All Along The Watchtower

by ariaadagio

Summary

Post-S6 finale, set immediately after Sanctuary & Death And All His Friends. Following the shooting, Derek struggles to recover from his wounds, both physical and spiritual. Derek-centric MerDer.[COMPLETE]

Notes

WARNING. This begins as a very dark fic with a lot of angst, but I absolutely promise it brightens up if you stick with it. I wanted to take a really in-depth look at recovery from a shooting, and I didn't pull any punches. Though this fic certainly does contain a ton of MerDer, this is first and foremost a Derek-centric story, and Derek is put through hell in this, so he behaves accordingly. If you want happy-go-lucky S1 Derek, you won't really be seeing hints of him until chapter 20 or so, and if you want nothing but schmoopy, no-plot MerDer, you'll hate this. Please, be prepared. That being said, if you like to see characters and couples working through their issues, this is the fic for you, and I promise, I don't put my toys away broken.
Meredith Grey had never been an athlete in school. She’d been too busy making sure she didn’t fit in with as many people as possible, assuming she showed up at all, to bother with something as inane as a varsity sport. But that was not to say she couldn’t have been an athlete if she’d chosen. Given proper motivation, she could run. She could hit, too, though, with the disadvantage of her petite frame, she had to use tools provided by the environment to get the impact she wanted. Like, say, a door for leverage, and a well placed supply shelf for emphasis. Yes, Meredith Grey was a Boston-cultivated scrapper in the best sense of the word, and she hoped Cristina would forgive her for it.

She barely heard the sound of Cristina hitting the supply rack behind her and falling to the floor in a heap of graceless surprise. She didn’t spare a glance to make sure her person was okay. She didn’t spare guilt that she didn’t spare a glance, either.

There was simply no time.

She swept her clammy skin against the cool metal of the door handle and pulled. The antiseptic-tinged air of the hospital outside their closet safe haven touched her lungs and gave her fuel exactly one time before she threw her body into hellbent flight.

She ran. Derek was close, technically, were she capable of real flight, and able to traverse the distance between her and him in a straight line, but she was not a bird, as much as she wanted to be in that moment. He was several long, winding hallways away when she considered the actual path she had to take, and the mere thought of all those floor tiles separating him from her made a sob catch in her throat.

She dared a glance toward the catwalk as she tore through the promenade. Quiet wind whispered against her ears, providing no distraction between each straining thud of her heart. The silent emptiness was utterly wrong in what was supposed to be the bustling, nerve center of this hospital, a place where thousands of medical professionals worked. It was wrong and strange, but the idea lasted perhaps a nanosecond in her brain before she caught a glimpse of him in the distance.

He moved. She saw him raise a knee before he flopped flat again like a landed trout, and though the quiet was strange, it did permit her to hear solid proof that he was alive, for now. He loosed a soft, upset displacement of air, not a scream or a sob or a moan, but something smashed between the three, borrowing jagged bits of each. Her heart wrenched at the unmistakable evidence of his pain.

He was alive, but he was hurt. Very hurt. How long did she have? Her brain didn't know what to do with the twisting combination of relief and blind panic.

“Derek,” she shrieked across the void between them, “Hang on; I'm coming!” Like a birthday gift with a pretty bow and a card, she was giving any potential shooter a veritable GPS coordinate to her vulnerable body, and she knew it, but she didn’t care. Derek made another noise of suffering, and she didn’t care about anything else at all.

She ran. She ran until it seemed like every sinew in her calves and thighs was going to split apart and leave her unattached muscles sliding down her bones into a pile of goo. She ran until her lungs were going to burst, and her laboring heart begged her to stop.

Unless the wound was instantly mortal, which was often only the case with certain penetrating head shots, GSW victims typically had about 2-4 minutes of normal brain activity before bad things started to happen. Things like hypovolemic shock, hemorrhagic shock, or worse. Much worse. Derek had been shot in the upper right quadrant, which meant cardiogenic shock was also a possibility. If his heart was too damaged to pump blood, game over. If his lung was pierced, he would be drowning in his own fluids on top of that. And, without surgery, there would be nothing she could do but watch him leave her.

2-4 minutes. Minutes that were already ticking away.

The catwalk came into view as she rounded the corner. Her flip-flopping heart dropped into her stomach. He lay flat on his back, staring at the ceiling while a pool of his blood crept out from underneath his body like the slow bloom of a rose. She couldn’t tell if he was bleeding from the back, or if it was spilling over from the front. Bright, wet red smeared the right side of his shirt. Everywhere. Red.

He was still too far away for her to make an accurate assessment of the situation, but a shred of hope remained when she realized his hand was against the wound. If he had the presence of mind to apply pressure to his wound, surely that was a good sign. Surely.

She skidded to her knees beside him like a shortstop headed for home plate, ignoring the dull shock as her kneecaps bruised on impact with the floor. Her shoes slipped across the wet tiles. He stared at some point beyond her shoulder, and a little cough stuttered from his lips.

“No,” he gurgled. His body twitched, and his labored breathing ratcheted into higher gear, as though he were trying to give his rebelling muscles a command to move, and they weren’t listening.

“Mr. Clark, no...” His fear was an icy sword down her spine. She’d never heard him terrified before, and she never cared to again.

“Derek,” she said. “Derek, it’s me. I’m here. Mr. Clark is gone.”

She bit her lip as she started to triage. The hand she’d thought he had been using to apply pressure to the wound was just resting against his bloodstained shirt, as if he’d thought about attempting to stop the bleeding, but his brain hadn’t quite translated the thought to action.

She grabbed his shoulder and rolled him onto his side away from the growing puddle. He offered no resistance, submitting with a meek sort of unawareness that terrified her. She found no exit wound, but her palm came back slick with his blood. The back of his shirt was already saturated and sticky. She tried to make mental calculations about how much of his blood volume was on the floor instead of inside his body, but her hand started to shake, and math escaped her. As she resettled him on his back, she decided it was very bad, but it wasn’t the worst it could be. The surface of the wound didn’t bubble or hiss as he breathed, and he wasn’t spitting up blood when he coughed. Those were good indications that his lungs were intact, and that it was just pain that made his breaths so short and stuttered.

Her brain cascaded through her limited options with desperation. Treat the shock. Stop the bleeding. She could at least do that. How? Apply pressure. Keep him warm. Keep him calm. Keep him talking, or at least awake. She had nothing to keep him warm with, but she could freaking keep him with her. She could.

“Derek, it’s me. You’re going to be fine,” she told him as she pushed the heel of her palm against the hole in his chest.

“No,” he said.
Another arctic chill swept through her. He didn't understand her, that was all. He was still frightened, and he was trying to get away from his attacker, and he was not in any way responding to her assessment that he would be fine.

“No,” he repeated. The sound was pitiful and cut up at the end by a moan that made her heart throb.

She spared a glance at their surroundings, prepared to lay herself flat on top of him if it meant keeping Gary Clark away. She saw Cristina fly across the promenade, following the empty path that Meredith had taken moments before. There was no Gary Clark, though, and there was nobody else either.

There was nobody to help. Meredith had no blankets to wrap him with, and nothing but her hands to treat him with. A bucket of bright red, oxygen rich, arterial blood was stuck in his shirt and on the floor, not doing what it was supposed to – keeping him alive. A bullet had gone through his sternum, and was stuck somewhere in there, biting him with agony whenever he took a breath. Near his heart. Or in it, which would mean the only thing that was keeping him from stroking out and dying would be the fact that the bullet was acting as a stopper for an otherwise gaping, irreparable hole.

Her body started to shake as he made another sound of pain. It was just her and Cristina, and he was going to die. He was going to bleed to death in his own hospital, so close to salvation, and yet metaphorical miles away because some lady he didn't know had signed a DNR, and he had respected it, unlike her psychopath husband.

“Please,” she begged him. “Please, don't die. Please, Derek. You can't leave me.”

His stark, blue eyes were a shocking peal of lightning against the sea of red on the floor. He blinked, and she felt his blood-slicked fingers slip over top of hers.

“Meredith,” he slurred, his voice thick, low, and labored. The music of her name falling from his lips made her dizzy. He sounded drunk. Oh, god. She had to keep him with her. She sandwiched his offered palm between her own as though it were the only thing keeping him breathing.

“Help is coming,” she lied. “Don't die. Please, you don't get to die.”

His chest pressed against her hand like a jackhammer as he panted, his body radiating all sorts of respiratory distress. She lifted her free hand and slapped his cheek. Hard. Anything. Anything to keep him focused. He didn't recoil with pain. Didn't flinch. He just sort of ate the motion with his face and stared like a headlight blinded deer at her.

“I'm serious,” she said in her best Meredith-means-it voice. “Stay with me,” she said. “Even breaths. You can do it. I know it hurts.”

He wasn't listening. His breathing, laced with moans, remained a desperate pit fight for air despite pain. His gaze shifted away from her, his hand slipped loose, and the tenuous, rope line connection between him and her frayed. Ripped. Disintegrated. She wasn't getting through to him at all. She wasn't even sure if he still knew she was there. The loss ripped a path of devastation through her. Just like the bullet that had felled him.

Reality snapped into pinpoint focus. If she didn't get him back on an even keel with sentience, she was going to lose him. Forever. And she had nothing to help her but herself.

In that moment, the world fell away. The only thing there in the darkness was him. She knew that even if she never took his last name or walked with him down an aisle in a church somewhere, she was forever, irrevocably Mrs. Derek Shepherd. In fact, she'd endure the title for the rest of her life if it just meant he would keep breathing.

She didn't know what part of her brain hadn't been convinced yet after all the years of their moth-to-flame routine. She didn't know she'd needed any sort of nudge to prove the divine providence of it all. After all, she'd freaking come back from the dead for him. She didn't know anything in that moment except that the man dying under her palms was the lost piece of the universe that completed her soul.

In the grips of that realization, Meredith Grey began to bargain with god or whatever was up there that had seen fit to carelessly throw this man into the destructive path of her life. Derek had been tossed her way on a vulnerable night at Joe's bar, and had, for some reason, stayed for the ride. If I know you, I'll love you? she remembered saying incredulously, not realizing that in a mere few months, she would discover the irrefutable truth of the statement. Now, she knew him very well, he existed in her space as though he were the one simple fact in her chaos, and she loved him more than life.

She put her mental foot down. She refused to let this roller coaster stop at the gate.

She bargained for all she was worth. Give me a few minutes, she thought. Just a few more minutes. Send us up the hill again for another loop. We should at least get to enjoy one more shot at free fall.

Desperation burbled from her lips like a runaway brook. “Hold on, okay?” she babbled. “Hold on. I love you. Please, don't die.” If you let him live, you can take whatever you want from me.

He started to fight her. Tried to push her away.

“Get out of here, Meredith, before he shoots you, too,” he mumbled. She'd never been so elated in her life that he didn't want her around. It was working. He coughed, and the agony in his gaze speared her, but she held on.

One more loop. Maybe a corkscrew this time.

She rattled his shoulder. If you let him live, I promise to believe. “Do. Not. Die,” she commanded as Cristina ran up behind her. “Do you understand?” she continued, yelling at him for all she was worth. “I can't live without you. If you die, I die.”

Please, please, please, god, she thought. And as the bargaining continued at an auction house pace, she brought him back from the brink.

For a moment, she stood in the hallway, staring. An orderly with blood on his uniform bumped her shoulder as he ran by, mumbling an apology as he went. She felt like she was frozen in the middle of a stage with a thousand people staring as the spotlight came down and lit up her face for scrutiny. She'd forgotten her lines. She didn't know what to do. The situation was beyond her capability to finesse her way out of because it was something she'd never experienced before. It was new and weird and uncomfortable.

It was awful.

The cardiac intensive care unit was a small, quiet, dimly lit ward, a stack of ten small rooms in a line with a heavily manned nurse station at each end. Billowing curtains with boring flower prints wrapped around the sides and back of each small cubicle in an attempt to give the patients privacy from their neighbors, but nothing covered the front of each room except transparent plastic plating. It was conducive to the constant monitoring heart patients required, but it also meant there was no slow preparation for what she would see inside. Just the instant shock of seeing Derek, sick and alone in the dark.

“I thought...” she said, blinking back tears in her eyes when she saw him for the first time after his chest had been closed. The nurse coming out of his room looked up at her. “I was told he asked for me?”

The nurse, a warm, older, heavyset woman with brown hair pulled back into a stark bun, squeezed Meredith's shoulder. “Yes, dear,” she said. Her name tag identified her as Charlotte Kent. She looked frazzled and tired, but who could blame her? “He nodded when I asked him if he wanted to see you.”

Meredith bit her lip, staring beyond Nurse Kent's shoulder. “He's...”

“Still waking up, Dr. Grey. He'll be pretty out of it for a while. Don't expect much.”

“I know,” Meredith said. Her voice cracked. “I know. I've done post-ops for hundreds of these. But it's...”

The woman's honey rich voice dipped low and soft. “Different when it's somebody you love?”

“Yeah. I...” Meredith wiped her face with the back of her palm. “How much is the ventilator still assisting?”

Charlotte smiled. “About 55%. He's almost ready to come off of it.”

“55%,” Meredith parroted. That meant for every breath he took on his own, the machine was forcing him to take another. “That's—”

“Extremely good at this stage,” Charlotte said, cutting her off. “Dr. Shepherd is a healthy, vibrant man, who takes care of his body, and he'll be just fine. Why don't you go sit with him? He wants you there. I left a chair for you by his bed.”

Meredith swallowed as she forced herself to move forward, one foot after the other until her hands came to rest against the cold steel bed railing. A sick, twisting lump formed in her throat, and butterflies played tennis in her innards. She didn't know what to do. The urge to crush him in an embrace was so strong she had to squeeze the railing until her knuckles hurt. She wanted to. She wanted to, but it would hurt him, and those two warring facts made her feel like barfing instead.

He was alive, and after the hours and hours of not knowing, all while his blood dried on her scrubs, she wanted to vomit.

“I'm here,” she whispered, swallowing against bile. She wished that he would wake, just for a minute. Just so she could see. But she didn't dare ask it of him. If he wasn't ready to be awake, he wasn't ready. She started to shiver. Please, just for a minute, she begged him in silence.

He lay flat in a maze of tubes and wires and monitors. The ventilator mask cupped his pale lips and his nose and filled the quiet with a low hiss as it made him breathe. Though he wore a hospital gown, the ties over the shoulders had been undone, and the gown had been folded down to let his incision and the gunshot wound heal a bit in open air. A fuzzy blue thermal blanket covered him midway up the swell of his ribcage, and EKG leads cascaded over his exposed chest, some ending at sticky pads near his shoulders and under his nipples, others snaking under the blanket. A long, angry-looking incision, held together with Cristina's perfect stitching, bisected his chest and stopped several inches above the seam line of the blanket. Fat drainage tubes poked through his skin, one of them near his clavicle, another terminating somewhere below the blanket, probably high in his abdomen. An automated blood pressure cuff constricted around one arm and sighed as it released. An intravenous line dripped medication and hydrating fluids directly into his system via a catheter shunt in his other arm. A pulse oximeter held his middle finger hostage. A little plastic name tag encircled his wrist, proclaiming him to anyone who wanted to know: Derek Shepherd. Sulfa drug allergy. Another tube snaking out from underneath the blanket at the base of the bed ended in a small, clear bag to collect his urine. It seemed like no part of him remained inviolate.

His eyes opened halfway. The flash of his pupils as they adjusted under his dark lashes broke her into tiny bits. “Hi,” she said. “Oh, god, hi.” You're alive.

She leaned over the railing and touched his face. The sharp forest of his stubble rasped against her palm and brought out all her pent up worry in a deluge of unfettered emotion. Her lip quivered, and she made an ugly, wet sound with her throat.

“Hi,” she repeated, feeling like a moron, but she couldn't stop touching him. She curled her fingers through his hair. It was disgruntled and greasy with old sweat and pain, but she didn't care. She felt the soft curve of cartilage that made his ear. The beeping heart monitor told her he was fine, and that his heart was working steadily, but she felt at his jugular anyway. The skin pounded against her fingertips. Thump-thump. Thump-thump. Thump-thump. A joyous, unwavering timpani that she never wanted to end in a million years.

_I want to die when I'm 110 years old, in your arms._

He didn't move and couldn't speak, but he didn't seem to mind her shaky, sob-y, graceless appraisal of his health. He watched her with a half-lidded, quiet gaze. She wanted to touch him everywhere, but it felt like nowhere was safe. She didn't want to hurt him, and he was so...

“Does it hurt?” she asked in a wispy voice. She didn't want him to say yes.

His eyelids lowered further, almost to the point of being closed, and he took a weak, sighing breath, unaided, pulling air through the ventilator tube without its assistance. His head moved almost imperceptibly side to side, and then he stilled. No, it didn't hurt.

Relief tore through her like a brush fire.

She yanked up the top sheet and both blankets at the foot of the bed and pushed them back, revealing more of the wire maze. The clear line of the catheter that spilled over the side of the bed was taped against his thigh and his calf and his ankle so he wouldn't pull it accidentally if he moved.

The only thing he had on under the covers aside from his loose hospital gown was a pair of pressure stockings, which were meant to keep the blood in his legs from clotting in his veins and causing thrombosis. The thin white leggings covered his thighs and calves and came to a stop at the mid-arch of his feet, which were otherwise bare, a function of the anesthesiologist needing to have a clear view of his toenails during his surgery. His toes were a fleshy blue color, a sure sign that his body did not have enough blood in it anymore to keep them warm on its own.

She pulled his left foot into her hands, feeling weepy at the chill that charged through her skin when she touched him, and pushed the pressure stocking back to his ankle. He offered no resistance, and at first, she found herself reluctant to do anything, as though she were holding a crackable egg in her hand and not a resilient, human limb made surprisingly heavy by the fact that he wasn't helping her at all. He probably couldn't, even if he wanted to.

Silence ticked.

He hadn't been shot in the foot, she forced herself to remember. She could touch his foot.

She rubbed the dime-sized callus underneath his pinky toe, felt the bones wobble under his skin as she massaged him. The callus was rough and hard and worn from countless miles in cross trainers and hiking boots and dress shoes, but she'd never felt anything so lovely in her life. His toes flexed, just a smidgen, and then he relaxed. He blinked, long and slow, and rested his eyelids at half mast. The ventilator shoved a breath through his torso, an ever-present reminder of his fragility.

She moved through each digit in slow succession, not proceeding to the next one until the skin of the present one started to feel more like skin and less like a cadaver in a fridge. She petted the under arch of his foot, pressing firmly to avoid tickling him. She couldn't recall the number of times she'd scraped her toenail against the skin there while they made love or by accident when she rolled during the night, and gotten kicked for her trouble. He would never admit it, but she knew he was sensitive there, which she'd always thought was kind of adorable. I'm not ticklish, he would always insist. She traced the long slender bones from his ankles to his toes, and then massaged life back into his Achilles tendon. When she finished, the foot was warm, and soft, and supple to the touch. She slid her fingers up his ankle, until they brushed the coarse, curly hairs peppering his leg.

Less than three hours ago, Jackson had convinced both her and Gary Clark that Derek was dead.

But he wasn't dead.

“Oh, god,” she whispered, not caring that he was staring at her in drugged befuddlement. “God,” she repeated, feeling horrible for it after she had spent all day promising to believe and all that crap. And she stood there. Holding his ankle. Sobbing quietly until the new-found warmth of his skin reminded her she was holding him. A human being. Her Derek. And he was hurt.

After replacing the pressure stocking with care, she moved to his right foot and repeated the slow process of restoring circulation underneath his skin. The next time she looked up at him, he'd fallen back into the oblivion of dreams.

“Thank you for not dying, Derek,” she told her sleeping husband, and she settled onto the chair beside his bed to revel in the simple fact that he was lying there, breathing, he had beautiful ankles.
and calves, and he wasn't going to leave her because he'd promised he wouldn't. He'd promised, and she believed him.

She believed.

She listened as his body slowly started to recover from the shock of surgery and the effects of the muscular paralytics and other drugs in his bloodstream. More and more of his breaths were his own. The usage percentage on the ventilator dropped from 55% to 40% in the mere space of an hour. She watched as his eyes moved under his eyelids, telling her he rested and recuperated, deep in the grips of healthy REM sleep. His skin pinked up a bit, particularly his lips, and his feet stayed warmer on their own. The catheter bag began to fill with gold-colored fluid, too, a reassuring sign that his kidneys were functioning at a decent clip.

Nurse Charlotte had been right. Derek was strong and healthy.

Strong, healthy, and hers.

The next time he opened his eyes, she had the presence of mind to tell him, “Cristina got the bullet out. She fixed you. And Gary Clark is dead,” just in case he was awake enough to worry about it. A stab of grief tore a runnel into her when he blinked out a fat pair of tears. Maybe she shouldn't have said anything, but she imagined wondering and not knowing, being as weak as he was, would have been a far worse kind of torture.

When the hospital PA system crackled to life, Derek was out again, replenishing himself for another bout of wakefulness that was sure to happen later. Dr. Webber's deep, soothing baritone filled the air. “This is Dr. Richard Webber. For those of you who don't know, Chief of Surgery Derek Shepherd, among others, sustained life threatening injuries during the shooting rampage that occurred several hours ago. The Board of Directors has elected that I fill the position of Interim Chief of Surgery until such time as Dr. Shepherd is sufficiently recovered to resume his duties. I want to assure everyone that Mr. Clark has been taken care of, and it is now 100% safe to move about freely within the building,” Chief Webber said.

“We have made arrangements for a full compliment of grief and trauma counselors to be available 24/7 in the surgery wing's conference rooms, and they are for use by any hospital staff or patient during this difficult time,” Richard continued. “They are here to assist you, and I encourage you to visit any one of them when your time permits. No appointment is necessary. I would like to ask that any staff who are approached by a member of the press please forward the request to our PR department, and do not attempt to answer any questions. Please, do not approach the areas cordoned off with crime scene tape. Police are attempting to take statements from all available witnesses, and have set up a base of operations in the hospital cafeteria. The ER is currently closed to trauma. Overflow and new patients will be sent to Seattle Presbyterian, but all existing patients will continue to receive the best standard of care here at Seattle Grace. For assistance with the location of loved ones, additional administrative staff has been reallocated to the main reception area. I thank you for your patience and love in helping us deal with this horrible incident. Seattle Grace is a family, and we have lost a lot of members today. My prayers go out to all the affected families. If you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to contact me through Patricia. Thank you.”

A hiss of static and silence followed as Dr. Webber left the intercom. Meredith swallowed. Affected families. She stared at Derek's prone, unmoving form, realizing that the message was for them, among others. They were an affected family. He was her family.

His eyes opened for a third time in as many hours, and she leaned forward to kiss his forehead. She brushed a loose curl away from his face and smiled at him. “Hello again,” she whispered. “I'm
For the first time after his surgery, he moved. His hand shifted under the blankets. He tried to speak, either despite the ventilator, or because he forgot all about it. No noise came out. She ran her fingers through his hair. “You’re still on the ventilator,” she told him. “It’s all right.”

Her family. She bit her lip and leaned closer, reading irritated distress in his gaze. He couldn't talk, and it was starting to bug him. He wanted to tell her something. Something...

Dread poured through her as her thoughts of family wandered to completion. He was her family. But what about his family? He wasn't alone in the world like she was. He had loved ones. In the chaos, she'd forgotten all about them. He had a mom. He had sisters. All those sisters had children and husbands. And any one of them could be watching the news that moment and see that Seattle Grace was a barely recovered war zone. They would be beside themselves. Her heart began to pound with worry when she realized there were at least a dozen people probably going through all the thoughts she'd cycled through when she'd been running toward his bleeding, broken body. Was he going to die? Was he dead already? They needed to know. She needed to call Carolyn.

But she wouldn't leave him, not if he wanted her to stay. She'd grab the first nurse that walked by and throw a phone number his or her way, but she wouldn't leave.

He stared at her, his expression vacant and glassy from all the drugs in his system, but pointed. At her. “Derek, do you want me to call your mother?” she asked as she rested her palm against his forehead. “I’m so sorry I forgot.”

His silent gaze turned pleading. Yes. Call my mom. He blinked, and she kissed him, her mind settling as she gave it a new goal. “Okay. Okay, I'll call her right now. Is her number in your cell phone?”

Silly question. Of course the number was in his cell phone, which was in a box under the bed with the rest of the belongings they'd removed from his person before surgery. At least he didn't waste energy answering her query.

She stood, and he moved again. His arm shifted under the blanket. She watched as he strained at her, his fingers splayed and reaching for her like a man clawing for a life raft. “What is it?” she said, which was another stupid question. Yes or no. That was the extent of what he could communicate at the moment. Of their own volition, her feet moved her back toward the railing, and she watched him, confused, as he patted at her scrubs and his palm came to rest against her womb, trembling with the effort it required of him.

For a moment, she couldn't breathe. He couldn't possibly know about... He'd been out cold with his damaged heart exposed to open air when Cristina had announced to Gary Clark that Meredith was pregnant. He'd been...

Her stomach growled, the rumble of it audible even over the whir of the ventilator. His fingers flexed, and he got a loose grip on her scrubs. He pulled at her and heaved a breath that made him wince. That was when she realized he wasn't exactly aiming for her malfunctioning uterus, but he was too weak to get enough lift for his true target.

A sob fell from her lips. “I'll eat, too,” she said. “I swear. And then I'll be back.”

Like a switch had been flipped, he was done. Out. Gone. His hand relaxed, and he slumbered again. She moved his outstretched arm back under the comfort of the thermal blankets, and turned.
She only made it to the threshold before the shadow of a towering man stumbled into the way and stopped. He looked past her shoulders, his eyes red and puffy, and then he fell apart. “Oh, Jesus,” he said, his voice thick and low with raw upset. “I spent all day fixing Karev, and the whole time Derek—I heard thirty minutes ago and raced back here.”

Meredith stared at Mark. The harsh lighting in the hallway gave his face a gaunt, haunted cast. He looked like he hadn't slept in weeks and was barely on his feet. Which probably mirrored her own haggard appearance.

A nurse Meredith didn't know passed by, her shoes squeaking against the floor as she propelled herself down the hallway. The lights buzzed overhead with the faint crackle of fluorescence. Mark looked alone and tired and ready to fall down, an unstable island in the sea of empty space between Derek's door and the back wall.

“How could anyone ever do this?” Mark asked the universe, plaintive and desolate.

She didn't have an answer. But Derek was her family. Mark was Derek's family.

Meredith, you can't do nothing. She's your sister.

And?

And your family.

I'm not understanding.

She didn't know why it hadn't clicked before, but it did now. She collapsed against him and pulled her arms around Mark's slender waist. “He's going to be okay,” she said. “I got to him in time.”

“Got to him?”

“Gary Clark shot him on the catwalk. He was going to bleed out.”

I'm not gonna die. I promise.

“Jesus,” Mark said. He pulled back and looked at her, his eyes widening. “Shit. I... You knew about Karev, right?”

Meredith swallowed. She knew. She knew that Alex was not awake yet, that he was at Seattle Presbyterian on the critical list in their intensive care unit. She knew Lexie was probably sitting by his bedside, waiting, right that moment, much as Meredith had with Derek, except without the reassurance of knowing that he would wake up again in a little bit. Her heart broke, but she didn't have room for all the extra sharp pieces in her chest. There was just too much. She didn't have space for almost losing Derek, getting Derek back, watching him fake die, v-fib, and then recover, for losing a baby, and then dealing with Alex at the same time. “Lexie called me while they were closing up Derek.” Her chest started to throb, and her breaths shortened. “Alex is really hurt. Worse than Derek, I think.”

Her voice cracked like dry kindling, and she cried. She didn't know where it came from. The yo-yo of elation to desperate fear and back again all afternoon was wreaking havoc with her emotional sense of balance. She wasn't even particularly sad at the moment. And yet it all fell out of her anyway. Tears. Snot. Ugliness.

“Mark,” she said. She gasped and hiccoughed, and he rubbed her back, which only made her cry more.
“Will you please sit with Derek?” she moaned against Mark's shirt. Her face stung, and his scrubs were soft and warm. She was such an ugly crier. Ugly and weak.

She was standing right outside Derek's room. If he woke up again, he would hear this crap, and he didn't need to hear this crap. He wasn't allowed to be upset right now. He had to heal. He'd promised her he wouldn't die. He'd held up his end of the bargain. He would be okay. But not if he was listening to her sob like a gutted, gasping fish who'd just suicidally leaped out of the fishbowl of his hospital room.

“I don't want him to be alone right now, and I need to call his mom,” she said. “He wants me to call his mom. He wants me to call his mom, and I need to call her.”

Mark stared at her like it wasn't even a real question, would he sit with Derek, but his grip didn't abate. “I called Mrs. Shepherd on the way back from Seattle Presbyter. I told her I'd call her with an update as soon as possible. She said not to bother, that she'd be here on the first flight she can find with a seat, whether it's in pet cargo or first class.”

“I didn't even think to call her,” Meredith confessed. “I had plenty of time.”

“If he's not dead because of you,” Mark said, a wry smile crinkling his face, “I think she'll forgive you.” He brushed her cheek with his thumb.

Meredith sighed. “Barely. He's not dead because of Cristina. She's the one who fixed him. And because he promised.” You had to want to fight to live through a literal hole in your chest. “I'm...

Just a bystander that begged the operator for another lap on the roller coaster.

Mark squeezed her shoulder. “Just go do what you need to do. I'll sit here.”

She didn't realize how comforting the presence of Mark's big body was until he left her bereft. The chair by Derek's bedside squawked under Mark's weight. Derek's eyes opened at the noise, and Mark smiled.

“Hey, man,” Mark said, loud and falsely boisterous, the way he seemed to live life in general, but she appreciated it at the moment. “I know Meredith is probably better company, but you're drugged, and she needs a shower or something, so you're stuck with me for a few hours.”

She went to the cafeteria to grab a salad, but the crowd of police officers and throb of life and sobs there was incredible. Detectives sat at every table taking notes while streams of people babbled the details of their horrific experiences like polluted, dirty brooks expelling waste. Dr. Bailey slouched at one of the closer tables, tear tracks running down her face, her expression vacant. Meredith stared at the scene with a surgeon's detachment and backed away. A vending machine sandwich would have to suffice.

She went to her favorite back hallway. Her favorite spare hospital bed. She'd spent countless hours studying there with Cristina and with Alex. With Izzie and with George. She stopped cold when she saw a streak of dried blood at the doorway by the vending machine and the telltale spatter that marred the floor with rusty brown blotches all the way up the walk into the distance. Someone had been shot there, or ran through there while injured, or...

Something.

She couldn't bring herself to shove quarters into the machine.

The next vending machine she tried had only two sandwiches left. She didn't even care what kind, and she didn't check the date on them. She grabbed one and devoured it, feeling slightly sick after she took her last bite. Her stomach churned and roiled and threatened to throw it all back up, but by the time she made it to the bathroom, it had settled, leaving her shaky, and pretty sure she would never be hungry again.

She hit the showers by the locker room, staring at her naked body as steam billowed around her, and water sluiced down her skin. Her palms came to rest against her lower abdomen. She'd had a baby there, and now it was gone. She stared at her bellybutton sort of like she had with the cafeteria and its overflowing burble of police officers. Distant. Disinterested. Because she knew if she let herself feel, the results would be bad.

She rubbed her stomach. Shampoo ran down into her eyes as it bled from her hair. Her waterlogged fingertips puckered. She'd been host to a tiny person for a little while. Two weeks. Maybe three. She and Derek had made something really kind of great. All by accident. As if on cue, her stomach cramped. Just a little, and then it went quiet. She ran her index finger in a circle around her bellybutton.

All her resolutions not to feel dissolved in a pile of tears, but the shower washed them away.

She made her peace with it as she sat against the cold tile and let the water stream down. Her heart didn't even have the opportunity to remain broken, because Derek was okay. Derek was okay, and she didn't have much energy for anything else at the moment. His piece of her soul remained intact and functional and warm and whole. And that was enough.

The water chilled. She started to shiver. She turned the water off and sat in the cold dripping shower for a long march of minutes.

She stood, pausing to let the world settle as her vision blacked out from the elevation change. She towed off. She dressed in methodical silence, threw her towel in the hospital laundry bin, and made her way back to his room without bothering to dry her hair or put on any makeup or anything. It didn't matter. He knew what she looked like without any of that crap on, and somehow, bothering with makeup after he'd been shot in the chest seemed silly. Worrying about a collection of cells that she'd hosted for less than a month and had only known about for less than twelve hours seemed silly. She would be sad, but there was too much to be grateful for, and that was okay.

Derek was okay.

Mark looked up as she shuffled through the door. “Hey, welcome back,” he said. “I was just telling Derek that I am a way better candidate for temporary chief than Richard. Don't you think?”

“I plead the fifth,” she said, a small laugh searing her throat.

“Whatever,” Mark said as he stood and offered her the chair. “I think he should lobby with the Board for me.”

She glanced past Mark's shoulder to see Derek awake and looking somewhere sort of centered on Mark, but not quite. His eyes didn't twinkle like they usually did when Mark was making stupid jokes, but she was happy to settle for awake and sort of looking around, and Mark didn't seem concerned.

Then she realized that Derek was off the ventilator. There was no obtrusive tube jammed down his throat. No hulking thing covering his mouth. Just a lightweight, clear oxygen mask cupped over his nose and lips.
The sight of Derek, awake, breathing unassisted by anything but his own vibrant will to be alive, pulled at her like an inescapable gravity well. She sank into the chair beside his bed.

“When?” she gasped.

Mark stood beside her. “Charlotte took it out about thirty minutes ago. He's a bit stoned, but he's doing really well, considering.”

The oxygen mask covering Derek's lips fogged as he muttered something underneath. The soft, tenor hum of his vocal cords at work made her smile, even though he'd only managed a syllable or two, even though she had no idea what he'd said. Because he'd said something, which was even better than just breathing. Better by far.

“Don't worry,” Mark said with a grin. He gave the bedside railing a playful slap. “You'll be singing horribly again by sunup, I'll bet.” He turned, placing a warm hand on her shoulder. “I'm going to go grab a shower myself. Then I'll be back.”

She vaguely heard his shoes against the floor as he left, but it was a peripheral sort of thing, lost to the eclipse of Derek. Breathing. Sort of speaking.

“Hi,” she said. “You're doing really great!”

When he rolled his gaze to her, she came to realize Mark's slightly stoned assessment was a bit off. A lot off. Derek was on a lot of painkillers. A lot. A dump truck full. Mountains of them. He didn't seem to have much motor control at all, and though his gaze did eventually find her, it took the most lackadaisical path she'd ever seen. No wonder he didn't hurt. He was on a Technicolor trip in la la land made possible only by a close sister of heroin.

A fist closed around her chest and squeezed, but she ignored it. He was alive.

He pulled the mask down to his chin, where it rested in the crook of his neck. His grip was weak and pawing, made with awkward fingers that he didn't quite seem to know how to operate after having his brain disconnected from his muscles for so long. His hand lay discarded, still clasped over the cup of the mask as though he didn't have the energy to move it again. Vapors curled from the lip of the mask, and he breathed noisily.

After a moment of preparation, he croaked at her, “How are you?”

A bark of disbelief skipped from her lips. “I'm not even sure where it's safe to touch you, and you want to know how I am? Me?”

“Won' hurt me,” he slurred, his voice a bare thread of sound against the quiet. “M on good stuff.”

“Excellent stuff,” she agreed, wiping tears away. It was all right. She didn't want him to feel. He deserved some peace.

“Love you,” he said.

She bit her lip, leaning forward to brush his face with her palm. “You should leave the mask on,” she said, her voice breaking. “God, I love you, too. I love you, Derek. I saw him shoot you, and I thought you were going to die, but you didn't. You didn't die, and now you're here. Breathing. And talking. And being alive to tell me that you love me. It's perfect, but you need to put the mask back on, because if you keep talking, I'll never want you to stop even though it's got to be killing your throat. Plus, your pulse oximeter is going to start whining soon because there's no way you're getting enough air on your own yet.”
His eyelids drooped, and he stared at her like he'd arrived at his own private nirvana. “Y'babble a lot,” he said. He fell asleep between one blink and the next. Like he had originally planned to open his eyes again, but his brain had received a busy line signal when it tried, and he didn't have the energy to hit redial.

Even when she pulled his hand away from the oxygen mask and resettled the mask over his nose and mouth, he didn't wake up, and she was unable to stop herself from staring as she watched him inhale and exhale. All on his own. The disconnected ventilator had been turned off, and it rested underneath his heart monitor. Unused. Done.

She let him ride the lull for minutes upon minutes, marveling at the wondrous process of his respiration. His soft sighs were a gift greater than any kidney-in-a-jar or diamond or even a house on his land for just the two of them. Better than any promise or heartfelt declaration. He was alive. She pulled his hand through the side rail of the bed and held it. She stroked his thumb and the lines of his palm, keeping him safe and close while he slept.

When Nurse Kent returned an hour later, she frowned apologetically, carrying one of the special heart-shaped pillows they gave to recent bypass patients to hold onto while they coughed. “He needs to start clearing his lungs,” she said.

Meredith's grip on his palm tightened. “Can't it wait?” Meredith asked. “Please?”

The nurse shook her head, and placed her hand against Derek's shoulder. “Dr. Shepherd. I need you to wake up now,” Charlotte said in a commanding voice.

He opened his eyes, confusion and disorientation evident in his gaze. She checked his vitals and his pupil response while she talked at him, explaining what she was seeing and doing as she did so. She didn't need to explain much, since Derek already knew what it all was for.

She handed him the pillow. He took it with weak, shaky fingers.

“I want you to hold onto this pillow as tightly as you can, and then cough,” the nurse said. “It'll clear your lungs, and reduce the chances of post-operative pneumonia. Okay? When you're ready.”

Meredith bit her lip. He was too stoned to be thinking straight about how bad this was going to be, or too confident in how stoned he already was, or he would have hesitated more.

The results were immediate and torturous for her to watch. Air chuffed out of his mouth. All things considered, it was a weak cough. Barely in the realm of coughing, and more so in the territory of heavy, forced breathing, but devastating all the same. His breath clipped off into a weak, upset cry of pain, muffled by the oxygen mask, but not unlike what she'd heard from the promenade when he'd been busy dying on catwalk. His eyes watered, and tears spread down his face, but what was worse was that the sudden agony made him breathe hard and fast, more so than his recently broken sternum was willing to put up with, and the cycle devolved into a vicious stream of unending pain.

The nurse encouraged him, told him to hold onto the pillow as tightly as he could, but by the end of the wave, he lay against the bed, spent and pain-hazed, shaking, and looking like if this meant living, he wanted to die no matter what he'd promised.

Nurse Charlotte gabbed at him with enthusiasm, assured him that he'd done a great job and wouldn't have to do it again for a while. He remained silent, either unwilling or unable to speak again. The nurse took the heart pillow and stashed it beside his bed, again telling him how great he'd done, and then she left them alone in her destructive wake.
“It’s okay,” Meredith whispered. “You'll feel better in a minute. Please.” Please, feel better.

He found the willpower to move his hand, and she watched as he tapped the button that would give him more morphine with bloodless, shaky fingers. Then he tapped it again. And again. He stopped after the sixth click, but whether it was because he was satisfied with the results or because he’d given up on ever receiving enough to make him feel better, she didn't know. She glanced at the IV and noticed there was nothing left for him in the dispensary, though the last little bit that remained dripped down the tube as she watched.

The crushing silence killed her. He'd been too willing to speak despite the discomfort before, and now he wasn't saying a word, which meant bad, horrible things. “I'm sorry,” she soothed. If it hurt him to talk, she would go to hell for him to stay mute. She stroked his cheek, and on a whim, decided no amount of him being breakable right now would stop her from climbing into the bed with him.

She needed to feel him against her, and maybe, just maybe, her body would help him. He could use the warmth, if nothing else, and if it was truly a bad thing to do, Charlotte could yell at her later.

Meredith folded her petite body between the length of him and the railing, careful as though she were dealing with a china doll not to jar him or rest her weight on any part of him. Dodging all the monitors and wires was a feat, but she managed after a close call with one of the drainage tubes. He didn't move as she melded herself around him and propped her chin against her wrist against her elbow. She stared at the lines of his forehead, deep runnels of pain carved into his skin. The fog of his tortured exhales buffeted the oxygen mask.

He seemed stuck in that place, in agony, unable to move or speak, for eons. A stretch of time well beyond reasonable and delving into cruel and unusual passed, taking moment after moment hostage. She never wanted Charlotte to come back. Not ever.

“It’s okay,” she whispered against his ear, caressed his temples. Anything to help him.

After what seemed like years, he moved his head and looked at her. His stoned, blue eyes tore holes into her, and his fingertips brushed the fine hairs on her arm like a whisper against flesh.

“M fine,” he mumbled behind the mask, his voice weaker and a lot more lackluster than before, but when she was a mere inches away from his face, she had no trouble hearing him. “Good 's new inafeweeks,” he said.

She knew it would be quite a bit more than a few weeks, but it was a beautiful lie, and she let him swindle her with it voluntarily. Take me for a ride, Derek. “Promise?” she begged.

His sigh fogged up the mask. “Promised I wouldn' die, didn' I?”

She kissed him where his nose met his forehead and lingered there, hovering, wanting. His eyes closed, and he lay there, still like death, but alive. Alive. A breath carried his mind away from her, and his body started to relax out of the pain. His face tilted into her body, slowly at first, gaining momentum as his consciousness lost traction, but at the last moment before free fall, he forced his eyes open and stared.

“'K now?” he said.

He was such a big, dumb, self-sacrificing idiot, she decided with a sob that was a laugh. “Shut up, and go to sleep, Derek. I'm okay.”

She hadn't even finished the sentence when she realized he'd already obeyed. Every muscle loosened, and the suffering left his face like a tide escaping back to the sea.

She didn't move for hours, allowing herself to linger in his fib, to pretend it was any night, that he was fine, that this was their marital bed, and that he was spent, resting against satin sheets after he'd loved her for a thousand, endless sighs, resting for no other reason than she'd worn him out with pleasure. The idyllic fantasy washed the backs of her eyelids in color and warmth and light, and she basked. He was completely fine. It was the sort of hyperbole she needed right now.

“Lay your head, man,” she told the sleeping piece of her soul, borrowing a quote from one of her favorite books. “It's a long time 'til dawn.”

Derek was okay. Would be okay. But a little bit of extra fantasizing never hurt.
Derek Shepherd experienced life sort of like a camera. Many times when he opened his eyes, the world had changed in his absence, and allowing the new kaleidoscope to come into focus robbed him of his energy. After a long, dazed battle, he would sometimes get a clear picture, and then snap. The lights would bleed out as the flash bulb went dark.

When he was asleep, sometimes, halcyon unawareness kept him in the dark, and that was all right. Sometimes, though, he dreamed.

When he was awake, the space behind his eyes was fuzzy and flowing all the time, like somebody had turned a faucet on in his brain. His bladder felt like it was always full, like he was always in the process of peeing. Talking was a knife of agony that slit his esophagus, and each syllable he bargained for exacted its price on his broken sternum. Breathing hurt as a simple act, but beyond that, the incisions where the surgical drainage tubes entered his body throbbed when he inhaled or moved or spoke. Even with the nurses harassing him to shift positions, he was unable to rest on his stomach, and his back muscles ached from being overburdened.

Asleep or awake. He wasn't sure which was worse. He did know that he didn't want to cough again. Not ever. He wasn't sure he'd be able to make himself do it when the nurse asked him the next time, even though he knew it was a necessary evil.

While regrettably not indestructible, he'd never been prone to sickness or injury, and he'd never even considered the fact that he might be a coward about discomfort. Or unwilling to go through the pain he sometimes subjected on his patients. But...

Picture your spine and ribcage like the spine and covers of a brand-new paperback book, Derek remembered being told by the local cardio god in one of his earlier days of residency. When the surgeon has to get at your lungs and heart, the book's pages, he opens the book and lays it flat on the table, pages facing up. And, just like a new paperback, your chest doesn't want to stay open. It wants to stay closed. So, the surgeon uses his very own page holder. Your sternum is cracked in half and pried apart with a sternal retractor, and then it's held that way, forced open, for hours. A patient is going to be feeling like their torso is on fire after they wake up from that, which is why...?

Proper pain management is a must, all of the residents had said in a chorus. Right.

He supposed it was a good sign that he was becoming more aware of how miserable he was, because it meant his body was starting to pull itself out of trauma mode and push itself into healing mode. His brain was no longer wasting energy barring him from reality just to keep him alive in the moment to moment. That coast was clear. Instead, it was figuring out how to use its resources to mend the broken bits instead. To keep him alive in the long term. At least, that's what he tried to tell himself. Pain being good was a difficult truth to sell when he hurt so much.

It took him a while to realize that all this thinking meant he was awake again.

Sound arrived first. A soft, familiar voice hummed against his eardrums to the right. Meredith. That took very little processing. His senses stretched. Somebody walked down a hallway somewhere near, wheeling something large behind him. A wet slopping noise. A janitor mopping? The tinny sound of a radio set on low volume tinkled in the distance, just loud enough for him to identify the lackluster beat of some insipid soft rock station. Quiet voices he didn't know, or couldn't recognize at that volume, hovered somewhere behind that. Nurse station three doors down?
Other senses came alive. New smells drifted by his nose. The dry, ozone scent of the oxygen mask was gone. His nostrils filled with the sharp scent of antiseptic, old rusty blood, sickness, and lingering body odor. His nose wrinkled. Him, he realized with disgust. That stench was him. He reeked, and his eyelids felt gummy from lack of use.

Enter touch. His face felt like it was caked with a thick grease and grime. No obtrusive weight hugged his mouth and nose, at least, but there was still something... Something light. Someone must have exchanged the mask for a nasal cannula while he'd been sleeping. He wiggled his toes. Pleasant neutrality. No cold. Meredith again, he assumed.

Meredith. He wanted... He opened his mouth before his brain really figured out what to do with that thought, and nothing happened. Meredith. He would keep working on that one.

Sight came only after several failed tries. A slit of light breached the darkness, blurry under the wisps of his eyelashes, and then went dark. He tried once more, and the light yawned wider. His dim hospital room resolved before his eyes like a reflection in disturbed water. Messy and disjointed at first. Gaining clarity. Crystal.

Meredith sat by his bed in a rickety chair, an old, familiar book clasped in her hands. Her hair hung flat and clumped into stringy sections against her shoulders, as though she'd let it air dry from wet and then hadn't bothered to brush it. She wore familiar baby blue scrubs with a light purple undershirt and her favorite black Converse sneakers. Puffy circles hugged her eyes, and her pallor seemed almost consistent with freckle-dotted flour, white and unhealthy and stressed.

His fault, he decided, cutting through the cotton in his head. His fault, but his relief at the sight of her made his guilt pale in comparison, and despite it all, he found her beautiful. He stared, unable to do much else, at his literal lifeline.

I love you. Please, don't die.

The murmur of her words formed syllables and took meaning as he watched through tired eyes.

“Cohn looked relieved,” she said, running a finger over her ear as she read from the book. Her sneakers squeaked as she wrapped them around the legs of the chair. “I was not kicked again. I said goodnight and went out. Cohn said he wanted to buy a paper and would walk to the corner with me. ‘For God’s sake,’ he said. ‘Why did you say that—’”

His body began to shake when he recognized the words. Meredith. He blinked, and the focus he’d fought so hard for blurred, but not because he was losing to sleep for the fifteenth round in a row. Just... losing to everything.

Her soothing voice stopped. Air whispered as she flipped the page, but she didn't finish Robert Cohn's sentence. “I can't believe I'm doing this,” she muttered at the book, an adorable look of consternation pinching her nose and eyes. “He'll think it's totally stupid—” Her gaze wandered to him. A moment passed. Her expression reddened. “Or he's awake right now, and he's getting a kick out of watching me humiliate myself or whatever.”

“No,” he said, but it was more of a dry gasp of... something. A reply? Or just surviving. Overwhelming need. Confusion. Resonating, unexplained sadness. Denial.

She looked at him, eyes creasing with deep concern. “Do you want some water?”

The thought of putting anything in his stomach right now roiled. He shook his head, wiping at his face with the awkward, disconnected clumsiness of a newborn who didn't know what his hands were for yet. He wasn't crying. He wasn't.

But she knew he wasn't crying either. She said nothing about it. “It's just after midnight, which I guess makes the book even more appropriate, what with the title or whatever,” she told him instead with a quivery smile. Her fingers brushed the old lettering on the cover, obscuring all but the word 'Sun' on the front, which was barely legible in its own right. The cover had faded after years and years of repeated but gentle abuse. He'd had that same edition since high school.

He closed his eyes, preparing himself for the knife slice of real speech. “From my office?” he said. Pain snaked down his throat and bloomed somewhere deep in his chest. He sounded like a stranger to his ears. Hoarse and haggard and weak.

He heard her shift.

“I found it in your desk,” she said. “I'm sorry I went through it. I know it's your private space and there's secret work stuff in it that I'm not supposed to know about, but I didn't want to go home, not when you're here, and Lexie and Alex are gone, and you've got nothing here to keep yourself occupied, and I was hoping I'd find your iPod or something because it wasn't in your pockets when you got shot, and I swear I didn't look at any personnel evaluations or anything like—”

“Mere, breathe,” he whispered.

“Okay.” She sounded like a small, chastised child, and he hated it.

He remembered leaving the book in his top left drawer. He'd made the decision last month to reread it again and had brought it in from home. He'd been making glacial progress. Sometimes, he would pull it out for a page or two when he couldn't stand the paperwork and needed a break. He'd last read pieces of it only an hour before April had come into his office, drenched in blood that wasn't hers.

He remembered the feel of the cover, soft and worn almost to a state of threadbare defeat, as he had returned it to the drawer. He felt the weight of it leaving his hands. He remembered the knob of the drawer as he closed it. The way his breath tasted in his mouth as he inhaled once. Twice. And then as he went back to the monthly budget report. He remembered everything about the moment. And he didn't know why. Certain details of the day seemed hyper real, immutable.

Dr. Shepherd?

Sir, you shouldn't be here. This hospital isn't safe...

She smiled. “I know. I remembered. From before.”

“Keep reading.”

“Promise you won't tell anyone? I feel like I'm in The English Patient or something, and it's not like I've got a bankable voice talent.”

You do to me. The words bounced around in his head. “Hmm,” he rumbled and closed his eyes. “Please.”

The ache from talking and breathing and being awake spread all over his chest. She seemed to get it. She didn't prod him anymore.
“I love you, Derek,” she whispered. Her chair scuffed along the floor, the loud noise of it deafening in the relative quiet. A soft hint of familiar lavender parted the coiling, unpleasant odors of his dire state. Her fingers touched his face, warm and feather-light, and he felt the soft pull and twist as she parted his hair with a sweep of her palm and splayed fingers. The long tips of her nails soothed his scalp.

He wanted to say it back. I love you. He wanted to tell her how grateful he was that she was there, knowing he wasn't crying, reading his favorite book to him, not pestering him to drink water he didn't want, or remember things he wasn't ready to remember, but then her fingers wandered to his lips, soft and searching, and he didn't have the strength to part them with her in the way.

Round 15. Derek 0, Penetrating Chest Trauma 15. Perfect match.

“Rest your throat,” she said. Then she inhaled, and the story resumed. “Why did you say that about the girl in Strausburg? Didn't you see Frances?”

He listened until somewhere in the middle of chapter three, when Jake spoke of his injuries in the war, before the camera lost focus and left him blind in the dark.

“Derek Shepherd, I am never speaking to you again,” his little sister screeched as the door slammed shut behind her. Right in his face. A brand new, hand-drawn 'No Brothers Allowed Beyond This Point' banner stared him in the nose with its ugly block lettering, leaving him a battered island in the cluster of doors. Alone and tired.

He sighed and wiped at his busted lip. “Amy, come on. Don't be a brat.”

Something hard slammed against the door, and the whole thing rattled on the frame. “I am not a brat!”

“You're being a brat,” he said.

“My life is over because of you,” she wailed. “Go away. I hate you.”

“Your life is over?” He snorted. “Yours?” He raked his hand through his tangled hair and sighed, trying to ignore the slight wheeze that accompanied his exhale. He had a headache. He felt dizzy. Really, he just wanted to lie down and let his ribs unkink and his bones stop throbbing. He looked one door to the left, to the welcoming siren call of his bed, where he could crawl under the covers and die of embarrassment, but...

Footsteps echoed on the stairs, muffling when they hit the cream-colored runner in the upstairs hall, and Derek heaved a sigh. Great. Just great. She'd tattled, too. Though, he didn't really know what he expected from her. She was just a baby.

A warm hand connected to a strong wrist cupped and squeezed his shoulder. “You want to tell me why your sister called me at work sobbing so hard I could barely understand her?” said his dad in a deep, lord-what-now tone that he reserved only for the last few fights and scuffles of the day. “And why you look like a refugee?”

Derek rolled his eyes as the watch around his father's wrist caught the light. It was a handsome Rolex imitation that made his father look like a well-to-do lawyer or something, completely not his style, but Mom had gotten it, and Dad never took it off.

“Apparently,” Derek said, “Amy's life is over.” He squinted at the door, as if he could somehow burn it to ash with his stare, but it mostly just made his face hurt more.

Dad frowned and rapped on the door. “Bean,” he said. “You want to tell me what this is about?”
For a long time, the space behind the door remained silent, and Derek wondered if perhaps she’d decided to go on another one of her pouting, silent, drama queen sprees. The kind that always made the small household about as fun to live in as sleeping on a bed of tacks. He hated girls sometimes. Hated.

Another thump resounded from behind the door. The door opened, revealing Amy, tears streaking down her pale, cherubic face. Her eyes were puffy and red and tortured, and her long brown hair was scraggled and snarled like a Medusa in training.

“He didn’t show up, but he promised he’d help, Dad. He promised! Derek, you promised!” she said. She sniffled.

His dad glanced at Derek, perplexed. Derek shrugged. “Who did what now?” his father said.

“Derek! He blew me off!”

Hot knives of anger slipped behind Derek’s heart. “I didn't blow her off,” Derek said. “I heard some guys in the locker room after phys ed planning a prank. I swear, I only meant to—” He swiped a hand at his stinging eyebrow. Broken pieces of newly forming scabs came back with his hand. “I got held up.”

“You promised to help me with my science fair project, Derek. You promised, and now it’s ruined! I didn’t even place. My display wasn’t complete because you were supposed to bring the—”

He winced. “Oh, crap. The baking soda.”

“Yes, the baking soda!” she screeched.

His dad looked between the two of him, deep blue eyes worried. “Amy...”

“No,” Amy insisted. “I told Jenny that my big brother was going to help, and then he didn’t show, and they all laughed at me. My life is ruined.”

“Bean...” Dad said.

Her lip quivered. A brush fire of red splotches crawled across her skin. “No! You always take his side! It's not fair.”

Dad turned to Derek. “Why don't you go downstairs?”

“Dad, come on,” Derek said. “Just because I couldn't get there in time—”

“It's Tuesday. You were supposed to watch her immediately after school, regardless of whatever plans you two made,” Dad said. “She's an eight-year-old child, Derek. She can't be alone. As it is, I had to come home early from work, and I left Peter managing the store by himself.”

“Yeah,” Amelia snapped. She crossed her arms over her chest, petulant. “You were supposed to watch me.”

Dad and Amelia both stared at him. A lump formed in Derek’s throat. “Fine,” he growled. He dropped his book bag and his saxophone case in the hallway and left.

Round 16.

He knew Meredith was asleep before he opened his eyes. The raucous sound of her snoring hit his ears like a running vacuum cleaner. He listened. Enjoyed wouldn't be the right word. Neither would disliked. He listened, and it helped.

When his eyelids parted, he found her draped over his bed railing, a sack of gangly, discarded limbs and a waterfall of messy, golden hair. Her hand rested by his ear, as though she’d reached to touch him and didn't have the energy for the last inch before exhaustion took her hostage.

The room was dark and still. He had no idea what time it was, or how long they'd been there, not that it was ever light, or that he ever knew. It's just after midnight, she'd said, but he wasn't even sure what day she'd meant. Had it been only one day? Eternity.

The cardiac intensive care unit was an interior wing and had no windows, and the clock hung on the wall behind him, not in front. Fix that. He knew from countless times walking past, buried in post-op charts or paperwork. More paperwork lately. Less post-ops. In the recent weeks, he would look because he had a headache, and he wanted to know how much longer it would be before he could go home and be with his wife instead of read proposals.

He'd looked in the morning. The morning. As he'd made his meandering sweep through the hospital, after the alarm had been sounded. His mind's eye saw the wall clock ticking the seconds away as he moved toward neurology, blurry, but real, like he could reach out and rip the second hand right off the face of it...

Siri, you shouldn't be here. This hospital isn't safe.

I know it's not safe here. That's the point. This hospital isn't safe.

Her snoring ceased. She snuffled, and then her breaths evened out again, still in the clutches of sleep. A watch hugged her wrist as she twitched with dreaming, but he couldn't get his tired eyes to focus on something so close to his face.

Do. Not. Die.

He remembered her hand, pressing into his wound as she begged him. The watch had been on her wrist, then, too. Derek, stay awake, she'd said. He'd hurt and wanted to sleep, and she wouldn't let him. She wouldn't let him, and now he was here. Half alive.

You don't recognize me, do you?

Mr. Clark. Sorry. There's a lot going on here.

“Mere,” he said.

She didn't budge. He reached with his right hand, arm fettered only by the blood pressure cuff, and touched her face. Her hair parted between his fingertips, soft and slightly tangled.

He tried again. “Mere, wake up.” Economizing words was an art, and he overpaid. A vise clenched around his chest and squeezed until he teared, but like she'd been shocked with a cattle prod, she snapped awake.

Her hand whipped to her face to scrape away a collection of sticky drool, and she almost fell backward. The chair squawked as she pinwheeled.

“I'm up. What is it? Are you okay? Do you need another blanket? Does it hurt?” she blurted before she really had any sense of what was going on. She blinked and swallowed and blinked some more, peering around as if she didn't know which direction the 911 page she hadn't received had come from.
“You should go to an on-call room.”

Silence. She scrubbed her face with her hands. “You don't want me here?”

“I do,” he said. Please, please, stay. “But your neck...” The words took the vise in his chest and set it on fire.

Her damaged expression melted, and he closed his eyes, breathing, existing. A stabbing sensation poked under his ribcage with each heartbeat. Quiet, now, his body whispered, deep in the roots of every sinew and pore. Quiet, before I break.

The air moved and whooshed as she resettled in the chair. She sniffled, a wet sound from the gut that left him heartbroken. The bed railing shifted as her fingers wrapped around it. Her palms brushed the metal. Back and forth.

“I don't think I can sleep alone,” she confessed, her voice tiny.

I have a situation. You should go someplace safe so you don't get hurt.

I'm already hurt.

His body shuddered. The room was much too small for a cot, not without impeding any staff member who was trying to monitor him. He knew he should argue, because she would wake up in pain in the morning. Knew he should. Couldn't. Wouldn't.

You hurt me when you decided to kill my wife...

“Okay,” he said. His voice sounded shaky and broken. He reached for the morphine button and slept.

His father found him sitting alone in the kitchen, staring at the small oak dinette table. Derek pushed the salt shaker with the pepper shaker to the edge of the table, and then reversed, in a solemn game of spice hockey.

“Do you want to tell me what happened?” Dad said as he sat down in the nearest chair. He caught the shakers in his big hands and took them away, forcing Derek to look up.

The white, frothy curtains billowed in the cool, spring air. A siren passed by outside, but the intrusion was an ephemeral one. It was New York. There were always sirens. Derek sighed. “Some stupid seniors decided it would be fun to see if they could get Casey Whitmore to dress up for the prom. They were going to drench her with a water hose and take pictures. I heard them talking, Dad. I swear.”

Not that it mattered, much. Casey didn't even know he existed. He sat next to her in Geometry, and she'd never once looked at him except to pass papers across the row when the teacher handed them out.

He sighed, waiting for the lecture about responsibility. The one that his father always capped with tired cliches, like the pen is mightier than the sword, and all that. Every time he and Mark came home with new scrapes and bruises that Mark had invariably conned him into getting, his father gave them that one, as if it would somehow stick if he repeated it just one more time. But the lecture never came.

His father nodded as a serious, stern look came over his face. He stretched across the table and gently thumbed Derek's split lip. Derek flinched. “You want to tell me what happened?” his father Derek shrugged. “I told them to leave her alone. She's in my class, Dad. She's just a sophomore. She would have been crushed.”

“And they hit you?”

Derek looked down at the table, picking at the place mat.

“I'm surprised Mark didn't join in,” his father said.

“Mark is in detention for fighting already. He wasn't there.”

The chair rumbled as Dad leaned back and sighed. “Should I be expecting a call from school for you, too?”

“No,” Derek said.

The janitor had found them before a teacher had. Rolling around in the dirt by the baseball dugouts. Clawing. Snarling. You're a good kid, Shepherd. Don't let me catch you fighting again, the old man had said as Derek had picked bits and pieces of sod out of his hair and spat blood to the ground. His cheeks reddened as he thought about it. A good kid. That's all anybody ever thought he was. Even bloody and cut up by violence like a common thug.

“Nobody is ever going to take me seriously,” Derek said, and then he looked at his father. “Are they?”

Dad sighed. “Der, I know that right now, you feel just the opposite, but some day, young man, you're going to rule the world.”

“Right,” Derek said.

“So, do you like this girl? This Casey?”

He frowned. “It doesn't matter.”

“Derek...” His father wilted with what had to be pity.

Derek clenched his fists. “I don't want to talk about it, Dad. I've had enough humiliation for one day.”

Derek woke deep in the bowels of an MRI machine, only vaguely remembering them telling him he needed tests. Checking Cristina's work or something. Making sure he didn't drop dead because she'd missed a stitch. Residents didn't do the sort of surgery that had saved him unsupervised. They simply didn't.

The narrow tunnel hugged his body too close. He couldn't move, and that made him claustrophobic. With a deep breath that made him wish he hadn't bothered, he forced himself to be still. It would be over, soon, and then the thunderous banging noises of the machine would stop. He tried to pretend it didn't sound like gunfire.

Seconds passed as his father considered him. “Let me show you something,” he said. He pushed back from the table, motioning for Derek to stay. Dad left the kitchen, heading for an unknown destination somewhere in the small house. His heavy footsteps clumped away into muffled, diffuse thuds. When he returned, he held a dark brown book in his hands.
His father pulled his chair around and sat next to Derek, close enough that the spicy smell of his familiar aftershave tickled Derek's nose. His father opened the book, a battered, musty photo album, and flipped through the yellowing, sun-damaged pages. The page came to rest on an old sepia photo with sheared edges and a long-faded, illegible date written in the white margins around it. A skinny, scrawny boy with black, frizzy hair stared back at Derek, frozen in time, as he held a trout and his cobbled-together fishing pole up for the camera's inspection.

“Just so you know,” Dad said, “I don't show this to people. Not even your mother.”

“Who is that?” Derek said. He touched the page, careful to avoid leaving fingerprints. The boy seemed familiar in a vague sense, sort of like Derek himself, but different. A broader nose, a wider forehead, eyes more deeply set...

His father laughed. “That's me, Der. Back when I was your age.”

“No way,” Derek said. His voice cracked and went high falsetto in his excitement. He clamped his mouth shut. Hot blush spread across his face and his ears, and he diverted his gaze.

“I look at you and I see myself, Der,” his father said. He squeezed Derek's shoulder. “You're young. Your body is changing. You feel alone. You feel like nobody understands you, particularly in this house, surrounded by women. But in a few years, I swear. You'll look back on this day and laugh at it. We Shepherds are always late bloomers, but you have great things to look forward to. Honest.”

Derek stared. His father had a broad, rugged face with a perpetual five-o'clock shadow that made him look distinguished and weather-worn. Laugh lines hugging his eyes made his face look like it was owned by a mischief maker. He smelled like cut leather and cedar and experience.

“I wish it would happen now,” Derek said. He couldn't imagine anybody ever trying to hit his dad.

“Well, you know what they say about that, don't you?”

“What?”

Dad grinned. “Good things come to those who wait.”

Derek rolled his eyes. That one was worse than the pen is mightier than the sword. “Dad...”

“I couldn't resist. I'm sorry.” He chuckled, deep and low and soothing, and then bumped his hip against Derek's. “Now, go get your sister. I have to go back to work, and you're going to help me make up the time I just lost to come referee this mess.”

“Can't we just leave her?” Derek said.

“I wish, but your mother would skin me when she gets home with the girls if she finds Amelia sobbing in the house by herself. Perhaps if we make her smile in the display window, she'll attract some customers.”

“I have to clean up first,” Derek said.

“Your mother moved the antiseptic to the medicine cabinet upstairs.”

“Okay,” he said, and he left to patch his wounds.

The gurney came to a stop in the hallway, and the orderly left him there, parked out of the way of foot traffic. Why? The sharp hallway fluorescent lights made the air too bright. Even when he closed his eyes, he saw a blaze of flesh-colored light through his eyelids, and he just didn't want to be there. In the hallway. Where people would see him and want to try talking to him.

The mere idea of talking, of holding some sort of fluent conversation, made him nauseated.

Mr. Clark...

Shut up. No talking. You're not the man here.

His body had begun to throb in time with his pulse, along his ribs and underneath them. He breathed, except breathing made it worse. He tried to slow down, to even himself out and relax, but the rhythmic stabs to his side and his lung made him want to pant instead. The vicious catch-22 snapped its iron jaws shut around him. The agony wasn't loud and boisterous like a sudden trauma, like a gunshot. It was malignant, and festering, and it burned him in a quiet, hypnotic blaze, whittling him down every time he tried to inhale.

I'm the man. I told my wife I would be.

He wanted it to end. He wanted to go back to his nice, dark room, and hurt. By himself. Or with Meredith. But that was it.

I'm the man. And a man looks after his wife. But I didn't. I let you decide that she should die. I wasn't a man then. But I'm a man, now.

Whispers interrupted his suffering, and he realized, then, why the orderly had left him. He would be receiving VIP service. A familiar face greeted him as she exited the imaging room behind her. She wasn't a cardio-thoracic surgeon. He had no idea why she'd been overseeing the post-operative review of his innards, but couldn't bring himself to feel anything other than comfort at the fact that she, of all people, had taken a personal interest.

“Am I still in one piece?” he asked. His words cracked apart over the rocks on the air. His war torn throat made him sound like he was spitting up dry gravel instead of syllables.

Bailey’s hands tightened around his charts, and the way her face reflected his pain like a cool plate of mirror glass scared him. He began to wonder in the intervening silence if his body was a bit more broken than he'd thought.

“You,” she said, booming, almost accusatory, but then her voice broke and fell away, and in that moment, she was very much a vulnerable young woman. Not a Nazi. She reached for his hand and squeezed. “You're a very lucky man, Shepherd.”

Something in her eyes snapped. Somebody else had not been lucky.

It isn't safe here. Somebody has to protect people. From you. Handing down judgments. Like you're god.

“M sorry,” Derek whispered, perhaps wheezed.

Mr. Clark, please—

You don't get to be god.

She wiped her face with backs of her hands. Her lip quivered. “You don't get to be sorry,” she said, but there was no bite in her tone. Only relief. “You get to heal. Your insides are a mess at the moment, but no more than they should be. Yang did a good job.”

“Hmm,” he said. “D hate to think she'd been taught poorly.”

Bailey laughed.

His gurney started to roll. He stared, blank and throbbing, at her upside down face. She said hello to people in the halls. He heard well wishes, and she shooed more than one person away with a violent sweep of his charts and hissing spitting words. “Don't you have better things to do than gawk?” she said. A few condolences seemed genuine and not born of rubbernecking, but he didn't have the energy to reply or indicate he'd noticed them. They stopped at the elevator, which dinged, and then they were alone again, away from the bustle and crush of activity.

“Drainage tubes...” he said as the elevator started to hum, and his body felt heavier. Going up. Up... “Starting to bother me.”

She moved, slammed her fist on the elevator halt button. Such an abused feature. It was for emergencies. Air whispered as she flipped the blankets back and peeled his gown away from him. Modesty synapses didn't fire. He just lay there, wishing it would stop. It. The burn. If she could make it stop, she could stare at him all day. Her warm hands fiddled with tape and gauze and touched naked skin. He couldn't hold onto the shaky, dry sob that skipped from his lips and made his whole chest want to seize.

Please—

No talking!

She froze. “If this is bothering,” she said in a low, dangerous voice, “I'd hate to see actual pain.” She mumbled something about men with stupid hair, but he couldn't parse it in the bedlam of sharp, jagged sparks her touch had caused.

“Trying to be modest,” he said. His heart wasn't in it. He sounded flat and dour, wheezy even, but she played with him anyway.

Her eyes sparkled despite a sniffle that followed. “Morphine is supposed to make you happy. Not delusional.”

Another gentle touch, and he moaned, panted, and the world turned fuzzy. The slow burn became a conflagration. He shook like some sort of leaf, and he couldn't make himself stop. His muscles tripped and skittered under his skin.

She frowned, referenced his chart, and went back to staring at his naked chest. He didn't move. Couldn't. Done shivering, his muscles locked up. Enough, they said. Stop torturing us. We're raw.

“The incisions around them don't look infected,” Bailey said. He watched the swirly blur of her scrubs as she leaned. “The tubes don't seem occluded or clogged. You're still losing quite a bit of fluid from them, though. I think they're probably going to stay in for a while. You seem to be one of those unlucky people who's really sensitive to chest tubes.”

Great. One of those people.

“Or it could be because you've been shot, and you have a hole in your chest, you damned, stupid fool,” she said, glaring.

He tried to catch his breath and couldn't. She put his gown back together with quick, economized motions, and pulled the sheet to his chest while he lay there, passive. He didn't want to move again. He felt abraded. Cut to the bone. He didn't want to speak. Or breathe. Or think.

“More morphine?” he said. “Please?” It was the last thing he was going to say for a while. He was done. He raised a weak, shaky hand to his face and wiped away the tears. His palm ran over sharp, endless stubble. He tried not to imagine the skin oil and grime he was getting on his hand.

The elevator resumed, and Bailey moved behind his head again. She stroked his greasy hair as though it were something she always did. He supposed it was, just not with him. She was a mom. And, despite her notorious title, she was one of the most empathetic doctors he'd ever met.

“Shh,” she soothed.

Derek! Hang on; I'm coming!

He closed his eyes. She sang a lullaby. Abject misery gave way to gentle waves.

Two men argued by the cash register with Peter as Derek pushed through the door of his father's large hardware store. The tiny bell above the door chimed, and Amy and his father trudged in after him out of the chilly spring air, but neither Peter nor the unkempt pair looked up from their debate.

The arguing seemed heated but innocuous at first. Like the two men were trying to get a deal, and Peter wasn't budging. One of them was short and skinny, with wispy gray hair. The other was tall, fat, and balding, brown hair swept over his q-tip head in a blatant, obnoxious comb over. They both wore wrinkled suits with crooked ties and scuffed shoes that had seen better days.

“Everything all right here?” Dad asked as he stamped his feet on the welcome mat and passed by the cash register.

Peter shoved his spectacles back against his long, beak nose, and huffed. “Yes, Mr. Shepherd. These men were just leaving.” He glared and crossed his long arms across his chest.

Peter was a tall, lanky man with faint wisps of a red beard permanently stuck to his pointy chin. He worked in the store during the evenings and on the weekends to support his enrollment at Columbia or something like that. Derek had first met him four years ago. They maintained a casual sort of civility, but didn't really like each other. Much.

The two men looked appropriately cowed, and Derek's father nodded, leaving them and Peter behind at the register as he followed Derek and Amelia to the back of the store toward his office, where he had been working on the ledgers. The arguing renewed and escalated before they'd even reached the end of the aisle. Peter raised his voice. The fat man and the short man started to gesticulate.

Dad stopped and turned. “Hey,” he called as the short one pushed Peter, a menacing look on his face. “Hey,” his father said again, when his first interjection failed to halt the scuffle. It was his warning voice. The one he used when he was about the break up a fight between raucous siblings or rowdy brothers-in-spirit.

A loud crack and a thump followed. The roar was the sort of sound Derek had only ever heard in the movies and on television, so he didn't connect it with anything real at first, even with his ears ringing, even with his nose burning from the powder smell. Not a gunshot. Just a crash. Not a body on the floor. Not a robbery.

“Derek, take your sister and hide,” his father whispered. He pushed them back behind an outcropping covered with handwritten advertisements. Oil-based paints. Half off.
Derek's eyes widened when he saw a puddle of red spreading out from underneath Peter's body. His heart started to pound when he saw the gun. A pistol or something. Silver, with a dark handle and a long snout. Sort of like Dirty Harry's make-my-day revolver, except this wasn't a Clint Eastwood movie. There was no clickety-clack of a film projector behind him, telling him the credits would roll in a few hours. The man holding the gun was not a police officer.

And his dad was walking toward him. Toward it. Toward the gun.

"Derek," Amy hissed, but he covered her mouth with his hand and pinned them back behind the shelf as he tried to stop himself from panicking. Empty display boxes fell on top of them, and he couldn't breathe. He couldn't breathe. The office sat behind them, a mere ten feet away, but he couldn't move. The smell of cut pine and cypress nauseated him. What was Dad doing? Why was he—

"Hey!" the man with the gun said, the taller fat one, as Derek's father leaned over Peter's body. Shorty pawed through the open cash register.

His father splayed his hands, and he held them in the air. His wedding ring flashed in the fading sunlight. "Look, I know first aid," he said. "This man needs medical attention. I just want to help—"

The gun waved. Fatty glared. "Back off, asshole."

"Nobody else needs to get hurt," his father soothed. "This man will die. I just want—"

"To help," Shorty spat as he stuffed a roll of tens and twenties into his coat pocket. "Right. I believe my friend said back off."

"No," Fatty said. "I said back off. Asshole."

"All right," Dad said. "All right."

Fatty moved. "Give me your wallet."

"Take it easy," Dad said. He reached into his coat pocket, slow, like he didn't want to spook a horse that was ready to bolt. He withdrew his worn black billfold. "Here. Take whatever you want." He stretched out his hand and held the billfold out for them to take. They grabbed it, but their attention soon wandered.

"What about them?" Fatty waved the gun toward the back of the store. Toward Derek, and his squirming sister. "They got money on 'em?"

"No," Dad said, which was a bald lie. "They're just kids. I didn't give them an allowance this week."

Derek had a small wad of bills in the back pocket of his jeans from the work he'd done over the weekend. They felt thick and heavy, and he started to shake. His sister wouldn't settle down. She bit his hand in her distress, but he winced through it, and then, without even thinking, he wrenched her hard. She stilled, stunned. He couldn't breathe. He couldn't...

Shorty leered. "That's a real nice watch, mister," he said.

"My wife gave it to me," Dad said. "She's expecting me home soon."

"Isn't that sweet," Shorty said. "Give it to me."
Amy twitched and squirmed. “Daddy,” she whined into Derek's hand.

“Please, it's an anniversary gift,” Dad said. “It's not even worth—”

The gun kicked back in Fatty's hand. Derek clapped his hands against his ears, but it was too late to block the noise. His sister, surprised and unsupported, fell to the floor with a wheezy thud. The thunderous crack vibrated deep within Derek's chest. His eardrums, already tortured by the first shot when Peter had fallen, sucked in the sound, and then the world went quiet except for the dull sound of bells ringing over and over and over again in his head. The acrid smell of burnt, smoking powder clawed at the back of his nose and throat.

“—hematoma and a lot of blood in his lungs. The bullet would have chopped his aorta in half if it'd been a millimeter to the left, but I was able to get it out. Teddy and Bailey said the post-op scans look fine. I'd like to remove the drainage tubes and the catheter tomorrow and see if we can get him moving around, but for now, I think rest is really the best thing for him.”

He woke up in the silent bubble between one scream and the next, and so he made no sound at all. The startle made him move his arm to the railing. His heart thudded once, twice, and then eased into a dull march as his mind woke him up. Dreaming. Only dreaming. Vivid thoughts slipped away into a fog. Then he couldn't remember anymore what had terrified him, and after that, he couldn't remember being terrified.

The three women standing next to his bed all turned, except one of the faces wasn't supposed to be there. She'd aged since he'd last seen her, and was now a beautiful young woman, bloomed into adulthood and grace. The gawky, upset teenager he remembered was long gone. She wore her raven-brown hair down over her shoulders, loose and lovely. He hadn't seen her in a long time, he realized. The thought bothered him. It buzzed around his head like a gnat. Had he even attended her medical school graduation? Then his concerns became immaterial, because he figured out what was really going on.

“Amelia,” he said. “You're in my head.”

The figment of Amelia grinned. “Wow, you really are stoned, aren't you?”

Cristina made a dry, deep sound in her throat, covering her lips with her hand, and for a moment, he thought they weren't going to let him in on The Big Joke. It was Meredith who leaned close and whispered, “Amelia got here a few hours ago from LA.” Her voice sounded humoring, as if it was something that she'd already told him, as if they'd already had this conversation.

Had they?

He struggled to process this new information. “But...”

“I was visiting Addison,” the figment said before he had a chance to tell her she worked in New York, and therefore could not have been arriving from Los Angeles. The skin around her eyes ticked as she lied to him. I'm not using anymore. I swear. He'd learned to recognize her untruths. But when he blinked, the lie didn't seem to matter anymore.

He relaxed back into the pillow, enjoying the way his brain seemed to whirl like a slushy in a mixer in his head. The three women stared back at him, goggling like fish. Or maybe he imagined them goggling. It seemed odd, regardless.

“Bailey gave me more morphine,” he informed them.

Meredith snorted. “Yes. Yes, she did.”
“It makes you eu-euphoric, you know.”

Meredith kissed his forehead. “It sure does.”

“Too many u's.” He sighed. “Mere. Mere, I need to tell you something.”

She frowned. “What? What is it?”

“I don't think I can have sex in the elevator tonight,” he said. More like his brain regurgitated. But he did recall something about an elevator. Or was that from before?

Meredith's eyes widened. Maybe he'd been wrong.

“Rain check?” he said.

Cristina rolled her eyes. “Mere, you have got to record this so he can see it later. It's better than television.”

“It's a leg legit.” He struggled. “Legitimate. It's a question.”

Amelia smirked. “Well, that was worth the trip.”

The swirl behind his eyes sucked him back into thick mental taffy. He closed his eyes and couldn't open them. He couldn't remember why he didn't want to fall asleep. “I proposed there,” he said. And then he slept.

For a moment, neither his dad nor the two men at the register moved. A can of paint thinner had tipped in the commotion, and the glug, glug, glug of the liquid as it surrendered to the floor broke the silence. But everything seemed fine.

Then his dad stumbled, caught his hand on the counter top, collapsed to his knees, and went down like a bag of wet cement next to Peter.

Amelia started to scream and wouldn't stop.

“Shit!” Shorty said. “Take his watch, and let's go.”

“Dad,” Derek yelled. “No.” The world slipped away. He didn't care about the gun or the two men, who looked at the new body on the floor like it was a minor inconvenience and nothing more. Didn't care about his screaming sister.

The space between him and them closed as his strides ate the floor tiles. Another shot cracked in the loud space, and Derek felt something zip by his ear. Plaster exploded from the wall behind him in a shower of dust and bits.

“Jesus, Ron. You really want to shoot a stupid kid?” Shorty said. He grabbed the gun from his friend and pocketed it. “Just take the guy's watch, and let's go.”

“Dad,” Derek repeated. He slid to the ground beside his father, who blinked and stared at the ceiling, bell rung by the unexpected trauma. He shook his dad's shoulder. “Dad, Dad. Dad!”

Fatty leaned down and grabbed his father's wrist. His dad opened his mouth, tried to speak. No words came out. The man didn't listen, anyway. The watch came loose from his dad's slack wrist, gold flashing under the light of the counter top display case, and then the two men ran into the street.
Wheels screeched against the pavement, and then...

Silence.

“Dad,” Derek said, shifting to find purchase amongst the gore-y chaos on the floor. “Dad, please.”

Amy slipped on the paint thinner, skidded, and came to an awkward rest at their dad’s other side. She kicked the container by accident and it skipped to the side. There was a twisted, battered hole in the side of the can.

For a moment, his dad lay there, eyes open, breathing, stunned. Then he blinked. “Are you and Amy okay?” he asked, his voice thick and strange, like there was a weight in his chest that shouldn’t be there. He didn’t look at them. He stared at the ceiling. He fumbled, unseeing, at his coat. The first button unlatched.

“Yes,” Amy said, her tone on the razor sharp edge between barely held together and hysterical. “We’re fine.”

“Good,” his dad said. He blinked again. His face tilted to the side, like he didn’t have the energy to hold his head up anymore.

That was when Derek saw the blood. The last button on his father’s coat came free. His father’s white shirt, hidden by the dark wool of his duster, had been saturated in mere seconds.

His father found Derek's hand and squeezed it. His grip was really strong. And warm. That had to be a good sign. Right? “Put your hand here,” his father said. Derek bit his lip when his father guided his fingers to the break in the skin on the soft part of his belly, and the wet, ruined flesh and gore beneath it. It was like touching shredded beef, and Derek's gag reflex kicked in, but his father held on. “Put your palm into it.”

“Like this?” Derek said, pressing down hard. His eyes watered as he swallowed and choked. He would not throw up. He would not. Throw up. No.

His father groaned and closed his eyes, panting. “Yes,” he said after a moment. “Peter. Is he all right?”

Derek glanced to his right, taking quick breaths through his mouth. If he didn't breathe through his nose, he couldn't smell it as much. It. The gaping wound in his father's abdomen. Peter stared back at him, his eyes not focused on anything in particular. He was just gone. Like a wax mannequin save for the gaping hole in his chest and the spreading blood slick on the floor.

“His eyes are open,” Derek said. “He’s not moving.”

“All right,” Dad gasped. He closed his eyes.

The ringing in Derek's ears subsided, replaced by the dull shriek of panic. Do something. Do something, do something! “Amy,” Derek snapped. “Amy. The phone. In the office. Call 911.”

She stared at Dad, her hands tugging desperately at the lapel of his jacket. “But...”

“Amy, go,” Derek said. “He needs help, and I can't move my hand.”
Her eyes widened, and she said nothing, shell-shocked as she turned away. Her reluctance to leave turned into a frantic dash.

“Dad,” he said. “Wake up. Stay awake.”

His dad stared at Derek, blank, a fever-bright shimmer in his eyes. Between them was a wall of panting and struggle and war, and neither spoke.

Derek dared to look at the wound. His fingers clenched. Blood and gore spattered his hand, bits that weren't supposed to be on the outside of the body, but he had no idea what. His stomach flip-flopped. “Am I doing this right?”

“Derek, listen to me,” his father slurred. “This is very important.”

Derek's heart pounded. His father's color faded from ripe peach to gray as he watched, and little dots of sweat collected at the edges of his forehead. The crinkles around his eyes, usually long lines of laughter, had become a latticework of pain.

Derek swallowed. “Dad?”

“I'm sorry.”

“Sorry for what, Dad?”

His dad took a breath. His body relaxed. A light filled his eyes, like he was staring at a Christmas tree in the dark of night, after the last ornament had been put on. And then he died.

“The ambulance is com—” Amy came to a halt somewhere behind them. “Dad? Daddy!”

“Wake up. Derek!”

His eyes opened to agony. Flames licked along his incision, and the vise in his chest squeezed so tight he could barely breathe. “No,” he gasped as the fire engulfed him, and the distant echoes of ambulance sirens wailed in his head. Not ephemeral. Not. His stomach churned, and nausea twisted his vision.

Derek, listen to me. This is very important.

This is very important.

Very important.

“Derek, wake up!”

Important.

He blinked. The sirens stopped. Meredith's arms wrapped around him.

I'm sorry.

He clutched her like a shield.
“Okay. They're going to find Teddy,” Meredith said as she raced back to the gurney where Derek lay. “It's gonna be okay. It's gonna be okay. It's gonna be okay.”

“Kiss me,” he said, and so she did.

Touching him this way was the first kind thing she'd done to him in what seemed like years, and it made her want to sob, but she refused herself the luxury and pushed the feeling back down where he wouldn't have to see it or hear it. Not after what he'd just been through.

She'd had to hit him more than once. Stay awake, she'd said. Over and over. Yelling. And then she'd had to watch him moan when she and Cristina and April had forced him to get up. Forced him to climb into the wheelchair that Cristina had managed to scrounge from a nearby hallway. Forced him to stay awake and talking. Forced him onto the gurney in the operating room. Forced him over and over to make his body do things he had no reserves or fortitude left to do.

All that movement had been nerve-wracking and horrible on so many levels, because he'd been in agony and making noise, and they hadn't known where the bullet was, but circumstances meant either risking a spinal injury and moving him, or killing him by leaving him on the floor.

The torturous test of endurance hadn't ended with getting him to the operating room, either. After they'd gotten him settled and still on the gurney, they'd had to touch him. Not like a wife touches a husband. Like a doctor touches a victim. Getting things fixed was paramount, and a patient's comfort sometimes took a backseat to that.

Watching him bear all that had been heart wrenching for her because it had left her wondering if those would be his last memories of her.

Memories of her hurting him.

They'd stopped the bleeding, at least, and he'd reached a certain level of stability. He had his eyes open to bare slits, but they were open, and she wasn't forcing him anymore.

She could be kind again, and it made her entire body wilt with relief.

“I'm not gonna die,” he said. “I promise.”

“Good, because that would be the worst breakup ever.” He tried to chuckle, but the results were an explosion of pain across his features, and his shallow breathing sharpened into something frantic. “Sorry, sorry,” she babbled as she reached for his hand. “Sorry!”

She leaned over the table and watched, silent, as he tried to breathe. His lips, pale like chalk, parted. He wasn't breathing through his nose anymore, like he just couldn't get enough air that way. His chest rose and fell as though he were recovering from running up an endless flight of steps. The effort...

Her throat ached.

“It's gonna be okay,” she whispered as he labored. She squeezed his shoulder with her left palm and stroked with her thumb along his deltoid. His skin was cold. Cold, and clammy. Even through her gloves, he felt shivery. And his breathing was getting worse.
Splinters of dread jabbed her soul. His lungs had seemed all right based on her initial triage, but it'd been many minutes since then. Many minutes with a bullet sitting in his chest cavity. Bullets, which traveled in a parabolic path to begin with, did odd things when they hit bones and organs. They ricocheted. They bounced around. She rarely saw victims where a bullet had simply taken a straight line to its resting place. Even if his lungs weren't damaged, there was a bullet stuck behind his breastbone, and it had torn who knew what sort of jagged path through his body once there. Even if the wound wasn't bleeding onto the gurney, he was still bleeding. Inside. The blood didn't have anywhere to go. It would sit there in his chest cavity until he filled up, and then he would die.

“Tell me something,” he said.

She blinked. “Like what?”

“Anything,” he said as he pushed up his eyelids and gifted her with stark blue irises, watery and lit up with agony. “Tell me anything.”

Distract me, he meant. Distract me so I don't have to think about the fact that breathing is like trying to stuff an elephant into the back seat of a Prius.

I'm pregnant was the first pair of words that came to her mind. That would be a pretty big distraction. A coherent sentence formed. I'm pregnant, and we're going to have a baby, Derek. But her brain skidded to a halt just as the syllables reached her lips, ready for launch. I don't want you to be alone if anything should happen to me, he'd said. I don't want it to just be you, he'd said. I'm pregnant was basically giving him permission to kick the bucket, she realized. I'm pregnant was bad. Very bad.

Her fingers clenched, and she couldn't breathe. For just a moment, she couldn't breathe, until she heard him fighting so hard through another inhalation it snapped her out of it. Not breathing when he was trying so hard seemed like waving her house key at a homeless person or something. She couldn't just not breathe.

“Derek,” she said, and then her throat seized, and the world turned blurry. The shiny silver and dull green surfaces of the operating room melded, until she blinked. Wet slivers tore down her cheeks.

She tried to think of something else to say. Anything. All manner of subjects flitted through her head, from the obscure to the inane, but they all seemed like ridiculous things to be discussing with him if this was going to be the last discussion they ever had, and despite his promise, that worry remained behind her heart, clenching harder with every heartbeat as she thought of his chest cavity. Filling with blood.

Her mind churned. He wanted to be distracted. He was maybe dying, he wanted to be distracted, and she had nothing. Nothing except a positive pregnancy test death warrant, and she couldn't get her brain off of it.

“I'm...” she wheezed. The mere thought of speaking was like a mule had kicked her in the gut. She couldn't and wouldn't say the words, but all she could think about was drooling babies and diapers and bottles and sleepless nights and him and her taking turns answering a wailing little person's demands at all hours of the night until both of them were so tired they couldn't think straight but it was wonderful and she couldn't— “God, you'd make such a perfect dad,” she blurted, and the screaming in her head faded to a whisper.

She stroked his bicep as he stared at her, perplexed behind the hazy wall of trauma in his gaze, as if to say, where on earth did that come from? He lay quiet, gasping softly. He blinked, and his mouth opened and shut and opened again, like he had a million things to say but couldn't think of which one to try first. He settled on, “You think so?”

He peered at her, panting, and she couldn't keep her hands off. She yanked off her gloves with a loud snap and touched him, skin to skin. She wanted him to remember nice things. Nice things that weren't painful or scary or bad. She touched his face and pulled her fingers through his hair. He leaned into her caress, and his breathing slowed, a drop in a massive ocean, but it slowed.

“I know so,” she said as she kissed him again. “I know. I... It's why you can't die. Okay? Besides the fact that I love you, and you just can't, you'd make a perfect dad, and you're not one yet.”

She kissed him, and she tried not to think about how weird it felt, to be kissing him and not have him kiss her in return. She was used to his hands, running through her hair or racing along her spine, cupping her hips or petting her underneath the waistband of her pants, touching her until she felt raw and shivery with love. But Derek's hands lay by his sides, unmoving, his muscles spent. She was used to laughs, and the softness of his breaths hitting her face. But laughing hurt him. She was used to banter and wit, sparkling eyes, and soft moans. Derek Shepherd made the most beautiful moans when he was aroused, low and gritty, deep within his chest.

She cupped his face, and gave as much of that to him as she could. “I love you, Derek,” she whispered. “I love you.”

A soft, exhausted sound rumbled in his throat, and she pulled back, gazing at him. “We should practice more,” he said, wistful.

She grinned. “Maybe in a few hours?”

“I'm game,” he said, his voice weak. “Unless you expect me on top.”

Her laugh faltered when his body hitched. He didn't make any noise, didn't say a word about his suffering, but she heard it all the same. She felt broken on the inside, but she smiled. Made herself smile.

“Teddy will be here soon,” she said. “She will, Derek. It's going to be okay.”

When he picked up his spears for the battle to breathe, she went with him. She laid her hands on him wherever she could that wouldn't hurt him to remind him of her touch, her warmth, hoping it would help somehow, hoping to give him... Something. Only minutes had passed on the clock since Cristina and April had left, but it felt like forever had pulled out a freaking tent and made camp while he struggled.

Where the hell was the cavalry?

His body started to shake, and his head tilted to the side.

“Are you cold?” she said, but he didn't answer. “Derek?” His eyelids drooped, and he still didn't answer. She shook him, and he blinked, dazed. “Derek!” she said. She pulled his hand into hers and squeezed. Hard. She didn't want to hurt him anymore. She didn't. “Okay, Derek. Now, it's your turn. Come on. Tell me something. Anything.”

“I can't breathe.”

“No,” she said. No. Not yet. “No, Derek. Yes, you can. You can breathe.” She tried to show him even breathing, to give him something to match up with, but he couldn't. He stared at her like he was drowning, saw the shore, and knew he couldn't get there before the waves pulled him under.
“Tell me about. The dirty sex. Tonight,” he said.

“The what?” she said, startled by the subject change. She wondered who was attempting to distract whom. She didn't know anymore. Nothing seemed real or right.

She gripped his hand, her muscles so stiff with tension they throbbed with a deep, unrelenting ache. “Well, it's going to be downright skanky,” she assured him. “I bought some really fun underwear last weekend.”

“What kind?”

“Itty bitty lace ones,” she purred, even though her stomach was churning because he was maybe-dying, and they were talking about sex they might not have. “I got whipped cream, too.”

“Pretty skanky,” he agreed. “Where are. We going. To have it?”

“The dirty sex?” she said. His head shook a little as he nodded, breathing, breathing. God, it was so hard to watch him struggling. Stress burbled off her lips in a tight, twisty laugh. She forced herself to smile. “Well, I was thinking we should be creative,” she said. “So, then we can have a kinky, skanky story to tell our horribly embarrassed child one day when we're discussing the glorious days of yore or whatever.”

“Kitchen?” he said.

She shook her head. “That's hardly original, Derek.”

“But it's dirty,” he said on the coattails of an exhale. “Elevator?”

Her jaw dropped. “At the hospital?”

“Where else?”

Thoughts of the elevator, their elevator, made her eyes blur with tears. “I'd really like that,” she said. She leaned forward, breathing in his space as he struggled. She brought her forehead to his and stared him in the eye. Fathomless, suffering blue stared back. “We have a date, Derek Shepherd. I expect you to keep it.”

He laughed, really laughed. The warm sound of it made her entire body vibrate as stress sluiced away, until he wrung out the last syllable of it with shaky, frantic sobs. “I really can't breathe, Mere,” he said. His eyes watered, and the stress piled back into her.

“Okay,” she said. “Okay, shh. Just hold on a few more minutes for me.”

She almost fainted with crushing weight of her relief when the door opened and Cristina returned, followed by April, Jackson, a nurse, and an anesthesiologist she recognized, but only by sight.

“Hold on,” she said, looking back at him. “Where's Teddy, Cristina?” she asked as she stroked his sweaty hair.

“She's not here,” Cristina said.

“Well, if she's not here, who's going to—” Meredith stopped. The chaos spinning in her head splattered into a giant, gooey mess against the windshield of reality. She gripped Derek’s shoulder. Maybe too hard. He didn't complain. “Oh. Oh, god.”
“Yeah,” Cristina said.

Meredith wanted to panic. She wanted to panic, but Derek was lying on a gurney, suffocating by degrees, and there wasn't time. Cristina was a capable, qualified surgeon. Cristina was her person. “I'm pretty sure he's got a hemothorax,” Meredith said. “I don't have my stethoscope, so I couldn't check.”

Derek wheezed. “I'm sure I do.”

“Then I guess we start now,” Cristina said. She clapped her hands. “Let's go, people. Let's move it.” She stared at her crew for a long moment, long enough for Meredith to see the worry in her eyes, and then she went into the scrub room to prepare.

Hours later, Derek was dead, and Meredith collapsed to the floor, screaming. Gary Clark walked past her and exited the room.

Meredith blinked awake, but memories held a noose around her neck for moment after moment. She stared at the floor for the longest time, unable to do much else. The low-backed examination chair Charlotte had given her provided very little support. She'd pushed the back of it into the stack of equipment by Derek's bed and then propped her feet against the bed railing, all so she wouldn't slip and fall if she closed her eyes for a minute.

She couldn't remember when she'd done that. Closed her eyes. But she had. And closed her eyes must have quickly devolved into sleeping, percolating over moments now past. Somewhere. Somehow.

She sighed, raising her head. Her neck hurt. Her knees screamed at her over their abuse. Her mouth felt like paste, and her eyelids wouldn't quite function. Stuck. She wiped the gum and grit away from her eyelashes and swallowed. Then her brain kicked in, and she flinched with rapid, panicky stress. Derek was—

Fine. Sleeping. Quiet. Unaware. And Meredith couldn't help the rickety laugh that wheezed from her lungs. “Getting lunch -Amy” said a scribbled yellow Post-it stuck to Derek's forehead.

Meredith snatched the paper away and crumpled it. She stroked his forehead where the adhesive had been, but couldn't help wandering to his cheek and his chin and his crooked, once-broken nose. His face had gotten fuzzy and sharp over the last thirty-six hours, and she wondered if he'd had time to shave the morning before.

Yeah, I like to say hello to my wife every forty-eight hours. You didn't come home last night.

She vaguely recalled the scrape of his stubble as he'd kissed her, oblivious to the fact that he would be nearly dead in an hour. She'd been oblivious, too. She missed that.

He was more awake, now, more self-aware, and she doubted he would be much interested in being doted on or fretted over, but he was going to want to clean up soon. She didn't think he had the energy to hold a razor above his heart level for several minutes. An unsupervised shower, at this juncture, would be a pipe dream for him, and the idea of seeing if he would accept a sponge bath almost nauseated her with worry. She had no idea how she would ask him if he wanted help, he would feel emasculated when she did, and it would be bad. Deciding how to treat him in this situation was like trying to figure out rocket science on a narrow deadline. She'd been tossed into the deep wilds of uncertainty without any sort of warning or prep. She had no map, and she felt alone. Alone and lost.

His limbs twitched. Something low-pitched and odd fluttered over his lips, not a grunt or a groan, and she froze. He'd been quiet and still all morning, ever since the morphine had knocked him out again.

“Derek,” she said.

His heart rate climbed on the monitor as she watched, tripping from the slow plod of sleep into something more effort-driven. More desperate. She shook his shoulder. “Wake up, it's just a dream,” she said.

“Mmm,” he said, almost a word, stuck in the back of his throat. His hands, face, and torso jerked as he flinched from some phantom impact. His breath caught like a knife had been slipped between his ribs, and the silence of him not breathing made her heart twist.

“Wake up,” she said. “Derek!”

He came alive like a firework explosion. “No,” he blurted. He punched his hands against the mattress and sat up. His eyes flared wide, unblinking and unseeing, and he shivered with the momentum of his awakening. His breathing resumed with shuddering, sucking pants that had to be ripping his chest apart with pain.

“Derek, wake up,” she said, trying to break through sightless panic in his eyes. Her chair snapped back against her knees as she stood and pushed it away. She leaned across the bed railing and threw her one arm behind him and the other in front, high across his shoulders and neck to support him and keep him from going farther forward and hurting himself. He tilted, the bony tips of his clavicles brushing her arms, and she bit her lip. She didn't want him to hurt himself, but she didn't want to hurt him either, and if he pushed forward much more against her arm...

He stopped, arriving at the precipice, caught in the twilight between unconscious and awake. And then the solid coil of dream-born tension unraveled from his body until he was a loose, beaten rag doll in her arms. He gripped her arm like he would a pull-up bar and leaned to the side, into her embrace, against her skin.

“Ow,” he said, his voice deep and dark against her body, shivering. His face found the crook of her neck, and he breathed her in.

“It's okay,” she said. “It's okay. It was just a bad dream.”

“Yeah,” he said. “A dream.”

He wouldn't let go of her right arm as she held it in front of him. She tested her other arm instead. When she was certain he wasn't going to fall backward in half-awake confusion, she splayed her fingers against his sleek muscles and ran her palm up his spine. He shook, and he still wouldn't let her go. She stroked his hair and whispered at him.

What she wanted to do was pull him against her and never let go. Instead, his injuries made him fragile. Unfit for the crushing, desperate embrace she longed give him. And she hated it. She hated that she couldn't even hug him. Not really, anyway. Not yet.

“Do you want some water?” she asked. “Something to eat? You haven't tried to eat anything yet.” The nurses had come by with graham crackers and a glass of water more than once, and each time, he'd refused, looking pale and nauseated, and so they hadn't pressed it.
He didn't say anything. She hit the button and raised the back of his bed with her free hand. The bed hummed. His grip loosened, and his hands fell slack to his sides, but he didn't fall back to the mattress, exhausted, like she expected. He sat there, breathing, trembling, and pale.

She tried another tactic, giving him her best bright-and-shiny smile. “Hey, look at you. You're sitting up on your own, at least. Cristina wasn't going to have you do that for a while. How do you feel?”

“Disgusting,” he said, and she swallowed, torn between wanting to press him about his awful dream, trying to find some way to make him feel better, and simple elation that he sounded so much healthier than he had the day before, when he could barely speak. He wasn't wincing with his words, wasn't breathy or weak or hard to hear. The punishment he'd just given his chest had done a number on him, but he was still sitting up on his own, unprompted.

“I could help,” she ventured, praying it wasn't the wrong thing to say. “If you want to get cleaned up or something, I could help.”

She wasn't even sure he was listening to her. He stared at nothing in particular, eyes haunted and disturbed, like he couldn't wash the sight of his mind's eye from the backs of his eyelids no matter how much soap reality gave him.

“Hey,” she said. “Derek. Hey.” She touched his shoulder, her body shuddering with the sheer force of his disquiet. It radiated from him in waves, like the pounding, throbbing dissonance of a subwoofer turned up too loud. “Do you want to talk about... Are you okay?”

He blinked. “No,” he said. And then like a tree, his resolve toppled with the final ax fall of a deep breath. “Ow,” he whispered again, his voice shaking and thready. He lay back against the bed and pillow and closed his eyes, his hand wandering for the morphine dispenser.

“Do you want the bed back down?”

“No.”

A light knock at the door entered the small space, and Derek's eyes drifted open. Meredith bit her lip. There was no way this was going to go well. Visitors. Not when Derek was so disturbed he was still shaking. Not when he was in so much pain and had just taken another hit of morphine.

“Richard,” Derek said.

Richard Webber stepped over the threshold in a clean pressed suit and shiny shoes and peered around the room like he'd never seen it before, at everything but Derek. His assessment slowed on the dormant ventilator and the stack of working monitors, and then he moved to Derek. Chief's fingers twitched against the six inch stack of papers and folders in his hands, like he didn't know what to do, didn't know why he'd come. “I stopped by to see how you were doing,” he said.

“I'm okay,” Derek said. His syllables had lengthened, and his stare had a dusky, not-all-there quality to it. She hoped the morphine had helped. It certainly helped him play the white lie game, the one where somebody said hello, how are you, and you said fine, even when you wanted to keel over dead or strangle someone, because being fine was the acceptable, expected response. Nobody actually wanted a laundry list of what was wrong. Nobody.

Richard smiled. “Well, don't worry about Seattle Grace, all right? I'll keep her together until you're ready to come back. I wanted to thank you. For leaving my name in the approved contingency plan.”
“Okay,” Derek said.

The conversation halted and died an awkward, violent death as silence crushed the room. Derek closed his eyes again, and Richard cleared his throat. “Well, I'll, uh... Leave you to it. The healing.” And he left.

Meredith stared as Richard departed, unable to stop the sigh of relief that tore through her lungs. That hadn't been so terrible. That hadn't been—“Who's dead?” Derek said.

She turned to find him staring at her, eyes red. “What?”

“He was carrying a pile of death certificates, Mere.”

“You saw—”

“Yes, I saw,” he snapped. His skin drained of color, and he fell silent, breathing.

She stared at her lap. She'd seen the finalized lists posted all over the hospital, and she'd seen the in-progress lists cluttering her email in-box. For a while, they'd been sending out updates by the minute, and she'd had to turn her phone off, because she'd gotten tired of the constant dings, telling her to check for new messages. She didn't know what to say.

“None of your friends?” he prodded.

She bit her lip. “Alex isn't waking up...”

Lexie called her every few hours with tearful updates, updates that were getting more panicky the longer Alex didn't budge from his comatose state.

_I don't know what to do, Mere, she'd said. I said I loved him, and now he's almost dead._

_He is not almost dead. He's not. He's fine, and he just needs a little extra time to wake up. That's all. Getting shot in the chest sucks._

_How's Derek?_

_I don't know. He's awake, but... I don't know._

“You should visit him,” Derek said.

Meredith shook her head so quick and hard the motion made her neck hurt. “I can't.”

“Why not?”

“Because I just can't do it right now, Derek. I can't.”

Derek stared at her, his eyes dark and foreign and hurting.

Her breasts quickened with the onset of sobs, but she tamped the urge so forcefully it made her face hurt. Her eyes burned. Her torso shook. Something inside her wanted to break, but she couldn't let it. The world was wrong.

When the world was right, even if he was crushed about something, she couldn't be in the same room as Derek and be almost crying like this without him wrapping around her and whispering something to make her feel better. He'd even danced once. Come on. Get up. Get your ass over here. I'm not doing this by myself. Now, he was like a stranger, and she couldn't make heads or tails of it. No map. She had no map at all. And she was alone.

“There was a stack,” he said. “Of certificates, Mere. He hurt all those people to find me. Alex is —”

“He hurt all those people because he was a freaking lunatic, Derek.”

“He thought I killed his wife,” he said. “I'm the reason he came here with a gun.”

She twisted her hands together. She'd seen this before, and she didn't want to be there, in that head space again, watching him push his own self-destruct button.

Go home, Meredith. Just go home.

“Derek,” she said.

He stared into space. His temples moved as he clenched his jaw, but he said nothing.

She stood, shaking, leaned across the railing, and reached for his face, pulled his stare to hers. “Derek,” she said, and she looked him in the eye. He took a quick breath, and another. His gaze was like a minefield of broken glass, slivers, sharp bits, and jags of his soul cracked open for her to see. “Get off this train of thought before it starts. Now. I am not in the mood to chase after you again while you play Babe Ruth with a pile of empty beer cans. I couldn't deal with that on top of everything else.” Not now.

He pulled away from her like she'd hit him, stayawakeDerek, and looked down at his hands. “I'm pretty easy to chase right now, anyway,” he snapped. “And I don't think I could lift a bat.”

“Derek...”

His lower lip trembled. His visage of fury cracked and gave way to a deluge of something else. Something worse. His fingers worked across the hem of his blanket, like he didn't know what to do with the pent up, twisting energy. He moved his head back and forth. No, no, no. As if denial would somehow change the outcome of the memories clotting his head.

“A man shot me,” he said.

She leaned forward and grabbed his hand. “I know. But it's over, Derek. It's over.”

“A man shot me, Mere, and I...” He sucked in a breath, wincing as he did so, and the semblance of calm he'd been fighting so hard to maintain stripped away, left him bare and raw for her. He moaned, soft and low, and then he was crying. Really crying. His breaths spluttered in his chest, and he fell to pieces. “Why?” he said, and she had no answer for him. She didn't know why.

“We'll get through this,” she said. “We will. We got through everything else.”

He stared at her, tears streaking down his face. “When is the memorial?”

“I don't know.”

“I should—”

“Lie back, and rest, Derek,” she said. “That's what you should do.” She hit the button on the bed and lowered him flat. It made her stomach twist to do it without asking him, to treat him like a kid, but he didn’t protest or fight. He blinked, silent, as he watched the ceiling crawl above him, and cried.

“I feel dirty.”

She sighed. “I know. I know you do. Would a...” Her fingers twisted around the bed rail, squeaking. “Would it help if I brought you your razor? Please, Derek, I want to help. I don’t mind helping.”

But he was already gone from that conversation, all screeching tires and burned rubber, making an illegal u-turn into the treacherous pit of badness he’d been stuck in moments before.

“I shouldn’t miss the memorial,” he said.

A soft, feminine sound scuffed Meredith's ears. She turned and saw April standing at the doorway, her stupid little diary clutched against her chest like it was the only thing keeping her afloat. The woman's big doe eyes were watering and shaky.

“Excuse me,” April said in a tiny voice as she shuffle-stepped at the threshold, awkward, unsure. “I'm sorry, Dr. Shepherd, I just...”

“Dr. Kepner,” Derek said. He drew his palms across his face as if trying to remove the traces of his torment, but it didn't work. His eyes were bloodshot and scary, and his skin had a wet, shimmery quality under his lashes. His cheeks streaked with a hot flush, and he looked away.

He was crying with his wife. He was crying with his wife, not his staff. He would never want his staff to see this.

Meredith glared at the woman, tried to mouth go away, not now at her, but April acted like Meredith wasn't even in the room. The sight of Derek in the bed, weeping, had snared her, and her eyes wouldn't peel away.

“I wanted to get a card,” April said, stuttering. “Or something, but nothing seemed like it would be...”

“April,” Meredith snapped, not caring if she sounded mean. “What do you want?”

“I just wanted to say I'm sorry,” she said. “For your loss. I know this is—”

Derek blinked. “What loss?”

April's eyes widened in horror. “Oh,” she stammered. “Oh, I...”

Meredith jerked to her feet and pointed at the hallway. “April,” she said. “Outside. Now.”

They marched outside. Meredith opened her mouth, but the words stuck against the back of her throat like bitter flies to flypaper, and she couldn't find any sort of coherency. Couldn't hold any thoughts in the maelstrom of her fury. She felt the hairs on her neck crawl and glanced to the right. Derek watched them, suspicion clouding his hurt, drugged gaze, and she couldn't take his scrutiny. She clutched a tent of April’s lab coat in her hands and dragged her down the hallway to the nurse's station. Out of view. Away from Derek. He didn't need this right now. Not from the woman who'd gotten him shot.

“I'm sorry, Dr. Grey,” April said, sobbing. “I'm sorry. I thought. I thought—”
Anger solidified in Meredith's chest like a coal hardening into a sharp, peerless diamond. Pressure built and built, crushing everything inside, until her vision went black with ire, and she couldn't stop the words anymore. “I don't care what you thought,” she said. “Derek is barely able to sit up on his own. You think I'm going to tell him about losing a baby he didn't even know about yet?”

“I...”

“Go away, April,” she snarled. “I'm sorry about Reed, but you have no right to be in our space right now. Our space. Me and my husband's. My husband's. He almost died, and we lost a baby, and you need to go away. We'll deal with our stuff. You deal with your stuff. Separately. See a counselor or whatever. I recommend Dr. Wyatt.”

April's face paled to an ashen, disturbed gray.

“I'm sorry,” April repeated, and then she fled.

Meredith collapsed over her knees in a furious squat, panting. Hot, snarly tears of anger had begun to seep from her eyes, and she couldn't breathe. She couldn't breathe. The nurses at the station, nurses she didn't know but knew she should, since they were watching after Derek, bit their lips and made it perfectly clear they weren't staring at her. No, they shuffled through printed computer records, or checked their watches, or wrote scribble-y things with pens.

This would be all over the hospital in minutes. She knew it.

She sobbed. Just once. And then she tucked it all away and stood up, wiping at her eyes. She could do this. She could do this. She could. She didn't need a freaking map, and somehow, somehow, she would make it through this horrible. Fucking. Day.

When she re-entered the room, his eyes were closed, his breaths low and deep and even. Laying him flat had probably been the last straw on his strained body. He'd been awake, emotionally stressed, and then it'd been quiet, he'd been flat, high on painkillers, and bam.

Winner by knockout.

She let him sleep as she re-settled on top of her squeaky chair, but the quiet respite lasted only twenty minutes, a drop in the bucket of eternity. Better than nothing, but he needed so much more than that. Even breathing skipped in his chest, became something more controlled, and without looking, she knew he was awake again. She swallowed, dread coiling in her gut. She wanted to cry, almost wished they could knock him out, just to get him through the hard part of healing before he could let his brain kick in and torture him with more dark and twisty thoughts.

“What loss?” Derek said, as if their conversation had never been interrupted.

“Nothing, Derek. She just meant all the people who—”

“She said my loss,” he said. “My loss. I'm stoned, Meredith, but I'm not that stoned.” He reached for the button and raised the bed, glaring at her.

“Derek...”

His face crumpled. “Who died? Who died that you don't think I can handle hearing about? I've seen Bailey and Mark, and... Who died?”

“Nobody.”
“Dr. Hunt,” he said. “I haven't seen Dr. Hunt.”

“Owen got shot high in the shoulder, straight through the trapezius muscle, just in the meat, no nerve damage or anything. He's at home on painkillers, but he's fine. Do you really think Cristina would be here if he wasn't?”

“Yes, she would,” he said, and she realized she couldn't exactly refute him. “She's always here. She worked when Burke was shot. She's—”

“Dr. Shepherd, how are you feeling this afternoon?” Charlotte interrupted as she bustled through the door. She held a small Styrofoam plate of graham crackers in one hand, and clutched a plastic cup with a red-striped folding straw in the other.

He loosed a frustrated, shaky breath. “Charlotte.”

“You're sitting up a little. That's good!” Charlotte said, smiling and bright, as if she didn't know what sort of horrible, vicious, man-eating lion's den she'd entered, a den with snapping jaws and ugly black energy. “I brought some crackers for you. I'd like you to eat one. Just to get your stomach to start working again.”

She pulled the tray table across Derek's lap and placed her bounty front of him. Little bits and pieces of crumbs scattered across the plate, collecting at the edges. The meal was meager, but it wasn't supposed to be filling. Derek needed to eat. He needed to, and this was supposed to be easy stuff that would wake up his digestive system enough that he might want real food in a few hours when the orderlies were making rounds with dinner.

“I'm not hungry,” Derek said.

“I know, but you need to eat,” Charlotte replied, her voice even and patient, and Meredith wondered how she did it. Remained patient with patients who belied their nomenclature and made you want to hit and rip things until they were broken. “I'll leave you alone for a little while after you finish one square and drink some water. I promise.”

Derek stared at the contents of the plate like the crackers were some sort of foreign, two-ply cardboard. Charlotte frowned, and Meredith thought she saw something snap behind the woman's eyes. Charlotte's lip twitched, and she sighed.

“Eat or cough, Dr. Shepherd,” the nurse warned. “Which would you prefer?”

Meredith sighed with relief when Derek picked up the cracker in crushing defeat. She stared at Nurse Charlotte. Thank you, she mouthed. Thank you so much. Charlotte caught the motion and winked, but didn't take her eyes from Derek, watching him, ready to catch any attempt by him to bamboozle her and make her think he'd done something he really hadn't.

He chewed the cracker as he glowered. He polished away one square and left the rest, looking pale and upset, but Charlotte ignored him. “That's great, Dr. Shepherd. Now, take a sip. The water will feel good. I promise. I have yet to receive a complaint from anybody else on this hall.”

He blinked. A loose tear slipped down his cheek. He picked up the cup and sipped. Once. Twice. His Adam's apple bobbed along his throat. Even in the dim light, she saw the water line in the cup descend to the bottom and disappear. He slurped once and then stopped. Meredith touched his hand when he set the cup back down, but he didn't look at her. Wouldn't look.

“Charlotte, can you get me a list of the people who died?” he said.
Meredith frowned. He thought she'd lied. He thought... “Derek...”

“They sent out lots of e-mails over the hospital listserv, Dr. Shepherd,” the nurse said. “You should be able to see them on your phone, but I can get you a printout—”

“Is my phone still under the bed?”

The nurse glanced at the storage compartment under the bed and made a small step toward it, but Meredith shooed her away. Tears of anger returned in force, backed by platoons of more tears, all with sharp knives and armor, just waiting for the opportunity to charge down Meredith's face. “I've got it,” Meredith muttered as she bent over, and her hair fell into her face. She clawed it back behind her ears.

Nurse Charlotte whispered something soft at them, encouraged Derek to finish his stupid crackers, and then she left while Meredith was stuck under the bed. Stuck. Her hands found the smooth plastic bin, felt at the rough label made with masking tape and black marker. “Dr. Shepherd,” said the label in a messy doctor's scrawl. Jackson's, maybe. Or April's. Or...

She pulled the box into her lap and scrabbled for her chair, off balance and trying to ignore the watery glaze that covered the world, trying to stop the army revolting in her tear ducts. She fingered his bloodstained leather belt and the black watch he always wore. The glass panel over the digital readout had a crusty red splotch on it. She shoved aside his cell phone clip and his shiny, pointy black boots, the ones she'd always thought he looked sexy in, and had told him so, long ago. They'd thrown out his shirt and his pants and his underwear, thrown them into the bio-hazard bin. They'd been damaged beyond repair. Too drenched with blood and sweat, too soiled with dirt from the floor and with gunpowder.

She remembered fingerering the hole in his shirt after they'd removed it. The perforation had been the size of her pinky finger, or maybe a pencil eraser, torn and jagged, wet with his body fluids and bits of obliterated flesh. Little loose threads had snarled in the empty space where solid shirt should have been, and they had caught against her nail as she'd slipped her finger through to the other side. She hadn't been able to believe something so small could cause so much damage. But it had.

“Here,” she growled, jabbing the phone at him like a weapon to ward away the memories of him lying on the floor. Dying.

The phone beeped as he turned it on and navigated to his email. The screen glowed against his face, haunting and pale, and he stared. His lungs hitched when he found the bulletin he wanted, the long list divided by fatalities and injuries in crisp, clear type, alphabetical and neat. Clinical and cold. He scrolled down as he read the names. Beep. Another page. Beep. Another, another. Beep, beep.

Dr. Shepherd, Derek C. was listed under injured but stable, one of the last names in the long crawl of death and pain. She knew. She knew because she'd received the same email on her own phone. The injuries list was much shorter than the fatalities list. Gary Clark had wanted to kill, not maim, and he'd been successful. Chillingly so. But at least he'd failed where it mattered to him the most.

She shuddered.

“I told you, Derek, nobody—”

“Seventeen,” he whispered. “Seventeen people died.”

Her throat constricted. “I know.”
He hit the scroll button again and paused. “That security guard. Paul Wandell. I said hello to him in the morning. His kids had a dance recital, and he was... He had kids, Mere, and now they're alone.”

“Derek, please,” she said. “Please, stop.”

He stared, shell-shocked and lost in the faded edges of his memories. “I wonder how old they are.
God, seventeen people, Mere.”

One person.

The air in the room hazed away from her, and she stood on the promenade all over again, watching him fall to the ground, hearing the crack as it buffeted her ears. Cristina had pulled at Meredith's arms so hard her shoulder sockets had ached for hours after that moment. Meredith screamed and screamed and screamed, and she couldn't stop. She hadn't in the memory, and so she was stuck, yelling her throat raw, watching Derek over and over again. He tumbled to the floor and smacked the back of his head into the hard tiles, stunned with the impact of the bullet as it ripped through his sternum.

She remembered the way he'd looked at her as they'd covered him with the mask that would bring him anesthesia. Breathe deeply, Dr. Shepherd, Jackson had said, which, at the time, she'd thought had been ludicrous, since Derek clearly couldn't do more than gasp. She'd stroked his sweaty hair, said she loved him, and before he could reply, his eyes had closed. Slowly. She'd seen one last flash of his pupils before he went still and silent. She'd kissed his forehead, given the deep, beautiful lines around his eyes a last, loving appraisal with the pads of her thumbs, and then the nursing staff had pushed her away so they could intubate him. She'd gone to find Cristina in the scrub room with that picture in her head. Her husband. Intubated.

She realized she was a selfish person, then. A selfish, horrible person. Because all she could think about was that Derek wasn't one of the seventeen. The rest was just superficial details that she couldn't bring herself to worry about.

In that moment, Meredith Grey snapped.

“I'm thirty-two,” she said.

He blinked. “What?”

“When I saw you get shot right in front of me,” she said. “I was thirty-two, and I'm going to be seeing it in my head for the rest of my life. But you're still here. You're breathing, and you're not to blame for the ones who aren't. Please, would you just...” Her voice faded, spent and wasted.
Destroyed. She had more syllables to say, but she couldn't say them, because she had no idea what they were. Her lip quivered. “Please.”

“I wish you hadn't seen it,” he said.

“But I did, Derek. You would have died if I hadn't. And now we're here.”

They sat in silence, seconds slogging by like ants caught in molasses, stuck, stuck and drowning in mire and thick tar. He stared at his phone, stared, like he couldn't bring himself to look at her, couldn't bring himself to face her as she fell apart. A low, throaty, choking sound gripped him, and his tears resumed, spattering down his face like loose raindrops in an endless storm. He looked at her then, raw upset in his gaze, his face marred with red streaks of irritation and embarrassment. Of deep, harrowing sadness.

“I want the drainage tubes and the catheter out,” he said, his voice broken. “I want to get up.”
She took his hand and squeezed, forcing her legs straight as she stood. “I'll tell Cristina right now.”

She pulled away, but he didn't release her. “No,” he said. “Stay. Come here. That can wait a minute.”

He pushed the tray table with the stale crackers away.

“But...” She stared at him. He still had the drainage tubes. The EKG lines. The intravenous line. Everything. She couldn't imagine fighting against that whole maze of medical keep away signs. She'd barely been able to get into the bed with him after ten minutes of wiggle-shifting between him and the railing when he'd been thrashed and broken with pain. She couldn't just—

“You won't hurt me, Mere,” he said as if she'd spoken her concerns aloud. “Come here. I'm not glass.”

He gestured with his arm, and she imagined herself, nestled against his frame. Whenever she was upset, he would hold her on the couch, body to body, breath to breath, and he would whisper at her and rub her back and make her feel better. In that moment, she couldn't imagine herself anywhere else. She needed it.

She needed.

She wiped her tear-stained face and collapsed against him. His body felt warm and soft, and in all the near death and dying of the last two days, she'd forgotten how reassuring his shoulder felt against her ear, how good his arm felt wrapped around her torso, and how strong his heartbeat sounded through his skin. Her map filled in with details, and she could almost find herself again. He made shushing noises at her and held her and did all the things that made her forget he wasn't healthy, until she looked and saw how uncomfortable he was. She was lying against him, putting pressure on his chest, however little, however light and tiny she was, and he was hurting.

“You're such a liar,” she sobbed.

“Shut up, Mere,” he said, his voice quivering but sure. “Let me do this. I need to. If it really starts to hurt, I'll tell you.”

She didn't have the energy to fight him. Tiredness clawed her into little wasted bits. “Okay,” she said, and she couldn't hold it in anymore. She was dizzy with exhaustion. Her brain hurt. Shards of upset tore gashes into her soul.

She cried.

“I love you, too,” he said. “I'm here. I'm sorry.”

She lost herself in his velvety, rumbling reassurances, lost herself in the quiet waves of his breathing against her ear. For a perfect, endless minute, she wrapped herself in his words and his softness and his strength, and she knew where she was again. There. In Seattle Grace. Next to her husband. The man she'd sworn her life to on a Post-it note.

Her eyelids drooped, and she rested. Her breathing slowed, and she heard herself start to snore, but she was too far gone to care. Too far into a full mental collapse. Wishes and sighs whirled around her head and sucked her under.

She heard his soft, choked, “Hi, Mom.”

She even heard the soft, earthy reply. “Oh, Derek...”
But the words had no meaning to her. Then she slipped into dreaming.
“So, then Derek and Mark stumble in,” Rachel said. “Derek's shell-shocked, his eyes all big and round like he doesn't know what the hell just hit him. He's covered head to toe in mud and dirt and leaves, and he says—”

Meredith closed her eyes, leaning back against the wall as the syllables bled into one endless rumble. They laughed at the end of the story. Laughed like the entire freaking army of cackling, nagging estrogen that they were. They’d been telling stories for the last twenty minutes while they waited in the hall in a dense flock of sickening, saccharine Shepherd solidarity.

When Derek's baby sister Amelia had arrived early morning the day before, Meredith had been a bit nervous, never having met her, or really any of Derek's sisters except Nancy. Well, a lot nervous. A lot. What exactly were you supposed to say when you met your husband's family for the first time, and he was nearly dead? It wasn't the sort of situation that begged getting to know each other over tea or dinner or whatever the hell actual not-dysfunctional families did when they had to meet their unwanted in-laws. Though, along that route, she wasn't entirely convinced his family wasn't dysfunctional, and she wasn't exactly an in-law.

But Amelia-call-her-Amy was pretty easy to get along with. She'd been panicked about Derek's status as a not corpse, and already upset from some sort of disaster back in Los Angeles, and there hadn't been much time for scrutiny or criticism or anything like what Meredith would have expected with a casual family visit. Amelia didn't much seem to care about the circumstances in which Meredith and Derek had met, or about their flimsy Post-it marital status, or about anything to do with Meredith at all, really.

Amelia was a fellow doctor, an up-and-coming neurosurgeon, and that was about all Meredith had gleaned in the brief moments they'd been alone. The woman seemed to fill the silences with brooding, sort of like Derek did when he was at his most dour, but when Meredith had asked about it, all Amelia had said was, “I lost a patient, and I almost lost my brother. Isn't that enough?” Then she'd refused to go into more detail, looking shaken and haunted.

When Derek was awake, Amelia hung around like a fly, always buzzing, always there, with big, guilty, hurt doe eyes, but when he was asleep, she found reasons to be far, far away, and, well, Meredith wasn't going to press her luck. She was much more happy to be ignored than to be pried apart and smashed with questions like a nut in a nutcracker.

Then the rest of his family had come. They'd all managed to nab the same flight from New York, the whole pack of them, and they had descended on SeaTac from LaGuardia, and finally into Seattle Grace, like rabid, eager wolves. Rabid, eager, upset, panicky wolves who wanted to know that their dearest son, brother, whatever, who had abandoned them to a life of rustic shame in Seattle with his dirty ex-but-not-ex-mistress, was not going to drop dead on them. At least not in the next few days.

There was his mother, who Meredith actually sort of liked. Contemplative, discerning, worried, she didn't seem to say much when the whole group was there. The gabby sisters-from-hell were another matter. There was Nancy, the bitch, who still seemed to hate Meredith for no other reason than the fact that Meredith existed. Kathleen, the shrink, who seemed to find everything about Meredith a fascinating, deeply freaky case study. And finally, Rachel, who'd said all of three words to Meredith since arriving, not out of spite so much as targeted obliviousness.

They all looked like Derek to some degree. All of them had thick, dark hair, smirk-y faces, and deep, expressive eyes that could tell you ninety-nine things about what they were feeling or thinking in two glances or less. Meredith wanted to love them. She did. Because they were part of Derek.

Derek loved his family. Derek missed his family, though he didn't speak of it very often. He'd grown up with them and spent a large part of his life with them all in spitting distance. For roughly forty years, he'd been in their orbit, always visitable and surprise drop-by-able. He'd probably even complained about it at the time. Then Addison had cheated. He'd left that all behind and moved to Seattle, where he had nothing and no one.

Now, he was alone on the West Coast except for her and Mark. His big family had been reduced to two points of light in a vast sea of darkness. He would never admit it, but he missed them all, bitchiness and nagging notwithstanding, which she supposed was what real families did. Loved each other despite everything. They all clearly loved Derek despite the fact that they seemed to think he was dumb as blocks. And for that, she wanted to love them very much. Not the dumb as blocks part. Just... Whatever.

Instead, they mostly made her want to scream.

The night before, they'd popped in after their flight had landed. Just for a few minutes to say hello before trudging off to collapse at the neighboring hotel or whatever. That had been awkward.

That had been nothing.

In the morning, they'd returned, laden with Starbucks coffee and bags and bags of things. For four solid hours that morning before a too-short lunch, and then again until the orderlies had come to transfer Derek to a step down room, the entire pack of them had talked and talked and talked at him, and he'd listened, a fever-bright glint of excitement in his eyes. They had occasionally let him get a word in, not that he was trying very hard. He was tired, and he'd been pushing himself too hard to stay awake and visit with them. All that effort just to be awake and paying attention had turned him into a taciturn creature. They seemed okay with that, expected it even, given his injuries and the state he'd been in when they'd arrived. Haggard, on painkillers, and crying, with sleeping Meredith curled up in his arms. She'd had to climb off of him, groggy and drooling while they all stared.

Awkward. No, she amended. Mortifying.

He'd been acting almost balanced since then, though she speculated it was mostly because with them always there and always talking and always being in his space, he didn't have the time or the energy to be upset. Maybe that was a good thing. She didn't know.

She did know that she didn't like how exhausted he looked, and she had no idea how she was going to intervene on his behalf. That was what she was supposed to do. Intervene on her sick husband's behalf. Right? That was what normal wives of normal husbands did. Except the idea of inserting herself between him and his stampeding sisters seemed about as appealing as a spinal tap, and she wasn't sure any good would come of it. His sisters would hate her even more. Or at least shift from neutral into dislike, if they weren't there already. Derek would get upset, too, which was the part that made her loath to act, and not so much his sisters' ire.

Worse and worse horror scenarios mounted, until the Derek in her mind's eye was ripping up the Post-it note with spitting, hissing fury, and vowing to return to Manhattan behind the wheel of his trailer. She begged him to at least take a plane, because he was hurt, and driving would be very taxing, but, no, he wanted the scenic trip to see pretty mountains, the elk infestation in the western national parks, and golden waves of grain, or whatever.
“You okay?” Mark whispered as the Shepherds laughed at another silly story of Derek in his younger days.

“Fine,” she insisted through gritted teeth.

They all stood in the hallway outside Derek's new room. He'd just been moved out of intensive care, and he finally had a big, private VIP room, with a bathroom and a door that shut and windows to the outside. There was a sofa and a television set and a small reading chair and space. Blessed space. Meredith had already asked for a cot, which the orderlies said would be brought to the room sometime around dinner. At least his family would sleep tonight. She hoped. And then Derek would have some needed peace and quiet. Surely, last night wasn't a fluke, and they slept like normal people.

Mark placed a warm hand on her back. “Let me check and see if they're ready in there.”

He pushed through the crowd of she-Shepherds toward the door and gave it a practiced, brief knock, just like doctors did before they entered a room where they knew a patient would be undressing. He turned the handle, opened the door a slit, poked his head in, and spoke some whispered words. Silence. Meredith watched Mark's hand crawl along the edge of the door as he listened to whatever response he was getting. And then Mark backed out again and closed the door.

“Few more minutes, at least,” Mark said.

Meredith bit her lip. She wasn't sure she could stomach waiting out here for a few more minutes. “Is he okay?” she asked.

Mark nodded. “Yeah, it looks like they're pulling out the first chest tube right now. Foley catheter is done.”

“That's good,” Meredith said. “That's... He'll be able to walk around.”

“He will,” said Mark. “Of course, then we'll probably need to tie him down. I fully expect him to stage a jailbreak. He's never been a big fan of hospitals. Not as a patient, anyway.”

Kathy snickered. “Oh, god. Remember after he crashed his bike?”

The whole lot of them broke into a rolling, endless wave of laughter. “Him crashing his motorcycle is funny?” Meredith said.

“No,” said Rachel, wiping tears from her eyes. She shifted. Her look became sober. “No, of course not. But watching him, concussed and on painkillers, trying to convince the doctor he was well enough to go home, was not a pretty sight.”

Mrs. Shepherd frowned. “Rachel, dear. That's enough.”

They all fell silent.

Meredith stared at them all, bewildered, and tried very hard not to be curious. Derek had never talked about his crash beyond the fact that it had happened when he was in medical school. He'd sold his bike as soon as he'd healed enough to be worried about owning an object that now scared him to death. That was all she knew.

“Excuse me,” said a low, deep voice as Jeff Willit, one of Seattle Grace's physical therapists, pushed his way through the crowd. He was a tall, well-built man who, really, should have been a centerfold for Sports Illustrated or something. Meredith knew he liked to play soccer and basketball and pretty much anything else that classified as a sport. He was always trying to recruit for Seattle Grace intramural teams, and he would put out sign-up sheets from time to time.

He'd asked her about volleyball once, but he'd given up and walked away when all she'd had to say was, “Volleywhat?”

The Shepherds parted, staring at the man as he approached the door and swept aside his thick brown Fabio hair. He knocked, opened the door, and disappeared. The latch clicked shut behind him.

“Wow,” said Nancy, and they all fell into appreciative silence for what felt like eons.

Eons until Rachel coughed. “So, Meredith. Tell us a story.”

Meredith chuckled. She didn't know why. The sound was a nervous, itty bitty tick that seemed to skip from her lips with little provocation. “A story,” she said.

Kathy's eyes gleamed. “Yes. We've been talking about Derek for the last thirty minutes, and you haven't said a word. Surely, he must have done something dumb since he got here. He's Derek.”

“I don't think—”

“How about cheesy romantic?” Rachel asked, sweeping aside a long, dark lock of her bangs. She was leggy and fabulous, just like Addison. All of them were. It made them a little easier to hate. “That's his other trademark. Dumb and cheesy romantic are his signature things.”

Meredith blinked. They all stared at her, waiting, expectant. “Well, he...”

“Yes?” said Nancy.

Mrs. Shepherd stared. Stared at her with a scary, omniscient mom look in her eyes. Like she knew something and wasn't letting on. Meredith swallowed. The hallway felt suddenly sweltering, and she pulled at the collar of her shirt. All his sisters stared. She wondered if they knew. About the Post-it. If they knew. Or if they still thought of her as a temporary fixture in Derek's life, something that would get swept away as soon as he laid eyes on someone a bit more age-appropriate and pretty. She hadn't had the guts to ask.

“I...” she stuttered.

“He was going to propose with a teddy bear,” Mark said, saving her. “And a big heart-shaped thing filled with rose petals. And candles. Lots of candles.”

“What?” Meredith said.

Mark looked at her, helpless and grinning. “It was my fault. I suggested it, but he went with it.”

“When was this?”

“Back when Addison's brother got sick. He kept bitching while we were setting up that it was awful and that he'd become a giant cliche, but he was so nervous, and I knew you'd say yes anyway, so I told him it was fine.”

“You knew I'd say yes?”

Mark shrugged, eyes sparkling. “It's not like it's rocket science, Grey. You two are disgusting.”
“You know I said no, right? Several times, actually,” she countered.

“Yes, but that was only after he went crazy.”

His sisters looked at Mark, perplexed, and then to Meredith.

“He didn't go crazy, Mark. He was...” Drunk. Self destructing. Losing his nerve. Dying inside because he couldn't bear the thought of hurting other people.

Kathy frowned. “What are you talking—”

“A teddy bear,” Meredith interrupted, practically choking on the words as she stuffed them through her lips. “Seriously?” Derek had enough to deal with already without being psychoanalyzed by his shrink big sister.

“Yes,” Mark said. “One of those big carnival-sized ones. Big, white, and fluffy. He must have packed it all away when Addison called him about Archer.”

Rachel's smile couldn't have been more gleeful. “Our Derek proposing with a stuffed animal. That's pretty classic.” They all laughed, and Meredith relaxed a bit. Disaster averted.

“So, when are you two getting married for real, anyway?”

Maybe not.

“Um,” Meredith managed. Hot. She felt hot.

Miraculously, it was Mrs. Shepherd who intervened. “Girls, this really isn't the time,” she said in a soft, earthy voice. His mother looked at her. Smiled. Really smiled. “I imagine, after the first time, Derek's not so much interested in the institution of marriage as the meaning behind it. I'm just happy he seems to have found the right girl this time. Leave him and Meredith be.” And then the older woman steered the conversation back to something a bit more palatable, leaving Meredith stunned, blinking, and speechless.

Did she know then? About the Post-it? Meredith wondered how that phone conversation had gone and why she'd never heard about it.

It seemed like ages before the nurse left Derek's room. She smiled, wheeling her cart of supplies away. Meredith eyeballed the piles of bloody, dirty gauze, stained dressings, torn open packets of topical anesthetic, and the two cloudy-colored chest tubes. Normal. Totally normal, she reminded herself.

“All set,” said the nurse as she trundled by, and then she was gone.

His sisters collapsed toward the door in a shuffling, noisy, eager pack. The bedlam, the sight of all of them, moving and chatting and babbling twisted something deep in Meredith's gut. He'd just had his surgical drains removed. And the Foley catheter. He'd had no break. Nothing. The entire day, they'd been here. Two seconds after the nurse had left, they were pushing toward the door, not giving him any time to recover or think or breathe.

She snapped.

“Could you maybe go in shifts, or something? So you're not all there crowding him?” Meredith said. “The only reason the nurses haven't been all over you people for breaking the rules is because he's the Chief of Surgery.”

The snarling, wretched heat returned as they all stared at her. She started to shake. “I'm sorry. But he was shot less than three days ago. He had emergency open-heart surgery. He's exhausted, and you're all here, all the time, talking and laughing, and he can't rest when you're doing that.”

Nancy frowned. “He's seemed fine.”

In what realm of the word fine, Meredith wondered. Fine as in not dead was about all she could come up with.

The four of them turned to Mark, who held his hands up in surrender. “He looks like crap, to me. I'm not really into measuring gradients of crap.”

“Well, he's not fine,” Meredith growled. “He actually looks worse since you all got here than he did yesterday morning when he couldn't sit up, and he was drowning in morphine. Not that he'll ever tell you he needs a break, because he's Derek. He's hurt, he's missed you, and you're keeping him from thinking about all the bad stuff that's just happened. But really. You're all medical professionals. All of you. How could you possibly think what you're doing to him is okay?”

Her breathing thundered in her ears. Everyone stared at her. Everyone. Mark, who stood behind the crowd of them, snickered. Feisty, his appreciative gaze seemed to say as he shook his head, though when Nancy turned to gauge his reaction, he turned stoic and unaffected in less time than it took him to collect a phone number at Joe's.

Silence.

Mrs. Shepherd sighed. “You're right. You're absolutely right, Meredith.” The woman shifted, as if she couldn't decide what to do with the upset energy that had just overwhelmed her. Her face shut down, like she was used to not permitting herself to cry. “We were worried,” Carolyn said. “And his father... But that's no excuse. We're...”

All of Derek's sisters glared, but for a moment, Meredith couldn't peel her eyes from Carolyn. Meredith felt as though she was staring in a mirror.

Be strong, Meredith, Ellis Grey had said. Strong women don't cry, and I will not permit you to cry. Stop it.

His sisters closed the gap between Carolyn and Meredith like a shield, as though they expected Meredith to launch into the fray, all sharp claws and screeching.

Great.

Meredith stared back at the flock of them. She refused to let them cow her, despite the antsy feeling in her feet that was urging her to run the other way. Fast. She redirected her urge in a healthy direction. She moved toward the door. “You can come in when you've figured out how to do it in smaller groups,” she said, forcing her voice to stay even even though her certainty was losing a battle to sheer, relentless panic.

She fled to safety before they could reply.

To Derek.

A slanting shaft of sunlight bisected the room, and her breath caught as she entered. Derek was standing up. Like it was any moment of any day. Well, not quite. He had his hands cupped over the physical therapist's shoulders, and they stood face-to-face like a pair who were ready to dance, but the setup seemed more like a precaution than anything else. Derek's arms were loose, his body straight, his legs spread at a normal width, and his grip didn't seem like it had the air of holding on for dear life. Just for a little extra balance.

“That's good,” said Jeff. “That's very good. Why don't you walk to the chair and sit for a while?”

Derek's foot moved. Just an inch before he stopped. He bowed his head, and the sunlight caught his profile and set him alight. The wayward tips of his dark, mussy hair glowed like embers. “I'm a little woozy,” he said.

Jeff nodded. “I can imagine. Just take it slow. You won't fall.”

She bit her lip. Derek was standing. Out of the bed. For the first time in days. She didn't know why she was so surprised. They'd removed the Foley catheter. They'd want him moving as soon as possible. Moving around and building his stamina.

In the bald daylight, he seemed shockingly pale. His face had no color, an unhealthy contrast with his almost-black hair and the sharp forest of his stubble. Dark circles of exhaustion had puffed up under his eyes. His face and limbs seemed thinner, too. Like he'd lost weight. Except Derek had already been on the very thin side of healthy, and a few lost pounds made him seem gaunt and feeble.

But he was standing. She eased against the wall and folded her arms, forcing herself to stay back and not interfere.

Derek swallowed, moving away from the orbit of Jeff's support, and walked, pulling his IV pole along with him, but not leaning on it in any overt way. Jeff followed close behind, his arms stretched and ready to catch or provide emergency support. Derek's strides were stilted, unsure, and slow, like an old man who'd been forced to move without his cane or a walker, but he made it to the reading chair in the corner with no assistance. He leaned in an exaggerated, slow motion to protect his chest, and collapsed as soon as his fingers gripped something solid.

He sank against the pillows of the chair and panted, his eyes shut against the buffeting sunlight.
“Oh, I don't want to do that again yet.” He wiped his face with shaky hands.

Jeff smiled. “Rest here for a while until you're ready to go back. That was great, Dr. Shepherd.
Really, really great. Are you in any pain?”

“I'll be all right,” Derek said. “I just need. To catch my breath.”

Jeff nodded. “Well, you can page me or a nurse if you need help. It'll get easier. See if you can sit here for at least thirty minutes. It's good exercise for your back, even though you're not moving.”

“Oh, Derek, sweetheart, you're looking so much better.”

He looked at them, eyes flaring wide with startled surprise. “Mom. Mere. I didn't even see...” He lost his breath and his composure and his voice, shivering. Not with cold so much as exertion. He ran a hand through his hair and looked at the floor, his eyelids drooping. A small sound rumbled deep in his throat, and when he looked up again, he seemed barely sentient. “Where's?” he muttered, his voice confused. He looked, gaze hooded, around the room.
His mother frowned at him. “They're outside. I just wanted to say good night. We'll come back in the morning.” She turned to Meredith. “During visiting hours. In small groups.”

He blinked. “Okay,” he said, his voice deep and weary.

Mrs. Shepherd smiled despite a watery, pained look in her eyes. “We all love you, sweetheart. Get some sleep. We didn't mean to wear you out.” And then she left.

Meredith stood in the middle of the room, unsure about what had just happened. She'd told the Shepherds off. And. They'd listened?

Jeff nodded at her. “Maybe we should see if we can get him back to the bed after all,” he whispered, looking in Derek's direction with a pointed stare. “I wasn't expecting him to pass out like this. Has he been tired? It's been long enough since his surgery that he should be okay with very short walks.”

Meredith sighed. “He has four pushy sisters and a freaked out mother.”

“Ah,” said Jeff.

Derek wasn't exactly out yet, but his head was tilting slowly, like a tree about to topple for a lumberjack, and his breathing had eased from panting into soft, solid lengths.

“Leave him be,” Meredith said. “I'll watch him.”

Jeff shrugged and left, closing the door behind him, and that left her and Derek alone. Blessedly alone.

For the first time in hours, silence laved her eardrums, and she felt her muscles begin to wilt. She heard the vague noises of the hospital outside the door, but they were distant, removed, like soft echoes from outside a cave. Tension she hadn't even realized she'd been harboring bled away. She walked to the chair where he sat and collapsed in front of it on her knees with a sigh.

She put a hand against his thigh, splaying her fingers. The pressure stocking was smooth like silk and very thin, one of few remnants of his intensive care unit stay. His intravenous line was still active, and his nasal cannula sat against his pillow, ready for use when he was lying down. But sitting up, here, in the chair, nothing. No EKG lines. The surgical drains were gone. All of it was gone.

“Hey,” she whispered.

His hospital gown rustled, a whisper in the quiet. He looked at her, dull eyes open in the barest crescents, but he didn't speak. The sun glowed brilliant orange gold. He blinked once, and then his eyes closed.

“I walked,” he said.

“I saw,” she said.

“It was exhausting.”

“I know,” she said. She rubbed her thumb along his kneecap. “You have a big, freaking family, Derek.”

He laughed, and she regretted the wince of pain that spread across his features. His eyes opened, just for a second, watery with discomfort. “At least they didn’t bring the kids,” he said, voice weaker.

“Or the husbands,” she added with a chuckle. She rose to her knees and touched his face. He leaned against her palm and stilled. “Do you want to try and go back to the bed?” she said. “I’m sure it’s more comfortable than this little chair.”

“Maybe later.”

His eyes shut. His body tilted against the arm of the chair. And then he slept sitting up, propped awkward and kinked to keep his balance without his conscious thought.

She considered waking him and trying to get him to move so he’d at least be more comfortable, maybe not develop a crick in his neck or a permanent bend in his abused spine, but he’d been so tired. All day. Then he’d walked.

She couldn’t bring herself to prod him back to life. Instead, she shifted, molding her back against the chair next to his leg, and rested her cheek on his knee. She let her thoughts drift as her own exhaustion chewed away at her mind. The sun beat down through the window and bathed her with pleasant, unwavering warmth. Her eyelids dipped once. Twice.

She didn’t mean to fall asleep when she was supposed to be watching him. She didn’t. But somewhere along the way, she did.

When Derek’s new nurse, a slight woman named Marcia Holding, arrived with a glass of water and his afternoon cocktail, Meredith sighed and attempted to stretch, blinking the cobwebs away. Her muscles wailed at her. She glanced at her watch, squinting. An hour. A nice nap, at least. The sun had sunk a bit lower in the sky outside the window.

Derek woke, but he took quite a bit of prodding from Marcia before he was able to take the glass and the pills. The nurse took the glass away from him after he’d finished and departed, leaving Derek disheveled and blinking and her squirming up from the floor. She wished she hadn’t fallen asleep drooling on his bony knee with her spine curled like a question mark, but there wasn’t much she could do about it at this point.

“I have to get up,” he said as she stumbled away from the chair and lunged to wake up her quadriiceps and calves. Her skin started to tingle as pins and needles jabbed her up and down her legs, and she resisted the urge to hop and stamp her feet.

She tested her ankle, and it took her weight without flopping around. That was good. She glanced at him and smiled. “Ready to go back?” she said.

“No, I mean...” His face bloomed scarlet. “I have to get up.” His hands wandered shakily to his IV pole, and he rose to his feet without waiting for her to set herself up to help or support him. His body pitched forward, and he let loose a gasp of surprise.

“Derek,” she hissed. Her muscles burned with energy as she reached to catch him. Her ankle twisted and pinched, but she ignored it. She grabbed his shoulders. He stumbled into her, almost lost his balance entirely before they managed a hesitant equilibrium. His arms slipped around her hips, and he breathed in her ear.

“Little dizzy,” he said, his voice faint and lost against her throat.

“You think, Derek? You’re only on about a gallon of narcotics right now,” she said. “Take it easy, okay?”
He turned and took a step toward the bathroom. The IV pole trundled after him as he took a second step. A third. A fourth. She grabbed his waist, not caring whether he wanted help or not. He stopped midway to his goal with a gasp, eyes closed, and he loosed a curdled, sick sound that made her heart break.

“Okay, a lot dizzy,” he amended.

Well, stop being a big, dumb idiot and let me help you, she wanted to say, to snarl, to growl. She rubbed her palm against the flat of his stomach. “I've got you,” she whispered instead. Please, believe me.

For a moment, they stood there, a lopsided island in a sea of space. She was small. She knew it. She knew she wouldn't be able to do something as significant as carry him if his legs were to give out, but she could help. If all he needed was balance and maybe a little support, she could help, and that would be more than enough. She just hoped he would see it that way instead of protesting more.

He believed her. His weight against her increased as he let her take some of the burden from him. She sighed with relief and squeezed him. “It's okay,” she said.

He took another step and another, and they shuffled into the big bathroom with the IV pole in tow. He stopped at the mirror, looking at himself for perhaps the first time since the shooting. A small sound coiled in his throat. He touched his face, fingers running over his scraggly beard and his pale skin, and watched the haggard stranger staring back at him do the same.

“Your razor is outside in the duffel bag I packed from your office,” she said. “If you want it. And I found a toothbrush in your desk. There's a pair of your sweatpants and an old t-shirt I pulled from your office, too, but that's it. I'm sorry. I haven't been home, and I—”

His lower lip quivered, and he brushed at his eyes with his palms. “Mere,” he said, his voice soft and lost.

“I know, Derek.” She leaned onto her toes and kissed him. “It's okay. We'll fix it.”

The toilet posed a whole new obstacle. She swallowed. “Derek, are you okay to... By yourself. I mean.” He bristled and turned a bright shade of scarlet, which made her feel horrible, but he didn't answer right away either, which made her feel worse. She rubbed his back. “Look,” she said. “I'm going to get you a towel, your razor, and some other things. I'll be right outside. Okay?”

“Oh,” he said.

She left the door open just a crack as she left and went to grab the duffel bag where she'd stashed his things and the miscellaneous toiletries she'd managed to scrounge up for him. If he still hadn't done anything by the time she got back, she figured she'd intervene with a bit more force, but for now? She couldn't stomach it. She just couldn't.

A thump sounded behind her. “Motherfucker,” he growled, his voice quivering with deep, harrowing pain, but muffled by the door. She bit her lip. Her fingers clenched. Silence followed. She wanted to go back and help. She wanted. But he didn't ask for help, and the thump hadn't been a big one that said he'd fallen or done something bad to himself in a permanent sense. After a brief less-colorful curse and another stretch of tense silence, the quiet gave way to a familiar low-pitched liquid noise. She sighed, tension draining from her body.

All right then.
She let herself worry about other things. She wondered what she would do about the intravenous line he sported, but in a moment of inspiration she grabbed the plastic bag full of last-minute macaroni paintings his sisters had brought him from his nieces and nephews. Get well soon, they said in rainbow pasta print and smelly Elmer's glue. They were sort of adorable, and he'd accepted the offering with a wistful smile when Kathy had bestowed him with it.

Meredith dumped out the papers onto the sofa by Derek's bed, careful not to bend them or rip them, and took the plastic bag. It would do just fine. Slinging the duffel over her shoulder, she went back to the bathroom and knocked softly as the toilet flushed.

“Derek, I'm going to come in unless you say something,” she whispered against the cool gray surface.

Nothing. He said nothing.

She pushed open the door and found him sitting on the toilet, staring at his knees. “My chest hurts when I push the wall for balance,” he said, as if to explain why he, of all people, would be in the position he was in. He didn't look up.

He wasn't supposed to be pushing anything. Or lifting. Or pulling. But she kept her mouth shut.

“I brought you a towel and a washcloth,” she said. The plastic bag crinkled in her hand. “And this is for your wrist.”

He snorted, but the noise ended with a small whisper of pain. He blinked, eyes red. He breathed, long and slow, and for a minute, he didn't reply, as if he couldn't figure out how to treat his body that wouldn't punish him in return, and that bothered him. When he'd ridden the wave, he swallowed and looked at her.

“Is this your not so subtle hint?” he said.

She sighed.

At this point, the shower thing wasn't so much about him being clean anymore, not in a clinical sense. Seattle Grace's nursing staff would hardly let him stew in filth just to save his pride. Just... It was something she knew he needed, and he wasn't giving her a freaking inch.

The nurses made their sponge bath rounds in the evenings after visitors were gone, and they would be by again that night like clockwork. They'd cleaned him up a little the day before while she'd waited at the nurses' station out of sight to give him privacy. She'd spent most of the time grumbling at herself for not offering to help. It had to be embarrassing for him, being washed like that, and she imagined it would be a little less bad if it were her doing the washing. But he'd barely looked at her. Certainly hadn't asked her for help. And she just hadn't been sure how to handle the situation.

“Derek, it's not a hint,” she said, feeling helpless. “It isn't anything. You've wanted a real shower since yesterday, and now you have a bathroom to do it in. I figured you'd want a towel unless you plan to drip dry or whatever. You do what you want. If you want to wait for the freaking nurse, you can do that instead.”

She crossed her arms.

“Admit it,” he said. “You think I'm dirty and unattractive.”

She opened her mouth to reply, but then she saw his eyes, glittering. He gave her a small smile.
Teasing. Only teasing. Her fight response deflated, and she laughed. Really laughed. For the first time in days. It felt liberating, and she watched his smile slide wider. How had she gotten used to him not teasing her in the mere space of two days? Had he really been that bad?

Yes, a small voice whispered. Yes, he really had.

“I would hardly be offering you a co-ed shower if I thought you were unattractive,” she said. “In fact, I think you're pretty sexy.”

“Oh, really?”

“Yes. I have a thing for men in flimsy hospital gowns.”

His lip quivered, and he blinked. He looked like he wanted to laugh at her, really wanted to, and had to struggle to hold himself back so he wouldn't hurt. Instead, he offered her something clipped. Not quite a laugh. Not quite. Just a soft, stutter-y sound, deep in his throat. “That's a bit kinky,” he said. “Liking men in pain.”

She shrugged. “I think it's a remnant of my crappy childhood trauma or something like that. I'm sure Dr. Wyatt could tell you more about it.”

“Hmm,” he rumbled.

He stood, wobbly and slow, and he reached for her body to steady himself. His hands shook. “No funny business in the shower, all right? I'm fragile,” he said, a haughty sort of mirth in his tone, but his voice was breathy and he stood in the center of the bathroom against her body, trembling. The simple truth was that he really was fragile. And that thought sort of terrified her.

The duffel bag fell from her shoulder with a thunk. She drew him into a kiss. His stubble scratched her face. His lips moved, just a little, and she tasted him.

He breathed her body in with a deep, searching breath. “I said no funny business,” he whispered, but he lingered at her lips, touching.

“Kissing my husband is hardly funny,” she replied against him.

He sighed, pushing his nose into hers, and closed his eyes. “I like kissing,” he decided. “More kissing, I say.”

She laughed as he leaned into her. “Definitely more,” she said. “But later.”

He made a soft, relaxed sound, deep in his throat. It felt so nice to hear him content. However brief.

She went to work on his wrist. She capped off the catheter and pushed the IV pole out of the bathroom so it wouldn't get steam on it. She tied the bag close to his skin. The plastic crinkled as she smoothed it against his arm, where it came to a stop at the base of his elbow and at the knobby bones in his wrist, but she couldn't help trailing along his bicep, letting the soft, fine hairs tickle the pads of her fingers. He felt so good. Shaky, but solid, and it was...

Something she needed.

“It seems watertight, but I'm not sure,” she confessed as she went back to the seam of the plastic around his elbow.

“I'm sure it's fine,” he said. “It's not like I'm submerging it.”
She touched him. “Nope,” she said. “This is just a shower, not a swimming expedition.”

His hospital gown was feather-soft and worn, and it slithered under her palms like silk. The flat plane of his stomach rose and fell under her hands. His hips, lean and sleek, were solid. His hands rested against her shoulders for balance, not gripping with any sort of desperation, just resting. He seemed fine standing still as long as he had something to ground him.

She took her own shirt off first. Her shoes and socks. Her pants. Her underwear. Until she stood before him naked and unashamed. It wasn't like he hadn't seen it all before. Hundreds of times, he'd seen it. He could probably catalog every feature from memory, just as she could with him.

“I love you,” she said.

He wanted to laugh again. “A free show when I can't even stand on my own? You must love me.”

“Hmm,” she purred. “So much it's scary.”

_I pick you. I choose you. You don't. Get to die._

She waited. Sixty seconds. Just to see if he was going to try to do something by himself. She wanted to give him that much, but he didn't move. His hands stayed resting against her, and he stood, breathing. He blinked, long lashes falling down over his face, and he sighed. “I'm okay,” he said. “It's okay. I'm…”

She smiled. “Okay.”

“Yeah.”

She crouched and rolled down his pressure stockings from the lean meat of his thighs to his ankles, where they pooled against the cold floor tiles. “Can you lift your foot?” she said, placing her palm against the ankle she wanted him to move.

His grip dug into her shoulder, and his breath caught, but he managed, and she pulled his left stocking away. Then she did the same for his right.

She rose to face him and peered into his gaze. He watched her, silent, assenting but not moving. She loosened the ties over his left shoulder first, and then his right and along his side. With nothing to support it, the gown slid into the waiting arms of gravity, and he stood before her, thin and pale and hurt. Naked except for his wound dressings.

“It doesn't hurt right now?” she said, unable to stop the burble of concern as she stared at them. He had a long rectangular bandage covering the dip between his pectorals from his neck to his abdomen, a square patch under his left nipple over the bullet hole, and little butterfly tabs over the narrow cuts where his drainage tubes had been.

He shook his head. “Just don't make me laugh, please.”

“Is that why you've been so grouchy? A precautionary thing?”

“Touche,” he whispered. “I'm sorry.”

She gave the bandages a final appraisal. She wouldn't pull them off now. The water from the shower would loosen the adhesive so she wouldn't have to yank at them, and she could replace the bandages after, or call a nurse to do it.
She moved with him into the shower. He didn't need much help to walk at all, just something to balance on. Something to tell him where the ground was, and which way was up, facts that his muzzy, tired brain was apparently unable to produce on its own.

He stood by the big bench at the back of the shower but didn't sit while she fiddled with the shower knobs to get the perfect temperature. He liked his showers just short of scalding, usually, but she tamped the heat down to a comfortable lukewarm, afraid the steam and the swelter would make him more lightheaded than he already was.

When the shower head exploded into warm, beating rain, he moved under the spray and sighed with a sort of world-weary relief that made her glad they'd somehow arrived at this unspoken peace treaty. Her helping. Him accepting. Just neither of them actually saying she was helping or that he was being helped.

She gave him the bar of soap and the washcloth first, and he did a haphazard job with his arms and his stomach, with his privates, and around his various bandages, but he couldn't twist to get at his back, couldn't bend to get his legs and feet, and couldn't raise his arms to wash his face or his hair. His slow, economized movements, and the stilted way that he shifted told her novels about how uncomfortable he was, and how little his body was willing to give him for his efforts. He'd said he wasn't in pain, but she began to suspect he'd meant it wasn't any worse than usual, that it was a constant but tolerable hum in his bones, reminding him of his unwellness. He relinquished the soap to her and stood against the rail, back to the pummeling spray to protect his incision.

“Okay so far?” she asked.

“Still dizzy,” he said.

“Let me know if you need to sit. The bench is right here. We'll manage.”

He gave her a little nod and closed his eyes as she set about to soap him down from head to toe and wash the dirt away. What first, she wondered, as she stared at her pale canvas. As many times as they'd taken showers together, she'd never really done this. Washed him. But she knew how he liked to be touched and stroked and petted, and she could work with that. She imagined the way his hooded stare turned glassy and faraway when she ran her fingers through his locks during sex. What first?

Definitely hair, she decided. She grabbed the little complimentary shampoo packet from the shower rack and poured a silver-dollar sized dollop into her hand. She had no idea what kind it was. She didn't really care.

He breathed as she tore runnels into his wet, dark locks with her nails and lathered. She threaded water and warmth deep into every tangle and clump, massaging away the grease and grime and old sweat. His hair plastered against his scalp. She pulled the tips of her fingers from his sideburns to the nape of his neck and rubbed. Again. Again. Again. Sudsy water streamed down his back in the valley formed by his muscles and his spine.

“Thank you,” he admitted, deep and quiet in the thunder. “I'm,” he began, but he never finished. The word was lost in the embrace of a moan. The water pelted them. She ran a hand up the rolling slope of his vertebrae, slipping along his wet, soapy skin, and he leaned back into her touch like a wanderer returning home. His body shuddered.

She grabbed the bar of soap and the washcloth from the rack and caressed the sleek, bunching muscles in his back. He flexed, and she remembered the last time she'd touched him there, both of them deep in the earthy throngs of shouting orgasms. Suds bubbled down his latissimus dorsi, and she stroked him spine to side along the diagonal of his muscle fibers. The washcloth rasped in the echoing space as she scrubbed and kneaded. He shook as she traced the bony line of his shoulder blades, which cut against his skin like a razor when he shifted. She rubbed soap deep into his trapezius muscles.

The last sound he gave her was a groan, but the noise had a sharp, dissonant edge. His posture seemed strange, like a question mark or some other curly cue, and not the straight, sleek line she'd seen in profile so many times in the dark or early dawn. She'd missed something in the din of the storm coming down around them, and she stilled.

“What is it?” she said.

“My back,” he said. He pushed his cheek against the cold tile wall and panted.

“Did I hurt you?”

“No. I've been sleeping on it for days. It hurts by itself.”

She put the washcloth on the railing and touched him, skin to skin, jabbing her thumbs into his pressure points. Up and down she went, spearing knot after painful knot. “Better?” she said.

He sighed against the wall. His head moved. A nod. Barely.

“Still dizzy?” she prodded.

“Yes,” he said. “But I'm okay.”

She grabbed the washcloth and resumed. She cupped his ass with her palm and stroked down to the hollow of his knees. His legs almost buckled, and she paused, breathing against his naked hip as the water sluiced between them. “Okay?” she said.

He shuddered. “Sorry.”

She shrugged and repeated, this time with gentler, slower movement, careful not to push him off balance, and then mirrored the motion from the crease of his groin to his kneecap, and from his hips down the slope of his quadriceps. She knelt and rubbed his calf and shin and the spaces between his toes, toying with the soft hairs that peppered his skin. Then she rose to her knees and did the same with his other leg, except this time, even when she was gentle, he faltered.

“Are you sure you're okay?” She hated bombarding him with the same questions over and over again, but this would not end well if he fell.

“The room is fuzzy,” he said, his voice low. Scary. Like he was going to faint.

“Do you need to sit? Derek, be honest.”

“M'okay,” he muttered, his voice tiny, but she'd had enough.

“Okay, Derek. Time to sit. I mean it.”

She guided him to the bench, and he sat, shaking as the water pelted around him. He rested, shoulder to the wall in a slouch, staring dully. His head thunked against the tiles. He was breathing hard, and his eyes looked glassy. Were this any other day, in their shower at home, she would have thought him aroused. In this case, he clearly wasn't.

“Does it still hurt?” she said. “Maybe we should stop.”
“No,” he whispered.

She frowned. “No, it doesn't hurt? Or no, we shouldn't stop.”

“Please, don't stop,” he said. His low-pitched whisper sent a shiver down her spine. “I'm fine if I just sit. Please.”

She knew they should be done. She knew it. He couldn't stand anymore. He was in pain. He needed rest.

Please.

She couldn't do it. Not when he said please like that, like he might break if he didn't have a few more minutes in this space with her, forgetting everything else.

She washed his hair again and gave him another once over with the washcloth while he rested on the bench, not so much because he needed more cleaning, but because he seemed to crave her touch, seemed to relax and uncoil just a bit more every time she stroked him and let the water wash the badness away. She did it again and again, long after it was unnecessary, until he stopped saying much. Until his face dropped forward, and he seemed to be staring at his lap for the duration because he didn't have the energy to hold his head up.

She stroked his wet hair and sighed. “You just don't know when to quit,” she said, but she doubted he heard it in the din of the water and his exhaustion when she barely heard it herself. She was a hypocrite anyway. Better that he hadn't.

She turned the water off, and the thunder ceased. He was too tired to protest at this point. Too wet and slippery and waterlogged. The drain gurgled, the spigot dripped, and he sat on the bench against the wall, breathing the drenched air while he stared at nothing. Getting him standing was a battle when he couldn't pull or push without hurting himself, and she couldn't grasp him under the arms or around his chest. They fumbled at each other, a tangled, sopping mess of naked skin, until he stood against her body, shaking and bleary-eyed.

“'I need a minute,” he said.

“I know,” she said as her eyes watered. “Only a few steps and you can rest for a while.”

He sat on the toilet seat, only semi-awake, but his body was boneless and slack, and then he actually started to doze once she'd settled him. Her husband couldn't take a shower by himself. She'd known on a fundamental level when she'd offered-but-not-offered to help, but it hurt so much more to know in a visceral sense. He couldn't take a shower by himself. Literally. He was so tired. And uncomfortable. And suffering. And it wasn't fair. Derek was the sweetest, gentlest doctor she'd ever met, and it wasn't. Fucking. Fair. How dare a patient do this? For revenge over something Derek couldn't possibly have controlled or fixed. How dare anyone do this at all? To anyone?

She sniffed once and forced herself to pull herself together.

She dried herself off, more as an afterthought than anything else, and then worked on him. She scrubbed his hair into a frizzy mess of dry-ish, explosive tangles. She tamed the snarl with a comb and some perseverance. She hoped she wasn't pulling too hard, but his eyes stayed shut, and he didn't say a word, enduring until his hair was wet but straight and clean against his scalp. She paused to throw her own clothes back on. She pulled out his sweats and his shirt and folded them on the lip of the sink.
She eyed the wet bandages. She didn't want to touch them. She didn't. But they were all soggy, now, and they needed to be replaced. She scraped the corner of the incision bandage with her nail. The water had rotted the adhesive away, and the bandage peeled from his skin with little effort. Then she removed the one over the bullet wound. The butterfly sutures could be left alone, at least.

She stared at the long incision bisecting his pectorals, the slit cuts for the drainage tubes, and at the circular but jagged gouge under his left nipple where the bullet had cut through his skin. He would have scars. For the rest of his life. Big ones that would never go away.

She debated leaving him there to grab a suture kit from the supply closet. She should have thought of that sooner. But she couldn't do it. She couldn't leave him sitting here. She would leave the wounds uncovered, for now, and drop a note at the nurses' station that the bandages needed to be replaced after she'd gotten him out of the bathroom.

“Derek,” she whispered, and his eyes slipped open like liquid.

The brief nap on the toilet seat had replenished him enough to contribute. She shaved him with his triple blade razor. He used to favor an electric one until she'd told him she liked the shave from this one better. Then he'd switched without comment. He leaned his head back and stuck his tongue into his cheek for her so she could give him a smoother finish. She held his chin while she rasped the blade against his neck, near his jugular, and down, down, down against his throat. For a moment she had to stop. Take pause. The trust he put in her was enough to make her shake with... Something. Everything. Her body shivered.

Stay with me. Even breaths. You can do it. I know it hurts.

He looked at her, eyes dark and hooded.

“What?” he said, though his serious look seemed ridiculous when his face was covered with white, fluffy shaving foam, and he was naked on the seat. She swiped the bits and pieces of hair and foam away with his towel to give him some dignity, and tossed the sopping terrycloth to the floor in a heap.

“When you were shot, I'm sorry I had to hit you,” she said.

His lip twitched. He wanted to laugh. Again, he wanted, but he didn't. “Mere,” he whispered. “Meredith. When I was shot...” His voice croaked, and he paused. Tears welled up in his eyes, but he pressed on, and they didn't fall. “When I was shot, and you hit me, all I saw was the most beautiful woman in the world.”

“Derek,” she whispered.

“Being hit was not on my list of thoughts. I promise.”

“You had a list?”

“Yes. Starting with, ‘Fuck. This hurts.’”

She frowned at him. Him making light of things seemed wrong given how pissy and angry and guilty he'd acted the day before. His shoulders moved in a cautious shrug.

“Mere, if I don't laugh about it...” His lip quivered and a torn sound split her heart in two. “I'm...” A wet sound broke the air between them, and he looked away, blinking.

She gave him a moment to regain his composure, gave him space, and let the minutes pass. In that moment, she hated Gary Clark. Just in that moment. When Derek sniffed and wiped his eyes, she continued, not commenting. She didn't think he would want her to comment.

Getting him into his sweats was next. She put them on the floor by his feet, and he sort of stepped into them while she pulled them up his thighs. They were loose on his waist, confirmation that he had indeed lost a bit of weight. A lot of weight. But the elastic held, and the pants were soft and his. He seemed to appreciate that.

He sat down again, panting with exertion.

“Will you talk to me now?” he asked as he caught his breath.

She frowned. “We've been talking. We're talking now. Witness the talking?”

“I meant about yesterday.”

“Oh,” she said.

“The loss you won't talk about.”

“Oh,” she said again. “You saw the list. Nobody was—”

He sighed. “Give me some credit, Mere. I'm hurt, but I'm not stupid. My brain still works.”

Her throat closed up. She grabbed his shirt from the sink. She was going to hand it to him to put on. She was. Instead she collapsed on her ass against the back wall and stared at him. Her eyes blurred. “I'm sorry,” she said. “I don't think you're stupid. I swear I don't.”

“When Dr. Kepner said your loss. She didn't mean mine. She meant ours. Didn't she, Mere. I've been thinking about it all day.”

“She said your loss,” she whispered.

He shook his head. “Mere, you just shaved me, and I let you, because holding up my arms hurts, and I don't want to be covered in a scratchy beard. You washed me, and I let you, because I can't do it anymore, I need to be human, and I don't want any more strangers touching me today.” He brushed a palm against his sweatpants. “I can't put clothes on by myself. A nurse who, up until this day, I've known only professionally, pulled a catheter out of my penis a few hours ago, and now I may not be pissing in a Foley bag, but I can't even stand over a toilet without feeling like I'm going to fall, and so I sit. My sternum is broken. I have a hole in my chest. Everything hurts, no matter how many painkillers I take. Everything. I'm exhausted. And I have no dignity left at all. At least let me help my wife. I can do that. You convinced me of that much yesterday. Okay?”

“Derek...” she said. She blinked, and hot, wet tears streaked down her face.

She wiped her face with her hands and stared at him. Her throat felt raw and torn. “I was pregnant,” she said. “When you were shot. I was... That's the stuff I wanted to tell you. With the dirty sex. I was pregnant, Derek.”

Whatever he had expected to hear, it wasn't that. He blinked. “But...”

“I thought you were dead,” she said. “And I was screaming and screaming and then... I lost... I'm so sorry.”

“But we weren't trying yet,” he said, his voice deep and low and stretched out like he was trying desperately not to fall apart in front of her. The look in his eyes cut her to pieces.

“Well, I wasn't trying to fall in love with you either,” she said. “Look how well that turned out.” Her fingers clenched against his shirt, and she twisted it into a tight funnel of fabric as thick around as her wrist and kept twisting. She wanted to die. She didn't think this conversation was going to make him feel very empowered.

“I need to wear that,” he said. He stared at the Bowdoin shirt she abused.

She pushed herself against the wall and stood, wiping her eyes. “I'm sorry. I'm sorry.” She didn't know what else to say. She handed the wrinkled mess to him. He flattened it against his knees, but he couldn't lift his arms over his head without wincing, and so he sat there, shirtless. The angry incision and the bullet wound glared at her. She bit her lip as she knelt in front of him, staring.

“Are you okay?” he said. “I mean... Your... You.”

“I'm fine.”

“Did you get checked by—”

“I said I'm fine, Derek.” Her snapping, harpy voice bounced around in the bathroom, discordant and unpleasant against her ears as it echoed off the tiles. She growled, more to herself than anything else. “Here,” she said. She picked up the shirt and helped him get his arms through the sleeves, and then she pulled it over his head.

As the soft, gray t-shirt settled against his torso, he pulled at the hem, straightening it. It looked wrinkled and more than a bit ridiculous, now that she'd twisted it to all to hell, but, again, he seemed happy enough with the fact that it was his, and he was wearing it.

He took a breath. “Meredith, you should—”

“I don't want to get checked,” she said. She rummaged in his duffel bag for the spare toothbrush she'd found in his desk. Who kept a spare toothbrush in his desk? He did, apparently, because he was Derek, and he was a freaking health nut who had floss and other crap where most people only had pens and slightly chewed erasers. She jabbed the tooth brush package at him like a spear, and he took it “I was only three weeks along or so. There was a little cramping and some blood. I'm fine. I am. It doesn't hurt anymore. Pregnancies that terminate this early don't need doctor visits, Derek.”

She felt silly to be lecturing him about it. He was a smart man. He was a surgeon. And he'd been married to a world-renowned obstetrician.

The toothbrush package crinkled as he fiddled with it. “Mere...”

“I made the decision when I saw you waking up after surgery. I'm fine.”

“You just decided to be fine?”

Her lower lip quivered, and she lost her composure all over again. “Yes,” she said. She placed a palm against his cheek. It was smooth and dry, and she couldn't help but roll her fingers back through his wet hair. “You're alive. You being alive is what I needed. The rest is sad, but in the grand scheme of things, it's immaterial or whatever. We can make more babies later as long as you're still alive. There is no other you, and I need you. Please, don't be angry at me.”

“Why would I be? Mere, why would I be...”

With an awkward, shaky motion, he stood up. For a moment he was fine, and then he flailed. She grabbed his hands and held him as he stumbled to the sink for support.

“Mere, why?” he said.

He crushed the toothbrush packet and threw it in the trash bin by the sink. She watched him brush his teeth on his own while she tried to think of a way to turn her garbled, messy thoughts into words. He had to stop in the middle for a break to rest his arm, but he brushed without assistance, and that made her heart twist into a tangled mess. Nobody should be this ecstatic when her husband brushed his teeth by himself. She hated Gary Clark. Just a little bit more than before, for just a moment longer.

“Because I didn't tell you,” she said. “And I... Yesterday. You were angry at everything, and you've been in a lot of pain. I didn't want to upset you anymore, not after... All this. I didn't want... I thought I could wait. Just for a little while. Until you were better.”

He spat into the sink. “Mere, I wasn't angry.”

“You were angry, Derek. You're angry now,” she said. She touched his shoulder while he ran the dirty toothbrush under the faucet, but somewhere between toothbrush washing and when he went still, her touch turned into clutching. His muscles tensed in her grasp, like a fire was welling up inside him, and she knew. She knew she was right no matter how much she didn't want to be. She sniffed, and she hated Gary Clark a bit more. “You're angry at everything. And scared. Maybe it's not burbling over right this second because we're talking about babies and you're brushing your teeth, but it's there. And you're having nightmares. I may not have any freaking idea what to do about it, but I know you. I know you, and I...”

He bowed his head and stared at the drain with a hopeless, endless gaze. His knuckles turned white as he gripped the porcelain. “I wasn't angry at you. Not yesterday. Not today. Never. I'm...” He turned to her and tilted her chin to him with his hand. “You saved my life.”

His face had a pale, dumbstruck, frightened look to it, like he still couldn't quite grasp that his life had needed saving at all, let alone from a crazed gunman bent on revenge. She looked away, at his neck instead of his face. She couldn't watch his face because it made her upset all over again. It made her hate even more, and she knew she shouldn't. Gary Clark was dead.

“Cristina did,” she muttered.

“No,” he said. The watercolors of the world tilted backward as he forced her gaze up again. Up at him. He kissed her lips. “You did. I wouldn't have lived long enough for her to touch me if...” Something in his eyes broke, something dark and upsetting. He blinked, and he was crying. Crying like a dam had broken loose. But he puffed out a desperate, frustrated sigh and grunted, forcing himself through it with shaky breaths. He built himself back up, brick by brick. “Take some credit, Mere, for god's sake.”

“I don't want any credit. I just want you to be breathing. And healthy, and okay, but...”

He stared at her, face desolate. “I am breathing, Mere,” he said, almost as if he were trying to convince himself more than her.

She blinked. “I know.”
“I'm working on healthy and okay, I swear.”

He moved. Toward the door in a sort of stumble shuffle shamble. His shaky hands found the door frame, he paused, took a deep, shivery breath, and then he moved back toward the bed. Midway, he wavered, and she wrapped her arm around his waist to give him balance. He put his hand on her shoulder, blinking like if he did it fast enough, his gaze wouldn't be blurry, and he wouldn't be upset or on the verge of falling apart. She knew. She knew he was trying to show her he was trying to be okay, and it wasn't working. It wasn't working at all.

He reached for the bed railing, and then he pulled his hand back like he'd been slapped. “Fucking,” he half hissed, half moaned, unable to finish the curse. He inhaled, and then he couldn't stop, because each time he sucked in a breath, which put pressure on his sternum, she watched his face crumple into agony, and he gasped, starting the cycle again. He put a hand on his breastbone and his lips tumbled open, like he was hoping the inferno at his incision site would escape in a snarl of fire and stop torturing him. His torso started to shake, and he sat on the edge of the bed as though his joints were made of glass, and if he moved more than an inch at a time, they would shatter. When he caught his breath, he looked like he'd run a gauntlet and lost.

“Derek...” she said. She wanted to hug him. Instead, she stood between his knees, her thighs stopped by the mattress, and cupped his shoulders. She stroked his arms. “I don't expect you to be Superman. You're Derek. You're just a person. And you were hurt. Really, seriously, light-at-the-end-of-the-tunnel hurt.”

She watched the ghost of Gary Clark slink and cower in the shadows of his face. Derek blinked. “He was going to kill me,” he said.

Mr. Clark, no...

“But it's over,” she told him. “It's over, and you're all right, and I'm all right.” She ran her fingers through his hair. “We're okay. And Gary Clark is dead. He's dead, Derek. He can't hurt you, or anyone. He's dead.”

“The men that shot my dad got away,” he said, and she stilled.

She didn't know what to say to that. She didn't have any idea at all. Her mind swirled as she recalled the way Derek had acted around Mr. Dunn, the serial killer, and the pieces clicked into place. She trembled with uncertainty. I'm sorry was all she'd had to say when he'd told her how his father had died. I'm sorry. Just a bad day all around, I guess. The degree of her insensitivity cut her to the quick like a ten-blade, and she clenched her fingers, gathering tents of his wrinkled shirt in her hands.

He wiped his hands against his face, leaving wet, salty remains behind.

“Is that what you've been dreaming about?” she said.

“Sometimes,” he said.

Silence settled down around them like a blanket. Millions of things to say ran through her mind, but not a single one seemed appropriate. She settled for standing there, in his space, to let him know she was there, because if she said something stupid again, something like Just a bad day all around, I guess, she would never forgive herself, not when he was this fragile.

He shook his head and sighed. “We really made a baby?”

She sighed. He apparently wanted to change the subject even more than she did. She smiled despite the ripping pain in her gut that told her this was far from over. She smoothed a lock of his hair that had dried funny and sticking out, and then collapsed beside him.

“We really did.” She leaned against his shoulder, and he rubbed her back while she touched his thigh. “I was so happy, Derek.”

His hand stilled. “You were?”

“I didn't think I would be,” she said. His shirt was soft, even if it was wrinkled. And he smelled like soap and clean things. Strange soap, with no aftershave, while they sat in a strange bed. She missed the subtle scent that was just him, male and heady and hers, the scent he left behind on pillows and shirts and places he spent time. She sighed again and wished she could just curl up against him and tell him the story while he stroked her. She rubbed her palm along his thigh, feeling selfish, and unable to stop the yearning at the same time.

“I threw up breakfast for a whole week before it clicked,” she said. Wistful. She sounded wistful about vomiting. How had that happened? How had any of this happened? “And then I didn't want to buy a test. Because I didn't want to know. I was ready to be upset. Like earthquake preparation or whatever. You know how to respond, like running under a solid door frame. But you know you're going to freak out when it actually, seriously happens.”

“Us procreating is like dying in a massive earthquake?” he said. “You're making me feel really great about this, Mere.”

She pushed his shoulder lightly, careful not to push too hard. “Derek,” she snorted, and she laughed. God, she loved how he could make her laugh. Even when the world was crashing down. Even when she was afraid to hit him even in play, or hug him because she didn't want to squeeze too hard. Even when they'd lost a baby.

“I finally grabbed a test from the supply room, and then...” Her voice fell away. She kissed him through his shirt and rested, staring but not seeing.

“And then?” he murmured.

She shrugged. “Then I wasn't upset. And I couldn't wait to tell you. That's when you found me in the hall. While the shooter was loose. I was on my way to tell you, Derek. I'd given up waiting for the dirty sex. I was too excited, and Cristina really wanted to see you cry.”

“She should stop by now, if she wants to see that show.”

“Derek...”

He sighed. “I have to admit, I'm a little disturbed that Cristina found out my sperm worked before I did.”

“I'm sorry,” she said, and she meant it. She meant it deeply. “She caught me right after I was finished in the bathroom with the test, and I was busting at the seams. I came to your office and scheduled dirty sex right after.”

“And then I got shot,” he said. It was the first time he'd said it that night without any intonation. She looked at him. He seemed all right, for once.

“Yeah,” she said. “And then you got shot.”

He blinked, but his eyelids languished while they were closed, and he drew a deep, upset sort of sound into his chest. “I'm really tired, Mere.”

“I know,” she said. She forced herself to smile. She'd attacked his family for keeping him up all day, and then she'd done the same, but at least he felt like he could tell her. When he was exhausted and couldn't talk anymore. He could tell her. Unlike his family.

He smiled. “I asked for it, Mere. Not your fault.”

She stilled, wondering if she'd spoken aloud. He winked, eyes sparkling despite his exhaustion. “I love you,” he said, his voice thick and heavy. I love you. I get you. Simple fact. His eyes spoke volumes. And then he wilted in the undertow of too much for one day.

She helped him lie back against the bed without jarring himself again. The sheets whispered as she helped him slide across. She reseated the nasal cannula over his nose, and the bed hummed as she laid him back flat. She hooked up the IV line while he watched her, quiet and breathing. She pulled a fresh set of pressure stockings from the cabinet by the bed, rolled up his pant legs, and helped him into them. His feet seemed cold again, and she wished she had socks for him. She made a mental note to go hunting later as she rubbed warmth into his toes. Maybe the gift shop had some.
If worse came to worst, she could head home tomorrow for a little bit while his family was invading his room like a born again Normandy.

He pulled the blankets over his body and sighed. “I feel better,” he said.

She smiled, this time not forced. She smiled, and it felt wonderful. “Good,” she said. She sat by his hip and leaned over him, kissing him, and as she hovered there in his space, nose-to-nose, she watched him watch her. “I want to try again, Derek,” she said. “When you can. When you're ready.
For the dirty sex.”

He grunted. “When I can? You know that part's not broken. Right?”

Hot blush streaked across her face, and she pulled back, startled. “I meant. I mean when you can exert... When. I didn't mean to imply that you can't. Um.”

“Hmm,” he said. “Just a bit shell-shocked from the catheter. Give it a few days to recuperate.”

She giggled. “Derek, you're such a freaking letch...”

“Sex in the elevator while I'm in a wheelchair after heart surgery would be pretty dirty,” he said.
“You have to admit that at least...” But then his body relaxed, and he slept before she could admit much of anything. She stood and raised the bed railing, leaving him secure and dreaming, maybe even about dirty wheelchair sex from the odd twist of his lips, a smile halfway to carnal pleasure and other naughty things.

Pushing aside the discarded macaroni drawings she'd left there earlier, she settled herself onto the sofa, stretching out her aching back. The hot, orange sunlight streaming through the windows dipped low faded to the deep purple of twilight. She watched him breathe as he slept. In and out. In and out. She still couldn't get over how such a simple thing could sound and look so miraculous.

He didn't wake when the orderlies brought in the cot for her and set it up beside his bed near the window next to the reading chair, even despite the racket they made, what with their grunting and heavy breathing. The bed squeaked, too, and it twanged when they banged it into things. It even made a loud resounding crash when they flattened it against the floor, but he still didn't budge.

He didn't wake when the orderly brought his dinner, either. The slight, curly-haired woman whispered, “Dinner time, Dr. Shepherd,” over his reclining form. She pulled the tray table over Derek’s bed at his waist and left the tray on top of it. The woman nodded at Meredith as she left and closed the door behind her, drowning out the distant sounds of people and movement and things into something almost silent, but not quite.

The food steamed and stank and made Meredith's stomach growl while she tossed and turned on the cot. She debated whether to wake him up for it, but decided sleep was probably the better for him of the two options. It still stank, though. Like food. Food she hadn't eaten in she couldn't remember how long.

Feeling like a felon, she crept over to his tray table and took a forkful of limp string beans from his plate. She chewed. The beans and spaetzle split apart in her mouth with little assistance, telling her they were processed and probably microwaved, but she sighed anyway. Food. God, food, how she'd missed it. She sampled the mashed potatoes as well. They were too salty, too buttery, and not even a small chunk of potato remained in the frothy, grainy mix to tell her that they were real and not instant. She couldn't tell if the chef was simply whip-happy, or if they were really the kind of mashed potatoes that started in a box. She took one more bite, and then she stopped.

“You sure you don't want some?” she asked his sleeping body.

He didn't reply.

“You're sort of missing out,” she said. “It's pretty good. Well. It's not horrible, I mean. Or maybe I'm just starving.”

Nothing.

She poked at the main course with Derek's fork. “I think this might be real steak, Derek. This is like the pinnacle of the entire hospital menu, and you're missing it.”

Silence.

She jabbed the fork at him and glared. “You. Are missing it!”

She kneaded her hands together when he didn't stir. He wouldn't mind if she took just a little bit. A rubbery piece of steak was in her mouth before she could talk herself out of it, and she gagged. Seattle Grace definitely needed to include A-1 with this meal. Or at least ketchup. Anything to hide the yucky lack of flavor, a lack that meat was not by any stretch of the imagination supposed to have, even when it was this well done.

“I. Am a horrible. Person,” she told him as she chewed.

She poked at the little slice of cheesecake on the side, but she couldn't bring herself to steal that, too. That was just too mean. Stealing cheesecake from her husband when he was sick. Too despicable and wrong.

The orderly came thirty minutes later to take the tray back. She pouted, not only because Derek hadn't woken up to eat any of what she'd left for him or to witness her martyrdom about the piece of cheesecake, though she'd broken down and stolen the cherry garnish at some point, but also because she really was sort of hungry still. She made helpless, starving faces at the orderly's back as she walked away with the tray, and then Meredith made an executive decision.

She would eat, if only to reduce her chances of grand theft eggs in the morning.

She didn't bother to change back into her scrubs or into something more presentable. Nobody would care. This was a hospital. People walked around in their pajamas all the time, and her pajamas looked more like gym clothes anyway. On her way down the hall, she stopped by the nurses' station and told them about Derek's bandages. Then she went to the cafeteria, which was now empty of police officers, and grabbed a pita sandwich to take back to his room. The steaming chicken and Caesar dressing smelled delicious. Delicious and good and tasty and... She didn't make it. She scarfed it down in the elevator, nearly choking she inhaled it so quickly. Her stomach rumbled its thanks as she polished off the last leaf of lettuce.

When she returned, she found him sitting up again, chatting with the nurse who'd brought him his pills and a fresh set of wound dressings. Well, more, the nurse was chatting at him while he worked on his chest, and he was replying in short sentences consisting of yes, no, or his trademarked hmm noises. His hair stuck up in all directions, having dried while he slept, and he looked more than a bit groggy. After Marcia finished with his bandages, she pulled his shirt down. He tossed back the cup, and Meredith watched him down an Oxycontin tablet, followed by some Percocet. She really couldn't blame him for being too dizzy to walk straight, not when he was on that kind of mind-blowing cocktail.

When they'd moved him from ICU, they'd taken him off morphine in an attempt to get him on the drugs he'd be using when he went home. Just to make sure, while he was still in their supervision, that there weren't going to be any gnarly side effects, and that the medication worked for him and gave him an acceptable amount of pain relief.

She waved at Marcia, who smiled. “You saved me a lot of work today, Dr. Grey,” Marcia said.

“Don't let her fool you,” Derek said with a smirk as he blinked muzzily in Meredith's direction. “She just wanted to see me naked and vulnerable.”

Meredith laughed. Marcia blushed. And then the nurse left.

“You really want to try now?” Derek said when they were alone. His voice had been scraped raw with a fierce sort of hope, like he'd convinced himself, in the back of his mind, that she'd never really want to try, and now she was dangling the opportunity at him like bait on a hook for a gullible tuna or something. He looked over from the bed, eyes still hooded with sleep, like he wanted to collapse back into dreaming, but not before he said what he wanted to say. “I mean not now. But...”

She padded over to the bed, pushed the railing down, and sat by his hip. She stroked the weave of the blanket. He stopped her with his hand, and she said with a small nod, “Now. Yeah.”

“You're sure you're ready now?”

“I love you. You'd make a really great dad.”

“You shouldn't do this just because I want it,” he insisted.

She shrugged. “I'm not. I want it, too.”

“I'd understand if you want to get through your residency first, or...”

“Derek?”

“Hmm?” he said.

“I really do love you,” she assured him. “But shut up.”

He couldn't stop himself from chuckling, and she waited while he recuperated from that, stroking the side of his face. She hated that he couldn't laugh when he wanted to. That was the worst of all of this.

“T'll make a deal with you,” he said when he found his voice again, low and throaty with lingering discomfort.

“Yeah?”

“I'll shut up if you get checked out.”

She kissed his temple. “It's late, Derek. I'm not sure anyone in OB will be available. I suppose I could go to the emergency room...”

“Try,” he said.

“If I do this, will you shut up, get some sleep, and eat the entire meal they put out for you next? You missed some moderately acceptable steak this time around, and I didn't see you do more than pick at the salad they brought for lunch today.”

For a minute, he didn't respond, and she wondered if he'd fallen back asleep. “You drive a hard bargain,” he mumbled. “I'll have to think on this.”

“Derek...”

He waved his hand. “Go. I'm closing my eyes right now.” Except he opened them and watched her.

“They're not closed.”

“They will be,” he said. “I'm thinking about the delicious fake-egg substitute and the greasy, drippy, processed sausage they serve on Saturday mornings, and I can't contain my excitement. Couldn't you have at least picked pancake day for this sort of bet?”

She laughed. “You're such an ass.”

He winked. “But you love me. You said so.”

“I do,” she said, and she stopped at the threshold to look back at him. “How did that happen?”

“I told you, Meredith,” he said. His eyes flared, heady and full of awe as he looked at her. “I'm someone you need to get to know to love.”

She snorted. “So, you're blaming me for this whole mess?”

“Well, I was drunk.”

“And vulnerable?” she guessed.

“And very good looking,” he added.

“You mean an ass.”

He sighed. “Mere,” he said, his suffering tone belied by his expression of glee. “Go get checked.”

“Derek,” she mimicked him, straight down to the sigh and the way he'd rolled his eyes. “Close your eyes.”
He grinned. “On three?”

They shared a playful, connected stare. She licked her lips, and he watched her like he couldn't decide between collapse and chasing her despite horrible consequences. Collapse or chase? Collapse was gaining ground. She knew, in that moment, that even if they didn't count, he wouldn't make it more than a few minutes, but what the hell.

“One,” she said.

She tapped her index finger against the door frame, a haphazard tick of motion to vent her thrill from her body. They were playing. They were playing, and it was nice.

“Two,” he murmured.

His eyelids drooped, but she drank in the lazy, carefree smile that spread across his face. He looked like he almost felt human again. She flipped the light switch with that image caressing her retinas, and darkness bathed his room.

“Three,” she whispered into the shadows, and she left him to sleep, closing his door behind her.
Chapter 5

A two-headed woman with four eyes stood over him, arguing with the One who sat by his shoulder. Every time he closed his eyes, his shoulder shook like an earthquake, and he had to wake up again. Had to. Didn’t know why. His chest hurt, and he wanted to sleep. The sounds that hit his eardrums seemed to waver in and out. One moment, all he heard was the thunder of his breaths. Another moment, pounding silence. Another, words.

When sound turned on, silence became words. “We can’t use that thing,” the One said, her words a cacophonous spear in his brain. “We don’t know where the bullet is! We need to keep his back straight, and he could bleed out anyway if we let him sit up.” Earthquake. “Stay awake, damn it!”

“How do you see anything else to use? It’s all I could find.”

Off. His heartbeat stuttered in his ears. On.

“—looks really bad...”

“Shut up, April. He can hear you, for god’s sake. Derek!” Something squeaked by his ear. Earthquake. He stared. “Derek. Derek, stay awake,” the One said. “Can you move? We need to —”

Off. Mouths moved. What did they say? He blinked. The left side of his body had been set ablaze by a wailing chorus of unhappy nerve endings, and he couldn’t fill his lungs.

On. “—lease, Derek,” the One said. “Please, get up. Get up. Get up!” Something pulled at him. “We need to get you into this wheelchair.”

“He’s in shock. Everybody grab hold. Mere, you get his feet, we’ll push him up on three, and then we’ll all lift. One. T—”

Off. Hands grabbed at him. The world lurches forward, and he stared at the floor in front of him because the ceiling was gone. Blood spread all over the floor in a lake. His blood? He blinked. What was... Why? Fingers gripped under his armpits and yanked. The fire in his chest ignited down his arms. He screamed. He didn’t hear it, but his chest burned. The hands at his feet let go.

On. “—hurting him. Stop. Stop, stop. Please.”

“Meredith, he’s got a bullet in his chest. He’s going to hurt no matter what the hell we do, and we need to get off this catwalk. Now. Pick up his feet and deal with it.”

“Meredith,” he said. Slurred. Why did he? Imitating. All three of them stopped.

“Derek?” said the One. “Derek, please. We need to move you. Can you stand? Please, can you stand, so we don’t have to drag you? Please. I love you. Please, stand. Please. I know you can do it.”

He didn’t understand the words anymore. He didn’t know the people. Just the intent. The desperation. The syllables didn’t make sense. But he wanted to help. He wanted to make it better. Why? Meredith. He wasn’t even sure what that was anymore. A person? An idea? But he knew a Meredith would want him to listen. He stared.

Fire sliced his face. The world swept to the side. He blinked again.
“Derek,” said the One. Beautiful face. “Please. Focus. Focus for me. It's me. It's Meredith. And I need you to—” Off. But he saw the word finish on her lips.

Move. He could do that. Could he? Yes. His hands found the One's shoulders and grabbed. Something gripped him around the waist. He pushed with his legs, pushed until his muscles shook. The floor fell away, and he was spent.

He collapsed against her, falling. She buckled but held, and he was up. Not falling. People wrapped around him on all sides and let him drop, slowly, into a chair. There was a chair? He couldn't breathe sitting up. Fire in his chest. He coughed.

Fingers ran through his hair. Arms around him hugged tighter. Warm when he was cold. The One said something next to his ear. He felt the soft beats of air against his skin. On. “—love you. I love you. It's okay. You'll be okay. Just hang on. Please, hang on.”

She melted away, and the world started to move.

Silence. Off.

Somebody tapped the wall by his door, and the sleep he'd so precariously purchased evaporated.

“Dr. Shepherd, I'm sorry, but you have to wake up now,” said an apologetic whisper. The light flicked on and speared his eyelids like a storm of tiny, stinging daggers. Shoes squeaked against the floor tiles. The empty space by his bed filled with a warm body, a person watching him. A hand touched his shoulder.

Not Meredith.

The sluggish desire to flinch away died as the bed hummed, and the world moved. His body folded at the waist. Air buffeted his face as somebody moved. “Hmm,” he groaned, but the noise stuck in the back of his throat like saltwater taffy and sounded almost pained. He scrubbed his face with his hands. His head spun, and he wanted to go back to sleep.

“Dr. Shepherd, it's 6 AM,” said the voice. “You need to take these.”

He pushed his eyelids open into slits, unable to bear the sharpness of the light. “What?” he said. In the blur beyond the fuzzy haze of his eyelashes, he saw the tray table over his lap, a cup full of water, and a white, indistinct spread of dots. Pills.

Sleep launched a final assault. His eyelids dipped shut. His head fell forward. His chin touched his chest. His awareness of the world began to falter, and the light didn't matter as much anymore.

The hand at his shoulder became more insistent, and it shook him. “Dr. Shepherd, you need to take these, or you're going to start feeling a lot more pain. I know you're groggy, and it's early, and I'm the last person you want to see, but trust me. Take them.”

“Weren't you just here?” he muttered.

“I'm sorry,” she replied, as if that somehow helped.

He would have rolled away from her, would have snuggled back under the covers on his stomach and stuffed his face under the pillow with a groan that would have made Meredith snicker, because he was a morning person, and anything that made him act grumpy in the morning was a source of amusement for her. He remembered doing some sort of groan and roll maneuver many times when Cristina would barge into their bedroom, crawl into bed, and start yammering about the newest crisis in her life while he was still trying to sleep. Groan and roll. Like the new duck and cover. Except he couldn't roll without squashing his healing chest, he couldn't sleep on his stomach, and this was not home.

The sheets smelled clean and stark. The bed was narrow, meant only for one person. He had no privacy or personal space. And Meredith was not beside him.

“Meredith?” he said.

“She's not here right now, Dr. Shepherd.”

He stared at her cot. A head-sized impression carved a dent in the pillow. The sheets and blankets sat askew, like she'd been there with him, tossing and turning all night trying to escape the noise. She was gone, now, though. Something tugged at his memory and then slipped away in the mire.

He grabbed the cup and washed pill after pill after pill down with it, until he wanted to gag. No more, he wanted to say, but then the glass of water and the tray table disappeared. The light didn't hurt his eyes anymore, but he felt detached and far away from things. The air seemed fuzzy, and noises seemed muffled.

He'd never been a diehard coffee person, though he did partake, but after five days of being prodded and poked and in pain, he thought he might need an intravenous line of the stuff to remain functional. Wake up, he tried to tell his body. His body said fuck you.

He sat with his head tilted toward his lap, staring at his fuzzy blankets. The weave of the blanket blurred and split into doubles as his eyes wandered out of focus. All night, he'd tried to sleep. All night. In the lull after 3 AM, a magic, noiseless time, he'd managed. Now, the sleep he'd struggled for was gone, and he felt as though he'd been mugged.

The nurse handed him the heart-shaped pillow he'd grown to despise more than anything in the world. Lethargy bled into dread. He blinked. He had to wake up, damn it. Had to.

“I don't want to,” he said, picking up his head.

He inhaled, short, soft little gasps that made him think he might be panicking. Was he panicking? No. Preparing. The room came into focus as his eyes caught up with sentience. He stared at Marcia, who looked like she wanted to cry. If he weren't in such a wretched mood, he might feel bad that he was being a horrible, argumentative patient.

“I know,” Marcia said. “I know you hate this, Dr. Shepherd, but I think if you get pneumonia, Dr. Grey wouldn't be very happy with you, and I'm sure you don't want to go back on a ventilator because your lungs have given out. Do you?”

He blinked. You're still on the ventilator. It's all right. Not all right.

Hi, Meredith had said, her face dissolving into tears. Oh, god, hi. She'd touched him, palm to his face, and he hadn't been able to figure out why his body wasn't moving the way he wanted it to, the way he commanded. The room had been dark and quiet and strange, but familiar. Why did he know it? His body had felt cold, like a block of ice through to his bone marrow, and he'd shivered, but he couldn't fix it. Mere, he'd wanted to say, except he couldn't speak. Mere, why am I stuck?

Does it hurt? she'd asked. No. But he hadn't known why she expected him to hurt in the first place, and he hadn't been able to ask. She'd made him warm and safe. Why was safe important?

Exhaustion had pulled him under.
He'd woken again to a repeat of the same confusion, but at least she explained. Cristina got the bullet out. She fixed you. And Gary Clark is dead. For some reason, he'd found those ideas upsetting. What bullet? Who was Gary Clark?

Bits and flotsam had returned as the moments turned into hours, like little glass pieces in a once-shattered puzzle. He'd remembered, eventually. His body hadn't been working right because it'd just been shot, in shock, and then under anesthesia for who knew how long with his chest cavity pried apart.

Gary Clark had shot him.

“I'll try,” Derek said. He gripped the pillow to his chest and forced a quick chuff of air from his lips, hoping it would be enough to appease his persistent caregiver. Something in his chest shifted and started to burn, but the thrum of pain was brief. Something he could handle.

Nurse Holding frowned. “Dr. Shepherd...”

“Marcia,” he said. “You're asking me to stab myself over and over with a giant machete. I'm sorry I can't be more enthusiastic about it.”

He was being horrible. A horrible patient. The kind of patient that sent doctors like him home at night wishing they could murder puppies and small children, and as a doctor, he rarely had to interact with any of his post-ops for more than thirty minutes a day. He couldn't imagine how the nurses felt. Nurses who had to deal with difficult patients for hours on end. Nurses who had to deal with a difficult patient who was technically their boss.

He pulled the pillow against his incision, enfolding it in a tense embrace, and then he gathered a breath deep into his chest and coughed. Really coughed. Something broke inside. A sliver of pain cracked him open wide like a crowbar. An embarrassing, choking yell he couldn't help erupted from his lungs when the first wave of shock hit his incision. The agony didn't stop. The pain made him inhale, which slammed him with another knife and another. Every time he wanted air, suffering plunged deep. The room went fuzzy and swirled around his head.

“Really good, Dr. Shepherd,” said Marcia. “Can you give me one more?”

No, he wanted to cry, but she'd been with him for days now, been dealing with him for days. He pulled the pillow against his chest, pressing until his arms shook. He filled his lungs to the brim and coughed. A dry, choking sob followed the cough. No more, he wanted to say. Please, please, no more, except he couldn't bring himself to speak. He clutched the pillow and lay there, gasping and being stabbed. Over and over.

“Squeeze my hand, sweetheart,” said a soft, low voice, and a warm, weathered palm found his.

His mother touched his hair, and he squeezed. He trembled, and his body felt like it was going to break. The tendons in his arm snarled with ache. His elbows locked with tension. And still, the knives impacted. Every time he breathed.

“One more, Dr. Shepherd,” Marcia encouraged. “Just one more.”

“Mmm,” he moaned, his eyes quashed shut, and then he forced himself full of hurt again. Pain sliced into his breastbone, sharp and unforgiving despite his lackluster last effort. It wasn't his best cough. Hell, the weak stutter of breath barely even counted, but his battered diaphragm was done. His chest was done. His body was done, and he didn't have the energy to do much else. If this wasn't good enough, there wasn't much he could do about it.
His mother rubbed his shoulder in a way she hadn't done since he'd been fifteen and shell-shocked and silent in her arms. His father's blood had still been stuck in his shirt and dried on his hands, and she'd held his skinny body against hers, as if she hadn't been able to convince herself he was okay. They'd found a sort of solace in the waiting room of the hospital where the body had been taken. Police officers had trudged in and out, whispering quietly at the edges of the corner they'd sequestered in the bustling space of Mount Sinai’s emergency room waiting area.

Somebody had covered him in a blanket. He didn't know who. A detective, maybe. Not his mother. His little sister had been hysterical, and they'd taken her away because his mother hadn't been able to be a functional parent right then. Hadn't been able to be a functional anything. But she'd rubbed his back, and they'd sat there, blank. Waiting.

Waiting for nothing. The body had been taken to the morgue. There was no exhausted doctor that was going to come in any moment with hopeful news. But nobody had been in any shape to move, and so they'd waited. One of his aunts had taken his other sisters somewhere away from all of the confusion, and even in the hectic midst of one of Manhattan's busiest hospitals, his life, for once, had seemed quiet. Nobody had been pushing him or whining at him or teasing him or wanting something that was his. Nobody had bothered him. His mother had breathed softly in his ear, and beyond that, he'd heard nothing, just felt the soft rasp of her palm against his shivery back while he'd stared into space.

By the time Derek came back to himself, Marcia had left him, and the sky had lightened a sliver from pitch black into dark, deep blue. He stopped clutching the pillow and breathed, and his mother's hand ran up and down his forearm in a quiet whoosh, whoosh, whoosh.

“Just keep breathing, Derek,” she said.

“Mom.” His voice sounded raw and torn, like he'd screamed for hours, though he knew he hadn't.

“Shh,” she soothed. “Sleep if you want.”

He reached for the button to lower his bed, but before he found it, his body lowered. The sheets rustled as she pulled them and the fuzzy thermal blankets up against his body. The weight of the evil heart-shaped pillow disappeared, followed by a soft, whispering thud, and, with nothing left to clutch, his arms fell to his sides, limp.

“Are you comfortable?” she asked.

No, he wanted to say. His back hurt. His chest ached. Every muscle in his body twinged with annoyed discontent. Why haven't you moved us lately? Despite it all, it didn't matter. His muscles could bitch all they wanted. The operator was too spent to appease them.

His eyelids dipped and closed, but now that he'd been pried firmly from sleep's grasp, he couldn't quite seem to find his way back to it again. Every time he arrived at the precipice of the abyss, something would happen in the hall. Some noise. He didn't manage much more than a doze. He had a vague awareness of his mother somewhere in the room, breathing, and he didn't dream. Sounds of the hospital outside his room fluttered against his ears. A team thundered past with a crash cart, and the distant sound of shrieking alarms and frantic voices echoed beyond that.

When he gave up and forced his eyes back open, the sky outside had lightened from dark blue to depressing gray. Rain splattered against the window. His mother sat in the reading chair, reading in the dim light. He stared at her through the bed railing.

She wore a dark purple sweater and faded blue jeans. She held the book toward the window, letting the dreary daylight hit the pages. Why hadn't she turned on the lamp by the chair? He squinted at the book title, but couldn't read it in the deep shadow. She dogeared the page and set the book beside her.

“I'm breaking the rules. I know,” Mom said. “No visitors before 10 AM.”

He couldn't bring himself to be startled, even in the haze of slow thinking gripping his brain. She'd always had that. That sixth sense that would tell her when one of her children was in her vicinity, staring, even when her back was turned, even when said child wasn't speaking, or crying, or whining, or anything at all. She just seemed to know.

“Meredith called,” his mother said, as if that explained everything, but it just made him feel more clueless.

He closed his eyes and brought his hands to his face, swiping the sleep away. Meredith. Where? That's right. He remembered. He'd sent Meredith home. Or rather, he'd asked Cristina to take her. Sometime last night. Or... Early morning? Some time dark. Meredith hadn't wanted to go, and so he'd offered her breakfast and lunch and a walk to the end of the hallway for it. For her to get some real sleep in a real bed. The walk had been what had convinced her.

All the way down the... Derek, are you sure?

Absolutely. I feel good.

Slight white lie. He hadn't felt well or good since the morning he'd said hello to her, and she'd scheduled dirty sex that night, but he couldn't see the harm in making Meredith smile. Getting her to grin at unexpected moments had become the highlight of his hospital stay.

His mother stood, brushed her palms against her jeans pockets, and turned toward the bathroom. He closed his eyes.

They paused in the hallway and ducked into an alcove. He couldn't sit up straight. His chest hurt, and he couldn't breathe. He wanted to be flat. The three women stilled behind him and went silent. A hand came around and covered his mouth, gripping him so hard it hurt. He blinked. Why?

“I think he went left,” somebody whispered.

“Left goes nowhere. He's going to turn around. We need to move.”

His body whipped backward in the grips of inertia. He moaned, but they didn't stop. They moved. Fast. All he could do was watch the walls of the hospital fly by.

His mother stood over his bed, staring down at him as he came back to himself, his heart beating like a drummer pounding out a frenzied solo. His chest ached. He couldn't remember when she'd moved from the chair to the side of his bed. Couldn't recall her footsteps, and the disorientation bothered him.

He swallowed, feeling detached and strange. The painkillers made it a little hard for him to recognize subtleties. He had the vague sensation of his body sitting several feet in front of his brain, and the delay between thought and action stretched the longer he was awake. The air seemed hazy. Thick with cotton. And when he moved, even just a little, the world sped up into something terrifying and hard to process, like every object around him was a car on the Autobahn, and he was a simple pedestrian debating the insanity of crossing.

“Do you need anything while I'm up, sweetheart?” Mom said.
“I don't need a babysitter,” he snapped. Want. You don't want a babysitter, whispered a tiny voice. Want is the key word. Not need.

She shrugged. “Good, because I'm not here to babysit you. Do you need anything?”

His bladder was full, but he didn't want to get up to fix it, and there was no way in hell he would ask his mother for the plastic urinal sitting like some sort of flag on top of his heart monitor, several feet out of his immediate reach. Emptiness gripped his stomach with a distant ache. After eating meal after meal to appease Meredith, his body had started becoming interested in nutrition again. He wanted food. His back shivered with stress. He wanted to relieve it. Except rolling onto his side made everything inside his chest feel like it was going to tumble onto the bed, and shortly after that, the shooting pains began, which left him with the option to sleep on his tortured back, or not sleep at all.

The fight bled out of him as the insurmountable list kept growing in his head into something unmanageable and hard to remember, and then he couldn't remember what his mother had even asked. The shivers in his back became barbs of pain, and he shifted.

“Mom,” he said, his voice breathy. His eyes stung. He blinked when he realized he didn't remember what he'd been planning to say. At all. “What?”

She frowned. “Meredith said she'd be at home for a few hours, and that's all she said. Your name didn't even enter the conversation. I connected point A to point B and decided you might like some company, that's all. I'm not here to hover or babysit. If I'm bothering you, I'll leave.”

He stared at the ceiling, trying to hold onto the upset twisting at his brain. “I'm not very good company.”

“You're awful company,” she agreed. “Shame on you. Yelling at your mother. Barely talking. Sleeping all the time. I expected a world class tour when I got here, and I still haven't seen this trailer of yours that Nancy says is awful.”

A noise cracked at the back of his throat, and he blinked. The room blurred. “Mom…”

“Derek,” she said. She touched his arm. When he dared to look, he found her smiling at him. “Derek, I'm teasing, dear. I'm sorry. I didn't realize you would take me seriously.”

“Oh.” He closed his eyes and tried to settle the floaty feeling. His back twitched as a spasm jerked all his muscles in tandem. How could he be this disconnected and still this uncomfortable?

“If you want to go back to sleep, that's fine,” Mom said. “I brought a very entertaining book. It's about a group of women who make quilts. You'd probably loathe it, but I find it to be a good dose of escapism.”

“I'm…” He wiped his face and fumbled for the button that would raise the bed, but he couldn't find it. The pads of his fingers found nothing but cold sheets, the plastic trail of his nasal cannula, and then the bed railing. “Just…”

“Up?” his mother said. He saw the remote in her hand.

“Yeah.”

He tried to ignore the spinning feeling as his head gained elevation. He breathed, a soft, wet sound in the quiet. He tried not to stare at the door. He wanted... “That's all they do? Make quilts?”
“That's all they do,” Mom said.

“What's the plot?”

“They make quilts.”

“The plot is that they make quilts?”

“Yes.”

“You're right,” he said. “That sounds loathsome.”

Mom laughed. She touched his face. Brushed her warm palm against his sideburns and ran her nails through his hair. “Oh, sweetheart,” she whispered. “I've missed you so much.” But she didn't say anything else for a long time, and he found himself drifting. Drifting away. The bed railing fascinated him for some odd reason, and he lost track of her as she moved away and did...

Something.

Noise drew his attention back to her. She pulled the small backless examination stool against his bed and sat with a heavy sigh, close to him so that he could talk to her without turning his head and staring across a void of empty space. He stared, and it took him at least twenty seconds before he connected what his eyes were showing him with thoughts.

“There are better chairs in the break room down the hall,” he said. “Ones with backs.” He imagined himself walking there to get one for her himself, dressed in his navy scrubs, fresh from an operating room where he'd made a save.

_You're not the man here._

She shook her head. “I'm fine for now. Tell me about Seattle. Why do you like it?”

He leaned back against the pillow. Rain plinked against the window and ricocheted into the grayness. He watched and let the gray lose focus. If he lost focus, he didn't see the muzzle of the gun, or the way Gary Clark had looked at him with hate. Derek thought. Why Seattle?

“It's quiet for a city,” he said. “It's the first place I've ever lived where I can hear myself think. I like the ferryboats on the water. And the green. And the rain. The people here. They're... less worried about everything.” _You hurt me when you decided to kill my wife._ The gun clicked as Mr. Clark pulled it from his pocket, and Derek found himself staring down the barrel of a black pistol. “Or...” His voice broke. “I don't know.” He didn't remember the impact; he just remembered staring up at the ceiling. He couldn't breathe. Dr. Kepner screamed and started talking, but he couldn't remember the words. “I'm...”

“I planted a new rose garden,” Mom said, pulling him from the undertow as though he were four again, and wandering too far away from the beach. He'd lost his watering can, once, but Mom had grabbed his arm, and he'd swung into the air as a frothy wave had swept the can away. He'd been very upset about the watering can, but she'd shrugged. _It was either save the kid or save the can. I think your father would have been a little upset if I'd chosen to save the can, don't you?

_I guess, Mommy._

He blinked, and the painful memories scattered like the raindrops hitting the window. He breathed. Focus. He could focus on the now. Except he couldn't remember what his mother had said. He swallowed. He wasn't sure if he liked the now any more than the then.
“I planted a new rose garden,” Mom said again. A re-prompt. Like she knew he had the mental capacity of a guppy.

“What happened to the old one?”

“Black spot and an early frost,” she said. “Wiped everything out. But I bought some new hybrid teas, and they’re blooming. Do you do much with your land here?”

“Oh, he said. “We’re planning a house. The construction workers broke ground just a little while ago.”

“Derek, that’s wonderful. I’m sure it will be beautiful. Do you have plans that I could see? Or pictures?”

“Meredith has them back at the house. I’m…” He thought of her, sleeping in their bed, in their home, covered in their sheets. He thought of himself, lying down beside her, skin to skin and warmth to warmer. She wrapped her arms around him. They didn’t talk. They slept. But she held his body, which didn’t hurt, and he finally found repose that wouldn’t abandon him too soon. He closed his eyes as longing welled up inside like a tidal wave.

“She’s very good for you,” Mom said, her voice soft. “Meredith.”

“I’m sorry she kicked all of you out.”

“Nonsense,” Mom said. “She was right. All of us lost our heads for a bit.” She shifted, and the chair groaned. “We saw on the news, and you didn’t call, but you would have called if you were okay. It would have been the first thing. Then the phone rang, but it was Mark. And we just… Lost our heads.”

His breaths started to skip in his chest, sending slivers of pain deep inside. “Mom, I—”

“Hush,” she told him. “Just hush. Mark called. We’re here. You’re alive. Mark is safe. Meredith is safe. I won’t insult you and say that everything is fine. But it’s not the worst, Derek. It’s far from the worst.”

He looked away and closed his eyes against the flood.

He lay on the ground, his body shutting down. Gary Clark stood over him with the gun pointed at Dr. Kepner. Derek couldn’t understand the words. She spoke too fast, and he couldn’t breathe. Then she ran, and Mr. Clark brought the gun to bear on Derek again.

“No, Mr. Clark,” he said. Gasped. “Mr. Clark.”

Derek held up his hand as though it would mean something, as though it would stop a bullet or entreat the man to have some mercy, but Mr. Clark stared, an angry, distraught Grim Reaper. He aimed the gun. A roll of agony like a typhoon forced Derek flat, blinking. He waited to die.

Mom picked up his hand and squeezed it, hurrying him back into the present. “It’s not the worst, Derek,” she said. “It’s not the worst.”

He punched the railing with his free fist. The bed jostled, and his chest felt like it would break. Mr. Clark took aim again, and Derek flinched. “It feels the worst,” he said. “A man shot and killed seventeen people just to find me, one of Meredith’s best friends is in a coma, we lost a baby, and now I’m… I can’t…” Breathe. Think. Do anything.
His mother blinked, a dead look of shock flattening her features. Her fingers tightened around his.
“Oh, sweetheart.”

The fury and frustration heating his body cooled when he realized what he'd said, what he'd blurted. “Please, don't tell them.” You bailed on Thanksgiving. And Christmas. And you live in a trailer. And you're getting a divorce. And then there's the slutty intern. “I don't want the third degree from them. I don't want them giving Meredith the third degree.”

“I won't tell them,” Mom said quietly.

“It just...” He sighed. “It feels the worst. I'm not even... I didn't know about it. Before. She just told me two days ago. She thought I'd died, and the stress, I guess... Or something. She thought I'd died. I was dying. I...”

Meredith talked with Cristina and April in the corner, whispering. He couldn't breathe. An elephant sat on his chest, and every nerve in his body wailed with pain, enough to make him nauseated on top of all that. He was too cold to shiver. His eyelids wouldn't move more than a millimeter either way. An indistinct, hazy detachment pulled at his mind, urging him to let go, but what scared him more was that he wanted to listen to it.

