Meredith nodded as understanding sank in its teeth. “But, now, I offered to do the wedding with your whole family.”

“Yeah,” he said. He looked at the floor of the boat. “If it's too much, it's okay. We don't have to go. I just thought...” His voice trailed away and he shrugged. He looked up at her again, and the hope in his eyes crushed her. “Maybe.”

“You really want to see them.”

He nodded. “I do.”

“But...” She licked her lips and closed her eyes. She didn't want to discourage him. Or needle him. Or make him feel bad. Or shut him down without consideration. But he had a tendency to push against his limitations, rather than work with them, and the clashes were... bad. They were horrifically bad. They resulted in things like Percocet abuse and exhaustion and panic attacks and near misses with pneumonia. She trusted him with her life, but... she didn't trust him with his. And that was the crux of it.

She put her hand on his sleeve and rubbed. “Forget about me for a sec. What about you? Would Thanksgiving with your family be too much for you?”

“I don't know, but...” He took a short, frustrated breath. “But I want...”

“How would it be different than the wedding?” she said, trying to keep her tone reasonable. Not condemning.

“It's an even-numbered year,” he replied. “Nancy and her family won't be there. That cuts it down by eight, and—”

“What do you mean?”
“Nancy spends time with Rob's family on even-numbered years. She trades off.”

“Oh,” she said. “Rob is her husband?”

“Yeah,” he said. “My brother-in-law. He's got a big family, too.”

“What about your aunts and uncles?” she prodded.

“Even-numbered year,” he said. “They won't be there.”

“Okay, so that's eight less people in your immediate family, and no aunts or uncles,” she said. “I assume that rules out cousins?”

“Yeah.”

“Grandparents?”

“Dead,” he said.

Her momentum failed and sputtered. She blinked. “Sorry,” she said.

He shrugged. “Don't be,” he said. “It's been a long time, and they lived good lives.”

In his eyes, she saw whimsy. Maybe a bit of sadness. But he seemed mostly reflective. She pushed onward. “Family friends?” she said.

He shook his head. “Not for Thanksgiving,” he said. “There's no room.”

“Well, I still count...” She let her voice trail away as she thought about it. There were three remaining sisters, which meant three husbands. Wait. No, two husbands. Because Amelia wasn't married. That meant five adults. Nancy and Rob together reducing the family gathering by eight meant six less kids, so still eight nieces and nephews. So, thirteen plus his mom, and, “Mark?”

“Probably,” Derek said.

“Fifteen total, then. I think.” She stared at him. He didn't counter her assessment with his own figure. In fact, he looked glum, which didn't inspire confidence. Fifteen people in close quarters didn't really sound like a good plan for him. Not if he needed space. Or quiet. She frowned. Her stomach churned as she was torn between wanting to do this for him and with him, and thinking this was the worst idea ever. “That's still a lot of people, Derek,” she said.

He sighed. “If we're just at Mom's house, and I can get away if I need to...” he said, a subtle hint of desperation pinching his tone.

“Do you have a room at your mom's house where you could go and shut the door?”

“No,” he said. “It's a small house. Addie and I always went home instead of staying the night because we lived so close.”

“Is there a guest room?” Meredith said.

“Three,” Derek said. “My sisters usually take them. The kids use sleeping bags in the living room and the den. The house is wall-to-wall people, honestly.”

“Well, if Nancy's not there this year, maybe, your mom could set something aside for you,” Meredith said, hope tingeing her tone. She really wanted this to work out. “Like a quiet place?”
Derek sighed. He blinked. His eyes reddened. He rubbed the sleeves of his coat absently with his palms as he stared at the water, his expression darkening. “I hate this,” he said in a low, frustrated, hissing voice. “I hate feeling like navigating my family is rocket science. I hate—”

She kissed him, cutting him off. “I'll go,” she said against his lips, her voice soft as she made a split-second decision. Having Derek hate himself for something he couldn't help wouldn't be any better than Derek having a panic attack, and at least, with some careful preparation, they could try to work around his PTSD instead of feeding it Wheaties by not going at all. At worst, even in a full house with no spare guest rooms, surely his mother could let him use her bedroom if he needed to retreat for a little while. “We'll go,” she said. “We can rent a hotel room nearby instead of staying at the house. And we'll make sure you have a quiet place to go at the house while we're there. Or somewhere close. Are the neighbors nice?”

He cleared his throat and shook his head. He wiped his face. Coughed. And then he hid himself in his arms. “Helen and Jean,” he said into his hands. His body began to rock minutely. Fidgeting. Agitated. “They live next door, and they have a married brother who visits with his wife and daughter, but that's it.”

“Do they know you well?”

He shrugged. “They're good friends with Mom,” he said.

“Well, there's an option, maybe,” she said. She wrapped her arms around his body. His frame was stiff with tension, and he still seemed upset. Unhappy. She kissed his coat at the shoulder, and she squeezed her arms tighter. “We'll figure it out. I think this is a lot more workable than the wedding.”

He raised his head and looked at her with bloodshot eyes, but he didn't speak. He seemed shaky. Sick with all his worrying, almost. Like he was overwhelmed, maybe. Except with his current mental health issues, he turned being overwhelmed into an extreme sport. Which meant it was break time.

“We can worry about all the logistics later,” she said. When they weren't on their forty-eight hour vacation, trying specifically to relax. “It's okay,” she said. “We'll figure something out, and we'll see your family. Okay?”

He sniffed. “You'll really go with me?”

“Really, I'll go,” she said. “I'll be your wingman.”

“Woman,” he corrected.

She rolled her eyes. “Whatever.”

He pressed his face against her throat. His warm skin heated the space between them. “You make a good wingwoman,” he said, his voice soft. Wistful.

“I hope so.”

“I know so,” he said. She smiled as he kissed her clavicle and nibbled. Then his voice dropped into a lilting murmur as he said, “I love you,” to her skin, and he breathed her in.

“I know,” she said.

A chuckle broke his remaining tension. He looked up, wiping his face once more. Unshed tears tangled in his thick, black eyelashes, and his cheeks had gotten puffy, but when he gazed at her, his glistening eyes sparkled. “Stealing lines from Princess Leia, now, are we?” he said.

She bumped his hip with her own. “I guess so, Han.”

“I think you should try on one of those metal bikinis,” he said. “Then I might like Star Wars.”

“Use your supposed imagination, and put me in one.”

He smirked. His eyes narrowed. The remaining upset in his gaze shifted into lechery. He stared with a cheerful intentness that told her she was naked in his head. Not in a metal bikini. Blush spread across her skin despite the chill. “You're making this fishing trip very naughty,” he decided as he peered at her.

“I think you did that with your rod,” she said.

He pressed his palm against his chest, and he laughed. “Touché!”

She leaned into him. She found it hard to look away, even for a moment, but she glanced at the floor of the boat to her discarded book. It had a bright red cover. Easy to spot. She grabbed at it.
The pages crinkled. She flipped to the relevant section, and she showed it to him. “Speaking of naughty,” she said, “do you think we could try this later?”

His eyes darted back and forth as he skimmed the page. “That's...” He shook his head and tilted the book as if it might cause the words to make sense. Clearly, the new perspective didn't cause any epiphanies. He made a face. “Impossible. If his arm is going that way, then how is he—”

“See?” she said. She kissed his throat. “Impossible physics. Told you.”

“Well,” he said. “Maybe, vampires are more flexible.” He regarded her for a moment. And then he grinned a dangerous grin. Like he had an idea. A dangerous idea. “You're pretty flexible, you know,” he said.

She giggled. “We could try.”

He shook his head. “Do, or do not,” he said. “There is no try.”

She snickered. “For a non-fan, you sure know the lines well.”

“It's been pop-culturally hammered into my brain.”

“Sounds painful.”

“Oh, it is,” he said with a nod. “It's very painful. Want to help me fix it?”

“How?” she said.

The delectable look he gave her made her spine tingle and her toes curl in her sneakers. Her breaths tightened. He shifted away from her and started the boat's tiny engine. Water churned at the sides of the boat as he steered them around in the direction they'd come from. Birds scattered. And the trees along the banks of the lake kicked into a solid green blur. Their cabin was a tiny dot, hundreds and hundreds of feet away, but it grew and grew. The boat bounced over the waves, and she clung to the bench with her numb fingertips.

“Where are we going?” she said with a sly grin, playing along, though she knew the answer. The chilly wind whipped against her face.
He looked back at her and winked. “Imagination only goes so far, you know,” he said.

“And what did you have in mind, exactly?” she prodded.

“Attempted sex,” he said with a definitive nod. “I'm tired of putting it off.”

(Snow falling at Christmas)

A soft, soothing heat pressed against Meredith's skin as the fireplace popped and sputtered. She and Derek sat on the fuzzy shag rug in front of the fire, which Derek had started after she'd begged him. That request, at least, hadn't left him as nonplussed as he'd been when she'd dragged him outside in the waning daylight, barely clothed, to look for perfect sticks.

Perfect for what? he'd said with a frown as his flip-flops had clapped against the damp earth.

She glanced at the big living room window. The colors surrounding the cabin had eased from verdant greens and cerulean blues to sapped grays and the blackest blacks, though at least the moonlight illuminated the now silver lake a bit like something out of a fairytale. She gazed at the shifting, flickering flames in the fireplace, which were bluish where they hugged the burning logs, only to flare into haunting orange at the tips. She rubbed her bare arms with her hands and blinked, trying to sever the hypnotic pull.

She migrated her gaze to Derek, and a whole new languid slowdown turned her thoughts to mush. Derek sat Indian-style beside her on the soft rug, wearing nothing but a loose pair of black sweatpants that stopped under his navel, just below a dark whorl of hair. His Adidas flip-flops rested on the corner of the rug by the spruce-colored couch, which they'd pushed back against the wall with the coffee table to clear space for their endeavor. He was barefoot, and bare-chested, and his dark hair crowned his head, loose and unkempt with the tangles of recent sleep and sex. His eyes were bright, and a delectable smirk tugged at the corner of his upper lip.

Her insides fluttered. She wanted to kiss him.

“What is with you and marshmallows?” Derek said, as if he'd mistaken her trip to la la land for a food craving instead of a craving for him.

She blinked. “Marshmallows are the best thing ever,” she said absently as she shifted on the rug.

“Better than me?” he said with a faux pout. His eyes twinkled. “I'm hurt.”

She scrunched her toes. The soft yarn threads of the rug moved against her skin. Her muscles ached, and she felt a bit sore between her legs and deep within her quadriceps, but it was a good kind of sore. A kind of sore that said she'd had a lot of awesome sex after a while without. She smiled, and her palm slipped to her bare leg to rub as she thought of about it.

Her eyelids lowered as memory sparked in her mind's eye. Memory of his palm chasing up the curve of her hip. Memory of his lips as he languorously worshiped her. Memory of the hot, slick slide of his body against hers. He'd touched her everywhere as he'd moved within her like a heavy piston. Kissed her everywhere. He'd left no part of her unloved, inside or out, and when he'd found his own release, she'd been so buzzed and loose and crackling like live wire, she'd thought she would never move again.

“Food,” she said, blinking, trying to bring herself back to the task at hand, which was roasting marshmallows. Not sex. They'd had sex already. Lots of it. More would... be really... really nice, though. If he wanted it, anyway, and she didn't want to pressure him. Their attempted sex had turned out fantastic and fulfilling, and they'd even managed that wacky position from her book for a few minutes before he'd had to put her down and rest his arms. She didn't want to ruin the streak or bust his confidence after he'd built himself up so far. She shook her head. Marshmallows. “Best food thing ever,” she said. “You're definitely the reigning king at sex.”

“Mmm. Thank you,” he said.

She couldn't help but notice how his shoulders straightened at her words. How his general demeanor inflated. His improved freedom of movement, along with his recovering stamina, had made a big appearance today. The hungry, confident smirk that crept across his face warmed her soul, and she smiled at him as she fiddled with the plastic bag full of jumbo-sized marshmallows. The plastic crinkled.

He glanced at the bag. His eyebrows raised as he looked back at her. “So, you think marshmallows are even better than strawberry ice cream?”

She frowned. “Well, no.”

“Chocolate?”

“No.”

“Pizza?”

“I guess not.”

“My pancakes?” he said.

She sighed. “No, but—”

“This isn't going to be like the fluffernutter, is it?” he said, a look of distaste pushing his mirth aside.

She rolled her eyes and jabbed a fat marshmallow at the end of the thin spear-like stick. She'd selected it for him from the myriad of other sub-par roasting sticks that surrounded the cabin in the woods outside. “No, it's not like a freaking fluffernutter, Derek,” she said as she slid the marshmallow into place and released it. “It's better. Much better.”

Derek frowned at the marshmallow she'd bisected. “It's hard to be worse than that.”

“Would you just humor me?” Meredith said.

“I am humoring you,” he said. “I'm here, aren't I?”

“Well, yes.”

He waved the stick at her. Though the stick was thin, the marshmallow didn't jiggle, which meant the wood was strong enough to support it. “And I have a marshmallow on a stick, don't I?” he said.

“Yes.”

“See?” he said. He leaned across the pile of marshmallow bags, Hershey bar wrappers, and graham cracker boxes littering the space on the rug between them, and he kissed her on the cheek. “Humoring you. So, what's next?”
She grinned. “Light it on fire.”

“What?”

“The marshmallow,” she said. She pointed to the fireplace. “Burn it. Some people waste time trying to roast it evenly to a perfect, bubbly brown, but I think the trick is to mercilessly blacken the outside.”

“I’m quite sure in the times I’ve seen this done before that the fire stayed in the actual fire pit,” he said, a mischievous glint in his eyes.

She frowned. “I thought you said you’ve never made one!”

“I’ve never performed a quadruple bypass surgery, either. That doesn't mean I've never seen one done.”

She narrowed her eyes. He had a point. “Well,” she said, “my way is better. So, light it on fire.”

He laughed. “Seriously? So bossy.”

“Yes, but you love it,” she said. “And, really, the whole freaking point is to get it gooey and perfect.”

“Gooey and perfect,” he said. “By lighting it on fire.”

“Yes!” she insisted with a laugh. She grabbed his wrist, trying to ignore the brief zing at the soft feel of his skin underneath her fingertips, and poked the stick at the fire. “You're supposed to be humoring me. Remember?”

He shook his arm loose from her grip and warily dangled the marshmallow over the flames. The bottom of the marshmallow browned a bit. He spun the stick and presented the white edge of the marshmallow to the fire. “I really don't see the point of all this,” he said. “How are marshmallows on graham crackers any different than marshmallows on Wonder Bread?”

“Because of the chocolate and the graham stuff and the warm gooey goodness!” she insisted, jerking with surprise when he dipped the marshmallow into the fire and caught a blast of flame with it. The marshmallow ignited. She clapped. “Oh! There you go,” she said. She squeezed his shoulder. “Now, pull it out of the fire, and blow on it.” The look he gave her as he withdrew the stick from the flame made her swallow before she could shake off the heady desire. “Blow on it,” she said, trying to flatten any lurking, smirk-y innuendo before he could utter it. He puffed on the marshmallow at her direction, and the flame winked out.

She gave him an excited grin as she pulled two graham cracker squares and a Hershey bar loose from their packaging. She gestured with the two graham crackers. He presented his stick to her, marshmallow end first. She smashed the marshmallow between the crackers and the chocolate. The chocolate softened, and the crackers slid a bit in her grasp.

“What next, Ms. Expert?” he said.

“Pull it out,” she said.

He gave her another look, and she rolled her eyes.

“The stick, Derek,” she said with a giggle.
He snickered, but he did, and she held the leftover marshmallow concoction together between her palms. She could smell it. The roasted, gooey marshmallows. The soft, melting chocolate. She licked her lips and held it out for him.

“Okay, now, try it,” she said.

He stared at her with dark, hungry eyes as the fire flickered. The light danced in his pupils. After a long pause, he held his hand out. She gave him the s'more and watched with bated breath as he lifted it to his lips. He bit into the cracker with a crunch. He paused for a long moment, as if assessing what was on his tongue. Utter stillness hugged his frame. For a moment, he didn't even breathe, but then his jaws began to work, and he chewed. His eyelids drooped, and a small, deep sound loitered in his throat. She watched his temples move with his jaw as he ate in silence. When his Adam's apple rolled, he blinked, and let loose a low, pleased, “Oh,” that made her toes curl with desire. He usually only said things in that tone during sex, a fact for which he'd given her ample reminders that day.

He leaned back, and he stared at the s'more with new appreciation. He took another bite without prodding, and then another.

“See!” she said. “See, it is good!”

His happy expression evaporated into a humoring smile as he rolled his eyes. “Yes, Mere, you're absolutely right,” he said. “It's very good.”

She pumped her fist. “I knew it!”

“I'm not budging on the fluffernutters, though,” he said.

“When the OB-GYN proves my conception theory, and you have to eat a real one with real marshmallow fluff, I think you'll change your mind.”

“That won't happen, because I'm right on the conception date.”

She snickered. “Do you have any idea how statistically improbable it is that you got me pregnant on the first try?”

“Me getting you pregnant on the first try is more probable than me getting you pregnant through birth control, which I did, might I remind you.” He winked.

“Derek, there's virility, and then there's pure hubris.”

“What can I say?” he said with a haughty smirk. “I am good at getting things on the first try.”

She laughed and shook her head. She couldn't help it.

“Look, I'll give you s'mores,” he said. He took another happy bite of the subject in question. His temples worked as he chewed. “But conception date is mine,” he said around a mouthful of graham cracker.

She grinned as a thin white line of marshmallow stretched into infinity when he pulled his hand away from his mouth. The gooey string of sugar snapped back and curled over his lip, and she sat on her hands to keep from licking it off him. The room seemed warm and floaty as she watched him polish off the rest of the graham cracker and gooey marshmallow. Not only because he was him, and he was gorgeous to look at, but because he was eating, and he was enjoying it with an almost cheerful gusto.
His appetite seemed to have barreled back into place like a linebacker tackling a ball carrier. Yesterday, she'd had to prod him just to make a freaking sandwich. This morning, he'd eaten his naughty banana pancake leftovers without her prodding. And then he'd eaten pancakes once more, whipped cream included, when he'd made them again for lunch at her behest, once they'd gotten back from the non-fishing fishing trip. He'd eaten a full dinner without being reminded, too. And, now, this...

Sweet, delicious dessert. She stared as he licked his finger clean. She cleared her throat, trying to force her mind away from sex. Sex... “What about the sex of the baby?” she said.

He swallowed, and he looked at her. “You still think it's a girl?”

“I know it's a girl.”

“I'll even let you have that one,” he said. “No arguments.” He smiled and made a faux zipper motion across his lips with his thumb and his index finger.

She rolled her eyes. “Because you want a girl. That doesn't freaking count.”

“I want anything as long as it's with you,” he said. “And you wanted a boy, I thought. So, why are you so set on it being a girl?”

She pressed her hand against her soft shirt. Warmth spread through the fabric to her skin. She smiled at the contact. “Because I just know it's a girl. But I'd really be happy with anything as long as it's with you.”

His expression smoothed into something... almost post-coital. Relaxed. Sated. His eyelids dipped, and he stared at her with a satisfied gaze. “I'm glad we agree on something, at least,” he said, his voice a husky slip and slide of syllables against her skin that made her think of his hands. Touching her. His tongue. Tasting her.

She shook her head. She jabbed another marshmallow on his stick and then put one onto hers. They pressed their sugary bounty into the flames together. “How is it that you've never made one of these before, anyway?” she said as both marshmallows bloomed into fire at once. They withdrew their sticks and blew on them.

“When would I have?” he said. He mashed his marshmallow between two graham crackers and the Hershey bar, and then withdrew his stick, almost as though this hadn't been a foreign concept to him not ten minutes earlier. She mirrored his certain movements.

“You never made a bonfire on the beach when you went with your family?” she said.

“Sandy Hook doesn't allow bonfires. Or, it didn't then, at least.”

“Well, that's stupid,” she said. “Bonfires on the beach are like... essential.”

He smiled. “Like s'mores are essential?”

She bit into her first s'more of the night and sighed as it sat on her tongue, a chocolatey, gooey, warm mess of sugar and everything right in the world. She almost couldn't bring herself to chew while she savored the calories in their tasty, full-figured glory.

“Mmm,” she purred before she could recover her drifting senses. She swallowed. “I mean, yes, like s'mores,” she said. “When we go to the beach, we're going to one that allows bonfires.”
He grinned. "When we go?"

"Well, you didn't think this was going to be our only vacation ever, did you?" she said.

Her cheeks bulged as she stuffed her mouth full of the s'more. She had no idea how she'd eaten the entire graham cracker square in less than four bites, but she'd managed it. She licked all of her fingers, one after the other, scouring them for every last bit of dietary sinning she could manage, and then she stabbed another marshmallow on her stick. She shoved the stick into the fire with a merciless grin.

She was being a pig. A big, oink-y, unrepentant pig. But... these were so, so good, and she never had opportunities like this anymore. It often seemed like if she wasn't sleeping or playing nursemaid, she was at the hospital. She didn't have any freaking time to slow down. She couldn't remember the last time she'd had a two-day weekend that didn't involve her or Derek being injured or sick.

Her marshmallow burst into flame, and she pulled it out of the fire.

Derek held a pair of graham crackers in his hands for her, and she flattened her newly charred marshmallow between them with a Hershey bar. She smiled at him. At least, despite the omission of s'mores from his childhood repertoire, he made up for lost time like a pro. She forced herself to slow down and not take a bite. Pain to enhance the pleasure.

"What beach did you have in mind?" he said. His gaze danced in the firelight.

"One that won't freeze off my toes when I step in the water."

He snorted. "That pretty much rules out the entire west coast."

"I'm sure you'll think of something."

He raised his eyebrows with incredulity. "I'll think of something?"

She nodded. "I got us this cabin," she said. "It's your turn to be creative."

"Richard got us this cabin."

"Because I said we should do a vacation while he was standing there, or did you miss that part?" he said. He shook his head with a laugh, and she barreled onward. Sugar made her bouncy and hyper and happy, and her brain raced. She felt... good. Great. Excellent. She gave him a bubbly grin. "So, what about camping?"

"For a vacation?" he said.

"No, silly. For making s'mores," she said. "They're like... a classic camping pastime, and you're all nature-y."

"Now, yes," he said. "I grew up in Brooklyn, Mere. The nature bit is a recent development."

She gave up on patience and took a huge bite. The graham cracker crunched, and then her incisors sliced through soft, melting chocolate. She chewed, letting her eyes close. Just for a moment. To savor it. "You never even went camping as a kid?"

"Meredith, I really didn't—"

"Not even as a boyscout?" she prodded before he could finish. She swallowed. "Or a cub scout? Or a scout-y something?"

“didn't want to.”

She bit into her s'more. “Why wouldn't you?” she muttered around the graham cracker.

“Because I got picked on and teased, and I had no desire to spend any more time with the kids at school than I had to,” he said. He took his own bite. Crunching filled the silence as he stared into the fire.

_ I wasn't very popular_, he'd said.

She swallowed. “Oh,” she said. “Why did you get teased?”

He shrugged.

She polished off the rest of her s'more, and she shoved the pile of wrappers and refuse away, under the coffee table with the sticks, both his and hers. She scooted closer to him across the soft shag rug. She rose to her knees, wrapped her arms around him, and rested her chin on his shoulder.

“Well, they were idiots,” she said. She kissed the crook of his neck. “I got teased, too.”

He gazed at her, and his eyebrows rose, as if he couldn't fathom why anybody would want to do that. That thought, that simple support, even without a word from his lips, made her smile. She pressed her cheek against his warm shoulder, rubbing his abdomen with her palms.

“I think kids are a bit like sharks,” she said. “They'll pick off anybody who's bleeding in the water a bit.”

He finished his s'more and turned. “I somehow can't picture you as shark bait.”

She shrugged. “Having a single mom was rarer back then. I just didn't feel like I fit anywhere, and I didn't have many friends. At school, I just...” Her voice trailed away.

“I know the feeling,” he said.

“But your parents were awesome.”

He nodded. “They were.” A long silence stretched. He filled himself with a huge breath and blew it out between his lips. As though it were a struggle to think back to that time without making himself upset. “I was small,” he admitted in a voice that was just as small, as though those ancient wounds still lingered underneath his skin. “I got teased because I was small.”

She stared at him in the flickering light. A sense of wholeness filled her as more and more of him made perfect sense. His attitude. The way he compensated for insecurity by acting more secure than anyone, acted secure to an arrogant degree, but at the same time, was probably one of the most insecure people she knew. Insecure, but... also the warmest, sweetest man she'd ever met.

“I bet they're all eating their words, now,” she said.

He smiled. His eyes danced in the dim light. “Meredith...”

She licked her lips. This was a vacation. He hadn't bothered to shave, and after a day, his stubble was a thick, scruffy carpet across his face, which... while not being the funnest thing to kiss, made him look freaking hot. The overall effect gave him an unkempt, dark look that matched his dark, almost obsidian eyes. His bare toes moved underneath his thighs, and his knees shifted, as though he felt like getting up and pacing. The dark sweatpants matched his dark hair, but contrasted with his pale skin. He seemed... Like a pent up panther, all sleek lines and the promise of sex.

_I can take it incredibly slow, he seemed to growl in her ear._

Her body flushed as her thoughts tightened their sexual noose. She couldn't help herself or stop herself. She was selfishly lost, feeling his phantom caresses as they explored an ocean of her skin. She leaned against him, and she nuzzled him.

“You're smart, funny, sensitive...” she murmured against his skin. He turned into her touch with a low, dangerous sound in his throat, as though she were playing with fire, and not just sitting next to it. “Successful,” she continued, “extremely hot, really great at sex, and you're all...” She paused to lick a drop of melted chocolate stuck in the stubble of his chin. Sugar and cocoa melded with the salt of his skin. “Mine.”

“Mmm,” he rumbled against her, a deep, vibrating well of need as she kissed him. “Again?” he said, but he didn't sound surprised or at all put out. Only desirous. Wanting. Demanding. The fire he'd threatened her with burned her to cinders as he crashed against her and laid her back on the floor, his bigger body dwarfing hers. She reveled in the heat. He pushed his hands underneath her shirt and touched her. His palms slid along her abdomen, past her navel. He cupped her breasts as he kissed her. The heat of the fire stroked her skin, and the air seemed to whoosh out of the room. She brushed his sides, found the waistband of his loose sweatpants, and pushed underneath the band to his toned gluteal muscles. She squeezed. His skin was slick and smooth and hard beneath her palms. His breaths chuffed against her, and the room ignited with their tangled war of push and pull. He nuzzled her, and then pressed in to kiss her again, his weight heavy against her.

Memories flickering like kindling, she recalled how he'd touched her in the shower after they'd returned from the lake, his hand between her thighs as soapy suds had meandered down her spine, and again when they'd moved to the bed. He'd made love to her until she couldn't do more than lie there in a pleased, pleasant catatonia. He'd made the whole day and all the passing eternal hours about her. Pleasing her. For the bouquet of orgasms he'd given her, he'd taken only one for himself that she could remember. When they'd been in the bed. Before he'd collapsed next to her in a panting, sated heap, and slept, sweat dotting his pale skin.

He'd done that since he'd been shot. Always drove the intimate moments, refusing to give her the keys. She'd made love to her husband exactly once in the last three months or more, and that moment seemed to have been a fluke, when he'd been too tired and hurting to support himself, and too far gone into the act to stop himself from wanting to finish despite any reservations. He'd let her crawl on top, then, and she'd given him release, like the ones he'd given her over and over again. She'd thought then that they'd been making progress, but today, their first sex since then, and he'd never once relinquished control. He was better, now, physically, but his mental wounds still ran deep.

The pain of denying him scorched her, but she swallowed, and she pushed at his shoulders. He pulled back from her lips, a surprised look loitering on his face, dark in the flickering firelight.

“What?” he said, his voice low. Murmuring. Like a slide of satin along her spine. Deep concern hovered in his gaze. “Are you feeling nauseous?”

She rose up on her elbows. Her loose hair spilled behind her, and she kissed him, staring into his eyes. “No, I just...” she said. “Will you let me?”
“Let you what?” he said.

She reached and stroked his face. His hair. And then she pushed, guided, not expecting him to listen. He surprised the hell out of her when he moved at her direction onto his back, and they swapped positions, her slight weight resting flush against his side while he stared up at her. She rubbed her palm against his sleek, flat abdomen, and then chased his raised, pink scar to his throat. She rested her fingers on the raised bump at the tip of the scar, a knob like a marble, just below his clavicles. It was an ugly, rough remnant of his surgery that would remain for a long time. She kissed it to prove it didn't matter. And then she kissed his lips. Hope twisted in her throat as he submitted.

“Let me do this,” she said against his skin when he pulled away to breathe. “Let me do for you what you do for me. Please.”

“Meredith...” he said. No, he didn't say. But she could see the word in his eyes. No, I don't want you to do that. He wanted to say it. He wanted to. The indecision in his eyes killed her, and she hated Gary Clark again. She'd gone for several days without wishing the dead man ill, but, now, Derek lay underneath her, ready, wanting, but not wanting because it wasn't on his terms, and that just... hurt. Stung. Ripped her open like a horrible wound.

She stared at Derek. “Please. Please, let me.” He blinked and looked away. Her lip trembled, and just slid out of her like oil through a funnel, sluggish, but... moving all the same. Dripping. “It's just us,” she said. She coiled her index finger in the hair dusting his chest. “Just you and me. Please?”

A deep, troubled sound loitered in his throat. She kissed him. Stop, she waited for him to say. Actually say. I don't want to. Real words instead of just a mopey stare left for her to interpret. But he didn't say that. Didn't say anything. His lips parted, and he let her in. She lay against him, searching, tasting. His hand touched her back, sloped down, cupped her ass, squeezed, as if he couldn't simply be still. As if he had to do... something. She shook her head as she pulled away from him, placed her hands in the soft tufts of hair at his armpits, and pushed him back. She chased her hands along the lean muscle of his triceps, and then his forearms, and then she tangled with his fingers, pressing him flat against the soft rug.

She bit her lip. “Is this okay with your arms like this?” she said. Keeping his arms over his head could be painful for his sternum or his back or both.

“I'm okay,” he said, his voice deep and low. No pain hovered in his tone, and his face seemed relaxed. He breathed, steady and even.

As soon as she moved her hands away, he pulled his arms down, just a fraction before she leaned and pushed him back. “No,” she said. “Stay.” He lay with his wrists crossed above his head. She could almost imagine him relaxed and sated on his back in a hammock. “Please, let me.”

He shook his head, his gaze confused. “Please, let you what?”

“Love you,” she said simply.

She kissed him, and then she straddled him. He watched as she grabbed the hem of her shirt with both hands and lifted it over her head. She looked down at him through her naked cleavage, watched his breaths quicken, and his gaze narrow with need. He'd always been about visuals, and she'd become a master painter over the years. She cupped herself, rubbed her nipples with her thumbs to perk them up, and then let her breasts fall free in the warm air. His lips parted, and he stared, his dark gaze stripping her more bare than she'd felt wearing only her skin. His pleased look made her smile back at him. Her lower body throbbed at the sight of his desire.
“You want me,” she said.

“Oh, yes,” he replied. “I want you.” He stared at her with adulation, as if he couldn't believe he'd found her, or that he had her, or that she was and, in that moment, sitting on top of him, wet and almost naked.

She rolled her shirt into a wrinkled, twisted line of fabric. She leaned forward, and she placed the twisted shirt over his wrists. He kissed a nipple as she slid past, and she jerked back in surprise. He gave her a sly grin as she pulled away, as if to say, What? It was there.

She brushed his face with her palm. “I want you to pretend the shirt is a rope.”

He frowned. He lifted his wrists off the rug an inch before resettling. “It's a pretty shoddy rope.”

“Use that imagination you said you have.”

“But—”

“If you move your arms, we stop for the night, and I put my shirt back on,” she said.

He sighed. “Meredith...”

She shook her head. “Please, Derek. The rope is fake. You can always move if you need to. You always have choices. I love you, and I want you, and you've been perfect, but I don't want to feel kept anymore. I want to do this for you, and I want you to let me.”

The fire snapped and popped. The glow flickered against his face. “I didn't mean to make you feel kept.”

“Well, you do,” she said. “When it’s all about me, and never about you, all I am is a cherished plaything.”

“I didn't mean...” His voice cracked, and he looked away.

She kissed him, brought his gaze back to hers. “I know it's what you needed, Derek, and I was happy to give it for a while because of that. But I want to go back to how we were, now.”

“How were we before?” he said darkly. He swallowed.

Meredith shrugged. “Equal. You gave, but you took, and so did I, and I want that back. I want you to let me give.”

He stared at her. She swallowed against nerves when she realized his body trembled, and she didn't think it was from lust. She stroked his skin, the hard expanse of his chest. Her palms plowed over the soft hairs dusting his front. He breathed, long and slow. His fists clenched and then relaxed.

He blinked. “I thought... you were happy.”

She pulled his fingers through his hair. Her eyes watered. “I was, Derek. You satisfy the hell out of me. You do, and I love you very much. But how would you feel if things were reversed between us in the long term?”

He tipped his head toward the fire to look away from her. Closed his eyes. Swallowed.

I just want to be able to give... something, he'd said, their first time together since the shooting. Because it was my choice. I need that.
She'd frowned. You don't feel like letting me be on top is giving something?

I don't know. I...

She deflated. She'd been a stupid idiot, and she'd pressured him, and she'd said a bunch of things. Things that had fallen out of her mouth like a freaking waterfall of insensitive idiocy. “I'm sorry,” she said. She wiped her eyes with her palms. “If you're not ready, I can—”

He threw off the shirt and moved his hands to clutch her thighs, which stopped her from sliding off of him. “No,” he said. He took a breath. He blinked as he watched the fire, and then he turned to face her. “Okay,” he said. I trust you. “I'll play.” For you. A smile curled his lips as he put his hands back behind his head. He winked. “Be gentle, though. I'm fragile.”

No funny business in the shower, all right? I'm fragile, he'd said mere days after he'd been shot.

For a long parade of seconds, all she could do was blink at him. The hugeness of the moment popped in her chest like an overladen balloon. She breathed, blinking back the stupid, upset, hormonal tears that plagued her. She wiped her face again. She returned her shirt to his wrists, ‘binding’ him. She kissed him as she scooted away, down his waist, down past his knees. She leaned over his body, and she grabbed the waistband of his sweatpants.

“You're sure?” she said as she tightened her hold on the elastic that kept him hidden from her.

He nodded. A small smile curled his lips. “I can think of worse ways to cure me of this stupid hangup.”

“It's not a stupid hangup, Derek,” she said. “But I would like it to go away.”

“Me, too,” he said in a soft, choked voice. “I'm sorry.”

“Shut up,” she whispered.

He laughed, soft, self-deprecating.

With a nod, she pulled his pants away, all the way to his ankles, and off his feet. She kept her eyes averted, knowing if she stopped to stare, she wouldn't stop staring, and that would be... bad. Bad when he was lying there, stripped, his will taken from him by a submission game they were playing at her behest. She spread his legs until she could comfortably kneel between them, and then she laid the pants across his ankles, the soft, fleecy side against his skin. His toes curled and straightened.

“Another rope that's not a rope?” he said.

“Yep. If you move your legs, the sweatpants go back on.”

“That would be...” He swallowed. “Really frustrating.”

She grinned as she moved back to him. She kissed his lips. “That's the idea. I needed a good deterrent.”

“So, if I move my legs, my pants go back on, and if I move my arms, your shirt goes back on?”

She nodded. “That about sums it up.”

His eyelids lowered, and he stared at her through his thick, dark eyelashes. “I guess I'm ready, then,” he said, his voice soft.
She brushed her fingers through his hair as she stared at him. A slow smile spread across her face. She kissed him. “Okay,” she said.

She pushed her panties down her legs as he stared, and then she lay along his side and settled against the warmth of his body. He breathed, long and slow as she stroked his chest, and she listened to the rhythm of it. His life. His heart, thumping underneath her ear, bold and strong, and the soft, rustling whooshes of the air filling his lungs. She kissed his left pectoral, and then underneath, where the bullet had pierced him. His skin had an ugly pockmark there, an indentation to show him where his life had bled away.

_Please, don't die,_ she'd begged.

“Well,” he said, his voice low and throaty and rumbling through his healing sternum where she pressed her ear. This would have been one of those moments where he would wrap his strong arms around her and tell her he was fine, and that he loved her. But he didn't move except to breathe. His head tilted to the side, and he met stare her with his eyes. A smirk-y smile twitched his lips. “I'm here. I'm sinfully naked. What do you plan to do with me?”

She didn't answer right away as the moments passed. “I don't know,” she decided. She lay naked against his body, her arm draped across his torso. She stroked his ribs in slow, soothing, repetitions as she wondered. Would he get impatient? Would he wonder what was going on? Would he get more nervous, or antsy, or...?

She tested him, staring at the fire. Stroking him. Skin to skin. He didn't move his arms or his legs. The lasts remnants of his trembling eased into perfect stillness. Patient, he let her do what she wanted. The minutes passed. She checked his face. His eyes were open, but half-lidded. He seemed relaxed. Content to be in her arms, even if she did nothing else all night. The warmth of the fire pressed against her face, and she sighed as she shifted into action.

She kissed him. She didn't pull away. “What do you want?” she said. When she pressed her lips against him, he met her with a starving sort of desperation that made her body hum and belied his calm stillness. She'd built him up. Ignited his anticipation. He tasted chocolatey. Sweet. He devoured what she gave him, only the sounds of their breaths and the pops and crackles of the fire interrupting the intimate silence.

When she pulled away, his even breathing had become panting. She licked the taste of him from her lips and grinned as she stared through her eyelashes at him. At his pale, naked body. She ran her fingers through his hair, staring at him as he grappled with her abandonment. His fingers flexed.

“What do you want me to do, Derek?” she said. She kissed his Adam's apple as he swallowed, licked the crook between his clavicles, tasted his scar and his skin and then, when he still didn't answer her question, she took his left nipple between her teeth and tweaked. “This?” she said. She moved to his right and sucked.

“Mmm,” he said.

“How about that?” he said, cheerful, encouraging between jerky breaths. “I like that.”

Entirely too composed for her tastes.
She slid the flat of her palm past the bullet wound, along the ripple of his ribs, to the crease of his groin. He wasn't hard or even semi-erect. The Paxil hadn't left him unaffected. He'd proven, now, that he could still function on demand even on his high dosage, but no amount of enticing visuals, or staying north of his navel would fire him up on all cylinders. He needed a more... direct sort of help, so to speak.

She hefted his flaccid weight in her hands, and he gasped as she said, “Maybe... this?”

She circled his scrotum with her index finger and thumb and lifted it away from his body. The gentle pulling sensation was one of his favorite things, she'd learned over hours and hours of experimentation. His back arched and then snapped straight at the unexpected touch. She sank the fingertips of her free hand into the warmth between his legs, behind his sack, and stroked his perineum once, twice. Another of his favorites.

A deep, shivering moan wrung from his lips.

“Do you want more of that?” she said.

“Yes,” he managed.

“I didn't hear you.”

“Yes,” he blurted, and her lower body throbbed and her breaths tightened from the simple act of watching him undone and at her mercy. She pressed and stroked and teased. A sensation of emptiness hollowed out her body as she stared. She wanted him, wanted him, now, and suddenly it was hard to think in more terms than the simple beauty of his anatomy. His dark, curly hair framed his lower attributes like a bulls-eye, sort of his own pick me, choose me, love me.

She thought of him aroused and full and ready, and she thought of his girth as he cleaved her. A gasp tightened in her throat. She shook her head. Focus. She had to focus, or they'd both be in the frustrated bowels of sexual purgatory, unable to ascend. Getting him going, now, took... calculation.

“What about this?” she said as she moved, and she pressed her lips to the whorl of soft, wiry hair underneath his navel. She skipped down his front, following the fuzzy arrow to its terminus, exactly how she'd imagined earlier that day, kissing, touching. With a slight stroke of her fingertips, she retracted his prepuce. It slid down his length. He sucked in a breath at the gentle motion, and then she kissed his sensitive head.

“Does that feel good?” she said.

“Yes,” he said, his voice hoarse and raw.

“Really good?”

The muscles in his lower abdomen twitched as she kissed him again, and then she licked once, looping her tongue around his corona much like she imagined working the raised ridge of a Tootsie pop. A rough, deep sound pealed from his throat. Sort of like a yes. More of a moan. Animalistic. The panther she'd seen in the coils of his muscles, growling. Caged and dying to be released. That was more like it.

When she took him into her mouth and sucked, his whole body skipped off the rug like he'd been zapped. The shirt against his wrists shuddered, and his knees poked upward in surprise, dislodging his fleecy sweatpants, but she let his misdemeanor go with a light, chastising slap to his smooth hip. “Hold still, or the pants go on,” she threatened, and he settled, his breaths chuffing with desperation. When she ran her hands along his quadriceps, along the flat expanse of skin below his bellybutton, the tightness, the unyielding tension she found there made her throb. He was trying to be still. For her.

You know you're my best friend, right? he'd said in the car on the way home from the hospital.

Mark is your best friend, she'd replied.

He hadn't blinked. Now, who's got no faith?

She ached. For all the torture she committed, she received it back in spades. Her breasts felt as full as her core felt empty, and a hot flush swept across her naked skin, along her cheeks, down her throat, and over her chest. She forced herself to breathe.

She licked the underside of his length, gratified to feel that his blood had begun to pool there. The veined skin was hot and feather soft and filling with the deep, blushing promise of sex. Soon. A bit more help, and he would be ready to fill the horrible void between her legs.

She raised her head to grin at him. “What do you want, Derek?” she said, her voice low, husky. Ready.

It's intense, you know.

What?

This thing I have for you.

He blinked at the ceiling, and his fingers clenched and unclenched. “Do... that. Again.”

She licked her lips and pulled away. “You'll need to be more specific.”

“Your mouth,” he said.

“What about it?”

“Taste me.”

She knelt before him between his legs, encircled his widening girth with her hands, and took him into mouth her again. She bobbed up and down, once, twice, a slip and slide, pressing him into the back of her throat. When she pulled away, she sucked.

“F... fuck,” he said.

She gave him a languid grin. “That's the idea,” she said, her voice even despite the churning coil of desperation underneath her guise of command. She wanted him, and she felt. So. Empty. She pressed her breaths in and out of her chest with the force of her diaphragm alone. She stroked him, encouraged him. Touched him. Kissed him. Tasted him. Until his arousal was a thick, heavy weight. Ready. Eager. Enticing.

“What do you want, Derek?” she asked again. She reached underneath his erection and massaged his perineum, a barrage of his favorite stimulation.

Do you have any idea, how often you turn me on?

He blinked at her, a glazed look of desire on his face. “I want...” He gasped. Twitched. “You.”
"How do you want me, Derek?"

His eyes widened, as though he were incredulous that she expected him to be able to explain the needs his nerve endings at that moment. Nerve endings she was twisting up with erotic fire in all his favorite spots. At that moment. She ran the nail of her index finger along his frenulum, and his whole body jerked. The sweatpants at his ankles shifted, but he didn't dislodge them.

"How, Derek?"

"I want..." His breaths squeezed in his chest, and she couldn't help but mirror him. The empty void within her throbbed. “Mmm.”

"Yes?"

His knee twitched. He blinked like he was trying to concentrate. “Dirty.”

"You want it dirty?"

He bared his teeth at her in a grimace of sexual frustration. “Dirty fucking...”

“We could do that,” she replied. “But you're going to have to be more specific than that.”

He panted. “Pool. Dirty... fucking... p...”

She laughed, stroking him.

He moaned, deep and low. His arms shifted. Three inches.

“Don't move, or we stop,” she warned. “Remember?”

Her heart beat like a crashing gong in her chest as she stared at him, naked and glistening and ready, if only he would say the words. Derek was a want, take, have sort of guy, and now he couldn't take or have. He could only want. The tables had been flipped on him. She licked her lips with anticipation as she watched him attempt speech.

“I want to be...” he said. His eyelids dipped as she applied pressure. “Mmm.”

She eased forward. “You want to be...?”

“Please,” he said. “Inside.” His breaths came thickly. Quickly. She watched his ribs slide and jerk with his desperation. “Just fuck me,” he blurted at last.

“That,” she said as she straddled him, “I can definitely do.”

She gripped his erection with her hand as she raised her lower body. For a moment, she hovered as wicked, thrilling anticipation pounded through her body. She guided him to her. The head of his erection pressed against the nerve clusters at her opening. She gasped. Twitched. Delighted at the feel of him pushing against her, a mere fraction inside. Pleasure set her nerves on fire, and the conflagration made it difficult to think.

He sucked in a breath and pushed up with his hips, slamming into her, wanting, taking, having. His hot, slick length slid home to her center. Her teeth clacked shut in surprise with the jounce, and then gravity took them down to the rug again with a jolt. She blinked. Her vision fuzzed and then corrected.

“Oh,” she moaned as her insides adjusted to him, and her body throbbed with unmet needs.
He looked at her, panting, a familiar sly smirk slathered on his face, as if to say once more, What? It was there. Neither of the two 'ropes' had moved. She couldn't exactly fault him for speeding things along.

She squeezed with her insides, feeling him deep within her, ready, hot, and he groaned a mirror, “Oh,” that bounced back at her with the same desperation of hers, only in a lower, choppier pitch.

“You feel really good,” she said.

“So do you,” he said.

Her lips parted, and she panted as the desire to move coiled within her like a spring. Her engine idled, ready and aching to accelerate. Go, said her brain. Just go. Go, go, go. Shaking, resisting, she squeezed around him as she splayed her palms against the flat expanse of skin below his navel.

“I really love you,” she said, looking down at him.

Maybe, we just fit.

“Hmm,” he said. His nostrils flared. He panted, and he stared at her with a fathomless expression that said those same words without any words at all. I love you. The fire made the dim light between them flicker and dance. She lowered herself to lie flush against his body, her breasts mashed against his heaving ribs, her lips at his throat. Where their skin met, the heat between them bloomed with perspiration.

She scrunched her fingers in his damp hair, and she kissed his lips. His chin. His throat. His chest.

“I love you,” she repeated, a murmur.

“I love you, too,” he managed.

And then she started to move.

Slowly, at first. Up and down to give him the sensation of thrusting, though he didn't thrust. He filled her, and then he left her, though he didn't move much. He rocked his hips against gravity to meet her on the downswings. Over and over. But he didn't move his arms, or his legs.

I'm in love with you, he'd said. I've been in love with you... forever.

His tight abs struggled to keep her pace as she leaned back, changed gears, and eased into more frantic thrusting of her own. Rocking. Like a grinding wave against his pelvis.

“Huh,” he managed, not a question. An observation. He smirked, though the expression carried more need than amusement. It was as though the heat of friction had taken his mind from him, and he burned.

“What?” she said.

“Save a horse.” He blinked. A rough groan stuck in his throat. “Ride a surgeon?”

“I swear you've said that before,” she said.

“Maybe...” He panted. “In another universe. Fuck.”

She snickered. “Feels good?”
His head twitched. Sort of like a nod. “Ye... oh.” His body snapped back in an arch of sinew and lean muscle as she slowed her rhythm, jerking her lower body in tight circles.

She pressed her fingers between her legs, jamming herself between their bodies to add needed pressure in the right places. Needed touch. She moaned as she hit her spot. A breath funneled out of her like a tornado. The feel of his shaft running her through her from underneath, while she pressed with her fingers over top...

“Oh, Derek. You feel so good.”

“Dit... ditto. You're so... wet.”

She clenched her teeth as a wave tore through her, made her toes twitch and her shoulders heave. “It's for you,” she said. “You make me that way.”

His pleased look gratified her.

The room fuzzed as she massaged herself. She bit her lip. Glorious need crushed into a fine point like a diamond stuck in the earth. She throbbed with it. Pulsed with it. She was ready. On the cliff. Looking down into the valley. She could jump, if she wanted. Enter freefall, if she wanted.

If she wanted.

She pulled her hand away and left herself dangling on the precipice, wanting and in glorious pain from it. She focused on him. This was about him. She only wanted to be able to find completion when he did. As much as he humored her by lying there bound in fake ropes, she doubted he would be okay with it if she didn't finish, and he did.

She leaned down, mashing her body against his. She nuzzled his throat. Kissed him. He ravished her with his endless hunger, returning what she gave him and more.

“What do you need?” she whispered against him.

His mouth moved. She saw her name form on his lips, but he didn't speak the word. He gasped. She met his eyes. His unfocused, desperate expression sucked her in like quicksand, and it took eternity to escape. She pushed against his groin, and he moaned, deep, low, unfettered.

She pulled away, re-seating herself. She rocked against his body. Slow, and fast, and fast and slow. Alternating. Patterns gave him no end. Neither did change.

“What do you need?” she repeated, breathless, almost frustrated.

Something was wrong. Was something wrong?

His fingers clenched and unclenched. Beads of sweat formed on his brow. She watched his Adam's apple slink along the skin of his throat. He thunked his head against the rug, and his gaze rolled back to the ceiling behind him as the knife edge of orgasm split him open. His body arched as he rose to meet her and then snapped flat.

Nothing happened. He panted.

“Fucking,” he said. He jammed his lower body into her. “Paxil.”

All the dots connected in a rush. He'd had one orgasm for her many because he'd camouflaged his slower climax with a meticulous ode to her body. He'd kissed her. Touched her. Every crease and crevice. Every freckle. Every hair. He'd sent her into blissful paroxysms once and again and a third time while he'd been sheathed within her, hot and hard and powerful, but not because he'd held himself back.

Paxil could cause delays. He'd used it to his own advantage then, and he'd enjoyed it. Now, he thought she was waiting for him, and he couldn't send himself down the beckoning slide. He was stuck and letting himself feel stuck instead of allowing the sensation to build his pleasure.

She slowed her pace and relaxed with a sigh. She smiled. She stroked herself to renew her toehold on sweet oblivion. She stared at him through her eyelashes. “We'll get there,” she said. “I'm just enjoying the ride.”

He'd smirked. You're telling me I'm a smooth ride.

She squeezed her insides around him, and he groaned.

She tangled her fingers in the delicate hair below his navel. She touched his flat, sweat-slicked lower body, and she splayed her palms. She flattened against him, a wave of flesh, still moving, rocking. She rode on top of him, against his skin. The heat between them built as she stared into his eyes. Endless blue stared back at her. Needing. Wanting. Having, not taking. She plunged her fingers into his sweaty hair and brushed it away from his face.

“I love you,” she said. She kissed him, and he drank her down, panting. “And we'll get there.”

When we got married on the Post-it, there was you, and there was me. And we made... We made a team.

“Meredith,” he said, the word a murmured group of loosely connected syllables. He tilted up his head to kiss her. Derive his existence in her skin. Her heartbeat.

She grinned. “It's not work if it's totally fun, right?”

A helpless smile crinkled the skin around his eyes and lit up his face. He laughed breathlessly against her lips as she kissed him. Pressed against him. Became him.

Time seemed to slow and stretch into the infinite.

She lost track of the moments they shared in the endless, buffeting heat. Staring at each other while the dying firelight flickered. Slipping against each other in a well of friction. She rode him into the darkness, toeing the line and towing him with her, waiting, encouraging.

Until she heard it. The telltale gasps of his breaths tightening in his chest. Felt it. The tension coiling his muscles into tight, pressure-loaded springs. Saw it. His eyes rolling back.

He'd passed close to no return. The sliver between him and release was the size of an atom.

She pressed her fingertips into the slick heat between them, pushing down as he pushed up. The flare as their two opposite forces met was cataclysmic. Brilliant. Punishing and perfect and bright all at once. She grimaced, showing her teeth to him. Not in pain. And then it all came apart at the seams. Euphoria sparked at the ends of all her nerves. She loosed a pleased, desperate moan. Her insides fluttered, squeezing around him in rhythmic pulses. She collapsed against him, boneless and out of steam.

Momentum carried him the rest of the way.
He arched backward into the floor. His belly pressed into her as he came off the rug, lifting her with him an inch. Two. His lungs filled to the bursting brim, and then he didn't move. Didn't breathe. Didn't speak. Bliss evened his expression into blue glass. His lips parted. And then his whole body jerked. Twitched. He spurted within her. Liquid heat filled the space between her legs.

He sank to the floor with her like the subsiding crush of a wave, and then he stilled.

They lay against each other, breathing. Silent. Exhausted in the languid aftershocks.

The last lick of fire popped. Snapped. Died.

It'd been a long day.

You were like coming up for fresh air. It's like I was drowning, and you saved me. That's all I know.

They didn't need words.

They slept.

---

(Like sleeping in on Sunday)

Meredith woke up feeling like a popsicle lying on a hot grill. The heat underneath her body pressed against her, inviting, beckoning her to curl closer. Her bare back and ass, however, felt frozen. She blinked and grimaced. A strange yin-yang of raven-brown mashed with fuzzy white replaced the blackness of sleep. She raised her head, squinting in the dim light. She smacked her lips as sentience arrived, and the yin-yang became her husband's hair, and the expanse of the white shag rug beyond him.

Derek, her personal furnace, lay on his stomach underneath her, breathing soft and even. He’d rolled over in the night, and she’d draped herself against him at a slant in her sleep. Heat seeking, or something, she supposed. Which was probably why Derek hadn’t stirred despite the loitering chill left by the vacant fireplace. She’d been his unintentional human blanket, leaving him all toasty and comfortable while her backside succumbed to the gelid wilds of Antarctica. Well, maybe not Antarctica. But at least a very cold territory in northern Canada.

She pressed a kiss against the slope of his pale neck despite her rue, pausing to inhale the familiar scent of him. All hers. And then she wriggled away, careful to avoid disturbing him. He didn’t wake. Didn’t mumble. Didn’t move.

Standing up felt a bit like trying to untwist a paperclip. Little curlicues of stiff muscles remained no matter how much she stretched. The shoulder and hip she’d been putting all her weight on overnight ached and twinged, and she was pretty sure, if she were to look in the mirror, she would find her hair to be a scraggly snarl, and crinkled imprints from the rug would dent her face.

She shivered and rubbed her hands against her naked skin for friction. Warmth. A latticework of dark and light, dim sunlight glimmered through the trees by the window next to the front door. The vague daylight spoke of early morning to her. Six. Maybe six-thirty.

She went to the bedroom to find clothes for herself. A t-shirt, some knit pants, and some socks to thaw the solid blocks of ice that were her toes and feet. After she dressed, she yanked the down comforter from the bed and returned to the living room. He still hadn't moved. When her feet padded onto the soft fuzz of the shag rug, she stopped. Her lip twitched. A smile overtook all else as she was reminded of the morning. Their first morning.

“Why don't you just come back down here, and we'll pick up where we left off?” he'd said.

He lay sprawled on his stomach, one arm parallel to his torso, the other draped in an arch over his head. Her eyes trailed from his broad shoulders, along the gentle slope of his spine. She followed the dip of his lower back, and then the gentle swell that followed, except this time, she didn't bother to cover him with a pillow, and he didn't wake up with a discombobulated grunt. The soft rasps of his even breathing filled the quiet space, and she watched her husband sleep. Just for a few, selfish moments.

“Meredith,” he'd said, his smile brilliant as he'd hopped over the back of the couch. He'd held her hand. “Nice meeting you.”

“Nice meeting you, too,” she whispered. He didn't stir.

She dragged the comforter to him and draped it over his prone form. His eyes slid open half way as the weight of the light down pressed on his naked back. He mumbled something incoherent, awake but not conscious. Thank you, maybe. Good morning. Scalpel, please. Something. She wasn't sure. His gaze was dull and unfocused with slumber.

“Hey,” she whispered. “It's just me.” She stroked his back through the comforter. “Go back to sleep.”

He didn't respond except to close his eyes. He relaxed again.

The living room lay in shambles. Black soot littered the fireplace. Wrappers, sticks covered with drying marshmallow goo, and other refuse lay on the rug in a heap by the coffee table. They'd pushed one couch against the back wall, and then the coffee table into that couch, leaving a wide open space on the rug. She quietly picked up the trash and took it to the kitchen, and then she fed herself a makeshift fluffernutter for breakfast.

The rest of the morning moved in a slow, pleasant crawl as she put coffee in the pot, took a long, hot shower, and eventually settled on the couch in the living room that hadn't been blocked by the coffee table. She curled up with her book under a rainbow-colored afghan that didn't match anything in the entire freaking cabin, and she read while she listened to him breathe.

Listening. To him. A pastime that, months ago, she'd hardly cared about, and now she couldn't ever stop. The sound of him wrapped around her like a security blanket, and she tugged it close, letting it soothe away the fears that always threatened. She rubbed her belly absenty, listening, and let herself fall into the vivid world painted by her book.

Distracted and soothed, her thoughts collected at the speed of snails.

It wasn't until her stomach rumbled and demanded lunch that she realized Derek hadn't woken up last night. Hadn't mumbled in her ear or shouted or shook with the disquiet of his nightmares. At all. He hadn't flinched awake in terror when she'd lain the comforter on top of him, and he hadn't tensed when she'd stroked his back through the covers, despite not being entirely awake.

After she'd eaten another fluffernutter for lunch, he began to shift like he might be waking up for real. His even breathing became subtly irregular. It wasn't until early afternoon, though, that he woke.

He rolled onto his back with a clipped moan. She couldn't differentiate the sound between pain, disappointment, or simple mindless noise. She looked up from her book as he sat up, an indignant, why-am-I-awake look scrunching up his face a bit like a rabbit's. The comforter slipped down into his lap, revealing his pale chest, and the distant echoes of injury still pink and twisted against his skin. He pressed his palms against his face as if to shut the daylight out.

“What time is it?” he groaned more than said, his voice muffled through his hands.

“Uh...” Meredith frowned. She glanced at her watch. “It's 1:00.”

“PM?” he grumbled.

She smiled, amused. “I don't think the sun usually shines this brightly at 1:00 AM.”

He didn't respond to her quip, and her smile bled away. He sat there. With his face in his hands. Breathing as though the simple act of being alive, at that moment, was a laborious task. He seemed... almost hungover. Except that was a ludicrous idea, because even if he had fallen off the wagon already, the cabin wasn't stocked with any booze.

“You slept forever,” she said, her voice soft. “Are you okay?”

He dropped his hands and made a face like he'd tasted something awful, but he didn't speak. Watching him ratchet to a standing position made her frown. He made moving look... almost painful. Then again, maybe it was painful. His back was finicky following his heart surgery and all the stress he'd been forced to put on it, and, now, he'd spent the night on the floor.

He stood in the center of the room. Naked. Silent. Seconds passed, and she didn't even find herself enjoying the view. He didn't ham it up or show off with a quirky grin like he did when he was feeling well. His lack of affectation and his grogginess sucked all the fun out of voyeurism. Instead of ogling, she frowned.

“Derek?”

He twitched, and he looked at her as if this was the first time he'd heard her speak. “Huh?”

“Are you okay?”

“Tired,” he said.

“You're sure you're not getting sick?” she said. Tension curled her fingers around her book. The pages crinkled.

A yawn cracked his expression open wide, and he blinked tears from it. He wiped his eyes. “Jus' tired,” he said. And then he lumbered to the back of the cabin without saying anything else.

She heard the flush of the toilet. The shower turned on long minutes later. She fiddled with the page of her book, reading and rereading the same lines again. He'd slept more than twelve hours. This had to be the meds. Or the distinct absence of stress cashing in its 'heal while you can' gift card.

The azure sky peeked at them through the green, swaying tips of towering hemlock trees. Birds chattered in the mess of overhanging branches as she and Derek walked along a narrow dirt path that followed along the lake. Waves lapped at the shore to the left as they moved counterclockwise along the water. The weather had warmed a bit, and a cool, pleasant low seventies breeze ruffled her hair.
Derek walked beside her, closer to the water, not fast, but... not slow, either. Over the months since his injury, his long, graceful strides had returned. His pace wasn't driving, wasn't that of the rushing surgeon she knew, the man who ate hallways for breakfast when he had a patient in trouble. She didn't know if this slower pace was because he had no reason to hurry, or because he wasn't physically able to walk faster, yet, but at least he didn't shuffle anymore, didn't struggle with simple ambulation, and she didn't have to remind herself every two seconds to slow down so that he could keep up with her. She'd noticed that subtle return of his fitness during their first walk with Samantha, and this walk at the lake only served to reinforce her opinion.

Derek was healing well, physically, despite everything. His lingering challenges were mostly mental.

She pulled his hand into hers as they walked abreast. Their feet clomped on the soft, damp earth. His warm skin brushed against hers. She regarded him. Carefully. He breathed a little harder than he should have at their current pace, but he seemed okay, and the farther they plodded, the faster their blood pumped, and the more his gaze seemed to brighten.

He seemed more chipper. More intent on listening to and looking at things going on around him. Less groggy. More... alive. A pleased grin tugged at his lips. Not a wide one, but enough to tell her he enjoyed this. Walking. With her. Even with zero conversation.

Thirty minutes had passed in relative silence when he squeezed her hand. “How are you?” he said in a soft, concerned voice. “Nauseous?”

If she'd needed proof he was waking up and feeling better, there it was. She paused and turned to him. He stopped. Waited. Three days of stubble had gathered on his face, and he'd gone from sexy to scruffy and un-kissable, but he seemed so comfortable, standing there in holey, frayed, threadbare jeans, and a black t-shirt. Comfortable. Relaxed. At peace. If he kept the beard after Monday, she'd mention she kind of hated it. Until then, though, she didn't want to ruin their first – and so far only – real vacation with stupid, time-wasting nagging.

“I lost a bit of my breakfast,” she said, “but lunch stayed down, and I feel fine right now.”

His easy smile spread wider, and they kept walking. “I'm glad.”

She bumped his hip with hers as they moved along. “What about you? Did you sleep well?”

“Yeah,” he said, sounding almost surprised. He blinked. “I did.”

“No nightmares?”

“None that I remember.”

She leaned against his warm body, relished the feel of his hand in hers. “That's really good,” she said.

They moved through a diagonal shaft of sunlight. She glanced at the lake through the line of trees to her left. Water sparkled in the sunlight. They'd been blessed with two idyllic days without rain, though the air felt a bit damp.

A giant freaking crow... thing with a red head shrieked as it flew above them, darting between the trees. It landed maybe forty feet away. It made a repetitious call that reminded her of the shh-shh-shh-shh of a lawn sprinkler, except with a sharp, pleading tone. The noise was freaking loud.

“What is that thing?” she exclaimed, pointing at it.
He snickered. “It's a bird.”

“No, seriously.”

“A plane?”

“Derek...”

He kissed her cheek. His stubble tickled her skin but didn't grate. “I don't know,” he said.

“But you're nature-y.”

“I'm a surgeon who likes to camp and fish,” he said with a soft chuckle. “Not a birdwatcher.”

She blinked. She'd never seen a bird that big. Not like that one, anyway. Maybe an eagle or something at the zoo. The bird slammed its beak against the tree trunk, and chips of wood flew away in a dry shower to the forest floor.

“Clearly,” Meredith told him, “it's a woodpecker.”

He laughed. “It could be a very drunk crow, you know.”

She snorted as laughter burbled in her chest. The big bird hopped to another tree and made its jarring call again. She leaned against Derek’s warm body. They watched the forest, and it came alive. Little birds tittered in the highest branches. Squirrels played tag amongst the bracken. Derek rubbed her arms with his palms, warming her in the balmy breeze.

“I forgot how much I love it out here,” he said.

She leaned back against his chest and looked up at him. “You've never been here before, have you?”

“No.”

“Then, what is there to remember?”

“Oh, I don't mean here, here,” he said. “I just mean here. This kind of space. I can hear myself think. Get perspective.”

The woodpecker – or possibly drunk crow – flew off, and they started moving again, hand in hand. He pushed a low-hanging branch out of the way for her, and she ducked through the gap. “It does suit you,” she agreed as she straightened. Damp earth and leaves slipped under her shoes.

“There's no people,” he said. “Well, a few people. But not many.” The longing tone that gripped his voice made her throat thicken.

She swallowed. “Derek...”

“Yeah?”

“Do you feel safer out here than you do at my mother's house?”

He shrugged. The dark look on his face answered for him. Yes. Yes, he did feel safer out here. A lot safer.

He didn't go out very much anymore. Sometimes, but not much. Almost never by himself, and never for fun. He had to have a reason. Like walking Samantha. When she prodded him to go for a walk with her, he did, but... he'd become very den-oriented. She couldn't remember the last time he'd walked simply to walk. Except...

Want to go for a walk? he'd said earlier. When he'd slogged back to the couch earlier, his hair a still-wet disaster, he hadn't looked much more awake than he had before he'd taken his shower.

She'd frowned as she'd assessed his listless countenance. You're sure?

I need to wake up, he'd said. It's our last day. I don't want to waste it.

It's our vacation, she'd said. If you need to sleep, sleep. That's not waste.

He'd blinked. No, I want to go for a walk, he'd said, his voice determined.

The world spaced and blurred for a long moment, until she realized he hadn't stopped. She found herself watching his back as he kept walking. She squeezed her fist, the one he'd been holding, and sprang forward to catch up. She tugged on the back of his t-shirt. The collar cut him in the neck, and he stopped moving. He turned.

“What?” he said. Not snapping or mean. Soft. Resigned. As if he'd assessed his new enclosed-space-loving persona at the same time she had, and he didn't like it, but... what was there to do about it except keep breathing?

I have a feeling.

I get those.

Yeah?

Yeah.

And?

If you wait long enough, it passes.

But there was something to do. If he could be here and sleep without nightmares and want to go out just to go out, then... there was something to do, and it was simple, and she wanted to kick herself for not suggesting it sooner.

“Do you want to move back into your trailer until the house is done?” she said.

He blinked. “No...” he said slowly. Where did that come from? said his gaze, and the strangest hint of... dread... gripped his expression. She narrowed her eyes. Since when was his trailer dread-worthy?

“It's just that this seems to suit you,” she rushed to explain. “And, yes, we've had some hitches here and there, but overall you seem so much better out here than you did back in Seattle. If you need some peace and privacy, away from roommates and stuff, I'd understand. I'd get it.”

He frowned. “Just to be clear, here, we are discussing you moving with me, right, and not just me going by myself?”

“Of course, I'd go with you,” she said. “Just... if it's what you need. I'd get it. I'm okay with it. We could, if you want.”
A distant whir of a boat drew his gaze to the water. He stared through the trees, and then he moved off the path, into the brush and bracken and ferns. She followed. Branches scraped at her. Sticky sap clung to her skin. She brushed her arms with her palms.

“Derek, what are you—” she began, only to stop when he stopped at the muddy bank of the lake.

He squinted at the shimmering water with an unreadable gaze. A bright bath of sunlight reflected off the water. A boat sped past, sending a churning white spray of water behind it. Water birds scattered.

“It’s not what I need right now, but thank you for offering,” he said.

“Are you sure?” she said. Her feet splurched in the mud as she stepped next to him and touched his arm. “Because you really do seem better here. A lot better.”

He shrugged. “Here, specifically, maybe, but...”

“We haven't been back to your trailer in a while,” she said. “You haven't even suggested it.”

“I... know,” he said. He glanced at her, and his expression made her heart squeeze. Like she'd pushed him into a confessional he didn't want to deal with right now, but he wouldn't avoid it, either. Because he knew. He knew she didn't trust him anymore, and he wanted to fix it. “It felt wrong.”

She frowned. “What do you mean, wrong? What felt wrong?”

“When I was sick, and we went there, it just felt...” His mouth opened and closed as he searched for the right word. “The trailer felt wrong.”

“Wrong, how?” she prodded.

“Mere, I really...” He sighed. “If I understood it, I'd explain it. I would. I had the trailer in my head before we went, and I wanted to visit so badly, but when we got there, it felt wrong, and I didn't like it. That's all I can say.”

She bit her lip as she stared at him and he stared at the water.

Where do you go?

The lake, sometimes. I like to sit on the dock.

She tried to think back to the day she'd taken him to his trailer. She'd meant for it to be a pleasant surprise, but he'd been sick. Very sick. He'd almost died that night, and she didn't like to remember the trip to the hospital or anything leading up to it.

Had he said something when she'd brought him to his land? She remembered helping him out of the car. He'd been hurting. Badly hurting. Like agony hurting. She'd gotten the distinct impression he'd been trying not to vomit he'd hurt so much, though he'd said nothing about the pain. He'd been so stoned at the time his feelings had been difficult for her to read, but he'd stumbled on the deck outside his trailer. Not like a clumsy stumble, now that she focused on that moment and, removed from the panic over how sick he might be, thought about his behavior. He'd been more... halting. Like he hadn't wanted to go inside. Except he'd been sick, and he hadn't said a single word to her after she'd gotten him out of the car except some half-coherent babbling about his lake. She'd passed off his reluctance as drug-induced poor coordination.
She swallowed. The one time since he'd been shot, and she'd taken him to his trailer, he'd been in so much pain he'd almost thrown up. He'd been stoned out of his mind because she'd forced him to take a third Percocet, and—

Wait.

She'd forced him to take a third Percocet, and he'd protested.

Will you take one more Percocet before we try the road to your land?

I already took two.

“I made you take an extra pill on the way to your trailer,” she said. “Derek, I—”

“You didn't make me take anything,” he said.

“But—”

He pressed against her. “It doesn't matter what you asked me to take that day.”

“It does, Derek. I gave you—”

“It doesn't matter. I was in pain,” he said. “Even with addicts, you still treat pain, and I was in pain, Meredith.”

“But, were you—”

“I hurt constantly for over a month.” He put his hand on his chest, pressing her palm underneath his. His shirt felt soft underneath her skin. The breeze ruffled his dark hair. “I still get bad twinges now and then. I was in pain. There's nothing wrong with treating that. You didn't know I had other reasons to take the Percocet, too.”

She swallowed against the lump in her throat. “When did you start taking the Percocet just for the other reasons?”

He shook his head. “I don't know.” A glassy film of tears slipped across his eyes. “I had a snowball, and then I had an avalanche. The between is a blur.”

“Oh,” she said.

He closed his eyes, and he pressed his forehead against hers. “I thought about you. In the car on the way up the hill to the trailer. And it was perfect. Then I woke up.”

How are you doing? she’d said.

He hadn't been able to speak to answer. He'd been ashen and clammy and unable to support his own weight on his own two feet. And he'd been stoned, so who knew what he'd seen or perceived, even awake.

“You woke up, and it wasn't perfect,” she said. “It felt wrong, you said.”

He nodded. Dots connected. Slowly. He'd created a safe place in his head. The lake. The trailer. An idealized place where nothing could hurt him. The reality didn't mesh with his ideal. He'd hurt to the point of nausea when he'd woken up in the car. The disharmony had hit him at a weak moment, and he didn't want to go back to that. Almost like... falling off a bike or a horse and not wanting to ride again. She could see that. She touched the small scar on his forehead. Another instance where he'd lost his nerve. One day, maybe, he would explain that one, too.

“So, that's why you haven't suggested we go back since then?” she said.

He shrugged. “I don't like the trailer anymore. It's stupid, but I don't, and I just... I don't want to live there.”

Worry squeezed. She clutched his sleeves. “But what about our new house?”

He smiled. “I'm looking forward to living in our new house.”

“But you just said—”

“The trailer,” he said. “The trailer felt wrong. Just... I want to go back to my land, but I want to make new memories there with you in the new house, not be haunted by old ones in the trailer. I don't want to live in the trailer again.”

“We could go somewhere else,” she said. “If it helps you, we could—”

He gave her a pained smile. “I think I'm going to have enough going on my head with the baby and the one move. I'm barely floating as it is.”

“Do you still want Percocet?” she said.

His eyes slipped shut. “I always want it, Mere. It's like a constant... ache.”

He looked away. At the water. She searched his face. She saw shame. Guilt. Regret. Things she didn't want him to feel. Not on their vacation. They could deal with this later. They had a lot of later, and not a lot left of now. Their forty-eight hours were coming to a close.

She wrapped her arms around him, and she kissed him, annoying beard and all. His face scratched hers, but she didn't care. His eyes opened as they met, skin to skin. She tasted him, drank down the soft, delightful groan that rumbled against her. She lit a fire in his tired gaze as she raked her fingers through his hair. “Always?” she said when she pulled back.

He blinked, panting softly. “Maybe, not always.”

“Last night?”

His bewildered, adorably mussed look eased into a pleased smirk. “Definitely not last night,” he purred.

“It was good for you,” she said. She clutched a piece of his shirt and gave him a sly smile as she backed away from the water and from him.

He followed, a sexy gleam in his eyes that told her she wasn't wearing clothes right then. At least not in his head. “Oh, yes, it was good for me,” he said. “Very good.” The black of his shirt contrasted with his pale face, made him seem... almost nefarious. The sun sparkling on the water behind him gave him a sort of halo. His lip twitched. She backed away with the distinct impression she'd cut the wrong wire on a ticking bomb. Or, maybe cut the right one.

She giggled as adrenaline and other pleasant things spilled into her system. Heat licked her veins at the thought of a chase. She flushed with arousal. And then she darted to the path just as his arms snaked out to grab her.

She felt his hand brush the back pocket of her jeans. Felt his index finger hook onto the lip of the pocket, only to slip away as she flew. His footsteps pounded behind her as he chased her back onto the path, which quashed her earlier speculation about whether he could run. Could he run? Emphatically, yes, and he was gaining on her.

The wind whipped her face as she sprinted into the forest, and he followed. She made it maybe a hundred feet before he caught her with a playful roar, spun her around, and kissed the world so thoroughly away she couldn't give a crap about his scratchy face. She couldn't think about anything.

They panted. She slipped her hands into his back pockets and squeezed. He pressed a palm between her thighs and slid along the denim seam. She ground against him, an interlocking puzzle piece, desperate to fit, and feeling like she'd come home when she did fit. Perfectly. He cupped her between her thighs, and the heat of his skin seeped into her through her jeans. She throbbed as she pictured him naked. Right here. Right now.

“Naughty forest sex against a tree?” he suggested with a low, rumbling laugh.

She made a face despite surging arousal. “Because sticky, sappy bark digging into my ass and pine needles up my hoo-hoo is so sexy and fun.” She almost hurt with desire despite her words.

He cocked his head to the side, a lecherous grin on his face. He moved the hand between her thighs. She gasped. “Well, this was fun, wasn't it?” he prodded.

“This was playing,” she said.

He winked and withdrew his hand. She moaned. “I'll wait,” he said.

“For what?”

“Naughty cabin sex on a comfy, tiny bed?”

She grinned. “Deal,” she said.

She took a moment to compose herself. To come down off her thrumming, pleasing high. She caught her breath as he watched with a sly expression that told her she hadn't fooled him. He knew she wanted it, now, now, now, even if the practicality wasn't, well, practical. She shook her head and chose to blame the pregnancy for the roaring sex drive. And him. She could definitely blame him.

It wasn't fair that he looked so delectable and mussed and, in that moment, radiated masculinity as though it were going out of style. His skin was damp with a sheen of sweat from the exertion. He had a healthy flush, and a dark, desirous look that spoke of intense hunger, darkened even more by his mask of weekend stubble and tussled, sweaty curls.

She leaned against his shoulder, leaving her right hand in his back pocket, and they kept walking. My first real walk after a gunshot wound, and you're feeling me up, he'd said what seemed like years ago. She smiled at the memory and gave him a squeeze.

He stared at her, his longing expression slipping into something more serious. “It was good for you, right? Last night? It's what you wanted?”

She nodded. “It was good for me.”

“Good,” he said with a definitive nod.
A jogger with a yellow lab trotted past. The dog yipped at them, a cheerful expression twinkling in its chocolate-colored eyes. Its dog tags jingled. It wanted to say hi. It pulled on the leash, its fat, otter-like tail wagging back and forth so fast Meredith couldn't see much more than a blur. The jogger smiled at them shyly as she ran by with the dog. Derek glanced at Meredith, a snicker on his face, as if to say, Okay, I'm possibly glad we put off the naughty forest sex.

“Sorry,” the jogger said as she yanked the lab away with a tug of its leash.

The dog almost seemed to frown, but grew distracted in moments as its owner plowed onward. The jingling sound of the tags waned. Meredith smiled as she watched over her shoulder at the departing pair, thinking of Samantha.

She and Derek had decided that tearing up Richard's cabin floor with claw marks and leaving a bunch of black dog hair behind probably wasn't the best way to repay him for loaning them the cabin. They'd opted to leave the dog behind so they wouldn't have to worry about her, but Samantha would have loved the long trails here and all the open space.

She was a big dog. She deserved space. Meredith's mother's house was mostly house, and not a ton of lawn. The new house would be better for Samantha.

Derek had enough space for almost anything he could want. Meredith supposed his space was hers, now, technically. Theirs. She'd never really thought about it in those terms before. He had his land and his trailer, which, though he'd technically given it to her, it'd never felt like hers. She had her mother's house. But...

This new house would be theirs from the beginning. Their house. They'd co-signed the loan and had the house built from scratch. It was a real fresh start. A square one. For them. Their family. The dog. Baby. Together.

“I hope our house will be done, soon,” she said.

Derek smiled, but his expression seemed apologetic. Not pleased. “You've never worked with contractors before, have you?”

“Well, no,”

“They said it'll be done by Christmas, but I'll believe it when I see it,” he said.

“I thought they said Columbus Day.”

He nodded. “They did. Months ago. They changed their projection.”

“Oh,” she said. “Has Bill talked to you lately?”

“Just to give me the weekly update,” he replied. “They're stalled right now because of some issue with the electrician, which is why I think they're going to bump the finish line back again.”

“Well, I hope it's done by Christmas,” she said. “I don't want to deal with moving and having a baby at the same time.” She pressed her free hand against her stomach. “I have to be due in May, right?”

“If you're right on the conception date,” he said, his voice dripping with nonchalance, except his sparkling gaze gave him away. He'd tried to slip that in there to see if she'd notice.

She had. “I am right on the conception date,” she said.
“Are not.”

Her lips parted. “Am, too!”

“Not,” he insisted.

She pushed against him. He stumbled, a chuff of laughter spilling from his lips as she said, “Too!”

He shook his head. “I got through birth control.”

“You're going to keep holding up a freak accident as evidence that you're flawlessly virile?”

His eyebrows raised. “Oh, we're calling my sperm freaks, now, in addition to squiggly bullies?”

She crinkled her knows. “Well, they are squiggly.”

“But not bullies,” he said, his voice low. “You let them in pretty enthusiastically.”

She snickered as they came to a stop. He panted. She brushed a flying bug away from her face. It buzzed away. “Are we really arguing about this?” she said.

He shrugged. His eyes gleamed. “We seem to be.”

They walked. A hiker dressed in a neon orange windbreaker strode past with a walking stick. The man, a slightly overweight guy in his fifties, gave them a nod as he passed, his silver hair gleaming.

She lowered her eyelids and let the verdant scenery roll by as she walked with him. In his space. Interlocked with him. He matched her hand in his pocket with his own in hers. He breathed hard. Sweat glistened at his brow. His pace had slowed a bit more. She wondered if the exertion he’d put forth to catch her earlier had tired him. Was that the first time he’d sprinted since before he’d been shot? She kissed his arm through his shirt, and she slowed to match his lagging pace. She didn't mention the drop in speed.

“They're bullies,” she said.

“I prefer to think of them as suave.”

“Suave sperm,” she said, her voice flat with amused disbelief.

“Yep,” he said. He kissed her cheek as they walked. “Suave. They probably seduced your egg.”

“So, now, your sperm are like Don Juan?”

“Your egg might have begged them for a good fertilizing with a single, smoldering look,” he said, a sly grin curling his lips. “They probably couldn't resist.”

“So, my egg was like Cindy Crawford in that Pepsi commercial?”

“It was beeyootiful,” he said with a cheerful expression.

She snickered. “Don Juan and Cindy Crawford happened in my uterus?”

He shrugged. “I'm not ruling anything out.”

“Except bullying, and the fact that I'm right,” she countered. “Conception date and sex. I'm totally imbued with mother's intuition, now. I can feel it.”

He snorted. He stumbled, but he caught himself quickly, and he said nothing about tripping. She could see from the slump in his shoulders and his tired expression, he was flagging, but he'd said nothing about it. He hid behind a quirky grin.

“I think the intuition is probably intestinal distress,” he said, breathless.

Her mouth fell open. She glared. “Shut up. It is not!”

His eyebrows waggled. “Feeling sick, now?” he teased.

“Oh, my god, don't jinx me!” she said.

“Wouldn't want that,” he said. His haughty smirk made her snarl playfully. She pushed him, and he laughed again. Laughed at her.

“Well, fix it!” she said. “Fix it before you make me sick!”

He pulled her into his arms, wrapped himself around her. He pressed a quick kiss against her lips. “Better?” he whispered against her skin. His eyelids dipped, and his body seemed to tremble. He was pushing himself too hard, but he seemed happy tired. Not making himself sick tired.

“Um,” she said as she struggled for intelligent thought. “Yes. Yes, better. But I'm still right.”

He grinned and didn't comment. She rubbed her belly, looking down at her stomach with a frown. “Tangents aside,” she said, “what are we going to do if the house isn't ready until April or May?”

He stared at her. “We'll deal with it. I promise.”

“How?” she said. “I'll be carrying around a bowling ball that might pop out at any second by then.”

She stopped short when she realized what she'd said. A bowling ball...

Time for the bowling ball to come out.

The last patient Meredith had had on Friday had said that just before she'd screamed with the incoming crush of new contraction. The woman, Gina, had been wasted by the end. Sweaty. So spent she couldn't lift her head off the pillow and could barely push. Couldn't push. They'd wheeled her away for an emergency c-section after twenty hours of exhausting, agonizing labor that had gone precisely nowhere except infant distress, a wife who couldn't even talk anymore she was so hoarse from screaming, and a husband so sick with nerves he'd thrown up all over the delivery room. They'd all been fine and delighted in the end, but...

Meredith looked down at herself, her breaths quickening as she heard Gina's grating scream in her head.

A person was growing inside her body. Her body felt full enough with only her innards and a few extra cells, now. How would she fit a bowling ball?

And, in a while, she would have to give birth. To the bowling ball. She'd thought about Baby a lot in the past week and a half, but the idea of giving birth – the bloody part with pain and suffering where she would need to push the bowling ball out of a space that typically felt full with just a penis in it — had sort of been a blank. When Gina had given birth to baby Timothy, Meredith had managed to detach herself from logical, connecting thoughts. She'd held the woman's hand, and she hadn't thought anything about Baby. The horrific birth aspect had been an un-relatable blank. A censored bleep. In nine months, you'll bleep. And bleeping was the pretty widely accepted as one of the most painful things a woman could experience.

Ever.

“That's a huge freaking deal by itself. A new house just makes it...” she said, but her voice sounded far away in her head. In nine-ish months, she'd bleep. The dull whine of oncoming panic throbbed behind her eyes like a heartbeat. Thu-thump. Thu-thump. She pinched the bridge of her nose with her thumb and index finger, and she squeezed. “How does it take a year to build a freaking house, anyway? I can build a person faster than that. You'd think a person would be more complicated than a house.”

The forest seemed to spin around her. His larger body eclipsed hers.

She'd lost their first baby. A stupid quirk of fate. A bad egg or a bad sperm had made defective magic together, and the result hadn't been viable. Her body had voided the result before it had ever become something threatening and ominous like a bowling ball. Before it had become a him or a her or anything but a fanciful idea about playing house with a real family in her head. She remembered the sharp, stinging pains that had nearly knocked her over they'd been so intense, and knew that pain would be nothing in comparison.

She rubbed her stomach, agitated.

He pulled her close, and he whispered in her ear, as if he'd sensed her panic. Or she'd screamed. Maybe, she'd screamed. That would be a reasonable thing to do, she decided, when realizing one would have to bleep. Screaming.

How was she going to do this?

“Derek, I'm building a person,” she whispered. She couldn't find air. There wasn't enough air.

He stroked her back. “You are.”

“It just hit me. Like really, really hit me, and I...” Words failed. She lost vocabulary in the din of crushing worry.

“Just take a deep breath,” he murmured.

Except how would that help with the bleeping? She clutched his shirt. “It's going to hurt at the end.”

He nodded. “It will,” he said, which, really, wasn't the most comforting thing he could have chosen to say, if she were allowed an opinion on the matter, and she was. She clenched her teeth. Her eyes watered.

“It'll really, really hurt, Derek.”

“I know, but it will be worth it,” he said. Which sounded exactly like what a man who didn't have to bleep would say. Because he didn't have to bleep. He just had to be the cheerleader and watch her do all the freaking work.

“Easy for you to say,” she snapped, like a fox gnawing at a trapped limb to escape. Derek was her claw trap as he tried to comfort her. Her face heated. Why was she terrified? She shouldn't be terrified. Bleeping was good. In the end, it was good. Right? They'd made life out of love.
Bleeping was—Really. Freaking. Painful. “You don't have to shove a bowling ball out your hoo-hoo.”

She was being mean. Her hormone roller coaster did an upside down loop. She blinked tears at his stricken look. She hadn't meant to yell. They'd made a person, and that was special, and why was she so—

“It's not easy for me to say,” he said, his voice quiet. His dark, understanding gaze made her stomach twist. He shook his head. “I know giving birth isn't the same at all, but...” She watched as he touched his chest. Over where his bullet wound had been. The fabric rasped underneath his palm. “I do understand what it's like to feel pain that you think might break you,” Derek said. “And I don't think lightly about the idea of you hurting like that.”

She swallowed against the inexplicable lump in her throat. “Oh,” she said.

She looked at the ground. Mud covered her black Chucks. She blinked as the ground bleached of color. She saw him sprawled at her feet on a shiny white floor, a pool of red spreading underneath his body in a crimson lake. Please, don't die, she'd begged him. The lapping water and the wind and the bird songs of the forest background splintered under the jarring memory of his unadulterated screams of pain. Screams she'd been helpless to fix or soothe, because they'd needed to move him. Needed to make him move. He would have died if they hadn't.

She didn't know if the prospect that he could commiserate with the physical aspects of giving birth made her feel better, or worse. Worse, she decided. A whole lot worse. She'd seen the cloud of suffering in his eyes. She felt like a coward, but going through that sort of agony for untold hours was not something she looked forward to. At all.

Her jaw clenched. The world swam before her eyes, and she swayed, nauseous. Terrified. A freak out to end all freak outs.

Breathe, that sometimes annoying voice in her head told her. Inhale. Keep going. Stiff upper lip, right? You can do it.

Derek held her close. Held her upright. “I know it's scary. I do,” he said in a soft, murmuring voice that made it hard to think about anything, let alone pain or something bad. “We both want this, though. And it's not a platitude when I say it will be worth it. I mean it, Meredith. It will be worth it.”

She pressed her nose against his chest. He smelled musky. Hers. She clutched him. Her eyes watered. The forest blurred as she blinked. A pair of tears slipped down her face and stained his shirt. She brushed her cheeks as she sniffed. First panic, then fury, and now blubbering. Great. This was just freaking—

He kissed her. “You'll do great. I can't say it won't hurt, but you'll do great. And I'll be there the whole time. I promise.”

“I know, but...” Her breaths hitched. She squeezed her eyes shut so hard she saw spots. “I'm still scared,” she said in a small, cracking voice.

The world shifted as he whispered in her ear, soft and shushing like a rush of water. He pulled her down to the ground with him. The damp earth soiled the back of her jeans. She felt wet cold creeping in through the seat of her pants, but he was so warm, she couldn't care. He shook, and the heat of exertion radiated from his skin. She curled against him and pressed her ear to his chest. His pulse raced as he wrapped his arms around her.

She clutched her belly, and she sighed. Exhaustion swept over her like a crushing wave. Emotional whiplash apparently caused headaches. And, now, she really did feel sort of nauseated. Her fluffernutter lunch churned in her stomach. Or, maybe that was nerves. Big, huge nerves about bowling balls and—

She leaned over his elbow, out of the cocoon he provided her, and threw up into the ferns. Her throat and nose burned, and she couldn't breathe because of the stench. She scrambled away, out of Derek's arms, away from the horrible smell. She kept heaving as she retreated past a thick, overturned log covered in a carpet of moss by the side of the trail. The log was a bit too small to use as a chair. She stumbled to the next usable tree where the air didn't reek of vomit, and she collapsed next to it as she swallowed back the remnants of bile in her throat. Her eyes watered.

She watched Derek get up and shuffle toward her. He moved torpidly. She'd been so happy not to see shuffling before. She saw it, now. His entire demeanor seemed weighted down by an invisible anchor dragging behind him in the wet earth. He collapsed next to her, breathing hard, sweating.

“Sorry,” she croaked.

“Don't worry about it,” he said, his voice soft as he caught his breath. “It's okay.”

He pulled her against him, his back to the thick trunk of the towering hemlock tree she'd chosen, and she curled up. “Shh,” he breathed more than said against her ear. Her tense muscles loosened at the sound of his soothing voice. She had no idea how far they'd walked. She'd lost track of the time, but the sun hung low in the sky. The water in the far distance glittered. He rested, shushing her, his eyes half open and glassy.

He was tired. She was tired.

They made a banged up pair, marred with bad battle scars and damaged psyches.

But she was in his arms, and she found it hard to feel frightened of anything, then. Which, really? Ludicrous. If a hungry pack of bears popped out of the woods to eat them, she doubted he could save her. If another Gary Clark with a gun found them here, there wouldn't be much of a contest. If she started miscarrying, again, there wasn't much Derek could do for that, either. Fate held her steering wheel and made her course changes more than anything else. But...

He made her safe.

Despite all the reason and twisted logic her tired brain could throw at her.

She felt safe.

She let her eyelids creep shut as he whispered nonsensical things in her ear, meant only to soothe and not to tell her anything coherent. She swallowed as her burning eyes dried. Her septum bubbled as she inhaled noisily.

“It'll be okay,” he assured her, a bone deep weariness in his tone.

She sniffed. “You're going to let me squeeze your hand until it's broken, and call you all sorts of obscene names that I don't really mean?”

He grinned as he kissed her. His eyes were wet and red, too. “Absolutely,” he said, soft and low against her ear. “You have a carte blanche to call me whatever you want the day Baby is born.”
“And break your hand?”

“You can break both, as long as you explain it to my insurance company.”

She wiped her face and gave him a weak smile. “Will you give birth for me?”

He laughed. It was a soft, soothing sound. “I wish it worked that way,” he said.

She pressed her ear against his chest and listened. They didn't speak. The silver-haired hiker who'd passed them earlier returned, headed in the opposite direction. He stopped to ask them if they were all right. They assured him they were, that they were just resting, which was true. The hiker moved on, and the forest opened up again with sound and sights and smells. It was nice just to watch, for a while. Nice to watch and rest and not think about anything.

She could totally get why Derek liked it here.

She got the getting perspective thing.

“Are you really nervous?” Meredith said eventually.

He swallowed. “Yes.”

“We'll be okay, right?”

“We will.”

“What if I'm a bad mother?” she said.

Silence stretched. He looked down at her. He stroked her back. “You won't be.”

“How do you know?” she said. “I'm not working off the best blueprint.”

He shrugged. “Because I know you.”

“But—”

“Meredith,” he said, his tone admonishing. He smiled. The tree towering over them swayed in the balmy breeze. “Your mother's house is full of people right now.”

“So?”

“You say you're not good at families,” he said, “but I've never met a woman more tenacious about supporting her family than you.”

“Oh,” she said.

He held her tightly, and she liked it. Liked sitting with him. Doing nothing. Letting the world go by. Passive and at peace. She watched the distant water sparkle and shift, and she listened to the rustling leaves all around. She hadn't been able to tell him he was her best friend. That would have been a lie, semantically speaking.

_She's your person. I'm your arm. Got it_, he'd said with a stoned, goofy laugh.

She smiled as she rested against him, feeling warm and loved. He got it, at least, even if she didn't know how to say it with words that made any sense. She kissed his sternum through his soft shirt, but when she peered up at him, she saw turmoil coiling in his gaze.
“What is it?” she said.

He flinched as if torn from deep musing. “Hmm?”

She gave him a soft jab with her elbow. “Derek, c'mon, I showed you mine.”

His lip twitched. “Showed me your what?”

“Incredibly embarrassing, vomit-inducing fear.”

“Oh,” he said.

“Well?” she prodded. She stroked his arm.

He frowned and shook his head, his gaze distant. “What if I'm a bad father?”

“You won't be.”

“I am, mentally speaking, scrambled eggs right now,” he said.

“You're not, Derek, you're just...” She sighed. “You'll get better.”

“In eight months or less,” he said, not a question. His tone dripped with disbelief. “You're sure of that.”

“I'm sure.”

He raised his eyebrows. “Intuition?”

“No.”

“Intestinal distress?”

She shook her head as she chuckled. “No. Absolute fact.”

He kissed her. His stubble tickled. “If I can't be a bad father, you can't be a bad mother. It isn't allowed. Deal?”

She smiled at him. “Okay.”

He smiled back, and then with a grunt, he stood. He held out his hand to help her up. Their palms touched. Their fingers interlocked. His expression remained even as he supported her. He didn't flinch with discomfort, even when his elbow snapped straight, and she fought gravity in earnest, though she tried not to pull too hard, just in case. Damp earth kicked under her feet. She brushed off her dirty jeans once she gained her balance.

The sun hung very low over the horizon. The bright, sparkly saturation of the light hitting the water had turned darker. More orange. The stringy wisps of cirrus clouds that painted the sky had turned a subtle pinkish color.

They turned back in the direction they'd come. She wished she had a clue how far they'd come, and how far they still had to go to get back. Derek moved sluggishly, but not laboriously. He didn't seem to be in pain or suffering. Just... worn out. Worn out, but relaxed, happy, and not hurting. He wasn't as quick-tempered or as easily startled out here, either. Overall... better. So much better, she found herself regretting that they would have to go back to the roommates situation. To civilization. He clearly thrived without either, but...
“Derek?”

He looked at her with a hooded expression. “Hmm?”

“If everything gets messed up, and the baby comes before the house is finished, I can't kick Alex and Lexie out. I just can't. I know it'll be crowded, but... they're my family, and I can't do it. They don't have anywhere else to go.”

“That's okay,” he said.

She frowned. “But you hate them there.”

“Well, they're not following us when we move, are they?”

“No,” she said. “I'm going to rent my mother's house to them. My only goal is to break even on the monthly mortgage payment. If they move out, I'll sell it, but, until then, it's theirs.”

“So, we have a known time limit.”

She nodded. “We do.”

“And there will be no more strays after that, right?”

“What?”

“I sort of told Cristina she could have a room,” Meredith said. “At the new house.”

His stony expression was unreadable. “Oh,” he said.

She swallowed. “I didn't mention that, did I?”

“You didn't.”

“I'm sorry,” she said. “I'm really sorry, Derek.”

“Are you sorry that you offered her a room, or are you sorry that you didn't tell me?”

“Both,” Meredith insisted.

He stopped in the middle of the trail and closed his eyes with a sigh. “Would this be like a guest room?”

“Um. I guess,” Meredith said. She looked at the ground. She kicked a rock. It skittered into the forest and bounced off a rotting tree trunk. “A guest room with her name on it. So, I guess more of a Cristina room. That she wouldn't always occupy. Because she does her own thing with Dr. Hunt, and...”

Derek looked at her, eyes still unreadable and flat, which had to mean angry. Right? He hated Cristina. This would be the last straw, and he'd snap. Meredith knew it. She—

“What was the context of you offering?” he said, his voice soft.

“I told her that if she and Owen don't work out, and her life implodes, she could live with... us. In her room.”

He didn't speak. His eyes narrowed. A sliver of some emotion Meredith couldn't identify crossed his face.

“I can tell her it won't work anymore,” Meredith said. “I can—”

He shook his head. “It's okay,” he said.

“I can tell her that... what? What's okay?”

He shrugged. “She's your family,” he said. He started walking again. Meredith followed. “You should spend time with her. I've... She's been knocking. Since I got shot, she's been knocking, and not barging in. I appreciate it.”

“I didn't tell her anything,” Meredith said.

He frowned. “I didn't say you had.”

“I wanted her to give you some space. I just told her to give you space. I didn't say why.”

He nodded. “Thank you. I needed...”

“I know,” Meredith said. “I know you needed it. That's why I told her to give it.”

“You shouldn't be sorry that you offered her a room.”

“But—”

“I'm not entirely happy you didn't discuss it with me first, but... she knocks,” he said. “And she only gets in my face when she thinks I'm killing myself.”

“She thinks if you die, I'd be upset.”

He laughed, but the utterance was a self-deprecating, soft sound. “That's kind of her.”

Meredith shrugged. “She's Cristina.”

“She is,” he said. “And she can have a room.”

“Really?”

“You've done a lot for me,” he said.

Meredith frowned. “That's not an answer.”

“It is,” he said. He rubbed her shoulder. He seemed... almost exasperated. “Meredith, you've done a lot for me. I don't like the idea of Cristina having a room at our new house, because I don't really like her, but she's essentially your sister. If one of my sisters needed a place to stay, I'd want to offer, and I know you'd let me, because you're you. Cristina's your family, so she's my family, and I'll live with it, if it happens, for you. Just like I live with the strays.”

“But—”

He kissed her. “It's a compromise,” he said as he pulled away. “Remember? We do those now that we're married.”
Meredith raised her eyebrows. “Oh, you're an expert on compromise, are you?”

He gave her a charming smile. “No, but I fake it well sometimes, don't I?”

She snickered. “You do. Sometimes.”

His eyes shone, and his voice was deep and apologetic when he continued, “I admit, in the past, I've utterly failed at compromise.”

She shook her head. “No more baggage crap, remember?” she said. “Clean slate. We decided.”

“I remember.”

“All the stuff I've done for you, I'd do it again,” she told him.

They stopped. His gaze searched her face. Thousands of thoughts danced on his face, encased in a blue, unblinking stare. She plucked them from the way his expression shifted. Read them like a primer book. He wanted to say thank you. That he loved her. That he'd take another bullet without hesitation as long as it was for her. He settled on the practical.

“And I...” He kissed her. “Can live...” He kissed her again, drank her down like a fine, exotic wine. “With Cristina.”

Meredith took his hand in hers. “I guess we have that settled then.”

He squeezed her palm. “I guess we do,” he said with a delighted grin, and they retreated down the path as the sun set over the mountains to the west.
“You disgust me,” Gary Clark said, a snarl in Derek's ear.

Derek's lip quivered as he stared into his cereal bowl. He picked at it with his spoon. Particles of shredded wheat tore away until he had nothing but swirling mush. His stomach twisted. He couldn't even consider eating.

“Derek?” Meredith said from somewhere far away.

He tore his gaze away from his uneaten breakfast to look at her. “Hmm?”

She sat across the small cafeteria table from him in her light blue scrubs, staring at him with worry in her gaze. She'd pulled her hair back, and she looked tired. The skin around her eyes pinched with need for sleep, and she seemed more pallid than normal. She rode the tail end of a thirty-six hour shift. She would be leaving at lunch to go home and recover and relax. He'd seen her briefly yesterday on his first day back to work since he'd benched himself, but he'd gone home after a short shift to an empty house, and he'd slept alone in their bed last night. He'd driven to the hospital a few hours early to eat with her, to say hello, and to get away from—

“Want to tell me what’s wrong?” she prodded.

“Oh, yes,” said Mr. Clark. “Tell her what happened this morning. I want to see her face when you explain. I'm sure she'll take it swimmingly.”

Derek shifted his gaze back to his cereal as his stomach churned. The thought of explaining made the sick feeling worse. He couldn't speak, and he certainly couldn't look at her.

“Hey...” Meredith said, her voice soft and low. Her chair squeaked as she stood. She moved to his side of the small table and sat next to him. When she touched him, tried to wrap around him, he stiffened, and she pulled away. Her concerned look deepened, which only made the lump in his throat expand to the size of a melon. He tried to swallow and couldn't. Bile collected in the back of his throat. Nauseating heat throbbed underneath his skin. “Seriously,” she said, “what's wrong?”

He imagined everybody in the cafeteria staring. Waiting for him to slip again. To go insane.

“Nothing,” he said.

“Liar,” Gary Clark said. “Everything is wrong with you.”

“Then why do you look like someone just kicked your favorite puppy?” Meredith said.

Derek's breaths tightened in his chest. He'd only been back to work for two days. The first day, he'd worked a six hour shift. Today and the rest of the week, his superiors expected him to be there for eight hours a day, but eight hours for a surgeon was like being stuck in the kiddie pool with little arm floaties attached.

His colleagues gave him extra consideration. Richard. Miranda. The neurosurgery department, Dr. Weller and Dr. Nelson included. Whether they knew Derek had noticed their intense scrutiny, he couldn't be sure, but they clearly didn't care either way, because they kept doing it. Kept supervising him. Unlike his last attempt at work, he wasn't left alone in his office to gouge his eyes out over budgetary work. They gave him menial, public tasks to do, and the kid glove treatment wore on his already thinning nerves.
Except they were justified, weren't they?

“Yes,” said Mr. Clark. And then he laughed.

Derek's innards squeezed. He stared at the table. He'd been back at work for six fucking hours, all told. He hadn't even started his second shift. People were staring. They had to be staring, knowing about this morning, and he couldn't let this—

“Derek?”

The table swam as something flesh-colored waved in front of his face. He blinked as Meredith pulled her hand away.

“I had to call your name four times just now to get your attention,” she said. She gestured at his cereal bowl. “You're not eating. You haven't spoken more than six syllables since you got here.”

“It's... nothing.”

Her agitated sigh buffeted his eardrums. “So, you're back to lying to me again?” she said.

“See?” Gary Clark said. “She thinks you're a liar just like I do. They all do.”

“Nothing is wrong with me,” Derek insisted.

Meredith rolled her eyes. “Right.”

“This is like television,” Mr. Clark said, his tone gleeful. “Poor you, drowning in denial.”

“Stop,” Derek whispered.

“No, you stop, Derek,” Meredith said. “Stop lying.”

“Nothing is wrong with me,” he said. He rocked in his seat. “Nothing.”

“I thought we were done with this.”

He bristled. “I'm sorry I'm not getting better fast enough for you,” he snapped as his last nerve frayed beyond repair.

Meredith's eyes narrowed. “Oh, come on,” she said. “You know that's not what I meant.”

“She won't love you when she finds out,” Mr. Clark taunted. “She'll leave you.”

Derek's stomach felt full of twisting snakes.

“Derek, you can't keep doing this,” Meredith said, softer, more pleading. “I thought you weren't shutting me out anymore.”

“You're sick,” Gary Clark said.

Derek slammed his hand on the table. The silverware shook. “STOP,” he roared, and everything stopped. The murmur of conversations. The clink of dishes. Movement. Dozens of eyes, a veritable sea of staring, shifted to him to watch the ticking time bomb explode for their gleeful, gossip-mongering entertainment.

Derek's face heated. The attention was awful. But worse was the stricken, watery look on Meredith's face. The way his defective handling of this situation had taken the exhaustion spread across her features and stretched it as though it were on a rack. He'd done it. It was his fault.

His coworkers watched him like they would watch a movie. All they needed were buckets of popcorn dripping with butter. And Meredith... She looked as nauseated as he felt. He tried to open his mouth. To say something. Anything. To explain.

Shame wrapped its hands around his throat. His vocal cords wouldn't work.

His eyes slipped open, and he stared at the ceiling overhead in silence, stuck in the muzzy halfway world. That place between dreaming and fully awake, when one could still remember the contents of a dream with clarity. He swallowed and blinked, resigned to it, waiting for the vivid phantasms of blood and gleeful laughter to fade back into his subconscious, where they would simmer until the next time he slept. When he rolled to face the red glow of the alarm clock, the familiar slide of sensation across his lower body made his muscles tighten.

His gut churned, his fists clenched, and then he bolted out of the cafeteria. Away from her and them and Mr. Clark and the memory. All of it.

He managed to slip into a dimly lit side hallway before all the twisting snakes writhed their way out of his stomach. No foot traffic or stares watched him as he emptied himself into a trashcan, heaving, sick. He had nothing inside but acid and bile. His throat and nose burned, and his eyes watered. When he eased away from the can, the room swam. He blinked, but the room wouldn't stop moving. He wiped his face with his shaky hands. His stomach settled. Sort of.

He moved to the water fountain and rinsed out his mouth. The dim slant of dawn sunshine falling against the window made him feel pasty. Hot. He glanced at the vague pink and yellow pastels that would be azure in an hour or two. Wispy clouds drifted over the sprawl of green treetops. Cars and people wandered below in the hospital parking lot. The water fountain hummed. Footsteps and voices in the distant hallways thrummed at the back of his awareness.

He stared.

Work held no joy for him anymore. None. He didn't look forward to it. He dreaded it. Dreaded the people and the churning stress of dealing with them all. They'd all moved on from the shooting, leaving him behind to feel like a solitary emotional dunce amongst geniuses.

He closed his eyes and tried to picture himself somewhere else.

I'm going to snap your fucking neck.

The image scalded the space behind his eyelids. Derek flinched away from the water fountain. He couldn't find peace. Not without abusing chemistry to switch off his thoughts by force, and that wasn't an acceptable thing to wish for anymore. Unacceptable. That didn't mean he never wished, though. The thought loitered like an unwanted visitor on the stoop for a moment before he managed to slam shut the door.

He thought of Meredith, his tired, pale, pregnant wife, whom he'd left, and took a deep, slow breath. God, what she must think of him. He jammed his hands into his lab coat pockets and sighed.

He walked back to the cafeteria, shoulders curled, hunched over like some sort of defensive football player. The warm smell of food wafted in the air as he moved closer. The din quieted somewhat as he stood in the wide doorway. He felt surreptitious eyes on him, but nobody stopped.
Nobody made their observations obvious.

He shuffled back to the small table where Meredith sat. She'd finished her sausage links and her hash browns and her scrambled eggs, and she sipped on a carton of orange juice. His cereal bowl was gone. Everything on his side of the table was gone. She didn't look at him when he sat in the chair he'd vacated minutes earlier. Didn't speak.

The silence between them stretched, and the din surrounding them crashed against his ears. He put his face against his hands and rubbed his face. He felt raw. Cut open. Ill. And he had no idea what to say or how to say it. All of it would be wrong, anyway. He must have made a sound, though, some pathetic, mumbling pieces of syllabic flotsam, because she looked at him.

When her eyes met his, he didn't see love or understanding. He only saw anger. At him. Hurt. All justified.

“Priceless,” Mr. Clark said. “And you haven't even told her yet.”

She put her orange juice carton on her tray. “If you tell me you're sorry, I'm leaving,” she said.

His heart thudded in his ears. He gripped the edge of the table until his fingers hurt. A sinking feeling overwhelmed him. This was it. The final straw for her. He'd yelled at her for being concerned, and now she was done with him. “No,” he said, a pathetic, soft, begging whisper. He couldn't offer up any sort of defense for himself. He'd been an asshole. Again. End of story. And he could barely find his voice. Humiliating words he couldn't help dribbled from his lips. “Please, don't leave me.”

She stared at him for a long moment, her face pinched with irritated confusion. And then she rolled her eyes. “Leaving the room, Derek.” She glared at him and sighed a huffy sigh. “I've been here. We've yelled and screamed plenty of times. We're having a baby. When are you going to stop assuming I'll leave? If anyone should be assuming someone is leaving, it's me about you, given your checkered history with me on that front, don't you think?” The words had barely left her mouth when her eyes widened. “I'm sorry,” she added quickly. “I shouldn't have said that.”

“Why should she be sorry about that? It's true,” Mr. Clark said. “You're sick and a coward and a liar, and all you do is run away.”

Derek swallowed. “No. You're right,” he said. He couldn't look at her. His gaze found his lap and stayed there. He wore his navy scrubs and his black cross trainers. They felt wrong. A shameful masquerade. He wasn't much of a surgeon anymore. Or a husband. Or anything.

“I'm sorry,” she said. “I said no more baggage, and I meant it. It's just...” She sighed. The anger thick in the air between them crumpled. Her shoulders bowed, and then she pushed her tray to the side. Her fork and knife clinked as she moved the tray. She leaned across the sticky table. Toward him. She grabbed his hands and kissed his knuckles while he stared, useless. “Why is it so hard for you to talk to me?” she said. “I don't expect you to be better already. I really don't. But I do expect the truth. After all the lying I've put up with, you owe that to me, at least. And, after Lake Cushman, I thought...” She sighed, her breath tinged with a frustrated growl. “I don't know what I think anymore.”

He opened his mouth to speak. Words wouldn't form, and the hurt look in her eyes stabbed him like a butcher knife. I'm going to snap your fucking neck, he'd said to Gary Clark. A phantom gunshot cracked in Derek's ears and the world flashed a nauseating, gory red.

When he rolled to face the red glow of the alarm clock, the familiar slide of sensation across his lower body made his muscles tighten. Recognition arrived first in his sleep-daze. He grunted, deep and low, and he pressed his body against the bed in a mock thrust because it felt good. Horror supplanted recognition moments later.

“Tell her,” said Mr. Clark. “Tell her what happened this morning.”

“I don't know how to talk about this,” Derek said.

She squeezed his hands. “Try. Please.”

“Oh, yes,” said Mr. Clark. “Try. I want to see you flail around.”

Derek's lip twitched. “I'm... wrong.”

She glared at him. “That's almost as bad as telling me you're sorry again. Can you, please, just stop?”

“No, I... I...” He shook his head. “You asked me what's wrong. It's me,” he said, his voice soft. “I think I'm wrong.”

Her glare lost its sharp edges. “What are you talking about?”

“I lost a lot of blood,” he said. “I needed transfusions.”

She nodded. A glassy film spread across her eyes. “All eight units that we had, yes.”

“Maybe, something is just... broken.” He wiped his eyes. They hurt. His head hurt. “I hit the late stages of hypovolemic shock. I could have brain damage, or... something just...”

“What do you mean, brain damage?” she said. She leaned forward, gaze piercing, worried. More worried than she'd been before. More worried and a lot less accusing. His fault. “What makes you think you have brain damage? What's wrong?”

He shrugged. “I'm wrong,” he said, at a crippling loss for words.

“Derek, you said that already, and you're not making any freaking sense. Which is actually kind of scaring me, now. What feels wrong?”

The din of the surrounding room squeezed around him. He squirmed in his seat. His throat closed up, and he couldn't speak anymore. He couldn't do this. He couldn't tell her, and Gary Clark laughed at him.

“Idiot,” Mr. Clark said.

Meredith glanced around the cafeteria at their murmuring audience. “Let's go somewhere private,” she decided. Her voice sounded far away, behind a layer of water, as though he were drowning and she called to him from the surface. He blinked and looked at her. “Okay? Derek?” When he didn't respond, she stood up and came around to his side of the table. She took a piece of his lab coat's sleeve in her tiny fist and pulled. “Derek?”

He stood at her behest and followed her out of the cafeteria and down the hall like a zombie. She'd left her food tray behind, forgotten. He had no idea where she wanted to go. He let himself be pulled along the white hallway, wishing for numbness in the place of abraded rawness and not finding it. She found them an empty on-call room and turned off the lights. The uncomfortable buzz of the overhead fluorescent lights winked into silence. Dim sunlight fell through the slats in the dingy blinds, giving the room a comforting, warm sort of darkness instead of cold pitch-black. She dragged him to the narrow cot along the wall.

He sat. The mattress squeaked and sank with his weight. She sat next to him. The scent of her conditioner, long since faded from the vividness of a recent shower, wafted against his nose, comforting. She didn't speak as she leaned close to him. He tensed as her warm palm met the slope of his spine. He flexed his fingers as the memory of sweaty skin and a throbbing, failing heart came alive underneath his palms. How does it feel, now? His hands shook as he cradled them against his body.

“She didn't speak as she leaned close to him. He tensed as her warm palm met the slope of his spine. He flexed his fingers as the memory of sweaty skin and a throbbing, failing heart came alive underneath his palms. How does it feel, now? His hands shook as he cradled them against his body.

“Please, don't touch me,” he said as his stomach roiled.

She backed off and hovered outside of his personal bubble. Close, but not painfully so. She held up her hands, palms out in surrender for him to see. “Okay, I'm not touching. I'm not,” she said. “But what do you mean, you're wrong? What's making you feel wrong? Tell me your symptoms.”

“I can't...” He swallowed. “I don't know how to talk about this.”

“Is it a physical problem?” she prodded. “Stress? Something else?”

Horror supplanted recognition moments later. He tossed the sheets away from his body and sat up. His cotton pajama pants bulged at his groin. As he moved, the sensitive head of his penis, normally sheathed, rubbed against the soft cotton. He swallowed with disgust at the pleasant sensation, at the tempting, reflexive pull, the way it made his insides twitch with sexual readiness. Bile rose in his throat as his still-lurid dream spun dizzying, sickening circles inside his head. He kicked his feet over the side of the bed and stumbled to the master bathroom in the darkness.

His breaths tightened, and he leaned over his knees to stare at the tiled floor. “I'm going to throw up.”

She darted from the bed to the wastepaper basket by the door. She dragged it back to him. He gripped the sides of the basket, shaking. Everything swam before his eyes, and he moaned, but nothing came up. After seconds or eons, he put the wastepaper basket by his feet and stared at it.

Meredith watched, anxiety in her posture, in her stare. “Derek what is this?” she said, her voice tight with worry. “Tell me why I shouldn't be dragging you to neurology or the ER right now.”

“If I healed wrong, maybe, this isn't my fault,” he said. Begged.

Needed.

She stared at him for a long, silent moment, her arms folded over her chest. Her eyes narrowed. She planted her back against the far wall with a thud and slid the floor. She wrapped her arms around her knees. The white tips of her black Chucks peeked out from the slight pile her body made on the floor. She looked over her kneecaps, across the narrow room, at him.

“What don't you want to be your fault?” she said.

He kicked his feet over the side of the bed and stumbled to the master bathroom in the darkness. He'd been asleep for hours. He needed to pee, except his penis pressed against his belly, ready for sex. He leaned over the toilet, teeth clenched as he touched himself to point his salacious salute downward, and he emptied himself. The physical press of his hand against his groin to aim made him feel.

He couldn't figure out how to answer her. Couldn't contemplate as his thoughts slowed, and his brain replayed that moment over and over like a skipping record. He didn't want to be here. Or anywhere. He didn't want to die, but today, he wished he didn't have to deal with living. He swallowed as a new wave of nausea overtook him.

“You've been better the last few weeks,” Meredith said. “Since our vacation, you've been eating. Smiling more. You've only had the one panic attack. And you said you wanted to come back to work. You wanted it, Derek.”

“I know.”

“What's changed?” she demanded. “Are you getting too stressed? Do you need more time off?”

The physical press of his hand against his groin to aim made him feel. Feel... good. Good despite the pinwheel of gory images fluttering in his head. The dream wouldn't go away.

Blood rushed in his ears, and everything felt far away. “Work is... fine,” Derek said weakly.

“Liar,” Mr. Clark said, a snarl in the din.

“Should I get Dr. Wyatt?”

“No.”

She pushed off the wall and slid closer to him. She pushed the wastepaper basket away. “Come on, Derek,” she said. “Throw me a bone, here. I'm not Sherlock Holmes.”

“A bone,” Gary Clark said with a snort. “Oh, that's funny. She's getting warm to your perversions.”

The dream wouldn't go away. He thought of Gary Clark, sweaty and slick underneath his palms as Derek strangled him. Heard Gary Clark begging him not to shoot with the gun Derek had somehow stolen. Heard the crack of the gunshot, followed by Derek's own laughter as he watched Glary Clark slide from lucidity to panic to the empty, unblinking glaze of death. A lake of blood had slicked the floor underneath Derek's shoes, but he hadn't cared. He'd reveled.

She stared at him, her gray eyes a sharp contrast to the spreading puddle of wet, sticky red caught in his mind's eye. “Are you afraid of what I'll think?” Meredith said.

He swallowed. “I know you'll tell me I shouldn't be.”

“And you're right,” she said. She took a breath as if to steel herself. “Would it be easier for you to talk to Mark about this?”

“Yes,” said Mr. Clark. “Tell the juvenile manwhore about your deviancy.”

“No,” Derek said.

“Then what, Derek? Whatever you think is broken, we'll fix, but you have to start talking to me.”

He'd reveled. Awake, now, he loathed, and the conflict between the turmoil in his head and the physical clarity of the pleasing feelings in his lower body made him ill. As soon as he'd finished urinating, he dropped to his knees and threw up.

“Are you embarrassed about it?” she prodded.

He shook his head. “More like... appalled.”
“That's a mild term for it,” Mr. Clark said. “Appalling.”

“Have you broken the law?” Meredith said.

Derek looked at his knees. “No.”

“Taken more pills...?”

“No.”

“Lied to me?”

“No,” he said.

Dark shadows passed through the sliver of light under the threshold of the door, and the door rattled as passing bodies displaced the air. He tensed, staring at the doorknob. Murmuring voices seemed to fill the room as whoever stood outside conversed. Meredith followed his gaze to the door and then she looked back at him, her gaze pleading, as if to say, Please, please ignore them, and he was caught. Caught like a stretching rubber band between listening to them and the illusory destruction of his privacy, and watching her begging expression. He wasn't being fair to her. They couldn't hear.

And he was a fucking coward.

“I got hard,” he blurted. Somebody outside the door laughed, and he almost lost his voice again. “This morning. When I woke up, I was...”

She frowned. “You mean you had an erection?”

Mr. Clark snarled in Derek's head. “You had your hands around my throat, and you liked it, you sick fuck.”

“But... that's good. Right?” Meredith said. “You were worried about the Paxil...”

Derek squeezed his eyes shut. He couldn't look at her, couldn't look at anything. His stomach churned. “I had the dream, Meredith,” he admitted to his lap.

“The one where you die?” she said.

“The one where I kill him instead.”

“Oh.”

Derek had tried to strangle Mr. Clark, and when that hadn't worked, the gun had appeared in his hands as if by magic. He remembered the cool feel of the metal stock against his palm. The give of the trigger as he'd consigned his tormenter to death. Shut up, Derek had said to silence Mr. Clark's pathetic begging. No talking. You're not the man, here.

A twisted role-reversal.

When Mr. Clark had wet his pants in abject terror, Derek had laughed, gleeful, omnipotent, remorseless. He'd found peace when he'd pulled the trigger. Bliss when he'd watched the spreading puddle of gore that spoke of murder. And then he'd woken up rock solid and ready for sex.
“I got off on killing another human being,” Derek said. “I got off on it, Meredith.”

“Sick bastard,” Mr. Clark said.

“Derek, that's...” Meredith began, only to stop. Silence stretched.

He'd clearly horrified her. Shame thickened inside him like a cancer, spreading. He couldn't do this. Any of this. He'd been a fool to think he could jump into the water and somehow stay afloat long enough to overcome the drowning grip of all his lingering trauma.

The mattress sank as she slid into the tiny bed with him. The warmth of her body pressed against him, and her soft breathing brushed his neck, as if she were less than the width of a paper from contact with his skin, but determined to respect his wish not to be touched. Her voice was soft against his ear when she said, “You can't control what your body does while you're sleeping. An erection doesn't mean you were sexually aroused. You know that just as well as I do.”

“But it's wrong...” he said.

“Well, did you jerk off to the image of murdering him or something after you woke up?”

“No.”

“Then what's so wrong?” she said.

“You shot me, and you laughed like it was Christmas morning,” Gary Clark said.

“I liked the killing in my dream,” Derek said. “I like my dream. I like it. It's not a nightmare.”

“Derek, it's totally normal for people who've been through what you've been through to fantasize about stuff like that,” she said. “Even the assault victimization for dummies pamphlet said that. We've been over this.”

Derek glowered. “Yeah, well, I never woke up with a boner from it before.”

“The male body does plumbing maintenance during REM cycles,” she said. “Your brain said 'give my owner an erection for a normal maintenance cycle', and you got one. That doesn't mean you wanted it. You were asleep. It's simple science.”

“It doesn't feel like simple science to me,” he said. The wall blurred as he blinked a pair of burning tears. “It feels sick.”

“Pathetic, disgusting coward,” Mr. Clark said.

“Stop it,” Meredith said, soft against his neck. “Stop trying to put a square peg in a round hole or whatever.”

Disturbed tears made sluggish tracks down Derek's face. He had no idea what was up or down anymore. He couldn't reconcile what his body had done with what he'd felt.

He could forget. He could forget all this. What he'd dreamed. What he'd woken up to. He worked in a hospital. It would be so fucking easy to hoodwink one of the pharmacists who knew him.

He winced, his breaths tightened, and he clenched his fists so hard his knuckles hurt. The unexpected wave of wanting made him... hurt, knocked him off his train of thought, disoriented him. Like he'd been mugged. The loiterer had broken in and beaten him up and left him wheezing on the floor.
Why couldn't he feel complete with what he already had? He'd nearly died, yes, but nearly dying meant he'd lived. His wife was pregnant. He had a wife. Meredith. His Meredith. The woman he'd met in his quest to reinvent himself. The woman he'd called his savior. A breath of fresh air.

Instead, he fantasized about killing a dead man. He'd made it into a sexual thrill. Or he hadn't. Maybe.

Tears oozed.

This could all go away.

“It'll pass,” Meredith said from somewhere beside him, as if his turmoil were an open book. “You can do it. Wait for it to pass.”

He shook his head, trying to think straight. “I'm...” he said. He blinked, trying to regain his bearings in reality. “This isn't...” He took a deep, cleansing breath. “Stop.”

“Take your time,” she said.

Frustration coiled as he rubbed his eyes. “I don't want to want this.” Not the killing. Not the drugs. “Not any of this!”

“I know.”

Derek turned toward her, his body sliding awkwardly when his scrubs and coat stuck to the sheets. His knee brushed her thigh. He dared to looked at her. Finally. Her sad, gray eyes met his. She didn't speak. Not for a long time. But her gaze told him things, anyway. I'm sorry you're hurting. I want to make it better. How do I make it better? Please, please, don't slip...

And not a single word of reproach or impatience or disgust loitered there. There was none of the hate or hurt from before.

Only, I love you.

The mattress shifted as she reached with her hand. She hovered with her hand in the inches of space over his face for a long moment, hesitant. When he didn't flinch, didn't say no, she pressed her palm flat against his temple and his cheek, and then she drew her fingers back into his hair. The soft pull on his scalp and the look in her eyes made the desperation seem less... desperate. Her warmth seeped into his skin, and the wave of mind-boggling need receded somewhat.

He couldn't help but relax a little. His pained, tight muscles loosened, and his breaths evened. His eyelids dipped as his body fell out of stress long enough for him to think straight and realize he'd told her. He'd told her everything, and she was there. Touching him. Not disgusted and not leaving despite having every right.

“Do you remember how you felt this weekend when we were making love?” she said. “You begged me to touch you.”

“I remember.”

“That was aroused,” she said. “Not whatever the hell you woke up with this morning.”

“I threw up.”

Her lip twitched. An almost smile. “Yeah,” she said. “That doesn't exactly jibe with getting off on something unless you have a weird fetish you haven't mentioned.”

“I think you know all my proclivities,” he said as her hand wandered down his neck.

She rested her grip on his shoulder, not really gripping, just... there. Her gazed softened. “I had a feeling we'd probably covered that area of getting-to-know-you pretty well by now.”

“Hmm.”

“You're not a sadist,” she said. “So, stop thinking it.”

And you're very, very bossy, he'd told her once, years ago. It keeps me in line.

He took a shaky breath. “I wish all of this would just stop,” he said.

She played with a loose lock of hair over his forehead. “I know.”

“I had two good weeks,” he said.

“And that was a great step in the right direction,” she replied, soothing. “Soon, it'll be three weeks at a time. Maybe, a few months down the line, you'll notice you went for a month without a bad day. It'll just keep getting better.”

His eyes burned, and every time he blinked, the world sharpened and then blurred. Hopelessness danced on the sharp edges of his mind. Barbed breaths jabbed him under the ribs. “I can't do this, Mere,” he said. “I can't do the bad days.”

“Yes, you can,” she said.

“It hurts to want something this much.”

“I know,” she said. “But what if tomorrow is supposed to be a good day? Don't ruin it by slipping up today.”

“Meredith, I can't.”

“You can,” she said. “You so can. I know it sucks, but you can.”

His lower lip wouldn't stop quivering. She watched him through her eyelashes, unblinking. Believing. No ounce of pity or condemnation, just... conviction that befuddled him. Conviction he didn't deserve and certainly hadn't earned. Silence stretched as he lost his voice.

“Take your time,” she said, even, practiced.

She put her hand against his heaving side, hesitant, soft, and when he didn't flinch, she wrapped her arm over him and snuggled close. He pressed his nose into her soft hair. She took his palm and pressed it against her stomach, slipping his fingers underneath the waistband of her scrubs to rest against warm skin and the bump of her panties' waistline. He felt her navel underneath his palm, felt the subtle rise and fall of her belly as she breathed. He couldn't feel the baby yet, not without palpating invasively like a doctor instead of caressing like a husband. She was eight weeks pregnant, at most. Her first OB appointment wasn't for another two weeks.

But he could imagine.

“You can do this,” she encouraged, and she held him that way for... hours. Days. Unmoving. Just breathing. And in the passing moments, shaky, unfettered need became an annoying buzz in the back of his head again. The unwanted loiterer he could close the door on instead of an armed burglar. Always there. Always present, but... surmountable.

Something he could tolerate again.

“When are you due for your shift?” she said, her voice soft in the muted darkness. She had his watch hand captive under her palm, warm against her belly. Her body pressed against him. His face rested in her hair. He couldn't look at his watch. The skin on his face felt raw and irritated. He had his eyes closed because they hurt. He didn't want to move. She shifted instead, saving him the trouble. “It's 6:30,” she said.

He swallowed. “An hour, I guess,” he said, his voice rough and croaking with recent grief.

Her palm slid to his waistline, to the drawstring of his navy scrubs. She unclipped his pager and took it from him. He didn't pay any attention to where she put it. “Take a little nap,” she said. “I'll let you know if there's an emergency.” His phone chose that moment to ring, loud and shrill in the silent space. He didn't want to talk to anyone. She reached into his pocket, switched it to vibrate, and took that away from him, too.

“I don't want to have the dream,” he said. “I can't deal with it right now.”

She kissed his chest through his scrubs. He couldn't see her face, but he could feel her smile. “Consider me your dreamcatcher or whatever.”

He could see her standing on a catcher's mound with a mask in a field of green. She would catch every bad thing that flew her way and crush it in her tiny fist with her tiny mitt, eyes blazing with adorable defiance. “Hmm,” he said at the thought.

“Seriously, Derek,” she said. “Close your eyes for a little bit. Relax. I'll wake you up in a few. You won't be late for work.”

Not that he cared much about being on time. “Mmm.”

He felt her, warm and solid against his body, her tiny arms wrapped around him, and some of his worries sloughed away. She made him feel safe. Safe and quiet and warm. Security bloomed like a flower around him. How did she do that? He didn't know and hurt too much to contemplate it. She pulled him to the mattress, and he didn't resist. She curled up against him, and he relished the warm slide of her small body against his. Safe. He was safe. Safe, frustrated, and tired. The perfect storm of good and bad felled him.

His awareness of the room beyond the sound of her breathing dimmed, but he didn't sleep. Didn't dream. He existed. Resting. Replenishing.

The intrusive bleat of her pager snapped him out of it. His breathing hitched, and he tensed as she cursed at the interruption and squirmed against him to see who'd dared to summon her. Her pager dangled in the air as she held it aloft over their prone bodies. His eyes wouldn't quite focus yet, and all he saw was a black blob waving in the air above him. Another curse fell from her lips after a moment. The mattress squeaked as she moved away, putting her legs over the side of the bed and standing up with a wobble. She wiped her eyes and blinked as she settled into standing and he realized, belatedly, that she'd taken a nap, too. Next to him. She'd been tired, and she'd needed it, and he felt better, somehow, knowing she'd taken a little comfort of her own from the situation despite his inability to offer any.

“It's an emergency,” she said with a sigh. “I have to run.”
He sat up, groggy and disheveled. He pulled his hands through his hair. He couldn't find many words yet, and most were single syllables. “Go,” he managed.

She gave him an apologetic look. “You'll be okay?”

He felt better. Not okay. The loiterer hung around on Derek's mental stoop, staring in through the glass panes at the top of his door.

Derek looked at Meredith and shrugged. He glanced pointedly at her pager. “I'm not dying,” he said. An honest but laconic assessment. He waved her off. “Go.”

She left after giving him an apologetic frown. As she opened the door to the on-call room, a triangle of fluorescent light flooded the room, making him squint. The sounds of conversation, of people and life and civilization, fell into the room, making him bristle. She closed the door softly behind her, but out of her eclipse, he heard the noises behind the door. A quiet murmur, but there. He had no bubble of nonexistence or safety anymore.

He wrapped his arms around his stomach and let loose a deep, irritated sound of pain as the loiterer knocked. Again. The subtle hum of wanting tugged on every sinew. Every bone. Every muscle.

This was beyond a bad day.

This was Hell.

But he had to work. He had to do this. As delightful as shutting himself away from civilization sounded on a knee jerk impulse, because he felt abraded and raw and undone, and as awful as the prospect of working all day made him feel, he knew conceptually that living the rest of his life as a fucking hermit wouldn't work. As the days of his stress leave had worn on, the somnolence caused by the Paxil had lessened. Passing the days by sleeping when he wasn't in therapy no longer worked. He'd found himself growing antsy. Bored. Desperate to do other things. Wishing to get back to the head space he'd been in before he'd been shot.

Except, to get back to how he'd been, he had to push himself over this horrible hump where doing too little drove him crazy and doing too much drove him crazy, and there was no middle ground that didn't drive him crazy. He had to push himself past loathing his job and interacting with new people. He knew he loved both, somewhere. Somehow. He just had to find that piece of himself again. It had to be there. Meredith saw it. And if he used her gaze like a mirror, he saw it, too.

“Maybe, you just want to see it,” Mr. Clark said, menacing. “Maybe, you're fantasizing again.”

Derek sighed. He'd been happy for the blessing of internal silence while it'd lasted. Everything, it seemed, was waking up.

Dr. Wyatt had encouraged him when he'd voiced his readiness to try working again. She'd smiled at him, eyes sparkling as she'd scribbled on her notepad.

What? he'd said.

I think we have a winner, she'd said.

A winner?

The Paxil.

What's winning about it?
You’re getting hungry. Literally. Figuratively. Your appetite seems like it’s on its way back.

Oh, he’d said, stunned. Dumbfounded. A small smile had stretched his lips.

Dr. Wyatt had written another letter to the Board for him, asking that he be allowed back for light duty. The Board had accommodated him in the space of days. Richard would stay as Interim Chief, for now, and Derek wouldn’t be performing any surgeries or offering anything even close to emergency care. He’d been bumped back to intern for all intents and purposes.

Derek ran his hands through his hair, agitated, as he glanced at his watch. He had ten minutes before his shift started. Ten minutes before he wouldn't have a moment of peace. Ten minutes before he had to be out there in the noise and the people, acting human and not like some beast slavering for a fix he couldn't have and didn't want to want anymore. The thought of enduring the chaos made the alternative seem so much more tantalizing. Attractive.

The knocking loiterer persisted. Louder. He tried to shake it off. To push it to the back of his mind. Nothing worked.

“Pushing yourself past this is a laughable endeavor,” said Mr. Clark. “There is no past this. You’re Humpty Dumpty in a thousand pieces, and there's no fixing you, you fucking coward.”

Derek clenched his hands together. “You're wrong,” he said.

“Am I?” said Mr. Clark. “I don't think so.”

“Stop,” Derek said. “Please.”

Mr. Clark laughed.

“I'm not listening to you today,” Derek snapped, teeth grinding in frustration. “I'm here because I'm ready.”

A long silence stretched. Derek clenched his fists, squeezing until his knuckles hurt. He was here because he'd said he was ready. The Board didn't want a cracked neurosurgeon flipping out with a scalpel. They wouldn't have forced him. Nobody had forced him. He'd had Dr. Wyatt write the letter announcing his competency for easy work. The constant cravings hurt. Dealing with people made him feel like he was receiving a bath in sandpaper. Being out of the house frightened him, made him nervous and sick to his stomach half the time. His entire life had become the painful experience of ripping off a band-aid, but he’d chosen this. He'd chosen it. He needed to do the ripping if he was ever going to get past any of the pain.

“Leave me alone,” he commanded.

“Fine,” said his tormentor. “We'll see how you do without me.”

Derek blinked as the punishing laughter he'd grown accustomed to left him. He heard the blood rush in his ears. Heard the murmur of life beyond the door. Nothing more. He shook his head. No comments. No judging. Nothing. He had a headache, and thinking hurt, but his partner in recrimination seemed absent. Derek Shepherd, mental party of two, had ditched one. How...?

The doorknob to the on-call room turned and the door opened, giving Derek little chance to contemplate it. He jerked, startled, and squinted muzzily at the person who’d broken into his sanctuary early. Before Derek had steeled himself to emerge.
“Hey, man,” Mark said, his voice gruff as he stood in the doorway, tall and imposing. “Debbie told me you were in here.”

“What do you want?” Derek snapped as he rubbed his eyes.

Mark held up his hands. “Whoa,” he said. “Aggressive much?”

“I'm not having a meltdown,” Derek said. He leaned over the edge of the mattress and picked up his cell phone and his beeper. He clipped his beeper on the waistband of his scrubs, and stuffed the cell phone in his lab coat pocket. “Tell Meredith I'm still not dying.”

“I didn't say you were dying, Mr. Paranoid,” Mark said. “And I didn't say she sent me, either, did I?”

“You don't need to say it. It's written all over your face.”

Mark closed the door behind himself and leaned against the wall, his thick arms folding over his chest. “Is not,” he said.

“Is, too.”

“Is not!” Mark said.

Derek rolled his eyes and glanced at his watch. Barely any time left. He stood and stretched out, reaching above his head and extending to his tiptoes. The collecting tension of anticipation released, somewhat.

“You're not thinking about doing something stupid, right?” Mark prodded.

Derek sighed. There it was. The scrutiny. Starting. He knew everybody meant well, but that didn’t stop the constant check-ins from irritating him. “I'm barely thinking at all,” he said.

Mark nodded. “You're going to Joe's with me tonight.”

“I am?”

“You'll have a club soda, and you'll play darts with me.”

“I will?”

“You will,” Mark said. “Because I asked you, and I know your dance card isn't exactly full lately.”

Derek sighed. Okay, there was ripping off a band-aid, and then their was jamming a scalpel into a healing bullet wound. Working for eight hours seemed like enough of a stretch of his capabilities. “Mark, I just want to go home to my dog and my pregnant wife.”

Mark shook his head, his expression impassive. “Not tonight.”

“Mark—”

“Not tonight, man,” Mark said. “You're getting out of the house.”

“I'm out of the house, now.”

“But not for fun,” Mark countered. “And your pregnant wife won't be there to go home to, anyway.”
Derek froze. He'd been looking forward to his reward for tolerating the day. Going home. Kissing his wife hello. Enjoying a long, relaxing bath with her. She liked to take bubble baths when she had the time, and she'd been taking them every chance she had since she'd gotten pregnant. Aches, maybe. Swelling? She hadn't said anything, and denied discomfort when he asked, but she always let him join her, even if it was just to keep her silent company while she read her latest book. He'd imagined they might have sex that night, too, given the rare but perfect mesh of their schedules. She had the entire evening off and wasn't expected back to work until Wednesday morning.

He frowned. She hadn't said a word about not being home that evening. Not that he was her keeper or anything. And not that he'd exactly been conversational that morning when she'd seen him for the first time in twelve hours. “She didn't say anything,” he said helplessly as his hopeful plans for a recuperative evening shattered before his eyes.

“I have it on good authority that Meredith will be hitting the bar with Yang tonight,” Mark said.

Derek raised his eyebrows. “The bar? But she's pregnant.”

“Non-alcoholically hitting it,” Mark clarified. “Just like you will be. With me.”

“But that's—”

“Not fair?” Mark said. He grinned and clapped Derek on the shoulder. “I know. See you there after your shift?”

Derek shrugged. “I guess.”

“I knew you'd come around.”

Derek's pager whined. Frowning, he picked it off his waistband and stared at it in the dimness. The sunlight filtering in through the blind slats had brightened as the morning advanced. 7:30AM the pager's clock proclaimed. His shift had officially started, and the small message on the screen told him he was needed in the ER, which was weird. He wasn't allowed to practice emergency medicine. In fact, the Board had expressly forbidden him from it. Simple care, conference room consults, and scut work. That was it.

“Duty calls?” Mark said, a twinkle in his eye.

Derek glared as he pushed past his friend out into the hallway. To work. The moment of engagement sank tension into his muscles almost reflexively. “Did you plan this so I couldn't argue with you anymore?” he said.

“Not me,” Mark said. “I swear.”

“Right,” Derek said.

“See you after your shift?”

Derek didn't dignify Mark's cheerful question with an answer as he jogged in the direction of the ER. Jogged. The page message said nothing about an emergency. He wasn't allowed to work on emergencies. That didn't mean it wasn't an emergency, though, and he would treat it like one until he knew otherwise. His phone rang, vibrating enthusiastically in his pocket as he trotted to the elevator, but he didn't answer it.

Emergency summed up the polar opposite of the scene Derek found in the bright, empty ER. A man sat on a gurney with a bloody nose, his head tipped forward into a crimson-stained cloth. He wore a hospital gown and an intravenous line had been set into his wrist. Cancer, Derek decided from the man's bony figure and tired, bruised-looking countenance. Two parents fussed with a screaming baby, but he couldn't make any sort of assessment on sight for them. Every other gurney lay empty. The bright bay doors let a long shaft of morning sunlight in from the east. Nobody walked in or out. No ambulance sirens bleated or chirped to announce their presence. No frantic trauma team burst down the white hallway into the bay. A single brown-clothed trauma nurse moved through the room, and Dr. Bailey stood at the admitting desk, chewing on the end of a pen as she scrutinized a clipboard. The room, normally bustling and full of activity, seemed sedate.

Derek sidled to the desk, no longer rushing, and leaned against the countertop at a slant. Dr. Bailey's pen halted, and Derek watched her brown eyes as she gazed first at his shoes, and then trailed up his legs to the cursive Dr. Shepherd embroidered in blue at his left breast, close to where he'd been shot. She rolled her eyes without meeting his gaze before her pen resumed its scribbling, and he couldn't help but smile at her assessment. Or smirk, he decided. Dr. Bailey would definitely consider this a smirk.

Some things, he decided, still felt pretty good. Like knowing he could irritate her with a simple lean.

"Why was I paged?" Derek said.

"Because I paged you," Bailey said.

"That's informative."

She circled something with her pen in blue ink, and then she looked up. "There was a scheduling snafu when Dr. Keller called in sick. I'm trying to juggle my time between here and the clinic, which is also short-staffed."

He frowned. "What is there to juggle? This is a ghost town."

"Do you expect me to be able to warp time and space to be in both places at once?" she said.

"No..."

She shoved the clipboard and pen into his hands. "Then there's juggling."

He glanced at her notes. The parents with the fussy baby had already been seen and only waited on a prescription. For the mom, actually. Not the baby. The man with the bloody nose had been admitted, and an orderly would be there to transfer him soon to the oncology wing. Not only was the bay nearly empty, the few people in it didn't need any care.

"Not very urgent juggling," he said.

"Are you saying you can't help me in my desperate hour of need?"

"I didn't say that," he said.

"Then what's the problem?"

He sighed, exasperated. "Is this intervention day or something? What did Meredith say to you?"

"Nothing," Dr. Bailey said. Her eyes narrowed. "Do you need an intervention?"

"No..."
“All right, then,” she said. She took his hand in her own and shook it. She gave him a subtle squeeze that he wasn't sure if he'd imagined or not. “Thank you for helping me,” she said.

He flexed his fingers. “You're... welcome.”

She left him at the desk to do... nothing, really. He stood there, flummoxed. He'd never seen an ER this dead. Meredith had told him the ER had been a ghost town and had described it much like this in the weeks after he'd been shot, but the shooting had been more than three months ago, now. Curious, he checked the scanner on the desk for ambulance chatter. Nothing. Two paramedics discussed their breakfast choices – Wendy's or McDonald's – apparently forgetting the entire city could hear them, but other than that, no matter how he tuned the receiver, no matter what channel, he only received the hiss of static. Seattle seemed miraculously free of injury and sickness that morning.

He sat down at the desk in the black, rolling chair, letting his feet skid on the floor. He propped his elbows on the desk. He ached. His joints. Everything. His vision turned to blur and blear as he rubbed his eyes. Only Tuesday morning, after a short, six-hour shift on Monday, and he felt a bit like he'd been working an overnight shift at the end of a long week. Heart surgery, pneumonia, post-traumatic stress, and a still-lingering bout with depression had destroyed any semblance of stamina in his possession. Between needing Meredith to pull him through the weak spot that morning, Mark dictating Derek's social life in the evening, and Dr. Bailey leaving him with the menial task to end all menial tasks, he decided the only thing left that was needed to complete the boxed set of 'you can't handle life anymore' would be Richard showing up to supervise Derek's desk jockeying.

His phone rang again, vibrating in his pocket. Sighing, he pulled it out and glanced at the display. The two calls he'd ignored and this call were all from the same number. Kathy, read the pixelated display. She'd been calling since 6:00 AM. He rolled his eyes and dumped the call to voice mail. He wasn't in the mood for yet more pestering from the East Coast peanut gallery, not today. Not ever, but certainly not after this morning.

It's totally normal, Meredith had said.

He clenched his fingers. None of his twisted thoughts felt normal. No matter what Meredith said. No matter what pamphlet or guide he read. He closed his eyes and found his father there, waiting in his mind's eye, face pallid, eyes glassy.

Derek, listen to me. This is very important.

Dad?

I'm sorry.

Sorry for what, Dad?

Michael Shepherd had taken a breath. His gaze had lit like a glowing candle, as if he'd seen something miraculous hovering before his blue eyes. And then he'd died without ever answering Derek's question.

He'd died.

Derek rubbed his eyes, trying to scrape away the burning, aching sensation that told him he skated close to losing his composure to overactive tear ducts. He'd experienced too much violence to ever wish it on somebody else. Why, then, could he imagine six different ways in as many seconds to kill Gary Clark? And why, the more personal and gruesome the method, did the thoughts not twinge some sort of gag reflex? Some disgust? Anything to tell him his moral compass might still be intact?

He clenchcd his fingers and closed his eyes, sitting stock still as that line of thinking dragged him down the rabbit hole to a gory, awful place. A scalpel in his hand cut flesh it wasn't supposed to cut. Blood and bits swam in a macabre, oozing river. Mr. Clark pleaded—

His eyes snapped open and he pushed back against his chair. “No,” he blurted. To no one. The empty bay stared back at him. The man with the nosebleed had been taken away, and the couple with the baby were too engrossed in conversation to care about his outburst.

When the desk phone rang, his heart caught in his throat, and he would have jumped out of his skin if he weren't already so discombobulated he didn't have much balance. The chair rolled back a foot.
Derek clenched his teeth and took a deep, cleansing breath. His heart slowed in the space of moments, but the burst of adrenaline made him feel shaky and a bit sick. He picked up the phone from its cradle and propped it between his ear and shoulder as he readied his pen, trying to hold his trembling fingers still in hopes of producing something legible.

“Seattle Grace Mercy West Emergency Room, this is Dr. Shepherd,” he said in a tone about ten times more confident than he felt. “How may I help you?”

A bluster of breath hit the other end of the line. A sigh? “Derek,” said a familiar voice.
A familiar voice whose owner sang alto in the church choir, and even knowing his healthy eating habits, even after he'd moved and had no private practice with no admin staff to feed and no clients to woo, still guilted him for huge Girl Scout cookie orders by the caseload every winter for her youngest daughter, Morgan. A voice he could still hear in his head, even after decades, telling him, Derek, put that back! or Derek, stop it, that's mine! when he'd been the youngest instead of Amy, and she'd been forced to babysit. Back when he'd been too little to care much about rules, and he hadn't needed Mark to egg him into doing something mischievous. Derek, sweety, come on, she'd said, her hand squeezing his shoulder as she'd tried to pull him back from his father's open grave.
He'd stared blankly at the coffin. They wouldn't bury it until everybody left. Those were the rules.
If he didn't leave... Let them work, she'd said, though, and she'd made him walk away.

He woke groggily to the sight of her beyond his gummy eyelashes. She flipped her curly black-and-silver hair behind her ears. “Hey, sleepyhead,” Kathy said, smiling at him as she put down her magazine. “How are you feeling?”

He rubbed the crust from his eyelashes and blinked. He didn't know what time it was. What day it was. Breathing made his body feel bisected by a blade, and he didn't feel well enough or high enough to fake any semblance of health. He winced instead of spoke, and then he let his eyes drift shut for a moment.

“Nancy's getting more coffee,” Kathy said, her voice a soft whisper. “Meredith is in the shower.
Everybody else is out. Mom told us we needed to visit in smaller groups. I'm sorry we wore you out yesterday. We all lost our heads, I guess.”

He clutched the thermal blanket covering his legs. He couldn't remember anything beyond
Meredith finding him in the dark after her ER visit. Telling him she was fine. That she didn't need a D&C, and so she hadn't gotten one. “It's morning?” he croaked.

“Afternoon,” Kathy said. “You don't remember the nurse checking you earlier?”
He remembered coughing while the nurse encouraged him. Meredith had coached him through the agony, her small hand gripping his. Then nothing.

He tried opening his eyes again. Blur resolved into focus. Barely. Cloudy gray hovered outside the window. The blankets covering Meredith's cot were rumpled and displaced. The distant, metallic plink of water falling emanated from his private bathroom. Nobody other than Kathy was in the room.

“Do you want some water?” Kathy said, her crystal blue gaze creased with concern.

He nodded, and she disappeared for a moment. She returned with a plastic cup. He gripped it in his shaky hands and sipped. The cool water sliding down his throat felt like ambrosia.

“Hungry?” she said.

He felt too awful to think about eating. He shook his head. “Maybe later.”

He stared, dazed, at the foot of the bed, and he lost track of the moments as he listened to the distant roar of the shower and the bustle of the hospital outside his open door. Kathy hovered by the bed railing, but she seemed briefly content to let him find his sentience in gradual steps. He drifted in the silence, one hand resting over his bullet wound as he breathed. He felt the bandage through his shirt.

“Where’s Mom?” he said.

Kathy's odd expression made him realize she'd probably answered that question already, though he couldn't recall. “Out sightseeing,” Kathy said. “We've been trying to cut down on how many people are in the room with you at once.”

“Oh.”

Kathy gestured to the small reading chair by Meredith's cot. “Want help to the chair? You're supposed to be sitting up and walking a little today, if you can manage it.”

“Kathy,” he rasped. He closed his eyes. The fuzzy, flowing feeling in his head made it hard to think.

A hand gripped his and squeezed. “I know it feels really rotten,” Kathy said, closer, “But you need to try. Just a little to help yourself heal. You've slept all morning. I'll help you.”

He licked his lips and peered at her. “Have you been shot?”

She blinked. “What?”

“Then you don't know how it feels,” he said.

She frowned at him, but didn’t retort.

“You're going to stare at me and pester me until I try, aren't you?” he said.

Her lip twitched with the hint of a smile. “Just try,” she said. “It'll be good for you.”

He looked at the bathroom door. His eyes watered as melancholy swept over him like a wave. He would have been a father. He didn’t really know how to feel about that or how to comprehend what had been lost. Not when he could barely put two and two together and get four in his head. The thought of Meredith alone in the shower made a lump form in his throat. She would still be bleeding, aching, and those were just the physical results. He wanted to be there. For her. But she'd had to hold him up in the shower, yesterday. She'd been forced to care for him.

His chest hurt. Though nature had performed the killing blow, Gary Clark had still stolen something profound from him. From them.

“Derek?” his sister prodded in the quiet.

He wiped his eyes with the backs of his knuckles. “M'okay,” he said.

“I think you're lying.”

A pair of tears splotched his face. He'd been shot, and his wife was finishing a miscarriage. The lump in his throat made it hard to speak, so he didn't bother to try.

He pushed his tray table backward, and he brushed his hand weakly along the bed railing. Kathy snapped upright from her chair and pushed the railing down for him. He untangled the nasal cannula and put it by his hip. Pushing away from the mattress to sit up under his own power brought pain lancing through his torso. He gripped Kathy's bony shoulder, trying to breathe, shaking, unable to stifle a long moan. She helped him bring his feet over the edge of the mattress, and she stood there, patient, a pillar of balance and support as he shifted and hobbled until he managed upright.

The room swam, and his chest felt like it might fall out of his body.

“Happy?” he said, panting. He brushed his wet face with his shaking palms.

She guided his feet into his flip-flops. “Walk a little,” she said. She rubbed the small of his back through his shirt with her warm hand. “You can do it.”

The IV pole squeaked as he gripped it and leaned. He shuffled to the foot of the bed. All of five feet. Everything swam behind his eyes, and his head spun.

“Come on,” she urged, and with glacial progress, he tottered to the doorway. The process of walking twelve feet took minutes. Not seconds.

His breasts escaped him in painful blusters, and his limbs felt like overcooked spaghetti. He rested his forehead against the doorjamb, his body half in the hallway, half in his room. His eyes burned. “Kathy, I—” he managed.

“Derek,” said Nancy, “you're up! Walking to the door is wonderful!”

He didn't feel wonderful.

Derek squinted muzzily down the hallway at his approaching sister. A fat mug steamed in her hand. She dodged a passing nurse he knew he knew, but couldn't remember beyond the barest recognition. Nancy smiled at him as she caught up to the clot of people hovering his doorway. He glanced at the bathroom door, which blocked him from Meredith. The rush of the water behind the wooden barrier continued. His lower lip quivered. She took long showers when she was upset. Or hurting. Or tired and trying to wake up. Or all three.

He took a step in the direction of the bathroom, only to blanch. The room blotted out for a sickening moment, where all he could do was hold onto his IV pole to keep from spilling to the floor. Everything hurt. Moving. Thinking. Feeling.
“Do you need to use the restroom?” Kathy said against his ear as she followed the direction of his wavering focus. She gripped his waist as Nancy dashed to set her coffee cup down on his tray table. Nancy flanked him and came to his other side.

His legs wobbled.

“No,” he managed.

Kathy rubbed his back, and she pulled on his arm as if to guide him to the reading chair. “You're doing great, Derek, just—”

“Stop telling me what to do,” he snapped. “You don't know what I need.”

Tense, ugly silence stretched between the three of them. He trembled. The doorknob twisted, and the bathroom door opened, revealing Meredith, her hair stringy and wet from her shower. She wore a ratty t-shirt and some knit pants, and tiny beads of water dotted her brow. Steam billowed out of the bathroom. Her expression seemed... haunted. Pained.

She stared at him. “Are you okay?” she said, and that was it. That was all. Nothing about her.

He swallowed as his decision coalesced. “I can make it to the end of the hall,” he told his riveted audience.

Kathy opened her mouth, but he glared at her, and she shut it. Meredith smiled at him. “That's really good,” she said, her voice tired. She sat heavily in the chair Kathy had been trying to push him toward. Her hunched posture told him without words that she hurt. But all she did was stare at him, a hopeful glint in her eyes, and he couldn't take it anymore. Couldn't take the lack of parity.

They'd lost a baby. This shouldn't be all about him, and yet it was, and all the things he'd normally do to flip the situation around were beyond his present capabilities. He could barely wobble to her. Holding up a toothbrush for more than a minute hurt. Sweeping her into his arms seemed like fantasy.

He turned on his heels and forced himself to move despite the mire of discomfort and the drugged feeling that spun thick webs inside his head. He hobbled over his threshold. Out of his room. He scaled along the hallway's edge, shaking, moving at the speed of a turtle with a pair of broken legs. Meredith didn't follow, and he couldn't decide whether that made him feel better that he wasn't the center of attention for her for a moment, that she could focus on herself, or worse that he'd left her alone and that maybe she hurt too much to chase after him, even when he moved this slowly. Panting breaths seared his sore throat. He felt pasty and dizzy and sick. Nancy cheered him on from behind, but Kathy...

“Derek, did something happen?” Kathy asked point-blank as he neared the first doorway after the one that opened into his room.

He stopped, panting, and closed his eyes. “I got shot, Kathy,” he said.

“Something else,” she said, eyebrows raised.

“I'm fine,” he insisted.

She stared at him for a long, penetrating moment. “Derek, you can talk to us,” she said.

“What's going on?” Nancy said.
“I got shot,” he said. “Isn't that enough going on?”

“It's something else,” said Kathy.

He turned to face his older sisters. Nancy looked confused more than anything else. The lines of many years of laughter creased Kathy's face, but she seemed somber, now, and more severe in that seriousness. He gripped his IV pole. “Please,” he said, “I need to walk to the corner.” He glanced over his shoulder. The bright hallway fuzzed and came back, a blur of bustling staff and endless white. Nurse Tyler gave him a thumbs up as he passed by, a clipboard in his hand. Derek stared at the corner, a junction about forty feet away, where Tyler turned to the right. Fifty feet total. Derek could walk that. He swallowed. “I need to do this. Stop being my shrink.”

Kathy’s mouth opened and closed and opened. “Derek, I’m not being—”

“Stop, anyway,” he said. “Please. I got shot. I need to walk to the corner for...”

“For...?” Nancy said.

He closed his mouth and didn't answer. He wiped his face. He turned and he grabbed the railing along the wall with one hand, and held his IV pole with his other. He slid one foot forward and pressed his weight into it. Pain sliced his middle with every clipped breath. He winced. One foot done. Thirty-nine more to go, and then he would ask for a wheelchair, but only then, when he reached the intersection.

He traveled another step alone. A third. Then a warm hand closed around his shoulder and squeezed when he took his fourth. “You're doing great, Derek,” Kathy said, her voice soft, encouraging, sure. Nancy joined in, coaching from behind.

They both stayed with him the entire way.

“Derek? Derek, hello?”

Derek blinked. The present returned, a slow slide of details coalescing with his memories. He rubbed the bridge of his nose. The bright well of natural light falling through the ER bay doors overwrote the memory of endless fluorescent bulbs in the hallway outside his hospital room.

Kathy, his oldest sister, older by six years, had already been out of the house and married by the time their dad had been killed, and had already had seven kids before he'd managed to have a single one. She'd always been the family vanguard. The referee. The supportive cheerleader or the voice of reason, whichever she felt fit the needs of the situation.

“Kathy, I can't really talk right now,” he said to the phone, expecting reasoning and refereeing more than cheerleading, this time. “I'm at work.”

“Well, you wouldn't pick up the phone anywhere else, and this is important.”

“Important enough to call me four times since 6:00 AM?”

“Um...” Silence stretched. He chuckled despite his tension at her predictable, colorful curse. She sighed, a bluster of breath on the line. “I'm sorry,” she said. “I added instead of subtracted for the time difference. I blame John. He's on a decaff kick, and it's left me addled.”

He smiled as he leaned back in his chair. Her blunder was caused by more than just decaf coffee, though he didn't feel inclined to argue or tease right now. Kathy couldn't organize her way out of an appointment book that had already been arranged by date and time. She failed to complete the time zone conversion every few calls.

“It's okay,” he said, and though the question was superfluous, he added, “What do you need?”

He knew what she wanted to talk about. He'd already spent three hours deflecting both Nancy and Rachel on the very same subject that weekend, and his sisters, excluding Amelia, tended to act in tandem whenever they rained judgment.

“I want to talk about the wedding,” Kathy replied.

“Kath, I told Mom I can't handle a huge Shepherd family shindig right now,” he said. “Okay? I can't handle it.”

The line hissed with a long silence. “This just isn't like you,” Kathy said, her tone cautious.

He closed his eyes. The phone creaked as he gripped it tightly. “It's too much for me,” he said. “I've had months and months of too much for me, and I'm finally training myself to admit it when I'm in over my head. What more do you want me to say?”

“Derek...” she began.

“Look, Kathy, I have to go,” he lied, staring at the nearly empty bay. An ER nurse in brown scrubs spoke to the couple with the baby, the only occupants of the room. “If that's all you wanted to—”

“Derek, your wedding is in a matter of weeks,” Kathy said. “I wanted to make sure you're okay. That you're not making a mistake.”

He frowned. The other two conversations he'd had with his sisters hadn't gone like this. Not once had anybody intimated they were unhappy with his choice of bride. The complaints and needling had begun and ended on whether Rachel and Nancy could attend, and why he'd gone through Mom to bar them from the wedding instead of telling them himself. It had been his mother's idea to break the news gently to them in person instead of having him do it over the phone. Apparently, her plan hadn't worked so well, because within hours, his phone had been ringing off the hook. All fucking weekend. First his mother to warn him they hadn't taken it well, and then his stampede of upset sisters.

“I thought you wanted me to get married,” he said, his tone low and dangerous.

“I did,” Kathy said. “I mean, I do, but—”

He clenched his fingers around the phone. Meredith being suitable for him was not a fight he was prepared for today, or ever again. Nobody had argued with him on that point since he'd moved in with her, well over a year ago. Almost two, now, actually. “I love Meredith, and as far as I'm concerned, we're already married,” Derek said. “We've already had our first anniversary. This isn't anything new.”

“The Post-it thing is a sham, Derek,” Kathy said. “Meredith is just your girlfriend until you get a marriage license.”

“It's not a sham. What we have is not a sham.” He clenched his teeth. Tension pulled his muscles to the point of pain. “You don't get to call it that.”

“Derek, it's not real,” Kathy protested.

“It's real, Kath,” he said, bristling. “And I'm done talking to you. Don't call me about this again.”
“Derek, wait,” Kathy said, her voice a tinny, distant squawk as he moved to slam the phone back on the receiver. He sighed at her distressed, begging tone. He held the phone, his arm extended, an inch away from hanging up. “Wait, please, I just...”

He gave up and pressed the phone to his ear. “What?” he said tiredly.

“I like Meredith,” Kathy said. “I really do. She's very sweet, and she clearly loves you, and I want you to be happy. Both of you. I just want to make sure that, with all this other stuff going on, you're not making a rash decision. That's all.”

He glowered. “You mean you don't think I should get married because I might be crazy.”

“That's not what I said.”

“Stop being a shrink with me, for once in your life,” he snapped.

“Then stop twisting my words! I'm not being a shrink. I'm being your big sister who loves you!”

“Look,” he said evenly. “I've loved Meredith for a very long time. She is my wife already. In my heart, she is. It doesn't matter whether you believe the Post-it or not, because I believe it, I've believed it since I signed it, and it's my marriage. This isn't new or rash. This is just...”

“What, Derek?” Kathy demanded. “What is it, that it's suddenly so important to you and to her, when clearly it wasn't important enough before? That's all I want to know!”

He glared at nothing in particular. He focused on the pencil cup. “If I get shot again, I need to know she'll be able to make decisions, if it comes down to that, and she wants some goddamned peace of mind. Is that so wrong?”

A long silence stretched on the other end of the line. He listened to her breathing. “You won't get shot again,” she said, her voice quiet, quivering.

He couldn't stop the roll of hopeless, upset laughter that fell from his lips. “Pick a fucking catastrophe, then,” he said. His life sometimes felt like Russian roulette with five loaded chambers out of six instead of only one. He blinked, and the room blurred. God, damn it. Why couldn't he keep it together today? He wiped his face with a shaky hand.

“Okay,” she said, fight absent from her tone. “I believe you,” she said. “I hate your reasoning, but I believe you're doing what you need to do.”

“Why do you hate my reasoning?” he said.

“Because you're my little brother,” she said. Her voice thickened with hurting anger. “You shouldn't have been there when Dad died, and you shouldn't have nearly gotten killed in your own hospital, and you shouldn't be scared of your own family who loves you.”

“I'm not scared of you,” he said. His head hurt. “I'm just trying to be realistic.”

She sighed. “I know,” she said. “That doesn't mean I have to like it.”

“I love her very much, Kathy,” he added quietly. “This isn't rash or a mistake. I promise.”

“I believe you,” she said. “I'm sorry. I really didn't mean to upset you.”

He swallowed. “It's okay.” Though it wasn't. It wasn't okay. He blinked, trying to focus the blur in front of his face and failing. Why did he have to be such a hopeless mess?
“I want you to be happy, okay?” Kathy said. “I really do.”

“Thanks, Kathy.”

A sniffle fell through the line and hit his ear, discordant. He clutched the phone at the familiar sound. He’d heard it growing up. Her crying. A lot of it when Dad had died or when her latest boyfriend had broken her heart and he’d been too young to think of it as anything more than gross. His breaths tightened in his chest. Great. They were both a fucking mess. He hated fighting with his sisters, even when he felt well. I'm sorry, he wanted to say. He opened his mouth.

“Will you have somebody take pictures, please?” Kathy said, interrupting his plans.

He shook his head. “Of what?”

“The wedding, silly,” she said. He imagined her smiling as she wiped her bright blue eyes. “I want to see it, even if I can’t be there.”

“Of course, I’ll send you pictures, Kath,” he said, putting conviction in every word. “I’d already planned to do that. It’s not that I don’t want to share this with you or the others. I wanted...” He wanted to be better, and he wanted everybody to be there, except even after three weeks on the Paxil, the thought of so many people vying for space at the courthouse, or even at the house... His stomach fluttered, and he shoved the thought away before the butterflies exploded into fully bloomed anxiety. “I’ll send you pictures.”

He felt her smile through the line. “Thanks,” she said, her tone warm, understanding, and that made him feel better. A little.

“I really have to get back to work,” he said.

“I know,” she said. “Love you.”

He closed his eyes and breathed. “I love you, too, Kathy.”

He listened to the click of her hanging up against his ear. He pressed the phone against his forehead and swallowed, and then he placed it back in its cradle. A sheaf of papers hitting the desk made him flinch and look up.

Richard stood there, elbows perched on the high lip of the desk, his wire reading glasses perched on his nose as he stared down at Derek. Great. This was just great. Derek's stomach churned as the boxed set of 'you can't handle life' slid together, a complete matched set. He didn't need this today. He didn't need so many people crowding him.

“What's next?” Derek snapped. “Cristina dragging me off by my ear to explain why I can't kill myself?”

Richard's expression didn't waver. “Is everything okay?”

“It's fine,” Derek said, rubbing the bridge of his nose. “That was just my sister.”

“Which one?”

“Kathy.”

Richard's eyebrows raised. “The psychiatrist?”

“Yeah,” Derek said. “She thinks me getting married right now is rash.”
“But you’ve been married to Meredith for over a year.”

“That’s what I tried to tell Kathy,” Derek said with a sigh. “Everybody still wants to weigh in.”

The couple with the baby approached the desk, and Derek waved them forward. Richard shifted to the side to give them space, but he didn't stop watching Derek, and the scrutiny was beyond blatant. Derek felt a hot flush spreading across his cheeks as the couple handed him a sheaf of discharge papers. He reviewed the papers and signed them, forcing himself to smile despite the way his gut churned. They thanked him, and then they left through the bay doors as the baby cooed in its mother's arms. The swishing sound of the automatic doors filled the silence, and then a blast of cool air unfurled into the bay. The drop in temperature made a shiver crawl through his body.

Richard stepped back to the center of the desk. “So, this isn't the first call?”

“Nancy tried earlier. And Rachel,” Derek said. “Kathy is usually the sister rally call when the first two calls don't work.”

At least Amy hadn't bucked her historical trend and jumped on the gavel-crashing sister solidarity bandwagon. She'd whined at him in the past about some of the decisions he'd made when she'd been younger and forced to live with him, but since he'd somehow graduated medical school despite nearly flunking out, her complaints had stopped. He'd moved out of the house, and he'd buried himself in his work. They'd drifted apart. Physically. Mentally. Honestly, getting away from her had been a relief. He'd tried to help her over and over, and he'd never been enough. Not once. Watching her self-destruct had been a slow form of torture.

Now, though... The relief he remembered felt more like a guilty brand.

Since their precarious truce after Amelia had visited Derek in the hospital, he and Amy had been talking more. Anything at all would have been more than before, but she called now and then. He called, too. Made the effort. Once every other week or so, maybe every three weeks, they spoke about small, pointless things like the weather. She talked about her job, sometimes, about working with Addison. He hadn't been working, much, so he mostly just listened. The conversations lasted five or ten minutes, at best, but it was better than before. Progress.

He'd barely managed to explain his PTSD to her. She didn't know about his addiction. None of them did. And none of them knew about the pregnancy, either. The fact that he would be a dad, finally, years after he knew they'd rightly suspected him of giving up hope. He and Meredith had decided to wait for Thanksgiving to tell them in person about the latter. She would be about four months along, give or take, by then. Showing a little, maybe. A happy, visible surprise for his family. But he wasn't sure how he would ever tell them about the former, none of them, but especially her. Amelia.

Look, she'd said. I... I know this must have been really scary. For you. I mean... with what we went through with Dad. If you ever want to talk about it...

I know who to call.

Yeah, she'd said. Besides. I know you're not perfect, now, so it's not like it'll ruin your image.

He clenched his fists. Of all his sisters, she would probably understand him the most, now. Maybe, she'd even be able to help him. Help him with... He closed his eyes against the burning feeling incinerating his eyeballs, and he wiped his face. Everything. She might be able to help him with everything.
Of all his sisters, though, none of them made him feel so much like a fucking hypocrite as she did. He'd called her a liar, and that had been one of the tamer things he'd said over the years. He'd called her a liar, and an addict, and accused her of throwing her life away, all true, but, now, years later, he'd fallen into the same abyss. He'd fallen, he lay broken and bloody at the bottom of the pit, and he couldn't seem to climb out.

She'd been there, too, and he'd left her.

He felt worse for ever judging. Pain, all kinds, did stupid things to people. All people. His lip quivered, and he shook his head.

"Why don't you sit down for a minute?" Richard said, tearing Derek from his spiraling, crushing musing. His voice was warm but stern as he continued, "I'll cover the desk."

Derek rubbed his eyes. "I'm fine. I just have a little headache."

Richard raised his eyebrows. "Did it sound like that was a suggestion?" he said. "Go sit down. Trauma room 2 is empty."

"The whole bay is empty," Derek snapped as he stood and slammed his hands against the desk. The loud sound cracked through the echoing, empty space. "This isn't stressful! What's stressful is being watched like a fucking guppy in a cup."

A hint of movement hit the corner of his eye, and he flinched to the side, startled. Dr. Bailey stood there, scribbling on a yellow outpatient chart, staring at her work more than him. She didn't look up as he recomposed himself. "I'm back for a few minutes," she said. "Why don't you sit down?"

"But—"

She looked up from her chart and glared. "Did you or did you not just tell your sister you can admit when you're in over your head?"

He gaped. "How did—"

"It's not my fault you brought your personal business to the front desk in the ER. Do I want to hear it? No. But that doesn't mean I can make myself blessedly deaf at choice moments."

"But you weren't even here," he said. Had she been? He swallowed, feeling lightheaded. Had he been so wrapped up in himself that he hadn't even seen her walk up to the fucking desk?

She rolled her eyes. She tapped her pen against her lab coat. "See all. Know all. We've covered this before." She stared at him, and she shifted her pen to point accusingly at him. Her gaze hardened like a diamond. "Sit. Down. And take a breather."

He clenched his teeth. "Meredith told you both to watch me for signs of nuclear meltdown, didn't she?"

Richard shook his head. "Of course, not," he said, overwritten by Dr. Bailey speaking at the same time, "She did no such thing."

Derek blinked. "Then why—"

"It's common sense, you fool," Dr. Bailey said. "Serve yourself a helping of reason and sit down. I swear, all the mousse you slather on is affecting your brain function."
“I don’t use mousse,” he said.

She rolled her eyes. “Well, you use something. Your hair is shiny.”

“Look, I’m fine. I’m not glass. I can handle...” His voice trailed away, and he flushed under their intense, unblinking scrutiny. They stared, eyebrows raised, and he wanted to yell or stomp his feet or do all manner of childish things that would convince them he belonged in the daycare playpen they’d constructed for him with their constant supervision. “I can handle my sister who is three thousand miles away!” he said, irritated and flustered and embarrassed.

“I’m glad you can handle that,” Richard said, his tone patronizing. “You know what I can’t handle?”

Derek sighed. He rubbed and squeezed the painful tension in his shoulders. “What?”

“A lawsuit against this hospital while I’m still Interim Chief.”

“Great,” Derek said. “You think I’m a walking lawsuit? Both of you?”

Dr. Bailey shot a miffed glance at Richard. She took a deep breath and moved into Derek’s space, placing a warm hand on his shoulder. “Nobody is saying you're a walking lawsuit,” she said, her tone low and soothing, but it didn't soothe him. “We just want you to relax. Go with the flow. Ease back into things. It’s only been two days since you came back.”

“From stress leave,” Richard interjected.

Dr. Bailey turned to Richard, eyebrows raised. "You realize, sir, that you're not helping?"

“You know, if I really were insane, it's you guys and my sisters that would have driven me there,” Derek snapped.

Dr. Bailey tapped her watch. “Fifteen minutes. Relax. I'm timing you.”

“But—”

She fanned her chart at him, an exasperated look on her face. “Scoot!”

His chest felt full and painful. He wanted to yell at them, both of them, and the overwhelming urge to exhaust his frustration through vocalization turned his vision black and spotty, and his skin felt hot, but he paused in the well of dizziness, his teeth clenched. He realized he was just letting them prove themselves right. They were riling him with needling that wouldn't have been a blip on his radar before. He would have laughed at them. Come back with a witty retort. Before he'd been shot, and the control he had on his temper hadn't been worn from strong ropes to fraying threads. Back when he'd had a sense of humor.

His eyes watered. People walked on eggshells around him because it was a fucking necessity. His skin flamed with embarrassment as he shakily called his temper to heel. He wiped his eyes. His skin ached with irritation. He was sure, then, that his eyes looked bloodshot, and that he looked like a disaster case, overall. No wonder they wanted him to sit down for a bit. He hadn't looked in the mirror since that morning. In the bathroom. He'd thrown up, but he'd still been hard, though deflating, at least. Finally. He'd looked wretched and hating as he'd stared at himself in the mirror over the sink. He'd stared, half naked, until it'd gone away. His erection. All while Gary Clark had laughed.

“I'm sorry,” Derek said, his voice quivering.

Dr. Bailey’s gaze softened, and she looked like she wanted to say something, but he turned around before she could, and he marched himself into the empty trauma room to take a breather. To unwind as commanded. He could do this. With practice, he could be a human being again. He could be himself, and he could prove he didn't need so many people working together to make sure he didn't fall flat on his fucking face.

He let himself collapse onto the rolling stool that sat by the paper-covered examination table, and he took a deep breath, willing himself to calm down and be rational, except his heart wouldn't stop thumping in his ears like the hoof beats of a racehorse, and the need to yell didn't seem to be subsiding. His shoulders slumped. The loiterer crossed his threshold, then, touting an easier path in his hands. It shined like a beacon, and Derek pulled his arms around his midsection with an unhappy moan.

“I don't want this,” he told himself. Told the loiterer.

Except he was lying. He wanted it. He wanted it more than anything, and it would be so fucking easy to get. He was a doctor with a prescription pad. The pharmacy kept controlled substances under lock and key, which was required by law, and he didn't have direct access, but that still didn't mean getting them would be more than a trifle. All he had to do was write a prescription for a post-op or pre-op patient in pain and then skim some pills off the top. A five-year-old could do it with a bit of precocious ingenuity. Or he could write a script for some random bum in the free clinic waiting room and pay him to pick up the pills. Or—

No. No, no, no. This was a despicable line of thinking. “I don't want this,” he announced to nobody. His words bounced off the cabinets and the metal sink. He swallowed, trembling. This was a bad day. He felt like he'd quit using yesterday, not a month ago.

The loiterer grinned an evil, toothy grin, filling space in his foyer. The front door yawned wide open, creaking on its hinges. An intense craving like a siren call made it hard to think beyond forcing the simple act of breathing.

Derek made himself count with no destination in mind. He started at one, and he moved into the tens, twenties, thirties, forties over the slow, painful crawl of needy seconds. He thought about Meredith. The baby. The upcoming wedding. About random bits and flotsam floating in his head. I want Daddy, Amelia had told him years ago, sobbing into his arms. She'd been so little, then. I want Daddy back. Please, make him come back. Why does he want to stay in heaven instead of be here?

I can't, was all he'd been able to say.

He had his hand on his cellphone before he was thinking straight, and he found her name in his contacts list. The soft, minor tone of the phone ringing caressed his racing brain. Help. He needed help, and she would know how to help with this. He would swallow his pride and ask, because he needed to fix what he'd broken if he ever hoped to be a functioning person again. He needed this all to stop.

“Hi,” she said against his ear, her tone neither excited nor irritated. Neutral. God, even grown up, he couldn't get over how cherubic she sounded. He clenched his phone. His knuckles hurt. She laughed. “Derek, you idiot, did you butt dial me?”
Amelia. The word caught on his tongue. Help. That word stuck, too.

When the trauma room door jolted open, he twitched, hanging up reflexively. He stood and jumped backward, the violent abruptness of his movement sending the stool rolling into the wall. The sharp corner of the counter slammed him in the waist and knocked his breath strangely in his healing chest. He blinked, upset as a new bath of adrenaline washed him head to toe, and his physical response meant shaking. Endless shaking. Nausea came next as a gurney roared into the room surrounded by paramedics and nurses in brown scrubs and Richard and Bailey.

“—GSWs to the chest, left thigh, and abdomen,” the paramedic at the patient's feet explained as they transferred the patient onto the steel examination table. Paper crinkled. “Patient is tachycardic with uneven breath sounds.”

Derek blinked at the sight on the table. A pile of limbs and bloody, mutilated meat. A man. His white shirt and light blue jeans had soaked through with shiny, bright red that mottled to a rusty brown toward the drying edges. A coiling snake tattoo wrapped the man's limb, pale arm from wrist to bicep. Ludicrously, all Derek could focus on was the man's right work boot. A tangled, tan-colored lace dangled over the side of the narrow table. Even the lace had been stained with red.

“Derek, get out,” Richard snapped, which would have been useful before the fucking gurney had been rolled into the room.

Instead, all Derek could do was stand there, shaking as he interpreted the devastation on the exam table. Gunshot wounds. Multiple holes. Multiple bullets. The chest, the leg, the abdomen. A mess. The nurses cut at the man's stained, wet clothes with disinfected, industrial shears.

No, Mr. Clark, Derek had begged, and Mr. Clark had listened, abandoned Derek for reasons that still baffled him.

Derek swallowed as he remembered the shivery, nauseating shock rolling through his body while his chest stabbed him with every heartbeat. Every breath. To the point that his own need for air had become a form of torture by itself. He'd lain on the floor on the catwalk on his back, panting, staring up at the white ceiling, unable to move as an ice bath had tunneled through his veins. Meredith wanted him to get up, but he didn't know why, and it hurt too much to think.

Derek. Please. Focus. Focus for me. It's me. It's Meredith.

Dr. Bailey tried to eclipse his view of the bloody man who would likely be nothing more than a body in a few moments, but she was too small. She gripped Derek's shoulders and shook him. He watched, unable to speak, as the nurses cut the man's jeans all the way to his hips.

Derek had lain on the operating room table, awake, shivery. They'd taken his clothes away with scissors and draped him with a thermal blanket that didn't feel warm. He couldn't remember when that had happened.

The operating room lights shined down on him like an oncoming train. He blinked woozily at the flaring brilliance, listening to the soft hum of Meredith's voice. She kept him attached to reality when all he wanted was to float away. He couldn't breathe. He felt lightheaded and sick. Something pricked his arm. The anesthesiologist apologized for a bad stick and tried again. Another prick. Another apology. He realized he had more than just Meredith in the room with him. When? Then he had a claustrophobic mask pressing down on his face that he was too weak to push away, and they asked Meredith if she was ready.
Dr. Bailey shook him hard, and the past flickered away. “Derek, come on,” she said. “Come on, snap out of it. Come with me. Let's go outside.” She glared at the frantic nurses. “Would somebody tell me why he wasn't kicked out of the room before we got here?”

“My fault,” said the nurse on the left with the scissors tersely, offering no explanation. She pulled the leftover pieces of the victim's bloody pants out from underneath his heavy body. A loud metal thunk hit the floor by Derek's feet. He looked down. Time slowed to a halting crawl. A gun rested on its side on the white floor tiles, spinning, and his throat closed up.

“Oh, he's packing,” the nurse said.

Derek couldn't breathe. He pawed at his throat, but there was no collar to loosen, no hands there, strangling him. Nothing solid to fight. His vision fuzzed around the edges.

“Stay away from it, people,” Richard said, his voice calm. “Someone call security to pick this up. Does he have anything else on him?”

“That's a Beretta 9mm,” the nurse said.

Derek choked on nothing at all. The idea of replacing his panic thoughts or counting seconds as he breathed escaped him. All of Dr. Wyatt's instructions dissolved in a whorl of hysterical fire. His knees gave out, and he slid the floor, a shaking, terrified pile of overstimulated muscle and bones. He would die this time. He would really die. He knew it.

“Derek!” Dr. Bailey said, right in his face, except all she was was a large pair of eyeballs. A dark, looming figure that would hurt him. Kill him. He curled away from her, but that only gave him an eyeful of the loose firearm as its spin came to a stop on the floor by his foot. The gun looked exactly like the one Mr. Clark had used. It had a black muzzle exactly like the one that Derek had stared into before the blinding firework of pain had burst open in his chest.

“Derek, look at me,” Dr. Bailey said. She shook him again. “Derek. The gun is on the floor. Nobody is holding it. It's not pointed at you. It's not pointed at anybody.”

“Cops like it for its stopping power,” Derek regurgitated uselessly.

Warm hands cupped the sides of his face. Directed his attention away from the metal pile of death on the floor. “Don't look at the gun; look at me,” Dr. Bailey said. “You're okay.” She shook him hard. “Do you hear me, Derek Shepherd? You are fine.”

The monitors went crazy in a whining assault of sound that made Derek flinch. “V-fib!” a nurse cried.

“Dr. Bailey, I need you,” Richard said.

Dr. Bailey cursed. She sprung from her crouch by Derek to help at the table, leaving him. Derek swallowed, nauseated as he stared at the gun. On a logical level, he knew he shouldn't be panicking. He knew he shouldn't be scared. It was a fucking gun. On the floor. Its wielder would likely be dead in five minutes, not on a rampage. That was all. But all he had left of logic was a teaspoon of disconnected thoughts. Primal panic had robbed him of everything else.

He flinched as a breathless nurse poked her head into the room. “Half of Seattle PD is in our lobby. They're demanding updates.”
It was too loud. Too loud and bright, and too many things were going on for him to focus.

“Is this guy a suspect?” Richard said.

The nurse shook her head. “No. Undercover cop.”

“Tell them we're doing our best, but they need to wait,” Dr. Bailey said, and the nurse scampered away. The door tapped shut behind her.

Derek clenched his fists. His throbbing heart wouldn't slow down. He shouldn't be panicking. Shouldn't be panicking. Shouldn't. Be. Panicking.

He climbed to his feet, barely able to control his trembling limbs.

“Derek?” Richard said. “Derek, how are you doing over there? Somebody page Dr. Hunt!”

Derek didn't answer. He couldn't speak. He wobbled out of the room. The bright, empty ER made him squint. Monitors squealed behind him. Another frantic call of, “V-fib!” nipped at his ankles. He flinched at the loud sound. Everything was too loud. And too bright. And too open. His limbs shook with chill as his body pulled blood out of his extremities to guarantee the safety of his heart and other vital innards. The room spun.

He stumbled blindly to the supply closet, dazed, unthinking, instinctual.

When he found the dark space, he closed the door behind him, shuffled to the corner, far away from the door, into the gap between two long rows of overstuffed shelving, and collapsed. He curled up, his back to the doorway, his soft parts facing the corner. He buried his face against his trembling knees, and he sat there in the dark. In the quiet. Breathing. Sick.

As the minutes passed, logic swept in like an oozing, molasses tide, leaving him tired. Still sick. But not panicking.

He blinked. His eyes pricked, and then the tears he'd been trying to hold onto all morning popped loose. He wiped his face. His torso jerked. He sucked in a breath. His futile resistance didn't stop the avalanche. Only delayed it for a teetering moment. Before he knew it, he was leaking like a fucking sieve as he sobbed and sniveled into his knees.

He hated people and work and guns. He hated them, and he couldn't do this. Couldn't push himself past this. Any of this.

A barbed breath filled his chest, and he made a grieving noise. Soft. Moaning. He pressed his hands against his mouth to muffle himself, humiliated. Breathing was a physical pain. Each gust of air tore his body. He closed his eyes and imagined Meredith hovering beside him in the darkness. I'm not her, Derek, his figment had said. And you can't be a father if you stay in here. Except for a long, needing moment, that was all he could think about. Staying in there. He wanted that safe place back, but he didn't have access anymore. Didn't have anything safe. Not without...

The door to the supply closet opened, and the lights flicked on. He blinked, squinting as his hurting eyes adjusted. A gasp hit his ears, and he cringed at the unmistakable sound of someone's pity.

“Dr. Shepherd?” said a familiar, feminine voice. A horrified voice.

He peered over his shoulder at her, dread coiling in his stomach, only to lose himself in the black hole of memory like he always did when she was around. He sucked in a breath as his eyes rolled back and the wall rushed into him.

Gary Clark stared at him, the space between them separated by a sleek, black gun.

Words. Derek said words. He tried.

Adrenaline made his body quiver. Fight or flight? His body chose flight, but fear and logic made strange bedfellows, and they paralyzed him in a shivery, trembling pile. He swallowed. Flight just meant he’d get shot in the back.

His legs turned to jelly. Sweat dripped down the curve of his spine. His voice wavered, and he tried not to take a submissive stance. Tried. But he’d seen what guns did. Killed people. Killed his dad. He tried to convince the jabbering fear to shut up, but his thoughts kept coming back to that. To soft, wheezy, final words. To, “Derek, listen to me. This is very important.”

His hands moved in front of him. Please, they said for him when real words failed in his throat. Please, don’t.

Given dominance, Gary Clark advanced. Anger burbled in his tone. “No talking!” he said.

Derek’s legs drew him back one step. Two.

He tried. He tried to talk. He tried to break through and reach the man behind Gary Clark’s hating gaze, but fear burbled in Derek’s gut. He couldn’t even keep track of what he said. Couldn’t make it sound strong and commanding at all. The man who cheerfully announced that it was a beautiful day to save lives became submissive. Shivery. He couldn’t keep his breaths steady. He knew he looked terrified, and he knew that was probably a mistake. He radiated easy pickings like a tripping, sick gazelle for a lion.

Gary Clark’s gun shook. He stared at Derek with sharp, furious, hating eyes.

Derek tried to talk. The gun wavered, until it pointed at Derek’s feet. He made the mistake of thinking he’d made progress.

“Dr. Shepherd!” Dr. Kepner said behind him, clear as a bell. His stomach clenched. “Thank god, you’re back!”

He turned to see her running onto the catwalk. Toward him. Toward the fucking madman with a fucking loaded gun. Almost blasé about it. The sudden movements, the idiotic words, something, must have broken Mr. Clark out of his repentant spell, and when Derek refocused himself on the deadly problem at hand, he found himself staring down the barrel of a gun. Again. Mr. Clark stared at him with remorseless, hating eyes, and Derek knew he’d lost the battle in that moment. The moment when Dr. Kepner had stepped onto the fucking catwalk.

The loud crack of the shot broke his eardrums. The muzzle flash blinded him. For a moment, nothing hurt, and it made no sense, and then he was falling. He landed on his back. The breath knocked out of him and the back of his skull whacked into the hard floor. He lay there, bell rung and stupid. And then all his misfiring thoughts connected. Pain flared long before sound resolved in the roar.

He’d been shot. In the chest. And he couldn’t breathe.

He stared at the ceiling, breaths twisting in his torso while April panicked somewhere behind him. Sucking down air sent knives into his gut, but he needed air. He needed. The struggle became a war. Needing air versus not wanting it. Eternity stretched into something longer and more torturous.

April abandoned him. Gary Clark pointed the gun, and Derek waited to die. “No, Mr. Clark,” Derek managed in a feeble attempt at... what? To save his own life? To flee?

Something drew Gary Clark's attention to his right. Derek looked, too, but he didn't see anything. Didn't see anything but a blur, and then he was alone, cast away like a cheap, expendable thing. He lay on his back, confused, unable to breathe or move or think. He didn't know why Mr. Clark had disappeared, or when he would come back.

When Derek blinked the past away, Dr. Kepner hovered right in front of him. The back of her hand rested on his forehead as if to check his temperature, and she stared at him as she leaned close. In his space. He could taste her exhalations on his tongue. The warmth of her skin radiated against the nervous, upset chill of his. Too close. She was too close.

She'd gotten him shot. He'd never remembered that before. He'd only remembered being abandoned to die on the floor.

“Get off me,” he snapped, his voice low, dangerous, strangled with embarrassment. She'd found him sobbing in the closet, and then he'd swooned. In front of her.

“Just like a eunuch,” Mr. Clark said, returning from his long silence.

April backed away from Derek, her concerned gaze glittering in the bright lights.

He struggled to stand. He felt like he'd been put through a garbage disposal. His muscles ached. His head hurt. His throat felt raw, the skin on his face, irritated. He wiped his tired eyes. The room wobbled as his balance faltered. He reached out for the shelf to steady himself at the same time she touched his arm to help.

“Dr. Shepherd, you—”

He stiffened. “Back off,” he told her, his voice a low growl, and she did. Her lower lip quivered like she might cry. He wished she would.

He closed his eyes, trying to shut out the ache of living.

It's safe, here, Mirror Meredith had said. You're safe. Please, don't be scared.

The pull between reality and fantasy tore him in two. He hadn't ever wanted anything like this. Escape. The beat of the desire drum throbbed in time with his racing heart, overruling every other half-formed thought in his head. It hurt. The wanting hurt, and his pathetic attempts at coping hadn't helped. Nothing had helped.

And Gary Clark laughed, and laughed, and laughed. “This is what you managed in my absence?” he said. “I should have shut up a long time ago, clearly.”

Derek stared at Dr. Kepner through his eyelashes, fighting to breathe. “I need a prescription,” he said.

She blinked and backed away a step. “Why? What for?”

“Oh, be still, my heart,” Mr. Clark said, cackling with glee. “Are you really doing what I think you're doing?”
Derek advanced. “I need you to write me a prescription for Percocet. I don't have time to see Dr. Altman.”

“Dr. Shepherd, I'm not sure that's appropri—”

He backed her into the wall, crowding her. Nothing mattered except the singsong call of Mirror Meredith's twisted voice in his head. It's safe, here, she said. He needed safe. He couldn't do this. He couldn't. “You did this to me,” he said.

Dr. Kepner swallowed. “Did what?”

“You got me shot,” he said.

“Oh, I think we both did that,” Mr. Clark said. “Don't you?”

Derek ignored his tormenter. He glared. “You got me shot, and then you left me bleeding out on the floor to save your own ass.”

“I didn't mean to leave you,” Dr. Kepner croaked. When she blinked, her eyes spilled over, and he felt bliss as he watched her misery stain her cheeks. She huddled in the corner by the door. He didn't give her any space. If she could feel even half the suffering he'd felt the last few months, it wouldn't be enough.

“I got you your job back, and I ended up in a lake of my own blood for my trouble,” he said.

“I... I...” she stammered. “I'm sorry.”

He leered. “You know what says sorry, Dr. Kepner?”

“Wh—”

He slammed his hand against the wall by her ear. She flinched. “A prescription. Write it.”

“But—”

She cowered, and he liked it. The black, dark twist of hatred coiled in his gut. “I'm still your boss, you know. I could easily take this 'job opportunity' away again.”

“But—”

“Write it!” he yelled. The room vibrated with his anger.

She snapped into motion. Her fingers shook as she withdrew her prescription pad from her pocket and scribbled something illegible on it, but he knew what it would say by heart. Percocet. Take 1-2 every four to six hours as needed for pain. He'd been on the 7.5mg/325mg pill. She'd probably write for the standard 2.5mg pill, but he didn't care. He'd just take more. It's not like the instructions meant anything.

“I'm sorry, Dr. Shepherd,” Dr. Kepner said. “I'm so sorry. I didn't mean to get you shot.”

She ripped the prescription from her pad and foisted it at him. He took it. The paper crumpled as he clenched his fist. “Dr. Kepner, I don't really care what you meant or didn't mean,” he said, his tone low and hating.

“But—”
“You did this to me,” he said. Fury like driving jackhammer throbbed with his heart. He thrilled at her terror as he hovered in her space. Too close. Larger than her. Scary. “You made me this person.”

“But—”

“Get out,” he said.

“Dr. Shepherd, I really—”

He slammed the wall with the flat of his palm again. The shelves along the wall wobbled, and packets of sterile bandages fell to the floor. “Get. Out.”

She made a shivery, upset sound that delighted him. He didn't move despite his words, which forced her to duck underneath his arm to get away. The door closed behind her, and he listened to her frantic footsteps as she fled from him.

Quiet followed.

He stared at the paper in his hands, and all his wrath and desperation shriveled. His hands shook. Overwhelming relief made his eyes water, and he sobbed once, not from pain or fear, but because it was over. All of it was over. He would go to the pharmacy, fill his prescription, take his pills, and feel safe. Not whatever ephemeral semblance of security he flailed for out here. It would be a long, lasting safe that would suck him down and require no thinking or effort. No thinking at all. And she would be there. Mirror Meredith. He shifted on his feet.

“Yes,” said Mr. Clark, “do it. Succumb. Show me how worthless you are.”

Derek folded the prescription, put it in his breast pocket, and stepped into the hallway.

“Derek,” said Dr. Bailey as she approached. Blood covered her scrubs, and she looked exhausted. “I've been looking for you everywhere.”

Derek licked his lips. “I'm fine, Miranda,” he said.

She frowned at him. He watched her gaze trace his shoes to his face. “Really? Because you look terrible,” she replied.

He laughed, feeling lighter than he'd felt in weeks. “No, really,” he said, smiling. He winked at her. “I'm fine.”

“You're sure?” she said.

“Absolutely,” he said, and he kept walking, leaving her behind to stare or follow or... whatever she wanted. He didn't care because none of it mattered.

Amy, he'd said. You need to stop doing this. You told me—

This-is-th'last-time, she'd slurred. I swear.

He stopped dead in the bright hallway as he thought of the time, long ago, when he'd watched her ride off into the rain in a blue Firebird, stoned out of her mind. He'd gotten the bright idea, in his subsequent frustration, to chase after her on his Harley. In the pouring rain. In the dark. Without a helmet or protective gear. He'd been lucky to walk away from that bout of idiocy with a concussion and an impaled thigh, and he'd only been a helpless bystander to Amelia's downward spiral.
He clenched his fists. Sense and reason returned with the scream of skidding tires in his head.

What would happen to Meredith? Or Mark? Or any of the countless people who'd stepped up to the plate to keep this jagged rock bottom from cutting him open again? They were all his helpless bystanders.

Best case scenario, he'd be leaving the woman he loved to raise a child alone. Their child. A woman who had an abandonment complex bigger than four Mount Rainiers stacked end to end. His lip quivered as he thought of all the promises he'd made her.

I can't say it won't hurt, but you'll do great. And I'll be there the whole time.

That would be a lie if he choked right now. He pulled the prescription from his pocket and stared at it. At the siren call toward deliverance.

But I won't take it. I don't have any; I swear.

He blinked. That would be a lie, too. Revulsion washed over him when he realized what he'd done, and before he suffered another attack of morality decay in the wake of desperation, he ripped the sheet of paper into illegible smithereens and stuffed the confetti into the nearest trashcan. He'd nearly turned every good thing that had happened in the last thirty days into a giant fucking lie.

Nausea crashed into him like a wave. He'd probably just gotten himself fired, too. He'd practically assaulted a coworker. Threatened her. Extorted her. All for a fucking prescription. And he'd liked it. He'd liked watching her snivel and shake.

“I told you,” Mr. Clark said, a snarl in Derek’s ear. “You are a sick. Depraved. Fuck.”

Indecision tore at him. He didn't know what to do. Find April? Apologize? She'd probably run the other direction the second she saw him, and he couldn't blame her for it, either. He'd acted reprehensible.

He closed his eyes for a minute, thinking. Panicking, really. What was he supposed to do, now?

“Ticktock, ticktock,” said Mr. Clark. Then he laughed and hummed the Jeopardy theme.

Derek stood in the middle of the hallway, frozen in that moment of realization and irresolution. What the fuck had he done? And what, now? Autopilot kicked in when gibbering upset wouldn't let him think beyond the sinking pull of dread. Instinct and nothing else yanked him through the searing, bright halls.

He didn't knock. Dr. Wyatt looked up as he stepped inside her office. She sat at her desk in front of a leafy salad piled high on a ceramic plate. Clumps of drippy, dressing-covered lettuce fell from her fork. Her temples pulsed underneath her skin as she chewed. She took a long look at him, frowned, and glanced at her watch.

She swallowed her bite of salad. “Derek, you're early,” she said.

He stood in the center of the room, a lost, lonely island. “I'm sorry,” he said. Or croaked. He blinked, and the room in front of his eyelashes shimmered. “Is this a bad time?”

He closed his eyes. Please, please, don't be a bad time. He didn't know where else to go.

“I'm eating my lunch,” she said.
He swallowed. "I'm sorry," he said.

He blinked, and he lost it. All over again. All semblance of dignity and poise and everything that made him the smallest bit human.

"You're a weak, sniveling wreck," said Mr. Clark.

Derek tried to glance at his watch, but the wall of tears veiled the time. He couldn't see more than blurry, bright shapes. He didn't know why he bothered to look, anyway. Meredith might not even be in the building anymore, and if she was gone, she would have just finished a thirty-six hour shift. He couldn't heap all of this on top of her. Not today. Not after how much he'd leaned on her already this morning. But who else was there? Who else was there that he could share everything with? He didn't know.

He turned toward the door, adrift.

"No, no," Dr. Wyatt rushed to say. "Stay. We can do your session early. What did you want to talk about?"

He opened his mouth, but he couldn't speak. All he did was leak.

"Why don't you sit?" Dr. Wyatt prodded. She pointed toward her couch with her fork. She took another mouthful of lettuce and brushed a wave of graying hair behind her ear while she chewed.

He sat on her couch in her tiny, cheerful, orange office. The rainbow of fish swam back and forth, and the water in the tank burbled. The room smelled flowery. Everything seemed bright and warm and too much when he felt cold and awful in comparison.

He wiped his face with the backs of his shaky hands. His skin felt raw. "I just extorted a coworker for a Percocet prescription," he admitted. It felt good to admit. To spill himself on the table for her and let her figure out how to approach this nightmare. Tiredness made his head ache.

"You really fucked up, this time," Mr. Clark said.

Dr. Wyatt wiped her mouth with a paper napkin, and she left her half-eaten salad behind on the desk as she picked up her notepad and settled into the chair across from the couch. She regarded him for a long, discerning moment. "Did you fill the prescription?"

"I tore it up and threw it out."

"That's a good sign."

"Extortion is a good sign?" he said. "I'll probably get fired."

"You didn't take drugs," she countered. "You came here, instead."

"So?"

"Derek, if it were easy to overcome addiction there wouldn't be such vast resources dedicated to it. You might not have overcome addiction, yet, but you just won a serious battle."

"By extorting my coworker?" he said, incredulous.

She gave him a sheepish grin. "Well, no. But the extortion created several paths for you, and you chose one that didn't end inevitably with drug use. That's a start."
“That's not a start,” he said, vehemence shaking his tone. “What I did was disgusting.”

She nodded, deep understanding in her eyes. “You're an ethical person,” she said. “Addictions counteract ethics, and that can be upsetting. You're making progress, whether you believe it or not.”

He put his elbows on his knees and pressed his face into his hands. He pulled his fingers through his tangled hair. “I don't feel like I've fixed anything.”

“And maybe you haven't, yet, but you've got your toolbox and a blueprint,” she said. “That's much better than before.”

“Why does it feel like this, then?”

She gave him a wry look. “Ever heard the expression the cure is worse than the disease?”

She scribbled on her notepad. He let the sound of it soothe him. He rubbed the soft knees of his scrubs with his palms.

“I think I like hurting people,” he said.

He looked up at Dr. Wyatt, who stared back at him with an even gaze that didn't judge. She didn't recoil or tell him how twisted he was. She shifted in her chair, recrossed her legs, and motioned for him to give her more. “Why do you think that?” she prodded.

“I have dreams,” he said. He closed his eyes, and he wiped his face. His skin felt sticky from crying. Hot. “About killing, and...”

“And, now, this?” Dr. Wyatt said. “The extortion?”

He nodded.

“You threatened this coworker?”

I'm still your boss, you know, he'd said. I could easily take this 'job opportunity' away again.

He nodded again.

“What about Meredith?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He looked up. “What about her?”

“Do you think about hurting her?”

Revulsion coursed through him. “No, of course not.”

“What about me?”

“No...”

She raised her eyebrows. “Anybody else specific?”

He didn't speak.

“Who did you extort for the prescription?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He looked back at his knees. “Dr. Kepner.”
“How did you feel when you did it?”

He shrugged. “I don't know.”

“Liar,” said Mr. Clark. “You felt good. You wanted to watch her cry.”

Derek put his head in his hands. “I... liked it,” he said.

Dr. Wyatt regarded him for a long, quiet moment. “You've told me that Dr. Kepner was involved in your shooting, yes?” she said.

Dr. Shepherd! Thank god, you're back!

His hands shook. Why had he remembered that, now? After so many months? He'd had the flashback of his shooting so many times he couldn't count the instances anymore, but he'd never remembered that little piece. The part where he'd felt the bullet pierce him. It'd been a blank in his head, but now, when he thought about it, he could recall everything.

From the way his ears seemed to pop, to the muffled sounds in the shot's wake. He hadn't been able to understand what April had been saying. He'd always assumed it was just the confusion of the moment. Now, he realized the loud sound of gunfire had shocked his ears into momentary dysfunction. He remembered the feel of the bullet as it incinerated a path inside of him. Remembered the explosive bloom of pain under his left breast, like a hot poker had been rammed underneath his nipple until the burning end touched his spine.

“Derek?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He blinked, realizing he'd been sitting there, fingering the remnant of his wound for who knew how long. His chest twinged. “Yes,” he said. “She was there.”

“Was the shooting her fault?”

“No,” Derek said.

“That's right,” said Mr. Clark. “It was your fault.”

“You don't sound convinced about that,” Dr. Wyatt said.

Derek blinked. You did this to me, he'd told Dr. Kepner. You made me this person.

He swallowed.

“Do you blame her, Derek? It's okay if you do.”

Something cold constricted in his chest. He clenched his fists until his hands ached. He opened his mouth and only a hiss of air popped loose. He took a slow, deep breath. “I got him to lower his gun, and then she came,” he said.

Dr. Wyatt nodded. More scribbling. “So, you do blame her.”

“It's my fault he was at the hospital,” Derek said. “Not hers.”

“Is it?”

“He came for me.”
“And we've talked a lot about your feelings of guilt over the people who were killed while Mr. Clark was looking for you,” Dr. Wyatt replied. “But what about you? What about when you got shot? You said you got Mr. Clark to lower his weapon.”

“I did,” Derek said. He ran his hands through his hair, agitated. “I never remembered the rest before...”

“But, now, you do?”

He shook his head as the moment replayed in his head, Dr. Shepherd! Thank god, you're back! “She ran up behind me while I was talking to a man holding a gun. What person does that? Why did she...?”

He blinked tears as he felt the bullet ram into him. Again, again, again. A burning echo. It hurt. It hurt so much, and he'd always thought Mr. Clark would have done it, regardless, because he'd been hellbent on exacting his judgments, but there'd been a moment when he hadn't been hellbent at all, and the ceasefire hadn't been broken by Derek.

_You stood up to him_, Meredith had said as though it were some sort of definitive thing. _You were brave. You got him to lower his gun_. As if it hadn't been a glitch on the way to bone-shattering inevitability. _I watched, Derek. I saw that._

He hadn't understood why Meredith would fixate on that moment, before. Now, he realized she'd watched April throw a grenade without the pin on a situation he'd almost had under control. The idea that he hadn't caused these crushing months of misery for himself with his own cowardice... Something lightened inside. Something small, but noticeable.

_Not your fault_, a hesitant voice said in his head. Not Gary Clark's rough growl. Something softer and forgiving. Perhaps his Mirror Meredith, giving him a respite. He didn't know. He rocked in his chair as unbearable despair became something... less. Not gone. Not hardly. But less. Like an ache had receded that he'd suffered for so long that he'd forgotten what it felt like to live without it. The absence allowed him to breathe through his discomfort instead of be squished by it, and it felt...

Better.

He wiped his eyes. He realized he wanted to ask Meredith about what she'd seen when he'd been shot. She'd asked him once what he remembered. He'd never asked her about her experience. Was there more he didn't remember? Some other set of dots he'd connected wrong because his head was a mess?

Maybe. Maybe not. But he wanted to know her version of events.

“Let's go back to the dreams you mentioned,” Dr. Wyatt said, her soft voice interrupting the watercolor memories blotched before his eyes. “Tell me about them.”

_I'm going to snap your fucking neck._

Derek shuddered as he remembered his hands. Squeezing.

“I dream about killing Mr. Clark,” he said. “I try to strangle him. Then I take his gun, and I shoot him.”

“Is there anybody else in this dream when you kill?”

Lawyers. At the beginning, there'd been lawyers. _So, she was alive, until you withdrew care, until_ you pulled the plug, one of them had said when he'd tried to explain. But then he'd leaped across the table at Mr. Clark, and everybody in the room had faded away like dispersing mist. There'd been only Derek and Mr. Clark, interlocked in a vicious, violent, bloody struggle. One that always ended with Derek staring down at Mr. Clark as Mr. Clark's life bled away on the catwalk. Alone.

“Not when I kill,” Derek said.

“Ever?” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

“No.”

“So, the only two people in this hemisphere of desired harm were involved with your shooting,” she replied.

He shrugged. “I guess.”

“Why do you guess and not know?”

“What if there's somebody else, and I just haven't run across him?” Derek frowned. “Her. Them. I don't know.”

“Somebody else you want to hurt?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Yes.”

“I don't know.”

He glowered. “What do you mean, you don't know?”

She shrugged as if his worries didn't matter. “I mean I don't know what would happen if there's somebody else, but I think, based on your established pattern, that it's pretty safe to assume there's nobody else until there's somebody else. I don't think extrapolation is warranted here.”

