Steve’s therapy. “Is he going to therapy to stop being a fag?” he asked instead.

---

Bucky’s eyes shot over to Greg and his entire body tensed up immediately. But he needed to stay calm. He needed to learn how to not react the way Greg wanted him to. He set his jaw and shook his head. “Yes, Gregory, I’m encouraging my husband to go to conversion therapy to stop being a fag,” he said sarcastically and looked back down at his calendar as he wrote in Tim’s birthday so he would remember to say something.

---

“Well, why else would a man need to go to therapy?” he asked. “I’m not being an asshole, I just don’t see any other reason why a man would have to go and talk about his feelings to a stranger? Why don’t you try to go since he’s doing therapy? You can get yourself fixed. I can pay if money is an issue.”

---

Bucky set his pens down and turned to face Greg. He wasn’t going to let himself get angry. He wasn’t. But he wasn’t going to just take this either. “First of all, Greg, I can’t believe you would say that you’re not being an asshole. How is it not completely rude and inappropriate for you to ask me these things? Secondly, conversion therapy doesn’t work. Sorry, man, but you can’t make a fag straight no matter how much you try. And that’s not what Steve’s going for anyway. Not like you care, but both myself and Steve have experienced significant loss in our lives and talking to a professional could really help.”

---

“How would you know unless you tried it?” Greg defended. “You’re a great dad, I know how much you love your kids. They need a mom in their life. And sometimes you have to make sacrifices for your children,” Greg said. “I care about you. You’re my nephew. I didn’t abandon you or anything. What else is a guy supposed to do when you don’t return my calls for years?”

---

Bucky pulled his hair back into a tight bun, he felt like he might start to pull it out if he didn’t. “No, because making sacrifices for your children means making good, healthy, important sacrifices. Like how I gave up drinking and smoking and I go to AA twice a week. But pretending I’m someone I am not, well, that’s just terrible for my kids.”

---

“What’s healthy about having sex with another man? You could get diseases from him and then what? What’ll your kids do if you died from the gay disease? Hell, he could, too. Then the kids will be even more upset. That could be stopped if you just saw a woman, Bucky,” Greg sighed.

---

“Oh, my god, you’re so fucking obtuse,” Bucky snapped quickly and then shook it off as he tried to hold himself together. “It’s not a gay disease, there’s no proof that it only affects gay men. Also, Steve’s my only partner and I’m his only partner and neither of us have any diseases so we aren’t going to spread anything to each other. The only time that happens is when I have a cold but Steve kisses me anyway and then he gets the sniffles.”

---

“Don’t curse at your uncle,” he scolded. “I’m serious, Bucky. You don’t know for sure that you’re safe from it. But fine. Whatever. You still haven’t told me why he’s in therapy for whatever this loss is and you’re not. Is there something I should be worried about?” he asked, crossing one leg over the other.

---

Bucky growled softly and let out a huff of air. “I don’t think you really have any right to be concerned about any of this. Especially since you keep saying that you’re my uncle, my family, but you also, just the other day, said that you didn’t want me calling you ‘Uncle Greg’ so whatever.” He scoffed and got up from the table and put the calendar on the fridge again. “But, no, I don’t think you have anything to be concerned about. It’s about Steve’s and my family, not you.”

---

“I don’t like being addressed as ‘uncle’, but I want the respect as one,” Greg said with a frown. “Come on. I promise I won’t say anything about the fag thing for at least an hour. Talk to me, tell me about what’s been going on. I’ve got to talk to the girls and to your kids. Hell, Sarah May has spoken to me more than you have and she barely knows any words.”
“That’s illogical,” Bucky said shortly and crossed his arms. “How am I supposed to respect you when you don’t respect me or my husband? Huh? That’s not very fair, Greg. Also, I don’t think an uncle who is trying to seem like he cares should barter with his nephew about whether he will bully him or not. Especially, because the things that have happened to us are very difficult for me to talk about and I don’t want to be ridiculed while I’m trying to open up to my last remaining uncle.”

“I respect you two as people. Just because I don’t acknowledge your marriage doesn’t mean I don’t respect you,” he said. “Why do you think I’m just pretending to care? Have I lied to you at all? Does a man who flies across the country to make sure your dad’s things get to you sound like a person who doesn’t care? Seriously, Bucky, just because I criticize you for poor choices you’ve made doesn’t mean I’m bullying you.”

“No, I don’t think you respect us, especially not Steve. You’ve not said one positive thing about him while you’ve been here,” Bucky said sharply. “And I don’t feel very loved or cared for and that might tell you that you’re doing some wrong, Uncle Greg,” he emphasized the title and gave him a nasty look. “And while I am grateful that you wanted to bring us some of Dewey and Dad’s things, I don’t think either of them would appreciate you being so rude to me.”

“Becca and Lilly have received me just fine, so something is telling me that the problem between us is your attitude and not mine. At least I was willing to forgive you for ignoring me and my family,” he said.

Steve came down the stairs after putting all the kids down for their naps and he frowned. “What’s going on in here?”

Bucky looked over at Steve and shook his head. “Nothing. It’s fine. I can handle it, Steve,” he said firmly and squared up a little taller. “Becca and Lilly haven’t been having the same conversations with you that I have, Greg. You haven’t ridiculed either of them for who they are. You haven’t told either of them that George would be disappointed in them. You haven’t called them names or suggested conversion therapy or told them they need to pretend to be something they aren’t.”

Steve tried to keep out of it, but when Bucky brought up conversion therapy, he saw red. “You tried to get him to do what?” he snapped.

Greg stiffened and glared at Steve. “Butt out of this. This is between my nephew and me, so bug off.”

Steve glowered at him and squared his shoulders, but didn’t do anything to stop him yet. “You want me to go, Buck?”

Bucky caught Steve’s eye and shook his head. He really needed him right now. He needed someone to lean on, someone to help him fight, because he was fading fast. “Don’t talk to my husband like he has no right to stand up for me,” Bucky said. “He’s not going anywhere. Not right now, not ever. Years from now, he and I will be at your funeral together, standing over you as you get lowered into the ground!”

---

Greg scoffed and let out an incredulous laugh. “Fuck both of you. Seriously,” he said. “That’s assuming you make it long enough to outlive me. Because if you want to be nasty, then I can get nasty back. I’ll be surprised if you don’t relapse and overdose before you’re thirty with this unstable, fake marriage with a fairy who needs therapy whenever his feelings get hurt,” he snarled.

---

“Sure, right, I’m the one in a fake marriage,” Bucky snapped, getting a little closer to Greg. “Remind me whose wife it was who spent eight months in ’76 going to the clubs with her twenty-two-year-old secret boyfriend, taking disco biscuits while you were putting the kids to bed like the ignorant cuckold you are!” He shook his head and added, “And you don’t know anything that Steve and I have been through so don’t you dare insult him for being brave enough to try to get help!”

---

Greg shoved Bucky back when he got closer. Steve grabbed him by the back of his shirt and yanked him back so he was now situated between Greg and Bucky. “I’ve had enough of you putting him down. Last warning - either you keep your opinions to yourself, you leave, or I’ll make you leave,” he growled angrily.

---

When he was pushed, Bucky gasped and readied himself for a fight. He was surprised that Greg pushed him like that since he was generally not physically violent. Bucky must have hit the right sensitive spot to get to him. But just as Bucky was about to attack, Steve was between them forming a wall that Bucky wouldn’t easily be able to get past.

Greg flared red and looked up at Steve with fire in his eyes. “What the hell are you gonna do about it, Faggot? You heard what he said to me. He can’t talk to me like that. I’m his damn uncle.”

---

Steve managed to keep his calm only because he thought of how he would want his kids to handle the situation - with words, not violence. “This is our house, not yours. If you can’t behave yourself, then you can leave. And if you don’t leave on your own, then I’ll make you leave. This is an armed house and I’m trained to use it,” he said firmly.

---

“Are you threatening to shoot me?” Greg said with a low, angry tone, eyes piercing Steve’s with an unwavering, cold stillness that would have chilled anyone else but Steve. Being a police officer trained him to use a gun, sure. But it also trained him to be fierce and confident and strong in the face of danger or any unsavory incident.

“Steve,” Bucky said softly behind him and gripped his arm. He wasn’t sure if Steve was bluffing or not.
Steve didn’t waver from his spot. He reached back to hold Bucky’s hand with a gentle grip despite his intense stare over at Greg. “I’m threatening to remove any intruders in my home who pose a threat to me or my family,” he said evenly. “It’s up to you to either act like a civilized person here or a threat to any of our emotional or physical wellbeing.”

---

Greg scoffed and looked past Steve to Bucky and then back again. “You’ve got my nephew wrapped around your finger so badly, don’t you?” He looked back at Bucky and caught his eye. “Bucky, he’s turned you against your own family. He’s brainwashing you to be this way, Bucky. Come on.”

Bucky could tell that his uncle was getting on his last leaf now. He was trying his last-ditch effort, his last argument, his most conspiracy-theory reasoning to try to get to Bucky - which may have worked back when Bucky was younger and not as certain in himself. “Gregory, you need to listen to him.”

---

Steve gave Bucky’s hand a squeeze. “I’m giving you until the count of ten to either pack your things and leave, or to stop bothering my husband,” he said calmly. Steve was bubbling with fury under the surface, but he kept reminding himself that he had to set a good example for their son and daughters. He had to act in a way that wouldn’t scare them. “One...two...three...”

---

Bucky could see the gears turning in his uncle’s head. He knew that Greg wanted to be with them - at least Lilly and Becca - for a little longer. He also really wanted to go through the boxes with them. But he wasn’t sure if Greg would be able to just cool it until he left or not.

Steve was up to ‘seven’ when Greg shook his head and looked away. He made his decision. “I’ll be in Becca’s room for now,” he muttered and turned to leave, not giving a backwards glance as he left.

---

Steve was thankful that Greg decided to leave the room because he really didn’t want this escalated. Once the two of them were alone again, Steve turned to Bucky and put his hands on his hips. “Are you okay, Buck? Did he say anything else to you?” He leaned in to kiss his forehead. “I’m sorry. I couldn’t have him saying that awful stuff to you.”

---

Bucky let out a breath that he had been holding while Steve counted. He wrapped his arms around Steve’s middle and pressed his face against Steve’s neck and just breathed him in for a moment, kissing him a few times gently. “No, I’m... I’m okay,” he whispered. “It’s fine. He was just going on again.”

---

Steve circled his arms around Bucky’s shoulders and kissed his face a few times before Bucky ended up putting his face up against his neck. At that point, Steve rested his chin on top of Bucky’s head with a soft sigh. “I’m sorry he said all of that stuff to you. You’re not going to relapse. And even if you do, I have faith that you’ll be able to get yourself out.”
Bucky was quiet for a long moment. He wasn’t so much worried about that, or about anything coming true from what Greg said. He didn’t think he was going to relapse or overdose or that Steve would decide one day to try to be straight. He didn’t believe anything Greg said. But he fell into his traps every time. He tried so hard to keep his cool this time but he still couldn’t. “I shouldn’t have brought up his wife,” Bucky murmured and looked nervously up into Steve’s eyes like he might be disappointed in him for stooping to Greg’s level. “They had a really tough time for a while after Greg found out. My dad always thought he wouldn’t be able to get over it. But they are actually a lot better now. I know that. And I just tried to reopen an old wound that he probably hopes everyone forgot about.”

---

“I’m not going to pretend and say that it was the smartest decision to make, but I certainly don’t blame you for it,” Steve said. “Just like threatening to use a gun on him wasn’t smart, but I was upset and it was the tamest thing I could think of,” he admitted. He stroked his fingers through Bucky’s beautiful hair. “Next time you’re mad, just try not to make someone seem like an idiot for taking care of their kids while their spouse is being irresponsible.” He kissed the tip of his nose gently.

---

“I didn’t mean he was an idiot for taking care of his kids when she was out,” Bucky said and gave Steve a little frown. “I meant it like he doesn’t know us or our marriage so he shouldn’t comment. Like he has no idea how strong we are as a couple. He didn’t know where she went and with who. She always said she was going to her friend’s house to help her learn how to sew clothes. He had no idea she was sleeping with someone else and getting high at a club. But I still shouldn’t have attacked him for not knowing something like that.”

---

“I know, but it came off like he was the idiot who stayed home. It’s a bit emasculating,” he sighed. Steve kissed Bucky’s cheek and led him to go sit down with him on the couch. Diana came over and laid her head in their lap with a heavy, dramatic sigh. “Only another day of this, Buck. You’ve done a good job.”

---

Bucky was in a bit of a mood. He wanted to argue right now. He wanted to argue with Steve and talk back. He wanted to grouse that his one emasculating comment didn’t compare to the multiple times Greg had called the two of them fags or fairies or told Bucky to find a wife or said Steve was weak for trying to talk to a therapist. Besides. Bucky thought most men could stand to be taken down a peg or two. But Bucky knew that Steve wasn’t the problem here. And arguing with his husband for no good reason would just make things worse. “One more damn day...”

---

Steve was doing his best to ignore and push out every foul thing Greg said about them. He felt like he was doing a good job not letting the therapy comment get to him. “And then we’ll be back to normal. You get your day with the kids, I’ll be a worker bee for a day. It’ll be great, don’t you think?”

---

“Mmm,” Bucky grunted noncommittally and messed with the hem of Steve’s shirt. There was a little tear in the seam and he couldn’t help but pull on the loose string a little bit just to have something to do. Bucky was still wearing his sweater and he looked down at the little sewn ‘Stev’ over his heart. He changed his mind then. He didn’t want Sarah to fix it. He liked it that way. He tried to put Steve’s name there because he wanted it right there. And even though he messed up, it was still important to him why he tried.

---

“Bucky,” Steve chuckled, laughing even though he was pissed as hell right now. “Quit messing up my shirt just because yours is silly.” Diana whined when she watched Steve swat Bucky’s hand playfully. He praised her and gave her a pet as well. Barely a minute later, there was an urgent knock at the door that had Diana barking. Steve quickly hushed her so she wouldn’t wake the babies.

---

They were both already on alert and Bucky let out an annoyed groan as he got up from the couch muttering, “I swear to God, Steve...” under his breath as he headed for the door. He peeked through the peephole and saw a familiar face standing in full uniform and a worried set to his jaw. “It’s Richard!” Bucky called back to Steve and opened the door. “Hey, Buddy. What’s going on?” he asked and let Richard in. “They’ve got you working the day before your vacation?”

---

Richard was in the middle of saying something into his radio when the door opened. Steve came over and stood at Bucky’s side. “Hey, man. Is everything alright?”

Richard put his hands on his hips once inside. “I don’t know, you tell me,” he said. “I just got a call to investigate a domestic here. Something about threatening to shoot someone?”

---

“Fucking Greg...” Bucky growled and smacked his hand against the wall in frustration. “Goddamn it, Steve. Now I’m actually gonna kill him,” he said angrily and looked between Steve and Richard. “We’re fine, Richard. It’s fine. We’re fine,” he said quickly, hands out in front of him, trying to calm himself so he didn’t go off again. “Jesus, I have the biggest fucking headache right now. Shit.”

---

Richard frowned with concern when Bucky smacked the wall. “Hey, Hey, is there a problem here?” he asked in his helpful officer voice. “If there’s a problem, I’m here to help,” he said.

Greg had poked his head out from the basement door and frowned. “Hey, I’m the victim here. I was threatened, not them.”

---

Bucky scoffed and looked back at his uncle. “You’re no victim, Gregory. You’re a damn tattle,” he said, already falling back into a level that he should have been above. “You knew that Steve is a former officer. He told you that. You called the police only to get one of our friends to drop in.” He laughed humorlessly and looked back to Richard. “He’s not in danger. He’s just a dick.”

---

“I didn’t expect him to know every cop in the city,” he said. Greg came out the door and crossed his arms. “I’m not being a dick. My nephew thinks he can talk to me however he wants just because I don’t approve of his marriage,” he said, using air quotes on the word ‘marriage’.
Richard gave Bucky and Steve a sympathetic look and then said to Gregory, “So, you wouldn’t approve if I married my boyfriend, either?”

“Excuse me?” Greg said, eyes squinting up as he looked at Richard and then Steve. “Another queer cop? Did Brooklyn run some sort of fag convention since I’ve moved? What the hell is happening to this city?”

Bucky shook his head angrily and stood a little closer to Richard. “You see, Richard? See what Steve and I have been dealing with for days now. He doesn’t have an off switch either.”

Richard was able to keep his cool. Steve could see him going through his training mentally on how to keep a level head. “Us fags have always been here, and we’re here to stay. Sorry, Sir,” Richard said coolly. “You see, I could escort you out of here on the grounds of disturbing the peace. You could even take a nice, cozy ride all shackled up in my big old queer police mobile,” he said as he pointed at his cruiser. “But I imagine you might prefer to spend the evening with your family instead of some fella that thinks you’d make a nice prison wife for a day.”

“Jesus, you’ve got a mouth on you too, I see,” Gregory said and folded his arms and squared up like he wasn’t at least a foot shorter than both Richard and Steve and definitely less fit. “But you can’t take me for disturbing the peace. I’ve not done a thing. It was your friend Steve here who threatened to shoot me. I think that warrants a night or two in his old station.”

“I didn’t hear him make a threat,” Richard said. Steve shook his head and feigned innocence to go along with Richard. “So, it seems to me like you’ve wasted taxpayer dollars and took me off patrol for a false call. I could be helping with actual threats right now. Besides...” he patted Steve’s shoulder. “Everyone knows that gay people don’t know how to use guns. We’re too busy painting our fingernails to use those things.”

Greg just stared at him for a tense silent moment. This wasn’t how he wanted this to go at all. “So, he threatens me, and you’re not going to do shit about it?”

Richard gave a nod and Bucky did the same. “Stop trying, man,” Bucky said. “You’ve got less than twenty-four hours before you head back home. And then I’m guessing we won’t see much of you for a long time. So, you might want to use this time carefully to spend it with your nieces and the kids if you want to. Then you’re done, Greg.”

“I’m sure all of this is a big misunderstanding,” Richard said patiently. “You’re family. Work things out and start acting like family.” Richard stepped back and looked back at Steve and Bucky. “I’ll see you guys later. Call the station if you need me for anything.” He nodded again and headed out.
Welcome back, everyone! I hope you all had pleasant holidays. I have some news. Due to the intense busyness of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes for doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV show will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has any questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Season Six will end on Chapter 23, followed by an epilogue.

After Richard left, Greg stared at the door for a bit before crossing his arms. Bucky was about to come after him but then Greg held his hands up in surrender. “I won’t say anything,” he said. “I want to go through the boxes with you and the girls. Can’t we do that at least? I’ll keep quiet otherwise.”

---

Bucky considered it for a moment. That was fine with him so long as it didn’t get back around to him and Steve being faggots. “If you promise that our conversations will only be about Dwight and Old George, then, yes, we can do that. If not, though, my sisters and I will go through the boxes on our own time once you leave. And I’m not budging. You don’t have to like it, but you have to behave - at least do it for them.”

---

Greg felt like he could probably handle that. He genuinely did want to spend time with the girls and even Bucky so long as they weren’t at each other’s throats. He nodded but then gestured at Steve. “Can it be Barnes family, only?”

---

“Greg-” Bucky started shortly and then stopped as he glanced over at Steve. His instinct was to tell Greg ‘no’ and to reinforce that Steve was just as much family as the rest of them. But he also knew that if Greg was giving in a little and agreeing to shut up about anything besides his brothers then Bucky should give in a little to him as well. And this was a Barnes family matter and he was the head of the Barnes side of the family and he could decide what he wanted about this. “Sure. Me, you, Becca, and Lilly. We can go to Becca’s basement.” He hoped Steve would understand.

---

Steve was a little upset. He wanted to be around Bucky and he didn’t like being limited in his own house. He looked at Bucky with a little betrayal in his expression but he soon sighed and rubbed a hand over his face. They needed to keep the peace, he reminded himself. “Okay,” He said. “I’ll keep out of your hair. I guess I’ll call once dinner is ready.”

---

Bucky nodded and gave him an apologetic little smile. He tried to convey with his eyes that he was sorry and that he would make it up to him later. He really did owe Steve for taking care of him and standing up for him while Greg was here. Bucky didn’t know how to make it better, but he was going to try. “Thank you. I’ll get the girls.”

---

Steve sighed and gave Bucky a small wave of his hand. “I’ll hang around in the nursery and read until the kids wake up from their naps for now,” he said. Steve headed upstairs quietly with Diana.

When Bucky came into Lilly’s room, the two girls were busy organizing baseball cards. Becca looked up and asked, “Is everything okay?”

---

“I don’t know. I guess so,” Bucky mumbled and sat down next to Lilly whose face was downcast and her eyes were red from crying. He wrapped his arm around her and pulled her in for a tight hug. “Uncle Greg wants the four of us to go through the boxes together. He promised we would only talk about Dad and Uncle Dewey. He just wants to spend time with you both before he leaves tomorrow morning.”

---

Becca wasn’t exactly sure what to think about Greg since he had been pretty shitty to Bucky, but Lilly had been pretty upset over ostracizing him. If Greg really did want to spend time with them, she supposed it wouldn’t hurt to go through the boxes.

“Alright,” Becca said and dusted herself off. “It’ll be nice to have some family time. Right, Lilly?”

---

Lilly sniffled and wiped her nose on her shirtsleeve before getting up. “Yeah, okay,” she murmured and pulled a blanket around her shoulders. “Where is he?”

“Becca’s room,” Bucky said and walked behind them as they all headed to the basement. “Should I make some tea for us while you guys get started?”

---

“I’m not in the mood for tea...” Lilly said quietly. She was still pretty miserable even though she was handling herself a little bit better now.

Becca, on the other hand, was all for some tea. “Yeah, can you make me a big mug? I have a feeling that the boxes are going to take a while to go through.” she requested.

---

Bucky nodded. “Sure, Becs. I’ll grab a soda for you, Lilly, in case you want it,” he said and gave them each a kiss on their foreheads before sending them downstairs to get started. He couldn’t believe how much they both had grown up since their parents’ died. It would be seven years that summer. And Lilly at age eight was nothing like Lilly at age fourteen right then. And Becca at age ten was vastly different than Becca at age sixteen now. And Bucky himself was different too. Twenty-year-old Bucky was terrified of being a guardian and ruining his sisters’ lives, he was an alcoholic, an addict, he was promiscuous, irresponsible, he tried to kill himself. But now he was none of those things and he was strong enough to think about his mom and dad without having a total breakdown.

---

Greg had been pacing nervously in the basement, unsure if Bucky may have changed his mind on their temporary truce. However, when he saw Bucky come in with the drinks, he relaxed and took a seat on the edge of the bed. “There’s some cool stuff in these boxes I thought you’d like,” he said. “You’ve probably wanted the medals, but there’s lots of pictures, too.”

---

“I hoped the medals would be in here,” Bucky said and handed his sisters’ their drinks. He even made tea for Greg and he passed it over without ceremony. “Go ahead,” Bucky said and nodded to Lilly who was dying to pull things out of the first box.

The first thing she unearthed was an old book with a brown dirty cover and the words ‘Dwight A. Barnes’ scrawled in the front cover. “It’s a journal,” Lilly said and flipped through it before handing it over to Becca.

---

Greg thanked Bucky briskly for the tea and helped Lilly open the box. He smiled at her and gave her hair a little ruffle. “Your uncle loved to document everything. It’s important to remember things as they happened instead of letting the details get blurred. Look at the years that are on there - it’s right around the time Bucky was born - maybe a few years after. There’s got to be something about him and your dad written in there.”

---

Becca looked through the journal and the word ‘baby’ caught her eye in the middle of a page. The paper was date marked ‘November 28th, 1959’ with a little dash underneath it before a wall of words. “Jane talked to Winnifred today...” Becca started, reading from the messy handwriting and scanning past superfluous words. “Winnifred said she is expected a baby. So, it looks like she and George are getting married before we leave for the east again. Don’t know when the baby is due but I’m going to bring my brother back so he can be with his kid.”

---

Lilly gasped and looked up at Bucky. “Wait. So, mom and dad got pregnant before their wedding?” Becca looked over to Lilly and laughed. “You never did the math? Bucky wasn’t a premature baby,” she said. Lilly huffed at her and reached out for the book. “Give it to me, I want to see,” she said petulantly.

---

Lilly read over the entry again just to make sure and she gave Bucky a questioning look. “Yeah, uh,” Bucky started and reached for another book from the box. It was just an old novel so he handed it to Becca since that would be right up her alley. “They got married when Mom was pregnant. And then Dad came back when I was about a year old or so and then he went away again two more times. But he got injured around when Becca was born and he was done and he came home for good. But they were young when I was born. I think Mom was eighteen.”

“She had just turned eighteen,” Greg said. “I remember being amazed that she was barely out of high school and raising babies while your dad was off fighting wars,” he said. “Your dad was the more responsible one out of the two of them, but apparently not responsible enough to wait until marriage to start having kids. We did tease him a lot for that, but we were genuinely happy for him.”

Bucky’s initial reaction was to want to protest against Greg’s comments about his parents. But he knew his responses would go to a place of criticism against his uncle and they had made a truce to only discuss the other two brothers. “Yeah... they were young then and they were young when they died too,” Bucky said somberly as Lilly pulled out the next item.

It was a small envelope pouch filled with pictures of their dad and Dewey in uniform and with their group in active duty. “Wow,” she gasped and held up a picture of George leaning back against a tree with a smirk on his face. “Bucky, he looks like you there.”

Greg peered over to have a look at the picture that Lilly was pointing at. He missed his brother sorely, and now he was the last one left out of the three of them. It was a lonely feeling. “That’s one of my favorites of him. That was almost a decade into his service. He was around your age, all muscled and trained from the military. I bet you’d look like that if you went off to the army, too.”

Bucky bristled a little at the comment. He wasn’t sure if Greg was just trying to make conversation or if he was trying to suggest he needed to enlist or if he was commenting on the way he looked, but neither made him feel very good. “I still look pretty close to that,” Bucky said and took the picture from Lilly carefully. “He’s taller and more muscular, sure. But it’s not like I’m bad off.” He sighed and mumbled, “And the military would make me cut my hair anyway.”

“We don’t want your hair cut. As much as I hate to admit it, a hippie haircut suits you better than a military buzz,” Gregory said. “Are you thinking about cutting Christopher’s hair at all? It’s getting so long that people might think he’s a girl. But once you cut his hair, it probably won’t curl again like it’s doing now. That kind of hair only comes once.”

“No, I’m not cutting his hair. And I don’t care if people mistake him for a girl,” Bucky confirmed hoping that an argument wasn’t coming - and tugged an old jacket from the box. It looked like it must have been Dewey’s from when he was a teenager because adult Dewey wouldn’t have been able to fit in it. “Here, Lilly, you can have this,” he said and handed her the jacket since it looked like it would fit her if she wanted to wear it.

“It’s not good for him to be mistaken for a girl, though. They might give him dolls and not let him explore and he likes exploring. I can tell,” Greg said. He seemed more concerned that Christopher wouldn’t be allowed to do the things he wanted because of being perceived as a girl more than he worried about him appearing feminine for the sake of appearing feminine.

Lilly picked up the jacket and made a face. “It smells petty bad. Can we have this washed first?”

---

Bucky’s face scrunched up like he just smelled something rotten – and it wasn’t the jacket - and he gave Greg a nasty glare. “Christopher plays with dolls now. He plays with lots of things, all the kids do. They all play with dolls and trucks and blocks and plushies and army men and farm animals. And Christopher and Adriana both love to explore.” He looked away for a moment over to Lilly. “Yeah, I’ll wash it, Lil. No problem.” He looked back to Greg and added, “And we had a deal that we wouldn’t talk about anything besides your brothers.”

---

Greg huffed. “I can’t talk about your kids?” He thought he was being fairly open-minded by not pushing Bucky to cut Christopher’s hair and only expressing his concerns. He reached into the box to pull out another album, this one full of pictures of the three of them when they were all kids. “Oh, wow. I wonder if the picture of your dad in the bath is in here.”

---

Bucky was going to protest that he thought it was fair of him to not want to discuss his kids when Greg wasn’t being positive but then Becca gasped, drawing his attention as she said, “Bucky! Oh, my god. It’s the photos that went missing.” She pointed to the burgundy leather-bound photo album. “We couldn’t find this thing anywhere when we moved to the apartment. I always thought Grandma had it but Uncle Dewey must have taken it from her place when she died. This one should have Lilly’s newborn pictures we lost.”