Meredith babbled at him as she returned to the table, assured him it would be fine, touched his hand and his shoulder, but the floaty feeling made her words hard for him to understand beyond her tone of voice.

“Kiss me,” he said. Pull me back to earth.

Their lips touched.

“I'm not gonna die,” he said as she pulled away. “I promise.”

Except he'd thought at the time that it was another white lie. Another way to make her smile for him one last time. Meredith kept acting like he was the hero of the fucking universe for keeping his word, and that only made it worse. He was alive, yes, but he'd had nothing to do with it. Whatever kept him breathing?

Not him.

You're not the man here.

And that was scariest of all.

“Mom.” He felt like he was sinking, like the mattress was pulling him in, and he wanted Meredith more than anything. His fingers clenched, and his sight blurred. A blink, and something spilled against his cheek, wet and crawling like a bug.

“Hush, now,” his mother said. “I'm here.”

She stood and leaned across the railing, and he couldn't stop himself from wrapping his arms around her. Something in his chest shifted. His torso wailed against the movement, but he couldn't help it. Couldn't... His fingers pulled tens of her fuzzy sweater into his palms, and he mashed his face against her neck and breathed in the scent of her perfume, something old and rosy and singular to her for as long as he could remember. In the space of seconds, he'd been reduced to infancy, wailing for his watering can. He supposed he'd almost died then, too, at the tender age of four, but just like five days ago, once and then again, somebody else had plucked him from the snapping jaws of a gruesome fate.
“He was going to shoot me again,” he said. “I was going to die, and I couldn't do anything.”

He couldn't do anything.

Her fingers pulled through his hair, and she listened, but didn't comment. Her breathing slowed into something schooled. Her hands, smooth and soothing against his back, lost their varied rhythm, and became more like windshield wipers on a low setting. Back and forth. Back and forth. Methodical. Like she was trying to box herself up and shut her feelings off.

He blinked and dropped his arms, struck numb. What the fuck was he doing?

He took a steadying breath despite the pain it caused him deep inside, and he closed his eyes. The effort to stop the floodgates nauseated him, but he managed. His eyes burned. His throat felt raw and full, like he'd swallowed an egg and it'd gotten stuck just above his Adam's apple. He didn't speak again for a long time, convinced that if he opened his mouth, it would all come out again, all that whiny, horrific sniveling.

His mother released him, and she sat back on the chair and stared at him with familiar, knowing, sad eyes that made him feel even sicker inside. Hers was a timeless look that he'd seen at countless troublesome points in his life, and it usually followed whenever he told her in no uncertain terms that he didn't want to talk about it. It. Whatever it happened to be at the time. Her stare was one that said, “All right. But I'm here.”

When the orderly arrived promptly at 7 AM with a still-steaming Belgian waffle and some orange juice, Derek thought he might vomit. His earlier hunger had collapsed with his stress, and now the smell alone of food made him twitch.

“Have you eaten?” he asked, his voice hoarse.

“I had some coffee before I came up here,” Mom said. “I'll grab a danish later after I've woken up a bit more. Eat. Don't let me stop you.”

He stared at the golden waffle, which was covered in a golf-ball-sized glob of melting butter. A little ceramic cup on the side held a thick puddle of congealing brown syrup. His innards twisted.

He forced another breath deep into his chest. Calm down. Calm. The fuck. Down. If he didn't eat, his mother would know without a doubt that something was still wrong, and he'd promised Meredith. Breakfast, lunch, and a walk down the hall. He'd promised, and that at least was a promise he could keep without external assistance.

“Is Meredith okay?” he asked.

He shoved the butter globule to the side with his fork and didn't touch the syrup except to move it as far away from his plate as possible. He stabbed the soggy waffle and worked a block of it away from the larger piece.

“She sounded fine on the phone,” Mom said. “Maybe a little worried about not being here for so long.”

“She's not taking care of herself,” he said. “We've started trading.”

“Trading what?”

He chewed and swallowed, tasting nothing but paper. The waffle felt like a brick in his stomach. He took a sip of orange juice, but the sharp, acidic citrus only made the brick feel like it had jagged
“I tell her I’ll take a walk,” he said. “Or eat. Or something. In exchange for her doing something. Like going home to sleep.”

His mother remained silent for a long time, staring at him. The distance between them felt like the miles between Seattle and Manhattan, though she still sat right by the railing. “She's just worried about you,” she said.

“She's barely gotten any rest since this happened,” he said. This. The gun clicked. He jabbed the fork into the waffle and took another bite. He managed not to gag. “I have nurses and visitors and orderlies coming in at all hours.”

“Hospitals are some of the most exhausting places in the world for people trying to heal. It seems counter-intuitive, but...”

He set the fork down with a small tap against the tray. His throat felt thick and full again. He couldn't do this. He couldn't be fine anymore. He shouldn't have said anything. He shouldn't have permitted the gates to open. Jamming them shut again with so much bursting through was a Herculean affair for the healthy. Not him. Not when, physically, he'd already been torn apart.

He closed his eyes. The room revolved around him, drunken and sluggish, but moving and unstoppable. Disorientation took the churning in his gut and made it tenfold worse. He wanted Meredith. Meredith made his world stop. Surely, she would stop this horrible spinning.

“I want to go home,” he said. With a deep breath, he faced the room again. Colorless walls inside the room. Endless, dreary clouds outside.

“Have they said when you'll be released?”

“Two more days at the earliest.” He stared at his half-eaten waffle.

“You look a lot better today, I think.”

“I look like I was shot, Mom,” he snapped, and the last vestige of his resolution not to be upset in front of her shattered like a bomb had gone off inside his head. He clenched the hemline of his blanket, because if he didn't, his hands would be shaking.

“No, Derek,” she said, her voice soft. “You look like you were shot five days ago. And now you're healing.”

A searing, ironic laugh skipped over his lips, and he winced as he paid for it in backlash. He shoved his tray table away. He pushed the blankets off his body. Chilly air hit him through his thin pajama pants.

“Derek, what are you doing?”

“I need to use the bathroom,” he said. “Is that okay with you?”

She looked like she wanted to say something, and he stared at her, ready to be nasty, ready to bite. If she said one word about the fucking urinal, he would probably say something he would never forgive himself for. Instead of berating his stupid choices, though, she smiled.

“All right,” she said, and she made no move to help. She stood, but only to return to the couch for her book.
Appeased, he scooted forward. The nasal cannula dug into his nose and upper jaw as the line cut him short. He yanked it away. It landed on his pillow in a tangled, distorted heap. He fumbled at the railing, infuriated with the long, exaggerated movements he had to perform just to keep his chest from flaring into agony.

He could push the bed railing down. He could slide over the side of the mattress. He could find his footing. But the expedition felt like a sports replay in slow motion, made only more torturous by the burbling anger that he had no way to release except by snapping at his poor mother, and the underlying fear that he wouldn't be able to do this. Walk to the bathroom.

The pads of his feet flattened against the floor. Cold seeped through his socks from the immaculate tiles. His back jabbered at him. Pain. Pain, pain, pain. He tried to straighten up, but he couldn't. Not quite.

He took one step. Another. He hobbled at the speed of a geriatric hip-replacement candidate. One step. Another.

“I'm fine,” he said when he felt his mother's eyes on him.

The room whirled around his head. He gripped his IV pole and gritted his teeth. He'd walked yesterday while Nancy and Kathy had accompanied him as perky cheerleaders. He'd walked the day before with Meredith. He could fucking walk, now, no matter how upset and tired he was.

A catalog of slow steps later, he shut the bathroom door behind him and sighed.

The mirror showed him horrors. His scratchy beard had started poking through his skin again, rusty black-brown and a few gray hairs mixed against his chalky skin. His eyes were puffy and bloodshot, his face haunted. Chunks of his hair stuck out in all directions. He wanted to shave. He wanted to comb his hair and wash his face and brush his teeth. He wanted it all so badly his brain ached with the desire, but the thought of all that effort and pain just to look like a presentable victim instead of a trashed one left him staring. Just staring. His breaths tightened into something painful. Tears welled up in his eyes, and he couldn't fucking breathe because it fucking hurt.

He shuffle-stepped over to the toilet and closed his eyes. The room kept revolving around him, even when he wasn't looking at it, except when he was standing, the dizziness wasn't just an annoyance. His breath caught. He held onto the IV pole because that was all there was between him and a trip to the floor, or at least, that's what it felt like, and he didn't want to test himself without support. The wheeled feet on the pole were a problem. He'd tried numerous times, and he couldn't get the pole close enough to the bowl to use it as support, not without bending his arm back farther than his chest wanted it to go. Biting his lip, he raised his arm. Maybe he could take his weight this time. Maybe. It'd been five days. Maybe his mother was right, and he'd healed. Just a little. He flattened his palm against the wall and leaned. Agony lashed up and down his breastbone, and he reeled backward, unable to stop the moan that skipped from his throat.

This shouldn't be rocket science. He swallowed.

He wasn't sure he'd be able to get up again if he sat, but like the last however many discouraging trips, he didn't have a choice. He dropped his pants, he sat, and he peed like a fucking girl. Shut up. No talking. You're not the man here. I'm the man, Gary Clark had said.

He leaned over his knees, feeling nauseated and sick as he emptied himself.

Let's reassess in a few days, Cristina had said the day before while Dr. Altman had stood by, watching. Cristina had taken one look at him and decided he wasn't well enough to go home, wasn't well enough to take care of himself at home if Meredith or someone else wasn't there, and Dr. Altman had agreed.

Reassess. Like he'd done with his palm against the wall, only to fail. They'd make him stay here longer than two more days. He knew it. His body wasn't going to fix in two days what it hadn't in five.

He reached for his duffel bag by the sink, ignoring the way his arms and his chest told him this was a bad, bad idea, stretching so much. Meredith had gone home yesterday and brought him some clean shirts and socks and pajama pants, a whole pile of warm, soft things that were his. He dragged the duffel bag to his feet and jammed his hand deep into the mess of clothing. He pulled a shirt free, a black Fruit-of-the-Loom cotton shirt, nothing on it but a stray golden hair the length of his forearm. Meredith.

He didn't bother to swipe the hair away. He brought the shirt to his face and inhaled. The fresh, clean scent of Meredith's favorite detergent wafted against his nose, and he calmed down a little.

He pulled a clean pair of cotton plaid pajama pants and white socks from the mess in the duffel, and put those on the lip of the sink with his shirt. He tried to reach the toilet handle to flush while he was still sitting, but his back snapped bloody murder at him, and he couldn't do it. With a soft groan, he forced himself to his feet and back into the spinning, dizzy nebula of the room. He turned and hit the handle with his palm. The bowl came alive with a roaring whoosh.

He stumbled out of his dirty pajama pants and grabbed the new set from the sink. The roll of his clean socks lost its precarious perch and fell into the bowl of the sink. The reflex to catch them didn't fire. He watched the roll fall and settle over the drain. The sink was mostly dry, and he couldn't bring himself to care about his socks yet.

He stared at the pants in his hand and let gravity unfurl them. He tried to get them the right way around, with the elastic waist open toward the ceiling, drawstrings facing away from him. Simple. This should be simple. He fixed brains for a living. But what should be wasn't what was. Exquisite tiredness swept over his body as he fumbled with the drawstrings to get them out of the way.

He held the pants at knee level and tried to step-shift into them. He succeeded, barely, and he rested with his hip against the sink, panting like he'd run for miles and miles. His vision fuzzed at the edges. Thoughts stuck in his head like gooey molasses. He decided he might fall. He didn't even try to catch himself. His body slipped. An inch. Then the world found him again. The bathroom snapped into place, and he knew he was by the sink, breathing. Barely balanced, but standing.

He swallowed.

His eyes started to burn again. This shouldn't be so difficult. None of this should be so difficult. Normal heart surgery patients were past this point by day five. Normal heart surgery patients who hadn't been fucking shot. Normal heart surgery patients who were already going home.

He reached behind his head and grabbed the collar of his t-shirt. Something in his chest stretched and twinged. He pulled up and over his head. The soft, worn shirt came down over his face and his arms and promptly got stuck on his intravenous line.

He cursed and fumbled with the damned thing, trying to get the line to release from the shunt in his vein, something he'd done countless times to seizing, psychotic, or simply crazy patients, and yet it had never seemed so complicated as it did now, when he wasn't even moving. The line fell free after several tries and swung like a pendulum through the air, back and forth. His dirty shirt slipped to the floor.

He grabbed his clean black shirt. Where his pants had been complicated, his shirt almost seemed impossible. Getting the front of the shirt facing the right way for application to his body, and then shoving his arms through the correct arm holes drained what little energy he had left. In a last ditch effort, he raised his arms over his head. His chest quivered with discontent, but he was fine. He was fine. He was fine.

When he bent his elbows and tried to bring the shirt down over his head, his incision line exploded in a roaring column of fire, and something popped audibly. Something that wasn't supposed to pop. He couldn't stop the yell of pain that punched from his lungs. The shock sent him to the ground with a jarring, agonizing thud that resounded up and down his spine like a ringing bell, and he rested against the sink, head spinning, shirt stuck and twisted about his neck and elbows while he choked.

You're not the man here.

Gary Clark took aim again, and there was nothing Derek could do but wait.

The bathroom door whooshed open. His mother burst into the room, moving faster than he'd ever thought she could move at her age. “Derek, what—” she blurted, but her voice cut short when she saw him on the floor.

He wanted to die as his mother helped disentangle him from his shirt. He leaned his head back against the sink and stared at her, eyes blank and dull. Her gaze, soft and brown and concerned, didn't match his face at all. He had his father's coloring and hair to the dotted i and the crossed t. He wondered how it felt for her to see her dead husband on the floor of the bathroom.

He blinked.

“Did you hit your head? Are you hurt? What happened?”

“Something popped when I put my shirt on,” he said, his voice hollow and far away.

She lifted the shirt she'd just helped him straighten out, and she felt his chest and stomach, clavicles to bellybutton. Her touch was warm and methodical and gentle, practiced and professional. “Nothing seems displaced,” she said. “I think you might have just popped your sternoclavicular joint. If your breastbone starts to ache or swell, you need to tell your doctor immediately, though. You're not supposed to be reaching over your head like that for a reason, Derek.”

“I'm sorry,” he whispered as his eyes started to leak, unbidden, and he just couldn't hold it in anymore.

She frowned. “Whatever for?”

“For putting you through all of this again. I'm...”

She grabbed his face with both hands and stared. He couldn't look away. “You haven't put me through anything, Derek. I am your mother. You're sick. It's no different now than it was when you were a baby. If you're sick, I will be there. And I will help. It's what mothers do, and I knew that when your father and I chose to conceive you.”

“I'm not sick, Mom,” he said. “Somebody did this to me. With a gun. Just like Dad.”
“A virus or a bullet, it's all the same,” she said. “You'll get better. Until then, I'll help. Can you stand?”

She settled back on her haunches and stood with a groan that reminded him he'd just had his sixty-eight year old arthritic mother on the cold floor. To help him with a fucking shirt.

“Mom, I'm so—”

Something in her eyes snapped. “Do not apologize to me, Derek Christopher Shepherd,” she said. “Do not apologize to me for another man's evil. I won't have you thinking I'm some burdened waif for having to see you be hurt this way. I'd rather see you this way than dead, and I'd rather have you talk to me than not talk at all. None of this is your fault, and I will not have it. Do you hear me, young man?”

He swallowed. “I think I'm going to throw up,” he said.

She pulled the trashcan to him and he clutched it, breathing. His throat remained constricted and stuck, but nothing happened. He tasted bile, but the brick waffle stayed down. He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

“Maybe not,” he decided.

“Sweetheart, can you stand? I don't want you on this cold floor.”

Can you stand? He wanted to laugh again. Wanted to. But then he thought of what would be entailed with him not standing. She'd need to call a nurse. Several nurses. Nurses who worked for him. With his chest so fragile, they'd need to roll him onto a backboard or something. Just to get him off the floor of the bathroom. His skin bloomed red and hot just thinking about it.

“I think so,” he said. He could. He could do this one thing. Please.

She took the trashcan from him, and he shifted, forcing his legs into an Indian style cross. He dug deep into the last of his last reserves. He pushed up with his feet and his shaking thighs, making a tired, pained sound with his throat, and managed to get off the ground without using his arms at all except for balance as he swung them forward in front of himself. His mother grabbed him around the waist, and he made it all the way to vertical before he wished he was still on the floor.

Mom grabbed his clean socks from the sink and helped him back to the bed, pulling the IV pole along with them. He collapsed against the mattress. She fixed his IV. His head pounded, his back screamed, and the lights seemed too bright, but at least he didn't need to use the bathroom anymore. That was something. Right?

“Were you going to put these on?” Mom said. She waved the roll of white socks at him.

“Yes.”

He stared at his lap and waited for the new dose of humiliation, but she handed the socks to him instead of trying to put them on his feet. He didn't have the energy anymore. His socks could stay dirty. He left the clean roll resting by his hip, forgotten as soon as his fingers abandoned them. He closed his eyes and let the heavy feeling in his brain sweep him away.

_Breathe deeply, Dr. Shepherd._

“Derek,” Mom said. “I want you to promise me something. Can you do that?”
“Hmm?”

“I know you think I can't deal with this because of Dad. I know you think you have to be strong for me and for your sisters and even for Meredith, though maybe not as much. But I want you to talk to me. All right? Even if it's about what that monster said to you, or how you felt, or what you saw. I can't guarantee it won't upset me. I can't. But I want you to promise you'll tell me anyway, if it's something that you want to tell. Will you promise me that, please?”

Breathe deeply, Dr. Shepherd.

Meredith had stared down at him, the soft gray of her eyes gloomy and worried under the beating lights of the operating room. I love you, she'd said. And he hadn't been able to say it back.

“Mom,” he said. And then he fell asleep before he could promise anything.

The waves slashed at the empty white beach. Millions of stars hung from the heavens like frozen fireflies in the black. The moon rested low on the horizon, a big pie plate of light that swallowed half the sky. Wind blew across the water and the sand, a slow, breathy hush across the world.

“What is this place?” Derek asked.

His father turned as a wave crashed to shore, gurgled, and slipped away into the dark. He shrugged. “Somewhere in your head, I suppose. We all have pieces like this.”

Derek raised an eyebrow. The breeze sent fingers through his hair. “Pieces?”

“Pieces where we go to heal.” His father smiled. “I used to love taking you to the beach with your mother and sisters. Do you remember when we went to Sandy Hook?”

“Yes,” Derek said. “Every summer. That's where I lost my watering can.”

Dad shook his head and laughed. “You're never going to forget that, are you? So many good things happened there, but it's always about the watering can.”

“What can I say, Dad?” Derek grinned. “My mind was young and impressionable. Losing my awesome watering can made an impression.”

Dad grunted.

“I kissed my first girl there, too,” Derek confessed. “But you were dead.”

“Oh? Was she pretty?”

He sighed. “Not as pretty as Meredith.” He pulled at the memory, but it clung to the edges of his subconscious. He remembered the feeling of the kiss. Nerves like bugs in his gut. Anticipation. Contact. Her lips had been soft and full. She'd grabbed his hair, and he'd known then that he liked it sexually. Having his hair touched. “Her name was Lisa, I think. Or maybe Liza.” He reached for more, but his grasp returned with nothing. Just a name and feelings long past.

“You needed that to get to here,” said Dad.

Derek nodded.

They watched the water for a while. Frothy, foamy, white waves spit up over the sand and swept away. The bald light of the moon reflected off the surface of the water, turning what would have been a dark, swirling pit into a choppy plane of sparkling glass.
A shadow crept behind his father.

“Derek, listen to me,” Dad said. He turned and cupped his hands over Derek's shoulders, and he squeezed. “This is very important.”

“Dad?”

His father opened his mouth to speak, but nothing came out. A loud crack of thunder broke the peace. Red bloomed under his father's left nipple. Dad looked down. He touched the wound. His fingertips came away red. Then he collapsed to the ground, leaving Gary Clark standing with a gun pointed at Derek.

Two women talked in the next room, and Derek could hear them through the wall as though it were made of paper, but their voices weren't what had woken him up. His eyes drifted open. He had no idea how much time had passed, but his back seemed to think it'd been years. A glance at the clock told him years had, in actuality, been about fifteen minutes. Sharp, spasmodic pains punched through all that Percocet and all that Oxycontin, and made him more miserable than he'd ever been in his life.

“Everything looks fine, Mrs. Fischer,” said the earthy voice of one of the orthopedic surgeons he had worked with a few times. Dr. McCullough, or something. The wall muffled her voice, but only slightly. “I think you'll be able to go home tonight as long as your husband agrees to stay home with you for the first day or two.”

Derek clutched the blanket by his hip. The rain outside had slowed into a drizzle. His mother had returned to the reading chair, and the pages rasped as she flipped them in the gloom. It took her perhaps two minutes between each flip, and he listened. Flip. Flip. Her breathing had a soft, comforting quality, and he tried to let his mind drift.

“Will you promise, Derek? I know you're awake.”

He looked at his mother, who'd shifted in the chair and put her book down. She stared at him expectantly. He tried to remember why, but all the cotton in his head made it hard to think, and his traitorous back broke even the most simple thoughts into pieces.

“What?” he managed in the lull between throbbing waves.

“Promise to talk to me,” Mom said. Her eyes shimerred. “Instead of bottling it all up. I can bear a lot of things, but I can't bear that anymore. Don't do that to your body on top of everything else that's already been done.”

“Okay,” he said. His voiced sounded strange in his ears, like someone had jabbed a knife into his spine and twisted. He sat up, unable to be still under the pressure of all that discomfort. He looked, bleary-eyed, at the couch. He could get there.

“Derek,” said his mother. He heard her footsteps. He gripped the bed railing and squeezed. The room went fuzzy as she came up beside him. “Are they not giving you enough pain medicine?”

“My chest doesn't hurt.”
She brushed his cheek with her palm. “That's not what I asked, sweetheart.”

He pushed the nasal cannula back over his head and shoved himself to his feet. He could make it to the couch. He could get there. He stood, his body crooked. His lower back barked at him. He trembled with fatigue. His whole body. Like a tuning fork. He clutched her shoulders, independence dissolving into defeat.

“I just want to get to the couch,” he said. “Please, I need to.”

“All right,” Mom said.

She shuffled with him as he moved like some sort of damaged refugee across the floor. He didn't even care anymore that she was helping. He wasn't sure he would have made it without her, and he needed to move. He needed it.

“Don't sit yet,” she said when they reached the sofa.

He hovered on the precipice of collapse. “What?”

She yanked the blankets from his bed and wrapped them around his body, tight and secure like a cocoon. “For support,” she said. “I've had patients tell me it helps.”

She guided him the rest of the way, and he sat. She brought him a pillow and stuffed it behind his back, between him and the sofa. She stuffed another one by his side between his ribs and the arm of the sofa. He leaned his weight against the arm of the seat. His ribs pressed in. His chest felt a little weird, but not bad, and it gave his back some amount of relief. What had been wailing pain all morning faded to a whine.

He felt like some sort of big puffy snowman on the couch, bundled and padded on all sides, but he couldn't bring himself to protest. He couldn't bring himself to speak at all. He closed his eyes. The room spun around him in slow, disorienting revolutions and made him feel a little sick. Sleeping sitting up like this was not a long term solution, and he didn't want to think about what things would be like a week from now, or even tomorrow. He didn't want to think.

The sofa cushion dipped as his mother sat beside him with her book. Her body gave him support on a third side. She pulled her book open to page sixty-two and started reading. Darkness gripped this corner of the room, even more so than where the reading chair sat.

“At least turn on the lamp,” he said. He tried to move his arm to do it for her, but he'd been wrapped up like a burrito and couldn't move. He swallowed, paused, and wondered if she'd planned this, but he couldn't bring himself to care, and so he sat, still, a suffering island held stationary by the water.

“It won't keep you up?” Mom said. “You always used to hate lights. You couldn't sleep if the hallway light was on, even when your door was closed.”

“I can't sleep anyway,” he admitted. “I can't sleep here. There's too much noise, everything aches, my head is spinning, and I miss home.”

She touched his shoulder, hesitant at first, and then her arms wrapped around him. “I know,” she said. Her voice sounded helpless, like she wanted to take it all away for him, but knew she couldn't.

“I'm sorry,” he said, feeling useless all over again. “I'm really sorry, Mom.”
She sighed. “You are so like your father, it's uncanny sometimes.”

“What do you mean?” he said.

The flat of her palm found his upper back, and she rubbed. He closed his eyes. “He was always apologizing for things that weren't his fault, just like you,” she said. “Nobody can control the world, and neither of you ever learned that lesson.”

“I'm a surgeon,” he said. “Every day I see that I can't control the world. Every day when I want to fix something, and it breaks instead. Or at least, I used to. Back when I still actually cut.” He sighed, and he couldn't help the bitter edge in his voice when he added, “Back before this happened.”

“Well, yes, sweetheart, I know that,” Mom said. “But does that knowledge stop you from being upset when you fail, even when you know that there was nothing else you could have done?”

“There's always something else I could have—”

“I think you've just proven my point,” she said. “Don't you?” She bumped into him with her shoulder, a playful, light jostle.

He shifted. The blankets and the pillows helped ease the strain of sitting up as well, and for the first time in days, he realized he actually felt, not comfortable, but at least not like an abraded, open wound. The relief, however, was a sort of torture all by itself, though, because he wondered how long it would last before his body found new reasons to complain about its hindered predicament.

“Your father would have been very, very proud of you,” she said. “You're a fine young man despite all the flaws he gave you.”

He couldn't help but chuckle. He grunted with the pain and forced himself past it. “Thanks,” he said, a sheepish grin sliding over his face as the discomfort waned. “Your confidence in me is astounding.”

Her eyes twinkled. “I knew I still had it in me somewhere.”

“What?”

She touched his face. Her thumb paused at his lip. “Getting you to show me that beautiful smile of yours.”

“I told you I wasn't very good company,” he said.

She shrugged. “You're healing, Derek. You're allowed to be bad company. I just wanted to see my son and read my book. Thank you for humoring me.”

“Hmm.” His eyelids dipped.

“Sleep. It's all right.” Awareness flickered. “Shh,” she added, and her soothing did him in.

He rested against her shoulder, staring through his eyelashes at nothing in particular. His breathing stretched out. “Lamp,” he said, and she reached across him. Light speared his pupils, and he blinked while they adjusted.

The mere act of clearing his mind and sitting without horrible, lancing pains, did wonders for his tired brain. Even despite the sharp yellow light, despite sitting up, despite the dull, whining ache in the back of his awareness, he almost managed to doze. Almost.

His eyes closed all the way. She rubbed his shoulder through the blankets absently as she flipped another page. His brain just wouldn't let go, and he sighed with frustration, a small bluster of upset air that sounded sort of like a gasp of pain, but wasn't really.

He gave up. He gave up trying and contented himself to sit there, a quiet block of not healthy. The narcotics made it easy to sit and stare and do nothing but think in a disconnected jumble. His thoughts started to twist inward on themselves.

“Mom?” he said.

She placed her finger on the page, holding her place, and looked up. “Yes?”

“Before Dad died, he said, 'Listen to me, Derek. This is very important.' Then he apologized. And then he stopped breathing.”

She paused, and she blinked. “Derek,” she said. “You never told me this.”

He stared at his lap. Her bedroom had been next to his on the other side from Amelia's. He remembered the muffled sounds of her sobbing night after night, after she thought they'd all fallen asleep. She used to say his father's name a lot when she slept, too. Michael. Always plaintive.

He couldn't figure out how to reply.

“Tell me, now,” she said.

“I've never been able to figure it out,” he said. “If his apology was the important thing, or if he never got to say what he wanted to say.”

She considered him for a long, long time, and he wondered if she'd gotten lost in the twists and turns of old memories. “He wouldn't have started to say something he wasn't sure he could finish,” she said.

“I wish I knew for sure.”

“I do.”

“How?” he asked.

“I just do,” she said. “He wouldn't have wanted to leave you alone. He would have been very sorry.” Her eyes spaced, and she left him behind as memories took her far away. Her eyes misted. “And I did tell you he liked to apologize for things that weren't his fault.”

Silence stretched. For some reason, her answer, her surety, didn't bring him the peace he'd thought it would. Instead, he felt empty.

His mother smiled at some stray thought, shook her head, and then chuckled. “He would have loved Meredith, you know. Very much.”

“You think so?”

“Yes. She's a scrapper. Feisty. She's, what, a hundred pounds soaking wet, and she stared all four of your sisters down like a bull-fighter. You wouldn't think she'd be able to cram that much spirit into such a little body, but she's figured it out.”
It's the chase, Meredith had said. Isn't it.

What?

The thrill of the chase, she'd said, but he'd lost the words and gotten stuck watching the cute way she cocked her head while she reasoned. I've been wondering to myself. Why are you so hellbent on getting me to go out with you? You know you're my boss. You know it's against the rules. You know I keep saying no. It's the chase.

Well, it's fun, isn't it?

"Tiny, ineffectual fists," he said. He snorted. Another brief pain bloomed in his chest, but it was all right. It was all right, and he was fine. Thinking about Meredith. When he saw his mother's curious look, he smiled. "Sorry, I guess you had to be there."

"Will you see if she'll come for Thanksgiving this year? I know she's not very comfortable with big families. But I'd like you to ask her. Maybe in a few weeks, when things aren't so raw with you two."

"I'll ask," he said.

"Good," she said. She went back to her book and read another few pages.

A light knock rapped on the door. The distant hospital bustle became loud and cacophonous as Amelia poked her head into the room. "Hey," she said, her voice soft. She glanced at him on the couch, buried in blankets and pillows, and her eyes creased with concern. "I just wanted to say goodbye before I left. Rachel said I could take her shift."

His mother stood with a groan that spoke of joint pain and weariness, but determination. "Already, sweetheart?"

"Yeah," said Amelia as she stepped fully into the room. She wore her hair in a simple ponytail, kind of like Meredith wore hers from time to time, but with a bit more of a polished look to it. "I got a call from—"

"Say no more," Mom said as she shuffled toward Amelia. "Give your mother a hug?"

They embraced, fingers grasping tightly at each other. Derek closed his eyes as his mother mumbled something soft and indiscernible at Amelia. Probably explaining why he looked so horrible. He let his mind drift.

Mom cleared her throat. "I'm going to clear out for a bit so you two can say goodbye. I think maybe I'll grab something from the coffee stand downstairs. Derek, sweetheart, I'll be back after lunch. Do you want me to bring you anything?"

Meredith. His bed. Home. Any combination of the three. "I'm fine," he said instead.

He heard Amelia's high-heeled shoes punch into the floor as she walked across it and then stopped several feet away. Silence. He felt her eyes peeling off layers of his skin. "I know I look ridiculous," he said. "Get it out of your system now, please." He waited for the laughter. For the comment about abominable snowmen.

She shifted, and she closed the distance between them. Her small body collapsed onto the sofa next to him, and she laid her head on his shoulder. "You don't look ridiculous, Derek. You look like you want somebody to come back and finish you off. Mom said you're in pain and that you're having a little trouble moving around.”

“I'm wrapped so tight I can't feel my arms. Of course I can't move.”

“You want me to get you out?” she said.

He swallowed. “No.”

She squeezed his shoulder and sat with him, silent for the longest time. He hadn't seen her one-on-one this entire time. Meredith had always been around before the rest of his family had gotten there, and then Amelia had been lost in the larger pack of his family, always hovering at the fringes, not saying much. Amelia tended to clam up in larger groups. This would have hit her closest to home, too, closer than his other sisters. Closer than his mother. Amy had seen what had happened to Dad. She'd been there when Derek had watched the last breath leave his father's chest. He remembered the way she'd screamed and wouldn't stop screaming.

“Amelia, are you okay?” he asked.

She bristled. “I'm fine. What makes you say that?”

He paused at her cool, even tone. He'd definitely hit a nerve, but... He realized he wasn't really sure what he was poking at. He hadn't seen or spoken to her in years. Even after he'd moved to Seattle, his other sisters had sent him emails. Voice mails. Snail mail. Endless bombardments of stuff that let him know he was not in any way free of them, no matter how many thousands of miles stretched between him and them. But he'd received nothing from her.

“You haven't called me at all,” he said, deciding to start with the easy route. Maybe the problem was something simple and had nothing to do with their dad. “Nobody else seems to want to leave me alone. They want to weigh in on the trailer, and the divorce, and Meredith, and the Post-it, and my job, and everything else that they think is wrong.”

She shrugged. “I've just been busy,” she said. “You haven't called me either. What's your excuse?”

“Do you need a laundry list from adulterous wife to shot in the heart? My life has been a mess.”

She snickered. “You make it sound like a Bon Jovi song.”

“You would know,” he groused. He knew all of Bon Jovi's songs by heart. At least the glam hairband tunes from the 80s and early 90s. Not because he liked Bon Jovi, not even close, but because the walls in their old house had been thinner than paper, and her room had been next to his on one side.

“Bon Jovi is way better than The Clash,” she said.

“At least I didn't play The Clash on my stereo all day and all night every day and every night.”

“Yeah,” she said. “You were too busy being bossy and important for silly things like that.” Her voice dropped low, and she imitated him as she said, “Amy, do your homework. Amy, clean your room.”

He sighed, feeling like he'd just thwacked a gong, and it rang in the space between them, discordant and humming with too much energy. He'd definitely hit a nerve.

“How's your fellowship going?” he ventured.
She tensed. “Why do you care?”

“All right,” he said. His own exhaustion had already blown his patience to smithereens. “Can you give me a list or something? Of the things I'm allowed to say to you without you wanting to jump down my throat? I'm a little too fuzzy right now to figure it out by myself.”

“I'm sorry. I'm sorry,” she said. The dam broke, and suddenly she was crying. Crying all over him. “I've just... I've had a really bad couple of weeks. And I didn't... I didn't want to come here.”

“Because of this?” he said. He would have gestured at his chest, but his hands were stuck by his hips.

She looked at him like he'd slapped her. She blinked and wiped at her face. She touched his shoulder, and then she touched the blankets that kept his back stabilized. Her lip quivered, and he watched a billion things march through her expression. She loved him. She hated him. She wished he wasn't hurting. She wanted him to hurt. She felt jealous and horrible for feeling jealous all at once. She was a mess.

“I don't know,” she stammered. “I just...”

Lie. She did know, and the bullet they'd dug out of him wasn't the reason. He saw the fib immediately, despite his tiredness, despite his dizziness, despite it all. He knew her lies from miles away. I swear, this is the last time, she'd slurred. I'm not using anymore, she'd sworn. I'm fine, Derek, leave me alone, she'd said. All lies.

She'd been touchy about her fellowship, too. He refocused in that direction.

“Would it help you if I wrote a recommendation?” he said, looking at the floor. The tiles seemed to shiver as his eyes lost focus.

She gasped. “How did you...” Her body deflated. “Right. What am I saying? What self-respecting neurosurgeon wouldn't have some sort of network going on with you. You're Dr. Shepherd. I'm sure Dr. Ginsburg told you how stupid I was.”

“She didn't talk to me at all,” he said.

“Great. So, you just guessed that I'm a failure? Just pulled it right out of your ass? That's perfect.”

“I know you, and I know when you're lying,” he said. He'd had to pick up after her for years. Of course he knew. “It has nothing to do with me thinking you're a failure by default, which I don't, by the way. I never did.”

“Nobody ever asked you to be my dad, Derek,” she said.

“There was nobody else to do it.”

She wiped her face and sniffed. “That still wasn't your cue.”

He sighed. He remembered her door. Slamming in his face. Time after time after time. He also remembered chasing the monsters out of her closet, being the one that picked her up from school, and making her peanut butter sandwiches without the crusts for lunch because they were her favorite. He remembered smiles. He also remembered the incongruity of those smiles with her face when she'd blitzed herself out of her mind, and how pale she'd been when the hospital's emergency staff had revived her.
He stared at her profile. She'd healed and become someone lovely. “Is there any way I can help?” he said.

“I'd like to think I can manage my neurosurgical career without the mighty Derek Shepherd swooping in to save me.”

He closed his eyes and rubbed his fingers along the bridge of his nose. Tension made his eye twitch. “Do you have any idea how long it's been since I've done anything noteworthy in the field?”

“It doesn't matter,” she said with a sigh. “You're immortal.”

“Well, I'm sorry, Amy,” he snapped. “I'm sorry that I'm good at my job, and that I started doing it first. What do you want me to do? Quit?”

Her shoulders slumped. “I don't know,” she said. Truth. “I don't... I'm sorry. I'm just... I lost somebody. Before I came here. He died. He was a good friend of Addison's, and he died. Under my scalpel.”

“Oh, Amy,” he said. “I'm sorry.”

“It never gets any easier. Does it?”

_They don't tell you when you become a doctor it's going to be like this. They don't tell you that you're gonna lose more patients than you save. Sixteen. I'm sick of the death._

He looked at his lap. “No,” he said. “No, it doesn't.”

“Well, I...” Her voice cracked, and she looked at her watch. “My plane.”

“All right,” he said.

She kissed his cheek and smiled as she stood. She pulled at his blankets. “Let me get your arms free at least so you're not trapped with nobody here to get you out.”

The support from the blankets gave way, and he sighed as some of the ache renewed. Not a lot. But enough to remind him he didn't want to get up. Or move. Or do anything. She piled the blankets by his hip and then grabbed his pillows one by one to fluff them before replacing them.

“Thank you,” he said, his voice a low murmur.

She smiled. “I charge by the hour, you know.”

When she turned to leave, he watched her, a nagging thought tugging at his brain. “Hey, Amy?”

“What?”

“When I first got started, I had to apply to twenty-six different hospitals before I found somebody who would take me,” he said.

Her mouth fell open. “You never told us that. You made it sound like everybody wanted you.”

Truthfully, his grades right out of medical school had been abysmal. His motorcycle crash and her overdose had obliterated his study habits and tanked his grades for his second and third year to somewhere in the realm of just barely passing, a place no hospital liked to see its prospective interns. The only reasons he'd finished with an acceptable cumulative GPA were the straight As he’d gotten in his first year and some very understanding professors.

“Gee, Amy, I wonder why.”

She blinked, and her gaze sobered. “Look. I... I know this must have been really scary. For you. I mean... With what we went through with Dad. If you ever want to talk about it...”

“I know who to call,” he assured her.

“Yeah,” she said. “Besides. I know you’re not perfect, now, so it’s not like it’ll ruin your image.”

“Cute,” he said. “Very cute.”

She walked back to the couch and hugged him again. “Love you, big brother.”

“I love you, too, Amy,” he murmured against her neck. He watched her go with a slightly bouncier step, and he felt better. Better now that he’d fixed something. Or at least sutured a gushing wound.

She stopped at the door. “Oh,” she said, snapping her fingers. “By the way.”

“Yeah?”

“Your trailer is stupid,” she said. “I love Addison, so on-the-record your divorce was lame, but off-the-record, you needed it, and I’m glad you’ve found some peace out here. Meredith seems very sweet. It’s more than a bit squicky that she’s younger than me, but I like her so I’ll deal with it. The Post-it is a bit off-the-wall, but it works for you, I guess. And I think your promotion doesn’t suit you at all. Go back to cutting, even if it means you’ll be showing me up.”

He smiled. “Good to know. Thanks.”

“Anytime,” she said, and she closed the door behind her.

For the first time in several hours, Derek was alone. He closed his eyes, and his body wilted. He leaned against the sofa arm and let his mind drift. The room spun around him in a slow, sickening waltz. For a minute, he thought he might doze again. For a minute. His awareness of the room began to slip away. His head fell forward. His muscles shut down and relaxed for sleep.

Somebody paged Dr. Weller over the intercom in the hallway. The words were distant, muffled, as though from the opposite end of a bad telephone connection, but they were loud enough to break into his respite. He snapped back into something half-awake. What. How long? He brushed his hands over his face. The clock on the wall came into focus. Ten fucking minutes. Ten.

The ache in his lower back returned like the precursor to a rain storm. Quiet. Rumbling. Foreboding. Black, angry clouds hung low over the horizon, ready to burst. He shifted, trying to ease the tension gnawing at his muscles, but try as he might, where before sitting up had stopped the twinging pains, lying flat seemed like it would be the only respite.

A breathy sob caught in his throat. He couldn't take much more of this. Nothing was comfortable for more than an hour or two at a time. Noises pinged his eardrums every time he closed his eyes. He couldn't sleep. He just wanted sleep.

He forced himself to his feet and shambled back to the bed, only to realize once he'd gotten there that all his pillows and the thermal blankets were strewn on the couch. He stared at the mattress, blank and stupid. He felt like somebody had stuffed his brain in a blender set on puree. His eyelids lowered, but he pushed them back up with sheer will. What? Pillows. Right.
He stared at the couch, at his big fluffy pillows lying on the seats. He blinked. Why did this feel like an impossible math problem?

Marcia came in with his pills, and when he turned to face the door, the room revolved around his face in slow motion. He let the carousel spin an extra time before he caught hold.

“Dr. Shepherd,” Marcia said. “I have your medication.” She glanced at the disheveled sheets on the bed and the blankets and pillows all over the couch. “Goodness, what have you been doing?” She set her things down on his tray table and bent to pick up his bedding.

“I'm sorry,” he said. “The couch was comfortable before, and now it's not.” His brain wasn't processing anything anymore. He shuffle-stepped toward the couch and bent to grab a pillow, moving slowly and exaggerated in the hopes that it wouldn't set something off inside of him.

Marcia frowned. “Dr. Shepherd, are you all right? You don't have to do that.”

“Tired,” he said.

“Hey,” Meredith said. She rolled over and faced him in the dark, eyes glittering. “Can't sleep?”

“I want to,” he said.

Her hands splayed against his naked ribs. Her body rustled against the sheets. “Let me help,” she said.

And then he was on the bed, lying flat, staring at the ceiling as Marcia resettled the nasal cannula. She tuck the thermal blanket under his armpits and took the empty cup away from the tray table. How had that happened? He blinked. Maybe he didn't care. He blinked again. The cloudy, spinning feeling renewed as the fresh dose of painkillers seeped into his bloodstream. His body shut down, and he slept. Finally.

The empty operating room echoed with his breathing. He stared at the instrument tray by his hands. He picked up a fifteen blade from the tray. The metal caught the sharp overhead lights and sparkled. He stared at the table. His ferryboat scrub cap sat in a careless heap by the headrest.

“Why did you bring me here?” he said.

Arms wrapped around him and rubbed his stomach. Meredith breathed against his ear. “Because it's your place. You need to sleep.”

He put the scalpel down and turned. “You don't understand.”

Her eyebrows raised. She pressed her palm flat against his chest. “What don't I understand?” she said. She looked him up and down, and her face melted into a luminous grin. “You look really good in your scrubs, you know.”

“He'll follow me here, Mere. I don't want him to follow me here. If he comes here, I won't have anything left.”

“It's okay,” she said. “You're safe.”

His veins boiled. Heat welled up inside him. With a roar, he shoved the instrument tray aside. Scalpels and other metal tools tinkled as they hit the ground, echoing in the empty, acoustic space.

“I'm not safe anywhere!” he said. His breaths hit the air in loud, exhausted chuffs. He kicked a spinning ten-blade away. It skittered toward the wall and stopped with a hollow plink. “I need to get out of here.”

He looked around, but there was no door.

“I told you,” Meredith said. Her long lashes swept low over her gray eyes. “You’re safe here.”

He took a step, lost. When she wrapped around him again, he collapsed. She took him to the ground, and they curled up against the base of the operating table. “I’m tired,” he said. “I’m so fucking tired.”

She pulled him into her arms. “Rest here for a while then.”

He breathed the scent of her skin, and then pushed his nose into her loose hair. The soft aroma of lavender swept over him, and he sighed. “I don’t have anywhere else to go.”

“I know, Derek,” she said. “It’s okay. We’ll fix it.”

He lay flat, relishing the black, fuzzy space behind his eyelids where the world flowed in and out. His brain squished and expanded and squished. He swallowed. He blinked. Once. Twice. The blurry room resolved.

Rain clouds had surrendered to hesitant, diluted sunshine, which fell through the window panes at a slant and covered him in a soft, soothing warmth. The clock had eaten four uninterrupted hours, and the first random thought that hit his consciousness was that he’d missed lunch by quite a bit, and he couldn’t keep his promise to Meredith.

A scribbled note on the back of an old receipt sat on his tray table. He reached for it, but his hand felt like a foreign country. He couldn’t convince his fingers to move without signing a million treaties. The paper crinkled in his awkward grasp, and he drew the paper to his face. Close. Inches. His eyes weren’t working very well either.

“Stopped by with Rachel after lunch, but you were out cold,” said the note in his mother's elegant script. He paused. His eyes hurt. “The girls and I decided to go shopping to give you some space. - Love Mom.”

He wiped his face with his hands and sighed. Fog and sleep slipped away from him with every breath. His muscles started to wake up and twinge. Even when he was barely drinking any fluids, the IV made sure he stayed hydrated. He had to fucking pee again.

He raised the bed and pushed the bed railing down, but he didn't get up. He leaned. His torso whined a little at the strain, but it didn't hurt too much. His fingers wrapped around the urinal, and he pulled it to him. He glanced at the door. Anybody could walk in. But...

He looked at the bathroom. No. He didn't want to move any more today. Not that much.

He pulled the urine under the blankets and closed his eyes, willing Marcia to not pick this moment to walk in. She didn't. He put the full urinal on his tray table. Somebody would take it. He tried not to think about it. Somebody cleaning up after him like that. He tried.

His back muscles throbbed, and he forced himself to stand and straighten up, to give them a break for a little while. He stretched as much as his body would allow. He didn't walk. He just stood. He held his IV pole for balance, but he forced himself not to hang onto it with his weight. His arm shook. His leg muscles quivered. He timed himself. He closed his eyes. Every time he felt like the ground would rush up and swallow him, he pushed his eyelids back open, absorbed what the minute hand on the clock told him, breathed, and re-balanced.

He made it to eleven minutes and thirty-two seconds before a tall man in a crisp, clean suit and duster knocked lightly and pushed the door open without waiting for a reply.

“Derek Shepherd?” said the stranger, but there was no uncertainty in his tone. Like he already knew the answer. Yes. The man had sharp brown eyes, no beard, and a buzz cut that screamed ex-military. He was built like Mark, but towered at least three inches taller.

Derek’s fingers clenched his IV pole, and his breathing hitched. “Why?”

The man reached into the pocket of his long duster. Derek's heart pounded when he saw the gun holster. His brain stumbled through a thousand panicked, scatter-shot thoughts. This was a hospital. A public place. Thousands of people worked here and walked the halls at all hours. A crowded, noisy nurse station stood thirty feet outside his door. Nobody would—Except someone had. And now he couldn't run and couldn't fight.

“I'm Detective Raymond Wolff with the Seattle PD,” said the man. He presented his big, shiny badge.

Panic crashed and broke. Derek's face heated as he watched the badge hover for a spread of seconds. A plainclothes police officer. A fucking police officer. Not Jack the Ripper or Gary Clark or anyone. Detective Wolff stepped forward, cautious, badge out, like he knew he was approaching a bomb, and he proffered his credentials for Derek to inspect, but Derek didn't move.

“I'm very sorry to disturb you,” the detective said as he stuffed his wallet back inside his coat pocket, “But I was wondering if this would be a good time to take your statement.”

Derek swallowed. “My statement?”

“About your injuries, and about what happened here,” said Detective Wolff. “I'm just trying to close out the case file on Mr. Clark. You, Dr. Grey, and Dr. Karev are some of the last few people I need to talk to.”

“Karev is in a coma,” Derek said.

Wolff smiled. “Actually, I'm told he woke up this morning.”

“Why do you need my statement?” Derek said, unable to pause on the good news. His heart banged in his ears, and he couldn't make his mind slow down. “I thought Mr. Clark was dead.”

_Son, my name is Detective Williams._

“He is dead, but we still have to fill out all the paperwork.” Detective Wolff shrugged and gave Derek an apologetic frown. “I know this is difficult for you. It's difficult for everyone involved.”

_I know this is very difficult, but I need you to ask you some questions._

“I have an appointment,” Derek said. “With one of my doctors.”

Detective Wolff nodded. “When would be a good time for me to check back?”

“I don't know,” Derek said. He moved toward the door. He had to move. He forced his body to move despite every fiber in his body telling him not to. Telling him that he'd already worn himself out beyond his limits for the day.
“Well, I'll be here for a little bit longer,” said Detective Wolff. “I have to stop by the nurse's station to review some visitor logs. If you get back before I'm gone, will you come see me?”

“I have to go,” Derek said.

He wrapped his fingers around the doorknob and pushed himself out into the hallway, dragging his IV pole along with him. He didn't have shoes or a robe, just dirty no-skid socks and his slept-in pajamas. He looked like an unkempt, horrific shadow of who he used to be. He knew it. The bright fluorescent lights in the hallway jabbed at his pupils and told him to go back inside his room. He didn't listen.

He felt the detective's eyes staring at his back. The hairs on Derek's neck stood on end. Spurred by something nonsensical and panicking, he walked like a healthy person instead of a cripple. His strides ate the hallway. The burst of adrenaline almost made him feel normal. Almost.

“Hey, Dr. Shepherd,” Dr. Nelson said with a bright smile as he walked past, a bundle of charts tucked under his elbow. “It's good to see you out and about.”

“Yeah,” Derek muttered. “Thanks.”

When Derek rounded the corner, he came to a nauseated, shaky stop, and he leaned against the wall. His chest ached and burned from his heavy, forced breathing, and his lower back wanted him to give into gravity and fall so it wouldn't have to hold him up anymore. Bugs crawled down his face and the back of his neck. He swiped a hand at the slow creep across his skin. His fingertips came back wet and salty. Sweat. He'd sweated like he'd been at the gym with Mark. Or having energetic sex with Meredith. But all he'd done was walk fifty feet at a normal pace.

A drop of sweat slithered down the small of his back, guided by the dip of his spine. He tried to catch his breath, except the hallway started to spin. He had no idea how he was going to get back to his room. None at all. He couldn't go back anyway. Detective Wolff would be there. Expecting Derek to talk about the things he'd spent all day trying to excise from his brain.

He let himself rest with his eyes closed, face against the wall as he gripped the railing that ran lengthwise down the hall at hip level. His skin absorbed the cool temperature of the white paint. A headache bloomed behind his eyebrows, throbbing with every heartbeat.

The barren, abandoned field stretched out over the bleak horizon. His trailer sat in the middle. Rusted and falling down in disrepair. “What are you doing?” he said. His boots crunched on the brittle grass.

Meredith slathered mortar across her trowel. Her tiny body shifted, and she slapped another brick into the short line at her feet. She'd dug herself a small ditch next to the rear tire. She panted. “I said we'd fix it. Didn't I?”

Wind whistled across the dead plain. The trailer creaked on its axles.

He glanced at the meager pile of bricks behind her. She had perhaps a dozen that she hadn't already used. “That's not enough bricks,” he said.

She shrugged. “We need to start somewhere. Don't we?”

“I want to go back to the other place, Mere.”

She sat back on her haunches and wiped her sweaty brow. She set her trowel down in the wet bucket of mortar and stood. “I know,” she said.
“He'll find me here.”

She wrapped her arms around his waist and buried herself in the folds of his coat. “That's why you need this wall,” she said. “Will you help me build it?”

She looked up at him, gray stare expectant. Demanding, even. He wanted to help her. He did. He wanted to make it better. He looked at the pile of bricks, her dirty trowel, and the small line she'd made for herself. For him. Roiling dread made him swallow.

“I don't know how,” he said, hopeless.

Derek blinked. Every muscle in his body strained with tension. The back of his throat felt thick and clogged with his tongue, and he swallowed. He flexed his fingers against the railing. This was ridiculous. All of this.

He left the safety of the wall and took a test step. Success. Another step. Success. He would be all right if he moved slowly, he decided. The atrium was only a few hallway lengths away. He could find a lumpy chair to sit in and hide with the old people playing checkers until Detective Wolff left.

He made a game of it. Counting how many steps he could take until he had to stop and rest his shaky limbs, until he had to calm his spinning head. The nausea rolled in and out of his body in waves. Sometimes, he felt fine. Other moments, he spent all his effort on not heaving.

He heard footsteps behind him. The soft squeaks of somebody's sneakers on the tiles slowed and then matched strides with him. He saw a wisp of black hair in the corner of his eye. He halted, and he turned. The room wavered, like someone had placed the world in front of him on the surface of a bowl of water, and then moved the bowl. She stood beside him, blue scrubs, turquoise undershirt, her hair tied back in a messy, curly ponytail.

“Cristina,” he said.

She swiped a loose lock of hair from her eyes. She flipped the page of one of her charts and stared, intent on whatever text she saw. She didn't look up. “McDreamy,” she said.

He bristled at the nickname. At least most people seemed to use it as a compliment. With her, the syllables were aural venom. He gritted his teeth. “What are you doing?”

“I'm reviewing charts,” she said. She looked at him. “What does it look like I'm doing?”

He forced himself to take a step instead of snap at her, venting frustration into his muscles and his desire to move them. She matched him, shambling stride to shambling stride. She stood close enough to make it clear they weren't walking separately. A foot, maybe. Sort of in his space, but not quite. Like she wanted to be able to reach out for him if she needed to do so. She flipped another page and didn't watch him, but she never fell behind or skipped ahead.

“Is Meredith—”

“Zonked out and drooling in your marital bed,” Cristina said. She looked up from her charts and glared. “On your side. In one of your dirty, smelly shirts. It's disgusting.”

“Oh,” he said. “Thank you. For—”

“No problem,” Cristina said. She stared at him. Her eyelids creased as she appraised him. “It took me three hours to get her snoring. We had to watch C-Span.”
He didn't know what to say to that. He kept moving instead. One foot after the other. She matched him, stepping with him in perfect tandem. He kept going, and she kept following, until he had to stop again. His body trembled, and he rested against the wall while she stood there, reading.

“Cristina,” he said. “I really don't need any help. I'm fine.”

Her charts snapped shut, and she finally looked at him. Really looked. He wanted to flinch under the accusatory weight of her glare. “Listen,” she said. “You're five days out from emergency heart surgery. Surgery I performed at gunpoint, all while Meredith was screaming on the floor and Owen was maybe dead. Then I had to shock you twice. I worked my ass off for you to be breathing right now. So, if I see you hobbling in the hallway, and I think you're going to fall on your ass, you can just deal with me being here, okay?” She didn't wait for him to reply. She fanned her charts and warded him away with them like a disgruntled peacock. He backed into the wall on reflex, cornered, but his movement had no thought to it, no conscious decision.

“I'm reading charts,” she said. “Walk already if that's your plan.”

He stared. His breaths fell from his lips in short, stuttering gasps. The air wavered, and Gary Clark stood between them, a ghost with a gun. He wrapped his arm around Derek's neck and pulled him close. The muzzle of the pistol shoved into Derek's temple, and he couldn't get away.

_You're not the man here._

“Please, don't,” Derek whispered.

Cristina frowned. “What now?” she said.

“At gunpoint?” he managed. “Shocked me?”

Her stony expression faltered. Panic. He thought he saw it. Like she knew she'd just accidentally taken the plunge off a high dive without any idea how to swim. She'd thought Meredith had told him. Her lips parted, but she swiped it away behind a calm, surgeon-in-a-box look. A look he knew Cristina had perfected.

“Mr. Clark came back,” she said.

He couldn't breathe. He'd been lying on a table, insides open to the world, and Gary Clark had almost killed him in his helpless oblivion, but it didn't matter anyway, because his heart had stopped by itself. When Meredith had kissed him one last time and said she loved him, and he hadn't been able to say it back, that may have been it. That might have really been the last time, and he wouldn't have even known.

“What...” he said, a lost verbal tic as he fell apart.

He would have died, naked on an operating table, a tube jammed down his throat, and his chest cracked apart like a broken book. He would have been a mess for the coroner to put back together. And then he'd have lain in a box for eternity. Rotting.

“We pulled your EKG lines to make him think you were dead,” Cristina said, her voice distant, like she stood across a gaping chasm instead of a foot away. “He left.”

“Meredith was there?” He pressed his forehead against the wall.

“Yes.”
“Did she...” He breathed. “Did she see you remove...”

I thought you were dead. And I was screaming and screaming and then... I lost... I'm so sorry.

“No. She thought you were really gone,” Cristina said. Her palm found his cheek and she patted him lightly, like she thought he might be in the process of fainting and was trying to pull him out of it. Was he? Fainting? Maybe. He lost track of his limbs, and the ground seemed very close to him.

“Hey,” she said. Pat, pat, shake. He blinked. “Listen to me. You're fine. This is some of my best work.”

“You had to use the paddles on me.”

“Yes.”

“After he left. My heart really stopped,” he said. “For no good reason. It just stopped.”

“Yes,” she said. “Well. V-fib. But it was barely anything. We got you back pretty quick.”

He nodded. “Okay,” he said, his voice thick and low as his mind shut down on him. Barely anything. Regardless of v-fib or a true flat line, how could his heart not beating be barely anything? He couldn't think about this. He blinked, and the blur sharpened into fat, salty drops that popped and soaked his eyelashes. He wiped his eyes with the back of his hand and sniffed, whisking the rebellious tears away from his face. The blur didn't return, but Gary Clark stood behind them, silent, accusing.

The atrium was only one more hallway length away. Derek could see the big bay windows and a dim pool of sunshine in the distance, could hear the faint blare of daytime television and the low tumble of voices, congregating. He could make it. He certainly couldn't turn around.

“What are you doing?” Cristina demanded.

“I'm walking,” he said. “Read your fucking charts.”

Willpower alone made his body move. He dug a well into his last reserves with a shovel and sweat and deep, guttural curses, and he walked. The atrium in the distance stayed in the distance, like he swam against the current. He wanted to stop, but he didn't. He could sit when he got to the atrium.

“Sit down,” Cristina said somewhere behind him.

Blood roared in his ears. “I need to get to the atrium.”

Something rumbled. A mass tapped the backs of his knees. Lightly, as though whatever pushed him knew he would break under too much pressure. He almost lost his footing anyway, and he stopped. Stopped and tried to capture the last vestiges of his equilibrium. He turned, panting, and found Cristina bearing down on him with a wheelchair. He blinked. When had she even left to get one? His thoughts scattered and swirled.

“Sit down,” she said.

“Sit down, Derek,” she said.

“I don't want to go back to my room.”

She crossed her arms. “Sit your ass down before I push you, McDreamy.”

He looked at the chair. Cristina hated him. Sitting down would be a humiliation. Hot, red, snarling blush crept over his face as he stared at the seat. Considering. Actually considering sitting. His body really wanted him to sit. He pulled a frustrated hand through his tangled, sweaty hair. His muscles trembled with strain.

“I said sit,” she snapped, like he was some sort of misbehaving dog.

He put a hand against the wheelchair’s arm in a slow stretch that made his body not mind the long reach so much. He squeezed the leather armrest, staring blankly at the seat. Something broke. Inside. He shuffled, shuffled, collapsed. The seat sagged under his weight. He leaned his head back and took gulping, upset breaths. The room fuzzed. He watched her take his IV bag from the pole that had supported him through his marathon, and she placed it on the hook above the wheelchair, consigning his fate to be whatever she made it.

She spun the chair and rolled him back the way he'd worked so hard to traverse.

“No,” he said, but the word was lost, halfhearted, and Cristina didn't respond.

White walls and floors and ceilings blurred as they zipped past. He watched another patient shuffling along by the railing in a stained green bathrobe and slippers. Cool air buffeted his skin. He shivered as the sweat evaporated off his skin, and they left the atrium far behind.

The world whipped right as she turned the left. He saw the nurses' station ahead. Detective Wolff leaned against the counter, talking in deep, soothing tones with a nurse as they stared at one of the computer monitors. The door to Derek's room advanced toward him, looming.

“No,” Derek said. “I need to get...” He breathed. Closed his eyes. “Please, no.”

“I'm not taking you back to your room,” she said. “Would you quit whining?”

True to her word, his room flew past. Detective Wolff didn't look up as Cristina pushed him by the nurses' station. He swallowed, nauseated with relief. Stress sloughed away. He closed his eyes and gave up. Gave up caring. His back hurt. His brain hurt. He couldn't keep track of things anymore. Too much effort. She could do what she wanted with him.

Rain spattered on the roof of his trailer. The inside cabin hovered in darkness. Bricks covered the windows halfway to their tops, blocking most of the gray light. Gloppy mortar collected in clumps between the bricks. An amateur job, but done nonetheless.

“She's not all bad, you know,” said Meredith. She slid against him like the crash of a wave on a breaker, naked and soft as she stared down at his body. Her fingers found his hair, and she stroked his temples as she kissed him. The sheets rustled.

“She's your friend, not mine,” he said. He traced the line of her cleavage with his fingers. “She hates me.”

Meredith smiled. “But she knows...” She kissed his lips. “I.” His Adam's apple. “Love.” The dip between his pectorals. She traced a wet line to his bellybutton. “You.” She found his erection, and he gasped when she kissed him there, too.

He arched back against the bed. The window seemed upside down that way, bricks on the ceiling. Anybody could get through. A shadow passed by, and the dark seemed darker. “What if the wall doesn't hold?” he said.

She stopped and stared, resting against his naked hip as she panted. Her hair fanned against the sheets, glittering and golden. “It's enough for now,” she said. “It has to be. You need to rest.”
He laughed. “This is resting?” he said, but she looked at him as though the situation were dire.

Her eyes seemed black in the dark. “Yes, Derek,” she said. She splayed her hands across his ribcage. He breathed as she licked low, lower, lowest. “This is resting.”

The wheelchair came to a stop in front of a large plate plexiglass window the size of his trailer. He stared through lowered eyelashes, not quite awake, not quite functioning. He blinked. Noise snapped into place, and he heard a chorus of discordant, wailing cries. His fingers clenched. His body hollowed out, and he froze in place. Maybe he did care what she did with him. She'd parked him in the maternity wing at the viewing window.

We really made a baby?

We really did.

“Why did you bring me here?” he said.

Cristina moved to stand beside him. She folded her arms and shrugged. “Before we resorted to C-Span, Meredith told me you're going to try again. I just wanted to show you what you have to look forward to.” She stared at the window as if the sight beyond the plexiglass caused her physical pain. Her eyebrows twitched. A line formed above her nose as she scowled. “Ignore the crying and the drool and the crap. The literal crap.”

He watched. Silent.

“You can have this. If you want it.” She gestured at the babies. “You can have this now because I managed to save your sorry, bony ass.”

He swallowed. “But—”

“Look,” she said. “You've convinced me, somehow, that you're not going to rip her heart out again on purpose. But you have to stop this...” She stared, gesturing haphazardly when she couldn't find the words. “Whatever this mental hangup is that you've got going on. If you break yourself, it's not just you you'll be breaking. She was beside herself when we took out your EKG lines. I've never seen her like that. She usually shuts down when she's upset. This time, she was hysterical. Like the hills are alive with the sound of music, except with screaming and sobbing and ugly bubbles of snot.”

“Why did you let her see?” he said.

“Because she does what she wants, and I had a gun pointed in my face.”

His lip quivered. He looked at the babies, at the wiggling little balls of energy with lungs the size of Texas. A nurse he didn't recognize waved at him from behind the window. She gestured. “Which one?” she mouthed.

Which one is yours, she meant.

He shook his head. The nurse shrugged and resumed fussing with a squalling boy in the back row.

“You didn't nearly die, Derek,” Cristina said. “You survived. And now you get to live what's left. Get it in your head.”

He pushed with his tired legs, and he groaned when they gave him practically nothing in return. He tried to help himself with his arms, too, but that only rewarded him with shooting pains. He hissed, adjusted, and wobbled to his feet. It took him several minutes to straighten his spine.

Cristina didn't help him. She stood beside the chair, silent. His IV line almost wasn't long enough. When he stepped to the window, she pushed the chair forward so he wouldn't catch himself, and then she settled against the wall beside him, her back to the screaming hoard of what she seemed to regard as simple DNA explosions, and not miracles. She stared into space.

He touched the glass. A baby girl lay in the bassinet closest to him in the front row. Unlike the rest of them, she didn't cry. She stared at the world with big, bright eyes, like she was still trying to figure out what the hell had happened to that spiffy, dark place she'd been enjoying for nine months. Spittle collected on her lips. Her tiny mouth formed a dumbstruck o, and she blew a bubble at him. She was little, and she had a fuzzy head and wrinkled, red skin.

Newborns were so tiny. Tiny and new and untouched by anything wrong in the world.

His eyes watered, and he blinked, but they kept watering this time, and wouldn't stop. A deep sound quivered in his throat, and he rested his forehead against the glass, staring. The little girl yawned.

Hi, baby, he imagined himself saying. It's Dad. Meredith would be there, panting, exhausted, but she would smile. He would be indebted to her forever for doing all that painful work. And they would have a little person. Part of her. Part of him. Theirs.

He'd given up with Addison. He'd been ready to surrender with Meredith, too, after the ferry crash, if it meant he could keep her with him and breathing. He would have been okay. After eleven years of Addison not being ready, eleven years of her telling him not yet, that she needed more time, he'd gotten used to the idea that the opportunity for fatherhood had slipped him by. He'd been like a frog stuck in a pot on a slow boil. A frog wouldn't jump out of the pot, not realizing its peril, until it was far too late.

He'd figured out the water was boiling on a bleak November morning, the year he'd seen his thirty-fifth birthday come and go. He'd entered a corner coffee shop to grab something hot and steaming for the frigid walk to work. A woman had been waiting in line at the register with a fussy, screaming baby, and she'd been so apologetic for all the noise. Exasperated. Tired. But apologetic.

He'd helped her when she'd spilled hot coffee on the baby's jumper. She'd been beside herself, babbling with worry. The baby had been fine, but he'd looked in the woman's distressed hazel eyes, and he'd known. He'd known that was a sort of look he'd never find on Addison's face. He'd seen Addison with hundreds of babies, and not once had she looked like that.

Since that moment, he'd refused to let himself hope. Even when it'd become clear that Addison wasn't his future anymore. Even when Meredith had stared at him, flustered as she caught him on the way out the door of Seattle Grace's waiting area to prepare the world's cheesiest proposal.

If you don't want babies, or you don't want babies with me and my crappy DNA, just say so.

He sighed.

She has your eyes, he'd tell her. His Meredith. Their baby. He'd want to collapse with the weight of how his life had just been changed, but he wouldn't be able to, because their daughter would be in his arms. Her tiny fingers would grasp at his thumb, barely able to wrap all the way around, and he'd smile and laugh through the blur.

He blinked, and his imaginary world slipped behind a wall of water. He rubbed his face, and his gut twisted. Cristina had gotten her wish to see him cry, but he couldn't even bring himself to be embarrassed. Just exhausted.

“I didn't think she'd ever really want one,” he said, his voice heavy. “I thought I'd always be waiting.”

Cristina rolled her eyes. “I imagine it's your fault.” She glanced at her watch. “Are you done freaking out now? I have other post-ops.”

He took one last look. His fingertips left smudges on the plexiglass. Maybe he would be here for real in a year, and when the nurse would ask him, which one, he would have an answer for her. He let the fantasy roll in his mind like a movie. And then he sat, emotionally and physically bankrupt.

“Thank you,” he said as she rolled him into the elevator. The doors trundled closed.

“If you tell people I stared at babies with you for thirty minutes, I will gut you, Meredith notwithstanding.”

“No, I mean thank you,” he said. “Thank you for saving my life.”

She looked away. “Yeah. Well.” She shrugged. “It was good practice.”

“Glad to help you advance your career,” he said.

“Just don't tell anybody about the babies.”

“Telling people about how you pushed me around in a wheelchair is not very high on my list of conversation topics.”

“Good,” she said.

The elevator dinged, and she pushed him into the hallway. He rested, letting her do the steering and the worrying. Well-wishers dotted the halls, nurses he knew, doctors he'd done consults for, people who relied on him for their livelihood because he wrote their personnel evaluations, even several patients who recognized him. He tried to at least say hello in return, but by the end of the ride, he could barely keep his eyes open.

“We're here,” Cristina said, and he snapped awake, surprised.

He mumbled something that could have been a word, but it clotted somewhere in his throat and came out gibberish. He tried to stand. Three feet to the bed. That was all. The distance seemed like an insurmountable canyon. Not thinking straight, he pushed against the armrests.

Agony split him open, and he grunted, thoroughly rebuked.

“Stop using your arms so much,” Cristina said. “No pushing. No pulling. Didn't the nurses explain anything to you?”

“I know how to treat a post-op heart patient, Dr. Yang,” he snapped.

“But do you know how to be one?”

No.

He breathed through the pain and willed his muscles to stop trembling, but they wouldn't. He tried to get his legs to cooperate, but they wouldn't. She left and returned with a new IV pole, and he was still trying to convince his body to join forces with his brain and let him out of the chair.

“I hate this,” he said.

“I know.” She moved his IV bag to the new pole.

“I knew you had an ulterior motive for all this,” he grumbled.

She didn't reply. She leaned her hip against the bed, crossed her arms, and watched him, eyebrow raised.

He took a breath. Another. A third. Then he pushed with his legs and feet. His body found vertical. His back shuddered with a painful, twisting spasm that turned vertical into a smashed letter s. He put his hand against his lower back over his hip and hobbled a step. He looked at the bed. He looked at the sofa. Both options seemed awful, but the bed was closer.

He grabbed the bed railing, lips parted as he panted with effort and strain. A small sound cut his throat. A moan. Pain. He couldn't stop it. He sat on the mattress, shoulders hunched. The room wound around his head in lackadaisical, lazy revolutions. He tried to lie down, but it sent fire licking down his spine.

A hand waved in front of his face. “Here,” Cristina said. “I'm upping your dosage. I already wrote it on your chart.” She held pills and a cup of water for him. When had? He blinked.

“Seriously?” he said with a gasp. “I'm already stoned out of my fucking mind.”

“No,” she said. “You were stoned out of your mind with the morphine. Right now, you're just being pathetic.”

He stared at her hand.

She sighed. “Look. Do you want to go home?”

“Yes,” he whispered.

“Well, you're not going to go home if you're not healing. If you're in pain, you're not sleeping. You need sleep to heal.” She jabbed the pills at him. “Prove to me that you're not an idiot.”

For a long, swirling moment, he could only glare.

He grabbed the Percocet and the glass, tipped his head back, and swallowed. The cold water settled in his stomach and spread. He finished the glass because it felt good against his throat. “Happy?” he said. He shoved the empty cup at her.

“Happy is relative,” she said.

She took the cup and glanced at her watch. His eyelids dipped. She didn't move, and he started to feel rushed. Rushed into being knocked out. Like he was messing up her busy schedule. What the hell?

“You're just going to stare?” he managed to slur. “I'm not a museum exhibit.”

If she replied, he lost it in the tumble.

His eyes closed without his permission. He didn't sleep. Not yet. But he felt her fixing his blankets. She reseated his nasal cannula. His muscles twitched once. The pain in his back became amorphous, and then diffuse, and then gone.

He made a soft noise. Relief. And then the roar behind his eyes swept him into oblivion.

“Welcome back,” Meredith said, and he smiled.
Chapter 6

The windshield wipers of the hulking Porsche Cayenne skimmed water off the windshield at a pace that made the whole car sway like it sat in the grips of an endless earthquake. Meredith pressed down on the brake, slowing the car's forward momentum to a snail's pace. The engine hummed.

The front left tire rolled over the bump. Meredith tensed as she felt the car rise. The car hit a pinnacle and dipped a centimeter, but then the front right tire hit the bump, too, and the car rose again. Both tires rolled back onto flat pavement with a thump that made the car jiggles. She clenched the steering wheel.

Speed bumps were, quite possibly, the worst thing the modern road could throw at a car's suspension, and whoever had designed the kiss-and-ride lane and the subsequent hourly parking lots at Seattle Grace had been a little bit too in love with them. Bumps rose out of the ground every fifteen to twenty feet, advertised by large yellow signs that said bump in screaming capital letters. A safety measure, no doubt, to prevent maniacs from speeding through the parking lot so close to the hospital entrance where lots of crippled people wandered. Except she wasn't a maniac, and she had her husband in the car with her. Speed bumps were like a big up yours to people in pain. Another twist of an already sharp knife.

Through some trial and error, she'd discovered that if she approached each bump at a diagonal and let each of the SUV's tires peak individually, the ride remained smooth. Well, smoother. Well, at least, not jarring to the point of making her want to vomit. By the time she'd rolled Derek's ridiculous car to a stop by the hospital entrance at the designated curb for quick pickups and drop-offs, she'd decided she'd gotten the hang of it.

Rear left. Rear right. Thump. Accelerator down until the next one.

She breathed and straightened out the vehicle. Next bump. Ten feet ahead. She tilted the wheel to the right and started the agonizing process all over again.

Water splashed against the windshield, blotting out the gray in a giant blur. The wipers slashed at the rain, but the precipitation came down so hard that they didn't make much of a dent. She saw the road and then nothing but splatter in even intervals the length of an eye blink, which gave the world a shuttered feeling, and made the car seem cave-like and claustrophobic.

“Mere, I think I could walk home faster than this,” Derek said.

“Sorry,” she said as they went into the next bump. Brake. Crawl the car up the bump. Thump. “Sorry, I just didn't want to—” Thump. “It doesn't hurt when I go over these?”

“It does a little,” he admitted. The words were stretched. Not quite slurred, but not quite put together, either. “I'll be fine as long as you don't stop on a dime at every light, sign, and stopped car. Really.”

She spared him a glance before returning her eyes to the road and the pouring buckets of rain.

He sat in the seat beside her, his right hand gripping the handle on the ceiling over the window loosely to keep himself stable. His wet, messy hair stuck out in all directions. Dark blotches covered his jeans where rain drops had soaked into the denim. His cross-trainers squeaked on the rubber floor mat as he shifted, and his ratty white t-shirt had become see-through in places from all the water, not that the threadbare rag needed much help in that regard.

She shivered, sure she didn't look much better. Her hair hung around her head in thick strings, and chilly water made her shirt stick to the small of her back. Her shoe soles slipped on the brake and the accelerator, making horrendous shrieks over every speed bump.

He'd waited for her under the awning, dozing in the wheelchair she'd used to liberate him, but he'd come alive as the familiar purr of the Cayenne's big engine had hit his eardrums. She'd bitten her lip as she'd watched him unfold and stand. He'd been slow and ungraceful and more than a bit uncoordinated as he'd left the wheelchair behind, but he'd managed, and she'd forced herself to sit still and not help. He'd walked into the rain, staring at the car like he had no sense of the universe other than his mode of escape from it.

Car. Car. Get to the car. Must get. To the car.

He'd opened the door, and then he'd tried to get into the vehicle. He'd tried. But the Cayenne, a typical SUV, sat high off the ground, and Derek, as much as he'd improved over the last week, had not healed enough for a solo climbing expedition. His face had crumpled with discomfort, and he'd made a small noise unidentifiable as pain or frustration or simple exertion. He hadn't been able to leverage himself into the seat, and so he'd stood there, dripping in the torrential rain. He'd given her a shaky, pleading smile that spoke more of embarrassment and desperation than of happiness or hope.

_I'd like to go home, now, please_, he'd said.

“I don't stop on dimes,” she said.

He stared out the window. “Yes, you do.”

“I don't stop on dimes, pennies, nickels, or any form of change!”

“You kind of stop on dimes, Meredith,” he said. “You drive like a narcoleptic. Start, stop. Start, stop.”

She eased them over the next speed bump despite his assurances. Thump. She couldn't bring herself to willfully inflict pain, no matter how much he tried to pass it off as negligible. “I do not,” she said as the land boat crested. Thump.

“Do, too.”

“Do not! Well, there was that one time with the kamikaze squirrel, but you can't possibly count that.”

“Do, too,” he said. “And I'm not counting squirrel avoidance maneuvers.”

“Derek, I do not!” she snapped.

A red smear of brake lights bloomed like a glowing flower in front of her, and she slammed her foot down on the brake pedal without thinking. “Crap!” she said. The tires screeched, and her body jerked against the seat belt, cutting her breaths short. In the corner of her eye, she saw Derek's left hand slam against the dashboard. He grunted, a deep, weary sound of pain that made her heart skitter.

A horn behind her blared. Her wet hair fell in a curtain around her face. Licking her lips, she tasted bile, and she couldn't get herself to move for several seconds. He struggled against his seat belt.
The belt carved a deep ravine into his shirt, and it took him several wincing pants to fix himself so that he rested against the seat and not the belt.

Nauseating guilt churned in her stomach. She reached across to help him, but he'd already done most of the work. Her fingertips brushed his shoulder. Through his soft shirt, he trembled. He leaned his head back against the seat cushion, breathing noisily, staring at the rainy world through half-closed eyelids.

“I'm so sorry,” she said, but the words croaked and quashed, and she wasn't sure she'd managed understandable syllables. Her heart thumped, and she couldn't stop herself from touching him. Touching his arm. His wet leg. Running her fingers through the hair over his ear. “Derek, I'm so sorry,” she said. Tears blurred her vision. “Are you okay?”

He didn't speak. The car behind them honked. She grabbed the cushion by his head and twisted around. “Go to hell!” she shrieked and flipped them off, and then she wilted. She'd yelled. Right in his ear. That probably didn't help either.

She turned forward again, panting. “Are you okay? Please, are you okay?” she said. They weren't even out of the parking lot, and she'd already nearly killed him. She wiped her face, clawing tears away, and then clutched the steering wheel. The leather squeaked and warped as she twisted her fingers. She hated this freaking car. She hated speed bumps, and rain, and stop signs, and people, and guns, and everything else. “I'm so sorry, Derek. I'm sorry.”

“I'm okay,” he said as he caught his breath, but he sounded odd. Sounded... bad.

“I'm sorry.”

He blinked. “You know, that was worth it,” he said. His syllables rattled in his chest and sounded more than a bit wheezy, but then he looked at her with a shit-eating grin. “That was worth the pain. The timing couldn't have been more perfect.” By the end of the sentence, he'd recovered his voice.

Her clenching grip against the steering wheel loosened, and her distress melted when she saw his smile. A glassy but bright haze clouded his eyes, and no suffering remained in the lines of his face. His skin crinkled at the corners of his eyes. His irises didn't sparkle like they usually did. In fact, they seemed black and opaque in the gray light, but he was drugged, and a bit not all there. The crinkle was enough. A real smile. A really real smile. She hadn't seen one of those in a while.

Her lip quivered, and she couldn't help but offer a sheepish grin in return. “My amazing husband is right. I stop on dimes. Happy?”

His eyelids dipped. “Hmm,” he rumbled, barely audible over the thunderous rainstorm. He wiped his face with his hands and sighed. His body relaxed. The crinkles disappeared, but his lips spread in a wide, close-mouthed, upward curve that spoke of quiet contentment.

“Do you want a sticker that says 'My name is Derek Shepherd, and I'm right'?”

“That's Chief Shepherd, to you,” he said.

She snorted. “Hah. Hah.”

He rolled his head against the seat cushion until his left ear met leather, and he stopped. His gaze caught her. The content grin on his face bled into something sloppy, and he winked. “I can think of other things I want more than a sticker.”

You know what says thank you like nothing else?
She stared at him, caught like a fly in the sticky trap of his stare. She leaned across the hand rest. Something sharp jabbed her ribs, but she didn't care. She forgot he wasn't well, and the last remnants of her earlier stress dissolved.

“Like this?” she whispered, and she kissed him.

Until her lips brushed his, her convenient amnesia lingered. Strands of his wet hair spilled over his forehead and tickled her skin as she pressed against him. He tasted like Crest toothpaste, and the familiar scent of his aftershave wafted against the back of her throat. Perfect. But memory drifted back into place when he didn't respond like he used to, with a moan or with his fingers tearing through her hair. They touched, but it felt chaste, more friendly than anything else.

His libido had taken a massive hit with his injuries. He joked now and then, but he didn't seem to want much more than that, and she imagined his bravado concerning sex was more about keeping some level of normalcy between them than anything else.

Kissing had become something for touch. Something for closeness. Something to remind them they were alive and together and breathing and someday — but not now — okay.

She sighed against his skin and pressed her forehead into his. The space between them rustled as she stroked his cheek. He would be all right. Eventually. She would be thrilled the day he let her know he wanted something more. Until then, though, she wouldn't be disappointed, and she wouldn't push him. Even if he wasn't really interested, they both needed him to keep joking. And they both needed her to forget from time to time.

“Here's to being right,” he said, his voice soft and sated, as she pulled away.

The car behind them honked again, and she jerked, startled out of the space where only he and she existed. She glanced in the rear view mirror and saw through the sheets of rain that the car behind her had a stack of about fifteen pairs of headlights bearing down behind it. Fifteen cars containing angry, antsy people who probably wanted to be home just as much as Derek did. Just as much as she did.

She pressed the accelerator. “Is this why you always drive?” she said as she pulled up to a four-way stop, the final hurdle before parking lot became open road. Cars churned through the intersection at a glacial pace. She slowed as the car in front of her halted, careful to let the Cayenne slide to a stop instead of screech to one this time. “Because I'm horrible at it, and you didn't want to hurt my feelings or something? Like with the snoring thing?”

“You said you didn't like it,” he said.

“What?”

“Driving. You said you didn't like driving.”

When on earth?

“Derek, that was...” She stretched her memory and arrived at a dark night, only a week or two into their tryst. They'd gone out to eat. She'd been in a wretched mood, but he hadn't known the area at all yet, and so she'd offered to drive. They hadn't made their reservation on time because they'd gotten stuck in traffic. Instead of waiting an hour for a table, they'd gone into some dive next door and had burnt food and crappy service. “That was years ago. The whole freeway was gridlocked. And I was having a really cramp-y, bloat-y period that sucked.”

She'd barely known him then, and he'd barely known her. Their one lousy date. Well, not lousy.
Just not great. The outing had been one of the few times in their history where she'd managed to feel like crap around him without him noticing at least on some level.

She navigated through the intersection and out onto the street. Water sprayed behind the Cayenne in a fan as she accelerated. Exhilaration tugged at her heart. Free of the parking lot. Two blocks, and then the freeway. Five exits, and then home. He tapped his fingers by the door handle in a steady, nervous thrum, and he shifted in his seat.

“You said you didn't like driving, so I drive,” he said as she blew through a probably-should-have-stopped yellow light that shifted red just as her rear tires entered the intersection.

“So, you don't think I'm a bad driver then?” she said. She took the exit onto the highway, forcing herself not to push the SUV too fast. The car lurched anyway, and her body swayed against the door. Stupid, top-heavy SUVs.

“What's a little whiplash between lovers?”

“You're totally avoiding the question,” she said.

“What question?”

She gritted her teeth. “Am I a bad driver, or aren't I?” she said. She cut onto the highway, narrowly avoiding the little Geo chugging along in the middle lane as she pulled in front and then swung into the fast lane. The Geo honked, and she snarled.

He chuckled, the sound of it soft and light and buried by the pounding rain. The laugh ended in a wince and a grunt, and he thumped his head against the window, but he smiled anyway.

“What?” she said.

“Nothing, Mere,” he said. “Nothing at all.”

“Sure,” she said.

The hum of the engine, the roar of the tires as they tore over the concrete pavement, and the heavy downpour drowned everything else out. Five exits left. Four exits. Three. Signs blurred past. Almost home. Almost.

Red. She blinked.

A solid wall of fuzzy red brake lights carpeted the space in front of her, and she slowed the car to a crawl, and then a full stop. Rain pounded on the roof. Horns honked. Nobody moved.

“Damn it,” she said as she pulled up the parking brake and let her feet off the pedals. “Damn it, what is this crap?”

He sighed. “Must be an accident up ahead, I guess.”

“Or just too many idiots,” she said, glaring at the pile of unmoving cars. “This is Seattle. Did you know we made the top ten list for the most congested cities in the country? I mean, when you think of traffic, do you think Seattle? No, you think Los Angeles. And New York. How did Seattle make that list? It's—”

Movement caught the corner of her eye. She turned. Derek's eyes had closed, and he'd leaned back against the headrest at an angle that couldn't have been comfortable. His crooked nose jutted toward the ceiling, and his Adam's apple poked against the skin of his throat. No longer supported by conscious thought, his mouth surrendered to gravity and fell open, revealing a pearly line of teeth. Deep, even breaths made his chest rise and fall. With his windpipe at such a weird angle, his breaths morphed over the moments into grating, heavy snores.

“Sorry,” she whispered, and she ceased her babble.

With no immediate prospect of home, adrenaline must have abandoned him.

She turned off the engine, and the windshield wipers halted at the end of their last swipe. No longer held at bay, rain streamed down over the windshield, and the outside world blotted away behind the flowing curtain. The car stopped shaking, and even with the torrential rain, the cabin would have seemed quiet in the absence of the constant swish, swish, swish, were it not for the raucous noises emanating from Derek.

Derek's right hand rested at the door handle, fingers curled around the lever. His left hand splayed against his thigh. His knees spread in a casual slouch, and he seemed... His lip twitched. He sucked in a whooping breath. The snores creaked to a halt. He breathed twice, soft and almost silent. Then the snoring resumed as his eyes began to pace under his eyelids. He dreamed. But she saw no sign of stress or nightmare.

He seemed at peace, if not peaceful.

Ever since Cristina had fixed the dosages on his pain relievers, he'd been different. Quiet. He'd slept a lot. A whole lot. He'd rarely stayed awake for more than an hour at a time. And when he'd been awake, he'd seemed disoriented and clumsy and reticent. He had a lot of trouble following conversations, and so he tended to space and let the world slide by without his input until he drifted off again. He'd said goodbye to his sisters yesterday, and it seemed like he hadn't quite understood what was going on when so many people crashed into his room for a quick round of noisy hugs all at once. Though, admittedly, she'd been a bit flummoxed by the whole thing, too, particularly when they'd pulled her into the fray and made a giant Meredith and sister-in-law sandwich.

She touched Derek's face, watching the supple trail left by her thumb on his skin. “Mmm,” he purred and leaned against her palm. “More bricks.” His head followed her touch, and his chin tipped into his shoulder, facing her. The snoring stopped, and thick, even breathing resumed. His dark eyelashes fluttered against his cheeks as his eyes moved underneath them.

Rain splashed against the windows and slammed into the roof. Cars didn't move. She thought about turning the radio on to find some traffic information, but she didn't want to wake him, and so she contented herself with ignorance and watched Derek sleep.

The nurse had dragged him awake at 6AM like always, but after he'd finished coughing, the morning had continued like an endurance test. He hadn't gone back to sleep to recover. Instead, he'd forced himself out of bed. She'd sat on the toilet seat, just in case, while he'd showered unassisted for the first time. He'd wrangled his clothes into submission by himself, too, and he'd shaved and brushed his teeth and flossed.

He hadn't needed her once, though the entire grooming operation had taken, perhaps, an hour and a half with frequent breaks. She'd read a book while he did things, well, pretended to read a book and mostly just read the same sentence over and over to try and keep her eyes somewhere not staring at him. She'd made a very big point of not cheering him on or smiling at him or making him feel self-conscious about his difficulties while he stumbled through things that used to be easy. She'd aimed for behaving like oblivious company and not like supervision. He seemed to appreciate it, both her vicinity and, at the same time, her distance.
He moved like a turtle. His muscles had kidnapped his flexibility and wouldn't let him do a lot of things. Anything more strenuous than a slow walk for about ten minutes left him gasping for breath. Even small interruptions in his stability knocked him off balance, and many of the movements that gave him his fluid, graceful, athletic appearance when he was well caused him harrowing pain.

But even then, even with all that sickness still piled up, he'd gotten so much better.

A siren wailed in the distance, and she turned. The leather seat made a squirming sound as her thigh shifted. Red lights flashed, a sparkling mess of color in the gray and the endless rain, but she couldn't see anything else through the sheets of water. The ambulance barreled down the left shoulder of the highway, and when it passed, the Cayenne swayed on its wheels. The pitch of the siren dropped as it left them behind.

Derek snuffled, and he flinched. His fingers clenched, and he made a thick sound of surprise deep in his throat. His eyelids stopped at half-mast, and he panted.

“Just a siren,” she whispered and stroked his hair. “Go back to sleep.”

His eyelids drifted shut, and his muscles relaxed. His panting slowed and stretched and became deep breaths.

Her watch beeped, and he flopped into half-awake again with a twitch that ran from his fingers to his toes. “Mmm,” he moaned at the second interruption.

She glanced at her watch. 10AM. She'd set the alarm to remind herself to give him his pills. They were supposed to be at home right now. She was supposed to be helping him slide into his own bed to rest in his own space. Except they were stuck in a car in the middle of a freeway, not moving, and not able to move for who knew how long.

She'd stuffed all his pill bottles into a plastic grocery store bag in the back seat. She twisted against her seat. She saw the bag behind her seat back in the dark pit formed by the floor and the rear seat. She saw it, but her arm didn't reach. She unclasped her seat belt and contorted until her belly ached and her shoulder sockets screamed. Her fingers brushed the plastic. She squiggled her hand, but she couldn't get a grip. She panted and tried one more time before she gave up.

“Crap,” she said. Not that it would matter if she could reach his pills, she realized. They were big pills. He couldn't take them dry. “Don't move,” she said to him.

He stared blankly. “What?”

“I'm getting out of the car. I'll be right back. Don't move, okay?”

He didn't quite seem to get it, but he didn't move, either. He stared, dark, glazed eyes half open, his hand dangling limply over gearshift and the parking break. She took a breath, preparing to get soaked again, and then plunged into the cold, wet curtain.

She opened the rear driver side door and dove for the bag. As soon as her fingers found the plastic handles, she yanked, and she used the momentum to dash for the trunk where Derek usually kept water for emergencies. The trunk popped open as she fiddled with the key chain. She wiped rain from her face and blinked. An unopened twenty-four pack of spring water sat behind a first aid kit, an emergency toolbox, and some other junk. Good. She jammed her nails into the unmarred plastic shrink wrap and tore it away. Her wet fingers slipped, but she managed to grab hold of the neck of a water bottle, and she pulled it free from the others. She tossed the bottle in the bag with his pills, slammed the trunk shut, and dashed back to the front driver side door. Her feet slurred and splorked in big puddles of water, sending spray everywhere. Shocking cold seeped into her socks and shoes.

She lunged back into the car and shut the door behind her as she panted. Water dripped into her eyes. Her hair plastered to her head. She pulled the water bottle from the bag, unscrewed the cap, and stuck it in the cup holder. Then she sorted his pill bottles. Antibiotics. Oxycontin. 1 every 12 hours as needed. Percocet. 1-2 every 4 hours as needed. A veritable drugstore sat in her lap. She grabbed the Percocet bottle, pushed down the cap and turned. She removed a pill — he only took one unless it got bad — and held it out for him. A tiny puddle of white liquid spread across her palm as the pill mixed with rain.

“Here,” she said, jabbing it at him. “It's 10AM. I'm really sorry, Derek. I thought we'd be at home by now.”

At first she thought he might not be sentient enough to take it, but then he shifted. He grabbed the pill and stared.

“Water in the cup holder,” she clarified when he didn't move.

“Oh,” he said.

He took the water bottle, popped the pill into his mouth, and tipped his head back to swallow. He gurgled and swallowed and swallowed again, taking a few more sips. Water dripped out of the sides of his mouth. He took a hearty gulp, and then he put the bottle back in the cup holder. He didn't wipe his chin or the corners of his mouth. He dripped instead.

“Thank you,” he said, and over the course of several minutes, he shut down.

Like a lumbering blob, he shifted into the window and pasted his cheek against the glass. His hands hung limply and at odd angles. His eyelids dropped but didn't close, and he stared at the sheet of water on the glass as his breaths lengthened. Fog chased the glass from his lips, renewing with every exhale.

Car doors thumped, and somebody ran past the window, a blur. “What the fuck is going on? I need to get home,” yelled a distant, feminine voice. Meredith sighed. Good question.

Now that he was awake, she jammed the key in the ignition and gave it a quarter turn to let the radio have some power. She fiddled with the radio dial, but the tuner found nothing for her but hissing static and a mess of half-syllables and stutters of silence between. The half-syllables and stutters may have been words, sentences, and sounds with meaning, but the rain stripped the jabbering mess of it and made it nonsense in a cloud of bad reception. Great. She turned the car all the way off again.

She sighed. Derek communed with the window, silent, unmoving, as though he were fascinated with the way reality hazed beyond the curtain of water. The only sign she could identify that he was actually conscious was that he blinked. Every once in a while.

She reached over his leg and grabbed her purse from the floor by his feet. The strap had gotten wrapped around his ankle, and he sat, passive, while she untangled it. She stuffed the plastic bag with his pills into the depths with her wallet, and then put the purse back on the floor by the ball of his left ankle. He didn't budge or comment.

“Derek,” she said, but he didn't move. “Derek?”
It wasn't until she touched his shoulder that she roused him from his space out session. His deltoid muscle tensed at the unexpected contact, which drove home how out to lunch he was, that she could touch him and he didn't recognize her by the feel of her hand, or even before her skin had brushed against him. He'd always seemed to have sort of a sixth sense about her. But, no, this time, it took him several seconds of firm touch before he relaxed.

“Hmm?” He sat up and rubbed his eyes.

“Where do you go when you space out like that?”

He frowned. “I'm sorry,” he said. “This stuff just makes me feel so out of it.” He blinked like his eyelids had been drenched in tar, and he was trying to overcome it. Then he placed his palms against his face and breathed once, twice, again. When he looked up, he seemed a little more in touch with reality, but still not wide awake. Dazed almost. He had a struck stupid quality to his gaze and a frail air to his presence.

“You don't have to apologize,” she said. “I don't expect you to be the world's greatest conversationalist right now.”

“I feel like an amnesiac guppy or something.”

“Yeah, well, I think I like amnesiac guppy way more than growly bear.”

He smiled, but combined with the distant look in his gaze, his mirth seemed vague and indistinct. “Oh?” he said. “Are you planning to take advantage?”

“Well, you have established that taking advantage is my modus operandi or whatever.”

“Oh, yes.”

He blinked, and she watched his awareness waver. His gaze became glassy and then focused as he found her again in the mire. Odd. It felt so odd, seeing him like this. Derek Shepherd was supposed to be with it. Put together. Cocky. He hadn't been any of those in days.

“Seriously, where do you go?” she said.

“Where do I go when?”

“When you space out,” she said. “Where do you go?”

He shrugged. “Dunno,” he said, the word drawling. “Some place with you, usually.”

“Like what?”

He turned to the window, and she lost him to the glitter of the water. The rain slowed, and the sheet of water became identifiable, meandering streams. He stared. His breaths spaced, and he leaned back against the seat, eyes hooded. He'd been awake for hours that morning, and crashing into sleep earlier seemed to have devastated his capacity for human interaction.

She touched his shoulder. Her palm stuck to his wet sleeve, and when she tried to stroke him, her hand skipped. She slid her hand underneath instead, and rested against warm skin. “Hey,” she said, and she waited until he looked at her. Six seconds. Maybe seven. “Why don't you push the seat back and sleep? It looks like we're going to be here for eternity.”

“I feel better sitting.”
“Is your back still bothering you?”

“A little.”

Leaning against the window the way he was gave her space to slip her hand behind his shoulder blades. She rubbed him, frowning when she felt tense muscles and a peppering of knots under his skin. Sitting in this cramped car for hours wouldn't help him at all.

“Like really a little, or are you being stubborn again?” she said. “You can take another Percocet.”

He sighed. “Really a little, Meredith.”

His body swayed with her touch. She pushed into a knot with her knuckles. He grabbed for the door and made a noise that made her think of pain, but he didn't tell her to stop. He leaned, and she reached lower. Tense muscle fibers rippled under his skin. She chased the curve of his spine to his waistband.

Two more sets of discordant sirens chased down the shoulder as a mini-caravan of ambulances thundered past. Derek flinched at the noise, and his breath caught as the Cayenne swayed in their buffeting wakes.

“Jeez, I wonder what's going on,” she said. The rain had slowed a little, but she still couldn't see more than a few feet. She splayed her hands against him and pushed with all five fingers at once, eliciting a long, low rumble that vibrated against her palm. His muscles relaxed.

“Mmm. No pagers. Can't be that bad,” he said.

She stared at him, but he seemed oblivious. Glazed. Somewhere between half-awake and dreaming, somehow, with his eyes open. She'd taken the two weeks of uncategorized leave the HR department had offered everyone involved in the shootings, and he'd filed for short term disability. Her, the hospital would maybe bother, but him?

They knew full well he wouldn't be performing surgeries, whether it was an emergency or not, for at least another month, maybe two. Maybe more, depending on how fast he recovered once he got home. Derek was healthy, but he wasn't the fountain of youth, either, and it could take some time for him to feel normal again. She had no idea how he paced his recoveries because he'd never had one before. He'd never even been sick. Not even a freaking cold.

“Derek, they're not going to page us today, even if it is bad.”

“Oh,” he said. He blinked. “Right.” He swallowed, stared at the window, and added a softer, whispered, “Right.”

“You really are out of it, aren't you?”

“Really am,” he said. He leaned back, pausing for her to remove her hand before he squashed her, and settled against the seat. He turned to face her. “It's making this waiting a little easier, at least.”

“How?”

“If I stop paying careful attention for more than a nanosecond, I'm off in space somewhere. It feels like my brain is gushing behind my eyeballs.”

“But it doesn't hurt, right? Cristina fixed your pain?”
“Mostly.”

She raised an eyebrow. “Only mostly?”

He stared. “Mostly what?”

“Mostly, it doesn't hurt?”

He shrugged. “Nothing's going to get it all, Meredith, not unless you knock me out. Which this is very nearly doing. I'm okay right now.”

She sighed. She knew that. She did. Nothing short of unconsciousness would take everything away. Nothing. Persistent pain sucked that way. But that knowledge didn't help; it just made her hurt more.

She wanted him to be okay. The idea that he wasn't okay, that he still had discomfort, even after a week, even doped to the point of stupidity, bothered her. She wanted to take it away for him, and there was nothing she could do about it whatsoever. She'd never felt so freaking helpless in her life. Not even after her liver surgery when he'd had to carry her to the bathroom because some mornings it had hurt too much to walk.

She twisted her hands against the steering wheel and stared. The wall of brake lights had long since disappeared as more and more people gave up on ever moving off the freeway and turned their cars off. She'd been an idiot. The universe had proven itself to hate her on more than one occasion, and he'd gotten sucked along for the vengeful ride because of his vicinity to her.

“I'm really sorry, Derek,” she said. “I should have thought to check traffic reports before we left. I'm sorry we're stuck in this stupid car. I know you want to go home.”

She wanted to go home.

He shifted. “Mmm. S'ok, Mere,” he slurred, her internal ranting having been just long enough to let him drift again, apparently. “Just relieved to be out of there.”

“I know,” she said. “But now you're stuck in a car. I nearly killed you in the parking lot, and now you're stuck. It's all my fault.”

He leaned across the parking brake and the hand rest. His body shifted, stuttering as he found his balance. He breathed. Close to her ear. Hot air tickled her skin. And then he touched her, stroked her neck. “S'my fault. I drove this car to work last week. I think. Or...” His words drifted into silence, and he nosed her cheek. Clumsy, but so warm and alive and there. She refused to laugh at his nonsensical reasoning or his coordination, though both were atrocious. He had good intentions.

She turned and found his eyes, dull and opaque, inches from hers. A lazy smile spread across his face, and he scrunched his crow's feet. “I put this shirt on, y'know. I'm better.”

She laughed, unable to stop herself from petting the soft fabric along his clavicle. The thin material had dried, and it rustled against her skin. No design spread across the front. Grease stains and other black streaks marred its age-worn surface. He wore it from time to time when he did housework or stuff with the lawn or things with their cars. She'd watched him change his own oil one day, and he'd come out from underneath the car, covered in new smears.

Why don't you just pay somebody at Jiffy Lube to do that or whatever?

He'd wiped his hands on a grease towel and smiled. Well, this is a great excuse to take a shower, you know.

I'm not dirty, she'd said.

He'd touched his dirty index finger to her nose, leaving a dark smudge. How about now?

He'd waggled his eyebrows at her, she'd laughed, and then he'd chased her into the bathroom as she shrieked and giggled.

She had no idea what had possessed him to pick that shirt to wear, of all the shirts she'd packed for him. Actually, she had no idea what had possessed her to pack it, either. It must have gotten stuck with his normal daily wear t-shirts in the laundry somehow. But he was, indeed, correct. He'd put on his shirt by himself, and that sort of made the rest of the stuff swirling in her head seem a little less bad.

She grabbed a tent of the fabric and pulled him close, mashing her lips against his.

“I'm really glad you're feeling a little better,” she said against his skin. “I'm so glad. Even if we're stuck in a car when we could be at home, and it's my fault.”

He blinked. The sky burst, and a torrent of new rain splattered against the window over what had slackened momentarily into drizzle. The wall of noise evened into a steady pounding. He breathed against her body, soft and searching. “How are you mine?” he said.

“Well, you asked pretty nicely, I thought,” she whispered in his ear.

I'm not going to get down on one knee. I'm not going to ask a question. I love you, Meredith Grey, and I want to spend the rest of my life with you.

“Didn't ask,” he said.

“Told me your intentions in an irresistible way,” she amended.

He sighed. “I proposed in the elevator.”

“Yeah.”

“I forgot we were going to have sex there. I fell asleep.”

She stroked his face. He'd been dressed and ready to go, and she'd wheeled him into the elevator to go home, expecting him, for some reason, despite his stupor, to make a dirty comment about wheelchair sex, but he hadn't. His face had fallen forward. He'd trusted her to take him home, and he'd slept, recuperating resources for the final surge of his escape. She'd reached over his shoulder and rubbed him, and then guided him into the fresh, wet air to freedom.

“It's okay,” she said. “I'll take you up on your rain check offer later.”

“What rain check offer?”

“Something you said a while ago. Don't worry about it.”

His eyelids dipped. “Okay,” he said. He smiled again, and then he let himself drop back against the seat with a sigh. The leather squeaked. He sat, hands resting on his knees, his body spent and relaxed and his brain not worrying about things he couldn't remember, at least, not worrying that she could tell.
She sighed when she realized this was the most he'd talked to her in days. Liberated from his prison, experiencing true privacy with her for the first time in over a week, he seemed a bit more inclined to fight through his impairments and speak. She rubbed his thigh, wondering if it was an embarrassment thing. Like maybe he didn't mind as much being a bit out of sorts with her, but he hated looking foolish in front other people, particularly coworkers. Or maybe he felt better, and that was the bottom line. When Derek felt yucky, he didn't talk. He bottled things up inside until he burst. He'd never been sick before, but he did have his darker moods, full of grief, guilt, anger, or depression, and she knew at least that much about him. Yucky meant silent.

A smile tugged at her lips as she watched him stare blankly at the windshield. “You know,” she said. “This is prime real estate for silly discussions.”

“Like what?”

“First experience?” he said. He looked at her with amorphous glee. “You've had more than one?”

“Well, yes, but I'm not stoned,” she said. “You're the one who's supposed to babble. Not me.”

He snorted. “All the drugs in the world couldn't make me babble as much as you. You're the Queen of Babbonia. Your subjects worship your skill.”

“Hah. Hah,” she said. “I don't know, you're getting pretty chatty. If you want another sticker, you're going to have to work a bit harder to prove yourself.”

But I like to talk with you, said his gaze, and she melted, only to laugh when he drew his index finger and thumb across his lips in the clumsy pantomime of pulling a zipper. He snickered, but his resolution didn't last more than twenty seconds.

“Mark got us thrown in the drunk tank once,” he said out of the blue.

“What? You? Seriously?”

She tried to imagine Derek crammed into a cell with snoring bikers, nonsensical bar patrons, and a clot of noisy, vomiting Manhattan residents and vagabonds. She couldn't do it. The Derek in her brain remained sober, unfairly accused, and broody in the corner as he tried to ignore the stench and the ribbing.

“Yes,” said Derek. “He pissed on the side of a building in Times Square.”

“And what does that have to do with you, exactly?”

He blinked. “What, you don't think I'd pee on a building?”

“You seriously did that?”

“Well, no,” he said. “But I was somewhere around .16 BAC when they caught Mark. I might have mouthed off a bit.”

“A bit?” she prodded.

He nodded. “A bit, yeah.”
Now, that? That, she could see. She snorted, thinking of all the colorful curses that would have streamed from his mouth. He had no reason to love law enforcement. None. And if he'd been drunk to the point of dysphoria... Yeah.

She pushed his shoulder. “Well, what did you say? Come on, you never tell me about this stuff. I want to know the pre-Seattle Derek Shepherd.”

“I don't really remember,” he said. “You'd have to ask Mark.”

“But you said Mark was drunk.”

He stared. “Did I?”

Laughter burbled up from her chest, unstoppable, and she leaned into him as tears erupted. She gasped. “So, what you mean to say is that you landed you and Mark in the drunk tank.”

“Well, he started it,” Derek said. “Public urination and all.”

She laid her head against his shoulder. She hated cars. The position was about as comfortable as sitting on a bed of spikes. Well, maybe not that bad. But she couldn't bring herself to care. He'd been bed-ridden and sleepy and not talkative and hurt for days. The crushing normality of sitting in the car with him, resting on his shoulder, chatting about stupid inanities, made her forget about her twisty, spine-killing position. She flopped against him and stared, looking up at the line of his jaw. Rain thundered against the window beyond.

“When was this, anyway?” she said.

A noise stuttered in his throat. He looked at her. Something churned behind the haze in his stare, like he realized then that he'd stepped into a trap that could have been avoided if he'd been thinking straight. He blinked, and the worry clouding his gaze dispersed as he made a decision. He sighed. “After my bachelor party,” he confessed. “Addison was pissed that she had to bail us both out so that we could make it on time to the rehearsal dinner.”

She grinned lazily, running her index finger in circles against the flat of his stomach over his shirt. “Hmm,” she purred. “And were there strippers at this bachelor party?”

“Maybe one or two.” Blush crept across his skin.

“Derek Shepherd, did you get a lap dance?”

Red swept down his throat and turned his ears a bright shade of pink. “Maybe one or two.”

“Wow,” she said. “You were positively naughty in your twenties.”

“Only a little.”

“I don't know.” she said. “A drunk tank adventure and a lap dance right before your wedding says maybe more than a little.”

She stroked his arm and breathed the warm scent of his threadbare shirt. Addison had been with him for eleven years. If she let herself get jealous when he brought her up, that made for more than one fourth of his life he couldn't talk about, and she didn't want that. She let herself laugh about it, instead.

Derek hadn’t had a bachelor party before their wedding. Not before the one they’d given to Izzie at the last minute, and not before the day they'd planned to go to City Hall and ended up writing vows on a blue Post-it note instead. He hadn't gotten drunk. He hadn't needed one last night of freedom with trashy strippers and tassels. Actually, his story sort of complimented the hell out of her.

“I still think you have me beat by a mile in the naughty youth category,” he said.

“I probably do, but, like I said.” She kissed his arm. “I'm not stoned.”

He turned. “Don't I get at least one story?”

“If you can remember to ask me in five minutes, sure.”

“So mean,” he said, frowning. “I'm vulnerable and amnesiac. You're taking advantage.”

“I know,” she said. “Which is why I'd rather tell you later.”

He shook his head. “I don't get it.”

“When you'll actually remember the bulk of the conversation, I'll tell you,” she said. “You know. Just to make it fair.”

“Oh.” He blinked and sighed. “Well, I guess that's okay. Do you have a pen?”

“In my purse in the small zipper pouch at the bottom with my tampons,” she said. “Why?” She stared at the windshield. The rain abated into drizzle and stayed drizzle, finally, and in the distance, she could just make out flares and flashing lights. A solid block of several hundred cars sat between her and a giant roadblock. People crawled back and forth like ants.

Having been given permission, he pulled her purse by the strap into his lap and rummaged through it, a perplexed look plastered on his face, as if drugs made it hard for him to fathom how she fit so much crap in there. He attacked the problem like a surgeon. He moved items to the side in a delicate manner, trying to gain visibility. Suction, she could imagine him saying. Except he'd lost his fine motor control, his focus, and just about everything else that made him a surgeon. The operation took a while. He leaned forward, putting his face closer to the mess. Something crinkled.

“Got it,” he said after eons, and he withdrew a green Crayola marker from her purse with a grin of triumph. The grin faded as he got a solid look at the item he'd liberated from her tampon stash. Seconds passed. “This isn't a pen. Did I miss a pen?” He frowned.

“No,” she said. “That's what I have.” She couldn't remember how that had gotten in there. She'd maybe stolen it from Pedes to fill out a chart after her ballpoint pen had wandered off. Desperate times, after all, and it was Pedes. They'd think marker charts were cute. Right? Maybe?

He uncapped the marker and wrote in slipshod print on the back of his hand. “I'm not letting you cheat me out of a story because my short term memory is paste,” he explained while she watched, eyebrows creeping up toward her forehead.

“Derek, would I do that?”

“Yes.”

She crossed her arms and stuck her lip out in a pout. “No faith. You have no faith in me whatsoever.”
“Plenty of faith, but you don't tell stories without tequila or torture,” he said. He returned the marker to her purse. “I'm not passing up this opportunity.”

“Not so much tequila anymore,” she said.

He paused and stared, head cocked. “S'true,” he agreed with a nod, and he blossomed into a sloppy grin. “Whole 'n healed or whatever.”

“You make me sound so articulate, Derek, thank you.”

His eyelids dipped, and he shifted to face her. His shoulder pressed into the seat, and his knee came up. He watched her, silent, hazy gaze unblinking. For a long moment, he said nothing, and she thought she'd lost him to another commune with space, but then he sighed. He touched her face as though it were new to him. She sighed and relaxed as he pushed away a tangled lock of her hair. His warm palm made the air whisper as he stroked her skin.

“You're pretty,” he said, and the bald truth of it struck her dumb. He had no inhibitions. What he said, he meant.

She blinked.

His eyes searched her face. “You know you're my best friend, right?”

“Mark is your best friend,” she said.

“Now, who's got no faith?”

“But Mark—”

“Slept with my wife,” he said. “He's my brother. He's my friend. But he's not a best anything. Not anymore, and never again.”

“Derek...”

“I know you and Cristina have your person thing,” he said. “I'm not fishing. I'm not. I'm just saying.”

“Everywhere. All the time. Saying things,” she murmured.

“Yeah. I do that.” He wiped his hands over his face, blinking. He loosed a growling, deep breath. “I'm sorry. I'm really... really stoned.”

Her heart sank. Not fishing. Sorry. He thought she was upset with him. She pulled his hands away from his face and replaced them with her own. “I love you,” she said.

He relaxed.

“Cristina is my person,” she said.

“I know. I said that, I thought.”

“You did,” she assured him, but his confusion seemed to deepen. She struggled to explain. “It's just... Cristina is my person. You're... You're like a piece of me. I can't call you my best friend or my person. Derek, losing you would be like losing a limb, or...”

He nodded. “She's your person. I'm your arm. Got it.” And then he laughed.
She hit him. Not hard. “Well, soul mate sounds even worse,” she said. “Like I threw up in a blender with Shakespeare and karma.”

“That's a disturbing picture when you're on drugs.”

She growled. “You get what I mean, though, right? You get that you're not competing for me, right? There's no competition. There's none. You win. I think I would die if I didn't have you anymore, and that sounds pathetic and melodramatic, but...”

Her frustration died in an explosive whorl of grief. She blinked, and the world morphed into a glassy impressionist painting as she cried. “I had a few hours where I really thought I might have wasted everything. Where I thought that you wouldn't be there in the mornings to make me coffee, or kiss me good morning with your awful morning breath, or tell me I'm more important to you than I've ever been to anyone. I thought that I'd be alone again. And I couldn't breathe. I couldn't breathe, thinking about that. You're it for me. You're so it. Please, you get it, right? You always get it. You have to get it, Derek. Please.”

He stared. “I get it,” he said. “I've been there, too.”

And that said it all. Her lip quivered, and she leaned into his space. “I'm sorry for that,” she said, and she kissed him. His lips, his chin, his throat. “I'm sorry for being insensitive. And for sometimes not being what you need. I'm sorry for everything.”

She traced a line down his neck and placed her palms against his chest, splayed and soft. Resting, not pushing or grabbing. She felt the bandage covering his incision, and she kissed that, too, through his shirt.

He curled around her like a coat, and his hands chased her crying away. “You're what I need, now,” he said. His voice rumbled against her body, soft and low.

“I really do love you,” she said.

“I love you, too.”

They embraced over the parking brake, and in the crawl of moments, everything that had twisted up inside her body unfurled. Stress sloughed away like dead layers of skin. “We're going to traumatize our kid, someday,” she said.

“Oh?” he said.

“Yeah. We seem to have a penchant for nearly dying and raunchy sex. One or the other will send him to therapy before he's five.”

“Him?”

“Or her,” she said. She hugged him, and he laughed. She pulled back and looked at him. “What?”

“Dreaming up new business cards, that's all.”

“For what?”

“Derek C. Shepherd, MD,” he said. “Rock star neurosurgeon, arm, Shakesma in a blender, pending father, and amazing husband.”

She laughed. “You forgot egotistical ass.”
“Well, yes,” he said. His eyelids drooped. “But only sometimes.”

He leaned back against the seat and closed his eyes. She touched his face and ran a palm through his hair. “Only sometimes,” she agreed.

“Mmm,” he groaned. And then his breathing spaced. He fell asleep the way a light turned off from on. With a blink and sudden darkness. She'd worn him out again.

She rubbed his thigh and watched the traffic ahead, which didn't move. The drizzle picked up into a light, steady splatter against the windshield. She sighed and let her mind space as she stared through half-lidded eyes. Maybe Derek was on to something. Spacing. The water dribbled down the windshield. She watched the way it crawled. Nothing happened. It wasn't interesting.

She took a sip of the water she'd brought for him from the trunk and then took another, careful not to take too much. Having to pee on top of all of this would just suck. Her muscles ached. She wanted to stretch, but her clothing and hair had almost dried again, and if she felt bad, Derek must feel worse. She didn't move. She flexed her muscles one by one, starting at her calves and working up to her arms. Isometrics.

She counted sheep and got to somewhere in the thousands. She even tried the radio again, but not a single station came through the mess. This sucked. This really. Really. Sucked.

She closed her eyes and leaned back against the seat. She imagined honking would wake her up if traffic started to move. Irresponsible, yes, but this was just stupid. Waiting here for hours. The black of her eyelids turned red, and she blinked, squinting. The driver in front of her had turned on his car.

She brushed her face with her hands and shifted, trying to see down the road into the gray. An undulating sea of brake lights blinking on and off greeted her through the misty rain. “Oh, thank god, we're moving,” she said, and she turned the key in the ignition. The engine rumbled to life. Derek didn't stir.

The police apparently had decided that it would be a swell thing to collapse three lanes of traffic into a detour on the right shoulder. She merged with the other honking cars, impatience making her head hurt. She tapped the steering wheel with her nails.

Eventually, she passed the wreckage. A single Hyundai rested in two gnarled pieces, one half of it upside down in the left lane, one half of it right side up in the right. A scorched, jack-knifed semi bisected the road through the middle lane. Firemen crawled through the metal and the mess. Lights flashed, blue and red and strobing. Beyond that, a crunched up line of six or seven passenger vehicles, an accordioned pickup truck, broken glass, and a mangled bicycle littered the lanes like a tornado had busted through or something. She bit her lip as a team of paramedics loaded an occupied stretcher into a waiting ambulance.

She glanced back at the destruction, and her lip quivered. There was no way everybody had walked away from that. No way in hell. Somebody had lost her Derek today, or perhaps simply died with him in an eye blink of screaming metal and heat.

Without thinking, she reached for him, and she pulled his hand into her lap. He didn't wake, but the warmth radiating from his skin left her no doubt that his heart still beat and would continue to do so. She inched the car forward and left the tragedy behind.

When she pulled the Cayenne into the driveway, she sighed. “We're home,” she said. She touched his shoulder and squeezed. “Time to wake up. Just for a minute.”
He flinched awake, and a tremor ran through his body. “Huh?”

“Derek, we’re home,” she said, trying to break his mental fog into pieces.

He pulled the door handle like a reflex more than anything else. The distant sound of rain made a crescendo as the door yawned open, but he sat there, blinking. Water plinked and skittered through the gap between the door and the car.

“We’re home,” she said again.

He squinted at her. The way his nose crinkled made him seem vaguely rabbit-like, but she didn’t laugh. “What?” he managed. His breaths rasped.

“Home, Derek,” she said. “We’re home.”

“Oh,” he said. He looked around with a bit more awareness. “Oh,” he said again. He fumbled with his seat belt. The latch clicked as it released, and the belt hit him in the chin before it rolled behind his ear into the space behind the door frame.

She reached over his knee to grab her purse, but he stopped her. “I’ll get it,” he said, his voice thick with sleep.

She tried to guesstimate how heavy her bag was. He wasn't supposed to be picking up anything that weighed more than five pounds. But... Five pounds? Hardly more than a stack of thick dinner plates or a heavy book. Even if the purse weighed closer to eight pounds, since, really, it was more of a tote, she couldn't see the harm, just this once. Carrying her bag would make him feel a bit more like he was contributing.

“Oh,” he said. He turned and slid out of the car into the rain. He didn't have the same difficulties as he'd had getting into the car, but after sitting down for hours, he had balance issues trying to stand. His shoes churned gravel. He pinwheeled, and as he twisted to grab the handle and right himself, she heard him grunt. Pain. He turned back to the car and leaned against it, eyes screwed shut. He let the water drench him and didn't move.

She grabbed his duffel bag from the back seat and came around to his side of the car. She put her hand on his shoulder. Her purse lay forgotten in the front seat. “Are you doing okay, Derek?”

“I'm okay,” he said, but he didn't sound okay. His voice wobbled, like he wasn't sure. She couldn't pinpoint why or what might not be okay, since he didn't look like he was still in pain from his landing, but there was a definite lack of okay. He took a deep breath and swallowed, and then he left the safety of the car, hands spread from his hips in a clear indication that his center of balance had been disturbed. Dizzy, maybe? He'd gotten better about that, but... His feet splurched in the muddy grass and left indentations behind. A cool breeze blew. It smelled earthy and full of ozone.

She grabbed her purse, slung it over her free shoulder, and shut the car door behind her. She put her hand on his shoulder. Her purse lay forgotten in the front seat. “Are you doing okay, Derek?”

“I'm okay,” he said, but he didn't sound okay. His voice wobbled, like he wasn't sure. She couldn't pinpoint why or what might not be okay, since he didn't look like he was still in pain from his landing, but there was a definite lack of okay. He took a deep breath and swallowed, and then he left the safety of the car, hands spread from his hips in a clear indication that his center of balance had been disturbed. Dizzy, maybe? He'd gotten better about that, but... His feet splurched in the muddy grass and left indentations behind. A cool breeze blew. It smelled earthy and full of ozone.

She grabbed her purse, slung it over her free shoulder, and shut the car door behind her. She clicked the lock button on the key chain, and the car chirped. He wasn't moving well. She caught up to him in about three strides and wrapped her arm around his waist. He didn't comment, but her presence seemed to help ground him. He stopped spreading his hands to make a tripod with his body. His left hand gripped her shoulder, and his right arm relaxed by his hip.

“Watch the step,” she said as they approached the door.

He managed, panting, and rested against the door frame while she fumbled for her key. The familiar brass slid into the lock, she turned it, and pushed open the door. He followed her into the house. She dropped her duffel bag and her purse on the floor and turned, watching him as his hands chased up the side of the door. He turned the deadbolt and checked the latch, two things she'd never seen him do before. Her house tended to be Grand Central Station for interns and other young residents. Or, at least, it used to be.

He turned and stood in the dark foyer, dripping on the carpet. He seemed pale. Pale and too thin and disturbed. His body swayed, and he stared at nothing. Rain pattered on the roof and gave the air a percussive quality.

She bit her lip. This wasn't quite how she'd imagined it would go, though, when she thought about it, she wasn't sure what she'd imagined either. The trip from the hospital had been enough to wear him out. She didn't think he was going to skip up the steps with a smile and say goodnight.

“Do you want to go to bed?” she said. He didn't answer, and he didn't give any indication that he'd heard her. She touched his arm. “Derek?”

He blinked. “What?”

“Do you want to go to bed?”

She peered at the stairway, at the long incline and the railing. He hadn't done steps before.
Everything she knew about home recovery from heart surgery suggested that for at least a few weeks, stair trips be limited to coming down in the morning and going up at night, because more than that would be too physically trying for someone who had just had his chest cut open and his heart jockeyed with by human hands. She turned and tried to gauge his reaction to the prospect of having to climb all that, but he didn't even glance that way. His face remained expressionless, maybe a little lost.

“Derek?”

“Not yet,” he said. “I'll just sit.”

For a minute, it seemed like he didn't know which way to go. He looked down the hallway toward the kitchen, but then he veered left, his eyes blank. She followed him to the couch and watched, concerned, as he collapsed. He didn't seem to care that he was soaked. Bits of wet, torn grass littered the soles of his shoes. Water discolored the legs of his jeans about four inches up from the hemline of the legs, and wet, dark splatters covered the rest of them. His shirt stuck to his skin, and she could see his bandages through the front of it.

and rubbed his thigh. “Earth to Derek,” she said. “Hey.”

His body shuddered. “I'm sorry,” he said. He squeezed his eyes shut like he was trying to get rid of a bad sight. She followed the direction of his stare, but nothing remarkable sat in the line of his gaze. A bookshelf. The wall. “I'm sorry,” he said again. “I feel like I'm wading through molasses.”

“It's fine,” she said. “Do you want a glass of water? You could lie down here if you're tired.”

“I just need a minute,” he said. “That was a long car ride.”

“I'm really sorry about that.”

He shrugged. “It wasn't all bad. You still owe me a story.”
“I don't know,” she said. “You did cheat, after all.”

He gazed at her, eyes dark and clueless. “I cheated?”

The marker had smeared a bit in the rain, leaving streaks of green on his pale skin, but the words were mostly legible. Meredith owes a story. Simple and to the point. She touched his hand. He followed her attention and flinched when he saw his marred skin. “When did...”

She laughed. She couldn't help it. “Oh, that's classic, Derek,” she said. “You remembered about the story, but forgot about the prompt you wrote on your hand so you wouldn't forget it?”

He'd been pretty self-deprecating about the memory thing earlier, but her snicker died when she saw how well he was taking it now. And by well, she meant horribly. A deep sound of worry rumbled in his chest. He wobbled to his feet and took a step, but the impulse halted, and he stared like he didn't know where to go.

“What is it?” she said.

“Your purse. I left it...” He glanced vaguely at the dining room. “I left it somewhere.”

“I got it,” she assured him. “I put it by the door.” She rose to her feet and pulled at his hand. “It's fine. It's really fine, Derek.”

He collapsed back onto the sofa and sighed. His eyes seemed shimmery. Wet. Like he wanted to cry but wasn't letting himself. She rubbed his back, and he blinked.

She didn't know what to do. She'd expected to have him home in fifteen minutes. She'd expected to help him up to bed, where he'd sleep, and that would be the day for him. He'd sleep, and she'd do stuff downstairs, and then the day would wane. She'd go upstairs to join him, and she'd sleep, too. Next to him and in his space for the first time in over a week.

She'd planned to stay with him through the weekend to make sure he could handle taking care of himself in the longer term. That had been the only reason Dr. Altman had been willing to let him go, because of her. If he'd had no one, Seattle Grace would have kept him closer to eleven or twelve days. Maybe more. Derek had improved, but he still wasn't well.

She'd expected most of the three days to involve him sleeping. Nothing was going like she'd imagined, and she felt lost again. But he was the one who'd gotten shot. She could do this. She could be the supportive partner. In the face of that, she had to be. Anything less would be freaking pathetic.

“There's a bright side to this, you know,” she said, at a loss for anything else.

He snorted. His eyes creased as discomfort wound through him, but the pain didn't linger. His gaze evened out, and he stared at her. “There's a bright side to being a helpless guppy?”

“Mmm-hmm,” she said. She shifted to her knees, pressed against his thigh, leaned, and kissed him. She loitered by his lips and spoke against his skin. “It means I have to keep doing this to make sure you remember.” She kissed him again. “Really? I can think of worse fates.” Again. “I'm an excellent kisser.”

Bingo. His tension seemed to drain, which made hers drain as well. He tasted her and ran loose fingers through her tangled hair. His grip was clumsy, and he didn't make it more than an inch before he got stuck in the snarl. Her hair pulled a little, but she didn't care. He looked at her, a hopeful sort of light in his eyes as he pulled his hands loose and settled for petting her instead.
“Does it mean you're going to tell me a story, too?” he said.

“You're just not going to let that go, are you?”

“I'm wounded and vulnerable,” he said. “I figure it's my only shot.” She almost resisted, but then he added a soft, rumble-y, “Please?”

He didn't play fair.

“All right,” she said. She threw herself against the back of the couch with a huff and crossed her arms. “All right, fine. What's your preference? Worst drunk dial, loss of virginity, or police encounter?”

He put his back against the arm of the sofa and turned to her with a hazy look of glee on his face. He pondered his choices. “Oh, definitely first run in with the law.”

“First one?” she said. “Or something subsequent?”

“Well, I did show you mine, discounting speeding tickets,” he said.

She grinned. “I got caught shoplifting.”

“Mrs. Shepherd, do you mean to tell me you used to be a klepto?”

“I swiped some hair dye.”

“Oh?” He peered at her. “What color?”

“Fuscia.”

He must have been expecting platinum, or red, or... something normal. His mouth curled in a surprised grin, and he laughed. “Why on earth did you want pink hair?”

She shrugged. “Just tips, actually. Seemed like a good thing to do at the time. I figured my mother would hate it or whatever.”

“A rebellious klepto then?”

“Better than a narcoleptic,” she said, though she regretted saying it. He didn't seem to remember that, either, and he stared blankly at the reference.

The hole in his memory either didn't bother him, though, or lost traction under the weight of his next thought. He made a low sound in his throat. His stare peeled layers of her clothes away, and she couldn't help but giggle. Whatever thought he had, it was a very, very bad one. “So,” he said, and he waited, expectant as he let the low, rich hum of the word fade into silence.

“So, what?”

“Did you dye the carpet and the drapes?”

“I did not dye down there!” she said. “I was like twelve, Derek.”

He grinned. “Uh huh.”

“I didn't!”
“Then I think you owe me another confession,” he decided.

“What?” she said. “Why?”

“Mine was ten times better,” he said.

“You got what you asked for.”

“But I was misled!”

“How? I even let you pick what story! You can't make me take responsibility for your crappy choices. And you can't play the stoned card, either. I wanted to wait, and I said so.”

“I figured you made it past middle school before you became an outlaw,” he said.

She glared, but it didn't feel very strong, not when her lungs quivered, and she struggled not to burst out laughing.

“Well, if you wanted the good ones from the time of my majority or whatever, you should have either been more specific, or thought to ask me after the liver transplant when I was more stoned than you are now,” she said. So there.

The look on his face became dangerous. He grinned, his lips a sly, sarcastic slant. “How do you know I didn't?” he said in a low, rich tone that slid down her spine like a solid stroke of his hand. Her innards thrummed, and she shifted, restless, as her breaths kicked into higher gear. No, she had to tell herself. No sex.

“No way,” she said, trying not to pant with all the launch messages her body was sending her. How could he do that without even touching her? Without even trying? She shook her head. “No, I would remember.”

He cocked his head to the side. “Would you?”

“You're evil,” she said. “You're an evil bastard, Derek.”

“Wounded evil bastard,” he said. “Let's not forget wounded.”

“Whatever.” She huffed. Her body trembled with the stress of no follow through. “So, what did I say?”

He shifted, inching closer. The cushions bowed to his weight. He rested his chin on his hand, his elbow against the back of the couch, and he stared. “Why don't you tell me another story, and we'll compare notes?” he said.

Touch me, he'd said on many nights with the same shivering, purring tone.

She grabbed a cushion with her fingers, lobbed it so hard it made her arm hurt, and whacked him in the face with it. Sexual tension released from her muscles like something had popped loose. “Ass!” she said, laughing.

The painkillers had stripped him of any sort of reflexes. He didn't even try to catch the pillow. His face swept to the right with the blow. He spluttered. His hair stuck up, wet and stiff and scattered by the whiplash. And then he stared. He didn't respond.

The bottom dropped out from her stomach, and relief twisted into something else. “Crap,” she said, pawing forward. She touched his face. “Did I hurt you? I'm sorry.” It's not like he had any recourse, assuming she hadn't nearly killed him again. Not being able to push, pull, or lift most certainly applied to hulking sofa cushions.

He blinked. “No,” he said, drawing out the syllable into something long and slow. “I'm not hurt.” And then he grabbed her thigh and pulled her to him with a grunt. No pulling, her brain screamed. Way, way more than five pounds! Bad! But then his hands slipped under her shirt, he squiggled his fingertips against her skin, and she forgot everything.

She shrieked and lost her breath as her muscles twitched all at once under the assault. “Stop!” she said, choking on laughter. “Derek, stop,” she croaked.

Through a blur of tears, she saw him kneeling over her, teeth bared in a sexy, triumphant grimace, but then she lost it as she arched back into the couch and laughed, and laughed, and laughed. “Bad girl,” he said somewhere in the haze.

She flipped onto her stomach, clawing at the cushions, but her desperate retreat only meant he shifted his attention to her back. A spasm wracked her body, and in her delirium, she prayed she wouldn't kick him. He worked her shoes away as she squirmed, and then he tickled the soles of her feet. Her left leg jerked wildly, and she struck him in the arm without meaning to.

He barked with laughter. “You're very flexible!”

When he let her go, she fell off the couch and landed on the floor with a breathless thump. She moaned, laughing, and inhaled the musty scent of the rug before rolling onto her back and staring at the hazy ceiling. She saw stars. Her vision wavered with the black dots of hyperventilation, but the seconds passed, and her breathing slowed. She wiped her face with her hands, spreading tears across her cheek in a salt slick that chilled her as it evaporated.

“That's what you get for belting me with a pillow when I'm vulnerable and wounded,” he said, staring down at her over the edge of the couch as he panted.

“You're evil incarnate,” she said, her voice hoarse. She coughed. “Got it.”

He grinned at her, but it faded. The force of his will and the thrum of adrenaline in his veins had been a powerful, heady, wonderful thing, but they abandoned him, sprinters overwhelmed in an arduous marathon. She watched it happen. The feverish excitement bled out of his face as he stumbled to her knees and crawled back to him, thumping her kneecaps and feet on the hard floor. Pain wavered on his face as his breaths hammered in his chest. He blinked, and he couldn't quite seem to catch his breath. The clock ticked away the moments as she settled next to him.

He grunted as she hugged him.

Sometimes, it shocked her how fragile he was, now, how easily his body broke under stress. She stroked his damp shirt, frowning when she noticed beads of perspiration along his temples, and wet stains that couldn't be rain because they'd collected underneath his armpits.

“Do you want to lie down, now?” she said.

“No,” he said. “I don't want to.”

She bit her lip. Want. A key word. Soon to be supplanted by need. He struggled to keep his eyes open.
His skin shivered under her palms as she rubbed his arm. With a groan, she forced herself to leave him for a moment. She padded to the hall closet. She pulled a thick winter afghan loose from the pile of musty blankets, even though winter had long since passed, and she returned. She wrapped them inside of it, and he sighed against her shoulder. She snuggled closer.

“I'm sorry,” he said.

“Don't be, Derek. Please, don't.”

His eyelids drooped as he lost the battle. His expression went slack, and he watched her through his eyelashes, breathing in the darkness, but he said nothing. His body felt heavy against her shoulder. Heavier. Dead weight. Rain plinked against the windowpanes. She kissed his forehead.

“It's okay,” she assured him.

He pulled the blanket closer and collapsed in a fluid motion, from sitting to sort of a fetal curl on the seat of the couch. She slipped loose from the afghan and, without word, she helped him lay himself flat on his back. She pulled off his wet, dirty shoes and his saturated, cold socks and threw them to the floor under the coffee table.

Minutes passed. And then his eyes closed at last as exhaustion pulled him under without his consent. She rested with her back against the couch, taking a moment to compose herself. The cushion and his soft belly cradled her head, and she looked to the side, up the line of his arm to the underside of his chin. He breathed, even and steady, but she could still detect shivers as the sweat evaporated from his skin.

Biting her lip, she went back to the closet for another blanket, and she put that on top of the afghan. Though she was reluctant to leave him there, wet and maybe-cold in damp clothes, he'd hit some sort of wall, and she doubted rousing him would be any healthier than letting him shiver for a while, and perhaps even worse. She left him sleeping in the living room, resisting the urge to do nothing but watch him.

She took his duffel bag upstairs and unpacked it for him. She hung his shirts back on the rack in the closet, and folded his pajama pants and put them in his drawer with his socks. She dumped all the dirty clothes into the hamper, and left the duffel in the bathroom in case he needed some of his toiletries or something, though she doubted it, since most of them were dupes, and he already had a full set here.

She stripped the bed next, yanking away the soiled, old sheets and mattress pad, and she replaced them. She tried to get it looking nice, but, she sort of sucked at housework. She folded the bedspread under the pillows. It hung off the sides of the bed, lop-sided. She thought about stacking the pillow shams back on the bed, but it seemed like a lot of effort, considering they would both be sleeping there in a few hours anyway.

She gathered up the sheets and the full hamper and waddled down the stairs with them. The answering machine beeped as she stumbled through the kitchen, dropping socks and underwear and other things in her wake. The room smelled like something rotten, and she gagged, almost losing her grip on the hamper, too. Dirty dishes sat in the sink, mold spreading across old food like fuzzy carpeting. Little flying bugs hovered in the air above the trashcan and the pile of dishes. Her eyes watered, and her gag reflex kicked in again.

The answering machine, oblivious to the decaying mess, beeped again. She gasped, trying to breathe through her mouth to stop the smell. “All right, one freaking second,” she said.
She made it to the washing machine and dropped everything in a heap. She stuffed some whites in first, since they were both running out of clean clothes after over eight days away. She turned the start dial, and the machine had just rumbled to life when her watch beeped. 2PM.

She sighed. The kitchen would have to wait a little. She gathered a breath deep into her chest and launched back into the room, unwilling to breathe. She grabbed a glass, filled it under the faucet, and vacated as quickly as possible. She sucked in air as she closed the kitchen door behind her. She grabbed his pills from her purse, and she returned to the couch.

He'd been asleep twenty minutes, at best, and she hated to wake him, but... She touched his shoulder through the blanket, anyway. “Derek,” she whispered.

Nothing.

“Derek, come on. You need to wake up for a minute.”

With a deep sound of pain and frustration, he rolled away from her into the back of the sofa. When he put weight on his arm and his side, he let loose a breathless sort of croak, and he flattened out again. His body shifted under the blankets, and then he wiped muzzily at his face, but he didn't open his eyes.

“Please, I don't want to cough,” he said.

“You don't need to,” she said. “You just need to take this, and you can go back to sleep. Can you sit up?”

He sucked in a breath and didn't move. She felt his muscles tremble underneath her hands. She slid her arm underneath his back, and together, they managed to get him into a slouch. He dropped his bare feet over the edge of the sofa, and he hovered over his knees with the blanket curled around him, breathing like he hurt and he wanted it to stop. He rubbed his eyes, and, finally, he looked at her. Sort of. His stare conveyed no recognition. His hair stuck up all over. Dark circles gave him a raccoonish appearance around the eyes.

He took the pill from her hand like an automaton. He didn't want to take the glass of water no matter what she tried. She ended up tipping the glass to his lips for him. Her stomach churned as he swallowed, water dripping everywhere in a giant, spluttering mess. She rubbed his shoulder. If he were at all awake, he would feel so embarrassed, and she ached for him.

“You can go back to sleep now,” she said. She tried to get him to lie back down, but he wouldn't budge. “Derek?” she whispered.

He blinked, stood, and shuffled toward the hallway. He clutched the blankets, and they trailed after him like a long cape. She followed him, concerned that, in his stupor, he would try the stairs. When the door slammed in her face, she flinched and came back to herself. She stood in the hallway outside the bathroom.

“Let me know if you need anything,” she told the door.

“I'm fine,” she thought she heard him grumble, though she could have imagined it. She didn't let herself dwell on it. He was on a truckload of drugs. He hurt. He'd been woken from a sound, deep sleep, and she'd stuffed a pill down his throat before he'd really regained any sort of thought processes. He was allowed to be a bit grumpy.

She returned to the kitchen. She pushed through the door and gagged, though the urge seemed less, now that she'd started growing accustomed to the horrible smell. She stared at the disaster area.
She didn't know what the hell to do first, and the answering machine wouldn't. Freaking. Shut up.

The answering machine, however, didn't make her want to vomit, so she left it. She grabbed a big black drawstring trash bag from the roll under the sink and attacked the refrigerator. The solidifying, reeking milk was the first to go, followed by the half-and-half, some very ripe orange juice, and a box of leftovers from some restaurant. She threw out liquifying strawberries. A fuzzy collection of unidentifiable items that had become a science experiment. She threw out the yellowing stick of margarine. She tossed vegetables and dip and all sorts of other things that normally, in a house full of four adults, they churned through in a matter of days. Thursday was usually grocery night, too, which meant the day of the shooting would have been when the untouched perishables on their last legs would have been swept clear to make room for replacements.

She closed the fridge door and attacked the counters next. She tossed bread that had become solid mold and mushy, browning apples that left little puddles behind. She fought her reflex to throw up again, and nausea swirled around her head as she approached the trashcan. She tipped it, and dumped everything from that into the giant bag as well. A plume of rotting stench hit her right in the face, and then?

Then, she threw up. Right into the bag. She gagged until her stomach hurt. Little flying creepy crawly things buzzed in her face, and she retched again and again until she was empty and trembling. Her nose ran. She swallowed bile. She twisted the ties on the bag and shut it. Then she wrapped it in a second bag, and shut that. The smell died to a tolerable level, and she heaped the bag by the trashcan.

When Derek wandered into the room, barefoot, blankets draped over his shoulders, and his hair all askew like some sort of windblown refugee, she was still trying to build the courage to clean the dishes in the sink. “Hey,” she said, and then she frowned. She'd been slamming things. Retching. Wrinkling trash bags. “I'm not keeping you up, am I?”

He shook his head. “No.”

The answering machine beeped again, and he moved toward it, his steps slow and deliberate, like he was hurting again. He looked haggard. And tired. And yet he wasn't sleeping. She debated whether to ask him about another Percocet, when he hit the button.

“You have thirteen new messages,” the machine said in its flat, mechanical tone.

Beep.

“Derek, it's Mom,” said Mrs. Shepherd in a wavering, panicked-but-forced-into-calm voice. “I've tried your office, both of your work cells, your personal cell, and now here. Mark's not answering any of his phones either. I didn't have Meredith's cell phone number stored, so I'm hoping you're with her. We saw the news. I know you're probably busy managing the troops, but, please, call, and tell us everyone is okay when you have a moment.”

Beep.

“Derek? Kathy. You need to call. Mom's freaking out.” Kathy's voice hitched. “We're all freaking out.”

Beep.

“Derek, it's Mom again. I'm really hoping this machine is broken.” Meredith bit her lip as she listened to Carolyn suck in a breath like she was forcing herself not to cry. “Call as soon as you get this.”

Beep.

“Lexie?” said Thatcher. “Meredith?” he added as an afterthought. “Please, call me when you can.”

Beep.

“Derek, this really isn't funny,” a woman snapped. Rachel? “Call somebody, damn it.”

Beep.

“Mom again. Sorry.”

Beep.

“Uh, hi. This is Aaron. I... Never mind.”

Beep.

“Derek, your family is ringing me every five minutes to see if somebody's contacted me, and I have no idea what to tell them,” said Addison. Her voice sounded low and warbling, like she was crying. She sniffed. “I'm watching the news. You can reach me at Sam's... Just call, okay? Or Meredith. Or anybody else who's there in that godforsaken zoo. Call, please.”

Beep.

“I'm sorry,” said a tiny voice. “I shouldn't have called it a godforsaken zoo. Please, call.”

Beep.

“You'd better not be dead,” Nancy snapped, “Or I'll have to strangle you myself. They're estimating casualties.” Then her voice broke. “Please, don't be dead.”

Beep.

“Mom again.”

Beep.

“Hi,” said an unfamiliar, feminine voice. “This is Janine Wilkinson from the Seattle Times. I'm calling Derek Shepherd concerning the recent shootings at Seattle Grace. I'd appreciate it if you would give me a call back. You can reach me at the city desk, extension 9216.”

Beep.

“Dr. Shepherd? Detective Wolff. We spoke on Sunday afternoon. I just wanted to let you know I've sent a packet for you in the mail. It has my business card and the numbers for some hotlines you can call. If you change your mind about making a statement, or just want to talk off the record with somebody who understands, my door is always open. I know this is a very difficult time, and I wanted to express my deepest sympathy to you and your wife.”

Beep.

“You have no new messages,” said the machine.
Derek stared at the machine, and he didn't move. Meredith's gaze dropped to the floor as a lump formed in her throat. “Those must be old,” she said. Anger made her teeth clench. Well, duh, Meredith. Of course they were old. “I... I didn't come in here. When I came home before,” she said. “All I did was sleep. I'm sorry. I should have... I should have gotten rid of them.”

Her throat hurt. Why. Why hadn't she realized and cleared the messages before he'd heard? Why? What had possessed her to think, after a freaking catastrophe so large it had been splashed across national news for days nonstop and still, to this day, was making some headlines, that nobody would have called home to check in? He was in pain, and tired, and he didn't need more reminders of what he'd been through. He had enough already. She'd been an idiot. Again.

Her fingers clenched. Her vision blurred. She walked to him, sneaked under the billowing blankets, and hugged him. His eyes watered, and she watched something horrible flash across his dead gaze. He clutched her, and his breaths sped up into something panicked. His warm body hovered in her space, but Derek Shepherd disappeared. His muscles shook, and his jaw clenched, and he looked like he wanted to explode.

“Are you okay?” she said, which was stupid. Stupid again. If she was crying and not okay, he wasn't okay either. “I'm not okay,” she added. Solidarity might help.

“Everybody called,” he said, his voice a wretched wasteland.

“They did,” she said.

“I guess I should check my voice mail. I've been putting it off, but...” He blinked, and with a sigh, he stumbled to the dinette set table and collapsed. He took a breath, and then his eyes began to space.

She crumpled into the chair next to him and scooted close. She wrapped her arms around his neck and leaned against him. “Detective Wolff visited you while I was away?” she said, trying to keep him talking. Anything. “You never said anything.”

He tensed. “I don't want to talk to him.”

“Nobody said you had to,” she said. “I told him to get bent. Well, not in those exact words or anything, but you know what I mean.”

“When?”

“He called me,” she said. She thought, sifting memories. “I guess the same day he spoke to you, but later? It was after I got back to the hospital.”

“Oh.”

“You don't have to talk to him, Derek,” she said. “You don't. Mr. Clark is dead. There's no criminal case. And even if there were, they can't compel you. Not as a——”

“A victim?” he said, speaking the word as though it were something dirty. Shameful. He stared at the table, his lips a flat line. In the gray light, his eyes seemed obsidian. Rain tapped on the roof, and water streamed down the windowpanes.

“I was going to say casualty,” she said. “Derek, are you okay?”

His fingertips wandered along the wood grain in the old oak table. He blinked, and then he stared at her. “Did somebody do something to you?” he said. “Is that one of the stories you won't tell me?
Is that why you hate talking about...” His temples moved as he clenched and unclenched his jaw, again, and again, and he couldn't finish his sentence. His breaths came low and even, but they seemed regulated, somehow. Like fists had grabbed his lungs and squeezed, squeezed, squeezed.

“What?” she said.

“You know a lot,” he said. “About police procedure.”

“Derek,” she said. “Derek, I asked Detective Wolff when he called me. Nothing ever happened to me. I don't like to talk about before because I was an immature idiot. The only person who ever hurt me was me.”

“Oh,” he said.

She touched his shoulder. “Will you talk to me? Please?”

His hands shook, and he petted the table. “I'm really... really stoned,” he said. “I'm...”

“I know.”

He pushed the chair back and stood. “Were you going to wash the dishes?” he said.

“Yeah, but—”

“I'll do them.”

“Okay, but—”

“I'm fine,” he said.

He left the blankets on the chair and walked past the counter top. He stopped at the trash bag, and he bent, reaching for it. She bit her lip, tamping the squall of worry burbling in her throat. That thing had a full milk jug in it and all sorts of other crap. That was definitely not five pounds, but she had a feeling if she opened her mouth, something catastrophic might happen that they would never recover from. And so, when he pulled at the drawstrings and tried to lift the stuffed bag, she said nothing.

She couldn't see his face. He flexed his arm, and the bag didn't even come off the floor. He left it there and moved to the sink without comment. For a moment, he paused, hands clenching the side of the counter. His body hitched, and she heard him choke and sniffle, but she thought it might have more to do with the rancid smells than anything else. He turned away, a look of pain blossoming on his face as his gag reflex stressed his breastbone. His torso jerked, and he screwed his eyes shut.

“Jesus,” he hissed. “Did Lexie leave this here?”

Meredith only knew it hadn't been them. Derek was a bit of a neat freak. He always rinsed his dishes after dinner, and usually hers, too, even if they didn't eat together for some reason, as long as he found the skeletal remains of her dinner piled up somewhere in the house before he went to bed. Alex almost never used plates. That left Lexie.

“I think so,” she said.

He swallowed thickly. She watched him compose himself, stuffing his reactions inside a tiny box of forced self-control. An experienced surgeon, he'd gotten used to dealing with gross things that instinct told him to get far, far away from instead of touch. He'd gotten used to the smell of bowels and blood and brains and bits over the years. Rotting junk took him a minute, but he managed.

He turned around. He twisted the faucet. Water gushed into the sink, and all the little bugs in the air scattered. He grabbed a sponge and some soap, and he began to work. “Even Mark wasn't this bad,” he said. “Not even during college.”

“Well, it has been over a week,” she said. “It's not like we normally leave things out like this. I don't think anybody planned to be away this long.” She grabbed a paper towel from the roll and wiped down the counter tops, clearing moldy, gritty crumbs away.

He didn't respond.

He used the spray to loosen a carpet of mold from a plate. Powdery bits of fungus kicked up into the air, and he coughed, and then he sobbed, shuddered, and blinked, but he kept going. Her muscles tightened, and she wanted to tell him to stop, she did, but she made herself stay quiet. There was helping, and then there was hovering.

When she finished with the counters, she slid behind him and wrapped her arms around his waist. For a long, agonizing moment, tension locked him in place, like he didn't know who'd touched him, and he warred with his fight or flight response. His soft breathing resumed, and his shoulders dropped as his tautness turned lax. She laid her cheek against his shoulder blades. They flexed and moved underneath his skin, and she sighed, resting as she rubbed the soft cotton over his flat stomach.

She spaced and let the world blur. He piled dish after rinsed dish beside the sink, ready for the dishwasher. She should help. She should. Her eyelids dipped, and she pressed her ear against him, listening. With the water and his breaths and all the moving, she didn't hear his heartbeat, but she heard him. Living. And that was enough.

She kissed him through his shirt and let go. He drenched her with the hose when she reached for the pile of plates, and she shrieked, leaping backward. Her spine jarred as she slammed into the opposite counter.

“Gotcha,” he said, his voice soft.

She laughed, wiping water from her eyes. “Ass,” she said.

“You love it,” he countered.

They settled into a sort of rhythm. Him rinsing. Her loading the dishwasher. Dodging each other. Not laughing endlessly or anything. But... Snickering. Hopeful play in the midst of a darker mess of issues. She bumped his hip from time to time, making him slip under the faucet. He got her dead on with the hose at least twice, though she gained skill at sneaking up behind him and making off with a glass or a plate, undetected. They both ended up wet and mussed and out of sorts, but content.

They stopped when Derek had to put a hand on the counter top to hold himself upright. She loaded the dishwasher with detergent and let it go. The machine came to life with a gurgle of water and soapy spit, and then she went to join him at the table. He rested in the chair where he'd draped the afghan.

“Do you want anything?” she said as she sat at the table across from him. Well past 2PM, disgusting job done, her stomach rumbled its discontent. He stared at her, but he didn't see. She waved a hand at him. “Derek?”

He blinked. “I'm sorry. What?”

“Do you want something to eat?”

His lip twitched. “I don't know. Are you cooking?”

“No,” she said, and she tried not to take offense when he visibly relaxed. “I'm reheating, or maybe pouring. We're totally out of milk and just about anything else perishable.”

That left, basically, crackers, soup, and cereal. None of which sounded appealing after many long hours without food. Derek hadn't eaten since after 7:30AM, and she hadn't eaten since at least 9AM herself. She could kick herself again for not being prepared. She'd been so focused on getting Derek home that she hadn't thought about what living at home again would entail or how, after nine days, many of the various necessities would have fallen by the wayside and need to be resumed.

“I guess we could order in,” she said. “Pizza? Chinese?”

“You hate Chinese.”

“And you hate pizza,” she said. He ate it, from time to time, when he was starving. But he liked to get it without cheese and covered with vegetables, which, frankly, was disgusting. Her stomach roiled at the thought. What was the point of pizza if it had no meat and no cheese?

“How about subs?” she suggested. “There's a place I wanted to try.”

“What place?” he said.

“You know.” She waved her arms, as if that would help him figure it out. “That little place that opened a few blocks over. I pointed to it a few weeks ago.” No recognition in his gaze. “When we were in the car.” Nothing. “On the way to work. That day. Uh. Ricardo's or something.”

He shrugged.

“I think I saved a menu somewhere,” she said. “We got one in the mail.” She stood and went to the paper drawer. She swept through piles and piles menus for pizza places, Chinese places, Thai places, bakeries, sandwich joints, Italian food, carry-out services, and more. She didn't think anybody had cleaned out the drawer since before Izzie had left. She found coupons that had expired over a year ago. Her eyes lit on a garish gold-and-green-colored menu as she churned through the drawer. Ricardo's. “Here it is,” she said.

She flopped back into her chair with the menu. “So, do you want that?”

“Want what?”

“Subs,” she said. “For lunch. The menu?” She pushed it at him.

“Oh,” he said. He fingered the menu. “Sure.”

“What do you want?” she said as he stared at the menu, a blank look on his face.

He fiddled with the corner, bending the already abused paper. She bit her lip. He seemed... Almost lost. She watched him. He read a line, and then his gaze lost focus. He squinted, and then he started at the top again. He couldn't make it more than halfway down the front page, which was cluttered with about fifty different combination platters, before he lost himself. With a sigh, he gave up, and he pushed the menu away.

“There's a lot here,” he said, his voice soft. “Any recommendations?”

She touched his hand. “It's new. I've wanted to try it for a while. I can just pick something. You know, if you trust me to pick something that could be construed as healthy or whatever.”

A wan smile ghosted his face. “All right.”

She took the menu to the phone and ordered from an crotchety woman who sounded like she was less than a cigarette away from emphysema.

“Okay,” Meredith said as she sat back at the table. “They said fifteen minutes. If they make it, I'll be— crap!”

He peered at her. “You'll be crap?”

“Do you have any cash in your wallet?” she said. “I forgot to hit the ATM on the way back, too.”

He stared at her for a long, silent moment, and then he shifted, reaching for his back pocket. Discomfort creased his expression, but it went away as he pulled out his worn leather billfold and stopped twisting. He opened the wallet. Money fanned loosely from the bill pocket, but he didn't touch that.

He stared at his license, and it seemed almost like he'd gotten caught in the thrall of a cobra or something. He touched his picture with his fingertips. He was one of the few people she knew who remained photogenic, even after he'd waited at the DMV for hours after a long hospital shift. His twin smiled back at him with a sly grin that announced he knew he was hot. Derek brushed the word Seattle, and then he paused over his scrawling signature. The address on the license read 613 Harper Lane. Her address.

“Derek?” she said.

He blinked and looked up at her. “Hmm?”

She held her hand out. “Money? It's $18.72.”

“Oh,” he said. He pulled a wad of bills free, but he didn't split anything out for her. His hand hovered on a fifty dollar bill, and he looked at the pile, perplexed. Normally, Derek was meticulous about tipping, and he calculated fifteen percent in the space of heartbeats. She grabbed a twenty and some ones, and she frowned as she crinkled the money in her hand.

“Oh, seriously,” she said. She put the money on the table and walked to his side. She cupped his shoulders and started massaging. “Scale of 1 to 10, how bad is it?”

“I don't know,” he said. “It just... I thought...”

She paused. “What?”

“I just want it to stop,” he said. “I need it to stop.”

“What do you need to stop, Derek?”

“I don't know,” he said. He blinked, and he started to rock in his chair. “I don't know, Meredith.”
She sighed and collapsed next to him. “Okay,” she said. She stroked his face. “Sorry. I'm just... I'm a little lost.”

“Join the fucking club.”

“I'm trying not to smother you,” she said. “I'm trying so hard, but you're starting to worry me a bit.”

He sighed. She stared at his profile. He swallowed, again and again, like he was forcing down a torrent. His fingers tightened against the edge of the table. “I'd talk if I had any idea what to say. I just...” He stared at his lap. “I don't know.”

She leaned against him. “We suck,” she said.

“We kind of do.”

“We're clueless freaks.”

“We kind of are.”

He kissed her forehead. The corners of his mouth twitched. “So, this club,” he said.

“The clueless freaks club?”

He nodded. “Co-presidents? Or is one of us on top?”

She snorted, and he wrapped his arms around her body. He breathed in her ear, soft and buffeting, and then he burrowed his face against her neck. His body felt warm and solid. He rumbled, not a word, not anything but deep, vibrating noise, and she felt her muscles loosen. “You're what I need,” he said, a breathless whisper. “Meredith.”

She stared, head back against his shoulder. Her vision blurred, almost as though she were drugged, and she rested, nose to his damp hair. She said something, but she had no idea what. Some regurgitated bits of flotsam she'd pulled from her internal reservoir of scattered thoughts. He melted, so it must have been right, must have been good.

She stroked his arm, and she let him hold her as seconds stretched to minutes.

When the doorbell rang, all the careful work she'd done dissolved. His muscles locked, and she sat in his arms, stuck in a tightening vise.

“It's probably the sandwiches,” she said, struggling away from his grip. She flopped against the table and grabbed the money.

“Oh,” he said.

By the time she'd undone the locks on the door, paid the delivery boy, and returned, he seemed less out of sorts. Just a little. She pawed through the warm, fresh-smelling bag. Two wrapped sandwiches sat partially buried in a pile of mustard and mayo packets. Just picking up the first sandwich made her stomach growl.

“Ham and Swiss. No mayo. Wholewheat,” she said as she presented his meal to him.

A breath flared from him, given weight by his diaphragm. Not quite a laugh. Not quite.

“What?” she said. She tore open the packaging of her sandwich. The thing was huge. They'd given her the full twelve inch loaf of bread, and it was stuffed with meat and other goodies. The sandwich had to be at least four inches thick.

“You make the most amusing face when you're humoring me,” he said.

“I do not.”

“Do, too,” he said. “Your nose crinkles, and you glower. It's just wholewheat, Mere. Thank you for ordering it.”

“Screw the wholewheat,” she said. “How can you survive without mayo? Isn't that really bland?”

He unwrapped his sandwich and took a test bite, leaving a small crescent of empty space in the bun. He seemed happy with it, and he chewed for several seconds. He swallowed. “You only wish your sandwich was as awesome as mine,” he said.

“Mine has bacon,” she said. She sunk her teeth into the warm, soft bun, and died. The tomato burst with flavor and mixed with the melting cheddar cheese, crispy bacon, and juicy turkey. Glorious. “Bacon is the definition of sandwich bliss,” she said around her stuffed mouth. She didn't care how muffled she sounded or how gross it was, because it was good, and her starving stomach demanded more, more, more, like a ravenous, rumbling beast. The second the first bit of bacon hit her esophagus, she couldn't stop shoveling. “Your ham and Swiss is on the losing team, Derek.”

“Oh, really?”

“Yes,” she said. “Greasy, crunchy strings of coronary artery disease and heart failure topped with high triglycerides, cholesterol, and a tomato to say it's healthy. It's perfect bliss or whatever.”

He shook his head. “You're going to have a stroke before you're forty, Meredith.”

“So worth it.” She licked her fingers to get the dripping sauce, and then she chomped down on another bite and another and another. “This is really, really good,” she said. “I like this place.”

“Where did you get this?” he said.

“Ricardo's,” she replied. “A few blocks over. You know. By the market and the drug store? It's really close. Their delivery guy was on a bike. A pedal bike. Not a motorcycle.” She reached for another bite, but she had nothing left. Her stomach rumbled its thanks, and she tried to breathe, but she couldn't fill her lungs. She moaned, put her hands over her abdomen, and leaned into him. “Oh, I had no idea I was that hungry.”

“Did you even chew?” he said.

“Maybe.”

“What's the point of eating to kill yourself if you don't even stop to taste it?”

“Oh, I tasted it,” she said. “I did. And it was goooooood.” She flopped like some sort of dead fish and watched him take another bite. He'd taken maybe four, all of them small.

“Really good?” he asked, a tiny ghost of a grin quirking his lips.

She nodded. “Really, really.” She almost collapsed into his lap and simply draped herself across him, except a sharp, icky, rotten smell hit her nose, and she remembered she hadn't taken out the trash yet. “Ugh,” she groaned, and she forced herself to her feet.

“What?”
“The trash is making me nauseated. It stinks,” she said.

She waddled to the big garbage bag like a pregnant woman and grabbed it with a heavy groan. Definitely more than five pounds. “I'll be right back,” she said.

She dragged the bag through the back door, which slapped behind her on its hinges. Luckily, the rain had slowed considerably, and she didn't get drenched in two seconds. She pulled the bag into the little fenced area where they kept the trash cans. She didn't even try to lift it to put it in one of the cans, she just left it by the plastic, county-approved bin. Alex could get it or something.

Or...

She bit her lip against the sudden, nervous well of grief. Not Alex. Lexie could help her get it later if the racoons and possums didn't rip it apart. Or maybe Mark. Mark would visit. She wiped at her face, though she didn't know why. Rain spatter made it impossible to discern tears from water droplets.

She trudged back inside, only to find Derek asleep at the table. He'd picked at his sandwich a little, but more than three quarters of it remained, untouched. He'd contorted a bit in the chair, his ribs resting against the back of the chair, and he used his elbow over the side to keep his balance. His chin touched his chest, and his other hand sat vaguely on top of his sandwich, as if he'd meant to take another bite, shifted to get more comfortable, and passed out instead. The paper wrapper crinkled as she picked it up and put it in the fridge so he could have it later.

“Derek?” she whispered. She touched his shoulders. “You can't sleep here. You'll fall.” He didn't move, and she sighed. She didn't want to have to keep doing this. She wanted to let him sleep. “Derek, come on.” She shook him, trying to be gentle. “Derek.”

“Mmm,” he groaned. He turned his face into her chest, and his hand clutched at her shirt. “Still don't see how this is resting,” he said, his voice low and feather soft against her shirt.

“Derek,” she said, louder.

His eyes stayed shut, but she felt him wake. His breaths became clipped like he'd been shocked, or he realized he hurt again. While his muscles didn't tense, his loose body had a more controlled air to it. “Let me go back,” he said.

“Come on,” she said, prodding him. “Let's go back to the couch. Okay?” But he didn't move. “You can't sleep in the chair, Derek.”

“Chair?” He blinked and swallowed thickly. The lack of comprehension in his eyes disturbed her, but she tried to ignore it.

“The one you're sitting in,” she said. “Can you stand?”

“What time is it?”

She glanced at her watch. “It's almost four.”

“When can I go home?” he said as he leaned over his knees and put his face in his hands.

She froze. “Derek, we are home,” she said. She squeezed his shoulder and felt her nails carve dents into his skin. “We're home. We're in the kitchen at my mother's house.”

He raised his head, and he peered at the room through dark, confused eyes. She watched him as his gaze wandered and paused at the window. Rain splattered against the smudged, glass panes. He licked his lips, and his assessment drifted to the sink, the counter tops, and the clock on the wall. He found the answering machine last and rested his stare on the phone on the wall for a long, long time.

“Can you stand?” she said. “Come on, Derek. Up.”

A warbling, worrisome sound collected in his throat. He looked at her. He stood, but he moved like he'd disconnected his brain from his limbs. He almost tripped on nothing at all. She bit her lip as she wrapped herself around him.

“I'm sorry,” he said, and the apology cut her to pieces. “I'm...”

“Derek, it's been a long day,” she said. “This is a lot longer than you're used to being active, even with naps. It's okay to be exhausted. It really is. It's only been nine days.”

“I was okay. I was,” he said. “And then you left, and I...” He shuddered. He wilted over her shoulder. His voice dropped low, and he swayed. “I need to lie down, now.”

“The couch is right in the next room,” she said.

She walked with him into the living room. He let her guide him like he slept on his feet and had no conscious idea where he was going. But, dreaming while awake, or not, he saw the couch, and he blinked. His gaze darkened.

“I want to go upstairs,” he said.

“Are you sure?” she said. “The couch is right here. And you wouldn't have to try the stairs when you're ready to pass out.”

“The couch hurts.”

“Are you sure the bed would be better?”

“No,” he said, frustration giving his tired tone sharp, painful barbs. His eyes misted. He looked back at the couch, and something in his expression broke. “I can't. It hurts, Mere. The cushions are too soft. I can do a fucking flight of steps. Not the couch.”

She stared at the stairwell with trepidation. Derek could barely stand. The stairway would kill him, but he didn't give her that much choice. He moved, determined, and, somehow, he found enough steam for four steps before he started to flag. Her throat hurt as she swallowed back tears. She gripped his waist. He leaned against the railing, panting, every breath breaking loose from his chest with a tiny moan.

“Slow down,” she said, rubbing his back. “Catch your breath.”

His momentum tipped him forward, and he stumbled through another three steps. He stopped. “Fuck,” he said, gasping. “Fuck.” He hit the railing with his fist, and the whole thing shook. The thunderous noise of it echoed in the empty house.

“Breathe,” she said, trying to hold herself together. She felt like she'd swallowed a nuclear bomb and it ticked, deep inside. Her lungs burned. Every time she breathed, she pressed down on her diaphragm until it ached. If she did that, she wouldn't sob. “You'll make it. I'm here.”

Another three steps, and then two, and then one. He kept going, nearly tripping, until he was within sight of his goal. He looked at the long, empty hallway beyond the steps. He rested, two steps to go, and then he dug down and pushed.

He sobbed as he reached the door frame of the master bedroom. His whole body wobbled. His chest rose and fell, over and over and over with every wheeze. He didn't move from the door frame. Ten feet from his goal, and he didn't move. He thunked his forehead against the wood, his eyes squeezed shut, and he spent all his energy on standing and breathing.

She rubbed his arm. “Do you want more Percocet?” she said.

He didn't speak, but he nodded.

“I'll be right back. Don't move.”

She raced down the steps and grabbed his pills from her purse, and she re-filled the water glass she'd used for his last dose in the bathroom sink about a quarter way up the side. She covered the glass with her hand, and she raced back up the steps. He took the glass and the pill without comment, and when he finished, she set the glass on the nightstand on his side.

While he rested, she yanked back the covers on his side of the bed and made the way clear for him to walk without tripping. She returned to him, reached around his waist, and unbuttoned his jeans. The thick, faded denim still hadn't quite dried all the way, particularly at his ankles. She slipped his pants down his trembling legs, where they pooled at his ankles, leaving him in his black boxer briefs and the soft, stained t-shirt. She helped him step out of his pants, but even with her guidance, he almost toppled.

He took the last few steps with his remaining energy, and he collapsed to the bed like a felled tree. He didn't even have the strength to lift his legs off the floor. He lay half on, half off the bed, eyes shut as he breathed, still panting, still struggling. She pulled his legs and lower body into the bed with a groan of effort that raked her vocal cords to shreds.

She stroked his face. “Okay?”

“No,” he said, his voice choked. He stared at her, his eyes red and puffy like he was about ready to burst into tears. “My back. I need to sit up.” He clawed at the sheets.

Her mind worked like lightning as she ran through options, trying not to panic over his desperation. She thought of things that had made her feel better after her own surgery. She thought of things she'd read. She'd actually poked around on some home care forums for heart surgery patients, too, because knowing how to crack a sternum, insert a chest tube, and fix a heart? Not the same as caring for the heart's owner afterward at home.

After spending days in pain at home after her liver surgery, after reading the clinical list of what to expect provided to her by Dr. Bailey, she'd become convinced that surgeons didn't really have any freaking clue what their scalpels did to people in the aftermath. Surgeons were taught to dehumanize from minute one. Sterile drapes took faces away during procedures. All surgeons looked at were mechanics. I'm staring at an aneurysm. How do I fix it? They didn't care that Betty Sue would have a headache for weeks.

Speaking of Betty Sue, Meredith recalled a blurry subject line. Some woman. Post-quadruple bypass surgery. “Can't sleep, back is killing me. Help!” Tom248 had answered...

“Can you roll?” Meredith said. “Just for a minute? I know it's uncomfortable, but I know something we can try.”
With a pained, torn piece of sound that loitered in his throat, Derek rolled away from her. She jabbed her knee into the mattress by the base of his spine, leaned across him, and pulled the pillows loose from her side of the bed. She lined them lengthwise along his shoulders, back, butt, and legs. She splayed her palms against his side. His ribs jammed into her as he panted.

“Mere,” he said, his voice wispy, like he was barely holding on. He shook.

“Okay, roll back,” she said, and she moved her knee.

He let gravity pull him down onto his back. The pillows pushed his right side off the mattress, so that he rested flat, but tipped at an angle. Not enough to make him feel like he was resting on his side, but enough give half of his back a rest.

A groan tumbled from his lips, but it sounded thick and heady and sort of cleansing, as though he were pushing out the badness. She wanted to collapse with the nauseating power of her relief when she saw his face. He swallowed, and his breathing slowed from stabbing agony into something restive. He raised a palm to his face to wipe at his eyes, and then he let it flop onto his stomach. He didn't move.

Rain pattered on the roof. A steady drip, drip, drip echoed from the gutters. Silence hung in the room like a fog.

“Better?” she said, but she knew the answer, just from how the pain had leaked from his expression.

“Better,” he said.

“Like a higher level of hell better, or actually not bad?” Just to make sure.

“Not bad.” His eyelids dipped. She watched her hazy reflection as he looked at her. In a small voice, he said, “Thank you.” And then he shut his eyes.

With the pillows stuck underneath him like that, he didn't have any mobility. She pulled the blankets over his body, and he sighed. “If it starts to hurt again, we can switch the pillows to your other side. Just ask me. Even if I'm asleep. Even if I'm not here. I'm going to put your cell phone on the nightstand in a little bit, so you can call me if I'm downstairs. Okay?”

He breathed softly and didn't answer other than a vague, “Mmm.”

She bit her lip as she started thinking of all sorts of horrible scenarios that involved him trying to fix it himself. He could fall. He could seriously fall and crack his head open on the bed frame or the nightstand. He was certainly stoned enough to fall. She could see him sitting in a messy heap on the floor, blood gushing down his face, and being completely oblivious about it because he couldn't feel pain enough to notice or care.

Or he'd twist something. Or he'd pop his sternum out of whack trying to be more flexible than he was, something he'd already nearly done once, and then she'd have to drag him back to the hospital for scans to make sure he hadn't re-broken anything. She began to wonder if, maybe, she'd gotten herself in over her head with this whole thing.

Derek tried things on his own first. He waited until he failed in a spectacular, cataclysmic way before he said a word about his difficulties, and even then, getting him to seek help was like pulling not just one tooth, but fifty. With a few root canals thrown in for good measure. He bottled things up. He didn't talk.
Objectively speaking, he was the worst kind of patient, and the worst kind of candidate to bring home early, which is probably why Dr. Altman had looked at Meredith like she was insane when she'd offered.

Meredith squeezed his shoulder. “Derek, I mean it. I really mean it. Don't fix it by yourself. Okay?”

He grunted. “Kay.”

“The shades,” he said.

She pulled the shades over the window, turning darkening, rainy gray into fuzzy blackness. Blind, she felt her way back to the edge of the bed. “Anything else?” she said.

He didn't respond. His soft, even breathing filled the room. She turned to leave, thinking he'd fallen asleep, but as she reached the door, he stopped her.

“Would you stay?” he said, his voice deep and slurred with drugs and exhaustion. “Jus' fer a bit?”

Her lip quivered. “Sure,” she said. “In the bed with you, or just in the room?”

“Bed,” he said.

She stumbled on something she'd left on the floor and slammed into the bedpost. Her vision flared with bright, flashing sparks, and she bit down on a moan.

The covers rustled. “Mere?” he said.

He would move. He would freaking move to try and help her, no matter how scrambled he was, no matter how much pain it caused him. She knew it.

“I'm fine,” she warbled. She limped to her side of the bed and pushed the covers back before he got any ideas.

She'd used all her pillows for his back, but she didn't think she'd be staying long, judging from how out of it he sounded. He'd fall asleep in minutes or less. She slid under the sheets and pressed against his body. With the pillows the way they were, he rested tipped toward the center of the bed, and he couldn't shift around on his own. Not well. He had no leverage. She helped him wrap his arm around her, and she settled against his chest. He breathed, and the noise rumbled like thunder in her ear.

“You're sure this doesn't hurt?” she said. Her side of the bed was, inconveniently, also the bullet wound side of his chest. The bandage covering the hole under his nipple sat inches from her chin under his shirt.

“Doesn' hurt now,” he said.

“Are you lying to me?”

“No.”

“Okay,” she said. “But you'd better not be lying.”

He made a wet, deep sound that could have been a chuckle. She bit her lip. She didn't think he was lying. He'd relaxed. His muscles didn't shiver with any sort of stress. He wasn't making pain sounds. His syllables had lengthened. He was flat, she'd relieved the strain on his back, and he didn't have to make himself move anymore. The second Percocet would be kicking in soon, too. He could give in to sleep, and he could stay that way as long as he wanted or needed.

She splayed her palm against his stomach and listened to his heart and the soft rasps of his breathing. Heat radiated through his shirt, which had dried from the rain over the course of the afternoon.

“Feels like home when you're here,” he murmured. His head tipped, and his chin came to rest on top of her head.

“It didn't before?” she said, but he didn't answer beyond a nonsensical, winding string of syllables that might have been words.

She lay with him for a long time, stroking the bumps of his ribs under the covers. She closed her eyes and let herself drift. She hadn't slept beside him in more than nine nights because she'd stayed at the hospital the night before he'd been shot. Nine nights. Ten days. Eternity collapsed into the now, and it felt like she'd never been away.

She lay in the dark while the rain tapped on the roof, curled up with her breathing husband. Her personal radiator. Her worrying ceased and swept away. She could do this, and she needed him. She needed him home. She needed him in the bed, breathing next to her at night. Like this. He needed to be a solid length against her body. She needed his scent, and the soft rumbles he made when he dreamed. She needed him. She needed.

Sleeping next to him on a cot hadn't been remotely the same as this. This... perfection. Everything felt right, despite the horrific downs in the ups and downs of that day.

“I love you,” she said. The only higher cap would have been if he were awake to say it back to her, but she didn't begrudge him his sleep, either. She smiled and snuggled closer. His arm shifted to compensate for her movements.

When the doorbell rang, she didn't want to move. She didn't want to think. She just wanted to stay there, warm. In the dark. In the silence. With him.

She debated ignoring the world outside the bedroom, but when the doorbell rang again, she forced herself up and off the bed. It could be Lexie. Maybe she'd locked herself out. Or it could be somebody else important. Someone family. She rubbed her eyes against the light and padded down the steps.

“Mrs. Shepherd!” Meredith said, surprised as she opened the door.

Derek's mother frowned. She held a crinkling plastic bag in her hands, and she looked through the open doorway with a sort of nervous but composed curiosity. A pile of suitcases sat at her feet.

“I'm so sorry, sweetheart,” she said. “Did I wake you?”

“No,” Meredith said. She swiped a hand over her head, hoping to smooth any flyaway bed hair. “But Derek's asleep.” She bit her lip. “He's exhausted. I really don't want to wake him up. I'm sorry.”

Carolyn shook her head. “Of course not,” she said. “Leave him be. I'll see him next time.”

Meredith gestured for her to come in. “I thought you'd left already?” she said. “Not that I want you to leave or anything. I just... I thought...”
His mother glanced at the long flight of stairs as she stepped into the foyer. She wiped her feet on the welcome mat. “I didn’t take the same flight as his sisters,” she said, her voice dropping into a considerate, low whisper. “The airline delayed mine to the point of cancellation. I booked a new trip this morning, but it doesn’t leave until the late evening. It’s a red-eye."

“Oh,” Meredith said. “Yeah. That’s Sea-Tac for you. May I take your coat?”

Carolyn shook her head. “Oh, no, dear, I wasn’t planning to stay long, but thank you for the hospitality. This house is just lovely, Meredith."

“Thanks,” Meredith said. “It was my mother’s.” She would have been content to stop there. Would have been. But Carolyn didn’t say a word, and for some reason, Meredith needed to fill the silence. Nerves jingled in her belly. “It’s not really me. Well. The decorating, I mean. But it’s home. My half-sister Lexie and my friend Alex live here, too, but he was shot. They’re still at the hospital. She’s staying with him. He’s her boyfriend. Sort of.”

“Isn’t Lexie the young woman who was seeing Mark?” said Carolyn.

Meredith looked at the floor. Her throat croaked before she managed to get a sentence going. “Yes. It didn’t work out.”

Carolyn nodded. “That happens sometimes.” Her gaze paused on the disheveled couch. The cushion Meredith had decked Derek with still lay on the ground. Carolyn didn’t comment.

“I’d offer you coffee or something,” Meredith said, “But we have no milk or half-and-half. Everything went rotten while we were away, and I haven’t been to the store. I’m sorry.”

The bag in Carolyn’s hand crinkled. “It’s fine, Meredith. I just wanted to say goodbye if he was awake. And I wanted to give you this before I forgot again. It’s been stuffed in my suitcase for days, and I kept forgetting to take it out.” She pushed the bag at Meredith.

“Oh,” said Meredith. She took the bag. Something lumpy and soft rested in a big clump at the bottom of the bag. “Thank you, Mrs. Shepherd.”

“Please, call me Carolyn,” Derek’s mother said.

The word felt strange on Meredith’s tongue. “Carolyn,” she corrected. She peered into the bag. A fuzzy, stoplight red pile of wool lay at the bottom. She touched the soft knit and pulled it free of the bag. A long, thin line about four inches thick unfurled. “A scarf?” she said, her eyebrows raised.

Carolyn nodded. “I knit when I worry. I made it on the plane on the way here.”

Meredith’s lip quivered. “You knit.”

“Yes. I didn’t have a plan, but I needed to do something with my hands, and that’s what I made. I wanted you to have it. Red would look lovely with your skin tone, and Derek said you had a white coat that it would go with.”

“I do. Thank you. My toggle coat. I wear it in the fall.” Meredith clenched her fingers. The scarf squashed in her hands, and she resisted the urge to tear at it as nervous energy thrummed through her muscles. “I knit, too,” she said. “Sometimes. Badly. I knit badly.”

Carolyn chuckled. “It helps with surgical dexterity. Even Derek knows how.”
“No way,” Meredith said. “Derek knits?” She couldn't stop the burble of laughter when Carolyn nodded.

When's the knitting start?

“I taught him when he was, oh, about eight, I think,” his mother said. “I don't think he does it anymore, but he knows how. Don't let him tell you differently.”

Carolyn smiled. “You're welcome.” She glanced at her watch. “I need to go. The bus will be at the stop soon.”

“Let me give you a ride to the airport,” Meredith said.

“No, no,” Carolyn said. “You stay with my son. I'll be fine.”

“Are you sure?”

“Positive,” she said. “Thank you for offering.”

As Meredith turned to open the door, she found herself trapped in a strong, warm embrace, the scarf mashed between her body and Carolyn's. Derek's mother smelled like a fresh flower. A rose or something. Her low, soft breathing made Meredith relax before she knew what was happening. Apparently, the talent ran in the family.

“Carolyn,” she said, sort of a verbal tic more than anything else. She didn't have anything to follow it up with. No words. Nothing.

His mother stroked her back. “You'll be fine. Both of you. Thank you for saving my son.”

Meredith had no idea what to say, but it didn't seem to matter. Derek's mother smiled, waved goodbye, and close the door behind herself with a quiet, considerate thud. Meredith heard the rumble of rolling suitcases. She glanced through the window. His mother turned left, oblivious to the rain, and wandered toward the bus stop down the street.
Gray water lapped at the dock supports. Quiet. Sloshing. A heron glided low over the water, flapped its wings, and set itself down in the reeds by the shore. The water spread out like a glass pane, undisturbed save for intermittent pings at the surface that sent ripples spreading outward in lazy rings.

He closed his eyes, leaning back in the lawn chair, and let the muted sun beat down on his face. Pleasant heat soothed his naked skin. He shifted, and the nylons of his wet swim trunks rasped. He scrunched his bare toes, and then he relaxed.

“This isn't really an efficient use of bricks,” Meredith said next to him. “There are more important places.” She lay on her back, sprawled on a black towel in half of a cherry-colored string bikini. The top piece lay in a tiny heap by her hip. She'd baked into a light, soft gold, even all across.

“Red suits you,” he said. Muted sun turned the dark behind his eyelids pink.

“You're ignoring me,” she said.

“Mmm,” he rumbled. “Trying to.”

“You shouldn't ignore me.”

He grinned and turned to her. “Isn't that my line?”

“Well, this is your head, you know.”

“You're right,” he said. “It's mine. And I'll put the bricks where I want.”

“Still...” She sat up. “Why here?”

He sighed and opened his eyes. A thick, high wall surrounded them. It cut a semicircle into the water and wrapped around behind him into the grass, a winding mortar-and-stone serpent. The water wasn't gray. The sun wasn't muted. The wall blocked the light and made it dark.

“You're ruining it, Mere.”

“I'm sorry.”

“I need this.”

“Why?”

“Because,” he said.

He stood, took a running, thumping start, and leaped when his toes dug into the last plank of the dock. His outstretched arms split the water in front of his face. Shocking cold sucked him down into a deep, dark embrace. He torpedoed to the lake floor. His fingers touched the slippery, rippled dirt at the bottom. He tangled with weeds and mud. He came to a rest, pushed his feet against the packed floor, and jetted up, up, up. He broke the surface, spitting water and breathing noisily. He tread water, just a moment, and then closed his eyes and stillled. His body sank into the lake up to his ears, and he floated, listening to the muted sounds of the world.

He floated. Weightless.

Meredith rolled onto her stomach and watched him, chin resting on her palm. She grinned. “Since when are you Mr. Athletic?”

He pushed up with his arms and kicked his feet. His body came out of the lake to his shoulders as he tread water. “I can do whatever I want in here.”

“You can’t out there?”

“I can’t do anything out there.”

“We skinny-dipped. That’s something.”

He swam back to the dock and pulled himself up against the soft, worn wood. She smiled at him, eyes glittering. “Yes,” he said. “I remember. That was a long time ago.”

“But you could do it again. I’m pretty sure I’d say yes if you asked, and I’m me, so I’d know.”

He snorted. “I can’t even take a bath for another four weeks. Maybe five.”

She stroked his face. “But you can do things, Derek. You can.”

“I can’t,” he said. “I can’t do anything.”

He let the water pull him under, and then he dove. Cold gripped his skin. He slipped along through the clear, glacial water like an otter. He grinned when he saw Meredith ahead of him. She’d joined him after all. He kicked with his feet and sped to join her. She stared at him, concerned, standing on the lake floor in her pajama pants and a rumpled t-shirt.

“Derek,” she said, her voice perfectly clear despite being underwater. “Earth to Derek...”

He blinked, and things like chairs and tables and a television appeared in the water. He blinked again, and the water was gone. For a minute, he had no idea where he was or how he'd gotten there, but after a cleansing breath, the world made a bit more sense.

His lake had become the living room in Meredith's house. He sat in a hulking armchair. A pillow propped up his back, pushing into his lower spine. He'd stuffed pillows between his hips and the arms of the chair. And he'd wrapped a comforter around himself while he'd sat in the dim morning light and waited for the pain to stop.

Meredith squinted at him. Her hair kinked and swept to the side in odd, tangled bits, and she seemed pale and tired and not quite awake.

He swallowed and squeezed his fists. The blankets tightened. “Meredith,” he said as he let his eyelids dip. A fuzzy clot of exhaustion stuffed his head behind his eyes. His chest hurt. His back throbbed. Every muscle twinged, and every bone radiated discomfort. But he felt more clear than he had in days or weeks. He rubbed his nose with his index finger.

The clock said 7:30 AM. She'd slept in, and he knew that. He knew that because he saw the clock and cared what time it said instead of just saw. He noticed pictures on the mantle and knickknacks on the tables. Birds chirped, greeting the gray morning outside the windows. The distant hum of a lawnmower intervened in the silence. All things that, in his endless fog, he'd barely noticed.

She sighed and stroked his cheek. “It happened again?”

Her palm felt warm, and he leaned against it. He thought of the hours he'd endured. He'd needed to sit up, but the flimsy chair in their room had only made it worse, made him need to move, discomfort nipping close at his heels. He'd gone in search of something more comfortable, only to discover, once he'd gotten downstairs, that nothing helped. He'd alternated between sitting and moving, stumbling laps around the house, kitchen to dining room to living room to foyer to kitchen. He hadn't been able to get more than thirty minutes ahead of the pain. He'd worn himself down to the point that stumbling didn't even help, and so he'd collapsed, but before then, he'd been productive. Sort of.

“I made coffee,” he said.

“I saw. Thank you,” she said. But she didn't sound happy.

She pulled at the pillow by his left hip, and it popped loose. What had been pinging pebbles of discomfort on a precarious mountainside slope rolled into a raging avalanche of pain. He clenched his jaw, withholding a grunt. She nudged him, and she stuffed her tiny body into the space where the pillow had been, but the support came too late to stop the landslide. He shifted, ending in an awkward, hooked pose against the arm of the chair, but it didn't help. His muscles trembled.

He didn't think he could stand, but he needed to stand. Or do something. Anything.

“We need to move a chair upstairs,” Meredith said. “One that you like. We'll trade it with the one I have up there now by the window in our room until you're better.”

“Meredith—” he said, breathless.

“Mark's coming over today,” she babbled, ignoring him. “I'll make him help me. He's big. We could move a chair for you.”

“Meredith—”

“No,” she snapped at him. “No. You shouldn't have to come down here in the middle of the night because you have no freaking chair. It's ridiculous. It's freaking ridiculous, Derek. We'll move a chair.”

He clenched the arm of the chair so hard his hand shook. Nausea rolled in as somebody stabbed him with a burning rod, and a line of hot pain ran him through from his nipple to his spine. “Mere, I—” His voice choked off into a low bark of suffering, and then he couldn't speak. The stitched line down his chest flared with brilliant, technicolor sparks. Every breath made it worse, but every throbbing pulse made him breathe.

She gripped his arm and clenched until her nails dug into his skin, but the discomfort she caused was immaterial mixed in with all the rest. “You haven't taken your pills yet?” she said, her voice low and tense.

“No.” He gasped. “They're upstairs.”

Tears welled up in her eyes. She looked at him. Really, really looked at him. “Okay,” she said. “Okay, hold on. I'll get them, you sit.” He had to move, but she clenched his shoulder and pushed him down. “Sit, Derek. I'll get them. I'm getting them. Don't move; you'll just make it worse.”
Her palm swiped at her face, she made a wet, snot-filled sound as she inhaled, and she darted out of the chair and the room. She flew up the steps, her panic giving her strides a weight that vibrated the whole house and made him feel worse. Worse for not being well enough that this wasn't an issue.

He was a grown man. He should be able to come downstairs at night and not have it be the end of the world. She was grumpy and tired because of him. Because she woke herself up at all hours to care for him and for his needs while she ignored her own. He wanted to tell her it wasn't her fault. She'd missed her alarm by two hours on her day off. Hardly a crime after he'd woken her up at midnight and again at one-thirty.

He tried to go back to the lake while he waited for her to rescue him again, but everything seemed too sharp. Too distinct. Barbed, painful pants ran through his lungs. He couldn't sit still. He stood, dragging the comforter with him. Everything hurt, and he wandered with aimless, shuffling steps as he tried to flee. Years passed. When her hands touched his shoulder, he caught the vague sight of her crying, and he knew it was his fucking fault.

“Sit, Derek,” she said. “This isn't helping.” She corralled him back into the chair he'd been resting in, and she pushed a cold, sloshing glass of water into his hand. “You should have called upstairs. I have my cell phone. Or you could have yelled. I know yelling hurts, but come on. Anything, Derek. I can't believe I slept through my alarm. I can't believe you let me.” Her lip quivered as she plied him with pill after pill after pill, until he wasn't sure he could make himself swallow anymore. The last one stuck in his throat and made him want to choke.

Three Percocet, one Oxycontin, and his antibiotics, all at once. That was a lot. They settled in his stomach with the cold, spreading chill of the water. “Gonna overdose,” he said when he found a thought. He tried to swallow the last dregs of water, but most of it dribbled down his chin.

“You're not going to overdose.” She sniffled. “You lapsed everything. You freaking let everything lapse, and now we need to start over.”

She took the glass from his slack hands. This was going to hit him hard, but he didn't think he cared. Not when breathing hurt this much. She settled back into the chair beside him. Her palms rasped against the comforter as she stroked his shoulder. He pulled the blanket tight.

“Meredith, this isn't your fault,” he said. Barely. Not being able to inhale gave him no air to work with, and his voice sounded miles away.

“No, it's yours, you stubborn... stupid...” Her face reddened, and she clenched her tiny fists as she searched for an appropriately derogatory noun.

“Ass?” he said. He tried to smile.

“Shut up.” Her gaze flared bright with fury. “Just shut up, or I'll yell at you, which would, in this moment, put me on the same level as Satan in terms of evil.” She ground her teeth, and her lip quivered. She stroked his arm, and she wept instead of yelled. “I'm sorry it hurts so much. I'm sorry.”

He watched her face and counted every soft freckle. He could still do that. For a minute. The knives dulled a fraction, enough to make him think maybe he would ease his way back into this. But then the narcotics hit him like a runaway Buick. He blinked, but his eyelids stuck, and he could barely open them again. The faucet behind his eyes dripped once, twice, and then the flow became a rushing roar. His body didn't seem attached anymore. The pain left him, replaced by pleasant, spreading numb.
He rolled his lips together. “Are you gone...” he managed. She looked at him strangly. His tongue felt thick in his mouth. He couldn't work it right. Tired. He swallowed. “Are you gonnna yell when I wake up?” he slurred. But he didn't hear the answer.

A great wave of disorientation tugged him down into its undertow, and the black crush swept him away.

He woke up to muzzy, black stillness, not sure what had startled him out of slumber. Soft, thick blankets and cotton sheets held him in a warm cocoon. His eyelids dipped. He didn't want to be awake. Not now. He rolled over and burrowed, but then he heard it again. A soft, clipped sob through the wall.

He sighed, groaned, and pushed back the blankets. Cold air made him shiver as he forced himself to his feet. Muffled, blurry shapes formed a forest around him, but he knew their locations by heart. His dresser. His desk. The bed. He didn't stumble as he padded to his door.

All the doors in the hallway remained shut. A tiny, soft nightlight glowed from a plug in by the floor molding, lighting the way for anybody who needed to use the bathroom at the end of the hall. Shadows crept along the wall as he moved. His bare feet scrunched against the carpet runner.

Amelia sobbed again.

He knocked on the door, squinting, trying to wake up. “Amy,” he whispered.

“Go away,” she said.

He turned the knob and walked into her room. She sat in her bed, huddled under her comforter in the dark. Her eyes sparkled with tears.

“What's wrong?” he said as he settled next to her on the mattress. He rubbed her back, and she cried as she curled up against his body.

“There's something in my closet.”

He sighed. “Amy, there's nothing in your closet.”

“There is,” she said. “It made a noise.”

She shivered in his grasp. He hugged her. “There's no such thing as monsters, Amy. Your closet is safe. I promise.”

“Daddy scared them away,” she said. “But now they're back, and nobody believes me. I want Daddy.”

His throat closed up, and he froze. For a minute, he couldn't do anything but sit there, hollowed out and dead inside. She whimpered, gathering up pieces of his flannel pants in her fingers. She sniffed and sobbed, and he rubbed her back. His breaths hitched. He disentangled from her warm body, and he stood. He let himself sniff once. Twice. And then he wiped his face and turned to face her.

“Well, you're in luck,” Derek said, surprised his voice didn't sound weak or wavering. “Dad taught me all his secrets.” He inched toward Amy's closet, faux-cautious, and pulled the door open while she watched. He waved his foot over the floor of the closet, and he ruffled all her clothes, making deep, concerned noises as he inspected everything. “I don't see anything, Amy.”
She bit her lip. “What about the shoe rack?”

He thumped through every pair of shoes, careful to check the cavity of each one with his fingers. “Monster free,” he assured her. She didn't look convinced. He tried to think of what Dad might have done. Maybe a theatrical production full of tricks and slights, but Derek didn't know anything like that. He walked to her desk and rifled through the top drawer. Scotch tape. He pulled a piece free and kissed the non-sticky side.

“This is special,” he said. “If something happens, it will hold the door. I'm right in the next room, Amy. Nothing's going to get you.” He taped the door to the frame and patted it. “Okay?”

“Okay,” she said.

“Go to sleep,” he told her. He pulled up her covers, and she snuggled under the blankets with her bear.

He shut her door and returned to his room. His chest quivered. He crawled back into bed, feeling tired and wasted. He stuck his face against the pillow, and he cried. Not loud and sobbing like his mom or like Amelia. His eyes leaked. That was it. His family wouldn't ever know.

His mouth felt dry and gummy, and his eyes didn't want to open. He'd mashed his cheek against something soft and familiar. Breaths rasped in his chest, thick and long and even. A noise stuck on his vocal cords, and his hand flopped at his side with some useless impulse his brain had sent. Solid warmth wrapped his body. For a long time, he didn't move. The comforter rustled. He pushed his face against the soft, familiar thing.

The dull murmur of voices hit his eardrums. People. Talking. People there. His hand flopped again, and he groaned. A vague sense of unease spread through his body like creeping moss. The voices got louder. Yelling. Fighting. His leg twitched. He should move. Get up. Something might... Someone might...

The warmth around his body constricted, and a thick thing rolled over his back. Soothing. “Shh,” said a voice. “Sleep it off some more.”

“What,” he said, but he couldn't finish the thought. He lost himself in the murmur, in the warmth. The voice kept saying quiet words that made him feel safe despite the noise. He didn't know how long he lay there, curled against the soft thing, not moving, not thinking, just safe.

His eyes creaked open to daylight and a pale, cream-colored blur. He closed his eyes and rested from that effort. A big, rumbling sigh tore through his body. Ache twinged, which chipped away at his stupor.

When he opened his eyes again, he forced them to stay open. Focus followed after a long stretch of warmth and cream-colored blur and nothingness. Meredith's neck. The soft thing. She still sat in the chair beside him, exactly where she'd been when he'd passed out. In sleep, he'd curled against her. The bulky comforter made him large and unwieldy in her arms, but she'd managed. Mostly.

“Meredith,” he murmured. His tongue felt wrong. Heavy.

She looked at him. “Welcome back,” she said. She rubbed his back through the comforter. He felt like a sloth. He couldn't bring himself to move or speak or do anything but exist. “Sort of welcome back,” she amended.

Her fingers toiled with the hair at the nape of his neck. She stared at something far beyond the chair. The twitter of voices hit his ears again. He twitched from head to toe. His muscles didn't want to give him much. Lethargy cowed him into stillness, but the voices made him feel like he should be attempting to look and act human. To be aware and ready to defend himself.

“Who's here?” he said, the words stretched and chewy like a Starburst in his mouth. He let his jaw hang open. His tongue lolled. His mouth and throat felt dry. Dry like Death Valley in August.

“Just you, me, and Jerry Springer,” Meredith said. A silver thing waved in his face, too close to his eyes, and he couldn't process it before she took it away.

She snorted. “Well, I would hope not, though I suppose our lives might fit with some of his themes. Born into an adulterous marriage, and loved only by my fake parents? Slutty home-wreckers and the adulterous men who love them? My ex-wife cheated on me with my brother, and now she wants me back?”

He blinked. “Huh?”

“The television, Derek. Jerry Springer is a talk show. There's nothing but trash on right now because morning programming sucks.”

“Oh.” He breathed thickly while she stroked him, and then his awareness faded. He dozed, not quite sleeping, not awake either, for an indeterminate time that could have been hours or days or minutes. Lazy shapes floated in his head, not any assembled thoughts.

Necessities pulled him out of it. One by one, until he had a stack of them piled high enough that they outweighed his lethargy. He needed water. He needed food. And he really, really needed to pee. He stood up before he understood anything other than those three things.

The room whirled around his head, and he swallowed. “Whoa,” he said as black waterfalls robbed the color from his vision. The floor tilted. Something gripped him around the waist. He didn't fall.

When he came to himself, he stood in the center of Meredith's living room, clutched in Meredith's arms. She stared at him, concern creasing her gaze. Something else, too. Anger. “Would you stop doing that?” she snapped. “You nearly fall, every freaking time.”

He blinked. “Meredith,” he said, too dumbstruck to say much else. “What?”

“Stop standing up like it's a freaking race!” she said.

His face heated at her tone, as if she thought he would willfully make a fucking fool of himself. As if she thought he liked being helpless and held upright by his wife. “I need to use the bathroom,” he said. “I'm sorry if my fucking bladder got hold of my brain before I did.”

She bit her lip. “I'm sorry,” she said. “I'm sorry, it's just that...” Her voice trailed away. She wouldn't meet his eyes.

“Just what?” he snapped.

“I guess I could call in sick tomorrow,” she said to his feet.

Since you obviously can't be by yourself for more than two minutes. Her unspoken words banged around inside his skull, repeating. His fingers clenched, and the backs of his eyes stabbed at him. “Let go of me,” he said in a low voice.
She backed off and looked away. For a minute, he had to think. Clots in his reasoning made the process slow. His brain reviewed the layout of the house at the speed of a snail. Bathroom. Right.

He didn't have to sit to urinate anymore at least, though trying to aim while he was so fucking impaired almost made him want to. A sneering Gary Clark hovered in the mirror as Derek washed his hands. Derek's face reddened, and his shoulders hunched. He panted with disquiet, and Mr. Clark seemed to smile wider every time Derek took a stabbing breath. “Stop,” Derek whispered. When he blinked, the apparition disappeared, leaving Derek staring at a gaunt, haunted, stubbly disaster case with glassy, unfocused eyes. When his stomach growled, he sighed and looked away.

Water. Food. Kitchen next. When he got there, Meredith had already sat down at the table. She'd put out a bowl and a spoon and a glass of OJ for him. A carton of milk sat on the table next to a box of Muesli. She sat opposite to the place she'd set for him, munching on her breakfast. She ate cereal as well, but he couldn't make out the writing on her box from the entryway, and by the time he'd gotten close enough to read, the momentary spark of curiosity had died.

“If you want something else, you can fix it yourself,” she said, tone neutral.

He sat and slumped in his chair. “This is fine, thank you.”

They ate in stony silence. She inhaled three bowls of cereal doused in milk to the brim of the bowl. He consumed maybe three-quarters of a bowl before he lost interest. The Muesli tasted like sawdust, and when his stomach stopped growling, he couldn't bring himself to care about it anymore.

He stared at his lap, tired, angry, with a side of roiling, consuming upset that made him feel like he was on the verge of tears. She was pissed at him, and he didn't like it, and that made his anger even worse, because he felt like it was something he couldn't help. Everything was something he couldn't help.

“Are you still hurting?” Meredith said. Her spoon tinkled as she set it against her empty bowl. The spoon spun around the lip before settling.

“No.”

“Good,” she said. Her eyes twitched. Like she wanted to say more. Was dying to say more, but she was holding herself back. Except the strong, dissonant waves of anger radiating from her made him feel chastised all the same. She saved him nothing, and on top of that, he felt worse, because she felt he was bad off enough that she needed to censor herself.

He put his elbows on the table and rubbed his forehead, wishing it would all just stop. Everything. He swallowed against the lump in his throat. His shoulders hunched. “I didn't mean to upset you,” he told his bowl of mushy cereal because he didn't want to see her glaring at him anymore.

“Why didn't you wake me when this started?”

“Because I already woke you!” he said. Blush broke out all over his face, and he pulled bunches of the tablecloth into his hands. His teeth clenched. “I woke you twice! You needed sleep, and by then it was a lost cause for me. I can get down the stairs by myself. I'm fine.”

“You're not fine,” she said. “You're high as a freaking kite, it's dark at night, and you might fall. As it is, you got trapped down here while I freaking overslept, and then you had to behave like a damned superhero and not call me when it was time to take your pills.”

“I lost track of time,” he said. “I didn't mean to do it.”
“Fine,” Meredith said. “Fine, we can call this an accident, but—”

“It was an accident,” he roared. He pushed back from the table and stood. “I came downstairs because it hurts me to lie flat for more than a few hours, and then I got stuck down here. I went to the lake and lost track of the fucking time. That's all. Maybe I'm stubborn, but I'm not a masochist.”

“The lake?”

He blinked, brought up short. “The lake?”

“You said you went to the lake.”

“Nothing,” he said. “A daydream.”

“You still should have woke me,” she said. “Before.”

“I can get down the steps by myself, Meredith.”

She stomped her foot. Her chair squealed as she rose to meet him eye-to-eye. “And just because you can doesn't mean you should!”

He clenched his jaw. He tried to count to three. He made it to one, and then he exploded. “I tell you when I need to go upstairs, and I tell you when I need my pillows moved, and I tell you when I can't reach something on the top shelf of the fucking closet because it hurts, and I tell you all the other things I can't do. I'm a fucking invalid already, and now you want me to wake you up from a sound sleep to help me with one of the few things I can manage on my own? Jesus Christ, Meredith. I'm trying, but I can't...” He panted, and his sight blanketed with tears. The back of his throat hurt. He didn't want to cry, but his body betrayed him. He wiped his face with shaky palms. They came away wet and sticky, and his torso shivered with emotional stress. “Do you have any idea how humiliating this is for me? I'm not even allowed to pick up a full jug of milk.”

She sighed. Through the blur, he watched her wipe at her face. In the intense, disturbing racket of his own misery, he'd missed her crying while he'd roared. Her soft, distressed sobs hit his ears now like deep, rending tears in his soul. Guilt plunged deep into his gut, and his body quivered. He hadn't meant to yell. He hadn't meant any of this. Tired, cottony exhaustion spun webs behind his eyes, and he closed his eyes. In the blackness, he felt the room revolve around his body in slow, disorienting circles.

She moved. Her arms wrapped around him. “Derek. Derek, I know that you're physically able to walk down the steps. I do. I really do. I've watched you. And I swear I'm not trying to take that away,” she said, her voice soft against his body. Her fingers wound through his hair. “I'm just really worried you'll fall because of all the stuff you're on, and I won't find out until the morning when I step on the broken heap that was my husband. Please. Please, I already saw you in a broken heap once. I don't want to do it again. Please, Derek.”

He leaned into her embrace and set his palms against her hips. “I'm sorry, Meredith. I'm really sorry.”

“I'm sorry, too,” she said. “I'm tired, and I've got no freaking right to take it out on you. I just hate to see you in so much pain.”

“I woke you up.”

Her fingers clenched, and his shirt tightened as she scrunched it in her grip. “Actually, Derek, I slept like crap, and you had very little to do with it. I'm a resident at one of the nation's top hospitals. Do you honestly think your two five-minute interruptions made a dent in my night? Not hardly.”

“Oh.”

“Seriously,” she grumbled against his chest. “Inflated ego much?”

A woeful shard of laughter shivered in his chest. Ache slipped into his sternum. Tears leaked, despite the momentary mirth. “I'm sorry,” he repeated.

“It's okay,” she said. She kissed his throat, and then she kissed his chest. “But will you please wake me up for downstairs trips from now on? Please? For my own peace of mind?”

“Yeah,” he said. His muscles trembled, and he added with soft defeat, “I need to sit.”

“Okay,” she said.

He heard the refrigerator door open and close as he plodded into the living room like a tranquilized, clumsy elephant. She put the milk away or something. Dishes clanked. Water ran. He sank into the chair he’d occupied that morning. The pillows settled under his weight. He relaxed and pulled the comforter around himself, curling up in the warmth. She joined him minutes later, slipping under the blankets with him. Her tiny body lined up with his hip and shoulder. She lay her head against the unmarred side of his chest, spread her right arm against his stomach, and curled against him like a small cat.

At least that didn't hurt anymore. He could be thankful for that.

“I arranged with Richard to do 12 hour shifts on the weekends and on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and 10 hour shifts on Tuesdays and Thursdays,” she said. “Nothing over night. I'll be home every night and in the mornings, at least, and I'll still be putting in hours up to the cap.”

“You won't have any breaks,” he said. His lip quivered.

She rubbed her palm idly against the flat of his stomach. “I can manage for a few weeks,” she said.

He thought of her trying to manage that schedule by herself, no breaks, not a single day off, and when she got home, she would be helping him with all the I-can't-do-it-by-myselfs he'd stacked up in a figurative pile for the day. She would be helping him, not relaxing or doing things for her own enjoyment. Even for just a few weeks. That would be awful for her. Exhausting. Stressful.

He swallowed as the tears renewed, and he looked away from her, into the side of the chair. Hot, awful blush spread over his face and down his neck. Her palms captured his face in a prison. She pulled him back to face her eye-to-eye. “Hey,” she said. “You'd do it for me. You have done it for me. When I had my surgery. We take care of each other. Remember? That's what the Post-it says.”

“I remember what it says,” he said.

“You're not an invalid, Derek.”

“I feel like one.”

“You're healing,” she said. She stroked his cheek with her palm. “It hasn't even been two weeks. It sucks. I know it does, but... Don't sell yourself short. You're the strongest person I know. You are, Derek.”
You're not the man, here. I'm the man.

Derek looked away. “Stop saying that.”

“Stop saying what?”

“Stop saying I'm strong like I had something to do with this. I was going to die. I'm still alive because the fucking universe thought it would be funny.”

“Derek...”

“You told me when you drowned that you had an experience. You had a choice. You chose to fight.”

She nodded. “I did.”

“It wasn't like that for me,” he said. Something upsetting and terrifying coiled in his gut. He clutched her and rested his forehead against her temple. “It wasn't... He shot me. He shot me, Meredith, and I couldn't do anything. I couldn't get away. Something distracted him, and he left me there. He left me.”

You're not the man here.

“But I found you,” she soothed. “It's over, now. It's over. He's dead. And you're alive. Just like you promised.”

“But I lied. My promise was a lie. I thought...”

“You were attacked and shot in the chest at close range. You were in shock. You were in pain. Thinking you're going to die in a situation like that? Not the biggest stretch in the universe. But you're alive, Derek. You're alive. That's not a lie to me,” she said. She placed a finger against his lips. “You breathing? Not a lie.” A palm against his heart. “Your heart beating? Not a lie.” A kiss against his shoulder. “Whether you thought you meant your promise or not, you lived, and no one will ever convince me that's not at least a little bit on you.”

He swallowed. The room spun away from him, and he watched the ceiling flicker bright with wide open grayness as he fell onto his back. April said words, but he couldn't understand. He couldn't breathe, and then Gary Clark aimed the gun at him. Derek blinked. The image made a ghost imprint in his mind's eye. A gun. Pointed. Ready to kill.

“Everybody saved me but me,” Derek said.

She stared at him, eyes determined, glittering. “We work at a hospital,” she said. “We see death every day. We both know that people who want to die usually find a way. Their bodies shut down, or they off themselves, or... whatever. Metaphysics or physics, they find a way. A man attacked you and left you with a penetrating chest trauma that came a hair's width from severing your aorta. You were suffocating in your own blood. Gary Clark pushed you through the door, Derek. You had your foot in, your leg, maybe even your hip. You could have easily died if you'd let yourself go, and you lived anyway.” She kissed him. “To me? That's not strong,” she said against his lips. “That's Herculean.”

He swallowed. “My heart stopped.”

“I know, but it's beating, now,” she said. As if to emphasize her point, she pushed her ear against his chest. Not over his heart, not pressing. Gentle. Careful to avoid the incision on his sternum. She listened for a long moment. He let her. A lazy smile spread over her lips. “It's beating now, Derek,” she said. “And that's what counts. You won't ever convince me you're not strong. So, stop trying.”

He didn't understand her determination. He collapsed under the weight of it, unwilling to argue anymore. “I'm just so tired,” he said. “I need it to stop.”

Her palm rasped against his shirt. “I know,” she said. “I'll have Mark help me with this chair when he gets here. You won't need to do stairs in the middle of the freaking night. This chair is good, right?”

He sighed. “I'm sorry for making this hard.”

“It's not your fault, Derek. It's not. Gary Clark did this. Not you. You need to stop apologizing for that.”

“I know you had to bargain with Dr. Altman to get me released early,” he said. “I know you took it upon yourself to be my caregiver. I hate it. I hate needing help with everything, but I'm trying, Mere. I'm trying.”

“I know,” she said, her voice soft. “I know you are. I thought it was going to be a nightmare getting you to wake me up for things.”

He gave her a weak smile. “Do I get a sticker?”

“I guess that's worth at least a few.”

“Gold stars?”

She yawned, and she snuggled closer. The blanket rustled, and she made a low, pleasant noise in her throat. “If you want.”

“I think I do,” he said. “I'm a gold star kind of guy.”

She lifted her head. “I'd give you thousands if I had them,” she said.

“Now, who's getting cheesy?”

She smiled, and she settled back against him without answering. Her hand rubbed his stomach, idle, almost absent, and she stared across the plane of his torso. He stroked her back, wishing he could move just a bit to pull her into an embrace, but she'd pretty much pinned him.

“Mere?” he said. “Mere, are you okay?”

“I'm fine.”

“Really fine? Or lying fine?”

“Right now?” She looked at him with a relaxed, dreamy smile. Her eyes seemed glazed, but with sleep and nothing else. “I'm snuggling with my amazing, alive, gold star husband. I'm pretty fine. Why?”

“Just...” He inhaled. “You never say anything about... I mean. You were hurt, too. He didn't shoot you, but he took something from you. From us. And you saw me get shot. That's not the sort of imagery that goes away with time.”

Shit! Take his watch, and let's go.
“I'm really okay, Derek.”

“No nightmares?” he pressed. “Nothing? Why couldn't you sleep last night?”

“I do have nightmares,” she admitted. “I think about it a lot. You nearly dying. The baby, sometimes. I don't remember dreaming last night. Maybe it was that. I don't know.”

“But?”

She shrugged. “I told you. I decided I'm fine,” she said. “And if I'm ever not fine, all I have to do is look at you breathing, and it's okay again. I really meant it, Derek. The rest of it is meaningless if I don't have you. You're alive, and you're healing, and we can make another baby whenever you're ready. In light of that? I'm fine. I'm more than fine.”

“I didn't think it would last when you explained it before,” he said.

“You're alive,” she said. “You kept your promise, lie or not. The fine will last until you're 110.”

He blinked. “110?”

“Remember?” She grinned. “You told me you wanted to live to 110 and die in my arms.”

He stretched his memory through the fog. So much had happened. He'd said a lot of things. “Oh, yes. I did say that, didn't I? That was one of my finer gold star moments, I think. Very waxed poetic.” What if, while I'm waiting, I meet someone who is ready to give me what I want from you? His heart sank when he thought of the rest of it. “Well…”

“What?”

“Until I threatened you at the end. About finding somebody else. That wasn't so amazing of me.”

She snorted. “I prefer to think of it as a much needed jump. My capacity-for-relationships battery was sort of dead.”

He looked at his lap. “It was still wrong to say.”

“It was, but it's what you used to do with me. I didn't get it before. I do, now. I do, and it's okay.”

“What do you mean?”

Her eyes searched his face. A ghost crossed her gaze. “When you were shot, you were barely lucid for a lot of it. I kept having to hit you. Over and over, and I hated it. I hated it, but I needed to get a response out of you. I needed to keep you with me. So, I did it anyway. I hit you,” she said. “It's the same concept, really, with your crappy ultimatums. I was in emotional shock. You just wanted me to react, so you hit me. You weren't trying to drive me away, and I get that now. You were trying to get me to pull closer.”

His lips flattened into a line, and he clenched his fists. “You can't compare those.”

“Why not?” she said.

“Because me playing Russian roulette with your insecurities as a fucking bullet is not the same as you saving my life. Not even remotely.”

“Let's compare your games to me using you for sex, then,” she said, blunt and matter-of-fact. “I knew you wanted more than I could give you. I knew it, and I had sex with you anyway, because it made me feel safe. Safe, Derek. I treated you like a doormat so I could feel safe for a few minutes out of the day. I used you.”

His body stilled. He listened to her take a long, slow breath. Quiet. He let his eyes drift shut, and he thought of all the times she’d done that. All the times they’d had sex in the space of minutes, quickies, and yet she’d always stopped for that pause before she left. The pause in the end, where he wrapped his arms around her, and they panted in soft, tired unison. That pause had always given him a false, leaping sense of hope that she would stay for longer than minutes. That she would stay forever. But she’d always dragged herself away with a look that told him, despite her hangups, despite all of it, she wanted what he wanted, even if she didn't think she could give it to him.

“You never told me that,” he said.

And then you pulled me from the water...

“Told you what?”

“Why,” he said.

“Oh. The safe thing.” Her lashes dipped low over her eyes, and she smiled. “You always make me feel safe. But I really needed it then. I needed it so much.”

“I let it happen, Meredith. I could have said no.”

“But you didn't,” she said. She toiled with a lock of his hair. “Because you loved me. And I used that. I used it, and I shouldn't have. It wasn't fair to you.” She swallowed, and her voice cracked. “But I needed it.”

“Mere...”

She wiped her eyes. “Look. My point is, we both did bad things. We both did. I'm the one who wasted time, though. I should have said it sooner.”

“Said what?”

She kissed him, lips to lips, and he moaned as her tongue stroked him. Their noses mashed, and she lingered, breathing in his space. “I should have said that I love you.”

Her body against his intoxicated him. Where the drugs made him hazy, she made him hot and alive and shaky. A fool, but in a different way. He inhaled the scent of her hair, lavender, and he kissed her temple.

Your choice? It's simple. Her or me.

“You did say it sooner, Meredith,” he murmured. “And then I chose Addison and wrecked it.”

Her body trembled in his arms. She made a small, wheezing, gasping noise that made him think she might be choking. He flopped against the chair, discombobulated with sudden panic stomped under the weight of a ton of narcotics. “Meredith,” he said, and she shivered against him. “Meredith, what is it?”

Tremors became giggles became rolling guffaws. He sat there, dumbfounded, blinking, and feeling very much the fool when he still couldn't figure out what was going on, even after he knew she was laughing. Had he tripped on his tongue and said something stupid? He couldn't remember saying something funny.
She panted against him, recovering, and then she looked at him, her eyes red but sparkling with happy, streaking tears. She wiped at her eyes, and then she laughed again. “How did we go from gold stars and pep talks to an argument about who sucks more?”

His lip twitched. “I have no idea.”

She kissed him. “I love you.”

“I love you, too,” he replied.

“Nobody sucks more,” she said. “We're equally suck-y. Let's be even, now. No more baggage crap. Okay?”

He raised an eyebrow. “I thought that's what the Post-it was for?”

“It was, but we never really had it out, I guess. Never really...” She searched for words. “I'm not sure I even understood any of it before. I guess I have a bit of perspective now, or whatever.”

He smiled. “Not an intern anymore?”

“I guess I finally graduated.”

He closed his eyes. “Hmm,” he agreed, and when she didn't reply, he drifted, tired.

“Derek?” she said after a long pause.

“Yeah?”

“You haven't said anything about it either.”

He swallowed, trying to remember. It. What was it? He blinked, and he thought, and he came up with nothing but the vague sense that he'd forgotten a large chunk of the conversation again, which made him feel bad. His brain felt like a cloud. Thick but not solid. Retaining nothing.

“About what?” he said.

She rubbed his arm. “The miscarriage,” she said. “Are you okay?”

He turned to her and stared through a half-lidded gaze at her outline. Gray light fell in through the windows, and he sighed. The miscarriage. That it. He settled against her and listened to her blood rush under her skin. The warmth of her skin seeped through her shirt into his skin.

“Derek?”

He blinked, torn from mental wandering. “I'm sorry.”

She scrunched her face in disgust. “Stop saying that. Seriously.”

“I don't know,” he said.

She placed her palms against his and gripped his hand. “You don't know if you're okay?”

“No.”

“About the miscarriage?” she prodded.

“I don't know. About anything.” He turned his face against her neck, and he sighed. “I'm tired,” he said. “All the time. I don't know.”

“Scale of 1 to 10?” she said.

He thought. For a long time. She waited, stroking his hand.

He wrapped his thumb and index finger around her wrist. His fingers met easily. Overlapped, even. She was such a petite woman. Tiny. He could never get used to it. He wasn't a large man. At 5'10", he was a hair taller than the national average, but he had a small frame. Not like Mark, who bulked into the size of a truck when he really spent time working on it. Despite that, Derek dwarfed her in all but spirit. His thumb brushed the vein in her wrist. A strong pulse fluttered under his touch. He slipped his palm under her shirt. Her skin shivered. His hand almost spanned her stomach. Her abdomen, flat as a board despite her horrible diet, gave a little under the pressure of his touch. She breathed against his ear, relaxed, and he closed his eyes.