“Why?” he demanded. “I dreamed about shooting somebody, and then I threatened a coworker.”

She leaned back in her chair. The wood creaked, and the cushion rustled. She tapped her pen on her notepad. “Derek, do you understand what targeted violence is?”

“I don't understand any of this,” he said, a sick feeling coiling in his stomach.

“It's the ultimate power exchange,” she said. “There's a winner and a loser. It's easy to feel mighty when your opponent is at your mercy.”

“You're saying I want to feel powerful?”

“I'm saying there are two people in this world who we know engendered deep, unshakeable feelings of helplessness and horror for you, feelings so unshakeable they caused you to develop a mental illness, and I don't think your reaction to either Gary Clark or Dr. Kepner has anything to do with loving violence,” she said.

“What does it have to do with, then?”

She leaned toward him. “What do you think it has to do with?” she asked.

“Taking control?” he hazarded.
“Of a sort,” she said with a nod. “I’d imagine enduring severe trauma is a bit like being stripped against your will. It can be dehumanizing, terrifying. I think of the actions you’ve described to me as an attempt at reestablishing a sense of self. Sort of... resetting the balance of power within yourself to a level you feel capable of enduring.”

He shook his head despite the hope welling in his gut. You're not a sadist, Meredith had said, and now, despite what he'd done, a second source, a more impartial one, seemed to be agreeing. He rocked in his seat at the twisting uncertainty. “I don't want to reestablish anything,” he said, blinking back tears he couldn't help. “I want to make all of this stop. I want to make the dreams stop. I don't kill people. I'm a doctor to save people.”

Dr. Wyatt smiled. “Well, that's the good news.”

“What’s even remotely good about this?”

“Consciously or subconsciously, you're reaching for equilibrium right now. One of the people who took your control away is dead. You can't reset the balance of power anywhere but in your subconscious, so, you dream. One is living, and you interacted with her in a way that set you up as the superior in the situation.”

“How the hell is that good?”

“I think these sessions will help you, in the long run, with finding a healthier outlet for all these feelings you have,” she said. “We can redirect your reaching for balance and control to somewhere more socially appropriate.”

He rubbed the bridge of his nose. It was a little too late for that, now that he'd done something so socially inappropriate he could get fired. “When?” he said. Painful breaths chuffed in his chest as he squeezed his fingers. “Soon?”

“I'd be lying if I tried to give you any specific answer,” she replied.

He put his head in his hands.

“Let's start with a little exercise,” she said. “I want you to start thinking about things in terms of what you're deciding for yourself.”

He rubbed his face. “What do you mean?”

“Have you been to lunch, yet?” she said.

He frowned. What did lunch have to do with anything? “No...” he said.

“When you go, and you pick what you're going to eat, I want you to tell yourself what you picked and why you picked it, and I want you to jot it down.”

His frowned deepened. “That's...”

“I know it sounds really silly, but it does add up,” she said. “When you go home today, I want you to tell yourself why you're choosing to leave work at that moment. Jot it down. When you change into your PJs, maybe stop and ask yourself why you picked those PJs. Jot that down.”

“But that's...”

“By drawing attention to the choices you make, even the small ones, you're going to start realizing exactly how much power you do still have over your own life,” she said. “I mean, why did you come here early today?”

“I needed to talk to someone.”

“Why not Meredith?”

He shook his head. “I don’t...” he began, unable to finish.

He'd gotten used to this, he realized. Having Dr. Wyatt as a sounding board. A woman who was compensated monetarily to help him sort things out. He felt a lot less like he was unfairly burdening her than he did with Meredith, who, though she never said a word to the contrary, never told him to shut up or go away when he needed somebody, even at her own expense, had grown more and more tired of entertaining his insecurities as the weeks had dragged onward. Her slipping patience with him that morning when he'd been less than articulate only confirmed the heaps of strain he'd piled onto their relationship.

“It's okay if you don't know why,” Dr. Wyatt said with a warm smile, misinterpreting his churning silence. “What's important is that you realize you made a choice to come here.”

“I... did.”

She nodded. “You definitely did,” she said. “You make a lot of choices. Every day. I want you to start tabulating them. Just for a few days, until you're thinking about the choices you make by rote.”

“Okay.”

She smiled at him, her gaze bright, encouraging. “We'll get there, Derek. I don't know when, but we will. Okay?”

“Okay,” he said.

Dr. Wyatt glanced at her watch. “Unless you want to talk about something else, I think that's a good stopping point for today. Do you agree?”

He nodded mutely.

“How do I get you to work on my lunch before it gets too soggy.” She returned to her desk and picked at what was left of her salad, leaving him be to think and reassemble without scrutiny.

He stared at his knees, trying to gather the flayed remnants of all his thoughts. A tired headache had flared behind his eyes, throbbing, crushing. He didn't have any idea what he would do if Dr. Kepner filed a complaint with HR. He wasn't sure how he'd get through the rest of the workday, or how he would even begin to function socially at Joe's that night. He didn't know how he'd tell Meredith what he'd done that day, either. How close he'd come, but he needed to. He needed to tell her, if only to preserve the trust he was trying so hard to rebuild in the wake of squandering it.

He rubbed the remnant of his bullet wound through his lab coat and scrubs.

_Not your fault_, the small voice whispered again.

With his unlocked memories, a small piece of chaos in the disorder had corrected itself, at least. He wiped his irritated eyes, trying to compose himself enough to leave Dr. Wyatt's office and go to lunch. Not my fault, he thought, echoing, testing out the words with his own voice and timbre as he remembered the bullet cleaving his insides. He would take it, he decided. The hope. He wanted it. Wanted to keep it. A small piece of hope that things were getting better despite how horrible he felt. Even a small piece of hope was a lot more than he'd had before, and Mr. Clark, for once, said nothing.

Not your fault, the little voice repeated in Mr. Clark's absence, and Derek listened.
Chapter 22

Derek had been living the last few hours in a shocked daze, drifting from one moment to the next without plan or forethought. He’d ended up in the cafeteria after his session with Dr. Wyatt, and he’d eaten alone at a small table in the farthest corner, seeing, hearing, but not really watching or listening. Eyes had been focused on him everywhere, but he’d been almost too numb to care. He’d had no plans about how to take his life back or to fix his fracturing future as a doctor or a husband or a father or anything. Plans required thinking, and... he couldn't really do that, yet. Couldn't think. He could only exist, pulled forward by a morsel of hope.

He wasn’t looking for April when he found her. By nothing more than cruel happenstance, he saw her in the bright hallway outside the cafeteria, first in haggard profile as she rounded the corner, and then face-to-face. Sunlight slanting through the windows made the ragged chunks of brown hair that had fallen down around her eyes shine. Deep, irritated red blotched her cheeks. Puffy skin hugged her bloodshot eyes, which widened as she caught sight of him. She stopped in her tracks. A moment passed in which she didn't move. Didn't breathe. Didn't speak. Then she turned on her heels and darted around the corner from which she'd first appeared.

A jagged spear of guilt stabbed him underneath the ribs. He’d done that. Made her cry. Him. He took one step, two steps, and then aimless ambling became a pointed jog. He didn't have any plans or answers, but he did need to do one thing. Apologize.

He rounded the corner and called after her retreating figure, “Dr. Kepner, wait.” He hadn't said much to anybody since leaving Dr. Wyatt's office, and the words stumbled from his throat, cracked and broken and dry. A soft request, not a command. April didn't stop. He cleared his throat, and tried again. “Please, wait,” he said, stronger, more hoping.

She stopped and sighed, a huffy, displeased sound, and then she turned to face him. She wiped her wet eyes, ruining the effect of her angry glare with her distress. “What do you want?” she said, her tone petulant.

They were alone in the short hallway. An empty, discarded gurney kept them separated. Her bloodshot gaze pierced him, and a quiver of nerves took residence in his gut. He had no plan. No answers. But remembering every word he'd said to her, how he'd threatened her, nauseated him. Disgusted him. He swallowed.

“I want to apologize for earlier,” he said. He took a breath. “I'm deeply, truly sorry for what I said, and for the position I put you in. I didn’t fill the script. I tore it up. I'm sorry.”

Her gaze didn't flicker or soften. “You meant it all,” she accused. “What you said to me. Didn’t you?”

“You did this to me,” he'd said. “You got me shot.”

He looked at his feet as vicious memories tumbled around in his head. Of Mr. Clark lowering his gun, and then of April jogging toward Derek like it was any other day, and there wasn't a man standing with a loaded firearm only feet away. Of the white ceiling rushing over Derek's field of view as he fell backward. Derek's lip quivered as, in his head, he hit the ground on the catwalk, shot and bleeding. He forced himself to take a long breath to save himself from losing his barely-managed composure.

“Do you blame her, Derek?” Dr. Wyatt had said. “It's okay if you do.”
“I’m... deeply sorry for saying it,” was all he could muster, his voice shaky and low and barely there. “My behavior was despicable.”

He couldn’t lie, even with her glaring at him, even knowing false words of repentance might mean he wouldn’t lose his job. He was sorry for what he’d said. Deeply. And he was sorry he’d threatened her. And sorry he’d let himself lose his figurative head so horrifically. But he’d meant every cold, hating word, and white lying himself out of the situation felt more wrong than saying those things in the first place.

A long silence followed. She sniffed, and nodded. To him or to herself, he didn’t know. Then her silence became blubbering.

“I didn’t mean for any of it to happen. I swear, I didn’t mean it,” she wailed, and he felt nothing. No sympathy. No relief that she suffered. Nothing but emptiness. “I saw my friend with her brains splattered on the floor that morning, and I... The whole day was scrambled. I never meant for you to be hurt. I lo—” Her words cut off abruptly, and her eyes widened, as if she’d almost let something slip that she didn’t want to say. She cleared her throat, almost choking on the gesture as she wiped her eyes once more. “I mean I’ve always been grateful to you for giving me a second chance.”

Derek shifted from foot to foot as his gut churned. She was fishing for something he couldn’t hope to offer right now, and the longer he spoke to her, the more he regretted approaching her without a plan or a clear head. Without anything other than the intrinsic knowledge that he needed to apologize.

“I know you didn’t mean it,” Derek said, “but I...” Can’t. Can’t forgive. He couldn’t say can’t. He got stuck on the word.

“You can’t do anything,” Mr. Clark said, a whisper in the din.

Derek was so sick of not being able to do things, and he couldn’t say the word to this woman who’d nearly gotten him killed and caused a whole mountain of can’ts. A better person would forgive, he knew, but he was apparently shit, and he couldn’t stop watching the white ceiling spill over his head as he tumbled backward. Couldn’t stop feeling the bullet cleave his chest with an incinerating blade of pain. All because of her blithe moment of negligence. Negligence with his life.

April blurred, and he clenched his teeth, blinking. He would not lose his composure in front of her. Not again.

“I’m sorry for what I said,” was all he could say, almost a whisper.

April bristled. “You said that already,” she snapped. “So, you won’t forgive me, but you expect me to forgive you?”

This was going horribly.

“What did you expect?” said Mr. Clark.

Derek swallowed as he shook his head. “I don’t expect anything,” he said, meaning it. Go. Get out. Everything in his body was screaming at him to remove himself from this conversation before he did something else he’d regret. “I just wanted you to know that I’m deeply sorry, and that you don’t have to worry about... your job.”

He didn’t give her a chance to reply. He turned on his heels and fled back the way he’d come.
“So, what is that?” Mark said.

The loud intrusion tore Derek from his troubled musing. He blinked as the sounds of the dim, noisy bar pressed against him. Voices. The crack of pool balls striking each other like distant gunfire in the back room where the pool tables were. Glasses clinking. Joe shuffling behind the counter of the bar. And Meredith.

Meredith was laughing again, a bright, cheerful, warm sound that reminded him of bells or birds or birds and bells all at once. The warm, recognizable timbre of her pleasure slid down his spine like she'd run her hand along his back, and his tense muscles loosened. She sat across the room with Alex, Cristina, and Lexie. Between them rested two beers, a fizzing soda, and something clear with a lemon garnish. Water, perhaps.

Alex said something Derek couldn't hear. Cristina made a face, Lexie blushed beet red, and Meredith smiled in that cute, coy way she did, with her incisors nipping into her pink, plush lower lip. She had a lot of different smiles. That one in particular, radiant and shy at the same time, warmed him. He didn't see it often enough anymore, and he found himself tempted to stare, except she was sitting in profile with her friends on the opposite side of the bar. All she had to do was turn her head, and she would see him staring, and he didn't want to intrude on her fun.

“What is what?” Derek said absently.

Mark pointed to the small spiral notebook Derek had procured earlier that day from the hospital gift shop after his horrific collision with April. Derek's fingers clenched around his pen reflexively at the scrutiny. The notebook, which had a dark blue cover, was the size of his palm, and he'd already filled the first several pages with his slipshod scrawl.

1. Ate an apple for lunch – easy to digest.
2. Apologized to April – right thing to do.
3. Found Miranda – wanted busywork.
4. Napped in Mark's office – tired, needed to wait anyway.
5. Came inside the bar –
6. Waited to tell Meredith the truth –
7. Ordered water, no lemon –

“That,” Mark said, frowning. “Please, don't tell me you've gone all Anne Frank on me.”

“It's not a diary,” Derek said. “It sure looks like a diary to me.”

“Nothing,” Mark said with a shrug. His gaze creased as his serious look deepened into a frown again. “It's just... not something a man does at a bar.”

Derek glared. “What the hell is it to you if I want to write a diary, anyway?”

Derek sighed as he stared at the notebook resting between his palms. Off in his own head space, he'd been playing catch up on his assignment for the last fifteen minutes, but he still had three choices listed with no reasons. Mark's scrutiny made it difficult to think, and all the noise made it hard to think, and everything made it so fucking hard to think, and worse, Mark was sort of right.

Keeping a list like this was definitely not something a normal man did at a bar with his friends, but Derek was so desperate for something to work to counter his heaping plate of mental spaghetti that he thought he might consider donning a hula skirt and dancing on the table with a ukelele if Dr. Wyatt thought it would fucking help. Something had to help. Well, maybe not a hula skirt. But the ukelele... He imagined it would be similar to a guitar, at least.

The black gel pen he'd been using slipped from his grip and rolled an inch as he pushed the small pad of paper idly between his hands, back and forth across the smooth, polished surface. They'd ordered drinks from one of the wandering waitresses, but the drinks hadn't arrived yet, leaving lots of space on the lacquered wooden table for embarrassed, diversionary ping-pong. Mark's gaze darted back and forth, following the offending object.

Not normal.

A familiar, coiling snarl gathered in Derek's head. Not normal. “You're not—”

“It's homework,” Derek admitted before his thoughts could take a bad turn.

Mark's eyebrows raised. “Homework?”

“It's for Dr. Wyatt.”

“Dr. Wyatt wants you to write a diary?” Mark replied, a teasing smirk on his face.

“It's not a fucking diary, Mark.”

“You're writing your intimate, innermost feelings about what you had for lunch on it.”

Derek snorted as Mark drew his attention to the first item on the list, the apple for lunch. “You know, that explains a lot about you,” Derek said, a weak, wry grin slanting his lips.

“What does?” Mark said.

“The fact that you think what you had for lunch is diary material.”

“Oh? What exactly does it explain about me?”

Derek shrugged. “I think people usually save their diaries for more weighty things.”

“What exactly are you getting at?” Mark demanded.

Derek shrugged again, unable to keep the smirk off his face.

Mark's eyebrows raised as the pieces connected. “Are you implying I'm emotionally stunted?” he said, his tone incredulous.

A helter-skelter, scruffy group of four filed into the bar and sat at an adjacent table between Mark and Derek's table and the bar. One of the four was tall. Like six-foot-five, and bulky like a body-builder. He wore a scuffed leather biker jacket and he looked... dangerous. All four of them looked dangerous. The big one could probably crack Mark like an egg. Derek would be an afterthought in the omelet of pain.

Derek inched backward in his seat. The big man blocked Derek's line of sight to Meredith and her friends. An unsettled feeling crept along Derek's spine.
God, the room was so fucking crowded, stuffed full of shoulder-to-shoulder people looking for cheap beer and peanuts after a long day at work. All the social bombardment made Derek's ears itch with every sound, and he couldn't relax or sit still in his seat. Derek hoped happy hour would end soon, perhaps driving the bar back to a more tolerable level of occupancy.

The walls closed in, and Derek's shoulders hunched defensively.

The four dubious intruders wheeled their stools around to face the television over the bar, which was muted, but showed the Yankees slowly destroying the Mariners at Yankee Stadium. A fly ball popped up and was caught, resulting in an out against the Yankees, and the group of four clapped with bland enthusiasm, having only just tuned in. Mariners fans, then, Derek guessed. With their backs to him, he didn't feel quite as threatened, and he forced himself to look at Mark, to try and function despite the coil of nerves fluttering inside his gut.

“Wh...” he tried, but his voice faltered, and he swallowed.

Mark watched him, his incredulous look shifting to concerned.

Derek had gotten good at making himself deal with small social situations. One-on-one interaction. One-on-two. Even one-on-three or one-on-four. He could usually even pretend to be fine even when he wasn't. But this whole bar thing was more than a challenge. To a small degree, it hurt.

Derek rubbed the bridge of his nose with his shaky fingers. He rolled his shoulders to loosen up. “I'm sorry, what?” Derek said, his voice soft as he tried to force himself beyond his tremble-y, easily distracted weakness.

If Mark felt any irritation at Derek's space-out session, he didn't show it. “I said, are you saying I'm emotionally stunted?” Mark repeated, his tone innocuous, but something sharper hovered in his gaze.

For a moment, Derek couldn't remember what they'd been talking about. He blinked. He'd been joking, really, but Mark didn't seem amused. At all. A small caution flag waved in the back of Derek's mind, but he shoved it away. He and Mark always teased and needled each other. This was no different.

Derek gave Mark a wary grin. “I might be,” Derek said.

Mark laughed, but the sound wasn't a happy one. “Coming from you, that's kind of ironic.”

The last of Derek's cautious grin faded. He frowned. “How is that ironic?”

“Well, who's seeing a shrink?” Mark said.

Derek prickled. The big man in the biker jacket shifted on his stool, his leather coat creaking. There was a bulge in the rear pocket of the man's leather pants. Probably keys or... could be a weapon or... Derek shied backward another inch, his hands gripping the sides of the table as though it were his life preserver.

“And who stole whose wife?” Derek snapped.

Mark's wounded expression lashed Derek like a knife. Derek closed his eyes for a moment and took slow, deep breaths. He had to stop doing this. Letting his temper take him by the reins whenever he felt terrified. He was scared all the time, and it'd turned him into a nasty, despicable person. He'd come to Joe's to try and remember how to socialize. Not fight with his friend over a necrotic, beat-to-shit horse that would never heal.
Mark stared, silent, his expression unreadable for moment after passing moment. The group of four at the table next to them jeered at the television. “Low blow,” Mark said darkly, his gaze darker.

Derek's nerves fluttered as he tried to resist the billion different pulls on his injured attention span. The television. The dangerous people less than two strides away. All the noise. Mark. He would look at Mark. The person with whom Derek was trying to have a discussion. He wouldn't be frightened, and he wouldn't lash out like an ass. They could talk.

“So was yours,” Derek countered, forcing civility into his tone.

“Yours was lower,” Mark said.

Derek sighed. “Dr. Wyatt is helping me.”

“And I've apologized for the thing with Addison a thousand times.”

Derek glowered. “An apology doesn't make it go away.”

“And the reason you're seeing the shrink doesn't mean you're less emotionally stunted,” Mark said. He fiddled with an empty coaster, staring at his fingers like he was performing complicated, pinpoint surgery on a phantom only he could see. “Just... you know.” Mark shrugged and didn't look up, uncharacteristically cowed and quiet as his focus intensified on the coaster. “It's about different things.”

“What, my coping skills blow, and you stab your friends in the back with a ten-blade when they least expect it?” Derek said, incredulity dripping from his tone.

Mark wouldn't stop playing with the coaster. Wouldn't look up. His shoulders slumped, and he didn't speak, and Derek had no idea what to do or how to handle this situation. He hadn't wanted to have this fight again. Except the whole fucking disaster was like a bug bite on Derek's brain. Whenever he scratched, it itched more.

“You hurt me, Mark,” Derek said, not sure what else to say.

“I know I did,” Mark said. He swallowed. “But that doesn't give you the right to keep making me pay.”

“I’m not making you pay anymore,” Derek countered. “That doesn't mean you can cancel your fucking debts like it's bankruptcy court.” He ground his teeth together. This was edging away from civil.

“I loved her.”

Derek sighed. “You just don't get it, do you? It was never about Addison; it was about me.”

Mark slapped the coaster on the table. When he looked up, his melancholic expression had sharpened into something more volatile. Something angry. Churning. “That's all it's ever about. You.”

“What are you talking about?”

“You, Derek,” Mark said. “You ride around on your moral high horse like the fucking King of the Universe, judging everybody.”

Derek blinked.
You're not my dad, and you're not my doctor. Stay the fuck away from me. You don't understand anything, Derek.

Amy had said that to him, moments before running out into the pouring rain and getting into a car with her drunk friends. He'd pulled the tarp off his bike and gotten on without a helmet. He'd chased after her. He'd woken up with his bloody face jammed against the rough pavement, alone, shivering, wet, and stuck.

I'm done, he'd said after she'd overdosed a year later. She'd been propped up in her hospital bed, pale and almost lifeless. She had been lifeless, earlier. Amy, I won't do this with you, anymore.

Her eyes had been wet. She'd blinked. I never asked you to, she'd said, her voice bitter as she'd glared.

You're going to die if you keep this up, he'd said, trying to keep his voice cold. You're a liar, and an addict, and you're wasting your life.

And then he'd left her. He'd shut the door behind him before she could respond. It'd been one of the easiest and hardest things he'd ever done.

The group of four at the adjacent table broke into cheers, and Derek glanced wildly at the television. Loaded bases unloaded. Mariners gained four runs in a single at-bat. He dropped his head into his hands, rubbing the bridge of his nose. There was so much noise.

“I do not,” Derek said, his voice tired. But he was such a liar. He did. He did judge. All the time.

“You do, too,” Mark said, echoing Derek's inner thoughts. “Except, now, you don't even have a fucking high horse anymore, and you're still doing it.”

Derek couldn't speak.

“We all do stupid shit, Derek,” Mark snapped, “but in case you haven't noticed, I'm still here trying to help, despite all your unbelievable fuckery. And you? You always leave. So, who exactly are you trying to call emotionally stunted?”

Hypocrite. Hypocrite.

“You're a fucking hypocrite,” Mr. Clark snarled in his ears, and Derek closed his eyes, trying to shut the words out as his throat closed up.

“Fucking hypocrite,” Mark snapped like an echo. His stool squawked in protest as he pushed it backward along the wood floor and rose to his daunting, full height. He made a scathing visual appraisal of the table and of Derek, and he scoffed before he turned away, grabbing his wind breaker from the pile of their coats on the adjacent stool.

Do you hit all your patients? Derek had asked.

Derek swallowed. “I'm sorry,” he said, feeling nauseous.

Mark froze.

Derek's hands shook. “You've helped me a lot, too, and I'm sorry. Thank...” He took a deep, cleansing breath. “Thank you.” He'd never said thank you. He'd meant to, but he hadn't. So many times.
Bewilderment replaced fury. Mark stared, and Derek couldn't take the scrutiny, or the revelation of his own poor character. Derek had said thank you, and Mark looked like he'd been presented with some sort of miracle. Water into wine, or the parting seas before his feet, or some other impossibility. That wasn't the sort of reaction that was easy to see.

Derek looked at his lap. “You and Meredith have both stayed, and I...” Don't know why I deserve it, he didn't say.

“You don't deserve it,” said Mr. Clark.

“Thank you,” Derek said, choking hoarsely.

A rustle filled the space between them as Mark replaced his windbreaker and sat gracelessly on the stool he'd vacated moments earlier. He scooted back into his seat. He cleared his throat. “Whatever, man. It's not a big deal,” he said, sounding as awkward and uncomfortable as Derek felt.

Except it was a big deal. Mark had been there from the start of this whole pile of shit. Not necessarily vocal about it – quiet – but he'd been there.

He'd brought his PS3 and hooked it up to the television so Derek would have something to do at the house while he was healing. Mark had helped Meredith carry that hulking chair up the stairs to the bedroom, back when Derek had needed to sleep in a chair for part of the night. Mark had also helped her get Derek himself up the stairs after the return trip from Seattle Presbyterian, when Derek had been too shaky and sick and tired to walk more than a few feet, let alone climb steps. Mark had rearranged his entire schedule so that Derek would have somebody at home those first few weeks after the shooting, once Meredith had run out of leave. Mark had been there when Derek had been kicking the Percocet, too, doing things even a paid nurse might wince over, like cleaning up all the vomit and holding up a grown man in the shower. And then there was today. Mark had pushed him to do something social, and though it felt horrible, Derek was smart enough to realize it might be best for him in the long run. Just like he was trying to push through the badness at work, he could push through the devastated wasteland of his social life. Maybe, salvage something and start enjoying it again. Find some level of normalcy somewhere.

Mark was drunk as a fucking skunk. His little car slammed into the barrier and caught fire. His thumbs jammed on his controller, and the clicks and clacks echoed over the roaring sound of engines and goofy music.

Derek blinked at the assault of color and sound. The drugs made all of the sensory bloom so hard to process. He swallowed, putting his controller down, his hands shaking. His car rolled to a stop while Mark fumbled through another lap with his own damaged vehicle. The lower part of the screen flashed some sort of message at Derek. Probably something like, “Press A to move your car forward, you dumb fuck.” But Derek couldn't read because everything was spinning.

When Mark noticed Derek wasn't participating, he pressed pause and looked at Derek, his gaze bright, his face flushed. “What'samatter?” he slurred.

The blankets rustled as Derek struggled to stand. He was so exhausted, the mere act of putting weight on his feet sucked all of his willpower away, and he stood by the couch, in the center of the room, swaying. The backs of his knees pressed against the cushions and threatened to buckle. His battered chest ached with every inhalation. The fullness in his bladder urged him onward, but the bathroom was... really far away.
Mark lumbered oafishly to his feet.

“I'm fine,” Derek snapped, his voice hoarse. He looked toward the hallway forlornly. He'd barely made it to the couch from the bathroom with Meredith helping. He was so fucking tired of being helped.

Mark shuffled next to Derek and put an arm around Derek’s waist. “Bathrum?” he said.

“You're drunk,” Derek replied.

“And you’re shh... shtoned. We’ll be a shh... shircus act.”

Derek closed his eyes. He shifted one foot forward. Every muscle wailed. The room spun around his head. The bathroom was so far. “I can't,” he whispered, an echo of hours earlier, when he'd been hanging off the towel rack, an inch away from collapsing because he'd had nothing left inside. His eyes burned. He didn't think he could bear another accident. But he didn't think he could walk by himself, either. A lump formed in his throat, raw and hurting.

“Wanna glass?” Mark said, a loud breath more than speech, by Derek's ear.

“I'm not going to pee in a fucking cup!” Derek snapped as his face turned blistering red and his eyes spilled. He wiped the mess away with the backs of his palms. He was such a fucking piece of shit.

The hand at Derek's back pressed into him, urging him forward. “Then move,” Mark said.

“I can't,” Derek said, almost a growl. He hurt. “I can't do this. I'm tired.”

Mark moved instead. A wobbly step. The momentum pulled Derek forward. Derek gasped, and he clawed for Mark's shoulders. Mark said nothing. They rested.

“Move,” Mark commanded after a moment. They shuffled forward a step. The loose bedding and blankets fell away like gnarled vines slipping free. Derek rested, his fingers clutching tents of Mark’s shirt as though he thought them a life preserver. “Another,” Mark said, and they moved again. Again. Shuffling. Sliding. Swaying.

By the time they made it to the hallway, sweat slicked Derek's brow, and breathing wrought columns of fire in his chest. But he'd made it. He rested by the doorframe, panting. Mark grinned sloppily at Derek and smacked him on the shoulder.

“Thanksh, man,” Mark slurred. He grabbed the other side of the door frame and swung a drunken loop-de-loop around the frame, hanging by his extended arm, and slingshotted inside. Derek gaped as Mark shut the door. “Didn't think I could make it,” said Mark's rumbling, slurred voice through the door. “I'm fucking... dru... drunk.”

A familiar liquid sound filled the silence.

Derek pressed his forehead against the wall as he tried to catch his breath. A bead of sweat slipped down the tip of his nose. His limbs shook. He thought he might have to sit down or fall down. Or possibly throw up from exertion. For now, he leaned. A small smile tugged at his lips.

Derek looked down at his list of choices as all his memories of Mark whirled in his head.

I'm sure that looked ridiculous, Derek had said after waddling like a duck to get into Mark’s Mustang without hurting himself.
I'm sure I don't care, Mark had replied. Always there. Supporting.

Derek took a deep breath, eyes closed as he listened to the bedlam of the bar. People. Everywhere. Talking, drinking, playing. The Mariners fans at the next table whooped again with glee, but Derek watched Mark, who sat across the table from him, eyes averted, fiddling with his coaster again. Mark didn't do emotional talks like this. Certainly not prolonged ones. Mark was Mark. But he was the best friend Derek had ever had beside Meredith.

Derek stroked the small notebook with his index finger. “I'm recording my choices,” he said.

“More of a ledger.”

“A diary ledger.”

Derek rolled his eyes. “Fine, it's a diary ledger,” he said. “Whatever you want to call it.”

“So, what's it for?” Mark said.

“To help me.”

“Help you, how?”

Derek shrugged as he stared at his list, which was still left with three empty reasons. Why he'd come here. Why he'd chosen to lie to Meredith for a few hours despite the trust he was trying so hard to reestablish with her. Why he'd ordered a damned water without a lemon.

Derek walked into the bar with Mark around 5:30, right in the middle of happy hour. Or, well, stumbled. Stumbled in and stopped on the well-trodden welcome mat like a fucking idiot statue. The heavy press of bodies, the endless pulse of noise, and the frenetic activity hit Derek like he'd run smack into a wall. Mark plowed into Derek's back, and Derek's throat closed up as the jolt pressed him inches closer to the chaos. He barely caught himself from toppling to the ground, and the impulse to flee sank into every tendon he possessed.

His heart throbbed in his ears.

“Are you all right, man?” Mark said as though his voice were floating through a tunnel in Derek's general direction, echoing and distant. A strong hand clamped on Derek's shoulder.

“I can't,” Derek said, his voice hoarse, and he turned. A boisterous patron wandered past with a foaming pitcher of beer, his trajectory pointing him toward a crowded table full of chattering men and women Derek vaguely recognized from the hospital. The beer carrier bumped into Derek as he passed. A small slosh of alcohol dripped on Derek's shirt. Derek barely heard the apology despite how loudly it was uttered.

Derek curled away instinctively. “I'm sorry, I can't,” he said, his words breathy and barely there. “I can't do this. I can't.”

“It's okay, man,” said tunnel Mark. “You tried.”

Derek couldn't. Couldn't socialize like this. Not after the day he'd had. A craving crushed his healing heart, it was so intense and overwhelming. He panted. Percocet would make this better. He wouldn't be so anxious. He—
The hairs on the nape of his neck crackled with a peculiar sensation, and then her laugh cut through the terrifying din. He halted at the threshold, and Mark ran into him again with a curse, but Derek barely heard the foul word. His thoughts focused pinpoint on that sound. That laugh. He didn't hear that sound enough anymore. White-knuckled, he gripped the doorframe and looked for her.

Meredith sat at the back of the bar with her friends, her face flushed and happy and truly carefree for the first time in... what felt like years, and just the sight of her so relaxed helped him relax. Just a little. She laughed again at something somebody had said. Her eyes scanned the crowded room. And then her gaze stopped dead on him.

She blinked as if to double check reality. Incredulity spread across her face. Her eyes widened. Her lips parted. In that moment, witness to her shock, all of Derek's paranoid suspicions about her joining forces with Mark in an effort to get Derek out of the house died. This had been Mark's idea, and Mark's alone.

Derek watched her body twitch, but she didn't move from her seat, like she wanted to come over and say hi to him, but she couldn't bear to draw attention to the enormity of the moment and have him chicken out and leave as a result. The fact that the moment was enormous at all – Derek walks into a bar, breaking news at eleven! – started the slow creep of embarrassed flush across his face, a reddening in his cheeks that had nothing to do with alcohol.

She would move, he realized. If he turned on his heels and ran out like a pathetic idiot, now that she'd noticed his presence, she would chase after him to make sure he was okay. She would ditch her friends, because he'd had a terrible day, and she'd left him on a precarious note that morning. She'd left him on a precarious note, but had still felt okay enough to go out with her friends instead of wait at home for him. Probably because he hadn't called to tell her how much worse everything had gotten, and she'd convinced herself that radio silence was a good thing. For the first time since he'd been shot, she'd let herself be optimistic about his well-being, sight unseen. She hadn't needed to press her ear against his chest and listen to him breathe. Hadn't needed to touch him to confirm life. He hadn't called, and she'd assumed things were okay. If he walked out, now, all that self-convincing on her part would undo itself in an eye blink, and worse, would probably guarantee she'd be less adventurous for quite some time to come, and he couldn't bear that. Not after seeing that beautiful smile.

He swallowed. Lack of movement made him tremble, and he felt light-headed. Nausea coiled in his stomach.

“Derek?” Mark prodded.

“Can we find someplace in the corner out of the way?” Derek said, barely able to get his vocal cords to function.

“I thought you wanted to leave.”

“No,” Derek said, forcing himself two steps back into the chaos. “No, I want to try.”

Derek picked up his pen. He'd come inside the bar because... I wanted her to keep smiling, he wrote for number five. One reason down. Two to go.

He realized Mark watched him, unblinking, curious.

“Dr. Wyatt wants me to record all the choices I make and my reasons for making them,” Derek explained. “She thinks it will help draw my attention to the control I still have over my life.”
“To include what you ate for lunch?” Mark said, his tone wry.

Derek sighed as his face heated. “Look, I know it's fucking silly,” he said. “I feel ridiculous writing it. You don't need to rub it in.”

“Well, is it helping?”

“No, the needling is not helping,” Derek said.

Mark pointed at the notebook. “I meant the diary,” he said, drawing Derek's attention back to his two remaining choices on the list.

Meredith waved at him, her eyes sparkling, as he and Mark settled at the table in the far corner by the restrooms, as far away from the crush of the crowd as possible. She mouthed, “Are you okay?” across the noisy bar.

A fair question, given the state in which she'd been forced to leave him that morning, and given that he'd stopped dead on the fucking welcome mat and almost run back outside in terror. He debated then what to tell her. No was the most honest answer. No, I did a horrible thing earlier, and I think I might faint from nerves, now. But she was smiling and laughing and socializing, and he didn't want to wreck it for her. Not now. I love you, he mouthed at her with a wink in response. Not a lie, just... deferring the bad stuff until later.

He'd waited to tell Meredith the truth because... She deserves to have some fun with her friends, he wrote for his reason on number six. Whether he told her the truth about how he'd slipped now or five hours from now wouldn't matter in the grand scheme. This wasn't like concealing his marriage to Addison or hiding his addiction unless he let the lie perpetuate, and he wouldn't, but he could give Meredith a few happy hours with her friends.

Two reasons down. One to go. Why had he ordered water, no lemon? His pen hovered next to line seven, and he realized he'd sort of grown to look forward to this. Tabulating all the times he'd made a decision. Coming up with reasons.

“I like it,” Derek said, at last. “I feel less... lost.”

The waitress, a short woman, even more slender-boned and slight than Meredith, smiled at them as she arrived with their drinks on a tray full of dripping, foaming pints and other fare. Mark had ordered a club soda, not a beer, and Derek wondered if that had been a concession toward Derek's need for sobriety. Mark hadn't said anything about his drink choice, though, hadn't advertised it other than by his quiet order, and so Derek tried not to focus on it too much. Derek took his water with no lemon, tipped her $1, and thanked the woman as she brushed curly black hair out of her face. Sweat dotted her brow from the heat of so many bodies in the room.

She smiled. “Sorry this took so long,” she called over the din. “We're a bit busy tonight.”

The Mariners table booed. Loudly.

“I hadn't noticed,” Mark cracked with a charming wink as he tipped her as well, and the waitress laughed.

As she moved to another table, Mark picked up his fizzing, clear glass, and tipped it a smidgen toward Derek. “Being less lost is nice, even if it is a diary,” Mark said in a clear attempt at a toast, though his gaze kept darting down to Derek's notebook, as if he hadn't read it three times already and memorized the contents line-by-line.
Derek grinned as an idea struck him. He held out his hand, gesturing for Mark to wait a moment. Mark watched Derek expectantly as Derek picked up his gel pen. Bucking Big Brother, Derek wrote on the notepad, and then he clinked his water glass against Mark’s to complete the toast.

“Bucking Big Brother?” Mark said.

Derek smirked. Predictable as always. “Still reading over my shoulder?”

“If you don't want me to read it, you shouldn't leave it open,” Mark said. “Are you on a 1984 kick, or something?”

Derek shrugged. “You wanted me to get club soda.”

Mark blinked. “I did?”

“This morning, you told me I'd get a club soda,” Derek said. He tipped back his glass and took a sip of the cool water. The liquid spread across his tongue. He swallowed, glancing at the crowded room.

“What does that have to do with 1984?” Mark said.

“It doesn't have anything to do with 1984.”

Mark frowned. The ice in his glass clinked as he took a sip. “Then why'd you write about it?”

“I didn't write about 1984,” Derek said. He grinned slyly. “I wrote about you.”

Mark's eyebrows rose. “I'm 'Big Brother’?” he said, incredulous. He pressed his right palm flat against his chest in a classic gesture of, Who, me?

Derek nodded. “You're sure acting like it.”

“Unless you've recently hopped in a time machine, I'm clearly the dashing younger brother in this twisted equation,” Mark said, a haughty expression on his face.

Derek sighed, shaking his head. “I can see my attempt at witty humor has fallen flat on its face.”

“Now, you're saying I'm stupid in addition to emotionally stunted?” Mark said, though there was no bite in his tone this time. No anger. This was the teasing and needling that was normal.

Derek chuckled as a weight lifted. “Not stupid. Sometimes obtuse.”

“I think your fucked up sense of humor is obtuse,” Mark countered. He turned up his glass and took a sip that turned into a gulp. “That's what I think.”

“Who's being judge-y, now?” Derek said.

Mark chuckled. “Since when do you say words like judge-y?”

Derek sighed, unable to stop his gaze from wandering across the room, through the crowd, to Meredith. The big biker guy had moved enough to the side when he'd scooted his stool for Derek to see her. She wore her hair in a no-fuss, looped ponytail that sent loose ends of wispy blonde and brown jagging every which way. She'd worn jeans, her black Chucks, a lilac-colored blouse, and very little makeup, devoid of fashion, as though she'd been too tired to worry very much about her appearance. It didn't matter to Derek. To Derek, she looked beautiful, anyway. Her smile made her beautiful. Beautiful and pregnant and just... perfect. He pressed his chin against his hands, resting as he watched her, not caring if he came off like a lovesick fool at this point. He needed her. The past few horrible months had proven it to him. He needed her, and he could admit that.

“Since I married a woman who makes them up so often, I can't even remember what's real,” Derek said.

“She does have that talent,” Mark said. Following the direction of Derek's gaze, he peered over the undulating crowd. He smiled when his gaze caught Meredith, too, and he shook his head. “It's kind of cute.”

“It's adorable,” Derek agreed, “but it sometimes prevents me from functioning without spell check.”

“So, how am I obtuse?” Mark said.

Derek blinked, tearing his gaze away from Meredith. “Hmm?” he said.

Mark rolled his eyes as if to say, good god, you're so fucking hopeless when it comes to that woman. “Obtuse, Derek,” he said, impatient. “How am I obtuse?”

“Oh,” Derek said. He took a long sip from his water, relishing the cool feel as it washed down his parched throat. “Well, you keep reading over my shoulder.”

“That's not obtuse,” Mark said. “That's me being a nosy bastard.”

“That doesn't seem 'Big Brother' to you?” Derek said, raising his eyebrows. “On multiple levels, both literal and metaphorical?”

“But you said it didn't have anything to do with 1984.”

Derek's mouth didn't have anything to do with 1984.

“Obtuse, my ass. You just don't know what you're talking about.”

“You told me to order a fucking club soda, and you keep reading over my shoulder,” Derek said, frowning. “That's totally 'Big Brother'.”

“You seriously got water because I suggested club soda?”

Mark snorted. “So, now, you're perpetrating revisionist history in your pansy diary just to fuck with my head. I think that's far more Orwellian.”

“It's not a damned diary, Mark.”

“You say tomato,” Mark said. His face lit with an evil grin. “I say it's a fucking diary.”

Derek rolled his eyes. “I'm not going to live this down, am I?”

“Nope,” Mark said. “It's like the time you broke my hand.”

“On my face!” Derek argued. “You broke your hand on my face.”

“I more meant it as a time I was offered scientific, painful proof, of your impossibly hard head,” Mark countered.

Derek sighed. “Can we at least call it a map?”

“You've leaped from George Orwell to maps, and you're calling me obtuse?” Mark said.

“Because writing it makes me less lost!” Derek snapped. He took another sip from his drink. “I said that!”

Mark shook his head. “That's pathetic.”

“It sounds less pathetic than a diary,” Derek grumbled as he stared into his half-empty glass. The water flickered in the dim light.

“No offense, man, but that's completely cracked, less lost or not,” Mark said.

Derek frowned. “It's not cracked.”

“At least you're writing it on a spiral notepad,” Mark said. “That's better than one of those prissy bound books only a girl would buy.”

“Gee, thanks,” Derek said. He stared at his so-called diary and sighed.

“Look, man,” Mark said. “If it makes you feel better, do it. Keep the diary. I'll stop giving you a hard time.”

“It does make me feel better,” Derek said.

“How about we call it a journal?”

“That's... less bad than diary.”

Mark shrugged. “Darts?” he said. “Or are you going to buck 'Big Brother' in your journal some more?”

Derek stared across the crowded room at the dart board. It was closer to Meredith. Farther from the scary Mariners fans. But there was so much between. So many writhing bodies. So many unknowns. But he'd calmed down over the course of the conversation. He felt jittery. Nervous. The hairs on the nape of his neck still tingled. Still, that was a far cry above feeling like he would faint, or fighting the distinct urge to flee in a panic. He had no idea how or when that had happened. Somewhere in the journey from Addison to George Orwell.

“We can stay here,” Mark said.

Derek shook his head and stood, staring at the distant, nerve-wracking objective. He'd stayed on the outskirts of the room, avoiding the largest concentration of life at the center. He took a sip from his water. The glass clinked as he set it back on the table.

He picked up his little notepad and flipped the page to a new sheet. Mark watched him as Derek scribbled number eight. Going to play darts, Derek wrote, a sense of peace unfurling as he made his decision despite his nerves.

“I'm going to win,” Derek said.

“Are not.”
“Too.”

“Not.”

“I always win this game,” Derek said.

Mark smirked. “Not this time. Today's my lucky day.”

“Why so confident?”

“Your hands have been shaking since we got here. I figure I can milk it for a win.”

Derek turned to Mark and gaped. Mark met his eyes, unblinking, challenging, but twinkling, as if to say, Kid gloves are off, buddy.

“Well, they have been,” Mark said with a smirk.

Derek snorted as he turned back to his little notepad. “You don't find any shame in abusing someone's infirmity for your own hollow victory?” he said as he readied his pen.

Mark shook his head. “Not when you're the infirm.”

“Ass,” Derek said cheerfully, and Mark chuckled.

I want to win, Derek wrote for his reason on number eight.

He and Mark left their unfinished glasses on the table and their coats on the stool. Derek stuffed his notebook into the pocket of his windbreaker to keep it out of plain view, and then he walked across the room. Cautiously. Through the center. Moving bodies touched him. Words slammed against his ears. But the competitive zing in his chest, the throb of his heart, made it easier to force himself forward. He wanted to win and wipe Mark's smug grin right off his face. Derek wanted to play.

Mark made no comment about their successful journey. “601, double-in, double-out?” Mark queried, eyebrows raised as they approached the dart board.

Derek nodded. The scoreboard was a small dry-erase board off to the left. Both were well lit by bright lamps. Mark picked up a red dry-erase marker from the tray. He wrote “601” with a “DD” over the top of it on the scoreboard, and then he drew a line down the center of the board. He picked up the darts left out for play, and approached the throw line.

Mark handed Derek the darts. “Age before beauty?” he said, a playful gleam in his eye.

Derek snorted and sized up the board. “You only wish you were beautiful,” Derek said. He hadn't played in months and months, and Mark was right. Derek's hands were shaking a bit from adrenaline and nerves, which would make it fucking hard to aim, but that wasn't something he could help. He would have to deal with it. And he really needed Mark to stop smirking like that.

Derek raised the dart and tossed it with a flick of his wrist. The little dart sang as it sailed through the air. It hit the outer bull with a smack and stuck, and he tried not to hide his amazement that he'd managed to hit center. Not dead center, but pretty close.

“Beat that, Belle,” Derek said in the spirit of competition.

Mark rolled his eyes as Derek stepped away from the throw line. “Belle?” he said. “That's the best insult you can come up with?” He tossed a dart much like Derek, only his hit the double bull and stuck. “I guess that's Mr. Belle, to you, Geezer,” Mark said, his voice dripping with annoying cheer as he went to pick the darts from the board.

Derek sighed and stepped away from the throw line to let Mark go for his first real turn. The back of Derek's neck tingled, and Derek turned, not paying attention to Mark as he threw his first dart. Only a few tables away, Meredith watched him, her bright gray eyes just visible over the lip of her glass as she took a sip – the clear liquid with the lemon. She set her glass down and wiped her lips with a napkin. She smiled at him as she saw him returning her look, and all at once the noisy bar bent away like petals falling from a flower, until there was only her, the bright colorful center, and nothing else.

You're still here, she mouthed, and he nodded.

A hand clamped on his shoulder, making him flinch. Derek found Mark grinning at him. “Okay, Cassanova. Your turn.”

“I thought I was Geezer,” Derek said.

Mark's gaze darted back and forth between Meredith and Derek. “I think Cassanova is far more accurate,” he decided. He appraised Derek with a smirk. “And pathetic.”

Derek turned back to the dart board and frowned when he read the scoreboard. “A ton sixty on your first turn? Are you serious?” A ton sixty would be nearly impossible for him with his shaky hands, and he knew it.

“I told you I'm going to win tonight,” Mark replied.

“I think you're messing with me,” Derek grumbled as he took his darts. He aimed for the double twenty, clenching his teeth. He needed a double to get his points to start accruing.

Mark shrugged. “You could have watched me throw.”

“Meredith is much prettier to watch than you.”

“See?” Mark said. “You're pathetic when you're in love.”

“Don't knock it until you've tried it,” Derek said.

Mark frowned. “I would try it.”

“Hmm,” Derek said. “Lexie?”

“I don't blame her,” Mark said, his tone glum.

“Still sucks, though.”

Mark nodded in agreement. “Yeah,” he said.

Derek flicked his wrist. The dart sailed. It hit the board with a smack. And it bounced right off.

“Be quiet,” Derek told Mark, who was snickering.

Mark held up his hands in playful surrender. “Hey, I'm not saying a word.”

“You're thinking it.”

“You're telling me not to think, now?”
“Yes. Blank everything out.”

Mark snorted, rolling his eyes. “Right,” he said.

Derek aimed for the double twenty again. This time, the little dart sank into its mark. It sagged, but it stuck, and tension Derek didn't know he'd had seeped out of him. With his third dart, he set his gaze on the triple twenty, trying to decide if that was wise. This early in the game, it was best to get as many triple twenties as possible, but those spaces were narrow and a lot harder to hit. Maybe, he should aim for the double bull, which was a bit easier to hit. Or... He sighed. No. Might as well go for broke. He tossed. His dart landed in the black single twenty space, and his shoulders slumped.

“Sixty,” Mark said, his voice neutral.

Derek sighed. Sixty to one-sixty on the first turn. Mark might win after all. And by a whole hell of a lot. He turned back to Meredith, deciding she was a lot more fun to watch than his impending demise on the dart board. He imagined himself writing number nine in his choice diary. Watched Meredith, he would write. Why? She's pretty, and I'm losing horribly already. He heard a dart smack into the board behind him, and he didn't even flinch, because he'd already lost himself in her eyes. She'd been watching him through his turn and still watched him, now, a tinge of watery disbelief clouding her gaze, as if she couldn't quite believe he'd stayed and played darts, of all things.

He hated how doubtful of him she'd become. Guilt at his own stagnant recovery loitered at the back of his throat. A huge lump formed. He swallowed.

Cristina, who sat beside Meredith, followed Meredith's gaze, landed on Derek, and rolled her eyes. Are you winning? Meredith mouthed.

I only wish, he mouthed back, and she giggled. He couldn't help but smile at her despite his misgivings. He found it hard to be unhappy when she seemed so much the opposite.

Mark pulled Derek out of his pleasant bubble. “You know, if you'd rather go sit over there with them—”

“No,” Derek said. He shook his head. Vehemently. “No, she's with her friends.”

“You're watching her like a stalker,” Mark said.

Derek snorted. “She was watching me like a stalker first!”

Mark rolled his eyes. “And I repeat. You two are pathetic. Take your turn.”

Derek glanced at the score board. The round hadn't been as kind to Mark this time. He'd only scored seventy. Derek aimed for the triple twenty. One triple twenty and he'd be almost even for the round with a single dart. He tossed, and the dart sank home between the thin wires surrounding the triple twenty. Triumph burbled in his chest, and he couldn't stop himself from pumping his fist.

“Hey, was that good?” a soft, familiar voice said to his left, and he turned.

Meredith stood next to him, and his tight, nervous muscles loosened into jelly as he met her curious, sparkling gaze. “My best throw of the night,” Derek said, unable to keep pride from dripping into his tone. His hands were shaking, and he was in a noisy, crowded bar that made him nervous, and he'd thrown a triple twenty.
Mark chuckled. “His only good throw of the night, if the gods are smiling on me.”

Derek elbowed Mark, watching Meredith with a grin. “What are you doing here?”

“Had to pee,” Meredith said. “Thought I'd say hi.”

Derek met her eyes. He stepped closer, into her space, leaning. He brushed his lips against the soft skin of her temple, breathing in the faint scent of lavender conditioner. Pleasant, sated lethargy sank into his body as her arms wrapped around his waist.

“Hi,” he said softly.

She leaned up on her tiptoes, looking into his eyes. Her hands slipped into the back pockets of his jeans, and she returned his hesitant hello with a kiss that had more to do with taking than searching. Her lips met his. Her hands squeezed.

“Hi,” she replied, panting as she pulled away. You're really, really here, said her gaze.

I really am, he didn't reply. “Mark thinks I'm staring at you like a stalker,” Derek said.

“I was staring first,” she said. “Turnabout is fair play.”

Derek grinned. “See?” he said to Mark.

“You know,” Mark interjected, his tone playful, “It's typically considered poor sportsmanship to distract the person throwing darts in the middle of his turn.”

“If I lose, this was worth it,” Derek countered, and Meredith giggled again. The sound slipped down his spine and soothed his trembling skin like a balm. He kissed her once more and stepped back onto the throw line. She watched.

He aimed for the triple twenty, where his first dart still stuck in place. If he could get another one without knocking his first dart out of the board, he'd be close to catching up to Mark's lucky first round. He tossed. The dart sailed. It sank into the triple twenty.

He raised his third dart, going for broke. Another triple twenty would be a lot to smirk about. That would max him out at a perfect ton eighty, the maximum possible score for the round, beating Mark's top first round score, and putting Derek ahead with a slight lead, which would make the rest of this game far more interesting. He let the dart sail, but it veered to the left in flight, and it sank into the triple five. Derek sighed as Mark clapped him on the back.

“Good darts, man,” Mark said.

Derek looked at Meredith. She frowned sympathetically at him. “Not so good?”

“Have you never played before?” he asked, which was a dumb question, he realized. If she didn't know the triple twenty was good and the triple five was, in most circumstances, bad, she probably hadn't played.

She shook her head, and even despite his idiocy, the fact that he'd learned something new about her made him happy, Meredith. Not a habitual dart player. That seemed to suit her. She'd always seemed like she used bars to get drunk and not much else. At least not before he'd met her. Since then, she'd turned Joe's into her social gathering away from home. Want to join us? he debated asking, but after moments of weighing the options, he didn't.
“I'll teach you, sometime, if you want,” he said.

“Okay,” she said in a soft voice. She danced from her left foot to her right.

He laughed. “Maybe, you should go take care of that?”

She blushed. “I'm sorry. I'd stay and watch more, but I'm kinda floating.” Her hand lowered to her belly, and she rubbed herself absently, as if the motion had already become so ingrained in her psyche, she didn't realize she was doing it.

Time halted as he watched her. Derek's lip twitched with a smile when he thought about the pregnancy. This sort of flight to the bathroom would happen more and more often as time went on, and the baby grew. She didn't show, yet, but dumbfounding moments of wondrous realization like this hit him with more and more regularity as the weeks passed. Her nipples had darkened. She didn't complain about back aches, but the baths she always took told him she might be hurting a bit. She'd started sliding out of bed in the middle of night to pee, something she'd rarely done before. In fact, the frequency was increasing, which made him speculate she was probably closer to eight weeks than six, as she thought she was. Eight weeks would mean he was right about the conception date, though he kept that hand of cards close to his chest instead of crowing about it. They would see for sure at her OB-GYN appointment in two weeks.

“Derek?” she said, her voice pulling him out of musing.

Without further hesitation, she turned on her heels, her sneakers squeaking on the wood floor. Her messy ponytail bobbed as she turned, and she left to use the bathroom. He couldn't help the flash of the future that fogged his brain. She would be rounder, her stride more waddling than lithe, and he would be tired from all the trips to the grocery store for pickles. The ludicrous image swirled in his head, and he grinned at nothing in particular.

Derek turned back to Mark with a pleased, relaxed sigh. Number ten, he imagined writing. Didn't ask Meredith to join us. Why? Despite his heady desire for her company, and the wonderment that left him slack-jawed, he stuck to the steadfast conclusion that, She should be with her friends.

The dart game continued. He watched with an increasing feeling of defeat as Mark threw the perfect ton eighty that Derek had been trying for earlier. The competition raged on, getting stiffer as the game progressed, because Derek's hands stopped shaking somewhere along the way, and he stopped thinking so hard about the noise or the bustle or the bodies in the room. Granted, lots of people filtered out of the bar as time wore on, and happy hour became early evening. The noise levels died down a bit, and the walls of the hot, stuffy room didn't feel like they pressed against him on every side. Even the heat itself began to cool. Or maybe he'd just stopped feeling nauseous.

He lost their first game, but not by much, and that felt... really good. Really...

Normal.

He felt normal for the first time in weeks. And he'd had fun. Fun.

“Best two out of three?” he said, unable to withhold the unadulterated hope from his tone. He was amazed at the knee jerk desire for his notepad. Chose to play another game. Why? Feeling great. Want it to continue.

Mark grinned at him. “If you want to keep losing, sure.”
“I won't lose this time,” Derek insisted as Mark handed him a dart.

“Age before beauty?” Mark said, echoing the beginning of their first game, but the experience didn't feel like an echo.

Derek felt altogether different. Relaxed. Happy. Not trying to force anything. He swallowed. Only a matter of hours had passed since he'd started keeping the choice journal, and he already felt a lot less like he was spinning out of control on a sheet of black ice. He'd been downgraded to speeding on a dry road. The choice journal. Such a small thing. But it felt a lot less silly, now. It felt... great.

Really great.

Derek raised the dart and made an effortless toss. The dart smacked into the double bull. Dead center.

“That's better,” he told the dart board. He gave Mark a haughty smirk.

“Feeling better, are we,” Mark said, not really a question, his voice flat, wry. He threw his dart, but the toss flew wide and hit the single seven near the tip instead of the bullseye. “Age before beauty this time, after all, I guess,” he conceded.

Derek took his first turn, scoring a ton sixty. Perfect for the first round. He lost himself in thought as Mark struggled to match that performance.

If Derek wanted to be really anal about things, he could be writing down minutiae. When he thought about it, he realized quite a bit of what he did involved choices. Split-second. Subconscious. But choices, nonetheless. Like moving his arm or shifting his feet. Though, if he wrote all of that down, every time he moved a muscle, he imagined he might spend more time writing than making choices. That idea was sort of a recursive problem, too, since writing involved moving more muscles.

He flexed his hand into a fist, staring at it as he thought. Basic body systems weren't at his command. His heartbeat, for instance. Digestion. Cell metabolism. To some extent, he couldn't control his breathing, either, in that if he tried to stop, he'd pass out and start again without his express consent. But everything else...

He glanced at Meredith, who'd returned to her table at some point. Cristina, Lexie, Alex, and Meredith all sat together. From Lexie's wild gesticulating, and the rush of urgent chanting, table-slapping, and encouragement emanating from their table, Derek thought they might be playing some sort of silly word game, but he couldn't hear anything specific enough to identify what game in particular.

He could kiss her, he thought. Kiss Meredith. The image popped into his mind without provocation. He could walk over there and choose to kiss her senseless. Why? Because he loved her, and he liked to kiss her, and she seemed to like being kissed by him. He almost took a step when niggling thoughts pulled him short. Truth. He still had to tell her the truth about how he'd nearly slipped and filled a Percocet prescription. He hadn't told her that truth so that she could spend time with her friends. Not so he could kiss her one more time. The former was acceptable. The latter was selfish. Shameful. Extremely.

He frowned as he imagined his notebook in his hands. What number had he been on? Eleven or something. No kissing, he imagined himself writing. Reason? Truth first.

He blinked as Mark threw a dart and hit the triple three. “Fuck!” Mark blurted. He aimed his final Derek could dance in public if he wanted. He glanced wildly at the small empty space in the center of the bar. Some banal pop song he didn't know blared over the speakers, the bass throbbing in his chest like a living, breathing thing trapped inside and pounding to get out. The idea of standing there in the center of the crowd, his limbs jerking like he was an epileptic in the midst of a seizure, repulsed him. Twelve. No dancing. Why? Still sane. Kind of.

He could do something crazy. Something unexpected. But a real choice.

“Maybe, I should get a new bike,” Derek said before he pulled the reins on that wild, fleeting thought.

Mark's dart flew wide and bounced off the wall beside the dart board. He raised his eyes as his head snapped in Derek's direction. “Um,” Mark said. “You mean a new bike that you pedal?”

“No,” Derek said, shaking his head. “One that I put gas into and ride.”

Silence stretched. “Really?” Mark said, his tone tinged with amazement.

“I...” Derek began, and then he stopped. He swallowed. The rest of his choices had felt nice. This one didn't. He wasn't even sure where the thought had come from. He remembered the slow-motion sensation of his body leaving the seat. The cold air hitting his face. Rain poured, everywhere. He squeezed his eyes shut, trying to blot out the sudden, intrusive image. The memory slipped away from him, a soft pastel in a loud, sprawling watercolor. “I don't know.”

“That sounds great,” Mark said with a grin, ignoring Derek's switchback into hesitance. Mark pulled his darts from the board, chased down the one that had bounced, and wrote his score, and handed the darts to Derek. “I was crushed when you sold your old one.”

Derek glowered as he stepped up to the throw line. “You still owe me for all the gas you used, you know.”

“No,” Mark said.

“Do, too.”

“Do not.”

“Do, too!” Derek snapped.

He tossed his first dart, which smacked into the triple twenty. He flexed his fingers. His muscle memory was returning. His hand-eye coordination. He'd always been good at darts, and the returning precision made him feel like a bona fide surgeon again, even though he wasn't cutting. “You never once paid me back,” he said. He tossed his second dart with a little flick. Smack into the triple twenty again. “I always filled her up, and you're the one who rode her everywhere.”

“Okay, maybe I borrowed it a few times,” Mark conceded.

Derek snorted. “A few?”

“You rode it more than I did!”

“More often, maybe,” Derek replied. He tossed his third dart, hoping for a third triple twenty. The dart hit the metal and bounced. He grimaced as he turned to Mark. “But you're the one who took the damned thing to Canada.” He went to pick up the lost dart and the two still stuck on the board. He wrote his score with the marker. One-twenty from that round. One-sixty from the first. That put him at a nice two-eighty under 601 after only two rounds, and well ahead of Mark, who'd only scored fifty-two so far. If Derek kept that up his pace, he'd be strategizing the way to zero in only a few more turns.

“Only once,” Mark said as Derek relinquished the three darts. Mark aimed. “And Canada is next to New York. It's not that far.”

“Quebec City is over 500 miles away,” Derek said.

Mark tossed his first dart and hit the triple twenty. “She was really hot, Derek.”

“That's over 1000 miles in one trip without asking.”

“I told you afterward...” Mark protested. He tossed his second dart, which slammed into the triple twenty, but the impact made his first dart fall to the ground. “Fuck,” he said. “I think you rigged this game.”

“Did not,” Derek countered.

“Did, too!”

“Not.”

“Too!”

The third dart listed to the right mid-flight and hit the triple eighteen. Mark frowned, but he didn't seem too unhappy with it. He approached the dartboard to calculate his score, sighing when he stared at the dart on the floor. Anything that fell off the board didn't count. That was sixty points down the drain in a single dart, but he'd still made a ton fourteen for the round. Not bad.

“You didn't even fill up the tank when you returned it from that trip,” Derek said. The dry-erase marker squeaked on the board as Mark wrote his score. 166 to 280, Derek's favor. A large gap, but Mark could still catch up if Derek ran into problems trying to hit zero. Not busting on the last turn was the tricky part.

“Okay, maybe you have a point on the gas,” Mark said as he handed the darts to Derek.

Derek smirked. “Thank you!” he said, emphasizing his point with a dart smacking into the triple twenty. He aimed his second dart.

“But, really,” Mark said, "regardless of who rode it more or longer, I—”

“Rode what?” interjected a familiar voice. Derek's second dart flew low and wide and slammed into the single one. Derek winced. Mark and Derek turned.

For a moment, Cristina stood there, silent, looking distinctly uncomfortable. She brushed a flyaway strand of black hair out of her eyes, flattening it with the rest of her ponytail. Her lips parted.

“I haven't... seen you out in a while,” she offered.

Derek's eyes narrowed. He glanced at Meredith, but she seemed fine, so... what, then? He'd had enough trouble just being in this place, let alone socializing with someone who disliked him so immutably. Worse, her presence popped the bubble he'd been in. The happy one where he'd been having fun. Noisy, suffocating reality pressed in. The reality full of people and discomfort. A glass crashed to the floor and shattered behind the bar, accented by the waitress's exasperated curse. He tensed.

“What do you want?” he said to Cristina. Or snapped, really. He couldn't help it, though he didn't mean to.

She smirked. “You're playing a symbolically phallic game, talking like a pair of chatty Cathys, and the subject matter is riding things?” Cristina said, her arms crossed over her chest in a haughty pose. “I think I want a tape recorder.”

Derek glared at the dartboard and readied his third dart. He let it fly. It hit the triple twenty. “You know, you're really very nosy.”

Cristina ignored him. “So, what were you riding in this conversation?”

“A motorcycle,” Mark said.

“Really?” Cristina said. Her gaze shifted. Almost as if her perception of the world had reorganized itself in light of revelation. A flicker of... almost respect... seemed to loiter there.

“More him than me,” Mark said, gesturing to Derek.

Cristina snorted, and surprise faded into faint derision. “Yeah, right. You?”

Derek sighed. He'd been having fun, but with every word she spoke, the relaxed feeling receded, slipping away like sand in the wind. “I used to ride,” he said.

Mark chuckled.

“Hah. Hah,” Derek said in unimpressed monotone. “Is there a reason you're here?”

She shrugged, gesturing to the empty glass clutched in her hand. A foamy ring of leftover beer circled the bottom. “Just getting another round.”

Derek rolled his eyes as he approached the board and pulled his three darts loose. He wrote his score for the round. 121. “I owned a motorcycle,” he said. “You don't have a monopoly on the idea.” Derek jabbed a thumb over his shoulder at the bar in the distance, where Joe moved back and forth, filling orders. “And the bar is that way.”

Cristina followed the line of Derek's gesture to the bar with her gaze. The big, scary six-foot-five Mariners fan chose that moment to sidle to the bar. His scuffed biker jacket looked like it had seen better days, as did his leather riding chaps and his cracked shit-kicker boots. He leaned over the bar to say something to Joe, moving so slowly Derek imagined the old leather creaking as he moved, but the big man's eyes didn't leave the television as he did so. Derek felt a sliver of disappointment. He'd moved away from New York City, but his loyalties with sports teams hadn't. The Yankees had been dominating when he'd sat down, but the Mariners had chipped away at the lead, particularly with that grand slam earlier. The big man clapped as somebody in a Yankee uniform struck out, though the television was too far away for Derek to identify the player.

“Thanks,” Cristina said. “Now, I'm imagining you in tight leather riding pants, and I don't want to. Stop. Now.”
Mark laughed. Derek turned to him.

“What's so funny?” Derek said.

“I'm trying to picture you in that getup,” Mark said, gesturing at the tall Mariners fan.

“Oh, for fuck's sake,” Derek snapped as his face blushed hot, bright red, his precarious hold on civility ruined by the repeated needling. He shoved the darts into Mark's grasp.

“Let me guess,” Cristina said. “You had a Moped. Or a Vespa. Not a real bike.”

Derek's chest tightened. “It was a Harley.”

“Such a fucking beast,” Mark said, his tone cheerful as he stepped to the throw line. “I should never have let you sell it.”

Cristina blinked. “Seriously?”

“Yes,” Derek said. “Seriously. Why is that so hard to believe?”

“Because your idea of the best kind of thrillseeking seems to be fishing,” Cristina said. She snickered. “For hours.”

Derek frowned. “Hey, I like fishing.”

“Right,” Cristina said. “That's sort of my point.”

“She does have a point,” Mark said. “Fishing is like——”

“Watching paint dry,” Derek said with a sigh as Mark's many-times-uttered assessment echoed in Derek's head. No, Mark had said. It's like watching invisible paint dry, which is even worse, because there's nothing to fucking watch. Mark tossed his first dart and hit the single one. Derek snickered. “Yes,” Derek said. “I get that fishing is too cerebral for certain people.”

Mark chuffed with indignant laughter. “Ouch, man,” he said.

Derek rolled his eyes. “I don't make fun of your hobbies, do I?”

“I distinctly remember you giving me a hard time about my PS3,” Mark countered.

“I wasn't making fun of it!”

Mark raised his eyebrows. “Well, what about sex?”

“You seriously consider sex a hobby?” Derek said.

Mark smirked. “You just made my point for me. Thank you.”

“What made you stop?” Cristina interjected.

Derek blinked. “Sex?”

“The bike,” she said impatiently.

Mark threw his second dart and it hit the triple twenty. The smack made Derek flinch as an image seared his mind's eye. The world. Tumbling in the dark. And then nothing. The concussion had robbed him of his memories. He'd never remembered the crash other than the fleeting, vague idea of his body leaving the seat and then flying through the air. He did, however, remember waking up on the ground with a piece of rebar shoved through his thigh.

He swallowed. “Nothing,” he said. “I sold it.”

“Why?” Cristina said.

“Because I did,” he said.

“But why?” Cristina prodded.

“But I did!” Derek snapped, unwilling to let himself fall into the memories that threatened. Mark's third dart flew into the triple twenty.

Cristina rolled her eyes. “Whatever,” she said. “Don't get your panties in a twist.” She raised her empty glass. “And I need to get my refill, now.”

“Nothing is twisted,” Derek insisted as she left him.

“Right,” Cristina called over her shoulder.

“Liar,” Mr. Clark said, and Derek huffed with frustration.

Nasty, growling laughter echoed in his head, and Derek squeezed his eyes shut, trying to force it quiet, but it wouldn't stop, and Derek's hands began to shake again. The room pressed in, and nausea swept over him like a tide as he glanced at the room, more empty, not, but... people. Everywhere. Dissonance tickled his spine, the feeling like somebody had swept his hair in the wrong direction, or... something.

Not this again.

When Mark grabbed Derek's shoulder and said, “Your turn,” Derek flinched away from the touch, barely able to maintain his composure. He needed his composure. He didn't want to implode when he was stuck in a crowd. He didn't want to implode anywhere. His heart skipped as he blearily looked at the room. God, so many people.

_Did it sound like I was asking for opinions from the peanut gallery?_ Dr. Bailey said, a distant echo.

“I'm done, now,” Derek said, his voice even, low, but it sounded far away. Almost woozy.

Mark didn't argue. Didn't complain that they were in the middle of a game.

Derek turned. He stared at the doorway. The exit. But their coats were at the table. His notebook was in his coat pocket. He couldn't simply flee. He was better than his panic. He could do this. He worked on replacing his panic thoughts like he'd been taught. _Pickles, pickles, getting pickles for my pregnant wife_, he thought instead. He licked his dry lips and walked back to their empty table, but once he'd walked that far, his shaky legs gave out. It was sit down or fall down, and so he sank onto his stool, a heavy, shell-shocked weight.

“You okay?” Mark said as he caught up. He'd stayed behind to erase the scoreboard.

Derek nodded his head as he pressed his face against his hands and breathed. Slowly. Even with his eyes closed, it felt as though the room were spinning around him. A kaleidoscope of noise and heat and color and too much else to deal with. But it settled some. With every inhalation. And when he looked up, he felt reset to where he'd began. Forcing himself to be there. Not enjoying it. But not feeling the intense need to flee, either. The bath of adrenaline receded from his limbs, leaving him achy. Thrashed. But, in the grand scheme of things, okay.

“I'm better,” Derek said, his voice soft. “I'm...” He swallowed and closed his eyes for a long moment. “I don't know what that was.”

Mark shrugged. “Hit your tolerance, maybe. Want to go?”

Derek blinked. Meredith was watching him from across the bar. He couldn't leave, now. He wanted to convince her that she could go out like this more often. If he left, that wouldn't be convincing.

“I'm okay,” he said, and he meant it.

He'd made it through this unsettling feeling before and managed to achieve normality, if only for a moment. Maybe, he could dip his toes into normal again, if he stayed. He wanted the feeling from the dart game to return.

He wanted that so much.

He could do this. Push through.

He glanced at his old water glass, which rested on the table by his hand, half-empty. All the ice cubes had melted. He raised the glass to his lips and took a long sip anyway. Though the fluid wasn't cold, it was cool, and it felt good on his tongue and in his throat. His muscles loosened. Just a bit.

He rifled through his coat pocket and sifted his notebook away from his cell phone and keys. He'd written past eleven in his head, but all the specifics fleeted from of his memory. He'd left off at eight on the page, and so he scribbled number nine. Staying. Why? I need to push through this.

Mark took a sip from his club soda but made a face. The glass wasn't fizzing anymore. Derek suspected it had gone flat, and Derek decided he wouldn't mind something with a bit more flavor than water. Scotch, single-malt. The whisper hit his brain, quiet, insidious. It would be nice to let go after what you've put yourself through today, wouldn't it? You could get drunk. Derek shook his head and forced himself to think about something else other than Gary Clark's harsh voice.

Root beer. Derek could get some root beer. Joe brewed his own, and it tasted pretty good. Derek shifted in his chair and gestured at the waitress who walked past the door toward the other side of the bar.

Her face turned toward the table next to Meredith's in response to somebody calling out to her, and she missed Derek's wave, but Dr. Hunt saw it as he entered the bar, and the little bell over the door dinged. He perked up at Derek's 'greeting', smiled, and waved at Mark and Derek. He went to the bar to get a drink, first, and Derek cringed as soon as the man's back was turned. Derek liked Dr. Hunt. On any other night, Derek wouldn't have minded the mistake, but Derek wasn't sure he could deal with another person, tonight.

“I can tell him to go away,” Mark offered.

Derek pushed air through his lips. Almost a laugh. Not quite. And more sardonic than humorous. “No offense, but your idea of tact is really just blunt. I'll live, somehow.”

Mark shrugged. “Don't say I didn't offer,” he said.
Owen approached and slumped into the stool across from Derek. He set a foaming pint of what looked like Guinness down on the table with a clink, and he shrugged off his windbreaker to add to the coat stack on the last stool.

“Hey, man,” Mark said.

“Sloan,” Owen said with a nod. He turned to Derek. “Shepherd.” He tipped back his frothy pint and chugged. And chugged. And chugged. The cloying scent of alcohol wafted across the table.

Derek raised his eyebrows and watched incredulously as Owen sucked back half the pint. “Rough day?” Derek said.

“You could say that,” Owen said. “I've been in surgery since...” He glanced at his watch. “Yesterday.” He glanced across the noisy room in Meredith's direction. “And I really don't get women.”

“Cristina, you mean?” Derek said.

Owen sighed. “You need to provide me with a translation dictionary. Twisted Sister to English. You seem to be good at it.”

Derek chuffed with laughter as Owen took another chug from his maybe-Guinness and wiped his mouth. “I'm no better than you,” Derek insisted, “with Cristina, in particular.” But Owen shook his head and waved him off.

“Enough of that. So, what are we talking about?” Owen said. “Please, say it's not anything to do with women or surgery.”

“Well, seeing as how I can't cut right now, and Mark already complained about Lexie over darts, I think you're safe,” Derek said with a smile. Across the bar, he watched Meredith, Cristina, Lexie, and Alex all stand up from their table. They gathered their coats.

Owen nodded. “Oh, good.” He frowned. “I mean not good that you can't cut,” he said, looking at Derek. His gaze shifted to Mark. “Or that you're having problems with...” His frown deepened. “I thought Grey was seeing Karev?”

“Oh, she is,” Derek said. Lexie leaned to kiss Alex on the lips, laughing as they walked out of the bar.

Owen's look of confusion only deepened. He took a deep breath. His lips parted. He looked ready to ask another question, probably about the whole relationship musical chairs, but on the apex of his inhalation, Mark interjected, “Derek's thinking about getting a new motorcycle. We were talking about that before.”

He shot a glare at Derek, who shrugged helplessly. The conversation seemed to be wrought with landmines no matter which way they turned. Derek rubbed the bridge of his nose. He didn't want to talk about this.

Meredith stopped on the threshold, her soft, gray gaze searching the crowd. She looked at Derek, eyes piercing, look expectant, as if she sensed his turmoil from across the room. Derek gave her a small smile and a wave. She smiled back at him. See you soon, she mouthed, and she left in Cristina's wake.

“Oh?” said Owen. He perked with interest. “I didn't know you rode. Cristina has a—”
“Bike,” Derek said, forcing his gaze away from the door with a sigh. “I know.”

The floating sensation wrapped around Derek's brain. The sensation of leaving the seat. Flipping. Free fall. Latent memories, agitated by continued prodding, came loose, and Derek could almost feel his body being propelled through the cold, misty air.

He woke up to the sound of the pounding water. Leached of all heat, his battered body shivered. He turned his head, half-drunk with dizziness. Something rough like sandpaper scraped his nose and forehead. His neck wouldn't support his head. Why was he on his stomach on the floor in a shower? He vomited before he had any time to assess the situation. The stench pressed into his nose, made his stomach churn and roil, and he tried to turn away, scraping his face on the wet, rough thing. The movement made him feel like somebody had jabbed a hot poker into his temples. Why couldn't he lift his head?

“Maybe not,” Derek said, his voice soft. “I...” The concussion had twisted his perceptions. Made something awful even worse. He rubbed the tendons in his neck with his fingertips, pressing deep into the coiling tension that loitered there.

Mark shook his head. “You should, man,” he said. “It'd be really great.”

“Why don't you buy one, then?” Derek said.

Mark shrugged. “It's more fun to steal yours,” he said. “And then there's the free gas.”

Derek stared into his water glass. “At least you're being honest, now,” he said, his voice soft, wry, as the memories threatened to steamroll him. He swallowed as a sick feeling churned in his stomach.

He cracked open his eyelids. The slanted, disorienting blare beyond his face hit him like an impressionistic painting. He lay under the dim prison of a flickering streetlamp. Water crashed down around him from the dark sky, hitting the side of his face and blotting his vision. The flat street had tipped like the hypotenuse of a triangle. Why was the world falling over? Had there been an earthquake? His bike lay on the edge where dim light became dark, wheels spinning in slow revolutions in the wind. A shiny fender gleamed in the light.

He tried to move. Pain exploded like a bomb through his body, outward from the epicenter at his thigh. He would have cried out, but his vocal cords didn't work. He threw up again instead, shivering, and he lay still, rebuked and cold.

“Help,” he whispered against the wet pavement.

He stared at his bike in the fuzzy distance. He'd been tossed thirty feet. At least. And something bad had happened to his leg. He needed help. He took a deep, sucking breath and tried once more to move. He ended his attempt on a silent, shaking shout of pain.

“Help,” he repeated, but there was no one.

“He used to have a Harley, but he sold it,” Mark said, and Derek blinked, trying to pull himself back to the present, but the past threatened to suck him back into memory. He remembered trying to wipe the rainwater out of his eyes, only to discover it was blood. He'd waited and waited for help. For hours. Dripping and cold and bloody.

Owen's eyebrows rose. “Why did you sell it?”

“Why is that so important to everybody right now?” Derek snapped.
“It... wasn't,” Owen said, his expression creasing with wariness. “I... thought this was our conversation topic?”

“He crashed,” Mark said, and Derek closed his eyes.

His neck hurt. His head pounded. He couldn't look behind him, or move his body. Whenever he tried, he almost fainted with the pain, and so he’d stopped making attempts. He’d given up calling for help, too. He lay with his face pressed against the cold, wet concrete, battered by the ceaseless rain. His hair plastered his head. Everything smelled like vomit and blood, and he couldn't move. His teeth chattered. He was cold. He’d landed face down on a tipped slab. He couldn't tell much else. Hours passed.

“A crash,” Derek echoed, and a wry, almost hating chuckle fell from his lips. He glowered at Mark. “That's putting it mildly.”

Owen took a sip from his pint glass. He brushed the foam away from his lips. “You quit because of a crash?” he said.

Derek’s hackles rose as he stared at Owen. What right did he have to judge? “I quit because I don't like waking up with my face stuck in a puddle of vomit, and a piece of rusty rebar jammed through my thigh.”

Mark took a deep breath. “Derek...”

“No,” Derek said. “No, I was stuck like that for hours in the rain, and I couldn't get help. You don't get to tell me it was stupid to quit.”

Owen frowned and shook his head. “I didn't say it was stupid.”

“Neither of us said that,” Mark said.

Sombody covered him with a fuzzy blanket that didn't feel warm. Rain thundered overhead, endless drumbeats splotching the space above him, but the water had stopped hitting him. The sky had turned red and white. Something flapped in the wind. Flashing lights and the rumble of a big truck engine made it hard to focus.

“Son, hang in there,” someone said over the din. A man. He sounded kind. Familiar. A hand pressed something against Derek's head. The spear of pain crashing through his skull made him flinch. “We're going to cut you loose, now. Can you tell me your name?”

A loud, metal shriek sent vibrations of pain through his battered body, and Derek yelled. Or, he tried. His voice had left him hours ago. Everything smelled like blood and vomit and old urine, and he couldn't move away from the stench or the pain. The metal shrieking wouldn't stop, and everything was a blur beyond his eyes. He thought he might die as the thing in his leg shifted. He clawed at the concrete with weak, pawing, raw fingertips. He didn't understand anymore.

A warm hand gripped his and stopped him from rubbing his skin away. The hand squeezed. “We'll get you out of here soon, son. What's his name?”

Sombody said something beyond his hearing. A woman looking at a billfold. She wore a red windbreaker, red that was the same color as the sky over his head. Her hair was curly and colored like a candle flame.

“Derek,” said the voice. The hand squeezed. “I want you to listen to me. This is very important, okay? Are you listening?”
“Dad,” Derek whispered, hoarse, almost delirious. He shivered.

“You're going to be fine, but you need to stop struggling,” the man said. “Okay? Derek, can you hold still for me? I know your leg hurts.”

The makeshift tent above him flapped in the wind. Derek looked at the man, who came into focus for the first time. The stranger had crouched over Derek, shielding Derek's face from the bitter wind. The man was old. Old and balding and unfamiliar.

The metal shrieking resumed. The thing in his leg juddered. Derek closed his eyes, too sick and tired to keep them open.

Time stood still in hell.

“It took them until morning to find me, and then it took them another hour just to get me off the rebar with a fucking hacksaw, so shut your mouth,” Derek said.

Owen held up his hands in surrender.

“Derek, I...” Mark began.

The piteous look on Mark's face made Derek want to strike something. His muscles tensed into rigid lines of steel. A scathing retort coiled on Derek's tongue, a serpent, waiting to strike. His jaw opened, and he almost snapped. Verbally. In two. Both. He'd lain there in agony, pinned like a bug for an entomologist in the rain for hours, and they made it sound like losing his nerve was frivolous.

“Pathetic,” said Mr. Clark in Derek's ear. “Letting yourself be ruled by fear.”

He stared at Owen and Mark, who both stared back at him, their eyes narrowing, like they thought Derek might leap into the deep end of the going postal pool at any second. Which was actually a justified assessment, given Derek's recent history. Wasn't it?

Back up. Give the man some damned space. Shoo!

Sense and reason returned in a rush, and Derek's jaw clacked shut. An embarrassed red flush ripped across Derek's face. He looked at his water glass to keep from having to look at them. He was being an idiot, freaking out about things long forgotten and passed into history. He'd let Cristina push his fucking buttons, and then he'd run a mile with the disquiet she'd caused.

Fuck his fucking temper and his fucking mental disease.

“Forget I said anything,” Derek replied, forcing himself to breathe slowly. “This was a stupid idea. I hate motorcycles.”

“Coward,” whispered Mr. Clark, insidious and cold.

Horrible silence stretched. Derek tried to calm down. Tried to force himself back into that place he'd been before. Hating every moment of being here, but struggling through. He fumbled for the notebook. Staying, he wrote. Number ten. I need to get back to normal.

But writing the choice didn't feel like an accomplishment or a badge of honor, and the messy jumble in his head didn't feel normal. He felt done. Like someone had scooped out all his brains with a spoon and left him hollow. Like he was running on the fumes of sentience.
He looked woozily at the room, which was now even less crowded. The clamor and crush of people had died to a more tolerable murmur, but he couldn't stop hearing the noise like endless, painful zaps of static on his over-sensitized brain. He'd found normal for a while. He tried to tell himself that was enough.

Please, please, don't push yourself today, he remembered Meredith telling him.

Promise you won't push too hard, she'd said.

Please, don't push yourself. Not today.

Over and over again, she echoed in his head. Same verse. Different day. Ever since he'd fractured himself on the catwalk, she'd been yanking on his reins. Trying to keep him from overextending himself into guaranteed failure.

He'd accomplished a lot. That should be enough. Why didn't it feel like enough? She'd left. Staying wasn't even for Meredith's benefit anymore. There was no reason to stay other than the fact that leaving like this felt like a loss in a long, humiliating stream of losing.

He rubbed the bridge of his nose, trying to ease the ache. This would be easier. It would all be easier if he could just take— He shook his head before that evil thought bloomed in full. He squeezed the side of the table until his grip turned his knuckles ashen-colored, and then he stood. He grabbed his choice journal as he rose from his chair.

Will not take drugs, he thought, too focused on forcing those words into his struggling-to-function brain to worry about writing a coherent plan in his choice journal. Will not take drugs.

Will not take drugs. Will not take anything. Reason? Mental silence followed. He clenched his teeth. Reason? he prompted himself again. A nanosecond of no-fucking-clue became Meredith, and their baby, and his family, and Mark, and Derek's job, and a thousand other things in a tumbling waterfall of that's-why-not, but that horrible, twisting nanosecond of silence had been enough to coil terror in his gut.

He wasn't fucking safe. He was a goddamned time bomb. And he didn't know how to deal with this.

Owen said something. So did Mark. Both of them stared at Derek. Derek blinked. He felt like they'd spoken Greek or Gaelic or Swahili for all the sense they made. His mind had become a snarled mess of gobbledygook, and he couldn't straighten out the jumble. He swallowed against the lump in his throat. He was done. Tired, and raw, and done.

Eleven, he thought, too tired to write. Was he on eleven? Did it matter? Leaving. Why? Can't take it anymore. He thought vaguely of that morning, when he'd tried to call Amelia, tried to reach for help, only to have been scared witless and then forget about it in the meantime. God, he needed help. He should be able to go for more than a few hours without thinking about the sweet siren call of backsliding into oblivion.

Mark nodded and stood without hesitation, gathering their coats. “Okay, man,” he said.

“I can—”

“Not drive yourself,” Mark finished for him. “No way. Give me your keys.”
“But—”

Mark shook his head and held out his hand, palm flat, fingers splayed. “Keys. I'm not asking again.”

“In my coat,” Derek said, his voice soft.

Owen silently watched them gather their things. Whether he thought Derek's lack of explanation or sudden change in demeanor odd, he didn't say a word. He nodded at them, a knowing, deep quality to his stare. “See you tomorrow,” was all he said, and he turned to watch the Mariners game as he nursed the rest of his maybe-Guinness.

The fresh, wet air outside the bar suffused Derek with enough mental fuel to remember simple things like how to breathe and walk and look both ways before crossing the street. Mark followed behind him in the dark, hovering and close, as though he thought Derek might fall. They headed back to the Seattle Grace staff lot where both their cars were parked.

Derek swallowed. He felt shaky enough to fall if he let his thoughts go for a moment, so he didn't begrudge the supervision. Much. He felt like a ghost as he shuffled between the cones of light draping from each streetlamp. A splotch of darkness hit him as he wandered under the busted lamp on the corner where the hospital parking lot became the main drag to the highway. His heart squeezed, but relaxed again as he reentered the dim light and security of the next lamp.

Dropping himself into the passenger seat of Mark's Mustang sent the usual line of pain down his center where his sternum had been split, and Derek grimaced. The pain from the chest incision and the bullet wound had improved a lot, at least. It only appeared when glaringly provoked.

The car wobbled back and forth as Mark swung himself into the driver's seat and slammed shut the door. Mark checked the mirrors. He nudged the rear view mirror to the left a millimeter, and then turned the key in the ignition. The engine rumbled to life. He flipped on the headlights as Derek put on his seatbelt. The engine revved, and Mark backed the car out of its narrow space.

Nothing but the swish of passing cars and the plink of random raindrops filled the space between them. Derek let his eyelids hang low over his eyes. He lost sight of the road through his dark eyelashes in the dark cabin. The tick-ticking Snapple cap sound of the blinker as Mark pulled onto the highway soothed Derek, and he drifted.

“I'm sorry about the motorcycle stuff,” Mark said as he accelerated, and slowly departing reality snapped back into place.

Derek rested against the window. “It's fine.”

“You haven't talked about it in years,” Mark said. “I thought, since you brought it up—”

“It was stupid of me to consider it.”

“It's not stupid. You loved riding that bike.”

Derek shrugged, tired. Wasted. He watched the glowing red tail lights of dozens of cars in the dark. Yellow blinkers flicked on and off at random, like fireflies in the distance. “I lost my nerve,” he said. “Thinking about that after a day like this was pretty stupid.”

“What happened?” Mark said. He pressed the accelerator to pass a BMW tottering along in the slow lane. He used his blinker again, and he didn't speed, either. It was a relaxing switch from Meredith's chaotic, cursing impressions of Mario Andretti, which Derek didn't think he could have handled tonight. Not after everything else.

“What do you mean what happened?” Derek said, careful to keep his tone neutral.

“You said 'a day like this', which implies something happened,” Mark said as he pulled back into the right lane.

The gun is on the floor. Nobody is holding it. It's not pointed at you. It's not pointed at anybody.

Derek rubbed his temples. “I just had a rough day. That's all.”

“What made it rough?” Mark prodded.

I'm still your boss, you know. I could easily take this 'job opportunity' away again.

“Look, can we drop this right now?” Derek said. “I'll tell you later.”

“Okay,” Mark said. No argument. Just quiet support.

Derek swallowed. He'd really been a fucking jackass with Mark the last few months. He made sure to say, “Thank you,” his words soft and enunciated, this time, instead of putting it off again. Putting it off meant he would never say it, and Mark needed to hear it. It was the least Derek could do.

Mark shrugged, and his shirt rustled with the movement, but he said nothing.

Derek turned his head and stared at Mark's shadowed profile. The lights of passing cars and the blur of speeding landscape made a bright kaleidoscope against the far window. When Mark had first appeared in Seattle, looking smarmy and full of himself as he'd chatted with an unsuspecting Meredith, Derek had been pissed that the man who'd betrayed him and stolen his wife would dare to follow, and had been even more incredulous when Mark had made it clear he hoped to reconcile. Who reconciled with the man who fucked your wife? That wasn't really a reconcilable thing. Or so he'd thought.

Time had proven his assessment false.

Somehow.

I didn't come to Seattle for Addison. I didn't come to Seattle to get chief. I came to Seattle for you. Okay? I came to Seattle to get you back.

The memory tickled him like a feather, and he guffawed in the quiet space.

“What?” Mark said.

Derek wiped tears from his eyes. “Nothing,” he said, “Nothing. Just something you said once.”

Mark frowned. “What the fuck did I say that was that funny?”

Which only made Derek roll with laughter again. “I'm sorry,” he said, panting. His stomach hurt. “I'm sorry, it's just...” He was fucking tired. And worn out. And everything seemed ludicrous anyway. He let himself laugh as he wiped his face.

“Glad I could amuse you,” Mark said, half-irritated, half-wry as the car tore through the dark. “You're not going crazy are you?”

Derek sniffed as he recovered his composure. “No,” he said.
He and Mark had been through a lot. Mark had been there before Addison. Before Dad had died. He'd been there since their lives had been defined by single digit ages. It was remarkable, really, in an age when most friendships were measured in months or years, not decades. They'd been through grade school. High school. College. Medical school. Private practice. All of it, together.

In his own way, Mark had always been there.

Derek stared into the rear view mirror. The splashing sea of white headlights behind him illuminated Derek's face. He stared at the telltale fleck on his forehead. A dent. He'd told Meredith that was why he didn't ride motorcycles anymore, but the scar wasn't really a why, so much as an echo. A reminder. Every day. A message in written blood. You're afraid of this, and you let it own you. He touched the rough skin, the shallow impression left where his skin had broken years ago. He remembered the topsy-turvy world when he'd woken up. The waiting. Feeling sick with dizziness. Feeling cold and hurting.

He grimaced. He had so many ugly scars that reminded him of so many ugly things. He closed his eyes as he dropped his hand and pressed his palm against his ribs, over the spot where the bullet had torn him apart. His choice journal jabbed him in the hip. He'd stuffed it in his jeans pocket at some point. He couldn't remember when.

“Can you fix my scars?” Derek said.

The rush of the moving car spread into the silence. Derek looked at Mark, who blinked. “What?” Mark said.

“The bullet wound and the sternal incision,” Derek said. “Can you fix them?”

“No scar repair would be perfect. Not even mine.”

“Reduce them, then?” Derek said, unable to curb the hope in his voice. “Can you do that?”

“Um...” Mark glanced at him for a moment before looking back at the dark road. “I'd have to look at them.”

“But you've seen them,” Derek said.

Mark snorted. “I'm not Meredith,” he said. “I don't make a habit of staring at your naked chest.”

Derek swallowed. “They're really bad.”

“I'm sure they're not that bad,” Mark said as he guided the car onto the exit ramp. A few more minutes, and they would be home.

“You just said you'd need to look at them.”

“I'm a plastic surgeon,” Mark said with a shrug. “I would have noticed them if they were bad, inappropriate staring or not.”

“Hypothetically speaking—”

“You should let the sternal incision heal for at least a year before you talk about surgical correction,” Mark said. “A lot of it will fade on its own if you just give it a chance.”

“But the bullet wound?”

A long pause followed. “You could get it fixed, now,” Mark said.
Derek clenched his fists. “What would the procedure be like?”

“I'd have to see the bullet wound.”

“Hypothetically,” he said.

“It'd be easy,” Mark replied. “Bullet wounds from handguns are tiny.”

“Would I need painkillers?” Derek said.

“You'd probably be fine with prescription strength ibuprofen.”

“So, not an opioid.”

“Nope,” Mark said. “No narcotics.”

“During?”

“Hmm. We'd use conscious sedation, probably,” Mark said. “You'd be supervised the entire time, and you likely wouldn't remember being high anyway. You'd wake up feeling groggy, and that might last a day or two, but that's it.”

The car bounced on its shocks as Mark pulled into the empty driveway. Neither Meredith's old Jeep nor Cristina's bike were parked at the house. No lights glowed in the windows, which meant Lexie and Alex were still out, too, or in bed. Maybe, they'd all gone somewhere else after they'd left the bar. Samantha barked in greeting, audible as a small, bass staccato underlying the nighttime rush of crickets. The Mustang's engine ticked as it settled in the dark.

“Will you fix it?” Derek said. He stared at Mark. “Please?”

Mark frowned. “Derek...”

Derek swallowed. “I'm choosing to fix it,” he said. His voice cracked. “I want it gone. Please, I need it gone.”

Mark stared at Derek in the dark. The streetlights caught his gaze. His eyes glittered. He didn't move, and Derek closed his eyes. Mark wouldn't do it. Why? Derek didn't know, but the crush of disappointment made a lump form in his throat. He didn't think he could stomach getting a consult from somebody else. He hated taking his shirt off for anybody but Meredith. Everything was so ugly. His eyes burned, and he turned away before he spilled, a victim of exhaustion and overspent hope.

“Okay, but not me,” Mark said. “One of my staff. And not until we've done a real consult instead of car hypotheticals in the dark.”

“Why not you?” Derek said.

“The horrendous ethics of me operating on you aside, I'd rather hold your hand through it.”

Derek blinked. A snicker tugged at his lips, but he forced his expression flat. “Hold my hand?”

“You know,” Mark said, his tone wry. He sighed. “I'm glad Yang's not here with that tape recorder.”

Derek chuckled as he popped his seatbelt loose. “Thank you,” Derek said as he slipped out of the car cabin to his feet. Mark pulled the key from the ignition, grumbling, broad shoulders curled around him, and Derek had the wild image in his head of a disgruntled, ruffled owl. Mark slid out of the car, and the cabin light turned off as the door slammed shut.

Derek's achy muscles took his weight as he stood beside the car, and he sighed, breathing in the chilly, wet air. A raindrop plopped on his nose. Leaves rustled overhead. His body trembled with tiredness, and he leaned against the cool metal of the car. Breathing.

“Need help?” Mark said from somewhere in the darkness.

“No,” Derek said. “I'm okay.” He shuffled away from the metal island toward the house. They clomped over the damp earth. The porch loomed. His keys jingled in Mark's hands. “Are you staying?”

“Meredith's not here,” Mark said.

Derek's lip twitched with amusement. “Yes, then?”

“Couch okay?” Mark said.

“Yeah,” Derek said.

They walked up the steps, and Mark jabbed the key into the lock and twisted. Samantha barked on the other side, her paws scrabbling and thumping on the floor as she jumped excitedly. When Mark pushed through the doorway, Derek moved in behind him, and in moments, a hundred pound pile of fur accosted Derek with slobbering kisses all up and down his arms. Derek bent down, grinning faintly, to greet the dog. He stroked her soft, silky fur as Mark hung their light coats in the hall closet.

“Hey, Sam,” Derek said, a weary, lackluster greeting. “Are you hungry?”

The dog skipped on her feet, and Derek corralled her into the kitchen to feed her. She gobbled down her food and licked the bowl clean in less than ten minutes. When she finished, she looked up at him expectantly. Derek rubbed the bridge of his nose as he leaned against the counter. Samantha moved to sit by his feet. She stared at him with knowing, sad eyes. Derek ached with a familiar longing, despite all his horrific realizations, despite everything.

When he wasn't jamming his head full of thoughts and worries and other noise, the words always came back to him. If only he could take... If only. Just one. The if-onlys had been needling him all day. They'd nearly taken him under like a riptide, today. Whether he'd destroyed his career still remained to be seen.

Small social victories aside, he'd made a big mess today.

Samantha butted his thigh with her head, whining, and he sighed against the lump in his throat. He rubbed her fur, wishing this would just end. All of it.

He wanted normal back.

“Would you take her for a walk?” Derek said as Mark entered the kitchen, headed for the fridge.

Mark stopped. Shrugged. “Sure.”

Derek swallowed. “A long one?”

Mark's eyes narrowed. The subtle suspicion in Mark's gaze hurt, but it was deserved, and Derek didn't refute it. “I need to make a phone call,” Derek said. He lost his focus on the room. “I need...”

Help. Derek needed help.

Mark stared at him for a long, discerning moment. Then he nodded. He grabbed Samantha's leash from its hook on the wall by the fridge. Samantha bounced into motion as soon as she saw the familiar leather lead, before Mark had a chance to say, “C'mon, Sam.” Derek barely heard the door open and close, or Samantha's happy yip as Mark led her off the porch into the night.

Derek took his cell phone out of his pocket and stared at it. For a long time. Silence stretched. He sat at the kitchen table and put the phone down in front of him, still staring.

He could do this. Call Amelia. He'd been flirting with the idea all day.

With a deep breath, he dialed, and he listened to the minor tone of the phone ringing with his eyes closed. He had no idea what he would say. Or how he would say it. Or anything. None. And the more the phone rang, the more doubt set down twisting, knotted roots. It was getting late. Maybe, she was asleep. Maybe, this wasn't a good time to talk. They'd gotten back on speaking terms again after years of estrangement. This would be too much. She'd laugh at him. She'd laugh, and ridicule him, and he'd deserve the disdain because he'd been such a fucking ass—

“Hey, what's up?” she said, her voice light, almost as though he'd caught her in the middle of a burst of laughter. He heard familiar, canned laughter in the background. Voices. Like a sitcom.

Shocked at the sudden change in circumstance, he didn't speak. Couldn't speak. Help. It was such a simple word. And yet so difficult to say. He'd almost hoped, toward the end of his wait, that she wouldn't pick up the phone. Then, at least, he could have said he'd tried. He licked his lips as they went dry.

What was he supposed to say? By the way, I got addicted to my pain medication, and I need your advice on how to deal with it. Seriously? He'd scared monsters out from her closet. He'd packed her lunches – he'd even cut the crusts off her peanut butter sandwiches. He'd held her little body against his to protect her from two evil men with a gun.

He heard her screaming, a distant memory.

Dad, she'd said as Michael Shepherd's life had left his body. Daddy?

“Derek, stop sitting on your damned phone,” Amelia said.

He shook his head. Swallowed. “H... Hi.”

“Not a butt dial, then?” she said.

He could feel her smile, and he smiled, too. Distant. Detached. Like he was watching his body, but his soul was floating nearby on the ceiling. “Not unless my ass is speaking,” his body said.

“I don't know, you do tend to talk out your ass a lot,” Amelia said, her tone playful.

“I knew I could count on you for a disturbing picture for my mind's eye,” his other self responded wryly.

The wet sound of an air kiss tumbled over the line. “I love you, too,” she said. “So, what's up?”

Reality snapped back, and the funny floating sensation shattered, leaving him in the seat at the table with the phone at his ear, talking to his baby sister, with no more time left for stalling. He squeezed the phone until his knuckles hurt. Buttons bleeped under the mashing pressure of his cheek.

“Derek?”

“I need your advice,” he said, forcing himself to breathe evenly. He could do this if he could just... breathe. Crickets sang outside the window in the blackness. He thought he heard a familiar bark in the distance. The sink faucet dripped, and the refrigerator hummed.

“You called me for advice?”

He sat rigid in his chair. “Yes.”

He heard shuffling noises through the line. The blare of the television in the background flicked off. “Hang on,” she said, “I need to get a coat.”

“What?”

“It's hell, and there's ice everywhere,” she said.

“Very funny, Amy.”

She laughed. Noise cluttered the line. He imagined her settling on the sofa for a long chat. “So, what do you want my advice on?”

“I'm...” And addict. A hypocrite. Sorry. Shit. He swallowed. “I had a bad day,” he said, his voice creaking.

“Didn't you work today?”

“Yeah.”

“You need help with a work problem?” she said, her tone almost... hoping. Dreaming.

“No,” he said. He closed his eyes. “No, I...”

“Damn. I guess that would be more than just hell freezing over.”

“Amelia!” he snapped.

She rolled her eyes. He couldn't see her, but he knew she did, which only rose his hackles. “What?” she said.

“Can you be serious for a minute?” he said. “Please?”

She snorted. The bluster of air through the phone made him wince.

“I need... to know,” he said. He took a breath. “How you deal with constantly wanting something you can't have.”

Silence.

“It figures,” she said at the end of forever.

“What does?”
“You're asking me for advice, and you're still making me feel like a horrible failure,” she said.

He blinked. “I didn't—”

“I mean, really,” she snapped. “Maybe, from your godly perch, my goals might look like unattainable frivolities, but—”

He slammed his fist on the table and stood. His chair roared as he pushed it backward with his knees. He stalked toward the refrigerator. “I didn't mean it like that; god, damn it!”

“Well, what did you mean?” she demanded.

“Cravings!” he said, agitated. He turned and paced toward the doorway. When he reached it, he turned and moved back toward the fridge. “How do you deal with cravings?”

“You're going to compare some new funky health-kick diet craving to my drug addiction?” she said, her tone incredulous.

“No, I'm comparing my drug addiction to yours,” he said, trying to keep his voice even.

A muffled sound filtered through the line. “You?” she said. “Seriously? You?”

He stopped walking. “Yes.”

She burst out laughing, and it was an awful sound that made his ears tingle and his chest tighten and his jaw clench. His skin flamed.

He hung up and tossed his phone on the table, disgusted with himself. With her. With everything. And then he stood there. Still. But shaking. He blinked, and the world blurred with hot tears. He wiped his face. He stared at the wet, salty mess on his skin. Leaking like a fucking sieve. Again. His lip curled.

With a roar, he looked wildly for something to toss or kick or throw or... something. He swept all the magnets and coupons and menus and business cards from the fridge, sending everything flying. Magnets pinged on the floor, bounced, and scattered. Papers fluttered to the ground. His chest screamed in pain with the violence of his movement – too much too soon after his injuries — which only made the churning coil of ugliness feel worse. He grabbed the fridge handle and squeezed.

When the front door opened, at first he thought it was Mark, returning with Samantha. A giggle and a low-pitched murmur told him differently. Lexie, looking back over her shoulder, walked into the kitchen. “Want a beer?” she called.

“Sure,” Alex said from the living room.

Derek knew she'd spotted him and the mess of magnets from the gasp. “Derek?” she said.

His fingers clenched. “Please, just go away,” he said without looking.

“But—”

He slammed the flat of his palm against the fridge. “Go away. Go away. Please. Go away.” He shook his head back and forth like some sort of crazed animal. “I can't do this tonight.”

“Can't... do...” Lexie began, her soft voice turned up in question, and then she stopped. A pause followed. Derek clenched his jaws, pressing his weight into the fridge as he tried to vent tension. It hurt. At last, she said, “Okay.”

The door closed. He heard the thump of her footsteps on the stairs, followed by a heavier set. He didn't care what they did, as long as it wasn't near him.

His cell phone rang, startling him. He glanced darkly at the display. Amelia. His teeth clenched, and he looked away. He loved her, but god, he hated her sometimes. When she tried to call again, he stalked to the table, denied the call, and stuck the phone on vibrate.

The house phone rang next. He let it go. The answering machine picked up after four rings.

“Derek, are you at home?” Amelia spoke through the void. She sounded upset. Frantic. Different on the land line. A lot less distorted. “I'm sorry, Derek. I'm sorry.” He stared at the phone. At the answering machine. A wet sniffle tore through the line, and his angry shell cracked around the edges. “I thought you were joking, or... or something. I don't know. Please, pick up. Are you there? Please?”

Please. The word hung in the air like a noose waiting to wrap around his neck. God, damn it. He snatched the phone off the hook. “Look, forget it,” he snapped.

She sniffed. “You're really not joking?”

“No, I'm not fucking joking,” he said. “Just forget it.”

“No, I won't forget it!” she snapped back at him. He imagined her stomping her foot. “You're not joking, and you called me, of all people.”

“So, what?”

“So, I know you wouldn't call me unless you're standing on a figurative bridge right now, and getting ready to jump, and maybe not even then,” she replied without hesitation. “Only an idiot would let this go, and contrary to your feelings on the matter, I'm not one.”

He clenched the receiver. “I don't think you're an idiot,” he said. “I've never said that!”

He didn't know how he made it back to the table. To his seat. He stared at the fridge. At all the magnets and papers he'd sent flying. The kitchen appeared as though a violent storm had blown through. He leaned onto the table, annoyed at the aching in his chest. He pressed his free hand against the fault line. The one Cristina had cut into him to save his life. Some days, he didn't feel saved. He moved to rub the bridge of his nose, trying to rid himself of the headache that hadn't loosed its grip since that morning.

When he'd fucked up.

“I...” he began, only to lose his voice. His lower lip quivered. He pressed the phone against his ear and squeezed his eyes shut. The popped-loose sensation returned, and he floated. Above. The pained, upset breath he heard, that wasn't him. He wasn't crying again, certainly not for his baby sister to hear. That was some guy sitting at the table who looked like him.

“Tell me what made your day really bad,” Amelia prodded. She didn't mention his sniveling. Didn't tease. “Tell me what happened.”
“How do you live like this?” the stranger said, his voice a harsh, grating whisper. He swallowed and clenched his fists, and tears slashed his cheeks. “I need...”

“How long have you been clean?”

“A month.”

“Derek, those first few months are hell,” Amelia said, her voice soft. Flowing. Calm. He drifted back into himself, listening. “They are the seventh level of hell, and there's no real way to make them not be hell. You have to slog through them one day at a time, one hour at a time, one minute at a time, one second at a time, and the effort involved makes you feel like you're climbing Mount Everest with no physical preparation or gear. Why do you think I kept slipping?”

He wiped his eyes. “I thought...”

“You thought I was weak, and I didn't care enough to stop using.”

He didn't reply. He couldn't. Because that was exactly what he'd thought, and now that he was here, in this place... he felt like shit for it.

“It's okay,” she said. “It's what most people who haven't been here think. I've made my peace with the stigma years ago.”

He rocked in his seat. “I need it to stop. Please, tell me it stops.”

“Tell you what stops?”

“This horrible wanting,” he said. “I don't want to want. I want to be like I was.”

“You won't ever stop wanting, and you won't ever be like you were,” she said. No hesitation.

Her surety raked him like claws. He shook his head. “No,” he snapped. “No, it can't be like that.”

“It is what it is, whether you want it to be or not,” she replied. She sounded almost... sad.

He took a deep, shuddering breath. “God, Amelia, I—”

“Look,” she said. “Dealing with an addiction sucks. To quote my favorite role-model, 'It's hard, and it's fighting, and it's every day.' You've had a taste, now. You will never stop wanting. But you can want a lot of things, Derek. Eventually, it'll be a small dab on your plate that you can push aside, 99.9% of the time. You won't always feel like you're in a famine by saying no. Just hang in there. I promise it does get better.”

“I can't,” he said. How could he have done this to himself?

“Weak,” said Mr. Clark. “Pathetic.”

“You can,” she responded. “You can do it. If I can do it, you certainly can.”

“How?” Derek said, his tone hopeless.

“You're a stubborn ass,” she said. “Use it. Be stubborn. Say no to yourself, and keep saying it, and if you can't say it, call me, anytime, day or night, and I'll yell at you until you can.”

He swallowed. “Amelia...”
“That's what you did this morning, isn't it?” she said. “That wasn't really a butt dial.”

“It wasn't.”

“You were listening.”

“Yes,” he said. “I got...” He pulled his hands through his hair and he sighed. “I got startled and hung up.”

“You don't have to talk when it happens, Derek,” Amelia said. “Just call, and I'll yell in your ear.”

He closed his eyes. When it happens, she'd said. As if she knew he'd have a bad day again with immutable certainty. He wondered how many bad days she'd weathered alone because he'd abandoned her. All of them had, except Mom, which meant the important stuff, like getting clean, she'd done primarily on her own, with her own strength of will. He needed people to hold him up, but she'd somehow managed without, and that was... illuminating. About her. About him.

“I'm sorry,” he said. “I'm so sorry for what I did to you.”

“You didn't do anything.”

“That's my point,” he said. “I gave up. I gave up on you, and I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I didn't know.”

Silence stretched across eternity, interminable, and he would have thought she'd hung up if he hadn't heard her breathing softly on the other end of the line. “Okay,” she said, her tone even.

Sadness squeezed his heart. He remembered that morning. When he'd spoken to Dr. Kepner and told her indirectly that he couldn't forgive her. The thought that he'd ruined something so thoroughly with his own blooded sister churned inside, a cold, hurting ball. She was his family, and this was wrong. You forgave your family. You loved your family. But it was his fault, not hers. He'd broken those rules first, and he wouldn't press the matter. He didn't deserve any better than what she offered him, now, anyway. He imagined he deserved worse.

It's hard, and it's fighting, and it's every day, she'd said. That assessment felt painfully real. Accurate. He had to believe her, at least, that this would get better. She'd done this. Been in this place. Been in a worse place, because she hadn't had Meredith, or Mark, or Miranda Bailey, or Richard, or anybody. Her friends had all been users. Coke heads. Alcoholics. He imagined when she'd quit, she'd found herself without any social structure at all.

Hard.

Fighting.

Every day.

He sighed. “Amy?”

“Yeah?”

“Who's the role-model you quoted?”

“Buffy the Vampire Slayer,” she said. “Why?”

He snickered. “Just curious.”

“That show was a serious commentary on a lot of social issues!”
“I'm sure,” he replied.

“Just watch it before you critique it, you ass.”

He raised his eyebrows, laughing incredulously. “Did I say a word?”

“No, but I heard you smile.”

“You heard me smile,” he said. He snorted. “Smiles are noisy?”

“You're, you smirky bastard,” she said.

“I love you, too, Amy,” he said. “Thank you for the advice.”

In that moment, he heard her smile, too. “You're welcome,” she said. “You'll be okay tonight?”

He closed his eyes for a moment, breathing as he listened to the hissing silence on the line.

“Derek?”

“I'm... not dying,” he answered, recalling what he'd said earlier that day to Meredith.

“It'll get better,” she said. “I swear, Derek.”

She sounded so sure. As sure as she'd sounded when she'd told him he'd likely slip again. Have another bad day. Or days. He pinched the bridge of his nose and sighed. His headache made him bleary. Tired.

“I believe you,” he said.

She chuckled, the laugh a light sound against his dark exhaustion. “You're not convincing me hell isn't frozen,” she said, no derision in her tone.

He couldn't help the tired smile that creased his expression. “Good night, Amy,” he said.

“Good night,” she replied.

The line clicked as she disconnected, and after a long silence, the dial tone blared in his ear, endless, a siren. He lumbered to his feet to return the phone to its cradle. He stared at the mess he'd made. The magnets. The papers. He picked those up gingerly, mindful of his protesting chest and the ache in his skull. When he finished, he sat.

He leaned back in his chair, staring at nothing for the longest time as he listened to the crickets sing. Eventually, he gathered himself. He pulled out his notebook. The paper crinkled as he fiddled with the end of the 2nd page, reading his messy script. The page felt soft under his fingertips.

There was a lot there, and he hadn't even written everything that'd flown through his head. He'd made a lot of choices. More than he ever would have noticed without this little booklet, and that made him feel... better. Amelia had made him feel better, despite the harsh reality she delineated. Going to a bar and having fun playing darts, even for just little while... That made him feel better, too.

He picked up his pen. He recalled hitting eleven several times in his head, but he'd only written up to ten.

11, he wrote. Asked Mark about fixing my scars. Why?
He tapped the pen against the paper. Why? Reasons tumbled through his head. They were ugly. Every time he saw them in the mirror it happened again. Getting shot. Falling to the floor. I hate them, he wrote. That seemed simple enough.

That one was easy to come up with.

He heard voices outside the house. Familiar ones. His ears perked. Meredith and Mark. Talking on the front porch. The deep timbre of Mark's voice rumbled through the air, accentuated with Meredith's softer, lighter tones. A car rumbled past on the street far beyond, and the windows rattled briefly.

Derek took a breath. He didn't want to do this. He wanted to bury all of today and never think about any of it again, but Amelia echoed in his head. Hard. Fighting. Every day.

13, he scribbled. Telling the truth.

There were so many reasons for that one, he couldn't quantify anything in a sentence small enough to fit on the sheet, but he wanted Meredith to know what he'd done with the prescription that day. Even if the consequences meant he would be sleeping alone that night. He wanted Mark to know, too. Mark had been there. Always. He deserved to know.

Derek took another deep breath, steepled his fingers, and he waited for them to come inside. He didn't wait long.

“Hey,” Meredith said as she stepped into the kitchen. Her gaze flicked to the wall clock. “You're still up,” she added, sounding surprised, but in a good way, as if she considered the fact that he was still up at ten as wonderful as she'd thought his attempt to go out had been. She tucked a loose, wispy strand of hair behind her ear and smiled at him, warm and hopeful, almost bashful. Samantha trotted past to collapse in her crate in the dining room. Mark loomed behind Meredith in the doorway, leather leash in hand.

Derek swallowed. “Hi,” he responded, unable to stop his smile, lackluster and small though it was, at the reassuring sight of her. “Yeah, I'm still up.” He glanced at Mark. “Thank you for taking her.”

Mark shrugged. “No problem. Did you finish your phone call?”

“A minute ago,” Derek said. “Look, um...” He pulled his hands through his hair. He glanced at Meredith. “I need to tell you something.”

Mark snickered. “Should I take Samantha out for another lap around the block?”

“No, I...” Derek said. “No, you stay. I want to tell you, too.”

Meredith's smile slipped, which made his heart squeeze. Both of them watched him expectantly. He thought about asking them to sit down at the table. Or grab a drink. Or... something. Meredith hadn't even taken her coat off or slid onto the couch to relax for a moment, and... No. He shook his head. No. His number thirteen would be of the ripping-the-band-aid variety, he decided.

“It's sort of a confession,” he said, and Meredith's serious expression deepened. Mark's, too.

Meredith moved to the chair across from him and sank into it, folding her arms across her chest. Mark still hovered in the doorway. Silence stretched.
“A confession about what?” Meredith said.

Derek looked at her. Her soft, gray eyes pulled at him. He squeezed his fingers, clutching his notebook until the pages crinkled, and relaxed. “I did something awful today,” he began, and then he told them everything.

They listened.

Later, he would write more lines in his notebook by the midnight glow of his bedside lamp.

14. Took a hot bath with Mere – she wanted the company.

15. Going to sleep – tomorrow might be a good day.

He would slide against his sleeping wife, spooning her, marveling over the freedom of movement that, weeks before, he hadn't possessed. He would inhale the soft scent of her hair and stroke her arm and wonder at his luck that he'd found her years ago, just a girl in a bar. His girl.

He would close his eyes.

He would dream.
Chapter 23

The blare of the alarm pulled Derek out of a blank, sound sleep. He flinched and slapped at his nightstand, but the awful noise didn't stop. He tried again. His palm smashed into something lumpy and hard. Whatever it was crashed to the floor, followed by a thunk and the dripping sound of water. His dormant clock? A water bottle? He didn't know or care about anything other than the fact that the noise didn't stop.

“No,” whined the warm, soft body beside him. Blankets rustled. A hand squeezed his naked hip under the covers.

He gazed blearily across the bed, over the fuzzy lump of his wife. Blinking red numbers stared back at him from Meredith's nightstand. 4:30 AM. They had almost an hour before she needed to head for the shower or risk being late for pre-rounds. He flopped back onto the pillow with a groan.

He breathed heavily into his pillow. A full-of-cotton sensation throbbed behind his eyes. He didn't open them as the noise shredded his sensitive eardrums. “Mere,” he said into the pillowcase, muffled, trying to curl away from the sound.

“Shut up,” she said.

“Alarm.”

“Don't care.”

“Work?”

“No,” she moaned. “It's not Saturday, yet. It can't be.”

He sighed. “Mere...”

“Your fault. Shut up.”

“My fault?”

“Peeing. Puking.” She rolled over and slapped off her alarm as she grumbled. “All night. Stupid bully sperm.”

Too exhausted for argument, he didn't take her grumpy challenge.

They lay quiet in the darkness. Moonlight spilled through the window, and something in his brain rebelled. He breathed. The idea of being awake physically hurt. This was too early. Human beings should not be up when the moon was still out. He'd worked his first full week. It was his first day off. He was exhausted, and the sticky, cloudy feeling behind his eyelids persisted. He was a morning person, but he hit his limits with the sunrise. Earlier than sunrise wasn't morning. It was fucking night, still. He had no idea how he'd ever managed to get up to fish at 3:00 AM when he'd lived in his trailer. That Derek seemed like a lunatic, now.

He pulled his pillow over his head. His head swirled. The fitted sheet pressed against his nose. The mattress smelled like her. Them. He wanted to curl into it and lose himself back in the quiet blank he'd been wrenched from with the alarm. He didn't want to move.
Heavy footsteps plodded in the hall outside the bedroom, which made him tense. Alex, he tried to reason with himself. Alex, not a stranger. The door across the hall opened and closed. The water ran in the tub basin for a moment and then shifted into a plink, plink, plinkplinkplink as the shower turned on full blast. The hypnotic sound of the falling water pulled Derek away from alertness.

He relaxed and drifted.

The hairs on the nape of his neck prickled first. He sensed eyes on him. Benevolent. Meredith. He lay there and let her stare. He felt a bubble of body heat millimeters from his skin, as if she hovered just above him. The pillow lifted off his head, the motion gentle, and her fingers splayed against his shoulder, a light touch that she slowly pushed her weight into, as if to announce her presence before subjecting him to the full, heady truth of her body. The biting, cold air outside the sheets pressed into his skin, only to be eclipsed as she mashed herself against him, and they became one sleepy, melded lump of wishing-it-wasn't-Saturday.

“We did make a date,” she said eventually. Her breaths hit his neck, thick and heavy in that half-asleep way. Like she wanted to get that last hour of slumber, but wasn't letting herself.

“We could skip it.”

“But we're already up.”

He dragged his face across the sheets, turning toward her voice, but he didn't open his eyes. “The me that made that date last night was happily ensconced in 10:00 PM.”

“4:30 AM didn't seem that early last night,” she grumbled.

So fucking true, he thought. He searched for the pillow she'd stolen to pull it back over his head and blot out the approaching day, but he couldn't find it. He gave up, flopping flat on the bed.

“Mere, I'm really tired.”

Silence stretched. He felt her watching him. His skin twitched.

“No, we can't skip it,” she said. Her fingers ran through his hair. His scalp tickled. His body relaxed. She pressed against him, her tiny weight a solid, warm reassurance at his side. “We could do a quickie.”

“Meredith, it wouldn't be a quickie.”

She flipped onto her back next to him and sighed as she stared at the ceiling. The mattress jiggled as she shifted. “Whatever. A longie, then.”

“But a longie is long,” he said.

He felt her frowning. “First, it was your bad day,” she said. “And then I went shopping with Cristina and Lexie after my shift, and you were out cold before I even got home. Last night, we agreed to do it today so we could sleep. We made a date, and I won't see you again until tomorrow evening, and then some other reason will pop up, I'm sure, and we can't. We can't let ourselves be those people.”

“What people?”

“People who get pregnant and never have sex again.”

“Meredith, it's been one busy week. And we had sex on Thursday!”
Another set of footfalls thumped down the hallway. The bathroom door in the main hallway rattled on its hinges as Lexie pounded on it. “Alex!” Lexie said. “Alex, come on. Stop stealing all the hot water, you hog!”

Alex muttered something inaudible through all the water and two closed doors.

“Well, you're a selfish jerk!” Lexie replied, and she stalked away.

Derek listened to Meredith breathe. The shower ran. A car passed outside on the street. Birds had begun chirping, a precursor to the dawn that would legitimately bring the darkness into day.

Meredith sighed. “This is how it starts, isn't it?”

Derek frowned. “How what starts?”

“I'm going to have a beach ball in my freaking stomach, soon.”

“Mmm,” he murmured. “Our beach ball.”

“But it'll be in my stomach.”

“Typically, that's where unborn beach balls are, yes,” he said.

“It'll be in my stomach, Derek.”

“So?”

The blankets rustled. “You're not going to want to do quickies or longies or anything with a beach ball in the way. And you're probably going to hog all the hot water in the shower because you won't care about me anymore.”

“What?” he said.

“It's logical!”

He fought the urge to shake his head in wonderment. “Meredith, if you want me to have sex with you while you have a beach ball in the way, trust me,” he said. “The beach ball won't stop me. I'll find a way.”

“I want you to have sex with me, now, and you're not doing it, and this is already a rain check date,” she countered.

“Meredith, I'm really just tired,” he said. “Beach balls hadn't even crossed my mind.”

“You're never just tired. Not for sex.”

His eyes snapped open. He stared at the pale blur of her neck. A sticky, tired feeling stuck behind his eyes. The meds, probably. Stupid somnolence. “Mere—”

“And you didn't even wake up last night.”

“Mere—”

“So, you can't play the had-a-nightmare exhaustion card.”

“Meredith!” he said, trying to capture her attention.
“What!”

He squeezed her tiny hand and pulled it to his lips. He kissed her knuckles. Her skin smelled nice. A mix of the cocoa from her lotion, and the remains of lavender. “You really think I don't find you attractive anymore?”

“No,” she admitted, her tone begrudging. “Maybe. No.”

“Maybe?” he said, incredulous that she could have any doubts at all.

He pushed himself from his stomach to his left side. The world spilled blurrily over his eyes as he moved. He found her as he came to rest. A twinge shivered underneath his skin with the new pressure on his side, but he lost his brief thought of pain as his gaze came to a stop on the curve of blanket over her naked body. Time seemed stuck in her orbit, refusing to move forward. The bite of wanting stirred deep inside. His breath hitched.

She lay on her back, staring at him through hooded gray eyes, bathed in the soft glow of moonlight. The loose waves of her hair fell down around her shoulders, messy and unkempt from sleep. Her breasts had swollen with the growth of their baby, and her nipples perked in the chilly air. The blanket came to a stop at her navel.

She had a glow about her skin. The pregnancy. Her desire. He didn't know. Whatever it was, it became her and seduced him all at once, and he almost cursed himself for not looking at her sooner and avoiding this whole argument. She was all beautiful curves and feminine symmetry and softness that he would find thrilling and sexy until the end of his days. No matter what.

He pushed his fingers through her hair. She leaned into the touch, a soft smile on her face that made his heart quiver with a feeling of rightness. She made his world right, even if it was crashing down around him. “Meredith, you're the most beautiful person I've ever met,” he said.

She kissed his hand. “It's just hard, sometimes.”

“Why?” he said, a soft murmur as he tasted her.

“It's really hard to get you interested, sometimes.”

He snapped backward to peer at her. “What?”

She looked away. “It's not your fault.”

“It's not your fault, either,” he said, his tone dark. “It's the fucking Paxil.”

“I know,” she said. “This is stupid. Never mind.”

He frowned. “Is it really that bad?” He remembered needing to be encouraged on Thursday, too. Just like this morning. And it hadn't seemed wrong until she'd pointed it out, now. Which, he supposed, was sort of the tricky, slow poison of SSRIs. When you didn't really want sex all the time, it was hard to care or notice that you didn't really want sex all the time. “I didn't even notice,” he confessed. “I'm sorry.”

She shrugged. “Just takes some perseverance to get you interested, sometimes. It's not a big deal.”

“It's a big deal if you're noticing it. Meredith, I love you. You'll always be the most beautiful woman in the world to me.”
“Even with a beach ball?” she said, gray eyes wide as she looked up at him.

He dipped down to kiss her lips. “Even more with a beach ball,” he murmured against her skin. He slid his palm against her navel, pushing the blankets away as he leaned over her warm body.

“What are you doing?”

“Keeping our date,” he said.

She gave him a coy, small smile, her incisors pressing into the plush red of her lower lip. She reached across the void between them and brushed her palm against his arm. She squeezed. He swallowed.

“Awake, now?” she said, her voice low. Her body whispered across the sheets. She scooted closer, until there was no space between them, only touch. Connection.

He nodded, unable to stop staring. “Oh, yes,” he said.

She pushed the blankets away from his body. The chill air made his skin twitch, not quite a shiver. Her pupils dilated as she looked at his naked skin. She touched his chest, her palm against his thundering heartbeat. Hairs on his pectorals tickled and shifted as she toyed with them. He swallowed, fighting the sweet lethargy of pleasure, fighting the urge simply to lie there as she did what she wanted.

She deserved more than a toy. She deserved love in return. She deserved so many things. So many days, he didn't feel like he could give her even half of what she should have. But he could give her that.

Love.

He loved her.

She slid the length of her body against him. Her palm chased along his side. She dipped between them and touched him, her warm, soft skin sliding like silk along his foreskin. The feathery sensation as she retracted it robbed him of thoughts. He pressed against her hand with a deep, needy groan to let her know he liked it. The room fuzzed as his eyelids dipped. He liked all of it. This.

How could he have forgotten he liked sex?

He captured her lips, almost desperate to stamp out the memory of sexual numbness. She inhaled deeply against him, as if his scent comforted her as much as hers did him. She stroked him, and his lower body quivered as delicious tension coiled.

“You didn't wake up last night,” she murmured as he cupped her breasts.

He blinked, unable to stop the fluttery moan that burbled in his throat as she pressed her fingers between his legs and toiled his desire into a thick, heady thing that clogged his brain. He gasped. “I didn't,” he said, almost a hiccough.

She grinned. “We're not in the middle-of-nowhere wilderness, Derek,” she murmured. He watched her through hooded eyes. “We're here. And you didn't wake up. And you've only had one bad day in the entire month since you got clean. And you played darts in a crowded bar for a little while. I'd say that's a worthwhile trade for a little more effort to find the mood. Wouldn't you?”
As if she’d read his mind. His doubts. How did she do that? She gave him acceptance. And belonging. Peace. Respite.

He pressed his forehead against hers, so close that their noses mashed. The glitter of her deep stare sang to him in the dark. In the moonlight. He brought his hand to her temple and pushed his fingers through the strands of her hair. He loved it when she wore her hair down.

“I love you,” he said, his voice soft. He kissed her, tasting her as she did things to him. Things that made the space beyond his eyes waver and his wanting burn. Another groan stuck in his throat.

She returned his searching kiss. “I love you, too. And I want you to be happy.”

“I'm trying.”

“I know.” She brushed his lips with her free hand. “You still don't do that enough.”

“What?”

“Smile like this.”

He laughed. “I'm happy, now— Oh. Oh...” He arched backward as she touched him.

She gave him another sly smile. The expression crackled, almost as if it were made of electricity. He panted. “I know,” she said.

He wrapped his arms around her, pulling her close. Against him. Into him. “You make me so happy, Meredith.”

She sighed, content, and the sound of her satiation made him alive. Proud. Happy that he could give.

“I don't tell you enough how much you mean to me,” he said.

“You tell me a lot,” she murmured. “You're always here. Saying things.”

He shook his head. He squeezed her hip, motioning for her to roll over, away from him. “Let me show you, too.”

Her eyes narrowed.

“You drove on Thursday,” he said. And she'd had to get him into the mood. He wanted her to feel loved. Loved and cherished and adored and everything he felt about her to the point that it made him ache. He needed to stamp those horrible doubts she'd expressed into dust. “My turn.”

“But you're not—”

He pushed her hand away from his groin before he lost his willpower to say no. “I'll worry about it. You relax.”

She snickered. “Relax? Sex with you is a lot of nice things, but it's never relaxing until it's over.”

“Figure of speech,” he replied with a sly chuckle. “I'm going to coil you like a spring until you're screaming.” He kissed her ear.

“I had a feeling you would.”
“You're going to beg me,” he murmured against her ear.

Her eyes widened. “I could beg you, now, I'm so freaking ready.”

He laughed. “Roll over.”

She snorted. “Fine. But when I'm looking the other direction, there'd better be some sex,” she said, and a vague echo of his own words, years ago, tickled his mind.

Fine, he'd said when she'd kicked him out for Cristina. But when I get back, there'd better be some sex.

The sheets rustled as Meredith shifted, rolling away from him before he could respond. His breaths tightened as he stared at her milky, freckled skin and the sloping curve of her hip.

“Is that really what I sound like?” he murmured against her ear.

“Like how?”

“Haughty and demanding.”

She laughed. “It's actually one of the things I kind of love about you... oh. Oh.” He rubbed her, trying to pay her back for his own discombobulation, and she shuddered. “Ooh.”

“So, you think I'm haughty and demanding?” he said.

“That's a trick... oh. Trick question, right?”

He laughed. “I suppose so.”

He pressed his body against hers, spooning her as he wrapped his arms around her, one arm underneath her shoulder, one arm over top her waist, a warm cocoon just for her. They fit together, skin-to-skin, resting on their left sides, and the heat of desire billowed between them.

He kissed her ear as he moved one hand to stroke a pert nipple. His other arm stretched across the valley before the swell of her hip. He found her navel with his explorations, splayed his fingers, and dove into the coarse curls below. She moaned, and the song of it made everything twist inside of him. He slipped his hand between her legs, into the heat, and pulled her against him tightly. The pressure made her shiver, and it trapped his slowly gorging arousal between their bodies. He swallowed, anticipation carving out his thoughts like a drill.

He thrusted, driving himself along her spine. The slip slide of her hot skin along his sensitive head made him gasp for breath, but it wasn't the perfection he wanted. He felt himself filling all too slowly. Fuck. Now would be good. He wanted to feel her wet insides wrapped around him now.

“Derek,” she whispered, the word almost broken by a whine as he stroked her in slow, tantalizing circles. She pressed her hands against his, one at her chest, the other below her navel, and he squeezed his palm, telling him, More. Right there. Please. Now. “Mmm,” was all she managed aloud.

He kissed her sweat-spotted throat. Sweet salt spread against his tongue. His eyelashes dipped as he drank her down. The room fuzzed.

He hugged her as though she might slip away from him. His. She was his, and he needed her, and desire to fill her hollow center played tricks on his mind. Made him see all sorts of dirty, dirty things before they happened. Himself driving into her like a piston. Her body shaking with every powerful thrust. The sweet, fluttery grip of her muscles as she descended into the abyss of orgasm, and the cock and release of his own drive into abandon.

The world wheeled over his eyes as pictures lit his imagination on fire. He couldn't do that sort of heavy athleticism with his innards still semi-broken, at least not for very long, but he thought of it, anyway. Hovering over her body as she looked up at him with a euphoric gaze. The sight of her flesh sang in his head, twisting with her moans in his ears like chords in a beautiful aria, and he burned inside. He thrusted against her, trying to get himself ready.

The feeling made him moan, and he couldn't help but laugh in his frustration.

“What is it?” she said.

“I'm going to tie myself in a billion knots before I even get one pretty bow made out of you.”

“Are you thinking of me?”

“Yes.”

“Of taking me?”

“Oh, yes.”

“Am I wet?”

He swallowed. “Yes.”

“Hot?”

“Mmm.”

“Tight?”

His muscles tightened like screws at the mere word. “Hey,” he said. “Don't you turn this around on me.”

She giggled. “But it's fun.”

“It's mean. You're ruining the effect.”

“Which is?”

“Well, I can't very well do this for you if I'm fucking you in my head, can I?”

She squirmed against him. “You could fuck me for real.”

“I'm working on it!”

“Yes, dear,” she replied, her voice low and throaty and strangely familiar, and though he couldn't see her face, he could almost sense her rolling her eyes.

“Is that really what I sound like?”

She laughed. “I like it.”

He kissed the back of her neck, and he closed his eyes, bathing himself in the soft sounds of her desire. They curled down his spine and tightened his insides. She shivered against him. Beads of sweat slipped between them. She pressed his hand down.

“Harder,” she told him.

“I'll see your haughty and demanding, and I'll raise you a naughty, bossy vixen,” he told her, unable to stop the smile from spreading across his face as he followed her command and gave her exactly what she wanted. He pressed his thumb against her as he slipped his other fingers between her legs. Slick, soft, and wet greeted him.

She jammed her pelvic bone against him. Her hands left him, and she grabbed for the pillow in front of her and clutched clumps of the pillowcase in her straining fingers. “Oh,” she whined. “Please, Derek.”

“Not so bossy, now,” he murmured as he toiled. “I think that might be construed as begging.”

He knew her body. Every cell of it. Hours of exploration had shown him what made her moan. What made her whine. What made her shake. What made her crash into orgasm. He pressed his thumb, waiting for the endless pressure to turn her into putty. But she didn't reply, this time. Her panting chopped up the silence like the soft beat of a drum, and she didn't give him any sort of direction or feedback, either positive or negative, which was... Odd.

He frowned. “Is this okay?” he said.

She laughed between pants. “Not so haughty, now,” she replied. “I think that might be construed as ambivalence, Mr. Haughty Pants.”

He smirked. “You're enjoying this.”

She wriggled. Her ass pressed against him, and he thought he might lose his thoughts again. A groan wound around in circles in his throat. “Mmm, I'm definitely enjoying this,” she said, her voice a far away echo of his thoughts.

He cleared his throat. “I meant torturing me.”

“That, too.”

“Backseat driver,” he grumbled. Her happy giggle warmed him.

His lip twitched as he tried to assess himself. He wasn't quite sure he was ready, and that was a little frustrating. He didn't like how much attention he needed to get going, even when he was in the mood, but... She was more than good to go, and while he definitely didn't have anything perfect going on down below, he didn't think he could wait anymore, or he might burst.

“I'm still going to make you beg,” he said, his voice a throaty, torn whisper.

He withdrew his hand from her and pushed it between them to help guide himself. He shifted his hips, dipped low, and pushed up. The sheets whispered with his movement. She gasped as he pressed into the heat. He felt the familiar resistance, and then he slipped inside. Just enough to let her know he'd found the way. And then he hovered, pressed against the nerves at her opening, but not sheathed. He felt her flexing around his head, almost as if she thought she could pull him inside, and the sensation made him shudder.

A low, throaty groan wrecked his throat. He laughed despite the whine in his head that told him to push all the way. To bury himself. He blinked and shook his head. This was how she usually tormented him. Waiting. Hovering. Flipping it around on her for once felt exquisite.

“Fuck,” she hissed.

“Something you wanted to say?” he said.

“Fuck,” she repeated, a staccato curse that made triumph burble in his chest, but then she took a deep breath. Another. She sucked slow breaths inside of her body, gathering herself, and she stilled. Quieted. As if he wasn't on his way to being submersed inside of her. As if she was reading a fucking newspaper for all the moaning and groaning and twitching she didn't do.

“Damn it,” he said as his limbs trembled. He would lose control. He couldn't—

“I like this game,” she said.

“Naughty,” he said as he let himself succumb. “Naughty vixen.” Her slick heat enveloped him as he sank inside to the hilt. The room spun around him, and for a moment he forgot the bed as he situated himself. She eclipsed everything around him. She squeezed him with her insides, and it was his turn to stop, pant, and scrabble at the sheets. “Meredith,” he said.

“Am I winning?” she said. “I think I'm winning.”

He laughed. “Is there really winning and losing, here?” he said. He kissed her throat.

She shook her head. “I guess not.”

For a moment, all he could do was rest his head on the pillow, breathing with his nose in her hair, relishing the feeling of her warm, small body tucked in his arms. Her heat wrapped around him. The inviting, cocoa scent of her skin wafted in the back of his throat. He pressed his nose against the damp nape of her neck and kissed her there.

The connection between them was affirming. Intoxicating. He felt thrillingly alive. Desired. Whole. He hoped she felt that, too.

“Thank you,” he said.

“For what?” she murmured.

Her fingers flexed as she clutched the pillow, breathing. “You deserve all of those things.”

The surety in her voice crushed him. The room blurred. He blinked.

“You do, Derek. You made some really stupid mistakes. That doesn't make you a bad person. That just makes you a person.”

He kissed her. “You're the best person I know.”

She snorted.

He squeezed her against him. “I mean it. You are.”

“I'm a freak,” she said.

“Hey,” he said, his voice low. Thready. He rose on his elbow and looked over her body.
She tipped her head up and met his eyes. Sweat stuck soft strands of blond hair to her forehead.
“What?”

“That's my wife,” he told her, millimeters away, a murmur. “Stop calling her names.”

The hesitant smile she gave him broke his heart. He cupped her face and pulled his fingers through her messy hair. He pressed his lips against hers. So soft. Her bleating moan hit the back of his throat, vibrating, quiet. His eyes creased with desire as he held her gaze. His spine hurt from twisting over her like this, but it didn't matter. Nothing mattered in light of the damage he saw.

“I'm sorry I ever helped you think that,” he said.

“What?” she said.

“That you're a freak.”

“We weren't very nice to each other for a while,” she said, her tone glum.

He raised his eyebrows. “No more baggage, though. We decided. Remember?”

She gave him a relaxed smile, and then she lay back on the pillow. “I remember,” she said. “And do you remember what I told you?”

“When?” he said.

She reached for him. Dragged his hand from her hip. Pulled it over her body to her lips. He felt the soft brush of her sweet skin against his. Her insides squeezed around him, and he swallowed as the pressure built to move. He'd been holding his place like a bookmark for seconds. Minutes. Too long.

“You're the strongest person I know,” she told him. “I mean it, Derek. Stop selling yourself so short.”

“I want to.”

He could almost hear her smile as she squeezed his hand. “I know.”

He took a breath and thrust. The bed creaked. A quiet moan wound through her throat. He shivered at the desirous, needing sound. It amazed him, sometimes, that he could reduce another human being to such simple imperatives, but, really, it was a two way street, wasn't it? Her slick insides touched him like slippery, constricting silk, and he fought the heady desire to lose himself in the oblivion of her body.

“I love you very much,” he said, his voice a broken croak. If he'd said it to anyone else, the dissolution of his composure would have bothered him. Embarrassed him. With her, though, it felt right. Perfect. The world blurred, and he kissed her ear. “I do.”

“Me, too,” she said, the word soft against the pillow.

Her fingers clutched the pillowcase as he drove into her and pulled out, the friction heating them to glowing embers. This was a slow burn kind of sex. The most intimate kind, in that it wasn't about complicated bending or movement or excitement. It was just about touch. And being close. And living, for a few minutes, in the eclipse of another human being.

He kissed her, unable to stop the desirous groan that tore his throat. Not wanting to stop it. Tension wound him like a screw, tighter, tighter, and tighter still, until he couldn't remember how to not need her, how to not need himself sheathed by her warmth and moving within it. She coiled around him, relaxing as he entered, squeezing as he left her, a clash of conflicting sensations that made him pant with exhilaration and arousal.

“Are you close?” he whispered.

She nodded, her head rustling against the pillow. He brought his hand between her legs and gave her a little push with the heel of his palm. She shuddered.

“Come for me,” he said.

“Believe me,” she said through gritted teeth. “I freaking want to.”

He grinned as he drove into her and stopped at the deepest part of her center. “Oh? Tell me more.”

She pushed a long, even breath through her lungs. He watched her clutch the pillowcase. Her body shuddered, and she rocked against him, as if she couldn't quite hold still.

“I know what you're doing,” she said.

He raised his eyebrows. “Really?”

“I'm not... begging you.”

“Really?” he purred. He stroked her with his thumb. Her body tensed, and she drew out a long unintelligible syllable into a shuddering moan. “Because that seemed kind of beg-y,” he said.

She snorted. “Beg-y? You're reaching. And making up words. Ooh.”

“Don't they say imitation is the best form of flattery?” he said. He gyrated, shifting inside of her. “I'm flattering you.”

“I like...” Her voice popped into a strange, desperate high-pitch before resettling into its normal registers. “Flattering.”

He laughed. “More flattering, then, I say.”

He leaned over her, pushing her heaving breasts into the mattress. He brought his hand underneath her taut thigh and gripped to give himself leverage. With a gasp, she brought her knee up. He pushed deep. And deeper. He moved against her like a wave. Every thrust, she moaned, a soft, warbling sound of twisted pain and pleasure that shivered up and down his spine. Told him he was doing the right things, even if she couldn't verbalize the yes, yes, yes of it all. He embraced her with his free arm, pulling her against him.

He kept her stuck there. For ages. She lay in his arms, shaking, moaning with every thrust. Every touch. When she started to shudder and tense like she might release, he stopped, dragging his virtual feet against the persistent whine in his head that told him to submit to the friction and go.

“You're really mean,” she gasped. “You're a mean, mean man.”

He gasped. “Mean? Me?” he said, mock innocence dripping from his tone. “But I'm flattering you.” He pressed his hand against the soft, inviting flesh of the vee between her thighs. Her lips parted, and she whined at him, twitching in his arms. “How is this mean?” he said. “I'm devoting my entire body and mind to your pleasure.” He stroked her slowly. She squirmed underneath him. Moaned. The sheets whispered with their movement. “That’s not mean.”

“I...”

“Yes?”

“Oh...”

He grinned as he kissed the back of her neck. “Does that feel good?”

She tensed in his arms. Moaned. He stopped. Again.

“Fuck,” she snapped. Her insides fluttered around him as she took out her delicious frustration on him. His lips parted as she drew a moan from him. “Fuck, just finish me.”

He regathered himself. “Are you begging?”

“Yes. God. Happy? Fuck!”

“I suppose,” he said, his tone nonchalant. He glided in and out of her, panting as he pressed his palm against her. She would have sensation beneath and above, and it usually—

All at once, her body tensed. She scrabbled at the sheets. The breaths froze in her chest. A tiny, relaxed moan dripped from her lips. Her insides squeezed him like a vise and began to flutter with rhythmic pulses that made his lips part and his eyes go glassy. Her toes and legs twitched with the uncontrolled firing of her nerves.

“Oh,” he couldn't stop himself from saying in his euphoric stupor.

He clutched her to his body and rode it out with her. The sound of her relaxed, finished sigh drowned him in lethargy despite his own state of incomplete disarray. He rested next to her, still sheathed inside, as he stroked her sweaty skin. He listened to the chirping birds. The moonlight had lightened into the gloomy white of predawn. The shower in the neighboring bathroom had stopped running.

“Oh, my god,” she said in the aftermath, and he smiled at the sound of her. Sated. Happy. He'd done that.

He grinned lazily. “Do I get a gold star?”

“You didn't finish,” she said.

He sighed. “It takes me forever.”

“I don't mind. Keep going. We have plenty of time.”

He glanced at the clock, frowning. Not that plentiful, anymore. “I'm okay,” he said.

“No, you're not.” She pulled away from him. A wet sound filled the space between them as she separated from him. The chill air hit him, and he sighed, bereft of their connection. She rolled over. She watched him with a hooded, beautiful stare that pulled at him. She reached across the space between them and pulled her fingers through his hair, now sweaty. Stringy. Damp. She kissed him. “Finish, Derek.”

He winked at her. “Bossy vixen,” he said.
“I'm not letting you throw the match for me,” she said. “I want my shot.”

He laughed as she pressed her body flush against him. She wrapped her hand around his base. He didn't need much more encouragement. He inched forward. She guided him into her. The slick warmth of her insides pressed around him, and for a moment, he wondered why he'd been dumb enough to decide he was fine with incompleteness.

“Really,” Meredith said with a laugh as she watched his expression. “I appreciated the whole stoic thing. It was cute.”

“Cute!” he scoffed.

“Mmm,” she said. She nodded. “Cute.”

“Well, don't say I didn't offer,” he quipped. The urge to move stripped him bare of his other thoughts, and he followed the burning impulse to thrust. Her insides stroked his sensitive head, and he chuffed with a broken moan. “You could be in the shower, now.”

“Hmm,” she said. “Somehow, I don't think I can compare a shower to being fucked senseless in a twisted game of orgasmic one-up-manship.”

He moved within her, and she bit her lip in that plush way he loved. “For senseless fucking, you seem to have a lot of sense,” he said.

Her hand chased the curve of his spine. She squeezed his ass as he drove into her center. “And you seem to be losing yours,” she said.

“I guess you're win... winning. After all.” He panted, desire tipping him into endless, fluid motion against her. When he'd been focused all on her, he'd avoided this frenzy. It would sweep him away in a conflagration. Soon. He simmered.

“You had an early lead,” she said. Her fingers raked through his hair. She moaned as he cleaved her. “But I like winning.”

“I could still turn this... around.”

She laughed. He captured her lips and kissed her. He relished the taste of her. The feel of her. This was one of the few instances he decided he'd be happy to lose. And lose. And lose again.

“Fuck me, Derek,” she chanted against his ear, and there was no more losing.

He was lost. A prisoner of friction. Her.

The inferno swelled, and he lost his mind somewhere between one thrust and the next. What had been calculated to please her became a desperate slip-and-slide that carved out his brain like a spoon scooping pumpkin seeds. He clutched her shoulders so hard he thought he might be hurting her a little, but she kept urging him onward, and the sentient considerations of flesh and bone and comfort left him. The headboard banged against the wall once. Twice.

“Mmm,” she moaned in his ears. “Fuck me. Harder, Derek. I want you.”

As if he needed encouragement.

He kept bumping into a wall that sent him stumbling just before the cliff, leaving him stuck in that fiery, frenzied pit of not-quite-enough. His limbs trembled as he worked for what he knew he wanted – the end – but lost the presence of mind to define the feeling.

Where was it?

A rough, tortured moan coiled in his throat. Pain scraped his scalp as she yanked her fingers through his hair. Her nails raked his back. She squeezed around him.

“More,” she told him, feeding the fire.

“Fuck,” he blurted. Pleasure twisted inside him, dancing an exquisitely painful waltz that bled him dry of anything but desire. For her. To finish. To get that sweet release.

“Meredith,” he chanted. “Meredith.” In and out and in and out, he moved. “Meredith.”

Everything tensed and drilled into his center, until he could barely breathe and couldn’t speak anymore. Her fists clenched. She held him against her body in a fierce embrace. Everything stopped. He trembled against her, on the quivering razor edge, not moving forward, but not falling backward, and he had the ludicrous image of a seesaw, tottering on a fulcrum at the top of a tall mountain.

“Game. Set. Match,” she said. Her insides clenched.

A shout choked in his throat, and he lost the conscious ability to control his body. He couldn’t breathe. His eyes rolled back. Release throbbed through his muscles, and his body shook. He burst inside of her as though he were emptying his entire being, giving her everything and leaving none for him. He rode the brilliant wave for what felt like hours. Euphoria baked him long past well done.

He relaxed in a boneless heap against the mattress as he slipped out of her.

“Wow,” Meredith said as she flopped next to him. “Good one. Go me.”

“Yeah,” he said, his voice a rasp. “You win. I think.”

She rolled into him. She kissed him. “I don't know. Mine was pretty freaking good, too.”

“Are you conceding?”

She giggled. “I thought there really wasn't any winning or losing.”

He smiled, feeling like some sort of senseless fool. The world seemed fuzzy, and he felt... Blissed out. Sated. He couldn't care.

“A tie, then?” he said.

“Sure,” she said.

“I like a good tie. More tying, I say.”

She stroked his sweaty hair, a strange smile on her face.

Lethargy pulled on his body. His eyelids dipped. “I have to go to work,” she said sadly in the blur. “I don't want to go.”

“I know.”
She kissed him.

“I'll make you breakfast,” he croaked. “While you're in the shower.”

“Okay,” she said, her tone indulgent.

He couldn't understand why she sounded like she was merely humoring him. What was so strange about him wanting to make breakfast for her? Waffles, he thought. Cut strawberries. And maybe some bacon as a treat. He'd eat a slice, and she would goggle at him. He closed his eyes. He'd move in just a minute. He felt the cool sheets slip over his skin as she dragged the blankets over his sweaty body. He thought he even heard her say, “I'll see you tomorrow. I love you,” but he wasn't sure. He swore he would move in just a—

The brick wall around the dock and lake had evaporated in places. Green grass peeked through from the other side, and the shade beside the wall seemed more like the uneven rectangles of Manhattan's many skyscrapers cast in shadow, not a solid block absent of light. The water lapping at the dock supports sloshed and gurgled.

Derek blinked as he sat up in his lawn chair in the sunshine. The light beat his skin with a subtle, relaxing warmth that didn't burn. Derek II's fishing line whizzed as he cast into the sleepy lake from the adjacent lawn chair.

“It's happening,” Derek II said as his line thunked into the water.

Derek rubbed his bare shoulder. It felt so nice in here with more sun. “What's happening?”

“She's crumbling,” Derek II said. “This was overdue.”

Derek frowned. “Who's crumbling?”

“Meredith.”

Derek glanced at the interrupted, dissolving wall. He didn't mind the holes. He didn't need the wall so much, anymore. “But I'm getting better.”

Derek II peered at him. “Does that change what you've done?”

“No...” Derek said.

“You've kept her from her friends.” A flock of birds darted overhead against the backdrop of a cerulean sky.

“I want her to see her friends,” Derek protested.

Derek II shrugged. “Could have fooled me.”

Derek shook his head. “I don't understand...”

“Obviously,” Derek II said. He gave Derek a sad frown. “This week, she went out after work for the first time in months.”

“I know,” Derek said. He sighed. His eyes watered as he remembered the sound of her laughing. Only a memory, the sound still brought him peace. Warmth. He smiled. “I was so happy—”

“So, what was she doing the other months?” Derek II prodded. “Knitting?”
“She's been with me,” Derek said.

Derek II raised his eyebrows. “With you?”

“With me,” Derek said with a resolute nod. “Yes.”

Derek II shook his head as he reeled in his line and recast with a flick of his wrist. “And where have you been?” he said as the line thunked into the water.

Something wet and warm touched his fingers. Licking. He twitched.

“Meredith,” he muttered into the pillow, pulling his hand away. “Mmm. Don't think I can go again.”

The heat of sunlight slanted through the windows, baking his back through the bedspread. He grunted. The hairs on the back of his neck tingled. The feeling of being watched bloomed and burgeoned. He remembered he'd promised her breakfast. Waffles and strawberries and bacon.

He snapped awake, tossing the covers back. “Fuck, I'm sorry,” he said as he raked his fingers through his greasy hair. “I fell asleep.”

Samantha sat by his side of the bed in a lake of sunlight, staring at him with her big brown eyes. The sunshine made her glossy coat gleam. She barked a quick hello that sank into a whine as she rose to her feet and wagged her stumpy tail. He glanced at his hand where she'd been licking him and sighed.

“I guess you're not Meredith,” he said, his tone glum as he tried to blink the sleep out of his eyes with only marginal success. He'd crashed. He'd completely crashed after sex. In mid sentence, almost. And, now, he felt sort of like he'd been hit by a truck. His muscles ached, particularly his groin and arms, and his head felt fuzzy.

“You could try Percocet,” Mr. Clark whispered. “That would make it feel better.”

He sighed, and he shoved the thought away like a gnat.

He glanced at his nightstand. A trail of destruction made a path off of the flat surface. He followed a tipped water bottle that had dripped over the side, his squished watch, the bent top pages of his choice journal, and a pen that hung half on and half off the lip of the stand, to the plush rug on the floor. His clock was face-up on the floor. It said 12:00. Water droplets splotched the face. Must have been reset.

He squinted at Meredith's clock at the opposite side of the bed. Only to discover it was 12:00 for real. He'd slept almost another eight hours. It was lunch time. And he felt a little like he could go back to sleep. But he couldn't waste the entire day. Jesus.

He rubbed his eyes and dragged himself out of bed to the master bathroom. His muscles pulled and stretched. Samantha followed.

He relieved himself. Washed his face at the sink. Brushed his teeth. None of that was enough to make him feel clean. His hair was a greasy, tangled disaster. He reeked of sweat. From the disarray he saw in the mirror, he decided he looked a bit like he'd survived a tornado.

He pulled his pill bottle out of the medicine cabinet. The orange container jingled. He unscrewed the cap and dropped a pill into his palm. He sighed as he looked down at Samantha.
“I really hate these things,” he said.

Samantha pressed her big body against his legs, a warm, reassuring presence. He sighed.

Meredith was right. As annoying as the side-effects were, there were no game stoppers, and the benefits far outweighed the bad things. Being groggy and a bit less promiscuous in exchange for feeling like he could leave the house without getting murdered was an even enough exchange, he thought. He liked not living in constant fear. When he added the fact that he was sleeping better, he felt more on an even keel than he had in ages, and, though he still had a lot of things to fix, he wanted to try things like going back to work and spending time at Joe's with Mark...

He put his palm to his lips and tipped his head back. He swallowed. The pill slid down his throat.

“I know,” he said as he leaned over to scratch her ears. “They're helping, mostly. And I suppose you care more about a w-a-l-k than my pills, huh.”

Samantha animated in the blink of an eye. She barked excitedly. Her big brown eyes followed his every movement as if she expected her leash to appear out of thin air. She'd learned the spelling of the word walk as well as the spoken word itself. There was no hiding from her exuberance over the matter.

He laughed. “Right,” he said.

W-a-l-k it would be, then. He raked his fingers through his hair, trying to return some semblance of order to the afro thing he had going on at the top of his skull. For all the jealous commentary his hair got him at work, he didn't think people truly understood what a fucking pain in the ass it was to manage.

Your head looks like it exploded, Meredith had commented with a giggle the first time she'd been subjected to it. She'd stared over her bare knees at him from the bed as he'd frowned in her dresser's mirror.

Now, you know my deepest darkest secret, he'd said, smirking over his shoulder at her.

She'd stared at him for a long time. I don't think that's your deepest darkest secret.

You're right, he'd said as he'd prowled back to the bed. He'd kissed her, dropped his voice low. By night, they call me The Batman.

Her eyes had twinkled. You are so freaking corny.

You love it.

She'd wrapped her arms around his shoulders. Kissed him. I do, though I would have thought you'd pick the Man of Steel...

He sighed. She'd been right to doubt him. He closed his eyes. Addison, he wanted to tell his past self. Tell her about that. Things would have been so different if he had. Maybe.

He shook his head. Those sorts of things were useless to dwell on. He'd made his mistakes and done his damage like an earthquake. If he'd been with anybody else, said damage would be wedged into the corner labeled irreparable in permanent marker. Except Meredith was one of the most beautiful people he’d ever met. Inside. Outside. She was empathetic. Forgiving.

She stayed through things that would make anybody else run. She was still staying. With him.
Through everything.

“And where have you been?” Mr. Clark said, his voice the strangest echo Derek couldn't place.

Derek's lip quivered, and a lump formed in his throat as a sudden enormity of feeling swept through him. He grabbed the doorframe. He blinked. Samantha stood by his knees. He dropped to his haunches and gave her a slow, reassuring stroke as he found his center of gravity again. She pushed her wet, black nose against his, and he laughed as she licked the salt from his cheeks. He scratched her ears and sat in the doorframe for a long time, thinking. About everything and nothing all at once.

“I'm okay,” he told her.

She gave him an odd look. Like she didn't quite believe him. A small whine escaped her throat.

“Working on it, anyway,” he said. He wiped his face. “I want to be okay.”

She seemed more satisfied with that. He stroked her fur once more, and he hobbled to his feet, unfurling his aching back. He thought about a shower, but opted to take one after the walk. He would only sweat more.

He padded to the closet. The chilly air spread a rash of goosebumps across his pale, naked skin. Seattle weather had settled into a pleasant between – too hot for the heater, too cold for the air conditioning. September was his favorite month for the crisp air.

He grabbed some loose boxers, an old pair of sweatpants, a soft t-shirt, and some fuzzy socks, opting for comfort. The sticky feeling behind his eyes, the cloudiness... All he really wanted was to go back to bed. He figured walking around in the equivalent of pajamas might help him cope with sentience. He pulled everything on under Samantha's supervision, laced his cross trainers, and then he wandered back to his nightstand.

Lying down was a tempting idea, but he didn't let himself. He pulled his choice journal and the pen off his nightstand, and he added quick bullet points for getting up, taking pills, not taking a shower yet, and his choice of attire. Dr. Wyatt had told him yesterday afternoon that the journal had served its purpose by making him consider his choices as he made them, and he didn't need to keep it anymore, but... he sort of liked it. He added to it when he could.

He headed downstairs, followed by a plodding Samantha. He grabbed a banana for breakfast, or, well, lunch, he supposed, and Samantha's leash from the kitchen. Samantha's nails scrabbled on the floor as she moved around the center island in the kitchen, almost galloping. She reminded him of a small pony. A very happy small pony.

“Sit,” he commanded, trying to get her to calm down.

Her butt lowered for all of a nanosecond before she continued her happy rampage in circles.

“Sit!” he chided her in his most authoritative voice.

She listened, and her expression turned melancholy, as if to say, Sorry, Dad.

Though her tail wagged while he attached her leash, and she twitched like she had a serious case of too-much-caffeine, she didn't move from the floor. He gave her a pat. Her silky hair was so relaxing to touch.

“Good girl.”
He stopped with her at the hall closet for his windbreaker, and then he led her outside into the cool, damp air. The sun shone in splotches through a puffy mess of clouds overhead. Birds chirped and tittered in the trees. He inhaled, and he let the wet scents relax him. A car rumbled down the street, and he didn't tense, and that was... amazing. A smile tugged at his lips.

Samantha stared at him, a longing look in her eyes. Can I go? Please, please, can I go? I want to run! she seemed to be saying. He stroked her fur. He wished he was healthy enough to jog with her. She would have to settle for a walk. He still didn't do very well once he hit about three miles, but at least it was getting much easier to hit three.

“What do you think?” he asked the dog.

Samantha stared at him, perplexed.

“The park?” he said.

Samantha barked. She knew that word, too. The park would be a four mile round trip. But he wanted to push himself a little.

“Let's go,” he said, and they moved away from the porch.

Samantha, no matter how much she seemed to want to run around, didn't push him. Didn't tug on the leash. Didn't strain against his authority. It was almost as if she realized she was dealing with a slightly more fragile human than most and adjusted accordingly. He took it slow, unhurried, knowing that, if he did otherwise, the return trip for miles three and four was going to be miserable for him. They strolled down the sidewalk at a relaxing pace.

Meredith's street was long and on a slight incline. Random water droplets plinked from the leaves in the trees to the ground below. The spring and summer flowers had almost all died, but the remaining verdant green more than made up for it. The woody feel of it all, the Queen Anne architecture that characterized the houses, gave the entire neighborhood a rustic, quaint feel that he'd always loved. For as urban as it was, he still felt a bit removed from the world, and that was a nice change from the frenetic, driving activity of Manhattan that he'd left behind years ago.

When he reached the end of the street, he felt hot, and he swept his fingers back through his hair. He'd sweated a bit, but he only felt warmed up. Not straining. He looked back behind him as he stroked Samantha's fur. He remembered having so much trouble with that just a few months before.

The world had blotted black and tipped. Whoa, man, Mark had said as he'd caught Derek before Derek had hit the sidewalk.

Derek had felt like he was going to throw up, and the world had spun. Mark had lowered Derek to the ground. Derek? he'd said. Derek, you awake?

Derek had sniffed. He'd still been having trouble breathing. Dizzy, he'd said, his voice low. Thick. Like taffy.

Mark had felt his pulse. Okay, man, he'd said. Just sit for a minute.

What happened? Derek remembered asking woozily, his voice a rasp across his broken vocal cords. His limbs hadn't been working.

I think you fainted, Mark had replied. It's okay. Take it easy.
Derek sighed as he watched the memory of himself, stumbling home in Mark's arms at the speed of a busted turtle. He'd wanted to do what he'd done with Meredith before the pneumonia. A walk around the block. And he'd wanted to get away from Lexie and Alex and their constant reminders that he'd brought new meaning to the word relapse. He'd wanted all that, and he hadn't even made it to the end of the street.

Derek watched a family playing in the yard across the street in front of a red brick house with black trim and shutters. Two children and a frazzled mother. An older girl, probably nine or so, made structures in a small sandbox. The little boy was riding around in circles on a tricycle with fat, plastic wheels. The mother chased him, and despite her obvious exhaustion, she still grinned as she overtook him, swept him out of the tricycle’s seat, and tickled him. The tricycle kept going for a few feet before it came to a stop. The boy shrieked with glee.

The shrill sound crept down Derek's spine, squeezing, and he clenched his teeth as nerves coiled like spaghetti over a scene that should have been heartwarming. He kept moving. Samantha followed, and the minutes blurred as he lost himself in his own head, drifting from thought to thought.

Meredith. Being Chief. Surgery. The baby. His family. The new house, still in progress. Meredith had her first OB appointment in about a little more than a week. They would be getting married by law not long after that. His mother would be flying in to attend.

_Booked our tickets_, Meredith had said nonchalantly as she'd come home after her shift.

He'd looked up from his book as she stamped her feet on the welcome mat and put down her tote purse by the door. _What?_ he'd said.

_Our plane tickets._

_For what?_

She'd frowned. _Thanksgiving. Remember?_

_Oh._

_You did still want to go, right?_ she'd asked as she'd sat on the couch beside him. The cushions had sunk with her small weight.

He'd nodded. _I do._

_Then—_

He'd kissed her. _You really booked the tickets?_ he'd said as he'd pulled back, wonderment in his eyes.

She'd shrugged. _Yeah. First class. I splurged. And I made our rental car reservation._

_You did the planning?_

_I did,_ she said, offering him a beautiful smile that stopped his breath. _Spent my lunch break on the phone with your mother._

_But—_

She'd put her index finger to his lips, silencing him. _I don't mind. Don't worry about it._
Shh, she'd said. Her body had been a whisper of movement as she'd swung her legs up and straddled him. She'd wrapped her arms around his neck and kissed him. I wanted to do this for you. So, shut up.

He'd been intoxicated by her closeness. Her scent. Her skin. Yes, ma'am.

When he made it to the park, he felt as though only minutes had passed. He blinked the cobwebs of kissing Meredith out of head. When he glanced at his watch, he saw that two miles had taken him an hour. Not horrible. It took him only a few minutes to catch his breath, and though he felt like he'd expended a lot of energy, he didn't feel like he was scooping out the bottom of his reserves.

The park was a large one, and people congregated there during the weekends for picnics and barbecues, recreational sports leagues, and other things. There were basketball courts, tennis courts, a baseball diamond, two soccer fields, a fenced in area for dogs to run around, and a playground full of fun obstacles for little kids. Monkey bars. Slides. Tunnels. Sand.

The distant sound of cheering and screams made his ears curdle. He put a hand over his damp brow to block the intermittent flare of sun through the clouds as he peered in the direction of the chaos. Little bodies, kids who couldn't have been more than five, stampeded in a helter-skelter herd across the far soccer field. Parents and other bystanders sat on the bleachers, cheering and talking. Even at this distance, the noise made his teeth clench. Kids could be earsplitting.

Samantha nudged his knee. She stared at the fenced, green area on the other side of the park from where the kids played the soccer game. A man threw a Frisbee to his whippet, which zipped across the ground so fast, it was a gray blur of fur. A woman with a yellow lab conversed with another woman and a little white puffball with black eyes. A maltese or something. The dog park was Samantha's favorite section of the park, understandably. Derek tried to take her there at least once or twice a week so she could stretch her legs. She was a big dog, and she deserved space to run around at a full sprint. Meredith's backyard wasn't big enough for that.

“I know you want to go to the dog park,” he said with an apologetic frown. “But...”

He stared at the soccer field. Watching from this distance made his body tense. But something pulled him forward. One step. He licked his lips. The idea of walking over there to watch with so many people around made him feel queasy. The idea of not even trying made him angry. At himself. At Gary Clark. At everything. It'd been more than three months since he'd been shot. Derek Shepherd could spectate at a kids' soccer game.

Samantha watched him, her expression wary. “What do you think?” he said.

She barked.

“Try for ten minutes?”

She gave him a pensive look, and she barked again. Softer. She almost seemed to be saying, If you say so, Dad.

He stroked her fur. He jingled her leash. And they were off. Into the fray. He passed the playground. The baseball diamond. The trip across the entire park took him about five minutes. He stopped on the sidelines, as far away from the cheering crowd as he could manage while still being identifiable at the soccer field. That was... okay. A cool breeze sent its fingers through the trees and ruffled his hair. He took a deep breath.
The game was co-ed, and no single player came past the referee's waist in height. Derek focused on the soccer ball and followed it with his eyes. The ball was mostly white, but had red hexagonal splotches. The kids kicked the crap out of it. They swarmed like tiny bees, shrieking, giggling. Most of them, anyway. He had to smile at the one or two kids who were on the field in their little cleats and shin guards and uniforms, but picking clovers or chasing butterflies, instead.

He swallowed, and he inched toward the bleachers. His sneakers slogged through the wet grass. One step at a time. Until his shoulder hit the cold metal. He leaned, resting next to the top bleacher by a pile of coolers and soccer balls and other sports-related refuse, out of sight from the people watching unless they turned around and looked down. Samantha settled on her stomach on the wet ground at his feet with a big, lazy sigh. He closed his eyes and listened. Tried to keep his breaths even. Focused on getting himself to relax despite the jarring noises that made his ears hurt.

This might be him in five years. Sitting on the bleachers, watching his kid play soccer in cleats the size of his hand. He imagined kicking a ball in the backyard between little orange cones. He didn't know the first thing about soccer other than the basic idea, but he could learn enough to teach a five-year-old about it. The very idea of that kind of research brought a huge grin to his face.

“What kind of dog is that?” a small, dulcet voice demanded. He jerked, startled, and looked down.

A little girl, her platinum blonde hair tied up in a ponytail with a pink ribbon, stood there, her skinny arms crossed over her chest. She had eyes that were a shock of brilliant, sapphire blue. She was six, he guessed. Maybe, five. She wore a dirty, grass-stained soccer uniform – a green shirt and white shorts with two green stripes from the hips to the hemline. She had a big Snoopy band-aid stuck on her knobby knee, and a dark red splotch stained the underside of the bandage. She came up to his waist, and he imagined from her skinny stature he could have picked her up one-handed if his chest hadn't been damaged. This was the kind of stranger he could deal with. He lowered himself slowly to his knees to bring himself down to her level.

“What kind of dog is that?” a small, dulcet voice demanded. He jerked, startled, and looked down.

A little girl, her platinum blonde hair tied up in a ponytail with a pink ribbon, stood there, her skinny arms crossed over her chest. She had eyes that were a shock of brilliant, sapphire blue. She was six, he guessed. Maybe, five. She wore a dirty, grass-stained soccer uniform – a green shirt and white shorts with two green stripes from the hips to the hemline. She had a big Snoopy band-aid stuck on her knobby knee, and a dark red splotch stained the underside of the bandage. She came up to his waist, and he imagined from her skinny stature he could have picked her up one-handed if his chest hadn't been damaged. This was the kind of stranger he could deal with. He lowered himself slowly to his knees to bring himself down to her level.

“Samantha is a rottweiler,” he said with a grin. He gave Samantha a scratch, which sent her rolling onto her back with a happy, deep groan. Her russet-colored paws flopped in the air.

The kid bit her lip. “Is she mean?”

Derek shook his head. “No, she's very friendly.”

“How can I pet her?”

“Be careful,” he cautioned.

The little girl's eyes widened, but she approached the situation with due seriousness. She dropped onto her knees. She stretched out her hand, inched forward, and lowered her fingers to the black fur that covered Samantha's side. She stroked the space over Samantha's ribs. Samantha twisted backward to lick her. The girl giggled. A smile stretched across her face, revealing several missing teeth that made him think wildly of the Tooth Fairy.

Parents invariably had methods to remove jiggly, loose teeth. His mother had had a sadistic attachment to the door method. He remembered standing with one end of a long string wrapped around his tooth, and the other around a door knob of an open door... He wondered what Ellis Grey had used. What he and Meredith might decide on in the end. He couldn't imagine subjecting his kid to the nerve-wracking theatrics of a door slam to get rid of a tooth, but... he wasn't exactly an expert on teeth. Maybe there wasn't a better way. He'd never had to research before. There were a lot of things he would need to learn, soccer and tooth removal among them.
Another helpless grin breached his face.

“She's soft,” said the little girl, interrupting his thoughts.

“She is,” he agreed. He pointed to her knee with the Snoopy band-aid. “What happened there?”

“Cut my knee.”

“Is that why you're not playing?”

The girl shrugged. “I guess,” she said, the exuberance draining from her cherubic features.

“You guess?”

“Honey, leave the nice man alone,” a woman said. He looked up. Mom, then. She must have been. She was an older version of the little girl, worn by age lines and the passage of time, but she had the same platinum hair. Her blue eyes had a hint of the shocking sapphire of her daughter's, but they seemed more washed out. Older. She looked down at them, her arms crossed over her chest. She stood a foot away.

“But he wants to talk,” the little girl pouted.

The woman shook her head as she sized up Derek and the large, black dog. “I don't think he does.”

“But—”

“Come on, sweetie,” she said. “Sorry,” she said gruffly to Derek. She grabbed the girl's arm and dragged her back to the other side of the bleachers, where the rest of the parents sat.

Derek sighed as he rose from his haunches. He couldn't blame the woman. He imagined he wouldn't want his five-year-old daughter talking to any strangers, let alone an unknown, scruffy, scuzzy man with a big black dog that, thanks to stigma, was widely recognized as one of the most vicious breeds alive other than Pit Bulls. He brushed off his arms, pulled his fingers through his unruly hair, and pushed away from the bleachers.

He should head back, anyway. He'd given his nerves enough exercise, and he was starting to get a bit of a headache as a result. He jerked Samantha's leash. She stood and shook. Her dog tags jingled. “We'll do the dog park on Sunday,” he promised. “I'll drive if I'm too tired to walk you.” She whuffed at him, satisfied.

They headed home, leaving the miniature soccer game behind. He couldn't help but smile as they ambled along. He'd aimed for ten minutes of spectator-ship, and he'd managed something more like twenty. And he hadn't really left because the parents had been uncomfortable with him.

The last mile on the way home was rough, and slow, as he could barely lift his feet from the pavement, but he pushed, and he made it without feeling like he would throw up or die or collapse, which put him in an even better mood. He was exhausted as he stepped onto his porch with shaky limbs, panting, but it was a thorough, to-the-bone feeling of being spent. Not overspent.

He released Samantha from her leash, and she trotted off to her crate. He hobbled up the steps to the shower to hose himself off, but the warm, buffeting sheets of water only served to sap his remaining sentience. His heartbeat slowed. He collapsed onto the bed on top of the blankets with a wet towel wrapped around his waist, his hair still dripping. His breathing lengthened as he brought his hands underneath the cool pillowcase to support his head. He surrendered into a recuperative Derek sat Indian style in the hallway to the kitchen. He tossed the baseball. It thunked against the wall and bounced back at him. He reached with the old leather baseball glove his father had given him, only to miss the ball. The thick ball whacked him in the knee and stung, but it didn’t matter. The world was already a blurry mess. He wiped his face and threw the ball again and again. He usually caught it.

Thunk. Bounce.

Thunk. Bounce.

Thunk. Bounce.

Thunk. Bounce.

Thunk. Bounce.

Thunk. Bounce.

He flinched backward as a big hand adorned with a thick gold wedding ring swept into his field of view and ferreted the ball away from him. The soothing scent of sawdust tickled his nose as his father sat next to him on the floor with a soft groan.

“I think you're driving your poor mother insane with that noise, Der,” he said.

Derek looked at the floor. “Sorry.”

His father touched Derek's shoulder. Derek wiped his face again. Eyes like azure steel stared at him from a tanned, worn face. “Want to tell me what this is about?” Dad said.

Derek sniffed. “I can't play,” he said.

His father frowned, and it set deep, worn lines into his face. “Who said that?”

Derek fiddled with the seam of his jeans by his knees. He didn't look up. “Everybody.”

“What do you mean, everybody?”

“I tried to play at school, and they said I couldn't.”

His father put his hand on Derek's chin and tipped back Derek's head, forcing him to look up. “Derek, why?”

Derek shrugged.

“Hey,” Dad said. He smiled as he ruffled Derek's frizzy hair. “It's me. You can tell me.”

“Dad, I really tried,” Derek said. “I couldn't catch anything.” His lower lip quivered, and a fresh pair of tears jagged down his cheeks. “I'm not good at baseball.”

His father sighed, running fingers through his curly black hair in an idle expression of frustration. “I really doubt that.” He rubbed Derek's shoulder, a steady, reassuring stroke. “Let's go outside.”

“Why?”
“We'll play catch.”

“I don't want to play anymore.”

His father climbed to his feet and held out his hand. Derek wiped his burning eyes and didn't move.

“Derek, come on,” Dad said.

“Why?”

“Because we're going to play,” Dad said. “It's not up for discussion.”

Derek sighed. He knew that tone. Begrudgingly, he lumbered to his feet and followed his father through the living room and out the front door onto their small lawn. The grass had died in patches. His mother kept trying to reseed it. Cars lined the street bumper to bumper beyond the sidewalk. His dad stood closer to the street, legs and arms spread, his leather loafers planted in dust that had once been a carpet of Zoysia.

“Put up your glove,” Dad said. He posed with his knees slightly bent, hand raised, as though he were ready to lunge for any projectiles that came his way. He gestured at himself, highlighting his long, lithe frame. “Remember how I showed you?”

Derek mirrored his father, watching him as he took the baseball he'd confiscated and drew his hand back in the ominous precursor to a throw. Derek swallowed. His dad threw a fastball that flew through the air so quickly Derek could barely keep track of the blur. Derek pounced. The ball smacked into his gloved hand so hard his palm stung, and he reflexively closed his fingers around the ball.

“That's not somebody who can't catch, Derek,” his dad said.

Derek frowned. He took the ball from his glove and lobbed it back. His dad caught it barehanded and returned the throw. Derek made a blistering catch that stung his hand, again, and he blinked. Dad gave him a pointed grin. “Have you thought that, maybe, the problem is that they can't throw?”

Derek threw the ball back, and his dad caught it. He wiped his face with his gloveless hand. They had been throwing balls at him like it was dodgeball. Not baseball. And then they'd laughed when he couldn't catch them. Told him if he couldn't catch, he shouldn't be playing. Told him he was probably too short to run bases anyway.

“I hate the kids at school,” he muttered.

“I know you do,” his dad said sadly. He moved his arm back. Readied a throw. The ball left his hand in a blur.

Derek raised his glove and dashed to the left. A zing and a catch.

Dad smiled. “You can't hate baseball, though. Those are the rules.”

Derek threw the ball back. “I don't want to play at school.”

“You don't have to,” Dad said. He tossed the ball. Derek leaned right and caught it. “But I have a request.”

“What, Dad?” Derek said. He returned the ball.
Dad tossed the ball back to Derek. Dad's messy hair fluttered in the breeze. “I have tickets to the Yankees game this Friday, right behind the dugout. And I'd like you to go with me.”

The ball stung in his glove, and Derek shook his hand as his mouth tumbled open. “Behind the dugout?”

“Yes,” Dad said. He grinned. “I wanted to surprise you for your birthday. Ten is a very important year, you know. Will you go with me?”

A wispy breath caught in Derek's throat. They usually watched games on the television. He could remember staring at the crowds in the stands, wishing that were him. “Can we get hot dogs?” Derek said.

“Hmm,” Dad said, a low, absent rumble as he considered the request. He nodded after a moment, his blue eyes twinkling. “That sounds like an excellent plan. And cotton candy, if you want.”

Derek raised his eyebrows. “Really?”

His dad frowned. “Well, it wouldn't be a good birthday present without cotton candy, would it?”

“Can I bring Mark?”

“I think that can be arranged. I might have bought three tickets.”

Derek blinked as excitement thundered through his body in a shivery, overwhelming rush. He pumped his fist. “This is so cool!” he blurted. “Can I go tell Mark?”

Dad nodded, and Derek barely paused to breathe before he scampered for his bike, a smile as wide as the Yankees' outfield plastered on his face.

His head snapped off the pillow. Samantha barked in sharp, deep, warning staccato downstairs. Her nails scrabbled on the floor as she paced by the front door. He fought the urge to clap his hands over his ears as his nerves coiled. He pushed himself up on his arms, ignoring the brief spear of pain. The rest of his muscles hurt so much, a little flare in his chest didn't make much difference.

He stumbled to his feet, blinking muzzily in the late afternoon sunshine, which made his calves join the chorus of ow, ow, ow in his groin and thighs and back. Dust motes swirled in the air. They scattered as he plodded to the master bathroom to deposit the damp towel he’d fallen asleep in and exchange it for the fuzzy blue bathrobe Meredith had given him their first Christmas together.

Somebody knocked at the front door, adding to Samantha's frenzy, and his own sense of bleeding ears.

“Sam, quiet!” he snapped.

She stopped. Immediately. Which unwound nauseating tension. His jaw unclenched. The sharp lines of pain in his sinews relaxed. He groaned. He didn't feel like talking to anybody, let alone anybody who didn't have a key to the house. But at least it was somebody Samantha recognized, and she considered her job done now that he was aware they had a visitor. That was reassuring. It could be Mark. Derek banked on that. Mark would at least get it when Derek wasn't very chatty.

The door knocked again. He squinted and scrubbed his eyes, trying to wipe the gauzy feeling of sleep away from his sticky eyelashes. It didn't help. He sighed.

“Coming,” he yelled, and he gingerly made his way downstairs.
Samantha sat on the welcome mat on her haunches, looking at the door with a pointed expression. “Please, tell me it’s Mark,” he grumbled as he wrapped his hand around the doorknob, but his dog didn’t offer him any hints, not that he really expected any.

He twisted and pulled, and the door swung back on its hinges with a light moan.

He blinked.

Well, fuck.

Cristina pulled open the glass door and met his eyes. She wore her hair tied back in a messy braid. Black strands fell down over the neck of her small leather coat and rested in a coil atop the red backpack she’d strapped over her shoulders. She held a huge bundle underneath her right arm.

Samantha’s stump tail wagged. She pushed her head across the threshold. Cristina reached with her free hand to stroke Samantha by the ears. Leather creaked.

“Meredith’s at work,” Derek said.

“I know,” Cristina said.

She pushed the bundle under her arm at him, and he had no choice but to take it or let it fall to the ground. The scent of leather wafted against his nose. A black glove fell free from the pile before he got a handle on everything. She pushed past him into the foyer. Samantha backed out of her way. Cristina turned around once inside and appraised him head to toe. He suddenly felt a little weird standing around in his bathrobe, his legs bare, his hair still damp and frizzy from his shower.

“Get dressed,” she said.

He blinked. “What?”

“I’m not here for Meredith; I’m here for you,” she said. She pointed at the leather-scented pile she’d given him. “Go get dressed.”

He untangled everything. It was a jacket. A leather jacket. And a set of leather gloves that terminated at the knuckles. He bent down to pick up the glove that had fallen, figuring if he left it there, Samantha might decide to make it a chew toy.

“What’s all this for?” he said.

Cristina shrugged. “Meredith might murder me if you get scuffed up.”

“Scuffed... what?”

“I’m taking you out,” she said.

He frowned. “Where?”

She shrugged. “Just out.”

“I don’t want to go out.”

She shrugged her red backpack off her shoulders and held it before him. “I’m going to pull my laptop out of this backpack if you don’t come with me.”
“So?” he said.

“All day. Watching every simpering, sappy chick-flick known to humanity. I have Pretty Woman, The Notebook, Pride & Prejudice, Kate & Leopold—”

He gaped. “Are you fucking serious?”

“Yep,” she said. She paced to the couch in the living room and collapsed in a heap. Her red backpack settled by her hip. She grabbed the television remote and inspected it. “I brought popcorn.”

“But... Why?” he said.

She shrugged. “Because popcorn goes with movies,” she said. “Go get dressed.” She flipped on the television. Anderson Cooper's voice broke the silence in the room. He reported some story about increasing crime rates. Samantha wandered to the couch and collapsed at Cristina's feet with a relaxed groan.

Derek frowned at the television. And at the dog. Traitor.

“You have fifteen minutes before Julia is markering the scuffs away on her hooker boots, and the deal is rescinded,” Cristina said as she leaned to pet the dog.

“But where are we even going?” he said.

“Be sure to wear jeans,” she said. “Thick ones.”

“But—”

She glanced at her watch. “Fourteen minutes,” she said without looking in his direction. CNN seemed to have her captivated.

He swallowed. “Will there be a lot of people?” he said, trying to ignore the red flame across his cheeks that he even had to ask. He didn't think he could do more people today. He shifted from his left foot to his right, cowed. He looked at the floor for a second before he forced himself to look at her instead.

She met his eyes for a long moment, but there was no bite in her unblinking expression. Nothing mean. “No, just me,” she replied.

Silence stretched. She watched the television, ignoring him as he stood like a lump in the middle of the rug. It was clear she’d give him no more clues or demands. But she did make a show out of tapping her watch as the moments passed, and he came closer and closer to being condemned to watching Julia Roberts fall for Richard Gere all day.

He sighed, shaking his head as he plodded up the stairs with the leather coat and gloves, more confused than anything else. Meredith's person, he told himself. This was Meredith's person. She'd saved his life at great peril to herself, and she'd been there for Meredith through thick and thin.

She was there when you weren’t, Meredith had said a long time ago.

Though Cristina was acting her normal, abrasive self, at least she hadn't gotten mean. She wasn't cornering him on his first openly social expedition since the shooting and making fun of him while a hundred eyes watched. She just wanted him to go out... somewhere. Where there were no people.
Which made no fucking sense. She hated him. Why would she want to take him anywhere? She'd made it clear in the past she didn't really like having anything to do with him.

I don't like you, she'd said.

He'd thought he'd understood. You don't like me because of Meredith?

I don't like you because you're you, she'd replied, which had flummoxed him.

Why was he even entertaining this fucking idea?

Meredith's person, he told himself again. Meredith's person. Almost a sister-in-law. He would have to live with her for a long time. Meredith deserved a family that wasn't comprised of enemies. If he and Cristina could establish some sort of friendly truce... fuck.

It was curiosity. Plain and simple.

Where did she want to go? Why did she want to take him? And why the hell did it require a leather jacket and gloves? His thoughts raced, and he realized with a chuckle, at least this situation had broken through the grogginess he'd been fighting all day. He felt awake for the first time.

Maybe, this was her twisted version of an olive branch.

He pulled a clean pair of jeans and boxer-briefs from his dresser, and he slipped them on as he thought of all the possibilities. He grabbed a faded blue t-shirt from the closet and put that on. Socks and cross trainers were next.

He forced a comb through the damp, curly tangles in his hair, though that mostly felt like he was ripping off his scalp, and it didn't help much with the knots. Ten minutes wasn't enough time to deal with that disaster, so he raked his hair against his head with his fingers and decided to leave it. He took some ibuprofen for his muscle aches, brushed his teeth, and called himself done.

He inspected the leather coat she'd given him. The coat would be large enough for him. Age had scuffed discolored lines into the black, particularly at the elbows. A single short red hair rested on the shoulder near a buckle, which he brushed away. Owen's coat, then. He hoped Cristina had at least asked before she'd walked out with Owen's stuff tucked under her arm. He'd thank Owen for the loan, later, once he found out what was going on. He stuffed the gloves in the pockets of the coat and then folded the coat over his arm.

"Ready?" Cristina said as he thudded onto the landing downstairs.

He shrugged. "I guess."

She stood up, brushing a fluttering cloud of black dog hair from her jeans. She left her backpack on the couch in a pile with the pillows, and she thudded out the door without further word. He frowned, following her with his gaze, first, and then with his feet. He didn't bother to set the alarm on the house, but he did lock the door. She waited for him at the foot of the porch. Her Ducati was parked on the street underneath an oak tree that billowed in the breeze. His keys jingled as he headed across the wet grass toward his Cayenne.

"Not there," Cristina said. She pointed to her Ducati as she moved toward the street. "Here."

He stopped in the middle of his yard, planting his feet. His upper lip twitched as he stared at Cristina's bike. She threw her leg over the bike and straddled the seat. Two helmets hung off the bike, one black, one red. His fingers clenched the leather coat as everything made sudden, painful sense. Why did she keep doing shit like this to him?

“No,” he said.

She pointed at the coat in his arms. “Put on the jacket and gloves.”

He shook his head. Breaths tightened in his chest. “No.”

She sighed. “Look, I know you crashed,” she said. “We’ll start slow. I promise.”

“Who told you about—”

“You do know Owen is my boyfriend, right?” she said. “And it was easy enough to infer, even without the info-dump. I’m not a moron.”

He gritted his teeth as fury coiled in his gut. “I won't let you humiliate me,” he said.

She sighed. “I'm not here to humiliate you.”

“The hell you aren't,” he snapped. “I don't know why you think this is funny, but I don't.” He dropped the coat and gloves where he stood, wheeled around on the balls of his feet, and he stalked back to the front door.

“Hey, stop,” she said.

Footsteps pounded behind him. Cristina grabbed his sleeve. He shrugged her off, though it was more of an upset flinch. A thrill of embarrassing fear at being touched unexpectedly clutched his brain and squeezed, and squeezed, and squeezed.

“Leave me alone,” he snapped.

She held up her hands in a gesture of surrender. “God, you are so irritating, sometimes.”

“I'm irritating?” he said, pausing to glare at her. His heart thudded like a jackhammer. The acid bath of adrenaline made his limbs tremble. He fished for his keys, but he couldn't quite get his hands to work.

“I'm not here to mess with you,” she insisted. “I'm trying to help you.”

“Why?” he said.

“What do you mean, why?” Cristina replied. “Meredith loves you.”

He ground his molars. “You hate me.”

She snorted. “You really are full of yourself.”

“And you really are a snotty little girl,” he countered.

“Ooh. I'm shaking,” she said. “McDreamy hates me.”

“You hated me first,” he said. “And don't call me that.”

“That's mature,” she said. “Hypocrite much? Pretty Woman it is, I guess.”

“I want you off my property,” he said.
She frowned. “It's Meredith's.”

Samantha barked on the other side of the door. The headache he'd been fighting earlier roared into existence. “Sam, quiet!” he snarled. He tried to get his key into the lock. His hands shook. He missed three times before sinking the key into the hole. The familiar, metal grinding sound of the lock's teeth falling into place relieved him.

“It's ours,” he said. “And I'm calling the police if you try to come in.” He pushed open the door, pushing Samantha out of the way and blocking Cristina's path with his body. He reached for Samantha's collar and gripped it. She licked his hand, whining at him.

“Wait,” Cristina said, her tone almost begging, as if she'd finally realized she'd bitten off more than she could chew. “Wait, please.”

He didn't know what it was that made him stop his intended beeline for the phone in the kitchen. Her pleading tone. The reassurance of his dog underneath his palm, a silky calming mountain of canine support. The fact that this would create an absolute mess for Meredith to deal with if he really did make the call to the police. He leaned against the doorframe and rubbed his tired eyes. He didn't want to make another mess for Meredith. He didn't want to call the police. But he didn't want to be tormented by this woman, either. He felt like he might throw up.

“Cristina, what?” he said.

“If you try the bike, I'll sneak you into a surgery at work,” Cristina said. “Anything you want. Nobody has to know.”

He shook his head and stared at her. “I don't want to cut.”

She goggled like a fish at him, her expression lacking all comprehension. “But... why?”

“I just don't,” he said.

Silence stretched as she stared at him, and she shifted from foot to foot, a distinctly uncomfortable, set-adrift look on her face. He realized he had her at a loss. That had been her trump card. Offering him a surgery. She didn't know he'd backed out of that responsibility on his own recognizance because he thought he might kill somebody with the state he was in.

He pointed at her bike. “Would you, please, leave?”

She searched his face with her gaze. “I don't have any movies in my backpack,” she said. “I don't have my laptop, either.”

He blinked. “Then, why—”

“I didn't think you'd listen to me if—”

“If you acted like a human being?”

“Look, I'm bad at people,” she said. “Okay?”

He swiped his hand across his face. “No shit.”

“I was trying to be nice at the bar.”

His eyes widened. “That was nice?”
“I said I'm bad at people,” she said.

“I...” He sighed as he closed his eyes. The scene at the dart board with Mark replayed in his head. She'd approached him almost neutrally, but he hadn't wanted to talk to anyone, then, least of all her. A glass had crashed, and he'd jumped down her throat. “I snapped.”

“I know you're sick,” she said, her voice softer.

“What are you talking about?”

She shrugged. “PTSD. I know.”

His fingers tightened around Samantha's collar. His lower lip quivered, and on top of all the other awful things, his sight blurred. Fucking god damn it. Did he not have any privacy at all anymore? None?

She touched his forearm. He flinched back against the door, which rattled on its hinges. She backed off. Immediately. Held up her hands so that he could see both of them, splayed, empty.

“Owen, remember?” she said. “I can add two plus two and get PTSD. Meredith didn't say a word, I swear.”

“I don't—” His voice cracked. He cleared his throat.

“Look, if you don't want to admit it to me, fine. We don't have to talk about that,” she said. She pointed to her Ducati. “But I know you want to do this, and I know you're not letting yourself.”

“You know?”

She nodded.

He wiped his eyes. “I was impaled.”

She nodded. “And shot,” she said. “Crappy things happen. You can't just shell up every time life slaps you in the face.”

Cristina turned and left him on the porch. She walked to the foot of the steps and then into the yard. She picked up the leather coat and gloves he'd dropped in the wet grass, brushed them off, and bundled them in her arms. She continued to the curb, folded her arms over her chest, and leaned against her bike, watching him expectantly.

He looked at the bike. His gut quailed. Just from looking at it.

“Percocet would make you braver,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek took slow, deep breaths, trying to shove the thought out of his head, but other bad things tumbled into the gap in its place. The memory of the saw cutting him loose from the rebar raked his eardrums. He remembered when they'd finally split him free from the concrete. He'd still had a piece of rebar almost bisecting leg. They'd taken him in an ambulance to the hospital with the bar still plunged through muscle and skin. But the experience more than the injury had been what had terrified him. He'd been pinned. He'd gone hoarse calling for help. He'd waited for hours for another human being to happen across him.

Was that something he really wanted to do again?

It's not stupid, Mark had said. You loved riding that bike.
Derek closed his eyes. Samantha pressed against his hip, and he splayed a hand against her ribs. She licked him.

I can't, he wanted to say. I can't do this.

“Do I really need to comment?” said Mr. Clark. “I'm getting fucking tired of it.”

“Please,” Derek said, cringing against the door. Samantha whined. “Stop doing this to me.”

“You know how to make me stop,” Mr. Clark said, his voice low. Taunting.

Derek took another deep breath. His fists clenched. He pushed Samantha back inside. He closed the door and stuffed his keys in his pocket. His legs felt like they were turning to spaghetti, but he walked toward Cristina. She stuffed the jacket and gloves in his hands. He couldn't help but clutch them. They were to prevent his skin from shredding if he slid on the pavement after a spill.

Was that something he really wanted to do again?

“Why exactly do you think this will help me?” he said.

She shrugged. “I have some experience.”

He raised his eyebrows. “With crashing?”

“No.”

“There—”

She straddled the bike and released the kickstand. “Look, would you just put on the jacket, and get on the damned bike?” she said.

He stepped closer. His teeth chattered with nerves.

“You're not going to throttle it the second I sit?” he said, still not quite willing to believe she was being entirely benevolent.

She put on her helmet. “I'm not.”

The black surfaces of the bike gleamed in the late afternoon sunlight. He read the Ducati logo, which was sprawled on the pommel near where she sat. He licked his dry lips as he put on the leather jacket, zipped it, and pulled the leather gloves over his palms. He flexed his fingers. The leather jacket was a bit too large for him, but it would do its job. Same with the gloves.

Cristina looked at him through the visor of her helmet, her expression... strange. Like she felt she was flying blind and didn't like it. “This won't go anywhere,” she said.

“The bike?”

She gestured around them. “This. It's a cone of silence.”

He frowned. “The cone of silence never works.”

“Mine does,” she said.

For a long moment, he couldn't bring himself to move. He imagined his knees might knock together if he tried. And this was Cristina. Cristina, of all people, witness to this. Why the fuck was he even considering this?

I'm not entirely happy you didn't discuss it with me first, but... she knocks, he'd told Meredith weeks ago. And she only gets in my face when she thinks I'm killing myself.

Cristina's your family, so she's my family, and I'll live with it, if it happens, for you, he'd said. Just like I live with the strays.

Aside from a few days ago at the bar... she hadn't really been that bad. Lately.

She's my person, you know, a soft, familiar voice whispered in his ear. She's not going to hurt you. Give her a chance.

He nodded once. Twice for resolve.

Then he swung his leg over the bike and sank into the seat behind Cristina. She handed him the red helmet. Another march of moments passed where he could only hold it in his hands and stare at it.

Cristina didn't needle him as he ran his hands along the smooth outside face. He hadn't worn one of these the night of his accident. Hadn't worn gloves or a coat or anything protective. He'd been a fucking fool.

He pulled the helmet over his head, and his perception of the world narrowed, claustrophobic and limited by the hole in the helmet for his face. He put his feet up on the rests. He blinked. He remembered this feeling. The feeling of the seat beneath him. And also the feeling of leaving it.

“Why are you doing this?” he said.

She turned on the engine and revved it. The bike rumbled underneath him. He remembered that feeling. That and the wind blowing in his face. He wrapped his arms around her waist, reflexively.

“Ready?” she said. “I'll go really slow.”

Nerves dissolved his resolve. He shook his head. “No. No, I'm—”

“On three,” she said, not listening. “Two.”

She zipped away from the curb before she hit one. The movement made it feel like the bottom was dropping out from the world through his stomach, and he made an embarrassing sound of sheer terror. His eyes snapped shut, and he gripped her so hard she grunted, but he couldn't make himself loosen up. Wind buffeted his face and his neck and his body. He plastered himself against her, too terrified for shame or humiliation or anything other than his own self-preservation.

And then it was over.

“Try this one with your eyes open,” she said over the rumble of the bike's engine, no bite or ridicule in her tone.

His head snapped up. He opened his eyes. They were against the curb in front of the house, exactly where they'd started, almost as if they'd never left. “We already went around—”

“Yep,” Cristina said. “Around the block. Ready?”

“Cristina—” he managed.

“Three. Two.” She zipped away from the curb, and the same thing happened again.
His eyes snapped shut, and he plastered himself to her smaller frame. When she drove them back to the curb where they'd started in front of the house, it took him a full minute to unwind from her, and it was humiliating and awful and he really did think he might throw up. He swallowed and swallowed and swallowed again before he managed to loosen his arms.

“I don't like this,” he said, his voice a bare whisper. He couldn't move.

“I've got an idea,” Cristina said. “Give me your keys.”

“My po... pocket,” he said. He didn't have his thoughts together enough to wonder what she was up to. Or to focus on anything other than not falling apart at the seams.

She didn't make any jokes about fishing in his pants for keys. She didn't make any jokes at all. She wormed into his jeans pocket. He felt her hands. His keys jingled. He sat on the bike in a shivery daze.

“Stay here,” she said, as if he could walk, anyway. She left the bike idling underneath him.

The rumbling pressed against his brain. Made him want to curl up in a dark, quiet corner. He couldn't do this. She was wrong. There was no point to suffering like this, not when so little would be accomplished. He'd lost his nerve, and it clearly wasn't coming back. He'd gotten more mature, and he knew too much about the ways his brain could be made into a fine paste because he'd spent the last two decades of his life fixing those kinds of injuries.

He looked toward his front door when he heard the familiar jingle of Samantha's dog tags. Cristina led Samantha out of the house on her leather leash. Samantha seemed overjoyed at the prospect of another walk so soon after the last one, and she trotted, a joyous look on her face.

“What are you doing with my dog?” Derek demanded as Cristina approached.

Samantha sniffed the motorcycle, inspecting the seat and the handlebars and the vibrating tailpipe and him, unperturbed by the sound of the noisy engine. She was a big enough dog that the bike and her shoulders were almost even, the bike having a slight height advantage. She sat beside him on the pavement and looked at him, her tongue dangling from her mouth in what he could only describe as a smile.

Cristina resettled onto the bike in front of him. It sank on its tires underneath her weight. Cristina reached behind herself, holding out Samantha's lead.

“Hold her leash,” Cristina said, and she dropped the leash in his lap.

He had no choice but to pick up the leash, or he'd have a loose rottweiler that could get into a lot of mischief, no matter how well-trained she was. She liked to chase cats and squirrels, for one. He glanced at Samantha, who seemed as perplexed with this situation as he did, but not nearly as nervous. This couldn't be safe. Could it? “But—” he managed.

“We'll go on three, two...”

The bike kicked away from the curb. Samantha leaped into motion. Derek grabbed Cristina with his free hand, and he made a sick, upset sound as his eyes snapped shut. He gripped the leash so hard it hurt his palm even through the thick glove. He tried to feel for any sign of pull on the line, ready to let it go to save his dog from getting decapitated. He swallowed. He couldn't feel anything, but... He heard Samantha moving. Her tags jingled.

He cracked open his eyelids. Through the blur of his dark eyelashes, he saw Samantha moving along at a relaxed trot, her coat glossy and gleaming in the dimming sunlight. She panted, her tongue dangling from her mouth, and she seemed happy as could be to get some more exercise at a faster pace than the slow walk he'd managed that morning on foot. Beyond her, he saw nothing but a verdant blur, but...

He closed his eyes. Squeezed. And then forced them back open to look. Really look. Without his eyelashes in the way, distorting things.

He clutched the leash in his lap. His lower lip trembled as he watched houses crawl past. They couldn't have been going more than five miles an hour. The wind fluttered against his face and body.

When they reached Meredith's house after a lap, Cristina didn't stop at the curb this time. She kept going. A little faster. Samantha's trot became a bit of a lope, but she kept up fine and seemed to be having the time of her life. Her tongue lolled out of her open mouth. She barked as they moved along as though she imagined she was in pursuit of juicy prey.

Derek blinked, watching her. And then he laughed. It was a small laugh. But a laugh.

When they came to a stop at the curb, Cristina looked back at him. “You kept your head up, that time, and you didn't crush me, either,” she said over the growling engine.

“I...” he said. He swallowed. “I guess.”

“One more?”

He glanced at Samantha. She stared back at him, happy brown eyes wide in an excited, exhilarated expression. She panted, but she stood beside the bike. She didn't sit. She seemed like she could do another lap.

He nodded. “Yeah,” he said.

Cristina pulled away from the curb, and they went around again, around the hilly block that had given Derek so much fucking trouble right after his surgery, and more than that after the pneumonia. They moved a bit faster than before. The bike rumbled underneath him. Samantha galloped beside him to keep up, but she seemed more than happy to do so, and he laughed, watching her gleefully get the exercise she deserved but had never demanded on their many glacially slow walks.

When they pulled up to the curb again, Samantha slid to her stomach on the pavement, panting.
Cristina gestured at the handlebars. “Do you want to try it?”

The warmth leached from his skin, and he tensed. He shook his head. Vehemently. “No.”

“Stop?” she said.

He surprised himself when he answered, “No...”

Cristina nodded. She turned off the bike, set down the kickstand, and removed her helmet. He did the same. She stared at him, assessing. “Small break, then,” she decided.

“Okay,” he said. He leaned off the bike to pet Samantha. Her coat gleamed in the sunshine.

They rested. Birds chirped. A few cars rumbled past. He was content to sit on the bike, just listening. Feeling the breeze blow. He swiped his hands through his messy hair. Sweat had started to collect again. Sweat from fear. But it was starting to dry, now that he'd removed his helmet.

Cristina played with the strap of one of her gloves. “I lied,” she said, inspecting the Velcro.

“Lied about what?”

“My dad died when I was nine,” she said. “Car accident. He died in front of me. I do have experience with crashing.”

She didn't look at him. He blinked, staring at the back of her head. Amelia had been eight when it'd happened. Only a year younger.

_Dad? Daddy_?

A visceral flash hit his mind. His baby sister's small, bony body in his arms as he'd held her behind a shelf. She'd bit him and squirmed, trying to get free. And then the gun had cracked. Amelia had lost her dad.

_He'd lost his dad._

He shook his head, shocked to find such a tragic point of similarity between him and Cristina, a woman who he'd always viewed as someone with whom he had nothing in common.

“I'm sorry,” he said, his voice soft.

She bristled and turned to glare at him. “I didn't tell you for sympathy points.”

“Then why did you tell me?”

She shrugged. “I wouldn't ride in a car for a while,” she said.

He gestured at the bike. “Did somebody do this with you?”

She shook her head. “Not this.”

“Like this?” he said.

“Yeah.”

“I didn't know,” he said.

She shrugged. “Not many do,” she said. She sighed. She gestured to Samantha. “She looks tired. I'll put her back.” She held out her hand. He gave her the leash. Samantha followed her back to the house at a slow, spent walk.

When Cristina returned, she handed Derek his keys, which he stuffed back into his front pocket. She climbed back on the bike, in front of him. She put her helmet back on, released the kickstand, and revved the engine. The bike rumbled.

“Why are you doing this?” he said over the roar.

She ignored him. “Ready for another?”

He put his helmet on as well. “Why?”

“Going in three. Two.”
They kicked away from the curb and flew around the block. Faster, this time, now that they didn't have to worry about Samantha keeping up. The wind buffeted his skin through the open face of the helmet. He held Cristina's waist, but not too hard, and he kept his head up, watching the scenery shift slowly past. The woman he'd seen playing in the yard with her kids when he'd been out for his walk had gone inside with them a long time ago, but he could see the skeletal remains of their playtime. A discarded tricycle. Crumbling piles of sand creations in the sandbox. Cristina turned the corner. A smile twitched at his lips, and all at once the road peeled away like a flower petal in the wind, and he was somewhere else.

The shifting, vibrant reds, rusts, oranges, and yellows of fall foliage churned past his field of view. Water spread beside him, a flat plane of sparkling gray glass as he zipped along the coast. The fresh scent of salt and ocean coiled in his nose, and he inhaled. The engine beneath him rumbled as seagulls split the air overhead with razor wings.

He yelled into the wind. Not because he was scared. Because it felt fucking good.

Another yell mirrored his own. Behind him. “This is fucking awesome!” Mark said against the wind.

“Still think I should have gotten a car?”

“Fuck, no!”

Derek grinned, the whites of his teeth showing. He passed a car, and then he accelerated. They tore into the sunset as it painted the sky.

“Better that time?” Cristina said as she pulled them up to the curb.

He shook his head, almost amazed to find himself back at the curb by Meredith's house, instead of pounding down Route 1 with Mark. He flexed his fingers, remembering the feel of the handlebars. The way the wind shearing past him had made him feel like he was flying. Opening up on an empty road with beautiful scenery was such an exhilarating, godlike rush. He had yet to discover another experience quite like it. Road bicycles didn't go fast enough to achieve the sensation, roller coasters were too brief, and cars were too... enclosed. Even convertibles.