---

Greg jumped a little when Becca gasped. He looked around at them and then smiled, happy that he was able to solve the case of the missing album. “Well, at least it’s here now. Lilly was a cute baby, I’m sorry you guys missed out on those photos for so long.” He patted the girls’ shoulders. “Dewey loved you guys. Look- the pages of the book are worn, he probably looked at this a lot.”

---

Becca looked through the pictures and found some photos of Lilly fresh from the hospital. She was a big baby and she had chubby hands and cheeks and she was asleep in every photo. “I’m so glad you found this, Uncle Greg,” she said. “Bucky and I were starting to think we would never find these again. We can put these with mine and Bucky’s, okay, Lilly? Mom and Dad will like that.”

---

“I’m happy that they made their way back to you. Had I known you were looking for them, I would’ve had Dewey send it all back to you ages ago,” he said.

Lilly looked at the pictures of herself. “Woah, I was a really fat baby. I thought you guys were exaggerating,” she said bluntly.
Bucky shook his head. “Nope, not exaggerating. You were giant. Becca was barely anything and you were a chunker.”

Becca slipped the photo out of its sleeve and let Lilly see it better. She flipped through some more pages and came across her dad. “Is this the tub picture you were talking about?” she asked Greg and showed it to him.

---

Greg grinned when he saw the picture. “That’s the one,” he said. “He would tell me how he only was able to convince Lilly to bathe by putting on a scuba diving mask and snorkel to entertain her.”

---

“I remember that,” Bucky said with a little tired groan. “Up until about age four, you wouldn’t just take a bath. Either Mom had to hold you while she bathed you or Dad had to get in and play and make it fun. And if they weren’t around and I was in charge of bath time, I’d have to sit in the tub and help you wash your hair because you didn’t want to get soap in your eyes.”

---

“Listen, I was just a kid who wanted to have fun,” she said innocently. “I bet everyone goes through dumb phases like that. Christopher won’t go to bed unless you read him a story and give him a stuffed toy, and I wouldn’t take a bath unless Dad played dress up. I’m sure Bucky did something dumb, too.”

---

Greg barked out a laugh and said, “Boy, did he ever.” He leaned back a little and looked at Lilly and Becca. “When your brother was little and your dad was still in active duty, I came over a lot to help your mom with Bucky. And the most difficult thing was feeding him. He was such a picky eater. And it wasn’t only just what food he was eating but also how it looked was very important. Sandwiches had to have no crust and be cut in two diagonals, he would only eat strawberries that were whole, all pasta had to be curly otherwise it wasn’t worth it to him. And if he decided he didn’t like something, then he just wouldn’t eat anything for hours and hours and he would sulk around the house like it was our faults he was hungry.”

---

Becca and Lilly laughed at that, finding it especially amusing because they were currently dealing with Adriana becoming picky. Now that she didn’t have to worry about being in a kid’s home without choices, she was starting to voice her opinion about foods she had no interest in eating. “Now, he’s a garbage disposal,” Lilly said. “Bucky will eat anything that’s on a plate.”

---

Bucky sighed and rolled his eyes. It was true, for sure. “Yeah, well, in my defense, I don’t remember being that way as a child so it must have cleared up after a while,” he said. “But, yes, I do love food now. I eat a lot, that’s for sure. And then I finish whatever Steve doesn’t eat because he doesn’t eat half his food since his injury it seems.” He wasn’t really thinking. He shouldn’t have mentioned Steve or Steve’s lungs or his eating habits. That wasn’t a smart move.

---

“What injury?” Greg asked. Lilly almost scoffed and asked ‘which injury’ but she kept it to herself.
because it was a small miracle in itself that Bucky and Greg weren’t at each other’s throats again. Greg was careful to keep his tone light so Bucky wouldn’t get defensive. Greg wanted to know what kind of a burden Steve was being on them.

---

Bucky realized immediately that he slipped up. He blinked and looked up at Greg for a moment and then away again. “He, uh,” Bucky started, deciding that he could just give the condensed version of this to satisfy the question. “His lungs only fill to half capacity. He went to a house fire on one of his patrols and he went inside to get a kid out of the house and he was in too long and the smoke damage was too much. The kid lived, he has lung problems and some burn scars. Steve had minor burns and they all healed but the lungs can’t.”

---

“Oh...” Greg didn’t seem to have something smart lined up to say in response. All he did was a little shrug. “That’s a shame. I guess that’s why he’s not a cop anymore, right? At first, I thought he got fired cause he was a queer, but I guess this city is full of queer cops. Is he like that for the rest of his life?”

---

“Greg, please don’t call my husband ‘a queer’,” Bucky said tightly but tried not to snap. “That definitely falls under the category of things we agreed we wouldn’t say right now.” He shook his head and looked into the box as he added, “Yeah, that’s why he isn’t an officer anymore. He’s too injured to be in the field anymore and he would hate just being a desk jockey.”

---

Greg huffed and rolled his eyes, but he didn’t argue. There was one thing that was nagging on his mind. “Okay, don’t get mad at me for asking but is there a whole department full of people like him and the cop that showed up? Or are they in with a bunch of regular cops? How does that work?”

---

“If you’re asking if the entire precinct is a bunch of fags, then no,” Bucky said sharply and crossed his arms. “Steve was the first to come out, then Susan, then Richard. I don’t know about anyone else, but as far as I know, it’s all straight people besides them. But, keep in mind, we are close to Park Slope and that’s all gay so.”

---

Greg shrugged his shoulders. “Must be something in the water.”

Becca didn’t know if he was being serious or not and let out a nervous laugh. “You know what would be cute?” she suggested, trying to get away from the topic by any means necessary. “If we recreate some of these baby pictures with your kids. Steve would really like that. Would Christopher do it?”

---

Bucky glared up at Greg and muttered, “Yeah, must be something in the water.” He looked over to Becca with a frown and tried to convey that he was a few seconds away from starting a fight here. But then Becca cut in with a distraction again and that helped. “We can always try to get him to cooperate. We can use treats like Steve does with Diana.”
“Classical conditioning and positive reinforcement. I like the way you think,” Becca said with a determined nod. “He’s still young enough to trick with that kind of stuff.”

Gregory hesitated a little before asking, “If you do that, can you make copies and send them to me? I’d like a few pictures of your kids to put in my house.”

Bucky looked up at his uncle and just stared for a long moment. He knew that Greg was enjoying his time with the girls and with the kids but he didn’t think he would want to be reminded that his nephew was a big queer with a husband raising their kids together. But if he wanted pictures, Bucky thought that maybe that was okay. “I’ll have to check with Steve,” he said simply, not wanting to just agree without his husband knowing about it. They were his kids too.

Greg looked a little bummed and slightly annoyed that Steve had a say in whether or not he could have pictures of his nephew’s kids, but he quickly reminded himself of their truce and opted to not kick up a fuss. He sighed and folded his arms over his chest. “If you say so, Bucky,” he said in a tired voice.

Bucky nodded and moved on to the next thing in the box. It was a metal tin with some wear-and-tear scratches on the sides and the top. He was hoping desperately that this box had his father’s medals so he undid the clasps on each side and popped the lid off. “Oh, my god. They’re all here,” he whispered and picked out one long badge that was hanging off a smooth blue silk with a pin on the end. He pulled out a few more and laughed once sharply, happy to find that all the ones they were missing were in the box. “Becca, Lilly, look. We can put his bars back on his uniform now. And we can display his achievements. We can put Dad’s things together again.” He sniffled and wiped his eyes before passing the tin over to his sisters.

As much as they butted heads, Greg still saw Bucky, in some ways, as the scrappy, little kid he used to be when he would skin his knees after a summer getaway in Seneca with his dad. And seeing him excited over the medals brought all that back. And he missed when things were simpler and his brothers were both alive and the kids were young.

Becca gasped and reached out so she could look at the medals closer. “Holy cow! They’re in such good condition, too. Uncle Dewey must have kept them polished so they wouldn’t tarnish.”

“They’re all here,” Lilly repeated Bucky and looked up at him with watery eyes. Becca and Bucky were tearing up too and Becca had to cover her mouth to stifle a little sob.

Bucky shuffled in between his sisters and pulled them both in against him in a big hug. He let some tears roll down his face and he kissed both their heads. “We have Dad’s medals,” he murmured again. It might not have seemed like such a big deal to anyone else but they had been upset about not having those metals for so long now. It felt like they were getting a piece of their dad back again after all this time. Bucky looked up at his uncle and said, “Thank you, Uncle Greg. For bringing this to us.”
It was rare for Becca to get so emotional, but she even leaned in to hug Bucky and was careful not to accidentally knock the tin into him during the embrace.

Greg put a hand on Bucky’s shoulder and said, “I’m glad it’s back in your hands now. It’s where George would’ve wanted it to go.” They didn’t exactly have a will written since they didn’t expect to die so soon and Dewey, being a fellow vet, took some the medals after George’s passing.

Bucky nodded and gave his uncle a real, genuine smile for once. He was sad, but also grateful. “We miss him so much,” Bucky said softly and ran his fingers through Lilly’s hair. “Sometimes it’s harder to deal with than others. I wish we could have them all back.” He wasn’t sure why he felt compelled now to be able to open up in front of his uncle but this was about his parents and his loss so it felt a little different.

Greg nodded. “It’s not easy having both of my brothers gone. I took them for granted when they were alive.” He nudged Becca and Lilly. “Don’t you three take each other for granted, okay? Us Barnes kids have a thing for being one of three. So, make the most of having all three of you around while you’re all still here.”

Becca and Lilly nodded and Lilly glanced up at Bucky with sad, frustrated eyes. Since Steve talked to her about Bucky’s cocaine problems, she had been thinking a lot about when Bucky tried to kill himself. She couldn’t get it out of her head and she just kept replaying how she found him. She never talked about it, she hated to even acknowledge it. But it was in her mind constantly right now. But she looked away and rubbed at her eyes.

Bucky gave Lilly a squeeze after he saw that look in her eyes and he moved to get up again. “I think maybe we should finish these boxes on a different day. I think today’s been enough.”

Becca was in the most stable emotional state out of the three of them, but having the break was still a good idea. They found the medals and those were the main things that they were hoping to find. “Yeah... another day,” she agreed.

Greg looked a little disappointed that he couldn’t stay to open the rest of the boxes up, but he was happy to have at least done this with his family. “Do you want me to run out and get some ice cream for you guys?”

Bucky sighed and nodded to his uncle. That was probably a good idea too. “Yeah, thank you,” he said calmly. “Becca, Lilly, do one of you want to go with him so you can help pick some out. If you go to the bodega you can get a few tubs and bring them back. You know what Adriana likes. I’ll get you some money so Greg doesn’t have to pay for all of it.”

“I’ll go,” Lilly volunteered before Becca has a chance to say either way.
“Don’t worry about it. I don’t mind paying for things you and your kids get to have,” he said. “I’ll be back soon.”

Bucky gave Lilly some money anyway just in case she asked for more than just ice cream - which seemed likely. But once they were gone, Bucky took the tin of medals up to his and Steve’s room and set it carefully on their bed. He would have the girls in later so they could pin the bars on his uniform together. But, eventually, he found himself back downstairs with Steve and the kids and Becca. “Well, That was easier than I thought it would be.”

Steve wasn’t in much of a talking mood since he was still a little upset over not being able to be with Bucky as they opened the boxes. He wasn’t mad at Bucky, but simply was upset at the situation. He settled on cuddling Sarah May, who was happy to be held in his arms. “What was easier?” Adriana asked.

Bucky was a little surprised that Steve wasn’t right there ready to hug him and hold him and talk to him. Steve was upset, clearly, and now Bucky would have to deal with figuring out what was wrong and he was really too tired to take on another issue right that second. So, he sat down next to Adriana and said, “Your aunts and I were going through some stuff of your Papaw’s.”

Adriana climbed into Bucky’s lap as soon as he sat down. She was such a cuddle bug sometimes. “Is he moving from heaven to stay with us here?” she asked. “Where are we gonna fit him?”

“No, Peanut. He can’t come back from heaven,” Bucky said gently and brushed her hair back from her eyes. “But we can remember him and have his old stuff and keep him around that way. Like how Daddy and I have tattoos for your brother Grant. You remember when Daddy explained the little feet on top of his feet?”

Adriana shook her head. “Daddy won’t tell me about those,” she said. “He said he would tell me when I’m older. Am I old enough now?” She looked over to Steve, who shrunk a little.

Steve shook his head. “Maybe tomorrow, Peanut. Your dad is feeling a little tired tonight.”

Adriana huffed out a sigh and looked up at Bucky. “Can you tell me, Papa?”

Bucky saw the look on Steve’s face and he knew it would be a bad idea to get into it right now. And now, he definitely knew Steve was upset about something - upset enough that he didn’t want to hardly speak or pay attention to anyone but Sarah May messing with his shirt. “Well, Adriana,” he said carefully. “Daddy says he’s tired so maybe we should start to wind down for the day. And Uncle Greg and Aunt Lilly are out getting ice cream for everyone. So, that’s good. And Papa can explain it to you a different day, okay?”
Steve leaned down to kiss Sarah May’s curls and whisper soft words of love to her. She smiled happily at the attention and reached up to him. Adriana sighed and flopped dramatically to lay across Bucky’s lap like dead weight. “Okay,” she said. A few minutes later, Greg and Lilly came back with bags full of ice cream tubs.

Bucky lifted Adriana up and brought her to the kitchen. “Come on, Peanut. Let’s eat some ice cream.” He tickled her tummy and set her down at the table and pulled her hair back into a ponytail so she didn’t get ice cream in it. “Becca, can you watch Adriana and Christopher for me? I’m going to go talk to Steve.” He gave both his kids a kiss on their foreheads and then slipped back to the living room where Steve was still sitting with Sarah May.

Steve looked up when Bucky came back. “Hey,” he said quietly. “Should Ya-Ya have some ice cream, too?”

“I don’t think she should just yet,” Bucky said softly and sat down next to Steve. He ran his fingers gently through Sarah May’s curly hair and gave her a little kiss. She made a happy little grunt noise and flopped back against Steve’s chest. “You’re upset,” Bucky said and looked into Steve’s eyes. “Why are you upset?”

Steve rubbed a hand over their daughter’s back when she flopped onto him. “I’m upset because I can’t be a husband in my own house,” he said, shooting a nasty glare in the direction of the kitchen where Greg was. “I wanted to be there for you and the girls but because your uncle is a homophobic jerk, I had to hide away somewhere else.”

“Oh, Baby...” Bucky sighed and rested back against the couch, already feeling too tired to deal with this. “You can be a husband in your own home. You are a husband and a father and a brother-in-law and a son and everyone’s protector. You are.” He touched his hand on Steve’s thigh. “And I know you wanted to be there for us, but I handled it. It was fine. And I know he’s such an ass. But I knew, if you were with us, he wouldn’t have been able to keep our deal. He barely could as it was. And this wasn’t really about you. This was about us - the Barnes side of the family. It was about my dad and Uncle Dewey.”

“My Mom and I don’t exclude your side of the family so we can do Rogers family things,” Steve said. “I’m not mad at you, Buck. And it’s one thing if you wanted to do this with your sisters cause he was your dad and uncle, but having Greg there but not me really sucked.” Steve sulked a little as he looked at the wall. “I know it was better that I wasn’t there - it’s just frustrating that it’s how it had to work out.”

Bucky squeezed Steve’s leg and tried to get him to look at him again. “Steve, it wasn’t about you,”
he said again. “We weren’t purposefully excluding you. But it was my dad’s stuff. It’s really personal for me and the girls. Even if Gregory wasn’t here, I might have asked you to let us have some time alone. I know how much you support us and have been helping us with handling losing them but somethings I think we just need to let it be us.”

---

“If you say so,” Steve said, childishly choosing to be short with Bucky over this. He knew that this wasn’t about him, but he still felt cheated that Greg won and was able to do something with Bucky while excluding Steve. “I guess you’re lucky that I don’t have an uncle that doesn’t want you in my life.”

---

Bucky blinked a few times, now more confused than before. He thought it made perfect sense why he asked Steve not to be part of this. But maybe he was being illogical too and he didn’t realize. “Baby...” Bucky said softly and used a gentle hand under Steve’s chin to bring him to look at him. “I’m not defending Gregory in the slightest. He’s still awful. He’s so rude and he can’t just shut up and let things be. He even questioned why I let Christopher’s hair grow out so long. He said that he’s worried people will mistake him for a girl. If it would have been both of us down there, I don’t think he would have been able to keep a lid on anything.”

---

Despite how frustrated he was, Steve still leaned into Bucky’s hand. His eyes flashed briefly when Bucky brought up Greg’s criticism of Christopher but he ended up huffing out a sigh of defeat. “I’m sorry, Buck,” he apologized. “I guess I’m so mad at him that I’m not being fair to you.”

---

Bucky nodded and carefully picked Sarah May up and held her between them so he could move closer and give Steve a slow, warm kiss. “Listen, Baby, Steve. I’m so sorry. I know this is horrible. He’s horrible. But we can’t fight right now. You know? We’re already fighting with him, Becca and Lilly are upset and emotional and Lilly keeps giving me these weird looks and I don’t know why. And Adriana’s worried something bad is happening in our family and no one is explaining anything to her. We can’t fight right now, please.” He paused and kissed him again, softer this time. “If you want to fight, we can fight once he’s gone. Okay? If you’re just angry and need to argue, that’s fine. We can pick a topic and go at it. But after Gregory is gone.”

---

“I don’t want to fight with you, Buck... I just want to fight him,” Steve said miserably. “I want to punch him in his dumb face and kick him out of here.” Steve was a bit needy and put his hands on Bucky’s shoulders to pull him in for another kiss. “I think I’ll sit Adriana down and talk to her about Grant,” he said. “I don’t want her to think that there’s something wrong.”

---

Bucky nodded and gave Steve a few more quick kisses. He just wanted Steve to feel loved and important right now. He could tell he was angry and feeling lonely with Greg around causing a mess. “I know, Steve. I want to fight him too. But he will be gone in the morning. He will be headed back home and we will be just us again. And tonight, we can make love together however you want. It’ll be all about you, okay? I can ride you and make out with you and touch all over your chest. Or you can take me from behind and hold against my back. Or I can open you up nice and slow and make you come and then rock into your ass and talk sweet you. Whatever you want to do, Baby. Anything you want.”

---

“Bucky,” Steve gasped in a scandalized tone as he covered Sarah May’s ears. “Not in front of the baby.”

Sarah may whined and pushed at Steve’s hands. “Dada? Why?” She complained. She had a habit of asking ‘why’ instead of saying ‘no’. Steve thought it was goddamned adorable.

He pulled his hands back so he wouldn’t annoy their baby girl. “We can talk more about that in private.”

---

“Steve, she’s a one-year-old. She’s got no idea what any of that means,” Bucky promised and leaned in to give Sarah May a few happy little kisses to make her crinkled eyebrows relax again. “You have a minimal vocabulary, don’t you, Sweet Pea?” Bucky asked and pulled some of her curls out of her eyes again. “Everyone else is eating ice cream. Do you want to join them, Baby? I can take Ya-Ya and you can spend some time with Adriana since she’s been feeling out of the loop today.”

---

“So? I still don’t like talking about that stuff with the kids around. Especially our innocent Ya-Ya,” Steve countered. Steve gave her cheek a kiss. She turned to her dad and gave him a happy smile before she snuggled up against her papa. “I guess. I was in a real cuddly mood with her, but Adriana deserves some quality time; too.”

---

Bucky nodded and sighed. “She definitely needs some quality time with you, Baby. You know she’s just trying to learn and understand what’s happening. And she gets so frustrated when we won’t tell her things when she asks,” Bucky said. “I’ll give Sarah May and Christopher their baths later and you can talk with her, Okay?”

---

Steve kissed Bucky’s cheek. “Okay,” he said. “Thank you, Buck, for being patient with me. I love you.” He pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair once before going to the kitchen. He went right to Adriana and tickled her sides gently. “How are you liking the ice cream, Peanut?”

---

Adriana looked up at her dad and shrugged. She was feeling a little stubborn at the moment and she wasn’t sure if she was ready to talk to him or not. She was still upset that he didn’t want to talk to her about what was happening. “It’s okay,” she murmured and looked back down at her ice cream bowl. “It’s mint chocolate. It’s not my favorite.”

---

Steve felt bad for upsetting Adriana so, but he couldn’t help but think that she was adorable when she was holding a grudge. “I’m sorry it’s not your favorite. But it’s better than nothing, right?” He leaned down and kiss the top of her head. “How about when it’s close to bedtime, I tell you a story instead of reading one of your books?”
Adriana grunted and looked up at Steve again. She considered it for a second and then decided that she would allow it. “Okay, a story is fine,” she agreed. She sighed and grabbed Steve’s hand. “Can we have pancakes for breakfast, Daddy? Papa said he’s staying home tomorrow but you aren’t? Where are you going?”

Steve brushed his hand over the back of her little hand. “Of course. I can make everyone pancakes tomorrow. And Papa is staying home to spend time with you because I’m going to go to work for him. I love spending all day with you, but I have to let Papa have a turn, too. Won’t it be fun getting to play with your papa all day?”

“Can’t you stay too? He was here yesterday and today, Daddy. That means you both can stay tomorrow,” Adriana asked. “And yesterday, he was all mad and today he was with Aunt Lilly and Aunt Becca. So, tomorrow we all can play.” She nodded once like she had come up with the best possible plan.

“I wish I could, Peanut, but we have to work so we can pay for our house and so the lights stay on and the bedrooms are cozy and warm. If we don’t work for a lot of days, then we won’t make any money,” he said. Steve kissed her head. “It was smart of you to try and think of a solution, though.”

“Do we not have money already?” Adriana asked and squinted her eyes. She hadn’t been taught about finances yet and she didn’t know the concept of what money actually did. Becca had tried to explain once by helping her buy candy but once she gave the money over and got her candy, she expected to get the money back again.

“We have some money, but not enough that we stop working,” he said. “If you want, we can play pretend and you can learn how money works a little bit better. You can be the worker and you can do some math, too. Papa and I use lots of math to know how much money we need to keep a roof over our heads.”

“I want to be a pet store,” Adriana said and looked up at him with big eyes. “I can get a ‘turtle’ and food and toys for him! Please!” She had ice cream around her mouth and hopeful twinkles in her eyes.

Becca overheard the conversation and added, “I don’t think turtles can live in houses, Adriana. I think it’s only in zoos and the wild.”

“We can’t have real turtles in the house, but we can have pretend turtles in the house;” Steve said. “And we can get pretend food and pretend toys for him. How does that sound, Peanut?” He played with her hair before bending down to kiss the top of her head. “We can do that after ice cream. Do
“Can Papa help me make toys for them tomorrow?” Adriana asked. “I know you’ll be gone but he can help, right?” She just wanted someone to play with her right now. The past two days was all hectic around the house and she just wanted some attention.

“I’m sure he can. Your papa is so excited to get to be home with everyone tomorrow. It’s going to be a special day. And you and your siblings are going to be good for him, right? Hopefully you three won’t get into too much trouble.”

“I’ll be good,” Adriana agreed and went back to eating her ice cream. “Sarah May doesn’t do anything at all so she will be good. But Christopher might not.” She looked back up at Steve like she was just trying to give him a briefing on how she thought it might go.

“Yeah, Christopher is a bit of a troublemaker. But he’s smart, so if you give him a puzzle to figure out, it’ll keep him occupied,” Steve answered.

Bucky came into the kitchen and sighed. “Becca, Lilly, do you two want to come with me to put Dad’s medals on his uniform? Steve, Baby, you can come too.”

Steve perked up when Bucky invited him this time. “Sure,” he said immediately. He kissed Adriana’s head. “We’ll be right back, Peanut.”
S6: E19

Chapter Notes

REPEAT:

I have some news. Due to the intense business of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes in doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV shows will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has an questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Season Six will end on Chapter 23, followed by an epilogue.

Bucky led his sisters upstairs and gripped Steve’s hand in his. He was trying to include him in this in hopes that Steve didn’t feel left out anymore. And this was important and he wanted Steve here. “Lilly, Becca, the tin is on the bed. I’ll get his uniform from the closet,” he said and let go of Steve’s hand so he could go reach into the back of the closet to get the smooth crisp navy uniform out from its hiding place.

---

“So, could you explain what each of the medals mean?” Steve asked. He knew already, but he wanted to hear it from them.

---

Bucky laid the uniform out on the bed and smoothed out the section of fabric where there were two bars missing. “This shows his rank,” he said and moved over so Lilly could pin the missing bars back on.

“His badge he got after the stealth coup goes here,” Becca added and slipped the pin over the heart of the jacket. “He was the first to volunteer to lead a troop right into the belly of the enemy territory for reconnaissance. Uncle Dewey was his second in command there. Dewey was older but Dad rose through the ranks much faster.”

---

Steve smiled as he watched them reunite the medals to the uniform in their appropriate places. He walked over to Bucky to put a hand on his back and give him a kiss. “He must’ve made his troop and superior officers proud,” Steve said. “That sort of commitment is really valued in the police force, so I can imagine how much it meant in the army.”
Bucky was misty-eyed and he could see Becca and Lilly were crying a little as well. He leaned back against Steve and sighed. “I’m sure they were. It was hard not to love my dad,” Bucky said warmly and watched Lilly touching the uniform gently.

She breathed in a heavy sigh and looked up at Becca. “I miss them,” Lilly said. It was really quiet in the room. Everyone just thinking and trying to okay as best as they could. Bucky was tired. This whole thing made him tired.

“They raised three great people,” Steve said, looking between all of them. “I may not have gotten to meet them in person, but each of you carries a part of them. So, they’re always here.” He gave Bucky’s hand a squeeze. “Do you want me to take care of the kids tonight so you can get some early sleeping time in?” He could tell how exhausted Bucky was.

Bucky shook his head and leaned in to give Steve a kiss on his cheek. “No, Baby. Thank you. I want to help. And I want to have some quiet time with you tonight before we sleep.” He was definitely tired but he thought it was important for him to have a bit of time with Steve, especially after how left-out Steve expressed he was feeling today. “We can do that together. Maybe we should give the girls a few minutes alone with Dad. Let’s go.”

Steve wasn’t about to argue over it. Whatever Bucky wanted, he could roll with it. “Alright,” he agreed. Steve walked out of the room and closed the door quietly behind the two of them so Becca and Lilly could have their privacy together. “Adriana doesn’t quite grasp the concept of money still,” he said, filling Bucky in with what they had talked about. “She wants to have a pretend turtle shop with you tomorrow.”

“Oh, so I’m teaching her about money tomorrow?” Bucky asked and slipped his hand in Steve’s. “That sounds fun. I can do that. Am I supposed to be selling turtles? What’s the game?” He wanted to make sure he was doing what Adriana was anticipating. He wasn’t home with the kids during the day and wasn’t usually the one teaching them things so he didn’t want to mess this up at all.

“I don’t know, we didn’t get that far. I think she just wants to have all the turtles so maybe you can convince her to sell something else in her shop,” Steve laughed. “She was trying to get both of us to stay home more often because you’ve been here for a few days now.” He reached his hand up to play with Bucky’s hair. “I’m so glad you get to be with them tomorrow.”

Bucky chuckled because Adriana had such a one-track mind for turtles and it was adorable. “I suppose I can do that for her,” he said warmly. “And I wish we both could be here tomorrow and every day. But that’s just impossible. I’m already worried you’re going to have a horrible day tomorrow. I don’t know how cut-out for retail you are, Baby. And you’re going to have to deal with a lot of stoned people. And a stoned Reggie. Possibly a stoned Clint, depending on how he’s doing.”
“You say that like I didn’t have to deal with a bunch of stoned people at my old job,” Steve said. “I’m sure they’ll be a lot more pleasant with me because I’m not obligated to arrest them now,” he said with a little wave of his hand. “I’ve been shot at, people have tried to stab me and take punches... I’m pretty sure I can handle some stoners and people trying to haggle.”

Bucky whined and stopped them in the hall so he could pull Steve close by his shirt and kiss him firmly and warmly. “I love you. I know you’ve had worse. I was there through it, Baby.” He chuckled lightly and slipped his arms around him. “You’ll do good tomorrow. I’m sorry for doubting you. And if Clint wants to talk about his and our sex lives like he usually does, just distract him with snacks.”

He smiled but then pouted when Bucky brought up Clint. “Why does your boss want to know so much about our sex lives?” Steve wrapped his arms around his perfect husband. “And don’t be sorry. I know it’s been a while since I’ve worked a proper job. So far, my only audience throughout the day are toddlers.”

“First of all, Clint was my best friend long before he was my boss,” Bucky said. “And it’s not like it’s a one-way street. We talk about his and Natasha’s sex life too.” He smirked at Steve, knowing he would definitely not want to know about that either. “We don’t talk about Tim and Richard’s though. Tim is a flirt but he’s a prude when it comes to talking about sex. He gets all red and huffy.”