He thought of a baby growing there, thought of how she would swell. He imagined listening to the heartbeat for the first time. Thought about arguing over names. Envisioned the moment when she would tug at his sleeve in the middle of the night and tell him she was in labor, and he would fall out of bed and trip all over himself trying to get her and her suitcase and himself out to the car in one piece.

Gary Clark had taken that from him. From them. Derek had made love to Meredith, made another life, and that was all gone. In an eye blink. In a whorl of agony. And he hadn't even been awake to help her through it. She hadn't even had a chance to tell him she was pregnant before Mr. Clark had robbed them all blind.

All of it was gone. His health. His baby. His peace of mind. People had died. People with kids. People with loved ones. Others had gotten hurt. Karev. Him. Meredith had abandonment issues, and he'd almost died on her. She didn't need more dark and twisty in her life. She'd lived through plenty.

“All,” he said softly.

She didn't reply, didn't say a word. She wrapped him in her arms, and she sat with him. Quiet. Tiredness gripped his body. He pressed his nose into her neck and breathed. Lavender. Some unidentifiable spice from her lotion. The cotton behind his eyes made it hard to think, and so he didn't. He rested, almost dozing, but not quite, while she held him.

He didn't know how much time passed, but it seemed like hours.

A horrible, raucous growl hit his ears, and he jumped. He hunched over the arm of the chair, panting, and for an interminable moment, he hovered, lost somewhere in the unmapped back roads of panic. Dulled senses and reflexes and hurting muscles trapped him. His mouth fell open. Fear pushed into his legs, and he flopped in the chair, stuck in the grips of drug and sleep-induced disorientation. Get up. His body twitched. Get up. Get up. Meredith squeezed his shoulder and blurted a startled, “What?”

The cushion shifted as she turned toward the noise. A low hiss followed the growl, and familiarity sunk in. Air brakes. Big vehicle. He looked through the window in the direction of the sound and saw a hulking garbage truck rolling down the street. His body shivered as he tried to get himself to calm down.

“It's just a garbage truck,” Meredith said.
“I know what it is,” he snapped.

He gave into the repeated impulses and stood. She stood with him, and for a minute, all he could do was tremble. He knew what the noise was, but it was loud, and it hovered in the air, full forte and grating. He made himself breathe, made himself walk off the stress.

“Stairs?” she said as he came to an awkward stop at the foot of the stairs.

“Yeah,” he decided. “I want to take a shower.”

He'd learned over the past few days to take the steps as single entities and not as a greater whole. If he knew he would want to go upstairs at some point, he had to give himself a thirty minute lead. Maybe more. He couldn't cut his transition time any closer than that, or the steps morphed from something difficult into something torturous. If he needed to sleep, if he needed it right now, he'd already passed the point of attempting such an arduous journey. With those rules, he'd managed to avoid another painful disaster like the one he'd had the day he'd come home.

He gripped the railing, forced himself to breathe, and fought gravity one step at a time. Just one. He waited after every step. If one step went well, he let himself take another. If it didn't, he rested. Thirty seconds. Sometimes a minute. Meredith echoed his movements, her hand on the small of his back to give him some support. She never spoke to him while he did this, not unless he showed signs of collapse or unless he spoke first.

Somewhere between halfway and two-thirds to his goal, he needed to rest for longer than a minute. Closer to five. Meredith waited by his side. Patient. Silent. As much as he loved her, he tried to imagine her not there. He didn't like needing help with this. He didn't like being stared at while he struggled. He didn't like needing to plan and prepare for stairs like they were long car trips. When he caught his breath, and his heart slowed, he continued.

By the time he made it to the top, he didn't feel like he was dying. That was progress, he supposed, though he had to rest again. He leaned his back against the wall and panted. He held her shoulder for balance with a weak grip, and he sucked down air again, again, and again. Breathing hurt.

“Derek,” she said, breaking her silence. “That was a huge improvement. That was really, really great.”

He looked at her. “Yeah,” he said, panting. “Twelve minutes for a flight of steps. Really, really great.”

The skin around her eyes twitched like he'd struck her, and his sarcastic armor deflated.

“I'm sorry,” he said. “I'm sorry, Meredith.”

“It's okay,” she said.

“It's not okay. I'm being a giant ass.”

She kissed him. “I get it, Derek. I do. You get mad at yourself. You want to run it off and hit things, but you can't, and so you yell. It's okay. And I know it doesn't feel like it, but, Derek, really. You're doing great. More than great.”

“Gold star?” he said.

She laughed. “At least three.”
After he caught his breath, he moved. Slowly.

When he reached the bathroom, he shucked his socks, pajamas, and shirt, and he tried not to feel self conscious. Meredith had removed the bandages last night before they'd gone to bed, and she hadn't replaced them. Nothing covered his wounds from sight but stitches and wretched scabs. At least she didn't stare or smirk or make a comment while she stood there, clothed, and he stood there, naked and covered in gnarly scars.

Actually, her gaze didn't stray below his face at all, which felt... even more weird. She always used to sneak a peek whenever he changed in front of her. Sometimes she'd act coy. Sometimes, she'd meet the grin he flashed at her with a brazen lick of her lips and a sparkly, come hither stare that made it hard for him to dress in the mornings sometimes. Hard for him to leave and go to work.

He lined himself up with the cool porcelain of the tub, and he slid back the shower door. She helped him step over the lip of the tub. Another thing he couldn't do by himself, he'd discovered. He didn't have the balance, and the tub had nothing to grasp, or at least nothing that he could reach without stretching to the point of searing pain.

“Okay?” she said.

“Yeah,” he replied as he turned on the water.

“Okay,” she said. The bathroom door closed, and she left him alone for a while.

For a long moment, he blanked, staring at the shower knobs and the plastic rack under the shower head where Meredith kept her razor and lotion and other things. The air hazed and steamed, and a lightheaded, faraway feeling spun webs in his skull. He placed a palm against the wall for balance as his thoughts drifted, almost out-of-body. Water tumbled onto his body, soaking him, but at least two minutes passed before he realized he should be doing something. Something... What? His hand drifted to the bar of soap, but the action didn't feel right until after he'd clenched his fingers around it. Right. Soap. Shower.

He shook his head, trying to clear some of the fuzziness away. Unsuccessful, his breaths stretched and depressed, and his eyelids dipped. He pressed his skin into the cold tiles against the wall. That woke him up. A bit. With a modicum of analytical thought, he managed to turn the shower knobs. He tamped the temperature to something lukewarm, almost cold, and with the slight discomfort pelting him, he almost felt human.

He stared down at himself as streams of clear water flowed over his body. Examined himself for the first time since the shooting. He'd never seen himself without bandages. When they'd been off in the past, he hadn't looked. He hadn't wanted to.

A long rough line cut him in half. His chest had swollen with a grotesque lump at the tip of the incision near his clavicles, which was normal, and would fade. In months. But... He grimaced. The line? That would be there forever without plastic surgery. That and the pockmark made by the bullet. The bullet wound sat dark red and crusted under his left nipple like a freakish birthmark. He touched it. A little spear jabbed him through the torso from his finger to his spine, and he gasped.

Ugly. It was all... Just... ugly.

You're not the man here.

He couldn't hold his own weight with his arms, which meant she'd be on top. He imagined trying to have an orgasm while looking down at the battlefield on his skin. No wonder she didn't look. His chest constricted, and his sight blurred.

He washed himself. Like an automaton. The shower deadened the sounds of his sniveling with thundering, echoing water. He still couldn't really get his back, but he could do the rest. Barely. With breaks.

The door opened, and every muscle tensed to the point of pain. His arm slammed into the wall as he fought for balance, and his heart throbbed. A torn, frightened choke fell from his lips. Shampoo came down into his eyes. His toes clenched, trying to grab purchase on the smooth tub floor, but really, could fleeing get any more pointless, when he couldn't even step into and out of the tub without help? Hopeless fear tunneled into his body and loitered, spreading shivers everywhere. He cowered in the corner by the spigot. Vulnerable. You're vulnerable and helpless and alone and anybody could—

“It's me,” Meredith said. “Just putting clean clothes on the back of the toilet.”

“Okay,” he managed. He stared at the tiles. His teeth chattered as stress made his muscles move in waves. He breathed, and he counted water droplets as they dribbled down the cold walls. One. Two. He stopped around fifteen.

His body slowed down. He pressed his forehead against the tiles. Water dripped into his eyes. Why? Why couldn't he feel safe? Why did every noise and unexpected thing do this. Vague nausea coiled in his stomach as the adrenaline burst withdrew.

She sat down with a thump next to the bathtub. Through the marbled glass, he saw the shadow of her body. His breaths quivered.

“Remember that trip to wine country?” she said.

He blinked. He was pretty sure they'd never been to wine country. They'd never really been anywhere. They didn't do vacations. He stared at the wall, a vague sense of lost memory tugging at him, but he couldn't break the fog. Blank. He felt blank.

He resumed his scrubbing. “What trip?” he said. He dunked his head under the spray and let the water wash the shampoo away.

“The weekend,” she said. “You wanted me to go with you for forty-eight hours of uninterrupted sex. But we didn't. You called it off, and you made your dreamy-capped-with-threatening-ultimatum 110 speech.”

“I remember,” he said.

“Why didn't we ever do that, Derek? Since we got couple-y again, why didn't we?”

“I thought you said we didn't do that. Go away together.”

“Well, I was a clueless relationship intern back then. Not now. It occurred to me earlier. When we were stumbling all over each other to admit fault or whatever. You almost died, and we've never even left Seattle together. We've never left, Derek. We haven't done anything, and we should.”

He swallowed. “For sex?”

“For anything,” she said. “I want to spend time with my husband. I think I might settle for watching paint dry or counting ceiling tiles. Though, if you wanted nothing but sex, I think I'd be okay with that. It would certainly help with the whole baby-making initiative.” Her voice dropped low. “And I miss you.”

“Meredith, I—”

“It's okay,” she said, interrupting him. He relaxed under the spray, letting the water wash everything away. “I'm not trying to pressure you,” she continued. “I'm not. You don't have to do anything before you're ready. You're steering this truck, and if you ever feel like you're not steering, you need to tell me, and I'll back off. I just... I miss you, Derek. I miss you all the time, even though you're right here, and it has nothing to do with making another baby, though that would be nice.”

A lump formed in his throat. He missed her, too. The flat of his palm roamed to his thigh and then his cock. He rubbed without thinking, and a deep, low moan rumbled through him and got lost in the thunderous echo of the water. He closed his eyes, pressing himself under the lukewarm spray. Water came down over his ears, cloaking the world around him through the low, rushing curtain of his deep breathing.

He missed her body as he cleaved it, the look on her face as he brought her. He missed the way her shivery breaths buffeted his skin. He missed her touch, and the way her hair fell against him in the dark. He missed the way she stared at him, sex-glazed and hooded, like she was in a dream, like he was a dream for her.

Since the shooting, she touched him all the time. All the time, she ran her palms against his body, hugged him, sat in his space and breathed his air and kissed him. But he almost always felt constrained by his injuries, or in pain, or cloudy with drugs. Always felt imprisoned by things out of his control.

He missed it. Missed her touch when nothing else mattered. And he wanted to feel himself sheathed within her, while he forgot about everything else.

His eyes half opened, and the picture of her soft body shattered as a knife of pain slid under his ribs. He panted. Desire made him pant, and panting hurt. A lot. And then he looked down, and saw through the blur what she would have to look at if he did somehow manage. Ugly scars and scabs and cut skin. An emaciated torso ravaged by recent weight loss and trauma. He leaned against the wall, shaky, as all his dreams melted, and reality slammed into him with every heartbeat.

He managed to catch his breath, and he rested against the wall, chastised and sullen. The water thundered down. He glanced at her. She'd leaned back against the marbled glass, soft hair pressed flat. He couldn't see a book or notebook or anything. She sat, unmoving, as if she really didn't care about anything else than spending time with him for the sake of spending time.

His lip quivered. He loved Meredith, and he'd been happy to let her go at her own pace, happy to love her and let her express herself back at him the only ways she knew how, which, typically were very muted unless they were having sex. Except now she kissed him and touched him and told him she loved him all the time, and she sat there with him just to sit there, and she wanted to go away with him on trips. The realization made his chest ache and his throat hurt. He blinked, and he wavered on his feet. A deep, empty emotional void he'd been harboring no longer felt empty, and the sheer force of noticing that fullness made his knees turn to jelly.

“I want to,” he said, his voice quiet. “I mean I want to want to.”

“You do? I thought... I mean you seemed pretty much not interested.”

“I do want to,” he said. “I just... I don't know.”
A long silence spread between them. Water thundered down around his ears. “Please, will you talk with me?” she said, begged.

“I don’t know what to say,” he said.

Silence stretched. “Are you embarrassed, Derek?” she said.

“I don’t know.” He said. Something snapped in his chest, and the dam broke. His torso jerked, and it hurt. He breathed, and it hurt. Everything hurt as he punished himself, and he stood under the shower head, dripping and naked and ugly. He sniffed, trying to make it stop. She was finally acting like he’d always dreamed about, but had forced himself not to ask for as a sacrifice to keep her, and now he couldn't even—

Meredith’s silhouette moved. “Derek, may I come in?” she said. “Please?”

He couldn’t do this. He couldn’t even breathe hard without hurting, and she wanted to come in for shower sex? His shoulders hunched, and he turned his back to her, but he couldn’t say no. He couldn’t say a word. She would figure it out anyway. When he couldn’t get it up because of... everything.

Water sloshed as she stepped into the tub. “Wow,” she said. “It’s a bit cold in here.”

He didn’t respond. He closed his eyes, and he let the blackness shiver in his head. For moments, he floated.

The space between them closed to inches. Her palms touched his shoulders. “Please, Derek,” she told his neck. Her lips brushed the skin along his spine. “I love you. Please, don’t be embarrassed.” Her fingers slid under his armpits, and she touched him, down the swell of his ribcage, down his hips. “You're healing. I know we're not going to be breaking headboards or hanging from the chandeliers for a while. And that's okay. It really is. I'm okay with that. I just want you in whatever capacity you can manage.”

Which only made him feel worse. Deep, coiling shame gripped him. If he could have curled into the wall and melted away, he would have. “I can't,” he said. “I can't do this right now. I want to, but I can't.”

Her roaming touch paused. “Can't what?”

“Have sex.”

“I didn't come in here for sex,” she said.

He scowled. “Then what did you come in here for?”

“You're upset.”

He clenched his teeth. “I'm not upset!”

She sighed. She rubbed his back, and he swayed. “Derek...”

The lump in his throat grew. He swallowed. “I don't want to have sex when all I can do is lie there,” he said. His fingers clenchend.

“Ohkay,” she said. She pressed her body against his. Her perky nipples touched his back. “Then we won't.” He closed his eyes as she kissed each shoulder blade. One. Two. “I'll wait until you're “Meredith,” he whispered. “Please.”

“Please, what?”

“I want to get out.”

She stepped away. “Okay. I'm sorry.”

He turned off the faucet and slid past her, dripping, skin burning. He had to wait. Had to wait for her to help him over the lip of the tub. His stomach churned. He felt sick. He stepped onto the bath mat with her help and reached for the towel. He didn't dry himself off, didn't do anything. He wrapped the terrycloth around his body and he sat, shivering, on the toilet seat.

“Seriously, what's wrong?” Meredith said.

“Nothing. I don't know,” he said.

She stood there. Naked. Breasts perky and round like freshly picked apples. Her wet hair slicked against her head. Water dripped down the swells of her hips and meandered in trails to her bellybutton. She didn't cover anything, and for a moment, he couldn't help but stare. He imagined her big and swollen with their baby. They could get started on that. They could. His lips parted, and he felt his body thrum, deep in his groin, despite everything, despite how upset and wrong he felt. They could, except they couldn't. Discomfort followed the thrum as he inhaled.

He drew the towel closer, and he shivered as arousal faded under the assault of cold, sharp spears of fear. He didn't want to be with her and hurt. It would hurt. It would really hurt. And it wasn't like he was pleasing on the eye.

“The scars are bad,” he said, looking at his lap.

She frowned. “I've seen them, Derek.” She knelt in front of him and put her hands on his knees over the towel. He shivered at the touch. “Is that what this is about?” she said. “The scars?”

“No,” he said. “Yes. I don't...”

Her lip twitched, and she blinked. Confused. He'd confused her, and he closed his eyes. He'd confused himself. He couldn't watch her anymore. Heat clawed at his face. He couldn't think straight. He could barely think at all.

Her hands squeezed his knees. “You're sexy to me,” she said. “You're always sexy to me. Will you look at me?”

He forced himself to open his eyes.

“I just saw you in the shower,” she said. “Do I look like I'm not ready to go, just from looking?”

He swallowed. Blush reddened her skin. Not embarrassment. Not hardly. The way she stared, the way her glassy eyes took in the sight of him with heady, gulping dregs, told him that much.

“Will you drop the towel?” she said. She licked her lips.

His hands shook. He couldn't bring himself to drop it, but he stopped clutching so hard, and it gave way a little. The terrycloth pooled around his upper arms. The thick, long line of his sternal incision poked out at the top, and the awful, swollen bump at the top stood in sharp relief against... his pale skin.

She rose up on her knees and peeled the towel away from his upper body, leaving it covering his lap and his legs. Cold air hit his wet skin, and he shivered. She stared into his eyes. Her breathing slowed, and then she swept her gaze to his chest. She hovered, eye level with the worst of it, with the bullet wound and everything else. She leaned. Her wet, soft lips touched him at the crease between his pectorals where the stitches formed a long, ugly line, and she licked beside the cut, upper abdomen to clavicles. She kissed next to the bump, and then she roamed higher.

Her lips pressed into his. Her tongue slid into his mouth, and he moaned, leaning back on the seat as she plundered. She looked at him as she pulled away, lips swollen with desire, panting.

“Do I look any less ready to go?” she asked, her voice low and quivering.

She stood, and she took his hand, guided his fingers against her inner thigh. Slick, wet heat touched his skin as she pushed him against the folds of her sex. “I feel pretty ready to go,” she said. “Don't you think?”

“Meredith,” he said, his voice shaky.

“I don't expect anything, Derek,” she assured him. “I'm just trying to show you who I see.”

“Who do you see?”

“I see the man I married. Scars or not. And he's a very, very sexy man.”

He blinked. His vision shimmered. His lip quivered, and he managed a watery, unsure smile. She winked, and he got lost in the sparkling gray of her soft, peerless eyes. He watched the ghosts of his face reflected in her pupils. She didn't blink. Her creamy, naked skin and her perk nipples stole his attention, and he swallowed. Instinct turned his vague smile into a slanted smirk. He touched her, hands splayed against her breasts, and she placed her palms over top his. Her warm skin soothed his soul. With a quiet, long breath, he stroked her to her navel.

She had scars, too. He touched the puckered, pink, jagged line on her side from where Dr. Bailey had extracted a piece of her liver for Thatcher. Remnants of her laparoscopic appendix removal, she had three faded marks carving dimples in her skin. One over her belly button, one just above her pubic hair, and one over the roll of her ribs on her right side, forming an triangle.

“We make a pretty banged up team,” she said, lip quivering.

“Yeah,” he said.

He pulled her against his body, trying not to feel uncoordinated and sluggish. He kissed the space between her cleavage, and warmth radiated against his face. He groaned, soft and low. She felt so nice, and she tasted so delicate. She giggled as he licked her. The sound relaxed him, and he hovered there. Her fingers wound through his hair.

“You're a very conniving woman,” he said he said with a sigh.

“What?” she said, her voice lost and low and dumb with desire.

He stroked her inner thigh and cupped her. She was hot. And she was wet. And she was ready. She moaned as he put pressure against her pubic bone.

“You know I can't leave you like this,” he said. “It's not in my genetic code.”
Her fingers scrunched in his hair as he stroked again. “Derek, I'm serious. If you don't want to do anything, we don't have to do anything.” She panted, and she moaned, and her muscles quivered. “I mean... I...” Another moan, and he grinned, watching her struggle with coherency.

“You were saying?” he said.

She grunted. “I'll live with a little frustration. I'm fine. I am. This was for you. This wasn't to make you feel obligated to—” “Sit down,” he commanded.

She didn't look at him with doubt. She didn't ask him if he thought this was a good idea, or if he knew he could manage without hurting himself. He said sit down, and she did.

He let himself collapse to his knees in front of the toilet. His breaths caught in his chest, and he forced himself to slow down before he started hurting. He didn't want to hurt when he did this. He didn't want to hurt at all. Ever. But he would settle for a few minutes, pain free. Please. The room fuzzed with the sudden exertion of moving to the floor. He waited. She waited. When it cleared, he shifted forward, inching close to her, closer. The towel fell away from his groin, but he forgot all about it in the overwhelming need to get to her. To please her. To lose himself and forget why he had a list a mile long of things he didn't want to do because they hurt and not because he didn't want them.

A stronger Derek lunged forward in his mind's eye. He crawled on his hands and his knees, and he pushed her flat against the floor and speared her. He laughed and rumbled and sheathed himself with her wet heat while she quivered and screamed his name. He drove against her, needy, ready, whole, thrusting until he spilled, and she raked her fingers down his back.

In a blink, his mind's eye shattered. He shivered with unresolved tension, but he breathed, long and slow, and let it slough away. He knelt gingerly before her on the floor.

She sat against the back wall, loose and supple and naked, knees bent, legs spread, relaxed. For a long moment, he felt like a painter with an untouched canvas. He stared, blank, but instinct helped him when analysis failed. He touched her inner thigh, and she spread her legs wide for him, giving him a full, glorious view. He felt clumsy, almost laughable as he petted her. Despite his less than masterful attempt, she gasped as he slipped his finger inside her body. He formed a hook, and he pulled back against her personal g-spot, a place he'd spent many long, arduous hours searching for.

“Derek,” she managed, voice trembling. The sheer abandon and need in her voice relaxed his self-consciousness. Derek. His name. Said with the sharp, whining edge of begging. Begging for him. He'd done something right despite the fog.

She pressed against him, panting. “Derek,” she repeated. “Please.”

He swallowed, and he couldn't stop his own, throaty groan as he watched her body twitch. Spread wide and senseless all for him. He stroked her inner thigh with the palm of his free hand. Her hot skin felt slick against his hand. She didn't need much help. She'd already plowed up the hill, already edged to the cusp. She'd made herself good and frustrated in her earlier appraisal of his body.

His lip curled with satisfaction.

He pressed his thumb against her clit, and he pulled with the index finger he held inside her. Her muscles clenched around him, and a sizzling, twisting groan wound from her body and wrapped around him like a feather boa. She bared her teeth at him, and her eyes scrunched in a telltale grimace that screamed pain at him, the pain of the precipice. He had her with barely any effort. Her thighs shook, and her whole body tensed. She had a good grip. He almost couldn't move his finger, but he managed. He stroked her on the inside. Nonsensical moaning tore her throat. She pawed at nothing with her hands. Her breasts quivered as she breathed and breathed and breathed for him.

“Please,” she said, senseless, and the word stroked him like a balm.

He circled her clit. “You sure worked yourself into a mess,” he said. He laughed. Ache broke his chest, but he didn't care. “What would you have done if I hadn't taken the bait?”

She wailed at him as he pulled her from the inside. “Finish me,” she begged. “Finish me, finish me.”

“That wouldn't be very fun,” he said. “I've only had you here for, what, a minute?”

Her nails scrabbled against the floor. He watched, delighted, as she couldn't breathe and couldn't think and couldn't do anything but writhe and grimace and gasp. He kept her there. Stroked her. Not often enough to release, but often enough to hold her dangling on the edge. He slipped his middle finger in beside his index finger and rubbed. Inside. She gripped him. Her muscles contracted.

She couldn't find any purchase with the floor, so her arms stretched up, and she grabbed the towel rack. Her nipples perked, and her breasts heaved, swollen with arousal. For him. She sobbed. Begging him. He liked it.

“Derek, damn it,” she said. Her fingers flexed. The towel rack squeaked.

“What's the magic word?” he said.

“I said please already, you egotistical ass!” she yelled.

He clucked at her. “You're very grumpy today, you know.”

“Shut up and finish me, you evil, evil bastard,” she said.

“Yes, dear,” he said, a bare, velvet whisper.

He clenched his fingers, and he let her go with a single stroke. She slammed against the back wall. Her breathing stopped, and she stiffened as her body contracted all her muscles. She choked. A little. And then a discordant, raking moan bounced into the space between them. Her legs jerked over and over as muscle spasms ran down her body. Her insides squeezed his fingers again and again in rapid, fluttering spasms. Then everything relaxed into jelly, and she sighed as she flopped onto the floor like a pile of muscle and flesh and nothing else.

Her hand found his naked thigh. For a moment, all she did was breathe. “You don't want to...” she managed after an eternity. She gestured at him.

He looked down at himself, surprised to find a partial erection staring back. He swallowed. Just watching her had turned him on, but...

Yes. “No,” he said.

“Kay,” she said. She didn't ask him why. Didn't prod him for an explanation or pressure him or do anything that made him feel embarrassed that he was kneeling on the bathroom floor, naked, scarred, sort of aroused, but unwilling. She smiled at him, instead, lazy and hazy and pleased.
“That was really good. That... Mmm. Fifty gold stars, at least.”

“Thank you,” he said.

He sat with her on the floor, both of them naked, for minutes after minutes. She relaxed and sort of dozed, eyes half-closed, in a pleasant, post-orgasm cloud. He watched her. His wife.

Until his back pinched his nerves, and he had to move. Had to shift. Had to do something other than just sit there. With trembling, tired muscles, he stood, and he reached for his clothes. He'd dripped all over them when he'd leaned back against the toilet, but they were dry enough to wear.

He managed to pull on his pants while she stumbled to her feet and grabbed her own clothes from their strewn, haphazard pile by the tub. She tripped and leaned against the shower door. “Mmm,” she purred as she pulled up her pants. “I think. I think you might have broke me or something.”

He raised an eyebrow at her. “The bathroom floor was new.”

She grinned. “It was. I'm glad I cleaned yesterday. Dirty sex would take on a slightly new meaning if I hadn't, I think, and not a really pleasant one.”

He snickered as he pulled on his shirt. His chest twinged, and he winced, but nothing snapped at him, nothing told him to stop. He moved to the door frame and let himself rest, let the room fuzz up and his mind drift without worrying so much about it. The sheer effort involved in remaining coherent and focused took so much from him. He breathed and spaced.

She slid next to him and wrapped her arms around his waist. “Your back again?”

He swallowed, opening his eyes. Reality sharpened. His breath hitched. “Yeah.”

“I'm sorry,” she said. She squeezed him. “I'm sorry this sucks so much for you. I hate that I can't do anything.”

“You're here,” he said. “That's something. A lot, actually.”

The trip down the steps didn't take nearly as long as the trip up the steps had. He didn't have to rest as much when gravity helped him instead of fought him tooth and claw. She helped him settle in his favorite chair. She brought him water and a single Percocet.

“Already?” he said as he swallowed the pill. He glanced around for a clock and surprised himself to find it was already noon.

“Yep,” she said. “You slept for a long time after the last batch knocked you out. We're on an 8 12 4 schedule now instead of 6 10 2, which, actually might help you at night, since your Oxycontin won't be fading very early morning when you're still trying to sleep.”

“That would be nice,” he said.

She rubbed his back. “It'll get better,” she said. “Two weeks. You'll wonder why on Earth you were ever so grouchy. Mark my words.”

“Do I need to get you a marker?”

She laughed. “Want anything for lunch? I'm gonna go heat up a hot pocket.”

He scrunched his nose. “Meredith, those things are horrible for you. They're solid blocks of fat and She shrugged. “Well, I'm not making you one. I assumed you'd want something like... a salad. Or... Whatever. I bought a few of those lettuce pack thingies and some fresh tomatoes. I can make lettuce pack thingies. You just cut the bag open and you have a nice, professional, crispy salad. Or so I'm told.”

“Not right now,” he said. “I'm just going to rest my eyes for a bit.”

“Okay,” she said.

He watched her as she padded into the kitchen. He listened as she rummaged through the freezer. He heard the vague hum of the microwave. She made odd thumping noises, as if she'd decided to pass the time by skipping around the center island in the kitchen while her hot pocket cooked. His eyelids lowered, heavy. The sound of her voice coiled in his head as she started to sing, off-key, to some ridiculous pop song she liked.

“You can stand under my umbrella,” she wailed. “Ella, ella, ey, ey, ey.”

The microwave beeped, and he lost track after that.

Gary Clark stared at him, the space between them separated by a sleek, black gun.

Words. Derek said words. He tried.

Adrenaline made his body quiver. Fight or flight? His body chose flight, but fear and logic made strange bedfellows, and they paralyzed him in a shivery, trembling pile. He swallowed. Flight just meant he'd get shot in the back.

His legs turned to jelly. Sweat dripped down the curve of his spine. His voice wavered, and he tried not to take a submissive stance. Tried. But he'd seen what guns did. Killed people. Killed his dad. He tried to convince the jabbering fear to shut up, but his thoughts kept coming back to that. To soft, wheezy, final words. To, “Derek, listen to me. This is very important.”

His hands moved in front of him. Please, they said for him when real words failed in his throat. Please, don't.

Given dominance, Gary Clark advanced. Anger burbled in his tone. “No talking!” he said.

Derek's legs drew him back one step. Two.

He tried. He tried to talk. He tried to break through and reach the man behind Gary Clark's hating gaze, but fear burbled in Derek's gut. He couldn't even keep track of what he said. Couldn't make it sound strong and commanding at all. The man who cheerfully announced that it was a beautiful day to save lives became submissive. Shivery. He couldn't keep his breaths steady. He knew he looked terrified, and he knew that was probably a mistake. He radiated easy pickings like a tripping, sick gazelle for a lion.

Gary Clark's gun shook. He stared at Derek with sharp, furious, hating eyes.

Derek tried to talk. The gun wavered, until it pointed at Derek's feet. He made the mistake of thinking he'd made progress.

He didn't remember the impact of the bullet. He didn't remember falling. He stared at the ceiling, breaths twisting in his torso while April panicked somewhere behind him. Sucking down air sent knives into his gut, but he needed air. He needed. The struggle became a war. Needing air versus not wanting it. Eternity stretched into something longer and more torturous.

April abandoned him. Gary Clark pointed the gun, and Derek waited to die. “No, Mr. Clark,” Derek managed in a feeble attempt at... what? To save his own life? To flee?

Something drew Gary Clark's attention to his right. Derek looked, too, but he didn't see anything. Didn't see anything but a blur, and then he was alone, cast away like a cheap, expendable thing. He lay on his back, confused, unable to breathe or move or think. He didn't know why Mr. Clark had disappeared, or when he would come back.

Somebody was in the room with him. Somebody not Meredith. He knew it before he opened his eyes. The steps as the body moved were too heavy. The breaths as the body breathed were too low and rasping. The general presence was too large. A man.

Derek's eyelids pushed up, and through blurry eyelashes he saw the outline of a large, looming person. Big. Male. Leaning near Derek's chair. Close. Closer.

No talking!

The impulse to flee grabbed his muscles and squeezed. His breaths sped into panting, and he lurched to his feet faster than he should have. Faster than his injured body could handle. A weird, twisting noise caught in his throat. “No,” he croaked. Fire snapped under his sternum. Things that had been healing stretched and twanged and broke inside.

The man dropped his gun to the floor where it shattered and made a wet splash. Something cold soaked into Derek's socks. Gasping, Derek tried to move. He did. One shaky step. More of a stumble, really. The Percocet didn't make him dizzy all the time anymore, but it still made elevation changes an invitation to faint if they weren't approached with enough caution.

The room blotted out at the edges and tilted.

Gary Clark pulled Derek into a tight bear hug before he fell. Pressure constricted Derek's chest. Pain. Trapped. Derek's heart plunged, every throbbing beat squeezing like a fist. His body shook. He made a whining, inhuman, keening sound as his lungs pushed and pulled, frantic for air. Something hot and wet seeped down his legs. He couldn't speak, and terror sucked him down into a black hole of panic.

“Jesus,” said Gary Clark as he adjusted his grip. The pain lessened, but didn't abate. “What's... Jesus Christ.”

Derek gulped for air, trembling. Run, run, run, run, run. Indomitable, his brain said run. His legs twitched with the need to obey. He clawed at Gary Clark's shirt, desperate, violent, but his murderer wouldn't let go.

“Stop it,” Mr. Clark said. “Stop it, Derek, you'll fucking hurt yourself. It's Mark. It's Mark. Stop!”

Heavy footsteps. “What the hell happened?” Meredith said.

“Please,” Derek said. The single desperate word of entreaty was all he could manage.

“I don't fucking know what happened,” Mr. Clark said. “Don't move, Derek. Jesus. There's glass on the floor by your feet.”

“Mark,” said Derek as spoken word began to register. The name skipped on his tongue and came out broken. He couldn't breathe, couldn't get his body to relax. The room spun. Mark, he thought. But Gary Clark wouldn't let go, and so Derek shivered, heart hammering like a gong, over and over. “Mark.”

Derek heard the whoosh of a broom scraping pieces of glass from the floor.

“The chair is two steps back,” Mark said, his voice low and cautious. “It's clear of glass.”

Mark let him go, and Derek fled in the opposite direction Mark had instructed him to go. He fled all the way to the foyer before he could make himself stop and assess. Unmitigated panic slowed into something less frenetic, less all-consuming, when he realized nobody chased him. Nobody yelled. Meredith was there, and she wasn't screaming or crying or distressed about a madman in their house. Daylight streamed in through the glass pane of the front door. He swallowed, looking back over his shoulder.

The scraping stopped. Meredith pushed shimmery, sparkling, broken bits into a dustpan and stood with a groan. Gary Clark? No. Mark. And the gun had been a glass. A fucking glass of water.

“Are you okay?” Meredith said.

“I'm fine,” Derek snapped. He moved deeper into the foyer, out of sight. One wobbling step. Two. “I'm fine.”

He hadn't just survived a murder attempt. Mark had been putting down a glass of water for him on the side table by the chair. Heat flamed across his face and his throat and his ears. He clawed at his neck, trying to hide it. He felt them staring at him through the wall as he moved, felt their eyes on him.

He shuffled into the windowless downstairs bathroom. Gunfire flared in the mirror, white and flashing and hot. He gasped, shut the door, turned off the lights, and collapsed to the floor against the wall. The soft bath mat muffled the jolt. His heart throbbed under his breastbone. He put his face into his knees, and he breathed. A familiar, vague tickle of ammonia crept into his nostrils, and he gagged and slammed his head back against the wall. Pain flared in his chest.

His pajama pants were drenched from the crotch to the calves. He'd wet himself. He'd fucking pissed in his pants. They'd seen it. They must have. Both of them. Nausea coiled. His skin bloomed hot and bright with a fresh flush.

Voices murmured in the other room. Talking about him, probably.

He couldn't stop trembling, and his heart wouldn't slow.

Water lapped in the distance. “Hi,” his mirror Meredith said. “Please, don't be scared.” Her arms wrapped around him.

A knock on the door tore him from his desperate reverie.

“Derek?” Meredith said, her voice soft and muffled through the wood. A dark shadow shifted under the threshold. The doorknob moved a millimeter and then jammed as she tested it. He'd locked it. When had that happened?

“Can you at least tell me you're okay?” she said.

He reached. His cold, sweaty, shaking fingers slipped, but he managed to flip the latch. Eventually. And then he curled against his wet knees, letting the slant of his thighs support his body. As long as he didn't press, his sternum didn't hurt, though his ribs felt strange, and the bullet wound pulled like somebody poked him with a finger. He didn't care. He didn't speak. He pressed his forehead into the wet dip between his knees and sighed. He wanted it to stop. Why wouldn't it stop?

“Derek? I'm coming in, okay?”

A long, interminable stretch followed as she gave him a chance to say no, but words clotted in his throat. What the hell was he supposed to say? My friend who I've known since childhood came at me with a glass of water, and I thought I was going to die?

A shaft of daylight fell into the bathroom at a slant. He squinted, but couldn't see more than her willowy shadow. “Hey,” she said. She didn't turn on the light, but she left the door open a crack. She fumbled in the dark and stepped over his legs. If she found anything odd about him sitting on the floor in the dark in the bathroom, she said nothing about it. She sat on the toilet seat, and she touched his shoulder.

Her breath caught, and her hand froze. “Derek, you're shaking,” she said. Her palm moved against his deltoid. She shifted. With a thump, she slid into the small space between him and the toilet, and she hugged him while he sat there, glassy-eyed and scared and wondering why his brain was doing these things to him. Making him think things that weren't real.

“I didn't know Mark was visiting,” he said. He sounded wispy in the small space. Like he couldn't get his lungs to work. Meredith's grip tightened.

She sighed. “I should have mentioned it again. It's my fault. He's been wanting to stop by since I took you home. He's been calling so much, I swear, it's like I already thought the world knew his day off was today, and that he wanted to stop by. I'm really sorry he startled you. I told him to bring you a glass of water since he was headed into the living room anyway. I... I didn't think. Wasn't thinking.”

She babbled. He didn't hear much of it, but the low rush of words grounded him. Made him feel... Better. The fear that had lit him up like a firecracker sparked and flickered and died, until all that it left in its wake was a shaky, weak, tired feeling that told him he'd stressed himself far beyond his capability to be stressed. He swallowed, sitting in his soiled pants. He needed to clean up and change, but he couldn't... He thought of all the steps between him and his clean clothes, and his eyes watered. His throat constricted.

A shadow loomed by the door. “It's just me,” said Mark, enunciating loudly and firmly as though he thought he approached a jumper on a roof. “It's Mark.” His arm came through the crack in the door, and the slant of light yawned a bit wider. He held a dark, fuzzy blob in his grip, which Meredith stood up to take from him.

“Thanks,” she said.

Mark's arm slipped back out of the room, and the shadow disappeared. Meredith pushed the door closed with a thud, leaving them with no light but what the small blue plug-in nightlight provided.

She handed Derek the soft bundle. His fingers clenched the soft, dry, clean flannel. Hot flush swept over him. Again. A low, grating moan tore through him, and he wept in the dark. She squeezed back into the space between the toilet and his body, and she embraced him.

“It's okay,” she said.

Fat, hot tears rolled down his face. “I thought I was going to die.”
“I know.”

“I don't want to die.”

She rubbed his back with long, soothing strokes. “I know.”

He rolled his face into her shoulder, and a deep choking sob racked his body. And then another and another. He clutched her shirt, and he cried, stirring up agony in his chest, but he couldn't stop. He cried until exhaustion pulled him into a sniffling, throbbing silence. His chest ached, his throat felt raw, and muzzy cotton clogged his brain. He felt sick.

She sat with him. Until his eyes drifted shut. Sleep plowed into him like a muscle car in a drag race, but she shook him gently, enough to jolt him back into half awake. “Why don't you change, and you can sleep in the living room?” she suggested.

Beyond sentience, he listened to her tone of voice more than anything else. She convinced him to stand up. She pulled down his dirty pants. Water whooshed in the sink. She dabbed the hand towel under the faucet. She turned, but he stopped her.

“I can do it,” he said, his voice hoarse and unrecognizable. Defeated. She handed him the towel, and he wiped the drying urine off his bare legs while she stared in the mirror, or at the wall, or anywhere but at him. Water evaporated. His skin chilled and shivered. His muscles ached, and by the time he finished and dropped the urine-soaked towel... somewhere, he'd lost his breath, the room seemed to waver in and out, and he really thought he might fall, not from dizziness or doing something he shouldn't, but because he had nothing left.

Nothing.

And so he stood there, naked from the waist down except for his socks, his weight slumped against the wall. Meredith waited. She waited, until he swallowed, trembling. Fresh tears and blooming embarrassment broke loose. He clung to the towel rack because if he didn't he would collapse.

“I can't,” he said. “I can't, I can't.”

“It's okay,” she said. “It's okay. Derek, it's okay.”

She hugged him, and he started crying again. Not the deep, guttural, rending sobs from before. Just quiet, wet sniveling that made him sick inside. The harder he tried to stop, the worse the urge to weep. As she helped him step into the clean pants Mark had brought for him from upstairs, he gave up. He just gave up and cried.

She threw his old, soiled pajamas into the bowl of the sink.

“Can you walk if I help?” she said.

Shaking with effort, he transferred his grip from the towel rack to her shoulders. He took a test step. He nearly buckled. Her arm slipped around his waist. Another step, and he had to rest, panting. They made it into the hallway. And then the foyer. He couldn't go more than a foot without resting. He shambled, mindless. He wanted to sleep. He wanted to disappear to someplace else. A place that wasn't here, where he'd wet himself in terror in front of his wife and his friend. A place that wasn't here, where he couldn't have sex or walk up steps. A place that wasn't here, where he hurt.

He hurt here.
Mark stood in the center of the living room like a lost, lonely island. “Hey, man,” he said, and then he fell silent, and an odd, crumpled look shattered his usual, confident demeanor. Like he had no idea what to say that would be right or reasonable.

Derek wiped at his eyes, even as another flush spread over his skin, rendering any sort of appearance doctoring useless. He’d cried himself into exhaustion, and he’d wet himself, and he’d been shot. Three immutable facts. He couldn’t even spare the energy anymore to speak.

He glanced around the room, unable to process anything else, and his gaze fell on the chair. The safe chair. Covered in supportive pillows and rumpled blankets. His back liked that chair.

“Don't sit there,” Meredith said. “We're moving this one, remember?”

No.

He blinked. She nudged him toward the couch. He hobbled and tripped as more and more parts of his body shut down and demanded rest. He tried not to think about Mark. Staring. Silent. Unsure.

Meredith transferred pillows while he clung to the armrest. She put a big, fluffy one next to the arm of the sofa, and another where his back would go. She wrapped a warm blanket around his body. He collapsed, and the faucet behind his eyes began to rush, fast, faster, until he lost track of everything.

A cold glass of water brushed his palm. Reflex made him clutch it, but it was too heavy. She helped him lift it to his lips, and he took weak swallow after weak swallow. The liquid hit his parched throat too fast, and he spluttered and spat with the shock. Water dribbled everywhere. He pushed the glass away, and she took it and set it nearby on the coffee table. She draped a thick, warm comforter over his legs. His eyes closed, and he stopped. Just stopped. His trembling, tired muscles loosened.

She kissed him. “I love you,” she said.

He floated in the dark.

“God, I'm so sorry,” Mark said. “I've never seen him like that. Not ever. I didn't want to let go because I thought he'd fall, but—”

“Does it make me a bad person?” Meredith said. “To hate a dead man so much I wish I could add some kerosene to whatever hell he's burning in?”

Meredith sucked in a wet breath and sniffed. “Let's just move this chair.”

“Okay,” said Mark, though he sounded unsure. “This is the chair you want moved?”

“Yeah.”

“I think... Yeah. You grab that end.”

The last noises Derek heard were of his friend and his wife, huffing and groaning while they lugged a huge chair up the stairs for him. He should be helping, he thought. He could help. He swallowed. Sometime between one thought and the next, he didn't hear anything anymore. His body wasn't sleeping on a couch. He was dying, instead.
“I love you,” Meredith said as they put the mask over his face, and Dr. Avery told him to breathe deeply.

Two knife stabs, and the pain lessened. Three, and relief washed over his nerve endings. His eyelids drooped. He watched Meredith watching him. He didn't want to leave, and then he couldn't not leave. His eyes shut. Voices disappeared through a long, echoing tunnel. His sense of the world faded like someone removed puzzle pieces in fast succession. Holes here. Holes there. Blotting out.

Black.

His eyes didn't open. He didn't exactly wake up. But he felt the roll of the lights overhead. Felt the rumble under his body. Heard voices. And then nothing.

A team of six or seven nurses counted to three. The sheets pinched his hips and his shoulders and the sides of his body, and they lifted him. The sheets relaxed. His body settled on something flat and soft. People touched him. Pulled at his hospital gown and did something with his mouth. Air hit his skin. Hands. All over him, touching places only Meredith should touch. A bag crinkled. The flinch that came with modesty lost itself in the mire. He sent the message, but his nerves didn't receive. Somebody picked up his hand and clipped something to his finger. Monitors bleeped in his ears. And then nothing.

When he managed to push his eyelids up the first time, even the dark hurt his eyes, and he closed them again for a moment. He tried again. Cristina stood there with a chart, and she talked with a woman. He didn't understand the words. Mostly, he saw ceiling. On the horizon, he saw his toes. Cristina stared at him, touched something on his chest. And then nothing.

The woman from before, the one he didn't know, unfurled a blanket over his body. He saw the edges of it fan into his view of the ceiling as she let the air fluff it up. Light flickered as the blanket eclipsed all else, and then returned as the blanket settled on top of his body, thin and not warm enough against the glaciers sliding underneath his skin. At least they'd covered him.

He couldn't move. Nausea swirled in the back of his throat, and his limbs froze with chill, but the tingly, weightless, not-really-there-yet feeling that made his head cotton overruled his ability to do more than lie there. He tried to swallow and couldn't. He had something in his mouth. His teeth couldn't meet, and his tongue sat mashed under the heavy weight. Thick straps gripped his face. He knew he had something stuck down his throat, but beyond that, numbness.

The woman looked at him, and a bright, wide smile curved her lips and crinkled at her eyes. “Dr. Shepherd,” she said, her tone low and whisper soft. “I'm told your surgery went just fine. It's about 3:30PM. You're on a ventilator right now, and you're in the cardiac intensive care unit at Seattle Grace. I just added more morphine to your drip. Can you nod for me if you're in any pain?”

The ventilator whirred and pushed air into his lungs. He felt like he breathed through a straw. Nothing made any sense. He couldn't move. How could he nod even if he wanted to? A blood pressure cuff constricted around his arm, tight, tighter. He blinked. His body shook. He didn't like it here. He wanted to go home.

The woman picked up his hand. He saw an intravenous line stuck in his wrist. A name tag encircled him. He couldn't read the tag. Couldn't feel it against his skin. He watched his hand in the woman's. He felt the touch. But he couldn't move. Like his body wasn't his. Just a prison.

“I know this is very scary, Dr. Shepherd. You've been given a lot of muscle relaxants and sedatives to keep you from moving around while you're waking up. There's a lot of tubes and wires, and we don't want you to dislodge anything by accident. But you're safe, and you're out of surgery. I'm told everything went just fine. Do you want to see Dr. Grey?"

Cold bleached his bones. He blinked.

“Meredith Grey,” said the woman. “Do you want to see Meredith, Dr. Shepherd?”

He stared. Desperation drove a sword into his nerves. He tried to squeeze his fingers, but they wouldn't move. He twitched. His head. Maybe not a nod, but a twitch. Please.

Please, give me Meredith.

Mark's voice penetrated the fog before Derek even realized he'd woken up. He swallowed and squinted, trying to force the cobwebs of sleep away, but they didn't want to leave. He wiped at his eyes. His cheeks hurt, rubbed raw with evaporated tears and leftover salt. His eyes burned. His body throbbed, and his chest ached, and he knew he wouldn't be getting up anytime soon. He didn't even try.

“Do you need anything?” Mark said. “Meredith's doing some laundry, but I can get her.”

A vague sound caught in Derek's throat. He stared at Mark through half-lidded eyelids and half-awake eyes. “Mark,” he said. His voice sounded broken and weak and sick. His throat felt raw.
Dry. Torn. Thoughts didn't work, and so he just stared.

“Yeah,” said Mark. “Go back to sleep if you want.”

Derek closed his eyes, trying, through the mire, to think of a way to ask for water that wouldn't sound pathetic. He swallowed and worked his salivary glands. Nothing helped. The pasty, gummy dryness in his mouth and throat lingered. He put his elbow over his eyes and breathed, fighting sentience for all he was worth, but something had decided he would wake up now, and he was stuck. Awake. Tired, but not tired enough to drift back into dreams without serious effort.

“I'd like some water,” he said. He couldn't bring himself to do add a please. To beg. Not after the morning he'd had. His voice grated, and so he sat there, eyes shut, and he rested his throat.

I'm coming into the room.”

Tired and spent and pushed beyond embarrassment into dejected indifference, Derek listened to Mark as he reported his positions in the room like a fucking sonar. Ping. Ping. Ping. I'm here! On a base level, Derek appreciated it. Just a little. Anything that helped him not become the terrified, nonsensical animal that wet himself. On an intelligent level, it annoyed him that Mark felt he needed to provide this sort of service. This coddling. And it frustrated Derek that Mark was probably right.

Mark handed him the glass of water, and Derek drank with slow, disinterested sips. When the glass emptied, Derek rubbed the cool crystal against his forehead. The chill broke some of the fog, but “No problem,” Mark said.

Meredith came into the room. She smiled when she saw Derek, blinking and sort of awake, but she didn't draw attention to him. She'd changed. She wore some old, faded jeans, flip-flops, and his favorite ratty Dartmouth shirt. She'd drawn her hair into a loose, scraggly ponytail that looped under on itself sort of like a bun but not really.

“I'm going to run some errands,” she said. “I'll be back in a few hours, okay?”

“Sure,” Mark said.

Derek stared.

“Do you want anything from the store?” she said. “Derek?”

“What?”

She smiled. “I'm going out. Do you want me to get you anything?”

“No.”

“Okay.” She kissed his cheek. She put on dark, stylish sunglasses, grabbed her purse, and she left. The resounding slam of the door rumbled through the house, and Derek flinched.

He fucking flinched. He wiped his eyes again. The blankets and comforter rustled as he leaned over his knees, trying to wake up his muscles and his body and his mind. Mark sat in front of the television, messing with cables and wires. He made clanks and thumps as he pushed the DVD player aside.

“What are you doing?” Derek said.

“I'm setting up my PS3 for you.”

“How do you even have enough time for a PS3?”

Mark shrugged. “I lead a vegetative, indoor life outside the hospital, unlike you, Mr. Fishing-Is-Fun.”

“Fishing is fun,” Derek said.

“It's like watching paint dry, Derek. No. It's like watching invisible paint dry, which is even worse, because there's nothing to fucking watch. Anyway, I figured this would help stave off some boredom when Meredith goes back to work. Plus, if I'm not mistaken, you owe me a stoned rematch.”

“What?”

“Remember when I got my wisdom teeth out?” Mark said. He grinned like a five-year-old in a candy store full of chocolate and gummy bears. “Space Invaders on the Atari? You beat my pants off every time because I was high on meds.”

“You say it was because you were high on meds,” Derek said.

“Right, well. Now's your chance to prove you're just better than me. Tables are turned.”

Derek blinked. “PS3 has Space Invaders?”

“You know, I read something about a remake a while ago, I think, but I don't have it,” Mark said. He lay flat on his belly on the rug and thumped around under the television. He grunted. Another thump. “There, got it.” He eased onto his haunches. When he hit the power on the television, the screen came alive with a flare of color. The rumble of a revving engine filled the room. Derek watched the screen, a bit disoriented with all the movement and flashing, and also helplessly engrossed because he didn't have the mental capacity for dividing his attention between multiple things.

Mark scooted across the floor. He pushed the coffee table away and sat down on the rug, his back resting against the sofa to the left of Derek. “Here,” Mark said, and he handed a controller over his shoulder for Derek to grab.

“What?” Derek forced his gaze away from the screen.

Mark glanced over his shoulder, an evil gleam in his eye. “Want to race?”

Derek stared at the controller. It had lots of buttons. Lots. It was way more complicated than the Atari joystick he could recall from the indistinct edges of his memory. “Mark, I haven't played a game since Space Invaders.”

“It's good for dexterity, you know,” Mark said. “Hand-eye coordination.”

“Right,” Derek said. “You do it for professional development.”

“Of course, I do,” Mark replied. “I didn't get to be this awesome just from my own excessive talent.”

Derek tilted the controller in his hands. He felt clumsy. Already. And he hadn't done anything yet. He stared at the screen and blinked. A flashy car sped past, and he could barely keep track of it. His head felt like cotton. He had no reflexes. The painkillers destroyed his normal ability for precision. His competitive spirit died a wheezing death because he knew he would lose. “Mark, I'm a bit more stoned than you were with your wisdom teeth.”

“It's okay,” Mark said. “I have a plan. And if you really hate it, there's always Netflix.”

“A plan?”

“Yes,” Mark said. He put his controller on the coffee table and crawled to the liquor cabinet. He peered into the space. Bottles clinked. “Do you mind if I finish off some of your scotch? Tequila is rank. I really don't get how Meredith drinks it straight.”

When Derek only stared, Mark took that as free license. Derek watched his good bottle of St. Magdalene single malt scotch turn up in the air. The scotch sloshed, and Mark chugged straight from the bottle. Chugged. He downed at least five shots worth of alcohol before he gagged. He rested with his mouth hanging open as his eyes watered. And then he took another long gulp.

“Give me a few minutes,” Mark said. “I haven't eaten in a while. We'll be on pretty even footing in no time.”

“Mark, it's not even dinner time.”

“So, what?” He took another swig and settled back against the couch. “I already asked Meredith if she minds a house guest, and I surrendered my keys. I don't have to work until tomorrow night. What's the big deal?” Another swig, and then he swayed. “Whoa,” he said.

“Mark...”

“Press,” Mark said. He stumbled on his tongue. “Press the shtart. The button.”
Derek rolled his eyes. “You are such an idiot.”

Mark poked Derek's knee. His face had turned a light cherry color. He took another swig. “Shhhut up, and race me, you pompous jerk.” He put the St. Magdalene on the coffee table, and he fumbled with his controller.

Derek couldn't help the smile that took over his face. He laughed. Not hard, but he laughed. And it felt liberating. Just a little. “No, do tell, Mark,” he said. “I think I'll like this version.”

“Jus press buttons,” Mark said. “First one to the... fffinish line...”

“Will be a miracle?”

“Yep,” Mark said, and they played. Somehow.
“Who’s got schizophrenia?” said a loud voice against her ear.

Meredith jumped and sent a stack of books tumbling to the floor. She almost fell out of her chair. Her heart thudded, and she clawed agitated hands through her tangled hair as she panted.

Cristina’s thin body crashed into the chair next to Meredith’s. She huffed, blowing black strands of her loose hair into the air. They sat in the back corner of the large research library. Meredith had picked the computer farthest from the door, facing all the rows of bookshelves, where nobody could look over her shoulder without some effort and some epic contortionist skills, or blatant nosiness. The sharp smell of new paper had mingled with the musty smell of old books as she’d started to pull up article after article after article.

“You shouldn’t sneak up on people like that,” Meredith snapped. Breath by breath, she calmed down. She’d let herself become too engrossed.

“I didn’t,” said Cristina. “I came in from the front. I said hi. I stood behind you for like three minutes. My pager even went off.”

“Oh,” said Meredith.

“So, how’d you dig up a patient with schizophrenia?” Cristina said. “The hospital is dead. I’ve been trolling the ER for hours. Did you get a surgery with shadow-Shepherd or something? Tell me you get to do a surgery. Something. Anything interesting.”

“Nobody’s got schizophrenia,” Meredith said. Derek? Not schizophrenic. You didn’t get schizophrenia from gunshot wounds. That was ridiculous. Right? Ridiculous. “That article was open already when I got here, and I didn’t want to lose somebody’s place. I was looking up other stuff.” She minimized the browser window that framed an article about anti-psychotic medications and their effects on patients diagnosed with schizophrenia. Behind it hovered mazes of other articles. Articles she had opened.

“Why do you want to know about post-traumatic stress?” Cristina said. “Is Derek acting weird?”

Meredith had started with easy research. Post-operative care for heart surgery patients. Stretching exercises to alleviate lower back pain. But nigglng suspicion had caused her to stray. She’d pulled up one article on post-traumatic stress disorder. And then she’d pulled up another. And another. Article upon terrifying article that regurgitated Derek’s symptoms to the letter all over the screen. She’d gotten lost in a nightmare, clicking link after related link, until her browser had about fifty articles open, and she had no idea which article said what anymore. Derek had post-traumatic stress disorder. She knew it. She knew it, and it made her insides twist and jumble, until she felt nauseated and cold and terrified inside. She thought of Owen. And the red marks she’d seen on Cristina’s neck the night he’d nearly strangled her. Derek… God.

No. Absolutely not.

She refused to let herself believe that Derek would sink that far. Hurting her or somebody else. He couldn’t. Derek didn’t hurt people. Not ever. She’d seen him snap and snarl and yell. If he got frustrated enough, he hit things. Inanimate things. Books. Papers. Door frames. Whatever. Not people. Never people. Well, Mark. He’d hit Mark. More than once. She wrung her hands together. No. Those times had been different. Unusual nexuses of bad, provoking events all piled onto one another. Derek did not hurt people.

But he didn't wet himself either. He didn't hide in dark bathrooms and shake like a freaking leaf with terror. He didn't startle over garbage trucks and tense when she touched him unexpectedly.

“Meredith,” Cristina said, her voice loud and piercing.

“Cristina...” Meredith said. But she couldn't find any words.

Cristina read the articles over Meredith's shoulder quietly. “Derek wasn't in combat for months,” she said. Simple. To the point. “He got shot by a maniac, and it was over in minutes. Seriously, Meredith. Think about it. Think hard. I mean, he might be a little messed up about it, but what's going on that makes you think he's actually got PTSD?”

“I...” Meredith said. She stared at the screen, and her vision blurred. White pages and black text turned mushy and spread into senseless gobs of gray. Maybe Cristina was right. But she didn't know about Derek's dad. And she didn't know the way Derek had been acting the last few days. Cristina didn't really know Derek at all, even on his normal days.

“More stuff you're not allowed to tell me?” Cristina said. She folded her arms across her chest.

“No,” Meredith said. “I just can't tell you. I won't. I won't talk about this with you. I want to. I want to gush until I'm gushed out because I think I might explode if I don't, but I can't, because he's my person, too, Cristina, and if I told you, I'd be stomping all over that.” She sighed. “I love you. You're my person. I'll always be grateful that you saved his life, and I'd do anything in my power to repay that, but I can't talk to you about this. Please, don't be mad at me. I can't take having somebody mad at me right now, especially not you.”

Cristina watched her. Seconds passed. She took a deep breath and settled her shoulders. “Do you need me to be supportive? I can be supportive. You don't have to get specific.”

“Are you still scared of Owen sometimes?” Meredith said.

“Sometimes,” Cristina said. “He's gotten a lot better since he started therapy with Dr. Wyatt. And he's never touched me again. Not once.” She frowned. “Did Derek hurt you?”

“No,” Meredith said. “It's not like that. Or, I don't think it's like that. Or, I'm trying to convince myself it's not like that, and I'm failing dismally at it. Or, I'm—”

“Stop,” Cristina demanded. “PTSD develops from fear. People do one of two things when they're scared. They fight, or they run. They're aggressive, or they cower. Owen fights. Which one did Derek pick?”

Meredith shivered as her brain took out a broom and a dust pail and recollected her shattered resolve. She took a deep, cleansing breath, and she blew it out, sending wisps of hair flying. Guilt roiled in her gut as she realized where the train she'd gotten on had been heading. Derek wouldn't hurt her. He wouldn't hurt anyone. Gary Clark had set a monster free, but Derek wasn't a vehicle. He was a victim. Plain and simple.

Cristina nodded. “I thought so. I mean, people might not respond the same way every time, but if he's established a pretty good pattern of flight over fight...”

Meredith scraped tear tracks away. “I can't decide if I should be insulted or relieved that you think he's a coward.”
Cristina’s lips pressed into a line. “Running away from a man with a gun doesn’t make you a coward, Meredith. It makes you smart. The aggressive ones are the idiots.”

Meredith snorted. “We stayed and fought,” she said, her voice soft. “Are you saying we’re idiots?”

“Yes, but I don’t regret it.”

“How’s Owen?”

Cristina snorted. “Macho and fine. Or he says he is. If his hands start to twitch while he’s recuperating, though, I swear I’m telling the Chief with a bullhorn and a neon sign.”

“No more bank robberies?” Meredith said.

Cristina grunted and didn’t answer. She glanced at her watch. “If you're done panicking,” she said, “I need to get back to the ER. It’ll be just my luck if I missed something. I can’t afford to miss something. I'm the most awesome resident we have. I need to maintain my hardcore rep.”

Meredith grinned. “I don't think you're in danger of losing that anytime soon. Did you take a single day off?”

“No.” Cristina shrugged. “Are you okay, now?”

Something dark and scary and shivery welled up in Meredith’s chest. She swallowed against the huge, awful lump that formed in her throat. She nodded, and she closed all the browser windows. She couldn’t look at this crap anymore. Reading articles about post-traumatic stress made her paranoid and upset and more worried than she’d been when she’d started, and she had no better idea how to help Derek than before. She’d wasted her time. Wasted Derek's.

She was a stupid, stupid idiot. You couldn’t research this crap like some kind of paint-by-numbers surgery to perform.

“I need help,” Meredith said.

Cristina rolled her eyes. “Clearly.”

“You shut up,” Meredith said. “But thank you. I mean it.”

“As long as we don't hug.”

“Never that,” Meredith said. “I'm good, now.”

When Cristina turned to leave, Meredith called after her. Cristina turned. “What now?”

“Can you do me a favor?”

“Does it involve giving you surgeries?”

“No, just—” Meredith sighed. “When you stop by the house to visit, don’t barge in. Just... Knock and wait at the front door or something? Please.”

Cristina’s stare peeled away layers from Meredith’s body, to the point that Meredith felt like an onion, labeled and bared on a plate. Maybe she didn't have to tell Cristina anything at all. Maybe she'd figured it all out on her own.

“I can do that,” Cristina said, her voice soft, and then she left.
“I think I've got PTSD or something,” Meredith blurted. “How do I fix it?”

She gripped the doorknob so hard it made her hand ache. The fish tank at the far end of the room burbled. Silence stretched. Dr. Wyatt looked up from her book and schooled her eyes on Meredith, who hadn't knocked, scheduled an appointment, or done anything to otherwise hint to Dr. Wyatt that she might be stopping by that day. Meredith swallowed as she felt heat lick across her face.

She probably should have knocked. At least that. But she'd sort of... blanked. Just blanked. She'd let Cristina talk her off the ledge after hours in the research library, but then she'd started drifting into dark and twisty mazes of worry and fear again on the long walk to Dr. Wyatt's office. Derek wouldn't hurt anyone. But that didn't make him okay. He was far, far from okay. And she had no idea how to fix it. No idea how to help. When she'd felt lost before, that had been nothing compared to how she felt now. She wasn't even sure she was on the planet Earth anymore.

Dr. Wyatt put her book to the side by her hip, crossed her legs, and folder her hands in her lap.

“I'm sorry,” Meredith said. “I'm sorry. I should have made an appointment. You're probably busy with all the very traumatized people, and I'm not particularly traumatized. I mean, I am. I have PTSD. But it can wait. It's not like it'll just go away. And, I don't want to bother you with—”

“Meredith,” said Dr. Wyatt. “Seattle Grace is a ghost town. The only people who are overworked in this hospital right now are the specialized trauma counselors they brought in.”

“So, you're not busy.”

“Free as a bird.”

“Oh.”

“What makes you think you have post-traumatic stress disorder?”

Meredith stared, and the blankness returned. “Well, I...” This was it. “I mean...” This was where Dr. Wyatt would tell her that everything was not fine. “Since the shooting...” Not fine at all. “Since...” That Derek would need help. “It's just been wrong...” The kind of help that involved being committed in a straight jacket, or doped into catatonia, or something else awful. “I don't know myself anymore...” Or...

She snapped awake to the sound of his disturbed muttering. Nonsensical syllables that probably made words, wherever he was in his head, but they made garbage in the real world. Darkness hovered in the air, so thick and opaque she almost felt like she could reach out and touch it. She'd drawn the shades when she'd brought him home, and she'd left them down, so he could sleep in their bedroom whenever he wanted, daylight or not. The thick shades made the days dark, and the nights black as pitch. She rolled into him and splayed a hand against his twitching body. She rubbed, and she whispered. Warmth radiated from his skin, and she pressed her cheek against him.

“It's okay,” she said. “It's over. You're okay.”

She repeated herself until the muscles in his body tightened all at once, and then relaxed. A soft, sighing breath filled the space between them. He lay still. With the pillows propped under his side the way they were, he had next to zero ability to move on his own, not without clawing at the mattress for leverage and pulling with his arms, something he wasn't allowed to do, and probably had no desire to do either, given how painful it would be trying to drag his body weight across a resisting surface.

“Derek?” she whispered.
Silence stretched. She wondered if he’d fallen asleep, or if he’d never woken up. She pressed her nose into his shoulder and curled up, careful to avoid jarring him. He said it didn't hurt. He'd said so multiple times, but...

He kissed her forehead.

“Hey,” she said.

He didn't speak. She found his hand in the darkness and gripped it. He squeezed her palm. A rumbling breath hit her skin. The sheets rustled. With effort, he shifted. She helped, wincing when she heard his breaths tighten. Pain. His hand gripped her hip, like he wished he could pull her against him and spoon with her. He liked to do that, but he couldn't sleep on his side anymore, couldn't tip his larger frame over her smaller body. She settled against him as close as she could manage. She ran her foot down his leg in a long, reassuring stroke. His skin twitched. Her big toe brushed the ball of his ankle. She squiggled her toes against the soft hairs on his skin.

His breaths stretched as he made precarious inroads back to sleep.

“Meredith? Hello?”

“I have nightmares,” Meredith said, and then her brain kicked into gear and examples and purpose plowed over her rambling. “And I space out. I mean, I know I’m on lots of painkillers, but I’ve seen tons of people on painkillers, and they don’t usually make people act like reality sieves. My temper is on a really short fuse. And I’m scared. All the time. Noises make me jumpy. Strangers and unexpected guests terrify me to the point that I can't function. I'm not eating. I cry all the time, too.”

“Derek doesn't have PTSD,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“How did you—”

“Maybe have a seat?” Dr. Wyatt said. “Close the door?”

Meredith shook her head. “Right. Right, sorry.” The door whispered closed. She skittered across the room, and collapsed into Dr. Wyatt's squishy, comfy, overly-relaxing couch, but she sat like a steel rod, straight and tense.

“We all saw the casualty lists,” Dr. Wyatt said. “I know he was seriously hurt. And most people suffering after a trauma aren't able to give me handy laundry lists of symptoms like that.”

“Well, if it's not PTSD...” Meredith clenched her fingers. “Are you sure it's not PTSD? I mean really, really sure?”

“100% certain.”

“How?” Meredith asked. “You haven’t even seen him. He matches all the articles. All of them. And I read bunches and bunches.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “Post-traumatic stress disorder is a condition that appears well after a traumatic episode. Months. Sometimes even years. Have you heard of acute stress disorder?”

Meredith frowned. “No, but it sounds just as bad.”

“Well, it's acute, which is somewhat better. It's very common for people who have experienced a serious traumatic event to exhibit PTSD-like symptoms in the days and weeks following the event.
Everyone copes differently and at different paces. I would be more concerned if he wasn't upset at all. Dissociation can be a dangerous animal.”

Meredith stared. Her jaw clenched to the point that her teeth hurt. Overwhelming, gut-wrenching hope tore her innards to shreds. She grabbed at the hemline of her scrubs and scrunched and wrinkled and fiddled because her hands needed something to do, and she didn't think Dr. Wyatt would like it much if she grabbed one of the periodicals lying on the coffee table and started ripping it to shreds. Her scrubs didn't fare so well. A thread at the hem worked loose. She—

Dr. Wyatt cleared her throat. Meredith followed her pointed glance. With a blush, Meredith dropped her abused hemline and grabbed one of the squishy stress balls from the pile in the wicker basket by the couch on the floor.

“So, it's actually good that he's a freaking basket case with anger management issues?” Meredith said as she mashed the stress ball into more of a stress pancake, or a stress jellybean, or a stress... something not round.

“It's not good, Meredith,” Dr. Wyatt said. “But it's perfectly normal. Really, it is.”

“Acute means it will be over soon?” Meredith said.

“That's entirely dependent on him,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Meredith bit her lip. She felt a little bad, heaping his short temper into the long list of symptoms she'd spouted. He hurt. All the time. He got very little sound sleep. Whether pain or nightmares woke him up, he didn't get much more than two or three hours of rest at a time. He couldn't sleep on his stomach, which she knew bothered him, not only because of the painful stress it put on his abused back, but because he liked sleeping on his stomach. He was one of those people who started on his back, usually, but in the course of the night, moved onto his side or his stomach, often waking up that way in the morning, buried under blankets, flat, warm, and eye-level with the mattress or stuck with his nose in the crook of her neck. But that had been taken from him. He couldn't even roll without being shocked awake with a flare of agony. Even without Gary Clark in the mix, if she'd been working under the same weeks-long list of annoyances, she would be spitting and snarling over every little thing as well.

But she didn't count simple instances of exhaustion. She didn't count the snapping because he couldn't make it up the steps without breaking a sweat, or because he couldn't carry milk to the table for his breakfast and had to ask her, or because he couldn't get into the shower by himself, or because he hurt and needed to shift to his other side in the middle of the night. Well, she tried not to, though they didn't help skew her perception in a positive direction.

No. He had a dark, dangerous quality to him at times, unrelated to simple negativity. The day Amelia had arrived, he'd been a seething, coiled mess of unexpressed fury. After he'd heard the answering machine messages, he'd been ready to explode into a thousand Derek pieces. In those moments, something twisty and bad said quite clearly that something was not right with him. Not right at all.

“How do I help him?” Meredith said. “Please, I want to help him.”

“Offer him love and support,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Meredith tossed her stress ball back into the basket. “That's it? That's your freaking expert advice?” The aquarium burbled. She watched two thumb-sized, shiny cylinders swim back and forth near the floor, ignored by the larger colorful fish. Guppies? Who knew? I feel like an amnesiac guppy or
Dr. Wyatt shrugged. “He'll talk if he wants to, but don't pressure him if he doesn't. He experienced something he found terrifying, something that engendered feelings of helplessness and horror. His mind is trying to figure out how to cope with that. You have to let him heal at his own pace, but you can't let him wallow, either.”

“That's seriously it? Love and support? That's it?” Meredith said. “I worried all day to the point of possibly vomiting. He's sick and stressed and it scares the hell out of me because it scares the hell out of him. You haven't seen him. He—” I thought I was going to die. I don't want to die. “You don't think he should be in therapy or something? Dr. Hunt is in therapy for his stress stuff.”

Dr. Wyatt stared at her for a long time, and Meredith wondered, for a moment, if she'd said something wrong, but she couldn't tell for sure. If there's one thing Meredith had learned over the weeks she'd come here, it's that Dr. Wyatt had a freaking excellent poker face. Royal flush, full house, a pair of twos, or diddly squat, the face Dr. Wyatt showed was always the same. Calm. Receptive.

“I'm happy to book an appointment for Derek if he wants one,” Dr. Wyatt said, “But it's not something I'd say is absolutely necessary at this juncture, as long as he's talking to someone, unless you think he's a danger to himself or to others. Do you think he might intentionally inflict harm on himself or on somebody else?”

Cold spears slipped down her throat. She clenched the arm of the chair. “You think Derek would hurt himself? Like secret cutting or...”

“That's what I'm asking you, Meredith. I don't think anything about this.”

“But that's the sort of question you have to ask for this. That's how freaking bad this is. I knew it.” Meredith stood, and she paced. She paced until the cheerful, bright, bubbly colors made her dizzy and ready to hurl. Her vision blurred. “Derek wouldn't...”

“Meredith,” said Dr. Wyatt, her voice soft and low. “What you and Derek are going through can be something very scary at times. But it's a normal process after a traumatic event like a shooting. I'm asking these questions because I want to make sure what you're going through isn't abnormal. That's all.”

“He wouldn't hurt anyone. And he wouldn't hurt himself. Not on purpose. Never.”

“If you're so sure,” Dr. Wyatt said, “Then why are you getting upset?”

“I'm not upset,” Meredith said.

“The trough in my carpet indicates otherwise.”

Meredith halted by the fish tank. Bright blue and orange fish fluttered by in the water, and then the guppy things came out from behind the fake weeds. She took a deep breath and forced herself back onto the ugly orange couch. She petted the edge of the upholstery.

“Derek is the sweetest man I've ever met,” Meredith said. Go home, Meredith. “Usually. Usually, he's the sweetest man I've ever met. But he has a really nasty mean streak that pops out when he's stressed or hurting, and he does stupid, hateful stuff he doesn't mean like batting beer cans and engagement rings into the woods, or almost calling me a whore, or making stupid threats about never wanting to see me again. I don't want him to be like Owen. I don't. And I keep convincing myself he wouldn't be, but then I remember the way the baseball bat cracked when he beat my ring into the woods. He called me a lemon, and he yelled. He yelled really loud, and he—"

“So, when he's under stress, you're saying Derek tends to vent in a manner that seems atypical to his usual demeanor?”

“Yes,” Meredith said, and then she fell apart. Her breaths became chaotic and painful as she sobbed, and tears blurred everything away into a mess of bright and fun colors that mocked her with cheer she couldn't feel. “Gary Clark nearly killed my husband, and we lost a baby, and Alex is in the ICU still eating almost exclusively Jell-O. Isn't that enough? Isn't it enough that Mr. Clark did all that? He can't take what makes Derek Derek. He can't do that. It isn't fair. It isn't freaking fair.”

Exhaustion made her flop flat onto the couch, panting, and she cried. “Derek needs to be Derek. I need it. He nearly died, and I need him to be him. I can deal with him needing help and being tired and in pain, but what if he—”

“All right,” said Dr. Wyatt. “All right. Let's stop and assess for a minute.”

“Assess?” Meredith growled, sitting up. She wiped tears away, but unruly tear ducts replaced them in seconds. “Assess what? What's there to assess about me not wanting my husband to strangle me?”

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward on her knees. “Meredith, I know that you've been through something horrifying, something that I wouldn't ever wish on another human being. I know how difficult and exhausting it is at home when you're trying to take care of a loved one who's been physically disabled in some way. I know that you love Cristina like a sister, and I also know that it's very tempting to use her life as a frame of reference for your own. But let's take a step back and calm down for a moment. Can you breathe for me?”

“I'm not making this about Cristina,” Meredith said. “This is about Derek being sick. He's sick, and I need to know how to fix it so this crap doesn't happen!”

Dr. Wyatt glanced at her watch. “I know. I know you want to help him. So, why don't you just relax. Five minutes. Just sit and breathe.”

“How is that helping Derek?”

“Meredith...”

Meredith nodded, though it felt more like a shiver, or a muscle spasm. “Sorry,” she said. “I'm sorry. I was fine until—”

“Meredith,” said Dr. Wyatt. She held her hand in the air, fingers splayed. “Five minutes.”

In other words, shut the hell up.

Meredith grabbed another stress ball and squeezed until her knuckles hurt. She breathed, deep and long, forcing her lungs to empty to the point of ache. Her diaphragm clenched. The seconds crept past. She kneaded the stress ball. Don't die. Please, you don't get to die. She closed her eyes and tried not to see him there, lying on the floor in a spreading puddle of his own blood. She'd been fine. He'd been getting better, and she'd been fine. Except the way she made herself feel better, by looking at him, wasn't going to work when he was stuck at home, injured, and she was at the hospital. She forced herself to think of something else. Something Derek, but not Derek on the ground in an expanding lake of blood.
When she came home in the early evening from running errands, the house was absent voices and movement and other sure signs of life. The steady rumble of speeding cars fill the silence, but as she put her purse down in the foyer and headed into the living room, the deep sounds of snoring split away from the general ruckus.

Both Mark and Derek had passed out, Mark on the floor in a gangly, loose heap, and Derek in his usual spot, sitting on the left side of the couch, propped up by mountains of pillows and wrapped up in heaps of blankets. Actually, he didn't look like he'd moved an inch since she'd settled him before she'd left, though he must have, unless she were to believe he'd gone six hours without using the bathroom or shifting a single muscle.

She glanced at her watch, and a spike of worry hit, but then she noticed all of Derek's pill bottles lined up in an uneven row on the coffee table next to an open bottle of Derek's scotch and two empty glasses. When she'd left, Derek's pill bottles had been upstairs on his nightstand, which meant Mark or Derek had moved them. She hoped Mark had been sober enough to bring Derek some water to take his pills with and not given Derek a glass of freaking scotch, though she doubted Derek would have drank scotch if Mark had offered it, even as out of it as he was. You couldn't drink more than a sip of that stuff without setting your esophagus on fire. Derek probably would have noticed his esophagus on fire. She stopped worrying about it as she watched him sleep, undisturbed despite Mark's endless racket.

The television flickered against Derek's face, giving his pale skin a haunting glow. Dark, fleshy circles hung under his eyes, and he looked exhausted despite his slumber, but the redness around his eyelids had faded, and his skin didn't look irritated from tears anymore. Absent a constant stream of fresh, punishing blush, he looked better. Just a little.

She tiptoed to the couch, bent over the arm, and she kissed him on the lips. When she pulled back, his eyes opened, and she stared into dark, blue-black depths. “Hey,” she said, “Did I wake you? I'm sorry.”

He made a noise. Not a yes or a no. She wasn't sure what. She grabbed the remote and turned off the television, dumping them into darkness and silence save for the brutal assault of Mark's snoring. “Do you want some water or anything?”

The comforter rustled, and Derek nodded. She went to the kitchen, careful to step around the lump that was Mark, and filled a glass of water for Derek. When she returned, she flipped on the lamp beside the sofa. He turned away, blinking.

“Sorry,” she said as she sat next to him. She held out the glass for him.

When his eyes had adjusted, he took the glass. He sipped until the water disappeared, and he set the glass down on the coffee table with a soft thud next to the other empty glasses. He leaned against her shoulder and rested, eyelids hovering half-shut. She pulled her fingers through his hair, but he just sat there, passive, not speaking.

“More water?” she said.

“No, thanks,” he replied. He sounded a bit hoarse, but better.

“Alex is improving,” she said. “I stopped by Seattle Presbyterian before I did my shopping. He's talking a lot. A whole lot. They're trying to get him back on solid foods, and Dr. Weston said he wants to move Alex out of ICU in another day or two if he keeps improving.”

“Who's Dr. Weston?”
“Alex's doctor at Seattle Presbyterian. They're pretty nice over there. Seattle Presbyterian definitely has less of a budget than we do, but the people are qualified, and Alex is getting better in leaps, so...”

“Hmm.”

A smile curled at her lips. “Did you win your game thing?” she said. “Mark looks pretty freaking sloshed.”

“I have no idea,” Derek said. “I'm not sure if he passed out before or after I fell asleep, and I'm not sure whether that preceded or succeeded us finishing a lap. We crashed a lot.” His words croaked at the end, like he'd strained his vocal cords a bit too much. She kissed his throat. He yawned, and he blinked. His eyes watered, and he yawned again.

“Why don't you go back to sleep?” she suggested. “I really didn't mean to wake you up.” She gestured at Mark's body on the floor as he snored. “I figured if you could sleep through that, you could sleep through a little kiss.”

The blankets rustled. He liberated his other arm from underneath, and he squinted at his watch in the dim light. 8:30PM. Not late. But not early. He scrunched his nose and peered blearily toward the foyer.

“Would you help me with the stairs?” he said.

She blinked. Not once, not a single time in the last twelve days, had she heard him ask for help that bluntly. In fact, she didn't think he'd ever said the word help. Not ever. He might tell her he couldn't do something, but he always forced her to infer that he needed assistance. Always.

“Are you sure?” she said. “You look pretty wiped. You could sleep down here tonight.”

“I'll go slow,” he said, his voice soft. “I just want to lie down in my own bed. Please.”

“Okay,” she said. She bit her lip, trying to decide if his request was good or bad. He sounded beaten. Like he'd had enough of trying to fight with the inevitable for the day.

Her eyes watered before she could stop them as she remembered his steady stream of embarrassed
I-can'ts when he couldn't put on his pants. And from there, she remembered how he'd been shaking and so tired and defeated and stripped of his pride that he'd almost fallen asleep in his wet pajamas. She clenched her teeth and forced the imagery away from her mind's eye. No. No, he didn't need this. He didn't need to see her upset when he clearly had enough upset for the both of them, though Mark had, at least, seemed to keep Derek from drowning in it.

Derek stood with effort that leached the remaining color from his face. His spine ratcheted straight as he slowly unfurled, vertebrae by vertebrae, in a way that looked almost painful. He rested against her, collecting his breaths into something composed as he clutched her shoulders.
And then he moved.

She wrapped an arm around his waist, and true to his word, he didn't rush or push himself. He moved like a rickety old man with arthritis. His disheveled hair, five-o'-clock shadow, and ratty pajamas framed him with fragile effect. He made a small distressed sound as the pads of his feet spread on the first step, but he forced himself onward.

He leaned on her instead of just letting her trail behind him for support. He took five minute breaks at a third and two-thirds of the way up, and again when he got to the top. The dark circles under his eyes seemed darker, and he held his body in a way that spoke of undeniable exhaustion.
The flight of steps that had taken him twelve minutes in the morning took him twenty-two long, difficult minutes that time.

He scaled the wall as he moved down the hall, resting every few steps, eyes glazed and dead as he stared at the door to their room. She tried to ignore how much his hands trembled. Fatigue? Pain? She couldn't tell.

When he finally reached the bed, he pulled back the covers on his side, and he lay down flat with his eyes shut. After seconds of preparation, he sucked in a breath, and he rolled to his right, shivering as he held the painful position for her. She jammed the pillows underneath him and had him on his back again in less than ten seconds. She'd gotten good.

“Okay?” she said as he flattened out and relaxed.

“Yeah,” he said. “More water?”

“Sure,” she said, smiling, despite the worried gnats buzzing in her gut. This wasn't normal, this beaten, given-up Derek. “I'll be right back.”

He stared at the ceiling as she brought a full glass of water to him. She helped him tilt up so he could drink without choking, and when he'd finished, she pulled the blankets over his body. His breaths evened out, but he didn't sleep. He gazed at nothing in particular, eyes blank.

He didn't ask her to stay, but she didn't care. She slipped off her flip flops, and she crawled under the covers next to him. She reached across his body and turned off the lamp at his bedside. The angle he tilted at, facing the bedroom floor instead of the center of the mattress, with a wall of pillows between them, made him impossible to spoon, but she could get close. Sort of. She draped an arm over the flat of his stomach, and she rested with her face against the nape of his neck. His warm skin radiated against her. She kissed him.

“Better?” she said.

“Hmm.”

She stroked his stomach and let her eyelids dip. “I'll get better, Derek,” she murmured. “Two weeks. I promise. You'll feel better.”

He didn't answer. He slept.

“Okay,” said Dr. Wyatt, and the clear picture of Derek lying flat in Meredith's arms evaporated. “Now,” said Dr. Wyatt, “Let's discard what you know about Dr. Hunt. All right? Dr. Hunt isn't married to you. He doesn't live with you. He's not the issue, here. Derek is.”

“Okay,” said Meredith.

“You mentioned Derek's done some mean things.”

“He has.”

“You mentioned he got pretty agitated once. That he was hitting things with a baseball bat?”

“He was.”

“Did you ever feel physically threatened when he did this?”

She didn't even have to think about it. “Of course not. He was hitting cans. And my ring.”
“But he was wielding a blunt weapon. He was angry and hitting things.”

“I wasn't scared,” Meredith said. “He yelled, but he didn't touch me. He didn't crowd me.”

“So,” Dr. Wyatt said. “You've seen him when he's actively expressed fury in a violent manner, but you felt safe.”

“Yes.”

“All right,” said Dr. Wyatt. “So, let's fast forward a bit. What has Derek done, specifically, that got you so upset that you came to my office?”

“I already told you.”

“You gave me a list of things that aren't right. But what did Derek do that upset you so badly that you came here? Something specific must have triggered this heightened concern.”

Meredith jammed her thumbs into the stress ball. She closed her eyes.

“Mark brought Derek a glass of water while he was sleeping,” she said. Tears welled up in her eyes as the sound of his terrified wail echoed in her head, over and over. For a long time, she hadn't even realized the awful noise had emanated from Derek, but she'd pieced it together as he'd retreated from the room, wet streaks marring the front of his pants. “Derek woke up. I guess he'd been having a nightmare or something. I don't know. I didn't see it happen. But he freaked out and tried to get away. Like really freaked out. He wet his pants. He was so terrified, he lost control of his bladder, and I...” Her voice cracked. “I don't...” A sob broke loose. “I want to know what to do. Please. Please, tell me what to do that will make it better.”

She wiped her face with her hands and stared at her feet.

“Hyper-vigilance and an overactive startle response are very typical of assault victims, Meredith,” Dr. Wyatt said. “But I know it's deeply disturbing to see a loved one so upset.”

“It's really not unusual?” Meredith said. She forced herself to look at Dr. Wyatt. Really look. “What about the space out sessions? Because those seem pretty freaking weird.”

“Dissociation. When he's not paying attention to the world, he's not hurt or frightened. He's created a safety zone for himself.”

“But you said dissociation was a dangerous animal! Are we talking about, like, the killer rabbit from Monty Python dangerous, or what exactly?”

“Anything is dangerous when you do it too much, Meredith,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Dissociation is a mental defense mechanism. A sort of... self-hypnosis. It allows us to separate ourselves from reality. It helps us avoid processing negative emotions before we're ready.”

“When I brought him home, for a while, it was like the house wasn't even real to him,” Meredith said.

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “A perfect example, then. Normal people experience an extremely mild, less immersive form of dissociation all the time.”

“Like what?”

“Daydreaming. Haven't you ever pictured yourself lying on a beach somewhere to save yourself from some stress or boredom?”

“Well, yeah. I guess.”

“Derek is emotionally stressed. He's giving his mind a temporary respite. As long as he's still addressing his feelings in a gradual manner, and as long as he becomes responsive when you stimulate him, I don't see a reason to worry.”

When you space out, where do you go?

Dunno. Some place with you, usually.

Dr. Wyatt licked her lips. She pressed her hands into her thighs, and she stood. She went to her desk and pulled loose a sheet of paper from a thick, uniform pile several inches high. She crossed the room, and as she proffered the paper to Meredith, she sat down on the couch. The cushion next to Meredith sank with Dr. Wyatt's weight.

“What is this?” Meredith said. She clutched the paper with one hand, stress ball quashed in the fist of the same palm. She stared, but tears made it hard to read. Hard to turn blur into words. She scrubbed at her face.

“It's a pamphlet on assault victimization that the Seattle PD provided the hospital,” Dr. Wyatt said. “I'm surprised they didn't send Derek one in the mail.”

“Derek got a big packet, but he threw it out without opening it,” Meredith said. She closed her eyes and watched him in her mind's eye as she smashed the stress ball and reshaped it. The mail from Detective Wolff had been stuffed in their mailbox – a thick, beat up, contorted manilla envelope with a red tie and Meredith's address written with a fat black marker. Derek had seen the return address. His lip had curled like he'd sniffed something rotting, and he'd tossed the envelope into the trashcan. Meredith saw the white plastic top of the trashcan swing back and forth with the disturbance. She heard the thud as the heavy packet hit the bottom. She'd let him do it. She hadn't gone through the trash later to fish it out. She'd been an idiot.

When she opened her eyes, she saw words. And diagrams and illustrations. Her frantic desperation to find answers made her skim past the section she already knew. What is assault? She freaking knew that. She stopped at the survivor section.

Her eyes darted back and forth. Victims may feel irrational guilt over being attacked. I'm sorry. Humiliation. I couldn't get away. Shock. A man shot me, Mere, and I... They may ask why this happened to to them. Why? Or they may express anger over being victimized. Victims may be fearful of a repeat incident, however unlikely. I don't want to die. Survivors often experience nightmares and flashbacks. They may be easier to startle. I know what it is. They may appear to be or feel like they're living in a daze, and they may have trouble concentrating. When can I go home?

“He...” she said, but her words died as she read to the last paragraph and got stuck like a squirming bug in a web on the very last sentence. Survivors of aggravated assault are often disturbed by new feelings of vulnerability and a loss of control. I was going to die. I'm still alive because the fucking universe thought it would be funny. “Oh, god,” she whispered, her voice wrecked in her throat. “This is...”

I need it to stop.

“Familiar?” Dr. Wyatt said.

Meredith's hands shook, and the paper fluttered. “Yes. Yes, it is.”
“Okay,” said Dr. Wyatt. “So, now, you have an appropriate frame of reference to make sense of what you've been seeing. I'll ask again. Do you think he might intentionally inflict harm on himself or on somebody else?”

Meredith swallowed. “No. No, he wouldn't. He wouldn't hurt anybody,” she said. And she realized, this time, that she meant it. He'd been nothing but gentle with her. He'd never once pushed her away, even when he'd tensed up in her arms, and she'd clearly startled him. When Mark had kept Derek captive in his arms, Derek had been violent, then, but as soon as he'd been released, all he'd done was get away. He just wanted to get away. He didn't want to fight. Come to think of it, he'd done the same thing when he'd been batting beer cans. He'd slammed the trailer door on her. Retreated. Told her to leave.

She didn't know what had happened in the past with Mark that made him okay to hit, but she suspected, upon thinking on it, that angry pugilism had become ingrained behavior through years and years of repetition. They'd grown up together, and somewhere in that long path, they'd established that fighting and violence was how they worked out their differences. It made a twisted sort of sense.

Relief made her shake, even as she sniffled again with guilt. He'd been living with this. All of this. She'd thought he'd been getting worse, but he hadn't. Not really. She'd just been catching different pieces of it, and the worst piece just happened to be the incident most recent in her memory. This was like an iceberg or whatever. She saw the tip. She saw different jags of it, depending what angle she looked at him from. The rest of the badness loitered in his head, under the water, huge and cold and dark, dangerous enough to sink ships, but invisible to the naked eye.

“He's scared,” she said. “He's just scared. And the whole reason he's flipping out is because he doesn't want to die. He wouldn't hurt himself.”

“He's told you this?”

“That he doesn't want to die? Word for word, emphatically yes.”

“So, he's talking to you, then,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“A little.” Meredith shrugged. “Derek doesn't really like to talk about his feelings or whatever.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “That's very typical. American culture has sort of dictated that men are supposed to be strong, and that's a hard mentality to shake when there's such overwhelming societal pressure to adhere.” She stood and returned to her chair, and the clinical distance between them reverted into something a mile wide. “The point is, though,” Dr. Wyatt said, “That he's chosen you as his confidant for the times he does talk, and that he is talking when he really needs to. Yes?”

“I guess so.”

“You guess?”

“Yes,” Meredith said. “Yes, I mean. He might be talking to Mark, too... I don't know for sure. But he talks. To me. When he can figure out the words, he talks.”

“All right,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Has he spoken to you about how he felt when he was shot?”

“Not much, but some.”

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward, and she clenched her fists together. “It's vital that he has support, Meredith. I can't stress that enough. But as long as he's talking with somebody he's comfortable with, I don't think there's any urgent need for him to be in therapy. Not yet, anyway.”

“So, that's really it?” Meredith said. “Just talk if he wants to talk, and leave him alone if he doesn't?”

“Spend time with him,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Just being in the same room can help, even if you're not really doing anything together. Don't let him isolate himself, but don't smother him, either. Let him make decisions wherever feasible. Help emphasize to him what he can control, rather than what he can't.”

All the websites and home care packets said no more than a single trip up and down the steps per day, but she didn't protest whenever he went up and down twice or three times or however many times he wanted, as long as he waited for her to be there so he wouldn't fall. She didn't make him stop when he wanted to be productive despite her misgivings, despite how much she thought he should be resting. He'd cleaned the house a bit. He couldn't push or pull a vacuum cleaner, but he hadn't even tried. He'd just dusted with a rag and a spritzer, and he'd picked up clutter. He'd folded laundry. He'd made dinner once, too, and he'd made coffee in the mornings. He'd even spent some time sorting things in his office, and she'd left him alone. She'd made a varsity sport out of forcing herself not to mother hen him death. She let him choose all the time.

“But I'm already doing all that,” Meredith said. “I think. Unless I think he's going to kill himself through sheer stupidity.”

“Then you're doing fine.”

“You don't need to prescribe anything? Or...”

“I could, and I do in some cases,” Dr. Wyatt said. “But I prefer not to use chemicals as a first method of attack. Society today is all about now, now, now, and pills are fast and easy. But medication won't address any of the underlying issues that caused the problem in the first place unless it's a genuine disease. And, as much as I'd like to make a political commentary on violence in the world today, the mental refuse that results from a failed murder attempt is not a disease. It's an open wound.”

“I've been so afraid for him,” Meredith said. Her eyes ached. “I thought...”

“PTSD is still a danger, eventually, if he doesn't learn to process his experience in a healthy way,”
Dr. Wyatt said. “And some of the symptoms you mentioned to start with sound a little more like depression than PTSD. You should keep an eye on those.”

“Like what?”

“Not eating. Crying a lot. How is he, physically?”

I'm tired. All the time.

“He's better, but he's still in pain, and he can't do a lot of things,” Meredith said. “He sleeps for a lot of the day. You do give stuff for depression, right? Anti-depressants? Should he be on those?”

“It's only been two weeks since his injury,” said Dr. Wyatt. “He might start feeling better on his own, once he's healed more physically. Give him some time. Let's not treat a few cracks in the foundation with a wrecking ball just yet.”

“How much time?”
“There's no certain answer to that.”

“That's not very freaking helpful,” Meredith said.

“You're living with him,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Use your best judgment. If his health steadily improves, but his state-of-mind doesn't, that might be an indication that he needs more help than you can reasonably provide.”

“But what if I'm wrong?”

“Then you're wrong, and we'll work from there,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Psychiatry and counseling aren't exact sciences.”

“I just want him to be okay,” Meredith said. “I'd do anything or trade anything. And now you've told me I'm just supposed to sit there and be supportive and hope he heals or whatever.”

Dr. Wyatt stared at her for a long moment that made Meredith's face heat. The woman's eyes scrunched as she thought about... something. She stood, and she went to her desk. She pulled out a thick leather-bound day planner, a steno pad, and a fat, shiny pen from the top drawer. The drawer made a soft scraping sound as Dr. Wyatt pushed it shut. “I want you to schedule appointments with me once a week every week for the next few months,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Do Thursdays still work for you? I have an empty block in the afternoons.”

Dr. Wyatt returned to her chair with the day planner clasped under her elbow. She clicked the pen open as she sat down. Meredith frowned. The pen and the steno pad meant she was being therapied. She hadn't come here to get therapied. She'd come here to get help for Derek.

“Are you familiar with a condition known as compassion fatigue?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“No.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “It's exhausting, watching a loved one suffer. Isn't it?”

“Wait,” Meredith said. “Wait just a freaking minute.” She clenched her knees, but that hurt. It hurt, so she grabbed the stress ball she'd dropped on the couch by her hip. “So, Derek gets acute stress whatever with a heaping side of post-operative depression, and he can stay home, but I frown because my husband is hurt, and you want me in therapy again? How does that even work?”

Dr. Wyatt pursed her lips and took a breath. “Derek needs to feel safe and comfortable talking to you. How does it make you feel when he tells you things about his experience?”

“I don't know.” Meredith shrugged. “Happy? That he talks?”

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward. “Think about it, Meredith. He experienced an extreme reaction to being woken up unexpectedly. He was frightened. His fight-or-flight response took over his body, and he urinated on himself. Surgeons tend to be very control-oriented people, and he lost control of something very basic. I imagine this caused him severe emotional distress.” Meredith nodded. “Did he talk to you afterward?” Meredith nodded again. “And how did that make you feel?”

When she handed him the clean pajama pants, he lost it. The low, deep, monotone moan of sheer anguish made the hairs on the back of her neck stand on end. He blinked, his mouth open in a grimace of suffering. In the pale blue glow of the nightlight, she saw the shimmer of tears against his skin. And then the discordant, endless, miserable hum vibrating from his chest broke into painful, sucking sobs that wrenched his entire body.

She froze as her stomach dropped out from her body and her muscles shivered with stress. She'd never seen this. She didn't know what... She... Derek didn't. He just didn't.

Without thinking, she collapsed next to him, squeezing into the tiny space between him and the toilet seat. The cold porcelain dug into her thigh, but she didn't care. She wrapped her arms around him, and she whispered in his ear. “It's okay,” she said, even though she knew it wasn't. In the crushing weight of uncertainty and uncharted territory, those two words were the only things she could think of to say, though all they did was make that stupid Fleetwood Mac song play over and over in her head, because she was suddenly its poster child. Telling lies, telling sweet little lies. This? This was not okay.

“I thought I was going to die,” he said.

“I know.”

“I don't want to die.”

She ran her palm against his back and squeezed him as tightly as she dared. “I know,” she said.

In that moment, she hated Gary Clark, and she didn't even try to stop herself. A deep black hole of festering rage clenched in her stomach and sucked everything into it. Gary Clark had done this. Her body shook. Derek curled against her, and he sobbed. He sobbed, unrestrained, stuck in the pit of abject misery Gary Clark had dug for him. And, worse, every time Derek sobbed, his muscles tensed. His grip on her shirt squeezed harder, and his body radiated physical agony as well. Every sob shot him through with a bullet all over again. Gary Clark had returned from the grave, and she hated him to the point of seeing red, sparkly things in the dark of her vision. She knew she would pay any price, up to and beyond her own life, to fix things for Derek.

She also knew of no cashier who would accept her spiritual credit card.

“Heartsick,” Meredith said as she clutched the stress ball. “Angry that somebody did this to him. To us.” She sniffed. “Helpless, because I can't fix it no matter how much I want to.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “So, you feel sad, angry, and helpless,” she said. “That sounds familiar to me.”

Meredith wiped her face. “It does?”

“Maybe a little like Derek?” Dr. Wyatt said, her voice soft. She scribbled notes on her steno pad.

Meredith looked at her knees. She smashed the stress ball, but it didn't seem to be doing much good anymore. Her lungs shivered with stress, and she really, really needed to hit something. Anything. “Well, I guess. Yeah.”

The scribbling continued. “So, Derek had this horrible experience, and he's talking to you about it. Listening makes you feel sad, angry, and helpless. What are you going to do when you get overwhelmed?”

“Well, I...” Meredith deflated. “I mean I hadn't... I mean.”

“You can't talk to Derek, because then you'll feed all his negativity right back to him,” Dr. Wyatt said. “And he's not in a mental position to be able to deal with it appropriately.”

“Maybe I could talk to Cristina,” Meredith said. Maybe she could. Maybe, without getting specific, like Cristina had said. Cristina could be supportive, and Meredith wouldn't have to confess anything private. Cristina could be discreet... Meredith dropped the stress ball back in the basket and sighed. Momentary insanity. She could talk to Cristina. About Derek. Because that would go so freaking well. Right.

“You don't sound very sure,” said Dr. Wyatt.

Meredith shrugged. “It's just... I mean...”

“Yes?”

I'm a little disturbed that Cristina found out my sperm worked before I did.

“I don't think he'd ever forgive me if he found out I was talking to her about him. Not about this. He's pretty good-humored about it, usually, like with girl stuff. Sex talk. Standard gripes when he does some stupid man thing. You know. But this... this is his private thing or whatever. And he's trusting me with it.”

I don't want to think about what I can and can't say, and who I can and can't say it to.

“So, you feel that talking to Cristina about Derek's emotional problems would create an unduly antagonistic environment for him?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“They tolerate each other,” Meredith said. “For me. And I've already broken his confidence once. I can't do it again. I just can't.”

“Who else can you talk to then?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Alex? But...”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “Alex was also hurt.”

“Lexie?”

“Don't ask me, Meredith. What do you think?”

“I don't know,” Meredith said. “Okay? I don't freaking know. My list of available friends and family is woefully short because Izzie is gone, George went and died, and Alex and Derek both got shot.”

“This is why I want you to schedule appointments,” Dr. Wyatt said. “If you let all that sadness, anger, and hopelessness fester, it'll get to the point where Derek will want to talk to you, and you'll want to run the other way. He'll pick up on that, whether you say anything or not. He'll stop talking. And then you'll both land in my office, because he really will develop PTSD, and you'll want marriage counseling to save you from hating his guts.”

A lump formed in Meredith's throat. She swallowed, and she shook. “Oh,” she said.

Dr. Wyatt stood, and she shifted back to the couch. She sat down next to Meredith. Close. And she touched Meredith's shoulder. She dropped her steno pad on the table, and Meredith looked at the scribbles. She couldn't read the messy writing. But she saw a picture with arrows between her name and Derek's, and it was labeled negative feedback or something like that.

“Meredith,” Dr. Wyatt said, her voice a low, soothing murmur. “What Derek is going through is very common. It is. But it doesn't mean the situation is any less precarious. You be there for him.
I'll be there for you. We'll make this work. You don't have to do this by yourself.”

Meredith wiped her face with her hands. Dr. Wyatt handed her a tissue from the box on the coffee table. The room hung in silence for a long march of moments. “I can still talk with him about my problems, right?” Meredith said. Her voice sounded far away. “I mean I have already. I didn’t make it worse, did I? Please, don’t tell me I made it worse.”

“As long as they’re your problems, and you're not just regurgitating his,” Dr. Wyatt assured her. “If he feels like he's helping you, that's probably good for him because it gives him a sense of control. If he feels like he's overburdening you, though, that's probably not so good, because it creates a sense of helplessness.”

“I hate this,” Meredith said. She blew her nose, and then she twisted the tissue into a tight screw-tie of snot and plush paper. “And I hate Gary Clark. I hate him.”

Dr. Wyatt rubbed her back. “That's normal.”

“Well, normal freaking sucks!” Meredith said.

“I know.”

“How do you deal with the compassion fatigue thing?” Meredith said. “You listen to people whine all day.”

“I take a three month sabbatical every three years,” Dr. Wyatt said. “I always take a full week off at Christmas, in July, and over Thanksgiving. And I have a very understanding husband who lets me vent.”

“Well, how does he deal with it?” Meredith said.

“Friends, I guess.”

“And them?”

“I don't know.”

“No wonder the world sucks,” Meredith grumbled.

“That's about the gist of it, sometimes,” Dr. Wyatt replied.

Meredith stood. She swallowed. “Thursday afternoons are fine,” she said. When she reached the door, she dropped her wrinkled tissue into the small trashcan by the light switch. She turned. “Thank you,” she said.

Dr. Wyatt smiled. “You'll get through this. And so will he. Just remember that this is all normal so far, and that healing takes time.”

Meredith nodded. “Time,” she echoed, but it didn't stop her from wanting Derek to feel better now. He deserved to feel better now. She sighed as she closed the door behind her and stared at the long, white, immaculate halls.

“Time sucks,” she said to nobody in particular.
Chapter 9

When Meredith walked up to the house, the sky had darkened a little from its afternoon azure brilliance into early evening hues. She leaned back her head, inhaling the temperate breeze. The sun had been out all day, only half-obsured by a sky pocked with dark, heavy clouds that spoke of rain. Not a single drop of rain had fallen. No drizzle mist had hovered in the air. Sometime soon, the rain would come. It always did in Seattle. But not today.

It figured that would be the day she had to return to work instead of spending it with Derek.

The dim foyer greeted her with silence. She didn't call out as she put her purse down by the door. A line of white illumination framed the underside of the kitchen door.

No lights glowed in the dreary living room. The couch had been torn apart. The cushions against the back of the sofa had been avulsed and lay strewn on the floor. Derek lay along the length of the couch, pillows heaped up under his torso and against one side. She could see the curly mop of his dark hair, piles of fluffy blankets, and the frills of her favorite pillowcases sticking out, but that was it. An empty glass sat on the coffee table. No plates or food. She frowned, wondering why he hadn't gone upstairs if he'd wanted to lie down. Surely, Mark would have helped him.

You'll get through this. And so will he.

Something twinged in her heart, and an unseen force pulled her toward the room. She thought about sitting down and watching him for a while. At the last second before the living room, she veered. He slept. He lay still, breaths inaudible. The sound of the door unlocking hadn't woken him up. He clearly needed the sleep, and she didn't want to chance rousing him like she'd done the day before with that stupid kiss.

She went into the kitchen. Mark sat at the dinette table, a sprawl of papers and notes fanned out in a semi-circle around him. He wore a beat up pair of jeans, fluffy white socks, and an old, scruffy, black t-shirt. He scribbled something against a yellow pad, and then flipped the page. Brightly colored MRI scans shimmered under the glare of the overhead light.

“Hey,” she said.

Mark looked up from his work. “Grey. How was your first day back?”

“Fine,” she said. “How is everything?”

Mark glanced behind him, in the direction of the living room and Derek, as though he could see through walls. “He's slept almost all day. Every once in a while, he asks for water.” He glanced at his watch. “I made sure he took his pills at 8, 12, and 4, just like you said.”

She flopped down into the seat across from Mark. He stacked his notes and pushed them to the side. She sighed. “He didn't take a walk or anything?” she said.

“Nothing,” Mark said. His eyes creased with concern. “I think yesterday really fucked him up.”

“He needs to start walking, soon,” Meredith said. “Real walks. Not laps in the house...” Her voice trailed away when she thought more about it.

She closed her eyes and tried to remember, tried to picture him in her mind's eye. He spent anywhere from half to three-quarters or more of his day sitting around, either sleeping or vegetating, and he'd never gone outside to sit on the porch swing. All his physical activities had been limited to things he could do indoors. Stairs. Laps. Small chores. He'd never even looked out the window wistfully that she'd seen.

Wrong. It all seemed wrong. Derek loved being outside. He loved nature and woodsy things and sitting in the fresh air. He loved wide open space. He loved rain and mud almost as much as sunshine. The Seattle weather had never once been a source of melancholy for him, not like with a lot of the new transplants from other areas of the United States that weren't so freaking rain-happy. But now that she thought about it, really thought about it, he hadn't been outside, excluding the car trip home, since before he'd been shot. He'd spent nine mornings in the hospital and another four at home, and he'd never said a word about being cooped up.

“I don't think he's been outside, Mark. At all.”

“I noticed that, too,” Mark said. “I thought about suggesting it today sometime, but...” He shrugged helplessly.

“Yeah, I know,” Meredith said. “Thank you. For staying with him.”

Mark gave her a small smile. “Sure,” he said. The chair squawked as he pushed it back. “Have you eaten yet?”

“No.”

He raised his eyebrow. “Hungry?”

“Completely famished, actually,” Meredith said. “I haven't eaten since... I haven't... Um. I think I had breakfast.”

“Didn't you leave when it was still dark out?”

“Well, fine,” she said. “I had coffee. Coffee is breakfast sometimes.”

Mark shook his head and went to the refrigerator. The appliance hummed as he opened it. She twisted around, trying to see. He pulled an ugly green Tupperware bowl off the top shelf and removed plastic wrap covered with thick condensation. Water droplets fell to the floor as he carried the bowl to the kitchen and tossed the plastic wrap in the trash.

“Listen,” he said as he put down two plates and scooped... something reddish and goop-y. His shoulders shifted, but his wide body blocked her view. “I know that you're in a bad spot. You don't have any sick leave left. You used up all your un-categorized leave already—”

“I saved one day for emergencies,” she said.

“Right,” he said. He put the first plate in the microwave. The machine beeped as he tapped the cook time onto the key pad. She finally got a full glance at the cold plate. Spaghetti. Her stomach growled. Mark must have made it sometime that day, because she couldn't recall seeing any pasta in the fridge yesterday when she'd rummaged for dinner prospects. “But my point is,” Mark continued, “You don't really have leave, and you can't afford to take off anyway, or it'll set you back even further.”

The microwave hummed, and the pasta inside popped as heat zapped it into submission. “I've taken off a lot of time,” she said. Bombs, appendicitis, a liver transplant, and dying once had not been good to her. Meredith remained in a constant state of amazement that nobody had held her back a year on her pay scale. Yet.
“Right,” he said, nodding. “And Derek told me about the crappy schedule you’re trying to shoulder.”

“It can’t be helped,” Meredith said. “He needs somebody here in the evenings and stuff. I can’t just leave him alone for thirty-six hour shifts when he can’t get into the shower or go up steps or pick up anything heavy by himself. And I—”

“How about you go back to your regular schedule, so you can have days off during the week, and I'll take my un-categorized leave now, and stay home with him?” Mark said. “I haven't used any of mine yet. I've been helping Seattle Presbyterian with its overflow.”

“Mark,” she began, but the microwave dinged and cut her off.

He pulled a fork from the drawer for her and placed the steaming plate in front of her. “Parmesan?” he said.

She nodded, staring down at the reheated pasta. The noodles looked a little desiccated, but he'd made food. And she needed food. He put down the cheese container next to her and returned to put his plate in the microwave next. He turned toward her as the microwave hummed. She dumped a heaping pile of grated cheese on her plate and ensnared a clot of noodles with her fork.

“I have a lot of leave banked, too,” Mark continued as she stuffed herself. “I can stay longer if it's needed. I don't mind. I'll clear out on your days off and when Lexie's here, if she wants.”

“But—” she muttered around a mouthful of spaghetti. The sauce was some sort of mushroom concoction. She couldn't taste any meat. Mark had probably made it with Derek's healthy sensibilities in mind. But after hours and hours of not eating, she'd take anything. A small, pleased moan displaced her voice, and she chewed and chewed and then shoveled another bite.

“Look,” Mark continued, “I know I'm probably not your first choice for mature and responsible, but he needs someone here, Meredith.” The microwave dinged, and he pulled out his plate. He sat across from her. “He shouldn't be alone, whether he needs help with anything or not. I've never seen him like this. Not even after Mr. Shepherd died.”

The men who shot my dad got away.

Her stomach churned, and she put her fork down. “I talked with Dr. Wyatt today,” she said, and she looked at her lap.

Mark took a bite of spaghetti. “The shrink?”

“Yeah.”

“About Derek?”

“Yeah.”

He swallowed. With no precursor, no lead up, nothing, he stared at her, took a slow, deep breath, and said, “How bad is it?”

She bit her lip when she realized Mark had been as worried, if not more so, than she had been.

“She said he's got acute stress whatever,” Meredith said. “It's like the precursor to post-traumatic stress disorder, but it won't necessarily develop that far. We're supposed to let him talk if he wants, but not push him if he doesn't. Don't let him isolate himself or wallow. Spend time in the same room even if we're not doing anything with him. Um...” What else? “Offer love and support. Encourage him to make choices. And...” She bit her lip, trying to remember it all, but it got tangled in her head, somewhere between the thought, Derek is hurting and sick, and her mouth. Dr. Wyatt had said so many things. Meredith's lip quivered, and she wiped at her face. “Let me just get the packet that explains it all,” she said. Her voice cracked and died.

She pushed away from the table and retreated to the foyer before Mark could say anything. She glanced into the living room. Derek hadn't moved. He remained a quiet lump under heaps of blankets. This far away, she couldn't hear him breathe, and with that many things resting on top of him, she couldn't see his chest rise and fall either. The quiet stillness unsettled her, and a small voice in her head whispered dead. Dead. He's dead. The inexplicable force pulled at her again, but she denied it. He needed rest. She refused to wake him up, accidentally or not, for her own peace of mind. She wasn't clingy. She wasn't five. It wasn't like somebody had taken her special bear away. She could function. She could.

Her fists clenched. She forced herself back to her objective, and she retrieved the pamphlet from her battered purse. Assault Victimization, the paper said in big bold letters, and there was a tacky picture of a gun, a knife that looked more like a giant sword than anything else, and a baseball bat on the front. The words inside were what mattered, though. The words that spoke regretfully of Derek with every syllable. Her thumb brushed the soft paper. She stood, unmoving, staring. The paper crinkled as her fist squeezed.

Victims may be fearful of a repeat incident, however unlikely.

That's what the pamphlet said, somewhere in the spill of warnings about all the other awful feelings that might surface as the result of nearly being killed. She bit her lip and opened the pamphlet. She scanned the page, and she found that sentence, stuck in the middle of the rest. The words blurred. Before, she'd lost that warning under the riptide force of the rest of all the badness. It'd seemed innocuous compared to the other scary things. Sort of a duh.

But Derek didn't go outside.

Her fingers tightened, and her breaths shortened into stabbing pants of grief. He locked doors. Loud things and strangers scared him. He didn't go outside. Puzzle pieces snapped into place. She sniffed. The wet sound of fluid in her nose crackled in the silence. She forced herself to plod back into the kitchen where Mark sat, waiting for her. He'd finished his spaghetti.

“Here,” she said, her voice rough and weary. She foisted the paper at him, hands shaking.

She watched Mark's eyes zip back and forth as he read. After a few minutes, he came to a stop. He hunkered low in his chair, and a dark, foreboding hint of violence crossed his face. He jammed his fist against the table in a repeated, frustrated venting of energy. The wood rumbled softly. “Fuck,” he said. “I wish...” he began, but his voice trailed away.

“Somebody tried to murder him, Mark,” she said. She collapsed back into her seat and sighed. Murder. The word made it sound so much more... More. Don't let him isolate himself. “You should stay,” she said. “It would be good for you to stay.”

Mark put the pamphlet down. “Thank you,” he said.

She finished her spaghetti in silence, throat raw. Mark made no mention of her sniffing. She never used to cry so much. Now, her tear ducts felt like infinite buckets of rebelliousness. Like, once she'd gotten past internalizing everything bad that happened to her, now she couldn't stop letting it all explode out of her face.
“This sucks,” she said as she put her fork down. She sighed. “This really, really sucks. We were supposed to be okay, now. He's alive. I thought that was all I wanted. It is all I wanted. Just... I don't know.”

“Yeah,” said Mark.

She stood and took her plate to the sink to wash it off. The sound of rushing water filled the empty space in the air. She took a glass and filled it. It almost slipped from her wet hands when the kitchen door swung on its hinges, and Derek lumbered into the room.

“Hey, man,” said Mark. “There's some spaghetti in the Tupperware thing on the counter if you want some. Your favorite sauce and whole wheat noodles.”

Derek looked awful. Dark, fleshy circles hugged his eyes. He'd lost weight, maybe fifteen pounds or so since he'd been shot, evident by the angular, gaunt appearance of his face, and the way his t-shirt hung loosely against his torso. The hair on his head stuck up every which way. Thick stubble carved a dark swath against his too-pale face. His glazed stare didn't really see much. He didn't say a word in response to Mark. He headed for the sink where she stood, pale lips parted like a man staring at an oasis in a drought. She held out the glass she'd filled for herself. He took it, grunted some sort of word at her, maybe thanks, maybe hi, maybe just urgh. He eyed the bowl of leftover spaghetti on the counter, but didn't move to serve himself any. He went to the table and sat down diagonally from Mark, and then he nursed his water like it was a glass of scotch or something.

She dished him a plate and heated the spaghetti. She didn't care if he wanted it or not, didn't care whether he'd chosen not to eat, or instead just existed on a distant plane so far removed from earth that he'd seen the food, but hadn't really seen it. She would try. She would try to get him to consume something. She watched as he blinked, disheveled and half-awake, over the table. She filled a new glass of water for herself and sipped, waiting for the microwave to finish.

“You alive?” Mark said. He laughed, but the awkward attempt at levity fell flat in the silence.

“Define alive,” Derek said.

“I'd say if you need a definition, you're probably alive enough to count,” Mark said.

“Hmm.”

The microwave beeped, and Meredith brought the plate and a fork to Derek. “You should really at least try to eat something,” she said as she set the plate down and pushed his water glass aside. “Please.”

She sat down next to Mark, across from Derek, and bit her lip. She didn't want to sound mother henish. She didn't. She also didn't want Derek to starve himself to death while she smiled and tried to ignore the fact that he wasn't eating enough.

At first, when she'd brought him home, she'd thought when he hadn't finished the sub she'd ordered, it'd been a fluke born out of the fact that he'd been near collapse with exhaustion. But then she hadn't seen him finish anything the rest of the weekend, and that was assuming he ate something at all. He skipped meals, sometimes even breakfast, which felt weird, considering what a poster child he was for breakfast being the most important meal of the day.

Derek looked at the plate. He didn't protest. He didn't say he wasn't hungry. He took two tiny bites and chewed, the expression on his face dead of any interest or enjoyment. Like she'd reminded him to comb his hair or something instead of keep himself fed.
“How was work?” he said.

“Um,” she said. Didn't do anything productive. Looked up articles about PTSD. Had a rather long chat with a shrink about you. Said chat disturbed me so much I lost track of the rest of the day. Figured out you developed agoraphobia or whatever in the space of days because Gary Clark decided to murder you instead of deal with his freaking grief appropriately. “Fine.”

He took a third bite. “Fine?” he said.

“Being back was weird,” she amended. Damn that word. Fine. She couldn't use it anymore. “The place is just dead. And quiet. No elective surgeries, just emergencies. And since people aren't coming to our ER voluntarily, we're limited to what the paramedics bring in, which isn't all that much, well, not much surgical. Mostly jerks who called 911 for stubbed toes and runny noses or whatever.”

“Oh,” he said. “Doesn't surprise me.”

At least she didn't feel particularly bad about wasting her day on non-work things. There hadn't been any real work to do. Her fingers clenched as she watched him take a fourth bite. He seemed to be perking up a little. Maybe he'd just been groggy from sleep. Or maybe she was just hopeful.

He glanced at Mark, and his gaze dropped to the pamphlet on the table. She held her breath. Derek didn't ask about it, didn't even seem to notice the stupid pictures of weapons on the front. For the first time, she wanted to cheer at how catastrophically the painkillers had screwed up his detail orientation. Though, she wondered, if maybe it would be good for him to read it. To help him make sense of himself, so he'd know he wasn't alone. That other people went through this often enough that law enforcement had tacky but informative pamphlets.

Fifth bite. He'd cleared a fourth of the plate. But his spree ended, then. He put his fork down and gulped the remains from his glass of water. When he finished, he stared at her. His lip curved into a small, hesitant smile. “Hi, by the way,” he said, and she melted.

“Hi,” she said. She grinned back. “More alive, now?”

“Yeah. You're home early.”

“I left early,” she said. “Twelve hour shift today. I wanted to get home at a reasonable time.”

He'd been in the chair in their room when she'd left. Her shrill alarm had jarred her from a sound sleep so early that the morning had still seemed like night. The new chair had worked well to save him from midnight jaunts, it seemed, though, it had been odd to wake up with him to the left of her, sitting, instead of to the right, lying down, or gone. At first, in her not-sentient-yet confusion, she'd seen the blurry outline his knee in the corner of her eye and jumped. Nearly fallen off the bed. He'd blinked at her, all bleary and groggy, and then he'd drifted off while she'd forced herself into the shower.

“I know you left early,” Derek said. “I was sad.”

“Sad?”

He gestured at Mark. “Being helped into the shower is much more fun when the help is sexy.”

“Hey, I'm sexy,” Mark said. “I can't help it that you're blind to my hotness.”

“I'm stoned, not drunk. I'm perfectly capable of discerning ugly.”
“That hurts, man,” said Mark. He patted his chest over his heart. “I’m hurt.”

Derek snorted. A wince creased his features, but the expression of pain faded in seconds. “I think I win in the hurt department. Don’t even try me there.”

“Fine,” Mark said. “But you blow at racing cars.”

“Racing fake cars,” said Derek.

“Whatever. You still suck.”

“I’m surprised you can even remember who won.”

“I did,” said Mark. “That’s my story, and your memory is too shitty to say otherwise.”

“So,” Derek said. “What you’re saying is that I won.”

“Nobody is saying that,” said Mark. “Least of all me.”

Derek smirked and didn't reply. The little energy he'd managed to conjure bled out of him over the course of silent minutes. He slumped forward and put his face in his hands, yawning. A small sliver of worry jabbed her heart. He'd been awake for thirty minutes. He'd slept all day. Even taking his surgery into account, he shouldn't be that exhausted after doing such a great impression of a slug all day.

“Mark and I talked a little,” Meredith said. She swallowed. Derek would take this badly. She knew it. But... “I'm going to go back to my regular schedule, and Mark's going to stay here for a week or two.” Let him make decisions wherever feasible. “Is that okay with you?”

Derek raised his head. His dark, hopeless eyes stared at her. In the wan daylight, his irises seemed almost black. “Okay,” he said.

“Really?” The word popped out before she could stop it, and she resisted the urge to cover her mouth with her hands.

“You want me to argue?” Derek said. “What good would it do?”

Silence stretched between them. Derek pushed back his chair and eased into a crooked standing position. “Are you going back to sleep already?” Meredith said.

He clenched the back of his chair, and his knuckles turned sickly white. “I'm tired,” he snapped.

Mark rumbled as he cleared his throat, stood, and gathered up all his papers and notes. “I'm going to go home and start packing some things so you two can talk, and then I'll head into Grace for my shift,” he said. “I'll be back in the morning before you leave for work, Grey.”

Derek watched him go, silent, brooding. When the front door slammed shut, Derek sighed.

“I really think he should stay,” Meredith said, “But if you're categorically against it, say something. You have a say, Derek. Your opinion matters. I don't want you to feel like it doesn't.”

He stared at his hands. “Maybe I can't get into the tub or carry things or drive or...” His voice fell away, and he swallowed. He drew in a wet breath. “I can take care of myself for a few hours. I can be left alone. I'm not some delinquent puppy.”

“I know,” she said. “Getting Mark to stay with you all day has nothing to do with that. If it were that, he could stop by over lunch and be done in an hour, and I would stay on my twelve hour days so you'd have somebody here every night.”

He looked up. His desolate stare made her chest tighten. “Then why?” he said.

“Because I love you, and I don't want you to be alone right now,” she said. “That's all.”

She watched him, watched the edges of his expression soften. “Oh,” he said. He swallowed, and she kept watching as he tried to compose himself again. He failed. His eyes rimmed with red, and he looked away.

She leaned across the table, face resting on her palms. “Derek, do you want to be alone?”

That question seemed to catch him off guard. He blinked. She bit her lip. He wasn't crying, but he was close, and all she really wanted was to close the space between them and wrap herself around him. “No,” he said. He ran his fingers along the edge of the table, following the wood grain. “I don't know. I want...” His voice trailed away, and he closed his eyes. “I don't know.”

She frowned. “What were you going to say?”

“If I told you the entire list of what I want, I'd just be whining, and I...” His fingers clenched. He scraped at his face with his hands, sniffed, and his skin reddened. He pushed away from the table, and he took his plate to the sink, where he scrubbed the uneaten spaghetti into the garbage disposal with an old, dirty sponge as he blinked furiously against tears he didn't seem to want. He flipped the switch, and the disposal growled to life. He sponged off the remains of the spaghetti sauce with all the violence he could manage, and then he loaded all the plates into the dishwasher. The dishes clanked.

When he finished, he stood at the sink, staring. She went to him and wrapped her arms around his waist from behind. “Top of the list,” she whispered. “What do you want?”

“I can't even narrow that down,” he said darkly.

She cupped her hands over his trapezius muscles and squeezed, obliterating tense coils of stress. He leaned into it. She rose to her tiptoes, and she kissed the side of his neck as she punched fingers deep into the knots in his back. She'd looked up a list of stretching exercises to help him, but most of them assumed the person doing the stretching had full use of his chest muscles and arms for support, and Derek didn't. There had been a couple, though, that had looked promising. One he could do by himself. Two he would need help with.

She kissed him, and then she went back to the dinette table. She pulled out his chair for him well away from the table. “Sit,” she said. “I want to try something. It might make you feel better.”

He didn't ask her why or what. He sat.

“Spread your legs,” she said.

A small chuff of air fell from his lips. “Are we doing something naughty?”

“You wish,” she said. “Seriously, just spread your legs.”

He did as she asked, a curious look on his face. “Okay,” she said. “Now drop your arms between your knees. Don't hold onto anything, just let your arms hang.” He did. She touched his stomach with one hand and the small of his back with the other. Warmth soaked her palms through his shirt. He inhaled. His skin twitched at her light touch. “Curl over my hand, don't bend at the waist, and
He didn't have much flexibility anymore. He didn't make it very far. His breaths sped up as he pushed her hand forward with his stomach. His abs tightened. She rubbed his back. She felt him tremble under her palm. “Does it hurt?” she said.

“No,” he said. “No, it's...” A soft sigh fell from his lips. “It's good. It feels good.”

He did that same stretch four more times. Each time, he dropped lower. “Okay,” she said. “Now, lie on the floor on your back.”

“Here?”

She shrugged. “It's clean, and it's hard. It'll work.”

“This really sounds like something naughty,” he muttered.

“Because you have a dirty, dirty mind,” she said, grinning.

Lying flat proved difficult for him with no support on a hard floor that would hurt if he let himself collapse to it via gravity. After he sat down, awkward and stiff and moving poorly, she held his shoulders, and he tipped backward, surrendering his weight to her hands. She slowed his descent. When he lay flat, resting in the space between the counter and the table, he looked at her, eyes glazed with painkillers, and something sharp stabbed her heart. The kitchen floor flashed immaculate white, and her fingers slicked with blood.

You don't get to die.

She flinched, and she focused on his chest. He wore a dark gray shirt with a high collar that hid his incision and the bullet wound from view. No hole in the shirt. No blood. He didn't pant with agony.

“Are you okay?” he said.

“Fine,” she said.

She splayed her palm against his breastbone, brushing the soft cotton of his shirt. Her fingers roamed across his damaged pectoral. The scab from the bullet wound made what had once been marble smooth dented and imperfect. Marred. Reflex almost made her ask if it hurt, but he moved, a whisper in the silence, and put his palm over hers in an echo of what he'd done when he'd been shot, and she'd been trying to stop the relentless tide of his blood. But there was no blood. His skin wasn't cold or shivery or slick with sweat. He felt warm. Warm and dry and living.

“It doesn't hurt unless I'm breathing hard, you press down, or I stretch my left arm weird,” he said. “I'm okay.”

She stroked his shirt as he breathed, relaxed, not clipped with pain.

“I see things sometimes, too,” he said when she didn't speak.

A lump formed in her throat. “Like what?” she said, but he looked away and wouldn't answer. She didn't press the issue. The refrigerator hummed. Birds chirped outside. He lay on the floor, breathing, not hurting, not bleeding, and she soaked in all the things that told her Derek wasn't dying. He'd been shot, but the pain he experienced now was just an echo of then. A memory. Something long past and gone. Real, but not real now.
He rubbed her arm with his thumb, and then he relaxed against the floor, resting his hands at his sides. “Have your way with me,” he said, his voice soft and tired, but she heard a spark. A spark of the Derek she knew. Her Derek. Just waiting to ignite. His eyelids lowered, and he watched her through his eyelashes. The corners of his mouth twitched with the hints of a smile.

She snorted, and forced herself to the present. “Put your knees up.” He did as she asked. With this exercise, he was supposed to pull his legs toward his chest with his arms wrapped under his knees. He wouldn't be able to do that, so she would be his arms, she decided. “I'm going to pick up your legs. Relax. And tell me right away if it hurts, okay? It's not supposed to hurt.”

“Hmm,” he said. He closed his eyes. She knelt at his shoulders, her kneecaps pushing into his trapezius muscles to the left and the right of his head. She rose as high onto her knees as she could go, and she leaned forward.

He laughed. Really, clearly laughed. Like a bell. His body tensed as he winced with the backlash, but the look in his eyes made her quiver. No sparkles. Stupid painkillers. But the skin around his eyes crinkled, and she couldn't see a single hint of sadness or anger or anything bad anymore. He was looking at her, and he was happy. “In what universe is this not naughty?” he said, staring at her crotch.

“Shut up,” she said. “I'm helping you.”

“Oh, I agree. This is definitely helping.”

She laughed as she reached under his thighs. She looped her arms. At first, he didn't budge when she tried to pull back his legs. “Relax,” she said.

“I'm stuck, helpless as a lamb, in your game of dirty twister, and you want me to relax?”

“Well, close your eyes and pretend I'm Mark or something.”

He made a disgusted sound. “Please, don't say that when my face is inches from your—”

“Relax, damn it,” she commanded. She pulled, and his weight came with her. She eased his knees toward his chest, and she lowered herself to the floor behind his head as his muscles extended as far as they would go. He inhaled, and a soft moan fell from his lips as she held his knees for him. She watched as the tears he'd held back earlier overflowed. “Does it hurt?” she asked, and she bit her lip.

“No,” he said, his voice wet and thick. “No, it doesn't hurt.”

After twenty seconds, she rose up and lowered his legs to the floor with care. He rested for thirty seconds, and she repeated. He didn't make any more jokes. He lay with his eyes closed, his expression sublime, even as tears leaked down his face. She repeated that stretch eight more times.

“Okay,” she said. “Same thing, sort of, but we're going to the side. Stay flat on your back.”

She scooted across the floor away from his shoulders to his legs. She touched his knees and pushed him to the left. He didn't need encouraging this time. He tilted his legs to the side. His right hip came off the floor. She stopped when his breaths jerked to a halt, and he made a small sound of discomfort. “Too much?” she said. “Keep your upper back flat. Only your hips should be moving.”

“A little too much,” he said, his voice clipped and tight. She eased up, and he rested, sort of tilted, sort of stretched. Tension bled away from him. “Better,” he said.
She kept forgetting that his flexibility was crap right now. He hadn't done much physical activity in weeks. His muscles had gotten used to stiffness and pain and overuse in the same position for hours and hours. She wished she'd thought of this earlier. Stretching exercises for his back. He couldn't run or lift weights or do any of the usual things he did in the gym with Mark, but he could at least do this. Natural instinct after a serious injury was to curl up and hibernate forever. But studies had shown that movement and exercise after a trauma was what sped healing. Dr. Altman had given him a list of stretching exercises that would help his arms and chest, which he did, but none for his back. She'd also enrolled him in physical therapy, but that didn't start for another two weeks. They'd wanted to give his sternum a chance to heal more before putting him through anything overly strenuous.

Meredith repeated that stretch to the left, going a little further each time for four more times. Then she switched to his right for another five.

When she finished, she watched him. He relaxed his knees and lay flat. Eyes closed, he didn't move. He'd cried steadily since that second set of stretches, but somewhere in the course of the third set of stretches, the tears had petered and then stopped. Wet tracks glistened against his temples, and small patches of his hair above his ears had gotten soaked. She licked her lips. “There are a few more we can try, but that seems like a good start. I think. Do you think?” When he didn't respond, she leaned forward. “Did you fall asleep?” she whispered, peering at his relaxed face. She stroked the skin above his eyebrows and teased her fingers through the hair over his forehead.

A lazy smile curled at his lips. “No,” he said, his voice thick and low. “This is just the first time I've been on my back in two weeks, and it's been a modicum of comfortable.”

“Oh,” she said. She eased herself onto her side next to him and picked up his hand, worrying at the joints. “Well, do you want to stay here a while?”

He looked at her. “I just want my wife.”

“Is that the top of your list, then?” She winked.

“Definitely,” he said. “Thank you for helping me narrow it down.”

She grinned. “Well, you have me, now. And with this new plan with Mark, I get days off here and there, and I can stay the day with you every once in a while instead of just being here for a few hours before you crash for the night.”

“That's true,” he said. He smiled as he tilted his head to look at her. “I'm glad you'll get days off. You need days off. You shouldn't have to work every day just to take care of me.”

“See?” She returned his grin. “It's all about me, me, me. It has nothing to do with you. I want my breaks. I need my freaking beauty rest or whatever.”

He laughed. Even despite the clipped ending that sounded more moaning than laughing, the noise of it hit her eardrums like balm. “But I'm very important,” he said. “How could it not have anything to do with me?”

“You're right,” she said. “My mistake. It must be all about you.”

His eyebrows rose. “You're admitting I'm right?”

She shrugged. “I guess so.”

“I can't decide whether to file that under the benefits of being high and hallucinating, or under the benefits of being wounded and vulnerable.”

“Maybe both?”

“Hmm,” he rumbled. “It could be both. You might be banking on me forgetting this conversation ever happened while at the same time suffering from hopeless sympathy for me and my not-so-hidden pain.”

She winked. “I guess you'll never know.”

“That's mean, you know,” he said. “Leaving me wondering.”

“Doesn't the mystique add to my sex appeal? I thought men liked a little mystery.”

“I prefer open books,” he said, and then his gaze shifted into gleeful realization that he'd been given an opening. He leaned into her body. “How about a story?” he said, his eyes inches from hers.

“This again?” she said.

“Well, you can't hardly expect me to believe you were born, stole hair dye, and then came to Seattle Grace, where you fell head-over-heels for the sexiest neurosurgeon on the planet.”

She laughed. “I don't know. Can't I?”

“Remind me not to ever let you play connect the dots,” he grumbled. “The sheer weight of your failure at it might cause you to implode, and then I'd miss you.”

He flopped against the hard floor. “Any suggestions on how to get up?” he said, his voice wry. “You seem to be an expert at naughty twister.”

She moved back behind his shoulders. “Do a sit up. I'll push you. Don't pull with your arms.”

“Hmm,” he said. “So very bossy.”

But he did what she said to do. Under his own steam, he rose to a 45 degree angle. She shoved him up the rest of the way with a grunt. Once he'd gotten into a sitting position, he managed the rest on his own, albeit slowly. The stretching might have made his back feel better, but he still wasn't moving all that well. As he stuttered to his feet, he groaned, and it took him a while to straighten out.

She watched as he shuffled to retrieve his empty glass, and then he refilled it under the rushing faucet. He gulped until the water disappeared. The corners of his mouth dripped, and he wiped them off with a paper towel. She glanced at the window. Daylight had waned considerably into dusk since she'd come into the house, and the overhead light in the kitchen did much more to illuminate the room now than it had when she'd entered. Slivers of pink and deep hues of blue stretched across the sky outside the window, highlighted with the deep greens and spruce colors of the treetops.

“Let's take a walk,” she said. “It's really nice out today.”

His fingers squeaked as he clenched his glass. The apprehension slathered all across his face made her ache. “Since when do you walk for fun?” he said.

“I walked with you,” she said. “We've walked. With Doc. I thought that was fun.”
“Meredith...”

You have to let him heal at his own pace, but you can't let him wallow, either.

“If you take a walk with me, I'll tell you a story,” she said. “A short walk. We'll go slow.”

“But I'm in my pajamas,” he said.

His meaning was clear. A trip up and down the steps would wear him out. He thought he'd found an out. She considered offering to bring down some clothes for him, but decided against it. Help emphasize to him what he can control, rather than what he can't.

“There are some clean jeans in the dryer.” She pointed toward the utility room. “You can grab those if you want.”

“But...”

She shrugged. “No walk, no story. But it's your choice. We could watch a movie or whatever. You pick.”

“It's getting dark,” he said.

“It is,” she agreed. “But it's not like I live in the middle of nowhere. The streets are lit.”

He peered at her, suspicion carving his expression. “How good is this story?”

“You'll have to come along to find out.”

He shifted on the balls of his feet, agitated. She wanted to tell him nothing would happen. That he'd be fine. But she thought letting him know she'd figured out his fears might make his anxiety about them worse. It would embarrass him that she'd noticed. He put his empty glass in the sink and sighed.

“Fine,” he said, and he shuffled out of the room, muttering, “But this had better be a damned good story,” as he went.

She grabbed a water bottle from the fridge while she waited. She didn't expect them to go far or to walk for long, maybe twenty minutes at best. He was at the point in his recovery where he should be managing about two fifteen-minute walks per day. He tired in the space of strides. He would probably sweat a lot, even if they went slow. She pocketed his Percocet bottle and her cell phone, not wanting to risk anything, and waited by the door as the clock ticked the evening minutes away. The pinks in the sky turned deep, fiery purple, and what had been blue before sank into a vivid blue-violet. Dark indigo. His favorite. Stars twinkled in the eastern-most part of the sky.

“I'm ready,” he said, startling her from her reverie.

His soft, stonewashed jeans barely hung onto his hips without slipping down, emphasizing his unhealthy slimness. He'd put on his black cross-trainers, and he wore the same t-shirt he'd worn with his pajama pants – the dark gray one with the high collar.

She pushed open the storm door and stepped onto the porch. Her keys jingled as she fumbled to cram them into her pocket without spilling his pills everywhere. Cool air kissed her skin. The disappearance of the sun had chilled the earth considerably, but she wasn't cold. Just uncomfortable. And she imagined she'd warm up in a bit once they started moving.
He didn't pause on the threshold, and he didn't seem overly concerned about standing on the deck. His feet thumped as he shuffled around her. She didn't lock the door, but she did make sure it closed, and then she turned to follow him down the step and down the walk to the sidewalk that ran along their side of the street.

She wondered if maybe she'd gotten it wrong. Maybe his extreme indoor dwelling had just been coincidence. Maybe he'd really just felt so awful that he didn't want to waste effort going outside. Maybe. Except he gave his game away as she watched him. His nostrils flared, and his eyes had a wide, alert look to them that defied all the drugs in his system. He hunkered down, hands crammed in his front pockets, and he watched everything around him as though it were something dangerous, or something dangerous might be lurking behind it.

“Which way do you want to go?” he said when they reached the sidewalk.

She shrugged. “You pick.”

He looked both ways down the long sprawl of uneven sidewalk. Either direction took a long time to reach a corner. He turned left. He moved, exaggerated and slow, his lips pressed into a firm line. She kept pace with him, careful not to let her strides escape her careful control. She didn't want to get ahead of him or make him feel like he held her back. She strolled, peering at the trees and the parked cars and staring at all the houses dotting the streets of her quaint little neighborhood, just enjoying being with him. A breeze ruffled her hair.

“I was fourteen,” she said as they ambled along in the dim light.

“Another story from your tame beginnings?” He sighed. “When do I get the good stuff?”

“I wasn't tame.”

“You were too tame to dye your—”

“Shut up, or I won't tell you anything,” she said.

“I think you'll tell me regardless.”

“Oh?” she said. “And what makes you Mr. Entitlement?”

He stopped and peered at her with an irresistible expression of innocence. She melted against him. He slipped his left hand loose from his pocket, and he wrapped his warm arm over her shoulder.

“Because I'm wounded and vulnerable?” he said.

She laughed.

A man passed by them on the walk, and Derek stiffened to the point that his tension looked painful. He yanked his arm away from her and bolted to the side of the walk. “Excuse me,” said the man. He wore a briefcase and hat and a snappy suit, and his heels clicked on the sidewalk as he tore past them at a good clip. His tie flapped, and he had crisp, white hair that made him look sort of like Colonel Sanders or something. Derek huddled at the side of the walk, breaths frozen in his chest.

Meredith waited while he collected himself. Red blush sprawled across his face in the twilight. She rubbed his arm. His skin trembled with disquiet under her palm. He closed his eyes. A car rumbled past, and he froze again as the sharp headlights illuminated him with piercing brilliance. His lips peeled back from his teeth, and he grimaced, distress pouring from his frame. Worry squeezed her heart. Maybe this had been a mistake. Maybe she'd pushed too hard.
“Derek,” she said, her voice low and soft. She glanced backward. They'd made it all of two house-lengths, but some was better than nothing, and she didn't want him to upset himself needlessly. “We can go back inside. I'll finish the story. I'm sorry. I shouldn't have pushed.”

“I'm fine,” he snapped. “I'm...” He took a deep, forceful breath that made him wince, and he plodded forward, slow and steady. “I'm fine.” A hedge that hadn't been trimmed clawed at his shirt, and he shoved past it, his breaths picking up as he forced some momentum into his pace. Dry leaves and debris dirtied his shirt. He swept his hands across his torso, and the leaves sloughed away in a fluttering, crackling cloud.

She bit her lip and matched his strides. Doubt chipped away at her like a tiny icepick, but she forced herself to ignore it. Let him pick, she told herself. If he wanted to keep going, they would keep going.

“You know, it's been nearly two weeks,” she said, continuing their conversation. “You can't keep using the wounded and vulnerable thing forever.”

He glanced at her. “Well, I'm using it now.”

“So, when's the cutoff between wounded and vulnerable and only slightly busted?”

His breaths buffeted the air. Small, glistening dots of sweat collected at his brow. “I think I'm entitled to a wide array of adjectives before I get from wounded and vulnerable to only slightly busted.”

“Like what?”

“Well, I'm working on throbbing and enervated right now,” he said. “I'm sure there's more, but—”

A woman passed by on the opposite side of the street. He didn't halt his forward motion, though his gaze chased her progress until she'd disappeared from sight, and he didn't speak. The sky darkened to the nighttime purple that spoke of light pollution. Meredith slipped into perfect tandem with him and wrapped her arm around his waist, relishing the feel of his body against hers, moving, pushing, working.

“I really love you,” she said, her words cutting through the silence. “Thank you for walking with me.”

“Hmm,” he rumbled. He moved with singular, focused purpose. Walking forward. He swept his hands back into his hair. His hair slicked back, shiny and damp, and he panted. She glanced backward. They hadn't gone that far.

“Are you okay?” she said.

He stopped at a thick tree and leaned, hands scrabbling over the damp bark. “I think your mother bought a house on a hill on purpose,” he said, his voice shaky.

“Yeah,” she agreed. “She was planning to sabotage your convalescence before you'd even met Addison.”

She glanced backward. The incline was hardly worth mentioning. The street rested on one of those pernicious hills that didn't feel at all like a hill until you'd gone a mile, looked back to try and figure out why you'd started sweating buckets, and finally noticed the shallow-but-steady gradient behind you. They hadn't gone a mile yet, but he wasn't fit.
Derek resumed, his pace slower than before. “Well, she did hate me, and I'm very likeable,” he said between pants. “There must be more to it. Was she psychic? Maybe she saw me coming.”

“I don't think my mother was psychic,” she said. “You're that likeable, huh?”

“Yes, very.”

She pushed the water bottle at him, and he took a sip and then a gulp, and she felt his body loosening up in her grip. Another car passed, and it didn't seem to faze him beyond a small twitch that ran down his frame.

“I don't think anybody is likeable enough to chip through the Ellis Grey wall,” she said.

“You know, if I hadn't passed out from resecting that woman's bowel later that day, I bet I could have,” he said.

She snorted. “Really.”

“Oh, yes.”

“Well, she started it,” he said. “That's mature.”

“What?” he said. “She's very grouchy. A normal person would have fallen to my expert and likeable wiles. It must be her fault.”

“You're very confident about that.”

“What can I say?” he said. “I'm a likeable guy.”

“And an ass.”

He grinned at her. In the darkness, the street lights made his eyes glitter. “But a likeable ass,” he said.

“I do like your ass.”
She slipped her hand into his back pocket to warm up her knuckles. His muscles flexed as he walked, and she squeezed him. They kept moving as a smirk slanted across his face. She rested her head against his shoulder. They plodded, interlocked.

“My first real walk after a gunshot wound, and you're feeling me up,” he said. “You're a very naughty woman.”

“What's naughty about it? I like feeling you up. And I'm allowed.”

“Oh? Not that I'm complaining. I like the touching. More touching, I say. But I don't think I ever got that memo.”

“Post-it provision. I can feel you up whenever I want now because we're married. It's totally kosher or whatever.”

“Is that how that works?” he said. “Hmm.” He took another sip of water. “So, I'm here. I'm walking. And I'm letting you feel me up in public. When do I get the rest of my story?”

“I was going to wait until we were finished walking,” she said.

“Oh, no,” he said. He stopped. “No escaping later when I'm too tired to care. Story, now, or I'm not moving another step.”

With his momentum lost, his body swayed, and he swallowed. He stumbled to a no parking sign and wrapped his arms around the post. He made a sick noise deep in his throat as he tried to catch his breath.

She touched his back. His shirt had soaked through, and his muscles shook. “Derek...”

“I'm going around the block. I can make it. I just need a minute.”

“Derek, please don't kill yourself for this,” she said. “This was great for a first expedition.”

“I'm okay,” he said. He tilted back his head and took a swig of water. She watched his Adam's apple roll down his throat. A drop of sweat meandered down his skin, broken into tiny, shimmering pieces by his stubble. “Please, just tell me the story,” he said. “You were five, and what happened?”

“Fourteen, Derek,” she said. “I was fourteen.”

“Right,” he said. “And?” He left the safety of the signpost and moved like somebody had recorded him in freeze frame and was stepping the video forward bit by bit with the remote. She glanced ahead. They'd almost made it to the top of the hill. If they could hit that corner and turn left, they'd be going down, and he would get relief. The water bottle crinkled as he squeezed it. He didn't take a sip. He dumped a bit of it over his forehead and spluttered. He slicked the moisture back with his hands, leaving his face glistening, and his eyelashes thick and damp with a latticework of water between each hair.

“During homecoming, my first year at high school,” she said. She patted his back and held his waist to give him support. “Some seniors held a bash. I went. There was beer there. And some other stuff.”

“Other stuff?” he said. His mouth hung open as he sucked in air. “Like what? Apple juice and cookies?” He smirked at her despite the weariness gripping his features.
She laughed. “Stop interrupting, or I'll never finish.” She closed her eyes and sighed with relief as they rounded the corner and gravity helped instead of hindered. He stopped struggling with every step and breath, and his pace picked up. Just a bit.

“Sorry,” he said. “Please, continue. Though, I'm going to lodge a complaint later if this turns out to be a bad story. You made me take a walk for this. I was expecting drunken girl-on-girl with Sadie or something.”

She snorted. “What is with that, anyway?”

He sipped the water and held out the bottle for her. She took a sip as well. Heat radiated from his skin in a wavering aura around his body. All she had to do was hover next to him, and she felt warm.

“What's with what?” he said.

“Why do guys always pant over lesbian sex?” she asked. “You'd think it would be kind of a duh that lesbian sex means no male participation. It's the biggest cock block in the history of vanilla porn, isn't it?”

He stopped, and he looked at her as though she'd asked him to explain why 2+2 equaled 4, or she'd questioned some sort of universal law like gravity or something. “But it's hot,” he said.

“Thanks for articulating to me the meaning of testosterone,” she replied. “Able to leap tall piles of logic in a single bound.”

He grinned. “Well, it is.”

“Hot?”

“Yes, very,” he said. He walked. “So, did you?”

She followed. “Did I what?”

“Have girl-on-girl with Sadie?”

She snorted. “I refuse to answer that.”

He laughed. “So, you did?”

“You're really kind of incorrigible, you know.”

“I'll take that as a yes,” he said.

“Damn it! You, shut up,” she said. “Just shut up, so I can finish!”

He raised an eyebrow. His gaze roamed from her head to her toes in a lascivious appraisal. He stopped at her breasts and inhaled, an appreciative, quirky grin pulling at his features, and then his gaze dipped lower. “Finish what, exactly?”

“Damn it!” she growled.

He leered. “I have a good mental picture to carry me through this, at least,” he said as they rounded the third corner. Steep downhill morphed into a downward slope that seemed almost flat in comparison, and Derek had to work again to move.
“I was fourteen.”

“You said that already,” he said. “You were describing this supposed other stuff.”

“Right,” she said. “Weed, okay? And I think I had too much. Or maybe it was the alcohol.”

“Oh?” He grinned. “Why’s that?”

“Because I woke up naked with a dirty condom on my thigh, and I don’t remember it, but I mean, I…” her voice trailed away. His grin faded, and he came to a wobbly stop by an overhanging mailbox with a little red flag. He leaned against it, frowning. He took several breaths before he found his voice.

“You said nobody ever did anything to you,” he said, his voice low and dangerous.

She quirked an eyebrow. “What do you mean?”

“You don’t count date rape as something?”

“It wasn’t rape,” she assured him. “I remember starting. I didn’t say no, and I could have. I just… The rest is gone.”

“I shouldn’t have teased,” he said in a soft voice. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay,” she said. “I had a sucky lead-in. You couldn’t have known where I was going with it. That was my first time.”

He pulled her against his body, and he kissed her ear, and then her temple. “I love you,” he whispered against her ear. His panting slowed as he rested, palms splayed against her back, and she couldn’t help but close her eyes and relish the warmth and the solid safety of his arms.

His sweat dripped all over her, but she didn't care. She didn't care at all. Her fingers scrunched his damp shirt, and she nosed into his shoulder, breathing. A strong musky odor wafted from his skin from all the exertion, but he didn’t stink. He smelled masculine and safe and sweet and hers. This was a more heady version of the scent he left on pillows and sheets and things that he wore, and the familiarity of it made her muscles relax and give way. She swayed on her feet, and he held her. His muscles trembled, too, and she tried to stand up, tried to take her weight off him. She wanted to collapse, though. She wanted him to pick her up in his arms and not let go. In his arms, people like Gary Clark didn’t exist. She'd be happy forever. And nothing seemed scary or bad.

Derek was her drug.

The night around them hovered in silence, save for an undulating chorus of crickets and other creep-crawly things. The birds had gone to sleep. The brief burst of people on the sidewalks and cars in the streets seemed to have calmed as everyone arrived home for dinner. Lights from windows glowed, leaving squares of bright illumination against black, amorphous lawns.

He kissed her again, full on the lips, and she lost the world as his tongue stroked hers. The dark, green, dimly-lit neighborhood bled away into nothing but a sense of flesh and heartbeats. Her cheek rustled against his shirt, and she listened to the air as he drew it into his chest, long and slow.

“I hate that you grew up so fast,” he said. “Even if it wasn't rape, you didn't deserve that.”

“Yeah,” she said as they disentangled. “But learning to have casual, drunken sex paved the way to meeting you, so I can't entirely regret it.” They headed for the last corner. Almost home. He moved sluggishly, and he lost his breath again in the space of strides.

“We still would have met,” he said. “And I would have noticed you without the one night stand.”

“You think so?”

“You're noticeable, Mere, and I really needed somebody. I was...” His voice trailed away, and he didn't finish his thought. He blinked, and he wiped his hands against his forehead, brushing back more sweat. His chest heaved, and he tripped a little. Pain leaked into his gaze, and he made a small sound. She handed him the water bottle, and he took a long swig that emptied the bottle. The plastic crinkled in his hand.

“Almost back home,” she said.

He made no indication that he'd heard her. He pushed forward, lips set in a line of concentration.

“I was fifteen when my dad died,” he said as they passed the second-to-last house on that street. “I was there.”

He'd said it like he'd been reciting what kind of sandwich he'd ordered for lunch. No inflection whatsoever colored his syllables, but the tone sounded rehearsed and perfected through countless repetition. I was there. It wasn't a big deal, and I'm not upset. I was there. She halted, and he didn't notice until her palm didn't move forward with his. Their arms stretched, but she didn't let go, and he shambled to a stop when his elbow locked. He looked at her. When she didn't budge, he backed up with wobbly steps.

A lump formed in her throat, and the dark smudged as she blinked. You never told me that, she wanted to say. Not once even hinted. Anger squeezed her breaths tightly in her chest. She'd been such a freaking moron. Maybe he would have told her if she hadn't blown him off for her own problems that night. Idiot. Freak. Emotionally-stunted dumb ass.

She swallowed, and she wiped at her eyes. “I hate that you grew up so fast, too,” she said. “I'm sorry.”

“Yeah, well...” he said. He blinked and sniffed and looked away.

“Do you think about him a lot?” she asked. She wrapped her arms around his waist and stood in his space. She rubbed her palms up and down the curve of his spine. His soaked shirt stuck to her palms, but she managed.

“More lately.”

“Was he a doctor, too?”

“No,” Derek said. “He owned a hardware store.”

She blinked and reddened. He'd told her his dad owned a store when he'd first told her about the murder. And what doctors owned stores? Who had the freaking time? “I'm sorry, that was a really dumb question. I'm being a mor—”

He put his thumb against her lip. “S'okay,” he said. He breathed against her, and she felt his weight drag on her shoulders more and more as the seconds passed.

“Are you doing all right?” she said, which seemed to snap him back into himself. He pulled away like he'd been stung and started moving, his expression unseeing as he shuffled. His cross-trainers scuffed the sidewalk. He'd stopped picking up his feet more than a centimeter or so, and the soles dragged against the pavement.

When they rounded the last corner, they were back on her street, back on that evil sort-of hill. He lasted about three meters before he veered, suffering. He stopped against a chain-link fence and closed his eyes, recuperating by a bright neon-and-black beware of dog sign that seemed to be a lie at the moment. The windows in the house behind the fence remained pitch-black, and no barking pierced the nighttime silence.

She stroked his chest while he tried to recover some wind, feeling particularly useless as he glanced in the direction of their house. She watched his dark gaze follow the line of sidewalk between them and their driveway, and his expression caved into hopelessness. She thought about telling him to sit down while she brought the car, but she imagined getting into and out of his big SUV or her Jeep would take just as much out of him as walking the remaining house-lengths.

He leaned his head back. His Adam's apple poked out as he swallowed, and his mouth lolled open. A thin, shining column of spittle stretched from his lower lip to his upper. He licked his teeth and cleared it away, and he clutched her shoulders with shaky hands while he struggled to breathe.

“God, I'm tired,” he said.

She squeezed him. “We're almost there,” she whispered. “A few more houses. You can make it.”

They covered the rest of the distance in silence. He walked like he couldn't convince his legs to work without devoting all his attention to them.

They made it. She held her hand against his waist. He leaned more and more against her body until she felt like a doorjamb holding back a storm door on a tight, squealing, pressurized hinge that wanted to close. He pressed her against the door frame, his body trapping her. She fumbled with the door, trying to keep from falling victim to his gasping, then dying, then deadweight, and they stumbled inside. His feet clipped the threshold with jarring whacks. He stopped, inches inside the house. She wrestled with him to get him out of the path of the door so she could get it closed. She slammed shut the door, panting, and he sat down in a boneless heap on the floor, his back sliding down the frame as she flipped on the hallway light.

Sweat plastered his hair to his head, and his complexion turned sallow. He brought the back of his hand to his mouth, and he gagged against his skin. His torso jerked with the spasms, and his face creased with agony as he tried to hold down bile and the little he'd managed to eat.

She ran for the kitchen without pausing to ask him if he was okay or what was wrong. One look, and she knew what was freaking wrong. He was undernourished, overheated, and exhausted, and she'd let him do it. She'd just let him because he'd hugged her and teased her and acted tired-but-fine, god, damn that man.

She grabbed a box of Wheat Thins from the cabinet over the sink, a bottle of water from the fridge, the hand towel from the dishwasher, and a trash bag from the roll under the sink. She returned in under a minute, and she skidded to her butt beside him on the welcome mat. She jammed her hand into the cracker box and pulled a handful loose. She shoved them at him. Cracker bits spilled all over the floor and over his sweat-soaked jeans.

“Put something in your stomach,” she said.

After he'd eaten five or six Wheat Thins, she pushed the fresh water bottle at him, and he drank gulp after gulp. He put the bottle down by his left hip after he'd swallowed his way through over half of it, and he leaned into her shoulder, breathing noisily, almost desperately.
“Better?” she said. She wanted to yell at him. Wanted to hit him. Why did he do this to himself?

“Yeah,” he croaked. He inhaled with a wet, sick-sounding snuffle.

“Do you want some Percocet?”

He nodded. She liberated a pill from the bottle in her pocket, and she gave it to him. He chucked the pill into his mouth, picked up the nearly empty water bottle, tipped his head back, and swallowed. He blinked as he brought his head down. She gave him the hand-towel, but his hands rested in his lap, and he didn't lift it to wipe his face or anything. He rested, silent, eyes closed. The sweat dried over the passing minutes, and shivers tore up and down his body. At least he hadn't needed the trash bag.

She didn't have the heart to say a word or scold him despite her fury. He was a grown man. He didn't need a mom right now. He'd worked himself to the point of throwing up. He'd collapsed in their foyer by the door on the hard floor, as though his options had been to sit down or fall down, and he'd been given no other choice. She doubted very much that his body wasn't already doing all the yelling for her, and she didn't want him to feel embarrassed or guilty or inadequate. She just didn't want him to kill himself trying to prove to her or Gary Clark's ghost, or whoever he seemed to need to prove himself to that he'd healed.

She rubbed his shoulder. “I'll be right back, okay?” she said.

He didn't answer.

She stood, and she left him, only intending to be gone a moment. He needed a towel at the very least, but as she wandered to the utility room, inspiration hit. She grabbed two full-sized bath towels. Then she went to the fridge and pulled out some of the fresh peaches and strawberries she'd bought when she'd run errands the day before. She washed the fruits under the faucet and piled them all in a big bowl. She scooped the remaining leftover spaghetti from the Tupperware container on the counter top to a fresh plate, and she heated it. She rummaged for napkins and a fork. When the microwave beeped, she powdered the pasta with a dusting of Parmesan. She stuck her tongue through her lips as she tried to remember exactly how he liked it. They didn't eat spaghetti much. She thought she'd managed a good approximation. Arms laden with towels and dishes, she walked back through the hallway to the front door.

He didn't look at her, eyes dull, as she waddled toward him with her bounty. He didn't ask questions, didn't indicate that he'd noticed her presence. She put the pile down by the far wall and brought towel number one with her as she sat down by his side. “Can you get your shirt off?” she said.

When he didn't budge, her eyes pricked, and she wiped at her face.

When he's not paying attention to the world, he's not hurt or frightened, Dr. Wyatt had said. He's created a safety zone for himself.

And he'd needed to go there. Again.

She touched his face, palm against his skin. Damp stubble and skin rasped against her fingertips. “Derek,” she whispered as she stroked him. “It's okay. I know it hurts and you're tired and it sucks. I do. But you have to be here and not there. Please.”

He looked at her, toward the noise, but his stare tore straight through her body to some distant point beyond. “Huh,” he said, monotone and distant. He blinked, eyes glassy and soulless. She watched herself reflected in his unblinking pupils, a pair of itty bitty Merediths who both looked like they were well on their way from sadness to worry. As long as he becomes responsive when you stimulate him, I don't see a reason to worry.
She pushed his shoulder, digging her nails into his skin through his shirt. “Snap out of it, Derek. Seriously.”

He blinked and blinked again, and she sighed with relief as she watched focus return to his gaze. “What?” he said. He swallowed, and he glanced at their surroundings with an odd expression of disorientation. A full sweep, ending with the floor under his legs, and the cloudy fog quality of his stare sank into depression. He looked away, and he sighed. He'd tried to be human again, tried to take a walk and not be afraid and enjoy some time with her, and he'd been slapped down for his trouble. She read his thoughts sprawled all over his face.

“I know,” she said. Her eyes stung. “It's okay.”

He didn't reply. He shivered. “Take your shirt off, Derek,” she said.

The crushed quality of his forlorn gaze lessened. He didn't smile, but amusement made his lip twitch. “Naughty wife,” he said, his voice soft with weariness.

“Derek, you're exhausted and soaked,” she said with a snort. “This is hardly about sex.”

“You say that now,” he said. He leaned back against the door and closed his eyes. With a rush of effort, he swung his torso forward with a force that made him grunt, and he pulled at the shirt from behind his head. The shirt came up over his head. Gravity pulled him back into the door, and he rested, unmoving, shirt stuck around his arms and upper torso, as though his reserves had been spent.

She pulled off the shirt the rest of the way for him, and she wrapped him in the thick, fluffy towel. She tossed the shirt, and it landed in a sopping pile further into the foyer.

“That's bad for the floor,” he said.

“I don't care about the stupid floor,” she said. “I care about you.”

She dragged her pile of stuff closer. She put the second towel beside his hip, and she put down the plate of spaghetti and the bowl of fruit and the fresh bottle of water.

“What's all this?” he said.

“Hallway picnic. You need to eat more. I tried to leave you alone. I swear I did. But you're shucking weight like yesterday's socks or whatever.”

He stared at his lap. “And fainting.”

“Well,” she said, “To be fair, that seemed more like enforced sitting than fainting, and it was after doing way more exercise than you should have ever attempted. But you need to eat, whether you're hungry or not. Maybe set an alarm for yourself. Or don't let yourself have a pill without a snack. Something. Anything. Anything, Derek.”

He swallowed, and his eyes watered and rimmed with red.

“Derek, you're hurt. You're depressed. I get that it's hard to remember to eat sometimes.” She sighed as darker twists of memories clung to her consciousness. “I've been there, and I understand. You can't really pull any dark-and-twisty on me that I haven't done myself, or thought about doing, so I get it. Just...”

He clutched the towel. “He took from me, and I never...”
She stroked his body through the towel. “I know,” she murmured. “I know.”

A deep-cherry blush cut a swath across his face and his throat. His eyes creased, and his lips pressed into a thin, colorless line. His temples fluttered under his skin. Anger forced his breaths into tight funnels of air. “I want to have sex with my wife,” he said. “I want to walk up steps and take showers and lift things without you fucking helping me. I want to sleep in my own bed for the whole night. I want to not hurt. I want to be able to walk on the street without wondering if the stranger walking across the way has a fucking gun. I want to stop seeing him over my shoulder and in the mirror and when I wake up and in my dreams and everywhere. And I want to be able to get through an hour of my life without feeling like this.”

“I know,” she said.

“I hate him, Meredith,” he said, his voice low and scratchy and clawing against the deepest, darkest point of his vocal registers. “I hate him for doing this to me. I'm not me. My body isn't mine anymore. He stole that. He stole everything from me. I want him to die, except he's dead, and I can't...” His body shuddered. “I can't make this stop. It won't stop, and I need it to stop.”

She swallowed against tears. “He didn't steal me, Derek. I'm here. I'll always be here.”

He looked at her, panting, fury leaking from every pore. The towel made a stiff tent around his body as he pulled it as hard as his arms would let him pull. A whorl of ugly, black emotions swirled around him like a storm cloud. Lightning strikes of pain smashed into her in the grips of that horrible, ugly gaze, but she forced herself to look him in the eye and say it again.

“I'm here,” she repeated.

He looked at her, and the expression on his face crumpled. He blinked, and tears streaked down his blush-blotched, mottled skin. “I know,” he said. “I'm sorry. I know. I didn't mean to—” He thunked his head back against the door and stared, hopeless, at the overhead chandelier. The fight and grief bled out of him, leaving beaten, tormented remains behind.

“I know what you meant,” she said. “It's okay.” She pulled her arms around his shoulders and tilted him against her. He didn't protest. She stroked his wet, sweat-soaked hair, and he rested in her arms.

“Why did he do this to me?” he said.

She didn't answer. She closed her eyes, and she lay her cheek against his head. “Life sucks sometimes.”

A wry laugh choked off in his throat. “Understatement.”

“Life sucks a lot sometimes?”

“Hmm,” he said. “Better.”

“Life is the suck by which we measure all other suckiness?”

“Such a poet,” he said. “Thank you.”

“For what? Being the thesaurus of suck?”

“No,” he said. “Just... Being you. Being here. I'm sure I'm fantastic company.”
“Derek,” she said. “I can honestly say there's nowhere I'd rather be right now. Fantastic company or not.”

“I don't know,” he said. “I hear the Bahamas are quite nice this time of year.”

“I'm sure they are. But I'd rather be here.”

He sighed and pushed himself up with a wince. He settled the towel over his shoulders and let go with his hands. He took the plate of spaghetti and started picking at it. He made a face, disgust curling back his lips.

“Cold and yucky?” she said.

He nodded.

“You need to start liking cold food,” she said. “It's what real doctors do.”

“I think it's only what you do, Mere,” he said. “I'm quite certain we neurosurgeons prefer heated items.”

She chuckled and took the plate back to the kitchen to reheat it for him. When she returned to his camping spot in the foyer, she found him tearing apart a peach. He stared blankly down the hall, toward her, but not at her. The fruit splurched as he sunk in his teeth, and wet dribbles coursed down his stubbly chin. She put the warm plate on his lap and sat back down, squeezing his knee for balance. She glanced in the fruit bowl and saw a tiny pile of strawberry leaves next to untouched fruit. He'd eaten a couple while she'd been gone. A couple, but not many.

“I stopped at Pike Place for those,” she said. “Are they good?”

“They're great,” he said, his voice muffled around the peach, but flat. Unenthusiastic. He sucked on the fleshy part of the fruit, and then he rested, eyes shut, holding the peach in his hand over the plate in his lap. Peach juice dripped onto the pasta, leaving wet pockmarks in the Parmesan. Minutes passed, and he didn't move.

“Your spaghetti is going to get cold again,” she prodded. “And very peach-flavored”

He looked at the plate in his lap and sighed. He took another bite of the peach, and he chewed and chewed and chewed. When he swallowed, he stared at the remains of the fruit like he'd just climbed Mount Everest and had been asked to climb it again.

“They're not good, are they?” she said.

“Nothing tastes good to me,” he said. “I'm just not hungry.”

Despite his words, he kept working on the peach, taking bite after disinterested bite. When he finished, he dropped the wrinkled brown pit back into the bowl with the other fruit skeletons. She grabbed a strawberry, and he started to work on the spaghetti plate. The strawberry burst in her mouth, little flecks of seeds and juice and grainy bits crushing under the force of her jaw, and she moaned as the sugary sweetness swept over her taste buds. When her eyes opened, she found him staring at her, an amused, ghost of a grin tipping the corners of his lips upward. His fork hung midair, a swirl of noodles clinging to the tines.

“Thief,” he murmured. “What if I was saving that one?”

“I'll show you a thief,” she said. She reached across his lap and nabbed his water bottle. She took a long, gulping sip.

He grinned, but he didn't try to take back the bottle, and she deflated a little. Not playing. He usually played. She frowned as she watched how much he economized his movements. How tired he looked after every swallow of the spaghetti. She put the water bottle by his hip in case he wanted it, because she didn't think he would ask if he did.

He finished off the entire plate, wiped his face with the towel, and sighed. He leaned against the door and looked at her, his eyelashes low over his eyes. The dark circles under his eyes seemed fleshy and bad and he looked... Wasted. Thrashed. Done. His breaths rose and fell in his chest, soft and even and slow. He looked full, at least. Stuffed, actually. For the first time in weeks. His stomach curved under the towel.

“Do you want to go upstairs and sleep?” she said.

He didn't move. “I'll just sit here for a while,” he said, his voice soft, but the desolate look in his eyes told her what he didn't want to say. He wasn't sitting there because he wanted to do so.

She kissed him. “That's fine. We'll stay here then. You owe me a story, you know,” she said.

“Why?”

“Because I told you one.”

“But I walked around the block for that one, and it wasn't even about lesbian sex,” he said. “I'd say we're even.”

“Well, I'll tell you another after you tell me something,” she said. “It's only fair that this be an even exchange. Maturity-challenged Meredith for Manhattan Derek. I want to hear the stories, too.”

He closed his eyes. “Rain check?” he said, his voice distant and faint.

“Sure,” she said. “I like just sitting here with you.”

“Hmm.”

His head tilted forward, gradual at first, gaining momentum, but he picked himself up at the last moment before his chin collapsed against his chest, and he blinked, recovering, eyes bleary. He scrunched the damp towel against his naked skin. She stood and went into the living room to retrieve a pillow and the winter afghan for him.

She returned just in time to see him snap his neck back and blink as he tried to stay awake. “Here,” she whispered, holding out the pillow and the blanket for him. He muttered something, and he didn't reach for them. She didn't understand the words.

She kicked away the picnic towel and the fruit bowl and all the refuse, and she put the pillow on the floor beside him. She unfurled the afghan, and she tried to take his wet towel away, but he clutched it. “M'cold,” he mumbled.

“Derek,” she said. “Derek, wake up just a bit for a second.”

He blinked. “M'awake,” he assured her.

She felt a wispy grin crack her frown in half. “Sure, you are.”

She pulled at his towel, and he let her take it this time, his grip slack. She wrapped the afghan around his naked, shivery torso. She settled on the ground, her back against the door, and propped the soft pillow against her thigh. She wrapped her arms around him, and she pulled him to the floor. He made a noise of surprise, but then he settled on his back, padded by the pillow, his wet head cradled in the crook of her thigh and her abdomen.

“But we're on the floor in the foyer,” he said as his eyelids drooped lower and lower, and he didn't pick them up again to blink. The glassy crescents of his eyes disappeared. His arms fell to his sides.

“It doesn't matter, Derek,” she said. “Just sleep. We'll move in a little while when you feel better.”

She lifted up her shirt a few inches so he could soak up some of her body heat. She stroked his sweaty hair as his muscles went slack. His bent knees flattened as his cross-trainers skidded across the floor boards with a slow chuck-chuck-chuck into final collapse. His feet hit her purse and shoved aside a small side-table, but it didn't matter. Nothing mattered.

“Can' tell me this isn' naughty,” he slurred, half asleep. Conscious support left his neck, and his face tilted into her jeans and bare stomach. His nose pressed into her abdomen. He took a deep, sighing breath against her skin.

“Only in your twisted male mind,” she said.

“Takin advan...” he mumbled, but the syllables fell away. His mouth loll ed open. Hot, even breaths buffeted her skin, and he slept, safe and solid against her.
Chapter 10

The Cayenne rumbled as Meredith navigated one-handed through the almost-sunshine, a peculiar dichotomy of gloomy and brilliant that Derek had long ago dubbed Seattle-sunshine. The clouds had dispersed somewhat, leaving solid, bright rays cascading to the earth in haphazard clumps. Thick patches of light cast moving shadows through the tree branches, and the car cabin vacillated between dim and dark.

She rested her right hand on his knit gray warmups over his left thigh. She'd told him flip-flops and shorts would be okay if he wanted, but he chilled easily since his surgery, and he'd declined, incurious, in his misery, about the strange statement. The air conditioner vents whispered cool, soothing, freon-laced air across his skin, but he felt far from soothed.

The car cabin vibrated with atonal bedlam. The tinny tinkle of the piano riffs from Carry On Wayward Son emanated from the speakers. “Once I rose above the noise and confusion, just to get a glimpse beyond this illusion,” Meredith sang, her tone several notes off of the actual score. He closed his eyes, clutching the pillow she'd given him against his chest. His head throbbed in time with the clash of cymbals.

Meredith hated his taste in music. He disliked hers, though he wouldn't label the feeling as any sort of rabid aversion. There wasn't much music he refused to listen to aside from rap and twangy, woe-to-the-world country. Regardless, they'd found a compromise with one of Seattle's classic rock stations, something they could both enjoy in equal measure. The problem, though, was that she liked to sing along with songs she knew when she was in a good mood, and she was in a good mood today.

Since they'd reunited for the final time, their lives had settled into blissful routine. They'd started commuting together when their shifts matched up. He'd heard her butcher everything from I Fought The Law to Poker Face. He usually didn't protest. Their commute was short, and even if the noises emerging from her mouth were a wretched cacophony, he still found her cute to watch. Her eyes and nose scrunched when she sang notes that were far too soprano for her, and she hunkered down in her seat and bobbed her head like some sort of turkey fowl when she tried to approach the bass registers that had been denied to her by evolution.

He usually didn't protest, except he usually didn't feel like shit, either. Time crept forward second by eternal second. He watched the road through heavy, gummy eyelashes, breathing through parted lips. A trickle of fluid drained down his throat as he leaned back. Everything swam around his head.

Derek sniffed, pulling air through his clogged nasal passages. He clutched the pillow as she tapped the steering wheel and tried to follow Brad Delp into the stratosphere of More Than A Feeling. Her hand on his thigh patted out a rhythm that may have fit with the percussion four songs ago, but seemed more like beatless flailing, now.

“I closed my eyes, and she slipped awaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaay,” Meredith sang, her syllables cracking with the strain, and she made her scrunch-face. She babied the Cayenne through a right turn, but despite her measure of care, the car seesawed on its axles, and he couldn't help the twisted gasp that skipped from his lips as pain drove deep. The noise lost itself in the tidal waves of rock and roil, and Meredith didn't look over or seem to notice.

He tried to give himself support with the pillow, but he already held it with so much force that his arms had started to ache on top of everything else. Discomfort made him pant. He couldn't escape.
On top of the constant hurt, his chest felt full and wet and sore when he breathed. He'd been fighting the urge to cough for what seemed like eternity.

Are you okay for a longish drive? she'd asked that morning.

Derek glanced into the side view mirror. The gun pointed at his face, and his tormenter grinned. “Yes, Dr. Shepherd,” said Gary Clark. “Are you okay for a longish drive?”

Derek pressed his forehead against the cool glass and let his eyes drift shut. The constant jarring had started out tolerable, but now even the lulls between jostles left him stuck in a solid vise of ache. Her shrill wailing jammed icepicks into his eardrums. He swallowed against a roll of nausea.

Are you okay for a longish drive? she'd asked within moments of him waking. His eyelashes had stuck together like they'd been glued. He'd wiped away grit, swallowed, and peered at her groggily from his contorted position over the arm of the chair in their bedroom. When he'd shrugged, he hadn't really had a good concept of Meredith's idea of longish. He'd been thinking maybe a half hour. Not this. Not eternity.

He'd stumbled into the shower that morning, and he'd stayed there an extra fifteen minutes because the steamy air had let him breathe. Finally. Air. But then the heat had made him lightheaded and dizzy, and his choice had been to faint or be finished. He'd eaten two bowls of flavorless Raisin Bran for breakfast, and then she'd stuffed him into his car, all bright and bubbly and bouncing. He hadn't seen her this animated or happy in weeks. Since before he'd been shot. And he'd let himself get swept up in her excitement.

My first day off, she'd said as she'd helped him climb into the front seat, grunting with the effort of supporting his weight. And I have a surprise for you.

Much more fun to listen to than the discouraging messages his body parts had been sending him. Stop. Derek, stop it. We're getting sick. We're getting sick, and we really don't want to be in a car for a long time. Please? Be nice? Maybe just sleep today? Haven't you abused us enough lately?

His eyes watered and pricked with tears as his wits approached their ends.

He peeled his eyelids back, only to see Gary Clark grinning at him, as if to say, “Look at what I did! Look at all the havoc I've wrought. Poor, depressed, stressed-out Derek let his immune system go belly-up.”

“Stop it,” Derek croaked. To her. To Gary Clark. To himself. He didn't know. “Please, stop,” he repeated, unable to take it anymore. He sniffed. Snot bubbled in his nose, and he couldn't breathe. Air crackled in his lungs, impeded by fluid. He wouldn't fucking cough. He would not.

One more, Dr. Shepherd. Just one more.

Meredith's singing ceased, and her supernova of excitement collapsed. Guilt pressed against his consciousness, even as he shuddered with the sheer relief of silence. His body swayed to the left, toward Meredith, as she pulled off the road onto the right shoulder. She turned off the car's engine, and he stared, helpless, scratchy eyes watering, at the cracked pavement to the left and rocks and bushes and overhanging trees to the right.

“Hey, what's wrong?” she said. She squeezed his thigh.
“Nothing's wrong,” he said.

“Liar, liar, pants on fire,” said Gary Clark as he sneered in the mirror.

The silence stretched as Meredith stared at Derek, undeterred. He heard himself wheezing as he watched his foggy breaths claw along the glass window. His nose ran. Snot crawled down the skin of his upper lip, creeping and slow, and there was no surreptitious way to fix himself. He inhaled. The increase in pressure made his head feel like it was splitting open, and the frothing sound of his breath, bubbling deep in his nasal cavity, embossed everything on an embarrassing neon sign for her.

Derek. Sick. See the lump in the passenger seat for details.

She brushed his forehead with the back of her palm. He didn't push her away or move or do much of anything. “You're hot,” she said.

“I know,” he said. “So are you.”

Her lip curled with a hint of amusement, but then worry doused her expression with a frown. “I think you have a slight fever,” she clarified. She petted his face, her fingers twisting through a wayward curl. Her lip quivered, and her gaze seemed watery.

“I'm not sick.”

“You sound awful, Derek.”

“Thank you for finally noticing,” he snapped. He hugged the pillow and curled against the door, away from her. The air conditioner rushed.

“I thought...” She sniffled. “I thought you were doing the mopey thing this morning. You've been gloomy and monosyllabic all week. I didn't know you were getting sick. I'm sorry. I'm really sorry, Derek.”

He couldn't look at her as she wiped away tears. He hadn't meant to be nasty, he just...

She sighed. “I never should have taken you on such a long trip this early. This was stupid. It was a stupid, stupid plan.” Her fingers squeezed his pant leg, and then flattened out into soft, reassuring strokes, and he closed his eyes against the torrential desire to yell or hit something or do anything but sit in this car and feel like he was dying. She shouldn't be sobbing because she'd taken him on a fucking car trip. Would this ever end?

“I'm not sick,” he said. “I'll be okay.”

“You have a slight fever,” she said. “This could be pneumon—”

“I'm not fucking sick!” he said, but his voice chose that moment to give out, and the last word came out a hoarse, breathy squeak.

“Okay,” Meredith said, her voice soft. She stroked his thigh. “Okay, I'm sorry.”

A car drove past them, and the Cayenne swayed as the air disturbed by the passing vehicle buffeted it. Derek let his lips part, and he panted, more wheezing than anything else, but he needed air, and his nose was fast becoming a dead end for oxygen. Gary Clark smiled at him from the mirror, almost gleeful. Frustration bolstered by exhaustion and pain coiled in Derek's gut. He tried to breathe. Congestion thickened in his chest, and the effort of being angry didn't seem very attractive after about three or four seconds. He funneled what was left into determination. This could not be happening to him.

“So,” Derek said. He sniffed, and he blinked, and he tried to make a show of looking ready to go again. He fumbled with his seat belt, and he resettled the pillow. “What's this surprise?”

He glanced at her and frowned. He'd apparently said something very wrong. She bit her lip, and her concerned gaze deepened into outright, unmitigated worry, like he'd just inadvertently admitted he had the plague or something.

“You mean you haven't guessed it yet?” she said. She stared, her gaze piercing.

“I don't...” he stuttered, and then he looked. Outside. He stared out the windshield down the long, winding road. A double yellow line bisected two lanes. Tall trees surrounded them on both sides, low, weeping boughs hanging over the road to form a makeshift, verdant cavern. His hand tightened against the door handle as recognition overcame confusion. In a few miles, there would be a break in the trees that housed a small gravel lot with a market place and a drugstore and a gas station. Beyond that, after several more miles, the road would turn off into obscurity. The elevation would rise. The road would climb out of the solid clot of trees, higher, higher, and then, “My land.”

“I figured it would be good for you,” she said. “You can stretch out on the dock and snooze in the sort-of sunshine. And the contractors—"

“My land,” he repeated.

“Yeah.”

“Keep going.”

She sighed. “Derek, the last road isn't paved. That's why I brought the pillow for you. And you look really, really—"

“Please,” he said. “Please, Meredith. Please, I want to see my lake. Please.”

Embarrassment made him shake, but he couldn't stop begging. His land.

He realized, if she wanted to, there wasn't much he could do to stop her from taking him home. He couldn't drive. Through exhausting repetition, he'd built his stamina back up to the point where he could manage two twenty-minute walks a day, or once around Meredith's hilly block without throwing up in the foyer at the end. He could climb the stairs in their house in about five minutes.
And he'd discovered two days ago that he could sleep on his side for very short periods of time. His list of can-dos had grown, but was still woefully short. He had no doubt she could manhandle him against his will if she felt she needed to. She'd already demonstrated time and time again that her physical strength far exceeded his own at the moment.

But he thought of the water as it crashed around his body. The way Meredith lay on the dock in her small red bikini, sunning. The perfection of the soft earth and the tall grass and the way the wind blew across the reeds with a low, soothing whistle. The ducks that churned the choppy water with their tiny feet as they swum by in a flock of feathers and happy chatter.

Reflective water spread out like rippled glass before his eyes.

His land.

I can do whatever I want in here.
He hadn't seen it in weeks.

“Please,” he said.

The tormented look on her face crumpled. “Okay,” she said. “Okay, I'm... Will you let me take a look at you first?”

“Why?”

“Because if you're dying of influenza or pneumonia, I'd at least like to know, even if you don't care.”

“But I'm fine,” he said. “I'm not sick. I can't be sick.”

“Liar, liar, liar,” Mr. Clark taunted.

Derek's chest tightened as he tried to pull in air. His diaphragm pushed into his lungs, and he forced out a slow, wheezy exhalation against the upswing of force, trying not to let go. In, out. In, out. He held his pillow against his body, and he breathed. Shivery urges to cough tortured him for a tense minute before he couldn't stop himself anymore.

A deep, wet, spuming cough pasted him against the back of the seat. The pillow barely did a thing to stop the knife that plunged into his sternum and sawed along the slowly healing line of bone. His eyes watered, and an uncontrolled shout of pain flew from his lips.

Meredith's seat-belt clicked. She popped the trunk and slipped out of the car. The space around his head spun. He grimaced and sniffed and panted as misery crushed him in its jagged embrace, and he didn't pay much attention to her at all until his door opened. She reached across his body and un-clipped his seat belt. Something crumpled and rustled as she leaned, and it hit his knee. He watched, almost as though he were watching a movie, unable to act, as she put his small blue Nike duffel bag on the floor by his feet. He kept his things in that bag. His doctor things. Just in case. In the trunk. She'd—

Her arms wrapped around his body, and she pulled him forward. The pillow quashed between their bodies. She held him prisoner against her shoulder. She fumbled with his shirt at the hemline, and something cold pressed against his back. His skin twitched.

“Breathe deeply,” she said.

_Breathe deeply, Dr. Shepherd._

The gelid clutches of anxiety pulled at his body. He rested his forehead against her clavicle.

She listened, placing the stethoscope against the skin over each lung, upper and lower, front and back. He tried not to wheeze or cough or snuffle or sound horrible, but his efforts didn't seem to make a difference. Her grip around his body grew tighter and tighter, and he knew she was panicking. His fault. His fucking fault. And then his nose ran, and he had to suck in breath after breath to keep from ruining her shirt.

When she'd finished, she sighed, a shivery, panty thing that sounded dangerously close to Meredith-in-tears. He didn't want her to cry. He couldn't stand it. She ripped his black stethoscope away from her face and let it fall against the duffel bag to the floor by his feet. She wiped her eyes with her fists, and then she hugged him, not speaking. Her palms ran up and down his back, soothing.
He coughed again, as horrible as the first. Tears welled in his eyes as pain sliced his body open at the seams. He moaned into her shirt, and her grip tightened. He didn't want to do this. He couldn't do this again. He'd been finished when they'd sent him home.

This would set him back to the beginning. If they took him back to the hospital and he was laid up for days on end, he'd be back to barely being able to walk down the hall. If they needed to put him back on the ventilator, they'd put the urinary catheter and the IV back in, and he wouldn't be able to speak. He vaguely remembered the feeling of breathing through a straw, only able to watch while Meredith babbled at him, and he'd hated it.

“Derek, your lungs sound really bad,” she said.

“Please, I want to see my lake,” he said.

“How long have you felt congested?”

He swallowed. “Since yesterday.”

She sighed. “Your head, your chest, or both?”

“Both,” he said.

“You haven't been coughing.”

“It hurts,” he confessed, and her grip tightened more. “Please. I don't want to spend the night in the hospital. It's not pneumonia. It's not.”

She held him in her arms. Another car sped past. He stared over her shoulder through the bug-splattered windshield. Tunnels of green and shadow flashed white. White walls. White halls. White sheets. The rhythmic pulsing of his heart monitor echoed in his ears.

_You're not the man._

“I'm not sick,” he said, helpless.

She wound her fingers through his hair, and she kissed his temple. “I'm going to stop at the drug store and get you some Mucinex or something for the upper respiratory stuff, and you're going to take it,” she said.

“Okay.”

“And if this doesn't get any better by tonight, I'm taking you to the hospital, Derek,” she said. “You just had heart surgery three weeks ago, your lungs sound like there's a small ocean of crap stuck in them, and you have a slight fever. We shouldn't even be having this discussion. I should be driving you to the ER. You know it just as much as I do.”

“It's not post-op pneumonia,” he said.

“Derek, if you were your patient, what the hell would you call this then?”

He couldn't stop another hacking, wet cough. He shivered against her, the pain making him dizzy. He hugged the pillow. “I don't know,” he said, his voice weak and distant. He swallowed, and Gary Clark laughed in his ears as Meredith returned to her side and started up the car.

He rested against the door as his Cayenne began to move. She jammed her hand on the gearshift and tried to pull out into traffic. As she drove the car off the shoulder, a horn blared, and she had to slam on the brakes to keep from being t-boned. Momentum pushed him into the seat belt, and he couldn't stop a tortured bark of pain. The pillow made it less catastrophic than it would have been.
He fought for breath against hurt and barely won.

“Damn it,” she cursed, and she slammed her hands against the steering wheel as she panted and her face turned bright red. “I hate this car. I hate it, Derek! The blind spots are bigger than trucks.”

The black spots in his vision flickered into normal sight. “Then why did you drive it?” he said, trying to peel the suffering grimace off his face. He sniffled.

“Because the suspension is smoother than the one on my Jeep,” she said, and then she sighed.

He closed his eyes as the Cayenne started to move. She hit the accelerator, and the engine hummed. “Oh,” he said. She'd driven it for him, then. Great. So, she'd planned a surprise. She'd thought of everything from a pillow for his chest, to the smoother suspension of his vehicle over hers, to help make him more comfortable. And all he'd done was moan in pain and yell at her.

Another bubbly cough shattered his frame, and this time when his eyes watered, they spilled over for several blinks before he got a grip on himself. He didn't want to cough, god, damn it. Except letting the first one loose seemed to have given a whole torrent of them permission to lay waste to his fragile sternum. Panting as he tried to recuperate, he leaned his head back against the seat. His chest hurt. It really, really hurt. At least, at the hospital, when they'd bugged him to cough a few times in the morning, they'd left alone long enough afterward to recover before asking him to do it again.

Gravel churned under the tires as she pulled into the small parking lot in front of the drug store and the market. The car handled the gravel well, but he couldn't help gripping the pillow tighter, waiting for something awful to punish him. Nothing did. When she stopped and put the car in park, she looked at him.

“I'll be right back,” she said. She grabbed her purse and exited, leaving him alone in misery.

He closed his eyes, and let his thoughts drift away.

“Derek,” Meredith said as she looked up. She sat in the dim light at the small dining table across from his kitchenette. She wore one of his t-shirts and nothing else. The paper crumpled as she folded her issue of Cosmo shut and sighed.

“What?” he said, grinning. “Are you not happy to see me?” He dropped off his grocery sack on the counter top. He planned to grill steaks tonight, ply her with a sixty dollar bottle of wine, and lay with her naked under the carpet of stars on a picnic cloth.

She shrugged. “I'm always happy to see you. I love you.”

_He sat across from her. The cushion on the chair squeaked. He frowned. He reached across the_ _table to brush her lower lip with his finger, relishing the soft rippled surface of her skin. Her_ _favorite lip gloss made his thumb slip. She licked the tip of his nail, but then she pulled away and_ _looked down at the table._

“Well, what's wrong?” he said.

_She fiddled with her hands. “I think you come here too much,” she said._

_He shrugged. “Because I need it.”_
“I know you think you do.”

He peered at her. Her hair tumbled down, loose and tangled with sleep, and she wore no makeup. Her skin glowed anyway. Ruddy imperfections marred her face and neck, a small peppering of flaws, but they did nothing to detract, nothing to make her less his or less beautiful. Need devoured him as he stared at her. His wife.

“I've wanted to do this all week,” he said. He stood and moved to her side of the bench. He kissed her and let his eyes close as the heady scent of her skin swept against him. She twisted backward, a small moan skipping from her lips. His shirt on her body rustled as he fiddled with the hem. She tasted him, and then she pulled away.

“You have done this all week,” she replied.

“What can I say?” he rumbled against her skin. “You're irresistible.”

She wiped her wrist against her lips as if to erase the taste of him, splayed her palm against his chest, and pushed him backward. He caught himself on the edge of the bench before he fell to the floor. He panted, flummoxed, as she stared at him. Her skin had flushed. He'd turned her on, and yet... “You're ignoring me again,” she said.

“Please, Meredith.”

She shook her head. “This isn't a good idea anymore.”

“But I need it!”

She looked at him like he'd sucker-punched her. Her lower lip quivered. Tears welled up. She looked at the trailer and he followed her gaze, past the bricked windows and the grocery bag and the mussed sheets on the bed.

Her soft, gray stare met his gaze.

“I'm not really Meredith,” she said. “You get that, right?”

“Derek,” Meredith whispered against his ear. She rattled his shoulder. “Derek, come on. Wake up.”

He coughed. The deep, bubbling sound of fluid caught in his chest, and he coughed again and again, until he felt bell-rung and half-dead and dizzy with agony. His trailer morphed into the small beige cabin of his Cayenne. Sunshine slammed into his eyeballs through the windshield. The tennis ball in his head had been exchanged for a basketball. He couldn't breathe or think or move.

She held him while he panted and wheezed, trying to catch his breath. Her feet churned gravel as she shifted to compensate for his weight. She rummaged through something she held behind his spine. The familiar jingle of a pill bottle intervened in the silence. Her shoulders shifted as she snap-twisted the child-proof cap. She pushed a cold water bottle against his palm. He grasped it by reflex. She gave him something. A small, solid dollop. A pill. Some decongestant or something. He didn't know what kind. He wasn't sure he cared. He took the pill and a swig of water and closed his eyes while she embraced him, rubbing his back and whispering.

“Please,” he said. “I need to see my land. It's only a few miles. Don't take me to the hospital.”

Her palm pressed against his forehead. Her fingers felt cold, but she'd been holding a water bottle.
“Do you feel cold, like you might be getting a fever?” she said. “Don't you dare lie to me.”

“No,” he said. She rummaged through his doctor duffel. Plastic crinkled. Before he knew it, he had a thermometer jammed in his mouth while she glared. “M'not lying,” he said around the small device. His tongue rubbed against the sterile plastic sleeve as he spoke. A lump formed in his throat.

After a minute, she took it out and stared, holding it up to the gray and blue sky framed in a square by the trees at the edges of the parking lot. “100.2,” she said, squinting.

“It's low-grade,” he said. “I'm fine.”

“Scale of 1 to 10, how bad is it?” she said. She leaned into him, her eyes inches from his. Her frosty, slate gaze pierced him as she gripped his shoulder. “Don't. Lie. This is your life, and it's very freaking important to me, even if you seem to be an uncaring idiot about it.”

Red blush crept over his face. “I'm not an idiot. I care.”

Her fingernails dug into his skin as her fingers clenched. “Scale?”

“7,” he said. “10 when I cough, but only because it fucking hurts.”

She stared at him for a long march of moments, a vicious battle of should she or shouldn't she sprawled across her face. She reached across his lap into the back seat. A bag crinkled. His pain pills. She made sure they carried them everywhere the few times they'd been out. She pulled his Percocet bottle loose from the pile of other bottles. “Will you take one more Percocet before we try the road to your land?”

“I already took two.”

“I know, but you look really miserable already, and I couldn't bear—”

He stared at the pill resting on her palm and, without further argument, swept it into his hand. He tilted back his head, and he took it with another swig of water. The pill caught in his esophagus, and he swallowed again and again, finally forcing it down. The cabin spun around his head. He blinked. She watched him as he re-settled, wordless, and then she slammed the car door in his face. He flinched.

When his heartbeat calmed, he stared at his lap, eyes watering. She was angry again. She was fucking angry at him, and he didn't know why or what the hell to do about it anymore. He didn't want to make her angry. Helpless frustration heated his breaths.

The car wobbled on its frame as she tore open the door on her side and settled herself with a huff. She jammed the key in the ignition like she wielded a knife for stabbing. Her knuckles turned white as clutched the key and turned it in the ignition. The car rumbled to life. She fought with her seat belt. In her agitation, she missed grabbing it and twisted again, spitting and hissing curses.

She pointed at the water bottle in the cup holder without looking at him. “Drink the rest of that.”

A cough and a moan pasted him to his seat, and he trembled, barely able to breathe, miserable. “I'm sorry,” he said, feeling useless. He wasn't even sure what he was apologizing for, but he could do that. Say sorry. He'd made a fucking Olympic event out of expressing remorse. It was one of his only skills that getting shot hadn't fucking robbed from him. “Meredith, I'm sorry.”

She flipped down her sunglasses over her face and backed the car out of its parking spot. Gravel churned. “I hate you, sometimes, Derek,” she said through gritted teeth. “I really freaking do.”

He swallowed. “Why?”

“Because you're leaving this up to me! You're sick. You're really sick. You won't admit it because you're scared witless, which isn't allowed, because you're the mighty Derek Shepherd, a man who is completely incapable of admitting fear unless the confession is drawn-and-quartered out of him, and now I'm stuck making what could be a life-or-death decision. I don't want to take you to your land, because as a doctor, I know that's probably the biggest mistake ever. But I don't want to take you to the hospital, because as your wife, I know that's probably the biggest mistake ever. And I hate you, Derek. I fucking hate you.”

He blinked as he stared at the windshield. His head started to whirl with the new introduction of painkillers. He couldn't breathe. His nose ran. He sniffled, and his torso shook as embarrassing, uncontrollable tears leaked. They crawled down his face, collected at the edges of his cheeks, and fell with wet splats onto his warmups, leaving darkened, round scars on the cotton.

“Hmm,” Gary Clark said from the mirror. “Wrecking your marriage now, too? Making you cry like a gutless coward in front of your wife? You're almost making me glad I missed your heart.”

Derek's hands shook as he wiped his face. Spit collected between his lips and teeth as he sniveled. Every fucking orifice on his face was leaking some sort of fluid. He felt disgusting. And shameful. And the licking heat of self-conscious distress wouldn't stop flushing across his face and his neck and his throat and... Hot. Now, he did feel hot. And awful. A deep, wet grunt of discomfiture tore through him. Pain.

And he couldn't stop crying.

She took one look at Derek and growled. “God,” she huffed. “This is turning into the crappiest surprise I've ever—”

“It's okay,” he said. Spasms of grief shook him. He watched the scenery pass by the window. Endless trees and bracken and moss. The cave of forest and fauna made the car dark. He gripped the door handle and the pillow.

“It's not okay,” she snapped. “There's nothing about this that's okay.”

“It's my fault.”

“It's not,” she said. “I've been trying so hard to be more sensitive or whatever, and I think this has pretty much proven that I'm a giant freaking failure when it comes to you. You're dying of pneumonia, and I didn't even notice because I'm so stuck on me, me, me. And now you're upset, and I don't want you to be upset, but I can't stop yelling at you because I hate you. I hate this. I hate Gary Fucking Clark. I just want things to be better.”

“I'm sorry,” he said. His tongue lost connection with his sentience. He blinked as the solid rush hit him. His grip on the door loosened. “Uh.”

“Stop it,” she snapped. “Stop saying that when you have nothing to be sorry for. If you say you're sorry one more time I think I might scream. You drive me crazy!”

“Ditto,” he managed. He rested his head against the door and inhaled with a deep, wet, bubbly breath.

“I... Okay.” She sighed. “You may have a point.”
Tense, awful silence separated them, and for the first time since she'd married him, he felt alone despite the mere feet of space between them. Alone like he'd felt in the hotel, days after he'd discovered Addison with Mark. Alone and drunk and nauseated and not sure whether he would ever get out of bed again. He clutched the pillow, unable to stop crying.

Exhaustion gripped him. He hurt without dignity, and no matter how much he tried, he couldn't pull himself together.

“Don't take me to Seattle Grace,” he said.

“What?”

“I don't want to go back there. Please. Maybe Seattle Pres?”

She bit her lip. Her palm came to rest on his shoulder as she accepted his shaky olive branch. She rubbed his arm, and he let the soothing tide pull him into the ocean. Disorientation made his sense of the passing scenery feel more like a drive-by in an impressionistic painting gallery. Greens and browns and earthy tones melded into muddy, featureless nothing. He swallowed as invisible cotton balls sucked the moisture out of his mouth.

“I still love you,” she said in the quiet roar. “Even though I hate you.”

His eyelids dipped shut. He didn't reply. She turned onto the unpaved portion of the road. The rear axle had barely touched the dirt, and he was already glad she'd suggested the third Percocet. He accepted the torture in silence, willing himself with the last of his reserves not to cry out after every pot hole, pock mark, ruffle, and dent in the muddy road. He'd asked for this. His land. For a few hours before she took him to the hospital. He strained against the pillow, trying to hang on to something, anything. His mind snapped out of conscious thought like a rubber band flung from a slingshot.

“Derek,” Meredith said as she looked up. She sat in the dim light at the small dining table across from his kitchenette. She wore one of his t-shirts and nothing else. The paper crumpled as she folded her issue of Cosmo shut and sighed.

“What?” he said, grinning. “Are you not happy to see me?” He dropped off his grocery sack on the counter top. He planned to grill steaks tonight, ply her with a sixty dollar bottle of wine, and lay with her naked under the carpet of stars on a picnic cloth.

She grinned. “I'm always happy to see you. I love you.”

He sat across from her. The cushion on the chair squeaked. He reached across the table to brush her lower lip with his finger, relishing the soft rippled surface of her skin. Her favorite lip gloss made his thumb slip. She licked the tip of his nail and moaned.

He peered at her. Her hair tumbled down, loose and tangled with sleep, and she wore no makeup. Her skin glowed anyway. Ruddy imperfections marred her face and neck, a small peppering of flaws, but they did nothing to detract, nothing to make her less his or less beautiful. Need devoured him as he stared at her. His wife.

“I've wanted to do this all week,” he said. He stood and moved to her side of the bench. He kissed her and let his eyes close as the heady scent of her skin swept against him. She twisted backward, a small moan skipping from her lips. His shirt on her body rustled as he fiddled with the hem. She tasted him, and then she pulled away and laughed.

“You have done this all week,” she replied.
“What can I say?” he rumbled against her skin. “You're irresistible.”

She wiped her wrist against her lips as if to postpone the taste of him, splayed her palm against his chest, and pushed him backward. “Bed,” she said as she tangled with his shirt. “Now.”

They shuffled toward the back of the trailer. He shucked his shoes and his shirt, and she grappled with the buttons on his fly, and then he was falling. Falling backward. His body slammed into the bed. He huffed as he flattened and bounced back. She collapsed on top of him in a giggling tangle of angular limbs and silky skin.

“I love you,” she said, and she kissed him on his lips, on his throat, on his chest. She trailed to his bellybutton, and he laughed, deep and rumbling and loose.

“It's my turn today,” he said. He flipped her on her back, and she shrieked with delight. “Why is my shirt still on your body?” he said.

“Because you didn't take it off yet,” she replied, eyes alight.

“This is a dilemma,” he said.

“The bigger dilemma would be that you're still wearing your pants.”

“Hmm. Very true.”

Her tiny hands curled over his waistband. Her knuckles dug into his skin. She rolled his jeans down his hips and paused. Her eyebrows shot up. “Commando?”

“Why would I care about my underwear in this place?”

“You always put me in mine.”

He grinned. “That's because I like to take it off you.” He kissed her on the throat, and he delighted with the vibrations underneath her skin as she laughed. “Piece.” He kissed her in the dip where her clavicles met her sternum. “By.” Her body rolled back in a wave as he yanked up his soft indigo shirt and peeled it from her body. He took a nipple in his mouth and sucked. Her fingers spider-walked against his naked back. “Piece.”

“Derek,” she moaned. Her knees imprisoned his hips as she opened for him. “Please.”

“Are you wet already?”

“Make me,” she replied. “Are you hard already?”

He leered. “Make me.”

He slithered out of his jeans and pushed against her. Heat radiated against his groin. He kissed her as she slipped her hand between their bodies and touched him, stroked him base to tip. “Oh,” he groaned, panting. A slave to the building pressure she wrought, he pressed against her hand. Friction built, and another groan tumbled out of him. “Stop,” he managed.

“Stop?”

He laughed. “It's my turn, remember?”

He captured her lips before she could answer, tasting the salt and sweetness of her skin. Arms shaking, he pushed himself down, down until he fell over the tip of the bed into a kneeling position.
He grabbed her thighs and yanked her against his body with a growl. Her knees hooked over his shoulders, and he buried himself in her warmth. He curled his tongue against soft skin between her thighs, and she screamed, and he moaned, and then everything tumbled out of focus as he brought her to a trembling halt on a ledge below the pinnacle.

Her body shuddered as he licked her inner thigh. Exquisite heat. “I want you,” she panted. She rose up and clutched his shoulders. “I want to see you. Now, Derek. Now.”

He climbed back into bed with a playful growl. She cupped him as she kissed everywhere she could reach. “Mmm. Hard, now,” she murmured.

“Wet, now,” he replied. He let her taste herself on his lips, and she loosed a warbling moan that made his muscles shiver and his groin tighten with need.

“Fuck me,” she said. “Fuck me, now.”

He propped himself on his elbows, flat above her body. She wrapped her legs around him. Her body heaved as he peered into her glassy, lust-drugged eyes. With a grunt, he found home, and he closed his eyes to keep from spilling as hot and wet and slick and tight overwhelmed all other sensation. His breaths shivered, and her internal muscles clenched.

She grimaced and squirmed. Her breasts heaved as she struggled for air. “Anything, Derek. Fuck me. Please.”

“How about slow?” he said. “I can do slow.” He pulled out and pushed in by inches, and he rumbled as tension locked his body and the buzzing sensation became a constant wail. He rested his lips by her ear, and he told her softly, “I can do incredibly slow.”

Out and in again, and she moaned. “I love you,” she said.

“Hmm. I love you, too.”

She clawed his back and he stroked her insides once, twice, again. Slow. He let the harrying rhythm pull him toward mental frenzy. The wail became a tormenting siren. Move. Move, faster. He denied it as long as he could, delighting in her moans and sighs and soft breaths against his body. Home. Her body was home, and he’d found it, and he never wanted to leave. He just wanted to come in. Again and again and again.

Her fingers twisted against his shoulder blades. She squeezed her legs around his body, until every time he met her with his hilt in a slow grind, she screamed and she squeezed and he felt like he was in the grips of a boa constrictor. Sweat meandered down his spine and dotted her brow as he tortured her. Tortured himself.

“I need this,” he said. “I need you. I need to be me.”

“I know,” she said as he speared her again. Again.

“I want you.”

“You have me. Take me.”

He couldn’t hold it in anymore. His lower body tightened like a screw and then snapped. The world split apart. He yelled as his body shuddered and twitched and he moved within her, lost to everything. Bright light flashed in his eyes. He arched his head back.

Heaven exploded into exquisite hell. Sunlight pierced the small crescents of space between his eyelids. He moaned as a dark, blurry shadow crossed his vision.

“We're here,” Meredith's soft voice said.

Reality crushed him, and he leaned into her arms, silent, feeble and unable. His sinuses felt a little more clear. Not a lot. His nose didn't leak between every inhalation. But he still couldn't breathe, and the horrible car ride had crushed his normal pain tolerance into tiny bits while he'd been absent. His sternum hurt. It didn't ache. It hurt. Like he'd been pried open with a sternal retractor, and then the surgeon had forgotten to staple him back together. Pain-born nausea coiled at the back of his throat, threatening to make him lose his breakfast in a wet splatter all over Meredith's shirt.

She leaned through the car door and held him. Something clicked. He felt his seat belt loosen. “How are you doing?” she asked, her voice soft and low.

His troubled, strained gasp answered for him.

“How are you doing?” she said.

He forced his feet over the floor panel into air, and he let gravity pull him into a wobbly standing position. His weight rested against Meredith. She swayed under the assault, but she shuffled back one step and then two, found her balance, and braced herself for him. His cross-trainers squished in the soft, wet dirt and spongy grass. Through a nauseated blur, he saw his trailer resting on the earth twenty feet away.

Bird calls, insects buzzing, and the soft whistle of the breeze soothed his ears. His heart pounded, and his breaths quickened as adrenaline contributed to the chemical mess in his bloodstream. “M'land,” he slurred. He took a step, only to stumble.

“You're totally stoned, Derek. Be careful.”

The distant chatter of ducks and geese and other water fowl drew his gaze to the right. He couldn't see the water or the dock from the trailer. Elevation changes and tall reeds interrupted the view. But he could feel the wet breeze against his face.

“M'lake.”

“I think you should lie down for a few minutes first before we try that hike,” Meredith said. “Okay?”

“M'lake's over there,” he told her.

Her grip tightened around his waist. “I know. And you can stretch out there in a bit. But why don't you lie down first?” she said.

Another step, and the tidal wave of adrenaline receded. He breathed and clutched her body. With a weak, shaky nod, he let her lead him to the trailer. Wrong. A vague sense of wrongness invaded his body as his feet hit the deck. A tarp covered the grill, but he knew he'd pulled it off that morning because he'd planned to grill steaks. And, despite the breeze and the birds and all the perfect things, he felt horrible. He wasn't supposed to feel horrible here. He was supposed to feel better.

His body shivered as she fumbled with her keys and unlocked the door. Light slanted into the small cabin through the windows. They shuffled inside, and sound muffled into almost silence. Too bright. No bricks over the windows. Meredith guided him to the bench at the table. “Let me put out clean sheets, okay?” she said. She left him without waiting for an answer.

Her issue of Cosmo had disappeared. And his groceries didn’t sit on the counter by the sink. The light made his eyes water, and he blinked. There were supposed to be bricks. Where were the bricks? The room swirled, and he put his head down on the table. Wrong. All of this was fucking wrong. He coughed, wet and wheezy against the place mat. A sob of pain popped loose from his lips, and he rested there in abject misery.

Arms gripped him around the waist. “Okay,” said Meredith. “All set. Are you doing okay?”

No. But he didn’t answer.

She helped him stand up and shamble down the short hallway to the bed. He lay on his back. She propped him up with piles of soft pillows, and she tucked all the blankets around him after she pulled off his shoes. She kissed his cheek, and then she settled next to him, warm and breathing and alive. The mattress sank with her small weight. The flat of her palm rested under his shirt against his bellybutton.

He stared at the ceiling, hazy and drugged. He couldn’t move. Miles of clothes and blankets separated them. His breaths struggled in his chest, and though he felt less congested above the neck, below remained a haven for discomfort. He sniffed, and he coughed, and his eyes scratched with latent sickness. Pain radiated through his torso. And he did feel hot. Now. Uncomfortably so. Mindless, he pushed back the comforter. She snuffled in her sleep and resettled. The very idea of sex nauseated him.

All wrong. All fucking wrong.

His eyes drifted shut after a suffering forty-five minutes, and he didn’t know how long after that it took him to fall asleep.

“Did you irrigate the ears to induce an ocular response?” said the defense attorney.

“No, that was not necessary,” Derek said.

“Why?”

“The patient had a pupillary response.”

“So, you saw life in her eyes?” said the attorney.

Derek paused. Gary Clark glared at him, his eyes bloodshot and brimming with grief and anger. Derek bit back the urge to apologize. He’d dealt with plenty of unjustified malpractice suits before. Distraught loved ones could, at times, be difficult to deal with, but understandably so. He thought of how he would act if it were Meredith who’d died. Or even Addison. And he understood. He did. But that didn’t stop the headache beginning to bloom in his skull, or the dull slivers of upset that jabbed behind his eyes like toothpicks. Jab, jab. “There was a pupillary response,” he said.

“Yet, you declared her dead,” the attorney said.

Jab.

“No, you misunderstand—” Derek said.
“Absence of a pupillary response is one of the signs of brain death, yet, you declared her brain dead.”

“I never declared her brain dead. She had normal brain activity,” Derek said. His gaze wandered to Gary Clark. Mr. Clark didn’t move, but unmitigated hate clamped unseen hands around Derek’s neck. Derek blinked. “I’m sorry,” he said to Mr. Clark. Jab, jab. “I tried to explain to you that there was absolutely nothing—”

“So, she was alive, until you withdrew care, until you pulled the plug,” the attorney said, undeterred.

The headache flared like a brilliant sun. “I’m sorry I’m not being clear,” Derek said. “Um.” He inhaled, trying to vent the frustration away with oxygen. He’d made the right decision to unplug Mr. Clark’s wife. He knew it. But the attorney’s relentless questioning and Mr. Clark’s unwavering, hateful gaze made him want to crumple. He tried to keep his cool. “According to the letter of her advanced directive, there was a level of brain activity that I judged—”

“You judged, you decided,” the attorney needled.

“It was my opinion, to—”

Mr. Clark burst into tears, and Derek couldn’t take it anymore. His headache shrieked in his ears, and his heart burst as it beat and beat and beat. The room around them disappeared in a red-tinged blur, and he launched across the table with the athletic grace of a big cat. He skidded on his knees. “She was a fucking vegetable, and she didn’t want to be,” he shouted as he wrapped his hands around Mr. Clark’s throat. “I didn’t kill her. Why don’t you understand? What do I have to say to make you fucking understand?”

Mr. Clark choked and sputtered, and his face turned a bright beet color. The chair squeaked under Mr. Clark’s body as he struggled, trying to free himself. Derek felt Mr. Clark’s flesh slip under his palms as sweat intervened like an oil slick.

“How does it feel, now?” Derek growled as he grappled for better leverage. He pushed his feet to the floor, and he stood. “I’m going to snap your fucking neck.”

Gary Clark wrapped his arms over Derek’s and yanked. Pain splintered Derek’s elbows, and his choke-hold skittered loose as he hissed with the unexpected jolt. The chair overturned. Mr. Clark’s wretched gasping filled the room as he stumbled backward, free. “Dr. Shepherd,” said Mr. Clark. “Please.”

“Nice try,” said Derek. He jammed a fist into Mr. Clark’s solar plexus, and Mr. Clark tumbled to the ground in a breathless heap. The conference room flashed soulless, clean white, and the small, enclosed space spread wide and open. The greenery of Seattle fanned out to the left like a verdant carpet. Drizzle fell against the huge side windows in the empty center of what should have been a bustling hospital.

“Please,” said Mr. Clark, and the word echoed in the open space like a thousand whispers.

“Shut up,” Derek said. “No talking. You’re not the man here.”

Derek flexed his fingers. Something cold and solid filled his grip, and he looked at the black semi-automatic cradled in his hand. The headache faded, and a calm, reassuring sense of power spread through his body. His joints loosened as pleasant adrenaline charged through his veins. His heart pumped, strong and sure. He inhaled, and all the pain and frustration and embarrassment and churning guilt he'd ever felt as a result of this man drew into a pinpoint of pressure on the trigger, channeled through his index finger. The trigger gave a millimeter.

“I'm the man,” Derek said, and he pointed the gun.

He stood, omnipotent. He watched with cold satisfaction as Mr. Clark begged and pleaded with nonsensical gibberish born from terror. A globule of drool formed on Gary Clark's lips, and then he lost control of his bladder. A wet stain spread across the front of his pants.

Derek laughed. A sense of peace unfurled like a blooming rose. And then he pulled the trigger.

He woke up yelling and frenzied and caught, and he couldn't get away. Blankets twisted around his body. Sweat plastered his clothes to his skin. He didn't know which way was forward or backward or left or right. He didn't know where he was. All he saw was blood. All over his hands. On the floor. Everywhere. And he'd caused it.

“Derek!” said a voice.

He discovered the floor with a resounding slam that tore through his joints and his bones and his muscles and knocked him into a pained stupor. He lay there on his side, tangled and sandwiched between the bed and the too-close walls. Claustrophobia squeezed. He shook, staring at a floor he didn't recognize as his heartbeat slammed under his sternum. Every throb brought agony. Nausea roiled in his gut. He couldn't move as he watched Gary Clark die on his back in a spreading lake of blood. White turned red, and the light left Mr. Clark's eyes. Again, again, again.

Primum non nocere, Derek had been taught in medical school. First, do no harm.

A hand brushed his shoulder. “Get off me,” he snarled, and he closed his eyes as he shivered with stress and grief. He'd killed a man. He'd killed a man, and he'd enjoyed it. The hand drew away.

“It's just me, Derek. It's Meredith. It was just a bad nightmare. It's okay. You're okay. I'm here.”

He blinked. A nightmare. But he could smell the blood and bits and the burning gunpowder. And he could see the dull, glassy eyes of his victim. He could hear the words he'd spoken, stolen from the man who'd shot him three weeks before. And he could feel the laughter burble in his chest as he pulled the trigger.

The room blurred as he pulled the wrinkled, tangled blanket to his mouth to muffle his sob. Pain split him open. Derek Shepherd was a doctor. He wasn't a murderer. He wasn't like Gary Clark. He wasn't like the men who'd killed his dad. He was Derek Shepherd, and he helped people. He saved lives. He...

“I'm going to touch you,” she said, her voice hesitant. “Okay?” He stared, blank and empty, at the carpet as tears leaked down his face, and when he didn't protest, he felt her warm hands slide across his shoulder. “You're all tangled,” she explained, soft and soothing. The blanket moved. She pulled it from his torso and teased it through his legs and away from his ankle.

Freed, he curled into a fetal position. His ribs protested. His bullet wound wailed at him. The sternal incision flared. Pain fueled his tears, and he trembled with discomfort and exhaustion and sickness as he wrapped his arms around his knees and pulled into a ball. He coughed against his knees, and he coughed again, and once more before he could make himself stop.

“It's okay,” she said. Her palm stroked his side. Fingers stroked his hair. He felt the crawling pull along his scalp as her nails teased through each strand. His eyes slipped shut as he listened to her soothing. “Do you want to talk about it?” she said.
He couldn't bring himself to speak, and so he listened while she talked. She started with gentle platitudes. It's okay. It's all right. Everything is fine. Please, don't be scared anymore. She devolved into babbling about anything that came to her mind. She talked about the weather as she rubbed his body. She talked about a funny noise her Jeep had been making lately, and mentioned that she wanted him to look at it when he felt better. She talked about the errands she'd run the night before. She talked about Alex, and how excited she was that he would be coming home soon. And about Mark. About the latest book she'd read other than The Sun Also Rises, and why she was thinking about switching shampoos again. About her most recent cooking snafu. She even confessed that she'd messed up a load of his dress shirts by mixing lights with a dark red sweatshirt by accident, but that she would buy him new ones as soon as she could. Her monologue ran for minutes and minutes and minutes, until he lost all track of time, just listening to her voice.

“Do you want some water?” she asked after a long, long time. “You should drink some water.”

She left him for a moment. The faucet rushed. She put a full glass on the floor by his head, and she resettled. “Please, will you say something?” she said. “You don't have to talk about it.”

He sniffed, and it sounded wet and bubbly. She felt his forehead. “You feel really hot. Worse than before.”

“I don't have pneumonia,” he said.

She didn't speak as she rubbed him. For a long time, his wheezing and her soft breathing mingled in the muffled silence. Birds chirped. Sunlight crashed down. Nothing was right here, nothing. And lying on the floor with no support was tightening the pressure in his head and his chest. His back hurt. A vague chill swept through his muscles, followed by trembling he couldn't stop. He winced as he tried to get purchase enough with the carpet to sit up. She helped, which only made him feel worse. More ineffectual.