“Yeah,” he said. “It was better.”

“Want to try, yet?”

He glanced at Cristina. Where she sat. At the handlebars. In front of him. For the first time, the idea of that being him sitting there didn't plunge ice water through his veins.

“Will you tell me why you're doing this if I try?” he said.

She shrugged. “If that's the carrot on a stick you need.”

She gestured at the handlebars once more, and she slid off the bike as she looked at him expectantly. He licked his lips and swallowed. The hypothetical idea of sitting in front and actually driving, versus being presented with it as something to do now, as in right now... That was a lot more daunting.

He slid forward to the front and wrapped his hands around the handlebars. The leather gloves squeaked as he clenched his hands. Shivery, nervous energy settled into his legs and arms. He didn't think he could.
No, he couldn't.

Could he?

Cristina settled behind him. The bike shifted as put her feet up. Her delicate hands pressed against his waist. She tapped his hip to let him know she was ready.

He swallowed. Closed his eyes.

Do it, he told himself. Just fucking do it. Rip the band-aid.

He kicked them away from the curb, throttling the engine. The bike jerked forward. His body whipped back at the waist and then lurched forward to the handlebars as it overcame inertia. His stomach churned as the unexpected seesaw filled him with nausea. He clutched the handlebars, breathing tightly.

"Sorry. I'm sorry," he muttered as they wobbled forward at a laughable pace that forced him to weave back and forth to keep the bike from tipping. Except the idea of speeding up terrified him. He resigned himself to the frustrating war of keeping the bike upright. His face heated like a wildfire had exploded in his helmet. He clenched his jaw and his hands, and his limbs started to shake with upset nerves.

They rolled around the block more slowly than Cristina had been going when they'd had Samantha to worry about. Three or four miles an hour. They were fucking speed demons. Cristina didn't comment. Her hands remained at his waist, steady, calm, the entire way.

When he arrived at their spot at the curb by Meredith's house and put his feet down on the pavement, he shook his wrists, trying to relieve tension he'd jammed into his muscles. A funnel of embarrassed fury burned him from the inside out. He took a breath. He glared at the handlebars. He could do better than that. Fuck that.

"Can we go farther?" he said through gritted teeth.

Leather creaked as Cristina shrugged behind him. "Whatever you want."

He pulled away from the curb once more. He made sure to keep the bike traveling in a smooth, straight line. His muscle memory was returning, making it a lot easier to balance and steer. The bike rumbled beneath him.

Cristina remained a solid, silent presence at his back. She was a skilled rider, and she didn't make any movements that made balancing the bike difficult. She may have even been helping him a little, subtly leaning left or right as the situation dictated. He imagined the first couple laps they'd taken when he'd been plastered to her back and squeezing her stomach like the middle of a toothpaste tube, he'd made it very difficult for her, but she hadn't commented then, either.

He accelerated to the speed limit smoothly, and he rode them around the block once. Twice. Three times without stopping.

The fourth lap, he didn't turn left to go around again. He continued in a straight line. Quaint houses and green lawns peeled past his view. A woman walking her cocker spaniel flew backward in the corner of his eye. He pulled to a stop at a stop sign to let a man on a blue bicycle cross the street in front of him. As soon as the man had crossed, Derek gunned the engine and pushed off again.

You spent your entire savings on a fucking motorbike? Why not get a car, man? We could pick up chicks in a car.
You don't understand. You gotta try this, Mark.

Try what?

Riding it!

Cars sped back and forth at the cross section at the end of the street. The main road. A twisted coil of nerves in his center told him to stop before he got stuck in the middle of a bunch of other vehicles with no escape but to bear it through to the end. But he was so sick of stopping. And so sick of being frightened. And so sick of listening to Gary Fucking Clark tell him he couldn't do anything or go anywhere or talk to anybody new because it was scary.

But helmets look stupid.

Just put one on, Mark.

But—

Fuck all of it.

He waited for a gap in the oncoming churn of cars, and he turned onto the main drag where the speed limit was a bit higher. There was a yellow double stripe line in the center of the road. There was traffic in the way, but not as much as it'd seemed from the side street looking on. A red Scion roared past him on his left, buffeting his smaller bike, but he corrected for the sideswipe of air that would have sent a beginner rider tipping to the ground or swerving off the road. It all came back so easily.

Trust me. We'll take a spin on Route 1.

That's miles away.

It's worth it.

He opened up and zipped forward, quickly catching the Scion that had passed him. He laughed. Really laughed. A belly laugh that made him hurt with its ferocity.

He was flying. And it wasn't scary. It was a rush. Exactly like he remembered. The scenery tore past his eyes in a blur, and he felt... happier than he could remember, ever, except for when Meredith had told him she was pregnant, and when she'd said she'd try a relationship again, and later when he'd married her.

The thingy, she'd said. It's a plus, Derek. Look.

His vision blurred. He had to pull them off the road or risk crashing. He turned back into Meredith's quiet neighborhood, though he wasn't quite sure what street they'd ended up on. He could barely read the sign. The sound of traffic muffled behind them, and the world again became a cavern formed by trees.

“What's wrong?” Cristina said, frustrated confusion audible in her tone.

The setting sun warmed his skin as he peeled off his helmet. The bike idled underneath them. Derek wiped his face with the backs of his leather gloves. The leather scraped against his cheeks, and he imagined he would look like a stoplight with how red and irritated his skin felt, but... didn't think it mattered. He blinked.

“Nothing,” he said, his voice low, shaky. And then he laughed. Another belly laugh that hurt. He smiled, and he couldn't stop it. He didn't want to stop it.

Cristina stared at him. Her jaw opened. Closed. “Oh,” was all she said.

He turned off the bike. They rested in front of a two-story house with chipping white paint. Manicured holly made a makeshift fence around the property. He glanced at the flowerbeds, all greenery at this point, and no flowers. Breaths slipped in and out of him as he stared. His eyes burned, but it was a good burn. He felt... really fucking good.

“Break time,” he said, his voice cracking as he put down the kickstand.

“Okay,” Cristina said, again, no ridicule. No comments on his emotional disarray. She slipped off the bike, stood, and stretched. She pulled off her helmet and shook out her hair. Sweat dotted her brow. She brushed a loose strand of black frizz out of the way.

He wiped his eyes again. “So, why are you doing this?”

Cristina shrugged. “Meredith is my person.”

“That can't be the only reason.”

“I operated on you at gunpoint,” she said. “I saved your life.”

He nodded. “You did.” He touched her arm. “Thank you.”

She stared at his gloved hand on her leather sleeve. “Most people...” she said. She looked up at him and sighed. “We do the surgery, and they leave.”

“They do.”

“But you live here,” she said. “I know you.”

“So?”

“It doesn't feel finished.”

“Because you think I have PTSD?”

“I know you have it,” she said.

He looked at his lap. Didn't speak.

She sighed. “I don't like this aftermath,” she said.

He swallowed. “Neither do I.”

“I'm supposed to feel finished after I close a wound,” she said. “I operated on you at gunpoint, and you're a mess, and Meredith's a mess, and Owen's a mess.”

His head snapped up. “Meredith's still a mess?” he said.

Cristina shook her head. “She's better, but she's pregnant, and she still has you to worry about.”

“Oh,” Derek said.
A moment passed before he realized Cristina had included another name. Owen. Owen seemed so put together, externally. But... Derek blinked. He supposed that was the insidious nature of a mental illness. Somebody could look fine on the outside, and on the inside be craving Percocet every other minute. Owen had survived combat and had already been battling PTSD before Gary Clark had come along. He would be more susceptible to stressful situations in the future, Derek imagined. Like being shot. Owen had been shot. It hadn't been a serious injury, and Derek hadn't thought much more of it at the time. He'd been wrapped up in his own problems.

And where have you been?

“Owen?” he said.

Cristina ignored him. “I was waiting for Meredith not to be a mess,” she said. “I need her to not be a mess.”

“Why were you waiting?”

Cristina blinked. A pair of tears jagged down her face. She scrubbed her face as he stared, stunned. “I operated on you at gunpoint.”

He didn't know what to say. He hadn't thought she would cry. Ever. “I'm sorry.”

“Shut up,” she snapped. She diverted her gaze. Tears plopped onto the pavement. “I don't want a pity party.” She curled in on herself, like she didn't want to admit to anybody she was crying, least of all him. Her shoulders shook, but she didn't make any noise.

He stared, wide-eyed, lips parted. He had no idea what to do. None.

Whenever Meredith got upset like this, he wrapped his arms around her and let her cry. He would whisper at her, and his heart would splinter with every beat, because he'd want to take it all away, and he wouldn't be able to. A grieving ghost, he could feel her hands grabbing tents of his shirt as she curled against his chest, even then. She liked to burrow against him. Surely, Cristina couldn't need that. She was a fucking human cactus. She...

Was crying. And it hit every uncomfortable button he possessed. He didn't know anything else to do.

He shifted, inching closer to her, and then he hugged her. She leaned into him awkwardly. Her shoulder rested against his chest, and she stayed in his arms, stiff, unyielding, a jagged, bony knife jammed against his sternum. He thought she would pull away. She didn't. He rubbed her back, and over gradual seconds, her butt came to rest on the pommel of the bike in front of him, and she melted against him. The leather of her coat moaned as she sank into his arms. She pressed her nose against his lapel. He imagined it might smell like Owen, if this really was Owen's coat.

“Shh,” he said, “deep breaths,” because there was nothing else for him to say.

He watched over her shoulder as a woman jogged on the opposite sidewalk. The fading sun set the glass windows on all the houses alight. Wind sifted through the leaves of the trees, and the sound billowed around them, a soft, wet rustle. The scent of wet earth wafted against his nose.

“Thank you for saving my life,” he told her.

She shifted in his arms. “You've said that.”

“I know,” he said. He smiled at her. “It bears repeating.”
She wiped her nose with the back of her wrist and pulled away. He let her go. Her face looked puffy and red, but she wasn’t leaking anymore. They didn’t discuss the tears. She rubbed her eyes and sighed as she looked at him.

“I don’t hate you,” she said.

He snorted. “Really.”

She nodded, her expression flat. Serious. “Really.”

“But you said—”

“When it was my job to hate you, I hated you,” she said. “I support my person.”

“Now?”

She shrugged. “I support my person.”

“I don’t ever want to hurt her again,” he said.

He’d never meant anything more resolutely. He would take a bullet for Meredith if he had to. Even knowing he might die. Even knowing the hellish months to follow if he lived would be something like what he’d already experienced the last few months. She meant more to him than anything else.

And where have you been?

“I figured that out,” Cristina said. She fingered her helmet. “Home, now?” she said.

Derek nodded, clearing his throat of the lump that had formed. “Yeah,” he said, the word breathy. He pulled on his helmet as she did the same. He released the kickstand.

He turned on the bike and revved the engine. The vibrations underneath him didn’t scare him anymore. He wasn’t ready for a cross country trip or anything. But he could see spending more time on this. He smiled. Cristina gripped his waist. He throttled the bike.

“By the way,” Cristina said over his shoulder as he pulled away from the curb, “just in case you’ve gotten the wrong idea, I wouldn’t really say I like you.”

He laughed. It felt good. “Cristina, I can honestly say the feeling is mutual.”

“Just making sure.”

He nodded. “Absolutely.”

“Does this make us frenemies?” she asked.

He snorted. “Perish the thought,” he said. He glanced at the street sign. They were on Warren.

He took them home.
Chapter 24

Meredith trudged up the sidewalk to the house, so tired she didn't think she could remember what not feeling tired actually felt like. Thirty-six hour shifts had been murder before she'd gotten pregnant. Now that she was trucking around a future beach ball in her uterus, feeling tired sort of seemed like a second skin she couldn't remove.

Nausea lingered in her gut, though it had subsided somewhat as soon as she’d left Seattle Grace’s maelstrom of horrible smells. Disgusting scents seemed to be abundant in hospitals. Blood, vomit, guts, crap, old urine, pus... All it took was a whiff, and she was done for, desperately holding off gagging paroxysms until she raced to a toilet or a sink or a trashcan. Other than a sewage plant manager, or a trash collector, she thought she might have the worst possible job to do while pregnant.

Everything in her body ached. The cool, darkening air hovering in front of her face seemed to waver as her eyes refused to focus full time. She sighed. Great. Even her freaking eyeballs hurt, and all they had to do all day was sit there in her skull.

She wanted to drop herself into the bathtub and sleep forever.

She pushed through the doorway, surprised when nobody greeted her. Usually, Samantha came to say hello, tongue lolling out of her mouth. And Derek. No Derek? When he had the day off and Meredith didn't, he almost always had dinner ready when she got home. He didn't wait by the door with bated breath or anything, but he often showed up within minutes of her opening it to give her a kiss or... something.

She sniffed the air. Nothing. No dinner. At least not anything that smelled.

She frowned as she placed her purse on the table in the foyer. She tiptoed forward, egged into stealth by the eerie silence. Derek lay in a quietly breathing lump on the couch underneath an afghan, nothing but a dark mop of curly hair and the crooked point of his nose peeking out from the rainbow-colored pile. Samantha lay parallel to him on her back on the floor between him and the coffee table, snoring, paws twitching in the air as she dreamed dog dreams.

Meredith licked her lips and glanced at her watch. Derek went to bed early since he'd been shot, but it was only seven. He'd been staying up past seven regularly within six weeks. Come to think if it, he'd been asleep when she'd gotten home on Wednesday, and that had only been seven-thirty. And they'd skipped sex on Friday because he'd been too tired. And Saturday morning, he'd been exhausted. She'd been tired, too, and then they'd had some pretty great sex, so she hadn't really thought about it.

She frowned. He'd been sleeping a lot since Tuesday. His bad day.

Stress?

She didn't know, but whatever the reason, he clearly needed the rest. She didn't want to wake him, so she padded down the hall to the kitchen. Somebody had left the windows open a crack, and the curtains billowed in the cool breeze. The last remnants of sunlight glittered on the glass panes. Lexie sat at the kitchen table, shoulders curled as she hunched over a carton of rocky road ice cream, looking woeful.

“Hey,” Meredith said as she collapsed into the chair across from Lexie.
Lexie looked up. Hanks of dark, brown hair hooded her gaze. Her cheeks bulged as she spoke around a mouthful. “Hi.”

Meredith raised her eyebrows as she folded her hands over her chest. “Something bugging you?”

Lexie frowned. “Nothing’s bugging me,” she said, a little too quickly. “Why does something have to be bugging me?”

“You're eating out of the carton,” Meredith said, gesturing at the tub of ice cream.

Lexie looked down and sighed. “It looked good.”

“Okay,” Meredith said, too tired to press it.

She felt better sitting. She debated dinner, but... that would require effort to make. She didn't think she could manage effort at the moment. And she wasn't sure she wouldn't barf, yet, either. She was at that annoying twilight period after sickness, where hunger sank in claws, but anything more complicated to digest than Jell-O felt like pushing it.

She stared at Lexie, who spooned another heaping portion of ice cream into her mouth. Ice cream seemed safe. Not smelly or hard to digest. And she was getting hungry... It all came back to effort. Getting up to grab a spoon? Effort. She glanced at the utensil drawer. Miles away. And sitting felt so freaking nice.

Meredith sighed. Maybe, a nausea-safe dinner would hop out of the fridge and scuttle toward her on a plate if she hoped hard enough.

“I miss Mark,” Lexie said.

Meredith blinked. “What?”

“I miss Mark.”

“I heard that part,” Meredith said.

She didn't quite know how to handle this. Lexie was her half-sister, but Alex was her friend. And Mark. Her fellow dirty mistress. Mark was her friend, too. How had that happened? She resisted the urge to chuckle in her tiredness. Being tired and being drunk were a bit similar. Ugh. She leaned forward. The chair creaked. She rubbed her eyes. She felt a bit like she might be poking a hornet's nest with a chainsaw or something, but...

“What about Alex?” she said.

Lexie stabbed her spoon into the rocky road and pulled loose a huge chocolate chunk. She shoved it into her mouth, withdrew the spoon, and crunched with a vengeance. “It hasn't been the same since he got shot.”

“What hasn't been the same?” Meredith said.

“Anything,” Lexie said, her words muffled around ice cream. “He called me Izzie when he was delirious.”

“Lexie, you can't hold him responsible for what he said when he was suffering hypovolemic shock. People see things. They say things.” Derek hadn't exactly been articulate for a lot of it, when he'd spoken at all.
Lexie shook her head. “I don't hold him responsible,” she said. She gave Meredith a hopeless look. “It's just... I don't feel like a person when I'm with him.”

“What do you mean?”

Lexie shrugged. “I'm just rebound girl,” she said. “I told him I loved him—”

“When he was shot!” Meredith said. “Does he even remember?”

“I didn't say it was reasonable!” Lexie snapped. She jabbed her spoon into the carton as though she found it cathartic. “But he doesn't... He's just not...”

“He's Alex, Lexie,” Meredith said softly. “He's not touchy-feely.”

“I know that,” Lexie said. “It's not that.” She twisted the spoon. “I expected that.” The ice cream in the container had become malleable with the heat of being out of the freezer and repeated friction of the spoon. “I'm not special to him. I'm just filling a space. But what kind of jerk leaves a relationship right after...?” Her voice trailed away. Her eyes were red when she looked up. She swallowed as she gave Meredith a pointed, haunted look. Right after somebody gets shot, she seemed to not be saying.

“Oh,” Meredith said.

Lexie sighed, a frustrated sound. “It doesn’t matter.”

“It does, Lexie.”

“It's just...” She took another heaping spoonful of ice cream. “You've been so strong,” she said, envy squeezing her words.

Lexie took another bite of ice cream. She seemed... almost as though she were placing Meredith on a pedestal. Or... Well, she was the little sister, technically. God. Lexie was little-sistering Meredith.

How had that happened?

Meredith swallowed. She wasn't sure she was a good role-model to be following in the first place. Her past wasn't exactly stellar. Her win in the relationship department had been the result of a lucky crap shoot, really. Not any sort of intelligent planning. But... Her palms wandered to her belly button. Slightly lower. She rubbed in a slow circle, her palms pressing against the soft knit of her shirt. When she realized what she was doing, she froze. Lexie watched her, too, a quirky grin on her face, as if she were happy for the distraction.

And that, Meredith thought pointedly at her pending beach ball.

How had that happened?

Well, you see, said the Derek of her imagination. As we've already discussed, it was clearly Cindy Crawford and Don Juan making some magic.

Meredith sighed, shaking her head. Tired and drunk. Synonymous.

If she were to leap backward in time to tell her past self of five years ago that she'd soon be pregnant, married to her boss, and giving her little half-sister relationship advice, her past self would have laughed her ass off and probably chalked up the weirdness to bad Tequila.

“Lexie, I'm married,” Meredith said. “And Derek and I have a lot of history. And a really big...
I don't think I have that.

Do you think you could have that?” Meredith said, eyebrows raised.

Lexie took a long time to decide. “I don't know.”

“Do you want to have that?”

“Yes!” Lexie said.

“With Alex?” Meredith prodded.

Lexie didn't answer. She stared at Meredith for a moment, brown doe-ish eyes wide. Then she looked at the tub of ice cream and jammed her spoon into it as though she were trying to kill it deader than dead. She dragged a huge chunk of marshmallow-y, chocolate-y goop out of the carton. The spoon clinked against her teeth. She closed her lips around it, sighing as she chewed with bulging cheeks.

“Lexie—” Meredith began, only to stop when Derek lumbered through the kitchen door wearing gray sweatpants, white socks, and a blue t-shirt.

His hair was a scraggly mess, and he looked like he'd left his sentience behind in the other room. He ran his fingers over his ear and squinted at them, as if his eyes wouldn't quite focus. He paused on Lexie, his expression neutral, but when he looked at Meredith, everything softened. His gaze. Posture. A relaxed smile tugged at his lips. His path toward the fridge veered into a path toward the table.

“I want that!” Lexie blurted around the spoon dangling from her mouth.

“Huh?” Derek said.

“I want somebody to look at me like that,” Lexie said. She sighed. “And Mark... did.”

Gears seemed to grind behind Derek's eyes as he thought about this new development. “Oh,” Derek replied.

“Sorry,” Lexie said. “Sorry, just ignore me. I babble. A lot. I babble a lot. And I seem to be babbling, now. Despite my knowledge that I should be shutting up and leaving and not babbling.” She took another spoonful of ice cream and chomped, eyes wide.

Derek's gaze shifted back and forth between Lexie and Meredith. He looked at the ice cream. The serious expressions on their faces. The dour atmosphere. Girl talk. Meredith smirked as she watched the conclusion break apart the tired haze in his eyes. He blinked.

“Should I go back into the living room?” he said.

“No,” Lexie said.

Meredith shrugged.

He frowned, a slightly befuddled look on his face. After some consideration, he didn't leave. His chair creaked. He leaned into her, a sleek, long line of muscle that, despite her tiredness, made her heart patter faster. The soft, musky scent of his skin wafted against her as he kissed her by the ear. She felt him smiling against her.

“Thanks for the blanket,” he said.

Meredith, discombobulated by the intimate hello, didn't have any idea what he was talking about. “I...”

“I did it,” Lexie said, solving the mystery. Derek pulled away and looked across the table at her. She blushed. “You were out cold. Sorry.”

“Thank you,” he said, his tone sincere.

“No problem,” Lexie said. She grabbed the tub of ice cream and her spoon. Her chair squawked across the floor as she pushed it back and stood. “Shutting up and leaving, now.”

She departed as though she were fleeing from a fire. The blare of the television banged through the door moments later, and Meredith bit her lip as she watched Derek flinch in his chair. The volume adjusted to a whisper easily ignored. Derek relaxed in moments. He blinked at Meredith and scrubbed his fingers through his hair as he pulled in a long sigh of air. He smiled at her, and then he stood.

He went to the fridge and rummaged. Meredith watched the way his arms flexed. Watched the shift of his weight from his right leg to his left and back again. He looked good. Really good. Months ago, he'd barely avoided classification as a skeleton. Whatever he'd been doing in and out of physical therapy had caught up with the fact that he was eating again, though. Really eating. Without any harassment from her. His toned physique had gradually renewed itself.

She smiled as a tub of fruit salad and a glass of water appeared in front of her as if by magic. Fruit would be easy to digest if she avoided the citrus-y stuff. Had he read her freaking mind?

She ate while he moved behind her. The sink rushed. Dishes clinked. Lexie or Alex had probably left something out again. He was meticulous about keeping the sink clear.

Minutes passed. He sat down beside her, munching quietly on an apple. He still wasn't quite all there. He blinked sluggishly. Like he wanted to go back to bed or something. In fact, the only reason he was sitting there at all seemed to be the magnetic pull factor. He hadn't seen her in nearly two days. He wanted to spend some time in her general orbit, even if they didn't talk.

A smile tugged at her lips. That was a nice feeling. The orbit thing. One she reciprocated. He had reassuring presence to him. He made her feel safe. And, really, she just liked him. When the world wasn't falling apart around them, he was chatty and cheerful. A fun person to hang out with. Except he wasn't chatting at the moment. She attributed his quiet behavior to tiredness. They were both tired.

At least she had an explanation for hers, though. He'd had the weekend off. She swallowed a banana slice. “Derek, are you okay?” she said.

He stopped chewing and looked at her. “Sure,” he said. “Why?”

She picked up her fork and snuck a plump strawberry between words. “You've been sleeping a lot.”

“I jogged today,” he said. “With Samantha. It wore me out.”
She gaped. “You... what?”

“Jogged,” he repeated with a wink. “It’s a form of ambulation that’s slightly faster than walking.”

She pushed him in the shoulder playfully, fruit salad forgotten as a thrilled smile grabbed her lips and wouldn’t let go. “Shut up. Really? How far?”

“Only a mile.”

“That’s great,” she exclaimed, unwilling to allow his self-deprecating tone to stand.

He stared at her for a long moment, as if soaking in her happy reaction. Instead of celebrating with her, though, he seemed... upset. His expression splintered when he blinked. “I really messed up, didn’t I?”

“What do you mean?” she said, frowning. “You jogged. That’s great.”

He looked at his hands. His wrists rested against the lip of the table. “I wasted so much time doing stupid things.”

She sighed. She pinched the bridge of her nose. She was too tired for this crap tonight. Too tired to play cheerleader. “Derek...”

“Cristina stopped by yesterday,” he said.

That threw her off balance. “She what?”

“I’ve kept you from all your friends.”

“No, you haven’t,” she insisted.

“Yes, I—”

“Derek!” she said. She touched his shoulder. His gaze shifted to her hand. She took the opening, put her palms against his rough cheeks, and pulled him into an unblinking stare. “You don’t have me on a leash,” she said while he watched her, hoping this would get through. She didn’t know how much of this she could muster before she snapped in two tonight. “I do what I choose. Either I’m bossy, or I’m not. Which is it?”

He stayed quiet for a long time. She stared. His eyes twinkled. “Maybe, a little bossy,” he conceded.

She grinned, relief making her shake. Disaster averted. “You love it.”

He leaned into her hand and kissed the inside of her palm. “Maybe, a little bossy,” he conceded.

She leaned into her hand and kissed the inside of her palm. “I do,” he said, deep affection hugging his words, and then he pulled her against him.

She pressed her cheek against the soft cotton of his shirt, and the warmth of his body pushed back at her, wrapped her up like a blanket. He rubbed her back. She pushed her arms underneath his and wrapped behind his waist. He breathed softly against her. They sat there, silent, for what seemed like hours. Her eyes burned with exhaustion when she closed them. She might have fallen asleep to the rhythmic reassurance of his hands moving in circles against her skin. Maybe. Not quite asleep asleep. The room remained a blurry object stuck in her awareness, as did the comfort of his hard body.

She’d needed this. All day. All yesterday. She thought of the fruit salad she’d abandoned on the
It was as if he were reading her mind. About everything.

She loved that connection, not that she could explain it. Its existence soothed her physical aches. Her mental ones. It reminded her why being a cheerleader was so important, even when the cheering sucked, and she felt so tired she couldn’t contemplate lifting her pompoms. She basked in it, the feeling provided by that tether. He took and took right now, but when he was healthy, his capacity for giving was astronomical. He’d taken care of her after the liver transplant. After she’d drowned. When she’d fought with Cristina. The balance would tip back toward the center, soon. That was how it worked.

“You could tell Cristina,” he said, his voice quiet against her ear. “If you need to.”

She flinched, surprised at the sudden noise. His grip around her tightened, reassuring, and the soft squeeze of his hand apologized for him without words from his lips. She blinked muzzily and looked up at him. She squinted, tempted to ignore him and snuggle back into the cocoon he’d made for her.

“What the hell did Cristina say to you?” she snapped.

“Nothing that didn’t need to be said,” he replied, his tone calm. “She doesn’t have her person. You don’t have yours. And it’s my fault.”

“Saying what wrong?” she said.

“I love you, Meredith. I want you to be happy.”

She chuckled acerbically as she picked up her fork and took another bite of her salad. The tines speared a peach this time. The sugar infusion from the salad woke her up a little, at least. “Okay... You definitely said that wrong, since I had no idea that was what you were freaking saying.”

“I love you, Meredith. I want you to be happy.”

She jabbed a grape. It exploded between her teeth. “I’m happy, damn it!”

He kissed her, his lips brushing her temple. He squeezed her shoulder, and his warm hand slid up and down her spine with hypnotic reassurance. Her shirt rustled in the silence as he touched her. “I want you to have your person because you love her, not because I feel guilty,” he said.

“But—”

“I didn't mean to take you from your friends with my problems,” he said.

Somebody coughed. Meredith and Derek looked up. Lexie stood in the doorway, wilting spoon hanging from her lips, ice cream carton balanced on her biceps like a log or something. She swallowed and pulled the spoon away from her mouth. She peered at them over the carton.

“I... Uh...” she stammered. “I was going to put this back before I turn into a fat cow. Sorry.”

Meredith glanced at Derek, waiting for the inevitable explosion. The one about privacy. Or, maybe, he would just stalk off in a huff. He stared at Lexie for a long moment, and Meredith waited. And waited. And waited. Nothing happened.

Derek took a deep breath. He glanced at Meredith. Something shifted behind his gaze. Like he'd made a decision. He swallowed.

“Lexie,” he said, turning back to his sister-in-law. “I have Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.”

Meredith's mouth fell open.

“And I'm addicted to painkillers,” he added.

Lexie stared. Like she had no idea what to say. Who would know what to say to that when something like that was dropped in your lap like a freaking bomb. Silence stretched. Meredith glanced from Lexie to Derek to Lexie to Derek. The skin at the tips of Derek's ears reddened. Blush spread to his face. He cleared his throat when Lexie still didn't say anything. Then he stood, and he calmly left the room without another word, leaving his half-eaten apple on the table behind him.

He'd just...

“What just happened?” Lexie said.

“I...” Meredith began, amazed as she stared at the empty space where he'd been, only moments before. “I have no freaking idea,” she said, but she found herself suspecting that, though he'd failed once again with the whole articulate thing, he'd been using that magical tether to read her mind the whole freaking time, after all.

In retrospect, he hadn't taken a thing that night. He'd only given.

The dressing on her garden salad made her nose crinkle and her stomach roil as soon as she pulled off the plastic wrapping. It was ranch dressing. Ranch! Ranch dressing should be safe. Right? It was the most generic dressing on the planet, damn it.

Salads in general should be safe. Salads were healthy and nutritious and they said good things like, “Here, Baby. I'm feeding you plants and stuff instead of pizza. Please, don't make me hurl.”

That's why she'd picked the freaking thing from the refrigerator in the cafeteria line. Certainly not because she wanted a salad. She wasn't a freaking rabbit. Besides, the pizza from lunch hadn't stayed down, anyway. Trying pizza for the second meal in a row seemed, karmically, like a bad idea. Like she was just asking for another porcelain prayer session.
She'd lost a bit here that day. A bit there. She couldn't count the number of times she'd fled to the bathroom, if not to puke, to pee.

Meredith made a face and stalked to the trashcan by the door to throw out the offending salad. Dinner was an official failure, not that it mattered. She wasn't even hungry anymore. She just felt sick. She couldn't imagine trying to eat anything when she felt like she had a top spinning in her innards. She wondered how she could possibly be consuming enough to feed Baby at this rate, but... at least at home her stomach seemed safe. Well, safer. Not blanket safe. But good freaking god, she hated being at work with a passion at this point.

She glanced at her watch. 6:45 PM. At least the suspense would be over soon, and she could go home.

Honestly, if Derek was serious about elevator sex tonight, she didn't know whether she'd punch him or not. Him wanting sex when she felt like this seemed like a punch-worthy offense. Just a little tiny punch. With no oomph. He'd probably catch it and laugh like the smirky bastard he was, but it'd make her feel better.

Maybe.

She glanced at the far wall. The dim remnants of the day had become dusk outside the window. Lexie, Alex, and Cristina sat in a row on the gurney like a line of pigeons on a wire or something. Lexie doodled in a black spiral notebook. Alex ate potato chips. Cristina read a book on congenital murmurs. None of them looked up or seemed to care about Meredith's misery, which, to Meredith, clearly meant Meredith had suffered far too much misery too often already.

They'd been desensitized to her suffering. And she still had seven months to go. How unfair was that?

She'd felt like crap all day.

She flopped down onto the gurney into the small gap between Alex and Cristina. Her body sank into the mattress. She wanted to lie down, but everybody sat in the way, so she huddled, pressing her knees to her chest, and leaned against the wall behind her. She stared over her knees at the white tips of her Converse sneakers.

“This sucks,” she said, wishing her stomach would settle.

Cristina's pink highlighter squeaked over an emboldened term on page 192. Meredith squinted, but she couldn't read the word. Cristina didn't even look up. “Oh?” Cristina said dryly. “Tell us more.”

Meredith hugged her knees. “I still can't eat anything. The surgeries that don't make me puke make my back hurt from standing so long. My bladder feels like it's the size of a walnut. I'm turning into bloated walrus. How am I supposed to do this for... like seven more months?”

“At least you can still fit into your pants,” Alex said. His potato chip bag crinkled.

Meredith glared. “You're not helping.”

He waved a chip at her and gave her an impressed, smirky, eye-twinkling nod. “Your boobs really do look good, you know.”

“Really not helping.”

Lexie stopped scribbling. “Is Derek...?” she began. She didn't finish the question.
Meredith could fill in the end with phrases like drug addict and post-traumatic stress. Lexie had been handling the idea of Derek's problems well, though she seemed to get hit with occasional moments of gobsmacked amazement, which waffled between disbelief and, Ooh, now it all makes sense!

Within a day of Derek's confession, Meredith had found a pile of books stacked on the coffee table pertaining to PTSD, addiction, trauma psychology, and all sorts of other tangentially-related crap. Lexie had swept them away and hidden them in her room within minutes of Meredith finding the collection. Meredith didn't know if Derek had seen the books. Meredith hoped Lexie's “holy crap, this is big” of it all would settle down. Derek seemed to thrive when people treated him like they always had, barring some minor allowances regarding his startle response. He didn't do as well when people treated him like his presence was an event.

She shook her head. “Derek is Derek,” she said meaningfully.

“Is that good or bad?” Lexie said.

Cristina snorted.

“You, shut up,” Meredith said to Cristina. “I'm still trying to figure out what you did to him.”

Cristina finally looked up from her book. “I didn't do anything.”

“He was really weird this morning,” Meredith said.

Lexie's brow creased with concern. “Define weird.”

“Smirky and... irritating,” Meredith said. “He brought me pancakes. In bed.” He'd given her apple juice, which was easier for her to keep down, instead of orange juice. And he'd put a little flower on the freaking tray. Just a dandelion he'd gotten from the grass outside, but still...

Alex munched on a potato chip. “So, he fed you your favorite breakfast, and you're calling that irritating?”

Meredith shook her head. “No, the pancakes were really good.”

“And you're blaming that on me?” Cristina said.

“No, I'm not blaming the pancakes on you!” Meredith said.

Lexie frowned. “I'm not getting the problem.”

“You did know he smirked a lot when you married him,” Cristina said.

Meredith sighed. “I know he freaking smirks!”

Lexie nodded. “Smirking is very Derek.”

“So is the being irritating part,” Cristina said.

Meredith glanced at her watch again. The moment of truth was getting closer. “He said he was cashing in a rain check today, and he wanted to make sure I'd still be here at 7:00...”

Silence stretched. When she looked up she realized all three of them were staring at her, puzzled expressions loitering on their faces. They just didn't get it.
Ever since his bad day, but particularly since last Sunday, Derek had been... odd with her. Not odd odd, like strange. Odd... Derek-y, which, given recent events, was odd.

He'd told Lexie about his problems, and, within a day, much to Meredith's spluttering surprise, he'd worked his way around to Cristina and Alex. Like he'd felt if he waited for Meredith to get around to doing the telling, she might never do it, so he'd done it for her.

This was an adjustment. People knowing. She couldn't imagine what it felt like for Derek, who'd shifted from relative privacy to figuratively standing on a stage with glaring lights shined in his eyes.

He didn't seem to have any idea how to handle having his mental health so transparent to her social circle. While he'd been antisocial since he'd been shot, the antisocial aspects of his PTSD had tended to manifest in avoidance, not social ineptitude. Around her and around Mark, he seemed fine. But around Alex and Lexie, and, mindbogglingly less so with Cristina, he seemed almost... unnerved by the prospect of finding the right things to say. He'd become scarily shy around them. To the point that conversing with him in their presence seemed like a pointless endeavor, because he hardly spoke.

She appreciated what he'd done for her, giving her her friends back, but on some level, he'd clearly not been ready for it. Clearly pushed himself. He still hadn't told any of his friends. Chief. Bailey. Dr. Hunt. And not his family, either, other than Amelia, who he talked with on the phone every other night.

On top of that, he'd been nothing but nice to her for a week. He hadn't snapped at her once. Hadn't lost his temper. He'd been sweet and considerate, and he smiled at her all the time, and it was just... weird. He'd even started getting inquisitive about what had happened to him when he'd been shot. He acted like somebody had flipped a switch inside his head, and the lights were on.

Like he was him again.

But it couldn't be that simple. Last time he'd been having a good stretch like this, after their vacation to Lake Cushman, he'd ended the streak with a cataclysmic burnout that had ended in a bad panic attack and extorting April for a prescription. He'd rescued himself at the last moment, but...

She bit her lip as her stomach flip-flopped.

She didn't have any idea what to do. She imagined a little screw inside his brain. Tightening and twisting, the pressure building and building as he forced himself to stand under the scrutiny of others and forced himself to be nice to her all the time and forced himself to seem Derek-y around her no matter how horrid he felt. Maybe she was fabricating the whole thing, and he really did feel that much better, but she couldn't help the awful image. And she couldn't help wondering how badly Cristina had messed with his head to cause the paradigm shift in his behavior.

“Look, you just...” she began. She waved her arms. As if that would help explain. It didn't. “You know when things have been really, really crappy? I mean like really crappy. And then there's a lull. And it's like the Jaws theme is playing. And you're all... is it safe to go back in the water? But you don't know. You don't know if the water is safe. It's warm, and it feels so nice, and you want to like it and enjoy it. But you know your foot might get chomped off if you dip your toe into the waves, and that just creates this... buzz.”

“A buzz...” Lexie said, a blank look on her face.
Meredith nodded. “In the back of your head. A buzz. Like a warning. Be careful. Or else.”

Cristina’s expression creased. “This isn’t like with the bomb, is it?”

“In case your memory is failing, there was a freaking bomb,” Meredith said. She blew out a frustrated breath, and bits and pieces of loose hair went flying. “It wasn’t needless worry.”

Cristina rolled her eyes. “You were complaining about faulty conditioner and split ends. Not bombs.”

“Wait,” Lexie said. “Derek is Jaws?”

“Ever since I got home on Sunday after my shift, he’s been sweet and considerate, and it makes me feel like crap,” Meredith said. She turned to Cristina. “Ever since you visited.”

“Sweet and considerate is crappy?” Lexie said.

Meredith sighed. “I can’t even yell at him for the buzz-y thing.”

“I don’t see why him being nice precludes you yelling at him,” Cristina said.

“I didn’t say it was logical,” Meredith grumbled.

Alex shook his head. “Pregnancy rarely is.”

Meredith bumped her shoulder into him and shoved. Hard. “You’re not scoring points today,” she said.

Alex snickered. “Hey, you’re happy, I’m happy.”

“I’m not happy right now,” Meredith said as she resettled. All this neurotic, stupid worrying made her feel worse. Her innards ran in circles. She hoped she wouldn’t puke up what little caloric content she had left in her stomach.

“I still don’t understand what’s wrong,” said Lexie.

“What’s wrong?” Meredith said. She took a deep breath. “What’s wrong is that I’m Richard Dreyfuss waiting for a freaking shark the size of my house to eat me. That’s what's wrong. I should have just stayed in bed today and waited for the crisis in relative comfort. My back hurts.”

She sighed, crossing her arms over her chest, and pushed backward. Her breath knocked in her chest as her back met cold window glass, and she glowered at the far wall where the snack machine rested. Not that glaring or flopping around dramatically did much to soothe any of the yucky anxiety prancing around in her head. Mostly, it just made her back ache.

She glanced at her watch. The universe, as if it had sensed her impatience, sent a wiry, brown-haired intern through the double doors ahead to distract her, but all the coincidence did was make her glare harder at the back of his head as he walked away.

Derek needed to cash his freaking check. Now.

“We should have a baby shower,” Lexie said in the tense lull.

“A baby shower,” Meredith said, narrowing her eyes as she turned her head. “That’s your solution?”
Lexie nodded. “Baby showers are happy.”

“I haven't even had my first appointment with the OB, and you want to have a baby shower? Isn't that premature? Or, like... taunting Jaws with a bloody stump?” Meredith said.

Lexie shook her head. “It's not taunting,” she said. “You're nearly out of the first trimester.”

“We don't know that,” Meredith said. “We don't know anything. Because I haven't had an appointment yet.”

Cristina glanced at her. “Why have you waited this long, anyway?”

“An eight week first appointment is normal!” Meredith said. “This was the first slot they had.”

“You could have waved the professional courtesy flag,” Cristina replied. “They would have gotten you in.”

“Yeah, and bumped somebody else who's just as anxious,” Meredith said. “Plus, I...” Her voice trailed away.

She looked down at her stomach. Rubbed her hands along the waistline of her baby blue scrubs. She couldn't tell, still. There wasn't a bump there. She'd stood naked at home in the master bathroom, staring at herself in the mirror for a long time just a few days ago, and hadn't been able to find the slightest hint that her belly had expanded. She hadn't noticed her pants getting tighter, either.

That didn't mean she didn't know something was there, though. Something huge. Something she wanted to be perfect, this time, for a billion different reasons. Except...

Cristina raised her eyebrows.

Meredith sighed. “It's been nice. The happy denial bubble. I'm...”

Lexie looked like she wanted to perpetrate a hug. “I'm sure there's nothing to be in denial about,” she said.

“I'm a demonstrably bad incubator,” Meredith said, frowning. “And Derek won't even consider the possibility that something might be wrong.”

_You're pregnant_, he'd said forcefully when she'd tried to delineate the possibilities of catastrophe. And, lately, he seemed to be using fatherhood as a carrot-on-a-stick to get better. At the same time, she'd gotten to know this carrot. Gotten used to the physical aspects of having it inside her. She'd started talking to it, sometimes, when nobody was looking. She and Derek had discussed names. It seemed so much less amorphous than the first baby she'd lost, which she'd only known about for a few hours before it had been gone. Hell, Meredith was already convinced that the “it” was actually a she. A little person. A baby girl. Maybe, a baby girl named Anne.

Meredith bit her lip as she stared at herself. This time, everything seemed so much more... real.

She didn't know what she'd do if the carrot was defective again.

She didn't know what _he_ would do.

She didn't want to know.

And as long as she didn't have an ultrasound, and she didn't start cramping and bleeding like she had last time... she didn't have to know, defective or not.

“Hey,” Alex interjected. “It was just shit luck. I'm sure mini-Meredith is fine.”

“I hope so,” Meredith said.

“What kind of baby shower would you like?” Lexie said.

Meredith sighed. “None?”

“You need a baby shower,” Lexie said.

“I need to not be Richard Dreyfuss,” Meredith countered.

Lexie ignored her. She flipped to a new page in her spiral notebook and readied her pen. “What kinds of activities would you want?”

Meredith raised her eyebrows. “Activities?”

Lexie shrugged. “You know,” she said. She drew a squiggle absently on the paper. “At the baby shower. Like painting onesies. Or guessing the birth weight.” Her eyes widened as ideas churned behind her gaze. She gasped. “Oh! How about pin the sperm on the egg?”

Meredith's nose crinkled. “That's...”

“Horrifying?” Cristina offered.

Meredith nodded. “In a word.”

“Oh, come on,” Lexie protested. “Let me plan a baby shower.”

“If you have one, do I have to come?” Meredith asked.

Lexie grinned. “Yep!”

“Don't let her do it,” Alex said. “If you let her do it, I have to help plan.”

“Men don't plan baby showers,” Lexie said.

“Oh,” said Alex. He seemed satisfied. “Okay, then.”

Lexie glanced from Alex to Cristina to Meredith, a look of frustrated bewilderment on her face. She dropped her notebook onto the gurney beside her with her pen and sighed dramatically. “What is wrong with you people, anyway?”

Cristina shrugged. “We're not snuggles and hearts.”

“I don't know if you've noticed, but we're in all the clubs,” Meredith added.

Lexie frowned. “What clubs?”

“Dysfunctional families,” Meredith said.

Cristina nodded. “Dark-and-twisty.”

“Abandonment complexes,” said Meredith.
“One dead parent,” Cristina said.

“Addict spouses,” Meredith said.

Everybody stared at her. Meredith wiped her face with her hands to cover the rapid spread of blush. She sighed. Being honest was so freaking weird. “What, you all know, now,” she said, more a grumble than anything else.

Cristina's lip twitched. “I think that one's all yours.”

“Drunk dads,” Alex offered helpfully. “Close enough.”

“My dad is dead,” Cristina said. “He wasn't a drunk.”

“And let's not forget Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder,” Meredith said.

Cristina nodded. “That's definitely a club.”

“Oh, my god, you guys are so depressing!” Lexie said, her expression horrified.

“We're not really a bed of optimism,” Cristina replied.

Lexie shook her head. “This is why you need a baby shower!”

Meredith frowned. “I'm still not following.”

Lexie opened her mouth. Closed it. Waved her hands. Made a face. She eventually settled on calm, even words. “You're going to be a mom. With Derek. A man who you love and fought hard to get. You've both lived through thick and thin together, despite all odds to the contrary,” Lexie said, her tone patient. Accommodating. As if she thought she might be speaking to morons. Meredith stared at her. Lexie stared back, only to groan in frustration, moments later, when Meredith still hadn't offered any sign she comprehended. “Those are reasons to be optimistic!” Lexie said. “Stop looking at half-empty glasses.”

“My glass isn't half-empty,” Meredith said. She sighed when she recognized a familiar pressure down below. She shifted, trying to alleviate it, but nothing helped. Hadn't she just gone to the bathroom an hour ago? “It's full, and I have to pee. Again.”

“I promise not to make it too fluffy-hearts,” Lexie said.

Alex snorted. “Right.”

Lexie smacked him in the shoulder. He feigned pain and brushed her arm away with a smirk.

Meredith slid off the gurney. She had to pee, damn it. “Fine,” she said, glancing down the hall. There was a bathroom just around the corner. “Fine, whatever, I—”

The double doors opened, and Meredith squeaked with absent, startled feeling. Her heart thumped at the unexpected intrusion, and for a bitter flash, she wondered if this was how Derek felt all the time at every moment instead of just occasionally like a normal person. She glanced at her watch as she turned. Seven. On the nose. Check cashing? She looked at the man who walked through the doors, and everything inside her body crumpled before the looming silhouette defined itself.

Mark held a cream-colored piece of paper in his hand, and he wore a bland look on his face that Meredith had seen too many times to misinterpret. He used that expression with patients who were goners and with the families of loved-ones when he had to deliver bad news. He used it as a buffer to keep himself detached. Most doctors had a face like that. A face like that was a survival tool in a stressful profession.

Her heart sank. Derek. Something horrible had happened. She'd been right. All along.

“Oh, god, what is it?” she said.

She expected a horrific tale. Maybe, Derek had had another public panic attack and gotten stuck somewhere in a crush of people. Or, maybe he'd been found stoned in the living room. Or...

“I don't know,” Mark said. He held out the cream-colored paper, and Meredith realized that it was an envelope embossed with flowery stenciling. She didn't take it. He jiggled it. “I'm supposed to give you this.”

“What is it?” she said, staring.

He frowned. “A letter.”

“I know it's a freaking letter,” she snapped. She couldn't help it. This had to be what Derek felt like all the time, and it was horrible. Her stomach churned. She hovered inches from Mark's outstretched hand, refusing to move closer, as though the letter's mere touch might burn her. “Is it from Derek? What's in it?” And why wasn't Derek here?

“I don't know,” Mark said.

She raised her eyebrows incredulously. “You don't know if it's from Derek?”

Mark shrugged. “It's from Derek,” he said, his tone flat. Neutral. “I don't know what's in it.”

“You mean you won't tell me,” Meredith accused.

“No, I mean I literally can't tell you, Grey,” said Mark. “I have no idea what he was thinking.”

“Is it bad?” Meredith demanded.

Another shrug. “No, it's...” An odd look crossed Mark's face. The first glimmer of emotion. His lip twitched, like he was fighting an explosion of feeling. “It's Derek.”

“That sounds pretty bad to me,” Cristina said from the gurney as she flipped a page in her book.

Meredith stiffened as a thud followed by footsteps resolved in a hand squeezing her shoulder. “I'm sure it's not bad,” Lexie said, her voice soft. Big-eyed and full of ooey-gooey sympathy that Meredith wanted about as much as oil wanted water.

Meredith clenched her jaw. The backs of her eyes pricked.

“Why didn't he just send you an email?” Alex said uselessly.

None of them understood.

Lexie took the envelope from Mark's outstretched fingers. She stroked the embossed flowers with a tiny smile. She sighed. “The envelope looks pretty,” she said, her tone envious. “Maybe, it's something romantic. You said he's been really sweet lately.”
Or, maybe it was an apology for something else horrible.

What had he done, now?

Meredith tried to breathe. She couldn't muster any more cheerleading or forgiveness tonight. She couldn't do it. There was too much other… stuff.

“I have my first OB appointment in less than twenty-four hours,” she said, blinking as a flash flood of tears drowned her face. They slid down her cheeks in burning, jagged lines. “His mother is flying in tomorrow just a few hours before my first freaking sonogram, and she doesn't know I'm pregnant or that he's a drug addict. We're getting married in a few days. The house is a mess. He's been back at work for all of two weeks. He comes home exhausted, and stressed, and he keeps pushing himself to do stuff anyway, like socialize after work or jog with the damned dog or cash a freaking rain check that I would have been happy to postpone a bit longer. It doesn't matter that he's been sweet. There's a lot going on, and he... he's sick. He's sick, and he can't handle this crap forever before he breaks, and he'll... He's sick, and I can't...”

Her voice died with a warble as a lump the size of an orange filled her throat. Horrified silence filled her wake. Cristina and Alex... they seemed less blandly observant, now. More concerned. Mark seemed stupefied. Lexie's eyes had gotten wet, too, like she wanted to hop into a good sympathy cry and bawl it out with Meredith for solidarity.

Meredith couldn't deal with this. Her lower body burned like her bladder had set fire to itself. She held up her hand before any of them could speak.

“Excuse me,” she managed, a bare, cracking collection of syllables.

They all gaped at her.

And then she ran. To the bathroom. In an embarrassing, blurry flood of tears. She plopped onto the toilet and let herself go, only to hear a tiny trickle. She couldn't empty herself of the burning urge that told her she needed to go. She dragged her hand to her mouth and tried to breathe. This wasn't a full bladder. This was nerves. Horrible, sick, twisting nerves.

“You're freaking out,” she told herself as she bent over her knees and stared at the floor tiles. “Stop freaking out. You need to calm down. He's fine. Baby is fine. His mom is all mommish, and it'll work out. Everything is fine. This is stupid.”

That didn't help.

It didn't feel stupid.

Her stomach churned, knotting and twisting. She felt like she would throw up, though she hadn't eaten anything since the stupid pizza at lunch. Her stomach didn't seem to care that it was empty. She had a chance to flip her body around before she spilled awful, acrid-smelling bile into the toilet.

When she stopped heaving, she felt... better. Out of breath. Exhausted. But better, despite the leaking deluge of hormone-y, nerve-wracked, stupid tears. She cleaned up after herself, sniffling, and then she flushed the toilet. She wandered out of the stall. She looked at herself in the mirror as she washed her hands. The fluorescent lights overhead made her look ghastly. The skin that wasn't wan was red and irritated and scary.

God, she hoped this wasn't what Derek felt like all the time.
Replacing the panic thought helps, he'd said. And he had a breathing thing he did, too.

Holding a retractor, she thought wildly as she forced herself to mimic what she'd seen him do with the breathing. Inhale. Count to three. Exhale over three. She wouldn't think about babies or miscarriages or drugs or moms or PTSD or panic attacks or anything. She fixated on bringing her pickles. She fixated on... holding a retractor for Derek in surgery, who was smiling behind his scrub mask. Holding a retractor for Derek in surgery, who was wearing his ferryboat scrub cap and smiling behind his scrub mask because he'd fixed a spinal tumor.

That thought calmed her. It calmed her on many levels. She liked to see Derek smile. The way his eyes crinkled when he was happy or aroused made her heart skip, particularly when he directed the look at her, but even when it was just idle happiness about anything. And if he was saving lives in surgery, that meant he was better. Really better.

He smiled at her, a crinkle-y ghost in her head.

That picture helped.

She almost couldn’t help smiling back at him.

She wiped her face with the backs of her palms, and she exited the bathroom. Mark, Lexie, Alex, and Cristina stood in a heap where she'd left them. They argued about whether to chase after her. She joined them. At first, they kept arguing. They clearly didn't have any idea what to do with blubbery, stupid, hormonal Meredith. They only knew about the one who closed down on problems. Went catatonic.

When they noticed her, they shut up. They appraised her haggard appearance in tense, is-she-going-bonkers silence. She brushed a loose bang out of her eyes and sighed.

“Stop looking at me like I'm going to snap in two,” she said. She didn't add that she had snapped in two. Already. They could do the math. “I'm fine,” she said. The addition felt obligatory. A required Meredith-ism.

Normality.

Cristina's stiff frame relaxed at Meredith's return to form.

Lexie inched forward, the cream-colored envelope clutched in her lithe fingers. “I'm positive it's not shark stuff,” she said, her tone low and soothing. “Look at the pretty envelope! You should open it.”

Mark frowned, confusion glazing his sharp features. “Shark stuff?”

Everybody ignored him.

Meredith wiped her face with her hands again. Just to be sure she hadn't left any glistening remnants of leakage. “You know something?” she said to Lexie.

Lexie shook her head. “Nothing.”

“Liar,” Cristina said.

“I'm not lying,” Lexie insisted.

“You know she sucks at lying,” Alex said, tilting his head toward Lexie. “She blushes like a fire hydrant.”

Cristina seemed appeased. She nodded. “That's true.”

“Shut up,” Lexie said, affronted.

“Everybody shut up!” Meredith snapped.

She sighed and took the envelope from Lexie. She ripped it open despite Lexie's look of you're- killing-the-romance horror. Meredith didn't care if she wrecked the pretty paper. She just wanted this whole ordeal with the freaking rain check to be over.

She pulled loose a card from the torn remnants of the shredded envelope. The card was folded in two. A glossy, overhead photograph of a ferryboat gliding across blue water covered the front. Behind the boat, frothy white carved a triangle into the stark blue. She flipped open the card. Derek's familiar, messy writing sprawled before her eyes, but it was... oddly neater. As if he'd taken immense time to keep his usual slipshod quality out of the lopsided loops and squiggles of each written letter. She got the feeling that if she'd met him twenty-five years ago, before the medical profession had corrupted his script, his handwriting would have looked like this. She stared, and after a moment, the untidy scribbles became words.

Dear Meredith,

I'm sorry.

She looked away before she could read the next sentence. Her eyes threatened to burn up all over again with tears, and everything she'd stuffed away in boxes for later popped out again. Her Derek-is-smiling-in-surgery picture splintered and evaporated out of her mind's eye.

“God, damn it,” she said. “Freaking... I knew it was bad. I hate rain checks.”

Lexie gently extracted the card from Meredith's clenching fist while Meredith tried to force herself to do the breathing thing. Again. The smiley-Derek thought replacement wouldn't solidify, so she focused on only the breathing. That was enough to make her tired brain hurt, anyway.

Lexie flipped open the card. She squinted. Frowned. Shook the paper, as if that would make the words easier to read. She blinked, shook her head, visibly steeled herself, and stared. Hard. Seriously. Like she'd been given a bomb threat to decipher. Her eyeballs began to move back and forth and back and forth as she skimmed.

“Meredith, you really should read the rest of it,” Lexie said as she reached the end of it.

Meredith squeezed her eyes shut to keep from crying all over again. “I don't want to hear another one of his freaking apologies. I'm so tired of—”

“Meredith!” Lexie snapped. Meredith opened her eyes, stunned, and Lexie continued, “Shut the hell up, stop whining, and read it!”

Meredith's jaw dropped open. “I...” She wiped her eyes with the backs of her palms. Swallowed. She glared at Lexie, but she took back the letter with a sigh. “Fine.”

Dear Meredith,

I'm sorry. I know you've never been big on corny romantic gestures. I tried to think of something you'd like, something more subdued than this, but I didn't want to ask anybody else for suggestions, because I wanted this to be from me alone. I've run this idea in circles around my head, and I keep coming back to it.

I've been having a hard time the past few months. I broke your trust in my struggle for equilibrium, and I want to earn that trust back. I feel like expressing myself this way is just another truth to tell.

What can I say? You married a corny guy.

Meredith snorted. Not quite a laugh. Aware that everybody watched her, she put her hand to her lips, covering them. Warmth spread into her body, and remembering to breathe, three seconds in, three seconds out, seemed less important. She kept reading.

I know how much you've been struggling lately. Struggling to deal with me and my endless anxieties in addition to your own. I've wanted to cash this rain check for a while. Not sex in the elevator, per se, because I don't think I could manage it with the medication I'm on – we'd be tying up the elevator for an hour in the best case scenario.

She laughed again. A real laugh. God. How did he do that? He wasn't even there. He was words on a freaking page. Messy words that were hard to read. That was all. And, yet... Her fingers tightened against the thick paper. Why was he only messy words? Why wasn't he here? She kept reading.

Rather, it's the idea that I can do something for you, for once, instead of the other way around. So, here I am. I'm cashing the check. Tonight is about you. I hope you'll take this game in the spirit I mean it and have some fun, even if it's only to laugh at my expense. You deserve a night off, and you deserve to laugh.

With love,

Derek

She reread the last paragraph about fifty times. It didn't make more sense the fiftieth time.

“Well?” Lexie demanded.

“I don't get it,” Meredith said, her voice low and throaty and... wrecked. She looked up at her riveted audience, wiping fresh tears away from her face that she hoped they wouldn't ask about. She didn't want to think about them anymore. She felt better. A game. A night off. Laughing at Derek's expense. Those things weren't scary or bad, and they said things about Derek's state-of-mind that made her want to wilt with relief. Ticking-time-bomb Derek wouldn't say, Hey, laugh at me! But... also? She felt damned confused. “What game?”

None of them seemed to have any more context than she did, except Mark, whose eyes twinkled in the dim hallway like lit firecrackers. He seemed to have some idea. Some juicy idea. But he'd been so freaking serious before—

Or you were freaking out and misreading everything, a tiny voice told her. The annoying one she preferred to shut up more often than not. This time, she listened, and the quivering remnants of her panic unraveled. Whatever this was, it wasn't bad.

But what was it, then?

Cristina grabbed the note from Meredith's lax fingers to read it to herself before Meredith could read the final paragraph a fifty-first time. Cristina seemed to have less trouble interpreting the words than Lexie, and she finished scanning quickly. Her lip curled with disgust, and she handed the note to Alex, who started skimming it.
“He really promised you sex in the elevator?” Cristina said while Alex read. “I thought he was making stuff up because he was stoned.”

“Yeah,” Meredith said, her tone soft.

“So, he was stoned?” Cristina prompted.

_It makes you eu-euphoric, you know_, Derek had said about the extra morphine Bailey had given him for the pain. He'd been out of it. That had been one of the few times he'd been given enough to feel giddy, instead of just miserable with a side of spacey. Dr. Bailey would never admit it aloud to anyone, but the woman was a soft touch when it came to suffering, and Derek had been freaking unnerving, crying after surgery, because it was so... _so not_ Derek.

Too many u's, he'd said, addled.

Meredith didn't know how to feel about that moment anymore. It'd been funny at the time. _I don't think I can have sex in the elevator tonight_. Funny. She'd laughed. But, now, she only saw the beginning of the end. He'd gotten a taste for how good the morphine made him feel in contrast to how horrible he'd felt without it, and... She shook her head. She couldn't keep doing this. Thinking about moments she'd missed the meaning of until it was far too late to do anything about them.

She focused on good things, instead. That rain check had carried them through a lot of bad stuff. She put her hand on her flat belly.

_God, you'd make such a perfect dad_, she'd said.

They'd gotten here, hadn't they? Alive, together, and pending as parents. And Derek _was_ getting better. A little here. A little there. Positive, she told herself. Think positive. Derek had created a mysterious game that he thought she would consider corny. There were no sharks or other things with big, slice-y teeth the size of her hand. No madmen with guns.

“Yes,” Meredith said. “But not making stuff up.”

“Dude,” Alex said, clear admiration in his voice.

Cristina made a face. “It's less funny and more gross, now.”

“He was shot and having trouble breathing,” Meredith said. “I was trying to keep him talking, so we made a rain check.”

“With sex,” Cristina said.

“Just talking about it, not having it!” Meredith said.

“While he was shot,” Alex said. He folded Derek's card, ferryboat facing up, with the crumpled envelope resting underneath, and held it out for Meredith. She took it.

“Yeah,” Meredith said as she ran her index finger along the card. The glossy paint of the ferryboat picture felt smooth and cold against her fingertips. She put the card in her lab coat pocket. Throwing it out seemed strangely criminal. “While he was shot.”

“That's... impressive,” Mark said.

“I really didn't feel like sex when I was shot,” Alex said. “Talking about it or otherwise.”

Cristina snorted. “And that's saying something.”
“That wasn't the point at all,” Meredith said. “Just...” When she blinked she saw Derek behind her eyelids. He lay on the operating table, shivery, panting, his lips the color of chalk. A bloody hole the size of her pinky carved a tunnel through his chest wall. He was dying, and she didn't know what to do except talk to him, but what could she say? She shook her head, kicking the image back into her mental pantry before it overwhelmed her with another flood of stupid hormone tears. She wiped her face with her hands. “What game?” she said.

“Maybe, that's part of the fun,” Lexie said. “Figuring it out.”

Meredith glanced at all of them. Alex. Lexie. Cristina. They'd all read the note, now, but nobody seemed to have any idea. She turned to Mark, who stood off to the side, set apart from the group, and, yet, still loitered with a little smile slathered on his smug face.

“You really have no idea what this is?” Meredith said to Mark.

Her words seemed to drag him out of a trance. The smile disappeared, replaced by the flat, emotionless mask she'd seen earlier. When he'd delivered the letter. The I'm-sorry-we-did-everything-we-could expression of detachment. He shrugged.

“No clue,” he said smoothly as he switched gears. “Sorry.”

Meredith didn't believe him. She narrowed her eyes, preparing an interrogation in her head. Cristina would help. They could good cop, bad cop it, probably. Mark was too guileless to lie for very long. She opened her mouth—

“Maybe, the letter is a clue,” Lexie said, interrupting.

Meredith's brow creased. She looked at her half-sister. “A clue to what?”

“The elevator?” Lexie said.

“Maybe, the operating room where you came up with the rain check,” Cristina said.

Everybody turned to stare at Cristina, who frowned. “What,” Cristina said. “I can't play?”

“The ATM in the lobby,” Alex suggested.

Lexie frowned. “Why the ATM?”

Alex shrugged. “Cashing a check, right?”

“Did you read the back?” Mark interjected.

“What back?” Meredith said.

“There's a P.S.,” Mark said. He pointed to her lab-coat pocket. “On the back.”

Meredith narrowed her eyes at Mark. She'd been so busy figuring out the words on the inside, she hadn't looked at the back. Nobody had. How would Mark know? He'd delivered the letter sealed in an envelope.

She pulled the card out of her pocket and flipped it on its back. Sure enough, more of Derek's messy writing sprawled across the cream-colored surface. She shifted her gaze back to Mark with the sneaking suspicion Derek had appointed him referee, for some reason. Maybe, some sort of secret guide. Mark blushed under the scrutiny and looked away, but said nothing.
“They say the first cut is deepest,” Meredith read aloud from the card. “In my case, it's true. I saw your inner fire, and your enthusiasm, too.”

“Dude... a poem?” Alex said.

Cristina made a face. “Sappy.”

Lexie sighed. “I think it's adorable.”

“That seems more like a clue,” Mark said helpfully.

Meredith peered at him, dubious. “You're going to play, too?”

Mark shrugged. “Why the hell not? He dragged me into this. I want to see how it unfolds. Besides, it's great material.”

He seemed... Maybe he really didn't know what this corn-fest was going to be. “Material for what?” Meredith said.

Mark smirked. “To make fun of him.”

“So, what's it mean?” Lexie said.

Everyone pondered for a long stretch of silent moments. Meredith read the poem aloud once more. She felt a bit like a Jeopardy contestant or something. Corny romanticism for $800, Alex. But she hadn't seen the fun, happy-go-lucky side of Derek in what felt like eons. His absence had begun to hurt so much that seeing him again, even in a letter, soothed a lot of dark-and-twisty things inside her head. All of her friends hovered around her. Her family. Bittersweet amusement broke up the perpetual steps-away-from-panic lump in her throat, and she swallowed as her eyes watered yet again with stupid, hormone-y tears. Except they were good tears, this time. Not ones that made her want to take a pickaxe to whoever had invented pregnancy. She wiped her face.

She would play.

“Isn't the first cut thing from a song?” she said.

Lexie lit up at the suggestion. She looked like she wanted to start humming the freaking song, or at least whistle it, which would only cap this crappy day with more crap.

“He's talking about surgery,” Cristina said before Lexie could torture them all.

That didn't stop Meredith's brain from running away with the chorus. The first cut is the deeee— Stop. Crap, crap. Stop! Meredith blinked away the song before it could hook its claws into her brain enough to repeat and repeat and repeat like “It's A Small World After All”, only worse.

“But it's a poem,” Lexie said, oblivious to Meredith's internal battle. “He wouldn't be that literal.”

“He's a guy,” Alex said, his expression placid. “He could be that literal.”

Cristina shook her head. “First cut is the deepest?” she said. I still want you by my side. “He's a surgeon. That's so about surgery. I'd bet money.”

“You would think that,” Lexie said.

Meredith tried to think. First cut. Baby, I know. First cut is the deeee— STOP. She ground her molars. “His first surgery?”
Mark shook his head. “That was in Manhattan,” he said. “I don't think he wants you to fly three thousand miles to find—”

“What?” Meredith prodded. “To find what?”

Mark swallowed and shut his mouth. Meredith imagined him wielding a little stick, poking at them to keep them on the right path. Stay on the yellow brick road, or else! She narrowed her eyes and peered at him, but he didn't crumble under scrutiny. He returned her gaze, all knowing-eyed and annoying and unhelpful.

“He so knows something,” Lexie decided.

“Do not,” Mark replied.

“It's okay,” Lexie said. “It wouldn't be as fun if you spilled.”

Meredith wasn't quite sure she agreed, but she let the comment slide.

“What about your first solo surgery?” Alex suggested.

“Maybe,” Meredith said.

“The first surgery he did with you?” Lexie said.

“Yeah,” Alex said, nodding. “Yeah. That gymnastics chick, right?”

Meredith smiled, snapping her fingers. “Katie Bryce!” First cut is the deeeeeeeeeee
—

“Who's that?” said Mark.

“She had an aneurysm. First cut.” Is the deepest. “Literally my first shift. Derek held a contest. He rewarded the intern who could diagnose the problem. She...” Just to help me dry the tears I've cried. “That was OR five. Maybe there's something there?”

“Can't hurt to check,” Lexie said, her eyes gleaming with excitement. “I wonder what it is?”

“Maybe another craptastic poem,” Cristina said, her tone wry, as they began moving as a group down the hall.

Meredith frowned as they approached the operating room in question in a small cluster. The little white and red plaque by the door had been slid to cover the word “available” and instead showed the phrase “in use”. She didn't want to interrupt a surgery in progress based only on her and her peanut gallery’s wild guess about not only what the clue-poem meant, but that they were, in fact, supposed to be looking for something in the first place. She pushed herself onto her tiptoes and peered through the small glass window, trying to see what was going on inside the big room.

Dr. Bailey performed some sort of abdominal procedure, though Meredith couldn't tell the specifics with so many other bodies wearing blue scrubs surrounding the table, the patient buried in pile of sterile drapes, and the door being situated so far away from the table. Derek could have set something up before the surgical team had arrived.

What if, whatever he'd planned, required Meredith to be in the middle of the room? She couldn't wander into a procedure based on whimsy. That wasn't sterile or safe or... No. Derek would have looked at the OR board. Right? He wouldn't have planned this corny, romantic thing – whatever it was — without making sure he wouldn't be foiled, which meant... whatever he wanted her to find, it had to be accessible.

If he wanted her to find something, that was.

She shook her head. The twisty, logical circles she ran in her head made her brain hurt. She backed up from the glass only to plow into Lexie, who thudded onto her heels from her tiptoes with a grunt and hopped backward two steps. Cristina rolled her eyes, and Alex snickered.

“Sorry!” Lexie blurted. “I was trying to see.”

Meredith ignored her half-sister and studied the door. Around the frame. Everywhere. Nothing seemed to be out of the ordinary.

“Should I go in?” she said. Lexie, Alex, and Cristina all shrugged in a row. Meredith bit her lip. “I shouldn't go in.”

Something compelled her to look at Mark. She gave him a pleading look, but he only shrugged, too, damn it. On the other hand, he didn't dissuade her, and that stupid, knowing twinkle had returned to his eyes. She kind of wanted to take his lab coat into her fists and shake him silly to see if some details fell out of his mouth.

“Oh, just go in,” Cristina said, her tone impatient.

Meredith sighed. “Fine.”

She covered her face with a sterile surgical mask from the dispensing bin outside, and she pushed through the door into the OR. She squinted as the bright lights of the operating room slammed into her pupils. A wave of cool air washed over her. Then the awful scent of bowel coiled around her body, and her stomach roiled in response. She swallowed, forcing down her gag reflex through sheer will as she glanced around. Frustration compounded everything. Of course she'd walk into a freaking bowel resection or something. And what was she even looking for?

Dr. Bailey looked up from her patient, her eyebrows raised expectantly. “Something I can help you with, Dr. Grey?”

Meredith swallowed. Vomiting in an OR where she wasn't even supposed to be present would be a perfect end to a perfect freaking day of perfect perfectness and stupid songs. Songs that were now thoroughly stuck in her head. That's how I know, the first cut is the deepest... Damn it. She tried not to sound sick or ready to hurl. “I don't know...” she managed before she clamped her jaws shut.

No barfing. No barfing. No barfing. Or singing.

“Then close the door,” Dr. Bailey said. “You're wrecking my sterile field.”

“Sorry,” Meredith said. Back to square one, but at least outside the door, out of the smell, she might be able to think.

“It's by your head,” Dr. Bailey said just as Meredith let the door go.

Meredith shoved it back open. “What?”

“The envelope,” Dr. Bailey said. “Turn your head.”

Dr. Bailey raised a gloved, bloody hand to point at the wall to Meredith's left, and Meredith followed the motion with her gaze. Right by her freaking ear, a mere three inches away, a small piece of surgical tape precariously held another embossed envelope, identical to the first one Mark had given her, against the wall. Derek had labeled it “For Meredith” in messy, black ink. Meredith blinked at it for two seconds, nonplussed, before she grabbed it off the wall.

Realization sank in that she'd been successful. She'd found the thing Derek had wanted her to find. She smiled despite her quivering stomach and the stupid song that wouldn't shut up in her head. “Thanks, Dr. Bailey,” Meredith said.

Dr. Bailey shook her head, but her eyes crinkled with a hint mirth as she said, “You're all a bunch of lovesick fools, if you ask me.”

Because when it comes to being lucky, she's cursed...

Meredith let the door shut, and she breathed a sigh of relief, now immersed in safe-to-breathe air, and feeling rather pleased to boot.

“Well, what is it?” Cristina demanded.

Meredith leaned against the wall, shaking her head as she dropped the surgical mask from her face. Alex backed away, his expression apprehensive. She assumed that meant she looked pasty enough to be fighting the urge to hurl without having to warn them about getting out of spew distance. She closed her eyes and breathed in and out to give her stomach a moment to settle from the smelly disruption.

Nobody said a word.

She clutched the second cream-colored envelope while she rested her eyes. Her fingers ran along the raised flowers. The tape at the top stuck to her hand. Surgical tape. Not scotch tape. Not masking tape. Derek had used surgical tape to tape the freaking thing to the wall.

That was so Derek.

He kept rolls of it at home in his desk. He wrapped his freaking Christmas presents with it before he boxed them to ship to New York. She'd watched his wrapping ritual with a weird combination of fascination and disturbed horror before their first Post-it Christmas together.

The sound of wrapping paper being sliced is an unmistakable, unique noise, but she didn't recognize it when she heard it coming from behind their closed bedroom door. She hadn't grown up around it. Her family had been tiny. Her mother hadn't shopped for nieces and nephews and sisters and cousins and every other possible label on the family tree. Not like Derek, who had everything but a brother. And a father.

Meredith frowned, standing in the dim hallway as cold needles of rain cut the air outside. Her hand rested on the doorknob as the shearing sound repeated once and again. “Derek?” she said as curiosity overwhelmed her.

“No,” he said, his voice muffled through the door. “Don't come in.”

His vehemence made her blink. She jiggled the doorknob. It wouldn't turn. He'd actually locked it. What the hell?

“Don't,” he said. “One sec.”

The slicing paper sounds stopped. Something thumped. Shuffled. Moments passed. Then the lock
He opened the door, his eyes sparkling, hair disheveled. He had slivers and bits of colored paper stuck all over his blue t-shirt. And he looked... giddy.

“Okay, now it’s safe,” he said. He backed away from the door, and her jaw fell open.

A pile of wrapped presents, listing and taller than the bed, leaned against his nightstand. The blankets and pillows and top sheet had been torn off their bed and discarded in a rumpled heap by the rain-spattered window. Rolls and rolls of shiny wrapping paper, a big enough stack of colorful boxes to stock a small toy store, two rolls of white surgical tape, and a glinting set of pocket scalpels rested on top of their mattress. He’d turned their bed into a giant fire and sharps hazard.

“This is safe?” she said, incredulous.

He nodded. “Items unapproved for your viewing have been appropriately hidden.”

“What?”

“I hid your presents,” he clarified with a wink.

“Oh,” she said.

Derek climbed back onto the bed and took the top box off the giant stack on the bed. The cover of the box was made of a thick, clear plastic, like the kind on Anatomy Jane boxes, and inside, shackled with thick plastic clips like a prisoner, was a red... Muppet creature of some sort.

“Wait,” she said. “My presents?”

“Hmm,” he agreed absently, nodding. “The ones I bought for you.”

“What presents?” she said. “Presents as in plural?”

Derek eyeballed the box, ignoring her. The Muppet’s googly eyes stared back at him. He shifted his scrutiny to the pile of wrapping paper. He selected a roll covered with little kittens dressed as Santa Clauses and unfurled it so that a section three feet long flattened against the fitted sheet on the bed, plain side facing the ceiling.

“It is Christmas, you know,” was his eventual answer, for all that helped her make sense of the sparkly paper mayhem sprawled on the bed.

He placed the Muppet box on top of the wrapping paper and proceeded to shift it back and forth like he was measuring something. The paper crinkled. He wore the most intent frown she’d ever seen on him outside of surgery. No, scratch that. It was exactly like the frown he wore in surgery, at least the part that reached his eyes.

She imagined him clipping off an aneurysm. Right then. Except the object of his concentration was an oblong plastic box with a Muppet in it, not a human brain, and as far as she knew, Muppets didn’t get aneurysms.

She took a step into the room. The floor creaked.

“What on earth are you doing?” she said, trying to keep her tone neutral.

He looked up at her, his expression lit like a firecracker. “Wrapping!” he said cheerfully. As if that explained everything.
She raised her eyebrows. “With Santa kittens, surgical tape, and a scalpel?”

He nodded as she sat on the edge of the bed. The mattress dipped. She watched him deftly cut off the three foot piece of wrapping paper. He folded the paper with all the laser precision of a neurosurgeon, encasing the strange Muppet as though it wore a glove that fit perfectly, despite the box’s odd shape.

“Finger here, please,” he said.

She bit her lip and placed her index finger along the seam at the top to hold down the fold. She flinched as he unrolled the surgical tape with a loud zip. He chased the line of tape with his scalpel. He flicked his wrist, and the tape roll fell to the bed, leaving him with a sticky, curling strip. He taped the center seam on the wrapped Muppet box with a third of the strip, taped the seam by her finger with the second, then flipped the box and taped the bottom seam with the last piece.

The finished product was gorgeous. His wrapping job eclipsed stuff she’d seen done by professionals. You know. Not counting the surgical tape, which stuck out like a beater Buick in Bellevue.

“A,” he said as he looked up from his finished masterpiece. He held up his thumb. “Mary likes kittens.” His index finger went up. “B,” he said, glancing at his pile of tape, “surgical tape sticks better than scotch, and it’s way more durable.” His middle finger made three as his gaze shifted to his little pile of different-sized pocket scalpels. “C, those things are a godsend. They’re so much more maneuverable than scissors.”

She stared at him, bewildered. “If you say so,” she said as he put Mary's wrapped Muppet on top of the pretty stack by his nightstand, and pressed onward to the next box in the still ginormous stack on the bed. There were a lot of presents. Derek apparently took Christmas lessons from Izzie. Or vice versa. She swallowed. “Derek...”

“I don’t care,” he said.

“About what?”

He shrugged. “It’s Christmas. You’re getting presents. You can’t say no.”

“But I didn’t—”

He leaned across the bed and touched her hand before she could finish. Before she could tell him she hadn't thought about buying a present for him, let alone pluralizing it to presents. If it hadn't been for the fact that he’d set up a freaking tree in their living room, and the Christmas carols and wreaths and candles and Santa Clauses ringing bells at every street corner, she wouldn’t have known or cared that it was Christmas in the first place. Plus, they hadn't even been married a year, yet. What was the protocol for— His warm skin brushed hers, and his palm drifted to her cheek before she could finish the thought.

“I get that Christmas is my thing and not yours,” he said, his voice low. Murmuring. Understanding. He looked at her, the deep, endless blue of his eyes piercing her doubts. His navy t-shirt matched the hypnotizing shade of his gaze in the dim light. “Don’t worry about it.”

“But Derek,” she said.

He kissed her before she could protest any more.
A stupid, embarrassing lump formed in her throat. She'd bought him a blue bathrobe a few days later. She'd been in the department store shopping for herself, and she'd seen it on the rack. She'd imagined how it would bring out his eyes, just like the blue shirt he'd worn when he'd been wrapping stuff, and the idea to buy it had clicked into place.

She'd wrapped it badly that night with some of the leftover paper from his wrapping extravaganza. Only the Santa kittens roll hadn't been used up. She'd felt idiotic and dumb and all sorts of silly, wrapping a stupid present for him in stupid Santa kitten paper. Plus, a bathrobe didn't exactly scream, “I love you.” It said, “I had no idea what to get you and felt guilty because you got me unknown amounts of unknown stuff.” Or maybe it didn't. She didn't know. She wasn't a Christmas expert.

She'd handed him the Santa kitten box later that night. It's progress, right? she'd said

He hadn't said a word about the Santa kittens or the shoddy wrap job. In fact, she'd gotten the impression that Santa kittens were the last thing on his mind. His whole face had creased with happiness, and his eyes had gotten misty. Yeah, he'd said, his voice rough as he'd looked at it. I love it.

She'd frowned. You haven't opened it.

He'd shrugged and smiled wider. I know. But I love you, and you gave it to me.

She opened her eyes, and the present day bled back into her view.

Alex, Lexie, Cristina, and Mark all stared at her.

Meredith wiped her face with her hands, unable to stop herself from both blushing and smiling. That would be a good replacement thought if she ever started panicking again, she decided. Derek's smile when he'd figured out she'd gotten him something, after all. He wore that bathrobe all the time.

She shook her head, blinking away the sudden flash flood. God, she missed that Derek.

The envelope in her hand crinkled as she squeezed her fingers absently. She looked down with a small sigh. She slipped her finger underneath the glued lip, more gentle with it than she'd been with the first one. Another gliding ferryboat card rested inside. She slipped it out of the flowery envelope and flipped open the card.

He'd written another poem.

If I could have loaned you a marker, It would have been red, For passion, and daring, and all things unsaid. But then your arms wrapped around me, and mine around you. All lines were forgotten, And we kissed, instead.

“Wow,” Cristina said in the silence that followed when Meredith repeated the poem aloud for the group.

Meredith grinned faintly. She wiped her face. Her leaky eyes had begun to dry. She was such a freaking hormonal yo-yo of emotions right now, it was exhausting.

This clue, at least, she knew without provocation, in the space between one heartbeat and the next. Thump-thump. The memory slipped in like the tide, unstoppable, indomitable. He'd started talking about ferryboats while they'd been waiting for the elevator near oncology.
Again with the lame pickup lines. Nobody could live in Seattle for six weeks and not notice ferryboats. But she'd thought it cute, anyway, and her heart had sped up. Except... cute? No. Stop.

She'd tried to remain vehemently in the land of no as they'd stepped inside the elevator. The land that was all about not dating. No, no, no dating her boss. I'm your boss's boss, he'd said, as if that would help. But they'd been alone in the elevator, and he'd smelled so nice, and then she'd thought about when they'd had sex.

Drunk sex. Even drunk on copious scotch and clumsy, he'd been the best kisser on the planet. She'd tried to steer her brain away from thoughts like those. Tried!

So, this line, he'd purred as he'd turned around. Is it imaginary? Or do I need to get you a marker?

And then all she'd been able to think about was the way he'd purred his words while they'd been drunk and fooling around in the taxi on the way home from Joe's, and...

If all kisses ever kissed had been graded on a bell curve, people would hate this man, she decided as his lips trailed against her skin, because he would have wrecked it for everybody else. She might grade him a half-a-point off perfect, but only because he stopped to breathe now and then. He was a really. Good. Kisser. An undiscovered diamond in the rough.

She was glad she hadn't ignored him, though she wouldn't ever tell him that.

Shadows slipped over them as the taxi cab sliced the darkness. The leather seats creaked, muffled by the hum of the radio up front. The scent of liquor and sweat coiled in the hot air between them. She inhaled. He smelled musky. Masculine. Hers.

Hers? She stomped out the thought like an unwanted fire.

Tequila did things. Funny things. Like make her feel hot. And bubbly. And bright.

She blinked at the happy smear beyond her face.

The taxi driver in the front seat stared through the windshield, either oblivious to what was going on in the back seat, or... intentionally ignoring it. She suspected he might tell them to stop if kissing turned into something... else. For now, the driver stared, unblinking, at the dark road ahead, and he made no comment.

“You're not going to tell me, are you?” Good Kisser murmured as he pressed against her, his words stretched and fuzzy with inebriation.

She realized she had no idea what he'd asked. What he thought she wasn't telling him. “Where we're going?” she guessed. Her hands slid along his smooth red shirt. He felt good against her. Strong. Solid. “Didn't you hear me tell the driver the address?”

They'd stayed at the bar for hours, talking about nothing important, and it'd been... nice. He had a quality about him. He listened. With his eyes and the rest of his body as much as with his ears. When she'd spoken, he'd never looked away. Never once appeared distracted. Never interrupted. No matter how inane the subject matter. She wasn't used to that kind of devotion from anybody. Particularly not from a stranger.

He snickered. “I meant your name.”

“Does it matter?” she said.
“I told you mine.”

And she’d forgotten already. “Why is it important?”

He shrugged. “Because it’s your name,” he said.

A thought struck her, unbidden in the alcoholic haze. She frowned. Pulled away. Licked her lips. They tasted like him. Heady. She wanted to keep going. Bad, sexy thoughts wouldn’t stop tumbling in her head despite dangerous logic.

“You’ve never done this before,” she said, catching her breath. She didn’t make the words a question.

“I’ve had sex,” he replied with a haughty, bewildered laugh. “Trust me. I’m very good at sex.” Almost as though he were trying to convince himself. It was the oddest thing.

She blinked. Alarm bells rung in her head. “I don’t care about that,” she said. Almost snapped. “I mean this.” She gestured awkwardly between them. Her limbs felt loose and not quite cooperative. “Gone home with a girl you don’t know.”

His mouth opened. Closed. Good Kisser stared at her, his eyes hooded in the darkness. “Is that a problem?” he said instead of denying it.

The alarm bells became shrieking sirens.

“You get that this isn’t anything, right?” she said. Almost demanded. “I don’t want...”

The skin around his eyes twitched. As though the question offended him. But the upset was gone in a flicker. So fast, she thought she may have imagined it.

“I get it,” he said, his tone low. Quiet.

She blinked. “But...”

The leather seat moaned as he pressed against her, closing the gap once again. He pressed his lips against hers. “You want some fun, right?” he said. God, he had such a sexy voice.

“Mmm,” she moaned. “Yes.”

“Well, I’m very fun,” he told her. His hand slipped under her skirt, and she gasped when he touched her. “And I learn fast.”

She couldn’t find words as he cupped her lower body. She squirmed in the seat, trying not to do something that would clue in the driver and get them kicked to the curb. Good Kisser smirked. He looked good in shadow. His almost-black hair framed his pale face, and, in that moment, he seemed a lot less goofy than he had in the bar. More darkly handsome. Suave. Which was a ludicrous idea. Tequila did funny things to attractiveness. Funny things that made it easy to enjoy just about anybody who was willing. But, still...

Bad, bad, bad idea, said her brain. The smart part. But then he touched her again. Kissed her. And the drunken, hedonist part took over. Telling him no just because he didn’t have the one-night stand code-of-conduct memorized seemed a bit like turning down a winning lottery ticket because it didn’t quite understand the lottery. Who turned down winning lottery tickets, no matter how clueless the ticket was? Lotteries could be explained.

“Yes,” she moaned, the letter s stretching into a long hiss.

Nobody turned down winning lottery tickets. That's who.

“Thought so,” he replied happily.

The taxi came to a stop in front of her mother's dark house under the buzzing glare of a street light. He wasn't as drunk as she was. He helped her stumble out of the cab. He even paid the driver without hesitation. She crinkled her nose at the unexpected, unwanted chivalry, but... He bumped into her on the front walk. Almost fell. Okay, maybe he was a lot drunk, too.

There was definitely drunkenness.

He chuckled, and the rich, lovely sound made her insides tighten like screws. She imagined him making that sound in bed. Imagined him naked.

She laughed as unparalleled debauchery unfolded in her mind’s eye. “I have more liquor in the cabinet.”

“Scotch?” he said.

“Sure.” She took a deep, sloppy breath. The sidewalk kept moving. “I think.”

“You think?”

“It's not really my liquor cabinet.”

He was definitely drunk. Because he didn't even ask what that meant. She struggled to put the key into the lock, sealing her fate, and he followed her inside without question.

She swallowed before that memory took her to places too sexy for scavenger hunts when one was surrounded by friends. She'd broken so many rules. She never should have taken him home that night, but she had, and it'd been the start. The beginning of the end of her single life.

We'll talk later? he'd called after her as she'd fled from the oncology elevator.

Yes, damn it, she'd thought. Because she'd known right then she was done for and only buying time.

Even after everything that had happened in the last few months. Even after Addison, and Rose, and every other stupid thing. Derek Shepherd was a mistake she was glad she'd made. There was chemistry not even she could explain, but it worked.

They worked.

She loved him.

“This is the elevator,” Meredith said as she folded the card, slipped it back into the envelope, and put it into her breast pocket with the first card, whose envelope she'd mangled.

Cristina's incredulous expression was almost comical. “If I could have loaned you a marker?”

“I tried to draw a line,” Meredith explained. “Him, boss. Me, not boss. No kissing across the line.”
Cristina frowned. “A literal line.”

“Yes,” Meredith nodded. She couldn’t stop the grin that overwhelmed her. “He offered me a marker.”

“To draw your line.”

“Yep.”

“This is reaching new levels of corn,” Cristina said. “Even for him.”

Meredith shrugged. “It’s not really a new level.”

“Really, really not new,” Mark added, his tone wry.

Cristina scowled. “Why did you marry him again?”

“I think it’s sweet,” Lexie said.

Alex snorted. “You would.”

Lexie glared. “You should take notes.”

“With the marker?” Alex said with a smirk.

Lexie jabbed Alex in the shoulder. He rubbed his white lab coat absently as they moved down the hall, toward the oncology elevator, which was in another wing of the hospital. The walk was a relatively long one. Meredith couldn’t help but notice looks from people as she walked. Lots of looks. Lots of smiles. Why? The scrutiny was a bit unnerving, to say the least.

When they reached the elevator, Meredith glanced around the door frame and at the button panel that would summon the car. Nothing. Disappointment pinged.

“Maybe it’s inside,” Mark said.

Cristina nodded. “Or on another floor.”

Alex stepped forward and jabbed the elevator button with his index finger. They waited. When the doors pulled apart, Nurse Debbie, the gossip kingpin of the entire hospital stood there, poring over a chart. She’d tucked her short, brown hair behind her ears and seemed lost in thought. She looked up, and for a moment, her expression remained blank. Then she must have registered who she was looking at, because her gaze shifted to Meredith, the tiny center of the human cluster outside the elevator doors, and Debbie’s lips curled into a secretive, sly smile. She didn’t say a word, only nodded, but her eyes gleamed as the crowd of them split apart to let her through.

She disappeared around the corner, shoes squeaking on the pristine floor tiles, only to reappear within moments, as if she’d changed her mind. “I have $50 down on you finding Dr. Shepherd in two hours or less,” she said. “Don’t disappoint me.”

“Does the whole freaking hospital know about this game thing?” Meredith said, but Nurse Debbie only shrugged, grinned, and walked away. Meredith turned to Mark with an interrogating glare. “Did Derek recruit the entire hospital to make this run smoothly?” Not that she minded. Not really. Not...

“Wait,” Meredith said as she processed Nurse Debbie’s words. “Finding Derek? Is Derek hiding somewhere?”
“I wouldn't exactly call it hiding,” Mark said in that irritating, I-know-something tone of his.

“Is that what this is?” Meredith said. “A bad poetry scavenger hunt to find Derek?”

Cristina shook her head. “He wouldn't do something so egotistical,” she said in perfect deadpan.

“Shut up,” Meredith said. She glared at Mark. “Well?”

Mark only gave her a Gallic shrug. “I'm just the messenger,” he said. “Don't shoot me.”

Lexie pointed at the back wall of the elevator. “Maybe, he didn't get the whole hospital involved.” The doors trundled shut, but she leaped forward to block them from closing. They split apart once more. “There are clues all over the place. I'm sure people have seen the envelopes. This is so romantic!”

“Oh, look, our broken record is skipping,” Cristina said, rolling her eyes.

Lexie frowned.

Meredith marched across the elevator's metal threshold. She grabbed the envelope hanging on the back wall from a single strip of surgical tape and pulled it down. She opened the envelope gently and pulled out ferryboat card number three.

Another poem.

She burst into a single, paralyzing explosion of laughter before she could read it aloud to the group. Before she could think about reading it aloud to the group. Everybody piled into the elevator. Nobody pressed a button. The doors slid shut, but the elevator car didn't go anywhere.

It's not the chase, Derek had said.

“What's it say?” Alex said.

Meredith opened her mouth, but nothing came out. “I...” She glanced at the letter. “He...” Words didn't want to form. She tried again, only to let loose a light chuff of air that wasn't really a syllable and wasn't really a laugh, more a snort of disbelief. Only somebody like Derek could come up with a rhyme like this. Somebody horny and five. She guessed this would be the laughter at his expense part of the equation he'd laid out for her in the first note.

She smiled. Really smiled. Derek being corny and romantic and horny and five... Something burbled inside at the thought. Something nice. Something warm. The picture of him that way stretched, a perfect, soothing moment where nothing bad intruded.

She loved, and life, in that moment, was unadulterated simplicity. The last few months, she hadn't had flash pan thoughts like that as much. She relished the one she had, now. Even though it meant grinning like a freaking fool.

This was one of the wonderful bits of being in love. Smiling just because she'd thought of him happy. Happiness, she decided, was the best kind of infectious disease.

Cristina grabbed the note out of Meredith's hands. Her eyes darted back and forth as she read the card. “Oh, for crap's sake. Seriously? He said that? With words?”

“Said what!” Lexie said.

Lexie pushed between Cristina and Alex to see, but didn't have the chance before Mark, of all people, forced his way into the people cluster and grabbed the note. Lexie clawed at it, but he was way too strong for her, and way too tall. He had the note in moments, held high above her head. His face dissolved into a comical expression as he read the card. Lexie tried to grab it once more, but he smirked and kept it out of her reach as though he were playing keep away.

Mark cleared his throat as Lexie backed him into the corner of the elevator. She gave up. He raised a fist as though he were reciting Shakespeare or something, maybe Hamlet's ode to his father's skull. “Your fists, I described as tiny, ineffectual,” he said, barely able to keep the laughter out of his deep tone. “And I said that this thing we have is more than just sexual.” His face turned bright red, and he shook his head. “Oh, man. That's...”

“The intern locker room,” Meredith said. She turned to Alex. “After I slammed you into the lockers.”

Alex looked at her blankly for a moment, which almost made her want to laugh all over again. Alex had clearly had his share of locker slams for bad behavior. As much as she loved him, that didn't surprise her. At all.

Meredith blinked. “Really?”

Alex's ponderous expression shifted into a haughty smirk. “No,” he said. “But your fists didn't seem that ineffectual at the time.”

“Definitely tiny, though,” Mark interjected. He handed Meredith the card.

“How would you know?” Meredith said. “You weren't there.”

He shrugged. “Watched you in surgery plenty of times.”

Meredith put the card into her pocket with the other two. She squeezed her fist once, staring at her slender knuckles and fingers. The nail on her index finger had broken, and her skin was dry from so much repeated abuse via soap, from scrubbing in for surgeries.

I'm still not going out with you, she'd said. For all the good that had done.

Derek had smirked at her in return, his expression infuriatingly knowing. You say that, now.

The locker room was on the next floor. Another warm smile crossed her face as she slid forward and pressed the button for the second floor. This was sort of fun. Not that she'd ever admit it aloud.

The elevator lifted them up, and they stepped out into the hallway as a group. This late on a Sunday evening, the hallways had a skeletal crew wandering through them. A few nurses. Custodial staff. The doctors unlucky enough to be on call. Overall, they didn't pass many people. The intern locker room was empty and silent, and they found the next envelope taped with surgical tape to the locker where she'd shoved Alex years ago. She pulled the note off the locker and read the next poem to herself.

The words Derek had written were an unexpected sucker punch.

Pick me, choose me, A moment I'll always regret, Because I knew in my heart, Though not in my head, That I loved you then, And I should have said yes.
She blinked, and she read it again. Her heart squeezed, and she swallowed.

Pick me, she'd begged.

Choose me.

Love me.

She'd begged.

The begging had sucked to begin with, but the lack of reciprocation he'd demonstrated when she'd confessed that she loved him... That had been the worst sort of humiliation. She'd loved him in an end-of-the-road sort of way, and she'd told him, and all he'd done was stare at her. She'd had to flee. And then he'd picked Addison and brushed Meredith aside like she'd meant nothing. In the space of a single night, the act of breathing had become a labor that had felt like knives had been slipping underneath her ribs.

“Well?” Alex said.

Meredith blinked. The sound of the paper envelope crinkling skipped off the walls, echoing in the quiet. She realized the note was now in Cristina's lithe hands. She couldn't even remember handing it to her. Couldn't remember Cristina grabbing it. Cristina rolled her eyes as she read.

“Shut up,” Meredith snapped before Cristina could say a word. “I really loved him. It makes you do stupid, stupid things. I acknowledge the stupidity.”

“Love, right?” Lexie said, her tone gentle. “Not loved?”

“Present tense,” Meredith said. She sighed. “Yes.” A lump formed in her throat as her mind's eye moved her body into the scrub room. He stood in front of her, not speaking. “In a big, share the last piece of cheesecake, pretend to like his taste in music, hold a radio over my head way.”

“Wait, you said that, too?” Cristina said as she looked up from the card. Alex and Lexie moved closer to read over her shoulders. “About the cheesecake and the radio? You never told me that.”

“He picked her, even after I said it,” Meredith said. She wiped her eyes. The emotional yo-yo seemed to have decided to swing back toward catastrophic, stupid crying. “I was practically begging. It was one of the most humiliating experiences of my life.”

Mark cleared his throat awkwardly and looked at the floor.

“Why's he bringing this up, now?” Lexie said, frowning. “This isn't romantic.”

“I knew he thought he'd picked wrong,” Meredith said. Her voice warbled, and she wanted to strangle herself for the amount of pathetic emotionalism she was showing tonight.

She and Derek didn't talk about the Addison stuff very often. He'd apologized for choosing wrong. And for lying by omission. And for any number of other things. He'd apologized profusely. But he'd never once said he'd wanted to pick her the first time around. Only that he'd regretted not picking her in hindsight. It was a subtle distinction that she'd danced around for years. She knew without any doubts that he loved her, now. But, in his own words, she'd known he'd been a little late.

“So, why rub in the moment?” Lexie said. “Isn't this game supposed to be fun?”
“He's not rubbing it in,” Meredith said, her voice soft as she worked out the subtle math. She sounded wrecked. “You don't get it.”

She'd always preferred to allow that horrible moment to sit in the denial section of her brain. Bringing the memory back to the active-consideration section made her hurt like the wound had gone septic in the time she'd left it sitting alone in the corner. Except... Now, she had antibiotics.

He'd given her that in the space of six silly lines that only sort of rhymed.

“I'm confused,” said Alex.

Lexie stomped her foot. “He's wrecking this! I thought it wasn't shark-y!” Her words ricocheted off the barren walls, echoing shrilly once before bouncing into silence.

“I get it,” Mark said in the tense lull that followed.

Lexie looked at him incredulously. “You do?”

Mark shrugged. “He'll break his own back to follow the rules,” he said. “He always has.”

“What does this have to do with the rules?” Lexie demanded.

Mark sighed. “Addison showed up and waved a wedding ring and divorce papers at him.”

“He wanted to pick me,” Meredith said. It was so weird to say. So weird to... She thought back to that moment. The pick me, choose me one. Her entire memory realigned. Her lip quivered as she watched her past. I love you, she'd said. She'd surprised the hell out of him, cornered him in a scrub room. He'd already been a conflicted mess. Her timing couldn't have been worse. His gaze had said, oh, god, me, too, not, gack, I'm in sticky wickets! like she'd thought before. He hadn't been able to verbalize the fact that he'd felt love, but he'd felt it. I know I'm a little late in telling you that, he'd said many torturous months later. Late telling her. Not late feeling it. “It wasn't hindsight that changed his mind about it,” she said.

The old wound stopped burning.

Six silly lines.

Lexie frowned. “Still...”

“He's never told me he wanted to pick me,” Meredith said. “We don't really talk about it.”

“I'm sorry,” Derek said. He stared across the small, round table at her, absently running his index finger around the lip of his empty scotch glass. His only glass. He'd never gotten a refill. She'd lost count of how many shots she'd gone through. Pool balls cracked in the background over the bustling murmur of inebriated voices. His gaze was dark and deep in the dim light.

She blinked, trying to remember the conversation track that had gotten them here. Tequila made her brain fuzzy like a peach. “Sorry for what?” she said.

“Not signing the papers,” he said. “I'm sorry, Meredith.”

She clenched her fingers. “I thought we were starting fresh,” she said.

“We are, I just... I'm sorry. I chose wrong.”

“You said that before. About choosing wrong.”
“I know, I…” He blinked. “I just wanted to…” A haunted look crossed his face, but he buried it with a soft smile. “I feel like I’m waking up after a long bout of flu.”

“Being with me is like having the flu?” she said, incredulous.

He shook his head vehemently. “No. Being without you. I just… I’m so tired, Mere. This last year has… I’m glad you’re here.”

“Oh.”

“I’m glad I’m here,” he added. She barely heard him over the pulse of life at the bar.

She kicked back her newest shot of tequila. Number five-hundred fifty-two. Maybe. She might be exaggerating. The room swam. She raised her hand, signaling for another shot. The passing waitress nodded.

“I don’t think we should have sex,” Meredith said as she returned to looking at him.

He blinked, looking befuddled. But, to his credit, he didn’t protest. “Um…” He frowned. “Okay.”

“If we’re starting fresh, we should do it like normal people.”

He leaned forward in his chair. The space between them closed to inches. “And how do normal people do it?” He made the words “do it” sound incredibly dirty. He always did that. Made her think bad, naughty, hedonist thoughts. She licked her lips and body-slammed the sexy thought to the ground in her head.

“They have dates and get to know each other first,” she said. “Don’t they?”

“But we’ve dated already,” he said.

“That was before. And I still don’t know you like you said I should. We only started over like an hour ago. An hour of discussion is not knowing you.”

He grinned. “You might want to stop drinking, then.”

“I can know you when I’m drunk!” she insisted.

“Yes,” he said. He leaned closer, and inches became less. He picked up her hand. Drew it to his lips. Kissed it. His lips felt soft against her skin. “But we have a bad track record with sex and alcohol.”

“Oh,” she said. She pulled her hand away. “Good point.”

He tilted his head. Stared at her, unblinking. Forever. His whole expression softened with adoration. “I love you,” he said. He smiled over the words as though the mere act of saying them made him giddy. Thrilled. As though, now that he’d said them once, the floodgates had opened, and the newness hadn’t yet worn off, resulting in countless repetition.

She bit her lip. A icy flicker of fear carved a space between her ribs like a sword. “That’s definitely not starting fresh.”

The cold got colder. “You’re breaking the rules.”
“We have rules already? We’ve been a couple for fifty-three minutes.”

She ignored him as she wavered in her chair. The waitress approached with a full shot glass, as requested, and set it down in front of Meredith on the table. Meredith stared at it, trying to ignore how the room had gotten all spinny and fun, and how freaking delectable he looked, and failing dismally. Derek was right. This crap would totally make her have sex. She picked up the glass and pushed it across the table. Toward Derek.

He smirked. “What, you want me drunk, too? I figured I was the designated driver.”

“In addition to making me have sex, tequila’s been known for its truth-serum properties,” she explained. “And I’m interrogating you.”

“But I hate tequila,” he said.

She narrowed her eyes. “But I’m interrogating you.”

He clutched his empty scotch glass. “Meredith,” he said, the word soft, and just the sound of it made her relax more than the alcohol gushing through her bloodstream had.

She sighed noisily. “I like it when you say that.” Which was making it hard to think. Or be smart.

He raised his eyebrows. “Meredith?”

She pointed loosely at the shot glass. “You don’t have any more secret wives, do you?”

The mirth bled from his expression.

“I’m interrogating you,” she repeated. She blinked. Everything felt cold inside, which was wrong. Alcohol should make her feel hot. “I’m not having sex with you until you tell me everything. I can’t...” She swallowed. “Don’t you dare tell me what I’ve earned and what I haven't, this time. If you really mean it when you say you’re sorry.”

He stared at her for a long, interminable moment, his expression unreadable. Or, maybe, readable but too subtle for her to figure out while her head was swimming and her thoughts were slow and plodding.

“And if you’re not sorry,” she said, babbling, unable to stop herself. Her eyes watered. “If you’re not sorry, I want you to leave, now. And we won’t start. Fresh or otherwise. I can't do it again. You broke me, you know. I’m a broke... broke.... broken.” The words tangled on her tongue.

He looked appalled, or... Like she’d taken her tiny, ineffectual fist, equipped herself with a shiny set of brass knuckles, and slammed him in the gut with it. He didn’t say a word. For a long moment, she couldn’t breathe. And then her stomach started twisting. He was waffling, she decided. God, she didn’t want to do this again. Any of it. The waffling or the secret wife or anything. And how did he always make her feel like the villain whenever he’d done something horrible? It was like his entire defense relied on making the aggressor feel like she’d kicked a puppy. She swallowed.

“I’m kinda drunk,” she confessed.

He nodded. “You are,” he said. He looked away from her, down at the shot glass with her tequila, a regretful expression on his face. “Truth serum,” he said, resigned.

Then he wrapped his fingers around the glass. His chair squawked as he pulled closer to her, until they weren't across from each other anymore, and he didn't have to lean to be close to her. They were next to each other. Inside each other's space. Their arms touched. He slammed back the contents of the glass in one gulp and gestured to the waitress for another as he finished his grimace.

When he returned his gaze to her, she felt naked. Not lusty naked, just... He peeled away all her layers. “I really meant it, Meredith,” he said. “I chose wrong, and I love you, and I'm sorry.”

She swallowed against the lump in her throat. Fear burbled. She'd bathed herself in ice. “Let's not talk about that anymore, then.”

“Okay,” he said softly. “What do you want to talk about?”

“Go back to the part about Columbia,” she said. That was safer.

“What about it?”

“You got your medical degree there. And your bachelor's,” she said. “In biochemistry.”

He nodded.

“Then why do you wear Bowdoin shirts so often?” she asked.

He shrugged. “I went there my Freshman year. I transferred out after.”

“Why?”

His expression shifted briefly to something distant. “To be closer to home,” he said.

She was drunk. She missed the relevance of his odd tone of voice. She swallowed. “I went to Dartmouth.”

His smile returned. “I guessed that.”

“Really?”

“Your shirt. Remember?”

“Oh,” she said. Stupid alcohol. “Right.”

The waitress arrived with another full shot glass. He took the glass and tipped it back immediately. He grimaced and blinked, eyes watering as he set the empty glass down on the table next to the others as though it were a statement. He gestured at the waitress for another. When he looked at Meredith, his stare had that thousand-mile quality that told her he and sobriety were already having a minor tiff.

“What else do you want to know?” he said.

“I'd still say this failed on the scale of one to romance,” Alex said.

“Still, it's... nice to know. It's just...” Meredith said, her voice trailing away. The whole humiliating lot of it didn't feel nearly so humiliating, now, knowing he'd reciprocated. “It's nice to know.”

Her fingers clenched. She had no idea what had spurred this. Any of this.

He'd lobbed so many empty apologies at her the last few months that she'd gotten used to hating the words, “I'm sorry.” He said them over and over and over again, and he clearly hated what he did and did feel sorry about it, but then he kept repeating the same behavior over and over. Snapping at her when his temper got loose from his precarious hold on it. Taking the blame for things that weren't his fault. Acting moody and dour and hard to live with. This poem, those six, cute-ish lines, felt more real than anything he'd uttered recently, even without a literal apology contained within them. These words meant more. They redefined an entire moment in her life, a moment she'd despised.

How had he even known that moment needed to be fixed in her head?

Knowing that would require an enormous amount of personal reflection, particularly so many years after the fact. Wouldn't it? Except sick Derek didn't reflect. He wallowed. He wallowed and moped and hid away from everything bad while he played his victim cards left and right.

I don't tell you enough how much you mean to me, he'd said, a little more than a week ago.

Was this more of that?

I'm a freak, she'd said.

I'm sorry I ever helped you think that.

Maybe, that apology hadn't been empty, either. And this game was all about Derek driving home a point. The point that he loved her and found her desirable.

He'd planned this out meticulously. He'd dragged the whole hospital into it. He clearly wanted her to get the message. So, he repeated it. Over and over again as he moved through their life together from ORs, to elevators, to locker rooms, to scrub rooms, and who knew where else?

Her hands shook as she brushed her face with her palms. Everybody was staring at her, doubtful, horrified expressions plastered on their faces, like they expected her to panic, or sob. Or barf. Or all of the above.

“Shut up,” Meredith said when she realized they were still dwelling on her horrible begging. “Just shut up.”

“We didn't say anything,” Cristina said.

“You're thinking it,” Meredith said, blinking with wet eyes. She grabbed the card from Cristina, jerking it out of Cristina's grip, not that Meredith had to try very hard, but the violence of the maneuver felt good. She stuffed the card with the others in her breast pocket. “It was humiliating, and I know I was pathetic, and shut up. You don't get it. None of you do.”

Tonight is about you, he'd said in the first letter.

“You really want to know what I'm thinking?” Cristina said.

Meredith rubbed her brow tiredly. “Not really.”

Cristina ignored her. “At least you got through the crap,” she said.

Meredith let loose an acerbic chuckle. “He got shot. He has PTSD. He's an addict. You don't call what's going on right now crap?”

“It's external crap,” Cristina said.
Meredith wiped her face. “I really do love him.”

Cristina nodded. “And he loves you,” she said. “And there's no more crap. Internally.”

“It sounds like you're describing an enema,” Alex said with a smirk.

Meredith ignored him. “I thought you were mad at him,” she said to Cristina.

“For making you say whiny drivel with no self-respect?” Cristina said. She shrugged. “Yes.”

“He didn't make me say it,” Meredith countered. “He never made me do or say anything.”

Cristina only shrugged again.

“Owen hurt you,” Meredith said. “You didn't have a problem forgiving that.”

“I didn't say anything about forgiveness,” Cristina said.

Hope burgeoned. “Or lack thereof?”

“He's a bit like a fungus,” Cristina admitted as though it pained her to say the words.

Meredith raised her eyebrows. “Owen?”

“Derek,” Cristina said.

“So, instead of an enema, he's mold,” Alex interjected.

Cristina shifted from foot to foot, her expression irritated, though, Meredith couldn't tell the direction of the irritation. At Alex, for his comments, or at Meredith, for making Cristina talk... mushy. “Look,” Cristina said. Or snapped. Sort of. “He grows on you. Okay? That's all.” She made a face like she'd sniffed something horrible.

Meredith stared at Cristina for a long stretch of moments. There was no way this couldn't all be connected. Derek's sudden shift in behavior. Cristina's sudden... support. Not blinding support, but, with Cristina, just having her liken Derek to mold was pretty freaking supportive.

“Really, what did you do to him last weekend?” Meredith said.

“I didn't do anything to him.”

“You did something,” Meredith countered. “Something that spurred this whole sincere mea culpa, flowers-and-hearts game thing.”

“I said it would be a cone of silence,” Cristina replied.

“Oh,” Meredith said. She sighed, glum. She couldn't counter that. She'd withheld novels of information from Cristina the last few months on Derek's behalf. Though, that stung, a little. Knowing there was something Derek didn't feel like he could tell her, even after everything. “That's fair, I guess.”

Cristina raised her eyebrows. “With them, Mere.” She glanced pointedly from Lexie to Alex to Mark, reminding Meredith about their rapt audience.

“Oh,” Meredith said, swallowing. “Later?”
Cristina nodded slightly. “If he doesn’t tell you tonight.” Her lip twitched as though she were fighting not to snicker. “He seems to be in a spilling mood.”

“I guess we’re not part of the dark-and-twisty club,” Lexie said.

Cristina glared at her. “Look, he needed a bit of a push.”

“And you pushed him,” Meredith said.

The last time she’d really pushed him, he’d had a panic attack on the catwalk, and he’d stoned himself on his Percocet, and she’d had to leave work early to drive him home. He’d barely been coherent.

Stupid. She’d been stupid to let that slide. She’d chalked the fact that he’d taken so many pills up to him hurting himself when he’d fallen by the railing.

She’d had to help him get into the car, and even through the numbing haze of drugs in his body, she’d watched an expression of pain slice across his face. Breakthrough pain. Bad pain. He’d paled to the color of flour and cried out. Just from trying to get into the car. She’d pushed him to go to the hospital before he was ready, and that had been the result. Him stoned and still in horrible pain.

She clenched her fists. She had to stop doing that. Had to stop pulling up moments where she could have intervened sooner, or at least not contributed to the problem, if she’d only been less stupid.

“That could have been a disaster,” Meredith said. “Pushing him.”

“It wasn’t,” Cristina said simply.

“And now he’s playing romantic scavenger hunt with extremely bad poetry,” Meredith said.

Cristina nodded. “He is.”

“Did you know anything about this?” Meredith said.

Cristina shook her head. “Really didn’t.”

Cristina bristled. “I do not.”

“He is sweet,” Lexie said.

“And hypocritical,” Cristina said.

“And considerate,” Lexie countered.

“And egotistical,” Cristina replied.

“And gregarious,” Lexie said.

“And vengeful!” Cristina said.

“Well, so are you!” Lexie said, snickering.

“I’m...” Cristina blinked. Swallowed. “Not hypocritical.”

Alex laughed.
“Points for Little Grey,” Mark observed.

Meredith shook her head. “Could we possibly move on? Please?” She left the locker room, forcing them to follow her request or get left behind.

“To where?” Lexie said.

“The scrub room,” Meredith said.

Cristina scowled. “You said the cheesecake stuff in the scrub room?”

Meredith sighed as they churned through the empty hallways. “Just shut up. All of you. Derek is a bouquet of stupid flaws, and he screws up a lot. I get it. I got it a long time ago. That doesn't mean I want him any less. Sometimes, you just love. Okay? You'd shut up if you understood it.”

They crawled out of the idling taxi cab in front of her mother's house, into the nippy, wet air. The taxi drove away after Derek sloppily tossed a fifty dollar bill at the driver. That was like a 200% tip, but Derek didn't seem to care or notice that the driver had pocketed the bill without offering change.

“This situation seems... fam... familiar, somehow,” Derek slurred, his tone mirthful.

Meredith stumbled, but he caught her. She pressed against his hard body. She felt hot with alcohol, but freezing with icky fear. And dizzy. And his soft, gray fleecy coat felt so nice against her cheek. He smelled nice, and she wanted...

She leaned on her tiptoes and kissed him in the flickering light. The streetlamp overhead buzzed. A deep, lilting groan coat in his throat as she explored him. The peat taste of his scotch and the remnant burn of tequila wafted in her mouth. No, she told herself. This was bad, and she was very, very drunk.

He was the one who pushed her away. “I thought you said no se... sex.”

“Right,” she said. “I knew that. Cuz I'm broken, and we're starting fresh. Or... whatever.”

“Hmm,” he agreed.

They'd talked at Joe's for three hours, and she'd drunk more shots than she could count. She wasn't sure she'd spent the time asking the right questions. Wasn't sure about anything. She'd started on the tequila again when she grilled him about Addison. She'd needed it like anesthetic to hear why and how and where and when everything had fallen apart for them. She'd figured having a forensic breakdown of the process, both before and after his move to Seattle, might be handy in the future, might prevent further secrets from popping out of the woodwork. He'd talked about his former marriage baldly, and she'd listened as he'd described a loving couple dissolve over the years into something loveless, dejected, and hurting.

They zigged and zagged toward the front door. She searched for her keys. If she hadn't been drunk to the point of muscle retardation, she thought her hands might be shaking. Why had she taken him home again? He hadn't held the taxi for himself, she realized. Only bad things could come from this. She wasn't ready to let him in again. Not yet.

When she found her keys, she opened the door, and they stepped inside the quiet house. George and Izzie were either sleeping or out or... She lost her train of thought.

“May I stay?” Derek said.
“Why?” she said, the word a harsh knife. Sudden fear made her shiver.

“I know it's not fresh,” he said. He wavered on his feet. “But I love... love you, and I'm ti...” He swallowed, as though the word had caught on his tongue. “Tired, and I just want to be here tonight. No sss... sex. Promise.”

He gave her a stupid, puppy dog look that made it hard to say no, but she couldn't say yes, either, not when he waved scary words like that at her.

She swallowed.

He stared at her for a long moment. He seemed spacey. And having trouble connecting glacially moving thoughts. He shook his head. “Never mind. I'll call... another ca... cab.”

Her body stiffened as the thought of him leaving seemed almost as bad as him staying. “Why never mind?” she demanded.

“Because I...” He looked around at her dark foyer as though it were new and strange to him. Took a stumbling step forward. Placed a hand against the wall to steady himself. “Well, do you want me here?”

“Yes,” she said. That was an unloaded question she could answer. She wanted him. She just couldn't get past that point in the equation to anything of substance, yet. Wanting him didn't mean sex or relationships or serious, scary stuff.

He stilled. “Okay.”

“No sex.”

He nodded. “No sex.”

She glanced down the hallway, and then back to him. “Stairs are complicat... cate... cated.”

“Hmm,” he said with another loose nod. “They are.”

She shucked off her coat and shoes and purse in the dark foyer and let them all fall to the ground in a heap by the welcome mat. He frowned at the messy pile. He looked like he wanted to pick up the coat and hang it in the closet. She snorted and left him behind to figure out how to do that while he was too drunk to walk straight, let alone bend down without falling over. She shuffled into the living room and collapsed onto the couch. She leaned her head backward to stare blankly at the ceiling.

What the hell was she doing, having him stay?

Minutes or hours later, he found her. He sank onto the cushions beside her. “This defin... definitely seems familiar.”

She flopped her head to the right to stare at him.

He gave her a hopeful grin. “At least there's no toilet... toilet brush,” he said, stumbling on the words. “On your man. Mantle.”

She laughed. She couldn't help it. “What are you talking about?”

“When you first moved in,” he said. He pointed sloppily at the mantle. “It was sit... sitting right there.”
She gazed at the fireplace and the mantle over top, trying to remember anything beyond the sight of him buttoning up his red shirt. She couldn't picture the mantle behind him, but she remembered him calling the house odd. A toilet brush on the mantle would most certainly be... odd. She smiled stupidly as she tried to picture it. Tried to picture him trying to ignore it.

“Seriously? A toilet brush?” she said.

He shook his head. “Why would I lie about a toilet... brush?”

Why would I lie? The words hit her like a bath of ice water, unexpected, freezing. “You've lied before,” she said, the words bald and cold and hurtful, freshly ejected from a still open wound.

For a moment, he stared at her like she'd sucker-punched him again, and she felt even worse. She felt worse, damn it, for telling him he lied. But he was. He was a lying liar who lied, and she... He’d broken her. Her trust. Her idea of true love. Everything. It was all broke, and coming back from that would take a while.

“You still don't... believe me?” he said, slivers of hurt cutting his gaze.

“I do,” she said. “I mean I don't. I mean...” She wiped her face sloppily. Her eyes watered. She couldn't muster much more than cracking syllables as she added, near tears, “I really, really want to, but...”

You broke me. She left those words unspoken. She blinked in the silence, heady exhaustion pulling at her. He didn't retort. About the lying. Didn't offer hollow excuses.

“Thank you for letting me... st... stay,” was all he said in a deep, low murmur that made it hard not to relax. Hard to remember why she was so twisted up inside.

She watched him through her eyelashes. He'd taken off the gray fleece thing, leaving only the open blue button-down and the black t-shirt underneath. His two best colors. He did seem pale. Tired. He stared back at her, his expression somewhat glassy. Anesthetized by alcohol, her heart didn't patter at his closeness, but something else coiled tightly in the pit of her stomach. Need. Need for...

“No sex,” she said again.

He nodded. “I promise.”

She awkwardly scooted closer, across the sofa cushions. He watched her, quiet, unblinking, his stare dusky with alcoholic haze. Their hips touched. He didn't move, as if he didn't want to spook her. He felt warm against her. Warm and solid and soft all at once. Safe. The denim of her jeans whispered in the silence as she brushed against the cushions and pushed closer still, melding against him.

She just wanted him.

She snuggled against his body with a needy sigh. Clutched his shirt between her fingers. Breathed him in. The scent of tequila and male wafted against the back of her throat. Without a word, he pressed his face against her hair. Wrapped his arms around her. Held her as tightly as he could with misbehaving, drunken muscles.

Him.

Like she wanted. The him that she could manage right now.
She fell asleep in moments, wrapped in the familiar scent of his body and listening to the soft sound of his slow, even breathing. She imagined he did the same with her.

Lexie sighed, her expression peaceful. “I miss that.”

“Miss what?” Alex said with a frown.

Lexie glared at him.

“I do,” Cristina said.

Meredith glanced at her. “Do what?”

Cristina shrugged. “Understand it. Loving idiot mold.”

“But—”

“I don’t intervene on stuff I don’t get,” Cristina said.

“Oh,” Meredith replied.

They reached the dark scrub room. Meredith pushed through the door. She glanced through the glass into the empty operating room beyond. This was the same OR that Cristina and April and Meredith had wheeled Derek when he’d been shot. The same OR where Gary Clark had pointed a gun at Cristina while she’d struggled to save Derek’s life. The same OR where she’d watched Derek, for thirty seconds, be dead. So much had happened here. She watched the ghost of Derek Shepherd scrub his wrists and palms and knuckles under the water in the sink.

Pick me, she’d said as she’d shoved the door closed behind her, plunging them into privacy.

Choose me.

Love me.

She watched the ghost of Derek Shepherd say it, too, with his eyes. She felt almost numb with the relief of it. A horrible moment in her life expunged. Replaced by something better.

She swallowed against the lump that had solidified in her throat. He'd taped the note onto the lip of the sink. “For Meredith,” it said in messy black ink. Just like the others. The soft patter of water dripped from the faucet, perhaps due to a surgeon's or a nurse's hasty exit. She turned off the water, and then she grabbed the letter. Opened it. Read it.

“You know what says thank you like nothing else?” she told her peanut gallery as she read. Her family. “I'll give you a hint. When you say please, I am helpless, and in this game: You win.”

You know what says thank you like nothing else? Derek had said. Sex, he hadn't said, but he'd mouthed it, cutting off the word with his teeth in a way that had seemed both vaguely and blatantly dirty all at once. He'd been kidding. Mostly. And she'd found it amusing. Mostly. And horribly distracting.

“This was the MRI room,” Meredith said as she stared at the note.

“What?” Alex said. “How did you get MRI room from that?”

She shrugged. She added the newest clue to the growing stack in her breast pocket, which bulged with too much stuff. The paper envelope crinkled, and she had to jam it to get it to fit, not that jamming constituted fitting so much as, well, jamming. She frowned as she brushed her breast pocket smooth, only to have it bow outward with a cardboard-sounding pop when she removed her palm.

“Context,” she said.

Alex raised his eyebrows. “Which is?”

A grin tugged at her lips. “Not telling,” Meredith said, and with that, she exited the scrub room.

“Mean,” Lexie said. “How are we supposed to play along and help you figure out the clues without details?”

“You don't need the details,” Meredith said. “Other than that he said this in the MRI room.”

“Said what!” Lexie said, huffing a frustrated sigh.

The hallways of the surgical wing were empty to the point of lethargy this late on a Sunday. The surgeries scheduled late at night were typically emergencies, which always seemed to come in a flood or not come at all. Some Sunday nights were a zoo in the pit. Others, like this one, well, the whole day had been slow.

The fluorescent, overhead lights shined off the immaculate floor tiles, giving the halls a ghostly feel to them in their emptiness. An abandoned gurney covered in rumpled blankets rested next to the wall on the right side of the hallway. A solitary nurse finished late night paperwork at the nearby station underneath the soft glow of a desk lamp. A radio played soft rock quietly as she clacked away on the keyboard of her computer. Sophie or Sadie or Sylvia or something. Meredith couldn't remember the blond woman's name.

“I bet the thing that says thank you is sex,” Alex decided.

Lexie's lip curled with disgust. “That's crass.”

The clacking slowed, and Meredith rolled her eyes when she saw SophieSadieSylvia look up from the glowing computer screen. As soon as Meredith met the nurse's eyes, the nurse's gaze darted back to her work, but not before the woman grinned a silly, annoying, obvious grin.

Everyone, Meredith decided. Everyone in the freaking hospital had helped set up this game. Or knew about it. Or...

Really, is that so bad? said the soft voice of Derek in her head. I do love you, you know. I don't do this for just anyone.

She grinned at the thought. She couldn't help it.

“He's a dude,” Alex said, his tone even.

“So?” Lexie said.

“He's a dude, and we've already discussed elevator rain checks, so sex in the workplace is clearly not below him,” Alex said. He gave Meredith a once over, head to toe, finishing with a brief, self-assured nod. “They've probably done it everywhere else already. Why not in the MRI room?”

Meredith glanced at the OR board as they passed it. There were two cells filled with scribbles and the rest, all blank. She didn't read them, instead turning right to head out of the wing. They passed through the double doors.

“Not in the MRI room,” Meredith said absently.

“So, where?” Alex said.

Meredith opened her mouth to reply, but Lexie interrupted.

“On second thought, you're right,” Lexie said, a look of disgust crinkling her face. She pulled her fingers through her brown hair, smoothing her ponytail. “You don't need to tell us.”

“Sadly,” Cristina said, rolling her eyes, “I know already. In vivid detail.”

“You ask me!” Meredith said.

“No, I don't,” Cristina said with a sigh. “You tell me anyway.”

“I... You...” Meredith frowned. “I distinctly remember you wanting to know if he was good.”

“Back when I didn't think he was idiot mold married to my person, and I wasn't getting any.”

“Oh,” Meredith said.

“We really don't need to know any of this,” Lexie said.

“Which is why I'm not telling!” Meredith said.

“You're telling by not telling,” Lexie said. “Telling that you're not telling is telling!”

Alex tilted his head in inquiry. “But you've done it somewhere else, right?” he said, ignoring Cristina and Lexie. “The lounge is near the MRI room. Did you 'say thank you' in there?”

“I'll have you know we made it home in this particular instance,” Meredith said.

Cristina and Lexie groaned.

“Meaning there are instances where you didn't?” Alex said, his expression gleeful.

“Um...” Meredith swallowed, stopped. She blinked as she realized the trap she'd walked right into. “No comment.”

Her gaze bounced from Alex to Mark, who were both grinning like the unrepentant letches they were, to Cristina and Lexie, who wore scrunched-up “yuck” faces that made them look like rabbits. Irritated, ruffled rabbits. Like the mean one in Monty Python.

Meredith rolled her eyes. “What! I'm not telling! I haven't told you anything. I haven't even said it was about sex.” She jabbed her thumb at Alex. “He went there all by his porny, dirty-minded, Uncle Sal self.”

“Oh, let's see.” Cristina held up her thumb. “It's about Derek.” Her index finger was next. “There is no number two. It's obviously about sex already.”

Mark snorted.

“Who's Uncle Sal?” said Alex.

“You,” Meredith said to Alex's look of confusion.
“I don't get it,” Lexie said.

Meredith rolled her eyes. “Never mind.”

They stepped around a janitor mopping the floor with a scuzzy, gray-colored mop.

“This whole clue hunt is painting a slightly different picture than I'd imagined,” Mark said.

Cristina glowered. “You picture McDreamy's sordid sex life? Am I seriously the only one here who doesn't?”

Lexie raised her hand. “I don't,” she said. Then she lowered her hand haltingly. “Or... I didn't. Before today. This is...” She made another disgusted face. “Eidetic memory sucks.”

“Well, I participate in it,” Meredith said. “I have an excuse.”

Alex smirked. “What about in Shepherd's office?”

Lexie shook her head. “They wouldn't. There are windows in there,” she said. “Everybody can see. And I've taken this to a logical place, where it shouldn't be, and I'll just be quiet now before I say something else.” She cleared her throat.

“Well...” Meredith said. Granted, she wasn't sure if they meant the Chief's office, which was technically Derek's, or Derek's old office. They both had windows. Chief's office remained sacrosanct, so far. Derek's, however...

She felt his hand on her thigh.

No. No, no, no. No, she did not feel anything. She wasn't thinking about that, now.

_I like where this is headed_, said phantom Derek with a smirk so smirky she could feel it. Even in her head. Even made up. Made up Derek was a freaking horny bastard. Just like the real one. She bit her lip.

Silence stretched as Lexie did the math. The shifting look from puzzlement back to disgust was comical. “Oh, ew,” Lexie said. “Ew, I've touched that desk.”

“See?” Alex said with a pleased grin. He looked at Meredith. “How about the supply closets?”

She'd yanked him through the door. He'd been flustered.

_Meredith, I have a page._ She'd moaned as she'd pushed him against the door to close it behind him. _It's an emergency._

Meredith grinned before she could help it. Damn it.

_Oh, this is priceless_, said the Derek in her head.

Lexie's face devolved into horror. “With the sterile supplies?”

“They were wrapped!” Meredith countered. “They were still sterile after!”

“Riiight,” Alex said haughtily. “Elevator?”

“No,” Meredith said.
Alex looked like she'd just told him she'd rode a unicorn to work yesterday. “Seriously?” he said.

“Yes!” Meredith said. “Why do you think the rain check was so special?”

She realized everybody was staring at her.

“Anywhere else?” Alex said.

Meredith opened her mouth. Then she thought better of it and closed it.

“Oh, ew,” Lexie said. “Ew, ew, ew. I don't want to know.”

“Good,” Meredith said. “Because I don't want to tell you.” She glared at Alex, who only snickered, infuriating ass that he was.

“And yet we still know,” Cristina said. She glowered. “Everything.”

They do, said imaginary Derek. You're a crappy liar, Mere.

“Shut up!” she said.

I love you, anyway.

When they arrived at the MRI room, they all filed through the doorway into the small room adjacent to the imaging room. The machine worked to scan a pale woman who looked like she'd just gotten out of brain surgery earlier in the day, or perhaps yesterday. Her skull was swathed in white bandages, and she lay peaceful and still, eyes closed, while the machine worked.

Meredith wondered who'd done the surgery. Perhaps Dr. Weller or Shadow Shepherd. A brief pang hit the back of mind when she thought of Derek. Real Derek. Derek should be doing that. Saving lives. Dr. Weller and Dr. Nelson were both great surgeons, but the neurosurgery department wasn't the same without Derek at the masthead.

Derek sat on the porch swing, sipping from the long neck of a brown beer bottle as he stared into the chilly night. She stopped at the end of the walk. Blinked. She hadn't expected to find him here. Or anywhere, really. She'd made her house of candles, and he'd broken up with Rose, and he'd come back after. Just like he'd promised. And then he'd backed off the last few days. If she invited him somewhere, he came, but otherwise, he didn't push. Didn't even hint, let alone show up unannounced, which was weird. She'd gotten so used to him pushing...

She clenched her teeth as she walked forward. So, he'd made it a few days. Maybe, this would be the pressure bombshell. He sure looked broody enough; just like when he'd started bolting after the ferry thing. She shook her head. No. She'd said she would try to trust him. All he was doing right now was sitting on her freaking porch swing. That was hardly a crime. Was it?

He was so engrossed in thought, he didn't even look at her until she stiffly sat beside him, and the swing swayed and creaked under the new weight.

“Hey,” she said. What are you doing here? she didn't add. Forced herself not to. People who trusted each other didn't ask that sort of thing. Did they?

He stared into the street. A smile tugged vaguely at his lips and then slipped away, as though his feelings were at war. “I watched Beth walk today,” he said, his voice thick with emotion. “She made it down the hall and back.”
“That’s really great,” Meredith said.

Derek didn’t respond. He took a frothy swig from his bottle. The hint of the smile she’d seen didn’t make a reappearance. His gaze was dark and dour.

She frowned. “That’s not really great?”

“Beth is fine,” he said. He gave himself a little shake. Like he didn’t quite believe it.

Meredith nodded. “She is. I talked to her an hour ago.”

“She is really fine.”

“She really is.” She put her hand on his knee because it felt like the right thing to do. “So, what’s wrong?”

“It’s just...” He swallowed, ceasing the quiver in his voice. “Wrapping my head around it.”

“Around what?”

“That she lived,” he said. He looked at her, finally. “She lived, and she’s walking.” He glanced down at his beer bottle. “This is going to sound selfish.”

“What is?”

He took a swig. The weird twitch that wanted to be a smile reappeared and slipped away, like he was trying to force it to stay on his face and failing dismally. A dark, thick sound caught in his throat. “I really needed her to live.”

“Oh,” she said. Awkward. It was the only thing she could think of.

A car drove past, wet tires swooshing across the pavement. The nighttime silence stretched. He hadn’t come to pressure her, she realized. He was upset. Fighting some sort of pervasive melancholy that he knew shouldn’t be there. His disquiet gripped her and scared her all at once, because he’d come here to do it. To be upset. Which meant... what? What did it mean? That he wanted her to suffer with him for her part in his misery? Was the other shoe dropping? Or...

She swallowed. “Did you mean what you said to me, earlier?”

“What did I say?” he said.

“That I make you feel like a murderer.”

He looked at her, his lips parted like he wanted to say something, but the words had gotten stuck. His mouth closed. The stricken look in his eyes only confused her. He stared at the dark, wet street. Wind rustled through the wet leaves overhead, and the random splatter of rain drops accented the quiet with their drum beats. He pulled his fingers through his mussy hair and sighed.

“I snapped at you,” he said. “I’m sorry.”

“You didn’t answer my question,” she said.

“It wasn’t you.”

“But you did,” she said. “Feel like a murderer.”
He took a swig. “It's so hard to remember why I do this, sometimes.”

“You do it because you have a gift.”

He shrugged. “I don't feel like I have a gift, lately,” he said. “I feel like a butcher. Even Beth called me a butcher. I became a surgeon to save people. Not...” His voice cracked. He looked away and wiped his face with his free hand. He stared darkly at nothing. Away from her.

His body language was prickly. Hard to read. But he was there. She frowned. He was there, and not dumping blame on her. Just... seeking comfort? Was that what this was? He made her feel safe. Was it so ludicrous to think she did the same for him?

Yes, a tiny, insecure voice said. You're worthless at this whole relationship thing. How could you make anybody feel safe when you're such a mess, yourself?

She shook the words in her head away. Fight through the fear, Dr. Wyatt had told her. Could she do that?

“We saved Beth,” she said. She leaned against his shoulder. He wrapped his arm over her like a coat, like her blatant invitation was all he'd been waiting for. “And we saved countless other people in the future because of the work we did.”

He sighed. “It's hard to wrap my mind around the theoretical when I'm presented with the real every day.”

“But Beth is real,” she said. “And she walked.”

“So were the other twelve who died,” he said, the words dark and lost. “But...”

Liquid sloshed in the beer bottle as he tilted it back and took a sip. He smelled malty. And his body was warm, a sharp contrast to the nippy air outside. She pressed her cheek against the soft, gray fleece of his coat, snuggling closer. The weird, amazing part was that she felt him relaxing underneath her. Settling into the swing instead of fighting it tooth and nail. He squeezed her arm with his hand and ran his palm up and down her sleeve, warming her even further, and she couldn't help but relax with him.

This wasn't bad, she decided. Him being here unexpectedly. Even upset.

It was actually... nice.

He was nice to come home to.

“Why did you become a surgeon?” he said.

She frowned. “I don't know... It just... seemed like what I should do.”

“Your mother?” he said.

“I guess some of it had to do with that. Or... Okay, a lot of it.”

He tilted his beer bottle at her in a clear offer to share, but she'd never been much of a beer person. Not like him, or like Alex, or Izzie. She waved off his offer. He shrugged and took a swig. His Adam's apple bobbed along his skin, and a wet, mushy sound echoed as he swallowed, his throat close to her ear.

“What do you do when you lose too many people?” he said.
An acerbic chuckle skipped from her lips. “I hyperventilate in the closet until my knight in shining whatever comes to help me with a paper bag,” she said.

His grip tightened around her. He looked down at her with a soft smile. “Meredith.”

She stroked the soft lapel of his coat. “You helped.”

“I’m glad.”

“I’m... here, too,” she said. Awkwardly. Hesitantly. Stupidly. But... “I can help you.”

He kissed her forehead. “You already do,” he said.

“But you said—”

“I know what I said. But Beth is alive. I’m wrapping my head around that instead of another tombstone. And that’s because of you.”

She didn’t know what to say, couldn’t even think of something awkward, and so she said nothing. He leaned forward to set his bottle on the porch floor. Then he pulled her close and buried his face in her hair, sighing.

“I’m glad you’re here,” he said. “Thanks for pushing me.”

The swing creaked as they swayed in the breeze.

Derek needed to cut. He had a rare talent for it. A gift. It was part of who he was. What made him tick. The fact that he’d twisted himself up inside so badly that he was afraid to pick up a scalpel, lest he hurt somebody, was a constant burn. A reminder that no matter how happy he looked or how well he seemed day-to-day, something still wasn’t right. A reminder that Jaws was lurking.

At least she understood it. His reluctance. He’d always been too sensitive to the losses. They took him longer to deal with and to sort through, and when they mounted too far into a pile, he tended to fall to pieces. Now, he had even less emotional fortitude than he’d had before, both to cope with mounting stress during surgery, and to cope with unfavorable outcomes.

Soon, she hoped, he’d be in a place where he could do what he loved again.

Save people.

Even if it meant he would be doing simple stuff for the rest of his career.

At least he would be saving lives.

He needed that to be whole.

The lab tech, Reza, glanced up from his computer screen and grinned when they entered. He was a short, stocky man of middle eastern descent, with bronzed skin and short, black hair. “Dr. Grey,” he said in a cheerful tone. He leaned forward, and he ripped something off the side of the computer monitor. A cream-colored, embossed envelope just like all the others.

Meredith reached for it and took the envelope into her hands.

“Thank you,” she said as she wormed her finger underneath the seal and tore open the top. “When did Derek put this here?”
Reza's brown eyes twinkled. “Dr. Shepherd was here? I thought he wasn’t working today.”

Meredith sighed. “You're not going to tell me anything, are you?”

Reza's lips curled into a grin. He glanced at the computer screen and then back at her. “Only that Mrs. Fitzgerald seems to be done with her MRI.” He brushed his hands on his pants as he stood.

“Thanks,” Meredith said with a sigh. “That's helpful.”

Reza shrugged and left them in the tiny room while he went to help the woman in the other room back onto the gurney on which she'd arrived. Meredith pulled the next clue out of the envelope.

“You're dark and twisty; but I like it, I said,” she read. “It makes you strong and so fearless, and I want us to wed.”

She didn't give the others a chance to digest the poem. “Elevator,” she said.

“But we've already been to the elevator,” Lexie said. She frowned. “You're answering these too fast!”

Meredith shrugged. “No, another elevator,” she said as she glanced at her breast pocket. No more of the envelopes or cards would fit, but she didn't want to throw any of them out. They were... special. She stepped out into the hallway, and all of them followed like a blind herd of sheep.

“That was when he proposed, right?” Cristina said.

“Right,” Meredith said.

She pulled her stethoscope out of the pocket at her hip and wrapped it around her neck as they walked through the empty halls. She hoped Derek didn't have too many more of these planned before the payoff. He seemed to be stepping forward in sequential order, and he'd gotten to his proposal already. There wasn't that much left between then and now. Was there? She shoved the envelope and the card into her newly emptied pocket. She could fit a few more in there.

“Wait,” Mark said. “He ended up proposing in an elevator?”

“Yeah,” Meredith said. “He did.”

“Do you do everything in elevators?” Lexie said.

“Not sex, apparently,” Alex said.

Mark snickered. “He proposed in the elevator, and you thought the teddy bear was dumb?”

“What teddy bear?” Cristina said.

“I never said the bear was dumb,” Meredith said.

Really, she hadn't said much of anything about the bear. Mark had been trying to save her from answering questions lobbed like bricks at her by Derek's pushy sisters, and in the spur of the moment, Mark had picked that as the subject switcheroo. She'd been too shocked to do much more than stutter, and then the conversation had taken a left turn, away from bears. So, when are you getting married for real, anyway?

“And the thing in the elevator was really sweet,” Meredith said. “He tacked up all my old case histories with him on the walls, and he—”
“Wait,” Cristina said. “I want to hear about the teddy bear.”

“His first proposal involved flowers and candles and a teddy bear,” Mark said.

Cristina smirked. “That must have been when he was trolling for ideas.”

The familiar ding of the elevator’s arrival in the distance made her gaze sharpen. “He asked you for ideas?” Meredith said as they turned the corner.

“I tried to steer him away from the stupidly maudlin,” Cristina said. She glanced at Mark. “I specifically told him no house of candles.”

“What house of candles?” Lexie said.

“Nothing,” Meredith said.

“You seriously swear you’ve never had sex in an elevator?” Alex said as they arrived at their destination, just in time for the elevator doors on the left to slide shut.

Meredith bit her lip as the familiar envelope taped on the far wall of the elevator disappeared from view. She raced to the elevator to jam the buttons, both down and up, but it was too late. The following hum told her the elevator had been summoned to another floor already and wouldn't be coming back for a few minutes.

Meredith sighed. “No, just—”

“Everywhere else in the hospital,” Alex said with a nod. “Right.”

Lexie elbowed him in the ribs. “You're such a pig,” she said before she turned to Meredith. “What house of candles?”

“Do you want the next clue or not?” Meredith said. There was no way in hell she would cop to the candles thing to Lexie. Meredith would never hear the freaking end of it.

The elevator dinged, and Meredith twitched, but it was the doors on the right, not the left that slid open. Her shoulders slumped. The doors slid shut.

“This seems to happen to us a lot,” she said. Everybody stared at her with blank looks of confusion. She jammed the up button again, once, twice, again, in rapid succession while she glared at them, picturing the Chief, instead.

That won't make it come faster, said the Derek in her head. It comes faster when I push it. She couldn't help but snort.

Cristina frowned. “You're not going to freak out again, are you?”

“No, I'm just laughing,” Meredith said.

“At?” Mark said.

“All of you,” she said. And Derek. Who she was making up in her head in his mysterious absence. McPhantom, she decided, which only made her snort again. “You're just...”

“Us?” Lexie said.

Me, McPhantom said.
“Something like that,” Meredith said.

The correct elevator came this time. Meredith stepped over the threshold, a small smile tugging at her lips as she remembered how Derek had looked, standing there surrounded by case files. Files she'd helped him with or done the large part of the work herself. The sweet smell of his cologne tickled her nose, almost too vivid to be only a memory.

Had he been there recently, taping the envelope to the wall? Wearing a bucket of cologne? Curiosity wound with excitement, her lingering exhaustion, and the whispering remnants of her headache. What kind of night did he have planned at the end of this, exactly? She wasn't quite sure she had the stamina to deal with corny, romantic, Derek-y Derek until the wee hours, but as far as worries were concerned, worrying that she couldn't keep up with a happy, cologne-y Derek seemed like a nice worry to be having.

See? said McPhantom. I'm getting better. No Jaws. I want you to enjoy this.

She grabbed the envelope from the back of the elevator and stepped back into the hallway, into the people cluster that followed her. The paper crinkled in her hands as she pulled out the next clue. The elevator doors trundled shut and hummed away behind them. “We were ready then, as we're ready, now,” she said as she read from the card. She glanced at her family. They stared back, intent. “So, we took out a Post-it, and we wrote our vows.” She knew this one immediately, too, but she waited to speak so that Lexie could have her fun.

Lexie didn't disappoint. She bounced on her feet, excitement in her gaze. “Oh! Oh! I know!” she said. “The Post-it wedding!”

Alex shook his head. “I still don't get that,” he said.

“Get what?” Meredith said.

“Why a Post-it?”

“It was a thing,” Meredith said. “A Post-it thing. We didn't have time for city hall.”

There isn't any time, she'd said, and he'd understood. Supported her.

She could feel the pen in her hand. He'd asked her for a piece of paper, and all she'd had were Post-its. She'd signed her life into his keeping. He'd signed his life into hers.

They'd fumbled toward that moment for years.

Taken missteps left and right.

She tried to put her finger on when it had all begun to come together. When they'd broken the vicious cycle of him pushing because he thought she would run, and her running because he pushed. When he'd thrown off his mantle of impatience and self-entitlement. When she'd forced herself to fight through her fears, both the ones he'd propagated and the ones of which he'd been a hapless victim.

Her first thought... The cliff. With the candles. She'd told him she wanted to trust him. He'd kissed her.

But the more she considered, the more she decided, no. The moment where they'd really lain down their swords had snuck up on them. It'd come and gone without fanfare in the night on the edge of dreams.
She lay in the bed, staring at the ceiling. She clutched the lip of the blanket. Darkness muted the world, made the shadows seem frothy and... bigger, somehow. Clouds had covered the moon outside in a thick, puffy, gray carpet turned purple by the city's light pollution, and the only light that filtered through the window was the soft, distant white of a buzzing streetlamp outside.

She tilted her head. She listened to his soft, even breathing beside her. Inches. He lay on his stomach inches away from her, his face tipped toward her as though he sought her even in dreams. She couldn't see any of his features. Just the muzzy, naked lump that was him. The breathing, there lump.

She'd promised that she would try to trust him, which meant she had to believe him until proven otherwise, or her promise meant diddly. Which meant he wasn't leaving. That he was going to be there tomorrow night, and the night after, and the night after that.

Which made this whole thing... really. Really...

“Derek?” she whispered.

His body twitched under the covers, and his even breathing skipped as he snuffled. Then he resettled and didn't move anymore.

“Derek?” she repeated.

Another snuffle. “Mmm?” he muttered into the pillow, his voice thick with sleep and dreams.

“Are you awake?”

“No,” he said, though it sounded more like “nurgh”, as he turned away from her and jammed his face into his pillow.

She stared at him, biting her lip. Seconds dragged as though time had been dipped in molasses. She worried at the hem of the blanket with her fingers.

“You have to be awake if you're answering me,” she decided.

He twitched. “No, I don’.”

“You do!”

“Talkin' in my sleep,” he mumbled.

“You don't sound asleep.”

He didn't answer. The silence filled with the thick, even sound of his breathing as he fell back into slumber, and she frowned. He was a light sleeper. Getting him to wake up was usually as simple as saying his name. This was... He was tired, and this was futile, and stupid. Being extraordinary was not being afraid of the dark or being afraid of him. Of them. Except...

“You don't think this feels weird?” she said before she could stop herself.

Something in her tone must have broken through. He flopped onto his back and wiped his face with his hands. The rustle of his palms across his stubbly skin soothed her, somehow. He sighed. Not a bothered sigh. Just... recouping some oxygen to be awake and functional.

“What's weird?” he said, and for the first time that night, his tone was fully awake and listening.
She looked at him. “Our first night together,” she said.

“But I’ve slept here dozens of times,” he said, his words soft and cautious.

“But not in a continuous sense,” she said, unable to stop the quiver in her tone. “This is really... This is it. You’re here. You’re totally here. Forever. You moved in.”

“You asked me to,” he said slowly.

“I know, but... now, it's... real. It's really real.”

A long, maddening silence followed. He didn't move or speak, but he was awake and staring at her. She could tell he watched her from the glisten of the dim light striking his eyeballs. Her heart skipped in the darkness. Forever was a scary word. Particularly when it came to him. She'd trusted him before, more than once, and it'd never gone well. And, now, here she was, in the middle of the night, dragging them into another confrontation, practically daring him to contradict her. To tell her he was walking away because he couldn't take waiting for her to work out the horrific pile of skittishness he'd helped to create. She'd told herself she'd try to trust him, but that didn't stop junk like this from twisting up in knots inside her head. Her feelings about Derek didn't mix well with logic. Logic made her scared. Which, honestly, didn't seem logical.

Was that a bad sign? Surely, that was a bad sign.

Panic coiled.

“Do you want me to leave?” he said, his tone soft. Calm. Resigned.

“No!” she said.

Silence followed when he didn't respond further. Damn it. She sighed. Derek, I'm scared. That's all she'd meant by any of this. Derek, I'm scared, and you inexplicably make me feel safe. I need you to make me feel safe right now. Except fear was a lot harder to explain than it was to feel. Explaining it was admitting it, and...

The mattress creaked as he slid closer. He wrapped his arms around her.

“I've never done this before,” she said, curling against him.

“I haven't either,” he admitted.

“But you...” She swallowed. “There was her.”

“She wasn't you, Mere.” His lips pressed against her forehead. He didn't pull away. He inhaled instead, as though her scent comforted him. As though he had words he couldn't say, either. Meredith, I'm scared, and I have no idea what you want from me.

“I want you here,” she said, her tone definitive. “You can ignore the rest of my screwy, messed up signals.”

“But I like the screwy and messed up,” he said.

“Liar,” she said. He tensed, which only confirmed her suspicions about her behavior. She added woefully against his chest, “I feel like a freaking yo-yo, Derek.”

“A yo-yo.”
“Yeah.”

For a moment, she wondered at his odd, tense silence. He didn't wear a t-shirt to clutch, so she curled her fingers against his warm skin. She'd called him a liar. Not the best choice of word, considering she was trying to figure out how to trust him again, and he knew it. Except...

His body hitched, and a soft chuff swept over the top of her head. She blinked, flummoxed. Was that...?

“Oh, Meredith,” he said, barely put together before he lost it again.

It was. It was that.

Mirth.

Her eyes narrowed. “What's funny?”

He rubbed his eyes. “You don't trust me,” he replied.

She gaped. “And that's funny?”

“I admit, you're confusing the hell out of me, but I don't really have room to complain about it,” he said.

All the pieces slid into place as she stared at him.

A giggle popped loose from her lips. She couldn't help it.

And then he laughed. The sound of it was delightful. It slid down her spine and made her feel warm inside.

She laughed again.

And then they were both stuck in paroxysms of noisy, gasping guffaws that probably woke Izzie and Alex from a sound sleep.

She hadn't heard Derek laugh this hard in a long time. She hadn't laughed this hard, either. It felt good. Liberating.

Perfect.

“Okay, so,” she managed, panting. “Maybe, yo-yo applies to us both.”

“We traded places,” Derek said.

She snickered as she kissed him. “I'm in, coach. Am I doing you proud?”

“At least we're a team,” he said affectionately.

She nodded. “We are,” she said, smiling in the dark. She settled against him as he rubbed her back in slow, soothing circles. “I want you here,” she repeated, and this time there was no doubt or panic or anything clotting the sleepy spaces in her head. She yawned.

“I want to be here,” he replied against her ear. He held her.

Whether he'd meant to do it or not, she felt safe. Just like she'd wanted. For now, she decided, despite damaged trust and yo-yos and everything, safety was more than enough to get through the night.

Baby steps, she told herself as she drifted to sleep.

Baby steps, and they would win the match.

“City hall takes twenty minutes if you're in a hurry,” Alex countered, unaware that she'd slipped deep once more into memory.

Meredith blinked and looked up from the note. “We didn't have twenty minutes,” she said.

The elevator dinged, and a harried, tired-looking nurse stepped through the doors. She glanced at them. Smiled despite the paleness of exhaustion crimping her features. And continued on her way.

“You clearly had twenty minutes somewhere if you were having sex in Derek's office,” Alex said.

Lexie's nose scrunched up, and her forehead wrinkled. “Ew.”

“Evil Spawn makes a decent point,” Cristina said. “You could drive a truck through that logic.”

Alex nodded. “It's crap logic.”

“It's not crap,” Lexie countered. “I thought it was cute. They should do what they want.”

“And we wanted a Post-it,” Meredith said.

“So, where was it?” Mark interjected.

“Derek's office,” Alex said.

“Not the raunchy sex,” Mark said. “The Post-it.”

“It's hanging on the wall in their bedroom,” Lexie said.

“I know. But where did they sign it?” Mark said.

Meredith stuffed the latest envelope into her side pocket with the other and led them to the residents' lounge. Derek had taped the envelope to her alcove. Her clothes, a blouse and some khakis, were folded and stacked on the bottom of the alcove underneath her shoes. She grabbed the envelope and opened it.

“Chief Shepherd, you said, a teasing purr. You strode to the table. The rest... a blur,” she recited, only to sigh.

“Oh,” Lexie said. “Oh, god. How much sex do you people have?”

Alex glanced at her. “I guess you wear earplugs.”

Lexie jabbed her thumb toward Meredith. “She snores. It makes the whole house vibrate.”

“Does not!” Meredith said.

Cristina sighed. “This game is TMI.”

“Derek's office, then?” Alex said.
Meredith's face heated. There was no way she could get out of this one without talking about sex. Derek had made it rather blatant. “Um. No.”

The gleam in Mark's eyes was positively lecherous as he said, “Where, this time?”

Meredith bit her lip. “Derek was in the conference room, and—”

“That has windows, too!” Lexie said.

“With blinds...” Meredith countered.

“I don't want to know!” Lexie said.

“I've sat on that table...” Cristina said.

“Dude,” Alex said with a smirk. “Mad props.”

“Next time he calls me a manwhore, I'm going to punch him in his fucked up nose,” said Mark.

“It's clearly a hypocritical nose,” Cristina said.

“It was my idea!” Meredith said. “He was working!”

“So, he did you on the table,” Mark said.

“Or, did you do him?” Alex said.

Meredith sighed. “This game was clearly not meant for an audience.”

You're enjoying it anyway, said McPhantom.

“No, no,” Alex said. “This is great.”

Mark nodded. “I'm getting tons of ammunition.”

“I hate you guys,” Meredith said.

Mark's eyes twinkled as he squeezed her shoulder. “I think you kind of love us.”

And me, McPhantom said. Do I count double?

Meredith didn't argue. Instead, she turned to hide her grin as she led them to the conference room, which, at this time of night on a Sunday evening, was empty, as expected. Derek had taped the note right on the table where she'd been sitting. She remembered the squeak as her naked skin had slid across the table. As he'd pulled her closer. She'd gasped as he'd—

Crap.

Without words, without being there at all, he'd made it dirty. Porny. She closed her eyes, trying to tell the pervasive, sexy memories to go away. There was no way in hell she was going to relive naughty table sex in the middle of a crowd of her closest friends. While pregnant.

Really? McPhantom purred in her ear. You seem to be reliving it already.

Real Derek wrote that clue, McPhantom said gleefully. I'd say he's porny, porny, too.

Lexie looked at the glossy, lacquered wood table. “I'm going to barf,” Lexie said.

Alex followed her gaze. “We should do that more.”

Lexie's eyebrows rose. “Barf?”

“Have sex in inappropriate places,” he said.

Meredith ignored them and picked up the envelope. She pulled out the next clue. Lexie, ignoring Alex, leaned forward, “What's it say? Not more sex. Please. He's my boss. And my brother-in-law. And my roommate. Wasn't it enough for me to catch you on the kitchen counter with him that one time?”

“The kitchen counter?” Mark said. “Really? I didn't think he had it in him.” His gaze traced the outline of the shiny table, and then he grinned at Meredith. “You're a good influence, Grey.”

“That's not good,” Lexie said. “It's dirty. And wrong. And... dirty!”

Alex smirked. “Mad props.”

“I eat in there,” Cristina said.

“Shut up,” Meredith said as she glanced at the card. “Where Derek and I choose to be intimate is —”

“ Everywhere,” Alex said.

Lexie and Cristina both sighed.

My work here is done, said McPhantom.

Meredith frowned at the card. This one was different. A veritable wall of scribble-y, hard-to-read text jumped out at her. She swallowed, squinting at it to piece it together.

Dear Meredith,

I can't write a poem about this. I tried, but...

I don't remember very much, but I remember you there. It was your strength that pulled me through. I would not be here today if it weren't for you. You always try to shrug it off like it was nothing, or like Cristina did more, because that's the kind of person you are. You give and give and rarely take. But I want you to take this, Mere. Please, take credit. You're an amazing woman. I was dying, and this is where you saved my life.

With love,

Derek

The air sucked out of the room as she reached the end of the card, and she lost all thoughts of porny Derek, imaginary or otherwise. She clutched the paper in her hands, breathing softly, trying to recuperate from the unexpected blow. Of all the places she'd expected this scavenger hunt to go, she hadn't thought Derek would take it to the shooting. That day and the following weeks didn't fit with the theme of the night. Sexy fun. Nostalgia. None of the memories from that day were sexy or fun or nostalgic at all, but...
A hand touched her shoulder. Meredith looked to the left, following the arm to its owner. Cristina. “The catwalk?” her person said softly, a concerned look on her face. She must have read over Meredith's shoulder, or...

“Yeah, I...” Meredith swallowed. “Yeah.”

Lexie took the card from Meredith's lax fingers to read it herself, and then she passed it to Alex, who passed it to Mark. Meredith put the clue card into her pocket with the envelope when it came back around to her.

“You're sure it's not the OR?” Lexie said.

“I don't know.” Meredith said. A lump formed in her throat. “I didn't do much in the OR. That was all Cristina.”

Cristina snorted.

“What?” Meredith said.

“You jumped in the line of fire for him. Does he know you did that?” Cristina said, her tone acerbic.

“Wait,” Mark said. “Wait, you did what?”

Meredith swallowed. “Yes,” she said. “He knows.”

“Meredith,” Derek said, staring across the expanse of soapy bubbles at her. Candles glowed around them, setting the dim room alight with flickering warmth. His pale skin glistened.

“What?” she said tiredly as she rubbed the bridge of her nose. Her fingers felt rough. They were starting to prune.

This had been such a long day.

After hitting Joe's, she and Cristina had gone to Cristina's apartment for a while. When Meredith had left and come home, she'd expected to find Derek asleep. He rarely stayed up late anymore. She'd read it could take a year before he felt 100 percent after injuries and surgery like he'd received, so she didn't worry, much, that he seemed so tired all the time. He'd had a bad morning, and, on top of that, he'd gone out for the first time in... forever. He'd even looked like he'd been having a little fun. He'd been smiling. Like her Derek. Not the moody stranger who'd been wearing his face since he'd been shot.

Instead of finding him asleep, though, she'd found him sitting at the kitchen table, waiting with a serious look on his face.

Then he'd confessed what he'd nearly done, and she'd forgiven him.

Again.

Water shifted as he moved his leg, and his slick skin brushed her thigh, reassuring her. His pale kneecap popped above the water, and small, soapy bubbles slid left and right and down over the dark, wet hair that peppered his shin. He resettled. He felt good against her. Solid.

“I want to ask you a question,” he said. His dark eyes watched her, unblinking. “You don't have to answer.”

A long pause followed. He searched for words. She watched questions forming. Dissolving. Wandering across his expression like lost lambs.

“What is it?” she prodded, more concerned. More tired.

“What happened when I got shot?” he said.

She blinked. Her mouth opened and closed. Her eyes pricked with tears at the unexpected question. “What do you mean?” she said.

“You saw it.”

“I did, but I still don’t—”

“I was scared,” he said.

She reached under the water and slid her hand along his calf, lower. His toes flexed as she wrapped her hands around the arch of his foot. “I know you were,” she said. “Me, too.”

His lip quivered, and he broke eye contact for a moment. “I didn't remember it right.”

“That's not surprising,” she said.

“Could you tell me?” he said. Looking back at her. “What happened? What you went through?”

She swallowed. He'd never asked her. Not once.

“Why do you care, now?” she said.

She didn’t mean to snap. She really didn’t. But she was at wit's end dealing with the whiplash of... him. His changing moods. Everything. She could forgive him for walking away that morning. For not being more articulate. She could forgive him for what he'd done with April. She could forgive him for the almost-backslide. She could. But it wasn’t easy or simple. It was exhausting. She was exhausted. She rubbed her temples.

“I always thought what I saw was what you saw, but... I didn't remember it right, and I...” He met her gaze. Whatever he saw made him swallow. Put on the brakes. He shook his head. “It's okay. We don't have to talk about this.”

But he wanted to. Despite the tremor in his tone. She could see it in his eyes. And he'd never wanted to before. The distinct, ludicrous picture of an ostrich pulling its head out of the sand slammed into her mind's eye.

She squeezed his foot. Something in his demeanor shifted. Water sloshed as he moved from his side of the tub to hers, and then his slippery body pressed against her. She shifted to give him room. His arms wrapped around her, and he kissed her chastely. Simple reassurance. She let him slide behind her, and he wrapped her in a cocoon of wet limbs.

She fell back against his chest by instinct, and his embrace tightened. “You really want to know?” she said as she gripped his arms, unable to stop her voice from cracking. Disbelief clung to every dark crevice in her mind.

A soft sigh brushed against her skin. Goosebumps chased the sensation along her shoulder. “I really want to know,” he said, his words soft. Disturbed, but... curious.
She leaned against him. She took a deep breath. Candles flickered as she exhaled. “I know you told us to stay put, but we didn't,” she began.

He laughed. Actually laughed. “Somehow, I don't think you'd be you if you had.”

Her nose crinkled. A grin tugged at her lips. “Is that a compliment or a complaint?”

“Yes,” he said, simply. The low, soft tone of his words slipped down her spine like a drip of cool water.

She giggled. She couldn't help it. “You're not so hot at following directions, either, you know, Mr. Stubborn Pants.”

He squeezed her. “I'm not wearing pants right now.”

Another giggle pierced her lips, and her body relaxed as she imagined the hesitant twinkle in his eyes, though she couldn't see his face with him behind her. She shifted her lower body. Skin slid against skin. “No pants,” she agreed.

“What happened next?” he asked, nervous energy gone.

She told him.

It had been the first time he'd ever broached the subject of what had happened. In the aftermath, she'd been forced to stuff all the bad things inside herself and deal with them on her own. She lost their baby, and she'd nearly lost him, and she'd done it alone.

Because he hadn't had the emotional capability to deal with any of it. He'd had a panic attack in her arms when she'd tried to get him to talk about what he'd gone through when Gary Clark had found him. It wasn't until they'd gotten Samantha that she'd even dared to try and ascertain how much he remembered after Gary Clark had left him bloody and dying on the catwalk floor. Not much had been her answer. He could recall the thirty minutes or so in the OR where they'd talked about the rain check and other things, and the rest was blurry, disconnected flotsam for him. She'd managed to give him the recount of it without falling into a blubbering mess, at least. He'd gotten very quiet when she'd talked about Gary Clark in the OR, and she'd been afraid she'd gone too far, but after long, painful silence, he'd given her a wavering smile, and held her close.

I asked, he'd said. Thank you.

But... “I'm not sure he'd want to commemorate that part,” Meredith said.

“I guess that leaves the catwalk,” Cristina said.

“What did she mean, throwing yourself in the line of fire for him?” Lexie said.

“It doesn't matter,” Meredith said.

“I think it does,” Lexie said.

“Look, can we just go to the catwalk?” Meredith snapped. The piercing wail of Derek flatlining echoed in her head despite her best efforts to shut it out. She remembered screaming and collapsing to the floor in hysterics. Derek had been dead for thirty seconds, and those had been the worst thirty seconds of her life. “In the grand scheme, it really doesn't matter, and I don't want to think about it.”

Lexie huffed a deep breath. “Fine,” she said.
Meredith clenched her fingers. This was definitely not fun. Or sexy. Or nostalgic.

They all walked in icy silence to the catwalk.

Maybe, sexy fun wasn't the entire point. Most of the point, but not the entire point. Remembering their history seemed to be a more apt fit with this clue and the pick me, choose me junk thrown in. Acknowledging the past and where it'd gotten them, eventually.

Disappointment twinged when they reached the catwalk, and he wasn't standing there. The catwalk was devoid of activity except for the occasional passerby. Pitch black carpeted the world outside the huge windows, contrasting with the endless, immaculate white inside the hospital. She spotted the envelope taped to the railing in the distance, closer to the Chief's office, closer to where Derek had fallen to the floor, and twinging disappointment at his absence widened into an ache.

She remembered running across this floor.

She remembered her knees skidding as she slid beside him. The vague sensation of a thin layer of her skin separating from her knees in her haste to get to him. She remembered her shoes slipping on the tiles. Not because she'd lost her balance. Because the tiles were wet with bright arterial blood.

His blood.

No, he'd gurgled, terrified. Terrified of her.

She glanced at her hands. His shirt had been sticky, and it'd gotten all over her palms.

It.

His blood.

She didn't walk here very often anymore. When she had to, she rushed. There were nothing but bad memories here.

Derek on the floor.

Blood.

The gun clapped. Her ears rung as she watched the scene in horror. Derek fell. He hit the back of his skull on the floor. Then he lay still, either bell rung, unconscious, or dead. Meredith screamed. She wanted to run toward him, to help him, to save him, but Cristina dragged her away before she could.

What convinced Meredith to move forward was the fact that he'd done so himself. Walked onto the catwalk. The envelope, which fluttered in the soft currents of air circulating in the room, proved he'd braved the past when she knew he typically avoided the catwalk like it was the gun that had shot him. He used to go here all the time to ponder things. To lean against the railing and watch the scenery. She'd never once caught him there since he'd returned from his medical leave of absence, and the one time she knew he'd gone there during his leave, he'd had a panic attack. A bad one.

But the envelope was there. Taped on the railing like a beacon.

I'm telling you, Meredith, said her phantom Derek. There is no Jaws. I'm better. See?

Was that the point of this?
To show her he could do, now, what he couldn't have done before?

When she reached the railing where he'd taped the envelope, she stretched out her grasp for it.

But Mark touched her hand, pulling her away. “No,” he said. He cleared his throat. “Wait.”

Mark was looking at the stain in the grout on the floor between the tiles, which themselves had been restored to their former pristine state. His face was white, and his clenching jaw danced underneath his temples. His unsettlement made her follow his gaze to the telltale discoloration, and a chill swept through her body. She looked back at the envelope, gritting her teeth.

“What?” Meredith said.

“He told you to take credit.”

She bristled. “So?”

“You didn't take credit,” Mark said.

“I do take credit.”

Mark stared at her, disbelief marring his expression.

Meredith glowered. “Just because I don’t shout it through a bullhorn, or crow about it from the rooftops, or...”

Her gaze wandered back to the stain.

An echo.

Derek's blood.

He'd gotten blood on his face. How had he gotten blood on his—

“Derek,” Meredith snapped as she slapped his cheek with a bloody hand. The wet sound of his wound as she pressed the heel of her palm into it filled the silence between her words. That and his choppy, labored breathing. “Derek, Derek. Come on. Stay awake.”

His eyelids fluttered, and he looked at her. Sort of. He swallowed. “‘Kay,” he told her drunkenly.

“That’s good. Hang on. You'll be okay.”

Meredith glanced in the direction Cristina had run. Why wasn't she back yet? Meredith couldn't do this by herself. She couldn't. Derek's head was tilting to the side again when she looked down.

“Derek!” she hissed, and she shook him.

His eyes opened. Another swallow. His lips moved. She couldn't hear him. She pulled her fingers through his sweaty hair and leaned down. Closer. “What?” she said.

“Did I fall?” he said, the words elongated and stretched and slurried.

Her throat closed, and she blinked tears as she tried not to let the panic burbling inside overwhelm her. “Yes, you fell,” she said. “Please, hang on. Stay awake. Please, Derek. Help is coming.”

He blinked. “‘Kay,” he said.
She bit her lip and squeezed his hand. He felt like a cold dishrag against her skin. He shivered.

“Hang on,” she said. “Please.”

When she came back to the present, a sheet of water covered her view. She wiped her eyes. He'd been so far into shock at that point, he hadn't even known he'd been shot. He'd descended even further, after that. To the point that what little he said, when she managed to drag words out of him, was gibberish.

“I threw Cristina against a shelf to get to him.” She'd been so scared.

“I know,” Cristina said.

Meredith sniffed. “I'm sorry I threw you against a shelf.”

Cristina snorted. “No, you're not.” Meredith clenched her fingers.

Dr. Wyatt had been trying to pry Meredith's experience out of her, but Meredith had been fine. She'd repeated that chorus to herself so many times it felt like a law. Derek had lived. They could always make more babies. Derek was too sick to handle Meredith not being fine. Therefore, Meredith was fine. Simple. Right?

Except, now, she felt like a spool unraveling.

“It's okay,” Cristina said with a shrug that told Meredith she considered the matter over and done with. Hadn't even considered it a matter at all.

“I stopped the bleeding with my hand,” Meredith said. “He's a surgeon, and he didn't even try to... He was so out of it, he was just lying there with a gushing wound.” She wiped her face and squeezed her eyes shut. She'd never talked to any of them about this. Any of it. They'd all had their own crap to deal with after the shooting. She hadn't wanted to add to it. She still didn't. “I want to read the next clue.”

“You did a good job, Mere,” Cristina said.

Fine.

Which only made Meredith's efforts at re-centering herself futile. She didn't feel like she'd done a good job. She'd ceased to be a surgeon in that moment.

The first time they tried to move him, he yelled like they were branding him with a hot iron, and she fell apart.

“Stop. Stop it,” she said, her heart pounding as she dropped his feet. “We're hurting him. Stop,” she pleaded, wrecked. His blood was all over her. All over the floor. All over him. It was everywhere, and— “Stop, stop. Please.”

“Meredith, he's got a bullet in his chest,” Cristina snapped. “He's going to hurt no matter what the hell we do, and we need to get off this catwalk. Now. Pick up his feet, and deal with it.”

“Meredith,” he slurred, staring at nothing.

Her stomach roiled.

She clenched her fingers. She could still feel his sweaty, bloody hand in hers. His sticky shirt. Could hear him slurring nonsensical, horrifying things that told her light. Tunnel. End. A slow pulse of tears leaked as she looked at the floor. She'd been holding it all in. For months. And now she was pregnant, and tired, and full of stupid hormones, and she didn't know what she was doing.

His blood had stained the freaking grout.

A warm pair of arms wrapped around her and held her tightly. In the blur, she didn't know whose.

“I wanted a blanket,” Meredith said, sniffling into someone's soft scrub shirt. “To keep him warm. I didn't have anything. There was so much blood. It was a la... lake. On the floor.”

She couldn't think beyond death.

“You did a good job,” Cristina repeated.

“I don't want him to leave me,” Meredith said. She knew she sounded pathetic. And whiny. And...

“Everybody leaves me, and he promised I could trust him this time. I trusted him.”

“He's still here,” Lexie said. “We're here.”

“I know!” Meredith said. “Which is why this is stupid.”

“It's not stupid,” Mark said, but he sounded far away, like an echo, or through babbling water. Somebody rubbed her back in slow, soothing circles, just like Derek did when he hugged her, and she lost track of the words as she closed her eyes. She could pretend the person wrapped around her was him.

The world flashed white, and the catwalk was replaced by endless nothingness. He wore his navy scrubs, and he looked younger. Less world-weary. His eyes glinted blue like an endless sea. He folded his arms across his chest and stood three feet away, facing her with a serious look.

“Oh, Derek said, his voice a familiar soft murmur that slid down her spine. “Time out. Take a deep breath. Just breathe.”

“I can't.”

“You can. You can do this.”

“I lost a baby. And now I'm pregnant, and tired, and I can't—”

He stepped closer and wrapped his strong arms around her. “I know. Shh.”

His whisper soothed her shattered mind, and she closed her eyes. The white turned mushy dark. His grip tightened around her, and she rested there. Breathing. Silent. His palms were warm, and he said the softest, nicest things that made her never want to move. Her muscles loosened.

“Just let it out,” he said.

“I can't let it out,” she said.

Chagrin overwhelmed his expression. “I think you need to.”

“I can't,” she insisted.

The image of him snapped away.

Meredith stood by the glass guard, wrapped in warmth, her eyes burning. She felt nauseous. And tired. He'd nearly died here, and she'd been alone since then. She'd been alone, and she hated it. Hated him a little for it. Or a lot. She hated him a lot. Loved him.

A lot.

The conflicting dichotomy made her head spin.

Her breaths hitched.

“Well, this backfired,” Mark said as the dizzy rush subsided.

“I'm fine,” Meredith croaked.

“Right,” Alex said, frowning. “You look fine.”

She rubbed her tired eyes and stepped out of Mark's sturdy grasp. He let her go, but he looked stricken. He didn't know what to do with a blubbering Meredith. None of them did.

She sure didn't. She looked at them. All of them. Cristina. Lexie. Alex. Mark. She was as far from alone, now, as she could be. Derek had broken down all the walls she'd erected between herself and her friends for his sake. He'd swooped in and fixed it on his terms. Like that was supposed to make it better, because that's what he did. When he was ready, he rode in on his freaking horse and saved the day.

“I should have told him this was a stupid idea,” Mark said.

She clenched the railing and kicked the glass guard. Hard. Pain tore through her toes and resounded up her shin like a cymbal clash. “I hate him,” Meredith said as her eyes leaked.

“Derek?” Cristina said.

Meredith shook her head. “Gary Clark.”

A familiar, masculine set of hands wrapped around the railing next to hers. “Me, too,” Alex said.

Meredith swallowed and looked at him. She wiped her eyes. “Alex...”

He met her gaze and shrugged. “What?” he said. “I can't hate him?”

“You said you were okay,” Meredith said, almost an accusation. She couldn't help it. “I thought you were okay.”

“I am okay,” he said, his tone calm. “Doesn't mean I can't call him a dickwad.”

He grinned at her, eyes twinkling, and that made her feel a little better. Her lip quivered. She sniffed. Snot stuck to the back of her hand. She felt disgusting. And tired.

“Solidarity?” she said, her voice wavering.

His grin widened. “Something like that.”

Meredith took two deep breaths. Slow ones. In and out and in and out. By the second release, her insides didn't tremble, and the image of Derek, bleeding, dead, didn't seem so sharp anymore.
“Read the next one so we can get out of here,” Alex said, bumping her shoulder playfully with his own.

She nodded and wiped her eyes before she reached for the clue. Getting out of here sounded like a great plan. The paper felt cold when she grasped it. She pulled the clue from the envelope. She crinkled the envelope between her fingers, unable to help venting tension, and it collapsed into a tight, crumpled ball.

She sniffed once more and began to read the newest poem aloud. “The Sun Also Rises. Your voice lit a spark. The words are a blur to me, but they helped in the dark.”

“What does that have to do with anything?” Cristina said.

“That doesn't sound like sex, at least,” Lexie said.

“Good point,” Cristina said.

“It's Hemingway,” Mark said. “They made us read it in high school, and for some inexplicable reason, he liked it.”

Meredith stared at the poem.

The Sun Also Rises. Voice lit a spark.

A spark.

Helped in the dark.

She'd felt so stupid reading that first chapter, but she'd wanted to do something. Needed to do something. To distract herself from the sharp aches squeezing her lower body as her uterus voided itself. To make the time go when he'd been too sick and hurt to do anything but lie there, and she'd felt helpless to help.

He'd been awake when she'd started the first chapter, but awake in a doped stupid sense. His eyes had been open halfway, but nobody had been home for a long while, and it'd been easy to read when he'd been staring at nothing. Easy to pretend he hadn't been listening, and thus easier to permit making a fool of herself.

I can't believe I'm doing this, she'd told the old, yellowing pages after a chapter or two. He'll think it's totally stupid. And then she'd looked up at him from the swirl of printed text, only to realize he was looking back at her. Or he's awake right now, and he's getting a kick out of watching me humiliate myself or whatever.

He'd been upset about something. She'd wanted to stop reading, but he'd told her not to. She hadn't been able to fathom why.

When she'd started chapter one, she'd only meant to pass an hour or two. He'll think it's totally stupid. And then she'd looked up at him from the swirl of printed text, only to realize he was looking back at her. Or he's awake right now, and he's getting a kick out of watching me humiliate myself or whatever.

He'd been upset about something. She'd wanted to stop reading, but he'd told her not to. She hadn't been able to fathom why.

When she'd started chapter one, she'd only meant to pass an hour or two. She hadn't realized at the time she would be creating a ritual of comfort that would carry them well into the middle of the book. He hadn't talked about the book since he'd left the hospital. She'd never thought reading it to him was a poem-worthy thing.

Apparently, though, he did, and a whole host of ho-hum memories loitering in her head from his hospital stays slid into a special category. She'd done something that had felt like nothing to her, but it'd meant a lot to him, and that... meant a lot to her.
Thank you, Mere, said McPhantom warmly as she stared at the clue. Her eyes watered with a much better kind of tears.

“I read the book to him,” Meredith said, wiping her eyes once more. “When he was in the ICU, I read it.”

Meredith sat by his little bed in his little ICU stall, a lump stuck in her throat. The dim fluorescent strip over his bed illuminated the space around him and cast the small room in a soft, white glow. He didn’t move.

His mother had shown up. His sisters. The four of them, sans Amelia, had stuffed themselves into his tiny ICU cubicle to announce that they’d made it across the country to see him, and in the space of fifty minutes, they’d exhausted him, peppering him with questions and regaling him with woeful stories about how scared they’d been when they’d seen the ticker tape fly past on CNN about a shooting in a Seattle hospital.

The orderly had served him dinner while they’d been there, and he’d eaten his first real meal under scrutiny. Probably only because of scrutiny. A slab of chicken. Rice. Some anemic-looking broccoli. A green Jell-O cup. He looked like he wanted to puke it all up again.

At least his stupid family had left him alone so they could get some sleep.

“Can I get you anything?” Meredith said.

He looked at her with bloodshot, wet eyes, and her heart splintered. He’d rallied earlier in the day. Tried to insist on having the catheter removed. On walking. But that resurgence had faded. He was exhausted, and he hurt, and he felt sick, and it showed.

“No,” he said, his voice a raspy whisper, as though speaking hurt. “Please, don’t leave.”

She reached through the railing, took his hand and squeezed. His fingers trembled, and his limbs still weren’t as warm as they should be.

“I’m here,” she said, her voice soft. “I won’t leave.”

“Mom.”

“They went to their hotel. She said she’d be back in the morning. Remember?”

From the blank look on his face, he didn’t. “Okay,” he said.

His shivering concerned her. “Do you need another blanket?”

He didn’t respond. She covered him with a third thermal blanket, just in case, while he lay there, passive. She squeezed his bare toes through the blankets. She leaned over the railing and brushed his temple. Touched the soft, lank hair that framed his haggard face.

What little color pinked his skin blanched from his cheeks and lips, and she tensed, ready to reach for the basin resting beside the bed. Nothing happened. He closed his eyes. His heart monitor beeped steadily.

“Mom.”

Meredith frowned. “Derek, do you want me to call her? I’m sure she’d come back.”

“She left.”
“That’s right.”

“Sorry, I’m... spacey.”

Meredith glanced at the morphine drip and then back at him. “It’s okay.”

“I got shot.”

“I know,” she said.

His dark eyes fluttered open, and he stared at her. The stark sickness in his gaze made the lump in her throat mutate. Grow. She swallowed.

“Will you read more?” he said, his tone... strange.

Like he didn't want to think.

She couldn't blame him.

She wiped her eyes. “Sure,” she said, no hesitation. “What's the last part you remember?”

“Doesn't matter,” he said. “Pick a chapter.”

She picked up his well-worn copy of The Sun Also Rises from where she’d stashed it in the compartment below the bed. They hadn't gotten very far the night before, when he hadn't been able to stay awake more than a few minutes at a time. She couldn't remember exactly where in chapter three he’d fallen asleep the night before, but it had been somewhere in that area.

She flipped ahead to chapter four, happy for the excuse to skip some of it. She ran her fingertips along the old, yellowing page. He’d read this book a lot. She didn’t know why.

Her first impressions of the novel hadn't been all that great. Hemingway's writing style grated, and this particular story seemed... almost as depressing as thinking about her childhood. Which... yeah. Depressing. That was why she tended to avoid anything put onto typical English class syllabuses when she looked for reading material. She’d discovered over the years that, if there was some sort of literary point to the story, it was usually depressing.

She read another chapter aloud, silencing herself only while the floor nurse came to check on him, before she scrunched her nose and looked over the bed railing at him. He rested, staring through his lowered eyelashes at a distant point on the ceiling, and he seemed... a bit more relaxed than before. And a lot less like he was going to hurl any second. The pulse of tears had slowed as well.

“Derek?” she said, keeping her voice low. Soft.

He shifted his gaze lackadaisically toward her.

“Why on earth do you like this story?” she said, horror tingeing her voice. And then she blushed. She hadn't meant to sound so critical. “I mean...” She swallowed, trying to suck the judgment out of her tone. She didn't want to be judge-y. She traded judge-y for what she prayed sounded hopeful. “Does it get better later?”

His lip twitched. A small smile overcame the glazed look on his face. “Mmm,” he said, an idle noise as his eyelids lowered. He breathed once. Twice. Like he was gathering himself for the discomfort of speaking. He’d been poked and prodded by doctors and nurses all day. “It’s a... literary... classic, you know.”
She blinked, and for a moment, she tried to picture the shelves in his office at home, which he’d commandeered to keep his books. Medical texts and journals. But also pleasure reading. She’d never examined what he’d put there beyond a cursory glance. She realized she had no idea what he liked to read. She’d rarely paid attention, and she hadn’t asked him.

“You’re one of those weird people who enjoyed being forced to read Animal Farm, and 1984, and As I Lay Dying in school,” she said. “Weren’t you?”

Another almost smile tugged at his lips. “Maybe,” he said. His eyes seemed glassy and galaxies away, but... She liked the smile. He had a great smile. He swallowed. “They make me... think.”

“Don’t you have a favorite bubblegum book, though?” she said. “Something where the goal is not to think too hard?” Something more appropriate for cheering up after a serious injury, she didn’t add.

“Sure,” he croaked.

“Well, what is it?” she said.

“Um...” He closed his eyes, swallowing, and she wondered if she’d given him too much of a mental cracker, considering how drugged he was.

“I could get you something happier from the gift shop,” she offered. She glanced at her watch. Visiting hours were over, which meant the gift shop would be closed, but it wasn’t too late for mainstream commercial ventures to be open. “On second thought, I’ll go to the bookstore across the street. They’re still open. It’ll take thirty minutes. I’ll just pick something.”

His eyes snapped open. “No,” he said. Croaked. Desperately. “Please, don’t leave.” Like he categorically didn’t want to be alone.

“I won’t,” she rushed to say, horrified at the rapid shift in his demeanor. “I’m sorry.”

“Please, stay,” he rasped.

“I will,” she said.

“Mere.”

She leaned over the railing and pressed her finger to his lips, encouraging him to rest his throat. Her aching insides tightened with stress. God, he was so freaking fragile. And hurt. And buried in a sea of monitors and wires and... The room swam before her eyes as the ghostly echo of shrieking EKG monitors filled her head. He’d been a millimeter away from checking out on her yesterday, and she was grilling him to the point of pain today, all to find his personal Robin Cook or Diana Gabaldon or whoever.

She didn’t mean to keep him awake. Or talking when it hurt him. Just engaging him in normal, everyday, stupid conversation had felt so nice, she’d forgotten all the bad stuff. Everything. For a moment.

She resettled in her chair, which seemed to console him somewhat. She gripped his trembling hand through the railing, mindful of the intravenous line, and stroked his thumb. His fingers clasped around hers. He was alive, she told herself. He was alive, and they would be okay, and they could have stupid conversations about bubblegum books later, when he was feeling better.

For now, this dismal book would have to do. She licked her lips and prepared to read more, despite her misgivings about whether this was appropriate post-shooting reading material, but before she had a chance to say the first word, he interrupted.

“You could read... the phone book,” he said.

Her gaze snapped to him. She blinked. “What?” She clenched the book with her right hand to keep it from falling off her lap. “I mean... not what. Forget I asked. You, shut up and heal.”

He laughed. Just a weak, short syllable of sound that cut off with a wince. He looked at her, his blue eyes a fathomless, spacey sea.

“I like your voice,” he rasped. He swallowed.

“Stop it!” she scolded. “You're not allowed to talk.”

“Okay,” he said.

She couldn’t help but laugh. Almost a cackle in the quiet, ICU ward. The sound bounced off the walls, and she blushed and flinched when she remembered where they were. She swatted at his hand.

“You,” she said. “Zip it. Or no Hemingway.”

He didn't speak, but his lips moved. Bossy, he mouthed. She let it slide. She stroked his thumb with hers, and she started chapter five.

Cristina made a face. “That's...”

“Sappy and stupid. I know,” Meredith said.

Meredith and Cristina rolled their eyes. “Romantic,” they said together.

“We know,” Meredith added.

_They make me... think_, Derek had said.

“I think it might be more of an academic sort of appreciation or whatever,” Meredith said.

“He likes _1984_, too,” Mark said.

Meredith pumped her fist. “I _knew_ it!”

_I never said no when you asked_, said McPhantom with another smirk she could feel

Everyone stared at her for a long moment, and she sighed as old melancholy overwhelmed her brief feeling of triumph. But she was breaking through, at least. Breaking through felt much better than drowning.

“Whatever floats his boat, I guess,” Mark said with a shrug. “I prefer my PSP to stuffy literature.”

“And I like surgical annals,” Cristina said. “Can we move on, please?”

Lexie raised her eyebrows. “Impatient much?” she scoffed.
“He likes literature and writes crap poems,” Cristina said. “The sensitivity two-by-fours that keep hitting me are starting to hurt.”

Lexie stared at Cristina, eyes narrowing with what looked like suspicion. Then she folded her arms over her chest and smirked. “You do like him,” she said. “You totally like him! You’re way past calling him idiot mold.”

“Just don't tell me he reads sonnets in his spare time, too,” Cristina said. “That's too much.”

“So, you don't deny it!” Lexie said.

“No,” Cristina said, a bland look on her face, “because I'm ignoring you.”

“You answered me that time,” Lexie pointed out.

Cristina's bland expression became a stony glare.

Lexie looked away from a potentially cataclysmic confrontation. “Okay,” she muttered, cowed. “Shutting up, now.”

“So, where are we going?” Alex prodded.

Meredith shrugged as she wiped the remnant ache from her eyes. “The CICU, I guess,” she said, her voice a little dull. “That's where I read to him, unless he means Seattle Presbyterian, but...”

“So far, they've all been at Seattle Grace,” Lexie said.

“Yeah,” Meredith said.

She looked at the grout once more. Shards of panicked memories didn't jab at her awareness. It hurt. Thinking of him, here, lying at her feet. Bloody and dying. It hurt, but the pain felt a bit like the surgery was done, and nobody was cutting into her skin with a scalpel anymore. She was definitely breaking through.

You got some of it out, McPhantom said. That's a good start.

She rubbed her tired eyes, too exhausted to tell his hypocritical self to shut the hell up.

With a definitive nod, she pulled away from the railing. They headed to the CICU, leaving the stained grout and painful memories behind.

Maybe, this clue would lead her to Derek. Real Derek. The one who'd been absent since... Months. Real Derek, who could wrap his arms around her. Despite her simmering, distant anger at his white knight complex and the complementary sliver of hope that kept her thinking, maybe, just maybe, this was really it. He'd come riding back on his stupid horse, and all the stress of the last few months would wane.

This is the happily-ever-after, he'd said. Years ago.

Meredith's fingers clenched when she saw the empty stall where Derek had lain after surgery for two days. Empty. She couldn't take much more of this. These clues. Searching with no payoff.

Crisp, sterile white sheets marked by square-shaped crease patterns, an echo of how they'd been folded in the closet, covered the small bed. The embossed, flowery envelope Meredith had grown to expect rested by the empty pillow. Everyone gathered around the bed, and she bit her lip as she grabbed the the next clue and tore it open. Sequentially speaking, there couldn't be much more.
There just couldn't. Could there?

She supposed she would find out.

“You had your Tequila straight up,” she said, reading Derek's scrawl. “You wore a black, slinky dress. You were just a girl in a bar, and, me, in a mess. I said something stupid, and you tried to ignore me, but I wanted you to know me, and I said it, imploring. You took me home, and we had a good time. It was supposed to be empty, but instead was sublime.”

When she finished reading to them, she looked up at them. “When Derek and I first met,” she said.
“It was at Joe's after the intern mixer.”

If I know you, I'll love you, she'd said with a chuckle, incredulous.

“I didn't want him to talk to me, but he wouldn't go away,” Meredith said.

Hey! McPhantom said.

“We went home together,” Meredith said with a hesitent smile, feeling a bit like sunshine had poked its head through the clouds as she put the envelope and the card with the crumpled stack in her side pocket. Her hand lingered on the smooth surface of the card before she let it go. A wistful sigh escaped her lips. “Best mistake of my life,” she added in a smaller voice.

Lexie stilled. “The girl in the bar,” she said, a look of blushing mortification encroaching on her face. “Crap. I get it, now.”

“It's okay,” Meredith said.

“Are we supposed to go across the street, then?” Mark said as he glanced at his watch, and Meredith couldn't help a spike of excitement.

“I don't know,” Meredith said, eyes narrowing. “Are we?”

This wasn't sequential anymore. Derek had changed up the order. Rewound. Surely, this had to be the final clue. He would be across the street, waiting for her. He could handle Joe's, now. She'd seen him handle it. Maybe, he would be wearing his red shirt, a not-a-scotch-because-he-was-a-recovering-addict cradled between his hands as he waited against the back wall for her to sidle to the bar and ask Joe for not-a-tequila-because-she-was-pregnant.

Hot chocolate, she decided. Well, in Derek's cup, anyway. The idea of anything other than water still made her stomach tremble.

She stared at Mark, waiting for an affirmative on their destination. He cleared his throat roughly and didn't answer.

“I think we should go,” Lexie said.

Cristina nodded. “Captain Obvious thinks we should.”

“I didn't say anything,” Mark said.

“Because Captain Obvious is obvious,” Cristina said.

“Let's check it out,” Alex agreed. “We're all off shift, now, anyway, aren't we?”

Mark glanced at his watch again. “I'm not, but I don't have surgery for another forty minutes.”
As a group, they moved out of the CICU toward the front doors of the hospital through the skeletal halls. Meredith walked in front, thinking, barely listening, as the others chattered behind her.

“What surgery are you doing?” Cristina said. “The ER's been empty.”

“Deviated septum,” Mark said.

“On Sunday?” Cristina said. “At...” She glanced at her watch. “Now?”

Mark shrugged. “She asked nicely.”

“She?” Lexie said, as though the sex of the surgery candidate were important.

“Fifty percent of the population is female, you know,” Mark said.

“Actually, 50.7% if you go by the 2000 census,” Lexie said, correcting him.

Cristina shook her head. “You really disturb me, sometimes.”

The words fell into the background letter by letter, and Meredith lost track of what they said as they stepped out into the chilly, dark air. Meredith shivered. She thought about halting pursuit to run back inside to the locker room for her coat, but Derek would be at the bar, waiting for her in the warmth and bustle. Just across the street.

Her Derek.

Excitement hummed. Need sang a chorus in her bone marrow.

Need for a lot of things.

To touch and be touched.

To comfort and be comforted.

To love and be loved.

And behind all that, to yell and cry and spit and scream.

The bright bouquet of memories that he'd given her, the good, the bad, and all the rest, had stirred up all sorts of things, good and bad and all the rest. Maybe, that had been the point. That there could be good and bad and all the rest, now. She could stop refusing herself things she didn't think he could handle. She could love him and hate him and all the rest in tandem.

They were returning to normalcy.

Maybe.

Her Derek would be waiting at the bar.

No Jaws, no Jaws, no Jaws, a little voice chanted in her head.

Maybe, damn it! she wanted to insist.

Her pace became brisker as a walk became a trot. The footsteps and chatter of her friends, her family, chased after her as a trot became a run became a heedless gallop. The cold air whipped her face. At least it hadn't rained. She watched the neon green bar sign grow and grow. Emerald City Bar.

Her Derek.

Waiting.

MaybeMaybeMaybe.

She slammed the flat of her palms against the door and shoved into the warmth and chatter and boisterous cheer. The little bell dinged over the entrance, but she lost the sound to the bedlam of life around her. Pool balls cracked. Voices simmered. Her eyes searched the crowd.

Red shirt, she thought. Red, shirt. Red... I had my red shirt on. My good-looking red shirt. You took advantage.

She glanced at the small, circular table she remembered sitting at with him for hours to chat when they'd first met. No red. A young, twenty-something boy wearing a Seahawks shirt.

Joe saw her standing, searching, on the welcome mat. His face brightened. He wiped his hands on a white towel and pointed with a wink to a stool by the bar. The stool where she'd sat the night she'd met Her Derek. There, taped with surgical tape to the vinyl-covered sponge of the seat, rested another envelope. She pressed forward through the crowd, relentless, and she snatched it, waiting to read the words she needed to read. The words she'd waited for this whole exhausting night.

I'm here, Mere, it should say. Just turn around.

He should be waiting in his red shirt.

But it didn't, and he wasn't.

Her friends caught up with her in moments and gathered around as she clutched the card so hard the stiff paper crumpled.

“I went to find you, and you went to find me,” she read around the disappointed lump in her throat. Her voice barely carried over the boisterous crowd, and everybody leaned closer into a tight huddle. She cleared her throat and continued, “We never crossed paths as we searched, desperately. I moped home in defeat, only to smile. From the lights on my cliff, my defeat? Worthwhile.”

“Is that the house of candles?” Lexie said. A large man with a beer belly bumped into her as he passed, and she lurched forward, blurting, “That sounds candle-y.” The man, oblivious, continued onward to a noisy group by the bar that waved at him. Mark reached to steady Lexie.

“Okay?” said Mark as she recovered her footing.

“Yeah, thanks,” Lexie said, and Mark let go. She brushed her hair out of her face. Her gaze lingered on Mark before she looked back at the group. “So, is it the candles thing?”

“But that was at his trailer,” Cristina said. “That's a long way to go to check a guess.”

Meredith turned to Mark. “Okay, enough. Where is he?”

“Derek?” Mark said. He took his palm from Lexie's shoulder like he'd been caught with his hand in the cookie jar.

“You came with the first envelope,” Meredith said. “You've dropped hints left and right. You clearly talked to him and planned this out. Where is he?”

Mark's mouth opened as though he intended to protest. His teeth clicked as he closed his mouth... again. He heaved a defeated sigh. “I was really that obvious?” Mark said. “I was going for subtle.”

“Captain Obvious,” Cristina said with a definitive nod.

“Not Stealthy Tour Guide?” Mark said.

Alex clapped him on the back. “I don’t think stealthy is your strong suit, man.”

“Can I get anyone a drink?” Joe said as walked to their end of the bar. He filled a glass with a spritzer while he watched them, eyebrows raised in inquiry.

“Not tonight, Joe,” Lexie said. “Thank you.”

“Still following clues?” Joe said.

“Do you know where Derek is?” Meredith said.

Joe shook his head. “Sorry,” he said. “He came in. He taped the envelope to the stool, tipped me enough to buy a small island, and told me to make sure nobody took it but you or Mark. Then he left.”

“When?” Meredith demanded, but Joe gave her a helpless shrug. He was the first person to give solid confirmation that Derek even existed. “No idea?”

Joe shrugged. “It’s been so busy today, I didn’t even look at the time.” He picked up the glass he’d filled. “Sorry,” he said again, and he moved on to paying customers as Meredith slumped with a sigh.

This didn’t make any sense.

“He has to be here.” Meredith said. “He gave you the first note, right?”

Mark nodded. “He did.”

“So...?” Meredith prodded, an expectant look on her face.

“He wanted to get a head start,” Mark said.

“To his trailer?” Cristina said.

I don’t like the trailer anymore, Derek had said.

Meredith shook her head. “He wouldn’t go to the trailer. And the rest of the game has been here.”

“Why wouldn’t he go to his trailer?” Lexie said.

Meredith sighed. “Because he just wouldn’t.”

“But why not?” Lexie said.

“He doesn’t like his trailer anymore,” Meredith said.

Confused frowns spread like wildfire, but Meredith didn’t make any attempt to explain. For all the avenues of communication Derek had opened for her with her friends, for all he’d laid himself bare, there were some things she imagined he would still want kept private. Like the fact that he’d made the trailer into his idyllic mental escape from the real, and when she’d taken him there while he was sick with pneumonia, it'd struck a bad chord.

_The trailer felt wrong._

“Weren't the lights on the cliff?” Cristina said.

“Yeah,” Meredith said impatiently. “So?”

“So, the trailer is not the cliff,” Cristina said.

“But it's still an hour away!” Meredith countered.

“What's your point?” Cristina said.

“It's not my point,” Meredith said. “It was your point. You said it was a long way to check a guess.”

“But I didn't say you shouldn't go if it's the right answer,” Cristina said.

Meredith threw up her hands in frustration. “Would you people make up your minds?”

“Let's take a group vote,” Lexie said.

“ Seriously?” Meredith said.

“Seriously,” Lexie said with a nod. “Raise your hand if you think it's the cliff.”

Everybody's hands shot up. Alex's. Mark's. Cristina's. Lexie's. Meredith glowered, arms folded over her chest.

“So, we have a consensus,” Lexie said.

“So, now, I'm just supposed to go to the cliff on a whim,” Meredith said.

A redhead woman wearing a micro-mini skirt, a festively red sweater with a neckline that plunged so far south it touched Antarctica, and heels that put Mount Everest to shame passed their huddle on her way to the bar. Her feet plinked against the floor, and a thick, noxious cloud of overdone perfume followed her as she leaned suggestively onto the bar and called Joe over to order a Cosmopolitan. Meredith wrinkled her nose, unable to hide her reaction as the stench made her eyes water.

“You drove your Jeep today, right?” Cristina said.

Meredith tried to answer, only to cough. Her stomach churned.

“Dude,” Alex said. “Road trip. I call shotgun.”

“It's not a whim,” Lexie said. “He said it's the cliff in his poem.”

“His _crap_ poem,” Cristina added.

“We are _not_ taking a road trip to the trailer,” Meredith managed. She pressed the back of her palm against her lips and squeezed her eyes shut.

“Why?” Alex said. “What's wrong?”

“Throwing up, now,” Meredith blurted, and before anybody could react, she darted to the bathroom, past the reeking redhead just as she picked up her Cosmopolitan from the bar. The woman looked at Meredith, batting thick, long lashes that had to be fake, a quizzical expression on her face as though she had no idea she smelled like a freaking trash heap.

The small women's bathroom at Joe's only had a few stalls, and it didn't smell the freshest, which only made things worse. Luckily, there wasn't a line despite how busy the bar was outside. Meredith surged past the woman fixing her makeup at the mirror and into the first empty stall. She skidded to her knees on the gross floor before she lost what very little was left in her stomach.

Nobody else had reacted to Skunk Woman. Meredith supposed it was Baby's fault, and that Skunk Woman wasn't, in reality, that skunk-y. She groaned as a spasm wracked her stomach, and she puked again.

A soft knock on the side of the stall preceded a quiet, “Are you all right?”

Meredith wiped her lips with the back of her palm and looked up with watery eyes. The woman who'd been fixing her makeup stood by the open stall door, which Meredith had been in too much of a rush to close.

“I'm pregnant,” Meredith grumbled.

The woman's expression bled with solidarity. “That bastard,” she seemed to want to say, but she didn't have a chance, because Cristina pushed past her.

“I've got it,” Cristina said. She looked at Meredith. “Are you done?”

“I feel like crap,” Meredith said.

Cristina nodded. “But are you done?”

“If I throw up anymore, I'll throw up my stomach,” Meredith said with a deep, shuddering sigh. “Is that medically possible?” She rested her forehead against the cool sidewall of the stall, breathing. Her stomach kept flip-flopping, and her limbs shook.

“I don't think you can throw up your stomach,” Cristina said.

“They'll name it after me,” Meredith said. “Meredith's Expelling Innards Syndrome.”

Cristina squatted on the floor, and she wrapped an arm around Meredith's waist. They stood together, but Meredith had to stop and lean against the wall for a moment, because the room revolved around her head. Once. Twice. Lazy revolutions that made her want to toss her cookies all over again.

Through sheer stubbornness and with Cristina's help, she moved out of the bathroom stall. The woman who'd been doing her makeup stood by the open stall door, which Meredith had been in too much of a rush to close.

“Rinse and spit,” Cristina instructed.

“Wait,” Meredith said. Her stomach squeezed, and she leaned against the sink. Nothing. She shook her head. The throbbing bass of the music outside pounded against her brain almost in time with her heart. Her tongue felt thick. But... “False alarm,” she croaked. “I can't do this for seven more months. I can't. Nothing is worth all this vomit.” She took the cup, tipped it back, and swished the cool water between her teeth.
Cristina squeezed her shoulder. “You can. It is. Stop whining.”

Meredith spat the water into the sink. “I'm not whin—”

“You're whining. You get a baby out of this with the man you love.”

“But you hate babies,” Meredith said. “And Derek is mold. You said he's mold.”

Cristina shrugged. “You want a baby. You want Derek. I'm your person.”

“Can't you be supportive right now?” Meredith said wearily.

Cristina shook her head. “Letting you wallow wouldn't be supportive.”

“I don't know if I have Derek,” Meredith said. The words made her stomach quiver again. Her lower lip trembled. “I...” She blinked.

_Time out_, said McPhantom, an echo. _Take a deep breath. Just breathe._

“That's crap,” Cristina said. “You have him.”

“But he's—”

“Sick,” Cristina said. “That doesn't mean you don't have him. He's so yours it's disgusting.”

“I can't count on him. He makes me _so_ tired,” Meredith said, her voice thick with emotion. She stared at herself in the mirror. Her makeup was a mess. The shirt she wore underneath her scrubs had a funny stain on the neck from god knew what. She looked like a pasty, disgusting freak.

“So, he's not McDreamy Msaves the Day anymore,” Cristina said.

“No,” Meredith said.

Cristina looked at her in the mirror, her unblinking brown stare peeling everything away. “You're Meredith Grey. You take crap from no one. You don't need saving.”

“No,” Meredith snapped. “And it's not just that. It's...”

A lump formed in her throat. This whole freaking scavenger hunt epitomized her problem. She wanted Her Derek back, and no matter how hard she tried to find him, he just wasn't there. He wasn't able because he was sick, and she couldn't let herself hope he'd gotten better, because it would only end in heartrending disappointment. Worse, she felt like her damning assessment wasn't at all fair to him, either. He was trying.

Anger tightened underneath her skin. Her lungs squeezed all the air out, and she clenched her teeth. If he'd tried harder, though, none of this would have happened, and she wouldn't be so tired. He would have freaking asked for help, and he wouldn't have tried to fix it with pills. Fixing it with pills wasn't trying at all. It was giving up.

He'd freaking given up, and she couldn't even yell at him without risking what little traction he had...

Trapped. She was trapped, but hoping. She was loving, but hating, and it freaking. _Sucked._

Cristina nodded as though Meredith had spoken aloud, a reflective look on her face.
“Fighting sucks,” Cristina said.

“We're not fighting,” Meredith said.

“You're mad at him,” Cristina said.

“I'm not mad! I've been vomiting all day, and I'm tired, and I just want to be done with all these clues, so I can go home and sleep, assuming I can go a few hours without needing to hurl or pee.”

Cristina rolled her eyes, as if she were sick of the self-pity. “I took him on my bike,” she said. Meredith blinked. “You have a bicycle?” she said stupidly.

“No,” Cristina said. “My bike, Mere.”

Meredith gaped. “He rode your motorcycle?”

“That's what I 'did to him','” Cristina said, putting the last few words in air quotes.

“But he won't even talk about—”

“I didn't say we talked about it.”

Meredith swallowed. “How did you—”

“I insulted him. And cajoled him. We yelled at each other. He threatened to call the police to get me off the property.”

“What?” Meredith said.

Cristina shrugged. “He's still in one piece,” she said. “And he rode the bike. He was grinning like an idiot when I dropped him off in the end.”

“Why are you telling me this?” Meredith said.

“You've been pestering me all night,” Cristina said. “And I thought it might be relevant.”

Meredith sighed. Relevant how, exactly? She rubbed her eyes. She was too tired to think about this right now. Too tired for anything. If she ever found Derek, she imagined she might faint on him. Or vomit. Or... just... She blinked away the fuzzy spots her rubbing had caused. Her eyes burned.

“Can we get out of here?” Meredith said. “I need fresh air.”

Cristina nodded. Meredith wiped her eyes once more, and they exited the stuffy bathroom into the warm, energy-charged air of the outside bar. The noise made her ears tingle. She didn't head back to the bar, where she saw Lexie and Alex and Mark chatting together. She went straight outside into the dark, fresh air, which soothed her sick stomach. Cars swooshed back and forth on the road by the bar. A beige sedan idled by the curb, its tailpipe sending curly tendrils of exhaust into the chilly air.

“It's kind of amazing how much you upchuck,” Alex commented as he caught up outside.

“Thanks,” Meredith said, her voice dull.

“I really didn't think you ate that much,” he said.
“I don’t,” Meredith replied. “Courtesy of the barfing.”

“Still—”

“Alex?” Meredith said, interrupting.

His head cocked to the side as he peered at her. “Yeah?”

“Shut up,” she said tiredly, and he did.