“I still can’t believe you tell all your friends about what we do in bed,” he complained. Steve didn’t like it, exactly, but he didn’t dislike it so much that he would try to make Bucky stop. “You better say only good things about me, or else I’m going to make stuff up to keep a good reputation tomorrow.”

Bucky shook his head and squeezed Steve’s upper arm lightly. “It’s just Clint really. And he and I talk about more than just sex also. Don’t worry. I know what to not share. He doesn’t need to know every detail about every time. It’s more like a highlight reel.” He knew that still probably didn’t sound great to Steve but he and Clint had been close for years and this sort of stuff wasn’t new at all.

“Highlight reel? You didn’t tell him about the time we...” he got quiet and made a fist to show that he was hoping Clint didn’t know about them fisting each other. It was a small miracle that Bucky got Steve to stop being such a vanilla catholic boy, but he wasn’t sure if he’d be able to look Clint in the eye again.

Bucky stared at the fist for a second and then looked back up to Steve and made an attempt at a smile that mostly looked like a grimace, totally giving him away. “Come on, Baby. Let’s go get the kids so I can get their baths,” Bucky said softly, hoping Steve wasn’t too mad. “I think the babies should go to sleep early tonight. Adriana can be up until her bedtime, though.”

Steve’s face blushed deeply. “You didn’t!” He gasped. “Bucky!” He was more scandalized than mad and he swatted at Bucky’s back as he walked to get their kids. He stopped hitting him when they got into eyesight and he attempted to compose himself so no one would suspect anything. “Ya-Ya, Christopher, are you ready to have bath time?”

---

Greg was on the ground with Christopher playing with blocks. And Sarah May was sitting a few feet away with some plushies and looking very sleepy. She reached her arms up when she saw her dads and whined softly. She was ready for a bath and sleep. Christopher, however, shook his head and clanged two blocks together. “No, bath, Dada!”

---

Steve plucked up Sarah May and gave her a kiss before passing her to Bucky. He was used to dealing with toddler temper tantrums so he would spare Bucky from having to take care of the more difficult child. “No bath?” Steve gasped as he picked Christopher up. “But you’re going to get smelly. Ya-Ya won’t play with you if you’re smelly.”

---

“No bath!” Christopher yelped and tried to wriggle out of Steve’s grasp. “Dada, no bath, ‘peas’!” He had recently gotten good at understanding ‘please’ and ‘thank you’ but he wasn’t the best at saying them sometimes.

Bucky held Sarah May and kissed her sleepy face. “Christopher, Bean, your sister is sleepy. Don’t you want to sleep when she does? You can wake up tomorrow and play together. That’s good.”

---

Steve kept a sturdy grip on his son. “Oh, Sweetheart, I know you don’t want to have a bath, but we have to give you a bath so you’re clean and healthy,” he said sympathetically. “Why don’t you want a bath, Precious Boy?” he asked, trying to soothe him by petting his hair.

---

Christopher frowned and pointed down at the blocks and Greg. “Play,” he said. “Playtime.” He whimpered and tried to reach for the toys.

Bucky sighed and looked at his uncle. The kids did like him. It wasn’t very surprising, though. As much as he seemed to dislike Steve, he loved their children plenty. Gregory was always good with kids. “Maybe Christopher can have ten more minutes. I’ll get Sarah May started in her bath.”

---

Steve looked between Greg and Bucky before sighing. “Alright,” he said. He gave Christopher a hug and said, “Bean, you can play for ten more minutes, Okay? Ten minutes. Then it’s bath time and I expect you to be a good boy.” He set him down on his feet and nudged him gently towards his uncle. “Bath time soon,” he reminded.

---
Bucky thanked Steve and pulled him with him into the hall really quick. “Christopher likes Uncle Greg. And he will be gone tomorrow morning so I figure a little bit longer will be okay,” he said and gave Steve a quick kiss. “If you want to stay and watch him, you can. Or you can come with me and Ya-Ya.”

---

“I know,” Steve sighed. He leaned over to give Bucky’s cheek a kiss. “I’m not going to keep him from Greg, it’s just that he typically puts up a fight whenever it’s bath and bedtime,” Steve said. “I’d rather go with you and Sarah May... I don’t want to be alone with your uncle.”

---

Bucky nodded and grabbed Steve’s hand. He led him back upstairs to the bathroom. “Maybe I shouldn’t have let him play for longer. Because it’s giving in to his fighting back about a bath,” he mused, setting Sarah May down on the ground so he could start up the bath. The second she was on her feet, she turned to Steve and raised her arms up, wanting to be held right now so badly. “I’m sorry, Steve. I made the wrong move. That’s on me.”

---

“Usually, I’d agree with you, but Greg is family and if Christopher wants to spend extra time playing with him, we should allow it, I guess,” he said. Steve bent down to pick up their daughter and cuddle her close. “Don’t worry about it, Love. If he gets his way one time out of a dozen when it comes to extra playtime, it’s not setting us back at all.”

---

That made sense to him. It wasn’t that big of a deal if it was only a rare thing. But it also probably would have been better to do that differently. At least, maybe when Greg wasn’t around or after talking with Steve about it first. Because what Bucky did was just undermine what Steve said to Christopher right in front of his uncle who already didn’t like Steve. That was a bad move. “I’m sorry, Baby. I get what you’re saying but it was a mistake.”

---

“Hey, you don’t have to keep apologizing, Sweetheart. It happens,” Steve reassured, giving Bucky a kiss. He rubbed Sarah May’s back and gave her a kiss to the top of her head. “None of us are perfect. Except for our youngest daughter.” He winked and gave him a nudge with his elbow. “Let’s get her cleaned.”

---

The two of them gave Sarah May her bath and then retrieved Christopher to do the same. Eventually, they had their two youngest to sleep and Adriana was on her way. “Steve, Baby, do you want me there when you talk to her about Grant?” Bucky asked softly and touched Steve’s chest and his arm. “I can join you or I can leave you two alone and I’ll wait in our room. Whichever you want.”

---

Steve heard Adriana coming up the steps and nodded in response to Bucky’s question. He didn’t want to do this alone. “Hey, Peanut,” he said gently. “Are you ready for your story?”

---
Adriana handed her favorite blanket to Bucky and nodded slowly, already feeling sleep coming up. “Nana brushed my teeth,” she said in response and tromped her way into her room and to her bed.

Bucky helped her get all tucked in and laid her favorite blanket up around her head like a halo. “There we go, Sweetheart. All ready for bed after Daddy tells a story.”

---

Steve sat on the edge of Adriana’s bed and gently stroked her hair. “So, um...” he started weakly. “There was a lady that your papa used to know who was going to have a baby, but she wasn’t ready to give her baby a home yet. So, Papa and I decided we could give her baby a home. We were very excited to be dads again and your papa had a beautiful crib all ready for him and we were ready to give him a good life, but something...” he took a breath. “Something very sad happened.”

---

Bucky stood as a backboard behind Steve. He gave him something to lean back on and feel support. He knew how much having to explain this story to a young child hurt. And he was grateful Steve was keeping fairly calm so far.

“What sad thing happened?” Adriana asked curiously and tilted her head to the side. If it were any other circumstance, Bucky would have giggled with how adorable she looked. But now wasn’t time for laughing.

---

“Well...” Steve had to word it in a way that Adriana would understand. “Missy was sick. That was her name. And before she could have the baby, she went to heaven and so did the baby.” His eyes were a little wet but Steve managed to keep the tears from falling. He didn’t want to explain the concept of a stillborn baby to his toddler. “Papa and I were so, so ready to bring him home and love him for all his life. We wanted to keep him close to us, even though he was far away in heaven. So that’s why I have his feet on my feet and that’s why your Papa has his name on his heart.”

---

Bucky moved out from behind Steve just slightly so he could show Adriana his tattoo. She had seen both tattoos before but maybe now she could understand this one more. “See, right here, that’s your name,” Bucky said and pointed to the one at the bottom of the tattoo. “And above you is Sarah May then Grant right there under Christopher.”

Adriana looked at the words as Bucky’s pointed them out but she still wasn’t sure what exactly happened. “How come she had to go to heaven with the baby?” she asked and looked back at Steve. “If she was sick, why did she take the baby too?”

---

“Well, babies need their mommies to live until they’re born. His mommy got sick, so he got sick, too,” Steve explained. “She didn’t mean to. It was an accident. But it happened, and your papa and I were very hurt for a long time.” He pet his fingers through her hair. “I thought that we wouldn’t have any more children... but then you know what happened? Father Frank called us to see if we could give baby Sarah May a home. And then, after that, Papa found you.”

---

“So, Ya-Ya came instead of Grant?” Adriana asked and squeezed her biggest turtle plushie closer to her chest for comfort. “Who was Ya-Ya’s mommy?” she added as an afterthought. She was still confused a bit about all this. But at least she was happy that they were finally telling her something about it. She also got confused a lot about how motherhood worked. Her dads had explained that some kids have two dads or two moms or one of each. But they also said that every kid has a mommy even if she doesn’t end up living with them. It was all a little convoluted for her young mind to understand.

---

“Kind of. Ya-Ya would’ve come regardless of Grant. Then we would’ve had even more kids and you’d have another brother just like Christopher.” Steve grabbed another turtle to pass over to her. “We don’t know who is Sarah May’s mommy. They left her at the church because they knew that they couldn’t give her a home so they wanted to let someone else take care of her so she can be happy.”

---

Bucky chimed in as well and touched his hand to the back of Steve’s neck. “But the important thing, Adriana, is that Daddy and I love every one of you so much. And that includes Grant. He is your baby brother and always will be. Just like your other mommy and daddy are still yours but so are me and Daddy. Do you understand, Peanut?”

---

Adriana pouted a little as she mulled the information over and then nodded her head. “I understand.” She paused and then focused on Bucky. “Papa, when we dream, do our brains go to heaven?” she asked. “Because sometimes I think I see my mommy and daddy when I sleep. Can I see Grant, too?”

---

“I don’t think our brains go to heaven, Baby. But I think heaven lets our family come back to us for a little bit,” Bucky said softly. “Because I know I see my mommy and daddy when I dream sometimes too. And I see Grant and his mommy just as much. And I think that Grant would be happy to come see you in your dreams, Peanut.” He looked to Steve and said quietly, “Should we show her his hospital picture?” He wanted Steve’s take on that because he knew that the picture might be a little distressing to a child who hadn’t seen a stillborn before.

---

Steve shook his head right away. Steve couldn’t bear to look at his son right now and he was even less ready to field the questions that Adriana surely would have after being shown the picture. Not only that, but he didn’t feel right showing her a picture of someone who wasn’t alive in the picture. “I think we should let Adriana get some rest now.”

---

Bucky saw that look in Steve’s eyes and he knew there was no questioning him right now. He nodded and kissed Steve’s head and then Adriana’s. “Okay, bedtime, Peanut,” he said and helped tuck her in better. “Daddy will sing you one song, just one, while Papa goes to check on Uncle Greg.” He looked to Steve and added, “To see if he needs any help packing.”

---

Steve tensed a little when Bucky brought up Greg, but he didn’t make any comments. He leaned down to kiss their daughter’s head and started to sing. He tucked the blankets around her one last time before retiring to their bedroom to wait for Bucky.

---

As it turned out, Greg had just started packing and Bucky actually did end up helping him finish up. It took about an hour because of the arguing and snide quips from each other. But eventually, he was trailing back into the master bedroom and coming to flop down on the bed next to Steve. “Hey...” he said tiredly. “He’s all ready to leave in the morning. I gave him money for the cab to the airport. He said he didn’t want it but I told him it was in exchange for bringing the boxes here.”

---

Steve was already showered, dressed, and ready to fall asleep with his husband. It had been a long couple of days and he was eager to get some rest. “I can’t wait until it’s just us again,” Steve mumbled. “Come here...” he pulled Bucky into a hug and nuzzled his neck affectionately. “How’re you feeling?”

---

“Exhausted,” Bucky whispered and held Steve’s head in his hands. “But I’m a little better now that we are alone.” He sighed and kissed the top of Steve’s head a few times and rested his cheek on his hair. “I love you, Steve,” he added. “I love you more than anything else in the world. I love our family. I love you all so much. And this is almost over. Then we don’t have to see him ever again. We don’t.”

---

Steve looked over at his husband with a happy smile. He felt loads better now that he was able to soak up Bucky’s undivided attention. It was rare that he got this needy about it. “I love you too, Bucky. I can’t wait to make you breakfast in the morning and kiss you whenever I feel like it without having to worry about someone holding back a rude comment about us.”

---

“I’ll kiss you every ten seconds to make up for it,” Bucky promised and gave him another long kiss as if it was a deposit on the plan. “Maybe I should make breakfast tomorrow since you’re going into the record shop for me. It doesn’t seem fair to make you do both.” Another long kiss. “I can do French toast. I’m pretty good at French toast.”

---

Steve leaned into the kiss with a happy smile. “I like the sound of that. All of that,” he agreed. “You can spoil me with breakfast in bed before I go work with the stoners. Do you think I should join in on smoking just to fit in?” he joked. Steve had no interest in weed.

---

Bucky made an annoyed little grunt in answer. He knew it was a joke but he didn’t think it was in good taste considering Steve’s lung condition and Bucky’s own former smoking habits. “You’re a funny guy, Steve,” he said flatly and pushed Steve on the bed so he could move over him. He caged his arms and legs around him and hovered over the bed with his hair flopping down around him like a messy, crazy angel. “You need to occupy that mouth some other way right now, Baby,” he whispered and leaned down closer to give him a pecking kiss.
Steve watched with interest as Bucky moved over him. “And how do you suggest I occupy this mouth?” he asked. “You got something to put in it?”

Bucky growled lightly and bit Steve’s neck a little harsher than he normally would have. He knew Steve was feeling really left out and definitely a little needy for love and attention. So, he figured being a little bit more possessive and firm on him than he usually got would be okay. “Got something if you want it, Steve. Just have to ask me nicely.”

Steve let out a little moan when Bucky bit him like that. He stroked a hand down his chest and looked up at him with dark, needy eyes. “Please?” he asked softly, rubbing circles over Bucky’s nipple with his thumb. “I want you to kiss me and jerk me off and then I want your cock in my mouth.”

“You got it, Baby,” Bucky agreed with a heavy, low tone before stealing a soft little kiss. “Slip your pants off and sit up for me. I want you in my lap while I jerk you off.” He moved off of him and propped himself up on the pillows and waited patiently for Steve to get on him.

Steve nodded and didn’t need telling twice. His hands were already working his pants and underwear off of his body. He sat up and got into Bucky’s lap right away. “Tell me how much you love me,” Steve said shyly. “I want to hear it over and over again tonight.”

“Oh, Baby,” Bucky said warmly, hands sliding slowly up Steve’s thighs. “Steve, Baby, my sweet husband. I love you more than I can explain. I wish I was better with my words so I could get you to understand how much you truly mean to me.” He gripped one hand lightly on Steve’s cock and started to move up and down on it. “Waking up to you every morning feels like I get to wake up the sun. You’re my warmth and my light and my everything. And without you, I would be cold and sad and shriveled and nothing, absolutely nothing.”

Steve purred when Bucky slid his hands over his thighs. He cupped Bucky’s face and kissed his forehead and then his nose, letting Bucky sing his praises and words of love. “You have such a way with words, love,” he murmured. Steve let out a little moan when Bucky started to stroke his cock. “I don’t know why you think you don’t give your feelings justice.”

“Because they aren’t enough for you,” Bucky said quietly and gave Steve a pushy kiss. “I don’t think I could ever find the perfect way to explain all my feelings. And I know that sounds cheesy. But you can’t be described with a handful of words, Babe. You’re more than any of that.” He gripped a little tighter on him and worked faster. “Loving you is a gift and an honor.”
Bucky knew just what to say. He always did. And Steve found Bucky talking to him like this just as much of a turn on as dirty talk. He rocked his hips into Bucky’s hand as he kissed along Bucky’s neck and jaw. “We’ve come so far,” he said. “You’ve turned me into a better person. You brighten my world.”

---

“I’m sorry these past few days have been really rough,” Bucky said quietly and hastened his hand on Steve’s cock. “But now, at least, it’ll be over in the morning. And once you get home tomorrow, everything is all about you, okay? I promise. It’ll be great, Baby.” He kissed Steve again and opened his mouth for him so they could get a little sloppy with their making out. He wanted Steve to feel so good all the time and he was going to give him anything and everything to make that happen.

---

Steve parted his lips and accepted the kiss readily. He was on edge and he was starting to make desperate, little noises as he rocked his hips into Bucky’s hand more. “You don’t got to make it all about me,” Steve said. “Just… just keep loving me.” He gripped Bucky’s hair tightly in his hands. “Almost there, Buck, please…”

---

Bucky whispered softly, “Come for me. Please, Baby. Come for me. I want to see that handsome face when you orgasm. I love that face. You always look so good.” He chuckled and leaned in to bite on Steve’s neck again firmly.

---

Steve moved his hips desperately, having little rhythm to them as he felt his orgasm start crashing down on him. When he came, he kissed Bucky to stifle the sounds that were coming out of his mouth. “Bucky,” he moaned, raking his fingers through his hair. “Love you.”

---

Bucky giggled happily and licked a long stripe up Steve’s neck. He kept pumping him for a few seconds and then brought his come covered fingers to his mouth and licked it clean. “You taste so good,” he said warmly and slipped his mouth over Steve’s again and held him close, tongue moving inside his mouth and carefully moving them both so Steve was under him on the bed.

---

Steve was in a mood to be claimed by Bucky and Bucky was doing all the right things to make him feel wanted. He pressed his body against Bucky’s as he was shifted and he worked his hands over his husband’s back to touch him affectionately. “I want to taste you, Buck. I want your cock.”

---

“I know you do, Baby,” Bucky said warmly and kissed Steve’s jaw a few more times. “Where do you want me?” He moaned softly and pressed his cock to Steve’s leg and moved just enough to get some much-needed friction. He wanted Steve on him so badly. He wanted to be on Steve some more. He knew how much they both needed to be tangled up together tonight.

---

“I want you on the edge of the bed so I can get down on my knees in front of you. I want you to sit up so you can watch me. I don’t care so long as you feel good,” Steve said. He reached down so he could rub Bucky’s cock to give him some relief. “I love your dick so damned much. It’s so thick and perfect.”

---

“I love you, Baby. All of you. Every inch,” Bucky promised and moved away a bit so he could get into position for Steve and wait. “And I love your laugh. And seeing those bright happy eyes when I come home from work. It makes absolutely every moment of my life amazing and worth it. And you have no idea how grateful I am that I managed to find you and get you to marry me.”

---

Steve wasted no time climbing off the bed so he could kneel in front of Bucky on the ground. He kissed along the inside of Bucky’s thighs as his husband praised him. He stroked Bucky’s balls as he licked his way up his exposed dick. “I’d marry you a thousand times.” He licked a stripe from shaft to tip before slowly taking his cock into his mouth.

---

Bucky moaned low in his throat and his hand shot to Steve’s hair to grip tight. He loved getting his dick sucked by Steve. It was always perfect and Steve’s mouth was so hot and wet and he had gotten so good at this. “Okay, Steve. Let’s do it again,” Bucky said softly. “It’s been two years. We had four kids in that time. And we had a lot of struggles too.” He gasped a little as Steve pressed his tongue against his cockhead sharply. “Let’s have a vow renewal. We can invite our friends and Father Frank to the house and do a little renewal ceremony.”

---

Steve pressed noisy kisses to the head of Bucky’s dick and happily swallowed him down. He moaned at the feeling of Bucky’s perfect cock on his tongue. He pulled back to breathe. “Let’s do that,” he said. “We weren’t parents back then. We’ve changed so much since getting married.” Steve began to massage Bucky’s balls when he went back to sucking him off.

---

“Yeah, that’s what I’m - fuck!” Bucky yelped and had to muffle his hand over his mouth quickly. He couldn’t talk anymore just yet. Steve was driving him wild right now and he needed to focus on that and not letting himself wake up the house. But he wanted so badly to have a wedding renewal with Steve. He knew their marriage wasn’t legal by the typical standpoints and if it ever became legal they would have themselves a proper wedding. But he really thought this could be good for them. They were parents now, and including their babies in this would be important. And they survived together as a couple through so much since their wedding - Tish, AA meetings, the fire, losing Grant and Missy, countless arguments and disagreements about any number of things, and now Greg’s unexpected visit. They could use this.

---

Steve basked in the pleasure he was able to give his husband. He wanted to make him incapable of thinking of anything except how good Steve’s mouth felt on his dick and how great Steve’s hand felt on his balls. He took all of Bucky’s dick into his mouth and moaned around it. He loved it. He stroked his tongue firmly on the underside of Bucky’s cock, running it up the long vein there.
“Ah, fuck, I love you,” Bucky whined and moved his arms up under his head so he was completely relaxed back. He couldn’t help the string of hums and moans that escaped him as Steve kept working him over and it really did transport him. All he was thinking about was how much he loved sex with Steve and how stupid hot Steve’s body was and how he wanted to bite and lick all over him. “Baby, I’m getting there.”

---

Steve glanced up at Bucky and felt better seeing how relaxed his husband was. He worked up a steady rhythm fucking his mouth on Bucky’s dick. His hand slipped underneath Bucky so he could tease his hole without penetrating him. He didn’t speed up his ministrations - Steve kept that relaxed, steady tempo to draw it out just a little longer. Usually, Steve wanted to be mindful of others in the house, but he hoped Greg would overhear somehow and be unable to do a damned thing about it.

---

The flow and rhythm of Steve on his dick combined with the gentle prodding around his hole, pushed Bucky ever closer to the edge and fast. His breathing picked up and he was mostly just panting Steve’s name and moving his body around a little with every jolt to his system. It didn’t take that much longer until he could feel the warm pit in his stomach that proved he was about to come. “Baby, fuck, fuck, I’m gonna come. I’m gonna - Steve!” He yelped again followed with a low growl of a moan before he covered his face with a pillow to stifle himself as he burst into the back of Steve’s throat. After a minute, he slowly moved the pillow from his face and looked down to Steve’s head resting on his thigh. He worked on bringing his breathing back to normal. “Jesus, Steve...” he muttered and reached down to touch Steve’s hair. “I was too loud. I’m sorry,” he said and wiped his thumb down Steve’s cheek and over his lips. “You felt incredible. You’re so good. I’m exhausted from that.”

---

“No, you weren’t. You were perfect,” Steve answered. His breathing was short and quick as he caught up with it. Steve kissed Bucky’s thumb and then climbed up to snuggle him. He wrapped his arms around him and looked happily into his eyes. “You’re exhausted from a blowjob?” he laughed.

---

Bucky formed to Steve immediately and tangled up their legs together. “Yes, I’m exhausted. You really got me going. That orgasm really punched its way out of me fast.” He shook his head and tucked up closer to Steve to kiss on his jaw and neck. “I was already tired after today but now I’m about to pass out, Baby.”

---

“Well, I’m glad that it got you properly exhausted. You’ll need to rest up if you want to have the energy for our three, little animals tomorrow.” He nuzzled his face against Bucky’s neck. “I love you. Good night, Bucky, and I’ll see you in the morning, Okay?”

---

“I love you too, Baby,” Bucky promised and moved a little closer up on Steve so he was half blanketed over him. “If the babies cry tonight, I’ll get up and get them. You should get a night off too since you’ll be going into my job tomorrow.”
S6: E20

Chapter Notes

REPEAT:

I have some news. Due to the intense business of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes in doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV shows will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has any questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Season Six will end on Chapter 23, followed by an epilogue.

At some point when Bucky was cooking breakfast for everyone, Christopher appeared behind him. He’d managed to not only escape his bed, but get out of his room and down the stairs. “Hi, Papa!” He chirped. “Food?”

---

Bucky jumped about a foot off the ground when he heard Christopher’s little voice behind him. He had just been listening to an album quietly coming from the living room and he hadn’t heard him coming in at all. He turned around and saw him and quickly picked him up. “Jesus, Bean. How did you do that? Was the nursery door not closed all the way?” He wondered and brushed his fingers through his son’s hair. “Or did Daddy get you? Is Daddy downstairs now?”

---

Christopher burst into laughter when his papa had a big reaction to seeing him. He hugged him and rested his head on Bucky’s shoulders. “No Daddy,” he said. He had tried to get Steve’s attention but his dad was sound asleep. “I open,” he explained.

---

“What, how?” Bucky asked. “Did you stand on something?” He was dumbfounded. Christopher would have had to stand on something to get to the doorknob. And if that was the case, Christopher might just actually be the smartest kid Bucky had ever encountered in his life. “Did you just want to come downstairs for breakfast?”

---

“Play blocks,” Christopher said. He’d stacked a few of his things just like he did when playing blocks so he could get up to the doorknob. “I want Papa,” he said. Christopher had heard one of his parents walking around the house and he wanted in on the fun.

---

Bucky nodded and stared at his son. He would have to go see what Christopher was talking about in the nursery to see how he made his great escape. “Huh. Okay. Well, you’re here now, Bean. Do you want some strawberries while Papa finishes making breakfast?” he asked and gave him a few kisses before sitting him in his high chair. “Strawberries, Bean?”

---

“Yiss,” Christopher answered in an excited whisper. He smiled when his papa kissed him. As he waited for his strawberries, he looked around the house. Nobody else was awake and it was a lot quieter than he was used to. “Where Greg?”

---

Bucky quickly put some strawberries into a little bowl and set it down for Christopher. “Uncle Greg left already, Buddy,” he said. Greg had come downstairs about a half hour earlier and gave Bucky a five-minute speech about his opinions once again before finally leaving for the airport. It took everything Bucky had to just not fight back on it and just let it be. He figured it was better to just let him finish and go instead of having another fight that might have extended his stay a little.

---

Christopher’s shoulders dropped a little and a disappointed look crossed his face. He ate a few strawberries in peace before he asked, “When Greg back?” As much as Bucky and Steve had been waiting for Greg to get out of here, the kids had a lot of fun with him.

---

“I don’t know, Bean,” Bucky said softly and touched Christopher’s hair carefully a little bit again. He still couldn’t stop thinking about Greg’s comment about his son’s hair. It wasn’t fair of him to tell Bucky what to do about his own son’s appearance. He loved Christopher’s hair just the way it was. And if anyone made a decision to cut it, it was going to be Christopher himself. “He lives in California. It’s far away, Love.”

---

“No,” Christopher whined, slumping a little in his chair. Thankfully, he didn’t throw a fit over it but he definitely wasn’t in as cheerful of a mood anymore. He miserably ate his berries while Bucky stroked his hair. “Why?” he asked quietly.

---

“How come he had to leave?” Bucky asked to clarify. “He has a family, Baby. He is a daddy too. He had to go back to his own family. He went home.” He hoped Christopher understood and wasn’t too upset about Greg leaving. It was nice to know they got along well but Bucky and Steve wouldn’t have lasted another day with him.

---

Christopher sighed and rested his chin dramatically in his palm. He got that from Steve. “Okay,” he huffed. Christopher finished up his berries just as Diana came over to beg. “Papa. Diana food,” he informed.
Bucky let out a little sigh of relief and went to get Diana’s food to fill up her bowl. “Okay, Christopher. Breakfast is ready. Do you want to come with me to get Daddy awake?” he asked and held out his arms as an offering. “I’m betting Daddy will be so happy to see you this morning, Baby.”

“Yiss,” he answered. Christopher reached up to get picked up by his papa. “Daddy happy,” he parroted, smiling over at Bucky. He had a look in his eye that promised many mornings of nursery escape if it resulted in extra attention from his parents.

Bucky had gotten well used to Christopher’s evil eye and he could tell he was enjoying the fruits of his labor this morning. “Oh, boy...” he sighed and picked up his son. He was going to have to think of a better way to prevent this now. He took Christopher upstairs again, Diana on their heals, and said to him, “Baby Bean, you are going to be the end of me, aren’t you?”

Christopher nodded his head enthusiastically. He didn’t understand all the words his papa used, but he assumed it was something good. He hugged Bucky’s neck and snuggled him happily. When they went into the bedroom, Christopher made an excited sound before squealing, “Dada! Get up!”

Bucky giggled and set Christopher down on the ground for a second before pulling the blanket around Steve’s middle tighter to cover his nudity. He then picked Christopher up again and set him on the bed so he could attack Steve however he pleased today. “Baby, someone wants to say ‘good morning’.”