The room spun as he panted, and his brain tried to catch up with the fact that he'd changed perspectives. She supported him. He reached for the water she'd brought, and he could barely lift the glass. She had to help with that, too.

“I want to go home,” he croaked after several weak swallows.

“Can you stand up?” she said.

The embarrassing prospect of her calling an ambulance drove him to his feet. His muscles shivered with the stress of holding his weight. She put his shoes on, and she tied the laces while he braced himself in the doorway, trying not to fall down.

The twenty-foot walk back to the car seemed interminable. He collapsed into the seat. He blinked, lost track of her in the effort to stay conscious, and then from the nondescript abyss she jammed the thermometer into his mouth again. She watched him. He swallowed and closed his eyes. A niggling request for a blanket hovered in the back of his mind. Visible shakes surged up and down his limbs.

Not too hot, he willed his body. Please, no fever, god, damn it. God, damn everything.

She pulled the thermometer away, and she sighed. “103.2,” she said. “That's not low-grade anymore, Derek. Not even close.”

“Fuck,” he snapped. “God, damn it, I am not sick!”

A cough ripped through his body. His sternum and his left lung burned. He put a hand over the bullet wound and closed his eyes, panting. He rested against her shoulder, breathing through his mouth because his nose had long since closed up solid. His muscles shivered, and he swallowed. Shivering meant his temperature was likely still rising, too. Damn it. God, damn it. Fucking...

She pushed the car door shut beside him. He watched through bleary, half-lidded eyes, at the space beyond the windshield while she walked around to her side of the car. All wrong. All of this was wrong. All of—

He stopped, and he blinked, and he stared. She sat in the drivers' side seat, and she started up the car. His fingers clasped his seat belt and released it. He flung himself from the car. He nearly collapsed as his feet hit the ground. He wheezed, and he couldn't stop staring.

“Derek!” Meredith called after him, but he didn't listen.

He forced himself forward. He made himself move. Not that far. He didn't have to make it that far. Half a mile. Mostly flat. A cinch. He pushed himself. His chest burned.

“What the hell are you doing?” Meredith said as she jogged beside him. She grabbed his arm and tried to make him stop, but he shook her off. “Derek, you're sick. Stop it.” She started to sob. “Stop it, please. You're going to give yourself heatstroke.”

Adrenaline poured into his body, and he kept going. He slogged through the small clot of trees and then through the disturbed mud and dirt and mire. Wide open space swept out beyond for miles and miles. Flocks of birds spiraled in the air in endless, lazy circles as they chased the wind with their wings extended. He collapsed on the front step, heart pounding in his chest. A big black curtain threatened to swallow him whole.

“What the hell!” Meredith said. “You're going to freaking kill yourself!” She shoved a water bottle at him. “Drink this before you die or something."

He took several moments to find his voice, and when he did, he sounded shaky, weak, and ill, but he spoke. “We have a house,” he said. He rested on the stoop, sipping water.

She glared. “Of plywood, yes. I would have driven the freaking car there if you'd asked instead of shot off like a marathoner.”

With another Herculean effort, he forced himself up the temporary slabs that would be brick-and-mortar steps in a few months, through the empty space that would be a door, and into the wooden maze of the lower floor. His feet thumped on the floor as he plodded into the wide open area that would be their living room. The smell of cut wood brushed his nose. He closed his eyes, and he pictured the house around him finished, with fresh paint and clean, sleek lines. Furniture. Lamps. A television. His framed diplomas on the wall. Hers. Pictures of his family and her friends on their mantle. A fire burning in the fireplace. The soothing scent of woodsmoke.

“This is our living room,” he said, barely able to find his breath.

She thumped after him. “What are you talking about?” she said.

He came to rest against the wall. A big bay window spread across almost the entire width of the room. He stuck his hand out into open space, and then he stared, breathless, at the open valley beyond. A balmy breeze whispered through the air. He shivered.

“We have a view,” he said.

She stared at him, her lips a flat line. Her eyes didn't sparkle. “I have a view,” she said. She crossed her arms and stared at him, not through the windowless window.

He swallowed. “Was this the surprise?”

“The house of plywood?” she said. He nodded.

She sighed. “It was supposed to be.”

“We need to tell the contractors to put in a fence,” he said.

Her solid mask of fury cracked around the edges. She glanced at the window. “What?” she said. Her body shifted closer to him. “Why?”

“So our kids won't fall off the cliff.”

“Oh,” she said. “Well, there is that. Not falling would be...”

He wrapped his arms around her and pressed his nose against her neck, searching. His legs felt wobbly and strange, and his head swam. He found the pulse at her throat, and he kissed her.

“What are you doing?” she whispered.

“Making kids?”

She stiffened in his arms, and she drew in a wet, shaky breath. She hugged him, one arm pressed against his back, like she was trying to keep him from bolting again, and the other cupping the back of his head. Her fingers scrunched, and his hair pulled as her grip tightened. “I think you're maybe delirious, Derek.”

A cough almost sent him to his knees, but she dug in, and she held him up. “Meredith...” he whispered, trying to breathe. His legs turned to jelly. He wanted to sit. Cristina had opened him up, and he could feel the knife. Cutting.

“You're burning up,” she said. “I need to take you to a hospital. Now, Derek.”

He clutched her with shaky palms. “Please, Meredith. I need it to stop.”

“I know, but—”

Tears spilled. “Please, make it stop.”

“Derek, you're really, really sick. You're not thinking straight.”

He breathed against her skin, and he blinked, and the house around them faded away. He stood maybe thirty feet from the car, ready to collapse. His body shivered, and he couldn't breathe. He saw the plywood construct in the distance, on the cliff, just like they'd planned. And he couldn't get there. He coughed, and his legs threatened to give out.

She pushed him toward the car and corralled him like some sort of fucking lost lamb.

“We can see the house later, Derek,” she said. He collapsed into the seat, sort of in the car, sort of out. She picked up his feet and dropped them on the floor mat, and then he couldn't move anymore. He coughed, and the invisible knife cut him into ribbons of pain. The back of her hand brushed his forehead. She took his temperature again, and whatever number she saw made her expression collapse into a solid sheen of tears.

His teeth chattered as a frigid chill swept through him. His muscles twitched. Temperature going up, up, up and away. He lost track of her, lost track of everything. He wanted a blanket. Something to curl up in.

The car wobbled, and the engine started.

“Hang on,” she said.

His teeth clacked in the silence. Her hand rested on his thigh over his warmups.

“Meredith,” he said, but his voice fell away. Breaths bubbled in his chest.

“I'm here,” she said.

The Cayenne began to move, and he closed his eyes against the onslaught of pain. The ride down the hill seemed even worse than the ride up the hill. She took his hand, and she held it while he shivered.
Chapter 11

Derek didn't wake up so much as become self-aware.

One moment he'd been stuck in a strange, snarly place full of colors and horrible sounds and painful stimulation. Gary Clark hid behind every corner, echoed in every thought, and growled his words of discouragement with every breath. You're not the man. You're not the man. You're not the man. The next moment, the menace died, and Gary Clark's endless tormenting died with it, leaving Derek somewhere much more peaceful, though he didn't know where. The moment after, when he started to wonder about where that more peaceful place might be, that was when Derek Shepherd retook possession of his brain.

His body boiled, and he lay drenched and almost naked on a narrow bed in a strange place he didn't recognize. A hospital, but not Seattle Grace. A thin privacy curtain separated him from the rest of the bustle. Nothing else. A huge, clear, plastic mask cupped his nose and mouth, blocking his lower field of vision, but as a weak cough tore through him and puffed against the cover, he realized it was simply an oxygen mask, not a ventilator mask. Pain split his chest open. All he could do was lie there while it ravaged him. He panted, each breath laced with ache and discomfort. He couldn't breathe. But he tried.

Alone.

A sliver of fear cut deep, and it had no outlet. He didn't have the mental fortitude to shove it away. He tried to take stock of his situation. The heat made it hard to think. Hard to process anything. Hard to care. For a while, he lay there, listening and unfocused, hot. The glare of the lights gave everything an odd, wavering halo, and sounds seemed to stretch and lower in pitch like someone was playing life back to him on a cassette player running out of batteries.

A heart monitor droned in his ears in time with the throbbing pain, and it took him a very long time to realize that it was his. His heart monitor. His heart beating.

Salty sweat dripped into his eyes and burned, blurring the odd halos. He blinked against the swelter, and the excess water slipped loose from his eyes, crawling down the sides of his face like tears. He could sort of see.

The privacy curtain rustled. He stared through half-lidded eyes as a woman he didn't know slipped through the curtain carrying a bundle of things he was too hot, too tired, and too miserable to identify. “Hello, Dr. Shepherd,” she said brightly as she entered, but she didn't meet his gaze, and her words stretched into oblivion when his brain began the sluggish process of interpretation. Her intent focus lay centered on the objects she carried, and not on him, as if she were used to him staring at her without saying anything. Staring and being unaware.

She wore a uniform and a name tag. A tight ponytail held her black, frizzy hair away from her face. Calming, business-like vibes filled her presence. A doctor. Or maybe a nurse. She was there to work and nothing more.

She walked to the side of the bed, and he couldn't see what she was doing. Turning his head seemed... Effort. Too much. He lay there, staring and passive and limp, because he didn't know how to convince his body to do anything else. She picked up his arm and felt his wrist for his pulse. “Good.” Something beeped in his ear. Tympanic temperature. “Better,” she said. Pressure on his bicep meant blood pressure. “Good.” She checked his intravenous line for infection, and she checked the drip. All familiar things he'd done so many times himself to patients that he knew them even in a fever dream. He couldn't bring himself to care about them.

“Well, Dr. Shepherd,” she said as she continued her cheerful dialog, “I think you're doing a lot better. Do you think you'll wake up soon? We'd really like to see you, if you don't mind stopping in. Your wife is pretty worried. But it's okay if you want to hang out for a while. No rush if you're having a good dream.”

She scribbled something on paper. She turned, and she picked up something she'd left... somewhere. Her body moved as something crackled loudly in the small space. “I'd like to get your temp down a little more before noon if I can. Maybe get you all the way out of the danger zone. Sound good?”

She lifted his left arm again. He didn't know what she was doing, but it didn't feel good. She moved around the bed and did it again with his right arm. When she was done, both of his armpits were burning points of gelid pain, and he didn't know why. What had she done? Cold against hot. What... He tried to move his arm, but he didn't get more than a twitch out of it. His limbs felt shaky and weak, like oatmeal or Jell-O, and he gave up, spent and hot and losing focus.

Lights seemed to bleed into each other. Fuzzy.

She moved something across his lower body. Air hit his skin. She snapped on a new pair of gloves, and then she touched him. His penis. His scrotum. His leg. High against the inside of his thigh. The unexpected invasion drove him out of his detached haze.

“Stop,” he said, but he had no voice. Nothing. His vocal cords cracked with the strain. A breathy hiss hit the mask, he lost the letter o in silence, and the p never arrived. She touched him again, and the area between his legs became a burning, freezing, solid well of discomfort that made him want to squirm away and curl into a fetal ball, except he couldn't. He couldn't move.

What had she done to him?

A cough speared him, and his eyes watered. Tears mixed with sweat. Stop, he tried again, but the results were inaudible under the quiet hiss of the oxygen flow and the bustle outside his private slice of the room, even to him. His vocal cords had dried out from disuse, and they hurt from all his coughing, and they wouldn't follow his frantic, frustrated commands. The woman he didn't know finished torturing him. She laid something soft over his hips. The open air sensation lessened.

“I'll be back in twenty-five minutes to remove those,” she informed him as she looked at a clipboard.

And then she left him suffering and confused.

Alone.

He knew he was sick. And he knew he'd been put in a place meant to fix that. But he didn't know anything else. How was he sick? Why? Was he getting better? Was he dying? He felt a little like he was dying. But nobody he knew was there to tell him anything. He lay helpless on a bed in a place he didn't know with nothing but a curtain to separate him from strangers. He couldn't speak, and he couldn't move, and where was Meredith?

Or anyone?

He couldn't remember anything.

The sliver of fear that had nestled in his body before split into thousands of jagged pieces. Heat flared as he breathed. He moved his hand. It flopped against the bed railing. The intravenous line snaking into the back of his palm swayed in the air. The cool surface of the bed rail soothed his hot skin. He wrapped his fingers around the top, and for a moment, he rested, panting. Maybe. Maybe, if he could get up, he could... A wet cough drove him flat against the bed, and he suffered.

Alone.

Tears re-collected in his eyes. In that moment, heat and fear and sickness broke him.

Derek Shepherd.

Broken.

“Help,” he said to no one in particular, but the word was nothing except air. He blinked. “Please.”

Please. He whispered into the mask one last time, and then he gave up and lay there, trying not to let the conflagration sweep him into oblivion before he had a chance to see her again. Meredith. Fire crushed his body, like he'd dried out and been stuck in a flower press in an oven. Hot. Too hot. Definitely dying. No human could live this hot. His eyelids dipped, and his lips parted as he tried to let the roaring fire inside escape, but the flames only grew. His body had become the center of the sun.

When the curtain rustled, he swallowed, and he stared. In the distance of his perception, beyond the relentless heat, his groin and his armpits still felt wrong. Very wrong. What other punishment would the woman devise? He almost didn't care if it meant she would come back.

“Help,” he told the curtain. The mask fogged. No sound.

The person on the other side of the curtain wasn’t his tormenter. He recognized Meredith before she’d done more than grip the seam in the curtain, just from the way her index finger curled. He knew her every curve, every joint, every freckle, and he knew that index finger. Relief made him pant, and he tried again to speak.

“Meredith,” he said. “Help.”

A silent, wordless scream.

She didn’t hear him. He wasn’t dying. He’d already died. And this was hell.

He listened to her voice. She sounded agitated and aggressive on the other side of the curtain as she spoke with another person. A male. His voice seemed deeper and more rumbling, but unfamiliar. Derek couldn’t understand what they were talking about, though he heard the words. Heated. Like his body. What would make Meredith so upset?

He wrapped his fingers around the bed rail and solidified his feeble grip. He would get up. He would get up, and he would get help. He coughed. Pain split him down the middle, but he pressed through it, and he sat up. The room spun around his head like he’d been tied to the middle of a gyroscope. Hot. He panted. His limbs shook. He pushed against the rail and slid down the bed. The blanket underneath his body was soaked and stuck to his skin. The oxygen mask cut into his face, and he drew a trembling hand against his cheeks to pull it back over his head. As he moved, the cold pain in his groin moved with him, but two loud thwacks chased behind him, and the balls of suffering in his armpits faded to a quiet whisper that throbbed in time with his heart.

The thing on his hips fell by the wayside. Air hit his overheated body. Something tugged on his leg by his ankle as he tried to push his legs over the side of the thin gurney, and he stared down at himself, almost drunk with the desire to move. To get help. What. He pulled the cold plastic thing away from his groin, and the gelid pain that had followed him down the bed went away, but he was catheterized. His penis had a tube trailing from the tip. A support wrapped around his thigh, where the tube pushed through a plastic loop, and then the tube chased down his leg, taped at his knee and his calf and his ankle. Delirium almost drove him to yank on it, to pull it out, to get rid of it and be free, but somewhere in his brain, he heard a loud, “No!” He couldn’t think of why pulling out the catheter would be a bad idea, but he listened to himself, and he didn’t touch it.

He inched forward, and his hand didn’t quite come with him. Pulse oximeter.

He could stand. Then he would figure out what to do. He could... Try to put weight on his bare feet. A frustrated moan turned squeak by his ravaged throat fell from his lips as he pushed away from the mattress. The force of gravity grew by a thousand times, and he almost toppled. His finger jerked. Out of slack, the pulse oximeter popped loose, and his heart monitor shrieked with alarms. He pinwheeled, and he tried to grab the bed railing, but it slipped against his sweaty hands. In a blink, he watched the ceiling wobble as his body tilted into collapse.

“Oh, my god!” Meredith said. Blurry, lightning movement splashed in front of his face, and open air became the fuzzy apparition of Meredith. He panted as he fell against her willowy body, but she caught him. She caught him, and he didn’t fall.

His first successful attempt at speech wasn’t even a whisper, instead, more of an exhale given shape. “M’h...” He got stuck on the letter h, and he had to try again after a weak swallow. “M’hot,” he said against her neck as he swayed with fatigue. He could barely hear himself. “Hot,” he tried again, only to croak. He pawed at her shoulders, desperate for her to fix it. For anyone to fix it.

Her fingers clutched his sweat-slicked body, and she held him. “I know,” she said. She stroked his spine. “I know, I know. I know it’s hot.” She sniffed in his ear, and her voice wavered.

“Help,” he said, a whispered whisper.

Her grip tightened, and she whimpered. She shouldn’t cry. He hated when Meredith cried.

“You need to lie back down,” she said. “Please, Derek. You’re really, really sick.”

She pushed against his body. Weakness infected his limbs like rot. His muscles trembled. He couldn’t withstand the tide of her dominion. His willpower collapsed into death throes. She pushed against his body, and he stepped backward. Once. Twice. The backs of his knees hit the wet mattress and bent, and then he sat, dumbfounded and hot on the gurney.

Her palm remained against his chest as if to hold him steady or still while she separated from him, leaned, and reached. She grunted. A loud thunk resounded in the small space as she pushed down the bed railing that had seemed so heavy to him moments before.

The curtain rustled, and his tormenter returned. She gaped. “What happened?” she said as she rushed to the bed, and the both of them crowded him while he struggled to understand what was going on.

“I don’t know,” said Meredith. “He was standing up when I came in.” She leaned across the bed and pulled things away from the mattress. He couldn’t identify them. Nothing made sense. He started to shake as the strange woman bent to help Meredith. They were helping each other. Why were they doing this to him?

Hell.

A cough boiled in his lungs, and he closed his eyes against the sparks.

Tormenter grasped his shoulders. “Dr. Shepherd,” she said in a loud, piercing voice. “Are you awake?”

He stared at her blankly. Why would she need to ask that when he was looking right at her?

“Look,” grumbled Meredith. “I can handle this.”

“I need to get the restraints,” said Tormenter. “He’s clearly still delirious.”

Meredith pushed her away and eclipsed the space around him. “Would you just give me a second?” she said. “He’s awake. He’s just confused.”

Tormenter frowned. “Dr. Grey, I know you’re very worried, but—”

“He’s sick,” Meredith snapped. “You try waking up sick and alone in a strange place after an overnight, 105 degree mind bender. This is why I wanted to be in here, but you all have your rules and regulations, and he almost hurt himself.”

“My supervisor authorizes floor visits outside of visiting hours, Dr. Grey,” Tormenter said. “If it were up to me, I’d let you sit here as long as you want.”

Meredith sighed. “I know. I know, Tammy, I’m sorry.”

He watched her through the fever-blur. Her leg. The curve of her hip. Her shoulder. He imagined her glowing, smiling face, and the way she laughed when he told a joke, but his imagination crashed into pieces when the swirly haze in his vision resolved into sharp relief. Meredith. She looked awful. Pale. Her hair hung in limp, clumpy strings. She wore no makeup. Dark circles puffed under her red eyes, like she’d been sobbing not ten minutes ago, and hadn’t gotten any sleep on top of that. She wore the same faded jeans and ratty purple t-shirt he’d last seen her in...

Memory faltered. He didn’t know when he’d last seen her. Or where. He didn’t know anything.

Her wary gaze grew hopeful. “Derek, do you recognize me?” she said. She picked up his hand and squeezed it.

Nerves clamored in his gut. Why would she need to ask that? He tried to tell her yes, of course, he’d know her anywhere. He’d known her from the sight of her finger. The whisper of her voice.

“Meredith,” he said, but his throat made no sound. Why would nothing fucking work?

She touched his lower lip with her fingertip. She smiled, and a sob of relief fell from her lips. She wrapped her arms around him, and she hugged him.

“Do you remember what happened?” she said.
He stared.

Tears slipped from her eyes, and he wanted to touch her, but when he tried to lift his arms they felt like fifty ton bricks. She wiped her face, and she sniffed, and her voice caught in her throat, but she continued in a soothing, slow rush that he made himself interpret and understand.

“You're in the ICU at Seattle Presbyterian. It's 10:30AM. You've been here for twenty hours or so. They diagnosed you with a common cold coupled with pneumonia. You're on new antibiotics for the pneumonia and Tylenol for the fever. Your temp hit 104.9. It's coming down, now, but it's still really, really high. I'm sorry I wasn't here when you woke up. I'm sorry. I've been fighting with the head nurse to let me stay despite visiting hour regulations, and I've been on and off the phone with your mom and Mark and SGH, and I...” Her voice cracked. She looked at him, and the panic in her expression softened. “Never mind.” She brushed her fingers through his sweaty hair, and then she stroked his slick chest. “I need you to lie down,” she said. “Okay? You're very, very sick, Derek.”

“M'H...” He breathed and winced. “Hot.” No sound but the sound of his exhale.

“I know,” she said. “I know you're hot. But it will get better in a little while if you lie down. I promise.”

He stared at her. His limbs shook with fatigue. She met his gaze, pleading and crying, and he couldn't say no to her. He struggled to slide backward on the sweat-soaked bed. Tormenter moved to the other side of the bed. Meredith grabbed his left arm, and Tormenter grabbed his right thigh under his knee, and the both of them helped him, pushed him, pulled him. When he'd slid back far enough, Tormenter let go. She adjusted the bed, and the mattress met his back. He lay back against the new support, trembling and exhausted.

He listened to the dull hiss of oxygen. His eyelids drooped. In his panicked bid for self-preservation, adrenaline had helped him push through the heat and function despite the stress on his body. Now, every piece of him began a slow shutdown. He coughed, deep and rough and bubbly, and the knife of pain drilled him back against the bed. Shivery weakness sank into his limbs, his muscles, his bones. Every sinew. The awful heat took his body, and it squeezed, and squeezed, and squeezed, until he could barely breathe through it, and every shallow pant scorched him from the inside out.

He wasn't sure he could ever get up again.

Or move.

Sitting up and sedated by his own state of broiling, he finally had a chance to take stock of himself. Of his body. The privacy curtain split apart and hung open over a foot, probably left that way by accident as either Meredith or Tormenter had dashed for him. He could see out into the bright ICU bay, and everybody could see in, other patients, visitors, hospital staff, anyone. Nurses walked back and forth. A woman in a sharp brown business suit passed within three feet of his cubicle, heels clicking on the floor. The woman didn't look at him, but the seven-year-old girl she dragged with her hand did.

“Mommy,” said the girl, and she pointed, wide-eyed, before her mother swept her away.

Embarrassment coiled as his state of undress, his lack of privacy, and his inability to fix either one of them all hit him at once. His hands flopped uselessly as he tried to cover himself, and a harrowed noise gurgled in his throat, but the fever and a wet, deep cough drove him back into submission. He lay on top of a soaked, quilted cooling blanket, buck naked except for all the tubes and monitors. Tormenter replaced his oxygen mask and his pulse oximeter, and then she covered his genitals with a hospital gown, barely. The gown started just below the line of dark curls where his pubic hair began, and coming to a stop high on his bare thighs. She didn’t tie the gown, and it lay in a loose, thin pile across his hips as a simple way to protect his modesty without trapping too much heat. His chest and abdomen were bare, all his healing wounds uncovered to the world.

“I’m going to get fresh ice packs,” Tormenter said, and she smiled. “Nice to see you awake, Dr. Shepherd. I’ll be back.” He blinked and watched her go. At least she shut the curtain, but the raw, abraded, less-than-human feeling wouldn’t loosen from the back of his mind.

Meredith sighed. She reached over his body, and she pulled the hospital gown up against his lower abdomen, covering the line of hair that Tormenter had left peeking out. “I’m so sorry,” she said. “I’m so sorry I wasn’t here.” she said. Something squawked as her lower body disappeared behind the bed railing. “I can see if they’ll set up a fan for you, or maybe I can arrange a lukewarm bath. It might make you feel better.”

He didn’t want a fan. Or a bath.

She leaned across the railing, and he felt her fingers weave through his sweaty hair. He turned his head. An inch. The best he could manage. He stared at her through dull eyes, trying to see through the halos and haze and heat. She took his right hand and clutched it. He couldn’t clutch it back. She rubbed his fingers, and he let his eyelids droop. He had Meredith, now. The confusion and the fire and the pain didn’t seem so scary anymore, and he didn’t want to be awake for the rest of it, didn’t want to feel. The rapid beat of the heart monitor in his ears slowed as his body recovered from at least the physical stress.

She leaned over the bed and kissed his forehead. He blinked, and when he didn’t speak, she kept talking. “You’ve been really out of it. Since I drove into the ambulance bay, and they pulled you out of the car, pretty much. They put you on a stretcher. You don’t remember any of it?”

He managed to shake his head. A millimeter either way, but she seemed to understand.

She sat with him in silence for minute upon minute. Her palm touched his naked chest, and her finger teased his right nipple. A lump formed in his throat as her caresses brought nausea. His skin twitched as new sweat dribbled from every pore. He blinked.

“Stop,” he said against the mask.

Disquiet squeezed him tight when nothing but a squeak fell from his lips, and she frowned with incomprehension. Her fingers tightened against his hand. She leaned into his space, her ear a millimeter from his oxygen mask, and he fought the upset twist in his stomach at her closeness as her palm pressed against his pectoral muscle. His space. His.

“I’m sorry,” she said. “Can you say it again?”

Despite the pain, he pulled air deep into his lungs, as much as he could inhale, and then he pushed it out in an effort to be heard. “Stop,” he repeated. His eyes burned when all he heard was air, and an invisible razor sliced down his throat.

But she must have read his lips or something. She froze, and she pulled away. The hand at his nipple stopped moving. The hand clutched around his palm loosened. “Stop?” she said. “You want me to leave?”

He blinked, trying to hold back tears as she pulled the hand at his chest away. She pushed the chair an inch. He didn’t want her to leave. That hadn’t been what he’d meant. He just... When she tried to extricate her hand from his, he drove whatever energy into his grip that he could muster, and he clutched her. His sweaty palm slipped, but she halted her retreat when she met his weak resistance.

“I'm sorry, I...” She faltered, staring at his hand. Her lip quivered. Utter confusion made her eyes seem doe-ish. She pointed to her hand. “This is okay?”

He stared, drinking the lines of her body, unable to do anything else.

A tear slipped down her cheek, and she swallowed. “But I...” she stuttered. Her stool squeaked as she resettled. She reached across the railing, and she placed her palm where it had been before. Against his chest, near the incision, and he swallowed.

“Stop,” he mouthed. He didn't even try to speak, but she saw his lips move, and she pulled back her hand.

“But that's not okay?” she said, and he watched confusion hover on her face. Confusion he couldn't fix, because he couldn't explain. She bit her lip. She shook her head. Her eyes reddened and spilled.

He squeezed her hand.

She swallowed, and she hovered her palm by his temple and cheek. “Is this okay?” she said. He met her eyes, and he didn't blink, and after a hesitant wait, she touched him, skin to skin. She splayed her fingers, and she pushed them through his soaked, sweat-grimy hair. The tickle of her nails against his scalp soothed him. “I'm sorry,” she said as she combed the wet strands with her fingers. “They've been keeping me away, and I just...” Bewilderment clouded her expression. “I won't touch you there, I'm sorry.”

Her body trembled.

“I love you,” she said softly, and her grip on his hand became painful, but he didn't complain. “I love you so much.”

“I'm sorry,” he tried to say, but the words got lost in his wrecked, dry throat. Tears pinched loose from his eyelids. Real tears. Mingled with sweat.

“No apologies, okay?” she said, her voice choked. “You can tell me later.” She stroked his hair.

His gut twisted as he watched her push her own feelings away. A cough ripped him apart. The fuzzy halos in the room turned bright and sparkled, and black dots came down over everything in a giant waterfall. His sternum felt like a fault line in an earthquake, shuddering with the force. He lay panting, trying to breathe, as he stared into the space she occupied. The black dots faded one by one.

“Your throat must feel awful,” she said. “Let me get you some water. I'll be right back.”

He didn't want her to leave. He didn't want her to move. He watched helplessly as she departed through the curtain and his empty hand fell slack against his side. He coughed, and he let his eyes fall shut as pain squeezed his weakened lungs in a tight vise. They'd given him something for his clogged sinuses and his runny nose. Something that had worked. His head didn't feel so full anymore. His chest remained a problem. His sternum ached, and breathing hurt, and, overall, he felt sort of like he'd suffered through serving as the floor for an elephant taking tap dance lessons.

She returned in minutes with a capped Styrofoam cup equipped with a folding straw. She pulled down the oxygen mask against his neck and held the cup to his lips. The straw hovered millimeters from his skin. His eyelids drooped. She wiggled the straw. “Take a sip,” she prodded.

He took the straw with his lips and tried to pull water against gravity. The barest trickle hit his mouth, cool and soothing and wet. He sighed, and he tried again, and then he was drinking. Cool tendrils spread into his esophagus. The water felt divine against his obliterated vocal cords, but it took so much fucking effort to drink. He couldn't finish more than several swallows before he'd exhausted himself.

“Done?” she said. He didn't answer. She took the cup away after several seconds of silence.

The water helped his words, but not much. “M'h...” He got stuck on the fucking h again. He rested, gathering energy. “Hot.” His vocal cords kicked in for the letter o and faded just after, leaving him sounding croaky and horrid.

Her lip quivered. She stroked his face. “I know. I know it feels awful. You just started responding to the Tylenol a few hours ago, so your temperature's still very high, but it's dropping. You feel hot because you're getting better. It's okay. You're okay.”

He coughed weakly.

Upset made the corners of her eyes twitch. “It's been a horrible night,” she said. “They wouldn't let me see you for more than ten minutes at a time every other hour.” When she blinked, tears rolled down her face, and her small body shook. She caressed his hand, and then she sniffed and shook her turmoil away. “I want to tar and feather your hypothalamus, Derek.”

“M'Sorry,” he managed, and he closed his eyes. Everything took too much effort.

“Stop apologizing, you stupid, stupid man,” she said. “This wasn't your fault. Though, maybe, next time...” She ran her fingers through his hair, and she kissed him. “Stay in the bed?”

His lip curled. He tried to smile at her, but wasn't sure if he managed very well. “Sorry,” he repeated. She hit him. Lightly. And she laughed. Perfect. He tried to raise his arm. He wanted to touch her. Desperately. His hand moved a few inches.

Tormenter returned through the curtains carrying a new bundle of blue things and little white fluffy blobs. He watched as she set the bundle on the tray table. The white things relaxed and unfolded. Towels. Tormenter picked up one of the blue things. It crackled as she kneaded it with her hands. Understanding broke the mental fog as he watched her beat it against the bed rail and crunch it in her hands. An ice pack. She'd said she was going to get ice packs. He'd gotten hot enough that they'd started trying to cool him down with ice packs. Groin and armpits. An emergency procedure when more aggressive cooling was needed than simple antipyretics. Emergency. 104.9, Meredith had said.

The reality of how dire his state had been hadn't sunk in before when Meredith had said how high his temperature had gotten. He swallowed as it sank in, now. Tormenter wrapped the icepack in one of the white towels.

Tormenter smiled. “104.1 right now. Much better than it was last night.” The ice pack crinkled in her hand. “We need to leave these on for about twenty or thirty minutes,” Tormenter said. “If we can get you below 104, we'll stop with these. I know they're uncomfortable.”

He didn't protest despite the pain as she lifted his arm and re-settled the icepack in the crook of his armpit. She repeated the process with his left armpit. He stared at Meredith while Tormenter shoved aside his hospital gown. He blinked, and he tried to let himself fall away, into a place that wasn't there, but then Tormenter touched him. The shivery, nauseating feeling of violation returned, and he couldn't think of anything else. He blinked and inhaled and closed his eyes as she settled the frozen ball of discomfort against his groin. She replaced the gown against his lower body, leaving him tearing and uncomfortable, and then she left.

Meredith sighed. Her chair squawked, and she leaned forward to fix the gown. She covered the pubic hair Tormenter had again left visible. A lump formed in his throat as he watched her.

The ice pack would help, he told himself. The ice pack was close to his femoral artery and his body's core and would help drive down his core temperature. He rocked, his torso pitching back and forth by millimeters, as he tried to force himself to endure. Already painful, his breaths tightened into wrenching gasps, and then he burst, powerless under the weight of the deluge.

He coughed, and tears of pain sliced down his face. Everything hurt. His groin. His armpits. Breathing. His chest. Whether it meant good things or not, he felt like a briquette on a smoking barbecue. She leaned against the bed railing and wiped the wet salt away for him.

“H...” he said. He couldn't deal with the vocal cord gymnastics of converting that letter into real speech. His lower lip quivered. He blinked. The world blurred through his tears. “Ho...” He rested with his eyes shut.

“I know it's hot,” she said, misunderstanding him. “I know. You'll feel better when your temp stabilizes. You will. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry.”

She squeezed his hand, and the look on her face made him want to shrivel up and submit to the fire. She hurt. For him. She physically hurt for him. She wanted to fix things so he didn't hurt, and she couldn't, but he was alive. Relief fought with the pain and made her feel sick. The warring pieces of emotions carried spears, and they made her face even easier for him to read than usual. He knew the feeling because he'd felt it when she'd drowned and then woken up. It was horrible. And nauseating. And painful. And he'd never, ever wanted her to experience it.

He swallowed, and he gathered his will, and he made himself speak. “H...” His throat screamed, but he said his word. Finally. “Home?”

She wiped the corners of his eyes with her thumb. “A few days, Derek. At least. You're really sick. They want to get your lung infection and your fever under control before they let you out of here again. I'm so sorry. I'm sorry I had to bring you here. And I'm sorry I wasn't there. I'm sorry.”

He drifted as the char-broiled flood in his veins overwhelmed him. A wave of fresh sweat made him dizzy as his body worked in tandem with the ice packs to drive his fever down into something helpful and healthy, something in the 99-101 range, rather than something life-threatening. She kissed his lips. She stroked his sweaty hair and replaced the oxygen mask over his nose and mouth.

“Do you want to lie down?” she said.

He stared, trying to process the words, but he couldn't do it anymore, couldn't make any meaningful response. The hypnotic hiss of the oxygen mask and exhaustion made his eyelids drift half-closed. He lay on the bed, panting, sweating, and coughing, too sick to do much else.

She lowered the bed for him when he didn't answer. Lying flat allowed sleep to sink in its claws. He lasted seconds before surrender.
“Please, stop nearly dying,” she whispered as she stroked his hair.

“Yeah,” said Mr. Clark. “Stop nearly dying!”

Derek lost his grip on sentience, and tormenting, fevered dreams overtook him.

“Why does this keep happening to me?” wailed a slightly overweight woman. Her dark roots stopped after an inch and shifted into stringy, bottled, platinum blond, pulled back in a sloppy ponytail. Thick, dark eyeliner hugged her bloodshot eyes. She wore a tiny strip of fabric around her breasts, a micro-mini skirt, and itty-bitty heeled sandals, and she sobbed into hands manicured with a hot pink finish.

“Don't you think that maybe you deserve it a little?” said Jerry.

Derek pressed the remote, and the picture blinked to something new.

“0% APR. Stop by your nearest Honda dealer tod—”

Blink.

“I think he's really hurt,” whined a frantic Calista Flockhart as she practically climbed through the car window into the arms of some buzzed-cut, stammering guy.

Blink.

“Help me, Obi-wan Kenobi. You're my only h—”

Blink.

“Police say they don't know what caused William Trammel, 42, to shoot and kill his family of seven, but—”

Blink.

Derek pulled the blanket against his body. He sat propped up on the living room couch by a small mountain of pillows. He stared at the television, but he didn't watch it as he hit the channel change over, and over, and over, until he'd looped back around to Jerry Springer. He made another lap. All garbage. Talk shows. Commercials. Re-runs. Awful movies. News he didn't want to hear about.

Blink.

“Robert,” said whoever Calista was supposed to be. Blood covered supposedly-Robert's face. “Stay with me.”

Blink.

Mark cleared his throat and looked up from his laptop at the opposite side of the couch. The white glare from his LCD screen tinged his skin sickly white. “Do you think you could pick a channel or something? You're giving my ears whiplash, and I can't keep track of what the hell I'm typing for this report.”

Derek's lip twitched, and his hand froze on the remote. His fingers twisted, and squeezed, and squeezed. Heat funneled down his throat as his breaths halted. For a moment, he stared at Mark, who wore jeans and a t-shirt and cross-trainers, and could get up anytime he wanted, drive his fucking midlife crisis car, and leave for wherever. Derek's teeth clenched, and the remote left his hands with fury-born wings.
The remote hit Mark in the shoulder, and the television snapped off as the power button hit unwavering muscle and bone. “Fuck,” Mark hissed, and he rubbed his arm with his other hand, an affronted, snarly look on his face. The remote fell onto the couch and settled in the crack between the middle and left cushions.

“You pick a fucking channel,” Derek said as he struggled to stand up. His words popped loose from his lips like some sort of honking goose. Hoarse and barely recovered, he could speak, but he couldn't produce any sort of tone variation. Even then, his voice dropped into squeaks and pops and cracks at random.

When he stood, his leg muscles shivered with a vague weakness. The blanket, which clung to him, slowly lost its grip and sank to the floor as he retreated. He moved into the kitchen, not waiting to see Mark's reaction. Alex stood at the stove, flipping bacon in a frying pan, wearing nothing but a pair of black boxers. His skin had tanned during all his walks out with Lexie, who came home every lunch and dinner break because, unlike Meredith, she could still afford to lose some time. The scabbed-over bullet wound puckered the skin on the front of his torso, displayed like a badge instead of hidden behind a shirt. The bacon sizzled, and the nauseating smell of too much grease filled the air.

Alex turned as Derek entered, and he pointed his dripping spatula. “Dude, I'm not done in here. Meredith said you'd be sleeping until at least noon.”

“Well, I'm not sleeping, and it's before noon, so I guess she was wrong,” said Derek.

“You know you're not supposed to be in here with me,” Alex said. “Get out. I don't want to go back.”

“You will anyway if you keep eating that shit,” Derek said. Ignoring Alex, he shuffled to the cupboard, removed a glass, and filled it in the sink. He took a sip, letting the clear water soothe his scratchy throat. “I just wanted water.”

He emptied the glass, slammed it on the counter, sneered at Alex's hostile expression, and shuffled to his office, where he collapsed, wheezing against his executive desk.

His eyes pricked as he tried to catch his breath. His lungs made him sound like he was gasping his last death rattle when he breathed hard, but at least the fucking cough was mostly gone, and at least it didn't hurt anymore to inhale. At least. A pitiful celebration. Tears popped loose as his throat thickened with misery-born ache.

“Wow,” said Mr. Clark. “You're turning into a rather spectacular pansy, aren't you?”

Which just made him cry harder. After he'd come home from the hospital, he'd spent three days bedridden upstairs, and when he'd felt well enough to emerge and move around a bit, his forays downstairs had been nothing but constant traffic jams with Alex, who was a lot more healthy and capable of defending his claimed territory, and also a fuck load more assertive. Worse, whenever Derek found a spot alone somewhere, Mark would find a reason to be there as well.

“You're not alone now, either,” Gary Clark hissed in his ears, and Derek collapsed his face into his hands.

Folders full of clinical research projects long ago discarded when he'd lost the time to work on them sat under his elbows. He'd tried to organize them two weeks ago, but he'd gotten tired before he'd finished. Tired. Organizing folders. For twenty minutes.
He closed his eyes, denying the disarray sprawled under his arms, and he took a deep breath. He let his brain wander, but no matter how hard he tried to make himself relax, he couldn't lose his sense of the room. Of the house. Of the distant smell of bacon, or the noises Alex made as he moved in the kitchen, or the paranoid feeling that Mark was lurking, somewhere, trying to find an excuse to hang out in Derek's office, too.

“Or me,” Mr. Clark said. “I'm your very own cockroach.”

Someone tapped against the door, and Derek looked up. He wiped his eyes with the backs of his hands, trying to push away the obvious signs of his distress. “What?” he said. He almost couldn't stop a manic, frustrated, croaky laugh as he watched Mark enter the room.

Mark's footsteps muted against the area carpet. He came to a stop in front of Derek's desk, his arms folded across his chest. He cleared his throat.

“I'm going to get the grocery shopping done,” Mark said. Since this seems like an excellent time to vacate. His unspoken words hovered in his wary expression. “Do you want anything that's not on the list?”

Derek clenched the sides of the desk, and he swallowed. He hadn't seen the list. Hadn't even been aware that anyone had made a list. But it didn't matter.

“No,” Derek said, his voice cracking as he looked at his lap. “I don't want anything.”

“All right,” Mark said. “I should be back in an hour or so. I'll—”

“I want to come along.”

Mark frowned. “Are you sure you're—”

“I think I can survive a fucking grocery store trip,” Derek snapped.

“I think the real question is why the fuck would I want to bring you?”

Silence stretched as Mark glared at him, his face blushing a deep, furious red. Derek balled his fists as he struggled not to let himself snap and snarl some more. What the fuck had happened to him, that all he could do was yell or cry? He'd thrown a fucking remote. At his friend. He'd intentionally walked up to Alex despite knowing that he shouldn't. He'd killed Mr. Clark in his dreams.

“Do it,” said Mr. Clark. “Throw something else. Show me you're angry.”

Derek's elbows thumped against the desk as he pressed his face into his hands. He tried to breathe.

“Well,” Mark said. “Are you coming?”

“But—”

“Now, you want to argue about it?”

Derek pushed himself to stand, blinking against tears when his arms and legs shook with fatigue with just that small movement. “I need to change,” he said, swallowing against the lump in his throat.

“Fine,” Mark said, and he stood still as Derek forced himself to walk past. “I'll wait out by the car,” Mark called after him.
When Derek reached the steps, he took three breaths to bolster himself. He didn't need supervision anymore, at least, but the steps were still a mountain, still something that he needed to plan his schedule around. He gripped the railing, and pushed himself up the first step and the next and the next. By midway, he panted, and he had to sit because his leg muscles turned to the consistency of soup, and he couldn't go anymore. He couldn't make it. Except Mark was waiting on him. Mark was waiting, and he would leave, and—

“Pathetic,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek willed himself to stand, and he kept going, kept pushing. When he stood at the top, he had to rest for a moment to calm the quailing nausea in his gut, and then he pushed onward.

He grabbed a clean pair of jeans from his dresser, and a clean shirt, and he shucked his soiled, thin pajama pants and his old shirt. They landed on the floor with a rustle. Pulling the new shirt over his head didn't hurt his incision anymore, which was nice. He sat on the bed and leaned over his knees to lace his shoes. Lowering his head made his brain hurt, courtesy of his remnant cold.

When he finished dressing himself, he stared at his side of the bed. Empty. He'd tossed back the sheets and blankets when he'd struggled out of bed several hours ago, leaving it unmade and unkempt. The pillow looked inviting. He thought about lying down. Lying on his side and letting himself take a quick nap. Pushing himself up the steps and changing his clothes was a lot. A lot of work... His eyelids drooped. A cat nap.

“Poor baby,” Mr. Clark said.

Tension wound into every muscle, and Derek straightened. He pushed himself to his feet again, and he left the idea of a much-needed, blissful recuperation period behind. Walking down the steps didn't tax him as much as going up had, at least, and Derek forced himself off the landing, through the foyer, and out the door into the dreary, wet, gray air.

Grass and mud sucked at the soles of his shoes, but he pushed, and he pushed, and he pushed, across the lawn, until he arrived at the passenger side of Mark's cherry-colored Mustang in the driveway. He draped himself against the cool, wet metal of the car, wheezing. A dry, unproductive remnant cough barked from his lips, and his chest tightened with hurt. Beads of sweat tumbled down his forehead. Little ones that spoke of minor exertion, not imminent collapse.

He wasn't sure how he would be able to do this. Get into the car. He hadn't been thinking when Mark had said he would be going to get groceries. The Mustang sat low to the ground, and the car cabin was awkward to get into even by a physically able person. Dropping into the bucket seat was a process that usually involved grabbing the frame of the car and drop-twisting into it. Derek was still under lifting restrictions. Five pounds. In two more weeks, the restriction would be raised to forty, but that was still a far cry from being able to support his own weight.

He looked up the driveway with longing at his big black Cayenne, but, really, that thing was also a painful nightmare to get into. All cars were. They required twisting and shifting and pushing and pulling, and all the fucking engineers who designed automobiles assumed that a passenger could use his fucking arms.

Fuck.

He pressed against the car frame. His biceps shook as frustration overwhelmed him, and he inhaled the wet air to try and cleanse it.

Derek pulled open the wide door of the Mustang after resting a moment, and he stared at the black floor mat. So far away. Mark leaned over the parking brake and looked up. “Do you need help?” he asked, unblinking, no tone, like he expected to get his head bitten off for speaking the forbidden word. Help.

“No,” Derek said. His eyes pricked as he thought of how badly this would hurt if he went the stubborn route. This was Mark, not Alex. Mark had already helped him into the shower more than once. He'd seen Derek in tears and unable to walk after Derek had peed all over himself. He'd seen Derek naked in the ICU while the nursing staff had tried to manage Derek's rampant fever. He'd known Derek as long as Derek could remember, and he'd seen everything. Derek's breaths shook in his chest as his limping pride broke down in the slow lane. He offered a soft, “Maybe.”

“Try squatting,” Mark suggested. “When I strained my shoulder a few months ago, that worked.”

Derek dropped low to the ground. He held the door frame, but only for balance. With some shifting, he waddled backward. His ass hit the seat, and he shoved with his quads. Mark caught his shoulders. Derek twisted one leg into the car cabin, and then the next, and then he rested, panting.

“I'm sure that looked ridiculous,” Derek muttered.

“I'm sure I don't care,” Mark replied. Silence stretched. “Look, Derek,” he said. “We're all doctors here. We know you're hurt, and that you were recently very sick. I might not be the poster boy for sensitivity, but come on. I don't laugh at people who are injured or ill. Especially not family. And if anybody else does, I'll cave in his fucking face without offering to fix it afterward.”

Derek swallowed, and he stared through the windshield as his breaths calmed. With a sniff, he leaned, reaching for the door handle. He overextended. A slice of pain ran down his arm, and his sternum protested. Just a little. He could... Maybe... He wrapped his hand around the door handle, and he tried to pull it closed, but it was too much. Too heavy. Too far away. The agony that vibrated through his bones made him pull back with a hiss, and he huddled in the car.

Mark undid his seat belt without word and got out. The car rocked as Mark pushed off of it with his weight. He walked around to Derek's side, and he pushed the door closed. The car rocked again as Mark resettled in his seat. He twisted, and he yanked a pillow from the back seat and handed it to Derek.

“Here,” Mark said, and then he twisted his key in the ignition as Derek took the pillow.

The car rumbled to life, its big, powerful V8 engine purring excitedly. Mark grinned, just like he always did whenever he turned the key. He pushed the radio dial, and AC/DC from his iPod filled the car cabin. He rolled down the windows and let the damp breeze blow through. He released the parking brake, pushed the gearshift into reverse, and crawled the car backward out of the driveway as Derek struggled to get his seat belt on without re-breaking his sternum.

_I have to get this_, Mark had said as they'd stood in the rainy Seattle car lot.

Shortly after they'd started going out for drinks again, in the wake of Addison's departure, Mark had asked Derek to come along to the Ford dealership near the hospital. The salesmen had left them alone to deliberate. Mark had argued and bargained the price into the ground. The dealership wouldn't be making much profit off the purchase. But, as Derek had stared at the lot, which was devoid of people, he decided that perhaps the dealership wanted whatever it could get.

_You realize this is a midlife crisis purchase, right?_ Derek had said as Mark walked around the car, staring at every line and sleek curve. Globules of drool had practically fallen from his lips.
You moved to Seattle and live in a trailer, Mark had replied. You can't knock midlife crises.

He'd chosen a convertible, not that he would ever be able to use the thing with the top down in Seattle. Derek did have to admit the newly remodeled Mustangs looked attractive, though.

Except the love of my life only wants me for sex, Derek had said, and my trailer's luggage compartment is home to a pissed off raccoon. I think I can knock midlife crises.

Mark had sat in the car and almost cackled with glee as he wrapped his hands around the leather steering wheel. Well, you can't knock this midlife crisis.

Trading one redhead for another. It's pathetic, Mark.

Shut up, man. And get in the fucking car.

Derek had complied, and the salesman had returned while they sat in the front seats, bickering over which feature was the best. Would you and your partner like to take another test drive? the slick salesman had said to Mark, his shiny suit rain spattered and his quaffed hair dripping.

Mark had glowered. Only if you take off another $500 for calling me gay. Why does everyone think we're gay?

In the end, Mark had driven off the lot with the red, rumbling car, leaving behind a flummoxed salesman who no doubt thought he'd been robbed. The car bounced as Mark coaxed it onto the street, and Derek hugged the pillow, his eyes shut against the pain. He waited for the whiplash. Mark always jammed on the accelerator. Except not this time. As the car stabilized, the sharp discomfort disappeared, and Mark babied it up to a reasonable speed instead of gunned it.

Derek swallowed as upset welled in his gut. “I'm sorry,” he croaked. “For the remote. I'm...”

Mark shrugged. “Whatever, man,” he said, and that was the end of it.

Derek clutched the pillow against his chest. His eyelids drooped as the rumble and the air and the thrum of the bass swept over him. His legs felt shaky. And his arms. And he hadn't let himself take a nap, and now... He coughed. He hugged the pillow. The gun that had destroyed his life flashed in the mirror. And he slept.

Derek didn't want an entourage as Meredith pushed him in the wheelchair to freedom, but he had one. Meredith stroked his hair while he sat in quiet misery, staring at his lap, curled in a thick, thermal blanket. They'd forced his fever down over days, and now his sense of hot and cold felt like a fucking busted yo-yo. He hovered around normal, but his body still waged war with armies of bacteria. Sometimes he spiked a little too hot, and the constant shifts between shivering when his fever rose, and sweating when it fell again wrung him out and exhausted him.

People chattered like a cloud of angry bees around him. Mark. Lexie. Alex. Cristina. The elevator dinged, and Meredith pushed Derek inside, followed shortly by the swarm. If he'd been a little more out of it, he might have thought he were in Seattle Grace. They hadn't really planned this, Alex and Derek being released at the same time. It'd just sort of happened, and they'd figured it out despite all the confusion and chaos of the morning when they'd collided on the way to the elevator.

Derek sighed, and he looked at the floor, too miserable to do much else. If he looked up, they would expect him to talk or be part of the conversation, when all he really wanted was home. Just home. Before he closed his eyes, he saw Alex's right leg and one wheel tumble into view as Lexie pushed him closer. The elevator hummed, and Derek felt his weight lighten.
“Lexie,” said Meredith. “You can't bring Alex home in our car.”

“Why not?” said Lexie. “It would save gas and money. I was going to call a taxi because—”

Mark cleared his throat. “Derek is recovering from drug-resistant, post-op pneumonia, Lexie.”

“Yeah,” said Cristina. “He's sort of a mutant germ closet right now.”

The hospital had kept Derek for about ninety hours. Long enough for the new antibiotics to work some of their magic. Long enough for the antipyretics to force his fever to drop. Not long enough for him to feel any semblance of healthy. His voice was gone. When he tried to speak, he received cracks and croaks and partial sounds for his trouble, but nothing more. Nothing understandable. Though decongestants had worked wonders for his cold, nothing could fix the general malaise that wrapped around him like a cloak and sunk into every pore. His limbs felt shivery and weak. He could breathe again without pain, but after days of coughing, he felt whipped and beaten and broken.

Derek coughed against the blanket, and Meredith rubbed his upper back, soft and soothing. He clutched at her hand as the shock wave tore through him. He wanted to be home. Not in the middle of this circus show.

“Dude,” said Alex. “How contagious is he? I'm just getting out of here. I don't want to go back.”

“Crap,” Lexie said. “I... Should they even be in the same house?”

“We'll just have to deal with it,” Meredith said.

“How?” Lexie said. She pulled Alex's wheelchair to the far end of the elevator. “Cristina said he's a mutant germ closet!”

Meredith growled. “We'll keep them separate or whatever! It's not rocket science. I'm sure plenty of families deal with this all the time.”

“But he looks horrible...”

“You really suck at tact,” Cristina said.

“You're one to talk,” Lexie grumbled.

“I'm sitting right here,” Derek tried to say, but nothing would come out but a strained, wordless whisper, and the pitiful noise got lost in the bedlam.

He longed for home to the point that it had become a physical ache loitering in every joint and every muscle. He wanted to be somewhere quiet and familiar. But despite the unquenchable desire, the prospect of going home didn't excite him. He felt more desperate than anything else. As though reaching home would reset him to his minimal requirements for comfort and privacy. Not make everything right again. He didn't feel like anything would ever be right anymore.

When the elevator dinged, Meredith pushed him onto the main floor. Lexie and Alex followed. Mark and Cristina loitered beside. They formed a big fucking oddball family parade. Derek wasn't even certain why Cristina had chosen to attend his release from prison. Or maybe she'd been there for Alex. But she'd shown up that morning while Meredith had been signing up and down all over his release forms, and she hadn't left yet. Cristina walked beside him, crunching on chips from a small, metallic bag.
“Okay,” said Mark as they made it to the front curb. “Who all has a car?” He raised his hand. Meredith raised hers. Nobody else did.

“I came on my bike,” said Cristina. She munched on a chip. “I’m pretty sure that rules me out as chauffeur.”

“I said I was going to call for a taxi!” Lexie said, bright red blush creeping all across her face. “My car is in the shop.”

“When exactly is your car not broken, anyway?” Alex said.

“Fine,” Mark said. He sighed. “I’ll bring my car around for Karev.” He tossed keys at Cristina. “And you’re chauffeur whether you like it or not. You can pick up your bike later.”

“But,” Cristina said. She looked at the Porsche insignia on the key fob. “You mean I get to crash Derek’s pretentious SUV?”

“Preferably not crash,” Meredith said.

“It’s not pretentious,” Derek whispered. He managed a few consonants. Nothing else.

“Perfect,” Cristina replied, ignoring his garbled croaking, and she wandered toward the parking lot while she tapped the panic button. Derek’s car wailed in the distance, and she jogged off in that direction. She crumpled up her chip bag and tossed it into a trash bin as she went past.

Meredith stroked his face. “Are you doing okay?” she whispered against his ear as she leaned over the back of the wheelchair.

“Tired,” he said, but the word cracked. Inaudible. He hadn’t been able to speak clearly for days. He couldn’t answer questions, or say what he wanted or didn’t want, or anything. He leaned against her arm, and he sighed before another painful cough jerked his frame.

Mark returned to the kiss-and-ride lane with his car, the telltale purr of his V8 preceding him by moments. He slowed his Mustang and then stopped at the curb beside Alex. He popped open the passenger door as Lexie approached.

“You really expect us to get into this thing?” Lexie said.

Mark shook his head. “I expect Karev to get in, and you can ride with Derek.”

Derek watched as Alex stood up. The effort made Alex pant, but he got out of the chair on his own. He took the two steps toward the car unassisted, and then he angled himself against the seat. Mustangs were not little or cramped. Not like most sports cars. The interior was spacious and wide. But they sat inches from the ground and were hard to get into and out of. Alex grabbed the door frame and lowered himself with the help of a bulging, shaking bicep. He granted, and he twisted to find his seat belt without needing assistance. He clipped the belt, and he settled in the car. He looked a bit worse for wear, and he panted, his face a shade paler than when he’d started. But he’d done it by himself. All Lexie did was pull away the empty wheelchair.

Derek swallowed, envious. They hadn’t cracked Karev in half. They hadn’t broken bones to fix him. He had full use of his arm on the side where he hadn’t been shot. He’d been stuck in the hospital for so long because of an infection and a badly healing wound, nothing more. They’d been able to leave the bullet in his torso and let his body heal around it instead of fishing it out over hours of the most invasive, painful surgery medically available. He’d had just over three-and-a-half weeks to heal, and he hadn’t gotten sick again, and it showed.
“Hey,” Alex said as he swung the door shut without help. Just a wince. “It's not eleven yet. Can we stop at McDonald's?”

“What's at eleven?” Lexie asked through the open window.

“The breakfast menu ends at eleven,” said Alex. “I want to get a sausage biscuit and some crappy coffee because I can.”

Mark replied. Derek didn't hear the words. The engine revved, and then the car rumbled away with an explosion of force. Lexie drifted back to the group.

A lump formed in his throat as he watched Cristina drive his black Cayenne up to the curb. He tried to stand. Tried to walk under his own power while Cristina watched him from the driver seat with unblinking, brown eyes. He couldn't do it. His arms shook, and his chest hurt, and his muscles were too worn out to take his weight without collapsing. A cough that snaked lightning down his abused throat drove him back into the chair, and he tried to catch his breath.

Meredith squeezed his shoulder. “It's okay,” she said. She clamped the wheel brakes on the chair. She folded the foot rests. She bent into him, wrapped her arms around his waist, hugged, and whispered, “I'm here,” in his ear.

With her assistance, he stood, leaning against her shoulders. She let him take his time without prodding him or pushing him or making him feel like he was wasting her time. He tried not to think about Cristina. Staring. Or Lexie, who mewed behind him with a burning, nurturing need to help him or something. Meredith must have glared at her while he focused on moving his feet, because, while the noises didn't stop, Lexie didn't touch him.

His body shook, and his legs felt shivery, like they would give out any moment. He took a wobbly step and then another, and then let his weight fall against the side of the car with relief. He coughed, and he sniffed.

Meredith crawled into the back seat and helped pull him inside. When he settled, panting and strained and trembling, Meredith wrapped her arms around him and the fuzzy blanket. He shivered as she held him against the door, her fingers tangling with his hair. She rubbed his back. Tears of exhaustion and pain pricked his eyes, and he had no fortitude to stop them. They stumbled down his cheeks. He tried not to think about Cristina and Lexie, both witnesses to his embarrassing broken resolve.

Lexie climbed into the front seat and closed the door. Outside sounds dimmed in the insulated cabin, leaving only his sniveling intervening in the silence. No one spoke. Like somebody had fucking died in the car or something. At least Cristina didn't tease him. He buried his face in Meredith's shoulder, and she held him, whispering soothing, quiet words.

He really had been set back to the beginning. And he'd never catch up to Alex. Not for months at this rate.

The gun cocked. “Welcome home, Dr. Shepherd,” said Gary Clark as the Cayenne began to move.

Mark's car door slammed, and Derek snapped awake. “What.” The hoarse croak squeezed in his throat. His whole body twitched, and his hand scrabbled at the door. He fought for purchase, blinking and bleary, shivering with the unexpected stress. His heartbeat slowed as he listened to the relative silence. The car ticked as it settled. The distant chatter of voices fluttered in his ears.

He rubbed his eyes. Mark stood by the car door, stretching. Derek swallowed and wiped his mouth with his hand. His tongue tasted like paste, and his eyelids stuck. He squinted at his watch. Two hours has passed. Two hours? Of driving? For groceries? He looked around. This was not the market six blocks away that Meredith liked to use. This was not Queen Anne Hill.

The car sat in a wide, endless parking lot ringed by dozens of stores and shops. A Safeway, a Best Buy, a Wal-Mart and countless other smaller businesses interspersed throughout the larger chains. He didn't recognize this area at all, and he frowned as he un-clipped his seat belt.

Derek pulled on the door handle and then pushed the door. He winced and grunted as pain shot down his chest, and he yanked his hand away. Stupid. Stupid and half asleep and... He sighed, and he forced the door open with his leg instead. He twisted, pressed his shoulder into the seat, and pushed his feet out of the car onto the pavement. He breathed, wheezing once, twice, and then he jammed down with his quads. Forcing his body to a standing position from such a low crouch without help from his upper body was something he maybe could have pulled off two decades ago. Not now. Not injured. He couldn't overcome gravity.

He panted, staring at the pavement and the thick white line that marked the edge of Mark's parking space. White cross-trainers appeared in his view, and Mark crouched by the door. “I was just going to let you sleep,” he said.

“I slept for two hours already,” Derek said. “Where are we, anyway?”

“I went south on the 5 for a bit,” Mark replied.

“Oh. Why?”

Mark shrugged. “Nice day for a drive.”

Derek frowned. Gray. Everywhere gray. And wet. And damp. “It's a horrible day for a drive.”

“The temperature is nice,” Mark said. “Ready?”

“Not that nice. You won't be able to get any milk or frozen things,” Derek said. “They'll go bad or melt in the trunk on the way home.”

“I'll worry about that later,” Mark said. He wrapped his arms around Derek's waist. “Push up on three,” he said, and he counted. Derek grasped Mark's shoulders. When Mark hit three, Derek jammed into the pavement with his quads and calves. He didn't have his upper body to assist him, but Mark supported his lower back and pulled, which gave Derek enough leverage to get up the rest of the way. When he'd achieved upright, he flailed for the door frame, and he rested from the exertion.

“You okay?” Mark said.

“I'm fine,” Derek croaked, and Mark let go. Derek coughed. “I just need a minute.”

“Take your time.” Mark folded his arms and leaned back against the car with a sigh. Gray clouds hovered overhead, but the drizzle had stopped hours ago, and a muted, post-rain grayness turned everything damp and gloomy.

Derek stared at the surrounding lot as he caught his breath. Mark had said they'd taken the 5. For a bit. Two hours was hardly a bit. He closed the car door and turned to Mark. “Are we even still in Washington?”

Mark snorted. “The state border is like 170 miles from Seattle.”
“Yeah,” Derek said. “And you could make a bouquet with all your speeding tickets.”

“We're still in Washington,” said Mark.

“But...” Derek said. And then he swallowed. Mark had driven the car like a normal car. He hadn’t accelerated it like a roller coaster or a rocket. He hadn't driven on the highway at his usual cruising speed of 85 mph or more. And he kept a pillow in his back seat. Since when did Mark keep a fucking pillow next to his gym bag? The sneaking, crawling suspicion that Mark had made all those concessions specifically to compensate for Derek's fragility made his stomach twist, and he wasn't sure whether to be grateful, embarrassed, depressed, or all three. Had Mark seen Derek fall asleep, and just kept driving out of some nurturing sense that Derek needed the rest?

“He fucked your wife, too,” Gary Clark said. “Clearly, he exists to make you a eunuch.”

“For me,” Derek muttered, trying to focus. “You...”

Mark shrugged, but Derek knew from his guarded expression that he'd pegged it. “I just wanted to drive,” said Mark. “That's all.”

“Right,” said Derek.

Mark grunted noncommittally, and he walked down the long, wide row of cars. The car chirped and the lights flashed as he held the key fob over his shoulder and armed the alarm. Derek shuffled after him and caught up after a few strides. Mark walked slowly, his steps compacted to half their normal length. Even then, halfway down the row, Derek's legs felt like spaghetti. Fatigue rolled over him. He wobbled on his feet, and he had no idea how he was going to walk all the aisles in a grocery store, or how he would be able to stand watching Mark walk the speed of a snail just so Derek could keep up, on an outing Derek had foisted himself on instead of being invited. His face reddened.

A vague, gnarling tension gripped Derek's muscles as a woman rolled by with her cart toward her car. He stared at her, watching her hands and her thin, graceful fingers as she gripped the cart handle. His gaze darted to her purse. She had a baggy shirt. She could easily hide something in her front pocket, something gun-sized.

“Derek,” Mark said.

Derek blinked, and he realized he'd stopped. He'd frozen like some sort of bird trying to outwit a snake by hiding in plain sight. All to assess the risk of walking near a five-foot-three woman rolling a cart full of grocery sacks back to her car. He swallowed.

“I'm sorry,” he said.

Mark shrugged.

Sweat rolled down his spine, and Derek forced himself to breathe. He made himself walk, but the closer he got to the store, the more and more people he saw. Not just one or two. Crawling hoards of them. The checkout lines beyond the sliding doors in the store were a writhing mass of life. Every step forward became a war with his body. His brain began threatening him in an endless litany. Do not go in there. Do not go in there. Do. Not. Go in.

“Derek,” Mark said again as he grabbed a cart from the stacked line of them beside the building. “Are you all right?”

“Y...” Derek said, his voice dying into a choked whisper. “Yes.” He made himself walk into the store beside Mark's cart. Made himself not jump as people bumped and jostled him. He was a doctor. He needed to be able to function around lots of people. Lots of strangers. This was ridiculous. He wouldn't get shot in a grocery store. Or anywhere. And he'd been able to calm himself down when he'd walked with Meredith. He could calm down, now.

“Are you sure about that?” Mr. Clark said.

Derek made it through the produce section. Mark picked up strawberries for Meredith. Bananas for everybody's cereal. Salad packs. Potatoes to go with steaks. But Derek hung in an over-sensitized daze. His gaze darted to the island stacked with a pyramid of ripe nectarines and peaches, and he didn't look at the fruit. He looked by the ground to see if somebody was hiding behind the stack. When a lady behind him crinkled a plastic bag, his body twitched.

By the time Mark pushed the cart into the deli department, Derek couldn't focus. His limbs shook. The deli had an open view into their meat freezer, but Derek didn't see hanging flanks of beef. He saw blood, and the shadow of a firearm flashed in the glass. Gary Clark sneered.

Near the back of the store, when a clerk dropped a crate of chili cans on the ground, the loud slam almost pushed Derek into a panicking, gibbering mess. He swallowed. His mouth felt cottony, and dry, and every noise was a gunshot, no matter what it sounded like to begin with. Too many people everywhere left him drowning in the constant task of threat assessment.

“I think I'm going to sit in the car,” Derek said, trying to sound confident and clear, but mostly he just heard hoarse, breathy failure. “May I have the keys?”

“You okay, man?” Mark said as he fished into his pocket for his key fob. The keys jingled as he withdrew them.

“I'm a little tired,” Derek said.

“Okay,” said Mark. “I'll try to finish fast.”

“Take your time,” Derek said, and he wandered toward the entranced without looking back, stuck in a dazed, shock-y place where everything seemed too loud, too bright, and too scary. His palms sweated, and he gripped the keys until the sharp edges of metal hurt.

The doors slid apart and guided him to freedom and safety. Derek couldn't stop the distressed whine that caught in his throat as a man bustled past with two grocery bags clutched in his hands and knocked right into him. The force of the collision and Derek's own momentum drove Derek to the side, shuffling one step, two.

“Watch where you're going,” the man snarled as he caught a falling cumquat, and his bags crinkled. Derek looked at the man's pockets and assessed the rest of him. Baggy. Not safe. Could have a weapon. And then Derek froze, caught, unable to look away. The man had short, gray hair with a high hairline, dark blue eyes, and a mustache. That was where the similarities ended, but it didn't matter. None of it mattered, because Derek couldn't breathe.

The man's grocery bags disappeared, and all Derek saw was the end of a gun, pointed at him. A roar hit his eardrums, and then he was falling backward. Dr. Kepner stood behind him, screaming and babbling, but he didn't understand the words. He couldn't remember the impact. Just the endless gray sky over head as he lay there, bleeding out and dying and unable to breathe.

The world snapped back to him like a rubber band. The man with the grocery bags who'd run into him snorted with disdain, and he left Derek behind. Derek trembled in the middle of the exit.
“Excuse me,” said a woman as she tried to push past with a loaded cart. Derek swallowed. Traffic jam. He was causing a traffic jam, and he couldn't...

He made his legs function despite the shivery, panicky, weak feeling in his quads and his calves. His hands shook. Everything trembled like a fucking leaf. Dots of sweat formed on his brow. The parking lot spread out like an endless sea. He didn't know where to go, where the car had been parked, couldn't recall anything in the midst of dizzying panic. People. Everywhere. He stumbled down the walk toward a bench. If he could get to the bench, he could sit, and he could make himself calm down and think rationally and—

He blinked when he saw it in the distance. A little business tucked between a Verizon store and the grocery store. He walked, every breath a small sob that he couldn't stop. Tears pinched in his eyes. He swallowed, and he kept going.

The bell rang as he entered the store, and then a hush spread around him, like he'd entered a library, or a funeral parlor, or... Derek wiped his eyes and blinked. His feet sank into the plush welcome mat. The store was narrow, but deep. A lighted, glass display case ran the length of the room. Stacks and stacks of boxes ran up the walls. An eagle poster slathered with the NRA logo in bright, bloody bursts of color had been taped to the cash register.

“Hello, sir,” said a thin, black-haired man as he came in from the back room. He smiled, showing pearly white, straight teeth, and no fillings. He wore a yellow shirt, a white apron, and jeans. Not prim, but not sloppy, either. Casual. At ease. “How can I help you?”

Derek didn't trust his throat to make words as he walked into the gun shop. His eyes darted to the boxes of ammunition on the wall. “9MM 2 for 1!” said a small placard, and his stomach roiled.

He shuffled to the first glass case by the door and looked down. Guns. Different colors. Shapes. Sizes. His breaths shortened as his gaze found a familiar black pistol, resting quiet and deadly in a red velveteen case. Derek gripped the display case, leaving smudged prints on the glass by the corners.

“That's a Beretta 9mm,” said the clerk as he came to a stop across from Derek and looked down. “It's very popular with law enforcement.”

Derek pursed his lips. “Why?”

The clerk shrugged. “They don't want to shoot through walls or people. They want to hit their targets and have the bullets stop.”

“Oh,” Derek said. He stared at the gun in the case, and then he closed his eyes. The barrel of a gun pointed at him. In slow motion, he watched the flash of the muzzle. The way the gun flinched in Gary Clark's hand as force kicked it back. Derek didn't remember the impact. Just the searing pain in his breast as he hit the ground, and his head smacked into the floor. Dr. Kepner wouldn't shut up.

He didn't know if that gun in the case was the type of gun Gary Clark had used. But it looked fucking similar. His gaze shifted manically to another black pistol labeled Glock–17, which didn't have the same sort of muzzle as the one Mr. Clark had used, and then some sort of Smith & Wesson. Derek only had a vague recollection of popular brands. He didn't understand any of the lingo, or the labels, or anything. He just knew a man could pick up any one of these, load it with bullets, and kill someone. Many someones. A hospital full of people. Him. His breaths shortened, and he put a hand to his side as a phantom hot poker smacked through his body and stopped by his spine.
“First time around firearms?” said the clerk.

Derek swallowed. “No.”

“Huh,” said the clerk. “Well, color me surprised, then. I can usually peg newbies a mile away.” He pulled out a ring of keys and opened the case. He pulled the Beretta from its tomb, and before Derek realized it, Derek had a fucking gun sitting in his hands. “See if you like it,” the clerk said.

The grip felt solid. The gun was surprisingly light. A few pounds. It definitely didn't break the barrier of Derek's five pound weight limit.

Derek's hand shook as he slid his index finger up against the trigger, and he lifted the gun in an imitation of what Gary Clark had done when he'd wielded one. A one-handed, extended-from-the-body grip with his right hand. He narrowed his gaze, and he pretended his murderer stood there, pleading and groveling, and then he yanked on the trigger.

The gun clicked, and Derek's stomach curdled. He put the unloaded gun on the counter top and stepped away.

“Not for you?” the clerk said.

Derek swallowed. His head pounded. “If I w... wanted this. Wh... What would I need to do?” His voice cracked, and he stuttered, and he couldn't look the clerk in the eye.

“Well, there's a form you'll have to fill out,” said the clerk. “There's a five day hold on all handguns. The state will run a background check. As long as nothing comes up, you'll be good to go by the end of the week.”

“The end of the week,” Derek echoed. “That's it?”

“Well,” the clerk said, and then he frowned. “The form is a bit cumbersome. But yes.”

Derek closed his eyes. He put his elbows on the counter, and he leaned into his hands. “S... so,” he said, struggling to speak against nausea. “If I wanted to... I... I could. Fff. Five days. That's all.”

“Assuming your background check is clean, yes.”

“Okay,” Derek said. He panted as the room seemed to waver in and out like a desert mirage in a blast of heat. “Okay.”

“Sir, are you all right?” said the clerk from very far away.

Derek stumbled to his feet, pushing away from the display case, and he blinked, trying to keep his brain in the room with him. He stood in a store full of death. Guns sat on display like museum exhibits. Handled like artwork. There was ammunition on sale. Like a great deal on printer ink at Staples. The store had a friendly clerk. And Derek or Gary Clark or anyone could buy a gun and kill somebody in five days. Some smiling, juvenile clerk had watched Gary Clark fill out his fucking form with a fucking ballpoint pen, sanctioned a bloody rampage, and had probably given him discount ammunition.

Who fucking gave discounts on murder?

Derek looked at the case where the Beretta rested. It sat on top of the glass, now, on a felt pad. He'd touched it. He'd picked it up, and he'd pretended. His body shook. Gary Clark laughed and taunted and jeered in his ears.
Derek didn't answer the clerk. He bolted. As fast as his body would let him flee. A sharply painful jog that jounced and tortured his healing upper body. But a jog. Something he hadn't done successfully in weeks. When he got back to the car, he was sweaty and shaky and upset and crying. He couldn't breathe. Or think.

“Fucking eunuch,” said Gary Clark. “Or, I guess a eunuch wouldn't be fucking. Would you?”

Derek vomited. By the side of the car. Bile and breakfast spilled onto the pavement, and his incision line flared with brief agony as his abdominal muscles jerked with spasms. He wiped his mouth, and then he crawled into the car, no special squat and shuffle required because he didn't fucking care if he got in knees first or contorted. He reached into the back seat. If Mark had the foresight to bring a fucking pillow, he would have the foresight to— Yes. Derek reached for his pills. He unscrewed the cap. They'd reduced him to 1 every 6-8 hours as needed. He spilled 3 into his hand, and he swallowed them dry, choking and gasping and forcing them down. He didn't want to be here. He didn't want to think. He didn't want to hold a fucking gun, real or pretend.

“That's right,” said Mr. Clark. “Run away. Coward.”

Derek had just thrown up. His stomach was empty. He didn't have to wait long before his head began to rush, and his muscles loosened, and his breathing slowed. He blinked, long and protracted, once, twice, and then it seemed better to just let his eyelids rest against his face. The pill bottle slid from his hands and fell to the floor mat by his feet. The jingle of spilling pills filled the cabin.

“Help,” he croaked, and his thoughts spread apart and loosened like warm taffy.

A hand slipped against his trembling body and pushed him back against the seat. “It's okay, now,” Meredith said in the silence. She wrapped her arms around him, and he forgot the rest as she soothed him. “You're safe.”
Chapter 12

Meredith had made a horrible mistake.

She petted the thick stack of towels and linens on the tray table next to a lukewarm water basin, wishing she hadn’t volunteered for this. Derek had made it clear that he didn’t want her to touch him, and now she’d inserted herself into a situation where she would have to touch him everywhere. But she’d seen the look on his face, torn between desire and humiliation, when Tammy, Derek’s assigned nurse, had entered the cubicle with the warm water basin. He didn’t want to lie in filth. But he didn’t want to be bathed like an invalid, either. Except he was an invalid. Temporarily. Since that initial burst of energy when he’d somehow stood up, he couldn’t lift his head off the pillow.

“I’ll do it,” Meredith had said without thinking when she’d seen that look. Tammy, exhausted after hours and hours on shift, had been happy to accept Meredith’s offer. The nurse had set down the basin, washcloths, towels, clean sheets, and soap, and she’d left.

Now, Meredith hovered in tense, silent debate. Was it better to let him endure humiliation with a stranger who he would likely never see again? Or was it better to do this herself, despite a clear unresolved issue between them that might be exacerbated by forced intimacy? Maybe she should go get Tammy after all.

Meredith didn’t know. She didn’t know anything. And now she’d wasted so much time Derek had checked out of the room to commune with whatever. Though he didn’t sleep, he stared at no place in particular, his eyelids drooping. Like he felt too hot to sleep and too sick to be awake, and so he hovered halfway between the two.

Meredith took several towels off the top of the stack, and she approached the bed where he lay, baking in a lake of his sweat. She reached over the railing and touched his face. Even now, hours after they’d pushed his fever under 104, his skin burned against her palm. Sweat poured from every exposed drop of skin. He didn’t move except for the shallow rise and fall of his bare chest. A cloud of fog against the oxygen mask cupping his face contracted and expanded in time with his breaths, and it hurt. It hurt to watch him struggle so hard for so little in return. His blood-oxygen levels were very low.

“Derek,” Meredith whispered, trying not to intervene into his space too harshly.

Sometimes, you were so sick you didn’t want to listen to anything, no matter what the subject, no matter who was speaking, You just wanted quiet. And dark. She suspected he was there. He’d refused his iPod several times when she’d offered it, and when she spoke to him, he tended to drift. She couldn’t give him dark, but she could give him quiet, at least. Beyond the conversation when he’d first come out of his fevered delirium, she usually didn’t speak unless he talked first, or, well, tried to talk. At least the head nurse had given in when she’d seen Meredith wasn’t going to interfere with his ability to rest and recuperate, and had given Meredith permission to stay for much longer intervals than before.

“Derek,” she said again, a little louder.

He blinked once, and his gaze shifted toward her voice, but he didn’t move his head or speak. Not that she expected him to, or even wanted him to. Hearing him try to speak hurt her almost as much as watching him try to breathe. She wished the antibiotics would start working, soon. Really working. Instead of just keeping him from getting worse.
“Hey,” she said, forcing herself to smile as his fever-glazed gaze found hers. “Do you need anything? Water, or...?”

He stared at her, sort of. His gaze went right through her face and focused on some point beyond. Not on purpose, she thought. Not like he tried to ignore her. More like he didn't quite have a firm handle on reality.

“I'm going to put some towels underneath you.” Nerves quivered in her gut. “Unless you don't want me to. I could... We could... Skip...” She swallowed. What was she saying? Skip a bath? He was soaked. And he lay on soaked blankets and sheets. A lukewarm bath would not only clean him up; it would help lower his temperature, and probably make him feel about six busloads more comfortable. But he didn't want her to touch him, and what if pressuring him, even for something he needed, made things worse? What if—

His right hand flopped against his hip once before he managed to move it across his torso. The intravenous line chased after his hand. He gripped the opposite railing, the barest flex of his fingers indicating he had a hold on it. In an swell of insecure paranoia, she thought he was trying to get away from her, but then sanity intervened. Derek knew how this was done. He would try to help.

With hesitation, she splayed one hand against his shoulder blade and one hand against his hip, and she rested for a moment, skin to skin with him, to give him a moment to get used to it. His muscles didn't tense. She gritted her teeth as her eyes watered. She didn't understand what made some things okay and some things not. She wished she knew why he hadn't wanted her to touch him, wished she had any clue at all. Was he just being moody? Or had she done something? She didn't know. And he couldn't tell her.

She forced away her doubts, and she helped him roll onto his side. He used his hand on the opposite railing as a weak support. He wheezed as the bullet wound neared the mattress and his weight pressed on his damaged side. He coughed into the mask, and his entire body jerked with the force of it, and then he coughed again, and again, and again, and again, like the movement from his back to his side had kicked up buckets of dust or something. His hips and legs jerked. The hospital gown covering his groin fell to the mattress. He reached for it, a hoarse, panicked sound crackling in his ruined throat. She rushed to help him, nerves whipping her arms across the bed.

“It's okay, Derek. I've got it,” she said.

Her hand brushed his grasping, sweaty palm. She fixed the limp gown so it covered both front and back, and his breaths slowed, and his hand relaxed. She glanced at the curtains. They were closed. And Tammy knew what they were doing. “Nobody will come in,” she assured him, heartbroken, wary, hoping his uncharacteristic self-consciousness wasn't because of her presence, though what else could it be when they were alone together? She wracked her brain, trying to think of what she possibly could have done to make him so skittish, but she couldn't think of anything.

She flattened out towels next to his torso, his legs, and his neck and head, leaving the excess rolled up near his sweaty body. She helped him shift onto the clean section by rolling him over the bump and onto his right side. She unfurled the towels the rest of the way, until the entire bed's grimy, sweat-soaked surface had been covered with soft, clean terrycloth. Then she helped him resettle on his back. She laid a fresh towel across his groin and removed the dirty gown he'd been using as a cover.

She pulled the basin close and then dipped a sponge into the lukewarm water. When she drew the sponge away, she squeezed, and she closed her eyes, listening as the water drained back into the basin. The bustle and shuffle of the hospital around them fell silent as she tuned it out. Only the sounds of Derek's struggled breathing remained. She opened her eyes, and she glanced at him. He hovered in a vague, half-lidded stupor. The deep blue of his eyes seemed opaque and black in the dim fluorescent lighting, and he stared at nothing in particular. She left him alone to rest.

After the sponge drained, she touched his chest with it. A thin film of water spread across his pale body as she pressed. His skin twitched, and she paused, giving him a chance to accustom himself to the temperature of the water and the feel of the sponge. He was very, very hot. Lukewarm would feel cool or cold to him.

“This should make you feel a little better,” she said as she rubbed his left pectoral. The sponge made a rasping sound as she dragged it across his skin. The incision line down the center of his chest shifted with the movement of his skin, but he didn't flinch or otherwise appear to be in pain.

He'd been shaved prior to his heart surgery. Short wisps of raven hair had grown back into place in a tapering triangle. She watched his nipple pucker as she brushed him with the sponge. She tried not to apply too much pressure as she neared the center of his sternum. A lump formed in her throat when she reached the bullet hole, still an ugly, pocked, crusty scab in dark relief against alabaster. She skirted around it.

Once she'd finished with his chest, she paused. The caffeinated butterflies in her stomach multiplied. Though he hadn't been watching her before, he watched her now through thick, dark eyelashes. He didn't speak, and he lay there immobile and naked except for the towel she'd draped over his hips. Despite the fact that this was Derek, her husband, the man she'd seen, touched, and tasted every corner and crevice of, this... This felt more personal and more intimate than anything she'd ever done to or with him.

Now, in this moment, he'd become dependent on her. Dependent for his health and well-being. Derek Shepherd was a human being who housed an immense well of pride, but also a vast well of insecurities, hidden deep underneath an arrogant facade. The pressure not to mess up, not to damage his pride or inflate his niggling doubts, seemed staggering, now that she'd hurled herself into this position. She watched his Adam's apple carve a line along his throat, and she looked away to dip the sponge as her face reddened.

She'd lingered on his chest. And she'd stared. He didn't want her to touch him. He clearly felt self-conscious. And she'd stared. At his nipple. As it puckered. This wasn't sexual. This wasn't for sex. He couldn't move much or advocate for himself. And she'd stared at an involuntary tactile response like it was some sign he still wanted her. Stupid. Lame. Idiot. She swallowed, and she squeezed the sponge as she pulled it out of the tub.

“Is this okay?” she said, and she stopped to look at him, at his face, for any signs of distress or embarrassment or anything negative. Something to tell her she'd irreparably screwed up. That this had been a mistake.

He blinked. The hazy, not-quite-lucid appearance of his gaze didn't dissipate, but she saw his lips move. The mask over his face fogged. He closed his eyes, and he nodded.

She stroked his abdomen, chasing the rise and fall of his breaths. She tried to aim for something more methodical, rather than intimate touching, but she failed when she encountered the ripples of his ribs sliding underneath his skin. He coughed, weak and tired, and she watched his diaphragm twitch and his abs strain.

Since she'd gotten on his case about food, he'd been eating, and, though he was still way too thin, he'd put on a pound or two in the week since his first real walk. This pneumonia would rip all his progress away again and would maybe set him back even further. He hadn't eaten since breakfast the day before. He'd been too sick to eat. He'd improved enough to eat since then, but his already meager appetite had been obliterated. He'd refused the lunch tray they'd brought him.

Tears burned. She blinked against them and forced herself to move onward. She dipped the sponge into his bellybutton, and rubbed down to the edge of the towel where the coiling fuzz of his pubic hair began. Swift strokes. Not lingering in any one place. Clinical, she told herself. Clinical, clinical. She could do clinical.

She rubbed his shoulder with the sponge. Dribbles of lukewarm water spread over his skin and pocked the towel below. She wanted to touch him, her palms to sweaty, wet flesh, and she wanted to whisper soothing, soft words, but she clamped down on her impulses. Keep him comfortable despite the precarious situation. Make him feel better. Don't embarrass him. Those were her goals. Nothing else.

She sponged his arms while he lay passive. She wiped hours of sweat away with soap and lukewarm water. The soft tufts of dark, soaked hair in his armpits reeked, and she scrubbed and scrubbed. The excess water caught on the towels. Small droplets remained on his skin after her attention, and she worked his upper body dry in sections before moving on.

She managed to keep with her clinical goals until she roamed to the puckered, nickel-sized scar in the meat of his left thigh near his hip, and she couldn't help but pause. She stared, caught in the glaze of hypnosis as she watched soapy, filmy bubbles slip and slide across his pale, cratered skin. She knew he had a mirror scar on the back of his leg, high on his hamstring, almost where the muscle dipped into the curve of his ass. From his motorcycle crash, he'd said, but he'd never said more, and she hadn't wanted to press it. She suspected, from the layout of the two scars, that he'd been impaled by something. Rebar, maybe, based on the round-but-jagged shape, or... Well. She really didn't know. A tree branch or a signpost? When she came back to herself, she realized she was stroking the dip of the front scar with her thumb, and he watched her.

“I'm sorry,” she said, and she pulled away. He didn't seem upset, but maybe she was just being hopeful. “I really sorry. It's hard not to daydream.” She belatedly realized she'd made it sound even worse. Like she was ogling him or something. Her stomach roiled at the thought of him assuming she was taking advantage. Really taking advantage. “I mean, I... Spacing. I mean. Sorry.”

Articulate. Wonderful. She opted to shut up instead of making it worse.

She dipped the sponge again, and she finished his thighs and his calves and feet while he watched, still silent. When she'd finished with his front, well, most of his front, she splayed her hand against his hip. “I'm going to wash your back,” she said. She held his shoulder and his hip. He gave her a feeble amount of help, but mostly she did the work of moving him herself. “I'll try to be quick,” she added, knowing that, while he could lie on his side for brief periods, he still found it uncomfortable after a while.

Except when she stared at him, she couldn't help wanting to go slow. If she spent more time on his back, that was less time trying to figure out how to deal with... other places. She pressed the sponge against his shoulder blade and watched the waterfall against his skin. He made a deep, croaky sound under the oxygen mask, and she bit her lip. He had no intonation. No words. It was impossible to tell if he was enjoying something or distressed or...

“Are you okay?” she said.

He didn't speak, but she watched over his shoulder at his expression. Watched the way his eyelids dipped as he exhaled. She stood behind him. He couldn't really watch her without serious contortions. Instead, he let his lashes fall low over his cheeks, and he rested with his eyes closed. Not just okay, then, she decided. Enjoying it. Or at least not disliking it.

Which made no sense in light of his earlier balking, and now she had no idea what to think. She watched his wet head tilt into the towel covering pillow, and his supporting grip on the bed railing faltered. Maybe he was too exhausted to care anymore, whether he liked it or not.

She stroked his back, and she chased the sponge down the ripples of his vertebrae. One, by one, by one. All the way to his coccyx where his body cleaved apart. His hand fell from the railing. She splayed her bare palm against his side to steady him. He didn't twitch, or struggle, or seem in any way disturbed. She shoved into the sponge and pushed down the diagonals of his lattisimus dorsi, laving attention on every freckle, all the way down to the final toned dip before the swell, and then she scrubbed his gluteals. The mirror scar on his hamstring shone in uneven relief.

She felt his muscles start to tremble. His eyes opened into slits, and he stared at the bed railing, silent. His fingers clenched, gathering a tent of terrycloth. His side hurt from resting on it too long, she guessed. He coughed. She wiped him down with a towel, made sure he was dry, and helped him settle onto his back again. She bit her lip. She'd finished everything but his face and his groin.

She put down the sponge and picked up a fresh washcloth from the stack. She dipped it in the water, wrung it out, and went back to the bed. She leaned over the bed rail, and she pulled the oxygen mask away. No longer muted, his noisy breaths hit the air like drumbeats. He lay passive, eyes closed. She couldn't tell if he slept or not. She ran her fingers through his sweaty hair with one hand as she wiped his face with the other. The filmy sheen of sweat across his skin shattered as she broke it with the washcloth. She dabbed his neck and behind his ears and everywhere his mop of mussed hair didn't touch, and then she replaced his oxygen mask. His lungs needed the help.

She felt his muscles start to tremble. His eyes opened into slits, and he stared at the bed railing, silent. His fingers clenched, gathering a tent of terrycloth. His side hurt from resting on it too long, she guessed. He coughed. She wiped him down with a towel, made sure he was dry, and helped him settle onto his back again. She bit her lip. She'd finished everything but his face and his groin.

“I need to pull this away now,” she said, her fingertips brushing soft terrycloth over his hips.

He didn't respond, and he didn't look at her. Very bad signs, unless he really was asleep, but she somehow doubted it.

She pulled the towel loose. As part of her recent grunt work as an intern, she'd done this countless times to people she didn't know. But this was different. A lump formed in her throat. She hoped this wasn't a mistake. She couldn't bear it if she made things worse.

She hated to leave him exposed when it clearly bothered him, but she'd just washed him. All over. Her hands had touched new sweat and old sweat and germs and dirt and dead skin cells, and now that the towel was out of the way, she had to re-sterilize. She washed her hands thoroughly while he lay in the bed, naked, uncovered. Nerves clamored in her gut, made her body shake. She wanted to be finished. She wanted to be finished, so he could be comfortable, and she wouldn't have to worry anymore.

She grabbed another sterile washcloth, dipped it, wrung it out, and approached.

“Derek,” she whispered.

His eyes remained closed.
“Derek,” she repeated. “I’m going to touch you.”

His eyelids fluttered. The deep pools of his pupils seemed glassy. He made a noise, and she watched his throat bobble as he swallowed. A cough rumbled through him, and he shut his eyes again. That was that. She had no idea what he’d tried to tell her, or if he was talking to another one of his fever hallucinations, or if he’d just been clearing his wrecked throat... Her brain hurt. She hated this. A no would have been more vehement, right? Maybe he’d just been telling her to get the hell on with it. Or... Something. Stop, he’d said earlier, when he’d meant it. Whatever this had been, it hadn’t been the word stop.

She forced herself to relax. “Okay,” she said.

She touched his feather-soft, veined skin, gently retracted his prepuce, and she cleaned around the area where the catheter entered him. He inhaled, and she froze. “Does this hurt?” she said, her voice tense, hoping she hadn't accidentally yanked on the balloon inflated inside his bladder. She didn't think she had. When he didn’t respond, didn’t open his eyes, she kept going, working down to his pubic bone and his balls as quickly and clinically as she could. She cleaned the entire area, she patted it dry, and then she backed off. As fast as she could.

After washing her hands again, she piled her used towels and washcloths to the side near the basin, and she unfolded a clean, fresh hospital gown. At last read, his temperature had been 103.6. High, but no longer a life threatening emergency unless it persisted for days, and the Tylenol was still forcing it down. The bath had probably lowered his fever a bit a bit as well. The hospital gown was very thin. Physically, wearing the full gown might be a little uncomfortable for him. Mentally, though...

“Do you want to wear this?” she said, gesturing at the gown, wanting to make it his choice instead of hers.

His eyes opened halfway. Fever glazed his dark irises, and for a moment, she wondered if he had any idea where he was. Maybe he really had fallen asleep.

She leaned against the railing and moved the gown into his direct line of sight. “Derek,” she said. “Do you want to wear this gown?”

He panted as he stared at her. His lips parted. The fog on the mask blocked her view of his lips, and she had no idea what he’d said, but it became pretty clear what he meant when he tried to sit up, scrabbling at the bed rails for leverage. She rushed to him, and he collapsed against her body, gasping, coughing. His shaky arms wrapped around her body for support, and she heard him then, when the oxygen mask pressed against her.

“Please,” he said, a croak.

She swallowed as the room blurred, and she helped him stick his arms through the holes. She tied the gown along the side, trying to hurry. The longer he sat up, the more his body shook with strain, and she didn’t want him to overheat all over again. When he collapsed against the mattress, she helped him raise his hips, and she pulled the gown down to his thighs, under his buttocks.

“The last thing she did was change his sheets to fresh, soft, clean ones. She placed a new cooling blanket on top of the fitted sheet. She didn't bother with the cover sheet. He wouldn't want it, not as hot as he felt. And then she helped him roll back onto the clean cooling blanket.

This was the first time in hours she hadn't seen him soaked. His hair was still wet, but he looked better, even as new dots of sweat formed across his body. He panted into the mask. He stared at her for a long, interminable moment, and then he closed his eyes. Whether he slept or not, she couldn't tell.

Finished, she collapsed into the chair by the bed. She would clean up all the supplies later. She reached across the bed railing, and she grabbed his hand. “I’m sorry,” she told him. “I’m sorry if I made it worse.”

He didn’t open his eyes or try to reassure her. She hoped he slept.

“I need to have sex with Derek,” Meredith said as she paced. The fish tank burbled, and the air smelled like fresh cut flowers or something. Relaxing. Nice. Except Meredith didn't feel relaxed or nice. She clasped her hands, clenching and un-clenching because she needed to hit something. Or squeeze. Or just... Anything to supplant the horrible desperation gnawing at her core. Her loafers caught on the soft carpet and dragged.

Dr. Wyatt let her pace. “Why do you need to have sex with him?” she said.

Meredith stopped and looked at her. “What do you mean, why?” she said. “He's my husband, and I love him.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “And that constitutes want,” she said. She shifted on her chair and recrossed her legs. “Why do you feel that you need to have sex?”

“I don’t know. I...” Meredith sighed as the fight bled out of her. She dropped onto the couch on her back and let herself sink into the too-comfortable cushions. She watched Dr. Wyatt's pen scribble across her steno pad, and then she let her gaze space. One pen became two. “We used to have sex almost daily, if not more.”

“And when did you last have sex?” Dr. Wyatt asked.

“More than five weeks ago,” Meredith said. “Six, really. It was a really busy week before he got shot, and I...” Her voice trailed away as she thought of the last time.

He'd been busy. She'd been busy. She'd paged him to an exam room, knowing the route he'd take from his office by heart because she'd seen him walk it more than once for other pages. She'd grabbed his lab coat as he'd passed, and she'd pulled him into the dark supply closet.

Meredith, I have a page, he'd said.

I know. She'd wrapped her arms around his neck and pushed him against the door to close it. Help me, Chief Shepherd. It's an emergency.

He'd snorted. You?

Guilty, she'd whispered. She'd inhaled against his neck, and the sharp, spicy scent of familiar cologne had made her dizzy with desire. Do you think my boss will mind?

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “So, things don't feel normal, and you miss the pattern?”

“It's not like that,” Meredith said.

“Tell me what it's like,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Meredith closed her eyes and sighed as his phantom hands slid under her waistband. Mmm, he'd purred in her ear as he'd pressed her against the metal rack. A bin full of gauze rolls had crashed to the floor. I'm going to do this again tonight, but much. His nose had nudge the underside of her chin, and she'd tilted backward. Much. He kissed her jugular. Slower.

I'm not going to be home tonight, she'd replied.

That's a shame, Derek had said, his voice a low, virile growl, but his pager had beeped for real, and he hadn't argued more than that. They'd finished, and he'd rushed off, still fiddling with his tie.

“The last time we met in a supply closet,” Meredith said. “It was... maybe ten minutes. A quickie. You know?”

“I'm familiar with the term,” Dr. Wyatt said, a wry smile creasing her features.

“Sorry, I just...”

“Go ahead.”

“I never thought it might be the last time, or I would have...” Meredith blinked. Would have what, exactly? “I mean he almost died. And then he almost died again. And I...”

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward and raised her eyebrows. “You...?”

Tears blurred her vision as Meredith thought of Derek, but she held them at bay.

Derek put more than just his body and mind into sex. He approached lovemaking with gusto. In the moments when he kissed her, when he touched her, when he filled her, he made every cell in her body hum. He loved her. And he made sure she knew it.

She was used to touching him. She was used to looking into his eyes and seeing into his soul. He gave, but he also let her take, just as she did with him. In return for her vulnerability, for her opening to him, he showed her his own weaknesses. A metaphorical statement. Here's my soft underbelly. If you exploit it, I'd hurt. He gave her that. All of him.

Even when the inevitable occurred, and reality struck to inform them that the human body was a complex, unpredictable, sometimes-misbehaving construct. When she couldn't stop thinking about a horrible case at work, and he couldn't excite her no matter what the hell trick he tried, or when something at work stressed him to the point of nausea, and she couldn't get him up, or keep him up, or... whatever. She never felt like the act of sex had been failure, even when one or both of them crashed and burned on the way to the big o, because the rest of it was fantastic anyway, the simple act of being together and loved instead of alone.

She'd never had that before. Not with any other guy she'd met, and she'd met plenty. Derek made her feel safe, and reassured, and whole, and, really?

Addicted to the whole freaking process from start to whatever the finish.

“I just need it,” Meredith said, and she rolled into a sitting position. She draped herself over her knees and stared at the neutral, soft carpet.

“It's normal to want to reconnect after a traumatic event,” Dr. Wyatt replied, her voice soft.

“But he doesn't!” Meredith said. She wiped her face with her hands. Her eyes burned. Her throat hurt. She felt raw. Did he feel that way with her? Safe. Reassured. Whole. She'd always hoped he did, that he felt even half of what she felt for him during intimate moments, but, if he did, then why was she here, talking to Dr. Wyatt. Why would he not want her to touch him? Why had it been six weeks since they'd made love? “He doesn't want to reconnect, or we would have already. I'm all over the reconnecting thing. I wouldn't say no at this point, even if I wasn't in the mood.”

“Are you saying he doesn't want to have sex?”

“Yes,” Meredith said. “That's what I'm saying.”

“Are you sure this isn't a case of can't instead of won't?” Dr Wyatt said.

“Well, I...” Meredith paused. Derek was on a lot of different drugs. Two types of narcotic painkillers among them, one time-release, and one fast-acting. He'd been very sick. And in pain. And depressed. And hurt. And just... Erectile dysfunction would make a lot of sense. Irrational hope swelled in her chest that this whole mess was a simple thing like that. Long term mechanical failure brought on by immense trauma that Derek, being Derek, wouldn't want to admit to, so it manifested in a snarly case of don't-touch-me and sexual avoidance. But her hope died as soon as logic caught up with her. “I've seen him get erections while he's sleeping,” she said with a sigh. “And he usually has one in the morning when he wakes up.”

“So, why do you think he doesn't want to have sex?”

“I did something wrong,” Meredith said.

“Why do you think that?”

“He used to talk about wanting sex,” Meredith said, recalling his litany in the foyer after he'd collapsed. I want to have sex with my wife, he'd yelled, helpless. “Within two weeks, he was...”

“But he doesn't now?”

“Not since the second hospital stay.”

“What happened during the second hospital stay?”

“I don't know,” Meredith said, shaking her head. “When he woke up, he didn't want me to touch him below the neck, but it hurt him to talk, and he was so sick, he couldn't tell me why.”

You can tell me later, she'd said. Except he'd lost his voice for a whole freaking week. He'd been sick and unhappy. Later had never arrived.

She and Mark had had to carry Derek from the car and up the steps. Unlike his first homecoming, there had been no detours to the sofa, no dish washing, no teasing over subs or tickling. Derek hadn't stood defiant in the face of physical weakness. He hadn't been able to stand at all, defiant or not.

She'd helped Derek change his clothes and get into bed, and then sleep had yanked him under before she'd even pulled the covers over his body. He'd slept. For three freaking days. He'd woken for water. He'd woken to pee. He'd woken for some gentle-on-the-stomach soup and to take his pills. All three he'd needed help with, at first.

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “So, he balked at physical contact with you, and now he's not discussing sex anymore?”

“He's barely discussing anything,” Meredith said. She looked at the floor. “He's withdrawn and completely not chatty. Pod Derek or whatever. I don't even know how to talk to him anymore. He bites my head off for every little thing, and he's worse with Mark.”
She’d found Mark in the backyard one evening a few days before, scarlet-faced as he kicked the community-provided trashcan all over in the shredded grass and mud. Fuck you, he’d growled as his foot had slammed into the can. Fuck guns and your fucking vegetable wife. He’d grabbed a trash bag full of garbage, and he’d do-si-do-ed into a tree with it. The bag had split open. Fuck! he’d shouted as refuse had rained around him.

Derek had been asleep against his desk in his office. He tended to retreat there after he finished the latest snap and snarl routine. She wondered what he’d said or done this time to upset Mark so badly.

Dr. Wyatt scribbled notes. “Have you asked him why?”

“You said not to pressure him,” Meredith said.

“I didn’t say not to talk at all, and I did say not to let him wallow,” Dr. Wyatt said. “If he’s initiated some sort of intimacy gap, that needs to be addressed.”

“I’m afraid to even bring it up. Every little thing sets him off.”

Since he’d kicked the pneumonia, Derek had moped. When she talked about work, he prickled, like she was rubbing it in his face that she could be productive all day while he rotted at the house. When she asked about his day, he prickled, like he felt she was patronizing him, because, really, what the fuck would he do all day? His words, not hers. If she tried to see if he wanted anything, he prickled, like he thought she was insulting his ability to take care of himself. Offering to drive him somewhere, or get him a glass of water, or even asking if he’d taken his pills had become a lesson in masochism. Overall, he’d become a prickly person. Prickly and nasty and just... Like Derek with all the good things about his personality stripped away.

Dr. Wyatt shrugged. “Maybe he’s afraid to bring it up, too.”

“He’s Derek,” Meredith said. “Why the hell would he be afraid of sex? He knows he's a freaking god at it.”

But he wouldn't be, now, a tiny voice said. And he knows it. His stamina is shot. He can't lift, push, or pull. He can't bend or twist. Sharp movements still hurt him. She swallowed.

Are you embarrassed, Derek? she'd said.

I don't know, he'd replied in a dark voice that spoke of shame.

Definitely not the cocksure Derek she'd grown to love. She also knew that when Derek experienced an orgasm, he breathed with heavy, sternum-straining pants for... maybe twenty seconds, just before. The moment of, he filled his lungs to the brim and froze. Sometimes he would yell or say her name with the air he'd gathered. Sometimes he would experience his ecstasy in silence, and would only exhale with the final spurt when he let his body collapse into the afterglow. Did he think it would hurt? She kneaded the leg of her pants. She hadn't really thought about that, and now she felt like a selfish idiot on top of everything else. She didn't want him to hurt.

“Why did you two wait back when he said he wanted it?” Dr. Wyatt said. “Is there some restriction on sexual activity after heart surgery?”

“No,” Meredith replied. “You can have sex as soon as you're home after heart surgery, not that you'd necessarily want to.”

“Why wouldn't you want to?”
Meredith, he'd said, his voice cut to the bone with pain. She'd opened her eyes in the dark. His hand had rested on her hip, and his breaths hit her skin in rapid blasts of warmth. Her digital clock had glowed sharp red against her tired eyes. 3:00AM. She'd just helped him flip sides an hour ago, and he usually went at least two hours before he needed to change sides again.

Mmm, what is it? she'd muttered, full of sleep, not registering his discomfort.

He'd rubbed her abdomen, his touch soft and warm, and she'd been tempted to collapse back into sleep. The blankets had wrapped her up in a toasty cocoon, and he lay tipped toward the center of the mattress. Her favorite, because she could lie against his body. But then the mattress had shifted as he tried again to move on his own. A low, hitching noise had popped loose from his lips, and his soft, harrowed moan had brought her out of dreaming.

I can't get up, he'd said, his voice soft between pants, as if he hadn't wanted to wake her despite his discomfort.

She'd helped him over the mountain of pillows, and she'd waited for him under warm blankets while he'd stumbled away to relieve himself in the dark.

“He's been cut in half,” Meredith said. She drew her index finger in a line between her cleavage. “All the muscles he would use to do a push up, or to pull, or lift, or anything. He can't use them. Well, he can. But it hurts. He can't support his body weight. For a while, even breathing hurt, but he says it doesn't anymore.”

“And that's why you didn't have sex?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“No,” Meredith said. “He didn't really say much about pain. He said he didn't want to have sex when all he could do was lie there.”

“So, his idea of sex involves him having to carry his weight,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Him being over top of you.”

“He's not a raging He-Man or whatever,” Meredith protested. “He was never picky before.”

“But it seems to matter to him, now.”

“I guess it does, yeah.”

Dr. Wyatt's pen stopped on the page. She looked up from her notes, and she stared at Meredith with an intent, serious gaze. The fish swam in lazy circles in their watery prison. “Do you remember the symptoms that the packet on assault I gave you listed?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Hyper-vigilant? Easy to startle?”

“But one in particular resonated with you, and we've since talked about it in other sessions.”

“The loss of control thing,” Meredith said.

“Right.”

“And that extends to sex, now?”

“It extends to anything, Meredith. It's important to remember that he's been victimized. He needs to feel like his life isn't at the mercy of others. This is why I encouraged you to help him make decisions.”
Meredith bit her lip and stared at the floor, tears blurring her vision, but again, she refused them. I don't want to have sex when all I can do is lie there, he'd said, his voice choked and tight with misery. He'd pleasured her on the bathroom floor, and he'd made sure she had a fantastic experience, but it'd been like assisted masturbating. He'd delighted in making her beg and whine, maybe because he needed to hear someone pleading with him, needed to see somebody at his mercy, and then he hadn't wanted her to love him in return. His reluctance to participate hadn't bothered her at the time. She'd assumed he was just too tired and hurting.

Now, in light of all this new knowledge, his behavior felt wrong, and it made her want to hit something again. Hit Gary Clark. Mr. Clark had affected her husband's psyche so deeply that Derek couldn't even bring himself to accept love. From her. He had to give it, or he didn't want to do anything.

The Derek she knew wasn't like that.

“So, he needs to be on top because it's empowering or whatever?” she said, wiping her face. Her diaphragm quivered as it threatened her with the possibility of making her explode into sobs. She tamped it with all her might, and she took a shaky breath. She could work with this. And then maybe her Derek would come back.

“That's my guess, but, really, I'm only guessing,” said Dr. Wyatt.

“Educated guessing,” Meredith countered.

“True.”

Meredith leaned back against the couch and closed her eyes. “But I still don't get why me touching him would suddenly bother him,” she mused aloud. “He's like Mr. Touchy Feel-y.”

“So, he likes touching you?”

“Yes,” Meredith said. A ghost of a smile creased her features as she remembered all the times he'd held her, or touched her face, or sniffed her hair, or stood in her space, his warm body interlocked with hers. When they lay in bed for hours, he would stroke her.

You're looking all thoughtful, she'd said.

I was just thinking how pretty you are, and also how pretty our children would be.

“Are you certain that he likes you touching him? That the desire is reciprocal?”

“Of course, I'm sure,” she said.

“Why?”

“Because of the way he reacts when I do it. Or, well, the way he used to react.”

“Which was?” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

“Well, he'd always lean into it,” Meredith said. “And he'd sigh, like he was relaxed, you know? And sometimes, he'd kiss me.”

“And he doesn't do that anymore?”

“Not in the hospital.”
“But what about at home?”

“I haven't really tried since then,” Meredith said. “I got the back off message pretty freaking clearly.”

“And you haven’t spoken to him about it since then?”

“No, I told you,” Meredith said. “I'm not sure how. He's a freaking cactus, and I don't want to mess this up even more. I don't want to make it worse for him than it already is. It's already at the point that I...” Her voice trailed away.

He wasn't being Derek. Not the full palette, anyway. She needed her Derek back. The one who smiled and told her he loved her and said nice things. The one who cracked jokes and chatted about his day, good or bad. The one who made love with her, not to her. The one who snapped and snarled and had a mean streak the size of Texas, but he only let it show once in a while. Not every minute of every hour.

Maybe that's what this quivery, awful feeling was that wouldn't go away. She grieved. He hadn't died, but every day it seemed like more and more of him slipped away from her.

Where's my Derek? That's what she wanted to ask. That's what she wished Dr. Wyatt could tell her. She blinked, and Dr. Wyatt spread into a giant, fuzzy blob, vaguely blonde on top from her hair, and black on bottom from her suit. Wet knives tore down Meredith's cheeks, and she put her face into her hands as everything she'd tried to keep bottled up exploded.

The fish tank burbled, and the clock ticked, and Dr. Wyatt let her sob.

“Please,” Meredith said. She looked up, her gaze watery. She kneaded her hands together. “Tell me how to fix it?”

Dr. Wyatt sighed, and she put her pen and notepad away. “Meredith, you're assuming he doesn't want sex,” she said. “You're assuming he doesn't want you to touch him anymore. You're assuming you did something wrong. That's a lot of assuming.”

“But what else could it be?” Meredith said.

Dr. Wyatt shrugged. “I have some ideas,” she said. “And we could speculate all day.”

Meredith stared at her feet. “I hate you when you're making a damning point or whatever.”

“I'm not saying hold him at gunpoint for an answer, if you'll pardon the heartless pun,” Dr. Wyatt replied. “What I've said in the past still applies. He needs to feel safe and secure talking to you. If he flat refuses to discuss things, it's probably best to let him be. But... Just ask him. Sensitively.”

“Great,” Meredith grumbled. “Because I'm awesome at that.”

Dr. Wyatt smiled. “You're probably a lot better at it than you think.” When Dr. Wyatt's watch beeped, Meredith sighed. How had an hour passed so quickly? It's not like she enjoyed therapy. Somehow, she'd lost track of the clock anyway.

“I'd let you stay,” said Dr. Wyatt, “But I have another appointment scheduled after this.”

Dr. Wyatt confirmed their appointment next week. Meredith gathered her purse and left. She didn't have to stop by the locker room. She'd already changed from her scrubs into her street clothes, khakis, loafers, and a cute lilac-colored blouse she'd bought on sale at Macy's a few weeks before Gary Clark had decided mass murder was a great way to fix things.

She wandered into the cool, gray air and breathed. The air smelled earthy and fresh. It wasn't raining. Not like most people thought of rain. For Seattle residents, though, drizzly mist and occasional fat drop was nothing weird. Shafts of intermittent sunlight struck the pavement, rolling as the thick clouds overhead moved and morphed in the breeze. The approaching midsummer had made the days longer, but the light was already beginning its afternoon fade.

She pulled open her car door. Water droplets sprayed everywhere. She slid into the seat, and she turned on the engine and the headlights. The old jeep rumbled.

“How the hell am I supposed to discuss sex sensitively?” she asked her steering wheel.

Her steering wheel didn't answer, and she sighed as she put the car in reverse and crept out of her parking spot. This was going to suck. She and Derek always had sex, and on the rare occasions where they went a streak without it, it'd been her fault. Wanting to go slow. Her liver being piecemeal. Whatever. Derek had made a joke out of asking for sex for the former. For the latter, he'd been patient, and hesitant, and he'd never pressured her. Not once.

Can we, uh? Derek had said, in an uncharacteristic verbal stumble. *Are you okay to...?

That had been the extent of it, and it wasn't really a model for how to approach this conversation. If she said, “Can we, uh?” to Derek, he wouldn't get it, because she wouldn't be on top of him, kissing him at the time. He'd say, “Uh, what?” assuming he didn't find some random reason to be insulted already and snap at her. And then she'd have to get specific, and it would get ugly, and...

She clenched the steering wheel. The radio DJ droned, mostly beyond her awareness. Rain tapped on the roof with intermittent drumbeats. If she phrased the sex thing as something she wanted, she would feel like a jerk for whining. If she asked him why he didn't want sex, she would feel like a nag, because she'd told him she'd wait until he was ready. There was no easy solution.

Somebody honked, and she flipped him off. “My lane!” she shrieked.

She could mention she'd gotten her period that morning. But that felt wrong. Using the fact that her reproductive system was functioning at a full clip again to hint sex at him. This wasn't about babies. This was about him. And her. And babies would be a welcome side-effect, but...

The Jeep bounced and jostled as she pulled it into the driveway, which, for once, was empty except for Derek's Cayenne. Lexie and Alex had gone out for dinner or something. Meredith couldn't remember the details. She'd sort of spaced while Lexie had been babbling at her. Mark had gone to work because Lexie had had the day off, and he would be on shift for another twenty-four hours, most likely. Which meant Meredith would be alone. With Derek. Just him and her.

If there was ever a time to talk about sex, this would be it, but... Nerves clenched in her stomach.

Meredith grabbed her things and approached the house. Where would she find him, she wondered. Asleep? A monosyllabic, haggard lump on the couch? Sulking in his office? As she pushed through the door, the warm smell of something cooking made her stop. Inhale. The tension winding through her muscles relaxed instinctively. She dropped her purse, kicked off her shoes, and followed the vague sound of rushing water to the kitchen.

He stood at the counter by the sink, barefoot in a black t-shirt and frayed jeans. The water ran, and for a moment, she couldn't help but stand in the doorway and watch the way his shoulders moved as he scrubbed. He had great shoulders. And biceps. She loved his arms. Very sleek and toned.
Muscular, but not bulky like a bodybuilder or something. He'd lost a bit of mass since his surgery, but the sight of him in a snug-fitting shirt still made her lower body tighten.

The stove light was on. The vague white blob of her mother's old casserole dish glowed in the oven window. He'd fixed dinner, which made her smile. Fixing dinner was better than moping. By far. She sniffed the air, but all she could discern was that it smelled good. Her heart swelled. Maybe, he felt better, and he wouldn't treat her with boiling anger. Maybe. Finally.

“What did you make?” she asked as she entered the room, but he didn't turn. She walked across the floor, and something niggled. Something tiny. Something seemed wrong, but she couldn't put her finger on it.

She slid behind him, pushed her arms through his, and wrapped around his waist. Water sprayed everywhere. Glass crashed and broke. He backed into her, and she leaped backward, surprised at the sudden movement. Her back slammed into the opposite counter. The impact knocked the breath from her. He yelled. Loud enough to make her hair bristle and her body flinch. And then he darted away like his toes were on fire. She blinked as cold water dripped into her eyes. The faucet rushed.

He crouched defensively by the refrigerator, one white-knuckled hand wrapped around the handle, the other arm arched in front of his body like a shield. He panted, and he looked at her with wild, frenzied eyes that looked but didn't see. He swallowed, and a torn sound fell from his lips. Like on the catwalk when he'd been shot. A thin, white cord dangled from two white ear buds resting in his ears. The gold-colored connector flashed as it swayed in the air. His iPod lay on the ground, spinning. The glowing, white display caught her eyes, and she stared, hypnotized.

“I'm sorry,” she said when time resumed. The sound of her voice seemed to pull him out of it.

He lowered his arm and leaned into the counter next to the fridge in a seamless motion. He pulled the ear buds loose and dropped his face into his hands. The ear buds slipped to the floor by his feet. His torso rose and fell as his breaths filled his lungs and then emptied. “Meredith,” he said, his voice soft against his palms.

“It's me. I'm sorry.” She didn't know what to say. What could she say? She pushed away from the counter. He balked at the movement. She stillled, trying to calm the sound of her heartbeat throbbing in her ears into something less deafening. “I didn't mean to startle you,” she said over the sound of the rushing water and her heart. She didn't dare move to turn off the water. “I thought you could hear me when I walked in. I'm sorry.”

“It's okay,” he said, but he didn't sound okay. His voice seemed thready. Whisper-y. Like he couldn't keep enough air in his lungs to speak properly. And he wouldn't look at her, wouldn't lift his head from his hands. In the waning daylight, she couldn't see as well, but she saw his dark hair contrast against the cupboards. The edges of it blurred.

Shaking. He was shaking. She'd scared him that badly. With slow, protracted movements, she pushed away from the counter. She reached across the sink, and she turned off the water. The loud rush stopped, leaving only silence. She moved toward where he stood.

“Derek,” she said, and she tried to touch him. To squeeze his shoulder. To offer security. Anything.

When her palm brushed his shirt, he flipped around to face her like he expected some sort of attack from behind. “It's okay,” she said. “It's just me. It's just me, Derek.” Dilated with terror, his eyes had become paper-thin, indigo halos wrapped around the solid black of his pupils. “Meredith,” she said. “It's Meredith.”
He looked at her. “I'm...” he began, but the rest of his sentence got lost and never arrived. He looked around the kitchen as though it were new to him. Like he didn't know where he was. That vague, distant look she'd seen on his face the first time she'd brought him home.

“I'm sorry,” she repeated. “Derek, I'm so sorry.”

She watched his gaze as he peered at the sink, and then the opposite counter where he'd pushed her by accident. “Did I hurt you?” he said.

“What?” Meredith said. “No, I was just surprised.”

He laughed, but the sound fell on her ears like a razor cutting into glass. “Surprised,” he said. He pulled a hand through his hair. “I need to lie down,” he said. When he took a step, he stumbled and bumped into the fridge, and she watched, frozen as he retreated into the living room.

For minutes, all she could do was stare. She twitched toward the oven, and then the sink, and then the refrigerator, and then the kitchen door. Indecision nauseated her. She grunted, annoyed, and then she went to the sink.

He'd broken a drinking glass. The sharp, jagged pieces of it all collected in the sink with a scrub brush underneath the dirty pot he'd been working on. He must have dropped the pot on top. She shook her head. She took the pot to the trashcan, turned it over, and let the loose shards fall out. Then she used the scrub brush to sweep away the remaining pieces to throw away. She filled the pot with water and left it to soak for a minute.

She picked up his iPod and his headphones next, and she put them on the counter by the fridge. She sighed when she saw the song title. Police and Thieves. A Clash song. Apropos. She hit the skip button and left it sitting on Lightning Strikes (Not Once But Twice).

She made it to putting fresh plates on the dinette set table before she couldn't see anymore. She sniffed, and she stopped to wipe her face. She'd scared Derek. She'd really, really scared him. She'd gotten used to him tensing up if she touched him unexpectedly, particularly when she came behind him, and he didn't see it. That had been happening since almost day one. But she'd never wanted to... Now, she understood how Mark had felt when it'd happened to him. Awful. Gut-twisted. And her heart felt like somebody had made a fist around it and wrenched.

She'd been an idiot. She should have made sure he knew she was approaching before she'd done something as stupid as wrapping her arms around his waist, particularly when she'd just finished a session with Dr. Wyatt concerning his desire for her to touch him at all. Ingrained reflex cultured over months was going to be hard to overwrite, and this was...

She collapsed into the dinette chair and cried. This was freaking crap. That's what this was. All the careful plans she'd made in the car to bring up the sex situation died as she wept into her hands. How could she expect him to want sex after she'd scared him witless? Lexie, Alex, and Mark were all gone. He'd been making dinner for her and her alone, and she'd wrecked it.

Over the last week-and-a-half since his release from the hospital, he'd dug out a 5000 piece puzzle. From where, she had no idea. The puzzle was a picture of the sunrise by the Bass Harbor Lighthouse in Maine. He worked on that at the dining room table, or he flipped channels for hours without watching anything, or he slept. She'd once found him staring blankly at the television screen while Mark's car game flashed in fascinating color before his dead eyes. He didn't fix dinner, or make coffee, or clean, or do any of the things he'd done when he'd first gotten home after his heart surgery.
She stared at the oven. He'd been trying not to mope for the first time since his pneumonia, and she'd wrecked it. She'd wrecked everything. She glanced at the timer on the oven. She had no idea what he'd thrown together. The temperature said 350. The timer said thirty minutes to go. She thought about opening the oven to check on it, but she didn't want to ruin anything.

Derek didn't cook very often, but he could, unlike her. He wouldn't ever be a professional chef or anything. He didn't like to experiment with ingredients or make the recipes his own or whatever, but he could grab any cookbook and make anything in it, and it tasted good, great, or excellent.

Follow directions. I know it's difficult, sometimes, he'd said with a wink when she'd asked him once how he did it.

I do follow directions, Meredith had said. It rarely results in anything other than kitchen fires.

Just don't tell your patients, he'd replied. They wouldn't want you fixing their innards when you can't even fix a baked potato.

Ass, she'd said.

The sound of Derek's laughter laved her ears, and she smiled at the memory. She wiped her eyes, and she stood. She walked through the dining room into the living room. His puzzle lay half-finished on the dining room table. He'd constructed the lighthouse and some of the craggy rocks underneath. The harder portion of the puzzle, all the blue water and pastels of the sunrise, he'd started on, but hadn't finished.

He'd collapsed on the couch on his side, arms wrapped around his midsection like he felt sick to his stomach. His back faced the room, and he faced the cushions, as though even in sleep he tried to protect his fragile innards from harm. His Percocet bottle sat on the coffee table, the white cap resting next to it. A lump formed in her throat. She hoped he hadn't hurt himself when he'd jumped away from her.

She pushed the coffee table away, and she settled herself by the couch. By his feet, not his face. She didn't want him to roll over, wake up, and have a person inches from his eyeballs. She didn't want to frighten him. That was the last thing she wanted. She leaned back her head, and she rested, eyes half-lidded, listening to him breathe.

Meredith, you can't keep taking time off like this, Chief Webber had said.

She'd gripped her cell phone so tightly her hands hurt. I know. But he's sick. He's really sick, and I can't come to work right now. I don't care if it's unpaid leave. I'll be back as soon as he's out of the hospital, but not now.

There's not much more I can do for you. I've already pulled all the strings I have. There will be consequences.

I know, she'd said. I don't care.

The oven alarm went off after an eternity. He didn't budge at first. She whispered, “Derek,” and he made a deep, resentful noise, but didn't move. Five more minutes, she imagined him begging. “Derek, your thing is done,” she said. She wanted to touch his leg, to give him some tactile stimulus to wake up, but she wasn't sure what was safe anymore, wasn't sure about anything at all. “Derek,” she said.

When he rolled over and sat up, a muzzy look on his face, she smiled. “Hey,” she said.
Her smile faded when he looked at her. “Hey,” he said, his voice thick with sleep, and his eyes glazed and spacey. He didn't smile in return. She wondered how many pills he'd taken. He stood, and he left her sitting on the floor without further comment.

She followed. “Derek, are you okay?” she said as she watched him take the steaming casserole from the oven. His biceps bunched, and his hands scrunched the potholders.

“I'm fine,” he said.

“You're not hurting?”

“I said I'm fine,” he snapped.

“Okay,” she said, not wanting to argue with him.

They ate in silence. He'd made some sort of tuna thing with noodles and crunchy bits, and it probably would have tasted great if she'd been in any sort of mood to eat. Instead, she just felt sick. He stared at his plate, and he didn't talk, and the oppressive silence choked her. She debated throwing a dish on the floor or something. Just to get him to react or... something. Anything.

“What's the crunchy stuff?” she asked, desperate.

“Potato chips.”

“You made something with potato chips?”

“Apparently,” he said.

“But...”

“I thought you'd like it,” he said.

Which made her feel like a jerk on top of everything else. She hadn't even said thank you when he'd dished her some. “I do,” she said. “I do like it. Thank you.” And then she couldn't take it anymore. “Derek, would you please talk to me?”

His fork tinkled as he rested it on his plate. “About what?”

“Anything. Please. Anything you want. Tell me another story. Or, you could tell me about lint. I just...”

He swallowed, and he picked at the edge of the table with his nails. He sniffed, and his breaths sped up like he wanted to burst into tears, but then she watched him swallow them back, and he sat there. In the chair. Eyes red and watery. His whole demeanor wounded. He didn't speak about his past, lint, or anything else.

“I'm sorry,” he said to his lap. He looked like he wanted to throw up.

She didn't know him. She didn't know this man sitting across the table from her. She didn't know anything about him, and all her resolve to be sensitive splintered and snapped like a pencil in the grip of an angry grade student with too much homework.

“Sorry isn't a freaking subject,” she said. “I can't take this anymore. Derek, I'm... I want...”

He gripped the table, and he looked at her. “What's wrong?” he said, his tone desperate, pleading. Like he wanted anything to latch onto. Anything to fix that wasn't his own problem.
You're wrong, she wanted to say. Everything's wrong. Sensitively, Dr. Wyatt had said. This wasn't sensitive. This was a freaking two-by-four to the face. She needed to regroup and try again later. She couldn't... “Nothing's wrong,” she grumbled. She took a deep breath.

“Something's wrong, Meredith.”

She crossed her arms. “You pick the most annoying times to be a freaking mind reader.”

“You'd rather I be obtuse?”

_I'd rather you be you_, she wanted to say. She clenched her teeth. “I don't think this is a good time to talk about this. In fact, I think it's a very bad time.”

“Talk about what? What are we talking about?”

“We're not talking about anything, because it's not a good time!”

His gaze darkened. “I'm not four, Meredith. You can take off the fucking kid gloves.”

Fury clenched in her stomach. It coiled into a tight, cold ball and spun in her abdomen like a black hole, sucking everything into it. How had he managed to flip this around on her? Whether he meant to or not, he'd gotten used to people not fighting back with him, and he'd started using that as a weapon and a suit of armor wrapped into one. How dare he make her reticence into an attack on him, when she had tried so hard to... The world flashed red. The backs of her knees hit her chair. She stood, and the chair toppled behind her. She slammed her hand on the table. Everything rattled. He flinched at the noise and the sudden movement, and his bald look of fear made her gut twist, half with satisfaction, and half with horror.

“This is about sex,” she snapped. “I want it.” Now, now, now. What was she? Two? Her fingers clenched.

“Oh,” he said.

“Yeah, oh,” she said, mocking his stupefied tone. She couldn't stop herself. Relentless, she pressed onward. “You used to talk about wanting sex. And I thought you were working yourself up to it. But then you got sick, and you didn't want me to touch you, and you haven't said a word about sex since then, and I don't know what that means. I need to know what that means, Derek.”

“Oh.”

“Derek, I love you,” she said, which sounded so utterly wrong to her ears when she was yelling and spitting at him. “And now I've almost lost you twice, and it's been more than five weeks since we've had sex, and I need you. I don't want to pressure you, but I need you really badly, and if you're not interested because I've done something wrong, I want to know. I want to know, now. Tell me.”

She panted as the wind left her sails. She swallowed, and she brushed flyaway hair from from her eyes. Her skin felt searing hot. Burning. He sat in his chair, his head in his hands. He'd stopped looking at her about midway through her rant. He'd gotten quiet. And he didn't fight back or hiss or snarl. Nausea quailed in her gut. This wasn't right. Nothing was right.

He drew a hand through his hair. “I'm sorry,” he said.

“Don't tell me you're sorry, damn it,” she said. “Tell me why you don't want sex. Tell me what I did wrong.”
“I do want sex.”

She crossed her arms over her chest. “With me.”

His face reddened, and he looked up from his hands. “No, I'd rather fuck Addison.”

A knife twisted in her gut, and tears popped loose. She backed away. “You're an asshole,” she said.

He stood. His eyes had rimmed with red, and when he blinked, his expression mirrored her own. Loose, glittery tears ran in busy tracks down his cheeks. He stared at her, a dark, tortured expression quivering on his face. He looked down at his barely touched plate, and then at the pot still full of casserole. He swallowed. And then he left the room.

Running away from confrontation. Just like he always freaking did. Where did he get off, calling her a lemon and broken when he did the same freaking thing for different reasons? Hypocrite. Ass. She swallowed around the grapefruit taking residence in her throat. She wiped her face. She took a deep breath. And then she chased after him. Not this time. She was not letting him end their fight by slamming a figurative door in her face.

Panic burbled in her gut when she saw him with his hand outstretched, reaching for the front door. He was going to leave. He was—

“Don't you dare!” she said, and he froze. She closed the distance between them, and she slipped between him and the door. “You're not leaving. We're not done.”

He breathed in her space. His warm skin, inches from hers, called like a siren. She wanted to wrap her arms around him. She wanted to lean into his heat and his strength and let him make it better. He always did that. When he was healthy and fine, he always did that. She knew he wouldn't, this time. She trembled, blocking the door. She reached behind her back and turned the deadbolt. It clicked in the heavy silence.

“I was just going to sit on the swing,” he said.

“You were going to leave,” she said.

He leaned against the door, resting his forehead against the cool wood. He laughed, more like a sob than anything else. “Where would I go, Meredith?”

“I don't know.”

“I can't drive. I can walk two blocks. Maybe three. I...” He blinked. He pressed against her body, and he breathed. Breathed her in. She felt his nose at her hair, and when she closed her eyes, she could pretend that everything was back to the way it had been.

You're hovering.

No. I'm breathing you in.

“I do want to have sex with you,” he said.

“Well, you have a screwy way of showing it.”

He sighed. “I told you I wanted to wait until—”

“But you're walking a lot,” she protested, interrupting him. “You're in physical therapy, now. Your pain is much better. You kicked the pneumonia. You wouldn't just be lying there, Derek. You're much better.” She thought of his open pill bottle on the coffee table. “Your pain is much better, right?”

“Yes, but, Mere, I...” His voice trailed away, and she hated to watch him. Lost. Broken. He slammed the flat of his palm into the door, which rocked on its hinges, and then he moved away. Toward the living room. He collapsed onto the couch with a sigh, and she bit her lip. She wanted to finish this. Badly. But if he needed to rest...

She shook her head. If he needed to rest, he could sit like he was, and he would be fine. An honest discussion wouldn't freaking kill him. She chased after him. He sat on the left corner. She sat on the middle cushion. She wouldn't give him space. She felt obnoxious, and mean, and all sorts of pushy, but they needed this.

If he said no, she would stop needling him, she promised herself. If he ever said no. Silence wasn't no. Looking mopey and sad wasn't no. Walking away wasn't no. He had to say it. N. O. No.

He blinked. He put his face in his hands against his knees. “I can't use my arms,” he said. “I try every morning in the shower, but—”

“Every morning?”

“Yes, every morning!” he snapped. “I want to have sex with my wife. But I can't take my weight without it hurting, and I—”

“So freaking what?” she said.

He glared at her, like she'd just lambasted his love of ferryboats, or told him that his trailer made her laugh. His voice dropped low. “What do you mean, so what?”

“We don't have to make love in a bed,” she said. “There are plenty of ways we can have sex without you being prone. We've done them before.”

He looked at her. “But it's not the same.”

“What's not the same?”

“You can't compare lying in bed together for hours with a quickie on the kitchen counter,” he said.

She sighed as the ghost of his soft laughter hit her ears. He'd pushed a stack of cereal boxes out of the way, lifted her like her weight competed with a grain of sand, and pushed her onto the counter. So, this is wedded bliss or whatever, she'd said.

No, he'd said. She'd gasped as he'd sheathed himself with her body. This is wedded bliss.

They hadn't spent more than fifteen minutes there, but she'd loved every moment of it. How the hell could she get him to understand she didn't expect a marathon out of the gate? How the hell could she get him to stop expecting himself to perform a marathon out of the gate, regardless of her desires?

“We can figure something out,” she said. “If we actually try.”

“But I don't want to have to try,” he said.

“Well, you're being a stubborn idiot, then,” she said.
His fingers clenched against his jeans. He looked away. A wet sound filled the air, and his shoulders shook as he tried to shield his misery from her.

She bit her lip. Nausea rolled in her stomach. Why did he have to make this feel like she was kicking a freaking puppy? She touched his shoulder. When he didn't tense, she leaned against his back, and she wrapped her arms around his body. The sound of her skin as she touched his shirt rasped in the silence. She rested against him, and he leaned backward. Into it. Into her embrace. A thrill of hope spiraled into her.

“Look, I get that this is something you need right now. Being able to contribute to the act instead of just receiving,” she said. She kissed the nape of his neck. “But you don't have to wait until things are perfect again. I know right now wouldn't be perfect. It might not even be good or great. But I need you.” She pulled loose fingers through his hair. “I need you. I care about you, and you almost died, and just being with you would be perfect. Five minutes or an hour or whatever. I don't care. But I need it, Derek. Please.”

“Five minutes would be embarrassing,” he said.

“It shouldn't be.”

He pulled away, and she let him go.

“I'm...” He swallowed, and the bitter, dark look on his face made her hurt. “I'm really not in the mood right now.”

“Well, I didn't mean right this second,” she said.

“But you would do it, if I was in the mood,” he countered.

“Of course I would.” She touched his shoulder again. He didn't tense. “Are you even listening to a word I'm saying? I need you. The rest doesn't matter to me.”

“I'm listening,” he said. He heaved a weary, shaky breath, wrapped his arms around his stomach, and then he dropped over his knees to stare at the floor.

She bit her lip. A car with a half-busted muffler drove past, and the windows rattled. The world outside had darkened. She hadn't even noticed they were arguing in the dark. She flipped on the lamp on the other side of the couch and resettled. The clock she'd put on the mantle ticked. She stared into space.

The warm scent of tuna and cheese and potato chips had saturated the house, and she swallowed as the grapefruit returned to her throat. Cheese and potato chips were like dietary hara-kiri. Maybe he knew he didn't have much to lose, given how underweight he was. It didn't matter. The fact that he'd made it for her...

“What did I do wrong?” she said. “In the hospital. I want to know.”

He looked away. “It didn't feel good.”

“What didn't? When?”

“When you touched me.”

She turned. “But you let me touch you on the face...”
He sighed. His lips parted. The sound was an empty syllable, like he'd lost his voice again. He took a deep breath. “I can't explain.”

She put her palm on his thigh. He didn't flinch. She rubbed from the crease where his leg turned into hip, all the way to his knee. The gesture didn't seem to bother him. She settled into what she hoped was a reassuring, comforting rhythm. Thigh to knee. Thigh to knee. “Please, try, Derek,” she said. “Please.”

He put his elbow on the arm of the couch and rested against it. He stared, his expression blank, at the far wall. “The curtain came open,” he said.

“What curtain?”

“The one around the bed,” he said. He blink, blink, blinked, but that didn't stop the sudden renewal of tears on his face. “And I was naked.”

She remembered the moment in fine detail, like it'd been flash frozen in her brain.

Pneumonia was one of the leading causes of death in the United States. If Derek had been healthy to begin with, she wouldn't have worried, but his immune system had been totaled by stress and depression, he'd had surgery that interfered with his ability to cough, and his fever had gotten wildly out of control. Generally speaking, anything over 105 was considered potentially life-threatening. 106 meant likely brain damage. When he'd hit 104.4 and kept going up, the doctors had gotten concerned. He'd been hallucinating and lethargic, and his blood-oxygen levels had gotten so low they'd discussed putting him on a ventilator. She'd spent most of the night crying all over Mark, and the few minutes she'd spent with Derek, he'd either been staring blankly into space or croaking at Gary Clark to leave him alone.

She'd come up early after a nurse had come to the waiting room to tell her his respiration and temperature had improved instead of gotten worse, for once. She'd wanted to see him. Wanted to reassure herself. An orderly had stopped her outside of Derek's cubicle. It's not visiting hours yet, he'd said, and she'd fought him tooth and claw.

She couldn't even remember what she'd said to get past him at this point. When Derek's heart monitor had shrieked about a flat line, her stomach had dropped out of her body. She'd opened the curtain. Derek had been standing naked by his bed, his eyes glassy and unfocused, and she'd run for him without thinking about anything other than the fact that he would fall, and his catheter could rip out, or he'd tear the vein in his wrist when his IV ran out of slack, or he'd smack into the bed platform and give himself a bloody concussion. She'd run, and all she'd been thinking about was keeping him off the floor. She hadn't thought about the curtain.

“When I ran to catch you, I left it open,” she said, swallowing. It wasn't something she could regret, sacrificing his modesty to save him from physical harm. But...

“Yes,” he said. “And I...”

“You what?” she pressed. “Derek, you what?”

He grunted against his hand. Tears slicked his face. He didn't try to wipe them away, but he wouldn't look at her. “I was so sick, I couldn't even cover myself, and I...”

She leaned into him. “You?”

“When you touched me, and that nurse touched me, and I couldn't say no, I just...”
He pulled in a breath. Once. Twice. He scrunched his hands in his hair and yanked. And then he burst. “It was the last straw,” he said. “I need to have a say about my life, and I didn't have...” A sob skipped loose, and he moaned. “Anything. I haven't had anything since he shot me, and I can't do it anymore. I can't.”

He looked at her, and she wanted to melt into the crevices between the cushions. His hair stuck up all over. He had a dark rash of stubble over his face and down his throat, which contrasted sickly with his bloodless face. Bloodshot blue eyes rimmed with red peered at her. He looked exhausted. Like he hadn't slept well in days. He probably hadn't. And he looked starved. His angular face, all sharp points and bones, didn't have a single ounce of extra anymore.

She'd been so freaking wrapped up in being annoyed with how awful he'd been lately to her and to Mark that she hadn't considered him beyond how he was making her life miserable. Hadn't considered him as a person who had bone-deep issues regarding control. She'd let it get this way with her hands-off approach. This was her fault.

He rocked back and forth, stuck in the grips of gut-wrenching sobs. She shifted, and she pulled him against her. He was jelly in her arms. Unresisting. Pliant. She rubbed his back, and she sat there, quivering with nauseating disquiet. She didn't know this man, this stranger with Derek's face. Gary Clark had damaged much more than simple flesh. She closed her eyes and pictured Derek's soul. Mr. Clark had shot a gaping, jagged hole through it.

“I'm sorry,” she said. She kissed his shoulder through his shirt. “I didn't mean to make you feel like that.”

He scrunched a tent of her shirt. “He took my dignity, Meredith. I don't have anything.”

I have no dignity left at all, he'd said.

He stole everything from me, he'd said.

Disconnected pieces of the puzzle formed a straight edge with a solid picture.

“You have me,” Meredith said. “I'm not going anywhere.”

“But I don't own anything. Nothing is...” His voice trailed away. He pulled away from her, and he stared at his arm. His wrist had an old scar on it. A dot on his flesh that told her where the intravenous line after his surgery had been placed. The back of his hand had a fresher mark from when he'd been admitted for pneumonia. “Since he shot me,” Derek said, “I've been bathed by other people. And shaved. And dressed. And fed. Dozens of people have seen me naked.” He took a jagged breath and exhaled. “I've had my penis handled by employees who I have to interact with on a daily basis, employees who make monetary bets about how McDreamy I am in bed.” He looked at her. “I can't stop crying. I've peed on myself, Meredith. I'm a grown man, and I can't even hold my bladder.”

“You were scared, Derek,” she said. “That's a natural response to—”

“But I'm always scared,” he confessed. “And I can't make it stop.”

I want to stop seeing him over my shoulder and in the mirror and when I wake up and in my dreams and everywhere, he'd said.

She rested her hand on his thigh. His muscle twitched. “Scared of what?” she said. “Of being killed?”

“Of everything,” he said. “I can't even relax in my own home. I'm...” He swallowed. “I don't enjoy anything anymore. I just want to get to the next minute.”

I want to be able to get through an hour of my life without feeling like this, he'd said.

She swallowed. “Do you think maybe an alarm system or something would help?”

He shrugged. “I don't know.”

“Well, it couldn't hurt, could it?”

“I guess not,” he said, but he sounded like he'd already doomed the idea to failure. He pushed his hands against his thighs and stood with a wince. He wouldn't look at her again. He turned and wandered through the dining room toward the kitchen.

But he hadn't said no. Hadn't said stop. She stood, and she followed him. After weeks of not talking, not really saying anything, he'd finally started opening up a bit. Getting him to speak was like poking an insect with a toothpick, over and over and over, and it made her feel like crap. But he spoke. She'd learned more in the past hour than she had in the entire month since he'd been shot.

He picked up the casserole dish and covered it with plastic wrap. She rinsed the dishes. “I'm sorry,” she said as she turned off the water. The faucet dripped. He closed the refrigerator door and stared at her. She took a breath. “I shouldn't have pressured you. I'm being selfish, and not sensitive, and I—”

“You're my wife,” he said. “It shouldn't be taboo for you to ask for sex. It shouldn't be taboo for you to talk to me about anything.”

“It's not,” she replied. “This is sort of a special circumstance.”

He slammed his hand against the refrigerator door. Four magnets went flying. A menu fell to the ground, followed by a ream of pizza coupons. “I don't want this to be a special circumstance,” he said. He hit the fridge again, and it shook. “I want it to be like it was.” Again. “I want me to be like I was.” His lip quivered. He looked at his palm like his need for violence disgusted him. “I don't know what's wrong with me.”

When he dropped his gaze to the floor and didn't move, she settled next to him. The refrigerator skidded under their weight and stopped. Derek flinched, and the way his eyes jerked to assess the situation made her heart squeeze. She didn't know Derek anymore, but she didn't love him any less. She kissed his shoulder through his shirt as he shook in her arms. She rubbed his back, and he leaned against her, into her space, reluctant at first, and then he settled. His breathing hitched, and she realized, again, what a freaking idiot she'd been.

She hadn't touched him all week except during times of necessity, not even when he'd been sick and hurting and unable to get up on his own. He hadn't said anything, but he had to have noticed and internalized the inadvertent message she'd been sending. She kept whining that she didn't know him anymore. That Derek had become a stranger. But he seemed more bewildered by it, more unhappy about it, than she did.

She closed her eyes, and she inhaled his warm, musky scent. Her nose rubbed his shirt. She petted his arms, and she thought about the packet she'd left folded in her purse. The one about assault victims.
“You can't just be fine after something like this,” she told him. “Nobody is.”

“Alex is,” he said. “You are. Everybody is but me.”

“Alex is a freaking iceberg, Derek. Ninety-nine percent of what's going on in his head, you'll never see. I sincerely doubt he's fine, and I imagine his whole life-is-great Broadway musical routine will crash and burn just like mine did after I drowned. It's fake.”

She gasped when he shifted, and his warm body enveloped hers. He kissed her hairline, and then he rested his chin against her forehead. She blinked at the unexpected, silent support. The room blurred. She tilted her head into his chest and cried against his shirt. His soft, unhindered breaths thundered in her ears. No pops or crackles or fluid sounds filled his lungs. His heart beat. His warm skin reassured her. Warm, but not fever hot. And he had such great arms. His body shifted to accommodate her as she moved. He said nothing, but he held her. For minutes and minutes and minutes. A deep chorus of crickets filtered through the closed windows. Beyond that, the world hovered in silence.

“I'm not fine,” she admitted after she'd gathered her resolve. “And I'm a liar. I lied to you.”

“It's okay,” he said. “I'm sorry I haven't been there for you. I don't know—”

“I'm seeing Dr. Wyatt,” she clarified.

“Dr. Wyatt,” he echoed. He kept stroking her, kept holding her. “Isn't she a therapist at Seattle—”

His hands stopped moving. “Oh.”

“Yeah.”

“About the miscarriage?” he said.

She squeezed her eyes shut as she pictured the puzzle pieces assembling in his head. She didn't want to do this, but she had to. It wasn't fair to him not to know. And if he knew, she could give him the pamphlet. And that might... It might help.

“Sort of,” she said.

He stepped backward and looked her in the eyes. The confusion slathered on his face made her want to run. Run before the earthquake. “How do you sort of see a therapist about a miscarriage?” he said.

“It's...” Her voice cracked. “It's more to do with you.”

He frowned. “Me.”

“I was really worried,” she said. “I'm still really worried.”

“About me.”

“Yes, about you.”

He dropped his hands. Her eyes watered. She wiped her face, bereft. “You need to see a therapist because of me,” he said. His voice had dropped in pitch. His gaze darkened.

“Derek, it's not like that.”

“Well, what's it like?” he said. “Because it's sounding like—”
“I'm seeing a therapist because of me,” she corrected him. “I love you, and I want to help you, and I don't know how. It's not like there's a manual on this sort of thing.” Just a damned pamphlet.

His lips parted. He made a hollow, lost sound, and he backed up another step. “Do you talk to her?” he asked. “About what I've said?”

“I sort of have to, so she can help me,” Meredith said. He nodded, and his wary expression flattened into something dead. Just like that. Like a light switch had been thrown. No love, no anger. Just dead. She had a ludicrous, wild image in her head of the play Julius Caesar. She stood there in a toga holding a jagged knife.

Et tu, Brute?

She shook her head. “Please, say something,” she said. “I'm sorry. I'm—”

He shrugged. “It's fine.”

Her eyebrows shot up. “It is?”

“Sure,” he said. His eyes creased, and the awful flatness became a glare and a nasty, wounded snarl. “What's one more episode of the Naked Derek Show for the employees of Seattle Grace?”

He turned on his heels. She chased after him as he stalked down the hall. He flipped on the hallway lights. His feet hit the stairs.

“Derek, it's not like that,” she said.

He stopped and wheeled to face her. She nearly plowed into him. He grimaced, and his eyes flashed with fury. “Did you talk to her about sex, too? Sex with me?” he snapped. “Is that why this is such a big deal to you today?” His hot breaths hit her face. He continued up the steps, his legs growing more wobbly as he went. She had to slow down to stay behind him, and he roared with frustration when he had to lean against the banister.

“I talked to her about sex, but it's a big deal because I love you, not because I talked to her,” she insisted. She wanted to assure him she hadn't given any details, but her stomach roiled. She'd told Dr. Wyatt about his nighttime erections. He'd probably consider that a big freaking detail.

Derek reached the top of the steps, and he stopped, panting. His squeezed his eyes shut, and he drew a shaky hand through his hair. His knees buckled, and he looked like he needed to collapse from the exertion, but he fell against the wall and caught his weight with his shoulder instead. “Does she know I pissed myself, too?” he said.

She couldn't meet his eyes. “Yes.”

“God, damn it, Meredith!” he said. He thudded down the hall, and he slammed the bedroom door in her face. Paintings in the hallway crashed to the ground. A dog barked somewhere outside. The crickets remained a constant, undulating wave of sound. He hadn't said no, she told herself. She hadn't once heard the word no or stop.

She took a breath, grabbed the knob, and followed him into the lion's den. He stood by his drawer. “Get out,” he hissed.

“No,” she said.

He pulled a pair of pajamas loose and slammed the drawer shut. He stomped across the room and bore down on her. She backed into the door with a thud. He leaned into her space, close, menacing. “Get out!” he yelled in her face. His pearly teeth flashed centimeters away. His skin had turned a deep shade of red.

I said leave! Meredith! Leave!

“Shut up,” she spat back at him. “Just shut up.” She took a breath. He wasn't giving her any space. He hovered against her, eyes blazing, fever-bright with anger. She took his rage. She funneled it into herself. And then she gave it back to him. “You're not allowed to be angry about this,” she said. “I've worked my ass off trying to keep your confidence. You want to know why I'm talking to Dr. Wyatt? You really want to know why?”

“Because I knew I couldn't talk to Cristina, or you'd react just like this, and I haven't, Derek. I haven't said a word to Cristina because I knew it would be important to you,” Meredith said. “I know Dr. Wyatt from before. She doesn't gossip. And she helped me. She really helped me, and I —”

“What do you mean, you know her from before?”

She slid away from the door. He didn't stop her. “How the hell do you think I got all whole and healed for you, Derek? Do you think I just flipped a freaking switch?”

He blinked. “You saw a therapist?”

“Yes, I saw a therapist. I saw Dr. Wyatt,” she said. Her eyes burned. “I wanted to be with you, but you wanted things that I didn't know how to give, and she helped me.”

He sat on his side of the bed with a heavy thud. The pajamas he'd liberated from the chest-of-drawers lay against his lap, and he stared at them, soft in his hands. “Oh,” he said.

She sat next to him. Her throat tightened at his upset expression. The unadulterated anger had mixed and twisted and swirled with other black emotions. She couldn't decide if what she saw now was better or worse. She touched his back. His muscles tensed under her hand like a tripwire, ready to set off an explosion, and he didn't look at her. She swallowed.

“I swear, Derek,” she said. “I wouldn't be talking to her if I didn't think she was discreet and a hundred percent professional. I didn't want this. I didn't want you to be angry. I just needed help.”

A deep sound rumbled in his throat. He glowered. “I don't want you to need help.”

“I don't either, but this happened, Derek. You were shot, and we have to deal with this. We have to deal with this. It's not just about you. It hasn't been since day one.”

He collapsed onto his side with a heaving breath. His pajama pants fell to the floor. He grabbed a pillow, and he squeezed it against him. “He did take everything,” Derek said. The emotional barometer in the room shifted. His lower lip quivered. He broke like he'd stepped on a minefield. Dark and twisty rage became a flash flood. He blinked, and tears glittered in the dim light. “He took everything from me,” he said. He rolled his face into the pillow and breathed shivery, jagged breaths.

She put her hand on his side. Her fingers found the ripples of his ribs, and she stroked him armpit to hip. She shifted. The mattress sank under her knee, and she climbed over his body. She pushed pillows and blankets and sheets away. She settled behind him, and wrapped her arms around his waist. “He'll never take me, Derek. I'm here. And I always will be.”

“Dr. Wyatt helped you with that, too?” he said, his voice low and raw and muffled by the pillow.

She stared at his back, and she kissed the space between his shoulder blades. “She did,” she said. “She really did.”

His body shifted. The pillow rustled. He sniffed. “Remind me to send her a thank you note,” he said, and then he didn't speak anymore. She rested along his length, quiet. He shook, and he said nothing. Not a word.

“It's okay,” she said. “Derek, it'll be okay. Maybe not tomorrow. Or next week. But it will be. If I can be here, wrapped around you, not running and not wanting to run after all this, we can be okay. Eventually. It just won't be a surgical fix.”

She couldn't tell if he was even listening. He sighed, deep and long and low. His torso filled her arms, and then he deflated. His breaths stretched evenly. At least he'd stopped crying.

The door slammed downstairs. She winced as she heard Alex and Lexie tromp through the door, their footsteps heavy in the foyer below. Derek flinched, and she squeezed his hip. Alex said something in a deep timbre, and Lexie laughed in response. The television snapped on.

“What do you want a beer?” Alex called.

“Yeah, bring me one,” replied Lexie.

The channels hopped and skipped until the loud, rushing, rumble of a crowd filled the house. A sports announcer reported a home run. Beer bottles clinked.

Meredith pulled her fingers through Derek's hair. She knew he hated roommates. He hated everything about her house situation with its constant revolving door of inhabitants, but he stayed there, and he didn't pressure her to fix it. He was sick and hurt. He liked privacy. He liked his space. He still hadn't complained. Not once.

He'd made her an unhealthy dinner on a whim, just as a treat to her. When she'd needed to be held, before she'd dropped the nuclear therapy bomb on him, he'd held her despite his own emotional wasteland. She inhaled. He had the same deep, male scent she'd always loved. Intoxicating and comforting at the same time.

He'd yelled and screamed and spat at her, but she'd done the same to him, and she'd never felt physically threatened. Even when he'd crowded her by the door. He'd been trying to scare her. Trying to drive her off. Puffed himself up like big peacock or a scared cat or something. But she'd known on a deep level he had no follow through, and his scare tactics hadn't worked.

He did want her to touch him. The setting, not the act, was what had been inappropriate. And she should have realized that. Should have thought. Should have... considered. Just for a second. Her husband was a private person. Very private. He didn't like the gossip or the silly nicknames. He touched and kissed her at Seattle Grace, but rarely when they had an audience. He'd been lain out on display, helpless and unclothed, and she should have thought about how he would feel about being intimately touched in that setting.

And he did want sex.

You know what says thank you like nothing else?
She kissed him once. Again. Maybe not such a stranger after all. Her Derek. He'd just gotten lost. And she'd been a freaking idiot.

“I'm really sorry about what I did,” she said. “In the hospital. I never wanted you to feel...” She swallowed. Something sharp stabbed her esophagus, bisected her to the stomach, and her throat felt like it was closing up. She swallowed again. She'd touched him, not intending to be sexual about it, but, really, how the hell was he supposed to interpret her playing with his nipple? “I never wanted you to feel violated. I never wanted that. Not ever. I'm very sorry. And I'm sorry about the sponge bath. I thought it would help. Being from me instead of a stranger, I thought... I'm sorry.”

Silence. She wished she could see his face. Anything.

“I know you didn't mean to do it,” he said after a long time. His shoulders hitched. “The bath felt good.”

She blinked against tears. “It did?”

“Yeah.”

“I thought...”

He sighed. “I didn't like needing it.”

The sheets and pillows rustled. He moved. Clumsily. His jeans stuck on the sheets. She backed away from him to let him roll, and she bit her lip when she saw him wince. He settled on his left side, his damaged side. His eyes creased with discomfort, but his expression evened after several moments. She lay next to him, inches from his face, her body flush with his.

“Receiving it from you was nice, though,” he said.

“Really?”

His gaze shifted away, and his face tinged red. She didn't press it. She didn't want him to be embarrassed about needing help. She rubbed his stomach as she tried to think back, tried to recall when he'd attempted speech, and when he hadn't spoken and... He'd been sick. He'd been so sick, he couldn't bathe himself or eat or stand. She'd been a paranoid freak about him not responding to every question with abundant reassurance. He had said it was okay early on. That should have been enough for her.

“I'm sorry about tonight, too,” she said. “About everything. The last thing I wanted was to upset you. Thank you for dinner.”

“I shouldn't have yelled at you,” he said. “You need somebody to talk to.”

The sick look in his eyes made her sniffle, and she resisted the urge to justify why she hadn't chosen him to be that somebody. “I should have told you sooner,” she said.

He grunted, and he didn't disagree, but he didn't condemn her either. He blinked. She stared into his eyes, deep, endless depths of blue. His pupils had long since corrected themselves from terror to correspond with the light level, and he seemed, well, almost normal. Flecks of dark, royal blue interspersed with lighter, ice shades. Darkish almost-black rimmed his irises. His pupils reflected her face. She stared, and his irises tightened. His gaze didn't seem glassy anymore. Her Derek. Hers. The man who'd told her with an delighted, relaxed smile that he'd been in love with her forever.
She pushed her nose against his, and a small smile tipped his lips upward as their foreheads bumped. She pushed her socked toe against his bare foot and slipped under his pant leg. His eyes crinkled.

“What are you doing?” he said.

“Beats me,” she said. She pressed her lips against his, and he inhaled. His hand gripped her waist and squeezed. She kissed him again and again and again, until she lost the sound of the rumbling television and the voices below them. His stubble scratched at her face, and it hurt, but she didn't care. He tasted a bit like tuna, but she didn't care. She stroked his lip with her tongue. When the room began to fuzz, she finally had to pull away to catch her breath.

He winced, and he rolled off his wounded side and onto his back. His hands came to rest on his abdomen as he panted. She pushed against his shoulder. He shifted, and his arm wrapped around her body. She rested the flat of her cheek against the soft space where his pectoral muscle melded into the fibers of his deltoid. His heart thrummed underneath his sternum, and she listened as she rubbed his stomach. Her palm rustled against his shirt.

“What did you have in mind when you said not a bed?” he said.

She kissed his throat. “No,” she said.

“No?”

“I'm not letting you have sex with me right now.”

He turned his chin against her. “You're not?” he said. His voice rumbled against her ear through his chest, and she smiled. She liked that sound. His lilting tenor tones humming through bone and flesh.

“No,” she said. “I pressured you. We had a bad fight, and you're still a little upset. It really wouldn't be perfect if we did it right now.”

He didn't respond right away, didn't disagree, and she knew she'd hit the mark. She raised her head to peer at him. He pondered the ceiling. She kissed his jawline, and a vague smile tugged at his lips. “How about a week from tonight?” he said.

She put her head back down. “Why a week?” she asked as she stared across the plane of his soft black shirt.

“My weight restriction will be lifted to forty pounds, and that will make two weeks of physical therapy,” he said. His lips pressed against her forehead, and he kissed her.

“I like that plan,” she said. “How was PT today, anyway?”

A bark of deprecating laughter stuttered in his chest. “It hurt, Mere.”

She sighed. “The sternum is one of the worst bones to break.”

“It's getting a little better,” he said.

She ran an index finger down his center. He had a swollen, rough bump at the top near his neck, and the long, raised scar felt jagged under her fingertip. She didn't press. His muscles didn't tense. She did it once more, memorizing every piece of his first wound. Then she shifted to the bullet wound. She didn't touch that. He'd said once that it hurt when he pressed or poked, and she didn't want to risk it. She flattened her palm and rested over his heart. His nipple puckered through his shirt, and she touched him, rubbed him, trying to erase the bad feelings she'd instilled there in the hospital.

He drew a deep, relaxed breath.

“I got my period, by the way,” she said. “This morning.”

“Is that what brought this on?”

“No,” she said. “I want a baby, but I need you, Derek. I need you.”

“I need you, too,” he said. “I always need you.”

She stroked his abdomen with her palm. She wandered lower, past his bellybutton. His skin quivered under his shirt. She slipped under the hemline and touched the line of soft fuzz that trailed from his navel, down and down.

“May I touch you?” she said.

“Mmm,” he purred. “Yes.”

She fiddled with the first button on his jeans. It popped loose, and she worked her way down the line. She slipped her palm beneath the waistband of his boxer briefs and sighed as her palm met warm, solid, soft skin. If she'd had any doubts about his ability to have sex, they would have been doused now. She moved her hand lower. Lower. Her body shifted. She cupped him, and he loosed a beautiful, low moan.

“I'm really not that upset anymore,” he said. His breaths shivered in his chest.

“I can feel that,” she replied. She withdrew her hand, not wanting to tease him when he was already that aroused. “But we should wait. I want to wait. We're always stupid, and we never wait when we should.”

“Okay,” he said.

She splayed her palm and crept along his skin. She settled against his body with a long, low sigh, and stroked his chest and abs underneath his shirt, staring out over the floor by his side of the bed. Her eyelids dipped. So warm.

“Mmm,” he rumbled, and she felt all the remaining tension in his muscles slip away. “Feels good,” he said, his voice spreading at the seams into slurs as she relaxed him. He inhaled and exhaled in a long, deep sigh. A soft, low sound, not a word or a moan or a groan settled in his chest on the coattails of a breath. She hadn't heard that in so long, that familiar utterance of tired contentment. They hadn't done this in so long. Just... lain together. Touching with no destination in mind.

“I love you,” she said.

“I love you, too,” he replied.

The minutes passed, and they lay interlocked.
“Are you allowed to take a bath yet?” she murmured. She couldn't remember how long—

“Mmm. Not for four to six weeks,” he said, eyes closed. “It's been five.”

She squeezed him. She sat up, crawled across him, and slid off the bed. Her feet thumped on the floor. She scrunched her toes against the soft carpet. She sighed, unable to stop the lazy grin that infected her face when she thought of relaxing in warm, bubbly water, naked skin to naked, slippery skin. He didn't move.

“Let's do that,” she said. “We haven't done that in a while.”

He watched her through half-lidded eyes. A tired smile rolled across his face. “Okay,” he said.

She leaned over the bed and kissed him. “You relax. I'll get it started. My treat for a lousy night,” she said. She went to start the tap and find the matches for the candles before he could reply.
Chapter 13

[After]

It'd begun to rain. Drops pattered on the roof to no particular rhythm. Derek lay on the bed, naked and curled in a fetal position. His eyes were closed, but he didn't sleep. He wouldn't look at her, wouldn't speak. He hadn't done either since he'd handed her a towel and stalked away while she'd cleaned up the mess.

“Derek,” she said as she sat next to him on the bed. The mattress springs moaned. Her hip touched his spine. Warmth spread into her skin. “It's really okay.” Her lower body ached with dissatisfaction. She ignored it. Her lower body could stuff it. She touched his shoulder, and she stroked his back. “I shouldn't have teased you,” she said. “That was a stupid thing to do right now.”

When he still didn't respond, she climbed over his body and collapsed next to him. The mattress jounced. The cool sheets soothed her hot, sensitized skin. She lined up with his body on her side, and she stared. A wet car swished past on the street below.

As if he sensed her looking at him, he opened his eyes. Flinty halos of blue peered at her in the dim lamplight. His eyes dilated a hair's width as his gaze caught her.

“Hey,” she said. Her heart tore at his sick expression, at the creeping bloom of scarlet that mottled his skin. A loose lock of damp, brown-black hair fell over his forehead.

He swallowed. “That wasn't supposed to happen,” he said.

She touched his cheek. “I know. It’s okay.”

He rolled his face into the pillow and inhaled against the cotton.

“Are you okay?” she said.

“No,” he replied, his voice muffled. “I feel sick.” She splayed her palm against his shoulder and rubbed. The remnant sheen of sweat slicked her path, and she couldn't help the twinge of desire deep within her core. The aching sense of incompleteness wouldn't leave her be, and she bit her lip. His fingers clenched. “Fuck,” he grunted at his pillow. His body twitched as he funneled hot fury into his grip on the sheets.

“It's okay,” she assured him. “Stop it. Please, don't be embarrassed.”

“That was pathetic.”

“We'll go again when you're ready,” she said.

He looked at her darkly.

“Seriously, Derek,” she said. “It happens. We'll go again, and you'll please the ever-loving hell out of me. I promise.”

A grudging grunt that could have been a chuckle rolled through him. “Ever-loving hell?” he said. His lips twitched, and a smile threatened to crack his anger open wide. “You make it sound so pleasant.”
She smiled and scooted closer. She kissed his lips, and he sighed as his body relaxed. “Ever-loving hell is very pleasant,” she said. “I swear.”

“Is that your expert opinion?”

“Yes,” she said. “I've had ample experience with most available flavors of hell, and the ever-loving variety is definitely pleasant.”

A soft chuckle rasped in his chest. “Meredith,” he said, as though he simply needed to hear her name fall across his lips.

“Derek,” she said, echoing his tone.

His gaze softened, and the anger and embarrassment that had collected there died in the wake of affection. His body shifted. The sheets whispered. He cupped the cleft between her thighs. His skin wasn't warm, but at least the chill of nerves had left him, replaced by something lukewarm.
Something living. She gasped as he touched her.

“I love you,” he said.

A shiver made her legs twitch. She pulled close against his body as he petted her. She flailed for something to hold onto. Her grip splayed against his slender hips. They mashed against each other.
He kissed her. Soft bleats of desire road on the coattails of her breaths.

“I'm sorry,” he said.

“You don't have to say that. You shouldn't.”

He shrugged. “I'm sorry anyway.”

His fingertips wove a tapestry of lust. Her discarded arousal roared back into her awareness, and he wove her full of shuddering cries. She pressed her face into his chest. She bit his nipple. Not hard.
A nip. He tasted good. He tasted like hers. He tasted like forever. She swallowed, and she let him weave another line of desire and another.

He tortured her until she arched into his body, desperate. Her muscles tensed. She clutched his shoulders. He would hold her while she fell. That was the part she loved the most. One stroke of his hand sent her lower body into fluttering spasms, and the bed disappeared underneath her as she flew. She cried out in the deluge of sensation. He wrapped his arms around her and squeezed.
She never wanted him to let go. Not ever. A safe, warm bubble enveloped her as the mattress came back, and she knew every molecule of her body was loved and cherished. Her personal Derek blanket. His arms tightened as she snuggled closer.

He lay with her, stroking her back and her face until the fuzzy, delicious haze wore off. She blinked, her body loose. Sleep tugged at her. She'd been up for hours. But she wouldn't let it. They weren't done. She licked his lips and smiled as she watched him through long, mascara-slathered eyelashes.

“Feel better, now?” she said.

“Mmm,” he muttered. The sound stirred vibrations in his sternum. The low murmur of it tickled her cheek. She kissed his drying skin.

The sheets rustled. His fingers touched her hair. Long, sweat-clumped strands cascaded into freefall as he gently loosed her ponytail holders. “I like it down,” he said. “No more naughty pigtails.” She settled as it fanned against her damp back.

He met her eyes with endless, sad blue. “I love you,” he said. “I wish I could have shown you just now.”

“You did,” she assured him. “And we'll go for an encore, soon. You can show me all over again.”

[Before]

Derek sat facing her on the bed, his knees bent, legs spread in a v. She mirrored him, scooted forward, and wrapped her legs over his thighs. Their lower bodies mashed together like interlocking puzzle pieces. She squeezed her knees against his ribcage, and he inhaled. “What do you think?” she said.

“I can't really do much like this,” he said.

“It's supposed to give you depth, not thrust,” Meredith said.

The dusky daylight slanting through the window had long since surrendered to nightfall, and the dim bedside lamp gave the room an intimate, yellow glow. They'd been on or near the bed for an hour, trying to find a position that gave him the dominant role, or at least put him on equal footing with her, and was also comfortable for him. Over the years, they'd tried some pretty wacky things, but a lot were categorically ruled out because they required lifting power or mobility that Derek simply didn't have anymore, or her to be on top. So, they'd started testing the simple stuff first. They'd cycled through all the missionary variations they'd ever tried in the past. All of that was out. He still couldn't hold his weight, though he'd tried.

Derek put his hands behind his torso and leaned. He seemed all right, and she hoped that they'd found something doable. When he tried to push against her body in a test thrust, he strangled a grunt of pain, and he fell back flat against the mattress, panting. He drew his hands against his face.

“I can't,” he said through his palms.

“Well, how are you on your side? We could...” Her voice trailed away when he didn't bring his hands down from his face. She frowned and put her hand on his leg. His body heat burned through the soft cotton of his pajama pants.

She disentangled, and she collapsed next to him. She kissed his shoulder. He'd been quiet the whole time they'd been testing things out, though he'd humored her as she went through her mental catalog of positions, and he responded to questions when she prodded him. He never offered encouragement. Never smiled. Never joked. Never had a gleam in his eye that told her he was looking forward to stripping off her clothes piece by piece in a languorous precursor to their long-awaited reunion.

Her innards quivered with how wrong this felt. She'd never once seen him so soft spoken about sex, never once felt like she was forcing him. When he looked at her, he watched her as a person, someone he loved, but he didn't make her feel like a sexual being. He had always made her feel that way before.

“What's wrong?” she said.

He dropped his hands, and he looked at her. His eyes had a filmy, watery later, and unshed tears made them glisten. “This is so embarrassing,” he said, his voice raw.
“Please, don't be embarrassed. You shouldn't be embarrassed.”

She pulled his hand into hers and interlocked her fingers with his. She withheld a gasp as he responded to her grip, and his fingers fell against her palm. In sharp contrast to his legs, his hands were freezing. She massaged his knuckles, trying to renew his circulation.

“I feel ridiculous,” he said. “Rehearsing for this is ridiculous.”

“Would you rather try to figure this out during?”

“No,” he said. “No, I...” He inhaled and blew a breath out through his lips. “I'm trying to think of it like I do brussells sprouts.”

“Brussells sprouts?”

He gave her a weak smile. “Necessary to eat before I can have the good stuff,” he said, but his voice had no gusto, no humor, and his gaze ticked away from her. He closed his eyes.

She frowned. She slid her palm up his arm, over the crest of his shoulder, and chased it down his torso. His muscles seemed tense. Unyielding. His body didn't give to her, didn't sway with the pressure she applied. She stroked his thigh, over the hill of his knee, and down the slope of his calf to his foot. His toes flexed, and he sighed. Even through his socks, chill hit her fingertips.

Sharp memories of him lying helpless and cold in the cardiac intensive care unit, mere hours after his surgery, struck her in a flash. She sat Indian-style and pulled his foot into her lap. She rubbed, trying to push warmth through the fluffy cotton into his digits.

“Are you nervous?” she said. She pressed her thumb into the arch of his foot and massaged his tendons.

When Derek didn't answer, a lump formed in her throat. She swallowed, trying to drive the grief away, but her thoughts slingshot to the sight of Derek cut open, nothing but a pale, still face and a body buried under a sea of blue surgical drapes. Gary Clark stood next to Cristina, his gun the length of a penny from her temple. “Step away from the table,” he snarled. Meredith blinked, and the memory shattered.

Anger tore her body to shreds, and she wished that he would go away. That man didn't deserve to be in their bedroom, wrecking something that should be sacred. Loving. Reaffirming. But when he'd shot Derek, he'd left a piece of himself behind, and Gary Clark was stuck there. With them. Like a cancer.

“Derek, I'll be satisfied,” she said. “No matter what we do, just the fact that we're doing it satisfies me. I love you, and I want you. The rest of it doesn't matter to me.”

“It matters to me.”

“Why?”

“I don't know,” he said.

The door slammed below them and the murmur of voices spread through the floorboards. Derek flinched, and he closed his eyes. Meredith sighed. She'd tried to subtly hint at Lexie that she should take Alex out or something. Maybe she'd been too subtle. At least Mark was gone.

Finally, Mark had said. Maybe he'll stop acting like a jackass.
“You're putting a mountain of pressure on yourself,” Meredith said. In a whisper of movement, she slid over his waist. Sheets rustled. The mattress shifted, and she straddled his hips. She splayed her palms against his stomach, pushed up, and flattened against his torso like a crashing wave, something she'd done so many times she couldn't count them all, but this time was different. His hands lay by his sides. He didn't reach to support her or caress her, and though he watched her and didn't protest being pinned, his gaze didn't brighten with desire or heat. She kissed his lips. “We could try this…” she murmured against his skin.

“No,” he said.

She frowned. “Is letting me drive really that bad?”

“It's not that,” he said, and he looked away. “I'm...”

“Well, what is it?”

“I need to...”

She rolled off of him onto her side. Her head settled by his neck. She reached across his body, cupped his ear and temple, and pulled his gaze to her. “Need to what?” she said.

He swallowed. “It's not...”

“What?” she prodded.

“He took from me, Meredith. Everything I had. I... I want...”

“What do you want?” she said. She pulled her fingers through his hair.

“I just want to be able to give... something. Because it was my choice. I need that.” He stared at her, his gaze pleading, like he needed her to understand because he couldn't put the coiled mess of feelings in his head into words. But she didn't. She didn't understand at all, and she hated it. They'd made a professional sport about understanding each other without words, and his injuries, both mental and physical, had ripped that all away like a stuck band-aid in a flash of pain.

She frowned. “You don't feel like letting me be on top is giving something?”

He shook his head. “I don't know. I...”

“He took from me, Meredith. Everything I had. I... I want...”

“What do you want?” she said. She pulled her fingers through his hair.

“I just want to be able to give... something. Because it was my choice. I need that.” He stared at her, his gaze pleading, like he needed her to understand because he couldn't put the coiled mess of feelings in his head into words. But she didn't. She didn't understand at all, and she hated it. They'd made a professional sport about understanding each other without words, and his injuries, both mental and physical, had ripped that all away like a stuck band-aid in a flash of pain.

She frowned. “You don't feel like letting me be on top is giving something?”

He shook his head. “I don't know. I...”

“Please, tell me.”

“I said don't know,” he snapped. The nasty words vibrated in the air. Her eyes pricked, and she watched through the blur as he swallowed. A look of nausea crossed his face, replacing the flashing anger, and he made a sick sound deep in his throat. “I'm sorry,” he blurted. He blinked, and the tears that had been loitering pinched loose from his eyes. He sniffed and wiped his face. “I'm sorry. I keep trying not to yell at people, and I just...”

She kissed him, inching as close to his body as she could manage. “It's okay,” she assured him.

“It's not okay,” he said. “I'm treating you like shit. I'm treating Mark like shit. I'm treating everybody like shit. It makes me feel sick inside when I do it, but I can't make myself stop. I'm...”

“It's okay,” she repeated.

“Damn it, Meredith, it's not okay,” he said. He clenched the coverlet with a white knuckled hand and yanked like he was trying to vent the furious need to pummel something. The tendons of his neck and arms stood in sharp relief, and his temples fluttered as he clenched his jaw. In several breaths, the ire drained away, leaving only upset behind. “I'm so angry,” he said, and he sighed as he rolled away. “All the time.”

She inhaled and closed her eyes. She followed him into a spoon. “Maybe,” she told the back of his neck. She kissed him. “You just need to get laid.”

Her attempt to brighten his mood met silence. She didn't know how to deal with any of this. Maybe her joke had been in poor taste, she realized on second review, but she felt like a dunce when it came to this, no matter how much Dr. Wyatt tried to help her. Insensitive. Horrible. She lay against his body and listened to his breathing. He didn't speak. She stroked him, trying to give him closeness, or support, or... something. Anything.

She knew yelling at people was not okay, and it did hurt when he did it to her. But he had no other outlet. None. He couldn't burn himself off with sweaty exercise. He couldn't go with Mark to the gym and beat the crap out of a punching bag. He had no closure with Gary Clark because Gary Clark was dead. His only way to vent had become words, and denying him that outlet seemed like it would be an unhealthy recipe to break him the rest of the way. She could accept his fury for a while if it meant he would get better.

“In my head, I can see myself laughing at that,” he said after a long time. A heaving sigh tore through his body, and he laughed. A tiny chuff of air. But the noise had no humor to it, only displeasure. “I'd kiss your ear. And maybe I'd say let's find out. I can see it. In my head. I know that's what I would have done before, but I...” His voice fell away.

She didn't really know what to say, and again she found herself lost. She'd never had to goad Derek into sex. And, now, I'm getting in your bed naked. Well. One time. One time, she'd goaded him.

He'd been upset after she'd drowned. He'd hovered. She'd told him to stop, and she'd turned his desire for communication into a freaking joke.

You're mocking me, he'd said.

I'm apologizing to you, she'd replied as she stroked his hair.

You're making light of things.

These past six weeks, she'd found herself begging him to talk again and again and again because he had the tendency to bottle everything up and let things fester. Sometimes, he said things. Sometimes, he didn't. But he'd never once told her what he'd eaten for lunch. She probably would have smacked him. She'd been such a juvenile idiot, back then. Her belated empathy, now, made her feel idiotic. And inadequate.

The floor slicked with oozing red blood. He stared at the ceiling while she hovered by his body. He panted. “Derek, it's me,” she said. “You're going to be fine.” The wound made a squishy sound as she pressed her palm into it.

She blinked, and the gore-filled image faded. Derek lay in her arms, silent, but alive and working on whole and healthy. Her throat closed up, and she tightened her grip against his body. He melded with her, and she never wanted to let go. Not ever. The very last thing she ever wanted to do was force him to do something before he was ready. She'd gotten used to him needing a little bit of a push. This felt like more than pushing, though.

“Derek, if you really don't want... I mean I don't want to force you. We can just lie here. I'll be happy. I promise.”

“But we made a date,” he said.

Somebody came up the steps. Heavy footfalls hit the runner. Their bedroom door rattled as a door slammed shut down the hall. The low thrum of bass rumbled through the walls as a stereo came on. Derek bristled in her arms.

“The date doesn't matter if you don't want to do this,” she said.

“I want to.” He sighed. “I just...”

“Stop thinking about what we used to do,” she said. “Stop comparing. Even if you weren't hurt, it wouldn't be the same anymore. We lived through... It just wouldn't be the same.”

“Please, don't tell Dr. Wyatt,” he said in a soft voice. “Or Cristina. Or...”

She kissed him. “Not a word. It's just us tonight.”

“Okay,” he said. He let his legs fall over the edge of the bed, and he sat up with a wince, only to fold over his knees. “I'm sorry.”

“Why?” she said. She shifted to sit by his side.

“For making this hard on you,” he said.

“You know,” she said. She wrapped her arms around his shoulders and winked. “That's the sort of thing you don't apologize for during sex.”

He blinked, and a small laugh fell from his lips. A real one. Her body loosened at the sound. The corner of his lip twitched, like a smile wanted to unfurl and couldn't quite find traction. He seemed bewildered that he'd laughed, that she'd managed to make him forget for a moment how miserable he was.

“I guess I've still got it,” she said.

His expression changed and deepened into something familiar. Something she hadn't seen in weeks. Want. Need. Take. He tipped into her, and he kissed her. She gasped, surprised, and her heart sped up as he leaned into it. He tasted fresh, and sweet, and he pressed against her. His hand gripped her arm and squeezed. She splayed a hand against his heart as he breathed, but she forgot about it. Forgot everything.

“I really love you,” he said, his voice a low murmur against her skin. “I really...” His words faded into a deep, hot breath that blew against her hair. He nuzzled her, and he inhaled.

The room swirled. She blinked, senseless. “Derek...” she managed, a throaty whisper. Her fingers clenched, and she pulled a tent of his soft shirt into her fist.

With a sigh, he stood. His shirt came loose from her grip, and she goggled for a moment, trying to regain her senses. She flexed her bereft fingers. Her lips felt alive and swollen. She wanted that again. She wanted to taste him. He hadn't kissed her like that in... She couldn't even remember. She couldn't remember the last time he'd kissed her like that.

Yeah, I like to say hello to my wife every forty-eight hours.

Her nails dug into her palm, and her jaw clenched. He'd kissed her then. Short. A habit. Just a soft hello. Not since before then. Six weeks. More. She wiped her lips with her hand and stood.

“What's wrong?” she said, trying to quell her frustration at his sudden withdrawal.

He stood by the bureau by the wall at the foot of the bed. She watched him in the mirror. “I think this would work,” he said. He pushed aside refuse. Her makeup. A pile of magazines. Some other junk that she hadn't cleaned up since before he'd been shot. “It's the right height.”

She swallowed. A vague sob of relief tore through her. She sniffled, and she blinked, and she walked to where he stood. She wiped her face. “Sorry, I...”

He wrapped his warm body around hers, and he breathed against her ear. “I do want to do this, Meredith, I just...” He shook his head and cleared his throat. He stared over her shoulder at the space he'd unburdened of clutter, not at her.

She kissed him. He watched the surface of the bureau, unblinking, as she backed up, clenched the wood with her fingers, and heaved herself onto it. His careful stack cascaded to the floor toward the bedroom door and left a trail of paper refuse and rolling makeup bottles. Something plinked on the floor, followed by another plink, and one more.

For a moment, his lost stare remained, like he didn't even realize she'd intervened her body between him and the object of his gaze, as if he hadn't heard or seen the chaotic landslide. She spread her bent legs. He stepped toward her, and then she pressed her knees against his hips. His legs thunked against the upper drawer. Their lower bodies didn't quite meet, and she had to scoot forward inch by inch, until she hung off the bureau with the entirety of her thighs. She gripped his body, and that was all that kept her from falling on her ass, but they fit. They fit perfectly.

“You'll be okay holding my knees?” she said. Her back began to twinge. “I can't sit like this forever without some help.”

He swallowed. His grip wandered across her thighs. His arms flexed, and she sighed as his fingers slid underneath her knees. Chill seeped into her sinews, but the effort to stay balanced decreased, and her back stopped complaining. She could live with his cold hands if it meant they could do this.

“It doesn't hurt,” he said. He didn't smile.

“Not good, though?”

He shrugged. “My choices are a bit limited.”

“We could find something else,” she said. “There's still a ton of things we haven't tried.”

“I know, but...” His voice petered into silence, and he dropped her legs. She scooted back to keep from falling. He pushed against her body. A soft, willowy breath brushed her ear, and he hugged her, still, quiet.

She stroked his hair with one hand while the other roamed. His back muscles felt like rods of steel. His shallow breathing cut her to the quick, and she closed her eyes as a swell of upset made her body quiver. Nervous. He was really, really nervous. Rip the band-aid, he was saying without words. No more rehearsing. Because he was Derek, and Derek wouldn't ever say that he was apprehensive about sex.

“So, when we're ready, we'll move here?” she said.
His grip tightened. “Okay,” he said.

[After]

Dim illumination from the outside street lights fell through the window and lit the edges of the room with silver-edged shadows. They lay naked, nose-to-nose. She watched his eyes in the soft lamplight, and he watched hers.

She'd turned her back to her clock. She knew from experience he'd be able to go again in about thirty to forty minutes. Maybe longer, since he wasn't exactly in tiptop shape. She had no idea how many of those minutes had passed. She didn't care. She didn't think she'd care if all they did was lie there for the rest of the night, close, touching. Going again was, really, more for him than her. This was what she'd missed. This intimacy.

She had work in the morning. Her alarm was set so early she'd get fewer hours of sleep than she possessed fingers on her hand, even if she were to shut her eyes and dream in that very moment. But she couldn't bring herself to worry about it. About anything.

Seattle disappeared. Her roommates disappeared. Her house didn't exist.

Just him. Just her.

His breaths fell against the pillow, soft and slow. She reached across the void and touched her palm to his chest. She hoped he was in a sharing mood. He hadn't spoken about himself since he'd begged her for a rain check way back before he'd gotten sick. It felt like eons ago.

“Tell me something I don't know about you,” she said.

“Like what?” he said.

She licked her lips and pondered the possibilities. She stroked him chest to thigh, and her finger stopped at the deep groove in the meat of his thigh near his left hip. The scar had almost been obscured by the tilt of his body against the sheets and the tent of his flaccid privates. “What happened here?” she said.

“That's from my crash.”

“I know,” she said. “But what happened?”

Rain pattered on the roof in the soft stillness. His pupils changed as he remembered. He blinked. She watched him for any sign of discomfort or distress. She possibly hadn't picked the best topic for pillow talk, but... She wanted to know. She wanted to know all of him. Why did he hate motorcycles so much? Why did he like indigo? Why did his taste in music suck? Why had he picked neurosurgery? Why anything?

“I lost control of my bike in the rain near a construction site at night,” he said. “I flipped over the handlebars and woke up stuck to some concrete in a junk heap.”

“Stuck to concrete?” she said.

“Like a bug,” he said. His voice cracked. “There was a bunch of bent, rusty rebar sticking out.” He swallowed, and his fingers clenched. “I landed right on it.”

She flinched as she thought of his younger self, flying through the air in an out-of-control descent. He would have been tumbling at least twenty-five miles an hour, probably more, depending on whether the construction site had been in a residential area or on a highway. She didn't know. She couldn't ask. Not when he looked so disturbed. Maybe later, she would muster the courage to prod him for elaboration.

“I thought it might be rebar,” she said. She touched the groove, and he heaved a shaky sigh. His muscles tightened, and the look of disquiet on his face spoke of crushing bad memories. She wondered how much he hadn't told her.

“Pondering my rare imperfections?” he said. He smiled, and the ghosts of his past dispersed.

“Pondering your anatomy in general,” she replied, echoing his grin. “I like it. It's fun to study.”

He raised an eyebrow. “Oh?”

“For instance, I like your shoulders,” she said. She touched his right deltoid. Lean, toned muscle gave under her fingertips, but not far. Bone pressed into her hand. Two weeks of physical therapy had helped him build up again. Not much, but some. He'd gained back a few pounds since the pneumonia, too, enough that he didn't look so jagged in the face, and his ribs didn't stick out unless he stretched. Her hand rasped against his skin as she stroked his bicep. “And your arms. You have sexy arms.”

“Mmm,” he purred. His eyelids dipped. His body shifted as he relaxed under her scrutiny. Muscles loosened. He rolled onto his back with a vague wince and sighed.

She could recall any number of times when they'd lain in bed, and he'd doted over his favorites of her attributes, or simply watched her with an awe-filled is-she-mine look that made her quiver. She couldn't recall a time when she'd done the same for him. She'd lived in his safety bubble, warmed by his adoration, and she'd been content to bask. Another regret.

Her perusal continued. She slipped her fingertips down the line of his incision. The cut had become a paper-thin, jagged line of scabbed red, hugged by a thicker section of marbled pink flesh. She stopped midway down the line, at his center point in the dip between his pectorals. Wisps of hair buried the pinking scar.

“I like how soft you are here,” she said.

He put his palm over hers. “It's almost all grown back.”

“It is,” she agreed.

He followed her with his hand as she caressed the flat of his stomach and paused just below his navel. “I like the way your hair twists into a whorl.” She rubbed her index finger in a circle over the wiry, curly hairs. “Just here.”

She left his hand behind as she wandered lower and cupped him. She wrapped her fingers around the base of his scrotum and pulled away from his body. Slowly. Gently. Not far. Just enough to give him the sensation of it stretching. One of his favorite things. “I like this part, too,” she said.

He inhaled and blew out a long, slow breath. “I like that you like that part,” he said, his voice shaky.

She settled against his shoulder. She kissed him at his pulse, and then licked along his jawline.

“And I've always wondered,” she said.
“About?”

“You're intact.”

He looked down at himself with a frown. “Is that bad?”

“Just different,” she said with a shrug. “Most men born in the sixties aren't.”

He watched the ceiling, eyelids dipping. “My dad had this thing about it,” he said. “He demanded that it be my choice. After giving him a trio of daughters, my mom decided to humor him, I guess.”

“And you chose this,” she said.

He looked at her. “By the time I was old enough to care about it, I was old enough to not want a knife down there, locker room embarrassment notwithstanding.”

She inhaled, and his deep scent wafted into her nose. She kissed him. He made a delightful, rumbling sound that sparked deep-seated need. Her lower body tightened. He rolled into her, having given his side a rest. His eyes twinkled in the dim light, and the smile he gave her made everything in her body contract with a twitch of desire. She wished they could stay here forever and never go back to the real world, where Gary Clark existed, and Derek's peace-of-mind remained an ephemeral idea that only coalesced in times like this.

“Does it feel different?” he said.

“What?”

He met her with a straight gaze. “Me. In you.”

She touched him. Soft, feathery skin shifted and slid, and he sighed into the pillow. Another one of his favorite things. Immediately after he finished, over-sensitized, blood humming, he didn't like to be touched there. She licked her lips at the feel of him as he pushed against her hand and groaned for her. Pleasure smoothed his gaze into glass, and her heart sped with anticipation at the clear sign that he would be ready again. Soon.

“More glide-y,” she decided.

“Glide-y,” he said. “That's a word?”

She grinned. “It's my word.”

“I like your words,” he said. “They make my life interesting.”

She drew her hand away and roamed along his hip and up. “I don't know,” she said as she explored his ribs, less defined than they'd been weeks before. “I don't need as much prep time with you.” She shrugged. “Hence, more glide-y.”

“Really,” he said, his voice a low, sexy rumble. He looked pleased, like some sort of preening peacock.

“Yeah, really,” she said. “What?”

“So,” he said with a smirk. “You're telling me I'm a smooth ride.”

She laughed, pressed her nose against his chest, and kissed him. “Mmm,” she agreed as the faint taste of salt brushed her tongue. “Vroom vroom. If your ego wasn't already the size of China, I'd call you my Ferrari or whatever.”

He snickered. “Cheesy.”

“Maybe just Derek, then,” she said. She teased the tufts of his armpit hair and moved up. His eyelids dipped, and he watched her. She traced his lip with her thumb. He kissed it, and he leaned into her touch when she stroked his face. Her index finger paused on the crooked bump of his nasal septum.

“Fight with Mark,” he said before she asked.

“Mark is the one who broke your nose?”

“Yes,” he said. “He stole my comic book. I tried to get it back.”

“Who won?”

“Tossup. I broke his hand.”

“Compound fracture or simple?” she said.

“Um,” he said. His gaze turned up as he stretched for the memory. “Compound.”

She blinked. “On purpose?” she said.

“Well, he sort of broke it on my face. So, no, not on purpose,” he said. His gaze clouded with the memory, and his hand wandered to his nose in absent remembrance. Stubble rasped against his palm. She wondered as she watched him if it had been Mark, then, that had started the trend of hit first, ask later between them. “Served him right, anyway,” Derek continued. “I have to live with this face, you know.”

She snickered. “But I like your face. It's one of the many bits of your anatomy that I'm an immense fan of. What comic?”

“Batman,” he said. “You like it even though it's crooked?”

“I think your nose gives you a rugged look. Batman?”

“I liked the nifty gadgets,” he said. “Is rugged good?”

She kissed him. “Rugged is good,” she confirmed. She touched his face. His eyes crinkled. “You really don't have any idea how sexy you are, do you?”

From the way he stared, she realized, no, he didn't have a clue. She kissed him and lingered, breathing him in. A deep, wordless mumble collected in his throat. She tasted it, drank it down, and that's when it clicked. Derek Shepherd, summarized.

She made fun of his ego time and time again, but, really? He thrived on reassurance. On people accepting him and looking up to him. The arrogant front worked for him. He faked people into thinking he knew what he wanted, how he wanted it, and why he wanted it at all times. It was his thing. Acting like he knew all the time. He needed that deception to function, needed it so that others would see him as strong and capable and not someone worth questioning. He wore his cocksure attitude like a suit of armor, and Gary Clark had stripped him.

Derek didn't know how to fake anymore. He couldn't be cocksure. His perilous house of cards had toppled, leaving only the insecure man underneath, naked for the wolves.
She turned the knob of the bathroom door and poked her head out into the bedroom. She blinked as her eyes adjusted from the sharp light of the bathroom to the dimness of the bedside lamp. Derek sat in the small wood chair she'd brought up from the kitchen and put by his side of the bed, facing the bathroom door. His legs spread in a relaxed v, and he'd folded his arms over his chest, a typical guy-in-repose stance. Still in his pajamas, his eyes had closed, his chin had tipped into his chest, and his breaths fell into the room in an even, rasping rhythm.

She frowned. He'd fallen asleep. She hadn't been in the bathroom that long, had she? Her gaze ticked to the digital clock on her nightstand. Red numbers declared the time to be close to eleven. She'd been preparing for twenty minutes or so, then. Twenty minutes, and that had been with her rushing. She'd pulled her hair into pigtails, changed her clothes from the duffel bag she'd hid behind the tub, and slathered on her makeup in record time, because she knew he was waiting, knew he resided in the sharp clutches of his nerves.

She'd wanted to break the ice, not thicken it.

But she hadn't gotten home from work until close to eight, and they'd taken a long time beforehand with dinner and then prep. Since his heart surgery, Derek rarely stayed up past nine or ten. She hadn't realized it'd gotten so late. Her brain pinwheeled through all the positions they'd tried, a lot of which had caused him momentary pain, and guilt plunged deep. He hadn't said a word about needing a break or being tired.

Another strike in the column of weird and wrong. She'd never seen Derek fall asleep with the prospect of sex hanging in the air unless he was still recovering from the last round. He tended to do the guy thing where he'd rock her world into orbit, and then he'd sleep with his arms wrapped around her while she floated back to earth.

Why do men do that? she'd asked him once as he'd blinked awake.

Wha? he'd mumbled.

Go comatose after sex. Why?

He'd given her a lazy smile as he'd rolled on top of her. So we can do it again, he'd replied, and then he'd kissed away all her arguments.

She took a deep breath as she stared at his sleeping profile. This was not the most encouraging start to sex, him being asleep. A helix of self-conscious energy churned in her stomach. Among her friends, she was known as a bit of a sexual deviant. She'd tried plenty of things, some more unusual than others. Despite her adventurous side, despite her security in her own skin, anxiety could still shake her moorings. Putting herself out there as a vulnerable object for judgment was... nerve-wracking, to say the least.

She wasn't entirely sure of the reception she'd get for this endeavor she'd planned since it was something she'd never tried with him. If there was a top ten list of ways to make oneself look like a flaming idiot, this would at least be in the top five somewhere. But she'd wanted to do something special. Something just for him. Something that would tell him she was willing to risk horrific embarrassment for him because she understood that, for him, though she wished it wouldn't, this would feel like a similar endeavor. Him risking embarrassment for her. She didn't do flowers and hearts and all that crap, but she could do this.

She gripped the molding around the door and swallowed. “Derek?” she said.
His eyes opened. He blinked, and he inhaled as he ran a hand through his hair. He sat up, his back sliding up the chair. “Sorry,” he said, his voice muzzy with sleep. “You were in there a while.”

“I know,” she said. “It's okay. We could do this tomorrow, if you want. We found a spot. That's a good start.”

“No, I'm okay,” he said. “Just a cat...” He stopped talking as she stepped forward, away from the shelter of the door. “Nap,” he added, almost as an afterthought. He leaned forward in his seat. His lips parted, and he watched her with an unblinking blue stare. She smiled at the feel of his intense scrutiny, and the deep pit of nerves in her gut loosened.

When she'd gone into the bathroom, his careful attention hadn't been there. Sit here, she'd said. I have a surprise planned. He'd made no lecherous comments, and he'd displayed only mild interest with no real smile, though he'd tried to fake her out with a grin that didn't reach his eyes. She'd had to remind herself that his muted reaction to the prospect of her doing something special had probably been manufactured by nerves. By the fact that he wasn't feeling one hundred percent. That his lack of obvious excitement didn't reflect on her.

He watched her, now, and she resisted the urge to chuckle when his anticipating look dissolved into confusion as he assessed her silly hairstyle and attire. “Why are you wearing a trench coat?” he said. He didn't mention the pigtails. He'd probably been expecting sexy lingerie, which was a surprise she treated him with often enough that it wasn't really surprising when she did it.

“Because that's how this works,” she replied.

“Sex works with you in a trench coat?” he said.

She walked toward his nightstand. She made a show of swinging her hips with a runway model walk, though it did little more than make the trench coat sway. Her legs shivered with nerves, and she remained secure only in the fact that he couldn't see anything yet. Her stilettos clonked on the floorboards once before she stepped onto the thin area carpet. She'd hooked up his iPod to a little pair of speakers when she'd had a moment free of his scrutiny earlier. He hadn't noticed at all. Or, if he had, he'd said nothing.

Her heart pounded, and she swallowed as she funneled her resolve into energy she could use. She turned to face him, his little iPod caught in her shaky grip. She'd searched online for hours for good songs. With Google and iTunes and Amazon and YouTube, she'd narrowed her choices to two, and then she'd picked, opting for something more classic instead of grind-y and ultra-slutty. She hoped he couldn't see her hands trembling. And she hoped she wouldn't crush his iPod. And she hoped...

She closed her eyes, steeling her shoulders, took a short breath, and then stared at him. She grinned, and she forced her voice to come out of her mouth on an even keel. “The rules are no touching,” she told him. A bemused expression crept across his face. “Well, that will make sex pretty difficult, Mere,” he said, but he settled in his chair as though he sensed her need for his undivided attention. “What exactly did you have in mind?” he said, as if to tell her indirectly, “Okay. I'll play. I trust you.”

She put her index finger to her lips and shushed him. He stilled. “No laughing either if I suck at this,” she said. “I haven't done it in a while.”

He frowned. “Suck at—” She kicked up the volume. She hit the play button, and the loping rhythm of drums interrupted him. She took her starting pose. “What?” he finished.
She rocked on her heels with the rhythm and backed toward the wall. Billy Squier began to sing, and then the guitars kicked in. Derek's look of confusion melded into one of recognition as she looped her hands underneath the belt of her coat. His lips twitched and became a wide, pleased grin as her coat slipped to the floor. She wore a thin white blouse, a black tie, and pleated red-plaid mini skirt underneath.

He leered. “Catholic school girl?”

“Yes,” she replied. She pursed her lips. She splayed her hands against her breasts over her blouse and roamed languorously toward her knees as she swayed to the beat. She stopped, and she made sure he had a great view of her cleavage. “But I'm bad, Derek.”

He leaned forward. “Are you?”

“Very bad,” she assured him with a pout.

“How did I not know you had this skill?”

She laughed. “I wouldn't really call it a skill.”

“Oh, it's a skill,” he said, his voice strained.

She turned around, spread her legs, dropped her palm flat against the rug and pulled back up in a slow, sensuous trip. Her spine unfurled, and she flicked her hips to the right in time with a slam of the drums. She peered sidelong over her shoulder at him as she stretched her arms. He stared like he wanted to take the blouse she wore and rip it off, and the last of her nerves melted in a dizzying column of fire as she imagined him doing just that.

“Keep your contributions by your side and stroke me,” sang Billy Squier.

She ripped off her tie and approached his chair where he sat, spellbound. Her tongue curled. She showed him her teeth as she tilted her head to the side in a hidden inspection of his body. He sat rigid. His hands rested by his sides, gripping the chair. His grip seemed stress-y at a glance, but a good type of stress-y. A holy-shit-must-stay-seated stress-y. She liked that kind.

She straddled his lap and rose to her knees, putting her breasts eye level with him. His right hand moved, and the soft touch of his fingertips on her thigh made her muscles twitch. She slapped him away, using the tie as a whip.

“Bad man,” she scolded. “No touching.”

She wrapped the tie around his neck and pulled him forward inch by inch until his face hovered millimeters from her cleavage. Derek had always been a visual-oriented creature. Touch and sight. Those were the keys to rev his engine. This was about showing skin. This was about letting both his rabid imagination and touch deprivation drive him to frenzy. She held him with the tie and watched with delight as his breaths shortened, and his pupils widened with bald desire.

“Meredith,” he said, and he swallowed.

She whipped the tie away, stood, and flicked his shoulder with it before letting it fly across the room. It fluttered to a stop, half resting on the bed, half dangling off. She stood, leaving him alone on the chair, a frustrated, longing island. He took a deep breath and exhaled. She ground her body down to the floor, gyrating with the beat, and rose again. He didn't blink. Didn't speak. Didn't move. She had him riveted.
She popped the first button on her blouse, and then the second and the third. The dark lace of her bra showed in the gap. She rotated away after giving him a look, and drew a palm up her thigh. The skirt lifted. His gaze gravitated to her legs as she touched herself. She imagined it was his hands rubbing her, and her breaths tightened. Her body throbbed, and she began to move because she needed to do something with all that thrumming sexual energy.

“Are you wearing the itty bitty lace underwear?” he said.

She popped another button on her blouse. She twirled. “What?”

“Before my surgery,” he said. “You said things about itty bitty lace underwear. And whipped cream.”

“You remember?”

He blinked. “Yes.”

“No whipped cream, sorry.”

“But itty bitty lace?” The hopeful pleading tone in his voice soothed her worries like a balm. He wanted this. He wanted her. He wanted. This hadn't been a mistake, and he was ready.

“You'll see,” she said, and she grinned at his predatory look. She popped the last button and let the blouse slip down her arms. She caught it and held it over her bra and shoulder blades like a shawl as she turned for him. His gaze traced the lines of her body like he'd never seen it before, like he'd discovered the eighth world wonder. Just watching him watch her made her lower body tighten, and a deep, aching emptiness spread its hooks into her groin. She needed him to fill... She needed...

She gathered her own frustration and threw it into her dance.

“First you try to bed me,” sang Billy. “You make my backbone slide.”

She flicked the blouse away, and it landed by his feet. The zipper on her miniskirt was next. The zipper teeth made a sawing sound as she lowered it bit by aching bit. She danced near the chair, tantalizing him with all angles, pausing only long enough to fire his imagination before she moved to show him something new. The heat of blush spread across her skin. She leaned, and she rested her lips by his ear, her body hovering inches from him, touchable, but not.

A gruff, throaty sound rumbled into the space between them. He shifted in the chair. His right hand moved.

“No touching,” she reminded him. She blew on his ear, and his whole body flinched. “A little birdie told me you like stripteases,” she said.

“A little birdie?”

“Mmm, yes,” she purred. “In the car when I drove you home from the hospital. I asked you about strippers. Do you remember that?”

His lips parted, but he made no sound. She kicked off her heels. One. By one. They thunked on the floor somewhere behind her. One. By one.

“Do you like stripteases, Derek?”

“Yes,” he whispered.
She turned and gave him a view of the zipper as she pulled it down the rest of the way. The skirt slipped to the floor. She caught her toe on the pleated fabric, and her exit from its clutches wasn't quite as graceful as she wanted it to be, but he didn't seem to notice or care. She licked her lips at the sight of his short breaths and lusting stare.

His gaze dipped. “Those are pretty itty bitty,” he said.

She hooked her thumbs under the spaghetti strings and pulled them away from her hips. The rough flower print of the lace scratched her hands. She hadn't washed them enough for them soften, but their discomfort didn't matter for her short term drive-Derek-insane plans. “And lace,” she agreed as she let the straps snap back into place.

“God, Mere, I—”

“Shh,” she said, and he shushed.

“Don'tcha take no chances,” Billy sang.

“Keep your eye on top,” Meredith said, echoing the lyrics. She undid the clasp of her small teal-colored bra and let it slip away. She draped it over his lap, and it caught on a pronounced tent in the fabric. He stared at her like she was edible, and he'd been starving.

She touched her naked breasts. Her nipples perked, and she moaned as she dragged her hands against her skin. She leaned forward. Cleavage gathered. “I want you so badly,” she told him, and his chair rocked as he scooted forward an inch. “Do you want me, Derek?”

Rigid tension locked his frame. “I do.”

Her underwear was the last to go. Discarding panties in a sexy fashion was a dilemma she'd had to practice in front of a mirror. She hooked her thumbs under the straps and worked them down her legs in a painstaking process meant to show off her legs. Not tripping as she stepped out of them was her major victory. She'd done it right, based on the look slathered across his face. The one that said sex. Sex, please. Sex, now. Now, now, now.

She gyrated for him, pausing at every angle to give him a good, long look. Warmth thrummed through her body. She imagined how it would feel when they finally did this. The ravenous stare he laved her with told her he wanted her. He burned for her. He wouldn't go slow. Her body flushed as she thought of him naked and ready, and when the last drumbeat fell into the room and silence followed, she stopped.

She slid her hand against naked skin, nothing but his rapid breathing filling the silence. She moaned. Her inner thighs ignited with anticipation. She felt empty. Not whole. Her insides fluttered with need. Almost seven weeks. They'd been apart too long.

The chair creaked. He skidded forward another inch before he stopped himself. “Meredith,” he said, his voice shaky, thready, almost gone.

She smiled. “Touch me, Derek,” she said.

He rose from the chair, closed the distance between them, and kissed her. His breaths were a storm buffeting her body. They waltzed into the bathroom door, and he pressed her flat. “I don't know what you were worried about,” he said as he nuzzled her throat. “That looked professional to me.”

She laughed. “You've watched strippers enough to judge?”
“That's not what I meant,” he said. A low, aroused moan rumbled through his body. “God, you're sexy.”

“Mmm,” she said. “And completely yours.”

[After]

He pressed his torso against her and pulled her tight as he kissed her neck, her cleavage, and down, down, down. He grunted with discomfort as instinct dragged his conscious thought away, and he rolled too far onto his stomach. The glazed, lusty look in his eyes sharpened with pain, and he barked with agony as he tried to push himself off of her with his arms. She helped him right himself, and his pained expression relaxed into neutrality.

“Fuck,” he grumbled.

“Do you want to get up?” she said. She glanced at the bureau. A scrunched-up, frilly pillow still sat folded over, leaning against the mirror. The dim bedroom reflected in the mirror. Two naked bodies against frothy, white sheets.

“No,” he said. “Can you flip around?”

“But then I can't see you,” she said.

“Please,” he said. “I need...” He panted, and she lost eye-contact with him as he gazed at the ceiling, a frustrated look on his face. “I want to do this on the bed, not there,” he said. “I need it. I want to love you in our bed.”

She kissed him, and his upset look dissolved into hunger. He stroked her lower body. Her wet, slick heat trapped his hand. Her muscles tightened as he curled his index finger, and she gasped. She tried to think straight. He made it freaking difficult. If she flipped around, he would be spooning her, and he'd push into her from behind. They'd done it before in the early predawn hours, when both of them were still filled with sleep and dreams. It was an easy, lazy position, meant for languid lovemaking and languid pleasure at his direction. He would wrap his arms around her, and she would be enveloped. The position would be easier on him, too. It required little to no upper body usage, and it would be easier for him to maintain a rhythm without exhausting himself.

On any other day, she would have loved it, lying in his arms and letting him do what he wanted, but she needed to see him, this time. She needed it.

“Will you let me on top for just a minute?” she said. “Please.”

“Why?” he said.

“We can do a different version of what you're thinking if you let me set it up. Please, Derek. I want to see you.”

He met her eyes. She gripped his shoulder and pushed. Out of protests, he rolled onto his back, meek against the tide of her will. She straddled him. His erection bobbed against her body. His lips parted, and his gaze turned glassy with desire.

“Ready?” she said.

“Mmm. Yes.”

She lifted off his hips and gripped him. She guided his tip against her lower body. Her muscles twitched as she pushed him through bundles of delicious nerve clusters to sit just inside. A pleasant spasm ripped through her, and she stopped to gasp and catch her breath. Sparks lit her vision.

“God, Meredith,” he said. He arched back into the bed, his hands clawing at the sheets. A flare of pain creased his expression. He grunted, and he flattened out on the sheets.

“How are you okay?”

“Mmm.” He nodded, panting. “Stretched too far, that's all. Please. God, just...”

She dropped her weight, and he glided inside to the hilt. A soft, desperate moan fell from her lips as he filled her empty void. They fit. They'd always fit, but she'd forgotten how well. Her muscles squeezed around his girth, and she sighed as she rested, adjusting. Seven weeks. Done. All done. She never wanted to go this long without him again. She brushed sweaty hair from her eyes.

“Derek,” she whispered. She splayed her hands against his abdomen, swallowing as tears pricked her eyes. She blinked. She wasn't going to cry on him. Only pathetic people cried during sex, and this? This felt anything but pathetic. Even if they didn't finish, and neither one ever moved again, she didn't think it would matter. “Derek,” she repeated, but she couldn't hold enough air hostage to tell him how not pathetic she felt.

Her body trembled as the world sloughed away in a blur, and there was only him. His body. His voice. His spirit. Sweat dotted her brow. She wasn't empty anymore. She'd been a destitute bucket of needy space, and he'd filled her to the brim. She almost didn't want to move. God, it felt good. He felt good. Everything felt good.

“I love you,” she said.

“I love you, too,” he said. His breaths had tightened, and he looked up at her, panting. “You're pretty tight,” he said. “Am I okay?”

“Seven weeks will do that,” she said. “I'm fine. I'm more than fine. Just give me a second.”

He agreed with a grunt and rested. His Adam's apple rolled down his throat as he swallowed, and his eyelids fluttered. “You're really wet,” he said. She twirled her index finger at his navel. The muscles of his abdomen shivered as she toiled. “I forgot how nice...” His breath shuddered. “You feel nice, Meredith.”

She licked her lips. “Only nice?”

“I'm not exactly a thesaurus when I'm inside you,” he said. He flashed a wry grin at her.

She flattened against his body, careful not to rest her weight on him, and gripped his shoulders. “Roll on three,” she instructed as she met his gaze. His eyes crinkled, and he blinked his assent. She counted backward, and they moved together with twin grunts. He stayed inside her as her weight pressed through her side into the mattress. He lay on his damaged side. They faced each other. She hoped it didn't hurt, but he'd been on that side a lot that night, and he seemed okay if he took breaks.

“Good?” she said as he settled.

“Up a little?” he said.

She shifted. The angle of his penetration changed, and she gasped as desire corkscrewed like a roller coaster. Her lower body clenched. His chest heaved, and she kissed him again and again wherever she could reach. Her lips pressed against the very top of his scar, and she licked the swollen bump. A soft rumble rolled up through his sternum.

“This was a good idea,” he said. He wrapped his arms around her body and pulled her close. His lower body shifted, and he moved within her.

She mewled. This position didn't mean merely looking at him. The safe zone she loved wrapped her in a solid, warm cloak. His musky scent enveloped her. His eyelids dipped as he gathered his energy. It wouldn't be athletic, or bouncy, or bed break-y, or shout-y, but she would be in his arms, and that was all she really cared about.

“Take me for a ride, Derek,” she said.

“Yes, dear,” he murmured, and with a smirk, he followed her command.

[Before]

Frigid chill washed the heat of her body with sensory overload, and she gasped as her back hit the mirror. The whole bureau shook. “Cold!” she hissed. She hadn't thought about that when they'd tested this place. She hadn't been naked.

He grunted, and he left her bereft, just for a moment. He put a pillow behind her back, and she relaxed, only to realize he'd frozen, his gaze caught in the silver grip of the mirror. “What is it?” she said.

He blinked. She turned around, trying to see what he saw, but all she saw was him and her, both naked and ready. The soft, dark hairs peppering his chest had flattened with sweat. His hair had spiked all over from the times she'd run her fingers through it, over and over, unable to get enough. Strong shoulders tapered into lean hips and legs. A swimmer's build. Sleek and toned. His breaths heaved in his torso, and he swallowed. His hand wandered to his chest, and he rubbed his left pectoral near the bullet wound.

“Are you hurting?” she said. Her insides throbbed with agony at the prospect, but she gathered her resolve and said, “We can stop,” despite the wailing no, no, no in the back of her mind.

“It does hurt a little, but...” His voice trailed away.

“What is it?”

“I forgot how ugly it all is.”

She wrapped her legs around his hips, pulled him close, and mashed against his body. His erection caught between them, full and weeping pre-ejaculate, and he groaned into her shoulder. “None of it matters to me,” she told him. “I'm so turned on right now I think I might burst. I'm not freaking kidding, Derek.”

“Hmm,” he said. He kissed her collarbone. Heat coiled between them, and sweat gathered where their skin slipped together with lust-filled friction. They forgot about his scars. He groped her breasts. His thumbs caressed a gasp from her as he drew lazy circles around her nipples.

Soft breaths filled the silence. Every touch spread fire. She hadn't had him in so long. She'd missed this. Missed it so much. Her insides ached with the need to pull him closer. She reached between them and cupped him. “I need you,” she said.

His whole body twitched, and he grunted. “If you do that, I'm not going to make it,” he said,
She bit her lip and smiled. “Really?” she said. She dragged the nail of her index finger along the underside of his erection and delighted in his ragged gasp. This was a game they always played. A sexual Russian roulette.

“Mere, I’m—” he said, but his breath skipped in his chest, and he said nothing else.

“No condom, and no birth control,” she purred against his ear. “We’ve never done this with nothing at all. Just you and me.”

He closed his eyes. He didn't speak. His breaths rasped in his throat. He slammed his hand against the mirror and rested it flat for support.

She stroked his corona with her thumb. He jerked. A whimper crushed in his throat, and he collapsed against her, heavy and unfettered.

“Does that feel good?” she said.

A low, twisty grunt told her yes. Yes, it did.

She looped his corona again and then shifted her attentions lower. She rubbed his frenulum. His jaw clenched. His knees slammed against the dresser. His whole body shuddered. His breaths screwed tight in his chest, deep and straining. His muscles locked, and his grip on her shoulder squeezed to the point of pain.

“Mere, please, I—” he said, his voice nothing more than wisps of syllables connected by the barest thread

“Please, what?” she murmured. She gripped him with his tip against her palm and wrenched her hand like she was trying to unscrew the cap off a jar. He choked and scrabbled against her body like he flailed for a cliff to keep from falling. He sucked in frantic gulps of air.

She watched, fascinated, as he tripped over the point of no return and lost himself in the space beyond. His expression flattened with glassy-eyed, peaceful bliss that made her envious. His lips parted, but no sound came out. His nostrils flared. His biceps flexed as he leaned into her. She cupped his ass to support him.

For a moment, on that pinnacle, he didn't move, didn't breathe, didn't speak, and then he snapped into motion. His lower body jerked in a series of rapid contractions. He spurted warm fluid against her abdomen, and she pulled him tightly into her arms a the seconds ticked past. She counted to twelve as she ran her fingers through his hair. His exhalation in the aftermath pounded against her body, and he didn't lift his head as even breathing resumed.

“Fuck,” he said against her shoulder.

“It's okay,” she said. “My fault.”

He didn't move and wouldn't look at her, and guilt ran her through like a sword. He'd told her he was close, and she'd teased him. Normally, that would have been fine. But they normally didn't go seven weeks without sex. She normally didn't torment him with a striptease beforehand. And, normally, he wasn't so nervous that his body refused to send heat to his extremities.

With a growl of frustration and a dark, upset look that made her insides quiver with regret, he pushed away from the mirror and went to get her a towel.
She panted as she lay with him. Her vocal cords had been reduced from producing coherency to only bleating moans. She pressed her mouth against his shoulder. Her teeth rested against his skin, not really a kiss or a bite or... anything. Just something to let him know that he was doing it right for her. Doing everything right.

She pulled her lips closed, and the taste of salt and male wound down her throat, but she could barely swallow before it all started again. Short, tight breaths. She needed them. Needed air. She pressed her nose into the crook of his neck and breathed and breathed and breathed. He filled her. Their position didn't permit athletic in-and-out like a piston or anything, but he moved enough that she couldn't ever forget he was there. Inside. Building friction and heat and stroking all the right things every time he pushed into her. Her fingertips tightened against the soaked hair at the nape of his neck, and she mashed into him with a helpless, winding, begging moan.

Please. Please. Please, finish.

She didn't want it to ever end, but hovering this close, her abdomen winding tighter and tighter without release, was a form of delicious torture. Living in pleasure that was like pain, knowing she could be weightless if she would just. Freaking. Finish.

He'd taken them up the slope at an indolent pace. They'd stayed ahead of the fire for minutes and minutes, and then it'd slowly consumed them. She rubbed his shoulders, his back. Squeezed. She needed to do something with her arms, needed to move. Needed...

The mattress squeaked, and she pushed down as much as he thrusted up. She couldn't help it. She couldn't help anything. Her legs shivered with the need to offset the coiling, tense energy. She traced a toe along the curly hair dusting his right calf, and his whole body flinched.

A deep, wobbly sound erupted from his lips, though it didn't make any sense. She blinked and watched his eyes, which were clouded with lust and near-completion. His lips had parted, showing pearly teeth as he struggled to breathe on an even keel. Soft, deep grunts peppered his exhalations as he failed and failed again. She squeezed with her lower-body, and she could see it everywhere in the way he reacted. The way a soft groan would bubble in his throat. The way his warm embrace would tense, and his body shivered. The way he looked at her. In love and loving. Helpless but indomitable at the same time.

They'd kissed. For a long time. Talked. Until the dizzying conflagration had swept them up, and now it was a struggle just to think straight, let alone speak or do anything else with a planned purpose. His arms tightened around her body. Warmth to warmth. Sweat slicked their bodies from the slide of skin on skin. Friction. Heat.

“Close?” he said, only to wrench into a moan.

“Please,” was all she could manage.

“Mmm,” he replied. Though she had no idea which flavor of mmm, it was. He had quite a few.

He shifted his weight. His angle changed. His depth became shallow, but he rubbed into all the external nerve bundles that were dying for attention. She moaned like she hurt. Her muscles quivered. He did it again, and she moaned. And moaned. And moaned. Her lips peeled back from her teeth. Her eyes shut. She pressed against his heaving body as he fanned the flames and fanned.

It took him only seconds to turn her to ash. She arched against him, and her body shivered. The tense, climbing feeling she'd endured for the past eternity split open into bliss. A loud, unfettered noise pealed from her throat. He shifted, deepening his position. His arms wrapped around her and squeezed. Her head tilted back, and she stared at him. He stared back, riveted, in the dim light. She struggled to breathe as wave after wave of it rolled through her body in what seemed like an endless ocean. Euphoria. Every muscle in her abdomen came alive, twitching.

When her first spasm hit, he groaned. His breaths sped up. He inhaled. As the pleasure of her own explosion died into a dull hum, she watched him tip over his boat into the swirling chaos of abandon. A languid, loved, bedazzled thrum pulled at her body like a drug, but she pushed it away, just long enough to watch him. Feel him.