Lexie and Mark joined Meredith on her left. They formed a line on the sidewalk.

“Well, now what?” Lexie said.

“We were discussing a road trip,” Alex said.

“A road trip that I vetoed,” Meredith said. The idea of driving for over an hour to get to Derek's land, only to discover she'd guessed wrong... Her head throbbed just thinking about it.

A quiet honk drew her gaze to the left. Meredith blinked against the glare of the headlights. Maybe, somebody needed directions. She didn't feel like giving anybody directions. Or talking at all. But the good Samaritan in her veins wouldn't let her leave somebody stranded. She sidestepped and peered into the car.

Chief Webber peered back from behind the steering wheel. The window rolled down, and a blast of warm air laved her face.

“Well?” Chief said. “Hop in.”

“Hop in?” Meredith said.

Chief nodded. “Into the car,” he said reasonably.

“You need a ride, don't you?”

“You do?” she said.

Chief nodded. “To Derek's land.”

Her head spun. Derek had gotten Chief Webber to play chauffeur for this? He'd... Was he really at the cliff like everybody insisted?

_I told you I wanted to make new memories there with you_, McPhantom said. _With you. Please, go._

“You owe us details when you get back,” Lexie said softly beside her.

“What if it's more sex?” Alex interjected.

Lexie shook her head. “Not those details.”

“Yes,” Cristina said. “Spare us the McSex illustrations.”

A looming shadow stepped in front of Meredith while her tired brain failed to process. Mark. He reached for the rear door handle and yanked. The cabin light in the car popped on, bathing the inside of the vehicle in dim light. A warm, cushy leather seat revealed itself. For a moment, all thoughts of Derek and the scavenger hunt aside, Meredith saw “chair” and wanted to sit. That was the only complete thought that entered her head until Mark squeezed her shoulder and rubbed her arm. Just like Derek when he wanted to make her feel better.

“I think you should go,” Mark said, eyes twinkling.

She swallowed. “He's really there?”

“Really there,” Mark said, nodding.

“This is the last one?”

Mark smiled. “Last one.”

“And you knew all along,” Meredith said.

“In case you got stuck,” Mark said.

“Stuck?” Meredith said. “On his crappy poems?”

“He's a doctor, Jim,” Mark said. “Not a poet.”

“You did not just Star Trek me,” Meredith said.

“Why don't you go see what he has in mind?” Mark said. He handed her the final envelope with the card neatly tucked inside. She hadn't even realized she'd dropped it on her mad dash to the bathroom, courtesy of the mad dashing.

“But—” Meredith said as her fingers closed instinctively around the envelope.

“Group vote!” Lexie said, clapping her hands. “Who thinks Meredith should go see what Derek has in mind?”

As if there needed to be a vote. The seat called to Meredith like a siren. She inched forward.

Everybody raised their hands around her. Including the Chief.

Sit down, Meredith, said McPhantom. Relax. It's okay. No Jaws. I rode a motorcycle, you know.

“The majority has spoken,” Lexie said definitively.

I'll be with you soon, he said.

Her Derek.

Maybe.

Yes.

“But I'm still in my dirty scrubs, I look like a scarecrow, and I feel like crap,” Meredith said. To him. Them. No one.

“I think he gets the potential conditions of your arrival,” Mark said.

Lexie gave her a little push. “Go on, Mere,” her half-sister said. “Let me live vicariously. Please?”

Meredith collapsed into the back seat with a sigh. Her lab coat slid across the leather. She pulled her seatbelt over her shoulder and across her lap. The door slammed shut beside her, and the cabin light winked out. She frowned at the Chief, who sat up front at the steering wheel, diagonal from her.

“I feel like Miss Daisy or something,” Meredith grumbled.

“I don't think Miss Daisy had as much awesome sex in inappropriate places,” Alex said, leaning against the open window.

The Chief cleared his throat.

Alex shrugged.

“Well then,” Chief said.

Cristina turned to Mark as the Chief rolled up his window. “Hey, can I get in on your deviated septum?” was the last thing Meredith heard from the outside world, and then everything collapsed into a relaxing hush. Everybody waved at her until they disappeared around the corner as the car moved, and then she was alone with Chief Webber. Meredith could barely resist the urge to close her eyes and let herself finally, for once in the past five months, be taken care of. The Chief was more of a father to her than Thatcher had ever been.

“Shall we?” Chief said, looking into the rear-view mirror at her.

“I guess,” Meredith said. She closed her eyes. “Do you know what Derek has planned?”

“I'm supposed to drive you to his land,” the Chief said.

“And that's it?” Meredith said.

“That's it,” the Chief replied.

“You don't even have a teensy tiny hint?” Meredith said.

Chief shook his head. “Not one.”

“Damn it,” Meredith said. She sighed as she felt the car rumble and move into the night, leaving her friends behind. She cradled her stomach in her arms. At least the Chief's car didn't smell. It was the first not-smelly place she'd been since she'd gotten to work, and she breathed deeply. Her body ached, and her brain felt like cotton, but at least she was sitting, and that was simply...

Nirvana.

The air burst in a warm rush around her as Chief fiddled with the blowers. “Comfy?”

“You've clearly never been pregnant,” Meredith grumbled.

Silence became static became smooth jazz. “Is this good?” Chief said.

Meredith glanced through her eyelashes in him. He had his hand on the radio dial. She didn't want music at all, or conversing in general, but he was trying hard, and he was taking about three hours out of his night to drive out to Derek's and back. “I guess,” she said.

“There's water in the cooler in the back seat if you're thirsty.”

“Chief?” she said, sitting up. She rubbed her eyes. “I'm really not Miss Daisy.”
“Sorry,” he rushed to say. “I was playing roles.”

“Role-playing,” Meredith said.

He nodded. “Yes.”

“No, I mean...” She shook her head. The car pulled up to a stop light she didn't recognize in the dark. “Never mind.”

Silence stretched. The car turned right.

“I uh...” He cleared his throat. “I'm proud of you.”

“Proud...” Meredith blinked. “What?”

“The way you've been holding things together,” he said. The car sliced through the darkness. “With work, and with Derek, and with the baby. I never could manage that with Adele, even without a baby.”

“Oh.” She didn't know what to say to that. She settled on an awkward, “Thanks.”

More silence.

“Derek seems to be doing better,” Chief said after a long while.

Meredith frowned. She wasn't sure how much he knew. How much Derek had told him.

“Um. He is,” she decided on saying.

More silence. More darkness. She began to wonder how wise this had been, subjecting herself to over an hour of being an awkward fake-daughter, no matter how comfortable the seat, no matter the prospect of seeing Derek at the end of this.

“Have you picked a name?” Chief said, oblivious to her concerns.

“We've talked about it a little,” Meredith said, unable to stop a hesitant smile. “Anne was the last thing we agreed on. For a girl.”

“Is it a girl?” Chief said.

Meredith rubbed her lower abdomen, staring down at herself. “I think so, but we don't know, yet. First appointment is tomorrow.”

“You should drink lots,” Chief said.

Meredith blinked. “Um.”

“Water. Drink lots of water.” His fingers squeaked against the steering wheel as he wrung it, and he stared straight ahead at the dark road. “Before your appointment. I heard they need your... that to see... so they can see... so it's better.” He stumbled all over his attempt to avoid mentioning specific parts of her anatomy, such as bladder or uterus. A full bladder meant a good picture of her uterus. He finally settled on, “If you're full down there, the picture is better. I think.”

“Thanks,” Meredith said as a soft, wry grin snuck up on her. “I'll keep that in mind.”

The Chief seemed to run out of things to say, then. Her exhaustion, the soft thrum of the engine, the darkness, and the intervening verbal silence joined forces. She closed her eyes again.

The night became a labyrinth of dreams.

_Meredith realized she'd gotten used to minor, habitual jealousy whenever she stepped across the threshold of her house and once again found Derek absent despite his SUV parked outside. When he didn't come to greet her, it usually meant he was sleeping, which was what she'd wanted to be doing for the last several hours. Pregnancy didn't mix well with residency. The long shifts were slowly killing her, and she wasn't even showing yet._

_Lexie and Alex were both still working._

“Hello?” Meredith called quietly enough that it wouldn’t carry upstairs through a closed door as she set her purse down on the table by the door. Jealousy aside, he did need the sleep. Which frustrated her a little. She felt a bit like a bad person for being jealous of something he needed, and feeling like a bad person made her grumpy. Well, grumpier.

“In here,” Derek called, and, pleasantly surprised, she followed his voice to the right. To his office.

_He sat in the big leather recliner in the corner of his office next to a floor lamp, wrapped in an orange thermal blanket. Samantha slept on the floor by his feet. He held a long, brownish-greenish box that looked like it’d been built for cataloging index cards or something, and it rested cupped in its larger lid. A long line of cards – photos, she realized as she moved closer – filled the box’s innards._

“You're still up,” she said as she glanced at the wall clock, which read 11:00 PM. She'd had a long shift.

_He looked up from his bounty and stared at her with half-lidded eyes that spoke of encroaching lethargy. A lazy smile stretched across his face._

“I wanted to see you before I went to bed,” he said, his warm, affectionate expression so infectious she found herself relaxing just by looking at him.

_She loved it when he smiled like that. She'd missed it a lot until recently, when he'd started taking the Paxil. She'd first started noticing the smiles returning on their vacation to the lake two weeks before. His burgeoning good cheer was difficult to get used to again, and still very hard to trust, given his rampant mood swings._

_Still..._

_Just seeing you makes me happy, said his gaze._

_Maybe it was the soft lamplight giving him an extra touch of... whatever had been missing._

_He looked..._

_He just looked better._

_No dark circles hugged the skin underneath his eyes. No strange tension held him stiff and alert for danger. He didn’t fidget or tremble. His pallor was a rich, ripe peach color, rather than chalk from fear or nerves._

“You look so good,” she blurted before she had a chance to rein herself in.
She didn’t want to jinx it. That was the last thing she wanted. But the way the world went these days, the way he went with his dizzying yo-yos from one extreme to the next, happy one moment, freaking out the next, or having some new crisis, saying anything could jinx it. Would jinx it. She thought of their vacation to Lake Cushman, when he’d been fine in the car, and then ferociously staving off a panic attack a few minutes later because he’d heard a twig snap in the dark outside. Her fingers clenched. Anything could set him off, really. Worse, though, was the fact that she couldn’t predict what would or wouldn’t.

If he noticed her sudden trepidation, he didn’t speak of it. His smile narrowed into something sly.

“I’m working the new blanket fashion,” he said. “Tell me, is orange my color?”

She giggled, and her bad mood faded somewhat. “You’re such a goof.”

A month ago, he wouldn’t have made a joke. A month ago, he would have taken that and turned it into moping over the fact that he’d looked bad before, if she was noticing he looked good, now.

He winked. “Does it pop? Or should I go with blue next time?”

She regarded him for a moment, hardly able to keep a straight face. The burnt orange color of the blanket was a bit of a clashing disaster with his maroon t-shirt. He could make a lot of things look good, but that wasn’t one of them.

“Always go with blue,” she said.

The thermal blanket rustled as he shifted in the chair, set the photo box on the end table, and motioned her closer. She took his invitation and collapsed into his warm embrace. Her lower body slid into the gap he made between his hip and the arm of the chair. It was a tight fit, but they did fit nonetheless. The ghastly thermal blanket wrapped around her, and then he cradled her in her arms. She pressed her ear against the soft cotton of his t-shirt, sighing, and pressed her nose against the blanket. She felt a bit like a burrito. He kissed her. But a very loved burrito, at least.

“How are you?” he said.

“I’m sorry this is so rough for you.”

“I’d say it’s not your fault, but...” She grinned tiredly. “It kind of is.”

He snickered, and he kissed her, but he didn’t argue. Samantha, mid-dream, moaned and rolled over, displaying her russet-colored underbelly to the ceiling. Derek squeezed Meredith’s shoulder and rubbed her arm lengthwise. She couldn’t help but relax further.

“Can I get you anything?” he said. “Pancakes? Pickles? Pickles and pancakes?”

She laughed. “Just stay,” she said, drifting. “S’nice.”

“Okay,” he said.

Silence stretched, and she listened to the slow rasp of his warm hand sliding along her arm. This was unreal. She’d missed it...

Minutes passed. Samantha snored a little, but Meredith focused on Derek’s heartbeat through his chest wall, and she got lost in that. The thump of his heart was slow and healthy and soothing, caught in the deep rush of his breathing. Her fingers scrunched up some of his shirt, and she inhaled, lost in the quiet warmth, listening to him be alive.

“What were you looking at when I walked in?” she murmured sleepily against him.

“I found a picture of my dad for you,” he said. Though he spoke quietly, with her ear to his chest, he sounded booming. “I knew I had one somewhere. I found it in the closet in here.”

She snapped awake from his hypnotic soothing and stared at him. He didn't touch the subject of his dad without prodding, and usually when he did, the discussion was rife with scary memories of watching a gruesome murder. Just the mention of his dad lately was enough to send him down the rabbit hole of some bad memory, and she'd learned to stay far, far away. Except... Stark blue stared back at her without a hint of moping, wallowing, or otherwise negativity.

He sure didn't seem upset...

“What prompted that?” she said, unable to hold back suspicion from her tone.

He shrugged, and if he heard her concern, he didn't seem to pay it any mind. “You asked what he looked like a while ago. I was just thinking about it today and thought you might like to see a picture.”

“You were just thinking about it,” she said flatly. She couldn't hold back disbelief. She just couldn't.

“Yeah,” he said.

“Why were you 'just thinking about it’?”

He shrugged. “I saw one of the neighbors out walking with his kids. It made me think of Dad. That's all.”

Her eyes narrowed. “That's all?”

His happy look began to crack around the edges. Tension washed into her frame like the crash of a wave. This was it. The part where he would freak out.

Except he didn't. He didn't freak out.

“Meredith,” he said, the word soft, “I'm really okay right now.”

“But—”

“Did you want to see the picture?” he said, interrupting her before she had a chance to spiral further into worries and doubts.

“I do,” she said. “I mean I do,” she said more forcefully. She sat up and brushed scraggles of hair out of her face. “I'm sorry.”

His hand squeezed around her shoulder, firm, reassuring. He reached for the picture box and drew it into their laps. He pulled out the first photograph from the entire stack, several hundred photos in all. The photo was sepia-toned. Slightly faded.

Meredith gasped. She was looking at a younger Derek. Other than the straight nose and a slightly fuller face, she could have sworn it.
“He does look like you,” she exclaimed as she took the picture from his hand and leaned closer to inspect it.

Michael Shepherd had a killer smile. Just like Derek’s. He stood with his foot propped against the shiny bumper of some old car. Meredith didn’t know enough about cars to identify the vehicle, but the way he preened for the camera, she imagined it might be a sports car of some sort. An old Mustang or something. Who knew? His dark hair was cropped short, but she could identify enough wave to it that she imagined it would curl explosively just like Derek’s if it were longer.

“What’s he doing in this picture?” Meredith said.

Derek looked at it. His expression grew distant. “I don’t know. I think that was from before I was born.”

“He liked this car a lot,” Meredith said.

“He didn’t have it when I was growing up,” Derek said. “At least not that I remember.”

Meredith glanced at him. “You should ask your mom. I bet she’d know.”

“Maybe, when she visits for the wedding,” Derek said.

Meredith sighed and leaned against him. She held the picture up to the light, above them, and she stared. Her heart squeezed, just over the fact that he’d dug it out for her. That he was sharing it with her. Despite all the badness it could have roiled up.

“I wish I remembered more,” he said, musing. “It’s just been so long.”

She splayed a palm against his stomach and rubbed up to his chest and back down to his navel. He shifted, and he held her closer. “Tell me something you haven’t told me about him,” she said.

“He took me to see the Yankees play every year on my birthday starting when I was ten.”

“So, you’re a Yankees fan,” Meredith said. “I was trying to figure it out.”

He grinned. “Yes. I remember sitting behind the dugout. Me and Mark and Dad. Dad would buy us cotton candy and hotdogs and Mom would hate it when we got home because we’d be hyper.”

She touched the picture box with her fingertips. It was old and worn, and in the soft lamplight, seemed an odd between of brown and green. She imagined it might have been vibrant green years ago, and the color had faded over time and heavy use.

“Can I look at the rest of these?” Meredith said, her tone soft, almost reverent, at being presented with such a thorough treasure trove of memories. He answered questions when she asked, but this was like having an open book, waiting to be read. No questions were necessary when there were so many answers sitting right there.

“Sure,” he said with a small nod.

She started at the back and pulled a small section of photographs loose from the stack.

For a brief moment, unexpected surprise overruled all else. Addison. In her wedding gown. A slender white thing with lace and stuff Meredith wouldn’t be caught dead wearing. Ever. Except when Izzie had forced her, anyway. He kept pictures of Addison. For a moment, Meredith didn’t know what to say.
“I’m sorry,” he said quickly, bristling, as if he’d read her mind. “I forgot those were in there.”

But she shook her head. He was alive. Alive and hers. He’d lived over eleven years of his life with another woman. Divorcing Addison didn’t mean he wanted to obliterate her existence. He’d loved her once. Of course, he would keep pictures. It wasn’t remotely fair to expect him not to.

“I’m okay,” she said with a sincere smile.

Derek raised no further protest. With his tacit approval, even with Addison staring her in the face, she didn’t feel like she was intruding. She kept looking.

She skipped through the wedding photos, past Addison, and then Derek and Addison, and other photos of people she didn’t recognize at all – probably Addison’s family – until she found Derek smiling back at her, removed from Addison’s orbit. He and Mark stood side by side in black tuxes and snappy-looking maroon cummerbunds. They stood on the steps of a church she didn’t recognize. She grinned, remembering the sight of him in his morning coat, courtesy of Izzie’s wedding planning. Derek really could work a suit like a model, even though he didn’t like them.

“Oh, you looked pretty dapper or whatever,” she said, as she flicked the edge of the photo with her thumb. “So did Mark.”

Derek didn’t speak. She leaned against his warm body, and she kissed him on the side of the cheek. His bewildered expression didn’t leave him. Like he didn’t know what to do with this Meredith, who felt secure enough to be staring at his old photos of a wedding to another woman without jealousy or feelings of inadequacy.

It’d all come together for her recently. On the way home from the hospital after he’d been shot. Human life was so freaking ephemeral. His life was ephemeral. She didn’t want to waste what she had with him or ignore part of his history. Not anymore. Never again. If she ignored eleven years of his life, she would be ignoring a lot of him, and she wanted the whole package.

“I love you,” she said.

He looked at her. He looked like he wanted to say a thousand things right then, but couldn’t find the presence of mind to separate his babbling thoughts and create verbal coherence. “You know I love you, too,” he said, his voice thick with emotion.

She nodded. “I do.”

Mental disease or no, that was one thing he’d always done well. Let her know of his adoration. All the time.

She settled into his warm arms, sighing. She put the wedding photos back into the box with care, and she looked through the rest of the photos in front of them. There were pictures of his mother. His aunts and uncles. His sisters. His nieces. His nephews. His grandparents. A whole buffet of his extended family. A few more of Addison. And Mark. Derek patiently stepped her through the whole pile, until it got to the point that all she had to do was hold up a photo for him, and he would enter into a narrative to explain who was in the photo, where it’d been taken, and what was going on in it.

When she reached the end, she felt both sated and disappointed. Sated that she’d learned so much. Disappointed that there wasn’t more. She set the box on the end table, and then she kissed him, and he kissed her, and the dog on the floor continued to snore. He held her close, and a lump formed in her throat. Maybe, he really was getting better. Really, really, if he could go through three-hundred photos of his past life and be fine about it.

“We should take more photos,” he said as he stared into space.

“Why?” she said.

They'd never been much for smiling for cameras. Or, maybe, that was her fault. She wasn't Queen Polaroid or anything. Why create memories of things she didn't want to remember? Except lately, that hadn't been as true. She'd been happier. Since she'd gotten her job at Seattle Grace and found him and Cristina and everybody else.

“They're nice to have,” he said. “I wish I had more of Dad.” He looked at her starkly. “You should have at least one of me. Just in case.”

She frowned, looking back at him. He still seemed fine. Maybe, a little morbid. But... reflective. Reflective was good. Wasn't it? It meant he'd started processing things without a heaping portion of terror. He'd started to assimilate what had happened to him in a healthy way. Right?

For some reason, telling herself what he'd said was good didn't quite make her believe it. The subject matter was too freaking dicey, and with him... she just didn't know for sure if he couldn't do dicey until he couldn't do it. She swallowed, wishing she had Dr. Wyatt coaching her over her shoulder.

“I'd like one of you,” he said softly.

She swallowed. “I'm not photogenic.”

“You're beautiful,” he said. “Anytime, anywhere, anyplace. In any lighting.”

She grinned cautiously. “Smooth,” she said.

He met her grin with one of his own, and she relaxed. Skirting around morbidity, and still smiling. That had to be good. Despite her niggling doubts, she couldn't help but acknowledge that.

“We'll get pictures at city hall,” she said. “For our not-wedding wedding.”

He kissed her. “Okay,” he said.

And that was that. It didn't seem like it should be that, but it was. She stayed in his arms for a long while, cuddling. Well past bedtime. He seemed better today, but she couldn't help but think of storm clouds, looming black and ominous on the horizon, rumbling with distant thunder. He seemed better today, but she wasn't willing to believe it would last until tomorrow. He seemed better today, and she took comfort in that while she could.

It wasn't perfect, because she knew what could happen. What would happen, eventually, when he had a bad morning or something.

But it was better than nothing.

The world shifted, and dreams of Derek's arms wrapped around her as they cuddled in his recliner became a seatbelt stretched across her lap and shoulder. She woke up with her face pasted against the cold glass of the window. Gravel crunched under the tires of the car. Pocks and pits in the road made them jounce and bounce back and forth on the car's shocks. Pitch black blanketed the outside world, though she thought she saw the blur of bushes. Or trees. Some type of plant life.
She blinked. The last comforts of her wonderful dream dispersed, leaving her wanting. Needing.

She needed Derek. More than anything.

But despite that positive swell in her heart, the negative swirled in her gut. She had no idea what she would say to him. Or how this would go. Somewhere between the first clue and the last one, she'd found her path on the edge of a razor, and she felt like she was a hair's width away from slipping off into... something. She didn't know what.

Something bad, a voice whispered. You can't stuff it all in anymore.

“Where are we?” Meredith said, trying not to sound too desperate or anxious as she shoved her tumultuous thoughts away. With sleep still raspy in her throat, she sounded a bit like she'd just overcome a cold. She swallowed and blinked as she wiped away the drool that had collected on her lip. She surreptitiously wiped the spit spot off the upholstery with the arm of her lab coat. The thing was scuzzy and stained, anyway. Drool wouldn't matter.

“Almost there,” Chief Webber said over the rumble of earth underneath them.

True to his word, the bleak black tunnel opened up as the overhanging eves of some-type-of-plant became empty space, and she recognized the clearing and the last stretch of driveway toward Derek's trailer. A blanket of stars speckled the sky overhead as though someone had scattered chips of glass on black pavement. What caught her attention, though, wasn't that or the curving sliver of silver moon hanging overhead. She'd been to Derek's land enough that the amazing natural lights, this far removed from the city's light pollution, didn't catch her eye unless she had a mind to stargaze, and she didn't tonight.

There was something wrong ahead. Or, well, not wrong. New. Strange. A rainbow of color made a bright spot on the distant horizon. Reds, greens, blues, yellows, all compacted into a nuclear pinprick of brilliance.

She squinted at it. What on earth was that?

A UFO was her first wild thought. A UFO had landed on the cliff. The universe knew she needed Derek soon – now! now, now, now – and so it'd sent a UFO to abduct him. She'd never finish the freaking scavenger hunt, and she'd never find Derek, and she'd be all alone, hopeless, abandoned, while Derek would suffer life as a lab rat on the planet Shazbot or whatever.

She shook her head. Exhaustion made her brain do funny, illogical, anxious things. She searched her mind for a more terrestrial explanation, but her tired neurons were running on empty, and she couldn't think of anything. More thoughts made her think she might break her brain, anyway.

She rubbed the bridge of her nose.

Derek's trailer slid past in the murky darkness on the left, and she tensed. Would he be there? No, she thought, not with his recently developed aversion to it. He'd be somewhere else on the land. Maybe, by the lake next to a roaring campfire, or... Her gaze snapped back to the trailer, and she made an anxious appraisal of the hulking vehicle anyway. The windows were dark, and there was no telltale black SUV parked out front.

Okay, then.

She swallowed against the lump in her throat as she thought of the last time she'd been here. The day had been idyllic, weather-wise, but Derek had been sick, and enduring the bumpy gravel drive of the hill had hurt him. Badly. He hadn't been able to enjoy the lake. He'd barely been able to
The car kept moving past the trailer, and the nuclear pinprick she’d spotted on the horizon became a bigger dot became a small box. The gravel underneath them became a smooth, paved road that hadn't been there before. Why was there a random paved road on Derek's land? Where had that come from?

They couldn't have been going more than five or ten miles an hour as they crept along. She unlatched the seatbelt and slid across the warm leather to the center of the seat. She leaned forward, staring through the front windshield as the Chief continued down the narrow black road.

Her breaths shortened as the bright thing got even bigger, becoming a hefty-sized landmark, and the colors separated into distinct points of light. Her fingers clenched as her thoughts worked through molasses. That was not a UFO. She could have kicked herself for not thinking of it sooner, but... Neurons. Limping, tired souls, they were.

“When,” was all she managed, her voice barely escaping her throat. “When... when.”

The car rolled to a stop, and all she could do was gape. The car's engine idled for a moment, and then the Chief turned his key in the ignition. Silence gripped her as the engine cut off.

“That looks really classy,” said Chief Webber.

“And...” Meredith swallowed. “Done.”

The house.

Her and Derek's house.

Their house.

The one that had been a pile of plywood back in June when Derek had been so sick.

At the end of a curving sidewalk, next to a closed, three car garage, two stories of cheerful red brick loomed. Black shutters hugged each of the nine front windows, five across the top floor, and four across the bottom, divided by the door, which had a shiny brass knocker. Something hung from the doorknob, and a tiny white square had been stuck to the door next to the knocker. Another ferryboat card in an envelope?

And there were lights. Red and green and blue and yellow. Christmas lights, though it wasn't Christmas. Wasn't even close. But did it matter? The lights crept up the gutter spouts. They hung from the gutter like colored icicles. Smaller sets wrapped over the doorway and the garage and framed each window with bright color.

The metaphorical razor edge underneath her seemed to shake, and she almost tripped into the abyss. Her chest squeezed like it would crush her. She inhaled and exhaled, but it didn't help the unsettled mix of euphoria and swirling... bad things. But this wasn't bad. This was... What was wrong with her?

“When?” Meredith said once again. It was the only word she could find as she blinked at the spectacle.

Though the lights were beautiful, she couldn't help but notice that the house had no interior light. No warm yellow glow beyond the glass panes that told her Derek would be waiting inside, sipping hot chocolate by the fireplace or something. Trepidation coiled in her stomach underneath the frantic pounding of her heart as she looked back at the little white square on the door.

Please, please, please, not another freaking clue to solve.

She couldn't take anymore thinking tonight.

She couldn't take anymore anything tonight.

“Houses go up pretty fast,” the Chief said. “It's the guts that are complicated.”

“It's not done?” Meredith said.

Chief shook his head. “Not the inside.”

But if the inside wasn't done... where was Derek?

She squeezed her eyes shut, trying to refuse herself any worry until it was warranted, but she'd been deprived of him all day. Led down miles of hallways, chasing after memories and phantoms. Exhaustion clogged every pore. And then there was the whole thing with the razor edge. She was rubbed raw. Questions played bumper cars in her head. They all hopped out of her mouth, unbidden, the moment her brain unclogged.

“Is this really the end of the game? Where is Derek, exactly? Why is there another envelope taped on the door if it's the end? What's that other thing there on the doorknob? What's not done inside, yet? Are they going to pave the rest of the road so it's less horrible for recent gunshot victims? We need plants or something to decorate the front walk. I thought we had a landscaper hired. When did Derek do this? How did he do this? He can't climb ladders or reach—”

Fuzzy spots began to form in her vision. Endless words ceased as she sucked in a breath.

The leather seat squeaked as Chief Webber shifted to peer at her. His gaze twinkled with Christmas light colors, as though he were somehow amused by Meredith's litany. Did you even take a breath? Derek, grinning, asked her that all the time when she got on a babbling tear. Her heart throbbed in her ears like a nervous drumbeat.

“Derek would be a better person to ask,” the Chief said.

“But where is he?” Meredith snapped, at her wit's end.

“I guess you'll just have to see,” Chief said.

She couldn't take it anymore. She scrabbled across the seat, grabbed the door handle, pushed, and launched into the crisp, damp air like a rocket. She made it about twenty feet down the brick walkway before she halted, spun on the balls of her feet, and ran back to the car.

The Chief rolled down his window, a quizzical look on his face as she barreled toward him.

“Thank you very much for the ride,” she blurted.

He opened his mouth, but before he had a chance to respond, she whirled around again and galloped toward the door. The white square got bigger and bigger. This one wasn't an envelope or a card. Just a Post-it. She yanked open the storm door and pulled the note from the front door.

“Turn me on,” the Post-it said.

“I'd love to, Derek, but you're not here,” she snarked at nobody in particular as she grabbed the thing hanging from the doorknob. A plastic Safeway bag containing a...? Plastic crinkled as she rifled frantically through the bag. A flashlight rested within. A big one that probably took D batteries. She flicked the switch, turned the doorknob, and plowed over the threshold, her breath caught in her throat.

She sighed at what she saw, both irritated and touched all at once – how was that possible? – when she saw a trail of LED lanterns leading out of the dark maw of their unfinished foyer and up a wide staircase. She swept the beam of the flashlight across the big entryway. The floor wasn't done. It was supposed to be tiled, but it was solid white, and big stacks of 12x12 travertine tiles rested by the wall. An uncovered electrical outlet left a bump on the unpainted wall. A coat closet with no door installed formed a dark alcove on the right, but what she saw in the glow of her flashlight made a giant soccer ball lump form in her throat, so big she couldn't even swallow as her eyes pricked.

Derek's black wool trench coat hung from a single hanger on the unpainted dowel rod, and his black Nike duffel bag rested on the floor. Some other things rested in a pile. Boxes. Empty boxes of Christmas lights, she realized, among other miscellaneous refuse.

“Derek?” she called into the darkness. God, her voice sounded broken. She sounded broken.

Her voice echoed in the cold, still air.

No answer echoed back.

“You'd better freaking be here,” she said more softly, her voice cracking. “Please.”

She closed the door behind her and followed the trail of LED lanterns into the guts of the house, careful to watch her step. She gripped the wooden banister and climbed the staircase, wishing she could run and rush, but forcing herself to take her time as she picked her way through the lantern-dotted dark. She passed by the upstairs hallway bathroom which, when she flicked the flashlight beam into it, showed more unfinished tiles. What she hadn't expected to see, though, were the two towels that hung from the rack on the wall. Derek's razor, a bottle of aftershave, a tube of toothpaste, and a toothbrush rested on the lip of the sink.

The puzzle over why he'd chosen this bathroom instead of the one in the master bedroom, where the lanterns appeared to lead, became lost in a swell of joy and relief. He was here. He was here, he was here. She began to chant the words in her head.

His Cayenne must have been parked in the garage, hidden from plain view.

When she made it to the bedroom, she couldn't force herself to move slowly or pay attention to the setup inside. There was a mattress laid out. Some other things. Details flew past, and she ceased interpretation of anything inside the house.

What caught her eye was the wide set of open sliding glass doors at the end of the large room. The doors led out onto a big balcony. Next to a small wicker table with another glowing LED lantern, sat a scoop chair. In that scoop chair, wrapped in a fluffy down comforter, was Derek, staring at the scattered glass stars overhead as a cool breeze ruffled his hair.

She must have made noise. Her feet. Shuffling. Something.

He turned.

Their eyes met.
All of his features crinkled into a big, bright smile that gripped his eyes and turned up his lips, and her heart fell into jagged pieces, because she didn't think she'd seen him smile like that in forever plus eternity, and because it was him, finally him, and because all the stress of trying to find him when she needed him so badly imploded into nothing, and because of a thousand other bits and pieces of emotions and dreams and hopes and thoughts and worries jabbed into her like splinters.

“Hey,” he said, his voice soft and purring and happy and just... Her Derek. “You made it.”

The everything-falling-apart feeling of her heart overwhelmed her. What had been pricking, watering eyes became a blinding deluge. She dropped the flashlight. She ran to him through a blur of everything's-too-much tears, and she collapsed into his arms.

The fluffy comforter folded over her shaking limbs. It was already toasty, because he'd been heating it with his own skin. She pressed her nose against the black wool fuzz of his sweater, and she cried. Like a freak. All over him. In his arms. Dressed in a scuzzy, stained lab coat and dirty scrubs. After he'd planned a cheesy romantic evening all for her. And he'd smiled like Her Derek. Like he was better. Like he was...

“Shh,” he said against her ear, like Her Derek, and the brilliant overhead world of open sky and the beautiful below of world valley lights beyond the balcony shrunk to a pinprick and disappeared behind a wall of stupid, hormonal tears.

He was there. She was there. Nobody else was there.

“It's okay,” he said in that soft, lilting voice that forced all but the most hysterical people to believe him deep into the marrow of their bones. He was there, said his tone. Her Derek. It would be okay. Her knight in shining whatever.

She wanted to believe him. She wanted it so much. She could almost pretend he wasn't sick when he did things like this. When he was strong and supportive and calm. Except he was sick. He was.

And believing him would only make the moment this illusion shattered even worse if she didn't get a freaking grip. Except she'd waited so long for even a hint of this. And they had a house. And he'd planned, and...

“Shh,” he soothed.

The interior of the comforter smelled like his spicy aftershave. The nice stuff he wore when they did romantic things. The bottle had been sitting on the sink in the bathroom.

She couldn't. Stop. Crying.

“Meredith, what on earth is wrong?” he said, his tone concerned. Concerned for her. Not stuck in his own little world of hurt and stress and Gary Clark and his stupid gun. In that moment, Derek was all about her, and there was no Gary Clark.

She couldn't remember the last time he'd been all about her without the flash of gunfire haunting the back of his psyche.

Tears streaked down her face. She shook her head, unable to do much else as his firm hands ran up and down her arms in a soothing wash of sensation. “Nothing,” she managed. Her nose ran. Snot pooled. On his freaking sweater. She wiped her face and held her hands there, unwilling to look at him and see him staring at her with fathomless, concerned eyes that didn't care about snot. Only her.
Her Derek.

She couldn't do this. Her chest quivered, and she fell apart all over again.

“Meredith...” he said.

She scrunched some of his sweater in her fingertips. “I can't find the shark.”

Silence pressed against her. For a heartbeat. And then he kissed the top of her head. The comforter crinkled. He stopped with the soothing rubbing, and he pulled her tightly into his arms. Like he didn't really care about the fact that she'd been completely nonsensical. Only that what she'd said was important to her, and it'd obviously made her upset.

“They're usually not this far inland,” he said. Calm. Rational. Soothing.

Her lower lip quivered. She liked it. Liked the unyielding feeling of him wrapped around her like a shield from the world. She hated that she liked it so much. Hated how much she wanted to believe that she would come out of this in one piece. That she wouldn't end up being slowly digested in the stomach of a giant Stephen Spielberg nightmare.

“You decorated our house, which is kind of done but not really,” she said. Babbled. And he listened. “And you wrote crappy poems. And planned a romantic game for me. And you're here. And smiling. And you look perfect. And I can't find the shark. Where's the freaking shark, Derek?”

“Mere, I...” He sighed, and she looked up at him. Confusion. Slathered all across his face like shaving cream or something. He frowned. “I want to help,” he said, “but isn't that all good?”

“No!” Meredith said without thinking as her fatigued restraint broke entirely. “It's horrible!”

He flinched like she'd slapped him. The movement was barely noticeable. She wouldn't have noticed at all, if he hadn't been wrapped around her, body to body as though they were one. He blinked and swallowed and looked away for a moment, like she'd hurt his feelings. She'd only meant the shark. Not the scavenger hunt. She hadn't meant to... Regret squeezed.

And that was when she slipped off the razor edge.

The pile of me, me, me, what about me? she'd shoved away for months bowled her over. God, she was so tired. And tired of worrying about everything she said and how he would take it, and everything that happened, and how he would take that. She stuck her foot in her mouth all the time, and it'd never been a problem before he'd gotten shot. Before he'd started lying, and he'd left her. He'd always just laughed, before.

“I'm sorry,” he said, his voice thick with... some emotion. Something bad. Something that inexplicably irritated her. “I thought it would be fun for you. I thought...”

His voice trailed away, leaving them with strained silence. The Jaws theme wouldn't stop playing in her head. He was upset. She'd hurt him. Knocked him out of his happy, shiny, fake Her Derek pattern.

There was a freaking shark. She only had to prove it.

“You sent me to the catwalk,” she snapped.

He looked like he didn't know what to do with that. At all. “I wanted to thank you...” he said, his tone helpless.
"I don't want your thanks," she said nastily. "I didn't want to be on the catwalk." She'd watched him get shot. And he'd nearly died. Right in front of her. And she'd— "I don't want to remember you nearly dying. I don't want it, Derek! Do you want to remember me in the water?"

She watched the metaphorical blade of her words slide under his ribs. His breaths shortened.

"I didn't mean it like that," he said. Barely said. He sounded sick. Like she felt. Sick. But she'd been rubbed raw, and only horrible, bad, I've-reached-critical-mass-on-suffering things seemed to want to leap out of her mouth.

She watched him, horrified and satisfied all at once. Because he wasn't fine. She'd been right. She'd been right all along, and—

He swallowed. He took a few shaky, slow breaths. Nodded resolutely. And then his grip around her tightened once more. He pulled her back into his arms.

"How can I help make it better?" he said, once more returning to the soft Her Derek lilt that usually calmed her down. Just a tiny quiver remained, enough to tell her he was expending gargantuan effort to do what she couldn't seem to tonight. To stuff all the bad things back inside. Her heart clenched, and then everything felt like it was dropping out from underneath her. "I wanted this night to be for you," he continued with a smile, "and I'd like to fix it if I can."

It was the last straw.

She clawed her way out of the comforter. A loose feather escaped into the breeze in the struggle and blew away. He grunted when she pushed on his sternum to get away from him, and a flash of pain spread across his face. Another thing she should regret. Wanted to regret. She hadn't meant to hurt him. Instead, the fire inside burned even brighter as she rose to her feet.

"Stop doing that," she said. "You've been doing it all week. Just stop it, Derek."

"Stop doing what, Mere?" he said, his look bewildered. He rubbed his chest, and he didn't get up. "Being you," she said. "You're acting like you again! All Derek-y and perfect, and I can't..."

She stood on the balcony, looking down at him, lost as the words died on her tongue.

She couldn't.

Couldn't hold it all in anymore.

Couldn't hold any of it in anymore.

"How am I supposed to act?" he said.

"Like..." She struggled to explain the jumble in her head. The shark. The part about razors. The edge she'd fallen from. She'd spilled her careful months of reticence all over the floor like she was bleeding from a mortal wound. Maybe, she was. Something had broken inside. "You're supposed to be sick."

He raised his eyebrows. "You... want me to be... sick..." he said, not even a question as he repeated her words, his tone dripping with confused, halting disbelief. He made it sound so freaking stupid when he said it like that.

She clenched her jaw. "I can't do this when you're not sick!" she said, stomping her foot for emphasis.

“Can't do what?”

She glared. “You,” she said, almost a hiss as hatred cracked her open from her vulnerable wound. “Your next bad day. Or your next crave-a-thon. Or the next time you need your perfect cheerleader to get you out of bed. I can't do it.” She blinked as tears crawled down her face. Her head was starting to hurt. “I need you to be sick so I can do it. I can't deal with half-and-half.”

“Oh,” was all he said. He swiped his hands over his eyes, and his gaze shifted to somewhere else. Not her. Not the mountains or the valley or the sky. Not anything. He sniffed, but he didn't say anything else, didn't move from the chair, and the silence stretched to the point that it became unbearable.

Sense caught up with her like a train, and the regret she'd shoved away earlier overwhelmed her. She'd really hurt his feelings. And she'd picked a freaking crap time to do it.

“God. I'm so sorry,” she blurted, shaking her head. Tears began to spill again in earnest. She wiped her face and turned away to face the dark, open valley full of twinkling fireflies below from all the houses. Everything blurred. Their view would be beautiful. Every night. They had a house. Her lower lip quivered and wouldn't stop. “I'm tired and full of stupid hormones. I shouldn't...”

A chilly wind ruffled her hair in the long silence that followed. She stopped panting and cried. Just cried. How had this night gone so horribly wrong?

Something scraped on the wood floor behind her. She heard his clipped breath of pain that told her sitting in the scoop chair might have been comfy, but getting out of it wasn't. Slow, soft footsteps hit the floor behind her. His hands materialized on the railing beside her, and he watched the valley view with a dark, upset glower and red eyes.

She tensed, expecting some sort of snapping retort. One of Derek-y Derek's less dreamy qualities was his temper. Fighting with him was a lesson in masochism. He went for the throat with horrible remarks that were meant to kill a discussion, not just wound the recipient. That, or he turned things into a gloomy, judge-y superiority session where she left the argument feeling like crap, even though he didn't really yell. She felt too tired for either Derek-y option tonight.

“It's okay to be angry at me,” he said softly.

He blinked and swiped his hands over his face again. The chilly breeze made his hair flutter in the darkness. No snapping. No judging. No anything. Just quiet acceptance.

“I don't want to be angry at you,” she said, frustrated.

“That doesn't mean you're not,” he said. He shook his head as he stared into the valley. “I've walked all over your feelings with my own.”

She couldn't even counter him. Couldn't tell him he was wrong. Because he had. He'd been doing that for months. He'd treated her like crap. Yelling and snapping whenever he got frustrated. Being too stubborn and proud to ask for help when he needed it, to the point that it made her teeth hurt. Lying. Taking drugs. She clenched her hands around the balcony railing. Her stomach roiled. These last few months had been abominable.

“I wanted to start doing things for you again,” Derek said, his voice thick with emotion. “I wanted to start fixing it.”
He'd shaved and dressed in a nice sweater and slacks. He would look handsome and perfect, were it not for the wrecked look on his face. He'd decorated their new house. He'd planned a romantic evening for them. The first time he'd really come out of his hurting-island shell in... forever. And they were fighting. And she felt sick. And tired. And horrible.

“What you did today with the crappy poems was really sweet,” she said, “You obviously spent a lot of time on it, and I shouldn't have—”

“Mere, please stop,” he said with a tired sigh, interrupting her. He met her eyes. His stare was onyx in the dim light of the lantern. His head tilted, and he didn't blink as he touched her face. His hand felt warm. Vibrant. His fingers slid back into her messy hair. “You've been so patient with me.”

She snorted. “You call this patient?”

“No,” he said, shaking his head. “I think I'd call you a saint, Mere.”

A wry laugh fell from her lips. “I don't think saints yell this much.”

He pulled his hand back, but he didn't look away. “I'm sorry I've made life so hellish. I'm sorry I've made stupid choices. I'm sorry I...” His voice cracked, and he shrugged. “Everything. I'm sorry.”

“Stop saying that,” she said.

He raised his eyebrows. “That I'm sorry?”

“Yes,” she said. “You say it all the time, but you're just—”

“I should have asked for help sooner. I made the wrong choice. I was selfish.”

This was the first time he'd ever said it so baldly. Ever owned up to where he'd gone wrong in the aftermath. Where he'd shifted from being a victim of misery to being the perpetrator of misery. They'd been existing. Ignoring his piling debt and stupidity to get through the now. She'd been stuck just getting through the now for... months, because she'd been so certain he wouldn't be able to deal with anything else. Except, now they had a house, and he'd decorated it. And he was wearing his romantic aftershave. And he'd planned a game for her. And...

“What the hell were you thinking?” she said.

He shook his head. His mouth opened, but it was as if he couldn't find the words to explain. Couldn't find anything anymore. He turned back to the endless, firefly view. His hands worried at the balcony railing. And then he shrugged.

“I wasn't thinking much of anything, Mere. That was the point.”

“Well, I needed you!” she snapped. “And you took all those freaking pills instead.”

“I know.”

“I was waiting and waiting for you, and you didn't show up,” she said.

“I know,” he said, the words low and miserable and regretting. “I know I didn't.”

The horrible deluge began again. Her insides squeezed, and she couldn't breathe as a waterfall covered the world. Her stomach hurt from all the crying. Her head hurt. She wiped her tired, achy, burning eyes. Her hands came away wet.
“Cristina saved your life. And I saved your life. And all you did with the second chance was stupid fucking things.”

“I’m... I know.”

“You’ve been such an asshole to me,” she said.

He didn't say anything. He just stared. At the freaking valley. No judging. No Derek-y nasty retorts. No anything at all.

“You could have killed yourself. You really would have left me,” she yelled into the tense, crushing silence.

“I...” He had to stop. Take a breath. He inhaled thickly, shivery, like he was a sliver away from falling apart. He leaned against the railing, shoulders hunched, twelve inches away, his own face covered in a salty water slick that shimmered in the dim light. She watched him breathe for long, stretching seconds before he managed, so twisted with grief she barely heard it, “I wasn't thinking.”

“Well, I hate you,” Meredith said, her voice low and grating and raw. He flinched, and she hated him more. Hated him for making her feel like this. She rubbed the bridge of her nose. “I'm so tired, and I hate you. I hate you so much.”

And there it was. Everything. Out on the table. The whole big ugly clot of it.

Derek didn't speak. She wouldn't have heard it anyway.

For a long time, all she saw was a red blur. Heat licked her body like flames. The blood rushed in her ears, an endless stream of fury. She clenched the railing because if she didn't, she would kick something. Or throw something. Or scream. Oh, how she hated him.

Slowly, as the moments passed, and she came back to herself, she heard his and her breathing beyond the rush. She panted, recovering from her tantrum. He panted, too. Her head hurt. Her eyes burned with hot tears. She was exhausted.

She wiped her eyes. Swallowed.

And then she was just tired.

She felt him in profile, still standing beside her, close but not intruding in her space. He'd rested his elbows on the railing, and pressed his face into his hands. His body swayed with upset energy, but he didn't move from his spot beside her.

She blinked with confusion as everything caught up with her.

Derek ran. That's what he did. Sick Derek or Her Derek. Even when there wasn't a freaking shark. It was another one of his not-so-dreamy flaws. If there was a confrontation, he ran. Something he didn't like, he ran. He ran as a form of punishment. He ran because he was scared. He ran because he didn't have a clue how to handle things, or because he didn't want to know an answer. It didn't matter. He ran.

He was, in his own way, as bad as she was, or had been, but for different reasons.

He always ran.

“Why are you still here?” she said, the words low and cracking. She sniffed and turned to him tiredly.

He slid his face forward and peeked over the tips of his fingers at her. From his expression, she’d taken what jagged bits were left of him after her last outburst and eviscerated them. His eyes were red and wet.

Her lower lip quivered. She didn’t mean to push him out the door on his way out. She felt like crying all over again. Stupid foot in her stupid freaking mouth. “I mean, I...” She swallowed, and she turned away to look at the lights in the distant valley. “I don't even know what I mean.”

The silence stretched. The awful, twisted sound of his upset breathing stabbed her like knives. Her muscles began to hurt in time with the throb of her heart. She held herself too stiffly. She couldn't relax. Couldn't speak. She couldn't think of words anymore.

Maybe, he was waiting until he was in good enough shape to drive himself home. He couldn't drive while he was this upset.

That made sense.

She waited for him to collect himself and to leave. To punish her for her angry words and go, just like he always did. She wondered how she would get home if he drove off in his car and left her there. She didn’t have her purse or money or her keys. They were all in her locker back at work. She supposed she could call someone to pick her up. She still had her cell phone in her pocket.

Minutes and minutes passed, and his abandonment didn't happen.

He didn't move.

She wiped her runny nose with the back of her hand. “Why are you still here?” she repeated hoarsely. She sounded so confused she doubted he could misinterpret her meaning this time. She hoped he wouldn't.

He took a deep, shaky breath. “Because I don't want to go,” he said, his voice as raw as she felt.

She blinked. “You're not leaving.” Not a question. But... a question all the same.

“No, I'm not leaving.”

“But you're upset, and I...” She rubbed her eyes. “I said I hated you.”

He swiped his hands over his face. They shook like he'd been hooked to a live wire. He looked sick. Heartsick. PTSD sick. He’d been brilliantly happy and smiling before, but now he just looked sick.

She'd found her stupid shark. She didn't feel triumphant. Only horrible. And she couldn't even apologize. She hadn't lied about any of it.

He took a deep, shaky breath and turned to her. “You're upset because I was a jackass, and an idiot, and there's nothing happening right now that I don't deserve tenfold. I chose to take those pills, and that was wrong. I was wrong and selfish to do it, and I don't blame you for hating me.”

“You were,” she said. “You were wrong and selfish.”

He nodded. Took another breath. “I got shot, and I almost died, and I couldn't control any of that, and I followed it up with wrong choices that made it all worse.” His fingers tightened against the railing. “But I want to make good choices. I can control what I do right now. I can stay.”

“Derek...”

He shook his head. “No,” he said. “You can be mad at me, but I’m staying. I choose to stay.” He paused to take a choppy breath, and he looked her in the eye. “I pick you. I choose you. I love you. And I'm not moving. You can leave if you don't want to be near me right now, but that's your choice, and staying is mine.”

She stared at him. For a long time, that was all she could do.

“I don't want to leave,” she whispered.

His tense posture deflated with a relieved sigh she hadn't realized he'd been holding inside. He nodded at nothing in particular. He pulled a shaky hand through his hair, and then, as if he didn't know what else to do with them, he shoved his fists into his pockets.

“Well, then we're both staying,” he said, and then he turned back to the valley. Gave her space to do what she wanted. Or because he simply didn't know what else to say or do other than plant his feet.

The wind whistled, and all the rest was silence. It was too cold for crickets. Too late at night for birds. Too far away from the rest of civilization for traffic.

She felt empty. Bowled over. Emotionally bankrupt.

She stepped an inch closer. His gaze ticked to the side, tracking her movement, and then went back to the valley. She stared at his profile. The LED lantern gave his face a soft glow. Her heart squeezed. She baby-stepped closer.

Maybe, not bankrupt, she decided. She could make one last transaction.

She moved. Breached his personal space. Slid up against his shaking, warm body. Slipped one hand behind his back, the other in front of his chest, and she pressed her face into the softness of his sweater.

“I pick you, choose you, love you, too,” she said, and she leaned on her tiptoes to kiss him.

He blinked as their lips met. Made a surprised grunt that vibrated in the back of her throat. He tasted like the mint of his toothpaste. His clear befuddlement fell victim to sense as the moments passed. His hands slipped out of his pockets, and he pulled her against him and didn't let go.

“Post-it?” he rasped.

She nodded. “Yeah.”

He shuddered. “I'm here,” he said with a shaky, low voice. He pressed his nose against her hair and sighed. “I mean it, Meredith. I'm not all better. But I'm here, and I'm not leaving if I can choose it.”

She sniffed. Started crying in his arms again. He held her tighter. She reached. Ran her fingers through his hair. Touched his chin. His cheek. There was no stubble this time. No ventilator to avoid or EKG monitors to dodge or anything. He hadn't just been shot. He was vibrant. Alive. She ran her fingers over the cartilage of his ear, an echoed motion from the past. She felt the pulse at his neck. It throbbed underneath her fingertips.
Her Derek.

“Hi,” she said, barely able to keep her voice from breaking into a thousand pieces.

“I'm here,” he said.

She believed him.

“Oh, god, hi,” she said, sobbing all over again.

His arms tightened around her. As if that were possible.

“I love you,” he said, a murmur against her ear. His body was warm and solid against her, and she believed him. “I'm so sorry, Meredith.” Derek-y Derek. Her Derek. Hers. And she believed him to the marrow of her bones.

“I missed you,” she said.

He nodded. Blinked. Two fat tears rolled down his face. “I know.”

She squeezed him against her, so hard her arms hurt, like he was some sort of toothpaste tube and she had to get every last bit of him into her arms. He shook. Shock or nerves or an overwhelming roll of emotions... She could relate as a swell of elation crushed her like a freaking bug, and she could barely breathe.

“I missed you so much,” she said.

“I know.”

“Please, don't leave me again,” she said.

“I won't if I can choose it,” he said. “I promise.”

She nodded. “I forgive you.”

She took a deep breath and let it out. Her knees almost knocked. Her legs felt like jelly. He stepped backward, pulling her with him, and she stumbled in time with his shambling. They collapsed into the scoop chair in a spent heap, into the warmth of the down comforter. Her eyes burned, and he shook like an upset leaf.

“I'm not fine,” she said as she curled against him tiredly. “You almost died, and I lost a baby, and the last few months have sucked, and I'm pregnant, and I'm really, really not fine.”

“It's okay,” he said, the words shaky whisper. “Just let it out. I'm here.”

He was upset, but not broken, and she believed him. She believed every word. He rubbed her back through the bundle of down. Held her tightly. She settled in his arms. Pressed her ear against his chest and listened to the calming thump-thump, thump-thump, thump-thump that she'd fallen desperately in love with since he'd gotten shot. He kissed her.

She cried. He caught every last drop of her grief in his arms, and he was clearly upset, but not broken.

Sink or swim. He swam. Gasping and choking and flailing, but he swam.

Her Derek. Jaws and all.
She cried like a sniveling wreck in his arms, and she didn't feel guilty, and that was the most liberating gift he ever could have given her that night.

Her Derek.

Over the passing minutes, the emotional roller coaster arrived back in the station. The jets whooshed as it cooled on the tracks. She sighed, long and deep, and the tears stopped streaking down her face. They slowed to a trickle, and then they ceased, leaving her eyes sticky and red. He'd stilled. Relaxed. His arms had loosened around her torso. He was still there. Reassuring with his solid warmth. But she didn't feel like she wore him as a coat anymore. He was just him. Quietly him.

“We have a sort of house,” she said, her voice scratchy with the leftovers of grief. She cleared her throat.

“Mmm.”

She wiped her eyes and took a deep, slow breath. The spicy scent of him relaxed her. She looked up. The comforter crinkled with her movement. Derek rested against her, eyes closed, body relaxed. He'd calmed in the long stretch of silence they'd shared, and she wondered if he'd succumbed to sleep. Her Derek. He'd been there for her in the face of everything. But he was still sick, and, deserving or not, she'd put him through the ringer that night. He tended to collapse after escaping from stress.

“Are you asleep?” she whispered.

He jerked awake and blinked. His eyes still glassy with dreams, he said, “Mmm? No.”

She snickered. “Right.”

He ignored her playful jab. He still seemed too groggy to counter with a wink or twinkling eyes. Instead, he swallowed, and he said, “Can I get you anything?”

She shook her head. “You got me a sort of house. I think that's enough.”

That got her a halting smile, and her body warmed. He rubbed his eyes, and some of the vibrancy returned to his expression.

“How did you get me a sort of house?” she said. “You told me it wasn't going to be done by Columbus Day.”

“It's not going to be done by Columbus Day,” he said.

“But—”

He winked. “I never said there was no house. Only that it wouldn't be done.”

“You've been planning this since Lake Cushman?”

He kissed her ear. “No. A week. Since Cristina visited. I really only meant for the lights to be the surprise. I figured you knew we had a house. I only knew you hadn't seen it, yet.”

“How'd you do the lights?” she said. “When?”
He sighed. “Today while you were at work. Very slowly.”

“I like them,” she said.

His earlier grin widened. “Worth the pain and suffering, then.”

The way he seemed to be bouncing back from this screaming ordeal made her feel a bit rejuvenated. He'd gotten so much better. He really could take it. Really was there for her like he said. Everything she'd tried to spare him, she'd ended up dishing onto him in a heaping, dump-truck portion of all-at-once, and he was smiling, albeit tired, less than an hour later.

Her Derek.

Hers.

Her lower lip quivered, and her tired eyes pricked all over again. She sniffed and wiped it away.

She cleared her throat, breaking up the clot of emotion. “So, when do I get a tour?” she said.

“This is the balcony,” he offered helpfully, an evil smirk on his face.

She elbowed him in the ribs. “Thanks, I got that.”

“No problem,” he said.

Still. She'd been so emotionally tunnel-visioned before, she hadn't looked around much. She peered over the warm lip of the down comforter, past the blur of his shoulder and the edge of the scoop chair. He'd piled Safeway bags in the dark corner by the wall of the house, just beyond the reach of the lantern's glow, along with a contraption she didn't recognize in the darkness, and a microwave. A fat orange cord greeted the end of the microwave's white cord, and it spilled like a piece of spaghetti over the edge of the balcony. If she hadn't been so tired, she would have been tempted to get up. To peer over the edge of the railing and see what lay below, other than an endless drop into the valley.

“Why is there a microwave over there?” she said.

“I thought we could make s'mores for dinner. I jury-rigged the trailer's generator because the house doesn't have electricity yet.”

She blinked. Frowned. Pulled back from his body and looked at him. “You can't make s'mores in a microwave. It's against the laws of nature.”

He snorted. “Because microwaves are nature's gift to humanity.”

“Exactly!” she said. “A fire is nature-y. There has to be a fire.”

He raised his eyebrows. “Oh? Who says that?”

“Everybody does,” she said.

“I don't.”

“Well, you don't count,” she said. “You were a s'more virgin until I taught you.”

“A s'more virgin.”
“Well, I don't want to burn our house down before it's even done. I didn't even want to use the space heater. I only brought it up to prevent us from becoming human popsicles when it gets colder tonight.”

“What space heater?”

He pointed at the junk pile. At the contraption she'd spotted but hadn't recognized. “That space heater,” he said. “I dragged it here from my trailer.” He made an annoyed face at it. Like it had gotten heavier since the last time he'd luged it or something, or maybe he'd dropped it in the mud a few times by accident. But he didn't comment further, and she didn't feel the need to press him.

“Oh,” she said.

He turned to grin at her like he'd been plugged into a light socket or something. “So, can we break the laws of nature just this once?”

Her lip twitched. Though the very idea of consuming anything at this point made her stomach roil, his delighted excitement over the possibility of something so simple – graham crackers, marshmallows, chocolate – was contagious, particularly in light of the emotional low they were coming back from that night. She couldn't help but smile back at him.

“You can make some if you want,” she replied. “I'd love to watch.”

His kilowatt expression faded a little. “Just me?”

She sighed. “I haven't been able to keep anything down.”

His brow creased with concern. His hands slipped underneath the comforter to find her stomach. His hands were a shock of heat through her lab coat and scrubs. She relaxed into his arms as he rubbed her, soft and slow and soothing. “Nothing at all?”

She shook her head. “I don't feel very well today.”

He hugged her. “Can I do anything?”

She shook her head again. “I don't think so.”

“May I try?” he said, and she slumped in his arms.

She really didn't feel like doing much of anything, now that they'd found some emotional respite, other than maybe talking. Which sucked. If he had any romantic plans left despite being raked over the coals, her lack of participation would certainly sabotage every last one of them unless they only required her to sit there like a log, which... she doubted. Romance and non-participatory logs went together like silk and mud.

“Do I have to move?” she said.

“Nope,” he said. “But I need to set up first.”

She peered at him. “Set up?”

“I was going to do it later,” he said. “I had it planned.”

“You planned on me being a sick, pregnant bump on a log?” she said.
He laughed. “Tonight was for you. I was going to do all the work, anyway.”

“Really?” she said, intrigued.

“Really,” he said with a nod. “I drew a flow chart, you know.”

She snorted. “Did it include me freaking out?”

A shadow of a grin crossed his face, but he didn't answer as he shuffled underneath her. The comforter was flung away, and she shivered as he worked his way out from underneath her. He grunted getting out of the scoop chair, and she winced, watching him strain to do something that would have been easy for him before he'd gotten shot. She regretted pushing him so hard when she'd been trying to get away from him. He didn't comment on his difficulties, though. He stood, brushed off his slacks with his hands, and resettled the comforter over her body. She snuggled and closed her eyes.

His footsteps creaked on the balcony floor, like he tiptoed and didn't want to disturb her. He rifled through the pile in the corner. Plastic bags crinkled. Something thunked. He moved again. Then the glass door slid shut with a whisper.

She drifted. Moments slipped past her awareness like water.

“Mere,” he whispered what felt like nanoseconds later. He rubbed her shoulder through the blanket.

She squinted at him and rubbed her eyes.

“I'm going to pick you up,” he said.

She didn't have time to protest before his arms slipped underneath her body, and he lifted her from the chair. A soft groan breached his lips, and his face creased with stress lines, but she didn't have the heart to protest. He'd written crappy poems and lugged a space heater and decorated the house and clearly Had A Plan™.

He carried her inside the house, back into the bedroom. A soft murmur of sound drew her attention to the foot of the airbed. The orange extension cord trailed through the balcony door, crawled across the floor boards, and stopped at the space heater, which burgeoned with heat that made her relax and sigh. She hadn't realized how chilled she'd gotten until the chill had been taken away. He'd set up what looked like a yoga mat and a pillow on the floor next to several of his LED lanterns. More Safeway bags lined the wall by the huge window. Had he bought the entire grocery store?

“This is our bedroom,” he informed her.

She snorted. “Thanks, McTourGuide.”

He set her down. Her feet came to rest on the floor by the mat. Her scuzzy lab coat came away with a skillful brush of his hands, collar to shoulders to wrists. He kissed her bare neck. The warmth of his body and the warmth of the space heater laved her tense, tired muscles, and she resisted the urge to be swept away.

“Derek,” she said, swallowing. “Please, no sex. I feel like crap.”

“I'm sorry you feel like crap,” he said sympathetically. Like she hadn't just busted his plans to smithereens. “Would you lie on the mat?”
“Um,” she said, frowning. “Okay.”

She dropped to her knees.

“On your stomach,” he said, the words soft like a wave, and she found herself following his directions without much more thought. She was tired enough that lying down seemed idyllic anyway, though she thought, at this point, she might prefer the comfy-looking air mattress that rested a few feet away.

He knelt beside her. Something rustled. His dark sweater landed in a heap on the floor beside one of the softly glowing lanterns. She peered at him. He wore a white button down shirt beneath the sweater, cuffs unbuttoned and rolled up to his elbows. He smiled at her, and then he straddled her legs.

“Derek, what are you doing?” she said. “This seems kind of sexy.”

He smirked, but he didn't say anything. He reached into one of the Safeway bags that he'd pulled closer to the mat. The bag crinkled. The hollow pop of a plastic bottle opening broke the silence. The oily scent of lavender wafted against her nose. Her nostrils flickered.

“Massage oil?” she said.

“Stop asking so many questions,” he admonished her, though his eyes twinkled. He slipped his hands underneath the back of her shirt. Wet and warm spread across her skin by her waistband. He pressed his palms into her tense body, and he rubbed the curve of her spine from her waist to her shoulder blades.

“Oh,” she managed. Her head flopped against the soft pillow, and she let loose a sigh she hadn't even known she'd been holding prisoner. “That feels good.”

“Mmm,” was his only comment.

He pushed up her shirt, and she let him pull the stained garment over her head with a bit of shuffling. With an open canvas of skin, he had more room to work, and she slowly relaxed into a puddle of gooey organs and muscles on the mat. No bones. Nothing. He had nice hands. Perfect hands.

“Mere?” he said as he worked.

“Yeah?”

“Were my poems really that crappy?”

She laughed at the unexpected question. “Um. Maybe, only a little crappy.”

She felt the warmth of his smile. “Did you laugh?”

“Yeah,” she said. “I liked the one about the ineffectual fists.”

He chased tense, ugly knots out of her shoulders. Oil slicked her skin. Delicious friction warmed her sinew to sinew. “Tell me about it,” he said.

“Cristina, Alex, and Lexie were there when Mark gave me the first letter.”

“Oh?” he said.
“They all tagged along,” she said. “Even Mark. I felt like I had a peanut gallery chasing me through The Joy Of Sex or something.”

His hands stopped as he pondered that for a moment. “That wasn't... exactly how I'd planned it,” he said, his tone wry. Not exactly happy. Not unhappy, either.

“Well, I would hope not,” she said. She crinkled her nose. She'd been a little uncomfortable listening to Alex and Mark pick apart her sex life, among other things, but it wasn't the end of the world that they knew. She'd mostly enjoyed herself as Derek had pulled her through their history with his clues. Mostly. “You're lucky I'm not a prude or whatever.”

“I'll take event planner off my list of alternative careers, I guess,” he said.

She snorted, the barest hint of a chuckle. She turned her head so she could peer at him. He rested in that colorless spot in the corner of her eye. She couldn't see his eyes. His face. His hands resumed their work. Movement flickered in her peripheral vision.

Her naked breasts mashed into the mat as he touched her, palms sliding across her skin. Her eyelids drooped. The heady smell of lavender and the spice of him made her brain feel fuzzy. The soft shh, shh, shh of his hands was hypnotizing. Her body swayed as he applied pressure. He kneaded every worry away, if only for a few moments.

She sighed, relaxed.

“Still, I'm glad,” he said after a while.

“You're glad everybody knows we've had sex on the conference room table?”

The weight of his hands dug into her slightly, as though he lost his careful measure. Just for a moment. “Glad you spent time with your friends,” he corrected, the words cracking. “I don't want to keep you from them.”

She swallowed. Her eyes pricked again, and her throat felt full. She reached up to wipe her face. “Oh,” she said, her voice deep. Touched. And then she realized his hands had stopped moving.

She twisted onto her side, semi-trapped with him sitting over her legs.

His skin glowed in the soft lantern light. He watched her through his dark eyelashes. A dark, shamed expression had spread across his face. The uncapped bottle of massage oil rested by his knee. A soft, choppy breath bisected the air, and then he pushed a pair of long, slow exhalations out after. Like he'd barely dodged falling apart in that moment, under her scrutiny.

“Mere, I'm... still sick,” he said. As if he somehow thought she could have missed his shaky turmoil earlier, when they'd been fighting, and later when they'd been wrapped in each other's arms, or the thing just now. He looked away. “I'm...”

She twisted out from underneath him and sat up. “I know.”

“I'm trying,” he said. He wrung his oily hands together. “I'm trying so hard, but...”

The frustration in his tone was a solid mass she could cut with a scalpel. A malignant thing. She shook her head. “I know you're trying,” she said. “I didn't mean it before.”

He sighed. “You meant it. You meant every word.”
“No,” she said. “No, I mean about...” She sighed. Leaned across the void to touch his smooth, shaven face. He swallowed. “I don't want you to be sick. I'm glad you feel better.”

“But it's half-and-half,” he said. “Like you said. I can't give you perfect right now.”

But he wanted to. Everything about his demeanor spoke the words for him.

He wanted to give her perfect.

He couldn't.

He hated that.

“I want what you can give me,” she said. “Nothing more. Nothing less. And I don't want you to hide it if you're not okay just because I got irrational and whiny about sharks. Okay?”

For a long stretch of moments, he didn't answer. She scooted forward. The mat squeaked as her shoes skidded on the smooth surface. She touched his knee through the soft weave of his pants. She gave him a squeeze.

His gaze rested on her hand for a lingering moment, and then he met her eyes. His eyelashes had gotten wet. He wiped his face. They seemed to have an abundance of tears tonight, and it made her heart hurt. She was mad at him for the drugs. For treating her like crap. For lying and leaving. Not because he couldn't make himself heal. If she could have taken back a solitary piece of her tantrum, that would have been it.

“Oh okay?” she said once more, hoping her words would sink in for him.

He quirked a hesitant, watery grin. “This is getting complicated.”

She shoved him playfully. “You know what I mean,” she said.

“So, I have your permission to be Derek-y, even if it's not perfect?” he said.

“That sounds so stupid when you say it,” she said.

He shrugged. “I like the made up words,” he said. “It makes life interesting. It's not every day you discover your name has become an adjective.”

She bit her lip. “I wonder what Meredith-y would be.”

She looked away. “I want to be those things.”

“You are, Mere,” he said. “I wish you could see it.”

She swallowed as blush licked red flames down her skin. She crossed her arms over her naked chest, feeling inexplicably self-conscious under the weight of his words. He didn't comment on her sudden bashfulness, other than to tilt his head and look at her like she redefined the meaning of life for him. Even when she was blushing, flustered, sick, pregnant, and gross with emotional ruin.

“Please, let me do this for you,” he said.

She didn't respond. Couldn't.
He leaned forward, gripped her bare shoulders, and guided her back to the mat. She relaxed against the pillow and the mat like a collapsing wave. The oil bottle squirted. He resumed his steady stroking, and her thoughts slowed as he pampered her. She wondered if he'd been a masseuse in one of his former lives or something. Or taken some classes on it for fun. That'd be a good question to ask in their next game of truth.

“You don't have to be a perfect cheerleader for me,” he said.

At first, she didn't even realize he'd spoken. She blinked slowly. Then his words sank in. She scrunched some of the pillowcase between her fingertips. “But I don't know what else to do,” she said.

“Just having you here is nice.”

She gave him a watery smile. “I... know the feeling.”

“I'm here, now,” he said. “I am, Meredith.”

She really believed him. It felt good. He massaged her trapezius muscles. Her deltoids. He shifted his attention to her back. The rhythmic, rasping sound of skin-to-skin tugged on her consciousness. Her eyelids drifted shut in the relaxing onslaught.

“I'll try and get myself out of bed from now on,” he said.

“It's okay if you can't,” she said.

He stopped. His fingers tightened into fists, and his knuckles rested lightly on the curve of her lower back. She heard him swallow wetly. “Are we okay?” he said, the words cut jagged with blades of hope.

A loaded question. He wasn't okay. And she knew it. And she wasn't okay. And he knew it.

But them. Were they okay?

They'd had a crap night, despite what he'd done to redeem it for them.

She reached behind her body. Found his hand. Oil slicked between them as she wrapped her fingers around his. She squeezed his hand. He squeezed back.

They stayed like that for moments, hands clasped.

“Big day tomorrow,” he said, hand in hers.

“Yeah,” she said. Her awareness of the room faded like somebody was shoving cotton balls in her head to replace her brain. “What are we telling your mother when she gets here, anyway?” she said. Regurgitated from the countless worries on the surface of her brain. Not that she felt particularly bothered in that moment.

In that moment, she felt quite nice. Spread out like a Meredith puddle of Meredith-y bits. Lax.

“We could just start with hello and work from there,” he said beyond the soothing rush of blood in her ears.

“Mmm,” she said. Not agreeing. Not disagreeing. She couldn't muster much else. She'd run out of gas.
She felt him smiling. Or, maybe, she was dreaming already. She couldn't seem to open her eyes to check. The cap on the bottle popped. Something rustled, and then he rubbed her down with a soft towel and wrapped her up. His arms wrapped around her bundled body. She and gravity parted ways. He placed her on the soft air mattress. She felt his fingers at her shoelaces, and then felt her shoes slide off her feet. Two thuds followed. He pulled down her dirty scrubs. Warm blankets slid over her body.

"Where'd you get the airbed?" she murmured as she listened to him shuffle around the room. "Don't remember it."

"Wal-Mart."

"Mmm," she said. "Were they still out of candles?"

"I'm sorry?"

"S'where I bought our house," she said.

He laughed. Maybe.

The lantern flicked out, and the fleshy orange of her eyelids became black. The mattress sagged underneath a heavy weight. His body slid against her underneath the flannel blankets. Instinctively, she rolled to her side, and he wrapped himself around her. His arm slipped over her waist. His nose pressed into her neck. He kissed her.

And that was the last thing she remembered before her mind swept her to a different place, a subconscious place deep in the seat of hope.

She didn't know what made her turn off the water. She put the syrup-encrusted plate in the sink, she wiped her hands on the kitchen towel, and then she stilled, listening. A breeze ruffled the curtains. Birds chirped.

She bit her lip.

She almost returned to her task, but then she heard it. Something high-pitched on the wind. Something like a shriek, but not a scared one. A happy one.

She left the pile of dirty pancake dishes behind. That had been their bargain. He made pancakes every Sunday morning they weren't on-call. She cleaned up the mess afterward. It'd been a system they'd developed shortly after Anne had been born.

Meredith looked out the front door. Her Jeep sat on the road in front of the house. She hadn't bothered to park it in the garage when she'd gotten home the night before. She'd been so tired, she hadn't trusted herself not to hit something in the tight space.

Beyond the curving brick walk, the gray above and the vibrant green below created surreal bi-color split of sky and earth. Blades of grass fluttered in the breeze. The distant trees on the horizon swayed, their leaves rustling.

She heard the sound again, this time more clearly. A scream of exhilaration. Behind the house.

She walked back through the house. Their house. As she approached the backdoor, she saw her daughter through the windowpanes. The little girl flew over the lip of the windowsill in a surreal, blurry burst of speeding color, and then disappeared again.
“Higher!” Anne shrieked, giggling.

Meredith moved outside, and she watched as she leaned against the little dinette set on their deck.

He stood behind the swing set, slightly to the side, presumably so he wouldn't get hit by their daughter, who was impersonating a speeding projectile at the moment. The breeze sent fingers through his raven-brown hair. His face had a ruddy blush to it, and he looked good. Happy. He looked peaceful and happy, standing there in his gray fleece vest and his frayed jeans, pushing their daughter in the swing set he'd built for her.

Anne kicked with her little feet as she whooshed through the air. Her baby teeth flashed as she grinned ear to ear. The view from their backyard was spectacular beyond the fence, and Meredith imagined Anne would squint at the valley beyond and pretend she was really flying.

“He looked up as if he'd sensed her scrutiny. She met his stark blue gaze. The skin around his eyes crinkled. Her lip curved upward in a smile. He waved with his free hand, and her smile deepened. They shared a long look across the verdant space.

“Higher, Daddy! Higher!” Anne said, and Derek pushed her higher.
Derek flinched awake, a muffled gurgle of terror caught in his throat.

“—ake up.” A hand waved sloppily in his face. “Drk.” The fingers hit his nose, not hard, but it was a blur of flesh that was too close. “Nghtmre.”

His heart thundered in his ears. Something confined his tangled limbs. He couldn't escape. Or breathe. A phantom snap of pain ripped through his torso. He couldn't breathe, and then he fell.

He hit the cold catwalk with a thud that made him wheeze. He lay on the floor, dazed, panting. Gasping. He'd been shot. He fingered the bullet wound. He'd been shot, and Gary Clark hovered over him like...

Derek held up his hands to the light. No liquid, shiny red covered his fingers.

Gary Clark hovered... somewhere...

Derek blinked. No pain. Nothing hurt, save for a faint echo deep in his torso when he inhaled.

Gary Clark...

Not there.

None of it was real.

“Ugh,” Derek croaked as he looked at the ceiling, and the last fleeting visions of his nightmare faded.

The gentle slope of the roof hovered above his body. He lay on the floor in their new house. He'd fallen. A hand dangled over the edge of the air mattress, grasping at nothing, as though it had tried to capture him, and the sight of it made him startle all over again. He tried to crab walk backward, but his left foot was stuck in the blankets, and he ended up falling on his ass.

“No!” he said.

“Whoa, whoa, whoa,” said a familiar voice. “It's just me! It's Meredith.”

The bed beside him jiggled, and the hand disappeared, only to be replaced by scraggly tangles of brown hair, and then a pale forehead, a familiar nose, and the rest of her pale, sleep-hazy face. Her face. Meredith. She squinted at him over the edge of the mattress, a worried countenance still made muzzy by sleep.

His breaths evened out into slow rasps. “Meredith,” he said, a whisper.

She nodded. “Yes. You awake now?”

Her gray eyes glinted.

He looked away, and his heartbeat slowed.

Birds chirped, greeting the hazy beginnings of morning.

Nothing was wrong.
He swallowed and swiped his shaking hands over his face and through his hair.

“Are you okay?” she said. “You haven't had one of those in a while.”

His left foot remained tangled in the comforter. He pulled. His quad trembled. But he was good and stuck. Worse, his traitorous penis saluted the ceiling, an irritating bulge caught in the grip of his boxer-briefs.

“Pathetic,” said a familiar voice that Derek shoved away.

He rolled into a sitting position, blinking. He yanked his foot free of the tangles of blankets. The uneasy sense of disquiet that laved his unprotected back made him tense. He clenched his jaw. He couldn't help but glance over his shoulder. Their house. Their home. The dim morning light slanted through the windows, making the long hallway out of the bedroom seem ominous. There were no locks on the front door. Nothing to stop someone from walking in with a gun in hand. Nothing to stop his dream from turning real except the fact that the perpetrator was dead.

“Derek, are you okay?” Meredith repeated, more awake this time.

“I'm fine,” he said, though even to his own ears, he sounded grumbling. Snapping. A bah humbug Scrooge of the morning.

“Derek,” Meredith said, her voice thickening with disappointment he didn't want to hear. Disappointment that told him he'd already failed in his endeavor to be better.

He closed his eyes for a long moment. Stop, he told himself. Just stop it. Wallowing wouldn't do anything except make him grumpier, and she didn't deserve such ill treatment. She didn't deserve any of the horrible things he'd heaped on her. That's what last night had been all about, and he would be god damned if he only made it twelve hours before ruining everything again. Agitated, he pulled his hands through his hair once more and took a deep, long breath.

Stop it, he repeated to himself.

Hold your temper.

Do not treat her like shit because you're scared.

She doesn't deserve that.

Nobody deserves that.

He counted slowly to ten.

Breathing calmly helped vent all the ugly things stuck in his head. Like how stupid he felt for being scared after spending a night in a strange place. And how he hated that dreams of violence aroused him. And how angry he was at himself for waking her up with his yelling after she'd been so tired the night before, or the fact that his cheeks turned crimson like a damned mood ring whenever he got upset, or the fact that months later, the same dreams still haunted him without abatement. All of that boiling negativity slowed to a simmer the longer he forced himself not to snap, and he let his breaths carry the negativity away from him.

She seemed to sense his internal struggle, and she didn't interrupt. Didn't ask what he was doing.
In a few moments, the simmer seeped away, and he gave her the best smile he could manage. A busted, watery one, but a smile. “I did promise I'd get out of bed on my own from now on,” he said.
“Didn't I?”

She didn't seem quite convinced by the change in his demeanor, but she didn't pick at it either. A hesitant grin spread across her sleepy face. “A for effort,” she said.

He sighed. “E for execution?”

Her smile widened. “Something like that.”

She lifted the comforter and awkwardly scooted away from the edge of the bed, a clear invitation.
The mattress wobbled as she shifted. He crawled back into the shaky bed, and as soon as the soft flannel covered his exposed skin, as soon as he felt her warm body settle against his like his last missing puzzle piece, he relaxed a little, and then a lot. His fear abated as she rolled into his embrace. Her nose rested against his shirt just over the scar where his chest had been opened in surgery. His innards thrrobbed with each breath. Just a little. Enough to remind him he wasn't perfect, that frayed nerves still roughed the edges of his mind, but...

“I'm not used to this house, yet,” he admitted. “I'm sorry.”

She put her small hand over the curve of his side, squeezed, and roamed down to his hip in a long, soothing stroke. She didn't comment about the erection he'd neither wanted, nor had encouraged.
The blankets crinkled as she shifted next to him.

“It's kind of mind boggling,” she said. She kissed him. “We have a house. A real house.”

“With no electricity or hot water.”

She shrugged against him. “You're toasty enough for me. Just don't fall out of bed again.”

He grinned. “So, that's my lot in life. To be your personal toaster.”

“Mmm,” she said, and she settled closer. Her grip loosened. He kissed the top of her head. “Does this mean I get credit for camping, finally?” she murmured.

“Nope,” he decided. “We're in a bed. Beds and camping are mutually exclusive.”

She didn't respond, and her breaths became deep and even. He let his eyelids drift shut, and he rested against the warmth of her skin, convinced she'd gone back to sleep, now that he'd stopped yelling, no longer caught in a web of dreams. Aside from good-natured humor, she hadn't mentioned how he'd fallen out of bed. Hadn't drawn attention to any of it. Like it was normal and didn't warrant commenting.

That helped him. A lot. Being around her helped him. Barring the occasional mishap, she pushed him when he needed it. Backed off when he needed it. Was there being her unjudging, beautiful self when he needed it.

Being with her was so unlike working at the hospital, where everybody treated him with kid gloves, gave him menial work, and tended to tiptoe around him like he might implode at any moment – behavior he couldn't call unjustified, but he could definitely call frustrating.

She made things so much better for him.

She was his best friend.
“I love you,” he whispered, hoping, if nothing else, he'd make her dreams a little better.

“I don't want to get out of bed today,” she said, almost a whine, surprising him. She burrowed closer. He squeezed her shoulder.

“Why not?” he said.

“Because it's warm in here,” she said.

He grinned. “Your personal toaster. Reporting for duty.”

When she didn't tell him how corny he was, didn't snicker, didn't comment, his grin dripped away. A splat of rain hit one of the window panes, and then another, and she stiffened. Pulled the covers over her body until nothing but the top of her head peeked out.

He frowned at the lump of blankets in his arms. “What's wrong?”

“Your mom is coming.”

“You don't have to worry about her,” Derek said. “I'll talk to her. You don't even have to be in the room when I do it.”

Not that he had any idea what he himself would say. How to even broach the subject. His mother knew about the PTSD. His whole family knew. But talking over the phone with them versus being in their presence were two different things. Hell, they'd already impugned his capacity for good judgment, asked him if marrying Meredith right now was a good idea. Not only that, but he'd skipped the part about the drugs whenever he talked to them. He couldn't think of a casual conversational segue for that.

He didn't want to be Derek the Addict.

Or Derek the Time Bomb.

Or Derek the Screw Up.

He just wanted to be Derek.

Every new person he told about his PTSD or his addiction who changed around him chipped away at his ability to do that. His family had changed. Being around Meredith's friends was nerve wracking. Terrifying. Embarrassing. Lexie watched him like a science experiment. Whenever he did something she found puzzling, she consulted books on PTSD and addiction that she didn't know he knew she had.

“Skip it all,” Mr. Clark said, taunting and guttural. “Take some pills. Slip away. What you can't remember can't hurt.”

He stared at the ceiling.

“We find out about the baby today,” Meredith said, ripping Derek from his stressful musing.

“We do,” he said.

“Something is wrong,” she said. As though she were certain.

Something was wrong.
Not with the baby, just...

He couldn't find a single thing reassuring to say. He was still in tatters. From last night's fight. From the nightmare that had driven him out of bed and onto the cold, hard floor. From worrying about his mom's impending reaction. He doubted Meredith would believe anything he said right then, even if he did muster something appropriately comforting.

He sighed.

She shifted. Her face came free of the warm blankets, and she stared at him, gray eyes glinting through her long eyelashes. Their eyes met, and they shared a long look. The patter of rainfall became a gushing storm against the windows, and the glass panes shimmered in the dim light. She rose onto her elbow and brushed her fingers through his hair.

“I need you,” she whispered, and everything inside unraveled.

“I need you, too,” he confessed. His chest squeezed as he pulled in a huge, anxious breath.

Her fingers found the hem of his t-shirt and slipped underneath. Her fingertips formed the points of a star against his stomach. She brushed slowly up to his pecs, and his eyelids drooped. Then she roamed south. Found the waistline of his boxer briefs. Slipped underneath the elastic band, into the warmth below. Cupped him. Something wet touched his throat. Her tongue. She kissed him.

His flagging erection began to renew.

He couldn't stifle a low, throaty groan at her blatant invitation.

She remained flush with him, her naked skin hot against his body. All she wore were the panties he'd put her to bed in last night. Her thumb and index finger circled the base of his balls, and she pulled. Just a little.

His toes twitched, and a breath stuttered in his throat. He blinked, for a moment discombobulated. Chill air spread goosebumps down his arms. Her nose crinkled at the interruption. She squinted at him, blinking in the light. Her soft gray eyes wore a shroud of concern.

Is this okay? she said without saying.

Yes. Yes, it is, he answered without answering, on the eaves of a skipping sigh.

She dragged her thumb around the edge of his corona. His lips parted. He grimaced as every muscle tensed, and his nerve endings sent pleasure up his spine. She moved. Her lips met his, and she kissed him. Breathed his air. Tasted his soul. She moaned, and he drank the sound.

“I love you,” she said, the words almost desperate. “I just have this feeling...”

“I get those,” he said as a lump formed in his throat. He didn't have anything to say this morning. Couldn't find comforting words or pearls of wisdom for her. But he could do this. He could be with her.

They would always have that.

Rain pattered on the roof. The covers rustled. She touched him. Stroked his erection. She rested against him, breathing softly. “I don't think I can wait for it to pass,” she said.
“Me either,” he said.

Moving on the airbed was a challenge, and anything complicated made him feel like he was balancing on a boat about to capsize, but he rolled over her, straddling her hips, and kissed her deeply. He dug his palms and fingers into the vinyl below the flannel sheets to keep his balance. He nipped at her lower lip. Tasted her.

The bed wobbled when she moved, nearly sending him sprawling on his face on top of her, and she laughed.

“This is a little...” He swallowed.

“Unstable?” she suggested.

“Um,” he said, taking a short breath. He nodded. “Yes.” And then he leered with all the gusto he could manage. “But, hey. Let's rock the boat.”

She slapped his hip. Not hard. She didn't laugh. Not really. But her lip twitched with a weak smile. “You're such a dork.”

“I'm your dork.”

She bit her lip. “My dork,” she agreed. Her hands came to rest at the elastic waistband gripping his hips. She pulled. An inch. Two. “My dork in underpants.”

“Hi, pot,” he murmured as he dipped to kiss her cleavage. “I'm kettle.”

She laughed, and the warm sound of it vibrated through her chest.

He followed the swell of her breast left to a pert nipple. The journey had gotten longer in the last few weeks. She'd swollen with her pregnancy. He sucked when he reached the pinnacle. The breath skipped in her chest, and she gasped, pushing into him. He roamed the opposite direction, laving both swells with attention.

She moved his briefs down his legs until he was able to kick them away. He had to shakily sit up in order to assist her with hers. The bed below his kneecaps seemed to shiver under his weight, and he straddled her precariously.

She watched him as he hooked his fingers underneath the tiny slivers of fabric over her hips and pulled down.

She wriggled, which nearly sent him sprawling. He landed on his elbow and completed the roll to the side as though he'd meant to fall. They rested side by side, staring at the ceiling, naked from the waist down, flushed and breathing hard.

“I think this bed needs more air,” she said. “It wasn't like this last night. Does it have a leak?”

“Maybe, it's just not meant for sex.”

“Who invents a bed without sex in mind?”

He shrugged. “I don't know. Monks?”

“You're saying monks invented our air mattress.”

“They could have,” he said.
He tilted his head to the side. Stared at her. She stared back at him. Grabbed his hand. Guided him to the soft, warm space between her thighs. He cupped her. Pressed his middle finger into the soft flesh. He knew when he hit the right spot because her eyelids dipped, and her breaths shortened. She didn't need to say stop, or go, or anything at all. Her lower body rose to meet his touch, and that was all he needed to know.

She reached across his body and wrapped her fingers around his length. “Oh,” he said, and he had to stop for a moment. Adjust to focusing while she did... that. Did... His insides tightened, and he pressed against her hand. He imagined she read his signals like he read hers.

They were open books, but only for each other.

“Don't they take a vow of poverty or something?” she said.

He closed his eyes. Inhaled. Opened them. “Hmm?”

“Monks.”

“So?”

“So, they wouldn't sell a bed they invented. Would they?”

“I don't know.”

“Unless it was at cost. Would that count if they broke even?”

He grinned as he leaned against her ear and kissed her. “Why are we talking about this?”

“You brought it up!” she said. And she laughed.

She laughed, and for an short moment everything made sense. He forgot the rain, and his mother, and the OB appointment, and everything else. He lay in bed, half naked beside his best friend, having a stupid, pointless conversation because he was alive, and he could still have as many stupid, pointless conversations with Meredith as he wanted. He loved her. And there was nothing wrong in the world.

He moved his hand from her core and splayed his palm against her womb, just below her navel. There was nothing he could feel yet without pressing, but he imagined it in there somewhere. A little collection of his and her cells, mingled and growing together to make a single person. Her free hand came to rest over his palm.

“What are you thinking?” she said.

“Zygotes.”

She stared at him. “Plural?”

“Well, I think just one, but it's probably an extremely good one.” He kissed her, and he moved his hand to her cleft again.

“Extremely good?” she said, eyes dancing.

He winked. “I hate to throw words like perfect around.”

She snorted. “You do not.” But then her happy gaze evaporated, and his moment of nothing wrong evaporated with it. “What if it's not perfect?”
“It will be,” he said.

“But what if it's not?”

“It will be, Meredith.”

Her temples danced. She clenched her jaw. “But what if it's not, Derek? I messed up on the last one.”

“It depends on your definition of perfect,” he said. “And you didn't mess up. You did not mess up.”

“Well, what's your definition of perfect?”

He swallowed. “I think the baby we lost was perfect, too.”

She blinked. “What?”

“I made it with you,” he said. “Didn't I? I think that's perfect by definition.”

“But it died,” she said, her voice cracking. “That baby died, and I…”

“It did,” he said. “But that's not your fault.”

His heart squeezed at the sound of her sniffling beside him. He didn't know what to say that would make this better. Didn't have words. Anything he could think of seemed like a platitude. He kissed her. She let him. He rolled on top of her, straddling her in the clumsy beginnings of missionary position. She let him do that, too. The blankets crinkled as he adjusted himself. She opened her legs. He pushed inside to the hilt without any further encouragement, and he let her warmth settle around him. Heaven. He didn't move.

“I'm here,” he said.

She nodded. Wiped her face. She squeezed around him, and he shuddered.

“Me, too,” she said.

Those words seemed to be the only ones they needed. He made love to her languorously as the rain pattered on the roof, and the world outside the windows brightened. Minutes and minutes passed, and no more words were said between them.

The airport was scary.

He hadn't thought about the fact that the airport was scary when he'd offered to pick up his mother. He supposed, on the one hand, that was a good sign. That, though the airport was scary, he hadn't thought about it being scary until he'd actually set foot in it. It hadn't been an Event like the first time he'd taken a walk outside, or the first few times he'd gone back to Seattle Grace, or the first time he'd gone back to Joe's to play darts with Mark. With everything else going on, like planning for Meredith's treasure hunt, the upcoming trip to City Hall that week for their wedding, and the fact that today would be the first day they saw their baby, well, he just hadn't thought about the scariness. He suspected Meredith hadn't either, which had to have been why she hadn't protested when he'd volunteered to play chauffeur.

Now, though, the airport felt like an Event. A Big Event. He was keenly aware of his heart thumping in his chest. Keenly aware of all the bodies moving to and fro. Keenly aware of the way his eardrums curled when a car honked or somebody shouted or a whistle blew. Keenly aware of the fact that, though it was unintentional, he kept finding himself gravitating closer to walls and barriers and things that would protect at least one side, so he didn't have to focus so hard on 360-degree awareness.

Terrorists gravitated toward population centers like this. People with guns who wanted to create mass mayhem gravitated toward population centers like this. There was a lot of mass here to create mayhem in.

And, then, pushing all that aside, there was his mother, whom he hadn't seen in any capacity since the first few days after he'd been shot, before he'd wet his pants because he'd been so scared. Before he'd had pneumonia. Before the fevered killing dreams had started and had stuck perpetually after in his head. Before he'd started having panic attacks. Before he'd turned to drugs like a pathetic, worthless fool.

His head hurt, and his jaw ached from clenching, and his limbs felt shaky, and this was An Event.

Whether he wanted it to be or not.

A sky captain threw a pile of luggage on a metal cart right in front of him. The thunk and the sudden motion made everything inside Derek seize like an engine without oil. Meredith plowed into his back with an indignant, “Oops!” sound that was sort of a word but not really, and the sudden impact made his heart skip.

Derek's lower lip quivered. They stood outside in the terminal where all the kiss-and-ride traffic barreled through. They'd parked in the hourly parking and walked this far, except now he couldn't budge.

He just couldn't.

“Derek?” Meredith said, concern dripping from her tone as she came around to his front.

“I, um.” He swallowed. “Um.” That was all he could say. Words crammed themselves into his throat, but he couldn't get his body to cooperate, and they tangled in an unspoken clot near his Adam's Apple, where they thickened until he couldn't breathe. He pawed at his throat. A whistle pierced his eardrums, and he winced. The repeated message about leaving baggage unattended bled out of the intercom on repeat. People could keep guns in luggage. That's where they would hide—

“Derek, look at me!” Meredith said, and he did. He did. He looked right at her, and things relaxed. Just a little bit. “Is this too much for you?”

He closed his eyes. He took a deep breath and forced himself to stop focusing on all the noise and badness around him. He thought about the OB appointment today. They might even hear a heartbeat if the baby was far enough along, if he was right on the conception date bet he had with Meredith. He'd heard lots of prenatal heartbeats over the years, but none of them had belonged to his baby. His child. With Meredith.

There was no greater gift.

None.

Hearing it would be... perfect.

Just imagining the sound made him smile. He couldn't relax. He couldn't forget about the awful airport and the awful noise. But he got himself out of the bad place he'd almost fallen into, got himself back to a point where he could at least function. When he felt a little better, he looked through his eyelashes at her. She'd bit her lip in that cute, pensive way she did, and she stared back at him.

“What replacement thought was that?” she asked, her tone amazed.

He pulled her hands into his palms and gave her a shaky grin. “Just thinking about later.”

She blinked. “Picking your mom up from the airport is that tranquil?”

“The baby, Meredith. Seeing the baby. It's a good carrot on a stick to get through this part of the day.”

Her bright gaze darkened. “You could wait in the car.”

“I don't want to wait in the car,” he said, though a not so small part of him really did want to. Then he wouldn't have to deal with the bedlam around them. Or with figuring out what to say to his mom. But he knew how nervous Meredith was. He didn't want to leave her by herself to do this, especially since he was the one who'd volunteered.

“Fine,” she said, and she started to walk.

“Meredith, wait,” he said, and he chased after her, easily slipping past the sky captain who had frightened him into inaction moments earlier. “I'm sorry. I didn't mean to upset you.” Though he had no idea what he'd said that would have done so.

“You didn't upset me,” she said as they walked through the sliding doors into the main building.

A man wearing a pinstripe business suit bumped into Derek, and Derek bristled as the man's suitcase fell to the floor with a smack. “Sorry,” said the man absentmindedly as he adjusted his cellular phone and continued his conversation with the person on the other end of the line. He scrabbled for his suitcase handle with his free hand, wrenched it upright, and then he continued on his way.

Meredith hadn't stopped. Derek clenched and unclenched his teeth. His head hurt. He shook his head, feeling a bit like he had nothing but jelly in his skull for a moment. He rubbed his temples. Took a deep breath. And he kept going down the wide open hall toward the flashing arrival board where she'd stopped.

Meredith stared blankly at the spew of incoming flights and their corresponding gates.

“What flight is your mom on?” she said as he came to a stop beside her.

“Meredith—”

“Should we meet her at security or at baggage claim?” Meredith said.

“Meredith—”

“What if it's dead, Derek?” she said, her voice shrill with the onset of panic. “Or sick? And your mom will be here. I don't want to do this while she's here.”

She stared at the arrival board. Wouldn't look at him. Tears streaked down her face. She frantically brushed them away with the palms of her hands, but they renewed in an eye blink.
He stood frozen for a march of moments, unsure of what to do. He hated it when she cried. Hated watching her hurt. It made him feel like somebody had taken his heart and stomped on it, and worse, there was the crushing helplessness of being unable to do much but be there while she did it.

He closed the short distance between them. Wrapped his arms around her. The contact made the airport bleed away from his awareness. She was upset. He had enough to worry about in this small microcosm.

“Meredith, please don't worry about my mother,” he murmured against her hair. His nostrils flared. She smelled like lavender. “The baby is absolutely fine, okay? And even if it's not, I'm here, and I'm not going anywhere, and if I have to, I will put my mom on the first plane out of here if that's what you need. I'm not kidding. Let me worry about my mother.”

She shivered in his arms and took a deep, long breath that made him sigh in tandem, because it meant some reassurance he'd thrown in that mess had stuck, and she felt a little better. He'd helped.

“I missed this so much,” she said.

He closed his eyes and swallowed. A fresh wound. Through his chest. Like a new bullet. Incinerating. She hadn't meant it that way, he knew, but that didn't stop it from meaning what it did.

“If only you'd gotten help sooner,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek took a short breath. He couldn't do this now. Couldn't play games with a figment.

“Worthless,” said his tormentor.

Not now.

“What will your mother say when she finds out about you?” Mr. Clark said.

Not now. Not now, not now, not now.

And Derek pushed his tormentor away.

Meredith was far more important.

“I love you,” he said, and then he repeated, “Let me worry about my mother. You just be you, and we'll get through the day, no matter what happens, no matter what I have to do to make it happen. I promise.”

She rested in his arms, breathing. She wrapped her arms around his waist, slipped her hands into the back pockets of his jeans. He rubbed her back and crooned at her. Not words really, just soft vocalizations meant to soothe both himself and her.

“Are you?” she said, breaking her long silence. She swallowed and looked up at him with red-rimmed eyes.

“Am I what?” he said.

“Worried about your mother,” she said. “You seem...” She shrugged. “Worried or whatever.”

He blinked. “I don't... I just don't know what I'll say to her.”
Meredith stared at him for a long, discerning second. She pulled her hands from his pockets and looped her arms around the back of his neck instead. He smiled and brushed a loose strand of her hair out of her face. He would never tire of looking at her.

“I wish I could suggest something,” she said. “I feel like a dunce when it comes to moms.”

He nuzzled her. “You're not a dunce. And you don't need to suggest anything.”

“I feel like I do,” she said. “She's your mother, and I'm...”

“My wife.” He pressed his lips against hers and breathed her in. The scent of lavender was so calming. He let it waft against the back of his throat.

Someone behind them cleared his throat, and Derek looked up for the first time in minutes. Remembered they weren't in a bubble. They were in a stressful airport. A crowd of people stood behind them, most looking at the arrival board, some surreptitiously trying to watch the show he and Meredith had provided.

Meredith, as if reading his mind, grabbed his hand, pulled him to the side, toward a bench that rested in one of the side hallways out of the way of most foot traffic. They sat down on the bench in a tired heap. She leaned against his body. He wrapped his arm around her. They sat, interlocked. A whole piece. Together.

“Why are you worried about your mother?” Meredith said.

“I'm just...” He sighed.

“Just?”

“Kathy called me. A few weeks ago. On my... bad day.”

“About?”

His jaw clenched. He ran his fingers through his hair.

“Derek, what did she say to you?” Meredith prodded.

He shrugged. “None of them think I'm in my right mind right now.”

“Well, they're jerks.”

“They're my family, Mere.”

“And they're jerks!” she said.

“They're partially right,” he said glumly.

“You had trouble,” Meredith said, a fiery look on her face. “I had trouble.” She inched closer. “People have trouble when bad things happen.” She kissed him. “That doesn't mean you're nuts. Or that I'm nuts. It just means we had trouble.”

He swallowed. A lump formed in his throat, and he stared at his lap. “Trouble was what I had four months ago when I got shot. Now, it's...” His voice trailed away, and he shrugged. “I don't know.”

“Derek...”
He couldn't speak for a long moment. He'd had trouble, yes. But he'd dug himself further into the hole instead of climbing out. He'd done things so fucking badly, made wrong choices left and right while he'd flailed around, which only made the upcoming mess of explaining it all to his mother feel worse, because he'd done most of it to himself, and wasn't that the very definition of not being in one's right mind? God, what would she say to him when he told her who was responsible for all of this misery?

“She'll be so disappointed in you,” said Mr. Clark, and Derek quailed.

Meredith squeezed his shoulder. “Hey,” she said softly.

He closed his eyes. All the stuff he'd pent up inside roiled.

“I don't know how to have PTSD around them,” he said. He ran his fingers through his hair. “And somehow, I have to tell them about...” He reddened. “I don't know how to tell them about the drugs. I'm so ashamed, Meredith, I...”

His lip quivered, and he almost fell apart. Right there. In the airport. In front of hundreds of fucking people.

Almost.

“Hey,” she said against the raging din in his head. “Hey, stop it.” She rubbed his arm. “You don't have to know any of that, yet,” she said. “You don't have to tell them anything. It's not their business. It's ours.”

He took a short breath. Another. Blew it out slowly. Let her words sink in. Calmed down. Dealing with this disease was like being trussed to a roller coaster, and he hated it. But at least the dips and twists had gotten less wrenching since he'd gone to Dr. Wyatt. And at least he felt like he could apply the brakes with enough concentration. And at least he had Meredith.

She waited patiently for him to collect himself once more without comment. She rubbed his arm, and that was all. She was simply... there.

And that was what he needed.

He gave her a weak smile. “I think if we omit the part about the baby my mother will kill me at Thanksgiving when it's too obvious to miss.”

Her eyebrows rose. “Not me?”

“No.”

“Why not?” she said, an indignant look scrunching up her face like a rabbit. “Am I not important enough to kill? What's up with that?”

Derek winked. “You've got the baby,” he said, and he glanced pointedly at her stomach. “All bets are off once it's born.”

“Oh. Right. There's that.” She looked down and rubbed her stomach. “Do you think I'll show that much by Thanksgiving? I'm not showing at all right now.”

He nodded. “I know, but you're very busty.”

“Now, you tell me that without being prodded?”
“I figured you'd ask again,” he said. “I learn.”

She sighed. Stared at her waistline. “What if it means something is wrong?”

“That you're not showing?”

“Yeah,” she said. “I still have that feeling.”

Derek kissed her. “I think it means you're in your first trimester, and every woman is different.”

She sighed like she didn't believe him. “Let's just go to the baggage claim,” she said. “Your mother will be here soon.”

But when she started moving, he didn't move with her. “Hey,” he said, a soothing murmur, but it didn't quite seem to register, and she didn't stop right away. When their arms snapped, she halted. Looked back at him. He winked at her in a last ditch effort to make her feel better. “That was some great makeup sex this morning, don't you think?” he said.

She raised her eyebrows at him. “Oh, is that what that was?”

“Well, we fought, didn't we? Last night?”

“We made up last night, too,” she said.

He shrugged. “Think of this morning as the exclamation point.” He gently pulled her back a few steps. Into his arms. He wrapped her up and rocked her side to side like they were slow dancing.

“I love you,” he said against her ear. “And I'm here.”

She sighed, and she relaxed in his arms. That felt good. A goal accomplished.

“I've got your back, too, you know,” she said.

He lifted his head from her shoulder. “Hmm?”

She grinned. “With your mom. The drugs. If you need it. I'm your wingman.”

“Woman,” he said.

“Whatever,” she replied, rolling her eyes. “All that stuff you said about putting her on a plane? I don't exactly know what I'm doing. I'm not good with families. But I'd do that, too, if you needed it.”

“My poor, poor mother,” he said, shaking his head.

She frowned. “What? I can't—”

“DEFCON 1 for either of us, and we're stuffing her in coach,” he rushed to say before she finished taking him too seriously.

She laughed and bumped his hip with hers. “Shut up, dork.”

“Yes, dear,” he murmured.

They walked to the baggage claim together.
Meredith watched Derek slide by degrees from calm into upset. He made a valiant effort to keep himself from slipping into freefall, tried replacement thoughts and counting and breathing steadily to a rhythm and everything else in the book of tools Dr. Wyatt had given him to help cope with his nerves. Meredith began to wonder if, maybe, once again, he might be pushing himself too hard.

Clusters of people had already begun to form around the baggage claim when she and Derek arrived, and Derek planted his feet about two yards back from the crowd with a nervous look on his face. He stood with his back facing a thick support pylon that went from floor to ceiling. She watched his gaze twitch from person to person, focusing on purses and suitcases and bags and big coats with big pockets. Assessing. Calculating risk.

She hated that.

Hated watching an optimistic person like Derek Shepherd reduced so thoroughly to the pessimism of searching each stranger for weapons. But the fact that he had approached so many people at all, let alone managed to get within ten feet, well, that was almost miraculous improvement.

She liked that.

Even better, he seemed to relax a bit once he'd looked everybody over to his satisfaction. His grip on her shoulder, though it remained chilly with nerves, became a supportive, comforting weight instead of a desperate cling.

She liked that, too.

His expression crumpled a little when the display board flashed a five minute tarmac delay for his mother's flight, and the healthy blush bleached out of his pallor. Sweat collected at his brow, but he seemed so freaking determined to be there with Meredith despite what his body was telling him, though she'd snapped about it earlier when she'd been upset, she couldn't bear to suggest that he go back to the car, now, couldn't get the words to form in her mouth. Not after everything.

Not when his mother would be arriving in a matter of minutes. Not when Meredith had her first OB appointment later in the day, not when she had this horrible feeling that something would go wrong, something with the baby, and not when whenever she thought about that, she just wanted to tug on Derek's shirt, crawl back into that ridiculous airbed with him in their done-but-not-really house, and forget the world.

She loved him. She was having a crappy day.

She didn't want him to go if he could help it.

He wanted to stay if he could help it.

So, she asked him about surgery. She had a tumor resection on Tuesday with Dr. Weller. A ten-hour procedure on some eleven-year-old's spine. She had no idea how she would get through it without having to puke or pee, but she wanted to be ready, and who better to help her study for it than Derek? As soon as she explained what she had scheduled, he peppered her with interested questions. He gave her tips, too. She waited patiently through interruptions when he looked up to investigate the sources of sounds he heard or of movements he witnessed out of the corner of his eye.

The last minute cram session was a halting, tripping process, but it was a process, and the minutes passed in an unsteady march. More people stacked up in thick, chatterbox clots around the baggage claim, but Derek seemed okay with it. Mostly. His jitters grew more pronounced. But he didn't retreat. Didn't freeze up.

She thought they would make it through this whole airport ordeal without any serious incidents.

Then everything fell apart.

The buzzer that warned everybody to step back from the baggage claim because the conveyor belt would start moving in a moment went off, and it was loud. Like fire alarm loud, to the point that, unprepared for it, even Meredith flinched. Derek stopped talking mid-word. He twitched backward like he would bolt if he could. His back hit the pylon he'd been using as surreptitious protection. The air popped out of his chest all at once in a disturbed, vocalized rush.

“Derek,” Meredith said, hoping to ground him a little, but her voice barely carried over the racket. She reached for his arm, but he snapped his wrist away from her. He'd hit that nonsensical point where no touch would be comforting. She showed him her palms and backed up a step to show him he wasn't being threatened, least of all by her.

He looked at her, and the panic stirring in his expression cooled from boiling to simmering.

She thought maybe he could recover if he had a freaking chance.

Then the conveyor belt started to move, and that was loud, too.

And in all that chaos, they missed his mother, who appeared from the side he wasn't looking at, as she approached and put her hand on his shoulder. She held her other arm outstretched, and from Meredith's perspective, it looked like the older woman wanted a hug. From Derek's perspective, though, a corner of the eye sort of thing, Meredith imagined it looked like he was about to get struck.

Derek made a terrible keening noise that chilled Meredith to the core, because she'd only heard it once before, uttered by Derek months ago when he'd wet himself, he'd been that terrified. He crumpled. Right there. Against the pylon. Slid to the ground like he'd fainted. But he couldn't have fainted, because he pulled his arms over his head when he landed, and he curled away from anything that might hurt him. He didn't say no or stop like he sometimes did. Beyond his initial outburst, he didn't make any noise at all.

Everybody in the surrounding crowd looked at them to examine the commotion.

His mother looked horrified. “What on earth did I do?” she said.

“Nothing, just——” Meredith began, but then she gave up as priorities lined up in her head. She could deal with Carolyn in a minute.

Meredith dropped to her knees next to Derek. Terror radiated from him in waves like a thick, palpable thing. Her own body shook with stress in response.

“Derek, it's okay,” Meredith said, trying to soothe him, and by extension, herself, even as a lump the size of Mount Rainier formed in her throat. She didn't dare touch him, yet, though she wanted to. She wanted to wrap herself around him and crawl back into bed like she'd been fantasizing about since they'd gotten up. They could go back to their nice little denial bubble, not hear about the probably-dead baby, not be scared by phantasms and ghosts, not have his mother hovering, and... “It's okay. You're okay. You're okay.”

The crowd billowed around them, rubbernecking and yammering like idiots. They were too close.
She saw feet shifting closer in her peripheral vision, which meant Derek could see it, too, if he was paying any attention at all anymore. It was hard to tell.

“What’s going on, here?” said a new voice, and Meredith looked up to find a rather stern looking policeman with a black mustache staring down at her.

Great. This was freaking great.

“He's sick, okay?” she snapped.

“Does he need a doctor?” said the officer. “I can call for assistance.”

Meredith sighed. “I am a doctor. He's having a panic attack. He just needs some freaking space.”

And quiet. “I—” She ground her molars. “Would you people please back up?” she implored the crowd.

Miraculously, they listened, and the five foot bubble around her and Derek became wider.

“I'm okay,” Derek said, his voice wasted and dull and quiet.

Meredith froze. Blinked. Looked at him. He was white like flour, covered with sweat, and shaking. But he was talking. And that was... That was... “Derek, you're—”

“Okay,” he said. He took a shallow breath and let it out. He didn't smile at her. Didn't wink. Looked like he'd been hit by a freaking truck. But he was talking.

Talking!

“Is there a water fountain?” he asked, his voice wispy. He pulled a shaky hand through his hair. He rubbed his eyes and his face. Wouldn't look at his mother.

“Just down the hall by the restrooms,” said the police officer. He pointed behind the pylon where Derek sat. Meredith had a chance to assess him. His gaze behind the mustache was a sympathetic one, not an accusing it's-a-terrorist! one like she'd originally thought. His nametag declared him Lieutenant Willoughby. “Do you need any assistance?” the man asked.

Derek stumbled to his feet. “I'm okay, thank you,” he said softly to the officer, who seemed satisfied once Derek was off the ground.

When the officer turned away, Derek closed his eyes. He slumped against the pylon. He rubbed the sides of his nose sluggishly with his trembling thumb and index finger. His rumpled black t-shirt and hair made him look like he'd spent a long night on a red-eye flight. Not like he'd just had a panic attack. Onlookers whispered and dispersed.

“Derek,” Meredith said. She couldn't ask him how he was feeling. That was obvious, and she doubted she'd get an honest answer out of him in front of his mother, anyway. The same went for asking him if he needed anything. Not in front of his mother. Telling him how amazed she was by his improvement seemed horribly insensitive, given how crappy he looked. She settled on, “I love you.”

He didn't say it back. His lower lip quivered and then settled into stillness. He cleared his throat. He still wouldn't look at his mother, and a scarlet mottle began to spread down his face and throat and along the tips of his ears. “I'm going to get a drink,” he said. His vocal cords didn't quite seem to be working right yet, and she could barely hear him.
“Okay,” Meredith rushed to say. “Okay, take your time.”

He didn't ask for help, didn't say anything else, not that she imagined he would with his mother staring at them, and she could glean enough from the horrible vibes in the air not to offer assistance no matter how much she wanted to. He hobbled away from the pylon. Gravitated to the wall. Slunk toward the restrooms like a shadow of the man she knew he was.

“Oh, dear,” said Carolyn as she watched her son retreat.

Meredith took a short breath and blew it out. She felt wasted, too. Like somebody had hit her with a baseball bat or something. She hated watching that. Hated watching him in pain. And she hated Gary Clark. Wished she could rewind and make sure neither she nor Derek nor anybody she loved went to work on that horrible day, but that was a useless wish.

She wanted to get through today.

That was, at least, a wish that might work.

“Oh, dear,” said Carolyn once more.

The heart wrenching look on Derek's mother's face made Meredith want to fall apart. That was probably what most mothers felt like when their kids were suffering. Mothers who weren't Ellis. Meredith put her hand on her belly. She didn't need to hear bad news and feel like that on top of everything else today. The lump in her throat got bigger.

Just get through the day, she decided. Get through it.

She coughed. Just a little. At least the repeated thunk of heavy suitcases hitting the conveyor belt gave her a convenient subject change.

“Is your bag on the belt, yet?” Meredith said. “What does it look like?” She didn't want to talk about Derek. Or about the baby. Or about anything.

Carolyn gaped at her for a long moment. Didn't speak.

Meredith waited for the harangue about disappointment. The one where Carolyn asked why she hadn't been called sooner. The one where Carolyn called Meredith a failure and a screw up for letting all of this happen to her son, and for not doing a better job at fixing it.

The harangue never happened.

“Tell me what I did wrong,” Carolyn said calmly. “I won't do it again.”

Meredith swallowed. “You're not going to yell at me?”

Carolyn looked even more horrified, if that were possible. “Sweetheart, why on earth would I do that?”

Meredith shrugged. “Personal experience, I guess.”

Carolyn shook her head. Made a clucking noise of disappointment, just like Meredith had originally expected. What Meredith hadn't expected was being pulled into a warm, firm embrace. She stood there awkwardly for a long moment, stiff and surprised and thoroughly unsure of what to do. And then she sniffled. Sank into it. Closed her eyes. She was so freaking tired, and this felt so nice. She stood there for a long, long time, breathing softly, not speaking. She couldn't muster much of anything for several minutes. Her eyelids felt heavy, and she didn't want to lift them.

“You can't sneak up on him,” Meredith said as Carolyn rubbed her back. “And you can't touch him until you're sure he knows you're there. He doesn't like loud noises or sudden movements. He gets upset or off-kilter really easily. If you startle him or... something, don't draw attention to it. You just have to give him a few minutes to work it out in his head. Unless you get...” She swallowed. Wiped her watering eyes. “If it turns into a panic attack, and you're already touching him when it happens, sometimes you can hug him, and that helps ground him. If he's coherent enough, you can ask him, and he'll tell you whether it's okay. If you're not sure, just don't touch him. Give him plenty of space. Reassure him in a calm voice.” No matter that you felt like your heart was getting ripped out.

“Okay,” said Carolyn.

“He's really a lot better,” Meredith said. “I swear he is.” Babbled. “He recovered from that panic attack really fast. And I haven't seen him have a real panic attack like that in...” Two whole weeks. His bad day. She hadn't seen that one, but he'd told her about it during his confessional. She shook her head. “He had a bad morning because we stayed in a strange place last night. He's not very good with crowds. The airport was new for him, and then that awful buzzer went off, and... that was sort of a perfect storm, except, well, not perfect, because it caused that. It wasn't really your fault. Why do they have to make that buzzer so loud? I forgot all about it until it went off, or I never would have let us stand so—“

“Meredith,” Carolyn said, interrupting softly. “Meredith, shh. I'm more concerned about you at this point. How are you?”

Meredith's lip quivered. This hugging thing was... It was nice. She could see where Derek had gotten his touchy-feely gene, and it was... nice. “I'm sorry. I babble sometimes when I don't know what the hell to say. I'm...” Pregnant. “I'm...” Pregnant. Say it. Get it done with.

She blinked. The tears she'd been holding back fell and spoke for her, two salty jags down her face.

“I'm really tired,” she said as she wiped her face. “All the time.”

Derek's mother considered her for a moment. “When we get back to the house, why don't you take a nap with Derek?” Carolyn suggested. “He looked like he's going to want one, too.”

Meredith pulled away. Blinded. “But don't you want to go out to lunch or something? Or...” She waved her hands. “Be touristy?” She'd moved her whole freaking schedule around so today would be free for the OB appointment and whatever else was on the docket. Like Space Needle visits or lunch at Pike Place or maybe a ferryboat ride. Meredith had expected the woman to want to want to explore. After all, Carolyn had been to Seattle twice, and both times, she'd barely left Seattle Grace.

But Carolyn shook her head. “How about you take a nap, and I'll figure out what to make you two for lunch.”

“But—” Meredith said.

“That's assuming you don't mind me using your kitchen,” Carolyn said.

“Of course, not,” Meredith said.

“What about laundry?” Carolyn said.
“What about it?”

“Does it need to be done?”

“Um... I don't know. Probably,” Meredith said with a shrug. And then she frowned. They'd been so busy the last few weeks. “Our house is a mess right now.”

Carolyn brightened. “Well, I can fix that.”

“You can't do that,” Meredith protested. “You're our guest!”

Carolyn stared at her, eyes serious. Determined. “Nonsense, Meredith. I want to help.”

“But—”

“You're my family,” Carolyn said. “You make Derek very happy, and I want to help. It makes me feel useful. Now, let's see if my suitcase has arrived.” And with that, she turned away, nipping the possibility of any arguments from Meredith in the bud.

Meredith goggled for a moment. This just wasn't how moms worked in her experience.

Carolyn, oblivious, or maybe pointedly ignoring Meredith's amazement, adjusted her leather purse strap over the shoulder of her knee-length coat, approached the conveyor belt and pulled off a green roller board suitcase with a neon-colored tag. Her mission accomplished, she looked in the direction Derek had departed and ran her fingers through her silver hair. Another habit Derek seemed to have inherited. The hair thing.

Meredith followed her gaze. No sign of Derek returning, yet. Not that that was much of a surprise. It'd only been about ten minutes since he'd left, and she imagined he would need a bit more time to collect himself. Not to mention the crowd around the baggage claim was still pretty thick, and she thought he might not be enamored with the idea of returning to a huge group of people who'd seen him collapse.

That was when she saw him.

Leaning against the opposite wall by the men's bathroom, staring at his shoes. His shoulders were hunched, and he had his hands stuffed in his jeans pockets. Anyone looking for the Derek they'd known before the shooting would have passed right over him and kept looking, which was probably why her mother had missed him.

“Wait here,” Meredith said, and Carolyn nodded.

Meredith trotted toward her husband. He didn't look up at her as she approached.

“Derek,” she said softly as she closed the distance between them.

He didn't speak, didn't lift his gaze, but she knew he'd heard her. His attention shifted to her feet instead of his.

Moving very slowly, she reached to touch his forearm. He didn't stop her. Her fingertips brushed his soft skin, and she gave him a squeeze. He'd gotten some of his color back, and he wasn't trembling. He was warm and solid. Only his pride still lay in bloody shambles.

“Why don't you come back and say hi to your mother?” Meredith said.

He swallowed. Was silent for a long moment. “I don't know what to say,” he said quietly.
“What was it you said last night?” Meredith said. “Start with hello, and work from there?”

His lip twitched. Almost like she'd made him laugh, albeit in a muted sense. He looked at her. “I'm sorry I left you to deal with her.”

“She hugged me, Derek. And she wants to clean.”

That got her a real laugh. A soft, beautiful chuckle. “She does that,” he said.

“So, this isn't like sitting shiva for her, is it?”

Another real laugh. He pushed away from the wall, and his hands came out of his pockets. He hugged her. Ran his hands up and down her arms, and she couldn't help but relax. How did he do that? “No, Meredith,” he said, a soft, soothing murmur against her ear. “She's usually like that.”

Derek followed Meredith back to where his mother stood waiting without further hesitation, though when they arrived, he got all hyper-awkward again, stared at his shoes, and stuffed his hands back into his pockets. Carolyn left her hulking suitcase leaning against the pylon where Derek had collapsed. She inched closer.

“Derek,” Carolyn said softly, and Meredith watched with quiet respect as the older woman planted herself in front of him in plain view, a very comfortable two feet away, and announced, “Sweetheart, I'd really like to hug you. Is that okay?”

He looked up. Blinked once. His shiny eyes spilled over. “Mom,” he said in a soft, choked voice.

“I'm so sorry I scared you,” she said, and then she pulled him tightly into her arms.

“It's okay,” he said, syllables wobbling. “It hap... happens a lot.”

“Not a lot,” Meredith said firmly. “Sometimes.”

Derek stood stiffly in his mother's arms at first, but the tension drained away in a matter of eye blinks, and then he closed his eyes and didn't open them again. His breathing slowed, and the wet pulse of tears against his cheeks slowed and stopped. Meredith watched the shame slide off his face as he took comfort in the embrace.

Carolyn Shepherd was a very good hugger, Meredith decided.

Derek's peaceful face said he agreed.

Derek couldn't sleep, though he tried for a while. He stared at the bedroom ceiling. The soft sound of Meredith's breathing beside him was relaxing. She'd collapsed into sleep within seconds of her head hitting the pillow, hadn't budged in an hour, and she wasn't snoring. She didn't snore when she was exhausted. His heart twisted a little at how hard this pregnancy was hitting her already.

“And you,” Mr. Clark said. “Dealing with you is doing this to her, too.”

Derek sighed. Kissed her shoulder. The blankets crinkled. She curled closer. Made a little squeaky sound deep in her throat, though she remained asleep and breathing thickly against his skin. She needed the rest. Needed it. She worked hard, and she came home to hard work.

Him.
“Great job at the airport,” Mr. Clark said snidely.

Derek gave up on sleeping. He was tired, and his body hurt from the stress of constant, fear-born adrenaline baths, hitting him and receding, hitting him and receding like the crash of waves against the shore. With the day he was having, though, if he did fall asleep, he'd probably just wake up yelling, and he'd disturb Meredith, and Mr. Clark's punishing commentary was already making it impossible to rest, anyway.

“You could take something for that,” said Mr. Clark said. “Just a little pill...”

Aaching swell of wanting burgeoned, and Derek sat up. Moved to the lip of the bed. Stood. Stretched. Closed his eyes. Counted to ten in a long, agonizing crawl.

“I don't want pills,” he whispered.

Mr. Clark laughed. “Liar.”

“I choose not to take them,” Derek clarified.

He snatched his notebook from the nightstand to make his point, flipped to the latest page, and wrote his choice down, the latest in a long, long list of choices. He didn't write the little choices down anymore, like what he ate or what color shirt he'd decided to wear that day, and he didn't carry the journal around with him, but the big choices, he still cataloged at the end of the day before he went to bed. It helped. Reading the list every night made him feel less like life was crushing him to a pulp.

Gary Clark had nothing to add as Derek underlined this particular entry three times for emphasis. That done, Derek put his journal back on his nightstand, sighed, and headed downstairs. He heard his mother making noise in the kitchen as she moved around. The faucet turned on and off. She hummed some tune that sparked a warm sense of nostalgia deep in his chest.

He thought about sitting in the living room and reading a book. Staying away from her. His tongue felt like lead whenever he got near her. After she'd hugged him in the airport, his worry and tension had died to an acceptable level around her, but he still hadn't been able to muster anything in the way of conversation, which had made him feel more and more moronic as the moments had passed. He'd been able to talk to his mom just fine on the phone. Why did proximity matter so much?

Meredith had babbled to fill the silence as they'd walked to the car. He'd felt recovered enough from his panic attack that he'd driven them home. Meredith had sat in the back seat. His mother had sat in the front with him, but had ended up craning her head around to make small talk with Meredith instead of with him.

He barely offered a syllable to the whole embarrassing affair. He'd tried. A few times. But he'd open his mouth and nothing would come out. His mother hadn't pestered him about it, maybe, because she thought him barely speaking to her was part of the Derek-with-PTSD package.

He looked longingly at the couch in the living room. But he couldn't. Meredith had her OB appointment in all of two hours. They still hadn't explained to his mother that Meredith was pregnant. He knew without a doubt Meredith was too scared to bring it up herself. He would need to be the one to elucidate the why of the “sudden” doctor's appointment that couldn't be rescheduled and required both of them to be there, if only to save her some worry.

I choose to talk to my mother, he thought.
No sudden rush of courage hit him. The act of choosing what he had to do, in this instance, didn’t really help make his path any easier. He still wanted to sit on the couch more than he wanted to walk into the kitchen.

“For, god's sake,” Mr. Clark said. “Buck up, you pathetic idiot.”

Derek closed his eyes. Counted to ten once more. Then he made himself walk into the kitchen.

The scene that greeted him made him smile despite himself. Samantha sat patiently on the floor, looking up with unblinking, mocha-colored eyes at his mother, who was slicing strawberries on the cutting board with a fat knife. His mother looked dispassionately at the dog. “I don't think dogs like strawberries,” she explained to Samantha, who didn't seem to agree, licked her lips, and kept staring like his mother was cutting steak and not fruit.

Samantha did like strawberries. Loved them, actually. Almost as much as Meredith loved them. Every time he went to the grocery store, he made sure to buy at least two pounds of them, one for his wife, and one for his dog. But he couldn't get himself to offer that tidbit of conversation.

His smile bled away.

The swish of the door closing behind him made his mother look up at him. A smile curled her lips. “Hello, sweetheart. Did you have a good nap?”

He swallowed. “I couldn't sleep,” he said roughly, and then his throat closed up, and he couldn't say anymore. He sat down at the table and stared at his hands.

“I'm sorry,” she said.

All he could do was shake his head.

His mother brushed the strawberries off the cutting board with the back of the knife into a ceramic bowl. She covered the top in plastic wrap, and she put the bowl into the refrigerator. She left the knife sitting on the cutting board, scratched Samantha's ears kindly, and came to the table to sit with him.

“I can't help but think you're giving me the cold shoulder, whether you're sick or not,” she said softly. “Do you not want me here?”

His lip quivered. “I want you to see my wedding,” he managed.

She reached across the table, paused inches from his hands for a long moment, and then continued her approach slowly to cover the last bit of distance. She gave him every chance to say no. To pull away. Her warm, weathered fingers brushed his. He felt comforted and sick all at once.

“What is it?” she said when he offered nothing more. “You're not still upset about the airport, are you?”

Shame caused emotional gridlock, and for too long, he couldn't bring himself to speak.

“I...” Emotion choked his voice when he managed to cough up a word. Words. “I haven't been doing so well. Since the shooting.”

He stared at his hands. Couldn't look up. His mother probably felt like she was pulling teeth.

“That's nothing to be ashamed of,” she said, as if she could sense the reason for the gravity pulling his gaze to the table. “I'm not a stranger to this, Derek. I've spent a lot of time with soldiers who've had trouble after receiving combat wounds.” She squeezed his hands so firmly his finger bones wobbled and collided under his skin. “Won't you look at me, sweetheart?”

His heart constricted. His lip quivered. The lump in his throat expanded. He looked up at his mother, but only for a second, and in that second, all he could see was a wet blur that was vaguely Mom-shaped. She was comparing him to people who'd been hurt in the line of duty. Him. She had no fucking idea.

Samantha's dog tags jingled. Her big feet padded on the floor. She put her head in his lap and whined.

The dog's affectionate concern only made him fall apart faster.

He didn't deserve unconditional love.

Didn't deserve support.

Didn't deserve his mother comparing him to soldiers who'd had courage and gotten limbs blown off for their trouble.

Didn't deserve Meredith, who lay upstairs trying to recoup the energy he'd sapped from her with his sickness.

“You don't deserve anything you've been given,” Mr. Clark snarled.

Derek split open at the seams.

“I messed up,” he said. His eyes spilled. He couldn't stop them. His breaths shuddered in his chest. “I really messed up, Mom.”

He couldn't look at her.

“That's okay,” his mother said.

“You don't even know what I did!” he snapped, wiping his face.

“It doesn't matter to me what you did,” she said.

“I took drugs, Mom,” he said darkly, practically daring her to hate him. A flash of hurt exploded across her face like a brush fire, and then it was gone. Seared from existence. Her face became enigmatic. “It's my fault,” he continued. “I'm an addict, and I took drugs, and it's my fault. Just like Amelia.”

Silence stretched. His mother didn't let go of his hands like he expected. Her grip stayed firm and solid. She didn't budge, and she looked far from hateful.

Just speechless and unreadable.

He wondered if he'd imagined the hurt he'd seen. Manufactured it because he expected it, or...

He wasn't sure.

“I'm trying to get better,” he felt compelled to add in the damning silence. “I'm in therapy. I go five days a week, except this week because I took today off for Meredith's doctor's appointment. Dr. Wyatt has me on antidepressants that I hate, but I need them. I'm really trying. I'm trying so hard to fix it, every day, all the time, so much it hurts me, and I'm always tired, but even then I don't know how I'll ever be better in seven months, and I need to be better in seven months.”

It all felt so hopeless.

He pulled his hands from his mother's grasp and wiped his face to get the wet, awful blur to sharpen back into focus, but it wouldn't. Nothing would focus, and he felt awful. Hot, embarrassed blush bloomed across his skin like a spate of wildflowers, and he buried his face in his hands.

“I'm really trying,” he said, the words hoarse.

“Now,” said Mr. Clark. “Now, you're trying. You wasted the first three months on Percocet.”

Derek cringed.

“Why do you think there's a time limit on getting better?” his mother said slowly. “There's no time limit for that. You do what you can manage, when you can manage it. That's all you can do.”

This wasn't how he'd imagined telling her about the drugs or about the baby or about anything.

He took a shivery breath. “Meredith is pregnant,” he said into his hands. “She's pregnant, and I'm like this.”

Silence stretched. He breathed into his hands.

How had this gone so wrong so quickly?

His mother's chair squawked across the floor as she stood. And then he felt her in his space. Warm body heat. Radiating. Heard her breathing close to him.

“I'm going to touch you,” she warned, and then she waited a long five seconds that only made him feel worse, because she had to warn him.

He'd been trying so hard, all the time, constantly, and he hadn't had a panic attack in two weeks, not even the night before when Meredith had been yelling and screaming at him. He'd tried so hard to stay upright for her. To let her get her licks in, because he deserved them, and she'd needed to stop pulling her punches to stay sane. He'd made it through all of that, and he'd thought he'd been doing a little better.

Just a little.

He didn't expect miracles. Didn't even believe in them anymore.

But he'd hoped for just a little after so much effort.

Then the airport had snapped him like a twig. Proved him wrong like a shit math problem in front of his mother, of all people.

2 + 2 = Derek falls apart.

His mother squeezed his shoulder with one hand. Her palm felt warm through his shirt. With the other, she rubbed his back in a slow, soothing circle, but she said nothing. Not about the impending baby or the drugs or anything.

“Aren't you going to say something about the drugs?” he said, a wretched croak of syllables.
“What are you looking for from me, exactly?” she said. “Absolution? Advice?”

The question brought him up short. He sniffed. “I don’t know,” he said.

“Do you expect me to fix it?”

He shook his head. “Nothing can fix it.”

She clucked at him in that way that told him she was disappointed, except he’d expected her to express disappointment well before now, which meant... he didn’t know what it meant.

“I messed up, Mom.”

“You did,” she said. “It happens.”

“It happens?” he countered incredulously. “I didn’t hit a squirrel in my car on the way to work. I’m an addict, Mom.”

She shrugged. “So, what?”

“What do you mean, so what?” he snapped.

“Explain to me why this should change how we talk, or the fact that I love you,” she said, the words warm and even and sincere, and he didn’t know how to respond to that at all. This wasn’t going how he’d planned. Not that he’d planned much. He’d mostly just worried. “If you want judgments, I can judge,” she continued, “but it seems to me you’re judging yourself quite enough already.”

He looked up at her. Blinked. “Mom...”

“I judged Amelia,” his mother said, and she lost some composure. Only for a moment. He saw a flash of pain slip across her eyes again. She lifted her left hand and brushed the corner of her eyes as though she thought she might be crying, though she wasn't. Then all evidence was gone, and he wondered again if he’d imagined it. If he might be even more out of his right mind than he’d thought. “That was my mess up,” she said.

He swallowed. “I thought you helped—”

“Not immediately.”

“Oh.” He had no idea what else to do with that revelation.

She took a short breath and then blew it out. Then she raised her eyebrows. “So, you said you’re already getting help?”

He nodded, speechless.

“Then hush about it,” she said in that soft, reserved-but-scolding tone he’d grown up with. The one she’d used when he’d made a grievous but understandable error. He was getting his hands metaphorically slapped like he’d expected, but for none of the reasons he’d expected, and it was just...

“But what if I mess up again?” he said.

“Then you mess up, dear,” she said. “And you work from there. That’s what we all do when we make mistakes.” Her earlier confession gave her words so much weight. Still, his mistake felt... worse. Worse, somehow. The gravity was... bigger.

“I did this to myself and to everybody around me,” he said.

He clenched his jaw. A softball gathered in his throat, and he blinked. In his bewilderment, he’d stopped crying, but it started easily once he thought about that. How he’d hurt Meredith. How she gave him endless, undying support, and how he repaid that support with nothing. Literally nothing. No miracles. No progress at all. Nothing. Just more of the same sick, broken, burdensome creature he’d become. He rubbed his tired eyes.

“I feel so worthless,” Derek confessed quietly, and he looked at the table.

“Derek Shepherd, you are not worthless,” his mother said without pause. She stopped rubbing his back. Stopped squeezing his shoulder. Shifted her entire body and pulled him against her. Samantha lifted her head from his thigh in surprise and backed away, her dog tags jingling. His mother held his head with his ear pressed against her belly, and she hugged him so tightly he couldn't move his torso. “You're not worthless,” she repeated, and he heard the words low and deep through her skin, rumbling in his ear. “You're not. I don't want to hear you say that anymore.”

He leaned into her. Long-buried instinct made him grab a piece of her shirt and squeeze it in his shaking palm a bit like a security blanket. His mother pulled her fingers through his hair and made little shushing noises. She rocked him in her arms like she'd done when he'd been little. Before he'd turned fifteen and become an instantaneous adult in the wake of a bloody, violent murder.

“Hush, now,” she said, a soft, soothing whisper. “I'm here.” An echo, and yet in the now. A collision of past and present. In that moment, he found what he needed.

His eyelids dipped. He stared through the blur at the kitchen. Samantha watched him mournfully from several feet away. He closed his eyes and pressed his face into the folds of her mother's shirt. Inhaled the old, rosy scent of her perfume that spoke of so many years long past.

The tumultuous, crushing act of living seemed to unconstrict a bit in that embrace, and he took his comfort greedily. Wished he could stay like this for a while. An hour. A day.

But he couldn't.

“I'm such a mess, Mom,” he said, shame lacing his voice.

“Something terrible was done to you,” she said, a soothing, soft murmur. He sighed at the feeling of his hair moving against his scalp as she stroked it. “I was an army nurse. I've seen far worse caused by far less.”

“But those men and women were heroes,” he said. “I'm not anything.”

She paused. Looked down at him. “You save lives every day you go to work,” she said. “How are you any different from the people I've cared for?”

He swallowed. “They put their own lives on the line. I didn't.”

She looked at him sadly. Tipped his chin toward her face with her palm. “But you did, sweetheart,” she said, a watery look in her eyes. “You knew there was a shooter loose. You could have locked yourself in your office and barricaded the door, but you didn't. Your priority was trying to make sure everybody was safe, and so that's what you did. How is that not heroism?”

He rubbed the bridge of his nose. His immediate instinct was to counter her. A dragging sense of depression pulled at him like an undertow. He thought about Paul Wandell, the security guard who'd died before seeing his kids at that dance recital. About Noah Cunningham, the man he'd found with a chunk of his neck blown off near the admissions desk, the man who'd died stepping in front of a bullet for Ben Forks, another security guard. Noah had been a hero. Not Derek.

“You didn't save anybody, and you still got shot,” whispered Gary Clark.

Derek looked at his lap, tired. Beaten. “I didn't help anyone, and I'm not making any progress.”

“Derek,” his mother said. “You helped Meredith, didn't you? And her friend? You made them hide. And how many other people did you get to safety? It's quiet heroism. You'll never know for sure if things would have gone differently had you not intervened. People might not cheer on your behalf. But it's heroism all the same.”

His lower lip quivered. He'd never told her any of that. None of it. Which meant... somebody had spoken up for him. Somebody. Meredith, maybe. Or... He blinked against the blur. He felt tears crawling down his face. He really wanted to believe his mother. He did. He wanted that so much, but the undertow kept pulling and pulling...

“When I last saw you, you could barely walk. You've been shot, and you'd just lost a baby. Today, you picked me up from the airport. You've quit drugs. You're starting a beautiful family. Tell me, how is that not progress? Can you tell me that?”

He broke in the wake of all that pulling. He wanted to believe her so badly, but today just felt... awful. Like the day he'd snapped and threatened Dr. Kepner for a prescription he'd only just barely not filled. “I think I'm having a bad day,” he said. “I'm...”

And he couldn't speak again.

“But you have good days,” said his mother. She brushed his face with the back of her palm. “You do have good days, right?”

He nodded. He'd had two bad days in a month, and he'd gone about two weeks between them. Two days out of twenty-eight had been bad. 7% bad. That was all.

“Usually,” he said. “Usually, I'm good.”

He'd gone two weeks without one, this time, and he'd been pushing and pushing. Planning Meredith's surprise had taken it out of him. Hanging the lights on the house had taken it out of him. Meredith yelling and screaming at him had taken it out of him. Seeing all the pain he'd helped cause when Meredith had been crying in his arms had taken it out of him. Nightmares and no sleep had taken it out of him. Waking up in a strange house had taken it out of him. Trying to stay sane in that horrible airport had taken it out of him.

His lip wouldn't stop quivering. “Usually,” he repeated. He wiped frantically at his face with his palms. His skin hurt. His eyes hurt. “I'm usually good. I'm usually good.” He latched onto that. He had to. He needed it.

His mother smiled at him. “Usually is progress, isn't it?”

He nodded mutely.

A warm hand splayed against his back. “I know it's really hard to see positive things when you're feeling so down,” she said.
He nodded again, and he curled back into her arms. She held him.

“I know,” she whispered in his ears, and the undertow didn't feel so terrible anymore. He took a deep, quivering breath. “I know,” she said once more, her voice like a soothing balm, and things almost felt bearable again. She pulled her fingers through his hair, and it felt... nice. So safe. He craved safe.

He clutched her shirt.

Samantha perked, lifted her head off her paws, and wagged her stumpy tail as she stared at the door. Derek followed her brown gaze. Meredith stood in the doorway to the kitchen, her tiny body blocking the door from swinging shut. Sleep had rumpled her hair and hazed her eyes. She looked less pale. A lot more rested.

Mortified. But rested.

He squinted at her tiredly over his mother's arm.

“I'm so sorry,” she said. She made a weird motion with her hand. Like she couldn't quite figure out what gesture was appropriate. “I didn't mean to eavesdrop on private mother/son whatever stuff. I heard... Crap!” She opened her mouth. Closed it. Opened it. “I'm sorry.” And then she turned like she would leave. The door slipped closed an inch as she twitched in the direction of the living room, but his mother moved to stop her.

The warm cocoon his mother had made around his torso disappeared. Derek closed his eyes. Pressed his face against his hands. His elbows slid on the table. He slumped.

“Congratulations, sweetheart,” he heard his mother say. The soft rustle of fabric and Meredith's awkward squeak told him Meredith was getting another hug. And only then, outside his selfish well of needing reassurance, did his mother finally let loose her enthusiasm. “I hear I'm going to be a grandmother again! How fantastic! Have you picked out any names?”

“Um,” Meredith said. “Um... When? We... Anne. Anne for a girl.”

The tension in her voice called him. He should get up. He should get up and rescue her. He knew it. He hadn't meant for her to walk into this conversation without preparing her first. Letting her know his mother knew about the baby.

The adrenaline receding from his veins had other plans for him, though. He'd told his mother. Everything. And he usually had good days. The stress-born ache in his muscles remained, but the stress itself slipped out of him like water from a sieve. He became a puddle of limbs in desperate need of rest, and he just couldn't bring himself to intervene, not knowing full well that, while Meredith might be flustered, his mother was entirely benign.

“Anne is very pretty,” Carolyn said.

“We don't know anything yet,” Meredith said, stress constricting her voice. “The first appointment is... it's today.” A pause. “In an hour and a half.”

They exchanged some other words, but the longer Derek kept his eyes closed, the more it all seemed to blur against the buzz of exhaustion in his head. He rubbed the bridge of his nose while they chattered back and forth. Well, more his mother chattered. Meredith replied in monosyllabic, ruffled bleats.

By the time Meredith sat down in the chair beside him, he'd begun to doze. He snapped awake when she said his name. He blinked and looked around. His mother had left the room. Samantha had left, as well. Muzzily, he glanced at his watch and was shocked to discover ten minutes had slipped away while he'd been in oblivion. Ten minutes in only a second. Ten minutes that had done nothing for him. He found himself wishing he'd taken that nap earlier. He rubbed his eyes.

“Hey,” he said tiredly.

She gave him a soft, watery smile. “Hi,” she said. And then she touched his arm. Fixated on a tiny swirl of hair on his forearm and twisted it around her nail. Her touch relaxed him, and he sighed.

She stayed silent for a long while. “So, you told her.”

“Yeah,” Derek said.

She took a short breath and let it loose. “Thank you. I'm glad it's over with.” She scooted her chair closer to him and wrapped her arms around his shoulders, locking her palms in front of his chest. She rested her chin against him. Her grip tightened. She kissed him. “For your bad day,” she murmured. “I'm really sorry you're not feeling well.”

He swallowed. So, she'd heard that part. “I'm usually good,” he said, unable to keep his frustration from clamping like a vise around each syllable. He squeezed his fists together. “I'm usually good. I am, Mere.”

She kissed him again. “I know you are. I know it.”

He sighed. “Sometimes, I don't.”

“It's good you have a wingman, then, isn't it?” she said.

“Woman,” he said, his voice rough.

“Whatever,” she whispered.

He took a long, silent moment of comfort in her embrace, and then he turned in her grasp. Splayed his palm against her womb. Warmth seeped into his fingertips. She breathed, and he closed his eyes, imagining what she carried beneath her skin. Magic. “Are you worried about the baby, still?” he said.

She nodded. “I don't think I'll ever stop until it's out of me.”

He kissed her. Gave her a small smile. “Mere, I think parents don't ever stop worrying about their kids, ever, at least a little.”

“Shut up,” she said. “You knew what I meant.”

They sit interlocked for a long while.

“She put her hand over her stomach, over his palm. “To see the baby. I'm sick of waiting. And you need something good today.”
“You believe me, now?” he said.

She nodded jerkily. “Really, really trying to,” she said, and she gave him a brave face that melted his heart. He couldn't help but kiss her.

“I'll get my keys,” he said, and then he stood. Excitement burgeoned, and all that remained of the undertow stopped pulling, at least for a little while.

When Meredith stepped onto the front porch and found Carolyn crying as she petted the dog, Meredith froze. Samantha whuffed softly, blowing Meredith's cover, which made two times in all of twenty minutes Meredith had been foiled by her lacks-comprehension-of-stealth dog. The silver-haired woman swiped at her eyes with the backs of her palms and looked up before Meredith could even think about a tactful retreat.

Meredith lowered the water bottle she’d been chugging from her lips. What was with her walking in on private moments, today? It was like Carolyn had a Meredith magnet hidden somewhere in her pockets.

“Oh, hello, dear,” Carolyn said, her voice thick with emotion. Her eyes were slightly red and watery, and the space below her eyelids glistened. The wet breeze ruffled her short hair. Drizzle made the air seem misty. The swing creaked as it swayed back and forth.

“I'm so sorry,” Meredith said. “I didn't mean to intrude. I'll just...” She turned toward the door. “I'll...”

Her water bottle crinkled as she squeezed it. She'd started drinking frantically to make sure she'd be full by her appointment. Luckily, she hadn't used the bathroom after her nap, so she was well on her way to floating already.

“No, no,” Carolyn said. She waved Meredith forward. “Please, sit.”

Meredith blinked. She twitched indecisively toward the bench. Then away. Then toward.

“I promise I don't bite,” Carolyn said with a soft smile.

Meredith sighed a short little sigh. And then she sat. She petted the dog awkwardly, not really looking at Carolyn. Are you okay? The obvious question sat on her tongue, a thick, clogged bunch of words that refused to budge into spoken syllables. She didn't think she was supposed to have seen the crying and didn't know what to say about it. Or if anything should be said at all.

“I'm sorry,” Meredith said. “I'm... I don't mean to keep intruding.”

Carolyn shook her head. “You're not intruding at all,” she said. She ran her old, worn fingers through her silver hair. She gestured at Meredith's purse. “Going to your appointment?”

Meredith nodded, her stomach sinking at the subject change. “Yes, I'm...”

She swallowed, unable to finish. She could put on a brave smile for Derek in light of how badly he needed to see one that day. It wasn't really a lie – her world of worries tended to fall away whenever he wrapped his arms around her. But Derek wasn't there, now. She looked down at her abdomen, her flat abdomen that didn't look pregnant at all, frowning, and she couldn't think of what to say. Couldn't think of anything to say about anything. So, she tipped back her water bottle and chugged to save herself from having to communicate by smiling or frowning or babbling or otherwise. She dared a glance at Carolyn as she gulped, only to find the woman gazing knowingly at her.

“It's very hard after a miscarriage,” Carolyn said.

Meredith brought her water down from her lips and swallowed. “You mean you—”

Carolyn nodded. “The gap between Derek and Amelia.”

“Oh,” Meredith said. “Oh, I'm...” Awkward, awkward, awkward. She gulped. “I'm sorry.”

But Carolyn gave her another soft, kind smile. Touched Meredith's shoulder and squeezed it. “The waiting gave me Amelia.”

Samantha rose to her feet as the front door opened, and Derek strode onto the porch. He looked a bit shaky and unkempt, but so much better. Bright-eyed. Excited. His keys jingled as he let Samantha back inside. “Ready to go?” he said.

Meredith stood. The swing creaked. She glanced at Derek's car. Then at him. “Yeah,” she said, the word a bare gasp. His smiles and excitement weren't helping much, anymore.

As if he'd read her freaking mind, he walked over, draped his arms over her shoulders, and leaned in to kiss her. To replenish her. She took comfort in his larger body, breathing and alive beside her. When she pulled away, things seemed better. At least, for a moment.

She glanced at Carolyn. Her eyes were still a bit red, but Meredith doubted anybody who hadn't caught the woman crying would assume tears had been involved. Carolyn gave her another kind smile.

“Show me pictures when you get back,” the older woman said.

“You'll be the very first one to see them,” Derek said with a kilowatt smile that made Meredith want to melt all over again. Melt in the wake of his absolute surety.

Meredith swallowed. Bit her lip. Looked at Derek, who was smiling and happy, and then back at Carolyn. The woman had been upset. Leaving her alone just seemed... mean. Mean and inconsiderate, and Derek would never offer, wouldn't presume in a million years that Meredith wanted his mother around for something like this. Meredith wasn't even sure she wanted his mother around for something like this, but...

Derek squeezed her shoulders. The mom prospect didn't seem so scary, in light of him standing there.

“Do you want to come along?” Meredith said, taking the plunge into the ice cold water of family.

Meredith stared at the fleshy orange backs of her eyelids, unwilling to open them as Derek's babbling brook of words washed over her. Doctors' offices were too bright and cold and miserable and austere and they reeked of antiseptic, she decided. Well, this one reeked. They used some stupid pine solution, and she'd barely gotten used to the lemony crap they used at Seattle Grace.

Her stomach roiled at the sharp smells, and she clenched her teeth, trying to think of something else. Something else that didn't stink or otherwise make her want to vomit. Like a birdbath. Or the beach. Or a stiff margarita. Or naked Derek melting ice cubes on his hot, sweaty skin.
Damn it.

She had to pee. Really, really had to pee. Like... couldn't stop thinking of waterfalls and sprinklers and faucets and metaphors that involved sailing or melting wet things on her sexy husband had to pee.

The gel on her abdomen felt slippery and cold, and she bit her lip as she felt the gentle press of the ultrasound wand against her skin. She tightened her fingers around Derek's. He held her hand and hadn't let go from the moment that he, Carolyn, and Meredith had entered the waiting room, except when Meredith had needed said hand to change into her hospital gown. Then, he'd let go, but he'd found her palm again as she'd climbed onto the examination table. The warmth of his skin at her fingertips was the only thing keeping her sailing down the dark and twisty river of Not At All Calm instead of stopping at Port Unadulterated Panic.

She waited for the news.

Bad news.

Your baby is sick. Defective. Dead.

Your uterus is broken.

You're a crap incubator.

Why did you even try to get pregnant?

What a stupid idea!

She knew it was coming. The frown and the looks and the lecture.

“Can she get some Zofran?” Derek said. “Just for when her nausea is really bad. She can't do her job, and she gets home feeling awful. She wouldn't even eat s'mores last night.”

“I'm sure the doctor can write a prescription to help with that,” said the ultrasound technician, who had introduced herself as Betty or Bessie or Nessie or something.

Derek hadn't let go of Meredith's hand since they'd gotten there, but he also hadn't shut up, either.

Meredith scrunched her frozen toes. Her socks felt a little wet from sweat. Her limbs had a nervous tremor to them, almost like her knees would knock if they could. Her hospital gown stuck to her spine, and her legs stuck to the stupid paper covering the examination table. Every time she tried to move, a crinkle, crinkle, crinkle noise obliterated the relative quiet, though Derek didn't seem to notice her nervous shifting.

He just kept talking.

“She said no to s'mores last night,” Derek said beside her. “She never says no to chocolate, anyway, but I've since learned not to get between her and her marshmallows, either. I was flabbergasted. Flabbergasted. And I was thinking maybe Phenergan would help, but that causes a lot of drowsiness, and she needs to be good for surgery. I remember reading something about using Zofran inst—”

“Let's see,” said Betty/Bessy/Nessie, her tone quiet as she politely interrupted Derek's motorboat mouth. The wand stopped moving against Meredith's abdomen. “Ma'am, are you all right?”
His behavior didn't make any sense, Meredith decided. When Derek got nervous or scared, he got quiet. He turned inward, and he gravitated toward sitting in the dark, alone, curled up in a ball in a blanket. This babbling brook of words was weird for him, and it was driving her freaking batty, not knowing the why of it.

“Ma'am?” said the technician.

Meredith shook her head. “Fine,” she said, her teeth almost chattering with excess nerves. The wand moved again. Why couldn't the technician find the damned baby? “I'm fine.” Not. “I'm listening.” Not. “I'm just...”

Not.

Not ready.

Not ready for this.

Her bladder ached, and she wondered if any of this was even worth it anymore.

“It'll be okay, Mere,” Derek said too quickly. “It'll be perfect, just like I told you.” He paused for a nanosecond to take a breath. “I'm just really worried about the vomiting. How can she possibly be eating enough to feed the baby, let alone herself? She can't eat at work, and she works long shifts. It's—”

And then Derek got quiet. All at once. The words stopped, and his hand went lax, and his breathing hitched like he'd been smacked stupid by a battering ram, which was more like what she was used to when he was scared.

“There we go,” said the ultrasound tech, her voice soft.

Meredith swallowed. Maybe, Derek had never been nervous. Just so excited he couldn't shut up. But, now, whatever he'd seen had driven him back into silence.

Derek regained his wits and his hand tightened so much around hers that his grip made her finger bones hurt. His breathing resumed, each inhalation a quiet but deep, messy, wrecked sound that spoke of emotion. She'd heard it before in the midst of his panic attacks. Or when he was crying. When he was crying, he made little sounds like that.

She couldn't look.

Couldn't breathe.

This was bad.

“I, uh...” Derek managed before his words constricted into tight, upset silence. She had the innate sense of him standing next to her, his hip pressed against the examination table. His shoes shifted on the tiled floor. The space between them lessened. She felt the heat radiating from his skin as his cheek neared hers. Like he needed to be closer. “That's...”

When he lost his words again, she snapped in two. “Oh, god,” Meredith said as her eyes pricked with tears. “What's wrong with it?”

“Nothing,” Derek said, the word rough like it'd been dragged over gravel.

“What do you mean, nothing?” Meredith said.
She cracked open her eyelids to peer at him dubiously. At first, she saw nothing but a messy blur wrought by her preemptive tears. She blinked, and her gaze sharpened. She focused on her hand, wrapped in Derek's larger one. Her heart squeezed at the connection, now more than ever. Derek stood beside her, hunched to be as close to her level on the table as he could. He stared at the tiny display with unblinking wet eyes that were leaking just a little, leaking that he wasn't even trying to hide, and didn't seem embarrassed about in the slightest. His lips had parted, and his pupils were dancing with a sort of dumbstruck, pleased amazement that was infectious.

He wasn't upset. Or he was, but he wasn't. Not in a bad way.

She had to look, too.

Had to.

She had to see why he was so amazed.

“Just look, Mere,” he said as if he'd followed her thought process. His tone was quiet. Reverent. Awed.

She shifted her scrutiny to her other side. The paper crinkled loudly, but she barely noticed as her gaze came to rest on the ultrasound tech, who looked... happy. The woman looked happy like she'd just had a piece of Izzie's cake. She held the wand to Meredith's belly with blue hands. Not blue hands. Blue nitrile gloves. Beyond the blue and the wand and the technician's opposite shoulder rested the monitor for the ultrasound machine, and on that monitor was a grainy black and white blob that—

“Everything looks perfect so far,” said the technician. “Just perfect.”

Meredith swallowed, not quite ready to believe. “Really?” she said.

The technician nodded. “Really,” she said with another cake smile.

“Really?” Meredith said. Her chest constricted, and her breaths shortened to match Derek's. “Really perfect?”

“Yes, really,” said the technician with a soft laugh. “It's a little too early to tell the sex, yet, though.”

“That's okay,” Meredith said. She yanked her hand from Derek's and scrubbed her face hard, still not quite sure she could trust her eyes. She propped herself on her elbows and looked. Meredith was no expert, but she'd read enough ultrasounds to stare at their blob and think tiny human.

“It's not sick?” she said, leaning forward.

“Not sick,” said Derek.

“Not defective?”

“Just look,” he said.

And Meredith looked.

Really looked.

Saw Baby for the first time.
Their Baby, whom she'd talked to on occasion the past few weeks.

Their Baby, who was not sick or defective or dead, in her uterus that apparently wasn't broken.

Their Baby, who looked strong and perfect.

Their Baby, whom she and Derek had made together.

Their Baby.

She couldn’t tear her eyes away from it. The thing on the monitor was inside her. She felt the heat of Derek pulling closer, if that were possible. He came behind her and put his chin at the juncture of her neck and shoulder. He put his warm hands over hers and looked down the length of her body toward the machine. His soft-but-full-of-too-much-everything breathing beside her ear was so reassuring.

“Can we hear the heartbeat?” Derek said, his words barely put together.

The technician nodded. She paused with the wand, pressed a button on the machine, and then in addition to Derek's breathing, Meredith heard the unmistakable, rapid flutter of Baby's tiny heart plugging along for all it was worth like any healthy, tiny heart should.

“That's really...” Meredith swallowed, overwhelmed to the point that she couldn't articulate the bursting feeling inside. She laughed, and the feeling took flight into the air. “It's loud!”

Euphoria.

That was the feeling.

She wanted to put her hands on her belly and feel with her fingers what she was seeing with her eyes, but the cold goop and the stupid wand and the technician's blue nitrile gloves were in the way.

“Looks like it's ten weeks along,” said the technician in the blur.

Not eight like Meredith had thought. Which meant Derek was right and had been right all along. When he was trying to get her pregnant, he didn't kid around. He’d knocked her up the first night they’d started trying, or soon after. Which was, probability-speaking... mind boggling. She found it nearly impossible to believe the universe had gone so right for them that it had actually defied the odds, even just this once, but there it was. On the monitor. The evidence.

“Seriously?” Meredith said.

The technician frowned at the display and leaned closer to the monitor. She paused for several seconds, and then she shrugged. “Well, the doctor will probably be able to be more specific as far as your due date, but... yeah. I’d say ten weeks or so.”

“Told you so,” Derek whispered against Meredith's ear, and then he kissed her there and along her jawline in a trail. He swallowed. “God, it's perfect. I told you it's perfect. It's so perfect.”

Which was when Meredith realized Derek was too befuddled to care about their bet or the fact that he'd been right and wouldn't have to eat a fluffernutter. Hell, she was too befuddled. By everything.

“We need to buy a crib,” she said, blinking back tears. “And a high chair.” It'd been real, but it hadn't been real before, and now it was... “And stuffed animals.” It just was. “And... baby stuff.”
With him. “We don't have any baby stuff.” It was with him, and it was real, and— “I don't know what stuff to get.”

“We'll figure it out,” Derek said. “My mom can help. She has a bit of experience, you know.”

He sounded so sure.

How could he sound so sure, even when he sounded so freaking wrecked?

And this was a wrecking sort of thing. This was huge.

They'd made a baby.

Really made one.

The long deferred promise of her first pregnancy had finally been fulfilled.

Her legs started to shake again when it sank in. Everything shook. She leaned into him. Pressed her nose against his throat and inhaled. He smelled good. Soothing.

The ultrasound tech took the wand away and wiped Meredith’s belly off with a towel. As soon as it was okay, Meredith sat up, and she curled into his arms as tightly as she could go without toppling off the exam table. She pressed her ear against his chest and listened to him breathing. To his heartbeat, which was so much slower and more distinct than their baby's. Their baby's.

She slipped her hand between him and her, pressed her palm flat against her abdomen, which still had no bump, but she'd seen it, now. Seen the blob that was their baby. Their baby. Derek placed his hand against hers. His skin was a blast of warmth.

She couldn't pay attention to the technician, who puttered about, putting things away. Couldn't pay attention to anything but the picture in her head of the blob she'd just seen. Of the night Baby had likely been conceived. Of Derek, naked in her arms. It had been so awkward at first, that first night they'd started having sex again, but now, in her head, it just felt magical.

_I forgot how nice... You feel nice, Meredith._

_Only nice?

_I'm not exactly a thesaurus when I'm inside you._

“Are you okay?” Derek said.

_No condom, and no birth control. We've never done this before with nothing at all. Just you and me._

“We really made a baby,” she said against his soft t-shirt. Just him and her.

They'd done that.

He hiccupped with emotion. “Yeah.” The rumble of his voice tickled the side of her ear. “We did.”

“Something went right.”

Another hiccup. “Yeah,” he said. “It did. It's perfect.”
But so many things had gone wrong on the way to here. So many terrible things. And so many things weren't perfect, even then, after so much. And now they had a Baby.

“Let's go early,” Meredith said.

He frowned. “Go where?”

She scrunched his shirt between her fingers. “City Hall. Let's go, now.”

“What?”

“Let's get married.”

He pulled back. Wiped his eyes. Blinked at her. “You mean, now? Like right now?”

“Why not?” she said. “Your mother's in the waiting room. We already have our marriage license. I could call Cristina and Mark really quick...”

A soft knock on the door interrupted her. The doctor strode into the room carrying a chart, a bright smile on her face. She looked a bit like Princess Leia, sans earmuff buns. Her blondish hair was cropped into a pixie cut, and she wore a pink stethoscope and a white lab coat over pink scrubs.

“Hello, I'm Dr. Charlton,” she said.

“Hello,” Derek said to her.

“Hi,” said Meredith, her voice still warble-y as she thought of Baby.

As Dr. Charlton shut the door behind herself and approached, Derek looked at Meredith and smiled. He pulled her fidgety hand into his and squeezed it. “I do have my keys this time,” he said.

They stood in a tight clot of bodies that barely fit into the room. Hulking bookshelves lined the dingy white walls of the windowless office, making the room seem even tighter around them than it should have been. Opposite the door rested a mahogany executive desk that gleamed under the overhead lights. Behind the opposing desk sat a man. A short, heavyset man, no taller than Dr. Bailey, with a bulbous nose, nostrils exploding with bushy salt-and-pepper-colored hair, and a poof-y dead raccoon, or something, sitting on his head. Maybe, not a dead raccoon. But it was... something. Something seemed to be an apt description. And Meredith couldn't tear her eyes away from it for the longest stretch of silence.

The little man glared back at them with a disinterested sniff. He brushed his sleek black robes with his hands as if to primp like a cat. His desk was stacked high with papers and books and other official-looking things. Even a fancy gavel and a round striker plate. Like, perhaps, in his spare time, he whacked the thing on the desk for fun.

Did judges even use gavels in weddings?

“Crap, I'm sorry,” Meredith said. She glanced at Derek, but he said nothing to help her. He seemed more focused on his shoes than anything else. Ever since he'd told Alex, Lexie, and Cristina about his drug problem, he'd acted like a shrinking violet who didn't know English around them, which was neutral at best, but at times like this, extremely. Freaking. Irritating.

Damn it.
She sighed, frustration making her teeth clench. “Can't we just—?” She waved her hands in a useless gesture. “Forgo the party limit this time? I mean we're all already here...” The butterflies playing tag in her stomach – why were butterflies playing tag in her stomach?? – and the shiver of excitement and last minute nerves compounded her frustration. Made it hard to think.

She was getting married. Really legally married. They would need a lawyer to undo it. Not that they would ever undo it. But... yeah.

It was a Big Thing.

The judge shook his head and looked down his nose imperiously at them. “Rules are rules,” he said in a booming bass that belied his tiny frame. Meredith glanced at the shiny nameplate sitting on his desk. Honorable Ian Cobblebodum. She couldn't help snorting despite her irritation as he continued, “Only six people in the wedding party are allowed in the room.”

Meredith turned to face said wedding party. Owen, Chief Webber, Mark, Lexie, Alex, Cristina, and Derek's mother fanned around her. Meredith felt squished between them and the desk.

“Well, what should we do?” Meredith said.

“You can start by removing three people,” said the judge behind her.

“How did you get this job?” Lexie said. “You're upholding an institution of love, a culmination of romance and happiness, and you're being a crotchety old fussbudget.” And then her face flushed bright red, her eyes widened, and her hand flew to her mouth, like she couldn't believe what she'd said. “I mean...”

And then she gave up trying to explain what she meant.

Judge Cobblebodum peered imperiously down his nose at Lexie. “Young lady, I am what you get when you sign up to get married at the last moment in the last appointment slot of the day. All the happy judges are done for the day, and I got pulled out of an office birthday party for this.”

“Oh,” said Lexie.

“I'm missing chocolate cake,” said the judge. He crinkled his nose and gestured between Meredith and Derek. “They'll just divorce in a few years, and I'll probably miss chocolate cake for that, too.”

Lexie stared, mouth agape. Meredith frowned.

“And I thought I was cynical,” Cristina said.

“Try not to be when you've done this for fifty years,” said Judge Cobblebodum, grumbling as he shifted in his chair. “Can we get on with this, please?”

“Um,” Meredith said, swallowing. “Well...”

She couldn't ask one of them to leave, let alone three. How was she supposed to pick something like that? Especially after she'd dragged all of them there on a last minute phone call, and they'd waited with her for an hour in the waiting room downstairs while the frazzled clerk had penciled them into the only open slot of the day. And she was really getting married. Right the hell now. This was...

“I'll wait outside,” Owen said before she could resort to eenie-meanie.
Meredith glanced at Cristina, who shrugged. “But—” Meredith began.

“It's fine; trust me,” Owen said. He smiled and reached forward to shake Derek's hand. Derek flinched. Not much. Enough for Meredith to feel his body twitch beside her. Owen didn't call attention to the movement. He shifted his smile smoothly to Meredith. “Congratulations,” he said while Derek collected himself. Owen shuffled back one step, two. The doorknob clicked as he pulled on the heavy door. Noise from the outside hallway rushed in. Voices. Bustle. And then he slipped out of the room.

“That was very nice of him,” Carolyn said as the door slid shut. Quiet covered them once more like a soft blanket.

The Chief nodded. “It was.”

“Sorry,” Derek muttered. The first word he'd spoken in an hour, almost.

“Whatever. We've all got stuff,” Alex said.

Meredith looked at Derek. Really looked at him for the first time since this chaos had begun. Derek had been quietly following her lead since she'd decided the wedding must proceed early. He'd made phone calls when she'd asked him to. Gotten directions when she'd asked him to. Driven when she'd asked him to, so she could worry about planning. He'd seemed excited and sedately pleased with the situation, but then everybody had started to arrive, and he'd melted into the chaos, forgotten.

From the tight, straight line of his lips, to the small dots of sweat on his pale brow, perhaps his reticent behavior didn't have so much to do with shyness after all. Or maybe shyness was dancing hand-in-hand with another problem. He was having a bad day, and the press of the crowd couldn't be doing him and his peace-of-mind any favors.

“There are still too many people in this room,” Judge Cobblebodum said as if to echo her thoughts.

Alex nodded. “I'll wait outside, too.”

“Alex...” Meredith said.

“I'm just here for you,” he said with a shrug. “I can be here for you in the hallway with Hunt.”

He gave her a pointed look. The world seemed to spin on that moment, and Meredith swallowed.

“We're not hopeful, Dr. Weston had said.

What do you mean, you're not hopeful? she'd practically growled into the phone.

I truly very sorry, but I mean you might want to come and say your goodbyes.

He can't die.

Dr. Grey—

My husband has spaghetti for insides, and he can't even sit up. Alex can't die right now.

Dr. Grey, I'm—

He can't! she'd snapped. She'd hung up the phone, unable to think about Alex when she'd barely been processing the very real possibility of Derek's death. She hadn't gone to visit Alex until over a week later. Lexie had stayed with him. Day and night for weeks. To the point that their house had seemed like a ghost town when Meredith had brought Derek home from the hospital.

The room seemed to blur.

People had always left her. Always.

Except they hadn't left her this time. Nobody had left her. And, now, she was getting married. And it was...

Big.

It was really. Really. Big.

And permanent.

“Alex,” she said around the sudden lump in her throat. “I'm getting married.” The words were a bare, cracking whisper she could barely hear.

Alex grinned at her. “Is that why we're at the courthouse?” he teased.

“Shut up,” she muttered softly, blinking through the wet blur filming her eyes.

“Please, please don't go crazy hormonal right now,” Cristina said. “I'm still recuperating from yesterday.”

“Leave her alone,” Lexie said.

“Are you okay?” Derek said softly beside her.

“Yeah,” Meredith said. She wiped her face, and the backs of her hands came away sticky. “I'm not crazy,” she added.

“But definitely hormonal,” Cristina said.

“Only I'm allowed to say that,” Meredith said. “If you say it, it's mean and judge-y.”

“Seriously?”

Meredith nodded, sniffing. “Yes.”

“You realize how ridiculous that sounds,” Cristina said, in a tone that was not a question.

“Yes,” Meredith said. “If you ever have a baby, you'll understand.”

“I'll never have a baby,” Cristina said.

“Well, join me in the land of the hypothetical!”

Cristina crossed her arms. “Fine,” she said. “I'm hypothetically pregnant. Solidarity. Can we get on with this?”

“Shut up,” Meredith said once more.

Cristina rolled her eyes.

Meredith turned to Alex. “Are you sure you don't mind?” she said.
Alex gave her a cheerful wink. “Don't worry about it,” he said. “I'll be right outside with Hunt.”

“Me, too,” said Chief Webber.

Meredith's jaw dropped. “But, Chief!”

The Chief glanced at Lexie and Cristina. “Family is important,” he said, his voice honey rich and soft. He squeezed Meredith on the shoulder. His gaze lasted long enough to make her blush and look awkwardly to the threadbare, orange carpet. “I'm very proud of you,” he added. He glanced at Derek. “Both of you.” Then he followed Alex out the door.

The fan of people around her and Derek loosened, and along with the lower people density, Derek loosened up, too. He took a deep, cleansing breath and exhaled beside her as if he'd just been removed from agony. Perhaps he had been. She felt a bit claustrophobic in this tiny room herself. She could only imagine how he felt, and all at once, she was glad they'd opted for a small Big Gigantic Permanent wedding. She couldn't imagine the Shepherd family zoo in addition to this. This was cramped, and Dr. Bailey hadn't even arrived yet.

“Thank you,” Judge Cobblebodum said. “That was most irregular. A party of nine. Hmph.”

“I should have read the stupid website,” Meredith said. “Stupid, stupid spontaneity.”

“It's not stupid,” Derek said.

“I dragged a ton of people out of surgery to not be my witnesses,” Meredith said. “How is that not stupid?”

Lexie rifled through her purse. “I can record it with my iPhone, so they can still see it.”

Meredith frowned, looking pointedly at the black camera dangling from Lexie's neck by a thick strap that had turned some of her skin a blushing, irritated red. “I thought you were taking pictures,” she said.

“I can take pictures,” Mark offered.

“But you're my best man,” Derek said.

“I'll take pictures,” Carolyn interjected. She stretched out her hand toward Lexie. “Hand me the camera, please. You can do your phone... thing.”

Lexie handed her iPhone to Mark and attempted to twist out from the camera. One of the thick buckles caught on her purse strap, which then stuck to her loose hair. “Ow,” she said, the camera in one hand. She didn't move, as if she thought she might disturb equilibrium and rip off her scalp if she did. Mark shuffled closer and tried to disentangle the disaster, a look of consternation crossing his face as he did so.

“This is like juggling,” Cristina said.

Mark snickered as he extracted Lexie's hair from the mess. “With fewer broken plates,” he said. “Ow!” Lexie snarled. “And more pain!”

He flinched and squeezed her shoulder gently. “Sorry.”

“I didn't break any plates,” Derek said as Mark struggled with the camera. “Only you did.”
“Wait a minute...” Cristina said.

“You two juggle?” Lexie said.

Mark nodded. “For hand-eye coordination. In college.”

“Seriously?” Lexie said. Liberated, she spun free of the camera. Mark passed it to Carolyn and handed the iPhone back to Lexie in a one-two shot of motion.

Meredith raised her eyebrows. “Do you knit, too?”

“Derek knits?” Cristina said.

Meredith frowned. “I didn't say that.”

“You implied it by association,” Cristina said.

Lexie sniggered.

“Also,” Cristina said as she swept her judging gaze over Mark and Derek, “neither of them is saying no.”

Derek reddened. “Mom...”

“Sorry,” Carolyn said, grinning. “I couldn't resist.”

“When on earth did you have time to tell Meredith I used to knit?” Derek said.

Carolyn shrugged. “You slept a lot after you were shot, dear.”

“Shot?” said Judge Cobblebodum.

Derek bristled and then relaxed, as if the reminder of his ordeal had slid off of him like water. He gave his mother a wavering smile that lasted for a nanosecond, but it was better than what he would have been able to muster for her only a few weeks before. Without thinking, Meredith touched his shoulder. His soft shirt slid underneath her fingertips as she moved her palm down his bicep, past his elbow, along the soft hairs of his forearm, and interlocked her fingers with his. His larger hand closed around hers. She squeezed his hand, and he squeezed her hand in return.

They shared a look. Had a conversation in silence.

I'm okay, he said but didn't say.

I'm glad, she replied. This is really big. Like hugely gigantic big.

It is. Are you sure you're okay with this?

Yes, she said.

The world fell away as she peered at his eyes and lost herself in the deep blue. He had an older expression than the one he'd worn in the days preceding his injuries. She hated that Gary Clark had taken what little had remained of Derek's innocence. Hated the bloody, open wound Gary Clark had left behind in Derek's optimism. But Derek was doing better. So much better. She saw so many glimmers where she hadn't seen them before, and she felt hope.

He said he was here, now. Not okay, but here. She believed him.
And she did like that.

Mark cleared his throat, breaking the moment. Meredith had no idea how long she and Derek had been staring at each other all freakishly moon-eyed. Her stomach fluttered with nerves, and she swallowed. Maybe, she'd made a mistake, pushing this along. Derek had only just started to iron himself out, and she didn't want that to get messed up. His family thought he was rushing things to the point of mental incompetence. Were they rushing things? Except they were already married. This was no different. Other than needing lawyers to undo it if things went entirely to crap.

Why did this feel different?

“So, should we start without her?” Mark said.

The judge raised his eyebrows. “Without who?” he said, sudden alarm tingeing his tone.

“Derek?” Meredith said, ignoring Cobblebodum. She took a short breath and exhaled, trying to relax. “What do you think?” She wasn't sure whether she was asking for his opinion about Dr. Bailey, or something bigger.

The judge slapped his desk before Derek could answer. The man's robes rustled as he shifted. Meredith still had to look down, even though he'd stood up. “There can be no more people in this room!” he said. “We only allow parties of six, to include the bride and groom!”

Cristina glanced at her watch. “I have surgery in two hours,” she said. “Can we move this along?”

“Did she say she was coming when you called her on the phone?” Lexie said.

Meredith sighed. “She mostly just yelled at me for interrupting an appendectomy.”

“Well, an appendectomy is short,” Lexie said, her tone hopeful.

“I don't think it was laparoscopic.”

“Well, it's... it's less long than lots of long things!”

“Oh, god,” Meredith said. “She's going to kill me if she comes. She'll find a way to get me stuck on scut work for a week.”

“She can't do that,” Lexie said.

“She's Bailey,” Meredith said. “She'd find a way.”

“But why?”

Meredith jabbed her thumb at Cobblebodum. “Because McJudge only wants six people in the room!”

The judge looked most affronted. “Those are the rules,” he said. He brushed his sleeves and sniffed.

Mark clapped Derek on the back. “I'm sure she'll make it, man.”

Meredith swallowed as nerves became nausea. This was bad. This was bad, bad, bad. “I kind of hope she's too busy,” she muttered faintly. She didn't want to have to explain that she'd been too stupid to read the rules on the website before calling everybody under the sun. Not to Dr. Bailey. Not after the woman dropped everything, including a man's appendix, to witness this very Big Gigantic Huge Monstrously Permanent event.

“The cake is probably gone by now. No need to hurry on my account,” the judge said with withering look.

“We're really sorry,” Meredith said. She rubbed her temples. She was wearing a t-shirt and jeans. So was Derek. She'd dragged him here with no forewarning straight from the OB-GYN appointment. This was a Big Gigantic Huge Monstrously Permanent event, and they'd shown up dressed for the beach. A cold beach, at least. Her bikini would have been a bit much. Well, a bit little, literally speaking. Not that she wanted a gown or anything. But she could have worn a dress. Or spent some time on her hair. Or anything. “We just wanted—”

“I'll call her,” Mark said. “Maybe, she's on her way.” Mark stepped out of the room, and the outside noise blasted Meredith's ears before the door slid shut. She felt a bit lightheaded.

“Is there a chair?” she asked. Somebody pushed one against her knees, and she dropped like a brick into it.

“Dr. Bailey will be here,” Lexie said. “I'm sure. This was just so last minute.”

Definitely last minute.

And possibly rash.

Was this rash?

“Why did you bump this up, anyway?” Cristina said, as if reading Meredith's conscience like a novel.

“Weren't you just criticizing them last night for the fact that they hadn't done it already?” Lexie said.

“I only pointed out that Evil Spawn's logic was logical.”

“I wanted to do it now,” Meredith said, her voice faint. Her hand wandered to her bellybutton and lower, and she rubbed in a slow, soothing circle to calm herself down. She didn't realize what she was doing until half-a-rotation into the motion, and by then it was too late.

“Oh, no,” Cristina said. “You saw the blob squirm on the ultrasound and got all goopy, didn't you?”

“It's not goopy.”

“It's kind of goopy,” Cristina countered.

“I'll have you know I'm still very dark and twisty!” Meredith responded.

Cristina sighed. “I think you lost the dark and twisty handbook.”

“There's a handbook?” Lexie said.

“If there is,” Derek muttered, “I haven't found it.”

Meredith's stomach flip-flopped again. This wasn't a mistake. Derek was feeling better, and they had a baby on the way, and she loved him more than her own life, and he loved her, and what was mistake-y about that? They'd only bumped things up by a few days, anyway.
Nothing was mistake-y, she told herself angrily.

This was just jitters.

Wedding jitters.

Oh, god. Cristina was right.

How had Meredith gotten to a point in her life where she could have wedding jitters? Men were merely bed warmers until a few years ago. But, now, she was marrying one in a Big Gigantic Huge Monstrously Permanent sense. She was pregnant and thinking goopy thoughts about babies.

Babies!

And why did she have to freak out at such inopportune times?

Mark stepped back into the room, cellphone in hand. “She’s—”

Dr. Bailey stepped into the room behind him, her arms folded across her chest. She looked like she’d just stepped out of surgery. Literally. Her swept back hairdo had a dent from her surgical mask ties. She wore her scrubs and her white lab coat, which had a red stain on the sleeve that could only be dried blood. She looked at the room's occupants, gazing from Mark, to Lexie, to Cristina, to Carolyn, to Derek, to Meredith, and then to Judge Cobblebodum in the space of an eye blink. Her gaze didn't betray any reaction to the raccoon thing on Cobblebodum's head. She was tough as stone. “Well?” she said.

“She's already,” Mark finished as he pocketed his cellphone.

“You made it,” Derek said, a curious blend of relief and disbelief wrapped around his tone.

“Of course I made it,” Dr. Bailey said with a dismissive shake of her head. “Why wouldn't I make it?”

She glowered, as if to say, Don't get mushy, you big mousse head.

Judge Cobblebodum made an irritated clucking sound. “I cannot abide by having a seven person party in this room!”

“Well, that's a stupid rule,” Dr. Bailey said, turning to the judge. She pushed through the crowd, deftly dodging Meredith's char as she marched toward the desk, her arms still folded. The judge’s gaze paused when he spotted the blood on her sleeve.

“It's a fire hazard to—”

Dr. Bailey's eyes narrowed. “We all survived a shooting four months ago by keeping clear heads. Do we look like people who panic?”

Cobblebodum blinked. “Well, no.” His gaze shifted to Dr. Bailey's state of dress, to her lab coat, where it said Seattle Grace Mercy West in blue embroidery, and then back to her face. “A shooting?”

“Yes, a shooting. Do you really expect us to trample each other if your waste paper basket suddenly catches on fire?”
Judge Cobblebodum reddened. “I—”

Dr. Bailey glared and leaned closer. “I know you didn't make me come all the way down here to kick me out of the room.”

“I most certainly did not,” Judge Cobblebodum said.

“Good,” said Dr. Bailey with a pert nod. “I'm glad we have that settled.”

“I didn't mean—”

“Didn't mean what?” Dr. Bailey said.

Judge Cobblebodum stuttered. Opened his mouth and closed it. With a slight sigh, he pulled an embroidered hanky from his robes and wiped his round face. The raccoon something on his head shifted to reveal a hairline that had retreated to the point of surrender.

Lexie's bubbly laugh made the little judge freeze.

Dr. Bailey peered at Lexie. “Do you have something to add?”

“No, ma'am,” Lexie said. She looked at her shoes as her face turned stoplight red.

Judge Cobblebodum sighed. “Let's just continue,” he said, the fight in his tone lost to resignation as he hid the hanky somewhere in his robes. “Do you two have rings to exchange?”

Meredith froze in her seat. “Um,” she said. Great. “We never really talked about rings.”

The judge frowned. “Vows, then?”

“Crap,” Meredith said. “Vows. I didn't do those, yet.” She looked at Derek helplessly.

Derek shrugged. “I wasn't going to write mine until tonight.”

The butterflies in her stomach picked up mallets, and suddenly she felt herself fighting back tears again. This was huge. Big Gigantic Huge Monstrously Permanent. They'd shown up in t-shirts after she'd gotten goopy and hormonal about a freaking baby. They didn't have rings. They didn't have vows.

Judge Cobblebodum sighed. “I assume this means we're just repeating the canned vows, signing the paperwork, and then I can go back to my empty plate?”

“No, we should totally have real vows,” Meredith said. She struggled to her feet. Her teeth chattered with nerves, and she wiped her face, conscious of free-flowing tears. “It's not real if there aren't any real vows.”

“Who on earth told you that?” Derek said, a touch of horror in his tone.

“Nobody,” Meredith said. “I just...”

She didn't have a chance to finish her thought because he pulled her into his arms. He pressed his forehead against hers. Kissed her. It was easy to forget she was standing in a room with a crotchety old judge and all of her friends.

The things in her orbit went dark around her except for him.
Just him.

She could pretend they had privacy.

“Maybe, we should wait,” he said, the words soft against her face.

“No!” she blurted, her fingers tightening like talons against his shoulders. “I want to marry you. Right the hell freaking now. I don't care if it's Big. You were shot in the chest while I watched, and then you almost died again from complications that arose from fixing that. You were so sick, and they treated me like your neighbor, and I don't want to do it again. If you die on me, I don't want it to be like that, and if I die on you, I want to know you can do the things I couldn't when you were sick. I don't care if it's rash or that we need lawyers if this all goes wrong; I need this. I love our Post-it. I love what it means, and that, in our little denial bubble, it was enough. But the Post-it isn't enough in real life. Real life freaking sucks.”

And there it was.

Silence stretched.

“What Post-it?” Cobblebodum said curiously.

Derek stared at her, gaze searching her face. His thumb brushed her skin. The side of her face. His lip twitched. Like he wanted to say something, but didn't know what it should be, yet. He settled on rubbing her back.

She panted, fighting off dissolution into completely crying all over him. She felt better, now. Calmer. All those jumbles of nerves had exploded out of her mouth. Jitter vomit. The butterflies had died. Her panting became longer breaths became deep, even inhalations and exhalations.

“Real life does suck,” he said. “Doesn't it?”

“I hate it,” she admitted miserably.

“Me, too.”

The bald honesty in his tone slayed her. Derek Shepherd shouldn't be dark and twisty. She closed her eyes and rested against him. “It sucks less like this.”

“It does,” he agreed.

“You're sure this counts with canned vows?”

“My fifty cynical years of experience say it counts,” Judge Cobblebodum assured them with, for once, no sarcastic bite in his tone.

Meredith sighed as their surroundings intruded, and the bubble she'd built popped. Derek's arms tightened like a cocoon around her briefly, and then he let her go. She wiped her face and clawed her messy hair out of her eyes.

“We could just repeat what we have on the Post-it,” Derek said, ignoring the judge.

“What Post-it?” said Cobblebodum. There was something different hovering in his eyes. Something less... bored.

“It was a thing,” Lexie said when no one else leaped to explain. “They planned to come here last year, but George died, and Izzie was sick with cancer, so they signed their vows on a Post-it note instead.”

“A literal Post-it,” Cobblebodum said.

“Yes,” Lexie said. “And don't you dare comment. They're finally here, and you're ruining it!”

“I was only curious,” the judge said indignantly. He glanced at Meredith and Derek. “Please, continue.”

“But I don't know what to say,” Meredith said, feeling helpless.

“You don't need to write paragraphs,” Carolyn said. “Why not just say something simple?”

Meredith frowned. “Like what?”

“Well, Derek, sweetheart,” his mother began, “what's the one thing you really want Meredith to know before you sign the paper?”

Derek blinked, as if the question had caught him by surprise. “I—”

“Wait!” Lexie snapped. She raised her iPhone and hit the record button. “Okay. Action!”

Derek stared at Meredith, an unreadable look on his face.

“Something you maybe haven't told her that you think she should know,” Carolyn prodded.

“I... only knitted the one scarf,” Derek said. “It wasn't an actual hobby.”

Meredith laughed and she felt herself loosen like an uncoiling spring. Derek's eyes twinkled. He'd done that on purpose. To put her at ease. Make her feel better despite how self-conscious she felt. He'd known to do that, and she hadn't asked.

She loved him. She really, really loved him. In a big, share the last piece of cheesecake way.

“Did you really not break any plates?” she said, staring at him.

“I juggled apples,” he said. “Bruised them all to hell, but didn't break anything. It's what you should know about me, I guess.” He winked. “I'm an undercover clown.”

“Not Batman?”

“Oh, I'm him, too,” Derek said.

Meredith laughed.

“I have got to hear this story later,” Cristina said.

“It really does help with hand-eye coordination,” Derek said.

Meredith smiled. “Being Batman?”

He nodded. “Yes.”

The judge cleared his throat. “Must we?” he said.

“Meredith,” Carolyn began, “what would you like Derek to—?”
“Wait,” Derek said, interrupting her. Mark, Cristina, and Lexie stared in a way that made Meredith think they should be shoveling popcorn.

Carolyn's eyebrows rose. “Yes?”

He shook his head, and he swallowed. “What I really want Meredith to know is... is...”

“What?” Meredith said.

“What I haven't told you that I think you should know is...”

“Yes?” she said, exasperated when he couldn't seem to find the words. He tilted his head to the side in that way he did when he considered her. He took in her face with his gaze as though he were memorizing every feature, which seemed weird, because she knew he already had it all memorized. He cupped her chin. His lower lip quivered.

“I'd do it again,” he blurted.

She frowned. “Do what again?”

“Get shot,” he said. “If it meant you would be okay, that you would be safe, I would do it.” His voice got thick and low, like he was fighting a deep swell of emotion. He swallowed. “Without hesitation. No matter what future it meant for me.”

“Oh,” she said, and gravity swept in. She didn't think she'd ever meant that much to anyone. Ever. “But—”

He took a deep breath. “Thank you for being patient with me,” he said. He pressed closer, eyes watery, but never breaking his stare. “It means more than anything to me that you're still here, and you still believe in me, even though I can't figure out how to believe in myself most of the time. Every day we're together, I find more to love about you. You're like a lightning strike. Whatever happens between now and the day I die, I'll never find another you, and I wouldn't want to. You're the love of my life, and I'm really looking forward to spending my future with you.” He swallowed and took a short, hitching breath. “That's what I want you to know.”

“Oh,” she said as her innards sank into her shoes. She blinked at him. "Crap."

“Crap?” Derek said, eyebrows creeping upward. His voice was thick and hard to hear. Like he'd almost been swept away in the emotional sea that had already capsized her.

She shook her head. “I can't match that...”

He smiled. Cleared his throat. “You don't have to match anything. You don't have to say anything if you don't want to.”

“I want to,” she said. She took a breath.

“One moment,” said Judge Cobblebodum.

Everybody turned toward him.

“Do you all know Detective Wolff?” he said.

For a moment, Meredith couldn't place the name, though it sounded familiar.

“Yes,” Derek said, the word soft.
And that was when it hit her. Detective Wolff had tried to interview her after the shooting, but she'd been less than helpful. She'd been too wrapped up in Derek nearly dying to deal with Alex nearly dying, and there'd been way too much nearly dying in general for her to want to recount her experience to a third party. She'd just... snapped in two when he'd called. The Detective had been warm with her, though, warm and understanding, and had never bothered her again.

“He tried to interview us,” Meredith said.

Cobblebodum nodded. “My son-in-law,” he said. And then he fell silent for a long time. He fiddled with his embroidered hanky, which, at some point, he'd pulled out of his robes again. He twisted it in his hands until it wrinkled.

“Sir,” Derek said. “I—”

“Shh!” said Cobblebodum. “I am deliberating.”

And the silence stretched. And stretched. Meredith glanced at Derek, who looked back at her and shrugged, a curious frown on his face. The gavel crashing on the striker plate was a loud sound in a small space, and the thunder of the motion made him flinch and bump into her. He reached for her shoulder with a shaky palm to steady himself.

“I've decided,” the judge announced, oblivious to Derek's discombobulation, though Derek seemed to unwind in moments. Meredith ran her palm against Derek's spine. The warmth of his skin seeped through his shirt into her palm, and he relaxed against her. The judge turned to Lexie. “Young lady,” he said. “Why don't you show the three gentlemen back into the room?”

Lexie gaped. “But I thought it was a fire hazard,” she said.

The judge peered at her. “Would you like me to change my mind?”

Lexie shifted toward the door, no further encouragement needed.

“Ray would be really happy to hear you're doing well,” Cobblebodum said simply after she'd stepped out. “He worked... very hard on that case.”

Meredith stared at Coddlebodum. “Thank you,” she said, the words thick and low. “Thank you, I...” She could barely contain the ready-to-cry that had lodged itself in her throat like a giant melon. And then a thought bounced in her skull. She looked at Derek. “Will you be okay?”

He looked at her with his bright blue eyes and winked.

She watched him as Owen, Richard, and Alex filed back into the sardine can behind Lexie. Derek stiffened. She felt it in his muscles. Saw it in his frame. But he kept staring at Meredith as though she were his life boat, as though he'd taken her existence and made that, alone, his replacement thought to carry him through the moment. He inched closer to her, as if he were trying to preserve a small bubble of untouched space around his body. Nobody in the room begrudged him that bubble. In fact, people seemed to be squeezing against the bookshelves and the furniture and each other, just to give him space, like they knew, even if they didn't know, what he needed. When the door whispered shut once more, he seemed mostly on an even keel.

Just by looking intently at her.

This man who would die for her.

She wasn't used to feeling like she was worth so much.
“The faith you put in me is freaking terrifying,” Meredith whispered. She reached for his face. Twisted a soft, curly lock around her index finger.

They shared another endless look.

I don't want you to be scared, he said but didn't say.

I'm trying not to be, she replied.

He winked at her. I'll be patient.

She laughed aloud, breaking the spell. Everybody stared at her. “Sorry,” she said. “It's nothing.”

“Meredith,” Carolyn said, prodding. “Is there something you'd like Derek to know before you sign the papers?”

“Um.” She struggled for a thought. Any thought. Anything half as nice as what he'd said about her. “I really hope our baby has your hair. That gene would be a shame to waste.”

Derek chuckled, and she blushed. She needed something better. Something that would mean something. This was their wedding. Their Big Gigantic Huge Monstrously Permanent wedding.

“You make me want to be better at all this goop stuff,” she said. “But I'm not. I'm dark and twisty and me, and it means a lot to me that that's okay with you.”

His gaze softened.

“You're worth it to me, Derek. But if you ever get shot for me, I'll kill you.”

His eyes sparkled when he said softly, “I'll try to do that sparingly then.”

“Good,” Meredith said.

He picked up a pen off the desk. “Should we sign, now?”

Judge Cobblebodum gestured mutely at the paperwork.

“I love you,” Derek said as he signed. He handed her the pen he'd used.

Meredith gripped it. Felt its weight in her hands. And then she signed the paper, too, relishing the whisper sound of the ballpoint sliding on the paper. “I love you,” Meredith said, an echo of him. She leaned into his arms after she relinquished the pen and watched the next few moments stuck in a haze of pleased lethargy.

This was really it.

Mark signed the document next. “I don't love either of you,” he said. “I'm just the witness.”

Cristina followed. “Yeah,” she said as she scribbled her name. “What he said.”

“Do you ever take a break from ruling the Land of Sickening and Sweet?” Cristina said.

“You'll find out if you keep snarking, you big pessimist,” Lexie replied.
“It's good that we all love each other,” said Judge Cobblebodum, only a hint of sarcasm riding on his voice as he signed on the last line. “I now pronounce you man and wife.”

Meredith looked up. Met Derek's eyes. He smiled at her. Their fingers intertwined. He leaned closer. They kissed, and the flash of the camera captured the first moment of the rest of their lives.
Paint it, black

Derek was tired. He was tired, and he didn't want to be there today. In therapy. Didn't want to recount the last twenty-four hours for this woman as though his life were a novel for her to read a new chapter wrought with drama every day. Didn't want to give her the normal update.

He usually liked it. Talking. Letting it all out. His frustrations. His thoughts. His successes and failures. He liked it because it was a guiltless release, like yelling at the top of his lungs while he was driving alone, or throwing ice cubes at the big tree in the back yard, or folding a pillow in half and pummeling it – all venting methods Dr. Wyatt had suggested that had helped him keep himself on a more even keel over time. He paid her to listen and to help, and he didn't ever have to worry about heaping too much on her like he did with Meredith. He usually liked it to the point that he wondered why he'd ever put it off so long.

Today, though, his exhaustion far outweighed the feeling of any benefits. He sat on Dr. Wyatt's orange couch, and all he wanted to do was collapse onto his side and take a long nap. Dr. Wyatt scribbled on her notepad in the chair across from him, and he was grateful for the break in talking, however momentary. Dr. Wyatt liked to collect her thoughts quickly. He knew her ticks. Her nuances.

That was a given when you saw somebody for an hour a day every weekday for weeks on end. Eight weeks.

Had it really been eight weeks since he'd first seen her?

Around that, at least. Maybe, a little more or less.

He rubbed his eyes, which were burning he was so tired. He'd made it two weeks again. Two weeks of relative normality before his body went kaput, the stress overwhelmed him, and he'd snapped, figuratively, in two. He couldn't seem to handle his life in bigger chunks yet. He'd gotten next to zero sleep the night before as awful nightmares had filled him to the brim like a beer mug, and it sucked. Sucked doubly, because Meredith didn't get any sleep when he was yelling and tossing and turning, either.

He closed his eyes. Swallowed. His throat hurt. He'd yelled himself nearly hoarse.

His head tipped forward.

The room began to fuzz out from his awareness.

“I think we may have been approaching this the wrong way,” Dr. Wyatt said, and he snapped awake.

Derek frowned as he rubbed his eyes again. Rubbed the bridge of his nose. Dr. Wyatt sat across from him, her pen still against her notepad. She'd crossed her ankles, and she sat poised in that familiar way that told him she was ready to continue. His bleariness would have to wait. “What do you mean?” he said.
“I think we're confusing two separate issues as one issue.”

“How?” Derek said.

“Well, when you actually see Gary Clark, you can't tell he's not real until he's gone,” Dr. Wyatt said. “He's usually threatening you, usually with a gun, and it makes you scared. He mimics the actions of the real Gary Clark, sometimes with slight exaggeration.”

Derek blinked. “Exaggeration?”

“You told me he held a gun literally to your head this morning, for instance, but we know the real Gary Clark never actually got that close to you,” Dr. Wyatt explained.

Derek jammed his elbows into his thighs and pressed his face into his hands. This was why he didn't want to do this today. He was too tired to deal with remembering and analyzing, not when the morning had been so bad. But he had to. He had to keep going. He had to get better.

“So, what about this morning?” he said, the words tired.

“You said you woke up, and he was standing beside the bed with a gun pointed at you, and you didn't want to get up,” Dr. Wyatt said. “You absolutely feared for your life, and even though you realize now he wasn't actually there, you didn't know it then.”

The last hour of darkness, he'd managed to fall asleep and stay that way, but then his alarm had rung. He'd been lying on his stomach, cheek mashed into pillow, a wet collection of drool on the pillowcase underneath his lip. His eyes had slid open, and he'd found himself staring at a shiny belt buckle. Meredith had already left for work for pre-rounds. The person standing next to the bed hadn't been Meredith.

Then the gun had pressed against Derek's temple.

And Derek hadn't been able to move.

I'll kill you, Gary Clark had said. I'll pull the trigger. You'll splatter like a ripe tomato.

Derek stiffened at the memory.

“I didn't want him to shoot me,” Derek said. And then his eyes watered. He stopped to take a short breath. He hadn't been able to move. He'd almost peed on himself all over again. It'd felt so fucking real at the time. He'd been so terrified he hadn't been able to speak, and so humiliated when he'd regained his senses after the phantom Gary Clark had faded. Derek ran a shaky palm through his hair. “I... I... I'm...”

“Stuttering, pathetic fool,” Mr. Clark said, and Derek's shoulders slumped.

“Do you need a break?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“No,” he said vehemently, forcing himself through the memory. “No.” It wasn't real. It hadn't been real. He hadn't wet himself. The vision had dissipated, and he was safe. He was safe, he didn't see that shit very often anymore, and he just... needed to get better. Wanted to get better. “I want to know what you mean.”

“What you experienced this morning was a hallucination.”

“I know that,” Derek snapped tiredly. He rocked in his seat, and a deep, black, burbling well of emotion that he couldn't tamp squeezed his heart. “I know I'm hallucinating. Do you have any idea what it's like to know you're hallucinating? I just want it to stop!”

“But, see, I don't think you're hallucinating all the time,” Dr. Wyatt said, her tone calm. “Sometimes, yes, like this morning. But not all the time.”

Preposterous.

He was a volcano. Ready to explode. He launched to his feet. “But—”

“Bear with me,” Dr. Wyatt said, holding up her hand. “Let's think about how Gary Clark talks to you when you can't see him.”

Derek nodded, frustrated. He ground his teeth. “Okay,” he said through his clenched jaw, the word long and drawn out and ending on an exhale that made his chest hurt he was trying so hard to keep a lid on his temper. He would not yell at Dr. Wyatt. Dr. Wyatt was trying to help. Just like Meredith tried to help. He vented frustration into pacing the length of the sofa instead of yelling.

“When you can't see Gary Clark, when he's only talking, you can identify that he's not real in the moment,” Dr. Wyatt said. “You don't fear for your safety. He derides you, and he says things not even remotely related to when you were shot. Your primary focus is in getting him to be quiet. Does that summarize it well enough?”

“I guess,” Derek said. The office was a pinwheel of color as he walked back and forth. He wouldn't yell just because he didn't like her conclusion, he told himself. He was tired, and things always seemed worse when he was exhausted and on bad days.

He would not yell.

“Okay, let's try something,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Name me something that you hate about yourself.”

“Really,” Gary Clark said. “Do you have to choose just one thing?”

That brought Derek up short. He stopped, mid-pace, right in front of the fish tank. The fish tank burbled. An orange fish with gleaming scales drifted past his view. He turned to look at Dr. Wyatt. Blinked. His eyelids felt heavy, even when his blood was running hot, and that stupid, awful voice in his ear... Crippling. It was crippling.

“Maybe you were right all along,” said Mr. Clark. “Maybe all the blood transfusions made you heal wrong. Maybe there is no cure, and you're just broken.”

“Is he talking to you, now?” Dr. Wyatt said, the words soft.

Derek nodded mutely. He moved back a few paces and let himself fall onto the couch. The cushions squeaked under his weight. How could she not think this was a hallucination? Hallucinations could be auditory. He gathered up tents of his loose scrubs in his fists. Clenched his jaw.

“Tell me something you hate about yourself,” Dr. Wyatt prodded.

A lump formed in his throat. A huge lump that made him want to choke. He looked at her carpet. At the magazines on the coffee table. At the basket full of stress balls in a rainbow of colors from violet to red.

“Just tell her, you piece of shit,” Gary Clark said, almost a growl. “Pick any one thing from your “I'm afraid.” The word died in his hurting throat, and Gary Clark laughed at him. Derek crunched.

Swallowed. “I'm afraid.”

“Afraid to name something?” said Dr. Wyatt gently.

“No, I hate...” His fingers clenched. He cleared his throat. “I hate that I'm afraid.”

Dr. Wyatt leaned forward in her seat. He'd interested her with his confession. Derek felt the fire of blush creeping across his skin as embarrassment supplanted the remnants of his fury.

“I want to talk about that in a minute, but for now, close your eyes,” she said, and he did as she commanded. It was easier not to look at her anyway. The room swam with his exhaustion. “Think in your head what you just told me, and keep repeating it to yourself.”

“I...” He cleared his throat again. The lump wouldn't obliterate. “Word for word?”

“Whatever comes naturally,” Dr. Wyatt said.

This felt wrong. Wrong for her to be asking him to think awful things about himself. Wrong after weeks and weeks of her encouraging him and helping him sort through his demons. Still, though it felt wrong, he had no trouble, for once, following her directive. I'm a coward, he thought without reservation, though the damning label was something he hadn't been able to say out loud. Coward.

I'm a coward. I'm a coward.

“You're such a fucking coward,” Mr. Clark said in his ear.

Derek flinched. His heart throbbed in his chest, and the world felt like it was pouring out through his shoes.

“I don't want to do this anymore,” he said faintly.

He heard her chair scoot forward. “Does the voice you just used in your head to repeat that thought sound a little like Gary Clark?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“Yes...” he managed.

“I thought it might,” she said. “Derek, I think you've managed inadvertently to link your experience of being shot with anything negative you feel about yourself,” she said. “Whenever you have a self-criticism, you frame it with Gary Clark's voice, but it's your criticism, not his.”

Silence stretched.

For a moment, Derek saw the math equation sitting there, but the numbers didn't connect.

“Well, look at that,” Mr. Clark said after a pause. “I'm the darker, shittier you.”

Derek's lower lip quivered. He opened his eyes to a blur. He wiped his face, but tears renewed.

“You're saying this is all my fault,” he said thickly. “That all this shit he says is really just me. That I'm torturing myself.”

“I'm certainly not saying it's your fault,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Your experiences shape how you perceive the world. I'm saying your perception is very skewed right now, and it's affecting your quality of life.”

“Of course it's fucking skewed,” Derek snapped in a last ditch attempt at denial. His eyes leaked, and he wiped at them frantically. He wasn't doing this shit with Gary Clark on purpose. He wasn't. “I'm fucking hallucinating.”

“You absolutely are hallucinating, and I know it's very frightening,” Dr. Wyatt agreed. “But you're not hallucinating all the time. Not even most of the time. I think we should back off the hallucinations for a while. What I'm seeing now is what we need to work on the most.”

What are you seeing, now?

The question loitered in his skull, unspoken, and he had no desire to speak it.

“You already know it's masochism,” Mr. Clark said. “You've brought this misery to yourself.”

He pinched the bridge of his nose and stared at his lap. He wanted to stop. He wanted to get up and leave. Not because he was mad anymore. Because he was bone-tired, and he didn't think he could deal with more terrible self-discovery today. The overwhelming urge to crawl into bed and curl up into a ball latched onto his sinews like a bird of prey and wouldn't go.

Except...

Get your freaking tumor fixed, Meredith had told him.

He took a deep breath. Counted to three. Let it out over three. He didn't feel panicky. Just tired. Upset. But the breathing helped anyway.

If Dr. Wyatt thought she saw something he needed to work on, that meant she thought it wasn't hopeless, he told himself. And if it wasn't hopeless, he owed it to Meredith to at least try. Owed it to himself. No matter how tired he was.

He glanced blearily at his watch.

Still time left.

He needed to get better, and they still had time left in this session.

He could go home and curl up afterward.

“If...” He swallowed when his whisper-soft voice died on him. “If I did this, how do I undo it?”

“Derek, this is not your fault,” Dr. Wyatt said. “You didn't do this. It's not like a gun you fired. I'm saying your experiences have misshaped how you perceive the world. You've had a lot of heartache in your life that you haven't quite bounced back from. It's like...” She shook her head as she tried to think of a way to describe what she meant. “It's like somebody put sunglasses on your face somewhere along the way and didn't tell you. Of course things look dark as a result, and every time something bad happens to you, a thicker shade gets added, and things look darker.”

He clenched his fingers. “I don't understand,” he said.

“Let's see if I can paint this a better way,” Dr. Wyatt responded. She looked up at the ceiling for a moment, thinking. Then her gaze shifted back to him, and she sat poised with her pen. “Tell me something good about you.”

He blinked.

“I don't know what you mean,” Derek said, despite the sinking feeling in his stomach.
“Oh, come on,” said Gary Clark. “It's an easy enough question.”

“If you could brag about one thing, what would it be?” Dr. Wyatt prodded. “What do you like about yourself?”

I just need it to stop, Derek had said.

Meredith had stroked his face as the rain had pattered on the roof of the car. Need what to stop?

This feeling.

What feeling, Derek?

That I'm nothing.

He rubbed his cheek. He could still feel her touching him. Could still hear her words in his head, her voice tired and sad. She'd gotten quiet after that for a long moment, only to return with appalled certainty. Told him all the things he'd wanted to hear. That he'd wanted to believe so badly but could never quite convince himself were true in the long term.

That he was, indeed, something.