Steve woke up with a start when Christopher shouted. When he saw his son crawling on top of him, huffing and puffing determinedly as he stood up on top of his chest, he couldn’t help but laugh. “Hello!” he answered excitedly, bringing him in for a hug. “Good morning, Bean! Did you help Papa with breakfast?”

“Not really,” Bucky said with a huff and watched his boys together. “He escaped from the nursery and got downstairs to me. Apparently, he stood up on something and opened the door. Nearly scared the shit out of me when he got to the kitchen.”

“What?” Steve sounded equal parts shocked and impressed. He looked over to Christopher and played with his hands. “Bean, are you getting too smart for us? You little wonder baby. You scared your papa!” he said in a bright voice.

Bucky shook his head and shrugged. “I have no idea how he did it but he did,” he said and sat down on the bed with them both. “He is so smart. All our kids are.” He chuckled and picked Christopher up again. “Come on, Bean. Let’s get Ya-Ya and Adriana so Daddy can put on some pants so he’s not a nakey daddy anymore. Let’s go.”

“Nakey Daddy,” Christopher repeated with a giggle.

Steve blushed and gave Bucky a small swat. “Don’t say that, he didn’t have to know,” he whispered in an embarrassed tone. Christopher didn’t seem to care.

“Come on, Steve. He doesn’t know why you’re naked,” Bucky said with a big grin. “He’s naked all the time when we give him a bath and you know how much he loves running around in his diaper so we can’t get him dressed.” Christopher probably just thought Steve had a bath and that’s why he was a nakey daddy. “I’ll get the kids and meet you downstairs, Love.”

“He does love being a little, naked boy.” He opened his mouth to say something else, but Sarah May began to cry in the nursery. She never liked waking up without her brother in the room with her. Today was no exception. “Our daughter calls for you,” Steve said.

Bucky set Christopher down and he padded down the hall to the nursery to get to Sarah May quickly. After a few minutes, Bucky had all three kids downstairs and seated around the table, waiting for Steve. Sarah was up and making coffee and the girls were tiredly making their way to breakfast as well.

Steve came down and immediately gave all of his kids kisses, hugged the dog, and then hugged his mom. Sarah slyly said, “Oh, so the dog gets a hello before your own mother?”

Lilly looked up and answered, “At least you got a hello.”

Steve put his hands on his hips. “Last time I tried to hug you in the morning, you nearly bit my head off.”

Lilly just gave him a little glare. It was true, though. But she was having a rough time lately. Even before Greg came and threw her out of balance with bad news and emotions. She was going through a puberty phase that was making her irritable. At least, that’s what Bucky assumed. Because she wouldn’t normally be so caustic and short with people and not having as much fun as she usually did.

“Here, Steve, sit down,” Bucky said and pushed him to his seat. He wanted to make sure Steve was just having a good relaxed morning. “Do you want coffee?”

Steve didn’t push any more buttons since he wasn’t in the mood to start a fight over breakfast. He chuckled when Bucky pushed him into a chair and Diana came bolting over so she could rest her head in his lap. “Hello, princess,” he greeted happily. Steve looked back up to Bucky. “I’ll have some coffee. Can you also put some in a travel mug for me to take?”

---

“Of course, Baby. Travel mug of coffee,” Bucky agreed and set a cup of coffee out for him and poured another into a mug. “You’ll be with Clint and Tim this morning, Steve. Then Clint will leave at noon today and Reggie will come in and Tim will close today. He’s pulling an all-day shift. But you’ll be done at four, Okay?” Bucky gave him the rundown for the schedule and touched his hair like he was fixing it for him. “There’s a new shipment coming in today. Several boxes of vinyl and cassette. Please, don’t over-exert yourself with carrying them. Tim can handle it.”

---

Steve smiled as he got the rundown for the day. It felt nice going out to work for once. Of course, he loved staying home with the kids and it genuinely was a fulfilling life to lead being able to be there all the time to help them grow. But a part of him missed being able to do an honest day’s work for a paycheck. “Only until four? That’s an early enough shift where I can probably still cook dinner tonight.”

---

“Sure, I guess. But I want to cook dinner, Steve,” Bucky said and touched his cheeks and neck. “I want to make dinner for everyone tonight. And you’ll be so tired when you get back. Trust me. I can do it.” He leaned down and gave Steve a kiss before going off again to get the bowl of fruit for the table. “I’ve got a lunch ready for you to take with you but if you would rather get something out, that’s fine too.”

---

“You’re spoiling me, Sweetheart,” Steve said fondly. He leaned into Bucky’s hands and smiled over at him. “I don’t think I’ll be as tired as you think I’ll be, but I’ll not complain about coming home to a dinner cooked by my perfect husband. And I’d rather have lunch made by you than by some sweaty teenager.”

---

Bucky chuckled and grabbed the lunch bag for him. “Here you go, Babe. There’s extra chips in there in case Clint finds it and takes some from you,” he said. “Call me at lunch to let me know how it’s going?” he cocked his head to the side and gave Steve a grateful smile. “Thank you for doing this.”

---

Steve sipped at his coffee and finished up his breakfast quickly since he had to get going soon. “Will do, love,” he said. Steve sat up and kissed his cheek. “Thank you for taking care of the babies. They’re going to love spending time with their papa,” he said.

---

“I love you so much, Babe,” Bucky said and followed Steve to the door after he kissed the kids’ goodbye. “Have a great day. Don’t sit on the blue chair, it’s horrible.” He handed him a few dollar bills and said, “This is in case Reggie left his wallet somewhere and needs money for lunch.”
Diana rushed up and nudged her way between the two of them. She wasn’t used to Steve being the one leaving at this time and started to whine. “No blue chair. Money for Reggie. Got it.” He leaned down to pet Diana before straightening up to kiss Bucky’s lips. “I’ll see you later. Love you.”

Tim and Clint were both already at the record shop by the time Steve got there. They were unpacking shipment boxes and checking the inventory slip to make sure they had what they ordered. When Clint noticed Steve he crossed his arms and grinned wide. “Hey, Blondie! Good to see you this side of town. How’s it feel coming to the underbelly to work today?”

Steve hung up his coat on the rack and put his lunch bag in the fridge before walking over to Clint to give him a hug. “It feels good,” he said. “Bucky’s convinced that I’m going to be tired when I get back, so I’m going to need you to spray me with water if I start looking sluggish. I can’t let him be right.”

“Can’t let Bucky be right,” Clint repeated with a nod. “That’s how we operate too. You’ll fit in here.” He chuckled and handed Steve a stack of vinyl. “Tim will handle the register, so if anyone is ready to buy, just yell for him. You’re not really trained on anything like that. So, for now, take this list and check off that all the items are accounted for in your stack.”

“Sounds easy enough to me,” Steve said. He was excited to be put to work and he set up camp on an empty spot of the countertop. “Once I finish this pile, should I come get you or do I bother Tim?” They were the only two reasonably responsible people here.

“Either or,” Clint said with a nod. “Each box has a list with it and they are all basically separated out now.” He hoisted a box of cassettes up on the counter and added, “and we finally got these in. For some reason, our order got messed up and they are just now getting here two months late.” He held up a cassette copy of Kansas’ new album called ‘Power’.

“Alright. I’ll get on it,” he said. Steve picked up the cassette from Clint’s hand and looked at it. “Cool.” He got right to work with checking inventory. Steve was pretty good with this stuff, so he didn’t take long checking things over. However, when a customer came in reeking of weed, Steve’s cop radar went on and he looked over at Tim.

Tim saw Steve jump to attention like a dog getting a whiff of frying bacon. He chuckled and watched one of their regulars milling in around the stacks. “It’s okay, Steve. He’s harmless. Not a nuisance. You can unclench.” He took one of the new Kansas tapes and slid it into their player and the first track started up. “Here, you’re Bucky today. So that means you’ve got to listen to the new music and give your opinions.”
Steve couldn’t help his knee-jerk reaction to the smell. He never enjoyed making arrests over weed, but he usually only arrested people who reeked of it when they gave him other reasons to do so, such as being belligerent or vandalizing something. “I bet you can’t bring Richard around here much. He’s more uptight than I am,” he said. “Also, are you sure I’m qualified to give my opinion? Bucky’s a bigger connoisseur than I am.”

Tim nodded, eyes wide as he said, “Yeah, you’re not kidding. He only came here once and almost arrested Reggie so he doesn’t come around anymore.” Richard was very high brow. He was a great fit for Tim but it could be a lot sometimes. “The first time he met my kids, he showed them pictures of what happens to the body of heroin addicts. They were terrified.”

Clint pushed into the conversation a little more again to add, “I’m sure you can give us something to work with, Steve. I can’t hear everything in the song and Tim only ever says that he likes it or doesn’t like it and that’s it.”

“Oh, my god.” It was a very Richard thing to mean well but end up putting his foot in his mouth like that. “And I’m sure you know well enough about the time he got Clint and Bucky in prison. Bucky’s still mad,” he said. Steve glanced over to the tape deck and walked over so he could have a listen. “This has a good beat to it.” He started dancing a little just to be embarrassing.

“Clint’s still mad too,” Clint offered too and glanced to Tim like he was little miffed that he was dating that guy even if he was so good with him. He watched Steve a second and shook his head. “Well, Bucky certainly doesn’t do that,” he spat out with a chuckle. “You and Tim are both useless with this stuff. Take home a tape and have Bucky listen to it.” The song ended and it started up on the next track. “Although, from what I hear so far, Bucky is going to hate it anyway. He will think it’s too boring.”

“He apologized,” Tim mumbled softly in defense. Steve eyed him and almost argued back but he decided to let it go. Tim was a bit of a soft-spoken guy when trying to avoid confrontation. Steve didn’t want to make things awkward so early in the shift.

“How can he think this is boring?” Steve said. “I bet you that Bucky is going to like this well enough. Christopher would like it too. He tries to sing Bucky’s songs.”

Clint shrugged and signed off on the bottom of the list he was working on before grabbing a new one and starting with a new stack. “Christopher might like it, sure. But Bucky’s a punk. This is way too current and popular and normal to be important to him. He’s going to say it’s got nice rhythm but lacks any passion or intrigue.”

“All I have to do is say that this is my new favorite album convincingly enough and he’s going to like it just because I do,” Steve answered back, as if he had just pulled out some sort of trump card.
“Christopher got out of the nursery today,” he said.  “Climbed down the stairs and scared the crap out of Bucky while he was making breakfast.”

---

“That’s because Bucky’s a big sap when it comes to you. You could convince him to buy you a helicopter and he would save up because you want it,” Clint said with a nod of finality.

Tim took a box cutter and sliced open the next box quickly. No one was really around so he figured he would keep helping for a while. “How did he get out? Have you guys transitioned him into a big kid bed yet?”

---

“He stacked up a few things to reach the doorknob, I guess. I’m not sure. We haven’t gotten him a big kid bed yet... I don’t have the heart to take him out of the crib Bucky made for him. He’s growing up too fast,” Steve said, pouting. “He knows that we don’t like it when he climbs out, but he still does it sometimes.”

---

“He’ll be two next month, right?” Tim asked. “He is growing up. I remember meeting him as a little guy at the shelter opening. He was tiny.” He sighed and gave Steve a sad little look. “I miss when my kids were that young. My youngest just started on the basketball team and I can’t help but think that babies can’t play basketball but then I remember he’s not a baby anymore.”

---

Steve said. “He loved you from the start. Out of everyone at the shelter, he recognized you and toddled right on over every time.” Steve sighed and got a sad look on his face too because his boy wasn’t a room away from him like he was used to. “Do they ever stop growing so fast?”

---

“No, it doesn’t stop. And it doesn’t get any easier. And you’re proud to watch them grow but you also just want them to stay your little babies forever,” Tim said and sighed. “And I know Richard wants to have a kid. He would love to be a father. But I’ve got kids that are already growing up and stuff. And I’m ten years older than Richard. I... I don’t know if it’s such a good idea or not that I be involved.”

---

Steve went back to organizing the records that customers pulled out and failed to put back in the correct spot. “I think you guys can make it work,” Steve said. “Bucky and I are going to have kids years down the road. Doesn’t mean we love our older kids any less. Besides, don’t you think it’ll be great to raise a baby with someone you love deeply?”

---

Tim sighed but nodded anyway. He had been thinking about this for a while now. “Yes, and I adore Richard. But I also loved my ex-wife for a really long time. Not in the same ways but I did. And now she doesn’t even talk to me, she got remarried and had another baby, she - without my permission - stole the name we were going to use if we had another kid together, and she spends too much time trying to convince my kids that I’m some scummy asshole. When I never wanted to leave her. I was prepared to die with her. I wouldn’t have been as happy as I am now with Richard. But I never wanted to split up the family and hurt the kids that way. She kicked me out.” He took in a shaky breath and covered his face. Tim got so easily worked up. And he really hadn’t handled his issues with his ex-wife yet. They still cropped up all the time.

---

“I know it’s easy for me to stand here and say this because it hasn’t happened to me, really. But why would you let her take anything more from you when she’s already taken so much? You could have a happy life raising a beautiful child with Richard. If what your ex did to you is holding you back from potentially letting it happen again, it’s just another level of control she has over you.”

---

Tim nodded and looked away for a second. He had been told something similar from Bucky and Clint too. But it was hard to let it not affect him anymore. “I understand. Thank you for your advice, Steve. I’m just so worried. I don’t want to disappoint Richard or anything. I just need to figure out if it’s even a good idea for me to raise another kid. You know?” He sighed and pulled out a picture from his wallet of him and Richard at the beach together and showed it to Steve. “He makes me so happy. Thank you for setting me up with him. I just hope I don’t ruin it.”

---

“There’s no way in the world you could disappoint Richard. You’re a good guy, you’re caring, you’re a great friend... you’re the whole package, Tim,” Steve encouraged. He felt awful to see his confidence tanked from his wife casting him out over something so petty. “You’re not going to ruin it, bud. I’ve got faith in you.”

---

Tim nodded solemnly and gave Steve a small smile. He had heard that before from Bucky and Clint too. It just was hard for him to believe after his marriage took such a horrible turn. “Thanks, Steve. I appreciate the encouragement.”

Clint shook his head and added, “Tim, my man, how many times have we done this now? Bucky and I tell you the same stuff. And we say the same to Bucky when he’s worried he’s not good even for Steve. And you guys tell me the same when I worry about Natasha.” He looked to Steve and nodded. “It’s true. We do this all the time.”

---

“You know we’re here for you,” Steve said. “And we would be honest if we didn’t think something was a good idea.” He scribbled down a few more notes on his inventory sheet before his head snapped over to Clint like he just realized what he said. “Wait... Bucky still doubts that he’s good enough for me?” he asked with a concerned frown. Steve had thought that those misconceptions weren’t so bad anymore for his husband.

---

Clint nodded, not even slightly nonplussed since to him it was so regular. “I mean, it’s nowhere near as bad as it used to be. He’s not constantly worried about that,” he said to Steve. “I used to get concerned that he was going to work himself up into getting an ulcer or something. But nowadays it just every so often something will happen or he’s having a bad day and his insecurities come worrying their way in again. You know?”
Steve was determined to put in extra effort every day so there wouldn’t be a second that they were together that Bucky doubted whether or not he was good enough for Steve. “It’s a shame,” Steve said. “Bucky’s done so much for me. You should’ve seen my place before I met him. It looked like it was never lived in. Now, I have a whole home and family.”

“I know, Buddy,” Clint said with a warm smile. “You two really make each other better. Always have.” He was grateful that Bucky had Steve now. He had been worried about him never getting better and never getting anywhere and always being sad and stuck. But Steve completed him. “So, I hear the visit from Bucky’s uncle didn’t go well. Tim told me that Richard had to respond to a call at your house.”

Steve groaned at the mention of Bucky’s uncle. “Ugh. He’s the worst. And Christopher won’t stop asking for him,” Steve complained. “Any time he had the chance, he would talk Bucky’s ear off about how to get rid of me and how our kids need to be raised with a woman around and how Christopher’s hair is too long.”

“You’ve got your mom there. That’s a woman in the house,” Clint countered with a shrug. “Was that not good enough for him? He does sound like an ass. And Christopher is perfect exactly how he is. He’s going to look like a little blonde Bucky if he keeps his long hair.” He shook his head and nudged Steve a little to pass over another set of papers. “Even if she wasn’t there, it shouldn’t matter,” Steve said. “And Christopher already is like a little, blonde Bucky. He tries to head-bang whenever rock music comes on and if Bucky so much as strums his guitar, Christopher is doing his damnedest to sing with him. I swear, I’m getting that kid music lessons the second he’s old enough.”

Tim finished off his box and started to set the stacks on the back table to be sorted as he said, “It’ll probably be easy for him to pick up on an instrument since Bucky’s always being musical. Don’t you think? He’s got a lot of positive musical influence.” “How do you think Sarah May will do with people playing instruments all around her all the time?” Clint asked.

“Yeah. Bucky’s so talented with that stuff. I wish I could lay there and listen to him play all day long,” Steve sighed dreamily. He could be such a dope with Bucky’s music sometimes. “Sarah May will probably wish she had your hearing when she’s in the house. I feel bad for her - she’s like Becca, wanting to have peace and quiet, but without Becca’s attitude.”

“She’s welcome to come stay with me. I’ll be her third dad. No problem,” Clint offered and shot
Steve a pleading look. He loved all of the kids so much. And he wished he was a dad too. He and Natasha still hadn’t come to any definitive conclusions about that yet and he was getting discouraged.

“I can’t let our baby girl spend that much time without me or Bucky. She’ll think that we abandoned her,” Steve said. “But I know she loves you because you don’t make a lot of noise and she likes signing. Christopher and her talk sometimes like that to each other.” He checked off a few boxes on the paper. “How’s the baby discussion going with Nat?”

Clint shrugged and kind of did a non-committal little dance in his chair. “Not great. We just keep circling the same issues. Bottom line is that I want kids, she doesn’t want kids. But I don’t want to give her up and she doesn’t want to give me up. So, we are still just... in a loop.” He forced a little smile and added, “I love her. And I don’t want to break up with her. So, it’s hard to decide what to do.”

“Is adoption out of the question too?” he asked. “Nat never struck me as someone who wanted to be around kids full-time. She’s good enough with them to do her job, but... I don’t know. I don’t blame her for not wanting to be pregnant. And you see how many diapers we go through. I’m tempted to try cloth ones because I feel bad throwing so many out. It’s a mess.”

“Yeah, I don’t think it’s so much that she dislikes the thought of being pregnant. Because even if we adopted, she would still be a parent. And that’s the block there,” Clint said as he stood up from his seat and shook himself off. “Man, we got to find something more fun to talk about. This is just sad now.”

Steve didn’t know what he would’ve done if Bucky didn’t want kids. It wasn’t something he had to worry about. “How about we talk about when Tim and Richard are finally going to tie the knot? Father Frank has been itching for another hitching,” Steve teased.

Tim blushed red and bit his lip in a grin. “We haven’t really talked about that yet. You know Richard. He’s not in a church, he didn’t grow up in a church. I don’t know if it would mean the same thing to him as it did to you. But I do plan on spending as much of my life with him as I can. I hope that’s a long, long while.”

“Church or not, it feels good to see the ring on his finger,” Steve countered, wiggling his hand for Tim to see. “Or maybe we can have Clint do the ceremony here. It’s a real classy place to get married, don’t you know?” He gave Clint a playful wink.

“Oh, yeah!” Clint jumped back into the conversation. “We can put an arch over there by the window and have some potted plants brought in. You can walk down the aisle to The Rolling Stones and Bucky will play guitar through the ceremony!” He was mostly joking but it kind of excited him now and he didn’t think it would be half bad.

---

“Sarah May will be able to carry a basket by that point, so you can choose if you want her or Adriana to be the flower girl,” Steve elaborated, grinning at Tim. “I’m sure Richard will love getting married in Stoner Central.”

---

Tim chuckled and ran a hand through his hair and adjusted his glasses. “Right, yes. My uptight boyfriend will love getting married here where the pot smell is caked into the carpets and the walls.” He did think it would be a little amazing though to be married to Richard. But he needed to discuss that with him before making any plans at all. “Are you two going to be the official wedding planners?” he asked and glanced between Steve and Clint.

---

Steve nodded right away. “Yep. I will say that all weddings that I planned have been a success.” The only one he planned had been his own, but that didn’t change the truth in his declaration. “And I’ll only charge the price of one night’s worth of babysitting from you in exchange for my services.”

---

“And I will charge you several pizzas,” Clint added. “Speaking of which, I’m hungry already. Steve, did Bucky make you lunch?” he asked and put his papers away so he could go snoop on what food Steve and Tim might have brought with them that he could leech a little bit from.

---

“He did,” Steve said. “And he gave me money in case Reggie needed lunch,” he added. He trotted over to his fridge and pulled out the lunch his husband made for him. Steve had a proud look on his face, as if he was showing off how awesome Bucky was for packing it for him.

---

Clint hummed and gave Steve a big pair of begging eyes and asked, “Anything in there you aren’t going to eat that I could have as a pre-lunch snack?” He was used to Bucky usually bringing something extra that he could give to him. They also usually kept lots of snacks in the back but sometimes they didn’t stick around long if Reggie or one of the others got the munchies.

---

Steve had quite an appetite and would have easily been able to wolf all of this down, but he also was a big sap who couldn’t let Clint down. He didn’t make a scene or huff as he unwrapped his sandwich so he could give half of it to Clint. “I wonder what Bucky’s up to right now. I hope the kids are behaving for him.”

---

“Aw, yes, score! I’ll bring Chinese food to you and Bucky tomorrow night. Promise.” Clint chirped happily. “What do you usually do this early with the kids? Adriana isn’t in school yet, right?”
“I’m usually doing schooling with Adriana while Sarah May naps and Christopher does his finger painting. She’s a little behind for her age but I wanted to homeschool our kids until they’re older anyway. I want them to develop good studying and cognitive habits.”

“Oh, okay. Well, maybe Bucky’s teaching them today. Or he’s just giving them a free-for-all, no Daddy day where they can run around in their underwear and make a mess of everything. You know, Bucky stuff.” Clint laughed because he knew how different Steve and Bucky were with cleanliness and organization. Bucky was a little bit of a slob.

“I already told the kids that today was going to be a different day and they get to do a new routine just this once,” Steve said. He grimaced at the thought of coming home to a mess. “I really hope that it’s not a zoo when I get back. Bucky barely cleans up when he doesn’t have three kids keeping him busy.”

Tim hummed in contemplation for a moment and said, “That’s so strange. Because he’s always picking up around here. He keeps this place really clean and in order. I mean, I know he’s a bit of an unkempt sort of person and his home would probably get a different treatment than work, but it just surprises me a little to know that.”

“You’d be even more surprised to see how bad it can get at home,” Steve said with a little groan. “Sometimes it’s a total sty. God, I hope today was okay for him.”
S6: E21

Chapter Notes

REPEAT:

I have some news. Due to the intense business of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes in doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV shows will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has an questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Season Six will end on Chapter 23, followed by an epilogue.

(UPDATE: There might be a delay on Chapter 23 and the epilogue - once again because of the hectic schedules that were mentioned above. But those chapters will be posted as soon as possible even if it's not in the immediate weeks that they should have been.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Once the day was over and he was back home, Steve went to find Bucky and worked his hands over his head in a little massage. He figured Bucky had a headache from the day anyway.

---

Bucky let out a low groan, both from his frustration and exhaustion from the day and because Steve’s hands on his head felt so nice. He did have a little headache. “You think we should trim the ends of my hair? We haven’t touched it in so long. I think it’s getting a little raggedy.”

---

“If you want me to, I can trim it. But if you like the length, I bet I can find some sort of fancy shampoo or conditioner to make it look nicer. I won’t buy my cookies so we can have the extra couple of dollars to spend on nicer hair product for you,” Steve offered.

---

Bucky shrugged and moved to get Steve in his arms for a moment. He needed some hugs and cuddles tonight. “No, that’s okay. We can just trim it. We just won’t take that much off. Just enough so the ends aren’t splitting all over the place.”

---

Steve snuggled closer to Bucky and kissed his temple. “I can trim it after we get the kids to bed. I’ll “get upset if I’m interrupted halfway through and I don’t want to be annoyed when I’m trimming your hair,” he said.

“Okay, good idea,” Bucky agreed and held Steve close to him. He wanted to just poof all their bad feelings away right now. He wanted to make Adriana not be sick anymore, and the babies to be calm, and the girls happy. “I think cereal for dinner tonight is a good idea. It’s easy and you won’t have to make anything and there’s minimal cleanup.”

“I don’t know, Buck. I want to take the easy route, too, but I don’t want our kids to have bad nutrition just because we’re tired. I bet some grilled cheese and carrots will go a long way with them. That’s easy enough to make and it’s a warm meal,” Steve said.

“Cereal isn’t bad nutrition,” Bucky countered flatly but didn’t protest against the grilled cheeses. He moved over on the bed a bit and grabbed his photo album from the nightstand. He had recently added extra pages in the back with a few of the new photos that they had gotten from Dewey’s stuff. He and his sisters divided the photos up for now. He opened the album to the back to a picture of his dad in his uniform standing with his mom. She was pregnant with Bucky at the time but wasn’t showing yet.

Steve kissed Bucky’s cheek and looked over at the pictures Bucky was thumbing through. “You look so much like your mom in some ways... even in the photos, I can see a resemblance.” He gave a light tug on a lock of Bucky’s hair before standing. “I’m going to make up dinner quick.”

Bucky sighed and took Steve’s hand. He gave it a quick kiss and then let him go. He kind of wanted a few minutes to himself anyway. He wanted to talk to his parents for a bit. And it was nice to see these younger pictures of them. His mother, at nineteen, did look a look like him at nineteen. And he definitely had her hair. He had his mother’s hair and eyes, and his father’s build and face. He spoke and moved more like his mom but he tried so far to be like his dad more every day. He flicked to the picture of his father at their camp in the war. He was leaning against a tree with his arms folded and his eyes tired. Bucky moved to the next photo, a more official ceremony photo of his father in his formal uniform - the one they still had. He was about twenty-eight in the photograph and looked almost exactly like Bucky did now, just with his hat covering his short hair.

Steve snuck downstairs and tried to get dinner started before the babies noticed that he was around, but he didn’t get too far before they were begging for their dad to play with them. He let them play with their toys in the kitchen so he could talk with them while dinner was being made. “Christopher, can you go get your papa? Where’s Papa?”

Christopher looked up at his Daddy and took a guess, “Up ‘dere’?” He pointed to the hall and added, “With ‘Adinana’?” He still had a very hard time saying his sister’s name.
“Yes, he is upstairs,” Steve praised. “He’s not with Adriana, though. He’s in Papa and Daddy’s room,” he corrected. Steve set up all the plates full of food at everyone’s spots and he reached down to take his son and daughter by the hand. “Shall we go get Papa for dinner?” he asked them.

Up in the master bedroom, Bucky had taken his dad’s uniform from the closet again. He usually never messed with it at all. But since getting his medals and pictures back, Bucky had been looking at it a lot more. This time though, he stripped down out of his own clothes and carefully worked the uniform on himself, taking every precaution not to hurt it. He had never done this before.

He got every button in place and made sure all the medals and pins were resting the way they should be. He looked at himself in the mirror, with his father’s dress uniform fitting him almost perfectly. The pants were just slightly short and his shoulders weren’t as broad as they needed to be to fill out the top.

Bucky felt like he was back as a little seven-year-old putting on his dad’s sweater and pants to see if they would fit. He did that a lot when he was off on a tour and Bucky was missing him too much.

The only thing was his hair. It was long and messy and cascading down the shoulders and back of the uniform. It made him look too foreign in the outfit. So, he tugged his hair up tight in a ponytail and shoved it all up on the top of his head before putting on his father’s cap. And Bucky didn’t stop the silent tears that then fell down his face as he stared at his father in the mirror looking back at him with his mother’s eyes.

Steve hoisted Sarah May up but then had to bend down to scoop up his son as well. He gave them each a kiss before heading up the stairs. He was admittedly a bit surprised when he saw Bucky standing in their bedroom dressed in his father’s uniform.

The kids were more confused. Sarah May clutched onto Steve’s shirt and whined softly at the sight of what she thought was a stranger. Christopher batted Steve’s chest lightly and asked, “Papa?” in quiet confusion.

Bucky was pulled out of his little trance when he heard Christopher’s confused voice. He looked over at them with eyes filled with tears and hands shaking. “Oh, hey...” he noticed Sarah May was cowering into Steve so he lifted the hat from his head and let his hair back down. “It’s just me, Babies. It’s just Papa.”