He moved inside her, rhythmic pumping motions beyond his control. Wet warmth spread inside her. His fingers twitched, and he groaned as he stilled. His breaths resumed, and a lazy smile slathered his expression.

“Oh,” he said, as though the secret to life, the universe, and everything had been revealed to him.

“Yeah,” she agreed.

Spent, he slipped out of her and rolled onto his back. She settled against his body, moving only enough to reach across him for the lamp switch. Darkness bathed the room. He wrapped his left arm around her body. Safe. Warm. She smiled as she laid her cheek against his chest. His grip relaxed in less than ten seconds. His head tilted against her, his chin to her forehead.

He slept. She'd never seen him collapse that fast except the time he'd stayed up two days to remove an impossible spinal tumor. She supposed she couldn't really complain. Her eyelids dipped. Every muscle in her body tingled. The room blurred, and she hovered in a cloudy, pleased, safe place. She lost the world beyond his arm and dreamed.

[Now]

The alarm shrilled in her ear, and she flinched awake at the awful, bone-vibrating, evil noise. Her brain felt like goo, and a headache split open behind her eyes as she rolled to turn off the offending appliance. She slapped blindly, hoping to hit the right button. A deep, annoyed moan rumbled beside her. On the third try, the noise ceased. Her ears rang. She squinted. 4AM, the clock proclaimed in the blurry darkness. She breathed, and she rolled back against his naked body.

Five more minutes. Just five.

He grunted, and her fleshy pillow moved. “No,” she whined. “Five minutes.” She reached for him, trying to keep him there. Her grasping hands found his arm. She felt the soft carpet of hairs on his skin slip underneath her fingertips, but he didn't stop. He left her bereft. Alone. She moaned.

A warm palm splayed against her back. He rubbed her. “You'll be late,” he said, but his voice sounded wrong. Tight. The mattress shifted. He panted in the dark.

She didn't want to get up. This would be one of those mornings where she fell asleep in the shower, her toothbrush dangling from her hands. She would need Starbucks. Lots. She knew the day would suck when she was already fantasizing about a nap in the on-call room despite not having even sat up yet. And—

When she heard Derek's pill bottle jingle, she snapped out of her sleepy haze and forced herself up. “Are you okay?” she said.

He didn't answer right away. He sat on the edge of the bed by his nightstand, his posture hunched.
He put a hand out against the nightstand. Things cascaded to the floor. Books. His watch and several cellular phones. A wet splatter and crash told her he'd knocked over his water bottle, too. He cursed. Under his breath. If she hadn't been so focused on him, she wouldn't have heard it.

“Derek?” she prodded.

The mattress shifted as he thought about standing up. He groaned, and he sank back down. “Would you get me a glass of water?” he said, his voice low and miserable. “Please?”

She stumbled to her feet. The room revolved. Exhaustion destroyed her perception for a good twenty seconds, and nerves didn't help. He hadn't let her get anything for him in weeks. Not since he'd been up and walking again after his pneumonia. He always said he was fine. Fine. I'm fine.

“Sure,” she said, swallowing as she blindly clawed the area rug for clothing. She remembered after a long, frantic minute, that the only things that would be strewn on the floor were the skanky remnants of her striptease, one of his dirty t-shirts, and some threadbare pajama pants.

She heard his tightened, pained breaths, and she gave up on the idea of clothes for the moment. She stumbled into the master bathroom and grabbed a Dixie cup from the sink. When she turned on the the bathroom light, pain seared into her skull. She blinked. Her pupils adjusted, but not fast enough.

She filled the cup and went back into the bedroom. A triangle of sharp light from the bathroom lit the bedroom. He sat, hunched and grimacing, naked, eyes shut. She handed him the cup, and watched him down his OxyContin and a Percocet. She swallowed. She didn't think they'd been rough last night. He'd jarred himself a couple times, but...

“Are you okay?” she said.

He gave her a small, apologetic smile creased with pain. “I'm bad at remembering to take pills when you're dancing naked in my face. I'll be fine in a minute.”

“Oh,” she said, and she exhaled with relief. She sat on the mattress next to him. She kissed his shoulder and hoped he would feel better soon.

“You'll be late if you don't start getting ready,” he said.

She shrugged. “I don't think I care.” She closed her eyes. She ached. All over. But it was a pleasant sort of ache. Now past her initial panic that Derek had somehow hurt himself the night before, she couldn't bring herself to be anything but relaxed. Loose. Pleased. She giggled, and she kissed him. “When are we doing that again?”

“Dancing naked in my face?” he said. “You can dance naked anytime. I won't complain.”

She bumped her elbow against him. “Baby-making, you over-sexed lummox,” she corrected.

“Over-sexed lummox,” he replied with a grin. “That's a new one. I'll file it next to Ferrari.”

She chuckled. “Derek,” she said. “Seriously.”

“Seriously,” he echoed. He kissed her. “I love you,” he said.

“I love you, too,” she said. “When?”

“Who are we saying is over-sexed here again?” he said.
She laughed. “Touche or whatever. When?”

He sighed, and he leaned against her body. Pain had worked its way out of his gaze, replaced by a glazed look of opiates and tiredness. “Maybe tomorrow?” he said.

She stroked his shoulder and tried to force her pleased lower-body to remember he was still healing. Forgetting to take painkillers wasn't the catastrophe it'd been a month ago, but he still needed them. He still hurt. “No pressure,” she said. “I don't mean to come off like I'm starved for attention or demanding or whatever. I just... I missed you. I missed you so much. Last night was...”

“It's okay. I missed you, too,” he said, his voice soft. He nuzzled her hair, and he kissed her temple, and she relished the warm, secure feel of him. Naked. Comforting. Hers. “Hmm,” he said. Tired. The sheets rustled as he shifted. His grip slackened. He kissed her once more, and then he lay flat. His eyelids dipped as she pulled the sheets over his supine body.

“You're making me freaking jealous, you know,” she said as she watched him stretch and prepare for sleep like a big, happy cat. “But just think. In two weeks, that alarm will be for you, too.”

She didn't know how she'd expected him to respond to that. A smile. A wink. A teasing remark. Something. She sat against the mattress by his hip and rubbed the sheet over his leg when he said nothing. At first, she thought he might already be asleep, but the sharp triangle of light from the bathroom betrayed him. She saw the vague shine his eyeballs as he peered at the ceiling.

“What is it?” she said.

He didn't reply. Not right away. She would have pressured him to talk. She'd gotten used to pressuring him. If he said he didn't want to talk, she backed off. A lot of times, though, she'd found he just needed a bit of a push. Something to make himself expend effort on translation from twisty-Derek-jumble to English. But she saw his expression. He blinked. His Adam's apple rolled as he swallowed. He was trying. Trying to think of something to say, and so she remained by his side, waiting, watching. Silent. She stroked his chest.

“I don't want to go back,” he said.

She blinked, trying to force her body to be awake. Surprise made her head spin. He'd never said anything about going back to work. Not once. She realized it only now that he'd brought it up. Work. She wondered if he didn't want to return to the place he'd been shot. Or if it was something else. Or both.

“What?” she said.

He rolled onto his side. “I don't know.”

She didn't know what to say. “Is it because you were shot there?” she said.

“I think I hate being Chief,” he replied. “And I don't...” He sighed. “People scare me.”

A lump formed in her throat. She hadn't thought about that before, either. He had a difficult time with sudden movements. Loud noises. A hospital was full of sudden movements and loud noises. Neurological patients, in particular, had the tendency to shift from calm to hysterical, still to twitching, in the blink of an eye. The emergency room dealt with all kinds of injuries. From a simple oops to intentional harm. The results of gang fights showed up on their doorstep all the time. Though security worked diligently, unsecured guns were something he would probably see from time to time if he ventured there. Knives. Other weapons. Every day would remind him that what had happened to him happened to other people all the time. That he wasn't safe. That it could happen again.

She had no idea what they could do about that.

“You should talk to Richard,” she said. She stroked his hair. “About the Chief thing. Tell him to stay on as interim Chief while you get your feet wet with just surgeries again.”

“I don’t know,” he said. “Maybe.”

Silence stretched. Her mind churned through ideas. He tended to stay at home. He went out for walks. If somebody ran errands, he sometimes went, just to keep from going stir crazy. But those instances were few and far between in comparison to his relative solitude. Maybe he just needed practice. A chance to return his mind to status quo.

“Let’s go to Pike Place,” she said. “Tomorrow after my shift. I’ll go in really early so I can get out mid-afternoon.”

“Why?”

“We can walk around,” she said. “Maybe go to that restaurant where Sleepless in Seattle was filmed and people watch. It might help you get used to people again.”

“Maybe,” he said.

“And then we can have sex afterward,” she added. “Maybe I’ll be a french maid.”

His body twitched, and she felt weight slough from her shoulders as he laughed. A happy, genuine chuckle that relaxed her just by the sound of it. “Mere, you’re really late,” he said. His sleepy gaze twinkled in the dim light.

She leaned against his body and kissed him. “Do we have a date?”

“Yes,” he said. “Get ready already so I don’t have to fire you when I go back.”

She laughed and grabbed her robe from the bathroom door. Light yawned wider into the room, and then blinked off as she flipped the switch. The red robe settled around her body. She tripped on the pile of junk they’d spilled by the bureau the evening before, but he didn’t comment. When she glazed back, she realized he’d already fallen back into dreaming.
The bullet slammed into his chest and knocked his breath away. He couldn't scream. The white, endless ceiling cartwheeled over his field of vision. He fell to the floor, and his eyes snapped open to darkness, but the muzzle of the gun hovered in the blur as Gary Clark aimed for a second shot. Derek lay there, panting. He couldn't speak or move. He waited to die.

Except he didn't die, and over minutes, he lost sight of the gun. He lay in bed on his back next to Meredith, staring at the ceiling in their bedroom, and he didn't die. Panic receded like a wave, leaving him in a muddy pit of doubt, not relief. His body shook. His eyes watered. The bullet wound plagued him with a persistent, painful ache, and he pawed at his chest with his shaky hand. His palm met the rough, pocked place where the bullet had broken him. No blood. Warm skin.

Breathing hurt, but he couldn't catch his breath to make it slow. He rolled to his side. Resistant sheets and blankets clung to his sweaty, naked skin and then released. He thumped to the floor. His toes scrunched the area carpet in the darkness, and he would have gotten up. Would have. A wave of weakness tugged him to the floor, and he curled inward on himself, grabbing his knees.

He rested, his back against the mattress, his side against his nightstand. Hot tears fell against his knees. Nausea swirled, and he thought he might throw up on himself. The taste of bile crashed into the back of his throat, and his tongue pulled back from his teeth in the precursor to vomit. His body jerked. Nothing came up, and he swallowed. Saliva stuck to the inside of his mouth. His mouth felt pasty and gummy.

His chest hurt. An aching, twinging, sting punched a line through his body. In time with his heart, it throbbed in horrible waves. Pa-pain. Pa-pain. Pa-pain. Not agony. Not like it had been. But enough, after seven weeks, that even mild as it was, it made him want to claw his body to pieces just to make it stop. His pain tolerance had been decimated after seven weeks of whittling away and whittling away. After seven weeks of fear, no sleep, and weakness.

The muzzle of the gun pressed against his forehead, and his body tensed. “I'll kill you,” Gary Clark said. “I'll pull the trigger. You'll splatter like a ripe tomato.”

Derek glanced at his nightstand where his pill bottles rested next to a water bottle. Three. Three pills would make this go away. Everything. The pain. Gary Clark. Reality would stretch, and he would be anywhere he wanted if he thought about it long enough. Four, and he wouldn't dream at all. There would just be empty, fuzzy black, and time would pass, but he wouldn't care or notice. He'd get through the night. He could.

Derek cradled his head against his knees as his murderer smiled at him in the blur. He swallowed. Three pills. Three. Or four? He reached for the bottle. His fingertips brushed the cool plastic. A low-pitched, frightened moan made him freeze, and Gary Clark's apparition faded.

“Meredith?” he whispered, and he set the pill bottle down, unopened.

She made another noise. Trembling, he stood despite a collection of shooting pains, and he crawled back into bed. The sheets slipped over his body. He slid across the smooth cotton until he met the warmth of her naked skin. She twitched. The dim street lamps laved her body with a silver glow in the darkness.

“No,” she murmured. Her head moved, and her eyelids flickered as her eyeballs chased the sights in her dream. “Derek, no,” she said, and his heart squeezed at her disturbed tone.
Dr. Shepherd, Dr. Kepner had said. Thank god, you're back.

The gun roared. He didn't remember the impact; he just remembered staring up at the ceiling. He couldn't breathe. Dr. Kepner screamed and started talking, but he couldn't understand the words.

Somewhere in that morass, he knew Meredith had been watching. Screaming. “Meredith,” he said. His gut quivered, and he closed his eyes. The gun fired. Again and again. He found his voice somewhere in the rumbling thunder, but it sounded weak and beaten and scared. “You're dreaming,” he said, to him, to her. “Stop. It's okay.”

When I saw you get shot right in front of me, she'd said, I was thirty-two, and I'm going to be seeing it in my head for the rest of my life.

“Meredith,” he said.

Her body stilled and relaxed as she woke. She took a long, deep breath and then sighed. He settled along her length and wrapped his arm over her hip. “Hey,” she murmured. She didn't open her eyes, but she clutched his palm and squeezed.

“I'm here,” he managed. “Go back to sleep.”

“Mmm,” she said. Her hands tightened around his, and he couldn't move without disturbing her. She took her comfort in his presence. Her breaths evened, and she fell into more pleasant dreams in moments. He could tell by the way her tension drained, and by the soft, happy noises she made before she began to rumble with familiar, raucous snores.

The shaky, nauseous feeling wouldn't leave him be so he could join her. His chest hurt. His muscles trembled. He breathed against her hair. Soft. Lavender. A hint of sweat and sex.

He closed his eyes, and he tried to relax. Noises in the old house made him tense. Old creaks and sighs of it settling between Meredith's snores. He imagined footsteps. His murderer lurked while his chest throbbed. Sleep took him by force after what felt like hours of lying helpless, waiting to die with her in his arms.

The dark house enveloped him as he stamped his muddy boots on the welcome mat. Rain came down outside, pounding, endless. His head ached. He'd ridden the subway home and walked the last few blocks, leaving him drenched and shivering and feeling sort of sick. His waterlogged jeans, sweater, and coat felt like they weighed an extra forty pounds.

He'd been at the library until 2AM, researching for a paper in his neurology class while Mark had jabbered and joked and threw crunched up balls of notebook paper around like miniature basketballs, much to Derek's annoyance. Derek needed to get a good grade. He would fail the class if he didn't.

A brief flutter of panic overwhelmed him. Fail. Fail. You'll fail, a voice said in his head. He stood in the doorway for a long, achy moment, panting, listening to the disembodied berating. His eyes wouldn't quite focus. He'd strained them that much, reading article after article with big words and small print. He pinched the bridge of his nose and breathed.

A small noise on the couch drew him out of his spiraling worry.

He squinted. A blurry lump made the couch seem bulbous and blob-like. He flipped the light switch, and spears of yellow radiance stabbed his eyes. He blinked. Amy hissed at him. Her hair spiraled from her scalp in twisty coils as though she were Medusa's daughter.
“Trn-off-th’light,” his little sister said, her voice slurred and low-pitched with sleep.

He glared and let the lamp light spear her as her familiar tone registered. She wasn't just slurred from sleep, he realized. “Amy, what are you doing?” he said. He tried to sound calm. Not accusing. Not anything.

She licked her lips and rolled off the couch to her feet with sloppy, flailing limbs. He caught her before she fell and broke her neck. “Jus' needed a pickmeup,” she said. A burble of laughter fell from her lips. The stench of alcohol wafted into the air as she breathed, open-mouthed and heavy, against his wet shirt.

She stumbled in his grasp and backed up a step. An open bottle of his best Scotch rolled off the couch and spilled. A wet, reeking stain spread on the carpet as the liquid made a glug-glug-glug noise and then stopped when it reached equilibrium. An unmarked pill bottle lay open and tipped on the side table. White powder spread on the tabletop where she'd crushed whatever she'd taken. One pill remained whole in the orange bottle, but he couldn't identify it on sight.

His gut tightened. She'd started mixing. She would kill herself.

“What did you take?” he demanded.

“What did you take, Amy?” He shook her. Her body was pliant like the corpses in his anatomy lab. Like a dead thing. In his arms. Dead. “How much?”

“How much?” he roared in her face.

She didn't answer. His teeth clenched as her gaze fell on him. Her bloodshot, blue eyes were cloudy and unfocused. Her pupils had dilated to the size of saucers. She had no coordination in her limbs. She tried to pull away, or rather fall over. He squeezed her wrists and held her close. Rain dripped off his dark coat and down his face. It dripped off his chin to the floor. He shivered as a dark, raging thing coiled in his stomach.

“Amy,” he said. “You need to stop doing this. You told me—”

“This-is-th’last-time,” she slurred. “I swear.”

He swallowed as her voice echoed in his head across dozens of old memories like a repeating cassette player. The last time. She always said that. He'd gotten tired of trying to believe her. “Do you have any idea what this is doing to Mom?” he said. To me? To everyone? “You need to stop doing this.”

A horn honked outside, and a smile oozed across her face as though he'd said nothing. “M'ride,” she said, and she tried to loose his hands from her biceps.

“No,” he said. “You’re not going out like this. Sober up, first.”

She struggled. “Fuck you. You're not my dad.”

“Dad is dead,” he snapped. Agony pinched her face as though he'd slapped her. “He's dead, Amy, whether you're stoned or not.” A lump formed in his throat as he pictured the marbled head stone on the plot where Michael Shepherd had been buried. Derek's eyes hurt. Rain crashed against the roof of the old house. “I'm not Dad,” he said, “But I'm all there is anymore.”

“Well, you're doing a bang-up job,” she said. She sniffed and looked away. “Really. Thanks.” Her tone belied her words.

“Do you really want to see him again that badly?” he said, his voice soft. His headache beat like a drum behind his skull.

She looked at him, blinking. Watery film spread across her eyes, and her pained gaze caught him in its net. For a moment, he thought he’d gotten through to her. Just a moment. But then she laughed, and she pushed him. He stumbled at her unexpected movement, but he held onto her.

“I don't care,” she said.

Her words splashed his face like the cold rainwater coming down in buckets outside, and he blinked. She tried to shake away his hands. He didn't budge. “Go to your room, and sleep this off,” he said. “Now, Amelia.” He would watch her and make sure she hadn't overdosed or something. He’d done it so many times he couldn't count anymore.

She moved faster than he thought her capable. Something wet hit the skin of his hand, but he didn’t have time to think about it. Pain sliced his palm as she bit him. Hard. He yelled and let go.

“Fuck!” he cursed as she stumbled toward the door. She'd broken skin. Teeth marks formed a bruised, red crescent in the web of skin between his thumb and index finger, and his nerve endings shot agony up to his elbow.

He reached for her, but she pushed the door against him. He thumped against the wall, bell rung by the impact. He tried to catch his breath as she glared. “You’re not my dad, and you're not my doctor,” she hissed. Her fury brought clarity to her words. “Stay the fuck away from me. You don’t understand anything, Derek.”

The door rattled as she slammed it in his face. He shook his hand, breathing, trying to recover his wits. Blood wept from his skin.

“Derek?” called his mother down the stairs, her voice still slurred with the cobwebs of dreaming. “Are you all right? Was that Amy? It’s three in the morning.” Her feet thudded on the steps, and he couldn’t look at her. Couldn’t look at her standing there in her ratty bathrobe, her hair a wild mess from sleep.

He fled outside just in time to see Amy and her stoner friends weave off into the rain and darkness in a beat-up blue Firebird he didn't recognize. The rain and his fury blurred the license plate. The Firebird turned the corner and was gone before he'd come up with any functional thoughts about what to do.

Failed, said the voice. Just like always.

“Fuck,” Derek said. He kicked the grass, and wet, dirty slop almost made him slip and crack his head on the sidewalk. Water sprayed. The rain thundered down against the pavement. “Fuck!” he yelled. Lights came on. Dogs barked. He couldn't breathe, couldn't think. Everything turned red and blurred as he let go of everything that toiled inside him. Wet tears slipped down his cheeks and mixed with rain. He heard the door behind him open.

“Derek,” said his mom, and he moved. Toward his bike. He'd parked it on the curb that morning. He ripped the tarp away and straddled the seat. He gunned the engine. The Harley throbbed. He jerked the handle and revved it. The seat vibrated with pent energy. More lights turned on. All the dogs in the neighborhood had woken up. He didn't care.

“Derek!” his mother called.

He didn't answer her as he throttled into the rain.

Blaring car horns became the rhythmic, throbbing scream of an alarm clock in his ears. Daylight slammed into his eyeballs as he chanced a look at the room. The black pavement sliding into a rainy horizon became soft, cotton sheets as his gaze took a snapshot of the room. He squeezed his eyes shut. He turned his head away from the noise and pulled the pillow over his head. He let the alarm ring and ring and ring. It would turn off after a few minutes.

His throat felt sore. His eyes hurt. His head hurt. The room swerved back and forth as consciousness lost its grip. Tired. He hadn't slept this little since he was an intern, not even when Meredith had kicked him out after sex, what seemed like eons ago. At least then, he'd been fucking healthy.

The alarm stopped. Silence crushed him. The sheets rustled. “Derek,” Meredith said, as if to announce her presence, that it was her, and that she approached. She'd been doing that for weeks, now, ever since she'd sneaked up on him in the kitchen the night they'd fought.

He grunted, unable to come up with anything intelligent to say. He just wanted to lie there and not think and not sleep. If he slept, he dreamed, and he always remembered something bad, like his unconscious thought was taking cue cards from his waking stress. It probably was. That's how dreams worked, wasn't it?

Her warm hand slid up his spine and stopped where the pillow covered his neck. She laughed. “Did I wear you out last night?” she said, her voice muffled through his fluffy shield. She kissed his back. “I'm sorry.”

“Mmm,” he said. The echo of her tongue on his skin made him twitch. He couldn't help the ghost of a smile that curled his lips as he thought of her opened wide for him. “No, that was good,” he said, but his voice came out strained and croaky from sleep loss. Her grip clenched.

“It's 6:30,” she said. He didn't budge. Maybe she would leave him be. “Are you going to get up for your appointment?” She shook him, and he groaned as her earthquake rumbled through his body.

Stay awake, damn it, she'd said while he'd been bleeding.

He had a followup at Seattle Grace today. The last check before he resumed limited work. Dread coiled in his gut. He swallowed against a cold spear of anxiety. He'd avoided going back to Seattle Grace. His physical therapy had been a few blocks away from Meredith's house so he could walk to it if he wanted, and the cardio-thoracic surgeon on staff at Seattle Presbyterian had looked him over when he'd been in with pneumonia.

He wondered if they'd manged to clean his blood off the floor tiles on the catwalk, or if there was a stain where he would have died. Blood left a dark memory in grout that was hard to scrub away, even with bleach. After years working in hospitals, he knew that. Nausea rolled into him, and he inhaled the warm scent of the sheets, but it didn't help.

Gary Clark laughed in his ears as the white ceiling tumbled over Derek's face. Dr. Kepner babbled, but Derek didn't understand the words. He couldn't breathe, and the bullet wound sharpened like a blade in his torso. Dr. Kepner abandoned him. The gun still echoed in his ears. He lay supine, waiting to die. Derek begged, and he waited as Gary Clark aimed again.
“Derek?” Meredith prodded.

“I don't feel well,” he said against the mattress as the memory oozed away, leaving only ache behind as the bullet wound twinged.

“Are you getting sick again?” she said. “You sound hoarse.”

“No.”

“Does it hurt?”

“Not really, I'm...” He took a breath and shoved the pillow away. The room seemed to quiver. She sat beside him, and he stared at her out of the corner of his left eye. She was already dressed in jeans and a t-shirt, her hair gathered up in a messy ponytail. Her face seemed pale, her hair lanky. She wore concealer, but he could still see the circles under her eyes. Worry clouded her gaze. “Did I wear you out?” he said.

“I didn't sleep well,” she said. “Thank you.”

“For what?”

He closed his eyes. “Love you, too,” he said, and he let the room drift away as he stared at him, stroking his back. His world-spinning headache didn't seem so awful when he closed his eyes. He listened to her breathing, and he let it soothe him.

“So, why don't you feel well?” she said. “Nightmares again?”

I almost died fifty times in my sleep, he could say. Instead, he didn't reply. He pulled the pillow over his head, burrowing. The mattress shifted as she stood with a sigh. She'd be late if she lingered much longer. His senses dulled by the pillow, he lost track of her as she moved away. Silence. But she didn't say goodbye. The space behind his eyes rushed and separated in the blackness. Even if he didn't want it, sleep would take him back, soon. He'd be dying again, or dead.

The blankets ripped away from him, and he grabbed at the mattress. His heart thumped, and he yelled in surprise as cool air hit his skin. He didn't know what was happening. Fear exploded through his body, but he couldn't convince his muscles to do anything other than shake. His breath skipped away. The death he'd waited for all night had finally arrived.

The fitted sheet underneath him jerked. He slid an inch. Two. She grunted. Exhaustion and panic prevented him from understanding anything but the fact that he was being dragged somewhere against his will.

“Get up, Derek,” Meredith snapped, but all he heard was Mr. Clark. “You'll be late,” turned into, “You're not the man.”

“No,” Derek said as the last bit of air punched free from his lungs. The sheet stopped moving that instant.

Gary Clark yanked the pillow away from him. “Seriously,” he said.

Light slammed into Derek's eyeballs as his canopy tore away. He grabbed for the pillow reflexively, but he'd been blinded. His grasping fingers brushed the pillowcase, but he missed. The shadow of his murderer's body eclipsed all else. Derek raised his arm to protect himself. He bent at the waist and whipped into a fetal position. Mr. Clark threw the pillow behind him, and it landed on the floor with a thump. Tears welled in Derek's eyes.

“No,” he said. “Please.”

Gary Clark froze. The world caught up with Derek, and he realized there was no Gary Clark. Only her. Only Meredith. He should have known that. He should have. He grunted in frustration as the live wires twitching his muscles stopped sparking. His panting eased into slow, calmed breaths. He closed his eyes and made a sick sound deep in his throat. He relaxed.

“Meredith,” he said, exhaustion and embarrassment grating his tone. Why? Why had she done that to him?

A stricken look carved her sleep-longing face. She sat on the bed beside his body and stroked his side. “I'm sorry,” she said. “I thought you knew it was me. I've been within four feet of you this whole time.”

“I had a bad night,” he said.

She sighed. “Every night's a bad night, Derek. Every day's a bad day.”

“Don't you think I'm sick of it, too?” he snapped. “I fucking hate this.”

“You'll always be scared if you don't even try not to be,” she said. “So, get up.”

He clenched his fingers. “I can't go there today. I'm not ready. Please.”

“No,” she said. “It won't work this time. You do that all the freaking time. I'm very sorry I scared you, but I'm not backing down. Stop 'please'-ing me to get what you want.”

Silence stretched. His stomach clenched. He tried not to chuckle. He did. His face turned red with the effort, and finally a small snort popped loose. “Meredith...”

Her eyes twinkled. “That came out wrong, didn't it?”

“A bit,” he said.

“Look. Just try. Okay?” she said. “I want you to go at your own pace. I do. But don't just stop. Stopping isn't a pace. It's stopping. The more you stop, the harder it is to get going again. I know from experience.”

“I'm sorry, Meredith,” he said. “I'm...”

“Don't be sorry, Derek,” she replied. “Just get up, and go to your freaking appointment.”

He sighed. He glanced at the digital alarm clock. Red numbers glared at him. “You're late again,” he said to her as the time registered through the fog of exhaustion.

“It doesn't matter,” she said. “I'm going on maternity leave soon, anyway.”

“Mmm,” he replied. “Confidence. I like it.” His breaths halted when he assembled the possible meanings of her sentence in his head. His gaze shifted to her nightstand. An open pregnancy test box sat behind the alarm clock in the expanding pool of morning sunlight. She'd bought a huge stack of them, and she'd put them in her drawer as he'd watched. “Unless...”

He swallowed. It'd been less than fourteen days since they'd started trying again. They'd only had sex about four times. Or... His mind raced as he tried to remember the specific times, but they blurred into a long, passionate moan in his brain. A lick of salt on her skin. The drips of her sweat. The wet, tight heat of her body sheathing him as he drove himself home to her center. Four times. He was pretty sure. Five? No. Four. Bed, bed, dresser, and bed. They couldn't possibly get that lucky. Could they? She'd gotten her first period after the miscarriage two-and-a-half weeks ago. Ovulation was feasible, but... There was no way the test would pick up a new life blooming from just last night. Was there?

“Are you pregnant already?” he blurted.

“It's okay,” he said. “Did you take a test while I was sleeping?”

“No,” she said. “I just wanted to read the instructions. I forgot to put the box away.” She kissed him. “I'd warn you if I was taking one this time. No more bombshells.”

“I appreciate it,” he said.

She shrugged. “You asked. I love you,” she said, as though it were a simple math equation. Two plus two is four. A no brain-er. Her eyelashes lowered over her pretty gray eyes as she stared at him. He watched her gaze trace the lines of his naked body, unabashed, unhidden, and an unimpeachable sense of security overwhelmed him. She loved him. She said it all the time, now. She never pent anything up anymore. She touched him, stroked him, kissed him. All the time. Unsolicited. Despite how horribly he'd treated her. Despite everything. He knew he'd become high maintenance since the shooting. Something less than he'd been. He knew it, and he hated it, but she hadn't once shown any doubts. She'd never not been there. A lump thickened in his throat, for the first time in weeks not wrought by something upsetting. He swallowed.

“Thank you,” he said, his voice rough and low. The world blurred as he blinked.

She stared at him. “For what?”

“I don't know,” he said. “Everything, I guess.”

She smiled. “Are you going to get dressed, now?”

“You don't like me naked anymore?”

She slapped his ass, and he smirked. “I love you naked, but get dressed,” she said. “Seriously. You're even later than me.”

He rolled onto his stomach and took a deep, cleansing breath. His ribs pressed in, and the bullet wound tightened. His sternum thrummed with vague discomfort. Don't keep this up, it said. But I'll let you go for now. The soft scent of the sheets caressed him, and he needed it. He'd slept there, yes, but they smelled like her. Like home. The last trill of upset left behind by his terror-filled awakening slipped away.

“I'm on my stomach,” he said. He breathed, and he couldn't help the smile that overwhelmed him, or the pang of excitement. He realized he'd been staring at the mattress when he'd woken to the alarm clock. The sheets had been his pale horizon. “I was on my stomach when I woke up this morning.”

“I noticed,” she said. “How does it feel?”
“Weird.”

“Weird like ouch?”

“Not ouch,” he said. “But not entirely pleasant. I'm—” He grunted as he pushed himself onto his side and tried to sit up. He used his arms to push up. That hurt. He groaned and bit his lip as a wince creased his face, but he managed to find upright before the pain skidded him to a halt. “I'm getting so fucking tired of this.”

She raised an eyebrow. “Getting?”

“I guess I passed that point a while ago.”

“Maybe a bit,” she said. She wrapped her arms around him, and he sighed in her embrace. “You're so much better, though, Derek. Really.” She kissed his ear. “When you first woke up from surgery, you couldn't walk. You couldn't sit up. You couldn't even breathe on your own.”

“I know,” he said, and he looked at the floor.

He sighed, and he wobbled to his feet, using her shoulder as a support. Getting out of bed was, really, the hardest part of the day. His sternum made pushing himself up from lying flat to standing a chore, though at least he didn't get stuck anymore. He couldn't count the times he'd had to ask somebody to help him in the past months. Mostly Mark and Meredith, but once only Lexie had been around.

He straightened up by himself. He walked. By himself. He grabbed a towel from the rack in the master bathroom and wrapped it around his waist, just in case there were people still in the house. He hated that. Having to grab a towel to walk four feet across the main hallway to the shower, but he wouldn't have to deal with that much longer.

They had a house. Of plywood.

“I'll wait downstairs,” Meredith said. She gave him a small smile, and he smiled back.

He took a quick shower and pulled boxer briefs, an old pair of jeans, and a folded t-shirt from the dresser. He didn't shave. Too much effort. He wouldn't wear a suit or tie. He wasn't the Chief today. His nerves re-collected in her absence as he yanked his gray Bowdoin t-shirt over his head. He brushed his fingertips along the soft hemline.

I need to wear that, he'd said as she'd twisted his shirt into a wrinkled mess with her nervous hands. The last time he'd worn this shirt, he'd been helpless. She'd helped him put it on when he hadn't been able to lift his own arms.

He'd been at Seattle Grace for days after his surgery, but he'd stayed in his hospital room, for the most part. He'd been drugged out of his mind. Exhausted. He hadn't gone to his office, or to the catwalk, or visited the operating room where he'd lain on a gurney, unable to breathe while Meredith talked about dirty sex with him.

As a critical care patient, he hadn't been accessible to most of the hospital staff. Only the employees assigned directly to him had been allowed anywhere near him. No rubber-neckers permitted. No gawkers. No accusers. None of the friends and family of the people he'd gotten killed had spoken to him.

He brushed his teeth. He flossed. He slicked cold, sticky gel through his hair so he wouldn't end up with a horrific, frizzy mess when it dried, but he didn't bother with the hairdryer. He put on and laced his cross-trainers. All by himself.

She waved a toasted, plain bagel at him on the way out the door, but his stomach twisted, and he shook his head. She didn't press him as he forced himself down the front walk. She armed the new house alarm they'd had installed and shut the door behind her.

The air was wet, but the sky was clear, and the sun shone down, unobstructed. The scent of green, cut grass and moist earth touched his nose, and he inhaled. The air was pleasant, and a breeze blew through. Not warm or hot. Not cool or cold. Idyllic. Bird calls boomeranged between the trees, from jays to little finches. A lawnmower whirred in the distant background.

She wrapped her arms around his waist as he paused. “It's nice out today.”

“Mmm,” he agreed, but his brief respite faded when he glanced at his Cayenne, sitting in the driveway behind Meredith's Jeep. One look at the shiny, black paint, and his mouth went dry.

Fifteen minutes. Thirty in traffic, maybe. And then they would be there.

“I can't do this,” he wanted to say.

“Derek,” said the One. Beautiful face. “Please. Focus. Focus for me. It's me. It's Meredith. And I need you to-” Off. But he saw the word finish on her lips.

Move. He could do that. Could he? Yes.

He forced himself into the passenger seat of his Cayenne. He pulled his seat belt over his torso and lap. The engine rumbled as she turned the key. She babbled at him about schedules. Mark would take him home after his appointment, she said. She had a thirty-six hour shift this time, so she wouldn't be home until the day after, she said. She said, she said, she said, until it became a drone he heard but didn't process. He didn't mean to ignore her, but he couldn't listen.

The car jounced as she rolled it backward out of the driveway. He clutched the handle over the window. It didn't hurt very much. Just a twist down his center that faded. He winced, but that was all. He leaned against his knees, and his breaths screwed in his chest. Tight. Tighter. He gripped the bridge of his nose as he felt the car accelerate.

They'd made it to the highway. He blinked, and he stared at the concrete road. Watching the white lines blur made him sicker. Meredith darted and weaved between cars as though she were hired for Nascar. He watched a shiny red Prius slide backward past his window, and then he peeled his gaze from the road entirely. He settled on her.

“You had a nightmare last night, too,” he said, trying to push away the churning in his empty gut.

“Yeah.”

“About?” he said. Derek, no, she'd said. Like he'd been dying. He closed his eyes and gripped the seat as he waited for her to reply.

She shrugged. “Never getting pregnant.”

“You're worried about getting pregnant?”

“I didn't think I was, but last night I was chased by a box of Night Light condoms and an overzealous, stomp-y can of spermicide.”
He choked on a breath. The engine roared, and his body lurched forward as she braked and switched to the middle lane to get around an idiot gabbing on his cell phone in the fast lane. He clenched his fingers. “That's...” he managed before he had to stop talking, or he would burst. Bursting into gales of amusement would not be supportive.

“It was more scary and less funny when I was sleeping,” Meredith said. “I swear.”

He watched her. Flush spread between her freckles. She bit her lip. Her body quivered. Pressure built. They laughed at the same time, and he relaxed in the shared moment. He loved her laugh. The way she forgot the world. He brushed her face with his palm as she sniffled, recovering. He wondered how she would look, glowing and pregnant, and his nerves slid away.

I look like I tried to eat a freaking beach ball, she would say.

It's our beach ball, though, he'd assure her. You look beautiful.

Liar, she'd say. But she'd smile. He'd kiss her, and she'd laugh her perfect laugh.

“It was a really big box,” Meredith said as she wiped her face and blinked as she focused on the road.

“I miss those condoms,” he said. “Those were fun.”

“They glowed, Derek. In the dark. They made sex look like a freaking UFO encounter.”

He smirked at her as he stroked her hair. She turned her face, relinquishing her attention from the road for a moment to kiss his hand. She made a soft, pleasant noise that turned into a growl when a car blocked her path, and she swerved. His gut quivered, but he ignored it.

“We've only been having sex again for a week-and-a-half,” he said.

He expected to be waiting six months for a positive pregnancy test. Maybe a year. He pictured a tiny, squirming bundle of nothing but lungs. She'd cry, and he'd wonder again how something so loud could come from someone so very tiny. Seven pounds, maybe eight. Part him. Part Meredith. Theirs. Made by them during an expression of love.

He swallowed as he watched Meredith, tried to picture her face as a baby, but he couldn't. She had piercing cat eyes, a long, slender nose, and a huge, glowing smile that didn't make sense on features only a few inches wide. She rarely showed him pictures from her childhood. He didn't think she had that many.

She sighed. “I know it won't happen right away. Well, it could. But I'm not expecting... I'm trying not to expect...”

“We'll get there,” Derek said. “I got through birth control.”

She snorted. “Does this mean I get to call them Supersperm?”

“Well, they're pretty super, I'd say, knocking you up through almost guaranteed failure;” he said.

“I know we could be waiting months,” she said. “It's normal to take months. I just...”

“You know it will take months, but you want it to be now,” he said. “I know the feeling.”

He brushed the seat belt with his palm. His bullet wound rested just underneath. He didn't need a pillow for support in the car anymore, at least. The little jostles and bumps didn't bother him much.
He leaned back into his seat and watched the road blur through his eyelashes. The bay spread out beside them under a blue sky. All blue. All sharp. All brilliant. All real. He inhaled, and the soft scent of her conditioner swirled with the freon emitting from the car's air vents.

“Do you still have the other nightmare a lot?” he said.

“Huh?”

She maneuvered the car onto the exit ramp, and his body tensed. Minutes. They were minutes away.

“The one about me dying,” he said as the car rolled through the curve of the exit. He leaned into it. She gunned onto the main street and cut across two lanes. The car straightened out, but his stomach didn't.

“Not since we started having sex again,” she said.

“I'm glad,” he said. “I'm sorry...”

They stopped at a glowing red light. She turned. “Sorry for what?”

Derek watched as a bustling crowd wandered into the crosswalk. Several people wore scrubs, some brown, some periwinkle, some navy. Close. They were close. Mere blocks away. He clenched the door handle, and he swallowed.

“I wish you hadn't seen it,” he said. He closed his eyes. Nausea swirled as he watched the white ceiling tilt over his head. He fell. The gun roared in his ears, and Dr. Kepner babbled uselessly.

Meredith touched his shoulder, ripping him away from yet another replay. “I'm glad I saw it, Derek,” she said. “It was horrible, but I'll never regret it, because it means we're here, talking about babies and sex and my silly nightmares about your favorite condoms.”

Her eyes watered. He blinked. He didn't know what to say. He didn't know anything.

“I really want to have a baby with you,” she said. “I can't even describe how much anymore.”

“We'll get there,” he said, his voice low and thick with... Something. He leaned against the window and breathed. His breath clawed along the window in a spreading triangle of fog.

“You will, too,” she said. She squeezed his knee. A horn honked. The light had turned green. She drove.

He pinched the bridge of his nose. “Meredith, I'm...” He couldn't finish his sentence.

“Do you want to talk about your nightmares yet?” she said.

She turned into the Seattle Grace parking lot. His body swayed, and the horizon line of cars and building and clouds tilted to the side. He clutched the door handle until it hurt. He tried to find his voice to say, “No,” but he opened his mouth, and his throat went cottony and dry. He couldn't say that word or any other.

She parked, and his legs shivered with stress. His hands. He'd been shot. Dying. He hadn't seen the outside of the hospital during the massacre. He only knew what the zoo of flashing lights outside had looked like through inadvertently glancing at newspapers and seeing photographs. Flipping channels and finding news specials. The front door had been barricaded. Sirens had flashed. An endless line of police cars had encircled the building. He'd been lying on the floor on his back, bleeding, when a few hundred feet away, a line of law enforcement had stood, oblivious to his life draining out of him.

He remembered the ceiling in the operating room. Or, not really the ceiling. The lights overhead. Bright. Like the front of a train. When they'd put a mask over his face and pumped him full of anesthesia, he remembered hurting as he breathed. Once. Twice. And then the lights of the train had barreled toward him. The pain had faded. The feel of Meredith's hand had slipped out of his awareness. He'd heard noises. Then he'd seen nothing but black and heard nothing but silence.

He'd woken several times in the hours following his surgery. Every moment, Meredith had been there, sitting by the bed railing. She'd climbed into bed with him, and he hadn't been able to move to wrap his arms around her. He'd wanted to. But he'd felt sick, and he'd hurt, and then the lights had gone out again.

He'd woken once more as the clock wound around to... He hadn't had a concept of the time. His eyes had slipped open, and nausea had pressed against his body. The throbbing, endless pain, lung to spine in a jagged line, had started as the anesthesia from surgery had worn off, leaving his abused nerves on fire. He'd opened his eyes to nothing more than slits. He hadn't wanted to move as misery had crushed him. His mouth had been pasty and dry. His limbs had felt like frozen lead, and his throat like someone had pushed a rake down his esophagus in a hunt for fall leaves. She'd noticed him with his eyes open, and in moments, she'd been hovering by the bed. Her fingers had slipped through his hair as she'd whispered soothing things that hadn't helped, but he'd appreciated them anyway.

Hey, she'd said. Do you need anything? Ice chips?

He hadn't even been able to speak. He'd made a noise of some sort. He couldn't remember what. She'd pulled her chair close, and she'd sat with him while he'd hovered somewhere more than half awake but desperately wishing he weren't, until he'd found the blackness again.

He'd suffered pain and brutal nightmares for weeks. He didn't know how he would feel from one moment to the next.

Gary Clark had done that. In minutes. With one bullet and no regrets.

“Derek?” Meredith said, and he blinked.

Gary Clark's pistol pressed into Derek's temple. He rested his head against the cool window glass and breathed. The noise of gunfire ricocheted between his ears. A touch on his shoulder made him jump. He slammed his body against the door. His heart throbbed. Noise pushed through his lips, and he shuddered.

When the world came back to him, Meredith had her hand outstretched, but away from his body, and she bit her lip, stricken. The car had stopped. She'd removed the key from the ignition, and the engine settled. The clacking footsteps of a pedestrian in dress shoes passed by the car. A noisy breeze cut a swath through the parking lot and made the car rock on its axles.

When he looked at her, she moved, slowly at first. When he didn't balk, she closed the last few inches of the gap between them in a blink, and she touched him again. First with just a fingertip. Then her palm splayed. Her hand slid from his left shoulder to his right in a slow, wandering, whisper of support, and then she leaned over the parking brake and embraced him. Warmth spread against his skin as she radiated. He took a jagged breath and breathed against her hair. A loose strand flew out behind her ear. He pressed his nose against her.
“I can't,” he said.

“Yes, you can,” she said. Her arms squeezed tighter.

“Meredith,” he said. His voice quivered in his ears. He inhaled, but his body pushed the air out again before he could use it. The soft scent of her fell against him, but it slipped away like wind through his fingers. He blinked, and the space beyond her hair blurred. “I can't breathe,” he said.

“You can,” she said. Her hand chased his spine. “Just slow down.”

He looked at the archway. Seattle Grace Mercy West Hospital. The parking lot beyond the car turned white, and he fell backward as the gun roared in his ears. The bullet lodged inside his body, and breaths became a serrated blade, sawing his ribs and his lungs. His throat closed.

“I can't,” he croaked, and he coughed. His sternum flared with pain. He pawed at the collar of his shirt, desperate.

“Stop it,” she said. She pulled his gaze to her, and her eyes became gray, endless tunnels jagged with flecks of green. He lost himself there, pupil to pupil with her. She blinked, and her eyes dilated less than a fraction. “Look at me, and breathe. You can breathe. You're alive. You're okay. He's dead. You're not. We're making a family, and it's okay.”

He took her shirt into his hands. The soft weave ran under his fingertips. He lowered his gaze to the dark space between them. Two seat belt clips, the parking brake, and a small storage compartment separated their hips. She'd leaned into him. Her cleavage interrupted his view.

“Are you looking at me?” she said. “Look at me.”

Her fingertips dug into the sides of his face. He blinked, and she caught his eyes again. “It was a good distraction,” he said between a short breath and another.

“Stop it,” she repeated. “No distractions. Just breathe.”

He tried to laugh, though it ended up a vague, breathy splutter. He watched her eyes. She didn't look frightened or disturbed. She pressed her forehead against his, warm skin to cold. Their noses bumped. Her calm, even breathing rolled over him like waves on a shore in the intimate space. He followed the crash of the surf, and as the wave pulled back, he inhaled. He exhaled in time with her. Waves mingled. The spots in his vision evened into the sharp, focused colors of her face. Soft peach skin, cinnamon-brown freckles, rose-y lips.

Her eyes narrowed with quiet pleasure. She smiled. He breathed in and out again if only to see her smile widen. For once, Gary Clark had nothing to say. No post-mortem taunts. No observations. Nothing. The inner silence soothed him.

“You're very bossy,” he said.

“And you're very stubborn,” she said.

He smirked. “I'm breathing, now.”

“You are,” she agreed. She traced the dent on his forehead with her thumb, and then her hand wandered over his scalp. “I'm sorry I don't have a paper bag.”

“A what?”
Her lip quivered. She kissed him. “You helped me before. Remember?”

I don't want my mother to die alone.

She'd hidden in the dark closet, and he'd followed. She'd collapsed against him in tears. They'd shared a minute. In a dark closet. All he'd wanted in that minute was to make her happy again. When he'd first come into the room, she'd only been hyperventilating. As he'd sat down, she'd squeaked, and his heart had broken as she'd fallen apart.

Slow down, he'd said. Slow down. Just slow down. Shh.

“Mmm,” he said in a low voice as the memory solidified. “I remember.”

Thank you, she'd said.

He'd looked into her eyes. You're welcome.

“We have good memories here, too,” she said. She splayed a palm against his shirt over the bullet scar. “Think of those instead of this.” She circled the old wound and stroked his ribs.

“You were crying in a closet after a patient died,” he said as she roamed back to his shoulder, “And I was still married to Addison.”

She blinked. “Maybe not that one.”

“Not that one,” he agreed.

“But we kissed in an elevator,” she said. “You proposed to me there. And you were with me the first time I scrubbed in to a surgery.”

“That's a pretty helter-skelter list.”

“So is our life,” she said. “I didn't say it made any sense.”

“It really doesn't,” he said. He sighed. He turned his gaze away from her and stared at the archway, and nothing happened. Seattle Grace Mercy West. His eyelids lowered, and he leaned back into the seat, departing from her embrace. The leather moaned under his weight. The letters blurred and split into duplicates. Words crossed into an alphabet mush.

She echoed his movements and let her stare follow his. She took his hand in her lap across the brake and held his palm in hers. “Healing from what's happened to you is a giant hill or something,” she said. Her fingers clenched. “You're pedaling to the top right now. If you get through those front doors, it has to get better.”

“You're sure of that,” he said.

“Yes,” she said. “It has to get better.”

He leaned, and he kissed her ear. “When did you get to be so sure?”

She laughed, and the sound lifted him. She had such a beautiful laugh. “I'm in love with you. I'm married to you. We're going to have a family, and I'm happy about it. I can say all these things to you. That I love you, and that I'm happy or whatever. If I can get better, you can get better. It has to get better.”

“I like you happy,” he said. “It suits you.”
She kissed him. “I wish you were happy, too.”

His stomach quailed, and he shut his eyes as a familiar, unsettling wave splashed against him. He let out a shaky breath and massaged the bridge of his nose with his thumb and index finger. “Meredith, I really...” His gaze blurred. “What if this never goes away?”

“It will.”

“How long will you wait?”

“Forever,” she said. “But it won't be that long. I know it won't.”

“It feels forever.”

She stared at him for a long moment, but he had no idea what she could be thinking. “Get out of the car, Derek,” she said. She released his hand, and she grabbed her door handle.

He watched as she slid her tiny body out of the seat and plopped onto the ground. Her reflection flashed in the side view mirror as she opened and shut the door, leaving him staring at an empty seat and the cloudy sky beyond. He sighed. Overwhelming lethargy sank into his bones.

The thunk of his door opening startled him, and he twitched. “Appointment, now,” she said. She leaned over his lap and unclasped his seat-belt. The soft scent of lavender wafted into his nose as he breathed. Rain-kissed air rushed through the open space and hugged his skin. “You're late,” she said. “You're beyond late. Get up.”

“And you're very bossy,” he said.

“You keep saying that.”

He gave a tired sigh, though he tried to smile. “Because you keep being bossy.”

He grabbed the handle over the door, and she backed away to give him space. He slid off the seat. His feet hit the hard pavement and stopped. He looked at the archway, Seattle Grace Mercy West, and his legs threatened to stop supporting him as his remnant nerves coiled in a tight ball and took away his muscle control. He scrabbled for the side of the door. The roads had been wet despite the clear sky. Rain-spattered paint slipped past his grasping fingertips. He leaned against the side of the door and let the breeze ruffle his hair as he closed his eyes.

The car chirped as Meredith armed the alarm. “Derek,” she said. A now familiar announcement indicating she was there. And then she wrapped around him. Her hip bumped his. “Come on. Let's walk.”

“Meredith...”

“Breathe and walk,” she said. “Up the hill.”

A nervous laugh burbled in his throat. “Are you sure you don't want to go home and make babies?”

“I thought you wanted me to be on time,” she said.

“Yes, but you're already tardy to the point of no return. You should at least make it worthwhile.”

She rubbed his back. “This is worthwhile.”

He took a step and stumbled as the jelly in his legs turned his stride to mush. Heat spread across his cheeks, and his throat felt full. “I'm a bit shaky,” he said.

“You're fine,” she said.

Wind tumbled against them as they stepped away from the car. Slowly. He felt like a wobbling old man. He glanced around, wild, trying to see if anyone was looking at him, but nothing stuck out. People walked to and fro, in and out. People in scrubs, suits, jeans, sweatpants. People on their own feet, in wheelchairs, or struggling with walkers and canes. But nobody seemed to care that Derek Shepherd was returning to Seattle Grace for his followup appointment, held upright by his petite wife. Unshaven, in jeans and a shirt, he probably didn't look like anybody worth watching. Just a sick man in a place meant for sick people.

As he approached the doorway, his world became a funnel, narrowing and narrowing, until the sliding doors spread apart and a whoosh of cool, antiseptic air hit his face. He knew that smell. The familiar odor that told him he was in a hospital. The adrenaline pouring through him made his body feel weak and willowy and ready to topple.

“Excuse me,” a man said as he pushed past, and Derek shuddered as he was bumped by a quick-striding, solid-but-thin man the height of an NBA center.

“Yes?” Meredith said to Derek.

He didn't reply as the welcome mat left them behind. He walked underneath the promenade, and the catwalk came into view. His muscles clenched, and something in his body told him to turn around and leave. Just leave. The impulse became a need that sank into the depths of his bone marrow. Tremors ran through him. The jelly in his legs wasn't a hindrance. It meant his muscles were ready. Brimming with pent up energy. He would be able to go. Sprint. Fast. And he wouldn't stop until his lungs burst. He felt sick because he needed to run, not walk toward something that made every inch of his conscious thought quiver with an intense, thrumming, almost-panic that could easily explode.

Meredith pulled on his arm. “Come on,” she said. “Just worry about your appointment today.”

He wanted to tell her he didn't feel well, but his throat closed, and he couldn't speak. She dragged him down the hallway toward the admitting desk, her hand gripping his like she expected him to bolt. He remembered walking there, less than an hour before he'd gotten shot. There had been a body on the floor. Blood spatter in a gruesome fan around the wound. Bits and pieces of obliterated flesh, no longer identifiable as organs or skin or anything. He'd checked the body by reflex, but he'd found no pulse at the wrist. He wouldn't have. Dead eyes had stared not at him but past him as he'd approached. A huge chunk of the man's neck had been missing. No amount of scientific miracles would fix that.

People started to recognize him. He heard whispers. The receptionist behind the desk, a blond, plump woman he knew he should know, brightened into a wide smile. “Dr. Shepherd!” she said, her voice burbling with cheer. “Good morning! It's so nice to see you back. Seattle Grace just hasn't been the same without you.”

He couldn't think of her name. All he could think of was Paul Wandell, the security guard who'd been stationed there by the desk. He must have wandered during the emergency. Derek hadn't found his body. He'd just seen the name on the death list.

Morning, Dr. Shepherd, Paul had said as Derek had walked past.

Derek had smiled. Paul. How are the girls?
Doing great, the balding, thin man had said. Leticia is taking them to their dance recital tonight. I'm headed there after work.

Ballet?

No, Paul had said, and then he'd laughed. A deep, gruff laugh that had probably been his last. Some crazy modern expression thing. I don't really understand it, but they love it.

Wish them luck for me, Derek had said.

Will do.

“Hello,” Derek said to the receptionist, his voice shaky. His smile lasted for less than half a second.

He'd failed his attempt at normal and happy by the look on the woman's face. Her smile faltered, and he saw what he didn't want. Pity. Worry over the fact that a very not normal Dr. Shepherd had just returned to Seattle Grace. Normal Dr. Shepherd would have remembered her name. He would have smiled. He would have said hello and asked about her family and complimented her hair or... something. Anything but the bald hello he'd barely managed.

Meredith squeezed his arm, and he swallowed. “I have a followup appointment with Dr. Altman,” he said.

The receptionist nodded. He lost himself in the sound of her fingers as the keyboard clacked. She frowned as she stared at the computer screen. “I'm sorry,” she said. She glanced at the small typed sign at the desk that stated anyone more than fifteen minutes late would not be seen, but she shook her head and forced a smile back onto her face. “You might have to wait a little,” she said. “But we'll get you in.”

“Thank you,” he said.

The receptionist printed out an update patient form, handed him a clipboard, a pen, the form, and a sheath of stickers for his charts that stated his name, patient ID number, and various other bits and pieces of information that would explain his physical woes in a nutshell to anyone who wanted to know. Meredith followed as he walked to a nearby chair and collapsed with the form and the pen. Nausea roiled. He couldn't get his legs to solidify. He leaned over his knees, head in his hands.

Meredith took the clipboard from him, and he listened to the scribble of the pen as she filled everything out for him. His name, address, current medications, allergies, and complaints. He didn't bother to check it. She knew all of it by heart anyway.

“I found a body by the desk,” he said against his hands, his shaky voice barely audible. He touched his jugular. “The bullet went here.”

The receptionist chattered in low tones against the phone receiver. The keyboard clacked. Nearby, waiting patients conversed. Meredith set the clipboard aside. She didn't speak. She hugged him instead.

“I don't even know who he was,” he said.

She kissed his shoulder. “Stop it,” she said. “Seriously, you need to stop. Just worry about your appointment. That's a great start. Get through that. That's all. Then go home. Mark will take you back to the house; you just have to page him.”
“I really don't feel well,” he said.

She took his palms and rubbed his freezing hands. “I know,” she said. “Life sucks. But you'll never feel well again if you don't push yourself through this. You can't let yourself wallow.”

“Is that what Dr. Wyatt says?” he snapped.

A deep pink blush spread across her face, and she bit her lip. She didn't speak.

He deflated, and embarrassing tears popped loose. “I'm sorry. I'm...” He bent his head down and looked at the floor as he sniffed. Not here. Please, not here. Anywhere but here. He choked on air.
The floor tiles blurred.

“Pathetic,” said Mr. Clark, and Derek cringed.

“No,” he said, though it was more of a gasp. He became vaguely aware of Meredith standing over him, a shield between him and prying eyes. She spread his legs with a nudge from her knees, stepped against him, and pulled his head against her body. Her fingers twisted through the hair at the nape of his neck. The soft feel of her shirt was interrupted by the bump at the waistline of her jeans. A belt loop mashed underneath him. He rested his ear to her belly and closed his eyes. Her stomach gurgled. She breathed.

He stuffed the swell of tears back inside his body. Jumbled thoughts churned in his head. His stomach wouldn't settle. But he wouldn't cry in his own fucking hospital. Not for everybody to see.
Though he was sure it was too late, anyway. The receptionist had probably already phoned into the gossip hotline to report the latest and greatest Dr. McDreamy news header.

Derek cries! News at eleven.

He wiped his face and cleared his throat. “I'm sorry,” he said again.

“Shut up,” Meredith replied.

A miserable smile flickered on his face. “Bossy,” he told her.

She grinned and sank into the seat beside him. She waited with him in supporting silence until the admitting nurse called his name. “Almost done,” Meredith said as he stood and convinced his body to move. She kissed him. “See you at dinner tomorrow?”

“Yes,” he replied. She squeezed his shoulder, and he wobbled to the waiting nurse. He tried not to think about how far away dinner tomorrow seemed. The admitting nurse led him through a door into a busy, bustling hallway, and he left a waving Meredith behind.

“Hi, Dr. Shepherd,” the nurse said. Another woman he knew he should know, but didn't. Amanda?
Anna? He couldn't see her name tag to read it, so he gave her a watery smile that lasted less time than the one he'd given the receptionist. He couldn't manage a hello.

She led him to an immaculate exam room the size of a large closet. A white ceiling, white walls, and a white floor framed a navy-blue exam bench. A stainless-steel hand sink and a narrow counter top lined the side of the room, and a small chair with a low back rested next to the counter in the corner by the door with a coat rack. The sink dripped with no seeming pattern.

He sat on the exam table. The paper lining gripping the cushion crinkled, and he shifted. He tried not to think about anything as the nurse took his blood pressure, temperature, and pulse. “Are you experiencing any pain today?” said the nurse.
Derek clenched his fingers. He croaked at first, and he cleared his throat. “Some.”

“How would you describe the pain?”

Derek frowned. “It's not bad right now,” he said. “Three or four.”

“And have you taken anything for pain today?” she said.

“No.”

The nurse wrote everything on his chart and smiled. She showed him his chart, and he saw Meredith's neat handwriting listing all his prescriptions. “The medications you've listed are current?” she said.

“Yes.”

“All right,” she said. “Remove all your clothes except for your underwear, and put this on.” She placed a hospital gown on the exam table by his hip. “Your doctor will be with you shortly.” She stopped at the door on the way out. “Good to see you,” she said. “You've been missed.”

“Thank you,” he managed.

She departed, and the door closed quietly behind her.

He stripped in silence, his lips set in a grim line. He folded his shirt after he took it off, trying to ignore the creeping ants sensation of self-consciousness that tickled his skin. He felt like somebody watched him. He put his shirt and his jeans and socks on the small chair by the sink. The cold air of the exam room wrapped around his body. He shivered and looked down at himself. The scar meandering down his chest made him cringe, even under the wisps of hair that had grown back. Ugly. Red and twisted. He touched the incision, and his vision blurred as his sensitive fingertips roamed over rough skin that had once been smooth.

Hang on; I'm coming!

The room flared white, and he blinked. He'd been alone and dying in a sea of white and red. A shadow had crossed his vision, and then she'd been there. Meredith. He'd hurt, and he'd lain there, helpless. She'd touched him. Pain had rumbled through his body when she'd put pressure on the wound, and he hadn't understood much at the time other than a consuming, mindless fear. Mr. Clark would come back. He would come back and finish what he'd started, and he'd get Meredith, too. He'd tried to push her away, and then...

Nothing but colors and pain and panic. For a long while.

Please, don't die. Please, Derek. You can't leave me.

Derek blinked and swallowed as the memory faded. He shuddered. This would never go away. The scars. Seeing the disfigurement every time he looked at himself served as an instant replay. He tried to catch his breath as he pulled on the exam gown and covered himself. Nausea coiled in the back of his throat, and he sat on the exam table and hunched over his knees. His toes turned an unhealthy red as his nervous body withdrew circulation.

Derek squeezed his eyes shut. “Stop it,” he said to nothing but air. He breathed once and twice and again, and he listened to the faucet drip to no particular rhythm. He didn't want to be here in this place, stuck in an endless crush of bad memories.
I pick you. I choose you. You don't get to die on me.

A knock on the door made his heart skip and his body lurch. Sweat made the paper on the exam table stick to the backs of his naked thighs and knees. The paper ripped as he launched to the side. He caught the edge of the table with his hand as the door opened, and somebody stepped in. Ragged, uneven breaths drilled through his body, and it took him several seconds to stop his brain from racing away with his senses.

He looked up as he caught his breath. “Cristina?” he said, incredulous. Blush cut a swath across his skin. He pinched the bridge of his nose. Where was Dr. Altman?

Cristina stood there in pale blue scrubs, a stony gaze on her face. “You're late,” she said. “Dr. Altman is in surgery.” And I got stuck with this lousy assignment, Cristina's expression said, though she didn't speak. She clenched his chart in her fingers.

“Oh,” he said. He wondered how much of his descent into panic she'd seen. The paper on the exam table looked like a tornado had run through. Shivers he couldn't help raced along his skin, and the blush wouldn't go away. Hot. His face. His chest. Everything felt hot. He didn't need to see himself to know he'd turned a telltale shade of red. Damn it.

He knew on a fundamental level that she'd seen everything. Everything. The nurses and doctors of Seattle Grace did their best to preserve everybody's modesty, but the simple fact was that in order to keep a sterile field, not a lot in the way of clothing was allowed into surgery. Just a gown. Pressure stockings. Nothing else. After he'd been anesthetized, they'd shaved his chest and catheterized him. Hell, she'd been the one who'd cut and cracked him open. He knew. If he had it, she'd seen it. More than once.

But at least he hadn't been awake, then. He hadn't been awake to know that Meredith's best friend, who hated him, and often made snide jokes at his expense, had seen him at his most vulnerable. She had the bedside manner of a robot, and she clearly didn't want to be there. Stress stiffened his muscles into thick lines of iron sinews.

He stared at the chart in her hands, not at her. The yellow sheet of paper had the hollow silhouette of a person drawn in the top left corner. The mid-line down the silhouette's chest and a small spot on the left breast had been circled in red marker. Shepherd, Derek C. was written across the top. She didn't say anything as she set his chart on the counter top and unwound her stethoscope from her neck. She didn't rub her hands or warn him that it would be cold. She touched the small of his back just over the waistband of his boxer briefs. “Sit up straight,” she told him, and he forced his spine to uncurl.

She slipped the stethoscope under his gown, and a freezing spear jabbed his back.

“Breathe,” she said with a soft voice. He closed his eyes, and he breathed, deep and long and low. She moved the stethoscope. “Again,” she said. “Again. Again.” Satisfied, she pulled the gelid instrument away and wrapped it around her neck. “How are your energy levels?” she said.

Derek sighed. Clinical. Make this clinical, he thought. He could manage this if he pretended she was somebody else. Maybe his personal physician, who he saw yearly. Dr. Worthington. He owned a private practice in a small office complex in Queen Anne Hill.

“You could pretend she's me,” said Mr. Clark, and Derek stiffened.

“I get tired easily,” he said.
She nodded. “How easily?”

“I can walk about two miles. Maybe three.”

“Can you jog?”

He set his lips in a thin line. He'd jogged. Across parking lots. Maybe a few house-lengths on Meredith's street. The jouncing and the extra exertion made him feel sick, more often than not, though he tried every other day at the recommendation of his physical therapist. “Not really,” he said.

“How are steps?”

“Fine as long as I don't do them over and over,” he said.

She gripped his shoulders. “Lie back,” she said.

He swallowed, and he forced himself flat onto the table. He tried to keep his breaths steady. He listened to the dripping sink as she undid the gown's ties and pulled his only shield away from him. She touched his chest, and he bit his lip. Her fingers slipped along her handy work. Her eyes sparked with satisfaction, a sort of glow in her dark eyes. A job well done. Nothing else. He felt like a slab of meat.

“How do you need to take naps during the day?” she said as she inspected the remains of the sternal incision.

“Sometimes.”

“But not always?”

“No,” he said. “Usually, I'm okay if I sit down for a while.”

Her inspection roamed to his abdomen. She kneaded the space over his intestines, and he fought to keep from wincing. It didn't hurt, but it was uncomfortable. He didn't like her touching him anywhere, let alone when he barely had any clothes on. He grunted as she drilled into his side like she was trying to reach the exam table underneath him. He gazed at the ceiling, blinking.

“How's your pain?” she asked.

“I still use painkillers,” he said.

“How much?”

“Good question,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek's stomach turned. Nausea coiled around his body, and the first sound he made wasn't a word. Just... Something. He couldn't look at her or anywhere.

“I don't know,” he said. “I'm...” What did you take this time, Amy? How much? “Not always. I don't always need them.”

Silence stretched except for the drip, drip, drip of the faucet. Cristina stared at him, her eyes narrowing, and he resisted the urge to try to explain things. He clenched his hands, and what was left of the paper underneath him crinkled.

“So, it flares up at times, but it's not constant?” Cristina said.
“The constant part is tolerable,” he said. “Just…” He wilted under her stare. “Yes, it flares.”

She touched his bullet wound and probed it, and he couldn't stop the gasp of pain, more from surprise than hurt, though the discomfort made his innards quiver. “GSWs are nasty,” she said. “You could have chronic pain here for a while.”

He raised a shaky hand to his face and wiped away damp remnants of nervous sweat. She'd surprised him. He hadn't been able to steel himself for any sort of invasion. He clenched his teeth.

“I think you're fine for light work,” she said. “Paperwork. No surgeries. And don't drive if you take pills, obviously, but otherwise you can get behind the wheel again if you want. I'll renew your Percocet prescription with the pharmacy here.”

He didn't know what he'd expected or hoped for. You're in terrible shape; stay home another month. We don't need you back here yet, anyway.

“Are you sure?” he said.

“Yes,” she said as he sat up. “Why? Do you think you're not ready to come back?”

He pulled up his gown but didn't bother with the ties. They would be done soon, and she would leave so he could change. Soon.

“I'm fine,” he said while his mind screamed no. No, no, no. Just say no.

She picked up his chart and made notations. He rested on the table, eyes closed, and he wanted her to leave so he could put on his clothes and get away. She'd gone down the veritable list for followup checks. As soon as she finished writing, they were done. Her pen scribbled on the paper, and the faucet dripped. She took forever. He blinked and watched the white walls. White. All white.

The bullet wound throbbed where Cristina had poked him. He rested a palm against his breast. His hands felt cold and clammy. He remembered blood, a glistening stain on his skin, as he'd held his hand to the sky. The gun cracked, and he'd fallen backward. You're not god, Mr. Clark had said.

“How are you doing, mentally?” Cristina said.

His waking dream dissolved, and he blinked. “Why would you ask that?” he said.

She shrugged. “Because I'm not a moron.”

“I'm fine,” he said.

“So, you've been peachy keen since I showed you screaming babies?”

_I thought you were dead_, Meredith had said. _And I was screaming and screaming and then... I lost... I'm so sorry._ As if she'd had something to apologize for. He hadn't known how to react, hadn't known anything. He'd been a potential dad for a nanosecond. _I was pregnant_, she'd said, and it'd taken him a blink to realize that the word 'was' meant past tense. Pregnant before, but not then.

“I'm...” His voice fell away.

“I thought so,” she said.

He slid off the exam table and let his weight onto his feet. He scrunched his toes against the cold floor. The loose hospital gown threatened to fall, and he clutched it to his chest. He shivered, naked back exposed, and she watched him, relentless. He felt as though a thousand eyes watched and judged and found him very lacking.

He met her gaze, glaring. Her tone seemed haughty in a told-you-so sense. She didn't look away, didn't back down, despite the sharp, metaphorical scalpels he tossed her way. She held his chart at her hip, and her hair hung in a frazzled ponytail with loose, flyaway curls.

He hadn't seen Cristina since he'd been released from Seattle Presbyterian. She visited Meredith, sometimes, but Cristina had started knocking, which gave him time to retreat. Usually, when she stopped by, Derek went to bed, and Meredith let him have the bedroom with no barging in. No kicking him out. If he went to lie down, Meredith never disturbed him, and other than a bleary, vague recollection of getting himself a glass of water from the kitchen in the midst of an exhausted painkiller haze while Cristina had been rummaging in their fridge, he hadn't laid eyes on her in a month.

He sighed. “Meredith—”

“Hasn't told me a damned thing,” Cristina said. “Don't yell at her.”

Meredith had promised him that she wasn't talking to Cristina, and he believed her, but he knew she couldn't realistically be expected not to say a single word. They were married. He was bound to come up in conversation, and they'd had a fight. Surely, the fight, if nothing else, would have been mentioned, even if the specifics had been glossed over. Meredith. Where else could Cristina be getting her information? Or, maybe she was fishing, but she sounded so sure.

“Or maybe you're just a big crybaby,” Mr. Clark said. “It doesn't take a rocket scientist to tell that I've twisted you into a gooey pile of tear-filled knots.”

Derek took a deep breath and stared at his hands. They shook. “I'm not going to yell at her,” he said.

Cristina rolled her eyes and snorted. “Right.”

“I'm not going to yell at her!” he snapped.

“You're okay with yelling at me, though?”

“I'm...” He squeezed his eyes shut and leaned into the exam table. The soft leather bowed under the weight of his thighs and body. He clenched his teeth. “Fine.”

She sighed. “At least tell me if you're more fine than you were before,” she said.

“Can we wrap this up?” he said. Home. The word repeated in his head like machine gun fire. He wanted to go home.

She set his chart down on the counter and approached. She stood next to him, not close enough to be considered a breach of personal space, but he bristled anyway. He wanted to go home. Now. Why wouldn't she leave him alone? His vision blurred, and the white walls smeared.

_No, Mr. Clark_, he'd gurgled, unable to catch his breath. Dr. Kepner had abandoned him, and now he would die. He would die on the floor of his hospital because he was helpless. He couldn't breathe. He had a bullet in his body. He raised a hand in front of his body, begging. _Mr. Clark_...

A hand touched his shoulder, and he flinched away. “No,” he said. A verbal tic. A reflex. The word spilled from his lips as though his lungs had punted it. He clenched his hands. Cristina let go with a fluid, slow motion, like she backed away from a rabid dog that might bite. He sniffed.

“Post-operative depression is almost a given after cardiac surgery,” Cristina said. “You've been crying a lot.”

“I'm not crying,” he snapped. He wiped at his face with a shaky palm. Wet smears came away from him. Why wouldn't she leave?

She snorted. “Is this sweating from your eyes, then?”

He said nothing.

“And I suppose you got hit with a lawn sprinkler when we looked at the babies?”

“Stop it.”

“What about in the car on the way home from Seattle Pres?”

He grabbed the ruined paper on the examination table and yanked. The sudden motion sliced him through with pain. The paper came away, and he slammed it onto the table, crumpling it into a wrinkled mass the size of a basketball, or maybe a watermelon, or... “I said I'm fine, Cristina.”

“If this doesn't go away soon, within another month or so, you might want to think about anti-depressants.”

“I don't need those,” he said. “I don't need drugs.”

“Oh, that's rich,” said Mr. Clark. “Really.”

A long silence followed. She slipped her index finger against her temple and swiped away a free falling lock of hair from her face. She stared at him. He wiped his eyes again. Why wouldn't any of this stop?

“Because you're weak,” Gary Clark said.

Pathetic.

Cristina picked up his chart and put the pen in the pocket of her lab coat. The pen's clip slid over the lip of her coat pocket. She smoothed the pocket and looked at him with an icy glare. “Any questions for me then?” she said.

“No,” he said. “Are we done, now?”

“Yeah,” she said. “We're done.”

She turned toward the door and took four steps. As her fingertips brushed the handle of the door, she turned. “She's worried about you,” Cristina said. “And I don't think she's being paranoid.”

He blinked. His eyes burned.

But you have to stop this... Whatever this mental hangup is that you've got going on. If you break yourself, it's not just you you'll be breaking.

“I can't win with you,” Derek said. “No matter what.”

“No, but at least I've figured out you're not a jackass on purpose,” she said. And then she left as abruptly as she'd arrived. The door shut like a whisper behind her.

His stomach churned. He shoved aside his clothes and sat in his underwear on the chair beside the counter for a long time, shaking. He stared at the floor over his knees. He couldn't move. He pulled his hands through his hair. Really pulled. Until his scalp hurt. His teeth clenched. Something black and ugly coiled in the back of his mind.

“Fuck you,” he said to no one. To her. “I'm trying.”

“This is what you call trying?” Mr. Clark said.

Just get through your appointment, Meredith had said. He rocked in his seat. He'd done that. He'd gotten through his appointment. How the hell was he supposed to get out?

Somebody knocked on the door, and he stiffened. “I'm still in here,” he said. His vocal cords seared with the strain of sounding normal despite falling apart.

Footsteps padded away from the door.

He stared down at his socks and his jeans and his shirt. He started with the socks. He could do socks. He pulled one onto his left foot, and then the other onto his right. His yanked up his jeans and buttoned them up to his waist. They sagged and slid down his skinny hips an inch. He still needed to gain back more weight. He pulled his shirt over his body last. His sternum didn't twinge at the movement. Not once. The only things left that strained him were coughing, breathing deeply, and pulling or pushing too much weight. The sternum wasn't considered fully knitted until sixth months had passed, and it'd only been two. It would be a long time before he felt no pain at all. At least it wasn't constant anymore.

He sniffed as he laced his shoes. The soles squeaked against the floor as he shifted. The sink dripped. This room was small. Nobody stared at him in here. He stared at the door, tense with anguish. He couldn't bring himself to move from the chair into the sea of watching eyes and sharp memories.

He fumbled at his pocket for his cell phone and dialed Mark. Mark answered on the third ring. “Hey, man,” Mark said. “Ready to go? I need a few more minutes here.”

Derek swallowed as he squeezed the receiver with a white-knuckled grip. He took a deep, wet breath. He couldn't bring himself to say hello. He watched the door, and all he could ask was, “How long?”

A brief silence stretched, and Derek heard papers shuffling. “Twenty minutes, I think,” Mark said. “Can you wait at the front door?”

No. “I'll wait,” Derek managed. He breathed as his torso quivered with pent grief. He wiped his eyes. They were dry, but sticky with salt.

“Oh, I——” said Mark. A low, male voice said something, and Mark spoke. Not to the phone. Papers shuffled. “Look, I'll meet you there,” Mark said, his voice distracted. “I have to run; my patient is having some issues.”

Derek's phone beeped, signaling a disconnected call, and Derek sighed. He put the phone back in his pocket. He stared at the door and rocked in his seat as he hugged his stomach. Twenty minutes. He didn't think he could stay in this place another second, let alone twenty minutes.

Hold on, okay? Meredith had said. Hold on. I love you. Please, don't die.
“Scared?” said Mr. Clark.

Somebody knocked, and Derek squeezed his eyes shut. “I'm still in here!” he said.

Whoever stood behind the door paused, but didn't walk away. The staff probably needed the room for the next patient, and he knew he wouldn't be left alone much longer. “Dr. Shepherd,” said a muffled, feminine voice through the door. “Do you need any help?”

“No,” Derek said. “I'm...” He swallowed. “I'm fine.”

Please, don't die. Please, Derek.

His body waved warning flag after warning flag. When he stood, he felt like a fault line under stress. His joints creaked. His muscles stretched. We're losing equilibrium, everything told him. Treat us with caution. Eventually, the fault would slip, and there would be an earthquake. His throat constricted, and he held back tears. Barely.

He looked at the door. He grasped the handle. Get out, get out, something whined in his head, but the thought of all the people beyond the door broke everything into a pile of indecision. Get out. He squeezed his hand. The cool metal jabbed into his palm to the point of pain. He twisted the knob and pushed.

I really can't breathe, Mere.

“Dr. Shepherd,” said a wide-eyed nurse as he stepped outside. She stood in the hallway by the door, a pen grasped loosely in her hand. She'd stopped mid-note on an overflowing clipboard. Her voice sounded clear with the door removed. Deep and rich. Earthy. Her burden buried her name tag behind reams of paper, and he stared at her, lost.

Derek, please. Focus. Focus for me.

“Are you sure you're all right?” the nurse said when he said nothing. He looked over her shoulder. The hallway wasn't wide, perhaps five feet at best. The space behind her would dump him out closer to the main hospital entrance, but he'd have to push past her to escape. And he'd also have to pass the already suspicious receptionist.

“Dr. Shepherd?” the nurse said when he didn't answer.

“I'm fine,” he snapped. He wiped his face again. He felt quivery. Unsure. And he probably looked like a red-eyed disaster victim. He turned away from the nurse and walked in the opposite direction, down the shiny white hallway that went on forever. Into the hospital's heart. Not toward the entrance. He felt the nurse staring at him, felt her eyes piercing holes into his back. His skin crawled like thousands of spiders had made his body a highway.

He remembered this hallway. After he'd found the bloody body with the ruined neck, he'd walked this way. The pharmacy would be on the left after the turn. Everything seemed to flicker, and his past immersed him.

He'd walked in tense silence. Most floors of the hospital had been emptied, and everything had been quiet and still, save for the eerie echoes of his footsteps on the immaculate tiles. He'd stopped midway down the hall to inspect a long smear of drying, sticky blood along the wall. Rather than one thick line, the smear was five thin lines close together, as though someone had dipped his fingers in red paint and stroked the white wall with an artistic flare.

You're not god.
The world flashed white, and he stared overhead as he held his bloody hand aloft. He'd been shot, and he had blood on his hands. He couldn't breathe. Every inhalation stabbed him with knives. He couldn't think. The knives made it difficult. Dr. Kepner babbled somewhere behind him. He didn't understand the words.

“Are you all right?”

He blinked, and the death and dying disappeared with a pop, leaving him panting and hollow.

“Fine,” Derek said to the passing nurse who'd asked.

He shuddered, and he moved onward, away from the new batch of scrutiny. He turned left out of the narrow hallway into a wider, more heavily trafficked area. A patient bumped into him. An orderly darted past, his sneakers squeaking as he bolted for some emergency. The PA system crackled to life and called Dr. Weller to conference room seven. The lights seemed too bright. His skin crawled. He wanted to be alone and not there. He caught himself veering toward the wall, his shoulders hunching protectively, and he forced himself back into traffic flow with a deep, shaky breath. Normal. Look normal. Except he couldn't walk more than five feet without somebody recognizing him and asking how he was.

His soul was splitting apart at the seams.

“Dr. Shepherd!” called a deep male voice. “Wait!”

Derek froze. He closed his eyes and took a deep breath. He turned toward the voice. The hallway where he stood spread wide like an ocean. Two small windows with counter tops at chest level opened into the abyss. One window was labeled drop-off, and the other was labeled pick-up. Between the windows, chairs lined the hallway. Placards about flu shots, accepted insurance, and all sorts of drug advertisements decorated the wall above the chairs. The man at the pick-up counter looked out at him. Gregory Wallace, Seattle Grace's head pharmacist, a weathered, wrinkled, snowy-haired man who'd been there for at least fifteen years, stared over the counter with his eyebrows raised. He held up a white paper bag emblazoned with Seattle Grace's logo in his meaty hand.

“You forgot your prescription,” Greg said.

Derek saw the familiar bag, and the tug of war began. Run or stay. Run or stay. He wanted to run to a dark corner and collapse away from prying eyes. The bag held his gaze captive, though, and conflict nauseated him. He stepped forward once and swallowed.

“Right,” he said. He had to clear his throat. “Sorry.”

“You just need to sign here,” Greg said. He pointed at the sign-out sheet.

“Thanks,” Derek said.

He closed the gap between him and the counter and picked up the pen by the register. He pressed the ball point into the paper. The pen tip left no ink, only an illegible indentation in the paper. He clenched his fingers.

Mr. Wallace frowned and rummaged for a new pen in the desk behind the counter. “I haven't seen you in several weeks,” commented Mr. Wallace. He found a new pen and deposited it on the counter.

Derek picked up the pen and began to sign his name next to the prescription sticker that would indicate he'd received his prescription and knew how to use it.

“How have you been?” Mr. Wallace asked.

Derek paused, and the letter d in Shepherd, already messy, faded into a tense squiggle. The pen almost snapped in his grip. He'd been nearly dead seven weeks ago. Why did everybody ask him how he was? He'd been shot and nearly killed and he couldn't sleep or breathe or function or— “I'm fine,” he said. Derek snatched the paper bag and continued down the hall without saying goodbye. His breaths tightened in his chest. The bag crinkled in his hand as he squeezed and squeezed. He felt the cylindrical orange bottle sheathed within. His Percocet.

Take some, now, a voice said. Take some, and you won't feel any of this.

His jaw tightened.

“Oh, yes,” said Mr. Clark. “Take it here. In front of everyone.”

The bag crinkled as Derek's grip crushed the top of the bag. “Stop it,” he said.

“Stop what?” said a bug-eyed intern as he halted.

“Nothing,” Derek said. The intern frowned and continued on his way.

Derek tried to get to the front of the hospital. He tried. But everywhere he went, his progress was dictated by another person asking if he was okay. He'd say he was fine, and he'd move in the opposite direction like terrified livestock being corralled with cattle prods. People. Everywhere. All of them seeing him in the process of having some sort of nervous breakdown. His heart throbbed. Sweat trickled down the small of his back. His muscles shivered with stress. Noise scraped his eardrums like nails on glass.

Help is coming. Don't die.

He moved into a dark stairwell because it was the only place without people. Nobody used the damned stairs. Not this close to the elevators. He climbed for a bit and then collapsed onto the step under the first landing. He curled into a ball over his knees. His body shivered. He couldn't breathe, and he couldn't stop himself from crying. He blinked once. Twice. Tears cut his face like sharp glass, and tiny blusters of vocalization hit the air and echoed in the bad acoustics.

“Please, stop,” he begged.

How are you doing? Meredith had asked while they'd watched the water over the Elliot Bay. She'd leaned across the table, close to him, and her eyes had sparkled like the sunset outside.

He'd crammed himself as close to the window as possible. I'm fine, he'd said after a long pause, and he'd taken another forkful of oyster omelet to chew.

I'm sorry you're not feeling great, she'd said. She'd mirrored his forkful with her own.

The world had been a bit of a dizzy haze. He'd barely flinched as a pile of dishes crashed, and the waitress who'd carried them had turned red and bustled to pick them up. By the time the noise had made any sort of sense to him, the terror impulse had long since faded. He'd blinked, and he'd turned his attention back to the table, only to find Meredith scrutinizing him.

He'd forced himself to smile at her. A real smile. Easy with the undercurrent of false euphoria running through him like an untapped well. She'd smiled back, her gaze hopeful.
You're safe, his imaginary Meredith whispered in his ear as he watched the real one eat her fluffy omelet with gusto. Don't be scared.

M'okay, he'd said at last, a little slurred, but mostly put together. A sleepy yawn had cracked his jaw, and he'd stuffed another bite of omelet in his mouth. Real Meredith hadn't commented at his lethargy. Before they'd left, he'd taken painkillers for pain he hadn't really been having right in front of her.

It'd been easy.

He blinked against tears. The blurry stairwell resided beyond the wall of grief in his eyes. He glanced at his watch and couldn't tell the time. The numbers were mush. How long until Mark would be able to take Derek home? He wiped his face. A door slammed several floors above, and he cowered, but the shuffle of footsteps exited above him, out of sight. He forgot about checking his watch.

“Admit it,” Mr. Clark said. “You can't do this. You can't do anything.”

Derek put his forehead against the cold metal railing and breathed. His body shivered as Mr. Clark stood over him, gun pointed, a leer on his face. Derek's shoulders curled. He hunched away from the apparition of his murderer, but Mr. Clark wouldn't disappear. Tension rung in Derek's joints like big, loud bells. Low, vibrating, painful. His cross trainers squeaked on the step.

The bag in his hands crinkled. He tore at the staple holding the paper bag closed, and he dumped out the orange prescription bottle within. The childproof cap would have confounded his shaking hands, but he forced himself to stop. Just for a moment. He needed what was inside. He needed it for this to stop. He could keep his hands still for a moment if doing so would make everything stop. He breathed. His exhalations echoed in the silence.

He fished out one Percocet and took it dry. The lump rolled down his throat painfully. He gagged and swallowed again, forcing it down. He took a second pill with the same ritual. He grappled for a third...

The stairwell door in his line of sight opened with a loud clank. He flinched against the railing in surprise, and the third pill he'd pried loose skipped from his hands onto the floor. The pill pinged as it bounced down the steps and came to a stop by Dr. Kepner's feet, where it spun until it settled. He scrambled off the stairs into a standing position. Dr. Kepner stood in the doorway, her eyes wide and showing white all around the diameter of her irises. Her mouth formed a tiny o.

The room flashed, and he stared at her covered head to toe in wet blood. He backed up a step, almost stumbling as the stairwell became his office, and he sat behind his desk. She pushed through the door, a jumble of limbs and panic.

I grew up on a farm, so, you know blood... blood doesn't... doesn't bother me, I... she'd said.

He looked up, and his stomach sank into his shoes.

“Dr. Shepherd,” Dr. Kepner said. The stairwell flashed back into place, but the blood on her body stayed like a garish coat of wet paint.

“I'm fine,” he said. He scraped a palm against his face. He turned, and he pushed himself up the steps. Away from her. Away from people. Away. “I'm fine.”

“Dr. Shepherd, wait,” she said. “You dropped your pill...”
Her feet echoed on the stairs, and he pushed to get away from her. From everyone. He made it to the next floor. He opened the door, and it dumped him into bustling crowds. Nurses. Orderlies. Custodial staff. Administrative workers. A breathing, murmuring, flotilla of busy people. The whispers around him kicked into a rumble. Eyes turned. Heat burned his face, but he didn't have time to be embarrassed. The spiders crawled.

The crush of life constricted around him. He dissolved out of sentience into pure flight, no fight. The world around him blurred not just from tears but confusion as over-sensitivity drove him into a deep, ugly pit of panic.

“Run,” said Mr. Clark. “Cowards run.”

The gun roared in his ears. He fell flat on his back with the impact and stared at the ceiling. His blood seeped out of his body, and he couldn't breathe. He couldn't breathe. He couldn't fucking breathe or think or anything. Light flashed. Or was it the ceiling? White. Endless.

A noise shrieked in his ears. He didn't know what. People touched him, and he couldn't get away. He couldn't. A shadow crossed over the world. “Hey!” a woman yelled, the letter ‘e’ stretched into eternity, and the horrific rumble of voices died to whispers.

“Back up,” said the woman. “Give the man some damned space. Shoo!”

He blinked. His grip hurt, he clenched so hard, and the color had drained from his fingers and palms. He couldn't stop crying, but the blur beyond the sheen of salty water looked sort of like a...

He blinked again. A long fucking drop spread out below him. Disorientation made him sway. A sea of wide-eyed faces looked up at him from below. He saw the entrance to the hospital. The place he desperately wished to be. He'd mashed himself against the glass barrier on the catwalk. He had nowhere left to go. People were everywhere behind him, staring. He didn't know how he'd gotten there.

His chest hurt. His legs weren't working. He would fall on his ass if he let go of the railing. Only his precarious balance against the railing held him upright. He couldn't breathe. Lights flickered in and out, and he heard his heart and the rush of blood in his ears more than anything else.

“Back up,” shouted the woman behind him, but he heard her voice through what seemed like fifty feet of water.

The spiders skittered. Whispers died into silence.

His grip wasn't enough anymore. He buckled into a sitting position, crunched up against the glass and the railing. His hands slipped loose from the railing and fell into his lap. He shivered as a deep, numbing chill set into his bones, and his head thunked against the glass. He put his head against his knees and hid away in the dark.

A shadow loomed. Somebody touched his shoulder, and he flinched, so overwhelmed with terror that he couldn't even cry out, but whoever it was didn't let go.

“Derek,” said a woman. “Derek, look up.” She shook his shoulder. “Look at me,” she said. “Derek.” The hand on his shoulder shifted to his head. She pushed. His muscles had become spaghetti. His neck tilted, and bleary colors replaced solid black as the warmth of his knees left his face, and cool air stroked his skin.

She nodded. “That's right,” she said. “Can you stand?”

What little he'd recovered of his breaths dropped way, and the room spun. He couldn't run anymore. He couldn't hide. There was nowhere to go. He needed to be not there, but he couldn't be anywhere else. His innards sank into the floor.

He couldn't breathe.

He was going to die.

He tried. He did. His heart pounded in his ears, and her voice faded into a dull murmur of which he only caught bits and pieces. It's fine, she said. You're fine, she said. Everything is fine, she said. Fine. Except he wasn't fine, and nothing would stop. The gun roared in his head, and he fell back. The ceiling tumbled over his head. White. Endless white. Like Bailey's lab coat. The blur stretched. He didn't know how much time passed.

“—ok at me,” she said. “Look at me, Derek.” She patted his cheek. The repetitive motion hit his nerves like drumbeats. “Look. You're fine.”

Under her constant, calming assault, fear receded like a slow tide, by inches and inches over eternity, until he didn't feel scared anymore. Just tired. Nauseated. Embarrassed. Unsettled. Stressed. The exited murmurs around him made his face heat. He knew without looking that his fantastic episode of being fine had attracted attention like a Rolling Stones concert.

He rolled his gaze to the left. Thick, navy pant legs blocked almost everything from view. He looked up and blinked. Mark stood beside him like a human shield, blocking Derek from the crush of bodies. Mark's back faced the crowd, but he wasn't looking at Derek either. Mark's lips formed a thin line, and he swallowed against red eyes. The skin underneath his temples leaped as he mashed his jaw again and again.

“Okay?” Bailey said.

Derek couldn't bring himself to speak. Bailey looked up. “Sloan,” she said. “Help him up.”

Mark turned and frowned. “Dr. Bailey—”

“No,” Derek said, more a moan than a word.

Bailey glared. “Did it sound like I was asking for opinions from the peanut gallery?” She pointed to Derek. “You, get up.” She pointed to Mark. “You, help.”

Before Mark could move, Derek grabbed the railing. He pushed down with his legs and pulled up with his shaking arms. His sternum screamed in protest. Too heavy. But he didn't care. He bit back on a moan of pain, and he pulled himself upright without Mark's help in front of... Eyes. Everywhere. The room swam and boggled out, and Mark grabbed Derek before he fell to the floor again. Derek gasped. The fuzzy blackness resolved after a long, sickening moment that made his stomach churn. The Percocet. He'd forgotten...

Bailey stood in front of them. She waved her arms like an airplane conductor. “This way,” she said. She gestured them both away from the Chief's office.

Derek blinked. There must have been two dozen people crammed on the catwalk around him, all with concerned, sad eyes and piteous looks that made his coiling stomach want to heave. Heat flamed across his cheeks. He tried to take a step. His legs were like deadweights. Mark's grip tightened. Derek's arm squashed against his torso and his ribs constricted as Mark crushed him. At least Derek didn't fall, but Mark's grip hurt.

Derek thought about how similar this was to the last time he'd fallen on the catwalk. Last time. Like this would become an annual ritual or something. Mark had caved in Derek's face, and Meredith had walked a hurting Derek off through the crowd. He'd been broken. He'd wanted to die. A laugh twisted from his mouth, and the whispers started again.

He hurt. His body shivered. He swallowed. “Mark,” he said, his voice soft and shaking. “Ow.”

Mark's grip loosened. “Sorry,” he said gruffly.

Derek stared at his feet as they baby-stepped off the catwalk because it meant he didn't have to look at the well-wishers and gawking masses. As he passed the place he'd nearly died, he saw the light grout between the tiles become dark with an ominous stain, and his stomach twisted. Him. He'd bled out his life into the floor, and it'd stuck despite bleach and other things. Forever. He pressed his face into Mark's shoulder and breathed as he moaned, deep and low. The whispers roared in his ears.

“Why aren't any of you working?” Bailey snapped as she pedaled backward, staring at the crowd behind them. “This is a hospital. Don't tell me there's no work to do, because it'll make you a giant pack of liars.”

Her piercing voice seemed to set the crowd into motion. They dispersed around him as he and Mark walked. Away. Bailey turned and swiped a small object from the one of the last people left in what had been a mob. She flipped open the phone and started hitting buttons. Derek watched. His stomach twisted again. Somebody had been taking photos? Or...

“Hey, I need that phone,” said an offended, scrappy orderly. He was a thin, wiry creature, with the wispy dusting of a beard covering his pale face. His eyes widened as Bailey glared.

“I know you're not playing paparazzi in a hospital,” Bailey said.

The orderly's mouth opened. And then shut. And opened. “I was just texting my girlfriend about dinner—”

Bailey held up her hand. “Do I look like I care? Do it elsewhere!”

“But—”

Her eyes narrowed. “Zzt!”

Blush crept across the orderly's face. Bailey pocketed the phone, and she shooed him away. He took her direction to heart, and he rushed off in the opposite direction.

With no crowd left to fend off, Bailey scurried to the place on the railing where Derek had fallen. She picked up the crumpled white bag containing his Percocet. She took the spot on his left side, and the three of them walked down the hallway opposite the Chief's office. Or, rather, Mark and Bailey walked. Derek limped. An eternity passed before they found an empty but open office in the long line down the hall.

The dark, ten-by-ten, matchbox room was full of sprawled papers and open books and other neurosurgery research. The desk plate identified the unkempt office as Dr. Weller's. Derek knew from experience Dr. Weller didn't spend more than about thirty minutes a day in the small closet Seattle Grace had provided him. They shuffled three feet inside the door before Bailey launched for the desk and pulled the wheeling executive chair around for Derek.

“I'm...” Derek managed between pants.

Bailey squeezed the back of the chair. The leather made a squishy noise. “Sit before you fall,” she said. The bag containing his pill bottle jingled as she handed it back to him. He clutched it.

A pager bleeped, and Mark groaned as he looked at it. Derek collapsed into the chair, which rolled two inches before the stained carpet caught the wheels like mud. “Fuck,” Mark said. “I told them not to page me unless it was a life or death emergency.” His gaze shifted back and forth between Bailey and Derek.

Bailey shooed him away. “Go, then.”

“But—” Mark said.

Bailey glared. “You're not ignoring an emergency page.” She jabbed her thumb in Derek's direction. “He's not dying.”

“I'm sorry. I'll be right back,” Mark said, and he fled the room at a run, whether to get to the page faster, or to return from the page faster, Derek didn't know.

The door slammed shut, and muffled silence spread into the room like a soft blanket. Dr. Bailey breathed. He breathed. The blood rushed in his ears. His heart beat. But nobody spoke, and he needed that. He settled in his chair and inhaled the musty scent of paper.

“You heard that, right?” Dr. Bailey said.

“What?” he said.

She touched his shoulder and squeezed. “You're not dying.”

His stomach quivered, and everything fell out of him. Everything he'd been trying to hold inside. His lungs heaved. He sobbed once, but the rest was quiet grief. Quiet weeping. His breathing stuttered, and his eyes leaked, but he didn't make any noises.

Bailey stood in front of the chair and wrapped her arms around him. She said nothing, but she made soft shushing noises until the tears dried. He didn't have much left. The entire episode lasted two minutes, at best.

He closed his eyes and put his face against his hands as she pulled away. His elbows jammed into his knees as he pressed his weight into himself. His pill bottle rested in his lap. “I'm fine,” he said into his palms. His voice came out croaky and wretched.

“I know you're not trying to tell me this is fine,” she said in a soft voice. She went to the miniature water cooler by the desk, pulled off a Dixie cup from the stack, and filled it. He raised his head and watched her.

“Miranda...”

She turned. “Shut your fool mouth,” she said. She jabbed the cup at him. Water sloshed. “Drink this. Small sips,” she said.
He took the cup from her hands. The idea of putting something in his stomach, even water, nauseated him. He took a tiny sip and swirled it in his mouth. The cool feel of the water relaxed him. He swallowed. The water felt good against his hurting throat, and his stomach untied a few knots when the fluid collected there.

“Okay?” Dr. Bailey said.

“Okay,” said Derek. He rolled the paper cup against his forehead. The dry, cool paper soothed him. He sighed and took another sip. Another.

“I can't go into the room where Dr. Percy was shot,” Dr. Bailey said. “I hid under the bed when Mr. Clark came. He found me, and he yanked me out by my ankles.”

“I'm sorry.”

Her gaze hardened. “Do I look like I need a pity party?” she snapped.

He blinked. “No.”

“Well, don't be a hypocrite and start one then.”

Blush bloomed across his features. He didn't have a good reply for that. She sighed, and she squeezed his shoulder.

“They haven't been through this,” she said. “They don't know. You just take your time, one day at a time, and you don't worry about them.” She pulled the visitor chair away from the desk, rolled it next to his, and sat.

He put his head down against his knees as Mr. Clark laughed in his ears.

“I can't be here,” he said. “I need to go home.” He reached for his pill bottle and unscrewed the cap. He felt like a uncoordinated blob as he tried to pull a pill loose from the pile.

She grabbed the bottle from him. “How many do you usually take?” she said.

He closed his eyes. “Two. I take... When it's bad.”

“You're getting sneaky,” Mr. Clark said. “Really.”

She dumped out two pills onto her palm. “Why didn't you say anything? Did you wrench yourself when you fell?”

“Sorry,” he said as she handed him two pills and screwed the cap shut. While she muttered about idiot male doctors and their pathetic pain management skills, he popped one pill into his mouth and tipped back his water cup. Water sloshed into his mouth and swept the pill down his throat as he swallowed. He took the second pill as well. The room spun as they both settled in his stomach.

“Is somebody supposed to give you a ride?” Dr. Bailey said.

He blinked. The room began slow revolutions as he absorbed more and more of the Percocet from his otherwise empty stomach. A wall of tiredness chased him, threatening to run him down.

“Mark,” he said.

“Well, Mark just got—” Dr. Bailey's beeper went off, a shrill, sharp sound in the quiet. He flinched at the interruption, and he hated himself for it when he saw her eyes widen at his discomfiture over such a small thing. “Paged,” she said as she un-clipped her pager from her belt and squinted at it.

He wobbled to his feet. The room blotted out, and he caught himself against the armrests of the chair. “I need to go home,” he said. “I need to—” But he couldn't. If he left the dark office, he would fall apart again. He knew it. He was trapped, and— His vision blurred. Maybe it didn't matter.

Small hands grabbed him and guided him back to the chair. “Did I tell you to stop breathing?” Bailey said.

“Y’asked me a question,” he said.

“Well, stop answering, and breathe,” she said.

He gestured to her pager. The flick of his wrist felt sloppy. Disjointed. “Wusthat 'n emergency?”

She glared, and he made a show of forcing himself to take long, even breaths. It wasn't difficult. He felt like he was turning to mush. The air turned to molasses. Muffled voices wandered past the closed office door, and he swallowed. The noise took so long to process it didn't really bother him. His muscles loosened. Peace laid a blanket over everything.

“I have to take this page,” she said. “I'll find Dr. Sloan for you. Don't move from this spot.”

“Kay.”

“Did I tell you to talk?” she said. She backed into the door, but didn't take her eyes off him. “Breathe.”

“I am,” he said.

“No,” she said. “You're talking.”

He opened his mouth to reply, but she held up her hand, and he stopped himself. He took a deep breath that inflated him from his belly to his shoulders and blew it out. She seemed satisfied. She nodded. “Don't move,” she repeated. He breathed in and out once more, and she left him alone.

He blinked once. Twice. His eyelids seemed kind of stuck. Kind of heavy. He leaned back in the chair and let his head tilt into the head rest. His body slowed down as he breathed. His tension loosened. He stared at the ceiling. There was a brownish, liquid stain near the light fixture shaped sort of like an amoeba.

He heard noises outside the room. People walking. Voices. A fog descended around his body, and though he heard, he didn't process. He breathed, slower. Slower. His heart rate depressed. His eyes closed, and he didn't care anymore. He didn't care about anything. The soft buzz of contentment spread through his veins.

_I know you're not playing paparazzi in a hospital_, Dr. Bailey had said.

The orderly had said he'd been texting about dinner, but the idea was ludicrous. To be texting about dinner while somebody was having a panic attack fifteen feet away. No, he'd been texting about Dr. Derek Shepherd on his knees. Doctor... Shep. Shh. Derek lost his train of thought. The memory of the phone and the beak-y orderly broke apart. Fear became a distant memory. He could think of the gun. He could think of Gary Clark. He didn't feel a thing when he did except peace.
A vague sigh of relief swept through him.

His lips parted as he lost his conscious willpower. Air swept through his cottony mouth. He breathed, and he heard the rasps in the silent space, but he didn't care. The room spun, but it didn't matter because he wasn't walking. Blackness swirled around him. With his eyes shut, the carousel wouldn't stop. He smiled sloppily. After several revolutions, he became less aware. The carousel continued, but far away. Wispy black became solid black, and then he slept, dreamless.

“Derek,” Meredith said. The noise pierced his abyss. She sounded concerned. Her fingers dug into his shoulders, and she shook him. Earthquake. “Derek, wake up. Derek.”

“Mmm,” he said. He turned his head into the chair and pushed at her. He wanted to be in the black place. But she wouldn't back off.

“Derek, wake up,” she said again. “Derek!”

He squinted at the sharp, smeary colors beyond his eyeballs. He swallowed. “M'dith,” he said.

The fleshy blur in the middle of the mess resolved into her face. Meredith. She wore her baby blue scrubs. A smear of dried blood crusted the sleeve. He leaned forward. “Bleedin','” he said. He reached for the stain.

She frowned until she followed his hand. She brushed him away. “It's from a patient. Don't touch it. I need to change. Are you okay?”

He blinked. “M'fine.” He stood up to demonstrate, but the room turned fuzzy and black, and the floor disappeared.

Arms wrapped around him. When he caught his breath, he still stood.

“Oops,” he said.

“What...” he said. He took a wobbly step away from the chair. The floor felt like an obstacle course despite being flat and unobstructed. He gripped her shoulder when the room see-sawed.

“Mark's busy. His patient needed emergency surgery.”

“Butyer busy, too,” he said.

She bit her lip. “That doesn't matter.” She hugged him. “You matter.”

“Goin' home?” he said. He waded toward the door. The air in the room seemed like liquid. He swam.

She blinked. “Yeah,” she said. “Home.”

He opened the door. Bright lights slammed into his eyeballs. He blinked, and he held the door frame. His hand slid, and his resolution to stay upright faltered. She held his waist. “Derek, I'm sorry I made you do this,” she said. “I pushed too hard, and now you're hurt, and I—”

“M'okay,” he said.
She babbled. He couldn't keep track of anything. Words gathered and collided on his tongue, until a gnarled, twisty pile of unspoken syllables rested there, waiting to be said. He lost track of them, too. Lost track of everything. People stared at him in the hallway, and hushed whispers curled around him, but he didn't know why it was important to care. He could barely keep track of his limbs.

He did remember one thing.

“Home,” he said. “Please.”

She rubbed his back. “We're going,” she said. She kept pace with him as he shuffled mindlessly toward the elevator.
Chapter 15

Derek sat on the leather loveseat in his old ten-by-ten office, staring at nothing. After he'd left his position as head of neurosurgery, the position had been filled by Dr. Weller. Dr. Weller already had an office at Seattle Grace the same shoebox size as Derek's former haunt. Neither office had windows. Neither had any particular locational advantage. There hadn't been much point in having Dr. Weller move his things. On top of that, the shooting had caused attrition, not growth. With no new doctors needing offices, Derek's old office had been left in skeletal limbo.

Meredith sat behind the dinged, scratched desk that had been his, watching him. His eyes were open, but his eyelids drooped. Just a fraction. Enough to take away the normal wakefulness from what should have been a bright-eyed gaze.

His dull gaze faced where he'd hung his various diplomas, now a blank, white-washed wall. His old bookshelves lined the room behind the desk. Empty. A pale, dusty film had collected on the shelves. His desk, once stacked a foot high with ongoing casework and research, was nothing but an old oak husk with empty drawers. She stroked the smooth wood grain with her fingertips. Condensation formed on the wood in her wake and then slipped away in an instant.

The whisper of the air conditioner spread a hush into the room.

"Derek," she prodded.

He blinked. He sighed, and he raised his hands to wipe his face, not in a graceful motion like it should have been. More lax. Like an ounce of care had been removed from the impulses sent by his brain to his muscles, leaving him looking like something... not. Not quite there. Not quite whole.

"I'm sorry," he said, and he turned to her. "What?"

"I said, best vacation?"

"I said, best vacation?"

She tried to ignore the fact that he'd lost track of the conversation right in the middle of it. They'd come to Seattle Grace two hours before, and they'd sat outside on the bench for a while. Just talking. People watching. Trying to get him used to things. They'd been doing it all week.

He'd been all right that morning. Not great. But all right. But then he'd excused himself to use the restroom. Ever since he'd returned, he'd been acting like he'd detached himself from reality. Weird. Spacey. Exhausted. Like he'd been when she'd brought him home from the hospital the first time.

Dissociation, Dr. Wyatt had said. When he's not paying attention to the world, he's not hurt or frightened. He's created a safety zone for himself.

A tremor of disquiet hovered underneath her skin. He was pushing himself. Pushing himself to be there when he wasn't okay with it yet. She tightened her grip against the arms of his beat up executive chair. Let him choose, she told herself, despite the whine in her head repeating to her that this was a mistake. Let him choose when he's done. He'll choose.

"Best vacation?" he parroted, as if the words he'd just heard weren't in English.

She spun the old executive chair half clockwise and then half counterclockwise. The chair squeaked. Tension drove her to move. She clutched the lip of the desk as she stood. Her fingers slipped over the empty surface, and a brief flash of what had been there months before illuminated in the back of her brain. She remembered a plastic poster stuck by double-sided mounting tape to the surface of the desk. The poster had delineated the different sections of the human brain and what purpose they each served. Frontal lobe for emotions, reasoning, movement, problem solving.
Parietal lobe for the senses like touch and taste. Occipital lobe for vision and object recognition.
Temporal lobe for memories. Which brought her gaze to him. Behind him, he'd hung dozens of posters, now, all gone. An illustration of a human spine. Nerve cluster maps. Framed copies of his headlining research articles, at least a dozen.

She left the desk behind her and sank onto the loveseat next to him. The cushions squeaked.
Without comment, almost as if it were a reflex, he wrapped his arm over her shoulder. She sank against his body. The strong, soothing scent of his cologne caressed her.

He wore a sharp black suit and a black tie. She'd caught him that morning, standing lost and silent by the closet. His fingers had brushed the striped blue tie she'd always told him she liked, and he'd sighed. It doesn't feel appropriate for this, he'd said. And he'd passed it over. His tie rack had moaned as he'd spun it around, looking for an even more subdued alternative. She'd sat on the bed and watched, torn between apprehension and voyeurism as he'd primped and prepared. She loved the way he looked in a crisp, well-fitting suit.

“Yes, best vacation,” she said. “You're acting really spacey.”

He sighed. “Memories, I guess.”

She stroked the arm of his sport coat. “Good ones or bad ones?”

“When Richard showed me this office, I thought I might have made a mistake,” he said.

“Not what you were used to?”

A tired smile pulled at his lips. She followed his gaze as he looked at his former desk, the bookcase, three chairs, and the loveseat, all crammed into the room like interlocking puzzle pieces that wouldn't fit anymore with the slightest disruption to their alignment.

“I had a bathroom attached to my old office in Manhattan,” he said. “The bathroom had a closet.
The closet was bigger than this.”

She tried to imagine the look on his face as Chief Webber had ushered him into this room. Derek's eyes would have widened, but he would have recovered with a panicky smile. The Chief wouldn't have noticed the panicky bit, just the smile. He would have blathered on about how Seattle Grace was the best of the best, and how Derek was a welcome addition to the team. Blah, blah. She could hear him in her head.

“Private practice is a bit more lucrative,” she said. “Life's a bit different down in the trenches.”

“More lucrative, yes,” he said. “But more empty. It only took me a few days to get over myself.”

I think I hate being Chief, he'd said.

She touched his thigh. His suit felt coarse to the touch. She'd gotten used to the soft, worn feel of beat up jeans. Pajama pants. Things he'd worn during his recovery. She kissed him.

“Hmm,” he said as he stared into the nothing where his coat rack had been. He used to hang his lab coon there with his stethoscope coiled in the pocket. “Egypt.”

“What?” she said.
“Now, who's spacing?” he said, a ghost of smirk on his face. “Best vacation. Egypt.”

She looked up at him. “You've been to Egypt?”

“A long time ago, yes,” he said. “Before I came to Seattle.”

“Did you go with Addison?”

“No, actually,” he said. “I went for a medical conference on neurosurgery and neuroscience in Cairo.”

“Derek, that's not a vacation. That's work. If you count work, I'm sure you've been everywhere.”

“I stayed an extra day. I saw the pyramids.”

She snorted. “A whole day, wow.”

“You're mocking me,” he said.

“I'm not mocking.”

“You are.” He kissed her, and she giggled. “The pyramids were sort of disappointing, by the way. They're not actually in the middle of the desert.”

“They're not?”

“No. And there's a Pizza Hut next to them. Or, there was. I don't know about now.”

“Seriously?”

He nodded. “I went. I saw. I even dared to sample the pizza. And you mock me.”

“It's just...” She stared at him, at his weathered laugh lines. She loved when his eyes lit up with extra wattage from his smile, and the skin around his eyes crinkled. She saw that look so rarely these days that it made her heart ache just to think about it. Today, he just seemed tired. A bit listless. He smiled, sometimes. But the expression never reached his eyes. “You seriously sampled the pizza?”

“Yes,” he said. “I was curious if it was as bad there as it is here.” His nose scrunched as though he'd scented something displeasing. “It is.”

“Did you get it without meat or cheese like usual?”

He shook his head. “See? You're mocking me.”

In her thirty-two years, she'd been to most of the states in the U.S. except Alaska, a few provinces in Canada, Mexico a few times, and a lot of Western Europe. “But...” She shifted, and he squeezed her shoulder as she resettled against him. “You've lived over four decades,” she said. “A one day vacation where you consumed faux-healthy pizza is the best one you've taken?”

He shrugged. “I'm a reformed workaholic, Meredith,” he said, and he gave her a lop-sided grin that made her heart twist. Almost. Almost perfect. Maybe he was snapping out of his funk. Maybe. “When would I have taken a vacation?”

“You didn't even take a nice honeymoon?”
He considered her for a moment. “Addison and I went to Niagara Falls for a long weekend because it was close, ate bad seafood, and spent most of it sick.”

“Oh,” she said. “Well, what about when you were a kid?”

“My dad died,” he said, and the kindling twinkle in his eyes waned. She swallowed as alarm bells rang in her head. Stupid. Stupid topic, given the setting. They were trying to re-acclimate him. Stupid.

She clutched his knee and squeezed.

He stared at the far wall where his diplomas had hung, and she wondered if he even registered anymore what he looked at. He'd gone to Columbia University for both his bachelor's degree and his medical degree. That had been a surprise to her when she'd found out.

Then why do you wear Bowdoin shirts so often? she'd asked.

He'd shrugged. I went there my Freshman year. I transferred out after.

Why?

To be closer to home, he'd said. She'd never asked why he'd wanted that. Now, she knew his dad had died only a few years before, his mother had been alone, and Meredith wished she'd asked, then. Asked more. Known more.

“Before that?” she said, trying to steer him away from that black pit. “Nothing?”

He said nothing. After a long, stretched moment, her nerves shivered back into existence. Fragile. The fragility of conversations with him made her dizzy. Topics that seemed safe on the surface swam like the shark from Jaws underneath, all chomping teeth and black, predatory eyes, ready and waiting to swallow him whole, or rip off a leg or something.

The air conditioning whirred. Quiet blanketed his office like the earth after fresh fallen snow. That's why she'd ushered him this way, though she hadn't told him outright that she thought it'd be easier for him away from the constant drone of the intercom. Away from the bustle and excitement of those arriving and leaving through the main entryway. Doctors, patients, other staff. People who'd recognized him often tried to chitchat, which hadn't helped, either. He'd gotten edgier as time had gone on. When he'd returned from the bathroom, he'd been spacey and weird, and she'd tried to get him away without making him feel self-conscious.

Have you been back to your old office? she'd said. I think it's still empty.

I don't know, he'd said.

Let's find out.

“Derek?” she prodded.

“Sandy Hook, I guess,” he said.

“Sandy what?”

“Hook,” he repeated. “It's a barrier spit in Jersey with some public beaches on it. We used to go there every summer for a long weekend. I take it you never went there?”

“Why would I have?”
He peered at her. “Boston is sort of close.”

“Why would I go to a sort of close beach when Boston has really close beaches?”

“True.”

“Plus, I lived with my mother, who didn't believe in vacations. Like Manhattan you.”

His gaze creased with displeasure. “That's just...”

“Sad and tragic, I know,” she said. “So, what made Sandy Hook a good vacation?”

“I don't know.” He shrugged. “My whole family would go.”

She pinched a line of fabric from his pant leg and ran her fingertips along the crease. The solid press of his quadriceps underneath her hand gave her reassurance. Her hand rasped against his leg, and she let her eyelids dip as she imagined. His mother had shown her a picture from her wallet when Derek had been sleeping in the hospital. Just one picture.

Derek had been small. Wiry. With a cherubic, smooth face and a big mess of untamed, almost-black hair. The picture had been taken before he'd broken his nose, and he'd been absent the ruggedness that his asymmetry brought him. She imagined the littler, younger version of him crowded in the back seat of a car with his four pushy sisters amidst a chorus of are-we-there-yets and stop-touching-mes.

“Did your family have a hippie van?” she said.

“Uh, no,” he said. “Why?”

“No reason,” she said. “Did you play car games with your sisters?”

“Car games?”

“Punch buggies. Or the alphabet game. Or I spy?”

He looked at her with a small, tired smile that made her melt inside. He found her amusing, and he loved her, and when he looked at her, she rarely forgot it. That was another thing she had missed since the shooting. All his looks had become wounded and dark. He still loved her. Obviously. But the amusement had died. Even this barest hint of him bouncing back made her body lift.

“I don't remember,” he said.

“Well, what did you do at the beach?”

“I don't know.” he said. He shrugged. “Beach things. Played in the waves. Made sand castles. I remember...” His gaze spaced as his conscious thought fell away from the room. He made a soft noise in his throat. A hmmm, sort of, but not a full-fledged vocalization. Something low and guttural and barely there, and it made her lower body tighten. The pink of his tongue appeared as he wet his lower lip. His mouth opened the smallest fraction. His pupils dilated a hair as he stared at the memory in his head.

“What?” she said.

“I remember standing in the water, up to my knees,” he said, his voice flat as he lived in the past. “I'd scrunch the sand between my toes, look out at all the open space over the water, listen to the surf, and—” He blinked and looked at her. She couldn't keep the grin from her face. “What?” he “Maybe Seattle Derek isn't so different from Manhattan Derek, after all.”

“I guess I've always liked space.”

She stroked his arm. “And quiet.”

“Mmm. And quiet,” he agreed. He kissed her forehead. “It's funny.”

“What?”

“I haven't thought about that in years,” he said. “Sandy Hook has always been about my watering can.”

“Your watering can?”

He nodded. “When I was four, I got caught in an undertow as I was filling up my watering can,” he explained. He held out his palm and made a fist. “I remember, the can pulled on my hand, and I didn't want to let go. I fell into the current, but then I was in the air, and the can slipped away in the waves. My mom had picked me up, and I was so angry. That was my favorite watering can, and she just let it go.”

She kissed him. “Well, I'm glad she rescued the more important thing.”

He grunted, and his composure shattered. What had been peaceful became disquieted and dissonant. She tensed. “I apparently have a penchant for near death dating back to childhood,” he said.

“Derek...”

He shook his head. “It's okay.” He swallowed, and he blinked. He ran his fingers through his hair and sighed, and then he seemed all right again. “My dad bought me ice cream to make up for the can.”

She stared. “You? Ate ice cream? Voluntarily?”

“Hey,” he said, glowering. “I eat ice cream. I've eaten ice cream!”

“Once,” she countered.

She remembered the moment with clarity because she'd never seen him so indulgent. He'd taken her out for dinner the week after they'd first started talking about babies, and she'd said she'd think about having one. They hadn't dressed up, but he'd worn his nice red shirt. The one she'd met him in. He'd ordered a steak, which hadn't surprised her. What had surprised her was when he hadn't gotten a substitution for his mashed potatoes, and he hadn't skirted around them either. He'd cleaned his plate.

The restaurant glowed. A candle flickered in the middle of a glass bowl the size of a teacup on their table, giving the dessert plate, tablecloth, and him a warm, soft tone. Beyond their horizon, the room seemed to blur, and candles dotted the tables in the distance like fireflies. Derek pulled the fork to his mouth and slipped another bite — the last bite — of hot brownie sundae between his lips while she watched.

Her eyebrows raised as his Adam's apple rolled. A wide smile curled his lips as he set his fork
Only brown crumbs trapped in a thin sheen of melted vanilla ice cream and fudge remained. The fork tinkled as he set it down in the bowl. He relaxed against his chair, which moaned when he shifted his weight. What had been a complete sundae had disappeared, not just into her stomach, but into his. The few times they'd gone out in the past, they'd always ordered dessert, but he rarely had more than a bite or two, and her portion ranged anywhere from seven-eighths to the whole damned thing minus some crumbs. This was...

“Hungry?” she said.

He shrugged. “I'm in a good mood.”

“Not that I'm complaining,” she said, “But, why?”

He gave her a small, vague smile, and he didn't answer. He wiped his lips, and he set his napkin down in his lap. His gaze didn't leave her face.

“Seriously, why?” she said.

“I love you,” he said.

“And that's why you're eating ice cream and brownies?”

He shook his head, and he didn't stop smiling.

“What?” she said. Blush crept across her face.

“You know you're beautiful when you're perplexed?”

Her chest tightened when she recalled his appetite then, a few weeks before the shooting, and his appetite now, when she had to remind him just to eat at all. He still skipped meals. He said he didn't mean to, and she believed him. Whenever she prodded him, he ate without protest, but the simple act of replenishing himself no longer came to him as a natural activity. He was still a bit too thin, but she'd been watching his weight, and he'd been gaining, so she left him alone about it.

“Who do you think eats your strawberry ice cream, Meredith? Kitchen gnomes?”

Meredith frowned. “You mean that wasn't Lexie?” she said.

“I happen to like strawberry ice cream.”

“We've been married over a year,” she said. She grunted as she sat up to face him eye-to-eye. She would wrinkle her clothes, but she didn't care. She turned her hip into the back of the couch and brought her knee up on the seat. His hand shifted from her shoulder to her calf. He rubbed her idly through her black dress pants. The heel of her right shoe popped loose and fell to the floor with a clunk. “How did I not know you like strawberry ice cream?” she said.

He shrugged. “Have you ever asked?”

“Well, I...” She looked at her lap. “Well, no.”

His thumb brushed her chin, and he tipped her gaze to meet his. “I indulge once in a while, you know.”

She couldn't count the number of times she'd come home to her long-awaited pint of ice cream, only to find it nibbled on more than she could remember nibbling on it. Always an extra spoonful. One or two. Here or there. Not enough to annoy her or make her curious. She didn't put her name on the carton. She'd never told anybody to keep off. It wasn't like ice cream was a dwindling world resource or something. She'd just... assumed it had been her half-sister for some reason. Alex scarfed down all sorts of unhealthy food, but he was more of a fat and grease freak than a sweet tooth. And the idea of Derek being the culprit hadn't even occurred to her.

“Besides,” he continued, “I was four. I didn't know the evils of high blood glucose back then.”

“Still,” she said. “I don't know. I always pictured you as a tofu toddler.”

“Tofu toddler,” he said with a frown. “I'm not even a tofu adult.” His affronted expression made her grin despite her guilt for not knowing about the ice cream. “I choose to eat a high protein, nutritious breakfast every morning, and—”

“Whole grains instead of processed when there's an option.”

“Well, yes,” he said. “That's just common sense, isn't it?”

“Vegetables, all the time. Low-fat yogurt. No mayonnaise. No cheese or meat on your pizza.”

“What's wrong with that? It's a quick way to cut calories.”

“That's not pizza. And, what can I say?” She leaned into him and kissed him. She lingered at his lips. “You're sort of a dietary saint compared to me.”

“That's just sad,” he murmured against her. He nuzzled her ear, and he breathed in her space.

“What's sad?” she said.

“That my sainthood has somehow wedged me into the tofu category. Really, Meredith? Have you ever seen me eat soy?”

“It's called health nut stereotyping,” she said. “Get over it.”

“I will not,” he said. “I maintain my manly figure through blood, sweat, and tears. Not tofu.”

She laughed. Really laughed. The noise burbled out of her like a running brook, and she leaned against him. Her hair fell into her face, and the flowery scent of her hairspray overwhelmed his cologne in a dizzy dance of scent. He wrapped his arms around her, and he embraced her. He said nothing. As she flipped her hair away from her face, she saw him grinning at her, again not quite perfect, but she lost herself in that moment of levity.

This was her Derek. Almost. The Derek she'd missed for weeks. The one who teased her and smiled and seemed happy with his life. The one who made her laugh and feel safe, beautiful, and doubtless. He made rare appearances. Every once in a while. And when he did, her world seemed to align with everything. Dissonant chords became harmony. And the longing, lonely ache in her chest eased.

“What?” he said with a grin. “You don't think my figure is manly?” He patted his flat stomach for emphasis, and she laughed at him again. He murmured her name like a prayer and held her. His suit mashed with her blouse in a war of wool and silk.

She peered into the stark blue of his eyes. The twinkle and soul she hoped to find were there, but muted behind a telltale cloud, one she hadn't seen earlier when he'd been spacey and dour, and the contrast hadn't been so high. Her happiness crashed into the rocks, and she bit her lip as she stared at him.
“What’s wrong?” he said as his smile faded, and seriousness crept in.

She stroked his chest. His thick shirt hid the scar, but she could feel it through the fabric. The long, bumpy line down his sternum and the swollen knob just underneath his shirt collar where his tie formed a trapezoidal knot. He inhaled as she touched him.

“You didn't tell me you were hurting this morning,” she said. “Again?”

The last bit of his almost-perfect smile bled out of him. He swallowed, and he looked away. “Yeah.”

“I don't understand why Cristina would discontinue your Oxycontin when you're still aching so much. If you're in pain all the time, Oxy makes way more sense than Percocet.”

“I don't know,” he said.

“You should talk to her.”

“I'm fine with this,” he said.

“But it makes you tired and spacey—”

“I said I'm fine, Meredith.”

The abruptness of his tongue-lashing made her flinch. Her heart thudded. He took a slow breath, filled his lungs, and exhaled. “I'm sorry,” he said, his tone much more moderated. He swallowed, and he pinched the bridge over his nose. “That was...”

She took a deep breath to mirror his, and she blew it out. She closed her eyes. Nerves recovered from their ebb and flowed back into her. He was pushing himself too hard. That much was clear, or he wouldn't be on such a short fuse.

“What flavor?” she said, trying to steer the topic away from the conversational sharks.

He blinked. “What?”

“The ice cream,” she said. “What flavor did your dad buy you?”

“I...” he began. She watched as he struggled to put himself back in the mindset of their prior discussion. She stared at his hands. He'd withdrawn during his outburst, back into his own bubble. Now, he pushed his palms an inch toward her like he wanted to touch her, but he stopped. She grabbed his hands and pulled him to her. His skin had softened. Months of being Chief, and over eight weeks off from work had allowed his skin to heal from the constant soapy beatings of scrubbing into surgery. His fingers flexed in her grip. He stared at her, and his upset expression relaxed. Just a fraction.

“I'm sorry,” he said again, his words deep and sincere. He didn't break his stare. He looked more tired than he had been.

She squeezed his hands. “What flavor?” she said.

Silence stretched as he remembered. “It was from a DQ,” he said. He filled the verbal space with an empty sort of sound. Not a word. Not an um. Just a sound. Deep and soft. She watched his face as the memory unfurled in his brain, and a bewildered, small smile replaced what had been contrition. “I think it was strawberry.”
She grinned. She kissed him. “So, Derek Shepherd has a weakness for strawberry ice cream.” She dropped her voice low. “That's my favorite flavor, too, you know.”

He nodded. “I do know.”

“Must be kismet or whatever.”

“I wouldn't say ice cream is a weakness, exactly,” he said. “And my favorite is coffee-flavored, not strawberry. But it's more a distinct fondness held at bay by my awesome willpower.”

“So, a weakness.”

He snorted. “I don't have those,” he said. But his hesitant expression belied his haughty tone. Still, he was trying despite his outburst instead of sulking, and that meant a lot to her. In the past months, he'd become the king of sulking.

He shrugged. “I like coffee. I like ice cream. It's both.”

“The same could be said for strawberries, you know.”

“Coffee-flavored is still better,” he said.

“Strawberry.”

He leaned forward, his gaze challenging and sparkling. “Coffee.”

“Definitely strawberry,” she said.

“Definitely,” he said. Their noses bumped. “Coffee.” She reached up and stroked the loose hair out of his face. His eyelids dipped, and he sighed.

“Did your dad have some ice cream, too?” she said. “The ice cream weakness could be genetic. Like kryptonite.”

That question brought him up short. “I don't...” He blinked, and the space between them widened. He sighed, though this time he sounded disturbed and not relaxed. “I don't remember. I don't remember much about him anymore. He died a long time ago.”

“What do you remember, then?” she said. “Did he look like you?”

“I see him in the mirror every day,” he said, and he seemed a bit forlorn. “He was taller.” A small laugh twisted in his throat. “Or maybe I just remember him taller.”

He looked at her, his eyebrows raised in an expression doubt. Do you really care about this? said his gaze, as though he didn't believe she would maintain interest in him or his past for such a long conversation. Her heart squeezed. She nodded to urge him on. She wanted to hear. She did.

“He smelled like... some kind of wood,” he continued, “Or... sawdust, maybe? Cedar.” He touched his face as he stared into space. His fingertips followed the line of his cheekbone. “I think he had a wider face. He never broke his nose, either. Or, if he did, it healed straight.”

She tried to imagine from Derek's description the man who had shaped Derek's young life. A less rugged Derek with a rounder face. The man must have been kind, she decided. Soft spoken, but confident. Derek had a soothing way about him that made it difficult to be upset when he was trying to calm her down. She imagined that quality in a dad, in his dad, and fantasies erupted in her brain left and right. She watched the elder Shepherd soothe away stubbed toes and hurt feelings and broken Barbies for the entire Shepherd family. And then she pictured Derek with their theoretical baby doing the same thing in the not-so-distant, theoretical future. She splayed a palm against her lower body and sighed as a familiar ache ran her through.

She wished it would happen, now. They still didn't have sex every day like they'd used to. But every other day to every three days at the widest gap. Whenever he was up for it, both literally and figuratively.

“Do you have a picture?” she said. “I'd like to see one.”

He shrugged. “Somewhere in a box, maybe. I didn't bring much with me when I moved.”

Another sad look.

“I'm sorry I dredged this up,” she said as his expression knocked sense back into her. What had she been thinking? She'd been trying to avoid the sharks, and then she'd pretty much fed him to one with a bucket of chum and a blood-sickle.

“No, it's okay,” he said. “He was my dad.” As though that were explanation enough. As though family could never be taboo no matter how much it hurt to discuss. He stroked her cheek, and then he glanced at his watch. “But we do have to get moving, soon.”

She sighed. As time had whittled away the moments, she'd really been hoping he'd given up on the idea of going to the memorial. He'd done poorly enough on the bench outside the hospital that she'd been forced to usher him away. He'd relaxed in his office, but at the same time gotten more tense. She stared at his face. Tired. He looked tired. And rubbed raw despite his small hints of returning levity and balance. And now she'd made him sad.

She stood as he stood, and she stumbled into the shoe that had fallen from her foot as she'd sat down. The small pump pinched her toes. She rubbed his back and watched his sleek lines as he took a deep, calming breath and blinked like he was dizzy. If he'd taken Percocet, that would make sense. She waited for a long moment, but he didn't move. The cushion pressed into the backs of his knees. He didn't speak.

She hated to keep prodding him. Hated to keep pushing. Nagging made her feel like the designated driver for an alcoholic who refused to admit he was drunk and couldn't get behind the wheel.

“Derek,” she said. She took a deep, preparatory breath to bolster herself. “Are you really okay?”

He shrugged. “Yeah, actually.”

“Not panicky?” she prodded.

“Maybe, I just needed to get it all out of my system that first time,” he said.

“Maybe,” she said, unconvinced. She smoothed her pants with a brush of her palms. Her blouse had gotten so wrinkled it looked like she'd slept in it. One reason to hate silk. But it was too late to care or fix it. He moved, but she stopped him before he reached the door, and she gripped his arms. “Derek, I mean it,” she said. “Are you really sure about this?”

“I'm sure,” he said, but he didn't sound sure. Not one bit. Her fingers tightened against his arms as she remembered how the whispers had started when he'd had his panic attack.
Meredith had been in the pit when she'd noticed an intern staring at her with a piteous look. And then another intern and another. A custodian. A fellow resident. What? she'd snapped, but no one had explained. No had one told her that Derek probably needed help. They'd just stared and whispered like gossiping leeches. What's the little wife have to run and fix, now?

Dr. Bailey had found Meredith and told her what had happened. Meredith remembered the burn in her lungs as she'd sprinted to Dr. Weller's office, a burble of uncontrolled presentiment coiling in her gut. She'd worried about how upset he would be that he'd fallen apart in front of so many people. At the same time, she'd been frantic. And frustrated. What the hell had he been doing on the catwalk in the first place? The plan, which she'd reviewed with him more than once, had been for him to go home with Mark after his appointment. Immediately. Do not pass go. Do not collect $200. Do not visit the freaking catwalk where he'd been shot! When she'd found him tired and beaten and barely aware even after she'd spent five minutes shaking him awake, though, that had somehow been worse than seeing him hysterical like she'd expected.

Dissociation is a mental defense mechanism, Dr. Wyatt had said. A sort of... self-hypnosis. It allows us to separate ourselves from reality. It helps us avoid processing negative emotions before we're ready.

She didn't want him to go through that again. She didn't want him to have to dissociate to make it through a minute or five or ten. Not ever. But he was a stubborn ass. He would force his body into a breakdown even though it was telling him, no, do not continue. She stared at him, meeting his gaze in the eye. She knew this would set him off. But she had to say something, if only to rip his keys away.

“I don't think this is a good idea,” she said.

A long pause followed. He stared at her, and he twitched like she'd slapped him across the face. She couldn't think of a single time she'd told him something so negative since he'd been shot. She'd been all about the you-can-do-it, maudlin crap, and the positive, fluffy it'll-get-betters. She still believed it would get better. But the longer he languished, the more she doubted that it would happen soon or even in the near-ish future. Not if things continued like they'd been going.

“How else do you expect me to become a human being again?” he said. “You said I had to keep going, and that I shouldn't stop.”

Guilty nausea churned in her stomach. “I did say that,” she conceded. “I think I was wrong.”

The last ounce of confidence in his gaze cracked. “You don't think I can do this.”

“No, Derek. I don't think you can,” she said. “You're pushing yourself too hard. Last week, you came here, and you had a twenty-five minute panic attack on the catwalk.”

“And we've been coming back all week,” he said, his voice even. “I haven't had another one.”

“To sit on benches and talk about our future first couple-y vacation!” she said. “Not to go to a memorial.”

“Meredith—”

“No,” she said. “You're tired. You've been sad. You've been snarly, and all I did was ask about your pain medication.” He swallowed, and he looked away as she spoke. “You're going to walk into the auditorium, and, assuming you make it past the jam-packed mass of hundreds, you're going to have to listen to stories about everybody who died. Did you even look at the program they sent with the invitation? There's bagpipers. With real bagpipes. Nothing says grief like bagpipes.”

He stared at the floor, silent. His breaths fell into the space between them fast and clipped. She closed her eyes and waited for the eruption. For the yelling match. For the hissing and spitting. She hated his temper, but she wouldn't back down. He swallowed, and the wet sound of it made her eyes burn. When he looked up, he stared at her, his expression like slate. Nothing there.

“I have to do this,” he said with a low voice.

“Why do you have to do this?” she said. “Give me a reason I can get behind.”

“Because I have to.”

“But, why?” she said. “Why do you want to put yourself through this when you know you're barely treading water?”

He blinked. The cataclysmic volcano she'd expected never erupted. His eyes filled with a thick sheen of water. He blinked again, and he sniffed. His lower lip quivered, and he looked away.

“Because they died, and I...” His voice cracked and fell silent.

She stared at him, disbelief and heartache carving out her insides. He hadn't said a word. Not in weeks. Not since the day he'd seen Chief Webber carrying around a bunch of death certificates. Had he really been bottling this up the whole time? A lump formed like a tumor in her throat, and she swallowed. He wasn't crying. She wouldn't cry either. She could give him that much. For the longest march of moments, though, she had no idea what to say.

“They're not dead because of you,” was the best she could come up with.

“They're all dead because of me,” he said. “Gary Clark was looking for me.”

“And Lexie, and Chief Webber,” she said. She touched his face. No stubble rubbed against her palm. He'd shaved for this. He'd shaved, he'd coiffed his unruly hair, and he'd put on his best suit and a depressing black tie. All to torture himself by attending. “It's not your fault, Derek. None of this is. Have you been punishing yourself this whole time?”

He didn't speak. A deep, grieving noise caught in his throat. He stared at the empty bookcase behind the desk where he'd kept all his medical journals and his old textbooks. His breaths shuddered in his chest. He took a deep, long breath and another and another. He blinked again. His eyes didn't spill over. He wiped his face with his hands. He swallowed. He rocked on the balls of his feet.

He didn't cry, but his carefully measured control made him look like an overly twisted paperclip about to snap with the next forced move. His body, from the tripwire tenseness of his muscles, to the crushed expression on his face telegraphed his thoughts for him no matter his Herculean efforts not to fall apart.

“It's my fault,” he said.

She embraced him. He still didn't speak as she rubbed his back. “You've got to let this go, Derek. We talked about this. You're breathing, and you're not to blame for those who aren't. You're not. Gary Clark is to blame. He shot the gun. Not you.”

“I still need to go to this, Meredith. I'm fine.”

“Don't lie to me,” she said. “You haven't been fine in eight weeks.”
“I'm not fine,” he said. “I meant I can do this. I need to do this. I need to.” He pushed toward the door, and she tightened her grip. His arm stretched. He stopped.

“We've been making progress this week,” she said. “You're going to see Paul Wandell's wife make a tearful speech, and it'll undo everything. You're going to lose it, and if you keep letting yourself lose it, that'll just make it harder to find yourself again.”

He bristled. “Just like stopping makes it harder to go again?”

“Stop throwing that back at me,” she said. “I made a mistake, and I'm sorry.” She pressed against him, and even though they were fighting, he held her. He was bristled and prickly, but he didn't let go. She sniffed as her stinging eyes overflowed, and she couldn't stop them anymore.

“I don't have anything left to lose,” he said.

She scrunched her fingers underneath his sport coat. Sleek, firm muscle slipped under her fingertips through his shirt. He rocked with the pressure she applied. “You keep saying that, but it's not true,” she said.

“Of myself, it is.”

“I'm here, Derek.”

“I know that,” he said. “I just meant...” He swallowed, and she watched him as he begged his brain for an explanation that would make sense to her. She wanted to hear it. Desperately. She hadn't understood the last time he'd said it either. Or the time before that. Instead, he fell into his old pattern. His expression collapsed. “Please,” he said, and the word slayed her just as he knew it would.

She hated him for that.

“This is your choice,” she said. “I'm not your keeper. You have choices, Derek, and you need to make them.”

“You didn't have a problem making me go to my appointment last week.”

“You never said no,” she said. “You just gave me flimsy excuses.”

His gaze darkened. “You pushed me, Meredith. And now you're pulling.”

“I'm not an expert at this,” she said. “Dr. Wyatt said—”

“I don't want to talk about Dr. Wyatt,” he snapped.

Silence crashed into the room like a wave, and she pulled away from him. His lower lip quivered. He launched from the door and paced like some sort of agitated cat, except his office was the size of a shoebox, and he didn't have more than a few feet to maneuver. The cramped space only seemed to incense him more. But he hadn't run away. Hadn't run out the door. He'd been between her and freedom. If he'd really wanted to, he could have bolted. Why had he stayed to carve a trough into his threadbare carpet?

“I'm sorry that I pushed too hard,” she said, forcing her voice into an even tone, despite the burbling, burning urge to yell and scream at him in frustration. “But I'm not sorry for pushing, Derek. You've been a different person.”
“I know,” he said.

“I'm trying to get to know you again. I am. But—”

“I know. I just...” He stopped pacing and looked at her. “I need to go to this thing. I need to, Mere. Please, just... I need...”

“I said it's your choice!” she said.

“I know, but I want you to...” He struggled for a word and ended up blowing out a breath in a huff. He gave up, and he looked away.

And then the reason for his lingering clicked. The world made sense to her. He wanted her to be okay with it, and he'd stayed instead of going off to the memorial half-cocked and crazy with the desire to prove himself. Which was both reassuring and daunting all at once. Reassuring that her opinion mattered to him. Daunting that her opinion mattered that much to him.

Her lip quivered, and she sniffled. Her mascara would run. She couldn't bring herself to care. She wiped her eyes. She went back to the couch and collapsed. She glanced at the clock on the wall. They still had time.

“Tell me about your nightmares,” she said.

“Why?”

“Because I think if you're not ready to tell me about that, just me and nobody else, after everything we've been through, then you're not ready to do this memorial thing, and nothing you say will change my mind.”

His lip twitched. “Bossy,” he said.

She folded her arms over her chest. “Stubborn.”

He collapsed onto the seat beside her and folded over his knees. He sat on her left. They'd flipped sides from before. He swallowed. “Would you just do this with me?”

“Yes,” she said without hesitation.

He stared. “But you said—”

“That you're a stupid, stupid idiot? Yes,” she said. “But I'll go with you. I love you even when I hate you, remember? Isn't that a given by now?”

He remained silent for a long time. When he looked at her, a tired smile caressed his face and made him seem less distraught. “You've changed, too,” he said.

“I know. For the better?”

“I think so.” He sighed. “I'm a lot worse.”

She touched his back and stroked him along his spine. “It'll get better,” she said.

“You really still believe that?”

“I do,” she said. “I've just developed slightly more realistic expectations about how soon.”
“I wish I could believe,” he said. The deluge he'd been holding back collected and spilled over his dark eyelashes. “It hurts to breathe.”

“How physically?” she said.

“No,” he said. “I just...” He shook his head. “I hate this. It's been two months, and I feel the same.”

“How do you feel?”

He swallowed and stared at his knees. He pushed the knuckles of his index fingers into the fleshy area below his eyes. He wicked the tears away, only to have them replaced. “I'm tired, Mere,” he said, his voice soft. “I can't ever sleep.”

“Please, tell me, Derek. One nightmare. It might feel good to get it out.”

He wiped his face. At first she thought he wouldn't give in, but then he spoke. “There are two,” he said, his voice muffled as he pressed his face into his splayed fingers.

“Two nightmares?”

“Yes. Over and over. Just two. Whenever I close my eyes. I have one and then the other.”

She kissed him. “Tell me.”

The couch moaned as he shifted. He turned into her with a sick look on his face. “The first one is just an echo, I guess.”

“Of when you were shot?”

He blinked, and he flinched like he'd been shot in that moment instead of weeks ago. “Yes. I'm...”

“It's okay.”

A noise quivered in his throat, and he stared at her, but the blankness she found in his eyes told her he didn't see her. His breaths quickened, and his eyes turned glassy and bright with terror. “I don't want to die,” he said as though he thought he were. Dying. His twisted, helpless tone ran her through with a sword of disquiet.

She remembered finding him on the white floor in a lake of red blood, staring at nothing. She remembered his clammy, shivery skin. The way he'd panted, suffocating before her eyes. She remembered hitting him. Over, and over. She remembered his scream as they'd tried to pick him up off the floor. She'd never heard him scream like that. Unadulterated agony.

Derek, in the time she'd known him, had proven to be a stoic individual in the face of pain. When he was upset, he got quiet, and the most she'd ever seen from him was a sniffle and wet eyes that he kept in check with an iron fist. Hearing him cry out as though she'd been branding him with a smoking iron had broken her last resolve into shattered pieces. Cristina had barely snapped her out of hysterics. And since then, since he'd recovered physically, Meredith had seen him break into tears so often he could fill a freaking lake.

She swallowed, and she forced her breaths to remain even. She hated hearing this. She hated hearing him speak like this. Hated seeing him prostrate himself like a victim for his ghosts when he was supposed to be the confident, snarky, arrogant man she'd fallen in love with. In a brief moment of fear, a tiny voice asked, “What have you gotten yourself into, asking him to talk about this?”
She wanted to run. For an instant that was so overwhelming, she flinched. And that made her feel like crap because she knew he'd seen it, too. Felt it. The flinch.

_Are you familiar with a condition known as compassion fatigue?_ Dr. Wyatt had asked.

“T’m sorry,” he said, but Meredith grabbed his arm before he could pull away.

“No,” she said, her voice firm. “Keep going.” Both of them needed to hear it. She made a show of staying put. This wasn't compassion fatigue. This was cowardice. She refused to break in front of him, now. Not after she'd finally forced the clog out of his verbal drain.

“He shot me.”

“I know.” He stopped, and she said, “Keep going,” again.

“I remember staring at the gun,” he said as he stared into space. “It was bl... black. He told me it was m... my fault. That I wasn't god. That I wasn't a man. That people needed to be protected from me.”

She wrapped her arms around his body and pulled him against her. His weight sank into hers. She blinked against tears as he filled her silent memory of watching him standing in Gary Clark's line of fire with a soundtrack. She hadn't realized Mr. Clark had demeaned Derek that way.

“It wasn't your fault,” Meredith reiterated. She pulled her fingers through his hair. Slick remnants of gel came away with her fingertips. She didn't care.

The world flashed white, and she stared at Derek across a wide abyss. He stood with his palms outward facing. Stop, said his gesture. Gary Clark held a gun at the end of an outstretched arm. Cristina's hands clutched her as panic drilled into her body. She heard the mumble even across hundreds of feet. Which meant he was yelling. Yelling awful things. At Derek. Who couldn't defend himself against a gun with no forewarning. Who could?

And then the image faded.

A deep, shivery breath filled his lungs. “I don't remember what I said. I don't remember... I hear him every night verbatim, but I don't remember what I said. My legs felt like jelly, and I thought I would tr... trip.”

“It doesn't matter what you said,” she said. “You stood up to him. You were brave. You got him to lower his gun. I watched, Derek. I saw that.”

April had gotten him shot. Meredith had seen that, too. Anger twisted in her gut.

“I don't remember getting shot. I hit the floor, and I couldn't breathe,” he said. “It hurt,” he said. His voice cracked. He touched his side. “It hurt here.” She gripped his hand and squeezed his palm hard enough that she felt the bones mash together. His bullet wound had healed, mostly, but the rough scar was easy to feel through his shirt. “Dr. Kepner was talking. I don't understand what she said. It's like... Gib... gibberish. In my head. I couldn't... She left me.”

Meredith bit her lip at his tone. She held him tight. “Are you mad at her? For leaving you?”

“I shouldn't be,” he said, his voice dark with loathing. “He was going to shoot her, too.”

“I'm mad at her, too,” she confessed. “It's okay.”
“I'm mad at another human being for saving her own life,” he said. “How is that in any way okay?”

“I didn't say it was rational,” she said. “I said it was okay. It's okay, Derek. Self-preservation is the most basic instinct we have, and she left you to die.”

“I'm a doctor,” he said.

“So, what? Doctors are people.”

He pressed his face into her shoulder. “It makes me feel sick,” he said, his voice muffled by her silk blouse.

“That she left you? Or that you feel angry about it?” She stroked his back. He didn't answer. He breathed against her neck.

“I b-begged him,” he said.

A chill ran down her spine. “What?”

“He aimed again, and I begged him. I told him n-no.”

“After he'd already shot you?”

Again, he didn't speak. He trembled like he was in shock, and he didn't say a word.

“It's okay,” she said. “It's okay, Derek. You're okay.” He clutched her shirt, and his body tightened like a screw. He didn't make a single noise, and she felt like she held a terrified rabbit in her arms, one that would die because its heart had exploded with terror. “It's okay,” she repeated, frantic. The wild sense that she'd gotten in over her head, that she was messing with things she didn't understand well enough to be messing with, wrapped around her neck like a noose and made it hard to breathe. She'd wanted to help him avoid a panic attack. Not shove him into one like a pickup truck. What had she done?

She pulled up his shirt and slipped her bare palms against his abdomen. He wasn't breathing. He'd frozen. She pushed her hand along the plane of his stomach, touched his ribs, and rested over the rough remnants of the bullet wound. “You're alive, and you're here, and I'm here, and he's dead. Do you feel my hand? I'm here, and you're here. He's not.”

At once, he snapped into motion and he sucked in a breath as though he'd been submerged. Drowning. “It's okay, Derek. You're okay.” He pulled at the collar of his shirt. At his tie. An unadulterated sound of distress pealed from his throat, and he made a choking noise. “Breathe. Derek, just breathe.”

“I don't know why he left,” he blurted.

She squeezed her arms around him as tight as she could. “But he did. And I found you. And you're okay. You're not going to die. Breathe. You can breathe.”

He did.

She repeated herself. Over and over. You're okay. You're not going to die. And he listened. He rested in her arms, silent. The swell of fear that had overwhelmed him ebbed. His shaking subsided. She didn't let go of him until he grunted.
When she released him from her arms, he turned away from her to re-collect himself. The couch squeaked with his weight. He wiped his face with his hands. The color had drained from his face. His expression seemed sallow. Exhausted. Wrung out.

And he'd only told her about one of his nightmares. He said he had two. She couldn't imagine what would be worse than what he'd just described. Living his experience over and over in high definition.

“Derek, I think you should see Dr. Wyatt,” she said.

The silence stretched into a small eternity, until she felt like the moments had turned to taffy, and instead of stepping forward, they simply stretched into infinitesimal lines of goo that never ended. The battery clock on the wall ticked to spite her observation. The tap-tap-tap of the second hand seemed thunderous in the small space. He didn't turn to face her.

“I told you what you wanted to know,” he said, his voice flat.

“Half of it. I had no idea you were holding onto all of this. I think Dr. Wyatt could really help you.” She swallowed. “Derek, I want to be enough, I do, and I'm not going anywhere, but I'm not enough. Not for this. I didn't know.”

“I don't want to see a psychiatrist,” he said. “I—” His watch beeped, and he glanced at the time. “Will you, please, just go with me? I need to do this. Please.”

She bit her lip.

“I did what you asked,” he said. He wiped his face. He tucked in his shirt. He fixed his tie.

“Promise me you'll leave if...” she said. “Promise you won't push too hard.”

He swallowed. “I promise, Meredith. Do you think I like having panic attacks?”

“No,” she said. “But you're a stubborn idiot.”

A wry, hollow grin spread across his face. “I'm glad you think so highly of me,” he said, though his tone held no bite. No snap and snarl.

She shrugged. “You're my stubborn idiot.”

“Hmm,” he said, though he didn't offer any more comments. He leaned into her and kissed her, and then he stood. She followed.

“Do I look like a haggard, horrid, scary monster?” she said. She brushed her blouse and swept back her hair. She should have worn it up today. Damn it.

A small smile crossed his face. “No more than me,” he said.

“Great,” she said as she stared at his thrashed expression. No amount of makeup magic would hide the fact that he'd been weeping. And in the process of soothing him, she'd wrecked his hair. It didn't look styled anymore. Just wet and shaggy, and a loose lock fell over his forehead. “We're sitting in the back, right?”

He nodded. “We can sit in the back.”

She took his hand. He squeezed her fingers. “Thank you,” he said as they shuffled out of his old office.
She followed him to the elevator side-by-side with him. Her heels clonked in time with his dress shoes on the hard tiled floor and echoed, echoed, echoed. The hallways seemed blessedly empty, and no one stopped to ask why either he or she looked like they'd just been resurrected as zombies. Posters for the memorial hung almost every twenty feet in the hollow halls. The posters weren't illustrated or anything. Times New Roman font announced the time and location and date, and that was all. They were both tasteful and minimalistic.

The elevator hummed as they stood inside. For a moment, her weight lifted as the elevator traveled down the shaft. More memorial posters hung on the walls, all simple white with black text. He leaned into the back corner, staring at the floor, and she stood next to him. His shoulder brushed one of the posters, and the paper bent. He shifted away. She closed her eyes and imagined him standing in front of all his patient scans, a thrilling smile on his face.

_I'm not gonna get down on one knee, he'd said. I'm not gonna ask a question._

Confident. Undaunted by the fact that she'd turned him down already. Twice.

Her heart throbbed as the moment rewound in her head. _If there's a crisis, you don't freeze. You move forward. You get the rest of us to move forward. Because you've seen worse. You've survived worse. And you know we'll survive, too. You say you're all dark and twisty. It's not a flaw. It's a strength._

She blinked at the memory. Her tired, tense muscles ached. He'd intended to be reflective and ended up prophetic. Except for the part about having seen worse. She hadn't. She'd never expected to have to live through a massacre. She'd never expected to press the heel of her palm into Derek Shepherd's chest to plug a gushing bullet wound. She'd never expected to see the muzzle of a loaded gun jammed into Cristina's temple while Cristina operated on Derek to save his life. She'd never expected to see blood between her thighs.

Meredith pressed against him, and he wrapped his arms around her. “It's okay,” he said.

“You proposed in here,” she whispered.

“I did,” he said.

“You still owe me elevator sex.”

A small smile stretched his lips. “Rain check?”

She nodded. “Rain check.”

Gravity welled up at her feet as the elevator came to a stop and dinged. They stepped out onto the first floor, the bright, open area underneath where Derek had been shot. He didn't look up at the catwalk. People bustled through the space, funneling into tight, directed clumps as they followed the arrows on the signs. The masses of them headed toward the big auditorium. The shuffling steps of dozens thundered in the open space. Derek stared at the crowds. His expression didn't flicker. Soft voices swirled around them. The somber mood had turned what could have been chaos into whispers and calm procession.

“Stop,” she said, and Derek stopped.

He peered ahead, his expression cloudy. Distant. “What?” he said, but he didn't look at her. He looked at the marching procession of life that he would have to join. His breaths tightened.

“Your tie is messy.” She pushed into him with spindly fingers and grabbed at the fabric. She watched his Adam's apple roll down his throat.

“I fixed it before,” he said.

“You really didn't,” she said.

His cologne wafted against her as she breathed. His gaze shifted, and he watched her as she straightened his tie. She patted his chest as she finished. “Thank you,” he said, though he sounded hollow. He took one step. Two. And then he stopped and pointed to the men's room sign at the side of the hallway. “I need...”

She nodded. “Fine,” she said, and he disappeared through the blue swing door labeled with a male stick figure.

This was it, she decided. He would make it another hallway. Maybe two. But he wouldn't make it to the auditorium. She paced outside the restroom door. She watched the people. Everywhere. People. Dr. Bailey walked past in the distance wearing a conservative black dress.

“Meredith,” said a calm, rich voice she recognized.

Her breaths halted. Her steps froze. She turned on her heel. “Chief,” she said.

Chief Webber stood beside her wearing a crisp black suit that looked much like Derek's, though he didn't wear it as well. He didn't look sleek. Or comfortable. “How are you?” he said.

“Fine,” Meredith said. “Derek's in the bathroom.”

Chief Webber nodded. He looked at the men's room door. He cleared his throat. He shifted on the balls of his feet. “Look,” he said. “I'm sorry about—”

“It's fine,” Meredith said. “It's really fine. I'll be okay. There are things going on in my life right now that are more important.”

The Chief regarded her for a long moment. His gaze softened. “I want you to know that I'm proud of you,” he said.

“Thank you,” she said. She didn't know what else to say or do. She clenched her teeth to vent uncomfortable energy. Her purse strap dug into her shoulder.

Chief Webber nodded, and then he joined the pulse of the crowd. She watched the white fuzz on his head until he disappeared into the crush, and then she glanced at the nearby wall clock. Derek didn't re-emerge from the bathroom for almost fifteen minutes, and when he did, he didn't stop for her. He walked. Like an automaton.

“Derek?” she said.

“Hmm?” he said, his voice flat.

“Are you okay?” she whispered, trying to keep her voice under the thrum of the whispers. He wouldn't want to make a scene.

“M'okay,” he said. He stumbled into her like the floor had reached up and grabbed his ankles. Her body popped loose from its stride at the impact, and her lips parted in surprise as she bumped into an older woman walking beside her.

“Sorry,” she said to the woman, who didn't seem to pay her any mind and kept walking.
He looked at her, his eyes lifeless. The blush of embarrassment she expected to sprawl across his face never arrived. He remained pale, and a bit detached. Like he didn't even realize he'd made a misstep.

“Derek,” Meredith said. He only stared, and worry set in. She grabbed his arm, and she pulled him to the side against the wall, out of traffic. He followed her, pliant and unresisting, which scared her even more. “Did you take something in the bathroom? How much?”

He wouldn't look at her. “It hurt,” he said in a soft voice.

A niggling, doubting voice whined in the back of her head. Wrong. This was starting to seem wrong.

“Then you need to talk to Cristina or Dr. Altman or something,” she said, keeping her voice low. Her whispers made her voice a hiss. Some of the passing crowd glanced their way, but she doubted, in the chaos of moving bodies, that anybody could hear anything specific. “You shouldn't be off OxyContin yet.”

“Meredith—”

“Seriously,” she said. “I don't care if you're okay with it. If you're in that much pain, you need to talk to them. And get checked again while you're at it. Maybe they missed something.”

He took breath. He didn't look happy. “I will.”

She swallowed, and she couldn't help the slivers of doubt cracking her resolve. Was he letting himself suffer because he felt like it was appropriate punishment? For living when others hadn't? He'd been keeping all that guilt mashed inside of him for weeks. He hadn't talked about it. Had it festered like a wound?

“You promise?” she said.

He bristled. “I promise, Meredith.”

“Oh kay,” she said, and she let it go, or at least tried to. For now.

She grabbed his hand as they filed into the crowd, getting bumped and jostled. Derek's palm didn't shake. His hand didn't feel cold or clammy. He didn't flinch as people ran into him. He didn't appear jittery or ready to bolt. His uncoordinated steps carried him down the hall with her. She watched him until her eyes burned from lack of blinking, but he seemed... Not fine. Who would be fine going to a memorial like this? But not bad, either. Not falling apart.

Not afraid.

But the essence of his gaze that made him Derek had disappeared. He stared, his face a blank, like he wasn't processing what he was looking at. Like he'd popped his consciousness loose and left it back in the bathroom. Which was...

She didn't have time to consider what that was as they were sucked into the general flow of the crowd, short people, tall people, old ones, young ones, and every variety between. The surge pulled them into the big auditorium. She held his hand to keep from getting separated in the crush. They managed to peel apart from the crowd several feet inside the auditorium. They moved into the sixth row from the back. He sat one chair into the row, where it would be easy for him to escape without causing a huge disruption. She sat in the aisle seat to save him from enduring the people bumping past to find seats further inside.
The shock of being part of the moving, breathing crowd that tried to find empty seats, and then falling out of it into chairs, was a bit like being born, she imagined. She panted with the stress of it all. The large stage in the auditorium had been set alight with candles and deep-hued flower arrangements. Maroons and blackish purples and darker, subdued colors. Pictures of the dead lined the lip of the stage, seventeen in all. All smiling, which seemed incongruous with the occasion. Soft symphonic music played from the speakers overhead.

She scanned the crowd for a moment. She spotted Lexie and Alex sitting together in the reserved seats by the stage. Mark sat by Callie. She didn't see anybody else she recognized. She had no idea where Cristina was, or Owen, for that matter. She tore her eyes from the writhing crowd and stared at Derek, who stared at the stage without expression. And then her stomach tightened with a sick explosion of nerves. “Dr. Wyatt?” she blurted as she saw who sat next to Derek on his right side, and Derek flinched, snapped loose from his air of detachment.

Isn't she a therapist at Seattle- Oh, he'd said.

He wouldn't have known who she was. Dr. Wyatt didn't work surgical cases. She wasn't his employee. He didn't deal with therapists, only psychiatrists approved for psych consults. He knew of her name as somebody who worked at Seattle Grace. Maybe, he would have recognized her face as familiar. But he hadn't had the name attached to a face.

His knuckles tightened against the arm rests of his seat. Though Meredith didn't see his body move, his seat moaned as though his weight had shifted. She touched his hand. His fingers didn't give. He didn't take her hand. She prepared for fireworks.

Dr. Wyatt looked up from her program and smiled. She wore a black suit, and shiny white pearls encircled her neck. “Meredith. Dr. Shepherd,” she said. “Hello. I thought you'd be up front in the reserved seats.”

Derek didn't speak, and Meredith needed to fill the silence. “We wanted to sit in the back,” Meredith said.

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “Understandable.”

“Derek,” said Meredith. Shivery nerves made it hard to think. To speak. “This is Dr. Wyatt,” she said. She didn't know if a proper introduction was appropriate here. But she didn't know what else to do. “Dr. Wyatt, Derek.”

Dr. Wyatt outstretched her hand, fingers splayed. Derek blinked. He cleared his throat. He raised his palm, and he shook Dr. Wyatt's offered hand. “Hello,” he said, his voice whisper-y. A baby shrieked somewhere in the auditorium, and a visible flinch tore through him. His hand slipped from Dr. Wyatt's back into his lap.

He closed his eyes, and he took a deep breath. For all that Meredith had no idea what to say, she read Derek's expression like a Dick and Jane primer, and he felt worse than she did. See Derek. See Derek panic. Panic, Derek.

If Dr. Wyatt knew Derek wasn't doing well, she didn't indicate it. Her lips curved with a cordial smile that reached her eyes. “It's nice to meet you,” Dr. Wyatt said, her voice calm and reassuring, and she didn't add the word 'finally', which made Meredith appreciative of the woman's tact. The word 'finally' would have emphasized how much Dr. Wyatt had already heard about him, like his nighttime erections, the fact that he'd wet himself, all his hopes and fears and everything, which he knew she knew about, but he wouldn't want to know. “I read the article about the Shepherd Method,” Dr. Wyatt continued. “Fascinating.”
Derek looked at her. “You follow neurosurgery?”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “I try to be familiar with it, at least.”

He didn't respond, and Dr. Wyatt watched him. Unblinking. During sessions, Dr. Wyatt made a disturbing analytical face that Meredith knew meant a snap judgment and conclusion would follow. The conclusion would typically be right, and it would suck to hear. With Derek, she imagined Dr. Wyatt would say something about an injured god complex. His inability to accept inabilities. But Dr. Wyatt remained neutral, and if she was doing any analyzing at all, she hid it well. The cordial smile stuck on her face like the curl of her lips had been shaped with crazy glue.

Derek swallowed. Movement on the stage caught his attention. A custodian wearing a black jump suit tested the microphone, which shrieked with echo-y reverberations before the electronics settled or whatever. Derek blinked at the noise. He didn't flinch, this time, though his even breaths became a forced kind of even, instead of relaxed. For a long stretch of moments, Meredith thought he might ignore Dr. Wyatt for the rest of the memorial, which would be impolite and all sorts of wrong. But if that's what he needed to do to make it through this thing, that's what he needed to do, and she would support it.

“Thank you for helping Meredith,” he said out of nowhere.

Meredith's lips parted. “Derek...”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “It's my pleasure,” she said. She settled into her seat to read more from her program, as if she sensed he needed emotional space to compensate for the lack of physical space between them.

Then the lights dimmed, and nobody had a chance to say anything else. Loud words became a mumble became silence as the crowd hushed. Meredith leaned against Derek, and she cradled his left hand in her lap. He stared ahead at the spectacle of grief. Blank. She rested her head in the crook of his throat and listened to him breathe, soft, even, alive.

Chief Webber approached the podium in the middle of the stage, which was draped with dark ribbons and flowers. The microphone squealed as he settled in front of the podium, a sheath of papers clutched in his hand. Notes for his speeches. He'd been nominated as the master of the ceremony, given his role in Gary Clark's final moments, and given Derek's leave of absence. From what she could remember of the invitation in the mail, Chief Webber's name littered the program.

He cleared his throat. “Good morning,” he said to the masses, his voice rich and deep and low. “Two months ago, Seattle Grace was put on the map, not for something great, not for a medical miracle, or a scientific breakthrough, but as one of Seattle's greatest tragedies. One of the nation's. We've joined the ranks of places such as Columbine High School. Virginia Tech. Fort Hood. The San Ysidro McDonald's. Seventeen of our fellow colleagues died that day, and seven more were injured. One remains in critical care today.”

The podium squeaked as the Chief shifted. “I wasn't in the hospital when the first shot rang out. My heart goes out to those who were. To the brave people who stayed to help protect those less able.” No one in the crowd moved. No one spoke. A cough filled the silence. A baby cooed.

Chief Webber continued, “We've had two months to heal, and we're all still reeling. Every one of us. I'm sure there's not a single person in this room who's not asking why.” He looked out at the crowd. “Why? Why did this happen to us?”

Everybody in the audience was silent.
“Well, I'm an old man,” Webber said. “I've been working in medicine for a long time. A long time. And I've learned that, rarely, do we ever have the luxury of knowing why. Bad things happen to good people every day. And that day, a bad thing happened to us.” He swallowed. “We're here today to remember those colleagues who aren't with us anymore. To honor their memories. To celebrate the heroes who were born from the tragedy. To share in our grief. And, hopefully, to close some lingering wounds.”

Footsteps echoed on the stage as a middle-aged man with a mustache walked across the stage. He carried a trumpet that shined in the dim light. Meredith let her gaze fall across Derek's lap to the white program resting in Dr. Wyatt's hands. “Trumpet – Archibald Percy,” said the top line where Dr. Wyatt rested her finger. Meredith squeezed Derek's thigh, and she kissed his throat.

Do. Not. Die. Do you understand?

“Please, rise for the national anthem,” said Chief Webber, and the crowd thundered as it stood. Meredith straightened, relinquishing her hold of Derek's palm, and released him from her weight, as insubstantial as it was. Derek stood. She stood. They all stood.

Dr. Percy's... father?brother?uncle? held the trumpet to his lips. The trumpet lowed the first verse of the anthem. The crowd sang, subdued, but thunderous in its volume. An overwhelming sense of solidarity filled the room and wrapped around her.

Meredith found herself watching Derek instead of the stage. Derek's mouth moved with the words, but she couldn't hear his distinct, tenor voice under the crush of all the rest. Dr. Wyatt's voice fell against Meredith's ears clear as a bell, identifiable and pure. She decided Derek wasn't singing. Not really. She couldn't recall ever having heard him sing. She wondered if he could carry a tune, or if he was tone deaf like she was. He'd written a song for Addison, though that didn't necessarily mean he'd sung it. He didn't dance without extreme provocation. Meredith knew he played the guitar, though. The saxophone. He knew music. Or, he used to.

When silence filled the air, and Derek's lips stopped moving, she swallowed. “Please, be seated,” said Chief Webber, but his voice hovered in her awareness like a fly or a mosquito, a barely there buzz that she wished would stop.

When Derek sat, she mirrored him. She found her position from before, wedged against him, holding his hand and breathing in the reassuring scent of his cologne. Somebody read a poem. People made speeches. She thought her resolve to see Derek get through this and her own mental fortitude might carry her, but the memories knocked and knocked again. Her door eventually opened.

“What do we do?” April said. “He can't climb up on that thing; he can't even walk.”

“Well, lower it,” snapped Cristina.

“I am lowering it! This is as low as it goes!”

“I've seen Bailey get it lower.”

“Shut up!” Meredith said. “Please, everybody just shut up for a minute.”

Derek sat in the wheelchair, his spine bowed. He favored his left side with a protective lean. He'd folded his arm, and his bloody hand curled against the left side of his torso to cover the wound. Through parted, bloodless lips, he panted. She'd tried to keep pressure on the bullet wound while they moved him, but it'd started to bleed again despite her efforts. Bright red oozed down his side into the chair, and his shirt had soaked past the waistline of his pants.

“Derek,” Meredith said. At first, he didn't respond, didn't look at her. She hit him across the face, and he blinked. The slap echoed in the bad acoustics of the operating room. Some sentience flared in his gaze. “Derek, please. Can you stand again? Please? Please, Derek? Stand?”

He looked at her, his eyes glassy and unfocused, but he moved. He achieved upright, barely, and then he wilted against her, no power in his legs. No power anywhere. She held him up with willpower alone, otherwise he would have dropped to the floor like a sack of rocks. Cristina and April converged. The low, deep sound of suffering in his throat made her stomach churn.

“Okay,” Meredith said. She pressed her palm flat against the back of his head. “Okay, it's okay. It's okay.” His body trembled, though whether from shock or cold or something else, she didn't know. They shifted him toward the operating table, pushed him against it so his hip lined up with the flat surface.

He pressed his face against her shoulder. “Pleassse,” he said, the end of the word a hiss of escaping air. He spoke as though his tongue were too thick for his mouth. “Merrr go 'way. He'll shhoot...”

“Lift on three, two, one,” Cristina said. Meredith closed her eyes as he screamed for the second time that day.

She tried to shove the echoes of his pain away.

She wanted Derek to get through this. That was all. She could focus on that. He seemed all right. For a long time. He watched, expressionless. She squeezed his hand, which broke him loose from his detachment. He blinked. He looked at her hand. His gaze followed her arm, and his dark eyes met hers. He stared. He squeezed her hand in return.

She squeezed his hand to reassure him. He stared at nothing in particular and offered no resistance while they peeled away his shirt and socks and pants and threw them into a dirty pile on the floor, out of what would be the sterile field. Blood slicked his left side. Her heart twisted when she saw the state of his underwear. His boxer briefs had been white, but rusty-colored red had soaked them through. More blood out of his body that should have been inside. How much blood had he lost? How much...

“Are you okay?” Derek mouthed at her.

Tears spilled from her eyes. She wiped them away as she nodded. She clutched his coat. “Are you?” she mouthed back.

He didn't answer, which worried her. Just a little. A bagpipe processional wandered down the aisles, loud and full of mourning. In an enclosed auditorium, the volume of a bagpipe overwhelmed all else, like Goliath, unstoppable. An army of bagpipes? Head-splitting. Brain-mushifying. Deafening. They drowned the sounds of shifting and movement in the audience.

He moaned and tried to twist away as Cristina jammed the heel of her gloved palm into the bullet wound. Meredith threw herself across his naked hips to hold him down. The hollow thumps of his body striking the narrow metal operating table pushed her stomach into the floor. She tried to breathe against the urge to vomit.

“It's okay,” she said. “Derek, it's okay. Hang on. We're almost done.”

He gave up his struggle, but she was afraid to let go. His skin felt clammy to the touch. Like a cold, wet dishrag. He shivered, and she took his hand. “April, get him a blanket,” Meredith said. Her eyes watered. “Please.”

The blood oozing out of him stopped after minutes, and Cristina pulled her hand away.

“I love you,” Meredith said, though bagpipes trampled the sound of her voice.

“I love you, too,” Derek replied.

The men in full highland regalia, kilts included, formed a line on the stage. She didn't really know why Seattle Grace had elected to utilize bagpipers. She'd seen them at military funerals before. She didn't really have experience with civilian ceremonies. It worked, though. The Scots freaking knew grief. Derek watched. Silent.

I'm not gonna die. I promise.

Somewhere along the line, the scales tipped. Doubt became hope and then confidence. She believed Derek would make it through the memorial. He'd made it through the crowds and the opening remarks. He'd made it through depressing poems. He'd watched Mrs. Wandell talk about her husband and break into tears at the microphone. He'd watched bagpipers and crying babies, and he'd sat next to Dr. Wyatt the whole time. He'd made it through it all, somehow.

The final speaker before the closing remarks approached the podium. He moved with a pronounced limp, not as though he couldn't put weight on his leg because of an injury, but as though the nerves to the limb had been cut. His foot followed him like a deadweight, and he leaned on a cane. He was a tall man with broad shoulders and curly blond hair. He wore a security guard uniform. The buttons had been shined, and all the metal gleamed in the light.

The microphone amplified the wet sound as the man swallowed. “My name is Ben Forks. I was a security guard in admissions on the day of the shooting,” he said. “Mr. Clark shot me in the hip and again in the back. I have permanent partial paralysis.”

Derek stiffened, and Meredith swallowed.

“When I was shot, I couldn't move from the waist down. I couldn't run.”

For the first time since the memorial ceremony had started, Derek looked away from the stage. He stared at his lap. His breaths shortened. He paled. Meredith squeezed his hand. His lips parted. She leaned close in an attempt to hear what he muttered.

“Stop it,” he said, a hoarse whisper. “Stop.”

Meredith frowned. “Derek,” she whispered. She gave him a shake, but it didn't appear to impact his state of mind.

Dr. Wyatt turned, frowning. “What's wrong?” she mouthed.

Meredith's eyes widened. She could only shrug. She put her hands on Derek's shoulders. “Derek,” she tried again.

“Stop it,” he pleaded.

The people sitting one row up turned at the commotion.

“Noah Cunningham died saving my life. He stood in front of me for the third shot. I will never forget his sacrifice, and I'm grateful for every extra day I've been given,” said Ben. He looked down at the podium.

Derek snapped into motion. Meredith didn't try to get out of the way as he crawled over her. She knew she'd just trip him if she moved. His knee jabbed her. He clawed at the arm of her seat closest to the aisle. And then he was gone. Bolted. The door moaned to announce his swift departure. People turned to see what had happened. There was nothing to see.

Derek had fled.

She gathered her purse, scooted out of her chair, and went after him. He'd moved fast. She didn't see him in the hall. A lump formed in her throat as worry crashed into her brain. Her mind raced. She had no idea where to look first. Would he have gone back to the car? Or maybe his office. Which one? The old one, or the Chief's office? Or...

On a whim, she shoved through the men's room door where he'd twice retreated earlier. She figured she had as good a chance there as anywhere else. “Is anybody in here?” she called as she stood in the entryway between the swing door and the privacy barrier. The faucets dripped. She heard frantic breathing, but no one answered. “I'm coming in.”

Her heels clicked on the floor tiles, which were each framed with dark, stained grout. She passed the sinks. A short line of urinals. The air smelled damp. A rumpled roll of toilet paper spiraled out from one of the stalls closest to the exit. She bent down and stared under the doors of all the stalls. She winced when she didn't see a pair of feet, but an entire body folded on itself. Derek. On the floor. Back in the corner of the large stall for those with disabilities. The door hadn't been shut.

She approached, and she pushed the door out of the way. The hinges whined. Her fingers slipped along the cool metal of the door as she passed. He didn't look at her, but his eyes traced the movement of her feet. He peered over his knees at her shoes.

She tried not to grimace as she sat on the icky floor with him. This was more important than germs. “What happened?” she said. She touched his arm. “You were doing really great.”

A wry laugh broke loose from his lips. “That was great?”

“That was great, Derek. You sat through a lot of it. Way more than I thought you would.”

“I did.”

“You did,” she agreed, keeping her voice low and soothing. “Did you remember... things?”

He blinked. His glassy eyes widened. His hand wandered blindly at his collar as he swallowed. His voice dropped in pitch. “My head is pounding,” he said. He pressed his forehead against his knees, and a weird sound filled his throat.

“It's okay,” she said. She rubbed his back. “Breathe.”

“No.”

“Shh. It's okay. You're okay. You're alive, Derek. You're alive, and he's not. Okay?”

Derek nodded. Barely. “Okay.”

“You did really well,” she reiterated as she stroked him. “You're safe.”
“I swear I didn't try to push.”

Her lip quivered. That's what he was worried about? That she'd yell? He'd been fine. She'd watched him. He'd been panicky all of sixty seconds before he bolted. There hadn't been any warning. He'd been fine, and then, WHAM. Like a two-by-four to the face or a gushing epidural hematoma. Fine and then dead.

“I'm sorry.”

She ignored him. “Can you stand? This floor is disgusting.”

She held out her hand, and he took it. As he stood, she assessed him. He'd scuffed the knees of his pants. Dirt marred his black suit. His tie hung askew. He leaned against the wall for a second and closed his eyes as he gained elevation. She gave him a minute as he swallowed away disorientation. The Percocet made it hard for him to change elevations quickly. She wished he didn't need it anymore, and she worried that he did. But now wasn't the time.

She squeezed his hand. After a few minutes, he blinked. “Okay,” he said. And they walked out to the car.

Rain fell. The air smelled earthy and felt just a bit too cold to be called temperate. Gray reflections shimmered from puddles sprawled on the concrete. Drops of water plinked and split apart as they hit the hood of Derek's Cayenne. He pulled himself into the passenger seat with a wince. He didn't need help anymore. That was something.

She settled into the driver's seat. The car door slammed beside her. Rain pattered on the roof overhead. She didn't start the car. He rested against the window, breathing. She threw her purse into the back seat and sighed.

“I really think you should see Dr. Wyatt,” she said.

He rubbed the bridge of his nose. “Can we not talk about this right now?”

“When would be a good time?”

He blinked as he watched the rain. “I don't want to see a shrink,” he said.

She reached across the void and touched his leg. She rubbed his left quadriceps through his pants. “It's been eight weeks,” she said. “You're better. You're so much better. But you're not fine, Derek. You're far from fine. And I don't think I'm giving you the help you need, or…”

He looked at her. “Or what?”

“I'm sorry I suck.”

His expression melted. “Meredith,” he said, and his voice dropped low and soothing like an old habit. “I love you. You're what I need. And you don't suck.”

She resisted the urge to let him comfort her. He needed to hear this. “I'm trying really hard, but it's not enough.”

He fiddled with the vents, though they weren't blowing. “I don't know why you stay.”

She shrugged. “I love you. We both signed the Post-it. I'm not going anywhere.”
“You said it yourself, you don’t even know me anymore.” He watched water stream down the windows. His eyes glistened in the muted, gray daylight. “I don’t know me anymore.”

“And that's why I think you should at least think about the therapy thing. I think it would help with that,” she said.

He sighed. She followed his blank gaze to Seattle Grace's main entryway. The sign didn't say Seattle Grace anymore. It said Seattle Grace Mercy West. Bodies dressed in black streamed from the doorways. The memorial must have finished.

She watched a small boy in a tiny black suit swing from the left arm of his mother and the right arm of his father over a deep puddle in the gutter. He shrieked and giggled, like he didn't know he was supposed to be somber. The mother scolded him, but even through the rain, Meredith thought she saw fire in the woman's eyes. Something happy. Not disappointed. The man laughed a rough, rumble-y laugh that told Meredith if he sang, he would be a bass. He swung the little boy onto his shoulders with a playful roar. The boy giggled again. He looked like his father.

Meredith wanted that. She recognized the woman from the Pedes ward. A nurse. Her name was Gretchen. Or... Grace. Grrr something. She didn't know the man.

“Please, Derek?” Meredith said. “Think about it?”

“What'd they say?” Derek mumbled, his voice thick with slurs and sleep as she entered his hospital room. She froze. He lay under thermal blankets, pale and quiet in the dark, and she could just make out the glitter of light reflecting off his pupils. His heart monitor bleeped and cast a soft glow over his bed.

“You're awake,” she said. “You promised you'd sleep.”

“Mmm,” he said. “I did. S'been hours.” His eyes dipped shut, and he swallowed. He seemed...

She tiptoed to the side of his bed. Every time she entered the room, she couldn’t get over how frail he looked. How unwell. Better than before. Alive. But sick. Hurt. She leaned over the rail and kissed him. His lips touched hers, but he didn't really participate, not that she expected him to. His breaths buffered the air, soft and shallow and raspy. She touched his forehead as a lump formed in her throat. Her fingertips met warm, dry skin.

“You should be sleeping,” she said.

“Mmm,” he said. Blankets swished as he stirred. The intravenous line moved as his hand shifted to the bed rail. Toward her. “Tell me how 't went.”

“I'm fine,” she said. “Everything’s fine.” She pulled the stool to the railing and sat beside the bed in the dark. Her eyes pricked with tears.

His head tipped in her direction. He gazed at her through his eyelashes. The rest of his body didn't move. He economized everything. “Not fine,” he said.

She blinked, and tears streamed down her face, unbidden. She sniffed. “Shut up,” she said. “You know what I meant. They said I should expect some more cramping and spotting, but that at this early stage, a D&C wasn't necessary, so I said no.”

Silence stretched into infinity, and she listened to the steady plod of his heart monitor to reassure herself. She stared at the intravenous line dripping fluids into his body. At the nasal cannula supplying him with extra oxygen. At the pulse oximeter clipped to his finger. So many things still... telling her he was sick, even after three days. Had it only been three days? Not even, because it wasn't light out yet. She found his hand in the dark. She wrapped her fingers around his. His grip tightened against her knuckles to the point of causing her pain, but he still didn't speak.

“Derek?” she said, and suspicion tightened in her gut. “Derek,” she repeated. She leaned, and she touched his face with her free hand. “Derek, are you awake because you're in pain?”

A soft, suffering grunt tore his throat. “This should be about you,” he said.

“And that's very noble of you,” she said. “But let me find a nurse.”

A breath jerked in his chest, and he winced. “Meredith...”

“I swear, Derek. You're alive, so I'm okay. I meant what I said before.”

“M'okay,” he said. “Sit with me?”

“But the nurse—”

“Just sit,” he said.

He blinked and wouldn't look at her. The rain spattered on the windows. His cold expression had cracked, and she pressed onward with the vague hope that she’d made inroads. That he would give in if she kept talking. Kept reiterating. Kept pushing.

“I feel like a failure,” she said.

He jerked his gaze to her. “What could you possibly—”

“Because I'm trying,” she said. “I'm working my ass off trying to be what you need, but I'm clearly not enough. You're better, but you're not sleeping. You're supposed to be talking about things and working through them, but I can't get you to talk without practically threatening you at gunpoint, and I—”

He stared.

Tears welled in her eyes as she caught the sliver of pain in his expression. “I can't believe I just said that to you,” she said. “I'm sorry.”

“It's a figure of speech, Meredith. It shouldn't matter that you said it.”

“Which is exactly why you need a freaking therapist, Derek!” she snapped, and the floodgates fell open. She couldn't help it. She gushed, and she gushed, and she gushed. Everything came loose in a deluge of pent frustration. He made her so tired. He didn't mean to, but he did, and she needed to rest. “I'm prancing on eggshells around you all the time. You're supposed to make choices and not wallow. If I push, you act like I'm forcing you, but if I don't push, you don't choose. I have no idea what's too little and what's too much. I always feel lost with you. I'm trying to learn, but I—”

“He's sorry,” he tried to interject.

Which only infuriated her, and the gray world tinged red. “This isn't about apologies! Stop with your fucking guilt complex about everything! I'm so tired of you apologizing!” Her yelling echoed in her head. In the car cabin. Or maybe she imagined it. The sound of her own voice made her cringe. She felt like a harpy. But she couldn't... He needed to budge. An inch. An inch, and she'd be happy. Silence spread in her wake. She sniffed and wiped her eyes. “Is it me?” she said.
“Is what you?” he said.

“The reason you won't talk. Is it me? Am I doing something wrong? Am I being an insensitive freak too much? Is there something I can change?”

“You're not doing anything wrong,” he said.

“Then what's the problem?”

“There's no problem.”

“There's a problem, Derek,” she insisted. “You're not talking to me. You're not talking to Mark. Unless there's somebody else I don't know about, you're not talking. You should be talking.”

“I am talking,” he said.

“Well, it's not enough,” she said. “You need somebody you can tell everything to. Maybe Dr. Wyatt is that person. Or maybe it's somebody else. Some other therapist I've never met. I don't care who, but you need to see somebody.”

“I do tell you everything.”

“Do you Derek?” she said. “Do you really? What about nightmare number two? I didn't even have a clue until today that you still felt guilty about everything. I still don't know what set you off at the memorial. And you're trying to hide pain from me by not telling me when you take pills. In what universe can you call that telling me everything?”

He looked away. “I don't want to fight.”

“Then promise to think about the therapist!”

He swallowed, and his expression broke. His elbow thumped against the side of the door. He leaned against the window. “You're not a failure, Mere.”

“I feel like one.”

He looked at her, his shoulders slumped, his pallor like chalk. “I'm terrified,” he said. “Every moment of every day. You're the only reason I get out of bed in the morning. Stop calling yourself a failure.”

Her tongue felt thick in her mouth. She sniffled, and she wiped her face. “Derek...”

“It's pathetic,” he said. “I know I'm pathetic. But that's not your fault.”

Tears fell. Both his and hers. Heartbreak drove her into motion. She got out of the car. Water fell down on her like she stood under a shower head. She walked around to his side of the car. Her feet splashed in puddles. She wiped water from her face. Salt burned her skin. People in the parking lot looked at her. She didn't care. She yanked on his door, and she leaned inside, pressing into his space.

She wrapped her arms around him. He shuddered in her grasp. His mouth found her neck. His lips rested against her skin, but he didn't kiss her. He inhaled, and she felt his fingers clutching at her back. “I should be able to fix this,” he whispered.

She tightened her grip. God, damn him and his sense of... his need... to do things himself. He'd twisted this into an exercise to prove his own lack of worth. Rain fell into the gap between the door

“Going to a therapist isn't admitting failure,” she said. “I did it twice, now. You just said I wasn't a failure. So, which is it? Am I a failure, or aren't I?”

“I don't think you're a failure.”

“So, stop with the freaking double standards,” she told him. “You're not pathetic. But you're acting pathetic, Derek. You're rolling over and letting Gary Clark win. He's winning.”

She pulled her fingers through his hair. His pale expression reddened to a deep scarlet. He curled in her grasp. She pressed on, wondering when their relationship had become the Battle of Midway or whatever. She'd never had to fight so hard in her life before he'd been shot. Exhaustion made her head ache.

He needed help. He needed to admit it.

“If your fear was a tumor that Dr. Weller or Dr. Bailey or whoever could cut out, wouldn't you get help?”

He didn't answer.

“Well, it's the same damned thing, only metaphorical. Get your freaking tumor fixed.”

Rain spiraled down from the sky. Car doors slammed. Water sprayed from the tires of a passing vehicle. She wiped strings of wet hair out of her face, and she spat water. He stared at her. For a long moment. She couldn't read his expression.

He blinked. “Okay,” he said, his tone broken, like he'd just admitted to something shameful. He pulled the seat lever. She snapped back as his body lowered. He rolled onto his side. The seat moaned. He lay facing the interior of the car. Away from the rain and her and everything.

“Okay, you'll go?” she said, almost unable to believe he'd listened after she'd worked so hard. He'd put a hand under his cheek. She watched the slope of his body as he breathed. “I'll think about it,” he said.

She wished they were home. She wished he wasn't in a cramped car seat. Screw it. She would fit. He'd rolled, which left her room to gain a foothold. She grunted, and she pushed into the car out of the rain, pulling the door shut beside her. The sound of the rain and the traffic and the people wandering outside world muffled. She spooned him. Cold from the leather seat soaked through the hip of her pants until she warmed it with her body heat. She rested along his length. They fit together. The cramped seat stuck her against his body like peanut butter to bread. But they fit, and she wanted the closeness anyway.

She stroked the side of his face as he stared. Away. “That's all I'm asking, Derek. Just to think about it. You're—”

“Naked,” he said.

“What do you mean?”

“I almost died.”

“But you're alive,” she assured him by reflex.
“Let me finish, Mere. Please.”

“Okay,” she said. “Okay, I'm sorry.”

He took a deep breath. She watched over top his slim body as his fingers picked at the seams of the seat. His nails made a chuck-chuck noise as he scraped them over the bumps of thread. Like he wanted to grip something, but he couldn't find anything. She reached across his body, and she grabbed his hands. He stilled. His grip solidified around hers. Warmth spread into her skin.

“He didn't kill me, but he took my life. I'm alive because he decided not to pull the trigger a second time. I don't know why.”

“But—” He tipped his head toward her, and she shrank beside him as she saw the flash of his right iris. “Letting you finish. Sorry.”

He sighed. The leather seat groaned as he flipped around. She pressed against the door with a thump to give him room, which still wasn't quite enough. They bumped and jostled. He winced as his hip jammed into the seat belt clip. She scrabbled for the head rest. She would have laughed on any other day. Right now, though? She just needed to see him. He needed to see her. And neither made jokes. When he settled, he stared at her, his dark eyes unfathomable.

“He took my life. My dignity. My choices,” he said. “I have you. And that means... more than anything to me that I do.” He put a hand on her hip. “I don't know why you stay, but you do, and I'm grateful for that. I am.”

I'm not going anywhere, she wanted to say again. She didn't understand why he couldn't believe her when she said it. But she stayed quiet. She let him finish.

He swallowed. “When we got married on the Post-it, there was you, and there was me. And we made...” He shook his head as though he struggled for an appropriate word. “We made a team. Or something. I don't know.” His gaze tore away as he took a breath. “But he took everything from me,” he said. He met her gaze, unblinking. His dark eyelashes hugged red-rimmed eyes. He reached up and wiped his face. “Now, there's you,” he said. He smiled at her. “And you're so strong. And I'm proud of you everyday.” His voice cracked. “But there's no me anymore, Mere.”

He took everything from me, he'd said. She bit her lip. She wanted to speak. To reassure him. To tell him that it wasn't true. But the look in his eyes kept her quiet.

“I had a panic attack at work in full view on top of everything else,” he said. “The only thing I have any control over anymore is what I say. The only privacy I have is in my head. The rest just happens to me. Over, and over, and over again.”

He blinked. “I feel like one. All the time,” he said. “I want to talk to you. I'm trying to talk to you. And I trust you. Implicitly. I just...” He shook his head. “Me not talking has nothing to do with how I feel about you, or whether you're doing a good job at supporting me, which you are. I'm having a hard time letting go of that last curtain. I need it right now, Meredith. Okay? But I'm trying.”

What curtain, she almost asked, and then memories swept over her like lapping waves. She remembered him on the couch. Crying.

The curtain came open, he'd said. I was so sick, I couldn't even cover myself.
Puzzle pieces assembled in a whirl around her head. She had edge pieces. She'd assembled all the colors that looked alike. A clear picture didn't seem so unobtainable anymore.

She stroked his arm. “What scared you at the memorial?” she said.

“I found a dead man by the admissions desk with his neck missing.”

_I don't even know who he was_, Derek had said.

“I remember,” she said. “You told me when we were in the waiting room for your followup appointment.”

“There were pictures on the stage,” Derek said. “I saw him.”

“Who was he?” she said. And then, in a flash of insight, she knew. “Was he the man who died saving that security guard?”

Derek looked at her for a brief moment. Then he shut his eyes. Rain pattered on the roof. She touched his shoulder. Her fingertips brushed his coarse suit jacket. She squeezed his arm. He lay limp on the seat on his side. She brushed his pale face with her hand.

“I just need it to stop,” he said as she traced the planes of his cheeks. His supple skin bowed under the pressure of her fingertips. His jaw squeezed. His temple fluttered. She felt his frustration underneath her hand like a road map to his psyche.

“Need what to stop?”

“This feeling.”

“What feeling, Derek?”

He swallowed. His eyelids lifted. Dull, defeated blue peered at her. “That I'm nothing,” he said. The puzzle snapped into place, completed.

Her lips parted. For a moment, she couldn't find words. Her gut churned with nausea, and she hated. She hated Gary Clark. The extent to which Derek felt dehumanized, emasculated, and powerless funneled fury into her chest. A single bullet had done all that. She couldn't breathe. His endless apologies, his dithering, his refusals to believe he was worth waiting for... They made a sickening, horrifying sense, now.

She'd hated Gary Clark before in snippets. Watching Derek struggle so hard over the past eight weeks had hurt her body and soul, and she'd needed somewhere far away to funnel that hurt. Gary Clark had been a safe target. An inviting target. _Does it make me a bad person?_ she'd said to Mark. _To hate a dead man so much I wish I could add some kerosene to whatever hell he's burning in?_ Those moments when she'd done her funneling didn't compare to this one.

She splayed her hand against his hip, and she squeezed. Hard. “You are _not_ nothing, Derek. You're the man I fell in love with. You're the man who proposed to me in an elevator decorated with miles and miles of case history on its walls. Those were all lives you saved, Derek. That's not nothing. You saved my friend's life. And me. You saved my life when you pulled me out of the water. That's not nothing. None of that is nothing.”

“I'm not that person anymore,” he said. “You said you don't know me.”
She blinked, rendered speechless. Just for a moment. She regathered herself, and she breathed. “I know you like strawberry ice cream,” she said.

“Coffee.”

“Whatever. Both. And I know you like The Clash, and fly fishing, and open space, and old books by Ernest Hemingway. I know you like to grill things, and I know you like crossword puzzles.”

“I don't like anything anymore,” he said.

He sighed. “Mere, I—”

“You love me. That's not new. And that's something. That's almost a fingerprint by itself. Not many people in the world love me.”

“Meredith...”

“Shut up,” she said. “This isn't a Meredith pity party. I'm just stating facts.”

“But that's not a fact,” he said. “That's ridiculous. I know lots of people who love you.”

She smiled at him. “And, see? You support me. More of the not new.”

His lips parted. She watched the argument form, but she kissed it away. He lay passive beside her. He inhaled, and he groaned as she touched him. She felt the vibration tunnel down her throat. His cologne swirled in the back of her throat. He smelled like rainwater and wet fabric. She tasted him. Her tongue touched his teeth, and then he parted for her. Another deep sound rumbled in his throat. A long, rolling m, perhaps a threadbare version of her name. Mere. He panted. His soft breathing touched her skin. She stroked his hair. And his neck. And his shoulders. And his side. All the sleek lines that made his body his and always thrilled her to touch.

When she pulled away, she stared into the endless, bewildered pools of his eyes. “And don't tell me you're not doing a good job,” she said. She licked her lips. She'd mashed into him hard enough that her lipstick had come off on his skin. He brushed it onto the backs of his palms.

“Meredith,” he said, like he still prepared to argue with her. She pushed her hand against his lips and covered his mouth.

“I don’t want to hear it,” she said. “You have extenuating circumstances, and you're doing the best you can do. I'd like to see anyone do better.” He looked at her, gaze almost drunk, and her heart quivered. She'd done that. With just a kiss.

“Bossy,” he mumbled into her hand. He kissed her palm.

She smiled and lifted her hand away. “You love it.”

“I do.”

“It keeps you in line,” she said, echoing a Derek from years before. One who'd smiled more.

His eyes danced despite his glum demeanor. “It does,” he said.

She brushed loose, damp hair out of his face. His curls slicked against his head. “You're still the same person inside, Derek,” she said. “Maybe you have a big, ugly, figurative tumor, but you're still you where it counts. Would you tell a patient with a brain tumor that he's not him anymore when he snaps at his loved ones or cries at jokes?"

“No,” he said.

“You'd say it's the tumor talking,” she said. “I've heard you say it.”

“I know I've said it.”

She clutched his sport coat. “You're not nothing. And you're not a failure. Your tumor is talking. That's all.”

He sighed. “Meredith, it's not that simple.”

“Well, it's not that hard, either. Stop making this so freaking hard.”

He swallowed. The fight gushed out of him like blood from a sucking chest wound. I really can't breathe, Mere. She watched it happen. He stared at the gray world beyond her body, beyond the window. The muted daylight reflected in his irises, making his gaze seem glassy and tired.

“Would you take me home?” he said.

She kissed him again. “Yeah,” she said. She stroked his body one last time, and she relished the feel of him relishing her. He swallowed. His eyes glistened. He said nothing. But the look in his eyes told her what she already knew.

“I love you, he said but didn't say.

She pushed open the door and the sound of the rain made a crescendo. Rain fell through the gap, spattering her with chilly slivers of water. She blinked. The leather seat squealed as she relinquished it to Derek, who rolled onto his back to claim it.

She shut the door. She returned to her side of the car. She turned the key in the ignition. The car rumbled. She felt the vibrations for minutes. Derek stared at the ceiling. When he didn't move, when all he did was muse, she reached across his body and pulled down his seat belt.

He blinked as the latch clicked into place.

“It'll get better,” she said. She latched her seat belt as well, and then she pulled the car out of its space. She didn't turn on the radio. She let the vents blow warm-ish air. Not hot. The day outside wasn't that cold. But the water soaking into her blouse and sopping her hair chilled her, and now that she didn't lie next to Derek in the seat, she shivered. She pulled into traffic while he rested.

She entered the highway and accelerated. The wet pavement made a whooshing noise as it swept under the car. The engine vibrated. Concrete horizon churned underneath them.

She blinked. Her fingers tightened around the steering wheel. The leather pad on the wheel squeaked. “What are you talking about?” she said.

“Gary Clark,” he said. He raised his hands to his face and spoke through his fingers. “I kill him. I try to strangle him. I threaten to snap his neck. And then I shoot him with his own gun while I laugh.”

She shivered, not from physical cold, but at his cold, disgusted tone. He had a temper, yes. He had a mean streak. But she found it impossible to imagine him perpetrating heartless violence. Words were his weapons. Not guns. The incongruity swam in her head, lazy, nauseating.

You are so in over your head, said the voice that had bugged her all day. She swallowed, trying to hold misery at bay. He was talking. He needed to talk. She could do this. The road beyond the car blurred until she blinked.

“Are you talking about your other nightmare?” she said.

He looked away. “I like it.”

“You like your nightmare?”

“No,” he said. “I like killing him.”

“Oh,” she said. She clenched her teeth. Oh. That was the best thing she could think of to say?

“I'm sorry,” he said. His apology wasn't like his others, where he spewed I'm sorry so often the words had sort of become meaningless. He meant something. Something deep.

She glanced at him. The flash of his profile filled her retinas before she had to look back onto the road. The traffic moved fast. Rain splattered everywhere. Misty air and her watering eyes made it hard to see. She decelerated, and she pulled into the slow lane to be safe, though it meant they would get home slower.

“No, he said. “I'm sorry for?”

He sighed and wouldn't look at her.

“What for?” she prodded.

The Cayenne pounded through the rain. The windshield wipers swished. A car cut her off as it changed lanes, but she didn't care enough to yell. She glanced at him out of the corner of her eye and then back to the road. Back and forth. Back and forth between him and the road. She wasn't being safe. She couldn't even pretend this was safe. They needed to get home.

“I'm a doctor,” he said, in an echo of before, what felt like days ago.

“So, what, Derek?” she said as a searing headache pounded behind her eyes. Exhaustion rolled through her. “I think wanting to hurt somebody who hurt you to that degree is pretty natural.”

He didn't speak. And in the silence, she found panic again. Not his, for once. Hers.

She'd begged him for weeks after the shooting to start talking. In the last three weeks, he'd broken his unending reticence. Today, she'd parted the last gates of his resolve. He'd gone from silence to gushing in the space of a day.

She'd wanted this.

But she hadn't been prepared.

She'd known he'd twisted himself in knots. She'd known the bullet wound extended far past the physical. Really, though? She hadn't known a thing.

You're so screwed, said the voice, and she wished it had a face so she could slap it. She gripped the steering wheel, overwhelmed by the intense desire for it to be Thursday. So she could run to Dr.
Wyatt and get help.

Help.

Meredith needed help.

They both needed help.

Dr. Wyatt had given Meredith her cell phone number to use in an emergency. Like if Derek suddenly decided he did want to die and got all wiggy with a scalpel. Or... Was this an emergency? She clenched her teeth. It didn't matter. She wanted to call that number.

“Do you think about it when you're awake?” Meredith said, trying to keep her voice even. She exhaled as she reached their exit.

The car veered as she followed the loop. “Sometimes,” he said.

She stopped at the light and turned to him. “Just him? Or other people, too?”

He swallowed. “Just him.”

She reached for his arm and touched him. “Did you read the packet I gave you after I told you about Dr. Wyatt?”

“No,” he said. Rain spattered on the windows. He looked at it. “I don't want to read it.”

She sighed, annoyance ruffling her. Why did he have to make this so freaking difficult? The light turned green. She accelerated. Momentum pushed her against the seat. “The very first paragraph talks about how survivors often fantasize about harming their attackers,” she said. “I really think it would help you understand what's happened to you if you would read it. You're not alone. You're not even weird.”

Not weird, she told herself. Not an emergency. No matter how disturbing it was to hear.

He said nothing.

“Are you okay?” she said.

He shook his head. Quick. Like the windshield wiper, except the movement was more muted. “No,” he said, and he sat up straight. “Stop the car.”

“What? Why?” She glanced at him. “We're almost home.”

“Just stop the car,” he said. He scrabbled at the door. “Stop it. Stop.” He gripped the handle. He opened the door before she'd even hit the brake. Traffic noise and rain gushed into the cabin.

She swerved out of traffic onto the side of the road. A car honked, and she flinched. He flinched. “Derek, what—”

The seat belt cut into his neck like a noose as he tried to escape. He pawed at it. The latch popped loose, and the belt swung back into the compartment in the wall. The metal buckle hit him in the face. He shoved it out of the way. He tilted his body out the door, and then he retched. Again. Again. Again.

She watched the red brick house with black shutters beyond the window. Her vision blurred, and the house became a mess of rusty-colored red. The engine hummed. Rain thundered on the roof of the car. She leaned, and she rubbed his back. “Derek,” she said. His muscles strained and relaxed under his sport coat as his stomach forced him to empty himself.

The spasms stopped after what felt like five years, but he didn't lift his head from the gap formed by the open door. He breathed. She watched his torso as he inhaled. Exhaled. Inhaled. Exhaled. A car drove past them, and the Cayenne swayed. He gripped the door handle. His knuckles turned white. He retched again.

When he raised his body, he held his left hand to his mouth. He sniffed, and a wet, bubbly sound filled his sinuses. He swallowed. Again. Again. Again. After a long moment, he pulled the seat lever. The back of the seat popped up. He fell back. They collided.

He shut the door, and the roar of traffic fell away. He re-clipped his seat belt. “I don't feel very well,” he said.

“Oh, okay,” she said. “Hang on. We're almost home.”

He rested against the window with his eyes shut as she navigated the Cayenne through the last few turns. The Cayenne churned gravel and bounced, and as she pulled up to the house, she sighed. She turned off the ignition. The car rumbled to a halt.

“We're here,” she said. “Are you okay?”

“No,” he said. But he didn't elaborate.

She resisted the urge to help him as he fumbled with his seat belt. His movements elongated and stretched, like it took him real mental effort to keep going. He slid out of the car, and he walked toward the house without talking to her. She watched him move across the front lawn. He didn't battle the rain, didn't speed up. By the time he reached the porch, his suit had soaked through. He disappeared through the doorway.

A deep, aching sense of tiredness seeped into every joint and muscle, and she sat for a while in the car in the rain. Numb. Or wishing she was numb, really, and instead, just aching.

It hurt. It hurt, it hurt, it hurt. It hadn't hurt much the last few days, but today she wanted to scream and never stop. His sisters and mother had gone to dinner, and after hours of trying to hold herself together all day, she let herself dissolve into a shaky pile. The reading chair by Derek's bed cupped her weight in all the right places, but it wasn't comfortable. Nothing was comfortable. Her muscles whined in protest. She squeezed her eyes shut and cradled herself. Late afternoon sunlight falling in through the window doused her in a warm bath. Except the light felt hot and icky. Tears she didn't want spilled loose. What was wrong with her? Freaking hormones. Freaking...

When she heard him return, she tried to smile and look fine. Fine, fine. She could do fine. She wiped her face with her hands, brushed stringy hair from her eyes, and stood, only to wobble. “Hey,” she said. She crossed her arms to make her swaying appear deliberate. “How was your walk?”

Derek pulled his intravenous line along with him as he shuffle-stepped into the room. The wheels squeaked. He moved with slow, deliberate, sliding steps where he barely lifted his feet off the floor. A grimace carved his face, and his pallor looked bad. He wore an old t-shirt, flannel pants, and some Adidas flip flops that made squishing noises with his half-strides.

“Hi,” he said, his greeting clipped between pants of exertion. He didn't look at her, and he didn't answer her question, as though he couldn't focus on talking or thinking or much of anything when he had to move his feet. He pushed himself to his bed and collapsed.

“Do you need anything?” she said.

She didn’t mean to sound falling apart-ish, but she must have, because he blinked. His head turned. His eyes widened, and his fingers tightened around his IV pole. “Meredith—” he said. He didn't even let himself finish her name before he tried to push himself back to his feet. His breaths rattled in his chest, and his face creased with discomfort.

“Don’t get up,” she said. “I’m fine.” She rushed to the bed and sat next to him to keep him from trying to get up anyway.

He swallowed as he looked at her. “Meredith,” he said again, and she couldn't hold it in anymore.

“It hurts,” she said, which made her feel like a freaking hormonal crybaby whiner, because he was sitting there on gallons of painkillers and shaking and, from the look on his face, feeling a bit nauseated by the mere act of sitting up. She cried anyway. All over him.

“I’m here,” he said.

She sniffed. “Me, too.”

He didn't say any other words. He wrapped his arms around her, and they hurt together.

Meredith shook the memory loose and grabbed her purse from the back seat. She darted through the rain, holding her purse over her head. She stumbled through the doorway and closed the door behind her, panting. In a few moments, she'd gone from damp to drowned rat or something. She slicked her hair out of her eyes.

The alarm by the door shrieked at her. She turned. The green LED display said ten seconds. Ten seconds until what? And then she realized he hadn't disarmed the alarm on his way past. She launched herself at the pad and tapped numbers as fast as she could remember them. Wrong. Wrong. She managed to enter their code at the last moment before the police would be called.

She sighed as her heart rate slowed. She hated that thing, and she hated herself for suggesting it. Hated. She plodded toward the kitchen. She glanced up the long flight of stairs. The floorboards above her moaned. He moved around. She wanted to follow him. She did. But maybe he needed some alone time. She didn't know for sure, but he'd given some pretty clear mope-by-myself-please vibes on the way out of the car.

She took her time in the kitchen. She grabbed a glass of water and replenished herself. After giving herself five minutes, she followed him up the steps. She needed to change out of her wet clothes. The water had probably ruined the blouse. She couldn't care.

He stood at the sink in the master bathroom wearing nothing but his boxer briefs while he brushed his teeth, a sleek profile of pale skin in the relative dark. He stared into the mirror. She watched his eyes trace the ugly red line trailing down his sternum. The toothbrush stopped moving. His lips pursed. Toothpaste collected at he corners of his lips. He caught his own gaze for a long, silent moment, and then he looked away. His expression hollowed, and his eyes shifted out of focus.

The rasping sounds of his toothbrush resumed as she went to the closet to find something simple she could wear on the way back to the hospital. He spat into the sink as she pulled out a shirt and some jeans. Not the most fashionable statement, but she would be in scrubs again in less than an hour. Effort seemed pointless. She pulled off her wet blouse and replaced it with the dry t-shirt.
Derek hadn't moved by the time she'd pulled up her jeans. He stood at the sink, his hips pressed into the lip of porcelain. He moved, then, as she watched him. He seemed sluggish, and he grasped the door frame for what looked like balance as he passed by. He moved across the carpet, his feet thudding against the floor. He didn't comment at her presence, though he looked at her with a dull expression. He knew she was there.

He collapsed into bed on his side sort of like she pictured a sluggish bear would prepare for hibernation. Every movement looked as though it taxed him. He pulled the blankets over his body. The sheets rasped as he shifted. He curled under the blankets and buried himself to his chin, and then he sighed.

“Do you need anything?” she said. She couldn't help it.

“No,” he said.

She walked to the foot of the bed and stared. “Mark is stopping by after his shift. I need to go back to work.”

“Okay.”

She bit her lip. “Can I help?” she said, though she knew he would say no.

He swallowed. “The room’s spinning,” he said in a low-pitched, slurry voice. She blinked at his unexpected admission.

She put a knee on the bed. The mattress sank. She crawled across it and collapsed next to him on top of the blankets.

“Are you still feeling sick?” she said.

She pressed the back of her hand against his forehead. No fever. She didn't know what to do for him. She turned her palm against his skin, and she rolled her fingers back through his damp hair. She suspected today had just been too much. He'd worried himself so badly his body couldn't take it anymore, and, in the end, he'd worried himself sick.

She leaned closer. She moved her hand over his scalp and down the back of his head. He shifted under the blankets. He pressed his face into the pillow, and he breathed. She listened. She pulled the blanket away from his shoulder blades, and she touched him skin to skin.

“You're okay,” she said, and he shuddered.

He didn't cry. Not really. But he grunted. A sniffly, wet sound filled his head. He shifted under the blankets, and his hands popped out from his cocoon. He rubbed his eyes.

“I'll think about the therapist,” he said. “I'll read the packet.”

She embraced him. “You're okay. You'll be okay. You will. I promise.” He stared at her like he wanted to believe her. Wanted it desperately. She kissed him on the lips. He didn't reciprocate, but he didn't pull away. “I know you have sixteen freckles on your back,” she said.

He swallowed. “I do?”

“Yes,” she said. “Sixteen. I've kissed all of them. And three of them are below your waistband.”

The dullness in his eyes receded, just a fraction, as he shifted. His head tipped back, as though he expected to be able to look at himself. She would have laughed at his perplexed expression if she hadn't just spent the morning watching him disintegrate. "What?" he said.

"Mmm," she purred. "Sixteen. Though I haven't cataloged them lately, because you don't like being on your stomach."

"It still feels weird."

She touched his face. "You're still you, Derek," she said. "Maybe your moods are harder for me to figure out, but I didn't mean you're literally a different person when I said it. And you're not a freak because you want to hurt somebody who almost killed you on purpose, no matter what the hell Hippocratic oath you took. Nobody is a saint. Okay?"

He stared at her. Rain fell on the roof in a percussive storm. Water splattered the window, and the gray light flickered through the rivulets of water cascading down the panes.

"Okay," he said.

She squeezed his shoulder. "And you're not a failure. You're not nothing. And I still love you."

She didn't blink.

He didn't speak, but he watched her. She kissed his forehead before she stood. She didn't want to leave. She wanted to crawl under the covers with him and help him forget the world existed, and that sucky people lived in said world. She wanted. Her head throbbed. She sighed as she glanced at the clock on her nightstand. She was due back for her shift in less than fifteen minutes. She didn't mind getting a little behind. But she didn't want to lose her freaking job.

She glanced at him. He'd closed his eyes. His breaths had evened. She wasn't even sure he was awake. She moved away from the bed, tiptoeing, though the floor of the old house still creaked with her movements. As she reached the master bedroom door and wrapped her fingers around the knob, he called after her.

"Mere?" he said.

She froze, and turned to face him. His dark eyes glinted in the dim light. "Did you need something?" she said.

He met her gaze, unblinking. "I love you, too," he said. "Thank you for staying."

Her hand tightened around the doorknob. She frowned.

He smiled. Not bright or gleeful, but a smile nonetheless. "I didn't mean that literally. Go to work."

"Yes, Meredith," he said. "I literally love you."

"Good," she said with a nod. "See you soon?"

He stared at her for a long, long moment. Rain pattered on the roof. He looked like he wanted to tell her something else, but he couldn't quite find the nerve, and she was done pushing for the day. His gaze softened as he took in the sight of her. She let him look.

"I really like that shirt," he said. Surprised, she glanced down at herself. The word Dartmouth stared back at her, upside down. He rolled. She looked back at him in time to see the blankets flip up. He buried himself to sleep, and had she not known he'd been in the bed, she might have thought the lump of his body to be pillows.

She let him be.

She wished she had any idea what to do for him. Any idea at all. She could push him to do things for himself. She could listen while he talked. She could support him. She could be his partner. But none of that felt active or assertive or anything. She wanted something she could get her hands on and fix. Something that didn't involve making her feel like a nag or a horrible person.

As she drove her Jeep back to the hospital, she tried to think of something. Anything. She'd been looking at his time off from work almost like a vacation. But, perhaps, that had been the wrong mindset. Derek was a doer. Cancer patients needed things to do to keep their minds off their treatments. Maybe, that was part of the problem with Derek. He'd been left on his own to think too much. Nothing distracted him. Nothing allowed him to live for a few hours without worrying about guns and violence and bad things. The more he worried, the worse it got, and he never had a break from it, because all he did was sit at home and wallow.

She tapped her steering wheel as she pulled up to the last light before the hospital. Her windshield wipers swished, and the car swayed with the movements. She watched a haggard woman in a bright orange poncho jog across the crosswalk with a waterlogged, shaggy creature that was probably a dog, but was maybe a Muppet with teeth or a small, fuzzy pony. The woman didn't seem pleased about the rain. Neither did the Muppet dog. They both tolerated it.

As they made it to the opposite corner, the dog sat on his – or her?— haunches. The woman blinked into the rain and sighed. She jerked the leash once, twice. Even through the rain and her closed window, Meredith heard the jingle of the chain. The dog stood like a lumbering mammoth, or at least how Meredith imagined a mammoth would stand, since mammoths were extinct, and she really didn't know, and off the pair of them went. Orange poncho woman and pony mammoth dog disappeared into the mist or whatever.

It wasn't until Meredith had parked her car that the idea solidified in her head. Like a bolt of lightning, it hit her. Something for him to do. She yanked the keys from the ignition and dashed through the rain into the hospital. Something for him to do. She could work with that.

She changed into her scrubs. She finished her rounds in record time. The hospital still had record low admittance rates. People weren't using Seattle Grace unless they had to. Which meant she didn't feel guilty as she signed off on her last chart and wandered into the research library.

The small library had several computers hooked up to the Internet. Three other doctors sat in the aisles, poring over medical journals and research papers. The air smelled sharp, like the glue from new books. Pens made scribble sounds. People coughed and sniffed and made other people noises. One of the researchers chewed an apple. Meredith blinked, and she sat down by the window at the nearest computer. In moments, Google took her where she wanted to go. She lost herself, and time slipped away.

“What are you looking at?” Lexie asked, and Meredith jumped, torn from her reverie.

She blinked, and she wiped her eyes with her fingers. She glanced at her watch, only to discover hours had passed. How had hours passed? She'd barely sat down. Was it still today, even? Or... She looked out the window and squinted. The sky had dimmed, and the rain had stopped coming down in buckets, cups, or any other form of large-ish container. Drizzle misted the air, barely visible, and that was all.
Lexie squealed as she leaned over Meredith's shoulder. The noise slammed through Meredith's brain like an ice pick, and Meredith winced. “I love puppies!” Lexie said as she hijacked Meredith's mouse and began to click. Click. Clickity click. Until a small, adorable lump of gold fur stared back at them through the small monitor screen. “They're so cute. This one is cute!”

The Labrador puppy's tongue hung out of its mouth and lolled. With his black lips parted, and his head tilted to the side, the puppy wasn't grinning, but Meredith couldn't stop herself from anthropomorphizing. The little dog's left ear had a chunk missing, evidence of a rough start in life, but he seemed happy enough, now, and fascinated by the camera taking his picture. She couldn't help but imagine watching Derek doting over it.

He liked dogs. Well, all animals really, as far as she could tell, but dogs were his main thing. He would try to be macho about it, maybe for a few minutes. But with a puppy like that, she doubted even cocksure Derek Shepherd would last long, let alone Derek Shepherd, version two. She pictured him sprawled on the couch, draped in puppy, while he read his favorite Hemingway novel. And then she pictured him tossing a ball around. The puppy would yip and yap and dance, and they'd just...

Meredith sighed. Irresponsible thoughts, she told herself. No puppies. And she was crisscrossing her desire to see him smiling again with oh-my-god-it's-a-puppy cuteness hormones, which was bad, and girly. And definitely irresponsible. With effort, she pulled her gaze away from the picture.

“I'm not getting a puppy,” she said. “Do you seriously think I could fit a puppy into my schedule? Or Derek for that matter, when he goes back to work? They're like babies. I'd rather save my time for an actual baby.”

“I'd help walk it and train it,” Lexie said. “We had a little Sheltie when I was a kid named—”

“Lexie!”

“Sorry,” she said. She blushed, and some of her effervescence died. She pulled away from the computer and plopped into the chair next to Meredith. The wheels on the chair slipped, and Lexie pinwheeled before she settled. She pouted. “No puppy?”

“No. Puppy. Give me that,” Meredith said. She took back the mouse and returned to the minimalistic, blue-and-white page she'd been staring at. Seattle Animal Shelter. The page had been divided by animal types. Cats. Dogs. Birds. Other things. They even had a section for pigs.

“Then what are you looking at this page for?” Lexie said.

Meredith shrugged. “Pets are good stress relief.”

Lexie frowned. “Do you want a cat or something?”

“No, I—” Meredith blinked. “What's wrong with cats?”

Lexie's nose crinkled. “They're all... fuzzy. And evil. And they barf.”

“Dogs barf,” Meredith countered. “And they're fuzzy.”

“But cats barf with malice.”

Meredith snickered. “You really don't like cats, do you?”

“I hate cats,” Lexie said. She hooked her fingers and made a snarly gesture. “They claw your face off with zero provocation, and they deposit headless mice in your slippers like it's some sort of gift. Do you have any idea what it feels like to wake up after two hours of sleep and step on a decapitated mouse that likely lived for hours before the cat finally had mercy and killed it? Well, I do. And when you scream, the cat looks offended, like you should, for some reason, enjoy a bloody mouse. It sucks. Who enjoys bloody mice? No one. That's who.”

“Cats do,” Meredith said.

“Cats aren't people!” Lexie snapped, eyes flashing. People looked up from their work all around, eyebrows raised. Lexie hunched in her chair, and her features flushed. “Sorry,” she said.