“Are you smart?” Dr. Wyatt said, pulling him back into the room. “A good surgeon? Why do you think Meredith should love you?”

He swallowed. The blur of tired tears renewed. He wiped his face with his hands. Once, again. His skin was starting to hurt. “I don't know.”

“Why do you think you're not smart?” Dr. Wyatt said.

“I'm still here, aren't I?” he said, the words quiet. Eight weeks of constant coaching, and he was still there. In Dr. Wyatt's cheerful, floral-vomit office. Needing his hand held. Training himself, with her assistance, to cope.

Dr. Wyatt stared at him for a long moment. “Would you call somebody with ataxia stupid for having trouble walking, even with practice?”

“No,” said Derek.

“So, why should you, somebody with PTSD, feel stupid for having trouble finding emotional stability, even with practice?” Dr. Wyatt countered.

“I...” His voice trailed away, and all he could do was shake his head.

“What about your surgical skills?” Dr. Wyatt said. “You're world-renowned. You must be a good surgeon.”

He stared at his hands. They'd healed. After years and years of dry, irritated skin from all the hand washing, they'd healed. A vague thrum of disquiet ran through him when he realized he hadn't done anything of import for nearly a year, first because of his stifling job as Chief, and then because of his stifling disease.
“Not anymore,” he said darkly.

“Why not?”

“I can't cut like this...” Derek said, anger leaking back into his tone. “I'd kill someone.”

“But people still come to you for advice,” she said. “You do consults, don't you?”

Dr. Langly, Dr. Fisk, and I were discussing how to proceed, and we were wondering if you could take a look, Dr. Weller had said while Derek had stood frozen at the threshold of OR 2.

Derek had done several consults since then, and they'd been fine.

Felt fine.

Outside the OR, anyway. Whenever he tried to go inside the ORs themselves, all he could think about was lying on the table. The overhead lights had looked like the headlights of an oncoming train. He'd been cold and shivery and naked and hurting and suffocating with every breath. The anesthesiologist had been jabbing his arm over and over with needles. Meredith had held his hand, and that was the only part he remembered with any firm clarity. She'd said she loved him, and he hadn't been able to say it back.

It'll be over soon, Meredith had told him.

He stared at Dr. Wyatt for a long moment, his tongue thick in his mouth. “I still do consults,” he admitted.

“So your skill set is still there,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“I...” He swallowed. “I guess.”

Dr. Wyatt nodded. She scribbled something on her pad. “Do you think you're good-looking?”

You really don't have any idea how sexy you are, do you?

He shrugged. “Meredith says I am.”

“But you don't believe her?” Dr. Wyatt said.

I see the man I married. Scars or not. And he's a very, very sexy man.

“It's so ugly,” Derek said softly.

More scribbling. She didn't look up from her pad, as if she somehow sensed he didn't want her looking at him right now. Didn't want her judging the embarrassed red mottle creeping along his skin. “What's ugly?” she said, writing god knew what.

He touched his shirt. Felt the marble-sized lump at the top of his chest. It'd gone down a little, but he could still see it through a thin t-shirt when he checked himself in the mirror. When he pressed, he could feel the raised, jagged line down his center. When he wandered below his left nipple, there was a discolored pock that looked a little like somebody had taken a teaspoon and scooped out the muscle and bone underneath the skin. That's essentially what a bullet did. Obliterated things. Meredith insisted none of it mattered, but it mattered.

It mattered to him.
“The scars?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He nodded, unable to speak.

“Do you think Meredith is a liar?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He looked at Dr. Wyatt, appalled. “No, of course not.”

“So, is she lying about you being good-looking?”

“Maybe, she's saying it to make me feel better,” Derek said.

“So, you think she is lying.”

“I didn't say that,” Derek said, irritated.

“But it is what you're saying. A white lie is still a lie,” Dr. Wyatt said, shooting down any potential uproar before it could burble further to the surface. “Has Meredith told you why she loves you?”

He picked up a stress ball – a violet-colored one – out of the basket and squeezed and squeezed and squeezed.

“She says I make her laugh,” he said.

“So, you're funny.”

“Wastes of space can't be funny,” Mr. Clark said.

He rocked in his seat. “I don't know. I don't know.”

“All right,” Dr. Wyatt said. “All right. It's okay.” And she backed off. As if she sensed he'd nearly hit critical mass. But then she took a conversational turn into something even worse. “Let's focus on when you were shot, instead.”

He took a shivery breath. He didn't think he could think about this right now. Didn't want to remember being shot again in Technicolor horror. He could usually step through it at will, now. Usually. But he was tired, and starting to feel nauseous. Gary Clark flashed in front of him with a loaded gun. His teeth gleamed as he spoke. Derek clamped down on the image. Filled his head with other things.

Ultrasound pictures, for instance. He and Meredith flipped through them all the time. He had them memorized.

He held those in front of his mind's eye, and he wouldn't look away.

Get your freaking tumor fixed.

“Do you need a break, Derek?” Dr. Wyatt asked.

“No,” he said flatly. “I'm okay.”

Not.

Not okay.

“Let's pretend Meredith is the one on the catwalk instead of you, then,” Dr. Wyatt said with a nod.
She was intuitive and really good at her job, but not infallible, and he was grateful, in that moment, for that. “She's shaking. She can't speak straight. She keeps backing up. All the things you've told me you hated about how you responded in that situation. Gary Clark has a loaded gun pointed at Meredith. Do you blame Meredith for acting the way she's acting?”

Derek squeezed the violet stress ball. “No,” he said, not willing to pretend anything of the sort. He wouldn't wish his hell on anybody he loved, least of all Meredith. He could never blame Meredith for being scared or upset over something like this. Never. And putting her in his place, even only in his head, seemed like the worst kind of treason to his marriage he could imagine. The mere idea that she had placed herself in front a bullet for him while he'd been unconscious in the OR had been enough horror for him to process, let alone imagining an additional, fake moment where she did it again.

He kept the ultrasound in his head, and he watched it, unblinking. The Meredith of his imagination remained unharmed and safe, just like the real one.

“Having a loaded gun pointed at you by someone with a clear intent to harm you is pretty scary,” Dr. Wyatt said.

He squeezed the ball into a little pulp. Didn't give the memory foam a chance to bounce back. Reduced it from the size of an orange to the size of a grape. His knuckles lost all color as he squeezed, and squeezed, and squeezed. “Yes,” he said.

“So, why is it okay for Meredith to be scared, but your number one dislike about yourself is that you were scared in the same circumstance?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He had no answer.

Silence burgeoned in the room.

He had no answer.

None.

He listened to the fish tank. Let his gaze wander to it. The fish floated back and forth in lazy, sedate, colorful paths. They gave his eyes something to fixate on other than empty space. The fish split in two, doubling in number as he let his focus drift.

Get your freaking tumor fixed, Meredith had said.

“Why are you showing this to me?” Derek said, though he didn't want the answer almost as much as he wanted it.

“You push yourself hard,” Dr. Wyatt said. “You judge yourself at a higher standard than you judge everybody else.”

“I... don't,” Derek said. He dropped the stress ball into the basket. His shoulders slumped. “I don't mean to.” He pulled shaky hands through his hair. Hunched over his knees. Breathed thickly. “I don't mean to do this to myself.”

“Derek, pushing yourself can be a really good thing. It can be a great thing. It helps you be a better surgeon. It helped you write poems and plan something romantic for Meredith. It helped you come see me for the first time. It's helping you right now to get through this session even though you're hearing things you don't really want to hear. It's helped you with any number of things.”
He swallowed. She'd made him after all. He thought he'd been so stealthy with his disquiet, for once. “Then what...”

“Pushing yourself is a good thing, but pushing yourself too far is what we need to work on with you,” Dr. Wyatt said. “Your self-image is extremely poor, and it's conflicting with the fact that you hold yourself to this...” She held her palms face out to him, gesturing for emphasis. “This impossible standard that you don't expect anybody else to meet.”

“So, you are saying it's my fault,” Derek said. “I'm screwing myself because—”

“Derek,” Dr. Wyatt said, the word measured, even, patient. “This is not your fault. I can't emphasize that enough. If you don't even know you're wearing sunglasses, you're not going to know to take them off.” Her chair creaked as she shifted in her seat and recrossed her legs. The shoulder of her pantsuit stuck up unevenly. Her blond hair caught on her blouse collar. “But now you do know those sunglasses are on. You know it. I just showed you the illogical effects of it in detail.” He looked at his lap as she gave him the whole damning list. “You think you're not a good surgeon. You think you're stupid. You think you're unattractive. You think you're craven. You're not sure why Meredith loves you, even though she's told you at least one reason. What we need to do is give you some tools to start taking those sunglasses off so you can get a more accurate picture of yourself, one that isn't driven by unrealistic expectations.”

He stared at her for a long time. She was patient. She let him think. Didn't slam him with another question while he picked at his scrubs and slowly processed things.

She... made sense. Derek was shocked when he realized it, that Dr. Wyatt made sense. He reviewed the conversation they'd had slowly in his head, and she... made sense.

You've had a lot of heartache in your life that you haven't quite bounced back from.

She made sense.

Grief threatened to overwhelm him, but he kept it down like Poseidon controlling a tide. He let the ultrasound picture sit in his mind's eye. Just for a little bit longer. He needed it.

She made sense.

All the things he wanted to believe so badly but couldn't seem to force himself to take to heart, particularly on bad days like today — they were true. All the nice, reassuring things Meredith told him were true. All the things his mother told had him were true. They were true, but he'd gotten himself so twisted up inside over the years with catastrophe after catastrophe, he couldn't see those truths anymore. Couldn't see the good things.

It was the opposite of rose-colored glasses.

And it... made sense.

“How can I make him stop?” Derek said quietly. He rubbed the bridge of his nose. “I just want him to stop.”

“I think you can definitely reduce his appearances with some work,” Dr. Wyatt said.

“How?”

“Anytime you hear his voice in your head, I want you to pause, and I want you to think. Would I blame Mark for the same thing? Would I blame Meredith for the same thing? Would I blame my mother for the same thing? Cascade through a list of your friends and family. If you're hearing a lot of nos, there's a very good chance you're wearing your sunglasses. Keep a journal again. Every time it happens, take some time and write down why Gary Clark's assertion can't be true. Write about all the people you wouldn't blame."

“What if what he says is true?” Derek said.

“Then you've found something you might want to improve about yourself, and I'm happy to help you with that,” Dr Wyatt said. “Self-improvement is a great goal, and success at it can only help to improve your self-image. But my guess is you'll find a lot of untrue assertions.”

“Okay,” he said.

He sniffed. And then he couldn't hold anything in anymore. The ultrasound had worked as a stopgap to get him through the important moment, to help him hear the things he needed to hear, but now he was through with it, and he felt even more exhausted than he had before this awful session. His hands shook and wouldn't stop shaking, and he thought for a moment that he might throw up from stress.

Not his fault, she'd said. Multiple times. Not something he'd done to himself, at least not on purpose.

But he was the one who had the responsibility of fixing it, somehow. His father had been murdered in front of him. He'd crashed his motorcycle. Amelia had overdosed. Addison had cheated on him. Meredith had drowned. Jen had died, another fatality in a long line of fatalities wrought by his scalpel. Gary Clark had shot him. Bad thing after bad, catastrophic thing had reorganized Derek's psyche like fruit in a blender, telling him he'd failed, that he wasn't worth loving, that he was a waste of space. And Derek had to break his back picking up the mess left behind afterward.

Him.

Frustration over lack of progress became something worse.

It became fear as he stood before a mountain he wasn't sure he could climb.

That was a lot of bad things to overcome. Years' worth.

“You know you can't,” said Mr. Clark.

Derek was so tired.

“Are you all right?” Dr. Wyatt said.

He blinked. “No,” he said. He glanced at his watch, but he couldn't read the face of it. Couldn't tell how much time was left on this session, still. “I want... want to stop, now,” he said. He couldn't take any more of this today.

“We can stop,” Dr. Wyatt said. “We did a lot today. This is a lot to process.”

“I need a minute,” he said. Barely. The room felt like it was closing in. He reached for a replacement thought. Any replacement thought. The ultrasound picture he'd used before. He flailed for it.

“Take your time,” she said.
He sat on Dr. Wyatt's couch, replaying that image of his baby behind his eyelids for a long time.

Get off my cloud

The murmur of voices downstairs crawled through the floorboards into the silence of his bedroom like little cockroaches. Derek stared at the ceiling, unblinking, but he didn't see it. Didn't see anything real in the darkness with the shades drawn. He only saw phantasms. Memories. Ghosts of violence.

“No child deserves this, ” his Aunt Sally had whispered to his Aunt Mel, both of whom had stood in the corner of the kitchen by the fridge, unaware that he'd come in to get a fresh pitcher of lemonade. “ He's too young to be the man of the house. ”

Aunt Mel had sniffed. “ I can't believe Mikey's gone. It's wrong. ”

“What is Carol going to do? ”

“I don't know, ” Aunt Mel had replied.

They'd shut up when they'd seen him. Offered platitudes. He'd set the pitcher down in the kitchen on the counter without word. He hadn't said goodbye to any of the people crammed on the first floor of their small house. He'd fled out of the kitchen, through the dining room, past the dining room table, which was covered in cakes and pies and breads and casseroles and all manner of other desserts, pastries, and dinners. Everyone had brought something. Everyone. As though they all thought homemade pudding or a macaroni salad would make everything okay.

His lower-lip quivered. He wiped his face.

He'd seen Dad today. He'd been still and cold and clean. Wearing a nice black suit like the ones he wore to church. Not like when he'd been shot. Derek had stared at the open casket, unblinking, just like he stared at the ceiling, now, until someone had pulled him away. Someone he didn't know in the blur. Maybe Mom. Maybe Kathy.

“Derek, listen to me, ” his dad had said. “ This is very important. ”

A soft knock on the door made Derek flinch.

“Derek, sweetheart, may I come in? ” Mom said through the door, her voice soft and barely put together.

He shook his head. Not that Mom could hear it.

The door knob turned slowly. The voices from downstairs flooded inside the room until she closed the door behind her. The soft shh shh shh of her feet moving across the carpet preceded the mattress dipping.

“I don't want to go back downstairs, ” Derek said.

His mother squeezed his shoulder. Ran her fingers through his hair. “ You don't have to. I just wanted to see you. ”

He rolled over. Away from her. Pulled the covers up to his shoulders. Buried his nose in the dirty undershirt he'd pulled out of the laundry because it smelled like Dad. Because it helped erase the acrid memory of gunpowder still loitering in Derek's head.

“I don't want to talk,” he said.

“I don't either,” his mother replied. “But I'd like to stay here for a bit, if that's okay.”

He didn't tell her to stay or go. He didn't tell her anything. She stayed for several minutes while he stared at nothing. He inhaled and exhaled in the dark, filling his nose with the soft remnants of cedar and spice that had been uniquely Dad. He saw his dad die again, and he wondered if there was something he could have done differently to make that not happen. He heard his sister screaming, and the teeth marks on his hand where she'd bitten him throbbed with remembered pain.

Breathing hurt. Living hurt.

His dad kept dying. Or was dead.

At least when he slept, the moments didn't take as long to pass.

He closed his eyes.

“Derek,” called a familiar voice, pulling him up from the lethargy of dreaming. “Derek, Derek, Derek, guess wha— oh.”

Meredith.

His eyes slipped open as she bounded through the doorway in a pile of bubbles and limbs and excitement, and then came to a dead halt when she saw him curled up in bed clinging to his dog. Waning daylight slanted through the window panes, laving his back with heat. Dust motes wandered lazily in the air currents. The blankets rustled as he shifted. Let go of Samantha's collar. He rolled onto his stomach, pulling the comforter over his shoulders. The physical tiredness had waned with his nap, but the mental tiredness... He just wanted to hibernate today. The dog licked his ear, whined, and resettled, a reassuring, solid weight beside him.

“Hey,” Meredith said in a softer, more moderated voice as she walked to the bed. She shooed the dog away. Samantha whuffed, a disgruntled sound, and plodded out of the room, stretching her hind legs as she went. The dog hadn't moved since he'd lain down.

“Sorry, I woke you up,” Meredith said as she plopped down beside him in the warm space Samantha had left behind. “It's early. I figured you were reading or something.”

“It's okay,” he said softly. He let his eyes drift shut again.

“What's wrong?” she said as she scooted closer. Curled up next to him. The warmth of her body heat soaked through the comforter. Her hand ran along his spine through the blankets. “Are you just tired?”

He looked at her. Her gray eyes glistened in the dim light. She looked bright and blonde and bubbly and happy, tamped to a simmer because she'd realized he was upset, he supposed. She looked happier than he'd seen her in a long time. He wanted to match that for her. Or at least be some semblance of okay. He wanted to be curious about why she was so happy. Wanted to share that happiness with her. Anything normal.

Instead, he blinked, and the world blurred, and something twisted inside his chest. He couldn't speak. Felt the wet crawl of grief down his face as he thought of the mountain once more. The mountain he had to climb when he was so mentally tired. So done. With all of this. Instead of climbing, he felt as though he were sliding off a cliff.

“Oh,” she said, the word soft, and the last of her bubbling excitement popped and dispersed. A sliver of frustration crossed her gaze, pinched the skin around her eyes. Just a sliver before a wave of empathy washed it away.

He couldn't blame her, but he was too tired to apologize. Too wasted. And he couldn't just shut all of this off, either. He had no idea how to get to the next minute awake, which made the idea of sleep even more intoxicating.

“You'll never make it,” said Mr. Clark. “Pills would help.”

“Do you want to talk about it?” she said.

Derek shook his head.

“Do you want me to go away for a while?” she said next.

He shook his head once more.

“Okay,” she said. She moved away in a fluid motion, but only to slip underneath the covers. She lay parallel with him, skin flush against his, pulled the comforter over both of them like a cocoon, and she hugged him, and she kissed him, and she pulled her fingers through his hair. “I'm sorry you're having a bad day today,” she said.

He swallowed against the lump in his throat. Let himself take comfort in her embrace. He closed his eyes, though he didn't sleep, forehead to forehead with her, and the minutes passed in a glacial march. He felt the hairs on his head shift as she stroked him.

“I love you,” she said softly after ages. “I really do, Derek.”

He stared at her. “Why?” he said.

She blinked at the question. “Because I just do,” she said.

He took a short breath and released it. “Tell me why. Please.”

She toyed with a loose curly lock over his forehead as she pondered his request, like she wanted to give it due and weighted consideration. “I like to talk to you,” she said. “You can make me laugh, even when I'm freaking out. You don't judge me even when I say something stupid or freaky. You make me feel loved. You get me. Not many people get me. You're the first person I want to tell when something exciting happens. I just... like to be around you.”

He stared at her. At her unblinking eyes. Her gaze searched his face, like she wasn't quite sure she'd given him what he wanted.

He recounted her words. Turned them over in his head. Every time he wanted to insert a but, he started over until he could get through the whole thing without arguing. Without Gary Clark commenting from the fucking peanut gallery seats in his head.

“Oh,” he said when he'd slowly processed all of that.

His heart pounded.
“My chest...”

“What about it?” she said.

He swallowed. “The scars really don't bother you?”

“No,” she said without hesitation. She splayed a palm against his pectorals and traced the line down his center. Then she wandered to the pockmark left by the bullet. “If anything, they remind me you stayed when you didn't have to.”

“What a laugh,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek flinched. “But—”

She put her fingers to his lips, shushing him. “You lived, Derek. I told you before, and I'll tell you a thousand times more if you need to hear it, but no one, not even you, will ever convince me that wasn't at least a little bit on you. You're the strongest person I know. You could have died, and you didn't.”

He took a short, clipped breath, and he mulled over that, next. Kept saying it over and over and over to himself. It felt foreign and wrong, and he didn't agree, like he was trying to convince himself green was red or up was down, because Gary Clark had shot him, and had been planning to shoot again, and only a quirk of fate had deemed it not so. Luck had made Derek not die more than anything else. There was no magic light bulb moment to mend his perspective. But he could convince himself not to argue with it if he thought hard enough about it, and maybe, if he could make the lack of arguments stick for longer than a few moments, he might be able to incorporate those statements into his worldview. A new set of truths. Eventually. Maybe, he could help undo the sunglasses with repetition in addition to Dr. Wyatt's suggested journaling.

Maybe.

“Okay,” he said, forcing himself to agree out loud with her. “Okay.”

It still felt so wrong.

He closed his eyes to regather himself for a long moment. His eyes were burning, he realized. He sniffed, and he wiped his face, but Meredith didn't pester him about it, didn't ask him to explain any of this, though she had to be confused.

With the choice journal, as soon as he'd started writing everything down, the world had realigned for him. Seeing his choices on paper in a big list, that was all he'd needed to remake the truth. That he made his own way and wasn't a continuous victim of pure happenstance, being battered from one moment to the next by cruel, sadistic fate. He'd tried writing a little when he'd gotten home earlier, but that hadn't helped much.

He groaned and rolled into a sitting position, pulling away from her. She watched him with curiosity. He grabbed his choice journal from the side of the bed because he hadn't had a chance to buy a new notebook. He flipped it to the first open page.

Meredith is not a liar, he wrote.

Meredith is not a liar, ergo Gary Clark cannot be telling the truth, he wrote.

It was a choice, really, anyway, wasn't it? Choosing to believe it?
He blinked at the paper. His eyes watered in earnest. Meredith was not a liar. Gary Clark was telling the truth. The two couldn't exist together, and yet, they did. They did, and he couldn't make it stop, even knowing that. Choosing felt fake because he knew he didn't believe it.

“Pathetic,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek started to shake as he thought of the mountain.

The more he thought about it, the bigger the mountain seemed. He'd lost his perspective. He didn't think he could get it back. No matter what Dr. Wyatt said about sunglasses.

He wanted to crawl back into bed and never get out again.

“Or take a pill,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek heard the blankets rustle behind him. Meredith touched his shoulders very lightly, and when he didn't tense, she leaned into the motion. Wrapped her arms around his torso. Looked over his shoulder at his notebook. He didn't think she'd ever read his choice journal, though she knew he kept it. He'd explained it the first night she'd caught him filling it in before bed. He couldn't imagine what she might think, reading that first line where he was—

“Why would you think I'm a liar?” Meredith said as she froze.

Regret plunged deep at the hurt in her tone. He shouldn't have bothered to try writing this out. Not with her sitting right there. Not when he knew it hadn't helped earlier, anyway. But turning to this fucking thing had become comforting habit. The paper pages crinkled as he jammed the journal shut and tossed it away. It hit the rug with a thud.

“I don't,” he said. “I don't think you're a liar.”

“Then why would you write that?” she said.

“It's just... that was the point. That you're not a liar, so when you and Gary Clark contradict each other, Gary Clark is lying, but...” Derek shook his head. “Tell me again,” he said. “Tell me why you love me.”

“Derek, what is this about?” Meredith said.

“Dr. Wyatt,” he said. “She thinks I can't see the truth about myself anymore. I'm... I need to find it. I need to find my perspective.”

For all the sense that made.

“Please, just tell me,” he said softly, begging, which only made him feel worse. He hated begging. “I want to believe you so badly. I want it. I want to remember what it was like to understand why my wife loves me.”

Her palms rubbed his chest. She kissed the nape of his neck. “You don't understand why I love you?”

He blinked. “No,” he said.

He'd thought he'd known why with Addison. Then Addison had cheated on him. Mark had considered Addison more important than Derek. Mark, Derek's supposed best friend. Then Meredith had drowned twenty feet from the dock. She hadn't swum; hadn't wanted to stay with him enough to swim. And then Mr. Clark had thought Derek was so repugnant he deserved to die. So many strikes.

Derek Shepherd was out.

You've had a lot of heartache in your life that you haven't quite bounced back from.

“I want to believe you,” Derek said. “I just don't know how anymore. So, tell me again.”

“I love you because you're you, Derek,” Meredith said.

He pushed away from the bed. “But I don't know who I am!”

He stood in the center of the room, feeling like he'd slammed into a brick wall. He didn't know anything about who he was anymore. That was the crux of it. He didn't know what was real and what was fake. What was sickness and what was, in reality, loathsome bits of the real him. What was fucking sunglasses, and what was just...

“All of you,” Gary Clark said. “All of you is loathsome.”

But that couldn't be real because Meredith loved him for some fucking reason. She may have sympathy for loathsome people, like William Dunn, because that was who she was. She was empathetic, and she responded in kind to almost anybody in pain. But empathy wasn't love.

Meredith Grey did not give her love to loathsome people.

She did give her love to Derek Shepherd, though. He didn't fucking know why, but she did.

Who was Derek Shepherd?

I don't want this to be a special circumstance, he'd said. I want it to be like it was. I want me to be like I was. I don't know what's wrong with me.

“I just want to understand this!” he said.

Meredith looked up at him from the bed, her hair mussed, her face blushing and alive. She bit her lip. That flash of frustration was back, pinching the skin around her eyes and lighting a fire in her gaze. For a long moment, he clenched his teeth, frustrated right along with her, and she stared at him like she didn't fucking know what to say, and he wanted to fucking yell. Yell, and yell, and yell. Not at her. Or at anybody. Just... to yell. To let out all the shit that boiled inside.

He hated how volatile he was.

“Derek...” she said, hesitantly through gritted teeth, and he bristled. She stood. Hugged her arms self-consciously, like she was preparing to take the brunt of something. Like him. Take the brunt of him. His temper. “Cut it out,” she said evenly. “Seriously.”

“Cut what out?” he snapped before he could stop himself. His heart squeezed. He took a deep breath. This was like watching a fucking train wreck where he was the train. “I'm sorry.” He paced. Counted to ten in his head. “I'm sorry I snapped. I'm sorry.” Pulled his fingers through his hair in frustration. “I don't want to snap at you. I don't want to snap at anybody.”

“It's a bad day,” she said flatly.

Like that was any sort of excuse to be a rotten person to her or anybody. He was so tired of this. He stopped dead center in the open space by the bed. He took another deep breath and another and another, and he resolved himself to be calm.

“Cut what out?” he said more reasonably.

“Being dark and broody-faced,” she said.

Dark and broody-faced. He snorted with irritation, and his temper burbled once more. “I'm not dark and broody-faced,” he said.

She rolled her eyes. “You always do it, Derek. You want to know who you are? Well, that's one thing. It has nothing to do with PTSD. You've done it since I met you. You do it whenever a problem you don't know how to solve blows up in your face.”

He stared at her. Blinked. “I...”

“You did it after I drowned. You did it when Jen died. You get all hyper-negative, you bottle everything up, and you hide in your freaking trailer.”

“I'm not in my trailer, now,” he said.

She shrugged. “Cursed up in bed, then. Whatever. It has to stop, Derek.” Her head tilted to the side as she regarded him. “At least for today. Please.”

He stared at her, and then he was back in the elevator, over a year ago.

You got me into the OR. If there's a crisis, you don't freeze. You move forward. You get the rest of us to move forward.

He swallowed as a lump formed in his throat. “What would you suggest I do?”

“You remember calculus?”

“What does calculus have to do with anything?” he said.

“You remember how, every once in a while, there was a problem you didn't get, or, well, at least that happened with me. There was a problem I didn't get, so I had to let it sit for a while. I had to walk away and not think about it and come back with a fresh mind, because no matter how many times I read the problem over and over and over again, I didn't get it. Did that ever happen to you?”

“I guess,” he said.

“Dr. Wyatt just told you this brain-breaking stuff today, right?” Meredith said.

He swallowed. “Yes.”

“So, stop thinking about it for a bit. Sleep it off. Worry about it in the morning. You're not going to come to a freaking epiphany when you're this frustrated. It never works that way, believe me.”

He took a deep breath and blew it out.

“She told me stuff I didn't know how to deal with, once,” Meredith added softly. “I stalked out of her office. But it made sense later.”

The last of his temper slipped away on cat feet.

“What was it?” he said.
She wiped her eyes and smiled. “How to be extraordinary.”

The flash of candles lit his memory. The feel of her lips against his after months apart. The cool breeze on the cliff ruffling his hair and whispering against his skin.

She was right.

He knew she was right.

She stared at him with one eye narrowed for a moment, as if she were considering something. As if she thought he might be ready to protest, thought she hadn't talked him off the ledge. She plodded across the carpet to him. Grabbed his t-shirt. Pulled.

“What?” he had a chance to say.

“We're going shopping,” she said. “Your attendance is not an option.”

“But—”

“You're not allowed to think about this anymore today,” she said. “I had a long shift. I'm tired. You're frustrated. It's not worth it. I can tell you I love you until I'm blue in the freaking face, and you can write that I'm not a liar in your journal until your hand hurts, but I doubt either will give you any sudden realizations if they haven't given you any already. I was looking forward to this all day and the whole way home until I found you. I'm not letting your stubbornness or your wallowing or your need to mull everything to death sabotage my freaking evening. Not tonight. I can't handle it. Got it?”

“But—”

She rolled her eyes and turned to face him. “All day and the whole way home, Derek. You're not ruining it, even if I have to staple your freaking mopey mouth shut.”

“But, Meredith,” he managed.

“What, Derek?”

“Can I at least change, first?” he said, gesturing down at himself.

Her mouth opened. Closed. Her face turned red. She seemed to realize he was wearing boxer-briefs and a t-shirt, and nothing else. “Oh,” she said.

He gave her a small grin. “I won't protest, Mere. I just want pants.”

She bit her lip. “Oops.”

He shook his head at her. “You're really very bossy, you know,” he said.

“You love it,” she murmured.

He let his grin widen and stepped closer. Closed the space between them. “I do,” he said softly. He kissed her breath away. And then he went to the dresser to grab a clean pair of jeans.

“So, where are we going that you looked forward to all day?” he said as he pulled out an old, stonewashed pair that had seen better days. He wasn't in love with the idea of going shopping, but he could live with doing it if it meant that much to her, and she was right. He needed to drop this for a while. “Do I get to be your awesome fashion adviser? I could fake a French accent to make it sound more authentic.”

She snorted. “Seriously?”

“Oui, mon petit chou,” he said with a discerning eye directed at her blouse. “Très chic.”

She giggled. “That's one of the other things I do not love you for,” she said. “Your fashion sense.”

“But you like my French?” he said, drawing out the words, not even intending authenticity at this point. French sounded more like Fraunch.

“Only the kissing,” she muttered, but he heard it.

“I like the French kissing, too,” he said. “More French kissing, I say. Want to French kiss, now, instead of shop?”

She rolled her eyes at him.

“Seriously, then,” Derek said, snickering as he dropped his inner Pierre in exchange for reason. “Where?” He stepped into the jeans and pulled them up his thighs. Buttoned them.

She shrugged. “A baby store or something,” she said.

His hands paused at the top button of his jeans. He looked up at her. “A baby store?”

“I thought we could look at...” She blushed. She touched her womb. Rubbed. “You know. Stuff. Lexie insists on having a baby shower, and apparently that means we have to put a list of baby junk in a registry. I don't know why, and I can't stop her. About the baby shower, I mean. I tried. I really tried, but she's hellbent on cuteness and bows and pin the sperm on the egg and other horrors.” Her palm circled her lower torso in repeated motions. The excitement and bubbling he'd seen before simmered back into existence. “I figured we could... go. Because I don't have any idea about any of the stuff we need, and I think I'll probably need to take a few trips to whittle things down, and she won't shut up until we have a list. Or something.” And then she grinned. Full of teeth and cheer, and she almost bounced. “Plus, you can see it, and I just... wanted to do something today.”

“See what?” he said, excited by the mere virtue of her being excited.

She lifted her shirt, and his eyes widened. A roll of skin hung over the waistline of her pants. Like she'd gained a few pounds and gotten pudgy or something, but was still trying to wear the same size she'd worn before, except he knew she wasn't pudgy in the slightest. “You can see Baby,” she said. “I had trouble zipping up my pants this morning, so I looked in the mirror and, well, there it was.” She gestured at the line of skin. “Finally.”

Derek, Derek, Derek, guess wha— oh.

He blinked. “That's what you were excited about. When you came in earlier. What you were going to show me. That's...”

She nodded.

He blinked again. The world blurred and disintegrated, but in a good way. A spectacular way. He laughed as he closed the space between them, the last button on his jeans momentarily forgotten. He laughed, and it felt great. An amazing, uproarious high compared to how low he'd been feeling earlier.
“That's amazing,” he said with a breathless, awe-filled voice.

She grinned. “I thought so, too.”

He met the hand she held at her stomach with his own. They stood there, silent, feeling, for a long, stretching second. He closed his eyes and let the moment collect underneath his fingertips. His baby. With Meredith. That he could feel with his own two hands.

His heart squeezed when he opened his eyes and saw her staring at him, her eyes sparkling and beautiful and happy like they'd been when she'd first walked in.

He cleared his throat. He had a late start, and he'd needed some prodding to get out of his funk, but he could share her happiness and excitement, now. He could salvage the moment with some effort.

“Why don't we go to a maternity clothes store tonight?” he said. “My fashion sense might suck, but I can ooh and ahh on cue. I won't even impose a garment limit. My tolerance knows no bounds, tonight.”

She shook her head, though she grinned. “I think I'd rather save that for this weekend with Lexie or something, since I doubt Cristina would be caught dead anywhere near maternity clothes.”

He nodded. “I get it,” he said, giving her a mock hurt frown. “She's a more qualified adviser. No love for Monsieur Shepherd.”

“No really,” Meredith said, “but I do love Dr. Shepherd a whole bunch.”

“Je t'aime aussi,” he said softly. He nuzzled her. “So, what would you like to do with me instead, then?”

She shrugged. “I just want to do something baby-ish.”

“Baby-ish,” he echoed.

She nodded.

He kissed her on the nose. “Baby-ish it is, then. Let me get my shoes.” He paused. “And Meredith?”

“Yeah?”

He stared, unblinking. “Thank you. For keeping me going.”

“You do the same for me,” she said.

“No, you don't,” Gary Clark said, but Derek pushed the comment away with ferocious repetition.

Meredith Grey was not a liar.

He knew that much.

Wild Horses

As soon as they arrived at Babies “R” Us, which was chock full of aisle after aisle full of baby-oriented things, Meredith’s determined charge into a night of potential registry content exploration seemed to falter. They’d talked in the car about where to go, but Meredith hadn't known much about baby stores. He hadn't either. They’d opted for ubiquitous, assuming they could switch to specialized when they had a more specific shopping list in mind. But Babies “R” Us was a big store, and the sight of so many aisles seemed to overwhelm her. She stopped only a few feet beyond the threshold and the line of theft detectors, her blonde-kissed hair damp with drizzle from the late afternoon sun shower that had visited them in the parking lot.

“Can I help you with anything?” a perky store clerk called from a nearby register.

Meredith shook her head, silent and barely noticeable. “Not yet,” Derek called, because he doubted the clerk could see Meredith's head move a millimeter. “We're just looking for now.”

The clerk smiled. “Okay,” she said. “Let me know if you have any questions.”

Derek looked at Meredith in profile as she stood beside him. His eyes darted to her waistline. He couldn't help the reflexive gesture, now that he knew he could see evidence of her pregnancy with his naked eye if he tried.

She'd doggedly stayed in the same pair of jeans despite how they didn't quite fit, but her blouse was too loose and hung down too low for him to see the overflow at her waistline without lifting up the blouse, which he wouldn't dare do in a public place without invitation. He settled for wrapping his arms around her. Letting his palms settle over her belly button, where he could feel the subtle shift in her stomach from flat to slightly rounded. The feeling gave him a zing from the tips of his toes to his lips, which curved into a grin before he could stop them.

She was pregnant with their baby, and he could see it. Feel it.

He kissed her ear and her throat and her shoulder. When he saw blush, blush he read as something other than arousal when he considered her stiff body language, he stepped away. He loved her. He wanted her to know it. He wanted her to know he thought she was attractive, because he suspected she might feel a bit self-conscious about the now visible weight gain. But he didn't want to make her uncomfortable.

“So sorry,” he said, his voice low and throaty. “It's just...”

“Neat?” she said hesitantly.

He nodded. Laughed. God, what an amazing feeling. That laugh. She was pregnant, and she showed, and when he thought about it, he laughed. “Yeah,” he said. “A bit.” He swallowed. “Or a lot. A lot.”

She bit her lip, and he saw the cute flash of her incisors. She rested her palms over the space where his hands had been. “I think it's pretty neat, too,” she said, though her tone was more restrained. She didn't laugh. Not like him. But her gaze lit like a firecracker, and he wanted to drown himself in it. In that expression of glee. He loved seeing her so happy, even if she didn't exactly know what to do with that happiness. Even if it made her blush and bristle nervously, like she wasn't sure she deserved to be that happy.

“So, what's first?” he prodded, directing her attention to the store and away from her doubts.

Or, maybe, not. She looked back at him. “Derek, I have no idea. I mean I knew I wanted to do something baby-ish tonight. I just don't... know. I didn't... think this far in advance.”

“So, this is a knee-jerk shopping spree,” he said, nodding understandingly.
She shrugged. She glanced at all the daunting aisles littered with cribs and swings and toys and diapers and god knew what, and she didn't budge. Didn't dart off in any particular direction of whimsy. Didn't seem so excited anymore as those doubts he'd seen earlier piled on higher and higher.

He understood the doubting.

He'd been in stores like this before to buy gifts for his newborn nieces and nephews, but he'd never once been there in this capacity. As a pending father. The prospect was a little daunting to him, particularly with the shooting in mind. His PTSD threw a wrench into things. He only had six months to get himself straightened out at this point. Six months seemed like such a short time...

“You'll never make it,” Mr. Clark said.

Derek clenched his jaws, unwilling to entertain that shit right now. No more Mr. Clark. No more mountain climbing. Not today, god, damn it.

His head remained silent in the moments that followed.

He took a short, tight breath and let it loose. He was a mess, and fatherhood was daunting. He couldn't imagine how daunting motherhood was to Meredith, who'd taken years just to come around to the idea of being ready to have a baby in the first place. He'd resigned himself to the idea that he wouldn't ever have children with her. She was working from bad examples. Thatcher and Ellis. Meredith had convinced herself she wouldn't ever be a good enough mother to make having a baby worthwhile.

I want to try again, Derek, she'd said after she'd told him about the miscarriage, and his world had realigned.

Except, now, Meredith had frozen on her feet, looking wide-eyed at the giant store, and he wanted to help. Wanted to make it better.

Stuffed animals littered the shelves of the rack closest to the door, and inspiration hit. He moved to the rack. Pushed aside a plush horse and a turtle and a bear. A fluffy lamb fell to the floor by his feet. He grabbed a fuzzy lion the size of a house cat. The thing had a turquoise-colored mane and purple fur and big, plush, saber teeth like small, pointy carrots. It smiled, as all ferocious lions were wont to do.

“We're explorers,” he said playfully. “Ready to brave our first safari into the cruel, unforgiving wilds of Babies ’R’ Us.”

She stared at him, one eyebrow raised. She chuckled. Sort of. A single, snorting syllable that could have been an incredulous laugh. “Derek, what are you doing?” she said.

“I didn't bring anything to fend off the wildlife! Will we make it out alive?” he said. He held up the lion in front of his face, facing Meredith. “Roar!” he gurgled in his best, most awful imitation of his favorite zoo animal while he jiggled it in the air.

“Derek, stop, seriously,” she said, giggling, and the sound relaxed him, let him know he'd done something right, no matter how silly. He peeked at her from behind the lion and gave her his biggest grin.

She'd tilted her head to the side to regard him. Her hands had wandered to her stomach. Pressed her shirt against her waistline. He could see the bump, now, with her hands like that. She smiled at him, gaze twinkling, like, though she thought him the corniest man imaginable, she couldn't help but wonder what he'd be like roaring playfully at their baby. Clowning around. Being a dad.

_God, you'd make such a perfect dad,_ she'd said when he'd been shot.

He kissed her before he put the lion back on the shelf. He kissed her again before he bent down to pick up the fallen lamb. When he stood straight, he found her staring at the bear he'd shoved aside to get to the lion. The bear was a soft, squishy thing with brown fur and limbs that had been exaggerated in length to make them dangle-y and cute, and it reminded him vaguely of the bear he'd had when he'd been little, before he'd declared himself too old and responsible for stuffed animals at the tender age of seven.

She picked the bear off the shelf. Rubbed her thumbs along the soft feel of its fur. And she stared. For the longest time. With the strangest look on her face. A sort of wistful something twisted with sadness.

“What is it?” he said as he put the lamb back on the shelf.

“I wanted one of these when I was a kid,” she said, staring at the bear.

His mouth tumbled open before he could stop it. Just a little. “You didn't have one?”

She shrugged. “My mother wouldn't let me. She said stuffed animals made you soft. She got me Anatomy Jane instead. Told me to learn something useful with it.”

“I thought you loved Anatomy Jane,” he said. “With the jelly pouch and the... the twash. And the chubble.”

She looked at him. “You remember all those?”

He shrugged. “Hey, I listen.”

She smiled. “I know. It's one of the many things I love about you. And I loved Anatomy Jane. But I still wanted a bear.”

He stared at her. “So, you didn't have any stuffed animals?”

She stared at the bear. “I think I did when I was really little. Thatcher. He got me...” Her gaze shifted to the lamb he'd left on the shelf before sliding back to the bear. “He got me a rabbit. That was my only one. It was packed in the box next to Anatomy Jane, wasn't it? I remember taking it out...”

“That rabbit was your only stuffed animal?” he said, still incredulous, particularly that she could sound so blasé about how her mother had treated her.

Meredith shrugged. “It's just... how it was.”

For a moment, he had no idea what to say. Couldn't imagine what her childhood had been like. Every time she gave him a glimpse of it, he hated Ellis more. And Thatcher. Hated them both for giving Meredith such a lousy start in life when she'd been innocent and couldn't speak up for herself. None of that was right.

Her hand on his shoulder made him flinch. “Hey,” she said, her tone concerned.

He realized he'd clenched the shelf with a white-knuckled grip and lost himself in brooding again. He shook his head. Pasted a reassuring smile on his face. “That's the great thing about having your own baby, you know,” Derek said, recovering from his trip to badness. He pulled her hand from his shoulder and kissed the back of her palm.

She looked up at him. “What is?”

“You can do all the things you wanted your own mother and father to do that they didn't. And you can skip all the things you didn't want them to do.” He pointed at the bear. “Our baby should definitely have a bear, I think.”

She blinked. “Derek...”

“It’s true!” he said before she could finish. “For instance, I have some opinions on how to deal with loose teeth. We will not be using doors to do our dirty work.”

“Doors?” she said.

He shrugged. “It was a thing. With string. And a door. And I don't like remembering it.”

She shook her head. “Traumatized youth.”

He nodded. “Exactly.”

“Even if I made a list of all the things I don't want to do because my mother did them, I don't think I'd know what I'm doing,” she said. She squeezed the bear. “I'm a feeling little lost.” She swallowed. Sniffed. “I don't think I'll be a good mother. I might even be a rotten one.”

He stared at her without responding for a long moment. Long enough for her to give him an odd, curious look.

“What?” she said.

I wonder what Meredith-y would be, she'd said.

Strong, he'd answered. Compassionate. Beautiful.

She'd looked away. I want to be those things.

You are, Mere, he'd said. I wish you could see it.

Some realizations didn't hit like crashing trucks. They slid into their parking spaces, unannounced, and dared one to notice them. Derek's fingers clenched, and he blinked at the parked, sleek, metaphorical Porsche he'd just noticed. How long had that been there?

“You're like me,” he blurted.

She frowned. “What do you mean?”

You’ve had a lot of heartache in your life that you haven't quite bounced back from.

Derek's head swam as he pulled Meredith into his arms. “Never mind,” he said. She let him envelop her with no resistance, almost like she'd been expected him to do it sooner. His throat felt like it was closing as a lump formed behind his Adam's apple.

Dr. Wyatt's observations...

They were true for the both of them. Meredith wore sunglasses about herself sometimes, too. Not uncategorically about everything like he did, but about certain things like self-worth and beauty and her ability to be a good parent.

She'd grown up without a dad, because her dad had left and started a new family with another woman. Derek had omitted the truth about Addison and then left Meredith to pick up the pieces by herself. She'd drowned. Ellis had died. Susan had died. Thatcher had slapped her for Susan.

Meredith had had a lot of heartache, too. Some because of him and his wrong choices. But not all of it. The bear squished between them as he pulled her tightly against him.

“You'll be a great mom,” he said, whispering against her. “Being lost doesn't equate to being bad. And you're already starting with something that Ellis never had.”

“What’s that?” she said doubtfully.

“Me,” he said, and in that moment he felt worthwhile. “I'm here. And I'm not going anywhere.”

Meredith sighed in his embrace. Breathed softly against his shirt. His open windbreaker rustled as he shifted to accommodate her. He knew she liked to listen to his heartbeat, and so he held her close and let her do what she needed. He rubbed her back.

He stared at nothing in particular, blinking, a bit dumbstruck. He was good at this. Comforting. Particularly comforting her. Really good at it. She hadn't said so, but she'd told him when she'd fallen into his embrace like she'd been waiting for it. And she wore sunglasses, too. He told her so many things that were true, and she never believed him, but they were. They were true. She was strong. He'd told her that, and she didn't believe it.

She told him he was strong. He hadn't believed it...

But... he wasn't going anywhere. He was fighting a lot of things. Stress and addiction and pain. But he was still here, still breathing, still holding her in his arms, and he wasn't going to budge no matter what the fuck Gary Clark said, no matter what else happened.

I pick you. I choose you. I love you, he'd said. And I'm not moving.

He was really good at comforting her, and... maybe... maybe, he was strong, too.

Maybe.

Gary Clark said nothing at all. Derek's breaths tightened. Maybe. Hesitant, unsure belief took hold, which was way, way better than not believing at all. Maybe strong.

Not a complete picture. Actually, it was sort of blurry. But... it was a way better self-portrait than the one he'd carried into the store. Derek Shepherd. Likes to brood unnecessarily. Has bad fashion-sense. Sucks at everything. He threw that photo into his mental garbage.

“I don't even know where to start in here,” she said, pulling him away from his musing.

“What?” he said.

Her lips curled into a grin, and her gaze was mischievous in a way that said, Hah, I caught you! “You were a thousand miles away just now.”
He shook his head. “I'm sorry, I just...” Had that epiphany he'd wanted. But this was her shopping trip. Her moment. About her. He took a breath and blew it out, and then he gave her an honest smile, because looking at her made him happy, and then he kissed her. “How about we just walk the aisles first and see what they have,” he suggested.

“Am I going to have to suggest no kissing to get through this?” she said.

He blinked. “What?”

She grinned. “Samantha, remember? That's what you said when we went to get Samantha. About walking the aisles.”

He winked. “It's a multipurpose strategy effective in many situations,” he said.

“Does it work in surgery?” she said.

“As a matter of fact, it does,” he replied. “If we're talking metaphorically, that is. Brains don't have aisles.”

“Good to know,” she said.

“I absolutely veto no kissing, though,” he said. He squeezed her. “I can't not kiss you like this.” He kissed her. “I just can't.”

“Okay,” she said softly.

“Okay, I can kiss you?”

“Okay, let's just... explore,” she said, rolling her eyes, and she took her first real step into the store, away from him, away from the stuffed animal rack. He echoed the movement with his own feet. Stayed beside her.

She officially left the entrance with one step, two steps, three. Four. Five. More. He mirrored her movements, surreptitiously letting her go at her own pace. She didn't seem to remember she still had the teddy bear in her hands. He didn't see any point to mentioning it. He fell into quiet support mode, which he liked, because it gave him a chance to catch up with things, himself. To take everything in. To look, wide-eyed, at their future.

The store was relatively void of people, which he supposed make sense, given that it was a work day for most people, and it was close to dinner time. The only reason he was available was because he'd come home early with Richard's blessing. He'd been unable to function after he'd left Dr. Wyatt's office. Barely able to ask for the time off. Richard had taken one look at Derek and sent him on his way. The only reason Meredith was available was because her shift had started at the crack of dawn, and the hospital was still slow with business after the shooting.

Meredith looked at cribs and bedding and diapers and teething rings and toys, and so he looked at them, too. She looked at little onesies meant for very small babies. Just like their baby would be when he or she was brand new. She stopped absentlly to stroke all the soft fabric and plush things in a store full of soft fabric and plush things. She wandered. Didn't stop for long in any particular place.

He watched her, unable to stop himself, and his attention on baby things waned somewhat. Meredith had been feeling a lot better since Dr. Charlton had prescribed Meredith some anti-nausea medication. She'd relaxed even more when Derek's mother had left a few days ago, Manhattan-bound.
Though Meredith and his mother got along, and Meredith was starting to realize she had a family on her side that didn't suck, not like Ellis and Thatcher had, he knew a true relationship would take a while for them to cultivate. Even then, he loved having seen her come this far. Loved watching her blossom.

Loved watching her in general. The way she walked. The way she bit her lip whenever she felt pensive or unsure. The way her eyes twinkled when she was happy. The way she lit up the space around her simply by being there.

Something stirred inside. Something deep within.

He loved her.

Every once in a while, that fact overwhelmed him in a good way, and nothing in his life seemed broken or wrong.

He slid behind her, body-to-body with her, and they fitted. He put his hands on her shoulders and rubbed her arms while she looked at a stroller. He pressed his nose into her loose tresses of brown-blonde hair by her right ear. He inhaled. The familiar scent of lavender filled his head. His muscles relaxed.

“You're hovering,” she said.

“No,” he murmured with a smile. “I'm breathing you in.”

Her nose scrunched adorably. She didn't look up from the price tag on the stroller. “You're hovering.”

He chuckled and pulled away, following her at a respectable, less hover-y distance as she moved to the next stroller in the aisle. More than thirty minutes of walking and looking in a daze had passed before she stopped in the bedding section to stare at a sun-colored bedding set painted with lambs and bears and giraffes. A menagerie of anthropomorphized cuteness. She ran her fingers over the soft blankets.

“Do you like it?” Derek said. His voice arrived rough. He cleared his throat.

She made a face. “God, no. It's too... cute.”

“Too cute,” he echoed. “But aren't babies, by definition, cute?”

She turned to look at him. “Cute, but... This is like cute on steroids. You're not sold on this kind of cute, are you? I don't think I can handle cute to this degree, even with nine months of conditioning.”

He grinned. “Meredith, I am many things, but decorator is not one of them. We can do whatever you want as long as the nursery is functional.”

She leaned into him with a sigh. “We'll have a nursery in the new house.”

He nodded. “We will.” He kissed her. “We planned it that way.”

“I know,” she said. “It's just... mind boggling to think about, sometimes. That I have a sort of house with a sort of nursery, an awesome husband, and a twelve-week bowling ball.” She tilted her head back and stared up at him, a mischievous sparkle in her eyes. “What if I want to paint it all black?”
“The nursery?”
She nodded.

“You want a goth baby?” Derek said, raising his eyebrows.
She snorted. “Maybe, not a goth baby.”

“I wonder if Hot Topic does baby clothes,” he said. “I've never looked.”

“How on earth do you know what's in Hot Topic?” Meredith said.

“Abby went through a phase,” Derek said. “It used to be the only store where I could find acceptable Christmas gifts for her.”
Meredith frowned. “Abby...”

“Oldest niece,” he clarified.

“Right,” she said, nodding. “Right, that Abby. You take your Christmas shopping pretty seriously.”

“I'm the awesome uncle,” Derek said with a grin. “I have a reputation to uphold, you know.”
Meredith laughed, returning her attention to the lamb, bear, giraffe concoction in front of her.

“Seriously, I think... yellow,” Meredith said definitively. “I hate this bedding, but I like this yellow. How about you?”

“Yellow for the baby's room?” he said.

“Yeah. Pink is...” She made a face of disgust. “It's pink.”

“But it's kind of the traditional color for a girl,” he said.

“But it's pink, Derek. I don't do pink. And yellow works, boy or girl.”

“I thought you were sold on it being a girl.”

“It is a girl, just...” She shrugged. “Yellow works.”

“No pink, no cute. Got it,” Derek said, nodding. He kissed her. “I like yellow. It's very cheery. Like... bananas.”
She stared at him. “Bananas are cheery?”

He nodded. “Bananas are a very happy fruit,” he said. “They're shaped like a smile, aren't they?”

“You're a fruit,” she said, grinning. “A naughty fruit. And I thought you liked indigo.”

“Indigo is my favorite color, but yellow is definitely in my top five.”

She laughed. “Top five, huh?”

He kissed her. “Yes.”

“What are your other three, then?” she said, eyebrows raised.
“I like gray,” he said. “Like your eyes when it's rainy. And I like green. Spruce to be specific. And I do like pink.”

“You like pink,” Meredith said with a disbelieving snort.

He nodded. “Only certain kinds of pink,” he said. He pressed closer to her, into her space. Caught her eyes, unblinking. She backed into the shelf with a thunk, and the fuzzy blanket she'd been looking at lay behind her head, yellow and cheery and forgotten. She licked her lips. He nuzzled her hair. Kissed her temple. Then her lips. “Like here,” he murmured against her soft skin. “Or... other places.”

“Other places,” she murmured.

“Mmm,” he said. The teddy bear mashed into his right hip as she gripped his waist. The feeling of her smaller body flush with his made his breaths tighten. The small swell of her belly pressed against him, and his heart skipped. The smell of lavender intoxicated him. He hadn't felt this overwhelmed by sudden sexual desire in a long time. It hit him like a wave. Washed over him and didn't recede. He nuzzled her, stuck in high tide.

“Derek, we're in a store.”

“Talking paint colors, I know.”

“This is inappropriate,” she hissed, but there was a level of desperation in her tone that told him she wasn't really saying no. “And wrong.” More, she was trying to convince herself she should say no. She kissed him back of her own volition. “And bad.” Her tongue plunged into his mouth. French kissing. All her. “And...” She tasted so good. He let her delve as far as she could go. “You're so...”

“I love you,” he said. A moan twisted in his throat. She felt wonderful against him. Inside him. Wonderful and full of life and all for him.

“That's how you make babies!” said a small, cherubic, informative voice. “You kiss the mommy. The kiss grows in the mommy's belly, and then the mommy goes to the hopsital. They keep the babies there, and she gets one when she trades in the kiss.”

Derek winced as his and Meredith's lips snapped apart. She banged her head on the shelf. He held onto a curse with a burst of willpower that would have made even Cristina Yang kowtow to him if she'd been there. He felt his face turning red.

Meredith pressed the back of her hand to her lips as though she wanted to preserve the taste of him. She stared at him, sexy-eyed and discombobulated, like she didn't know what the hell had hit her. She swallowed. Rosy blush had spread across her skin. Down her throat. Like her skin did when they had sex.

“Really?” said the deeper, scoffing voice of a woman. “There are children here!”

“Did they make the baby, yet?” said the kid. “I don't see it anywhere.”

“Hannah, that's inappropriate!” scolded the woman.

Frustration, sexual and otherwise, licked at Derek's mind like flames. His muscles were stiff with sexual tension and... other things were just as stiff. He shifted. His jeans rustled. He didn't dare back away from Meredith with an audience, especially not such a short one that would be at waist level. He felt like he'd been caught with his hand stuck in a big, shiny cookie jar. Literally stuck, because he couldn't move without causing an even bigger scene.
He dared a glance at their audience. The little girl, who was perhaps five-years-old, looked at them with a combination of curiosity and hilarity. The girl's brown hair was tied up with a cute, pink bow. She looked like a younger version of the older, pregnant woman standing beside her. The little girl giggled. The older brunette woman did not. She glared, holding her daughter's hand.

“Um,” Meredith managed. “We're sorry.”

The older woman rolled her eyes, and she dragged her little girl away by the arm.

“Are you going to get my brother from the hospital soon?” said the little girl as they walked away.

The woman sighed. “Soon,” she said. “After I kill your father for explaining it that way.”

“You can't kill Daddy!”

“Sorry,” Derek called gruffly when he found his voice somewhere deep under a hearty pile of embarrassment, but the woman only snorted as she and her daughter disappeared around the corner. Away from scrutiny, he took a step backward, removing himself from Meredith's space. He shifted miserably. His pants felt... very small, and his body hummed with unfulfilled desire.

“Where did that come from?” Meredith said.

“Clearly a failed sex talk,” Derek grumbled, frowning. “I hope we do better.”

Meredith laughed but sobered quickly. “No, I meant...” She gestured toward him awkwardly. “Where did that come from?”

He shrugged. “It just... did.”

“You haven't done that in...” She swallowed. “Since before. Before you were shot.”

He closed his eyes for a moment. First, it'd been the injuries. He'd hurt, and he hadn't been interested in sex at all. Then, he'd been shackled into inaction by his own self-consciousness. His need for control. He'd wanted her, but he'd been too terrified to take her. Then the Paxil had leched his sexual appetite over time. He could be enticed, but he rarely wanted without at least some encouragement.

Except he'd needed no encouragement just now. He had no idea what had swept over him, but he liked it. The timing had been awful, but in those few moments, when all he'd been thinking about was kissing her because he'd really wanted to kiss her, he'd felt... normal.

Which only brought his attention to how abnormal things had been lately.

He looked at her. Sort of. But he didn't speak. He didn't know what to say.

“I know why you haven't,” she said, touching his shoulder reassuringly. Except that just made him want to kiss her again. His brain had gone topsy-turvy with the conflicting signals of heart versus logic. “I'm just trying to figure out why you did,” she continued. “As in just now. As in...” Her gaze darted below his waistline. He didn't miss the way she bit her lip, or the sudden tension in her frame like she'd become a longing, sexual tripwire. Or the way her gaze slammed upward so fast he thought she might have given herself whiplash. “As in... um,” she managed. She cleared her throat. “Yeah.”

“Do we have to analyze it?” he said uncomfortably, feeling more than a little bad that his unsolicited advances warranted such scrutiny.
She shook her head. “It?” she said, her tone breathless. Almost... dreamy.

Which was not helping his resolve to keep off of her. Not when, despite the no, no, no of the location, her body screamed yes, yes, yes at him from a bullhorn. Worse, he couldn't stop thinking about her naked. Right there in the aisle. Whatever switch the Paxil had flipped off was fucking on tonight.

“Well that,” he grumbled. He shrugged off his rain spattered windbreaker and held it in a crumpled pile in front of himself to better cover that up. “I'm calling that a lucky crap shoot.”

His words seemed to shake her from a stupor. She shook her head. “I'm sorry,” she said. She rested her palms over her navel as if the gesture comforted her. “I really didn't mean to put you on the spot.”

Still not quite willing to meet her eye-to-eye, he stared at the swell highlighted by her hands. “I think it's the way you look right now,” he said, hazarding a guess.

She frowned. “What about the way I look?”

“I like that I can see the baby,” he said. “It's been my replacement thought for so long, and now I don't even have to imagine. I can just look. And it's... I like it.” He swallowed. “I really, really like it. Pregnancy looks good on you.”

“Oh,” she said.

“Sorry,” he said with a heavy sigh. “I didn't mean to make this porny. We can keep looking around.”

She shifted. Bumped his hip playfully with hers. “Hey,” she said. She looked at him, a sly smile crossing her features. “I think not here. But I'm okay with now, now, now.”

He looked up as her meaning sank into him, into all his disappointed, thrumming sinews. “Home, then?” he said, hope encroaching on his tone.

She nodded. “Yes, but I hope you know I'm not going to let you live this down anytime soon.”

“Live what down?”

“You made shopping for baby things porny, Derek,” she said. “That's almost as bad as getting sexy in a grocery store or something.”

“I have never gotten sexy in a grocery store with you,” he said.

“Maybe, not in this universe,” she countered. “But I'm sure there's a porny Derek somewhere who has.”

He grinned sheepishly as they went to the register to buy her bear.

Let's spend the night together

His lady had a craving.

Derek stood in the kitchen in nothing but his fuzzy blue bathrobe, the one Meredith had bought for him on their first Post-it Christmas, sated and relaxed and smiling. They'd made love, languishing in their bed for over an hour, and... it'd brought him home again. Almost like when she'd announced she was pregnant, he'd forgotten what little had been left of his bad mood. Forgotten his disease. Enjoyed the moments. Been happy in her arms. With her in his arms.

They'd dozed afterward, and as he'd hit that twilight before dreaming, he'd felt...

Replete.

He couldn't stop smiling, because he loved his wife. And he loved his baby. He was alive to love both of them, and life was good. He ached in all the right places from biceps to heart to hamstrings. Good aches. Except he was smiling at the fridge. Smiling at the open fridge, letting out all the cold air.

He shook his head and grabbed the sleeve full of fresh bacon from the shelf. He pulled the jar of mayo from the rack on the door. He tried not to grimace at it. Bacon and mayonnaise. Arterial death on bread. Wonder Bread, she'd specified. Not the wholewheat whole grain crap full of seeds we buy for you. Bacon and mayonnaise and Wonder Bread. He couldn't think of anything more disgusting in this particular moment.

But he forbore.

His lady had a craving, and he'd happily offered to fix her something while she rested upstairs. It was the first time she'd asked him for anything other than his pancakes. And, just like with the cliched pickles and ice cream of his replacement thoughts, he wanted to do right by her. She was carrying his baby. The least he could do was fix her a sandwich, no matter how appalling he found its contents.

He pulled five paper towels away from the roll and laid them on the microwave floor. Then he took four greasy strips of bacon from the sleeve and placed them in a line before he closed the door. She liked her bacon crispy. Not just a little crunch. C-r-i-s-p-y. He put three minutes on the microwave timer. He'd work from there. He hit start.

The strips began to pop and sizzle while he waited. The room filled with the scent of cooking bacon. Samantha arrived in moments. She'd been sleeping in her crate, but now her gaze held an air of carnivorous glee in it. Samantha sat down on the floor by the microwave and stared up at it.

"It's not for you," Derek said, despite the dog's wagging stump-tail.

Meredith walked through the kitchen door with thirty seconds left on the microwave timer. Her feet were bare, her hair mussed and tussled. She wore her red bathrobe, and she looked beautiful. The glow of sex and pregnancy and her general, pleased, relaxed demeanor made her radiant, and he had to kiss her again.

"Hey," he said as he cut her off on the way to the counter to follow his heady kissing impulse. He loved the way her breath caught when his lips met hers. The way her body melded against him in the space between one heartbeat and the next. The feel of her hands on his hips, squeezing. Very, very good at sex, she told him in a million ways without a single word.

"You didn't have to come downstairs," he murmured when he finally pulled away.

"I changed my mind," she said.
“No bacon?” he said.

She slipped past him toward the countertop where he’d placed the mayonnaise and picked it up. “I think I’d rather have a fluffernutter. A real one.”

He couldn't stop his look of horror as the microwave dinged. “A fluffernutter with bacon?”

She giggled. “No, silly.” She put the mayonnaise back into the refrigerator and pulled out an open jar of marshmallow paste. She'd bought it after their Lake Cushman trip, her mind newly reawakened to the possibilities of peanut butter and marshmallows, he supposed. She grinned at him. The sky outside was black, and the way her eyes caught the light in the kitchen made him sigh as his thoughts became laden with old memories.

I'm in love with you. I've been in love with you... forever.

She'd worn a lilac-colored shirt with a gray... thing underneath. Her hair had been down. The wine glasses she'd been cleaning had clinked as she'd put them in the sink. He'd stumbled all over himself, then. Stumbled with his words.

I'm a little late. I know I'm a little late...

But he'd told her how he felt.

“Just a fluffernutter,” she said, pulling him away from his mental trip. “But thank you for making the bacon, anyway.”

She pulled the Wonder Bread from the top of the fridge. The plastic bag crinkled. She walked to the dinette set with the bag, a knife, the jar of marshmallow paste, and a jar of peanut butter from the countertop, all in an awkward bundle. She plunked down in the chair and dropped everything in a pile on the place mat.

Bacon forgotten, he slid into the chair across from her and watched while she made her sandwich. Watched with his usual quiet amazement while she stuffed her face with it. He really didn't understand where she put it, or why her blood tests were always so pristine. If he were to eat like she did, he'd be overweight and minutes from a heart attack, if not already dead.

“You sure you don't want one?” she said around a full mouth, more than half the sandwich already gone.

He nodded, staring at her while he rested his chin on his hands. “I'm sure,” he said softly.

“I swear, it's better with the paste,” she said.

“You're actually advocating that it's better with fake marshmallows than with real ones?” he said.

“Mmm,” she said. She took another huge bite. “Yes.” She grinned at him. “You seem like you're feeling a lot better. You look... good.”

“I am feeling better,” he said.

She waggled her eyebrows. “When I get that feeling, I want sexual healing?”

He laughed. “Minor epiphanies. Sex. I'll take anything I can get.”

She pouted. “But you won't try a real fluffernutter. You won't even give it a chance. You're prejudiced against fake marshmallows! What if they're a magical PTSD cure?”
“I won our bet,” he said haughtily. “I don't need to try them. And I'm pretty sure fake marshmallows won't cure my PTSD.”

“You never know!” she said.

“Admit it,” he teased. “Your woman’s intuition may be suspect.”

“We're still having a girl,” she said.

“Assuming you're right, that’ll put you at a fifty percent average, which is still an F, Mere.”

“Well, you should try a real fluffernutter at least once!”

“You're changing the subject,” he said.

“And you're a frustrating ass!”

“My ass is not frustrated,” he said, grinning.

Her nose scrunched adorably. “Jerk,” she said, the word a curious amalgamation of affection and irritation.

“I just don't like marshmallows,” he countered.

“You love s'mores,” she countered back. “Those have marshmallows.”

“Okay, fine,” he said, conceding her point. “Maybe, it's the peanut butter and marshmallow combination I don't like. Either way, it's gross.”

“It's not gross,” she said. “It's the best. Thing. Ever. And you won't even try it.” She chomped on the last bite of her sandwich as if to prove her point.

He smirked. “Are we really fighting about this?”

She sniffed, though her eyes twinkled. “I'm ashamed by your close-minded marshmallow bigotry,” she said as she chewed. “Everybody should have one real fluffernutter before they die. It's a rite of passage.”

“Oh, it's a rite of passage, now, in addition to a PTSD cure?” he said, incredulous.

She nodded.

“Meredith, I think the only way I'd ever try a real fluffernutter is if I have to lick it off you,” he said.

She stopped chewing. Swallowed. Stared at him for a long, silent moment.

“What?” he said.

She reached for the marshmallow paste. Unscrewed the cap.

“Meredith, what are you doing?” he said. He'd been joking. Honestly joking. Surely, she couldn't...

She did. She dipped her index finger into the paste, and then she drew a white, sticky line on her lips.

“That's not a real fluffernutter,” he said. “That's just the paste.”
“Now, you’re mincing details?” she said.

Fabric rustled as she shrugged away her robe, leaving her sitting naked in front of him. Pregnancy had swollen her breasts. Her nipples perked in the cool air. He’d known her carnally an hour ago. All the delightful details of joining with her roared back into his head. The way she called his name. The way her hands slipped down his spine. The soft, wet, warm way she squeezed around him when he drove to her center again and again and again.

“Um...” he said. “Isn’t Lexie home? I thought...” He didn't really have thoughts.

“She and Alex are both on-call tonight,” Meredith said. “We're all alone.”

“Oh,” he said.

She dipped her fingers in the paste once more. Rubbed it in her cleavage. Over her nipples. She shifted provocatively in the chair. Her robe slipped from her hips to the hardwood floor, leaving nothing to the imagination. She drew her palms down the front of her body in a languorous accentuation of all her beautiful features. Her hands came to a stop over her womb, a subtle swell that had once been flat.

Breaths tightened in his chest as she drew a sticky line around her navel. She spread her legs as she did so. He swallowed at the view.

“I have a new craving, Derek,” she said in a singsong voice.

“Tell me more,” he said.

“You did say you'd eat me if you won.”

He swallowed. “I did.”

“Well,” she said, “you won.”

He stared. “I did, didn't I?”

She stood. Walked confidently around the table to the space in front of him, dragging the marshmallow paste jar with her. The bag of bread and the peanut butter and the knife lay forgotten on her place mat. She stood with her butt against the table, facing him, a mere twelve inches away. He looked up at her. She leaned down and forward, and she kissed him, marshmallow paste and all.

A blast of sweet sugar hit the back of his throat. She made a soft, bleating sound that decimated him. He drank her down, and the paste came away from her lips as he laved her with attention.

“Oh,” he whispered, panting. He scooped his hands underneath her thighs and pulled up. She sat on the table at his behest with a thud, naked and... He kissed her. Naked. His brain mostly stopped at naked. “Maybe, fake marshmallows do taste okay.”

Her fingers tore through his hair. “We can skip the peanut butter then,” she murmured.

“Thank you,” he said.

She arched back, putting her hands behind her for support. The peanut butter jar crashed to the ground, followed by the clatter of the knife. He didn't flinch at the unexpected racket. He was too engrossed with her. She pushed her chest at him. “Taste me,” she said.
He wandered down her throat to her cleavage and licked. Licked a long line from below the place where her ribs fused in the center to the little dip between her clavicles. He sucked each of her nipples with attentive care, removing the sticky marshmallow mess she’d left for him. She moaned. The bread bag slipped off the table and landed in a pile on the seat of the far chair. He licked her navel. Stopped to press his ear against the small swell of her belly. Their baby was in there.

Maybe, I'm more fertile than the garden of freaking Eden, she'd said. Don't me and my hoo-hoo get any credit?

The thought made him laugh. He looked up at her and smiled.

“This is why I feel better,” he said. “I like the world when it's only this bubble. Just us three.”

“Me, too,” she said.

“You're beautiful, Meredith,” he said, the words deep and dumbstruck. “I hope you know that.”

She bit her lip, looking at him. “You make me know it,” she said. “Do I taste good?” she said.

His breaths tightened in his chest. “Yes.”

She shifted off one hand. Dipped her fingers in the marshmallow paste. And then she cupped herself. Touched herself between the thighs. Spread her legs wide for him, giving him a glorious, glistening view of his favorite color pink.

“Taste me, then,” she said. Commanded.

He grinned. “Bossy woman.”

You know you love it, she said with her eyes, and he agreed with her.

She gazed at him through her eyelashes. Her gray irises sparkled at him in the light.

I'm in love with you, he'd said.

“I've been in love with you forever,” he murmured aloud. She lay back on the table. Put her knees up. Rested her feet on the edge of the table. Her toes curled around the edge.

He bent down, pressed his palms gently against her thighs, spreading her as wide as she could go, and he opened his gift with his tongue. The hair at her cleft was coarse, colored light honey-brown like the hair on her head when she didn't dye it. He found her favorite spot in moments. He sucked. The heady taste of marshmallows, and her, and the vague, salty remnants of him mixed in a swirl.

Her muscles tensed. She called out. A nonsensical syllable that, out of context, sounded like a moan of pain, but he knew her well enough to know it wasn't pain. At all.

He tasted her again, and she scrabbled for purchase. For his body. For anything. Her fingers tangled in his hair, and she pulled him into her. Into the warmth that defined her center. He kissed her. Worshiped the confined, slippery, wonderful space he found himself in. His insides tightened more. Every time she cried out. Music. That, and the thumps she made as she thrashed on the table for him. All for him. Her short, skipping breaths were drumbeats in his ears. Her words...

“Derek,” she bleated. “Derek, Derek, Derek.”

And it was what he needed to hear.
He drank her body like wine, and she screamed for him.

Good screams.

Moments passed in blissful, stretched succession, slow and fast all at once. He made sure to clean every last bit of the marshmallow from her skin. Drove her to frenzy. Until she lay on the table, legs spread, body shaking, a grimace on her face as she stared, blank and drunk on the pleasure and tension of it.

He breathed her in. The scent of her below. He loved it.

He nuzzled her there, and she twitched.

Well, do you want to stay here a while? she'd said.

I just want my wife.

Is that the top of your list, then? she'd replied with a wink.

When he lay his cheek against her inner thigh and looked up, along the length of her body, at her, he saw the small swell of their baby at her navel. Saw her breasts, perked nipples pointing at the ceiling. Saw her gaze, which had been undone by need. For a moment, awe overwhelmed him. Awe at her trust. Awe at the intimacy. He kissed his favorite pink, and she squirmed, and she moaned, and she spoke his name in a long, dark, twisty way that made his spine tingle with the need to respond to her desires.

He loved it. Loved that he could do that for her. Undo her. Build her world. Help her find euphoria.

He blew softly on her skin, and she twitched. Moaned, long and low.

“Do you like that?” he purred.

“Yes,” she said. “Yes, yes.”

He sucked, and her long, low moan became a whine became a pulsing scream as he built her into the stratosphere. And then he pulled away. She flailed while he directed his attention to her thighs instead. To anything but her center. When she relaxed, he returned. He built her again. Higher. And then he let her relax. He took her high to low. High to low. Waxing, waning, like the moon, eclipsed.

You were like coming up for fresh air, he'd said, so long ago.

He lost track of the time because he was lost in the bubble that was her.

It's like I was drowning, and you saved me.

When he let her go at last, her release made her moan. She flailed. The remaining place mats went flying. She needed to hold something. Anything. He pulled her into his arms and let her twitch and pant and eventually ride back to earth. She rested in his arms, naked, half sitting on the table, half collapsed in his arms, her eyelids hanging low over glazed, sated eyes. Her fingers curled around the soft terrycloth of his bathrobe as her breathing relaxed from the endless cascade of tension.

“I think I like fluffernutters if that's your definition of a real one,” he said.

She snorted weakly against him. “Half of one,” she croaked. “That was really... real.”
“Is that what you had in mind?”

She nodded.

“Glad I could oblige,” he said, snickering. He licked his lips, finishing off the last remnants of sugar and her. Derek Shepherd. Damned awesome at sex. “You do taste very good,” he said. “But if that was only half, would that make you the fluffer? Or the nutter?”

She laughed. “There was no peanut butter. I'm definitely not the nutter.”

“There were nuts, but they were spectating,” he said with a leer.

“Yes,” she said with a snort and a gleaming gaze. You are so dirty, she said with her eyes. She slid her hands into his robe. Cupped him with her warm palm. He pressed against her hand. “Yes,” she said, “but... those were definitely not me.”

He kissed her. “Fluffer it is.”

She giggled. “Fluffer is... so...”

“Wrong but right?” he said, his voice a low purr.

“Very,” she said. She kissed him. “Very freaking wrong.”

Still, he was proud. Proud he could do that so well if nothing else. Please her. Beyond their first night together since he'd been shot, when he'd still been in too much pain to be very mobile, and they'd needed to rehearse for sex, no hint of Gary Clark's voice had ever surfaced again during intimate moments. Never made him doubt what he knew. He knew he pleased her when he put his mind to it. He more than pleased her. Finding that sort of confidence, even for such a limited thing; it was... freeing. Maybe, that was why he loved this bubble so much. Beyond the fact that he loved her, and it was fun, and it felt good. He felt like himself again when they made love. Even when the Paxil gave him trouble, he could still give her a great time, and that made him feel... like strutting and bragging.

Made him feel... whole.

Undamaged.

If you could brag about one thing, what would it be? Dr. Wyatt had said.

“What are you thinking?” she said.

He looked at her. “That I love you, and that I'm glad I'm good enough to show you that.”

She gave him a lazy, sated smile and kissed his chest through the terrycloth. “You're more than good, Derek.”

“Damned awesome?” he said.

She nodded. “Oh, yes. It's one of those many things I do love about you.”

“So, yes to sex and comforting. No to fashion-sense and brooding,” he said. “Got it.”
She laughed. And then her gaze grew more serious. She ran her fingers through his hair. “You do know it's not just about you being good at sex for me. I hope.”

“I know,” he said. “I mean, maybe I don't understand the rest, yet, but...” He nuzzled her. “I know you. You're not superficial. I know there's more. And I'm just... basking at the moment.”

“Basking,” she said, echoing him.

He nodded. “In my awesomeness.”

She laughed again. Petted him, her palms against the soft terrycloth over his pectorals. He supposed he could believe her about being funny, too. Not even hesitantly. She laughed so much when she was happy. He clearly made her happy, if nothing else, and it was hard to feel bleak when she made lovely noises like that. Her giggle was infectious.

Derek Shepherd. Likes to brood unnecessarily. Has bad fashion-sense. Comforts Meredith really well. Listens. Is maybe strong. Is damned awesome at sex. Is funny ha-ha, not funny strange.

Sweat had pasted loose strands of hair to her skin. He brushed one out of the way. Rested his cheek against the top of her head and sighed. “I just wish it would stick when I walk outside,” he said.

She stroked his arm. “Wish what would stick?”

“This feeling that I'm something,” he said. “I feel like something when I'm with you.”

Maybe, it would stick a little this time. He felt... different. Ever since he'd realized she wore sunglasses, too. He didn't expect a miracle. Didn't expect to love himself overnight or anything, but he actually had a tiny list of things to like that didn't feel like a blatant lie. Having a real world example of the same paint-it-black behavior in someone else helped him establish reasonable doubt with his own self-criticisms.

“You're always something.” she said. She slipped off his lap and stood on wobbly feet, unabashed by her nakedness. “Always.”

“You are, too, Meredith,” he said. “You're strong, and you're there for me in so many ways I can't even quantify. I never would have made it this far without your help.” He would never be stingy with compliments again. Not that he'd ever been stingy, but... he wanted her to know. Maybe, he could help her take off her sunglasses, too.

Maybe, they could heal together.

She gave him a watery smile. “Ditto,” she said, and he hugged her close, refusing to let himself argue with her no matter what kind of damning crap Mr. Clark whispered in his head. He loved her, and now, he had a project. Helping her, too. Another empowering thing that made him feel good. Telling her nice things because she deserved to hear them. He could do that.

Moments passed, and he didn't let her go. He held her close, terrycloth-to-skin. Breathing. Being.
He found so much peace with her about so many things. For long, stretching silence, he listened to her breathing, and she listened to his heartbeat, and they were both content. He could listen to her breathing for hours. A pure, simple sound that told him she was alive and safe.

His.

You're like a piece of me, she'd tried to explain. I can't call you my best friend or my person. Derek, losing you would be like losing a limb, or...
She's your person. I'm your arm. Got it.

Meredith pressed her nose against the juncture of his throat and chin and kissed him there. He felt the wet press of her tongue. She rose to her tiptoes and kissed his lips, plunging deep. He let her in, and he purred at her invitation.

“Again?” he murmured.

“Mmm-hmm. I'm having another craving,” she said.

“What kind of craving?” he said suggestively.

She looked at him with a heady, hooded gaze, only to giggle as her attention shifted somewhere behind him. He twisted to see what— He laughed, too. Samantha still sat by the microwave. Staring forlornly at it like she expected the bacon to jump out at any moment.

Meredith frowned. “That's...”

“Sad?” Derek said.

Meredith nodded. “We can't have gratuitous, kinky, kitchen sex while our dog is suffering. It isn't fair.”

“I concur,” he said.

Meredith walked to the microwave, and grabbed the uneaten bacon from the greasy, soaked paper towels. Samantha bounced on her hind legs, whining. Meredith dropped the four crunchy pieces into Samantha's empty food bowl.

That done, though, Meredith didn't return to him immediately. He watched as she pulled a familiar jar from the cupboard and then closed the door while the dog inhaled her treat.

“What are you doing?” he said.

Meredith shrugged. “Having a craving,” she said, her tone innocent enough.

“You want me to get fat, don't you?” Derek said, frowning as she came back to him. She clutched the lapels of his bathrobe, and she kissed him. “This is going to require some gym time, but I'll do it,” he murmured against her lips. “I'll make the sacrifice.” He kissed her on the nose. “For you.”

She laughed.

“No,” she said. “This is for me.”

“The Nutella is for you,” he said stupidly.

“It's my turn,” she said. She pressed against him, Nutella jar in hand, and he backed into the table.

He smirked. “What exactly are you planning to do with that?”

“You,” she said, matching his leer with one of her own. “I thought that was obvious.”

She put the Nutella jar on the table by his hip, pressed her palms against his robe, and stroked him waist to shoulder. Then she kissed and kissed and kissed him until he saw spots. He cupped her ass with splayed hands, and on instinct, he growled and tried to spin them around.
“Nope,” she murmured against his lips. “You had your turn.”

“McBossy,” he replied.

She nipped his lower lip, a playful gleam in her eyes. “McSexHypocrite.”

“Touché!”

Her hands slid to the bow tie knot at his waist, where he'd tied the thick belt of the bathrobe he wore. She fumbled blindly with it as she plundered his mouth. She tasted of peanut butter and marshmallows, but with her tongue dueling his, he didn't mind the combination. He felt the terrycloth of his robe sliding against his shoulders and his back and then his hips. He felt cool air against his skin, and the robe pooled on the table behind him, obscuring the Nutella jar from view.

And then she pushed him. Not hard. Enough to catch his undivided attention.

“Lie back,” she commanded.

“You want me on the table?” he said.

“It's more polite to eat at the table,” she replied, and he couldn't help but chuckle.

He squeezed the edge of the table with his fingers and hoisted himself up. A brief, unhappy line of pain lanced down his sternum, but it disappeared as soon as his weight had settled on his robe instead of on his arms. The Nutella jar slid to the side. She moved in front of him. Her waist hit the table edge between his knees. He pressed his knees against her hips. She wrapped her arms around him, and she kissed him, and he kissed her.

“Lie back,” she repeated.

The robe underneath his back let him slide down the length of the table easily. He brought his feet up with him, and she climbed on top after him, coming to rest with her knees beside his hips. He blinked at the overhead light and grinned.

“How do you want me, Derek?”

He remembered lying underneath her by the roaring fire. Remembered the way she’d faux-tied his hands and his legs as a motivator to remain passive. Remembered the way that, even when he'd been helpless, she'd given him choices at every opportunity.
What she'd done for him had worked.

He lay underneath her now, confined, offered no choices at all except to lie still and be loved, and he didn't mind at all.

In fact, he rather looked forward to the possibilities.

She dipped her thumb into the Nutella jar and drew out a glob. The sticky paste slid against his skin. He watched her draw a long line down his chest, covering the ugly, twisting, pink scar of his surgery from view. She dipped down like a swan, her body lithe and arched, and she pressed her lips against the space where he'd been cut in half.

“Mmm,” he said, and his eyes closed.

She spent long, languorous moments there, laving the ugly marks with love.

“You stayed,” she said for emphasis, her voice a low murmur. She pressed her nose against the scarred dip between his pecs, and she kissed him again and again. “You stayed when it would have been easier to go, and you're the strongest person I know. You kept your promise to me.”

Mr. Clark said nothing.

Derek blinked. He was floating. His breaths squeezed into something choppy. He wiped his face with his hands.

Maybe strong.

“Are you okay?” she said.

He nodded. Grunted. “Yeah. I'm okay.”

She kissed him, and he laughed, releasing the swirl of lighter things that had pent up inside of him like a near-bursting balloon.

“Tickles?” she said.

“No,” he said. “I'm just happy. Being with you makes me very happy. You make me happy.”

She looked down at him. Ran her fingers through his hair in a way that made him want to purr. She smiled a wet, watery smile and she said, deep and shaky with feeling, “I'm really glad you're feeling better, Derek. I'm so glad.”

He put a palm against her navel, unable to resist contributing any longer. “And I'm glad you're feeling better,” he said. “And I'm glad you're here.”

She grinned at him. Dipped her thumb into the open Nutella jar and pressed a glob of spread against the space below his left nipple where the bullet had ripped into him. He'd never liked the pock mark there so much as when she pressed her tongue into it. He moaned and arched back, pressing his upper body into her kiss. He looked through hooded eyes at the upside down, nighttime world behind him.

Only to jerk in surprise at the pair of eyeballs that stared back at him with a dreamy, mocha-colored, bacon-bacon-bacon gleam.

“Our dog is staring,” he said.
“So? Just ignore it,” Meredith said. “She always stares.”

“She what?” Derek sat up so fast the table skidded on the floor. The Nutella jar sat by his hip. Meredith almost lost her balance. She grabbed his shoulders. Her nails dug into his skin, and the pain of it made him grit his teeth, but he didn't complain.

“She always stares,” Meredith said calmly.

“She does not,” Derek said.

“She does,” Meredith insisted. “She's a total voyeur.”

Derek ran his fingers through his hair, agitated, and glanced at Samantha. Her stump tail wagged, and she looked... hungry. And that was just... wrong. He felt like the Thanksgiving turkey for real.

“I'm kind of flattered you never noticed,” Meredith said.

“I... really?” Derek said as his world realigned. “She really always stares?”

“Mmm,” said Meredith with a nod. She guided him back onto the table with a light push. “Just ignore it.”

She shifted and, as if to provide emphasis, she cupped him, touching his penis for the second time since they'd started their kitchen adventures. He found himself unable to stop his eyelids from lowering, unable to stop a moan from punching loose as Meredith shifted his weight in her hands. Her skin was so warm, and she knew exactly how he liked it. Exactly what made him come undone. She pulled on him slightly, not painfully, just... enough to create the pleasing sensation he so often found himself drunk on when they had sex. His favorite thing, and she knew it.

“Okay,” he said. Barely. A soft, pleased sigh fell out of him before he could stop it. “Ignoring, now.”

She smiled. “Good,” she said. She swept upward. Ran her fingers through his pubic hair, following the trail as it tapered to a stop at his navel.

He felt bereft. “You could go back down south, you know,” he suggested hopefully. “South would like some attention.”

She leaned down. Kissed him. Laughed. “Well, I'm not done with north yet. South will have to be patient.”

She drew a circle around his nipple with her index finger, tracing the skin softly with her nail. His nipple puckered in response. He sighed.

“Is north getting better, now?” she said.

“Mmm,” he purred. “But when in doubt, Mexico is way nicer than Canada.”

She laughed.

“I love you,” he said.
When she kissed him, he lost himself in it. Lost himself in every touch. Lost himself simply listening to her breathing. When she ran her fingers through his hair, he felt the hairs shift on his scalp in a way that tingled, and he lost himself in that.

She licked a ring of Nutella from around his navel while kissing his hair.

It felt so good.

A deep groan loitered by his Adam’s apple—

Wait.

What?

His eyes snapped open. He turned his head. And there was the damned dog, tongue dangling from her mouth, eyes gleaming as if to say, Dad likes kissing a lot. I like bacon a lot. I kissed Dad. Do I get more bacon, now?

“Go away, Sam,” he said.

Samantha didn't move, and he tensed when he felt Meredith's tongue approach Mexico at a what-should-have-been-tantalizing crawl. Her fingers wrapped around him. She kissed the tip of his penis. His world went off-kilter for a moment.

When he regathered his wits, he barked, “Sam, for god's sake, shoo!”

The dog merely said, “Woof.”

It was really hard to muster any kind of authority with Meredith's tongue invading Mexico.

“Mere, really, the dog—”

Mere lifted her head. “Samantha, crate!” Samantha pouted. Meredith pointed at the dining room. “Crate! Now!”

Samantha left, her feet padding on the floor as she whined dejectedly.

Derek slumped back onto the table with a sigh. “Our dog is a voyeur,” he said. “How did I not know this?”

Meredith laughed. “I think I have a more pressing problem,” she said.

“What's more a pressing problem than the dog licking me during the Mexican invasion?” he said.

“This angle. I don't like it,” she said with a gleam in her eye. “I think I need you standing. I'm used to doing this on my knees.”

He shook his head. “On the table. Off the table. It's like sex on a seesaw,” he said.

She snorted.

He climbed off the table with another fleeting lance of pain that he barely noticed. She guided him, hands on his shoulders, to the edge, almost where he'd been sitting when he'd pleasured her earlier, but she pushed the chair aside. She pulled away his robe from the surface of the table and dropped it onto the floor, presumably to pad her knees.
“Your fluffer,” she said with a mock salute that made him laugh. “Reporting for duty.”

“Why does this feel like it could be a Julia Childs porno?” he quipped.

She giggled. “Did Julia Childs cook with Nutella?”

“No, but crepes are French,” he said. “And she cooked French food.”

“And that has to do with Nutella?”

He snorted. “Nutella goes on crepes. Even I know that. Don't you pay attention to the coffee carts at work?”

She licked her lips lasciviously. “Oh, right. I'll have to have one. Later. At work.” She stared at his body as though it were an unpainted canvas. “Now, shh. I need to concentrate. We haven't done this in a while.”

“We've never done this,” he said, staring down at her.

Her eyes widened. “We have, too! In your office that one time, we—”

“That,” he said, interrupting her, “did not involve Nutella. I would remember Nutella on the nutters, Ms. Fluffer.”

She snorted. “I didn't mean we've done that part before. God, you're dirty today.”

“Today?” he said.

“Okay, maybe, that's also one of the things I love about you,” she said. “People have this mistaken, quaint idea that you're respectable.”

She pushed him away with a sexy gleam in her eye. “Hold still,” she said.

“Only if you promise to be very thorough,” he said. “That shit is sticky.”

“Very thorough,” she agreed. Then she dropped to the ground in front of him with the Nutella jar.

He closed his eyes as the cool air laved his skin. He wasn't erect. Not even a little. Even with the kissing and the dirty jokes and her sitting on top him licking Nutella off his chest. His one dance with the spontaneous function of yore had happened in a damned store, of all the luck. He really hated the Paxil, sometimes.

“Never fear,” Meredith said playfully as if she'd read his mind. “That's why your fluffer is here.”

He laughed, at ease again. Gripped the sides of the table. Leaned his head back and sighed. He loved that she was here. Loved spending time with her, wherever that time happened to lead. Loved her.

_You know you're my best friend, right? _he'd said.

He made a soft grunt when he felt her slide back his foreskin with her fingertips. That was pleasant.
More than pleasant. But the Nutella was cold. And definitely sticky. He tried not to squirm at first while she put it on, only to realize after about twenty seconds, he’d inadvertently started pressing himself against her hand. The rubbing... That felt... nice.

“Really good?” she said.

“Mmm,” he answered. “Yes.”

He felt himself starting to fill.

He forgot about everything, though, when she kissed the head of his penis, setting nerve endings that had been sheathed on fire. Then she licked the underside of his length. He gripped the table. “Oh,” he said, and then he felt her mouth close around him. “Oh,” he said more deeply, a bark more than speech. His eyes opened to stars, and he grinned. And then the stars faded, and he frowned. “Wait.”

“Wait?” she said. He felt her mouth on him. Fought not to press into the motion.

“The dog is back. I can't have gratuitous, kinky, kitchen sex while our dog is watching. It's weird.”

Meredith turned her head. Samantha stared at them with the bacon-bacon-bacon-where's-more-bacon eyes. He cleared his throat awkwardly.

Meredith pointed at the door. “Crate!” she said. “Seriously. I need to blow your dad.”

Derek's eyes widened. “And you think I'm dirty?”

Meredith bit her lip to keep from giggling. “Crate!” she managed in a loud, firm voice despite her scarlet face and trembling limbs. “Go, now!”

Samantha slumped, like her favorite steak squeak toy had been put away, and she wandered out of the room again. Meredith turned back to him. Looked up at him with a sly smile. She rubbed her hands against his inner thighs. “Now, where were we?” she said.

“You tell me,” he said with a wink.

“How about I show you?” she said.

She dipped her head toward him. His eyelids lowered as he felt the wet slide of her mouth on his skin. When she sucked, he lost it. The table groaned against the wood floor as he pushed backward, surprised.

“Fuck,” he said. “That was...” He'd forgotten. He'd forgotten what this felt like; it'd been so long since he'd allowed her to do it. Sitting wetly sheathed inside her body felt like coming home. Felt beautiful and perfect and all sorts of euphoric, and he would never, could never, replace that feeling with anything. But it had never sucked.

He laughed.

Her mouth left him. Cool air snapped at his skin. “What's funny?” she said, looking up at him.

He glanced down. His partial erection looked a bit like a banana she'd greased up with Nutella to eat, though it was a partial erection, so the banana wasn't smiling yet. It was frowning. Kind of pointing toward the doorjamb, actually. That wasn't good. And he laughed again.
“I'm sorry,” he said. And he laughed again. “I'm sorry. My head is going weird places.”

“Weird good?” she said.

“Well, let's see,” he said. “I just thought a joke about you sucking. And now I'm comparing my own erection to fruit.”

Her eyes gleamed. She kissed his head, and he tensed as the zing of pleasure twisted through him. “What fruit?” she said. She licked.

“A sad banana.”

She giggled. “You have lots to say about bananas, today,” she said.

“What can I say?” Derek said. “It's a phallic fruit. Very vulnerable to raunchy humor.”

“Only because your dirty, dirty mind goes there,” she said. And then she shook her head. “And your fluffer is not doing a good job if your banana is sad.”

“It'll be happy in a minute if you keep doing that,” he said. Barely.

“It does look a little like a banana,” she said. “A banana covered in Nutella.”

“See!” he said, and they both laughed. And then he huffed. “Wait. A little?”

“In similarity,” she clarified, kissing him. “Not in size.”

“Okay, then,” he said, appeased.

“This is much, much more tasty than a banana, though,” she replied. And then she enveloped him once more, and a wet sound filled the air between them.

The air punched from his chest in a sharp grunt. His body wouldn't let him inhale as the sensation took him almost out of his own body. His toes curled. His lower lip quivered and his face pulled into a grimace. It felt good. It felt good. It felt— her tongue did something delightful and the air rushed back into him so quickly he felt dizzy.

“Mere,” he said. “Mere. Meredith. Mered...” He was lost in useless babble.

And then she stopped again. “I'd say the banana is very happy, now,” she said, though his ears buzzed, and it took him a while to interpret her. He glanced down, panting. That was definitely a smile. An upward, rock-solid curve that told him he was full to the brim.

She had Nutella on her lips. Her skin blushed with the promise of sex. He blinked. Once. Twice. She licked his corona. His jaw fell open, but his moan got stuck in his throat. It'd been a long, long time since he'd had this level of attention down there, and he could barely keep his thoughts straight. The only way he stayed on his feet was by keeping his knees locked.

He panted.

“Feels good?” she murmured during a tactical pause.

He nodded, panting, but he didn't have a chance to speak before she'd taken his full length into her throat to the hilt. “Holy fuck,” he managed, unable to stop himself from thrusting. Thrusting deeper. She gripped his hips to steady herself, and he fought not to get his fingers tangled in her hair. He heard the wet, slick sound of skin on skin. Sliding.
He thought he might die in the best way imaginable.

You're like a lightning strike.

He scrabbled for purchase. The light over the table split in two as his eyes lost focus. And then she was gone from him again, and he was cold as what she'd left behind evaporated. He couldn't find words for a moment.

She wiped her lips and looked at him with a sly smile. “Forgot I could do that?”

“My memory,” he said between short, panting breaths. “May have. Omitted it. I blame. The hypovolemic. Shock.”

“I learned in college,” she said.

“In what. The fuck. Class?” he said.

“French cooking?”

He barked with laughter, only to lose it when she kissed his head, and his thoughts dissolved all over again.

“I missed some spots, earlier,” she announced while his mind was still reeling. He shivered. She shifted. And she licked his scrotum instead.

She'd never done that before.

“They taught tea-bagging in French cooking, too?” he said incredulously, unable to stop the moan that punctuated the question.

She paused. “They might have taught tea-bagging.”

“Our daughter is never going to Dartmouth,” he said.

She giggled. “Got it all, I think.”

She gave him a kiss and a last lick for good measure. She enveloped him to the hilt once more, and he shouted. He couldn't stop himself. His insides tightened to an unbearable level, paradigmatic of torture, yet also pleasure. Pressure gathered in his center.

“Meredith,” he said, panting. “Meredith, I'm going to—” He tried to push at her despite the fireworks in his vision, but she kept slip sliding along his hard length, sucking. “Meredith, I'm going—”

And then it was too late. He pulled in a breath as though it were a riptide. He remained stuck on the precipice for an eternity moment. The world collapsed into a pinpoint and then exploded into a whorl of light, a single, brilliant star gone nova. He shouted. His muscles twitched out of control. He spilled into her. She squeezed his hips, her fingers like talons against his skin, and she drank it all. Every last drop.

When the explosion left him, he collapsed his weight against the table. His knees shook. She let him go, licking the underside of his length as she withdrew. His erection sagged and left him spent. He panted as she rose to her feet.

“Wasn't that salty?” he said, incredulous and hoarse. She hadn't done that before, either.
She licked her lips. “I hear salt goes with nuts.”

He grunted. Sort of a laugh. “I feel like I should make a spit or swallow joke, but my head is empty right now.”

“Literally,” she said. She leaned over him and kissed his flaccid privates.

“Not that head,” he said, snickering. “I think you're taking home the dirty prize tonight,” he said. “I can't win against that.”

She'd always been a bit more... experimental than him. He happily went along for the ride when she took him, but most of the more unusual things they'd tried were at her behest. Well, other than the glow-in-the-dark condoms, which he still found novel and funny.

_They glowed, Derek, she'd said. In the dark. They made sex look like a freaking UFO encounter._

She hummed a soft tune in her throat.

A chuckle ratcheted out of his sore throat when he realized it was the Batman theme from the horrible Biff-Pow-Thwack Adam West version that had been popular when he'd been a kid. “That song is by the Kinks, you know.”

She nodded. “So appropriate, isn't it?”

“Does this mean I should call you Fluffergirl from now on?”

Her eyes sparkled. “I fluffed, and I fluffed, and I blew your house down.”

“Now,” he said, kissing her on the lips, “you're mixing naughty stories. And double entendres.”

She sighed, leaning against the table next to him. They were both sweat-slicked and smelled of sex. She kissed his shoulder. He wrapped his arms around her. Pulled her close.

“This is why I love you, Derek,” she said softly. “You're fun to be with, and you happily go along with my freak show.”

“It's not a freak show,” he said. “And you're not a freak.”

_You're the love of my life, he'd said, and I'm really looking forward to spending my future with you._

She shrugged. “Well, whatever it is, you go along with it. And you don't judge me. And I just...” She kissed him. “I just love you. Okay?”

He met her eyes. In this moment, he could believe anything. She could sell him a bridge. A fake bridge that went to Neverland. He'd buy it, no questions asked.

“I'll try to remember,” he said. “You might have to keep telling me for a while.”

“I don't mind,” she said.

He nuzzled her. “I love you, too,” he said. “Very much.” He shifted uncomfortably. “Except I think I'm still sticky.”

“Me, too,” she said. She grinned at him. “Sex in the shower, next?”

He nodded. “Good plan.”
“Bendy thing?” she said.

“If you insist,” Derek replied with a wink.

“Oh. My. God,” said Lexie, her eyes wide like saucers as she stood in the kitchen doorway.

Derek snatched for his robe from the table behind them, only to remember it was lying on the floor at their feet as a pad for Meredith’s knees. Meredith leaped in front of him, grabbing his shoulder for balance as she stumbled. He crossed his palms in front of his lower body, despite already having Meredith as a shield, but from the look on Lexie’s face, it was too late for modesty, anyway. Lexie had clearly gotten an eyeful, from the tips of his toes to the scarred mess on his chest to Meredith's little baby bump.

“Again?” Lexie said as she turned redder than Rudolph’s nose. “Seriously, again!? You'd better wash that table with Pine-Sol. And bleach. And more Pine-Sol.” She darted out of the room. “And get a freaking room!” she called through the door as it slammed. And then she was gone.

Derek glared at the door. He really, really hated that. Hated people barging in. Hated people seeing him with his shirt off since the shooting, let alone buck naked. The day they moved into their new house could not arrive soon enough.

“The kitchen is totally a room,” Meredith said at the closed door.

“I thought you said she was working tonight,” he said, his tone rueful.

Meredith bit her lip and gave him a guilty look. “She told me she was working tonight!”

He sighed. There wasn't much they could do about it, now. “It's okay,” he said. He took her palm from his shoulder and kissed her hand to prove it. She smiled.

Meredith bent to pick up his robe from the floor. “You know what else I love about you?”

“What?” he said.

“That you somehow haven't stashed her body in the woods, yet.”

He laughed hoarsely. “Batman doesn't kill people. At least not for failing to knock, anyway.”

Meredith raised her eyebrows. “Does Fluffergirl?”

He laughed again as they put on their robes and headed to the shower.
“Audrey,” Derek said as he watched a ferryboat glide across the water. The sky was lit with strands of pink and rose and mauve as the sun melted into the horizon line behind puffy walls of clouds.

Meredith shook her head and flipped the page of the book they held between them. “How about Beverly?”

They sat curled in each other’s arms on the passenger side of Meredith's Jeep—a tight fit, but a fit nonetheless. She’d parked in their spot next to the bay under a lone tree, which waved in the chilly breeze. A towel covered the drivers’ side seat, where they’d put out sandwiches, and in the back seat rested stacks and stacks of baby name books, all of which Derek had gleefully ordered.

“Beverly is pretty,” Derek said as he mulled over the name. “Beverly Grey-Shepherd.”

“Or Shepherd-Grey,” Meredith said.

“We need to flip a coin on that at some point,” he said.

Meredith nodded as she glanced at the page. Derek watched her lithe finger trace the words beneath her fingertips. “The book says Beverly is Old English for beaver stream,” she said.

“Oh.”

She snickered. “Not a big fan of beavers, Mr. Nature?”

“Hey, I like beavers,” he said. “Just not as a connotation for our daughter's name.” He flipped the page. “Do you like Caitlin?”

“Cassidy,” Meredith countered.

He frowned. “Colette?”

She laughed. “That reminds me of your Fraunch. We can't do that, or I'll giggle every time I have to say her name.” She flipped the page. “Sybil. With an S.”

Derek blinked and looked down at the book, which was still resting on one of the later C pages. He saw Cybil, with Cybill and Sybil listed as common variants. “Sybil?” he said.

Meredith nodded. “Yeah. I like Sybil. Do you?”

“I do,” Derek said, “But—”

“It just rolls off the tongue for some reason,” Meredith said. She looked down at the page. “And it means prophetess or oracle. That’s pretty neat. And it's not giant rodent-y.”

“Veto,” Derek said.

The seat cushion squeaked as she pushed back to look at him. “But you just said you liked it!”

“I do, but my last name makes it pretty silly.”

“Sybil Shepherd sounds great. It flows.”
“Yes, Meredith, and you can catch her on Moonlighting reruns.”

Meredith looked at him blankly. Another ferryboat glided past on the gray water beyond the windshield.

“The actress?” he prodded. “Cybill Shepherd? Star of Moonlighting? We can't name our daughter after a celebrity.” When she didn't respond, he sighed. “You're making me feel really old right now, Mere.”

“Only vaguely?” he said.

She gave him a small nod. “Vaguely.”

“I think you're teasing me,” Derek said.

Her eyes gleamed, and her nose crinkled like she was seriously considering laughing, but she didn't reply to his accusation. “So, I guess we're still thinking Anne for a girl?”

“Subject change,” he accused with a smirk.

“Returning to the subject,” she fired back.

He snorted. “Fine. Yes. Anne. But we have a lot of books we haven't read yet.”

“I feel like we've read thousands of names already,” she grumbled.

He pulled her tightly against him and slid his palm down her arm. The book slid off their laps to the floor with a thunk. The warmth of her body felt good in the quickly cooling car. Her closeness felt even better. He pushed his nose against her hair and kissed her once more.

“We could take a break, then,” he murmured.

“But we haven't even started looking at boys' names,” she said.

Derek nodded. “We still have more than five months.”

“We could have Dr. Charlton tell us the sex, soon,” Meredith said. “Then we'd know what to spend time on.”

Derek frowned. “I think I'd rather be surprised.”

“You would?” Meredith said.

He nodded.

“Why?” she said.

“I don't know…” He shrugged. “Just…” He looked at her. “It feels right. To let the universe surprise us. Do you not want to be surprised?”

She scrunched her nose. “When I think of surprises, I think... Alzheimer’s and secret wives and miscarriages and guns.”
“All the more reason to let this be a surprise,” Derek said.

“What makes you say that?”

He smiled. “Because whatever the outcome, it'll be a really.” He kissed her. “Great.” Kissed her again. “Surprise.” Again. “And you clearly need some faith restoration.”

She looked up at him, eyes twinkling.

“What?” he said.

She sighed against him, snuggled closer, and wrapped her left arm over his stomach. Her fingertips scrunched his shirt between them, and she kissed his chest. “It's just nice to see Mr. Optimism again,” she said.

“He really likes to be here when he can be,” Derek said softly.

“Good,” she said.

Instead of reading more names, they spent time watching the ferryboats, wrapped up in each others arms. The sun waved its final surrender to nightfall soon after. The Seattle skyline reflected like twinkling fireflies in the dark water.

The undercover police officer who'd been shot had lived, Derek had discovered when he'd returned to work for the second time. The man, named Adam Peabody, a sergeant, had needed three major surgeries and four subsequent smaller surgeries to repair the damage of four bullets. His intestinal tract and bladder were in shambles. He hadn't woken up and still wasn't breathing on his own, even weeks later.

But he'd lived.

And he had brain activity.

He just... wasn't waking up.

“So, we're still thinking about Anne for a girl, but that's not set in stone,” Derek said. “And we're stuck on boys' names. Maybe, Michael after my dad, but...” Derek sighed. The name made him balk. Remembering his dad in any capacity still felt like a raw wound, sometimes. Not always. But sometimes. “I don't know if I'm ready for that.”

Adam didn't respond. Nothing responded except quiet, steady beeping, and the rhythmic pulse of air being forcibly moved. Derek dropped his hands to his lap, and he leaned forward to watch his unconscious companion.

Maybe Adam,” Derek said, only to freeze when he thought he saw the unconscious man twitch at the sound of his name. “I like Adam,” Derek continued purposefully. Another small twitch. Derek glanced at Adam's heart monitor, but nothing had changed. “Adam Shepherd-Grey sounds good. Or Adam Grey-Shepherd.” He sighed ruefully. “We might be flipping a coin on the last name. I want her to put Grey first, and she wants to put Shepherd first, and we're kind of at a stalemate.”

Derek stopped to stare at his silent companion. He hadn't seen any additional movement after the first two twitches.

“Adam, are you awake?” Derek asked.
The man didn't respond or move. The monitors didn't change.

“Can you hear me, Adam?”

Nothing, again.

Derek rubbed his nose with his thumb and forefinger. That was it, then. He'd been doing charts for so long, he'd started to see things. He shifted. A pile of post-op charts slid off his thighs to the sofa cushion beside him. He'd offered to chart for Meredith, who'd taken him up on his offer with such a thankful look, he couldn't regret the work. He had to look over all the work her interns had done to make sure they'd followed proper procedures. Had to double check every dosage and confirm every diagnosis. Then he signed off on them for her. She handed him her new charts in the mornings, and he had them done for her by the afternoon. He selectively offered to do Dr. Bailey's, Mark's, and Richard's charting when he felt up to it, but charting for too long was exhausting, just like too much heavy reading, or too much math, or too much of anything that required intense thought. There was a reason doctors hated it, and he didn't miss having his own charting to do.

The room, other than the whir of the ventilator, was quiet. Still. Adam Peabody had visitors occasionally. His squad members visited once a week on Fridays, and his partner visited every Tuesday. Other than that, though, he didn't seem to have anyone. No kids. No significant other. No siblings. No parents. No family whatsoever. And that made Derek a little sad.

Family was what made tragedy like this the least bit tolerable. He couldn't imagine going through something like this alone. He couldn't imagine what his first few days after his surgery would have been like if Meredith hadn't been there. If his family hadn't come to keep his mind off of things.

Derek leaned back against the sofa. It creaked.

When Derek looked at Adam, Derek saw himself. Or what Meredith must have seen after the shooting. A pasty, sick man swathed in bandages, blankets, and wires. He saw jagged memories of tan-colored work boots with bloody shoelaces like spaghetti with his mind's eye. A spinning gun on the floor. A myriad of bad things. But the more Derek visited, the less visceral all the conjured images seemed. The less sickening.

Until he could be here, now, weeks later. As a friend for someone who didn't seem to have anybody.

Derek glanced at his watch. He'd been sitting here for two hours, and he was due in OR 12 in ten minutes. “Tomorrow, same time?” he said as he gathered up all the charts that had spilled off his lap and rose from the sofa.

He approached the man's bed. Gripped the railing with his free hand. Looked down.

Adam had greasy black hair that went past his shoulders and a swath of stubble. A snake tattoo wrapped around the man's arm from wrist to bicep. What once had been a muscular frame had wasted to skin and bones and not much more.

Derek remembered vaguely that when Adam had been brought in that he'd been clean-shaven. One of the most trying things about a hospital stay was feeling like you were slowly losing your humanity. The night Meredith had helped Derek take his first real shower, helped him shave and brush his teeth...

“I'll bring a razor for you tomorrow,” Derek said. “Okay?”

Adam didn't answer, not that Derek expected it.
“Oh, you found another Really Old Guy!” said a familiar voice, and Derek bristled as he looked up. Cristina bounded through the doorway with a lunch tray and sprawled across the sofa Derek had vacated moments earlier. “Dibs on the sofa,” Cristina said.

Derek glared. “He's forty-six, Cristina.”

“What's your point?” She tipped her head to the comatose man for emphasis. “That's old.”

“Don't sit in here,” he said.

Cristina pulled open a bag of chips, and the pop-hiss of an opening soda can filled the room. She crossed her legs and popped a potato chip into her mouth. “Why not?”

“It's not a room for you to sit in,” Derek said.

“You were sitting in it.”

“I'm standing.”

“The sofa cushion is warm, so you were sitting at one point,” Cristina countered.

“Because he needs company.”

Cristina raised her eyebrows. “I'm not company?”

“Not the kind he needs.”

“What kind am I?” Cristina said.

Derek glowered. “The kind who calls him Really Old Guy.”

“How about Comatose Guy?” Cristina said. “Is that better?

“Cristina—”

“Borked Guy?” she offered.

“Cristina, he was shot, okay? Just like me,” Derek snapped. “And if I was lying in a hospital somewhere on a ventilator, I'm pretty sure I'd rather not be called Borked Guy. Have a heart, for Christ's sake.”

She stared at Derek for a long, long moment, her expression unreadable. “Fine,” she said. Her gaze drifted to the chart resting in the holder at the foot of the man's bed. She leaned forward. Squinted. “I'll call him Mr. Peabody.”

“Sergeant,” he said.

She sighed. “Sergeant Peabody,” she said, rolling her eyes.

“It's a start,” he said. He glanced at his watch and turned to leave.

“Where are you going?” Cristina said.

He glanced pointedly at the unwieldy bundle in his hands. “I'm done with my charting.”

“Meredith's charting.”
“Which I offered to do for her, so it's my charting,” he countered.

“Right,” she said. She popped another chip into her mouth and crunched on it. “When exactly are you going to cut again?”

“When I'm ready,” he said.

“And when is that?” she said.

“Not now.”

“Obviously,” she said. “So, when?”

“When I don't think I'll kill someone,” he said.

She took a sip of soda. “Don't you think you're just wallowing at this point?”

He frowned. “I'm not wallowing.”

“You were hiding in a hospital room with a borked guy doing somebody else's charts.”

“He's not borked, Cristina.”

“Whatever,” she said, her tone blasé. “It seems like you're wallowing to me.”

“I'm working on it.”

“Working on wallowing,” she said.

“On cutting!”

She frowned at him as she crunched on a chip and swallowed. “Just don't let it be another motorcycle... thing, okay?”

He snorted. “Because I've been looking forward to having you drag me against my will into an OR and chain me to the scalpel tray.”

“The motorcycle wasn't against your will, McDreamy!” Cristina said.

“I've asked you not to call me that,” he said, almost a growl.

She gave him a defiant glare. “I don't call you that when you're being reasonable.”

He almost snapped at her. Almost. He could hear Gary Clark telling him to lose his temper. Taunting him. Instead, Derek took a breath, and he let it out. He took another, and he let that out.

He wasn't going to let himself unleash his temper at hapless bystanders anymore, he'd decided earlier that week with Dr. Wyatt. That was one of the things he wanted to fix about himself. One of the things that had been persistently wrong, both before and post-shooting. Exacerbated by, but not caused by, PTSD. His terrible temper.

He counted to five in his head.

Usually, that was all he found he needed. The presence of mind to hold back on a comment long enough to count to five. Long enough for his common sense to catch up with the situation.

“Touché,” he said, the word soft, though he tried to inject some humor into it with what Meredith liked to call his lady-killer wink. From Cristina's steely gaze, the lady-killer aspect of the wink was entirely lost, but he called this instance a victory, anyway.

“I'll see you tomorrow, Adam,” he added. The man on the bed seemed to perk up at the sound of his name, and Derek stared. “Did you see that?” he said to Cristina.

“I saw the dopey wink,” Cristina replied blandly. “With that sort of context, the story of you and Meredith ending up in the sack after meeting at Joe's makes even less sense.”

Derek rolled his eyes. “I think something's wrong with you,” he said, enjoying the brief flash of good humor he'd found. “You're the only woman I've met who's impervious to the wink.”

Cristina snorted and stuffed a chip in her mouth. “What about Ellis?”

“One of two,” he corrected, and he left the room smiling.

He dropped off Meredith's charts at the nursing station and stepped into the elevator moments later with a crowd of doctors, nurses, and other staff. He pressed himself into the back left corner as the elevator began to drop. So many people pressed against him made his smile melt away, and he felt almost itchy with the desire to get out of the small space, but two floors later, the elevator doors opened, bodies shifted, and all he was left with was April Kepner huddled in the opposite corner, her nose stuffed in a little spiral notebook like she was trying to hide. The doors slid shut, and the elevator continued its descent.

He swallowed. As far as he knew, she hadn't reported him to HR or to Richard or to anybody. He had no idea if she was waiting, gathering courage, or if she truly intended not to do anything about what he'd done. He'd sincerely said that he was sorry. There wasn't much else he could do. He'd made his bed. All he could do was lie in it, though not really knowing what his fate was to be, let alone knowing he had no control of it anymore, was maddening.

He glanced at Dr. Kepner out of the corner of his eye, only to discover her glancing back at him in the same, sidelong, surreptitious way. He broke his gaze immediately and stared at the floor. Eye contact meant likely conversation, and he didn't want that. He'd sincerely said he was sorry, but that didn't mean he forgave her for getting him shot. Or that he wanted anything to do with her. Or that trying to be near her didn't make his chest tighten with... something bad. Something boiling. Something he didn't want to let out.

When the elevator doors slid open on his floor, he stepped forward, unable to stop his audible sigh of relief.

“Dr. Kepner,” he said gruffly to be polite.

“Dr. Shepherd,” he heard muttered behind him in response.

And then the doors slid shut again, leaving him in the cool, refreshing open space of the hallway, and Dr. Kepner heading down to another floor. His shoulders slumped in relief, and he took a moment to breathe and relax.

He glanced at his watch. He was a little late, but not so late that he'd missed his opportunity.

But, now, he had a whole new obstacle to deal with.

The operating room.
He walked through the staff-only sliding doors into the surgical wing. Bustling staff cast incurious glances at him, just as they would any other surgeon passing through. Some of the scrub nurses seemed mildly interested in his presence, but he expected that given the events of the last few weeks. Some people bumped into him—not on purpose—and they didn't act like the collision was the Armageddon in the making. He didn't get the feel of eggshells cracking around him. Nobody tiptoed or gave him a disproportionately wide berth.

The result of such treatment was an odd dichotomy. The collisions and the close proximity to so many unknowns made him feel antsy. Uncomfortable. But the discordant thrumming of his nerves made a tolerable hum that he could hear, but to which he didn't need to listen. It stayed in the back of his awareness like the hush of an air conditioner, or individual voices in a bedlam. There was always the danger that something would tip him into fixation on that discordance, and then into panic, but he'd learned a lot of ways to keep that from happening, both preventive and reactive, and he felt better.

Better about being there than he had in a long time.

Darlene, one of the head scrub nurses waved at him as she passed, and he waved back at her. She winked at him knowingly. “Good to see you,” she said, and from warmth in her tone, the way her smile reached her eyes, she genuinely meant it.

“Dr. Shepherd,” Darlene said in her soft, soprano voice, “Is there anything I can help you with?”

He jerked his gaze away from the window in the door to OR 12, surprised at the intrusion, to look at the nurse. He’d been slinking through the surgical wing, peeking at surgeries in progress, trying to remember how to be excited about being a surgeon and saving lives, rather than full of dread. After two weeks of slinking with no interference, he’d gotten used to being pointedly ignored.

He felt his face heat. “I’m sorry. Am... am I in your way?”

She cocked her head at him like he'd spoken Greek. He wanted to melt away, but then her gaze softened. She put her hand on his shoulder. Though he knew her as a colleague, had never had a single problem with her, the unexpected touch made him tense. He couldn't help that part, but at least he didn't jump. She pulled away, but not in a scalded way that told him she was nervous about his reaction. In a slow, deliberate way that told him she was more concerned with his comfort than whether he would fall apart on her. Another subtle sign that told him he was getting better at faking normal, even if he didn't quite feel normal. A small success that made the moment less sharp.

“You're not in my way,” she said. “But you've been looking in doorways for days, now, and I can't help but think of myself when I'm shopping.”

“Shopping?” he echoed, not sure how something so disparate connected with his current situation.

She nodded. “When I can't find what I want, sometimes I need to find a little courage to ask a salesperson where something is. It's always been a quirk of mine. My daughter thinks it's silly. She always rolls her eyes at me.”

“Oh,” he said. He licked his lips and looked at the floor.

“So,” she said warmly, “can I help you with anything?”

“Well, I...” he blurted, and then the words stuck in his throat. This was ridiculous. A surgeon afraid to ask for an OR. He shuffled from foot to foot. Swallowed. “Would it be possible...?” And the words stuck again.

Darlene waited. Didn't put words in his mouth.

“Stuttering fool,” Mr. Clark said like a snake in Derek's head, and Derek closed his eyes for a long moment. He tried to think. If Meredith, queen of verbal blunders, was having trouble saying what she wanted to say, he always waited. He never thought she was silly or stupid for it. He had plenty of patients who stuttered or suffered from some form of aphasia. He never ridiculed them for it. They were sick, and that was all.

He took a calming breath, ignored Mr. Clark, and tried again. “I’d like some OR time,” Derek said. “No pressure OR time. I need...” He shook his head. “Could I arrange that?”

Darlene's patient expression slipped into a wide, warm smile. “We've been wondering when you would ask.”

He blinked. “We?”

“The scrub nurses. We didn't want to push you, so we left you alone.”

“Oh,” he said. “I'm... okay. Well, bet— better.”

Darlene nodded. “How about I page you whenever we have an OR free, and you can slip in for a while to practice?”

He swallowed against the sudden, overwhelming lump in his throat. “That'd be really great,” he managed. “Thank you.”

He'd gotten used to the eggshells. To people avoiding him, thinking he was lit dynamite. To whispered gossip nobody thought he could hear, wondering why he'd become so soft-spoken and jittery and short-tempered, speculating why he wasn't operating. That moment with Darlene had been his first time back at Seattle Grace since the shooting where he hadn't felt like he was an experiment stuck in a fishbowl for people to gawk at.

That feeling had stuck around.

He was in the surgical wing, and he was starting to feel at home again, at least in the hallways.

A hesitant smile tugged at his lips. Crinkled his eyes. He took a soft, relieved breath.

Good to see you, Darlene had just said.

“Likewise,” he replied, the word barely audible, but spoken, nonetheless, and not a lie.

The auburn-haired scrub nurse gave him a nod as she passed.

Seattle Grace had a dozen operating rooms. Most of them got used at least once per day. He walked to the last one on the right and stared through the wire mesh window. The room beyond the doorway was dark. Devoid of people.

OR 12 wasn't the same operating room where he'd had his surgery, but it had the same layout. The same kind of bright, glaring lights. The same equipment and the same shining, sterile scalpels, all arrayed with cold, clinical precision on a metal tray by the empty table. The room had the same everything but location.

He opened the door, but only to hit the light switch. He went back out into the hallway to the scrub room. And then he stopped. Put his hand into his pocket. He felt the crumpled-but-soft piece of cloth with his palm and pulled it loose.

His ferryboat scrub cap.

He took a short breath as he stared at it.

Something inside his chest felt... bigger.

Almost too big.

He hadn't worn this cap in over a year. Hadn't worn any cap in over five months.

His ferryboat cap had frayed in places and was beginning to fall apart at the seams from going through the washing machine one too many times. He'd tried to order another one just like it, but the pattern had been discontinued. He'd retired the cap from service, opting to save it only for very special occasions. It'd become his “lucky” cap, as Meredith had termed it.

His fingers clenched.

He needed to stop stalling. He put the cap on quickly and shoved through the door to the sinks. He grabbed a sterile mask from the dispenser, and he tied it over his face, and then he went through the long ritual of washing his hands. The sponge and the harsh soap tingled, and his breaths tightened the longer he spent washing himself. His teeth clenched as he snapped on a sterile pair of blue nitrile gloves. He shivered. His throat felt full. But he didn't hit a brick wall until he walked inside the main body of the operating room.

The bright overhead lights bore down on him like an oncoming train, and everything mushed together.

He remembered some of it. Not all of it, but some of it.

It'll be over soon, Meredith had whispered while he'd struggled for breath. I love you.

She'd held his hand, and he'd wanted to say it back, but his lips hadn't cooperated. His throat and tongue hadn't worked. He'd felt woozy and sick and cold, and he'd been there, but he hadn't been there. He'd been floating intermittently outside of his own ravaged body in a stupor.

He hadn't been in control of anything.

Derek backed into the wall with a thud and closed his eyes, shutting out the glare that always triggered upsetting memories. He breathed in. He breathed out. Rhythmically to the count of three.

He needed a replacement thought. Badly.

He needed a—

“Meredith,” Derek said jubilantly as he bounded into the backyard with Samantha bouncing at his heels. “Meredith, you have to see this.”

A half-naked deciduous tree covered sparsely with yellow and orange leaves creaked and swayed in the breeze. Derek looked with chagrin at the leaf-filled lawn. He'd need to get the leaf-blower and the rakes out of the shed, soon, but he lost that thought as his gaze found Meredith. Samantha barked happily, as if she'd sensed the way his mood brightened whenever he looked at his wife.

Meredith lay almost flat on one of the lawn chairs outside. Their day off together was a sunny one, and despite the cool air, she'd gone out to soak up some of the rays. She'd stretched out under a blanket with a book, and he'd left her alone to relax. Except at this point, the book lay face down on the leafy, damp ground, and she was on her side, wiping drool away with the back of her palm.

“What?” she said as she squinted up at him.

“I'm sorry, Mere,” he said, tamping his voice to a more reasonable level. “I didn't mean to wake you. Go back to sleep.”

She wiped her eyes. “It's too late. I'm up. What is it?”

“You're sure?” he said, concerned, as he walked over to her. Samantha plodded behind him.

“I'm sure,” she said as she sat up. She licked her lips and sniffed. Her hair stuck up in all directions, and her cheek had a dent from the chair carved into it.

He leaned down, kissed the mark on her skin, and helped her stand. Her rumpled shirt fell back into place, framing the gentle swell of her lower body. Once she'd started showing, she'd really started showing. At fifteen weeks, she looked a bit like she'd found her bowling ball, albeit a tiny one, perhaps the kind for duckpins. He gave her shoulder a gentle squeeze.

“I think you'll like this, at least,” he said apologetically. “It might be worth the napus interruptus.”

She snorted as she rubbed her eyes again. “Napus interruptus?”

He grinned, and she rolled her eyes. Your sense of humor is unbelievably cheesy, he could hear her saying, though she didn't speak. The three of them walked inside, where she looked at him expectantly. “Well?”

He nodded. “I taught Samantha a new trick.”

“Is that what you've been doing all day?”

He nodded again. “It kept me out of your hair, didn't it?”

“Until the napus interruptus,” she replied wryly.

He grinned. “This one's for you. I taught it to her specifically with you in mind.”

Meredith raised her eyebrows. “What is it?”

He looked down at their dog, who peered at him expectantly with her mocha-colored eyes. He'd been working with her for hours today, and a little bit each day earlier that week, and it'd given him a real thrill the first time she'd done the trick perfectly. He'd had her do it three more times, just to be sure she understood the command, and she'd done it right every time.

“Ready to show Mom what you learned?” Derek said.

Samantha glanced at Meredith and then back at Derek. Her little docked tail wagged as though she were excited.

“Samantha, lights!” he said.

Samantha yapped at him and bounded for the kitchen light switch. Her claws scrabbled across the floor. She rose up on her hind legs and nudged the switch with her black nose. The overhead light in the kitchen turned on. Samantha dropped to all fours and returned to them, tongue lolling happily out of her mouth.

“Good girl!” Derek said, and he gave her a hearty scratch. “Very good girl.”

Meredith snorted. “You taught our dog to turn on the lights?”

Samantha perked up at the sound and ran back to the switch.

“And off,” Derek said helpfully as the lights winked out and Samantha returned triumphantly to them. “For when you're tired and don't want to get up.”

Meredith didn't respond for a moment except to touch her belly. He stepped behind her and placed his palms over top of hers, and they rested together, breathing softly. His heart was pounding. He loved his wife. And he loved his dog. And he'd had a lot of fun today.

He was happy.

“Training your dog is a very healthy way to exercise control,” Dr. Wyatt had said in session earlier. “Try to do a little every day, and see if you feel even better next week.”

And so he had. And so he did.

He kissed Meredith's left temple and her ear and her neck. “So, what do you think?” he said.

Meredith chuckled. “I'm think I'm going to have to start calling the balls of illumination a codename if I don't want them to flick off.”

He grinned. “Balls?”

“Your mind is a dirty, dirty sieve,” she replied. “I said balls of illumination.”

“You like the dirty, dirty sieve,” he said.

She snorted. “And the balls. I like those, too.”

He snickered. “I probably should have picked a less ubiquitous word for the balls—”

“—Of illumination,” Meredith interjected.

He nodded. “I could try and retrain her. Maybe, lumières?”

Meredith nodded, though her eyes sparkled as she turned to face him. “Probably a good idea, Monsieur,” she said with a little smile that melted him. She leaned into him. Turned and wrapped her arms around his waist. “Still, though.” She leaned onto her tiptoes. Kissed him. “Turning on the flip-jibbits is pretty useful.”

He snickered. “Flip-jibbits? That's the first codename that comes to mind?”

She nodded. “Flip-jibbits.” She kissed him again. “Where did you learn French so fluently, anyway? I've forgotten all my high school Spanish.”

He nuzzled her. “Rain check. I have something else I'd like to turn on, first.”

“Oh, do you?” she replied.

“Yes,” he said. “Oh, yes, I do.”
“What are you doing in here?” Meredith said, pulling him abruptly to the present.

He jerked away from her, too surprised by the sudden intrusion to tamp his reaction. A panicky syllable that wasn't a word popped loose from his mouth, and his heart thudded in his ears like cymbals clashing. His limbs shook when the adrenaline hit. His elbow hit the wall when he took another nonsensical step.

“Sorry, sorry!” she said somewhere in the rush. “I thought you saw me.”

In a few seconds, his rational thought caught up, and the overwhelming crush of his flight response receded. He resisted the urge to pull his fingers through his hair to calm down. Not only was the cap there, he'd scrubbed in. Though there was no patient to worry about, this was practice, and he wanted to stay as sterile as possible. Instead of fidgeting with his hair, he started counting, breathing rhythmically like he'd taught himself.

All of ten seconds had passed by the time he was mostly back to normal, albeit sweeter, with an achy funny bone, and still breathing to the count of three. Meredith stood beside him, fingers splayed, her body well away from him in what he'd begun to call her I'm-not-a-threat pose.

In a minute, he was fine, and he stopped making himself count. He got his first good look at her. She wore her scrubs, and she'd followed his lead with a cap, mask, and gloves. He'd been so engrossed in his daydream he'd never heard her washing up in the tiny scrub room behind him. Never heard the door open. Never saw her walk into his field of view.

“All of ten seconds had passed by the time he was mostly back to normal, albeit sweeter, with an achy funny bone, and still breathing to the count of three. Meredith stood beside him, fingers splayed, her body well away from him in what he'd begun to call her I'm-not-a-threat pose.

“Good?” she said.

With the mask covering her face, all he could read were her eyes. She didn't seem concerned with what had been a minor startle, which helped. It was just a thing they'd both gotten used to—that, sometimes, things surprised him, and that, sometimes, his reaction was disproportionate.

“I'm fine, now,” he replied honestly, and her eyes softened.

She didn't ask for an explanation.

He didn't feel the need to give one. Not with her.

He cleared his throat as she dropped her hands and stepped closer. He would have wrapped his arms around her if he hadn't been trying so hard to stay sterile.

“I saw you in here from the hallway,” Meredith said. Her gaze crackled with excitement. Hope. “Are you thinking of cutting again?”

He glanced at the operating table. At the shiny tray of scalpels and clips. One of the neurosurgical dummies lay on the table, its body covered with the appropriate drapes, its head propped in the direction Derek would stand in a real surgery. Darlene had even set out the neurosurgical drill for him, along with a bunch of other specialized tools he used in various procedures.

“No,” he said softly.

Meredith didn't deflate with disappointment. She nodded. Inched closer. Her expression remained interested. Alert.

“I have a deal with one of the scrub nurses,” he added.

“To do what?”
He shrugged. “To let me be in here. She'll re-sterilize all the instruments and the equipment after I leave.”

“She must like you,” Meredith said, her tone playful.

He looked at her. “Well, you like me, don't you?”

The skin around her eyes crinkled. “Very much,” she said.

“Clearly, I'm likeable, then,” he said, smiling back at her.

He gave her a wink, and then he took a step off the wall, deeper into the room. It'll be over soon, he heard her say, a panicky, upset wisp of words in the back of his mind's eye, and he felt the ghost of her hand squeezing his clammy palm. I love you. He stopped. Clenched his right fist. Closed his eyes.

He’d gotten used to being around comrades in the surgical wing again. Almost felt at home. But here? This was the first time he'd stepped his full body into an OR since he'd been shot, and he felt like a splinter in stuck a wound, not a person coming home.

“I'm just trying to get used to this room again,” he said. “I'm... I'm not ready to cut. I'm just not.”

How could he ever hope to cut into somebody else when he couldn't get past his own body, lying near-death on the table? Not to mention when Meredith had surprised him, and he'd jumped a mile. Something like that would kill a patient under his knife.

“That's okay,” she said.

“Cristina doesn't seem to think so.”

“Well, Cristina isn't sick,” Meredith said. “And Cristina is Cristina.” She gave him a long look. “Do you want to cut again?”

“No,” he said.

“Do you think you'll ever want to cut again?” she said, the words softer.

That was such a high, Meredith had said years ago. I don't know why anybody does drugs.

He'd nodded. Yeah, he'd said.

They'd shared a long look, and he'd felt... complete.

“I miss what it felt like when I loved it,” he said. He looked at Meredith. “Except all I can think about right now is how I felt on the table when I had a bullet in my chest, and...” His voice fell away.

If he could get past that memory, maybe that feeling would come back. That feeling that he'd helped somebody live his or her life instead of end it. That completion. That razor moment of clarity where he was high on life, and he didn't want things like Percocet.

His eyes watered with an unexpected swell of emotion, and his throat felt suddenly thick.

“I was in the room while you were helpless,” whispered Gary Clark.

Derek's stomach lurched.
“Your heart stopped after I left,” Mr. Clark said.

The lights brightened and blurred. Derek took a slow breath. Counted to three. Let it out.

“I can't be a functional chief if I don't get used to this,” he said, clearing his throat. “The Chief of Surgery needs to be able to walk into an OR without feeling woozy.”

“You want to go back to being Chief?”

“I can't keep bumbling around the hospital like an intern forever, Mere, or the board will give up and fire me,” he said. “I need to do something more meaningful with my day than charting and fixing stubbed toes in the clinic.”

“But do you want to be Chief again?” Meredith said.

“I hate being Chief, but... I think... it's something that I need,” he said slowly.

She regarded him for a moment. “Why do you think you need it?”

“Because the hospital is a mess right now, and I got shot, and I don't want the time I was Chief to be the time I got shot and left the hospital in ruins. I want my time as Chief to have meant something. I think I need that. I need to end it on my own terms, not on Gary Clark's.”

“And you're sure you're ready for that again?” she said.

He shook his head. “No, but I can't just not try things anymore because they might break me.”

“But you can be realistic,” she said, “and doing a job you hate is really stressful.”

“I'm being realistic,” he said. He took another slow breath. Counted to three. Let it out. “And this isn't just so I can be Chief. This is so I can do a consult in here without feeling like I'm going to faint.” His hand wandered to his chest on reflex before he could stop himself. So much for sterility, but thoughts of following the rules fell away like wilting leaves as he ran his fingers along his torso. Even through his scrubs, he could feel the raised, pink scar wending down his chest. He could feel the pockmark where the bullet had pierced his skin. “And so I can get the fucking surgery to fix—”

“You don't need to fix it for me,” she said, interrupting him.

He turned to her. Swallowed around the lump in his throat. “I know that, but I need to fix it for me. I—”

He didn't have a chance to finish before she'd dropped all pretense of scrubbing in and wrapped her arms around him. He took a shallow breath that was cut with grief as she rubbed his back. He'd been doing okay, but this room brought everything back to him. Every hardship. Every ache. Every fear.

This room was the last bastion of Gary Clark's ghost.

She rose to her tiptoes and pressed her masked face against his.

Like a kiss, but not.

He listened to her breathing.

Closed his eyes.
She sank back to her feet and stood with him. Simply there. Supporting.

“I hate what he did to me,” he said, the words thick and low around the lump in his throat. His fingers clenched, and his teeth clenched, and every muscle in his body tensed. “I can't even look at myself in the mirror. I want it gone. I don't want him in our bedroom anymore, and he's always there because of...”

“I know,” she said, soft and soothing.

He shook his head. “It's so ugly, and I just can't...”

“I know.”

“I want it gone so badly, but the idea of... letting them sedate me.” He shuddered as the pent up roots of his reservations came tumbling out. He'd been stalling coming back here for so many reasons, but that was the biggest one. The lingering one. The very idea of being on that table again terrified him. “Being in here with all the lights, and everybody staring at what Mr. Clark did to me, and I'll just be...”

Helpless.

“I know,” she said, and her grip around his torso tightened.

He pressed his masked nose against the side of her head, against her hair, which she wore in a bun underneath her cap. He gave up on sterile, and he returned her embrace, because right then, in that moment, he needed it like he needed air.

His hands were shaking, and his face felt hot, and the little sardine can examination room felt smaller than it had before. He hated taking off his shirt. He'd felt like a fucking museum exhibit, but Mark had refused to do the exam, refused to even be in the room, citing conflict of interest, which Derek understood. He just didn't like it.

“So, what... what do you think?” Derek said after he'd pulled his shirt back on.

Dr. Clemens, one of Mark's attendings, a beak-nosed, younger man, smiled warmly. “I think Dr. Sloan was correct,” he said. “It should be simple enough to fix. You'd be put under conscious sedation, and the procedure would be outpatient.”

Derek shifted. The paper on the table crinkled. The metal exam table was cold, even through that, and even through his jeans. Or, maybe, his nerves were running away with him. “I wouldn't need narcotics afterward, right?” Derek said, looking at his lap.

“No,” Dr. Clemens said. “Like Dr. Sloan said. A prescription strength NSAID should take care of any discomfort afterward. The only narcotics involved would be the ones used initially to sedate you, and you'd be carefully monitored for that.”

Derek nodded. Swallowed. Looked up. “Can you do it all at once?”

Dr. Clemens frowned. “Pardon?”

“The scar from the heart surgery. Can you do that at the same time?”

Dr. Clemens's frown deepened.

“I know Mark recommended waiting a year,” Derek said. “I'm aware that I'd be going against
Dr. Clemens shifted as he clipped his pen to the lip of his pocket and put Derek's chart on the small counter by the sink. He leaned back against the counter and crossed his arms. “Can you tell me why you want to get it done prematurely?”

Derek opened his mouth. Closed it. “It's... per—” He licked his lips. “Personal.” A lump thickened in his throat. He looked at Dr. Clemens. Met his eyes. Saw the you'll-need-to-do-better-than-that expression. Knew in that moment that if he didn't offer up a better explanation, Dr. Clemens wasn't going to help. “A man shot me,” Derek said. “Every time I look in a mirror. Every time I make love to my wife. Every time I have to take my shirt off for a stranger. Even if it's usually just an eye blink before I can push it away, that man shoots me again, and I can't...” He slid off the examination table to his feet and gripped the edges of the table with white knuckles. He took a breath. “I'm a surgeon. I know what this scar is going to look like in a year, and that's not enough for me.”

Dr. Clemens stared at him.

“I know it's not recommended, but from my understanding, it's not bad, is it?” Derek said.

Dr. Clemens shook his head. “It's more invasive than is necessary if you let time heal it instead. But, no, it's not any more dangerous than if you got the same surgery in a year.” Doubt dissolved from Dr. Clemens's hazel gaze. “In fact... I could argue that it's safer and more expedient to do it all at once if you know you're still going to want the surgery no matter how much it heals in the next few months.”

Derek closed his eyes. “Please,” he said. “Please, do this for me, then. I want it all gone.”

He listened to the wall clock tick noisily in the intervening silence.

“When would you like to schedule it?” Dr. Clemens said at last.

“I've created a real catch-22 for myself, haven't I?” Derek said ruefully.

Meredith pulled back from him. Gave him an equally rueful look. “Wanting a surgery to feel better that you can't stomach receiving because you don't feel better?”

He nodded.

“You trust me?” she said.

Like that was even a question. “Yes,” he said, anyway.

“Well, I'll sit with you,” she said. “The whole time. Just like you did with me for the liver transplant. And I make a pretty mean guard dog, you know.”

He laughed despite himself. “I bet you're very tenacious in that capacity.”

“So, you don't have anything to worry about,” she said. She cocked her eyebrows at him. “Do you?”

He wiped his wet eyes with his gloved fingers. More of the not sterile, but sterile had already gone out the window. He didn't understand how she did it. Time and time again. Pulled him up from drowning. Made him feel normal.
“You just want to hear what I say while I'm sedated,” he teased.

Her mask shifted as she crinkled her nose. “Purely a side benefit or whatever.”

“Oh, purely,” he said, nodding, and then he pressed his mask against her forehead. “I love you, you know.”

“I know,” she said. “I love you, too. Nice cap, by the way.”

“I figured my first trip back to the OR in five months deserved the ferryboat cap,” he said. He gave a wry glance to the operating table. “Even if my patient is fake.”

She nodded, and even without her lips showing, he could tell she was giving him a brilliant smile. “Definitely,” she said. Then her look shifted into something more serious. “Derek...” she began hesitantly.

“Mmm?”

Her hand wandered up and down his spine. “Why don't you wait and see how Thanksgiving goes with your family next week before you make a decision about being Chief, or cutting, or getting the scar correction done, or any of this?”

“I'm miles from making plans right now,” he said. “Desensitizing myself to all of this will probably take me a while.”

“Can I help?”

He sighed. “If you have a suggestion, I'd love to hear it.”

She shifted away from him, regarding him for a long moment. “Well,” she began, and her eyes tipped up to the ceiling while she thought. When her gaze shifted down once more, she said, “You could walk me through a craniotomy.”

He frowned. “You know how to do a craniotomy in your sleep.”

She shrugged. “So?”

He stepped toward the operating table, finally bringing himself into the center of the room. He moved to the dummy's head. All of the scalpels on the tray gleamed in the bright lights. He looked at the tray skeptically. He was rusty as hell, but surely he could help her unless Dr. Weller would be using a technique that had been developed in the last year or so.

“A or B,” he said as he stared into the microscope. “Dr. Grey, A or B?”

“You got it all out?” Lexie said, amazement in her tone.

“Except for the blind cut,” he said, staring at the offending vessels. He simply couldn't tell which one fed the tumor, and Isaac's spine had been open to the air for over twenty-four hours now. Recovery would be a long journey, even if Derek managed not to paralyze this man. He resisted the urge to shake himself as tension set in so deep he hurt to the bone marrow. “Just have to pick one, and then we're good to go. A or B?”

“You're kidding,” Lexie said.

“You're stalling,” Derek countered. “Dr. Avery?”
“I don’t... like to gamble,” Avery said.

“Dr. Sloan?” Derek said.

“Oh, so you can blame it on me for the rest of your life?” Mark replied. “This is all you.”

“Are you playing eenie meanie minie mo?” Lexie said incredulously.

He laughed nervously. “Yeah.”

Lexie shook her head. “No.”

“Yeah. It’s a bad idea?” He glanced at Lexie. She looked about an inch from panicking, which didn’t make him feel any better. He glanced back at into his microscope. “Okay,” he murmured. “Okay.”

He closed his eyes for a moment. Let himself think. Let himself bask in the quiet of his own head. There was no Lexie. No Mark. No Dr. Avery. Nothing but his own ideas, floating.

One choice would save the man’s life and let him walk. The other choice would still save his life. Derek had taken Isaac that far, at least. To a life, no matter what. Derek had given this man a chance for a tomorrow and another day and a day after that. Done what no other surgeon was willing to do. Done what very few other surgeons could do.

In light of that?

Picking one or the other didn't seem so stressful or difficult.

His gut said pick the left one.

He pressed the scalpel into the left vein.

And he chose.

“Do you have any surgeries coming up with Dr. Weller that you’d like to go over, instead?” Derek said.

“Um.” Meredith thought for a moment as she approached the table. Her arm brushed his. “There's one later this week. A malignant gliobastoma.”

“Tell me about it,” he said as he picked up a ten-blade from the tray, ready to teach.
Chapter 28

“There’s a cat in your lobby!” Meredith blurted as a bundle of fur head-butted her leg like a sumo wrestler.

The woman at the front desk of the Algonquin, a blonde, leggy thing, nametag Vanessa, flashed her perfect teeth at them. “Her name is Matilda,” she said before looking back at her computer. The clackity-clack-clack of her long, manicured nails accentuated her words. “She lives here.”

“Huh,” Meredith said as she bent down to flick a gob of cream-colored hair from her pant leg and give Matilda a scratch behind the ears. “A hotel with a cat.”

“You and your husband will be staying with us for three nights, Dr. Grey?” the woman said.

“Yeah,” Meredith said. “Leaving Saturday morning.”

“One key or two?” said the woman.

Meredith glanced at Derek. “Two,” she said. She stood, and Matilda plodded out of sight.

Derek leaned against the front desk, putting what appeared to be most of his weight on his elbows. His face was buried in his palms.

He’d been jittery at the airport in Seattle, but fine. Still chatty. Still happy. Still excited to be going back to New York for the first time since he'd left it. The noise of the plane taking off had shaken the moorings of chatty and happy and excited for a few minutes, but he'd been fine when they’d reached cruising altitude. Chatty and happy had come back to roost, and he'd entertained her thoroughly for the first hour or two of their flight. He'd joked and teased and snarked and been, well, Derek-y. As the hours had dragged on, chatty had died a gradual death, but he'd diligently held onto happy until they'd landed, more than six hours after they'd taken off. Somewhere in crowded, frenetic JFK, though, happy had joined chatty and excited in a graveyard somewhere, and he hadn't said much, if anything, since then.

With his face buried, she wasn't sure if he was aware of her. “It’s me,” she whispered, just loud enough for him to hear, and she placed her hand on his back. He didn't seem tense, and his black trench coat was warm and soft. She gave him a slow, reassuring stroke.

He moved, but not in surprise, judging by how languid the motion was. His stubble rasped against his palms as he raised his head. He peeked over his fingertips at her. His face was pale, and his eyes looked slightly glassy.

“You okay?” she said.

The skin around his eyes crinkled. Even with his mouth concealed, even with chatty and happy and excited all buried alive in a graveyard somewhere, his smiles were brilliant. “I’m just tired,” he said in a low, throaty voice.

Exhausted was more like it, from the look and sound of him. She couldn't blame him, though. Traveling was tiresome business. Maybe, he hadn't been chatty or grinning the whole trip, but if she hadn't just lived through months of Derek-with-PTSD, his behavior wouldn't have said much more to her than what he'd said just now. Tired.

“How are you?” he said as he stood straight and stretched his long frame from toe tip to splayed fingers.

She frowned. She felt tired, too. Achy everywhere. More than a little bit worried about how this whole visiting Derek's army-sized family thing would go, both from the perspective of how Derek would deal with it, and the perspective of how she would deal with it. And she had to pee. Again. Even though she'd peed at the airport. She settled on saying, “My ass is sore.”

In a lithe move that made it look like some sort of dance step, he sank out of his stretch onto the flats of his feet and wrapped his arms around her waist. His hands were warm, and his grip lowered, lower and lower still. She made a soft squeak as he pulled her to him and gave her a squeeze with his toasty palms.

“Derek!” she said, scolding but not really scolding. “Public place!”

“Is it less sore, now?” he said.

She pushed him away. He skipped back a step, thudding into the high lip of the check-in desk. The woman at the desk, still typing, seemed to be biting her lip to keep from giggling as her whole face turned two shades darker than her blush.

“Maybe, we should get you a heating pad,” Derek said.

Meredith rolled her eyes.

“No?” he said.

“Shut up,” she replied, her lips threatening to twitch into a smile.

He snorted, and he resettled against the desk as the playful sparks that had ignited died quickly to embers. His shoulders slumped, and he put his face against his palms once more. “Yes, dear,” he may have mumbled tiredly into his hands, but she couldn't quite hear. He really did seem to be running on fumes.

“All set,” said the woman at the desk. She pushed two key cards across the desk to them and grinned. “Checkout is at eleven. We hope you have a pleasant stay.”

Derek lumbered back into motion and grabbed their two roller board suitcases while Meredith took the key cards and hotel information packet, and they trundled together to the small elevator at the end of the hallway. They rode up to the seventh floor and shuffled to their room. She slid the key card into the lock while Derek leaned against the wall beside her. The light on the lock stayed red, and the lock beeped. Frowning, she flipped the key around and tried again. And again.

“I think they messed up the keys,” she said, muttering more at the key than at him. “It's a key,” she said, muttering more at the key than at him. “It's not brain surgery.”

She tried again, and the lock glared at her. Glared!
He opened his eyes and pushed away from the wall. “Maybe,” he said, taking the key gently from her hand, “you just need some artistic flair.”

Her eyebrows rose, and she snorted. “Artistic flair?” she said.

He smirked. It comes faster when I push it, Meredith thought wildly, because his face? Exactly like that.

He stuck the card in the lock. The light stayed red, and the lock beeped obstreperously. He frowned.

“You know; you're right,” Meredith said. “Flair is the answer.”

He sighed. Tried again. Got another beep for his trouble. Which was when his joking demeanor cracked around the edges. His forehead thumped on the door, and he sighed a deep, tired sigh that told her just how hard he was working to stay sentient right now. How hard he was working to stay his snarky, Derek-y self. His Adam's apple wobbled in his throat as he swallowed. He pinched the bridge of his nose with his fingers.

“Oh, other key?” he said tiredly, all hints of mirth gone from his tone.

She pulled it out of her pants pocket. The key worked on the first try, and they stumbled into their shoebox-sized room. A queen-sized bed, a television, a tiny desk, and a beige-colored sofa that looked more like it was for bragging rights that a sofa could actually fit in the room, rather than for the comfort of having something to sit in, stared back at her.

“This is cute,” she said as she closed the door behind them and Derek put their suitcases on the sofa, since there wasn't much room for them on the floor. “It's basically a bed.” “And walls,” Derek said. And then he collapsed onto the bed onto his back like a falling tree. He heaved a heavy sigh that moved his whole frame. His palms rose to his face, and he scrubbed at his skin with his hands. “God, that was exhausting. I feel like...” Words failed him. He swallowed and rolled onto his stomach. “Exhausted.”

And he lay there. Not even bothering to take off his coat or his shoes or pull out the covers or anything. His feet dangled off the bed, and his head hadn't even found a pillow.

She shrugged off her white toggle coat and hung it in the closet, used the bathroom quickly because her bladder was screaming at her, and then she crawled onto the bed with him. Her body fit lengthwise with his. Though he was on his stomach, she lay on her side. Her belly had gotten a little too big for stomach sleeping to be comfortable anymore.

She rubbed his shoulder. Ran a hand down his side. “You did really great, Derek,” she said, the words soft.

“Mmm,” he said. He didn't open his eyes. “M'sorry you're sore.” His coat rustled. He moved his arm, gently squeezed her hip, and then his warm hand moved to her butt.

She snickered.

“Better?” he murmured.

“Well, it's not in public, at least,” she said.

He twitched. Almost like he might have meant to laugh, but was too worn out for it. “What time is it?” he asked, which made her want to roll her eyes, because he had a watch. It was on his wrist, carving a dent into her hip, but he seemed unwilling to lift his arm or open his eyes to check it.

Blearily, she raised his hand to glance at the watch face. It was about 5:00 PM. They'd left on an early flight out of Seattle, and their plane had landed by 3:00, even though they'd lost three hours to time zone hopping. It'd taken them two hours to get off the plane, fight their way to the baggage claim for their luggage, get through the taxi line, and ride to the hotel. Derek's mother was expecting them around 6:30 for dinner. They had a few minutes. Not many, but a few.

“It's 5:00,” she said as she let his hand flop back to her hip.

“Oh,” he said.

She closed her eyes, simply enjoying the warm feel of him next to her. Distantly, she could hear car horns. The sounds of the living, breathing city below and around the hotel. The foggy feeling in her head lessened when she wasn't forcing herself to pay attention.

“I don't think I can deal with any more people today,” he said quietly.

“You don't want to go to your Mom's?” she said.

A long pause followed. He swallowed and shook his head. “I can't. It's just... too much.”

Tension she hadn't realized she'd been carrying uncoiled, and her muscles got a loose-spaghetti feeling that made her shaky with relief. She shifted closer to him. The bed squeaked.

“Oh, thank god,” she whispered.

She wasn't ready for an army of Shepherds. Wasn't ready to do the family thing. Not yet. Not after six plus harrowing hours of traveling with her ass stuck in a seat that was nailed to a giant, airborne tin can. Once his sisters had pulled her into a circulation-constricting, bone-crushing group hug toward the end of Derek's first hospital stay, she'd convinced herself that his family wasn't likely to disown her, but then they'd tried to convince Derek he was insane for marrying her right now, and the mixed messages from the greater Shepherd mass were a bit hard to deal with. His mother was the only one of the bunch she'd gotten remotely comfortable with, and now she would have to meet more of them. Brothers-in-law. Nieces, nephews. Hell, she was an aunt to fourteen little child-creatures she had yet to meet. And then there was still Derek to worry about, who had done so great it made her heart squeeze to think about how far he'd come in the last few months, but she knew he was worried about what his sisters would think of him—this new, quieter, jumpier Derek who needed to take “people breaks” because he lost his capacity for interaction after too much of it at once.

Derek's eyes opened to slits, and he peered at her through his eyelashes. “Thank god?”

She nodded. “I would have gone if you wanted to go, but... I'm tired, too. That was a long freaking flight.”

“It was a long freaking flight,” he echoed with a nod. He inched closer. Kissed her. “And I know you're only doing this for me.”

“Your family scares the crap out of me,” she admitted.

He brushed his fingers through her hair. “I know it does. Thank you for being here.” His voice cracked. “It means a lot to me.”

She scooted closer still. Breathed in the soft scent of his coat. She was glad for this intimacy. For the fact that, even when he felt like he was done with the world for a while, he still thrived with her there. As much as she seemed to balance him through all the crap life liked to throw at them, she knew he balanced her. She tipped up her head and kissed his throat despite the five-o-clock rasp of stubble that had gathered as a shadow on his skin.

“We should call your mom to let her know we can't make it today.”

His body shivered against her, and he closed his eyes once more. He took a deep, quivery breath. “I know,” he said, but he didn't move.

She bit her lip. He'd said he was done with people for a while. Maybe he was more done than she'd thought. “Do you want me to do it?” she said.

“No,” he said tiredly. “I can do it. I just hate...” His face reddened. He shifted to fish in his pocket for his cell phone. He moved like his muscles were made of taffy.

“Hate what?” she prodded.

“Hate that I'm still not better,” he said. “I wanted to be better for this trip.”

She blinked. “Derek, you just dealt with two crowded airports, a noisy plane, and general chaos for over six hours. That's not better. That's amazing. It sucks that you can't see your family today, but I didn't marry Superman. I married Derek Shepherd, mild-mannered surgeon. Remember?”

“Yeah.” He wiped his face with his hands. “I know I'm doing it again. Judging myself. It's hard to stop, sometimes.”

She kissed him. “I know.”

He winked, tired though he was. “You keep me in line,” he said, and she grinned at him.

“I do,” she said.

And then he beamed at her. “I did ride a noisy plane today, didn't I?”

She nodded. “You did.”

“Thanks,” he said.

She smiled back at him. “You're welcome.”

He didn't even look at the keypad when he pulled his phone to his ear. “Call Mom,” he told it, not even bothering to dial, and it did the work for him. She listened while he told his mother he wasn't feeling up to socializing that night. His mother seemed graciously accepting of the situation and didn't give him a hard time about it. From what Meredith could hear through the phone's little speaker, the older woman took great pains to avoid expressing disappointment, just excitement for Thanksgiving the following day.

That done, Derek hung up the phone and dropped it beside his ear, not even bothering to put it back in his pocket. He still hadn't taken off his coat or his shoes, pulled his body fully onto the bed, or found a pillow. He didn't seem to want to move at all. He closed his eyes, and his breaths thickened into long, deep rasps in the short space of a few moments.

She ran her fingers through his hair. She hated that he was so tired—it spoke volumes about his overall mental fitness. At the same time, though, it was one of the most promising moments she'd ever witnessed in his recovery, because in more than six stressful, noisy hours of public interaction, his temper hadn't snapped once, he hadn't had any panic attacks or startled badly, and he'd acted like himself. The whole. Freaking. Time. And that? Well, that was amazing.

With a pleased grin, she kicked off her shoes and curled up next to him. He had the right idea. Six hours in a plane was enough to try anybody's patience. A nap sounded like an idyllic idea to counteract the cloudy feeling in her head.

Her eyes slipped shut. She listened to the pleasant sound of him breathing next to her, slow and rhythmic and alive, and she let those quiet gusts of air carry her to her own dreams moments later.

“I bought tickets to Phantom of the Opera,” Meredith said as she plopped onto their bed with a pad and pen. She'd spent an hour at the computer downstairs. “For when we're in New York.” The mattress shook as she settled on top of the bedspread next to Derek, who was reading by dim lamplight.

“Oh?” Derek said. “What spurred that?”

He looked up from his book, which was some fat, leather bound, old thing that looked like it might be another depressing Hemingway title. She just didn't get it, not the fact that he read them, or what might appeal to him about them. Not The Sun Also Rises, not For Whom the Bell Tolls, not A Farewell to Arms, not any of them, literary classics or not. But, then, she imagined her own bookshelf in her mind's eye, and thought he might live life similarly perplexed about her own questionable literary choices.

“Everybody says we need to see a Broadway show,” she said.

“Who is everybody?” he said.

Everybody she’d said more than five words to at work that day. “Chief and Lexie and Ms. Patterson.”

Derek frowned. “Ms. Patterson is a paranoid schizophrenic.”

“Well, her delusions like Broadway, apparently.” Meredith kicked off her shoes, and they landed on the floor by the bed with loud thumps. The room glowed softly by the light of Derek's lamp. He wore a black t-shirt, blue cotton pajama pants, and fluffy white socks.

“You didn't ask Cristina?” he said.

She shrugged. “She told me to visit Columbia and Mount Sinai.”

“Why didn't you ask me?” he said.

She glanced at him. He didn't sound hurt. Just curious.

It was Saturday. She’d worked. He hadn't. He got weekends off because of his reduced schedule. That was sort of a double-edged sword, though. He needed those weekends, but he got frustrated by how little he worked. The surgical kiddie pool, he’d called his hours once when he’d lost his temper, which was funny to her, because with her pregnancy, with the aches, and the nausea, and the exhaustion, and the constant need to pee, sometimes, she would have given anything to be in a freaking kiddie pool.

Regardless, she hadn't asked him because she hadn't seen him that day. The pit had been dead.
No surgeries that she could get into had been on the boards. She’d had nothing to do, and so she’d decided to start hashing out more of the details of their trip. All she’d done until then was arrange for time off, book plane tickets, and reserve a rental car, but there was still so much more to worry about. Obviously, Thursday was already taken care of, but she’d managed to wrangle a Friday out of the Chief, too, in addition to the two days they needed for traveling.

“Well, do you not like Broadway?” she said.

“I do like Broadway.”

She scooted across the bed and curled up next to him. He wrapped his left arm over her body and held her. He smelled distantly of aftershave, and she found the familiar scent comforting. “I didn't want to stress you out with planning,” she said.

He grinned and paused to kiss her before answering. “Planning fun stuff to do with my wife isn't that stressful.”

“So, what should we do when we're in New York?”

He thought for a moment, looking up at the ceiling. “I think ferryboats trump Broadway.” He looked back at her and winked. “More ferryboats, I say.”

“We could do both,” she said.

He nodded. “True.”

She marked ferryboats on her notepad. Circled it. Underlined it for emphasis. They both liked ferryboats. She'd look up more about that later. “So, if you were going to pick a show on Broadway, which show would you pick?” she said.

He put his book on the nightstand beside the bed. “Probably Phantom, since you already bought tickets.”

She sighed. “It had the neatest poster. Okay? I have no idea.” She was trying, damn it.

“It's a romance,” he cautioned.

“So?” she said. “You're fluent in romantic. You can translate if I get lost.”

He laughed and glanced at her notepad. “So, what's next on your list?”

Meredith sighed. She’d spent almost the entire hour she'd been downstairs reading Yelp reviews of various hotels. There were literally hundreds, maybe even thousands in the five boroughs. New York was freaking huge. His mother lived in Brooklyn, and she had the address, but that hadn't been much help narrowing things down. For one, the east coast was so tightly packed it was hard to judge how long it would take to get somewhere simply by looking at the distance between two points. By west coast standards, even twenty miles was close.

“I'm not sure what hotel to pick,” she said.

“Well, you'd probably want something close to Broadway, or something close to my mother. Probably close to Broadway would be better if you want to play tourist for a day or two.”

Crap. She hadn’t even considered that. “What's close to Broadway?”

“I like the Algonquin,” he said. “I've stayed there a few times. That's what I usually recommend “What do you like about it?”

“Well,” he said, and then he paused, thinking. “The atmosphere,” he decided. He looked at her. “It's very historic.” He squeezed her shoulder. “And they were good to me my last stay when I needed it.”

Her eyebrows rose as she looked up at him. “Your last stay?”

“Addison,” he said, just a little reluctantly. A dark shadow crossed his gaze but quickly left him. “I needed somewhere to stay when I left her, and I couldn't exactly crash at Mark's.”

She rubbed his chest. “You've never really talked to me about that.”

“Truthfully, it's a blur,” he said. “I drank a lot.”

She met his eyes. Understood the retrospective admission he hadn't spoken baldly, but had spoken all the same. He'd been dealing with his problems the same way for years. Been heading toward the precipice he'd found himself careening over only months ago when bad circumstances had stacked up in a perfect storm. She lay her ear against his chest and sighed, listening to his breathing. His heartbeat. They were such soothing sounds.

“I've been there, too,” she admitted. “It's a tempting way to try to fix things.” One she was glad she'd mostly grown out of.

He kissed the top of her head. “I do remember the $10,000 martini,” he said.

She looked up. “The what?”

“The Algonquin has a $10,000 martini called the Engagement Special,” he explained. “It comes with a pre-selected, custom cut diamond at the bottom of the glass. Somebody proposed while I was at the bar getting hammered.”

She blinked. “Ten thousand dollars. For a martini?” she said.

“The woman said yes,” he said. “It was gut-wrenching for me to watch after Addison.”

“I'm sorry,” she said.

“Don't be,” he replied. “I think it was worth it, since it all ended up getting me here, and I met you.” He smiled. “I wonder if they're still happy. I hope they are.”

She ran her hand up and down his arm. “We're happy,” she said.

“Yes,” he said. His gaze softened as he looked at her. “And in retrospect, I get it.”

“Get what?” she said.

“Spending that much on a martini.” He kissed her. “Especially as a special gift for a tequila girl I love.”

She looked up at him. “Derek?”

“Mmm?”
“Please, please, don’t you dare ever do that to me. Seriously.”

He laughed. Squeezed her shoulder. Kissed her. “I’ll try to restrain myself,” he said ominously.

She woke to the relaxing sound of the shower and an empty bed where Derek had lain.

She rolled over to squint blearily at the clock beside the bed. The room was dark, lit only by the brilliant strip of gold light at the base of the door to the bathroom. 8:00 PM glowed at her in bright red. She’d been out for almost three hours, which, on top of the time zone change, meant she was going to have a terrible time sleeping that night, and a worse time tomorrow when she was inevitably a grouchy zombie.

Wincing, she sat up. She probably should have read a book instead of closed her eyes. Anything but give in to the siren call of sleep. But the damage was done, and she would have to live with it. At least, now, she felt more refreshed, pure contrast to how she’d woken up that morning for their flight. The cloudy feeling behind her eyes was gone, and she felt ready to, if not embrace the day, what little of it was left, at least give it a reluctant handshake.

She switched on the bedside lamp. Sharp spears of light jabbed her eyes, and she squinted until her pupils adjusted. When she could see, she glanced at the bathroom door. The steady patter of water falling thickened and relaxed as Derek shifted under the spray.

This was the first real moment of peace they’d had since their alarm had gone off in the pitch-black that morning. Honestly, the first real moment of peace they’d had since Sunday, because she'd been running around like a lunatic, freaking out about this trip to meet his—cue the horror music—entire. Freaking. Family. The entire thing. Well, minus Nancy and her brood of fire-breathing, invincible dragons. At least that was eight scary monsters off the already long list of scary.

Meredith had agonized about clothes—did they match? What was fashionable in Manhattan? (Derek had been a clueless, unhelpful lump.) She'd agonized about food—should they bring anything? It was Thanksgiving. Surely, they should at least bring a freaking pie. Not that she could bake a pie. Could Derek bake a pie? Could they carry the baked pie through security? (Derek had finally convinced her not to worry about a pie.) She'd agonized about his family. She didn't want to call Abby Chloe or Cody Chase or something and be the worst aunt ever. (Derek had diligently hounded all of his sisters until he'd received up-to-date family photos in his inbox, which he'd then printed and used to make flashcards for her.) She'd agonized about logistics—had she planned everything well? Would Derek be happy with his one trip back to New York in years? (Derek had sworn he'd be happy with anything she had planned because he got to do it with her, and that he was grateful she'd taken care of the brunt of it for him.) She'd agonized about Derek. Was the plan to tell his family about his drug problem or not? She'd back him up either way, but she wanted a game plan, and— (Derek hadn't been able to answer. At all. Damn it.)

It was nice to be past all of that. Well, some of that. But the hotel room was still an oasis of calm compared to her life in the last few days. She glanced around at the impersonal furniture, absent of any clutter or anything to remind her of home or something lived in. She and Derek had never spent a night in a hotel before. She listened to the shower, and she bit her lip as she imagined him standing there, naked in the non-chaos. Before she knew it, she'd walked to the bathroom door.

She knocked hesitantly, and then she pushed open the door. The bathroom was a tiny room, barely large enough to house the small cast iron tub, sink, and toilet. The air was thick and warm with steam—Derek liked his showers just short of scalding. The shower curtain, made of thick white and black cloth, took away any potential glimpse of Derek's outline, though she could imagine it all the same, from his face to his marvelous shoulders to the scrawny lines of his legs, that, though not that marvelous, she loved all the same.

“Hey,” he said over the roar of the shower, his voice husky. “Did you sleep well?”

“Okay,” she replied. She licked her lips as she leaned against the doorframe. “I feel a little better, now. You?”

“Better, but...” The rush of the shower filled his pause. “I'm just worn out, Mere.”

“I still think you did great,” she said.

“I rode a noisy plane, and I'm okay,” he said, and she could practically hear him beaming.

She nodded, though he couldn't see it. “You really did, Derek. It was kind of rockstar.”

“Only kind of?” he said.

She laughed.

“Doesn't Panic On Planes Or Even In Airports, Now,” he said. “It's a catchy band name.”

“Cheesy,” she countered. “I believe cheesy is the word you want.”

If he chuckled, she didn't hear it in the storm of the shower. She stood, arms folded over her chest, and rubbed her arms with her palms. A warm feeling had grown to bursting inside. Simply from talking. From laughing with him. This was what she'd wanted. This feeling. She put her hand on her belly and rubbed herself in a slow circle around her navel.

She almost laughed when she thought about it. How quickly things changed, that in the space of five years, she could go from strings of blackout-drunk, one-night stands to happily pregnant and ecstatic just to talk and joke with her husband. A man who, by her own admission, she couldn't call her best friend, or her person, though he was both, simply because he was more than that. He was hers, and that meant a lot of big things that didn't fit into words.

“Do you want to come in here?” Derek said, surprising her from her musing.

Maybe, he really could read her mind. Sometimes, she wondered. “Yeah,” she said thickly.

“Not for sex; I'm too tired,” they both said at the same time. They shared a laugh, and that moment was one she would remember for a long time. Life subtly saying, See? Things work out, sometimes, even for you.

Something squeaked, and the rhythm of the water changed. She imagined him adjusting the water temperature to something cooler. Unlike him, she preferred not to look like a lobster after a shower.

She shucked her clothes by the doorway and left them on the floor in a pile with his. Steam curled around her body, dampening her skin. She bit her lip as she glanced down at herself. Her feet were rapidly disappearing behind an expanding wall of baby. She wiggled her toes. At least she could still see those. She put her hand on her stomach.

“You're getting really big,” she told her belly button, barely audible over the water, and then she blushed. She still felt weird, talking to Baby. Derek had caught her a few times, and never once had done more than smile and leave her to her moment. But she still felt...

An absolutely maddening combination of excited and fat all at once. Excited, because she was going to have a baby. With Derek. And Baby was getting big. And fat because, well, Baby was getting big. Which was enough, sometimes, to stuff her normal sexual self-confidence kicking and screaming into the trunk of her mental car and replace it with irritating, stupid doubt that reared its irritating, stupid head at irritating, stupid moments like this one.

She looked back at the shower curtain. They'd had plenty of sex in the last five weeks since she'd started showing, but in a bed, under blankets. She hadn't felt exposed like this.

“Meredith?” he called over the beating water.

She shook her head. This was crazy, and self-conscious, and stupid. And Derek was waiting for not-sex. She wanted not-sex. Wanted him. Badly. This hadn't seemed like a questionable idea until she'd taken off her shirt and pants.

She took a step toward the tub, climbed over the edge, and into the shower with him. He stood under the warm spray, naked, hair lathered with shampoo in a sudsy pile on top of his head. Soap and water ran down his shoulders and sluiced over his chest and abs and lower still. The occasional wayward droplet splattered her, but for the most part, she stayed dry.

“Hey,” he said, and his eyes lit up like Christmas as he peered at her. He did that guy thing, where his gaze started at her face but dipped low and lower still and paused there in testosterone-borne appraisal.

She blushed at his scrutiny, trying not to squirm or make a snarky comment like, “Yep! My breasts are still there. Or, yep! My belly button is reaching out for a handshake, and it's your bully sperm's fault.” Instead, she whispered, uncharacteristically shy, a soft, “Hi,” that barely carried, and she dropped her eyes to the ground to stare at what little she could see of her toes.

She tried to tell herself he'd gotten a good long look and didn't seem fazed. Tried to tell herself seeing the baby turned him on. He'd expressly told her so, and she'd seen the rock hard results of that in a freaking Babies 'R Us of all places.

He even said, “You look really pretty,” in a deep, reverential tone, but that didn't do much to help.

Being pregnant was, apparently, a hormonal cesspit of insecurity that was hard to shake, sometimes. Compliments and smiles and even blatant erections turned into circumstantial evidence with no smoking gun connection to whether she was attractive. The only real proof any of it offered was that her husband was smart enough not to want to upset her.

Except then he wrapped his arms around her, pulled her under the spray, and he kissed her so hard the world fell away for a moment. Water fell down around her face. Doubts fell away. Her vision went spotty. His hard, slick, warm body connected with hers in a long line from knee to groin to lips that jolted her from her thoughts and made her moan. He smelled of soap and rain. Her fingertips slid down bunching cords of muscles in his back as he plied her mouth. She forgot about feeling like a blimp. In that moment, all she knew was that she felt empty. That there was a hole inside her. Not in a bad or lonely cat lady way. The kind of way that drove one to say demanding, begging things like, “Please, please, fuck me, or I'll die,” if one were to have any sense to speak them, but she didn't.

Nothing was left in her brain when he pulled away, panting. Her insides were throbbing and tight. She felt warm and shivering and energized all at once, head to toe.
In that moment, she felt like a goddess.

Worshiped.

Derek Shepherd was very good at creating moments like that.

“It occurred to me,” he said, catching his breath, “That I was too stressed out and tired from my rockstar day to do that earlier.”

Her thoughts were still scattered like shooting stars. She blinked.

“I love you,” he added. And then he pulled her into a more low key embrace. He relaxed against her. Breathed her in. Nuzzled her like he'd done nothing but miss her deeply for that entire day. His body trembled, perhaps with tiredness, perhaps with desire. Either way, it didn't matter anymore.

“I love you, too,” she said, nerves forgotten. She squeezed his sculpted shoulders, leaned on her tiptoes, and gave him a kiss slightly less earth-shattering than the one he'd given her, though no less meaningful. “Thank you. That helped.”

He really could read her mind.

She was convinced at this point.

He grinned at her, and he tilted his head to look at her in that way he sometimes did. Like he didn't understand how he'd managed to keep her despite everything, and he found her amazing. “I'm not sure what you're talking about,” he said, his tone innocent, his face betraying nothing.

She laughed. “Yes, you do, but thank you, anyway. I really needed that.”

He gave her shrug like he still didn't know what she was getting at, though the returning twinkle in his eyes ruined the poker face effect. He reached for the bar of Ivory soap and the plush black washcloth he'd left hanging over the spigot. He lathered the cloth.

“What were you working on?” she said.

“Oh, I'm done.” He grinned. “Pruning, even. But there's still you...” He paused when he caught her staring, wide-eyed. The washcloth dripped. “What?”

She'd been too self-conscious moments ago to notice. And then she'd been kissed senseless.

Now, though?

She hadn't gotten a look at him like this in over a month. The same blankets and in-the-dark sex that had provided her some level of disguise for the blimp wasn't conducive to the full view he blessed her with now. And, boy, was this view a blessing. She swallowed as her lower body tightened, just from staring.

He looked... good. Great. No, gorgeous. No...

Her mind blanked on appropriate adjectives.

Though she knew the scars bothered him, she could hardly see them anymore, even when she searched for them. The pink line wending down his chest was buried in wispy, black and gray hair, and the bullet wound was a small pock that looked more like a birthmark than a remnant skeleton of violence. After he'd finished physical therapy, he'd started doing cardio with Samantha and hitting the gym again with Mark to lift weights. Combined with the fact that he was eating healthily again, the results were... delectable. He'd gained back his muscle mass, and then, perhaps in his zeal to eradicate Gary Clark, gone a few steps further. His biceps had and pecs had a slight bulge to them, and even his quads and calves, which were normally sticks, had filled out a little. He didn't look anything like the frail skeleton he'd been those first six weeks. A month ago, she would have labeled him back to normal, and normal for him certainly didn't bear many complaints. Now? “Holy hell,” she blurted. She wondered what his ass looked like, and tried shamelessly to think of a surreptitious way to get him to turn around for her. Maybe, stand in profile. Anything.

He quirked his eyebrows at her. “What?”

“Look at you!” was all she could manage.

He glanced down at himself, frowning. “What about me?”

“You look...” She swallowed. “Ripped.”

“Ripped,” he said, his tone disbelieving.

She nodded. “Not like gross body builder or crazy fitness monkey. But like... really, really good.”

He snickered. “Crazy fitness monkey?”

“You know,” she said. “Like those people. With the six packs and arms the size of Popeye's and nothing better to do than spend their lives in the gym.”

“Oh, those people,” he said, his tone humoring.

“Shut up,” she said.

He rubbed his flat belly, grinning. “I guess I have no six pack.”

She stared, trying not to follow the little line of hair descending from his navel. “No, but it's a very nice one pack.”

“And I suppose I need more spinach.” He flexed his arms like a body builder, hamming it up for her.

She snorted. “No. No, you don't. You look really good, Derek.”

He stepped closer. “Really good, huh?”

She nodded. “Really good.”

The look on his face was comical. Pure preening peacock. She imagined if he had room, he would have strutted. She laughed and stepped closer, into the spray to meet him. He wrapped his arms around her, pulling her into a wet embrace, and he kissed her. “I think you just put a cherry on top of my rockstar day,” he said against her ear. “Thanks.”

“Mmm,” she purred as he moved his lips across her clavicle. “You're welcome. Can you do me a favor?”

“Anything,” he said.

She made a little spinny motion with her index finger. “Turn around? I want to see, damn it.”
His whole body shook with laughter she could only describe as a full-bellied guffaw. His expression danced brilliantly as he stepped back from her and turned to face the opposite wall. “I'll take male objectification for $1000, Alex,” he said, haughty cheer in his tone bouncing off the tiled walls in a happy echo.

“Whatever,” she replied. “You're loving this.”

“I might be loving this,” he admitted.

“You called it a cherry! On top of your day!”

He glanced over his shoulder at her. “My rockstar day,” he clarified. “So, how does it rate?”

The question dragged her gaze inevitably down the gentle curve of his spine to where his body cleaved apart. That was... nice. Her breaths quickened. She stepped closer. Mashed against his back. She kissed the juncture between his shoulder blades. Her lips slid on wet skin and hard muscle.

“That good, huh?” he said.

“Yes,” she replied.

“Can I turn back around, now?”

She was tempted to say no, so she could keep staring at him, and she didn't have to worry about him staring at her. “I guess.”

He laughed again as he squiggled around to face her. The look on his face was desirous as he stared at her. As if all the hot, sexy, flipping-freaking-gorgeous she saw when she looked at him, he found when he looked at her. She felt herself blushing despite herself, as all her self-consciousness came roaring back like a freight train. Damn it. Blimp sex, hell, even blimp not-sex, was slightly blush-worthy, and she was a freaking blimp.

“Hi,” he said softly once again.

She looked up. “Hey,” she said.

He nuzzled her. “I love you,” he said.

She blinked at him. Her eyes watered. “But I'm fat, and you're gorgeous,” she said before she could stop herself, which only made her want to stab herself in the throat. Meredith Grey didn't say crap like that in the bedroom. In the bedroom, Meredith Grey was the rockstar. Except this is a bathroom, a tiny voice said, and you're in the shower with Model Edition Derek, complete with biceps and one pack.

He didn't speak for a long moment.

“Stop doing that,” she grumbled.

“Doing what?” “Staring,” she said.

“But you're beautiful,” he said. “Why shouldn't I stare?”

“Because...”

She didn't have a chance to formulate a real reply before he closed the space between them.
“Come here,” he said, the words soft, and he spun her gently around. His left arm gripped her under the waist, under the bulge of their baby. He stepped them back underneath the spray, and water fell over them in a relaxing sheet. He ran the washcloth over her skin. Over her stomach and her breasts in slow, soothing motions. She couldn't help but lean her head back against his shoulder and moan. The warm, buffeting water prevented her from looking at him, so she closed her eyes and sighed instead. Under the spray, the water sounded like peals of thunder in her ears. Her body throbbed in time with each stroke of the washcloth.

“You're cheating,” she murmured as he washed her.

“I'm not cheating,” he said. “And you're not fat, Meredith.” He dragged the washcloth in a circle around her navel. “You're pregnant. This is our baby.” He paused with the washcloth just above her pubic hair. Kissed her shoulder. “This is my replacement thought. It's the best thing I could ever imagine for my life, except it's real. You made it real with me. You are beautiful. Okay?” The washcloth slipped between her legs, and he stroked her thigh to knee and then knee to toe, and then he started again with the other leg. Soft, panting breaths and heady, intoxicating warmth stripped her throat of words as he laved every cell of her body with attention. She wished he would do that... forever.

“Okay?” he repeated softly as he finished her legs and moved to her back.

The feel of his hands at her spine made her body thrum. “Okay,” she croaked, barely, as warm water fell down around her. When he pulled his fingers through her hair, lathering shampoo, she felt the soothing shift of her hair, individual strand by strand. Gravity seemed to leave her for a moment, and her body went lax. “That feels so good,” she said.

“Good,” he said, just a whisper over the roar of the water.

The world became fuzzy and not quite there. She leaned against him, hazily imagining the things they might have been doing if they both hadn't been too tired for the athletics of sex. Between that, being cradled against his rock solid body, and the steady motion of his hands as he worked conditioner through her hair, her lower body tensed, and then released into soft, pulsing flutters. The release wasn't earth shattering like it would have been if he'd been arousing her on purpose, but it was enough that a low-pitched, breathy moan expelled from her lips as her legs turned momentarily to jelly. He captured her in his arms and murmured something against her ear, but she was too relaxed to interpret words anymore.

Minutes later, she was blinking, dazed, cradled in a big fluffy towel the size of Alaska, out of the shower, and feeling so wholly loved her entire body was humming. She had no idea what that had been, but freaking hell, that had been some magic. She sat on his lap on the lid of the toilet as he dried them off.

“You,” he said, pulling her close, “are pregnant. Not fat. And I love you.”

She snuggled into the terrycloth against his chest. Her nostrils flared, and she inhaled deeply at the soft detergent scent that spoke of spring and rain. “I'm too relaxed to argue,” she said, and he laughed. “You so cheated.”

He snorted. “I did not,” he said, his voice rumbling against his breastbone.

“Did, too.”

“Not.”
“Too.”

“Too,” he echoed.

“Not,” she said reflexively. She frowned. “Wait.”

He grinned at her. “That was cheating, I admit.”

“Ass,” she said, though she didn't mean it, and he laughed again. “I like your laugh,” she murmured. She rubbed her eyes. “And I'm really not that upset. It's the stupid, stupid hormones, making me say stupid, stupid things.”

“None of it is stupid,” he said. “It's frustrating as hell when I don't feel like I'm helping, but it's not stupid.”

His grip around her tightened, and he struggled into a standing position with her. A flash of doubt stripped her bare as he carried her gracelessly into the bedroom. She wasn't that heavy. Or she was. She was a fat whale. Her horrible imagination ran away with her when he put her down on the bed like a sack of potatoes.

He growled. Actually growled, which snapped her out of her spiraling fears long enough to look at him. Frustration seemed to drip from his pores. “I swear I'm just tired, Meredith,” he said, reading her mind again. “I was nearly shot to death five months ago, you know.”

She gaped at him.

He sank onto the bed in a pale, naked heap next to her with a sigh. He gave her a helpless smile that didn't seem happy. “Well, there went all my hard bolstering-Meredith's-self-esteem work,” he said glumly. “I should have just let you walk.”

“You always try to carry me,” she said. “You not trying would have felt even worse.”

He sighed. Kissed her. “I really can't win, I guess.”

“Apparently not,” she said, and she leaned against him. Empathy made her heart squeeze. She knew all about watching somebody you loved implode and wanting to help so badly, but not knowing how. Not feeling like you could. “I'm sorry. This hormone crap sucks. Thinking I'm a fat blimp whale sucks. And crying at random sentiment sucks. I know logically I'm not a fat blimp whale, and that I'm pregnant, and even that you find that really sexy. Just... Pod Pregnant Meredith kidnaps my brain, sometimes.”

“Crying does suck,” he agreed. She supposed he had some authority on crying despite one's general disposition to avoid it. “And Pod PTSD Derek pisses me off a lot, too, so I get it. You must feel so helpless with me, sometimes.”

She blinked. Mind reader. He had to be. “I do, sometimes,” she said softly. She looked up at him. “But I hang in there, because when I hang in there, we get moments like this.”

He grinned. “Rockstar days?”

She nodded as she leaned against his shoulder. “Days where I swear you're reading my mind, for instance.” She kissed his chest. Hard muscle and soft hair greeted her lips. He stroked her hair. “And like now. I've never heard you say something like what you said earlier.”

He looked down at her, eyes hooded with confusion. “What did I say earlier?”
“That you were nearly shot to death,” she said. “Like it's just something that happened to you. Like, oh, and by the way, I got shot.”

He swallowed. “I suppose it was.”

“Just something that happened?”

He cleared his throat. Kneaded the bedspread with his hands. Like he knew how huge the answer to that question would be, and the gravity of admitting it gave him pause. Made him think hard before responding. “Yeah, I suppose it was,” he said. “It still bothers me at times, but... not right now.”

She looked at him. He seemed... fine. Honestly fine. Not angry, or drowning in terror, or ready to burst into tears. Not looking over his shoulder for the next person with a gun to come along. Just... Derek. Derek-y. Something swelled inside her. Something good. Something that felt... great, and she had another moment filled with brilliant clarity. A moment that showed her no matter what crap they had to shovel through, they would see the other side, were even seeing it now, and that maybe, just maybe, the world didn't suck so much anymore. A smile burst across her face, and she pressed against him like a wave.

He laughed and met her with a kiss. He tumbled backward onto the bed, and she landed on top of him. The wet black towel landed on top of her, draping them. Her wet hair fell down around her shoulders. She stared into his eyes. He didn't seem upset or antsy about being underneath her. From the way his eyes twinkled, that phobia had departed for a trip to Timbuktu, and he wasn't anything but in love with her. In love and loving. His one pack bunched, and he rose up onto his elbows to kiss her again. The motion made the towel slip down to the bed. He kissed her lips, the tip of her nose, and her forehead in soft, searching succession, before he lay flat.

“Meredith Grey,” he said, looking up at her, “Would you let me take you downstairs to dinner?”

He glanced down. “Preferably after we've put some clothes on?”

She blinked, surprised. “I thought you were done with people today.”

His fingerprints traced her spine. “I can deal with a short dinner.”

“Really?” she said. “We could do room service.”

“Really, Mere,” he said. He kissed her. “I feel like this rockstar day needs a rockstar ending. Besides, I had something planned, anyway, that I never called to cancel because I was too busy face-planting into the bed.”

“What is it?”

“Face-planting?” he said. “Well, you see, it's when you're so tired or klutzy that you—”

She smacked his shoulder playfully. “The thing you have planned, Derek.”

He gave her an enigmatic smile. “It's something I planned.”

“You can't just throw that out there and then not tell me,” she said.

He shrugged. “I guess we'll have to go to dinner and see what it is.”

She glowered. “You're mean.”
“And you,” he said, not taking the bait, “are gorgeous.”

“I don’t like surprises,” she said.

“I know, but you're still gorgeous,” he countered. He kissed her, and then he gently pushed her off of him. He stood and walked to his suitcase, buck naked while she sat on their damp towel. He bent over to peruse his belongings. She could have sworn he was purposefully giving her another view of his spectacular, quarter-bouncing ass, but he pulled out a pair of boxer briefs and slipped them on before she could accuse him of anything untoward.

They dressed quickly. She didn't bother drying her hair or putting on makeup or jewelry. He put on on a dark pair of pants and button-down shirt that had miraculously survived the trip without needing to be ironed. She eyeballed his level of dressiness and opted for a black, A-line, pocket, maternity dress she’d just bought. Nothing snazzy, but not casual either, and the flattering black and the way the dress flared did a lot to reduce the blimp-factor. He waited by the door for her while she pulled on her shoes, and when she met him there, he threaded his with fingers with hers. They walked back to the elevator and rode down to the lobby, hand-in-hand.

“How hungry are you?” he said. “Snack hungry? Dinner hungry?”

She stared at him suspiciously. They’d grabbed a bite at the airport. “Snack, I guess. I don't want a big dinner this late.”

“Oh, okay,” he said.

“You're really not giving me any hints?”

He grinned. “Nope.”

When the elevator doors trundled open, the sounds of piano music filtered through the air. Derek led her through the hall. The hotel had a unique look to it. Lots of dark-colored woods, and dark-colored carpeting with bold patterns.

They walked out of the lobby area, down a few short steps, and into a larger open space where a smattering of people sat here and there, spaced by many more empty tables than full ones. Meredith supposed most people who normally would be staying in a hotel right now would be with their families for Thanksgiving-related festivities, just like she and Derek would have been if Derek had been feeling better, but this was good. Empty was good. She glanced at Derek, who seemed a bit more tense outside of the hotel room, but okay. Okay was good, too.

“Welcome to the Round Table Restaurant, madame, sir. Table for two?” a deep, baritone voice said, and Meredith's gaze shifted from the empty tables to an easel board labeled Round Table. Next to it rested a small podium, and a black-haired man wearing a dark suit and white gloves smiled warmly at them.

Derek leaned close to the man and murmured something in a low, whisper tone. Meredith strained to hear, but she couldn't identify anything more than the cadence of Derek's voice as it rose and fell. The man smiled. “Ah, Dr. Shepherd,” he said, not bothering to grab menus, which piqued Meredith's interest. “Right this way, please.”

They followed the host to a candlelit table in the corner, where he pulled out a chair for Meredith and helped her to sit. Derek sat across from her. The host said some things, which Meredith didn't hear, because she was too busy wondering what the surprise would be. The host said something else about a waiter, and then he left.
She glanced across the restaurant. Well-dressed socialites dotted the room. “Where’s the bar? The one with the crazy martini?” she said.

Derek glanced at it, his expression nonchalant. “The Blue Bar is in a separate room. You can’t see it from here, but we can go there later, if you want.”

“Sure,” she said. She imagined the bar. She imagined the color blue was part of the theme, given the name. Perhaps blue with the same dark, austere lines as the rest of the hotel. She could picture him there. Years ago. Younger. Devastated. Drowning himself in single malt scotch until he couldn’t see straight.

And then she blinked. Looked at him as dread tightened in her stomach like cold lead. He wouldn’t do that, she tried to tell herself. Except Derek was romantic, and cheesy, and he would. He totally would do that, ambiguous promise or no. “You did not buy me a $10,000 engagement martini when we’re already married, I don’t do diamonds, and neither of us can drink the freaking thing,” she said. “Please, tell me you didn’t do it.”

He winked at her. “You’ll just have to wait and see, tequila girl.”

“You didn’t,” she said. She stared at him, trying to gauge his expression. He wasn’t giving anything away except the fact that he was delighted to see her squirming. “You didn’t!” He leaned forward on his elbows, rested his face in his chin, looked at her dreamily, and grinned. “You didn’t. You didn’t. No. It’s the most pointless waste of money possible!”

He shook his head. “Actually, I can think of a quite few ways to spend money that are more wasteful. I saw a diamond-crusted water bottle on e-bay the other day, for instance. And there’s always gold-plated toilets.”

“Shut up,” she snapped, which only seemed to make him more gleeful. “You didn't. This is not a good surprise, Derek. Bad surprise. Bad! Bad, Derek!”

He snickered. “I'm not Samantha, you know.”

“You're definitely not Samantha,” Meredith countered. “Samantha doesn't buy martinis with diamonds in them!”

“You're protesting quite a bit,” he said.

“Because you bought me a freaking $10,000 diamond in a glass,” she said. “I'll have a stroke trying not to lose it. And I hate rings. Seriously? Your mother's is still in the box. Why on earth would you think—”

“I think you're jumping the gun a little bit,” he said, a conspiratorial whisper.

She folded her arms and slumped in her seat with a sigh. “And I repeat, you're mean. You're a mean, mean, evil man.”

He cocked his head at her. “Your definition of mean is very odd, you know.”

Movement caught the corner of her eye, and she glanced to the right. A waiter carrying a little round tray approached. On top of the tray, a martini glass perched. The waiter headed straight. For her. Damn it. Damn it, damn it, damn it. She closed her eyes.
Air buffeted her face as the waiter breezily filled the empty space next to her. “Your order, madame,” he said, and there was a clink as something was set on the table. “Congratulations,” he added, just another twist of the knife. Then he left.

“Thanks,” she said dryly at his departing form.

And then she sat there. With her eyes closed.

“It won't bite you if you look at it,” Derek said.

“Yes, it will,” she hissed.

He laughed. He was laughing. Laughing! At her. She clenched her teeth.

“I am not romantic,” she said. “I don't do diamonds and schmaltz and cheese. I can take the occasional scavenger hunt when our almost-done house and my mostly healed husband are at the end, but, Derek, this is too much. It's just—” She opened her eyes and looked down. “Empty.” There was no sparkly diamond sitting at the bottom, and the liquid in the glass was bubbling. Like it was carbonated. Except martinis weren't carbonated.

She looked up at Derek, who was grinning. “I know you don't do diamonds,” he said. “I know you're not a ring girl. I know you'd kill me if I spent $10,000 on a martini for you. And I know neither of us can drink.” He gave her a bald look. “I know you.”

“But—” she managed.

His eyes twinkled. “It's club soda.”

“In a martini glass,” she said flatly.

He nodded. “In a martini glass.” And then he shifted in his seat and pulled a crinkling plastic package from his pocket. She watched as he opened it. “This,” he said as he pulled out the pink, jewel-shaped candy from the bag, “is the non-alcoholic Engagement Special, done on a Meredith-acceptable budget.”

It was a Ring Pop. Strawberry-flavored if she wasn't mistaken. He leaned across the table and deposited the pop next to the bubbling martini glass.

She stared at it.

“Meredith Grey,” he said softly, “Thank you for marrying me. You really are the most beautiful thing in my life.” And then he shut up. As if he sensed anything more poetic than that would get him throttled.

Her eyes pricked at his words as she looked at the pop. And then she looked up at him. “That's still really cheesy,” she said, relief making her shake. “But...” Derek was Derek. He was demonstrative, and romantic, and he always would be. He would always do cheesy things, she imagined, because that was just part of the whole Derek-y package. Her heart squeezed. He'd planned this. For her. And he'd tried to come up with something she wouldn't altogether hate while still satisfying his own need to be himself. “Thank you,” she said, and she meant it. It was cheesy and silly as hell, but she meant every word, because she loved him. Even the demonstrative, romantic cheese.

“That's not the surprise, by the way,” he said low murmur. “That was just whim.”
She wiped her eyes. “It's not?” she said. “It is?”

“No. Yes.”

“Where'd you get the Ring Pop?” she said.

“At the airport.”

“When you went to buy a magazine for the flight?”

He nodded. “Yes, then.”

He glanced up, across the room, and she followed his gaze. The waiter was coming back with another tray. She frowned. They hadn't ordered anything. Was it bread or something?

She damned near bawled when she saw what got placed in front of her—stupid, stupid hormones.

“That's the surprise,” he said. “They don't normally serve it like this. I had them make it special.”

The “it” was a single piece of New York cheesecake, doused in cut strawberries. “For Meredith” was written in looping cursive script with red-colored sauce. There were two shiny forks resting on the side of the china plate. Derek stood and pulled his chair and napkin to her side of the table.

“Want to share it with me?” he said.

He found his mother in the kitchen, taking foil off the pies she'd been cooling in the fridge. Her clipped, methodical movements made her look... upset. The sniff he heard, as if she were staving off tears, solidified the suspicions that had burgeoned since he'd watched her dish up the green beans at dinner like she'd meant to stab them and kill them, not serve them.

His mother didn’t ever cry in front of them. She always hid like this, like she thought it would be a sin for her children to think she might be less than superhuman. He didn't think she knew he heard her sniffing at night, sometimes, through the bedroom wall. She struggled with the holiday season every year, and she'd been upset last night. He knew that much, though he didn't think his sisters knew.

When he graduated in the spring, if he graduated after tanking so many grades, he and Addie had made the decision to find a place and move in together. For a test run, Addie had said with a coy smile. He thought he might marry her, soon, though he hadn't worked up the nerve yet to propose.

His heart squeezed with the thrill of that thought. Getting married. Starting his own family. Having two beautiful children like his little niece, Abby, whom he adored. On the other hand, leaving would mean his mother would be alone. He would be the last to move out.

“Ma?” he said, his voice soft, concerned. A cheerful cloud of voices, muffled by the kitchen door, bumped and collided in the air. His sisters. Addie. Kathy's husband John, and Nancy's husband Rob. Abby. A modest gathering, but one he'd looked forward to all year. “Do you need any help
His mother jerked at the sound of his voice. “Sweetheart,” she said. She looked up. She seemed fine, based only on the superficial. “No, I don’t need help,” she said in an even tone. “Why don’t you go back out with your sisters?”

Derek’s ears sharpened at the sound of Rachel’s jovial laughter floating through the doorway, followed by Abby’s excited shriek and a thump. He folded his arms over his chest and leaned against the door frame. “Abby’s starting to wriggle a bit,” he said with an amused smile. John had been trying less than successfully to keep the two-year-old girl occupied while all the adults talked. “I think she wants pie.”

“Well, I’m working on it,” his mom said, and she turned back to the counter. The foil crinkled. She’d made two huge pumpkin pies that made the whole kitchen smell like nutmeg and cinnamon. The crusts were a perfect, golden brown, with not one burned speck.

Without prodding, he pulled the whipped cream from the refrigerator and set it on the countertop beside her, along with the carton of homemade vanilla ice cream that Kathy had brought. He touched his mother’s shoulder and gave it a squeeze. “Are you really okay, Ma?” he said. “You seem...” He swallowed. “Not okay.”

She sighed, like she’d lost her patience. “No, I’m not okay, Der.”

He blinked. A lump thickened in his throat. He didn’t like talking about this, but if she needed an understanding ear, he would make himself suffer through it. “Are you missing Dad?” he said, preparing for the knife stabs of remembering.

His mother sighed and gave him an exasperated this-is-exactly-what-I-mean look that told him nothing, because he truly had no idea what she meant. She brushed her fingers through her graying hair, agitated. Despite her displeasure with him, though, his bewildered look must have tugged at her heartstrings, because she pulled him into an embrace that made his muscles loosen and his mind drift.

“Of course I miss your father, sweetheart,” she said in a soft voice by his ear and pulled her fingers through his hair. The lump in his throat became a softball when she said, “It’s Thanksgiving. I miss him very much. I always will.”

He swallowed. “But?”

“But Amy is waiting tables at the diner right now,” she said.

He bristled in her arms, and he pulled away. Amy wasn’t there because of her own stupid choices. “So, what? She made her bed.”

“So, you four are acting like it doesn’t even matter,” Mom said. “You wouldn’t even know she’s even missing from the way you all are talking. It’s like you don’t even have another sister.”

“She should have thought of that before she started using,” he said, his tone tripping upward into self-righteous.

His mother stiffened. “Derek, I don’t want to hear it.”

“Do you have any idea what it’s like to watch somebody you love die right in front of you because of her own fucking stupidity?” he snapped.
“I don't want to hear it!” she said again. “And don't use that language in my house, young man.”

He glowered, unsure how this conversation had gone so quickly from melancholy to red hot anger, but too ruffled to analyze it. “It's her choice not to be here.”

“She chooses not to be here because you all make her feel like dirt whenever she's in the room with you,” his mother said. “That's not a real choice.”

“I'm not treating her like dirt. I'm not treating her like anything. I haven't even talked to her since her OD!” he insisted. “I told her I was done, and I meant it. I'm done, Ma. I won't be party to her machinations to kill herself.”

“That's exactly my point, Derek,” his mother said. She squeezed her fingers into tight, white-knuckled fists. “It shouldn't be this way. You shouldn't give up on your family, not when people are so easy to lose!”

Easy to lose. He ground his molars together. That was the crux of it. Easy to lose. He'd watched his dad die in front of him, and then he'd watched Amelia die as well, for no reason other than her own idiocy. The latter seemed like a pointless, sadistic punch in the face after the former. A pointless, sadistic punch that Amelia, his sister whom he loved, had perpetrated against him.

“Well, it is this way,” he said. “Your father would be so disappointed in you,” she said. “All of you!” And the words hit him like a slap. Her mouth clacked shut, and she blinked. Her eyes went misty, like she regretted saying those things the moment the awful words had leaped off her lips.

“You can thank Amy for that. Not us,” he said, his voice low and furious and wounded, and then he stalked out of the room. His sisters, who'd heard the fight through the door, converged around him in support, but he shoved through them, and stomped out the front door. He needed some fucking air.

He stood beside Meredith on the landing in front of the two-story house where he'd grown up, hands folded against his chest defensively. He could remember standing there, panting and hot because he'd been so furious, so hurt, and so convinced he'd been right, and that his mother had been wrong.

Amy hadn't started coming to Thanksgiving again until after she'd gotten through medical school, nine years later. Once she'd met Addison in more than just passing, they'd hit it off like sisters. Addison, who didn't have any real context other than the vague details she'd been told. Addison, who hadn't watched Amelia flat line right in front of her after years and years of trying to help and failing dismally.

Until Amelia had shown up in his hospital room after he'd been shot, he'd largely been aloof toward her whenever they happened to be in the same room. Cordial when addressed, but not interested in getting emotionally involved anymore. He hadn't gone to her college graduation, hadn't gone to her medical school graduation, both despite being invited. Until she'd shown up at the hospital, the last time he'd seen her had been the Christmas before he'd fled to Seattle, and they'd barely spoken more than ten words.

“We really should ring the bell,” he mumbled, but his heart wasn't in it.

Meredith flinched beside him, as though his words had startled her from her own whirling cesspit of worries. She shifted from her left foot to her right, and the floor boards of the old house creaked. Her fists balled in her pockets.
“Well, ring it, then,” she said, her voice tight, almost shrill with nerves, which only made him feel more helpless, because he couldn't bring himself to raise his finger to the bell, and because she was upset, but he didn't think he could help her much. Not when he felt this... dreading.

She was probably feeding off his worries like they were Wheaties, making her own nerves even worse. These people were his family, and if he was a wreck about meeting them, of course she would be a wreck, simply by reading his fucked up signals. He pulled his shaky arms around her, because he could do that, even if he was a worrying, hopeless, basket case.

“Worthless,” Mr. Clark said, which made Derek cringe. He tried to push the awful word out of his mind. If Meredith was in a similar situation with her own family, he'd be sympathetic, not condemning. But that cold, hating voice was so hard to ignore when he felt like this.

“You're not ringing it,” Meredith said.

He glanced at her. “No, at this moment, I'm hugging you.”

“Why?” she said. Like he needed a reason or something.

“Because you're hunkering in your coat like a turtle,” he said.

“And you're shaky and barely speaking!” she countered.

“Well, maybe I need it, too,” he said quietly.

“Oh,” she said. She closed her mouth and looked up at him. She snaked her arms around his waist. He sighed as she pressed her cheek against his chest. “Are you okay?”

“No,” he said.

He wanted Percocet. Wanted it so badly he was aching for it, and all his joints hurt. Percocet took all the noisy jumble in his head and made it mostly quiet, and it was hard not to want that false calm when he was this unsettled, when he was hearing Mr. Clark again, when he was dealing with so many things, new and old, all at once.

He'd slept until 1:00 PM, beyond worn out from the long plane trip, and still on Pacific Time, and he didn't feel quite right anymore. He couldn't seem to recuperate from the deficit he'd accrued. He probably still would have been sleeping if Meredith hadn't gently woken him to ask if he wanted her to warn his family they would be late. Six hours on a noisy plane was a lot for him. Dealing with a ton of people who didn't know how to deal with him was a lot for him. Dealing with a ton of people who didn't know how to deal with him, after six hours on a noisy plane?

“Insurmountable,” said Mr. Clark, and Derek gritted his teeth.

His mother and Amelia, he wasn't worried about, because they both already knew everything, and they were okay. Mark, he wasn't worried about, of course. It was them. Rachel and Steve and Kathy and John. All of the kids. Nancy and Rob, too, but at least they weren't there today, which took some of the heart-crushing stress away. They were in Houston with Rob's family.

“Are you okay?” he said to Meredith.

She pressed her ear against his heart and listened. “Not really.”

They sighed in unison.
Empty, parked cars lined the street bumper to bumper behind them. His mother's house was a narrow, but deep, two-story house with pristine white siding, crammed like sandwich filling between the bread of the two houses next to it on either side. Helen and Jean lived in the house on the left. He didn't know the new neighbors on the right, who'd moved in after he'd left Manhattan. The house had a small yard in front the size of shoebox, where he could remember playing catch with his father, tussling with Mark, playing cops and robbers with water pistols, juggling apples he'd stolen from the kitchen, stalking through the rain to get to his motorcycle on the night he'd crashed, any number of things. There was no driveway, which was why he'd canceled their rental car reservation before they'd left Seattle, and they'd taken a taxi instead.

The air around them was bitterly cold, and the grass in the yard had turned the color of straw for the coming winter. None of the trees had any leaves, and the whole neighborhood had turned gray and cold and barren. That was something he'd grown to adore about Seattle. The fact that, with all the evergreens and the wetness, the world stayed green and lush year-round.

“How not okay are you?” Meredith said as they stood shivering, not entirely from chill, in each other's arms.

“Seven,” he said. “You?”

“Eight,” she said. And then she shook her head. Her fingers scrunched the lapel of his coat between them, and he felt his collar pulling on his neck a little. “No, nine.”

“Nine?” he said.

“What if they don't like me?” she said. “What if I'm a horrible aunt?”

He frowned. “Meredith, they've met you already, and they liked you fine. Even Nancy came around.”

“But not the kids, or the husbands, or the lions and tigers and bears!” she said. “Plus, you were nearly dead at the time, and we weren't married in their eyes, yet. Nobody would hate on their nearly dead brother's not-permanent girlfriend.”

He blinked. “Lions, tigers, and bears?”

“Or similarly chomp-y mammals,” she said.

“You're really comparing my family to vicious carnivores?”

She gave him a look that said, Well, aren't you? He couldn't exactly refute her.

His heart filled up as he looked at her. She was beautiful. She wore a maternity version of the white toggle coat she loved. She'd discovered last week that her old one wouldn't button over her stomach anymore. She'd dragged him along on an emergency coat-shopping trip, and he'd obliged, giving her his opinion of more than twenty coats. He'd said, “You're beautiful; it's perfect,” for twenty-four out of twenty-five, which she'd gotten a little irritated with, but he'd been honest, at least. She could wear a potato sack and make it work, in his opinion. She'd ended up buying the one where his broken record “beautiful” had changed to “enchanting”. She'd wrapped the red scarf his mother had knitted for her when he'd been in the hospital around her neck. Blush from the cold had brightened her face, and she looked alive. Alive and glowing.

She was scared witless. A nine out of ten. But she was there. She was in his arms in a maternity coat. She wasn't going anywhere. And he loved her for that.
Now, there's you, and you're so strong, and I'm proud of you every day, he'd said once when he'd been feeling lost, and she'd pushed him through the day with her own tenacious strength of will. He'd meant every word he'd said about her, then. “Thank you,” he said. “For doing this for me. I mean it. I know it's hard for you. And you won't be a horrible aunt.” He kissed her. The hotel had smelled a bit like peppermint that morning, and her hair had carried the scent along with it. He breathed her in and sighed. “I think you'll be amazing.”