Steve would’ve hugged Bucky if his arms weren’t full of kids. He did walk over and kiss the tears off of his cheeks. “Hey, Baby, it’s alright,” he said softly. Sarah May looked up at Bucky with big, brown eyes as she put together what happened. She reached her hands out to try and make Bucky hold her. “That fits you well,” Steve said.

Bucky shook his head and started to unbutton the top again. “No. It... I shouldn’t have put it on. This is really stupid. I’m not even sure I’m allowed to put on a military uniform since I’m a civilian. I might have just broken etiquette here. I just... I have that new picture from when he was close to my age and I thought I looked so much like him...”

---

“There’s no harm in putting it on in your own bedroom, Love,” Steve said sweetly. “Let me have a good look at that picture,” he said.

Sarah May’s bottom lip trembled when Bucky didn’t immediately hold her. “Papa,” she said softly, trying to get his attention. “Papa!”

---

Bucky took the photo album and brought it to Steve. He held it up for him to see and kept it out of reach of the kids. “Ya-Ya, Sweet Pea, I have to get out of Papaw’s uniform but then I’ll hold you.” He didn’t want her to accidentally harm the uniform or the medals in any way. And the pins would be dangerous if she managed to pull something out, she could get herself pricked with one.

---

Christopher pointed at the picture of Bucky’s Dad. “Papa, ‘dat’ you?” he asked. Steve let out a laugh. “Bean, that’s not Papa. That’s your Papaw- your pop’s daddy,” he explained. “Don’t they look so alike?” Christopher looked between the picture and Bucky, still not convinced that it was two different people.

---

Bucky shook his head and started to cry again. He took the photo album back and put it away quickly. He shouldn’t have put on his dad’s uniform. He was too upset now. He just wanted to feel close to him again but this was a bad idea. “I’m sorry, Steve. I’m sorry, Dad,” he said and took the uniform off gently and put it back into the garment bag and zipped it up. He stood there in his underwear and a tight white shirt just staring at his family and feeling so small and unstable.

---

Steve hastily but gently set their children down on the bed and he led Bucky to the mattress to sit down. He sat down beside his husband and held him tightly. “Sweetheart, you don’t have to be sorry. It’s alright.” Christopher and Sarah May started crawling over so they could wiggle their way between Steve and Bucky.

---

Bucky opened his arms for his kids and finally held them close to him as they stood on his legs. “It wasn’t a good idea,” he murmured and stroked Christopher’s hair and gave Sarah May a kiss. “It’s not mine, it’s his. And he wasn’t just my dad, and I didn’t even ask the girls if that was okay. I just thought I could look more like him and I did. But now I feel worse than before.”

---

They didn’t know why their papa was crying, but they wanted to try to comfort him when they could see he was feeling down. Steve was incredibly proud of their kids. He reached out to rub Bucky’s back. “Why do you feel worse?” he asked. “He’d be proud of the person you’ve become.”

---
“I just feel worse because I miss him,” Bucky answered softly and leaned into Steve. “And seeing how similar we looked when he was around my age, just made that feeling worse. When he was twenty-nine, I was ten. When I’ll be twenty-nine, Adriana will be six or seven.” He stopped. He didn’t want to mention that he worried all the time that something would happen to him and Steve and his baby girl would have to start taking care of her siblings without her parents to help.

---

Steve continued to pet Bucky’s hair and kiss his face while their children snuggled their papa. “I wish there was something I could do to ease that pain, Sweetheart. But I know that you’re always going to miss him,” he said. “Maybe we can set up something nice on the dresser? Something that’s special so you can talk to them without having to make a trip to the cemetery or getting out a picture album.”

---

Bucky sniffled and glanced up at the dresser. Right now, there was a pair of socks, a baby toy, Bucky’s wallet, and a hairbrush sitting on top. “Yeah... yeah, maybe we could do that. Like a little shrine or something?” he asked. He was so tired. And all he wanted was to get to sleep and wrap his arms around Steve all night. He needed his husband close against him.

---

Steve nodded. “Yeah, like a shrine. I’ve got my rosary beads to use when I can’t go to church to pray, so you can have your way of talking to your parents.” Christopher looked up at Bucky and started to sign that he was hungry. Their dinner was probably starting to get cold at this point.

---

“Okay, Bean. Let’s go eat.” Bucky moved both kids on to the bed and got up to put on some pants and a sweater. “I’d really like that, Steve. Thank you,” Bucky said and pulled him in for a long kiss that was only interrupted because Christopher and Sarah May both pulled on their arms for attention again.

---

“Anything for you, Baby,” he said. Steve was ready to give Bucky a lingering kiss, but their kids had other plans. He pulled back with a laugh and pet Sarah May’s hair. “What’s the matter, Ya-Ya? Are we not giving you enough love?” He kissed her cheek. “Let’s go have dinner, Sweet Pea.”

---

Bucky took Christopher in his arms and went downstairs. The girls were waiting for them in the kitchen and Lilly had already started eating. “Lil, you couldn’t have waited?” Bucky asked as he settled Christopher in his chair and got him some juice. He wasn’t sure if Adriana would want to come down to eat but he could get her in a second.

---

“Dude, it’s almost seven. I’m starving,” Lilly defended. It was pretty late, but Steve and Bucky always waited up for everyone to be home before they ate. “It’s Just grilled cheese anyway, it’s not like it’s special dinner,” she added.

Steve frowned. “I cut the crusts off for you. That’s special.”
Becca was mostly waiting for everyone else. She hadn’t started on her sandwich but she was eating some celery. “Bucky, were you just crying?” she said gently and gestured to his red face.

Lilly shook her head. “Steve, you always cut the crusts off. And Bucky is always crying.”

“I cut the crusts off because it tastes better that way,” Steve said. Once the rest of his family was settled down, Steve kissed Bucky’s temple. “I’ll see if Adriana will come down.” He trotted up the stairs and knocked on the eldest’s door. “Adriana, Sweetie... Are you awake?”

Adriana turned to look at Steve with watery eyes and a runny nose. She was feeling so itchy and sick and unhappy and she just had to cry because of the discomfort. “Daddy,” she whispered and reached an arm out for him. “I don’t like this.”

“Oh, Peanut...” Steve said softly. His heart ached for her. He hurried over to snuggle her and he laid down under the covers with her. “I know it’s tough right now, Baby Girl, but it’ll pass. It’s only going to be like this for a little while and then you’ll be all better soon.”

Adriana cuddled up next to Steve and gave a little nod in answer. She wasn’t sure it would go away fast enough. “I’m hungry,” she said and touched Steve’s face with her little hand. “Can I have noodles and cheese? No red sauce.”

Steve kissed her face a few times. “I made everybody grilled cheese,” he said. “If you’re too hungry to wait for noodles and cheese, you can have that. But if you can wait, I’ll make you noodles and cheese without any red sauce on it,” he said sweetly to her.

“I can wait,” she agreed and rubbed her eyes to get the tears away. She was already feeling better being with her dad and not being all alone in her room. “Can I come play? I want to make clay animals with Play-Doh.”

“Alright. I’ll make a special meal just for you so you can feel better soon,” Steve said. He cuddled her to his chest some more. “You can play a little bit, but you can’t play with Ya-Ya because you might get her sick. I bet Nana will love to make animals with you while I make you dinner.”

Adriana nodded and slowly crawled out of bed. She pulled her hair into a little ponytail and grabbed her biggest turtle to come with her downstairs. Bucky had already told her that he would have to wash all her plushies once she wasn’t sick anymore. She wasn’t happy about it at all. “Okay, I’ll play with Nana.”
“That’s a pretty ponytail you did there,” he complimented. Steve picked her up and carried her downstairs. “Mom? Would you mind keeping an eye on Adriana in the playroom? She wants something different for dinner and she’s going to play with some clay while she waits.”

Sarah got up and took Adriana from Steve and went to play with her. Bucky was helping the babies finish their sandwiches and eat some grapes. “Babe, is Adriana not eating?” he asked and glanced up at him. “She needs something.”

“She wants noodles and cheese,” Steve answered, giving Bucky an apologetic look. He knew that Bucky wanted to go to bed soon but Steve didn’t have the heart to not make Adriana what she wanted to eat when she was feeling so shitty

Bucky sighed but didn’t argue. He would rather be inconvenienced a little bit so his daughter could eat. And he figured she was allowed to be picky tonight since she was still so uncomfortable. “You’re about to have two little kids and Lilly very upset with you that you didn’t make noodles for them,” he said flatly as a heads-up. Lilly would take pasta over anything else anyway - except pizza.

“I’ll just tell the kids that it’s special pasta only for sick kids and Lilly will have to suck it up. There’ll be enough for leftovers tomorrow,” Steve answered as he returned to the kitchen after Adriana was set up to play. Steve’s patience was wearing thin today and he figured that things didn’t have to be fair all the time. He was allowed to not give everyone everything at least once in a while.

“You think I should try to get the babies to sleep early?” Bucky asked as he trailed after Steve. “I can get their baths done while you cook and then we can tuck them in together. They might go for it. Maybe if I use the good bubbles they will be more willing to have bath time.”

“That’s a great idea,” Steve said. “You’re the best, Buck. That’s why you’re the smart one,” he said with a loving smile. He blocked the food he was cooking so he could keep everything out of the babies’ sight. Steve didn’t want to risk anything. “How close are they to finishing their food?”

Bucky looked back to the table to check on the kids. Sarah May was a mess of crumbs and sticky grapes. And Christopher had taken his sister’s other sandwich half that she wasn’t eating. “I think they are winding down now,” he said and looked back up at Steve, leaning on the counter and touching his hip gently.

“That’s a relief,” Steve sighed. He turned his head to give Bucky a light kiss on the lips. “The night is almost over, Baby, we can relax soon,” he murmured. “And Adriana will be so happy to be able to have something she wants to eat. She’s barely had anything since she got sick.”

---

Bucky was quiet for a second, still thinking of his parents right now. “I’ll take the babies upstairs for a bath,” he muttered absently and pulled away from the counter to get the kids. “Make sure Adriana doesn’t have orange juice. It keeps giving her acid reflux when she goes to sleep.”

---

“Alright,” Steve sighed. He let Bucky go upstairs and he brought Adriana her pasta and a glass of milk. “Here you go, Peanut,” He said softly to her. “Do you want Daddy to get you anything else?” If she was in the mood to eat, Steve would make her damned near anything.

---

Adriana took the bowl and shoved handfuls of food in her mouth as fast as she could. She was getting to feeling better now. “Do we have broccoli?” she asked through a big bite of noodles. “Where’s Papa?”

---

“I can steam some in the microwave for you, Adriana. Give me a few minutes, Alright? Your papa is taking care of your baby brother and sister right now. He’s very tired tonight, but he can still tuck you in before you go to sleep. He’s been worried about you,” he explained.

---

“Can you snuggle tonight?” Adriana pleaded and squeezed her tiny hand on Steve’s and gave him big puppy eyes. “Just until I fall asleep, please?” It was hard on her being so isolated for the past few days and she was wanting some more family time.

---

Steve held her hand gingerly. “Of course, I’ll snuggle you.” He kissed the top of her head. “Let me get your broccoli done. Then we can snuggle all you want. I promise.”

After Adriana finished her dinner, Steve took her to the bathroom to wash up and then spent almost a half hour reading to her and snuggling until she fell asleep at last.

---

By the time all the kids were asleep, Bucky was too tired and grumpy to function. His head hurt and he was cold and sort of felt like he had a fever himself. He took a fast shower while he waited for Steve and was now spread out on the bed in his pajamas just waiting to fall asleep or for Steve to come in.

---

Steve made his way into the bedroom tiredly and slipped into bed so he could wrap his arms around Bucky. “I’m sorry that took so long, Love. Adriana wanted me to stay until she was asleep,” he apologized. He knew Bucky wouldn’t be angry at him for taking care of their sick kid, but he still felt bad for his husband.
Bucky nodded wordlessly. He grazed his fingers up along Steve’s arm and sighed. The day had been too overwhelming and it still felt that way. “It’s okay,” he muttered. There wasn’t much emotion left in him. And he knew tomorrow would be another early morning for him. But all he could do was think about how much he looked like his dad when he put on his uniform.

---

Steve pet his fingers through Bucky’s hair and he looked at him earnestly. He knew that Bucky was feeling pretty shitty, but he also wasn’t sure if he was in a mood for Steve to try and cheer him up. “I’m thinking tomorrow is going to be a better day,” Steve said. “What about you?”

---

“I don’t know,” Bucky said flatly, eyes still closed. “Things have been tough lately. I don’t think it’s going away soon.” He was being too pessimistic and he knew that. But he didn’t have the energy to try to be positive. “At least Ya-Ya is mostly sleeping through the night now. Maybe we won’t have to get up for anyone for a while now.”

---

Steve shook his head. “No. It’s going to go away soon because you’re resilient, I’m stubborn, and there isn’t a damn thing in this world that we can’t do when we work together.” He pressed a kiss firmly to his husband’s lips. “Here’s to hoping that our youngest doesn’t wake us up tonight. Or her brother.”

---

“Or any of the other endless options of things that could keep us from sleep,” Bucky added and gently pushed Steve’s side to get him to turn over. “Roll, Babe. I want to be big spoon now. I need to hold you for a while, please.” He yawned and added, “We should have a day away soon. Something just for us.”

---

Steve smiled warmly and rolled over when Bucky pushed him. He liked it when he was blunt with what he wanted. Steve hummed with approval and pulled Bucky’s arms around him. “What are you thinking? Do you want to do another hotel weekend? Or something different this time?” he asked.

---

“I think that’s too much money out of our budget at the moment,” Bucky said as he nestled himself up against Steve’s back. “We can think of something else. Besides, Valentine’s Day is right around the corner. So, an opportunity might present itself.” He kissed lazily along Steve’s neck and gave a small bite when he was done. “Richard and Tim are going to Vermont for Valentine’s Day. Richard has a friend up there. They are going wine-tasting too.”

---

“We can try calling up the radio station. They give tickets away in all sorts of contests,” Steve suggested. He squirmed a little and smiled at the bite. “Sounds like they have a good Valentine’s day planned. Maybe we can do another upstate trip? We can fuck around in a cabin and not get caught this time.”
Bucky shrugged and let out a tired grunt. “That sounds nice but could we really manage a three-day weekend up there leaving all the kids we have now to your mom?” he asked. He knew he was being kind of a contrarian right now. Every suggestion Steve gave, he knocked right away again. But nothing struck him yet as the perfect idea.

---

Steve initially wanted to give Bucky a snippy comment for being unsupportive of his ideas, but he bit it back. He sighed and brushed his fingers over the back of Bucky’s hand. “Alright... then what’s something you think would work out, given the amount of kids we have?” he asked.

---

“I don’t know,” Bucky sighed. And he knew that was unhelpful too because at least Steve was putting forth some options for them. “I guess I’ll have to think about it. I have some time anyway. Maybe I’ll figure out what Clint and Nat are doing. If they are doing anything. Who knows what’s up with those two.”

---

Steve was glad that he was facing the other way and Bucky couldn’t see the little scowl that came on his face when Bucky didn’t offer any alternative. “Are they okay? It kind of feels like they’re at a stalemate in their relationship and it’s been like that for a little while.”

---

“Yeah, that’s exactly what it is. It’s been about a year of them pretending this issue isn’t going to come between them,” Bucky said. “It’s been a year of Clint ignoring that Natasha isn’t going to change her mind about kids and just doing anything he can to keep her because he doesn’t want this to be over. And Natasha has been doing what she can to keep Clint happy in other ways because she feels bad and doesn’t want to lose him either. They both are putting in so much effort for a relationship that won’t be able to last much longer. They might be better just being friends.”

---

Steve frowned. He knew that Bucky was right, but he loved Clint and Nat. He also loved that they were together and had the ability to make each other happy. It was just a damned shame that this one issue was too big to ignore. “I don’t want them to break up, though. They’re both great people,” he sighed.

---

“Yeah, well, we can’t really control that,” Bucky said, a little noticeable tick of annoyance to his tone. “We just have to wait to see what they decide and then be supportive friends about whatever it is. And if just being friends with each other and finding romantic partners better suited to their goals is what they need, then we will have to be okay with that.”

---

Steve huffed when Bucky used that tone of voice on him. “I know,” he sighed. “That doesn’t mean that I can’t be sad that they’re probably not going to work out.” He gave Bucky’s hand a little squeeze. “Let’s go to sleep, Buck. I don’t think either of us is in a patient mood tonight.”

---
At Steve’s comment, Bucky wanted to snap at him and ask what that was supposed to mean, proving Steve’s statement precisely. But he bit his tongue before he could mess that up. “Yeah...” he mumbled and just pressed closer up behind Steve in a little attempt as an apology. “Night, Baby...”

Chapter End Notes

This is a work in progress and is updated at least once a week.
(UPDATE: There might be a delay on Chapter 23 and the epilogue - once again because of the hectic schedules that were mentioned above. But those chapters will be posted as soon as possible even if it's not in the immediate weeks that they should have been.) --- I will see you all soon! Hopefully, not too long after this.

REPEAT:

I have some news. Due to the intense business of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes in doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV shows will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has any questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Season Six will end on Chapter 23, followed by an epilogue.

It was a bit of a crazy plan, but it was the only one Bucky agreed to, so Steve wasn’t going to complain. Becca was sitting in the living room, watching Steve check over their bags like a chicken without a head. He had to make sure everything was there.

“Camping? In winter? I bet one of you is going to get sick,” she said matter-of-factly.

---

Bucky was in the middle of trying to get the kids all squared away. Christopher wasn’t really understanding why his dads were leaving without them all. “Papa, where?” he asked several times, trying to get Bucky to hold him instead of making Adriana’s bed with the clean sheets he just got from the laundry.

“Bean, how about you go find Nana? She’s with Daddy. Go get Nana, Christopher,” Bucky said, nudging him gently to the door. He had gotten really good at going down the stairs now with someone there to watch. He had just turned two on Monday and he was starting to get the feeling he was a big kid now.

---

Christopher gave Bucky an annoyed look for being brushed off. He stared Bucky down for a moment before making his way down the stairs. Maybe Nana would give him answers. He climbed down the stairs under Bucky’s supervision and then sought her out. “Nana! Nana!” He ran over and tugged at her shirt. “Where Papa go?”

Steve smiled fondly at his little boy as his Mom scooped him into her arms. “Oh, Love. Papa is going out. Nana is taking care of you tonight.”

---

Sarah May was laying on her tummy on the carpet. Diana was next to her and just watching carefully in case she was needed for anything. But Sarah May looked up when her nana said that her dads were leaving. She might not have understood entirely but she read the tone. “No,” she yipped as she pushed herself up to stand again and trot to Steve. “Dada! Up!”

---

Steve looked over and gave an apologetic smile. “Hey, Baby Girl. Don’t worry, Ya-Ya,” he said sweetly. He picked her up and rocked her in his arms. “Your Papa and I will be back,” he promised. “We are going to go camping. One day, we can take you camping, too. But this is a special camping trip for your dads.”

---

“Dada,” she whined, pushing her hand on his chest lightly to make sure he would still pay attention. Bucky came downstairs then with Adriana trailing after him happily. She was looking forward to a weekend with her nana and aunts and siblings. Not that she didn’t love her parents, but Bucky had explained it like she and her little brother and sister would be getting a special treat of just having fun with Nana and playing games and watching movies for two days. “Adriana’s bed is made up now with the clean sheets,” Bucky informed Steve when he popped in the doorway. “No more icky chicken pox sheets.”

---

Steve walked her over to Bucky and gave both him and Adriana a high five. “Alright. It looks like you’re all set to have a weekend with Nana. You’ve got the new book she can read to you, right?”

Steve rubbed Sarah May’s back and cuddled her. “If only Ya-Ya understood she’s going to have a fun time playing with Nana too.”

---

Adriana nodded. “Yes, my new book is upstairs on my bed. And Papa already helped me pick out PJs,” she said. She was kind of ready for them to leave so she could have the parents-free lawless sugar-and-television fest that she assumed this would be.

---

“Perfect.” Steve was glad that Adriana was taking it well even though it made him a little sad that she was totally fine with not seeing them for a few days. Steve was going to miss them all sorely. Steve gave Sarah May over to his mom so, hopefully, she would be decently distracted. “Is there anything else we need before we go?”

---

“I think we’re good,” Bucky said with a happy little grin up at Steve. He was more than pleased to get to go out with Steve on a Valentine’s weekend getaway. “Did you fill Diana’s food bowl? Becca already agreed to take her out to pee when she needs it.”

“Oh! I forgot about Diana!” He ran over to his dog and kissed her face a few times, apologizing for forgetting to feed her. The dog soaked up the attention and snuggled Steve until he broke away to put extra food in her bowl with a treat on top. “Alright. Ready to go,” he said. Steve gave each of their kids a kiss on the cheek goodbye, promising to come back and play extra with them when they returned.

Bucky did the same and made sure to give both of his sisters long hugs even though neither of them were bothered by him leaving for a little under forty-eight hours. Bucky just still had a hard time not being anxious about leaving them, his kids included. “Okay, Baby, let’s go. I want to get a good spot at the campsite in some trees. That’ll be warmer.” They had a bunch of blankets and an insulated tent, but he still wanted to be sure.

“I don’t think there’ll be too many people looking to camp in February. But it gives me more of an excuse to cuddle to keep you warm.” Steve gave Bucky’s ass a playful swat before trotting off. Diana gave him the usual sad look she gave whenever Steve didn’t take her out with him. “You want me to do the driving?”

“Yeah, yeah. I can’t do it still,” Bucky said and took Steve’s bag from him. He had been trying to do some driving practice when he could. But it was kind of stressful to him and it wasn’t going that well. “At least it isn’t snowing right now. And I watched the weather earlier and it didn’t seem like we are getting snow until Tuesday.”

“That’s good.” Steve loaded their things into the car and paused to run his hand through Bucky’s hair. “It’ll be nice. Just the two of us for once. Who knows when we’ll have this sort of privacy again.”

Bucky hummed happily and squeezed Steve’s arm. A weekend alone in a tent with Steve was all he needed right now. “I don’t know. I think we’re busier than ever right now. We need to make the most of this in case we don’t get another for a long while.”

Steve got into the car and turned it on, eager to get the heat up to warm them both. He rubbed his hands together to shake off the cold. “I packed your acoustic so you can serenade me all weekend long,” he said.

“Oh, did you?” Bucky mused and put his hand on Steve’s thigh. “Because all that cold will mean tuning the guitar pretty much between each song, Babe.” He chuckled to himself and sighed. “I love
“It’s probably to do with therapy. None of the therapists I’ve been trying have been working out. And I know you’re not the biggest fan of him, but I figured it was better than nothing.” Steve placed his hand over Bucky’s. “I wonder if he’s going to do one of those cheesy Valentine’s Day proposals.”

Bucky sighed and looked out the window for a second and then back to Steve. “It wouldn’t be a cheesy proposal, that actually sounds like a really amazing date. If he is proposing, he chose well,” he said first and then entwined his fingers with Steve’s. “It’s not that I don’t like him. I think we got off on the wrong foot. But I also think he and I are just like... not compatible as friends or something. It’s literally nothing wrong with him or anything he does. I don’t know, maybe I’m jealous. Because it feels like he knows a lot more about some of your deep thoughts and feelings than I do. And I get it if you don’t want to necessarily make your husband into your therapist, but it just sort of hurts that I can’t be that but your close friend can. You know?”

Steve sunk back in his seat a bit. “I don’t like over-analyzing things. I don’t want to feel like you’re analyzing my feelings or how you might interpret things I do. I’d rather not talk to anyone at all, to be honest. But you want me to do therapy.”

Bucky really didn’t think it was healthy for Steve to never want to talk about this to anyone at all. But it was Valentine’s weekend and they were headed to camp out together, so he decided not to engage in this anymore. It would only lead to a bigger argument like it always did and they could do that some other time. “Okay, Yeah. I understand. Just because I do something my way, doesn’t mean I should try to get you to do it the same way. You know what you need.”

Steve sighed and looked out the side window. He knew Bucky was only saying that to avoid a fight. “Do you genuinely think Sam might be proposing tonight? I kind of said it as a joke, but they have been pretty close and they’ve been dating for longer than we did before we got engaged.”

“He might, yeah,” Bucky replied, hoping that Steve wasn’t wise to the fact that he was hoping to redirect them. But he knew Steve knew him too well. “From what I can tell, they fit together nicely. They are both really intelligent and accomplished. And I feel like Sam needs someone who he can relax and laugh with and have deep discussions with too. You know, unlike Clint who is just a goof and sassy and needs someone who is chill and sometimes a little wild like him.”

Steve gave a dramatic sigh when Bucky brought up Clint. “Which is why Natasha would’ve been so perfect for him if it weren’t for the whole kids thing. I don’t know what I would’ve done if you didn’t want kids. I’m pretty sure I still would’ve married you. But I would’ve been sad about not being a dad.”

---

Bucky knew that was probably really true. For one thing, when they were first together, they weren’t sure they would ever be allowed to have kids. It was more miracles from Steve’s god or perfect timing from the universe that gave them the kids they had now. And even if they never had babies of their own, his sisters were young enough when Steve came around that they probably felt enough like stepchildren to him or something. “I understand. I think it’s just different from couple to couple. And I know Clint. I’ve known him for a long time. He’s not good with compromising sometimes. And with something like this, it’s pretty big. It’s not like giving up half a sandwich to me because I forgot my lunch that day. It’s... being a dad or not.”

---

“It is a big thing,” Steve agreed. That didn’t mean that he wasn’t still sad about the unavoidable end to their friends’ relationship. They got about halfway to the campground before it started to snow and Steve groaned. “I always hated the snow when I was an officer. I’m a careful driver, but I always would worry about getting into a chase during bad weather.”

---

Bucky glared out the window at the snow and grumbled. He was hoping it would hold off for a bit. But the day was still pretty young. They might get lucky and have the sun show up again. “Do you think we should teach the kids to drive? And by ‘we’, I mean you because I don’t have a handle on it yet. It might be good for them, especially if anyone goes off to college somewhere else that they will need a car. I think Becca is staying in the city so, she doesn’t need her license yet. But we might get a jump on things with Lilly now.”

---

“I think we should,” Steve said. “Becca should learn how to drive, even if she’s staying in the city. It’s an important skill to have. And, not to be morbid, but if some sort of attack happens, she should be able to know a way out of here other than public transport because that would be a madhouse.” He shrugged his shoulders. “I’d be happy to teach all of them.”

---

Bucky looked over to Steve with a spike of anxiety through him. He had already had a hard enough time agreeing to try to learn to drive himself. After his parents’ deaths, cars still never felt entirely safe. And he figured convincing his sisters to learn to drive would take some time too but now he was worried about not only car wrecks but some other disaster. “Okay... yeah. Sure...” he said, hoping he didn’t seem too nervous.

---

Steve saw the expression on Bucky’s face and heard it in his voice. “I’m sorry,” he apologized. “On the force, we’re kind of trained to assume the worst and prepare for it objectively. Even if there is some sort of attack, the chances of us being directly affected by it are still pretty low.”

---

“Mm-hmm,” Bucky hummed in answer. That didn’t really take into consideration all the other things that could happen. There could be a disaster and then on their way out of the city, they could get into a car wreck or fall into a ditch. Or they could just have a car wreck any day just like his parents had. It wasn’t recklessness or a crisis. It was just another day coming home at night. The car suddenly felt very tiny and fragile and Bucky couldn’t help but worry, like he had so many times, that he and Steve would die the same way his parents had. They would go and leave behind his sisters again and all three of their children.

---

Steve blindly found Bucky’s hand again to lace their fingers together. “I know you’re worried, Babe. But everything is going to be okay. I’ll make sure of it. Our family is going to be safe and well-prepared. I understand why you’re nervous and I’m not asking you to stop being nervous. But I do want you to know is that I’m going to make sure that everything will be okay.”

---

Bucky closed his eyes and just paid attention to his breathing so he wouldn’t start to cry or panic. He didn’t want to do that on their Valentine’s weekend. “I know. I trust you...” he whispered and squeezed Steve’s hand. “I trust you. I know. It’ll all be okay. Nothing is going to happen to us or our babies.”

---

Steve brought Bucky’s hand up so he could kiss the back of it. “We are going to grow old together and our kids will, too. Becca will get mostly old but then die a slightly too young at the age of seventy because she had a heart attack over someone bending the pages of a library book,” he joked.

---

“Oh, god. That’s probably going to happen,” Bucky agreed with an exaggerated huff. “And Lilly will outlive us all because that kid has resistance to everything, it seems.” He shook his head and laughed softly. “Sorry I got worked up. I just got thinking about it all too much at once. I’m okay.”