Meredith stared. “You have issues.”

“Cat issues,” Lexie corrected. Her lip curled with disgust. “Are you really getting a cat? Do I need to move?”

“Well...” Meredith let the silence stretch. Lexie's eyes widened with desperation. “No.”

Lexie glared. “You're mean. You're a mean sister.”

“Sorry,” Meredith said. But she wasn't sorry. Not really. “Derek likes dogs. I was thinking—”

“But you said—”

“I said no puppies. I was thinking we could get an older dog. We both like dogs. I liked Doc. And I think it would help Derek. Having a dog to train might help him cope a little.”

Lexie nodded. “It might give him a sense of control.”

“Lexie...”

“What?” she said. “I've read the packet. For Alex. Photographic memory, remember?”

“Oh,” said Meredith. She looked at her lap. She'd gotten used to defending Derek's privacy with sharp, pointy sticks.

“So, who's Doc?” Lexie said.

“I had a dog for a little bit a few years ago. He was a horrible dog, but...”

Lexie smiled. “But he was your dog.”

“Yeah. Well, he was Derek's dog in the end. I couldn't keep him. I didn't have time.”

“You would have time, now?”

“I have Derek,” Meredith said. She smiled. Even after more than a year of saying it, the words still felt weird on her tongue. They'd struggled for so long to make something lasting. “He managed with Doc.” She folded her arms over her chest and leaned back in her chair. “I don't know. Maybe it's a stupid idea.”

“How is Derek? I saw him at the memorial.”

“Lexie...”

Lexie frowned. “Right,” she said. “Taboo topic. Though, I'm assuming he's not well since he extended his leave by two weeks, and also because I live with you guys, but I almost never see him.”

“I'm sorry.”

“He's my family, too, you know. You realize he's my brother-in-Post-it?”

“He's having a very hard time, and he's a very private person. I'm sorry,” Meredith said. “What do you want me to say?”

Lexie stared at Meredith for a long moment. She took a small breath. “Pets are proven stress relief,” she said as she put down her daggers. Meredith relaxed in her chair. “I don't think it's a stupid idea at all,” Lexie continued. “Plus, if you get a guard dog, maybe we can get rid of that awful alarm system.”

“Do you think it's irresponsible? Getting a dog? I messed up with Doc.”

“Well, that depends,” Lexie said. She folded her hands together. “Are you getting a dog to be Derek's pet project until he gets better, or are you getting a dog to be Derek's friend for life, and the pet project part is just a bonus?” And then she clapped her hands over her mouth and snickered. “That was a bad, bad pun.”

“Just a bonus,” Meredith said, ignoring Lexie's chortling. “We both like dogs. It would be something we could do together that doesn't involve suture kits. And we'll have lots of space, soon.”

“Space?”

“The new house.”

“Oh. Right,” Lexie said. She beamed, though the expression didn't touch her eyes. “Then, I think a dog would be great!” she said a little too cheerfully.

“I hope so,” Meredith said. She sighed. “This is my last idea. I don't know what else to do, and I'm at the end of my rope.”

“What happens to your mother's house when you move?”

Silence stretched. Meredith peered at Lexie. Meredith ran her fingers along the soft legs of her scrubs in an absent expression of energy. God, she hadn't even thought about her mother's house. Not in any sort of appreciable sense like what do I do with it now that I'm leaving?

“I don't know,” Meredith said.

“Will you sell it?”

“I hadn't... really thought about it.”

Lexie snorted. “That's nice of you.”

“I have a crap ton on my plate right now,” Meredith said. “Moving is the last of my worries.”

“But dogs are big on the list? I live at your mother's house!”

Lexie goggled, and she looked down. “Right. Right, I... Sorry. I...”

“I'll let you know when I know,” Meredith said. “I promise.”

“Okay. Is there anything I can do?”

“I don't think so, but thanks for offering,” Meredith said. She bit her lip. Lexie fiddled with her lab coat. She had thin, long fingers. Her nails caught on the fabric. “Do you have a preference?” Meredith asked, her voice soft. “On the house, I mean.”

“Well, I...” Lexie shook her head. For a moment, she seemed flummoxed that she'd even been asked, which made Meredith feel a little guilty. “Alex and I could rent it. I mean not as a couple couple. Just as a couple of people who rent in the same place. We're not ready to rent a house as a couple. That would be—”

“Lexie?”

“Yes?”

“You babble worse than me.”

“I'll think about it.”

“The dad gene?”

“About renting it to you,” Meredith said.

“Oh. Okay. Thanks.”

Meredith sighed. “So, what kind of dog should Derek and I get?”

Lexie took back the mouse and began to browse the site while Meredith mused. Meredith didn't even know if Derek had a favorite kind of dog. She would have to ask him when she got home. He wouldn't want a dog that barked a lot. Or a little yappy ankle-biter dog. He would want a loyal, friendly dog who would go for walks with him but also be happy to laze about and watch him fish at the lake. And, given her project idea, the dog would need to be the kind that would respond well to training, rather than looking dumbly around whenever it received a sit command.

“What about this one?” Lexie said. “He's cute, Mere.”

“You shouldn't get a dog just because he's cute,” Meredith said as she gazed into space. “I mean, you have to think about breed characteristics. Is the dog trainable? That's important. What kind of dog is it? A guard dog? A watch dog? A lap dog?”

“I will laugh my ass off if you get Derek a chihuahua or a toy poodle.”

“Maybe a rescued greyhound,” Meredith said. “That's pretty noble.”

Greyhounds were big, fast dogs. Her neighbor had owned one when Meredith had been a kid, and his favorite thing to do had been to run away at full speed, turn around, and charge at Meredith from fifty feet away. When she'd been several feet shorter, having the fastest dog breed on earth streaking toward her at full bore had been terrifying, but it had been a good sort of adrenaline-spike terrifying. The dog had always veered at the last second, and she'd laughed and laughed. He'd been a sweet dog. With big brown eyes and a brindle coat and a long, whip-like tail that had always sported a snoopy band-aid at the tip because he kept thwacking it into things and cutting himself. She stretched the memory as far as it would go, but she couldn't remember the dog's name, and a brief well of sadness rolled through her when she realized the dog was, by now, probably dead.

She shook her head. She could picture Derek with a dog like that. Taking the dog for walks. Playing. It would be a big dog, but gentle. One that would never bite or bark. One that liked to play hard for a little while and crash hard afterward. Greyhounds tended to like lying around when they weren't sprinting, and she imagined one would be perfectly happy watching Derek fish if it had a nice bed from which to do it.

“Seriously, Mere, you should look at this dog,” Lexie said.

“No greyhounds train well?” Meredith said. “I wonder if they make good guard dogs. Derek would want a guard dog, I think. Or are they—” She glanced at the screen where Lexie had been urging her to look. Adorable eyes the color of mocha stared back at her. “—really, really cute,” she finished.

Lexie grinned. “Told you.”

“McPerfect?” Lexie said.

Meredith couldn't disagree.
Gunfire woke the sleeping baby in her arms. The baby began to wail.

"Derek!" Meredith said as she watched across a white void. He toppled onto his back on the floor. He lay on the ground in a blooming red puddle, staring at the ceiling. He swallowed, and his lips worked in a chewing motion, but no words spilled from his lips, as though he were too shocked to yell.

"Derek," she said. "Hang on!"

She took one step through the billowing fog, and the baby screamed in her ear. She winced. She couldn't run with a baby. "Cristina, would you take it?"

"It?" Cristina said, her voice flat. She raised her eyebrows.

"The freaking baby!" Meredith said. "It's screaming, and I have to save Derek, now."

Meredith didn't wait for a response. She shoved the bundle of blanket and baby at Cristina, and she ran. She ran through empty, endless white, but she knew he was there. That way. The fog parted, and she found him. Sprawled. Bleeding. Dying. She skidded to a stop by his prone form. Her knees burned on impact with the floor. Blood splattered his blue shirt. The puddle of red beneath his body spread.

"Derek, it's me," she said. "You're going to be fine." She pushed his useless, bloody hand away and pressed her palm into the wound. She tried not to wince at the wet, fleshy sound as her skin met his shredded insides. His torso jerked like she'd scalded him, and he yelled, only to end in a cough. Two coughs. Rattling, breathy coughs that stuttered from his lips as his lungs filled with fluid. He fought for air.

"Please," she begged him. "Please, don't die. Please, Derek. You can't leave me."

Pained, blue eyes stared, not at nothing. At her. "I can't breathe," he said, his voice a croaky remnant of the soft, silky tone she'd fallen in love with. His skin turned sallow. He coughed again. A line of red formed where his lips pressed together, and then a drop of blood spilled like a tear down his chin.

"Help is coming," she said. "Don't die. Please, you don't get to die."

"Where's the baby?" he said. "You shouldn't be alone."

She froze. Her hand pressed into the wound, and he groaned. His head tipped back, and he thunked his skull against the ground. "Sorry," she said. "Sorry!" She swallowed. "Cristina?"

No answer. Meredith heard only his panting. She looked around, but the fog thickened oppressively, and she saw no one.

A lump formed in her throat. She grabbed his hand and squeezed. He had no grip. "I think I lost it," she said.

"I guess you did," Derek said. He brushed off his shirt and sat up. The blood had disappeared.

Derek wasn't in the bed with her anymore.
She groaned and rolled as her weird dreams slipped away. The covers rustled. Warmth grabbed her body and pressed in like a cocoon. She swallowed and winced at the dry, pasty feel of her mouth. How long had she slept? She groaned again. She mashed her face into the pillows and breathed the soft scent of sleep, sleep she didn't possess anymore because it'd freaking left her. Her nose crinkled, and, at last, she gave up. She breathed, resigned to the fact that she was awake. The lingering scents on the sheets of Derek, and sex, and sex with Derek relaxed her, and she breathed again. Again. Thoughts began to process.

Why wasn't Derek in the bed with her anymore?

Darkness became a crescent of dim sunlight as she cracked open her eyelids. She peered over the white plane of sheets, an empty space blurred by her eyelashes. She blinked. Derek's Oxycontin and Percocet bottles sat by his alarm clock, obscuring the time. The Percocet cap skewed to the side, evidence that it hadn't been screwed shut properly, evidence that it'd been used. The sheets and blankets on his side of the bed lay in a disturbed torrent, as though he'd woken up thinking they were vines trying to yank him into the mattress, and he'd clawed himself free. She rolled onto her back and glanced blearily at the clock on her side of the bed. The red, blurry face began as a mess and resolved into readable digits. 11:30AM.

She sat bolt upright. How had she slept so late? Today was d-day, and the shelter opened in thirty minutes.

She scrubbed at her eyes and face until her skin burned, and then she flipped back the covers. She paused to listen. Nobody stirred. In the far distance beyond the window, she heard a lawn mower. A passing car. Several barking dogs. Birds. But she heard nothing from inside the house. She stood, and she scrunched her toes against the worn carpet. She swept messy hair away from her face and moved.

“Derek, are you up here?” she said. Her voice arrived croaky with sleep, and she cleared her throat. “Derek?” No water running. No closed doors. He wasn't in the master bathroom or the shower across the hall.

She stumbled down the steps, not quite awake enough to counter the force of gravity, and peered into the living room. He liked to mope in the living room. He would stare at the television without watching. Or stare at his book without reading. Or... She looked at the empty couch. No Derek. She checked his office next. Again, no Derek, just his solitary desk and shelves and shelves of books and folders. She didn't find him as she wandered past the open gate into the kitchen, either.

Alex and Derek had fenced off both the kitchen and the dining room with baby gates. The big dog crate they'd gotten rested in the corner of the dining room. Empty bowls rested on a vinyl place mat on the floor by the center island in the kitchen, waiting to be filled with food and water. Lexie had put a huge box full of toys in the corner by the fridge.

Piercing the cobwebs of sleep, an excited thrill ran through Meredith's body as she stared into the toy box. A squeaky fake steak sat on the top. A small rope with a looped handle on both ends rested underneath. Lexie had gone a bit overboard with her assignment to find their future dog some good entertainment. Under the rope and the steak rested a grinning rubber ducky, enough tennis balls for the US Open, and more stuffed animals and squeaky, rubber things than Meredith could count. They were not going to make a mistake like she had with Doc. The dog would have plenty to do and lots to chew on that wasn't furniture or shoes.

“Derek?” she said. No answer.

An empty frying pan sat in the sink, soaking. The faucet dripped. The warm scent of waiting coffee tickled her nose. Her stomach rumbled. Deterred from her search for Derek by hunger, she opened the fridge to grab the milk carton for a quick bowl of cereal, but stopped short as her face met a dinner plate stacked five high with six inch, golden-brown pancakes. Shrink wrap covered the plate, and a small yellow sticky note had been stuck to the top. 45 seconds on high, the note said in nearly illegible doctor scribble. Derek's handwriting.

He'd made her breakfast. A smile tore across her face before she could stop it. “Derek?” she called, and her voice filled the empty house like a thunderclap. Only silence answered.

She pulled the plate out of the fridge, tore away the plastic wrap, and put the plate in the microwave. She tapped in 45 seconds on the timer and hit start. While she waited, she grabbed the syrup from the pantry and a fork from the drawer, and poured herself a cup of coffee – Derek's favorite Irish crème blend was already warm and in the pot. The timer dinged, and she grabbed her pancake bounty from the microwave.

Breeze hit the window panes with a low whistle. Sunshine fell into the room at a slant, unadulterated. Not a single cloud marred the sky. A smile broke her face as she peered at the endless azure beyond the trees. The universe and her plans seemed to have aligned for once. The weather for d-day was perfect.

Except d-day would not really work so well without Derek.

Where was Derek?

She took a bite of the pancakes as she padded back through the main hallway. Sugar, a hint of maple, and multi-grain batter split apart on her tongue. A whine of pleasure tumbled through her.
He made really good pancakes. Though he didn't make them from scratch, he didn't just dump batter into a mixing bowl from the Bisquick box like she did, either. She'd watched him once.

You put honey in the pancake batter? She'd said as she'd raised herself onto the counter top and sat down. He'd stirred a bowl of cream-colored batter by her hip. He'd worn loose flannel pajama pants and a rumpled blue shirt. His hair had stuck up all over, and he hadn't shaved yet. He'd looked rough to kiss, but... delicious.

Yes, he'd said as she'd licked her lips.

I don't think honey can save that recipe. It's all... healthy. Like bran. There's a reason I don't eat bran muffins.

Just try it, he'd said with a smirk. Don't you trust me?

We just got married, she'd said. We have no pancake trust.

Pancake trust?

Yes. Trust that you won't ruin my pancakes on the one day a week I have time to make and eat them.

“Derek?” she called again as she moved into the foyer. Silence.

She opened the front door, and before simple curiosity had a bloody crash with worry, she found him. He sat hunched over a book in the swing on the front porch, wearing jeans, fluffy white socks, and a maroon-colored t-shirt. The cool breeze ruffled his hair, and the swing swayed in moving air.
The book rested flat on his lap. His cheek mashed against the swing support. His eyes were closed.
She bit her lip, torn between waking him up or letting him be. She wanted to sit down to enjoy her pancakes with him, but she didn't want to surprise him, either. “Derek,” she said, but he didn't budge. Indecision tore at her as she remembered the disarray of sheets on their bed. He looked pale. A bit haggard. She didn't want to interrupt him when he'd managed to fall asleep, d-day or not.

A pickup truck made the decision for her. Her neighbor two houses down started his big Dodge Ram, and as the powerful engine turned over in the nearby driveway, Derek flinched, and he blinked awake a bit like he'd been shocked with a cattle prod or something. His book careened to the ground with a smack. A weird sound caught in his throat, something halfway between startled and outright distress.

“It's okay,” Meredith said. “It's just a truck.”

He stared at her as though he saw her, but his brain hadn't made sense of her yet. “Derek, it's me,” she clarified. She didn't move toward him or move at all, really. She didn't want to look threatening. Her fingers tightened against her plate and her warm coffee mug. “Derek, wake up,” she said.

He blinked once more. He breathed and stared as the blue truck pulled out of the nearby driveway. As it drove in front of her mother's house and down the street, sense seemed to return to Derek's gaze. Recognition pierced some of the clouds in his eyes. And then his posture relaxed.

His face turned red. He bent to pick up his book. “Morning,” he said in a soft voice as his arm extended. His watch flashed in the sunshine. “Sleep well?”

“Hey,” she said. She plopped down onto the bench next to him and took another bite of fluffy pancake. “I slept... weird. These are really great,” she said around her mouthful. “Thank you for breakfast.” The words arrived muffled. She tried to chew.

He shrugged. “Sure,” he said. He righted himself. She glanced at the book, but couldn't catch the title. “Slept weird?”

She chased the pancakes down with a gulp of hot coffee. She grimaced as her throat and stomach heated, and her tongue burned. A little too hot. She blew over the lip of the mug. The surface of the liquid fluttered. “Weird dreams,” she clarified. She shoveled another bite and chewed. “I'm sorry I slept so late. I don't know how that happened. How long have you been up?”

“A while,” he said. “It's fine. Bad dreams?”

“Just weird,” she said.

His eyebrows raised. “About?”

She bit her lip. She didn't want to tell him, because he would take what she was saying and twist it into yet another thing that was his fault, which he'd been doing way too much lately. But not telling him would make her feel like a freaking hypocrite. “You got shot, and you were dying,” she said. “The baby was screaming. I gave it to Cristina and ran for you. And then you were fine, but I couldn't find Cristina or the baby.”

His head tilted, and his shoulders slumped as he regarded her. “Meredith,” he said.

“It wasn't some metaphorical crap or a window to my hidden pain or whatever. I swear,” she said. “It was just weird, and I'm fine now that I'm awake. Honest. You're alive, and I'm happy, but you asked what I dreamed about, so I told you. Golden rule. That's all.”
He looked at the street beyond the yard, and when he didn't reply, she put the plate by her hip and sighed. She searched for any sort of twinkle or excitement in his gaze and found none. Dark circles hugged his eyes. He looked tired. Tired like he looked when he came home after an endless shift. Tired like he looked when he lost a patient. She wrapped her arms around him. He didn't resist. He leaned into her. A lump formed in her throat at the sense of fatigue that washed over her from him like high tide. She stroked his shirt.

“Do you want some of my coffee?” she said.

He breathed against her shoulder. “No.”

“Nightmares again?” she said.

He didn't answer, but he might as well have screamed yes the way his muscles tightened. Her eyes burned. This was d-day. He was supposed to be excited. Not ready to keel over.

“Do you want to take a nap first?” she said.

“No,” he said.

“Are you sure?”

His grip tightened. “I don't want to sleep,” he said.

The cool breeze blew. She swallowed. “When did you get up, Derek?”

He shrugged. “It was dark out.” Which meant he'd been up six hours, probably, if not more. He pulled away from her and wiped his face with his hands. “I'm fine. I'm tired, but I'm okay.” He smiled. For the first time that morning. A smile suited him. Even exhausted, even though it didn't quite reach his eyes, it made him look less haggard. He cleared his throat. “Finish your pancakes so we can go get our dog.”

“I hate that you can't sleep,” she said.

He kissed her, but he said nothing.

“Did you eat breakfast?” she prodded. He looked away. She frowned. “Derek, you really need to __”

“I didn't forget. I'm queasy,” he said. He swallowed. “Please, just...” Leave me alone, he didn't say.

She touched his face. “I really don't mind waiting if you want to take a nap.”

“I'd rather take a nap after we get a dog,” he said.

He stared at her, his eyes endless, tired pools of distress. Drop it, said his eyes. Drop it, please. Her gut twisted at his exhausted, upset look. She wound her thoughts back to the night before, wishing she'd heard him in distress back when it might have made a difference. When she could have woken him up and rescued him. But that was the crap thing about nightmares. They were in your head. He wouldn't necessarily have been making any noise. She'd slept straight through the night and well into the morning. She couldn't recall once opening her eyes and wondering why. He'd suffered in stealth.

“Do you want to talk about it?” she said.

He blinked. His eyes watered. “No.”
Now, he was awake. He wanted to not think about it. She could at least help with that. She hugged him again, mashing her thin body against his. His body heat pressed against her. He shuddered, unresisting and limp in her arms, until, after moments, he sighed. He returned the embrace. She kissed his ear, and then his throat, and then she shifted to meet his lips.

She grinned as she pulled away. “D-day today.”

He nodded. His muscles loosened. The chipped pieces of his broken expression re-collected like a puzzle put back together. He found a small grin. “Yes. I've been waiting all morning for you, you know.”

She hit his arm. “Why didn't you wake me? I wouldn't have minded.”

He shrugged. “You needed the sleep. The animal shelter isn't going anywhere. And it's not even open yet.”

She picked up his wrist and glanced at his watch. “It's open in a few minutes.”

“It'll keep a few more.”

“I need a few minutes to take a shower and get dressed and finish eating, but then I'm ready. I'll hurry.” She picked up her plate and resumed her pancake feast at inhalation speed to demonstrate. The pancakes had gotten a bit cold, but were still tasty even then. “Are you ready?”

“Yeah,” he said. He glanced at his socked feet and scrunched his toes. “Just need shoes and my wallet.”

“Okay, let me finish my breakfast, and then I'll go get ready,” she said. He read his book while she forked bite after fluffy, delicious bite and another and another, until she'd cleared the plate. She kissed him on the cheek. “Be right back,” she said. “You can have my coffee if you want; I'm awake. I don't need it.” She took her plate back to the kitchen and made a mad dash for the shower.

Her hair was still sopping as she returned to the swing with her purse in tow, and water soaked through her gray t-shirt to her bare skin. She shivered. He looked like he hadn't moved an inch except for the fact that he'd put on his black cross trainers and laced them. Her coffee cup had disappeared, too, though whether that meant he'd dumped it out or drank it, she had no idea. She clutched her purse strap.

He glanced at her. His eyes traced her dripping hair. “Hmm,” he said.

His book rested on his lap. She peered over his hands. Words sprawled before her eyes. Words she recognized. The Sun Also Rises. She hadn't seen that one since the hospital. She wondered if he'd picked up where they'd left off. She'd read about half of it to him over the course of his first and second hospital stays.

He closed the book with a smack, slapped his thighs, and stood. He stopped to watch as one of the neighborhood kids rode by on her wobbly pink bike with training wheels, and then he cleared his throat. “Ready to go, now?” he said. “Or do you need to dry your hair?”

She combed her fingers through the wet, tangled strands. She stared at the empty street in front of the house. No parked cars crowded the curb. Lexie and Alex had gone to work. Mark was on shift. Lexie had wanted to stay to meet the new dog, and she'd made sad puppy eyes about going in to work, but she'd gone. Eventually.

“My hair will dry in the car,” she said. “I'm ready. Let's get a dog.”
He grinned. A real grin, and that made Meredith grin. He placed his hand on the small of her back as they walked to his Cayenne. His touch comforted her. Reassured her.

He went to the passenger side before she could ask if he wanted to drive, which made her smile slip away. He never drove anymore. She eyed him as he opened the door. He hadn't seemed spacey while he'd been sitting on the swing, but she'd found she had a harder time noticing he was on something when he was already upset. And he might have gotten better at hiding it, a small voice said. She watched his fingers slide along the door handle, and, though the effect was subtle, she received the distinct impression of a man adrift in a solid sea. Like he didn't quite understand how his hands worked, or... something. Somebody who didn't know him well wouldn't have noticed. Mark might not even notice. But she did. Derek pushed his body into the passenger seat with a wince while she stared. Something cold slipped behind her heart and stabbed.

“Did you take something earlier?” she said as she climbed into the driver's seat.

He blinked and turned his gaze to her. “I'm supposed to take the Oxycontin every twelve hours, remember?”

Her eyes narrowed. No mention of the Percocet, which she knew he'd at least opened from the way the bottle had been disturbed. It'd been nine weeks. Nearly ten. He would be back at work for light duty in three days, at the official ten week mark.

He'd gone to see Dr. Altman at Meredith's request. He'd come home with a fresh Oxycontin prescription a week before. He'd been checked. Research had assured her that gunshot wounds could cause problems for months and months. Years. Forever. But those cases all involved nerve cluster injury. She'd seen his scans. His lungs and heart had been damaged. A hole the size of a dime had been shot through his chest wall. All muscle, bone, and organ damage. Not nerves. His pain shouldn't be so bad he still needed both Oxycontin and Percocet. She'd thought he'd only been taking the Oxycontin since his last visit, and that the Percocet was leftovers. But...

“I know, I just...” She shook her head. He'd been checked by specialists. She wasn't a specialist. “Never mind. I'm being stupid.”

He said nothing as she turned the key in the ignition, which made her skin itch with worry. He was usually the first one to tell her she wasn't being stupid, even when she really, really was. The car rumbled to life, and she shifted the gear into reverse.

She watched him clip his seat belt, watched his fingers slide over the clasp. Derek Shepherd was a surgeon. Seeing his hands move, less than precise, searching, not so much graceful as sloppy, even in the most minute terms... Wrong. All wrong. And why hadn't he mentioned Percocet when he'd clearly opened the bottle?

I'm queasy, he'd said. She'd assumed his nightmares had caused him anxiety. Taking too many Percocet could cause nausea, though. Taking too many of any narcotic painkiller could. And another thing the packet had talked about was the high potential amongst survivors for substance abuse as a coping mechanism. She'd let his behavior slide before in light of his clear physical pain.

But... ten weeks. Almost ten.

She touched his arm, and his gaze shifted to her hand. “What?” he said.

Silence stretched as she fumbled for something to say. Something that didn't sound wildly accusatory. Something that didn't sound like some sort of gross betrayal or lack of trust. Are you really still in so much pain you need two types of narcotics? How many pills are you really taking?
She couldn't think of anything to ask that wouldn't sound like she'd already tried him and found him guilty, even though she hadn't.

“I really love you,” she said.

“I love you, too,” he said without hesitation in that whisper-y lilt that made her heart patter and her lower body tighten with desire. His gaze softened on her face, and she swallowed as the truth of his statement stripped her bare. He loved her. The sky was blue. Fact.

“Meredith,” he said. “Are you really okay?”

His concern slipped guilt in like a knife. Idiot. She was being a paranoid idiot. They'd made it through two-and-a-half months of struggle. He talked to her about things. He was considering a therapist. He'd read the packet. Despite his behavior that morning, he ate. He'd regained his weight. He would tell her if something was wrong beyond the simple fact that he'd been shot. Beyond the fact that healing from a gunshot wound involved a marathon of discomfort stretched over months. He would tell her. If he said he was in pain, he was in pain. Fact. Just like love and blue skies.

And today was d-day.

She could worry on some other day, but not today. What day, though? said that awful, persistent voice. When you find him in cardiac arrest from an overdose? No. She made up her mind. Not today. He had a legitimate prescription that he was following for chronic pain. He wasn't even acting stoned, for crying out loud. She'd seen his grip slip on the door handle and run ten miles in her head with wild thoughts. Idiot. Paranoid. She put on her resolve face.

She flipped on the radio, she hooked her arm over the back of his seat, and she watched through the back window as she pulled out of the driveway. The low murmur of a commercial filled the cabin. He leaned back in his seat, and she couldn't help but scent him – a hint of ivory soap, aftershave, and the soft, reassuring musk that defined him. Warmth spread through her body.

“I'm okay,” she said, and she meant it. “More than.” They were getting a dog. They were starting a family. “We're getting a dog.”

He smiled. “Mmm,” he said. “We are.”

She guided the Cayenne down the street. The shelter was only a few miles away. It would take about ten minutes to get there. She didn't even have to hop on the highway. For the first block, they sat in silence, watching the houses and verdant greens pass by. Every street in Seattle had something green on it. From overhanging trees to bushes to quaint gardens full of flowers. Even in winter, conifers kept the colors alive even as other leaves died. But now, in late summer, every plant and flower had been thriving for months.

She came to the first stop sign and glanced at a trimmed hedge to her right. Cars rolled through the intersection while she waited for her turn. To her left, a white privacy fence spread around a house. A shadow loomed with in. She heard a bark greet the car. A dog, then. She smiled and waved at the mystery behind the fence. From the sound of it, the dog was neither small nor yappy. When she turned her eyes back to the road, she sensed his gaze on her. Derek watched her, his soft, unblinking stare resting on her body. A relaxed grin carved his features. Despite his tired paleness, he seemed content. Content to watch her be her.

“Have you owned a dog before?” she said as she cycled through the stop sign and continued driving. Scenery churned beyond the windows. “Other than Doc, I mean.”
His hand wandered along the upholstery. “I had a dog,” he said.

“What kind?”

He shrugged as the commercial ceased, and the beginnings of a drum beat tapped in the air, tinny and mostly beyond awareness. She couldn't identify the song. “Just a stray I picked up off the side of the road,” he said. “I found her abandoned in a broken crate.”

She smiled as she tried to imagine him managing a stray dog on his motorcycle. He must have had a car, too, then? Or, perhaps, this had occurred after his accident, and he’d had only a car and no motorcycle.

“So, you took in a stray before I knew you?” she said.

He winked. “Yes,” he said. “She was black and white with a patch around her left eye. She looked like some sort of border collie cross.”

A Buick passed the Cayenne going the other direction. The sound whooshed against the windows. “Was she a puppy?” Meredith said.

“Hmm,” he rumbled. “No, but young and still exhausting to own.”

“What was her name?”

“I named her Charlotte,” he said.

“Why Charlotte?”

“The patch around her eye always made me think of pirates, so I looked up pirate names.”

Another stop sign. She rolled the Cayenne to a stop. She'd become used to braking slowly to prevent jarring him, which drew her eyes to his body. He didn't use a pillow for support or protection anymore. She watched his body sway into the seat belt. He put his hand on the dash to support himself. The belt cut into him a little, but he didn't wince. Didn't grunt. Didn't seem uncomfortable whatsoever. See? said the voice she’d tried so hard to quell. He’s not in pain. Why would he be taking Percocet and not mentioning it? She gritted her teeth and tried to shove the thoughts away.

“There was a pirate named Charlotte?” she said forcing her brain back on the conversation.

“Charlotte de Berry,” he said.

“Was Charlotte an awesome pirate?”

He smirked. “Can a pillaging, plundering crook be awesome?”

“Fine,” she said with a huff. The engine rumbled. “Was Charlotte a horrible, dreadful, awful pirate?”

“She had a rather tragic tale, but she was spunky,” he said

“When did you own her?”

“I never owned a pirate,” he said.

She pushed at his shoulder. He grunted and brushed her hand away as he feigned hurt. Feigned.
The twinkle in his eyes and the erupting smile on his face told her he was faking. She couldn't have pushed him a month ago without hurting him, not without pulling every last ounce of force from the gesture. She could push him, now, without coddling. She could play with him again. That thought loitered, but she clenched her teeth, and forced it away.

“The dog, Derek,” she said.

“Hmm,” he said. “I was a second year resident. Addison was a bit mad when I brought Charlotte home.”

“Addison doesn't like dogs?” Meredith said.

“Addison does like dogs,” he said. “Or did when I was married to her, at least. But I didn't really discuss it with her first.”

Meredith couldn't stop the laugh that burbled from her lips.

He stared at her, a bewildered expression on his face. “What's funny?”

“It's just I've somehow convinced myself that you're a completely different person from your Manhattan incarnation. But that sounds just like you.”

He frowned. “I like to think I'm better trained, now.”

“I don't know, Mr. Let's-Make-Izzie's-Room-An-Office.”

“Ouch,” he said. He pressed his palm against his chest in a mock expression of pain. “Touché.”

“It's one of your less fun qualities,” she said.

He raised his eyebrows. A soft chuckle fell from him. “You mean I'm not completely perfect?”

“I know it's hard to believe, sometimes,” Meredith said. He leaned his elbow against the door and regarded her. His eyes twinkled, and a soft, small smile curved his lips. He seemed, in that moment, to exist outside of Gary Clark's influence. Blush crept across her face at his unblinking scrutiny. “What is it?” she said.

“Nothing.”

“What?”

“It's just... you make me feel perfect sometimes,” he said. His words bounced around the car cabin, and her breath caught at his sentiment. Even after more than a year of a committed, steady marriage, she still found reasons to be blown away. To know that she had such influence over another human being was, well, overwhelming. Her fingers tightened on the steering wheel. His face reddened as the silence stretched. He turned away. He shook his head and grunted. “That was corny.”

“That wasn't corny!” she insisted.

“It was a little corny, Mere,” he said. “Not one of my more suave moments.”

“Okay, it was corny,” she said. “But I officially don't care.”

“What about unofficially?” he said. “Unofficially is just as important.”
“Unofficially, I think it's kind of adorable.”

He snorted. “Meredith Grey thinks something is adorable?”

“Don't tell the dark-and-twisty club,” she said. “They'll pull my membership.”

“I won't tell the dark-and-twisty club if you don't tell the great-lines-to-say-on-a-date club.”

“This is a date?” she said.

“It's d-day,” he said. “We're here together. It's not dinner, a movie, or a craniotomy for two, but I'd say it's a date.”

She pushed her index finger into her thumb and drew her hand across her lip in a mock zipper motion, unable to stop the smile on her face from spreading wider as she did so. He grinned back at her. The air conditioning churned the scent of freon into the air, and the space between them fluttered with air currents.

“A date, then,” she agreed, and in that moment, she forgot everything.

Brake lights ahead of her flared. Her heart throbbed, and her stomach dropped in momentary panic. She gasped at the sight of the approaching solid ton of car sitting in front of them. She braked. The pedal hissed with the sudden motion. The Cayenne's tires skidded, and it slammed to a stop inches behind the car in front of them. Her seat belt dragged the breath from her body as momentum churned her toward the steering wheel. In the kaleidoscope of chain reactions, she heard him groan in pain. Real pain. Like when he'd been shot and struggling for air. Relief and shame crushed together in her head.

“Sorry!” she blurted. She glanced at him, even as the voice laughed.

“...You did that on purpose, didn't you? Just to see? Maybe...” Her fingers tightened on the steering wheel as she watched him.

“Are you okay?” she said. “I'm sorry.”

He swallowed, and he picked himself up off his seat belt. “It's okay,” he said. His voice sounded funny, and his pale face had paled a shade further. His lips pressed into a flat line, and he closed his eyes. His posture hunched, his shoulders curling protectively toward his injured chest. There was no way he was faking.

“I didn't mean to,” she insisted.

“I'm fine,” he said with a wheeze that rent her heart. “I just need a minute.”

She bit her lip as the car in front of her cleared the intersection. She pressed the accelerator and moved through the stop sign herself. She turned onto the final street. They were close. Assuming she didn't kill him on the way there. Idiot. Idiot, idiot, she cursed at herself. Her eyes pricked with tears at the realization that she'd intentionally hurt him. The Porsche logo on the steering wheel seemed to glare with recrimination at her.

“I'm really sorry,” she said again, helpless, as she tightened her grip against the steering wheel. She glanced at him. His expression had recovered. He watched the scenery pass by the windows. He didn't pant or wince. That made her feel a little better, but not a lot.

He shrugged. “You had to brake, Meredith. It happens.” She wiped her face with her right hand and couldn't stop a sniffl. His gaze shifted from the passing trees to her. His brow creased with concern. “Are you okay?”
“Fine,” she said.

“Meredith...”

“I didn't mean to hurt you,” she said in a small voice. “I'm sorry.”

Silence stretched as he regarded her. The hairs on the nape of her neck prickled under his scrutiny. “Meredith,” he said, “Are you sure you're... I mean, the dream you had...”

She didn't speak. The animal shelter came up on the left. The shelter was a medium-sized, single story building with a green awning and blue lettering. She turned on the left blinker and stared intently at the road ahead. No oncoming cars. She gunned the accelerator and pulled into the tiny, single-row parking lot. A scratched silver minivan sat in the space closest to the road. The Cayenne was a bit big to maneuver in the small lot. She managed to squeeze into the parking space farthest from the road, leaving a two space gap between the Cayenne and the minivan. She turned off the car, and the background sounds of classic rock cut off into silence. The car settled.

“We're here,” she announced.

He frowned. “Meredith—” he began, but he didn't have time to finish as a man and a woman exited the building with a bouncing, tail-wagging ball of happy energy. The scrappily tawny-colored mutt dog pranced at the end of the leash, his claws scraping on the pavement. The woman was heavy set with frizzy brown hair. The man was thinner but not thin. They both smiled, but Meredith didn't pay attention to that. Her heart squeezed at the sight of familiar, mocha-colored eyes.

“Derek, that's our dog,” Meredith said.

“What?”

“That's our dog,” she repeated. She watched as the man slid open the side of the minivan and guided the happy dog into the back seat. The dog yapped, and the man slid shut the door. The slam resounded in her head. Cars swished past on the busy road beyond, back and forth. “They're taking home our dog.”

“I'm sure it's just another dog that looks the same,” Derek said. “You called ahead, right?”

“I called after I saw him on the website,” she said. She gripped the steering wheel. A lump formed in her throat as the woman climbed into the passenger seat. The man walked around to the driver's side. The engine started. The white tail lights illuminated. The wheels inched backward. Through the tinted windows, Meredith watched the silhouette of the dog she'd seen on the animal shelter's website. She swallowed, and her eyes watered. “Derek...”

His hand touched her thigh. “Let's go in.”

“But, Derek—”

“Come on,” he said in a low, soothing voice. He popped his seat belt loose and opened his door. “Let's find out what happened.”

She watched, numb, as the minivan turned right and drove down the street. She watched until the animal shelter building obscured it. She imagined it barreling down the street to the light. It would turn right, and then it would disappear. Forever.

Her door opened, and Derek appeared beside her. His arms wrapped around her. “Come on, Mere,” he said. “I'm sure there's an explanation.” The reassuring scent of his aftershave swept over her.
She didn't speak as he leaned over her and un-clipped her belt. She slid out of the car. He hovered in her space and wrapped his arm over her shoulder like he expected her to fall over. Did she look that upset? She probably did. She swallowed. The lump in her throat swelled to the size of a softball, and her eyes burned.

She walked with Derek up a small flight of steps and through a glass door. The bell overhead dinged, and they were dumped into compact but bright foyer with a single row of chairs along the wall, and a desk with a computer and a receptionist at the end. Animal posters decorated the walls. Dog barks, from yips and yaps to deep, throaty bellows, interspersed with meows here and there, echoed in the air at a low, distant pitch.

The receptionist was a willowy woman with subtle wrinkles and age spots marring her light skin. She wore thick cuffs of gold bangles on her wrists, which jangled as she stopped typing at the computer and looked up. “Hello,” said the receptionist, who grinned. “How may I help you?”

Derek stretched out his hand and greeted the woman with a dashing smile. They shook hands. “Hi,” he said. “I'm Derek Shepherd.” He squeezed Meredith's shoulder and gestured with his free hand. “This is my wife, Meredith Grey. She called ahead about a dog she saw on the website, and —”

“And they took it!” Meredith blurted. “They took our dog.” Derek's grip on her shoulder tightened, but he said nothing.

“Who took what dog?” the receptionist asked.

“A couple just left with the dog Meredith called about,” Derek said.

“Hmm,” said the receptionist. She frowned. Through a blurry gaze, Meredith stared at the woman's name tag. Cassandra. “Oh, Lucky, right,” said Cassandra. She swept a lock of gray-dusted, black hair aside. “Yes, we just found his forever home today.”

“But I called about him!” Meredith said.

“Ma'am, I'm so sorry,” Cassandra said. Her voice was low and deep and rich and earthy. She sounded sincere, and her gray eyes expressed regret that, inexplicably, made Meredith want to claw off the woman's face. “We can't hold dogs for more than twenty-four hours,” Cassandra continued. She shook her head. “We have no way to know how serious a caller is until he or she shows up, and we can't pass up opportunities to place animals. There are too many who need homes.”

Meredith gritted her teeth. “Nobody told me that.”

“I'm really sorry, ma'am,” Cassandra said. “Do you know who you spoke to?”

The woman's eyebrows raised. “Marvin?”

“Yes, that's it,” Meredith said. She wiped at her face with her hands. “Marvin!”

Cassandra tapped something out on her keyboard and frowned as she read whatever popped up on her computer screen. “Well, Marvin did notate on the file that you'd called so that the dog wouldn't be euthanized.”

“He made me think you were holding the dog,” Meredith said.
“I'm really sorry, ma'am,” Cassandra repeated. “We'll talk to Marvin about it.”

“So, the dog is gone,” Meredith said. “He's just gone.”

“I'm so sorry. Would you like to see our other dogs? We have quite a few lovely animals who are looking for homes. I'm sure we could find one that's perfect for you and your husband.”

Meredith bit her lip as she stared at Cassandra. The woman looked truly apologetic, as if she understood that, to some people, pets were like children, or a dear friend, and a loss could be just as catastrophic. Except Meredith hadn't even met this dog. She'd only seen his picture. Her gut quivered as she remembered his soft, mocha-colored eyes staring at her from the picture on the website. She'd gushed over the picture with Lexie, and Meredith had called ahead specifically so something like this wouldn't happen. She'd known it would take at least a week for her and Derek to be able to visit the animal shelter together. She only had one day off a week, and sometimes those days didn't line up very well. She could get Sunday off one week and Saturday the next, for instance, making the space between her days off almost two weeks apart. It was luck of the draw, really, and she'd had crap luck that week.

She stared at Cassandra. She blinked. The sharp pieces of the room fuzzed. She blinked once more, and then she was crying. Like a freak. In the middle of the animal shelter. Over a dog she'd never even laid eyes upon.

“Oh, Meredith,” Derek said, and his grip around her tightened like a comforting cocoon. “I think we need a minute,” he said, his voice a low rumble over her head. She pressed her face against his shirt as blush exploded across her cheeks in a hot snarl.

“Of course,” Cassandra said. “I really do apologize for the confusion.”

“It happens,” Derek said. Just like he'd said when Meredith had slammed the brakes and hurt him.

Tears spilled in a deluge, and she couldn't stop. He moved her. She let him guide her, pliant. He backed her through the doorway they'd entered. Onto the outside stoop. Cars whooshed back and forth behind her. Breeze ruffled her hair with each whoosh. He shifted her around so his back faced the street. He rubbed her back, his body a warm, reassuring block against the cool wind. His fingers carved runnels into her damp hair. “What's wrong?” he said as he tried to soothe her. “We can find another dog. I'm sure there are dozens here.”

“But I wanted that one,” she said. “I thought...”

“Meredith,” he said, his voice low and worried. “Are you sure you're okay?”

“Do I look okay?” she snapped. “I'm crying like a freaking freak over a dog that was never ours.”

“You're not a freak,” he said. “I meant the miscarriage.”

Oh. She swallowed. “I... I'm,” she stuttered. Her throat closed up. He hugged her. “No,” she wailed.

“No?”

“I don't know.”

He sighed. “You put everything on hold for me,” he said. “Everything.”

“I didn't put everything on hold,” she said. She pushed away from him and clawed loose, scraggly hair out of her face. She wiped her cheeks with her hands and sniffed. “I really meant it when I said I was okay. I've been okay.”

He raised his eyebrows. He touched her chin and tipped up her gaze to meet his. “This is okay?” he said.

“This isn't okay right this second, but I'm okay overall,” she said. “It just... I wanted that dog.”

“I know, but at least he found a home, and I'm sure he'll be really happy. He looked happy.”

“But he won't be ours!” she said.

He regarded her for a long, silent moment. The roar of cars bounced against the building and echoed back into the space between them. The breeze chilled her. He wrapped his body around hers again. She let him stay. She rested, cheek and ear to his chest. If it'd been quiet, she might have been able to hear his heart beat. She settled for feeling the warmth of his skin soaking through his shirt. His palm stroked her spine.

“Scale of one to ten,” he said. “How bad is it today?”

She swallowed and sniffled. “Six, I guess,” she said. “Maybe five.” She brushed her index finger under her nose. That would be perfect. Getting snot all over his shirt. She looked up at him. “You?”

“Eight.”

“Eight?” she exclaimed. Her stomach sank into her shoes. God, what a... Guilt wrapped around her heart and squeezed and squeezed and squeezed. She'd run him into the seat belt to see if he would wince. She'd cried on him. She'd wailed about a stupid dog. He felt like an eight, and yet he'd talked with and smiled at the receptionist as though he hadn't been rendered unnaturally shy by trauma. As though nothing had ever been wrong with him. He felt like an eight, and yet his hand still stroked her spine and didn't stop. The relaxing cadence of his soothing almost toppled her resolve to stay upset. Almost.

“You said you were okay,” she said. “Derek, eight is really—”

“Better than ten,” he said in a soft voice. “I'm... okay.”

“Are you sure?” she said. Her heart broke over the fact that he could ever think eight was okay. That he'd been living at ten so long eight felt decent in comparison. “It's okay if you want to go home, or maybe we could—”

“Do you want to go home?” he asked.

She frowned. “No,” she said in a small voice. “No, I want to get a dog.”

“Are you sure?” he said.

She nodded. She brushed the last of her tears away. “I want a dog,” she said. “It's still d-day.”

He kissed her forehead. “Okay.”

“Why?” she said. “Are you not sure?”

He shook his head. “Let's go.”

She swallowed. “Home?”
He smiled. “Inside.”

They returned to the lobby. “Can we see what dogs you have, now?” Derek said, and Cassandra was happy to assist. She interviewed them as she led them into the back and down a long hallway. What did they do for a living? Why did they want a dog? Did they have a big yard? General questions that Meredith supposed would help her get a feel for whether Meredith and Derek were suitable dog parents. They passed another woman mopping the halls. She had a volunteer name tag on her green polo shirt, and she smiled and waved as Derek, Meredith, and Cassandra walked past.

The barking noises made a crescendo as Cassandra led them into a wide room with a gray concrete floor. Rows of long, fluorescent ballasts lit the room, giving the space an odd, silvery glow. Chain-link fences rose from floor to ceiling and formed rows of cubicles, each row about five cages deep. Each cage had a water bowl, a food dish, some squeaky toys, and a dog. The taps of claws on pavement skittered into the walls and echoed back and forth amongst the barking, creating aural chaos. There were little dogs. Big dogs. Medium dogs. Noisy dogs. Quiet dogs. Shaggy dogs. Nearly bald dogs.

For a moment, Meredith stood frozen at the end of the row, overwhelmed with the selection. There hadn't been nearly this many dogs the last time she'd been here. “What's our strategy?” she said.

Derek grabbed her hand. “We need a strategy?”

“I don't know,” Meredith said. “Do we?”

He shrugged. “Let's just walk the aisles first and see what they have.”

“Okay,” Meredith said. She nodded. “Walk. Walking. We can do that.”

“Just let me know if you have any questions,” Cassandra called after them. She folded her arms and leaned against the wall by the door.

Derek smiled at the woman. His teeth flashed. “Thank you,” he said, his voice soft and polite.

Meredith stepped into the first row with him by her side. A little brown and white chihuahua bounded up to the fence, his tiny tail wagging miles a minute as he stuck his button nose through the fence. She knelt down to scratch its ears through the fence. Soft fur touched her fingertips. A warm, wet tongue pressed against her skin. She knew Derek wouldn't want a chihuahua, but she couldn't help the grin that split her face as she received a tongue bath from the little creature.

“This one is cute!” she said.

“Just walk,” he said. “See which ones react well, first. We'll come back to those.”

She brushed her hands on her jeans and stood. The chihuahua looked mournfully at her. “React well?” she said.

“The ones who come up to say hello instead of cower or growl,” he said. He pointed at the chihuahua, whose tail wagged back and forth like a windshield wiper set on high. “Like that one. He's an obvious people dog.”

She grinned. “But he's small and yappy. And you don't want small and yappy. You said so. I remember.”

“Well,” he said. He stared down the long line of rows beyond the chihuahua. “I'm sure there's a bigger version of him in here somewhere.”
She bumped her hip against him. “I thought you said we didn't need a strategy.”

“That's not really a strategy,” he countered. “It's walking.”

They stopped in front of the cage next to the chihuahua. A bedraggled, shaggy brown mop that reminded her of Doc cowered in the back corner. He – or she? – didn't come to the fence greet them. It stayed in the back corner, looking traumatized and alone. Meredith bit her lip and forced her shoulders straight. If she felt bad about every trauma case in this room, this was going to be a long selection process. They moved on.

“So, what makes you the expert?” Meredith said.

Derek shrugged. “Did you ever own a dog other than Doc?”

“No,” she said. “My mother didn't like pets, and my twenties were a black hole of irresponsibility, sex, and drinking.”

He smirked. “Lesbian sex?”

“I told you,” she said. “You'll never pry it out of me. My lips are sealed.”

“Are they?” he said, his voice a low purr. He leaned into her.

“What—” she managed before he covered her mouth with his and kissed her, and her words became a squeak stuck in the back of her throat. The mint of his toothpaste swept into her body as he pressed in with his tongue. He tasted good. Her eyes closed. She clutched his shirt to keep from falling into a tailspin. She drew in a deep breath as their noses mashed. When he pulled back, she saw little dark spots dancing under the lights overhead. Her body throbbed. More, please, her insides screamed. Please? She swallowed, and she brushed her hand against her lips. He'd scorched her, and she felt swollen. Unfulfilled.

“Okay, they're not that sealed, but...” She blinked, trying to regain her senses. She watched him lick his lips and couldn't help watch the glisten of his saliva, or the way his eyes had dilated into wanting pools of onyx. His eyes twinkled. “Hmm,” she said, imitating his favored expression, and then she shook her head. She shoved at him, and he fell back a step. He laughed. “Mean,” she said. “You're mean, and you're taking advantage. We're supposed to be picking a dog.”

He nodded. “A dog, right.”

“New strategy.” She poked her index finger into his chest, careful not to press. “No kissing.”

Light danced in his eyes. “That's a tough one.”

“We'll manage, somehow,” she said.

They passed some sort of lab mix. A scragglly beagle. A husky mix with ice blue eyes. Another row full of dogs, big and small. And then Derek stopped so abruptly, she plowed into his back. He grunted on the impact. She grabbed his shoulder for balance, only to let go when she realized what she'd done. Just because he didn't hurt as much anymore didn't mean she could hang off his shoulders as though he were a coat rack. She shook her head and forced the spear of guilt away. He hadn't winced or expressed pain. No harm, no foul.

“What are you stopping for?” she said.

She froze as he knelt by the fence and stared into the cage. A big black dog with a russet-colored feet and a dusting of russet around its mouth rose to its paws and walked to the fence. The claws on its feet tapped on the floor as it moved. Derek held his hand out. The dog sniffed the air by the fence. It didn't bark. Or whine. Or make any noise at all. It pushed against the fence. Its broad black nose wouldn't fit through the chain links. It stared with soft brown eyes, mocha-colored like the original dog that had brought them here. The dog's tail had been docked, but the stump twitched back and forth. The dog sat, and it looked at Derek with an expectant, quiet gaze.

"Hi there," Derek said, his voice soft and low.

He put his fingers near the fence. Meredith tensed. But the dog didn't snap or snarl. A big, wet, pink tongue slipped out from its powerful jaws, and the dog licked him. A smile crept across Derek's face.

"Hi," Derek said again.

"I think this is a rottweiler," Meredith said.

Derek shifted to read the placard on the cage wall by the latch. "A rottweiler mix," he said as he scanned the placard. "Samantha." The dog's ears twitched as he read its name. Derek dragged his hand along the fence. The dog followed him. When he stopped, the dog sat and watched with knowing eyes. Derek pressed his hand closer and received another lick. "Hi, Samantha," he said. "What are you doing here?"

"Rottweilers are bite-y and mean," Meredith said. "Aren't they? I mean, statistically speaking, most bites are——"

"Pit bulls."

"And then rottweilers, Derek," she said.

After working in the emergency room, she knew her dog bite statistics. She'd seen any number of wounds, from simple teeth marks to ravaged flesh and bloody muscle, but as she watched Derek watch Samantha, she had a sinking suspicion that trying to stop this love affair would be futile. He liked this dog. A lot. A freaking rottweiler. With a big, broad, hundred pound body, dangerous teeth, and staggering bite force gifted to it by its wide jaws. Even give or take a few pounds on her eyeball estimate, she barely weighed more than the dog did.

"Unfortunately, rottweilers have a very strong drive to protect that can be turned into aggression with bad training or bad breeding," Cassandra said, and Meredith jumped. She hadn't even heard the receptionist approach. Cassandra smiled apologetically. "I'm sorry," she said. "I couldn't help but overhear." Derek broke his unblinking gaze on the dog and rose to his feet. Cassandra glanced from Derek to Meredith. "Toward their own families, rottweilers are actually average dogs as far as aggression goes."

"So, they're mean and bite-y with strangers?" Meredith said.

"Most rottweilers aren't aggressive — that's more stigma than truth — but the ones who are aggressive typically display the behavior more often with strangers," Cassandra said.

"Can I see this one in a private room?" Derek said.

"Sure," Cassandra said. "Let me see if our play room is open. If not, I'm sure we can find something somewhere for you."

"But, Derek..." Meredith said as Cassandra left them alone again.
“What?” he said.

Meredith swallowed. He looked sold. Already. He’d found his dog. She glanced at Samantha. Samantha's jaws parted, and her tongue lolled as she tilted her head to the side in an innocent-but-smiling dog version of, Who, me? Despite her size and her intimidating looks, Samantha was pretty cute. Her broad face had an expressive quality to it. An understanding, sage demeanor. The dog stared. Meredith blinked as the subtle feeling of approaching a cliff hit her senses. She looked away.

Meredith sighed and returned her gaze to Derek. “I know that you want a good guard dog, but this is a rottweiler.”

“A rottweiler mix,” he said.

“Whatever!” she said. “The point is I'm not even sure if my home owner's insurance will cover it.”

He stuck his hand by the bars. Samantha sniffed and then licked. “The woman said the ones who are aggressive are more aggressive with strangers,” he said.

“So?” Meredith said.

“So, we're strangers, and look at her.”

The dog, who had yet to speak, barked. Once. As if she understood the gravity of this situation. As if to say, Please, I want a home. I promise I won't bite. She had a deep voice. Substantial. One that would be scary to any intruder stupid enough to wander into a home with a rottweiler residing. But she sounded almost melodious at the same time. She sat by the fence, and her tongue lolled as she panted. Derek held his hand by the chain link fence again. Samantha pressed her nose against the fence and licked him through the chains. Again.

“Well, that's true,” Meredith said. “She's pretty lovey, I guess.”

“She's not mouthy,” he said. “She hasn't put my fingers or wrist in her mouth. She's only licked.”

“She can't fit her nose through the fence even if she were mouthy,” Meredith said. “She's big.”

He pushed his index finger through the fence, and she tensed as she watched his livelihood resting next to jaws that could snap his bones. Samantha's tongue appeared once more. She licked. That was all. And then she stared at Meredith. Give me a chance, her expression said. I'm a good dog. Honest.

The cliff approached, and Meredith couldn't tear her eyes away. She swallowed. “Well...”

Cassandra returned carrying a brown leather leash, and again, Meredith jumped when the woman announced her presence with a cheerful, “All right. The play room is open.” Cassandra approached the latch on the cage. Samantha backed away from the door. The remnant of her tail wagged back and forth, and she sat. Patiently. Cassandra stepped into the cage and leashed Samantha. Cassandra jiggled the leash once, and Samantha stood, but she didn't barrel through the door or push her way through. She waited for Cassandra to exit first and then followed.

“We're trying to have a baby,” Meredith said as Cassandra led them down the row of cages.

“Oh?” Cassandra said. “Congratulations!”

“But, I mean...” Meredith swallowed. “Are rottweilers good with kids? Little kids?”
“Rottweilers can be excellent, loyal, loving family dogs,” Cassandra replied.

They walked out of the main area with all the barking dogs. The door closed behind them, and the barking decreased in volume. Cassandra led Meredith, Derek, and the dog down a small white hallway, to a twelve-by-twelve room at the end. The room had a counter top and a hand sink along the side, but was otherwise bare. Samantha's nails tapped on the scratched, tiled floor as they entered.

Meredith glanced at Derek, but he was watching Samantha. Not her. The dog peered at the new environment with a curious gaze. She sniffed the floor. Cassandra let her wander the edges of the room, exploring. The dog didn't pull when her leash ran out of slack. She changed directions and explored further in the provided radius.

“I'm just not sure this is a good idea,” Meredith said.

Cassandra nodded. “Most bites involving children from any dog involve lack of supervision. Teach your child to treat the dog respectfully, and never leave them alone together before the child is old enough to know better about pulling tails and stealing dog food, no matter what. Even if you're just going into the next room to pick up the phone. That's advice I give everyone, not just rottweiler parents.”

“Is she socialized with kids?” Derek said.

“I believe so,” Cassandra said. “She greets every family that walks through, kids included.”

Derek nodded. “Why is she here?”

“The owner couldn't keep her anymore.”

“Why?” Meredith said. “Behavior issues?”

“No, nothing like that,” Cassandra said. “I don't know the specifics, but I gather there was a death in the family, which caused some unexpected financial burdens.”

A lump formed in Meredith's throat as she watched Samantha finish her circuit of the room. She sat by Cassandra's feet and stared at them. Samantha didn't bark. Or pull on the leash. Or bounce around in a kinetic frenzy of muscle and fur. She watched, a hopeful light in her brown eyes, as the stump of her tail wagged back and forth.

Meredith wondered who in the family had died. Samantha's person? Or maybe Samantha's person's person? The dog had been trained rigorously. That much was obvious. Which meant the owner had spent a lot of time with her. And now that owner was gone. A deep, chilling sense of loss swelled inside of Meredith, and the room flashed away for an instant.

Please, don't die, she'd begged. Please, Derek. You can't leave me.

She blinked, and the bright room with its painful fluorescence pierced her memories. She stared at Derek, haunted, and pushed closer to him. His arm wrapped around her waist. Warmth pressed against her. She swallowed, and she glanced at Samantha. Samantha whined, as if she could sense distress, and moved to Meredith's legs, where she sat, her broad body pressing into Meredith's knees, not so hard as to trip her, but more like... Support. The dog stared at Meredith, and Meredith's eyes watered as she peered into concerned brown eyes.

“She likes you,” Cassandra said.
“Yeah,” Meredith said. She pushed the word out of her throat before her voice could crack. Anthropomorphizing. She was being irresponsible, and projecting, and... Derek frowned at her. A concerned expression spread across his face, almost a perfect match for Samantha's, and her grief turned into a chuckle. “Yeah,” she said, and this time her voice didn't falter. Derek stroked her back.

Samantha stared up at her, and a sliver of doubt pierced Meredith's haze. This wasn't anthropomorphizing. Maybe dogs didn't have people feelings, but dogs had feelings. They helped sick people by offering comfort – she'd seen it any number of times at Seattle Grace. That's why so many support groups used animals. Dogs guarded their families. They could experience grief. Maybe not people grief, but grief. She'd read too many stories about dogs who wouldn't eat after their owners had died, or...

She swallowed.

“How long has she been here?” Meredith said.

“A while,” Cassandra replied. “She's not a puppy. She's an unpopular breed. And we typically have a hard time placing black dogs.”

“Really?” said Derek. “Why?”

Cassandra shrugged. “It's been speculated that they don't stand out as well in their cages. Plus, they have a bad rap, courtesy of Hollywood.”

“Do you like her?” Meredith said.

Cassandra smiled, and her voice dropped in pitch to something conspiratorial. “Truth be told, she's my favorite dog here. I'd take her home if my husband hadn't put his foot down about more pets. We already have three dogs and two cats.”

“Could we have a small bowl and kibble?” Derek said.

“Absolutely,” Cassandra said. “Spend some time together. See if you mesh well. I'll be back in a few minutes with some kibble and a few toys.” She handed the leash to Derek. He grasped the leather lead. Samantha watched, and Cassandra left, leaving them in silence.

“What do you think so far?” Derek said.

“I don't know,” Meredith said.

He nodded. “Would you hold the leash?”

“Sure,” she said. She took the leash from Derek. The braided leather felt thick and substantial in her grasp. Samantha didn't pull or try to back away, despite the fact that she could easily overpower Meredith if she wished.

Derek knelt on the ground. His jeans skidded on the dirty floor. Meredith watched his muscles bunch, watched his hands as he stretched into the dog’s personal space. He put his palm on Samantha's neck, and he stroked her head to stumpy tale.

“What are you doing?” Meredith said, watching with fascination as he ran his hands along the shiny black coat. He touched the dog’s ribs and stomach. He stroked Samantha legs to the paws. He touched the dog’s face, at which point Samantha pushed forward, but only to lick Derek's face.
A laugh chuffed from his lips as he rolled back onto his haunches and stood. “She's not skittish at all,” Derek said.

“She is pretty sweet,” Meredith admitted. She gave the leash back to Derek.

Cassandra returned with a bowl of food and a chew toy, and Meredith watched as Derek put the bowl down and tried to pet the dog while she ate. Her tongue rasped against the bowl. Wet, slopping sounds filled the air as Samantha shoveled food. She didn't snap or snarl as Derek touched her. She stopped chewing on her kibble, looked at him, cocked her head, and whuffed, as if to say, I'm eating right now. I'll play in a minute. Then she buried her face in the kibble once more.

“She is pretty well-mannered,” Meredith said. “Is she house-broken?”

“Yes,” Cassandra said.

When Samantha finished her kibble, Derek threw the chew toy. Nails scrabbled on the floor. The dog launched at it and caught it in her mouth at the far corner of the room. She yipped, a deep, energetic bark that dripped with ecstasy. Cassandra laughed as Samantha groaned and rolled onto her back, exposing her black belly to the ceiling. Her paws flopped. She chewed.

“She's a bit of a clown sometimes,” Cassandra said.

They took the dog for a walk in the small yard behind the shelter next. Though it had been sunny that day, the rain had been torrential the day before, and reminders of the downpour had slicked the earth into a muddy mess. Footprints of all sizes, both people and dog, marred the wet earth, and only wisps of grass remained un-flattened by the weight of water. A chewed, dirty yellow Frisbee rested by the far fence. A tennis ball marked the middle of the space like a chartreuse cherry on top of a sundae.

Derek held the leash in his loose grasp. Samantha didn't pull or leap or run. She trotted across the sopping earth until she ran out of slack, looked back, and Meredith smiled as she saw that familiar head-tip again. Why aren't you walking faster? This is mud, and I like mud, Samantha seemed to be saying. But she didn't press the issue when Derek didn't speed up. She slowed to a loping walk that showed off her powerful muscles and stocky legs.

“I think you were holding out on me,” Meredith said as they took a lap around the small yard.

Derek didn't tear his eyes from the dog. The dirt made sucking noises underneath Meredith's feet, and Derek's cross trainers splurched in a soaked, deep patch of mud. “Holding out?” he said as he bit his lip and navigated around the obstacle.

“You so totally had a dog-picking strategy, Derek. This whole time.”

“I read a guide on how to pick a shelter dog,” he said.

“You did?” she said. He didn't have a chance to answer before slippery mud gave way, and the earth sent her sliding.

“Don't fall!” he said with a soft laugh, and he caught her. His arms wrapped around her body, and her fall became stillness. She rested against him, breathing as he held her.

Samantha, excited by the commotion, barked once, twice. She circled them in a wide arc, drawing the leash around their hips. She ended by Derek's knees, barked once in approval of her handiwork, and sat beside them, staring up with her tongue lolling in a dog-version of a smile. Her cheerful brown gaze dashed back and forth between them as though she were watching a tennis match.
Meredith stared at Derek. His blue eyes met hers, but in the bright daylight and broad shadows, they seemed almost gray or green or a sea-washed mix of the two. “I think your clown dog is trying to get us to kiss,” Meredith said.

“My clown dog?” he said.

Samantha barked as if to say, Yes, please.

Meredith couldn't help but laugh. “She must have heard about our no kissing strategy or something.”

“I told you it would be a tough strategy to follow, Mere,” he said. He closed the meager distance between them, and he pressed his lips against her forehead. He held the leash in one hand over her shoulder. With the thumb of his other hand, he traced the sharp edge of her jaw and tipped up her gaze. He stared at her. “Do you like her, Mere?”

Meredith swallowed. “I know it's not fair, but her breed worries me.”

He frowned. “How much?”

“Just a little,” she said.

“I wouldn't ever want to get a dog that might hurt our kid, Mere,” he said. “I just...” He ran a frustrated hand through his hair. He glanced at the big black matchmaker at their feet and sighed.

Meredith smiled. “You just like her.”

“I do,” he said. “But we can put her back if you really aren't comfortable with her. This is supposed to be our dog. Not my dog.”

She grabbed the leash from his hand. He relinquished his hold without hesitation. She stared down at Samantha. “Unwrap, please.” Samantha didn't quite seem to get it, and so Meredith found herself spinning around Derek's lithe body. She pointed to the far fence. “Go over there, Derek,” she said.

“Why?”

“I want a minute with her without you making puppy eyes at me.”

“Puppy eyes?”

“Yes,” Meredith said. “You have this expression you use when you want something that makes you impossible to resist, and I want to make a non-brainwashed decision.”

“Brainwashed,” he said.

“Yes,” she insisted. “Brainwashed.”

He raised his eyebrows. “You think I brainwash you?” he said.

She snorted. “You know you brainwash me. I have a weakness for the word please whenever it's uttered by you, and you know it.”

He scoffed. “Have I said please?”

“Not yet,” she said. “Go away before you can't resist the urge anymore.”
He smirked. “I love you, too,” he said, and he sauntered to the far side of the yard. He caught his elbow against the top rung of the fence, and he leaned as he stared at her with a dark-but-mischievous look. His eyes sparkled. Her heart sped as she took in the sight of him in frayed, threadbare jeans, his tight shirt, muddy shoes, hair askew, and a light dusting of stubble that never seemed to go away no matter how much he shaved.

“No leaning!” Meredith said.

“I can't lean now, either?”

“Just go away,” she said. “Seriously.”

He laughed. His teeth flashed as his lips parted, and her body began to melt at the sight of him enjoying the moment in his full, snarky glory. “I'll go inside,” he said after he'd recovered. He pulled his fingers through his hair, and he winked at her. “But when I get back, I'm leaning.” His gaze on her lingered. Samantha stepped forward and whined, but she didn't pull on the leash. Her feet splashed in the mud.

“He'll be back in a minute,” Meredith said as she watched Derek slip through the doorway. His silhouette hovered in the glass pane a moment longer, and then even that disappeared as he gave her her requested lean-free, please-free, Derek-free space.

Meredith brushed the braided leash with her fingertips. The bumps in the leather felt smooth under her palm. Slightly oily. Well-used. Black, aged streaks marred light brown leather that had, at one point, probably been resplendent. She wondered how many dogs this leash had brought outside to meet their prospective parents.

Samantha sat at Meredith's feet.

“Hi, Samantha,” Meredith said. The dog's ears ticked at the sound of her name, and her head shifted. “Or do you prefer Sam?”

Samantha stared.

“I guess you have no idea what I'm talking about,” Meredith said. She reached with her palm and put her hand flat against the dog's skull. Soft, silky fur touched her hand. The dog whuffed and pressed into Meredith's hand, forcing the motion to become a full blown stroke from the top of the dog’s head and down her neck. Samantha's remaining bit of tail wagged, and Meredith couldn't help but repeat the stroke. The dog had a soft coat. Really soft. And shiny. And the dog was sort of relaxing just to pet. Meredith bit her lip.

“You like my husband, don't you?” Meredith said, which felt a little stupid. As smart as she suspected this dog was, it wouldn't understand a question like that. Or respond. Just like it hadn't understood the preference question.

Meredith glanced around the yard. Beyond the wooden fence, parked cars spread out in a sea of metal sparkling in the sunlight, and she wondered if she'd parked in the wrong spot. In the distance beyond that, a large hill rose up into the sky. Houses buried in green trees dotted the rolling horizon. A man rode by on a yellow bicycle down the street that ran parallel to the parking lot. The bicycle wheels squeaked. In the background, she could hear the roar of cars from the busy street in front of the shelter.

Meredith stroked Samantha's head once more. She laughed when the dog licked her and then watched with a bright gaze. More, please, said Samantha's eyes.
“You are sweet, aren't you?” Meredith said.

Samantha shook her black coat as she stood. Meredith took a lap around the muddy yard with her. The dog ambled with a lazy gait. Samantha remained beside Meredith, her body pressing against Meredith's legs. Again, not hard. Not as an obvious attempt to get Meredith to fall over or some sort of dominance play. Just... reassuring.

Meredith stroked Samantha's back. In all Meredith's days, she'd never expected to be in the back lot of an animal shelter, petting a clown rottweiler who liked chew toys and kissing. “Derek's had a really rough time, and he's pretty sad right now,” she said. “Do you think you could maybe help with that? He's trying not to be pushy about it, but he likes you.”

Samantha said nothing.

The faucet dripped and mingled with the sounds of her sniffles. Meredith brushed her nose with the back of her palm. She sat on the toilet seat, shaking. Beyond the blur of her tears, the floor tiles and stained grout spaced and separated as her eyes slipped out of focus.

The door to the restroom swung open, and Meredith winced. She swallowed, trying to force her tears into silence. She didn't want to deal with questions. She couldn't do this. She couldn't. Not right now.

“Meredith Grey,” said Dr. Bailey's soft, rich voice, “I know you're in here. I'm not leaving until you come out.”

Meredith shook her head and stood. She unlatched the door, and she stepped out to face the wolves. Or wolf, really. Just one. The long row of bathroom stalls spread out like a firing squad at her back. Dr. Bailey stared, her eyebrows raised. Meredith scrubbed her face. Her stomach churned with sickening flips and flops, unsettled and unable to deal with the pancakes she'd eaten while Derek had been receiving his post-op scans.

“I'm sorry,” Meredith said. Her throat felt full. She swallowed. The remnant taste of syrup nauseated her. A red-eyed Medusa reflected from the mirror back at her. Meredith pushed loose, tangled hair away from her face.

“I'm not the one who needs an apology,” said Dr. Bailey.

Derek had been crying when Dr. Bailey had returned him to his ICU room. Crying. Unmoving. Silent. His eyes had gotten wet the night before, but Meredith had gotten the distinct impression that his pain had been emotional, and she'd left him alone to sort things out. This time, though? Physical. He'd hurt so badly he cried. All he'd done was stare at the ceiling while his eyes leaked, as though his body were some sort of torture chamber and his soul had been left on the rack. He hadn't tried to reassure her. He'd just lain there. She'd never seen Derek cry before, not like that, and the sight of him suffering that much had snapped her. She'd fled the room to keep him from seeing her fall apart all over again.

“I'm...” Meredith's voice cracked. Tears exploded in a deluge, and she couldn't breathe. “I don't know what to do. Please, I don't... I can't. I'm. I... He's...”

Dr. Bailey's gaze softened. “I had the nurse increase his morphine. He's doing much better.”

“His scans—”

“Were absolutely fine for a man who's been shot in the chest,” Dr. Bailey said. “Which I would have told you if you hadn't bolted like your damned hair was on fire.”
“Then why is he—”

“Anesthesia, Grey,” said Bailey. “It’s all gone, now. And you, as one of Seattle Grace’s most talented residents, should know that.”

“I’m sorry,” Meredith said.

Dr. Bailey shook her head. “Again, wrong person.”

“When I saw him...”

Dr. Bailey nodded. “I know it’s hard.”

“He’s really hurt,” said Meredith. “I just don’t know what to do. I want it to be better, and I—”

Meredith sighed as Dr. Bailey’s warm hand touched her shoulder. Meredith met Dr. Bailey’s hard gaze. “You go back in there, and you sit with him,” Dr. Bailey said. “That’s what you do. Just like you’ve been doing all night. And that’s what will make it better.”

“Okay,” Meredith said in a small voice. “Okay.” She wiped her face once more. She swallowed down against the clot in her throat. She smoothed her shirt as she tried to muster resolve.

And that’s when Dr. Bailey’s lip quivered. Meredith froze at the odd sight. “He lived, Dr. Grey,” Dr. Bailey said. Dr. Bailey blinked, and her eyes seemed to swim, but no tears fell. “Some didn’t.”

“I know,” Meredith said, her voice soft.

They stood in silence, sharing pain for several moments, before Dr. Bailey's forlorn look shifted into a glare. “Well?” she snapped. “Go sit with your fool husband.”

By the time Meredith returned to Derek’s ICU cubicle, her tears had dried, and her eyes had stopped burning quite as much. She hoped she didn't look like some sort of scary freak monster. Derek lay in a mess of wires and periwinkle blankets, unmoving, eyes closed. Meredith glanced at his heart monitor. Fine. He did look better. His breaths rasped softly in the quiet space instead of jabbing at the air like knives. When she sat, the stool Nurse Kent had left behind for her squawked.

Derek shifted. His eyes opened to slivers.

“It's just me,” said Meredith.

His lips spread into a wide, lazy smile. “Hey,” he said, the word stretched and quiet. His eyes shut.

“Hey,” she replied. “I'm sorry I left, Derek. I'm really sorry.”

She waited for condemnation, but it never arrived. She watched his chest rise and fall. His hair hung in a lusterless, greasy shell around his head that was, over the hours, turning to untamed frizz. Stubble had sprouted all across his face in a prickly forest. His skin was pale, and he looked...

Sick.

The lump returned to her throat, and her eyes pricked. Her inner volcano of stifled grief threatened to erupt. She tensed, but she forced herself to lean forward and pet his arm and his hand. His soft skin pressed back against her fingertips. She couldn't help but glance at the intravenous line snaking into his vein.
At least he'd relaxed. Red still hugged the skin around his eyes, and his temples glistened with the evaporating skeletons of what had been tears.

She bit her lip. “Do you feel better?”

“Bailey gave me more morphine,” he said, though his vowels stuck in his mouth and took forever to complete. Another smile stretched across his face. He blinked, and his eyelids rested at half-mast.

A shaky laugh fell from her lips. “I know,” she said. She grabbed his hand and squeezed. “I know she did.”

“M’okay, Mere,” he muttered. “You shh... shouldn’ worry.”

She sniffed and brushed his face. “No pain, now?”

“Even if there was,” he said, his voice soft and weary. “I don' think I'd remember it.”

He drifted, then. She let him sleep while she watched.

In the silence, Meredith's eyes watered. She sniffed and wiped her face with her palms. “I don't know why I'm being so emotional today,” she told the dog. “I've really been okay.”

Samantha had no answers for her.

Meredith wandered to the center of the yard and picked up the lone tennis ball. Dark stains smudged the chartreuse fur of the ball, and it smelled like wet dog, but, given that she'd been given a tongue bath already, today, the unsanitary nature of the toy didn't seem to matter much. She squeezed her hand around the dirty ball.

“Do you like to play fetch?” Meredith said. Samantha's gaze traced the ball as it moved. Her tail wagged. “Guess so,” said Meredith.

Meredith un-cliped the leash and let the tennis ball fly across the yard. The ball bounced off the back fence. The dog launched. Her claws had no traction on the wet earth, and for what felt like eons, Samantha churned ground, but didn't move. Mud and water spewed everywhere. Flecks of dirt landed on Meredith's jeans. And her shirt. And her face. She laughed as she watched Samantha gain a foothold and fly after the ball, which had settled in the muck. The dog barked. She attacked the ball with gleeful ferocity and chewed it with her big, chomp-y jaws as she trotted back to Meredith with her bounty. The dog dropped the ball at Meredith's feet, sat on her haunches, looked up and barked. “Again!” said her gaze.

For several minutes, the pair of them played a sedate game of fetch. On what Meredith intended to be the last throw, she tossed the ball against the fence, but with the force of her throw, the wet earth churned underneath her as though she'd stepped on a banana peel. Just like in the cartoons. She careened hands first into the mud with a shriek. A hundred pounds of muddy dog danced around her in an excited circle and then bounded for the fence. Cold, wet dirt seeped through her jeans and drenched her socks as Meredith clawed for footing. By the time she struggled to her feet, she imagined she looked a bit like Frankenstein with her hair in frenetic, dirty disarray and mud streaking her clothes and skin. She found Samantha staring up at her, yellow ball in her mouth. Samantha dropped the tennis ball at Meredith's muddy feet and woofed.

Meredith stood there, muddy and disheveled, and she laughed. She couldn't stop. This was so ridiculous.
“Okay,” Meredith said. “I guess we can keep you if Derek lets you in his car after this.”

The muddy dog whuffed with appreciation and stood still while Meredith re-clipped the leash. Meredith brought the dog back inside the shelter building and slogged down the empty hallway. She found Derek talking with the receptionist around the corner. He leaned against the wall. Leaned!

Meredith snorted as she approached, muddy dog trailing behind. Cassandra and Derek both stared at her. Derek's jaw dropped, but he closed it before speaking. He straightened. She watched worry creep into his gaze. His expression danced, and she could see the words on the tip of his tongue.

Jesus Christ, what happened? He'd say it just like that. If he were to open his mouth. He didn't.

“Let's take her home,” Meredith said.

He blinked. “Really?” he said.

“Yes, really. I think she deserves a chance.”

“Okay,” he said. For a moment, he stared. His gaze traced her head to toe. He didn't say anything about the mud on her or the dog. “If your insurance won't cover it, I'll find a policy that does. I'll pay for it, Mere.”

“We'll figure it out,” Meredith said.

Cassandra grinned. “Wonderful! Let's go fill out the paperwork.” She glanced at Samantha. “And maybe we can get one of the techs to give this girl a bath. Sorry for the mud outside.”

Meredith shrugged. “It's Seattle. There's mud.”

“Spoken like a native,” said Cassandra.

Meredith handed Derek the muddy leash. He took it without a grimace or a comment. “You do the paperwork,” she said. “I'm dripping dirt.”

She left him gaping at her as she went to the bathroom to clean up her hair and face. Her clothes were a loss, but she could make herself a bit less like an automatic stain on Derek's upholstery. Maybe. Possibly. Nope, she decided after spending twenty minutes scraping at herself with a paper towel. In fact, after careful work, she felt a bit like all she'd done was grind dirt further into her jeans. She gave up.

She found Derek sans dog in the lobby, filling out the pet owner's agreement with a gold ball point pen that he had to stop and shake for ink twice as she approached. She plopped into the chair next to him just as he signed his name on the dotted line. He handed her the pen and the clipboard. She signed underneath his name. Meredith Grey.

In another twenty minutes, a tall, wiry man with brown hair and blue eyes led Samantha from the back of the shelter. Her damp fur was free of mud and glossy. Meredith watched the man as he left Samantha with Cassandra at the front desk. His name tag said Marvin.

Meredith bit her lip. She watched Derek as he watched the dog. The skin around his eyes crinkled, and he watched the newest addition to their family trot toward him. A smile curved his lips as Cassandra smiled, brought him the dog, and said, “All right. I'll take the forms. You take the dog. Thank you so much for supporting the animal shelter.”
Samantha barked once, and after they'd all exchanged a few last minute pleasantries and Cassandra had double checked the forms, Derek, Meredith, and Samantha left through the glass door. The bell dinged overhead, signaling their departure. They crossed the threshold, moved out onto the street. Meredith couldn't stop from beaming. She skipped down the last step.

“We have a dog,” she said.

Derek returned her grin. “Yes, we do,” he said.

Samantha woofed.

And with that, after some juggling, and a pause for Derek to retrieve a towel from his trunk to cover Meredith's seat, they headed home with Meredith at the wheel. Samantha rode in the backseat, sprawled across Derek's shiny leather upholstery.

“Never thought I'd see the day.” Meredith said, unable to stop the grin from splitting her face. Sunny streets churned past the windows.

“What day?” Derek said.

“There's a dog in your backseat, and I look like I won in a mud wrestling match.”

He smirked. “Oh, you won, huh?”

“Yes,” Meredith said. “In this hypothetical mud wrestling match, I would have won.”

He nodded. “You would have. You're a scrapper. And you're feisty.” He watched her, his lashes low over his eyes. She glanced at him. His relaxed posture and the simple awe in his gaze blurred the bright metal rainbow of passing cars beyond his window. “So,” he said. “What's wrong with a dog in my back seat and you looking like you won a mud wrestling match?”

“Nothing. It's just a lot of dirt, and it's in your car. And you're not mad.”

“Hmm,” he said. He glanced at the frothy terrycloth towel he'd placed under her tiny body. Brown stains marred indigo blue. “Samantha is clean,” he said. “It's just you tracking mud all over.”

She scoffed. “Are you calling me dirty?”

“I might be,” he said. Out of the corner of her eye, movement flickered. His seat moaned. The solid, sure feeling of something there beside her, inches away and closing, made her smile. “But it's sexy dirt,” he said, his voice a low rumble by her ear.

“I'm trying to watch the road,” she said. His breaths touched her skin. A warm hand gripped her shoulder. He kissed her throat. She leaned into it, unable to stop herself.

“Hmm,” was all he said.

Breaths tightened in her chest. She pulled the car to a stop at a red light. She turned. His blue eyes shimmered close to hers. He traced her gaze with his own. She swallowed.

He kissed her, his lips to hers, and the car disappeared in a torrent of fire. She moaned into his mouth. They dueled across the parking brake, gaining and losing ground in equal measures. Until something wet that wasn't Derek touched her right ear, and she shrieked and jumped. In a whorl of sights and sounds and colors, she caught a glimpse of big, brown eyes and sharp teeth. Lips parted, revealing a drooping, pink tongue. Their newest addition made her best impression of a smile as Meredith wiped her face with the back of her hand, and Derek laughed, and laughed.

“I guess she doesn't like hanky panky in the car,” Derek said. Samantha hovered in the space between their seats. He leaned over the seat and stroked her fur as she panted.

“No, she likes it,” said Meredith. “She kissed me. I think she just felt left out.” The light turned green, and she accelerated. The car pressed her back into her seat. Derek's body swayed in the grips of inertia, and he, too, sat back. Samantha wobbled but didn't budge.

“We can save the hanky panky for later,” Derek said.

Meredith licked her lips. “Promises, promises.”

She'd meant to be playful, but his smile slipped out of his expression like liquid. Derek said nothing. He looked away from her, and he stared out the window, stroking Samantha while he watched the world go by.

Her chest tightened. Glass. Every conversation with him was like a piece of glass, ready to drop and break into thousands of pieces, from the highest heights to the bowels of low in an instant. For a moment, she hovered in bewilderment, wondering how her throaty, playful attempt at banter had gone so wrong. And then she thought of him, his cold, trembling, clammy hand clutched in hers. He stared at her through glassy, hooded eyes, and he'd said, I'm not gonna die. I promise.

His voice echoed in her head. Over and over. She swallowed as a lump formed in her throat, all hints of levity or lust gone.

Promised I wouldn't die, didn't I? he'd slurred a few hours later. He'd said that before he'd had much chance to reflect on the situation. Before he'd become a survivor in his mind. He'd just been... Alive. He'd been doped and barely lucid, but alive. Alive, and...

But I lied. My promise was a lie. I thought... he'd said.

“I'm sorry,” Meredith said. “I shouldn't have said that.”

A wet sound filled the car as he swallowed. He didn't speak.

“Derek...”

He shook his head. “I hate that I can't...” he said, but he didn't finish. Samantha whined at him, and he stroked her neck. The motion seemed to soothe him, but he still didn't speak.

Meredith sighed. The car jounced and rocked as she pulled it into the driveway, and she couldn't help but notice Derek wince. This time. He didn't make any noise. But he winced, and his face paled, and he folded his arm against his chest as though he were attempting to protect himself.

“She's a survivor,” she repeated, but he wouldn't look at her.

He un-clipped his seat belt and slid out of the car before she could say more than that. He opened the door for Samantha. The leash jingled as he attached it. The dog leaped down onto the pavement.

“Let's take her for a long walk before we go inside,” Derek said. “I read that it's good to get them tired first, and it's a clear day, for once.”

“But I'm muddy and gross,” Meredith said. “I...” Her voice trailed away as she stared at him through the gap between the door and the car. He didn't comment on her disheveled state. Or the mud. And what was a long walk, anyway? Derek still had heaps of endurance issues, and he would go by himself if she didn't budge. What if he stranded himself a few miles away because he didn't have the good sense to turn around when his body told him he needed to stop? She could tell from the sharp, determined look on his face that he planned to go with or without her. She swallowed. “I guess it doesn't matter,” she said. “What's some sweat on top of mud?”

She exited the car and pressed the lock button on the key fob. The Cayenne chirped. “How long of a walk are we talking?” she said as she walked around to meet him.

He shrugged, the motion a bit listless. “I imagine I'll be the first one calling it quits,” he said as he looked at the ground. Her heart squeezed. She wanted to wrap her arms around him, but she didn't want to make him more self-conscious. She left him alone.

“Do you have baggies? Just in case?” she said. “I mean, I'm sure she went at the shelter, but—”

“In my pocket,” he said.

Her jaw dropped. “Wow. You really did plan ahead.”

“Yeah,” he said. He didn't greet her comment with humor. Or banter. Or anything.

He turned on his feet and headed up the driveway toward the sidewalk. He turned left up the walk in a vague echo of his first walk, up the pernicious hill that wasn't quite a hill. Samantha followed, and so did Meredith. She hoped this walk wouldn't turn out the way that first one had, with him nearly throwing up because he'd pushed himself so hard. In her head, she repeated a long chorus of let-him-pick, let-him-pick, let-him-picks, until they'd gone several house lengths in silence.

This wasn't like before. Over weeks of healing, his long, sure stride had returned. She didn't have to slow herself down to stay even-paced with him. Though he didn't relax in the presence of strangers, he didn't stop and stare at every pedestrian like he expected to be shot and killed. Improvement. Some. Samantha loped along, stopping to sniff here and there, and they all moved in silence, save for Samantha's happy panting.

For ten minutes, they walked without speaking, because Meredith couldn't think of anything to say, and because his mood had gone from his version of okay, not that eight out of ten could ever be construed as okay, to awful in a whiplash turn of events. He didn't breathe hard or slow down. After ten minutes. That was a vast improvement as well. He didn't turn at the end of her block, either. His goal wasn't a single block. Also improvement.

They stopped as Samantha explored a fire hydrant with interest. Derek watched the dog with fascination as she pushed her nose through the grass blades in a ring around the hydrant and then up the chipping paint to the bolt at the tip. Meredith squeezed Derek's shoulder. His body heat pressed against her as she pushed close to him.

“Scale of one to ten,” she said in a soft voice.

He blinked, and his eyes reddened. Bird calls bounced through the trees. Samantha's ears perked as a dog in a distant yard barked. She glanced at Derek and Meredith, found no excitement there, and calmed. She resumed exploring her more exciting fire hydrant.

“Ten,” he said, his voice rough. “I'm sorry. Or...” He looked away as though he expected her to scream at him. “I'm...” And he ran out of things to say. Silence stretched. She heard him swallow. His breaths fluttered, as though he were struggling not to lose himself in a storm of unwanted, tempestuous grief.

She wanted to say it. Don't apologize. But she held the words down on her tongue under heaping mountains of willpower, until her jaw muscles hurt from the strain of clenching her teeth. From the reddening tinge on his face, and the way he wouldn't look at her, he knew she hated apologies for this kind of stuff, for his mood swings and for visceral reactions over which he had little to no control.

Samantha stopped and stared at Meredith, her dark eyes accusing, as if to say, Well? Say something. He's not going to do it. She chuffed, sort of like a sneeze, and she pressed her nose back into sensory euphoria. Grass folded under her nose.

“So, what should we name her?” Meredith said, at a loss for anything else.

For a moment, he stared at her with wet, red eyes. He sniffed. His gaze shifted to Samantha as Meredith watched the veritable wheels in his head churn. He followed Meredith's rapid and random subject change. With difficulty, but he followed it. “You want to change her name?” he said, his voice rough with weeping that he'd withheld.

Samantha finished exploring the fire hydrant, and they resumed walking. “I don't know,” Meredith said. “Do you?”

“The shelter said her name is Samantha,” he said. “We've been calling her Samantha.”

“So?”

“So, she probably grew up with that name,” he said. They skirted around an untrimmed hedge. Branches clawed at her muddy shirt and scratched her bare skin. A twig dug into her neck and stung. She hissed and rubbed her throat. Wet bits of crumbled, black bark came away with her fingertips. Derek stopped, twisted, and held the bush out of the way for her. The pain ceased. She and Samantha shuffled through. Through the obstacle, he sniffed, and he wiped his face with his hands. The reddened, crushed expression slathered on his face lessened. “How would you like me to suddenly start calling you Delilah because I think it's prettier?” he said.

“You think Delilah is prettier than Meredith?”

“I meant it as a hypothetical.”

“But you like the name Delilah?”

“Um,” he said. “I don't know.”

“You thought of it off the top of your head,” she said.

“She was a patient.”

“When?” Meredith said. “You haven't operated in more than two months.”

“My last patient.”

“Oh,” she said. She dropped her gaze to her muddy sneakers. The pocked sidewalk blurred. She couldn't win. All roads led to that day. All—

His arms wrapped around her, and she stopped. The world stopped. He hugged her. He breathed against her. For a moment, she stood, dumbfounded, and then her muscles loosened. She wrapped her arms around his back. Toned, lean sinew pressed against her hand through his shirt as she ran her palm along the lines of his muscles. She pressed her face against his chest and listened to the rustle of his breathing.

“It's okay,” he said, his voice soft. “I'm okay.” The words rumbled through his breastbone. “I just... thought of it,” he said. “Some things, I can...” He breathed. “Some things are better.”

“And this is one of those things?” she said.

“Hmm,” he said. “I guess it is.”

He stroked her hair, careful to keep his fingers from getting stuck in the mud and snarled tangles. She took a deep breath. “I don't remember her,” Meredith said. “Why was Delilah at Seattle Grace?”

He shrugged. “Delilah Rogers. Keyhole craniotomy to clip an aneurysm. I was in and out in about an hour. Nothing special.”

His bitter tone saddened her. A year before, he hadn't minded doing small procedures. A patient to help was a patient to help, regardless of the severity his or her problem or how complicated his or her problem was to fix. But that had been Derek's attitude back when his entire career hadn't been relegated to the simple procedures. Back when he still did groundbreaking casework and twenty-six plus hour surgeries to remove inoperable spinal tumors. Now, he was limited to the things he could fit into his schedule before the mountains of paperwork and interruptions each day would crush him, which meant, really, he could do very little.

That was another discussion, though. Another time. She didn't want to talk about work that much when she'd only steered the conversation back to safety moments before.

“Still,” she said. “You thought of the name over two months later.”

He raised his eyebrows. “So?”

“So, you must like the name,” she said.

“It's a name.”

“But a good name?” she prodded.

He laughed despite the snarly, troubled look lingering on his face. The sound of his levity made her lips turn upward. Mission accomplished, then, however ineptly. She'd made him forget, if only for a moment. “Meredith, what are you trying to whittle out of me?” he said. “Because I'd love to help you out, but I have no idea what you want me to say.”

She held out her hand. His gaze followed the length of her outstretched arm to her splayed fingertips. He took her palm with the hand he didn't hold the leash with. His warm, reassuring palm touched hers. They squeezed, and then they walked.

“Are we not naming dogs anymore?” he guessed.

“No...” she said. The breath deflated from her chest. Were they not naming dogs anymore? How the hell had that happened? And how the hell had he noticed before she had? She really was being a freak today. A freaky, clingy, hormonal... “I don't know.”

A skinny woman wearing holey jeans and flip flops approached on the opposite sidewalk with a bouncy dalmatian. Samantha perked. She opened her black-and-russet-colored jaws, her broad torso expanded, and she barked, deep and full. The dalmatian barked in return, and the skinny woman nearly tripped as her dog launched at the street, but she held it back. The dalmatian pedaled empty air, its front feet off the ground. Derek pulled on Samantha's leash before she got the same idea, though Meredith wondered if there was much either of them could do if Samantha decided to dash for a doggy meet-and-greet. Samantha tensed.

“No,” Derek said, his voice sharp.

Samantha snorted and relaxed, quiet. She looked up with a chastised expression, as if to say, Aww, Dad. You're no fun. But she kept walking, and after several strides, her stumpy tail began to wag once more. Another block passed, and when Meredith looked back, she gasped. She hadn't realized they'd climbed such a substantial hill. She glanced at Derek, but he seemed okay.

“I like Susanne,” he said as he stepped off the curb into the street. He looked both ways and proceeded. He squeezed her hand as they reached the other side and stepped up onto the sidewalk. The earth tipped downward again into a valley.

“Susanne Shepherd,” she said.

He nodded. “Or Grey. Susanne Grey.”

“I think it's a pretty first name, but it doesn't roll well,” Meredith said.

“What do you mean?”

“With our last names,” Meredith said. “The accent on the 'anne' makes it choppy to say. Susan works, but Susanne doesn't.”

“You'd want to use Susan?” he said.

“Fake Mommy?” said Meredith. She cleared her throat. “No, I just meant... I. Example.”

“Hmm,” he said as he considered her. She watched his lips trace the name as he presumably repeated the words in his head. He frowned. “Susanne does trip on the tongue a little bit.”

“Still, it's pretty,” Meredith said. “And not weird. I don't want to be one of those parents who names her child after a movie character, some obscure word in another language, or something not typically considered a name for a human, like Stapler or Fruit Stand.”

He grinned at her. “Fruit Stand?” he said.

“It was a joke I heard,” she said. “And we can't name her after me.”

“Why not? Meredith is pretty,” he said. “I like Meredith. A joke?”

“Because I'm Meredith,” she said. “I don't want another one. And when I call you Derek, our son shouldn't wonder if he's being addressed. And, yes, a joke. But I don't tell it well.”

“Tell me anyway,” he said in a soft voice. He stared at her. His eyes twinkled. “Please.”

“See!” she said, even as the soft sound made her innards quiver. She pushed at him. He shuffled a step to the side. “You totally brainwash me. And you do it on purpose, you evil, evil man.”

He winked. “I don't know what you're talking about,” he said.
“You do.”

“I don't!”

“You do freaking too!”

He shook his head and scoffed. “Do not. Tell me.”

“Fine,” she said. “A teacher kept calling her student Fruit Stand because that's what his name tag said, but then when the bus driver tried to figure out where to drop Fruit Stand off in the afternoon, the driver flipped over Fruit Stand's name tag to read what his parents had listed as his address, and it said Billy Summers.”

They stopped. She stared at him. His lips parted. He looked like he'd sniffed something rotten. “That's...” he said.

“Not funny when I tell it, like I said.” She sighed. “I'm horrible at telling jokes because I'm not a funny person. I'm dark and twisty and not funny.”

“Meredith,” he said. His head tilted. He shook his head. They kept walking. “What name do you like?”

“For a girl?”

“That's what we seem to be discussing,” he said.

“I kind of like just Anne.”

“Anne Grey,” he said.

“Or Shepherd,” she said. “It should be Shepherd.”

He peered at her as they walked. “Why?”

“I don't know,” she said. “I just...” She'd be the one giving birth. The baby would be, without a doubt, hers. But they weren't married. Not to the world. Giving the baby his name seemed like a good way to announce him as Dad. Or... was that stupid? “It seems right.”

He shook his head. “Shepherd-Grey or Grey-Shepherd,” he said. “Putting my foot down.”

“What?” she said. “Why?”

“Well, because she'll be ours,” he said. “She should have both names.”

“Or he.”

He shrugged. “We were talking about girls' names.”

“But we could have a boy,” Meredith said. “What was your dad's name?”

Silence stretched, and she wondered if she'd made another conversational misstep. A small snake of guilt coiled in her stomach, too, over the fact that she didn't know. She didn't know Derek's father's name. He knew about Thatcher. And Ellis. And Susan. And Lexie. And the other half-sister Molly who she never even spoke to, really. And all her extended not-family family. She hadn't even known all his sisters' names until they'd shown up in Seattle. Nancy, Amelia, Kathleen, and Rachel. She could recite them, now, at least. She stroked his hand with her thumb. His grip “Michael,” he said.

“Would you want to do that?” she said. “Use Michael as a name, I mean.”

“I...” He paused. His Adam’s apple trailed down his throat as he swallowed. The leash jingled as he shifted his grip. They stopped as Samantha paused to explore an interesting picket fence. She pushed her nose into a pile of crab grass and sniffed as though she’d scented nirvana in the dirt. Her big russet-colored paws pressed into the sponge-y carpet of vegetation. “No!” Derek said in an authoritative voice before she began to dig.

He received a disappointed, “Well, nuts,” look from their newest addition. Samantha resumed walking.

“I don’t know,” he said, his voice a bit stronger.

Meredith stared at Samantha. That was some crazy timing. Almost as if the dog had sensed he’d needed an anchor to yank him out of an uncontrolled spiral. Meredith stared as the dog trotted ahead to check out a patch of dandelions. A bumble bee zipped to freedom. Sunshine glared against the walkway and shined on Samantha’s black coat. Samantha stayed out of the soil and didn’t paw anything or dig, didn’t even try, and Meredith frowned, suspicious. That dog had a plan. Or something. She shook her head.

Ridiculous. No dog was that freaking smart. Right?

“Did any of your sisters already do it?” Meredith said. “I don’t know all your nieces and nephews yet.” She only knew the ones he mentioned in passing. Another shameful point that needed fixing.

“Mary, Nina, Sabrina, Jennifer, Chloe, Mia, Abby, Alexis, Morgan, Cody, David, Patrick, Sean, and Chase,” Derek rattled off without pausing.

Her jaw dropped. “How the hell do you keep all those straight?”

“Cue cards,” he deadpanned.

“Seriously?”

He smiled. “No,” he said. “I’ve had two decades to learn them all, you know. Abby is twenty.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah,” he said. “Amelia hates it.”

“Hates what?”

“She was an aunt before she graduated high school.”

“And you were barely out of college before you were an uncle,” Meredith said as she made a mental time line.

“Hmm,” he said, nodding, and his gaze grew distant. He grinned. “I’m the awesome uncle, you know.”

“I bet you are,” Meredith said. “Do you bribe them all with presents?”
“Of course,” he said. “Every Christmas. You could help me shop this year, if you want.”

“Tempting,” she said. “It’d be nice to not be known as that-weird-aunt-we’ve-never-met.” He laughed. She smiled. “Did you get stuck playing doctor a lot?”

“I let Chloe use my stethoscope, once,” he said. “She listened to my heart and told me I had Ebola.”

“Ebola?”

He shrugged. “She was five at the time,” he said. He shook his head. “I don’t know where she heard of it. She prescribed me two jelly beans.”

Meredith snickered. “Did you take them?”

“Of course,” he said. “I didn’t want to die after my recent trip to Zaire.”

“You went to Zaire?”

He winked at her.

“Oh,” she said, and a smile crept across her face to mirror his. Her heart melted at the thought of him regaling his niece with his fake trip while he lay on the couch. Meredith leaned into his body and sighed as she stroked his left arm. “You’d make a really good dad. You really would, Derek.”

“I hope so,” he said.

He stopped against the trunk of a thick maple tree and closed his eyes. He leaned, and his wrist and hand pressed against the damp bark. He breathed, in and out, and he swallowed. Samantha sat by his feet and looked up with worried, mocha eyes. A car roared past beside them on the street. He flinched. Just a little.

“Are you tired?” Meredith said as she collapsed the space between them.

He didn’t answer. She took a peek at her watch. They’d been walking for about forty minutes, and they’d covered about two miles, give or take. Not a fast pace. But not slow, either, given the up-and-down of the terrain. They hadn’t turned around, which meant it would be another two miles back to the house, for a total of four. The last time they’d walked together, earlier that week, he’d managed three miles before he’d needed to stop.

“Please, don’t push yourself,” she said. The touched his bicep and rubbed. “Not today.”

“I’m not trying to,” he said, his voice thready. “It just hit me. Just now. Like a wall, or...”

She bit her lip. “We’ll turn around.”

“Okay,” he said.

“I could go back for the car,” she said.

“No, I’m...” He took a breath. “I just need a minute. I’m okay.”

“Are you sure?”

He didn’t speak. He only nodded, which scared her. She’d seen this happen before with patients in rehab. Seen fatigue that hit like a pugilist. Wham! She assessed him. Really assessed. His skin had a healthy blush to it. Not embarrassment blush, just a nice pinkish tone. He didn’t shake or tremble.
He wasn't out of breath. Sweat dotted his skin at his brows and glistened on the nape of his neck, but, she decided as she brushed sticky hair out of her face, she'd perspired, too. No human wouldn't after forty minutes of up-and-down at a reasonable pace.

“Can we sit?” he said in a soft voice.

“Sure,” she said. She gripped his shoulder, and she guided him to the curb.

He didn't collapse. Not like his strings had been cut. He used her for balance, he folded in half, and he sat. His cross trainers scraped the pavement. Samantha sat by his shoulder as he crouched. He put his head against his knees and wrapped his arms around his legs. Meredith touched his thigh. The soft, worn denim of his jeans pressed into her palms as she stroked him quads to knee. Minutes passed, and he didn't move.

“Are you sure you're okay?” she said.

His clothes rustled as he straightened. His eyes looked a bit bleary. “I'm really okay,” he said. “Just wasn't expecting that.”

“It happens sometimes,” she said. “Ready to go back?”

He nodded. She helped him stand. His body unfolded from a crouch bone by bone in a way that looked almost painful, and when he straightened, he stood still for minutes, as though he had to get used to forcing his body to defy the full force of gravity and stay upright. His fingers slackened, and she took the leash from him. Samantha looked at them, back and forth. She shifted to Meredith's hip. Her tail wagged. Then she moved behind them and back to Derek's side, despite the leash. The leash cut Meredith in the backs of her thighs, swept at a downward angle between them, and slipped behind Derek's knees. Meredith stared at the cord, afraid it would trip Derek, who wasn't very solid on his feet.

“Samantha,” Meredith said. “Dad's not feeling well.” Time stopped. She imagined saying those same words to a small child with twinkling, blue-gray eyes, a wide smile, and floppy, curly brown hair. Her fingers scrunched. She pulled a tent of his soft, worn shirt into her hands and squeezed. Her throat tightened with longing. She swallowed it away.

Samantha stared. And then she moved back to Meredith's side. Around the front. She succeeded in wrapping Derek and Meredith together. Samantha sat by Meredith's feet and looked up.

Derek snorted. “Well, it's the thought that counts.”

“Derek, I really should get the c—” Meredith began, but he kissed her, and she lost her words against his lips. When he pulled away, the verdant cavern of plant life around them spun. She couldn't protest as he put his arm over her shoulder. He grinned at her. He spun her around to get out of the leash prison, and then they moved once she'd regained her senses. He walked, his strides both stilted and slow, but he seemed fine, otherwise. She slowed her steps to match his.

He wasn't panting or sweating buckets or straining. He didn't lean on her. He'd just cut his speed in half. She made up her mind that if he started to show any signs distress, though, she would get the car whether he wanted it or not.

“I'm really not pushing,” he said as though he'd read her mind. “I'm tired, but I'm okay, for now. I swear.”

Her jaw dropped. “I wasn't—”
“You were still thinking about getting the car,” he said.

He laughed. She smiled and relaxed, letting the warm feel of his body chop her tension to bits. He squeezed her shoulder. She reached behind him and hooked her free hand in his back pocket. They moved together. Slowly.

“Do you want a girl?” she said, resuming their conversation from before.

“I want anything,” he said.

“But if you had to pick in a split second, what would you pick?”

“I don't want to pick, Meredith,” he said. “I'd really be happy with anything.”

“I know you'd be happy either way,” she said, “But you have to have some sort of knee-jerk desire.”

He kissed her hair despite the streaks of mud. “Do you?”

“I hadn't thought about it. I guess...” Her voice trailed away. She dreamed about having a baby. She dreamed about losing the baby. But... “I mean I think baby, and I just get baby.” But she'd asked him about his desire. She expected him to pick something. To get a little, she would have to give. She went with her gut as she sighed. “I don't know. A boy.”

“Why a boy?”

She shrugged. “I don't know why,” she said. “It just seems to make sense in my head for some reason. Because you like fishing and hiking and—”

“Girls can like those things.”

“I know, but you grew up with four sisters,” she said.

He nodded. “Four very girly sisters.”

“Did any of them like fishing or hiking?”

“No, but that's not something my dad really fostered,” he said. “Maybe, they would have if he'd tried, but I think he just assumed...”

“What types of things did your dad do with you?” she said.

“We didn't have a lot of money,” he said. “He worked six days a week. Sometimes seven.”

“Is that why Sandy Hook was so special? Because you spent time with him?”

They stepped off a curb into a street. A dingy, rusted Mustang that had been loved a lot less in its life than Mark's cherry-colored car waited while they ambled across the black divide. As they stepped onto the opposite curb, Samantha moved to sniff the crack in the pavement between one sidewalk tile and the next. Meredith jerked on the leash. “We need to go home,” she said to the dog. Samantha sniffed and continued.

“The day he died,” Derek said, “He made me go back to the store with him to help make up time he'd lost by coming home to referee one of my and Amy's spats.” He paused to take a tired breath.
“He was always making up time. He worked a lot, but he was always there when we needed him. Sandy Hook was special because...” He sighed. “I don’t know. It’s just what I remember.”

She pulled her hand from his pocket and rubbed his back. “Did he ever take you fishing?” she said.

“He taught me how,” Derek said. “But he only took me a few times. Five kids is a lot, Meredith.”

She stiffened. Five kids was a lot. A lot.

_I was just thinking how pretty you are_, he'd said as he'd stroked her hair. _And also how pretty our children would be._

_Children_, she'd said. Her stomach had flip-flopped. She'd tried to keep the smile pasted on her face, but she'd failed. _Like multiple?_

_Child_, he corrected. _Let's just start with one and see how that goes._

They'd never really finished that discussion. They'd never talked about what would happen after baby number one. They'd never compared notes. In all the death and dying and trauma, they hadn't talked about anything other than the fact that she wanted to start, now, too. She was ready. Worry carved her thoughts. Five. Five kids. What if he wanted five? Or Twelve? Or a freaking army of little Derek Shepherds? Her breaths tightened in her chest as unbidden panic tumbled into her.

“What is it?” he said.

“Derek, I... want a baby,” she said.

“Well...” He paused, and he looked at her, confusion pinching his tired gaze. “That's good.” A bewildered smile twitched at his lips. He kissed her. “Since we pulled the goalie, that's kind of important.”

She sighed. “Derek...”

His smile tripped into a frown. “What is it?” he repeated.

“Pluralizing baby scares me,” she said. “I can't be a surgeon with a gaggle of kids.”

He laughed. “I don't want five kids, Meredith. Just thinking about five gives me a migraine.”

“How many then?”

“I'd be happy with one.”

“But what's your goal?” she said.

“Less than five.”

She sighed. This was like pulling teeth. Many, many teeth. She didn't understand why he was being so careful to avoid stating his real opinion. “How many less than five?”

“Can't we just see what happens?” he said.

“When you think of your ideal family, how many kids do you have?” she insisted.

“Meredith,” he said, and he stopped walking.
She returned his gaze, unblinking. “Derek,” she said, matching his vexed tone.

Time stretched. His lips pressed into a line. “Two,” he said.

“Two,” she parroted. “Not three of four. That's manageable. That's...”

“We can have just one, Meredith,” he said. “I'd be happy.”

“You'd be happy with anything,” she said. “You said that.”

He shook his head. He loosed a soft, exasperated chuckle. “What do you want from me?”

“I just want to know what you actually want, Derek,” she said. “I don't want to get all the way to our destination only to find out we're in Seattle and you'd rather be in Tacoma. Or, hell, France. Or... whatever.”

“Meredith,” he said, his voice low and flat and definitive. “I want you.”

“I know that, but—”

He kissed her. “I'm fine with Seattle. Or Tacoma. Or France. As long as we're in the same car or boat or plane. The trip matters to me. Not the destination. Okay?”

She growled. “You're so freaking frustrating, sometimes.”

“Why is that frustrating?” he said.

“Because I want to know!” she said. “You've bent, and bent, and bent for me, lately. You moved in when I wanted you to. You live with roommates you hate because I like them there. You've let me be an insensitive, nonsupporting freak for months and months without saying a word. You still do it. Maybe, I'm not going to change my mind or my opinion about anything, but I'd like to know what you want. Pre-filtered. Meredith independent. What would you do in a car or a boat or a plane if I wasn't there? You have to have some sort of solo plan.”

He gripped her shoulder and started walking. She sighed at the fragile, short steps he took. He was going to play the too-tired-and-sick-to-talk card to get out of this. And she hated it. She hated—

“Whenever I think about it, you have a girl,” he said.

She watched his feet as they navigated over a treacherous section of pavement. A tree had grown old, and the roots had pushed up and cracked the sidewalk tiles. He leaned against her as he worked his way over the pile of roots and pavement. His weight on her arm lessened as they reached flat ground.

“You think about it?” she said.

“Yeah, Mere,” he said. “Of course, I think about it.”

“You've never said anything.”

He swallowed. “I didn't want to spook you.”

“You wouldn't spook me,” she assured him.

“Not now.”
A lump formed in her throat. She blinked. “You mean you've been thinking about it that long? About me, and...” She clutched Samantha's leash and rubbed her womb with her fist. “How long?”

“Meredith, I'm forty-two,” he said. “I've wanted kids for fifteen years. Maybe, I don't have a biological clock like you do, but I'm getting a bit old to be a new dad, and I've known it for a while.”

“How long have you... I mean with me. How long?”

He shrugged. “I don't know. Since... before you drowned.”

“Before Addison?”

“No. I think... in the kitchen.”

“The kitchen?”

“Mmm,” he said. He kissed her. “You wore a lavender-colored sweater. You picked up a pair of crystal wine glasses and put them in the sink. I walked in, and I said—”

Hi.

Hi.

I was going to come over this morning, but, uh...

“That's when you told me you loved me the first time,” she whispered. She blinked, and tears popped loose. She brushed the tracks away with the backs of her palms. “You thought about it all the way back then?”

“I knew I loved you,” he said, as though that explained everything, and she supposed it did. Derek had such an entrenched sense of what family meant. He wanted kids. Love meant family. Love, therefore family, therefore kids. She glanced at Samantha, who'd stopped again to lick up a beetle she'd found. Family, therefore dog.

Meredith's hands trembled with the weight and realization of what they'd just done. They hadn't just gotten a dog. Her lower lip quivered.

“Thank you for not pushing,” she said. “It means a lot that you didn't.”

He sighed and shook his head. “I gave up. With Addison. She never...”

She swallowed. “I'm sorry.”

“Don't be. I love you. Honestly, Meredith, I have the family I need with just you.”

“But not the family you want,” she said. “I really want a baby. Maybe two, but definitely one. With you. I really...”

He grinned. “We will. Soon. We haven't even been trying for a month yet.”

“I know,” she said. She sighed. “Maybe I should get one of those tests that will tell me when I'm ovulating so we can be sure we don't miss it.”

“I thought you didn't want to go crazy about this,” he said.
“I thought I didn't. But...”

His eyebrows raised. “But?”

“You're forty-two,” she said, “And I love you. And nearly losing you made me realize how much I want this, not because it would mean I'm not alone or... whatever. But because it's you. And it's me. And the phrase 'now or never' hits very close to home. We've both wasted a lot of time nearly dying.”

“We have,” he said.

His feet shuffled on the pavement. They finished the walk in silence, sharing company. The return to her house took ten more minutes than the walk away from it had, probably due to their slower pace. He walked up the steps under his own steam, and he opened the door while she held Samantha's leash.

He didn't collapse once he'd crossed the threshold. Samantha glanced at her new surroundings. Her feet tapped on the floor as she walked a quick circle around Meredith as Meredith disabled the alarm. Samantha's tail didn't wag. She whined with uncertainty.

“Are you going to sit down for a bit?” Meredith said. “I can bring you something from the kitchen.”

Derek shook his head. “Bed,” he said. He moved like an old man toward the stairs.

“Okay,” she said.

She frowned. He hadn't been taking naps, as a rule. Emotional stress drew him into hibernation, but for physical exertion, he tended to need only inactivity to recover. She wanted to help, but he didn't ask for it, and she made herself not worry about his exhaustion. He'd been up since before sunrise. He'd just walked four miles less than three months after heart surgery. She didn't need to be concerned.

And now they had a nervous, upset dog to deal with. From the way Samantha paced, the walk hadn't tired her out enough to prevent the homesick anxiety they'd been hoping to prevent. The steps creaked as Derek moved up the flight. The floorboards moaned as he moved around upstairs. Samantha watched the noises with consternation, her ears perked. She barked. Once. Twice.

“That's Dad,” Meredith said, and Samantha quieted.

Meredith kept the dog on the leash and walked her room to room, starting with Derek's office, allowing Samantha to sniff and explore under supervision. Samantha walked a lap, sniffing the shelves and the books and the desk and his chair. She paused at one of the drawers in his executive desk, which had been left open several inches. After a few minutes, Samantha decided to move on to the living room. Meredith followed her as Samantha moved around the first floor.

Once Samantha found the dog gates, Meredith introduced Samantha to her dog crate in the dining room and the box of toys in the kitchen. Samantha ignored the toys and settled on the fluffy bedding in her crate with a huge sigh that heaved her big black frame. Meredith grinned. Maybe the walk-to-exhaustion plan had worked for more than just Derek, after all. Samantha's russet-colored paws stuck out the door of the crate. History had worn the black pads on her feet. Meredith unclipped the leash. She stroked Samantha's glossy fur from head to paw.

“Quiet time for a bit sounds good,” Meredith said. “I need a shower, anyway.”
She filled the water bowl and then closed the dog gate behind herself and latched it. She glanced at her watch. Neither Lexie nor Alex were due back for hours yet, and they both knew to expect a dog. She decided to leave a sticky note on the front door about Samantha, anyway. They were expecting a dog, yes. Not a rottweiler. Samantha seemed pretty laid back, but as a potential guard dog, Meredith thought she might get a little upset about strangers she hadn't been introduced to walking into the house unannounced.

That done, Meredith went upstairs. Dim shafts of sunlight cut into the room at slants around the edges of the blinds. Derek lay on the bed on his stomach underneath a fluffy tent of blankets. She could see the mop of his hair cresting his mashed pillow and not much else. His soft, even breathing told her he slept. He didn't seem agitated, didn't toss or mumble. She hoped that meant he slept well. She didn't disturb him. She grabbed her red robe from the back of the master bathroom door and headed across the hall to take a shower.

Hot water lifted the dirt from her naked body and muddy trails sluiced down her skin. She sighed as billowing steam collected and cleared her lungs. She stayed in the shower for a luxurious twenty minutes, not because she was that dirty, but because it felt really freaking good. By the time she'd towed off, scraped the tangles from her hair with a brush, and put her robe back on, at least a half hour had passed.

She padded back across the hall into the master bedroom. Her wet hair had soaked her robe, and she shivered. He still slept. She tried to be quiet, but the floor of the old house moaned with her weight as she approached the closet. She grimaced when the blankets moved, and he took a deep breath.

“What time is it?” he said, his voice low and full of sleep, his face buried in pillows.

“It's only been about an hour,” she said. “Go back to sleep if you want.”

He rolled onto his back. “The dog?”

“Passed out,” Meredith said. “I think your plan worked.”

“Kay,” he said. He swallowed. He lay with his eyes shut, like he didn't want to face the world yet, but he didn't go back to sleep, either, and the sight of him lying there sparked memories. She listened to him breathe while she dressed herself at the closet. She pulled on some panties and gray knit pants. She shucked her robe and found a soft, clean white t-shirt to wear. When she turned to face him once more, the churn of the past made her grip the door handle. She swallowed.

Meredith stayed with him while the surgical team made the final preparations and Cristina... Cristina prepared in the scrub room. He lay on the gurney, silent save for his worrisome panting, while Meredith held his hand. She watched the anesthesiologist attempt to slip an intravenous line into his other wrist, wincing every time the woman made a bad stick and missed a vein. His whole body shivered, making a good line harder to set. Worse was his lost blood volume, though. Meredith suspected that was the main culprit. The needle broke his pale skin once more.

The anesthesiologist sighed and shook her head. “I'm sorry, Dr. Shepherd,” she said. “I'm trying.”

Derek didn't speak. He stared into the operating table lights overhead. His pupils had dilated with shock despite the brightness.

Meredith wanted to yell. She wanted to scream. She wanted to stomp her feet. She refrained from all three. This wasn't the anesthesiologist's fault. This was Gary Clark's fault. But she made a futile wish that the anesthesiologist would work faster, regardless. Derek couldn't breathe, and he was in “Got it,” said the small woman, and Meredith’s tension snapped and snarled in her muscles. She hadn’t meant it. She wasn’t ready for him to be asleep. She wasn’t—

“I think we’re ready,” said the anesthesiologist.

They slipped the gas mask over his pale face. Meredith’s eyes watered. She glanced wildly at his heart monitor. The thready, unstable rhythm made her tremble. She blinked. When she looked back at him, she found his glassy gaze resting on her.

“Are you ready?” said a quiet voice in her ear.

She twitched and turned to see Jackson’s sharp green eyes staring at her. “Yes,” she said. No, she really meant. No, no, no. She squeezed Derek’s palm with one hand, and with the other, she pulled her fingers through his sweaty hair.

“Okay,” said Jackson. “Let’s go, then. Put him out.”

Meredith swallowed. “It’ll be over soon,” she assured Derek. The mask hissed as they turned on the gas flow.

“Breathe deeply, Dr. Shepherd,” said Jackson, which made her want to laugh as nerves and stress and pain overwhelmed her. Derek couldn’t breathe at all, let alone deeply. What a ridiculous thing to say.

Derek’s eyelids drooped. “I love you,” she told him.

And then he was gone. Just like that. One moment, awake and damaged. The next, sleeping. Not sleeping. Knocked out. His jerky breaths smoothed out into shallow wisps. They didn’t deepen. They couldn’t. He had no room in his chest for his lungs to inflate. But at least he wasn’t suffering anymore. There was that.

She swallowed, and the tears she’d been holding onto broke loose, now that he couldn’t see them. She kissed his forehead, uncaring of the tense audience waiting for her to back away so they could work. She stroked the skin of his face not obscured by the mask. And then, unable to wait anymore, Jackson and the scrub nurse pushed her away in a frenetic explosion of activity.

All at once, they violated his still body. They pushed an endotracheal tube down his throat. They pulled his bloody underwear down his legs, threw the dirty article into the bio-hazard bin with his other stained clothes, and catheterized him. Though they did try to keep him covered with blankets for his modesty, everyone in the room saw him while he lay oblivious at least once or twice. It couldn’t be helped. They shaved his chest, and then they covered him with blue sterile drapes. The ventilator whirred as they turned it on.

She stayed there, watching, but not watching. Four feet away in a sea of empty space. Adrift.

“What’s wrong?” Derek said, and she blinked back to the present.

She realized she stood at the door of their closet, her hand gripped around the doorknob as though it were her only lifeline. And she’d started crying. What the hell?

He watched her from the bed, his dark eyes endless pools of concern. She wiped her nose with her hand, sniffling. “I’m sorry,” she blurted. “I’m sorry. I just keep thinking about it, today, and I don’t know why.” She stumbled to the bed. She needed him. She crawled under the covers. He wrapped his arms around her without asking why. She rested against his chest. He didn't comment about her wet, cold hair. Or anything. She listened to his heartbeat, and she let it soothe her out of the rafters of hysterics. The warm sheets and his body cocooned her.

“The miscarriage?” he said in a soft voice.

“No,” she said. “Not the baby. You.” Her throat burned. A tennis ball formed in her esophagus. She couldn't breathe. And then and she lost what little composure she'd regathered. She cried. She didn't know why. He was warm and alive and breathing beside her, and she couldn't stop the waterworks no matter what she tried.

“I'm okay,” he said.

“I know!” she wailed. “Which is why this doesn't make any sense.”

“It makes sense to me,” he said.

“How?” she said. “I'm crying like a freak over something that happened over two months ago.”

“I told you,” he said. “You put everything on hold.”

“I didn't,” she said. “I've been seeing Dr. Wyatt.”

“For me,” he said. “Not for you.”

“But—”

“It's okay,” he said.

The blankets rustled as he tightened his grip. His warm body radiated against her. She cried until her cheeks felt sticky, and her eyes hurt even when they were closed. She lay along his length, and he rubbed her back, saying nothing. The moments stretched. She pressed her nose against his soft shirt and inhaled. Her body relaxed despite her grief.

“When you told me I'd make an amazing dad, you knew you were pregnant,” he said, his voice soft.

“I'm sorry,” she said with a sniff. “I didn't mean to make you think about—”

“I was already thinking about it,” he said. “All day. You wanted to say something, and then you didn't. You told me I would make an amazing dad instead. You knew.”

She brushed her face with her hands. “You knew I knew. I told you later.”

“You did, I just...” He sighed. “It didn't click.”

“I was afraid to tell you,” she admitted.

He rolled onto his side. His glistening gaze met hers. “Why?” he said.

“You said I shouldn't be alone if something were to happen to you. That's why you wanted to have kids.”

He nodded. “I did say that. That wasn't my only reason.”

“But that's what you said, and I thought...” She swallowed. “I thought...”
“What?” he prodded. He stroked her face.

“That I’d be giving you permission to die if I told you I was pregnant.”

“Oh.”

“And then I started getting cramps a little while later,” she said. “Cristina kicked me out of the OR to stitch Owen's shoulder. My pants were bloody.”

“My OR?” he said.

She nodded. “Yeah. They pulled your EKG leads. I thought you were dead. I got a bit hysterical. Cristina didn't want me there.”

He kissed her. “I'm sorry, Meredith. I'm sorry you had to go through that alone.”

She smiled despite her watery eyes. “I got to keep you. I'd trade thirty seconds of panic for that any day,” she said. She shifted, and she splayed a palm against his chest. The scar down his center wasn't as prominent anymore, but she could still feel it where Cristina had cut him in half. Through his shirt. The line pressed against her sensitive nerves. She scrunched her fingers. He stared at her, unblinking, as she appraised his scars. His breaths pressed his chest against her hand. She kissed his shirt and swallowed as a thousand flashes of him sweaty, shivery, and dying sparked in her brain like remnants of flashbulb explosions. She had no right to ask. Not when he was on such shaky ground, himself, about the whole thing, but...

“What do you actually remember?” she said.

Silence stretched. He stared, and she wanted to hit herself for her curiosity. Stupid. Stupid, insensitive idiot. But he pressed his forehead against hers and breathed, his look... not untroubled. But not... Not like it had been. Not when he'd curled in her arms, shaking with terror. Not like when he'd had his panic attack, and he'd been clawing at his collar in a terrifying struggle to breathe.

“When I was shot?” he said.

“That day,” she said. “Before we put you under, but... after. After what happens in your nightmare.”

Again, the silence stretched, and she couldn't help but blurt, “I'm sorry,” into his chest. “I'm sorry. I shouldn't have asked.”

His palm raked her arm, and his eyelids lowered. “Shh,” he said. “I was just thinking. I'm okay. I can...”

“This is one of the better things?” she said.

A small smile crept across his pale face. “You were there,” he said.

“I was.”

“It wasn't as scary.”

She swallowed. She didn't know what to say to that.

His gaze spaced, and he shook his head. “Just impressions, really,” he said. “I remember you wanted me to get up, and I didn't understand why. And then it's a blur for a while.”
“We had to put you in a wheelchair to move you,” she said. “That’s why.”

“Yeah. It hurt to sit up like that. I couldn’t breathe. I...” His breaths shortened, and she tensed. He’d said he was okay. But... She stroked his shirt and stared into his eyes, less than inches from hers.

“You were there,” he said again, but it sounded more as though he were using the phrase as a ward against fear than recalling a memory.

Her throat burned as her own memories crashed into her brain. His screams of pain, the first when they’d tried to pick him up to put him in the wheelchair, and the second when they’d been forced to lift him onto the operating table, burned brightest.

“Do you remember when we moved you onto the operating table?” she said. She clenched her jaw.

“No,” he said, and she sighed with relief. Her teeth unclenched. He licked his lips and continued, his voice rough, “For a while, I... Nothing. But then I felt nauseous. And I hurt. And I was cold. I couldn’t lift my eyelids more than a sliver. You had my hand. You picked up my arm.”

She nodded. “I took your blood pressure.”

“You looked upset,” he said.

“It was bad, Derek,” she said. “You’d lost so much blood.”

They’d had to transfuse him. Multiple units. Thankfully, the OR refrigerator had had eight units of unexpired O-negative leftover from the crew that had been there earlier that morning, or they... He would have died from blood loss. Or somebody would have died running to get blood for him as Gary Clark wound his way through the hospital to the surgical floor. Or both.

“I couldn’t breathe, and I...” He sighed. “Cristina dragged you off before I could say anything.”

She sniffled. “And when I came back, you asked me to kiss you. And you promised you wouldn’t die. You always do that.”

“Do what?” he said.

“Try to make me feel better.”

“I thought I was lying.”

She cupped his face. “And do you remember what I said when you told me that?”

He closed his eyes.

“You’re the strongest person I know,” she said. “I still believe that. I mean it. I’m sorry I brought this all up. I don’t know what I was thinking. I didn’t mean to—”

He kissed her, and he swept her breath away. She inhaled the scent of him. “I’m supposed to talk about this, aren’t I?” he said.

“Yes, but—”

“It’s okay, Meredith. I’m... I’m okay today.”

“An eight,” she countered.

“Maybe, I’ll be a seven tomorrow,” he said.
“I hope so,” she whispered. “I wish—” she began, but he took away her words again.

They didn't speak anymore.

He pressed against her, warm and alive and breathing. His fingers slipped through her wet hair, and the world tipped as he rolled on top of her. He kissed her. He kissed her again. His fingers slid underneath the waistband of her panties, and she moaned as he touched her, searching and gentle. The blankets rustled as he shifted, and somewhere in a tango of bodies and a crash of skin, he pushed her pants down to her knees and away, and he lost his shirt and boxer briefs. His pale body crushed against her, a naked tapestry for her artistry. She painted him with her fingertips. Her lips.

They tangled together, a knot of limbs. She splayed her palm against the flat plane of his chest and wandered down, down, down into the coarse forest below his navel. She cupped him. He growled against her skin. His hips jammed against her. A reflex. And then he regained his sentience. His fingers roamed low, and she gasped as her insides clenched with anticipation and need. He worked her into a mess. She clutched him, clutched his shoulders, begging.

Her lower body fluttered, and she lost all control, helpless as he stroked her. Her breaths shuddered. She grimaced, and a low, desperate, wavering moan boiled in her throat. The triumph in his gaze made her giddy as she returned to her body. She fought the lethargy of release.

“I love you,” she murmured.

They kissed. He didn't reply as he swept her away in the crash of his wave. Through the haze of her eyelashes and the blurry heat between them, she watched his torso huff as he gasped. He kissed her, his breaths buffeting her in the silence, and she drew in a tight, noisy breath as he speared her. He rested his weight on his elbows, above her, looking down, and though he didn't speak, his eyes said the words for him.

I love you.

He pushed in and out, his body a line of sleek, straining, powerful muscles. In and out again. He repeated and repeated, but he didn't crest. His lusting, desirous expression clouded with discomfort. After an eternity of slip and slide, he pulled out and tumbled to her side, panting, spent, but still hard, still ready. He inhaled. Exhaled. His lips parted, and he swallowed, pulling down air. As though he were rallying.

She rolled, and he yielded to her. She straddled his lower body. She kissed him, and she stroked her fingers through his hair. “Let me,” she said, panting. “Please?”

The seconds stretched as he gazed at her, underneath her, submitted to her. She rubbed her palm along his skin. Her hand chased the contours of his ribs. His pectorals. The pink line down his center, and the dime-sized knot of dented, pink flesh underneath his left nipple.

“Please?” she repeated.

“And you think I brainwash you,” he said, his voice hoarse but quivering with laughter. His eyes sparkled.

She snickered, and she kissed him. She pulled at his lip with her teeth, and she sighed. “This is okay then?” she murmured.

“Hmm,” he said. He nodded his assent. “Do something before I burst.”

For the first time in more than ten weeks, she made love to Derek Shepherd. She guided him into her once again and settled. She squeezed around him, and a rumble caught in his throat. She moved in a slow, luxurious figure-eight pattern that made him moan on the tips and dips of the eight. She watched with delight as his body tensed, and his breaths clipped off into gasps. He arched back into the pillow, his face a mask of thrilling abandon. He filled her. She squeezed, and a throaty, delicious groan fell from his lips.

Torturous hours, or minutes, or seconds later – she didn't know – his body tensed. He gathered air. His eyes turned glassy, and he hit free fall underneath her. His lower body twitched and jerked, and when he came, he loosed a nonsensical shout. Something wet bloomed inside her body. Seconds ticked by. Twelve. Fifteen. His breaths resumed, and he swallowed as his muscles relaxed. He sank against the mattress.

“Good?” she said with a languid smile.

“Mmm,” was his reply. She flattened against him and kissed his throat. His breaths evened, and he fell asleep before he softened. She didn't laugh or comment. He'd been tired, and he tended to nod off for a few minutes even when he was healthy. She stroked his sweat-dampened hair, and she rolled to his side to rest, her cheek against his breastbone. She twirled the tuft of hair there with her index finger as his heartbeat thumped against her ears. She listened, and she breathed, and she felt...

Good.

Great.

Better than ever.

He'd let her do the work for the first time in weeks, and...

She blinked as the room beyond his sweaty body came into focus. The red glow of his clock on his nightstand showed the time. Nearly five. And then she frowned. His painkillers had blocked the view before, and... Now, they were behind his clock. He'd moved them.

Had he taken some? No. No, he'd just moved them. So he could see the time while he slept. Surely.

She swallowed as she stared at his Percocet bottle. Something niggled. Something told her to keep looking at it. Why? She thought back to the morning, when she'd woken, bleary and wanting more sleep. She'd noticed the bottle then, and— That was it. The cap wasn't skewed anymore, which meant he'd taken the time to fix it. Or... he'd taken pills.

Her stomach churned as she listened to him breathe underneath her. He hadn't said anything about being in pain. Not enough to take pills. He'd been acting fine. Not suffering. They'd just had sex, and he'd used his arms to support himself for at least a little while.

Clearly, no pain.

She flipped back the blankets and slid off the bed. She blinked. Outside the bubble of his reassuring warmth, her wet hair and naked lower body chilled her. She shivered. This was stupid. Beyond stupid. Why couldn't she trust him? Why...

He didn't budge as she moved away. Didn't snuffle. Derek slept very lightly. Surely, he would notice something as significant as her weight disappearing from his side. But he didn't move. Like he had help staying asleep.
Help. Like narcotics. Or good sex, she insisted, but explosions of worry buried that thought under piles of paranoid debris.

She tiptoed around the bed and grabbed his pill bottles, both the Percocet and the Oxycontin. The bottles rattled. He didn't stir. She bit her lip, and she took them into the master bathroom with her. She closed the door behind her. She sat on the toilet seat with the orange bottles in her lap. Her eyes watered.

Why couldn't she just trust him?

He's lied to you before, said the small voice. About Addison. About Rose.

Omitted, she told the voice. He never lied; he just omitted.

What do you call not telling you about the Percocet, then?

She didn't have an answer for that one.

Guilt churned in her stomach. She could just ask him. What if he wanted help, but wasn't sure how to explain? What if he hadn't told her because he didn't realize he had a problem? Drug-addicts were champions at living in denial. What if...

What if she was jumping to stupid, freakish, paranoid conclusions?

She felt dirty. And wrong. And awful. But she unscrewed the cap, and she counted the pills. In both bottles. She would count them again in a few days when he wasn't looking. Then, she would have a real idea about how many he was taking, and she could... She could work from there. When she had facts, instead of silly not-quite-baseless suspicions.

She ignored the roiling in her gut as the voice pressed down on her like an avalanche. Doubt churned.

What will you do when you have facts? it said.

What then?

She didn't know.
Chapter 17

The shriek of the alarm pulled him up from darkness. What had been a pleasant, solid black beyond his eyelids became murky. Lighter. Dawn interrupted by flesh. He slammed his hand against his nightstand. Things crashed to the ground in an inanimate cascade, followed by a liquid slosh, but the awful noise stopped. He lay with his arm dangling off the mattress, breathing. Water from his glass dripped from his fingers and fell onto the rug below with a tap, tap, tap. He became aware of his pillow. He'd mashed his face against the cotton pillowcase. Moist warmth touched his face.

He moved his hand and pawed at his mouth. His palm rasped against stubble. Had he been drooling? His nose scrunched, and he made a noise. Nothing particular. Just noise. He rolled onto his back. The covers rustled.

He lay quiet, wrapped in warmth, and he rested, awake but not alive. The house below the floor radiated silence. No Alex. No Lexie. No Meredith? But that didn't make sense. Meredith was supposed to be there...

He swallowed. His mouth felt pasty and gummy with sleep. He didn't want to get up. The daylight brightened against his eyelids as he lay there. Heat spread across his skin with the slow sunrise.

“Just going to lie there?” said Mr. Clark in the distance. “Coward.”

Derek rolled away from the words. Rolled back into the dark. He pulled the blankets over his shoulders, heaved a sigh, and let reality slip an inch. Two. His sense of the room around him stretched. Bright became fuzzy dark, and Mr. Clark didn't seem so loud anymore.

Back again? said her familiar soft voice.

Buzzing pierced his head space, and the image shattered before lethargy could sink in its teeth. His body jerked, and his heart throbbed. He opened his eyes at the unexpected noise. The room blurred as he squinted against the light.

“Fucking...” he cursed when he realized the source of the noise. Another alarm. Across the room. Atop the dresser by the doorway. And it didn't turn off as he lay there, his head swirling. He let it ring for minutes, and the noise didn't stop.

He fell out of bed more than stood. He gathered his treacherous balance for a journey across the carpet. His bare toes scrunched against the soft area rug. He slammed his hand on the off button, but his palm slipped across the plastic, and he crunched his finger bones against the hard, cold wood of the dresser instead. A second haphazard attempt brought silence. His ears stopped throbbing. He didn't remember setting a second alarm. He didn't remember anything except waking up dying in the dark, and then... He stared at the device, dumb and groggy and fascinated for what seemed like eons.

Vague euphoria hovered behind his eyes, and he felt a bit too dizzy to move much. He rested against the dresser and breathed and swallowed as he tried to gather his scattered wits. He didn't notice Meredith for... He didn't know how long.

She sat in the hulking chair she and Mark had lugged upstairs for him, back when Derek hadn't been able to sleep through the night lying flat. The diagonal shaft of light filtering in from the window framed her. Dust motes swirled around her head. She wore khakis and a blouse, and her hair had been pulled into a tight, lanky ponytail. No amount of makeup could hide the haggard, dark circles under her eyes, or the paleness of her face. He saw it. He did.

But his lips curled into a smile anyway. He blinked. “Hi,” he said. He took a wobbling, laggard step toward her. His body wasn't working quite right, wasn't waking up fast enough, but that didn't matter. Nothing mattered. Except she mattered.

Paradox.

She didn't return his smile. Her gray gaze swept over his body, head to toes. “Hey,” she said. Her voice hung low in the air, soft and tired. Her expression seemed pinched. As though she hadn't slept, or she had a headache.

Her distress called him forward. He approached the bed. He grabbed at the bedspread and scrunched his fingers. He sat on her side of the bed, on top of rumpled sheets and blankets, and the revolutions around his head slowed to a crawl.

“Dizzy?” she said. She didn't blink.

Yes. Very. But he shook his head. “Were you watching me sleep?” he said.

Her eyes narrowed. “You do it, too.”

“I know I do it,” he said. “I was asking you.”

“No,” she said. She bit her lip and looked away. “Sort of.” Her throat wavered as she swallowed. “Yes.”

He laughed. “That's a lot of answers.”

“Maybe, I like watching you sleep,” she said, but she didn't sound playful, or... anything.

He stood. The world tipped, but he caught himself against the arm of the chair. Leather slipped under his hand, and he leaned, chuckling at his own clumsiness. His body swayed. Forward. Into her. Against her. The soft scent of lavender tickled his nose as he pressed his face into her soft hair.

She didn't respond at first. Didn't speak. A soft squeak caught in her throat as he kissed her ear and her throat and low and lower. He pressed into her cleavage. He felt her tiny hand grip his waist. Her palms rasped against his shirt and slid up. Along his spine. She sighed, and he embraced her, and in that moment, the world fell away. Nothing mattered. He breathed, and he forgot everything.

He kissed her lips last. “Mmm,” he said as he pulled away. He licked his lips to linger in her taste. “I like that you like it.” She didn't respond. She gave him silence. Not even a smile. “Normally, you smile when I kiss you,” he said.

She froze. Her eyes widened. A long silence followed. Her mouth opened. And closed. And opened.

“Derek,” she said, but she said nothing else. Her lips curled, poised around a word to which she didn't give any sound.

He frowned. “What's wrong?”

Silence stretched, as if she didn't know what to say. And then her expression crumpled. “You didn't brush your teeth before you kissed me.”

“Oh,” he said with a laugh. “Sorry.” He swiped a palm against his lips and blew into it, trying to get a whiff of whatever he'd tortured her with. He couldn't smell a thing, but... “I guess that's my cue.”

“Cue?” she said.

He kissed her temple and grinned. “To get ready. Truth be told, though, I think I'd rather kiss you.”

She smiled a wan smile as he stood, but she said nothing. The room heaved into motion. He grimaced as he tried to navigate across the room to the door. His head felt like a faucet, rushing endlessly, and his empty stomach churned and squeezed. Why...? He couldn't remember.

“I'm still here, you know,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek swallowed. Out of Meredith's infectious eclipse, his mirth waned. He didn't look behind himself as he traversed the hall on unsteady feet. He needed to take a shower. He needed to shave. He needed to brush his teeth and be a person again. Somehow. Today. He needed. Last night had been... He couldn't remember.

“You can't make me go away.”

Derek pushed the hallway bathroom door shut behind himself and drew clumsy hands to his face. His palms scraped against stubble. When he looked in the mirror, he saw bloodshot eyes, dark circles, and a wiry mess of gray-dusted, curly hair. He swallowed. No wonder Meredith had seemed upset. He looked like he'd barely survived a—

Derek! Hang on; I'm coming!

“Pretending I'm not here won't work.”

Derek shook his head and sighed. He looked like he hadn't slept. Which he hadn't. Not... mostly.

He relieved himself, and then he shaved as he stared into his own haunted eyes. The razor swerved across his face and rasped against his skin. Tilting his head made the room feel like it was toppling, and he gripped the lip of the sink with his free hand. He needed to shave today. He needed to wear a suit. He needed...

Something.

Derek!

His hand shook, and he paused with the razor as the mirror world beyond the silver glass shifted into endless white. His body was falling. The ground met his back, and he couldn't breathe. He couldn't breathe, and his own blood slicked his hands. No, Mr. Clark... Derek's fingers grasped at nothing but air as he begged.

The mirror snapped as Derek yanked it back on its hinges, revealing the medicine cabinet behind it, full of over-the-counter medications, band-aids, gauze, a small set of scissors, extra packs of dental floss, and even a scalpel, courtesy of living in a house full of surgeons. His razor clattered in the sink.

“Stop,” Derek told the shelves in front of him. “Leave me alone.”

Silence stretched. The tension in the waiting became unbearable as he washed his face. He moved away from the sink, from his dying shadow in the mirror. Mr. Clark said nothing. The chilly air made Derek shiver as he peeled off his shirt and slipped down his cotton plaid pajama pants to pool at his feet. Still nothing, and Derek paused, reveling in the silence. No ridicule. No tormenting. No flashes of death or mayhem.

He swallowed, and he closed his eyes, and he let the room revolve around his head. He had to reach for the sink to steady himself, but he listened to the quiet. His awareness shifted away. Nothing. If he let his brain stop thinking, if he let himself stop fighting the current of impairment, there was nothing, and it was... Nice. Really nice.

For a long moment, he let the force of it sweep him away. His muscles relaxed. His breaths evened. He stared, but it didn't matter, because his eyes didn't process. Time didn't pass, except it did.

They lay on towels on the docks, their hands interlocked as they stared at the cerulean sky. Seattle had that sort of idyllic, cloudless sky perhaps a few weeks out of the entire year. Here, though, the endless blue was just that. Endless. Eternal. No rain. No weather. Just perfect. Water lapped at the dock supports and spread out beyond them like a plane of chopped glass. A rim of spruce and pines divided sky and earth.

“You took a lot of pills last night,” she said.

He tilted his head to the side. His cheek met sun-baked terrycloth. Her eyes glittered. Her fingers stroked his hand.

“So, what?” he said.

“It's just...” She bit her lip. “That was a lot.”

He looked away. “I was having nightmares.”

“I know,” she said. She rolled onto her side and mashed against him. He grunted as her slight weight fell into his space. She kissed his throat, nuzzled the juncture where his throat met his chin, and kissed him again. Her tiny fingers toiled with a twist of dark, curly hair nestled between his pectorals. “I'm sorry you can't sleep,” she said. “It sucks. But—”

“I didn't come here for lectures,” he said.

Meredith didn't speak. She sighed. She rolled away and looked at the sky.

“What's wrong?” he said, feeling like a broken record. Nothing should be wrong here. Why had wrongness followed him?

“Nothing.”

“You're lying to me,” he said.

She swallowed, and she looked at him. “Please, don't take more,” she said. “I think you might hurt yourself if you do.” She kissed him. “I have a vested interest in you not hurting yourself, you know.”

“Meredith, please,” he said. He grabbed her hand. “I need it.”

“You don't,” she hissed. “And stop calling me Meredith. I'm not her.”

“Yes, you are,” he said. “You're her. You're her, and I need you.”

She glared. “Get out, Derek. Stop letting him win.”
The room snapped back into place. He blinked, and the daze dissipated. His body existed. He brushed his newly shaven cheeks with his palms. With some difficulty, he leaned into the shower, stretched across a porcelain void, and twisted the knobs, mixing hot and cold water until he had inviting warmth.

Little things surprised him, like when he'd noticed that he could sleep on his stomach, though it had felt weird. Then, a few weeks after that, he'd found himself on his stomach in the morning, and he'd felt nothing. No pain. No little twists underneath his ribs. He could lift. Not a ton, or he'd get twinges. But he could lift. Three days earlier, he'd had sex with Meredith, and he'd supported himself. Not for the whole time. It had hurt. But he'd managed for a while, and she'd stared up at him with a glassy, loving gaze. Stairs didn't bother him. He didn't need naps, just a few rest stops now and then to regather.

“Such progress,” Gary Clark said. “You're my idol.”

Derek turned on the spray and stepped over the lip of the tub into the heat. Two months ago, he'd needed help to do something so simple. Mark and Meredith both had assisted him into the shower because he'd been unable to lean and twist to turn on the water, let alone maneuver over the slippery porcelain lip without toppling. A little before that, he'd barely been able to walk to the bathroom, and a little before that, he'd been in a bed with a machine breathing for him, helpless.

Hi, she'd said, her voice warbling with tears. Oh, god, hi. She'd touched his face, and he hadn't been able to move.

Water pounded his body. Steam billowed. He dipped his head under the warmth and sighed. The stream cascaded over his face and sluiced from the tip of his chin.

The mistake was closing his eyes to shut out the water. Before, he'd had a sink to grip. A dry one. And a rug to scrunch between his toes. As soon as his eyelids crashed together, the running faucet sensation in his skull swelled like the crush of a wave. The room tipped. He reached for the side of the shower, but his wet hands scrabbled on cold tile. He gasped. His feet lost purchase. And he slipped.

In a flailing, desperate gamble for balance, he reached for the plastic shampoo rack, only to have it snap apart and tumble after him in pieces. Shampoo and conditioner and lotion bottles slammed into him. His hip connected with the spigot as he collapsed. He landed in a heap at the bottom of the shower. Water plunked down around him. He breathed, bell rung, and blinked as he sat in a pile of bottles, sharp plastic, and a gold-colored bar of Dial soap. He gasped. His feet lost purchase. And he slipped.

How had that happened?

“Because you're high, idiot,” said the deep, caustic voice of his tormenter.

Derek closed his eyes and swallowed back nausea. Sitting, the swirl wasn't as bad when he couldn't see because he had nowhere to fall. He let his head thunk against the cold tiles. Warm water slipped over his skin. He imagined it was her hands. Touching him. He smiled as he focused on the faucet flowing behind his eyes. A distant sort of bliss, untapped. His lips parted. He let the blackness beyond his eyelids revolve around him. And then, without any effort at all, the world snapped away from him like a rubber band, and he didn't have to listen to Gary Clark anymore.

Her arms wrapped around him. “Derek, please, what are you doing to yourself?” she said, her voice hoarse. She kissed his neck as he lay cradled in her arms in a bath of light. Seattle had disappeared. He lay with her naked in a perfect sprawl of nothing, her flesh to his flesh. He didn't hurt, and he didn't fear. Why did she have to nag?

His lip quivered. “He did this. Not me.”

“He didn't,” she said against his ear. “You're doing it.”

“This is the only place I have,” Derek said. “Please, don't take it away from me.”

Her fingers ran through his hair. “You can't come here anymore.”

“Where will I go?”

She smiled, though her eyes glistened. “Someplace real, Derek. I think you're ready if you'd just take the leap.”

He blinked, back in the shower, waterlogged and cold. The heat had leached out of the water, and the blood streaming from his wrist had stopped, leaving a small gash the width of his thumb. His wristwatch would hide that small bit of carnage. He glanced at his body, startled to find a darkening bruise the size of a softball over his left hip. It didn't ache. He shifted. Bottles tumbled into the tub basin, wedging themselves between him and the porcelain. Plastic plinked.

He reached for the lip of the tub. His fingers wrapped around it. He gripped. All fine. But when he pulled, his chest squeezed, and he couldn't stop the grunt of discomfort that spiraled through him. Flames engulfed his healing sternum. He swallowed as unbidden tears of discomfort flecked his eyes. He blinked, trying to catch his breath. Pain thumped in his chest with every heart beat. Every inhalation.

He couldn't get up. He'd gotten better, but he couldn't lift himself. That was just too much. He tried to push up with his feet and shaky quads, but the slippery floor of the shower prevented any hope of gaining purchase. He shivered from the chill of the water and the cold air. He turned the knobs, and the spray ceased, leaving him dripping and crumpled and helpless.

“You can't do it,” said Mr. Clark. He roared with laughter. “Pathetic.”

“It hurts,” Derek said.

“So, call her,” Mr. Clark said. “Call your wife. Let her fish you out of this like a guppy on a hook.”

Derek flailed for the lip of the tub, and he pulled until his muscles shook. Bottles rolled underneath him. His skin squeaked as it slipped on the porcelain. Through the haze, the center line down his chest screamed as he moved. A moan burbled over his lips, but he didn't stop pulling until he'd fumbled to his feet. When he let go, he expected relief, but instead he felt as though he'd ripped off a band-aid inside his chest.

“Fuck!” he belted. Stinging tears welled from his eyes. He couldn't stop them. It fucking hurt.

Footsteps thundered up to the door. The doorknob twisted, but he'd locked it. When had he locked it? “Derek!” Meredith said, her voice muffled. The warble of panic in her tone made his heart squeeze. “Derek, did you fall?” The door rattled as she knocked. “Are you okay?”

He forced himself to breathe through the agony, and he hobbled out of the tub. His balance spun out from him like a car doing donuts in an icy parking lot. His body swayed into the shower stall door. Glass shrieked as the door slipped on its tracks. He slid an inch. Bones jarred. Pain rolled through his body, and he stood there, naked, dripping, hunched, the towel rack carving a furrow into his bruised hip. He vibrated with hurt. He stood still, but the room wouldn't stop spinning.

“I'm...” He clenched his teeth and breathed. Once. Twice. He didn't think he'd re-broken anything. He swept his palm past the lurid, ugly knob between his clavicles to the scar that trailed down his torso underneath it. He felt warped skin where Cristina's blade had sliced him in half, but his sternum underneath remained smooth. Not off kilter as though a fault line had slipped. Noisy pain was already subsiding into a dull hum. He hurt, but he didn't feel something had shifted inside or snapped, nor had he heard anything pop or crack. No, he just felt battered and stupid. “I'm fine,” he said.

She tested the doorknob again. “Did you fall?”

“No,” he said. With a shaky breath, he pushed away from the shower door. He wiped the tears away from his eyes. “No, I'm fine.”

“You yelled.”

“The shampoo rack fell, and everything hit me,” he said. Not a lie. Not really. She didn't have to know that part had happened earlier. “I'll fix it later.”

A long pause. “And you're okay?”

“I'm said I'm fine,” he snapped. Why didn't she believe him? His muscles tensed, and he closed his eyes. Except that made the room waver around his frame. Gravity seemed to leave him. The rug under his feet disappeared. Free fall without falling. Vague nausea coiled at the sensation. He opened his eyes and sighed.

He took a long, slow breath, and regathered himself. “I'm fine,” he repeated in a calmer tone.

Another long silence followed. He wondered if she'd left, if he'd scared her off for good this time with his molten temper, but then the floor creaked, and a line of moving shadow passed underneath the door. He imagined her beyond the door, biting her lip and looking pensive and cute as she shifted from foot to foot. He pulled his fluffy blue towel from the rack and wrapped it around his waist, careful to cover the ugly bruise. He steeled himself. He gripped the doorknob. Smooth brass filled his hand. And then he turned the knob.

She stood there, a lone, small island in the empty hallway. She chewed on her lip, exactly as he'd imagined. And she did look pensive and cute. His heart squeezed.

He put on his best smile and leaned against the door frame. He focused on her face. The tiny freckles that dotted her skin. On her long brown eyelashes. On the gray of her irises and the endless pools of her pupils. Shadows of himself danced in her eyes. He watched those. He watched her. He watched his wife, and the room stilled from its annoying spinning.

“Watching me sleep,” he said. He took a breath and leaned closer. “Watching me in a towel.” The remaining ache became numb as he kissed her. “Are you stalking me, Meredith Grey?”

“Yeah,” she said. “Stalking.”

“I'm going back to work today,” he said. “You can stalk me all day, now, you know.”

“I could.” Her voice wavered. She brushed under her nose with her index finger and sniffed. Her inhalation sounded wet.

“If you want to stalk me to a supply closet, that might help my day go quicker. I'm—”
Her eyes reddened and spilled. She covered her mouth with her hand. Tears glistened on her face, clear and sparkling in the early morning light, and they drew his attention to her. Not her as an anchor for him. Just her. Her eyes were puffy and swollen. Like this hadn't been the first time she'd cried that morning. Like she'd been crying while he'd been an uncoordinated oaf fumbling around in the shower.

His heart trembled. He hated when she cried. He hated when she was upset. Why hadn't he noticed the puffy face sooner?

“Need I repeat myself?” said Mr. Clark.

“Meredith,” Derek said, his voice soft. “Are you okay?”

“I'm fine,” she said.

He left the support of the door frame and wrapped his arms around her. He'd never felt so clumsy and inadequate in his life. “What happened? Are you upset about the miscarriage again?”

“No,” she said. She pressed her face against his chest. The tip of her nose touched the pink scar between his pectorals. She breathed as though she were inhaling the scent of his body. He held her close. She was so small in his arms. Small, but... So strong, too.

“Then what's wrong?” he said.

“It's your first day back today.”

He nodded. “It is.”

She looked up at him. “Are you okay? I mean really?”

A lump formed in his throat. He forced himself to smile. “I'm okay,” he said.

“Oh, you liar,” said Gary Clark. “You can't even fucking walk straight.”

Derek stiffened. Her palms brushed his arms. Her stare burned him. How long had he been awake?

“Not very,” said Mr. Clark.

And how many times had Derek already painted untruths?

Mr. Clark snorted. “I lost count.”

“Still an eight?” Meredith prodded.

Derek swallowed. “I guess.”

“You didn't sleep last night,” she said. “You were yelling.”

He blinked, and any attempt at mirth slipped through him like grains of sand passing through an hourglass. He'd been full. And now he'd been abandoned.

“I'm sorry if I kept you up,” he said.

The world blurred and turned to colored slivers. He sniffed. The bright hallway sharpened as he blinked. A pair of fat, pathetic tears crept down his face. He brushed them away with clumsy fingers as his face heated. He was so fucking tired of all of this. It would be easy to let the spinning room spin him away.

Easy.

And yet...

Her grip tightened around his arms. “Derek, that wasn't my point, and you know it.”

“I slept some,” he said.

“Yeah, after you—” she began, only to be interrupted as a long, lonely howl crept through the house. The hairs on the nape of his neck stood up at the sound. Meredith sighed. “I haven't fed Sam yet.”

“I'll do it.”

“No, you still need to get ready,” she said. “I'll do it.”

“Meredith—”

“I'll do it, Derek,” she snapped.

Frosty silence stretched. Nausea quivered in his gut. He swallowed around the lump in his throat. The whiplash of her mood swing left him uncertain of anything but the fact that if he said something, it was sure to be the wrong thing.

Mr. Clark chuckled. “Now, I guess you know how she feels.”

Derek took a long, slow breath. “But you've been crying,” he said, his voice low.

She glared. “Well, so have you.”

He didn't really have anything with which to counter that. He stood, silent.

“Get dressed or whatever,” she said. She turned on her heels and left him before he could protest. Her footsteps thumped down the hall. He watched her retreat, wanting to say something, anything. But he didn't.

He listened to the sounds of her moving downstairs. Samantha yipped. He heard the tap of the dog’s nails on the floor, and he heard the lilt of Meredith’s voice. Not the words. Just the tone. Samantha would feel loved, even if Meredith wanted to smash something with a mallet.

He shuffle-stepped to the master bedroom, where he would have changed. Would have gotten ready for work. He sat on the bed in his wet towel instead. The mattress sank with his weight. A lump formed in his throat as he stared across the empty room. He didn't know why. His chest tightened. He thought about lying down instead of getting up and getting dressed. Two opposite courses of action, warring.

Dread collected like a solid ball in his gut. He'd been back to Seattle Grace almost every day for a few hours since his follow up check and his panic attack. Trying to build up his tolerance. Trying to get himself used to people again. But he could have left anytime. He could have opted not to go, then. He'd had options. Today...

No options.

A shadow lumbered past the corner of his eye like a living thing, and Derek twitched. Turned.
Apprehension tightened every sinew in his body.

The shaft of sunlight that had once framed Meredith on the chair remained empty. Dust motes swirled around nothing. The birds outside chirped, an incongruous, happy reminder that he shouldn't feel like this.

He closed his eyes and let the room swirl. The revolutions didn't seem so bad anymore. He sighed as he fingered the damp terrycloth covering his legs. He tried to force his mind blank and couldn't. Gary Clark stared at him from the empty chair. No matter if he was really there or not, his tormenter waited, and Derek felt eyes. Staring.

Derek took a long, steadying breath. Black dripped over his senses like sticky, thick tar. Gary Clark laughed at his efforts.

Then the laughing stopped. The birds stopped. Everything crumpled into a muffle of sound and light.

When he opened his eyes again, he wasn't in his bedroom.

The empty stainless-steel table stretched out in front of him, gleaming in the bright overhead lights. The doorless, tiled walls echoed his breaths back to him. He stood in the center of the quiet thunder. His gaze dropped to the instrument tray. Scalpels gleamed. But she wasn't there.

Ghosts of her presence slipped at the edges of his perception. Like the tickle of her laughter against his ears. The touch of her lips against his skin. The liminal hint of lavender he kept thinking he smelled, but when he inhaled, only sterile, empty air that was neither hot nor cold touched his nostrils. He waited for her to appear, but when he turned, emptiness greeted him.

"Where did you go?" he said. His voice bounced off the walls.

No one answered.

He prowled in a circuit around the room. Shiny instruments. Silence. Nothing else. With a sigh, he pushed his back against the cold wall and slid to the ground. He closed his eyes. Bright lights beat against his pupils even through his eyelids.

Birds chirped. A distant set of wind-chimes tapped against each other in the breeze. What birds? What breeze? He opened his eyes and found himself back in the bedroom. Resigned, he fumbled his way to the closet. Meredith had hung up a freshly pressed pair of slacks and a shirt for him on the doorknob. He couldn't help but chuckle at her tiny attempt at domesticity. She never ironed unless Hell was frozen. Usually, he was the one stuck doing it, even for her clothes. The fact that she'd done it for him made him smile. She hadn't stamped out many of the wrinkles, but she'd gotten some. Enough for the clothes to be presentable. He brushed his hand along the fabric. Black pants, with a bright blue shirt just like the shirt he'd gotten shot in except there was no bullet hole. No blood. He pulled on the pants and the shirt as he stared at nothing in particular.

When in doubt, always go with blue. It brings out the blue in your eyes.

He moved into the master bathroom to brush his teeth. The scent of unlit, waxy candles filled his body. He inhaled as he remembered the way her laugh crawled along his skin. He'd kissed her wet shoulders in the flickering light. I can do slow. He brushed his teeth on that thought and no other. When he spat out the used toothpaste, he looked into the mirror. He saw himself as he'd looked the morning he'd left for his last day of work. Except he was different. Thinner. More stretched across his bones. Darker. Tired. Not happy. A stranger. He slicked his wet hair back with product, but he didn't spend much time on taming the mess.

“I guess this means you're off to save the day?” Mr. Clark said.

Derek glanced at his pill bottles, which rested on the lip of the sink. He'd come in here last night with them. To hide from her while he supplanted desire. His stomach tightened and twisted. He gripped the sides of the sink. Porcelain dug into his bones as a deep, cold need so profound swept through him that his body shook.

“Take more,” Mr. Clark taunted. “Shut me up like a coward who can't bear the truth. That's the spirit.”

“Stop talking to me,” Derek said. “Please. Just stop.”

“Why should I?”

“You're not real,” Derek said.

“So, the weeks you spent at the hospital, and the months you've spent at home, helpless and weak and pathetic... Those were just figments of your imagination?”

Derek closed his eyes as phantom pain sliced into him. He felt quivery. Like his body would explode if someone would only pull the trigger... “He was real,” Derek said. “Those were real.” He took a deep breath, deep enough that his sternum, taxed from the accident in the tub, whispered with ache. He took another deep breath, and another, and another. His lip trembled. His legs felt weak. The barrel of a gun faced him in a stretch of endless white. Maybe, he would fall again. Maybe, he would—

“Woof!”

He opened his eyes as his hand brushed the cap of the Percocet bottle. Samantha sat on her haunches at his feet, her big, black body sleek and comforting against his knees. He reached to stroke her head. Soft fur slipped underneath his palm. She panted, and the raspy sound of it soothed him.

“Hey, Sam,” Derek said. He sounded rough. Weak. Shaky. Even to his own ears. “I thought Meredith was going to feed you.”

Samantha had no answers for him. She stared with large, chocolate-colored eyes. Her tongue lolled, giving him the vague impression of a smile. He swallowed, and he left the security of the sink. She stood, and she guided him down the stairs. The house seemed to be performing cartwheels around his head. He took the steps one at a time, leaning on the railing, leaning on the dog, leaning on anything that helped keep the floor under his feet. Samantha went with him and matched his speed.

When he moved into the kitchen, he frowned. Kibble filled Samantha's bowl to the brim. She'd left her morning meal to come upstairs? Samantha left him, then. She made deep gulping sounds as she resumed inhalation of the breakfast she'd been howling for minutes earlier.

Derek's gaze roamed to Meredith, who sat at the small kitchen table with a bowl of Raisin Bran while she read a neurosurgical journal he didn't recognize. Meredith didn't look at him. She stabbed her spoon into the bran. Milk leaped from the bowl and splattered around the edges. Pocked splotches in the place mat told him this wasn't the first time she'd tried to murder her bowl, and it wasn't the first time the milk had escaped its torture.
An empty bowl and clean spoon sat across the table from her on the opposite place mat. The jug of milk rested in the center of the table with the open box of Raisin Bran. The smiling Kellogg sun seemed to glare at him from the box.

He sat in the space she'd set for him. The thought of food made him feel a bit sick, but he poured himself a bowl anyway. A small one. He took a bite, expecting cardboard. Cardboard it was. He couldn't bring himself to chew it much. When he swallowed, the bran felt like blades slicing down his throat.

“You're coming home after lunch today?” Meredith said without looking up from the journal.

“Yeah,” he replied. He forced himself to take another bite. “At two.” After the spectacle of Derek's panic attack, Richard had insisted Derek only work partial days to begin with. Derek hadn't protested. He didn't really want to work at all.

“You'll be here when I get home at nine?” Meredith said.

He frowned. “Where else would I be?”

“I don't know.” She shrugged. “Out.”

“Me,” he said. “Out.” He couldn't keep his grip on the sardonic laugh that burbled in his chest. It escaped and slashed at the air.

She glared. “Well, you used to go to Joe's a lot. Or you fished. Or whatever. You have to start going out again sometime. How am I supposed to know whether that's tonight or next week or in two years?”

Silence stretched.

He looked at his lap. “It's my first day back, Meredith,” he said. “I'll probably collapse the second I get home.”

She blinked. “Oh,” she said. “Right.” She slammed her spoon into the bowl and crammed the heaping pile of Raisin Bran in her mouth. Her cheeks bulged like a chipmunk, which, under normal circumstances, he would have found adorable. Something to smile about as he watched his wife do adorable things. Instead, he felt sick.

He reached across the table and touched her wrist. She froze. “Meredith,” he said, his voice soft. She dumped her spoon into the half-eaten bowl. Her face reddened as she stared. “What, Derek!”

“What did the Raisin Bran ever do to you?”

She stared at him for a long time, but she didn't answer. She yanked her napkin off her lap and wiped away the wet remnants of milk and bran from her lips. She threw the napkin on the table beside her bowl, and she said, “Are you ready to go?”

He glanced at her bowl. She never left anything in the bowl, and yet she'd left mouthfuls behind. “You haven't finished eating,” he said.

“I can't eat right now.”

“Why?”

“Because I can't eat,” she snapped. “Are you ready to go?”
A sick, guilty feeling coiled in his gut, and he didn't know why. He stared at the bowl in front of him. The bowl he'd taken two bites from. She always nagged him to eat.

“T’m ready,” he said, his voice soft.

“Liiiar,” Mr. Gary said in a sing-song voice.

“I'll crate the dog,” Meredith said as she stood. “Meet you at the car?” she added, though it was not a question or a request. She turned to the dog, away from him, and clapped her hands. “C'mon, Sam,” she said. Samantha looked up from her empty bowl and barked at the sound of her name.

Meredith proceeded to leave Derek's presence in the room unacknowledged, as though he were a coat draped on the chair or something else inanimate. Derek swallowed. He stood. He grabbed his briefcase from the hallway closet. And then he walked to the car, feeling a little bit like he'd been hit by one.

He climbed into his Cayenne on the passenger side and settled his briefcase by his feet. His briefcase. Something he hadn't touched in months. He couldn't even remember what he'd put in it, and he didn't really care, either.

The taillights of Meredith's lonely green Jeep blurred as he stared through the windshield at the driveway. Crushed gravel sprawled under the Jeep's tires. Shadows skittered across the driveway as the leaves in the trees overhead moved. He closed his eyes, and he listened. The spinning was gone. Or... mostly gone. Enough of it remained to leave him off balance. Unsteady on his feet.

He heard her footsteps on the walk. That was the only reason he didn't flinch or startle when she ripped open the door across from him. She wrestled herself more than settled herself into the driver's side seat. A flowery curse slipped into the air between them as she missed with the seat belt and jabbed the upholstery with the buckle instead. A soft click followed on her second try as the buckle slid into place. She heaved her huge tote purse into the back seat. The car rocked with the motion.

“I guess I'm driving,” she said as she stabbed the key into the ignition and turned it. Her lips formed a flat line. “Again.”

The car rumbled to life. He stared at her. At the anger frothing from her tiny body. She'd been upset. Crying. Unwilling to talk. And, now... He blinked. Something he'd done? But what had he done...?

She raised her eyebrows at him. “When are you going to start driving again?”

He swallowed. “I don't know.”

She stared, and he felt like the seat beneath him withered away. Sinking. He was sinking. He had no idea what was upsetting her, but he was smart enough to know he'd picked the wrong thing to say. He looked away first. His chest tightened, and his heart ran away from him. Thu-thump. Thu-thump.

“Mere, I—”

She ignored him, and instead twisted the gearshift into reverse. The transmission wailed at her violence. The noise hit his ears muted, from somewhere far away, as he listened to his blood rush. She backed the car out of the driveway. His stomach flip-flopped when he tipped forward, a slave to inertia.
“Meredith, what is wrong?” he said as he righted himself.

She didn't answer. He braced himself against the door as the car bounced into the street. She pushed the gearshift into drive. The car roared underneath them as she slammed on the accelerator. Inertia pasted him to his seat. Scenery churned past them in a blur of greens, grays, and blues. But he didn't watch the specifics. He watched her. Blush bloomed on her face in a slow, delicate crawl. She kept her eyes plastered to the road ahead of them, as though she knew that he was watching her every breath and hated it.

He stared into his lap instead. He wanted to know what was wrong, not embarrass her by his scrutiny.

“Maybe, she knows,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek clenched his hands and jaws. He wouldn't reply to a fucking figment anymore. Whether it made him feel better or not. He picked at the seam of the left cuff of his shirt to vent nervous energy. How could he deal with work today when he couldn't even deal with her?

Mr. Clark snorted. “Pathetic.”

Derek closed his eyes. Stop it. Stopitstopitstopit.

“Can I wake you up tonight when I get home?” Meredith said abruptly.

He opened his eyes. The highway stretched out in front of them. He watched a green Jeep much like Meredith's split off from the road and curve away as an exit flashed past in the side mirror. His muscles tightened when he realized they were almost there. How had they gotten there so fast? He dared to look at her. Her blush had receded, at least.

“You can always wake me up,” he said.

“Okay,” she said.

She nodded. Her lithe body stiffened. Her lips flattened into a grim, determined line, and her upset expression leaked away. As though she were resolving herself to do something she didn't want to do. He'd seen it before when she went to tell a waiting, sobbing relative that her husband or brother or father had just died. He'd seen it when she'd demanded that he discuss his nightmares with her.

“Meredith, what is this about?” he said.

She wouldn't look at him. “I need to talk to you about something.”

“So, talk to me, now.”

She sighed. “I can't.”

“Why can't you?”

“Because this isn't the sort of thing I can discuss with you in our freaking car on the way to work.”

Cold silence. Buzzing nerves became a chorus. He gripped the door handle. Despite the confusion and misery of this conversation, a small seed of hope bloomed. “Are you pregnant?” he said.

She snorted. “You're an asshole.”

“But I—”
“I’m not pregnant,” she said. Her hand drifted to her womb. “And I'm not PMSing, either.” She blew out a breath as they barreled down the exit to the main street.

“But—”

Her pager shrilled.

“Would you check that?” she said. Her fingers squeaked as she worried at the steering wheel. “I'm watching the road.”

He sighed. “Meredith...”

Her temples fluttered as she ground her jaws together, as though she were holding onto another outburst by a thread. “Please,” she said through gritted teeth.

He twisted in his seat to grab her purse from behind him. His chest, fatigued from repeated punishment, flared with pain. He winced, but held onto the gasp that wanted to escape with all of his might. She said nothing, her eyes riveted on the road. With a jabbing motion, he managed to hook the straps of her purse onto his index finger, and he pulled. Her heavy purse slammed into his lap. Fire funneled through his body as he resettled. For a moment, all he could do was sit there, trying not to breathe or move.

A horn honked. Through the blur of his eyelashes, he saw lines and lines of cars. The parking lot. When had they gotten to Seattle Grace?

“Well?” she prodded.

“Um,” he said, more a verbal tick than anything else. A closeted expression of pain. He took a breath. The fire extinguished. Slowly. He pulled her pager from the clip inside her purse and squinted at the pixelated display. “911. They want you in the pit.”

“Ohokay,” she said as she pulled into one of the staff parking spaces closest to the main door. She turned off the car and whipped the keys from the ignition.

“Meredith, please,” he said.

“I'm late, Derek,” she replied. She leaned across the parking brake, gave him a peck on the cheek, and said without smiling, “I'll talk to you later.” The weight from her purse disappeared. She slipped out of the car, and the door slammed. Muffled silence stretched wide in the car.

He blinked, bewildered, as he watched her go. She stopped two parking spaces away and turned on her heels. Tears that hadn’t been there seconds earlier made her face look red and snarly. Her feet scraped the pavement as she ran back to the car. She pulled open his door, and before he had a chance to speak, she wrapped her arms around him and crushed him in a tight embrace.

“I love you,” she said against his ear. She pulled the hair at the nape of his neck as she clenched her fingers into a fist. “Please, please, don't push yourself today.” The warm, soft smell of her body wrapped him like a cloak, but before he could take any sort of comfort, she stepped away.

“Meredith, wait—”

“I just can't,” she said, her voice sharp like shattered glass. She sniffed and wiped her face. “Not right now, okay?” Her lower lip quivered. “Please,” she said, her voice raw. Please was a word she teased him about, always mentioning that she was helpless to say no whenever he chose to utter it. He wondered if she realized he suffered from a similar affliction with regards to her. He reached for her. The chaos in his head eased. Wet, slippery tears rubbed away with his fingertips when he touched her skin.

He swallowed. “Okay,” he said.

When she left him again, she didn't return. He watched her, head spinning, for once not from dizziness, but utter confusion. He'd never seen her like this. Never.

He closed his eyes and tried to relax, but sounds kept intervening. The distant chirp of an ambulance pulling into the ambulance bay. Cars prowling in the parking lot, engines growling. People walking and talking. Birds chattering in the trees. The stiff breeze's moan as it whistled through the side mirrors of the car. After ten minutes, he gave up, and he glanced at his watch.

Late. Just like Meredith.

He picked up his briefcase, climbed out of the car, shut the car door behind him, and walked across the parking lot. He looked at the towering hospital as he approached the main entrance, and he felt nothing. No twinge of nerves. No fear. No apprehension. He walked across the threshold, just as he'd conditioned himself to do over the last few weeks, and he felt nothing. He walked toward the elevator where he'd proposed to Meredith. Proposing had been a good thing, a good memory, but the elevator brought him close to the catwalk, which was a bad thing. He still felt nothing, even as the elevator car ascended. Three more things to catalog in his little book of surprises.

“Good morning, Dr. Shepherd,” said Dr. Weller in a deep baritone voice as Derek stepped off the elevator. Dr. Weller smiled. He clutched a patient chart in his hand. The pages had been flipped back, as if he were examining every minute detail of the patient's history. “You're back to work today?”

Dr. Weller was a tall, thin man. Taller than Derek by at least four inches, maybe five. Taller than Mark, even. Derek looked up at the man who had replaced him as head of neurosurgery. Dr. Nelson had fought tooth and nail for the job. He'd puffed himself up and strutted about like an overbearing peacock, talking about how nobody ever remembered he existed, how he was perfectly capable and competent. How he was good at his job. Except he wasn't good. He was adequate. And while Dr. Nelson had been on his self-advertisement campaign, Dr. Weller had been in the OR, quiet, unassuming, fixing people, letting his meticulous work speak for itself. Dr. Weller possessed both better surgical skills and better people skills. The decision, for Derek, had not been a difficult one, and one of Derek's first tasks as Chief had been to calm down a hissing, spitting Dr. Nelson and congratulate Dr. Weller in two back-to-back meetings.

“Part time this week and maybe next,” Derek said. “But, yes.”

Dr. Weller nodded. His skin had a jovial, reddish tint to it, as though he were in a state of perpetual cheer. He reached out with long, lithe fingers and offered his hand. Derek swallowed as they shook hands. “I'm glad you're back,” said Dr. Weller, his voice rich with sincerity.

“Me, too,” Derek said. He flashed his best smile as a ball of ice collected in his stomach. Dr. Weller stepped onto the elevator that Derek had exited. And that was that.

Derek's smile bled away. He'd conditioned himself to go inside Seattle Grace and to act like he didn't hate being around people, but that was about all the progress he'd managed. White, sterile hallways stretched out from his feet. He followed them until white opened into empty space. Echoes bounced off the walls. Footsteps. Voices. He stared at the catwalk where he'd gotten shot, and beyond that, the Chief's office. His office. Two places he hadn't voluntarily stepped foot in since he'd nearly died.

He didn't have time to be upset.

“Derek, it's good to see you back,” Richard Webber said as he approached and put his arm over Derek's shoulder. Richard dragged Derek along as though he were tackling the ball carrier in football, and the blotched floor where Derek had bled swept under Derek's feet in a blur. The door to the Chief's office opened and shut behind them before Derek had a chance to react. Sounds from the outside hospital muted. Derek stood where Dr. Kepner had been, covered in blood and frantic.

“Richard,” Derek managed. He tried to focus on the man who had once been his friend and mentor. Richard wore his lab coat. His stethoscope poked out of the front breast pocket. He rifled through his desk for some papers and turned as he yanked a pen from the knit wire cup by the computer monitor.

“There was fourteen car pileup on the freeway,” Richard said.

Derek blinked. “I'm not cleared for cutting. I can't—”

“Multiple abdominal traumas,” Richard said. “They need another general surgeon.”

“Oh.”

“Look, I realize this is your first day back,” Richard said. “And I realize you've been having... a difficult time.” Derek pressed his lips into a flat line. A difficult time. Understatement. The ball of ice heated into something molten. Richard continued, “I'm sorry for dumping all the budget work on you before you've had a chance to set down your briefcase, but they need bodies downstairs. Now. Dr. Bailey is overrun.”

Derek glanced at his desk. Richard's desk. A sheaf of folders and paperwork sat in a fourteen inch pile on top of the desk calendar that covered the desk's surface. Derek stared at it. “Go ahead,” he said softly.

“You're okay?” Richard said.

“I'm okay.”

“There won't be any surprise welcome back parties, so you don't need to worry about that,” Richard said as he barreled toward the door, brushing past Derek, who hadn't moved. When Richard grasped the door handle, he turned. “By the way.” He pointed at the corner of the room where the coat rack stood. Colorful balloons bobbed against the ceiling. A pile of shiny wrapped gifts and cards full of what Derek could only assume were well wishes rested on the top of the file cabinet. A framed picture of Meredith that Derek had put there when he'd moved his things into the office had become buried. “Those are all for you from the staff,” Richard said.

“Thanks,” Derek said as heat flamed across his cheeks.

And then Richard left, leaving Derek in crushing silence.

Derek looked at the balloons. And then at the desk piled high with paperwork. He blinked. Something swelled in the back of his throat. His eyes stung. His lips pulled back. A soft snarl became a roar, and in a blur of motion, he launched himself across the room. His briefcase slammed into the desk and dropped by his feet. The Chief's stacked paperwork exploded in a flutter of budgetary confetti as Derek rammed into it. With a furious huff of breath that made his chest hurt, he collapsed into the executive chair that had been his for months. Paper crumpled underneath him. He wiped hurting eyes with his hands as the molten ball churned.

I grew up on a farm, so, you know blood... blood doesn't... doesn't bother me, I... Dr. Kepner had said, standing less than ten feet away, covered in another woman's blood.

He closed his eyes as papers that had been balanced precariously dominoed off the edge of the desk. How was he supposed to do this? Any of this? He inhaled. The hospital, even in the Chief's office, had a faint, antiseptic smell that tickled his nose. He leaned back in the chair. The seat rocked with his weight. He let threatening disorientation crush him, and then it swept him away.

"Would it help to show you this?" she said, disembodied.

He sat on the floor in the dreary hallway, shoulder-to-shoulder with Mark. His wet hair and his wet clothes made him shiver. He'd made a puddle on the tiles. Dripping. He shook as he looked up from his knees. Ice formed a block in his chest.

The door opened. She saw her swathed in blankets. Still and cold and blue. The people who surrounded her weren't him. Bailey. Richard. Burke. Even Addie. But Derek had been relegated to the hall to wait.

Derek stood so fast his knees popped and protested. He wiped the clawing tears from his face. "Why would it help me to show you like this?" he snapped.

She didn't answer. Mark didn't move. He stared forward, as though Derek still sat on the floor, crying into his knees.

"I don't want to see this again," Derek said.

No answer.

"Stop it."

Silence. Derek's lower lip quivered. He tried to approach the door that blocked him from where she lay. He couldn't pass. As though an invisible barrier had knit together and barred his way. He couldn't pass. He could only watch as they fought to force her back to life.

For three hours, she'd been dead.

"Please, stop," he begged.

The blackness faded. He sat in his chair, alone. His hands shook. A void had hollowed out his body that he wanted to fill. He knew he needed. Something. Slivers of ache slipped behind his eyes. He pinched his nose with his fingertips and rubbed the bridge of his nose. He placed his elbows on the desk and stared through blurry eyelashes at the pile of work Richard had left for him.

Papers spread around the desk and on the floor as though a hurricane had swept them up and displaced them. He picked up the closest paper, scanned past all the numbers and dollar signs and words, and sighed as he absorbed the page number listed at the bottom. 23 of 76. And that was only for Seattle Grace's plastic surgery department, which was smaller than their world-acclaimed neurosurgery and general surgery departments, mostly because Mark, as good as he was, didn't make a department by himself. Plastic surgeons flocked to Los Angeles. Not Seattle.

Derek spent his first hour back on the job sorting the papers he'd sent flying. His brain tripped every time he tried to shuffle things into order. Staring at text made him feel spacey and disconnected. He double and triple checked page numbers, only to forget what number had come before, and what went after. Other times, he found himself staring at nothing, or chasing a stray thought to the ends of creation, or riding the subtle buzz of elation that made his mind feel like it'd been replaced by cotton balls. He would blink, and it would take minutes to reassemble himself into sentience.

He hated budget work, but after he'd repaired the results of his tantrum and placed everything into neat stacks, he flipped on the computer, pulled up the hospital's accounting software, and he tried, but he suffered much the same problems balancing numbers as he did sorting. It seemed like he had to double check himself after every row. He lost his place over and over. He kept going until his head throbbed with the effort of concentration. Until his eyes refused to focus no matter how hard he tried to make them. He rocked in the chair, venting nervous energy. He needed something.

“You brought this on yourself,” said Gary Clark.

“Shut up,” Derek said.

“You fought for this job. You fucked Richard over. It's your fault.”

Derek loosed an agitated sigh.

“Everything is your fault, you know.”

He didn't know what he was doing until the second bitter-tasting pill was falling apart on his tongue in a mess of his own saliva. He swallowed, confused, and yet not surprised by the orange bottle in his hand. The pills slipped into his stomach. He closed his eyes, and as the minutes passed, the carousel began to spin. He sighed. The empty hole had been filled, and Gary Clark shut his fucking mouth. Finally. Derek looked at the bottle, lethargic, and put it back into his briefcase where he'd stowed it. When had he stowed it? Did it matter?

No. He swallowed, and he closed his eyes, and this time, she returned.

_He found himself in a place he didn't recognize. He stood on a lush, green hillside with grass that came up to his knees, a rolling hill in the middle of hundreds. A weeping willow draped the crest of the hill. Crows circled, gliding up and down in the gray air currents as they mourned with woeful caws. He swallowed when he turned and saw Meredith standing by a chipped marble headstone. The dirt on the plot lay fresh at her feet, churned and black and rich with nutrients._

_Derek C. Shepherd, said the elaborate headstone. April 7, 1968 – September 9, 2010. Beloved son and husband._

_Meredith looked up as he approached. The long grass caught his ankles. He slogged through it, his eyes riveted by the sight before him. The breeze ruffled his hair and made the willow sway. Leaves rustled._

_He came to an unsteady stop two feet from the stone, panting. His feet sank into the loose earth. He stared at the dates sprawled across the headstone. September 9th was less than a month away. “What is this?” he said._

_She shrugged. “Isn't it obvious?”_

_He couldn't look at her. “But it's safe here,” he said._

_She pointed at the headstone. “It's not safe. Think like a doctor.”_

_“I don't know what you mean.”_
“You do, Derek. You do know,” she said. “You’re just ignoring it because you want something easy.”

“I don’t,” he said. “I’m not.”

Meredith stared at him. “Percocet has acetaminophen in it,” she said, speaking low and soft as though she were teaching a kindergartener. “Do you remember that?”

“Yes,” he said.

“What does acetaminophen do in large doses?”

His lip trembled. “It's a painkiller.”

“I don’t remember.”

“You do,” she insisted. “You do remember. It's basic medicine.”

“Please, don’t.”

She wrapped her arms around him. The soft scent of lavender made his muscles loosen. He breathed against her hair, and he couldn’t stop himself as frustration tumbled out of him. He sobbed. Once. And then he rested his nose against the warm skin of her neck, breathing, existing. The rush of blood under her skin heated him, reminded him he lived. Her grip tightened. She kissed his ear, and she ran her skillful hands along the trembling sinews of his back. He closed his eyes, and the crows and the weeping willow and the gravestone disappeared behind his eyelids. This was what he needed today.

“You can’t be here anymore,” she said. “If you keep coming here, you can never go back there.”

He took a shaky, deep breath. “I don’t care about there. I hate it there.”

“That’s bullshit.”

He shook his head. “It's not. It's not. I want to be here.”

She tugged on his sleeve, and they sat, shoulder-to-shoulder, their backs against the cold stone that marked his plot. For an eternity, she said nothing and stared at her knees instead. He watched the black birds flying in the distance, and he let the gray clouds and the crows’ black, feathery bodies blur into a bleak, impressionistic painting.

“You want to be with Meredith, right?” she said, her voice soft. Gentle.

“I do.”

“And you want to have a baby?”

“I do,” he said. “I want that so much.”

She swallowed. Her fingers touched his face. She pulled his gaze toward her, until their eyes met. He lost himself in deep, sad gray. She blinked, and when she blinked, wet tears popped loose. Her distress crushed him.
“I'm not her, Derek,” she said. “And you can't be a father if you stay in here.”

“But you have her face.”

She shook her head. “I showed you what happened while Meredith was dead,” she said. “Would Meredith remember that?”

Derek swallowed. “But—”

“You needed me to be her before,” notMeredith said. “You don't need it, now. Now, you need to listen to me, Derek.”

“I don’t know what that means.”

Her body shimmered as though she’d been strung with a thousand Christmas tree lights. The flash made his eyes hurt. He blinked and turned his head away until the bright white faded from view.

When he looked back, he saw himself like a twin in the mirror. The other Derek wore the same blue shirt and black pants that Derek had dressed in that morning. Except this Derek hadn’t lost weight. He didn’t look tired or stressed or scared. Derek II stared. Their eyes met.

“Are you listening, now?” Derek II said.

Derek could only nod.

“When you have too much acetaminophen, what does it do?” Derek II said, his voice soft.

“It causes liver damage.”

Derek II nodded. “It does,” he said. “And what does too much oxycodone do?” When Derek didn’t answer, Derek II kept prodding. “What does it do, Derek? Think.”

“It causes depressed respiration.” Derek swallowed. “Hypotension. Bradycardia...”

“And?”

“Coma...”

“And?”

“Cardiac arrest,” Derek admitted. “It causes heart failure.”

Derek II nodded. “Do you remember how you felt when Meredith died?”

Derek thought of gray, cold hall where he’d sat, sobbing. “Yes,” said Derek. “I remember.”

“Do you want to put her through the same thing?”

Derek swallowed. He stared at the churned soil over his grave. The gravestone at his back chilled him to the marrow of his bones. His eyes watered. “No, I don’t,” he said, his voice breaking. “I don’t ever want to do that.”

“If you don’t want Meredith to have to go through that, then what are you doing?” Derek II said.

Derek blinked. Tears wobbled in the nets cast by his eyelashes, spilled over, and chased down his face. He swiped at his eyes with his knuckles. “I don't know.”
“If you seriously don't want to die, Derek, then what the fuck are you doing?” Derek II prodded.

“I don't know,” Derek said.

Derek II laughed, but the bitter sound cut like sharp glass, and Derek flinched. “I guess that's the crux of it.”

Derek looked away, and then in a blur, the odd landscape disappeared.

Derek blinked and swallowed. His head felt clogged and full. Like his mental capacity had shrunk. He put his head down on the desk, and he rested for what seemed like eons. The clock on the wall ticked. Probably anybody walking down the catwalk would see him through the glass windows. Sleeping on the job, or at least giving the appearance of it. He peered at the clock. Lunch hour had crept up on stealthy feet. He should at least get a bagel. Or something. He wasn't hungry, but visiting the coffee cart would give him something to do, at least, that might make him appear productive and participatory in the hospital at large.

He squinted as sat up. The paper he'd been resting on stuck to his face, and he pulled it away as he grimaced and stretched. His eye caught mention of her name before any context arrived in his brain, and he pulled the paper back into his field of view. Meredith Grey. Pay scales. Nothing exciting. He shook his head, almost ready to dismiss the paper, when something in the financial blur made him read the spreadsheet more closely.

Meredith Grey. The sheet was alphabetized, which meant Lexie Grey's name was just above Meredith's and served as an easy comparison. His gaze followed the columns left to right. At first, he didn't know why what he was seeing caused niggling doubt. His head felt cloudy, and comprehending through the thick cotton took considerable work. Numbers. Dollar signs. Pay scales. He focused on the text and tried to understand it. This was silly. But then he realized what he was looking at, and in his laggard shift from not knowing to knowing, he tightened his grip on the paper and fought to keep his breathing steady. Both Meredith and Lexie were making the same pay. Both Meredith and Lexie were listed as third year residents. Both of them. He scanned down the page to Karev. Fourth year. Higher salary than Meredith. He would have checked Yang, too, but the page ended on the letter M.

Why hadn't Meredith said anything to him?

Can I wake you up tonight when I get home?

I want to talk to you about something.

“God, damn it,” he said as he slapped the paper back onto the pile. He pushed back his chair and stood. The room swayed like it had that morning. He counted to three before he left the safe island of space where he could still reach out and grab something if he fell. The disorientation settled. Slowly. All while the office space around him seemed to be closing in.

He glanced at the doorway.

A shadow crossed his view, and then she was there, babbling, covered in blood. I grew up on a farm, so, you know blood... blood doesn't... doesn't bother me, I...

“Fuck!” he yelled. “Stop hounding me, you fucking, heartless bitch!”

“You brought her back to work,” Mr. Clark said. “It's your fault she was there that day.”

Derek walked toward her. She was a hallucination. Just like Gary Clark. It didn't matter. They didn't matter. He was fucking hallucinating. Like people with PTSD did. They hallucinated. Her body separated like mist as he exited his office. Outside, he could breathe. The air felt cooler.

“You can't outrun me,” Mr. Clark said. “I'm in your head.”

“Leave me alone,” Derek said.

“Your little solution isn't working so well anymore, is it?” said Mr. Clark. “I think you need to take more.”

Derek needed a walk, and so he took one. A slow one. People said hello. They smiled. They well-wished him. But he couldn't help but notice the stares. Couldn't help but notice the eggshells cracking as people metaphorically tiptoed around him, as though the entire hospital expected him to fall apart in the hallway or have some sort of psychotic break, which he supposed wasn't exactly unjustified. When he found Mark chatting up a voluptuous, blonde nurse in the corner by the oncology ward, Derek felt stress unwinding from his body.

At last, something normal.

Mark smiled as Derek approached. He rested against the lip of the nurses' station desk with his body at a slant and his elbow propping up his torso. A chart lay by his hand. Derek didn't read the whole thing; the mere thought of trying to decipher Mark's usual chicken scratch made his head spin, but he did catch one word in the mess. Rhinoplasty. In an oncology ward? It took Derek a minute to add two plus two. He blinked dumbly at the pair.

“Hey, man,” Mark said. “First day back.”

“Yeah.”

“Hi, Dr. Shepherd,” said Mark's nurse 'friend'. She smiled, showing pearly, bleached teeth. She brushed a stray strand of hair out of her face, smiled shyly behind a waterfall of platinum bangs, and leaned into Mark. “Call me later,” she said, her voice throaty and sultry and sexy, as she slid past Mark's broad shoulder. Her hip brushed Mark's as she went. Derek watched her depart.

Derek raised his eyebrows. If it had been a normal day, and he had never been shot, Derek would have smirked. Teased. Instead, he felt nothing but irritated. He sighed. He rubbed the bridge of his nose. “Seriously, Mark? You used a rhinoplasty chart as an excuse to talk to an oncology nurse?”

“It's not like she could read my writing,” Mark said. “I told her it was for a mastectomy.”

“That's mature of you.”

Mark shrugged. “Lexie's not interested.”

“Oh,” said Derek. Lexie had been spending an inordinate amount of time with Karev. Derek didn't mention it. Silence stretched. He grasped at straws. “Did Meredith talk to you recently?”

Mark cleared his throat as though something had gotten stuck in it. “About what?”

“She's upset about something, but she won't talk to me.”

“Hmm,” Mark said. He fidgeted. Since when did Mark fidget? “No idea, man.”

“She hasn't talked to you?”

“Why would she talk to me?” Mark said.
Derek ground his teeth. “Since I got shot, she's been talking to you. Or hadn't you noticed that?”

“Oh,” Mark said.

“So, has she?”

“Has she what?”

“Talked to you, Mark,” Derek said, rolling his eyes.

“Oh,” Mark said. He jumped and fished his pager out of his pocket. The pager hadn't beeped. He squinted at the screen. “I have to go.”

“Mark, come on,” Derek said. “You didn't get paged. I'm not an idiot.”

“I had it on vibrate,” Mark said. “I gotta go.”

Derek watched his supposed friend depart down the long hall, dodging between moving bodies and crash carts and stretchers. Mark had lied. He'd fucking lied to Derek's face. Derek had seen that type of lie many times before, enough to recognize it without any effort. Mark screwed a lot of women. Inevitably, one would try to continue a relationship past Mark's arbitrarily chosen expiration date. Derek had watched over and over again as Mark had told his latest in a long line of victims that he had other plans without having any other plans except a new lay.

“And yet you missed it entirely when he was fucking your wife,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek stilled.

“Nobody wants to stay with you,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek closed his eyes, drew in a shaky breath and let it out, and he forced himself to focus. Mark had lied. Which meant Meredith had talked to Mark about the thing from this morning. Apprehension gripped Derek. What could Meredith possibly be so afraid to talk to him about that she would be okay talking to Mark about? What could Meredith want to discuss that had nothing to do with her being pregnant, but she thought it would be a long, scary conversation? Unless the thing from this morning was her working up the nerve to mention she'd been bumped back a year in her residency, he had no idea. None.

“Whatever it is, I'm sure it's your fault,” said Mr. Clark. “That's the theme of the day, isn't it?”

Derek needed to find her. Meredith. He needed to know what was going on. He moved downstairs to the pit, first, where he knew she'd been paged when they'd arrived. Chaos spread before him, and trying to separate that chaos into individuals and unrelated events made him lean on the wall and stop to stare for a long, long time. The shrieks of somebody's baby broke the air into pieces, and he winced as he stared out over the bay. Doctors he knew fixed bloody noses, stubbed toes, stitched wounds, and diagnosed. He caught a glimpse of Dr. Hunt as he moved at a jog beside a stretcher with a moaning, bloody woman on it. A whiff of perforated bowel as they passed made Derek grimace. Dr. Bailey and Richard were absent. Derek didn't see Meredith.

As a nurse trotted past, Derek touched her sleeve. The motion felt clunky and imprecise, but she stopped, smiled. “Dr. Shepherd,” she said.

“Have you seen Dr. Grey?” he asked.

“Sure,” said the nurse, and she pointed with a gloved hand to the small room less than twenty feet away. “She's in trauma room two.”

“Thanks,” Derek said. He strode to the door, knocked once, and entered.

Lexie looked up as she palpated an overweight, hairy man's abdomen. The man moaned, and his jowls seemed to shudder with suffering. Lexie's eyebrows raised as she caught sight of Derek. “Dr. Shepherd,” she said.

“Dr. Grey,” Derek said. “Sorry. Wrong room.” His heart sank as he closed the door behind him.

When his pager beeped, he almost didn't recognize the sound, a single thread in a tapestry of bedlam. His pocket vibrated. He blinked, and he looked down. Who would page him on his first day back? He was useless. He hadn't been cleared to do anything but desk jockey. He stared at the display, and nerves clenched. OR 2. Who would page him to OR 2? And why? He stared. And stared, and stared, until a loud crash startled him into looking up. Paramedics had brought in another stretcher, and they'd transferred a cyanotic, seizing patient onto a gurney fifteen feet away. A free ER doctor rushed over. Derek shook his head. The pager in his hand didn't display a number anymore. It'd gone dark. How long had he been staring?

The thought that the page might have been from Meredith got his feet moving. When he arrived at OR 2, he grabbed a sterile mask from the dispenser, and he poked his head in to see what was going on, he didn't see Meredith.

Dr. Weller and two newer residents Derek didn't recognize stood over an open skull flap. The body and face of the patient had been obscured by flowing curtains of blue sterile drapes. The ventilator hissed, and the EKG monitor bleeped with a steady, stable rhythm. Dr. Weller looked up. The skin around his eyes creased, and he gestured with the pneumatic drill in his hands. His white gloves shined with a red sheen.

“Dr. Shepherd,” he said.

“Dr. Weller,” said Derek, his voice muffled behind the mask he held. He didn't move from the door. He tried to ignore the heat of everyone staring at him. Doctors. The scrub nurses. All on eggshells. All waiting for him to choke.

“I have a bit of an unusual aneurysm, here,” Dr. Weller said. “It's a lot more complicated to clip off than the scans indicated it would be. Dr. Langly, Dr. Fisk, and I were discussing how to proceed, and we were wondering if you could take a look.”

Derek tried to dip into his mental well for information about aneurysms, but he received only cobwebs and dust bunnies for his trouble. He should know things like this. Instead, his head had been stuffed with cotton.

“I'm not cleared to cut,” Derek said.

“We just want you to take a look,” Dr. Weller said.

Derek gripped the doorframe. The bright OR lights disoriented him, and the sea of eyes disappeared behind the nuclear flare. He swallowed. “I'm...” he began. He took a step toward the body on the table without thinking about the sterile environment, and then he stopped. Scrub in. He should scrub in if he was going to contribute to...

He stared at the table. The lights ran into him like a train, and then all he could hear was the beep, beep, beep of the EKG. His heart pounded.
It'll be over soon, Meredith had whispered as he struggled to breathe. I love you.

The room became a kaleidoscope of color and light, and the beeps and whirs and voices mushed together.

“Dr. Shepherd?” Dr. Weller said.

I know this is very scary, Dr. Shepherd.

“Dr. Shepherd?”

Derek blinked, and the room tightened into focus like a screw. Where had he gone? He... “I'm sorry,” he said. And he fled before they could say a word. He tossed the used mask in a trash bin as he passed it.

Do you want to see Dr. Grey? Meredith Grey. Do you want to see Meredith, Dr. Shepherd?

He went to the nearest nurses' station and paged Meredith once. Twice. He waited twenty minutes, but she never showed. He checked her favorite coffee cart, which was covered with scones and chocolate croissants and smelled like some sort of mocha blend. He checked the cafeteria to see if she was eating with her friends. He checked the residents’ locker room, and every other place he could think of. He became so determined that he didn't feel dizzy or strange or nauseous or scared. He just kept moving. Place to place. He checked x-ray. He checked all the MRI machines and CT rooms. He checked the lab, and the pharmacy, and every nurses' station in sequential order.

As his last stab in the dark, he went to the hallway where the hospital kept decommissioned gurneys and other equipment because it had nowhere better to put them all. The long hallway with a snack machine where he knew Meredith and her friends liked to hang out. He didn't find Meredith. It was as though she'd been stamped out of existence. Or she was intentionally keeping her eye out for him and hiding. His page would have alerted her to keep her eye out for him, whether she'd answered it or not. But he did find Cristina, who sat on the empty bed with her legs crossed.

She didn't look up as he pushed through the doorway. Sunlight framed her dark hair with a bright halo. She'd drawn her hair into a thick ponytail with a white band, and she wore a yellow undershirt beneath her blue scrubs. She read a thick medical text with keen focus. Her highlighter squeaked as she drew it across the page. He came to a stop in front of her and cleared his throat. He watched her highlighter drag across another line. She read an article on angina. Her gold bracelet sparkled as she flipped the page.

“Cristina,” he said when she didn't look up.

She still didn't look up. “Is there a particular reason you're hovering?”

He folded his arms over his chest. “What's wrong with Meredith?”

“I don't know,” Cristina said. He watched the highlighter brighten another line with neon pink. “What's wrong with Meredith?”

“You don't know?” he prodded.

Cristina shrugged.

“So, she hasn't talked to you?”
“Nope,” Cristina said.

“Great,” he said with a sigh. He sat beside her on the gurney. His head had started to pound again, and the hallway lights seemed impossibly bright. He rubbed the bridge of his nose. “Perfect.”

Cristina glanced at him once out of the corner of her eye. Her head flicked to the side as she did it. She capped her highlighter, slammed shut her book, and stood. She went to the snack machine and dumped a pile of quarters from her pocket into the change slot. She hit buttons and waited with her hands on her hips. When she returned to her seat, she tossed her bounty at him. It landed in his lap.

The sudden movement and unexpected contact made him flinch. His heart throbbed. He took a shaky, slow breath, trying to calm himself down, trying not to show visible panic. He wouldn't let Cristina scare him with a fucking bag of Doritos or whatever she'd bought. He swallowed, and he stared at his lap. She pulled out her book again and didn't watch him. Her highlighter squeaked.

“What's this?” he said.

“It's a sandwich.”

“I know it's a sandwich,” he said. “I meant why.”

She glanced at him with a withering look that told him he should ask what he meant, then, if he expected a certain answer. Her lips pursed. She pointed at the clock over the door with her marker. “It's lunch time. If you're going to hover and annoy me, you can eat.”

He frowned. “I'm not hovering.”

“You're hovering.”

“Why does everybody think I hover?” he said.

She shook her head. “Because you do. It's your thing,” she said. “You lean, you have perfect hair, and you hover.” She pointed at the sandwich with her highlighter, her expression imperious. “Eat.”

He stared at the sandwich wedge encased in saran wrap. Two stale slices of bread hugged a sliver of dark yellow cheese, pale pinkish meat, old lettuce, and a lackluster tomato that seemed a bit greenish. He fingered the package. The saran wrap crinkled. He peered at the expiration date. Tomorrow. It looked like it had expired last week. The mere sight of it made his stomach turn.

A brunette nurse guiding an emaciated man in a wheelchair pushed through the doors by the snack machine. She smiled at them and waved, but didn't say hello. The man didn't seem coherent. He stared ahead, his gaze blank. An IV pole dripped fluids into the back of his boney hand. “You're doing great, Mr. Finch,” the nurse said, her saccharine voice too sweet to be comforting. Derek glanced at the telltale Foley bag hooked on the back of the chair, and he closed his eyes as the nurse and her ward departed.

That'd been him. In the chair. When he'd had pneumonia, and they'd transferred him out of ICU. Meredith and Mark together had helped him move into the wheelchair to be taken downstairs while the nurse had supervised. His first time out of bed in days, and he'd barely been able to stay upright. His chest had squeezed with the agony of gravity, and he hadn't been able to breathe without wheezing. He'd still been attached to everything. Mark, of all people, had moved the Foley bag from the bed to the back of Derek's wheelchair. That's good, Dr. Shepherd, the nurse had exclaimed as Derek had collapsed into the chair, breaths whistling in his chest. You're doing great.

Derek shook his head, and the memory faded. “She really hasn't talked to you about anything?” he “Nope,” Cristina said. “She really hasn't.”

“And you're not worried.”

“I'm still not even clear why I should be worried,” Cristina said.

“Because she was upset this morning, and I can't figure out why.”

Cristina shrugged. “A man can't figure out his Post-it wife. Like that's news.”

“She has a lot to deal with,” he said. “I just want—”

“You just want to stroke your wounded hero complex and save something,” Cristina said.

“That's not what this is about.”

“That's so what this is about,” she said. “McDreamy's coming back.”

He glared. “Don't call me that.”

“Well, what do you want me to call you, then?” she countered.

“Derek would be fine. It is my name.”

“Fine,” she said. She pointed at the sandwich. “Derek, take a bite.”

“Why are you—”

“Because this is your first day back,” she said. “Cardio patients typically don't know what the hell hit them on their first day back, and if you relapse before dinner, Meredith will get all sad and pout-y-faced.”

He pulled the sandwich to his mouth and took a bite. The stale bread made him want to choke. The soggy tomato burst under the pressure of his teeth. He had no idea what kind of meat this was. Turkey or chicken. He could only identify that it was cold and tasteless. The lettuce didn't crunch. The mayonnaise made everything slimy. He chewed once, and he swallowed.

“It won't kill you before the expiration date,” she said.

He glared at her, and he bit off another chunk. He swallowed with a grimace. “I'm touched that you care,” he said.

“I care,” she responded.

He raised his eyebrows. “You care?”

“I do care.” She shrugged. “I just don't 'care'.

He scoffed. “Because that makes sense.”

They sat in silence for several moments.

“She didn't tell me you're food challenged,” Cristina said.

“Right,” he said. “You figured it out in five minutes of talking to me.”
“I pay attention.”

He crossed his arms. “So, you have me all figured out.”

“Yes.”

“Really.”

“Yes,” she said. Silence stretched. “How's your pain?”

“Why would you ask me that?”

Her lip twitched. “Why wouldn't you answer?”

They stared at each other. Her deep brown eyes pierced him, and he couldn't help the feeling that he'd been laid bare. She knows, said a small voice. She knows, and Mark knows, and Meredith knows. They all know. He closed his eyes, and he took a breath.

“Meredith would talk to you,” he said. “If there was a problem. Right?”

“If there was a problem, yes.”

“So, you don't think there's a problem.”

“At this point in time, I'm reading this book about angina,” she said. “I'm not thinking about problems.”

“You really frustrate me.”

She snorted. “The feeling's mutual. Take a bite.”

He stared at the partially eaten sandwich. His stomach roiled. He couldn't do it. “I'm not hungry,” he said. He stood and stretched.

The room blacked out, and the floor dropped away in a sickening twist. Just for a moment. He put his hand on the gurney behind him to steady himself. He inhaled as he waited for the fuzzy blackness to recede. As colors replaced the black dots, he found her staring at him, eyes narrowed. Face heating, he turned away. When he reached the trash bin by the snack machine, he tossed the gloppy remnants of his sandwich into it. Relief flooded him when his poor coordination didn't cause him to miss his shot while she watched. He felt her gaze on his back, peeling away layers of his skin.

“She wouldn't talk to me if it was about you,” Cristina said as he grabbed the door handle.

He stopped and turned. He couldn't withhold a burble of bitter laughter. “She talks to you about me all the time.”

“Something she thinks you'd want kept private,” Cristina clarified.

He sighed. “And she really hasn't talked to you?”

“Really hasn't.”

“Would you tell me if she had?” he asked.

Cristina drew her highlighter across the page. “If it meant I could read this book in peace, I would.”
He took the hint and left her alone. He returned to his office, past more and more people who thought it was great that he was back, and told him so in detail. When he entered, he scowled at the bobbing balloons and glittery cards in the corner on the filing cabinet and went to the desk, where he'd left a still huge stack of paperwork.

When he sat down, a profound wave of tiredness crashed into him. He sighed, and he glanced at his watch. 1:00 PM. He only had to make it to 2:00 PM, and then he could leave. He stared at the pile of paperwork. He couldn't do it. He just couldn't.

He took a breath, and he let the room tumble out of focus. If he didn't think, everything was easy. And it didn't hurt. And nothing frightened him. He let his eyelids droop. He wouldn't fall asleep. He wouldn't let himself. If he fell asleep at work after only five hours on his first day back... His head tilted, and the world panned downward, into his lap. He blinked.

_Dark, choppy water splashed in his eyes and then swallowed him whole. He dipped underneath the surface, searching. Everything, black. Dark. His eyes burned. He would need air soon. Blue, in the distance. In the deep. Like a blue jay. Or a bird egg. Or..._

_He kicked. His body sliced the water. Bubbles sprayed in his face. His frozen fingers caught in the wet web of her tangled hair. He hooked his arm around her chest, underneath her armpits, and then he kicked harder than he'd ever kicked. Spots formed in his vision. And then dark and black and cold split apart into light and gray and colder._

_Wind blustered against his face. He choked on the air. Sputtered._

“Meredith,” he gasped.

_Shе didn't help. Or speak. He fought his freezing limbs and the heady urge to sink as he splashed and kicked them toward the dock._

A soft knock at the door rescued him from the abyss. His mouth felt gummy. He swallowed, and he glanced at his watch as he pushed the chill of the water to the back of his mind. 1:40 PM. How...? He swiped his face with his hand. His head pounded. But he could make it twenty more minutes.

Though he never beckoned the person on the other side, the door opened, hesitant. As though whoever stood on the other side was—“Meredith,” Derek said, surprised.

All the bricks in his demolished world aligned. He sighed as he looked at her. She carried a small object wrapped in white paper. Her lunch? He hoped she wanted to eat lunch with him. That would be nice. She used to do that from time to time while he was stuck in the office with not just mountains but mountain ranges of paperwork, and she needed a break from the bustle and constant noise of the hospital. She wore her baby-blue scrubs, her favorite beat-up Converse sneakers, and a lilac-colored undershirt, and she looked beautiful. She looked right. He hadn't seen her in a work capacity in forever. He let a small smile tug at his lips despite his apprehension.

“Decided to stalk me, after all?” he said.

“Hi,” she said, her voice soft and apologetic as she pulled up a chair on the opposite side of his desk and sat. She seemed almost bashful.

“Hi,” he replied.
She looked at her lap. The paper in her hands crinkled as she fiddled with it. After a moment, she seemed to gather some courage, and she looked at him. “Have you eaten?” She pushed the white paper thing across the desk at him. He studied it. Wet spots marred the paper. He inhaled, and he scented the warm spices while she said, “I brought you a sandwich because I figured you’d forget to eat.”

He wasn't hungry. Cristina had already force fed him. He grinned, anyway. “Split it with me?”

“Okay,” she said.

He peeled the paper while she watched, silent. She’d brought him wholewheat wrap filled with grilled chicken, pesto, ripe sliced tomatoes, and alfalfa. The wrap and the paper were still warm. Juices dribbled from the chicken onto the paper. Steam wafted against him, and he inhaled. He sighed when his stomach didn't rumble. He just wasn't hungry. But she stared at him with such hope in her eyes.

“They don't have these in the cafeteria,” he said as he took his half and bit into it as a peace offering. The chicken split apart on his tongue as he chewed. It should have been delicious.

“I went to the deli across the street,” she said.

He swallowed. “Thank you.”

She watched in silence as he finished his half. She didn't touch hers. She shifted in her seat, and she chewed on her lip. When he finished, the pesto wrap rested like a brick in his stomach. She said nothing, until he couldn't do it anymore. Couldn't keep waving the truce flag, hoping she'd start talking on her own.

“You got held back, and you didn't tell me,” he said. “Your pay didn't get bumped up with the other residents' this year.”

Her eyes widened. “It wasn't important,” she said.

“It's important. Your career is important.”

“It's not important, Derek,” she said, her voice firm. “You're important.”

He looked away. “I'm sorry.”

She sighed. Her chair shifted as she stood. She circled the desk, and then she hovered there, in his space. She wrapped her arms over the back of his chair and she kissed his temple. “It's not your fault.”

“You took three weeks off to take care of me,” he said. He blinked, and the sharp edges of the room quivered and blurred. Grief dug into his throat like a blade. “And you've been getting in late. And—”

“And I had appendicitis,” she interrupted. Her grip tightened. “And I drowned, Derek. And I went to Hawaii with Cristina when her wedding to Burke imploded. And I had a piece of my liver removed to fix my alcoholic father. All me. Not you.”

“But—”

“I'm okay with this,” she said. “In twenty years, I'm not going to care that I became an attending one year late or two years late or even three. I'm just not, Derek. But I'm still going to care about you. I don't regret spending time with you instead of being at work.”

He swallowed against the lump in his throat. “What wouldn't you tell me this morning? Was it this?”

Please, let it be just this. He'd hate it, but he could live with this.

“Derek...” she said.

He closed his eyes as she crushed his hopes. His headache roared. “Please,” he said. “Please, I've been worrying myself in circles all day. I need to know what's wrong, Mere.”

She didn't say anything. Her fingers trembled, and her choppy, hitching breaths hit the air by his ear. He couldn't see her face, and he needed to. He needed. He wobbled to his feet, and the sight of her twisted his heart.

“I'm sorry. I'm really sorry,” she babbled, and he couldn't stop himself from wrapping her in his arms, even though he was frustrated, and angry, and upset, and worried to the point that he'd given himself a raging headache. She rested, her body flush with his chest. “I didn't want to upset you on your first day,” she said. “I hate to upset you.”

Her grief cut him. “Well, I'm upset, Meredith. Would you, please, tell me what's going on?”

“I don't know how,” she said.

An icy chill gripped his body. “Are you dying? Are you sick?”

“No.”

He swallowed. “Are you leaving?”

She shoved at him with her tiny, ineffectual fists, and he stumbled backward a step. He bumped into the glass wall behind the desk. A flash of fury crossed her tear-stained face. “Stop acting like I've got one foot out the door all the time,” she said. “It's freaking insulting.”

He growled with frustration. “What the hell do you want me to think when my last marriage blew up in my face, and you're making this out to be doomsday, but you're not dying?”

“I...” she said, but her voice trailed away. She took a long, deep breath. Her jaw worked as he watched her steel herself. “This is really hard for me.”

“Why?”

“Because I'm the one who's been upset all day, and you're already making me feel like I'm the bad guy.” She threw up her hands. “I haven't even said anything, yet!”

He still. Point for the 'Derek, you've done something stupid' column. Maybe... a whisper began in his head, but he stomped on it. She didn't know. He ground his teeth in frustration. Why couldn't she just say it? Rip the fucking band-aid already?

“I can't fix it if I don't know what it is, Mere,” he said.

“Stop talking to me like that!”

“Like what?”
“Like you're put upon,” she said. “You're not put upon, Derek. You have no idea the meaning of the phrase 'put upon'."

Tension gripped his muscles. “I'm sorry,” he said.

When she rolled her eyes at him, he fought biting the urge to spew vitriol. They didn't need vitriol.
She needed to talk to him. Why did he have to fight so hard with himself?

_I'm so angry_, he'd said weeks ago. _All the time._

He pushed down into his center and battled for calm. “How can I help?” he said.

“I need to work myself up to this,” she replied. Silence stretched as she thought for a moment, but then her gaze turned hopeless. She shook her head. “I can't. I need someone else. I can't talk to you about this yet. I need... I don't know what I need.”

But I know it's not you. Those words hung on the end of her sentence without being spoken. That stung. He held ruffled, frayed nerves at bay by counting to ten in his head while he breathed.

“What about Cristina?” he said.

Meredith shook her head. “I can't talk to Cristina about this.”

“Are you and Cristina fighting again?” he said. “She was really—”

“No. We're not fighting. I can't talk to Cristina about this, because it's about you, and I...”

Meredith's lower lip quivered, and a new pair of tears escaped her eyes. “I don't want to make this even worse.”

She'd already fucking made it worse. He looked at her, biting back the snapping retort before it leaped from his tongue. Time seemed to stretch as he stared at her. She'd never made him feel more helpless in his life, even when he hadn't been able to walk to the bathroom by himself. He wanted to yell, but he couldn't stand to see her so upset, either, and that just made his frustration swell in his chest like an overinflated balloon. His heart tore in two.

He wanted to help, but...

He closed his eyes. No. He wanted to help. There was no but. She was too important. He tangoed for a moment with his pride, but he let the dance end when he stared once more at her face.
Perhaps, if he could help her sort herself out...

“I could be Cristina,” he offered.

Meredith wiped her face, making ugly snot-filled sounds as she sniffled. “How?” she said.

“I don't know.” He shrugged, helpless. At least she hadn't laughed in his face. “Role playing.
Something. You've done it with Alex. I've seen you do it. Please, Meredith. Let me try to help.”

Her eyes narrowed. “But you're...” She bit her lip. “I mean you're...” She made a vague, hand-waving, frustrated gesture that said nothing to him except for the fact that she had no idea how to describe who he was.

“Why don't you think I can do it?” Derek said.

She crossed her arms. “If you do, that means you can't be Derek right now. No knight in shining whatever. You get that, right?”
Anyone but you as you are she said but didn't say. Another deep gouge in his soul. He swallowed and looked at the floor to recollect himself. Or keep himself in check. Or something. Anything. His fists clenched.

“Okay,” he said. He kept his voice even. “No knight in shining whatever.”

Her skeptical gaze widened into hope. “You swear?”

He stared at her. He could do this. If Alex, of all people, could be a fucking girl for her, Derek could. And he could do it without taking her desire to talk to somebody else personally. And he could help her.

He could.

“I swear, Meredith.” He took another deep breath. “Just don't tell Cristina I'm subbing in, or I might die of embarrassment.”

His heart lifted just a little when Meredith snickered. She wiped away the last of her tears, and the world didn't feel so crushing anymore. “That would ruin the whole point of this exercise if I told her, anyway,” she said.

“Good,” he said. That also placated him, somewhat.

She offered him a tiny smile. “So, you're my person?”

“I'm always your person, Meredith,” he said.

“I know, but...”

He nodded. “Yes, I'm your person,” he said, matching her soft tone.

She took a deep breath and walked to the center of the room. He watched, perplexed, as she dropped to the floor and lay on her back, looking up at him, or rather, the ceiling. She waved her hand, like she wanted him to get down on the floor with her.

“It's just...” She swallowed. “We do this sometimes.”

He stared down at her. “You and Cristina lie on the floor?”

“Yeah,” she said.

He glanced at the glass wall of the Chief's office. The hospital bustled behind him as people walked to and fro on the catwalk. Nurses, patients, doctors. A woman toting a sloshing Starbucks cup in one hand and dragging along a small child with the other ran across the catwalk. Her mouth opened as though she were shouting. A doctor Derek didn't know very well, Dr. Ransom, turned, a bagel clutched in his teeth because his hands were full of post-op charts.

“You can't see the floor from outside,” Meredith said. “The office will look empty.”

He smirked. He couldn't stop himself. “This is something you've checked before?”

She reddened. “Floor, Derek.”