She relaxed in his arms. “Have you made any decisions about... what to tell them?”

His grip tightened, and he took comfort in her warmth.

He just didn't know. He was leaning toward not saying anything about the drugs. The PTSD, which they knew about already but hadn't yet experienced firsthand, was daunting enough by itself. He missed his family, but he didn't have a clue how to be mentally ill around them, and he sure as hell didn't know how to be an addict around them. Except he was both. He was both to gigantic proportions, right now, even with all the improvement.

“I don't know,” he said with a half-hearted shrug. His stomach twisted. “My sisters already think I'm crazy. I just—”

“They don't think you're crazy,” she replied. “They just don't understand what we've been going through.”

“What if I have a panic attack?” he said. “What if I jump six miles because—”

She shrugged. “Then you have a panic attack, or you jump six miles, and—”

“It's embarrassing,” he countered.

“I know, but if they think less of you for that, they're not worth it, Derek,” she insisted. “They're not.”

“They're my family.”

“That doesn't give them a blank check to be mean, judge-y freaks,” she said.

He sighed, deflating. “That doesn't mean they aren't, sometimes.”

She looked at him with sympathy. “I know.”

“They practically disowned Amelia.” He clenched his fists. “I disowned her.”

“I know,” she said. “It's hard for everybody involved when stuff like this happens. But you have a new perspective, now. Maybe, they do, too.”

He swallowed, and he looked away. He was making himself sick. He knew he needed to stop. Knowing and doing were two different things, though. All the worrisome stuff stuck and churning inside his head wouldn't cease its endless swirl.

She bumped his hip with hers. “Hey.”

“What?” he said weakly. “Whatever you decide, I'll back you up a thousand percent. Okay?” she said. “And you don't, Derek. You don't owe them anything.”

A car drove down the street behind him, something that hadn't bothered him in weeks, except today, the noise of the exhaust made his heart squeeze and his breaths tighten, and it was all he could do not to jump out of his skin. He made an awful, soft, terrified noise that made him sound like some sort of animal. His mouth went dry, and his body shook despite his attempts to control himself.

Meredith gave him a wide bubble of space.

He thought wildly about pickles as he counted for his inhalations and exhalations. Pickles and his pregnant wife. She was pregnant, and she'd want extra crunchy pickles to eat with her strawberry ice cream. He thought about the grocery store aisle. She liked Ben & Jerry's. He'd get her something special. Strawberry Cheesecake instead of just strawberry. She loved that flavor. He couldn't fathom how it could taste good with pickles, but he would buy it. Whatever she wanted.

He saw the fog on the glass display case. Felt the cool burst of air as he pulled open the freezer. By the time he'd put the ice cream in his grocery basket, he felt better, and by the time he found the aisle with the pickles, he felt wrung out, but not panicky.

He moved back into her orbit, pressed his nose against her hair and breathed. She rubbed his back.

“I can't,” he said softly. “I can't think about telling them right now. This feeling is just going to get worse the longer we wait here.”

“For both of us,” she said.

He would try to be pleased with the mere fact that he'd made it here, no matter what happened today with his family. He would try to be pleased that he'd had a rockstar day yesterday, pleased that, seven weeks after having a crippling panic attack in an airport, he'd flown six hours across the country and conquered not one but two airports. He would try to keep the sunglasses off his face.

He pulled away from her embrace and rubbed his tired eyes. “Yeah. Let's just ring the bell.”

“I'll do it,” she said. She looked at him, eyebrows raised. “On three?”

He nodded shakily. “Sure.”

He swallowed, staring at the bell. The black paint on the molding around the door was chipping. The last time he'd seen it, there hadn't been a single crack, and now it was chipping and would need a new coat soon. It'd been that long since he'd been home. The mathematics of each year passing hadn't sunk in, really, until he saw the paint chipping. When he'd left, his newest nephew, Cody, had been a year old, and now he would be big enough to have a primer-level conversation.

Things would be so different, now.

“You're not counting,” Meredith said.

He looked at her. “I thought you would count, since you're pushing it.”

“I can't multitask when I'm this nervous,” she snapped.

He swallowed. “Ditto.”

She sighed. “I need a replacement thought.”

“You can borrow mine.”

She looked at him. “What are you thinking?”
He grinned weakly. She knew about the pickle thought, already. He used that one a lot. “It comes faster when I push it?” he joked, trying to put her at ease.

She elbowed him, rolling her eyes. “Oh, shut up,” she said, and he had the presence of mind to laugh. Just a little.

Silence stretched as they both stared at the bell.

“I freaking knew we should have brought a pie,” Meredith said.

“Why?”

“So we could eat it while we're waiting for courage.”

And that was when the door swung inward. He leaped back without sense or reason. Meredith, who'd been holding the lapel of his coat, let go, but not before the line of fabric cut him in the neck and he made a choking noise. His shoulder hit the thick post at the top of the stairs that supported the awning. Pain flared and went silent.

He caught up with the world to find his heart slamming in his chest and the words gone from his throat. His sister Kathy stood on the threshold wearing jeans and a festive red sweater that brought out her cream-colored skin. Her curly, shoulder-length hair framed her face with silver and black, and her eyes were a shock of surprised azure.

She blinked. Her lips parted. “Are you okay?” she said, her tone bewildered. “What on earth are you guys doing out here on the stoop?”

“Um,” Meredith said, flicking a concerned glance at Derek, “debating the merits of pie?”

Fuck, Derek thought as he tried to collect himself. Fuck, fuck, fuck. He'd already done something Not Normal. He hadn't even made it inside the house. He glanced at the ground. A foot. Though it had felt like a mile, he'd only jumped a foot. Maybe, it was okay.

“H...” He lost the word he wanted, and he swallowed. He didn't like calming himself down under pressure. He'd gotten so used to Mark and Meredith and, lately, everybody at the hospital being patient with him. Rachel's familiar face appeared behind Kathy's shoulder, making his audience bigger, and his distress worse. “Hi. K...” He couldn't get his tongue to work, and they were both staring at him. Pickles, he thought. Pickles, pickles, pickles. “Kathy.” He took a deep, cleansing breath, and shook the last of his jumbled, surprised neurons back into their proper places. He even managed a smile. “Rachel. Hi.”

“Hi!” said Rachel with a bright smile in return, though it didn't quite reach her eyes, which was... troublesome.

Kathy, however, grinned at him like nothing had happened. The skin around her eyes crinkled, and her body language seemed welcoming and happy and all sorts of positive things that told him to relax a bit, which he tried and failed.

“Come in, come in,” Kathy said, beckoning them with her hands. “It's freezing outside!”

His oldest sister backed away from the threshold, pushing Rachel backward with her. Rachel made an indignant noise. Meredith looked at him, her gaze a wild twist of Meredith-patented crap-it's-a-family-what-do-I-do panic.

A protective wave rippled through him. He wrapped his arm over her shoulder, gave her a shaky squeeze, took a breath, took the lead, and stepped into the lion's den in front of her. Probably not the best plan, given how fast he was likely to fall apart if things went wrong, but Meredith had flown across the country to support him, and the least he could do was give her a moment to collect herself. He felt her hands at the small of his back, clutching his coat, and if he were more relaxed, he would have been amused at his literal conversion to human shield.

The house stank of roasting turkey and pumpkin pie and all the traditional things that would have made his stomach rumble if he hadn't felt nauseated with worry already. He froze on the front landing, only inches inside the house. The biting cold at his back went away as he heard the door shut. Meredith slid out from behind him after a moment to stand by his right shoulder, and he felt good about that, that he'd at least given her the few seconds she needed.

He'd expected noise, but there wasn't any, other than a few clinks and clanks of food preparation coming from the kitchen. He'd expected people, but only Mark, Rachel, and Kathy stood in the immediate vicinity. He'd expected—

“Holy crap, Derek,” Rachel said as she charged at him from the left, having wormed her way around Kathy. She wrapped her arms around him, and she squeezed him like he was a long lost teddy bear she'd found underneath her bed. His breaths froze in his lungs, but he made himself not jump and not make a startled gasp with every piece of willpower he possessed.

This was what he'd expected. Getting accosted by hugs. His family had always been big on hugs.

“You look so much better!” she said, right against his ear, her voice like an icepick in his skull, and he pushed down into his well to keep from flinching despite the horrific invasion of his personal space. His bristled, though, unable to help himself. Her explosion of curly black and green hair blocked his view of the living room, and with the front door at his back, he didn't have any space whatsoever.

Pickles, pickles, pickles, pickles he thought wildly, and he knew he wasn't doing what she expected him to do, like, say, hug her in return. Old Derek would have hugged her. New Derek stood there like a fucking tree, barely interacting with her at all, but it was the best he could do. New Derek still loved to hug, but not when he was already so nervous he felt sick, and not when he'd been tackled, and definitely not when he didn't have any space.

Though he didn't tell her to back off, his body language must have spoken to spite him, because she let him go. The hurt look on her face made him want to curl into a ball. He'd been here for thirty seconds, and he'd already done two Not Normal things.

“They're judging you,” Mr. Clark said. “They don't like it.”

“I'm sorry,” Derek blurted. Rachel's eyes widened, and his heart sank. Three Not Normals. Forty seconds. He felt like there was an imaginary Mr. Clark marking tallies on a blackboard.

Kathy was glaring, not at him, but at Rachel. She pulled at Rachel's t-shirt. “Give him some space,” she said in a low hiss, which only made him feel more self-conscious.

Mark, who'd been hovering by the fireplace, well out of Derek's bubble, gave him a big grin.
“Hey, man, glad you two made it!” he said. He approached slowly and held out his hand. Derek grasped it. Mark's palm was warm, and his grip was firm, and nothing in Mark's gaze said anything bad about the three Not Normals, which helped, but not much.

Rachel snorted, and her antagonism wrapped around Derek like a noose. “A handshake, Mark?”
his sister said. “Did you forget your coffee this morning?”
Derek glanced at his sister and then back to Mark. Mark didn't usually shake Derek's hand, even with the PTSD, but Mark had gotten good at reading when Derek couldn't handle more than that. “We... made it,” Derek said.

The clinks and clanks coming from the kitchen stopped. “Is that them?” he heard his mother call excitedly, though the words were muffled. Something crashed. Water rushed for a second. “Is that them?”

“Yeah, Ma,” Kathy yelled back, and he flinched again. He couldn't help it. He sighed. Four Not Normals. Kathy's gaze flicked to him, and she adjusted her volume to something more reasonable. “It's them.”

“Where... is everybody?” Derek managed.

“They're all at the park,” Kathy said.

Rachel rolled her eyes. “Kathy made Steve and John take them all. Amy went, too.”

He swallowed. “Oh.”

Rachel turned to his mother as she came into the room. “See?” she said. She jabbed her thumb in Derek's direction, and he flinched at the sudden movement so close to his face. Five Not Normals. “He hates it. He wanted everybody here, just like I said he would.”

Kathy elbowed Rachel.

Mom shook her head. “Rachel, stop it,” she admonished in a quiet, gentle tone. And then she pointedly turned to Meredith. She took one look at his wife, from her cold-nipped cheeks, to her bright scarf, to the coat that bulged at her waist, and his mother's excited smile went nuclear. “Oh, Meredith. You look beautiful. Let me take your coat.”

Derek shrank against the door, now that attention had shifted away from him. His hands shook, and he stuffed them into his pockets to hide the sixth Not Normal. They weren't letting him through, and they were crowding him. His skin crawled, and his legs shivered with the desire to make him move. He wanted to move, but bolting would definitely not be normal, and he planted his fucking feet with everything he had.

“What did you expect would happen when you were a nervous wreck before you even got here?” Mr. Clark said.

Pickles. Crunchy.

“Wow, you're just glowing,” Kathy said from far away as Meredith shrugged off her coat.

Meredith froze. “Glow... wait.” She frowned. “Glowing?”

Kathy grinned. “Glowing is good.”

Rachel sighed wistfully. “Gorgeous.”

Meredith froze. “Glowing is good.”

“I'm a flashlight is gorgeous?” Meredith said.

“In this family, it sure is,” Kathy said. “We're going to expect lots of pictures, you know. Have you picked a color for the nursery, yet?”

“Yes,” Mom said as she folded Meredith's coat over her arm, “I'd like to knit something for the “Um... yellow,” Meredith said. “Maybe.”

Meredith bit her lip. “Um... It was sort of sunshine-y.”

“It's been a few years since we had a new addition,” Kathy said. “Expect craziness.”

“And lots of presents,” Rachel added. “I just love babies. We should go onesie shopping while you're here. We've been calling and calling, but Derek says you don't have a registry, yet.”

“Derek says?” Meredith said.

Rachel paused her gushing to snap her fingers. “Oh!” she exclaimed. “We could get a cute little set of mini scrubs.”

Mark rolled his eyes. “This family needs a surgeon general's warning when it comes to kids.”

Rachel elbowed Mark. “We do not.”

“Do, too,” Mark said. “You guys are like a yapping pack of wolves.”

“It's a baby, Mark,” Kathy said.

Rachel simpered. “A tiny, tiny person!”

“It's a Shepherd family event,” Kathy said.

“And we always thought Derek wouldn't have kids, so it's even more exciting,” Rachel said.

His mother turned to Derek and held out her hand. “May I take your coat, Derek?”

He huddled against the door, unwilling to let her have his only suit of armor, flimsy though it was. His coat rustled as he hugged himself.

“Derek, are you okay?” his mother said, deep concern clutching each syllable.

“I'm... thought...” He swallowed. “I thought...” Swallowed. “More people would be here.”

Mom frowned. “We weren't sure what to do because of yesterday. We wanted you to be comfortable.”

Blush crept across his skin. “I'm sorry.”

“Nonsense,” said his mother. “Everybody understands.”

The put-off look on Rachel's face said, at the very least, she didn't get it. He struggled to focus. There were too many people too close to him and not giving him any room.

“Why don't we get away from the door?” Meredith suggested.

“They're really all...” His heart began to pound. Thump-thump. Thump-thump. He swallowed. “At the park... because of me?”

“They're at the park because they were sticking their hands in my mashed potatoes and eating my pie crusts,” Mom said. She gave him a sympathetic look. “And we did think it might be easier for you if we filled the house to capacity gradually instead of all at once.”

“You didn't...” Thump-thump. “Need to do that.”

“Told you it was stupid,” Rachel said. She touched him again. Put her hand on his shoulder and squeezed. “He's totally fine. See?”

He tensed.

“Rachel...” his mother warned.

And then everything that had coiled inside like a spring burst apart. He couldn't hold any of it in anymore. He jerked back against the door, away from her. “Please, don't touch me,” he blurted before he could stop himself or try to pretend he was fine. He wasn't fine, and they weren't letting him breathe. He swallowed, and swallowed, and swallowed again. Seven and eight Not Normals, and he wasn't off the welcome mat, yet. “I... can't.”

“Seriously?” Rachel said.
Kathy grabbed Rachel's shirt and dragged her away. “She's sorry, Derek,” Kathy said.

“All I did was touch his shoulder!” Rachel said.

He pawed uselessly at the door, because he needed to move. Needed to move something. Anything to stave off the need to bolt and add a huge Not Normal number nine, not that there was much of his first impression left to salvage. “I think I need a few minutes to... to... I... I... just need a few minutes.”

“What will they think when you collapse?” Mr. Clark said.

“Der, are you okay?” Kathy said.

“No,” he managed.

He was losing it. His throat started to close. He grappled with his collar, and he made a noise that wasn't a word. He needed to get out of here. His heartbeat became a crush that he could feel. Thump-thump. Thump-THUMP. Thump-THUMP.

“Please, let me out,” he whispered pitifully, giving up on normal.

He just couldn't do it.

Everybody backed off. Immediately. The extra breathing room brought him back from the brink.

“Derek, look at me,” Meredith said calmly, and he did. He did. Thump-thump. He could look at Meredith. “Why don't you show me around? I'd love a tour,” she said. Thump-thump. Thump-thump. She turned to the blur and said, “That's okay, right?”

Thump-thump.

Meredith nodded, and then she looked back at him, her eyebrows raised. “Please, Derek, I'd really like a tour,” she said calmly, as if he weren't falling to pieces right in front of her.

“I'm going to touch you,” she said. “Okay?” He might have nodded.

And then he was being pulled. Normally an upsetting prospect, but he knew it was her doing the pulling with her tiny ineffectual fists. Knew it because everything around him had become a taffy blur of sensation he didn't want to deal with, but Meredith remained in focus. He could deal with Meredith pulling. Meredith could pull him into Hell, and he'd follow. Not that she would.

The living room melted away as Meredith dragged him underneath the arch into the dining room, where his mother had lain out the white tablecloth she'd embroidered with flowers on the table. Meredith glanced wildly around the room, taking in the sights of the heavy drapery, the chairs, the big, hulking table, and the china closet full of shiny plates and serving dishes. A carved wooden box full of silver utensils sat on the tablecloth next to a bottle of silver polish and a dirty rag. The forks had been set to the side on the tablecloth and looked resplendent. The knives and spoons were still in the box and tarnished.

A tour, he thought. Give the tour she'd asked for, he thought. But his brain wasn't working right, yet, and his mouth felt dry, and his limbs shook. He didn't think he could speak that well. Thump-thump. Thump-thump. Thump-thump.

He thought they might stop in the dining room, but Meredith glanced through the archway, back into the living room, where an irritated Rachel and a Kathy he didn't know how to gauge still stood with his Mom and Mark in a semi-circle around the space Derek and Meredith had just vacated. Still being line of sight wasn't good enough for Meredith, who'd entered flight mode with him, not that he minded. He felt sick and hot with embarrassment, and he didn't want people staring at him, either. She kept dragging him, and he followed.

She moved out of the dining room with him into a short hallway blocked on all sides by doors. Door number one, the left door, she opened to reveal the tiny downstairs bathroom, which was barely more than a sink and a toilet. She evidently didn't want to drag him into the bathroom, so she closed that door and tried door number two. She saw the kitchen ahead, and she never tried door number three. She dragged him forward, her gaze both determined and a precious mix of concerned and worried.

The kitchen was a larger room, full of oak cabinets. His mother had been working on various things on the center island, which was a mess of bowls and pans and plates and knives and spoons. The roasting turkey smell filled the room to the brim and made it hard to breathe without thinking about food. Normally, Thanksgiving turkey was a prospect that made his stomach rumble. In this case, though, he just felt sicker, and he was glad he'd seen Meredith take some Zofran that morning.

Meredith pulled them to the tiny dinette set in the breakfast nook, and she sat him down like a sack of rocks. Or, more, he may have fell that way. He brought his head down and buried his face in his hands. He heard cabinets opening and closing at random to the soft, staccato beats of her panicky, but mild cursing. “Freaking... I don't... invasive... stupid, stupid... do they own any freaking cups?” were the words he heard through the maelstrom of rushing blood in his head. And then he heard a clink, followed by a running faucet.

A crystal glass full of water appeared in front of him on the small table. He couldn't think about drinking a glass of water right now. He couldn't think about what had just happened.

“Definitely a bad first impression,” Mr. Clark said. “They judged you. You failed at a simple Derek closed his eyes. Took a deep breath.

“Pickles, Derek,” he imagined her saying. “I need the little spears, not the circles. The crunchy ones!”

He focused on that until the house around him faded. Until he wasn't sitting at a table in a breakfast nook. Until he stood in the entryway at the market a few blocks from his and Meredith's house. The rain pattered on the pavement behind him, and he wiped the water from his face. He'd shopped there so many times, at this point, that he didn't even need to look at the aisle markers to find anything. He knew where the ice cream was, the produce, the coffee, the cereal, even the tampons, though Meredith hadn't asked him to buy those since before the shooting.

Aisle four. Condiments. Salad dressing. Soups. Boxed things like macaroni and cheese. He paused to help a woman reach a can of condensed cheddar broccoli soup from the top shelf. She smiled. Said thank you. He didn't have any trouble with things like that when he was in his head. He moved forward.

He touched a cold, glass jar of pickle spears. The fluid inside the jar sloshed. The green caught the overhead fluorescent light—

“Derek?” the real Meredith said, the word a soft, concerned question, and his imaginary place snapped away from his mind's eye. He looked at her. She'd pulled a chair beside him. Her hip almost touched his. He hadn't even heard that part, hadn't heard the legs of the chair sliding across the tiles on the floor.

They eye contact, the tacit acquiescence, was all she needed.

She leaned into him. Wrapped her arms around him. He didn't explain where he'd been in his head. With her, he never seemed to need to, anymore. She got it, anyway. He still wore his black trench coat like a suit of armor, and her hands sliding across the wool made a soft, rustling sound.

“I didn't even make it off the welcome mat,” he said miserably.

“They didn't let you off the welcome mat,” she said.

He stared at his hands. “They were just excited.”

She kissed him. “I think the same could be said for you, couldn't it?”

He shrugged as she rubbed his back. “I guess,” he said. His eyelids dipped. It was hard not to relax when she touched him like this. “Feels good.”

“Have you really been fielding rabid sister calls because we don't have a registry?” Meredith said softly. “I had no idea.”

“A few, yeah. As soon...” He sighed when her knuckles hit a tense knot underneath his shoulder blade and obliterated it. “As soon as they figured out you were pregnant.”

They'd wanted to know everything, not just about what to buy. Sex of the baby. Due date. Name. The works. April 14th, maybe Anne or Adam, he'd managed to interject into their storm of excited babbling, though not the sex, since he and Meredith wanted that to be a surprise.

Meredith sighed. “I wish I'd thought about the fact that they would see a video of the wedding when I made that joke about The Hair.”

They'd wanted to tell his family in person. Unfortunately, they'd given burned video discs to his mother to carry back to New York with her after their wedding. Nobody had said anything blatant during the wedding like, “Meredith is pregnant!”, but Meredith had made a remark about Derek's hair being passed down through genetics that both she and Derek had forgotten about. It had taken his sisters about five minutes upon first viewing to call him and ask if said baby was hypothetical or not.

“I didn't think about it either, until they called in a tizzy,” Derek said. He looked at Meredith. Gave her a lazy, relaxed smile, because she was starting to make him melt in his seat. She punched out another muscle knot with her tiny fists, and a groan caught in his throat. “But see, Mere?” he said when he'd gathered himself. “They love you. And they're excited. You have nothing to worry about.”

“Neither do you,” she said. “They seem thrilled just to see you. They don't care if you're jumpy.”

He frowned. “I think Rachel hates me.”

“She doesn't hate you, she just doesn't get you, yet,” Meredith said. “It's hard to see somebody you love be so dramatically different.”

“Well, I can't be the person she knows anymore,” he said, frustrated.

“I know,” Meredith said, the words soft and sure, but not condemning.

The conviction in her tone brought him pause, and he stared at her. The fact that she spoke from personal experience wasn't lost on him. At all. And it struck him all over again how much she'd changed since he'd first met her. How much she'd sacrificed. She'd gotten so strong.

Fearless wasn't the right word, because he knew she got terrified. She'd been terrified today. Possibly still was. But there wasn't anything wrong with being afraid, a sentiment he and Dr. Wyatt were trying very hard to pound into his head. He'd never thought less of Meredith for being afraid. Some things in the world, like being threatened with violence, or committing to something you'd been brought up your whole life to fear, were very frightening.

Sometimes, he could convince himself that he wasn't less for feeling fear, either. Other times, he couldn't. But he'd gotten better at it. Better than before. Better at admitting he was scared shitless and either pushing through it or taking a break to try again later. People asked him if he was okay, and he could say no, sometimes, without feeling awful about it. His family seemed to make him hit the rewind-to-square-one button on that growing mentality, but he'd gotten a lot better at work, and a lot better at home with his Seattle family. With Mark and Meredith. Even Lexie and Cristina and Alex, though less so.

You're my role model, you know, he'd said at one point as he and Meredith had lain together, naked in the sheets.

Meredith had looked distinctly ruffled. Who, me?

Yes, he'd said, and then he'd kissed her.

Why? she'd said, the word a tight gasp of confusion.

You used to run, he'd said. Now, you don't. It helps me think I'm not hopeless.
You're not hopeless, she'd insisted. You're not hopeless, Derek.

I'm trying, he'd said.

She'd wrapped her arms around him. I know, she'd said.

Courageous, he decided. Courageous was the right word.

He shrugged off his coat and hung it on the back of the chair. “Thank you for doing this,” he said, because he didn't think those words could be said enough.

“Yes, I am,” she said. She smiled at him, though she fidgeted self-consciously.

They were broken from their moment by the kitchen door creaking open very slowly, as if whoever was on the other side was taking great care not to startle anybody. His mother poked her head and left shoulder into the kitchen. “May I come in for a moment?” she said in a hushed whisper. “I'm so sorry to disturb you; I just need to check on the turkey.”

“Crap,” Meredith said. “You probably need the kitchen on Thanksgiving. I wasn't thinking.”

His mother smiled as she came into the room. “It's quite all right; I needed a little break anyway.” She looked at Derek. “Rachel made your favorite kale salad, by the way.”

Derek's eyebrows rose. “Really?”

“Not a lot, since you're the only one who will eat it, but yes,” his mother said. “She worked really hard on it.”

He didn't know what to say to that. A small seed of hope burgeoned. Maybe, he was overreacting. Maybe, Rachel was, like Meredith said, just a little overwhelmed with the differences in his behavior right now.

He watched as his mother pulled on her favorite oven mitts, ones that looked like big-eyed, smiling cows. She slid open the oven door and checked the meat thermometer quickly before sliding the oven door closed again. The turkey was huge. Well over twenty pounds, if he could guess by sight alone. The skin had turned golden brown, and the smell that wafted into his nose didn't make him feel sick, now that he'd calmed down a little, and his stomach had stopped churning.

“We've missed you, sweetheart,” Mom said as she pulled off her mitts. She peered into a pot she'd left simmering on the stove, but seemed satisfied after she'd stirred it twice, and she looked back at him. “It's so good to see you home. Everybody is excited.” She beamed at him. “It was very hard to get the kids out of the house, because they didn't want to miss you.”

He puffed up and grinned. He couldn't help it. “I am the awesome uncle,” he said to Meredith, who giggled. The beautiful sound robbed him of his last coil tension, and then, at last, somewhere in the middle of all his nerves settling like fallen leaves on the wet ground, he felt home. The feeling he'd been hoping to find again all morning.

He was home with his family, new and old.

His mother winked as she left the room.

He stared at the table.

“Dad, how do you do this?” he said as he erased another line of gibberish numbers. “I don't get it.” He'd been struggling with this stupid problem for twenty minutes. It didn't make any sense.

Dad looked up from a big stack of bills and peered across the table to the problem in Derek's textbook. He squinted. He frowned. Ran his fingers through his black hair while he thought. Then he scooted his chair closer. He put his index finger on the problem and read. Dad seemed to need to touch books to read them.

“This is dimensional analysis,” his dad said after a moment. “It's not hard, but it can be a little confusing until you get the method down.”

Derek frowned at his book. “It's stupid,” he said. “When will I ever use this?”

Dad squeezed his shoulder. “I have you do this at work all the time, you know,” Dad said. “It's actually pretty useful.”

Derek looked up. “You do? It is?”

Dad nodded. “If I have thirty boxes of nails, and they sell for seventy-five cents each, how many dollars will I make if they all sell?”

“This problem is like that?” Derek said.

“Well, what units are you starting with?” Dad prodded.

Derek reread the problem. “The guy's jogging eight miles an hour.”

“And what units do you need at the end?”

“How many centimeters he ran in forty minutes.” Dad nodded. “So, what do you think might get you from miles an hour to centimeters per minute?”

Derek took his pencil and started scribbling.

Derek blinked at the table. A sheen of wetness stretched over his gaze. He rubbed his eyes. That was the sort of math problem he could do in his sleep, now, but he'd learned it here. From his dad. In the same spot he sat in, now, thirty years later. A lump inexplicably formed in his throat.

“Kale salad is your favorite?” Meredith said gently, bumping him out of the long lost memory.

“With strawberries,” Derek said, nodding. “You might like it.”

She made a face at him. She called it her ick face. “Maybe the strawberries,” she said. “Kale is... kale.”

He shrugged. “More for me, then,” he said. He looked around the kitchen. He had so many memories in this room alone. They all danced in his head, and he felt... warm. Warm and home and all sorts of nice things. He took a deep breath. “I went off the deep end a little.”

“Unexpected stuff happens,” Meredith said.

“I need to be better at handling people who aren't quite sure how to handle me.”

She kissed him. “So, work on that later, and go enjoy your family, now?”

He touched his forehead to hers. Peppermint welled against his nose. Peppermint and whatever flowers had been in the hotel's shampoo. He hadn't read the label. “I really love you,” he said.
“I know,” she replied. Nothing could have made him happier. “Ready to go back out?”

He looked dubiously at the kitchen door. He was happy. He was so happy to be here, and he felt like he was home, finally. But it was one thing to think and feel that in the empty kitchen, or chatting one-on-one with his mother, and another entirely to go back out in front of his sisters, who he'd just panicked in front of, Rachel in particular. As if on cue, Rachel said something in the living room, and the bare sound of it, though unintelligible this far away, carried through the air. The hairs on the back of his neck stood on end. He swallowed.

He didn't want to go back to that, yet."

You wanted a tour, didn't you," he said, "or was that just an excuse to get me out of there?"

“"I wouldn't mind a little tour," she said quietly.

He stood, and she stood with him. He grabbed her hand, and pulled her toward the other doorway. The one that went into the library instead of back to the dining room. He moved over the threshold, only to be yanked to a halt when his arm ran out of slack.

“Oh, my god, is this you?” Meredith said.

He looked back at her. “What?” he said. There weren't any photos on the wall, what—

Her fingertips ran over a set of scribbles on dirty, chipping white molding around the door. The molding had seen better days, but his mother hadn't touched it, even after all these years. Small black horizontal lines about an inch wide, starting at about two feet, ending at about five-and-a-half feet marked the white molding. Each of the many lines had a letter and a height written next to it in messy handwriting that looked a little like Derek's. D, K, R, A, N were the letters.

Meredith’s fingers had paused on the D at five feet, which was the last D marked, because Derek had been five feet tall when his dad had died.

No tiptoes, Derek. Stand flat-footed.

But, Dad—

His father had laughed. Hold still, will you?

Derek blinked at the molding. For a long moment, he didn't know what to say. Didn't have words. He swallowed at the unexpected lump in his throat. “Dad used to measure how tall we were. He marked it on the wall. Mom hated it, but she's never taken it down or painted over it.”

Meredith stared at the molding reverentially, and she lifted her hand away, as if she didn't want to smudge anything. “Do you remember any of these?” He touched the one at four-feet ten. The wood felt cold and worn under the pad of his index finger. “I really wanted to be five feet tall,” he said, “but he wouldn't let me cheat.”

She grinned. He stared at that mark. The second-to-last one. And then he pulled her gently into the library with him. His feet sank into the thick, soft carpet. The smell of books permeated the room. Shelves lined each wall except for the wall with the giant window. He grinned when he turned left. There it was. On the shelf right by the light switch. An old, old edition of Webster's dictionary, too fat to pick up with only one hand, sat on the shelf. He pulled it out to show her.

“He used this to make the marks level,” Derek said. “He sat it on top of our heads and drew the pen along the underside.”
Meredith took the book from him. Her hands sank like a rock until she got used to the weight. “I'm surprised your necks didn't break.”

“It's a heavy book,” he agreed.

She put back the dictionary on the shelf. She looked around the room, eyes brimming with curiosity. Her gaze fell on the old, hulking, tan leather chair in the corner that had seen better days. Dad's chair. The chair didn't match the décor in the room at all anymore. His mother had re-finished all the shelving with a cherry-colored stain, and she'd repainted the walls a pale, cheerful yellow that hadn't been there the last time he'd been home. But she'd always kept the chair. He imagined she would keep it until it fell apart.

“Dad read to me in here when I was little,” Derek said. He pointed to the chair. “I sat in his lap in that chair.”

Meredith wandered across the room, and he followed. She picked up a silver-framed photograph from one of the shelves, an old, black-and-white of a young boy in a white t-shirt and jeans. His hair was curly and dark, and he beamed for whoever was behind the camera. A stadium full of people staring at something else filled the space behind him. “Is this...” Meredith squinted at it, and then looked at Derek. “Is this him, or is this you?” “Me,” Derek said. “Yankees Stadium. Dad took the photo.”

Meredith put the picture down, but she stared at it for a long, silent moment.

He picked up the photo next to the one she'd been looking at. It was a photograph from earlier in the year, a family photo where they'd all dressed up. His dad stood on the left, and his mother stood on the right, and Derek and his sisters filled in the front row. Dad had his hand on Derek's shoulder. Derek didn't look nearly as happy as he had in the Stadium photo, which had been taken toward the end of the school year. His smile was forced, and his lip was busted, but scabbed.

Meredith wrapped her arms around him and peered at the picture with him. “Tell me something new about him,” she said.

_His stomach rumbled, and for a moment, he felt lightheaded. He leaned against the shelf, barely keeping his grip on the inventory clipboard. The pen he'd been holding slipped from his fingers and fell to the floor._

_He stared at the paintbrushes he'd been counting. Had he been on... row six? Or seven? He blinked at the shelf. He couldn't think straight, and the shelf seemed to shimmer. He thought about sitting down in the aisle. Sitting down seemed... nice. In fact, the floor seemed to be getting... closer._

“Derek?” his dad called from the other side of the aisle where they kept the tools like saws and hammers. “Are you almost done over there?”

_Derek swallowed as the world slowed down, and his heartbeats suddenly seemed very loud in the quiet space. “Sh... sure.” He'd tried to sound okay, but he didn't think he'd managed._

_He heard footsteps as Dad rushed into the aisle wearing a stained shop apron. “Derek?” his dad said, and then he was there, in Derek's space. The smell of cedar tickled Derek's nose. Derek wobbled on his feet as the clipboard was gently taken from his shaking hands._

_Dad felt Derek's forehead with the back of his hand, a look of deep concern on his face. “Are you feeling okay?” Dad said._
Derek blinked. Yes, he wanted to say. I'm fine. He'd almost managed. Dinner was only two hours away. Mom made meatloaf every other Monday, and it was meatloaf day. He could taste the peppers and the beef on his tongue already. He licked his lips. And then all he could think about was meatloaf. He couldn't make it for two hours. He just couldn't.

“I'm hungry,” he said woozily, and then he sat down at his father's feet because he couldn't stand up anymore. He would have fallen, instead of sat, but Dad controlled the descent.

“Hungry?” Dad said sharply. “Didn't you eat lunch?” Derek swallowed. His non-answer probably answered for him. The room kept wobbling in and out of focus. He thought he might be in the process of fainting. He didn't think he'd ever fainted. It was a new experience. He didn't like it.

“Peter, mind the register, will you?” he heard his father say, voice rumbling, though the rumble could have been the blood rushing in Derek's ears.

“Sure thing, Mr. Shepherd,” said Peter.

And then the world moved. Something tugged under his shoulders, and Derek rose to his feet, more of the something's volition than his own. The bell over the door rang. The hardware store disappeared. The cool outside air ruffled his hair.

“I'm okay, Dad,” he managed. “Really.” What he should have said earlier. What any self-respecting eleven-year-old would say.

What a wimp, he heard the kids at school say, an echo.

But his father didn't speak as he frogmarched Derek across the street to the diner. Mae, the head waitress, and Dad exchanged words that didn't make much sense. Something about, “Something quick and easy.” In a matter of blurred seconds, Derek found himself sitting in a booth on a red vinyl seat across from his father. Mae put down a bare bones garden salad drizzled with some creamy dressing, a glass of milk, and a piece of the diner's signature carrot cake in front of him.

Dad grinned at Mae. The skin around his eyes crinkled. “Thank you, Mae. You're a dear.”

Mae said something, but Derek didn't hear it. He stared at the chipped surface of the table for less than a second before he grabbed his fork and stuffed his face full of crispy lettuce and explosive cherry tomatoes. He finished the whole salad in a matter of moments and started on the carrot cake, which made his nose crinkle. He wasn't a huge fan of carrot cake, but he was so hungry, the taste didn't matter. He ate the whole sickly sweet thing, icing and all, and then he chugged the entire glass of milk Mae had left him to wash it down.

When the starving frenzy died, he realized his father was looking at him, eyes dancing with fury, mouth set in a grim line. Derek swallowed. “I'm sorry,” he said, and he looked at his lap.

“Don't apologize. You didn't do anything,” Dad said. “They took your lunch money again, didn't they.” Not exactly a question.

A lump formed in Derek's throat. They'd taken more than that. They'd taken his breakfast money, too, and he hadn't eaten since Sunday night. But he'd thought he could make it until dinner. He'd tried.

What a wimp, the kids said again. He heard them laughing.

He fiddled with one of the napkins and didn't speak. The diner was narrow and long, full of about twenty-five red vinyl booths, with big bright windows that looked out on the busy street. A jukebox sat by the front door near the cash register. His dad took him to this place with Mark every Sunday afternoon after work for milkshakes, a happy, sharp contrast to the misery of now.

All the bruises from the day suddenly hurt a lot more. His eyes pricked. If he spoke, he’d just cry, and that would be proving them all right. Men didn’t cry. Only wimps and girls cried.

Dad shook his head. The vinyl squeaked as he shifted, and then stood, and then switched to Derek’s side of the booth. His father’s arm came down around Derek’s shoulder, and Derek felt himself pulled into a warm, tight embrace, but Dad didn’t say a thing, not one word. He sighed like he was disappointed, but he rubbed a firm, strong hand up and down Derek’s arm.

Derek closed his eyes. He hated school. He hated it so much. Ever since he’d gone to middle school. Mark was a year behind him and was still in elementary.

Mark was the one who could hit.

Not Derek.

“Will you tell me what happened?” his dad said. He squeezed Derek’s shoulder.

The lump in Derek's throat grew. He said nothing. He'd said nothing the last time, too. And the time before that. His dad hadn't said anything about it the first time when Derek refused. The second time, Dad had been a bit more persistent. This time...

“Is there someone else you'd rather talk to?” his dad prodded gently. “It's okay. It doesn't have to be me.”

If Derek told, his dad would try to intervene. Derek knew it. Dad would talk to the principal, or the kids, or the kids' parents, and then it would only get worse. Everybody would hate Derek even more, and he'd never fit in, and it would never ever stop.

Derek’s lower lip quivered. “No.”

Dad sighed and ran his hands through his dark, curly hair. His skin rasped as he wiped his face with his palm in an upset motion. Then he took a deep breath, as if he were steeling himself for something.

“Where is this happening?” Dad said.

Derek stared at the table.

His father shifted. The red vinyl seat squeaked. He wrapped both arms around Derek and squeezed before letting him go. “I promise nothing goes beyond this table, Derek. Whatever you tell me stays between us.”

“You'll tell on me,” Derek said. “They'll find out I ratted.”

“I won't tell anybody, Der. I just want to hear from you what’s going on. I promise.”

Derek's chest constricted. The diner was empty. It was too early in the afternoon for the dinner crowd, and way too late for lunch. They were alone, save for Mae, who shuffled around behind the front counter, stacking menus. The careworn woman was well out of hearing range.

“I promise,” Dad said again with quiet surety, and then he pantomimed a zipper across his lips using his thumb and index finger.

Derek blinked, and the world blurred. “They corner me on the way to school,” he blurted. Usually, he managed to dodge them on the way there, and those were the days he got to eat. Sometimes, they terrorized him in the bathroom, too, even when they knew he had no money to give them. “And in the bathroom. I try not to go, but…” Even if he didn't drink anything in the morning, he couldn't make it past the final bell.

Dad stilled.

“Please, don't tell anybody,” Derek said into the silence.

“I won't tell anybody,” his dad said, his voice a low murmur. “But maybe we can come up with a plan.”

Derek wiped his face with the back of his hand. “A plan?”

His dad bumped shoulders with him. “A plan. What could you try to get them to stop? How would you like to solve this?”

“Me?” Derek said.

Dad nodded and gave him a soft, understanding smile. “Yes, you.”

Derek looked at the table. He'd managed to tear one of the napkins to tiny paper shreds with all his self-conscious fiddling. “I wish I could hit back like Mark,” he said.

Dad was silent for a moment. “What do you think might happen if you hit back?” he said.

“I don't know,” Derek said. He shrugged half-heartedly. Usually, when Mark hit back, everything turned into a brawl, and Mark got put in detention, but at least Mark didn't starve. “A fight.”

“What else could you do?” Dad said.

Derek gritted his teeth. “Call them jerks.”

“That's a bit like hitting them,” Dad said.

“Well, I've tried running away, and they just yank me back,” Derek said, frustrated. His fingertips hurt from grabbing at trees. No parking signs. Cars. The fence. Anything available.

“Do you know if they do this with anybody else?” Dad said.

Derek swallowed. Honestly, he felt like all those kids did was wait for him—the easy pickings shrimp. He tried to avoid them, but they always found him eventually. He'd never seen them picking on anybody else. He was alone.

“No,” he said.

“Do you know why they do this?” Dad said.

“Because I'm small,” Derek replied.

Dad shook his head. “No, it's because they're small, and that's not your fault.”

“They're huge, Dad. I can't—”
“No, I mean... they feel small. Maybe, something is wrong at home. Hurting other kids makes them feel bigger.”

“Oh,” Derek said. And then he frowned. “What would be wrong at home?”

Dad shrugged. “Sometimes, moms and dads don’t get along very well.”

Derek frowned. He couldn't imagine that. At all.

“The point is, though,” Dad said, “that they want to hurt you, and you shouldn't give them what they want.”

“But it does hurt!” Derek said. Tears renewed in earnest. He was a wimp. Just like they said. “They call me names, and they won't let me leave until I give them my money, and then I can't eat all day, or I can't go, and—”

Dad hugged him. “I know, Der. I know it hurts. And you're very brave to talk to me about this. Do you understand that I think you're very brave?”

“I don't feel brave,” Derek said.

“Well, you are,” Dad said. He ran his fingers through Derek's hair. “Those kids are the cowards, Derek. Not you. And I'm not saying you shouldn't hurt when they do these things. What they do is a hurtful thing.”

“I don’t understand.”

Dad squeezed Derek's shoulder. “Derek, do you know what a poker face is?”

“He always seemed to know how to handle everything without making me feel handled,” Derek said as he placed the picture where he'd found it on the shelf, a lone tree in a forest of pictures. He had no idea what kind of parent he would make when he couldn't even deal with a hug from his overzealous sister without flipping out.

Meredith rested her head on his shoulder. “I wish I'd had that. Maybe, I wouldn't have turned out so deeply freaky.”

“You're not freaky,” Derek said. And then he sighed. “I miss him.” He blinked, and his eyes watered. “I miss him a lot. I didn't used to think about him much. I think about him all the time, now. What he'd be like, now, if he were alive. What he'd think of me. I'm not sure he'd be pleased.”

“I think he'd be proud,” Meredith said.

“You really think so?”

“Yeah, I do,” she said. “It takes a lot of courage to get help.”

Derek nuzzled her, pressed his nose against her hair. “You realize you're talking about yourself, now, not me, right? You're more courageous than anybody I know.”

“I'm not,” she said.

“You are.” He kissed her, and a rueful laugh popped loose from his lips as he pulled away. “We're doing it again. Dr. Wyatt would slap us on the wrists and make us start journals.”
Her eyes twinkled as she stared at him. He loved her smile. “Being hopelessly negative about ourselves?” she said.

“Mmmhmm.”

“I'll stop, if you stop,” she said.

“On three?”

She nodded. “Two.”

“One,” he said.

They shared a long silence. Derek took a deep breath.

“Are you okay, now?” Meredith said.

“I'm better,” he said honestly. “You?”

“I'll live.” She glanced at the doorway. “A little more tour? Or back to your family?”

He'd calmed down. He didn't feel sick or panicky anymore. He felt no pressure when it was just him and Meredith in their own little bubble, but he couldn't stay in that bubble forever. A tiny pile of worry twisted at the thought of going back into the fray where he would be judged, but there wasn't much he could do to get rid of it, other than to get things over with.

Do you understand that I think you're very brave? his dad said, a distant echo.

Derek tried to hold onto that, instead of the hating words of Mr. Clark. It was hard. It was so hard. But he tried. He was less of a nervous wreck, now, and it was easier to think straight. Easier to think about good things. He wouldn't think badly of Mark, had Mark been in this position instead. He wouldn't think badly of anybody trying to come home with a new illness, mental or physical or both. He tried not to think badly of himself for having difficulties with something that was truly difficult. Something that would be difficult for anybody.

You're the strongest person I know, Meredith had said many times.

He tried to hold onto that, as well.

“I just don't get it,” he heard Rachel saying as he walked back to the living room with Meredith's small hand clutched in his. Meredith walked beside him, a bastion of support, but even then, his grip on the good things faltered when he heard Rachel's frustration bleeding from every syllable. “Crap happens to everybody, and we pick ourselves up. It's been nearly six months. Shouldn't he be less jumpy by now? He's not Derek. He's not acting like my little brother.”

Derek froze just outside the room. Closed his eyes. So much for hoping Rachel had sorted through her initial surprise. Now, she sounded like she'd had a chance for her concerns to boil over and make a mess of the stove, and she was on a tear.

“She'll judge,” said Mr. Clark, a quiet, returning whisper. “She'll judge, and she'll hate you. She hates you already.”

Meredith squeezed his hand, and Mr. Clark's voice snapped away.

“He has a mental illness, Rachel,” Kathy insisted in his defense, which, put that baldly, didn't make Derek feel much better, though it was the truth.
He did have a mental illness.

“Well, that's crap!” Rachel said. “He should be able to—”

He stepped into the room, and she shut up. Fast. Mark and his Mom and Kathy looked at him, but Rachel looked away.

“Should be able to what?” he said, the words quiet. His voice sounded shaky. He cleared his throat and steeled himself.

Derek, do you know what a poker face is?

Rachel's miffed expression dissolved into horror when she got a good grasp of how much he'd heard, but she stuffed her emotions behind a cold mask in seconds. She took a short breath and steeled herself, much like Derek had just tried to do. Kathy attempted to diffuse the situation by stepping between them, but that didn't stop Rachel from saying imperiously, “You should be able to handle your family touching you, Derek. Six months, and Mark doesn't clap you on the back anymore, and I can't even squeeze your shoulder or hug you?”

Meredith stiffened beside him, and calm resolve threatened to turn into something nasty. “H—”

“And how would you suggest I fix that?” Derek said, interrupting Meredith before she could leap like Wolverine to his defense, though he did appreciate her sentiment.

“Get a new shrink,” Rachel said, her tone hostile. “I don't know. Clearly whatever yours is doing isn't working.”

“Rachel, that's enough,” Mom said, her voice low and furious.

Kathy folded her arms and glared at Rachel. “A psychiatrist isn't a magic fix-it button, you know.”

But he ignored Kathy, and he ignored his mother. He spoke calmly, though he didn't feel calm. “I'm still me, Rache,” he said, refusing to drop eye contact with her. Refusing to be cowed. He was so sick of being cowed. His entire body hummed, and his heartbeat began to thunder in his ears. Thump-thump.

Rachel snorted and looked away.

His legs started to shake with the adrenaline of confrontation, and he resisted the urge to flee the room. He'd backed up for Gary Clark. He'd spent the last six months backing up. This was his family. His family. He took his nerves and funneled them into defiance.

“I remember when you graduated high school,” he said. “It was a year after Dad died, and you couldn't even get through your speech without crying. I remember when you hitchhiked back here from Cornell because you were homesick. You came home every weekend for a year before you were okay with being alone. I remember when you totaled Steve's car a few weeks after you'd met him, and I told him for you, because you were feeling so guilty, you wouldn't eat.

Rachel sniffed and folded her arms defensively. “What does any of that have to do with anything?”

“Somebody shot me,” he said. He pressed his hand to the pockmark underneath his left nipple. He could still feel it through his shirt. “That bullet came within a millimeter of killing me instantly. I couldn't breathe, or walk, or defend myself, and the only reason I'm standing here having a conversation with you at all is because of Meredith and her friend.” He jabbed his thumb in Meredith's direction. “She saved my life.”
Kathy blinked tears. “Derek,” she said, her voice torn. He hated that he'd upset them, he kept going, anyway, before he completely lost his nerve to the thunderous pounding of his heart. They needed to hear this.

“Some things really scare me,” he said, and his voice cracked. “Like loud noises, and people touching me when I'm not expecting it, because those things make me think I'm being attacked.” He felt Meredith lean into him, a soft, firm reminder that she was there with him. His wingwoman. “I'm trying to be better about all of this, I truly am, and I'm sorry I can't be the little brother you remember right now, but this isn't something I can just switch off, just like you couldn't switch off grief, or homesickness, or guilt.”

Rachel reddened.

“I have some big problems. Do you think I don't know that?” he said. “But I'm still me, Rachel. I remember when you were pregnant with Cody, and Steve was on a business trip. You went into premature labor, so I took you to the hospital, and I held your hand. That was me.”

Rachel's lower lip quivered. She started to cry, just like Kathy and his mom. Meredith was crying, too. The whole fucking room except for Mark was crying, and Derek felt like he'd just stabbed a puppy or something. His sudden courage drained like a sieve, and he felt horrible. He hadn't thought about Meredith. She didn't like hearing about the details.

I don't want to remember you nearly dying, she'd screamed at him only a few months ago. I don't want it, Derek! Do you want to remember me in the water?

“I need you guys to understand this because you're my family, and I really need my family,” he managed, before he lost his momentum, and then his throat felt too full to talk, and he couldn't take looking at a bunch of women who were crying because of him, particularly Meredith and his mom, so he looked at his feet instead. He felt like a giant jackass.

The front door opened, and Derek shied away. He couldn't stop himself when he was already so upset. His heart thundered, and he felt faint and sick with the need to run, but then Meredith was there, tears and all, and just having her in his field of view, clearly not panicking, helped him find enough of his center to keep from falling apart. He made himself not fall apart through sheer stubborn will. The sounds of his heart beating subsided in the rush, leaving dead silence and shame behind.

Steve stared at them all from the threshold. He was a tall, freckled man with red hair, a round face, and a ruddy complexion. He worked for Merrill Lynch as a mutual fund manager for a few hundred clients. He was a high roller, but for family gatherings like this, he relaxed. He wore jeans and a sweatshirt that were a little too big for him, and his sneakers were stained from years of trekking in the mud. “Whoa,” he said in his typical deep baritone. “What happened?”

Rachel took one look at her husband. Her lower lip quivered. She sniffed and wiped her face. And then she marched out of the room, her nose pointed toward the ceiling as if to say, You can't cow me, either, Derek Shepherd.

A lump formed in Derek's throat. He'd screwed up again. He knew it. He'd upset everybody. On Thanksgiving. Why did this have to be so hard? He blinked, and then the room blurred. God, damn it. He'd made everybody cry.

“This isn't how I wanted this to go,” he said, his voice thick and warbling with embarrassment. He wildly thought about places he could take his pregnant wife at the last minute on Thanksgiving. “Should I leave? I can...”
“No, you should not leave,” Mom snapped, cutting him off.

“Nobody should leave,” Kathy said as she wiped the remnant tears from her face. She took a deep breath. “Can we all just accept that this is weird for everybody? Anything like this takes some time.”

Derek rubbed the bridge of his nose. He needed to apologize. Or something. He didn't know what. “Let me go see if I can talk to her.”

“Derek,” Kathy began, “that might not be a good—”

“I have to try,” he said. “You can tell everybody at the park to come back,” he said to Steve, and then he turned to Meredith, whose eyes were red. He wanted to talk to Rachel, but not at Meredith's expense. He pressed his forehead against hers, and then he kissed her. I'm so sorry, he said, but didn't say.

Her gaze softened. It's okay, she told him in return. I'm glad you did what you needed.

“Will you be okay?” he said aloud.

She gave him a watery grin. “Just call me Dorothy,” she said.

“Dorothy?” Kathy said.

Meredith gave his sister a wry look. “Private joke.”

“Oh.”

“Meredith...” Derek said.

“I'm okay,” she said. She wiped her eyes with her hands, and she looked a lot better. Her eyes were bright, and she smiled genuinely. “Really. Go talk to her.” Satisfied, he gave her a nod, one last kiss, and he trudged after Rachel, who he found in the library where he and Meredith had been, talking about his father, moments before. His sister stood by the window in a bath of muted fall light. Her hands were folded over her chest, rumpling her Florence and the Machine t-shirt. She'd gotten her hair highlighted with green tips at some point since she'd visited him in the hospital. He couldn't see her face, but he heard her sniffing.

Derek stared at the wall in his bedroom, silent. He sat on the bed, Indian-style on top of the quilt his mother had made for the bed. His baseball glove lay in his lap, clutched around an old baseball. He was sixteen, now. Dad was supposed to be there to take him to their annual game.

Rachel knocked softly on his open door. Her keys jingled as she shifted. “Hey,” she said. She'd dyed her hair cotton candy pink that year, and it made her head look a bit like a blob of strawberry ice cream. His mother hated the colors, but Rachel kept coming up with new ones to shock and horrify.

He looked at her dully, feeling too dour to tease her today. “What?” he said.

His fingers clenched around the old leather glove. Dad was supposed to be there, but he wasn't.

Rachel pulled two ticket stubs from her jeans pocket, and she gave him a watery smile. “I thought I would take you, this time.”

His throat tightened. “You don't even like baseball.”
She sat on the bed beside him. “No,” she admitted. She put her hand on his shoulder. She blinked, and tears spilled. “But I do love you.”

“Rache?” he said softly as he entered the room.

She looked at him. Her face was streaked with glistening tear tracks, and her eyes and cheeks were red. Her deep blue gaze took him in, head to toe. Her lower lip quivered, and then she turned away to stare out the window. Her shoulders shook.

His chest tightened at the sight of her. He'd done that. His fault.

“Rachel, I'm sorry,” he said as he closed the space between them and sidled hesitantly to her side. She watched him out of the corner of her eye, and though she acknowledged his presence, she didn't move closer to him, which felt weird. Of the whole family, Rachel was the biggest offender in the hug department. He swallowed against the lump in his throat. “I'm sorry I'm like this. I wish I could fix it.” He would have given anything to fix it.

She shook her head. “It's not your fault,” she said, her voice twisted with misery.

Derek blinked, surprised. “But I—”

“Mom said to give you some space,” she said. She rubbed her eyes. “I didn't want to believe her because you're...” She looked at him, and she smiled through her tears. “Well, you're you.”

“I'm sorry, Rache. I—”

“I hate guns. I hate them, Derek,” she snapped. “Dad is dead, and I can't even touch you anymore.”

He wrapped his arms around her and pulled her tightly against him. She squeaked in surprise, and then a hitching breath flowed out of her body. She relaxed like he'd drugged her, like this, this hug, this was all she'd wanted the whole afternoon. Maybe, it had been.

“Yes, you can touch me,” he murmured against her hair.

“But you said—”

“You lunged at me,” he said, figuring honesty was the only policy at this point. “Then, you all had me cornered by the door, and I didn't have any space. I was already a nervous wreck about making a good first impression, and I kept making more and more errors that you were noticing, and I just...” He sighed. “It was too much, and I lost it.”

“Oh, I...” She pulled back, and she looked at him with a guilty frown. She wiped her eyes. “I didn't even think of that.” She pushed back into his embrace. “I'm sorry, Derek.”

“I do like this,” he said. “I do. I just need a little warning, and I need to not feel cornered.”

“Oh,” she said, the word soft. Her lithe arms wrapped around him. She clutched his shirt, and she didn't let go.

In the distance, he heard the front door open, and a crash of voices entered the house like a stampede. He heard John's unmistakable timbre. He heard Amelia saying hi. He heard the kids. Giggles. A screech. He stiffened, and he clenched his teeth. There were fifteen people out there. All crammed into the living room like sardines, he imagined. He didn't know how he would do this, but he focused on pickles, pickles, pickles, and his tension slowly bled away.
“This is really difficult for you,” she observed.

“Yes, but I swear I’m trying as hard as I can.”

“Me, too,” she said. She sniffed, and he rubbed her back in slow, soothing circles. “I do want you here. I love you. I’ll always love you. You’re my brother. It’s just...”

He closed his eyes. “Hard?”

She nodded rapidly, but she didn’t speak for a long moment. He listened to her sniffle as she tried to collect herself, and he kept moving his back up and down her spine. “Dad used to do that when I was upset,” she said when she found her voice.

“Where do you think I learned it?”

She laughed ruefully. He liked it much better when she laughed, and it did a lot to soothe his nerves.

“Want to go back out, now?” he said.

She raised her eyebrows. “Do you?”

He looked dubiously back at the door. There was a lot of noise filtering through. Enough to make his skin crawl. But he’d left Meredith out there. He’d left Meredith alone in that crush to act out the Wizard of Oz, and, even with the nerves... he really did miss them. All of them.

“You might have to push me the last few feet,” he sort of joked.

“Should I warn you first?” Rachel said with a teasing smile. “Send a messenger pigeon?”

“Funny,” he said.

She pushed against him playfully. “I’m a funny girl,” she said. Her eyes were red, still, and it was clear she’d been upset, but she looked so much better, now. She seemed like Rachel he knew and loved and had grown up with, now that she understood she could still play with him, just... not as hard.

He let her take the lead heading back to the living room. When they hit the threshold, hit the veritable wall of noise and people, she kept going a step before she realized he’d slammed to a stop. Rachel looked back at him. Guys, look who's here! she would have said excitedly, clapping, if he’d visited last year before he’d gotten sick, because that was the kind of bubbly, effervescent person she was, and all the kids would have converged on him like a swarm of noisy ants. She didn't do that now. Didn't draw any attention to him whatsoever. She gave him an encouraging smile, and then went to sit by her husband.

Derek took a short, clipped breath. The adults and older kids had mostly taken seats in the ring of chairs his mother had put out around the big room in a circle. The younger kids were... chaos. On the floor. Everywhere. He eyeballed the empty folding chair between Abby and Meredith, who’d taken refuge next to Mark and was looking almost as wildly at the room as Derek was. At least Mark was trying to keep her occupied with what looked like a very poor excuse for conversation. But he was trying.

Meredith and Mark. His people. And Abby, whom he adored, and hadn't gotten a chance to talk to in what felt like a year, now. She’d called him a few times when he’d been in the hospital, but... hell if he could remember those conversations beyond the fact that he’d had them. He’d been too stoned.

He used that empty seat between Abby and Meredith as a carrot on a stick. He didn't say hello, yet, to anybody. Didn't announce that he was there. He just had to make it to that seat, and then he could worry about behaving like a human being once he'd done that. Everybody was so busy chatting in small, happy groups, nobody noticed him.

A few feet from his goal, Abby caught sight of him and lit up. Abby looked more like her father John than like Kathy. She'd inherited John's dirty blond hair, which she in turn dyed platinum, and she had John's button nose, and his oval face. Uncle Derek! it looked like she wanted to say, but he supposed she'd either caught on to Rachel's choice for subtlety or had been forewarned by Kathy, because Abby didn't say anything.

“Hey,” Meredith said softly as he sat down.

He gave her a kiss. “Are you okay?” he murmured.

“I've just been given a detailed plan about how Mark intends to woo Lexie back,” she said.

“Woo?” he said.

Mark leaned forward to see around Meredith's shoulder. “Woo,” Mark said. “I've been reading a how-to book.”

Derek snickered. “A book on how to woo?”

“Hey, man,” Mark said, and he held up his hands. “It was conversation.”

Derek pulled Meredith into his arms, and he gave her a kiss. Thank you, he mouthed over her head.

Meredith seemed to relax in his arms. She rested her head on his shoulder. She didn't seem to want to say much, seemed happy to soak things in, tucked safely in his protective bubble. He didn't begrudge her some Derek-as-a-human-shield time.

“Abby,” he said, turning to his oldest niece.

She grinned at him. “Guess what my grade in molecular neurobiology is right now,” she said.

“Hmm,” he said. He tried to make a show of guessing, though he knew from Kathy's excited babbling on the phone that Abby was somewhere in the summa cum laude range as she neared graduation. “70%?”

Abby rolled her eyes and laughed. Kathleen had asked him to let Abby shadow him for a day when she'd been a sophomore in high school. Kathy had been trying to show her daughter what kind of career options were out there, not as anything binding, just... as helpful encouragement. Being the awesome uncle with an awesome uncle reputation to uphold, he'd let Abby put on scrubs and watch a hemispherectomy right next to the operating table, and she'd been smitten with neurosurgery ever since. She'd applied to his first alma mater, Bowdoin, early decision, and she'd gotten in without needing to apply anywhere else.

“I am really proud of you,” he said, and she brightened.

And that was when the room quieted, and he realized everybody was staring at him. They'd noticed he'd joined them. He swallowed. His muscles stiffened, and he couldn't help but sink in his chair. Under scrutiny, he found it a lot harder to smile, but he made himself do it. He smiled over Meredith's head, and he squeezed her shoulder. He wasn't sure if he was reassuring her, or reassuring himself.

“Hi, everyone,” he said, barely, to the huge crowd.

“Sibling spat resolved?” John said with a playful grin. He and Kathy sat across the room on the piano bench like a pair of birds on a wire. Rachel made a face. “It wasn't a spat.”

“A misunderstanding,” Derek added kindly.

Mark elbowed Meredith, and she twitched in Derek's arms. “Bets on the first real fight?” Mark said.

“The first?” Meredith said as she pulled away and sat up. She looked wildly at Derek. “As in there are multiples?”

“They're not fight fights,” he assured her.

Mark shrugged. “Well, it is Thanksgiving.”

“But they're not real fights,” Derek interjected. “Don't give her ideas.” He looked at Meredith. “They're mild disagreements.”

“Like what?” Meredith said.

Mark's eyes gleamed. “Ask who likes Mayor Bloomberg and see.”

“Let's not do politics right, now, okay?” Derek said. “I already have a headache.”

Mark folded his arms. “Fine,” he said. And then he grinned. “Ask who likes Star Wars.”

“You wouldn't,” Derek said.

“Didn't you miss this?” Mark said, but before Derek could answer, Amelia was there right in front of him.

He flinched. He couldn't help it. But he collected himself quickly, and he accepted her apologetic look, giving her a wink in return. She dropped to her haunches, crouching so she was eyelevel with him.

“Hey,” she said, leaning close to whisper against his ear, giving him a little privacy from Abby. “How are you doing?”

“I've been better,” he said. And then he gave her a tiny grin. “I've also been much worse.”

Amy nodded with understanding. “I know that feeling.”

“Thanks for...” He swallowed. “Thanks for all the phone calls.”

“Any time,” she told him. She made a sweeping gesture toward the noisy room. “Have you told them?”

“No,” he said.

“Okay,” she replied, and she pantomimed a zipper closing over her lips. He blinked, momentarily dumbfounded to see such a profound remnant of his father in the room with them, but she'd moved away to talk to Mom before he could say anything.

That was when a small body plowed into him like a wrecking ball, and Derek flinched again. Just a little. His heart sped up and then slowed down. The constant adrenaline baths were making him ache even more than he'd been aching that morning, but he steadied himself, and he managed to stuff his nerves away in a box before he reacted too badly. He looked down to see his newest nephew staring up at him with big blue eyes and wisps of explosive, curly black hair just like Rachel's. Cody held a little matchbox truck in one hand, and a car in the other, and it was clear from his “oops” expression that he'd gotten carried away.

For a moment, Derek was stunned. The tiny baby with the bright smile he'd held in his arms, only weeks before he'd left Manhattan, had gotten really big. He'd seen lots of pictures, but seeing Cody in the flesh was profoundly different. He'd watched Cody being born. Cody had been seven weeks premature, a tiny ball of wrinkles and skin and scrunched up eyes, and his entire hand hadn't been much bigger than Derek's thumbnail. He seemed to be catching up to the growth curve, finally.

“Hi, Cody,” Derek said, leaning forward.

Cody didn't seem to know what to do about this big person who knew his name, and Derek's heart twinged a little. He'd been away too long. He was the awesome uncle. For the kids who still recognized him, like Abby, he supposed. The youngest Shepherds in the crowd, like Cody and Morgan, who were here, and Mary, who was in Houston with Nancy, probably wouldn't know him as anything more than a complete stranger.

Derek held out his hand and smiled. “I'm your Uncle Derek. Do you remember me?” he said, the words gentle.

Cody didn't say anything. Didn't take Derek's hand. He stared like he'd been caught with a cookie he wasn't supposed to have. Derek could sympathize.

“I get a little nervous around new people, too,” he said.

Rachel, who'd been watching the exchange, slipped down from her chair, crawled across the bright, oriental rug, and scooted up beside her son. She rubbed Cody's shoulder.

“Cody, this is your Uncle Derek,” she said, her voice injected with cheer. “He was there when you were born. I bet you don't remember that.”

Cody shook his head, and he hid behind Rachel.

“Hi, Cody!” Derek said, and he winked at his nephew.

Cody stayed mostly hidden behind Rachel. He gripped her leg and put his cheek against her shirt. But he smiled, and Derek saw a fantastic collection of little baby teeth that hadn't been there before.

“The last time I saw you, you fit in my arms,” Derek said. Cody had been almost one when Derek had left for Seattle. “Do you remember that?”

Cody shook his head.

“I don't think you could fit anymore,” Derek said. “You look like you could be ten.”

Cody grinned, and he held up four tiny fingers.
“Four, now. Wow!” Derek said with an appropriate level of amazement. He glanced at Meredith and grinned. She looked... hesitant. Like she couldn't figure out how to enter the conversation, but she wanted to give it a try. Families scared her, but Cody was a tiny person. A lot less threatening. Her hand rested on her belly, and his throat filled up, not with bad nerves for once, but yet another astonished I'm-going-to-be-a-dad-soon thought, followed by the heart-constricting additional thought, with Meredith. He would be a dad soon with Meredith. He coughed a little to clear his throat, and wrapped his arm over Meredith's shoulder as he turned back to his young nephew. “Have you met your Aunt Meredith, yet?”

Cody shook his head. He seemed more intent on jamming his cheek into Rachel's shirt than talking to these strange adults.

Meredith grinned. “Hi, there. I'm Meredith. What's your name?”

Rachel gave Cody a little push. “Cody, say hello,” she said.

“Hello,” he said reluctantly, and Derek blinked. He remembered that voice, though when he'd left, Cody had only known a few single syllable words like ma and da.

Meredith held out her hand. “It's really nice to meet you, Cody,” she said, but Cody seemed too shy to shake on it.

“What do you have a game you like to play?” Derek said, trying to draw Cody out a little.

When Cody didn't answer, Rachel did for him. “He likes to play Candy Land,” she offered helpfully.

“Do you have a game you like to play?” Derek said, trying to draw Cody out a little.

When Cody didn't answer, Rachel did for him. “He likes to play Candy Land,” she offered helpfully.

“Do you have a game you like to play?” Derek said. And then he tossed his bait. “Do you want to play Candy Land for a few minutes? I think your grandma has that in the library.”

Cody's eyes lit up. Victory. Derek grinned. There was a reason he was the awesome uncle. And this would be both a great way to reintroduce himself in a less crowded setting, and a great way to help Meredith get her feet wet with the whole not-a-horrible-aunt thing.

“I can play, too?” said a small voice, and Derek looked to the right, surprised, but not overwhelmingly so. Morgan, Kathy's youngest, a year older than Cody, stood there, too. Her thumb was stuck in her mouth. She wore a little teal-colored dress and a tiny pair of patent black Mary Jane shoes. She'd inherited the same dirty blond hair from her father that Abby had, and her big security blanket dragged behind her in a fuzzy pile.

Derek beamed at her. Double victory. And he hadn't even been trying.

“I think that would be very fun,” he said. He squeezed Meredith's shoulder. “I have to warn you, though, your aunt is a card shark.”

Cody giggled.

“You think I'm kidding,” he said.

“What's a card shark?” Morgan asked.

“Derek, we've never played cards,” Meredith said, eyes twinkling.

“No,” he said, and he kissed her, “but you're great at stealing hearts.”
The whole room collectively groaned, and he chuckled when he caught Rachel's grimace as he pulled away.

“Okay, definitely still the same Derek,” Rachel said, rolling her eyes as he stood up.

“See?” he said. He grinned at the room, nerves momentarily forgotten, and then he went to play Candy Land with his wife, niece, and nephew.

Sometimes, being pregnant involved Meredith thinking she was a fat blimp whale. Sometimes, being pregnant made her want to cry at random intervals about things Normal Meredith wouldn't have been caught dead shedding a freaking tear over. Sometimes, being pregnant made her think porny pornstar things in what should have been sexless situations. She hadn't run into a moment where all three sometimes things happened concurrently. Until now, when the cornucopia of pregnancy-related what-the-hell-is-wrong-with-my-brain coalesced, she'd been blessed with singular bouts of weirdness.

In fact, Meredith decided, today, her head felt like a mix tape made by a drunk guy, and she kind of wanted to strangle whoever had invented hormones.

Kathy deposited a white box—a board game of some sort—in the center of the long oak table, which shone under the glow of the chandelier. She sat down with a gleam in her eye. Nobody at the table looked surprised by this development. In fact, everybody but Carolyn, who'd begged off this affair and retreated into the library for some post-dinner Grandma time with the younger kids, was sitting in a ring around the dining room table, and everybody at the table except for Derek sat with salivary looks on their faces. Kind of like a football team getting ready to go out on the field or something.

Taboo, the box said in bright gold lettering, and there was a smirking stick-figure face on the front, but that didn't help Meredith determine what sort of twisted Shepherd family ritual she was getting sucked into. She glanced at Derek, hoping for a clue, but he gave her nothing. Derek stared at the box with a singular intensity that told her he was exhausted and running on fumes, like if he didn't stare at the box, he might collapse. Pickles, pickles, pickles, she could almost hear him reciting to himself.

“What's Taboo?” Meredith said.

She'd made it through the afternoon. Through a drama free, almost pleasant dinner. Derek was still in one piece, she hadn't made a horrible faux pas that she was aware of, because with immense effort, her porny pornstar/blimp whale/sentimental mush thoughts had all stayed in her head, and the only wrong thing that had happened since Rachel and Derek had made nice was that the turkey, or whatever, wasn't sitting well in her already too full stomach. Of course now would be the look-dumb-learning-a-game-you-haven't-played-before curve ball. After all, why not now?

“You haven't played it before?” Rachel, who sat on Meredith's left, said gently.

Meredith clenched her fists. “Nope.”

Only child. Neglectful mom. Surely, Derek had given them the freaky-Meredith rundown?

But Rachel didn't go in a piteous I'm-sorry-for-your-pathetic-family direction, nor did she snark about it, instead. “No party games in college?” Rachel said, her tone only curious, not demeaning. “We played strip Taboo at mine.”
“Strip Taboo?” Mark said. “How does that even work?” And then he grinned lecherously. “I'd like to know more.”

“I'm pretty sure you can make any game into a stripping game,” Derek, who sat to her right, interjected.

Meredith glanced at him. “Seriously?” she said.

“Oh, yes,” Derek said. He dipped his head low and kissed her temple. There was a heaviness and a sluggishness to his demeanor despite his playfulness. Even so, he added with a throaty purr against her ear, “Why, is that a challenge?”

An eight letter word for sex? phantom Derek asked huskily from the dinner table in her head. A crossword puzzle lay beside him on a rumpled place mat.

Oh! Oh, she said, excited. How about copulate?

Wow, he said with a sly smile. You got that fast.

He slipped off his shirt.

Wait, so we strip for correct answers in this game? she said.

His eyelids dipped as he nodded. Mmm. Wrong ones, too.

We're going to be naked really fast.

He grinned. That's the idea.

Meredith couldn't stop the laugh that breached her careful wall, but she managed to choke it back into silence before it became more than a weird cough. She glanced at everybody. Having inappropriate discussions about stripping games at the Thanksgiving dinner table was probably not a sound plan for making good impressions. Imagining Derek getting naked on the Thanksgiving dinner table probably wasn't much better. Except nobody seemed fazed in the slightest, not the husbands, not Kathy, not Rachel. Like naughty speech was normal, and nobody had even noticed her naughty thoughts.

Well, nobody but Derek. Meredith glanced at Derek, who stared back at her through his thick eyelashes with a sly smile. He'd followed her naughty thought train all the way to hoo-hoo station. He was tired. A sliver away from hitting his limits. But, while not necessarily relaxed, not stressed, either. His visible jitters had waned. He seemed happy. Like he was enjoying himself. Being himself.

And being himself meant porny, flirty, smirky, and reading her freaking mind.

She supposed between him and the even more blatant lechery of Mark, Derek's family, or at least his siblings, given that his mother wasn't in the room, had gotten used to the liberal use of innuendo.

“Strip punch-buggies?” Derek suggested, and she laughed again, unfettered, guiltless.

“We'd get pulled over for public indecency again,” she countered.

Rachel snickered. “Again? Do we want to know?”

“Probably not,” Derek said, and everybody laughed.
Meredith leaned against Derek, and his warm arms wrapped around her. The protective bubble he offered was addictive, and yet, feeling less and less necessary as she let the last bits of Paranoid Meredith flutter away. She came from a crappy family, she didn't know how to play Taboo, and her husband was a porny, porny letch. His family didn't seem to care about any of that very much. They were actually sort of nice.

“My knowledge ends at beer pong,” she said, emboldened.

“We should totally do that one year,” Mark said.

“Shepherd family beer pong,” Derek said, his tone faux-nostalgic. He smirked, though he paused to rub his eyes. He was getting tired, and post-Thanksgiving meal coma probably wasn't helping. “I'm sure the kids would love it.”

“Oh, can we?” one of Derek's nieces said, perking up. “Can we?” Teenager. Slender. Short like Kathy. Dirty-blonde hair like John's and Abby's. Chloe, Meredith thought. Maybe. Meredith's mind blanked on the name, though, and all the pretty flashcards Derek had made for her slipped out of her memory. Worry clenched her heart in a flash and then released just as fast. His family was sort of nice, and she'd started believing Derek's repeated assertions that they wouldn't bite, even if she did get a name wrong here and there.

“Chloe...” John said, and Meredith resisted the urge to pump her fist. Chloe. She'd remembered. Point for Meredith, the potentially non-sucky aunt.

“Party-hearty girl, huh?” Rachel said.

For a moment, Meredith was too focused on her victory to realize she'd been asked a question. “Used to be,” she said. Then she glanced at Derek. Rubbed her rebelling stomach. Smiled. “But I grew out of it.”

Rachel fluffed her green hair and smiled. “Maybe, you can give me pointers. I'm still stuck in the party.”

Not an unfair assessment, Meredith decided wryly. Rachel was brash. Hot-tempered. Judgmental. Like Nancy, though a lot quicker to tame. Meredith had no idea how the woman even practiced medicine, since most patients would take one look at green hair, cry about professionalism, and walk out to find somebody who at least gave the appearance of not treating the hospital like it was a frat party. But Meredith kept her mouth shut. Family politics. She was learning. Learning, and... not completely sucking at this whole family thing.

“It's true,” Derek said, smirking like a cat still toying with the canary. “We keep hoping she'll grow up, but we've had no luck.”

“Hey,” Rachel protested.

“She is socially degenerate” Mark interjected, eyes glinting.

“Hey!” Rachel said, blushing, but she smiled. “Pot meet kettle, Mark!”

“I think that makes me more qualified to judge,” Mark countered. “Don't you?”

“Touché,” Rachel admitted. Her tone slipped into something more serious. “And I am sorry. For earlier.” She tilted her head and glanced affectionately at Derek. “You're visiting home for the first time in years. You've brought Meredith to really, finally meet us. And somehow, I made it all about me, me, me, and that's not fair to you.” She looked at Meredith. “Or to you.” She sighed, and she pulled her fingers through her curly hair in a motion reminiscent of Derek when he was upset. “I’m not good with people.”

Derek smirked. “She’s really not.”

“Not even remotely,” Amelia added.

Kathy grinned. “I like to call her my case study in narcissism.”

Which, again, made Meredith wonder how in the hell the woman functioned as any kind of doctor. Doctors had to talk to people all the time. People they didn’t like. People they didn’t agree with. People with big problems. People with little problems. All freaking sorts of people. Maybe, she’d gone into medical research or something, instead of clinical work?

Derek leaned close to Meredith and murmured, “Think Cristina on the people-inept scale, but a lot lower on the human cactus scale.”

Meredith snorted at the comparison.

Rachel blushed to the shade of a poinsettia. “Okay, you guys. You’ve gotten your licks in. I won’t even retort.”

Maybe it was harsh to wonder how the woman functioned as a doctor, Meredith decided. Cristina functioned well as one, even if she didn’t do the people side of things that well.

Steve stood, breaking the congenial silence that followed with the squawk of his chair sliding across the hard wood flooring. He smiled brightly at everybody, and said, “Anybody want a beer before we start the game?” Silence stretched for a moment, as if it took everyone a moment to readjust to the old trajectory of the evening. Taboo. Getting ready to play.

“I’ll pass,” Derek said nonchalantly.

“Sure,” Mark said.

“You know none for me,” Amelia said.

John nodded. “One here.”

“Pregnant,” Meredith said.

“Could I?” Chloe said hopefully.

“You two can have a sip of mine,” Kathy said reasonably, “and if you don’t choke in disgust, then we’ll talk.” To which Abby and Chloe gave each other a high five.

“I’ll take one,” said Rachel.

“This game is always better with beer,” Kathy said, and Rachel nodded in agreement. They shared a giggle in tandem and looked to Derek. “Remember last time?”

All the divided attention at the table came to bear on Derek, who grinned. Nervously. Why nervously? Meredith bit her lip, unsure where this was going.

Rachel hooted with laughter, and Meredith felt Derek tense. “I still can’t believe how many dirty word associations he can come up with.”

“It’s a talent,” Derek quipped, smiling weakly.

“A dirty talent,” Meredith grumbled.

Steve's gaze fell on Derek. “I got your favorite blonde, Der. Bought a case from the local brewery for you. Are you sure?”

“Meredith's my favorite blonde,” Derek joked in response, but the joke was half-hearted at best.

“Cute,” said Steve with a snort.

And then Meredith realized what all Derek's subtle broadcasting meant. From the cornered, helpless, tired expression on his face, he had been hoping to slip under the radar instead of having to come up with an actual excuse to beg off of a drink. Derek was—had been—a very social drinker. He was a bit of a whisky connoisseur, but he loved beer, too. That, combined with the fact that his family really seemed to want to make him comfortable for this visit, created a problem.

“I'm sure,” Derek managed to add. “No, thanks.”

“You know,” Kathy said. “I think Mom has some Glenlivet in the liquor cabinet if you'd rather have that.”

Derek shifted uncomfortably in his seat. “I don't want scotch, either.”

Meredith still had no idea whether he planned to tell them about his drug problem this weekend. She thought he might have decided to leave it off the table for now, to let his sisters digest the PTSD first. Either way, he clearly didn't intend to make it a conversational topic right now.

“He won't drink anything.” Meredith said. “It's for me. Solidarity or whatever.”

Derek glanced at her, his expression momentarily flummoxed by her sudden lifeline. And then his gaze slipped into something warmer as his whole body relaxed. Thank you, his eyes seemed to say with relief, and he sighed like he'd just dodged an inquisition. Maybe, he had.

She kissed him. You're welcome.

“Wow,” Kathy said. “How many points does Derek get for that?”

“Lots,” Meredith said. She winked at Derek. “Mountains. It's a point-palooza.”

“Gold stars?” he murmured against her ear.

“Mmm,” she said, imitating his familiar purr, “Yes. A bunch.”

“Man, I wish I'd thought of that when Kathy was pregnant,” John said.

Companionable, quiet conversation filled the dining room as Steve left to grab the libations. The giggles and shrieks coming from the library expanded in the air, and Meredith thought she heard, “My turn, my turn!” from one of the littler kids. Derek didn't seem to be doing so badly with all the random noise anymore. His family had gotten conscientious about moving quickly in his vicinity or shoving things in his face or touching him unexpectedly, once they'd gotten a crash course in what he needed to feel comfortable. Thank you, he thought with relief. And the shrieking barely seemed to faze him. He was just... running out of steam.
She relaxed against him and looked up at the slope of his jaw, at the crook where his jaw became his neck. “Doing okay?” she said.

“Mmm,” he said quietly. “I'll need a break soon, but not now. I'm...” He swallowed. “I've really missed this. How about you?”

The turkey did weird things in Meredith's stomach again, and she shifted uncomfortably. She scrunched her nose. “Too much turkey. I don't think I have room for a bowling ball and a turkey in here.” And she had no idea how, even after the family had taken a break for games, she was going to manage consuming any pie later.

Derek gave her a concerned look. “You're not feeling nauseous, though?” he said, and then he splayed his palm against her belly and rubbed her in a slow, soothing circle.

She sighed. “No. Just really, really full.”

Which she thought might be worse. At least when she puked, she puked, and then it was over. She moved uncomfortably. Bubbles. That was the only way she could describe it. She was overly full, and there were bubbles moving around somewhere in the overly full, which she knew she could have avoided if she'd exercised some freaking dietary restraint, but... she'd never had the home-cooked-by-Mom Thanksgiving experience before, and it'd been delicious. And... really nice.

At which point Sentimental Meredith reared her head, and Meredith's eyes watered. Just a little. Not enough for anyone to notice. Well, except for Derek. Derek frowned at her, but she shook her head at him. She drew the line at naked phantom-Derek lying on the table. She was not going to cry over tasty Mom-turkey and having a sort of nice family. That was ridiculous. She wiped her eyes.

“I'm fine. It's just... everything was so good!” she whined.

He snickered tiredly. “Mon petit trou noir found her limits.”

She frowned. “What's that mean?”

“Oh,” he said, eyes gleaming, “nothing.”

“He called you a black hole,” Rachel interjected.

Meredith glowered. “Hey!”

“Just a little black hole,” he said cheerfully.

Steve returned with a clinking bundle of unopened beer bottles. He set them all on the table next to the Taboo box, and everybody reached for theirs. Looking at beer bottles just made her think of more bubbles, though, and she bit her lip. This was such a crap night to have stomach issues.

“I am not a black hole,” she asserted.

“You're a very cute black hole, at least,” Derek amended, and she glowered, which only seemed to delight him. She elbowed him in the ribs, and he feigned hurt with a cheerful, “Ow.”

“So...” Derek said as he rubbed his side, smirking. “Taboo before I get the stuffing knocked out of me?”

Everyone groaned at his joke. “Right, well, don't worry; it's very easy,” Rachel said, turning to Meredith. “Do you know charades?”

“Sort of,” Meredith said.

“It's like that, but without gestures, just words,” Rachel explained. “We ignore some of the rules for the sake of simplicity. Essentially, we divide into two teams. Whoever's up gets a stack of cards. They need to get their team to guess the words on the cards without saying any part or variation or rhyme of the words, or any of the other five taboo words listed on each card. You get more points the more cards you can get your team to guess. You get a total of sixty seconds each round.”

Meredith frowned. She should have known when she'd fallen for a serial crossword puzzle cheater that she would be marrying into a family of competitive word gamers.

“Okay...” Meredith said. Maybe, she could sit this one out and just watch.

“It'll make total sense once you've seen it,” Rachel said. “So, how are we divvying the teams?”

“Captains pick?” John said.

“Names out of a hat?” Kathy said.

Derek flashed everybody a brilliant grin. “How about Team Neuro versus?”

“Am I included on Team Neuro?” Meredith said, worried.

“No,” Mark said to Derek, ignoring Meredith. “No way.”

Derek frowned. “Why not?”

“Yeah,” Amelia said, folding her arms over her chest. “What's wrong with Team Neuro?” Her chair creaked as she leaned forward.

“Because Meredith is neuro, so you'd have her, and you guys are weirdly psychic,” Mark said. “Being weirdly psychic is an unfair advantage.”

“I could just sit this one out,” Meredith offered.

“You can't,” Derek said. “Who else knows a six letter word for pinnacle without cheating?”

“Oh, come on, they can't be that good,” Rachel said with a dismissive wave of her hand. “And Steve and I on the same team would balance them out.”

“You and Steve are not weirdly psychic,” Mark said.

“We're married!” Rachel countered.

“There's married psychic, and then there's weirdly psychic,” Mark said. “Trust me. You're not like them.”

“That sounds like a bet,” Steve said, eyes gleaming.

Mark shook his head. “It's not a bet,” he said. “It's self-preservation.” Mark jabbed his thumb at Derek. “I have to work with him.”

“I won't rub it in when we win,” Derek offered.
Mark snorted. “Yes, you will.”

“I promise not to rub it in!” Derek said.

John raised his eyebrows. “Confident, aren't you?”

“Of course,” Derek said. He kissed Meredith's temple. “We're weirdly psychic.”

Meredith glanced wildly at the table. Everybody was looking at her like she was a flopping, bloody, busted fish wriggling around in the dirt, just waiting to be killed. Another thing she’d never grown up with was sibling rivalry, and the fleetness of feet on which it arrived. In her and Derek’s ongoing game of truth, where they traded stories about their earlier lives, Derek had told her lots of stories about his childhood. Stories that seemed fantastical to her, the family dynamics were so foreign to her, including one particular instance where he'd somehow, at the tender age of eight, ended up in a dress, high heels, and a sunhat, egged on by a triplet of jeering older sisters.

She glanced at her husband. This argument about teams seemed to have lit a spark. He didn't look so tired anymore. More determined. A competitive gleam had burgeoned in his gaze, flaring bright where before, there'd been only dying embers that spoke of weariness. She liked to see him happy again, but...

“Derek...” Meredith said.

He gave her an innocent look. “What?”

“Hi, pressure,” she said. “I'm Meredith. I don't even know how to play.”

“Hi, Meredith,” he said. He took her hand and shook it heartily. “Very nice to meet you.”

She rolled her eyes. “Oh, shut up.”

Which only made him snicker. “You love me.”

She nodded. “I do,” she said, “but you're suddenly being a competitive jerk.”

A flash of worry hit her as soon as the words had left her mouth that his family might not take very kindly to her insulting him in front of them. A brief glance around the room declared her in the clear. Rachel appeared to be just shy of buying pom poms for the occasion, and Kathy had an indescribable look of glee on her face.

“I prefer to think of it as encouraging jerk,” he said, either oblivious to or in defiance of his sisters' mirth.

She frowned at him.

“Charming jerk?” he tried.

“How exactly charming,” she said.

“I think you might be lying,” he said. “I'm very charming and very encouraging.”

“And kind of a jerk,” she said.

“But a lovable one, yes?” he said.

She kept her mouth clamped shut. She refused to let him win.
He leaned in close. Inhaled the scent of her hair. His warm breath touched her skin. He kissed her. “You'll be a champ. Trust me, okay?” he said against her ear, in that soft, definitive, everything-is-fine tone that made him almost impossible not to believe.

“But what if I'm toxic, like a Typhoid Mary or something, and my team goes down in flames because I don't know the rules, yet?” she protested weakly.

“Weirdly psychic, remember?” he said in return. He gave her a playful, confident fist bump that made her heart flutter. “And as sweet as it is that you want to sabotage the team I'm not on... we've got this in the bag.” He leaned forward and pulled the Taboo box toward himself. As his final sell, he gave her one of his dreamy please looks that was hard, if not impossible, to say no to, regardless, and then he said, “We'll do a practice round; just you and me. It's easy. You'll pick it up really fast.” And you'll rock it, he added wordlessly.

She stared back at him. He'd been beyond supportive today. He'd let her hide behind him whenever she'd needed it. She'd spent most of the night observing more than participating, staying in her comfort zone. He knew how much she didn't want to make an idiot of herself. Why was he doing this to her, now?

“Oh, play, Meredith,” Kathy said with a welcoming grin. She took a sip from her beer. “You won't be any worse at it than Mark.”

“Yeah,” Mark said. “I suck, and they always let me play. Though, I still protest Team Neuro, unless I can be on it to ride your coattails to success.”

“You can't be on Team Neuro,” said Derek. “You're not neuro.”

“I don't know,” Rachel said. “Are you sure you guys don't want him?”

“Yes,” said Derek, Amelia, and Kathy in tandem.

“You guys should get a handicap,” Steve said.

“Why?” Amelia said.

Steve shrugged. “I think taking Mark should start us with five points.”

“Hey!” said Mark.

“Two points,” Derek countered.

“Four,” Steve said.

“Three,” Derek said, “and that's my final offer.”

“Done!” Steve replied.

“We're still going to win,” Derek said, and then he looked at Meredith with a pouting pleasepleasepleaseexpression that made her roll her eyes. “Right?”

Meredith sighed. She wasn't going to win. Everybody was staring. “Fine.”

Derek winked. The cardboard box moaned as its sides slid against each other when Derek opened it. He rummaged through the contents and pulled out a large stack of cards, which he then shuffled. From the larger stack, he pulled off a small set of cards, and from that small set, he grabbed the top card. He ignored the sand timer and everything else.
“Dr. Bailey is this type of surgeon,” he said.

She blinked. Well, that wasn’t that hard. “General,” she replied.

He grinned and placed the card face up on the table. The word general was listed at the top, followed by army, rank, star, Tso, and hospital, the five words he wasn’t allowed to say.

“See?” he said. “That wasn’t so bad.”

“You started easy,” she said.

He shrugged. “This is the whole game. You saw me shuffle.”

Which, well, he had a point.

“Both a compression bandage and one of five items necessary for a royal flush in poker,” he said.

Compression... elastic... Ten, jack, queen, king, “Um... ace?” Meredith said.

Derek grinned, and he put the card down so she could see it. Ace was the top word, followed by the taboo words: highest, card, tennis, serve, flying. She stared at it. Another easy one. Maybe, Derek was right, and they were all easy.

Maybe.

The chair beside Meredith squawked as Rachel stood, beer bottle clasped in her hands. She clapped, and her sparkly diamond wedding ring hit the butterscotch-colored glass. “Go Meredith!” she shouted. “Woo, woo, woo!” Like she was at a Seahawks game or something. “See, you got this.”

Mark sighed. “You’re cheering on the enemy!”

“We didn’t decide Team Neuro for sure, yet!” Rachel said.

“We agreed on a handicap,” Steve said.

“Well, what would that make the leftovers, anyway?” Rachel said.

“A plastic surgeon, a forensic pathologist, a stockbroker, a high school student, and a painter,” John said with a wry grin. He took a swig of his beer. “Sounds like a punchline.”

“Oh, that’s good,” said John.

Derek grinned at them. “Congratulations,” he said.

“What?” Rachel said.

“You guys are now officially more cheesy than me.”

“I think we have a long way to go before that happens, Der,” Steve replied.

“That sounds like a bet,” Derek said, eyes gleaming.

Derek laughed, rich and boisterous, and the sound of it made Meredith shiver. His sister had slammed the table so hard it shook, and Derek had laughed, not flinched. Meredith looked at him, amazed. This rivalry stuff seemed to have invigorated him, and he'd finally, truly relaxed. Or, well, maybe not relaxed, she decided, looking at the competitive gleam in his expression, his buzzing-with-excitement demeanor, but... he'd fixated on something that didn't involve being afraid. On purpose or accidental, he didn't even seem to realize what he'd just accomplished.

“Charlatan without a medical degree,” Derek said as he read from the next card.

Meredith frowned. “Fraud?”

He shook his head.

“Phony?” she said.

Derek shook his head again.

For a moment, her mind was blank. She couldn't get herself to think of anything except the fact that Derek had just laughed happily at a startling noise. She kind of wanted to hop out of her chair. Dance. Or hug him. Anything. Sentimental Meredith made her eyes water, but she wiped away the evidence.

“Also the noise made by a type of water fowl, such as a mallard,” Derek prodded, oblivious for once.

“Um.” She shook her head, getting herself back in gear. Later. Later, she could mention what he'd done. Mallard. Like a duck? Duck. Noise made by a duck. Charlatan... “Um, quack!”

With a sly grin, Derek placed the card on the table. The word was indeed quack. He picked up the next card.

“You drive a green one of these,” he said.

“Oh! Jeep!”

Another grin. Another card on the table.

“Meredith’s last name,” Derek said as he read the next card in the thinning stack.

“Grey!” Meredith replied.

Derek put the card down on the table. Gray was the word at the top, and it was followed by white, black, area, matter, and old.

“My last name isn't spelled like that,” she said.

“Doesn’t matter,” Derek said. “As long as you get the phonetic equivalent.”

“Huh, okay,” she said.

He flipped to the next card. “Meredith’s favorite black shoes,” he said.

“Converse!”

“No—”
“Chucks!” she corrected herself before he could add another clue. “It’s chucks!”

“Singular,” he prodded.

“Chuck!” Meredith said, and she bounced. In her seat. Bounced when he grinned. This was actually sort of fun. Derek was grinning at her infectiously. And she was bouncing, and there was shouting, and he didn’t seem to mind a bit, and that was just...

“High as a—”

“Oh! Oh, kite!” she said.

The next card with the word kite, followed by fly, wind, string, tail, and Charlie Brown, fell to the table.

“Contrary to what Meredith said that night on the cliff, she’s definitely not a stupid, lame ass—”

“Loser!” she exclaimed.

The next card fell to the table. Loser. Uncool, unpopular, unsuccessful, winner, two-time.

“Mmm,” Derek purred. “Smells like lavender.”

“Conditioner,” she said.

Derek shook his head. “You put it on before that.”

“Lotion. Soap. Shampoo!”

The card listed shampoo at the top, followed by wash, hair, suds, conditioner, and rinse.

“If, along with sharing the last piece of cheesecake, and pretending to like my taste in music, you were to actually hold a radio over your head outside my trailer, you’d be doing what?” Derek said.

“S... serenading.”

He nodded, but prodded her for a correction with, “Present simple tense.”

“Serenade,” she said.

The card fell to the table. Serenade was the word, followed by sing, outside, window, boom box, and Lloyd Dobler.

He read the next card. “I wrap my presents with paper and surgical—”

The entire table around her said in cheerful chorus, “Tape!”

Scotch, sticky, masking, duct, and red were the taboo words for that one.

Derek read the next card and grinned slyly. “Having sex with a virgin is called popping a blank.”

“Cherry!” Meredith said without hesitation to the relative silence of the table. “Wait. What? Seriously? Is that allowed in a family game?”

Everybody laughed as Derek threw the last card in the stack onto the table. Cherry was the word. The taboo clues were red, fruit, blossom, pie, and Washington. She supposed the game creators hadn’t really thought anyone would go the virgin route as a clue.
“Told you Derek gets raunchy in these,” Kathy said.

Derek kissed Meredith. “You okay?” he said.

Feeling less typhoid-y,” she replied. “That was sort of fun.”

His lips curled into a relaxed grin. “Good,” he said. “I knew you'd rock it.”

“This is how Team Neuro starts,” Mark said. “Then they start talking to each other with just their eyeballs, and it's even more disturbing.”

“Relax,” Rachel said. “This wasn't even timed.”

Mark threw up his hands in defeat. “Okay. Don't say I didn't warn you.”

Derek winked at Meredith. “So, Team Neuro versus?”

John nodded. “Team Neuro versus Punchline Posse. Let the games begin.”

Meredith watched, mystified, as everybody got up from the table and started trading seats like they were at a swap meet. John, Steve, Mark, Chloe, and Rachel sat together. Team Neuro, which apparently included Kathy in addition to Meredith, Abby, Amelia, and Derek, coalesced surrounding Meredith and Derek on either side. Beer bottles clinked and upholstery rustled as everybody re-settled.

Steve shuffled the card stacks still in the box, and John took out the sand timer and placed it mid-table.

Meredith stared, open-mouthed, as Derek stood, leaned forward, and met eyes with Steve. The two of them looked at each other, unblinking, grave, for a long march of seconds. Then, they whipped out their hands and snapped in unison, “Rock, paper, scissors, go!” while bobbing their fists with each syllable.

Derek held his palm flat on the downswing, signaling paper. Steve made what looked like a peace sign sideways, the symbol for scissors.

“Hmm, best two out of three?” Derek said.

Steve smirked. “You wish.”

Derek collapsed into his chair in a disappointed heap. He looked at Meredith. “They go first.”

“I... uh...” Meredith began, trying to hold her laughter at bay, not quite successfully, “So, I gathered.”

“What's so funny?” he said.

“You,” she said. “I had no idea you took your Taboo so seriously.”

“He takes anything that involves winning seriously,” Rachel chirped.

“You should see him when we play capture the flag,” Kathy added. “He's like a drill sergeant when it comes to jail raids.”

“Only because when I lose, I have to deal with you people talking it up for eternity,” Derek replied, smirking. His voice cracked and slipped to falsetto, “Remember the time we kicked Derek's ass at Pictionary? Remember Charades? How about the Scrabble tournament of ’02?”

“Cute,” Kathy said.

Derek grinned in response, but didn't retort. In the quiet moments before the game where everybody settled in, he rubbed his nose with his thumb and index finger and sighed, deflating somewhat.

Meredith leaned close to him. “Are you sure you're okay?” she said.

“Really tired,” he whispered back at her. “I'll make it a few rounds.”

She brushed his forearm with her palm and squeezed it. “Okay,” she said.

“All right,” said Kathy as she shuffled the deck, dragging Meredith's attention back to the game at hand. “Here we go.” Kathy gave the card stack to John.

Derek pulled out a little notebook out of the box that, from the number of pages he flipped past, they'd been using for years. She recognized Derek's handwriting in quite a few of them. He seemed to have alternated with three or four other people with distinct styles of their own. When Derek found a new page in the book, about halfway through, he drew columns in it, and labeled them TN and TPP, and he put a three in the column for TPP.

“Ready?” Kathy said when Derek had finished, and John nodded. She reached for the sand timer and flipped it over. “Go!”

John scanned the first card wildly. “Phoenix rises from the?” he said.

“Grave,” Mark said.

“Death?” Rachel offered.

“Jean Gray?” Steve said.

John shook his head, visibly frustrated. “Cremation results in?” he said, offering another hint.

“Ashes,” Steve said.

John nodded and moved on to the next card. “Um... Two words,” he said. He clenched his teeth and made a face like he was struggling to come up with something. “My name. Um. Um. A note that ends— shit.”

He dropped the card and sighed. The card, which had Dear John at the top, was followed by letter, break up, end, romance, and ditch. Team Punchline Posse groaned collectively.

“Wait, what happened?” Meredith said.

“He said ends, which is a taboo word,” Derek said. And then his expression turned gleeful. “Which makes it our turn. Who wants to go first?”

“How about Meredith?” Rachel said from across the table.

Meredith's jaw dropped. “I...”

Derek turned to her and gave her a huge smile. “Yes,” he said. “How about Meredith?”
Meredith blinked.

“Do it,” said Kathy with a grin. “It's good for the soul.”

“Taboo is chicken soup, now?” Meredith said.

“Yep,” John said, pushing the stack of cards back across the table. “Eat up.”

Meredith stared woefully at the deck. Derek had convinced her she was decent at coming up with the answers, particularly when he was the one formulating the clues for her, but coming up with clues on her own for the entire team was an entirely different matter. “I take no responsibility if Team Neuro goes down in flames,” Meredith said.

Derek kissed her. “If we go down in flames, I take full responsibility. Clearly, it will be my failure at freakish marital telepathy.”

“Wow,” Amelia said, a teasing gleam in her eyes. “He's offering to take blame.”

Kathy giggled. “Quick! Somebody get a calendar to mark the day!”

He made a disgruntled face. “Hah. Hah.”

Meredith shook her head. If only they knew how much blame he really did take for himself. He was a guilt monger in his own head. Still... She bit her lip, staring at him. He really did seem to be going out of his way to both drag her kicking and screaming into the familial fold and protect her at the same time. Why now? she wanted to ask.

He met her eyes. Despite his outward demeanor of cheer, exhaustion gripped his expression.

He'd kept saying he needed a break soon. Now, she could almost correct him. He needed to take a break right now.

But he squeezed her shoulder. And he grinned at her. And he winked in that cocksure, classic, Derek way.

Maybe, he wanted to make sure she was comfortable doing more than hiding behind him or Mark before he slipped out, she thought. And then it all clicked. That was exactly what he was doing, that sneaky, sneaky man. He'd brought her to New York to be with his family on Thanksgiving. He didn't want to leave her to fend for herself in a situation he'd created unless she was okay with it.

She glanced at the table. Everybody was being nice. John had just flunked out in two cards, and nobody was ragging on him, other than good-natured teasing. She could do this.

“Just start the timer,” she said.

She grabbed the first card. Rachel let out a whoop and flipped the sand timer.

Meredith stared at the first set of words. Handcuffs was the word, and she couldn't say cop, lock, wrists, metal, or arrest. Amelia, Abby, Kathy, and Derek were all staring intently, waiting for her to say something. The problem with games like this, she realized immediately, was that they encouraged personal word associations, personal being the keyword, and today, her head was in a Porny Pregnant Place.

Handcuffs. Padded. In her sock drawer. In another life, before he'd been shot, he'd let her try... them on him, except he hadn't been able to stop laughing. But she couldn't say any of that.

_Pink? Really, Mere? So not you._

_They were out of black!_

Meredith coughed. “Um. A type of restraint.”

“Zip tie,” Amelia said.

“Rope!” Kathy said.

Oh, I guess I've been bad, he'd said, trying for a sexy purr, except he'd ended in hysterics, and the handcuffs had rattled as he'd suffered paroxysms.

Her tight leather bodice had squeaked as she'd looked down at him. _This isn't quite how I imagined it._

_I'm sorry,_ he'd gasped. _I can't do this without laughing._

_Honestly, I'd call it giggling, not laughing,_ she'd replied.

His eyebrows had shot up to his hairline. _I'm not giggling._

_I'm sitting on you in tight leather, and you're giggling._

The handcuffs had rattled as he'd tried to shift underneath her. _I have no complaints about the tight leather._

_Shut up,_ she'd replied.

He'd snorted with laughter again. _Yes, Mistress Meredith._

“Could be...” Meredith said. “Porny.”

“Ropes and zip ties aren't porny?” Derek said.

“They're all pretty porny,” Mark agreed.

“No cross-table talk!” Kathy scolded.

“Duct tape,” Abby said.

“A leash!” Amelia said.

“What kind of porny is a leash?” Abby said.

“What kind of porny is duct tape?” Kathy demanded.

Abby rolled her eyes. “Mom...”

Pink, Meredith thought. Pink, not black. Wait, she couldn't say that.

“Used by law enforcement,” Meredith offered instead.

“Handcuffs,” Derek said.
She glanced at Derek briefly, wondering if he'd thought of their brief flirtation with bondage. His face remained passive. Except then he winked at her.

“I do like pink,” he murmured, too low for the rest of the table to hear.

She laughed. At least, she was tied with John, now, and her porny handcuff thoughts could be squashed. She tossed the handcuffs card on the table for all to see and read the next one to herself. Stiff was the word, followed by rigid, hard, dead, body, and drink.

Of course, her mind would randomly wander to penis and refuse to leave, as if giggly handcuff sex wasn't enough. She glanced at Derek, unable to help herself. Her gaze wandered downward. Briefly. Damn it, damn it. She was thinking about Derek's penis. Worse, Derek and his stupid freakish psychicness followed her line of thought as well as her gaze, from the sudden leer on his face. He even shifted in his seat, giving her a nice view of the way his jeans cupped— that rat bastard.

She was thinking about Derek's penis.

In the middle of a family game. At Thanksgiving. Except, Derek had talked about popping cherries, so maybe...

Rachel tipped the sand timer to the side. “What is it?”

“Before I completely stick my foot in my mouth, exactly how porny is this game allowed to get?” Meredith said.

“I think if it can go in an R-rated movie, it's okay,” Kathy said. She glanced at Chloe. “We're all mostly adults, here.”

“Yeah,” Steve said, “and we get pretty raunchy sometimes, anyway.”

“So, like, Terminator is okay, but Naughty Nurses IV isn't?” Meredith said.

Rachel laughed. “I guess that's a good description.”

“I'm dying to know what word that is,” Derek said.

“Well, we know if it was in your head, it'd be part of a porny thought,” Amelia offered.

Derek laughed. “Any word can be part of a porny thought in my head. The key here is that it's porny in Meredith's head.”

“Okay, I'm ready,” Meredith said, ignoring him. “Um.” She glanced at the card one last time. And then at Derek. Who peered back at her lecherously. Oh, whatever. “Slang for... an erection.”

“Rod,” Kathy said.

“Member,” Amelia said.

“Oh!” Abby said, bouncing in her seat. “Throbbing manhood!”

“If only they'd made a card for throbbing manhood in this family game,” Mark said, deadpan.
“It could also be a corpse,” Meredith offered weakly.

“A penis or a corpse?” Derek replied with a laugh. Meredith scowled. “You're not helping, Mr. Porny Pants.”

Which only made him laugh harder.

“Bone?” Amelia said.

Derek leered. “Stiffy.”

“Shorten it,” Meredith said.

Derek snickered.

“Shorten the word, Derek,” Meredith said.

“Stiff,” he said.

Finally. She threw the card onto the table so everybody could see and picked up the next one, only to sigh. Maybe, she had a pregnant porny pornstar mind, but this was ridiculous. “Did one of you guys stack this deck to mess with me?”

“I shuffled it six times or so,” Kathy said.

“And I shuffled it before that,” Steve chimed in. “Why?”

Meredith glowered at the card. Sack it said, followed by bag, hold, potato, plunder, tackle, as words she couldn't say, but those restrictions didn't even begin to touch where her mind leaped to. Balls, her dirty hormonal mind said. Balls, balls, balls. Derek likes it when you pull them really gently. Having sex in the sack. So. Much. Dirty. Slang.

Worse, Derek caught her gaze drifting south again. He was hanging right today. Oh, god. Stop. Stop, she told herself. Thanksgiving. Why did there have to be porny taboo cards?

“Another word for scrotum,” she said.

“Balls,” Derek said, his tone in that lower register he often reserved for the bedroom, not that anybody at the table would have known that. He was definitely on the same wavelength as her. He shifted evilly in his chair.

“Gonads,” said Kathy.

Abby rolled her eyes. “This is so wrong that I'm playing this with my mother.”

Kathy laughed.

“Nuts!” Amelia said.

“Junk,” Derek said.

“Family Jewels?” Amelia said.

“How about sack?” Abby said.

“Got it,” Meredith said, and she put the card on the table.
“It's good you're learning important things in college,” Kathy replied, peering at Abby.

Meredith looked at the next card. Seriously? Lap was the word, followed by sit, top, computer, swim, and victory as words she couldn't say. At least with her brain doing dirty word associations, the taboo words didn't create a lot of obstacles.

_Don'tcha take no chances_, she remembered as she'd danced for him, and he'd stared back at her, smitten. _Keep your eye on top._

“Umm...” she said. “Blank dance.”

“Break dance?” Kathy said.

“Flash dance?” Amelia said.

“Porny blank dance,” Meredith clarified.

“Lap,” Derek answered in a heartbeat, and Meredith moved on to the next card.

The universe was setting her up. She was convinced at this point. “Porny,” she said. “Bump and blank.”

“Grind,” Derek said before anybody had a chance to think about it, and Meredith put that card on the table.

Next up, Meredith laughed. Finally, something not porny. Though it was a bit more challenging, since she couldn't say two, male, friends, man, or crush.

“Mark and Derek have this,” she said.

“Are we still on balls?” Derek offered.

Meredith snorted. “It's a platonic relationship between guys. Combines a word for guy siblings and a love affair.”

“Oh, oh, bromance,” Amelia said.

Derek made a face. “Really, people call Mark and me a bromance?”

“Brothers and romance, smashed together,” Rachel said, grinning. “I like it.”

Mark frowned. “I don't.”

Meredith read the next card and smiled. She looked at Derek. “Batman lives there.”

“Gotham,” Derek said without pause.

_By night, they call me The Batman_, he'd told her with a throaty growl.

_You are so freaking corny_, she'd replied.

The next card made her jaw drop, and the moments ticked away. There was no way all the porny stuff and this could be a coincidence. Except the only person with enough knowledge to organize the cards like this would be Derek. Except his sister and brother-in-law had both shuffled. She tried to think of any other times he'd handled the cards and came up blank.
“Okay, seriously, Derek, did you stack this deck?” she said.

“Hey,” he replied. “You saw Kathy shuffle. Maybe, it's fate.”

“Then fate is a dirty, dirty whore,” she grumbled.

He grinned. “Oh, is it?”

Meredith sighed. “You promised to eat one if I got the conception date of the baby correct.”

“A fluffernutter,” Derek said.

“Wait,” Mark said. “How does a fluffernutter make fate a dirty, dirty whore?”

“No reason,” Meredith said.

Derek nodded. “None at all.”

“The fluffernutter was consumed at the table,” Meredith added.

“We even had a place mat,” Derek said.

Meredith nodded. “Totally couth.”

“I'm not sure I want to know about this,” Kathy said. “Mark, you'll have to live in wonder.”

“Good plan,” Meredith said. She reached for the next card.

“Wait,” Rachel said, and everybody looked at her. “I just realized. We never flipped the timer back after the time out.”

“But I was on a roll!” Meredith said. She put the card back in the unread pile since she hadn't had a chance to look at it.

“I think that whole round should still count,” Derek said. He glanced at Meredith winked. I told you you would be good at this, said his smirky smirk.

“I was the time keeper; it's my fault,” Rachel said. “I was too busy laughing at balls.”

“That's fine,” John said. “We'll give them the points.” Derek nodded and scribbled Team Neuro's score of eight into the appropriate column. “Team Punchline Posse has some ground to catch up.”

Meredith shifted in her chair. Derek wrapped his arm over her shoulder. She leaned against him and whuffed a heavy breath. Despite the invasion of Porny Meredith, she'd kind of kicked ass. And she was kind of having fun. A lot of fun, phantom Derek corrected. Okay, a lot of fun, she amended with a schmoopy sentimental smile that made her want to punch something. And she was kind of... full. The air didn't quite fit in her lungs, and all her organs felt smooshed. And somewhere, despite the compression, the stupid bubbles found enough room to take another lap. It didn't even feel like gas, really. There wasn't any pain. It just felt... weird.

She let her eyelashes rest low over her eyes. The light of the overhead chandelier smeared into a white-gold blur. Derek was warm. And soft. She snuggled closer against his sweater as the other team chatter-boxed, trying to figure out who would be their next clue giver. TPP couldn't figure out which would hurt them more, having Mark guess, or Mark come up with clues. Which made her snort. Poor Mark.
Steve clapped, snapping time back into place at its regular pace. “Okay, guys, let's do this.”

The room jumbled as Derek flipped the timer for them, and her headrest moved as a result. Meredith wiped her eyes and sat up. Mark picked up the first card and stared at it impassively.

“Meredith is going to be one of these in less than five months,” Mark said.

“Mother,” Rachel said.

“Mom,” Steve said.

Mark shook his head. “Say it like a baby would.”

“Ma?” said John.

“Mommy?” Chloe said.

“Like John's but more syllables,” Mark said.

“Mama!” Rachel said, and then she grinned. “Meredith's going to be a mama!”

Mark nodded and tossed the card on the table. Meredith rubbed her belly and shifted in her chair.

Mark looked at the next card.

“Um...” he rumbled, considering, and then said, “pregnant women often compare themselves to this giant aquatic mammal.”

“Mark!” Rachel snapped.

“What?” he said.

“You can't say that when Meredith is pregnant!” she said.

“But—”

“Not cool,” Rachel said. “Massively not cool.”

Meredith froze, hand on her stomach, mid-rub. “Holy crap,” she said. The bubbles coiled in her lower body. This wasn't gas. There was no way this was gas. She was full, but she didn't hurt beyond the fact of having no room left inside. Eighteen weeks, a little voice said. You're at eighteen weeks. It's the right time.

“What's the matter?” Derek said.

“See?” Rachel said. “You pissed her off.”

“Holy crap.” Meredith said. “Holy crap!” She slammed backward into her chair and stood up. Derek moved in unison with her, his eyes wide. He put his hands on her shoulders like he thought she needed steadying. Maybe, she did need it. Because... holy. Freaking. Crap.

Mark frowned. “That sounds more like an orgasm than pissy, to me.”

Meredith stood, gaping. Everybody in the room stared back at her, but they all fell away from her like white noise amidst a kaleidoscope of color. There was only her in the room. Her and Derek. And Baby. “Meredith,” Derek said, his voice creased with a hint of panic, “what's wrong?”
“Nothing's wrong,” she rushed to say. “She's moving. Baby is moving.”

“It's a girl? I knew it!” she thought she heard in the background somewhere, but her attention lay solely on Derek.

He blinked. Silence stretched. “Really?” he said.

“It's like a little butterfly or bubbles or...”

He pressed up close behind her. The scent of his cologne wafted against her nose. She leaned back against him. He pushed his arms underneath her shoulders, and she waited, pliant, as his palms came to rest high over her womb near her navel. The heat of his hands radiated through her blouse. She wrapped her hands around his wrists and moved his touch a few inches lower. How she could have mistaken this for gas was, in this moment, beyond her ability to comprehend.

“Can you feel it?” she said. The movement was so light. She could barely detect the flutters inside her body. He likely wasn't going to be able to feel them outside her body, yet. But that didn't stop her from hoping.

“Hmm,” he said, the syllable a rumble against her ear. His hands pressed against her firmly, and he waited for a stretch of moments. He shifted his hands and waited longer. “I don't think so.” His voice was thick and deep with emotion, but he didn't sound disappointed.

Meredith laughed. The bubbles moved in faint, popping line across her lower body. Like Baby had decided to turn over. Or was kicking just to say hello to Mom and Dad. “It kinda tickles. I thought it was indigestion or something. I was trying to figure out how to get out of eating the pie, but... I don't feel sick, and it doesn't hurt. It's...”

“Like a butterfly, you said,” he murmured.

She nodded. “Yeah.”

“That's amazing,” he said. And then the rest of the room wasn't just white noise. It was gone, because he'd wrapped himself around her. “That's really amazing,” she heard in the crush of his body. His limbs were shaking and his words were low and torn, like he couldn't manage much else. A flash of tears in his eyes disappeared when he wiped his face.

“I think that's an automatic win for Team Neuro,” Rachel was saying as the world came back into focus.

“They win because the fetus moved?” Mark said.

Kathy snorted. “Yes. Shut up, Mark.”

“It's still kicking!” Meredith said to Derek's family. She felt freaking high.

In the moments when Meredith's head had been in the baby-is-kicking blur, his sisters had all gotten up. They hovered a few feet back from Meredith and Derek, like they wanted to collapse into a big family hug, but there was an invisible wall holding them back. Derek was a happy, glorious wreck in Meredith's arms. He'd been smashed up against his limits for the last hour, and he didn't seem to have any composure left whatsoever.

“I can't right now,” he said, and he took a few stumble-y steps back from the crowd to hover nearby. “I need a break.” But he didn't budge, yet. He hovered in the corner. Like he wasn't ready for this moment to end, even if he knew he was done with touching people right now.
His family didn't rib him. They let him get safely away. And then they collapsed around her. Congratulating. Hugging. Somebody ran to get Carolyn. Meredith's eyes watered as Sentimental Meredith took over. “I hate crying,” she snapped.

Kathy groaned. “I remember that. I do not miss it.”

“I don't usually cry!” Meredith said.

“It's pretty amazing, isn't it?” Rachel said. “I remember when Cody first gave me some kickboxing lessons.”

“I don't think I'll be able to focus on the game anymore,” Meredith said. She rubbed her eyes.

Kathy shook her head. “Oh, forget the game.”

The kids and Carolyn filled the room to bursting.

“I hear little Anne or Adam said hello?” Carolyn said.

“Yeah,” said Meredith. She blinked tears. “Still saying, actually. It's more like hi, hi, hi, hi, hi, hi, hi, hi.”

“Are you okay, sweetheart?” Carolyn said, turning to Derek, who'd shrank into the corner with the arrival of the kids.

“Oh... it's...” He swallowed. “It's good crying. Honest. I just...”

“You can close the door and lie down in my room if you want,” Carolyn suggested without pause. “I put clean sheets on the bed this morning.”

“Okay. Okay. In a min... minute.” He wiped his face and grinned brilliantly. He still looked like a disaster. Hell, his teeth were almost chattering. “I want a pic... picture, first, though.” He took a deep breath. Attempted to compose himself.

Meredith wasn't sure he'd accomplished much in that attempt. “We both look like train wrecks,” she said.

“Happy train wrecks,” he said. “And I want to save this moment.”

Somebody get the camera,” Carolyn said.

Meredith moved away from Derek's sisters, back into his orbit. She wrapped her arms around him. “This picture's going to look pretty silly,” she said with a wry, tearful grin.

“I don't care,” he said. He pressed his shaky hands over her belly. He was a trembling, tearful mess. In front of his family. And he didn't seem to care. “I want to save it. I love you.”

“I can't wait until you can feel it,” she said.

He grinned. “You're good with words. I think I have a mental picture.”

“You think I'm terrible with words,” she said.

He laughed. His eyes twinkled. She was glad that, if he was going to hit his limits, this was how he was going to do it. By being too happy. “You might not be the best at Scrabble,” he said, “but I think even your made up words are pretty functional.” He kissed her. The kids all made gross noises. One shrieked. Even in this state, Derek didn't flinch.

The camera flash snapped with white brilliance as she leaned to kiss him in return.

“I really need to lie down,” he said when he pulled away, and the stars of the flash faded.

She grinned at him. “Go,” she said. “I'll be fine.”

“You're sure?” he said.

She nodded. “Yes. It's not that scary anymore.”

He pulled his fingers through his hair. He swallowed. “Thank you,” he said in a soft voice.

_For what?_ a normal woman in a normal couple might have asked, but she supposed she and Derek _were_ weirdly psychic, because she knew what he meant without words.

_For everything_, his expression told her.

He left the room under his own steam, not fleeing, but walking with purpose. He didn't flinch, nor did he try to hide his need for respite. His family wished him well, but didn't linger on his departure. Only Meredith saw his toothy, dumbstruck grin as he began his ascent to the second floor.

---

After

Abby sat in the kitchen at the breakfast nook in the dark, crouched over a small piece of pumpkin pie. She dipped the tines of her fork into the soft pie and pulled a bite away, but she didn't eat it. She sniffled, and the fork sat there, balanced loosely on her index finger. Her dirty blond hair hung in disheveled strings.

“Hey,” Derek said as he pulled a chair out and sat beside her.

Abby peered at him through her bangs. She didn't say hello. The wounded look in her eyes made his heart squeeze.

“Can we talk?” he said.

Abby shrugged.

He took a deep breath. “I know you feel like I betrayed you, Abby,” he said in what he hoped was a low, soothing murmur, “but there are times in life when you get so sick or scared or sad that the only thing on your mind is how to get those feelings to go away. You don't think about the people you'll be hurting by destroying yourself. You just... want it to stop hurting. I made the wrong choice by doing what I did, but I didn't make that choice with malice. I never intended to hurt anybody.”

She put her fork down and sighed. “But you did. Just like when you left.”

He froze. He hadn't realized she'd been upset about that, too. She'd never said anything. “I did,” he said, “and I'm very sorry.”
That got him eye contact. Ice blue stared back at him. He grinned at her, hoping to elicit some mirth.

Peekaboo!

The thought flitted through his head, unbidden. The echo of her giggle followed it, a crackle of energy on the edge of his mind. When she'd been very little, she'd loved that game, and he'd never tired of playing it. Kathy had made fun of him.

You'll break out in zits if you keep your hands on your face much longer, she'd said.

He'd shrugged. Practice makes perfect.

Practice for what? Is peekaboo a competitive sport?

He'd laughed and shook his head. For when I have my own kid.

“I'm sorry I yelled,” Abby said, loosing him from the memory.

“It's okay,” he said. “You're allowed to be mad at me.”

She shook her head. “I'm not mad.”

He looked at her, eyebrows raised. “Oh, you're not?”

“Oh, I'm mad,” she said, reneging. Her fingers clenched. “I'm mad. I just...”

He swallowed. He wanted more than anything for her to be okay with all of this. On the flip side, though, he knew it might take some time. As much as he wanted things to be okay before he left for Seattle, he knew it wasn't realistic for him to expect them to be.

“It's okay,” he said. “Take your time with it.”

She nodded.

“I want you to call me if you want to talk about this,” Derek said. “Anytime. Day or night.”

“Oh,” she said in a small voice. And then she looked at him. Took a deep, clipped breath. “I'm sorry things got that bad for you.”

“I know,” he said. “And I'm sorry I handled it wrong.”

She peered at him. “You're mostly better, now?” she said. “Like Aunt Amy?”

“Yes,” he said. “And I see a therapist.”

“Okay,” she said.

He pulled her into his arms. Her body hitched, and she melted against him. He let her cry, despite how much he hated to hear her so upset. Knowing he was the cause of her weeping made his heart squeeze. The sound reminded him of stubbed toes when she'd been little, and boys who'd dumped her when she'd been a bit older, and when she hadn't gotten into her first choice for college, just before he'd abandoned New York.

He closed his eyes. “I'll try to come back more often. Seems like I've been a very Not Awesome Uncle in more ways than one.” Now that he knew Meredith was okay with it, and now that his life... wasn't disintegrating around him like a lit match, getting back to the East Coast would be a little easier. Well, when Baby got a little bigger, anyway.

“I've really missed you,” Abby said. “And this.”

He smiled. “I've been told I'm an excellent hugger by reputable sources.”

“Mmm-hmm,” she murmured.

And he let the moment stretch.

Before

He didn't know where he was, but it smelled like his mother's favorite perfume, which kept him from tripping into abject panic upon waking. He wasn't sure what had pulled him up from dreaming. A shadow coalesced in the strip of light below the door, thickening the darkness in the room, and faint knock on the door breached the quiet.

“Sweetheart, it's Mom,” the shadow said in a muffled, familiar voice before he could get upset. “Are you awake?”

He tried to say something like, “Yeah; I'm up,” but with his face mashed into the pillow, he didn't think the words made it to his mother in any more than a garbled jumble of sound, because there was a long pause after that.

His mouth tasted gummy and parched, and his bladder was getting full, as though instead of a short nap like he'd intended, he'd been asleep for hours. His head didn't feel quite so much like melting taffy anymore. The rumble of voices and laughter rising softly through the floorboards didn't rub wrong against over-sensitized nerves. He felt more generically tired and less if-I-don't-take-a-break-soon-something-very-bad-will-happen.

“May I come in?” Mom said more softly, doubt pinching her tone.

“Mmm-hmm,” he said. Stupid. She wouldn't hear that. He rolled onto his back. He cleared his throat. “Yeah,” he called more loudly.

The door creaked open slowly. A triangular patch of light spilled into the room. His mother, a dark shadow against the brightness, stepped into the room and paused, giving him a long time to get used to the idea that she was there.

“Okay,” he said. He put his palms against his face and closed his eyes as a shield.

She flipped the switch, and he let himself adjust as she approached. The mattress sank by his hip. He lowered his hands and squinted at her. She carried a plate of pie with a shiny fork, which didn't seem right.

Dessert was supposed to be at seven-thirty. He'd set his iPhone to wake him in forty-five minutes, and it was still sitting on the nightstand beside him. He'd tipped his mother's alarm clock face down before he'd crashed because the bright red glare of the giant numbers on its face had bugged him. His mother liked the other side of the bed, what he was used to calling Meredith's side, and he couldn't reach the clock to right it without rolling, which, with his mother sitting on the quilt, would be difficult anyway.
“What time is it?” he said.

“It's almost nine,” she said.

“Nine!” he said, sitting up. He'd been asleep for three hours. More than. Without thinking, he tried to stand, but his muscles were still in slumber, and his mother had him inadvertently pinned. His body got caught in the blankets, and all he really did was flop like a land-stranded fish.

“You don't have to get up if you're still tired,” his mother said.

He shook his head. He grabbed his phone. He'd set it for seven in the morning, not seven at night. Damn it all. “I left Meredith for three—”

“She's fine,” Mom said. “The baby is still kicking. Meredith has been giggling and happy all night. It's darling.”

He swallowed, blinking. “Oh,” he said. He looked at her, now that his eyes had fully adjusted.

“You missed dessert,” his mom said, offering the plate she carried. “I thought I'd bring you some, so you can enjoy it where it's quieter.”

“That's really...” He stared at the pie. It was pecan, which was his favorite. And somebody had put a whipped cream smiley face on the plate. Once he'd explicitly laid the ground rules for them, his family had been so welcoming and supportive. He hadn't expected anything like it. A lump formed in his throat. “That's... thanks. Thank you.”

“Are you feeling better, now?”

He nodded as he took the plate, still staring at the pie. “Rachel?” he said as he poked at the whipped cream smiley with the fork. Derek... Meredith had said. My breakfast is smiling at me. Little had she known it was a Shepherd thing more than a Derek thing.

Mom grinned. “Yes.”

“No snacks in the bedroom, I thought,” he said. “Gets crumbs in the sheets.”

“I think we can make an exception today,” she said.

He glanced at her. If it was nine, that meant things would be winding down. The kids would be getting cranky from staying up so late. He and Meredith still had to get back to the hotel. He felt like he could sleep another year or two, and still not be recharged. Also, he was running out of time to tell them about... everything. He'd waffled on it all afternoon. He needed to go back downstairs. Yet, he didn't quite feel ready to deal with so many people at once.

He took a bite of the pie and closed his eyes. Perfect. Sweet and crunchy. Kathy had learned how to make them from his grandmother, and had continued the tradition since his grandmother had died.

“You were muttering earlier,” his mother said.

“Was I?” Derek said. “I'm not sure what woke me up.”

Mom nodded. “I heard it from the hallway. You sounded upset. Is there anything you want to talk about?”

“Sometimes, I don't sleep very well,” he said. “I have nightmares.”
“About what happened to you?” Mom said.

He took another bite of pie and chewed pensively. “Yes,” he said around his mouthful.

Though, truth be told, it didn't feel right to call whatever this had been a nightmare about Gary Clark. Derek remembered those vividly, and Meredith told him he yelled a lot when he was stuck in them. Yelling wasn't muttering. Yelling would have brought more than just his mother to the door.

“I used to have them every night,” he said. “It's part of why I...” He looked at his lap. “I needed help to sleep.”

“Do you want to talk about it?” she said.

He shook his head and sighed. “Not really. I don't have them very often anymore, and I don't think...” Maybe, this had been something slightly more mundane. He had one every once in a while where he failed a class in college because he'd forgotten he'd been enrolled in it, and by the time he'd remembered, it had been too late. “I don't remember having one today.”

“That's good,” she said.

He took another bite of pie. He heard Meredith's distinct, bubbly laughter in the distance, and a smile tugged at his lips. She said something he couldn't quite hear. Something about “kicked again!” like she was amazed that their baby could be so active, and a little thrill ran through him at the words.

Their baby. Alive. Well.

Meredith was happy.

A lot had gone right during this trip despite his initial nerves.

Derek put the plate with the pie on the nightstand, his father's old nightstand. There was a 5x7 picture of young Michael Shepherd sitting in a frame by the lamp that Derek hadn't paid much attention to when he'd been in the process of collapsing earlier. His father sat behind the wheel of a classic red Mustang, the same car Meredith had found him posing with when she'd gone through the pictures Derek kept in his office back at her mother's house.

_You should ask your mom_, Meredith had said when he hadn't been able to provide an explanation for the car. _I bet she'd know._

He picked up the picture, careful to keep his fingers off the smudge-free glass. His dad donned a worn leather coat and beamed for the camera. The car sat on a packed-dirt road. There were trees in the background behind the car, oak and maple and ash. An azure streak of sky overhead and an endless roll of green below gelled the picture together. Maybe, it was a park, somewhere. Or an out-of-the-way drag strip.

“When was this?” Derek said. “Meredith wanted to know, and I couldn't tell her.”

His mother peered over his shoulder at the photo. “That photo was taken about a year before we had you.”

“Why don't I remember the car, then?” Derek said.

“Your dad had to sell it before you were born.”
“Why?” Derek said.

His mother shrugged. “We needed money. You remember how tight things were.”

Derek stared at the picture. It didn't take a genius to do the math. “He sold it because you got pregnant with me, you mean.”

His mother shrugged again. “Well, yes.” She grinned at him. “But I think he thought it was a pretty good trade.”

“He looks so happy,” Derek said.

Mom smiled. “He loved that car to pieces. He was very much a country joyrider when he was younger.” Her body shifted. She paused with her hands resting in his peripheral vision for a long moment. And then she wrapped her arms around him. The warmth of her body seeped through his shirt. She kissed his cheek. The photograph fell to his lap as he relaxed. “He loved you to pieces, too.”

“I've been missing him a lot, lately,” Derek said. He closed his eyes and soaked in her embrace.

“That's understandable,” she said.

He sighed. “I don't know how I'm ever going to live up to him.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, he was... He was just... Dad. And he always knew how to handle everything.”

His mother chuckled. “Oh, Derek, if you only knew how lost your father was most of the time...” Her gaze tilted upward as she thought for a moment. “He dislocated your shoulder, once.”

“What?” Derek said. “I don't remember that at all.”

“It was an accident, of course. You were almost five. You insisted your closet was the way to Narnia and wouldn't come out. He lost his cool and tried to drag you out by your arm.”

Derek frowned. “I really don't remember that.”

“Oh, yes,” Mom said with a smile. “Your dad was completely beside himself. I had to drive us to the ER because he was so upset that he'd hurt you, he couldn't see straight.”

“Seriously?” Derek said, trying to picture his father as anything other than all-knowing and perfect.

His mother nodded. “Seriously. And that's just one of the things I can think of off the top of my head.”

“He always seemed so perfect on my end.”

Mom laughed. “Derek, that's what parenting is.”

“What do you mean?” Derek said.

“You'll always worry that you could do better, no matter what. In the end, though, you do the best you can do, and nine times out of ten, that's enough.”

“What about the one time out of ten where it's not?”
“What did your father used to say when you made a mistake?”

Derek rolled his eyes. “It builds character.”

Mom shrugged. “Well, there you have it.”

Derek sighed. “But how am I supposed to be a good parent? How am I supposed to care for somebody else, when I can barely deal with my own problems, right now?”

“You've been taking good care of Meredith,” Mom said.

“Meredith's different,” he muttered.

“Why do you say that?” “Because Meredith is an adult, and she knows when I need a break. A baby isn't going to know when Dad needs quiet or space.”

“I think that’s true of any baby and any parent. Look what happened with your father.”

“But—”

“And you seemed to be doing a fine job at dinner, putting things that were bothering you aside,” his mother said, steamrolling any objection he could muster. Her embrace tightened. “I don't think you're giving yourself enough credit.”

“You really think I'll do okay?” Derek said.

“I know you will,” Mom said. “I've always thought you'd make an excellent parent.”

Her certainty made her almost impossible not to believe, and he let that certainty sweep over him. Meredith kept telling him over and over that he could do this. Maybe, he really could. Maybe, he was being a worrywart.

“When I visited you in the hospital,” Mom continued, “you were acting like your life was a jigsaw puzzle that somebody had shuffled up and scattered across the room. But, now, it's like you have most of the picture back together. You just need a little help with some of the leftover pieces you haven't found the correct places for.”

And speaking of pieces he hadn't found places for...

He leaned against her shoulder with a sigh. “I think I'm going to tell them.”

“Tell what to whom?” Mom said.

“Tell my sisters about my drug problem. I've been waffling all day about it. Worrying about how they'll react is probably just as bad as them knowing is going to be. I just want to get it over with, so I can move on, and so I can keep getting better for the baby.”

“I think that's a good plan,” she said.

“How bad do you think this will be?” Derek said.

“I don't think it will be that bad,” Mom said.

“But what happened with Amy—”

“Was a one time out of ten sort of thing,” Mom said. “And I think they've all learned from it. At least, I hope so. You did, after all.”

“I did,” he said slowly, “but—”

“You did,” his mother said, cutting him off. “No buts.”

Derek sighed. He set the picture of his dad back on the nightstand and stood reluctantly. His body ached. His head throbbed. But he needed to do this. His mother picked up the plate with the leftover pie and walked behind him down the narrow hallway. He stopped in the bathroom, and his mother went on ahead.

The stairs creaked as he descended, but the sounds were lost in the comparative din of the living room. The room glowed in a bath of soft lamplight and holiday-scented candles. Everybody was sitting in the big circle of chairs, talking in hushed voices that, due to the number of people involved, collectively didn't seem that hushed.

The adults were having some sort of conversation about tomorrow's plans, except for Amelia, who sat conspicuously silent and stiff in the corner by the old grandfather clock. Meredith mentioned The Phantom of the Opera, and Rachel was talking about Black Friday sales. The noise slid up Derek's spine in an unpleasant tingle of discordance, but it was more than tolerable.

Sabrina and Chloe had sprawled on the floor to play Uno. Patrick and David were lying like pretzels by Sabrina's feet, toy trucks still clutched in their hands despite their slumber. Mia sat in John's lap, her face pressed into her father's shoulder. Cody and Morgan, the youngest kids, had conked out in Steve's and... Meredith's laps, respectively. Morgan had her head tipped back against Meredith's shoulder, and her mouth had fallen open, displaying a pearly line of little baby teeth. Her frilly dress covered most of Meredith's swollen belly, and her tiny patent-leather mary-janes dangled beyond Meredith's knees. One small hand rested over Meredith's navel. Derek's heart squeezed at the scene.

“The Museum of Sex is my first stop,” Mark announced.

Rachel giggled.

“There's actually a museum for that?” Meredith said.

Mark nodded. “Yes. And my curiosity is burning. I got a Groupon deal if anyone wants to join me.”

“You got a Groupon deal,” Meredith said flatly.

“Yes,” Mark said.

“For a sex museum,” she said.

“Yep,” Mark said.

“I have to see it,” Meredith said.

“The Groupon or the museum?” he said. Meredith giggled. “The museum. We don't have plans tomorrow morning, anyway.”

“I don't know,” Mark said. “Is Derek coming?”

Rachel rolled her eyes and threw a balled up napkin at him, which he deftly dodged. “You're as bad as Derek with the innuendo, sometimes,” she said.

“I might be sleeping,” Derek said from the stairwell. “But I'll come if I'm awake.”

Meredith spit out her drink in a curtailed, choking laugh, which miraculously didn't disturb her dozing charge. Blush crept across her cheeks, but she recovered quickly. Her eyes sparkled in the light as she beamed at him. His mother slipped back into the room and sat down next to Abby as he smiled tiredly at his wife.

Hi, she mouthed, and he winked back at her.

Kathy grinned at him. “Hey, sleepyhead,” his oldest sister said. “How are you feeling?”

Derek pulled his fingers through his hair. “Much better, thanks.”

“You were out forever. Are you going to be able to sleep tonight?” Rachel said with a frown.

“Yeah,” he said. “I'm sorry I wasn't here, much.” Stress, desire, and exertion had amalgamated, creating lightning rods for pain in all of his joints and a lot of his muscles. Stress over subjecting himself to fear. Desire to reduce the stress with Percocet. Exertion to keep the desire from snowballing. “I didn't intend to sleep that long. I'm really worn out.”

“Yeah,” Rachel added, “we're just thrilled you could make it.”

“Why does post-traumatic stress make you tired?” Chloe asked, looking up from her hand of cards. Sabrina craned her neck to look at him, too.

“Well,” Derek said. He blinked. They actually looked interested, particularly Chloe. He knew his sisters must have explained things briefly to the kids who were old enough to understand, but he wasn't sure how much deeper than don't-yell-near-your-uncle they'd gone. “It's not really that... but certain things like loud noises make me very anxious. It's just like being stressed out for a test at school or something. It makes me tired faster.”

“Oh,” Chloe said. “That makes sense.”

Sabrina frowned. “But why don't you like loud noises anymore?”

“I was shot,” Derek said. He knew his sisters had told them that, at least. “Guns are really loud.”

Sabrina shook her head. “Right. Duh. Sorry.”

Derek shrugged. “No reason to be sorry.”

“That really sucks,” Sabrina said. “People shouldn't have guns.”

“No, they shouldn't,” Derek said. He moved out of the stairwell and stepped over the minefield of bodies on the rug.

Mark, who seemed to have been fulfilling his role has a backup human shield in Derek's absence, and sat dutifully next to Meredith, said, “Hey, man.” He stood to give Derek the chair closest to his wife, and moved across the room to the empty piano bench. Derek took the seat gingerly, trying to avoid too much pain. He leaned across to kiss Meredith's ear, careful not to disturb his sleeping niece.
“Hey,” he said. “How are you doing?”

“I have a loaner baby,” Meredith said, tone proud, and he chuckled.

“I can see that,” he said.

“She wanted to feel the baby kick,” Meredith said. “I think she got bored when she couldn't.”

“She's up way past her bed time,” Kathy said. “That's all.”

“Yeah,” John said. He glanced at his watch. “We should really think about calling it a night. The kids are dropping like flies.”

“Wait,” Derek said before John could stand up.

John cocked his head to the side. “Hmm?”

Derek glanced at his mother, who nodded. Then he looked at Meredith, met her unblinking eyes. She knew what he meant without explanation.

You're sure? she said with her gaze.

I need to, he thought back at her.

She nodded as well. A thousand percent. I'm here.

She stretched out her fingers and touched his. She clasped his hand, strongly enough that his joints mashed together and the lines of his palm became the rise and fall of waves. The warmth of her skin warmed him. For a moment, he got lost in her gaze.

His commitment-phobic one-night stand, one he'd initiated simply to prove to himself that he wasn't as broken as his marriage to Addison had become, had turned into a pursuit to prove he could still pursue, had turned into a date to prove he could still date, had turned into another date because he liked her, had turned into countless mornings waking up in her bed because he really liked her, had turned into what he had finally realized was love. Somewhere between if-you-know-me-you'll-love-me in his sexy red shirt, and the moment Addison had stuck out her hand and haughtily introduced herself to Meredith, he'd fallen for her. Meredith Grey. The love of his life. His light in the dark. His very best friend. His soul mate.

He could recite the entire thing like a baseball play in slow motion, but he still couldn't explain the why or the how of it. He could only say that life, sometimes, had magic in it. Magic, and miracles, and the metaphysical.

His lips curled into a wide, goofy smile, unbidden, despite his nerves, despite everything.

“What?” she said. Morgan shifted sleepily in her arms.

“I just realized something,” he said. “That's all.”

Meredith's eyes narrowed. “What?” she said again.

He shrugged. “I feel... lucky.”

A simple statement, really, but her eyes widened like he'd told her he'd be back in the operating room tomorrow, removing somebody's malignant glioblastoma, or performing the resection of a spinal tumor, and it was his turn to cock his head and say, “What?”
“Mr. Optimism. He keeps popping up at the most unexpected moments, lately,” she replied, and a brilliant smile stretched across her face. “I like it a lot.”

He blinked, surprised by her assessment. He hadn't even noticed the onset. And, now that he thought about it, he realized Mr. Clark had been silent all afternoon. Ever since Derek had been able to lay some firm ground rules, rules they'd heard straight form his own lips, rather than rules they'd heard through the familial grapevine. Ever since he'd stood his ground despite every fiber in his body screaming at him to run away instead.

_Fight for it_, said his mental Meredith. _Fight for what you need._

Real Meredith nodded, too, as though she'd heard her counterpart speak.

“There's something I want to talk to you guys about,” Derek said, turning back to his family.

“What is it?” Steve said.

“Is something wrong?” Rachel said.

“Let's put the kids in the library,” Mom said before he could say anything, and she stood. “Chloe, would you help me, dear?”

“Oh, lord,” Kathy said, glancing at their mother and then back to him. “What is it?”

Derek frowned, watching his mother move across the floor to collect Morgan from Meredith. Meredith shook her arms like they'd fallen asleep. Steve stood with Cody draped in his arms, and Chloe began to shepherd Patrick, David, and Mia, who were all varying degrees of asleep on their feet, out of the room, amidst a chorus of grumbles and whining.

“Sorry,” Derek said. “I didn't...” Think. At all.

Stress tightened in his chest as Steve and his mother reappeared. Chloe came back into the room and sat down in a heap next to Sabrina, who'd never left. He'd prepared himself, sort of, to talk with his sisters. With his brothers-in-law. Mr. Optimism or not, it was another thing entirely to see three of his nieces still sitting there. And, actually, he wasn't sure if Kathy would even want them there. His family had been circumspect with the children regarding Amelia's issues. Abby had found out by accident when she'd been a senior in high school, and that had been a bit of a mess because she hadn't been prepared for it whatsoever.

His gaze flicked to Amelia, who'd hunkered in her chair a bit like a turtle preparing for harassment by hiding in its shell. She shook her head at him vehemently. _No_, said her gaze. _Don't even try it if you want this to go remotely well._

He tensed at that revelation. He turned back to the rest of the room. “I don't...” He cleared his throat and caught Kathy's stare directly. “I don't know if you want Sab and Chloe here for this. You might want to listen first and decide whether to tell them later.”

Sabrina pouted. “But I'm fifteen. I'm an adult!”

“It's probably just boring grownup stuff, anyway,” Chloe said, rolling her eyes.

“Yeah,” Derek said. He couldn't bring himself to laugh about it. “It's very boring.”

Kathy looked at her daughters sternly. “Why don't you two stay in the library for a bit?” she said. Not exactly as a request. Sabrina and Chloe threw their Uno cards on the ground and struggled to their feet. Chloe began to move away, but Sabrina folded her arms over her chest and stood her ground defiantly.

"Why can't we stay, Uncle Derek?" Sabrina said, peering at him with dark, angry eyes. Chloe, on the other hand, slunk away with an expression that said, Hey, don't drag me into this rebellion.

He shivered at the surge of nervousness that flooded him. Even though this was his niece. Even though she was smaller than Meredith. Despite all that, this was a confrontation, and a noisy one at that.

"Because I'm not sure it's age appropriate for you, and I'm not your mom or dad, so I don't decide whether you stay or not," Derek said.

"But I'm mature!" she protested, stomping her foot.

Kathy let loose a sardonic laugh as she stood and pointed to the hallway. "Sabrina, out."

"If you want us to think you're mature, this is not the way to do it," John said, joining his wife.

Derek stood and forced himself to straighten his shoulders. "You heard your parents." He pointed in the same direction Kathy had, setting his lips in a grim line. "Out."

Sabrina gave him and Kathy and John a glare and stomped off, which made the chandelier in the dining room shake, and sort of made him feel like a jerk. He wasn't used to any of his nieces being pissed at him. He was supposed to be the Awesome Uncle, though he supposed he preferred Uncle Jerkface over Uncle Addict.

Kathy looked back at Derek. "Sorry, Der," she said. "She's discovered she has hormones since you last saw her. It's not you." And then her eyebrows rose in askance. "Abby?"

Derek swallowed. He glanced at Abby. The amazing young lady who idolized him. Abby looked back at him, confusion written all over her face. He wanted to say no, that she was too young, but she was in college. She could vote. She was an adult and could make her own choices, and she knew about Amelia already, so, there was little point in keeping her away from this revelation. "It's um... It's fine," he said. Not. Not fine. He swallowed.

Meredith stroked his fingers with her thumb, remind him she was there. You'll always have me, no matter what your crazy family does, she seemed to be saying, though she didn't speak. He gave her a wavering smile despite his nerves.

Rachel laughed nervously. "Okay, what is it?"

His lungs didn't seem to want to fill. He shifted nervously from foot to foot. "I'm sorry," he said breathily. "I need..."

"Take your time," Kathy said, her voice low and soothing.

Say it, he thought. Just say it. Get it done. This was what he'd wanted, right? To move on? Fight for what you need. He took a deep breath. He had Meredith with him. Mark and Amelia and his Mom. There was almost an equal number of sympathetic people in this room as there were unknowns, now. Abby, Rachel, Kathy, Steve, and John. Four on five. Five on five if he counted himself. When he thought of the situation in those terms, like it was a checker board with red pieces and black pieces, a fair fight, things didn't seem as intimidating.

"I'm an addict," Derek said quietly.
“To what?” Rachel said, laughing. “Lobbing bad innuendo at unsuspecting victims?”

“No, I mean I'm really an addict,” Derek said, barely able to find his voice. “After I was shot, I got addicted to my painkillers.”

“What do you mean?” Rachel said.

Derek took a deep breath, urging himself not to snap at her. This was kind of big. Of course, she wouldn't quite get it at first. “I mean that I've been sick. And Percocet made me feel better. And not a day goes by that I don't regret the choice I made to keep taking it, knowing that, but I made it. I'm an addict.”

Silence stretched. Kathy didn't look that shocked, but everybody else sure did. Steve's mouth had fallen open, and John was blinking like an idiot. Abby looked like she was trying not to cry. He hated to see her cry. He hated seeing any woman cry, but his niece, often still a child in his mind, wielded special heart-piercing swords with her tears. And then there was Rachel. Blush crept across her face, but Derek didn't think it was from embarrassment. Anger, maybe. Or... He didn't know. He tried to remind himself this was necessary. That it would be bad before it could be good. Like a wound that needed to be opened and cleaned before it could heal properly. But that didn't make it feel any less bad in the moment.

“But...” Abby said, the first to break the mind-wracking silence. She took a deep breath. Her voice was low and her syllables were stretched. His chest tightened. “You're okay, though, right?” she said.

“I'm better than I have been in a long time,” he replied.

“You're not going to jail?”

The question surprised him enough that a nervous, humorless laugh popped loose from his body. “No. No, I'm not going to jail.”

“Okay,” Abby said, nodding. She bit her lip like she didn't know what to say. “That's good. I knew someone at school who...” She swallowed, not finishing her sentence, but he could fill in the blanks.

And then her eyes darkened. She wiped her face. “How could you?” she said with belligerence that made him flinch, in part because it scared him a little, and in part because he didn't think he'd ever heard her speak in that tone of voice. The only thing he had shelved in old memories that compared was when he'd heard her fight with Kathy and John about getting a learner's permit. In that case, though, her tone had been more of a two-dimensional, pout-y, “Why are you being so unfair to me!” rather than a three-dimensional wail of betrayal, “Et tu, Brute?”

“I'm sor—” he said.

“Don't bother,” Abby replied icily.

Derek looked at the floor as his eldest niece stalked out of the room and disappeared into the kitchen. A chilly puff of air displaced by her passing hit him in the face in the midst of Kathy's repeated, “Abby? Abby!” that did no good for the situation whatsoever. Kathy didn't seem to have any idea whether to chase her daughter or to stay.

“She shouldn't have done that,” Kathy said.

“It's okay,” he added lamely, almost unable to find his voice. “It's... what I expected.”
“She's just being a stupid kid,” Mark said, a small, soothing voice of reason. “Don't take it personal, man.”

Even with the help, Derek didn't know what else to say.

For a long moment, it seemed like nobody knew what else there was to say, and he didn't miss the fact that, other than Abby, none of the “hostile” checker pieces had responded specifically to what he'd said. His eyes pricked, and his lower-lip quivered, and a big, thick lump expanded in his throat, but he didn't let any of that own him. Not right now. Not when, if he lost it, everything would get even worse. He wiped his eyes and didn't speak. He looked at Meredith for... he didn't know what. Help. Reassurance. Something. Anything.

Her eyes were filmy with unshed tears. I love you, she mouthed, and his knuckles smooshed together as she tightened her grip again.

He didn't know what else to say. What else could he say?

“So, Mom knew, and...” Rachel began slowly, her eyes and nose had scrunched in her I'm-doing-math-and-I-hate-it face. Her voice was thick and lost as she struggled through her thoughts. “Why didn't you say anything to us, Derek?”

Because he'd screwed up was his instinctive response, but his throat wouldn't work.

Meredith's hip pressed against him, reassuring him, and her fingers clenched around him, almost to the point of real pain, like she was trying to reassure herself. A wild thought flew into his head. Him telling her to push. Her reminding him she was allowed to break his hand because he'd said she could for this. And then she'd squeeze his hand a bit like that.

“He just did tell you,” Meredith said, pulling him back into the room from his musing, her tone borderline I'm-good-with-a-scalpel-don't-mess-with-me, her posture bristling. “Right now. Didn't you hear him?”

Rachel looked at Meredith. Goggled for a moment. “I mean... I meant before!”

Kathy nodded. “We could have helped you.”

“Are you guys serious?” Amelia said as she, too, rose to her feet. She rolled her eyes, and in an unexpected hailstorm of support, said, “He didn't tell you two because you're a pair of judgmental, hypocritical bitches. And if Nancy had been here, too, I doubt he'd have opened his mouth at all.”

His mother shook her head. “Amelia, language!”

“Ladies,” Steve said, “Let's all calm—”

“I will not be calm!” Rachel snapped. “Amelia, what are you even talking about?”

Derek wasn't sure if Amelia supporting him had helped or hurt things.
Amelia rolled her eyes again. “Only the fact that you ostracized me for years.”

“That was a long time ago,” Kathy said.

“It wasn't a long time ago,” Amelia said. “I still don't feel comfortable at family bonanzas like this. And the only one of you who ever even apologized to me, though it took him more than a decade to get around to it, and also a painful trip to the land of ‘me, too’, was Derek.”

Kathy and Rachel sat in stunned silence, and the moment stretched, and stretched.

“Amy,” Kathy began slowly, “that was a long time ago.”

Rachel nodded. “I thought it was done.”

“It's not done,” Amelia said. “It's never done. I'm an addict. Derek's an addict. Addiction is a problem for life. We can be almost okay, but we can never be totally better, and this family needs to take its head out of its ass about it. He didn't tell you because he was terrified of you, and I honestly can't blame him, whether he's sick or not.”

“Thanks, Amy,” Derek snapped, finding his voice. “Thanks for your help.” He put the word help in air quotes. “This is really going well.”

At least Amelia had the decency to look like she felt a little guilty about throwing her Molotov cocktail into the lit cigarette party at the gas station. Silenced stretched to the point of being unbearable. Nobody spoke. Everybody stared. Derek wanted to crawl back to his mother's queen-sized bed, pull the covers over his head, and curl up in a ball.

“How about we all sit down,” Meredith said calmly. “And then, maybe, we can talk about this like adults.”

“Yes,” Mom said, “That's a good idea. Let's all take a timeout.”

“No,” Kathy said. “Wait.” When Kathy stood, Derek squeezed his eyes shut, prepared for the worst. “Amelia's right.” Derek's eyes snapped open in time to see Kathy walk over to Amy and hold out her hand. Amy snorted and didn't take it. “I'm sorry,” Kathy pressed. “We're both sorry,” she added, gesturing at Rachel, “and we should have said something instead of assuming things were okay. We created a pretty hostile environment.” Kathy sighed as if she were disappointed. “And then we unintentionally tried to let time sweep it under the rug to avoid a difficult conversation.” She turned to Derek. “I never wanted you to feel like you couldn't tell us something. I'm sorry.”

Rachel nodded. “Amy, I had no idea you felt that way. I see too many ODs wind up on my table. I would never be as stupid, now, as I was when we were younger, now that I've seen so much. I thought it was... Well, I thought it was obvious.”

“Obvious,” Amelia scoffed. “Obvious? Obvious is I am so sorry, Amelia, for treating you like dirt.”

Rachel flinched.

Kathy straightened, as though forcing herself not to engage in a petty fight. “I want to help,” she said coolly.

“We both do!” Rachel said with a thick voice. “Both of you.”
“Both of you,” Kathy agreed. “How can we help?”

Derek kneaded his jeans with nervous hands. “It took me three months to admit I even needed help.”

“So, you and Meredith did this all by yourselves?” Kathy said incredulously.

Meredith bit her lip. “We had Mark,” she said roughly. “Mark was there.”

The tips of Mark's ears turned pink. He shrugged. “I didn't do much.”

“Don't say that,” Meredith said. “You did a lot.”

“You did,” Derek said, tension making his throat hurt. “You did so much, Mark. Thank you.”

The pink on Mark's ears spread to his cheeks. “It really wasn't a big deal.”

“When did you tell Mom?” Kathy said.

“When I visited in October,” Mom said.

“And Amy?” Rachel said.

“I had a really bad day in September,” Derek said.

“And Mark?” Rachel said.

Derek glanced curiously at Mark. Mark had... always known.

“I told him in August,” Meredith said. “I didn't know what to do when I... figured it out.”

Derek squeezed her shoulder in support.

When nobody spoke, he felt a stupid, nerve-wracking need to fill the silence.

“I was selfish,” Derek said. “Selfish, and stupid, and I let this all get heaped on Meredith and Mark, particularly Meredith. And I'm sorry for that every day. I'm sorry for—”

“Shut up, you big, dumb idiot,” Rachel snapped. She blinked tears, and her voice cracked. “And I mean that in the nicest possible way.” She waved her hand at Amelia. “C'mere, squirt.”

Amelia rolled her eyes and stood. “What?”

“You, too, Derek,” Rachel said.

“What?” Derek said dumbly.

“What?” Derek said dumbly.

“Just come here,” Rachel said, pointing at the floor in front of her feet for emphasis.

The four of them converged at the center of the room. Rachel pushed closer. “Is this okay?” she said to him, raising her arms to show clear intent.

Derek swallowed. “What? Yes...”

And all at once, he and Amelia were at the center of a bear hug so tight it was hard to breathe, not that it mattered, because his breath froze in his chest.
“I thought you would hate me, now,” Derek said thickly, still not ready to believe what had just happened.

“We could never hate you,” Kathy said against his ear. “And we never hated Amy. You never hated Amy. We were all just...”

“Really, really stupid,” Rachel said. “All of us.”

His muscles relaxed. Finally. His jaw unclenched. Tension bled out of him as though his body were a sieve, and then he was just tired. Tired. Relieved. Derek's throat tightened. The room blurred. “I'm really sor—” “Didn't I say shut up?” Rachel said playfully.

“Let's just let it go,” Kathy said. “We're all here, now.”

Amelia snorted. “That's easy for you to say,” she said, muffled by the sibling dog pile.

Kathy sighed. “Look, we clearly all have unresolved issues. But we don't need to fix them all right now. One at a time, okay?”

“Fine,” Amelia grumbled.

“What just happened?” Steve said.

“I think they all agreed on something,” John added.

“Is that not normal?” Meredith said.

“No,” Derek said in choked up unison with his sisters. Beyond Kathy's shoulder, he saw his mother smiling.

After

“Derek,” said a soft voice. Meredith. “Derek...”

He opened his eyes to a strange blindness. Nothing but brown. A moment later, he realized this was the breakfast nook table, and he'd slumped to the point of collapse against it. Abby wasn't in his arms anymore. That's right. She'd left, and he'd put his head down for a moment... He rubbed his eyes, righted himself, and stared fuzzily up at Meredith.

“What time is it?” he said. A murmur of voices flitted through the air from the living room. It couldn't be too much later.

“Ten,” Meredith said. “Our taxi is here.”

“Oh, okay,” he said, still not quite functional. He stumbled to his feet. “Should say g'night.”

Meredith flashed a soft smile at him. “The adults are in the living room. The kids are down.” She wrapped her arms around him and stopped him from moving forward. “Hey.”

He looked at her.

“You made it,” she said.

A sleepy smile stretched across his face. “I did.”
She stared at him through her eyelashes. She sighed with content. “I think I like your family, by the way. They don't seem that mean, or judge-y, or freaky anymore.”

“I guess they've grown out of it for the most part,” Derek said.

She nodded. “People grow.” You have. I have.

Her unspoken words resonated with him. “I'm glad you're here,” he said.

“Me, too,” she said. Her lip twitched. She shifted on her feet. Put her hand on her belly. “I swear, this kid is running laps.”

He put a hand against her navel. The warmth of her skin through her shirt soothed him. “I can't wait until I can feel it, too,” he said.

“You will soon,” she said. She leaned onto her tiptoes and kissed him. “Let's go say goodbye,” she murmured against his lips.

He breathed in the soft scent of her lotion. Her hair. “Okay,” he said. And then he let her lead him home.
8:27 AM

One of the disadvantages of being a surgeon who'd been married to an OB-GYN in an earlier life was that he knew full well how to read an ultrasound. Worse, Meredith, relatively fresh from her intern year, knew full well, too, because she'd had so much recent practice. And they were both relying solely on personal willpower not to interpret the easily knowable.

“We could figure it out so easily,” Meredith said as if she'd read his mind, leaning against him, fingers clutching the manila envelope. The black-and-white photo of their baby, taken at twenty weeks, sat on top of the yellow paper, but there was a tiny neon Post-it note stuck over a revealing area of the photograph. The ultrasound tech hadn't even batted an eyelash when they'd asked for it. Meredith flicked it with her finger. “We just have to lift this up...”

Samantha barked in the distance and trotted back to them with her favorite, chewed-up, dirt-ridden tennis ball. She dropped it by the bench in front of Derek's feet. Derek reached down. The ball was soggy with drool and mud, but it didn't faze him. He threw the ball as far as he could muster, and Samantha bounded away, her feet churning up bits of grass and mud as she flew. He wiped his hand on his coat.

“Meredith,” he said. He kissed her temple. Pressed his nose against her skin. Her wool coat mushed up against his duster as she shifted in his arms. “If you want to peek, you can. It's okay. I understand. But I really want it to be a surprise for me.”

They sat in the dog park on a bench in the chill, warming each other while their dog had some fun with Queen Anne Hill's other canine residents. Meredith shook her head. “I'm not gonna peek, if you're not gonna peek. I'd feel like I was cheating or something. Besides...”

A cold winter breeze bit at his skin. “What?” he said.

She shrugged, shivering against him, and then she looked up. Met his eyes. “I kind of like the idea of a good surprise, too.”

He laughed. “Maybe, we should give all the pictures to Lexie for safe-keeping until Baby is born. Having them out of our possession might shore up our willpower.”

Meredith snorted. “Asking Lexie to keep a secret like that is like asking Samantha not to eat bacon.”

“Point,” he said, nodding. “Mark?”

Meredith rolled her eyes. “Mark's even worse. The man sucks at lying. All of our friends suck at it, actually. Can you imagine if we gave these to Richard?”

Derek couldn't help but chuckle. “Bailey?” he said. “We could give them to her.”

Meredith snickered. “After she's done gutting you for reminding her we have sex, it might work. Maybe, Alex? He knows already.”

“He knows about the sex?”

Meredith laughed. “Well, he knows about our sex. But he doesn't know about the baby's.”
Samantha barked as she brought back the ball. Derek threw it against the back chain-link fence, where it fell to the wet grass with a metal clink. His chest didn't hurt at all anymore. Not even from the whipping motion of his arm. He had to do several pushups to elicit a reminder that he'd been seriously injured. The increasing freedom from painful rebukes for exertion had helped him feel better. A lot better.

“We could have Dr. Charlton keep them on file for us,” he said.

“But then we can't take them home,” Meredith said. She placed her palm against her belly. “And I still want to be able to look at them whenever I want.”

He nodded. “Alex works, then.”

Meredith slipped the ultrasound photograph back into the manila envelope and stuck it beside her hip on the bench. She leaned against him and pressed her lips against his throat. “So,” she murmured against his skin. “Are you ready to go back tomorrow?”

He swallowed, staring across the dog park. Over three years later, he still hadn't quite gotten used to how green things stayed, even in the winter. In New York, the grass died cyclically. Here, it was still vibrant. Some of the trees had lost their leaves, but there were a lot of evergreens that kept their verdant coloring.

“I don't know,” he said, staring vacantly. All he knew was that he was out in the wide, wide open, cuddling with his wife, playing fetch with his dog. He didn't hurt, and he wasn't scared, and the days when he'd been so upset he hadn't wanted to get out of bed felt... very far away. He might not be ready, for sure, but he wasn't not ready. “I can't not try.”

She kissed him again. “Mmm, Chief Shepherd.”

He nuzzled her. “It might be worth it just for the title.”

“And free use of the conference rooms,” she said.

He laughed. Nodded. “I will admit, there are a few perks.”

“Chief?” said a deep, low voice, and Derek snapped out of his musing to find Stan, one of their orderlies, staring back at him in the bright hallway. Derek's heart throbbed at the unexpected intrusion, once, twice, and a quick pinch of adrenaline hit him like a boxer, but then he relaxed without any extra work. Stan stood with one hand clasped around the handle of a shoulder-high meal cart full of empty meal trays. He wore a festive Santa hat, which made it hard not to smile at him.

“I'm sorry?” Derek said, already recovered. Morning sunlight slanted through the windows, making passing nurses and doctors shield their eyes with clipboards, papers, anything available. Tinsel garlands strung the hallways under the windows, and he thought he smelled a hint of evergreen.

Stan frowned and swept his long black hair back behind his ear with his hand. His gold wristwatch glittered in the light as it shifted, and his Santa hat tipped perilously to the side. “Waterworks,” Stan said. “Storage room at six. Thought you'd want to know.”

Derek sighed. “Stan, I'm not a counselor,” he said. He glanced down the hallway to the storage closet across from nursing station six. “If somebody has a problem, they're welcome to come to me, but I'm not going to intrude on—”
Stan shrugged. “You might want to for this one.”

Derek swallowed. His heart squeezed. Meredith cried a lot, lately. Over the most random things. Stupid freaking hormones, she’d said belligerently more than once. But that excuse didn't make Derek hate the crying any less, or want to fix it any less. “Is it my wife?”

“Half right,” was all Stan said before he turned, which made no sense to Derek. How could somebody be half his wife? “Sorry,” Stan said, gesturing to the meal cart, “these trays need to be washed.” And then he left, the cart squeaking as he wheeled it toward the cafeteria.

Derek turned on his heels and walked down the hall. Deirdre, a nurse in her late fifties, sat at the nursing station desk, a station that should have boasted at least two nurses, but there was only Deirdre. She typed charts into the Seattle Grace computer system, frown lines tightening her gaze. An old radio played a tinny, quiet rendition of Jingle Bell Rock from one of the local stations, but that didn't stop Derek from hearing the sniffles on the other side of the door on the opposite wall.

“She's in there,” Deirdre said, tipping her shoulder toward the door without lifting her hands off the keyboard. Her typing clacked percussively in the air.

“She...” Derek began. He sighed. “Is this really something that needs my intervention?”

Deirdre shrugged. “I doubt we'll know until you find out.”

“Why didn't you find out?” he said.

She rolled her eyes and looked at him. “Sir, it's eight-thirty in the morning. My shift ends in thirty minutes. I've been up all night. I've already dealt with two different patients and a fellow nurse who had their own catastrophes.” She pointed at the doorway. “That's a surgeon. You're Chief of Surgery. You deal with it.”

Derek sighed. “All right, all right. I'll handle it.”

“Thanks, sir,” Deirdre said, her tone absent as she stared back at the computer screen. “You're a peach.”

Derek knocked softly at first. There was no response. He hated this. When he'd first come back after his stress leave, he'd spent a lot of time in storage closets, curled up in the corner in the dark with his back to the door, mostly recuperating from too many stimuli, but sometimes breaking down in a blubbery pile. He never would have wanted people to walk in on him. He was half tempted to walk away. No matter that Deirdre wanted him to deal with this. Or Stan. Or anybody.

But the staff was miserable. Seattle Grace was in trouble it wasn't bouncing back from. Your fault. Your fault, your fault. “Your fault,” whispered Gary Clark. Guilt slithered in Derek's stomach before he could push it away with a firm hand and a deep breath.

He took a deep breath, and he turned the knob, and into the dark closet he went. It took him a moment for his eyes to adjust. Somebody, a woman, sat in the corner on an overturned mop bucket. She wiped her eyes and looked up at him, eyes glistening. He squinted in the darkness.

“I'm sorry,” she said, and he recognized Lexie's distinctive voice, thick with grief though it was, before he could make out her face. “Do you need to get something in here?”

“No, no,” he said. He swept his hands through his hair and shifted from foot to foot. “Are you okay?” Which was a moronic question he could have kicked himself for. Asking a woman in tears if she was okay.
Lexie wiped her eyes and sniffed. “Yes,” she said, a little too quickly. “I'm fine.”

Derek grinned ruefully. “You know, I've learned not to believe Meredith when she says that, even when she's not crying.” He turned over another bucket and sat next to her.

“You don't want to hear this,” she said. “I'm sure you have stuff. Other stuff. To, you know. Do. I mean, don't you? Have stuff?”

He shrugged as he pieced together her babble. He'd been doing his circuit. The circuit he walked when he was surveying all the goings-on at Seattle Grace, checking in on all the staff, making sure there weren't any problems. It was the circuit he did every morning after he arrived and checked his e-mail. The circuit he'd walked when he'd searched for Gary Clark.

“I'm just doing my rounds,” he said. “I've got nothing urgent. Maybe, I can help.”

Tears pulsed freshly from her eyes. She made a soft sound that wasn't a word. More a squeak. The kind Meredith made when she was really upset, and Derek's heart squeezed tighter. “I broke up,” his sister-in-law said.

He blinked. “What?”

“With Alex,” she wailed. “I broke up. He said pass the salt; I said I couldn't take it anymore. In front of everybody. I just... I exploded.”

For a moment, however inappropriate, Derek found himself wilting with relief. Not at her problem, but at the fact that he'd built this up in his head as another shooting-born catastrophe, and now he'd discovered that it wasn't one. He looked woefully at the door and then back to her. Maybe, he should get Meredith, or... Meredith would be a lot better at this. This seemed like a women-commiserate-over-rocky-road-ice-cream problem that he found happening every once in a while in Meredith's kitchen. Except, Lexie's bucket moaned as she pulled it across the floor to him, and then she leaned against his shoulder, and then he was stuck in a closet comforting his sister-in-law who'd just broken up with her boyfriend.

“I'm... sorry,” he said, rubbing her back with robotic strokes, not quite sure what to say.

“I feel like such a selfish jerk,” she said, sniffling.

He paused. “Why?”

“He was shot,” she said. She rubbed her nose on the wrist of her lab coat. “Who breaks up right after...” She glared at no one in particular. “Who does that!”

“I know what it's like to feel like you have to stay,” he said slowly.

“I broke up right after he was shot,” she wailed, not listening to him, and he winced.

He pulled her close and tried to put it another way. “Lexie, it's been months since then,” he said. “If you weren't happy, you weren't happy. And it's not like you have wedding vows with the guy.”

“Well, I still feel like a jerk,” Lexie grumbled.

Derek shook his head. “Wanting to be happy doesn't make you a jerk, and staying in a situation where you're miserable doesn't do any good. Believe me, I know.”

She pulled away from him. “You're miserable with Meredith?” she said sharply.
“What? No!” He shook his head vehemently. “I was talking about my ex-wife.”

“Oh,” Lexie said, her body deflating. “I didn’t really know her.”

“I didn’t sign the divorce papers the first time,” he said. “I felt like it was my duty to try again, but I just wasn’t happy, and it only ended up hurting everybody involved, especially Meredith.”

“So, you think it’s good that I left?” Lexie said.

“A relationship should be about more than just duty,” he said. “If the only reason you can come up with for staying was that he was shot, then yes, I do.”

“Would you want Meredith to leave you if that was the only reason she’d stuck around?” Lexie said.

He rubbed her back. Found himself nodding. I like to talk to you, Meredith had said. You can make me laugh, even when I’m freaking out. He’d come far enough, felt secure enough, to treat Lexie’s hypothetical scenario as she’d meant it. You don't judge me even when I say something stupid or freaky. You make me feel loved. You get me. Purely hypothetical. “I’d never want her to stay if that was the only reason.”

Lexie sighed. Nodded. Sat quietly in his arms for a long stretch of moments. He supposed this was a shooting-born catastrophe after all, but this was... actually... a lot like helping Meredith, he decided. Which, wasn’t as far out of his depth as he’d thought he would be in here.

“You know,” she mused in the dark. “We’ve never talked like this before.”

He cocked his head and looked down at her. “Like what?”

“Like you’re my brother instead of my boss,” she said.

He smiled. “Well, we probably shouldn’t make a habit of it.” He thought about it for a moment and decided to add, “At least, not at work.”

“Probably not, but... it’s nice for now,” Lexie said.

They stayed for a while in the quiet.

10:43 AM

A fruit cup, a juice box, a plastic fork, and a bag of unsliced, unpeeled carrots fell onto the desk in front of him. Meredith stood over him, a pensive look on her face as she bit her lip.

“I figured you’d forget to eat, so I brought some stuff from home,” she said. And then she frowned. “I’m sorry it probably looks like it’s for a five-year-old or something. I don’t really cook, and the cafeteria made pizza today, which I know you won't touch with a ten-foot pole unless all the cheese is picked off, and—”

“Meredith,” he said quietly. He took the fruit cup. He gave her the best smile he could manage under the circumstances. “You haven’t needed to remind me to eat in months.”

She shifted on her feet and plopped into the chair across from him. “I know, but this is your first day back, and I thought, maybe...”

“I’d get too stressed out?” he offered.
She deflated when he seemed to both get it right away and not harbor any anger about her doubts. “Yeah. Yeah, I... Yeah.”

She glanced around the room. He’d put his pictures back on the desk in what had been Richard’s office, including two new photos, one from their wedding, and one of Meredith's ten week ultrasound, which he’d had framed. He’d put his old, beaten copy of The Sun Also Rises back into the top left-hand drawer. He’d put his favorite blue pen into the pencil cup by the computer monitor. She paused for a particularly long while on the ultrasound photograph. And then she cocked her head at him.

“So, how are you?” she said.

She didn’t mention that she’d found him sitting in the dark. Or that he’d been rubbing his temples, trying to relieve a massive headache. Or that she’d had to call his name several times before he’d realized she was there. Or the fact that it was three already, and she was right. He hadn't eaten. Hadn't even thought about eating because he was too tense to want anything. Even the fruit cup made his stomach twist.

“I'm not hungry,” he confessed, his tone a little broken, “but thank you.”

The white light drifting into the office from the promenade gave her an otherworldly, silvery look. She wore her scrubs with a white shirt underneath. Her hair hung loose around her ears and over her shoulders. He let the world pause. Drank in the sight of her. Sighed. And then he stood.

She didn’t move as he hobbled around to the other side of the desk. He hurt. From all the tension in his arms and legs and everywhere.

He pulled her into his arms. Something he’d been thinking about doing all morning, ever since they’d parted ways with a long kiss at the car in the driveway. She’d still been wearing her bathrobe, and her hair had stuck up in weird places, because her shift didn’t start until after lunch, but he hadn't cared a bit.

He breathed her in. Her scent. Her heat. He pushed his fingers into her hair. He nuzzled her.

“Hi,” she said warmly.

“I really needed this, now,” he whispered.

“I had a feeling,” she said. Her hands slid along his spine as she embraced him. “How's it going?”

“Awful,” he said in a dark, thick voice.

Since he’d come back, he’d rediscovered budget reports. Job vacancies. Seattle Grace's revenues had been sinking steadily since the shooting. The Board had placed a hiring freeze on some of the more menial positions, like janitors, administrative staff, and orderlies, in order to compensate for the shrinking budget. Turnover rates in the nursing staff had skyrocketed as the nurses inevitably got pushed outside their job descriptions to make up for the lack of support staff. Too many empty nursing positions weren't being back-filled because there weren't enough applicants to meet the losses, and the problem was only deepening. A poor nursing staff was a sign of a bleeding hospital, and interns were getting harder to woo. Everybody from janitors to management seemed to be stressed out by trying to cover for all the people who weren’t there anymore, either because they’d been killed, or because they’d understandably fled an environment dominated by fear, overwork, and unhappiness.
Before, Derek's focus had been inward, and he hadn't noticed the hospital dissolving around him. All he'd been worried about had been navigating each day successfully without a meltdown or five. Now that he was back in full capacity other than the cutting, which he refused to attempt, yet, his focus had turned outward, and he hated what he saw.

“Your fault,” Mr. Clark said.

No, Derek insisted. Not his fault. But he still felt the need to fix it, or help, or... something. The trouble was, he had no idea what that something was.

“I don't know if I can do this,” he said.

He appreciated it when she didn't say, “Then don't.” She hugged him tightly. “Can I help?” she said instead.

He sighed. “Not unless you know how to make a thousand employees with their own versions of PTSD happy again. I had no idea it was this bad.”

She looked at him. “You had your own stuff to worry about.”

“I did,” he agreed. “And, now I have everybody else's stuff, also.”

“I think I might know what would help immediately,” she said, her voice a husky whisper.

He grinned. “Oh, do you?”

“Yes,” she said with a cute nod. She rose onto her tiptoes and pressed her lips against his. He felt her fingers pulling through his hair. “This,” she murmured against his skin, and kissed him again in the dark. “And this.” Another kiss. “And... this.”

“Hey, Shepherd,” Richard said, bouncing Derek out of another daydream like a bumper car. “Thought I'd check in.”

Derek's heart thumped in his chest, and he lost his breath. Eleven days. Eleven days of this, and he couldn't focus worth a damn. Worse, it seemed like every time he drifted, someone picked that moment to sneak up on him. The startles didn't last long, and Meredith said his flinches were barely noticeable when they happened, but the constant little scares didn't help his mood or his body.

He rubbed his temples, squeezing his eyes shut. “I'm fine,” he said. He inhaled. He exhaled. “Just a headache.” When he opened his eyes, the conference room lights didn't seem so much like sharp blades anymore.

Richard nodded as he approached the big table. “It's rough coming back after such a long break.”

“I promise, it's not going to go like last time,” Derek said, thinking of before, when he'd shown up for all of a day before he'd broken and disappeared on stress leave for weeks. “I'm back for the long haul. I'm just... adjusting.”

“I know,” Richard said, looking at the budget paperwork spread in a thick, messy fan on a five-foot spread of the table.

Derek had made his way through the first few pages with a highlighter before he'd sighed and put his head down. Just looking at the pile made him want to think of other things, like Meredith. Kissing Meredith. Meredith kissing him. He wondered, sometimes, if the headaches and exhaustion he came home with in the evenings, now, had more to do with the fact that he loathed the work, and not so much that he had a mental disorder.

Had he felt that bad in the evenings before he'd been shot? He couldn't remember. The things from before seemed so much more distant, like memories of a book he'd read a long time ago. He did remember in upsetting detail the number of times he'd been frustrated to the point of wanting to hit things. And he did remember the unsettling rift the position had punched through his marriage—something he vowed not to let happen again. Regardless, waiting for an epiphany to figure out exactly what he needed to feel “done” didn't seem to be doing much except piling on more slices of stress to his mental sandwich.

Richard pulled out a chair on the opposite side of the table. “A support system really helps you get through rough spots. I hope you realize you have a big one, now.”

Derek frowned. “A big rough spot?”

“A big support system,” Richard clarified.

“Um, thanks,” Derek said. The tips of his ears heated. “I do know.”

He looked down, and he pulled his hands through his hair. He pushed the piles of paperwork back into a foot high, neat, but now unsorted stack. He couldn't work on them right now. He just couldn't. Not when his head was splitting.

Richard leaned forward in his seat, which creaked with the weight redistribution. His gaze bored into Derek. “And I'm here if you need to talk about... anything,” Richard said.

Derek's eyes narrowed. “Anything.”

“Yes,” Richard said with a nod. “Anything.”

“I get the feeling we're talking about something specific,” Derek said.

Richard shrugged. “It's just that I'm in a unique position to know exactly what you've been going through, and I can help.”

The furrow in Derek's brow deepened. “You've had post-traumatic stress?”

“No,” Richard said.

Which made no sense. What was Richard getting at? What was there in common about this situation and Richard's, except...

Fuck.

“He knows,” Mr. Clark said, a sinister whisper.

A blade of ice slipped between Derek’s ribs. His heart inflated by two sizes. It thumped against his chest wall like it was trying to break free. He couldn't swallow. His breath slipped away in a short puff that he couldn't recuperate. His limbs shook. The room blotted.

“Derek?” Richard said, worry dropping his tone into something... almost fatherly.

How could the man be comforting when he knew what a hypocrite Derek had been? About everything? The whole fucking thing had been a replay of what had happened with Amelia from start to finish, but on fast forward, because Derek had already been through it once, and he'd been certain of how it would go again. He'd stomped in on his high horse, and he'd judged faster than a whip cracked, and, now...

“Richard, I'm...” Derek began, breathless, but he couldn't finish. His elbows thumped as he jammed them onto the table and put his face against his palms. He breathed in. He breathed out. This wasn't a panic attack. It wasn't bad enough. But it was, by far, one of the most unpleasant buckets of adrenaline he'd had dumped on his face in weeks.

Richard said something soothing. Derek didn't hear the words. Just the tone.

A minute passed before Derek didn't feel like he would fall to pieces in the chair. Beyond that, he didn't say anything because he didn't know what to say. An apology for being a self-righteous asshole felt woefully inadequate, just like it had when he'd finally said he was sorry to Amelia. An apology for keeping his addiction a secret felt pointless and fake, because Derek hadn't intended to tell anybody else. His wife knew. His family knew. His best friend and his wife's best friends knew. His therapist knew. In his mind, nobody else needed to know.

“I'm sorry,” he said anyway, if only to force his vocal cords to do something other than fill up with an unbearable, aching lump.

“You don't need to be sorry about before,” Richard said, misunderstanding. “You took me out of the equation when I didn't have the good sense to do it myself.”

I'm an alcoholic, Richard had said. People got hurt. I took advantage of Meredith. Thank you for stepping in.

Derek stared at his lap as his face blazed red. “No, I mean...” He swallowed. It hurt. “I'm sorry I didn't... understand.”

“A lot of people don't,” Richard said, no hurt in his tone, but that didn't make Derek feel much better.

Heat crept down Derek's throat from his face. “When did you...? How...?”

“You go to Joe's with Sloan, and you've never once gotten scotch or beer since the shooting. It's always club soda or ice water.”

Derek opened his mouth, but no words came out. Richard had joined him and Mark and Owen last week for darts. Only Mark and Owen had gotten booze.

“As well,” Richard continued, “I know the look.”

Derek blinked. “What look?”

“The look you get when you're upset, and you're thinking, however briefly, about the easy fix. I see it in the mirror, a lot. I know.”

Derek's fingers clenched. His heart thumped. “I'm not going to take—”

“I know,” Richard said before Derek could finish. “I believe you. But anybody who's been where we've been gets that look occasionally. Which is why I wanted you to know I'm around. If you ever need to talk.”

Derek forced himself to keep breathing at a steady rhythm despite the fact that his head was spinning. “Does anybody else... know?” he managed.
Richard shrugged. “It wasn't my business to ask or tell.”

“Nobody's said anything,” Derek said, more blind hope than any solid certainty.

“What would you like them to say?” Richard said, raising an eyebrow.

Nothing, really. Derek had fucked up. He'd let people down. He'd hurt his wife. And Mark. He knew it. He was coming to terms with it. He didn't need the world to rub it in anymore. “I don't know,” Derek said, the words quiet. He picked at his cuticles, unwilling to look up at the man who had been his mentor for years.

An awkward silence filled the room. Richard coughed conspicuously. “Well, I just wanted to... to stop by,” he said. “See how you were holding up. And to tell you I'm here if you need an ear.”

Derek swallowed. “Thanks,” he said, though he felt more sick than thankful.

He heard Richard getting up from the chair.

“Oh, admit it,” Gary Clark said. “You know you should have told him, but you didn't, because you're a coward, and now you're going to sulk about it.”

Derek clenched his fingers. He wasn't sure if he could dismantle that criticism, even with Dr. Wyatt's exercise of trying out how scenarios felt in his head when they involved other people. He wasn't sure if he'd agree with Meredith or his mom or Mark if they'd done the same thing. Worse, a sinking feeling in his gut told him he should have told Richard, and not only because he owed the man some karma points. In the years since Derek had been in Seattle, rebuilding himself, Richard had been there. As a friend, yes. But more as a father figure. The relationship had cooled to arctic levels when Richard had fallen off the wagon, but...

This was not one of the many times where Gary Clark had lied.

Derek's lower lip quivered, but he pushed the black, awful feeling of self-loathing away. It's okay to be afraid, Derek, Dr. Wyatt had said. Work with it, or push through it. It's only bad when you let it bowl you over.

Derek took a breath. This wasn't going to happen today. He'd been afraid. He'd screwed up. He was embarrassed. That didn't mean the world had to end, or that he was unworthy of living in it. There would be no sulking.

“Richard?” he called softly before Richard could leave.

Richard put a hand on the doorway and turned. “Yes?”

He stared back at Derek silently, eyebrows raised in askance. He really wanted to help. The desire was written all over his face. He'd been offering the same thing for months, now, almost from the moment Derek had woken up in the ICU, and Derek hadn't taken him up on it except under duress. In hindsight, he decided he'd been really fucking stupid.

There was an easy way Richard could help, too. Over the months, Derek had gotten more inquisitive in his attempts to forge some peace for himself. He'd asked Meredith for her version of the shooting. He'd talked to Mark. To Bailey. Tried to sort out the fact and fiction in his head. Dr. Wyatt had gone over each minute with him again and again until he was okay saying things like, “I was shot six months ago,” or, “I'm afraid of being shot again.” He'd gotten the beginning and the middle of the shooting mostly sorted. But he'd never talked to Richard about the end.
“What happened the day I was shot?” Derek said, taking the plunge. “With Gary Clark?”

Richard frowned. “What do you mean?”

“All I ever heard was that he was dead,” Derek said to his lap. “That he died... with you there.”

Richard walked back into the room, but this time he sat in the chair next to Derek's. Derek didn't look up. He saw Richard's pant leg. His lab coat. “I talked to him,” Richard said. “He only had one bullet left. We talked about his choices, facing punishment, or finishing his revenge and killing me. He decided to shoot himself.”

“I tried,” Derek said. He stared down the barrel of his memory. “I tried to talk to him, but...”

No talking!

“Some people don't want to listen,” Richard said, pulling Derek back into the room.

Derek clenched his jaw. “But he listened to you, and not to me.”

“He thought you were dead, and he only had one bullet left,” Richard countered. “He knew law enforcement was coming. He had more reasons to listen than not by the time I ran into him.”

Derek swallowed. “I almost got him to put his gun down, but... it wasn't enough.” His chest tightened when he thought of Dr. Kepner rushing in behind him, foolish and negligent, and then nothing Derek had done to diffuse the situation had been worth a flying fuck in the end. “I wasn't enough.”

“I don't think anybody would have been enough at that point. He'd already killed people, and he had no pressing reason to stop, yet.”

“No, I...” Derek sighed and looked up. “You're a better chief than I am. You're better at dealing with... people.”

“There's a learning curve to being Chief,” Richard said. “I've just had more experience.”

“No, you're better at it,” Derek said, shaking his head. “You were meant for this job. Take the compliment, Richard.”

“Administration does take a certain kind of person,” Richard admitted.

“I'm going to step down,” Derek said. Agitated, he pulled his fingers through his hair. “I just... I need to do some things, first. For my own peace of mind. And then I'll be out of your way for good. I'm sure the Board will rehire you in a heartbeat.”

Richard leaned closer. “What things do you need to do?” he said curiously.

“I don't know what they are, yet,” Derek said with a huff of frustration. “I just know that if I walk away, now, I'll spend the rest of my life feeling like a coward and a quitter. I need... closure.”

“Hmm,” Richard said, the word a low, noncommittal thrum of bass. His fingers brushed his beard.

“I want you to have this back,” Derek said. “I do.”

Richard regarded him. For a tense moment, Derek thought Richard might be angry, might call Derek selfish, but instead, Richard nodded, his expression thoughtful more than anything else. “I'm an old man,” Richard said. “I've met my goals. I've had a good life.” And then he stood. His chair creaked. “You'll let me know if I can help?"

Derek nodded. “I will.”

Before Richard left, he put a hand on Derek's shoulder. Squeezed. “You're a better surgeon than me.”

Derek blinked. “I am not—”

“You're the top neurosurgeon in the country,” Richard said before Derek could finish his protest. “You do some impossible stuff. General surgeons at my skill level are a dime a dozen. I'm good, but I'm not the best.” His eyes twinkled. “Just take the compliment, Derek.”

Derek grunted, a begrudging, quiet laugh. “Touché,” he said, and Richard left the conference room.

1:07 PM

He found Meredith in the skills lab, lobotomizing one of the neurosurgical dummies. She cursed a blue streak, filling the air with guttural, nasty words that belied her dainty frame. He grinned like a fool when he wondered how such a tiny woman could sound so much like a pissed off lion.

“Freaking piece of crap!” she said, almost a growl, as he set the plate down beside her. She glanced at him out of the corner of her eye and dropped her dummy scalpel on the tray. “I just can't get this!” And then her expression abruptly pinched with desperation when she turned toward him. Her gaze dropped. She ignored the pizza and fixated on his coffee mug. “Oh, god, give me that.”

Before he could stutter a protest, she'd snatched his steaming latte from his hand. She tipped back the bright blue “#1 Dad” mug she'd bought him as a gag gift in New York. Her throat bobbled as she chugged.

“Meredith, that's—”

“Hot!” she snapped, pulling it away from her lips. She put the cup on the table next to her mutilated fake brain. “Ish hot. Ow.” She shook her hands and panted. “Damn it. Thish ish jusht pufect.”

He gave her a wry grin. “If I say good afternoon, will you hit me?”

She glared at him and pulled the plate he'd put down for her into her lap without speaking. He'd grabbed her a piece of cheese pizza from the cafeteria line. She picked at it halfheartedly, probably because she'd just blown out all her taste buds with scalding coffee.

She sighed. “You're not gonna yell at me fuh duh cawffee?” She licked her lips and made a face, giving up on the pizza. She put the plate back on the table.

He pulled up a stool, sat down beside her, and kissed her. “Why would I yell at you for the coffee?”

“Caffeine ish bad fuh Baby.”

He laughed. “Mere, a single scalding cup of latte isn't going to hurt anything. You, on the other hand—” “Whud about me?” she snapped.

He snickered. “Well, it seems you might kill me without it.”

She sighed, the fight bleeding out of her, and she leaned against him. He pulled her close.

“I'm sho tired,” she said. “I really tried not to have any.” Still, she took his cup and blew on the surface. The brown liquid fluttered. She sipped more cautiously.

Despite her misery, he grinned. Eating or drinking something on the “no no” list was kind of huge for her. Though it was widely accepted that a cup of coffee a day wouldn't hurt anything, she'd religiously been staying away from any quantity of anything on the list Dr. Charlton had given her. She'd gotten considerably less morbid about Baby since their first ultrasound, and now that it was kicking with regularity, she seemed to have stopped fixating on awful possibilities and started fantasizing about all the good ones.

He gestured at her neurosurgical dummy. Simply eyeballing it, he couldn't figure out what procedure she was practicing for, which... was a bad sign. Either he was getting too rusty, or she was in dire need of instruction. “Can I help?” he said.

She put the coffee mug on the table, slumped against him, and let her eyes drift closed. “Don't you have Chief-y stuff to do?”

Yes. But he'd rather be helping her. “I have a few minutes,” he said honestly. His stared at the brain on the table.

“Shut up,” she snapped before he could open his mouth about the brain. “I know ish mangled. I'm jusht tired.”

He tried to keep the smirk off his face. “Um...” He poked the brain. “What is it? Exactly?”

But she didn't answer. Her breaths evened. She'd fallen asleep in his arms. He kissed the top of her head. He would need to move in a few minutes, but those few minutes? She could have those all to herself.

“—Shepherd,” a woman said. Dr. Shepherd! Thank god; you're back. “Dr. Shepherd!”

Something flesh-colored and mushy waved in front of his face, not close enough to make him feel threatened, but close enough to make him jump reflexively as his thoughts came back into the room. He managed to hide his flinch by turning down his head and looking through his desk drawer, letting the jitters slide out through his fingertips into his pen tray. He made an intentional racket as he routed through the pens. He breathed in. Out. In. Out. He grabbed a random ballpoint pen, a red one, like he'd meant to grab a pen all long, and of course he hadn't flinched. He clicked the cap and looked at the woman standing across from him.

“—Shepherd,” a woman said. Dr. Shepherd! Thank god; you're back. “Dr. Shepherd!”

He leaned back in his chair. He tried to relax, tried to unclench all the muscles that had tightened in her presence, but being around her set his teeth on edge, and being around her when she seemed nervous only fueled his own nervous fire. They didn't play off each other well. She seemed to know it, too. She'd either been avoiding him, or they'd somehow not run into each other more than twice since Thanksgiving due to happenstance. He was inclined to believe the former more than the latter. He couldn't think of any other staff member he'd seen less than her.

He cleared his throat. “Well, what can I do for you?” he prodded, and then he winced when her already unsure expression faltered further. He'd snapped. And he'd sounded impatient. Even to his own ears. He hadn't meant to snap or sound impatient.

Her mouth opened. Closed. “I'm...” She inhaled shortly and let it out. A loose bang fluttered as she pushed air over her lips. She reached a shaky hand to her clipboard and pulled out an envelope. “I wanted to give this to you.”

“What is it?” he said, reaching across the desk for it.

“My two-week notice.”

He blinked as his fingers closed around the envelope. The paper felt cool to the touch. Relief pinched his thoughts before anything else, and, weeks before, he would have rode it like a wave. Would have told her, So long, and thanks for all the fish. Except he couldn't, now, in good conscience, do that.

“Dr. Kepner—” he began.

“April,” she insisted, interrupting him.

He breathed in. He breathed out. Why did she have to act so familiar with him? “Dr. Kepner, you don't need to leave.”

She shook her head. “I do need to leave. I really, really do.”

He sat back in his chair and sighed. You did this to me, he'd nearly growled at her. You got me shot. Some of the tension bled away, leaving only tiredness. He swallowed, and he took another deep breath. “Dr. Kepner, I hope I've shown you that I can remain professional despite our personal differences,” he said, forcing cool when he couldn't manage warm. “Please, don't feel like you need to leave because of me. What happened before won't happen again. I promise.”

“My best friend died here,” she responded, her voice cracking on the last syllable. Her eyes reddened. Her clipboard and her little book fell to her lap as she reached up to wipe her face. “I found her body. Her head was blown to bits. I saw you get shot. I was threatened with a gun. You threatened me. I can't sleep at night. I have panic attacks. I just don't want to work here anymore. I swore to myself I'd try until the end of the year to see if it would get better. In two weeks, it will be January first, and it hasn't gotten any better. I can't do it anymore.”

He stared at her, not sure of what to say.

“You don't want me here, and I feel guilty whenever I'm in the room with you. It's just not a good environment for me. You might be able to force yourself to work with me, but I can't work with you.” Tears escaped her eyes, and sharp, wet slivers lashed her cheeks. His gut tightened as she added in a twisted whisper, “I just want to go home.”

He swallowed. Before, in the supply closet when she'd caught him falling apart, he'd gone on the offensive, and he'd been thrilled. Thrilled that he'd upset her. That he'd made her cry. He'd reveled in her tears. Reveled that he'd made her pay. That he'd gotten some justice. But watching her cry, now... There wasn't any justice. Her tears just made him feel sick, and he couldn't imagine why he'd ever wanted them.

His throat tightened. Silence in the office stretched. Sounds from the outside, footsteps, voices, and distant Christmas carols, filtered softly through the big glass window behind him, through the closed door.

“I didn't know you were having trouble,” he said, the words quiet.

“Nobody knew I've been having trouble,” she snapped. “My friends are all dead except for Jackson, and he's... got his own problems.”

Derek sighed. This was such a fucking mess. For weeks, for months, he'd felt like an emotional dunce because everybody was okay except for him, except he’d been finding out again and again since then that nobody was okay. Cristina had enough problems that she'd forced him onto a motorcycle in hopes of getting back her person. Owen was having problems, if Cristina's vague hints meant anything. Meredith had burst apart at the seams when he'd tried to thank her for saving his life. And now he'd come back to a hospital that was the equivalent of an emotional landfill. Everybody had problems.

Derek regarded Dr. Kepner for a long moment. He didn't like her. Thinking about when he'd been shot, thinking about her role in it, still coiled something awful inside of him like a snake. He blamed her. Her and Gary Clark. He couldn't say he wanted her to stay, because he didn't.

But he didn't want her to suffer, either. He didn't wish her any ill.

And he could help her.

“I want to write you a recommendation letter,” he said. “To take with you.”

“You don't have to do that,” she said.

“Yes, I do,” he replied. “And I'm sorry, Dr. Kepner. About the thing before. I wasn't... really in my right mind. At the time. What I did to you was very wrong.”

“It was,” she said. She paused, and she considered him. Her gaze softened, and for a moment, her expression seemed too tender. Too familiar. He cleared his throat, uncomfortable. She looked like she wanted to say something else, but she didn't. She gave her head a little shake. She stood, and her chair creaked. She clutched her clipboard and her book against her chest, and she brushed her lab coat with her free hand. “I appreciate the letter.”

“You can add me as a reference, too,” he offered.

“Thank you, Dr. Shepherd,” she said with a cold formality that seemed forced to his ears.

“Good luck,” he said, and he thought that was that, because she turned to leave.

She paused at the doorway, though, and she turned. Her sudden coldness turned warm again. “Hey, have you...?” She shifted on her feet. “You've gotten help. Right?”

He nodded. “I've gotten lots of help.”

“Good,” she said. “I hope...” Her head tilted as she considered him again. The warmth in her eyes was unmistakable. She cared about him. More than she should. “I hope things get better for you,” she blurted. And then she was gone.
His tension eased, leaving ache and fatigue behind. He clutched the envelope containing her notice letter, and only then, did he let the relief sweep him away.

3:28 PM

The gray water spread out beyond the big boat in a choppy, frothing sheet below a gray glass sky. The wind broke the surface, making small waves that sloshed and slurped. A one-pitch, moaning whistle filled the air around their ears as the boat sliced the air. The hum of the motor filled what would have been silence on the bay. The air smelled of salt.

Derek inhaled deeply. The breeze ruffled his hair. When he exhaled, all his stress sloughed away, leaving only the beautiful bay, and his beautiful wife, and his awesome dog to keep him company. Samantha rolled onto her back at their feet, exposing her belly, and he reached down to give her a rub.

“This was a good idea,” Derek said.

He scooted closer to Meredith on the bench and wrapped his free arm over her shoulder. He held Samantha’s leash with the other. Pets were allowed on leash on the ferry as long as they stuck to the sundeck or the vehicle deck. The sky was gray, but the clouds were thin enough that he could see a bright ball of light behind them, hanging low on the west horizon over Bainbridge’s approaching sheet of green. Bainbridge grew and the Seattle skyline behind them shrunk.

Meredith grinned at him. The wind had nipped at her cheeks and nose, turning them bright and rosy. “Wasn’t it?” she said. “I think, in this moment, I might be awesome.”

He laughed. “More than only in this moment.”

She stretched up her arms and breathed in the cool air and made the cracking, sated noise she often made after sex. He leaned close and kissed her, brushing his cold nose against her temple. She giggled.

“Ferryboats and Bainbridge for stress relief,” she said with a sigh. “I think we should make this a weekly date.”

“He laughed. “Deal,” he said without hesitation.

He looked forward to stepping off the boat almost as much as he liked being on it. The island had a small area near the ferry landing where there were quaint shops and little restaurants. There were also places to walk along the water, and the land was green and lush and refreshing. Sometimes, it amazed him that one could find the country so close to the city. While it took him an hour to drive to his land from the hospital, Bainbridge was only twenty minutes via ferry. It was a rapid change in setting when one needed to unwind, and, at this moment, he needed to unwind, because he’d been kinked more than a slinky with stress.

Samantha yawned, flashing her big teeth and her powerful jaws. Her eyelids drooped, and her tongue lolled, pitting the deck with slippery bits of drool as she relaxed, too.

“All right, so,” Meredith said, her body warm against him as she resumed their earlier discussion. He pressed his chin against her head, listening. “I think I know what will help you.”

“Oh?” he said.

“When you get stuck because you’re upset, you need to use your sexy voice.”
“My sexy voice,” he said.

“Yeah, you know.” She turned to him. Her voice dropped low and soft and soothing, and each syllable dripped like honey from her mouth. “Like this. You talk all soothing. It's impossible to fly off the handle when you do it.”

“My...” He blinked. “Really, I talk like that?”

She punched him in the shoulder. Not hard. She met his eyes, and she gaped at him when he didn't react with feigned hurt or a laugh. “You so know you talk like that. Particularly when you want me to stop freaking out.” Confusion bit into her expression, and her nose scrunched as she peered at him. “Don’t you?”

“I...” He blinked. “Well, I'm not sure I did it consciously.”

“You can't tell me that's not at least a little bit on purpose. You know women drop like flies around it.”

“They do?” he said.

She rolled her eyes. “Fine,” she said. “You can keep your fake-innocence about it if you must, but seriously, use it when you get all stuck in grr mode.”

He snorted. “I have a grr mode and a sexy voice?”

“Okay, now you're just teasing me,” she said.

He kissed her, and he laughed. “Maybe, a little. But, Mere, when I'm in grr mode,” he said, holding up his fingers as though they were quotation marks, “it's really hard to...”

“To what?” she prodded.

He looked at his lap. “To not bite people's heads off,” he said. “It's usually all I can do not to snap.” He sighed with frustration. “I hate this job.”

“So, pretend you're talking to me,” she said. “Maybe, you hate the job, but you love me.”

“You seriously want me mentally pasting your face onto everybody I talk to that I don't want to be talking to?” he said. It felt more than a little wrong to use her like that.

She shrugged. “If it helps, why not? It's kind of a compliment to me. Just... use the sexy voice. You officially have my permission.”

He leaned against her. Sighed. Nuzzled her temple. “Not that I'm complaining,” he said against her skin, “but when did you get to be so secure?”

“Well,” she said, “so far, I've survived secret wives, and bombs, and Alzheimer's moms, and drowning, and George dying, and drunk dads, and you getting shot, and, well, pretty much everything falling apart.”

He swallowed and pulled her close. Kissed her once. Twice.

“All that bad stuff happened,” she said. “You're still here.” She looked at him, reddening. “So...”

“I'm not going anywhere,” he said in a low murmur.
“That’s it!” she said triumphantly. “That’s the voice you need to use.” She grinned. “Whenever you’re upset and trying not to snap at people or whatever, you just have to find what you’re feeling right now, and use it.”

“I wanted you to know that I’m here,” he said, words thick with a swell of emotion. “And that it’s okay. And that I love you.”

“That’s great,” she said. “Use that. Think of that. And, actually, it’d really be best if you used my face for it, because holy crap that’d be weird if you didn’t.”

He chuckled. “I’ll try.”

He pulled her close, and she rested against him. Their coats smooshed together. The boat slowed as it entered the docking area on Bainbridge Island. Mist loitered in the air, and the smell of wet leaves and bark made him inhale. Samantha’s dog tags jingled as she stood up and looked at the shore with a bemused expression. She’d never been to Bainbridge.

“I believe you, by the way,” Meredith said.

“Hmm?” Derek replied.

She gazed at him through her eyelashes. “That’s how I got so secure. It took me a while, but I do. Believe you, I mean. About everything.”

“Oh,” he said. A lump formed in his throat. It was the first time since she’d found him naked on the floor in a mess of empty pill bottles that she’d ever said anything like that. He swallowed. “I won’t mess it up again.”

She stared at him for a long, silent moment. “I believe that, too,” she said.

“I love you,” he said.

She stole a page from his book and winked at him. “I know,” she said. She put her head back on his shoulder and watched the scenery slide by.

“Sir, are you listening, or am I wasting my time?” Pamela Springer said. Pamela sat across from him in the conference room. She wore a black pantsuit. She’d pulled back her hair into an austere, auburn ponytail. Her makeup made her features look severe, almost intimidating, which belied her high-pitched, grating voice and her small stature.

Derek blinked as the familiar jolt of adrenaline punched through him. The surprise receded as quickly as it had arrived. He gave his head a little shake, forcing himself to snap out of his encroaching thoughts. I wish I wasn’t, he wanted to say. I don’t fucking want to be here. But instead, he put Meredith in front of him, and he smiled for all he was worth. “Of course, I’m listening,” he said, offering her a smooth, soothing tone, the one Meredith had told him to use.

The trick worked, because Pamela relaxed and smiled back at him. Derek made a mental note to thank Meredith for the advice. He’d found he couldn't manage his “sexy voice” when he was too upset, but with some effort, he could find the soothing demeanor he was looking for anytime before he fell over the cliff. He stood, pushing his chair back with his thighs, and reached across the table to shake Pamela's hand. Stretching made everything ache, but he didn’t let himself wince. Friendly and collected, he told himself. Stay friendly and collected. And smile.

“I think it's a good idea,” he said. She'd suggested an amendment to Seattle Grace's pet ambassadors program that would allow people to have their own dogs visit. “But I'd like to see some numbers about cost, first, and I want to see some hard rules about when a visit would and wouldn't be acceptable.”

Pamela nodded enthusiastically. “I'll write up a proposal for you. Thank you!”

Derek’s insides tightened at the thought of more paperwork, but he refused to let it show. He forced that smile to stay stuck to to his face. Meredith, Meredith, Meredith, he thought. “You're welcome, Ms. Springer. Just meet with my secretary to make another appointment.”

She grinned. “Will do,” she said as she gathered up her purse.

After she left, he slumped with relief. He'd fallen into a routine where friendly and collected was getting much easier to fake, but... He missed the days when he'd genuinely felt friendly and collected, when he could be soothing to a stranger he wanted nothing to do with without it being much of an act. He pulled his fingers through his hair and sighed. This just wasn't him anymore. He didn't want to meet with people to talk about policy or money. He didn't want to manage.

He wanted to slip back into what he'd been before. A surgeon. Making personal connections on a smaller, more intimate level. Helping very sick people see another tomorrow. Saving lives. He wanted that back. He missed feeling fulfilled. He missed loving his work. Beyond Gary Clark, Derek's own ambition had really shot him in the foot.

He flexed his fingers.

Too bad the idea of cutting into a living, breathing person, a person he could easily kill if he fucked up, still scared the shit out of him. On top of that, surgeons were widely recognized as holding one of the most stressful professions available. Sure, it was immensely rewarding when things went right, but things went wrong a lot, too, and there was enormous pressure to make decisions on the fly, something Derek wasn't sure he was even capable of, anymore.

With a sigh, he followed the path Pamela had taken out of the conference room, and he walked down the bright, immaculate hallways. He smiled. He said hello to everybody he passed. Inquired about their families and their days and talked about their holiday plans. But he felt like a ghost.

When he found Mark loitering by the coffee pot in the attendings' lounge near oncology, Derek shuffled to a stop. Mark bounced as he prepared himself a cup of coffee with the added help of some Coffee-Mate Irish Créme. Mark hummed an off-tune version of... something that seemed like a cross between Jingle Bells and Deck the Halls.