---

“She’s going to be a hundred-years-old,” he chuckled. Steve gave Bucky’s hand an affectionate squeeze. “I’m glad you’re okay. I was starting to get worried there. If you were still worked up, I’d have to give you a blow job and it’s so cold that I don't know if I’d turn into the Christmas Story kid who got his tongue stuck to the pole.”

---

“Oh, my god,” Bucky giggled. “For once, my dick isn’t cold. Giving me a blowjob might actually warm you up. I think it’s just about the warmest part of my body right now.” He took his hand away from Steve’s for a moment to pull his hair from its ponytail. “When was the last time I got a blowjob? Like seven years now?” He was joking, of course. It was more like seven days.

---

“Please. Your dick and my mouth have a date together at least once a week,” Steve said with a dismissive wave. “I blow you more than any of your coworkers get head, that’s for sure.” he pulled into the parking lot of the campgrounds and made a little pout as he realized he was going to have to go from the warm car into the cold air.

---
Steve was probably spot on with that. Considering he knew for a fact that Richard wasn’t much of a fan of sucking cock even though he really liked when Tim did it for him. And Reggie didn’t like getting head because mouths freaked him out. And Natasha and Clint were always trading off their balance of who was doing what. And Bucky and Steve just happen to be lucky enough that they both loved giving and receiving. “If your mouth wants my dick after we set up the tent, it can have it.”

---

“Please. We’re going to be camping all weekend and we won’t have our radio and television. We’re going to need all the distractions we can get, including your dick in my mouth,” Steve said smartly. He shivered as he opened the door and hurried to get the tent out of the back. “Holy smokes, it’s really cold! Let’s get this tent up as soon as possible.”

---

Bucky helped pull their stuff from the car and tugged the tent out of the bag. It didn’t take much time for him to get the tent up. He was well practiced in that by now. And he even let Steve help regardless of the fact that he would have to fix Steve’s stakes when he wasn’t looking because he never grounded them right.

---

Steve stood proudly at the entrance of the tent with his hands on his hips as he stared at their work. “I’m pretty sure this is the best I’ve done,” he said. “I didn’t leave any stakes too high in the ground this time.” Steve was utterly oblivious to Bucky fixing his errors. “Let’s get everything inside.”

---

“Of course, Baby. You did great,” Bucky said, giving him a quick kiss on his cheek because they were the only ones at the campground as far as they could see. “Get in. I’ll pass stuff inside.” He waited for Steve to shuffled into the tent and then he grabbed their big sleeping bag and handed it to him first.

---

Steve shuddered at the sudden change in temperature now that he didn’t have to deal with snow and wind. He was quick to organize everything as Bucky passed it in. “This weekend is going to be great, Buck. When was the last time we got some peace and quiet?”

---

“I don’t know. But it was definitely sometime early in 1986. Because I don’t think we’ve really had time to ourselves since my birthday. With the concert and everything,” he said, finally scooting into the tent with the bag of snacks they brought.

---

“How bad is it that we don’t say ‘last week’ or ‘yesterday’ but we say it’s a year in which we last had quiet time,” Steve laughed. He tugged Bucky over by his hand and reeled him in for a proper kiss. “So, what snacks did you bring for us, Gorgeous? Did you pack the crackers that I like?” he asked.
Bucky unzipped the bag and rummaged around for Steve’s crackers. It had taken him so long to figure out which box to buy and which not to buy. The brand just didn’t make enough changes to the boxes per flavor. “Here, Baby. Like I would forget these.”

---

Steve happily took them and opened them up. “You’re the best,” he said. He nibbled on one of them and gave Bucky absolute doe eyes. “I thought I’d be sad about being away from the babies. And I am, but I’m actually pretty fucking excited to have it be just the two of us.”

---

“We can have a weekend away from our kids and still absolutely miss them and love them,” Bucky agreed. He pushed Steve’s arm up so he could wiggle underneath and rest his head on his Steve’s chest. He wrapped his arms around him and sighed contentedly. “Even just getting some peace and quiet to cuddle you for a while without worrying someone will come interrupt is nice.”

---

Steve grinned as Bucky snuggled underneath his arm and he leaned down to give him a kiss. “Yeah,” he said. “Are you warm enough in here, Baby? Or do you want me to turn on the space heater?” he asked. He rubbed a hand up and down Bucky’s back.

---

“I’m good for now. I think we should wait until it’s dark to turn it on for a bit. Besides, we have blankets we haven’t gotten out yet and your body is definitely warm. And if I fuck you tonight before we sleep, that’ll get us all sweaty too,” Bucky said, grinning up at him at the mention of sex.

---

Steve blushed but looked very interested in the promised activities later. He hummed with approval and nodded his head. “Sounds like a plan, Buck. You’re the one with the camping experience.” He winked. “We got to turn the lights off, though, or else we will cast a shadow.”

---

“You don’t want our shadows showing how good I can ruin you tonight?” Bucky asked, giggling a little. “Wanna get you on your knees, ass up for me. And I’ll fuck you so nice and deep and kiss all along your shoulders. How’s that sound, Love? Want your ass full of my come tonight? I can eat you out after, if you want. I got to make the most of our alone time.”

---

“Quit that. I don’t want to risk anyone seeing if they happen to pass by,” Steve chuckled, swatting Bucky’s arm. “I want everything else you’re talking about. I’d be a fool if I wasn’t on board for having you balls deep in my ass.” He put aside his crackers. “So, what are we going to do until then, Buck? You got any plans to get me in the mood?”

---

Bucky hummed and kissed Steve’s neck. “It’s not quite like we can do the same things we have at hotels. We don’t have a hot tub or room service. What I wouldn’t give for a warm bath right now...” he loved camping but winter camping had fewer options for them.
“Don’t you go talking about hot tubs when we are five minutes into our weekend of camping in freezing weather,” he scolded. Steve nudged Bucky to lay back and he moved over him so he could kiss along his jaw. “I can keep you warmer than any hot tub.”

---

Bucky chuckled and pulled his arms up over his head, just watching Steve. “Gonna keep me warm, huh? Is this that aforementioned blow job you wanted to give me?” He knew he sounded a little self-important and annoying but he just loved Steve’s mouth on his cock.

---

“That’s the plan, Champ,” he said. Steve’s hand moved down Bucky’s chest and he gave a possessive growl as he nipped Bucky’s lower lip. “I’m doing this thing called ‘foreplay’. It’s meant to get you in the mood or something like that,” he joked.

---

“Oh, oh. I’m sorry, that’s what you’re doing. Go ahead with your foreplay.” Bucky teased back and played with the ends of his hair. “Kind of forgot what ‘foreplay’ even was. Every time we’ve had sex the past few months has just been a ‘get-in, get-out before anyone knocks on the door’ sort of situation.”

---

“I know. The best foreplay I got all month was ‘wanna get one in quick before the kids wake up?’,” he chuckled. Steve slid his hand lower and lower until it got to Bucky’s belt. He undid it and started to work on his zipper. “It can be just like when we first started dating. We have all the time in the world.”

---

Bucky moaned quietly as Steve undid the front of his pants. His cock was already waking up for Steve and waiting patiently to get out in the open. “To be fair, though, that morning I did suck a hickey on your thigh before we got started. That counts, right?”

---

Steve didn’t push Bucky’s pants off yet. Instead, he pushed his hand down past his waistband and started to Palm at his husband’s cock. “You did,” he agreed. “My point still stands.” Steve grinned down at Bucky with a loving smile before he brought their lips together for a deep kiss.

---

The kiss helped but the light touches didn’t. Bucky wanted more and he whined against Steve’s lips. He couldn’t quite stop himself from pushing his hips up to press closer to Steve and grind slowly. “Baby, come on...” he whispered. “We have time for teasing later.”

---

“We have time for teasing now,” Steve pointed out, giving a few more kisses as he massaged his palm against Bucky’s dick. “And we have time later. And tomorrow. And tomorrow evening...” He did end up giving Bucky some relief as he started to undress him slowly.
Bucky exhaled softly and moved his hips up a little so Steve could get his pants tugged down a little. “I know. But I just love having you on me. And I’m feeling a little impatient.” He reached down and brushed his thumb across Steve’s cheek. “You’re so handsome.”

Steve removed Bucky’s shoes so he could pull his pants off all the way. He also grabbed the blanket to throw over the both of them so he wouldn’t get cold. “I’m not as handsome as you are,” he said. Steve shimmed down lower and pulled Bucky’s boxers down so he could give little licks to the length of Bucky’s cock.

Bucky was going to protest that Steve was saying some nonsense. But then his tongue was on him and he forgot whatever it was he was going to say about it. “Wow, yes, thank you, Steve,” Bucky whispered, hand going to Steve’s hair to grip on. “More please?”

Steve obliged and he slowly took Bucky’s cock into his mouth, steadily sinking lower and lower until he was swallowing it down all the way. He moaned when Bucky’s dick rubbed against the back of his throat. He stayed there for a few moments before hollowing his cheeks and starting an unrushed rhythm.

Bucky gave an embarrassing moan that sounded too desperate to be dignified. But he knew Steve wouldn’t mind at all. He also felt a rush of heat go down his body and the cold winter didn’t feel so bad anymore. “Fuck... Baby...” he whispered. His eyes fluttered and his mouth just hung open. Steve always made him speechless.

Steve loved the sounds that were coming out of his husband’s mouth. He reached up to tease one of Bucky’s nipples, rolling it between his thumb and index finger as his head bobbed on Bucky’s dick. He loved the taste of Bucky’s dick. It was nice and thick on his tongue.

If Bucky could memorize an image and keep it forever, it would be this. His perfect, amazing, loving, sexy husband laying down by his legs, sucking dick like he wanted to do nothing else, and a hand up Bucky’s shirt to tease him where he knows it gets him the most. “You are so good to me,” he said, even though he knew he had said it countless times before and probably would a million times more in his life.

Steve was proud of how far he had come along with sex with Bucky. It felt pretty perfect that Bucky was the only one he had ever been so intimate with, so everything he learned was thanks to this man. And he learned all of his preferences and the little things that made his toes curl. He let out a possessive growl as he let the flat of his tongue drag along the underside of Bucky’s dick.
Bucky shook his head and reached down to grip Steve’s arm. He couldn’t explain just how much he loved it when Steve growled like that. And it didn’t come around that often so he had to savor it. “I’m much closer than I would like to be,” he warned gently. He would have preferred to keep going for a bit longer but it was hard when he kept looking down and seeing Steve like that and hearing him too.

---

Steve dragged his nails down Steve’s front and he cupped Bucky’s balls. They had all weekend to enjoy each other even if Bucky was quick this time. Steve moaned and looked up at Bucky through his lashes, trying to look as seductive as possible as he worked his mouth hungrily over Bucky’s dick.

---

Bucky hissed in a tight gasp through his teeth and tried to settle himself down before he came, but it was no use. His hands clenched in their blanket as he shot hot, quick streams of come down in Steve’s mouth without much warning. “Fuck, Steve, Steve, Babe...” he mumbled, eyes rolling closed and head thumping back.

---

Steve swallowed Bucky down eagerly, almost choking at the first spurt, but quickly recovering and taking the rest. As he pulled back, panting, he wiped his lips and gave Bucky a satisfied smile. “You look so good like that.”

---

“Get up here and kiss me,” Bucky demanded lightly. He reached out for Steve and pulled him in close and tight to him. “Very good start to Valentine’s, I think. You are my favorite man, Steve. You’re so beautiful and lovable and you’re mine.”

---

Steve happily moved over Bucky and laid a few kisses on him. “I better be your favorite man. I just sucked your dick good. What other dude will suck your dick any day, any time?” he said with a silly grin. “Nobody but me.”

---

“Nobody but you,” Bucky agreed with a chuckle. “You have no idea what a blessing is it to be your husband.” He scratched his fingers over Steve’s hair again and smiled. “Baby, your god really knew what he was doing to put us together, didn’t he?” Bucky had gotten a lot better about acknowledging Steve’s spirituality. Around the start of their first Hanukkah with Sarah May and the others, Bucky had a talk with Father Frank about helping him find a synagogue. And he stressed the importance, especially in a two-faith household, of Bucky being mindful of showing he was paying attention to the spiritualities of everyone.

---

Steve snuggled up to Bucky and latched on to him like a bear. He absently kissed along his jaw, taking his time in loving every inch of his husband. “I know he made us for each other,” he said. “And he made us wait so long to meet so we would appreciate each other and how much we would lose if we didn’t take care of one another. Because we lived too long without knowing what each of us could have.”
“I’m so grateful for you,” Bucky answered warmly, looking down at Steve and sighing happily. “And I would marry you again right now. And one day, when we can marry each other by law, I’m dragging your cute butt up the aisle.” He wondered when that would be. He hoped it would be soon.

“I really hope we can marry each other legally one day. I want to have our kids see us walk down the aisle together and not have to worry about some ass raining on our parade,” he said. “I wonder how much longer it’ll take for us to be able to do that.”

Bucky touched Steve’s lips again and then gave him a little kiss. “It’ll be sooner than we think,” he assured him, even though he didn’t know. “And by then, we might have four more kids. And Sarah May might be in college. Or it could be next year. Who knows. We will get there. You, me, and our family.”

“I don’t want our kids to be that old when it happens,” he pouted. Steve nipped at Bucky’s fingertip playfully. “I want Mom to be there and she may not make it all the way until they’re in college.” Steve nuzzled Bucky’s neck lovingly. “Make it happen tomorrow, Buck.”

“Steve, Baby, your mom is a tough bird. She’s going to outlive the sun,” Bucky joked back, but he kind of wondered if it was true. “Maybe Becca will become a politician or something. And she can be in Congress and make everything better. She would be good at that job. And she can be terrifying so all the dumb old men would have to listen to her, right?”

“I hope she does. I want my mom to be around us forever.” Having her move in was probably the best thing for Steve. And for her. The two of them really had a great relationship, even though Steve still was pathetically a mama’s boy. “Has Becca picked a major yet? Is it too late for us to bully her into picking politics?”

“I don’t think bullying someone into politics is quite the right way to do it, Babe,” Bucky giggled. “But I’m sure she’s already thinking about a major. The problem is, she likes so many things. She could do English, history, science, politics, ethics, anything really.”

“She can do anything, but what she’s going to do is politics. Because I said so, and we all know that if Becca is going to do anything, it’s going to be what a man tells her to do,” Steve snickered. “They’ve both grown up so much. Well, Becca more than Lilly.”

“Yes, and not just any man, her brother-in-law. That’s exactly who Becca wants telling her what to do with her life.” Becca would sooner push Steve off a cliff. “Lilly has grown up in some ways. I think she’s getting better at school. She’s learning that she needs to balance academics and sports a bit better. You know? That’s improvement. And she’s been sharing better.”

---

“Lilly is still a doofus, though. Sometimes I wonder how she hasn’t burned the house down. Now that I think about it, I’m not sure if it’s such a great idea to teach her how to drive,” Steve joked.

---

Bucky grunted and flicked Steve’s arm. “That’s not a good joke, Steven,” he said seriously but with an uptick to his voice so Steve knew he wasn’t angry but he thought his comedy could use some work. And Bucky hardly ever pulled out a ‘Steven’ and never when he was actually upset with him, more good-naturedly exasperated. “Besides, I think Lilly would be the best at driving out of the three of us. She can concentrate and not get nervous on the field so I would think she could apply that to driving too.”

---

“She is pretty determined. Out of all of us, she’s the only one who’s still in competitive sports, so she’s used to having to make plenty of decisions on the fly.” He shrugged his shoulders. “She’s still pretty hell-bent on that camp, by the way.”

---

“I don’t think we can pay for it, Baby. What do you think? She’s really good at other sports already, she doesn’t need that camp. She can just play some softball with her friends here.” Bucky really wasn’t sure they could manage that camp right now.

---

“I don’t think we can, either. But she’s really trying to guilt me into changing my mind.” Steve typically was the bigger pushover with these kinds of things. “I’ve been trying to find jobs for her so she could have the opportunity to make the money to pay for it.”

---

Bucky scoffed. “Yeah, sure. And how much of her money do you think would actually go to something like that? She would spend it at the arcade or on snacks we won’t buy. Or more baseball cards or something.”

---

“Well, it’s worth a shot,” Steve said with a shrug. “She’s got to learn skills with her money at some point.” He gave Bucky’s hair a little tug. “Hopefully sooner than later.” But even if she blew all of her money away on junk, at least it was less for them to hear her begging them to buy.

---

Steve did have a point. Bucky just figured it would take years for Lilly to get responsible about money. Hell, it took himself until he was suddenly a guardian to get real with his money. And now that felt like ages ago. This summer, it would be seven years since his parents died. “You have a point, Baby. I’m sorry. We should help her find a job.”
“I always have a point,” he teased, puffing out his chest. “I mean, we don’t have to find a job for her. But I don’t see the harm in looking whenever we have a couple minutes to spare. If Lilly won’t pick up the job, then maybe Becca would and we know that the money would get put to good use on that end.”

Bucky kissed Steve’s head again. “You’re the best brother-in-law-guardian they could ever ask for. And you are the cutest, sexiest, funniest, kindest husband I could ever ask for. And with that in mind, I want us to go back to us things now. It’s our weekend. A romantic weekend. We can complain about Lilly’s spending habits when we get home.”

Steve laughed and gave Bucky a big hug. “You’re right. I definitely don’t want to be talking about your sisters in between the bouts of sex we’re having.” He gave Bucky a flirty wink. “Do you want to play strip poker? You’ll probably win, but at least it’s something fun we can do.”

“Can you really play poker, strip or otherwise, with two people?” Bucky asked quizzically. He sat up and grabbed their deck of cards. “We can play strip Go Fish or something?” he asked, nudging Steve’s leg with his leg with a happy little smile.

“I have no clue. I don’t play gambling games,” Steve said with a wave of his hand. He kissed Bucky’s cheek and said, “We can play strip Go Fish. I don’t care what card game it is so long as at least one of us ends up naked,” he remarked.

Bucky chuckled and opened their food bag again to get sandwiches. “We will end up naked one way or another,” Bucky assured him. “You want the ham and cheese or the turkey and avocado? There’s mayonnaise and tomato on both and your mom made me pack mustard even though I don’t think either of us like mustard on sandwiches?”

“Can I have the avocado?” he asked. Steve shook his head with a smile. “My Dad used to like mustard on his sandwiches. Somehow I’ve managed to keep up for nearly thirty years that I like it too because she said once that it reminded her of when she made lunches for him.”

Steve was a very dedicated guy when it came to keeping up something that made his family happy. He did a few things like that with his mom and a couple times he kept his true feelings hidden so no one got upset. It was admirable even if Bucky would have preferred the transparent route about things. But he was still impressed. “She hardly talks about him. I think I’ve heard a handful of stories about your dad from her. But most of them had to do with you as a child too.”
Steve shrugged. “I don’t really know all that much about him. She gets so wistful whenever he’s brought up that I’ve always been hesitant to ask. She only seems okay talking about him when she’s the one bringing him up in conversation,” he said. “I used to sneak into her keepsake boxes to try and find stuff out about him.”

---

“What did you learn from the boxes?” Bucky asked softly, touching Steve’s thigh reassuringly and then tearing into his sandwich. “I’d like to know more about both of your parents. You know a lot about mine, but Sarah is so closed off. It like she thinks it’s protecting everyone else if she doesn’t talk about herself and her own pain that much.”

---

“I found a few love letters they wrote to each other when they first met,” Steve said. “He was stationed in her town and she was training as a nurse at the base since it was an easy way for her to get experience at the time.” He smiled. “His family was from Northern Ireland. Caused lots of trouble and my mom’s family didn’t like them or him that much because of it.” He ate some more of his sandwich. “Me and my mom are alike. We don’t like talking about things that upset us.”

---

Already, that was so much more about Steve’s parents as a couple than Bucky felt he knew about them before. He wanted to keep talking about it but he knew Steve was right. Rogers’ didn’t like to discuss anything potentially painful - even if Barnes’ did. “We don’t have to talk about your parents if you don’t want to. We can just finish our sandwiches and play our card game? I don’t want you getting quiet and bummed with me on our Valentine’s.”

---

“I mean... it doesn’t bother me that much. I don’t really have any memories of him because I was so young when he passed. The only thing that bothers me is that I never got to know him, but it’s not like I... miss him, I guess. I don’t have any memories to miss,” he explained. It was his mom that hurt more. “We can play in a little bit. I feel weird stripping right after talking about my dad.”

---

Bucky chuckled, just letting them both move on from a heavy discussion to having more fun instead. “Okay, yeah, I understand that entirely. I was with this guy once - we were probably just eighteen or so. And we were drunk and I had some coke in my system already. And he had the guts to tell me, as I was taking off my underwear, that he thought my dad was sexy. Why would someone do that? And I was too messed up to think it through logically so I slapped him and then cried. Because that’s how you handle things as an intoxicated teenager.”

---

Steve made a face because he couldn’t imagine talking about someone’s dad if he were about to have sex with them. “What an ass,” he said. “Well, rest assured, that I only find you attractive,” he promised.

---

“Thank you, Baby. I appreciate it,” Bucky said with a little smirk and a nudge to his leg again. “Love you so much. And I guess it’s a good thing I ended up looking so much like my dad after getting through my early twenties. Early twenties Bucky just looked sick and sad for a long time.
Probably not the most handsome thing in the world."

---

Steve finished up his sandwich before returning to cuddling Bucky with both arms. “I still would have loved every inch of you,” he swore. And he meant it. Steve had been through some rough times with Bucky and he was confident that he would’ve been able to stick with Bucky even during his worst moments.

---

Bucky kissed Steve’s hair and finished his sandwich as well. He thought Steve was probably right. They had stuck together through a lot already in their almost three years of being a couple. Steve probably would have been able to handle Bucky at worse times too. But Bucky was so glad Steve didn’t have to. Dealing with his alcoholism was enough. Bucky didn’t want to think what sort of emotional toll it would have taken for Steve to see him through his cocaine addiction too. “Sandwich is done. Game time. Get ready to get naked, Stevie.”

---

“I’m not going to get naked yet. We’re playing Go Fish. That’s a game of luck more than poker is, so I don’t have to worry about my face giving things away,” he said. Steve made himself comfortable and crossed his legs as he waited like a damned prince for Bucky to get the deck of cards open.

---

Bucky hummed in response. “Well, you could be a good sport and lose on purpose so I get you naked faster. I think that sounds fun.” He shuffled the deck and divided out the piles. “I brought lots of chocolate, too. And a sparkling grape juice thing. So, we can have a little romantic toast later.”

---

“Nah. You’re going to have to work for it, Babe. It’s rare that I win any card games and I’ll be damned if I don’t give you a run for your money on this one.” He reached out and gave a lock of Bucky’s hair a playful tug. “And look at you planning ahead and making us fancy. Nothing like a romantic toast in the middle of the woods.”

---

Bucky chuckled and leaned forward to kiss Steve. “Nothing like a toast in the woods,” he agreed. “Okay, Love, focus up. Prepare to lose miserably at Go Fish. I know when to hold ‘em and fold ‘em. And I do realize that song is about poker, but I like to think Kenny Rogers plays Go Fish on occasion. So, I think it applies.”

---

“Now that’s in my head,” Steve complained and hummed The Gambler. He sang it any time Bucky asked for a card that he didn’t have, and despite him talking the big talk, he still managed to be the one stripped down to almost nothing a few minutes later.

---

Bucky watched as Steve removed his last undershirt layer so he was just in underwear and socks now. “Huh... didn’t you say this game was more chance than strategy? I wonder what kind of bad luck you’ve had tonight to get this far with only taking two pairs and getting just my jacket.”

“Yeah, the luck is in your favor, you jerk,” Steve complained, pouting at his husband. He put his cards down and pounced on Bucky suddenly to pin him down. “I think it’s time that I start tipping the scale in my favor. I need to check and make sure you don’t have any cards hidden up your sleeves.”

Bucky yelped in surprise but made room to let Steve cover over him. “Steve, Babe, this is most certainly cheating. I have no cards hidden anywhere. You can check. I just think the Go Fish fairy knew I needed this one.” He giggled and kissed Steve when his face was close. He was so enamored by this big goofball of a husband. He was so cute. Sometimes Bucky forgot how downright adorable Steve was. But he was always reminded eventually.

“It’s not cheating. This is ensuring that we’re having a fair game.” Steve didn’t genuinely think Bucky was cheating, but that didn’t stop him from playfully shoving his hands up the sleeves of Bucky’s shirt so he could tickle under his arms. “Let’s see, do we have any cards under here.”

Bucky giggled wildly and his body tried to curl up in itself under Steve. He was so ticklish and Steve had been employing that tactic since the beginning of their relationship. “Fuck, Steve, no!” Bucky gasped between laughing and trying to grab Steve’s hands. Steve wasn’t ticklish like him and he really thought this was a dirty move on Steve’s part. “Baby, no tickling.” He giggled sharply again and scrunched his eyes shut.

Steve didn’t like exploiting Bucky’s tickle spots too much but once in a blue moon, he had to be at least a little bit of a prick. He leaned in to kiss Bucky deeply, smiling against his lips as he let Bucky move his hands away. “Yes, tickling,” he said. “It’s the only way I can keep you honest. Without the threat of tickling, you can be cheating at games all day.”

Bucky took a second to catch his breath after the gasping and giggling. “You... are an ass,” he panted as he pulled Steve down close again for another hot slow kiss. “I wasn’t cheating,” he added between more kisses and moving his hand around to cup Steve’s ass in his underwear.

“Let me be the judge of that. I used to be an officer of the law, you see.” He gave Bucky a pat down that was interrupted by another kiss. He moaned against his lips and calmed down his silliness as Bucky held his ass. “It seems your story checks out,” Steve confirmed. “You’re free to go.”

Bucky squeezed Steve’s ass and whined. “But I don’t want to go yet. You’re too sexy to let out of my grasp.” He kissed Steve’s neck and then bit down on him too. He really liked biting Steve lately. He always did it a little but, for the past few weeks, he was biting him a lot more. Not harshly every time. Sometimes he could just come up behind him when he was making dinner and give a tiny nip on his neck as a greeting. It was probably a little ridiculous.

---

Steve jumped a little at the bite and felt his face flush. He would’ve gotten annoyed at the more frequent biting if he didn’t enjoy it so much, but he was also a little embarrassed how much he liked Bucky doing it. He pressed his body flush against Bucky’s, a little needy at this point for attention. “Well, with what you’re doing to me, you’re more than welcome to stay.”

---

There was a little rush of wind that rattled the fabric of the tent and sent a shiver over Bucky’s skin. He had a feeling that, once they were asleep, he was really going to regret this idea to go to the campground in February. “Baby, I love you so much,” Bucky whispered and gingerly touched Steve’s lower back for a moment before slipping his hands in Steve’s underwear and pulling them down. “But now I really, really need to be inside you,” he added, with a lower, more desperate tone. “I want to fuck you so well. Want you on your knees and want to be buried in your ass. Showing you how much I need you. Giving you whatever you want.”

---

Steve bit his bottom lip in anticipation. It was so sexy when Bucky was open and needy. He loved it when Bucky told him exactly what he wanted, especially if it was sex. “I want that too,” he said. “I want it rough tonight, Bucky,” he said, dragging his nails down his chest. “And then I want you to take care of me after. Cuddle me and be extra sweet on me.”

---

“I can give you all of that,” Bucky readily agreed. He massaged his hands over Steve’s asscheeks and looked up at him with a soft smile. “After we fuck, we can have our sparkling grape juice and then chocolate and we can fall asleep together. How’s that sound?” He reached one hand over to his bag and he rummaged around for lube before successfully finding the bottle he brought.

---

Steve moaned with approval. “Yes. All of that,” he said eagerly. He rolled his hips forward, making sure that Bucky could feel how hard he was already and how much he wanted Bucky to follow through with each promise for the evening. He kissed Bucky deeply, ending it with a harsh bite to his bottom lip. “You want me to stay like this?”

---

Bucky growled softly at the bite and nipped Steve’s neck again in return. “I want you like this for now. I’m going to watch your face while I finger you, okay?” He poured some lube out on one finger and poked at Steve’s hole. “Want you to try to talk to me. Tell me how much you love me. Tell me how cute I am or something. Something romantic and gross.”

---

Steve nodded and made a needy sound when he felt Bucky’s finger press at his hole. “I love every goddamned thing about you, Babe. Sometimes I get so overwhelmed by all of the responsibilities of owning a home and being a dad, but, god, the fact that we can still run away for a weekend and fuck like rabbits because we can - it makes me so happy to know we’re not grumpy old men yet.”
Bucky giggled and pushed one lubed finger inside Steve slowly. “We will be grumpy old men eventually. And you’ll miss how young and hot I am right now.” He hummed as he started to fuck his finger in and out of Steve as smoothly as possible from this angle.