He stepped around her prone body and locked the door, just in case anybody wanted to be daring like she had been, and walk in without a verbal okay. He lowered himself to the floor, trying not to wince as his stiff muscles and his bruised hip protested. He lined himself up with her body as though they were lying abreast of each other in bed. The room spun as he adjusted to the new elevation.

She grabbed his arm and squeezed. “Other way,” she said.

He gaped. “You and Cristina spoon?”

“No.” Meredith rolled her eyes. “I mean flip around so we're facing each other, shoulder-to-shoulder.”

“O...kay.” He scooted into position. “Do I get gold stars for this? I think I deserve gold stars.”

She didn't reply.

He lay flat on the floor. His right shoulder touched hers. He stared at the ceiling. So did she. She'd cupped her arms over her stomach, and so he mirrored her, just in case that was a necessary Cristina-ism for this exercise.

Silence ensued while she worked up her nerve. So, she wasn't pregnant. She wasn't dying or sick.
And she wasn't leaving. What she had to say had nothing to do with her demotion. She clearly thought he was to blame. Which meant... what, exactly? He reached up and pinched the bridge of his nose, wishing the throbbing ache would stop so that he could think without crushing pain.

Maybe, she did know. Maybe.

Before any dread could coil into tangled loops, she spoke. “So, you're Cristina,” she said. “Not Derek.”

He nodded. “I swear, Mere.”

“Thank you for humoring me,” she said in a small voice. “Thousands of gold stars.”

He didn't respond. He didn't think she wanted him to. He wasn't sure he could. He swallowed and gave the affronted, unsettled feeling in his gut a few moments to even out. He could do this. He could be what Meredith needed. He lay there, and he waited. And waited, and waited. Until she made up her mind and spoke.

“I really need to talk to Derek about something,” she said.

He swallowed. What would Cristina say to that, exactly? He'd grown up in a house full of women.
Though the mindset made little sense to him, he'd learned, over the course of his life, that a lot of times, when a woman said something sucked, she just wanted a sympathetic ear. Someone to commiserate with. She didn't want solutions or suggestions or offers to fix her problem. No knights in shining whatevers. Except Cristina wasn't really a sympathetic person. At all. She had the commiserating abilities of a prickly pear. Which left only the option for biting sarcasm.

“You mean you guys do more together than have McDreamy sex?” he said.

That earned him snort. He imagined her blushing as she tried not to laugh. He tried not to grin himself despite the absurdity of this situation and his jumble of twisting nerves and dread. He failed. But they were on the floor staring at the ceiling, and she couldn't see his expression anyway.
He hoped.

“He's very chatty when he's in a good mood,” Meredith said. “And he's funny. He makes me laugh.
He's my favorite person to talk to about anything because even when I don't have a lot to say, it never seems to faze him. And, when I do have something to say, even if it's really bad and freakish, he doesn't judge me.”

“Your favorite to talk about anything? Really?” he said, and then he winced. He'd forgotten his role playing hat already.

She didn't seem to mind. Or, maybe, she sensed his need for a stroke of reassurance. She shifted. Her hand found his, and she squeezed. “You don't know anything about what happened when I went to Europe. He does.”

A lump formed in his throat. He swallowed, and he tilted his head. “Mere, I—”

“You're not Derek right now,” she scolded, though her eyes sparkled.

“You squeeze Cristina's hand?”

Meredith laughed. “Shut up,” she said, but the words had no bite.

He nodded, more to make himself focus than to reply. He stared at the overhead fluorescent light, and he lowered his eyelids. He let the light separate into two. He could do this. “Ready to be Cristina again,” he said.

Meredith sighed. “So, I need to talk to Derek about something. I think it's going to really upset him, and I'm worried.”

Nerves clenched in his gut. “What do you need to talk to him about?”

“I can't tell you,” she said.

He frowned. “But I'm your person.”

“This is something I can't talk to my person about. That's why I'm talking to you.”

“But I'm your person right now,” he said. “I'm not Derek.”

“You're Derek pretending to be my person.”

“So, pretend I'm Derek not pretending to be your person.”

“But that's not pretending,” she replied.

He opened his mouth. The beginning of a word came out. His jaw clacked shut. Seconds passed. “I'm confused,” he said.

“You're not being a very good person,” she said wryly.

He pushed up onto his elbows. His chest twinged, but he ignored it. He watched her as she stared at the ceiling.

“Does Cristina give you advice with this little to go on?” he said.

“Yes. No.” She shook her head and sighed. “Sometimes. I'm... I don't know.”

Her lips twitched with the hint of a smile, and he couldn't help but match her with his own sliver of a grin. He shifted and put more of his weight on his hip, the side he hadn't bruised. He picked up her hand and stroked her thumb.
“That's a lot of answers,” he said, his voice low as he echoed himself from that morning. He pulled her hand to his mouth and kissed her. Her soft skin brushed his lips. Her fingers flexed. He pushed his cheek against her palm.

“Cristina doesn't do that, either,” Meredith said.

“She doesn't kiss you?”

Meredith popped up onto her elbows and mirrored him. They stared at each other. “Pretty sure she doesn't kiss me,” Meredith said, her eyes sparkling.

“Good,” he said. “That'd be a little weird.”

That earned him a playful smack. He laughed as she growled a tiny growl and launched at him. They met in the middle, embraced, and he fell back to the floor. She settled her weight against his chest. As insignificant as her body weight was, it didn't hurt. Not anymore. Her ponytail fell beside her face. He brushed it behind her ear. She dipped, and her lips met his.

“I love you,” she said as she pulled away. “I really do, Derek. I'm so glad...” Her voice trailed away. Her gaze searched his face.

“What?” he prodded.

She kissed him. “I'm glad I made that stupid house with candles.”

“It wasn't stupid,” he said.

She made a face. “Maudlin or whatever.”

“Hmm.” Warmth spread through his body, and he relaxed. “You're beautiful, you know. Even when you're maudlin.”

She licked her lip, and blush crept across her face. “We can't have sex in your office when it's still Webber's,” she said. “That's a bit icky.”

He stroked her cheek with the pad of his thumb. “Please, don't tell me you and Cristina do that.”

Meredith laughed. Really laughed. The sound hit his ears like a bell. She kissed him again and shook her head. “No,” she said.

“I do still owe you sex in the elevator, though,” he said.

“Rain check?” she replied.

He nodded. “Rain check.”

He watched her. The way her nose scrunched with delight. The soft dusting of freckles across her face. The soft blush that gave her face a youthful vibrancy when she laughed. He couldn't help but return her grin as a layer of nerves and worry sloughed away. She did that to him all the time. Made him forget bad things.

“I love you, too,” he said, his voice deep and low.

She shifted and resettled, shoulder-to-shoulder with him just as they'd started, except she didn't let go of his hand. They stared at the ceiling, and he forced himself to remember he was supposed to be somebody else, at the moment. Focus. He could focus. If he could just keep nudging...
“So, you want to tell Derek something,” he said, “But you're not sure how he'll handle it.”

“Yeah.”

He let his eyelids fall shut. Her fingers tightened around his.

_No, I'd rather fuck Addison_, he'd said with a straight face when Meredith had approached him about being unhappy with their sex life. He'd been pissed at the time. Pissed that she would even intimate he'd want to have sex with somebody else, let alone baldly say it, and he'd erupted. _Get out!_ he'd roared minutes later.

For a large portion of this entire conversation, he'd been fighting with himself not to explode at her.

He tried to breathe around the queasy squish of his innards. “Is it because he's been really moody and short-tempered lately?” Derek said.

“No,” Meredith said. “Well, yes.”

He raised his eyebrows. “So, yes?”

“Or no!”

He sighed. “Meredith...”

“I'm trying,” she said. “I'm really trying to explain this.”

“Take your time,” he assured her. “I'm sorry, Mere.”

She didn't answer him. Her hand rubbed her stomach as she worried for a moment. “I think if I'd talked to Derek about this before he'd gotten shot, he would have been really upset, too. Or he would have laughed at me and wondered if I'd snorted too much tequila. But I don't think I would have ever had to talk to him about this if he hadn't gotten shot. So...” Her voice trailed away.

“So, no,” he said. “But yes.”

“Yeah,” she said. Another sigh. “I'm sorry. I'm being wishy-washy. Or unclear. Or... whatever.”

“It's okay.”

“So, are you looking for my advice on how Derek might react?” he said. “Or are you trying to figure out how to tell him in the first place, or—”

“Yes,” she said. “I need to know what to say, and I don't. I just want him to be okay.”

“You think Derek's not okay?” he said.

“I know Derek's not okay.”

“You're sad he's still an eight?” he hazarded.

“He's worse than that,” she said, her voice soft.

Tension locked his muscles. She did know. She did.

“Why don't you think Derek's okay?” he asked.
She didn't make a sound, and the agonizing silence stretched and stretched. He listened to the blood rushing in his ears. He listened to footsteps outside his office. He listened to distant voices and bustle. But Meredith didn't speak.

“Meredith,” he prodded. “Why don't you think—”

Her pager shrilled, and she flinched. She sat up, and she pulled the pager from her belt to peer at display. Her ponytail had skewed to the side. She looked bedraggled and startled and... She was going to bolt. He hadn't seen her do it in over a year, but he recognized the sinking, wide-eyed look on her face as though he'd last seen it yesterday. She didn't look at him. Wouldn't look.

“Please, don't take that page,” he begged.

“I'll talk to you tonight,” she said, her voice hoarse, and he wanted to kick and scream.

Motherfucking hospital. Motherfucking, flighty, frustrating... He clenched his fists. He'd almost gotten her to talk, and she'd let something as silly as a page spook her out of it. What did she want to talk about?

“I'm telling you,” Mr. Clark said, “She knows.”

The interruption was so abrupt, so unexpected after minutes and minutes of silence from his tormenter, Derek didn't have a chance to dampen his reaction or bolster himself to ignore it. “She doesn't know,” he snapped. “Nobody knows.”

Meredith froze, and she looked at him. Wide-eyed horror filled her expression, and her beautiful blush drained to pallid white. She swallowed, and his heart quivered when he saw her hands shaking.

“I'll take a river in Egypt for $300, Alex,” said Mr. Clark.

“Meredith, please,” Derek said. “Why don't you think I'm okay?”

Meredith opened and closed her mouth. Once. Twice. She found her voice as she crab-walked backward two steps and then shoved herself to her feet. “I have to go, Derek,” she said. “I'm not having this discussion with you when there's a time limit.” And then she left him on the floor of Richard's office. The door slammed shut behind her.

He sat in stillness, bell rung and stupid for... Minutes. Hours. Days.

She knew. She knew, and...

“You,” said Mr. Clark, “Are the most inconsiderate, pathetic, sniveling waste-of-space I've ever laid eyes on. I'm glad I shot you.”

Derek had crawled to his briefcase, stuck his hand under the leather flap, and closed his hand around his pill bottle before he realized what he was doing. Crawled. On his knees. To get pills. His gut clenched, even before Mr. Clark spoke again.

“That's right,” his tormenter growled. “Run away. That's what you wanted to do all along, isn't it? You kept backing up like you were going to fucking trip and fall on your ass, and you don't think I noticed?”

Derek let go of the pill bottle and wobbled to his feet. He pulled the strap of his briefcase and set it on his shoulder. He didn't glance at his watch. He didn't care anymore what time it was. He'd worked enough. He left the office, and he stalked down the hall without stopping. Without thinking. Cool gusts of air hit his face as he rounded corners. Dodged people. Nobody said hello to him, this time. They all stared. Like they had when he'd been on the catwalk, panicking. Broken eggshells lay everywhere in his path.

“Because you're falling apart again,” said Mr. Clark. “Obviously.”

Her door was open. Wide open. He didn't knock.

“Didn't I say you were inconsiderate and useless?” Mr. Clark said.

Derek's head pounded. He crossed her threshold, and he collapsed onto the couch before his legs decided to make the choice for him. His briefcase fell to the floor by his feet with a loud thunk. He pushed his head into his hands and breathed. The room smelled flowery. A bit like potpourri. Or... something. The fish tank bubbled and burbled. Muted sunshine made the world behind his eyelids more fleshy pink than black.

“Dr. Shepherd,” Dr. Wyatt said, her voice soft and low. She didn't ask how he was. That part was probably pretty fucking obvious.

He swallowed. He couldn't open his eyes. He shivered with stress. His stomach churned and he thought, for a moment, that he might vomit all over her coffee table, though he had nothing inside. He was empty despite having eaten.

Why did he feel so empty?

Her chair squeaked. Her soft footfalls allowed him to trace her position as she moved across the room. The sounds of the outside hospital faded as she closed the door with a thunk. She moved again. He heard the swish of water pouring. She approached his personal bubble, but only to set something onto the table in front of him, and then she left, giving him a wide berth. Her chair squeaked again.

She let him gather his wits in peace. She said nothing.

“I don't like therapy,” he said. He barely recognized his own voice. “I don't want to be here.”

The silence stretched, as if she were waiting for him to elaborate. When he didn't, she prodded, “Can you tell me why?” in a gentle tone.

And how does that make you feel?

Old memories flipped over and over in his head like a crashed car rolling on pavement. He rubbed the bridge of his nose and dared to open his eyes. The light made him feel bleary and hungover. He rubbed his eyes with his hands and sighed. He stared at the Dixie cup she'd set on the table. The surface of the water shimmered, reflecting the light.

She leaned back in her chair and folded her hands together over her lap, her expression calm. Passive. Not piteous or concerned or wondering when he actually would vomit all over her coffee table. Her blond hair fell to her shoulders. She wore a gray cardigan sweater over a striped blouse and dark pants. Her wedding ring sparkled on her left ring finger. He stared at her. This woman who'd seen him metaphorically naked before he'd ever met her.

“It never works,” Derek said.

“Can you elaborate?” she said.
He looked away. “I thought you knew all about me already.”

“I know what Meredith has told me, but you're here, now,” Dr. Wyatt said. “I’d like to know from you.”

“Why?”

Her pen clicked. She pulled a notepad up from the crevice formed by her hip and the arm of the chair. She scribbled notes. He imagined what she might be writing. Paranoid. Fearful. Passive aggressive. Angry.

“Dr. Shepherd,” she said as her pen looped. “Do you ever make a diagnosis based on hearsay?”

He looked at his lap. He gathered a clump of his slacks. His pants wrinkled in his sweaty grip. His fists clenched. “No. I...” His throat closed, and he couldn't breathe.

“Take your time,” she said.

“My dad was still dead,” he said. “It didn't fix anything.”

He put his head into his hands. Maybe, it would stop the room from mushrooming like some sort of nuclear disaster. Stop it from swallowing him whole.

Your mom is worried about you. She says you're not talking much since your father died.

“How old were you when you saw a therapist for that?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“I don't remember,” he said. “I was in high school.” He pulled his fingers through his hair because it gave him something to do with his hands. His mother had waited a while before insisting that he see someone. Waited until he'd already boxed everything away and thrown away the keys. Being forced to pry open those boxes had been...

Can you tell me about your dad?

Horrible.

“So, you were young,” Dr. Wyatt said. “A teenager.”

“Yes.”

“So, it's been more than twenty years, and you measure the success of that venture by whether things were fixed.”

He shrugged. “Why is that important? Why shouldn't I measure it that way?”

She leaned forward. “Because therapy doesn't fix anything, Dr. Shepherd. That's not the point.”

“What do you mean, that's not the point?” he snapped. “You fixed Meredith.”

“I didn't fix Meredith.”

“You fixed her.”

Dr. Wyatt shook her head. “I really didn't.”

He exploded from his seat and launched into agitated pacing. “But she used to run away, and she never touched me, and she never said she loved me. You fixed her.”

You're a lemon, he'd said when he'd been too drunk to think straight. There's no fixing you. Another regret. He'd been so fucking wrong.

“I helped give Meredith the tools and perspective to improve herself,” Dr. Wyatt said. “The rest was all her.” Dr. Wyatt didn't stand, as though she consciously wanted to give him the upper hand in the conversation if he wanted it, though her eyes tracked him back and forth and back and forth. He saw her out of the corner of his eye. He didn't focus on anything. He just moved. “That's what therapy is about,” Dr. Wyatt continued. “Helping you do what you need to help yourself. It's not like surgery.”

He stopped. “But I need you to fix me. I need...” He blinked, and tears slashed his face. “Please, fix me.”

Silence stretched. Dr. Wyatt regarded him, gaze discerning. “Dr. Shepherd, what spurred this visit?” he said.

“Meredith's been trying to get me to come for two weeks.”

“What made you listen to her after resisting for two weeks?”

“I told her I would think about it,” he said.

“Which means you didn't immediately agree with her,” Dr. Wyatt said. “And you just said you don't like therapy.” She spread her hands, palms upward in a Gallic shrug as she stared at him. “So, what made you change your mind?”

He collapsed onto the couch, and leaking tears became muffled sobs. He couldn't stop himself. He pressed the palm of his hand against his lips as he tried to contain himself and failed, over and over and over again.

“That's right,” said Mr. Clark. “You're a failure.”

“I'm sorry,” Derek said.

“It's okay,” Dr. Wyatt said.

The room blackened and blurred around the edges. A low-pitched, dull buzzing replaced the rush of blood in his ears. He panted as he gulped for air. “I don't feel well,” he said, but he sounded as though he were speaking from miles away.

“This is your first day back at work, isn't it?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Yes,” he said between gasps. His stomach hurt. His chest hurt.

“It must be exhausting,” she said.

And frightening. And infuriating. And frustrating. And stressful. And awful. His remaining resolve snapped in two. “I can't,” he blurted.

“Can't what?”

“Do this,” he said. Alternating hot and cold bleached his bones. “I...”

She moved, then. From her chair. He felt the cushion underneath his body sink. She sat beside him. Breaching personal space, though she didn't touch him. “Can you tell me what you're feeling right now?” she said.

“No.”

“Is that because you don't know?” she prodded gently.

He swallowed as he looked at his knees. The room flashed in and out, and panic like a tsunami swept over his body. He couldn't breathe or speak. He thrashed. He clawed at his collar, but nothing helped. He tried to suck down air, and he couldn't.

“Slow, deep breaths,” Dr. Wyatt instructed. “You're in a safe place.”

It's safe here, Derek. You can talk to me. Tell me about your dad.

Sound blotted out except for the throb of his heart in his ears. He listened to that for the longest time. He didn't know how long. By the time the room stopped moving, he felt flayed, quartered, and left for dead in pieces. His throat hurt. His hands felt clammy, felt slippery against his hair as he yanked and yanked. He swallowed.

“I'm sorry,” he said in a low, tired pitch, too tired to care about the flames of embarrassment licking at his skin. He couldn't manage anything else but breathing.

She pushed the paper cup at him. He grasped it with shaky hands. He tipped back the cup, and cool, soothing water flowed over his tongue. He swallowed, and he set the cup down on her coffee table.

“I want you to make an appointment with me,” Dr. Wyatt said. “For a full session. I'd like to start from the beginning.”

He couldn't speak. Couldn't move.

“I know sometimes everything can feel insurmountable and terrifying,” she said. “But we can work on that.”

“I just want it to stop,” he said. “Please. Please, make it stop.”

She gripped his shoulder. Squeezed. “What time this week is good for you?” she said.

“I don't know,” he said. The roaring in his head returned. “I don't...”

“Okay, slow down,” Dr. Wyatt suggested, her voice soft, calm, gentle. “Take a deep breath.”

He tried. He really did.

“I want you to think of something in your life that you love.”

“Meredith,” he said, his voice a bare wisp of air.

Dr. Wyatt shook her head. “Don't tell me. Just think it. Okay?”

He nodded because he didn't trust himself to find his voice. He closed his eyes and hovered in blackness. He thought of Meredith's taste when he kissed her. Her scent. The way her skin felt underneath his fingertips when he touched her.

I want to try again, Derek, Meredith had said. When you can. When you're ready. For the dirty sex.
When I can? he'd said. You know that part's not broken. Right?

She'd blushed. I meant. I mean when you can exert... When. I didn't mean to imply that you can't. Um.

He found a shaky smile for himself despite everything. He still wavered on the knife edge of a cliff, and looking down took his breath away, but at least she'd given him a grapple hook and a prayer.

“All right,” said Dr. Wyatt, her voice low and calm. “Can you tell me what day this week is good for you?”

“I don't...” He still found it hard to speak. “I don't know.”

She nodded. “How about Friday at 2:00 PM, and if that doesn't work for you, you can call me to reschedule?”

“Ohkay,” he said, his voice the barest sliver of okay.

Dr. Wyatt stood. “You can bring Meredith to your session on Friday if that would make you feel more comfortable.”

He nodded, but his neck felt stiff. Unyielding. “Okay.”

Dr. Wyatt went to her desk to retrieve a small business card. She pulled a pen from the pencil cup and scribbled something on the back of the card. She returned to the sofa. He took the card when she offered it. On the back, she'd written another phone number in blue ink.

“I want you to call me, day or night, if you're panicking like that again, or if you just need to talk to somebody,” she said. “That number on the back is my home number.”

He stared at the card. “But—”

“You don't have to do this alone,” she said. She smiled. “Okay?”

His fingers clenched. The card rumpled in his grip, though he didn't mean to crush it. He swallowed. “Okay,” he said.

She shook his hand and made no comment about his sweaty palms. “I'll see you on Friday, Dr. Shepherd,” she said.

“Ohkay,” he said again, like a busted, skipping record.

Or he thought he said it. Maybe, he didn't. She might have replied. Maybe, she didn't. A haze sort of like a fugue swept over him, and he walked out. Walked away. He didn't think Meredith would drive him home, given how she'd fled. He didn't want to find Mark or beg a coworker he didn't know very well. He stepped into the taxi line at the main entrance and fled.

When he got home, he wandered like a ghost past the open dog gate in the kitchen and then to Sam's crate in the dining room. He unlatched it. She greeted him, stumpy tail wagging, fat, pink tongue dripping with affectionate saliva. He opened the door to the back yard for her. She bounded outside, barking and yipping with glee, but when he didn't follow to play, only stood on the threshold and stared at nothing in particular, she did her business, and trotted back to him.

“Woof,” she said as she pressed against his knees.
He stroked her fur. Exhaustion bound him like a pair of handcuffs, and all he could think about, if one were to call his thought processes thinking, was collapse. He shuffled toward the stairs. The dog followed. He stripped, and he put his Percocet bottle by his clock. When he fell into his and Meredith's queen-sized bed, Sam sat on her hindquarters by his nightstand and stared at him, soft brown eyes level with his own.

He stared back at her. “You can come up,” he said, his voice flat.

Emotionless.

Sapped.

Meredith's side of the bed exploded with black, furry dog as Samantha leaped on top of the covers. She chased herself around in a circle and then settled on her side. Her clawed feet dangled off the side of the bed, and her strong, stocky body formed a solid barrier along his side. He rolled into her, rested his right arm on top of her body. He stroked her belly, and she loosed a low-pitched, pleased sound. The covers rustled. Her breaths made him rise and fall. He slipped his fingers underneath her leather collar. Gripped and held on tight because he needed it. Needed something.

He closed his eyes. Sunshine fell through the window at a slant, bathing him in muted heat. He pressed his face into Samantha's neck to blot it out. The dog sighed. And then he slept.

The billowing blue curtain slid shut with a metal scream as Dr. Smythe and Derek exited the small patient cubicle and headed back to the nurses' desk. The emergency room at NewYork-Presbyterian had a bright, yellowish look from the unwavering bath of fluorescent lights on all the white surfaces. Equipment and curtained-off sections where patients waited in privacy to be treated crammed into what would have been a wide space, had it been empty.

Derek yawned, though he tried to hide it behind his notepad as he scribbled note after note. Overnight emergency room shifts taxed his stamina. He glanced at his watch. Only a few more hours until lunch, and then he could go home and nap before class.

“Now, remember,” said Dr. Smythe. “When you see a head wound like that, always get a complete history and patient workup. You don't want somebody coherent to get stitches and leave, only to collapse later.”

Derek nodded. “So, check for symptoms of increased ICP.”

“Exactly, Mr. Shepherd,” Dr. Smythe said. Derek clipped his pen into his lab coat pocket as Dr. Smythe set the chart for Henrietta Wilkins down on the counter. The nurse at the desk took the chart.

“Can you tell me some of those symptoms?” Dr. Smythe said as he blinked the cobwebs of the long night away. He brushed under the nose pads of his gold wire-rim glasses, rubbing with his long thumb and spindly index finger, and then he wiped his face with his palms. Silvery stubble rasped. His knobby knuckles flexed. It'd been a long night. The older doctor's skin had paled, and his silver hair had flattened and dulled as the night had worn on into the morning, though he always managed a bright smile for patients who needed one.

“You'll need lots of coffee on this job, Shepherd,” Dr. Smythe had said with a wink when Derek had shown for his first day. Third and fourth year medical students had always supplemented the emergency room staff at NewYork-Presbyterian.

“Symptoms of ICP,” Derek said to his teacher. “Headache, vomiting, pupillary dilation—”
He was interrupted when heavily bundled EMTs burst through the bay doors with a stretcher. A light dusting of snowflakes mantled their thick navy coats. A gusty, cold draft followed the gurney and sent icy fingers crawling down Derek's spine. Dr. Smythe snapped on a fresh pair of latex gloves. The nurse at the desk, Julie, dropped her paperwork on the counter and stood to follow.

“What have we got?” said Dr. Smythe as the EMTs moved the gurney into an empty bay.

Derek halted mid-corridor as he took a good look at the thin, pale girl lying still and lifeless. She’d been wrapped in thick blankets to protect against the arctic winter chill outside. White flecks of melting snow dusted her raven-brown hair. Her eyes were closed, and she looked... Dead. A thick lump formed in his throat. He blinked.

“Seventeen-year-old female, student at Clara Barton High School, found unresponsive on the floor by a teacher,” said the left EMT.

Dr. Smythe checked her pulse. “Do they know why she fell?”

The EMT on the right adjusted the straps holding the girl to the gurney. “They don't know, sir. Displays hypotension, bradycardia, decreased breath sounds, and pinpoint pupils.”

Dr. Smythe nodded as he leaned over the girl with a penlight. He peeled back an eyelid. Sightless ice blue irises sparkled in the harsh fluorescent lights and caught Derek like sucking quicksand. Dr. Smythe let the eyelid fall. The girl's eyelashes resettled without fluttering. Without awareness. Without... anything.

Derek clutched his notepad. The room and his surroundings slowed, until sounds played at a low, incomprehensible pitch, his breaths hit his ears like thunder, and a crushing weight constricted his chest. Heat pooled in his gut and burned.

“Possibly an opioid overdose,” Dr. Smythe said. He seemed far away.

“That's Amy,” Derek said. His throat wouldn't work, and his voice arrived as a croak. “Amelia Shep... Shepherd. That's my sister.”

Dr. Smythe glanced at Derek. His eyes flared with surprise before he hid it behind sterility. Detachment. “Do you know if she was taking anything?” he said.

Derek shook his head. Of course she’d been taking something. She always took something. “She takes anything she...” He struggled to find his voice. The world blurred as he blinked and blinked and blinked again. “I mean I...” A cloudy picture flashed in his head. Crushed white pills and a tipped liquor bottle. A year ago, but... His brain stopped working, and his stomach churned. “Oxycodone?”

Monitors shrieked. “Asystole!” yelled Julie. The two EMTs, Julie, and Dr. Smythe exploded in a frenetic burst of activity.

“Get me epinephrine and atropine, stat,” said Dr. Smythe. They pushed the blankets away, revealing Amelia's body. She was a waif. A wasted remnant of a girl. “Beginning compressions.” The doctor stood over Amelia, who didn’t move or speak or smile, and heaved with his upper body. The gurney squeaked, but the sound seemed small in the bedlam.

The crack of Amy's ribs as they broke under the forces of CPR brought the room into pinpoint focus. Derek dropped his notepad. He launched himself at the gurney. “Amy!” he belted. “Amy, don't you dare do this.” He touched her hand. She didn't grip his fingers. He squeezed. Harder than he should have. “Don't you dare.” Tears jagged across his cheeks. He couldn't see. And he... couldn't breathe. And he couldn't think.

Dr. Smythe glared. “Mr. Shepherd, you need to back up.”

The screeching monitors seared Derek's ears. “But I—”

“Mr. Shepherd!” Dr. Smythe said. One of the EMT's pushed Derek out of the way. The crew of them bustled while Derek stood by, shaking. Julie injected fluid into an IV. They all stared at the monitors. Dr. Smythe kept pushing. One. Two. Three. Four. Five. “Anything?” he said.

Julie shook her head. “No response, sir.”

“But she could... five minutes...” Derek managed. “She could come back.” He had less than five minutes before his sister would be declared dead and gone. He rushed the gurney again. He clutched her hand. “Amy! Come back!”

“Get him out of here,” Dr. Smythe said.

One of the EMT's grabbed Derek's sleeve, strong-arming Derek down the corridor, and he didn't stop pulling until the whine of the monitors had faded behind two sets of double doors, until Derek swallowed, and blinked, and looked around. His body shivered as he registered the waiting room. A television blared the morning news. A woman nursed a baby. A man held a bloody cloth to his head.

“You're family, now,” said the EMT, his tone apologetic. “Not staff, son.” The snow on the EMT's shoulders had melted, leaving only wet stains. “They'll update you when they can.”

“She can't die,” said Derek. Helpless. Hopeless. Heat licked his face.

The EMT didn't respond except to say, “I'm sorry.”

Derek stared after the EMT as he disappeared behind the double doors to rejoin his partner. Derek's legs threatened to give out, and so he sat. He should call Mom. Or... He sniffed, trying to keep himself from falling apart in front of a dozen strangers. He put his head in his hands. His stomach churned. His white lab coat cut him in the armpits as he leaned over his knees to calm the seesawing sensation he felt when he looked at the room.

He couldn't do this again. He just couldn't. He should have tried harder to get her to stop. He should have...

He glanced at his watch. 9:18AM.

They'd be declaring time of death, soon.

He woke feeling like he'd been flayed, quartered, left for dead, and hit by a train. Darkness hugged him. He didn't know what time it was. Didn't care. Samantha howled, and his chest constricted with a deep-seated, gelid, consuming need for something that made it hard to think straight. He reached for the pill bottle on the nightstand, and then he froze. Fury burbled.

He flipped on the light, which stung his eyes. He blinked, caught a glimpse of the drug label set ablaze by the lamp before pain made him look away, and turned his head out of the glare.

“God, damn it,” he hissed.

He pushed back the covers. Samantha followed, as if she were afraid to leave him alone. He stumbled into the bathroom, flipped on the light, and in a pained, frustrated explosion of ire, he dumped the contents of the pill bottle down the toilet. He took deep breaths. And then he grabbed his Oxycontin, which still perched on the lip of the sink, and did the same. He watched the pills sink to the bottom. White wisps trailed from their surfaces into the water as they dissolved. He knew he shouldn't. It wasn't environmentally conscious to throw opiates into the water supply. And, maybe, he would need... Mayb—

When he realized he was contemplating reaching into the water to rescue the pills he could reach, he slammed his hand down on the lever. The toilet flushed. He dropped the empty pill bottles on the floor. They spun apart in two wide circles. He laughed as he imagined their trails forming an eight, or infinity, or... something. Ludicrous. This was all—

What had he just done?

He slid to the floor, dumbfounded. The cold tile and porcelain chilled his bare legs and back as he leaned against the tub. He shivered. Samantha settled next to him and lay her head against his lap. He stroked her, not sure what else to do. It was the only thing he could do.

What had he just done?

“In a few hours,” Mr. Clark said, “You're going to wish I hadn't missed your heart.” And then he laughed, glee dripping from each burst of noise.

What had he just done?

When Meredith pushed open the door to the bathroom and glanced down at him, Derek couldn't read her expression. Couldn't quantify anything he saw in her eyes. She'd changed her clothes, back into her khakis and blouse. He swallowed, and he looked at her. His haggard, tired wife who'd fled. Samantha whined.

“Meredith,” he said, his voice a weary croak.

Meredith's eyes widened. Her gaze caught the empty pill bottles resting on the floor, the caps scattered, one by his knee, one near the pipes underneath the sink. She made a sound he'd never heard before. A shriek, or a moan, or... something broken on her vocal cords. “Oh, my god, Derek,” she said. “How many did you take?”

“I didn't take any,” he said in a small voice.

She didn't seem to believe him. She scrambled across the constricting room. He inhaled the reassuring, sweet scent of lavender as her body pressed close to his. She could do whatever she wanted as long as she didn't leave. As she grabbed his wrist and felt for his pulse, Mr. Clark laughed.

“See?” said his tormenter. “I told you she knows.”
Day Zero

Somehow, despite the two years of careful, intense conditioning since that night on the cliff when she'd made that stupid candle house and professed to Derek that she would try to be extraordinary, Meredith Grey had devolved. She'd been on the brink of something momentous. On the brink of a level of bravery classified only by superheroes with serial movie deals like Batman or The Fantastic Four. She'd had a moment to declare, unequivocally, that she was committed, and strong, and supportive, and completely extraordinary in the face of adversity that would make even the most steadfast person think, why me? Instead, she'd exchanged her human veneer for that of a giant. Freaking. Chicken. She'd become poultry. Poultry!

There hadn't been any emergency. The lab had been letting her know the post-op blood tests she'd run earlier that morning were finished, and it would have made very little difference if she'd picked them up an hour later. But she'd gone to get them, anyway.

Please, don't take that page, he'd said.

I'll talk to you tonight, she'd responded, which had been the wrong thing. The poultry thing.

Then he'd taken her heart in his hands and squished it with the look that followed on his face, because she'd seen herself reflected in his eyes. She'd seen the unextraordinary Meredith Grey who bolted and couldn't commit and wouldn't stick around when things got bad because they weren't easy. The one who broke up with Derek on frivolous whims and used him for sex and didn't trust him. The one who heard words like house and babies and marriage, and froze like a freaking popsicle.

She hadn't wanted to see that Meredith Grey ever again. The unextraordinary one. She should have stayed and talked despite the pager's summons. She'd known it, but the urge to run had overwhelmed her, and she'd broken like she'd been water boarded. She had run away.

She'd never had any intention of staying away, but her momentary cowardice still made her feel like scum. He had a serious problem, he needed help, and she'd abandoned him. Scum. She'd wrung her hands all afternoon as she'd replayed that last moment in her mind.

Please, don't take that page.

She'd chewed her lip bloody. She hadn't been fair to him, and, yet, at the same time, she'd been furious. How could he not know on his own what was wrong? Why was it her job to be the one spell it all out for him? How dare he make her feel like the bad guy in this equation? Why couldn't he just say, “Meredith, I'm in over my head, and I need help.” How was it that he was the one abusing Percocet, and she was the one who felt like crap for it? Seriously? How dare he! And, even still, her fury had taken the better part of a day to burn off the frozen locks that barred her from her courage.

When Meredith arrived home at 10:00 PM, one hour after she'd said she'd be home, and approximately eight hours after she'd done her poultry devolution thing, she was freaking mad. She planned to stomp up the steps as loudly as possible, burst through their door, and... and what? Okay, she hadn't planned that much. And the second she stepped across the threshold of their house, despite her grinding molars, she didn't stomp. On her way up the stairs, she wondered how she would wake him up without scaring him, but still remaining firm. This topic needed to be
She wouldn't run away again.

She didn't expect to find an empty bed. For a moment, she halted at the door of their room, unsure. What if he'd never come home? What if, because she'd run, he'd thought she wasn't fixed anymore, and he'd— Logic broke her spiraling thoughts when she let her gaze fall on the unmade rumple of sheets and on the pile of clothes by his side of the bed. The blue shirt and black pants she'd pressed for him that morning lay in a crumpled heap with his boxers.

She glanced toward the master bathroom. The door hung open partway. She didn't see Derek, but she saw the black outline of Samantha's stocky body. Ominous. They hadn't even had her for a week, yet, but the dog had developed pretty predictable habits already. She liked to follow Derek around, and when he wasn't around to follow, she tended to hang out in the kitchen or in her crate. Samantha wasn't in the kitchen or her crate, which meant Derek couldn't be far.

Meredith padded across the room. She knocked softly, just in case. Nothing. The hinges creaked as she tapped the door and sent it swinging inward, revealing a pale, familiar foot and leg. Two feet and two legs. Samantha's head. Derek's scarred torso. And then his face. He sat on the floor, shivering, naked, and looked just like he had when he'd learned Gary Clark had killed seventeen people. The dog raised her head off his lap and whined at her as if to say, “Mommy, something's really wrong.”

Derek met Meredith's eyes. His broken gaze made her gasp. “Meredith,” he croaked.

Then she saw the uncapped pill bottles on the floor, and, in that moment, her world stopped spinning on its axis. Her planning and fury and everything else? Gone in a whorl of panic. The moments blurred immediately after her discovery. “How many did you take?” she thought she said. She wasn't sure.

“No,” he said. Or something. Something she wanted to hear but knew she couldn't believe.

She closed the gap between them to check his pulse, expecting some sort of gasping, weak flutter underneath his skin that would indicate he was moments away from heart failure and death, but she didn't find it. A strong, steady rhythm thumped against her thumb as she stroked his right wrist, that, if anything, was a little too fast. A broken line of skin startled her, and she looked down to see a scab hugged by the tan lines usually covered by his watch. He pressed his face against her neck. She pushed him away so she could assess.

“I swear I didn't take any,” he said.

His quiet voice startled her, and she jerked her gaze to meet his eyes. He didn't blink, or twitch, or do anything that would indicate a lie. She dropped to her knees. She grabbed the bottle by his leg and shook it. No weight inside. No jingle. No pills flew out the open end and skittered on the floor. She glanced at the label. His Percocet. All gone. Her fingers clenched around the bottle. Her knuckles hurt.

“So, that's it. That's all you've earned for now. The rest you're just... just gonna have to take on faith.

“Are you really going to lie to my face?” she said. Her eyes watered, and the room blurred. When she blinked, her focus sharpened. “That's not omitting. That's not even stretching the truth. That's lying, Derek. You're lying to me.”
“Do I look high?” he said. He didn't sound incredulous. Or incensed by her intimations. Or much of anything, really. Just... dead.

She pressed her palm against his face. Despite his shivering, his skin felt normal. Dry. Warm. He didn't resist as she tipped back his head and watched. His pupils constricted to adjust for the lighting change. Not pinpoint, then. And the whites of his eyes seemed clear. Not bloodshot.

She touched his lips and rubbed her index finger across the skin. She looked at his fingernails and his toenails. No signs of cyanosis. She listened to him breathing. In and out. In and out. Not deep, but not shallow, either. Like normal.

And he seemed lucid, if aloof.

“No, you look...” She shook her head. There were empty pill bottles on the floor. She couldn't let herself believe him. “I think we've established I'm a clueless, insensitive freak about everything. Tragically so.”

“You're not.”

“You're going to console me,” she snapped, incredulous. “Now. When you're sitting on the floor potentially on a one-way trip to the emergency room. That doesn't console me, Derek. That makes me want to freaking hit you! How's that for sensitive?”

He broke his gaze away from her, and he looked at the floor. “I didn't take any.”

“You've been taking twenty pills a day,” she said. “Twenty. Your prescription is for four a day, eight at most, if you're in agony. Are you seriously trying to convince me these bottles on the floor are empty because... what? Because the Easter Bunny wanted your Percocet?”

“You've been counting my pills?” he said.

“Don't you dare turn this around on me, Derek,” she said.

He didn't look up. Didn't meet her eyes. “I'm not trying to,” he said. His voice seemed strangely flat.

His state of undress, and his weird attitude, and the mopey dog, and, well, everything about this freaking situation, filled her with the thrum of disquiet. She found it hard to scream at somebody who was so disengaged. Hard to be angry or stay angry. Harder when it was Derek, knowing how Derek typically liked to fight, all snarly and spitting and burning with fury. Instead, she was getting this... this broken thing. He seemed... almost shocked. Like he'd flipped his emotional mute switch or something. He seemed tired. And sad. Hopeless. Dejected. Any word for beaten she could yank out of a thesaurus would have sufficed. His shivering concerned her, too. She knew she should call 911. She should call it no matter what he said, did, or looked like, but something niggled about the situation.

“You told me you were in pain, and I believed you,” she said. “Was that all a lie?”

“No,” he said, but he didn't elaborate.

He wouldn't look at her. Derek Shepherd was chatty. This person was taciturn. Responding in short sentences. Uncertainty supplanted her hurt. Maybe... Maybe, this was it. His, “Meredith, I'm in over my head, and I need help.” The one she'd wanted. He wouldn't be wordy about it. Maybe, he really wasn't lying. Maybe, he'd rescued her from being the bad guy, after all. He'd come to his senses. Maybe.
She scratched Samantha's soft head, and then pushed the dog gently away. Meredith sat beside him. Their shoulders touched. The cold tub propped up her back. She pulled his wrist into her lap, and she rested her thumb over the thump of his pulse. His fingers flexed at her touch and then spread as he relaxed. If his heart started skipping or slowing, if he lost his lucidity, or if he took a nosedive for the floor because he couldn't stay awake, she'd call 911, she told herself. If she saw anything, even a hint, that he was lying, that he'd taken even one pill, she'd call 911. Samantha settled by Meredith's hip and rested her broad snout on Meredith's thigh.

“Describe it, then,” Meredith said.

“Describe what?”

“Your pain.”

He swallowed, and for a long time, he didn't speak. “My... my sternum,” he said, his voice rough. “It still flares up.” His naked body shifted. He didn't move the hand she held captive. He fingered the puckered, splotchy scar underneath his nipple where the bullet had slammed into him with his free hand. Her throat closed up as she watched his wandering exploration of the damage that had been done to him. “And h-here.”

The fact that he still hurt after nearly three months made her want to cry, but she refused to allow herself to do so. “When does it flare up?” she said.

“Sometimes.”

“It hurts to breathe,” he said. “I—”

“Well, is it tolerable?” she prodded.

She waited for the no. The word she needed to hear that would explain the situation he'd allowed himself to fall into. She couldn't decide if that made her horrible on top of being a chicken, wanting to hear him say no, wishing her husband hurt so badly he took twenty Percocet a day to assuage it.

He didn't answer. Her hopes shattered. Derek Shepherd was a drug addict, and he'd been lying. Plain and simple. How had this happened? How had he let it happen? And how had she not noticed?

Call 911, the persistent voice said.

He moved beside her. Away. He pulled his wrist from her hand, and he gripped the lip of the tub. His knuckles whitened. His biceps shook. He stood with a grimace that confirmed he did, indeed, still experience pain from his injuries. She saw the bruise on his hip slide past her eyes. Her eyes widened. He looked like he'd been kicked by a freaking horse or something. She'd been too focused on the pills to notice before. The shampoo rack fell, and everything hit me, she heard him say in the back of her mind. No shampoo bottle would create a fist-sized bruise like that, not unless it'd been shot at him out of a cannon. Another lie. When he wobbled to the doorframe, she stood, and she chased him.

“You really did fall, didn't you? When you yelled this morning,” she said. How had she let things get so bad?

He stopped at the doorframe. He looked at her. “The room was spinning, and I—”
“Why didn't you just call me for help?”

“I needed to do it myself,” he said.

“Why?” she demanded.

“Because I needed it!” he snapped. The first sign of that temper. Lurking.

“Well, you're stupid, Derek!” she said, surprised to find the renewed burble of anger a relief, if only because it was familiar. “I am so freaking angry with you. Your compulsive need for control should not be at the expense of your health.”

His face reddened. He didn't bite back with a retort, and her innate sense of wrongness settled in again.

“So, you want me to believe that you haven't taken anything, and that when you do, it's just for pain. When you're taking twenty. A day. Seriously?”

“No,” he said. Again, no elaboration.

She raised her eyebrows. “No? No, what?”

He pressed his forehead against the doorframe, and he inhaled. “I... I've been taking them to... to not think,” he told the white molding.

“How many?” she prodded. “About dying?”

He looked at her, then, and the desolation she found in his gaze stripped her bare. “About anything...” he said.

He moved toward their closet. The floor creaked with his slow footfalls. Call 911, the voice said again. Call it. He took those pills, and he's a ticking time bomb. She wanted to tell him to sit. Stop moving. But...

She watched as he reached for a shirt among the forest of hangars with a slow, searching hand. She couldn't exactly deny him the dignity of clothes in this conversation, no matter what he'd done or hadn't done. He pulled a bathrobe from the tight clump of garments, not a shirt. A navy blue one. She'd bought it for him on their first Christmas. He swallowed as he pulled it over his shoulders in silence, and she felt odd, watching him dress like this with such a clinical stare. Like suddenly the concept of privacy was obliterated because he didn't have the right to it anymore.

“I took some before you came with lunch today,” he admitted.

“How many?”

He shrugged. “I remember... two.”

“But you're not sure,” she said, not a question, more an incredulous, snarky observation she couldn't tamp.

“I'm not a fucking bean counter,” he snapped. “I just took them until it stopped.”

She touched his shoulder. “Until what stopped?”

“Him.”
“Him, who, Derek?”

“Mr. Clark,” he said. He swallowed. His body moved. He was in her space, and his arms wrapped around her. The fuzzy bathrobe pressed against her. She wanted to press her cheek against his solid chest and pretend. “Please, Mere, I—”

He blinked. He said nothing. They stared at each other. Close, but not touching.

He'd admitted taking pills, and not for their prescribed purpose. He'd admitted taking some. Openly. But sworn he hadn't taken others. Why would he lie about some, but not others? And he was walking. And breathing. And lucid. His heart rate was fast, not slow. He had not a single sign or symptom that he'd taken anything, plus, he'd shown pain when he'd stood up. The squeeze on his sternum from standing wouldn't even have been a blip on his radar if he'd taken the entire missing bottle of Percocet, let alone the Oxycontin that was missing as well. The crushing sense of how precarious this situation was even without her dragging him to the hospital lingered in the back of her mind. Please, she heard him saying, I don't want to spend the night in the hospital.

The pleading call 911 voice seemed quieter.

“Where are your pills?” she said. “You had twenty-two left this morning, and now they're gone, and you want me to believe you didn't take them, so, tell me where they are.”

Had he hidden them? Like an emergency stash? Or...

“I flushed them,” he said.

Silence stretched.

“What do you mean, you flushed them?” she said.

“They're all gone,” he said. His voice cracked. Like that was something that disturbed him. Deeply.

“You mean you dumped them all,” she said. She had to be sure. “All of them. In the toilet. And you flushed it.”

“Yes.”

“How long ago?”

He shook his head. “I don't know,” he said. “A little before you came home. Or...” Which would explain why he'd been sitting in shock on the freaking floor.

“Well should I believe you?” she demanded.

He laughed, but it was a bitter sound. “You shouldn't,” he said.

He moved to the bed, and he sat down, leaving her alone and adrift by the closet. A gold halo of lamplight framed his body. The dog whuffed and sat on her haunches by his feet. She stared up at him, mocha-colored eyes expectant. He made no move to pet her. The dim lighting made the dark circles underneath his eyes seem darker, somehow.

He stared at nothing. He held his hands against the edge of the mattress, fingers clenched. “Amy,” he said. “After my dad died. She started using. Anything she could get her hands on. She overdosed. Her heart stopped right in front of me.” He shook his head. “I knew all that, and I still...” His voice trailed away.

Another big thing she hadn't known until recently, and not because she'd asked about it. She hadn't even thought to ask about it. It was a big. Freaking. Thing. And she'd been clueless. Little things he'd said about painkillers in the past made even more sense to her, now, but not a single bit of it — his history, his attitude about drugs, nothing — jibed with the current situation. How could he have done this?

“She lied to me. Over and over,” he said, oblivious to Meredith's confusion. He blinked. He sniffed. Tears streaked his face when he looked at her again. He looked at her, and he didn't flinch. “I'm so sorry, Meredith.”

She swallowed. “You really flushed your pills?”

“I don't want this anymore,” he said.

“And I shouldn't believe you.”

“No,” he said. He brushed his face with his palms. “But I want you to.”

She closed the space between them, and she sat beside him. “You're really quitting?” she said.

“I can't do this anymore.”

She pulled at his wrist again to check his pulse, and he didn't resist. She bit her lip. His heart rate seemed to agree with his words. Opiate withdrawal caused a spike. Opiate overdose caused a depression. She'd listened to his heart beat too many times, ear to his naked chest, to not know that the rapid pounding against her thumb was too fast. Not too fast for a human being, or for somebody his age and fitness level. Just too fast for Derek.

She believed him. She refused to allow herself to feel relief, though.

“Well, do you...” She swallowed. “I mean. Should I take you to a rehab program? What's the protocol for this?”

He shook his head. “No rehab.”

“Why?” she said. “They could help you.”

“No more hospitals,” he said. “I don't want to do this on display. I just want it to stop.”

Beads of sweat bloomed on his brow and collected on the nape of his neck where before there had been none. She touched his forehead with the back of her palm. He didn't seem all that hot to the touch. Low grade, at worst, but, “You look feverish,” she said.

“It's hot in here,” he said.

“It isn't hot, Derek.”

“Well, I'm fucking hot,” he snapped.

His breaths shortened, and his lips parted. He fumbled with the bathrobe. She helped him pull it off his shoulders. He didn't look very good. He'd been shivering moments before, and now sweat slicked his skin. Withdrawal took the human body's temperature regulation controls and flipped them like pancakes until they didn't know which way was up, which caused alternating hot and cold flashes. Goosebumps, profuse sweating, both things to look for. If he hadn't taken anything since before lunch, that meant it'd been eight hours or more since his last dose. Withdrawal symptoms started to show around then. With a gut-twisting coil of worry, she realized she was watching the beginning.

If he wasn't already, he would be in pain soon.

“Will you be okay for a half hour if I leave?” she said.

“Why?”

“Because I'm going to fill your prescription again.”

He stared at his hands in his lap. He wrung his fingers together with a clump of terrycloth from the bathrobe, as if he couldn't quite force himself to sit still all the way. “I don't have any refills left,” he said. “Those were my last...”

She wondered how, if he hadn't come to this drugs-are-bad epiphany now, he would have gotten more. Her stomach sank into the floor when she thought about it. His Oxycontin. The Oxycontin she'd pushed him to get. Oxycontin was heavier stuff, but time release. Addicts liked to crush the pills to get the full hit at once. She didn't want to think about a Derek so desperate for a high he stooped to crushing pills. She swallowed. She'd almost pushed him up a rung on the abuse ladder. Percocet had been his gateway... Then Oxycontin. Then... Her brain had boarded the 'Derek on heroin' bus before she snapped herself out of it.

“I'll write a new prescription for you,” she said.

He looked at her. “Meredith, you could lose your DEA license doing that.”

Writing a prescription for a controlled substance when one had no established doctor patient relationship was like inviting the Drug Enforcement Administration and the State Pharmacy Board for tea. On the other hand, the script would just be for one time. One sheet of paper. One bottle of Percocet. No refills. Just this once. Law enforcement wasn't likely to care much about a 'just this once' sort of infraction. She hoped.

“Well, would you rather I explain this situation to Dr. Altman?” she said. “You can't quit cold turkey, Derek. Just look at you. You seriously need the script, so it follows the spirit of the law, if not the letter. I'd feel comfortable defending myself for writing it. I'll rob a bank for you and hope for the best. End of discussion.”

“Please, don't,” he said in a soft voice.

Please. The word sent hot fury pouring down her spine. He did that on purpose, damn it, even after she'd asked him not to. “Are you insane?” she snapped. She grabbed his hands before he could rip a hole in the terrycloth with his worrisome fidgeting. She squeezed his fingers. “You're already starting to show some withdrawal symptoms. It's only going to get worse.”

“It won't kill me,” he said.

“No, but you'll wish you were dead,” she said. “Maybe, I don't know about step A, step B, step C for drug addicts who don't anymore or whatever, but I know that opiate withdrawal is horrible. Any doctor does.” So did he, when he was thinking rationally. She ground her teeth.

He shook his head. “I don't want to taper.”
“Screw what you want, Derek,” she said. “Your crap choices got you into this.”

Silence filled the space between them for a long time, and he wouldn't look at her, as if he couldn't justify arguing with what she said. His body rocked. Forward and back at the waist. Small motions at first, but he soon became a seesaw. He hugged his stomach like it would tumble out of him if he didn't. And then he broke. Tears cut slivers down his face. “I just want it to stop,” he said. “I don’t want any more. I don't want it in me another second. Please. Please, help me.”

She blinked, dumbfounded. The words she wanted. They sounded so freaking wrong. The room felt like it was sinking into a black hole, and she'd been caught in the pull toward oblivion. “Okay,” she said. “Okay, I...”

“Please, help me,” he said. “Please. P-please. I can't do this anymore.”

“Okay. Okay, I won't write a script,” she said. She wrapped her arms around him for the first time. He was shaking. His whole body. He didn't return the hug, like he didn't know what to do with his corporeality or something. He huddled in her grasp. What were they going to do? He couldn't just stop, and if he refused to taper... What was left? “I'm sorry,” she continued, “But, Derek, rehab is —”

“Please, no.”

“If you're quitting cold turkey, rehab is really the smartest—”

“No,” he said. “Please, I can't. I don't want to go back to the hospital.”

“It doesn't have to be Seattle Grace,” she said. “There are plenty of facilities in—”

“No,” he said. His voice cracked. “No, I won't go.”

His vehemence rattled her. He pulled out of her grasp, and he stood, flipping up the bathrobe as he did so, and his pale, shivery shoulders disappeared under navy terrycloth. The dog stood with him. He looked bad. Sweat glistened across his skin. His hair had dampened with it. She watched as he fumbled to the closet. He reached over his head. He searched the top shelf, his hands wandering along the edge. The dog watched this weird behavior for about two seconds before she started barking, loud and panicked, and in the enclosed space, every throaty vocalization bounced off the walls in an endless, nerve-wracking spiral. The horrible noise made Meredith flinch.

What the hell was Derek doing? He pulled down a black Nike duffel bag. The duffel bag he used as his overnight suitcase when he flew out for consults. A neon-orange luggage tag gripped the arm strap, one that she could spot yards away. She remembered, in a strange flash of memory, grinning as she'd darted through hovering crowds for it at the baggage claim when she'd picked him up from Sea-Tac half a year earlier. He'd been gone for three nights to attend a conference in Las Vegas. He'd wanted to take a cab home from the airport, but fate had left his plane touching down just as her shift had ended, and she'd picked him up on the way home. She felt the nylon arm strap of the bag in her palm, a ghost of the past, and she flexed her fingers as she stared at him. She gaped.

What did he think he was going to do? Go have his withdrawal in a freaking hotel? Or in his trailer or something?

“Derek, you're not thinking straight.”

“Rehab doesn't do anything,” he said, barely audible over Samantha. “I won't go.”
He yanked shirts off hangars with no apparent rhyme or reason. Some dress shirts. A few t-shirts. Some not even his, but hers. He pulled down pants. Some khakis. Sweat pants. A holey set of jeans she hadn't seen him don since he'd moved in. Incredulity turned to panic as she watched him prepare incoherently for a trip he couldn't possibly take. She swallowed, and she stood, and she rushed for the bag to take it away, but he blocked the door to the closet.

“I'm not going to rehab,” he said, and when she touched him, he yanked away as though she'd burned him.

She kept her distance. Tension locked her frame. He couldn't do this. She wouldn't let him. “Derek, they do help,” she said. “They offer support, and counseling, and medical care, and—”

Everything he freaking needed.

But he wasn't listening. He dropped the duffel bag by his feet. “No,” he said. “No.” His eyes bugged out, and he slid down the doorframe to his ass as he scrabbled for the bathrobe collar. Except there was no collar, and he ended up blindly grappling with the invisible noose around his neck. His lips formed a third no, but he didn't speak the word. The tendons in his neck bulged as he tried to breathe. He floundered.

The dog barked in his face, and he flinched away, too far gone to understand it was just the confused, panicking dog. Samantha shifted back and forth on her big, russet-colored feet. Her nails scrabbled on the floor. She licked him and whined before resuming her litany, but that just made everything worse.

When Samantha didn't immediately listen, Meredith added a harsh shh, which, finally, made the horrible, earth-shattering barking cease. The dog moved into the closet and sat on her hindquarters, her dark eyes full of worry. Garments on the lower rack fell to the floor with soft thuds.

Meredith couldn't bring herself to be angry. The dog didn't know what was going on. She didn't speak English. She just saw Derek doing something terrifying, and she was reacting to the emotional vibes in the air.

With the dog subdued, she shifted to Derek. “Derek, it's me,” Meredith said, careful to keep her distance. He was beyond reason, and she didn't want to scare him more. “It's okay. You're okay. Do you hear me? Listen to me. Everything is okay. Derek?”

“Meredith,” he croaked. He met her eyes, terror carving his gaze, but he recognized her. That was enough. She wrapped herself around him. Tremors coursed through his body, and his heart pounded. He didn't speak as she enveloped him.

“It's okay,” she said, keeping her voice soft and low.

He jerked in her arms. “I can't.”

He pressed his nose into her skin. “I won't go,” he whispered against her neck.

She felt sick. Her stomach clenched. “I know,” she said. She swallowed, trying to hold down bile. This was... She didn't know what the hell else to say. What was she supposed to do? “I know.” She pulled her fingers through his damp hair. “You don't have to go. It's okay.”

He made a deep sound, low in his throat. Not a grunt or a groan. A low, agonized sound of grief. His fingers clenched around her shirt. He trembled, but she thought that might be withdrawal. Not nerves or cold. He pressed his face against her, and she held on tight.

And that, she realized, was all she could do. He was a human being. Not only that, but a very prideful human being. And a freaking stubborn one. She couldn't force him to go if he didn't want to, and he clearly didn't. And what if he wouldn't seek help, if she pushed?

He wanted help. He wanted it. He'd begged her. She'd never thought she would see that. Not ever. She didn't want to push back so hard that he reneged.

And hadn't Dr. Wyatt insisted Meredith help him make choices about his life, wherever feasible? She'd nearly ruined that. She blinked. The room blurred. She swallowed grief. She knew she hadn't been wrong. Suggesting rehab to a drug addict was not wrong. Just... Potentially catastrophic anyway, in this case. And that felt just as horrible.

Guilt coiled into nausea.

A warm, black body pressed against her side. She leaned her head against the dog. Derek rested in her arms, silent. The three of them sat in a crumpled, quiet heap, half in the closet, half out. She waited for the room to settle, though nothing seemed to want to stop her flip-flopping stomach. She listened to the chorus of crickets filtering in from outside the house.

“Can you...” she said. Her voice cracked and broke. She cleared her throat and wiped her nose. “What do you want to do, Derek? Should I call the Chief? I can tell him we both need more time off.”

He didn't answer right away. He rested against her at a slant, his shoulder pressed against her chest. She couldn't see his eyes. His face was pointed at the floor by their bed. She brushed her fingers through his hair. She wasn't sure it would help him, but it felt good to her, soothing to her. She let her eyes fall shut. Exhaustion burned, even then, and the room swirled.

“You can't take more time off work,” he said.

“I can, Derek,” she said. “If we're doing this your way, there's no way in hell I'm leaving you alone.”

“No.”

“You made your choices,” she said, fighting to keep her voice even and cool despite her rapid descent back into fury. He was so freaking stubborn it made her teeth hurt at times. Actually literally hurt. She clenched her jaws. “I'm making mine. I'm not budging.”

“What if we get fired?” he said.

She had her Grey name. She had a fake-daddy who was extremely susceptible to all things Ellis. And she worked at a hospital that now had to beg interns to apply and for world-class attendings to stay. People weren't knocking at the door to replace her. Or him. Seattle Grace's reputation was in free fall. They'd found a precarious ledge, but then Gary Clark had shot it out from under them.
“We won't get fired,” she insisted. “You're a rock star on a ship that's mostly still sinking, and I'm —”

“I'm not worth losing a career over,” he said. He shifted, his movements stiff and stilted. Out of her arms. He looked at her. She frowned at how pale his face had gotten. “Please,” he said, his voice soft and low. He stared at her with a haggard expression, his blue eyes unblinking. “If you lose your job over this, I will never forgive myself.”

“You're worth it to me,” she said. “And I won't lose my career. Or my job. I swear.”

“Meredith, you can't.”

“I can, and I will,” she said. She kept her voice firm. She held up her right hand, palm facing him. “You have three options.” She raised her index finger. “A, taper off.” Middle finger. “B, go to rehab.” Ring finger. “Or, C, let me stay home with you to make sure you don't drop dead.” He didn’t look pleased. She scooted toward him, and she reached for him. “Stop looking for option D. There is no freaking D.”

He looked at the floor. “Mark.”

“Mark, what?”

“He could stay with me,” he said. “Or... Please.”

She sighed. “Okay,” she said. At least he seemed to acknowledge that he needed supervision. Except that didn't feel like any sort of victory. She still felt sick. “Okay, I'll talk to Mark. Maybe, we can arrange shifts or something, but I'm not making promises.”

She staggered to her feet. Samantha stood as well. Derek didn't move. He looked thrashed. Pale. Sweaty. Sick. She went into the bathroom and poured him a glass of water. She pulled the ibuprofen bottle from the medicine cabinet. He would be in pain. If not now, soon. Muscle aches. Joint aches. Headaches. All common side effects of withdrawal.

She walked back into the bedroom. The floor creaked as she moved. He reached for the glass and the pills with a shaky hand. When he finished, she helped him stand. Pain flashed in his eyes as he stressed his torso with the movement. He had no Percocet in his system anymore to dampen that. It was unavoidable.

She swallowed. He didn't look good, but he didn't look horrible, yet. There was little sense in waiting around for the inevitable. She felt tired. And sick. And she didn't want to think about this anymore right now. Not before it was needed.

“Let's watch a movie,” she said.

He gave her a wary gaze, as if, wherever he'd expected the conversation to go from there, it hadn't been to impromptu movie night. “What movie?”

“I think we need a comedy,” she said. “A raunchy one.”

He raised his eyebrows. “Specifically raunchy?”

“Yes, specifically,” she said with a nod. “Like Wedding Crashers.”

“I haven't seen that one yet,” Derek said.
“I saw it in Alex's Netflix stash,” Meredith said. She fluffed the pillows on his side of the bed, and she helped him settle. He moved with glacial, purposeful movements that spoke of weary discomfort. She frowned as he shivered and pulled his bathrobe closer, hugging himself. The movement seemed incongruous with the sweat on his brow. She pulled the covers over his legs, and then she patted the bed next to him.

“Up, Sam,” Meredith said.

Samantha, excited by the invitation, leaped up and settled along Derek's side with a practiced circle and flop maneuver, a pleased look on her face. Meredith silently thanked whoever had owned Samantha before and trained her so well. The dog already understood up, down, sit, stay, come, go, and, apparently, shh by rote. Both Meredith and Derek had been careful to make sure their bed was by invitation only. The dog seemed to think it was the greatest treat in the world when she was allowed on top. All-in-all, the plan worked well, and Samantha's integration into their household had been flawless.

“I'll go get your laptop,” Meredith said. “We can watch the movie up here in bed.”

Derek stared at her, eyes dark and unfathomable. She bit her lip when he didn't speak. He swallowed, and then he looked at his lap. She gritted her teeth as she prepared for another apology. Another heart-wrenching statement of his worthlessness. Something she'd gotten tired of hearing long ago. Instead, he surprised her.

“Thank you,” he said in a rough, quiet voice.

A thousand sentences careened through her head, then. I hate you, among them. Another, how can I ever trust you again? He'd lied by omission again. And not just about something little, but about something life-altering. He was definitely on the third strike with that. Addison. Rose. And, now, this. Also, why did you do this? She still didn't understand that one. Why. It'd been nearly three months since he'd been shot and nearly died. They were supposed to be worried about babies right now. Babies and houses and all the things that made the unextraordinary Meredith Grey scream in terror. And, despite it all, no matter how irrational, she couldn't help but think for a moment that this was her fault. At least some of it. She'd tried to help him. She'd tried to give him the support he needed to get through this. She'd clearly failed.

The crickets sang outside.

She sighed. Her lower lip quivered, and she brushed her hands across her face as new tears streaked down her cheeks. Hot anger snarled in the back of her throat in a lump that was hard to swallow around. She clenched her fists.

He didn't look at her. His shaky hands ran along the rib of the blanket. She watched his feet move underneath the comforter. Not much. Just enough to tell her he couldn't sit still. Not quite.

“I'll be back in a minute,” she said, and she meant it. She went to find Derek's laptop and the movie, and to give herself a few minutes, just five, to cry without him making mopey, guilty, sick eyes at her.

---

Day One

The harsh sunlight streaming through the window made her squint. Her head hurt, and she felt... pasty and headache-y and ill from lack of sleep. Getting through the night had been a lesson in misery. At least they'd managed to avoid collisions thus far with Alex and Lexie. That would have been fantastic.

Derek had either paced or tossed back and forth in the bed because he couldn't hold still. All. Freaking. Night. He was irritable and prone to panic attacks at the slightest provocation, and he cried. Worse, whenever he was upset, the freaking dog got upset. Samantha liked to follow Derek. Derek paced. Meredith had listened to his sniffling, the dog whining, claws tapping on the floor, and floorboards creaking for an hour before she'd snapped like a twig.

They'd inflated an air mattress for him and put it down in his office so she wouldn't be disturbed by his restless, upset energy, but it hadn't helped. When she hadn't been able to see him with her own eyes, she'd just worried more, and hadn't slept anyway. They'd moved him back into their bed, and she'd suffered with him. It'd been awful. All freaking night.

"Somebody'd better be dead," Cristina growled into the receiver when Meredith called at 3:30 AM.

"I need you to swap your off day with me this week," Meredith said without preamble. A patch of moonlight cut through the windows, illuminating the kitchen with a soft, silver glow. The refrigerator hummed.

"You're waking me up on my off day to tell me to go into work? Couldn't you have at least waited until 5:30 to call like a normal squawking alarm clock?"

"Cristina, please. I'm begging. Okay? It's an emergency."

"Are you dying?" Cristina grumbled.

"No."

Silence stretched for several seconds, and then Cristina sighed. "Whatever. Fine," she said. She hung up to get her remaining two hours of sleep. The dial tone echoed in the darkness. Meredith put her head on the table and sighed. She had many more calls to make.

Meredith sighed as she rubbed her eyes. Her eyelids dipped as she hovered by the microwave. The microwave hummed. She'd dumped a can of chicken noodle soup into some Tupperware and added water. Chicken noodle would be easy on the stomach. She hoped. His stomach, anyway. Her stomach churned endlessly. The mere thought of eating something, no matter how easy or soothing, made her insides curdle, and so she opted not to think about food at all, anymore. She rested her eyes and listened to the microwave whir. Just for a minute.

"Holy..." Lexie muttered as she stopped short in the doorway.

Meredith snapped awake from a doze and turned to face her half-sister. Lexie's eyes widened. Meredith had dressed in her red bathrobe, which she knew made her look pale in the mornings. Her hair was scraggly and tangled. She wore no makeup. No concealer. She'd drunk no coffee. And she felt like she was going to barf all over herself. The results probably made Frankenstein look like Miss America in comparison. She didn't need a mirror to confirm. She only had to look at Lexie's horrified face.

"Are you staying home today?" Lexie said.

"Yeah," said Meredith. "I swapped shifts with Cristina."

"Is Derek okay?"
Meredith's fingers clenched. She thought they'd avoided collisions. “Why do you ask?”

Lexie frowned. “Well, his car is still here. Does he have the plague, too?” She moved to the refrigerator and pulled open the door to hunt for breakfast.

Meredith's stomach flip-flopped. “Don't you people ever help clean?” she snapped.

Lexie frowned. “What?”

Meredith stomped to the fridge. “Something reeks,” she said.

“I don't smell anything.”

Meredith pushed Lexie aside and stared at the fridge's innards. Her nose scrunched, and her stomach roiled. She looked at all the shelves. She grabbed a greasy takeout container and some mushy grapes that looked like potential culprits. She threw them in the trash without sniffing. If she sniffed, she might die. Her stomach squeezed.

Lexie stared.

“What?” Meredith grumbled.

“Nothing,” Lexie said.

The microwave beeped. Meredith rolled her eyes, liberated Derek's soup, and left her half-sister in the kitchen. “Throw out the milk, too,” Meredith said over her shoulder as she left. “And take out the trash when you leave!”

She shambled up the steps sort of like a zombie. Their door was open a crack so the dog could get out if she wanted. Meredith bumped it with her elbow and walked inside. The soup bowl steamed, and wet heat wafted toward her face. Dim sunlight streamed in through the window. Stillness gave the room a muted, soft feel.

Derek was nothing but a dark head of hair and a lump under the blankets. The dog lay on the floor by his side of the bed, her head cradled against her russet-colored paws. Derek's feet, for once since this had started, weren't churning underneath the covers. Meredith wondered if he'd managed to get some sleep. She hoped he had, but as she approached his nightstand to put the soup down, the blankets moved. He turned his head. He didn't speak.

“Hey,” she said, a whisper. His hair stuck up in random chunks. The skin below his nose and at the corners of his eyes glistened with runoff, and sweat slicked his brow and temples. He looked ghastly. She felt his forehead. Still a very low grade fever. Nothing to worry overmuch about. “I brought some soup,” she said. “Would you, please, try to eat it?”

“No,” he said.

She frowned. “Okay,” she said. She didn't want to argue with him. Belaboring such a small issue when there were larger battles to fight was pointless, and her head ached with exhaustion already. “Well, I'm leaving it here on your nightstand if you change your mind.”

The covers rustled, and he buried himself again without replying as she pushed aside his clock and put down the bowl. She bit her lip. This was the first time she'd seen him able to sit still since last night. Able to rest. Even if he wasn't sleeping, the downtime had to help. Or, maybe, he'd just gotten to the point where he felt so sick it didn't matter that anxiety compelled him to burn off energy, because he couldn't bring his body to move.
The thought made her throat constrict. But she wasn't sure what to do for him. Or if anything could be done at all. Keep him hydrated. The rest had to run its course. That's what she'd read in her thirty-minute crash refresher from old medical texts and Google, and she was tired enough and grouchy enough and nauseous enough that it all seemed hopeless, anyway. She bent to pet the dog, and the room went topsy turvy. Bad idea. She stumbled back to her side of the bed and dumped her bathrobe on the big chair by the window. She crawled under the covers, and she closed her eyes. Derek said nothing, and he didn't move. She didn't really care anymore.

“Many more people go through withdrawal at home rather than at rehab centers,” the adviser explained with a deep, comforting voice. He'd probably been hired for his voice alone, and Meredith wondered, briefly, if he knew what he was talking about. He spoke a bit like he belonged dubbing movie previews.

“Are you sure?” Meredith said. She pushed back the dinette set chair. The feet squawked along the floor. As soon as she had her balance, she paced in the dark. Just like Derek. “I mean, how qualified are you?” She needed somebody who knew about this crap to tell her this wasn't the stupidest thing she'd ever done, not taking Derek to rehab, a feeling that had propagated and spawned little clone feelings the more advanced his symptoms and misery became.

“It's doable for most people, though, of course, not in all cases,” the man said. “I've been an addiction counselor for ten years, but if you'd like to speak to somebody else, I'd be happy to transfer your call.”

“Really?” Meredith said. She sniffed. She heard Derek pacing upstairs again through the ceiling, and she closed her eyes. Birds had begun to chirp outside in the dark, a precursor to dawn. Her eyes burned with exhaustion. She felt like she'd found Derek in the bathroom years ago. Not last night. Eternity stretched before her as the floor overhead creaked. “What's a professional addiction counselor doing on the phone at 4:45 AM? No offense, but isn't that more of a nine to five job?”

“Really doable, and really a counselor,” said the man. Meredith could hear his smile through the phone line. “I'm on the phone at 4:45 AM because tonight is my night to be on call. I've volunteered with the hotline service since I moved to Seattle four years ago. Helping people get sober is important to me.”

“Oh,” said Meredith. “Well, I... Thank you.”

“You're very welcome.”

“So... It's okay? That he's doing this at home? I'm so worried.”

“Oxycodone withdrawal is rarely life-threatening. As long as he doesn't need constant supervision to overcome temptations, it's okay, if that's what he prefers. Think of rehab like a willpower enhancement, in that respect.”

“He flushed his pills on his own.”

“That's a good start then,” the counselor said.

“Okay,” she said.

“What's important to remember, though, is that drug addiction is typically a symptom masking another problem. You need to help him figure out why he started abusing in the first place, and he needs to address it, or it'll just happen again. And, if it does happen again, his risks for overdose increase because his drug tolerance will be low. Most overdoses happen after a period of abstinence.”

“So, he needs counseling,” Meredith said.

“It's a very good idea, yes.”

She rolled onto her stomach, trying to ignore the squeeze of stress. She didn't want to think about how she was going to get Derek to stop "considering" seeing Dr. Wyatt, and actually see Dr. Wyatt, or somebody else. She shook her head. She would worry about that if they got through this freaking part of the whole ordeal. She let her thoughts drift. Derek still wasn't moving. Or sobbing. Or making any kind of noise. She took that as a blessing, and she slept.

The sound of the toilet flushing woke her up. She opened her eyes to slits. She had no idea what time it was, but she felt better. A little. The sun had brightened, and the heat of its light beat on her face. She snuggled under the dark sheets. The mattress shifted. She listened to Derek sniffle and re-settle. She closed her eyes, and she slept.

The toilet flushed again. She swallowed against the pasty feeling in her mouth. She rubbed her eyes. She rolled to look at the clock. She'd been in bed five hours. Her head didn't feel so cloudy anymore, and it didn't hurt, and her eyes didn't burn when she blinked. The nausea that had been rolling in her stomach seemed to have found her ceasefire request, too, which was nice.

She listened to him re-settle in the bed. “Are you okay?” she said. Her voice sounded muzzy. She licked her lips. He didn't respond, and she rolled toward him. She stroked the blankets over his body, but he tensed. She pulled her hand away, and she sighed. “I'm here,” she said, and it was the first time that morning where she felt like she wasn't lying. She let her eyes drift closed once more when he didn't speak, and she slept.

This time, a loud, miserable cough woke her. Not a cough. A heave. “Derek?” she mumbled. She rubbed her eyes. The sun felt hot, and she wasn't tired at all anymore. He wasn't in the bed. Another cough that was a heave. She glanced at the bathroom door. It was closed. The toilet flushed. She waited for him to come back to bed, except he didn't. He didn't make any noise. The bathroom door never opened. Long minutes passed.

Samantha's raspy panting drew Meredith's gaze to her side of the bed. The dog stared at her. “He locked you out of the bathroom, huh,” Meredith said. The dog looked chagrined. Meredith stroked Samantha's head, and Meredith groaned as she stood.

She walked to the master bathroom. She knocked on the door. “Derek?” she said, careful to keep her voice soft. Noninvasive. When he didn't answer, worry twinged in her gut. She glanced at Samantha. “You'd be more upset if he was really sick,” Meredith said. “Right?”

Samantha licked Meredith's hand.

“That's not very helpful,” Meredith said. “You're an unhelpful dog.”

Samantha's stumpy tail wagged.

Meredith sighed. She tested the doorknob. It turned. She hadn't expected that. He'd been locking doors left and right since he'd been shot. The fact that he hadn't stopped to lock this one worried her. He'd been in a serious rush. She braced herself for anything. This was the sickness part of in sickness and in health. Right? Right, she told herself. The dog waited at the door.

The faint odor of vomit hovering in the air made her nose crinkle as she pushed open the door. He'd curled up in a fetal position on the floor by the toilet, half on, half off the bathmat, a position that couldn't have been comfortable. He'd wrapped his arms around his stomach. His choppy breaths cut the air, like he was crying. Or trying not to cry. Or... something. She didn't dare turn the light on in case it set him off.

She sank to her knees by his shaking body. A whiff of his body odor made her stomach turn. He'd been sweating buckets since last night. She held her hand to her mouth and swallowed once, twice, trying to keep the nausea at bay. He was sick, but not so sick that he wouldn't see or notice her suffering. Embarrassing him by gagging wouldn't help the situation. If the smell bothered her, it definitely bothered him. The fact that he hadn't taken care of it lent to her earlier theory that he'd been feeling too sick to move, and guilt collected over the fact that she'd been too tired to worry about it. She'd been a selfish idiot. She swallowed again. Her stomach settled from flip-flops to quivering through sheer power of will, enough that she could function, anyway. Barely.

“Derek,” she said softly.

“Go away,” he croaked. His fingers caught her t-shirt, and he pushed at her, but the motion was so frail she didn't even sway. She grabbed his wrist before he could pull it back, and she slipped her thumb against his vein. His heart pounded, and his arm trembled, though whether that was withdrawal, fatigue, or chill, she had no idea. She leaned, intending to feel his forehead to make sure he didn't have a serious fever.

“Don't touch me,” he said with a snarl.

She pulled away as her throat constricted. She held up her hands in surrender. “Okay,” she said.
“Okay, I'm not touching you.” He pressed his face into the cold tile floor as though it were soothing. There was something so wrong about a human being lying on the floor like that. “Do you... want a pillow, or...?”

A flash flood of sweat spilled from his pores. His face reddened. A noise caught in his throat, a low-pitched, miserable moan. His body hitched and undulated. He heaved. A wet sound gurgled in his throat, but nothing came up. She forced herself to hang back as he dragged himself to the toilet bowl. She wanted to help. She wanted to do... something. But what was there? Nothing. He retched again. Spittle collected on his lip and dangled in a stretching, glistening line. He panted, looking like he'd survived three miles while being dragged by a train, but only barely, when he'd finished.
Fluid crackled in his nose as he sniffed. He wiped the back of his palm against his lips, and the spit train fell away. His hands shook.

“Leave me alone,” he said in a dark, tired voice.

“I got worried when you didn't—”

“I can't even fucking get sick by myself?”

“I'll give you privacy, Derek, but I'm not going to let you die in the other room because you might be embarrassed,” she said.

“I'm not dying,” he grumbled. He didn't sound like he believed himself.

She sighed. She would not let herself cry. Not in front of him. Not like this. “Well, I don't know that until I check on you, do I?”

He glared at her. His eyes glittered in the dim light, and his fury seemed to heat the air like lava.
He moved, then. He could barely stand without swaying, but the look he gave her kept her from trying to help despite the lump in her throat. She swallowed as she watched him. He shambled out of the room, stopping once to catch his precarious balance on the door frame. The dog walked with him, her footsteps slow and halting to match his pace. Moments later, Meredith heard the distinct sound of him retching in the bathroom across the hall. Then he fell silent. He didn't return. Neither did the dog.

She closed her eyes, and she forced herself to wait. Just a few minutes. Though the idea of him lying on the floor in the bathroom, wishing he were dead, while she sat there and twiddled her thumbs made her feel like a horrible person. No matter what he said or snapped at her, no matter how angry she was with him, or how much she felt like crying or barfing, she didn't want him to suffer. Not like that. She clenched her fists.

“So, you want me there on Wednesday at five-thirty?” Mark said.

“At dinner, yeah,” Meredith replied, pinching the bridge of her nose. She tapped her pen against the notepad in front of her. She’d written things out after she’d given up sleeping, after she’d lost all hope of ever sleeping again. The sheet looked like a rocket science diagram. Her helter skelter shifts, courtesy of her resident status, didn’t help things much. No clockwork, there. They were just... whenever. “My shift starts at 6:00 PM that day.”

“Oh, and then you’ll be back... Thursday?”

“Friday morning.”

Silence. “So, what’s that look like overall?” he said.

“I have him today and tomorrow morning,” she said. “You get him Wednesday evening, Thursday, and Friday morning. I get him until at least Friday night. I haven’t worked out the rest of Friday, Saturday, or Sunday yet. I’m not sure what shifts I’m covering, or whether it will be necessary, anyway.”

Derek would have somebody with him at all times for, at the very least, four days. She hoped that would be, for the most part, enough. He hadn’t been on painkillers very long, in the grand scheme of things. His body couldn’t have built up a rock solid tolerance. His brain chemistry couldn’t be that damaged. Right? She’d seen some people go through withdrawal in twenty-four hours or less and be all smiles on the flip side. Others took more than a week. Two weeks. She’d seen a man who’d abused Oxycontin for years fall into a deep depression that had lasted for months while his brain’s dopamine receptors healed. She glanced at the ceiling. The floor didn’t creak. Derek had stopped pacing for at least a little while. He wouldn’t be that man. She refused to consider it, but...

“All right,” Mark said, pulling her out of worry freefall, “I’ll have all my elective surgeries rescheduled. I have one there might be some problems moving, but I can get Dr. Silver to cover, I think, if I bribe him.”

The page in front of her with the arrows and diagrams and schedules blurred, until all she saw was vast, endless white. She sniffed as she wiped her face. “I’m sorry.”

“Don’t apologize, Grey.”

At least, when Meredith had called him at 4:00 AM, he’d been a little less grouchy about it than Cristina had been. Then again, he’d had the Derek-on-drugs context that Cristina had lacked. And he’d been waiting for an update, anyway. “Thank you,” she said. “For helping.”

“No sweat. And, Grey?”
“Yeah?”

“He’ll be okay.”

Meredith sighed. Derek hadn't come back from the other bathroom. She glanced at the clock. She'd given him ten minutes. She stood, and she walked to the bathroom across the hall. “Look, Derek, I'm sorry, but could you at least call out every once in a while, so I know you're not—” Her voice cracked and halted when she stared at the open door and the empty, dark room. He wasn't there. Her stomach twisted. “Derek?” she called, a bit louder. She wheeled on her heels.

Where? He couldn't have gone far.

The dog barked once, and Meredith raced down the steps. She skidded to a stop at the foot of the stairs. Derek looked at her as he wobbled into the foyer. Dark splotches stained his maroon shirt at the armpits and along his neckline. Perspiration glistened on his skin. His nose ran. And he cried. The low-pitched, hitching sounds of his weeping made her heart clench. His face and ears and neck bloomed bright red when he saw her staring like some sort of gaping freak. He wiped his face, and he looked away. He kept moving down the hall, and he disappeared into the kitchen without speaking to her. The dog ambled after him.

She clutched the banister and debated whether to follow him. He didn't want help. He was embarrassed and sick and upset. But... He popped back into the room at the foyer where he’d entered, and he went down the hall again. Laps. He was walking, or stumbling, or... laps. Through the kitchen, the dining room, the living room, the foyer, and the hall. His agitation squeezed her heart. She didn't know what to do. What was she supposed to do? She sat on the couch in the living room.

“I'm right here,” she said as he wandered past, but he didn't look at her or speak. She flipped on the television and tried to watch the news, tried to engross her brain with other things, which was difficult, because every few minutes, he'd hobble past her and block the picture with his nightmare countenance of sweat, tears, and misery.

On his ninth or tenth lap — she'd lost count — he lurched to stop in the archway between the dining room and the living room, and he clutched the open dog gate. The plastic gate creaked and moaned, giving testament to how much weight he put on it. His willowy body swayed like a sapling in the wind. Her heart caught in her throat, and she launched herself off the couch.

He tensed as she wrapped his thin body in a bear hug. “Don't touch me,” he hissed as she helped him fall without hurting himself. A controlled descent. That was the best she could do when she was so much smaller than he was. He panted. “Don't—”

“I'm not touching,” she said. “You're falling.” She pulled away as soon as soon as he reached equilibrium with the floor. He rested with his back against the dog gate. He closed his eyes. She swallowed against the lump in her throat. “See?” She wanted to touch him. Badly. “Let me get you some water,” she said, a whisper. Keep him hydrated. She could at least do that.

She pushed herself to her feet and went into the kitchen. She debated orange juice for a moment, but she decided the citrus might do more harm than good if his stomach was upset. They didn't have anything milder like apple juice. Water would have to suffice. She pushed a clean glass under the faucet, but then thought better of it and dumped it out. She grabbed mini-ice cubes from the tray in the freezer, and she filled the glass with those. She brought him the glass and next to him on the floor. She stared at the legs of the dining room table, if only to help him feel less scrutinized. Samantha heaved a tired sigh and flopped down in her crate in the far corner. She'd been up all night, too.
The glass clinked. He crunched on an ice cube. He swallowed.

“I'm sorry,” he said in a low, tired voice.

Meredith closed her eyes.

“My skin doesn't...” He swallowed. “Fit.”

“Is that why you don't want me to touch you?”

He shivered, or trembled, or... “Stop talking to me,” he said, but at the same time, he rolled into her. He clutched her shoulder. Forcing herself to not respond tortured her limbs. She sat, rigid, and let him take the comfort he wanted without offering any he wouldn't want.

“We don't have to talk,” she said. She pointed at the glass. “You do have to drink, though.”

He shook his head as though he were startled. “I didn't mean—”

“I know,” she said, though she didn't know. “Drink.”

They sat in silence while he worked on the ice cubes, one by one. He finished about half the glass before he put it down and made a noise. A sick, disgusted grunt. He staggered to his feet. His breaths tightened like screws in his chest. He tripped and shambled away. A door opened. She heard him flip up the toilet seat. He vomited. Again. Again. So much for ice cubes being easy to deal with. The toilet flushed. Then the house went silent, and he didn't come back.

Again.

She rolled her eyes and followed him. He was such a stubborn, annoying, frustrating bastard when he wanted to be. “Derek?” she said. She rapped her knuckles on the door of the downstairs bathroom. “Derek, come on. You can't keep—”

The door opened and swung inward. She peered into the dark, which shimmered haunting blue under the security of the night light. For a moment, she blinked, and all she could think about was that horrible morning when she and Mark had discovered something was wrong, really wrong, with Derek. He'd been so terrified he'd wet his pants, and then he'd fled into this room, here. He'd sat in the same spot he sat in, now. He'd trembled much like he did, now. He hadn't been sweaty or sick, then, though. Just scared.

_I didn't know Mark was visiting_, he'd said, his voice wispy and hoarse.

He sat in the corner, semi-wedged between the wall and the toilet bowl. He had his arms wrapped around his stomach, and he looked into the dark water with a disinterested, dull gaze, like he'd seen it far too many times that day for it to be interesting.

“Can you tell me how you're feeling?” she said. She kept her voice soft. It seemed like an obvious question, she knew. Horrible was the obvious answer. But she didn't want him so sick he needed intravenous fluids before she broke down and took him to the hospital. If he couldn't even keep water down...

He stared, listless.

She slid to the floor beside him. “Please, can you talk to me?” she prodded. She didn't touch him.

He swallowed. “Stupid,” he said. He reached and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.
“What's stupid?”

“I feel stupid.”

“Why stupid?”

Fury flared in his gaze. He looked like he wanted to snap at her. He closed his eyes instead, and he breathed, long and slow. “This is my fault.”

She nodded. “Some of it is, yeah.” And some of it... She clenched her fingers as hate churned in her stomach like hot tar, slow and sickening. This was supposed to be her happily ever after, and it wasn't happy. It wasn't anything but awful.

“All of it,” he said.

“No, just this is,” she said. She gestured at him. “The part where you're sick and sweaty and ick? That's your fault. The part where Gary Clark shot you? That's not your fault. That's his fucking fault, Derek, and I wish you would just stop.”

He blinked. Fresh tears slipped down his face. “I'm so sorry I did this,” he said. “I'm sorry I lied.”

She closed her eyes, and she let herself count to ten. She clenched her teeth to vent frustration. He didn't move. “I'm going to run a warm bath for you,” she said. “Okay?” At the very least, a bath might help him with the ill-fitting skin thing. The not wanting to be touched. Nothing soothed like relaxing, warm water. And if the bath didn't soothe him, at least it would wash him off, and he wouldn't reek like a dirty sock drawer anymore.

He sniffled. “What if I'm sick in the tub?”

“We'll worry about it if you're sick,” she said. “There's always the waste basket in a pinch.” Of course, that would require him to be sick in front of her while she held the basket, something she doubted he was keen on, given his behavior. She blew out a breath in frustration. Her loose hair went flying. “I'll be upstairs. Come up when you're ready.” With that, she left him before he could ponder it more or protest. She left him before he could see her lose it.

Her throat clogged, and she sniffled as she walked up the stairs. Why was this so freaking hard?

She stomped into the master bathroom and stared at the tub. I may not be cut out for bright and shiny, she'd said. She remembered the stroke of his foot as he'd run his toes along her leg underneath the water. I am glad you're in my bathtub, she'd added. Her lower lip quivered. She hadn't had any idea, back then, that she would be here. Now. She'd had no idea what she'd been talking about.

Not the bathtub part. He was hers. She wanted to freaking strangle him, but he was hers, and she wanted him to stay that way. She just meant the bright and shiny part. That'd been before. Before she'd drowned. Before he'd been shot. Before she'd found out that Derek's father had been gunned down in front of him when Derek was fifteen. Or that his sister was a drug addict, too. Before Ellis had died and before fake mommy had died and before everything had gone so horribly wrong. She'd been a spoiled brat back then. A freak.

Not cut out for bright and shiny. She snorted as she lit candles while the bath ran. She'd been a freaking lighthouse of bright and shiny back then. She'd known nothing. She turned on the little FM radio resting on the shelf. Tinny classical music bounced in the small room. She dumped in bubble bath to the frothing water, next. Bubble bath was more her thing than his, but he hadn't shown up yet, and she was starting to suspect this would be her relaxing bath, not his.
She reached for her hemline and was about to yank her shirt over her head when the door pushed open. She curtailed her exclamation of surprise as he shuffled into the room, and she let her hands go. The shirt fell back against her waist. He moved to the tub, and he gripped the porcelain edge with shaky fingers to keep his balance. He swallowed. He didn't speak to her.

“I can do it,” he said, but he didn't snap. He just seemed... tired.

She sat on the toilet seat to supervise, much like she had on his last day in the hospital after his heart surgery. He'd spent nearly ninety minutes soldiering through the grooming process, and it'd been difficult for her to watch without offering to help, but he'd managed on his own, and she'd managed not to offer assistance once. He peeled off his sweaty shirt, and he let his cotton pajama pants pool at his feet. When he bent to pull off his socks, he didn't do as well, and she rushed to steady him before he collapsed and hit his head on the tub or something.

“I see how it is,” he said, his voice soft, as she held his naked waist.

“How what is?”

“You did this for the free show.”

“Derek, I didn't—” She stopped when she realized his tone hadn't been mean. Just teasing. Sort of. Except gutted by how ill he felt. His arms tightened around her. She swallowed. “Oh,” she said. Her voice warbled. She'd missed him so much. She didn't know why he was there, in that moment, but she took his olive branch and clutched it. “Hi,” she said.

“Hi,” he said.

His eyelids dipped as she helped him with his socks. He took a weary breath. He held onto her shoulders with a weak, shaky grip, and he stepped over the lip of the tub with one leg. Two. That done, he slipped into the warm bubble bath and let the water swallow him. The pink, twisty scar on his chest and the bullet wound and all of it disappeared behind a wall of bubbly white. His pale kneecaps poked above the surface. Water sloshed. He sighed, and he sank up to his neck.

“This helps,” he said. “Thank you.” And then his eyes slipped shut the rest of the way.

“Do you need anything?”

He grunted. “A hammer to bash my skull in with would be nice.”

“Your head hurts?”

He didn't move. “Everything hurts, Mere.”

“Well, I can't give you ibuprofen if you're not eating anything.”

He didn't respond. The water sloshed, and he just lay there. Eyes closed. His nose ran into the water, and sweat covered his face, but he seemed... better. She stood, and she walked to the door. She'd left her book on her nightstand. She could catch up on it while he relaxed.

“Would you stay with me?” he said.

She halted at the threshold. “I wasn't planning on going anywhere. I was just going to grab a book.”
She tossed the idea of retrieving her book, though, and she slid to the floor on the bathmat. She rested her arms against the cold lip of the tub. If he felt her watching him, he made no comment. His pale skin contrasted with his almost-black stubble, making him seem even paler than he was. The crow's feet around his eyes pinched with misery. She traced his tired lines with her gaze.

“We can be dull and lifeless together,” he'd said with a pleased smile. As if that'd been the greatest plan he'd ever proposed. He'd been so happy then, just to be there with her.

“Derek?”

He twitched. “Mmm?”

“What made you stop?” she said. “The pills, I mean.” His eyes slid open. He watched her. “I thought I would have to... I mean I didn't expect this.” This. She'd come home last night expecting a war, only to find that he'd already fought it for her. Her war had been in believing he'd already been on the battlefield.

Silence filled the space between them. He blinked, long and slow. He didn't move. “You did,” he said, at last.

She frowned. “But I didn't do anything,” she said as a lump formed in her throat.

He shrugged. “I don't want you to go through what I went through with Amy. I don't want you to go through what I went through when I thought you were dead.”

She swallowed. “Oh.”

“I'm not trying to make you feel guilty about... what happened before,” he said.

“I didn't say you were.” But she did, anyway. Feel guilty.

“I just... I don't want you to go through that.” His eyes reddened. He blinked. But he didn't look away with embarrassment. He faced her, and he let her see. His expression carved her to shreds. “I never want you to go through that.”

“Derek...” she whispered.

“And I'm really sorry,” he said. The water sloshed as he shifted in the tub. His wet, pruned thumb stroked her cheek. He cupped her face. She barely noticed the water as it dripped from his wrist to carve splotches in her shirt. “I'm so sorry, Meredith. I know you don't think I mean it, but I do. I am. Deeply.”

She grabbed his hand. “Shut up,” she said, her voice soft.

He pulled his hand back into the water, and he looked away. Like she'd struck him in the mouth or... something. A lump formed in her throat. She reached across the bubbles and the empty space, and she touched him, first, the back of her palm to his forehead. He didn't feel very hot. Still fine. Low grade. But then she turned her palm against his forehead and stroked his damp hair once. Twice.

“I know you mean it, and I love you,” she said. “That doesn't mean I'm not pissed. Okay?”

His eyes met hers. They stared, until she almost forgot why she was sitting on the floor, and why he was sick in the tub. Mmm. I can take it slow, he'd said. I can take it incredibly slow. The echo of his kisses on her collarbone, as he nibbled on her ear, made her eyes water. Bright and shiny. She could do with some of that again. Someday soon. She'd been such an idiot back then.

“Okay,” he said. He closed his eyes, and he sank into the water. She leaned against the tub and sat with him until the water got cold.

---

Day Two

Meredith stood in the ER. Cristina hovered over an empty bed a few feet away, scribbling notes on her chart for the patient she'd just dismissed. She'd been trolling for cardiac cases and been disappointed when the woman reporting chest pains had simply been suffering a bad bout of acid reflux, though she'd managed to keep from cursing at the woman's good fortune until the woman had left, at least. Meredith sighed as she searched through her tool tray with latex-gloved hands. Shiny scalpels, tweezers, a sonic debrider, gauze, and other metal implements glimmered in the bay's fluorescent lights from the tray.

“I don't know why I let him convince me not to take time off from work,” Meredith said to Cristina. “I'm not getting anything done because I can't stop thinking about what's going on at home. Surely, not being at work and not getting things done would look less glaringly unproductive or whatever than being here and doing nothing whatsoever.”

Her patient cleared his throat. “Fixing my foot isn't productive?” he said.

Zachary Keller was an older man. Thin, but toned. He took care of himself. Mostly. Not all the time, or he wouldn't have been in the ER, but everybody made mistakes now and then. He lay on the gurney, propped into a sitting position. Meredith sat at the end of the gurney on a small, rolling stool, facing his bloody foot.

“It would be productive if I were an ER doctor,” Meredith said.

Mr. Keller frowned. He pulled his leg back an inch. “You're not an ER doctor?”

“I'm a surgeon,” Meredith said.

“Wow,” said Mr. Keller. “Really? I get a surgeon to fix this?” He gestured to his foot. He'd stepped on something. A nail or a tack or something else sharp. The wound would have dragged a normal person into Seattle Grace days ago, but Mr. Keller was diabetic, and he hadn't even noticed the cut until it'd gotten infected. Luckily, they'd caught the infection before it had become a threat to his life and limb. He'd been put on antibiotics already. All Meredith had to do was debride the wound the nail/tack/whatever thing had left behind.

Meredith smiled. “Today's your lucky day, Mr. Keller, because I'm being unproductive. Productively speaking, I mean.”

“Because your husband made you come to work,” Mr. Keller said. “And that's not productive.”

“Exactly,” said Meredith.

Mr. Keller frowned, but he said nothing. His wavy brown hair had mixed with threads of washed out gray and blonde, giving him a salt-and-pepper look that didn't become him. Exactly like Meredith's hair would look when she aged. She preferred the more distinguished way dark brown and black turned to silver or shock white. Like... Well, like Derek. She sighed. She'd managed to distract herself for... fifteen seconds before thinking about Derek. Again.
“You’re welcome for swapping off days,” Cristina chimed in.

Meredith rolled her eyes. “Thank you, Cristina.”

“No problem,” Cristina said. She scribbled the finishing touches on her notes and clipped her pen back into her pocket. She looked across the ER bay. Brown-scrubbed trauma nurses wandered to and fro, but none of them jogged. The typical rush and bustle of the ER was absent. It was a slow day, just like every other day since the shooting. Cristina sighed with disappointment when she saw no available prospects, and she folded her arms over her chest. “So, who’s home with—”

“Mark,” Meredith said. “Mark, the pillar of emotional immaturity, is nursing my sick husband.”

She still wasn’t quite sure what had possessed her to allow this situation. Derek needed not just care, but support. Emotional support. Mark had the emotional capacity of a flea. A small flea. She should have just taken a week off. She’d already been held back. They couldn’t legitimately hold her back another year until she’d missed more than one, and, while she’d been absent a lot, she still hadn’t missed an entire freaking year. Right? More like several months. Half a year, at worst.

“I’m sorry he’s sick,” Cristina said. “It’s not pneumonia again, right?”

Meredith stopped, frowned, and looked at her friend who was now, technically, her boss. Cristina wore her hair in a high ponytail. She looked regal. Like an attending already, if not for her light blue scrubs. She fit in her lab coat. The sympathetic expression, however, seemed foreign on her face.

“It’s not pneumonia,” Meredith said slowly.

Cristina shrugged. “What? When he’s sick, you’re mopey.”

Meredith shook her head and turned back to her patient. “Mr. Keller, I’m going to debride this, now. Tell me right away if you experience any discomfort.” She’d numbed the area with topical anesthetic.

“Honestly, I’m not even sure I can tell I still have a foot at all,” Mr. Keller said with a grunt. “Just do what you’re going to do.”

Meredith picked up the sonic debrider and swallowed as she stared at the wound. White, dead skin swirled like marble with blood and gore. Out of nowhere, the stench of infection clogged her nose. Her stomach turned, and then she couldn’t look at it, either, which was patently ridiculous. She’d seen plenty worse. She’d been inside people’s skulls. Brain soup was not exactly the easiest thing to look at. But the smell... Rotten. Decrepit. Dead flesh. After another quick glance at pus, and she had to look away and couldn’t look back because her stomach had twisted into oozing knots. Sweat dotted her brow.

“What’s wrong with you?” Cristina said, her tone more accusing than concerned.

“I’m sorry,” Meredith said. She shook her head and tried again, but she thought of the sound of a scalpel cutting dead flesh. She imagined the layers of dead skin she’d have to peel away. She could push herself through that, but the foul odor of the wound kept hitting her like a brick wall. The reek magnified everything. She pushed back from the debridement tool tray so hard the instruments clattered. She swallowed and swallowed and swallowed again, trying to keep her stomach from rebelling. She set the sonic debrider down on the tray table, and she squeezed her eyes shut as bile burned her throat. God, the smell...

“Cristina, could you get this?” Meredith said, her voice hoarse and shaky. Hot. It felt hot in here.
She swallowed as the lights all around her brightened like a firestorm.

“Having me do your busywork is going to make your unproductive productivity look more like complete inactivity, you know,” Cristina said, her voice wry.

Meredith didn’t speak. She was certain that if she were to open her mouth, she’d lose her dinner on the floor. Her throat swelled with a full feeling as her tongue pulled back. She snapped off her gloves and raised her bare hands to her mouth. She shook her head. In the blur, she saw Cristina, who actually looked concerned, now. She heard Mr. Keller asking her if she was all right, except his voice sounded low-pitched and far away, as though he were yelling at her from behind a pillow.

She bolted.

She tore through the hallway past nurses and crash carts and equipment and doctors, and she didn’t stop until she reached the bathroom. She ran to the sink because she didn’t think she’d make it through something complicated like a stall door. She stared at the silver drain at the bottom of the sink. Water dripped. She breathed in and out. In. Out. As fast as the wave of blood and gore had crashed into her head, it receded like the tide, and she didn’t feel sick at all. Not a bit.

“What the hell?” she croaked at her haggard counterpart in the mirror, but the room was empty, and the only sound that greeted her was the echo of her words bouncing back into her face. She sighed. She wiped her eyes. This didn’t make any sense, unless withdrawal was contagious, which, as a skilled doctor, she knew it wasn’t.

“You're not getting the flu,” she told the mirror. “You're not. Okay?” She pointed at her pasty reflection and glared. “You don't have sick leave. You can't get sick. You cannot.”

She sighed as she thought of Derek. Fluids were hit or miss. Keeping food down had been impossible for him since yesterday. And even when he didn't have anything in his stomach, he vomited bile. On the rare occasions he had energy anymore, he paced. Over the hours, though, she’d caught him lying on the floor in the bathroom more and more often, trembling and sweaty and pale like wax paper. He’d stopped telling her to go away. He’d stopped saying much of anything. He’d just lain there, on the floor, in a fetal position by the toilet. Either silent or crying. Anxiety, depression, insomnia, irritability, restlessness... All symptoms of withdrawal.

And she’d let Mark deal with it. Mark, of all people.

She went into one of the bathroom stalls. She sat on the seat and pulled her cell phone from her lab coat pocket. She checked for messages. None. And no missed calls, either. She dialed home, and Mark picked up on the second ring.

“You were just here like three hours ago,” he said.

She startled. She’d dialed the land line. She didn’t have caller id. How would he have known... “I wanted to check in,” she said.

“Mother hen.”

She frowned. “I am not.”

“Are, too,” he said. “I’d be embarrassed.”

“Am not!” She stood from the seat and stomped her foot. “I’m not!”

“I won't tell him you called, if you want,” he said. “You can still salvage the situation with a lie by
She heard the dog bark and growl on the other end of the line. Not like she was snarling or being nasty. More like playing. The phone made jostling noises. Meredith wondered if Mark was playing with the rope toy in the kitchen or something. How could he be playing with the damned dog at a time like this?

“But I did call,” Meredith said. “I am calling. I'm...” She swallowed as she sat back down. “How is he?”

“About the same as three hours ago,” Mark said. “Time to go out,” he said, not into the receiver. The dog barked once close by, and again and again farther and farther off.

Meredith clenched her fingers. “You're mocking me.”

“You know I've been a doctor a lot longer than you have, right?” he said. “I can care for another human being.”

“And if Derek needed a nose job, I wouldn't doubt your abilities,” Meredith assured him.

“Ouch, Big Grey. That stings,” he said. “And he does need a rhinoplasty, you know. Haven't you looked at his face?”

“Because you broke your hand on it! Which is exactly my point!” she said. “You can't fix this by punching it.”

“He told you about that, huh?”

“And I'll have you know I like his nose,” she said. “It's rugged and charming.”

“Glad I could help with that, then.”

“Mark...” She sighed as she rolled her eyes. “Just put Derek on the phone, please.”

A pause. “I can't.”

“Why not?” she demanded.

“Because he's in the bathroom.”

Meredith sighed. She stood up. She exited the stall, and she started to pace. “Is he lying on the floor again?”

“I don't know,” Mark said. “The door is shut.”

“He could be really sick!”

“He is really sick, Grey,” Mark said. “That's sort of the definition of withdrawal.”

“You know what I meant!” she snapped as she stopped by the trashcan. She gave it a half-hearted kick to vent frustration, but it didn't help her feel better. She didn't want to be here. She didn't want to be at Seattle Grace. What had possessed her to promise Derek she'd try to go into work if she could arrange her shifts with Mark? His mopey eyes, and his please, please, pleasees. That's what. She kicked the can again, a bit harder. The lid swung. Stupid... leaning... mousse-loving... man. Her eyes watered. Stupid sick man.
“He's fine,” Mark said.

“But how do you know? You can't be sure,” she said. “What if he has a stash in there? Why are you even on the phone when you're supposed to be watching him!”

“Because you called me!” Mark said. “And he doesn't have a stash.”

“Well, you should have known not to pick up,” Meredith insisted. “And how do you know he doesn't have a stash?”

“You just established I'm an emotional Cro-Magnon. You want me to be psychic, now?”

Her face heated. “No.”

“Good,” he said. “And I know he doesn't have a stash because I checked every fucking nook, cranny, cave, and crevice in this house the second you left, and I made no apologies about it.”

She blinked. Tears swelled and streaked down her face in an unexpected deluge of grief. The fact that Derek needed this sort of policing, now, made her heart squeeze, but the fact that Mark had done it, that Mark had been the bad guy and saved her some of the heartache in this horrible situation... “Really?”

“Really.”

“How did you know to—”

“Amelia went through this,” he said. “Remember?”

“Oh. Right.” She closed her eyes. They burned. God, she didn't want to be at work today. She wanted to be curled up on the bathroom floor with Derek. Or hiding in a dark hole until this all went away. “You swear you can handle this?”

“I swear I can handle this,” Mark said. She imagined him standing there holding his hand in a mock boy scout salute. “Shit happens in his life. He deals with it badly every fucking time. But he gets through it. He'll get through this.”

“See, I don't think he really does get through anything,” Meredith said. “Well, most... some things.”

Big Things. Derek's method of coping seemed to be all about stuffing things in boxes in the corner and leaving the room, until he had a whole big pile of boxes, nowhere to cram the next Big Thing, and then they all toppled on his head when he came back to stack the next box. Not that she could throw many stones. She hadn't been a card carrying coping champion until... well, until she'd married him and let herself believe she could be the extraordinary version of herself if she tried.

“He'll be fine, Grey,” Mark said. “Really. I promise I'll watch him. Nothing will happen.”

Meredith swallowed. “You swear?”

“Absolutely swear,” Mark said. “Cross my heart and hope to die. Needle in my eye and everything.”

She scoffed. “That's mature.”

“Either I'm a Neanderthal or I'm not,” he said. “Make up your mind.”

She wiped her eyes and sniffed. “You said Cro-Magnon before.”
“They're both prehistoric stupid people.”

“Fine,” she said. “You can be both. Can I call later?”

“Do you want me to pick up?”

She rolled her eyes. “Mark...”

“Just making sure,” he said.

She pressed her forehead against the cool, tiled wall, and she closed her eyes.

“What do you mean, odd behavior?” Mark said.

They sat in the conference room. He had a steaming Starbucks cup and a pile of patient charts stacked in front of him on the table. She'd pulled him out of rounds with an emergency page. He hadn't complained or commented, which made her feel worse. Worse for stumbling all over this. Worse for wasting his time and looking like a foolish idiot.

“Well, I think...” she said. She shook her head. “I mean, I'm suspicious... I mean.”

He leaned forward. “Spit it out, Grey.”

She sighed. She stared at the open doorway. Nobody hovered nearby, but she couldn't just blurt... She stood. She brushed off her lab coat, and she went to the door to close it. She stood with her back against the door. Mark whirled in his chair and stared at her with his eyebrows raised. He crossed his arms.

This was Derek's friend. Derek's friend since... Who knew how long? Derek hadn't really specified, though she suspected, from clues uttered here and there, from little conversational tidbits, that Mark had been around since their childhoods. Since before Derek's father had died. Which meant this was going to be horrible. Mark would laugh at her for even suggesting that Derek was an addict. Not Derek, who'd been his friend for nearly as long as Meredith had been alive, if not longer.

Just rip the band-aid, she decided. Rip it.

“I think Derek might be taking too many Percocet,” she blurted.

Mark closed his eyes, and he let out a slow breath. “Shit,” he said.

She blinked. “I kind of expected more disbelief.”

“A few weeks ago, I took him grocery shopping to get him out of the house. It was the week after Seattle Presbyterian released him.”

“Oh, okay,” she said. She shook her head. “What did that have to do with anything?”

“He wasn't feeling well,” Mark continued. “He went back to the car before I'd finished with the shopping list. I found him in the car later. I thought he was asleep. He'd dropped his pills, and they were all over the floor of my Mustang.”

She gaped. “Seriously?” she snapped. “You didn't think that might be worth mentioning?”

He shrugged. “He woke up when I shook him. He said he must have fallen asleep without screwing the cap on the bottle, and it'd fallen out of his lap.”
“And you believed him?” Meredith said, her voice dripping with incredulity. She’d known Mark wasn’t the most emotionally intuitive guy around, but... “Mark, he’s taking like two dozen a day. And, now, you’re saying this might have started over a month ago?”

“You’re counting his pills?” he said.

“Yes, I’m counting them!” she snapped. “I’m worried about him.”

“I guess I’m an idiot.”

“Yes, you’re a freaking idiot,” she said. “I can’t believe you wouldn’t mention something like that.” She stalked back to her chair and sat down. She sighed, and she slumped onto the table. Her elbows squeaked on the wood. “I can’t believe this. I just can’t,” she told the table.

“With his history, I didn’t think he’d... I wanted to give him the benefit of the doubt,” Mark said. “Okay? I’m sorry. If I’d seen something else, I would have said something. Honestly, I’d forgotten all about it. He’s seemed fine, lately. Well, not fine. But not two-dozen pills worth of stoned.”

She stared at him, but her eyes lost focus on his features, and her gaze wandered through the open blinds behind him. A redhead attending in navy scrubs who she didn’t recognize trotted down the hall, followed by a clot of interns. She closed her eyes and let darkness soothe her. She rubbed the bridge of her nose as a headache bloomed like an unwanted dandelion weed thing in her skull.

“What history, Mark?” she said.

“You didn’t know?”

She opened her eyes. Tired. She was tired. This was too much. Why did there have to be more? Derek being a freaking addict was already a lot. “Didn’t know what?”

“His sister,” Mark said. “Amelia.”

Meredith shrugged. “She seemed nice. What about her?”

“She’s an addict, Grey,” Mark said. “She’s why he crashed his bike, and he nearly flunked out of medical school because of her, too. I didn’t exactly think he was clamoring to follow in her footsteps.”

“What do you mean?” She shook her head. “Flunked... crashed...” she repeated uselessly.

“You didn’t know any of this, did you?”

“No, I didn’t know any of this!” she said. “He doesn’t talk about medical school. Or his crash. Or anything prior to Seattle, really.”

“There’s a reason for that, Grey.”

“Oh, god,” she said. She cradled her head in her hands.

“It’s not your fault.”

“No, but it’s my fault I didn’t know any of this. I’m an insensitive freak, and if I hadn’t been, maybe, I would have caught this crap sooner.”

He laughed, low-pitched and wry. A sympathetic chuckle. “I think we’ve established that I’m the insensitive freak in this club.”
“Do we still even have a club?” she said.

He gave her a sad smile. “Dirty mistresses for life,” he said, his voice soft.

She sighed. She flopped back in her chair. “Mark, what the hell do I do?”

“There might be some other explanation.”

“Like what? What possible explanation could there be? And how am I even supposed to bring this up with him without him having a nasty, shout-y fit complete with door slamming?”

“I'll back you up,” he offered.

“No,” she said. “No, if we're both there, he'll think we're ganging up on him, and he'll lash out, whether he's abusing or not. You can't talk to him about this, yet, until I can think of something. You have to promise.”

“Grey...”

“Promise, Mark,” she said.

Silence stretched. He stared at her for a long, weary moment. She thought he might protest. Instead, he sighed. “I promise.”

The drip, drip, drip of the faucet pulled her out of old memories. “Mark?” she said, her voice a whisper against the receiver. She hoped he hadn't hung up in the lull.

“What, now?” he said.

“Thanks,” she said. “I know I’m...” She cleared her throat. “Thanks.”

Silence spread on the line other end of the line. Static hissed in her ear. “See you later, Big Grey,” he said after a long moment. The phone clicked and disconnected.

“Yeah,” she said to no one in particular. “Bye.”

She stuffed the phone into her lab coat pocket, and she sighed. She glanced at her watch. Somehow, she had to live through thirty-two more hours. This would be a long shift.

---

Day Three

Meredith lay on her back on the gurney in the hot sunshine, her arms cupped over her stomach. She sighed. Heat laved her face, but it wasn't a good kind of heat. It was a sweaty, room-spinny heat propagated by a fishy stench and the panicky thought that, if she moved, she would vomit. Something crinkled, and another wave of nausea overwhelmed her. She covered her nose and mouth and rolled to a sitting position. The gurney squeaked.

Alex sat in his lab coat and scrubs. He chewed on something. He clutched a shiny metallic potato chip bag in his hands, and as his temples moved, she heard him crunch, crunch, crunch. Logic drew her attention away from the bag and to his plate. She fixated on the goop-y conglomeration of cheese and whitish pinkish... gunk, smashed between two toasted slices of bread. Still hot, the sandwich steamed slightly. She groaned and reached for it, but he sat at the other end of the bed, and it was so. Far. Away.
He glanced at her with an affronted expression, and pulled the plate closer to his body.

As if she would want to steal it!

“Could you put that away or eat it somewhere else?” she snapped. “It's making me want to hurl.”

He stopped crunching. “My chips?” he said.

“No,” she wailed and gestured to the source of the noxious odors. “That.”

“It's just a tuna melt,” he said.

“I don't care what it is; I can't freaking stand it,” she said. She flopped back onto the gurney. “It's making my stomach churn. I'm already struggling to find reasons to stay in this horrible place for my entire shift, and that's not helping me. I want to go home.”

Alex narrowed his eyes.

“What?” she growled.

He shook his head and slid off the gurney. He put down his potato chips. He took his plate to the trashcan, and—“Throwing it out right there won't make it smell less!” she said.

He rolled his eyes, passed the buzzing snack machine, and pushed through the doorway. He disappeared through the little window in the door as he cut to the left on the other side. She sighed with relief as the clot of tuna odor left her nasal passages, and she could breathe again. She rolled onto her side to face the door as she cupped her tortured stomach.

Alex returned empty-handed through the doorway. “Thank you,” she said. “I'll pay you back.”

He shrugged. “It didn't look that good anyway.” And yet he'd tried to keep it from her? Her lip twitched as she fought a smile. He flopped back onto the gurney with a sigh and pulled a chip out of his bag. His pager whirred. He pulled it from his lab coat pocket and checked it. His gaze shifted to his watch. With a small nod, he put the pager back in his pocket, and he relaxed.

“What time is it?” she asked the mattress.

“11:20,” he responded. “I'm scrubbing in at noon.”

She sighed. She didn't feel any amount of jealousy that he'd managed to find a real surgery. She just felt dismay over the time. How had it only been seventeen hours since she'd started this horrible shift? “I should be at home,” she said.

“You're being kind of melodramatic,” he replied “Shepherd can live for thirty-six hours without you.”

“I'm not being melodramatic.”

“Yes, you are,” Alex said. He shrugged and munched on another chip. “So, he's an addict. He'll cry and vomit for a few days. At least he's trying to fix it, now. Wanting to fix it is the hard part.”

She clawed into a sitting position. “I never said he's an—”

“Meredith, I'm not an idiot,” he said.
“I never said he's an addict.”

“Dude,” he said. He waved a chip in the air for emphasis. “I get that you want to preserve his privacy bubble, but don't patronize me.”

“But—”

“I figured it out this week,” he said. “It wasn't really hard to do the math.”

“But—”

“I see vomiting, sweating, chills, a runny nose, a nasty-ass temper, endless pacing, and sobbing, and I'm pretty much going to think crazy psycho with the flu, or withdrawal. And we all know he's not a crazy psycho.”

Meredith's mouth tumbled open. “He was sobbing?” she said. “Right in front of you?”

Which meant Derek was still really, really sick. Not in a million freaking years would he have let himself fall apart where he could be seen by people he considered subordinates if he could have helped it. Alex was, like Cristina, in Derek's life because he mattered to Meredith. He was not a part of it because Derek and Alex were friends. Derek hated the whole roommates thing, but he'd stopped complaining, and he'd lived with it for over a year, even after Alex had returned sans Izzie, and Lexie had returned sans Mark, both somewhat uninvited. This wasn't the first time she'd thought about it since Derek had been shot. He did that for her, and not once, since their initial conversation about it, had he ever brought it up or used it as ammunition or anything since then, just as he'd promised. She clenched her fingers as her lungs and stomach constricted. She wouldn't cry. Not now.

“In the hallway, when I left this morning,” Alex said. “Sloan gave me the glare of death and practically shoved me out the door, so I figured you guys have it covered, and it's not really my business.” He shrugged. “So, whatever.”

“Oh,” she said. Her eyes watered, and she brushed her face with her hands. Alex would think like that, wouldn't he? She forced herself not to give him a hug. What was... She was not a hugging person unless it was with Derek. Where was this coming from? She sniffled. “He's still that bad?”

“I'm sure it'll get better soon,” Alex said. “The first few days are the worst.”

And it'd only been, well... She squinted as she thought about it. Monday night to lunchtime Thursday wasn't even three full days. She hadn't planned for more than four, yet, though she knew Mark was on standby if she needed backup. Still... She closed her eyes. It sure felt like an eternity, and she wasn't the one who'd been lying on the freaking bathroom floor, too sick to move other than to puke. She wasn't the one who had panic atta—

She covered her mouth with her hands.

You're stoned, she'd said. Did you hurt yourself? Are you hurting? Derek?

He'd acted like a lumbering, tranquilized elephant after his panic attack on the catwalk. He'd done it then. Taken pills to supplant bad feelings instead of pain. She'd seen it, it'd been blatant, and she'd just... let it go. Guilty nausea and hot sparks of anger coiled in her throat. She hated rewinding her life with him and finding idiocy and lies wherever she went. She'd been like one of those freaking horses with the blinders on its bridle, and he'd been feeding her falsities for... How long would she keep remembering new things?
She didn't want to remember new things.

“I should have paid more attention to him,” she said as she stared at her lap and clenched her fists around a tent of her scrubs. “The proof was all right there, and I—”

“Addicts can be persuasive people.”

She peered at him. “Did you have suspicions before?”

“I just knew he wasn't dealing well with all of this.”

“Oh,” she said. “No tiny inklings?”

“I barely saw the guy.”

“Not even an itty bitty clue?” she prodded. “Something he said? Something you saw?”

“No,” Alex said. He crumpled up his empty chip bag and tossed it like a basketball into the trashcan on the opposite wall. “What are you getting at?”

“Nothing. I just...” She crossed her arms and scooted back against the window. “I feel like such an idiot.”

“Why?” he said.

“He's been falling off a cliff, and I didn't even notice,” she said. “Or, I did notice. I just did the wrong thing. I saw him using drugs, and I assumed it was pain, exactly like he said. I should have realized the second he started fixating on the Percocet. Or sooner.” She sighed. “I went to medical school. They train us on what to look for. And I knew people who suffer the kind of trauma he did are prone to substance abuse in the aftermath.” She shook her head. “He lied to me, but I let him.”

Alex grunted as he scooted across the gurney and sat next to her. “You can't blame yourself.”

Meredith looked at her lap. “I'm not. Not really.”

Alex raised his eyebrows.

She sighed. “I mean, I know Derek is the one who did this to himself. I know that on a conceptual level or whatever. He took the pills. He poisoned his body. I just wish I'd noticed he needed help sooner. I wish I'd...” Her eyes stung, and she rubbed at them. Please, help me, he'd said. Please, P-please. She'd waited for the literal cry for help, and that just felt... wrong. And clueless. “I just wish I'd... done something.”

“That's crap. You're doing a lot.”

“This whole thing is crap. Derek's always been a flag-waving, card-carrying member of the say-no-to-drugs club.”

Alex nodded. “Which is why it makes sense that you gave him the benefit of the doubt.”

“How could he do this?” She punched the mattress with her fist.

Alex shrugged. “Crap happens to good people. At least he didn't go crazy.”

She raised her eyebrows. “That's it?” she said. “Those are your words of wisdom?”
“Shepherd was hurt,” Alex said. “He took pain medication legitimately for pain, at least for a while. Shitty luck gave him a big shove.”

She stared at Alex, and she bit her lip. He'd bounced back from near death, physically, after he'd come out of his sepsis-wrought coma. The bullet had migrated to the surface of his torso as he'd healed, and he'd had it removed under local anesthetic by Dr. Bailey. Afterward, Lexie had driven him home and plied him with babble-y, bubbly TLC, much to his chagrin. He was younger and more athletic, and none of his bones had been broken. He hadn't been like Derek, who still struggled with fatigue, malaise, and pain on top of everything else. Sometimes, she found it difficult to remember that Alex had been, at one point, so much worse off than Derek, that she'd been told her over the phone to come and say goodbye.

You should visit him, Derek had said.

I can't, she'd replied.

Why not?

Because I just can't do it right now, Derek. I can't.

A sliver of guilt slipped behind her heart. Derek hadn't known about the call. He'd been fishing for names of the deceased. He'd been upset. She'd lost the baby, and he'd nearly died, and she hadn't been able to deal with Alex maybe dying, too.

Alex is a freaking iceberg, Derek. Ninety-nine percent of what's going on in his head, you'll never see. I sincerely doubt he's fine, and I imagine his whole life-is-great Broadway musical routine will crash and burn just like mine did after I drowned. It's fake, she'd speculated. More for Derek's benefit than anything else, but, what if she was doing the blinder thing again?

She swallowed, and she touched Alex's shoulder. Not a hug. There would be no hugging. “Well, how are you fine, then? You were—”

“I don't know,” he said. “I just am.”

“Are you?” Meredith said.

“Look, just because your husband is a disaster doesn't mean I am,” he said. “It wasn't personal for me.”

“What do you mean?”

“I didn't know Mr. Clark. I saw the gun for two seconds, and then I'd been shot and left for dead.”

“So, you're equating you getting shot to... to what?” she said as she struggled to grasp his attitude. “A freak accident like getting struck by lightning or a piano falling on your head?”

“Shit happens,” he said. “I'm better, now. Why dwell on it?”

“You were shot, Alex. How can you—”

The door burst open. “Hey guys,” Lexie said. She chomped on a familiar-looking toasted sandwich full of melted cheese and goop-y white pink meat. Was that a freaking daily special in the cafeteria or something? “What are we chatting about?” Lexie said rudely around her mouthful. She clutched a green apple and a juice box in her other hand.
Meredith had about three seconds of clean air before the tuna stench hit her. Her stomach roiled, and she put one hand to her mouth and the other against her rebelling, churning, kickboxing stomach.

“Dude, you can't eat that here,” Alex said from somewhere far away.

Lexie's eyes widened. The half-sandwich dangled from her mouth. “Why can't I—”

Alex jerked his thumb at Meredith. “Tuna makes her barf today.”

“What do you mean? She likes tuna,” Lexie said, as though Meredith weren't even in the room. Meredith clenched her teeth. She would not throw up. She would not.

“Not today,” said Alex.

Meredith groaned and hobbled off the gurney. She shambled toward her half-sister. The trip took her closer to it. The sandwich. The horrible smell. It. But she needed to get to the trashcan— “Ugh. Lexie.” She gasped, and she pushed on Lexie's shoulders as she stumbled past. “Get it away.”

Meredith slammed into the trashcan with her hands, and she lost track of Lexie. Blood rushed in her ears, and the heat and swelter of nausea made her perception of the world swim. She clenched her jaws, and she stood over the open bin, fighting a gag reflex that really wanted her to hurl. The warm reek of garbage wafted against her face. Strong hands wrapped around her shoulders, squeezed, and pulled her away from the can. Shh, she imagined Derek whispering. It's okay. Breathe. And she did, and the stench of the trash receded, and tuna didn't replace it.

She groaned. “Oh, that was bad,” she said as she held the back of her hand to her lips. Alex supported her and kept her from slipping to the floor.

“Okay?” he said.

She nodded as her stomach calmed down. “Yeah.”

He let go.

Lexie returned through the doorway empty-handed. No tuna. The apple and the juice box had disappeared, too, as though she thought any food might offend. “I'm so sorry,” she said. Meredith didn't have a chance to protest before her half-sister stood in her face, the back of her hand pressed against Meredith's forehead, all hovering, hyper-concerned, and crowding. Lexie frowned. “Do you have the flu or something?” she said. “You were sick on Tuesday, too.” She glanced at Alex. “No fever,” she relayed.

Alex and Lexie pushed Meredith back onto the gurney. Lexie stood over Meredith, dark brown eyes full of concern as Meredith lay back on the mattress. Alex hung farther back by Meredith's ankles, but, still, he stayed close. Lexie didn't lift her hand from Meredith's forehead. She stared. A long time.

“Any muscle aches?” Lexie said.

“No,” Meredith grumbled. “What are you looking at?”

Lexie's frown deepened. Her hand shifted. Meredith felt her cheek press inward with pressure from Lexie's thumb. “Your face is really full,” Lexie said.

“Are you saying my face is fat?” Meredith pushed Lexie away.
“No,” Lexie said. “Just full, and I...” Her eyes narrowed as though she were staring at puzzle pieces that almost fit. Almost. If she were to just shift an edge piece one way and flip another... Her eyes widened. “Oh, my god, are you pregnant?” she blurted.

Meredith sat up so fast the room swam. She glanced back at Alex through a dissipating waterfall of black. “What?” Meredith said.

Alex held up his hands. “I wasn't gonna go there.”

“But you thought it, too?” Meredith snapped.

He backed away, as if to say, “Yeah, and that's exactly why I didn't go there.”

Lexie's concerned frown broke into a wide, warm smile. “Well, you've been trying, right?”

Meredith folded her arms over her chest. “Yeah. So?”

“So, you don't normally barf over tuna,” said Lexie. “And your face is full. And you've been nauseous all week. You threw out my leftover Moo Goo Gai Pan, and it wasn't even a day old.”

“Those are small bullet points in a long list of possible symptoms,” Meredith said. “How do you get that I'm pregnant from that? Maybe it's stomach flu or something, like you said.”

“You don't have a fever or muscle aches. And your face is full. How is that flu?”

“I moisturize,” Meredith said. “I could have a full face! I could have a full face and have the flu.”

“You do look a bit busty, you know,” Alex said.

She gaped at him. “Busty!” Meredith exclaimed. She looked down at her chest. She didn't notice anything strange. She hadn't needed a larger bra. She wore her favorite one – white with no lace or ornamentation — because it was comfortable, though Derek didn't like it as much because the clasp confounded him for some reason she couldn't fathom.

How could she be more busty if she could wear the same bra? That made no sense.

Alex shrugged. “Well, you're not popping out of your scrubs or anything, but you're bigger.”

“Because you stare at my breasts all day and notice these things?” Meredith said. “Alex!”

“What?” he said. He smirked as he gave her a once over and then gave her an approving nod. “I think your jugs look good today.”

“I'm not even dignifying that with a response,” Meredith said. “I can't be pregnant. It's impossible.”

Lexie's face fell. “Oh,” she said.

It's totally possible, said a small voice. You haven't had your period yet since the last one, and it's been five weeks. Which was normal, Meredith insisted to herself. After a miscarriage, cycles were screwy for a bit. That was a given. Right?

“I cannot be pregnant,” Meredith said. “Not right now.”

Lexie nodded. Her smile returned. “Oh,” she said. Her tone sounded more... knowing. “Maybe, you should take a test.”
Meredith blinked. “But Derek is—”

“Probably looking for some good news in his life right now,” Alex said.

“Well, yes, but he’s—”

“I hear good news cancels vomit.”

“What?” Meredith said. “Alex, that’s—”

Lexie frowned. “So, he is sick again? Meredith, I'm sorry. He just can't seem to catch a break.”

“I can't be pregnant!” Meredith insisted, ignoring her. “I just miscarried. We've had sex like ten times. Not even the sweaty, shout-y, bed-break-y sex you guys always complain about.”

“It only takes once,” said Lexie.

“It know it takes only once, but I drowned, and Derek got shot. Our childhoods have enough trauma and abandonment in them to give Freud a wet dream or whatever when you mash them together. And let's not even get into the whole freaking mess with Addison. It's clear to me that the universe hates us with a fiery passion. Why would it pick our side, now, of all times?”

Lexie shrugged, her expression helpless.

Meredith growled with frustration. “Great. This is just great.”

“You're not happy?” said Lexie.

“No, I'm not happy!” Meredith snapped. “I promised Derek I wouldn't take a test without letting him know, and because I also let him make me promise I'd try not to take more time off work, I'm stuck here for another...” she stopped to glance at her watch, “Eighteenish hours looking even less productive than the utter not productiveness I was exhibiting when we started this chat, and I can't take a pregnancy test here and tell him over the phone because who tells people gigantic news like I could be pregnant over the phone when there's a reasonable amount of vicinity and means to freaking get together? Plus, I told him on Monday I wasn't being hormonal, and I apparently have been. Or might have been. Maybe. Assuming he knocked me up again like a virile he-man jerk instead of letting me have the stomach flu like a normal person.”

Meredith flopped flat on the gurney and heaved a dramatic sigh. Lexie snickered. Snickered!

Meredith glared. “It's not funny, Lexie.”

“It's kinda funny,” Alex said.

Cristina joined them before Meredith could respond, and the horrible cycle of sickness began again when the funk of tuna rolled over her like a dump truck. Heat burned her from the inside. Meredith's stomach clenched and jerked. She gagged. Bile and other fluid filled her throat as she rolled to the side. And then everything spilled onto the floor out of her innards. She gagged and gasped and choked as everybody scattered to avoid wayward projectiles.

Meredith sniffed. Her nose ran. She wiped her mouth with her hand as her body relaxed, and she pushed away the sticky, wet ends of her ponytail from her face. “There's too much freaking vomit in my life right now,” she croaked as she lay there with her eyes squeezed shut against the gurney.
“Seriously. Is that sandwich a special or something?”

Cristina looked at the mess on the floor as she munched on her sandwich, and then back up at Meredith. At least, now appeased with its need to evacuate itself, Meredith’s stomach had stopped protesting the mere presence of tuna. “Okay, what’s wrong with you?” Cristina said. “I thought you said yesterday night was a fluke.”

“Dude,” Alex said. “She’s hormonal.”

“I am not hormonal!” Meredith snapped. “What time is it?”

“11:51,” Alex said. “Why?”

Meredith pressed her face into the gurney, breathing. Oh, god. Derek's sperm was a bunch of super-powered, squiggly bullies. She didn't need a test. She knew. That was the exact time. She'd puked right on time. How could she be pregnant, now? Now, of all times, when Derek was so sick from withdrawal because of his freaking drug addiction he couldn't even pick himself up off the bathroom floor half the time. Neither of them were in any shape to be parents, right now. How the hell were they going to do this? What had they been thinking? Oh, god, how were they going to do this?

“Crap,” Meredith said, her voice the barest whisper. She struggled to sit up.

“Neat,” said Cristina. She sat on the gurney and swung her feet. “Am I still the godmother?”

“Crap!” Meredith repeated. She crawled off the gurney. Her sneakers squeaked and squished as she nearly slipped on the puddle of vomit she’d created. Her vomit. Great. This was just great.

Lexie stared with a helpless expression. “Congratulations?”

“I don't like you people anymore!” Meredith snapped as she stalked off to find a towel and the janitor.

---

Day Four

“You can't freak out,” Mark said in a hushed voice. He blocked her from the front door with his big body. He'd come out to greet her as she'd rushed down the front walk. He wore jeans and a stained white t-shirt and cross-trainers, and he had his laptop bag shouldered, as though he expected to leave as soon as he passed on his message. The birds chirped in the early dawn, and a cool breeze blew against her skin.

She clenched her fists. “What do you mean? What happened? Why would I freak out?” She had to pee. She had to pee, and she wanted to take a pregnancy test to be sure sure, instead of just sure, and she wanted to do it now. Now. She stared into the foyer through the glass of the front door behind Mark. Nothing but empty space. She'd thought Derek might be feeling well enough to come to the door. Or, well, been hoping. His absence, in conjunction with Mark's greeting, though, sent a chill down her spine. She hadn't spoken to Mark since early evening the night before. “Is something wrong with Derek? Why didn't you call me?”

Mark grasped her shoulders and met her eyes with his stark blue ones. “He's fine,” Mark said in slow, enunciated syllables. “I took care of it.”
“Took care of what!” she hissed, careful to keep her voice matching his whispered pitch. Why whisper? She didn't know. She shifted on her feet.

Mark stepped to the side, clearing her path. “He's asleep in his office on the air mattress.”

She frowned. But she and Derek had decided the air mattress was pointless. She'd thought... “Why?”

Mark shook his head. “Just leave him be,” Mark said. “He's fine, and that's all you need to care about. Okay? Just wait a few hours before you go to bed.”

She searched his face. What the hell? What had she missed? “Mark...”

He shifted his laptop bag to his other shoulder. His keys jingled. “I have to get to my shift. Just in case you need me this weekend, I need to make up some time.”

She opened her mouth to protest, but opted to close it before she said something. He'd bent over backwards to accommodate this whole screwy situation, and he'd let her deal with it the way she wanted, and he'd been quietly supportive this whole freaking time. He'd just spent thirty-six hours nursing Derek, and now he was on his way to a shift that would last who knew how long?

“Oh okay,” she said, though curiosity burned as she watched him nod and head down to the street where he'd parked his cherry-colored mustang.

She danced over the threshold and set her purse and keys down in the foyer. She really had to pee, but she'd promised Derek she'd warn him about taking a pregnancy test first. She glanced at her watch. 6:30 AM. She didn't have to be back at work until 7:00 PM. Another graveyard shift. She'd managed to have horrible luck with scheduling this week. At least she had twelve hours to sleep and take pregnancy tests, though. And, with luck, Derek would be okay enough that he could be on his own for a little while, and she wouldn't need to drag Mark back or swap shifts with somebody else.

She closed the front door behind her, and she walked to Derek's dark office. The door was open. He lay on the air mattress crammed between the desk and the walls and the dog, who looked up at her as she entered. Billowing, frothy red blankets covered him. A smile bloomed across her face when she looked at the lump he formed, and she realized he wasn't moving. No rolling side to side. No agitated toe flexing. Nothing. She listened to him breathe for a moment in the quiet space, raspy and slow with sleep, not labored. And sleep! Real, honest-to-god sleep. She didn't think he'd slept much, if at all, since before Monday.

She knelt by the mattress. The dog's stump tail wagged, and Meredith gave her a happy wave, though she couldn't reach to pet. Derek shifted, and she saw his face. A thick rash of stubble covered his chin and throat, but there was no perspiration at his brow or anywhere visible. His hair looked clean, and he smelled soapy, not sweaty. Actually, a bit like fabric softener, as if he'd just changed his shirt or something.

She hated to wake him up, but her bladder twinged, reminding her of the filtered water she'd guzzled during the last hour as her shift had drawn to a close, and the 32oz lemonade she'd purchased on the way home at the drive-thru and sucked dry.

“Derek,” she whispered, not wanting to startle him. She didn't touch him. “Derek, wake up.”

His eyes slipped open. He blinked. His gaze softened when he focused on her.

“Hey,” she whispered. She brushed his face with her palm. The stubble scraped, but his skin was smooth and dry. When she drew her fingers through his hair, it flicked back into position. Dull and frizzy with lack of product, but completely dry. Dark circles wrapped underneath his eyes, and his skin seemed way too pale, but despite that, the improvement in how she found him, now, over how she'd left him stole her breath. She'd hoped for him to be better, but not like this!

“You look a lot better,” she said, louder, as a smile tore across her face, and she wondered what on earth Mark had been going on about.

“Meredith,” Derek said, still muzzy with sleep. His voice seemed a bit weak. A bit bleak, too. Hoarse. His eyelids drooped, and he looked like he wanted to roll over and go back to whatever dream he'd been having.

She rubbed his back through the blankets. Guilt formed a lump in her throat. “I'm really sorry, but I need you to get up,” she said.

“Mmm?” he said. “Why?”

“Better,” he replied.

He rubbed his eyes with his hands and grunted. She backed up to give him room to sit up. The big red comforter spilled away from his body. He wore his gray Bowdoin t-shirt and black shorts. There were no sweat stains at the neck or in the armpits of the shirt. The fabric smelled fresh and clean. The shirt hung too loose on his frame, which made her sigh. He hadn't been eating enough going into this to be able to withstand days of vomiting and not replenishing calories.

“Do you want something to eat?” she said.

A dark expression crossed his face that she couldn't read. “I'm not that much better,” he said.

“Okay,” she said. She pushed away the building ache. He was better. He was a lot better. She would be content with that.

He struggled to stand, and she helped him without comment. The wince that carved his features made her wince, too. When he achieved upright, he stopped for a long, lurching moment. His grip was shaky and feeble, and he took his steps with care when he began to move. The dog stood and followed them out into the living room. Her nametag and rabies tags jingled as she moved.

He moved with agonizing slowness, and when he sat on the sofa in the living room, he collapsed at a slow pace, too, as though he didn't want to exacerbate something that was already painful. He sank into the cushions like a glacier sliding into a valley. Samantha resettled on the floor by the coffee table. She rolled onto her back with a snort. Her dog tags jingled again. And then she evened out and closed her eyes.

Meredith didn't sit with Derek. She stood in the middle of the room. She shifted foot to foot. Now that she was finally here, and she had him awake... Derek, I think I'm pregnant, she thought. It was easy to think. Why not say?

“Well,” he said, his voice dull. He rubbed his eyes again. “I'm up.”

She stared at him.

“Why am I up?” he said. He didn't sound irritated or mean. Just curious. And exhausted. And sick-but-better.

Silence stretched. She opened her mouth. She closed her mouth. She started a gesture. That didn't work, either.

“First word,” Derek said tiredly. He leaned into the arm of the sofa and pressed his face into his palm. “Rhymes with clue.”

She laughed. She couldn't help it.

“It doesn't rhyme with clue?” he said.

She shook her head and sighed. The burning feeling in her bladder urged her onward. “Derek, I'm sorry. I had a speech planned. I did. But it died a non-speech-y death as soon as I walked through the door. I want to take a pregnancy test,” she said.

For a moment, a long moment, he didn't react, and she could almost see the gears in his head grinding against sleep deprivation. And then his breaths shortened. His eyes widened. He pressed his hand into the arm of the couch, and he stood like he'd been shot out of a cannon. “What?” he blurted, only to take a slow step. His foot stuck, sort of as though he were stepping through molasses. He blanched. The dog stood and began to bark. His gaze lost focus, his eyelids dipped. He made a sound sort of like, “Ungh,” and then he toppled.

She'd seen that happen any number of times with people who donated blood without eating a big enough meal beforehand. They thought they were fine, stood up in a rush, and wham. Down they went. She stepped forward more on instinct than anything else, arms outstretched. She hooked her arms underneath his as he flailed. She fell onto the couch with him more than sat, and she rolled off his willowy frame as soon as they'd landed. She swallowed, still catching up with the situation. “Shh,” she said to the dog, who shushed.

Meredith blinked and rolled back toward Derek. His lips were the color of chalk. His eyes rested half-closed, and he wasn't seeing, but he wasn't all the way out, at least. She patted his face, and he blinked a bit like his eyelids had been attached to his eyeballs with slowly drying glue. “Derek,” she said. His hand twitched. She slapped his cheek a bit harder. “Derek, wake up.”

“M'okay,” he slurred.

“You fainted,” she said. She ran her fingers through his hair. He blinked again, but he still didn't look like he was perceiving that much. “Derek? Derek, are you awake?”

He made a noise that wasn't exactly coherent. She stroked his face. She didn't want to leave him, but she doubted she would get very far just by smacking him. “I'll be right back,” she said, and she ran to the kitchen, careful to keep him in her line of sight as long as possible, just in case he did something like faint all the way.

She needed orange juice or something else sugary. She pulled open the fridge, only to be delighted by what she saw. Apple juice. Mark must have bought it. She grabbed the jug and poured Derek a glass. She ran back to Derek with her hand cupped over the top of the glass to keep the sticky juice from spilling too much.

She helped him hold the glass. He sipped weakly at it while she brushed her fingers through his hair. Color seeped back into his face.

“I haven't eaten,” he said in a wispy, disturbed voice.
“In days,” she said. “I know. It's okay.”

He took another sip and blinked. Another sip. Another blink. She tried not to bounce from foot to foot. She had to pee, damn it, but she didn't want to rush this and have him faint all over again because he didn't have enough sugar in his body to deal with the situation.

Another sip, and his whole body jerked. “You're pregnant,” he said, his tone confused. “You said you're pregnant?”

“I don't know yet. I have to do the pee test,” she said. She stood. “Which is good because I'm floating. I drank lemonade all the way home to make sure I'd be ready in case the water I drank before I left didn't work.” She thought, however, that both had worked pretty amply, from the painful pressure in her lower body. She moved toward the foyer, waiting for him to show some sign that he understood the situation, so she could go.

“Okay,” he said, his voice flat. He set the half-finished glass of apple juice on the end table. He pushed at the arm of the sofa, and he stood again. He swayed as though, now that he'd accomplished this goal, he had no idea what he'd been planning to do.

“What are you doing?” she said as she rushed back into the room.

He gripped her shoulders. His arms shook. “You have to take the test.”

“You sit,” she said. “I'll go do it.”

“What?”

She raised her eyebrows. “You want to watch me pee on a stick?”

That seemed to penetrate the thick fog that'd clouded his senses. He blinked. “Not really.”

“Well, you can't pee on the stick for me, so sit.”

A deep red hue sprawled across his cheeks. Color restored. He glanced at the living room, and at her, and seemed to be taking stock, finally. He gifted her with an adorable, sheepish grin. “Sorry,” he said. He settled back on the couch and made a point out of sipping more apple juice.

She grinned. “It's okay,” she said. She kissed his temple. “Gold stars for determination.”

“Lacking in rational thought, though,” he said.

“You just fainted,” she said. “I give you a pass. And, now, I have to pee.”

She bolted before he could respond. She ran up the steps as fast as her feet would allow. She barreled into the bedroom to grab the pregnancy test box she'd opened from her nightstand, only to halt. Birds chirped through the open window, and a fan whirred on high. The room reeked like lemon. The pillows, sheets, and blankets had been stripped from the mattress. Someone had propped the fan against a small table, and the fan blew across the bed on Derek's side. She stopped. She pressed her palm against the mattress as she bit her lip. Damp cloth met her skin. A light stain splotched the carpet by the bed on the floor. More light stains splotched the side and the top of the mattress. Light stains that looked like they had, at one point, been dark. But then somebody had scrubbed. A lot.

Just wait a few hours before you go to bed, Mark had said.
You can't freak out.

Just leave him be.

She raised her hand to her mouth as a lump formed in her throat. Derek had been that sick? Guilt swept over her like a wave for waking him. The mattress was still wet. It was only about 7:00 AM. That meant Derek had had a late, awful night. No wonder he was shaky. Her stomach churned as she thought about all the work Mark must have done to clean Derek without brutally embarrassing him, and then clean the room. No stench of vomit remained. Just lemon, and she could deal with lemon without her stomach flip-flopping. Mark had done a good job. And Derek seemed none the worse for wear. Her fingers clenched. Mark had done a really good job.

You can't freak out, he'd said. Mark's one demand. Her bladder screamed at her.

She forced herself to drop it. It wasn't important. Derek was clean and obviously okay, if not well. They could buy a new mattress. None of it mattered, and asking about what had happened would just ruin all the work Mark had done to make this all okay. She would put new sheets on later when the bed had dried, and she wouldn't ask about it.

She grabbed the pregnancy test from the drawer. She barely made it into the bathroom. She ripped open the test package, scrabbled her fingers along the packaging for the applicator, and yanked it free. Then she sat down, and she exploded. She sighed as she emptied herself. Thank God. When she'd finished, she grabbed the applicator and headed back to the living room. She met Derek on the stairs. The dog teetered up the steps with him. He clutched the railing as though it were the only thing keeping him from oblivion. Probably true, from the way his body shook. She rushed to support him.

“Derek, what are you doing?”

“You were gone for a while,” he said.

She swallowed. For a moment, her head blanked. “I was reading directions and peeing,” she said after a pause. A white lie. Half a white lie.

“You've already read the directions.”

“I wanted to refresh myself,” she said.

“It’s a pregnancy test,” he said. “It’s not rocket science.”

“Well, I might be pregnant, Derek!” she snapped. “That’s pretty rocket science-y to me!”

“Sorry,” he said, though his eyes glittered, and his lip twitched.

She grinned back at him and squeezed his hip. “You are not.”

“I am!” he insisted.

“Whatever,” she said. “Upstairs or downstairs?” she added before she remembered the mess in their bedroom. She squeezed her eyes shut. Crap. She wondered if he knew about the state of the bedroom, or if he'd been too sick to really understand what had happened. Except she'd promised herself she wouldn't ask, and so she wouldn't.

“Where do you want to go?” he said, saving her however inadvertently. “I just wanted to be with you.”
“Let's sit downstairs,” she said.

“Okay.”

They made slow progress. He wasn't moving well, and his limbs shook with fatigue. He put more and more weight on her, and by the time they'd made it to the landing, he breathed hard, and his body swayed. She guided him back to the couch. Samantha watched them for a moment, whuffed, and departed for the dining room, presumably to lie down.

“How long do we wait for this one?” Derek said as he collapsed. He swallowed, and he wiped his face with his palms.

“The booklet says ten minutes,” she said. She set the applicator on the coffee table, dropped onto the couch, and snuggled into his arms. He wrapped her in his embrace, and he didn't say a word. But he trembled. She felt it against her skin like the flutter of a leaf. His whole body.

“Derek, are you okay?”

“I'm fine,” he said.

“Because you seem sort of like you might faint again.”

He reached for the glass of apple juice on the end table and took another sip as if to demonstrate he really was fine, despite how his limbs were behaving. He swallowed, and he stared at her with an odd expression. “You really think you're pregnant?”

Like she would jerk his chain or something just for the hell of it. Her mouth tumbled open with a snappy retort, but she held it back when she looked at him more closely. His expression had an innate fear to it. Like he didn't want to hope too hard, lest he ruin everything, but he hoped anyway, and it'd spilled over into his speech like water from a glass that was too full.

“I don't know for sure,” she said. “I've felt sick this entire week. And then yesterday I threw up. Pretty much right on schedule.”

“Schedule?”

She glanced at the applicator and then at her watch as nervous energy twitched through her body. Not long enough. It hadn't been long enough.

“I'm a punctual barf-er when I'm pregnant, apparently,” she said. “Well, maybe pregnant.”

“A punctual barf…” He blinked. “What?”

“When I was pregnant before, I vomited every morning at the same time,” she said.

“Oh.”

She thought of her last bout of vomit and snorted. “Do you think I look busty?” she said.

“Busty?” Derek said.

“Big-breasted,” she clarified. “Like my boobs have exploded out of my chest.”

He blinked. “Is this a trick question?”

“Alex says I look busty, and I don't see it. I mean I fit in the same bra. I love this bra. And you’d think I'd notice if—”

“Alex says?” he interjected.

“Yeah. They said my face was full, and that I looked busty.”

He shook his head, as though this whole train of thought had lost him at the last stop. “Who are they?” he said.

She took a deep breath. It was hard to remember he was sick, and he'd just woken up, and he'd just fainted earlier, too. There was just so much other stuff swirling in her head. “They, Derek. Lexie, Alex, and Cristina. Who else?”

“Oh.”

“So, am I busty?” she said. “You'd know.”

He chuckled. A lecherous grin slipped across his features, belying his shaky grip and his pallid skin. “Oh, I would, would I?”

“Well, of all the people on this planet, I'd say you're probably the only person other than myself who is legitimately allowed to be staring at my chest and thinking, good god, she's busty.” She scooted back from him, took a breath, lowered her arms, and presented her chest to him. She tried not to puff herself up on purpose or think of how ridiculous this looked. “So. Busty?”

His eyes twinkled despite his sick countenance. You know what says thank you like nothing else? he'd said long ago. She was reminded of that moment as his lip curled, and he gave her a look that said plainly, I'm taking off your clothes right now in my head, and I like it. His gaze traveled south. His assessment took him approximately one fifth of a second. “You're a little bigger,” he decided.

She gaped. “Really?”

He shrugged. “Not very. Just a bit more full. I wouldn't have said anything, yet.”

“How the hell did Alex notice that?”

“He's Alex,” said Derek. “He's a guy.”

“You're saying all guys would notice?”

“Well, I doubt they'd say anything,” he replied. “That's the 'he's Alex' part.”

She frowned. “What the hell? Why can't you use that power of observation for anything else?”

“How did we get from debating whether you're pregnant to demeaning the side effects of testosterone?” he said.

“You started it!”

“I did not,” he said. “You asked me if you were busty. There's no good answer to that, anyway.”

His eyes twinkled. “It's a trap.”

She snorted. “A trap.”

“I know how this works,” he said with confident smirk, as if women had a secret code or something, and he'd cracked it. “Either I notice you're busty, and I'm a lech, or I don't notice, and I wasn't paying enough attention to you.”

“But you are a lech.”

“Yes,” he said with a conspiratorial wink, and then he dropped his voice low, “But I prefer to keep my cover when I can.”

She laughed as she flopped back against his body. He grunted as she settled. Warmth enveloped her, and she sighed. She pressed her cheek against the soft cotton of his shirt. She stroked him with her palm. “Well, you're screwed,” she said. “Your cover was blown a long time ago. You fail at incognito lechery.” She kissed his stubbly throat, and she relished the rumble as he chuckled.

“You only think so,” he said.

“What's that supposed to mean?”

Her insides tightened as he dropped his mouth next to her ear, and practically purred, “I'm a rock star at incognito lechery.” He kissed her earlobe.

“How so?”

“Do you have any idea, how often you turn me on?”

She shivered at his raw, desirous tone. “Um,” she managed. He tipped her back against the cushions and pressed against her, and suddenly he didn't seem so weak or sick. His lips met hers. “But I thought you were sick and faint-y,” she murmured.

He nuzzled her. “I'm distracting myself,” he replied. “Slowly.”

He tasted like Crest and Derek and all male and all hers. She hadn't had him in a week. Not since they'd brought Samantha home. “Mmm,” she said. She hadn't been able to stomach the idea of intimacy while she'd been skulking around behind his back, counting his pills, but now he was better, physically, and there were no more secrets, and she might be pregnant—

“And you might be pregnant,” he echoed as if he'd read her mind.

“Mmm-hmm,” she moaned. The hairs on her head shifted as he pulled her ponytail loose and ran his shaky fingers through her hair.

“And I love you,” he said. He licked her lip and plunged. She moaned as she lost sense of everything but him. Him in her space. Him breathing. Him. She pulled a tent of his shirt into her needing, searching fingers, and clutched.

“This isn't incognito at all,” she said.

He laughed. “I'm not trying to be. It's intense, you know.”

“What?”

“This thing I have for you.”

“Not ferryboats?” she said.

“No,” he said. He kissed her again. “You.” She tilted her head to the side as he wandered south. Her gaze moved past his shoulder. For a moment, her insides tightened, and she saw nothing but blur and wanted nothing but sex. But when she blinked, somewhere in the torrent, she found enough presence of mind to glance at the coffee table. Her eyes fell on the applicator. He growled in her ear, soft and low. “Plus,” he continued, “I—”

“Plus,” she blurted.

“What?” he said.

“It's a plus,” she exclaimed. She glanced at her watch, just to make sure. The sofa disappeared from underneath her body. Floating. She was... She smiled as she pointed. “The thingy. It's a plus, Derek. Look.”

He broke away from her, panting, and stared at it. “What does plus mean?” he said.

“Um.” She shook her head. “Positive. Plus means positive. I'm pregnant.”

He stilled. “Really?”

She nodded. “Really,” she said. Her eyes watered, and she brushed tears away with her palms.

He kept looking at the applicator as though he didn't quite grasp what was going on. He swallowed, and then he pulled his gaze away from the coffee table and looked back at her. “We made a baby?” he said, wide-eyed.

She nodded. “Yeah, kinda.”

He didn't speak. Not a word. He blinked, like he didn't know up from down or left from right.

“Are you okay?” she whispered.

He flinched as though her voice had pulled him miles. His gaze fell to her lap. She stilled, watching him. He splayed his palm, and he pressed it against her body over her belly. Warmth spread through her shirt where he touched her. He blinked once. Twice. A pair of tears spilled over his eyelashes, and his body hitched. “I thought it would take months,” he said, his voice thick with emotion.

“I know. You said.”

He shook his head. He sniffled. “I thought...”

She kissed him. “I guess it's good you're not a rock star at obstetrics, too.”

“Yeah, I...” He shook his head. He blinked. Another pair of tears. Then he laughed. The way his eyes sparkled made the room seem dim. And then he pulled her into his arms and squeezed so hard she thought she might never breathe again. “Happily stupid about obstetrics,” he said against her ear as he hugged her. He grunted. “Um.” The sounds of his hitched breathing hit her ears, and her throat closed up.

She stayed in his warm arms and clutched him. She'd panicked. She'd panicked for the large majority of Thursday, and for a few hours that morning before she'd loaded up on water and lemonade and come home, because Derek had been so sick the last time she'd seen him, he'd just lain on the bathroom floor, because Derek had been sick and a drug addict and a liar, and she'd been feeling like crap from the constant nausea, except she didn't feel sick now, and Derek was better. Derek was so much better. And he was crying. Not like holy waterworks, Batman, but... tears, and not over something superfluous because withdrawal and anxiety and stress had wrecked his brain chemistry. He was crying because he'd made a baby. With her. She'd never seen him react that way about anything happy, not even when she'd said she'd marry him, and, frankly, it struck all her worries dumb and silent. Derek was so much better, and she loved him, and he loved her, and anybody who could react to being a parent like this surely deserved to be one no matter what. They deserved this. Together. He'd been shot, and he'd nearly died, and he was having a rough time, and she'd lost a baby, and she'd nearly lost him, and she was having a rough time, but they deserved this, and they could freaking do it, hateful universe be damned. She blinked, and her view of the world pressed with her eyelashes into a blur, and then she was crying, too.

She lay her ear against his chest. His heart pounded against her ear, clamorous and alive. “I'm really, really happy, Derek,” she said, her voice breaking. She was breaking into a billion euphoric pieces. Or broken. She couldn't tell.

He kissed her, and he kissed her again. She ended up on her back, her legs wrapped around his slim hips. She sank into the sofa as he crashed against her and kissed her again. “I love you,” she said.

“I love you too,” he said, his voice breathy.

He'd paled further instead of blushed with passion, and he shook as he touched her cheek to cheek. His almost-beard scratched her, but she didn't care because it made her alive with him. He kissed her clavicle, and he traced a line south to her belly, and lower. He kissed her womb through her pants. When he rose to kiss her lips, they touched. He made a soft sound. Delightful. And then another sound. Collapsing.

He blanched. His weight pressed into her as his eyes went glassy. “Oh,” he said, his voice low and deep and exhausted. He had the presence of mind to roll off of her into the crevice between her body and the back of the couch. His hands and arms shook.

She panted, struggling for her senses. She stroked him. “I'd say you're still pretty shaky, and still pretty faint-y, even with the slow distracting,” she said as she wiped at her swollen lips. He hadn't quite fainted this time. She helped him sit, but he didn't stop trembling.

“Do you want to try and eat something, now?” she said. “You don't seem barf-y on top of everything else.”

He didn't answer. He stared, bewildered.

“I'll make some soup again,” she said. She kept her voice soft. She squeezed his shoulder. He didn't reply or stand or try to chase her, which worried her, but she left him, and she poured a fresh can of chicken noodle soup into a bowl. She stuck it in the microwave and left it heating while she went back to check on him. He held his head in his hands. He breathed short and fast, like he was trying not to be sick. She touched his shoulder. Everything was still shaking as though electric current ran through him. “Derek,” she said.

“I'm fine,” he said faintly.

She sat down beside him and rubbed his back. “This was a lot,” she assured him before he could beat himself up about his collapse.

“That was embarrasing,” he said. He looked at her. A faint smile curled his lips, and she relaxed. She could deal with happy, self-deprecating Derek. He shook his head. “I fainted during sex.”

“It wasn't sex.”

“It would have been sex if I'd eaten something, first,” he said. “I don't care how shitty I feel. I'd flog myself through it if I could stay conscious.”
She snickered. “Flog yourself, huh,” she said. She leaned into him and kissed him. “That's very romantic.”

“You know what I meant,” he said.

She stared at him. His blue eyes twinkled, something she hadn't seen in a long, long time. No drugs. No brooding. Just... happy. Happy Derek. Her throat clogged with an unexpected swell of... everything. He still needed lots of help and support and love to fix everything that had gone wrong. But, when he smiled at her like that, the prospect of all the work that would be involved didn't seem so hopeless. She returned his smile as she wiped her eyes. “I won't tell anybody if you don't.”

He winked. “I'm not sure what you're talking about. My wife is pregnant. I gave her a hug.”

The microwave dinged, but it was a distant thing, and she couldn't bring herself to move. “That's how I remember it, too,” she said.

He pulled her into his arms. He was shaky, and his grip was weak, but when he hugged her and squeezed, she wrapped her arms around his body and squeezed right back. There was no end or beginning. They simply were, and it didn't matter that he did slightly less, because there was no less or more or anything at all.

“For posterity,” he said as he held her.

“I guess that's literal, now.”

“What should we tell people?” he said.

She blinked as his words pulled the real world back into the room with them. She tightened her grip and sighed.

“What?” he said, his voice low.

“Maybe, we shouldn't say anything until I make it past the first trimester,” Meredith said. “I mean I've shown a recent aptitude for failing at this whole human incubator thing.”

He cupped her face, and he kissed her. “No.”

“No?”

“You're pregnant, Meredith.”

“Well, I—”

He swallowed. “You're pregnant,” he said, as though he needed it ranked with the sky being blue, grass being green, and gravity pulling him down into his seat. Needed. She met his eyes. They stared at each other for a long, passing moment. She stroked his arm, his shoulder. His muscles quivered under his skin. She leaned into him, and she kissed him. His eyes closed. She rested body to body with him, and she realized she needed it, too. There was too much other crap going on to add this worry to the laundry list. She wrapped her hands over her womb, pulling his hands with hers. She squeezed his fingers.

“I guess I am,” she agreed. A smile spread across her face.

“Hmm,” he said. “You are.”

“I think everybody who matters pretty much already knows except Mark and your family, though,” she said. “I'm not sure how much there is to tell everybody else.”

He snorted. “We have got to stop this trend of me being the last to know about my rock star sperm selling out another concert.”

She kissed him. “Well, they don't know,” she said. “They only saw me barf. They didn't see the plus sign. And that was a crap metaphor, Derek.”

“Was not.”

“Was, too.”

“Was not!” he insisted. He leaned into her. “I am a rock star at getting you pregnant.”

She laughed at his ego peeking through the clouds. She'd grown to miss it. So much. “So, you're making this into an ego stroke, huh,” she said. She pulled her fingers through his hair and ran her big toe up the soft slope of his shin.

“Well, that's why you love me, isn't it?” he said. “My extreme confidence?”

Yes, so much. “You wish,” she said. “It could be me, you know. Maybe, I'm more fertile than the garden of freaking Eden. Don't me and my hoo-hoo get any credit?”

He snickered. “Hoo-hoo? I don't remember that one from basic anatomy.”

She swatted at him, but he captured her, and tipped her onto her back. He leaned over her. Their lips met once. Twice. He rolled to the side, and they lay side by side, pressed together, unmoving. “Hmm,” he said against her skin. His hands shook, but his warmth filled her. “Maybe, we just fit.”

She grinned. “I really like that idea.”

He rested his forehead against hers. Their noses mashed. He sighed, and the bluster of his breath hit her skin. She stared at his stark blue eyes.

“I love you,” he said.

“I love you, too,” she affirmed. They kissed. Her world stopped and spun on that moment for blissful hours.

---

Day Five

She arrived home again at 7:30 AM after her twelve hour shift, just as shafts of sunlight struck the pavement through the trees in front of her house. She yawned as she plodded through the warm patches of sunlight and approached the door. Her heels clicked on the walk. Mark didn't greet her like he had last time, though she didn't know why she'd expected it, since she'd left Derek alone. Her stomach churned with nerves. She hadn't been able to focus much on her shift. She gripped the doorknob and turned.

“You're sure you'll be all right?” she said as she put her hand on the doorknob.

“I'm tired,” he said. “I'll probably just sleep.”

She couldn't bring herself to turn the knob. Instead, she turned to face him, and pressed her back against the door as she clutched her purse. He stood behind her in the dim lamplight, still in his shorts and Bowdoin shirt. He ran a hand through his unkempt, frizzy hair and stared at her, his eyes sapped of expression. He still looked pale and tremble-y and sick, though better, much better. He'd eaten earlier. Finally. Nothing big – some warm soup and then later some peach yogurt mixed with cereal.

“You're sure?” she said.

He nodded. “I'm sure. I'll be fine for twelve hours.”

She swallowed. “And you'll call if you need anything?”

“I'll call.”

“You promise?”

He nodded again. “I promise, Meredith,” he said.

They'd lain together for a long time that day, just cuddling, marveling over the fact that they would be parents, and it'd been nice to forget everything for a little while, except, now, she had to go to work, and the real world crashed back into her head. She bit her lip. “Please, help me,” he'd said. “Please. P-please.” She couldn't help but wonder if he'd bankrupted himself on asking for help, if he wouldn't ask again, even if he did want somebody to stay home with him. She'd let the day rot away, and neither of them had talked about his drug problem, or how he intended to continue from here.

“I'm not sure I believe you,” she said.

A dark sliver of hurt flashed in his gaze, but he didn't retort. He swallowed, and then he looked at his feet. “You can call Mark, if you want,” he said, his voice low. If you don't trust me, he didn't say.

I don't anymore, she didn't need to reply. She squeezed her purse straps. “I already called him an hour ago. He got pulled into an emergency surgery, and he can't come.” Either she stayed home, or he would have no one.

“Oh,” he said.

She sighed, and she closed the space between them. She wrapped her arms around him. She kissed him, and then he pressed his nose into her hair, and he inhaled her scent. “Would you tell me honestly if you wanted somebody to stay with you?” she said. “Would you really?”

He remained in her arms, breathing and silent for a long time. She felt his fingers clench her shirt in the small of her back. “I'm not that sick anymore,” he said.

“That's not what I asked, Derek.”

“I won't take any Percocet.”

“That's not what I asked, either,” she said.

“I'd tell you,” he insisted as his face reddened.

The crickets chirped outside, and a car drove past the house, its low-pitched rumble of exhaust shaking the windows. His body tensed. As the noise receded, he relaxed. She pulled back and stared at him, at the troubled wetness in his gaze, where before there hadn't been anything but exhaustion. He'd tried to hide it, but that car had frightened him, or at least... made him anxious. She wondered how much courage being high had given him, and how bad he would be at functioning beyond the threshold of their door, now that he wasn't taking anything. There were so many unknowns. When he'd been sicker, it'd been easier to focus on just getting through that part.

“I should... stay home,” she said. “You need somebody here, Derek. At least until we figure out what we’re doing.”

“No,” he said. “Twelve hours. I’ll be fine.”

“I'm going to get more behind anyway, Derek. I'm pregnant. Popping out a baby means time off.”

“That's different,” he said.

“How is it different?”

“Because that was your choice,” he said. “Our choice.” He touched her stomach. “Meredith, I'm not fine, and I'm not trying to tell you that I'm fine. But I'll be okay for twelve hours. Really. And I don't want you to miss work just to watch me sleep.”

She bit her lip. “We need to talk about this. What you're going to do. We've ignored it.”

“I know,” he said.

She raised her eyebrows. “When I get home?”

“When you get home,” he agreed with a nod.

“Please, don't make me regret this, Derek.”

He pulled her into his arms and sighed. “I could never forgive myself if I did,” he said against her ear as he stroked her back. “I don’t want this anymore,” he’d said. The conviction in his tone sold her, and she decided that if she couldn't leave him alone for a mere twelve hours, it would be better to know, now. Better, so she could figure out how best to convince him he needed to enter rehab as fast as possible, whether he wanted to go or not. She squeezed his shoulder once to remind herself of him, solid and alive. She inhaled the soft scent of his body. Musky. No aftershave. He hadn't shaved in a week.

“I love you,” she said, and then she turned out of his arms to leave. In twelve hours, she would know if this had been a mistake.

Sighing, she plodded over the threshold and stopped at the quiet stillness that greeted her. “Derek?” she called, keeping her voice low in case he was sleeping. He didn't answer. She went into the kitchen to let the dog out, but Samantha wasn't in her crate. Meredith refused to be worried. Yet.

She walked upstairs. Relief flooded her within moments. Their bedroom door was open. She saw the snoring dog sprawled on top of the covers. Derek had his fingers wrapped around her collar and his face pressed into the dog's black neck. He didn't stir as she walked into the room. He didn't stir as she changed into an old t-shirt for bed. He didn't stir as she slid under the covers and settled next to the dog. Two adults and a big dog in a queen-sized bed was a tight fit, but she didn't want to disturb him if he’d managed sleep. Insomnia was something she'd expected him to grapple with, particularly given his nightmares. She stroked the dog's stomach, pushed a floppy paw out of the way, and then pressed her nose into her pillow. She relaxed to the raspy sounds of Derek's breathing, and she slept.

She woke up, sort of, hours later, when the dog decided to hop down. She had the presence of mind to mumble something like, “Do you need to go out?” as though it were spoken through a mouthful of cotton, but the dog didn't stick around or whine. Samantha shook her big black body. Her dog tags jinged. And then she plodded out of the room. Meredith rolled, spreading her legs and arms at this new, luxurious freedom, and she slipped back into dreaming without any effort at all.

By about 1:00 PM, she was ready to be alive again. She smacked her lips, rubbed her eyes, and sat up, squinting against the dull sunshine. The covers rustled. She glanced to her right. Derek. Still in the bed. He'd burrowed under his pillow, like he tended to do when she was making too much noise, like snoring. She frowned. Maybe, he hadn't gone to bed right away the night before, after all. She didn't want to wake him, so she padded quietly out of the room and went downstairs for lunch and to let the dog out to run and do her business.

By 3:00 PM, Meredith was worried. She went back upstairs. “Derek?” she said, careful to keep her voice soft and low as she tiptoed into their room. He moved, but only to curl more tightly under the blankets. The mop of his hair shifted, but she couldn't see his face. She sat on the bed beside his body. The mattress sank. His hip pressed into hers as she leaned over him. “Derek, are you sick?”

She wanted to check his temperature, and she wanted to rub his back, but she restrained herself. He tended to wake up terrified if he was being touched. She didn't want to scare him. Not ever, but certainly not now.

“Derek,” she said. “Wake up.”

He shifted. Familiar, listless blue eyes stared at her for one blink, two. He swallowed, said nothing, and turned away from her. A creeping sense of wrongness took hold of her and squeezed. She shouldn't have left him alone.

“Hey,” she whispered. “What's wrong?” Had he been awake this entire time? She rubbed his back through the blanket, only to bite her lip as nerves coiled in her stomach. She pulled back the covers, and she felt his skin through his shirt to confirm what she'd felt through the comforter. He trembled. She touched the back of her hand to his forehead. He didn't feel hot, not even a little. “Derek?”

“I don't feel very well,” he said, his voice dark and low.

She frowned. “What's wrong?”

“I don't know what's wrong, or I would fix it,” he snapped. He pressed his face against the sheet and tried to burrow again, but not before she caught the red-tinged glisten of his eyes as his mood splintered. The unhindered shiver of his muscles and the tightness of his tendons spoke of fear. She pulled his wrist into her hand and felt along the center for his pulse. Racing. A trickle of sweat dotted his brow and his neck, not buckets like before with his withdrawal. He made a deep noise as he swallowed.

This looked sort of like the precursor to a panic attack, or maybe an ongoing one. Panic and anxiety tended to cause a positive feedback loop by begetting more panic and anxiety. The smallest snowflake could roll into an avalanche if left unchecked. She frowned. When had this started? Had he been afraid to get out of bed all day? How long had he been awake and suffering instead of sleeping?
“It's okay,” she whispered as she stroked him. “Can you sit up?” When he didn't budge, she grabbed him by his shirt. He still wore the Bowdoin shirt. He hadn't changed. The fabric stretched as she pulled on the hem. “Come on. Sit up.”

One moment, he'd been lying on the bed in a defensive, semi-fetal curl, buried under blankets. The next, she inhaled at the force of his embrace as he wrapped his arms around her body and pushed his face against the warmth of her neck. The blankets rustled as they fell away from his shaky torso. His frozen hands chilled her through the back of her shirt. He panted. Chuffs of air fell against her skin, and for minutes, he didn't speak at all. She wasn't sure what to do. He'd clutched her as though she were some sort of teddy bear.

“It's okay,” she said.

He moaned, long and low and distressed. “I don't feel very well,” he repeated.

“I know,” she said. She stroked his back. “It's okay. You're okay. You're okay, Derek. You need to take deep breaths.” She forced herself to take her own advice. Feeding his own anxiety with hers wouldn't do anything but exacerbate everything.

“I'm sorry,” he said against her skin.

“Why?”

“I didn't call, and I promised I would.”

She swallowed. “Have you been feeling like this all night?”

“No.”

“Well, when did this start?”

“I don't know,” he said. “I don't... I...”

“Were you awake when I got home?”

“Y-yes.”

“Why didn't you say anything, then?”

“I don't know...” he said. “I didn't want to move.”

“Why?”

“I don't...” He shuddered. “Please, I don't know. I don't... I'm sorry I didn't call.”

She pulled her hands through his hair and stroked his back in slow, soothing motions. His whole body trembled. She clenched her fingers. He was so terrified he wouldn't get out of bed. He hadn't been able to speak to her when she'd been lying three feet away for hours. How could he possibly be worried she'd assume he'd been attempting subterfuge about his freaking drug problem by not having the presence of mind to pick up a phone in the middle of a panic attack?

“I'm sorry,” he told her neck miserably, his voice a cracked whisper, as if he couldn't not worry. About anything. No matter how unreasonable.

“It's okay,” she assured him.
His grip tightened. He breathed against her shoulder. In and out. In and out. He grunted. “I want to go back,” he said, as though it were the most shameful admission in the world. He shifted in her embrace. He wouldn't look at her.

“Back where?” she said. She stroked his back as she swallowed back lump after lump of dread.
“You still want the Percocet?”

“Yes,” he answered baldly. He cleared his throat. “But I won't take it. I don't have any; I swear.”

“Can you tell me why you want it?”

“I just want to make it stop,” he said.

“You say that all the time, but I don't know what that means.” She brushed the back of his neck with her palm, and then she chased down his spine along the soft cotton of his shirt. She pressed her nose against his temple and kissed him. “I thought I did, but...”

“I like it there better than here.”

“Like where?”

“When I'm high, it's just...” He shifted. “I can be anywhere I want, and it doesn't have to be here.”

Here. He said the word as though he meant hell, deep and dark and grating. She glanced beyond his shoulder at the dim room. Dust motes carved a lazy diagonal path from the window to the floor, caught in a slanted prison of sunshine. The room smelled faintly of lemon. The stains on the mattress were covered by fresh, soft sheets and blankets, but the stains on the carpet remained, and would remain, likely until she purchased a new area rug. She heard the distant laughter of one of the neighbor's kids, playing. Birds whistled through the windowpanes.

I'm terrified, he'd said. Every moment of every day. You're the only reason I get out of bed in the morning.

“Where do you go?” she said.

Dunno. Someplace with you, he'd answered vaguely the last time she'd asked.

He sniffed. “The lake sometimes,” he said. “I like to sit on the dock.”

I went to the lake and lost track of the fucking time, he'd said to explain why he hadn't called for help when he'd gotten stuck downstairs in the early morning. That's all. Maybe, I'm stubborn, but I'm not a masochist.

The lake?

He'd blinked, confused. The lake?

You said you went to the lake.

Nothing, he'd said. A daydream.

Tension locked her frame as weeks of history started making painful sense. Things he'd said. Or done. Or hinted. “Why do you like to sit there?” she said.

His fingers clenched. “Because you're there, and he's not.”
A cold feeling crept down her spine. She swallowed. “Gary Clark?”

“I hate him,” he said, his voice low. “I hate him, Meredith.” He shivered. His torso shook, not with tremors, but with stiff twitches that jerked his whole frame. She realized he was crying. Such a sharp contrast to the happy crying she’d experienced in his arms barely more than twenty-four hours ago. “I just want him to go away. I want to make it stop. He won't stop.”

“What do you mean, I'm there, and he's not? When is he there?”

“He's everywhere,” he said. “All the time.”

She doesn't know, Derek had snapped at no one. Nobody knows.

She blinked, and she froze, a solid block clutched by his nervous energy. For a moment, her brain refused to assemble the pieces for her. Sort of like... surgery. When you saw a person who'd been maimed, sometimes, you didn't see the person. Just the gushing wounds. The broken bones. Torn muscles and ligaments. Splattered organs. If you saw only the pieces, and not a man who had three children and a wife who loved him, it was easier. Easier to cope.

For a horrifying moment, she didn't want to know. She didn't want to see the man she loved more than her own life struggling with a mental illness wrought by bloody violence. She saw shivering. She saw sweat. She saw fear and dissociation. She heard his words, bleak and nonsensical against the backdrop of piece after piece after piece in the big picture, not assembling.

She squeezed her eyes shut. She'd known. She'd known his panic attacks had been escalating, ever since that day when he'd somehow ended up on the catwalk, reliving his near murder, and before then, he hadn't had any. He'd just been painfully easy to startle and scare. But, why? Why had he been getting worse?

The big picture flipped her the bird and formed solidly before her. Her eyes watered when she realized how sick he was.

“You mean you see him like...” She swallowed. Her teeth chattered with nerves, but she clenched her jaws shut and forced her voice to stay even. “When you're awake?”

“I know he's not real,” Derek said. “I'm not crazy.”

She closed her eyes. “That's not what I asked,” she said.

I see things sometimes, too, he'd said, but he hadn't elaborated at the time. Nearly two months ago. Another clue she'd missed in the fray. Or, well, hadn't missed. She'd let it go prematurely.

“Is he here, now?” she said.

Derek didn't answer.

“Like... memories?” she prodded.

He sniffed. “Sometimes.”

“Well, how else?”

Again, no answer.

“Like a hallucination or something?”
He stilled in her arms. His elbows pulled inward, almost as though he were trying to protect himself from injury, and every trembling muscle stiffened like iron rods in her grasp. His breaths choked to a stop.

“Stop,” he said. His voice sounded more like a wheeze than anything else. “Please, stop.”

Hallucinations were appetizers on the post-traumatic stress buffet. The fact that Derek experienced them was horrifying, but not so much because he hallucinated, but because he hallucinated. Her Derek. And she didn't want to look at the big picture anymore. She wanted to throw it away.

“Oh, okay,” she said around the lump in her throat, attempting to curb the flare in his panic attack before it went nuclear. “You're okay.” She rubbed his back. “Breathe.” He gradually loosened up.

He rested in her arms, quiet. Exhausted. Shivery with stress.

The big picture hovered in her mind's eye as though it had been burned there.

Why? Why had he turned to drug abuse? She'd asked herself that question so many times in the last few days, and now it seemed stupid that she hadn't grasped the reason before. Maybe, he hadn't used a ton of words, but he'd already explained it once or twice. She hadn't understood, but he'd told her, all the way back when Mark had scared Derek inadvertently, and Derek had fled into the dark, cave-like downstairs bathroom to hide.

I thought I was going to die, he'd said as he'd wept, huddled in the corner by the toilet.

I know, she'd said, though she hadn't known a thing back then. She'd just wanted to help.

I don't want to die.

I know, she'd repeated.

Facts slid into sharp relief as she blinked back tears. Derek didn't want to die. A trauma-born echo of his would-be murderer haunted him, reminded Derek daily by his mere presence that Derek had nearly died and could again. Easily. Derek had been using the Percocet to self-medicate away reminders of his own death. He'd been using the Percocet to medicate the ghost of Gary Clark away. She was certain. And, now, he didn't have the Percocet anymore. All he had left was himself as a barrier.

And he was sick. More sick than she'd thought. Compromised.

She wiped her eyes. She couldn't afford to fall apart right now, no matter how much she wanted to take the big picture and stuff it in a raucous, crunchy garbage disposal to be chewed and torn to bits. He was sick. He needed an advocate with a clear head because he couldn't be that advocate himself, and if she freaked out, neither one of them would have that advocate. She took a deep breath and steeled herself.

“Derek, I know I said I wouldn't push, that I'd let you decide, and I'm sorry. I am,” she said. “But you need to see Dr. Wyatt. Or someone. Anyone. I don't care who. Just tell me where, and I'll take you. Right now. I'm putting my foot down.”

He swallowed. “I saw Dr. Wyatt.”

She gaped. “When?”

“The day you found me with the pill bottles.”
“Why didn’t you say—” She shook her head. Way to divert the issue. “Never mind. Do you like her? Did she help?”

“I don’t know.”

“Well, are you going again?” Meredith said.

“I was supposed to go yesterday at two.”

“But you didn’t.”

“I forgot,” Derek said. “I was so happy, I...” His voice choked into silence. He pulled away from her. He wiped his face. His eyes were red and puffy. The skin of his cheeks streaked red with irritation from tears. He blinked. “Meredith, how am I supposed to be a dad like this?”

“The same way I can be a mom after everything that's happened to me,” she replied. “You'll get through this.” There was no other option. She wouldn't allow it. “I'll help. And I really think Dr. Wyatt will help, too. Way more than I can. It'll just take some time.”

He looked hopeless. “I don't know how.”

“Well,” she said. “You said you forgot because you were happy, right? Yesterday?”

“You're pregnant,” he said. “I forgot everything.”

“So, there you go,” she said. “It's possible for you to feel better. We just have to figure out how you can tap into that at will instead of waiting for me to get pregnant, because I can only do that so often, even if I am more fertile than the garden of Eden, and your sperm is a bunch of super-powered, squiggly bullies.”

“Bullies?” He snickered despite his haggard expression. “Meredith,” he said, his voice soft, chiding, but... less stressed.

She smiled. “Do you want me to make you another appointment with Dr. Wyatt?” she said. “I bet she could fit you in today.”

He grunted as he cleared his throat of his remaining grief. “It's... Saturday.”

“I have her home phone number for emergencies,” Meredith said. “I think this might count as an emergency. Maybe, she'll come in for you.”

“I'll be okay until Monday.”

She squeezed his shoulders. “Derek, you just told me you want Percocet, and you wouldn't get out of bed this morning. I'll call, now. Putting my foot down. Remember?”

“No,” he said. He wiped his eyes. “I'll call.”

“To make the appointment?” she said. “Are you sure?”

He touched her womb with a splayed, cold palm. “I'm sure.”

“Will you tell her about Gary Clark? About how you see him? Or hear him? Or... whatever?”

He looked away. “I didn't even want to tell you.”
“But you did.”

“I did,” he said.

Meredith pulled him back into her arms. Her eyes watered. “I'm glad you did. I really am. But I think Dr. Wyatt could help you more with it, Derek. I'm sure she's seen this sort of thing before.”

She hoped. She dearly hoped Dr. Wyatt could give him some tools. Something. Anything. For now, Meredith refused to allow herself anything but hope and determination, because Derek was talking. With short sentences, yes, but he was talking. He was sick, but he was talking, and if he kept talking like this, he wouldn't stay this sick forever. He couldn't. It wouldn't be right or fair if Gary Clark won after all this freaking heartache.

Silence stretched.

“I'll think about telling her,” Derek said. He pulled away and shifted his attention to his nightstand. He moved aside a half-empty glass of water. His watch. The lamp. A picture of him and her that made her smile because she remembered the moment he'd held out the camera in front of them and told her to say cheese. His fingers wandered across each item. She bit her lip as she watched his hand shake. He stopped and looked at her, eyebrows raised, after he finished searching. “Where's my phone?”

“I don't know,” she said. She scrabbled across the bed and grabbed hers from her nightstand. “You can use mine, though.”

He nodded as she handed the small flip phone to him. He stared at it as though he couldn't quite commit, but he didn't set the phone down, didn't move. She swallowed, and she kept her mouth shut, fought to keep her mouth shut. She didn't want to push him when he didn't need it. Not after the morning he'd had. He was still deciding, which meant he hadn't decided on no, yet, and—

“When does your shift start?” he said at last.

“I'm due in at 9:00 PM,” she said. “I have another graveyard shift.”

He looked at his lap. “She won't see me at 9:00 at night...”

“Ask her and see, Derek. If you need to wait until Monday to see her, we'll deal, but let's not make assumptions before you've spoken to her. Her number is in my contacts.”

He nodded. “O-okay,” he said softly. His nervous stutter made her heart clench. He popped open the clam shell of her phone. She listened to the beeps as he navigated her contact list. When he placed the speaker against his ear with a shaky hand, she settled behind him and wrapped her arms around his stomach. She kissed the back of his neck, and she rubbed her hands along the soft cotton of his shirt to reassure him.

“H...” he began. His voice died, and he regathered himself. “Hello, Dr. Wyatt.”

Meredith closed her eyes as she listened to Derek Shepherd ask for help for the second time.
Chapter 19

The shower rained around him, washing the vomit and bile away. Derek looked at the white and red tiled blur beyond his eyelashes, but didn't see. Nausea swirled. His mouth hung open, and his lips dripped the fluid remains of his stomach as he stood there. Helpless. Mark's bare, shaking arm wrapped under Derek's shoulders and held him up under the spray, but that was Derek's only barrier between upright and collapsed.

“See,” said Mark, his voice low-pitched and playful despite everything, “I imagine this is why people think we're gay.” The washcloth rasped against Derek's skin. Soap and suds spilled over him.

Derek shifted with a low groan. He hurt. Everything. His head throbbed. His joints creaked. His bones and muscles thrummed with discomfort. The battered fault line in his chest slipped with every breath, and he felt a bit like he'd swallowed acid.

Warm water gushed against his skin, and Mark stood against Derek's back to hold him upright, a massive well of body heat, but Derek was cold. Empty. He shivered. A deep-seated, crushing need squeezed him with every heartbeat. He needed to be full, and he would never be full again. His foot shifted and slipped on the porcelain floor of the tub. He didn't have the wherewithal to fight for balance, and so the slide continued until Mark squeezed, and his grip tightened around Derek's chest. Pain crushed him, and his armpits throbbed as he was dragged to his feet.

Again.

“Almost done,” Mark said.

Derek blinked. Water dripped into his eyes. His neck wouldn't support his head, and his gaze lurched to the side. He saw the slope of Mark's pale arm, a mist of water, and then nothing. “Hurts,” he croaked.

“I know,” Mark said. “Almost done.”

Derek shook his head. He needed. He needed. He wasn't almost done. He would never be done. He would never be full again. This hell would never end. He would be stuck here for... forever. His eyes pricked with tears. “It hurts,” he repeated, caught in a sob as the shower spun around him. He couldn't stand anymore. He couldn't—

Mark held him up. “I know,” said Mark. The washcloth rasped.

Derek's stomach churned. He tried to move. He tried. He twisted, feeble. The tub seesawed. Naked skin slipped on naked skin. Mark grunted with pain. Derek ended up bent over Mark's forearm at the waist, and the washcloth merely shifted to Derek's back, rasping. Derek panted. Each breath brought a line of fire to the slipping fault line in his chest, and his throat hurt. It hurt. His stomach clenched, and he vomited onto the floor of the tub by Mark's bare foot. Burning bile dripped from Derek's teeth as he sputtered and choked. He had nothing left. He was empty, and he hadn't slept. Empty, empty, empty. And tired. And glacier cold despite the steam and swelter and Mark.

“Stand up straight,” Mark said, his voice strained as he kept Derek from crashing to the floor of the tub. Barely. Derek shook. The washcloth made a wet splat as Mark slapped it onto the rack and grabbed Derek with both arms. The world shifted like a pinwheel. Colors. Pain. “Stand up,” Mark commanded again, and whether Derek could or would obey, it didn't matter. Pain followed, and Mark dragged Derek up. Bigger. Mark had always been bigger. And stronger.

“Mark,” Derek wheezed more than said.

“I know this sucks, man,” Mark said. “But you have to help me out a bit.”

Derek needed, and it hurt. “Can’t.”

Mark's grip shifted, and he sighed, but he said nothing.

Derek shook. “I'll taper,” he said, his voice the barest wisp of sound between tortured panting. “Please.” He was empty. And broken. And he would never be full again. And he needed. Pounding shame wrapped around him like a frigid cloak as he begged. “Please.” He swallowed. “You could get me... refill.” He tripped over the words. Unforgiving ache loitered in his throat.

Mark washed the soap away, and the new vomit, and everything, without comment or complaint. He twisted the shower knobs and the thunderous rain ceased. Silence constricted around Derek. Empty. All empty. And cold. Freezing.

“Please,” said Derek, breathless as he dripped.

Mark shook his head, all vestiges of good humor sapped from his expression. “Even if I did get you a refill, and I let you take a pill,” Mark said as he dragged Derek out of the tub, “At this point, you'd just puke it up anyway. I'm not interested in more cuddle sessions in the shower, and I'm really not interested in cleaning up the rest of the fucking rug.”

Mark pounced on Derek with the towel as though he expected a fight. Derek didn't struggle as Mark wrapped him up. Derek had nothing. And he needed. The room lurched as Mark hauled Derek onto the toilet seat. The towel tightened and wicked the dripping water away. Derek shivered. He stared over his knees at the floor mat. He hurt, and he needed, and there was nothing else.

“Please,” Derek said, beyond rational thought, beyond anything. The room contracted and constricted. The lights dimmed. He couldn't breathe. He was empty, and cold, and he'd never be full again. “Please, I can't. I need it.”

The towel tightened around his body, and Mark squeezed Derek's shoulders like a vise, unyielding. “You can,” Mark snapped. “Stop saying you can't.”

“No,” Derek rasped. He struggled feebly with the wet towel. He couldn't breathe. "No, I can't." He fought the press of Mark's hands on his shoulders and tried to stand. Where would he go? He didn't know. He didn't know anything. The room spun. The towel caught his arms as he flailed for balance, and he stumbled. He fell in a gangly heap on the toilet seat, hobbled, but he couldn't stop struggling. Mark stared, open-mouthed, but the sight was a small needle in a haystack of sensory overload. Derek hurt. He hurt, and he needed. He needed, and he couldn't breathe, and the room was getting smaller and smaller. Shrinking. Crushing. “Please.” His vision blurred as a sheet of tears spilled over his eyes. He fought with the towel. Weak. “I need it.”

“You're weak,” Gary Clark growled. “Pathetic!”

Fire smashed Derek's face as Mark slapped him. The room whipped to the left with the blow. “Get a fucking grip, man. You don't need anything.”

Derek blinked, bell rung for a long moment.
Mark gripped Derek's shoulders, and he leaned in, inches from Derek, eye-to-eye. “You can do this,” Mark said, enunciating. Certain.

Derek swallowed as the room came back to him on an even keel. He was empty, and cold, and he would never be full. He hurt. Everywhere. But the slowly expanding balloon stuck in his chest had popped and dissipated. The pressure died. His feelings didn't grow. He just was. He wasn't becoming more.

“Do you hit all your patients?” Derek said, his voice cracking with strain. His throat bloomed with caustic fire, and he decided he wouldn't speak anymore. He grabbed the towel from Mark and started helping despite his exhaustion. Everything hurt. He was empty. He wanted to lie down and let the world go away.

Mark shook his head. “Just the idiot neurosurgeons,” he said, his voice soft. His eyes crinkled with a hint of returning humor.

Derek nodded. He closed his eyes and rested while Mark grabbed a towel and dried himself. Derek would say thank you when his throat didn't hurt so much.

Gary Clark laughed raucously in Derek's ears, and all he wanted to do was shut it out.

“Have you even listened to a fu— single word I've said?” Derek snapped, barely holding the top on the funnel of fire in his head. His head hurt, and he wanted to yell until he couldn't anymore, because Gary Clark was laughing, and he wouldn't stop, and Dr. Wyatt thought a pill was the answer.

Dr. Wyatt met Derek's angry gaze with calm rationality. “I've listened to every word, Dr. Shepherd.”

The fish tank burbled. Colorful fish floated lazily back in forth in the small tank. The room smelled like some kind of flower or potpourri. The colors in the room were muted. Taupe and soft oranges and cheerful things. Dr. Wyatt sat in her chair with her fucking pen and her notepad, and he wanted to yank the pillows from the sofa and throw them at her. Or the fish. Or both.

“Then why the hell do you want to put me on Paxil?” he said.

“Because I believe, for your situation, it's the right choice,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Meredith trusted this woman. He'd come here for help. He'd asked for help. He'd spent the last two hours telling her everything. Everything. From the nightmares, to the panic attacks, to the time he'd wandered into the gun shop, to the drugs, to everything except for his loitering murderer’s ghost. All the things that had taken him weeks to admit to Meredith, because he needed help, and he wanted to get better, and he was sick and tired of being sick and tired, and Dr. Wyatt's response was that she wanted to put him on a fucking pill for his trouble. All that, and her solution was a drug. One that would take Meredith away from him along with everything else, and he needed Meredith. He needed her.

“I just went through hell to get clean, and you want to put me on another drug,” he said.

“You'll never be free,” Gary Clark said between guffaws. He'd been laughing and commenting for hours. He'd walked in circles around Derek's bed, and Derek had tried to ignore him. Tried to burrow away. He had. Then Meredith had pulled him out of freefall, but Mr. Clark had still been there. “No one can help you,” his ghost continued. “She can't help you. The look on your face when you begged her was worth it, though.” His voice crept into falsetto. “Help me, Dr. Wyatt. Please.”

“Paxil is an SSRI,” Dr. Wyatt explained, her voice rich, cool, calm. Everything Derek didn't feel. “It's non-addictive.”

“I don't care,” Derek said. “It's still a drug, and I can't...” He closed his eyes, and he ran his fingers through his hair, and Gary Clark laughed. “Stop it!” he roared, and then he collapsed on the couch as his eyes pricked with tears. As fast as the molten fury had sloshed into him, it receded, leaving only desperation. The empty, cold feeling in his gut constricted. He needed this to stop. “I can't... Please.”

“Yes,” said Gary Clark. “Beg more. That will solve it.”

“Dr. Shepherd.” Dr. Wyatt shifted. She put her pen and her notepad down and she leaned forward. “Derek. You're right. It is a drug.”

“But—”

“Drug addiction is often co-morbid with mental illness,” Dr. Wyatt said. “SSRIs are often a first line of defense in treating addiction. Paxil, specifically, is used to treat panic disorders, anxiety, depression, and post traumatic stress, all of which you experience badly enough that they're affecting your ability to lead a normal life. Given those factors, I believe that Paxil is the appropriate choice for you.”

“It's another drug,” Derek said. He wrapped his arms around his stomach. He needed. He needed so badly. He couldn't take needing more. And he couldn't... He didn't want... “I can't. Please, I can't.”

“Can you give me a reason why?” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

“It's a drug. I don't want a pill telling me how to feel.” Taking Meredith away.

“Anti-depressants don't tell you how to feel, Derek,” Dr. Wyatt said, misinterpreting him, not that he blamed her this time. “Not if they're working correctly. They're not like benzodiazepines. All they do is tell you that you don't have to feel like you feel, now.”

“It's a drug,” Derek spat.

“Drug addiction is often co-morbid with mental illness,” Dr. Wyatt said. “SSRIs are often a first line of defense in treating addiction. Paxil, specifically, is used to treat panic disorders, anxiety, depression, and post traumatic stress, all of which you experience badly enough that they're affecting your ability to lead a normal life. Given those factors, I believe that Paxil is the appropriate choice for you.”

“It's another drug,” Derek said. He wrapped his arms around his stomach. He needed. He needed so badly. He couldn't take needing more. And he couldn't... He didn't want... “I can't. Please, I can't.”

“Can you give me a reason why?” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

“It's a drug. I don't want a pill telling me how to feel.” Taking Meredith away.

“A few antidepressants don't tell you how to feel, Derek,” Dr. Wyatt said, misinterpreting him, not that he blamed her this time. “Not if they're working correctly. They're not like benzodiazepines. All they do is tell you that you don't have to feel like you feel, now.”

“It's a drug,” Derek spat.

Dr. Wyatt nodded. “It is,” she said. “And I know that's invasive.”

“It's a mind-altering drug,” Derek said. “That's pretty damned invasive. And Paxil is infamous for the side-effects.”

“You're right,” she said. Placated. “It is. But it's also lauded for how powerful it is, and how fast it acts. You could be feeling better in a matter of weeks. Not months, if we try something else.”

“If I get the side-effects, I won't feel better,” he said.

“Can you tell me which side-effects concern you?”

“Which do you think?”

“I want you to tell me,” she said reasonably.

He swallowed, and he closed his eyes. Meredith had found him in a shaky heap hours ago. She'd held him close as he'd called Dr. Wyatt, who had not only offered to come in for him on her day off, but had offered to see him immediately. Meredith hadn't complained as she'd driven him to the hospital at 5:00 PM, four hours too early for her shift. She'd waited with him outside Dr. Wyatt's office. She'd hugged him when Dr. Wyatt had arrived, made sure he was okay, smiled her soft, hopeful, effortless smile that he loved, told him everything would be okay in a way that made him want to believe despite everything, made him want to believe Dr. Wyatt could and would help. He could still feel the brush of Meredith's lips on his skin, the heat of her body as she rested against his chest. And she was pregnant. They were going to be parents.

“I don't enjoy anything anymore but Meredith,” he said, blunt, hopeless, because he didn't. He didn't enjoy anything but her. She was his sanctuary. One he'd perpetuated in the Other Place. The one he couldn't go to anymore. “I hate my job. I can't stand being around people. I'm frightened all the time. I'm tired all the time. My body hurts. All the time. I need to be able to have sex. I need to want it. I need it because it's all I have that I look forward to anymore. It's the only thing that feels good except...”

He looked at his feet because he couldn't look at Dr. Wyatt or the fish or anything. He'd spent five days in hell. He'd been held up in the shower by Mark. He'd ruined his and Meredith's bed with his vomit. And he still wanted. Needed. And he couldn't have. Wouldn't have. Never again. His wife was pregnant, and he couldn't do this anymore. His throat closed as hopelessness burbled through his body. This would never stop. And if he took the Paxil, the only thing he found solace in would be gone, and all that would be left was this horrible, eternal wanting.

“The Percocet felt good?” Dr. Wyatt said, as though she'd sensed innately which way Derek's thoughts had drifted.

Silence stretched. He listened to the fish tank. “Yes,” he admitted.

“It helped you forget those things that you don't enjoy.”

“Yes.”

“Like your job, and being around people, and being scared and tired and hurting.”

“Yes,” he said softly.

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward. “What if you could flip a switch?”

He looked up. “What do you mean?” he said.

“What if you could like your job again, and not be scared or tired or hurting?”

He blinked. He wanted that so much. A lump formed in his throat. “But... I couldn't have sex,” he said.

“Derek, that might not even happen to you,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“No,” he said. “No, there are a million things that can go wrong with...” He swallowed. SSRIs caused all sorts of problems. They could tank his libido. Prevent orgasms. Remove pleasure from orgasms. Cause erectile dysfunction or slow his ability to climax to a frustrating level that would sap all the fun out of whatever intimacy he might be able to achieve. The penis was sort of a marvel of biological engineering, and it was one of the easiest things in the male body to fuck up. One broken or weak bit brought the whole system down. “I don't want to mess with it. I need sex. I need Meredith.”

“That's right,” said Mr. Clark. “Your options are being a eunuch, or being a sobbing, cowardly pansy who wets himself. Pick your poison.” Laughter followed. “I can't believe you thought she'd actually help you. There is no help for you. You're a raging failure, and you're stuck that way.”

“If you have problems, we can always make changes and adjustments,” Dr. Wyatt said. “I just want to get you to a stable baseline as fast as possible.”

“I can't,” Derek said. “Please, I need help, but I can't do that. I can't do... I can't.”

“We can try just therapy if that's what you truly want.”

He pressed his face into his hands and sighed as the lump in his throat bulged like a melon. He couldn’t swallow. His eyes burned. There were no options. It was hopeless.

“But you don't think it will work,” he said. His voice cracked.

She shrugged. “It might.”

“It won't,” said Gary Clark with a sneer. “Ever.”

“Determination can do a lot to help move things along,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Derek sighed and looked up at her. “Then why do I sense a 'but'?” he said.

“Because there is a 'but',” said Dr. Wyatt. “I want you to think about things realistically.”

“How am I not being realistic?”

“You have an illness, Derek. Because of what happened to you, your brain is sick. It's sending you messages that aren't normal, and that you don't want, and that are interfering with your ability to function. Not treating this with medication is like, in my mind, not treating a gushing wound with stitches. The wound might still heal without them, but there will be more scarring, it will be more painful, the skin will take a lot longer to knit, and in your case, things have already gotten infected.”

“How much longer will it take to knit?”

“A lot longer,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Would it take longer than eight months if I didn't take the pills?” Derek said.

She shook her head. “I don't know. I can't give you that answer. Every person is different.”

“But if I took Paxil, I might feel better next week?”

“Or the week after, or maybe in a month, yes,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Choices, choices. Don't fuck your wife, or listen to me,” said Mr. Clark. “Forever.”

“I really think it will make you feel better,” Dr. Wyatt continued, “And when you feel better, therapy is a lot more likely to work for you, and you'll be a lot less likely to want to utilize harmful coping methods.”

“Like Percocet,” Derek said.

“Exactly,” she said.
“It would help me... not want that?” He brushed streaking tears from his face. He had no idea when they'd started. He'd given up ever controlling himself again. Things happened, and he was left with the pieces. His vision blurred as his eyes filled up again. He blinked. Wet slivers curled over his eyelashes and tore down his cheeks.

“It would,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Subconsciously or purposefully, you've been self-medicating. If we take away the reasons you did that, I think it would help with the addiction as well.”

Derek, it'll be okay, Meredith had said a long time ago. Maybe not tomorrow. Or next week. But it will be. If I can be here, wrapped around you, not running and not wanting to run after all this, we can be okay. Eventually. It just won't be a surgical fix.

He sniffed. “Paxil is my... surgery?”

“It is,” said Dr. Wyatt, following his metaphor. “I truly believe it is. And if I'm wrong, or if you're unhappy with how it affects things it's not supposed to be affecting, we can always change it. There are lots of different choices we can make. Zoloft, for instance. It's not an exact science. But the sooner we start, the faster we'll get to a solution that works specifically for you.”

“O...okay,” Derek said. Abject misery pulled his face into his hands, and he couldn't look up while he cried.

“Pathetic,” said Mr. Clark. “Eunuch it is.”

“Okay?” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

Derek nodded. He couldn't find his voice.

“We can do this, Derek. Okay?”

He swallowed. “I'm tired,” he said. He sounded pathetic.

Dr. Wyatt licked her lips, and she stood up from the chair. “Derek, we will find something that works for you. I promise we will. And you'll feel better. The point of this is to get you feeling better, not worse. Okay? Some doctors might be happy with a partial solution, but I'm not and never will be, and if you don't like the Paxil, we'll change it once you're stable. This isn't a death sentence for your sex-life.”

The cushions sank as she sat on the couch beside him. She didn't touch, and she kept a wide, professional bubble between her and him, but the closeness... helped. Her calm, reassuring presence helped. He swallowed. His throat felt raw. He thought for a minute about Meredith. What she would want him to do. She smiled at him behind his eyelids.

I want you to be happy again, she'd say. Sex isn't the only way to express love or whatever. Why are you so freaking worried? He could hear her saying the words in all her inarticulate glory.

“I need you to be on board with this, or I won't prescribe it,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Are you on board with this, Derek?”

He nodded. “Okay,” he said.

She nodded. “Okay,” she said with a small smile that was probably supposed to be reassuring. “Now, I know you're tired, but want to discuss your panic attacks before you leave. I think that the Paxil is likely to decrease or eliminate those, given time, but in the meantime, there are lots of things you can do that can help when you experience one coming on.”
By the time he finished with Dr. Wyatt and picked up his Paxil prescription from Gregory Wallace at the hospital pharmacy, nearly four hours had passed. 8:00 PM had come and gone, and 9:00 PM had knocked. He felt tired and sick and nervous. His throat still hurt from the abuse of the last week. And he just wanted to go home, except home would be empty.

He needed to find Meredith. Just for a moment. He'd promised he would. And he needed to see if Richard was around because he didn't know when he would be back anymore. He didn't know anything. And Richard needed to know he would be in charge for a while longer. Derek hadn't spoken to Richard in weeks. Meredith had done all the work, and that wasn't fair to her.

Derek closed his eyes. They burned with exhaustion, and his sense of the hallway seemed to wobble. The rumble of a stretcher rolling past at the hands of an orderly dragged him back into focus. He sighed, and he tried to relax his stiff muscles. Everything ached from tension to the point that ibuprofen wasn't really helping. He kept moving.

Richard was in Derek's office. A dim light illuminated the small desk with sharp yellow tones, but darkness gripped the rest of the office. Shadows stretched in the room, muted by the bright white light in the hospital beyond the glass windows. Derek glanced at his watch and shook his head. 9:00 PM on the nose on a Saturday, and there Richard was. Working. His undivided attention on the paperwork in front of him. His pen scribbled as he signed something.

Derek rapped his knuckles on the open door. “Richard,” he said. His voice cracked, and his throat hurt. He sounded sort of like he'd had strep throat. Or like he had when he'd been recovering from pneumonia.

“Derek,” Richard said without looking up. He flipped to the next paper in his stack and scribbled more with his pen. Then he froze. The heavy sheaf of papers collapsed with a slap, and Richard stared at him. “Derek!” he said. He pushed back his chair and stood as Derek moved toward the desk. “You want to tell me why my star neurosurgeon disappeared for a week after showing up for a day, just a day, and all I got was a cryptic message from Meredith about the flu?”

“I'm not here to work,” Derek said. “And I'm not your neurosurgeon.”

“Not here to...” Richard shook his head, and his look creased into a frustrated glare. “What do you mean, you're not here to work? You certainly don't look like you have the flu.”

“I... can't,” Derek said. He collapsed into the chair across from Richard, who didn't sit. His former boss remained a tower of incredulity on the other side of the desk. “I need more time off.”

“Well, you can't have more time off,” said Richard. “You've taken almost three months already if you include this week.”

“You're not my boss anymore, Richard,” Derek snapped, and then he closed his eyes as regret filled him. God, he was tired. He pinched the bridge of his nose and sighed. “I was going to... tell the Board. Jennings. I have a letter from...” He swallowed. The recommendation letter Dr. Wyatt had typed for him felt heavy in his pocket, like a slab of iron. They wouldn't make him work after reading it. “I have a letter.”

“I can't force you to take time off,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“I thought...”

“I can't force you to take time off,” Dr. Wyatt repeated. “I know you were worried about that, and I want to assure you because of privacy laws that I'm in no position to force you not to go back, or to tell your superiors what you've told me about your drug problem, but I'd really like you to take time off. In fact, I urge it. You're not in any shape to work right now. Not in such a high stress position."

He closed his eyes. “I don't want to go back,” he said as he thought of all the people. The strangers. The bustle. The pressure. The now, now, now of it all. His collapse on the catwalk in front of everybody. The mountains of budgetary paperwork he'd suffered through within hours of returning in an official capacity. The parts he didn't despise scared him to death.

“Good,” Dr. Wyatt said. “That's a healthy decision.”

“But I've already taken all my disability leave,” he'd said. “There's nothing left.”

She nodded. “Let me write a letter of recommendation for you. I can make it as vague or as specific as you want. You can show it to your boss, and that should give you a bit of breathing room.”

He nodded, silent.

“Then why are you even here?” Richard demanded.

“I can't work right now. I'm not in any... condition to work. I'll take an unpaid leave of absence if I have to,” Derek said.

“How long?”

“A few more weeks.” At least.

“Weeks?”

Derek nodded.

It is my professional opinion that Dr. Shepherd cannot fulfill his duties without considerable danger to his psychological well-being, the letter said. That was it. It didn't mention post traumatic stress, or drugs, or anything. It just made it clear that making Derek work would be a disaster in the long run. The Board wouldn't be happy, but they couldn't afford to have a high profile surgeon suffer a nervous breakdown on the job. Not ever, but especially not after everything else that had happened to tarnish Seattle Grace's reputation. He'd already had a panic attack on the catwalk in full view. A year before, he'd gone a drunken binge and nearly quit after Jen had died on his table. The Board would read the letter and believe it.

Derek Shepherd was a flight risk.

Richard's eyes narrowed. “You could do that,” he said.

He sat in his chair, which creaked. Derek followed his mentor's gaze to Derek's hands, shaking at the edge of the desk as he clutched the bag containing his new prescription. Derek licked his lip and stuffed his hands in his lap with the bag, out of view. He fiddled with the bag. It crinkled. One moment passed. Two. Richard's gaze softened, and the space between them seemed to cool as the older man switched modes from frustrated boss to something else.

“Derek, tell me what's going on,” Richard said.

Derek looked at his lap. The stonewashed denim of his jeans looked dark indigo in the dim light. “Meredith is preg...” He cleared his throat when his voice failed. “Pregnant.”
Richard's expression lit up like a sparkling bouquet of firecrackers, and a smile tore across his face. “Really? That's wonderful!” he said as he launched forward. The sudden movement to shake Derek's hand, or clap him on the back, or... something, made Derek flinch and roll back in his chair. He lost his grip on the bag containing his prescription, and the bottle spilled and rolled onto Richard's desk. The bag fluttered to the floor. Derek's heart throbbed, and he panted. His blood rushed in his ears. Tension coiled as Richard fell silent and watched Derek put himself back together. Slowly.

“Pathetic,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek pulled his shaky fingers through his hair. “I'm sorry. I...”

“Not a problem,” said Richard, his gaze suspicious.

Derek moved to pick up his pill bottle. He met Richard's hand midair. Richard cleared his throat. Derek took the bottle from Richard's warm grasp.

“When is she due?” Richard asked as Derek fumbled for the bag on the floor and stuffed the bottle away out of sight. If Richard had seen what the pills were for, he made no indication.

“We don't know yet,” Derek said. “We just found out yesterday.”

“Is that what this is about?” Richard said. “Can I help?”

“No, I... If I had a scalpel right now... I wouldn't mean to, but I'd kill someone. I can't be this way if I'm supposed to be a dad.” A noise crashed in the hallway, and Derek flinched again. A startled exclamation stuck in his throat. He couldn't stop himself from reacting to anything anymore. His heart raced as he looked over his shoulder to see what had happened. Just the janitor passing with a cart and a mop. That was all. Frustration coiled in his gut.

“Derek...” Richard said, his voice low. Concerned. “You weren't out with the flu, were you?”

“No,” Derek said as he resettled himself in the chair. “No, I'm...” His eyes burned. “I'm a bit of a mess,” he admitted. He didn't know why. Like he'd been abraded, and rubbed raw, and he had no fortitude anymore to not spill himself to the first person who asked a prying question. At least this was Richard. Someone who'd been his friend. Not as much lately, but...

“He'll think you're a hypocrite if he finds out,” said Gary Clark. “You practically got him canned for the same problem. And then you took his job like a shark.”

“Is it the shooting?” Richard said.

Derek nodded. His voice was gone.

“He wanted you. And he was upset,” Richard said. Derek squeezed his eyes shut. Richard had spoken to... Richard had... Derek rocked in his chair. He couldn't think about this. He couldn't think about anything. A gunshot ricocheted in his head. The room snapped into endless white. He tumbled backward, and he hit the ground. Pain. He couldn't breathe. “What happened to you, Derek? What did he do?” Richard prodded, pulling Derek back. Derek blinked, and the sprawling white bled away.

“I made a mistake by unplugging his wife, and he shot me,” Derek snapped. “He shot everyone.”

“Mr. Clark was a sick man, Derek,” Richard said. “His wife's living will was very clear. You didn't make a mistake. And his wife was my patient. Not yours.”
Derek shook his head. “I need to go. You just... You have your job for a while. I wanted to warn... tell you.” He stood, and the room spun around his head like a carousel, and he almost toppled. He was tired. And stressed. And he couldn’t...

A warm hand cupped his shoulder and pushed him back into the chair. The light at the desk went out, and the room sank into comforting, cold darkness. “Why don't you relax for a minute?” Richard said. “I’ll see if I can find Meredith for you.”

Derek said nothing as Richard closed the office door behind him with a soft thud. Derek closed his eyes, and exhaustion pulled him into a doze in moments, despite the tension, despite everything. His sense of the room waned to nothing.

He lay in the dark in the bed, propped to the side by pillows. He clawed at the sheets. He couldn't move. His chest hurt, and it was dark. Pitch. His throat hurt like he’d been yelling.

“He lay in the dark in the bed, propped to the side by pillows. He clawed at the sheets. He couldn't move. His chest hurt, and it was dark. Pitch. His throat hurt like he’d been yelling.

“Derek, you're dreaming,” Meredith murmured. Her hand wandered over his shaking bicep. She snuggled closer as sleep abandoned him.

He made a noise. This wasn't the hospital. It was too dark. He tried to remember where he was. The house. The bedroom. He'd been home for a night. He couldn't breathe or move as he listened to the odd sounds of the house settling and civilization beyond the window. Rain thundered on the roof, and wet cars swished past on the street outside.

“S'okay, go back to sleep,” Meredith said against his skin. “Bad dream.”

He clenched his jaw. “Meredith,” he said. He sounded wrecked. Breathy.

She twitched and snapped awake as he clutched her. “What's wrong?” she said. She raised her head and stared at him. He couldn't see her face, but he felt her there. Eye-to-eye in the darkness. Worried.

“Meredith,” he repeated.

She brushed his face with her hand. “It's okay. You're okay,” she said. “Do you need something?”

He swallowed. His breaths arrived as wheezy pants. His eyes watered as he tried to force himself to inflate. An elephant had stepped on him. “My chest,” he said. “Hurts.”

“Not your back?”

He shook his head. “Chest.”

She nodded, sniffing. “Let me get your pills,” she said, and she rolled away. The jingle of the bottle hit his ears.

“Hey,” Meredith said, her voice low and whisper-y, and she brought the world back. He opened his eyes, and light bisected the darkness. He blinked. Her blurry shape resolved in front of him. She smiled. Her palm touched his face. “How are you doing?” she said.

“Meredith,” he murmured. He swallowed and wiped the sleep from his eyes, except it wouldn't go away. Exhaustion weighed him down. The prescription bag fell from his lap as he shifted, trying to become aware. She kissed him.

“How did it go with Dr. Wyatt?” Meredith said. She wore her periwinkle scrubs and a white undershirt, and she looked... fresh. For once. Not beset by worry. Glowing.
He pulled her against him, and he rested with his face in her hair. Breathing. Her body was warm. She wrapped her arms around him, and they hovered in silence for a long time.

“You're pregnant,” he said, his voice tired, as he rubbed her arms with his palms.

“I am,” she said.

A wide smile stretched across her face and lit her up like one of his young nieces on Christmas morning. Uncle Derek, he remembered Mary saying, with her big brown eyes wide like bowling balls as she stared at the lighted tree, Santa came! The last Christmas he’d visited his family. Years ago. Addison had still been asleep. Mary had tugged on his pajamas with her tiny hands and dragged him down the steps to join the other kids who'd woken early. He'd been the first adult sentient that morning. 4:00 AM. The tree had glowed in the dark living room like a bonfire, and shiny presents had sprawled for what seemed like miles.

His heart squeezed when the words changed in his head. Dad. Daddy. Daddy, look! Santa came! A lump formed in his throat, and he tightened his grip around Meredith.

“I told her,” he said.

Meredith ran her fingers through his hair. “Everything?”

He sighed. “Most things.”

“It's a start,” she said. “Are you going back to see her again?”

“Every day this week except tomorrow.”

Dr. Wyatt had penciled him in for 1:00 PM, every weekday until the end of creation, actually. She'd insisted he see her every day until they started making some progress. The thought of it, of putting himself on display for a stranger again and again and again, made him tired, and he became acutely aware of all his aches and pains. His eyelids drooped.

He gave her a weak smile. Ditto, he said with his eyes, but didn't speak it. “I'm really tired,” he said.

She nodded. “I know. I know you are. Thank you for going to see her.”

“Yeah.”

He gripped her shoulder and struggled to stand. His back unfurled, but not without protest, and he couldn't stop the wince that crept across his face, or the soft, muttered groan that fell from his lips. He stood in her space, breathing the soft scent of lavender, as the aching receded. She bent down. Something crinkled. She'd picked up his prescription. She looked at it. Her eyebrows raised as she pulled the bottle from the bag and stared at the instructions.

“That's a really big dose,” she said.

“Apparently, I'm messed up enough to warrant one,” he snapped, raw and hurting. He swallowed, and he looked away. “Sorry. I'm sorry. I'm tired.”

“It's okay,” she said, which made him feel worse. It wasn't okay that he yelled at her for no reason. It never had been.
They moved slowly to the office doorway. Richard stood on the far side of the hall, his arms crossed. He looked at the ceiling, surreptitious, but obviously waiting for his office to clear out. Derek rubbed the bridge of his nose. He took the prescription away from Meredith and sighed. He leaned into her.

“I need to go home,” he said, his voice soft against her ear. Her loose hair brushed the side of his face, and he breathed her in, once, twice, before he added, “I'll take it at home.”

“That's fine,” she said. “I'll drive you.”

He shook his head. “I can get a taxi.”

“Are you sure?”

“You need to work, Mere.”

She sighed but didn't argue. She stood, her arms wrapped around his back, and they hovered in the office doorway for minute after minute. She stroked his back, and he listened to the rasp, rasp, rasp in the quiet hall. This late on a Saturday, the catwalk and office complexes in the surrounding areas were often empty, and not many people walked to and fro. She kissed his throat, and then the stroking motions stopped. Her fingers scrunched his t-shirt.

“Let's go somewhere,” she said.

He lifted his head. “Hmm? Now?”

“Next weekend,” she said. “You need to get out of the house and relax. We both need it. It'll be good. We've been talking about our future first couple-y vacation. Why not?”