Derek leaned against the wall by the pot and grinned, happy, finally, to have a distraction bound by the real world, instead of one conjured in his head. “You look too chipper, considering you’re slumming for free, bad coffee.”

Mark took a sip of his steaming coffee, winced, blew on it a bit, and turned to Derek with a smile that would have put the Cheshire Cat to shame. “Lexie is open,” he said.

Derek tilted his head to the side. “Open to what?”

Mark shrugged. And then he bounced again. Actually bounced. “She's open. She's free. Tyler told Marcia told Sandy told Bob told Debbie. No Karev. She dumped him in the middle of the cafeteria over breakfast!”

Derek snickered. “I had no idea you were such a gossip.”

“Hey, I paid good money for this intel.”
“Gossip,” Derek countered.

Mark shook his head. “Intel.”

“Gossip.”

“Intel!” Mark insisted.

“Hmm,” Derek said. “So, you paid Nurse Debbie for gossip?”

“Intel,” Mark corrected. “And that's beside the point.”

“The point, which is...?”

Mark sighed. He took a cautious sip of his coffee, and then a gulp when he found the temperature to his liking. “If you were Lexie, and I asked you out, what would make you say yes?”

Derek blinked at the unexpected request for role play, and he laughed.

“No, seriously,” Mark added.

Derek shifted and grabbed a paper cup from the shelf. Meredith had taken his good mug hostage, and his backup mug was sitting on his desk in his office. He poured himself some black coffee from the pot, and then went trawling through the sugar packets and creamers next to the pot. There was nothing he liked. It all screamed fat and cholesterol and other arterial badness. He'd take his coffee black.

“Nothing would make me say yes, Mark,” Derek said after some thought. He blew on his cup. “I'm not going out with you.”

A snort of derision caught his attention, and he looked up to find Cristina standing by the doorway to the lounge, caught mid-stride in the hall. She stared at her clipboard. Her face held no expression. She looked up and met his eyes, and only then did he identify a small, ticking twitch of her lip that could have been laughter in a normal human being. “You know, you guys seriously invite it,” she said. “You invite it! It's like... you're toast, and we're the butter... or something.”

“Yeah, keep walking, Yang,” Derek said.

“Or, maybe you're the crap, and we're the flies?” Cristina said.

“Keep. Walking,” Derek said.

“Just saying,” she said. And then she continued her surge down the hall on her original course, her black ponytail bobbing behind her.

Derek sighed. “It's like she has radar.”

“You mean faulty gaydar,” Mark grumbled.

“Meredith calls it a bromance,” Derek said matter-of-factly.

“That's not much better,” Mark said.

Derek laughed. “Oh, come on. You have got to work on your security issues.”

Mark made a face as he reddened. “Have you ever considered my issue isn't that I'm being perceived as gay, but that I'm being perceived as loving you?"

Derek smirked. “Hey, now, I'm a lovable guy!”

Mark rolled his eyes. “Shut up, and pretend you're Lexie, jackass.”

“I'm not going to pretend I'm Lexie,” Derek replied. He took a sip of his coffee.

“I need to get on this, man,” Mark said. “Somebody else could swoop in.”

Derek sighed. “Mark, she was really upset this morning.”

“Wait,” Mark said. “You knew she and Karev broke up, and you didn't tell me?”

“I haven't seen you!” Derek said. “I've been stuck in meetings and doing paperwork all day, and I'm sorry to tell you this, but I'm not Debbie.”

“It's valuable intel, man; that's all.”

Derek shook his head. “Gossip. And why don't you leave Lexie alone for a while?”

“Intel,” Mark said. “You think she won't say yes if I ask her, now?”

Are you freaking kidding me? Derek imagined her saying. Seriously? “Women like patience,” Derek said with a definitive nod.

Mark frowned, his expression concerned. He took a swig of his coffee. “So, give her time.”

“I guess so,” Derek said, shrugging. “Yeah.”

“How much time?”

“Do I look like a dating manual to you?” Derek replied. “Doesn't your how-to-woo book explain this stuff?”

“You and Meredith worked out,” Mark said. “You must know something.”

“Yes,” Derek said with a snort. “I know miracles happen.”

Mark sighed. “Man, c'mon, I really need h—” His speech stopped short when his beeper went off. He looked like he wanted to smash the thing, but he pulled it from his waistband and looked at it despite his clenching jaw. “Fuck,” he said. “Gotta go.” He gave Derek a suspicious look. “Don't think you're getting out of this.” He tossed his coffee into the trashcan and trotted off as Derek watched.

“Call me later?” Derek yelled after him.

“Shut up, man,” Mark yelled back.

Derek laughed. Some things, it seemed, had returned to an exquisite sort of normal.

6:54 PM

He woke in a bath of gray light with his nose pressed into her hair, and his body flush with hers. His arm draped over her hip. Her feet rested at the base of his shins. She smelled like lavender, and she'd left the scent on the sheets. On his skin. Rain pattered on the roof and plinked against the “Mmm,” he rumbled against her neck, and then he whispered, “Good morning.” Just in case she was still asleep.

He kept his eyes closed despite the light, and he didn’t move, not wanting to disturb her. The bed was warm, and for once, neither the dog, nor an alarm had woken them. He’d managed to coordinate their day off that week, an ability he counted as one of the few things he loved about being Chief. He didn’t abuse the privilege, but he used it now and then. Neither of them had anywhere to be or anything to do or anyone to meet that day. It was a true holiday. An island of calm in a giant, stressful mess.

Her body shifted, and she reached for the arm he’d rested on her hip. She squeezed his hand. “Mornin’,” she mumbled. “’S’warm in here. I like it.”

He grinned. “Well, we don’t have to move.” He kissed her neck. Her skin was soft. “We have all day.”

“Nuh uh,” she said. “You gotta move.”

He frowned. “Did you want me to make breakfast or something?”

She shook her head. “No.” She paused. “Well, yes, later, but...”

“But what?”

“You’re poking me in the back, and your breath smells.”

He laughed, long and loud, and it felt nice. “Sorry,” he said cheerfully, “I do tend to wake up that way, particularly when you’re in my arms.”

She shifted, and he thought if she hadn’t been pregnant, she would have rolled onto her stomach to curl under the covers. As it was, she hadn’t been sleeping on her stomach for weeks. “Halitosis and a boner,” she groused affectionately. “Yay me.”

He laughed as he crawled out from the covers and padded across the rug to the master bathroom. “I’ll fix it,” he called over his shoulder.

“Just the halitosis,” she said. “Leave the boner. I want that part for me.”

He chuckled as he stepped into the bathroom. “Yes, dear,” he said.

He brushed his teeth, used the bathroom, and splashed water on his face. In three minutes, he slid back under the covers and against her warm body. He sighed as he resettled. The sheets rustled. She grabbed his hand and pulled it to her mouth. Her lips pressed against his skin.

“Mmm,” she said, her tone more awake and hazed with sex. “Interested?”

He kissed her. A few months ago, he wouldn't have been comfortable enough to make a joke, because the Paxil made him self-conscious. This morning, the words, “When am I not interested?” slipped easily from his lips, and it didn't matter that more often than not, she had to help him get into the mood. He had the mood right now. Courtesy of waking up in a whorl of lavender-scented hair. They’d discovered the best time for him was in the morning, riding on the coattails of his last nighttime erection.
He sheathed himself like a key in a lock with the small gap between her thighs, just where they met her torso. The contact set him pleasantly askew. Her skin there was slick, and warm, and he relished the feel of her, so close, and yet so far. “Not poking, now?” he murmured.

“Better,” she said with a gasp. She ground her hips against him. “But I'm not ready yet.”

“I'll fix that,” he purred against her ear.

He squeezed her and slid his palm up the curve of her hip to her breast. Her soft skin passed like silk beneath his fingertips. She gratified him with her relaxed sigh. Her nipple perked under his thumb. Her breaths shortened. He pushed his other arm underneath her waist. His hand came to rest under her navel. He dipped low, pushing his fingers through her course hair, down between her legs, and he cupped her. Touched her. Stroked her. Her breath popped out in a long, slow moan, and her hand came to rest over his. He used the sound of her inhalations and exhalations to tell him what was right, and what was perfect. When she quivered, and when she gasped, he’d hit a jackpot.

“Good?” he said, just to be sure.

“Yes,“ she whispered, and her body twitched. “Oh.”

They made a quiet, sensual dance of it. The salt of her skin mingled with his. The rain beat on the roof like a collection of heartbeats.

He heaved a sigh and closed his eyes, imagining her body as he knew it by heart from the front. She was slender. Thin-boned. Her skin was a milky peach color, smooth, but dusted by more freckles than he could count. Her hips had a subtle curve before sloping into her long, long legs. Her belly and breasts had swollen as she grew their baby in her body. She worried sometimes about her waistline, but he tried to kiss the worries away whenever he caught them propagating. To him, she was a goddess, and he told her that with love and with words as often as he could.

The covers rustled as he shifted behind her. This position, spooning with him in the back, was perfect for letting him do all the work, and letting them both have fun at his direction. It wasn’t about control for him anymore, but finding things that were comfortable for her. In an amusing role-reversal after he’d been shot, it’d been him trying to find what worked for her, instead of her trying to find what worked for him.

He kissed her throat. A tinge of salt tickled his taste buds. Her heartbeat fluttered underneath her skin, and she turned her head to try and catch a glimpse of him as they rode a wave together. Her face had flushed with sexual heat, and her gaze had a dusky, desirous quality. Sweat dotted her brow. He kissed along her jaw, and he played her body like his harp.

When the hand he pressed between her legs felt slick with her desire, he shifted, angled himself, and he pushed into her to the hilt in one thrust. She gasped, and a choked noise fell from her lips. Her heat blitzed his senses. He’d come home.

“Okay?” he asked breathlessly.

“Yesssss,” she said in a long sigh as she squeezed around him. He couldn't suppress a moan, and their shivering exhalations mingled in a long chorus of desire.

Her body relaxed against him on the bed. He wrapped both arms around her waist, burying his fingers between her legs, adding pressure from the front as he pushed from the back, and a deep, twisting moan shuddered from her throat. She bucked against his hand, and they rocked together in a jagged rhythm of push and pull and push and pull.

The dog yapped at them, bringing him up short as he saw mocha-colored eyes beyond Meredith's shoulder staring at them mournfully.

“I told you she always watches,” Meredith said, and he laughed against her skin. She tasted of salt and sweat and lust. She was an elixir that set his world on fire.

“Sam,” he barked. “Crate.”

The dog’s ears twitched. She licked her lips once. Flashed her sharp teeth in large yawn. And then she plodded out of the room, cowed by his command.

“You're getting better at that,” Meredith said.

“Mmm,” he purred, beginning to rock against her. He kissed her. Nipped her ear as he found his rhythm again in the drumbeats of the rain. “Well, I’m not getting a blow job right now.”

She clutched the pillow and gasped. “I guess it’s harder to think with my mouth around your— ooohhhhhhhhh.”

He laughed as she quivered in his arms. “Harder to think, you were saying?”

With her body so close to him, slickly squeezing around him, he felt dizzy with desire, and he struggled to keep this about her. He drove to the patter on the roof, meandering between relaxing and frenetic, creating a wax and wane of needing. She urged him on with a staccato beat of, “Yes, yes, yes,” for minute after minute until nothing drove either of them but a frenzy of want.

When she fell to glorious pieces in his arms, he chased after her. Her belly twitched as her body pulsed around his length. He sucked in a breath as he found his peak not long after hers. For the torturous moment before he fell from the cliff, he found euphoria. Heat. Love. He saw spots. He thought, for that moment, he might die there, and then everything released into freefall. He collapsed beside her, panting as his lower body pumped against her, well out of his control, and then all was still.

They lay together breathing, spent, slumped, and silent, body to body, skin to skin.

He rested with his nose pressed into her hair, exactly as he’d woken. His palms rested over her belly. He basked in her warmth, never wanted to move again. The rain picked up, and the patter on the roof became a steady, clamorous thunder.

He kissed her. “I love you,” he murmured.

Her body shifted, and her palms pressed against his hands. “Love you, too,” she said, her voice a wrecked whisper that told him he’d done everything right.

His eyes drifted closed. He let the warmth, the feeling of home, and her love relax him, wrap him in a cocoon he didn’t think he ever wanted to crawl out of, unless perhaps she asked for pancakes. He drifted to the liminal space between slumber and sentience, but then she moved underneath his hands. His eyes snapped open, and his encroaching dreams dissolved.

“Oh,” she gasped, like she’d been startled, too.

“What’s the matter?” he said.
Her silence was filled by the falling rain. “You felt that?” she said.

“Felt what?” he said.

“Derek,” she said in a low voice, “that wasn't me.”

For a moment, he had no idea what she meant because the afterglow seemed to have zapped his synapses. And then he felt it again. Something small, perhaps a tiny elbow or a foot, drifted underneath her skin in a curve that almost followed his bottom palm line. Almost like it sensed his hand resting there.

He swallowed. “That's...”

She nodded. “Baby, yeah.” He could feel her smile, though he couldn't see it. The covers rustled as she snuggled closer to him. “Shh. Let's see if it happens again.”

They waited quietly, her hands clasped over his. They rested, joined just over her navel. The falling rain marked passing seconds. Less than a minute later, he felt it, whatever appendage it was, move back the other way.

“Oh, my god,” he said, barely able to find words.

“Yeah,” she said. “That was my reaction the first time, too. Remember?”

“I do,” he said, a faint, shocked whisper.

The world was dropping out beneath him. “Hi,” he said, swallowing. He thought his heart might flutter out of his chest. He sucked in a breath. “Hi, Baby.”

Meredith squeezed his fingers. “That's your daddy,” she said, looking down at the swell of her belly.

The baby moved again, and he laughed as his view of the world became a hot, messy blur. “Oh, my god,” he said again. And then he couldn't stop laughing. “That's our baby.” The euphoria he'd found earlier felt like nothing compared to this, felt like a drop in the massive bucket of happy. “Baby is moving, and I can feel it.” He couldn't catch his breath.

“I guess we woke her up,” Meredith said.

He nodded. “I guess so.” His fingers curled against her body as he felt their baby move another time.

“She gets like this sometimes,” Meredith said. “Where she won't freaking hold still.”

He laughed. God it felt good to laugh like that. “Meredith, she could dance a ballet. I don't want her to stop unless it's bugging you.”

“It's not,” Meredith said. She chuckled. “So, you agree, now?”

“About what?”

“That it's a girl?” she prodded.

“Well, I can't call something that dances that well an it,” he replied. “I'll go with your gut for now.”
She grunted, rolling to face him. He helped her shift. They were fathomless gray today. Like the billowing rainclouds outside. Or a stormy sea. She grinned, touching her palms to his face, and she kissed him, scruffy stubble and all.

He pressed his nose against her forehead and breathed. In and out. In and out. The world had the heady scent of lavender. He closed his eyes, and he pressed his hands against her belly, waiting for Baby's next exuberant greeting.

He spent his morning that way, naked, warm, curled up with his wife on a rainy day in their bed. Some of the best spent hours of his life.

“Hey,” said a weak, cracking voice. “Anybody home?” A hand with a plastic wristband waved in front of his face in the dark. Adam Peabody, said the wristband in new courier type. The wrist it gripped was sharp and boney and sickly pale.

Derek flinched, but he didn't know if Adam had noticed. Adam was flying high at the moment. Derek glanced at the cloudy morphine drip by the Adam's hospital bed, gaze lingering for a long second. A twinge of wanting swept through Derek as his hearthammered from the surprise. The morphine would fix it. All the jumping. All the times his heart skipped beats. All the fear. But as he pulled air in and out of his chest, as his heart stopped slamming, as he calmed, the wanting faded, and he managed to tear his gaze away from the siren song in the intravenous line and look back at the man.

“Sorry,” Derek said, shaking his head. Adam had been asleep when Derek had sat down, and Derek had drifted. He leaned back in his chair. The thin strip of light over Adam's bed lit the room by itself, lengthening the shadows. The sun sank below the horizon early in the winter, and the cloudy sky outside the window had already darkened to the dull, misty purple of light pollution. “I'm having trouble focusing today.”

“You seemed pretty focused just now,” Adam said wheezily. His heart monitor bleeped a quiet, steady rhythm. “Just not on me.”

Derek felt his face heating before he could stop it.

“Oh-ho,” Adam said with a weak laugh. “One of those thoughts, huh.”

Derek gave the man a sheepish grin. “Truth be told, I'd much rather be with my wife than at work today.”

“So, I'm your hairy substitute wife right now?” Adam said.

Derek took a long look at Adam and laughed. The tattoo on Adam's arm, what Derek had mistaken for a snake, was actually a dragon, according to Adam. Either way, the brilliant red serpent covered the man's entire bicep and wrapped all the way down his arm to his wrist.

“What's funny?” Adam said.

“Just trying to picture Meredith with that kind of ink. I think that dragon is as big as her entire arm.” Derek rubbed his chin with his fingers as he thought about it. She did have a little cursive sprawl in black on her ankle. Carpe noctem, it said. Seize the night. She'd gotten it when she'd been in Europe with Sadie, though he couldn't pull specifics from her, not because she didn't want to tell him, but because she'd apparently been hammered and couldn't remember.

“Meredith,” Adam said, snapping Derek loose from his musing. Adam smiled weakly. “That's a pretty name.”
Derek frowned. “I've never told you her name?”

“Nope,” Adam said.

“I could have sworn I told you...” Derek said.

“I'm sure you've told me a lot of stuff,” Adam said. “But I've been out of commission for a while. Remember?” He winced and bit his lip as if to prove his point.

The man lay flat in his hospital bed, barely mobile, bundled in a sea of thermal blankets and wires. A nasal cannula hugged his pale, angular face. A forest swath of black stubble covered his face, and the only reason the fuzz wasn't a full blown beard was because Derek had been helping him shave every few days. Adam had long, stringy black hair that would probably look better once the man could get into the shower, but at the moment, he couldn't even sit up, and the long hair combined with Adam's gaunt face to ghastly effect.

He'd been awake for only a few weeks, and off his ventilator for less time than that. Derek had been the one to find him. Adam had been blinking at the ceiling in a confused, drugged haze one night when Derek had stopped by to say his usual hello. Derek couldn't imagine how he himself would have felt if he'd woken up under the same circumstances, hurt and scared and alone, unable to speak. Derek had been all of those except alone when he'd first opened his eyes, and that had been bad enough. The mere thought of it made him feel sick to his stomach.

_I know this is very scary, Dr. Shepherd, a distant voice swirled in his head. Do you want to see Dr. Grey?

“Are you in pain?” Derek asked, pushing the past away. The man's wincing concerned him.

“Just the usual,” Adam said with a smile that showed clenched teeth, and looked more like a grimace. “Nothing much helps with it. I feel like crap. Blah, blah.”

Derek leaned forward. “I'm sorry.”

“Not your fault,” Adam said. “Tell me about... your wife.”

Derek grinned. “She's a surgeon here, too. She wants to specialize in neurosurgery. She says she's dark and twisty, but I disagree,” he said easily. She perhaps wasn't bright and shiny, but she was a light to him all the same. “She's got the best smile in the world,” he continued. “She's my best friend. She's my hero. And I really love her.”

“How'd you meet?”

“I picked her up at a bar across the street from here,” Derek said. “It was supposed to be a one night stand. And it was, until I found out we worked at the same hospital, and that I was her boss.”

Adam laughed, only to cringe as his face screwed up. “Oh, that's classic,” he said breathily. “So, why are you thinking about Meredith instead of work?”

“I'm just... frustrated,” Derek said.

Adam's eyebrows rose. “About?”

“I've been on a reduced schedule,” Derek said. “I only started working full time again last week.”

“That sounds like cause for celebration, not frustration,” Adam said.
Derek gripped the bed railing by Adam's head and squeezed. Tension lanced up his arm. “I don't want to be Chief of Surgery anymore.”

“Then why are you?” Adam said.

Derek tilted his head. “I... can't quit,” he said. “Not right now.”

“Why not?”

“Because I want to fix some things before I step down,” Derek replied.

“So, fix them.”

“I don't know how,” Derek said. “I'm not even sure where to start.”

Adam snorted. “Sounds like you have a dilemma, then. And a hairy substitute wife with tats.”

Derek rolled his eyes, a breathy almost laugh pushing from his lips. “Look, can I get you anything? Magazines? A movie to watch? Ice chips? Anything?”

“The company's nice,” Adam said. “Keeps my mind off things.”

“I know the feeling. I was...” Derek said before his voice trailed away. Shot. I was shot. For some reason, he wasn't ready to say it when Adam was awake. The relative anonymity was like a drug, Derek thought. Heady. Hard to let go.

I was shot, and I was so afraid.

“Yeah?” Adam prodded.

Derek swallowed. He pressed his hand against his chest. Though he couldn't feel any of his scars through his lab coat and his shirt, he could still feel the awful, ugly bump near his clavicles at the top of what had been his sternal incision.

I was shot.

Visiting you reminds me that victims can win.

I was...

A man came into my hospital and tried to murder me.

I...

“Nothing,” Derek said, shaking his head. “Never mind.” His beeper went off shrilly in the quiet, and he reached down to look at it. WRU?-M. He couldn't stop the smile that slipped across his face as he interpreted the message. Where are you? -Meredith “That's my wife,” he said for Adam's benefit. “We have a dinner date in Bainbridge. It's a thing we've started doing.”

“Go,” Adam said, making a weak shooing motion with his hand. The end of his pulse-ox meter flapped in the air. “The real thing is definitely better than daydreaming and hairy substitutes.”

“Hey,” Derek said congenially, “the daydreaming was about the real thing.”

“Yeah,” Adam said, “a repeat. Go get your new episode.”
Derek gathered his briefcase and stood. He stretched. His body was full of aching kinks, but just knowing Meredith was waiting for him in the lobby made most of the latent stress funnel away. He almost skipped toward the door. Almost. But he caught himself. When he reached the threshold, he gripped the doorframe and looked back into the room.

Adam lay in the dim light, eyes closed already. From the doorway, he looked even more pale and gaunt than he had looked close up. He would be spending Christmas alone in the hospital, unable to get out of bed, which made Derek's heart squeeze. Nobody deserved that.

You look small like I did...

“Hey, Adam?” Derek called softly.

Adam snuffled and squinted at him. “Yeah?” he said, the word more asleep than awake.

Derek's lips moved, but nothing came out until he tried a second time. “Are you scared?”

“Of?” Adam said.

Derek swallowed. “Guns? Being... attacked?”

Silence stretched. Adam's heart monitor bleeped softly in the dark room. “No,” Adam replied after some consideration. “Just pissed that they got away, and that I'm stuck eating out of a sippy cup.”

Derek gazed at Adam. I know it sucks. “It'll get better,” he said. “Slowly, but it will.”

It took me six months to feel half normal.

“I know,” Adam said. “Thanks.”

“I'll see you later,” Derek said.

“Later, husband,” Adam muttered, and then his breaths evened as he fell into a needed healing sleep.
Lexie had a mushy look on her face again. It was the third time in ten minutes that Meredith had looked up from her charts to find her half-sister staring, her head tilted slightly to the side, lower lip pouting, as if she'd just finished saying, "Aww." Except there'd been no noise, so Meredith couldn't be certain.

"You're making goo-goo eyes at me," Meredith snapped, stopping mid-pace.

Lexie's face reddened, her misty look shifting to something less schmoopy. In the world's most transparent attempt at misdirection, she looked back at her phone and started pressing buttons like she was texting somebody. The gurney she'd stretched out on squeaked as she resettled. Cristina, who hadn't even looked up, flipped a page in her book. Meredith continued pacing.

Mr. Wilson's symptoms were bizarre, and they didn't match any case Meredith had ever seen. She stared at his charts. His stats were all normal. But there was nothing normal about how he was behaving. If the MRI hadn't been clear, she would have sworn she was looking at a—

She whipped around on her heels. "What?" Meredith snapped, and Lexie blushed again. "Seriously, what is it?"

"Nothing," Lexie rushed to say.

"What's with the gooey face, then?"

"Absolutely nothing," Lexie said, too quickly to be innocent.

Meredith sighed with exasperation. "I've caught you staring four times!"

Lexie's words were a rush. "No you haven't."

"Yes, I—"

Cristina slammed her book onto the gurney. "Oh, for god's sake. You're waddling. Like the pregnant woman that you are. And Dr. McSappy thinks it's adorable or something equally gross."
Meredith looked indignantly at Cristina. “What? I am not. No way. I'm not waddling.” She took a demonstrative step forward, but her attempt at a sexy sashay failed, and she moved a bit like a duck instead. Not waddling, though. Definitely not— “Damn it!” she snapped when she saw Lexie turning to goo again.

When Derek glided through the double doors, all graceful lines and unbridled sexy, she rolled her eyes. “Do I waddle?” she asked him point blank.

He blinked as he took in the sight of her, and his features scrunched with visible affection. “Why, hello, Dr. Grey. It's so nice to see you, too.” He circled her, his step light, and closed in for a peck on the cheek.

She ignored him. “Do I waddle? They say I waddle.”

“I never said you waddle!” Lexie protested. She jabbed her thumb at Cristina. “She did. Why am I getting blamed?”

“Whatever,” said Meredith. “Your eyes have a vocabulary.”

“More like a thesaurus of the barf-worthy,” Cristina said, her tone wry.

Meredith folded her arms across her aching breasts. “So, do I waddle, now?” she said again to Derek.

Derek didn’t have a chance to respond because Mark pushed through the double doors, more There’s a skull fracture underneath.”

Derek nodded. “Sure.”

“Hi!” Lexie chirped.

Mark blinked and looked back at her. “Hello, Little Grey,” he said, his voice calm and humoring.
And then he turned back to Derek. “Can you come look at this, now?”

They departed together. “Don't think you're escaping my question!” Meredith called after Derek before he disappeared.

He looked over his shoulder and gave her a smirk. “I assure you, it's a very cute waddle,” he said with a wink, and then he was gone, the double doors swishing behind him.

“Oh, screw you, Dr. McDreamy,” Meredith grumbled. “I do not.”

Lexie deflated. “Hi,” she said, rolling her eyes. “Hi? Hi? What the hell is wrong with me?”

“What isn't?” Cristina said.

“Jeez, why are you always so grouchy?” Lexie said, folding her arms across her chest in a perfect imitation of Meredith. Cristina apparently deemed the question rhetorical and didn't respond.
Lexie sighed, her expression glum. “Damn it. Who says hi?”

Meredith frowned. “People saying hello?”

Lexie made a growling sound of frustration, something halfway between guh and augh with a little grr thrown in. She threw her hands in the air, slammed against the swinging doors with her right shoulder, and followed Derek's route of escape, frowning all the way.
The funny thing about this whole debacle was that she had intended not to wake Derek up.

“Damn it!” she hissed at nobody in particular when she heard the alarm console by the front door chirp.

The contents of her grocery bag toppled onto the kitchen counter as she startled. The bag of apples hit the granite with a progressive series of dull thuds, and the sparkling cider bottle clanked in protest. Sunlight streamed through the frozen window panes, making the bottle glint as it rolled to an abrupt stop when it hit the faucet. A rawhide that was supposed to be a New Year’s treat slid out of the bag and to the edge of the counter, and Samantha exploded off her haunches from the floor to grab it. Meredith didn't have a chance to rescue the hide from certain doom.

“No, no, no,” she whispered in a quiet litany as she gracelessly kneed the dog out of the way and made a waddling but frantic beeline for the front door. She'd been so fixated on tiptoeing past Derek, who'd been sleeping on the couch in the living room, that she'd forgotten to enter the freaking code. She had maybe a few seconds before—

The chirp turned into something much more high-pitched and abrasive just as she slid to a stop by the console, and Derek's cell phone began to shriek on the end table by the couch where he lay, a lump under several blankets. Then a clamorous crash tumbled out of the kitchen, and Meredith looked back to see the grocery bag fall to the floor. Samantha's head had disappeared inside, and Meredith barely had a chance to wail a baleful, “No!” before Derek's blankets had flipped back from his face, and he snapped upright. A notepad and a pen, which had been resting precariously on his stomach, fell to the floor beside the couch with a smack, and the pen rolled under the couch.

“What the hell?!” he barked, out of sorts and flailing, and Meredith had a brief, panicked moment of indecision about whether to turn the freaking alarm off, answer the phone, run to Derek, or save the honey-baked ham from the dog. The racket was paralyzing.

After a heartbeat, she shook herself back into action. The green LED display on the alarm was blinking at her accusingly. Code, code, code....

“What should our code be?” he asked, looking up from the little instruction booklet.

“I don't know,” she replied. “Not something simple like a birthday. The crooks always figure those out in the movies.”

A ghost of a smirk lit his tired, space-y features. “Oh, do they?” he said, his tone the barest, grumbling, haughty hint of the Derek she worried she might never see again.

She nodded and smiled, unwilling to let his dour mood stomp on her hope. “They do.”

His gaze tipped up in thought for a moment, and then he came back to earth with a small shrug. He punched a familiar string of numbers into the pad and hit enter, and then typed them in again to confirm.

She grinned as she slipped her arms around his waist. He tensed for a moment at the constricting contact, and then relaxed as she rested her chin against his shoulder blades. “That was the day I started at Seattle Grace,” she murmured against him.

A rumbling sort of laugh filled his torso and tickled her cheek. “I prefer to think of it as the day I met you,” he said. “It was a very good day.”

“We met the night before,” she countered despite the fact that her insides were melting. “You were in your sexy red shirt, and you took advantage!”
“I believe you took advantage in this story,” he said.

“Whatever,” she replied. “It was still the night before.”

He turned in her embrace to face her. He gave her a charming smile that didn’t quite reach his eyes, but she could pretend for a minute that everything was fine when he looked at her like that, 75% of what he’d been before the shooting, and for that minute, she felt like she’d started to float. He wrapped his arms around her in return, and he put his stubbly chin against her forehead. He inhaled deeply, like he was breathing her in. He reached up with his right hand, and his snaked his fingers through her hair. “I distinctly remember you refusing to give me your name until I woke up naked on your living room floor.”

“Distinctly?” she murmured.

He kissed her. “Yes, distinctly.” And then he frowned. “I may have had a slight hangover, though.”

“So, not quite so distinctly, then?” she said.

He considered her for a moment. “Distinctly with a side of headache and a yearning for aspirin.”

She sighed. The heat of his body flush with hers relaxed her. Made her feel mushy and loose and boneless. She liked pretending things were okay, sometimes. “Okay,” she said as he nuzzled her. “I guess you win on a technicality.”

“I can live with that as long as I win,” he said.

They shared a laugh together. She ignored the fact that his sounded hollow and unconvinced of the humor, like he knew he’d been given a part to play and was trying hard, but he wasn't a great actor, and he couldn't sell it. Then the gap in conversation stretched, and the following silence curdled. Or, maybe she was just being silly and imagining things, because his moods had been so precarious, lately.

She traced lines down his pectoral as she clenched her fingers and ended up resting her fist against his healing heart. She bit her lip as they stared at the newly armed alarm. “So....”

“What?” he said, a little too glumly, and her insides tightened. She hated how fast his moods swung.

“Does it—” She cut that question off before she could finish it. She didn’t want to hear him tell her it wasn't helping. That it wouldn't help. She took a quick breath and let it out. She smiled, looking up at him through her eyelashes. “I hope it helps you.”

His gaze softened, and some of the dark edges fell away. “Yeah,” he said in a wistful tone that made it sound like they were discussing the minute possibility of purchasing a winning lottery ticket, not the simple idea of feeling safe in one’s own home. He leaned forward and pressed his lips against her forehead. “That’d be really nice.”

She jammed the code into the number pad as fast as she could, her fingers flying across the keys. The shrieking alarm stopped wailing at her, and she turned to her husband, giving up on the honey-baked ham. Derek was much more important than a honey-baked ham, which was probably half gone already, if she were to base an estimate off the horrific snarfing sounds of a carnivore delighting in dinner coming from the kitchen.

“Derek,” she began, “I'm so——” She stopped in her tracks, and her jaw fell open as he stiffly held up an index finger at her in the universal sign for, “Give me one moment,” though it had a slightly tense edge to it. Sort of a, “Give me one moment, damn it,” she amended.

“Yeah,” Derek was saying into his phone, his voice tight. His hair was mussed, and he looked bleary-eyed, but his sharp tone didn't show any sign of his quick severance from dreaming. “No, no police. We're fine,” he said, almost a snap. Derek glanced at her, then at the alarm pad, and then he flopped back down on the couch with the phone cupped to his ear. “Yeah, just a mix-up. Thank you.”

He tossed the phone onto the coffee table where it landed with a smack and skidded into a magazine. He closed his eyes for a brief moment as he pressed his palms against his face and sighed. Then his palms dropped to his sides and clutched the cushions. He sat up with a vague grimace that spoke of effort, not of pain, and looked at her with an unreadable expression.

She bit her lip. Scratch that. She could read it all right. He was pissed off. He was pissed off, and he was trying very hard to keep a lid on it, based on the grinding of his molars.

The dog made another noise in the kitchen that made her think of lions ripping up helpless gazelles on the savannah, which, of course, she'd only seen in documentaries, but it was hard to forget a sound like that. She considered the ham a lost cause, but Derek rose to his feet and trudged into the kitchen without speaking.

She felt compelled to say, “Sorry,” into the silence.

He didn't respond as he entered the kitchen. He hissed at the dog, who didn't listen, so he escalated to a barked, harsh, “Hey! Get away from that!” And then he pressed his knee against the dog's shoulder.

When that still didn't work, Derek grabbed her collar and yanked. Samantha's feet scrabbled on the floor as she struggled to keep her purchase. Her muscles bulged. She kept her muzzle stuck in the ham as long as physically possible, and pieces of torn meat came away with her jaw as Derek managed to drag her away by force.

Derek snapped again, “No.”

The dog finally seemed to listen and hopped back a step, out of Derek's grip. She looked up at Derek with a dejected expression. He glared back at her, and she slunk out of the kitchen with a veritable raincloud of guilt hanging over her head.

Samantha's behavior in the aftermath was almost funny, and Meredith would have laughed, were it not for the tension thick in the air.

Derek bent down to pick up the ham.

There was still a lot of meat left on the thing, but there were huge chunks taken out of it, their ragged edges littered with stringy bits of fat and muscle fiber. There was no doubt it was ruined – Samantha was devastating when she wanted to get into something. Bits of foil and plastic wrapping had spread over the kitchen floor as though they were confetti blasted from a canon. Rare, unfiltered winter sunlight that belied the chill in the air streamed through the window panes, making the foil gleam.

Derek dropped the ham into the sink, still silent, and still not looking at her. He bent over to pick up the fallen apples, next.

She fidgeted as she watched him, shifting her weight from foot to foot, until she finally felt compelled to fill the silence. “Can I help?” she said. She would have just butted in, but he'd monopolized the space where the disaster had occurred, and fighting over who picked up bruised apples seemed rather silly.

“I've got it,” he said flatly.

She grabbed the cider off the counter instead and put it into the fridge. “I hate that freaking alarm.”

He looked at her with a raised eyebrow. “You're the one who wanted it,” he said, not hiding the passive-aggressive accusation in his tone. The snotty passive-aggressive accusation, she thought. Derek really did know how to act piss-y.

Something inside her head snapped. She'd tried. She'd tried to get the freaking alarm turned off before it started shrieking. Before it automatically notified ADT that something was up. She'd been shopping for them to get the stupid ham and dog treats and cider and everything, because he'd said he wasn't feeling up to people today.

“For you, Derek,” she said, her voice low. “I wanted to get it for you, so you could feel safe in your own freaking home.”

“Well, it doesn't make me feel safe,” he said through gritted teeth, his tone low and throaty. He glowered. “It's just a big fucking annoyance.”

A pit hollowed out her righteous anger, and a lump formed in her throat. They hadn't really talked about this in ages. She'd just assumed, since he'd been doing better.... “You still don't feel safe at home?” she said.

He rolled his eyes. “Meredith, I feel just fine at home. The only reason that alarm was even armed was because I think Lexie forgot I was on the couch when she left for work.”

“Oh,” she said, relaxing as relief crashed through her like a wave. “Well, that's good... but....”

“But what?” he snapped.

“Why are you freaking pissed at me, then?”

He looked at her like she'd just spoken in a foreign tongue. “I'm not pissed at you...,” he said slowly.

“Well, you're acting like a piss-y jerk,” she snapped.

He blinked, and his expression softened. He breathed slowly in and out for several seconds, and Meredith realized he was doing his thing. The thing that kept him from panicking when he was feeling panicky. Except it apparently worked on temper tantrums, too.

“Meredith,” he began, his tone low and stretched and forcefully calm, “I got yanked out of a very good dream by an alarm shrieking so loud my ears are still buzzing, then I had to be coherent for a phone call asking me if I wanted the police sent out to my house, our New Year's Eve plans are in Samantha's stomach, I basically just had to choke my dog to get her to listen to me, and on top of all that I had a shitty day at work yesterday. It truly has nothing to do with you. I'm sorry if it seemed that way.”

“Oh,” she said, slightly relieved. Not relieved that he was angry. That was still bad. Her insides tightened. God, she'd gotten so used to him lashing out at her over countless months, it just felt weird when he was only a regular version of pissed.
“I’m really sorry,” Derek said again, the words stiff. He didn't make a move toward her.

“I guess I’d be a little pissed, too,” she admitted.

He swallowed, and he looked away. Out the window. Skeletons of trees danced outside in the wind. Smoke curled out of the chimney of her back neighbor. “I’ve been trying,” he said, his tone edging on frustrated.

“No, that was really good,” she said. “I just read it all wrong.”

She gave him a hopeful smile as she approached. He must have caught her movement out of the corner of his eye. He returned her smile, though it was somewhat forced. Like his eyes didn't quite mean it, yet. That was okay, though, she supposed. He was allowed to be pissed off. Just... not at her. Not when she didn't deserve it, and this time, she damned well didn’t.

She wrapped her arms around him. His body was tense, and it took him several moments to relax, but then it was like a switch had gotten flipped, and he... melted. There was really no other word for it. He melted against her, pressing his nose into her hair. His warm palm pressed against her belly, like he was reminding himself. He heaved a colossal sigh, and then it was like all his anger had been flushed away. She much preferred this gradual, quiet release to his typical snarling explosions.

“A good dream, huh?” she murmured.

“Mmm,” he rumbled. “Yes.”

She grinned. “Was I in this dream?”

“Yes,” he said, the word unabashed.

“Clothed?” she said, quirking her eyebrow suggestively.

He pulled away to peer at her. His eyes were finally smiling along with the rest of his face. “As a matter of fact, yes.”

“Oh?” she said, surprised. “What was I doing?”

“We were in the OR,” he said. “And I wasn't scared, and it was going well, and it was just... nice.”

She grinned at him. “You were dreaming about cutting again?”

“Yeah,” he said, his tone mysterious. He cocked his head to the side, and his expression grew ponderous. “Admittedly, I think it was on a very distressed, brain-damaged grapefruit, and Cristina was riding a motorcycle in circles around the table, but still...”

Meredith burst out laughing. She kissed him. His lips were cool and soft against hers, and he tasted faintly of mint, like toothpaste. “No more unusual than being chased by a can of spermicide, I guess,” she said against his skin, remembering a nightmare she'd had months ago.

He winked at her. She rested against him as he drew his fingers through her hair. “We could get rid of the alarm,” she mused, “since we both hate the damned thing, and it doesn't help you.”

“Mmm,” he said. “I don't really seem to need help on that front anymore.”

“Did it ever help?” she asked.
He snorted and looked at her ruefully. “Not really.” He shook his head, looking off into the distance. “Before, it was just... constant. That... feeling.”

“Being scared?” Meredith said.

“Yeah,” he said, swallowing. “The only thing that changed was how loud it was. In my head.”

“And it's not loud anymore?” she said.

He shrugged. “It's not anything anymore. Not when I'm at home.”

Her heart squeezed. “That's really good, Derek.” And then she blinked. Looked at him. “Hey...”

He frowned at her. “What?”

“You didn't freak out,” she said.

“Freak out about what?” he said.

“The alarm. And the phone. And the dog. Waking you up. It was all really loud, Derek. But you woke up, and you spoke coherently on the phone, and you disciplined the dog, and you didn't freak out.”

He stared at her.

“Did you feel like freaking out?” she demanded.

He thought for a minute. “No.... I was flustered. Irritated as fuck. But not freaked out.”

“Yeah, well,” Meredith said. “Newsflash, but normal people would feel like that too, given that situation.”

“I guess I just....”

“What?”

He grinned at her. “Home is....” He shrugged. “Home is home. It's okay. It's home.”

Meredith laughed. “I guess we're moving up in the world.”

He nodded as a yawn cracked his frame, and he reached up to wipe his watering eyes with his hands. This was his first day off in a week, and he'd come home completely wrecked with exhaustion the night before. He'd collapsed into bed as soon as he'd gotten home – he hadn't spoken more than five words to her before he'd crashed – and it seemed like he still hadn't quite bounced back, yet. As the weeks had passed since he'd returned to work, he'd gotten a lot better at forcing himself to deal with work and the people at work, but the strain of that, together with the fact that heart surgery patients sometimes took over a year to feel like they were back to normal, left him enervated in the evenings. He still rarely stayed up past nine or ten, and he wasn't at all chipper in the mornings. Not like he used to be. She'd even caught him hitting the snooze button several times.

“You should go back to sleep,” she suggested. He clearly needed it. “Maybe, you can go back to that dream.”

He pinched the bridge of his nose and grunted. “Yeah, maybe,” he said, not even trying to come up with an excuse to stay awake. He ran his hands through his hair as he pulled out of her embrace.
“I'll get the foil later,” he said, and he padded out of the room, said foil crunching under his bare feet, before she could tell him not to worry about it.

As she grabbed the broom in the corner, she heard the cushions squeak. He sighed. Blankets rustled. She swept up the foil refuse quickly and dumped it in the trashcan. He was already asleep by the time she went into the living room. His discarded notepad still lay on the floor by the couch, forgotten. She picked it up, frowning. He was already asleep by the time she went into the living room. His discarded notepad still lay on the floor by the couch, forgotten. She picked it up, frowning. He rolled away from her, presenting his back as he pressed his face into the back cushions. His deep breathing continued, and she absently pulled the slipped blanket up to his jutting shoulder as she looked at the notepad.

He'd written a number one followed by a period, as if he'd intended to write a list, but the only item on the page was number one, which said, “Pray for a miracle.” And it had been crossed out with harsh pen strokes that left dents in the paper. There was nothing written after it. The margins had some idle scribbles and squiggles, and at the bottom of the page, he'd drawn a stick figure fishing on a dock or something.

She plopped down into the easy chair, still frowning. She'd written aborted lists like this before. Usually when she was frustrated, trying to work things out, and couldn't think of what to add, just that writing a list might help organize all the stuff tangled inside her brain like spaghetti.

“Derek, what's this?” she said before she could stop herself.

For a moment he didn't move, but she heard his breathing change. “What's what?” he muttered into the cushion.

She winced at the exhaustion dragging at his words. “Sorry. Sleep. It can wait.”

He didn't comment, and his breathing evened within moments, more testimony to his need for rest. She leaned back, breathing softly. The air still smelled of spruce and wintergreen, and she found it soothing. Baby seemed to like it too, because Meredith felt her moving, rolling over like she was turning in her sleep. Meredith smiled, placed her hands on her belly to feel, and drifted.

“Meredith,” he said, snapping her out of dreams.

She twitched under the covers and groaned. It was dark. The air was cold outside the blankets. She had no idea what time it was, but it was dark and cold, and dark and cold meant time for sleeping.

“No,” she said.

The pleasant scent of cut spruce tickled her nose. The mattress dipped beside her. He slipped under the covers with her and lay parallel to her, spooning her with his endless warmth.

“No?” he replied. “I haven't said anything, yet.” His words were soft and low like velvet against her skin. “I could be telling you I won the lottery, you know.”

She could hear him smirking. Screw the idea of smirks being a facial expression; his were noisy, and they sucked to hear when she was trying to sleep, no matter how much sexy he cranked into every syllable.

“Whatever it is, no,” she said. Especially if it was sex, she thought, which, in this tired moment, would be so far from winning the lottery, Derek's lovely attributes notwithstanding, that she couldn't even muster the will to be hypothetically excited for her future not-tired self if she were to take a rain check on any proposed sexy goodness. “I'm exhausted, and I don't have to pee for once, nor is Baby kicking like she's in a soccer match, and I'm sleeping.”
His nose pressed against her neck. “Okay,” he said without further comment or protest.

He made a small, pleasant sound deep in his throat, a murmur against her ear. He wasn’t smirking anymore. His breath ruffled her hair. His warm arms wrapped over her body. He pressed his palm against her belly. Whether Baby was kicking or not, he loved to do that. Then he sighed, and his breaths evened out along with hers.

If she’d been more awake, she might have gotten jealous about how fast he collapsed into slumber along side her when sleeping hadn’t even been his idea, but the Land of Nod took her away soon after, and she lost track of the world for a while. Until she did have to pee.

When she got up, he wasn’t in the bed anymore. After she relieved herself, she waddled back into the bedroom. The curtains had been drawn, plunging the room into darkness. She opened them, squinting in surprise at the broad daylight that greeted her. The sky above was overcast with thick, frothy gray clouds, muting the effect of daytime hitting the windowpanes, but, still. Definitely freaking day.

Her gaze snapped to the clock. 2:00 pm. She made a sound. A squeak or something. Something that said surprise in less than a word. She’d slept late. Really late. Half her day off was already gone. The dark had fooled her into thinking it was still night time.

She ran her fingers through her hair, dazed, and opened the bedroom door. The faint sound of some song she knew was a Christmas carol fluttered up the stairs. She recognized the melody and the somber chorus, and the chant-y dudes singing in what sounded like Latin, but she couldn’t place the name of the carol. Then she heard a loud thump and a grating curse in a very familiar timbre, and she froze. The last time she’d heard something like that, Derek had fallen in the shower and hurt himself, and less than twenty-four hours after that, her world had exploded when she’d found him in their bathroom with empty pill bottles rolling around on the floor.

“Derek?” she shouted. She scrambled down the stairs as any other potential thoughts played bumper cars and knocked themselves out of her head. “Are you okay?”

“Fine, Mere,” he called from the living room. The blasé distraction in his tone didn’t speak of any serious hurt, more, I-have-a-project-I’m-thinking-about, but that didn’t stop her heart from pounding.

Her socks slid along the hardwood flooring as she skidded to a halt in the archway to the living room. Derek looked up at her, and a brilliant smile scrunched up his crow’s feet around his blue, blue eyes. She could lose herself in those fathoms. All her worries slipped away on quiet, cat feet, leaving her blank as she stared back at him.

“Hi,” he said in a velvet tone that made her insides tighten.

The fireplace roared with licking flames. A seven foot Christmas tree towered in their living room, and hundreds of colored lights on strings lay spread between the living room and dining room on the floor. An open box rested by the fireplace with something shiny in it, and a cloth... thing that she vaguely recognized... hung over the lip of the box. The Christmas carol she’d heard upstairs played from the speakers in the living room, albeit very softly. From the spinning turntable and the faint crackle under the music, Derek had liberated on one his many LPs from the bookshelf by the stereo.

Derek wore an old t-shirt and some loose fitting sweat pants. None of the lights had been hung on the tree, yet, but he’d wrapped a string of lights over his shoulders and behind his neck a bit like a feather boa. The end of the string was plugged into the wall, but only half of the lights seemed to be working, the ones hanging over his left shoulder. He held a square doodad in his hand, and he was touching it to the base of one of the tiny light bulb sockets at his right side. She didn't know the doodad's purpose.

Samantha sat by the couch, oblivious or maybe even happy about the floppy Santa hat she'd found herself wearing. She watched everything with rapt amusement. She barked at Meredith, the Santa hat jiggling as she moved.

“Sam says good morning,” Derek said.

Meredith wrinkled her nose. “Afternoon, you mean. What was the thump?”

He shrugged. “Oh, that? Banged my knee on the box.” He gestured at the box by the fireplace. “Wasn’t paying attention.”

The box, more of a trunk, really, was made of heavy slats of wood that had been painted gray. As she moved closer, she saw tinier boxes stacked inside, each full of shiny things. Wooden things. All manner of things, really. Ornaments. Old ones. She recognized the box on the top. It contained an old set of golden wire ornaments depicting the twelve days of Christmas. The first one depicted a partridge in a pear tree.

She bent over to look more closely at the contents of the box. The cloth she thought she recognized? The red corduroy fabric was folded on top of an old tree skirt made of checkered green and white fabric with red ribbing. Each checkered box on the tree skirt framed a little embroidered tree inside, but the red corduroy on top of the tree skirt was what held her attention.

A lump formed in her throat as she picked it up. The red corduroy, stiff with lack of use, was an old stocking with a boot shaped more like a pancake than a foot. Red yarn crookedly spelled, “Meredith,” on the white lip of the stocking. The whole thing looked very amateur, but that didn’t matter so much. Thatcher. Thatcher had made this for her when she’d been little. Her mother wouldn’t, so he’d sewn it himself, despite not knowing how to construct more than the crudest of hole patches. She had the vaguest memory of watching him make it. An impression, really. Nothing more. But it was one of her more pleasant childhood recollections. She brushed her thumb along the coarse fabric.

“Where’d you get this?” Meredith said. She hadn’t seen this in... forever. Not since she’d moved to Boston. She hadn’t even realized her mother had still had it when she’d died.

Derek stepped close to her. “I found the box in the attic. It looked like it had Christmas stuff in it, so I grabbed it. I wasn’t sure how much decorating you wanted to do.”

“When did you go digging around in the attic?” she said.

The ladder to the attic was a rickety, ancient thing with worn rungs and chipping paint. The ladder had to be let down through a trap door with a wooden pole... hook... thing. The whole monstrosity weighed a ton, probably more than this tree had, and the process was unwieldy enough that she refused to do it without help, for fear of the heavy ladder smashing her skull as it came down. As far as she knew, Derek was still not the best at things that involved pushing and pulling. She didn’t want to speculate about how heavy that gray wooden box was, either.

“Last weekend,” Derek said. “You were on shift. Mark helped me get the ladder down. The box has been sitting here by the fireplace all week. I’m surprised you didn’t notice it.”

“Oh,” Meredith said. She tipped her gaze to the heavy wooden box. He’d been a lot better, and he'd been hitting the gym with Mark, but she hadn't realized he'd graduated to heavy lifting, even with help.

She bit her lip. She hadn't been home much in a conscious state. The last few weeks since they'd gotten back from New York, she'd been working and sleeping, and that was about it. Him too, really. They were both not at their peaks. Him with his stress from work, and her with Baby's shameless yet abundant mooching.

Her hand wandered to her belly. She was getting damned tired of the mooching stealing all her available energy like a Hoover in overdrive, but she figured if anybody had an excuse to mooch, it would be Baby. At least her pregnancy was over the halfway mark. She was almost done. And then she would have Baby. Which would more than make up for it.

“I'm sorry I haven't been paying attention,” she said. “I've been really tired.”

His expression softened. “I'd be a hypocrite if I complained, Meredith. And you have a much better excuse than I do.”

She absently petted the old, barely-used stocking as she frowned at him. “Not true,” she said. “Let's just call us even.”

“Deal,” Derek said after some consideration. His gaze followed her hand as she stroked the stocking, and he twitched, like he wanted to move closer and feel, too, but he didn't move. “Did you want to hang that?” he said, the words cautious. “When I saw that in the box,” he said, continuing, “I thought you might...” He swallowed, and she watched as the possible ends to that sentence flitted across his face. I thought you might like it. Might hate it. Might want it. Might want to burn it. The conflicting tumble concluded with an audible, “I don't know.”

“Do you have one?” she said, looking up at him.

“A big, ugly box that weighs more than my car?” he said.

She let loose a chuff of laughter. “A stocking, jackass.”

His eyes sparkled. “I'm sure my mother kept it somewhere,” he said. “But, no, not here.”

“Well, we're not hanging mine without yours,” she said, putting the stocking back in the box on top of the old tree skirt. “It'd look lonely.”

She watched him process that. He glanced at the stocking and then back at her, his expression unreadable. Wary but optimistic, maybe, but he slipped into a frown when the music track changed. This song sounded... happier. And also recognizable, but not something she could peg with a title. The melody in it was still kind of slow.

“The music didn't wake you up, did it?” he said, anxiety gripping his words. “I thought the volume was low enough.”

“My bladder woke me up,” she conceded. “I didn't hear the music until I came out into the hallway.”

“Oh,” he said. He stopped fidgeting, at least.

“So, you tricked me with the shades,” she added, returning to neutral territory.

He snorted. “Hey, don't look at me. They were closed when I got home from work yesterday. I didn't touch them.”

She frowned. She vaguely remembered needing a nap yesterday. She vaguely remembered yanking the curtains closed. Vaguely. She didn't comment. She stepped over all the lights and other junk on the floor, closer to the tree. The air smelled lovely and fresh and like winter. The spruce she’d smelled earlier. She inhaled until it filled her lungs. “So, how did you...?”

“I went to the tree lot at the grocery store this morning.”

She gaped, noticing the distinct lack of Mark in that sentence. He’d been quick to offer up Mark for the attic adventure. “You dragged this thing home by yourself?”

He looked like he didn't know what to say to that. “Um....” His gaze looked almost... hopeful. “Surprise?”

And then it clicked. She blinked as she stepped into his space. He thought she’d changed her mind and was mad about the Christmas vomit.

She thought of the Christmas furor of last year, when he'd dragged home a tree much like this one, though about a foot shorter, and she'd watched him wrap his presents in surgical tape and Santa kitten paper. She hadn't complained about the tree last year, but she hadn't cheered him on when he'd brought it home, either, and the only reason for her silence on the matter had been because she liked the smell. The spruce.

She glanced at the floor. There hadn't been nearly this many lights involved last year. And he hadn't gone digging around in her attic for old ornaments. He seemed to have been happy she'd let him get the tree through the front door and hadn't gone much beyond hanging a few lights on it and perching a big star at the top.

But that had been last year, and, this year, she'd already decided, wasn't going to go like that. While they'd been at Lake Cushman, it had occurred to her that this was something she wanted to try. Having an actual Christmas. Baby deserved a Christmas where Derek wasn't sewing pathetic stockings like Thatcher's. A Christmas where Mom didn't view all the merrymaking as a big chore stealing valuable time from work. Even if Meredith didn't really get the whole Christmas spirit... thing, she didn't want to take that away from Baby before she’d even been born. She didn't want to be Ellis, and this holiday was a decent area to start attempting changes.

Meredith tipped up on her toes and kissed his chin. “I'm not upset, Derek.” She was befuddled, maybe. But not upset. She gestured at the tree and the lights and the everything. She pulled a pine needle out of his hair and flicked it away. “I meant, are you okay? From the whole lugging a large, sticky tree that's taller than you are thing?”

“Oh,” he said. “Yes. Fine.” He pressed the knuckles of his fist against his sternum and rubbed through his shirt along the line of his scar. “Ached a little afterward, but that was what the nap was for. I mean, you insisted.” He grinned at her. “Who was I to say no?”

She thought of him collapsing beside her without arguing. “You were trying to tell me about this stuff earlier.”

He winked. “Not every time I say hello to you is for sex, you know.” He put the thingy in his hand on the mantle and wrapped his arms around her. “Is this....” He squinted as he searched for words. “This is okay with you, right? I tried to keep it light. I mean I know you said you wanted to try... well... this... but I wasn't sure how much was too much.”
Her eyes widened as she glanced around. “This is light for you?”

Something in his gaze crumbled a bit. “Well, there's the tree,” he said, the words calm. He shifted from foot to foot, and a blush began to spread from his throat to his cheeks. “And the decorations for the tree. But that’s it. I swear.” Samantha barked. “Oh, and her hat.” A tiny smirk twitched at his lips despite the worried embarrassment on his face. “I couldn't resist the hat. I'm sorry.”

“This is all for the tree?” Meredith said. “There's like a thousand lights here.” She didn't even think she was exaggerating, for once.

“Well,” he said. He swallowed. “You see. If you weave in to the trunk and out to the edge on every branch instead of just wrapping the lights around the outside, it looks better. And, yes, that takes a lot of lights. We might have to buy some more if I can't get all these strands from last year working.”

She glanced around the room as the slightly-less-somber song from before ended, and a new song started playing. One with... an actual beat. The song sounded happy, and not even begrudging about it. There were trumpets, even. Synthesized ones. No words this time, though. “What's playing?”

“Mannheim Steamroller,” Derek said.

Meredith shook her head. Mannheim Steamroller? That sounded like it should be a street name for meth or something, not the name of a band.

“What song is this?”

He glanced briefly at the stereo. “Um. Hark the Herald Angels Sing. Carols are sort of a requisite for decorating, you know.”

She peered at him. “You can't decorate without them?”

“If it's not a law, it should be,” he said with a fleeting grin, and then he sighed.

“What's wrong?” she said.

He pulled his fingers through his hair. “I thought getting the tree put up might make me feel more Christmas-y, but I'm still just....” He shrugged. “Not.”

Her heart squeezed. Christmas was his holiday. He always felt Christmas-y. Like clockwork when December hit. He was supposed to be the one locking her out of the bedroom to wrap massive piles of presents with Santa kitten wrapping paper.

She hugged him, pressing against him. He melted into her embrace with little encouragement. “You're not feeling Christmas-y this year?” she said, rubbing his back.

His sigh ruffled her hair. “I'm trying, Meredith, but....”

“Not quite there?” she said.

He didn't answer her, which was an answer by itself. Instead, he stood against her, breathing, nose pressed against her hair. She understood. He'd been through the ringer this year. So had she.

“I'm glad I'm here, alive,” he said after a long moment. “And I'm glad I have you. And my dog. And Baby. I'm glad I don't hurt anymore, at least not my chest. I'm glad I don't have to work so hard to think of good things anymore. About myself or about life in general. I'm... happy. I am. But... I'm also very tired. All the time. And I miss liking people."

She pressed her lips against his skin. “I can understand that.” She pulled her fingers through his hair. He leaned into the touch. “You’ll get there. You’re getting there. Have you gone shopping, yet? Maybe buying presents would help.”

He laughed, but the sound was hollow and had very little humor in it. “Shopping malls are kind of crowded at Christmas, Mere.”

She swallowed. Oh. Oh. Damn it.

“I’ve gotten a couple things,” he said.

But nothing like the weekend shopping marathons she’d witnessed in the years before. She could hear a hundred words unspoken in his unhappy tone.

“Online shopping?” she suggested.

Derek nodded. “That’s probably what I’m going to have to resort to.” His face pinched with a frown. “It’s not nearly as fun that way, though.”

She couldn’t think of anything to say to that. Couldn’t think of any other suggestions. He stood in her arms for a long time, not speaking. She was happy to stand there, cheek pressed against his chest, letting the moments pass. “I love you,” she said against his shirt.

“I love you, too,” he said, a soft sigh of words.

The song changed again as they stood there, sharing space and time. She liked this song. “What’s this one?” she said.

“It’s Carol of the Bells. You like it?”

“This is my favorite so far. It’s fun.”

He grunted with laughter against her hair, and his embraced relaxed as he stepped away to look at her. “The traditional version doesn’t sound like this, just so you know.”

“Well, I like this version,” she said. She stared up at him, grinning. “So, I guess you’re the Christmas expert in this family.”

“As long as you don’t call me a Nazi,” he said, matching her grin.

“I’d only do that if you breached the Izzie barrier that separates tastefully appropriate from a-Hallmark-store-exploded.”

He laughed again, and it made her insides warm to see him livening up a little at her interest.

She kissed him, stepped out of his arms, and sat on the sofa. Heat from the fireplace buffeted her, and she closed her eyes briefly, enjoying the feeling. She reached down to stroke Samantha, who leaned into Meredith’s palm. Meredith grinned. “Well,” Meredith said. “I said I wanted practice at this for Baby.” She gestured at the lights. “So, why don’t you start by explaining what the hell you’re doing?”

“Untangling,” he said, shoulders slumping as he visibly relaxed at her verdict that this amount of Christmas was okay. That still didn’t stop him from smirking some more, though. “It’s a scientific “process.”

She laughed and pointed to the mantle. “What's the thingy for?”

He followed her gaze. “Oh, that? That's testing to see where the current is failing. It helps diagnose problems.”

“Like the fact that that strand is only half working?”

“Yes,” he said. He picked up the thing. There was an LED at the bottom she hadn't noticed. “If this lights up, there's current.”

She nodded. “Okay. Can I help?”

He tilted his head and stared at her for a long moment. His smirk stretched into an easy, pleased smile. “There are a few more strands to untangle.” He pointed to the trash bag on the floor by the sofa. She'd ignored the bag before. “You can do that while I fix this if you want,” he said, pointing to the dead string in his hands. “Just stretch them out like the rest of the ones on the floor.”

She grinned. “Okay.” And she leaned down to pick through the dusty bag of lights.

When Meredith's eyes slid open, she smiled. The tree still towered in the corner of the room, though the lights weren't plugged in at the moment. She and Derek had put the lights and ornaments on it together. Light application to a Christmas tree was apparently a science, and Derek had found a lot of glee in showing her how to do it. Where light application was a science, though, ornament arrangement was like Stephen Hawking's version of physics. She and Derek had ended up using lots of the sparkling, metallic balls from the box from the attic after dusting them off. Derek had claimed that if one used sparkly ornaments, the reflections enhanced the lightning, and had instructed her to skip the ornaments that didn't have a reflective surface. That had resulted in her leaving about half of the old ornaments in the box, and the resulting ornament coverage on the tree had more been like accents rather than a blanket.

Meredith had always assumed garlands and tinsel and other crap were a must, but all they had used were the ornaments and the lights. She wasn't sure what the tree would have looked like if they had used non-sparkly ornaments, but she did have to admit he knew his Christmas trees. The end result of Derek's instruction looked... really freaking pretty.

And the longer she'd stuck around helping him, the more gleeful he'd gotten. By the time they'd finished, other than a few miscellaneous firsts associated with Baby, she couldn't remember the last time she'd seen him so happy, but his joy had been an ephemeral feeling, not a permanent alignment shift. He'd gone back to work the next day and gotten stuck in the mental slog again. Stuck in the constant war inside his head where he wanted to be away from people and stress and busywork and blah, but didn't have the luxury because of his job. Because he was trying to get better. He'd come home the next day run down again, and the day after that, even more so, and she'd felt like she was dancing a perpetual jig of two steps forward, two steps back with him as they approached Christmas.

Meredith sat at the kitchen table, rubbing her temples in slow circles as she rested her weight on her elbows. Lexie sat across from her, shoveling spoon after spoon of peppermint ice cream into her mouth. Her cheeks bulged, and she looked, well, miserable. Which made no freaking sense. And Meredith kind of wanted that ice cream. Kind of a lot. She licked her lips in time with the throb of her head.

“I really don't understand what the problem is,” Meredith said.
“I only dumped Alex a couple weeks ago,” Lexie said.

“Yeah,” Meredith said. “And?”

“After he was shot,” Lexie said.

Meredith blinked. “And?”

“During the holidays?” Lexie added, a helpless tone dragging her pitch into the upper registers.

“So, what?” Meredith said. “You weren't happy. You got out. You know who you want, now. So, go ask him?”

“Go ask him, she says,” Lexie grumbled. “Go ask him?”

“Yes,” Meredith nodded. “Go. Ask.”

“But it's rude to move on so fast!” Lexie frowned. “Isn't it?”

“I'm really not a good person to be asking about the etiquette for moving on,” Meredith said, looking down at her belly. “In fact,” Meredith said, “I think the only person worse for asking about experience with moving on would be Derek.” Who wasn't home, anyway. Their days off hadn't matched up this week, and Derek hadn't been able to fix it because Richard hadn't been able to cover for Derek today. Something about Adele and warpaths and blah blah blah.

“I've been such a jerk,” Lexie said, tone glum.

“You don't even create a blip on the radar of jerk,” Meredith said.

Lexie fidgeted. “Well, there has to be a reason Mark hasn't asked me out, yet. Right?”

“Maybe, he's waiting for you to go all Sadie Hawkins and save him the trouble,” Meredith said. She sighed. “I really don't know,” she said. “Most of my history involving relationships has been with a man who's selectively deaf about the word no. I have no experience with him not asking me out, even when I told him to stuff it. If he'd been anyone else, and I mean anyone, I would have been filing a sexual harassment complaint with HR.”

“But Mark is the king of sexual harassment. Why won't he harass me?”

Meredith snorted as Lexie turned a shade of red that would have put a beet to shame. Lexie jammed another spoonful of dripping ice cream into her mouth. Her cheeks bulged as she flogged herself with calories, and then she swallowed her misery with an audible gulp.

“I can't believe I just said that,” Lexie said. “I probably just sent the Take Back the Night campaign into the dark ages of feminism when we were still having fights about who does the berry gathering and who kills the sabretooth cats for dinner.” She dropped her spoon into her ice cream bowl. The metal hit the lip of the bowl with a clank, and then she raised her hands to her hair and yanked. “I hate men. I hate them! They're so frustrating!”

Meredith rolled her eyes, giving up on preserving Mark's privacy for the sake of everyone involved. “Lexie, he's interested.”

Lexie perked up. “Interested? How interested? How do you know?”

“Yes. A lot. Because he gave me a bullet point list over Thanksgiving about how he intends to win you back.”
“Bullet points?” Lexie said, eyebrows raising. “Thanksgiving? Really? That was before Alex and I even broke up.”

“He bought a freaking self-help book as reference material for that list,” Meredith said. “If he’s not asking, it’s probably because he hasn’t got a clue he should be asking, yet, not because he doesn’t want to.” With a groan, Meredith rose to her feet, walked to the phone, and grabbed it off its cradle. The dial tone filled the air with a vague, distant whine through the receiver. She foisted the phone at Lexie. “Just. Call. Him. Right now.”

“But he’s on shift,” Lexie said weakly.

“I don’t care,” Meredith said with a huff as she resettled and closed her eyes. “Do it, now.”

She resumed rubbing her temples. Her head was splitting her open, she thought. Too much work. Too much stress. Not enough sleep. She’d go back to bed the second she could muster up the will to stand again. Her ankles hurt. Her back hurt. Everything hurt. And she felt like a freaking walrus.

She heard the chair squeal as Lexie stood. Heard shuffling as Lexie moved around. Heard the phone being set back in its cradle, though Meredith couldn’t muster any more strength to protest. Heard a clink in front of her, and then Lexie sat back down.

When Meredith pulled her eyes open, she glanced through her eyelashes blearily at the sight in front of her. Some of the pink peppermint ice cream had been added to a small bowl, which now sat in front of her with a spoon.

“Mark can wait,” Lexie said. “Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” Meredith said.

“Right,” Lexie agreed with a snort.

Meredith sighed. “Growing a whole other person sucks sometimes.”

“Is the baby kicking?” Lexie said.

“No,” Meredith said. “But I was up like three times last night to pee, and I got no sleep, and everything hurts. And I’d kill for some wine or something.”

“You could have a glass,” Lexie said. “One glass won’t hurt anything.”

Meredith clenched her fingers briefly. “No,” she said, and then she grabbed the spoon from her ice cream bowl. There was no way in hell she was doing anything that could risk the baby, no matter how slight the chances. Barring two mornings where she had fallen off the wagon and landed roughly on her ass, much to Derek’s extremely irritating amusement, she wouldn’t even drink coffee.

She broke off a piece of the ice cream, raised the spoon, and tipped it into her mouth. A blast of peppermint hit her senses, and she moaned a little as she closed her eyes. Peppermint ice cream was almost as good as strawberry, and this was a limited flavor only available in stores around Christmas. She loved it.

“This is an okay wine substitute,” Meredith said as she swallowed the treat.

Lexie grinned at her, and for several minutes, they ate their remaining ice cream in silence. When the doorbell rang, Meredith didn’t even have a chance to think about answering the door before Lexie was rising to her feet. “You stay,” Lexie commanded. “I’ll get it.”

“I’m not helpless,” Meredith snapped at Lexie’s retreating figure.

“I know,” Lexie said. “But I’m still helping you anyway. Deal with it.”

Meredith huffed another sigh and closed her eyes, letting her awareness of the surroundings blur. She heard the door open, heard Lexie exchange some words with whoever was there. Meredith was too tired to even care who it was, or to speculate.

“You got a package,” Lexie said when she returned. “From New York. Priority overnight?”

Meredith’s eyes snapped open. Lexie clutched a large Fed-Ex box. “Wow,” Meredith said. “It came already? I only talked to her yesterday.”

“What is it?” Lexie said, excitement gleaming in her eyes. “Something we should put under the tree?”

Meredith tore the package open with gusto. Three items slid out of the box. The first two items, both knitted and wrapped in tissue paper, looked like what she was expecting, though she had expected only one. She set those aside and looked with curiosity at the third item.

A tupperware container. Filled with... cookies. Dozens. With white icing slathered across the tops, and a praline stuck in the middle of the icing on each one. They smelled delicious. She grabbed one from the box and offered it to Lexie, and then snagged one for herself. The cookie was chewy and fell apart in her mouth. A blast of almond and sweetness hit her tongue.

“These are amazing!” Lexie mumbled, her voice distorted as she spoke with a full mouth.

Meredith glanced at the note Carolyn had written, which was taped to the top of the tupperware container, and smiled. “These,” Meredith said, “are apparently Derek’s favorite. How did I not know this?” A small index card with the recipe was taped next to Carolyn’s note. The steps didn’t seem too complicated. Maybe, she could try to make it, and then when she set the kitchen on fire, Lexie would take pity on her and help. Or, maybe, she could be smart and just draft Lexie in the first place.

“What are the other things?” Lexie said.

Meredith turned her attention to the yarn items wrapped in tissue paper. She pulled open the paper on the first one, unsticking the tape and letting the folded item unfurl, which revealed a stocking with Derek’s name knitted into the pattern at the top. The stocking was large and floppy, almost four feet from top to toe, and it was soft and red, which was almost exactly like she’d imagined Derek’s would be. Granted, she’d pictured stripes, and this was solid-colored except at the top where Derek’s name broke into the color scheme with white. Carolyn must have made this thing by hand. She was far more skilled at construction than Thatcher had been.

Meredith unfurled the second knit item, also a stocking, though this one had Mark’s name at the top, and it was green instead of red. A little sticky note was attached to the top of Mark’s, which said, “Thought you might want this one, too! – Carolyn.”

“Derek’s stocking from when he was a kid,” Meredith explained to Lexie, who was bubbling over with interest. “I called Carolyn yesterday and asked her if she still had it.”

Lexie licked her lips. “Not that I’m complaining, but you want to hang stockings? You?”
Meredith shrugged. “For Derek, yeah.”

“Really?” Lexie said.

“He's been having some trouble with Christmas this year. I just wanted to do something for him.”

Lexie frowned. “Trouble?”

Meredith nodded. “He's just a little down. I think the holiday is emphasizing to him how different he is this year. I almost get the impression that he's... well, he's lonely.”

Lexie's frown deepened. “Derek is lonely?”

Meredith sighed. “I don't think I'm explaining this well,” she said, before Lexie could enter DEFCON 1, operation Find Derek Some Friends. “He's not alone, per se. He's just...”

“Not used to having to budget his people time?” Lexie suggested.

“Yeah,” Meredith said, nodding. “Yeah, that's it exactly.” Meredith could almost see the churn of thoughts tumbling behind Lexie's eyes. “Lexie, don't tell me you're planning something.”

Lexie's lip twitched.

“Lexie, seriously,” Meredith said. “Please, don't throw some big Christmas bash that will put him on the spot. He's already not feeling that great.”

Lexie nodded. “I swear. No spot putting. No big bash. But... it'd be nice to do something.”

“Something... like what?” Meredith said, caution dripping from her tone.

“I don't know,” Lexie said, eyes gleaming as she galloped through possibilities. “I'll tell you when I figure it out. I promise to keep it low key, though.”

After daydreaming for the better part of an hour, Meredith left Derek alone in the living room to sleep, and she watched some streaming television on her laptop in their bedroom. She found she couldn't stand to watch hospital shows, since they were all ridiculously unrealistic, and after the shooting she found she had little taste for cop dramas and other violent stuff, but... she had an unrepentant addiction for Top Chef. She couldn't cook worth a damn, but it was so fun seeing what people who could cook could create under pressure with such wacky rules and time limits. She watched three episodes before she had to turn it off, because it was making her both hungry and jealous. Hungry because dinner was approaching, and jealous because she knew her hunger would no longer be satisfied by that beautiful honey-baked ham she'd bought, which now resided in Samantha's stomach. No, she was likely stuck with takeout tonight. Or something Derek could throw together with what little they had in the pantry, like a casserole.

Her attention was yanked away from her laptop when a thunderous crash exploded through the house, followed by a, “God, damn it!” She didn't think she'd ever moved through the house so quickly. The only thing that stopped her from sliding down the stairs like a bobsledder was the bulge of her womb reminding her she had a lot more to risk than just her own safety if she were to fall on her face. She slowed down to an urgent trot as she descended the steps, but sped up again as soon as she'd hit the landing.

She found him sitting at the dining room table staring into space, which... wasn't what she expected, and it drew her to a skidding halt in the archway. His notepad sat in front of him on the placemat, pen discarded off to the side. There was still only one item on the list. Pray for a miracle.
And he was so stuck in his own head he didn't seem to notice her standing there, venting panic with every heaving breath.

Her gaze darted around. He looked... fine, other than the fact that he'd disconnected himself from reality enough to not hear her come into the room. She couldn't identify what had made the crashing sound until she tiptoed forward and saw the thick, skewed book on the floor by the wall. A dim shaft of afternoon light plunged into the room from the window, and she couldn't read the title on the glossy cover until she padded over to it. The Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder Sourcebook. It was one of the references Lexie had bought when she'd had her revelation that Derek wasn't necessarily dealing with things very well. She'd tried to keep them discretely in her bedroom, but apparently Derek knew about them, anyway. He had to have gone into Lexie's room and found her stash to get it, or at least asked her for it.

Her heart squeezed. Why would he need that book right now?

She made sure she was in his line of sight before she whispered, “Derek?” in a low, soothing whisper. It took another, “Derek, hey,” along with a little wave before he blinked and seemed to focus on the room again.

He didn't start at her sudden appearance, which was a good sign. His shift in demeanor was more of a slow slide from absent to perceiving. His lip twitched into a soft smile, though preoccupation gripped the other muscles in his face, preventing his mirth from reaching the crows feet hugging his eyes, and his irises didn't sparkle like they did when he really, really meant it.

“Hi,” he said, matching her soft tone.

She glanced pointedly at the book on the floor, eyebrows raised. “What happened?” she said. “You scared the crap out of me.”

He sighed, deflating. “Sorry. I lost my temper for a second.” Concern flecked in his eyes. “Are you okay?”

“I'm fine,” she assured him. “I'm more concerned about you. What did that poor book ever do to you?”

He propped his head up on his elbows and tore his fingers through his hair. “Nothing, it....” His eyes drifted to the list he'd made. “Nothing. I was brainstorming, and I thought it might help.”

“But it didn't,” Meredith said.

He slid out of his chair to pick up the book. He smoothed out the cover, tucking the jackets back into place, and put the book back on the table next to his notepad. “Not really.”

She picked up the list he'd left on the placemat, digging her thumb into the metal spirals until she hurt. He didn't take his eyes from her. She didn't see any reproach in his gaze. Nothing to indicate this was a no no subject or that she'd grossly invaded his privacy by reading the list earlier in the day. “What exactly are you brainstorming?” she said.

He ground his molars. His temples bulged as he clenched his jaw and released it, and she bit her lip. Maybe not an invasion of privacy, but she could tell she wasn't in for a happy subject, and he seemed reluctant to explain. She put the notepad gently back on the table and stepped into him, embracing him, but he stood like a stiff, unyielding board, and gave her nothing in return.

“Talking about it could help, you know,” she said.
He stared out the window and shook his head. Not at her, he gathered. Just... whatever was stuck in his head. “I'm trying to...” His words trailed away.

“What?” she prodded.

He considered her for a long moment, like he was debating whether this was a good idea to talk about with her. Whatever this was, anyway. Curiosity was a slow burn underneath her skin.

“If it helps you to talk, I want to hear it,” she said, standing her ground. She hadn't encountered closed-like-a-clamshell Derek in a while, but over months and months of practice, she'd gotten pretty good at getting him to crack open. Persistence and patience in equal measure seemed to help a lot. She pulled him tight against her.

The moment he gave in came like a tide to a beach, slow and creeping, but unstoppable. He wrapped his arms around her. Tension slipped out of his muscles, and he sighed. He pressed his forehead against hers and breathed. In and out.

“I'm trying to figure out how to fix this mess,” he said on an exhale.

She scrunched his soft t-shirt between her fingers. “What mess? Can I help?”

He was silent for the briefest of pauses.

“I'm a big girl, Derek,” she said, one last push. “I'm fine. I can take it. Talk.”

“If things don't turn around soon, Seattle Grace Mercy West is going to bankrupt itself, and this time there's no merger to pull us out of free fall.”

She blinked. Of all the things she expected to hear, that was not one of them. “What?” she said, dumbfounded. “What do you mean?”

“I just got the year-end financial report, Meredith. If the hospital were a patient, Seattle Grace would be in the ICU on a ventilator with a priest on the way.”

Sinking. She was sinking. “Why didn't you tell me?”

“I have told you, Meredith. I told you the hospital was in ruins months ago.”

Her fingers clenched. “I didn't think you meant we were on our way to bankruptcy again!”

“I didn't know we were on our way to bankruptcy again until I got the full analysis report,” he snapped. And then he inhaled, exhaled, inhaled, exhaled. He shook his head as if to knock loose his temper, and added in a much quieter voice, “I only found out about this yesterday. I'm not an accountant, Meredith; the earlier reports looked bad but not dire to me, and this is the first one where it was spelled out for me in tiny, easy-to-understand words.”

Her eyes pricked. “How long do we have?”

He shrugged. “Months, I'd guess. A year, tops, with some considerable cutbacks.”

“What's it going to look like by April?”

Baby was due in April. His hopeless expression wrecked her. She wiped her eyes as his palms came to rest on her stomach, and he kept breathing. In and out and in and out. “Meredith, I....” He took another deep breath, and looked away. His lower lip quivered. “This is all my fucking fault.”
“It's not your fault, Derek.”

He shook his head. “We almost had things under control with the merger. Then I got shot. Patients don't want to be treated here. Nobody wants to work here. And all the stress leave for the people we managed to keep sucked our rainy day funds dry.” He looked at her. “This is your home. This is where we met.” He blinked. “This is where you saved me.” It's like I was drowning.... His eyes were watery. He didn't look like he was seeing anything.

“Derek, it's not your fault,” she snapped.

He was silent for a long time, staring into space. His face was red and blotchy, and he looked about a millimeter from bursting into tears right along with her. She wiped her eyes again, and then she cupped his chin with her palm and forced his gaze back to her.

“No. Your. Fault.”

He sighed. “I'm doing it again, aren't I?” he said, the words glum.

She snorted. “You kind of are.”

“Right,” Meredith said.

“And I wouldn't blame you, or Mark, or anybody else in the same situation as myself.”

She nodded.

He took a long, slow breath and let it out. “But I still need to fix this,” he said, his voice cracking.
“T need....”

“Closure,” she said.

“Not just that. It's....”

“It's?”

He crumpled like he'd misplaced his thought. “I don't know what to do,” he said. The words crushed her. His lost expression crushed her. “Meredith, I don't know what to do. What the hell should I do?”

He was looking at her like he was flailing around in the Sound, but had spotted his life raft. Her.
And she had no idea how to respond to that.

She didn't know anything about this stuff.

She swallowed. Her legs felt watery. “I think I need a time out,” she said. “Just for a minute.”

“A time out?” he parroted.

“This is... big,” she added, the words hollow. “A big problem. Really, really... big. Supernova grade.”

should do.”
She searched his expression for a long, aching moment. Her chest hurt. Her eyes hurt. She'd known the hospital had some problems. She'd had no idea they were plodding down a gangplank to a looming grave. She leaned up on her tiptoes, pressing against him, enveloping herself in his warmth. She snaked her fingers through his hair, clutched at him along the nape of his neck.

Silence stretched for six heartbeats. She was in free fall, and she needed a place to land. He was drowning, and he needed something solid to grab. And they both needed to hit the emotional reset button, or they'd never get through this discussion.

“You should kiss me,” she said.

“Meredith—”

She grabbed his shirt. “Kiss. Me.” The cotton scrunched between her fingers. She shifted her weight and pulled him along as she stepped backward. Her back hit the dining room table. She slid into a sitting position on the tabletop, and he filled the space between her knees with his torso.

He hovered close enough that she could feel the heat radiating off his skin. He didn't speak. The faint scent of his aftershave filled her every inhalation. She pressed her nose into the space where his jaw met his throat, opened her mouth, let his skin slip between her teeth, and she nipped him. A hint of salt tickled her tongue.

“Kiss me, Derek,” she said against his throat. Stubble rasped against her, but she didn't care. She hugged his hips with her knees. She unclenched her fist and let her palm slide down his shirt, pushing up under it. She glided to his waistband, teasing at the lip of it, and plunged underneath into heat. He made a deep sound in his throat when she touched him, halfway between a groan and a purr.

But then he batted her hand away.

“What—?” she had a chance to say before he captured her mouth with his own and drank down her question. Not a no, then. She waited not-so-patiently to see what he had in mind.

He pulled at her pants while he plundered her. She shifted to let him take them away. They fell with a thud to the carpet when he dropped them next to the table. She arched back as he did the same with her panties. Their breaths thundered in the quiet. Her nails raked him, and he made another deep sound that came from the pit of his chest. A growl, almost. Something primal.

Then he dropped to his knees, palms pressed against her inner thighs. He spread her wide with a sweep of his hands. Her skin twitched, and she moaned as he opened her like a present. Hot breaths blustered against her wet skin. He pushed himself between her thighs, lips to skin, and he kissed her until the world crumbled.

Meredith woke on Christmas morning a bit like a bear crawls out of hibernation. Not that she knew how bears coming out of hibernation acted, but she imagined there'd be growling. And snuffling. And a mountain of denial. It took her almost a minute to slap off the alarm.

8:30 am, the clock said, and the light streaming through the windows seemed to agree with the clock's assessment of the time. While not even that early, given that many of her days started at 4:00 am, it felt like she'd just gotten home and fallen into bed. She'd worked Christmas Eve until about 11:00 pm and had made it into bed around 11:45 pm, collapsing next to an already-passed-out Derek.

“Oh, my god, how is it morning already?” she muttered into her pillow. A wet spot of drool had collected on the pillowcase under her cheek. Yuck. “How am I awake? Why?” She rolled away, but Derek followed her into a sleepy, draping spoon.

“Merry Christmas to you, too,” Derek murmured against her neck, soft breaths making her skin tingle. His voice was groggy, but his body was a long line of warmth behind her, and she could hear the vague, dream-filled smile in his words.

“Bah humbug,” she said in return, and he let loose a whuff of air that could have been a laugh, however brief. “Sorry about the alarm,” she said. “I forgot to unset it.”

The lump that was Derek didn't move. “Mmm,” he said, the syllable thick with sleep. “'S'fine.” And then he didn't say anything else, despite what had to have been at least nine hours of sleep. Despite Christmas. Despite the fact that he was erect and pressing against her, and that was normally a precursor to a lot of dirty innuendo, if nothing else.

Which made her frown. It was Christmas. She couldn't remember the last few Christmases in an eidetic sense, but she knew he should be more excited than this. She slid out of his arms. He groaned a bit in protest, but didn't speak. She bit her lip as she rolled out of bed and scrunched her bare toes in the plush carpet. She took care of her ready-to-explode bladder in the bathroom quickly before returning to find Derek still snuggled on his side under a mountain of blankets, not moving. Which was really... just not normal.

She padded to his side of the bed and sat down beside him, hip to hip with him. She put her hand on the lump at where she estimated his shoulder should be. “Hey, are you okay?” she said.

The covers rustled. She caught a dull blue eye looking at her through a wiry curtain of his kinked bed hair. “Just tired,” he said.

“Want me to put on some coffee for you?” she said, frowning.

She listened to him breathing. Silence stretched for several seconds until he muttered something multisyllabic but unintelligible. She leaned over him and kissed his forehead.

“Sleep, then,” she said, intending to leave him in peace. “Merry Christmas.”

The blankets rustled as she tried to step away. His warm palm grabbed her wrist. “Don't go,” he said in a clearer tone. “I'm up,” he added, without a hint of leer or entendre in his tone.

She stopped. Turned. When she looked, he was blinking, scrubbing at his stubbly face and bloodshot eyes with his other hand, and then he sat up. The comforter fell away from his chest, and his gaze softened.

“Hey,” she said.

His expression became... almost shy. “It's Christmas,” he said. “I can catch up on sleep ton—” And then his eyes focused on something behind her. “What's that?” he said, interrupting himself mid-sentence.

“What's what?” she said, but when she turned to follow his gaze, she saw the object of his scrutiny. A big envelope embossed with candy canes. It was taped to the inside of their door with surgical tape. It hadn't been there last night. She snorted. “Oh, lord, what cheesy scavenger hunt thing did you plan, now?”

When she turned back to him, she found him looking at her, bewildered. “That's not from me, Mere.”
She snorted again. “Uh huh.”

“Really, it’s not,” Derek said. “I didn’t plan anything. I thought I was already pushing my luck with the tree and the lights and the ‘Christmas vomit,’” he said, putting the words in squiggly air quotes with his fingers. He smiled sheepishly. “Believe it or not, I can restrain myself from further vomit. For you.”

She frowned, got up, and snatched the envelope from the door. She ripped open the envelope to find a glittery card, which she pulled out and read. She recognized the handwriting. Not Derek’s.

“Oh, she so lied,” Meredith said.

“Who lied?” Derek said, padding up behind her.

“Lexie!” Meredith said, glancing at him. Lexie hadn’t told her anything about this. Not even a tiny, tiny hint. Meredith shoved the card at him. Specks of glitter flecked onto his black shirt, getting stuck in the weave of the cotton, and more fluttered to the carpet.

“Santa humbly requests your presents in the living room,” Derek said, reading from the card. He laughed and ran a hand through his messy hair, leaving bits and pieces of glitter behind. One curl stuck up like a flag, despite his weak attempts to mow it down with his fingers. “Presents. Cute.”

“Santa seems awfully glitter-happy,” Meredith grumbled.

Derek brushed at his shirt. More glitter drifted into the air. “No need to get snippy with Santa,” he said, eyes pinching at the edges with the vague hint of a grin. “After all, it just adds to my sparkling personality.”

“You love it,” he replied, pressing closer, and she found she couldn’t argue.

He reached in front of Meredith and opened the door, bicep bunching under the sleeve of his t-shirt. The scent of coffee and cinnamon wafted against them in a warm billow of air. Derek’s nostrils flared and his eyelids drooped subtly as he leaned into it and inhaled. The soft sound of voices filtered up the stairs. She could identify male cadence and female cadence from this far away, but not the specific owners of said voices, not from such a soft murmur.

Her teeth clenched. She’d told Lexie not to put Derek on the spot, and this was pretty freaking spot-putting, Meredith thought. She grabbed Derek’s hand and squeezed.

“You don’t have to go downstairs,” she rushed to say. “I can tell them to leave.”

Curiosity painted his face despite the sleepiness still loitering there, and he stepped into the hallway, pulling her with him. “If you did that,” Derek said, “we’d never find out what Santa wants with us, now, would we?” A smile twitched at the corners of his lips. Not a brilliant one, but it was a brilliant one all the same, simply for the fact of its existence, a real curve that made him look years younger, and so much more buoyant. While he didn’t seem that excited about this spontaneous development, one that, weeks ago, would have had him refusing to leave the bedroom, he certainly seemed willing to humor it today, and that... that was just.... Tension flowed out of her as though she were a sieve.

“What about you?” he said. “You don’t have to go downstairs, either, if this is too much.”

“Too much?”
His lip twitched. “Christmas vomit.”

“Oh,” she said. “No, I’m fine. This is just the right amount of Christmas vomit.” She frowned suspiciously. “So far....”

“Good,” he said, another smile ghosting his features.

She stopped him. Kissed him. Halitosis and all, she didn’t really care at the moment. They shared a long minute with each other in the quiet hall, and then they went downstairs.

Lexie and Mark were the only ones sitting in her living room, which, Meredith relented, didn’t really constitute a “bash,” so at least Lexie had stuck to the most important part of her word.

Presents that hadn’t been there the night before were piled high under the tree. Christmas carols played softly on the stereo. Lights hung on the tree in a brilliant red, blue, green, and yellow sprawl. A fire snapped and popped in the fireplace, making the room smell of wood and heat, mingled with the scent of coffee wafting from the kitchen. Samantha, who’d stretched out beside the warmth of the fire, wore her floppy Santa hat with her own special brand of canine aplomb.

Meredith’s and Derek’s stockings hung in a close pair from the mantle. On the far right next to Derek’s stocking, hung an oversized, misshapen, badly knitted, cream-colored sock on which Meredith had written “SAMANTHA” with a blue fabric pen. Carolyn had coached her over the phone in its construction, but backseat knitting over the phone hadn’t been enough to save it from looking like it had been made by Meredith. Oh well. On the left, next to Meredith’s, hung a newer, misshapen stocking that looked a lot like Meredith’s, only it said Lexie on the lip. Lexie, happily contributing, had hung up hers shortly after Meredith had explained her reasoning for stockings in the first place. On the far end hung Mark’s big stocking, which hadn’t been there the night before. Meredith had given it to Mark to do with as he pleased. Lexie had probably gotten it back from him.

Lexie gave Meredith and Derek a look of glee as Meredith tiptoed through the archway with Derek behind her. “Merry Christmas, you guys!” Lexie exclaimed, though she kept her volume just above a whisper.

“Hey, man,” Mark added, grinning. “Meredith. Best day of the year!”

“Looking forward to it,” Meredith said, a smile twitching at her lips when she realized she wasn’t lying.

Mark was barefoot, and he wore a fuzzy blue bathrobe much like the one Meredith had gotten Derek for Christmas last year. From his dress and his stubble, he seemed to have rolled out of bed and driven straight here. Lexie wore a t-shirt and sweats, and her hair wasn’t even combed. With the casualness, and the fact that it was just close family instead of a giant crowd of longtime Christmas celebrators, well, things didn’t feel so foreign or scary. In this environment, she wouldn’t feel horrible if she mangled some heretofore unknown Christmas ritual. She made a note to thank Lexie later, not just for Derek, but for herself.

Derek relaxed beside her, apparently coming to the same conclusion she had. He smiled. A bigger one than the one he’d offered her in their bedroom. He rubbed at his sleepy eyes again. “Merry Christmas,” he replied as he sank onto the couch.

“Want some coffee?” Lexie said, before Meredith could sit next to him. “I made decaf for you, Mere.”
Meredith sighed. Her eyes still felt sticky with sleep, and having decaf sounded about as fun as having a virgin daiquiri. Tasty, but pretty much pointless. Worse, the fact that everybody else would be having the real deal was kind of like visiting a candy store and watching everybody devour delicious Godiva chocolate while she was stuck chewing sugar-free gum or something.

“Oh, have some real coffee, Meredith,” Derek said as if he’d read her mind. He winked. “It’s Christmas. Baby won’t mind one cup.”

“But—” Meredith began, but she didn’t have a chance to finish.

“Maybe we can mix them together or something,” Lexie said in a rush. “You can help me.” And then Lexie grabbed Meredith's wrist and pulled her into the kitchen without another glance.

Dim light spilled into the kitchen as rain spattered against the window panes. Rain was Seattle's version of a white Christmas, Meredith supposed. The bitter scent of coffee, subtle from the living room, became a cacophony in her nose. Her nostrils flared.

“Lexie,” Meredith snapped as they skidded to a halt in front of the bubbling coffee maker. “What the hell?”

“How’s Derek?” Lexie said. “The card took the edge off the surprise, I hope? I tried to keep this thing small. Alex volunteered to clear out, though I think that's more to do with the fact that he'd rather spend Christmas hitting his toes with a hammer than do anything with me in the same room. But anyway. So, Derek seems okay. Is he okay? He's got really big circles under his eyes.”

Meredith blinked. Perhaps Lexie had already had some coffee herself. Possibly a whole jug. Possibly spiked with some speed or something. “He’s fine, Lexie; he’s just worn out,” Meredith assured her half-sister. “If he wasn't fine, he wouldn't have come downstairs.”

“Okay, good,” Lexie said, nodding resolutely. “I’m glad.” She bit her lip and shifted from foot to foot.

Meredith rolled her eyes. “What did you drag me in here to talk about?”

“So, Mark. He’s here.”

Meredith nodded. “I noticed that, yes.”

“And it's not a date,” Lexie said. “It's for Derek. As like a brother solidarity support thing.”

“Okay...?” Meredith said, watching Lexie expectantly. Meredith folded her arms across her chest. Lexie reddened. “But I really, really want it to be a date,” she said in a pleading voice.

“For god's sake,” Meredith said, rolling her eyes again. “Just ask him, Lexie. He'll say yes. I'm telling you. It's not even a little bit iffy. Just do it.”

“Okay,” Lexie said, steeling herself. “Okay. I can do this.”

“You can,” Meredith said with a sage nod.

She pulled four mugs out of the cabinet. A double-size “I <3 NYC” mug, two random mugs Derek had picked up as swag from medical conferences in Auckland and Los Angeles, respectively, and some generic blue-colored mug with a horse on it that she couldn’t remember buying, but clearly she had, because... well... there it was. She stared longingly at the pot with regular coffee in it for three seconds. Four. Five. She closed her eyes. Inhaled. Let her mind drift in the caffeine, caffeine, caffeine of it all. The scent was an olfactory siren song, splendiferous, tempting, and evil, and for a moment, she wavered. She leaned toward the pot with the real stuff. Caffeine. God, she missed caffeine so much.

Finally, though, with a depressed sigh, she shifted to the decaf, and filled up the horse cup for herself. She filled Derek's mug to the brim with regular. And then she pushed the remaining two mugs across the countertop to Lexie.

“Bring him coffee,” Meredith suggested. “It’s a conversation starter or something. I think.” She remembered her first legitimate date with Derek, and there had definitely been coffee involved. Honestly, it was hard not to have coffee when dining out in Seattle.

She hooked the two mugs she’d filled with her thumbs and walked back out into the living room with them, leaving Lexie behind to ponder her course of action. Derek gave her a grateful look as he clasped the giant mug, blew on it, and took a sip. “Thank you,” he said, and Meredith curled up next to him, cradling her own. “Did you pour yourself some actual coffee?”

She sighed. “No.”

He gave her a look that seemed like a strange marriage of exasperation and understanding. She hadn't realized before seeing it that those two emotions could be married. But he didn't comment to commend or condemn her choice. Instead, he wrapped his arm around her, squeezed her shoulder with a warm palm and kissed her temple.

Lexie shuffled back into the room, blush creeping across her face, reddening her ears, and plunging down her throat beyond the neckline of her t-shirt. She approached the big chair where Mark was sitting.

That was Derek's favorite chair. The one they'd had to lug upstairs to the bedroom when he hadn't been able to sleep through the night on his back. They'd lugged it back downstairs months ago.

Mark looked up at Lexie, a curious expression on his face.

“Hey, thanks,” he said to the offered cup of coffee, tone slightly surprised.

Lexie cleared her throat. Shifted from foot to foot. “So, can I sit here?” she said abruptly. “I mean, if that’s okay. Is it okay?”

Mark’s expression was unreadable. His eyebrow twitched. The chair where he was sitting was definitely only meant for one person, but that didn't mean two people didn't fit as long as they didn't mind being extra cozy with each other. Meredith had sat there curled up in a comforter with Derek any number of times, and Lexie was pretty small as well. They would fit.

“Sure....” Mark said after a pause. He put his cup on a coaster on the coffee table, next to a plate full of the cookies Derek's mother had sent. His fingers squeaked across the leather chair arms as he gripped them for leverage, and his biceps bulged as he made a move to stand up.

“No!” Lexie said. Her sudden twitch made her coffee slosh. Brown liquid dribbled out the sides of her cup, but she didn't seem to notice. “No, I mean. Can I sit here?” She swallowed. “With you?”

Mark blinked. The silence between them stretched, filled with the tinny sound of Deck the Halls playing softly from the speakers.

“Please?” Lexie added.
Without another word, Mark's face shifted glacially into a bright-eyed, toothy, Cheshire Cat grin. He raised his right arm, scooted to his left, and gestured. Lexie slid onto the chair beside him, hugged between his large body and the arm of the chair, and his arm came over her shoulder much like Derek's over Meredith's. Lexie clutched Mark's bathrobe as if her life depended on it. She rested her head on his shoulder and settled, movements hitching and awkward, but who cared about awkward? To Meredith, anything was better than seeing Lexie waffle endlessly for days.

Mark sighed the biggest, happiest sigh Meredith thought she'd ever heard, and his eyes had more glitter to them than the freaking glitter card Lexie had stuck on the inside of Meredith and Derek's bedroom door.

“So,” Mark said in a tone that said life-is-pretty-fucking-fantastic-right-now-MERRY-FUCKING-CHRISTMAS, “who gets to open the next present?”

They lay intertwined in a tangle of naked limbs and sheets and blankets. Somewhere in the hurricane, they'd shifted to the bedroom. She drew circles on his chest with her index fingers. He stared at her through his eyelashes, a rapturous expression painting his face.

The sun had long since set, and the dim, warm bath of light from the lamp reflected off his eyes in its absence. A cold winter quiet gripped the house, wrapping it in a muted blanket. All she could hear was Derek's breathing, and the occasional swish of a passing car on the wet street outside. She pressed her ear to his chest and listened through his breastbone to his heartbeat, adding a slow, percussive rhythm to what was otherwise silence, and she sighed, boneless, relaxed. Safe. The world stopped spinning when she lay like this with him. Wrong things didn't feel so wrong. And a bankrupting hospital felt like puzzle to solve, not a life-altering crisis.

Emotional reset: accomplished.

“I think you should talk to someone,” Meredith said.

“I'm talking to you,” he murmured, and his lips leaked into an easy smile. “I like talking to you. More talking, I say.”

“No,” Meredith said with a chuckle. “I mean a professional. This isn't the kind of thing you can fix by yourself, and I have... no idea. Doesn't the hospital have financial people to help with all of this?”

He sighed, and some of the mirth dripped from his face. His eyes focused, and he thought for a moment while she drew more circles, the nail of her index finger twisting through the light dusting of hair on his chest.

“All they do is tell you how to fix money problems,” he said eventually. “Leaking money is a symptom, not the disease. Budget cuts, tax law loopholes, and funding reallocations will only prolong the inevitable if we don't fix the underlying cause. The tension is so thick at work you couldn't cut it with a steak knife. Everybody is scared, Meredith. Everybody. For months, I thought it was just me, but...” He shook his head. Not just him. Not even close. “An accountant can't fix that.”

“So, we have to figure out how to help everybody not be scared,” she said.

“I can't just send the entire staff and every patient to Dr. Wyatt,” he said. “Paxil can't fix this.”

She shook her head, putting an index finger against his lips. He quieted, and he kissed her, tasted her. His tongue pressed against her skin. “I wasn't suggesting that,” she said, the words soft.
“Well, what were you suggesting?” he asked as he dropped her hand.

She sighed. “I don't know,” she said, and then she gave him an apologetic frown. “Sorry. Unhelpful. Did you try Google?”

He snorted.

“Sorry,” she said, unable to stop a loose chuckle from escaping. “Sorry, now, I'm making light.” And she shouldn't. But she laughed again, anyway. “Sorry!” She shouldn't be making light when the world was crashing down around their ears, but between massacres, secret wives, secret sisters, exploding ferryboats, appendixes bursting, liver transplants, Izzie's cancer, George's death, and now this, the whole world felt so suddenly ridiculous she couldn't breathe, and she could laugh about it, because she was in his arms, and she was safe, and she had nothing left to stifle her morbid sense of humor. “Oh, god,” she added, panting between torrents of giggles. “What's next? A plane crash?”

“With our luck, Mount Rainer will blow, and we'll be stuck in a modern Pompeii,” he said, tone wry.

Which only made her laugh harder. “God, I'm so sorry,” she said, gasping. “I really shouldn't joke, but....”

He gave her a cautious grin, though he didn't laugh with her. “It's okay,” he said. He cupped her cheek. Brushed his fingers through her hair. The warm pad of his thumb traced her cheekbone. He kissed her. “Someone has to.” His eyes were dark blue halos in the dim light. “I love you,” he added in an even softer tone, and she melted.

She rolled onto her back to stare at the ceiling, and he followed her, draping himself against her side. His left shoulder pressed into the bed. The sheet that had barely been hanging onto him slipped and crumbled to the mattress between them, leaving her with long line of naked skin from his shoulder to below his hip in her peripheral vision. He rested his left palm on her belly and pressed his lips against her cheek. She put her hand overtop his and squeezed his fingers.

“There's really no one in the hospital who could help you?” She turned her head to gaze at him. Surely, there had to be someone. Somewhere. She wracked her brain.

“There isn't really a position for 'Mass Trauma Recovery Specialist' that I know of,” he said. He smirked at her. “At least, not in the phone book. And, while I did actually Google,” he added, kissing her, “all I got were trauma centers and a bunch of stuff that's not really related to what I wanted.”

She thought for a long moment. “Maybe, Owen can help? Richard?”

He frowned. “I'd planned to talk with Richard next week, since he'll be inheriting this mess eventually, assuming we don't go under. Why Owen?”

“I don't know,” she said, shrugging. “Combat experience? Surely the army gets training on how to cope?”

He nodded slowly. “True...,” he said, and she could see the wheels behind his eyes turning, churning. Then his eyes widened a fraction.

“What are you thinking?” she said.

“Adam.”
She squinted at him. For a moment, she couldn't recall the name, but then recollection flooded into her head. “The cop with all the GSWs? Been in ICU for months?” Though she hadn't met Adam, she knew Derek liked to sit with him, knew Derek felt some sort of kinship with him. Perhaps even the beginnings of a friendship. Hell, Adam had even made it to the top of their boys' names list.

“Yeah,” Derek said. “Him. He's talking a lot more, now. I think he'll be working up to walking soon.”

“Why do you think he'd be better than Owen to help with this?”

“Remember Detective Wolff?” Derek said.

She nodded. “Sure, but what does he have to do with Adam?”

“Wolff sent me that packet,” Derek said. His gaze left her. He picked at his cuticles while he added, “The one about assault victimization that I threw out without reading. The one that helped you... figure out... what was going on with me.”

Now, she could see where he was going with this. She nodded again, encouraging him. “And, maybe, Adam has access to the same resources, and could point you in the right direction?” she said.

“Yeah,” he said, looking back at her. “Because I don't even know where to start, which is my big problem at the moment. All I need is a place to start. Something to work with. The police must have contacts.” He sighed. “I don't know. Maybe, its a stupid idea.”

She smiled. “It's worth a try.”

The silence stretched again. He pressed his nose against her hair, breathing her in. A relaxed sigh fell from her lips. She didn't ever want to move from this bed. Ever.

“Thank you, Meredith,” he whispered.

“You're welcome,” she replied, only to have her stomach interrupt their exchanged. Her offending digestive system growled and gurgled, and she remembered she hadn't eaten since... she couldn't remember. She turned red and pressed her face into the pillow, snorting with laughter. In the quiet, it almost sounded like an avalanche or something. Or maybe she was just being silly and exaggerating, but—

“So...,” he said, an amused expression sparkling on his face.

“Yes?” she murmured.

“Given that our New Year's Eve plans currently reside in our naughty dog's stomach....” he said, his voice trailing away.

She snorted. “Order a pizza?”

He blinked. Nodded. “We could do that.”

“With cheese?” she said hopefully. “And stuff that's not green on it?”

She smacked his arm playfully. “Oh, gag me,” she said, and he laughed.
“I think I could force myself to have a pizza with cheese this one time,” he said. He gave her a woeful, burdened sigh. “For you.”

“And then,” she continued, “we could watch a super sappy movie that my hormones compel me suddenly to like and cry over?”

He looked less than thrilled with that idea, but he kept smiling. “We could,” he said, conciliating.

She grinned at him. “And then, we could completely ignore the movie, and have lots and lots more sex on the couch.”

His smile brightened. “I'm liking this plan.”

She pulled him into a deep kiss. “Happy New Year, Derek.”

“I hope it's happy,” he murmured.

“It will be,” she assured him. “It has to be. It can't be anything else.”
Chapter 31

Chapter Notes

Wow! I'm back already! I have no idea how I managed that, but I'm not complaining. This was a true pleasure to write. So many things coming full circle. So much progress. So much NSFW! In so many places! If you need something to set the mood for this part, I admit Talking Body by Tove Lo was stuck in my head for most of this.

Thank you so much for the feedback on the last part! Please, leave me a comment if you get a chance. I'm determined to get this behemoth done regardless, but hearing from readers always helps :) A big thank you to Gladys for helping me with the logistics of a cholecystectomy. And thanks to my Twitter followers for flashback ideas! And as always, a huge thank you to my diligent betas.

3-4 more chapters to go. Hang in there, folks!

Enjoy!

For a long moment, Adam sat with his face tipped toward the sun that streamed through the blinds. A small smile carved his pale-as-chalk face. Ambulatory enough to dress himself at last, he wore a pair of black sweat pants and a white t-shirt, replacing the flimsy hospital gown he'd been sporting for as long as Derek had known him, and he'd pulled his long black hair back into a stringy, unkempt ponytail.

Derek had pushed Adam's wheelchair to the atrium so he could get out of his room for a little while. He'd been cooped up in the hospital for months, at this point. He could walk as a newborn fawn could walk. Not well, not fast, and not far. More of a stumble than a walk. Though, at least he was walking, now, despite partial paralysis in his left leg. The bullet that had torn up his intestines and bladder had ended up by his spine after it finished bouncing around and wreaking havoc. Derek found it hard to believe a little ball of cauterizing metal could be so devastating, but the pencil-eraser-sized pockmark under Derek's left nipple served as proof, and Adam had three of those pockmarks scattered across his torso, and one marring his thigh.

All things considered, the mere fact that Adam was sitting here, coherent, breathing on his own, alive, and with the prospect for an independent life and the ability to work, albeit desk-bound, after he healed enough to go home, well, that was a miracle. A real, honest-to-god miracle. And Derek didn't begrudge Adam his sunshine, despite wanting answers.

Adam sighed and looked back at Derek. He shifted in the wheelchair, which squeaked as he moved. They sat by a huge nine foot bay window that had a view out onto the cityscape and all its rolling gray and green, next to a sofa and some chairs and a table covered with magazines. "I think if you have a lot of scared people," Adam said, "you need to look at the reasons why they're scared, and fix them."

"I don't know how to do that, though," Derek said. He ran his hands through his hair. "I mean I know why I was scared, but—"

"Offering some sort of self-defense courses for free to your staff and patients who want them might be a good place to start," Adam said.

Derek frowned. "I... don't know how that would have helped me."

"It might not have," Adam said with a shrug and a wince. "But you're trying to solve a problem with a broad spectrum of causes. There is no one solution. A lot of times, what makes people scared of a particular situation is not knowing what to do when they encounter it. So, the question becomes, would it help anyone? My guess is, yes."

"I... don't know."

Adam looked at him, eyebrows raised. "Can't hurt to try, can it?"

For a long moment, Derek didn't speak.

Adam knew Derek had been working in the hospital while Gary Clark had gotten loose and gone on his rampage. But Derek had never mentioned he'd been a victim. Something had kept stopping him whenever he'd bumped into a conversational path that might lead to a confession. Other than with Meredith and with Dr. Wyatt, he didn't talk about it. Not with anyone. Even Mark danced on eggshells when it came to discussing specific details.

Derek couldn't remember most of the aftermath. He had scraps of memory here and there. Images. Sounds. Touch. Scents. Fear. Pain. Not much solid beyond about thirty minutes in the OR where he'd grabbed onto enough sentience to talk with Meredith about dirty elevator sex. There was at least an hour after he'd been shot that was a blank, and most of the first day-and-a-half after his surgery was a blurry mess.

But he remembered the catwalk. And he remembered Gary Clark standing there with a gun. And he remembered every word that Mr. Clark had said. He remembered April running up behind him. He remembered the crack of the gun, and the way his eardrums popped when it fired. He remembered falling to the ground, deafened. He remembered April abandoning him to die, and the helpless confusion he'd felt when Mr. Clark had left him, too.

All of that, he remembered.

"It's just... I was one of the ones who was shot," Derek said, staring at the bloody memory painted in his mind's eye. "And I don't... know how that would have helped me." His eyes burned. He wiped his face. His hands trembled. "What exactly is the defense when somebody has a gun shoved in your face?"

The look in Adam's eyes shifted from curious into the horrified recognition of a fellow victim. "Derek..."

"I'm... sorry," Derek said, swallowing. "It's taken me a while just to be able to say that much. I've never felt so powerless in my life."

Adam nodded. "Tell me. If you can."

Derek recounted his experience in halting syllables and frequent full stops to get himself together. He could think about it, now, and not sink into abject panic. He could tell people he'd been shot without triggering vivid flashbacks and nightmares and hypnagogic hallucinations. He'd stepped through the events before and during and what little after he remembered with Dr. Wyatt more times than he could count in order to be able to do that much. But that didn't mean it was easy for him to recount or recall in detail. Thinking about it scared him. Seeing it in his head scared him. Everything about it still scared him. He didn't think there would ever be a point in his life where it didn't.

He used to feel dumb about that. But Dr. Wyatt had assured him over and over again that the goal wasn't not to be scared. That he wasn't some sort of dunce for not being able to box the violence up somewhere numb and objective in his head. That the goal was to deal with the fear that was present in a healthy, non-destructive manner.

"So, he pointed a gun at you," Adam said. "You tried to diffuse the situation. You tried to humanize yourself in the shooter's eyes. You didn't make any threatening gestures. You were submissive."

"Yes. I. I think," Derek said, stuttering a bit. "I still don't remember... what I. What I said. Exactly."

His Hail Mary bid to Mr. Clark was the only thing he still couldn't remember about those few minutes, no matter how much he regressed through it all with Dr. Wyatt. He'd babbled, terrified, some stuttering, embarrassing, reflexive word dump to save his own life. He could remember his intent with the words. But the words themselves? They were just... gone.

"Derek, do you know what I usually teach students about self-defense versus firearms?" Adam said, snapping Derek's attention back to the present.

"No."

"That resisting is usually what gets you killed, and that you should try to talk the situation down wherever feasible. The simple fact of the matter is you, as an unarmed individual, versus somebody with a gun who knows how to use it, are mismatched. The only time I recommend outright resistance is if the shooter is trying to take you to another location, i.e. kidnapping you, or when you're certain that you'll die if you don't, and it sounds like until this other doctor came onto the scene, you had no reason to believe him shooting you was inevitable. A scary-as-fuck prospect, yes, but not inevitable. You did everything right," Adam said.

Derek blinked, stunned. "There really... wasn't anything? Nothing I could have done?"

"Don't you get it, Derek?" Adam said, leaning forward in his wheelchair. He winced, and then his expression flattened out again. "There were things you could do. And you did all of them like a pro. You weren't powerless. You were smart. And there's no magic jujitsu move to disarm maniacs I could teach you that would have fixed it."

Derek thought about that for a long moment. A lump formed in his throat. He'd always thought... Maybe. Maybe, if he hadn't been such a fucking coward, he wouldn't have gotten hurt. And he wouldn't be sick. And he wouldn't be burning himself out trying to get better before Meredith had the baby. Maybe. No matter how many times he'd tried to reframe that moment – he wouldn't think Mark in the same situation was a coward, or Meredith, or anyone – Derek's perception of that one wouldn't budge an inch. Maybe, maybe, maybe.

"They why suggest self-defense courses if there's no defense?" Derek said, though his voice sounded far away, and he felt a little dizzy. He leaned forward, and he pressed his face against his palms, trying to put himself back together. He breathed, and he counted. Three for every exhale. Three for every inhale. One, two, three. Breathe in. One, two, three. Breathe out.

"Because most people do think there's a magic jujitsu move," Adam said next to him, yet miles away. "The only way to fix that is through education. And not all defense is with your fists. A lot of it is with your mind," he said. Adam's palm pressed against Derek's shoulder. And then Adam added in a quieter tone, "Derek, are you okay?"
"I don’t like to talk about it," Derek said, his voice a croak against his trembling hands. He thought he might throw up.

"Understandable," Adam said.

"So... you teach self-defense?" Derek said, trying to distract himself.

"What?"

Derek raised his head. He felt... a little less shaky. "You mentioned teaching students."

"Oh, yeah," Adam said. "Daphne roped me into helping out on campus. I teach RAD classes."

Derek's eyebrows crept toward his hairline. "Daphne? RAD?"

"My partner's girlfriend," Adam said. "She teaches at Wash U. And RAD stands for rape aggression defense."

"Oh," Derek said. He looked out the window, into the sunshine. A rare moment, to have sun in January. He thought about the view on the catwalk, out into verdant green. He thought Daphne was a pretty name. He tried to picture what she might look like, but came up a blank slate.

"Doing okay?"

"Yeah," Derek said, the word rough against his throat. "Yeah, I'm good, now." He sighed. "Any other suggestions?"

"Well, I definitely recommend hiring a security consultant," Adam said.

"Our security department has doubled in size," Derek replied. "It's the only department that's seen gains since the shooting."

Adam snorted. The dragon tattoo coiling around his arm seemed to slither as he shifted in his chair again. "Derek, you're a smart guy."

"Your point?" Derek said.

"Surely, you know that throwing more bodies at a problem doesn't necessarily fix it."

Derek nodded. "True," he said reluctantly.

"A consultant can point out areas where you're weak," Adam added.

Derek looked at him. "Do you know any good ones?"

"I know lots," Adam said. "I'll get my partner to e-mail you some phone numbers."

"Thanks," Derek said.

Adam nodded. The silence stretched for a moment as Derek leaned back in his seat, and Adam relaxed, closing his eyes for a bit to bask in the sunshine. He tired easily and didn't spend more than a few hours awake at a time. Derek was surprised he'd lasted this long.

Derek glanced at his watch. He still had another thirty minutes before he had to be anywhere, and he was tired. He liked spending time with Adam. He did not like spending time with the staff in accounting. He felt his eyelids dip.
A rough squeak of leather and a groan snapped him awake. Adam’s biceps were shaking with strain as he attempted to rise from his wheelchair. Derek jumped up to steady him.

Derek could have said any number of things. Be careful. Don’t fall. But he’d been in this horrible place. Weaker than a newborn, but yearning to be mobile again, of course trying be careful, of course not trying to fall, and fantasizing about hitting the fucking people who told him to do either of those two things. Adam stood silently, breathing hard, swaying. He shuffle-stepped to the side. His slippers scraped the tile floor because he didn’t pick up his feet. Derek held Adam’s arm, and uttered not a single word to talk him out of it.

"Put your hands on the wheelchair handles," Derek said instead. "You can use it as a walker."

Adam looked at him and adjusted, though he looked like a geriatric hip patient doing it. His left foot dragged a little in particular, like his toes were stuck in mud, which was to be expected with the partial paralysis. His intravenous line got tangled as he shifted, and Derek helped him straighten it out. Derek followed as Adam shuffle-stepped out of the siting area, close enough to offer the support that might be needed, far enough away to offer the independence that was desired.

Derek frowned, thinking back. Cristina had done this to him. Followed him at about the same distance Derek was following Adam. Then she’d chased him down with a wheelchair and cowed him into it. Bullied him. He’d felt so awful after that. Powerless. Embarrassed. Hurting. Alone. Like a victim. And that was just one of many horrible memories from the first few drug-hazed days. He vowed not to ever do that to this man. Ever.

"Did you feel helpless?" Derek said, taking quarter steps to keep himself tamped to Adam’s glacial pace.

Adam stopped, panting, and looked at him. "When?"

"When you were shot."

"I don’t remember when I was shot," Adam said. He inched forward.

Derek blinked. "Nothing at all?"

Adam’s gaze shifted to some point beyond the horizon as he thought. "No," he said. "Nothing. My cover got blown. I got into a fight with the perp. I had him pinned on the ground. I heard a crack, crack, crack, crack. Then I woke up here."

"Oh," Derek said.

"Why?" Adam said, pushing the wheelchair along. His breaths were tight, and pearls of sweat dotted his forehead. He looked pasty and unwell, but he kept going. Kept pushing.

Derek swallowed. "I was terrified," he admitted. "And I did feel helpless."

Adam snorted. "Only an idiot isn't terrified of a loaded gun when it's pointed at him with intent."

Derek frowned. "But you said..." He took a breath. "You said you weren't afraid of guns. When I asked you earlier."

"I'm not," Adam said with a shrug. "I'm not afraid of knives, either. Or baseball bats. Or any number of things. But you can damned well bet I'm afraid if I'm in a fight where one is being used on me, particularly if I've got nothing."
"Oh," Derek replied.

They kept walking. They made it out of the atrium and into the long white hallway that led back to Adam's room. Equipment dotted the left side of the hall. Adam stuck to the right, where the railing remained unobstructed. Derek doubted Adam would make it more than halfway to the first nurses' station, if that. Derek could remember the first time he'd walked to the atrium from his room, unassisted by anything other than his own willpower – he'd only managed it the next to last day of his hospital stay, and he hadn't been in a coma for weeks. Meredith had been his babble-y little cheerleader. When he'd collapsed onto the sofa by the bay window, he'd been dizzy and sick and upset. His headspace had been a mess. Meredith had tried to cheer him up, but... He blinked away the bad memory.

Two chatty surgical interns bustled past, arguing about the latest episode of some show. They waved their arms about, intent on their discussion about whether Castiel was going to be the villain in the finale. Whoever that was. Whatever show. They didn't look up to say hello, didn't seem to notice they'd even passed their boss.

"You know when I did feel helpless?" Adam said. He'd made it another five feet.

Derek's eyebrows rose. "When?"

"When I woke up here," Adam said. His face crinkled as he frowned. "With that... thing on my face."

"The ventilator," Derek said. "Yeah, that's... claustrophobic. I didn't like it, either."

Adam stopped to look at him. "You, too?"

"The bullet hit me... here," Derek said, resting a palm against his left side. He could feel the pockmark through his shirt like a brand. "I needed open heart surgery. My... wife. She found me. She saved my life. I don't remember much. Impressions, really."

"Me, either," Adam said.

"Shock... takes a lot of it away," Derek said, and he was glad for that. He didn't want to remember it, anyway. He had a hard enough time with what he could recall.

Adam nodded. He made it another ten feet. And then he stopped, panting. Sweat plastered his ponytail to his neck, and his skin glistened. His t-shirt was drenched in a triangle shape descending from the collar, and around the armpits.

"Okay, I'm done," he said.

He looked back at the distance he'd come. Not even fifty feet. Similar to Derek's first few times out of his room. But that was fifty feet more than Adam had managed before. His lip twitched and he grinned, his pale face erupting in cheerful blush, and Derek couldn't help but smile with him. Adam was so similar and so different, all at the same time, and it helped. Watching him helped. Made Derek feel more empowered by proxy. Made Derek feel good about things he'd historically felt loathsome about.

"Not bad for a first try," Derek said, finding he meant it.

Old memories of his hospital stay reorganized in his head as he spoke. He'd thought himself pathetic back then, but he didn't feel pathetic looking back at himself anymore. He'd been healing. Just like any other human in a shitty situation. And he'd done so at a pace comparable to a former Army Ranger, now police officer, of all people.

He helped Adam settle back into his wheelchair.

"Thanks," Adam said. He looked into the distance. "It's nice not being..." Alone. Adam didn't finish his sentence, but Derek could fill it in. Derek had been very lucky to have Meredith, and Mark, and his family. Adam cleared his throat. "Thanks, man."

"Sure," Derek said. He leaned forward and pushed him and Adam into motion. The wheelchair's wheels squeaked as they rubbed on the floor. Derek bit his lip as hope blossomed in his chest. "So, I really did everything right with...?"

Derek stood in front of the OR board, shifting from foot to foot. He clenched his fingers, crumpling his abused scrub cap into a sad, sweaty ball. He wasn't sure what had possessed him.

When he'd come to work that morning, when he'd kissed Meredith before her shift, he hadn't had any machinations, no stealth plans to dive headlong back into his career as a surgeon. One who actually cut. But then he'd done his rounds, and he'd walked by the board, and the sprawl of names had caught his eye in more than a cursory fashion. He'd stopped, and he'd stared for a moment, and then he'd sighed. A wistful sigh. A twinge of longing had snapped in his chest and was gone, moments later, but it'd been there. That desire. That need. He'd shrugged it off as the product of eating a bad omelet or something. He never felt like that about surgery anymore.

But then he'd passed by the board a second time later that morning, and it'd happened again. And he'd stopped. And he'd stared at all the names. He'd bitten his lip and shifted his weight from foot to foot, much like he was doing, now. But he'd felt it again. That twinge. A niggling desire.

He'd shrugged the feeling off again, but between then and now, his scrub cap had wandered into his suit pocket. He couldn't even remember going back to his office to get it, but he'd passed by the board a third time, this time, and he'd stopped. And he'd stared. And there it was – the cap – clutched in his hands, wrinkled and damp with the sweat from his palms.

People pushed back and forth in the hallway behind him, shuffling, talking, but the world dimmed to a focused pinpoint. The board. He skimmed the names of all the surgeons in operating rooms. Skimmed the names of all the procedures. He bit his lip, ambivalence making him hurt. Something inside his chest had a sudden, shocking void carved out of it, almost like he'd been shot, but this void was existential, not physical. And he really wanted to—

"Are you kidding?" Mr. Clark said. "You can't do that."

Derek shook his head.

"You'll kill someone," Mr. Clark said.

The lights overhead sharpened into glaring spears, and his throat closed, and he couldn't breathe. No. No, he couldn't. He couldn't do it. Stupid. What a stupid idea. He snapped back on his heels, yanking himself away from the board like he'd been burned, only to plow right into a solid, unyielding wall of Mark. Derek's scrub cap fell from his hands on impact.

Mark caught Derek's shoulders in a bid to keep him from falling, but released him as soon Derek had balanced himself. Mark hopped back a few inches, holding up his hands in plain view, as though he hoped to make himself look as nonthreatening as possible. The quiet scuffle took all of four seconds.

"Sorry, man," Mark said, and Derek blinked. Swallowed. Bent to pick up his scrub cap, which had landed on the scuffed, white-tile floor.

"It's fine," Derek managed, though his voice didn't sound... quite right. A little croaky, maybe. Derek swallowed again. He cleared his throat. His heart pounded for three or four beats, and then he couldn't hear it anymore. Couldn't feel it. He clasped his fingers around his scrub cap. They didn't shake.

"You all right?" Mark said as Derek straightened up, scrub cap in tow. Mark looked at the board behind Derek, eyes narrowing, and then he glanced at the tiny bundle clutched in Derek's fist. "You looking for an empty OR?" Mark said.

"No," Derek said.

Mark frowned. "No, you're not all right, or, no, you're not looking for an empty OR?"

"I'm fine," Derek said. He took a deep, slow breath, and that was the end of it. The end of his entire threat response. Five seconds of heart palpitations, and a bit of a wheezy sound to his words for the duration. He hadn't flinched. Or yelled. Or started to shake. Or in any way devolved into a gibbering mess. "Totally fine," he added, surprised. His lip twitched. And then he smiled hesitantly. He couldn't help it. "I meant I'm not looking for an empty OR."

Mark's eyes narrowed. He wore his dark blue scrubs, untied mask flipped down over his chest from his neck a bit like a bib. From the dents on Mark's face and the flush to his cheeks, the mask had been in place until recently. Derek flicked his gaze back to the board and saw "SLOAN, M" listed next to a double mastectomy procedure that had started at 7:00 am. It was almost 11:30 am, now.

When Derek didn't elaborate, Mark frowned. "What, were you looking for a not-empty OR, then?" And then his face brightened. "Holy shit, you were."

"It..." Derek deflated. "It was a dumb idea. I don't think I'm rea—"

"Oh, hell, yes, you are," Mark said, cutting him off. He grabbed Derek's shoulders in an iron, vise-like hold, and he strong-armed Derek back to the OR board. A wall of names looked back at Derek. "Yes, you are," Mark continued. "Pick one, and go. I wish I'd known you were thinking about this. I would have dragged you into mine. Finished with flying colors, by the way. And the reconstruction will look really hot on her. Some of my best work."

"I wasn't thinking about this," Derek insisted. "I wasn't. But..."

Mark's grin spread wider. "Got the bug?"

"I..." Derek swallowed. "Yeah. A little." Mark opened his mouth, and Derek said, "Emphasis on little," to stave Mark off at the pass, but Derek's attempt at reining Mark in didn't seem to work.

"Finally," Mark said, ignoring Derek's size quantifier. "If you don't pick something right now, I've got a facial reconstruction on Thursday that you'll be helping me with."

"Mark—"

"No," Mark said. "I'm not letting you convince yourself you're not ready. It's what you do, and if you've got even the tiniest damned spark—"
Derek sighed. "But, Mark—"

"No," Mark repeated. "It's a roller coaster, man. Just get on the ride, and go."

"It's people, Mark," Derek said, the words soft. "It's lives."

Mark rolled his eyes. "You're not going to hurt anyone just by scrubbing in. Nobody's asking you to excise a stage four malignant glioblastoma and all its metastatic tumor babies. Just go, man."

Derek sighed and read the board. Nothing called to him. Dr. Weller was in 7 with a t4 meningioma. Spinal tumors were a lot more complicated and a lot more weighty than Derek was willing to deal with his first time out of the gate since... seven months. Jesus, had it been that long? Derek clenched his teeth, counting. He hadn't cut in over seven months. Closer to eight months. Dr. Nelson was in 2 with a pituitary adenoma, and that... that was... That was not something Derek wanted to touch either. A particular curse of neurosurgery was that a screw up, even a tiny one, could result in catastrophic mental and physical deficits for the patient, and Derek didn't think he could stomach worrying about that on top of everything else.

The surgeries in 1 and 4 were both six plus hour cardio procedures that required stamina Derek wasn't convinced he had anymore. The surgery in 3 was a cesarean, and there was no way in hell Derek was going to risk a baby. In 5, Richard was doing a colectomy. All the other ORs were empty, courtesy of Seattle Grace's failing popularity.

The colectomy was the only thing Derek could even see himself trying. The problem was that that procedure typically took four hours or less, and Richard had started at 8:00 am, which meant by the time Derek scrubbed in, the procedure would be done, unless there were serious complications, and Derek didn't want to be involved in a surgery with serious complications. Not yet.

Derek pulled his hands through his hair. "Mark, there's really nothing here that would be a good starter surgery for me."

A nurse approached the board, biting her lip. She was a tiny twenty-something woman, probably only recently graduated from nursing school. She glanced at Mark and Derek, a shy, wavering smile pasted on her mocha-colored face. "Excuse me, sirs," she said in a soft, smoky tone that belied her slight frame.

Mark's expression shifted. His eyes gleamed like a wolf, and his smile oozed into something predatory. Something flirtly. Something lecherous. "Why, hello there," he said. "Have we met?"

The nurse blinked. "I just started last week."

"Christine," the nurse said, putting her hand in his, and he clasped it. "Christine Chapel." Derek's eyes must have widened slightly as they shook hands, because the woman just rolled her eyes and said, "Yes, exactly like Star Trek. No, my parents weren't fans, just clueless. And, no, I'm not a fan, either."

"Christine," said Mark, ignoring her rant. "That's a pretty name."

Derek elbowed Mark again. "So, Mark, have you seen Lexie today?" Derek said through gritted teeth, forcing that smile to stay stuck on his face. "She was looking for you earlier."
Mark shut up with a cough.

The dry erase marker squeaked in the awkward silence that followed as Christine filled in a new entry for OR 8. When the nurse left, Mark made a fist and scrunched his face like he was frustrated. "Fuck, this whole monogamy thing is hard," he said with a weighted sigh.

Derek's eyes narrowed. "Look, Mark," Derek said. "Lexie is part of my family. I care about her. Please, please don't fuck this up again. If you want to play the field, play the fucking field, but do her the courtesy of cutting her loose, first, and don't expect another 'be kind, rewind' on that front. I'm amazed she did it even once."

Mark nodded. "I know." He closed his eyes. "I know." He sighed. "I really don't know how you do it sometimes."

"What?" Derek said.

"You're so..." Mark squinted at him. "Faithful."

Derek snorted. "That's not a bad word, Mark. You can say it a little less like it's lutefisk in your mouth."

"I want to be. For Little Grey. I really do."

"Then do it," Derek said. "Grow up. It's a choice. Don't blame your dick for the crappy decisions you make."

Mark's lips formed a flat line that quivered. And twitched. And bled into a smile. He laughed. Hard. "Jesus," he said. "We sound like we're on Oprah or something."

Derek frowned. "Are you saying I'm Dr. Phil?"

Mark clapped him on the back. "Nope. You just did it for me." He laughed. "Anyway," he said. He looked back at the OR board. Derek followed his gaze.

The new surgery Christine had filled in on the board could have said, "Derek, this was meant for you," and it wouldn't have been any less accurate. Laparoscopic cholecystectomy. "BAILEY, M." Starting at 11:45 am, which was – Derek glanced at his watch – just about now. A laparoscopic cholecystectomy was such a simple procedure that there'd barely be anything for an assistant to do except stand there and participate in the act of being scrubbed in. Precisely the kind of shallow pool Derek felt like he could dip his toe into without too much risk of drowning.

"Gee," Mark said, a wry grin on his face. "It's almost like the universe wants you to listen to me."

"You can't," Mr. Clark said. "You can't do it."

Derek closed his eyes. "Mark..."

"No," Mark said, grabbing Derek's wrist. He pulled Derek in the direction of OR 8. Admittedly, Derek let himself be pulled. "You need a kick in the ass. I'm kicking it. Just like you kick mine."

Derek stared at the door. He started to shake. "Mark," he said, the word breathy.

Mark opened the door and shoved Derek into the dark scrub room. The operating room beyond the window bustled with activity, though they didn't appear to have started yet. Dr. Bailey chatted with a nurse as they lowered the operating table to accommodate her slight height. Derek had never felt such a strange dichotomy of longing and reluctance before in his life, and he ached. He ached with it. He rubbed his shirt along his scar line, barely noticing as his knuckles hit button after button.

A hand pressed against his throat, and Derek flinched in surprise. "Just taking your tie," Mark said, the words toned low and soothing. "Okay?"

Derek managed to nod. He watched numbly as the blue tie Meredith liked so much, the one that, she claimed, made the color of his eyes pop, slipped into Mark's grasp. Mark coiled the tie around his palm like he was equipping himself with brass knuckles or something.

"Now, put on your cap, push up your sleeves, and start scrubbing," Mark said. He folded his arms over his chest. "I'm not leaving until I see some soap bubbles."

Derek didn't move. He couldn't move. A watery, weak feeling crept into his legs, and for a brief moment, he considered sitting down, if only to prevent falling. One of the faucets dripped, and the plop, plop, plop of loose water droplets hitting the metal sink basin marked off a glacial eternity as it passed. He couldn't do this.

Mark sighed. "Look, if you freak out, you freak out. Leave, if you do. But don't not go in just because it might not work out the way you want it to. I mean it, man. If you've got the bug, use it."

Derek nodded uselessly.

"You're not ready for this," Mr. Clark said. "You're not."

Derek clenched his fists, and he took a shallow, shaky breath. He squeezed his eyes shut and brought his hands to his face. "Stop it," he snapped.

Mark backed off, holding his hands up as he gave Derek a wide, four foot bubble of personal space. "Deep breaths. You can do this."

"You can't do this," Mr. Clark said.

The clash jarred his ears like cymbals. Mark wasn't a liar, Derek thought. Not about stuff like this. Mark had all the guile of a watermelon. The only reasonable scenarios Derek could think of where Mark would be lying – very transparently, Derek might add – were, a, the surgery was a woman who was asking for a second date, which it wasn't, or b... That thought's tires screeched and veered into a mental pylon before Addison was much more than a blurry, redhead wisp in Derek's mind. He couldn't go there. Wouldn't go there.

Derek shook his head. Mark wasn't a liar. He wasn't. He wasn't. Which meant Mr. Clark was wrong. It meant...

Anytime you hear his voice in your head, I want you to pause, and I want you to think, he heard Dr. Wyatt say, an echo.

Pause. Think.

Derek looked at the OR and shifted indecisively from foot to foot. He could hear his heart beating now. He could hear it like wild thunder in his ears, slamming up against his eardrums. The patient was anesthetized. Bailey was already going in. This was such a short procedure, if he didn't move, now, he'd lose his chance. He'd lose it. And... He swallowed. He wanted it.

Fuck.
We were in the OR, he'd told Meredith only a month ago, and I wasn't scared, and it was going well, and it was just... nice.

He ground his teeth and marched himself to the doorway. He grabbed a disposable mask from the dispenser and covered his face. He stepped forward.

And he shoved Mr. Clark away.

Dr. Bailey looked up from the table to him, eyebrows raised askance as he came through the door, though she didn't relax her grip on the grasper handle she'd picked up. "Chief?" she said. "Is there a problem?"

He blinked against the glare of the OR lights.

The overhead lights bore down on him like a train. He lay on his back on the OR table, cold and woozy and sick, and he floated in a stupor. Her hand clutched his. He could feel it. Could feel her fingers squeezing his knuckles until the bones all jammed together. His hand shook in her grasp.

He knew she was there in a vague sense. She said things he didn't understand, and her sniffles and croaks were a kind of background snow in his ears. He couldn't breathe. He tried so hard, but his lungs wouldn't inflate, his chest felt like an elephant had crushed it, and he hurt. So, he floated.

"Hang on. Please, hang on," he heard her say. "They're setting up as fast as they can."

He shivered, watching the lights.

"How's he doing?" a man said.

"Bad," she responded, the words panicky. "And he's not talking, anymore." She pressed her palm against his face. Pulled her fingers through his sweaty hair. "Derek, can you hear me? Derek, please."

But he couldn't. Move, think, talk, breathe, wish. He couldn't any of it.

"Please, hold on for me," she said. "Please. Please, Derek."

He hurt.

"Please."

He shivered.

"Please."

He watched the lights.

"Please, don't leave me," she whispered.

And he floated.

He blinked, snapping himself out of the cloudy, amorphous memory, which was detached from anything that preceded or followed it. It was just there. In his head. A terrifying, disconnected piece of flotsam that always hijacked him the first few moments he came into an OR. Any OR. But only for moments.

That was a long time ago, he told himself. He felt fine, now. Things were okay. He was okay. He didn't hurt anymore. He wasn't trapped, dying in slow motion. He could move. He could talk. He could breathe. He could do anything he put his mind to, including but not limited to replacing that scary thought with an imaginary pickle run for Meredith. With the image of their first sonogram. With Samantha playing fetch with him at the dog park. With anything.

He inhaled, exhaled, grabbed the pickles off his mental shelf, and pushed the memory of helplessness away.

But that didn't stop his heart from pounding.

"..." The first syllable he managed died in the air, only the barest thread of sound separating it from total silence. He closed his eyes. Took a breath. Squared his shoulders. "May I scrub in?" he said, the words a lot less authoritative than he would have liked, but...

Dr. Bailey's eyes creased.

"This is a cholecystectomy," she said slowly, and though a mask obscured her face, he could imagine her frown as it deepened.

Thump-thump, thump-thump, thump-thump. His heart pounded. He licked his dry lips.

"So?" he managed.

"So, does this look like it involves a brain to you?" Dr. Bailey said.

He glanced at the monitor, which showed what the laparoscope inside the patient's distended abdomen was seeing. A lot of fleshy pink. Connective tissues. Fatty deposits. The unmistakable reddish brown of a liver. Not things he often saw during surgery, but he'd been a resident way back when. Hell, he'd even done a cholecystectomy, though his had been open, not laparoscopic. The memory hung on the fringes of his recollection.

"Well, with all the squiggles and stuff, it could be a brain," he said, gesturing dismissively at the screen as he tried and almost grasped some real bravado. Almost.

Dr. Bailey snorted. "Remind me never to let you near my brain."

"Hey, I saved the father of your child," he countered.

She rolled her eyes. "A fluke, clearly."

"Seriously, though. May I?"

She blinked. "What the hell for?"

"I just thought..." Derek swallowed. Dr. Bailey was staring at him. All the scrub nurses were staring at him. His nerve leaked out like loose spinal fluid, and he lost all fluency with the English language. "I thought..." he stammered.

Dr. Bailey met him with her unblinking brown eyes, but her expression softened as she watched him struggle. "I'm the boss in here, not you," she said, gesturing at him with a gloved hand. "You get that, right?" she said, but her tone wasn't mean. More of a gentle reminder. If Derek had had any ego left to check at the door, the warning may have been useful, but Dr. Derek Shepherd, rockstar neurosurgeon, was trapped in stasis somewhere, and hell if Dr. Derek Shepherd, recent shooting victim, knew where he'd gone.

He clutched his surgical mask with a white-knuckled grip. "I just want to scrub in," he managed.
"Please."

The patient's heart monitor bleeped in the ensuing void. Derek closed his eyes to shut himself away from the staring. He was shaky enough without a dozen people watching him like a cluster of hawks eyeballing a mouse. He waited for the verdict.

"Well, get in here, you fool," Dr. Bailey said with a long suffering sigh.

Derek blinked. The heavy weight that had perched itself on his shoulders melted away. "I'll be right there," he said, and he darted back into the scrub room before Dr. Bailey could respond, tossing the disposable mask into the biohazard bin as he went.

Mark was waiting for him in the shadowed scrub room. He stood like a bouncer at the door, his beefy arms crossed over his chest, Derek's tie still tangled up in his fist. When Derek didn't speak, instead moving to the sink while he pulled off his watch, Mark animated.

"That's what I'm talking about!" Mark said with a muted clap as he struck his palms together, and then he pumped his fist with a guttural, triumphant grunt.

Derek tied his ferryboat scrub cap over his hair as he glanced down at himself. He wore his button down shirt and dark slacks and dress shoes, testament to just how spontaneous this crazy idea had been. Not his preferred clothes for surgery from a comfort perspective, but with a sterilized smock overtop, for a short procedure like this, they'd be all right. He'd played dress up in the OR any number of times for emergencies where he didn't have time to change.

Derek turned on the faucet and began to scrub methodically, and just as Mark had promised, as soon as suds started forming on Derek's skin, Mark left. The door to the hallway clicked shut. Mark raised his hand to the window to give Derek a thumbs up through the wire mesh glass. And then Mark was gone, leaving Derek alone in the silence.

By the time Derek made it back into the OR, and one of the scrub nurses had helped him put on his mask, smock, and gloves, Dr. Bailey had been working for about fifteen minutes. She glanced up at him as he came to rest on the opposite side of the table. His teeth almost chattered with stress. Nervous energy made him shiver along his spine, but he shook it off, rolling his shoulders and neck as he settled in for the remainder of the forty-five minute procedure.

He blinked down at the person on the table, and then at the heart monitor to his right, bleep, bleep, bleeping in a slow plod to fill the quiet. The patient's face and body had been obscured by a blue drape. He could identify that the patient was a woman based on how the draping was done, but all Derek could see was the pale flesh of her abdomen, inflated with carbon dioxide for the procedure, and the edges of her ribs. The three laparoscopic rods pierced her skin just over her bellybutton, in the middle of her torso, and slightly off to the side, a few inches underneath her left breast. He could see her breathe in time with the hiss click hiss click of the ventilator. She was a real, living person. Not a surgical dummy.

Shit, he was really doing this. Derek swallowed nervously, heart slamming in his ears.

"Hold this," Dr. Bailey said, barely audible over Derek's internal thunder, and before he knew it, he was holding the rod attached to the laparoscope, moving it as Dr. Bailey commanded.

For another ten minutes, the surgery proceeded in a textbook fashion, and Derek didn't speak. He guided the camera where Dr. Bailey asked for him to move it, and he watched, and he listened, and he kept breathing, in and out, in and out, right along with the patient, because he thought if he talked, or if he stopped counting to three for every inhalation, he might dissolve in a gibbering mess. A whole rabble of butterflies had busted out a keg and were having a party in his stomach.

He was really fucking doing this.

"Damn," Dr. Bailey said, the single syllable one of disappointment.

Derek squinted at the monitor, trying to follow her unspoken thought process. Red soup rapidly filled the visual field. "That's a lot of bleeding," he said, words only slightly shivery, despite the fact that his jaw vibrated, and his limbs felt like water. He looked at Dr. Bailey. The liver, basically a giant detoxification system for the blood, was very vascular. The gallbladder, which is what they were trying to remove, was a storage compartment for the liver, and as a result, by its very nature, a cholecystectomy occurred in close quarters with the liver. Excessive bleeding was a common complication. "Too much?"

Dr. Bailey nodded. "Yeah. Yeah, it is." She sighed. "Okay, pull everything out. I need to open her up. Damn it." She glanced at the table. "Sorry, Nina."

Derek felt a twinge of sympathy for the patient as he removed the laparoscope. Outpatient surgery had just become a hospital stay, along with a much longer, much more painful recovery. But there wasn't anything that could be done about it except press onward. This just happened with some patients.

Still, a laparoscopic cholecystectomy took forty-five minutes. An open cholecystectomy took two hours, and he'd need to do a lot more than just hold a camera without speaking. He'd likely be touching things like flesh. Like tissue. Like blood. All components of a real, vulnerable, living person. Not just an inanimate rod with a camera stuck on the end.

He closed his eyes and took a deep breath, trying to maintain his calm. He could do this. He could do this. He wanted to do this. Two hours was still a short procedure. And this wasn't a serious complication. Just a little bump in the road. Nothing to panic about. Nothing to get upset over. Nothing—

"Dr. Shepherd," Dr. Bailey said, and he snapped his eyes open to see a scalpel held toward him from her outstretched hand. The dull, handle end of the gleaming blade faced him. "Would you like to open?"

His throat closed. "No," he said, the word a croak, and much more vehement than he would have liked. He flinched backward. Just an inch. But he could feel eyeballs on him, pairs of them boring into the back of his neck. Somebody whispered something he couldn't hear. He tried not to imagine them laughing at him. He cleared his throat with an awkward, chuffing stutter of air. "Thank you," he managed to add in a calmer tone.

If he were an intern, he imagined Dr. Bailey might say something along the lines of, "That wasn't a request, Dr. Shepherd," in response, but she didn't do anything of the kind with him. She gave him an understanding, wordless nod, and she lowered the scalpel to the patient's abdomen.

"All right, then," she said, and she drew the knife north to south in a quick, clean stroke that split apart the patient's skin. A thin line of blood welled up where she'd cut. "Lucy," she added absently to one of the scrub nurses, "hand Dr. Shepherd a retractor, please."

Derek took the retractor. For a long moment, all he could do was stare at it in like someone had handed him a golf club at a basketball game. Jesus, he was doing this. He hadn't expected to—

"You sure you're okay being my peon?" Dr. Bailey said at his prolonged stillness, her voice gentle.
The dubiousness in her gaze wasn't lost on him. Not an iota. But he had the distinctest impression she wasn't asking about his ability to take orders instead of give them.

She was giving him an out that would save face, he realized. If he was too scared to do this. If he'd jumped into the deep end and realized he couldn't swim. He could throw an ego fit – a common tantrum among cocky, bleeding-edge surgeons — leave, and his rockstar image would be preserved.

Except he was no rockstar. Not anymore. He hadn't been on the bleeding edge of anything since he'd taken his mind-numbing job as chief. And he really, really wanted to remember how to love this.

He shook himself out of inaction, lowering the retractor, and gently spread apart Dr. Bailey's incision. The retractor shook. Not enough to impair his ability to use it, but the instability was noticeable. To him. To Bailey, certainly. Maybe, to the scrub nurses. The metal gleamed under the bright OR lights. The wet sound separating skin and muscle and adipose tissue filled the tense silence. His jaw shook like he was stuck in the freezing arctic. He clenched his teeth to make it stop, but there was nothing he could do about his hands except soldier through.

He was okay. This was okay. Everything was okay. This was kiddie pool stuff.

"Miranda, I'd happily be your peon any day of the week," he said, speaking through his teeth. He tried to inject some cheer into his tone, something to cover up the ohmygod ohmygod ohmygod knocking around in his skull like a pinball. He wasn't sure he was successful. He was staring at the open abdominal cavity of a real person, a young woman named Nina, who hadn't died the second Derek had gotten involved with anything that halfway resembled cutting, and it was—

"Any day that ends in Q, you mean," Dr. Bailey said.

"We need some suction," Derek said at the bloody mess he found underneath the incision, and a nurse responded by aspirating the area and clearing the field of view. A lake of red became recognizable organs again. Tissues. He looked up at Dr. Bailey. "That hurts. Truly. And here I thought we had a good working relationship." He managed a smile. A real one. Brief though it was.

"I'll believe it when you hold this retractor for two hours without whining," Dr. Bailey said, her tone sardonic.

Derek snorted. "I'll have you know I'm excellent at holding retractors!"

She raised her eyebrow at him. "Then why is my visual field the size of a walnut?"

"Just making it challenging," he muttered, and she chuckled.

He frowned and pulled the incision open wider, making the motion as gentle as possible. Admittedly, it'd been so long since he'd made an incision in that area that he had no recollection of what kind of elasticity or give there was, no idea what was too much and what was too little, and he'd much rather err on the side of too little. He could always add pull, but he couldn't take away an additional injury after he'd created one.

"You're fine," Dr. Bailey said as if she'd read his mind, and he relaxed a little.

And that was when he made the mistake of rolling his neck and shoulders again. His view shifted as he tilted back his head. He noticed the gallery overhead. And it was full. Jam-packed. An army of aspiring surgeons. Stuck in the dark little room overhead like sardines. This was a routine gallbladder removal. You couldn't get more boring. None of the interns had even bothered to sign up for it. Why was...?

Fuck.

Dr. Bailey followed his gaze. Her eyes narrowed. "Somebody hit the intercom button," she snapped.

One of the scrub nurses in the cluster by the table peeled away from the pack. "It's open," he said in a deep voice after he reached the button and pressed it.

"Now, I know you all don't think my OR is here for your entertainment," Dr. Bailey said, tone sharp like a steak knife. Everybody in the gallery stared back, bug-eyed, motionless, caught red-handed. "Unless you're a first year resident with a notepad taking copious notes on how to perform this surgery, and believe me, if I see you up there, you will be performing it solo while I watch next time, so you'd better take some damned fantastic notes, get the hell out of my gallery."

For a long moment, nobody moved.

"Don't make me find someone to remove you," Dr. Bailey threatened. She glanced at Derek. "How hard can Sloan hit, anyway?"

And then everybody couldn't get out of the gallery fast enough. A massive clot of people traffic-jammed at the door, but after a lot of pushing and shoving and general chaos, the whole baby-blue-colored stampede of them filed out. Everybody except for two interns, who did appear legitimately to be taking notes. Latoya Watson was the name of the woman sitting on the left, but the name of the man on the right escaped him.

Derek blinked. "I..." he managed, and then his throat closed, and he couldn't say another word.

"They're all just happy you're back in the OR, Dr. Shepherd," said a small voice behind him. He turned. Lucy. She smiled at him, not visible behind her mask, but her eyes crinkled around the edges, and he could imagine the rest of her face. "It's big news. Don't mind them being idiots about it." A lot of the scrub nurses nodded.

Derek closed his eyes and took a long breath and blew it out, inflating his mask briefly like a bubble. His hands shook. His teeth chattered. He couldn't make them stop. The lights felt hot against his face. Maybe, he wasn't ready for this. Maybe, he'd been a fucking fool.

The overhead lights bore down on him like a train. He lay on his back on the OR table, cold and woozy and sick, and he floated in a stupor. Her hand clutched his. He—

He blinked the image away before it could take over. Before it could become so vivid that he was in it. Stuck in it.

Dr. Bailey watched him. "You good?" she said, as if he hadn't just averted some kind of mental breakdown.

"Yeah," he managed, a croak. "Yeah, I..." He cleared his throat. He took another deep breath. He blew it out. "Yeah."

"You want to scrub out?" she asked.

"No," he said, almost as vehement as he'd been when she'd asked if he wanted to open. "No, I..." He swallowed. "I want to do this. I need to. I'm okay."
"You're sure?" she said.

He nodded. The pause allowed him to gather his wits. Another deep breath. In and out. Another. Three, and he almost felt like he had at the beginning. Nervous as fuck, but... wanting. He wanted to do this. He needed to get this part of himself back. A void had carved itself out of his soul, and he needed it filled.

He needed to cut.

A breathy laugh escaped from his lips. This was more than just a bug. Way more.

"I really miss this," he admitted.

Dr. Bailey's eyes narrowed. She reached across the poor woman on the table and took the retractor from his trembling hands. The bleep, bleep, bleep of the heart monitor marked the seconds as they passed.

"Dr. Bailey," he protested, "I'm fine. I can—"

"Dr. Shepherd," Dr. Bailey said, cutting him off. "Do you remember all the steps of a cholecystectomy?"

An inkling of where she was going with this tickled him. The butterflies found a DJ for their stomach party and started dancing. His teeth started again. With the fucking chattering. "Well, I'm sure I could... muddle through. If I had to."

Dr. Bailey shrugged. She tipped her head to the side, gesturing wordlessly at the instrument tray. "What are you waiting for, then?" She waved at him with a bloody glove. "Muddle."

She pulled open the incision with the retractor she'd stolen from him, giving him a clear field of view. This was way more participation than he'd planned. He felt a bit like he'd dipped his toe in the water, only to have some cowboy gallop past with a lasso and yank him under the surf.

"Miranda, I—"

"So, how do you think you start?" Dr. Bailey said.

He looked down at his gloves. "My hands are shaking."

She glanced down at his hands, and then back to him. Her brown eyes met his, unblinking. "Not nearly enough to matter," she said.

"But—"

"Do you think I'm going to let you kill my patient?" she snapped.

Silence stretched.

He swallowed. "No."

"Then trust me," Dr. Bailey said. "And tell me how you start."

"Well, I, uh..." He stared at the abdominal cavity. The ohmygod ohmygod ohmygod started shaking around again in his skull. He tried to remember way back when he'd been a resident at Mount Sinai. Back before he'd chosen neurosurgery as his specialty. Back before the Shepherd Method and countless research articles and dozens of groundbreaking surgeries. He grabbed onto a wisp of a memory. "L-l-lap pads. Under the liver," he said. He clenched his teeth. Stuttering. Him. God, he was a mess.

Dr. Bailey passed off her retractor to Lucy and started grabbing lap pads from the tray. Dr. Bailey packed the area for him.

"Do you think you'd like to use a retrograde or an anterograde approach?" she said.

"W-well we started laparoscopically," he replied.

"And?"

"S-so we use the anterograde method," he said. He looked to Dr. Bailey for confirmation.

She nodded at him. "And what do you think may have caused the excess bleeding?"

"I..." That, he really didn't know. This was getting into the specialized stuff he'd long since let leak out of his brain in favor of memorizing neurosurgical procedures. In fact, there was a good chance he'd never known it. "That's a little above my pay grade," he joked nervously.

"My guess would be I nicked the cystic artery," she said, but there was no reproach in her voice. This wasn't something she'd expected him to know. "How would you like to fix that?"

He licked his lips. His mouth felt like a desert. "I n-need forceps," he said.

The scrub nurse to his right passed him his desired tool. The metal was cold. Chill seeped through his glove. He clutched the forceps so hard his knuckles hurt. Fuck, he was really going to do this, wasn't he? Fuck. Fuck. Fuckfuckfuck. How had this happened? He wasn't ready for this. He couldn’t—

"Just take a deep breath," Dr. Bailey said, her tone soothing. "You're fine. The patient is fine."

"You say that, now," he said, tone breathy. He laughed at his own joke, but the laugh wasn't one of humor. Just nerves. Stress. Holyfuckhollyfuck. All venting in weird ways.

"Derek," Dr. Bailey said. "You're fine. You're doing better than a lot of residents so far. Now, put your nerves away, and get this done."

He nodded. He rolled his neck and shoulders. The two interns who'd remained were staring at him through the glass, bug-eyed and stunned and... sympathetic. He fought the urge to chuckle inappropriately again. Of course, they'd feel some solidarity. Dr. Bailey wasn't picking on him, at least. She was actually being alarmingly nice to him.

"I need to separate... the cystic duct from the artery," he said. He looked at Dr. Bailey. All she did was nod, so he went to work.

He did need forceps, but... not yet. He handed them back.

This area of the body wasn't something he was used to manipulating. Or touching. Or cutting into.

One of the first things one learned in anatomy classes is that internal human plumbing is nothing like the beautiful colored diagrams in medical textbooks. The real thing was a mess of similarly colored blobs, none of which were clearly separate entities on cursory examination, with tons of connective tissues and veins and fatty deposits and all manner of things smashed between them. In short, the inside of the human body was a Jell-O mold of organized chaos, and good luck finding what you wanted, even if you knew what it, in theory, looked like. The liver, though. Both large and a distinctive shade, the liver was an easy organ to find. He used that as his reference as he fumbled around, looking for what he wanted.

He found the triangle of Calot and narrowed his focus. In the triangle was the common bile duct.
The hepatic duct. He identified the cystic duct, and the cystic artery.

Now, he needed the forceps. He picked them up again.

In his search, he found the inadvertent hole Dr. Bailey had made. A tiny laceration in the cystic artery. Exactly as she'd speculated. Ligating the tear was a quick matter of a few stitches. Blood stopped leaking in a few heartbeats, and the nurse who'd been periodically aspirating the area moved away, job done. From there, he moved on from fixing complications to continuing with the standard procedure.

"You know," Dr. Bailey said, watching as he ran his fingers along the cystic duct, pushing gallstones back into the gallbladder before he removed it. "Considering you probably haven't done this in, what, fifteen years? You remember this really damned well."

He laughed. Genuinely. And he felt lighter for it. "Yeah. Fifteen sounds about right."

Jackhammering heart, keg-slamming butterflies, watery limbs, and ohmygod ohmygod ohmygod aside, a layer of adrenaline rush had snuck in somewhere along the way. The epinephrine flow wasn't like his panic attacks, where it crashed in like a wrecking ball, devastated his equilibrium, and receded in a quick gush, leaving him wasted, tired, and collapsing. No, this was a steady thrum that didn't abate. A natural high.

When he dissected the gallbladder itself and removed it, the hearty round of applause he received made him flinch in surprise. Everybody clapped. The nurses. The note-taking interns. The anesthesiologist. Everybody. A giddy feeling rolled over him like a wave.

"Would you like to close, Dr. Shepherd?" Dr. Bailey asked as he disposed of the gallbladder in the appropriate biohazard bin.

He found himself saying, "Yes."

Dr. Bailey's expression softened. He couldn't see her mouth through the mask, but he knew without a doubt she was grinning at him. She squeezed him on the shoulder before she left.

"And you doubted," she said.

He snorted. "Yeah." He sighed. "Go ahead. Get it out of your system."

"You damned, stupid fool," she said, though with no bite in her tone, and then she added in a softer tone, "Welcome back."

"Thank you," he said.

"Glad I could help," she responded.

He finished the surgery in a matter of minutes. Stitching was like riding a bike to him, and he gave the woman a line of tiny loops along the incision that would minimize scarring. The abdomen was unfortunately prone to scarring, so she'd have marks, even years later. But, maybe, he'd made it a little better. After he tied things off, he leaned down to the unconscious woman, and said with a whisper by her ear, "Nina, I know you don't know me, but... thanks. I'll stop in to say hi later."
And then he stepped back and stared with a stupid grin while the nurses took over and prepped the woman to head back to the recovery room. He didn't move for a long time. Just stood there staring. Smiled at the shiny metal operating table. Even long after the woman had been wheeled away, he didn't budge.

He fucking did it.

He fucking did it.

He glanced around. The gallery had cleared out. The scrub nurses were cleaning up, not paying attention to him. He pumped his fist while nobody was watching, and then he left, almost skipping instead of walking. He peeled off the used smock and tossed his used gear into the biohazard bin on the way out. He scrubbed out in a giddy sort of daze that had him halfway to cavorting around like a tap dancer on Broadway. A smile pasted itself across his face and would not go away.

He made it all of two steps into the hallway outside the scrub room. Meredith, who'd been leaning against the wall beside the door, arms folded over her chest, one leg bent with her foot resting on the wall, sprung into motion. Her converse sneaker squeaked down the wall as she straightened herself from leaning to standing. She raised her arms. In the corner of his eye, he had time to identify movement, and he turned his head, much too ensconced in the floating, happy feeling loitering in his brain to be startled or scared. Her smile lit up like fireworks. She let one second pass while he took in the sight of her with his gaze, two, and then she pulled him into a fierce, lavender-scented embrace.

"I... Derek!"

"Meredith!" he replied with a laugh, unable to do much else intelligent.

"Shut up!" she said, and he laughed again. She bounced. In his arms. He barely fought the urge to jump right along with her. Screw the fact that they were professional adults standing in a public hallway full of people who were his subordinates, because he felt fucking awesome. Her fingers toiled at the nape of his neck, and then she scrunched her hand. Hard. "Seriously. I'm so..." She laughed and flushed a lovely, deep shade of pink. One of his very favorite pinks. "You're so..." She clutched his shirt and kissed him. "I had no freaking idea you were going to do that today!" she eventually decided on saying.

"I didn't, either," he said.

She looked up at him, smile bleeding wider as he watched. "Hi," she said in a soft voice.

He sighed against her. "Hi," he said, the word almost a breathless wisp as he pressed his nose against her hair and inhaled, and for a long, stretching moment, all she did was hug him so hard he could barely move, or speak, or breathe. Her warmth pressed against him, adding jumper cables to the batteries of his ridiculous high. He didn't think he'd ever come down.

He couldn't remember the last time he'd felt this good. Scratch that; he could. Exactly twice. When Meredith had told him she was pregnant. And when she'd said yes.

She touched his face with her palm. He leaned into it, breathing. His eyes watered. The world blurred. His chest filled up with feelings that were too big to contain, too big to put any sort of label on, and a lump the size of a golfball formed in his throat.

"Jesus, Mere," he said. "I can't... I'm..."

The void had filled.
He felt... whole.

"I know," she said. She blinked, eyes wet like his. "I'm so glad for you." Every syllable that fell from her lips was a thick, weighted thing.

There was just so much, and he felt so... He leaned back, looking up at the ceiling, unable to contain the lit bottle rocket in his chest, and he laughed. "Meredith Grey," he proclaimed, "I love you." The words boomed up and down the long hallway. And then he laughed again. God, he felt drunk. Or high. Or drunk and high. Or both. Except this wasn't some artificial chemical telling him to be happy or to not think. This was an unadulterated dopamine shower, like a cloudburst, and he was stuck in the pouring rain without an umbrella.

Jesus Christ.

Meredith snorted with amusement, but she didn't respond in kind. She clutched his shirt and pulled, and he followed willingly. She could take him anywhere. She could drag him off a plank with her, and he'd happily drown in her arms.

"Where are we going?" he said as they passed through the harshly lit hallway.

She didn't answer right away.

Murmuring. He could hear— He glanced up and wiped his leaking eyes to peer out of their private bubble. Into the hallway. They'd started to draw an audience. Some of the nurses at the closest station weren't even being surreptitious about their spying. One of them even had her hands on a keyboard but wasn't typing, while she stared at a monitor that wasn't on, and cradled between her cheek and her shoulder a phone she wasn't speaking into.

After a long march, Meredith managed to find them a somewhat private alcove. A dead end after a corner where the hallway met a window and a locked, facing pair of offices, doors closed and silent. She pulled him to the window. Sunlight streamed in through the windowpanes at a slant. She backed into a radiator and semi-sat on it, and then she looked up at him, rapt. The light turned her hair into spun gold.

"Tell me everything," she said. "All I heard was that you'd scrubbed into a cholecystectomy with Dr. Bailey."

And so he did. Everything. He told her about how nervous he'd been, and how Mark had pushed him, and how Miranda had pushed him, and how he'd gone in with the express goal just to watch and assist, but he'd ended up performing the whole fucking procedure by himself.

"How did that get spread around so fast, anyway?" Derek said. "I swear, from the audience, you'd think I was Bono performing live in OR 8 or something."

"You're the rockstar," she said. "You tell me."

"No, seriously," he said. "I had a crowd too big for the gallery in less than forty minutes."

"One blabbermouth," she said with a snort. "Name rhymes with Spark. May or may not have gushed to me while we were standing right next to Nurse Debbie."

He laughed. "All the guile of a watermelon. Called it."

"Huh?"
He shook his head. "Nothing. Just something I was thinking about Mark earlier."

She shrugged. "Anyway, I figured you wouldn't want me watching, so I mostly just stood out here while I bit my nails to the quick. Oh, and I paced."

He laughed, and he pressed against her. Nuzzled her. "You could have watched. I wouldn't have minded."

"You say that in hindsight, but..." She shrugged, and a frown flitted across her face. "I just didn't want you to feel any extra pressure." She showed him her ragged nails. "And this horrible disaster," she said, "is all your fault."

He took her hand in his and kissed each of her fingers in slow succession. "I'm very sorry," he said, the words solemn, and then he grinned. "You know, I can think of several ways to make this up to you."

She peered back at him, eyebrows arched in condemnation belied by the sparkle in her eyes. "The way I see it, you owe me more than several," she said. "I wrecked eight fingernails."

"Eight, hmm," he said, a purr.

"Yes," she said. "I think you owe me at least eight apologies."

He snickered. "At least eight? What is this, inflation?"

"The longer you don't apologize, the more interest you accrue, clearly," she said.

"Oh, clearly," he said, nodding. "So," he continued, "are we talking all eight apologies in a row, or may I space them out?"

She raised an eyebrow. "Well, I don't know. Can you apologize that many times at once?"

"Is that a challenge, Dr. Grey?"

She stared at him through her long eyelashes, eyes lit green like emeralds by the sunshine. A loose, stray lock of hair, one that had escaped her ponytail, hung in a little wave over her forehead. She smiled a pleased, caught-the-canary smile and purred, "I think it might be, Dr. Shepherd."

"And are you... ah..." He gave her a suggestive leer and waggled his eyebrows. "In the mood for me to apologize right now?" She was hit or miss lately, depending on how she felt, how hard the baby was kicking, whether her ankles hurt, or her back ached, or any number of other physical hardships, and he didn't want to be pushy, no matter how much his body hummed at him to do something, to act on the dizzying rush flooding his system. "Or would you like to wait?"

"Oh, this is definitely a hormones-made-me-do-it day," she said, a wry expression on her face, and he laughed. She waved her hand at him dismissively. "Please, by all means, apologize."

Silence stretched the moments between them. He regarded her. She regarded him. Distantly, he could hear sounds of life. Papers shuffling. Keyboards clacking. Sneakers squeaking. But they were distant, and Meredith... she was close. The scent of her conditioner filled his headspace. She'd pressed her hand against his chest, scrunching up his shirt over his heart, and the warmth of her fingertips bled through the cotton. A healthy blush accented her cheeks and plunged down below the neckline of her scrubs. Her breasts were full and swollen. Through her open lab coat, he could see the swell of their baby, now six months along, and all of it made him stop. Stop, and simmer, and think... wow.
Just wow.

"What are you thinking?" she said, gaze searching.

For a moment, his throat constricted, and he couldn't find his voice. All he could do was clear his throat and blink and be high. High on her and life and everything in general. "I just can't figure out how the hell I got this lucky," he said. He smiled. "Not that I'm complaining or anything."

And then he could hear his pulse again. In his ears. Not a nervous drumbeat like before but a slow, relaxed thrum as he stared. Just watching her clarified his world.

Her mouth opened and closed, like she didn't know how to respond to him, hadn't been expecting such a sweeping declaration. "I'm sorry," she said, running the words together. "It's just when you say crap like that, responding, 'I love you, too,' feels completely lame, and I don't know—"

He pressed his lips against hers, silencing her, swallowing the last mumbling, bewildered syllable in a whorl of affection. "You don't have to say anything, Meredith," he said as he pulled back. What she gave to him didn't fit into words anyway. Goosebumps rose on her arm as he traced her skin with his fingertips. He smiled at her. "I know. Really, I do."

"Oh," she said.

They hovered nose to nose, breath to breath, as the moments passed.

He allowed one glance over his shoulder to the empty hallway to confirm they still had no audience, and then he turned back. He pushed closer, gesturing what he wanted with a nudge from his knee against her thigh. She parted her legs, allowing him to into her space. Her back bumped against the window. The radiator on which she perched creaked as her weight shifted. He cupped her face, brushing the loose lock of hair out of her eyes, behind her ear, and he felt whole as her knees squeezed his hips.

"Does this count as one apology?" he said, voice a low murmur, and he dipped low to kiss her again. She invited him in, and he tasted her. Her mouth hinted of mint.

When they parted, she licked her lips. "That's a little tame for an apology," she said.

"Oh?" he said. He kissed her again. And again. Her lips. Her throat. Her temple. Back to her lips again. "How about that?"

She nipped his lower lip. "I think I need some more convinc—"

He didn't let her finish. He plunged. She made a soft sort of squeak noise as he drank her down, and the sound curled down his spine and plunged into his muscles. His body stirred. Yearned. Sparks lit inside, and he felt it building – the slow, intense burn that was desire.

He desired her.

"How about now?" he said with sly wink, and he leaned in to kiss her again, again, again.

"Mmm, yes," she said.

They traded tasting and giving, and the world fuzzed at the edges, dimmed by tunnel focus. He was having a fucking good day, and he wanted to lay with her, so much that the need made him tremble. There was an on-call room around the corn— She cupped him through his pants with her other hand, and his exhalation spiraled into a deep groan, leaving him bereft of thought. "Ooh," she said, looking down at his groin. "We have spontaneous liftoff. We should so freaking use this."

"Oh, I intend to," he said, a purr against her ear. "One of the many..." He kissed her. "Many benefits..." Again. "Of a cholecystectomy."

"Funny," she said. "I don't remember reading that one in the literature."

She stroked him, her thumb sliding along the seam at his crotch. His lower body tightened, and he couldn't resist the urge, no, the need, to push into her scorching touch. Fuck. This was going to get well beyond rated-for-public-hallway if she did more things like that. Perhaps, it already had. She had him practically rutting. Perhaps, there was no perhaps.

She smiled slyly. "On-call room?" she whispered.

Perhaps, she could read minds.

"Yes," he said. "God, yes." Or he might burst. "I still need to apologize seven times, you know."

She laughed.

He helped her down from the radiator, grabbed her hand, and traipsed back through the throng of the hospital in a happy daze. He vaguely heard people here and there trying to talk to him, darting around like gnats, and he managed to murmur, "Later, okay?" to an inordinate number of people while Meredith waddled along behind him. All of it blurred in his singular focus on the burn. The visceral want. He wanted to make love to Meredith. Now. He wasn't used to wanting it so much anymore. Not lately. Not that he didn't enjoy it when it happened, but he'd gotten used to her initiating, and him catching up, eventually, given the right kind of encouragement.

He yanked open the door to the on-call room. In a stunned blink, his brain assembled the sight before him. Sweaty skin, and manicured red fingernails raking down a broad, male back. Lexie, the owner of the fingernails, caught herself mid-moan, mid-arch, and stilled, but Mark was too far gone already, and Lexie could only hold on, turning beet red while Mark spasmed in the throes of orgasm.

"Fuck, Mark!" Derek blurted, and he slammed the door closed again.

Meredith snorted. "I get the impression that was the idea. Don't you?" Then she added in a louder tone, directed at the door, "Sorry!"

A pause followed.

"No problem," Lexie said in a woeful, muffled voice through the door. "I'll just go die, now."

Derek squeezed his eyes shut, trying to eject the pornographic image out of his head, but his retinas were seared with it. Probably permanently. His face heated. They really needed to get some sort of official we're-having-sex sock to hang on the doors around here. Or maybe a scrub cap of sinning.
For four seconds, silence filled the space. He counted them as they passed.

He sighed when he reached five. "Well, if Mark was going to scar my brain today, at least he did it with Lexie," he said, resigned.

"So... supply closet, then?" Meredith said, sniggering.

He nodded, kissed her, and they walk-ran, but it turned out the supply closet wasn't meant to be, either. "Dude," Alex said without turning to see who it was when Meredith pushed open the door,
"get your own damned closet." Alex had his back to the door and a woman tangled in a knot of limbs around him. Some nurse, Derek thought, based on the color of her scrubs, but he had no idea who from the small slices of flesh and hair and arms he could see. Derek didn't want to have any idea who. Meredith shut the door without commenting, though her face turned a bright tomato shade, and she raised her hand to her mouth to cover what Derek suspected to be another snicker.

The hunt continued.

"Oh!" Meredith said as they passed a darkened, open doorway, and she veered to the right. "In here!"

He followed her and shut door the behind him. Locked it. And grinned.

A cubical-shaped exam room, perhaps eight by eight, made garish by the overhead florescent lights, greeted them. A small metal sink and a black formica countertop covered with pamphlets hugged the left side of the room, a narrow padded table in the middle, and two chairs by a computer in the other corner. Medical posters covered the walls from about waist level to well over the height of his head. There was very little room to maneuver. But he didn't need that much.

Meredith leaned her back against the small table, clutching the padding with her fists. She bit her lip, eyes twinkling as she looked at him through her long eyelashes. He closed the distance to her in a single footstep across the tiled floor, pressed close, until nothing separated their bodies, and only molecules separated their lips. He hovered, anticipating, and then with no worries about audiences, he kissed her. Drank her. He found her hemline and pulled gently on her scrub shirt. He slipped his palm underneath, resting against warm skin, and began to wander up, up, up. He touched her left breast through her bra, circling his thumb around her nipple.

She flinched.

"Hurt?" he said, eyebrows raised. "Meredith—"

"Ache," she rushed to correct herself. "They ache. They're just... they feel really full."

"Oh," he said, frowning. "I'm sorry you're hurting."

"It's okay." She smiled, albeit the smile was thin. "We get a baby out of it."

"We do," he said, a murmur. He knew no matter how awesome having a baby at the end of this might be, she'd been getting pretty fucking sick of all the uncomfortable, agonizing parts of getting there. He marked breasts off in his head as a no fly zone today, and he stepped behind her to pull her into an embrace. He wrapped his arms low under her distended belly, and he craned over her shoulder to kiss her cheek. "Can I help at all?" he said, swaying back and forth like he was dancing with her.

"You can apologize," she said. "Take my mind off things. Preferably more than once."

She leaned her head back against his shoulder, looking up at him. Her breaths were shorter, too, and that had nothing to do with arousal. He'd noticed that starting a few weeks ago. He imagined Baby pressing on her diaphragm and her bladder and everything. She was such a tiny woman. There wasn't much room in there to begin with. And she'd been having a hard time with all of this since day one.
"You're sure?" Derek said.

She pressed her palms against his. "Yes, just be gentle."

He nodded, nuzzling her. "I can be gentle," he said. He kissed her slowly, let his lips linger against her skin. "I can be very, very gentle."

"Mmm," she purred. "I know. And I want you."

The high feeling hummed in his veins. His eyelids drooped. He pulled up her shirt over the swell of their baby and gently pushed both his hands underneath the waistline of her scrubs, into her panties. Coarse, curly hair met his fingertips. He relaxed, and for a while, all he did was sway with her, his front to her back, warm palms touching a place that, of all the men in the world, only he was allowed to go. A deep, content sigh dripped from her lips, and she melted against him.

God, he was a lucky man. For all the horrendous and bad that he'd accrued in the course of living, the good he'd managed to find in the last few years far outweighed it. True love. A family of his own. A woman he would grow old with. His soulmate. A son or daughter who would remember him long after he'd died in Meredith's arms. A repaired friendship with Mark. A renowned career. All of it pinged 10s on the Richter scale of life. He couldn't ask for more.

He pressed his middle and index fingers against her core. She inhaled a sharp breath when he touched her there, and then blew the air out in a long slow exhale that ended in a moan. He stared through his eyelashes at nothing, letting the world around them blur as he focused on her with singular intensity, massaging and rubbing in slow, meandering circles as he rocked her, operating entirely on feel, and by the sound of her choppy breathing, to judge his next move. She pressed her ear against his chest, panting against his shirt. He wondered if she could hear his heartbeat.

"That feels so nice," she said, voice low, syllables stretched into infinity, and he felt himself stir in response.

Heat rushed between his legs, but he ignored the sensation for now. He would have plenty of apologies to get one in for himself. This was about her. All her.

She slid into her orgasm a bit like the seasons changed. The leaves changed color one by one from green to vivid reds and oranges and yellows, until they were surrounded by bursts of vivid hues. She shivered against him, twitching, a moan twisting in her throat that made his lower body tense and tighten. And then her spasms waned, and she went silent. She sighed.

He pulled one hand free to stroke her face. She leaned against the touch.

"That's two," he said, a murmur against her ear.

"I get six more like that?" she said, sounding almost drunk.

He snorted. "Meredith, you can have as many as you want, whenever you want."

She didn't respond to that, just rested in his arms.

"This isn't a special occasion, you know," he said. "I love you, always."

She turned, then, to look up at him. "All the time," she said, "saying things." Her eyes watered. She wiped her face.

He winked. "That's me. I'm a chatty guy."
"I love you, too," she said softly. "I'm sorry I'm not a poet."

He kissed her. "I don't want a poet. I want you."

A knock at the door nearly jolted them out of their skins, and they jerked apart. "Hello?" someone called, a tenor male voice that sounded quite disgruntled. Another knock rattled the door. "Hello, who's in here? This shouldn't be occupied."

Derek's heart thudded in his ears, but subsided in moments. He took a cleansing breath and stepped to the door. He pulled it open to find Nurse Tyler staring at him, a dark contrast against the bright, sterile hallway. The man gaped. "Chief Shepherd." Tyler's gaze shifted to a nondescript point on the floor. "I'm sorry to... um. Sorry."

Derek filled the doorway, covering Meredith from view. Though she was clothed, she was flushed, and a bit teary, and he wanted to give her some privacy to collect herself. "Is there a problem?" he said, refusing to engage in any chat about what Tyler already knew he'd interrupted.

"I'm really sorry, sir," Nurse Tyler said. "This room is supposed to be available for an appointment in ten minutes."

"We'll be out in just a minute," Derek said, his face heating from ear to ear. He'd probably turned some wacky shade of scarlet. "We didn't know."

"It's... not a problem."

Derek leaned close to the man, mindful of the staff shuffling back and forth in the hallway beyond Tyler's back. "We didn't do anything on the table," Derek whispered right against Tyler's ear. "You don't need to sterilize it." Of all the embarrassing things to have to disclose...

"Oh," Nurse Tyler said. He cleared his throat. "Okay, well. I'll... leave... you." He didn't look like he could scramble away fast enough. His shoes squeaked as he dashed down the hallway.

Meredith waddled up behind Derek. "So," she said. "We should re-check the closets, now."

Derek snorted. "You actually want to keep going?"

She gestured at herself. "Did I mention I'm having a hormone-infused hump day? And, seriously, you could make money as a very dirty masseuse."

He couldn't help it. He burst out laughing.

"Well, you want to keep going, right?" she said, folding her arms. "I mean you haven't even gotten any, yet."

No, he definitely had not. And his groin, semi-erect just from watching his effect on Meredith, was in the agonizing process of complaining about its neglect. In vivid detail, the picture of what Meredith looked like naked, arched back on their marital bed, sweaty, coming for him, hair in wild disarray, pasted itself behind his eyelids.

Well, fuck.

"I could keep going," he said, though the words arrived strained. "For you."

Meredith stared at him for a moment. "Right," she said, the edges of her lips twitching with an expression that yearned to be a smile. "All for me."
He nodded. "Yes. Mostly."

She didn't dignify that with a response, but her eyes twinkled with sedate amusement.

They resumed their search for a room. They tried several closets. Occupied – sex. Occupied – mopping. Another on-call room. Occupied — sleep. His blooming arousal had been all but murdered and left in a bloody heap, skewered by a knife of frustration by the time they checked the conference room they'd christened the year before. Occupied – conference. Another on-call room. Occupied – sex. They were running out of places to look. And Derek thought they might perhaps be working in a brothel, not a hospital. Not that he had much room to complain, considering why he and Meredith were scurrying around, looking for a damned room.

"Seriously?" Meredith grumbled as they trudged, defeated, away from the last closet. Occupied – inventory. "I want the rest of my freakin' apologies."

They approached the elevator.

Derek sighed. "Believe me. I want to apologize." He pushed the up button and then pressed her against the wall beside the elevator and kissed her. She gripped his hips, scrunching his pants in a tight grip, which only served to make things rub in front, and that was... that was... exquisite. And awful. A moan constricted in his throat, but he tamped it to silence. Barely. He ached with frustration as he nuzzled her neck. "I think might legitimately burst if I don't," he murmured against her skin.

Her breath hitched when he ran his nose along the pulse of her throat, inhaling lavender. He felt her tremble. He wanted to devour her. The only thing stopping him was the waiting area at his back. Two people sat in chairs behind them, shifting and twitching with nerves. Waiting. Waiting for news about loved ones.

"We haven't tried your office," Meredith said.

He thought for a moment. A caution flag waved. His office. Windows. But his protests died before he could piece a coherent thought together. Her hand was a brand at his hip, and he was drunk. Drunk on her and her lavender and their baby and his surgery and everything, and if she was suggesting his office, surely she had some remedy in mind. For the windows. And he ached. He'd just kicked ass. He'd cut. And he'd succeeded. And he needed to revel in that with her without deferring his own needs. Just for a few minutes. Needed.

"Whatever," he said as the elevator dinged, and the doors slid open. "Anywhere."

They stepped into the elevator. The doors closed. The car began to rise. In moments, Meredith's expression lit up like he'd given her another kidney in a jar. A thousand kidneys in jars. She hit the stop button. The car lurched and halted.

"What?" he said, frowning.

"How about here? We could totally do it here." A suggestive smile spread across her face. She rose to her tiptoes and kissed him. "What about our rain check?"

He blinked as things went all screeching brakes in his head. Sex. In the elevator. Sex in the elevator?

"Dirty sex in the elevator," she said with a nod as if she'd read his mind. "It was on our bucket list, remember?"
"I'm not in a wheelchair after heart surgery," he said with a wink. "It's not that dirty."

She grinned. "I'm six months pregnant, and we're still in an elevator. It's pretty freaking dirty, Derek."

He laughed. If he'd been in any other state of mind but horny and desperate, he might have let reason talk him out of even trying to do this. He couldn't do quickies. Physically couldn't. Not anymore. But he wasn't in any other state of mind but horny and desperate, and she was looking at him with lusty gray eyes that stripped him bare and made him want to do things. Dirty, base things.

"I want you, now, here," she said, and he couldn't say no.

He pushed her against the elevator wall, which her back hit with a soft thud. A poster crinkled in the quiet as her shoulder dueled with the frayed edges. "Okay," he said.

He tore his fingers through her hair until his ring finger got caught on her ponytail holder. She moaned, leaning into his touch while she fumbled with his belt. He heard his zipper sliding open. She pulled at his boxers. And then she had her warm hands against skin. His skin. A shiver ran through his body from head to the tips of his toes, making him twitch. An incoherent, throaty noise escaped his lips.

"I love you," she said in a velvet tone that curled down his spine and made him feel as though he were condensing. His breaths tightened like screws in his chest, his muscles coiled like springs, and his body sang with unspent energy.

"You know I love you, too," he replied.

"Yes," she said. "I do."

She held him in her hands and wrought fire. What had flagged during their search for a room renewed. Taking charge for a moment, she pushed him against the opposite wall, where his back impacted with cold metal. His eyelids dipped, his jaw slackened, he loosed a low, vibrating hum of pleasure, and he let his head thunk against the wall while she stroked him. She held him in her palm and did all his favorite things. His thighs shivered, threatening to give out.

"Fuck, Mere," he said.

She licked her lips. "That's the idea, isn't it?"

Never fear. That's why your fluffer is here.

He laughed, pushing into her hand. When she let him go to embrace him instead, he was hard, and ready, and panting, and there were funny sparks shooting behind his eyelids. Go, go, go, his body demanded, every nerve ending, every muscle. He pulled at her scrub pants, yanked at her panties, sliding both of them down to mid-thigh in two harsh jerks. They traded places, a duel of tangled limbs.

"Turn around," he commanded, the words gruff, and she did. The pale curve of her ass greeted him, and it made him hungry. Ravenous. He stepped forward, pressing his erection against her spine, and she whined for him. But that was when he was brought up short. He frowned, trying to think past the go, go, go, go, in his head. Just for a min—

"Why'd you stop?" she said, almost a whine.

"Um," he said. He rubbed against her, and he couldn't think for a moment. Couldn't think beyond
"What's that?"

"You're short," he said.

She looked over her shoulder at him. "Kick your boots off or something."

"You're very short," he amended. "That won't fix it."

"You kick them off, and I'll stand on them."

He frowned. His boots did have a heel. Not a huge one, but... Yeah, that might work, he decided, for all that he could deal with complex math at the moment. He kicked off his shoes. She stepped on top of them, crumpling the leather ankles under the soles of her sneakers. He lost an inch; she gained a bit more than one. The height difference shrunk. Enough for him to have something to work with. He grinned.

"My wife the problem solver," he said.

"Lots of practioooh—" Her voice broke off in a moan when he reached around her and pressed his fingers against the slick, hot v where her thighs met her torso. He searched the soft, wiry hair until he found the right spot, indicated only by a hitch in her breath and his years of worshiping her body. With his other hand, he guided himself to her. She twitched when he pressed against her.

"Good?" he said, barely holding himself still.

She braced herself, palms flat against the wall, nodding. "I'm ready," she said, and she was. She was hot and wet with barely any help from him. Anticipation was a lovely tool in the absence of hands.

With a grunt, he let go, and he sheathed himself with her core. She gasped as he entered with a sort of desperation that didn't allow for gentle, and the gasp turned into a long, winding moan that rolled down his spine as he pushed forward to the hilt. Her fingers flexed, and her palms squeaked along the wall as she lost about an inch of purchase. He saw her grimace, reflected in a smear of color on the metal elevator wall. Her insides tightened around him like a lock accepting a key as she adjusted to him. Accepted him. For a moment, everything went white snow behind his eyelids, and a breathless sound tumbled from his lips. She squeezed him again with her pelvic floor, and the white snow became a cloudburst. Sparks. Fireworks.

He'd found home.

"Jesus," he said. "You feel good."

He shifted. Her eyes were shut, and she'd bit her lip. She only loosed a quiet, shivery moan in response. He toiled at her cleft with his fingers. When he withdrew and pushed in again, slowly, so she could feel every millimeter of him, she moaned again, and then he let himself find a rhythm, pumping, pushing her groin into his right hand with every thrust, but not too hard. Like the gentle rocking of a boat. He didn't want to jar her. He chased up her left arm with his left hand, until his palm came to rest over hers. He clutched her hand, hard enough that his knuckles turned white, and then he tipped his head back, eyes closed, and just... let himself feel.

Feel all of it.
Feel her slick, inviting heat sliding along his length. He smelled her skin. Her hair. He heard her hitching gasps, each with a little moan piggybacking on the end. Each bluster of vocalization told him right, right, right, you're doing it so right, and he lost himself in that. In her. Responding to all her unspoken yet very much broadcasted direction. This was what he needed.

"Harder," she urged him after a moment, apparently done with wanting gentle, and so he obliged, spearing her with everything that he had, until her directives became a litany of, "Yes, yes, yes."

In a matter of minutes, her body seized into stillness. Her breathing stopped. A moan became a long, pained whine as her lungs constricted. Her fingers curled and squeaked down the metal walls. And then she burst into contractions that would have pushed him off the cliff and wrung him dry on any normal day before the shooting. Before the Paxil. Color burst around him, and everything inside tightened with want, need, need, must. But he didn't go over that imaginary, blissful line of completion. Didn't cross the point of no return. He pushed a deep sound out his chest on a rushed exhalation, one of frustration. His teeth clenched. Meredith's orgasmic throes subsided, and she sagged bonelessly against the wall. He embraced her, holding her up until she had her legs back under her control.

He managed a lazy smile despite the incompleteness carving out his soul. The ache. "That's three," he said, a low rumble against her ear while she panted. He kissed her, and he pulled out, still engorged. Still rock solid. Still unfinished.

She laughed. "I'll let that one count double," she said, breathless. Happy. "Definitely. Mmm." She nodded. Let lose another delighted giggle. Her sheer pleasure warmed him, and his smile broadened. He was good. No. He was a fucking rockstar today. At everything. Maybe, he couldn't do quickies for himself anymore, but he could definitely give them to her, and if she loved it that much, the frustration was worth it. Her gray eyes glittered, bright with affection, and they gazed at each other for a long moment. He kissed her temple.

Her smile dimmed, though, when she glanced down. "You didn't finish."

"You know I can't," he said, dimming right along with her, now that the moment had been marred. "Not that fast."

She frowned. "You don't normally get it up that fast anymore, either. I was hoping..." She shrugged, expression helpless. "Another benefit of cholecystectomy. Or something."

He sighed. "Yeah, I know."

He wasn't unhappy by any means. He loved her, and anything with her felt amazing. Anything. And he was a fucking rockstar. But he felt dissonant. Jarred. The incompleteness made him hollow and needing, and it was hard for him to think beyond the fact that he lacked something. He liked it when they did this at home with no prospect for interruption. Where he could take his time, and he didn't feel rushed, and he didn't have to pull a hold-that-thought in the middle. Still, he managed to locate the smile he'd lost, and he grinned at her.

"Don't worry," he assured her with a wink. "My office is still waiting, after all. And I do still owe you five apologies."

She relaxed into a smile as she pulled up her scrubs. "Four. That one counted twice."

He laughed. "Four, then. Right."

Wrestling himself back into his boxers and zipping up his pants was a kind of exquisite torture that made him want to rip them all back off and take her again until he exploded. Forget that tying up an elevator for what would probably be forty-five minutes was such a bad idea in a hospital. He sighed. The tent in his pants was pretty obvious no matter how he arranged himself, and every time he touched his erection, he only reemphasized to himself that he wasn't done, and he craved touch. Her touch. He ended up trapping himself in the waist of his pants, a heavy, thick line along his belly, pointing at his bellybutton. He tightened his belt with an unhappy grimace.

Meredith bit her lip as she watched him. "I don't think I could do that," she said.

"What?"

She shrugged. "Live with a really porny mood ring." She snickered. "A mood bone."

He snorted. "It has a mind of its own, you know. It's not really indicative of what I'm thinking."

He bent over to slide his boots on. His pants pinched around him. He resisted the urge to squirm. God, this felt awful. Just fucking awful.

She stepped closer as he straightened. Her palm slid along his back in a move she probably intended to be comforting. And it was. Just a little too much. What little enthusiasm his mood bone had lost rushed right back. He groaned, unable to stop himself from leaning into her.

"What are you thinking?" she said.

"I'm thinking I want to fuck you senseless," he said, almost a growl.

She snickered. "I'd say it's a pretty accurate bone right now, then."

"Very," he said. "Can you just..." He gestured at himself. His aroused state was pretty well hidden, pinched by his waistband as it was. "I don't know. Stand in front of it?" She'd only be an added layer of concealment. Still, he didn't want to take chances. Nothing sabotaged respect with subordinate employees like an unwanted salute.

A laugh that was a snort caught in her nose, and she flushed. "I think I can manage that. Do I look okay?"

"Beautiful," he said, gaze softening. "Always."

"I don't have sex hair?" she said.

He frowned. Disordered blond wisps stuck out from her head here and there. "It's... a little disheveled."

She winced and yanked out her ponytail holder. She combed her hair back into submission and tried again, eyebrows upturned in askance as she looked at him. He gave her a thumbs up. She stood up on her tiptoes and brushed her fingers through his own hair, straightening out whatever disarray she'd caused in their elevator tangle. Her closeness, her heat, her fingers on his scalp all sent another rush of blood to his groin, and he let out a long, slow, frustrated breath. He had a feeling his body just wasn't going to give up until it got what it wanted.

"Oops," Meredith said, offering him an apologetic grin. "Sorry."

"I think we should take an apology off my tab for pain and suffering," he said, grumbling as he shifted from foot to foot, trying to get comfortable, though it was a lost cause.
She gave him a sympathetic look. "Deal," she said.

With one last look to appraise him, she released the stop button, and the elevator started moving again. Two floors to go. A short walk. He could do this. Except as testament to how badly the universe wanted to fuck with him today, the elevator stopped on the second floor. He groaned and let his head thunk against the wall as he closed his eyes. Meredith shifted so she stood in front of him. He put his hand on her shoulder and squeezed it in thanks.

Richard stepped into the elevator car, humming, oblivious, though he frowned when he absorbed the sight before him. "Derek, are you okay?" he said. "You look sick."

Derek pinched the bridge of his nose and looked up again, forcing himself to smile and nod and be friendly. "Oh, fine," he said as the elevator doors slid shut. "Just have a headache." Which wasn't a lie, really, though he didn't mean the head attached to his neck.

"Are you sure?" Richard said. "You're really flushed."

Meredith snorted with laughter and then coughed. "Sorry," she said. She cleared her throat and went silent, staring at an interesting crease in the floor tiles.

Richard's gaze shifted back and forth from Derek to Meredith and back to Derek. "Right," he said, tone suspicious. "Well. Don't forget our meeting today."

"Right, the PR guy." Derek nodded. "I'll be there."

"Good," Richard said, "see you then."

The elevator dinged, and the doors trundled open. Richard didn't budge. Meredith said, "Oh, that's our stop!" a little bit too cheerfully. "Gotta go!" She grabbed Derek's hand and dragged him from the elevator, not that it was dragging, much. They made a mad dash, raced around the corner, across the catwalk, right past Derek's secretary, and so help him, he slammed the door in the poor woman's face.

"Sorry," Derek called behind him. "My wife's not feeling well. Please, hold all my calls."

"Sure..." said Patricia, the word muffled through the door. She sounded more than a little confused. "I hope she feels better."

Meredith snickered. "Shame on you, using me as an excuse," she whispered.

"You're pregnant," he whispered back. "Fifty percent of the reason you make such a good excuse is because of me!"

"Shut up," she responded, and he snorted, but forced himself not to laugh.

The office was dark and quiet and the carpet muted the bustle of the hospital outside the door. They huddled in the corner of the office behind the door, the only place that couldn't be seen from the promenade and catwalk. The secretary had a desk right outside the door. They had very little space to maneuver that wasn't in plain sight, unless Meredith intended for them to get down on the floor, but... he looked down. That was a pretty hard surface, not very comfortable for sex, and she would have trouble both lowering herself down and getting back up again. Either way, he glanced at the door, which was no doubt not soundproof, and worse, he wasn't sure how not soundproof.

Meredith fumbled with his belt buckle and slipped her hands into his boxers, where his confined erection still waited, ready and willing, no matter how ludicrous the setting, to oblige her in any and all apologies she desired. She looked up at him, gray eyes hooded, expression almost... lazy. And then she slipped her free hand over his mouth. Her skin was hot against his lips. "Meredith..." he said, but the word was muffled by her palm.

"Shh," she said.

"What are you—?"

"Shh," she repeated, a loud, sharp hiss, and he felt compelled to obey. His pants rustled as her arm moved. She pressed her palm against the inside of his thigh, and then she slid her finger up behind his—

He jerked when she hit the spot and a zing of pure sensation rushed through him. And then she stroked him. All along his perineum. He turned to Jell-O, and he moaned, all thought stolen from him. Her palm pressed harder against his mouth. The webbing between her thumb and index finger pushed between his lips, slightly parting his teeth, an iron line of flesh constricting his ability to speak to grunts and groans.

"You have to be quiet," she told him. She licked her lips and backed him into the wall. There was nowhere to go. None. She dominated the space, and he had no option except to obey, unless he wanted to stop playing her game. Once she saw he wasn't going anywhere, she pulled down his boxers. First just a little, until there was a line of coarse, dark hair peeking over the waistband, and then all the way. Cool air hit his skin.

She stroked him underneath like a harp. He arched back against the wall, pressing into her touch, and the world went fuzzy and sharp and colorful and dim all at once. He panted, breaths blustering from his nostrils against her index finger.

"Do you like this?" she whispered. She cupped his weight in her palm and did his favorite thing. He felt a slight tugging sensation. He nodded, closing his eyes. And then she added more softly, "You're sure this is okay?" Though she was smaller, and the idea of her legitimately restraining him unaided was laughable, a few months ago, being constricted like this would have been claustrophobic and terrifying. Having his choices taken away would have been worse, blinding to the point of sheer panic. But he could relax, now. He could enjoy the ride. He could enjoy her and everything she offered. He nodded again. His jaw lolled, and her hand slipped deeper between his lips. "Okay," she said, satisfied.

Her gaze wandered to his coat rack, which rested a few feet away, on the opposite side of the door. Mark had left the tie he'd liberated earlier in the morning dangling from one of the rungs. She took her hand from his lips. He had a chance to say, "How is this me apologizing?" But then she grabbed the tie and gagged him. She winked.

"Oh, it's not," she said. "You still owe me three." She wrapped one hand around his length and cupped him with the other. "But that can be later."

He watched her hungrily, anticipation carving a hole out of him. He bucked against her hand when she settled into a rhythm, pumping him. A low, throaty groan stuck in his esophagus like taffy. He couldn't stop it, but it was a deep, quiet rumble that he doubted anyone could hear beyond the intimate space filled by him and by her, in the quiet, in the dark. Saliva collected on the tie. He swallowed and tipped his head back as he felt his body start to wind with tension and with want.

He wanted to rip off the gag, kick himself off the wall, and fuck her on his desk. The image was running through his head on repeat, and between that and her ministrations, his hands shook, and he was so wound up he could barely breathe. She stroked him mid-perineum to base to tip, and he bit the tie. Hard. But a groan still escaped.

When she shrugged herself out of her lab coat, threw the coat at his feet for padding, and eased herself awkwardly to her knees in front of him, he blinked, looking down at her. "Um," she said, frowning as she settled at his feet. She briefly rested a hand against her belly. "I might need some help getting up after this."

Something in his expression must have spoke for him, because she shook her head vehemently. "Oh, no. I'm going to get you off, even if I have to throw my back out to do it. Fair's fair."

He reached for the gag.

"Oh, relax, Superman," Meredith said. "I'm kidding. I'm not going to throw my back out. I'm not a damsel in distress. I'm not that fragile." She frowned. "I will need help getting up, though."

He snorted, nodding at her, and dropped his hands.

She put her hands on his hips. And then she took him into her mouth. He grabbed at her shoulders, blindly, flailing. And he nearly died on the spot. If it weren't for the tie, he would have shouted. As it was, he offered a muffled, strangled grunt into the quiet.

He lost track of time after that, until he was plastered with sweat, so tense with almost, almost, stubborn fucking almost, he thought he might come apart at the seams. His throat felt like it'd been stripped with a rake, and his jaw was sore from clenching. All the low-pitched, guttural sounds of need, muted by the gag, had probably stolen his voice. He was frustrated, and exhausted, and unfinished, with a hole carved out of his soul, and yet so blissed out he couldn't fucking see straight. He thought this might be one of those torturous days where he couldn't. He just couldn't get off no matter how long he tap danced in ecstasy on the fucking cliff. The Paxil did that, sometimes, and he loathed it every time he had the misfortune of experiencing it. He wondered how long Meredith would persist in trying before she, too, got frustrated. He was approaching the fine line where pleasure became agony. She kept building him up and up and up, until he thought there couldn't possibly be more up.

"Please," he begged hoarsely into the gag. "Please, just..." He couldn't speak. He couldn't find words. He had nothing left that represented thoughts. He shook himself out of it long enough to worry he was leaving bruises, and he relaxed his grip on her shoulders. But then it all slid away from him again. Language. Ideas. Sentience. "Please," he repeated, because it was the only word he had left in his vocabulary.

And then he hit it. Like a tripwire. He froze as his body wound itself up, and he hovered there on the edge, stuck, past the line in the sand that defined no return, but not falling, yet, and the seconds seemed to stretch into infinity. His heart pounded. He clutched her shoulders. His eyes lost focus. He couldn't breathe. He hovered, a prisoner in the void, stuck in that moment. Forever. And then he burst so hard he saw stars, and he thought his heart might burst right along with him. She drank him down. Everything around him became a mute and fuzzy, and he floated in languid revelation. For a long time. Just floated. Spent. Done.

Time resumed. He became vaguely aware of his back sliding down the wall. Meredith was a warm, soft bastion beside him, and he tilted in her direction. He still couldn't catch his breath. She fumbled with the tie, peeling it from his face, though it took him a moment to think sentiently enough to unclench his jaw and release it, even with her tugging on it. Even back in the grips of reality, he still floated.

"Holy fuck," he croaked when he found his words. A smile twitched at his lips. His voice sounded a bit like somebody had sent it through a cheese grater or something, all shredded and in pieces. He swallowed, and he looked at her. His limbs felt like rubber. He didn't think he'd move for a while.

"I think we ruined your tie," Meredith said. She held it up for him. It was covered in teethmarks and spit.

He couldn't care. He didn't speak. He floated, and the room seemed far away.

Meredith frowned at him. "I really hope that meeting isn't anytime soon."

He laughed a bit like he was stoned, all bubbly and way too loud. He was floating and buzzed and it didn't feel like he had a body anymore. "Raincheck on the other apologies?" he murmured drunkenly. "I think you broke me."

She snickered as she pulled her fingers through his sweaty hair. "Okay," she said. She curled up next to him, and he wrapped her in his shaky arms as he closed his eyes. He wasn't sure what time it was. He didn't have the energy to check his watch. He'd worry about the meeting in a minute. For now, he rested, and he smiled, and he floated.

When he came out of the bathroom, straightening his tie, he was greeted by Meredith's back. She'd curled up on her side on the bed. She faced away from him, toward the window, wearing nothing but black panties and a bra. The black dress she'd intended to wear lay spread across the coverlet. She hadn't bothered to move it. A bottle of nail polish, which hadn't been there before, rested by her alarm clock and her brush. Her lamp was still on. For all intents and purposes, it looked to him like she'd put her head on the pillow, closed her eyes for a moment, and the brief respite had ended up turning into an accidental nap.

"Meredith?" he whispered, not wanting to startle her. "We need to leave soon."

For a long moment, she didn't move. Then she shrugged and pulled the blankets tighter. Her dress fell to the floor in a crumpled heap. "Can you go to this thing without me?" she said.

He frowned. She sounded wrong. More than just tired. They were supposed to meet Owen, Cristina, Mr. Jennings, and his new wife for dinner to discuss Owen's thoughts on trauma medicine training for the medical staff. That was when he heard a sniffle, and he froze. "Meredith, are you crying?"

"No," she said. The word was plaintive and tiny, and it broke his heart.

Yes. Yes, she was. He walked to her side of the bed and sat down by her hip. The mattress dipped as his weight sank into it. On this side, he could see her face, and it was a wasteland. Tear tracks glistened on her face. Her eyes were puffy and red.

He put his hand on her shoulder, squeezed, and then ran his palm down her side, stroking her warm skin. She'd been fine five minutes ago when he'd stepped into the bathroom to straighten his tie. Or, well, she'd seemed fine. Maybe, a bit more dour than usual, though he hadn't asked about it, yet. But her emotions were a constant whiplash, lately, and even on his best days, he had a hard time keeping up with her, which was frustrating, because it made him feel like damage control, rather than damage prevention. He'd much rather prevent her from being upset in the first place.

She sniffled again, and the dissonant sound made him wince. "What's wrong?" he said, a murmur.

"My toenails."

He blinked. "What?"
She struggled to sit up, and he reached to help stabilize her. "I'm fat, Derek!" she snapped, shrugging his hands away like his fingers were hot brands. And then she started wailing. "I tried to buy new shoes and it was so embarrassing and now I can't even paint my toenails and I don't want to go and I'm pissed."

"Shoes?" he said helplessly. "What? Wait, you're mad?"

"I can't buckle the straps!"

And then he had an armful of Meredith. She collapsed against him, crying, sniveling, her fingers scrunching up the dark wool of his suit jacket. His jaw clenched, and his chest ached. Watching her be upset made him hurt. He rubbed her back. "Shh," he said, lost. "Shh." He couldn't take her pregnancy away. He couldn't do it for her. The only thing he could do was be there. And, sometimes, that killed him.

"You don't have to come, Mere. Not if you don't want to," he said when she'd calmed down a little. "And you're not fat. You're—"

"If you say I'm beautiful right now, I will gut you with my ten blade."

He clamped his mouth shut. Definitely mad, then. And he knew conversational quicksand when he heard it.

She sniffled. "I wrecked your suit."

"I don't care about my suit," Derek said. "I care that you're upset." He glanced at the nightstand. Nail polish had been the culprit. He thought. Or something about shoes and straps. Or both. If he'd understood... the problem. Nonsensical though it was. He glanced at the floor. He didn't see any shoes except her sneakers. So, he grabbed the shiny bottle, which had been emblazoned with some fancy name that, as far as he could tell, meant: red. "Can I help?"

She looked up at him, and then at the bottle in his hands, and then back at him. Her eyebrows knitted. "You want to paint my toenails?"

"I want you to be happy."

"You," she said. "Derek C. Shepherd. Are offering to paint toenails."

He shrugged. "Is it harder than brain surgery?"

"Depends if you're pregnant," she said, irritation leaking into her tone.

He chose not to engage. He scooted to the side, pushing the coverlet out of the way, and pulled her right foot into his lap. She leaned back on her hands. He stroked her skin. Under the arch of her foot, pressing to avoid tickling. Her toes curled, and she sighed, slumping as she relaxed. He bent over and kissed the ball of her ankle. "Do I just paint, or...?"

"There's some stuff in the drawer," she said.

He frowned and leaned over to pull open the drawer and look. Next to a box of tampons, the harlequin-fueled bodice ripper she was currently reading, and a little bullet-shaped black vibrator she liked to use when he wasn't around (and sometimes when he was), he recognized the nail file and the clippers. The other tools, though, were a mystery. He felt like a first year intern again, tossed into the wilds of an appendectomy.
"You need to buff the nails, first," she explained, and he followed her careful direction through the mystifying stages of painting a toenail, from buffing, to clipping, to filing, to actual painting.

He painted her big toe with gentle red brush strokes, careful to avoid getting any on her skin. "Is this okay?" he said. It looked okay to him. But he didn't have the best eye for this stuff. Or any eye for this stuff.