“You’ll still be young and hot. You haven’t aged a day since I met you.” Steve rutted slowly up against Bucky’s body. “You’re going to be this gorgeous forever. I can see it now,” he murmured.

“I feel younger with you. I mean, I’ve matured a lot over our relationship. But I also feel so much more youthful energy now that I’m focused on you and our family and not self-medicating or drinking,” Bucky kissed the side of Steve’s face and gave him another finger. “You’re the reason I don’t get older.”

“Mentally, you’re an old man now. Physically, you’re even more gorgeous than the day I met you. And god, were you amazing back then.” He kissed Bucky’s neck messily. “Back in the old apartment, daring to invite me out on a date before I knew for sure that it was a date.”

“I miss that apartment sometimes,” Bucky mused. “Not because it’s better than being in our house now. But it was a good home for us for a long time. My sisters and I grieved our parents and grandmother in that apartment. We did a lot of growing up. Becca threw things against the walls of that apartment. Lilly almost broke the ceiling fan trying to string Christmas lights from it. Christopher took his first steps there. You proposed to me there.”

Steve felt his heart ache a little. He missed it, too. He missed the small living room and the room he hid Christopher in until Bucky came home. He missed having to hide Raphael from their crappy neighbor who kept trying to get them evicted. They had a good start to their new life together there. Steve kissed Bucky gently. “Let’s lighten the mood when you’ve got your fingers in my ass, Love.”

“Right. Of course. Sorry, Baby,” Bucky chuckled. “Do me a favor and crawl off of me. I need to get behind you.” He nuzzled Steve’s neck for a moment and then removed his fingers from him so they could get in a better position for him to really open him up and fuck him.

Steve whined when he felt Bucky’s fingers leave him, making him feel even needier than before. He moved off of him and turned so he could lay his head in his arms with his ass in the air for Bucky. “How’s that?”

“Perfect, Baby,” Bucky groaned quietly. He shifted in the small space of the tent and pushed two fingers back into Steve, and then got more lube ready to get his cock slick as he opened his fingers and stretched him more. “Tell me when you want me inside you.”

---

“I wanted your cock inside of me ten minutes ago,” Steve complained. He spread his legs more and arched his back. “Can I have it? Please?” Steve was a little extra desperate tonight. It was rare they got to relax and enjoy one another like this.

---

Bucky pulled his fingers out and lubed up his cock fairly heavily. He took a little breath and leaned over Steve. “I love you so much,” he whispered before carefully slipping inside of Steve’s tight ass. “Fuck... so nice. Steve, you’re amazing.”

---

Steve let out a loud whine. “Fuck, oh... Babe, that feels so good.” He pushed back on Bucky’s cock, taking more into his ass. He was still pretty tight but, despite the slight burn of being stretched, his whole body was relaxed as Bucky’s cock pushed deeper inside of him.

---

“How much do you love me, Steve?” Bucky whispered softly into Steve’s ear. “Because I love you so goddamn much. And you’re so beautiful in every sense of the word. In every way.” He gently pulled back, slowly dragging his dick out of Steve before sinking back in just as carefully.

---

“I, oh, I love you more than anything, Buck. You are my everything. I can’t imagine going a day without you. Fuck - you’re my world,” Steve praised. “Bite my neck. I want you to claim me tonight. I wanna see bruises in the morning.”

---

Bucky gave Steve exactly what he wanted so quickly. He moved in and out of him a little bit faster. And hovered over his shoulder and bit lightly a few times. It was just a tease. And he moved up to his neck and bit down much harder. “Fuck,” he gasped lightly and bit him again, licking the spot afterwards. “You’re so perfect. Smell good too.” He felt really possessive over Steve right then.

---

Steve whined softly, enjoying the bites at his shoulder, but it wasn’t enough. However, when Bucky sunk his teeth down harder on his neck, Steve cried out his name and gripped on tighter to the blanket under him. “Oh, just like that...” he groaned. “What do I smell like, Buck? I feel like I smell like wet snow and cars.”

---

“But you also smell like our home and your nighttime sweater and arousal,” Bucky added with a low undertone to his voice and then a growl before he bit him again. “Fuck. You’re mine. How did that happen?” He pushed in far as he could go and just gave a few short rolling sorts of thrusts. He wanted to be tight and close with him for a second. Then he pulled out almost all the way to start back to a firm, fast, slightly erratic fuck.
Steve closed his eyes, focusing on the feeling of his husband’s body over his, claiming him in every way imaginable and making him feel on top of the goddamn world. He whimpered as Bucky started to fuck him hard and fast, desperate for release. “So good. Oh, Buck. Make me come. Please, Baby. I need you.”

---

Something about Valentine’s Day always made Bucky incredibly possessive. And sometimes a little rough. He gripped Steve’s cock in his hand firmly and pumped him fast. He also sped up his thrusts more and put some heavy strength behind each one. He wanted to wreck Steve in the best way. But he also knew to be mindful of his lungs so Bucky listened carefully to Steve’s breathing to make sure he wasn’t over-exerting him. “Come for me, Baby. Come in my hand. I want it.”

---

Steve threw his head back and moaned Bucky’s name in an almost pathetically needy tone as Bucky fucked him and stroked his cock. He nearly blacked out from pleasure and he saw stars in front of his eyes as Bucky brought him to a sudden and hard orgasm that had his muscles gripping tight around Bucky’s cock. He made a mess of Bucky’s hand and the blanket below them.

---

Bucky himself whimpered at how nice it felt to have Steve clench around him and to have Steve come so hard for him. He kept hammering into him for about a minute more, then he was shooting into Steve’s ass with an impressive force. “Steve! Oh, my god!” he gasped.

---

Steve took what Bucky gave him, feeling overwhelmed in the best way possible as his husband rammed into his already-sensitive ass so he could reach his own orgasm. Steve wanted to be held, but a part of him also knew that Bucky liked to be dirty sometimes. So, before he let Bucky cuddle him, he reached back to give Bucky’s hair a little tug. “Lick my ass clean, Love.”

---

Bucky moaned again and gave Steve a heated stare. “Yes, yeah, you got it.” he said, moving down Steve’s body again. “God, you’re so fucking cute.” He grunted before licking his tongue over Steve’s hole. He tasted like Bucky’s come and that was wonderful. He wasn’t sure how sensitive Steve was feeling so he didn’t tongue-fuck him like he would normally, he just went gentle and slow, really pampering him.

---

Steve’s back arched again and his hole tensed just a little before relaxing as Bucky’s tongue gently laved over him, cleaning up his mess while soothing it from being fucked so thoroughly. “So, are you - doing whatever I ask you to do. It’s almost like I’m the boss of this relationship,” he teased. Steve would likewise do anything for Bucky.

---

Bucky moved back up Steve’s body, kissing him every few inches as he went. “You can be the boss right now, if you want,” he said softly. “We can trade off. But I’ll do whatever you say.” And he would like doing it too. He did enjoy when Steve was taking control or vocalizing exactly what he wanted. It was always so good.
“Mmm, keep kissing me everywhere. I like it when you pamper me, Buck,” Steve said, looking back at Bucky with all the love in the world. “I feel so lucky I get the whole weekend with just you. Tomorrow I’m eating your ass for breakfast and then making love to you nice and slow.”

Bucky pressed more careful kisses to Steve’s shoulder and back. “I would love that. I really want your dick, Babe,” he said and kept kissing him for a few more seconds before pulling away. “Here, let me get the chocolate and juice.” He rummaged in the food bag and produced a big plastic zipper pouch filled with chocolates and a bottle of non-alcoholic sparkling grape juice. “I know it’s not necessarily very fancy. But we can have our little Valentine’s toast now.”

“You always want my dick,” Steve said proudly. He turned around and sat up so he could enjoy the treats that Bucky brought for him. “It’s still fancier than the instant meals I’ve been making all week because we were too busy packing and getting everything together,” he said. “Maybe we should put those in some bowl or something instead of the plastic bags, though.”

“I don’t think I brought a bowl...” Bucky mumbled to himself and looked through the stuff. He didn’t really think they would need a bowl in the tent. “I... also didn’t bring cups. So, this toast will be a sharing sort of thing.” He shook his head and rolled his eyes. “Wow, I know how to throw a Valentine’s Date, huh?”

“Hey, it’s okay. I’m having an amazing time and I’m going to enjoy all of this stuff just as much,” Steve said. “Come here and give me a sip of that juice and a kiss,” he encouraged, holding out his arms to welcome Bucky back to him.

Bucky moved back to Steve and leaned into him. He opened the bottle and held it out. “I love you, Steve Rogers-Barnes. And I am beyond grateful to get to be with you. I love our family and the moments we have with our children and my sisters and your wonderful mother. You make my life brighter and happier and healthier. You are the exact right man for me and I think we are the hottest couple ever.” He finished his little speech for the toast and gave Steve a warm, pleased little kiss.

Steve smiled proudly, leaning into the kiss. “We are always going to be the hottest couple ever. Who else is as cute as we are with an amazing family of kids who are going to grow into kickass people? Nobody. That’s who,” he said stubbornly. “Actually, I lied. My mom is a cute couple all by herself.”

“Your mom is pretty special. I’ve got to say,” Bucky said with a little chuckle and stole another warm kiss from Steve. He grabbed the bottle of sparkling juice and took a drink. It wasn’t half bad - little sweet - but he didn’t mind it. “To our third Valentine’s Day together. Me and you.”
“And to many more,” Steve said and wiped his mouth dry. “I’m going to have to come up with something good for your birthday. I always get into this situation every year because I try to break out the big guns for Valentine’s Day, but a month later, it’s your birthday anyway.”

“Well, Baby, we don’t have to make my birthday a ‘big guns’ sort of thing this year,” Bucky said and set the bottle aside for now. He turned around and leaned back against Steve so he was nestled against his chest. “We can have a quiet birthday, if that’s better.”

“Yes, we do. It’s your birthday. It’s got to be big guns,” Steve said, wrapping his arms around Bucky firmly. “We have to celebrate the day you were forced out of your mom’s womb in a slimy, crying mess until the doctors held you upside down and wiped you off,” he teased. “You deserve big guns birthdays every year.”

“Oh, Jesus fuck, Steve. That’s so gross. Why do you always do that?” Bucky groused and wiggled in his grasp to try to escape Steve. He always knew what to say to make Bucky’s skin crawl and melt in on itself. “Now I feel like we shouldn’t celebrate my birthday. Maybe ever again.”

Steve let out a laugh. It was kind of a fun habit for him - not so much for Bucky - to gross him out while also being somewhat sweet on him. “Oh, don’t be dramatic, Bucky. You’re just jealous that I was a c-section,” he joked with a wink. “But seriously, what sort of thing would make you really happy this year for your birthday?”

“What would make me really happy is if we don’t discuss the differences in our births,” Bucky grumbled. He closed his eyes and shuddered. He was totally fine with the miracle of birth and all that, until he had to think about it in the context of his own life. “I think what would make me happy for my birthday... is... a nice morning out together as a family. Maybe at a little breakfast place. And then a visit to my parents and Grant. Then we can have our friends over for dinner and cake and then you and I can have the rest of the evening alone and naked. Maybe take a bath and then make love and just have a peaceful sort of day. I think we need peaceful.”

Steve had a little pout on because he liked making a big deal of Bucky’s birthday, but it was Bucky’s day to choose what they did with it, so he couldn’t push it. “Well, if that’s what you want, that’s what you’re going to get,” he said. “Though, I think it’s going to be hard to have ‘peaceful’ with three small kids. We aren’t going to have any sense of that for, what? Fifteen years, about?”

“Fifteen years at least,” Bucky agreed. “Unless we have any more kids then we may never have peace.” He ran a gentle hand through Steve’s hair and gave him a little kiss. “But even with our little kids, we can have a fairly reasonable birthday. Especially if Clint or Tim come over for dinner then they will keep all the kids occupied. You know Clint loves being with them.”
“Yeah, I know it’s something I hope never happens, but if something bad were to happen to the both of us, at least we’ve got enough friends who love our kids and would make sure they never went without having a family,” Steve said. “It’s a true blessing.” He played with Bucky’s hair idly. “How is Clint doing?”

Bucky sighed softly and let his eyes shut as Steve played with his hair. “I don’t know. I think he’s just pretty upset and confused. He wants a lot of things he doesn’t know if he can get. And I think he’s letting himself get worked up about too many things. And you know how he is, he doesn’t like being worked up. He’s a relaxed sort of guy.”

“I think I can count on one hand how many times I’ve seen him riled up,” Steve admitted. “Maybe he should take Reggie’s approach for a little while and come to work baked.” He chuckled because he used to loathe how Reggie treated his job, and now he was trying to make light of it all. “What do you think I’d be like if I got high?”

Bucky glanced up at Steve and thought about what to say for a second. “Baby, Clint gets high still. He and I used to smoke together. He does it way less now. Like maybe once a month or something.” He wondered if Steve was messing around or he really didn’t realize that. “He’s still pretty calm when he’s high. But he says deep shit more often.”

“What? No way. But he always seems... the same.” Clint was so laid back on an average day that Steve couldn’t tell the difference. He assumed Clint didn’t smoke since he was dating a police officer. “What sort of stuff does he say when he’s high? Is it fake deep stuff or actually really deep stuff?”

Bucky wasn’t sure sometimes how to differentiate ‘fake deep shit’ from ‘real deep shit’. “I don’t know. Maybe a little of both. Like one time we were laying on the ground in his living room and he asked me if I thought whales could still hear above water.”

“They probably can, just not as well because their echolocation or whatever. I think.” Steve rubbed the side of his face. “It’s been so long since biology. I’m sure Becca would have the answer for that,” he said confidently. Of course, she would roll her eyes if they used her as an encyclopedia again.

Bucky blinked and looked up at Steve. That was way more knowledge about whales then he knew. “Wow, damn. Are you a little of a nerd today, Steve?” he asked and gave him a warm kiss. “Clint also once told me that he thinks we can’t see the dark side of the moon because the moon doesn’t want us to. Like the moon thinks that side is ugly so, we aren’t allowed to see it.”
“I think that’s fake deep, though. Clint definitely wouldn’t have thought that if he was sober,” Steve decided with a wave of his hand.

---

Bucky chuckled and pulled Steve to lay down with him. “I’ll give you that one. It’s kind of fake deep,” he said. “Let’s get a little sleep. I’m pretty beat and you know I’ll want to fuck you again once we are awake. Make the most of this weekend.” He kissed Steve again for a long moment and Would you look at that! It's finally updated! Here is the last chapter of season six! K and I have been really busy and somewhat frantic lately so this took us a lot longer than we had hoped. But here is the last little slice of life chapter for this season. Hopefully, you still like it! I'm so sorry it has taken a hot minute here. :( (Also, I will finally finally finally get to comment replies now that this is up. I have been the worst person ever and been neglecting and forgetting to actually respond like a human being. So, I will get to those!)

We are also currently working on the epilogue right now. I'm guessing it won't be too horribly long and we might be able to get it wrapped up relatively quickly now that it is summertime. But I can't promise anything. I'm so sorry. But it will be up eventually and then this big old bear of a fic will be officially all finished and our little literary TV show will be concluded.

It has been so much fun working on this story for the past TWO and a half freaking years! Oh, my god. We started it January 2nd 2017 and then started posting May 30th 2017. I would really like to post the epilogue on May 30th 2019 if we have it finished by then. It'll be a nice solid two-year posting dates and I would really like that.

In case you were not aware of this show/series/fic/monster coming to an end, here is a repeat of the message we posted about it:

REPEAT:

I have some news. Due to the intense business of our schedules and my increasing health issues, K and I have decided to cut the fic shorter than originally planned. We had hopes in doing another season and then an epilogue. However, it'll now end after a small wrap of a few chapters and then an epilogue. This story, like many a long-running TV shows will have a some-what spliced together ending season and a conclusion. I apologize for anyone who hoped to see this continue on but it's simply become a bear we can't take care of properly anymore. And neither of us would want this fic to suffer because of trying to continue it and making it less than our best. If anyone has any questions or comments, you can email me at rogers.barnes.stucky@gmail.com -- Thank you all for being with us on this journey and I hope you like the rest of the story and wrap-up.

Their weekend away from home was too long and too short all at once. Steve wanted more time with his husband on their own, but he also missed their babies dearly. He spent a good portion of the next few days cuddling with them in a big blanket fort and watching TV, utterly ignoring any typical schooling he did with them.

Come the springtime, they were well in the swing of a usual routine. Lilly was back in lacrosse and now Adriana was joining a little cheerleading squad because she liked seeing the girls run around at the football games that played on the field across from Lilly’s games.
Steve was in the middle of early dinner prep when he heard Lilly come in, followed by another set of footsteps going up the stairs with her.

---

Bucky was home from work already and he had the rare luxury of getting to sit at the table and read the paper for once. He had his reading glasses on and his hair pulled loosely back into a ponytail. He looked more like his dad right then than he realized. But when Lilly came home without even greeting them, and she clearly had someone with her, Bucky sat up and set the newspaper down. “Who was that?” he asked and looked to Steve as if he had an answer.

---

Steve loved it when Bucky wore his glasses. It made him look like the wise, old dad he knew Bucky was even though he was still plenty young at heart. Steve smiled at him and shrugged. “I was hoping you caught a glance,” he admitted. He held out his hand towards him. “Rock-paper-scissors to see who goes in to check?”

---

Steve was busy making dinner and Bucky had really been hoping for a calm hour while the kids all napped. “Gah, Fine,” Bucky groaned and held out his hand too. He gave Steve a little pinch and then said, “Rock-paper-scissors,” before flipping out two fingers for scissors quickly.

---

Steve put out paper and swore under his breath. “Dammit. Alright, I’ll go check on them.” He leaned down to peck Bucky’s lips before heading upstairs to knock on Lilly’s door. “Hey, Lil, it’s me. Can you open up the door for a second?”

---

There was a scuffle of noise for a minute and then Lilly opened the door just enough so her head was popping out. “What?” she asked plainly, eyeing Steve like she had no clue what he could possibly want right now.

---

Now Steve definitely knew something was up. He put a hand on his hip and gave her a level look. “Well, I came up here because I heard four feet making their way up the stairs. And while I know you’re getting more into science nowadays, I know you didn’t grow yourself an extra pair of legs in a petri dish.”

---

“What if I did? How rude of you to doubt my science skills and to make fun of my second set of feet from my experiment gone wrong,” Lilly countered. She was also wearing her hair down and it was teased a little so it wasn’t so flat. And she had what looked like a little bit of eyeshadow and lip gloss on - deviating greatly from the messy ponytail and bare face she usually wore.

---

Steve nudged the door a little to see if she was going to budge at all. He was already privy to what was going on now that he noticed her dolled upstate. “You’re right, I’m silly to doubt you. I like what you did to your hair, by the way. I’m glad that you’re making an effort to be presentable for family dinner.” He raised his voice a little as he asked her, “Did you make sure to take your dirty clothes of the washing machine today?”

“Stop it! God, Steve,” Lilly snapped and tried to shove him a little bit out of her door. “Shh, please.” She looked up at him with wide eyes but did let the door open to reveal a boy sitting on her bed. He had on a denim jacket that was so big it was probably an older brother’s or his dad’s. And he had his hair coifed perfectly to one side. He also had on a bold green shirt that seemed too bright to be indoors.

Steve gave a satisfied smirk when he successfully embarrassed her, but he sobered up when she opened the door for him. He was a little annoyed at her sneaking a boy in, but he also knew that giving them a reason to hide would only cause them to make mischief elsewhere. He would at least attempt to be welcoming. He walked in and offered his hand out to the boy. “Hey, I’m Steve. And you are?”

“Oh, uh,” the boy stood up and shook Steve’s hand. “I’m Scotty.” Once he was up, he was barely shorter than Steve, although he was pretty scrawny. He smiled at him and nodded. “I go to school with Lilly. You’re the brother?” he asked.

Steve was doing his best not to do the overprotective thing. Lilly could look out for herself, but he also had a hard time not stepping over the line, especially when he knew they needed his help sometimes. “No, you’re talking about my husband,” he said casually, testing to see what his reaction would be. Steve gave his hand a firm shake before letting go. “I’m Lilly’s brother-in-law.”

“Oh, oh! Right,” Scotty said with a nervous chuckle and looked to Lilly for a second. “Yeah. She told me. Sorry. So, you’re the husband.” He nodded again and shoved his hands into his jacket pockets awkwardly.

Lilly crossed her arms and glared up at Steve. “Okay, this was a great talk, Steve. Can you leave us alone now?”

Steve decided that it was good enough. He shrugged casually in response to Lilly’s glare. “Give all the attitude you want, but you don’t pay the bills, so, I have a right to know who’s under my roof.” He pointed to the both of them. “So, no canoodling, you two. I’ll have none of that nonsense in my house,” he joked, genuinely trying to be funny but falling short. He let himself out of the room before Lilly got more upset at him. Steve made his way downstairs and sat down at the table excitedly, ready to gossip.

Bucky had gone back to reading the paper and he looked up briefly over his glasses to see Steve’s over-eager face. He went back to reading, pretending he didn’t want to know what had him all riled up. “Who was it?” he asked casually and finally folded the paper neatly back on the table.
“Okay, don’t get mad and go up there,” he said, placing his hand on Bucky’s arm. “But she’s got a boy in her room,” he whispered. “She’s put make-up on and everything, Buck. It’s like she’s everything she’s complained about and made fun of at some point.”

“What?” Bucky gasped sharply. “No way!” His face contorted into disbelief and surprise and he just got stuck like that for a long moment. “No way, Steve.” He couldn’t say anything else hardly. This was Lilly, after all. And she was only fifteen. And she had never really been one to be interested in anyone romantically, boy or girl. This just seemed unreal.

Steve nodded eagerly. “Yes, way! His name is ‘Scotty’. I shook his hand and everything,” he said. “I mean… she didn’t say he was her boyfriend, exactly, but all the clues are there, Babe. They’re totally flirting with each other, at least. She likes this boy, I know it.”

Bucky shook his head again and stood up from the table. “No way,” he said once more. “I’m going up there.” He took off his reading glasses and his sweater so he was just wearing his Queen tour shirt that he had cut the sleeves off of years ago. It didn’t do much to make him look intimidating, but he hoped it looked less fatherly than his cardigan and glasses. “Come on, Steve.”

Steve caught Bucky’s hand and held it. “She’s just going to get mad if you go up there, Buck,” he said. “Give her a little space and then once Scotty goes home, we can grill the shit out of her on who this kid is. I already embarrassed her to get her to open the door.”

“Babe, don’t you think she will get just as mad, if not more so, if we ‘grill her’ on this crush of hers?” Bucky asked and squeezed Steve’s hand. “Besides, I don’t want them up there unsupervised and making out or something. I got to go do the big brother and guardian thing. Come on.”

“At least she won’t be embarrassed in front of the kid,” Steve said. He grimaced when Bucky still insisted on going upstairs. He didn’t entirely disagree with Bucky, but he was trying to be the ‘cool brother-in-law’ right now. Looks like that was going out the window. Steve followed Bucky upstairs, sulking a little to try to guilt Bucky out of it last-minute.

Bucky thoroughly ignored Steve and tromped his way upstairs to Lilly’s door. He didn’t even knock. He just tried to open it and grumbled when it was locked. “Lilly, open the door,” he said firmly but not sharply. “You can’t have a boy in your room without permission, Lilly,” he added, totally throwing Steve under the bus as the one who told him what was going on.

There was an annoyed sound on the other side. “Steve, you snitch!” She made her way over to the door and unlocked it, but didn’t open it. She stood ready to receive her brother, arms crossed and looking at him with a glare that usually was reserved for when Becca was being overbearing. “You never said no boys in the house.”

---

“Well, so far, there’s never been any attempt at having boys in the house,” Bucky defended. Lord knows Becca never brought any boys home like this. “Besides, Lilly, last time you brought someone into our home unexpectedly was with that kid on our fire escape at the old apartment. Remember?”

---

“Well, if we had a fire escape, I would’ve used it so I would’ve gotten away with Scotty being here,” she huffed. “What’s the big deal? You’ve done a lot worse. It’s not like we’re doing anything we shouldn’t. And Scotty’s parents let us hang out in his room without being babies about it.”

---

Bucky huffed and crossed his arms. “Becca used to try to pull that same argument against me all the time. And you used to be the one who told Becca to lay off about the mistakes I’ve made. Seems pretty unfair for you to bring that to the table as your argument right now.” Bucky pointed at Scotty. “Lilly, you and your friend can hang out in the living room or on the back patio. Just don’t mess with Steve’s plants.”

---

“That was because I was madder at Becca then than I was at you,” Lilly grumbled. She eyed Bucky with a challenging glint in her eye before making her way over to Scotty, who was pretty quiet. She grabbed his hand and made him put his arm around her waist. “Let’s go to the patio so my square brother stops bugging us.”

---

Bucky watched them head down the stairs and he was none too pleased to see a boy’s arm around his sister like that. But at least she was going someplace he would be able to keep an eye on them. “Fucking hell, Steve,” he complained and turned to his husband. “She’s so damn grumpy lately. And I don’t care if Scotty’s parents do let them hang out in his room alone. They aren’t doing that here!”

---

Steve wrapped his arms around Bucky to comfort him and keep the both of them from getting too annoyed. “She’s a teenager. Becca was a lot worse and we survived.” He kissed along Bucky’s shoulder. “And remember. No matter how grumpy she gets, we have the power to embarrass her more than she could piss us off.”

---

Bucky was powerless to stay too upset when Steve started kissing on him. He just melted into him and held his hands on Steve’s hips. “Yeah, But I think if you embarrass her any further, she will just get groucher and more annoyed and harder to handle. Remember how much it riled Becca up when you would try to counter her with anything at all? They both, like, feed off of opposition.”

---

“I know they do,” Steve sighed. “But... still. I still maintain that we have more ways to make her embarrassed than she does to make us mad,” he said. He played with the ends of Bucky’s hair. “You look so smart like this,” he complimented as a quick aside. “Do you think our little girls will be stubborn like Lilly is?”

---

Bucky shrugged and pushed his glasses back up his nose. “I don’t really know. Maybe. I mean, I think it’s hard to live in this family and not grow somewhat stubborn,” he said. “I just can’t believe Lilly is into some guy. That’s just ridiculous to me right now. And did you see his hair? It was like one big poofy wave on his head.”

---

Steve chuckled. “Better to have a poofy wave on his head than tattoos on his knuckles and piercings everywhere,” he teased. “He looks harmless, Buck. Lilly will probably scare him off before he tries to pull anything. He’s nice enough, though. Didn’t seem to care that we’re married.”

---

Bucky shook his head and tugged on Steve’s shirt just to have something to do with his hands. “Steve, I know plenty of tattooed, pierced punks who are plenty nice. But I have also encountered a lot of snot-nosed teens who think they are all that. Who do you think is usually trying to steal from the record shop? Entitled teenage boys.” He huffed again and looked off at the wall forlornly. He just didn’t want his little sister to be growing up and dating now and stuff. But it was reassuring to know he wasn’t homophobic at least.

---

Steve gave Bucky a sympathetic look. He knew that it was tough for Bucky to watch his baby sisters grow up. And in a way, it was tough for Steve, too. Lilly wasn’t even a teenager when he first met her and now she was off chasing boys. “Just trust me on this. Most first boyfriends don’t last anyway.”

---

“Steve, my mom’s first boyfriend was my dad. And you know what he did? He got her pregnant before their marriage!” Bucky hissed quietly and then huffed to himself, getting worked up still. He didn’t have any ill feelings towards his parents or how their lives played out. It was exactly what was perfect for them. Marriage and kids were always the plan, and the sooner the better. But Bucky wasn’t hoping for that with his sisters.

---

“Okay, and I’m not your first boyfriend. Everyone is different and Lilly isn’t going to get pregnant before she graduates high school. You think she wants a baby to ruin her lacrosse career?” he joked with a chuckle. “And if she does, it’ll be fine. We can’t control every moment of their lives, Bucky. You know that probably better than anyone.”

---

Bucky pouted and pushed Steve’s chest gently with his hand as a small form of protest. “But, Steve,” he whined again and damn near almost stamped his foot on the ground like a toddler. He sighed and tucked his face in Steve’s neck for a moment before pulling back. “You are going to have to help restrain me around that boy. I want to toss him out of this house.”
Steve laughed and hugged him tight, kissing his neck affectionately. “Baby, it’s going to be fine,” he reassured. “It’s better that they’re here where we can monitor things than out somewhere that we can’t control,” he reminded.