“Meredith—”

She splayed a palm against his chest. “Don't say it,” she said, interrupting him. “If I smash two thirty-six-hour shifts together with a small break between, I can hit my eighty hour cap by Friday afternoon. We'll have the whole weekend.”

He stared at her. Her gray eyes sparkled in the dim light. Her lips pressed into a flat line, and her nose scrunched. Her determined face. He'd seen it a lot lately. When she'd told him he couldn't stay home alone for his withdrawal. When she'd told him he needed to see somebody. He swallowed. The ache in his head that her presence had tempered returned with roaring force. He was too tired to argue when he knew he would never win.

He shrugged. “Whatever you want.”

“I'll think of someplace we can go,” she said. “You relax this week.”

Except she was pregnant. And if she intended to work eighty hours in the space of five days... where would she find the time to plan and arrange a trip? That wasn't healthy even for somebody who wasn't pregnant. “Meredith, you—”

“Maybe wine country?” she interrupted. A small smile tugged at her lips. “First impulses are usually good.”

“Maybe,” he said.

She cradled her womb. “Forty-eight hours. Uninterrupted.” Sex, she didn't say, but she'd seen the Paxil. She'd commented on it. She knew what it did. Didn't she? He felt sick as she continued, “Though, sampling the wine would be out.”

“It would,” he replied. “But, Meredith—”

“You have a cabin?” Meredith said.

Derek closed his eyes as he listened to the excitement drip into Meredith's tone. He wouldn't win. Not when she sounded like that. He fingered the bag, and it crinkled. Mood killer in a bottle.

“I bought it on a whim when Adele kicked me out again,” Richard said. “When I was drinking.”

“Oh,” replied Meredith. Silence followed.

“It's a bit of a bachelor pad, but it's quiet,” Richard added. “It's got a beautiful view of the lake. And it's free. I can bring you the keys tomorrow.”

“That would be really nice, Chief,” Meredith said.

“Listen, I, uh...” Richard swallowed. He glanced at his watch. “I'm headed home.” He looked at Derek. “Did you need a ride?”

“I was going to grab a taxi,” Derek said.

“Well, I'm happy to take you,” Richard said.

Derek shrugged. One the one hand, it meant he didn't have to wait for a taxi or help the driver navigate. On the other, it meant he would have to ride home with Richard. “If you're sure,” Derek said, trying not to sound too wary. He figured he sounded more tired than anything else. He rubbed his burning eyes.

“Oh, this will be swell,” said Mr. Clark.

“No trouble at all,” replied Richard, oblivious. “Let me just grab my coat and hat.”

Meredith turned to Derek. They shuffled out of the doorway to allow Richard to pass and then leaned against the wall by the door. She brushed her fingers through his hair, and he pulled her into his arms. “I'll see you tomorrow when I get home, okay?” she said. “Call me if you need anything.”

“Okay,” he whispered.

“Meredith...” Richard said as he exited the office and pulled shut the door, his briefcase, coat, and hat in hand. “I wanted to say congratulations.”

Meredith glanced at Derek. He gave her a thin smile. They'd decided to tell whoever was pertinent at the time, since most of her friends already seemed to know, anyway. Or, at least, that's what he'd thought they'd decided. “I told him,” he said.

“Oh,” she said, and he relaxed when no anger swelled in her sparkling gaze. She just seemed... pleased. Thrilled. Her hands absently went to her belly, and he couldn't help the smile that ignited on his face as he watched her do something so small and simple. She turned to Richard. Her cheeks flushed, but Derek thought it made her look beautiful. Not embarrassed. “Thanks. I’m...” She made a small shrugging motion and bit her lip in a gesture that was purely Meredith. The Meredith he loved. “Thanks.”

They said their goodbyes and parted. Derek, clutching his prescription bag, followed Richard to the parking lot as fast as his tired body would allow, which wasn't fast, though Richard said nothing about the stilted pace of their departure. The older man had a jaunty step. His coat folded down over his leather briefcase, and he held his hat tucked under his arm. The weather outside was fairly balmy, though damp, as summer stretched its remaining muscles. The street lights buzzed and reflected on the dark, wet pavement. The staff lot was quiet, mostly.

The soft purr of a car prowling past made Derek look up and assess. The vehicle kept moving into the dark, away, and he would have relaxed, except looking up made him realize how dark it was. How solitary. His pupils strained to adjust as he stared beyond row after row of cars. His heart squeezed as he looked at all the places where one could hide with a gun. Parked cars became malevolent. Unlit headlamps and front grills became glaring faces. Each vehicle could hide the crouching body of a person. Easily.

A cool breeze ruffled his hair and his shirt. Richard whistled as they walked. At least he didn't make small talk. Derek forced himself to move despite the disquiet snarling in his head and pressing on his chest. They walked between a pair of parked cars. Nervous energy made his steps shaky.

They'd almost made it to Richard's car when the air around Derek lit like a supernova. Cacophony burst in his ears, unexpected after the muted almost-silence, and Derek slammed into the parked car on his left. His fingers slipped on the wet paint as his eardrums curdled with the horrible noise. His innards dropped out from his body, and his knees wobbled. He fought the urge to curl up into a ball or explode into a sprint as the blaring horn kept going, and going, and another horn joined it, a rapid blast of noise, until Derek's chest hurt and everything hurt, and he wanted to run, except he had no idea where to, because the painful light and the muted colors flashed and confused everything.

Through the blur, several feet away to the right, the headlights of a car speared the intersection, blocked in part by a shadow and glowing tail lights and a blinking yellow turn signal. As fast as the honking had started, it stopped. He blinked against the bright glare of the oncoming car. Having settled their quarrel, the first car slid through the intersection. The second turned left and moved perpendicular. Derek tensed as the first car rumbled in front of him as it moved down the parking lot's aisle, and then faded into the distance. The parking lot darkened and quieted. Derek's heart throbbed. He swallowed. A hand touched his shoulder, and he made an embarrassing noise. Not a word. Just fear. Solid, abject, unabated. “Stop,” he managed, his voice throaty and miserable as he made his stand against his nerves, but Gary Clark, who'd been silent for so long, began to laugh and laugh and laugh. The hand that had touched him lifted away.

“You're a hoot to watch, you know,” said Mr. Clark. “It's better than cable.”

And then all Derek could hear was laughing and more laughing, and he tried to curl away, but a solid wall of metal blocked him on one side. Shadows lurched around him. He couldn't breathe, and he—

“Derek!” Richard shouted in Derek's ear, and the shock was enough to snap reality back into place. Derek stood in the dark parking lot, trembling against a beige Impala. He turned. He felt nauseous, and he fought the urge to let the threat of Richard's imposing figure slip into his thighs and his knees and his toes and make him move backward. It didn't work. Derek stumbled. His back hit the parked car with a thunk, and he couldn't speak. His throat closed.

“Derek,” said Richard, his voice softer. He backed away, and he raised his hands so they both were visible. Pink palms hovered in the darkness.

“I'm sorry,” Derek croaked. He blinked, and then he was crying. In front of his fucking former boss. “I'm sorry,” he repeated. Useless. Nothing helped. He was useless. He tried to remember all the things Dr. Wyatt had told him about panic attacks, but they flew from his grasp like a scattering flock of birds, and he couldn't think about anything other than the fact that the parking lot was really dark. Tenebrous. Shadows stretched and then seemed to coil and gather. Somebody was hiding out there somewhere. He knew it.

“It's okay,” Richard said, soft, slow. He pointed to his car, parked three spaces down, and hit his key fob with his thumb. The car chirped, and the headlights turned on. The keys jingled. “Move when you're ready. It's okay.”

Derek forced himself to shuffle toward Richard's car. Forced. He couldn't stop his hands from shaking. He settled into the soft leather seat of Richard's sedan and pulled the seatbelt over his lap. He swallowed. He swallowed again. Nothing would stop the sick feeling quivering in his stomach that he was being stalked. He locked the car door beside him, and he sat there. Shaking.

He flinched when Richard settled into the car, and he flinched when Richard slammed shut his door. The walls closed in. Derek tried to think about the rules. What Dr. Wyatt had said. His heart pounded in his chest. And then he couldn't breathe, and he couldn't think, and he was dying. In the seat. Dying. He clawed at his throat.

“Breathe in,” Richard said from far away. “Listen to me. Breathe in, and hold it.”

Derek breathed.

“Now, let it out,” said Richard.

Derek exhaled.

“In.”

Derek closed his eyes.

_The most important thing you can do for yourself during a panic attack is breathe_, Dr. Wyatt had said. _Focus on yourself. Breathe in. Hold it for three. Breathe out over three seconds. Okay? Keep doing that as long as you feel like you need it._

Derek collapsed over his knees and kept breathing. He lost track of Richard as Dr. Wyatt's voice filled his head. _Stop and replace the panic thought. Think about something you know you like instead of what's scaring you._

Derek scrunched his fingers in his hair. Meredith. Pregnant. Meredith was pregnant. He needed to be able to do this. _Pickles and ice cream_, he imagined her demanding at 3:00 AM. She would tug on his shirt in the middle of the night. He'd roll over and mumble something. _Derek, she'd say more insistently. Derek, I really want pickles, and we don't have any._ She would be swollen with their child. A boy or a girl. He would be thrilled with either one. _The spears, not the little circles. And they should be extra crunchy!_ she would command. And he would take pity on her and drag himself to the supermarket in the middle of the night. Again. Because she'd asked, and it was his fault she was suffering, anyway. Well, half his fault. But he would do it.
When he came back to himself in the car, he felt... better. Exhausted. Beaten. Hurting. But better. Not scared. He blinked when he realized it'd actually worked. He'd stopped panicking on his own, and he'd only had to get to step two of seven. He cleared his throat as he unfurled his body and relaxed shakily in the seat.

“You weren't like this on Monday,” Richard said.

“I know I wasn't like this on Monday,” Derek snapped. He'd been fucking high. Now, he had nothing, and every little thing was making him feel like crawling into bed and never getting out again. He stared at the bag by his feet containing the Paxil.

I really think it will make you feel better, Dr. Wyatt had said.

A lump formed in his throat. He hoped so. He couldn't live like this. He couldn't do this anymore.

“Sorry,” said Richard as Derek stared out the window through a blur of tears.

Derek wiped his face, but he said nothing. As they went over the last speed bump before the main street, he pressed his face against the cool glass. He didn't want to think anymore. Exhaustion won. His eyelids drooped, and he hovered somewhere less than half-awake, but not quite unaware. Cars swished past on the wet road, repetitive. Hypnotic. He blinked once. Twice. The blur beyond his eyelashes became unimportant, and he closed his eyes.

“So, what should we name her?” Meredith said as they sat at the table in the kitchen.

Derek nursed a small bowl of cereal mixed with peach yogurt. He crunches through another bite as he looked up. He swallowed. Sunlight fell through the windows. The bright light made the ends of her hair glow, and she looked warm. Happy.

“Her?” he said.

“The baby.”

“It's a her?”

Meredith shrugged. “I think so.”

He leaned on his elbows and grinned at her. “Oh, you do?”

She nodded. “I do. So, what name?”

“I thought you liked Anne.”

“I do,” she said. “But do you? Maybe, we should get a name book since this is more relevant, now.”

“I like Anne,” he said.

He took another bite of cereal. He swallowed. She sat across from him with a glass of apple juice. Her soft skin glowed, and her eyes were... happy. Just happy. He leaned back in his chair, and he couldn't stop the smile that overwhelmed him. His body ached. He felt like shit. Tired. Spent. And yet... None of it mattered, and he'd never felt better.

“What?” she said in a soft voice.

“Just you,” he said. He finished another bite of his cereal. His stomach behaved instead of “What about me?”

“Everything.”

Her eyebrows raised. “Is this a good everything?”

He nodded. “It’s a perfect everything. You’re perfect.”

“I’ll be fat in a few months,” she countered.

He shrugged. “No, you won’t. You’ll be pregnant.”

“Smooth.”

He winked. “I try. We should get a name book, though.”

“I keep thinking there’s a name out there I don’t know about that’s better.”

“Exactly,” he said. “And we have eight or more months to kill, don’t we?”

She grinned and cocked her head to the side as she stared at him. “We do.”

“Plus, we need a fallback,” he said.

“A fallback?”

“In case you’re not psychic, and it’s a boy. We should have a plan for that.”

She giggled. “I’m telling you, it’s a girl.”

“Would you be upset if it’s a boy?”

“Nope,” she said. “But it’s a girl, anyway.”

He finished his cereal. The entire bowl. He dropped his spoon into the bowl and rested on his hands. He couldn’t stop watching her. She really did have a glow. Something... Otherworldly. Whenever he looked at her. Perfect. “I love you, Meredith. I really do.”

“Derek,” a soft male voice whispered. Derek twitched. “Derek?”

“Hmm.”

“We're here,” Richard said.

Derek opened his eyes and wiped his face with his hands. Richard had parked along the curb in front of the house where Mark liked to park his Mustang when he visited. Home. Derek was home. He stared at the dark, wet walk, the small flight of steps, the deck with the swing, and then the house beyond. Every window was dark – Lexie, Alex, and Meredith were all at work — but the light in front of the house was lit as if welcoming him home. Meredith. She must have flipped the switch before they’d left that afternoon. He gazed at the door, and longing so profound it ached swept through him. He wanted to go back to bed. He wanted to crawl under the covers, where it was safe and warm, and he could sleep.

“Thank you,” Derek said as he released his seatbelt. He coughed as he cleared his throat.
“It's no problem,” Richard said.

Derek pushed open the door of the car. Deep, energetic barking began. Once, twice, and then a staccato of earnest welcome. Dad, dad, dad, he imagined Samantha saying as she danced at the front door. Oh, boy! You're back! Can we play?

“You got a dog?” Richard said.

“Yeah,” Derek said as he fumbled with his seatbelt.

“I love dogs.”

Derek paused, his fingers on the latch. The seatbelt popped out and rolled back into the holder. Won't you introduce me? Richard hadn't said it, but...

“Richard, I'm...” Derek swallowed. He wanted to hibernate, and he needed to take the first fucking pill. He needed to be safe. For an hour. Two. He couldn't take this much longer. “I'm really tired.”

“Let me come in,” Richard said. “You can go to bed.”

Derek closed his eyes. “Richard...”

“I just want to help.”

“Why?”

“Because I think you need it,” Richard said. “You seem like you need company. Just somebody in the house. I won't bother you.”

“Adele—”

“Won't mind if I'm helping a friend. It's the extra work she hates.”

Friend. Derek's fingers clenched. “I nearly got you fired.”

“I nearly got me fired,” Richard said. Derek faced him. Their eyes met, and Richard didn't blink in the dark of the car. “I'm an alcoholic,” he said. “People got hurt. I took advantage of Meredith. Thank you for stepping in. I know that wasn't easy.”

“You're...” Derek swallowed. “Welcome.”

His mentor – his friend – nodded. A small nod. As if to say he considered the matter closed and done with. No hard feelings. “Now,” Richard said. “Let me meet this dog of yours.”

Derek grimaced as he climbed out of the car. “Her name is Samantha.”

Richard glanced down the walk at the house. Samantha hadn't stopped barking. “She sounds big.”

“She is big,” Derek said. “She's just a gregarious clown, though.”

“When did you get her?”

“About two weeks ago,” Derek said. “We're... building a family.”

Richard smiled. The car chirped as he locked it. “I can see that,” he said.

They ambled up the walk. Derek turned the key in the lock and was immediately greeted by a hundred pounds of slobbering dog. Finally. Something that didn't make his heart want to burst in his chest. He was kissed. Again, again, again. His tension unraveled. Just a little. He couldn't help but laugh as he pushed Samantha out of the way so they could get into the house and he could disable the threatening security alarm.

“Down, Sam,” he said, and she backed away, but her stumpy tail wagged, welcoming him home.
Chapter 20

(Loud and clear, pulls you near)

“Punch buggy yellow, no return!” Meredith blurted, and she jabbed Derek in the arm. She zipped past the cheerful yellow Volkswagen plodding along in the slow lane and spread the distance between them.

Silence spread in the car cabin between them for one second, two, and she could have kicked herself. What better way to startle a man who was easily startled than to yell in a cramped space and then hit him? Derek had about zero tolerance for loud noises, sudden movements, or any combination of the two, which was something she found perilously easy to forget after having developed years worth of habits around him. Except he didn't flinch this time. She'd gotten used to watching him with a lump in her throat as he resettled his jumbled, tattered nerves, and she didn't see that behavior, now, out of the corner of her eye.

Torn from his commune with the dreary road ahead, he rubbed his arm and turned to face her. “Hey,” he said, the word stretched out by bewildered indignation. He frowned, and he looked across the parking brake at her as though she'd grown another head, or maybe two heads. Or maybe some wings and a tail. She snickered. She hadn't socked him that hard.

“Have you never played that game before?” she said as her eyebrows tipped upward.

Trepidation overcame her playful grin when he didn't answer right away. He had four sisters, and he'd gone to the beach every summer with them. He'd said so. How could he have four sisters and not know the punch buggy game? Even she'd picked it up, and she'd had no one. She'd learned it on a school field trip to the zoo, of all places.

“I've... played it,” he said. “Just not...” His eyes trained on the yellow Beetle in the rear view mirror that was quickly becoming a speck on the horizon. “You cheated.”

“What? I did not cheat,” she said. “There was a yellow one, and we just passed it.”

He shook his head. “It was a new one,” he said. “You can't count the new ones.”

“Why not?”

“Because you can't!” he insisted. “Those are the rules.”

“Well, if we only count old ones, we'll never see another one,” she said. “Weren't they discontinued over thirty years ago? You weren't even a teenager yet when that happened!”

He scoffed, though his lip twitched with the hint of a smile as he stared at her. “Are you calling me old?” he said in a rare bit of self-deprecation.

He had a decade on her. The age difference wasn't something they discussed very often because, really, to her, it didn't feel like any sort of issue. She loved him. And he knew that.

“No,” Meredith said evenly, “I'm merely saying that cars aren't typically on the road for... gee... decades. They're not like people.”

He shook his head. “Such a pessimist.”
“Well, have you seen one recently?” she said.

He shrugged. “I can't say I was paying attention,” he said. “I haven't exactly played this game in a while.”

She sighed dramatically as she fell into the familiar, comfortable role of teasing him. Playing. “So, you're one of those people who has no fun,” she said.

His eyebrows raised. “Excuse me?”

“No fun on road trips,” she said. “I bet you don't even allow bonus points for Karmann Ghias.”

“Bonus points?”

She nodded. “Those are worth ten because they're rare.”

“I think you're making this up as you go along,” he said. “Karmann Ghias aren't Beetles. Are we going to count Rabbits, and Golfs, and all of those?”

“No,” she said, heaving another sigh. “Two points for old ones, including Karmann Ghias, and one point for new ones. No Rabbits or Golfs. It's 1-0 so far, my favor.”

“Fine,” he said, surrendering. “But that won't last.”

She flashed a competitive grin at him. Her fingers squeaked as she wrung the leather steering wheel. She thought she'd found something to pass the time. Something fun. Except the engaged, lit expression on his face evaporated as the odometer crept up another mile, two, three.

He propped his head on the side window of the Cayenne and resumed the intense brooding she'd just tried to crack open like a nut. She zoomed along in the left lane a good nineteen miles over the speed limit. The road wasn't crowded. They'd beat rush hour out of the city. No other Volkswagens came along. Not even one that wouldn't count, like a Jetta or something.

They'd been on the road for about forty minutes. They'd left from the hospital as soon as he'd finished with Dr. Wyatt. They'd passed the turnoff for Sea-Tac as they'd looped around. If they'd been able to travel in a straight line, Lake Cushman was, really, only about fifty or sixty miles away. But Seattle, surrounded on three sides by water, posed a rather annoying obstacle. There were no roads as the crow flew between them and the lake. They had to drive around all the water, first down the 5, and then back up on the 101 in what looked like a big horseshoe when the route was drawn on a map. The trip burgeoned to over two hours and thirty minutes, that way. About 110 miles.

The ferryboat to Bremerton wouldn't have chopped off that much time, if any, given the wait times and the length of the ferryboat ride, so they'd opted for simplicity. Well, she'd opted. She should have known something was wrong the second he hadn't fought tooth and nail to take the ferryboat. He'd just nodded and shrugged at her logic, and let her do her thing. You're the native, he'd said. With her busy schedule, she hadn't seen him much that week, didn't have much of a barometer on his mood. She hadn't registered his response as a clear funk until later.

The day had been gloomy, at best, thus far. Overcast without a hint of sun, but not raining or drizzling or otherwise precipitating. Deep, verdant greens spread to the left of the roadway across rolling hills, and then in the distance stopped short at the snow-capped, craggy mountains, Mount Rainier among them. To the right, the plant life spilled away gradually into water. The vast but somewhat random elevation differences in just a few short miles always made her breath catch. Derek's, too.
He'd commented any number of times since he'd moved to Seattle on how much he loved the way civilization seemed to stack on itself like a haphazard pile of building blocks, instead of like Manhattan, which was flat, flat, and more endless flat, the only things towering being buildings. Anywhere in Seattle or the surrounding suburbs that you could stand, there was pretty much always more up, more down, and lots between. Two-dimensional skyline pictures didn't do the city justice in that way.

But Derek had been quiet for the forty minutes they'd been on the road. He didn't comment on the mountains. He stared at the road, not as somebody sightseeing, gaze flicking to passing sights, but as somebody engrossed in his own head. The horizon pinned his gaze, and it didn't shift. He barely even blinked.

Cool air whooshed from the vents. Something in the trunk wobbled back and forth. Maybe, his fishing poles or something. He'd packed a lot of fishing junk. The radio whispered a hint of Layla, the Eric Clapton version, barely audible above the hum of the engine and the sound of the wind buffeting the car. She pulled into the slow lane to let somebody crazier than her pass in the fast lane, and she sighed. This was their vacation. Their first vacation. Nothing had even happened yet. Why was he broody-faced already?

“Derek, are you okay?” she said.

His gaze didn't shift. “I'm fine.”

“Because you seem fine in the sense that you're totally not,” she countered.

“Hmm?” he said without moving.

“You. Monosyllabic and glower-y,” she said. “We don't have to play the game if you don't want to.”

He tore his gaze from the road, and for a moment, she saw confusion slide across his face. Like he had no idea what game she meant. Her body tensed. She couldn't help it. Dissociation, she heard Dr. Wyatt say. Was he dissociating? She hadn't seen that sort of behavior since... since he'd gotten clean, not that she'd been around him all that much since then. But... Her fingers tightened on the steering wheel.

“It's not the game,” he said at last.

Not, What game? Or, We were playing a game? She relaxed a little. “Do you miss the dog already?” she said, grasping at straws. Derek and Samantha were practically attached at the hip. Wherever he went in the house, the dog was there. They'd left Samantha in Lexie's care. Lexie had been more than thrilled about it.

Don't worry, Lexie had said. I'll be sure to walk her four times a day, and I'll play with her as much as she wants, and—

Well, don't spoil her or anything, Meredith had replied, a wry grin on her face. She'll swindle you for all the dog treats.

Of course, not, Lexie had replied, her skin blooming red, and then she'd dissolved into smiles and sighs. You're going to a cabin on the lake alone together. For a whole weekend. That's so romantic!

“I don't miss the dog,” Derek said, interrupting Meredith's thoughts. “I...” His voice trailed away, and his gaze shifted to the road again.
“What?” she said.

For moments, he didn't speak. She tried to keep her eyes on the road, which was frustrating, because she wanted desperately to watch him, instead, to try and interpret the minutiae that might give her a clue about his mood. “I don't like this,” he said at last.

She swallowed. Dread washed over her. “The trip?”

He shook his head. “The Paxil.”

“Oh,” she said. “What don't you like about it?”

He shrugged, and he rubbed the bridge of his nose. “I feel really lethargic.”

Relief replaced dread. That would explain the fact that he hadn't been his usual chatty self. It would explain, really... everything. “You should give it more of a chance,” she said. “The somnolence is supposed to go away after you get used to it. A few weeks.”

“I know that,” he snapped. Discordant energy clotted in the car. She bit her lip. He sighed. “I'm sorry,” he said, his voice lower-pitched and tingeing on hopelessness. He took a deep breath and blew it out. “Sorry.”

“It's okay.”

“Stop saying it's okay for me to yell at you,” he said. “It's not okay, Meredith.”

“Yeah, well, me yelling back at you whenever you make a cross remark or whatever isn't going to help, either,” she said. “We both know why it's happening. You're getting help. I'd rather just let it go.”

He ran his fingers through his hair once. Twice. He sighed again, more agitated. “I'm already ruining this.”

“Already?” she said, raising her eyebrows. Her heart clenched. “What do you mean already? You were planning on ruining something?”

Silence. He opened his mouth and closed it. The car rumbled as she zipped along in the gloom. At last, he said, “Planning implies intentional sabotage.”

“Fine,” she said. “What are you expecting to ruin?”

More silence. He shifted to fiddle with the air vents and then the door lock before answering, “I'm worried about the side-effects.” He stared at the road. She watched him out of the corner of her eye. His skin was pale, and the cloudy gray outside darkened the circles under his eyes and turned his irises a stormy, dark blue.

“It's okay if you sleep more,” she assured him. She'd expected it, even. She knew how SSRIs worked. “That won't ruin anything. I brought a couple books.”

“I don't mean the sleep, damn it,” he said. “I mean... the other stuff.”

“Oh,” she said with a sinking feeling. Other stuff. She ran through all the side-effects in her head, trying to pinpoint potential 'other stuff'. There was only one side-effect on the list that would get Derek this bent out of shape so soon, and it would explain the moping.

“I feel like I'm trapped,” he confessed.
She blinked. “Why?”

“Being with you is...” He ran his left thumb along a crease in his frayed jeans. “It’s the only thing I enjoy anymore. If that goes away, I don’t know what I’ll do, but...” He blinked as he watched the road. Blinked, blinked. A glassy, watery coating filled his eyes, but they didn’t spill over. His fingers scrunched, pulling up tents of loose denim in his hands. “But I really want to feel better,” he said, his voice soft and cracking, as though he were ashamed to admit it, but he’d been broken past his capability to tolerate.

A lump formed in her throat. He had been. Broken. He was frightened, and seeing things that weren’t there, and nervous, and stressed, and... That’s what the drugs had been for. The Percocet. To fix something he couldn’t tolerate by himself. At least, she understood it, now. “There’s nothing wrong with wanting to feel better,” she said, her voice soft. “I want you to feel better, too. I want that a lot.”

He swallowed. “But what if we can’t have sex anymore?” he said, his voice thick with emotion.

She wanted to stop the car. She wanted to pull over, stop the car, pull him into her arms, and just... sit. Breathe. Remember they were alive. She didn’t mind if they couldn’t have sex for a while if it meant he would be okay. Surely, he knew that. Didn’t he? He must. The urge to pull over became an overwhelming, consuming need. As an outlet, she settled for grabbing his hand. She gave it a squeeze that he reciprocated, though not as strongly.

“What do you think... anything has changed yet?” she said.

He shrugged. “I don’t know. We haven’t really had much time together to find out since I started taking it.”

Which was true. She’d worked 6:00 AM on Monday to 6:00 PM on Tuesday, 6:00 AM on Wednesday to 6:00 PM on Thursday, and then 6:00 AM to 2:00 PM that Friday. She’d seen him awake all of three hours since the Sunday before. She’d arrived home on both Tuesday and Thursday evenings exhausted, and she’d been in bed by 7:30 PM, sound asleep. He’d cooked her dinner both evenings. Chicken mixed with vegetables the first night, and some sort of casserole thing the second night. She could recall the warm smells of roast chicken and fresh baked bread as she’d walked through the door both times. She’d been a bad, horrible, inattentive wife, and she hadn’t really chatted with him about anything, let alone whether the Paxil was working its magic yet, but she figured she had a good excuse, what with cramming her schedule full so that they could fit in this weekend. She had thanked him for dinner both times, at least.

“Well, do you want sex?” she said.

He pulled his hand free from hers, wiped his face, and stared at her. “Like, now?”

“Yes, right now,” she said. “Can you imagine yourself having sex with me?”

“In the car?” he said, his voice tinged with a hint of uneasiness, as though he thought she expected him to get ready and take her right then.

She shrugged. “Anywhere.”

“I can always imagine sex with you,” he said.

“But do you want it?” she prodded. “Like want, want it? Or is it more of a insert tab A into slot B and win sort of imagining?”
“I’m...” He swallowed. He stared at her for an interminable moment, like he was trying to kick start behavior he knew should be there, but wasn't. She felt it. Him staring. Intent. Intense. To the point that, even though she watched the road and could only glance at him in small, too-short intervals, she felt her skin heat with blush, and her lower body tightened as she imagined what he might do to her after staring at her like that. He'd push her against the side of the car with a thump. He'd be hard, and ready, and he'd devour her. She blinked to push the enticing image away and glanced at him, expecting him to have a similar fantasy written all over his face. But he didn't smirk, and he didn't have that cheerful peeling-your-clothes-off-with-my-eyes countenance that she'd grown to love. He looked... disturbed. And then his shoulders crumpled. “No, I don't want, want it,” he said, “But maybe I'm thinking too hard. I mean...”

“Derek,” she said. She reached across the car and touched his arm. “It's okay.”

“It's not okay,” he said as he shrugged her off. He shook his head. “It's not okay. I need to want sex.”

Her heart clenched over the fact that he was so twisted up in knots about this. She switched gears when she saw she wasn't making any headway in improving his outlook. Maybe, there was more to this anxiety than lack of wanting. Maybe, he'd noticed something physical already.

“Have you had an erection since you started taking it?”

He blushed, and he looked at his knees. “Not this morning.”

But he'd had nightmares last night. Not horrible ones, but... bad. He'd muttered in his sleep, and he'd tossed and turned. The sheets had stuck to his sweaty skin, and she'd had to fight him for them in a perpetual tug of war. He'd groggily told her he'd see her later and that he loved her as she'd slid out of bed that morning, which meant he'd been sort of awake already, if not fully aware. She doubted very much when he'd eventually crawled into the bathroom that morning that he'd just lapsed out of REM sleep, which was when nighttime erections typically occurred in men.

“How about earlier this week?” she prodded. “Anything?”

“I... Yes. One. But that was...” He ran his hands through his hair, agitated. “That was days ago.”

“Have you... tried by yourself?” she said in what she hoped was a gentle tone.

The red on his face deepened into scarlet. “In the shower this morning.” His look darkened. “Nothing happened.”

“But weren't you already upset about this by then?” she said.

He didn't answer.

She imagined the stressful pressure that he put on himself alone might have been enough, emotionally, to make him choke. “Maybe, you just need some help getting into the mood. Kissing. Touching. Something slow and fun,” she said. “It might be different when we're naked. Does it really matter if you're not ready to strip me every time you look at me, as long as we can get going when we're both ready?”

“But I always...” he stammered. “I mean...”

“Or, maybe, you're worrying yourself in freaking circles, and the Paxil has nothing to do with it.”

He took a deep, shaky breath, and he laughed, but the laugh wasn't happy. “I know this is stupid,” he said.

“It's not stupid.”

“It's stupid,” he said. “I worry about stupid things, and I can't make myself stop.”

“We're on this trip to relax,” she said.

“But you made it about a weekend of sex when I'm not even sure I—”

“When did I make it about a weekend of sex?” she said, interrupting him as a sinking feeling overwhelmed her. He did think she would be upset if they couldn't. She rewound frantically in her head, trying to think of when she might have said something to give him that impression, but she couldn't think of a single moment, or a single word.

“You said forty-eight hours. Uninterrupted.” His temples danced as he clenched his jaw. “And I just started a huge daily dose of a medication known for quashing libido, and for causing erectile dysfunction and ejaculatory problems.”

She frowned. “Did I ever use the word sex to describe this weekend?”

“No, but we did before when we talked about wine country,” he said.

He sounded so lost. She reached across and rubbed his thigh in what she hoped would be interpreted as reassurance. She closed her eyes. Just for a moment before fixing her gaze back on the road.

You want to go away with me this weekend? he'd said.

Why would I want to go away with you this weekend? she'd responded.

Because of this.

He'd kissed her. Again and again. He'd been the one to make it about sex. All sex. Nothing but. In order to lure her into saying yes, he'd done that, because that was all she'd permitted him to do with her, then. Have sex. Of course, he would have framed it that way.

But the sentiment had perpetuated when she'd brought it up again.

You almost died, and we've never even left Seattle together. We've never left, Derek. We haven't done anything, and we should.

For sex? he'd said.

She'd steered him away from the idea, sworn she'd be happy doing anything at all with him, but that made two times his knee jerk interpretation had been sex. Of course, he would have connected the dots the same way, this time, particularly when she'd regurgitated the same words. Again.

Forty-eight hours. Uninterrupted.

“Derek,” she said. “When I said uninterrupted this time, I meant uninterrupted. As in, I get to be alone with you, my mostly healed husband, for forty-eight hours, and there will be no guns, no hospital crap, no roommates, and no near death whatevers.”

He sighed, and he gave her a frustrated look. “That sounds like sex to me.”
“Only because you're a freaking lech,” she said with a snort. “I want to relax, and pick baby names, or go for a scenic hike, or... just do... whatever it is you do at a cabin. I'm all for sex, but we could do the freaking crossword puzzle all day – you could even cheat – and I'd be happy.”

“Oh,” he said.

“I'm happy, Derek,” she assured him. “And I want you to be happy again, too. If that means no sex for a while, that means no sex for a while, and that's okay. I mean that. Do you realize we've never even done this before?”

“Done what?”

“Spent this much uninterrupted time together when neither of us has been sick or hurt?”

Silence stretched as he considered that. “I guess we haven't,” he said.

“I don't think we've ever even been in a freaking car this long.”

“We have, too,” he said.

“When?”

“When you drove me home from the hospital, and we got stuck in traffic.”

“That doesn't count,” she said.

He frowned. “Why not?”

“Because I was in the car,” she said. She rubbed his arm. The soft hairs dusting his forearm followed her thumb, and she grinned. “You were on the planet Neptune.”

He scoffed. “I remember most... some... bits of it.”

“Name one thing.”

“I'm your...” He paused, and he bit his lip in a ponderous expression that seemed so anti-Derek it made her want to chuckle. He gazed at her, and he offered a hesitant, “Um, I'm your arm?” as though he didn't quite believe what he was saying, and he thought, maybe, he really had been on Neptune.

She's your person. I'm your arm. Got it, he'd said with a laugh.

“Oh, fine,” she huffed. “Fine, we've been in a car this long.”

He smirked, and he crossed his arms in a haughty gesture. “Thank you,” he said with a small nod.

The taillights on the blue car several lengths in front of her bloomed red. She gasped as she saw telltale lights flashing on the side of the road by the shoulder, and she slammed on the brake. Derek stuck his hand out against the dash to catch himself as she shaved 20 MPH off the speedometer in a matter of seconds.

She glanced at the parked police car as they passed. The policeman had already pulled somebody over. He sat in the front seat of his car, scribbling notes on a pad of paper while a depressed-looking blond woman sat in a pickup truck in front of him, her forehead on the steering wheel and her shoulders slumped. As soon as the flashing lights sprawled in her rear view mirror, Meredith jammed her foot on the accelerator and resumed her normal cruising speed.
“You know,” Derek said as he resettled in his seat, “If you can see them, it's too late, anyway. If you're going to speed, you should commit.”

“Shut up,” Meredith told him. “I will rubberneck when I feel like it.”

He snorted. “Yes, dear.”

Another mile passed. He seemed lighter, now, that she'd told him under no uncertain terms what she expected from this weekend, as though the pressure had been lifted, which frustrated her. There never had been any pressure. He'd made up all the freaking pressure by himself. She wished he would have said something, instead of forcing her to pry it out of him. He did that. Assumed and brooded and internalized and—

“Hold up your pinky,” she said in a flash of inspiration.

“What?”

They'd had a few mishaps on both sides over the years. Failures on her part. Failures on his. She knew he was capable of treating an event with good humor when he was in the right mindset for it. She knew it. If she could just... nip the bad thoughts in the bud?

“Just do it,” she commanded.

“Okay...” he said, his voice wary. He showed her his pale hand. He had long, slender fingers, perfect for surgery and other precise movements. His pinky stuck up from his loosely formed fist, and she pictured him with a hoity-toity, British accent. Meredith, he'd say. I'd like a spot of tea.

She fought back a chuckle at the imagery as she curled her pinky around his. He dwarfed her. “We'll try sex if you want to try it, but I want you to pinky swear that if something happens, and we can't, you will not get upset about it,” she said. She glanced at him. He looked... bemused.

“Okay?” She turned her gaze back to the road. “I don't want my forty-eight hours to involve you being all dark and broody-faced about a problem that isn't even a problem. This is our weekend, and it should be fun.”

He made a soft noise that sounded suspiciously like a laugh, buried under pounds of restraint and the rumble of the car's engine. “Dark and... broody-faced?” he said.

She ignored his maybe-mirth. “Pinky swear, or even if you want to, and even if I want to, nothing happens this weekend,” she said. “We'll be celibate. Like monks or... other celibate people.”

“Celibate? Monks?”

She nodded. “Yes. You won't get any if you don't swear.”

His pinky shifted. She tightened her grip, not that she could tighten her pinky all that much, but... it was the thought that counted. “That's... cruel and unusual,” he said. “Our first weekend alone together, ever, and you want to make it celibate?”

“I mean it,” she said. “I'd rather chop out performance anxiety altogether than deal with it in flagrante.”

He chuckled. Outright. “And you're very bossy.”

“Yes. Yes, I am,” she said. “I keep you in line, remember? And you haven't sworn yet.”
“I swear.”

“Pinky swear!”

He sighed. His pinky squeezed hers. “I pinky swear, Meredith.”

She raised her eyebrows. “Swear what?” she prompted.

“That I won't get upset if I can't—”

“If we can't,” she corrected.

He rolled his eyes. “If we can't have sex.”

She nodded. “Okay, then,” she said, satisfied.

“Are you going to ask me to put it all together, now?” he said.

“Shut up,” she said.

He sighed. “Yes, dear,” he said, his mock-weariness making her feel gooey and warm inside, though she didn't reply.

She couldn't stop herself from smiling as the normality of it, of Derek being Derek, consumed her. Every so often, he would remind her that the man she'd fallen in love with was still there, trapped, but there, waiting to break out from under if he could just get some relief, and she cherished those moments. He was playing, which was what she'd been trying to instill since that first yellow punch buggy. He was playing, and joking a little, even after a discussion about potential mechanical failures during sex, and... that was good. Right?

Yes, that was good. Weight lifted from her body as she pushed the car through the miles. They could do this. Have a vacation. A full forty-eight hours of no doom, gloom, or personal injury, even if things did go belly-up in the sex department.

Silence stretched. He shifted. “Can I have my pinky back, now?” he said, his voice soft.

“I guess so,” she said with a smile. She relinquished her grip, and he pulled his hand away.

He sighed, and he leaned back in his seat. “Hmm,” he said. “I don't think I've pinky sworn since I was...” His voice trailed away. He shook his head. “I don't even remember.”

“Megan Swift,” Meredith said. “Second grade.”

He looked at her, his eyebrows raised. “Oh?”

She nodded. “Yep,” she said. “I wanted to make sure she'd pay me back my lunch money.”

“You pinky swore over lunch money?” he said.

“You pinky swore over lunch money?” he said.

“Yeah, I...” She searched her memories as she watched the road. “She needed to pay for...” She scrunched her nose. She remembered her friend. Brunette. Always wore her hair in a curly, twisty ponytail with a pink ribbon that spilled down her back. She'd been short for her age. A stick, like Meredith. She could feel the money exchanging hands, but the memory stopped there. “I don't remember. I do remember my mother wouldn't give me any extra ever, though, no matter what the reason, which is why I needed the pinky swear. My mother said I needed to learn to budget, and if I couldn't budget, I could starve.”
“But... you were seven,” he said. “Six?”

“I was eight, I think,” Meredith said. That had been at the tail end of second grade. Her teacher had been Miss Finch, an elderly woman who'd never married and never seemed to leave the school.

Derek shook his head. He looked horrified. “That's...”

“How I grew up,” Meredith said. She shrugged. “So?” She rubbed his arm. “Spill.”

“Spill what?”

“Pinky swearing,” she said. “When was your last?”

“I really don't remember,” he replied.

She grinned. “Must not have been a worthy pinky swear, then. Pinky swears are supposed to be big things, you know.”

“Really,” Derek said, a playful look on his face. “And you're the expert?”

“Yep, I am,” Meredith said. She splayed her palms and spread them midair for emphasis. “Big things.”

He snapped his fingers. “That was it,” he said.

“What was it?”

“Amelia,” he said. “She made me pinky swear to help her with her science fair project that year. I thought it was stupid, but I humored her. I...” His mirth fell away like shattered glass. His expression flattened as he presumably dipped further into the memory.

“What is it?” she said.

“The year before, I blew her off,” he said.

“Derek?” she prodded.

He shook his head, swallowed, and wiped his face with his hand. He took a deep breath. “Sorry, I...” he began, only to fade out again.

She touched his leg. “What, Derek?”

He stared out the window into the gray and rolling green beyond, expressionless. He blinked. “The year before. That was when Dad died,” he said, flat again. Sapped of emotion. She'd seen him do it before. I was fifteen when my dad died, he'd said. I was there. Like he was reading a list. Like he needed to separate himself from the event in order to process it.

“I blew Amy off to help some girl I knew at school,” he continued. “I got beat up for my trouble. Dad came home from the store to lecture me, and he made me go back with him afterward with Amelia to make up the time he'd lost by coming home. Two men were in the store arguing at the cash register with Peter when we got there.”

She tightened her grip on the steering wheel. This was the most he'd ever told her about it. Ever. She swallowed as her eyes watered. “Peter?” she said, trying to keep her voice even. She tried not to imagine his younger self walking into his father's store, one foot in front of the other. The little bell over the door would have rung, and he'd have smiled at this Peter person—“Dad's clerk,” Derek said. “He was young. In his early twenties. He died, too.”

She squeezed Derek's shoulder.

“I'm... okay,” he said. He shook his head as if to clear it. “I haven't thought about that in... a while.”

“You don't look okay,” she said, her voice soft. Or, he did look okay. If one were to call this strange emotionless demeanor okay, which it wasn't. It wasn't okay for a passionate person like Derek to be dead like this.

He frowned at her, swallowed. “I tried to stop the bleeding, but I couldn't. He showed me how, but I think it was just to distract me from realizing he was dying.”

“Your dad?” she said. “Or Peter?”

“Dad,” he said. “Peter was already dead.”

She hadn't realized he'd seen two people murdered, not one, or that his dad had lingered long enough to speak to Derek at all, let alone to provide supervision over his own first aid. That seemed, in her mind, worse. Worse than if it had been quick, with no suffering. Sort of like she felt about her mother. Wasting away. Not knowing who she was half the time.

He held out his hands, the heel of his right palm pressed downward as if to show her how he'd tried to staunch the bleeding, and she watched his younger version in her head, holding closed a gaping, bloody wound. Where? If his dad had been speaking, but had still died in front of Derek before help had arrived despite pressure on the wound... she guessed the liver. Or bowel. Both were very ugly wounds. Wounds a fifteen-year-old should never see.

“The light in his eyes just... went out,” Derek said, his face blank, but his words thickening with grief, “And then Amy was screaming, and screaming, and—”

She gave his shoulder a shake. “Derek,” she said, a lasso back to the present. As vivid as her own imagining, his had to be worse. Visceral. He grunted as she shook him, and then he blinked. He looked at her.

“That's why I became a doctor, you know,” he said baldly.

“Because of your dad?”

“He bled out right underneath me, and I didn't know how to fix it. I wanted to be able to fix it.” He sighed. A dark expression overtook his face as the last of his enforced detachment faded from sight. “I wanted to save people.”

“You do, Derek,” she said. “You save lots of people.”

He shook his head. “Not anymore.”

“What do you mean?”

“I don't save anyone, anymore,” he said. “I just do budget work.” He said the word budget as though it were synonymous with cancer or plague. He made a deep sound in his throat. An ugh. Sort of. He blinked, and his dour expression bled away. He gave her a guilty, soft smile, and the jagged pain in his eyes lessened. “Can we change topics?” he said, his voice thick with emotion. “This is not a relaxation subject for me.”
“Sorry about the pinky swear,” she said.

“You didn't know,” he replied. “I didn't even know until I thought about it. It's okay.”

She bit her lip as she watched the dreary road. The clouds far beyond had a thick, almost black quality to them, and the air between the clouds and the earth was misty, moving blue. Rain ahead. In a disorienting, shimmering wall. They were driving right into it. The radio station they'd been listening to started to hiss and crackle with static. They still had a few minutes before they drove into the cloudburst, though.

“I'm glad you're in my car,” she blurted.

I'm glad you're in my bathtub, a ghost of her past echoed.

As soon as she'd said it, she blushed. He looked at her. “It's your car, now?” he said, confused.

“No, I mean...” She sighed. “I mean I know the road sucked, but... I'm glad it brought you here. To me. In the... In the car. Your car. Not my car.”

That sounded even worse. She'd tried. She'd tried, damn it, and now her freaking face was on fire. He stared at her. She wrung the steering wheel with her fingers. “That was... like criminally corny,” she said. Why did nobody ever shut her up? “Sorry.”

He shifted in his seat. The leather squeaked. He pressed his shoulder into the back of the seat, and he faced her instead of the road. He grinned at her, and he reached across the parking brake to stroke her cheek. She smiled. “It wasn't, Meredith,” he said, and he seemed... pleased. Pleased that she would say something like that, even if it was as corny as a freaking bowl of popcorn. “I'm...” He swallowed “Likewise.” He tucked a loose strand of hair behind her ear. She fought the urge to close her eyes and lean into the touch. She had to watch the road. Freaking... Watch. Watch, the road.

“I'm glad you're in my car,” he said, his voice soft as he twisted her words back on her.

She felt his gaze on her. The air smelled wet and earthy with the coming rain, and she inhaled. Her nose crinkled. She didn't know when or how it happened, precisely, but one moment, she was fine, and the next, her stomach lurched.

“Oh,” she said.

His eyebrows raised. “Oh?”

“Oh, I need to pull over,” she said as her throat thickened with nausea.

“What?” he said. “Why?”

She didn't even try to explain as she yanked the steering wheel hard to the right, pulled into the slow lane, and then out of traffic. The wheels of the Cayenne had barely stopped moving as she clawed at her seatbelt, almost fell out of the car, scurried to the wet grass beside the road, and heaved until it felt like her stomach had popped loose from her innards. “Oh,” she moaned. She held the back of her palm to her mouth as she leaned over in the grass. The smell of vomit made her heave again.

The sky overhead seemed almost black with oncoming rain. Not yet, but soon. Wind buffeted her small body. Goosebumps crinkled her skin as the chilly air gripped her. His car door opened slowly. She lost track of him after that while her gut quivered, and then his warm palm pressed against her back. He rubbed her in slow, comforting circles.

She wiped her lips and stumbled away from the chunky puddle in the grass she'd created. She curled into his arms as she swallowed away the remains of her nausea. She grimaced as she pressed her face against his soft, blue shirt. Ugh. Bile burned her throat. Now, she needed a freaking toothbrush. And some mints. At least her stomach felt good as new, now. Not even a flip or a flop of a flip-flop told her she'd just barfed. She didn't even know what had triggered that one, but whatever it had been, it was gone.

She'd puked. All freaking week. In the morning. In the afternoon. At night. There'd been no rhyme or reason to it, and definitely no schedule. Morning sickness was such a freaking misnomer. She wanted to hit whoever had come up with the term for misleading the masses. She wondered if the schedule thing had been a crazy fluke. A crazy fluke she wished she could return to, because that was so much better than this random upchuck of the day.

“That was not on schedule,” he said softly.

“Thanks,” she said between gasps as she recovered. “Thanks for observing that.”

His embrace tightened. “I thought you only puked in the morning?”

“Apparently I puke whenever, now!” she said. “I don't know. I've been puking all week.”

He kissed her forehead. “Give me the map.”

“What? No.”

“Give me the map, Mere,” he said. “I'll drive.”

“I thought you were sleepy.”

“I'm not sleepy,” he assured her.

“You said specifically that you were sleepy,” she said as they shuffled back to the car. “You used the word lethargic.”

He chuckled. “Well, I'm awake, now,” he said. “There've been like a thousand conversation points since then. Plus, you just threw up.”

“Well, I'm sorry my vomit ruined your would be nap,” she snapped. She wiped her mouth again, trying not to grimace at the acrid taste lingering in her mouth.

“It's not. It didn't. I meant...” he stuttered, and then he relaxed as he found his words. “I mean you're pregnant. You threw up because you're pregnant with our child, and that's...”

She looked up at him and grasped the look on his face as he searched for a word. He had a wide-eyed look of awe to him. Like he'd forgotten something monumental, had just been reminded of it, and it... staggered him. Like the enormity of it was a hulking boulder he couldn't hope to wield in his hands. “Really neat?” she said with a smile, finishing his sentence for him when he didn't.

The wind buffeted them. She stood in the shelter of his taller figure. He stared down at her. His blue eyes were bright, and they twinkled. He kissed her on the forehead again. “Yeah,” he said, his voice rough with emotion. But... good emotion.

She surrendered the driver's seat to him without further protest. He glanced at the map and at Richard's directions to see where they were going as he settled himself into the seat. He had to crank the seat back several inches and adjust the steering wheel. He looked at her with a cheerful shrug as if to say, What? You're very tiny. He turned the key in the ignition. The car rumbled to life. He stared in the side and rear view mirrors, back and forth, like a windshield wiper, decided it was safe, apparently, and the car kicked to life. Inertia pushed her back against the seat.

Within moments, he'd settled the car back into a steady pace, about ten miles per hour slower than her habitual speed, but that was okay. She leaned back in the seat and let herself relax. She'd been go, go, going all week, and now she wasn't going, and it felt... nice.

They hit the rain they'd been approaching within moments. A raindrop plinked on the roof of the car. Once, twice, and then the whole car sounded like it'd been swallowed by an ice shaker, forever doomed to make martinis or something. Derek flipped on the windshield wipers, but otherwise paid the storm no mind. It was Seattle. It freaking rained. All the damned time.

She watched his profile in the darkening cabin. He was driving. He hadn't done that in a long while. His attire was the epitome of vacation and relaxation. He wore stonewashed, thready jeans that had seen better days, old, beat up cross trainers, and a dark but threadbare navy shirt that brought out his eyes. He'd gotten his hair cut recently, but the length, she thought, was perfect. He had just a bit of wavy curl at the end, a hint of disarray that needed taming. He'd shaved that morning, so the skin on his face was mostly smooth. Almost perfect for kissing.

Static filled the cabin. He frowned at the radio dial and shifted to a new station.

"You're looking at me," he said.

She shrugged. "You're my husband, and you're sexy. I like looking."

"So, it's a good look," he said, "And not a Derek is a ticking time bomb and might freak out on our first vacation look."

She would have kissed him were it not for the recent vomit. She settled for stroking his shoulder. "Definitely a good look," she said. "No time bombs. Though, I was a little worried before we got the sex stuff worked out."

"I'm okay," he said, his voice soft. "Thank you for... Thanks."

She smiled. "I know." She squeezed his shoulder and settled back in her seat to look. His lip twitched with a pleased grin. "Our first vacation is going to rock, you know."

He glanced at her. His eyes glittered in the dim light. "Oh, will it?" he said.

She nodded. "I have it on good authority."

"Good," he said. "I could really use a rocking vacation right now."

"Well, you'll have one," she said. She grinned. "Guaranteed."

"Hmm. Will I catch fish?"

"Yep," she said. "Dozens."

"Will my wife join me in the boat?" he said. The hope in his voice made her smile.

"Well, she probably won't fish. But she might come along."
“Hmm,” he said. He nodded, a pleased look on his face.

She wrinkled her nose. The radio station he'd flipped to was... not good. Some... country thing. He hated country. She despised country. He must have stopped when he'd hit identifiable noise instead of static. She jammed her thumb on the power button, and the weak strains of twanging guitars faded into the thunderous rain pounding on the roof.

“So, what do you think?” she said.

He glanced at her again. “About what?”

“Do I get credit for going camping with you on this rocking vacation?” she said.

He snickered. “Meredith, I love you. I do,” he said. “But this is not camping.”

She folded her arms over her chest. “It is, too,” she said with a pout.

“It's not in a tent, and there's working plumbing.”

“But there won't be any Internet,” she countered.

“That's... sad,” he decided. He shook his head as he mock-pondered her shame. “That's sad that you think camping is the mere absence of Internet.”

“What? We turned our phones off. We didn't bring any laptops. Our beepers are at home in the bedroom. We're driving to the middle of nowhere—”

“Lake Cushman isn't the middle of nowhere,” he interjected. “It's Lake Cushman.”

“Thank you,” she said. She kissed his temple, recent vomit be damned. “That's helpful information.”

He didn't seem to mind. “Well, it's not nowhere,” he said with a frown.

“It's way more nowhere than I'm used to,” she said. “I grew up in Seattle and Boston, you know.”

“Brooklyn and Manhattan. I win.”

“You do not win just because you're from New York,” she said.

She giggled. “But Karmaan Ghias don't count for ten?”

His fist jabbed her shoulder lightly, and she jumped at the unexpected contact. A little shriek fell from her lips. “Punch buggy red. No return,” he said. He looked pointedly at her. “And, oh, look. It's an old one. That counts for two, so I'm ahead. 1-2, my favor.” He grinned as he turned back to the road.

Her mouth tumbled open, and she gaped as she watched a rusted, tomato-colored Beetle putter behind them in the right lane. The hood had been patched with gunmetal gray. “That's...” she stuttered. “That's...”

“An old one,” he said again, as if to rub salt in the wound of her defeat.

“You're mean,” she said, staring with incredulity his shit-eating grin. How the hell had he whipped this whole thing around on her? “You're a mean, mean man.”

He snickered. “I gave you a full twenty seconds to notice it,” he said.

“How am I supposed to notice a car when I'm looking at you?”

“I don't know. Should we give me a handicap?” He waggled his eyebrows at her. “I am pretty hard not to stare at.”

She snorted with laughter, and then she jabbed him in the arm. Hard. His whole body swayed in the seat with the impact, and he grunted. “Hey, what was that for?” he said. “I said no return!”

“I'm taking out a loan against future sightings,” she grumbled.

“A punch on the basis of a car you haven't even seen yet? Seriously?”

“Yep,” she said. “And I'm allowed.”

He laughed. “You are, are you?”

“I am. And don't you dare give me a lecture about slippery slopes.”

“Bossy.”

“You said that already.”

She rolled her eyes. “Whatever, Mr. Manhattan.”

“McBossy,” he retorted.

“I'm not calling you McDreamy just because you McNamed me,” she said. “And since when do you McName people?”

“I don't know.” He shrugged. “Since now?”

“Well, stop it. It makes you sound like Cristina, and that's just weird. You two exist in separate spaces in my head, and you're threatening my reality.”

He shook his head, amusement lighting his face. “I love you,” he said.

“I guess you can keep talking, then.”

“Good,” he replied. “Because we have at least another hour to kill until we get there.” He glanced at the clock on the dash, and then the odometer. “More like an hour and a half.”

She grinned. “License plate game?”

“If we must,” he said with a mock-weary sigh belied by his smile. “At least it's less violent.”

“Oh,” she said. “Oh, pull over.”

He frowned. “Again?”

“Yeah. Just... Pull over!”
He barely had time to stop the car before she darted into the pouring rain. Her feet slipped and slid on the wet shoulder. Pavement became gravel became slick, muddy grass. Rain plastered her shirt to her body as she slurched through a sucking puddle. Then she threw up, and the last of her lunch emptied onto the ground.

The rain slamming down on her stopped its assault. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw him standing there, holding an umbrella over her. She straightened. Her stomach roiled. She leaned over and barfed again. Right by his feet. She grabbed his shirt to keep her balance. At least he didn't flinch or move. When she'd finished, she trembled, and her stomach hurt. What the hell was causing this? Maybe, something she'd eaten disagreed with her. There'd been no smells to set off this or the last barf session. None that she'd noticed, anyway. She wanted to go back to the schedule.

“I'm sorry,” he said softly over the rain, and he pulled her into a tight hug under the umbrella. He guided her back to the car, and he held the umbrella over the gap between the car and the door while she settled herself back in the seat. He didn't move until she'd closed the door.

She spat water from her lips and wiped the raindrops out of her eyes, shivering. The rain thundered on the roof. It made a steep crescendo as he opened the driver side door and he resettled himself to drive. When he closed the door, the thunderous pounding muted. He turned the key in the ignition, aimed the vents at her, flipped a switch, and then adjusted dials on the dash. Blowing, frigid air became warm. Soothing.

“Thanks,” she said. She closed her eyes, ready to go again, but he didn't move the car. She felt his gaze on her. “I'm okay,” she said.

“Do you still feel nauseous?”

“No, it's sudden, and then I puke, and then I'm fine,” she said. “It only sticks around if I try not to throw up.”

“Oh,” he said.

He sounded really concerned. She couldn't decide whether that was adorable, or whether he deserved to suffer for this. This was his super-powered bully sperm's fault. Right? She cupped her hands over her stomach. The churning stopped after a few moments. Sort of like a switch had been thrown. One moment, sick as though she'd been on a boat in the middle of the Atlantic, braving fifteen feet swells. The next? Dry, solid land, and not a single twitch or quiver. She sighed and let her hands slide lower. Underneath her belly button. Warmth seeped through her shirt as she pressed.

Baby, she told herself, hoping the new life below would hear. If you could settle down this weekend, that'd be nice.

Nothing answered, of course. She sighed.

“It's really okay,” she assured him. “Keep going. I want to get there.”

He stared at her. “Are you sure?”

“Mmm.” She nodded. “Keep going. I'm fine, now.”

A chuff of air released from his mouth. He shook his head, and the car started moving.

“What?” she said.
“You really are very bossy,” he said.

“You love me for it.”

“Hmm, I do,” he agreed. “So much.” The delight on his face made her shiver. She wanted a toothbrush. And she wanted the cabin. And then she wanted him. Badly.

“Me, too,” she said, hypnotized.

He snickered. “I'm glad you love yourself, Mere. That's important.”

“Just shut up, and drive, jackass,” she snapped, but she couldn't keep the grin off her face.

“Fine, McBossy,” he replied. “But when we get there, there’d better be some sex.”

“I just threw up next to your shoe, and you want sex?” she said.

He nodded. “Attempted sex that I won't get upset about if it flops,” he assured her with a grin.

“I'd say your libido is still pretty healthy.”

He laughed. “Sex? Please?”

She smiled. “I think that can be arranged. After I find a toothbrush.”

“Good,” he said with a nod. “I want my newest pinky swear to get a work out.”

(Can you feel my love?)

Gravel crunched under the tires as the Cayenne crawled through the darkness. A sprawling cave of trees, fauna, and other blurry shapes surrounded them. The scenery beyond the dim glow of the car's headlights seemed indistinct and inky black. The rain had stopped as they'd gotten closer to the lake, but the thick, frothy cloud cover had guaranteed an early sunset. Far outside the city, the sky at night was dark. Black. Not glowing purple. Like the sky at Derek's trailer, she bet the lake was a perfect place for stargazing on clearer nights. Maybe, even better.

The car rumbled to a stop. Meredith stared out the window. The road stopped abruptly at a pile of bracken and ferns and... other plant stuff that she wasn't woodsy enough to identify. A narrow walk proceeded to the right, where there was a small, glowing light the size of a soup can about fifty feet in the distance. The light framed a small set of steps and a large, boxy shadow. Between the soup can and the car, though? Black. She wasn't even sure if she was looking at grass, gravel, or dirt in the sea of ink beyond her window.

“Here we are,” Derek said, his voice entirely too cheerful and sure considering she knew he wasn't sure at all. They'd seen a sign on the road that he'd had to chop his speed in half and flip on his high beams to read. Supposedly, the Chief's cabin was at the end of Cedarwood Place, and, well, they were at the end of this ambiguous road for which they'd identified the first three letters. Ced. Ced what?

Who knew for sure? But she was hungry and tired and willing to roll with it for now.

“Finally,” she said. She shifted in her seat and popped her seatbelt loose. The belt rolled back over her shoulder. Her stomach growled. She wanted to stand and stretch and not be in this stupid car anymore, no matter how nice the company. She wanted to eat, too.

He turned off the engine and the car cabin lit up with a soft glow that made the outside look even blacker. “Don't you grumble at me,” he said. His keys jingled, and the seat squeaked as he turned to face. “What did I do?”

“It took us an extra year to get here!”

He smirked. “You were the navigator. I'm blameless.”

“And I told you to turn on Hemlock!” she said.

He nodded. “Five miles too early, yes.”

“Well, I'm not psychic,” she said. “The Chief's directions said turn on Hemlock. How was I supposed to know there was a Hemlock Court, Hemlock Lane, Hemlock Circle, and a Hemlock Street all in different places? That's ridiculous!”

“By checking the physical map first?”

His sage-but-laughing look made her want to strangle him. She jabbed her finger at him and poked him in the chest. He grunted, though it was more an amused sound than an indignant one. “You, shut up,” she said. “These people here are too obsessed with wood! It's their fault.”

His eyes narrowed. His cheerful grin turned into a leer. “Really,” he said as he looked her up and down.

“Yes, really, I...” Her voice trailed away as she thought about what she'd said. Obsessed with wood. “Derek, seriously? Are you five?”

He winked. “Admit it.”

“Admit what? That I said wood?”

“You can't deal with life when you don't have a GPS,” he said.

She crossed her arms over her chest. “I can, too!” she protested. “I told you to turn on Hemlock!”

“Too early.”

“Not that early.”

“Five miles too early!” he said. “I had to use the map.”

“You could have just pulled a u-ey and gone back to the main road,” she countered.

“The map told me a shortcut.”

“Which wasn't short,” she said. It felt like he'd driven them around the entire freaking lake. Possibly more than once. And he'd seen another damned punch buggy and walloped her because she'd been too busy poring over Richard's directions, trying to figure out where they'd gone wrong, to see it first. They'd ended their trip at 3-4 his favor instead of a tie because of that.

He shrugged. “I knew where we were.”

“Lost,” she said. “That's where we were.”
He grinned. “Well, it was scenic,” he said. “Wasn't it?”

She glowered. “It was long.”

“You saw the lake.”

“I heard my stomach growling more,” she said.

“And it was wood-y,” he said, and she couldn't help but chuckle at his lascivious expression and his what had to be an intentional slip. “Sorry, woodsy.” Her chuckle became a laugh. “Wooded?” he pondered. “Perhaps arboreous would be more appropriate.” She snorted. “And less innuendo-laden.”

“Stop,” she said. She wiped her eyes, convinced tears had formed as she'd cackled at him. “Oh, my god, stop. You are five.”

“Horny,” he corrected. “And the people here are obsessed with wood. You said it, not me.”

“Horny and five,” she amended. She smiled at him, leaned, and she kissed him. She relished the small groan that loitered in his throat. His warmth swept her up, and she couldn't help but lean in further. She clutched his shirt. Soft cotton ran underneath her fingertips. Even after hours in the car, he smelled fresh and musky and... hers. All hers. How did he do that?

She felt kind of icky, to be honest. They'd stopped at a rest stop shortly after she'd finished puking, and she'd been able to brush her teeth. Then, about thirty minutes ago, when they'd finally stopped to ask for directions, she'd washed her face in a convenience store bathroom and grabbed a bag of chips to sate her growling stomach. Except the chips hadn't done more than provide momentary distraction for the gnawing hunger, now she tasted like French onion dip, and, really, she just didn't want to be in the freaking car anymore.

He stared for a moment as she pulled away, as though she'd knocked him senseless, though that may have been the onion taste. Or, maybe not. He blinked. “You promised me attempted sex,” he said, his voice low and throaty, and it sent an anticipatory thrill meandering down her spine. Apparently, he was impervious to onion breath.

She shook her head. She leaned back, licked her lips, and popped open the door. A chorus of crickets and other nighttime insects swept into the cabin along with... frogs? Or toads. Something croaking. Over and over. “Let's at least get the car unloaded before you jump me,” she said with a laugh as she slid out of the car to her feet and into the darkness. Gravel churned under her shoes as she found her balance, and she groaned as she leaned against the car and stretched her aching muscles.

“Fine,” he grumbled. “Fine, but after suitcases, there'd better be sex.”

She smiled across the car cabin at him. “I think your record is broken,” she said.

“I want sex,” he said, and his eyes crinkled as he grinned back at her with delight. “I want, want sex. I'm relishing it. Okay?”

She stared at him. He looked so happy. And himself, for once. The shadows she'd gotten used to on his face had disappeared over the course of their long drive, as if, the further he'd gotten from Seattle, the less the world weighed him down. They'd laughed and joked all the way down the highway, and it'd been nice. Nice to play. And talk. And be Post-it married without anything else getting in the way.
“I’m glad,” she said, her voice shaking with emotion. She gripped the door handle and squeezed because she couldn’t reach him at this distance. “I’m really glad, Derek.”

He popped open his door and followed her to the ground. “I love you,” he said, “even though you’re a horrible navigator.”

“And I love you,” she said, “even though you're horny and five.”

They stared at each other across the void of the car cabin for several seconds, and many things were said without words as the nighttime world around them fell away. Good things. You're mine. I love you. I'm so lucky. I'm glad you're here. They both closed their doors at the same time, and the night swallowed them whole as the car's cabin light blinked out. For a moment, she stood, dazed, her head swirling as she swallowed. Who would have ever thought, years ago, when she’d been seeing Dr. Wyatt to become whole and healed, she’d have made it here?

She stretched before she moved. First her arms. Her shoulder blades and triceps pulled as she grabbed her elbows one at a time and yanked them behind her head. While she did that, she lunged to return some feeling to her calves.

Something snapped twigs and brush in the undergrowth in the distance, and it made the hairs on her neck stand on end as she leaned against the black SUV and stretched her quads. Deer, maybe? Wind creaked through the wet trees, and a fat drop of water fell on her nose. She blinked and looked up. Nothing but rustling black.

A breeze ruffled her hair, and more twigs snapped in the distance. Leaves rustled. The air smelled wet and full of the promise of rain. Her nostrils flared in the dark. She closed her eyes, and for a moment, all she did was listen as the cool air tickled the nape of her neck. There were no traffic sounds or hints of civilization. Just... emptiness. And the whisper of the wind through the leaves. And an owl, mournful in the distance.

Another twig snapped, and she squinted at the darkness. Had to be a deer. A single one. Or maybe a herd. She wished the light was better so she could see. She wanted to see deer. She loved watching them in the early morning on the deck by Derek's trailer while she sipped her first cup of coffee. They came close. Quiet. In small groups. They would stare at her with their delicate brown eyes and wet-looking noses, only to shoot off into the distance in response to some sound only they could hear, or some threat only they could determine.

Derek would love it here, she decided, and she'd been glad the Chief had suggested this place. Derek needed open space and quiet to relax. To not stress.

“So, what all should we bring in from the car? Can we leave your fishing stuff out here?” she called over the hulking SUV as, at last, she walked to the rear of the vehicle.

She kept her hand on the cool metal of the car's frame as she moved. The feel of the car gave her some orientation in the black. Her night vision had kicked in enough to identify shapes, at least. Tall trees surrounded them, reaching up into the sky, and at their swaying feet, she felt small and insignificant. She kicked a large rock with her shoe by accident as she moved. When she shuffled to the trunk, Derek wasn't there. She pulled open the door. The rear light came on.

She frowned when she realized Derek hadn't replied. At all. She began, “I would assume you'd want to take that stuff directly to the...” only to trail away. He still hadn't arrived. “Dock...” She glanced beyond the car windows. With the light on in the car, and the relentless darkness outside, she couldn't see a thing through the tinted glass.
“Derek?” she called. Maybe, he'd stopped to stretch. She listened to his footsteps and watched his shadow move.

He reached the corner on his side by the trunk. His breaths hit the air, steady and even. “Okay,” he said, his voice quiet.

“Do you have a flashlight or something? I can't see a thing out here except the car trunk.” He liked to carry a little two-inch long LED light sometimes, particularly at his trailer at night. Things got freaking dark there when the moon wasn't out, which, in Seattle, with the copious cloud cover, was actually a common occurrence.

A pause. “In my pocket.”

She hauled her rolling suitcase from the pile in the trunk. She grabbed his suitcase next. His fishing gear clanked and crashed in a cascade that made her wince. She hoped she hadn't broken anything. “Umm,” she said as the last box tumbled to the floor of the trunk, “Sorry.” What the hell had he done? Stacked all the suitcases like he was playing Tetris or something?

He didn't respond or make a snarky comment about her clumsiness, and her guilt quickly bled away. Surely, his gear wasn't that breakable, and he didn't seem disturbed by the prospect of his careful equipment stacks being disrupted. He stood by the corner of the trunk, gripping the frame of the car, breathing.

She marveled at the weight of his bag as she hauled it over the lip of the bumper. He'd managed to pack just as much as she had, for once. Maybe, more. On his consult trips, he tended to stuff a few things in a duffel and run, but he'd been meticulous this time. On Thursday night, before she'd fallen into bed to sleep, she'd watched as he'd tucked about thirty thousand pairs of socks along the edges of his suitcase, buried underneath piles of clothing. Lots of layers. Undershirts. T-shirts. A fleece vest. A sweatshirt. And a thick, lined coat that seemed too heavy for the end-of-summer they were experiencing.

What's all that for? she'd said.

You'll need layers, he'd replied.

Why?

Trust me. You'd rather have them and not need them. It's a camping thing.

She'd shrugged and packed heavily as he'd suggested, though she still didn't get it. It was chilly at night, yes. But not arctic. Though, she decided as she frowned, it was a lot colder out here than it'd been in Seattle. A shiver crawled through her. Perhaps they'd climbed elevation a bit? And, maybe, he planned for them to spend at least one night outside in a tent, if only to say he'd roughed it at least a little. She hadn't asked him about his specific plans. She'd been so busy simply getting through the week, she hadn't even thought about it. She grinned. A tent could be fun. Maybe. She wasn't sure if he'd packed one under all the other crap in the trunk.

“Here,” she said as she pushed his suitcase at him. Gravel spit under the suitcase's wheels. “Take your bag.” He skipped backward a step, but the suitcase still thumped his knee and fell to its side. “Derek? Flashlight?”

For a long moment, he didn't speak. With slow, exaggerated precision, he shifted, and he reached into his back pocket. The small LED light she'd remembered him carrying flashed to life. The jiggle of the light as his palm shook gave his state of mind away, and her stomach felt like it was sinking as she watched him try to give the light to her. He couldn't keep his hand still. She felt like an idiot for not noticing sooner when she looked at his face in the dim light, really looked, and saw unadulterated, nauseated terror loitering in his wide-eyed, glassy gaze.

“Here,” he said, his voice breathless as he gave her the flashlight. His fingers brushed hers as he did so, and a lump formed in her throat. He'd been so warm, moments ago, and now? Now, his limbs had had frozen through with anxious chill as his body pulled his blood supply to his heart and his core.

What on earth had set him off? He'd been so happy. Her eyes watered. She shook her head. It didn't matter, now.

She swallowed as she slammed shut the trunk, plunging them into darkness, save for the white cone of brilliance offered by the LED. She bent to grab his suitcase along with hers, because she doubted he possessed the presence of mind to carry it himself, and she then positioned the LED so that it was jammed between her hand and the suitcase handle in her right hand. She could steer the light a little by squeezing her palm.

“You know what, we've got our clothes,” she said, forcing her voice to stay low and calm and soothing. “We can get the rest in the morning. Let's go inside.”

“Okay,” he said on a tight exhale, but he didn't move with her.

She swung around after several steps toward the soup can light and urged him on. He took a step after what felt like an eon of stillness, but that one stride looked as though it were a fight against the earth to keep it from swallowing him. Like it was a struggle to force himself to follow her. His fight-or-flight had kicked in, except flight had become freeze in terror when he'd realized he couldn't see to run anywhere, or to identify where the mysterious threat resided. It was written all over his footsteps and his posture and his shaky voice. She gripped their suitcases and kept urging him onward, hoping her voice would help and maybe give him an anchor. He didn't seem annoyed by her constant peppering of requests to keep moving.

They made it up the walk, which, thankfully, was paved and made for easy suitcase rolling and for frightened shuffling. They moved out of the well of blackness, and into the small sanctuary offered by the soup can light, which she realized was actually a glass lamp held in place by a shiny brass frame. She hauled the suitcases up the steps, grunting. The gold numbers posted by the door said 3137. Thank god. This was the Chief's place. Unless they'd somehow ended up on 3137 Cedarwood Court, or Cedarwood Lane, or Cedarwood Circle, or Cedarwood Street, or some other Cedarwood Something, named like all the freaking Hemlocks in a tree parade. The people here were obsessed with wood, damn it. She refused to claim a bad navigator rap for that.

“Do you have the keys?” she said as he shuffled behind her. She flicked off his little flashlight and slipped it into her pocket.

“Yes,” he said, but he didn't move.

The frightened verbal tremor in that one syllable made her want to throw her arms around him and never let go. But the situation would get better if they could move inside, first. That way, she hoped whatever had caused him to fall into panic mode would cease, and he could recover instead of linger and suffer like this.

“Can you get them out?” she prodded, trying to force him to function.

His nostrils flared as though he fought a wave of panic. “I'm okay,” was all he said.
“I'm going to reach into your pocket,” she told him.

Again, he didn't move. He made no comments. Didn't smirk. Didn't joke about the fact that she would be stuffing her hands into his pants, and that felt... Wrong. Discordant and wrong and bad. She closed the short distance between them with a cautious, telegraphed step as she tried not to spook him. She squeezed his shoulder with one hand as she reached into the front left pocket of his jeans, where she saw the telltale bulge of keys. His breaths came in slow, forced inhalations and exhalations. Regulated and even. His body was stiff as a board and shivery, and he swayed, as though she could topple him with a light push. Warm metal jabbed her fingertips. She clutched, and she pulled his keys loose.

She fumbled around the storm door and looked for a key that didn't seem familiar to her. She recognized the house and backdoor keys she'd given him when she'd asked him to move in. The keys to his trailer. Keys to both his Cayenne and her Jeep. A bike lock key. The keys to his office at the hospital, both his new office and his old one, which he'd never officially relinquished. She grabbed the next key and tried it in the door. No. Next one, yes.

The key sank into the keyhole with a metal crunch as the lock's pins fell into place. She turned the key and pushed open the door. She pulled the suitcases through, and then she motioned Derek forward. He followed. Slowly. He felt at the door frame with a shaky palm. Like he'd been blinded and needed grounding.

She felt by the door along the wall for a light switch. When her fingers touched a ripple on the wall, she flicked it. Pitch black plunged around them as the outside light winked off. She winced as his breaths hitched, and he made a scared, I-might-faint sounding gasp. The second switch next to the outside light illuminated the main room of the cabin in welcoming brilliance, and she sighed in relief. She didn't take any time to stare at their surroundings, though.

She pushed the door shut and locked it behind them. The thunk of the deadbolt echoed in the silence. Derek flinched, and his gaze ticked to the door handle. He swallowed, and he seemed to deflate a bit, but not much.

“I'm going to touch you,” she announced.

When he said nothing, she stepped forward and pulled him into her arms. His body shook, and his grip convulsed around her as he pressed his face against her mussed hair and the warmth of her neck. His body jerked as he pulled breaths in and pushed them out with forced, even slowness, and as she rubbed his back, trying to soothe him, she realized he must be counting or something. He held every deep inhalation for three seconds. No more. And he blew his breath out over three more seconds. No more.

“It's okay,” she assured him as he trembled in her arms, wondering what on earth had caused this. “You're okay.” The rasping sound of her skin as she brushed his shirt filled the eerie silence. He trembled. “You're okay, Derek. You're not going to die. You're safe. Nobody will hurt you.”

One of the suitcases fell with a thunk, and he flinched and made a small moan. Her heart squeezed, and she kept whispering at him. She had no idea how long she stayed that way. On the welcome mat. Holding him. His mood gradually began to shift. His controlled breathing tightened into sharp gasps and wet sniffles. He turned away from her and slammed his hand against the wall. Once, again, another time. A hanging picture wavered, and she caught it with her hand before it fell. She let him burn off his tear-streaked frustration in silence.

When he stopped hitting things, she pulled him back into her arms and rubbed his back. “Let me get you a glass of water,” she said, her voice soft. He didn't respond as she wandered away. She wasn't sure where she was going, entirely, until she took a moment to orient herself in the new space.

The main room of the cabin was a wide, airy space. Hulking couches and a beat-up, wooden coffee table surrounded a fireplace on the right wall. Huge paned windows with aging blinds adorned the rear wall and the front wall. To the left, open space across a wooded floor, and then a dining room table. Beyond that, a large kitchen with a marbled center island and a stainless steel fridge and dual ovens. A hallway in the back led to, presumably, the bedroom and bathroom and whatever else was there.

A long handwritten note had been stuck to the fridge. She grabbed it. Curious. Apparently, a man named Ben had stopped by at the Chief’s behest and put some perishable items in the fridge, along with fresh bars of soap in the bathroom, clean towels, and sheets, and all of that. Some bananas and a small pile of tomatoes sat on the back of the counter next to the salt and pepper shakers. This Ben guy had gone all out.

She searched the cabinets for glasses. Jackpot on the first try. She grabbed a thick, heavy glass from the cabinet closest to the sink and ran it under the faucet after testing the temperature with her finger. Good enough.

When she returned to the living room, she found him sitting on the sofa staring into space. He’d turned on the crooked lamp on the end table. His eyes were red and puffy, and though he wasn’t crying, now, the skin on his cheeks glistened, and red irritation spread across his face like sharp, streaky blush. The rest of his pallor was bad, though. Sunken and pale and tired, and the contrast to how he’d been not fifteen minutes ago, happy and alight, made her eyes prick with tears. She blinked, and the blur sharpened once again.

“Derek,” she whispered to keep from surprising him as she wandered into his field of view.

He didn't move. She sat beside him, sinking into the thick cushions. She handed him the glass of water. He took a shaky sip, but didn't speak.

“Are you okay, now?” she said. He clearly wasn't okay. In the broadest sense, that was the stupidest question she could have asked. She supposed what she really meant was, was he still frightened? He seemed... better, at least. Better than he had been.

He looked at her with desolation. Without words, he set the water glass on the coffee table on a coaster, and she accepted him into her arms. He sighed, and she tightened her grip around him. She rubbed his back in slow, soothing circles, just as he'd done for her when she'd been throwing up on the side of the road. She swallowed around the lump in her throat as she stared beyond him at the empty fireplace.

“I love you,” she said.

A breath ratcheted in his chest. He grunted. “I want this to stop happening to me,” he said, his voice dark and tired. Upset.

“I know,” she said, unable to stop her tone from plunging into sadness. “Me, too.”

He didn't respond.

“What scared you?” she said.

He tensed, and silence stretched for moment after moment, as if the mere thought of trying to identify his fears scared him. “There was somebody out there,” he said. He sounded sick. And embarrassed. And all sorts of things she didn't want him to feel on their forty-eight uninterrupted hours.

She didn't bother telling him that there hadn't been anybody out there. Just a deer snapping some twigs as it walked through the brush. Or some other furry wildlife thing. He knew. Which was what made all of this worse. To be scared to the point of gibbering malfunction, and at the same time, knowing that it was your brain playing chemical tricks on you? That would be horrible for anyone. But, for a control-oriented man like Derek, it was breaking. Had already broken. She pulled her fingers through his hair and said nothing. She rested her cheek against his head and sighed, offering as much silent support as she could.

“I'm sorry for ruining this,” he said, and she closed her eyes at his shame-laden tone.

“Don't be sorry,” she said. Her eyes burned over the fact that he felt guilty for this. He felt guilty for everything. He didn't need to feel guilty for this, too. “You're here in the best capacity you can manage, and I love you. It's okay. You're okay. You didn't have a panic attack. That's a start, isn't it? Better than before?”

Which was true, she decided, as she found some hope and lit it bright like a lantern in the dark. He'd nearly incapacitated himself, but he'd kept breathing, and he'd moved when she'd asked, and he hadn't collapsed in a choking mess to claw at his throat or tell her that he felt like he was dying, like she'd seen him do, now, several times.

He cleared his throat. “Replacing the panic thought helps,” he said, his voice rough. “Dr. Wyatt...”

“She taught you that?”

“Yeah,” he said.

“How does it work?”

“I think about... something,” he said. “Something else.”

“Like what?”

He swallowed. “Pickles.”

“Pickles?”

“I keep imagining you want pickles and ice cream in the middle of the night, and I go to get them at the marketplace you like a few blocks down from your house. The pickles, I mean.”

She frowned. “Why would I want pickles?” She usually picked them off her cheeseburgers, and he knew that.

He shrugged. “I know it's cliché. But you're pregnant,” he said, and even then, even when he was upset, the words tinged with a brilliant sort of hope and eagerness that made her heart flutter. She hugged him tightly and didn't move, relishing the warmth as his body reanimated slowly from fear over the passing moments.

“Like cravings?” she said.

“Yeah.”

She grinned, and she kissed him. “Definitely gold stars.”
He wiped his face with his hands and sniffed. “What for?”

“At my beck and call even in your head.”

He didn't answer. He rested in her arms, and she lost track of the crawl of moments as she rubbed his back and his toned bicep. She watched the fireplace with an absent stare. Extreme stress followed by its absence must have pulled on his consciousness. She felt the weight of his body press down on her, and his breaths evened into thick, raspy blasts of warmth that hit her skin. She tried to look at his face, but with him curled against her shoulder, his nose resting at her chest level, all she could see was his silver-dusted curls and the slope of his side and hip. She kissed him while he dozed, unwilling to disturb him.

At least, the Chief's cabin was cozy, she decided as she stared at the living room, unable to do anything else for the moment. It was a bachelor pad, exactly as he'd said, but it was livable, and homey, and just... nice. The two couches didn't match, exactly. They were two different shades of worn green, one more olive, and one more spruce, as though they'd been picked out at separate yard sales, and whoever had chosen them had simply eyeballed the color. A fluffy white shag rug accented with green and black swirls that, again, didn't quite match either of the couches, covered the hardwood floor between the couches and the fireplace. Ornate, flowery carvings crawled up the sides of the fireplace and created a huge mantle over top.

The wood scent of the cabin tickled her nose, and she closed her eyes as she was reminded vaguely of the smell of a freshly cut Christmas tree. Her mother had always used the fake ones that didn't smell at all, and, as Meredith had grown into an adult capable of buying her own tree, she hadn't really understood the appeal of it, anyway. Real trees would only die, turn brown, become giant fire hazards, and shed their needles all over the floor in a sticky, sappy pile. Izzie had gotten a real tree, though, and the whole first floor had filled with the sweet scent. Meredith had found that she kind of... liked it.

The lights and sparkles and other Christmas vomit, she could have done without, but she'd liked the smell. Spruce-y and fresh. When Derek had dragged another Christmas tree over her threshold for their first Post-it Christmas, she hadn't complained.

Post-it Christmas number two would be coming again in four months, she realized. Only four. When had that happened? How? With all the shooting crap and the hurt and pain... She'd pretty much missed the passage of time.

Her free hand roamed to her womb, and she opened her eyes to stare at the fireplace. She could imagine hanging Christmas stockings from the lip of the mantle, and she could imagine a real tree in a stand by the window, decorated with shiny ornaments and a bajillion lights. There would be glittering presents adorned with pretty bows sitting underneath.

She didn't want to suck as a mom, and a big tree and a sparkly Christmas was an important facet of not sucking, she decided. She hadn't had it as a kid. She would make sure baby had it. No matter how ridiculous and fake she felt doing it. She'd have to let Derek explain to her exactly how to do all the happy Christmas vomit stuff. He loved Christmas.

He'd tried to get her to participate more their first year, but he'd backed off a bit when all she'd done was glare at him. They'd compromised, and they'd had that painfully awkward dinner and invited everyone. His idea. Not the awkwardness. The dinner. Mostly his cooking, too, though she'd fooled people by being in the kitchen at opportune times. She'd gotten him that fuzzy blue bathrobe that he liked to wear, and they'd exchanged gifts over coffee the day after Christmas because they hadn't had time on Christmas day. She'd called it progress, then, and he'd happily agreed with her. Progress.
She could make more progress. Right? Her throat thickened with emotion as she stared at the empty mantle and imagined a stocking for Derek, and for Samantha, and at some point in the future... a stocking for baby. She was artistically challenged and couldn't sew. She imagined lopsided, patchwork stockings with sloppy glitter for the names instead of embroidery. Derek's would be big and striped like a candy cane. It would dangle from the mantle all the way to the floor and be large enough to fit a small person. That seemed to fit his Christmas personality. Exuberant and sort of funny and full of cheerful awareness that Christmas should be something enjoyable and full of wide-eyed innocence, rather than something to fear or dread.

She squeezed his body as he slept. She wanted that. For baby. Christmas.

_You could help me shop this year, if you want_, he'd said as they'd given Samantha her first walk. She wanted that. She needed the practice. _For baby._

He stirred after about thirty minutes and groggily smacked his lips. “Fell asleep,” he muttered against her skin.

She grinned and squeezed his shoulder. “You did. Feel better?”

“Well,” was all he said as he pulled away from her, blinking life back into himself, and whether that meant yes or no, she couldn't tell. He rubbed his face and looked slightly dazed. He ran his fingers through his flyaway curls, and she watched as he, at last, had a chance to assess his surroundings. His sleepy gaze traced the fireplace, and the shag rug, and the dinged coffee table. He looked behind them into the dining room, and beyond to the kitchen.

“Richard must be colorblind,” he decided after giving everything a lackadaisical once-over.

She chuckled. “That's common in men, you know.” She kissed him. “Both literally and figuratively.”

He shrugged, an amused look on his face. He glanced at the crooked lampshade beside him before turning to face her. “He kind of needs Adele to function,” he'd said.

He'd told her once about how the Chief had acted on their camping trip to the wilderness, what seemed like eons ago. When she and Derek had been taking some space or whatever because his sister Nancy had twisted him up in knots, which he'd also later explained. And she'd seen the Chief trying to peddle his clothes to be mended and ironed when he and Adele had been separated. And, really...

“He kind of does,” Meredith agreed. “I like it, though. It's very homey. Rustic, even. And it was really nice of him to offer it up for us.”

“It was,” Derek said. He glanced at the crooked lampshade once again, sighed, and reached to set it straight.

She smirked. Neat freak.

“It's got real food,” she said as he continued to look around. They'd been expecting soup and things in the pantry after Richard had said it was fully stocked. On the way there, Derek had suggested that they rough it with whatever was available tonight, and then buy fresh food in the morning after they'd gotten some sleep, and she'd agreed. “Apparently, the Chief had a neighbor drop by with some perishable stuff like fruit,” she continued. “Oh, and clean sheets and soap and stuff. There's a note on the fridge. It says call Ben if we have any problems, and there's a number on the sheet.”
He sniffed, and he gazed at her. The cloudiness of recent sleep had receded, leaving only sharp, aware blue. “Who's Ben?”

She shrugged. “I don't know. The grocery fairy neighbor?”

“Hmm,” he said, at which point, her stomach broke the silence with a burbling, obnoxious growl.

She blushed. “I guess I'm really hungry.”

He nodded, and he rose to his feet with a grimace and stiff movements that told her his body was still asleep, even if his mind wasn't. He wiped his face with his hands again, reached toward the ceiling and stretched, stared for a moment, and then swallowed. “Well, let's fix that,” he decided after a pause. “What was in the kitchen?”

“I don't know,” she said as she rose to join him. “Kitchen stuff.”

“Well, did the grocery fairy bring bread?”

“I don't know,” she said. “Maybe. I saw bananas.”

He glanced at her and gave her a wry grin. “Bananas are not bread,” he informed her. He shook his head and plodded into the kitchen. She followed.

“I know that,” she said. “I'm a doctor, you know.”

“A doctor who can't cook or identify bread, apparently,” he said with a soft chuckle as he pulled down a loaf of white Wonder Bread from the top of the refrigerator. The plastic crinkled. She hadn't even looked there. He stared at the package and grimaced. She couldn't help but smile. Not whole wheat. He would be slumming it with America's comfort food tonight.

“Normal people like crappy white bread, you know,” she said. She leaned against the counter and gave him a sheepish grin as she watched him explore the large kitchen.

“Normal people aren't healthy,” he countered with a haughty smirk. “That's why we're employed.”

He rifled through all the cabinets and then glanced at what was in the fridge. Beyond his thin frame, she saw milk and eggs and OJ and a pile other things that looked potentially edible, given preparation.

“Why do you want bread?” she said.

He turned and winked. “The better to feed you with,” he said with a wolfish grin that lit up his whole face, and she wondered what that might mean. If he still wanted sex, now that he was feeling a bit better, after he plied her with a scrumptious dinner. Relief fluttered in her body. Even if she was over-interpreting, at least he felt better enough to smile like that. She just wished he could feel like that most of the time, again, rather than experiencing fleeting moments of normality.

Soon. She hoped. With Dr. Wyatt's help, and when the Paxil started to work.

She frowned as he pulled a jar of boysenberry jelly and some Skippy peanut butter from one of the cabinets. He pulled knives and plates loose next. “And that means...” she pondered as she stared and added everything together, “peanut butter and jelly?”

He nodded. “At this precise moment, it does.”

That hardly seemed like a healthy, scrumptious meal to ply her with. Good in a pinch. But more her style than his. "Derek Shepherd makes peanut butter and jelly?" she said with incredulity as she wrapped her arms around his waist.

"Yes," he said. "Tonight, I do."

She watched as he pulled out bread. Enough to make one sandwich. Not two. She frowned. He hadn't ever gotten his appetite back since the shooting. She still had to remind him to eat. Time and time again. Like it just didn't occur to him to feed himself anymore. How weird would that be, to just... not be hungry. Ever. Even as you wasted away. "You should make two sandwiches," she said. She kissed his bicep.

"You're that hungry?" he said.

"No," she said. "Make one for yourself."

He didn't comment as he added two more slices of bread to the stack.

"That's not cooking, you know," she said as he slathered peanut butter on the first slice.

He paused. "Did I say it was?"

"You impugned my cooking skills earlier."

"You don't have any cooking skills to impugn," he replied.

She laughed and held him tightly. "Mean, mean man," she said as she pressed her face between his shoulder blades and kissed him through his shirt. The shirt felt soft against his lips, and his shoulder blades shifted and moved as he worked the peanut butter across the bread. The heat of his body made her feel warm inside. Warm and complete and happy.

"How is feeding my starving wife mean?"

"Come on. I can make a peanut butter sandwich," she said. "You could have just pointed me at the kitchen and let me fix it myself."

"I know. I just..." He paused. The knife clinked as he set it against the plate. He'd put peanut butter on two slices. "I wanted to..." He waved the knife in the air as he fought for the right words to explain his feelings. "But I don't think I'm up for elaborate right now."

She pressed her cheek against him and sighed. She could understand that. He'd driven for several hours, which was tiring by itself. Then he'd been scared witless and beset by panic that he'd fought against. Valiantly. He didn't think he could do something complicated, but he wanted to do something. Something for her. Something to show his Gary Clark ghost and his damaged self-esteem that he could function. Live. Be a man. Provide. Normally, she might have labeled that sort of behavior as some sort of alpha caveman jerk thing. But... not now. He needed something to prove to himself he wasn't omega and helpless. That he wasn't without choices.

She kissed him through his shirt again, only to pause. She hadn't closed the cabinet. Beyond the space from which he'd pulled the jelly, she saw a stack of familiar-looking bags full of fat marshmallows. White, puffy cylinders of sugary awesome.

"Oh," she exclaimed, and he stopped before he dipped his knife into the boysenberry jelly. "Oh, there's marshmallows in here!"

He raised his eyebrows at her as she pushed past him and grabbed one of the bags. He'd moved them into the kitchen, and he'd put the peanut butter on the bread. He'd done something. She hoped he wouldn't mind if she—

“So?” he said.

“We can make fluffernutters!”

“Fluffywhats?”

“Nutters."

The lascivious snicker on his face made her roll her eyes, but she couldn't help her grin. “You are so freaking five, Derek,” she said. She gave him a light shove. “I can't take you anywhere.”

He laughed. “What are fluffernutters?” he said.

She ripped open the marshmallow bag and dumped out several of the marshmallows. They were the big kind that you could put on sticks and roast to make s’mores. She'd always used a fork and roasted them over a candle, though. While her mother wasn't looking, anyway. Ellis Grey probably wouldn't have appreciated her smallish daughter playing with fire, of all things. Then again, she'd approved of a suture kit for a present when Meredith had been ten.

Looking back on it, that was sort of bad, wasn't it? Meredith filed that away as something not to do with baby. No sharp knives before baby was old enough to drive. She shook her head as her mind wandered back to the situation at hand.

On a hunch, Meredith glanced again at the open cabinet. Yep. Graham crackers and milk chocolate Hershey bars stacked in the back behind where the marshmallows had been. A grin she couldn't stop overtook her. They could do those, later, though. She tore a couple marshmallows to bits while he watched, and then littered them on the first piece of peanut buttered bread.

“Marshmallows and peanut butter,” she explained as he watched her culinary burst with a touch of horror in his gaze. “Normally, we'd use marshmallow paste, which comes in a jar, actually, but marshmallows will have to do in the meantime.” She paused and turned to him. “Unless you want to nuke these, so they melt?”

His expression was comical, and she couldn't help but snort with laughter at the way he stared at her concoction. Like she'd ruined his perfect sandwich by putting mud on it instead of jelly. “Melt the marshmallows?” he said.

“Yes! Melt.”

“With peanut butter?” he said.

She nodded.

“That sounds...” He stared at the plate, looking thoroughly uninterested, and, maybe, a little sick.

“Bliss,” she said. “Bliss on bread. You have to try it.” She jammed the two pieces of bread together and shoved the sandwich at him. He frowned. “Come on. It won't kill you. I swear it won't. One bite.” When he didn't budge, she gave him a pout-y face she knew he had trouble resisting. “Please? Please, Derek? Try it? It's great. I swear!”

With a look of doubt, he took the sandwich from her hands and raised it to his lips. Her heart fluttered. Victory! She stared as he bit into it and chewed.
“So, what do you think?” she said, anxious.

“This is...” He made a face and handed it back to her. At least he swallowed. “This is pretty disgusting, Mere. You eat these? As meals?”

She frowned. “It’s a delicacy!”

“It’s... marshmallow-y.”

“Marshmallow-y,” she said. “That’s all you have to say? What is wrong with your taste buds?”

He chuckled as he picked up his knife and resumed making his own sandwich. A normal, ho-hum PB&J that made her want to weep with the injustice of it all. “My taste buds are perfect, thank you,” he said.

She snorted. “Well, at least we know you’re not completely defective, since we’ve established that you’ll eat ice cream.”

He put a finishing dollop of boysenberry jelly on the last slice of bread and smooshed the two remaining slices together. She bit into her marshmallow sandwich and chomped, the motions pronounced, as if she could prove a point. He glanced at her and shook his head, an amused smirk on his face.

“Remind me never to let you feed our kid,” he said.

“I could so feed our kid!” she said. “I fed myself plenty when I was a kid. Therefore—”

His eyebrows raised. “You grew up on this?”

“I might have,” she said indignantly.

“It’s really kind of a miracle that you’re this tiny,” he said. He smirked, and his eyes roved her figure, up and down, appreciatively. “And alive.”

“You, shut up,” she said. “Jelly isn’t that much healthier. It’s solid sugar, and you’re a hypocrite.”

He shrugged. His eyes sparkled as he bit into his sandwich and chewed his first bite. He swallowed. “I’m actually kind of jealous of you. You eat like a garbage disposal, but you’re the size of a pea.”

She stuck her tongue out at him.

He laughed. “That’s mature,” he said.

She put her sandwich down and slid up against him with a smile. His body accommodated her presence almost like a sixth sense. She didn’t see him move, but she just... fit with him. Like an interlocking piece. He took another bite of his sandwich. “You know what would make this perfect?” she said. She kept her voice deep. A low purr.

“It’s not perfect already?” he said. “I thought you called it bliss.”

She nodded. “It is bliss, but it could be blissier.”

He stared. “Blissier.”

“Yes,” she said. “It’s a word.”
“A word you made up just now,” he said with a wink.

“Whatever,” she said, rolling her eyes. “More blissful. And we're never playing Scrabble, by the way.”

He pouted as he chewed. “Not even strip Scrabble?” he said around a mouthful of sticky peanut butter, as though he couldn't wait to empty his mouth for that complaint.

She shook her head. “Not even.”

He sighed with disappointment and swallowed. “So, what would make this more blissful?”

“Mmm,” she moaned. She pressed her lips against his cheek, in his space and close. His breaths tightened. She ran her fingers through his hair and hovered by his ear. “Pickles,” she whispered.

His eyes widened, and he dropped his sandwich on his plate. “Now?” he said, his tone incredulous, but what was funnier than his disbelief was the fact that she could tell he'd do it if she asked. Get pickles.

She couldn't stop herself from bursting out laughing. “No,” she said, and his body deflated with relief. She kissed him. He would have gone back outside into the terrifying pitch blackness, braved a panic attack, gotten back into the car, and driven to find a freaking supermarket. For pickles. Because she was pregnant. And she'd asked. And that was just... adorable. Adorable, and she loved him. “No, I just wanted to see the look on your face,” she said.

“And you say I'm mean,” he replied, his eyes twinkling.

She nodded as she rested her head against his shoulder. “You are, but I love you, anyway.”

He snickered. “No, I'd say you are. Abusing my willingness to get you odd food items in the wee hours.”

“Maybe, we're both despicable,” she said.

“You're despicable,” he said, a playful grin on his face. “I'm not despicable. I was willing to get you pickles. Now, I'm not so sure. I think, maybe, I'll pick another replacement thought.”

She pouted. “No more pickles?”

“Mmm. No. You've ruined pickles,” he informed her. His lip brushed her ear, and he left his sandwich behind on the counter. Forgotten. “I'll take you to bed,” he rumbled against her ear, and she shivered at his desirous tone.

“As your replacement thought?” she whispered. He kissed her, and she gasped.

“For real,” he said.

For a moment, she stood senseless as he kissed her. Again, again, again. His mouth trailed along her throat, up her chin, and to her lips. Tasting. Searching. Wanting. Needing. Taking. A groan fell from his body, telling her that he'd found his dinner for the night. His delicacy. She was in his arms. Warm and solid, and she forgot her sandwich, too. Where had she put it? She couldn't even remember setting it down. She— He kissed her again, and she couldn't think about anything anymore, except the fact that she wanted him. She'd wanted him since he'd hit her with his first punch buggy sighting. Since before then, even. She'd always wanted him.
Since that first night in the bar when she'd tried to ignore him and his sexy red shirt and his horrible pickup lines and his cute arrogance. And, now, she had him. All to herself. No secret wife or nurse in the way. No mommy or daddy issues left to interfere. All whole and healed, herself. They were Post-it married. And both breathtakingly alive with beating hearts and no physical wounds left to speak of. She was alone with him, and he was kissing her. Loving her.

She was his. She let him own her in that moment, and she liked it.

He backed her into the counter with a thud, pressed against her, dwarfed her. Retaking some ground in a war of love, she slid her hand along his soft shirt to the waistband of his pants and fingered the fat brass button that kept his lower body away from her and entrapped. She licked her lip and relished the taste of him. Derek-y with a bit of peanut butter and boysenberry.

She undid the top button of his jeans, and he groaned. She slipped her hands underneath the soft, fraying denim at his waistline, underneath the clinging waistband of his boxer briefs, and down. Down, down, down into warmth. Heat. He pressed against her and made a delightful, deep noise in his throat that told her yes. Yes, he liked that a lot. But he wasn't hard. At all. She cupped him, felt his weight in her hands, just like he liked, and he bucked a little. A plate clinked as he pushed her backward. She pressed her lips against his and swallowed his growl with a moan of her own. She stroked him, and he shuddered. But, still nothing.

“Derek, are you sure?” she said, her voice breathless, as she forced herself to pull away from his body enough to speak. The separation was a physical sort of pain, but the last thing she wanted was attempted sex that failed, because even though he'd pinky promised that he wouldn't get upset, she imagined he might get upset. Just a little. After the harrowing experience he'd had not even ninety minutes ago. And, if they failed, now, that didn't bode well for future attempts as his self-consciousness started to crush him like a bug.

“I was in the mood before,” he said. He pressed himself against her hand. She gripped him. Nothing. “Maybe, I can get back into it.”

She pulled her hand away and hugged him. She hated to say it. Not when her insides felt gooey and her breaths had shortened and she felt a bit dizzy with hedonist thoughts about making love to him, but, “Maybe, we should wait a bit,” she whispered.

He pressed his nose against hers and sighed. “I want to get back into the mood,” he said, his dark eyes millimeters from hers. “This yo-yoing kills me. Please, Meredith. I want to make love to my wife.”

“I'm not saying we can't,” she said. She kissed him. “But trying to force yourself to have sex after what just happened less than two hours ago wouldn't exactly help you with that emotional whiplash feeling.”

He sighed. His frustration made her bite her lip. He kissed her forehead. “I know,” he said, his voice tinged with regret. “I know that in my head, I just...” He shook his head and looked away, blinking. He growled with irritation, not lust.

“How about a bath instead of bed, first?” she said, a compromise.

He stared at her. “A bath?”

“Just to relax,” she said. She kissed him. “Maybe, play a little. We'll see how you feel afterward.”

“We don't even know if this place has a bath,” he said.
She frowned. “How could it not have a bath?”

“Because it's a cabin,” he said. “It might only have a shower.”

“I refuse to allow this cabin to have only a shower,” she said.

She made a face.

“Well, let's see, shall we?” he said. He grabbed her hand and pulled at her, and she relaxed as he consigned himself to this new non-lusty plan. Their footsteps thunked on the hardwood floor. There was an alcove to the left in the short hallway, where an old washer and dryer sat. The hallway ended in two doors, one on the right, and one at the end. The door on the right? Bingo. She flipped on the light. Bright circular bulbs flashed on over the vanity at the sink. A heat lamp in the ceiling also flicked on.

Her eyes widened as she stared. The shower was the size of a house by itself, or, well, a shed, at least. It was about six by six feet with sliding glass doors. Two fat metal shower heads the size of dinner plates pointed downward onto a tiled floor. And there was definitely a freaking tub.

“Oh,” she said with a gasp as she took in the sight of it all. Derek slid up behind her and peered into the room over her shoulder. “Oh, wow. This is...”

“A giant pit,” Derek said.

“A whirlpool tub,” she corrected as she stared at the huge platform by a large half-frosted window that looked out into darkness at the top. The tub looked like a small pool and was surrounded by a tile platform where they could stack towels and candles and other relevant things. Huge, fluffy white towels and washcloths adorned the shiny towel racks against the far wall, and the room smelled slightly of fresh soap. Her nostrils fluttered as she stared at the rose-colored bar of soap in the dish by the big window on the ledge around the tub. The soap matched the pastel-colored tiles. I bought it sight unseen, the Chief had told her as he'd given her the keys. Almost as if he'd been a little embarrassed about it. She'd wondered why at the time. This bathroom? Probably why. It was obscene. And pink. And not a freaking bachelor pad bathroom by any stretch of the imagination.

“Definitely not what I was expecting,” Derek said, his voice airy.

“Oh, my god,” she said as she stared at the luxurious bathroom. Derek's grip tightened around her body. He kissed her ear. “I want to take a bath. Please, please, can we take a bath? It'll be fun and relaxing and... it's a whirlpool tub!” She turned into him and kissed his lips before he could reply. She bounced. Just a little. She couldn't help it. This was bounce-worthy.

“Are you sure it's safe?” he said when they parted. His gaze seemed apologetic, as though he were reluctant to dampen her excitement.

She frowned. “Why wouldn't it be safe?”

His warm hands roamed low against her belly. He rubbed her shirt. Instinct drove her to lean against him as he said in that soft voice of his, “The baby.”

“Oh,” she said. Her forehead crinkled with consternation. “Oh, um...” There was a freaking whirlpool tub, and if she couldn't take a freaking bath in it, she might cry. And then yell at him for his super-powered bully sperm. And, maybe, pout a little. But... “Well, I can't imagine it being bad if it's not too hot. Aren't the problems from... like... hot tubs?”

He shrugged. The concern in his gaze didn't lift. “I don't know. I fix brains, not unborn babies.”

Unborn babies couldn't sweat because they were swimming in a uterus. Hot tubs tended to cook unborn babies. A sliver of fear ran through her as she tried to remember the facts from her neonatal cases, some long ago with Addison. She couldn't remember any specifics as her mind raced for answers, and she had no way to check for information. She pouted at him. “Derek, I want the Internet.”

His gaze softened as he stared at her. “And a bath?”

“The Internet and a bath,” she said with a nod. “Yes.”

“Why don't you run the water?” he said. He gave her a so-so motion with his right hand. “Not too hot, yet.” He turned back toward the hallway. “I'll be back in a minute.”

She frowned. “Where are you going?”

He looked over his shoulder and winked. “Just... run the water,” he said, and he gave her a secretive smile that made her curious. The Internet was not like pickles. He couldn't just run to a convenience store for that. Could he?

She snickered as she imagined him wandering back into the bathroom tomorrow morning, bedraggled and tired as he dragged a new shiny laptop and a router in with him. Look, Mere, he'd say. I found a Best Buy. And it only took me eight hours and three laps around the lake!

“Okay...” she said, shaking off that image in her head as he disappeared down the hall. She leaned across the porcelain void, fiddled with the shiny hot and cold knobs, and let the water warm up from freezing. She stared at the pit as it filled with water and giggled with anticipation. A whirlpool tub! She licked her lips. A whirlpool tub. With Derek. She sat on the tile ledge around the tub and stared at the water as it swirled to fill the huge, bath-tubby abyss.

Derek returned in about five minutes. “It's safe as long as the water isn't hotter than you are, and we don't stay in it until we're shriveled prunes,” he announced as though he were quoting somebody directly. There was something familiar about his phrasing...

“So, we keep it low 90s and limit ourselves to less than thirty minutes or so?” she said.

He nodded. “Yes.”

“Where'd you find that out?” She combed her spread fingertips through the frothy water. It felt good. Not hot. Definitely not cold. Perfect. She turned on the jets. “Did you get me the Internet?”

He winked as he sat on the edge of the tub with her and pulled at his shoelaces and slipped off his shoes. “I'm a miracle man,” he said with an arrogant smirk.

She laughed. “No, really,” she said. “Where—”

“I called Miranda.”

She gaped. “Bailey?”

“I owe her charts for a month,” he said.
“For her telling us we can take a bath?”

He shrugged, but his eyes sparkled. “She doesn't like knowing I have sex, apparently.”

“But we're not having sex right now,” she said.

“We'll be naked in a bathtub,” he countered. “I think that's enough for her sensibilities. She says congratulations, by the way.” He frowned. “Or rather, 'Congratulations, fools. Now, leave me alone, so I can fix this poor man's liver and not think about the specifics of how that baby happened.'”

Meredith blinked at his impersonation. Really, he did a good job at it. “You called Bailey,” she said, not a question, yet. She glanced at her watch. “At 8:30 PM. To ask about unborn baby safety? How did you know she was working tonight?”

He shrugged and winked. “I didn't. I risked it. And I didn't break the cellphone rule, either. I used the land line.”

The fact that he knew Bailey's number by heart made Meredith smile. Dr. Bailey had visited him every day in the hospital for at least a few minutes, more than anybody else outside of his family and Mark. She'd even come across town once to see Derek when he'd been at Seattle Presbyterian with pneumonia. For all their claims to the contrary, those two were thick as thieves, and the fact that Derek had thought of Bailey instead when he probably knew Addison's number as well made Meredith smile more. Bailey wasn't a world-renowned neonatal specialist or an OB-GYN. She was, however, a mom and a doctor that he apparently trusted to know the answer.

“She likes you, you know,” Meredith said.

Derek grinned. “Everybody likes me,” he said. She rolled her eyes as he slid across the tiled ledge. Closer to her. He kissed her ear and whispered over the rushing water, “You like me.”

“I do,” she said. The tub was almost full. She bent to begin undressing, but he stopped her with a look. The look. His look. The one that made her feel special and loved and perfect despite all her flaws and all her problems and all her freakishness. She leaned into him and raised her arms as he lifted her shirt. His warm palms slid up her bare skin and cupped her breasts over her bra. She moaned as she relaxed into his arms. He undressed her as though he were unwrapping a present, intent on saving the paper because it was pretty and perfect, but he marveled over the present, too.

She stared through her eyelashes, drunk on the sensation of being pampered, as he put her socks on the pile with her pants and her shirt and her underwear and her bra. “Well,” she said as she languished at the side of the tub, “I'm naked. Now, what will you do with me?”

He grinned at her and let her watch as he undressed. Slowly, as if to tantalize her. She licked her lips as the blue of his threadbare shirt became pale skin, and his pants fell away from his slim hips into a denim pool on the floor. His biceps bunched and flexed as he moved. Curly, wispy hair dusted his torso in a triangle at his chest, covering most of the harrowing, pinkish scar where he'd been split open by Cristina. The bullet wound remained sharp and ugly and pocked under his left nipple, but... she barely saw it as she basked in the sight of his naked body.

He didn't seem to favor the marks left by his injuries anymore. Didn't hunch over them or hide them. He might not like them, but at least he'd grown a bit more comfortable with them, or at least comfortable with the fact that, even if he found them ugly, she wouldn't balk at them or look at his body with horror or pity. She looked at him, yes. But horror and pity were the last things on her mind.
Her mouth dried as she trailed along the flat plane of his stomach with her gaze, to the twist of dark curls below his belly button, and lower. Even flaccid, she found him pretty impressive, or maybe that was just the knowledge of what he could do with what he had. He wasn't small, not hardly. But he wasn't large, either. They fit, exactly as he'd said that day on the couch when they'd found out together that she was pregnant. They fit, and that was all that mattered to her. The toned swell of his quads and his sleek calves completed the picture. Artwork. Her body twitched, and she inhaled tightly in anticipation as she stared at the tapestry of him. Of Derek Shepherd.

All hers.

He flashed a grin at her, and her heart skipped. She swallowed, trying to recover her wits, but that was a hard thing to do when he looked at her like that. He had an irresistible smile, which was one of the reasons she loved when he was happy and at peace, and one of the reasons she hadn't been able to ignore him at the bar when she'd been just a girl, and he'd been just a guy.

They climbed into the warm water together and sank down to the bottom. The tub was deep, and the swirling, moving water enveloped her up to her shoulders. The water was warm, but not hot. Perfect. He spread his legs and pulled her against him between his knees, her back to his chest, where she rested, relaxing in his wet embrace. His kneecaps offered support for her arms. She gripped him, and she rubbed her thumbs against his shins. He sighed as she twisted her fingers with the soft, wet hairs peppering his legs.

He was still flaccid. She could feel him mashed at her lower back along her spine. That thought remained in a cobwebby corner of her mind, somewhere. Fleeting. But she stopped thinking about it so much when he lathered a washcloth and rubbed her with it until she thought she might slip down the drain when they unstopped it, boneless and fluid in the churning water.

“Thank you,” she said, her voice sleepy and soft as he worshiped her head to toe without involving a single kiss, a streak he then broke almost as if he'd read her mind. She felt his lips graze her throat, and she listened to his breathing, soft and sure, as he tasted her skin.

“For what?” he whispered by her ear. The washcloth rasped. Water dripped.

“Just... thank you,” she said. She let him do what he wanted. He'd worked her into a pile of goo, and she couldn't bring herself to care much beyond the fact that she didn't want the goo feeling to ever end. They hadn't done this in a while. Well, they'd taken a bath or two. But not like this.

He rubbed her nipples with his soapy thumbs until they perked. She moaned, and his touch slipped lower. He kissed her neck and rested the flat of his palms against her belly. Her stomach at first, and then he sidled lower and lower, until the edges of his pinkies brushed the wiry hair down there. She put her palms over his and held him close.

“Can you tell, yet?” she said.

The water sloshed as he shifted. Not enough to disturb her much. “That you're pregnant?” he said.

“Yeah, I mean...”

He nuzzled her. “Well, you can't possibly be more than six weeks along,” he said, his voice a soft slip of fur down her spine. She tingled. “We've only been having sex since mid-July.”

“I know,” she said. They'd missed the fireworks, she thought in a blur. The literal ones, anyway. How had they missed so much? “I still look the same to me. Even the so-called bustyness.”

“You're not that much bigger,” he said. His knees squeezed against her sides, and he cocooned her.
“I told you I wouldn't have said anything, yet.”

“Still,” she said. She pressed his hands against her. “Can you tell?”

“I can't tell, yet,” he replied. “Other than the fact that since we found out, I can't look at you without knowing. I...” His voice trailed away. A soft noise filled her ear as she listened to him swallow. She turned her head and leaned back against his pale shoulder.

“What?”

She kissed his wet skin.

A sigh that moved her body with it rumbled through him. The water swirled around them. She watched the ripples chase along the filmy surface. Their bodies reflected in a soft shimmer. “You make me so happy,” he said, his voice thick and low and choked up with... everything.

She smiled as she languished in that feeling. That he loved her so much that he felt like that, just thinking about the fact that they'd made another person together in an act of love. She squeezed his hands. “You're not so bad yourself, you know,” she said.

“I love you so much,” he murmured.

She leaned, and she kissed his kneecap. Water dripped as she resettled. “Ditto,” she whispered.

Moments passed. The water sloshed, and the whirlpool jets whirred. “When do you think we...?” she began, soft words against his skin.

“Conceived?” he finished for her, as though he simply... understood. No matter what kind of freaky off-topic thing she could come up with, he would always get her. That was his thing. Getting her. She loved that about him.

“Yeah,” she said, swallowing.

“Hmm.”

“I think it was the night before the memorial,” she said. He'd been happy that night because he'd managed a bit more athleticism than their first few couplings since the shooting, and he hadn't needed any timeouts or assistance righting himself out of a position that caused him pain. She closed her eyes as she remembered the taste of him, and the sound of his soft groans as he filled her body to the brim. Her lower body fluttered at the simple thought of it. Of him. Filling her. Her breath caught.

As if he sensed her sudden desire, his hands moved. At first, she wanted to die with the abandonment as the warmth of his palms against her belly left her, but he slipped down through her forest of wiry curls and lower, and he touched her there. At the fluttery spot. She gasped, and she stiffened against him. “Derek,” she managed, her voice a choked whisper as he wrung her senses out like a wet washcloth.

He kissed her ear as he stroked her. Need built in her body, slow and coiling. “I think you're wrong,” he said, his voice low and challenging, and she couldn't think straight to ask him why or what about. He touched her, and she mewled in his arms.

“Derek,” she said again, helpless as he played her like his violin.

“I think it was the first time,” he said as she gasped and shuddered.
The first time, she thought. The words filled her brain like a soupy oatmeal and refused to coalesce. She couldn't think. She couldn't speak. She scrabbled at his knees, and he laughed against her ear as he leaned over her, his larger body dwarfing hers. He laughed, and the sound vibrated against her body like heady, thick music. Her head swirled like the water as she fought for breath. Air. Something.

His sigh rolled against her ear, and his arms enveloped her like a warm coat. He pulled her against his body, until her skin slipped against his, naked and wet and strangely frictionless in the slippery fluidity of the water. She sucked in a breath, leaned back, into him, and she couldn't breathe as her body tightened. She could only moan to tell him yes. Yes, that was good. That was perfect. She moaned like she was dying. Was she dying? Yes, yes, yes.

He kept her on that painful, perfect precipice for... hours. Days. Years. Eternity. He touched her, working his magic, and then she died in his arms for real, and yet only metaphorically. La petite mort. That was what the French called orgasms, right? Little deaths. It didn't freaking matter. The phrase was appropriate. Bliss squeezed her brain. Everything popped loose at once. Her body twitched like she'd been zapped with lightning, and then she became a pile of jelly and boneless limbs in his arms. Unmoving. Languishing in stupor. Pleased to the point of malfunctioning synapses. Her eyelids drooped, and he held her, not speaking.

This was the most perfect freaking bath. Ever.

She lay against his arms, not moving, and her awareness of the room blurred. Exhaustion overcame her. She'd just had the most amazing orgasm she could recall in months, and she'd been working nonstop all week, and she just... Couldn't. Couldn't do anything anymore but enjoy his body close to hers and let her brain shut down.

She moaned when he shifted, and he whispered gently in her ear, “Mere, we've been in here about forty minutes.”

Forty minutes? How? Already?

She didn't want to move. Or think. Or anything. He turned off the jets. The drain gurgled, and the warmth surrounding her drained away. He slipped his arms underneath her body, and the world skewed as he lifted her.

She had the presence of mind to croak at him. He hadn't lifted that much since before he'd been shot. “No,” she moaned. “You'll hurt...”

“I'm okay,” he said, his voice strained but even. He panted, but he didn't seem to struggle too much with her weight, and she stopped caring as much as he wrapped a billowing, fluffy towel around her lax body. The world skewed again.

“Derek...”

“Really, I'm okay,” he said, and he sounded sure, but not defiant, and no pain laced his tone. “I can carry you ten feet. Maybe, not eleven, though.”

She was too spent to argue, and she curled up in the towel and against his chest. In the blur, she thought she saw the hallway, and then things got dark again. Bedroom? He laid her flat on cool, clean sheets that smelled like Downy fabric softener or something. The mattress squeaked as he joined her. He pulled fluffy blankets and a soft, light down comforter over them. He wrapped his arms around her, spooning her. He stroked her hair, and he breathed against her ear. They lay naked together under the sheets.
Somewhere, in her grottiness, she flopped her hand against his bare hip, underneath the blankets. “Mmm,” she said. She felt him against her. Ready where he hadn't been before. Thick and pressed against her spine like a steel rod. “Sex?” She swallowed. “Don't mind.” She'd just lie there. He could still have fun.

He laughed. “I'll wait until you're conscious, if it's all the same to you.” He kissed her ear. “I'm okay.”

He meant it. She knew he meant it from his tone. He'd done more than make a freaking sandwich for her. He'd kicked his shoddy self-esteem's ass. He'd needed that, and he was happy. Pleased. Sated, though unsated.

She rolled, turning the spoon into a fork, and she pressed her nose into his chest. Soft fuzz tickled her nose. “Kay,” she muttered sleepily. She kissed him. Her lips touched the dent where his sternum had knitted underneath his skin. Her eyelids creaked open as she realized a bit more about their surroundings. He'd wrapped himself around her tightly like a cloak, her own personal Derek cloak, and though it was nice, it seemed it was also a necessity. “This bed is really small,” she said abruptly.

He kissed her again. “Yes,” he said. “Our very own microcosm.”

“Huh?”

“Bachelor pad, remember?” Derek said. The blankets rustled. “It's a double bed.”

She didn't wake up enough to contemplate it, much. They'd fit together in a hospital bed, and that'd been a single, though that had had railings, and... Did it matter? The room turned fuzzy again. The warmth of his body pulled her toward dreaming like quicksand. She yawned and breathed the musky, soapy, clean scent of his body. “If I'm right,” she said, “You have to eat a fluffernutter.”

He laughed, soft against her body. “Right about what?”

“I think it was the night before the memorial,” she murmured.

He stroked her back. “Okay, Mere,” he said.

“You'll eat one?”

She felt him nod. “If you're right,” he said.

“I am,” she replied.

“If I win,” he said, and she felt him smile in the darkness, “I'm eating you, though.”

She fell asleep in his arms to that thought, and dreams of him naked shimmered in her head like the reflections on the whirlpool water.

---

(We got all the memories)

Meredith paced in the hallway outside of Derek's hospital room for what felt like years as she tried not to think about how sick he was. How sick he'd been. About how close he'd come to dying in the last month, not once, but twice. Once via attempted murder, and another time via a combination of crap luck and his horrific stubborn streak. This wasn't fair. None of this was freaking fair.

He'd been transferred to a step-down unit late that afternoon after two nights in the ICU. The step-down unit was a real room with real walls, a lockable door, and a private bathroom, and it was a glorious rung up on the privacy ladder for him. Except she wasn't entirely convinced he should be there, yet. He still had a fever, and they'd stopped making serious gains at lowering it. The antipyretics seemed to have gotten stuck in neutral as he'd hit 101.7 or so. On top of that, he wouldn't eat. She'd watched breakfast, lunch, and dinner trays being taken away from him that day, all untouched, and he hadn't eaten anything the day before, either. At least he was lucid, for the most part, though his grasp on reality didn't seem all that firm. With his voice in shreds, she couldn't really call what he did speaking, but he seemed to interact with nothing at all, sometimes.

Her hands trembled. A worried lump gobbled up the empty space in her throat, and then she couldn't swallow because the lump had grown to basketball proportions. He'd nearly died again, and he wouldn't eat, and she couldn't touch him, and his fever was stuck, and he should be back in the ICU, being more closely monitored. Except if it were anybody else and not Derek, she'd be signing the 'discharge to step-down' papers herself. His fever was stuck, yes, but it was far better than it had been, and unless it stayed stuck for a long time, like days, not eight hours, she was being irrational, and stupid, and freaky, and she wished this would just... Stop. He was very sick, and she hated it, but that was all. Except telling herself to stop didn't make anything stop. Derek had almost died again.

Again. Once was already too much.

She paused in the quiet hallway and rubbed her temples. Her eyes hurt from lack of sleep, and her head hurt from endless worrying. The white walls seemed to brighten, turn incandescent, and then stab at her retinas with vicious knives. She closed her eyelids, and sighed as she rested against the wall, listening to the sounds surrounding her. A pair of doctors conversed in whispers several doors down. The floor nurse tapped away at a keyboard at the station just around the corner, and the sound fluttered back to Meredith, vague and distant. The scent of antiseptic tickled her nose.

“For the record, I am not here, and I never was here, and I certainly never drove across town for this,” a familiar voice told Meredith.

Meredith's eyes slammed open, and she found herself inches from her boss. Dr. Bailey stood by the door, wearing a tan raincoat that covered street clothes – slacks and shiny loafers. The shoulders of the raincoat had darkened with rainwater. Meredith's jaw tumbled open.

“Dr. Bailey?” she said.

Dr. Bailey frowned at Meredith, her eyes intent, concerned pools of brown. Dr. Bailey glanced at the closed doorway to Derek's room, and her frown deepened. “Why are you standing in the hallway?” she said. Her wet shoes squeaked on the tiled floor as she shifted. “Did that fool kick you out of the room?”

Meredith blinked. “Dr. Bailey?”

Dr. Bailey nodded. “That would be my name, Dr. Grey.”

“But...” Meredith swallowed. “How are you here?”

“I thought I already explained that. I'm not here.”

“But... Why aren't you here?” Meredith said, feeling strangely clueless.
“Because I do not drive across town to visit arrogant, stubborn neurosurgeons when they get sick.”

“But...”

“Spit it out, Grey,” Dr. Bailey said as she folded her arms over her chest. Her small frame puffed up with her authoritative tone.

Meredith shook her head. “I mean, who told you... about...?” Derek. Nearly dying. Again.

“I have spies, Grey,” said Bailey. “Everywhere. I see and know everything. Or haven’t you learned that by now?”

“But this isn't Seattle Grace—”

Dr. Bailey held up a hand as if to silence her. “I see and know everything,” Dr. Bailey said. She shuddered and shook her head. “Not that I want to.”

An orderly walked past, rolling an empty gurney covered in rumpled sheets. Meredith paused as he went by. She swallowed. “Derek didn't kick me out,” she said. “He's... using the bathroom. I wanted to give him some privacy.”

Not quite the truth, but close enough. He had an intravenous line feeding him fluids, antibiotics, and other medications nonstop. No longer intent on monitoring Derek's kidney function so closely, the doctor had removed Derek's catheter just before they'd moved Derek out of the ICU. Except Derek was still sick. Still feverish. Still weak. And tired. And lethargic. He didn't even want to get up. Didn't want to try. Meredith had handed him the plastic urinal and left so he could do his business in private.

“How is he doing?” Dr. Bailey asked as her voice dropped low with empathetic concern.

Meredith shrugged. “He's sick, and he doesn't want to be here.”

“He's one of those, is he?”

“One of what?”

Dr. Bailey's eyebrows raised. “Horrible patients?”

Meredith shook her head. “He's too sick to be a horrible patient. He... almost died again.”

“He what?”

“His temperature hit 104.9. The doctor was debating whether to put him on a ventilator because he couldn't breathe. It's agony for him to cough. And he... he almost...” Died. Died. Died. She closed her eyes and tried to stop the quailing in her gut as she remembered how bad he'd been two nights ago. How frail he'd looked when they'd had to pull him from the car and wheel him into the emergency bay. His eyes had been open, but he'd been caught in feverish delirium, and there just... hadn't been anybody home.

“How is he, now?” Dr. Bailey said, her voice gentle.

“He's not eating, and he's in a lot of pain, but they got his fever down to 101.7...” Meredith sighed. “I thought we were done. I thought we were done when I took him home after the shooting. This is...” Her throat hurt. “I don't know what this is, but it's horrible.”
“Grey,” Bailey said, “if there’s one thing I know about that man, it’s that he’s annoying.”

Meredith blinked. “What?”

“He’ll be fine.” Meredith opened her mouth to protest, but Bailey barreled onward. “And not your version of fine, just so we’re clear,” Bailey said. She splayed her palm against her chest. “My version. Which is actually honest-to-god fine.”

“But—”

“If he’s not fine, he can’t be annoying,” Bailey clarified.

Meredith looked at the floor. “Oh.”

A warm hand touched Meredith’s shoulder. Dr. Bailey moved closer. Wet shoes squeaked. “And he loves you,” Dr. Bailey said, her voice soft and mothering. “That idiot would move heaven and earth to be fine for that.”

Meredith nodded, but she didn’t respond. They stood in silence in the hallway for several minutes. Meredith glanced at her watch. She’d given him ten minutes. To pee. He had to be finished. Surely. She pushed away from the wall, trying to ignore the swaying feeling as her body fought gravity and an upset stomach. She blinked, and the dizzying, black waterfall receded.

“Let me see if he’s done,” Meredith said. As she began to turn the doorknob, she glanced at Dr. Bailey. She tightened her grip until the knob’s edges bit into her skin. “Give me a second, okay?”

Dr. Bailey nodded. Meredith moved across the threshold, back into Derek’s private room. He’d filled the urinal, which rested on his tray table over his lap, at the opposite end from his still untouched bowl of oatmeal. After he’d refused breakfast, lunch, and dinner that day, she’d gotten desperate to see him eat. She didn’t want to have to see him with a feeding tube, and she’d wondered if, perhaps, he hadn’t been eating simply because the full meal trays served by the hospital were too daunting for somebody so sick, but she’d had no luck. He wouldn’t eat the oatmeal, either, though she couldn’t tell if that was her failure to cook more than his failure to consume.

Subtle wisps of steam curled up from the Styrofoam bowl. A plastic spoon poked up from the concoction a bit like a flag, which made her think she might not have added enough water. Shouldn’t the spoon fall to the side or something? Oatmeal should be mushy, she thought.

She walked under the television, which hung high on the wall and had been muted. The only sounds in the room were the high-pitched, background whine of the television electronics, the slow bleep of Derek’s pulse oximeter, and his chuff-y, labored breathing. He lay on the bed on top of the sheets, not sitting so much as propped at a shallow angle. A sheen of sweat dotted his brow along his hairline and down his temples to his wet sideburns, but that was all. A far cry from how bad he’d been the day before, when she’d had to bathe him. He still wore the full oxygen mask, and he stared dully at the muted television, where the Yankees were decimating the Mets 4-0. His gaze didn’t shift to face her as she entered. He didn’t greet her. He didn’t move. He stared, listless. She couldn’t even tell if he was a Yankees or a Mets fan, though she knew he likely had to be one or the other, given where he was from.

She resisted the urge to touch his naked shin as she moved alongside the bed to his tray table. No touching except when necessary, she chastised herself. She still had no idea what kind of touching was okay, and what kind of touching wasn’t. She didn’t understand it at all.
“Derek,” she whispered. Finally, he looked at her. “Hey,” she said. She gave him a small, wobbly smile that she hoped he would find encouraging, and for a moment, the empty space between them seemed to connect with a tangible cord. Some connection. The sense that her gaze pulled at him like an anchor overwhelmed her. For all his shaky reality, he was in the room then, and he loved her, and she knew it. His pupils sharpened in the sea of blue surrounding them, and she couldn’t help herself. She touched his brow and rolled her fingers back through his damp hair as she leaned over the railing on the bed. Her eyes watered when he leaned into her touch like he'd been suffering through a drought, and her palm was water. Which made no sense, damn it. What was good, and what wasn’t?

“Bailey's here to see you,” Meredith said. She grabbed the urinal. “Let me... take this.”

He didn’t move or blink as she walked into the bathroom and dumped the receptacle’s contents into the toilet. In fact, she wasn’t quite sure he’d understood the bit about Bailey. But when she set the empty urinal down in the bathroom and moved back into the main room, she discovered she was too late for further clarification.

Derek blinked at his short, determined visitor, and then his gaze sharpened from somewhere adrift into helpless panic. Meredith read the thoughts crossing his face as though he’d spoken them. I'm sick. I'm lying on a hospital bed in nothing but a skimpy gown. I can't lift my own head off the pillow. I don't want a visitor.

Guilt stabbed at Meredith for not policing the situation better despite her exhaustion – she hadn’t been thinking — but Bailey intervened before the awful, churning feeling gutted her. “Oh, don’t give me that look,” Dr. Bailey said as she pulled a chair close to the bed and sat. The chair squawked as she settled. “You know you're happy to see me,” she told him. She leaned against the railing and gripped it. Her gaze didn't wander away from his face, not to the monitors, or his bare legs, or the muted television, as if to say, I'm here to see you. Not whatever you're embarrassed about.

His eyelids drooped. He pulled his mask down and panted in the open air, as though that small act had sapped him. His wheezy breaths filled the silence while Dr. Bailey waited patiently for him to speak. After about fifteen seconds, he tried, but his throat butchered whatever the original utterance had been. One syllable popped. Another dropped like a brick into oblivion and made no noise at all. The last was a hoarse, mumbled, unidentifiable whisper. And then he was coughing. First, a bubbly, weak cough that stuttered in his throat, but that was followed in sharp succession by a stronger, more forceful one that sent him rolling forward with its momentum. He grabbed feebly at the railing for support. An expression of abject pain sliced his face.

Dr. Bailey snapped into motion. She leaned over the railing, and she put her hand against his back. “That's right,” she encouraged. “Get that bad stuff out of your lungs.”

She swallowed as she sat down in the small reading chair in the corner of the room. She wished there was something she could do for him. Anything. Home, he'd croaked at her, and she'd only been able to tell him he would be stuck here for a few more days.

His eyes slid shut as he flattened against the bed, breathing noisily. Dr. Bailey resettled the mask back over his nose. “You don't have to talk,” she told him as she settled back in her chair. She pushed her arm under the railing and grabbed his hand, mindful of the intravenous line stuck in the back of his palm. Her knuckles turned white as she squeezed. Another cough ripped him up and spat him out, leaving him haggard and sniffling and panting. He blinked, and his collection of tears spilled. He looked away. His Adam’s apple rolled along his throat, and the mask shifted as he swallowed.

“I know you're tired, and everything hurts, and life's not fair, but you are not allowed to give up,” Dr. Bailey said. “Okay?”

Derek looked at her, his expression desolate.

Dr. Bailey smiled. “You have too many people who want to see your stupid smile and your stupid hair back at work. Not that I'm one of them, because I'm not here.”

The skin around his red eyes crinkled. Not much. Just a little. A small hint of a smile. Meredith leaned forward in her chair. That was something she hadn't seen in... days. His head shook minutely, as if he meant to say, “Nope, never happened.” The oxygen mask fogged.

“Exactly,” Dr. Bailey replied with a firm nod as though he’d spoken aloud. She glanced at his tray table to the cooling, solid-ish oatmeal. “So, is something wrong with your oatmeal? Not enough cinnamon? It smells good.”

“I cooked it,” Meredith said, her voice glum.

“Grey, that's immaterial,” Dr. Bailey said without looking away from Derek. “You can't mess up oatmeal.”

Meredith sighed. “I think I probably can mess up oatmeal, yeah.”

“Instant oatmeal?” Dr. Bailey said, eyebrows raised. “All you do is add water.”

The crinkle around Derek's eyes deepened as he breathed under the mask. Meredith stared at the bowl and the unappetizing glop she'd made. She'd put the bowl on his tray table less than twenty minutes ago. Just before she'd left the room, actually. Theoretically, the oatmeal should still be edible. Just as, theoretically, it shouldn't be possible to start a kitchen fire while microwaving pizza, but that had still happened to her, once. Theoretical was a tricky word.

“I'm... talented that way,” Meredith admitted. “Talented at sucking,” Dr. Bailey frowned, and Meredith's face reddened when she realized what she'd said. She rushed to add, “I mean it's probably horrible, disgusting, awful oatmeal.”

Dr. Bailey snorted. “You see this?” she said to Derek, but gestured at Meredith. “You're making your wife feel bad about something she cooked for you. At least give it a try.”

Meredith's eyes widened as Derek pulled his mask down. He said something. Two words. An unidentifiable crackle followed by a rasping, “H... Hungry.” His noisy breathing flooded the room, and he stared at the bowl she'd microwaved with glazed disinterest.

“Well, if you're hungry, eat,” Dr. Bailey said.

Derek made a face. “Not,” he croaked, his entire chest heaving the with effort of pushing out that single, intelligible syllable. “Not... h...” He choked on the h, and his expression turned molten as he stumbled all over it and gave up. He glared.

Dr. Bailey blinked. For a moment, she remained silent. She took a breath. Her voice shook with intensity when she said, “If you mean to tell me, Dr. Derek Shepherd, that after all of this, a bowl of oatmeal is going to stop you, I don’t know what to say. Because the Derek Shepherd I know would want to get better, and he would know that starving himself wouldn’t do much, other than torture the poor woman who made his dinner for him in the first place.”

His expression crumpled, and Meredith twitched in her chair. Don’t bully him, she wanted to say. He was sick, and he couldn’t speak to respond, and he felt bad enough already. Except then he picked up the spoon from the bowl with a shaky hand and plunged it into the oatmeal goop almost vengefully. She watched him take his first bite to eat in more than two days. His dark, stormy expression clouded the entire room, and his nose crinkled with what had to be disgust, but his jaw worked, and he settled into a chewing rhythm, and no matter how miserable he looked, Meredith couldn’t help but smile. Because he was eating.

Dr. Bailey leaned back in her chair with a satisfied nod, still holding his free hand.

“How bad is it?” Meredith said as Derek swallowed. “I mean, on a scale of oatmeal to brick?”

Dr. Bailey snorted.

Meredith blinked as he picked up his spoon for a second bite. “Ten?” she said. “Is oatmeal a ten, or is a brick a ten?” From his expression as he stared at the bowl, she could only assume that ten meant brick. “I can get you something else. Just name it. Please.” She left her chair and approached the bed, only to be interrupted when the floor nurse bustled in with a smile and a clipboard.

“Dr. Shepherd,” the woman said. Her brown hair was pulled into a stark bun, and she had a pen tucked over her ear. “You're eating! That's wonderful to see. Are you feeling any better?”

He looked up at her and swallowed bite number two, but he didn't speak. The nurse approached the bed and quickly checked his pulse and tympanic temperature. She smiled again. “101.5,” she said as she glanced at the digital display on the small ear thermometer. “Looks like we’re moving again. Hang in there. You'll be out of here, soon.” She scribbled some notes on his chart. “Be sure to put your mask back on when you're finished eating,” she said, and then she left as quickly as she'd come.

The woman's name was Janet. Meredith liked her. Janet was fast and unobtrusive, but warm and caring, and, really, just a very nice person.

Derek shook his head and dipped the spoon for bite number three. A tired expression swept over his face, and Meredith gripped the railing by his bed. The hand and arm he used to lift the spoon trembled. The plastic ticked as it hit his teeth, and he took his next bite. She glanced at the bowl. Some progress. Not much. Three bites. Three bites should never be such horrendously difficult achievements.

He tried a fourth bite. He did. But his eyelids drooped, and the spoon stuck in the oatmeal while he stared at the bowl. Like he saw it, but he just... couldn't. Couldn't lift it. He wheezed, and he blinked once, twice. Each time his eyelids took longer to rise, but he didn’t let go of the spoon.

Dr. Bailey stood. She smiled. “Well, I don’t want to keep you up. You keep fighting, and I’ll see you soon. For the first time. Because I wasn’t here. Okay?”

Derek nodded. Sort of. Except with the last dip of his head, his chin tilted toward his chest and didn't rise again. He stared at the oatmeal, holding the spoon, a dead glaze robbing him of any
“By the way, I'm slightly relieved,” Dr. Bailey said as she reached the threshold of his room.

“By what?” Meredith said as she sat in the chair Dr. Bailey had been using.

Dr. Bailey gestured at Derek, who, at this point, was barely sentient. “At least I know his hair isn't always stupidly perfect,” she said. She shook her head, and then she left.

Derek didn't react at all as his last blink became slumber.

When Meredith snapped awake in a bath of moonlight, curled up in his arms, she didn't know where she was, and the disorientation kicked her heart into overdrive. She jerked and looked around, blinking muzzily, fighting sleep to try and figure out... what... His arms tightened around her, and she was warm, and cocooned, and protected. The sheets smelled like him, musky and male. Her muscles relaxed, and as her dreams slipped out of her grasp, she remembered. She wasn't in the hospital with Derek. She was in a very small bed in a cabin in the middle of nowhere with Derek.

He’d spooned her again at some point. He'd pressed his nose into her neck. She listened to his thick, even breathing by her ear as she squinted at their surroundings. A large window at the head of the bed towered over them. The moon hovered in the sky, a bright pie plate poking through the wispy ends of puffy clouds. It spilled a diagonal shaft of white light onto the bed where she and Derek slept. Half the sky, it seemed, had cleared up over the hours, leaving twinkling bits of glass-like stars flecking the endless black.

The bedroom was small and danced with long, dark shadows. A small nightstand with a lamp and a clock sat on her side of the bed, and the black mass of a dresser rested against the far wall by the doorway. She couldn't read the clock on the nightstand. It wasn't digital, and she couldn't see the hands marking the time despite the bath of moonlight because the face was so small. A second window looked into the night on the wall to her right, pouring another shaft of moonlight into the room on the floor a few feet away.

He twitched. An almost snore pressed against her ear. She stroked the arm he'd wrapped over her naked hip. He'd been so sick in the hospital the second time. She'd almost lost him twice, now. The universe had sent her two blaring messages that what they had together could easily be severed through no fault of their own, and she'd received them crystal clear.

His grip tightened, and he muttered something in her ear. He moved, his body a pale, disrupted line of stress in the dim moonlight as his legs scissored. She clutched his hand and squeezed.

“Derek,” she whispered.

He shook his head like he was trying to break loose from his dream. “Mmm, no.”

“Derek,” she said, more insistent.

A terrified gasp hit her skin. His body jerked. He kicked at some phantom that wasn't there. “No!” he snapped, and then his sleep shattered. He sucked in a breath. She listened to him swallow. The blankets rustled as he pressed his naked body tightly against hers. His body trembled with disquiet. He grunted.

“You okay?” she whispered as she stroked his arms. The tiny, light hairs on his skin chased her fingertips.

“S'dreaming,” he said thickly.
“That's right,” she said. “You were dreaming.” She stroked his arms. “It's not real, and you're okay.”

He didn't speak for a long time. His breaths tightened as he struggled with his demons. She stared at the shadows dancing along the sides the room, wondering if he saw Gary Clark there. Loitering. Waiting. She imagined him standing there with a gleaming pistol, and she heard his snarled words as he told Derek he was worthless.

“He's not real, Derek,” she said. “It's just you and me here.”

“I know he's not real,” Derek said. “That doesn't mean he's not there.”

“Is he talking to you?”

Derek didn't answer, but that was answer enough. Yes. Yes, Gary Clark was speaking.

“I want...” Derek said, his voice breathy, and his body shook.

She swallowed. “Percocet?”

A pained sigh hitched in his chest. “I just want to sleep,” he said. “It helped me sleep.”

Meredith rolled out of the spoon Derek provided, turning, struggling in the small bed, and pressed her face against his naked chest. He grunted, deep and dark, like he was trying not to cry. She kissed his skin. A taste of salt touched her tongue. And then she kissed him again. His tension drained as she lay on hands, just touching, pressing her warmth into his.

“You can sleep without it,” she told him, a soft, soothing whisper. “Shh.” She kissed him again, and he loosed a stress-venting sigh. “Just think. We're here on the lake, lying naked in the moonlight. We have our forty-eight hours. Uninterrupted. Just you and me. And you can go fishing on the lake tomorrow and relax. I'll go with you in the boat. I promise.”

“Hmm,” he murmured. “Sex?”

“Now?”

“Morrow,” he said, sleep thick in his voice, robbing him of syllables.

“Absolutely,” she assured him.

His thick breathing evened into steady rasps. His grip loosened.

“I'm here,” she soothed. “You're fine. Everything is fine. You can sleep. You can.”

As he spilled into dreams again, she pulled on his arm, and he wrapped around her, warm and naked and hers. Except when she closed her eyes to sleep beside him, she kept thinking of her dream from before, and she couldn't stop hearing Bailey's voice in her head, telling her Derek would be fine.

Dr. Grey, if his pulse-ox gets any lower, we'll need to put him on a ventilator, Derek's doctor at Seattle Presbyterian had told her after pulling her aside. Her world had snapped in two on that moment. Putting somebody on a ventilator was a big freaking deal. A maybe-permanent freaking deal. Whenever somebody was put on a ventilator, there was always a chance, some quirky, unpredictable possibility, that his or her lungs wouldn't start again, and he or she couldn't ever be removed from the ventilator in the future. That was why a ventilator was usually used only as a last
But what had been worse than realizing how bad things were was realizing there wasn't a blessed thing she could say in the situation. The doctor had told her about Derek. Informed her. Not asked her. She'd been a visitor who had no say about his treatment. Never once had the doctor said, Should we put him on a ventilator? Or, Do you know what his wishes are about being on a ventilator? Seattle Presbyterian staff had enforced strict visiting hours that first day, when she knew full well that hospitals, or at least Seattle Grace, went out of their way to give loved ones more time with family members who were dying.

When he'd been in the ICU in Seattle Presbyterian, she'd been allowed ten minutes every two hours during visiting hours, and not at all overnight. He's in critical condition, and he needs to rest, they'd claimed to keep her away, which was true. He had been in critical condition. And he had needed rest. But that was what hospital staff said to somebody they didn't feel should be allowed free access, for one reason or another. They'd loosened up a bit after that first awful day and night, once they'd seen she wasn't some loitering nut job, and he clearly recognized her, even as out of it as he'd been, but, still...

To Seattle Presbyterian, she wasn't Derek Shepherd's wife or his family or anyone.

She was just some girl, and she'd had nothing in her possession to prove otherwise. She doubted they would have done more than nod and smile at the framed Post-it she and Derek kept over their bed.

The situation at Seattle Presbyterian had been so different than her experience at Seattle Grace when he'd been shot. At Seattle Grace, she'd been allowed to see him before he'd recovered fully from the anesthesia. They'd let her sleep in a chair in his ICU cubicle as long as she stayed out of the way of the nurses and doctors. They'd put out a spare cot for her to sleep on in his step-down room without her even asking.

She pressed against him, snuggling closer. They'd been lucky, so far, that their tragedy had been limited to Seattle, and largely limited to Seattle Grace, where everybody knew them. Knew they were a married couple, even if it wasn't by law. If Derek got seriously hurt again, or had some new complication from his injuries or his PTSD or his drug whatever, to the point that he couldn't speak for himself, she didn't know what she would do. She didn't want to be just some girl again.

She bit her lip. What if he slipped, metaphorically, took some pills, and they had to start all over? He'd been clean for little more than a week and a half. It would be so easy, and so tempting, for him to stumble. Wouldn't it? Her gut churned as she worried. Yes, a small voice said. That annoying voice that always told her things she didn't want to hear. He still wants it, even if he's not acting on it, said the voice. He's said so. He said so just now.

If that were to happen, if he were to slip, she would insist on rehab. She'd told him she would. She knew he wouldn't want to go back to Seattle Grace for that, which would mean the Seattle Presbyterian situation all over again, be that at Seattle Pres itself, or some specialized rehab clinic somewhere.

If he became unable to speak for himself, somehow, she'd be just a girl again. Not a wife. Not unless she and he took great pains to get a lot of additional paperwork signed before whatever crisis might pop up in their faces, unwanted.

And they were having a baby together.

What if something happened to Meredith? A lump formed in her throat. She had nobody but Derek and Cristina and Lexie and Alex. Mark, maybe, too, though he was more Derek's person than hers. But that was it. She had five people in the universe. Four and a half, since Mark didn't quite count. Because George had freaking died, and Izzie had stormed out of Meredith's life and refused to return a single phone call except to say stop calling. It's just a place I worked, and I can do that anywhere, Izzie had said when Meredith had tried to tell Izzie she had a home. Izzie was working somewhere in... Boise, now, enjoying her fake fresh start. Or something. Alex would know. Meredith didn't care much anymore. Not after Izzie had lit up a blowtorch and burned the last bridge.

Meredith listened to Derek breathe, such a strong, steady sound compared to how his lungs had sounded when he'd been in the hospital with pneumonia. In and out. In and out. When she moved, he resettled around her as though he were conscious of her needs even in dreams, though he didn't wake. He pulled her close with his strong arms. She relaxed against his heat and the safe cocoon he offered, even as her throat closed up.

She had nobody but him and Cristina and Lexie and Alex, and if something was going to happen to her, she wanted them all to be there. All of them. But at the very least? Him. In the room. Not kept out by stupid visiting hours, or some slip of paper he hadn't freaking signed. She wanted him to be able to say, No, my wife wouldn't want a ventilator. Let her go. Or, Yes, save my wife. Or whatever he thought was necessary for the situation.

She was the recipient of crappy, freaky genes. If she got all early onset Alzheimer-y and couldn't remember who the hell he was, or who the hell she was, she wanted him to be able to speak for her. She needed for him to be able to speak for her, because he understood her. He got her. Getting her was his thing. If she was Alzheimer-y and couldn't remember anything, she wanted decisions on her care to be in his hands. They hadn't really talked much about living wills, or their thoughts on life saving measures in various situations. She wasn't even sure she knew what she wanted for sure. But she trusted him as her soul mate, arm, Shakesma in a blender whatever, to be able to make the right decision because he got her, and that was his thing.

She kissed his chest along the line of the scar on his sternum and closed her eyes, musing until the moments bled together, and she lost track. The moonlight burned overhead, bright like the sun crowned the sky, and she closed her eyes to shut out the blaze. She listened to him breathe. Over and over and over, unceasing. Alive, and okay.

He jerked around her, and his arms tightened like a vise, shocking her out of hypnosis. “No,” he blurted, and the single word exploded next to her ear like a bomb in the close space. His breathing hitched, and then he swallowed.

“You okay?” she said.

He grunted, and then he moaned. It was a thick, weeping sound that made her chest tighten. “No,” he said. “I'm not.” She stroked him, and his tight, shaky breaths subsided into smoother, raspier things, but not the soothing waves she wanted to hear. She reached up, and she pulled her fingers through his hair. Slowly, he relaxed.

“I'm sorry you can't sleep,” she said.

The blankets rustled. “Not your fault,” he said. “I'm sorry to keep you up.”

“You didn't, and you're not,” she said. “I was just thinking about stuff.”

“Mmm. Like what?”
“Just...” She sighed. She didn't see the point in belaboring how she'd felt when he'd been sick and she'd been kept away. Not when he was trying so hard to sleep. She settled on telling him, “I love you.”

“Love you, too,” he echoed, his tone sleepy. Lethargic. Like this nightmare hadn't been as bad, and he was close already to putting it behind him.

She kissed him. The moonlight was freaking bright, even through her eyelids. She sighed and sat up. He pressed his face into his pillow with a groan at her loss, but she ignored him, determined. There must be a cord for the blinds, somewhere. She squinted blearily at the window and felt along the sill, only to stop and stare out at the view. From her new vantage point, she saw not one moon, but two, the second reflected in shimmery, shifting glass. On a whim, she leaned forward, her palms against the latticework, and she pushed with a grunt that made the bed frame jerk and groan. Derek flinched, and the bed squeaked with the harsh movement.

She grimaced. “It's just me. I'm opening the window,” she said. Stupid. She shook her head. She should have warned him. “Or, well... trying to.” Her arms shook with the strain, but she kept pushing. She'd already started this. Better to finish it. And, maybe, chopping out some of the light would help him sleep.

“Need help?” he muttered into his pillow.

“I got it,” she said, half groaning more than speaking, as she forced the window up along its tracks. The thing did not want to move. But then it hitched once. Twice. Finally, the window jerked upward with a protesting moan, and a chilly breeze blew across the bed from outside. The sound of lapping, slosh-y waves and a chorus of frogs spilled into the room and soothed her ears. She'd heard the frogs before, but not the waves. She hadn't realized the frogs meant they were right on top of the water.

She glanced through the screen and down. The ground wasn't several feet below as expected. There was a dock down below to the right, but from this vantage point? Right. On top. Of the lake. Like the cabin was partially on stilts or something. Or maybe a cliff-y thing. On that note, she found the cord for the blinds and plunged the bedroom into muted darkness, which was made imperfect by the moonlight falling through the other window.

Derek sighed as she resettled into his arms. She panted from her exertion. “We're right on the lake,” she said. “Like right. Freaking. On it.”

“Hmm,” he said. He didn't sit up to shove the blind away and look out the window with excitement. He rubbed her shoulder sedately. “I'll catch a fish,” he said, random and half-asleep.

She smiled. Apparently, the window disruption hadn't ruined his progress back to sleep as much as she'd thought it had. She let her eyelids droop. She kissed him. “You'll catch plenty,” she said. She stroked his face, and they both fell asleep to the rhythm of the waves.

---

(Meredith woke up sprawled from corner to corner on the small bed as though she'd become some sort of amoeba overnight, spreading with no rhyme or boundary. Muted sunlight streamed through the window on the neighboring wall. A soft, steady breeze blew over the bed, and the blind made a tapping noise as it swayed freely. The waves outside swished so close to her ears she thought they) might come to sweep her away as she blinked her eyes and readjusted to life over dreaming. The clock beside the bed read 7:30.

She inhaled. The pillows smelled like Derek, and the sheets enveloped her in a deep, comforting warmth that made her reluctant to move and face the day. Except Derek had already gotten up, and this was their forty-eight hours, and she didn't want to miss anything. She sat up and stretched with a yawn. The sheets and green comforter fell away, and the cool air hit her naked skin. Goosebumps crawled over her body. She shivered and crossed her arms over her chest.

She didn't know where her suitcase was, she realized. They'd sort of skipped the unpacking step last night. Wait. There it was. Propped against the wall by the dresser. Derek must have brought it in after he'd woken up. She stood, letting the sheets fall away from her entirely. In the dim light, she paused, and she let her gaze slip downward.

She cupped her breasts, and she frowned. They really didn't look that much bigger to her, but this morning? They ached. Liked they would be getting bigger soon. And that was... pretty cool. A smile spread across her face as she continued her exploration. She slid her palms down her abdomen to rest just below her belly button. She pressed. She couldn't identify anything other than intestines. There wasn't a bump. Not yet. But she grinned, anyway.

“Hi,” she said, staring at her bellybutton, but then she felt corny, and she shut her mouth.

She leaned, and she peeped through the blinds. She took a deep breath as she absorbed the sight of endless blue beyond the window. The clouds had finished clearing up. Placid, deep-blue water spread out underneath an azure sky. Gray mountains stretched across the back of the lake, and green forest crept along the left and right sides of the water. Meredith felt a bit like she was looking down a narrow pipe, and she remembered from the map that the lake was oblong, shaped kind of like a curly mustache, actually.

She let the blinds fall back against the window and looked around the room. She padded over to her suitcase on cold, bare feet, and she slipped into a t-shirt and flannel boxers. When she opened the bedroom door, she heard noises coming from the kitchen, and a warm, fresh scent of something cooking tickled her nose. She inhaled. Something good cooking. Her stomach growled like a beast awakened. After a brief pit stop in the bathroom, she wandered down the short hallway toward the scent. Toward Derek.

Derek stood at the stove wearing nothing but a loose pair of plaid flannel boxers, almost identical to the ones she wore now, which were actually his, but she'd stolen them from the clean laundry basket when they'd been packing. He'd taken out a carton of eggs, milk, and a box of pancake mix. A red bowl with a drip of batter spilling over the lip rested next to the stove, along with an empty plate. A wide circle of batter sizzled on the pan on the stove. He hovered by his bounty with a spatula.

Sleep had mussed his hair into a big, messy disaster, and dark circles hugged his eyes, but... Meredith leaned against the wall, a smile on her face as she watched him skirt the edge of the batter with the spatula, peering underneath to see if it was ready to flip. He whistled. Whistled! His shoulders were loose, and his posture relaxed. He had a bounce in his step as he shifted on the balls of his feet. He slipped the spatula loose and let the pancake fall back onto the pan to cook some more.

When he looked up at her, a wide grin spread across his face, crinkled the skin around his eyes, and made his irises sparkle. Their eyes met. The air sucked out of the room, and she swallowed against the elation that swelled in her throat like a giant bubble at the mere sight of him so... perfect. She hadn't seen him like this in... in...
You a cereal person? he'd asked. Straight out of the box? Or are you all fruit and fiber-y? He'd laughed, the sound clear and happy like a bell, and then he'd kept peppering her with questions, a smile on his face and a sparkle in his eyes. Pancakes? Do you like pancakes?

"Good morning," he said.

"Hi," she said softly.

He looked away to flip the pancake, and the broken eye contact collapsed the tunnel-effect she'd experienced. She saw the room again. The batter sizzled, and steam rose from the pan.

Her stomach rumbled. She loved his pancakes. He wasn't a master chef or anything with the day-to-day stuff, not that she was one to throw stones about cooking, considering she couldn't. At all. He produced edible meals without the assistance of miracles, which beat the crap out anything she could accomplish in the kitchen other than amazing countertop sex. Regardless of whether he brought flare to a beef stroganoff recipe, which he didn't, or dumped his spaghetti sauce out of a prepackaged jar, which he did, he made freaking awesome pancakes. Thick and fluffy and perfect circles, and they always fell apart on her tongue like sweet ambrosia.

"How are you feeling?" he said.

"I'm... fine," she said. "Why?"

He pointed his spatula at her and winked. "The baby. Vomit?"

"Oh," she said. "Oh, I'm..." Her lips parted as her gaze trailed across the hair dusting his chest and giving way to his flat, smooth abs. The pink, raised scar from his surgery, and the ghost of his bullet wound barely registered as her gaze wandered down and down. Underneath his navel, a thin line of dark fuzz tapered, interrupted by the waistline of his boxers, but her brain filled in the rest from exquisite memory. She swallowed as she dragged her gaze back up, except that didn't help. He had such a nice chest. And shoulders. And biceps. And everything. She cleared her throat. "I'm really good."

"Not sick?" he prodded.

"Not right now. It sort of just hits me," she said as he turned and flipped the pancake from the pan onto the plate with a twist of the spatula. His hand barely moved. He reached for the batter bowl and poured a new dollop of batter onto the pan. "How long have you been up?" she said.

He shrugged, which probably meant it'd still been dark out when he'd given up on sleep. A twinge of worry hit her as she wondered if, maybe, he was overcompensating for being exhausted. She didn't even realize her foot had moved until he waved his spatula at her like a sword and shooed her away from the stove. "No," he said, and then he pointed across the center island at the small dinette set table in the dining room area. "Sit."

"But—"

"Sit," he commanded. "I'm making you pancakes. I can't have your wretched cooking karma over here overwhelming mine."

"Wretched?" She frowned, but she didn't move. "That's really mean."

He quirked a grin at her as he leaned against the stove and crossed his arms. Her breaths tightened as her gaze wandered up the slant of his hip and side. His boxers dipped with the new position to ride sinfully low on his hips, and a dark line of curly hair peeked above his waistband. The whorl of fuzz below his navel pointed downward like an arrow that she had to exercise amazing restraint not to follow to its terminus. God, he looked good doing that. Leaning. His quads flexed as he balanced himself.

“We've had this discussion before, you know,” he said. “I fail to see how feeding my starving wife is mean.”

“It's not,” she said. “I like pancakes.”

He moved, destroying his luscious lean. She couldn't help but sigh as he flipped the second pancake onto the plate next to the stove, and he poured more batter onto the pan.

“Sit, will you?” he said.

She pouted. She felt a bit like her hormones had smacked her in the face with a two-by-four, but she wanted to ask him to keep doing that. The leaning thing. He could even burn the pancakes if it meant he would just... pose. Like that. Forever. Well, not forever. Until she burst with sexual frustration and jumped him, at least, though.

He pulled up his boxers with an absent tug, and she just about died. “Seriously?” she said.

“Seriously,” he replied. “Sit.”

“That's what's mean!” she said as she stomped to the table. “You're practically naked, and you're making me sit at the table, which is far, far away.”

He smirked. “Just building things up for later.”

She crossed her arms over her chest and collapsed into the small wooden chair. “Later, huh?” she said. “What about now?” From this vantage point, the center island blocked the goods below his waist, but she could still watch his delectable—

“Now is pancakes,” he said, and she flinched, ripped from her musing.

She sighed. “I'm surprised you didn't fish for breakfast or something. Don't you New Yorkers like lox or whatever?”

He flipped the pancake over in the pan. She watched the curve of his spine and the way his body shifted. His deltoids were truly fabulous. Hard and smooth, and... She blinked when he turned to face her again. Heat bloomed across her face.

“A, salmon is not a freshwater fish, so I wouldn't be able to catch one here even if I wanted to,” he informed her with a haughty grin. “B, there are no bagels, just Wonder Bread, and—”

“Wait,” she said, and he stopped talking. “Wait. Lox is salmon?”

He rolled his eyes. “Yes, Mere. Lox is salmon.”

“I thought lox was lox.”

His lip quivered, and he blushed, not from sexual heat or embarrassment, but almost as though he were fighting not to laugh. Fighting and losing. His gaze sparkled, as though he found her precious and adorable and... hopelessly ignorant about fish. “There is no fish called lox.” At least he managed to keep his voice patient and even, despite his dissolving expression.

She frowned. “So, you can't catch it?”
“Well, you can catch pox,” he said. “But not lox.”

She watched him flip the fourth pancake onto a stack on the plate. “This sounds like Dr. Seuss,” she said.

He shrugged as he reached across the counter. His shoulders bunched, and a fleshy tearing sound filled the room. What the hell? She leaned to see beyond his torso. He'd ripped a banana off the bunch that had been resting on the back of the counter with the tomatoes. “I'm just making my wife pancakes,” he said.

“As long as we don't talk about fox, socks, and co—”

“Besides,” he said, interrupting her. He spun around to face her, holding a partially peeled banana. She couldn't stop the burble of laughter that made her snort. He looked at his phallic bounty, and his expression lit with something... evil. Lecherous. He rested the fruit on the web of flesh between his thumb and his index finger and slid his hand along the underside in a gesture that seemed vaguely and blatantly dirty all at once. Her eyes widened, and she lost her laughter somewhere when her brain decided to paint the same picture with him cupped in her hand as she slid her grip along his hard length. He would rumble in her ear, aroused and glassy-eyed, and she would—

“Pox, lox, and all Dr. Seuss aside, I didn't want to contribute to your new nickname,” he concluded with a smirk, interrupting her fantasy, though she still saw it. Hovering. Stuck in her brain like gum in her hair. He turned away from her and grabbed a knife, leaving her floundering.

She blinked, and the brilliant, sparking image faded. She was at the table. And he was over there. And there was no nakedness or touching or sex or anything. Sadly. And then she frowned. He'd done that on purpose, damn it!

“What... What new nickname?” she said, her voice faint as she caught up with what he'd said.

He glanced over his shoulder and winked. “McPukey.”

Her jaw tumbled open. “McMean!”

He sliced the banana into pieces. “I'm cooking you pancakes, trying desperately to save you from the pain and suffering of vomiting next to my shoe again, and I'm half-naked and letting you watch,” he said. “That's not McMean.”

“Well, what would you call it? You pulled your pants up. And you're not leaning. And you did dirty things with a banana.”

He chuckled. “What things with a banana?” he said. “Where your mind takes you is not my problem. And I don't know that there's an adequate word to describe what an awesome husband I'm being,” he countered. “Do you?”

She rolled her eyes. “McWhatever.”

He sighed. “So unappreciated,” he said as he walked to the refrigerator. He pulled open the door. “I was even planning on putting it all on a little tray and carrying it to you, but you woke up too fast.”

She snickered. “So, I've botched your nefarious breakfast plans?”

“Yes,” he said with a pout as he carried a can of whipped cream back to her plate. He shook the can. “And it's a real shame,” he said, and then he popped the cap off the bottle. He aimed at the pancakes, and he gave her a lecherous smirk. He squirted the can as he told her in a low voice,
“Because they were very.” He accented the word with a squirt of cream. “Very nefarious.”

“That's...” She swallowed. Her chair creaked as she shifted. A hot flush bloomed across her cheeks and her throat as she thought about what he might have done with pancakes and syrup and whipped cream if he'd found her sleeping naked earlier.

If I win, he'd said last night, a rumble in her ear, I'm eating you, though.

“What are you...” She cleared her throat. “Um, what are you having?”

He turned to face her, the plate of pancakes in his hand. His gaze roved her figure appreciatively, and she felt naked despite her clothing. “See,” he said, “the breakfast in bed plan involved me eating, but now you're awake, and you've ruined it.”

He delivered her plate to the table with a fork and a bottle of syrup, but she barely looked at it as the space between them closed. His body heat pressed into her space, and she licked her lips. Focus. She had to fuck— focus. He leaned into her as the plate thunked onto the vinyl place mat. He kissed her, a deep rumble stuck in his throat as his lips brushed her skin, light, tantalizing, and all too brief. She moaned as he drifted away from her.

“Don't stop,” she said. “I want...” Incoherency strangled her. “Banana...”

To which he replied with a smirk, “Isn't the anticipation worth it?”

No, she wanted to say. Now!

He swaggered to the chair beside her and sat down. It was the slide of his ribs along his pale torso that yanked her back to earth as though her parachute had failed. He wasn't thin to a dangerous degree, but he was thin, and it didn't take much to offset his sexy, delicious illusion of perfect health. She shook her head and tried to calm her thudding heart. He couldn't cheat like that. He couldn't use subterfuge to take her away from the issue at hand, damn it.

“Derek, seriously, what are you eating?” she prodded gently.

“I had a pancake earlier. With syrup, even.”

A pancake. A single pancake. Not hardly enough, but something, supposedly. She glanced at the stove where he'd been fixing everything. The spatula rested on the countertop. Only one egg was missing from the open carton that she could see, and there were no dirty plates anywhere except the one that held her pancakes. The room had smelled like something cooking as she'd walked in, but...

She frowned. A lump formed in her throat when she realized she didn't believe him.

Silence stretched.

He sighed, and he didn't speak as he stood. She watched him through a watery blur as he returned to the kitchen and poured himself a small bowl of shredded wheat. He put the eggs and other perishables away while he stood at the counter. He came back with a spoon tucked into his bowl, and he sat. He looked her in the eye as he spooned a piece of shredded wheat and stuffed it into his mouth. He winked at her as he chewed, and a bit of sparkle returned to his gaze, as if to say, See? Eating, now. All okay.

“Sorry,” she said, her voice soft.
He shrugged. “Are you going to eat your awesome pancakes?”

She nodded. She picked up her fork. And she looked at her plate. Tension drained out of her as though a dam had broken. She chuckled as she stared at his concoction. She couldn't stop herself.

“Derek...” she said, incredulous.

“What?”

She covered her mouth with her hand to hide her grin. Unsuccessfully. “My breakfast is smiling at me.”

“Well, it's a happy day, isn't it?” he said. He leaned, and he kissed her. “And we can do naughty, naughty things later tonight.” He hovered by her ear, and his voice dropped low. “With bananas.”

“Nefarious things?” she said.

His face lit up. “Oh, yes. I like the sound of that.”

She rocked in her chair with his touch and laughed as she brought her fork down onto the stack of pancakes. She almost hated to cut them. He'd made a smiley face with the banana slices, and he'd given the face a fluffy whipped cream toupee. In fact, she decided as she sliced her Donald Trump pancakes into bite-sized, Trump-let pieces, eating them felt a bit like murder.

“You're so...” she said. She took a bite and forgot about Donald Trump as she sighed with bliss. He really did make good pancakes.

He munched on his shredded wheat. “So?” he prodded with a goofy grin.

She waved her fork as she searched for a word. “Unimaginably corny,” she decided.

He bumped her with his elbow. “I should have given you a frowny face,” he said, his tone indignant, but his face belied the seriousness he managed to fake.

She laughed. Really laughed. A loud, chortling belly laugh. Not at the smiley face, or his response, or anything except the fact that being with him made her feel... just... good. Euphoric. She stabbed a banana piece and ate it with a pancake chunk. The whipped cream and perfectly browned batter melted on her tongue as she chewed. She swallowed, and she looked at him. He liked the way his eyes danced, and how carefree this place seemed to make him.

“Thank you for the pancakes,” she said.

He nodded. “You're welcome.” His jaw worked as he chewed another piece of shredded wheat. He swallowed. “So, what's the plan today?”

“I thought you wanted to go fishing.”

“I do want to go fishing, but not if you'd rather do something else,” he said. His chair scraped on the floor as he scooted closer. “This is our forty-eight hours. Not mine.”

She shoveled a huge bite of pancake. Melting whipped cream dripped down her chin. She wiped it with her finger and she licked it away. She closed her eyes, unable to contain a small whine of pleasure as she chewed. When she swallowed, her eyes drifted open. He watched her with an intent adoration that made her feel warm inside.

“I want to,” she assured him as she took another tasty bite.
A bright, hopeful smile spread across his face. “Fish?”

“You can do the fishing part,” she said. “I'll read.”

His smile wavered. “Are you sure?” he said as he took another bite. “We could do something you're interested in.”

“I'm interested in seeing you relax, and spending time with you, and finding out what happens in chapter twelve of my book,” she said. “This will take care of everything at once.”

She'd found a new book series recently and had been both dismayed and thrilled that there were at least eight books already written. With her busy schedule, she couldn't read more than a chapter here and there. She made slow progress, but progress. She'd packed the one she was reading, and the next one, just in case, because she'd had no idea how much he'd want to do on a trip like this, less than two weeks after he'd quit abusing Percocet, and on top of everything else going on in his head.

He frowned. “I don't want you to get bored.”

“I won't,” she said. Truthfully, the forty-eight hour push had been an excuse. To force him to relax. Take a breather. Get out of the freaking house, where he'd festered for months. She'd known there'd been a possibility he would do nothing more than sleep on this trip, in too much deficit from all the heaping portions of stress life had served him, and too befuddled by the new medication, to do much else. She hadn't minded that prospect, because he needed sleep as much as he needed to relax. Though, as she grinned at him, she couldn't help but be glad that he'd bounced back enough to do things. To play. To smile. To enjoy himself.

She put her fork down with a clink and touched his knee. “And, if I do get bored, we'll come back,” she said to appease him. “I have great faith in your ability to steer a boat.”

He snorted. “Your confidence in my abilities is appreciated.”

“We could call you McFishy,” she suggested as she took another bite. “Or McCaptain.”

He made a face. “I think I liked McDreamy better,” he said with a wry tone.

“I'd agree, but I think waxing your ego at this point might be a mistake.”

“Fine, McPukey,” he said. He shook his head and took a bite of his shredded wheat. “We'll have it your way.”

She stuck her tongue out at him, and he snickered as he swallowed. She watched him eat another bite and glanced at his bowl. He'd nearly finished the whole thing. Stringy bits of orphaned shredded wheat swam in the leftover milk, along with some half pieces, but he'd eaten all of the large pieces.

She forked away a chunk of her pancakes, stabbed them onto the tines, dipped them in syrup, and shoveled another bite. She sighed with bliss. When she heard a clink on her plate that she hadn't initiated, she opened her eyes in time to catch him making off with a piece of pancake.

She gasped. “Thief!”

With a smirk, Derek spooned a banana piece and took that, too, staring at her, as if daring her to protest. She didn't. His eyes twinkled as he chewed. “Just making sure it's safe,” he said. “I'd hate to kill you with a stack of poisoned pancakes.”
“Aren’t you supposed to do that before I start eating?” she said.

He shrugged. Her eyes widened as he pushed his spoon into Donald Trump’s remaining eyeball and took another bite. He chewed and swallowed without comment. She nudged her plate toward him, amazed as he went for another bite. And another, including an extra heap of whipped cream. He leaned back in his chair, chewing. His face relaxed. A subtle curl twitched the corners of his lips. Almost like he looked in that last moment between sweet release and collapse, during that last throb of pleasure. Her eyes watered as she pinpointed with unmistakable clarity the emotion hovering on his face. Enjoyment. Unadulterated.

“You really do make good pancakes,” she said, her voice soft, but her throat felt thick. She blinked. She couldn't remember the last time he'd shown anything other than indifference or dislike toward eating. Her breaths tightened in her chest. She pushed the plate the rest of the way in front of him. Her fork, too. The plate and the fork clinked, and the noise snapped him out of that strange hypnosis.

He frowned at the plate of food he'd so artfully constructed and then at her. “You're done already?” he said. “You usually eat the whole thing. All four of them.”

“I couldn't eat another bite,” she said as she crossed her arms over her stomach, barely able to keep her tone from cracking. She hadn't lied. She'd eaten about half of the stack, which, honestly, was enough to fill her. She ate the rest to stuff herself, usually, because it tasted good. Because his pancakes made her into an unrepentant, raging glutton.

A fullness settled into her body as she stared at him. A sated, happy feeling. More full than she'd felt in months. Not with food. Not really. Just...

Everything.

She almost broke when he shrugged and kept eating, swapping from his spoon to her fork without hesitation. Like he didn't even realize what this moment meant. Maybe, he didn't realize at all. Maybe, he'd gotten so used to gray, he didn't recognize color anymore. Or... Something. She stared, dumbstruck for the longest time, until the last bite disappeared between his lips, and he'd cleaned her plate.

He swallowed, and he cocked his head at her. “You're staring at me again,” he said.

“I know,” she said. “You're nice to stare at.”

She wanted to stare forever.

She stood, and he tensed to follow, but she put a hand on his shoulder to keep him where he was. She came up behind him, and she leaned against the wooden back of his chair and arched downward. She rested her chin against his shoulder, pressed her cheek to his, and wrapped her arms around his chest. His unshaven face rasped against her skin as she nuzzled him, but she didn't care. Didn't care about anything except being close to him. She pulled him tight, and she rested against him, breathing him in, silent.

He didn't speak. Didn't ask her why. As though he sensed her need for closeness. She kissed him. He turned his head. She leaned, and she brushed his lips. He smelled like syrup, and he tasted sweet. A rumble pressed against her lips as he made a sound against her. Soft. Pleased. A deep, masculine purr that slipped down her spine like silk.

She'd almost lost this. Twice. Almost lost him. Twice.
“I um...” She cleared her throat with a cough, and she reached to wipe her face. Was she crying? No. Sort of? A little. Stupid, stupid hormones. “I was thinking last night about things.”

“What things?” he said.

She kissed him, and then she pulled away. Tugged on his arm as she bit her lip and smiled. He followed without hesitation, and they moved into the bright living room, which, in the daytime, she realized, had a gorgeous view. The huge window against the far wall opened out onto a wooden deck and a set of winding steps that went down, down, down to a dock, far below. The dock she'd seen stretching out to the lake last night, she presumed. Beyond that, the lake spread in a long blue curve, hugged by sloping, verdant green on either side. The sunshine slanting down from the east made the water shimmer and sparkle. If she squinted, she could see little dark dots interrupting the shine. Boats. Or something.

He shuffled toward the olive-y-colored couch, which faced the window looking out on the lake. He pressed his back into the arm of the couch. She collapsed against him and curled up in his arms. He kissed the top of her head. He pulled her fingers through her hair. She felt the tickle as strands shifted, and she sighed. His body heat pressed against her as he looked at her, a questioning gaze in his eyes, as if to say, Well?

She took a breath. “I think we should get married.”

Confusion wavered in his gaze. “We are married.”

“Not according to the State of Washington,” she said.

Silence stretched, and she tensed, wondering if, maybe, he wouldn't like this idea. The Post-it had been his idea. He'd insisted he was happy signing that instead of signing a marriage license. She hadn't really thought much about it at the time because so much other stuff had been happening. Maybe, he'd had some secret agenda.

“Okay,” he said, but she barely heard him as her mind raced.

“I mean, our anniversary will always be Post-it day,” she assured him as she stroked his chest. “And, I don't want to do anything crazy or fancy, but I really think we should do this, and I...” Wait. She blinked, and she looked up at him. “You said okay? As in, okay, let's do it?”

He nodded, and a bright, infectious smile spread across his face. “Let's do it,” he said.

“Oh,” she said. Oh? What kind of response was oh? “It's just that the Post-it was your idea, and I thought you might—”

“Meredith,” he interrupted. He kissed her. “It was my idea because you were freaking out.”

“About time,” she said. “I was freaking out about time. Not about marrying you. I'm so glad I married you.”

“I know that, but you were still freaking out.” And I needed to fix it, said his gaze, though he didn't speak the words.

“I was freaking out,” she admitted. “I do that.”

“You do,” he said. His tone dropped low, almost reverential as he added, “But you wouldn't be you if you didn't.”
“You really want to get married?” she asked. “I mean officially? Like 'let's file joint taxes' married?”

He grinned. “Maybe, we could claim all your strays as dependents.”

She hit his shoulder playfully. “Derek!”

“Yes, I'd love to go to city hall with you,” he said. He kissed her. “But our anniversary is Post-it day.”

“Okay,” she said.

Content, appeased, she settled against him, and she stared out the window at the little dots floating on the water. One had wandered closer and had become a large, frothy white triangle. A sail. She watched, unable to do anything but be relaxed, as boats wandered back and forth across the view. A soft breeze creaked against the windows. A white bird swooped low over the water, dipped with a splash, and then pulled away with something wriggling in its beak.

“May I ask what brought this on?” he said.

She shrugged in his arms. “Just... everything that's happened.”

“The shooting?” he said, his voice soft. She glanced at his face. He didn't seem disturbed. Only reflective. Apologetic. Concerned for her.

“Everything, Derek,” she said. “We've both been seriously hurt. I've needed surgery twice. You got very, very sick. It's worked out okay, so far, but what about next time? I'm pregnant. I just want... things to be taken care of.”

He swallowed. He rested his left palm flat against her belly and rubbed her. “Nothing's going to happen with the baby,” he said, forceful despite his gentle touch. Almost as if that thought were a life-preserver for him in the choppy, relentless waves of all that had gone wrong.

You're pregnant, he'd told her when she'd tried to tell him the first trimester was dangerous and prone to disaster.

“I'm not saying anything will happen,” she said, “but it would be pretty idiotic to assume we're invincible after all the freaking memos to the contrary.”

He nodded, though his expression remained rocky. Sharp. Jagged. She reached, and she stroked his face before wandering down. She found a soft curl between his pectorals, and she twirled it with her index finger. The bump of his scar wandered underneath her touch. She turned, and she kissed his chest, lips to his bare skin. A hint of salt pressed against her tongue. Salt, and... him. She inhaled as her mind sparked with all the times she'd touched him there. Kissed him. Loved him. She wondered if his thoughts had shifted from the baby to himself, and wondering if something would happen to him. Again. She hated that she might have turned his thoughts from away from the joy of pancakes to worries of being hurt by someone evil, simply by suggesting a legal marriage.

I'm terrified, he'd said. Every moment of every day. You're the only reason I get out of bed in the morning.

A lump formed in her throat. He'd done nothing to deserve those fears, and it wasn't fair.

He surprised her with a kiss. “I'm okay,” he said, his voice soft. “I'm okay. Just a bad turn, there.”
She stared at him. His expression had lightened, and she believed him.

“When do you want to do it?” he said, as if to keep them moving. Away from the bad spot.

“We could go on Monday.”

He nodded. “We could.”

“Why do I sense a but?”

He shrugged. “Our Post-it was a three minute thing because we didn't have time. Why not plan this a little more and invite people? Don't you want Cristina there?”

She raised her eyebrows. “You want Cristina there?”

A small smile pursed his lips. “Yeah, I do.”

She frowned. “Okay, who are you, and where'd you stash Derek's body? Because I'd like it back.”

He chuckled. “I'm serious, Mere. I want her there because I love you, and you've told me point blank that she's your family. Her and Alex and Lexie. Don't you want your family there?”

“It feels weird to treat a ten minute city hall thing as more serious than our actual marriage.”

“It's not more serious or more special,” he countered. “But we have some time to think about it and not be impulsive. This is our chance. Why not?”

The longing that squeezed his tone surprised her. Izzie and her overzealous wedding hurricane, one that had had everything to do with Izzie's dreams, and none to do with Meredith's or Derek's, had swept away any traces of their plans. Actually, Meredith realized, they'd never really discussed what kind of wedding Derek would want. She'd told him she wasn't a frilly dress person, and that she didn't see herself getting married in a church. He hadn't countered with his own desires.

_We'll get naked and get married in a field of flowers_, was all he'd said in response. Joking. Putting her at ease. Letting her know he would be comfortable with whatever she decided.

He didn't seem to be a big wedding person. Meredith could recall his look of horror at being forced into a tuxedo with tails, and his quiet disbelief when they'd stood in the middle of the church Izzie had booked for them.

“So, you want to plan something instead of just doing it?” she said.

“I guess I do,” he said. “Since we're on the subject.”

She stroked him. “You are such a cheesy romantic.”

He frowned. “It's not cheesy.”

“Hopeless, then,” she decided. “Hopeless romantic.”

A scarlet hue spread across his face as though he were embarrassed by her assessment. After all, hopeless romanticism wasn't macho or arrogant or strong, not according to the Bible of Testosterone. _He's still an optimist_, a voice said. _He still believes in true love and magic and soul mates..._ She blinked, and her vision fuzzed as she leaned into him, wrapped her arms around him, and breathed. He still believed in true love and soul mates, and somehow, he'd decided that was her. She was his soul mate. She was his true love. And he made her remember it whenever he spoke her name like the breath before a prayer, and whenever he told her he loved her, and, really, whenever he looked at her. He made her feel like a person. Not a freak.

Do you know what kind of miracle it is that Derek is who he is?

She hadn't understood it at the time. Now, she did.

She grinned, and she kissed him long and deep. He panted as she pulled away, his gaze glassy. The flush on his face had shifted from embarrassment to arousal. She placed a palm against his cheek. Stubble scraped her palm. She pulled her fingers back through his disheveled, untamed hair.

“It's something I love about you,” she said, honest, stark. It was something she'd come back for, she thought. Though she didn't quite know what that meant. “That you can think like you do after everything that's happened to you.” She swallowed hard as she stared into the fathomless blue of his eyes, hoping she made him feel even an eighth of what he did for her. Her body quivered. “Sometimes, I wish I could be like that,” she admitted.

“You wouldn't be Meredith without your dark and twisty,” he said.

She pressed her nose against him, relishing his scent and the warm feel of his skin. He shifted underneath her. “I guess we do sort of complement each other,” she said.

He nodded. “We do.”

She settled on the couch, her head in his lap. She sighed as she watched the sparkling water outside while he stroked her back with slow, soothing circles. “I could pick out a nice dress,” she said. “Not a froofy white gown or anything, but... something nice.”

“I'd like that.”

“Do you want to invite your sisters and your mom and Mark and whoever?”

He looked down at her, his eyes sparkling. “My family?”

“You want me to bring mine.” She kissed his bare knee. “It's only fair.”

“You'd be willing to put up with my family again?”

She smiled. “You'll be able to protect me this time.”

A bark of laughter jerked his frame. “I don't know if you noticed, but they're kind of a force of nature,” he said. “I might get steamrolled, now that I can't play the wounded and vulnerable card.”

“They're your family,” she said. “I'll live.”

She'd already lived through the whole Shepherd shindig without him in good enough shape to save her, and she'd done all right. His sisters had started out dismissive of her when they'd shown up at Seattle Grace, back before he'd even been able to walk, but other than Nancy, they'd warmed up to her over the days that had followed, as though they'd realized she was a real person with feelings and hopes and dreams just like the rest of them. Not the gold-digging, home-wrecking bar whore that Nancy had no doubt described her as. Before they'd all left for Sea-Tac from the hospital, they'd pulled her into a big, sandwich-y hug that had squeezed the breath out of her, and they'd made her promise to make Derek visit them more often.

His sisters overwhelmed her. She didn't understand them. But she didn't hate them, and she could live with them for a wedding if he wanted them there.

“You'd seriously be okay with that?” he said as though he'd read her thoughts.

She looked at him and grinned. “Okay with using you as a human shield? Absolutely.”

“Your concern overwhelms me.”

His wry tone made her laugh, which he met with a small smile. She shifted, and he lifted his hands while she struggled to move onto her back. She stared up at him as he resettled around her. He put a warm hand on her belly as he stared out the window, rubbing, absent, and with the other, he cupped her forehead and ran his fingers through her loose hair. The flannel of his boxers felt good against her face. She leaned into his stomach as he watched the water, his gaze growing distant as he plunged into his thoughts.

“What are you thinking?” she said.

He shook his head. “My family.”

“What about them?”

“That'd be twenty-two plane tickets for my sisters, brothers-in-law, nieces, nephews, and mom, and I'm not sure where we'd put them all when they got here. Mom would have to stay at the house. That's not negotiable. I guess hotels for the rest, but...” He swallowed, and he rubbed the bridge of his nose. “If my entire immediate family comes, I'm sure I'm going to have at least three sets of aunts and uncles who tag along. Maybe, four. Five if the ones who moved to New Mexico find out.”

Meredith blinked. She'd been thinking sisters. Not the entire cadre they'd inevitably be traveling with for an occasion like this. The idea of meeting a Shepherd army that size made Meredith's stomach quiver with nerves, but she forced them away. She'd told him she would deal with his family, and she would. She could. They were related to him, and they all loved him, and he loved them, and she would try.

“So?” Meredith said. “We can figure it out.”

“Yeah,” he said, his tone wavering and not at all sure. The look on his face shifted to something troubled.

She sat up. She touched his shoulder. Unyielding tension met her fingertips. “Derek?”

“That's more than thirty people just off the top of my head,” he said. The color seeped out of his face, leaving him pallid instead of a healthy fleshy pink. His head ticked to the side, as if someone had shouted in his ear, and he'd been surprised by it, but had managed to cover up most of his reaction. “They'd all want to talk to me,” he said. “And Mary, Morgan, and Cody are still practically babies. They'd—”

“Hey,” she said, her eyes widening. He'd started to tremble. She wrapped her arms around his bare shoulders and squeezed. Tight. “Hey. It's okay. We'll put them up in a hotel, and we'll have a reception or something, and it'll be fine.” She hoped, though she had no idea how she'd pull off that level of organization, but she would, if he wanted them there, and he couldn't handle the planning because it was too stressful. She would do that for him. She'd figure it out, somehow.
Except her assurances didn't appease him. He shook in her arms, and she had no idea why. The speed at which this conversation gone from happy to upset made her head swirl. His behavior almost smacked of a slow motion slide into another panic attack, though she had no idea how thoughts of his family had triggered it. He loved his family. Didn't he? Before she could tell him to breathe and, maybe, take stock of himself, though, he did it on his own. Worked at calming himself down.

He made a sick, disgusted sound, and then he took a deep, long breath and blew it out with his eyes closed, and she felt the rhythm of the night before resume. He breathed in for a count of three, and out for a count of three, and in, and out, and in, and out. She didn't say a word. She pushed up on her knees, pressed her chest against his shoulder, and she held him. He leaned into the touch, and she splayed a palm against his spine. She rubbed in slow, soothing circles, while he rested with his eyes closed, breathing.

The tension left his body as though it were water flowing through a sieve. The shaking stopped. He curled into her embrace. “Oh,” he said, his voice deep and low.

“You're getting really good at that,” Meredith said, her voice soft. “No panic attack. Do you want some water?”

He nodded. She hated to leave him, but she stood, and she stretched, and she walked back to the kitchen to fetch him something to drink. She dumped some ice cubs into a tall glass and ran the the tap in the big, stainless steel sink to fill it.

When she walked back, he had his face pressed into his hands, and he rested propped against his knees. She sat down beside him and placed the glass on the dingy coffee table. The water caught the sunlight with a flash as it wavered back and forth and settled. She kissed his shoulder and leaned against him.

“Doing okay?” she said.

“I think I'd like to do something more quiet,” he said, almost as though he couldn't find his voice. He leaned, and he reached for the glass. He didn't shake, but he seemed... willowy. As if he were ready to topple.

Meredith frowned, watching him as he took a sip and then rolled the cool glass against his forehead. The thick crystal sparkled in the light. “So, you don't want your family there?” she said.

“I do,” he said. Shadows seemed to gather on his face. His eyes watered as he put the water glass down. “I do want them there, but...”

She blinked. Her heart squeezed when she realized it wasn't just logistics he was upset about. Derek loved his family. He loved them. But they were an army of sisters and brothers-in-law and screaming kids and doting aunts and uncles and who knew what else? Cousins? Were his grandparents still alive?

Kids, particularly toddlers who liked to shriek, were going to be noisy and nosy. Babies would cry. And adults, even if they knew they needed to be quiet and considerate, would have issues as the crowd grew more concentrated... or inebriated. City hall rooms were tiny to begin with, which meant the wedding itself would be concentrated, and any sort of wedding reception was bound to have alcohol, which meant the reception would fall under the inebriated column.

For a man who had problems with sudden movements, loud noises, and lots of people crowding him, the whole Shepherd mess would be a recipe for disaster. And that was just... crap. She swallowed, and she hugged him so hard her arms hurt. She pressed her nose into the soft mess of curls over his ear.

“That is a lot of people,” she said. “It's okay if you don't think you—”

“I can't,” he said, interrupting her. “I know I can't do it.” The frustrated hopelessness in his tone made her feel so freaking helpless. He stared at the water beyond the window, a brooding cloud in his gaze.

“Maybe, soon?” she said. “I don't mind waiting. We could wait until—”

“Until I'm better?” he snapped. “And when will that be?” All at once, he closed his eyes and sighed, as if he'd lost patience with himself. “Meredith,” he said, the word soft and cleansing and apologetic. He continued in a more even tone, “That might be a year from now. Or never. I want to do this. We should do this. Soon. And if we wait...”

He didn't finish his sentence, leaving the impending, predictable future dangling, unspoken. If they waited too long, they would never get it done. The Post-it had narrowly averted a never-ending engagement as it was. They couldn't wait. But she wanted to wait. For him. So, he could have the wedding he wanted. With his family. She didn't know what to say. She didn't know anything. She pressed herself against him. He sighed, and he relaxed in her arms.

“Maybe, just my Mom?” he said. “And Mark?”

She pulled her fingers through his hair. “Would you be happy with just them there?” she said.

“Meredith, the mere fact that you want to do this makes me happy,” he said. “The rest is just window dressing.”

“You're sure?”

He nodded. “It's a compromise.”

She searched his face. He seemed... okay. Not thrilled. But content. She could live with that if he could.

“Do you think your sisters would get it?” she said.

A wry bark of laughter fell from his lips. “I have no idea. They all had huge weddings with lots of people, and my attendance was never optional.”

“What about before? With Addison?”

“That was big, too,” he said. “And they all came.”

She kissed him. “Let's ask your mom,” she said. “I bet she'll have some ideas on how to pull this off without hurting any feelings.

His gaze brightened with hope. “Maybe, yeah. Though, I don't know how. I want you there, but I don't want you there?” He made a face. “How do you even say that?”

She shrugged. “We'll think of something.”

He sighed. “I hate this.”

“It'll get better,” she said, and when he said nothing in response, she squeezed his shoulder. She kissed him. “I love you, and it'll get better, and, now, I think I have a better nickname for you.”

He looked at her. “Oh?”

She winked. “McHusband,” she said.

A small smile curled his lips. He leaned into her, and he kissed her. “That's a good one. Let's go with that.”

---

Better than our first kiss

A steady, chilling wind whipped over the lake. Meredith shivered, staring at the cabin's dock behind them over Derek's shoulder as it shrunk from life-sized to miniature proportions. The little engine on the boat whirred and sputtered, and she fingered her orange life jacket. She frowned at the water rushing past the sides of the boat. The very cold water.

The Chief had happily babbled on and on about his boat after he'd handed over the keys to the cabin. He'd promised the boat was in good working order, and that she and Derek could take it out if they wanted. When Meredith had, in turn, suggested to Derek that they go fishing on this trip, she'd been thinking the Chief's boat would be, well, an actual boat. Maybe one with a real steering wheel and a deck and chairs with actual padding. Maybe a sheltered down below. Or sails. Or... something. She had not pictured what was essentially a little rowboat with an outboard motor and a chipping paint job.

But Derek had grinned like a kid high on sugar when he'd pulled off the blue tarp covering the boat and checked the fuel, and he'd kept grinning as he'd transferred his fishing junk from its mountainous pile on the dock into the little boat, where the pile seemed even more mountainous. Like mutant mountainous. Rockies versus Appalachians. He had a cooler, and fishing poles, and a tackle box, and other crap she couldn't even begin to identify that looked like it might be important. For fishing, anyway.

The choppy surf caused the boat to skip and jump as it cut through the water like a blunt knife through gristly steak. Meredith gripped the bench she sat on, knuckles white, her hair snapping all over the place. Smacking her eyeballs. Getting stuck between her lips. She blinked and spat. She probably should have worn a ponytail holder. That would have been smart.

At least the open air refreshed her lungs, the cerulean sky was clear, and the water sparkled in the sunlight almost as much as Derek's happy grin. That all made this endeavor worth the dubious nature of their transportation.

The motor of the boat whirred to a halt as Derek picked their spot, somewhere in the middle of the giant blue expanse. The green blur along the bank became trees interspersed with houses and cabins as the boat slowed to an aimless drift. Craggy mountains towered along the horizon in all directions. A flock of ducks or geese or... water bird things floated several hundred feet away, bobbing on the surface of the water, splashing. A pair of hikers wearing yellow weaved through the tree trunks in the distance, barely identifiable as more than bright specs of color. Water sloshed against the boat. She swallowed and pulled her messy hair away from her face. His fishing gear rattled as he rummaged through it.

He selected one of his fishing poles and looked up with a hopeful grin. “Are you sure you don't want to fish?”
She stared at him. He sat on the opposite bench, bundled in a dark navy coat and a clashing neon orange life jacket. His tangled hair fluttered in the chilly breeze. The scarlet hint of windburn had flushed the tips of his ears and his cheeks and his nose. He had a windblown, breathless look that contrasted with his dark stubble. He looked... alive. Exhilarated. Happy. And the sight of him warmed her to the core.

She gave him a coy smile. “I don't even know how,” she said.

He smiled back at her. “If only you had somebody with you who was known for his excellent teaching skills.”

“I love that you love fishing,” she said honestly, watching as he fiddled with the pole he'd picked up, making adjustments or... something, “but it really doesn't interest me.”

He sighed and shook his head, though that didn't disrupt his grin. “I guess I'll live,” he said, mock woe hugging his tone. He looked at her again, and his gaze shifted into something subtly pleading. “You're absolutely sure you don't want to try it?”

She flexed her fingers, working life back into them and displacing the numb bite of wind. “I'll just read, thanks,” she said.

She hated to be a killjoy, but the very idea of fishing numbed her brains almost as much as the unseasonable cold had numbed her knuckles. Staring at the water for hours on end, hoping some slippery little trout or lox-salmon whatever would wander past and think, Oh, hey, I'll eat this suspicious looking worm on a hook... Not her idea of fun no matter how much she tried to convince herself of the potential amusement of it all. She got that he liked the quiet time and getting perspective or whatever, but... Yeah. No. She pulled her novel from her big coat pocket.

He waggled his eyebrows. “I have an extra rod.”

She snorted. “I bet you do,” she said.

“Don't you want to grip my pole?”

She giggled that time, unable to stop the infection of his grin from spreading sepsis. She was a goner. A hopeless, lovesick goner, and he was adorable. Horny, hopeless, and adorable. But she still had no desire to learn how to fish. He could keep that hobby to himself.

“We could rock the boat,” he continued, undeterred by her reticence.

“Let's not,” she said wryly. “This thing is more scary than the contraption Tom Hanks made in Cast Away.”

At first he didn't react. His blank stare made her wonder if he'd even seen that movie to know what she was talking about. The main protagonist had built a raft out of a latrine door, some logs, rope, the film from a video cassette, and some other odds and ends.

“You know,” Meredith prompted, “the one about the FedEx guy who got stuck on a deserted island after his plane crashed, and he made friends with a volleyball?”

Derek made a face as his memory kicked in. “Horrible movie.”

“But it had Tom Hanks! And Wilson!”

He raised his eyebrows. “You're counting the volleyball as an asset to the movie?”
Meredith frowned. “Well, he was a really good character.”

“It was a volleyball.”

She shook her head. “Don't you have any imagination at all?”

“It was a volleyball,” he said, as if that were reason enough to denounce it. “And I hate gimmicks.”

“And Star Wars, which officially means you're broken,” Meredith said.

He frowned. “I'm not broken.”

She rubbed her palms against each other, trying to warm them. She didn't understand his dislike for the trilogy. Derek had been in that first generation, just a kid when the first one had been released, and he'd grown up with the two sequels. The whole Star Wars thing for him should have been like... Harry Potter for the most recent generation of tiny humans.

After a lot of hemming and hawing, she'd gone by herself to see the first one during the re-release. She'd sat in the back row, eyes caged with layers of dark makeup, her fuchsia-tipped hair tied up in a messy, scattershot ponytail. She'd hunched in her seat, a black hoodie covering her thin body like a suit of armor. She'd just wanted to see what the stupid fuss was about. She'd gotten tired of all the pop culture references going right over her head. She'd already felt like enough of a freak. She hadn't needed some stupid, ubiquitous movie making it worse.

In the space of two hours, however, she'd become a fan. It was a fantastical story. Like a swashbuckling western in space or something. There were knights in shining whatever. Sword fights. A princess and a scoundrel. Good versus evil. Magic. Faith. For a few hours, she'd been somewhere else, rather than a delinquent teenager hiding in a movie theater. When the credits had rolled, she'd walked out of the theater smiling a big, stupid smile, and she'd ended up returning to view the rest of the movies as the re-release had rolled them out.

She looked at Derek. She just didn't get it. He would have been about ten when the first film had been released. Maybe, younger. She would have thought he'd at least identify with some of the characters. Maybe idolized Luke or Han when he'd been growing up, or... something. Anything positive. She wouldn't have expected hatred.

“Didn't you go to see them as a kid with all your friends?” she said.

“Mark,” he said.

“You saw it with Mark?”

“Yes, but I meant I didn't have 'all my friends', Meredith,” he said. “I had Mark. I wasn't very popular.”

“Oh,” she said. She blinked. Somehow, she'd never pictured him as anything other than cocksure, and everywhere, and always smiling, and well-liked by anybody who cared to get to know him. Certainly not the shy kid sitting by himself in the cafeteria at lunch. Her worldview shifted as she found another kindred facet of his personality, another piece of the puzzle that made sense of his 'arrogance as a suit of armor' front. A small thrill followed the shift. She'd dug something up about him that she hadn't known before. She was getting good at that. The boat swayed with the lapping waves. “I didn't have many friends, either,” she said for solidarity, if nothing else.

He waved his wrist like he was testing himself to cast a line. She watched the graceful, sloping movement of his arm. He didn't extend the pole beyond the boat. He stared at the water. “I liked “the first one,” he conceded.

“Why didn't you like the next two?”

He shrugged. “The second one was okay, I guess.”

“But not the third one?”

He shrugged again and didn't speak.

“Let me guess,” Meredith said. If he couldn't handle a volleyball having a major role in a feature film, she doubted he'd been happy with three-foot tall teddy bears destroying the Empire with rocks and sticks. “The Ewoks ruined it for you. Right? They must have.”

His lips tightened into a thin frown, and he looked out at the water through his dark eyelashes. For a long moment, he didn't speak, didn't move.

“The third one came out a month after my dad died,” he said, his voice grim.

She blinked. “Oh,” she said.

For a moment, she didn't get it. Lots of things had probably happened that year. Did he hate all of those things, just because of their vicinity to a horrible event in his life? And then her stomach sank when she thought about it. The latter two Star Wars movies had introduced the theme of redemption for Vader. Luke's father. He'd been redeemed, yes, but he'd also died at the end of the movie. In Luke's arms. Maybe she was being too analytical, but... that final scene between Luke and Vader had probably resonated pretty freaking badly with Derek. Even if he couldn't verbalize the why of it.

“Derek,” she said, her voice low and wary.

He stiffened. “I just don't like it, okay?” he snapped. “It's a stupid movie.”

She jerked, surprised by his lashing tone. “Okay,” she said. “I'm sorry. I was only teasing about being broken, you know.”

He swiped his palms against his cheeks, looking at the water, not at her. “I know,” he said, his voice tired, strained.

Carefully, she shifted off her bench. The boat wobbled with the movement. She didn't want to topple into the water by standing up. She crawled over his carefully stacked pile of gear, only to wince when she kicked his tackle box by mistake. Her big toe flashed agony up her shin, which quickly faded to an achy whisper. She cringed at him and gave him an apologetic frown, but he didn't seem to notice or care that she’d almost demolished his things with her klutziness.

She sat on the bench next to him, stiffening as a shock of cold transferred from the bench through the seat of her jeans. She wrapped her arm around him. The nylon sleeves of their coats whispered as they slid against each other. She leaned into him, and she kissed his cold, windburned, stubbly cheek. Hovering close to his skin, warmth built between them despite the breeze.

He blinked, and a hint of a smile returned as he looked at her. “I thought you didn't want to rock the boat?” he said.

“It's not rocking,” Meredith said as a small swell made the little boat seesaw a few inches. “It's swaying gently.”
He chuckled, and the last of his upset expression bled away. The breeze ruffled her hair with chilly fingers as she leaned closer. “You're really toasty,” she said by his ear. She put her hand on his knee. “Can I sit here while I read? Or, will it mess up your special fishing technique or whatever?”

He gave her a small, suggestive smile. “Well, you won't mess up my technique,” he said, his voice dripping with a hint of sex, as if to tell her she'd certainly mess something else up. Like his concentration. Or his blood flow.

She shivered in the cold and decided he could live with a bit of sexual tension. Repayment for the naughty banana, if nothing else. She settled between his legs onto the damp floor of the boat, grimacing as more cold pushed through the seat of her pants.

When this outing was over, her backside would be numb. Or possibly frostbitten. Was it possible to become frostbitten in high sixties weather? Maybe. With her luck, she'd find out the answer was yes.

She rolled her eyes and hooked her arms over his knees for support. His knees squeezed against her ribcage. He mashed his front against her back, a cloak of body heat and a shield against the nippy breeze. She sighed as she flipped to the dog-eared page in her book and settled in to read, wrapped as more cold pushed through the seat of her pants.

Gradually, she lost her sense of Derek at her back and the lake around the boat as her book immersed her. Dark Lover. The first in the Black Dagger Brotherhood series. The romance aspects of the plot boggled her mind. The hero, Wrath, fell in love like a falling bridge, apparently. Suddenly, unexpectedly, and irreparably. Speaking of which, what the hell kind of name was Wrath? And then there was Beth. The heroine. Meredith shook her head. The woman had taken one look at Wrath and was ready to jump his freaking bones. Literally. Because like four paragraphs later, she'd jumped his freaking bones. Then again... Meredith rubbed Derek's knee. She supposed it could sort of happen like that. Sort of. With a lot more crappy pickup lines and superficial protests before calling the metaphorical taxi, at least. She turned the page, almost against her will, and after a few more pages, her criticisms seemed faint and not as important as the story drew her inside its addictive, reality-defying bubble.

She'd read about forty pages when he grunted, and he moved, shoving her inadvertently when he moved his knees. She resettled, ready to ignore it as aimless fidgeting, but then he grunted and moved again. As though he couldn't quite get comfortable on the bench anymore. She looked up at him.

“You okay?” she said.

He sighed, lines of pain pinching the skin around his eyes. “Yeah. Just getting sore.”

“How’s your sternum?”

He rubbed his chest through his coat and frowned. “A little. I'm used to more padding for my back, I guess.”
“It's almost like being in a chair down here,” she said from the floor of the boat.

He looked at the drop from the bench to the floor with doubt. He still had trouble with heavy lifting and with over-extending his arms. If he braced himself on the bench to lower himself to the floor, he'd be putting his full weight on his still-healing sternum. He'd had trouble carrying her the night before, and he weighed a lot more than she did.

She moved, flexing her numb joints as she shifted. Feeling returned to her ass. She rose up on her knees and wrapped her arms around his torso to help take some of his weight. Even with the help, his wince flared into blatant suffering like a blast of trumpet as he moved off the bench. He gripped her shoulders so hard her bones hurt, and his half-barked, half-grunted, “Oh!” slammed into her ears. She winced at the sound as he thumped to the floor. She hoped he hadn't pulled or re-broken something. To her relief, his pained expression evened out in nanoseconds, and he gave her a more even, more calm, “Oh, that _is_ better.”

“You're okay?” she said.

“Yeah,” he said, his voice even. No hint of pain pinched his tone.

She relaxed. With a bit of rearranging, they managed to stuff an extra life jacket and a spare sweatshirt between his back and the bench like a pillow. She resettled against his shoulder. He sighed with renewed comfort and recast his line.

“Thank you,” he said.

She kissed him and resettled to read. More chapters flew past, until she found herself reading and rereading the page, trying to force her suspension of disbelief to hold the line, but it wouldn’t. She tilted the book, and peered closer at the words, trying to get a sense of... How. On Earth. She shook her head. She frowned. “That's totally impossible,” she muttered.

Derek chuckled beside her. “You're reading a book about vampires, and you're critiquing the realism?”

She pressed the open pages against her chest and gaped at him. How did he— “Were you reading over my shoulder?”

He snickered. “His erection was a painful, rigid length,” he said in a dark, sultry tone. Except he looked close to bursting into gales of laughter.

Heat flamed across her cheeks. “Oh, my god, you were!” she said.

“I want you to take me,” he continued, his voice deep.

“Look, there's mythical lore that's not possible, and then there's blatant abuse of physics that's not possible,” she said. She'd had sex far too many times in far too many ways to not be able to pick out fictitious drivel a mile away. “This sex is totally not possible!”

“The entire book is impossible,” he said. “It's about vampires.”

She smacked his shoulder with the book. “You really have _no_ imagination,” she said. He pawed at where the book impacted and mouthed the word ow, though he didn't speak it. His eyes twinkled.

“We're back to this again?” he said.

“Clearly, because it's true,” she grumbled.
He frowned. “Is not.”

“Is, too.”

“Is not!”

She folded her arms over her chest. “Prove it.”

He shook his head. “You're naked. I'm too busy staring to prove it.”

“I'm not naked...”

“See?” he said. His expression split into pleased, haughty grin. “Imagination. I have it.”

“You are such a— Oh.” She dragged the palm of her hand to her mouth and covered it. A rush of heat flushed her face that had nothing to do with sex, pleasure, or anything of the kind. Within moments, she felt as though she were stuck somewhere in the bowels of a sauna. Not on a chilly lake that seemed more like a wind sock than a body of water.

He frowned at her. “I'm an oh?” he said, confusion loitering in his gaze.

She wanted to answer. She did. But her stomach flip-flopped before she could open her mouth to speak. Flailing, she grabbed for the side of the boat. The whole thing swayed and sloshed in the water, and she heard Derek grunt something like a surprised, “Whoa!”

Water splashed. Something thunked in the bottom of the boat. His fishing pole? She didn't care. Gripping the side of the boat, she leaned over the edge, her face and neck straining toward the frothy blue water. “Meredith, stop—” he said, somewhere in the back of her awareness. Something shuffled. The boat tilted precariously, and she heaved. Her stomach emptied itself into the lake as she hung over the side. The stench of vomit flew back up into her face, and her innards clenched and churned, but the wind dispersed the odor in moments, before she had a chance to lose the rest of her breakfast in some sort of digestive tract reenactment of The Poseidon Adventure.

She rested against the side of the boat, sniffling, breathing. Bile burned the back of her throat and made her eyes water. The boat rocked back and forth with the waves. Eventually, she sat up, swallowing back the burning sensation. She made a sound. Ugh. Uck. Something like that. She wiped her face with shaky hands.

Derek stared at her from the opposite side of the boat, his elbows hooked over the side as though he'd thrown his weight that way to offset her disruption. His fishing pole lay in a diagonal, off-kilter heap at the bottom of the boat. The thin line extending from the tip of the pole dangled over the side of the boat and disappeared into the water, as though he hadn't had time to reel it in before ditching the pole.

“Well,” he said, his expression wry, “at least you're feeding the fish.”

She grimaced. “That's disgusting.”

He gave her an apologetic smile. “I'm sorry,” he said. “Are you okay?”

She glared as he rescued his fishing pole and reeled in the line. Cold wind slashed her face, which at least made her feel less nauseous. He put the pole on the floor of the boat once he'd fixed it, and then he spread his arms, inviting. They scooted across bottom of the wobbly boat and met in the middle, a tangle of life jackets and coats and cold, red noses.
“You know, this is your fault,” she said as he rubbed her back.

“Oh, we're blaming my sperm again instead of your hoo-hoo?” he said.

“You can't say hoo-hoo like that,” she said. “Hoo-hoo is my word.”

“Whatever you say, McPukey.”

She glared at his chest, because lifting her head took effort. “I hate you.”

He laughed. The sound of it rumbled against her ear, muffled by his coat and his breastbone. “You love me,” he said.

She did, and he knew it. But she didn't have time to respond before she was flying out of his arms to the side of the boat again to heave. In the back of her awareness, she heard the boat's outboard motor chug. The breeze whipped against her face, and the waves churned against the boat. They were moving. Slowly. As soon as her stomach settled, she tried to pull him away from the motor, her hand on his sleeve.

“I don't want to go back yet,” she said.

He gave her a flabbergasted look. “But you're sick.”

“It'll go away in a second.”

“Are you sure?” he said.

She nodded. “I'm sure.” She swallowed. At least her throat had stopped burning. The fresh air plunged into her system and refreshed her. She gave him a shaky smile that probably looked horrible on her pasty face with her windswept, tangled hair. “See?” she said. “Already better. And the fresh air helps.”

He cut the engine. The boat drifted. “You're not just saying that so I stay out here?”

“Why would I do that?” she said.

“Because you're worried about me, and you want me to relax.”

She gaped. “How did you—”

“Meredith, I'm a basket case,” he said, his voice gentle. “But that doesn't mean I'm unobservant.”

Silence stretched for a long moment. A flock of birds arrayed like a letter v darted through the air overhead, casting moving shadows on the water. A small crowd of people on the opposite shore laughed and talked, and the sound carried across the lake with the blowing wind. Water churned, and the boat swayed.

“You used to be,” she said, her voice soft. She remembered when she'd left the pamphlet on assault victimization on the table in the kitchen by accident while he'd been eating. He'd glanced at the pamphlet, but what she'd thought would be the inevitable 2+2 moment where he demanded to know why she had it had never happened. His dead gaze had moved onward. Elsewhere. Disinterested. And he hadn't asked about it. With the Percocet, he'd been almost oblivious.

Derek nodded. “I was. I'm not, now.” I'm clean, said his unwavering gaze.

Meredith swallowed. “I'm sorry.”
He shrugged. “Don't be. I'm glad you're here.”

“Vomiting?”

He shook his head with a smile. “Making me relax.”

“Vomiting is relaxing?” she said.

“You're vomiting because we have a baby on the way.”

She bit her lip. She hadn't thought of it that way. She pressed her hand against her belly. The nylon windbreaker and her life jacket slithered underneath her palm. She wished she could feel the warmth of her skin. “I guess it's happy vomiting,” she said.

He nodded, and a wide grin brightened his face. “It is.”

She grabbed a water bottle from the stash next to his tackle box and rinsed out her mouth. As she screwed the cap back onto the bottle, she giggled. Where had that come from? She didn't know, but suddenly she couldn't help it. Giggling. She did it again as he watched her with an adulate gaze. Blush crept across her face. A smile took her face hostage and wouldn't let it go, all while her eyes watered, and a lump the size of Cleveland swelled in her throat. She put the bottle on the floor of the boat, and then she moved. The boat wobbled as she sought his body, almost not caring if they capsized. She needed his warmth and his touch and him. Just him. They resettled on the floor of the boat, their backs to the bench by the motor, and he wrapped his arms around her.

She sniffed and blinked, and her eyes spat tears onto her cheeks, and yet, she'd never felt more giddy. “We have a baby on the way,” she said, grinning like a fool. She'd known this fact for over a week, now, and still, sometimes it hit her like a bug slamming into a windshield. Pregnant! Splat! The reality of it struck her stupid and made her do non-Meredith, hormone-y things like sob. And have nearly epileptic bouts of smile seizures.

“We really do,” he said softly against her ear, a low rumble barely audible against the wind. “I'm sorry it makes you sick, though.” He kissed her temple. His hands slipped over hers and then down to her thighs, searching over the soft denim of her ratty jeans. He pushed underneath her mountains of layers – her coat, her life jacket, a sweatshirt, a t-shirt — and he pressed against her belly with his—

“Cold hands!” she shrieked.

He flinched away. “Sorry,” he said. He kissed her ear.

He backed up a few layers and let her shirt and sweatshirt fall down before he resumed rubbing her in slow, soothing circles. The world drained away, and she sighed. She let her eyelids drift half-closed. She stared through her wet eyelashes at the sparkling water. The breeze made their coats and life jackets flap, but she didn't feel cold. Not at all. Not even her ass against the freezing, damp seat.

“Will you make me pancakes again?” she said as she leaned against him. “I need to replace the ones I involuntarily ejected.”

“Aren't they what made you sick?”

She shrugged. Her coat rasped against his. He rubbed her shoulder. “Hell if I know what makes me sick anymore,” she said in a weird combination of hopeless and unconcerned and freaking euphoric. Happy vomit. Who'd have thought? “There's clearly no schedule. The schedule was my own delusion. I think it's more of a Russian roulette type deal or whatever.”

He nodded. “I'll make you whatever you want,” he said.

She grinned. “What if I wanted chicken galantine or something?”

His arms tightened around her body as he chuckled against her ear. “I'd drop you off at a nice French restaurant, at the very least,” he said.

“My hero,” she said, playful and full of mock adoration. She simpered for him and batted her eyelashes.

A breath chuffed against her ear as he laughed. “Hmm,” he said, his voice low-pitched and rumbling, and then he fell silent as he stroked her body.

They watched the water. His chin rested against her shoulder. Somewhere, in the passing moments, the vague thought hit her that he seemed to have abandoned the whole idea of fishing, and he was wasting his boat time doting on her and daydreaming about babies and watching the surf and... not fishing. He hadn't even caught anything. She turned.

He didn't seem to notice as she assessed him. The way he stared over the sparkling waves, a strange, longing expression carving his face, tugged at her heartstrings. What could he be longing for? Or dreaming about? She kissed his cheek and nuzzled him. His stubble rasped against her skin, but the sharp sandpaper only made her feel more alive.

“Hey,” she said, the barest whisper. “What are you thinking?”

He blinked, and his gaze shifted to her. “Nothing,” he said, which he then amended to, “Everything.”

“That's a lot of thoughts,” she said.

He shrugged. “My family, I guess.”

She wondered, then, if he'd changed his mind about the wedding. If he wanted to wait, or something, so that he could have them all there. “Still thinking about them?” she said.

“Yeah.”

“You really love them.”

“I do. I haven't seen them in...” He swallowed, and when he continued his voice sounded choked. “Years. It's been more than three years since I moved here.”

She squeezed his shoulder. “You don't count the hospital?”

“I was drugged out of my mind and in pain,” he said. “I barely remember the hospital. I have bits and pieces in my head, but...”

“That's not a visit, I guess.”

“It's not,” he said. And then he sighed. A deep, world-weary sigh that made her heart squeeze. “I miss them a lot.”

“We still need to tell them about the baby,” she said. “We could call them all when we get back to the cabin.”
He nodded. “We do,” he said. “We could,” he said in a smaller voice. And then he stopped and swallowed, as though he were building himself some courage to say something big.

She pulled her fingers through his messy hair. “I really don't mind postponing the wedding, Derek. If that's what you want—”

“No,” he said. “No, it's...” He gazed at her, his expression doubtful. “Will you go to New York with me for Thanksgiving? We could tell them in person, then.”

She blinked. Whatever she'd been expecting him to say, it hadn't been that. But it made sense, she supposed. Thoughts of the wedding had dragged his thoughts to his family. Thoughts of Baby had dragged his thoughts to his family. Sort of like kismet, or something, when you were trying to make a decision about something and everything in the world at that moment seemed to lead to that thing.

Except he wasn't mentally well. He'd admitted that he didn't think he could handle a big family gathering for a soonish wedding. And Thanksgiving? That was soonish, too.

“That's only three months away,” she said.

“I know,” he said, his tone apologetic, as if he thought she were annoyed with the short notice, and not worried about the fact that he might not heal fast enough in three months to be ready for something like that. “My mom invited us when I was in the hospital. I told her you might not want to, but...”