“Yeah, that’s a lot better, I guess,” Bucky agreed quietly. He wasn’t sure how he was going to handle all of his kids and sisters starting to date and move on. It was too much for him. “Should... we have him stay for dinner?” he asked like he was trying to be polite, but really, he wanted to ask him a lot of questions.

Steve gave Bucky another squeeze. “Invite him for dinner. That way Lilly doesn’t have a leg to stand on if she wants to call us unaccommodating to them and you get to spend time questioning him like I’m sure you want to do,” he said sweetly, playing with the end of Bucky’s ponytail.

“I do want to question him,” Bucky admitted. “Please teach me some police interrogation techniques.” He pulled Steve towards the back door to their tiny yard and glanced out at Lilly and Scotty sitting on the ground and talking together. “Steve, you ask,” Bucky prompted and poked him softly in the side.

“I wasn’t the interrogation man, I was a street cop,” Steve reminded. “Natasha interrogated.” He kissed Bucky’s temple and rubbed his back before heading to the door. He knocked on it so they knew he was coming out and he opened it so he could poke his head outside. “Hey, Lilly. We were wondering if Scotty would like to stay for dinner.”

Lilly immediately looked at Scotty and said, “You don’t have to. They’re just being weird,” before looking back up at Steve and then Bucky through the glass.

Scotty shook his head. “No, yeah, I’ll stay,” he said and touching Lilly’s knee softly once. “Can I help with anything? Setting the table?”

“We’re not being weird, we’re being hospitable,” Steve said with a childish roll of his eyes at her. He gave Scotty a small wave. “Don’t worry about it, but thank you. You two have fun out here and someone will come get you when it’s time to eat,” he said pleasantly, putting on his best behavior with Scotty so Lilly wouldn’t get upset at them.

Even Bucky had to admit he was pleased that Scotty had asked if he could help. That was at least a good sign probably. Lilly certainly never asked to help with dinner. “Thanks, Baby,” Bucky said, pulling Steve into another hug. “God, I just love you so much. You don’t mind that I’m like a little bit crazy. Thank you for that.”
Steve happily walked into Bucky’s arms and gave him a proud smile. “Bucky, you’re not a little bit crazy. You’re a lot crazy. And I love you,” he said sweetly. He pecked his lips gently. “And the good news is that your sister is the pain in the ass so far and Scotty’s the angel.”

“I am not a lot crazy,” Bucky protested but he definitely knew Steve was right. “I will give him one point for asking to help with dinner. But he already got negative five for touching Lilly’s knee. So, right now he is at... negative sixteen. He got some negative points earlier too.”

“Oh yeah?” Steve asked in an amused voice. “Why did he get negative points earlier? Was it for the mere act of dating your sister?” he asked. “Or was it sneaking up the stairs with her?” He ran his hand down Bucky’s back and played with the hem of his shirt.

“Steve!” Bucky gasped and smacked his chest. “They are not dating!” He didn’t want it to be true at all and the longer Scotty stayed, the more it seemed to be the case. “And yes, he got negative points for all of that. And for even coming into my house. And having that hair.”

Steve cackled. “Oh, be nice, Babe. What score do you think my Ma would’ve given you the first day I took you home?” he challenged. “In fact, we could go ask her right now,” he teased, pinching Bucky’s ass lightly.

Bucky squirmed slightly at being pinched. “No, she loves me. She always has. I would have gotten fifty points just for showing up. And then another twenty for being polite. But maybe like minus a few after she found I suck your dick or something.”

“She loves you, but you were wild and smelly and a hippie,” Steve joked. “And you’re still a jerk. She would have taken more than a few points off because you were sucking the straight right out of me,” he joked. “But you’d have a million points from her by today.”

Bucky’s mouth fell open and he looked at Steve with sharp eyes. “I am not smelly and I am not a jerk,” he said, folding his arms and cocking his head to the side like he wasn’t going to yield until Steve made it up to him. “And you were never straight a day in your life.”

Steve giggled at Bucky’s defiance. “You are smelly. Especially after a concert where you dress in those cute shorts you have,” he purred. “And you’re right. I’ve never been straight but if I was, you would’ve sucked it out of me. I’m right about that,” he asserted.
Bucky wasn’t super happy with that answer. He knew Steve was messing with him but he could mess right back too. “Well, fine. Sounds like you’re going to be waiting a long time to see me in shorts or to get yourself sucked off by me again,” he said in a tone that could have been falsely offended or genuinely so.

---

Steve frowned at Bucky’s comment. “Hey, hey, I’m just messing around, Love...” he said gently. “You don’t have to get upset. You know I love you and think you’re Gorgeous and smell nice.” He reached out to lace his fingers with Bucky’s.

---

Bucky tugged Steve’s hand up and kissed his knuckles. “I know you do,” he conceded and gave him a little smile. “Besides, my shampoo makes me smell like strawberries and you love strawberries.” He sighed again and glanced out the window to Lilly and Scotty. “Alright, I guess we should start on dinner then.”

---

“You know me too well,” he chuckled. Steve kissed his cheek and pulled him towards the kitchen. “I was getting food started when the two goofs thought that they could pull one over on us,” he said. “You want to help me get the table set?”

---

“Yeah, I’ll help you set the table,” Bucky said warmly and got the plates. He was still really uncertain about Scotty but he was going to try to get it out of his head for the moment. “So, Baby, did you see that Adriana’s reading her books all by herself now?” He knew he had. Steve was the one who was always around the kids anyway. “She’s growing up.”

---

Steve nodded his head quickly. “She’s getting so much better at reading. And I’ve been working on her speech, too. Her little mistakes were so adorable, but... I don't know, I wouldn’t want to encourage bad habits,” he said. “I’m trying to find more books she’s interested in that are easy but not too childish so she will feel more confident reading on her own.”

---

Bucky agreed entirely. He had always been correcting Adriana’s speech issues and incorrect words. But he and Becca were the only ones for a while so they ended up being the bad guys about it. “Yeah, she just needs to learn. And it’s not that it’s a problem but if she can learn it then that’s good.” He set down the last fork and came to stand close to Steve again. “How about we go to the bookstore sometime this week and we can find something. Becca can come too and help and I’ll buy her a new book.”

---

Steve had considered letting the speech issues slide so Adriana wouldn’t feel self-conscious about it, but he figured he could build up her confidence in other ways and this would avoid some forms of bullying in the future. “I like that idea,” he said. “We’re going to have to get something small for the other kids so they don’t feel left out,” he said.
“Okay, but it’ll have to seem equal but actually be a lot cheaper. We already went over-budget last month and I really don’t want to again,” Bucky said in both a stern but pleading voice. He never would have thought that he would one day be stressing over budgets so much with his husband. Or that it would cause some arguments like it had a few times already.

---

Steve gave Bucky an apologetic glance. Surprisingly, he had been the one responsible for that since he bought some extra toys for the kids. “Alright. We can see if the store has any good toys in it that are just a dollar or two,” he said. “Sarah May definitely won’t know the difference. I doubt Christopher would.”

---

“Yeah, I think they won’t mind. Thank you, Love,” Bucky said gently, running his hand down Steve’s arm. “Although, Lilly might. And I assume she can’t be the only one without something too?” He folded his arms and shrugged. “Maybe we can find something relatively affordable for her somewhere. Maybe some makeup. Considering she’s apparently doing that now.” He grumbled the last part. He was not happy about Lilly and this boy.

---

“We can get that for her,” he said. This happened all the time. Steve didn’t have the heart to leave any of the kids or older kids out when he went somewhere. “You think they have boyfriend-repellant somewhere, too?” he joked.

---

Bucky groaned again and sat down at the table. He had temporarily forgotten the plan at hand and was back on Lilly and Scotty again. “What should I do? Should I tell her she can’t see him? Or is that not fair because I’m not Dad? Or is that not the point because I am her guardian? But I also was dating at her age but in a worse way? God, Steve, I hate this.”

---

“Don’t Do that. You’re only going to succeed in pissing her off and pushing her away. How would you feel if they pushed me away from the get-go?” Steve asked. “They were wary of me, sure. But it wasn’t like your sisters were refusing to let you see me, even though you had a history of less than savory boyfriends.”

---

“Sure, Babe, But I was also twenty-four and not a child still and dating my first boyfriend,” Bucky said and gestured vaguely with his hands. “I should at least talk to her and make sure she understands she can’t have her door locked when a boy is here.”

---

“Talk to her after he leaves, Bucky. I know you don’t like any of it, but be patient. You’ve got an ex-officer for a husband and he can sniff trouble from a mile away. Right now, Scotty isn’t causing any,” Steve reassured. “How about you go pick us a nice record and get the babies up for dinner.”

---

Bucky grunted but got up to get some music playing – something calm today: Dean Martin. And then he got all the kids to the kitchen. Adriana hoisted herself up in her chair and Bucky got Christopher on his and Sarah May in her high chair. “Babe, watch them a second and I’ll go get your mom.”

---

“Of course,” Steve said. Christopher was entertaining himself by hitting his hands on the tray to the beat of the song. Steve had been working a lot with music with the kids because he knew how much Bucky loved it. Sarah May didn’t quite get it, but Christopher was catching on fast.

---

Bucky came back with Sarah and she made sure to kiss every one of her kids and grandkids but stopped when she saw Scotty. “Oh, who’s our new guest?” she asked warmly.

---

“Scotty...” Bucky informed with a long, drawn-out way of saying his name. “He’s Lilly’s special friend.” He was still not happy.

Scotty stood from the table and extended a hand to Sarah politely. “I’m Scotty, Ma’am. I was told I could stay for dinner.”

---

“A special friend, huh?” Sarah gave Bucky a knowing smirk, understanding immediately what was going on. She looked back to the boy and shook his hand. “I’m Sarah Rogers, Steve’s mother. It’s nice to meet you,” she said pleasantly.

---

Christopher started wiggling for his grandma’s attention. “Nana!” Christopher yelped and then so did Sarah May. Adriana shook her head and grabbed Sarah’s shirt so she would pay attention to her first.

“How about Steve prays before the kids fight over Nana?” Bucky said and gestured to him. “Steve, Babe?”

---

Sarah loved her grandchildren even when they were all fussing for her at once. She sat down between Christopher and Sarah May and pulled Adriana onto her lap so all of them could get some love.

“Of course,” Steve said. “Dear, Lord... please let our children give my mother some peace. Also, thank you for the food. Amen.”

---

Bucky shook his head and gave Steve a kiss on his cheek. “You’re the sassiest churchman I’ve ever met, Steve,” he said and turned to help get food on the kids’ plates.

Scotty, so far being more outgoing than expected, looked to Steve. “What church do you go to?” he asked and gestured to himself. “I’m Buddhist now. But all spirituality is important, isn’t it?”
Steve was pleased with how conversational Scotty was being. He smiled and reached over to hold Bucky’s hand. “Well, I go to a church a little while from here,” he said. “You say Buddhist ‘now’? So, I imagine your family must be different and you converted?” He gestured to Sarah May. “Our daughter is Jewish,” he said. “And Bucky is atheist. All spirituality and even no spirituality is important.”

---

“Oh, right on,” Scotty said and nodded to Sarah May like she understood what he meant anyway. “Yeah, actually my whole family is Buddhist now. My parents grew up in the Christian church but when I was about ten they started to branch out and now we feel like Buddhism is where our souls fit in better.” He smiled and nodded.

Bucky interjected before Steve could respond to Scotty. “For the record,” he said, mainly focused on Steve and not Scotty. “I wouldn’t say I’m atheist. Maybe I used to be. But I think I understand some higher power stuff better now. I might not be about to jump on the Jesus train, but you know.” Whatever change he might have had was all because of how much he could see that faith was important to Steve.

---

“Well, if you don’t jump on the ‘Jesus train’, jump on the Jewish train,” he said fondly. “Which is still Jesus, but different.” He winked and looked back to Scotty. “I’m glad your family has found a place that works for you. I think that so long as people are good to each other, it doesn’t matter how they worship.”

---

Bucky blinked a few times and tilted his head in confusion. He was pretty sure Jewish people didn’t think Jesus was a real god or whatever. And he was also pretty sure Steve shouldn’t be engaging with Scotty so much. It was Lilly’s secret boyfriend after all.

Scotty nodded and swallowed his bite of food before answering. “I entirely agree. Being kind and loving is better than anything else.”

---

“Absolutely,” Steve agreed, clearly taking a liking to this kid even though a part of him knew he should be a bit tougher on him since Bucky was so adamant about not liking Scotty simply because Lilly dared to take interest in him. “We need more love in this world. That’s what this whole family is built on. There’s a lot of moving parts here that make us far from the traditional family, but love is what makes us unbreakable.”

---

Bucky grunted in response. He didn’t disagree, obviously. But he wasn’t entirely sold on Scotty like Steve seemed to be. Lilly, also, could tell exactly what Bucky was thinking and she wasn’t going to just let him go unbothered. “Yeah, free love. That’s our thing. Bucky would tell you that too. But he’s having an aneurysm over there. His love thing didn’t include his sisters growing up.”

---

Steve put an arm around Bucky and turned his head to kiss his cheek. “If it’s any consolation, Becca might be single forever,” he joked, giving Becca a wink to show he didn’t mean anything by it. “At least you’ll have one sister you won’t have to worry about. And our daughters definitely won’t date before college. Right, Adriana?”

---

Adriana looked up from her plate and shrugged. “Aunt Lilly says that dating boys is fun,” she said softly and shoved some food in her mouth.

Bucky blinked and looked up at Steve. He wanted to convey that he was not pleased about this at all. But instead, he said, “Well, I guess I’ll be worried about Adriana now, too.”

---

“Dating boys is not fun,” Steve said to his daughter with a wag of his finger. “Dating your fiancé is fun, because by then, you don’t have to worry about the other person not working out or hiding stuff. By then you’d have shared everything with one another.” He patted Bucky’s back. “It’s Okay. She’ll realize after her first boyfriend how they’re not all they’re cracked up to be.”

---

Bucky took in a stuttering breath and shook his head. He was so close to losing his mind. Lilly was dating. Becca was getting ready for college. Sarah May was talking more. Christopher was climbing up on chairs by himself. And now Adriana was getting a dating talk from her Daddy. It was all way too much. He felt time slipping through his fingers and he hated it. “How about you all stop trying to give me a stroke and we discuss something other than dating boys,” Bucky said, only sort of joking.

---

“We can talk about how perfect of a dog Diana is,” Steve said, understanding that he needed to redirect this conversation very quickly. She perked her head up when she heard her name and gave a wag of her tail. “She’s the furry daughter I never had. Don’t worry, Adriana, you’re my not-furry daughter. It’d be silly if you had fur like a dog. You’d look like Chewbacca.”

---

“I don’t want to be Chewie. I want to be Leia,” Adriana protested. “Christopher can be Chewie.” Christopher just grinned in response even if he wasn’t sure what was going on so much. He was also covered in food. There really was no hope for him to be a clean eater. He was too much his Papa’s son.

“Becca, can you clean him up?” Bucky asked and gestured to his messy son by his sister. “Steve, that boy can’t find his mouth.”

---

Steve looked at their son with a small grimace. “Christopher, who taught you those manners? Certainly not your nana.” He grabbed a napkin and went around the table to clean him up. It was a lost cause, but Steve was determined to make sure their little boy would be a polite eater.

Becca was just glad that she didn’t have to wipe up her messy nephew. “If my baby ever ate like that, I’d send him to another family,” she said.

---

“If your baby eats like that, just sent them to me. It’ll fit in with me and Christopher,” Bucky said and smiled over at his messy baby boy.
After dinner was over, Bucky called a cab to take Scotty home. He didn’t much like the idea of Lilly walking him home, despite all her protests that she would be fine. But eventually, Bucky and Steve were finally winding down in bed together. “Steve, do you really think Scotty is okay enough for Lilly?”

---

By the time Steve had them all the kids tucked in, he was more than ready to cuddle in bed with his husband. He played with Bucky’s long hair and gave him a little smile. “I think he’s harmless and any boy willing to date a firecracker like Lilly is worth giving a chance.”

---

Bucky sighed and draped an arm across Steve’s chest. “Yeah, I suppose you’re right. I just worry about her. I always will. She’s my baby sister.” He seemed to just get more worried every year that went by. He wanted to do right by his family. “I’m a little annoyed at you for being so nice to him. You could have been only a little nice.”

---

Steve laughed and kissed Bucky’s cheek. “Give me a break, Bucky. If she doesn’t marry someone eventually, she’d just end up living here forever and I don’t want to be washing her dirty socks when she’s fifty,” he teased. “Although, I’m sure you wouldn’t mind being able to look after her forever.” Steve poked Bucky’s chest lightly. “How about I be a little mean to him next time to make up for me being too nice today?”

---

Steve was probably right. Bucky would let his sisters live with them forever if they needed to. He was going to miss Becca so much once she finally got a real apartment and moved out. “Okay, I’d like that. Just a little mean to him,” Bucky agreed and tugged Steve’s pajama shirt lightly. “But I think you should make it up to me now too. A little bit.”

---

“Allright. I’ll bully a teenager just to please my adult husband, who is totally a mature adult,” he snickered. Steve kissed Bucky’s neck innocently. He ran his hand up Bucky’s side and asked, “Are you sure? Because I think I have a pretty solid plan for next time.”

---

“I am mature,” Bucky protested as he slipped his hand up Steve’s shirt. “And, yes, you still need to do a little extra to make me not annoyed anymore.” He kissed Steve’s jaw and then his cheek then his lips slowly. “Make love to me, Baby. My sweet husband. It’s the first night in a week that all the kids got to sleep on time. That’s not let it go by us.”

---

Steve loved hearing Bucky ask for him. And Bucky was right. It was a small miracle that all the kids were in bed at a reasonable time. “Well, when you put it that way...” Steve moved over Bucky and held the sides of his face so he could kiss him slowly and tenderly. “As if I could ever resist you asking.”

---
“You just love me too much for that,” Bucky agreed and slipped his hands down the back of Steve’s pajama pants and pulled down so his ass popped out. “Do you want me like this? Under you?” Last time he bottomed, he rode Steve into next week with everything he had. It exhausted the both of them and they ended up sleeping in an hour and a half.

---

“I’m not letting you make me feel like a tired, old man again,” Steve teased. “I’m making sure we stay awake to cuddle after this time. So, your ass is staying right here where I can keep an eye on it.” Steve was still mildly embarrassed that he was knocked right to sleep after the last time they had sex. He slid Bucky’s shirt off of him so he could kiss down his chest.

---

Bucky chuckled and lifted his arms for Steve. “Yes, but that was some of the hardest we have ever come,” Bucky reminded him and kept his legs together so Steve could more easily remove his pants. “You loved it when I was on you. Please tell me you did.”

---

“Of course, I loved it,” he answered. Steve casually removed the rest of Bucky’s clothes while they conversed, undressing him with confidence but also care and love. He made sure to kiss wherever his lips could reach. “You’re always goddamned sexy when you ride me like that,” he purred. “You’re sexy all the time.” Steve reached into the nightstand to grab lube.

---

Bucky’s body moved with Steve and he felt like he could just melt under his touches. Sex with Steve had never once been boring. He loved every time he got to be touched by him. “I love you, Baby,” he whispered and lifted his legs so his ass was easier for Steve to get to. “Take me apart tonight. Slowly.”

---

Steve moved between Bucky’s legs and kissed down his belly. He moved his mouth along the shaft of Bucky’s dick, moaning his name softly because he couldn’t wait to have sex with his husband. “Do I have to do it slowly?” he whined, already coating his fingers. “What if I’m eager, Baby?”

---

Bucky moaned too and changed his mind. “Fine. You can be eager. You can be faster. But you better hold me close all night, Steve. Even if you get hot and sweaty.” Bucky needed Steve right on him tonight. “You can take me how you want to take me. Fuck me how you want.”

---

Steve teased Bucky’s ass with his finger before easing it inside steadily. “If I’m hot and sweaty, I’m either letting go or turning the fan on,” he insisted. “Your hair sticks to me.” To stop Bucky from protesting, he sunk down on his cock, taking him inch by inch into his mouth while he worked on opening Bucky up for him.

---

Bucky wanted to tell him that wasn’t fair because his hair had a mind of its own. But then Steve was sucking him down his throat and Bucky couldn’t say a thing except, “Fuck, Love...” he groaned softly as his hand shot to hold the back of Steve’s head. He felt beyond incredible with a finger in his ass and Steve on his dick. He still couldn’t believe he managed to get himself a husband - and the best damn husband anyone could ever want.

---

Over the time they spent together, Steve learned the ins and outs of making Bucky ache for more.
And, of course, Steve would always give it to him. His fingers moved just slowly enough for Bucky to truly feel the stretch as Steve got him ready for his dick while his tongue never stopped working along the length of Bucky’s cock as it rested in his throat.

---

Bucky moaned and whined and wiggled on the bed. He couldn’t resist the slow, deep, determined way Steve was fingering him or the drag of his tongue over his cock. He wanted to scream from the rooftops of New York that he loved this man. And he got to fuck him often as possible. “Steve, you’re incredible...” he whispered and pulled his legs up a little. “You’re a damn angel. I swear.”

---

Steve pulled off of Bucky’s cock so he could bite at the inside of his thigh. “Speak for yourself, gorgeous. How lucky am I that I married the whole package?” he hummed. “Good looks, good personality, the perfect dad, and fucks like a champion,” he said with a little, giddy laugh. “You ready?”

---

Bucky nodded. “Yeah, let’s see if I’m still a champion,” he said and spread his legs wide for him.
“You want me like this? On my back?” He didn’t care at all how they did it. He wanted Steve’s dick already. “I can ride you if you want?”

---

“You’ll always be a champion.” Steve pulled his fingers out and started to coat his dick with lube.
“We’ll start with you underneath and finish with you riding me.” With his lungs, he found this easier.
Some days were better than others, but he didn’t want to give Bucky any reason to worry.

---

“Anything you want,” Bucky agreed, unaware that Steve tended to plan their position by how well he was breathing that day. “Fuck me good, Baby. I want to feel it all week. Be the boss of me tonight.” He gripped his cock in hand and just held it. He was waiting for Steve to get inside him before he jerked himself off.

---

Steve gripped Bucky’s hip and eased his cock inside of him in a single, fluid motion. He ducked down to sink his teeth into the side of Bucky’s neck with a little growl. “I’m always the boss of you.”
His fingers pressed into Bucky’s skin as he rocked his hips steadily in and out, making the mattress creak under them.

---

Bucky sucked in a fast gasp and gripped Steve’s forearm for stability. Steve was right. He was always the boss of him. He wasn’t arguing that at all. “Need a quieter bed...” he mumbled and felt the hot, slick, intense thrusts in and out of his open hole. He parted his lips and stuck his tongue out just a peek so Steve would get the idea to put something in his mouth to suck.

---

“If we - ah - had a quiet bed, how else would my ma know not to come upstairs?” He smiled fondly when Bucky’s tongue poked out as he moved his hand to cup the side of Bucky’s face. He gave him a hot and dirty kiss as he fucked him. Once he pulled back to breathe, he traced his thumb over Bucky’s lips slowly.

---

“Ah, fuck, Jesus...” Bucky sputtered quickly but shut up again with the thumb on his lips. He opened his mouth wider as an invitation for Steve to give him his fingers. He liked sucking on them when they fucked. He liked the feeling of having two holes filled. Bucky finally started to stroke his hand up and down his cock just a little. He wasn’t about to overdo it and come too fast.

---

Steve pushed his thumb past Bucky’s lips once he got the invitation. He licked up Bucky’s throat possessively and started to roll his hips up with each thrust to get just a bit deeper into his husband.
Steve grunted softly from the effort as his movements pushed Bucky just a little further up the bed each time.

---

Taking Steve’s thumb into his mouth, Bucky licked and sucked around it and tried to keep eye contact with Steve as best as possible. He moaned low in his throat as he wrapped his legs around Steve’s middle to feel him pushing deeper inside. There was a thin layer of sweat on Steve’s back and it was a little hard to keep his legs secure on him but he did his best.

---

Steve whimpered as he watched Bucky suck on his finger. He looked down at his husband with dark eyes as he rocked into his body. Steve was able to keep a steady rhythm for a little while, but he could feel his breathing start to get a little irregular. He pulled his hand from Bucky’s mouth and grabbed his shoulders to swap their positions, still keeping his dick buried in Bucky’s ass. “Ride me,” he demanded breathlessly.

---

Bucky stumbled a little when he was hoisted around and his ass clenched down on Steve’s dick as an attempt to steady himself. “Fuck, yeah, Baby, I’ll ride you,” he agreed. He positioned his legs on either side of Steve and arched his back so his hands were on his thighs. He knew Steve loved seeing him all stretched out over him like this. He grinned and picked himself off Steve’s dick and then dropped back down, setting a strong pace. “I love you, Stevie.”

---

Steve looked up at Bucky as he moved, wondering what he had done right to deserve such a perfect husband and family. He put one hand on Bucky’s hip to hold him secure while his other hand pumped Bucky’s cock. “Love you too, Buck. God, you’re so beautiful. Nobody should be allowed to look as good as you do.”
“You look beautiful too, Baby,” Bucky said softly. “We’re a good pair.” He tried his best to match the way he bounced on Steve and fucked up into his hand. He wanted to come so badly. And he knew they didn’t have a bunch of time really. Everyone was asleep but they couldn’t be up for much longer otherwise Bucky would never wake up in the morning. “Your cock feels so perfect in my ass. Jesus, you’re so big and you use it so well.”

“We’re the best pair.” Steve couldn’t be convinced that there was another couple that could beat the two of them at having the best kind of relationship. “I want to feel you come,” he groaned. “I know you’re close.” Bucky always started making restless, little expressions when he was close to coming.

“Uh-Huh, fuck, uh-huh...” Bucky muttered, unable to really get anything else out. “Fuck me, Steve. Fuck me...” his mouth fell open and he knew he probably looked and sounded absolutely ridiculous. But he couldn’t help it. He was always pretty needy on Steve’s cock. He wanted to try to hold out for a few more minutes but that didn’t happen. He barely got out a word of warning before he was shooting come into his husband’s hand and over his stomach quickly.

Steve’s hands gripped Bucky’s hips tightly, holding him firmly in place as he fucked Bucky through his orgasm, gasping as his hips rolled up into Bucky’s ass. It took a few thrusts after that to fill Bucky’s ass with his cum. His orgasm ripped through him, leaving him laying almost boneless and utterly breathless on the bed. His half-closed eyes looked up at his husband and he gave a tired smile. “That’s a good look for you.” He gave Bucky’s ass a playful swat.

Bucky whined as he lowered himself down to lay on Steve’s chest. He ran his fingers over Steve’s neck and face. “You are my light, Steve,” he whispered softly, kissing him tiredly but with so much love. “And nothing ever felt near as good in my life until you came along.” He chuckled to himself and sighed. “You’re like my own personal miracle.”

Steve’s hands roamed over Bucky’s back, tracing down his spine and then back up to round over his shoulders. “You speak too highly of me,” he chuckled. “You’re the one who gave me a family, even before we had our kids. I didn’t realize how lonely I was before you came along. Also didn’t realize how gay I was either,” he laughed.

“I don’t speak highly enough. Shh, Steve”, Bucky protested gently. “I love you so, hush.” He bit Steve’s neck once to punctuate his point. “You’re so cute and I’m very glad you are gay. So, thanks for that.” Carefully, he rolled off of Steve and flopped onto the bed, tired as fuck. “I’m going to clean up and then I think I’m ready to sleep. What about you?”

Steve still was panting heavily, unable to catch his breath, but having Bucky laying next to him helped him take it slow. “I think I’m already halfway asleep. You better clean up quickly so I’m not out when you get back,” he teased, although he knew he would wait for Bucky if he took longer.

---

Bucky nodded and slipped out of bed. He returned quickly to put on pajamas and cuddle right up next to Steve. “Everyone is asleep, the girls don’t have school tomorrow, what do you say we sleep in a little bit? I’m sure Adriana will come get us once she’s decided we have been away for long enough.”

---

“I think that sounds perfect, Love. But I need a kiss to seal the deal,” Steve said as he wrapped an arm around Bucky’s shoulders. He knew as well as Bucky did that they weren’t going to get much more time to sleep in than normal.

---

“Oh, wow, such a burden,” Bucky joked as he squished as close to Steve as possible. He slotted their lips together gently and hummed into the kiss before pulling back. “I love you, Baby.” He nudged his forehead on Steve’s and then went back in for another kiss. His husband was simply irresistible every damn night. He couldn’t think of a better place to be right now than in Steve’s loving arms.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!