She leaned forward, though from her toothy, snarling grimace, her stomach prevented her from giving his masterpiece the kind of inspection she wanted to give it. She bit her lip. It started to quiver. "I feel like I'm trying to identify people from an airplane," she snapped, frustrated. Tears leaked. She wiped her face. "And I hate that being mad makes me cry."

"It's okay to cry," he said. "I get it, Meredith. I do."

She wiped her face with her hands and then folded her arms. "Because you and your stupid PTSD tears are in any way similar to me growing a freaking person."

Well, yes. Though she did have the monopoly on growing another person, he thought he understood unwanted, embarrassing emotional swings, perhaps better than she did. But he didn't respond to that. She seemed determined to be pissed off.

He was on a ledge. A precarious one. He wracked his brain.

"Hold that thought," he said, and he set her foot down.

"What thought?" he said, and she glowered.

He stood up and dashed to his nightstand to grab his phone. Meredith watched him the entire way. The skin on her forehead was crinkled, and her nose had the cutest little scrunch. His lip twitched before he could stop it.

"Don't," she growled as he approached and sat down again, "smile. At me."

"I'm sorry," he rushed to say. "I'm sorry. You're just..." He wanted to say cute. She was cute when she was mad. He didn't want to get murdered, though. He sighed. There was no winning here. None. "I love you."

She folded her arms over her stomach and rolled her eyes. "Whatever."

He opened up the camera app on his phone and zoomed in on her toenail to snap a photo. He handed her the phone. She looked at the picture. "How's that?" he said.

For the first time since this started, he saw a break in the clouds on her face. "That looks... really good," she said, eyes widening as surprise blossomed in her expression. "Really... goo— where'd you learn to do that?"

He blinked at the abrupt conversation shift. And then he shrugged. "I guess I'm a natural?" he said. He couldn't stop the grin that time, but she didn't seem to mind. Didn't comment.

"Would you do the rest?" she said in a softer tone, and he felt his tension leaking out of him. He was making headway. Good. "Please?" she added, and he couldn't help but look at her for a long, stretching moment. She had such a pretty face. Such pretty gray eyes. He resisted the urge to put a palm to her cheek, lean forward, and kiss her. To kiss every freckle. Because that would definitely get him killed at the moment. "What?" she snapped when his gaze lingered.

He sighed. "I really do think you're beautiful," he said. "I'm not just saying it because you're upset. You take my breath away all the time. I hope you know that."

She blinked. Tears pulsed. "Oh," she said. She gave him an apologetic look, but she didn't say anything else. She brushed the tears from her face and looked out the window, though it was dark outside. There wasn't much for her to look at.

He pulled her foot back into his lap and continued his work. He'd had no idea nail-painting was such an involved process when he'd offered, but wasn't about to back out, now. Not after he'd finally gotten her to calm down. He soldiered through, and he gave her an even coat of her supercalifragilistic-whatever-the-hell-it-was-called red. Painting nails was sort of like coloring books for grownups, he supposed. Staying inside the lines wasn't too hard.

By the time the polish dried, she seemed almost put back together. She wasn't sniffling anymore, and the tear tracks had evaporated in time with the polish drying. She looked up at him and said, "Fine. You win. I'll go."

"Mere," he said. "If you want to stay home, it's really okay. I'll manage. I wasn't trying to win anything."

"Then why'd you paint my nails?"

He sighed. "I just wanted you to feel better. If pretty nails does it, I'll paint your nails."

"Oh," she said.

He pressed his hand against her belly and rubbed her navel to thorax. "You're carrying our baby. I know this is rough on you, and I want to help," he said. He shrugged. "You just have to ask. Nail painting is not a service I intuitively offer."

Her lip twitched. Almost a smile. She kicked her legs over the side of the bed. He reached to help her stand. Her grip tensed, and she squeezed his hand to the point of pain as she used him for balance to lean forward and look down at her newly painted nails. He winced, but he didn't say a word. She scrunched her toes. Her smile widened when she looked back up at him and let go. He flexed his fingers to get circulation back.

"You should," Meredith said. "You're good at it."

He snorted. "Just so we're clear," he said, "if Cristina ever asks me for a pedicure, you and I will have words."

Meredith pantomimed a zipper closing over her lips. Her eyes twinkled.

He brushed off his slacks. They seemed fine. As did his shirt. He would have to change his jacket, though, because she'd gotten some spit and some tears on it, and he didn't think either would dry in time for appetizers. He changed out the charcoal-colored jacket with a quick trip to the closet. When he turned around, pulling the jacket over his shoulders, she stood in front of him, dressed. Ready to go. Black dress on. Black clutch in hand.

"You're sure?" he said.

She nodded, sneaking past him to grab her shoes. She passed over several different ones with straps and went for some open-toed pumps with low heels. He helped her balance as she stepped "Okay," he said. He grabbed her hand and walked down the stairs with her. They pulled their coats from the hallway closet on the way out.

"Have fun!" Lexie called from somewhere in the kitchen. "I'll walk Samantha in an hour or two!" A happy bark accompanied her farewell.

"Thank you!" Derek called back.

He and Meredith passed through the front doorway and into the dark, chilly night.

"Would you go shoe shopping with me this weekend?" Meredith said as they descended the steps, hand in hand. She raised her eyebrows and looked at him. "Is that a service available by request?"

He laughed. "Well, I don't know. What would this entail?"

She shrugged. "Mostly buckling buckles for me and pretending you're having fun."

He stopped. She stopped. They stood on the sidewalk, halfway to the car. His breaths misted in the cold, wet air. Silence hugged the darkness. She gazed at him. He pushed his fingers through her hair and did what he'd wanted to do all evening since he'd found her crying. "It's a date," he murmured, and he kissed her.

When Derek came back to himself from a post-coital doze, he found Meredith, who'd managed to get up without his help after all, balancing against his desk as she bent over, trying to reach for a pen that had fallen and rolled into the middle of the floor. His limbs didn't quite want to cooperate, but he managed to rise. "Don't do that," he said. "I've got it." He bounced forward one step, remembered the window, bounced back, pulled up his pants and buckled his belt in a rush. Then he dashed to help her.

"Thanks," she said as he handed her the pen. "My center of balance is crap."

"No problem," he said.

He glanced at the clock. His meeting was in thirty minutes. He'd slept for about thirty-five. He sank into his desk chair, beset by lassitude. He didn't want to deal with a meeting in thirty minutes. He'd more than burned out his high with his copious apologizing, and after the stress of that unexpected surgery, and all the fun with Meredith, he was just.. done. He frowned, looking at Meredith as she sat down in the opposite chair. She picked up a pile off his desk, which he realized belatedly were charts. She hadn't had the charts when they'd come into the office, which meant she'd left them here...

"Have you been using my office?" he said.

She looked up. "Yes." She frowned. "Why, is that a problem?"

"No, of course not," he said. "But.. why?" She'd never done it before. Not when he wasn't in it.

She sighed. "To hide."

He frowned. "Why are you hiding?"

She rolled her eyes. "Because if another person who's not you sticks their hands on my stomach without asking, I can't be held responsible for the homicide that follows."

He blinked. "Oh." His frowned deepened. "People really come up to you and—?"

"All. The freaking. Time."

"Even strangers?" he said.

She nodded. "All. The freaking. Time."

He made a face. He couldn't imagine that. Strangers wandering up to him and touching him without so much as a warning. He'd be a wreck. A panicking, suffering wreck. In fact, he was pretty sure there wasn't anything about being pregnant that he would have handled very well. "I'm sorry," he said.

She shrugged. "Not your fault."

They both looked up when a knock rattled his door. "I'm sorry, sir," Patricia said. "But Dr. Webber is here with a Mr. Pruitt, and he insists you have an—"

"That's fine," Derek called. He sighed. They were early. "Send them in."

Meredith stood, charts in hand. "I'll see you later, okay?" she said.

"Yes," he said. He let his expression drip into a lazy smile, and he winked. "I still owe you three."

She laughed and passed Richard on the way out. Her smile dimmed somewhat for the tall, heavyset blonde man wearing what had to be a thousand dollar Armani suit. Mr. Pruitt. She did, however, manage to keep her pleasant look from falling off entirely. Mr. Pruitt nodded to her as she passed. Derek's eyes narrowed when he noticed the man's eyes roaming... a bit too low for his tastes. But he clenched his jaw, and he bore it. This was temporary. And it was necessary. And he had great confidence that Meredith would grab, pull, and twist if things ever went beyond looking.

After discussing the Seattle Grace's dire financial situation with Richard, they'd both agreed they needed to bring in a PR consultant to help out their current PR department with the shooting fallout. Though the hospital's funds were dwindling at an alarming rate, they'd deemed this a necessary expense, and this man came highly recommended by the Dean at Virginia Tech, whom Derek had also spoken to at length over the phone. The one caveat being that Mr. Pruitt was... colorful. Or, as Meredith called him, a freaking sexist pig who deserves to die alone.

Mr. Pruitt held out a beefy hand, and Derek reached across the desk to shake it. "Mr. Pruitt," Derek said. "Tell me you have good news?"

Mr. Pruitt grinned, showing them pearly, rod-straight, too-white teeth. He and Dr. Webber took seats side by side across the desk. "Well, I have good news, and I have bad news, and I have some more good news." The chair squeaked as he settled his ample weight. "The good news is that your current PR department has done a great job establishing your brand. The public knows who you are."

"And the bad?" Richard said.

"Your public outreach sucks," Mr. Pruitt said. "It sucks. It blows. It's a horrible lay. It's no wonder nobody's coming here anymore. You're not doing anything whatsoever to woo people back."

Derek frowned. "What do you recommend?"
"Your hospital is a beautiful woman, but she's just standing there like a rock. We need to get her to flirt a bit."

Richard cleared his throat. "And how do you propose we get her to... flirt?"

"Well, now, we're back to the good news," Mr. Pruitt said, reaching into his briefcase for a sheaf of papers. He gave them a wolfish grin. "Because I have a long fucking list."
Chapter 32

Chapter Notes

Well, here I am, still chugging right along. Thank you to my beta readers, and to Emeline, for helping me with my French, and to Gladys, for helping me make my fictional doctors sound like they know what they're doing. Thank you also to everybody who takes the time to leave a comment. I really, truly appreciate the feedback. It makes my day. I'm a little behind on my responses right now, but I hope to catch up soon. Finally, thanks to everybody who is still hanging in there with me, even though this monstrosity has taken me five blasted years to write.

This is kind of a sedate chapter. A calm before the finale, if you will. 2-3 more chapters to go! I'm excited. Are you?

When Samantha stood and ran to the door to bark, Derek stopped rubbing Meredith's feet to look, and Meredith moaned. "No..." she said, and Derek gave her an apologetic frown. Baby kicked Meredith's bladder for what felt like the fifth time in a row, and Meredith winced. She shifted, hoping Baby would settle. Shifting usually helped.

Samantha's warning was a short one, and then she quieted, which meant the person at the door was somebody she recognized. "It's probably Mark," Lexie said, and she stood. She went to the front door, disappearing behind the wall.

"Hey, Little Grey," Mark said, muffled from the hallway, but he didn't sound pleased. The words were tight and clipped. They exchanged some tense whispers in private, and then the pair of them appeared in the archway, Lexie looking red and fidgety and worried.

"Hey," Mark said without preamble. His posture was stiff and hulking and tense, and Lexie didn't stand with him. She walked back to the chair instead. Mark looked at Derek with dark eyes. "I need to talk to you, man," he said. He took one look at Lexie and jabbed his thumb in the direction of the kitchen. "Right now." And then he disappeared down the hall without waiting for Derek to answer him.

Meredith frowned. Well, that didn't sound good. Mark sounded... almost... mad.

"This sounds... not of the good," Lexie said, a worried expression on her face.

Derek's eyebrows knitted with confusion as he gently moved Meredith's feet and stood up.

"What's that about?" Meredith said.

He shrugged and shook his head. He had no idea. He followed Mark, Samantha plodding after him.

"Please, tell me this is just a big fucking mistake," Mark said a few seconds later, loud enough to resonate through the whole house. The heated words that followed, though, were quieter, and Meredith couldn't hear beyond the sharp tone. Derek's softer, tenor response was equally harsh and equally unintelligible. Within moments, it was pretty freaking obvious there was a rapid fire word duel happening in the kitchen. What in the hell?

Meredith grimaced as she struggled to stand up. "I'll be right back," she told Lexie. "This sounds like it needs a referee." And then she chased after Derek and Mark.

What she found was not what she expected.

They weren't at each other's throats. Derek was sitting at the kitchen table, red-faced, teeth grinding, staring at the placemat underneath his elbows like he was embarrassed about something. Samantha had her head on his lap, whining, but he wasn't paying attention to her. Mark stood over him, looming, arms folded, but he didn't look mad. Upset, yes. Worried, yes. Mad, no. His eyes were red, his face haggard, and her memory sharpened on how he'd looked right after the shooting, when he'd first found out Derek had been shot. When he'd come back to the hospital and found Derek on a ventilator. He'd looked just like that.

Neither of them told her to leave when she came into the room. "Maybe you can talk some fucking sense into him," Mark said, almost growling as he looked at her.

"What the hell is going on?" she said. She looked at Derek. "Some sense about what?"

"I reviewed the plastic surgery docket for next week," Mark said. He gestured at Derek. "He has a w-plasty for his sternotomy scar scheduled along with the scar revision for the bullet."

Meredith blinked. "So?" she said. "Isn't a w-plasty what you do to revise long hypertrophic scars?"

"Not for the chest!" Mark snapped. He turned to Derek. "Didn't Dr. Clemens explain to you that a w-plasty is only going to make it worse?"

Derek swallowed thickly, but he didn't look up. "He said there was a small chance..."

Mark sighed. "That it'll work? Yeah. A small one." He pulled out the chair next to Derek and collapsed into it. He sounded calmer, now, at least. "But we're talking like winning the lottery probabilities. You'd have a better chance of getting struck by lightning. The chest is one of the worst areas on the body for scarring. If you try to revise the scar, there's a huge chance you'll just make the it bigger. Derek, I'm telling you. Don't fucking do it. You'll be butchering yourself for no reason."

Meredith's mouth tumbled open, and she stared at Derek. She'd known about the surgery. That wasn't a surprise. They'd talked about it. He wanted the procedure done for his own peace of mind, and she'd supported it, even though she didn't think it was necessary. Next week, their days off lined up, and she would be taking him to the hospital to get it done. It was an outpatient procedure that wouldn't lay him up more than a day or two, give or take some discomfort. But she was no specialist in plastic surgery. She'd assumed he'd already talked this over with Mark. She'd assumed what he was getting done was appropriate for the wounds he'd received.

"Derek, what is he talking about?" Meredith said.

Derek had been so much better. So much better. The idea that he would intentionally and knowingly harm himself was... unreal to her. And unfathomable. Not to mention they had a baby coming in a matter of weeks. This seemed... so incongruous with all the progress he'd made.

"Derek?" she prodded, hoping he'd explain. Hoping there was a freaking explanation.

Silence stretched. Derek didn't look up. He fiddled with the placemat. Red covered his face and the back of his neck.
"I can’t wear my scrubs," he said, the words a rough whisper.

Meredith frowned. She yanked a chair out from the opposite side of the table and pulled it around to his other side, opposite Mark. She dropped heavily into the chair. Her everything ached. Everything. "What do you mean?" she said. She gave Samantha a stroke, but the dog was fixated on Derek's bad mood, and she didn't budge.

"The v-neck," Derek said. "It goes down too far, and you can see..." He pulled his fingers through his hair. His expression looked like cut glass, and he put his hands over his eyes like he didn’t want them to see.

A lump formed in her throat. She’d known the scar bothered him. She'd had no idea it bothered him this much. That he was too embarrassed to wear his normal work clothes. He was doing more and more surgeries, now, too, nothing solo, yet, but, still, scrubbing in. All the time. Something he couldn't skate through in a suit and tie, not for long procedures, which she supposed might be what had made this a pressing issue for him. Her eyes watered.

"Derek," she said, unsure of what to say. She thought back to the times she'd seen him in scrubs since the shooting. Nothing had pinged her radar of wrong, since wearing t-shirts under scrubs was something they all did when it was chilly, even her, but he'd worn a high-necked black t-shirt underneath every time.

Every. Freaking. Time.

"There’s other stuff we can do," Mark said, tearing Meredith from her recollections. He put a hand on Derek's shoulder and squeezed. "Nonsurgical stuff. Laser treatments. Those can reduce scar visibility by up to sixty percent. And the knob at the top will keep going down over time. It's already smaller."

"But... it will still be here."

"Yes. The scar will still be there," Mark said. "There's nothing magic that's going to take it away. Even a successful w-plasty would have left you with marks. C'mon, man. You know that."

Derek said nothing.

"Are you okay?" Meredith whispered. She tried to wrap her arms around him, but he shrugged her off, so she didn't press it.

"I just wanted..." he murmured.

"I know," Mark said. "I know, man."

"The scar revision for the bullet wound," Meredith said, worry encroaching. She looked over Derek's shoulder at Mark, eyebrows raised. "That will still work, won't it?"

"He’ll always have a little bit of a mark, but the fat graft should get rid of the skin crater," Mark said. "I don't have a problem with that. Just the w-plasty. Didn't Dr. Clemens tell you all this? It's sheer quackery if he didn't – I'll fire him."

"He told me," Derek said, the words quiet.

Mark looked crushed. "But you were hoping, anyway," he said. He grimaced. "Fuck!" He sighed. "Fuck, man. I'm sorry."
Meredith swallowed. Derek was like... the anti-Meredith when it came to probabilities. Meredith thought even good odds would turn against her. Derek thought even bad odds were a barrier he could break through.

"I can't wear my scrubs without a t-shirt underneath because I'm too fucking embarrassed," Derek said, the words thick and upset. "I can't change in the locker room at work. I can't take my shirt off when I'm jogging or at the gym. I can't go swimming."

Meredith blinked. She'd known he was self-conscious about it. Hell, he'd told her how much he hated it. But, for some reason, that hatred hadn't translated for her.

To her, the scar on his chest was a non-issue. It was a raised pink line, still, but his wispy chest hair covered a lot of it. There was a bit of a bump at the top of the line, a hard, raised knob just under his clavicles, a common deformity caused by the way the skin bunched at the top of a sternal incision, which, in Derek's case, had been done under less than ideal circumstances to begin with. But none of it mattered, to her. He was breathing. That mattered. Even if his chest were bald, and the scar wending between his pectorals were in plain sight, the mark wouldn't matter to her. When she looked at him, she didn't even think about it anymore. She didn't see scars. She saw Derek, whole and healed and hers.

She just needed him breathing.

"Please, don't be embarrassed," she said.

He swallowed. "Well, I am," he said, the words dark, his expression darker. "And I..." He looked at Mark. "I don't see how a botched w-plasty would make a fucking difference."

Mark regarded him for a long moment, thinking. "You think you're embarrassed, now? You'll feel worse if you get this done. I know. I see people all the time who are hoping I can fix some other surgeon's mistakes, and I have to tell them I can't. There's some magic that just can't be done. Look, man. Give the sternotomy scar a year to heal like I said. Do the laser corrections. I promise you'll like the result, and if I'm wrong, if I'm honestly wrong, I'll shut up about the w-plasty."

Derek fiddled with the placemat for a long, silent stretch of moments. His lower lip quivered. She wished she had any idea what to say to him. Anything. Anything that would make him feel better. But she had nothing.

His chair legs roared against the floor as he pushed it back and stood. He wiped his eyes. They were wet. Overflowing. "I'm going to bed," he said, and then he fled.

She watched him go, gaping. She heard him thump up the steps, and heard Samantha plodding after him. She heard a door slam. And then... silence.

"Jesus," Mark said. "I didn't want to..." The words trailed away into silence. He bunched his fists, and his temples danced as he clenched and unclenched his jaw. "Damn it."

"It's okay," Meredith said, head spinning. "I'm glad you caught it before he did something permanent."

"I'm not sure what good it did," Mark said, glowering. He put his head in his hands and huffed out a huge, depressed breath of air. "Fuck."

Meredith sighed. She was tired. She was tired, and now she was upset, and she had no idea what to do, and she was done with today. Just done with it. Baby kicked her for good measure as Meredith struggled to get out of her chair. Mark helped. She was too tired to protest. Another kick. Baby was being really mean, today.

"You're welcome to stay," she said to Mark, and then she lumbered after Derek.

"Goodnight," Lexie called after her forlornly, and Meredith stopped on the stairs.

"Night, Lexie. Sorry to abandon you."

Lexie shrugged. "It's okay. I hope Derek feels better. I hope you feel better."

"Thanks," Meredith said.

She trudged up the rest of the steps. Derek was already in bed, curled up under a mound of covers with an armful of Samantha, whose broad black nose poked out from under the lip of the comforter. Meredith thought Derek might be asleep. He tended to collapse after emotional stress.

After using the bathroom, she eased her aching body into bed, facing Derek and the dog. She didn't have the heart to kick Samantha out of the bed, so the dog ended up sandwiched in the middle under the comforter, the middle participant in a strange threesome, but that was okay. Adding Samantha to their family had done wonders, and the dog deserved some bed snuggles occasionally. A man, a Rottweiler, and a pregnant whale walked into a bar, Meredith thought, and she snorted despite herself.

Derek wasn't sleeping. The covers shifted. He scooted closer, reaching across the dog's broad side to touch her. His hand rested under the bulge of their baby, his palm a ray of heat through her shirt. Baby tried another bladder punch, the punctuation at the end of a long litany of, "Mom! Mom! Mom! Hey, Mom! Mommmm! Yoohoo, I'm in here. MOM!" Meredith sighed with irritation. She was never going to get any sleep tonight if Baby didn't settle the hell down.

"Oh, wow," Derek said, the words a rough whisper, "Baby's going bonkers."

"She's been getting violent, lately," she replied with a sigh. "I feel like crap. I can't sleep when she's like this."

"I'm so sorry," he said. He stroked her skin. His eyes glittered in the dark. Her eyelids drooped, and she exhaled in a long, slow breath. "Can I do anything?" he added as she drifted.

"Do you know any magical hypnosis techniques that would put Baby to sleep?" She licked her lips and stared at him. "Like, are you a closet baby charmer? Is this something I have yet to learn about you?"

He snorted. "I wish."

She sighed. "Nobody ever mentioned the kicking could hurt. Everybody always made it sound so awesome," she said, grimacing. This wasn't that painful, yet. More irritating than anything else, unless Baby fixated on a particular spot. But Meredith shuddered to think of how this was going to feel in a month. "It's not awesome anymore, Derek. I object."

His free hand rested against her womb. He rubbed her belly. When a foot moved somewhere within her womb, his fingers tightened. "Hey, give Mom a break," he said, a soft murmur, the same voice he used to talk hysterical people off ledges everywhere. Baby didn't seem to want to listen, though. Not even to The Voice. He pulled her hand to him, across the dog, and he kissed her fingers. "A few more weeks. You can do it, Mere."
"Can't you just take Baby out, now?" she whined. "You're a surgeon."

He laughed, the sound a bit hollow, but a laugh nonetheless, which was what she'd been hoping for. He helped her. She helped him. It was a thing.

"Are you okay?" she said, worried.

He was quiet. Quiet for a long time. And then he sighed. "I wish I could take something."

A lump formed in her throat. "But you're not going to."

"No," he said. "But I want to."

At least he was being honest. She took his hand and squeezed it. The dog snored between them.

He'd made her the potato chip casserole thing for dinner. The only other time he'd made the dish, they'd been fighting, one of the worst fights post-shooting that they'd ever had, and she hadn't had an opportunity to try the food. Well, she had, but she'd felt sick enough from the oppressive mood in the air that the food had tasted like it was competing for Seattle's best cardboard box. Things were on an even keel, this time, though, and it had felt nice letting him take care of her when she got home.

She felt tired. Tired, and fat, and ache-y. Six weeks, she told herself. Six. Just six. She could do six. Except these last few weeks seemed to be crawling slower than a glacier.

She shoveled a forkful of cheesy bliss into her mouth and sighed as she chewed. The dish contained egg noodles, heaping globs of sharp cheddar, chicken swapped in for what should have been tuna, because she couldn't stand tuna thanks to Baby, and potato chips. He'd made it for her on a lark when she'd told him to surprise her, which made her smile. This wasn't the sort of dish he'd ever make for himself. Just her.

They sat together at the little table in the kitchen sharing the moments as they passed. The room was warm from the oven, and the tantalizing scent of the casserole filled every nook and cranny in the kitchen. Murky, drizzly black hugged the house outside the windows. Lexie had gone for a rainy, late night jog, and Samantha had been more than happy to play the role of security on the endeavor. Alex was at work, which meant Meredith and Derek had the house to themselves for a little while.

He sat across from her with an uneaten plate of salad. He pushed soggy, vinaigrette covered spring mix around with his fork. A cherry tomato fell off the plate, but he didn't seem to notice. His gaze had a bit of a thousand yard stare quality to it, and she wondered if he was seeing the plate at all. While he'd made her the casserole, he hadn't been his usual chatty self. She thought he'd said perhaps three sentences since she'd waddled through the door two hours before.

"Derek, are you okay?" she said.

For a long time, he didn't respond, just stared. A swath of stubble covered his pale face, dark circles hugged his eyes, and his shoulders slumped, making him look careworn, like he had the weight of ten worlds crushing him into the chair. She stretched out her foot and pushed her toe against his leg, sliding it up under the leg of his jeans. The soft, wiry hair on his shin slipped under her bare toe pad.

"Psst," she said.

He looked up. "I'm sorry, what?" he said, and she dropped her foot back to the floor.
"You're not eating," she replied. "You haven't eaten." She glanced at the clock. Almost 8:00 pm. "You're running out of time before you need to fast." He wasn't supposed to eat after midnight.

Derek looked at his plate, and his lip curled in what looked like disgust. "I don't..." He swallowed. "I don't want anything."

"Which brings me back to, are you okay?" she said, but he didn't have an immediate answer for her.

She didn't like the troubled look on his face. He was too pale, and his lips had stretched into a thin, flat line. A quiet tink, tink, tink-ing noise filled the silence, and she looked down to see his fork hitting the edge of the plate. He was freaking shaking. She hadn't seen this in... months. This was what panic attacks looked like on him just before he forgot how to breathe. She scooted her chair around, put her hand on his knee, and squeezed.

"Hey..." she said, worried. His threadbare jeans were soft under her fingertips as she stroked his thigh. "What's wrong? Take a deep breath."

He blinked, and his eyes got wet, but he didn't say anything. He took a wispy, breathless breath and looked away from her. He dropped the fork on the plate and raised his palms to his face.

"I can't," he said, the words a torn whisper. "I can't... I..."

"Derek," she said, almost a snap. "Derek, you need to look at me, and you need to breathe. You're fine." She squeezed his shoulder. "You're fine. You're safe."

His slip into panic land ended in three pounding heartbeats, like he'd been riding a mountain bike on a steep trail over a ravine, the front wheel had slipped into dead air, and he'd lost control for a moment, but after some wrangling, he'd managed to get back onto solid ground. He took a deep, slow breath and blew it out, and then he slumped.

"I'm okay," he croaked. "I'm fine."

She rolled her eyes. "In what universe is this okay?"

"I'm..." He swallowed thickly. "I'm fine. I just can't... think about... that." He gave her a watery smile that ended up looking ghastly because of his pallor. "Want to distract me?"

"I want you to tell me what's going on," she said. "What can't you think about?"

"Tomorrow," he said. He sighed. His hands wouldn't stop shaking. "I can't think about..."

She bit her lip. Tomorrow.

Tomorrow was his plastic surgery. He'd scratched the w-plasty from the docket, but he still wanted to get work done on the bullet wound. Dr. Clemens would be using fat taken from Derek's lower abdomen to fill up the crater the bullet had left. The bullet scar was small. Dr. Clemens would only need a dollop of fat to fill the depression, which was good, since Derek only had about that much fat to begin with. The graft wouldn't get rid of the scar, but it would make the skin more uniform and the scar a lot less noticeable. Bullet wounds were tiny things, and a lot of different procedures could be done to hide them.

"You don't have to do this, now," she said. "It's okay. If you're not ready—"

He wiped his face with his palms and peered over his fingers at her. "I do need to do this, now," he said. "I do." His eyes squeezed shut. "I just want it over." He swallowed. "I need this over, so I can stop... thinking." He looked away. "This is the last place he's still hurting me, Meredith."

"The scar?" she said.

He looked at her. "No, I have this... memory. Every time I walk into an operating room. I'm sick, and cold, and helpless, and everything hurts. I can't breathe, and I can hear you talking to me, but I can't do anything about it. I'm looking up at the lights, and I know I'm going to die, and..."

She blinked. They'd stripped him because his clothes had been sticky and caked with blood. He'd been shivering, and April had found a blanket for him. For a while, he'd been able to talk with Meredith and joke about elevator sex. But he hadn't been able to breathe, and he'd exchanged regaling her with bad jokes for strained gasping. She'd been terrified that she'd end up watching him suffocate as his chest filled up with blood, denying his lungs the ability to inflate. He'd been conscious in the sense that his eyes had been open, but even when the anesthesiologist had been pricking him over and over and over trying to find a good vein for the intravenous line, he hadn't reacted. He'd just gasped for air, and he'd stared at the ceiling, and he'd shivered. She'd had no idea he could remember any of that. She'd had no idea he'd heard her talking to him.

A golfball sized lump formed in her throat. "You still have the phobia about the operating room?" she said.

"Yes," he admitted.

"But you've been cutting again," she said. "You scheduled your plastic surgery. I thought..."

"I can usually push it away, but it's still there," he said. He swallowed, and he looked at her. "I'm worried... that I won't be able to push it away tomorrow. Being on the table instead of over it..." He shook his head. His hands were shaking again, and she grabbed them. Held them. "It fucking scares me, Meredith," he said, looking down at their intertwined hands. "I'm scared."

Her eyes watered, and her lower lip trembled. Hearing him say that made her heart hurt. She dropped his hands and wrapped her arms around him. His whole frame shook. "I'm here. I'll be there. The whole time," She'd already talked to Dr. Clemens, and he would be letting her sit with Derek inside the OR, right by Derek's head, just like Derek had done for her when she'd had part of her liver removed for Thatcher's sake. "Mark's going to be there, too," she said. "You'll be fine. We won't let anything happen."

"I know," Derek said. He pulled back to give her a wavering smile. "Thanks."

"You really remember me talking to you?"

"Yes," he said. "I could still hear."

"Right before they put you out, you weren't looking at the ceiling. You were looking at me."

"Yes," he said.

"That was you. You remember that."

"Yes," he said.

She blinked, and a pair of tears cut slivers down her cheeks. She'd stroked his hair, she'd told him it would be over soon, and she'd told him she loved him. And he'd heard all that.
"What's wrong?" Derek said.

She sucked in a breath and wiped her eyes. "I don't know. It's just nice to know you heard me. I love you."

"I love you, too," he murmured against her skin, and he kissed her.

The world fuzzed for a moment, and she sighed, resting in his space. Want to distract me? he'd said. As much as she loved him, the idea of sex right now repulsed her, but she could still distract.

"What do you think of Piper?" she said.

He changed gears with her in moments, no confusion written on his face. She watched his mouth move as he sounded it out. Piper Grey-Shepherd. Piper Shepherd-Grey. "It's pretty," he said. "But it doesn't..." He gestured futilely, but couldn't come up with a word.

"Pop?" Meredith finished for him.

He shook his head. "No, definitely not. What about Isabelle?"

The name caught her by surprise. "You want to name the baby after Izzie?"

"Well," he said, pausing, "I admit I wasn't even thinking of her when I said it, but I wouldn't be against it. Why, do you want to?"

She shook her head. Izzie had... left. She'd left, just like everybody else did, and she'd never sent any letters, never sent a forwarding address. She'd cut all ties, left Alex in ruins, and the last words she'd ever said to Meredith... It's just a place I worked, and I can do that anywhere. Cold. Meredith shuddered as she watched that bridge burn in her head. "No. No, I don't think so. She left."

Derek nodded. "She did. Sorry, I wasn't thinking about it."

Which made some amount of sense. Izzie had been one of Derek's first dissenters, back when she'd thought Meredith was only fucking her boss to get ahead, not in the horrible process of falling in love. Derek and Izzie had never been close, even after that perceptual hurdle had been cleared. Cordial, yes. Close, no. Meredith sighed and wrapped her arms around him.

"That's okay," she said. "You have a lot on your mind. Maybe, Emma?"

He made a weird gagging nose in his throat. "God, no," he said. "Definitely not."

She frowned at him. "Is there a story, here?"

His face mottled with red. "Well..."

"Oh, there is," she said, her frown slipping away, bulldozed by delight. She scrunched a tent of his shirt between her fingers. "You have to tell me!"

He laughed. "Oh, do I?"

She nodded. "Yes. You still owe me a story."

"We're back to story swapping, now, are we?"

"We're married," she said. "I don't think the story swapping ever stops, does it?"
"Touché," he said with an easy smile. "You realize that means if I tell you, you'll owe me a story next, right?"

She looked at him through her eyelashes. "Yes."

"She was somebody I knew back in college," Derek said. "My first girlfriend."

"Ohhh," Meredith said. "Your _first_ girlfriend? How did she produce that gurgle of dread?"

He blinked. "Gurgle of dread?"

"Yes," she said, laughing. "When I first said her name, you almost gagged."

"Well, she was... a neat freak."

"Derek," Meredith said, "I hate to break this to you, but you're a neat freak."

He snorted. "I'm neat, but I'm not a freak about it."

"All I have to do to when I want you distracted is tip a lampshade somewhere in your field of view," Meredith said.

"Yes, but I don't iron our sheets, do I?" Derek said. "And I don't throw tantrums when you move my toothpaste. And when you leave stuff out, I just pick it up. I don't lecture you for twenty minutes about every infinitesimal infraction."

Meredith gaped. "She ironed sheets? The ones you sleep on?"

He rolled his eyes. "Yes. And she dumped me when I put one of her shirts back in the wrong color section of her closet."

"Color section," Meredith said, eyes creasing. "Like, what, did you put a black shirt in with the yellow ones?"

He shook his head. "Oh, no. That might almost be reasonable. No, I apparently can't tell red from scarlet."

"Wow," Meredith said. What a crazy... "I don't think I can tell red from scarlet, either."

"And this," he said. He pressed his lips against her temple, kissing her. "Is why I love you."

She grinned. "What I want to know is how in the hell you ended up dating this woman in the first place."

"She asked me out out of the blue," Derek said, thinking. "Right after Bio. I'd never gotten much attention before. I didn't know her, and she was a knockout, and my brain shut down. I didn't find out about her organizational proclivities until a few dates later."

She rested her head on his shoulder, trying to imagine it. And then it struck her. He'd said this was in college. "Your first girlfriend wasn't until college?" she said. She'd lost her virginity at fourteen.

He shrugged. "I was a late bloomer, Meredith."

"When was your first time?" she said.

He was silent for a long time.
She swallowed. She couldn't imagine him waiting. He was entirely too lecherous to wait. He didn't approve of Mark's revolving door approach to women, so she could see him as a serial monogamist. But she couldn't see him waiting. Still... "Was it Addison?"

He shook his head. "No." He gave her a lop-sided smile. "No, I didn't wait that long. I was a late bloomer, not a monk. And I didn't meet Addison until medical school."

"So, when?" Meredith prodded. "I told you mine."

"It was Emma," he said, not looking at her. "There was a reason I gagged when you said her name."

"Oh, boy," Meredith said. "I take it it didn't go well?"

He snorted. "Do first times ever go well?"

She giggled. "Okay, you have a point."

"Let's just say I found out about her psychotic level of neat freakiness because of the way she cleaned up afterward."

She burst out laughing. "Oh, god, Derek."

He nodded, sharing her humor despite the stoplight red blooming all over his face and neck. "Yes. Yes, sex is messy, and I may be scarred for life."

She nuzzled him. "I don't know. You seem to have turned out okay."

"You think so?" he said.

"Yes," she said. And she sighed. "So, emphatically not Emma." She crossed the name off her mental list.

He grunted in agreement. His body was lax in her arms. He wasn't shaking anymore. Wasn't jittery. He seemed content.

"Elizabeth?" she said, thinking.

"Mmm," he said. "Maybe. Beatrice?"

"Nah." She yawned. "Charlotte?"

He laughed. "After my old dog? No, thanks."

"Oh, yeah," she said. "Forgot about Charlotte."

It felt like they talked for hours, discussed the merits of hundreds of names, swapped stories until her head got fuzzy with a need for sleep. Lexie came home and joined them at the table around 8:45 to eat some of the arterial-death-by-potato-chip. Samantha wandered off to her crate to sleep. Derek began picking at his salad around nine, long after it'd become a not-crunchy, icky mess. He only managed a few bites, but that made her feel better about his state of mind. They changed tracks and discussed boys' names around ten, but by ten-thirty, both of them were falling asleep at the table, and Lexie told them to go to bed, or else, so, they did. And by eleven, they were both sound asleep.

She found him standing naked in their bedroom by the mirror, staring at his chest with a hateful gaze. The darkness in the room had turned his blue eyes black. He didn't look up as she stepped inside the room and closed the door behind her. Didn't speak. He pressed his fingers to his chest and traced his sternotomy scar with the tips of his fingers.

She stepped behind him, but her stomach prevented her from spooning him like she wanted to. Instead, she shifted to the side, and she wrapped an arm around his waist. She kissed his shoulder.

"Are you okay?" she said. He'd been moody. Moody and unhappy for several days. Ever since Mark had brought reality down on him like a ton of bricks.

Derek's gaze shifted, and he met her eyes in the mirror. "I was stupid to think I could just get rid of it." He said the word stupid like he meant it as a curse word. His eyes narrowed, and his lip curled with unhappiness.

She couldn't take it anymore. She stepped in front of him, blocking his view of the scar. "I know you hate it, but it doesn't make a difference to me," she said. She kissed him. Kissed the nub between his clavicles that he loathed. Kissed the entire wending line in a slow trail of lip presses down his chest. "None of this does. I love you. I desire you." She looked up at him so he could see her expression. He was buck naked, and lust came to an easy boil in her body. It wasn't hard to show him what she meant. "I think you're very sexy."

The anger in his gaze broke, finally, and he swallowed. He sniffed and wiped his eyes. "I... talked," he said, the word falling apart. He cleared his throat. "I've been talking. With Dr. Wyatt. About it."

She raised her eyebrows. "Oh?"

"I would think you looked just as beautiful as the day I met you, even if you had this scar, even if it was worse than this," he said. "And I wouldn't think less of a stranger. I'd just think he or she had... heart surgery." The words trembled, and when he blinked, his eyes seemed wet.

Meredith blinked. "She thinks you're doing the sunglasses thing with your scar?"

"No, but framing it that way helps a little," he said.

"That's good."

He looked at the mirror with a sigh. "It's a blemish, yes," he said. "But it's not grotesque. It's a story. We all have stories."

"That's a great way to look at it," she said. She kissed him.

He sighed. "I wish I believed it."

"You'll work on it," she said. "Just like you have with everything else. And I'll be here."

"Yeah," he said. Something thick stuck in his throat, and he made a deep, upset sound.

"C'mon," she said, squeezing his shoulders. "Let's try to get some sleep, okay?"

She met his eyes. He nodded. And then he followed.

When her alarm shrieked the arrival of 7:00 am, she slapped at her clock before it managed to belt out more than a syllable, and she lay quietly for a moment. Rain pattered softly against the windowpanes. Derek lay beside her, one arm draped over her hip, body pressed against her back. She could tell without looking that he wasn't asleep, just from the sound of his breathing. The hairs on the back of her neck tingled in a way that told her she was being watched, too. She squeezed his hand. Despite him being curled up under a comforter with her, his skin felt frozen.

"How long have you been awake?" she said.

She heard him swallow. "Since three or so," he croaked. "I kept having nightmares."

Her eyes pricked. So, he'd backslid from the relaxed demeanor she'd managed to get him to before bed. She hadn't heard him suffering at all last night, hadn't noticed he wasn't sleeping when she'd gotten up to pee an hour or two ago. He hadn't had nightmares in months. He'd been great for months. His stomach rumbled in the silence. He'd had all of four bites of salad in about eighteen hours. So, he was going to be tired, thirsty, and hungry going into this surgery that already scared him so much he'd nearly had a panic attack about it, and he couldn't have any anxiolytics, because he was an addict, and giving him narcotics would be bad. This was a great freaking recipe for success.

With an awkward, cursing struggle, she managed to roll over to face him. He peered at her, smiled when she met his eyes, but didn't speak. She pressed her palm against his t-shirt. She could feel the crater of the bullet hole through the fabric.

To her, visually, the scar was a pencil-eraser-sized discolored spot with jagged edges, barely anything worth mentioning, but she had to admit it was like a bullhorn to the touch, loud and obvious. When she pressed, she could even feel the damage that had been done to his rib. The bone hadn't broken on penetration, but the bullet had nicked the edge on the way in. In fact, his rib was probably what had caused the bullet to bounce toward his heart. The plastic surgery he was getting wouldn't fix the bone, but the dip in his skin would be gone.

He put his hand over hers, stopping her exploration, and he leaned forward to kiss her forehead.

"I won't tell you that I'm fine, because I'm obviously not," he said, voice rough. "But this is something I need to have done. I need it, Meredith. I'll make myself get used to the sternotomy scar if I have to, but this?" He pressed her fingertips against him. Her ring finger sank into the crater. "He did this to me, it's easy to fix, and I don't want it there."

She swallowed. "I know."

He pushed his fingers through her hair, and her eyelids dipped. "Just help me not think about it, okay?"

"I can do that," she said, smiling. "What do you think about Max?"

"For a boy or a girl?" he said.

"Max can be for a girl?" Meredith said, frowning.

He shrugged. "Maxine."

"Oh," she said. "Well, I meant for a boy."

"I like it," he said. "Cameron?"

She winced. "No. Definite veto."

"Oh?" he said, giving her a grin, "Do tell. You owe me one."
"Cameron introduced me to tequila," she said.

"Boyfriend?" he said.

"No," she said. "More like my party coordinator. He also introduced me to gin, and cigarettes, and ecstasy, and a couple other things."

His eyebrows raised. "You've done ecstasy?"

She shrugged. "Yes." In Europe, particularly. But she'd met Cameron in high school. Her adult life had started years before most peoples' did. "But don't ask for the story, because most of it is a legitimate blackout."

"Hmm," he said.

"I told you, Derek," she said. "There's not really any dark-and-twisty you can pull on me that I haven't done, too. Or at least thought about doing."

"You were never an addict," he said.

She shook her head. "I never got the point where I physically needed something. But I wouldn't say being familiar with blackouts is a good thing."

"No," he said. "It's not." He kissed her. "Mon petit délinquant."

"What's that mean?" she said.

He grinned. "My little delinquent."

She punched him gently in the shoulder. "How do you say cocky bastard?"

"Cocky bastard," he said, laughing.

She punched him again. "In French, jackass."

"Umm," he said, thinking. "Bâtard témoignant d'une assurance exagérée. I think." And then he frowned. "No, wait. That's kinda circuitous. Maybe, bâtard arrogant."

She blinked. "That. You're that." She grinned. "Where did you learn French so fluently?"

"That," he said, kissing her, "would be a result of the depths I sunk to get girlfriend number two."

"Your second girlfriend was French?" Meredith said.

"No," he said. "From Québec. And after we broke up, Mark stole my motorcycle to chase after her for himself, and he never even paid for the gas."

Meredith snorted. "What was her name?"

"Liliane."

"Okay, then," Meredith said. "No Lily on the girls' names list, then."

"Agreed," he said.

She rolled onto her back and stared at the ceiling. "What was Liliane like? Was she neurotic, too?"
"No," Derek said. "That relationship lasted seven months."

"Why'd you break up?"

"I transferred out of Bowdoin to go to Columbia, and we both hated the long distance thing. We tried, but it just didn't work."

Meredith glanced at the clock. 7:30. They really needed to get up. But this was nice. Just lying here and talking and... being. The covers made everything so warm. She noticed his hands had warmed up, too. She was a damned good distractor, if she did say so herself. When her second alarm went off at 7:45, though, she had to admit defeat. They had to be at the hospital in forty-five minutes, and they weren't even out of bed yet.

They both took quick showers as they traded more names back and forth. He threw on an old, threadbare pair of button-fly jeans and a t-shirt. He didn't normally go to the hospital in such slobbish clothes, but she supposed he was opting for comfort in light of the fact that he'd be getting cut into in an hour or two. He watched through his fingers as she inhaled a muffin. His stomach kept rumbling, and she felt a bit guilty, so she ended up eating the whole muffin in about five monstrous bites.

He drove them to the hospital. She'd avoided driving once she'd hit the second trimester, and stopped altogether once she'd hit the third. She'd read too many horror stories to want to risk it. Between all her friends, she'd been managing to bum rides on the days her schedule didn't line up with Derek's. Derek would be stoned and unable to drive on the way home, but Mark had offered to drive on the way back.

Though Derek got quieter the closer they got to the hospital, she managed to keep up a running dialog, until the parking lot. "What about Stewart?" Meredith said as he parked the car. Derek didn't reply. He stared through the windshield, unblinking, spacey. She reached across the parking brake with a struggling grunt and put her hand on his knee. "Derek?"

"Hmm?" he said, flinching back to life. "Sorry. What?"

"Stewart," she said.

He frowned. "That sounds... familiar."

"I don't know a Stewart," Meredith said. "Do you know a Stewart?"

He thought for a long time and eventually shrugged. "Maybe, in another life or something."

"Maybe," Meredith said. She grinned. "Or as an alternate you."

He didn't meet her smile. "Yeah," he said, the word shaky and soft as he peered at the hospital in the distance, beyond a dozen rows of parked cars. He unclipped his seatbelt, pushed the door open, and slid out of the car into the sort of drizzle.

She climbed out of the car awkwardly and followed. He stopped midway down the walk that sprawled between the hospital and the parking lot. The entrance loomed beyond them.

"Doing okay?" she said.

He glanced at her and gave her a weak grin. "I think you might have to push me."

The early March air was crisp and wet, and the sky was a dreary gray. The drizzle came in misty spurts, now, and it had rained all night. Puddles formed everywhere in the muddy grass and in the dips in the sidewalks. She brushed her fingers through his damp hair and then clutched the lapels of his green windbreaker. He leaned close, and pressed his nose to hers. They kissed.

"You'll be fine," she assured him. "I'm here."

He didn't have much to say to that other than a shaky, "Hmm." But he did start walking under his own power again.

The new security at the hospital entrance was a bit of an annoyance, but they made it through to the admission desk for outpatient surgery with a few seconds to spare, even with a side trip to pick up freshly sterilized scrubs for Meredith. They were technically on time, and the woman at the desk gave them a thousand watt smile.

"Good morning, Dr. Shepherd," she said. She glanced at Meredith. "Hi, Dr. Grey." She glanced at Derek's attire, and then at Meredith's. "Not working today?"

Melinda was her name. Or Merry. Or something starting with an M-e- other than Meredith. Meredith couldn't put her finger on it, and the lapels of the woman's silk blouse obscured her name tag. Meredith glanced at Derek, but he'd sunk into a black hole of nerves the moment they'd passed the hospital's threshold. He swallowed, but said nothing.

"We're here for Derek," Meredith said, frowning. "You have his paperwork, right?" Mark and Lexie, though Derek didn't know about Lexie, had both agreed to run interference to keep people out of the gallery while Derek was in surgery. She wondered if the interference had extended to nosy administrative staff.

The receptionist blinked. Then she looked down at her files. She shuffled them until the folder labeled D. Shepherd sat on the top. And then looked back at Derek. "Oh, this is you! I didn't make the connection." She gave them a sheepish grin. "Well, I feel silly."

She proffered a pile of paperwork to Derek. Derek flinched backward an inch and didn't reach to take it, so Meredith grabbed it for him. She frowned at Derek. A near panic attack, nightmares, and a visible, negative reaction to another person encroaching in his personal space... all things Derek hadn't exhibited in months.

She knew he wanted to get this surgery done. She knew it, and she supported him. But she wondered, not for the first time since last night, if, perhaps, this was a catastrophically bad idea to do today.

A nurse carrying Derek's chart showed them into the outpatient wing. The nurse was one of the new hires that had been flooding the hospital with the recent employment drives Seattle Grace had been doing, courtesy of Mr. Pruitt's advice. Meredith didn't know the woman. Derek didn't seem to, either. And the nurse went through the rote steps of admission with little indication that she knew who they were.

That was good, Meredith thought. Derek would appreciate the anonymity.

"Do you need to use the restroom, Dr. Shepherd?" the nurse said. "This is your last chance for about two hours."

"No," he said, the word flat and tight as the moved down the long white hallway through a pair of double doors. "I'm good."

The room Derek was led to was more of a cubicle surrounded by a drab, pinkish-colored curtain than an actual room. Twelve similar cubicles lined the large room around the edges, and in the middle of the room stood a nurses' station like an island. There was a hospital bed inside Derek's assigned cubicle, along with a stool, another chair, and miscellaneous medical equipment. A clean, crisply folded hospital gown rested on top of the blue thermal blanket that hugged the bed.

The nurse pulled a plastic bracelet from the sheaf of papers included with Derek's chart, and affixed it to his wrist. Derek's name was typed on the band to the left of a color-coded square indicating a sulfa-drug allergy. Derek's gaze twitched to his wrist and then twitched away, and Meredith got the worrisome impression of some little kid on a playground going, "La la la, can't hear you!" The nurse told him to change into the gown, and that she'd be back with the anesthesiologist in a few minutes.

When the nurse left, Dr. Clemens arrived to say hello before the curtains had even stopped fluttering behind her. Dr. Clemens was a younger, rotund man with a beaky nose, who Meredith stood eye-to-eye with, even without wearing heels. He had reddish-blonde hair, a round face, and a ruddy, Santa Claus complexion that made him seem permanently cheerful.

"Dr. Shepherd, Dr. Grey, good morning," Dr. Clemens said.

Derek sat on the lip of the bed and folded his arms. He gave Dr. Clemens a smile that screamed I'm-not-happy-to-be-here-can-we-hurry-this-up. "Dr. Clemens," he said in a breathy voice.

"I just wanted to see if you had any last minute questions for me," Dr. Clemens said.

Derek shook his head. "I'm good," he said, like he only had a handful of phrases he was capable of uttering, kind of like a magic eight ball. He stared at the floor.

Meredith couldn't stand it anymore, couldn't stand watching him be shaky and frail and nervous whenever she wasn't babbling his ear off with name ideas. She turned to Dr. Clemens. "Can you give him some alprazolam or something?"

Derek snapped out of his daze. "Meredith, no. I don't want to risk it. Not so soon after I quit."

"It'd just be this once," Meredith said. "You'd be supervised. Please, Derek, you're having issues today and yesterday that you haven't had in ages. I think you need it."

Dr. Clemens frowned and pulled out his stethoscope. "May I?" he said.

Derek nodded, and he stood rigidly, trembling, as Dr. Clemens pushed up Derek's shirt and listened. Dr. Clemens's frown deepened as the moments passed, and Derek's eyes got wet.

"Please, I can calm down," Derek said. "I'm fine."

"Well, I admit, this is troubling," Dr. Clemens said. "Your heart rate is elevated. And I imagine if I took your blood pressure, that would be skyrocketing." He looked at Derek apologetically. "I know you have concerns, given your history of substance abuse, but I think a small dose of alprazolam might be in your best interest." He glanced at Meredith, and then back to Derek. "I assure you, it's safe. We do this all the time."

"I'm fine," Derek snapped. "Just let me change, and I'll fix it."

Silence stretched as Dr. Clemens considered. "Okay," Dr. Clemens said, the word slow. "Well, we still have some time. I'll give you a few minutes, but if I don't see some improvement, we're going to have to have a chat."
Derek glared at Meredith as Dr. Clemens left through the curtain, an unhappy et tu, Brute expression on his face, but she refused to apologize for being the freaking smart one. He stripped naked, putting his windbreaker and clothes in the bin below the bed, and then he unfolded the hospital gown with tight, jerking motions. The harsh, fluorescent light in the small cubicle made his scars look far worse than they were in reality, emphasized and harsh against his pale skin. Or, maybe, she was just imagining things because of the tension and anger he was radiating like a heater. The white and blue hospital gown was awkward. The ties connected the front and back panels over his arms and shoulders and along his sides, so that the gown could be pulled down during surgery. He shrugged into the gown, fighting to get it straight, and she resisted the urge to help him. When he sat on the bed, he looked frail and awful, and his limbs were shaking. The dark circles under his eyes from his next-to-sleepless night didn't help the overall picture, either.

"I can do this, Meredith," he said, an unhappy grumble. "I can do this without drugs."

"Prove it to me," Meredith said. "And I'll shut up."

"I can't afford to backslide right now," he said. His teeth chattered with stress. "You're having the baby in—"

She pulled him into her arms. "You wouldn't backslide," she said. "We wouldn't let you."

"Damn it," he snapped. "I don't want alprazolam!"

She swallowed as he pulled away. He lay back on the bed, yanking the blanket over his bare legs and feet, and he closed his eyes. His breathing changed into the slow rhythm she'd learned to recognize. Breathe in for three. Breathe out for three.

She sighed, taking a moment to rip the plastic on the pristine package containing her clean scrubs and change while he cooled down. She put her things in the bin with Derek's junk. Then she sat down on the bed by his hip and grabbed his cold, trembling hand.

"I'm sorry," she said. She squeezed his palm. "I'm just worried about you. I love you, so I worry."

His eyelids opened partway, and he stared at her through his eyelashes. "I know. It's okay. I'm sorry I snapped." He sighed. "I'm tired."

"How can I help?" she said, stroking his thumb.

A small smile twitched at his lips. "Tell me why you vetoed Jamie. Is there a story, there?" He kept breathing. In and out and in and out.

"You'll laugh," Meredith said.

Derek's grin widened. "Well, laughing is better than panicking, isn't it?"

She rolled her eyes. "Fine. It's because he's one of my favorite characters in my favorite book series, and I can't imagine naming our son after a kilted highland warrior who I'd really like to find naked in my bathtub someday."

She was right. He laughed. It was a brilliant sound after such a tense night and such a tense morning. The sound lit up the silence around them like a bell. "Naked in your bathtub, really?" he said. And then he smirked. "I could be naked in your bathtub, later. If you'd like a substitute sans kilt."

She squeezed his hand. "I might take you up on that. Preferably after the sedatives wear off."
He snickered. "Wouldn't want me falling asleep on you, would we?"

"Wouldn't want you drowning," she countered. "That bathtub has already nearly claimed one of us."

Her mouth fell open when she realized what she'd said, but he took it in stride. Maybe, he wasn't as nervous as he looked, after all. He gave her a lazy smile. "Heaven forbid we add yet another near death experience to this family." He put the flat of his palm against her abdomen. Baby kicked, as if she could feel his hand, too. "I think we've met our quota."

Meredith stared at his hand. Family. Her eyes pricked. She really liked the sound of that. "Heaven forbid," she echoed, the words soft.

"So," he said once the silence had ripened. "I guess this means we can't name our son Wrath, either."

She laughed at him. He remembered the book she'd been reading while they'd been out on Lake Cushman. He'd been reading over her shoulder. They'd argued about one of the sex scenes and whether it was possible, which they'd later proven through experimentation that, yes, it was possible, but only because she was very freaking flexible.

"Definitely not," Meredith said. "And not Rhage, or Tohrment, or Zsadist, or Phury, either."

He snorted. "Seriously, Meredith, that series sounds awful."

"I don't read it for literary enlightenment," she replied, and he winked at her.

He was a chatty guy. She wasn't chatty, but he could come up with a conversation out of thin air, and with aplomb and little effort, he always managed to get her discussing nothing at all for minutes on end. She liked killing time with him.

You know you're my best friend, right? he'd said in the car on the way home from the hospital, what felt like an eternity ago.

She leaned down and kissed him. She was met with warmth, and she kind of wished they were still at home, in their bed, under the toasty covers.

"Okay, you two," Mark said as he pushed through the curtain, "break it up."

Meredith pulled back, brushing her lips with the back of her palm. "Hi, Mark," she said as she sat up straight.

"How's it going?" Mark said.

Derek shrugged. "It's going." His steady, even breathing continued between words.

"So, I have a serious question."

Meredith raised her eyebrows. "What is it?"

"Does a three month anniversary warrant a gift? What's the protocol? It's coming up, soon."

"I'm surprised you even remember the date," Derek said with a wry grin.

Mark rolled his eyes. "It's not hard to count three months out from Christmas, man."
"I don't think three month anniversaries are a thing," Meredith said. "Are they a thing?" She looked at Derek, who was far more romantically-oriented than she'd ever been. And then she blinked. Derek was the only man she'd ever spent three months with, come to think of it. Huh. Who'd have thunk? "If they're a thing, Derek totally forgot, so, I think he's a bad person to ask."

Derek snorted. "I'm pretty sure they're not a thing. But you could get Lexie something nice, anyway."

Mark nodded. "Like what?"

"I don't know," Derek said. "What does she like?"

Mark thought for a moment. "Sex."

Derek shared a glance with Meredith. Meredith fought not to snicker. Lexie? She liked all the gooey and romantic crap that Meredith only tolerated for Derek's sake. "Maybe," Meredith said, "you could take her out to dinner and, I don't know, talk. To find out what stuff she likes."

"Hmm," Mark said. "That's kind of good."

Derek nodded. "Sage advice," he said, lip twitching like he wanted to laugh.

The curtain rustled, and Dr. Clemens reappeared with the anesthesiologist in tow. The anesthesiologist was a willowy, quiet, black-haired man named Dr. Nguyen, who Meredith had met over the course of many surgeries. She liked him, but he was like her. Very not chatty. So, she'd never gotten to know him well. Dr. Clemens looked around at the three of them, but focused on Derek, who was smiling, and relaxed. Dr. Clemens nodded, and Dr. Nguyen pulled up a stool next to Derek's bed like a quiet wraith. Dr. Nguyen needed to set up the intravenous line, which was what they'd use to deliver sedatives once Derek was in the OR. Derek's gaze twitched to the needle as he held out his arm.

"How about Logan?" Meredith said. If she could just keep Derek distracted for a few more minutes, he'd be in the OR, and they'd be putting him under, and this would all be done. Once Derek was under, he'd be too out of it to care or worry. "Or Gabriel?"

"Oh," Mark said, "still talking names? How about Mark?"

"Meredith doesn't want to name the kid after anybody she knows," Derek said. He turned to Meredith, his attention drawn from the anesthesiologist. His expression didn't change as the needle broke skin. "I like Gabriel. That's a good one. Not Logan, though."

Meredith grinned. "Do you like Gabriel more or less than Adam?"

"More, I think," Derek said.

"Isn't Adam the cop?" Mark said. He turned to Derek. "You just said you don't want to name the kid after anybody Meredith knows."

Meredith shrugged. "Adam's not really family," she clarified.

Mark blinked. "I'm family?"

"Yes," she said. Him and Derek and Lexie and Cristina and Alex. All of them. Her family by choice. The best kind to have, she was convinced.
Before Mark could respond, Dr. Nguyen rolled his stool back, pulled off his gloves, and stood. "All set, Dr. Shepherd," he said, a low murmur. The intravenous line was done. The needle went into the back of Derek's left hand. Dr. Nguyen smiled and gave Derek a polite nod. "See you in a few minutes."

As soon as Dr. Nguyen left, the nurses came to move Derek to the OR. "I'll see you guys in a bit," Mark said. He banged his fist against the bed railing. "You'll be fine," he said to Derek. "I'll go shove people out of the gallery, now." Before he left, he turned to Meredith, and he gave her a bright smile that crinkled around his eyes just like Derek's did. "Thanks," Mark said.

She gave him a warm look as he departed. She turned back to Derek as the nurses pushed the bed out of the cubicle. She glanced down the hallway. They had a corner to turn, and then they'd be right by the doors to OR 1.

She waddled along side the bed, left hand resting on the bed railing. "Aaron?" she said. "What about that one?"

"I like Aaron, too," Derek said, looking up at the ceiling. He sounded... not as good as he had a few minutes earlier, but not panicky. Not upset, yet. "Blake?"

Meredith nodded. "Good one, but less good than Adam."

"How about Devon?" said one of the nurses.

"Or Jackson," the second chimed in.

"No, they were on the right track," the third said, shaking his head. "I vote Blake."

Derek grinned. "I think I like Gabriel the best so far."

They rounded the corner. "So," Meredith said, "we're at Gabriel or Adam for a boy?"

"Mmm," Derek said, as they wheeled him into the OR. "Maybe I'll think of something else while I'm out. I'll let you know when I wake up."

The air in the operating room was chilly, and Meredith shivered. She'd forgotten how cold they kept the operating rooms, or she would have brought an undershirt to wear under her scrubs. She looked longingly at the bin under Derek's bed, where her fleece sweatshirt resided. Not that she could use it in a sterile environment. Not that she could bend down that low without falling over and looking like an idiot. Not with Baby in the way. Oh, well. She glanced around. There was a stool set out right by the head of the operating table for her.

She didn't have to scrub in since she wouldn't be participating, just watching. She grabbed a surgical mask from the dispenser by the door and put it over her nose and mouth, watching as they had Derek shift off the bed and onto the table. He lay on his back and put his head on the rest. One of the nurses covered him up to his waist with a sterile blanket, and another put a nasal cannula over his face and clipped a pulse-ox monitor to his index finger. They rolled the bed away from the table, and Meredith sat down on the stool.

Dr. Clemens stood chatting with the anesthesiologist. Derek stared up at the lights. He swallowed. She leaned forward and pulled her fingers through his hair.

"Hey, I'm here," she said. "Right behind your head."

His gaze ticked backward, and he smiled at her. A weak smile, but a smile. "I'm good," he said. His temples danced as he clenched and unclenched his jaw. He clutched at the thin blanket they'd given him. "But I hope they knock me out soon." He looked back at the lights, and a sound loitered in his throat. A bad, scared, upset one. But he took a deep breath and blew it out and seemed to relax again.

"I'm right here," she said again. "What about Annabelle?"

"Oh," Derek said, "we're back to girls' names?" Still okay, but a little worse.

Meredith bit her lip and glanced at Dr. Clemens, who was still chatting with Dr. Nguyen. The rest of the people in the room were still in the process of setting up, and they didn't make a habit of knocking patients out for longer than was necessary, but... a few extra minutes of twilight sedation wasn't going to make much of a difference. Twilight sedation didn't have the same risk profile as general anesthesia did. She waved at Dr. Nguyen and Dr. Clemens.

"I like Annabelle," Derek said, oblivious. "But not as much as Anne."

Dr. Clemens seemed to get what she was waving for, even without being asked, which she was thankful for. He mumbled something at Dr. Nguyen, who nodded and came to the table. "I'll start the drip," he told Meredith in a soft, reassuring voice. She sighed with relief.

"Ready, Dr. Shepherd?" Dr. Nguyen said.

"Yes," Derek said tightly. Meredith stroked his hair.

"Okay," Dr. Nguyen said, reaching for the intravenous line. "Count backward from ten."

"Ten," Derek said. "Nine. Eight." His eyes went glassy. "Seven. Six." And then his jaw went slack, and his body loosened. He'd been clutching the blanket with a white-knuckled grip, but he let go, and his fists fell to the wayside by his hips, fingers unclenching during the short fall. She could almost imagine his plug being pulled or something. "Five," he said, but the word stuck like taffy in his mouth. He blinked, the motion long and slow and disoriented. He didn't finish counting. He looked around at the people bustling around the room a bit drunkenly, but he didn't close his eyes.

"Derek, can you hear me?" she said.

"Yeah...," he replied, but he sounded out of it. Like, way out of it. Like, in the ozone out of it. For a moment, a sharp, clear memory of him stoned on Percocet slammed into her mind's eye, but she pushed it away with a deep breath. That was not the same as this. That was not even in the same realm. And by the time he woke up enough to remember things, he wouldn't remember being high.

"Are you comfortable, Dr. Shepherd?" Dr. Nguyen said, looking down at them.

Derek squinted. "Mark is in the ceiling."

Meredith followed Derek's gaze. Mark was up in the gallery, sitting in the middle seat, arms folded over his chest. His biceps bulged, and he was eyeballing Dr. Clemens like the guy was a little field mouse and Mark was the big, strapping eagle, or something. She imagined he'd be down in the operating room in less than a heartbeat if he thought Dr. Clemens wasn't doing something up to snuff, but for now, he sat still, an oppressive barrier to keep onlookers away, the only one there in the entire three rows of chairs. When Meredith tipped her head to the side, she saw a brown head of hair through the little window in the doorway to the gallery. Lexie, she guessed. Lexie had wanted to help, too, but knew Derek didn't want this to be a production, so she hadn't said anything to him.

"Yeah, Mark's playing bouncer for you, remember?" Meredith said.
"Oh," Derek said, making it more than clear that he didn't remember one bit.

Meredith glanced at Dr. Nguyen. "Can you up the dosage a little?" she said. "He didn't want to be awake."

"If I go much more, it'll depress his respiratory system too much," Dr. Nguyen said. He looked at the intravenous drip and fiddled with it. "That's the max I'll allow without switching to a full oxygen mask. He'll probably fall asleep soon."

Meredith sighed. She'd seen enough people under this kind of sedation to know it was variable. Some people fell asleep. Some people stayed awake the whole time. Some people were too chatty, like drunks. Others went into zombie mode and didn't say much at all. Derek seemed like a minor version of awake, chatty drunk. Which she wasn't sure he'd appreciate if he had the faculties to care at the moment.

He blinked slowly, like his eyelids were glued to his lower eyelashes and weren't working right. He stared up at the lights. They seemed to be a trigger for him, from what she could tell. She hoped he was okay. He seemed okay. But who knew what he was thinking in this kind of impaired state?

The nurses put a sterile drape over his legs on top of the thermal blanket they'd given him, and then they set up a vertical drape by his clavicles that extended up about two feet. Enough to block his and her view of what was going on below his neck.

"What about Daphne?" he said, slurring a little.

"Daphne?" she said. Daphne was... She blinked. Daphne was pretty. And kind of unusual. She didn't know any Daphnes, not even by distant association. Daphne Shepherd-Grey had a great ring to it. Wow. And he'd come up with that stoned. "Do you know what it means?"

He didn't answer. He stared through his eyelashes at the lights overhead, blinking like his eyelids had weights taped to them. She wanted to grab his hand, but she wasn't situated in the right spot to do that. She settled for cupping his face. She slid her hand under the nasal cannula line, careful not to dislodge it, and she stroked his cheek.

"Laurel tree," one of the nurses said, eyes crinkling as she smiled behind her mask. "Or bay tree. It's from Greek mythology."

"I like it," Meredith said. She looked at him, her thumb brushing along his stubble. "Where'd you hear that one, Derek?"

"Oh, I dunno," he said, his tone so sing-song-y weird that she almost laughed at him. Almost.

"That's helpful, Derek, thanks," she said with a snort.

His gaze drifted back to her. "I'm sedated," he said seriously. "Gimmeabreak." He blinked, and blinked, and then his eyelids didn't come up a third time. His head tipped to the left into her hand, and he was out.

"There he goes," said Dr. Nguyen. "Sometimes, it takes a few minutes."

Meredith sighed. Good. This was good. She could ask Derek about the name later. He wouldn't remember any of this. And she didn't have to worry anymore if he was scared, just too impaired to express it. He was out, face slack, breaths thick and slow, and he looked peaceful. Relaxed. She pulled her fingers through his hair again. An hour and they'd be done, and Derek would be in recovery, and this whole freaking thing would be over.
Thank. God.

Meredith had never seen this kind of fat graft being done before, and for a few moments, curiosity burned enough for her to stand up and watch over the top of the vertical drape. The nurses undid the ties and pulled away his hospital gown, exposing his chest and lower abdomen, almost to the end of his happy trail. With bright OR lighting spotlighting his chest, Meredith could understand why the sternotomy scar bugged him.

She'd passed off what she'd seen when he'd been changing into his hospital gown as fluorescent lighting playing tricks, and that had made it a little worse than what she was seeing, now, but... She swallowed. She realized she'd only ever seen the scar in the bedroom. In the shower. In places that tended not to be well lit. Here, under the bright lights, the scar was raised and pink, and while his chest hair did disguise it, some, that was like saying black was slimming. Black was slimming, but it couldn't work miracles.

She closed her eyes, trying to imagine what the scar would look like sixty percent lighter after laser treatments. Mark had said sixty percent. Mark had promised Derek would like the results. She sighed and shook her head when she couldn't come up with a clear picture. Human imagination and percentages didn't mesh well.

When Dr. Clemens started collecting fat, she had to sit down behind the drape they'd set up and stop looking. Surgery wasn't fascinating to her when she couldn't compartmentalize, and this wasn't just some random body on the gurney, this was Derek. She saw Dr. Clemens cutting into Derek. And that was something she didn't want to watch anybody do. So, she settled on stroking his hair and letting herself space out to pass the time.

"Oh, no he didn't!" Lexie said with a gasp, staring at the television.

One chef had prepared a pea puree that had gone missing. Another chef had unexpectedly included a pea puree in his dish that nobody had seen him preparing, but he swore it was his. Nobody knew what to think.

Lexie grabbed a dainty pair of popcorn kernels, and they disappeared into her mouth. She passed the bowl to the right, down the conga line of residents loitering on the beat up couch in the living room. Meredith stared down at the yellow mixing bowl they'd converted into a popcorn repository. They – or rather, Cristina – had been refilling the bowl between each episode with a trip to the microwave. Meredith was so full of kicking Baby, though, she didn't think she could eat anymore right now. Frowning, she passed the bowl to the right.

Cristina grabbed it and shoveled a hulking handful into her mouth. "This show is remarkably cutthroat," she mumbled through the gob of kernels as she chewed noisily. "I like it."

Cristina glanced to her right. Alex didn't take the bowl. He reached and grabbed like a dump truck or something. He didn't comment on the show. He was reading. Some book. But the fact that he'd sat down on the couch to join them, even with Lexie there, made Meredith smile.

"Do you think he really stole the pea puree and served it as his own?" Lexie said, wide-eyed.

Cristina shrugged. "If he did, he's my idol."

Lexie rolled her eyes. "Yeah, I suppose he would be."

Alex was listening enough to snort with amusement. He flipped a page in his book.

Cristina passed the bowl back to Meredith, balancing it on Meredith's swollen belly a bit like they'd been granted a convenient, mid-couch table. Lexie grabbed it before Meredith could complain.

Meredith sighed, tipping her head back. The fluffy cushions supported her neck as she stared at the ceiling. She felt a tiny foot or arm or whatever like a punch, kind of like Baby was trying to pop Meredith's stomach open for a chance at some popcorn. She was freaking done with being pregnant. It had been a marvelous and novel experience for the first few months. The first time Baby had kicked, she'd been over the moon. The first time Derek had been able to feel the kicking with her, another over the moon moment. But, now, Baby was big enough that the "delightful" reminders that Meredith was growing another person felt like practice boxing matches. And after months of throwing up, and aches in places she didn't know could ache, and having her bladder shrink to the size of a walnut, and feeling like a bloated walrus, she was done. Her boobs felt like they were lying on a table all the time, and she couldn't reach her feet, and she was freaking done.

Less than two months, Meredith thought, squeezing her eyes shut. Six-ish weeks if she was lucky and Baby decided to arrive a bit early. Six-ish more weeks. Seven-ish for an on-time delivery. She could deal. She could, damn it. Except she wasn't a lucky person. Meredith Grey was not lucky. For the Meredith Grey who drowned and donated her liver and had her appendix burst and her husband almost die and had her happily-ever-after delayed by a leggy, fabulous, secret wife, Baby would come a year late. Meredith would be pregnant in elephant gestation time, and if she wasn't insane by delivery, Derek would have to take her to the hospital in a dump truck or something. She just knew it.

This would never end.

Lexie's eyes widened as she moved to pass the bowl back to Cristina. "Holy crap, was that a foot or something?"

Meredith frowned. "What?"

"Your stomach," Lexie said. "It just moved."

"Yeah," Cristina said. "Looked like an itty bitty little shark fin under your shirt."

Meredith glanced down at herself. She'd felt the kick, but hadn't been watching. She didn't have to wait long. Another one hit her insides like a drumbeat. Her shirt ruffled a little near her bellybutton like she had something crawling underneath it. "Yeah," Meredith said, glowering. She shifted. Please, please, stop, she thought. "A foot. Or an elbow. Or a leg. Or a head. I don't know. Baby's trying to run me into the ground, I think. She does this whenever I stop walking around."

"Maybe Baby likes Top Chef," Alex said.

Meredith tried to sit up straight, to lean forward, but her belly got in the way, and she ended up looking like a complete idiot. Alex seemed to get it, though. He put his book down to grab the remote from the coffee table. Top Chef flicked off in an instant, and the big flatscreen television snapped from colorful plates and dishes and overly dramatic chefs to a cool, silent black.

Meredith leaned back on the couch with a heavy sigh. "Thank you," she said, a grumble, and she closed her eyes again.

"No problem," Alex said. "You want anything from the kitchen?"

Meredith shook her head. She wanted Baby out is what she wanted. Out.

She swallowed. She wanted Baby out, except she really freaking didn't. Fear prickled, but she shut it down with clenched fingers and a grinding jaw. She wasn't going to be Ellis. She wouldn't let herself. And even if she ended up being the crappiest mom on the planet, Derek would be a perfect dad. She'd thought that from the beginning. Baby wouldn't be alone like Meredith had been.

She sighed as her thoughts drifted to Derek.

Derek had kissed her that morning before leaving. It was her day off, which had fallen on a Wednesday, and he had to work. The sky outside had been dark, and the air had been cold. He'd helped her sit up instead of watching her struggle with it, and she'd stumbled into the bathroom to relieve herself. Derek had been gone when she'd come back out. She'd crawled into bed, snuggling under the covers, shutting out the chill in the air, and slept until noon. The rest and relaxation had been glorious, but not enough. Never enough. She always felt freaking tired.

When she'd come down stairs, her hair scraggly and her face haggard, wearing her red bathrobe over yoga pants and a wrinkled t-shirt, Lexie had been on the couch watching the news while she munched on a bowl of Froot Loops. Alex had been out in the kitchen doodling on his laptop. He and Lexie had been keeping their distance from each other, well, as best they could while living in the same house. Cristina had barged in while Meredith was still sipping hopelessly on a warm cup of pointless decaf.

Somehow, their days off had all aligned. Somehow, everybody had seemed to understand Meredith didn't want to do much of anything today except sit there and wallow without talking for a while. Somehow, the scenario had evolved into an impromptu Top Chef marathon on the couch, despite only Meredith having watched it before.

Despite the pain and suffering, that had been nice. The little gathering. Meredith couldn't remember the last time they'd all just... hung out outside of work. Derek's situation had, for the better part of four months, swallowed her life like a phagocytic amoeba. Then, when he'd finally been well enough to stand on his own two feet, Baby had gotten more and more demanding with Meredith's energy. Her desire to socialize in her free time had collapsed like a dying star, and the time outside of work she didn't spend trying to catch up on sleep got spent with a solo friend, or with Derek. Not by his designs, but because he slept in the same bed as she did, and she went on trips like the one to New York over Thanksgiving with him, and because, as her boss, he was a lot better able to engineer his own schedule to be available at convenient times than Alex, Lexie, and Cristina were. Come to think of it, she suspected that this day with all her friends miraculously off work at the same time had somehow been his doing. He did what he could with the schedules.

Baby didn't stop kicking, even in the silence, even when Meredith squirmed and shifted, trying to alleviate whatever was irritating her little passenger. Meredith sighed. "I don't think it's Top Chef. I think she just hates me today."

Alex flipped the television back on, and the pea puree drama continued.

Another elbow in the bladder made her wince. That one had kind of hurt, and it was making her feel like she needed to pee, even though she didn't. Lexie was looking at Meredith with a half-curious, half-longing expression that Meredith had seen from too many obnoxious strangers to not know what it meant. Except, at least Lexie waited for permission. At least Lexie was family. In fact, Lexie wasn't even asking, despite her looking. She seemed to get that Meredith felt like crap.

"You can touch if you want," Meredith said with a sigh.

"You're sure?" Lexie said.

"Somebody should freaking enjoy it," Meredith grumbled. "I can't right now."

"You're sure?" Lexie said.

"Somebody should freaking enjoy it," Meredith grumbled. "I can't right now."
Lexie pressed her palm flat against Meredith's t-shirt. The warmth of Lexie's hand seeped through Meredith's shirt. Baby kicked again. Lexie had never done this before, and her eyes widened. "Oh, wow, that's so..." She looked at Meredith. "It's amazing."

Alex snorted. "Come on, you've felt a baby kick before. You've worked gynie."

Lexie glared. "Yes, genius, but none of them were my future niece!"

Meredith blinked. She hadn't really thought about that before. An unexpected smile curled at her lip. If someone had asked her ten years ago where she'd be right now, she didn't think she ever could have come up with married, pregnant, and somehow in possession of a sister, and a perfect extended family.

"Could be your nephew," Cristina remarked, interrupting Meredith's thoughts.

Lexie jabbed her thumb at Meredith. "She says it's a girl. I'm working with Mother's intuition until proven otherwise."

Samantha padded into the living room, through the dining room, from the kitchen, tail wagging. Meredith glanced at her. Damn it. She needed to go out. Meredith shifted. She didn't want to get up. Everything ached, and she just wanted to sit there on the couch and watch stupid shows about cooking with her friends, and never move again.

"I'll get it," Cristina said, and she popped up from the couch without preamble, setting the popcorn down on the coffee table. Alex paused the show while Cristina led Samantha back to the kitchen. Meredith heard the back door open and shut. Cristina came back in moments, sans dog. "She looked like she wanted to play for a bit, so I left her outside," she explained as she collapsed back onto the couch, which was fine. Samantha would let them know when she wanted to come back inside.

Meredith didn't have a chance to respond, however. She heard footsteps on the front walk. Keys jingled, and then metal ground in the lock. She glanced at the clock, realizing for the first time how late it had gotten. Crap. She hadn't told Derek about this impromptu gathering. She hadn't thought they'd still be there when he got home. She craned her neck to look toward the doorway.

Derek stepped inside the house. He looked pale. The cold outside had made his cheeks blush a ruddy red. That and his black wool duster were a sharp contrast with the lack of color elsewhere. His hair was disheveled and dark circles wrapped underneath his eyes. His crow's feet pinched with strain. He dropped his keys on the table by the door and started peeling off his gloves.

"Meredith?" he called, loud enough to carry, but not loud enough to wake her up if she'd been upstairs sleeping with the door shut.

"Hey," she chirped, still startled by his entrance.

Derek's head turned toward her voice. Toward the living room. He took one look at the couch, at Lexie and Meredith and Cristina and Alex, and he froze.

Crap. She'd been hoping this might not be bad.

Meredith bit her lip, staring at Derek apologetically. She wouldn't say sorry out loud, because that would just put him on the spot, and he'd hate that even more. After spending all day at work, the last thing he usually wanted was to hang around a bunch of people. And he didn't handle social surprises so well anymore.

"Hi, Derek," Lexie said, and from the worried look on her face, she seemed to understand the issue, too. She’d gone out of her way to understand. Ever since Derek had explained what the hell was going on back in September.

His jaw clenched. But he didn't say anything right away. He stood there in the archway, one glove on, one glove off, staring at them with an unreadable expression that made Meredith worry.

"I can go," Cristina said unexpectedly.

Meredith blinked with surprise, but then she remembered. Owen. Lexie had book smarts about what was going on, but Cristina had personal experience. Lots of it.

Derek swallowed, and he gave himself a little shake. "No, that's okay," he said, surprising Meredith even more, though his tone sounded... irritated. Derek pulled off his other glove, shrugged out of his coat, and moved to the closet, away from them. Lexie frowned, glancing at Meredith, but Meredith could only shrug mutely back at her. She had no idea what that meant.

He came back to the archway to peer at them all. For a minute, he didn't move.

Samantha whined to come in. Her claws scraped against the kitchen door. Derek twitched, the only indication he'd been startled, and he disappeared down the hall. Meredith heard him open the door, heard him say hello to the dog, and heard Samantha's rambunctious response to Dad returning, including licks and bouncing and a happy bark or two. She heard Derek's affectionate whispers, too, and that made her smile.

Everybody in the living room was staring at her with a questioning expression, dragging her out of her reverie. She shrugged. She didn't know what to tell them. He seemed fine with them here. Maybe, he didn't want to be in the room with them, but...

A few minutes later, Derek came back to the archway, Samantha leaning against his knee, tail wagging, and he looked like he was on a bit more of an even keel. Samantha trotted into the room and lay down on her favorite spot by the fireplace. His gaze traced the dog's path, but for a few moments, he didn't budge. She expected him to go upstairs after he'd surveyed the scene to his satisfaction. He tended to collapse after work, even when he wasn't beset by an unexpected social gathering.

But he surprised her.

He nodded like he'd come to a decision, and instead of retreating like she thought he would, he approached the couch. He paused once, several feet away, and he glanced at Lexie and Cristina and Alex in rapid succession, as if he were having trouble reconciling himself with his decision, but determination flooded his expression, and he overcame whatever had caused him to stop.

She looked up at him as he approached. "Hello," he said, eyes sparkling despite his earlier show of nerves, and he leaned down to kiss her. His lips pressed against hers, and she breathed him in. He tasted good. Like he'd just brushed his teeth or something. His body was tense like a tripwire, and his shoulders hunched, like he was trying to curl himself away from the people on either side of her, but he was there, and warm, and him, and she found herself relaxing despite herself.

"How are you?" he murmured against her skin. He nuzzled her throat like her mere presence sustained him. Maybe, it did.

She hadn't showered. She'd never brushed her teeth or face. Her hair was a yucky, ratty mess. She still wore the t-shirt and yoga pants that she'd slept in, though she'd tossed the bathrobe in a messy pile on the floor by the couch when she'd gotten hot. She ached everywhere, and she was a blimp.
Baby chose that moment to kick her bladder again, and she winced.

"Fine," she said, and he snorted like he knew she was lying, but he didn't press for a confession, either. He gave her shoulder a comforting squeeze and didn't bug her about it. "You're okay?" she added, her voice a bare whisper by his ear. She didn't think anybody else would hear.

He didn't really answer her. "I thought this might happen," he said instead, but he hadn't pressed her for details about her being "fine", so, she did him the same courtesy.

"The coinciding days off was you?" she said.

He shrugged. His gaze was warm, and he smiled at her, but he didn't say yes or no. He leaned by her ear again and murmured, "I told Dr. Clemens to cancel the w-plasty. You don't have to worry."

A lump formed in her throat. She used her arms to push up off the couch a few inches, and she kissed him. He gave her a wink and stood up. She expected him to leave, then, having imparted what he wanted to tell her, but he surprised her again when he strode across the floor and sank into his favorite chair, the big hulking thing he'd used to sleep in when he hadn't been able to make it through the night on his back. Though he was notably separating himself from the crowd, he was still opting to be a part of it, rather than fleeing to their bedroom. She couldn't remember the last time he'd hung around when she had a friend with her, let alone friends, plural, and her mouth fell open.

He didn't seem to notice how amazed she was. "What are you guys watching?" he said, glancing at the screen with caution. He didn't watch much anymore. Violence upset him. The news upset him. He watched documentaries on the History channel sometimes, but for the most part, he stayed away from the television, these days. She couldn't blame him.

"Top Chef," Lexie said. "It's a cooking competition."

Derek's eyebrows raised. "A cooking show?" And then he snorted. "You guys are watching a cooking show?"

"It's fun!" Lexie said.

"But none of you cook," he said.

"I cook!" Lexie protested.

He rolled his eyes. "You can cook," he amended. "But you don't."

"Dude," Alex said, "he's got you there."

"Shut up," Lexie said.

Cristina shrugged. "I just like watching them backstab each other."

Derek was laughing. He wasn't making noise about it, but his body shook, and he raised a palm to his lips to cover what she assumed was obnoxious sniggering. As he laughed, the tension in his frame seemed to seep out of him. Just a little.

"It's fun," Meredith grumbled. "I like watching what they make."

"I have to see this," he said.

"I'd get out, now, while you can," Alex said. "It's a bit addictive."
Meredith’s eyebrows shot up. “You’ve been watching?”

“It’s like when we fought over the sparkle pager, but with food,” he said.

Derek snorted and shook his head. “I have to see this,” he repeated.

Lexie grabbed the bowl of popcorn from the coffee table and walked it over to him, approaching with caution. He took the invasion into his personal space without so much as an eye twitch. “Is it buttered?” he said.

“No,” Lexie said.

“Salted?”

“Yes,” she said.

“No, thanks,” he said.

“I wish I had your willpower,” Lexie said with a sigh.

Derek laughed. “You don’t need it. You seem to have Meredith’s metabolism.”

Meredith rolled her eyes. “He called me a black hole, once.”

“Just a little one!” he responded, relaxing even more.

“Whatever.”

Lexie laughed, her expression glowing with delight. “You guys are so—”

“Say cute, and I hurt you,” Meredith replied.

Lexie bit her lip and shut up, but she didn’t look at all apologetic.

Alex un-paused the show as Lexie collapsed back onto the couch with the popcorn bowl in tow. The scandal with the pea puree continued. And that’s how Meredith ended up converting everybody, dog included, into Top Chef addicts.

“Dr. Grey,” Dr. Clemens whispered, snapping her out of it. “Dr. Grey, we’re all done.”

She blinked and squinted up at him. His eyes had crinkled, and his face had a healthy, happy blush to it. They were taking down the vertical sterile drape as she peered around. Derek had a square bandage taped underneath his left nipple, and another bandage lower on his abdomen, below his belly button and to the left. One of the nurses retied the ties on his gown. Derek still slept. She lifted her hands away from his face and stood. Her back complained, and she winced. Sitting on a stool for an hour with no lumbar support hadn’t done her any favors.

Meredith swallowed as she stretched. “So, how’d it go? I couldn’t watch.”

“Just fine,” Dr. Clemens said. “No problems.” He pointed to Derek. “The graft site will probably look a little angry for a few days, but you two should be able to see the improvement pretty quickly.” He cleared his throat and looked at her with warm eyes. “I hope it helps him.”

“Thank you,” she said. “Me, too.” She watched the nurses coordinate a one-two-three-heave and shift Derek back to the hospital bed he’d arrived in. They snapped the bed railings back into place and covered Derek with several fuzzy thermal blankets. “Really,” she said to Dr. Clemens as she pulled off her surgical mask, "Thank you. He's wanted to get this done for months."

Dr. Clemens gave her a nod, and she followed the nurses as they moved Derek to the recovery room. With the kind of sedation he'd been under, he'd probably be there for all of fifteen minutes – his eyelids were already fluttering a bit – but any sedation required at least a little post-op monitoring. They pushed Derek's bed into an empty bay in the recovery room, right by the nurses' station. Several other beds, each holding a groggy patient, filled the row along the wall.

Patients were coming back. Slowly but surely. The hospital was hardly bustling again, but the relentless advertising campaign and community outreach drives seemed to be helping.

Meredith pulled up a real chair with a real back and sat by the head of Derek's bed. The nurse at the station, an older woman with silver hair and a kind-hearted Carolyn-ish look waved to her and walked over to check Derek's vitals. She picked up Derek's wrist and took his pulse, nodding. She gave Meredith a warm smile and said in an unworried tone, "Everything looks fine." And then she moved back to her station. The clack of a keyboard added percussion to the tinny soft rock playing from an old FM radio on the desk.

Meredith reached over the railing to pick up Derek's hand. She squeezed his fingers. He squeezed back, just a little. So, he was already kind of awake. Kind of. "Hey," she said, her voice a low whisper, "you're all done, Derek."

He twitched. "Hmm," he said, a bare, groggy exhalation of noise.

He didn't move or say anything else for a few minutes, but this wasn't at all like waking up after general anesthesia, and she didn't stress. She held his hand, and she let him sleep off the drugs. They'd be going home, soon. An hour or so, probably.

The nurse came back. "Dr. Shepherd," the woman said, tone gentle and hushed. Ruby Smith, said her name tag. "Dr. Shepherd, it's time to wake up, now," she said.

He inhaled thickly and peered at them through barely-open eyes and sticky eyelashes. "M'awake," he croaked, squinting as he shifted. The sheets rustled.

"How do you feel?" Ruby said, picking up his wrist to take his pulse again.

He didn't answer, and Ruby and Meredith shared a grin. "Derek," Meredith said, shaking him a little. "Come on, time to wake up." The squinty, grumpy, why-are-you-torturing-me-I-want-to-sleep look he gave her made her want to laugh. "Derek, come on. Talk to the nurse, so we can go home."

"How do you feel?" Ruby repeated.

"Feel?" he echoed, looking confused.

"Yes," Ruby said. "Are you sick? Do you hurt?"

He cleared his throat, pulling his hand from Meredith's grasp to rub his eyes, but he didn't open them. He breathed thickly as he tried to get some words. "'m a bit sick," he managed.

Ruby nodded. "Anything else? Are you in any pain?"

"No," he rasped.

"Do you want something for nausea?"
He thought for a too-long moment. "No. 'S jus' a 'lil."

Ruby looked at Meredith and then smiled back at Derek. "Dr. Shepherd, I'm going to have you transferred back to your room, okay?"

He didn't answer, and Meredith suspected he'd fallen asleep again. She thought back to when he'd been on the ventilator after heart surgery. He'd woken up a lot, but never for more than a few minutes at a time, and he hadn't been able to talk to her because he'd had the endotracheal tube stuck down his throat. She'd take this, this sleepy-but-talking-and-ready-to-go-home-soon Derek, over just-been-shot Derek any day of the week. She brushed her palm against his chest. The hospital gown was soft, and his skin was warm through the cotton. If she pressed in just the right place, she could feel his heartbeat. She lingered with her index finger resting on the reassuring thump-thump-thump.

He slept through the transfer back to the cubicle where they'd started. After the nurses trundled the bed back into place between the curtains, one of them fiddled with the controller and forced Derek to sit up. Derek said something unintelligible as a tray table was brought to him and put over the bed over his lap. On the table was a paper plate with two graham crackers and a little dixie cup full of water beside it.

"All right, Dr. Shepherd," the head nurse said. "When your plate and cup are empty, and you can put on your clothes without help, I'll let you go home, but not a minute sooner. Okay?"

Derek still wasn't being super coherent. "Okay," Meredith said for him. "I'll see if I can get him to work on it."

The nurse smiled. "Take your time and call me if you need anything. I'll check back in a half hour or so to see how you're doing."

Derek blinked slowly at the tray in front of him. His eyelids slowly dipped to half-mast, and his head tilted forward with gathering momentum like he was falling asleep, but he caught himself, straightened, and blinked. And then he did it again. His face and lips were pale, making the dark circles under his eyes seem almost like bruises. If he was sick like he said, this might take a little longer than Meredith had estimated, but... he fumbled with the little cup of water and took a tiny sip. That was a good sign. He put the cup down, and his head did the tip thing again.

She laughed at him. She couldn't help it. He looked ridiculous, and he obviously wasn't ready to be conscious.

Her laugh must have caught his attention. He looked at Meredith for a heartbeat. Two. He rubbed his eyes and looked again, like she'd been out of focus before. "Hi," he croaked. His eyes were cloudy, a bit unfocused, the blue of his irises dull, like he wasn't all there, but his expression was about halfway toward his usual looking-at-Meredith face, where his gaze softened, and his eyes crinkled around the edges, and his lips quirked up the sides, and she could tell he loved her without him ever opening his mouth. Head tip.

Meredith grinned at him as he caught himself. "Hi. Are you doing okay?"

He looked at her. His answer arrived after a long commune with the atmosphere. "I feel... hungover," he said, though with his thick tongue the f in feel was an fff slide that lasted too long, and hungover sounded a bit more like hun gover. Head tip.

Meredith bit her lip, watching him. "I had Dr. Nguyen knock you out," she said. "Like out out. He gave you a bit more sedative than usual. I'm sorry. Was that okay?"
"Oh," Derek said. "Sure." From his mystified tone, she wasn't sure he was receiving with any sort of coherence, yet. Head tip.

He picked up a graham cracker and worked on it, taking small bites with a grimace that told her he was tasting something about as appetizing to him as plaster. He polished off the first cracker, but made a yuck-face at the second, and reached for the dixie cup instead. He picked that up and chugged it, and he sighed.

"Can I have more?" he rasped.

"Sure," she said, grabbing the cup. "I'll be right back."

She took the cup out to the hallway, filled it at the water fountain, and waddled back to his area. He'd lost a battle with a head tip while she was gone. He'd drooped over the tray, hand on the graham cracker plate, like he'd conked out in the process of reaching for the second cracker. When she sat down and put the cup in front of him, the squawk of her chair snapped him out of his doze.

He snuffled and blinked and sat up straight again, resuming like he'd never fallen asleep. He took the cup, newly filled, and chugged it as fast as he'd chugged the first one. He hadn't had any water or food since yesterday. She imagined his mouth felt like a desert, and the dixie cup was so freaking tiny. She doubted he'd made much of a dent in his thirst.

"One more?" he said.

"Why don't you let that settle for a bit?" Meredith suggested. He'd said he was sick, and she didn't want him to throw up. For one, she didn't want him to be sick. Period. But, for two, if he vomited, they'd never get out of here. Today was their only day off this week, and this recovery period would be far more pleasant for him and for her at home, in private, where he could sleep as much as he wanted without being poked and prodded, and she could watch television or something while he did that.

"Do you remember anything?" she said.

"About?" he said. He seemed a little more awake. The head tips were spreading out a bit.

"The surgery," Meredith said. "The OR. You weren't scared, were you?"

He squinted at her. And then he frowned. "Everything after nine is fuzzy." A long vvv. A long fff.

It took Meredith a moment to figure out what he meant, but when she did, she laughed. "You made it to five, you know," she said.

He made a weird noise that probably would have been a chuckle if his throat hadn't been so dry, and he'd been more awake. "I was scared," he said, "but not after nine." Head tip. Blink. "Thanks."

"You did it for me," she said, meeting his spacey gaze with a warm look. "It's only fair." She watched as he ate the second graham cracker with about as much enthusiasm as he'd eaten the first, but at least he'd emptied the plate. One step closer to home.

"How goofy was I?" he said.

She laughed. "Really, not too bad. You fell asleep after a few minutes." She didn't think it prudent to mention he was still very much ensconced in the land of goofy.

He rested with his eyes closed for a minute. This stuff had really laid him flat. She kind of regretted having asked Dr. Nguyen to increase the drip when Derek couldn't remember past nine anyway, but there wasn't much that could be done about it, now, except have Derek sleep it off. She stroked his hand. His fingers tightened around hers. "Feels good," he murmured without opening his eyes. His breaths were thick and even.

She let him sleep for a couple minutes. He twitched awake on his own when something loud rolled by in the hallway. Probably another patient coming back from the recovery room. The curtains around Derek's cubicle fluttered as the rumble receded into the distance.

"So, where'd you hear the name Daphne?" she said.

"What?" he said, blinking at her.

She smiled. "You suggested it during your goofy phase."

"Oh," he said. He shook his head. "I don't remember that. Umm." The umm wobbled in his throat and broke. He swallowed. He thought for a moment. "I'm really... fuzzy right now," he said. Head tip.

She squeezed his shoulder. "It's okay. We can talk about it later when you're a bit more with it. Do you think you're ready to change back into your clothes, so we can go home?" She imagined if she didn't prod him, he'd just sit there half asleep for another hour or seven.

He nodded and pushed back the covers. She helped him get the bed railing down. He pushed his knees to the edge of the bed and let his bare legs hang down. He contemplated the floor for what felt like eternity. Head tip. Then he slid off the mattress into a standing position, though he had most of his weight against the edge of the bed. Caught between his body and the mattress, the hospital gown rolled up on one side to his hip, and he stood there, exposed and blinking with a dull expression that said he wasn't aware of what his gown was doing. The curtains were closed, but a nurse might walk in at any moment, so she stood up and stepped in front of him. Just in case. She didn't want him to end up with another hospital horror story like his time at Seattle Presbyterian with pneumonia. That had been traumatic enough for a lifetime.

She put a hand on his shoulder to keep him steady. The nurse wanted him to be able to change without help, but she couldn't see the harm in assisting a little, not when he was going home with two experienced surgeons to watch him while he shook off the rest of these sedatives. After a minute against the mattress, he managed to straighten out and support his own weight. His gown fell down to his thighs.

He looked around, eyes glassy. "Where, um." He swallowed, a flummoxed look on his face. "Where are my clothes?"

She bit her lip, looking down at the bin underneath the bed. She really didn't think she could bend down to get those, and Derek was still acting a bit too drunk to try it himself. Crap. Whatever. She grabbed the bed railing with a death grip and bent at the knees to lower herself.

"What are you doing?" Derek asked, looking down at her. "I should... do that."

"No," Meredith said, wobbling. "No, you definitely should not."

Her center of balance was screwed up because of Baby, but at least she had all her mental faculties. She pawed at the bin and managed to yank it out from its little cubby without leaning forward. If she leaned forward, she suspected she'd topple. She grabbed the lip of the bin and lifted it up for him with one shaking arm. He took it and put it on the bed. She rested for a minute, and then she used the bed railing to hoist herself upright again. Derek tried to help, but he didn't have the wherewithal, yet, to take her weight, so, his hand under her arm was mostly just a companion in her ascendance, not an assistant.

Still, it was the thought that counted. "Thanks," she said.

He took out his boxers first, and with one hand on her shoulder to keep his balance, he managed to get them on by himself. He managed his threadbare jeans, too, though the fly confounded him, and she ended up fastening all the buttons for him. Socks and shoes, he saved for later. He untied the gown with graceless fingers and let it fall to the floor by his feet, stepping out of it with a precarious wobble that made her reach out to steady him. He reached for his t-shirt, but then he stopped. He looked down at himself. Saw the big square bandage with all the tape under the bulge of his left pectoral muscle.

He scraped at it with his nails and peeled the bandage down from the top to see what was underneath. Meredith bit her lip as he stared with half-lidded eyes. "Dr. Clemens said it wouldn't look that great for a few days." The scar itself looked worse than it had before. The area was inflamed, and angry red needle-sized dots covered the surface where the borrowed fat had been injected. She found herself wincing in sympathy. "I'm sure it will be fine by next week."

He touched the red area with his thumb, wincing. "Ow," he said.

"Well, don't poke at it," Meredith said. The wound was nothing serious, and Dr. Clemens had assured them that Derek wouldn't need more than prescription strength ibuprofen to deal with it, but, still, it was a wound. And men were stupid sometimes. Particularly half-comatose men. But then she noticed he was smiling. "What?"

He grabbed her hand and put her index finger on top of the wound. He winced as her skin touched his, and she wanted to pull away, but... "No crater anymore." He was right. She could feel little dents of broken flesh where the needle had pricked his skin, but her finger didn't sink into a big dip anymore. The space was soft and had give, just like normal skin, despite the redness. She couldn't feel his damaged rib underneath, either.

She smiled, looking up at him. "That's really great, Derek."

"Yeah," he said, grin widening. And then he laughed. Really laughed. The sound burgeoned in the air, beautiful and bold and happy. And he kissed her. "All gone." The transformation in him was...

mind boggling. Years melted off his face, years she'd gotten used to in the last ten months. The glassiness robbed his eyes of any of the usual twinkling, but she could imagine what he'd look like sober, and it warmed her heart.

He yawned so wide his jaw cracked, but he was happy, and that made this whole thing more than worth it.

After he felt Dr. Clemens's work to his satisfaction, he resealed the bandage against his irritated-looking skin and took a shambling step toward the curtain. She grabbed one of the empty belt loops on the back of his jeans and pulled him backward. He see-sawed and moved back a step, pliant.

"What?" he said, looking back at her, still grinning.

She looked pointedly at the clothes still on the bed. "Shirt? Shoes?"

"What about them?"
She sighed. "They're not on you."

He looked down at himself, smile dripping away. "Oh."

He stared at the pile on the mattress for a moment like it was a calculus problem, and then he took a shuffle step back to the bed.

"So, how's the weather up there?" she said.

He glanced at her with an uncomprehending look that made her want to hug him. He blinked. "I know you're... teasing," he said. About what, I have no fucking clue, he didn't add, though.

"I'm sorry," she said, unable to stop smiling. "I don't mean to tease, but you're cracking me up."

He met her smile with one of his own. God, she loved that smile. He gave her an easy shrug and said, "Glad I make you happy."

She gave him that hug she'd held onto. She kissed him. "You're cracking me up, and I love you," she said. Head tip. Right in her arms. His weight increased like an avalanche, but receded just as quickly when he caught himself, and she laughed. "Jeez, I tell you I love you, and you fall asleep?"

He steadied himself on her shoulder. "Sorry," he said, dazed.

Which only made her laugh again.

"I see how it is," he grumbled when he recovered. Without any twinkle-eyed cues, she wasn't sure if he was joking or not. But then he added, "Takin' advantage."

And she laughed some more.

It was the uptime, she thought. He couldn't do the head tip micro-nap things when he was standing on his own steam. And he was screeching past the point where the cloudiness that was causing the head tips could be ignored.

"We'll be home soon, and you can crash," she assured him.

"Okay," he said.

He put on his shirt. His shoes and socks were a challenge, but he managed in the end, with lopsided, pathetic looking bows at his laces, and two head tips between his left and right shoe as he sat on the edge of the mattress.

Processing him out was a matter of signing some papers, clipping off his bracelet with some scissors, and collecting a packet of home care pamphlets from the nurse. He leaned against the nurse's station, staring dully at the counter like his head was too heavy for his neck while Meredith handled things for him. After a head tip almost made him topple, she grabbed him a wheelchair to sit in while she finished up. And that was when she knew he was in outer space, because he sank into the chair like it was his personal chariot, with not one word of protest out of his mouth, not one, "Oh, come on, Mere, I can walk." Nothing.

A three minute nap in the chair refreshed him a bit, enough that he was having semi-coherent conversations by the time she'd wheeled him into to the elevator, and then to the front walk, beside which Mark was already waiting behind the wheel of Derek's idling Cayenne.

The rain had picked up again into sheets. Everything was gray and wet and cold, but Meredith couldn't stop grinning. Derek was hysterical, and he was happy with the results, and it was just a double shot of pure fun. Meredith opted to sit in the back seat with him, soaking up the humor, even though that made Mark look like a chauffeur, not a friend.

Derek slept in the car after three head tips turned with a thunk into his face pasted against the window. It wasn't so much the head tipping that made Meredith giggle. It was the way, when Derek blinked himself back awake, and he straightened up from his slump, that he acted like he didn't even realize he'd fallen asleep. When Mark came around to help Derek out of the car, Derek snapped out of his doze and grinned like he'd been grinning the whole way home and in no way had he been caught with his cheek smooshed into funny shapes against the window.

"Did you see?" he said as Mark wrapped Derek's arm over Mark's shoulder. Derek didn't seem to care or notice that his arm was being manipulated. "It's fixed."

"I saw from the gallery," Mark said, helping Derek wobble out of the car. "I'm glad it worked."

They walked like a pair of drunks, arm in arm, toward the door. Derek seemed fine with his own weight. Mark's presence provided sentient steering more than anything else. Meredith suspected if they let Derek decide where they should go, they'd end up in Mexico or something.

Samantha greeted them with enthusiasm, but seemed to understand if she jumped on her disoriented dad that he might fall over. She settled for licking his hand and wagging her little stump tail.

"Hi," Derek said, giving her an absent pat on the head. Her head bobbed with the impact of his hand when she received his graceless affection. But she didn't seem to care that Dad's petting sucked, just that he was petting her, and she made a face that reminded Meredith of a smile.

Samantha followed them up the steps.

The steps weren't the obstacle Meredith thought they might be, and Derek collapsed onto their bed with no encouragement. He landed face down on his pillow, already asleep, body draped like the bed had merely caught him on a trip to the floor. His feet dangled off the edge of the mattress.

"You can come up," Meredith told Samantha, and the dog jumped on the bed, shook her massive, stocky body, and collapsed with a happy whuff along Derek's right side.

Meredith pulled off his shoes and reached under his waist to unbutton his fly. She grunted at his dead weight, but with some exploration that not-conked Derek would have made a porny joke about, she managed to find all five buttons and pop them open without having to roll him over.
Then she yanked off his pants with a few strong tugs. He didn't wake. Not even for that. Mark moved Derek's feet onto the mattress.

"Jeez, this crap really wasted him," Meredith said, pulling the covers over dog and husband.

Mark grinned. "I kinda like it. He's so docile. And pose-able."

Meredith snorted. "Well, enjoy it while it lasts, then." She leaned over Derek and shook him.
"Derek? Derek, do you need anything before we go downstairs?" She pulled her fingers through his hair. "Derek?" A bit more prodding, and he swallowed, sort of awake. She shook him a little more. "Derek?"

"Wha?"

"Do you need anything before we go downstairs?"
"M'okay," he said thickly into the pillow. His eyes didn't open.

She leaned over and pressed her lips to his temple. "Sweet dreams, then."

"Mmm. You, too."

She shook her head, fighting not to laugh, and they left him to snooze off his impairment.

He slept six hours.

Around four-thirty, he thumped down the steps and padded into the kitchen, now awake enough to care that he was thirsty and starving, apparently. His hair stuck up in all directions like he'd plugged himself in, but his eyes seemed clear, and the brain behind his eyes seemed to be firing on all cylinders again. He greeted her and Mark with a smile that showed teeth, grabbed a bottled water from the fridge, and then went to the cabinet to grab something to eat. He moved with grace and didn't seem to be in any pain.

"Hey, man," Mark said. "Back from your trip?"

"What trip?" Derek croaked. And then he thought for a moment. He blushed. "Oh. Hah hah. Very funny."

Mark shrugged. "What?" he said. "It looked fun."

Derek unscrewed the cap on his water and chugged. And chugged. And chugged. The bottle crinkled, having been emptied in seconds, and he tossed the skeleton into the recycle bin by the counter. "If it was," Derek said, voice recovered, "I don't remember. I don't even remember coming home." He frowned and ran a hand through his wacky, sticking-up-everywhere hair. "I was in the OR, and then I woke up here with a big pile of snoring dog in my face."

Meredith snorted. "You were... uh... pretty comatose on your feet."

He made an amused sound deep in his throat. "Was I? I didn't do anything embarrassing, did I?"

"Oh, god, what?" he said.

"You tried to walk out into the hallway barefoot without your shirt on."

He blinked. "Seriously? I..." He blinked again. "I really don't remember anything."

"Best that you don't," Mark said.

For a moment, Derek looked worried, and Meredith laughed. "He's just teasing, Derek. You were fine. Funny, but fine."

"Funny, huh," he grumbled, but his eyes twinkled. And then he shrugged. "Well, I'm glad you got a laugh." He pressed his palm against his side, over where the bandage would be underneath his shirt. He swallowed. And then he looked at her. "It's all fixed," he said with a cracking, thick voice. Not cracking with upset. Just... too much feeling. "I looked before I came downstairs."

And her heart warmed all over again.

"I know," Meredith said, smiling at him. "I saw. I'm glad."
"Thanks," he said, meeting her eyes, unblinking. And then he turned to Mark. "Thanks. Seriously."

Mark smiled. "No problem."

Mark had a pile of MRI films laid out in front of him on the table like a fan of cards. He marked them up one at a time with a pen, and then shifted to his yellow steno notepad to jot notes. Rain splattered and splashed against the windowpanes, and something outside the house hit the back vinyl siding with a slap, slap, slap in the wet breeze. Meredith made a note to check that out later. When she felt like moving. Which would probably be never. The microwave hummed as Derek heated up some soup for himself, and then it dinged.

Derek sat down with his soup at the kitchen table with her and Mark. Tomato soup, it looked like, from the red color. Or something else, she thought, as she noticed little particles that looked like rice floating in the bowl. Steam wafted into the air from the dish, and her own stomach growled. She might have to make something similar for herself in a few minutes. Derek blew on his first spoonful and then slurped.

"So, do you remember Daphne, yet?" Meredith said.

"Oh, I like Daphne, if I get a vote," said Mark, not looking up from his paperwork. "Does family get a vote?" He said the word family like it was worth a zillion dollars to him, and she didn't miss the way his gaze softened.

"What?" Derek said after he swallowed, looking from Mark to Meredith.

"Daphne," she replied. "Where did you hear the name Daphne?" He frowned at her, and she rolled her eyes. "You suggested it while you were on Neptune." She looked at Mark. "And, yes, family gets a vote, but our vote trumps."

Mark grinned and nodded. "Good to know."

"I did?" Derek said, ignoring Mark. "I don't remember that."

She laughed. "And we've had this conversation before."

"I don't remember that, either," Derek said, blushing, but he winked at her and met her laugh with a chuckle of his own. "Daphne. Hmm." He ate another spoonful of soup. Rain pattered. "That's right. Adam's partner's girlfriend's name. She teaches at Wash U or something like that. I thought it was pretty when I heard it, but then I forgot all about it."

"Well, you remembered it in La La Land," Meredith said with a snicker. For once, drugs had done something good for them. "What do you think?"

"I like it," he said.

Mark gave them a thumbs up.

"More than Anne?" Meredith said. "I kinda like it more than Anne."

Derek thought for a long moment, and then he smiled an easy smile. "Yeah, I do."

"You could always make Anne the middle name," Mark suggested. "Daphne Anne Shepherd-Grey."
Meredith stared at him.

"What?" Mark said.

"Mark, that's freaking perfect!" Meredith said. She looked at Derek. "Right? It's perfect, right?"

Derek leaned forward, resting his chin on his elbows as he stared at her. His eyes sparkled. "Hmm," he purred. "Yeah. Yeah, it is."

"The initials don't form a bad word, either," Mark said. "I'd say you're golden."

"We still need a boys' name, though," Derek said. "Just in case."

"We both liked Gabriel and Adam," Meredith said. "Gabriel Adam?"

"No, no," Mark said, shaking his head with vehemence. "You can't do that. Tack on Shepherd, and it spells gas."

Meredith snorted. "Adam Gabriel?"

Mark nodded. "Much better."

"I like that, too," Derek said.

"Adam Gabriel Shepherd-Grey," Meredith said, and Derek nodded after a pause. "Adam Gabriel Shepherd-Grey, or Daphne Anne Shepherd-Grey." She leaned to kiss him. Derek met her with tomato-flavored lips. "I guess we're settled, then."

"Yes," Derek said with reverent murmur. "I guess we are."

The silence stretched for only moments.

"Hallelujah," Mark said, thumping the table with his fist so hard that Derek's bowl and spoon shook, and Meredith flinched. Mark gave them both a bright smile. "Seriously, I thought you guys would never fucking pick."
Derek wiped away a drop of sweat with the back of his palm before it dripped into his eye. He slicked back his hair, clawing the damp, curly strands out of his face. He groaned. And then he straightened out one cracking vertebra at a time, panting as he paused to let his body catch up with his current predicament. His shirt stuck to his spine and shoulder blades despite the cool air. His joints and muscles ached, and he was tired. Not just tired. Weary down to the bone marrow.

He squinted at the harsh shafts of sunlight striking the room through the windows. Samantha, who'd been doing the "grueling" work of supervising him, basked in the corner in the brightest spot, stretched out on her back with her fat paws dangling in the air, her limbs twitching, her little moans and bleats piercing the air as she dreamed. Shades, he thought, trying not to feel envious of the snoozing dog. Shades were one thing he and Meredith had not gone shopping for, yet. One thing they needed to bump to the top of the list, lest he go blind. At least, this last day in March, the room wasn't cooking, yet, even at noon.

Mountains of unopened boxes surrounded him. Shelving. His executive desk and his executive chair. A lamp. A recliner. But pretty much everything important enough to bring with him when he'd fled New York was still packed in the boxes. Awards. Framed diplomas. An assortment of articles and research projects. Photos and other old memories. All his books, from the mental exercise of Hemingway to the mental vacation of Robin Cook. The idea of sorting any of it made his head hurt. But at least his recliner, and his shelves, and his lamp, and his desk, and his big stupid chair were all in the right spots, now. All seven billion pounds of it. And if Meredith walked in, she'd see he'd done what she wanted him to do, and that he'd crossed off another item on her crazy list.

Blinking sluggishly, he let his watery, tired legs relax, and his knees unlock, and he slid to the floor with an enervated sigh. If his furniture was seven billion pounds, his body felt like ten billion.

He pressed his fingertips to the hypertrophic scar snaking along his skin underneath his damp t-shirt. His sternum didn't hurt at all, didn't even give him a hint of ache. But a little over ten months since he'd been shot, while he'd regained his physical strength, he still didn't have his former stamina back all the way, and he'd been pushing and pulling and dragging and lifting and carrying and chucking and arranging, and that was just from the move.

The day before yesterday, he'd slogged through a ten hour surgery. A meningioma. T6. A spinal tumor. He hadn't flown solo — he couldn't convince himself to cut without training wheels, yet — but he'd been the lead surgeon in the room, with Dr. Weller, the current Chief of Neurosurgery, only present in an assisting role. Well, more like co-leading than assisting. Bringing Dr. Weller along as an "assistant" was like calling Samantha a Chihuahua. Talk about the big guns. The man was a national superstar in his own right. But Dr. Weller had been going out of his way to drag Derek back into the OR as often as possible, ever since the cholecystectomy with Miranda. For consults. For assists. For anything neuro under the sun. Derek imagined Dr. Weller had seen the opportunity to get one of their best neurosurgeons back on normal rotation, and had grabbed onto it like a hyena snapping bone between his jaws. And Derek... was having fun again.

Derek closed his eyes and took a deep cleansing breath. Between that surgery, dealing with the moving van the next day, unpacking and arranging today, very little sleep either night, a few grueling hours with Dr. Wyatt, and the snowballing urge to fix... whatever the hell was wrong with Meredith, well, he was running on fumes. And something was wrong with Meredith. He just didn't know what.
She'd tolerated a few shoulder rubs and some kisses from him, back when the morning had been younger, but as the clock churned onward, she'd started to bristle whenever he came near her, and then she'd finally exiled him.

She'd moved into the dining room. The doors to the china closet had hung open. Torn open but untouched boxes full of dishes and other things, all in disarray, had surrounded the closet like soldiers in a siege, but the closet itself had shown signs of order that had never been present in Meredith's old house. She'd unpacked the wine glasses in even columns of two, not a single item out of alignment, not a single fingerprint on any glass, each glass tipped upside down to prevent dust from collecting inside them. Their fancy cloth napkins had sat in a pristine stack twelve high, all sharp edges and neatness.

She'd sat at their new dining room table with the silver spread out in front of her, and a little bottle of polish resting to her right. She'd scrubbed each utensil with a washcloth, the motions so violent her whole body had shaken as she'd worked. She'd paused to peer at the fork she'd rubbed so clean it sparkled, and her hawk-like focus had made him think she thought she was looking at impending bomb explosion, and she didn't know what color wire to cut. But then she'd gone back to scrubbing. He'd wanted to tell her that the china closet didn't fucking matter right then, albeit in a more gentle way, but she hadn't even let him get that far.

_Are you okay?_ he'd said.

And she'd said, _Stop worrying about me. We have to get it done! We have to!_

_Meredith,_ he'd tried to assure her. _We're fine. We'll get it done. Just brea—_

_Don't tell me to breathe!_ she'd snapped, her tone slipping into something panicky and shrill. And then she'd gritted her teeth, and she'd taken a breath and let it out, much like he did when he got upset. She'd added in a more reasonable voice, _Go fix up your office or something. That's still on the list, right? That's really important! If you take paternity leave, you're going to want somewhere to work from home._

The beauty of paternity leave was that there'd be time to fix his office _then,_ he'd thought. It didn't need to be done right the hell now. Just like the china closet didn't have to be done right the hell now, either. _Meredi—_ he'd tried to say.

But she'd given him a gentle shove. _Go away, Derek!_ she'd said. _Fix your office!_

Needless to say, he'd gotten the message.

He sighed. His head thunked against his desk, suddenly feeling too heavy for his neck. He _loved_ her. His Meredith. But she was driving him to complete fucking distraction. The level of freaking out seemed to be increasing exponentially, and he wasn't sure he'd be able to keep up if whatever this was kept getting worse. An exponential increase from "already panicking" over the course of two weeks was...

Jesus.

Two weeks. April 13th or somewhere thereabouts. He'd been in pain, still, and they'd been having sex infrequently enough in July that they had the advantage of knowing the time of conception down to the minute, so the due date was likely to be quite accurate.

A little zing ran through him, enough to subdue the constant ping of his nerves. The _oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I—_ don’t-know quieted. Just for a moment. And despite his exhaustion, his lips turned up in a quivering smile.

Two weeks.

Just two.

You'd make such a perfect dad, she’d told him when he’d been dying.

"I hope so," he said to nobody, and he let his eyes drift shut, trying to recoup enough energy, he hoped, to feel like standing up sometime before Meredith went into labor. Sometime before the next panic.

God, he hoped this was just a temporary thing. Like, maybe, somebody had spiked her decaf coffee. Or something.

He could hear everybody talking out in the main body of the house. Not the words. Just the cadences. A pulse of life. Cristina and Lexie and Alex, who were all helping to get the house in order in time for the birth. Even Owen had tagged along to offer support. The only people he couldn’t hear were Meredith and Mark. Mark wasn’t here, yet. Meredith... Maybe, she’d finally taken a damned break.

His eyelids dipped. His head tipped to the side. He listened to them murmuring. His family. And then his perception of the sunny room and the distant voices faded.

"Push on three, two, one," Owen said, "Go." And then Derek, Alex, Lexie, and Owen all lifted together. Derek’s muscles shook, and he couldn’t curtail a groan. The sofa was a massive sectional that they had to lift instead of drag to avoid scraping the hardwood floors, and even with all four of them, it was fucking heavy.

They’d left the old, worn couch in Meredith’s living room for Lexie and Alex to keep, since it was too small for the new, much larger living room. Meredith had chosen a brand new living room set last weekend on her day off to fill their new what-felt-like-endless empty space. Derek hadn’t been there to help pick it out, but if she was happy, he was happy.

That was pretty much the name of the game as they counted down to delivery day, as far as he was concerned.

Keeping her happy. Or, at least not upset.

Except she was acting progressively more irrational, and the effort required in staving the crazy seemed to be snowballing. Especially today. She was just weird today.

Derek stepped back, panting. He wiped the sweat from his brow. His eyes stung with sweat salt, and he rubbed them. The salt sting abated, but the relentless, tired ache throbbing behind them did not. He squinted to check their furniture placement. Damn it. They were a bit off. The edges of the couch didn’t line up with the geometry of the room. "I think," he said, trying to catch his breath, "one foot... back... to the left."

Everybody nodded, and the process repeated with stoic resolve. "Three, two, one," Alex counted. "Go."

When the couch landed with a thump, Lexie sighed with relief. "Please, say it’s fixed, now. Please. I can’t feel my arms."
Derek couldn't blame her. This. This was misery, and Mark-the-never-injured-weight-lifter was missing in action. No, their roster consisted only of Owen-the-formerly-shot-in-the-shoulder, Derek-the-formerly-shot-in-the-chest, Alex-the-also-formerly-shot-in-the-chest, and Lexie, who could maybe lift a big bag of dog food, but not a thousand pounds of furniture.

Derek gazed at the couch. It looked fine to him, now. The lines of the room versus the sofa didn't make his eye for neatness twitch. He looked around at the entire ensemble. They'd managed to get the sectional, Derek's giant chair, the entertainment center, the coffee table, the lamps, the big flat screen television, and all the other odds and ends arranged. It had taken over an hour just to do the one room. They still had piles and piles of untouched boxes full of books, knick knacks, DVDs, blu-rays, VHS tapes, LPs, CDs and whatever other media, but the big stuff was done. He hoped.

"Hold on," Derek said. "Time to check with the boss."

"Okay," Lexie said, the word faint and breathy, and she and Alex collapsed onto the sofa they'd just hoisted into place. Owen seemed to be the only one in half-decent shape.

Derek left them to their recuperative breather and plodded tiredly to the kitchen, where Meredith and Cristina had decided to focus their efforts. Cristina stood at one of the drawers, filling up the utensil tray with shiny forks. Meredith absently held her belly with one hand while she shuffled things around in one of the cabinets with the other. The sun lit up her hair like spun gold, and he stood for a moment, silent, watching her in profile. The moments passed, and he looked, unobstructed. He liked to look.

"I don't know how we're going to do all of this in two weeks," Meredith said. "I just don't—"

"Calm down," Cristina said without looking up from her task. "Breathe." She finished the forks and moved on to the spoons, laying them down in the tray at a rapid clink, clink, clink pace that almost sounded like some sort of percussion instrument. "Stop thinking about everything, and just worry about the box you're on."

"Did you get the utensils done?" Meredith said.

Cristina rolled her eyes. "I'm doing them, now, Mere."

"Did you clean out the utensil tray before you started that?"

Cristina stopped. Looked down. Sighed. Took a deep breath. "No."

"You really need to do that."

"Meredith!" Cristina snapped. "Nobody cares if there's a few crumbs in the tray right now. We can get to the nitty gritty later."

"Cristina... this is important."

"Fine," Cristina said with a put upon sigh. She started taking the spoons and the forks back out of the drawer. "Fine, I'll clean out the stupid tray." She looked up and glared at Meredith's back. "Is there a specific cleaning solution you'd like me to use?"

"Hello," Derek said in a careful, neutral tone as he stepped into the bright room, interrupting before this discussion could devolve into a fight. Cristina only spared him a miffed glance before returning to work. Meredith offered a real smile, though, and he smiled back at her.

With the designer's help, they'd chosen a mix of olive, white, and cream shades to paint the walls and cabinets. Wallpaper with button-sized, bright-colored flowers on it covered the wall near the backdoor. The kitchen, den, and breakfast nook resided in one room. A large, black-granite center island separated the kitchen from the den. They had tons of space. Stainless steel appliances. Skylights and high ceilings made the room bright and airy. The den and breakfast nook parts of the room were almost wall-to-wall windows, and he could see for miles into rolling hills and endless green. He tried not to pay attention to the fact that the furniture in the den was still a disorganized, heavy mess that he'd have to be luggering around sometime soon.

He sidled behind Meredith, lining up against her back, but he didn't try to kiss her or hug her. Or anything too affectionate. He grasped her shoulders and massaged them, testing the waters. She let him do that without comment.

He frowned, looking over her shoulder at her work. She was unpacking the spices in alphabetical order. Everything was in neat, impeccable rows. In the old house, the spices had been in a haphazard jumble in the cabinet until he'd ended up loosely organizing them to prevent cooking from becoming an expedition.

He pressed into her trapezius muscles. Her fingers loosened, and she dropped the little bottle of fennel she'd picked up. She leaned her weight back into him.

"Are you okay?" Derek said, a soft murmur beside her ear as he rubbed her.

Meredith sighed. "There's so much stuff to unpack," she said. "I don't know how we're going to get all of this done."

"All the more reason to just stuff things where they go and move on," Cristina quipped. She wiped the utensil tray with a paper towel and an evil eye. He glanced at the six boxes piled up beside her near the countertop, and then shifted his gaze. Meredith had one box. Just one.

"Don't stress," Derek said. "Really. I'll sort it out later when I need to cook something."

He kissed Meredith on the cheek, and a deep moan loitered in the back of her throat. Today seemed like it might be an "affection allowed" day, which was nice. Ever since she'd hit month eight, she had days where she just didn't want him touching her. At all.

"Can you come look at the living room?" Derek said in a low tone, trying to keep her relaxed. "You can see if you like it."

Meredith nodded and turned to face him. A frown creased her features. "You're all sweaty." Her nose crinkled. "And ick."

"You mean he doesn't always smell like clouds, chocolate, and sex panther?" Cristina snarked. Meredith snorted and looked at her person. "You, be quiet." Then she turned back to Derek. "You should take a break."

Derek pulled his fingers through his damp hair. "I will, but I want to get the furniture done, first. If I stop, now, I might not be able to start again."

She nodded. "Okay. Just... don't push too much." She stepped toward the hallway. "Let's go see."

She headed back to the living room. He and Cristina tagged along behind. Alex and Lexie still lay draped across the cushions of the sectional. Owen had gone to sit out on the deck for an outdoor breather.
Meredith circled the couch and peered around at the room. "It looks... fine." She bit her lip. "Does it look fine?"

"I think so," Derek said. "That's why I'm asking you."

"Did you take Feng Shui into account?" Cristina said. "Energy flow? You wouldn't want the baby to grow up in bad juju, would you?"

Meredith blinked. "Seriously?"

Cristina rolled her eyes. "No, Meredith. I was mocking. That's what I do. I mock."

"Oh," Meredith said. Except she kept staring at the room. She folded her arms and paced, peering at the couch and the coffee table with particular concerned interest. Then she sighed, deflating. "Maybe, we should change it."

Alex groaned and rolled off the couch. "Thanks, Cristina."

"No," Lexie whined. "No, it looks great. It's got great Feng Schwoo flow."

"I'm sorry!" Meredith said. "I'm sorry, it's just... she said that, and now I can't un-see it."

"Seriously?" Cristina said. "Do you even know Feng Shui? What is there to un-see?"

"No, but it all looks wrong, now!" Meredith said. She shifted from foot to foot. Her eyes reddened. "I'm sorry. I don't mean to make you guys work so hard, but I really want it to be perfect." She inhaled. A quick, quiet little gasp. And then another. "I just don't know how we're going to get this done in time. There's so much. There's just so—"

"Shh," Derek said, interrupting her descent into panic. He stepped close to rub her shoulders again, despite the fact that, inside, he was screaming. Jesus, he hoped she didn't do this for every room. He loved her, and he wanted things to be perfect for her, and he didn't want her to panic, but... he didn't think he could do this if Mark didn't show. The idea of lifting that damned sectional again made his gut quail, and his head throb, and it looked like Lexie would drop out from exhaustion any moment. While she couldn't lift much, she did help a little.

"I'm sorry," Meredith said. "It just looks wrong, now, and—"

He took a deep breath, praying for fortitude. "We'll get it done," he said. "Just tell me where you want things, and we'll fix it."

"Oh, for crap's sake," Cristina said. She glared, and she grumbled, but she did help with the new arrangement she'd inadvertently foisted on them.

The sharp, piercing ring of his cellular phone yanked him out of sleep. His eyelids stuck. His throat had gone dry. He blinked, wiping his face, and squinted at his watch. He'd been conked out for an hour. Just long enough to make himself more tired because of how shitty being yanked out of deep slumber felt. He needed some honest-to-god sleep. In a bed. And now his kinked back and neck hurt in addition to everything else. Fuck.

He struggled to get the phone out of his jeans pocket. Between the fuzz in his head and the throbbing ache behind his eyeballs, he didn't look at caller id. Maybe, it was Mark, calling to explain why the hell he was missing out on the glorious "fun" of moving all the fucking furniture.

"Hello?" he croaked. Fuck, he sounded awful. Even to his own ears. He cleared his throat. "Hello?"
he said in a more reasonable voice.

Silence on the other end of the line. But someone was there. He could hear breathing.

Derek pulled the phone back and squinted at it, but getting his eyes to focus was useless. He rubbed his stubble-covered face and leaned back against the desk, giving up on keeping his eyelids propped up. Gravity took them down to his cheeks in nanoseconds. "Hello?" he repeated. "Who is this?"

"Um...," said a tiny, familiar voice. "Hi. Is this... is this a bad time? You sound..."

"Abby?" he said, unable to stop his jaw from toppling open. He hadn't spoken to Abby since... Thanksgiving. She'd taken the news of his addiction less than well, and they hadn't parted on the best terms. He'd thought about calling her, but after a few long talks with Dr. Wyatt about it, he'd opted to give her space. To let her come to him when she was ready, if she ever was. "Hi!" he blurted, unable to mask his surprise. "No, this isn't a bad time. It's never a bad time. You can call me any time. I was just..." He swallowed. He opted for honesty. The fact that she now perceived him as a lying bastard is what had gotten them into this... rockiness. That and the fact that he'd let himself get into this mess in the first place. "I fell asleep at my desk." Well, he thought, peering wryly at his uncomfortable back rest, next to his desk, at least.

"Oh," she said, and then she added tensely, "Why are you tired?"

He frowned. "We just moved into the new house. I've been moving lots of heavy things."

"Oh," she said again.

Silence stretched. He rubbed his eyes. "Did you want to talk about something in particular?" he said.

He sat on his metaphorical hands to keep from saying more. No matter how awkward this was, he refused to push her. PTSD had offered him a crash course in perspective about what it felt like trying to keep up with the expectations of people who thought he wasn't healing fast enough. He'd tried so hard to act normal when he'd visited his family over Thanksgiving, and failing before he'd gotten off the welcome mat, and then seeing the looks on their faces when he'd crashed and burned... Awful. He never wanted to make another person feel like that. Ever. And the fact that he'd done it to Meredith, pushing her for a commitment she couldn't offer because of the negative headspace she'd been in, well, in retrospect, even years later, that felt like shit.

"Abby?" he said, the word soft.

He gazed at the dust motes dancing in the sunlight. Samantha had moved while he'd been asleep, and he reached left to stroke her with his free hand. Abby still didn't say anything, and his mind raced. He didn't want her to hang up. If he could just... draw her out a little. Not push her. Just... encourage?

"I resected a T6 meningioma two days ago," he said. "It was... exhilarating. Being back in the OR for such a big procedure." Exhilarating. And terrifying. And fun. And if this were any other day, if they'd been on good terms, he probably would have offered to let her scrub in the next time she visited. He'd let her scrub in on various procedures back when he'd lived in Manhattan. Because he was the awesome uncle, and she had her eyes on medical school. On neurosurgery. An interest he was happy to foster.

But that would definitely be pushing. Well, bribing. Same effect. Pulling her somewhere she wasn't necessarily ready to go. So, he kept his fucking mouth shut.

He heard her swallow. "You haven't been cutting?" she said.

"Not for a long time. I jumped into a cholecystectomy about two months ago. That was my first since before I was shot."

"Isn't that... a gallbladder removal?"

He felt a stab of pride. Not many people her age knew the technical name of the procedure. "Yes," he said. "That's right."

"What...?"

He sighed. "I didn't want to start with a neuro procedure. It'd been more than seven months since I'd done anything in the OR, and neuro procedures have a really high risk profile."

"But... why?"

She wasn't being articulate about it, but he could guess what she was driving at. She hadn't seen the worst of it. The panic attack on the welcome mat at his mother's house. She'd arrived after that. After he'd gotten his head straightened out with a timeout in the kitchen with Meredith and then a heart-to-heart with Rachel. And it occurred to him, then, that despite her being apprised of "the rules," like no touching him by surprise, no loud noises in his vicinity, maybe, she hadn't grasped how bad things had been for him.

"Abby," he said, "I've been sick. Too sick to cut. I know I looked fine on the outside, but I was ill. Something in my brain got broken. I'm still... not quite right. I might not ever be back to the way I was before." The curse of brain injuries and mental illnesses. No wounds to see, but catastrophic damage all the same.

"I know, but..." Her voice cracked. She sighed. And sniffed. And she was quiet for a long, long time.

"Abby, please talk to me," he said as he pet the dog. "Please, I'm here. I miss talking to you. I miss hearing what my favorite niece is up to." And then he clamped his mouth shut. Damn it. Fuck, fuck, fuck. He'd promised himself he wasn't going to pressure her. Except that's what he'd just done. Pressured her. He closed his eyes. He was fucking tired, and that frayed his resolve.

She laughed. Just a little. "We're all your favorite. You say that to everybody."

He smiled. "Well, sure, but it's still true." He loved all of them to bits. "It's like ice cream. You can have more than one favorite flavor. In fact, it's impossible not to. I love coffee-flavored, but I've grown rather partial to strawberry since I met Meredith, for instance."

Another small snort of laughter. A teensy one. He let the silence ripen as she rested on that happier note.

"You're my favorite uncle," she said in a soft voice, and he stilled. He didn't think she had multiples of those like he did with nieces. And he hadn't thought she still regarded him that highly.

God, he hoped he didn't fuck this up. "Tell me why you called," he said in a gentle tone. "Is something wrong?"

"No. Well, yes. Well." She sniffed again. "I'm, umm. I'm taking... abnormal psychology. This "Okay," he said, frowning. "Did you need help on an assignment or something?" Though, why she would call him for assistance with a psych class, he didn't know, not when she had a psychiatrist for a mother. Not that he wouldn't help her. Hell, he'd break his back to help. He'd taken psych classes in college. The knowledge was still in his brain somewhere.

"No," she said. "I just..."

"Yes?" he prodded.

And then she broke. Like a dam. And everything gushed loose at once. "I was reading for an assignment. Just now. Reading. There's a section on addiction in the textbook right after the chapter I was supposed to be looking at, and I read that. And then on a whim, I looked at the index, and I noticed a chapter on post-traumatic stress. So, I read that, too. I just finished. And I wanted... to call. I don't know. I'm being stupid."

"It's not stupid to be curious, Abby," he said. "And it's not stupid to care."

"You said I could ask you questions," she said.

"Yes, I did," he said. The silence stretched, and so he added, "You can. Anything. If it's something I can answer, I will."

She sniffed. "Do you... see things?" she said, the words a bare whisper he could barely hear. "The book said... that you might see things."

He blinked. "You mean like... flashbacks? Or hallucinations?" Or both?

"Stuff where you can't tell it's not real," she clarified. She was crying. In his ear. Crying.

His heart squeezed. He hated that his situation had caused this.

Honesty, he thought, thinking. Opt for honesty.

He hadn't had a hypnagogic or hypnopompic hallucination since... November. Five months. He didn't miss those one bit. Falling asleep to Gary Clark prowling in circles around the bed. Waking up to a gun shoved in his face.

But he did still have flashbacks.

Every once in a while, on days where he was bone tired like he was now, and he had no fortitude to brace himself against triggers, something noisy would set him off, and then he would have Gary Clark pointing a gun at him, an echo of the catwalk, or he would be in the OR, dying, both images so real, so terrifying, the experience made Derek lose his wits until the memory faded moments later. But that was rare, now. Very rare. And when it happened, it only lasted a matter of seconds.

"I have flashbacks," he said. "They're mostly gone, now, but... sometimes."

"But you did," she said. "Have hallucinations."

"I did," he said.

A long pause. "What were they like?"

He swallowed. "Well, I..." His voice trailed away.
He wanted to be honest, but he also had no idea how to describe them to her, the way reality bled into the unreal like an abstract painting, and he couldn’t tell which was which, even when, logically speaking, Gary Clark with a gun, threatening Derek, growling horrible things like, I'll splatter you like a ripe tomato, should be a dead ringer for the not real category, given that Gary Clark was fucking dead. The disorientation of having what should be a no-brainer turn into a situation where he had no idea it wasn’t real, and he was so scared he lost control of his bladder... terrifying. Embarrassing. Indescribable. He wouldn’t wish that kind of fear on anybody except Gary Clark himself, and Derek did, still. Wish. Even though it was futile.

At least he’d gotten to the point where wishing for that wasn’t claiming his life, though. It was a small thing. Fleeting, idle thoughts on a rare day in a rare moment. That and thinking about taking Percocet. A small dollop on his plate, just like Amelia had said the wanting would end up being, if he were to give it some time.

Abby sighed. "I'm sorry," she said. "You don't have to talk about this. I'm prying."

He shook his head. "You're not prying. I'm just... not sure what to say."

"Talking about this doesn't... upset you? Does it? I didn't mean to upset you."

"Abby, I'm fine," he assured her. "I'm not glass anymore. I just..." He sighed. "Yes. Talking about that upsets me. I'd rather not."

Another long silence.

"I can try if you really need me to," he said, feeling helpless. God, he didn't want to fuck this up.

"No," she whispered. "Don't. If it's that bad, I don't want to know."

He licked his lips. "Okay," he said, the word a soft murmur. He clutched his phone until his knuckles hurt. She didn't say a word. "Do you have... other questions?" he prodded.

The phone rustled as she shook her head. Or nodded. He didn't fucking know.

"Abby?"

"I'm sorry," Abby said, grief-stricken. "I'm sorry this happened to you. And I'm sorry if... I made it worse. I'm sorry," She inhaled sharply. "I didn't read the chapter until today, and—"

"Abby," he said, interrupting her. "Abby, Abby, shh. You didn't make anything worse. And I'm okay, now. 99% of the time, I'm fine."

"But you've been sick," she said. "You've been really sick. And I basically told you to get bent for something that wasn't even your fault. Not really. I was horrible to you."

His eyes pricked. He pinched the bridge of his nose. "You weren't horrible, Abby. Really, you weren't." She was a young woman, not even the legal drinking age, who'd grown up sheltered. She hadn't been prepared for a jarring yank into full-blown adulthood, yet. And, while her reaction had hurt, he was mature enough to understand her anger, at least. "And the addiction was my fault. It was my choice to take pills, Abby. A bad choice, but entirely mine. Nothing forced me."

"But you never would have done that before," she countered. "Never. Not until you were hurt."

He sighed. It was hard to say what one would never do. A lot of nevers could become conditional sometimes, given the right kind and amount of ammunition, though he liked to hope she was right.
Watching Amelia self-destruct before his eyes despite his efforts to curtail her was a gigantic deterrent. He could still hear the whine of the heart monitor as she crashed. Right in front of him. And the fact that that could have been him, right in front of Meredith, was chilling reality.

Somebody said something in the background. A quiet, feminine hum of words over static. "Crap, my roommate's back," Abby said in a rush. "I have to go."

"That's okay," he said.

"I love you," she said, and the connection went dead before he could reply in kind.

He stared at his phone for a long time. A weight lifted, and a lump formed in his throat. Things weren't fixed with one phone call, but she'd called, and that meant the world to him. She sounded like she was coming to terms with things. With him. Sounded like she wasn't angry anymore. Hurting and full of questions, but not angry. And that was a step in the right direction.

A smile stretched across his lips, lasting for a moment before a jaw-cracking yawn drove his eyes to water. He needed real sleep. Something to recharge him. The master bedroom was still in disarray, with boxes stacked almost ceiling high in his and Meredith's big walk-in closet, but there were clean, soft sheets on the brand new mattress, new deep green ones that worked well with the ocean blue they'd painted on the walls, or so the interior designer had said. He wasn't great with colors, and neither was Meredith, so they'd let the designer do most of the work. He thought of the fluffy blankets he'd unpacked. And the new down pillows they'd bought. He and Meredith had spent last night here. He could sink. Just sink into the bed.

And, fuck. He was fantasizing about pillows. That was damned sad.

Wincing, he wobbled to his feet.

He frowned when he realized the house had gone silent. Leaving the sleeping dog behind, he padded out into the hall. His bare feet squeaked on the hardwood floors. The living room was devoid of people. Everybody, it seemed, had moved out onto the balcony to chat and eat the pizza and donuts and other bribery he and Meredith had offered for their help, a late, unhealthy lunch. Except Meredith. Where was? Hmm. More niggling. Something was wrong.

He didn't have a chance to worry much, though, or to take his much-needed nap. Someone knocked at the door, and he diverted from the living room to the foyer. Hardwood became tile, freezing against his feet. He didn't look through the peephole. He grabbed the doorknob and opened the door to greet his long absent friend-turned-brother.

"Mark," he said, the word flat. Tired. Accusing.

Mark sighed as he brushed off his muddy feet on the welcome mat and stepped over the threshold. "I'm sorry, man."

"You missed the part where we were moving all the furniture around."

Mark winced as he shrugged off his windbreaker. "Would you believe I got stuck in an elevator for four hours?"

Derek folded his arms. "No." But Mark's face was straight. The man had no guile. None. All the guile of a watermelon. Called it. "Seriously?"

Mark sighed. "Yeah," he said. He hung up his coat in the coat closet and then kicked off his muddy shoes. "And I left my cellphone in the car, so I couldn't call."
"It takes an hour to get here," Derek said, eyes narrowing. "You had time."

"Left my car charger at work by accident, and the phone batteries ran down while I was in the elevator, wishing I wasn't in the elevator. Perfect storm." Mark sighed. "Mea culpa. Do you still need help with anything?"

Derek shrugged. "There's still a metric ton of boxes to unpack," he said, glancing around as they wandered into the living room. Sunlight bathed the room like it was an over-saturated photo, and Derek squinted in the brightness. Shades. Very fucking needed. "Actually, you know what?" he said. "Why don't you take some packing paper and tape it to the windows until we can buy some real blinds or something."

"I'm just tired," Derek said. "We finished the first floor, but I might need you as second string if Meredith decides she hates the furniture arrangement again. I don't think I could lift an empty teakettle at the moment, I'm not sure Owen or Alex are much better off, and we lost Lexie on the living room re-shuffle."

Mark snorted. "Meredith doesn't strike me as the picky decorator, type."

Derek shook his head, pulling his hand through his tangled hair. "She's not. She's never cared about this stuff before. She's acting bizarre. We've rearranged the living room once, and every time I checked on her earlier..." He sighed. "You know I like things neat."

Mark snorted. "That's... kind of an understatement."

"I like things neat, but she's making things so neat it's enough to make me look like a fucking slob in comparison."

"Weird," Mark said, frowning.

Derek sighed. "I've been trying to calm her down, but I don't know what to do. I can't fix it if I can't figure out what the hell is causing it. Usually, there's some amount of logic to her meltdowns."

He yawned, slumping, and Mark clapped him on the back. "You should crash for a bit, man. You're not going to fix anything if you're too wasted to think straight."

Derek's stomach growled. He looked down at himself, a sheepish, tired grin spreading across his face. "I will," he said as his needs aligned in a row, one, two, three, "but I think it's lunchtime first." He hadn't allowed himself the time to be hungry before. He glanced at his watch. One-thirty, almost.

Mark followed him out onto the deck where everybody was sitting. The day was gorgeous. A sunny 58 degrees. Fluffy cumulus clouds spread across the azure sky like blobs of cotton candy, and thinner wisps of stratus clouds jagged across the sky farther above those. The breeze blew, ruffling Derek's hair as he stepped outside. Birds drifted in circles on the air currents beside the cliff. He stopped for a moment by the railing, inhaled the wet, fresh air, and grinned. The view was spectacular. He had space. Endless space. And, now, he lived here. With Meredith.

Everybody sat in a jovial, chatty ring around a glass table under an umbrella at the center of the deck. The umbrella flapped in the wind. He grabbed a powdered lemon-jelly donut from the tray on the table. He didn't care how unhealthy of a meal the confection was. The donut was there, didn't require preparation, he was tired, and he needed sugar to stay conscious, end of story. He grabbed a napkin and collapsed into one of the empty lawn chairs. The chair frame creaked under his weight. He sighed, exhausted, and happy to be off his feet. Mark pulled out the chair next to him.

"She's going to pop, you know," Cristina said as they settled.

Lexie rolled her eyes. "Duh."

"No, I mean, now," Cristina clarified. "You have a day left. Maybe."

Derek frowned as he took his first, lemony bite and grimaced. Disgusting. Not his favorite way to fall off the health-food wagon. "What makes you say that?" he said impolitely around a sticky, lemony mouthful that stuck to the roof of his mouth.

"Yeah, she's not due for two weeks," Lexie said.

"It's the nesting behavior," Alex said. "Dead giveaway."

"Meredith isn't nesting," Lexie said while Derek chewed and inhaled and chewed and inhaled. "They just moved. Of course, she's going to want to organize things."

Cristina snorted. "She was polishing silver, earlier."

"She knows what silver polish is?" Lexie said.

"That's my point," Cristina snapped. "Everything she touches turns into a Martha Stewart project. And she's been going nonstop since the crack of dawn. I'm telling you, she's going to pop. I thought I might be wrong, but—"

"You mean you were testing her?" Derek said, incredulous. He put the remaining half-donut on the table. The sugar didn't seem to be doing much more than make him feel sick. Or maybe that was the returning ping of nerves. "With the Feng Shui bullshit. Seriously?"

Cristina shrugged. "Well, it was better than your problem-solving skills! You got told to go away because you hover and sniff hair and make a general McDreamy menace of yourself."

"I'm not a menace," Derek said, frowning. And he didn't sniff hair. Not lately, anyway. Damn it. He looked at Mark. "I'm not a menace, am I?"

Mark could only give him a helpless shrug as if to say, I wasn't here. I have no clue.

So, Derek turned to Owen. "Am I?"

Owen shook his head. "You've seemed pretty low key to me."

Cristina snorted. "Says Hoverer 2, the Apprentice."

Derek sighed. "Well, that worked out great, Cristina. Thanks for your help." He gave the word "help" the air quotes it deserved.

"I told her I was kidding!" Cristina said.

"Good work on that," Alex said with a snort.

"Yeah," Lexie grumbled. "Talk about backfiring."

"I'm sorry, okay?" Cristina snapped. "I helped with the sofa."
"Whatever," Alex said.

"Just don't... tease anymore," Derek said, pinching the bridge of his nose. "Okay? You don't tease a person on a ledge, and Meredith is on one."

"Well, I know that, now," Cristina said. "And it's not a ledge. It's labor."

"But you don't understand," Lexie protested. "She can't have the baby, yet!"

"I'm pretty sure that's not up to you," Cristina said.

"But the baby shower is this weekend! She can't have the baby before the shower! I worked for hours to organize that shower!" She jabbed her thumb at Derek. "His mother is coming!"

"Speaking of which," Mark interjected, looking at Derek, "are you picking her and Rache up from the airport on Friday, or am I?"

"Oh, god," Meredith said as she stepped out on the porch with a fresh plate of donuts, and Derek rubbed his temples. "I forgot about that," she said as she put down the tray. A little gasp. "That they're coming." Another gasp. "We need to unpack the guest rooms. And the linen closet. And the bathrooms." Gasp. "I don't know how... I don't." And then she bolted back into the house.

For Christ's sake.

"Maybe, we should just stop talking altogether," Lexie said. "No noise. No sudden movements."

"See?" Cristina said. She picked up a fresh glazed. "And if that wasn't proof, she just fed us donuts. Moms feed people donuts. You seriously need to add the arranging nursery to the to do list."

"They do not need to add it to the list," Lexie protested. "The baby is not coming tonight."

"Is, too," Cristina said.

Derek closed his eyes. "I can get them from the airport," Derek said, ignoring Cristina and Lexie's sniping. And then he thought better of it. The fog in his brain made reneging an easy thing to do. "Actually, you do it." He sighed. Too much shit to do. Too many fires to put out. And this fire. He knew he should put it out. He knew he needed to go find Meredith. Find her and get her to relax. But he couldn't. Bring himself. To move.

"Hey," Mark said with a sympathetic look when Derek rubbed his face and looked up again, "at least the whole stampede isn't coming."

"Don't even fucking joke about that," Derek said.

He loved his family. Loved them. But he didn't think he could handle four sniping sisters right now. The idea of Nancy traipsing around, "helping" to organize by virtue of dictating the best places for everything like some sort of furniture Nazi when Meredith was already acting like an insane decorator was enough to make him groan. The idea of the four of them, Nancy, Rachel, Amelia, and Kathleen, all tag-teaming in the delivery room, where he imagined he'd already be a nervous fucking wreck, and knowing how much Meredith was going to need him... Jesus. No. Just no. Even without 99% cured PTSD tossed into the mix, he didn't think that was something he could handle.

"Bet you $100 she's in labor before this time tomorrow," Cristina said, snapping him out of his spiraling thoughts.
"Fine," Lexie said, glaring. "You're on."

"$200 says she's having contractions by dinnertime," Alex added. He glanced at his watch. "Six hours."

"Jesus Christ," Derek snapped, unable to take it anymore. "She's fine. She's not having the baby early. I know something is wrong, but it's not that. It can't be that." Yes, it could be, a tiny voice told him, but he shoved it away. "And stop turning my fucking life into your entertainment." God, he was tired.

"Sorry," Lexie said, reddening as she crumpled in her chair. Mark gave her shoulder a squeeze.

Derek shook his head and sighed. "No," he said, his tone weary. "No, I'm sorry. I need to lie down for a bit. I've gotten about ten hours of sleep in the last forty-eight, and if I have to push another piece of furniture, I might drop dead."

He didn't wait for a response. He knew he should chase after Meredith and try to calm her down. He knew it. But, for some reason, when he thought about that, he felt like he had weights in his shoes and his brain was shutting down. He slogged out of his chair like some sort of swamp creature and turned to leave.

Cristina stood like she intended to follow him, polishing off the last of her glazed donut as she did. He looked at her with a dull, tired, defeated gaze. "What?" he said.

"I'll get Meredith," she said. "Stop worrying about her. You, sleep. You'll need it."

"Right," said Lexie, standing up, too. "I'll work on unpacking the linen closet. But she's not going into labor tonight."

"I guess I can unpack the first guest room," Alex said. "It's arranged already, right?" He turned to Lexie. "And, yes, she so is."

"It's not," Derek said with a sigh, "but there's not much in there to move, at least."

Owen nodded. "I'll help in the first guest room, then. Might not be perfect, but we can get things passable, and we can move on to the second one if we have time."

"How about I help with the guest room furniture," Mark said. "And one of you can take my job."

"Which is?" Alex said.

"Papering the windows to keep the sun out," Mark said.

"Okay," Alex said. "Good trade to me. I'm fried." He glanced at Owen, eyebrows raised.

"I'm fine," Owen said. "The lunch break was enough for me."

"Good; we have a plan," Mark said. He pumped his fist like he was in the middle of a huddle. "One, two, three, break?"

Derek snorted in tired amusement. "Thanks, guys," he said in a thick, weary voice. "I appreciate it."

"No problem," Owen said.

"No more Feng Shui, though, please," Derek said.
Cristina shook her head. "Yeah, I'm smart. I learn in one try. No need for lectures."

He rolled his eyes at her, shaking his head as he left.

Derek trudged up the stairs and headed to the master suite, losing sentience by the second. He thought he might find Meredith hiding in here, but she wasn't. He wasn't sure what new panicked project she'd assumed as her latest whirlwind of OCD. Maybe, unpacking the den or something. Worry clenched and released. Cristina would handle it. She'd said she would.

When he shut the bedroom door behind him, blessed, muted silence filled the room, and he deflated.

He weaved across soft, plush carpet, in and out of stacks of boxes to the bathroom, which wasn't unpacked, so much as decorated with travel-sized toiletries to tide them over until they found the time to set things up how they wanted. A lone pair of towels hung on the racks, one for him, and one for Meredith.

He stripped, leaving his dirty t-shirt and jeans and socks and boxer briefs on the toilet lid in a messy heap. He was too tired to find the hamper, wherever that was in the maze of boxes. He stepped into their huge, dual-head, walk-in shower, turned on the water as hot as it would go, and then he stood there, leaning against the cold wall, too fucking exhausted to reach for his washcloth and the soap and start scrubbing. His head felt too heavy for his neck, and he found himself looking at the floor. The lines of grout between the tiles fuzzed and split, and time stretched like a rubber band.

He didn't hear Meredith come into the room. Didn't see her shadow through the marbled glass as she approached. Didn't see her pop her head into the shower to look at him.

"Derek?" she said, her voice soft.

But it was enough to make him flinch awake from his half-doze and make an awful, strangled noise of fear. His hands slipped against the wet shower wall, and he lost his balance. He stumbled. His shoulder slammed into the tile, sending a jolt of pain vibrating down his humerus. He didn't fall, but it was a close thing, and he stood there, wet, naked, heart pounding, breaths rattling in his chest, arm throbbing.

"Sorry!" she said over the drumbeats of the water. "I'm so sorry! It's just me!"

He swallowed. His hands shook. He pulled his fingers through his hair, and he looked at her. And then he looked back at the floor, panting. "S'okay," he said, the words thick. His body calmed, and he settled down over minutes. When he regained his composure, he said, "Did you need something?"

Please, say no, he prayed. He didn't think he could do anything else right now. He was running on empty, and he was about thirty minutes from being a dead car on the side of the road, useless, waiting for a tow.

"I just came to check on you," she said, and he slumped with relief.

He said, "Oh." But that was about all he could muster. At least she seemed less panicky for now. Cristina must have helped.

Meredith bit her lip, concern slipping into her expression. "You should sleep."

"I wanted to take a shower, first," he rasped. "You said I smelled."
"This looked more like a passive soaking while the wall propped you up," she said, a frown creasing her face. "Please, sleep, Derek. Stop pushing."

He couldn't argue with rightness. He turned the shower knobs. He'd hosed himself off, at least. He wouldn't be getting sweat all over the clean sheets. "Yeah," he said, the word thick and stuck in his throat like taffy. "I'm done." He needed to collapse. Needed. Like breathing.

She moved back a step to let him out of the shower. He grabbed his towel and slicked the water away. The clothes he'd left on the toilet seat were gone. He glanced at Meredith. She didn't have anything in her hands. He snorted. He really didn't understand how she could find the time to panic about everything, care about everybody, unpack everything her hands touched, and still pick up laundry. Come to think of it, since when did she pick up laundry? This had become Bizarro World, where Meredith was the one picking up clothes, and he was the one leaving them everywhere.

God, he wished he could figure out what the fuck was going on with her.

This couldn't really be nesting behavior. Could it?

Something cold slipped behind his heart and squeezed. Nerves. The brief panic she'd wrung from him by surprising him in the shower tried to encroach. He shoved it away. No. No, no, no.

She touched his shoulder, and he flinched. He'd forgotten she was still standing there. Her expression creased even more than it had been when she saw his reaction. "Derek... is something wrong?" she said.

"No," he said.

She didn't look satisfied with his answer, but she didn't say anything else.

He swallowed.

Trying to figure out what was wrong with her was worrisome enough. Trying to figure out what he would do if he was going to be a father tomorrow was worse. And trying to figure out what in the fucking hell he would do to get Meredith through that whole panic-palooza if it turned out Cristina was right... Oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know started up again in a deafening, thunderous chorus. He and Meredith had both been counting on those last two weeks to prepare. The idea that they might be taken away from him... He shook his head. He couldn't think about this, now.

He just couldn't.

He didn't bother finding anything new to wear. He walked over to the bed, Meredith shadowing him the whole way, like she didn't believe he would sleep like he said he would. He dropped onto his side of the mattress with a heaving sigh that spread his ribs, and she pulled the fluffy blankets over his naked body before he could think about doing it himself. He grabbed his pillow and burrowed.

Bliss.

"Do you mind if I unpack some things in here while you sleep?" she said, her voice soft and somewhere near his ear. "I'll be quiet." She rubbed his back through the comforter.

"Hmm," he said.

"Was that a yes?" she said. "Or a no?"
"Whatever you wan'," he mumbled.

If she asked him anything after that, he couldn't say.

"I think we're ready to try stepping you off your Paxil, if that's something you're interested in," Dr. Wyatt said.

Derek blinked. The fish tank burbled in the ensuing silence. "What?" he said after an eternity.

"You've mentioned more than once that you're unhappy with the side-effects."

He clenched his teeth. "Yes, but it's better than the alternative."

"It used to be, yes," Dr. Wyatt said with a nod.

He couldn't go back to that. To the before. Could he? A picture of himself in his mind's eye formed. He used to be a man who liked sex without needing encouragement or flukes. Who could think things like, "I want to sleep with my wife. Right now." And not have it be an event that required logistical planning. But he also used to be someone who wet himself. Who couldn't get out of bed. Who kept seeing things that weren't there. How could he...

"You... you think I can be okay without it?" he said.

"We've done a lot of work," she said. She gave him a warm, soft smile. "You have a whole toolbox that you didn't before. Tools to help you cope with your anxiety in healthy ways. I think, maybe, you can."

He swallowed. "But..."

"It's just something to think about," she said with an easy shrug. "We don't have to try it right this second."

"The baby is coming in less than a month," he said.

She nodded. "And that's a very valid reason to wait. That's a stressful event, and I can understand not wanting to risk exacerbating your illness in light of that."

"How long would weaning me off take?" he said, leaning forward. The cushions squeaked as his weight shifted.

She shook her head. "It's not an exact science. There's no definitive endpoint. You might find that you can't go all the way off of it, but that at a reduced dose, you still get all the benefits, but none or fewer of the undesired side-effects."

"That would be... nice." He swallowed. "That would be..."

She wrote a prescription. "Here. I'll give this to you. It's a reduced dose. You can think about it. Talk it over with Meredith. You can try it as soon as you're ready. If you're ready. Just be aware you'll probably experience some withdrawal symptoms, and be careful not to confuse those with a return of your anxiety symptoms. I can give you a pamphlet."

He stood, because he needed some way to vent... everything. He paced. He ran his fingers through his hair. "What if I'm not okay?" he said, coming to a stop beside the fish tank. He stared at the rainbow inside. Betta fish. Neon tetras. "Without it. What if...?"

"Then we'll put you back on your current dosage, and we'll get you stable again," she said. She
The good news is that we already know for sure what does work."

He licked his lips, staring at the fish. "I don't know."

"There's no rush. Like I said. It's just something to consider. You might not be okay without it, but that's something you'll never know without trying to wean yourself off."

"Yeah," he said, swallowing thickly. "Yeah."

He woke to black, but not pitch black. Moonlight slanted in through the large windows and the sliding glass door, and stars scattered across the sky like loose confetti. For a moment, he lay there on his back, relaxed, breathing softly, enjoying the warmth and comfort. He must have slept until almost dinnertime, he thought. He glanced at the alarm clock on his nightstand, one of the few items he'd unpacked in this room, so far. 3:30 said the face of the clock.

He frowned.

3:30, and it was dark? He scrubbed his face and looked at the clock again. It still said 3:30. His growling, empty stomach confirmed his sinking suspicions, but still, he grabbed his phone off the nightstand – Meredith must have pulled it from his jeans pocket and left it there – and hit a button to light up the display. 3:30 am, the phone specified. He had a text. He pressed more buttons. "Let me know when contractions start, so I can win my bet," the text said, from a number he didn't recognize, though he could guess the sender, even just woken up. Fuck, he'd slept thirteen hours. How could... He couldn't remember the last time he'd slept thirteen hours. Hell, he couldn't remember the last time he'd had thirteen straight hours in which to sleep. Lake Cushman back in late August, maybe. Why had nobody woken him up? Come to think of it, if this was the middle of the night, why was he alone in his very comfortable bed?

"Meredith?" he said into the darkness, but nobody answered. "Sam?" he said.

Nothing.

He flipped on the lamp on his nightstand, wincing and blinking as the light speared his pupils. He flipped back the covers. The chill made him shiver. He glanced down. The duffel bag he'd put four changes of clothes in to tide him over until he unpacked everything was gone. Damn it. Where?

And then he saw the closet. His jaw opened. Closed. Opened. Meredith had been busy while his lights were out.

The ironing board stood unfolded in the middle of the floor inside the closet, and the unplugged iron and a lint brush stooped on top of the board at the widest edge. Clothes on hangers hung from the dowel rods that had been empty before. All his suits, lined up in crisp rows, loosely organized by season of wear. Shoes filled the shoe shelves. His tie rack had been loaded with ties, all pristine and wrinkle-free.

Meredith had arranged everything how he'd had it in the old house. Without fail. She'd unpacked her things as well. She'd ironed, and de-linted, and unpacked. Everything.

On a lark, he checked his dresser. He found his underwear. Socks. Jeans. Sweats. Shorts. Everything that didn't need a hanger or an iron. Also arranged exactly how he liked it, though much more crisply folded and stacked than he'd ever cared about. He grabbed a quick change of clothes – clean socks, boxer briefs, a high-necked black t-shirt, and some soft, gray sweat pants – and he yanked them on in a rush.

Curious, he checked Meredith's bureau. Also full of clothes and jewelry and other things, though he didn't rifle through things or pry, only looked. He perused all of the boxes in the bedroom, walking past each one. Most were now empty, save for a few odds and ends.

Everything. She'd done everything, and he hadn't heard any of it. Screw sleep, he'd been unconscious.

After making a quick pit stop to relieve himself, he opened the doors to the master suite and stepped out into the dark hallway. "Meredith?" he called, loud enough for his voice to carry, but she still didn't reply. As he moved down the hallway, he peeked into rooms.

All rooms were empty of people, but one guest room looked perfect, the second looked less than perfect, but usable, even a little bag of potpourri tied with a ribbon had been unpacked on the back of the toilet in the hallway bathroom, and... he pulled on the door to the linen closet. He found towels and sheets smelling of fresh, flowery detergent, folded and stacked into every spare space. The nursery was the only room on this floor that had, so far, not been touched, and still contained a disarray of furniture and piles of unopened boxes. He imagined Lexie had put her foot down on where time would be best spent, and the nursery was not it.

He headed downstairs, clutching the dark wooden railing as he took the steps two at a time. The house seemed empty, save for soft strains of music emanating from the living room. He headed that way.

He found Meredith and Samantha sitting by the entertainment center. Meredith's iPod perched on top the stereo, a little cord trailing from the headphone jack to the stereo's input. He recognized the group playing – Lamb – as one of her favorites, some trip-hop group she'd picked up an interest for after her time in London, but he didn't know what song played. A spritzer bottle sat by Meredith's hip. She held a cloth, and she sat on the floor by an open box, knees resting on a foam pad she'd put down underneath her for support. From the box, she pulled out a record sleeve he couldn't identify from this distance and swiped the surface with the cloth. Then she stacked it on the shelf by the stereo, where about ten other records already resided. Above that shelf, piles of stacked and organized CDs.

"You don't need to do that," he said as he approached.

She sighed. She looked up at him, her expression... unhappy. "I'm pretty sure they need to be unpacked."

He bent down to kiss her and squeeze her shoulder. She let him, but she didn't lean into any of it, didn't tell him wordlessly or audibly that she liked what he was doing, so he stopped, forcing himself not to sigh with disappointment in the process. Still bristling, then. He gave Samantha a scratch behind the ears, too, to vent his need to be affectionate. Samantha had flopped on her side and snoozed behind Meredith, almost like a living back rest.

"I know," he said as he straightened and stepped away to give Meredith her space, "but I can do that later." At the very least, she didn't need to waste time dusting everything.

"Did you sleep well?" Meredith said, ignoring his assessment.

"Yes," he said. He blinked, running his fingers through his hair. His head wasn't throbbing or swimming anymore. His eyeballs didn't feel too big for his skull. His muscles felt a little sore from his previous abuse of them, but nothing too painful lingered. "I feel better than I have in days."

She nodded. "Good." She wiped off the cover of another record, glanced at the title, glanced at the records she'd already unpacked, split them apart about midway, and stuck the newly cleaned one into the bunch. "I thought about waking you for dinner, but... you seemed like you needed sleep more than food."

He sank onto the couch. His stomach growled, but he ignored it. He could get food in a minute. "Have you gotten any sleep?" he said.

"I've taken a couple catnaps," she said, not looking up.

"Meredith—"

She sighed. "Look, don't. Please, don't."

"Don't what?"

"Don't ask me if I'm okay," she said, inhaling and exhaling through her teeth like she was trying not to blow up at him. "Don't tell me what I need or don't need to be doing. Don't tell me how I should feel. I'm sick of it."

His heart sank at her words. Oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. All of it churned. He was making a fucking mess of all of this, and he felt... helpless. He didn't like this. Didn't like that he couldn't figure out what she needed or what was wrong. Didn't like that she kept getting upset, and he could do nothing about it. Didn't like that she didn't seem to want anything to do with him because of it. Didn't like that he seemed to be exacerbating... whatever it was. Fuck.

"Okay," he said, nodding.

His stomach rumbled again. He pulled his fingers through his hair and stood, and then he left her alone to do her manic unpacking. She didn't comment on his departure, just let him go, and that made him feel worse.

He headed to the kitchen to grab a cup of peach yogurt from the fridge, and a spoon from the utensil drawer. He leaned against the countertop as he nibbled on the yogurt. Samantha trotted out into the kitchen and whined at him. He stroked her fur, and then he took her to the back door to let her out. She took off into the murky darkness. He sighed as he stood by the door, waiting for her to return.

He polished off the yogurt in a few bites. When Samantha came back, he let her in through the storm door. She pushed her wet nose against his hand, and he flinched, not because she'd startled him, just from the surprise of the chilly touch. He shook his head with a snort and petted her. She gave him a deep, discerning look with her mocha-colored eyes.

"You ever feel like you're trying to learn new etiquette on the fly?" he said. "And every time you think you might get it, you commit some horrible faux pas. Like... trying to eat a steak in India or something?"

Samantha sneezed at him.

"I suppose not," Derek said, the words glum. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. She seemed to sense his distress. She pressed her big, stocky body against him, a bastion of support. A lump filled his throat as he stroked her with his free hand. God, damn it. He didn't want to keep fucking this up. Why was this so difficult? With a frustrated sigh, he threw out the yogurt cup and put the dirty spoon in the dishwasher after rinsing it off under the tap.

He stared at the doorway and took a deep breath. Samantha walked beside him as he ambled back into the living room, where Meredith still sat, unpacking. What had been about ten records when he'd left had become about thirty on the shelf. Meredith glanced up at him, swiping the cloth at another record, and his heart squeezed at her wary, "What, now?" expression.

He dropped to the floor beside her. He didn't touch her or kiss her or anything, and he left a good three feet of space between them. He didn't know what was safe. Samantha flopped onto her side with a heaving sigh and closed her eyes. He reached into the box of LPs and handed Meredith a record as a peace offering. She took it, and then her gaze darted away from him. Toward the record. Her lap.

"I'm sorry if I've been a menace," he said.

"You haven't been a menace," she replied without looking at him.

He shrugged. "Making you feel suffocated, then."

"You haven't been," she said.

She stacked the record and grabbed another. And another. He watched in silence. He wanted to help. Not to take the work away from her, but to give himself something to do in the deafening silence between them, but he thought she might take that wrong. Might take it like he was trying to control her. He scooted to the wall and pulled a beat up box labeled "movies" toward himself. She hadn't been anywhere near this box. He pulled off the lid.

A pile of old DVDs and VHS tapes sat inside the box. They hadn't bought many new movies lately as streaming services had taken over the world, but they did still have somewhat of a collection, albeit downsized. He rubbed his hand along the edge of the cardboard box. Before he'd packed, he'd pulled out anything with violence and told Alex he could keep them or donate them to the library. That had included a lot of the latest wave of superhero movies, which Derek, a comic book fan in his youth, had quite enjoyed. He and Mark had seen a lot of them in the theaters over the years. But... he found he didn't have the stomach for them anymore, cartoony as they were. Explosion sounds didn't sit well with him, leaving him tense and fidgeting on the couch, though he could handle them at low volume. Gunfire, though... forget it, and even if he put the movie on mute, he could still see them. The guns. Actors playing bad people doing bad things. Those movies had become a condensed pile of triggers for him, and he just... didn't derive any enjoyment from them anymore.

Superman, both with Reeve and Routh, Spiderman with Tobey Maguire, Batman, both with Keaton and Bale, Transformers... All of that, he'd left with Alex. Most of what was left was documentaries, or Meredith's, though a couple sedate dramas had made it through the downsizing. He pulled one of the top items from the box.

The Star Wars trilogy, a set of DVDs in a special, shiny, embossed box of its own. He grimaced, but he didn't comment. He swore, Meredith had like six different copies of it. The originals. The re-release. The special edition re-release, both in letterbox and 4:3 aspect. And that was just VHS. In addition to the DVDs he'd just picked up, she had it on blu-ray also, and who knew what else. Every time George Lucas decided to fuck with it, Meredith happily threw down her hard-earned money to buy the result. It made no sense to him whatsoever.

He tried to put the DVD box on the shelf, but Meredith tensed in the corner of his eye, and the hairs on the back of his neck prickled in response. "You have to wipe that off, first," she said.

He froze and looked at her with a frown. "It's clean, Meredith."
"No, it's not," she said. "You have to wipe off the dust." She raised her rag, showing him the faint stain of dirt spreading across it. But she was wiping off old records, some of which he hadn't touched except to pack, in years.

"There's no dust on this," he said, showing her the shiny box in his hand. She pulled this box out and watched the trilogy all the fucking time. It didn't have time to collect dust. But she bit her lip. Her breaths funneled into quick gasps. He felt like he was watching a volcano about to erupt, and he rushed to say, "Okay. Okay, let me grab a rag. I'm sorry." I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know.

He glanced around wildly. His friends had been working the house over for over half a day in his dreaming absence. He wasn't sure where the clean rags had been put. He settled on the roll of paper towels that had been left on the end table by the sectional. He scooted across the floor, snatched those, and moved back to resettle by the movie box. He made a show of wiping off the box that didn't need to be wiped, but she shook her head and handed him the spritzer. He fought not to roll his eyes. He squirted some cleaner into the paper towel, wiped again, gave her a long look at the result, and set the box down on the shelf when she nodded. She seemed... okay, now.

"I'm sorry," he said into the silence, at a loss. God, he just had no idea what to do anymore. Everything was wrong, and she shrugged off his default coax-calm-hug-kiss approach like he'd changed careers from surgeon to professional cactus. He picked up another DVD from the box, wiped it top to bottom, and put it on the shelf.

The silence stretched. He must have wiped off ten more movies. She kept working through his LPs. Some of the stuff in that box, he'd had for over twenty-five years. The first record he'd ever bought with his own money, after he'd saved up his allowance for weeks, had been Give 'em Enough Rope by the Clash, and even that was in the box somewhere. He'd never made the jump to cassettes or any of the later media iterations, except for the bare necessity of converting records to tapes or CDs for his car and portable players and, eventually, to MP3s for his iPod. There was something about a record that just... sounded better.

He smiled, remembering when he'd moved into the old house. Meredith had boggled over the player like he'd brought home a unicorn. They still make record players? Really? she'd said.

"It's just... I'm not okay," Meredith said, voice wobbling.

He turned to look at her, pulled from his musing. She'd stopped unpacking and set her rag on the lid of the box she'd only half-pillaged. He didn't know how to respond without upsetting her. Why wasn't she okay? Was it the baby? But asking her for specifics, despite the runnel of worry tearing through him, seemed like... conversational suicide.

"I... noticed that," he said, trying to keep his tone neutral.

She sighed. "I know I'm acting totally insane."

"I wouldn't say... insane," he said, words cautious. "More like... a steroidal Donna Reed."

She looked at him with a blank expression. "Who's that?"

"This is one of those moments where you're making me feel like a fossil," he said.

She tried to scoot toward him, but she struggled. He took the hint, and he moved closer. When she wrapped her arms around him and kissed his shoulder, tension flowed out of him. "You're a really sexy fossil, at least," she said, nuzzling him.
"The Donna Reed Show was a 50s sitcom that was still on in reruns when I was a kid," he explained, returning her kiss with one of his own. He pressed his lips to her forehead. It felt so good to kiss her. "Donna Reed played the housewife of a doctor. She cooked and cleaned and took care of the kids and did all of the stuff you've been doing in overdrive today."

"I didn't cook!"

"You heated up pizza and served donuts," he said, grinning. "That counts for you."

"Hey!" she said with faux-offense, socking him in the arm, and he laughed as he rubbed the spot where her knuckles had impacted. He missed this. Playing. When the moment of mirth bled into silence, she sighed and put her head on his shoulder. He rubbed her back, running his palm along her spine, and she groaned like she'd been in pain before, and now he'd relieved it. "It's just..." she said, jerking as he hit a bad knot and pressed into it, "I feel like there's so much I need to do, and there's no way I'll finish it in time."

His hands slowed. He swallowed, unsure. "It's not... the end of the world if you don't." Was that safe to say? That seemed safe.

"That's the problem," she said, looking up at him. "It feels like it, and I don't know why."

He raised his eyebrows. "Like the end of the world?"

"Yeah."

"Meredith..." He sighed, and he hugged her. "I promise it won't be the end of the world."

She sniffled. "That just sounds like a platitude."

"It's not a platitude," he said. "It's the truth."

She pulled a tent of his shirt into her fingers, and she rested against him. "How in the hell can you be so sure all the time?" she said, her tone... envious. When she looked up at him, her eyes were wet, and that made his heart hurt. "In two weeks, I'm going to have one of the most painful experiences a woman can have. I'm going to have a freaking baby in two weeks, we're going to have a freaking baby, and you're all, 'Breathe, Mere!' and, 'It's okay, Mere!' and, 'Take it easy, Mere!' and, 'It's not the end of the world, Mere!' like some sort of fineness coach, like it's me having any other freakout on any other day, and life is normal and good and peachy. I feel so freaking inadequate right now. Can you loan me some of your Kool-Aid?"

"Not what?"

"Sure," he said. He dared a look back at her. "Meredith, I'm terrified right now."

Her jaw dropped for a moment before she picked it up. "But..."

"I'm terrified I won't be able to be a father and have PTSD," he said. "I'm terrified I won't be able to help you through this."

"Derek, don't say that," she said.
"You know Dr. Wyatt told me I can try weaning myself off the Paxil if I want to?"

She blinked. "What? You never said anything!"

"What would have been the point of getting your hopes up?" he said. He took a choppy breath and blew it out. He never wanted to feel like he had nine months ago. Ever. Too scared to function, angry at everything, feeling like his best friend had died, lost, and guilt-wracked, all wrapped together in a blanket of abject misery. "I'd rather take the Paxil than go back to... where I was before. Not when I worked so fucking hard to get here."

"But she doesn't think you'd go back to that, or she wouldn't have suggested you stop taking it!" Meredith protested.

"I can't," he said, shaking his head. "I can't. I promised I'd be there for you, and I will be. If I have it, you can take it. I mean that. I'm just worried that what I have won't be enough, even with the Paxil. I don't want to fuck this up." I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know.

She kissed him. "You're enough. No matter what."

"Yeah," he said with a derisive snort. "I'm doing such a bang up job so far. You bristle whenever I get near you, everything I say seems to be the wrong thing, and Cristina labeled me a McDreamy menace." He pulled his fingers through his hair. "I don't know what I'm doing, I'm trying, but..."

"Is that why you're worried?" she said. "Because I keep telling you to go away?"

"Some of why," he said.

She sighed. "Jeez, we're a freakin' pair."

"What do you mean?"

"I've been marinating in panic because you seemed so peachy and calm, and I felt like some sort of inept Debbie Downer in comparison. And you're marinating in panic because my avoid-y goodness translated into Derek-speak as, 'Shit, I'm fucking this up.'"

He gave her a wry snort. Her imitation of him, snapping, harsh voice and all was... a picture. "I guess that's... one way to put it."

"I am really scared, Derek," she said, relaxing against him. "But I know you'll be enough. I know it."

He shook his head, staring into space. "I'm sure you'll still be saying that if I have a panic attack in the delivery room."

She thought for a long moment. "I had a patient who gave birth back in August," she said. "Right before we went to Lake Cushman. She ended up needing a cesarean. After twenty hours of labor, she'd screamed herself hoarse, and she couldn't even lift her head off the pillow she was so tired. Her husband was such a nervous wreck he threw up in the delivery room all over the floor and fainted. But they were fine in the end." She cupped his face, and she smiled at him, peering at him through her the fringe of her eyelashes. "They were really happy. If you have a panic attack in the delivery room, yeah, it'll suck, Derek, but to steal your platitude, it's not the end of the world. We'll be happy in the end." She kissed him.

"I'm sorry in advance if I fall apart on you."
"It's not going to happen, Derek. I'm sure of it. But... apology accepted if that's what you need."

He looked down at her. "How in the hell can you be so sure?"

"I have an amazing husband who's always here, saying things," she said. Her palm felt so nice against his skin. He sighed, and he felt some more of his tension loosen. "And I know what it looks like when he's really struggling. This isn't that. He isn't a sick man who's so scared he can't get out of bed right now. He's just a normal guy worrying about something that's going to flip his life upside down or whatever."

They rested against each other, counterbalanced, for a long moment. The soft strains of music from the speakers filled the silence. "If I should die this very moment," sang the lead vocalist in a soft, whispering lilt, "I wouldn't fear, for I've never known completeness like being here." He sighed, soaking up her warmth and her confidence. Her confidence in him. She twitched, and she smiled, and she grabbed his hand to press his palm to her womb. Baby moved under her skin, strong and vital and alive.

"It'll be worth it," Meredith said like she was trying to convince herself. "All this scary crap."

"Yeah," he said. "It will be." He kissed her. "Is there anything I can do? To help you not be scared?"

"Helping me put this junk away is a nice start. I appreciate it."

"Okay," he said. They basked in each other for a few more minutes. They pressed close. Their noses touched. They kissed. And then they split apart to get back to work.

He wiped off more DVDs, losing track of the time. He filled the shelf. The VHS tapes of Ellis Grey's surgeries rested at the bottom of the box. He placed those on the next shelf up in chronological order, so Meredith would have an easier time finding what she wanted if she ever wanted to review them.

She snorted, drawing his attention away from his task.

"What?" he said, looking up.

She showed him the cover of LP she'd picked out of the box. "Really, Derek? Really?" And then she burst into gales of laughter. "This is just... I never pictured you for the type."

He blinked. Hangin' Tough. New Kids on the Block. For a brief moment, he couldn't remember where on earth he'd gotten that, or for fuck's sake, why, but then it came to him in a crushing wave of bittersweet memory. "I can explain that..."

Meredith nodded, sniggering. "I think you owe me a story."

"Amelia... had a phase when she was younger," he said, smiling as he remembered. She'd been... thirteen? He couldn't recall. Please, please, please, please, will you take me, Derek? Mom's too busy. He'd been trying to study for finals, but she'd worn him down after weeks of pestering. The group had had a concert Westbury. Mom had given him her car keys on loan, and they'd made a day of it. That had probably been one of the last times Amelia had enjoyed his company. That had been in... an April, and after the summer had passed, she'd gone to high school. She'd met the stoner crowd, and that had been all she wrote. "Before the drugs. I took her to a concert."

"And you bought a record of it?" Meredith said, eyebrows raised.
"She bought it with her allowance money and gave it to me as a thank you," Derek said. Thank you, thank you, thank you! she'd babbled at him. Do you think Jordan noticed me? He's soooooocute. "I never had the heart to toss it."

"That's kind of adorable," Meredith said. "Have you ever listened to it?"

"Um, no."

"What about at the concert?"

He shook his head. "All the screaming teenage girls nearly had my eardrums bleeding."

She turned off her iPod, reverently pulled the old record from its pristine, untouched sleeve, put it on the player, and started up the turntable. An unfamiliar pop riff filled the room. "The right stuff," sang one of the New Kids. Meredith nodded to the beat for a moment and turned the volume dial, until the noise was bouncing off the walls and vibrating against his breastbone. "The right stuff."

She pressed her hands into the floor and tried to rise, only to grunt with frustration. She looked at him, biting her lip. "Can you help me up?" she said as the song proceeded out of the intro into the first verse.

He stood and offered her his hands. "Please, don't tell me you want to dance it out to this shit," he said. "I think that might be where I draw my line."

"Do you need me to get you a marker?" she said, smirking. "This is so freaking 80s!" She wiggled her shoulders along with the beat, grinning mischievously at him, and he couldn't help but meet her grin with one of his own. He refused to dance, though. Even in not-public.

"Hah. Hah," he said, though he couldn't keep the amusement from twitching at his lips.

With his help, she got her knees underneath her, but it was an awkward, unwieldy struggle. Baby had gotten so big, and Meredith was so tiny. He didn't know how she had room for everything.

Meredith had almost found upright when her hands tightened around his, and she hissed with... pain? Annoyance? He couldn't read it. Under the pressure of her grip, lightning bolts of pain snaked up his finger bones as all his knuckles smashed together. She followed inertia and his help, and she managed to straighten. She let go of him with one hand, but even upright, she clutched him with the other, so hard he thought bones might break. "Ow," he said, trying to pull away, but her grip didn't wane. "Ow. Meredith?" Her free hand went to her belly button, and she stood there, breathing, the strangest expression loitering her face.

Samantha sensed something was going on. She stood and padded over to whine at them. Still trapped by Meredith's hand, Derek shooed Samantha away with his knee.

"Is the baby kicking?" he said, frowning.

Her grip loosened. He yanked his hand from her painful clutches and shook the discomfort out of his joints. She looked up at him with gobsmacked, wide eyes. "Um," she said.

"What?" he said. "Are you okay?"

"That was Braxton-Hicks," she said with a firm nod. "Right? It had to be."

He blinked. For a moment, he couldn't think of a single intelligent thing to say. The throbbing beat of the music made his skull rattle. He reached to turn it down, and the wave of noise receded to a background murmur as he spun the volume dial. But then he was back to staring dumbly at her. "You... had a contraction?" he managed after what felt like eternity.

"Sure as hell felt like one," she said.

"Did it hurt?"

She looked at him, a helpless expression on her face. "...sort of?"

"Well, how bad was it on a scale of one to ten?"

"Um," she said. She frowned. Samantha nudged her with her big, broad nose, and Meredith reached absently to give the dog a pat on the head. "One? Point five? It was more surprising than painful."

"Okay," he said. He pulled his fingers through his hair. He shifted from foot to foot. "Okay, um."

"Time it?"

"Yeah," he said. Oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know rattled in his head like somebody banging rocks with sticks. Louder and louder and louder. His breaths funneled into gasps, and his vision went pinpoint and fuzzy. The dog whined.

"Derek!" Meredith snapped, elbowing him, which was enough to jolt him out of his spiral.

"Sorry," he said. "Sorry, um." He took a deep, slow breath, and pushed it out. He glanced at his watch. "Time it. Right." He fiddled with the buttons, trying to change his watch to stopwatch mode, but his fingers shook, and he... Beep, beep, beep. Beep. There. There, he got it. He hit the start button, and he watched the numbers climb from zero. Ten seconds passed. Twenty. Thirty.

"I'm sure it was just Braxton-Hicks," she said, hawk-eying the timer from beside him. Her hand rested on her belly. "Those are pretty common the last few weeks."

"But you've never had any before," he said.

She frowned. "No... No, I don't... think so."

He raised his eyebrows. "You don't think so?"

She sighed. "Well, the book said some women don't even notice them early on."

"This isn't early, though."

"So?"

He pulled his fingers through his hair, resisting the urge to pace. Or stare at his watch. Or just stand there and shake. "So, wouldn't you have felt some other ones?"

"Derek?" she said.

"What?" he croaked.

"You're not helping," she snapped.

He flinched, rebuffed. "Sorry," he said. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. "Sorry, I. Um."
She pressed against him, clutched at him. "I don't want to have it, yet. I'm supposed to have two more weeks!" Her voice was shrill, like an icepick in his ear, and her own upset fed into his.

"Meredith..."

"Derek, I don't want to have it, yet!" she snapped.

"Well," he said, taking a breath, "you might not be, so... let's just... let's just..."

"If the next word out of your mouth is relax, chill, or calm as a prefix for down, I'll hurt you," she said, glaring at him. "I'll hurt you, Derek."

He took another deep breath and blew it out. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. Another breath. He dug deep for some humor. Anything. Anything to keep him out of free fall. "What about simmer?"

She blinked. "Simmer?"

"As a prefix for down," he said. "Am I allowed to say simmer?"

She rolled her eyes, but she laughed. Just a little. "You're such a freaking asshole."

"I love you, too," he said.

He pulled her into an embrace and stuck his nose in her hair, because in that moment, he needed it. Needed her. Needed. The faint scent of lavender tickled the back of his throat, and he breathed, and breathed, and breathed. One, two, three. In. One, two, three. Out. She snaked her hands around him, and the feeling of her palm along his spine, warmth from her skin seeping through the cotton of his t-shirt, helped. The I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know faded underneath the steady thrum of his heartbeat. She pressed her ear to his chest like she liked to do when she was upset. He let her listen as long as she wanted. He carded his fingers through her soft hair, and he rocked her, falling into his default mode for handling freakouts. Coax. Calm. Hug. Kiss. The act of calming her sank into his bones and his muscles and his mind. He kissed her, and he sighed as he relaxed. He seemed to help her, too, because she melted into his arms like some sort of putty.

She pulled at his wrist, swaying a bit like she was drunk. "How long has it been?"

"Just a couple minutes," he said, showing her his watch. "Anything?"

"No."

"Okay."

"I really don't want to have it, yet," she said, but she sounded more resigned than shrill this time.

"I know," he murmured. "I know. I'm not ready, either."

Her gaze narrowed. "Boohoo for you! At least it won't freaking hurt for you," she snapped. She stepped out of his arms and rested her palms against her womb. She looked down at herself. "Please, please, don't come out yet, Baby. Please."

"It might be false labor," he said. "We shouldn't get upset, yet."

"I know," she said.

"I'm here," he said. He squeezed her shoulder.
"What are we supposed to do?" she said, looking up at him with wide eyes turned slate in the dim light.

"Well, we can't just stand here staring at each other while we panic," he said.

She gave him a desperate look. "Can't we?"

"How about..." He frowned, trying to think of something. "Oh, that show you like. The cooking one. We can watch that."

She sighed. "Our Internet isn't hooked up, yet. That was streaming."

"Oh," he said. "A movie, then? What are you in the mood for?"

"I don't know," she said. "I don't really have a mood right now except for, 'crap, crap, crap, this is not happening.'"

"It might not be," he said.

He stretched for an idea, but he couldn't think of anything off the top of his head, either. He grabbed from the DVD shelf at random, not even glancing at the title. With his luck, they'd be watching Empire Strikes Back or some other gimmicky bullshit, but he was willing to watch the whole fucking trilogy with her if it meant they had something to do for a while. "Go sit," he said, gesturing at the sectional. He turned on the television and the player, and he turned off the turntable. He unhooked Meredith's iPod and switched the stereo's input to the correct source. He popped the DVD into the player's tray, and he looked up to find Meredith sinking into the couch cushions with a sigh. Samantha flopped to the ground by her feet with a sigh.

"Do you want something from the kitchen?" he said. "Coffee or something? I can brew up some decaf for you before we start."

She shook her head. "Water?" she said instead.

He nodded and went to nuke himself a quick mugful of caffeine. He had a feeling he would need it today. After rifling through three unfamiliar cabinets, past pots, plates, and glasses, he found the coffee mugs in the fourth, and he grabbed his favorite double-sized mug, the royal blue one that said, "I 3 NYC," on the front. He dumped some instant coffee into it, filled it with water, and stuffed it into the microwave.

As he watched the numbers count down to zero, Meredith called, "Time! How long was that?"

He glanced at his watch. "Seventeen minutes and thirty-eight seconds," he called back. He restarted the timer. After they got a feel for what was going on, he'd stop, but... "Did that one hurt more?"

"No," she replied. "But not less, either."

He walked back into the living room with his steaming mug and a glass of water for her. He sat down on the sectional next to her, wrapped his arm over her shoulder, and told Samantha she could come up. The dog happily settled on his left side and rested her head against his thigh. He stroked her fur and reached for the DVD controller to hit play.

"What are we watching?" she said.

He shrugged. "I have no idea. I just grabbed."
"Oh," she said.

"Sorry. I'm just... not much good for making decisions right this second."

She pressed her lips against his shoulder. "No, I get it. Me, either."

They watched the opening credits roll.

"Sweet Home Alabama?" Meredith said, reading the title.

Derek watched as a pair of kids ran around on a beach during a lightning storm. Lightning struck the sand, and they screamed and ran the other direction. They argued. "Lightning never strikes the same place twice," said the boy. Then Derek realized they were talking about marriage. Then they kissed. Crap. What had he picked? This seemed...

"What is this about?" Derek said, words cautious.

"I don't know," Meredith said, grimacing. "I think it's a rom-com."

Derek frowned. "You don't know? Isn't it yours?"

"No," Meredith said. "Why would I own a chick flick? I don't do chick flicks."

He shrugged. "I hate to say it, but lately, you've done chick flicks, Mere." He put his palm against her womb and grinned. "Internal influences and all."

"Romance-y drama, yes, but not this stuff," she protested. And then she sighed. "Well, okay, there was that one with Hugh Grant, but—"

"But you read this stuff all the time."

"I read romances, Derek. With graphic, rutting, wild sex." She made a face at the television like she'd sucked a lemon. "I don't read cutesy, meet-cute... cuteness. Ick."

"So, your reading material is porn for women," he said.

"Yes!"

Derek snorted. "That explains it."

"Explains what?"

"Why in the hell you read those," he said. "I have the Internet. You have graphic literature."

She rolled her eyes as if to say, "Well, duh!" though she didn't open her mouth. "Izzie must have left this behind on the shelf or something," Meredith said.

They watched for a few moments. Reese Witherspoon walked down the street with a cup of coffee while pop-y top 40 music played. Derek sighed. He should have grabbed Star Wars.

Meredith snorted as Reese stepped into her apartment. Roses littered the entire space. Everywhere. Red ones. Yellow ones. It was like a florist shop had exploded. "It looks like she got attacked by one of your cheesy schemes," Meredith said.

"Hey," he said. "You love my cheesy schemes. Sometimes."
She kissed him. "I tolerate your cheesy schemes. I love you." And then her eyes widened. "Whoa. Rewind that."

"What?"

"Just... rewind it," she said.

He stepped the movie back a minute. They watched Reese discover the floral vomit in her apartment again. Reese checked her messages. A man spoke. Meredith gaped. "Holy crap. That sounds... just like you."

Derek frowned. "What? No, it doesn't."

"Yes," she said. "Yes, it does. Listen to him!"

"I don't sound like that," he said.

"Trust me," she said. "Yes, you do. That voice has your timbre and everything."

He shrugged, and they kept watching. Some sort of fashion show proceeded. Jesus Christ, what had he picked?

"Oh, my freaking god," Meredith said. She snatched the remote and jammed the pause button. She gestured at the television, waving the remote like an extension of her arm. "That's you! That's... That's you!" She peered at him, eyes narrowing. "Are you a secret movie star? Is this one of the things I haven't learned about you, yet?"

"Um," Derek said, looking at the man on the screen. He had blue eyes, dark, voluminous hair, and he wore a suit like a boss, but... "No. That's not me."

"It's so you!" she argued. She glanced to the screen, and back to him, to the screen, and back to him. "Minus the gray hair and the extra pinch to your crows' feet. He's like you with ten years subtracted or whatever. Crap, Derek, if that's not you, you have a doppelganger somewhere."

"Amnesia, Mere? Really?"

She sighed and un-paused the movie. "It's you."

"That accident was twenty years ago, not ten."

"Oh," she said. "Well, crap."

"Amnesia, Mere? Really?"

She sighed and un-paused the movie. "It's you." He watched. He supposed he saw the resemblance a little. Meredith sighed beside him, melting. "He even has your smile. You have such a great smile."

"I hope I get the girl," he said, and she elbowed him in the ribs.

"You have the girl," she said.

He grinned. "Touché." He pressed his lips to her temple.
They watched as the narrative proceeded and his doppelganger proposed to the woman in the middle of a Tiffany's somewhere in Manhattan. Meredith had become a relaxed pile of goo beside him, and she wore a misty look on her face.

"For a woman who hates chick flicks—" he started to say, but she elbowed him again.

"Shut up," Meredith said. "It doesn't count when I'm basically watching you be you."

He laughed. "Yes, dear," he said, a soft murmur. Reese and his doppelganger kissed in the back seat of a limo and talked about marriage. He let his eyelids droop, and he relaxed, not paying much attention. He enjoyed the quiet in his mind as he sat sandwiched between his dog and his wife.

"Time," Meredith said, and he raised his watch.

"Seventeen minutes five seconds," he read from the watch face, stomach sinking. "Rating?"

"Still a point five or so," she said. "They don't hurt much. It's just... like a little baby menstrual cramp that only lasts thirty seconds or so."

He nodded. One of the things that could distinguish Braxton-Hicks from actual labor was if the contractions didn't have any consistency to them. Real contractions were the body gearing up to push a baby out, not in a few weeks or days, but imminently. They didn't lessen or space themselves out more. They snowballed, until they were hard for a woman to even talk through. If the time increased or intensity decreased between one and the next, well, that was likely Braxton-Hicks. And, so far, whatever Meredith was experiencing, was progressing in a way that refused to be easily categorized. Stress coiled. He'd been hoping for an easy label, if only so they could stop wondering. He reset the timer. A few more, and they'd have a good baseline, and he could stop timing unless they got closer together or more intense.

They watched the rest of the movie, snarking back and forth at each other as he sipped on his coffee and she worked on her water. The expanse of sky beyond the windows began to brighten from black to twilight blue to faint pinks and yellows to the east. Meredith had five more contractions, no more or less painful than the first two. And all of them were about seventeen minutes apart. Like the universe knew he was trying to categorize this as real panic time or something to shake off and was giving him the finger.

When the credits rolled, Meredith said, "That's so freaking lame. She should have picked Doppelganger Derek. He's so much prettier."

He snorted. "Because being pretty is the first priority when choosing a potential husband."

"Whatever," Meredith grumbled. "It's Reese's loss."

He glanced at his watch. 6:30 am. He nudged Samantha after stroking her with his palm. "Off," he said, and she hopped down from the couch with a sneeze. She stopped to shake off, sending a small cloud of loose black fur flying everywhere while Derek stood and stretched. Meredith twitched, and her gaze shifted to the vacuum cleaner sitting by the steps as the cloud settled. "Meredith," he said, the word soft, and she looked at him. "We have a dog. There will be hair. Everywhere. I know you want it squeaky clean, but that one's a lost cause. If you stress about it, you'll drive yourself insane."

"I know; it's just..." Her fingers tightened into white-knuckled fists, and she gasped. "Time."

"I'm not timing them anymore," Derek said. "They seem pretty stuck at seventeen minutes right now."
She bit her lip. "Oh. Well, that was..."

"What?"

"A two," she said. "Maybe a... two point five. Not that bad, but I can't... really call that not ouch-y anymore."

He blinked. Tension coiled. _I don't-know-I don't-know-I don't-know_. "Oh."

Her eyes bugged, and the little panicked gasps started up again. "I don't think this is Braxton-Hicks, Derek. I..." She shifted on the sofa and grimaced. "Help me up!"

He offered her a hand, and she used him as a counterbalance to pull herself up to standing.

He pulled her into his arms and stroked her back as a lump formed in his throat. "There's time," he said, pulling his fingers through her hair. "We're okay." He kissed her. "Just breathe." He kissed her for the again. "And for the record, I'm not even on the same continent as calm, so I'm allowed to say that, and you're not an inadequate Debbie Downer. I'm talking to me, too. Okay?"

She snorted, pressing her face against his shirt. She nodded. "Okay," she said. Gasp. Gasp.

"Just breathe in," he said. He inhaled. She echoed him. One, two, three. "Out," he said, exhaling, and she copied. One, two, three. "In." One, two, three. "Out." One, two, three. The little gasps seemed to stop, then, and he didn't need to encourage her anymore. When he spoke, he used a low, soothing tone and said, "Why don't you pick a room for us to work on for a while, and I'll call Richard to book us off. Okay?"

"Okay," she said in a tiny voice.

He kissed her. It was still too early to tell if this was real or false labor, and while Dr. Charlton had told them no solids when active labor started, she'd recommended light fare prior to that, and if this was the real deal, he didn't want Meredith starving by the time it was too late to fix it. "Do you want me to make you some breakfast? Something easy. I could scramble some eggs for you."

"Okay," she said.

He nodded, squeezed her shoulder, and trudged back into the kitchen. Samantha trotted behind him as he pulled his phone from his pocket. Derek bent and plucked Samantha's empty metal bowl from the floor by the kitchen door. He frowned. The plastic tupperware they'd filled with kibble to tide them over was empty, which meant... dog food. Dog food. Where had the dog food been unpacked? He hit speed dial #9 while he searched through all the kitchen cabinets.

"Richard Webber," Richard said after picking up on the third ring, his voice almost lost in the chaotic background murmur and the unmistakable whine of the intercom.

"Hey, Richard," Derek said. He found the forty pound bag of kibble in one of the lower cabinets near the sink. He yanked. "I need..." He grunted when the bag succumbed to gravity and dropped to the floor with a thump. "I need you to cover for me today." Samantha tried to shove her nose into the big bag, but he kneed her in the shoulder blade, and she hopped back, giving him a whuff of indignation. "And I need you to find a replacement for Meredith. Her shift was supposed to start at 10:00 am."
"Sure," Richard said. "Is something wrong?"

"Well, we're not sure, yet," Derek said as he measured out four cups of kibble and dumped them into Samantha's bowl. "We think she might be in labor."

"Oh, that's wonderful news!" Richard said.

Derek sighed. "Yeah. Really great." Samantha hopped beside him, nails scrabbling on the tiled floor as he walked her bowl to the mat where her water dish sat. He put the bowl down, and Samantha attacked her food with gusto. "Look, can you not tell anyone else, yet? We're not sure, and I..." Samantha's snarfing noises filled the quiet. He pulled his fingers through his hair. He wanted some time. With his wife. Alone. If this was the real deal, he needed some quiet time to prepare before the shit hit the fan. If Meredith asked him to call her friends to come support her, he'd do it in a heartbeat, but... not until she asked. He needed... space.

"Yes," Derek said. "I'll call you back when we know." And then he hung up. He texted Dr. Charlton next. "Meredith might be in labor. We're keeping an eye on it."

In a matter of seconds, his phone beeped, and he read the response, "How far apart are her contractions?"

"About 17 minutes," he typed.

A longer pause this time. A beep. "Let me know if they get closer than ten minutes apart."

Numb, he stared at his phone until his eyes lost focus, and then he had two phones. And then he had no phones, because all he had was a slate-colored blur. The blur stretched. He hadn't expected to hear anything different. Two weeks was early but... not early enough to be considered at risk, or in need of intervention. Most OB's didn't try to stop pre-term labor after about thirty-four weeks, and Meredith was far beyond that. But...

He put his phone on the counter, leaned onto his elbows, and slumped over the countertop. God. What had been a comfortable two weeks away had become now, now, now, now in the space of hours, a persistent weight crushing in on all sides, and he didn't know... He... Oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. All of it thumped at his mental door, knocking and knocking and knocking. He swayed on his feet. Oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. His hands shook, and then the tremors spread to the rest of his body. He was on the jagged edges of the cliff before a panic attack. He knew it. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know.

Fuck, he couldn't afford this. He couldn't do this.

He closed his eyes and breathed. In and out and in and out. He thought about the future. The part that came after this... uncertainty. Hi, Baby, he imagined himself saying shakily as a tiny, wrinkled new life was placed in his arms. The life he and Meredith had made. He imagined himself smiling so wide his face hurt. Hi, Baby. It's Dad. Big, beautiful blue eyes would stare back at him. Newborns were so tiny. So new and untouched by violence or anything wrong in the world. He envied that, sometimes. That innocence. That newness. Hi, Baby.

A new replacement thought for himself, he decided, wiping the wetness from his eyes. He held his mind on that thought, frozen. He would get through this, and he would be there for Meredith, just like he'd promised, and he was okay. He was. He could do this. For her. For him. For Baby. He could.

His phone beeped. He took a deep breath, straightened, and picked it up. A text from Mark. "I'm on standby if you need me," it said, and Derek snorted. God, Richard couldn't keep a secret any better than Mark could. The two of them were a pair of guileless watermelons in a fucking watermelon patch. And, now, the whole hospital would know about Meredith in minutes.

"It's false labor," texted Lexie moments later. "It's got to be. Don't worry."

Followed by Cristina's, "Sweet. I just won money."

"Do you need us there?" Lexie added.

"No," he responded in moments, fingers flying over the keys. "Not yet. Thanks."

He put his phone back in his pocket, and he whipped up the eggs for Meredith. All of it was a blur of forced calm as he made himself breathe in and out on counts of three. Hi, Baby, he imagined himself saying as the frying pan simmered and spat somewhere in the peripheral of his awareness. It's Dad. Over and over. Hi, Baby. It's Dad. Each time, the scene in his head developed more elaborate details. What had been him and the baby alone in dark nothingness became him and the baby in the bright, noisy delivery room while Meredith panted on the bed beside him, exhausted. Doctors and nurses in scrubs churned in and out of the busy room. He sat by Meredith's hip, and he handed off their miracle to her, content to watch, open-mouthed, amazed, and stupefied, over Meredith's shoulder as mother and child bonded. She'd done the hard part, after all. Hi, Baby. It's Dad. He swallowed. I'm sorry I'm a mess. I'm trying so hard not to be. The scene repeated until he could feel Meredith's skin as their fingertips brushed. Could hear Baby gurgling. Could smell the sweat and blood of all that hard work. Hi, Baby. It's Dad.

He shook the mental picture away when he realized he was well on his way to burning the eggs. He saved them before they became inedible, though, and he didn't think Meredith knew the difference between perfect eggs and passable eggs. He bypassed salt and shook on some pepper to her taste, and then he scraped the passable eggs onto a plate. Samantha had long since finished her kibble feast by the back door and left the room, probably to find Meredith, but he wasn't sure what project Meredith had decided to tackle. Still, he had a feeling.

He found her in the nursery, sorting through the boxes stacked along the wall, and he handed her the steaming plate. "Bon appétit," he said with a flare of his hand and a wink of his eye, and she met his gaze with a hesitant smile. Better than panicking and gasping, by far, he decided.

She picked at the eggs more than ate, but at least it was something. When she set down the plate, half the bounty he'd cooked for her still a yellow blob on the surface, he snorted when he realized the eggs sort of matched the paint in the room. After some debate, they'd picked a shell-colored yellow, a unisex welcome for Baby that Meredith thought was cheerful but not an "eyesore of happy", and much less offensive than pink, if Baby did turn out to be a girl.

The next few hours passed in a slow crawl.

Meredith unpacked the smaller boxes while he tried to figure out the instructions for assembling the crib. He swore the directions were in Swahili. The diagram was nonsensical and told him to insert tabs into slots that didn't exist. The coup de grace on his construction endeavor was that he had no idea where to find his tools. He wasn't a Mr. Fix-it by any stretch of the imagination, but he had the basics, enough to keep a house running without the need to call in a specialist for every minor breakdown and loose screw. Wrenches, hammers, screwdrivers, a tiny hacksaw, and some other things, all tucked into a bright green toolbox that had made it into the moving van, but fuck all if he knew where it'd ended up after. Worse, still, half the stuff they needed to make the nursery functional hadn't even been bought, yet. They'd been waiting to see what came their way at the baby shower. His mother had volunteered to go shopping with them after the shower to pick up the remaining odds and ends after they inventoried everything, and to get everything set up once they'd finished that.

By 10:30 am, Meredith didn't have anywhere left to put all the remaining loose items, of which there were box loads, and he had a half-assembled, off-balance, useless wooden heap that sort of resembled... a cage. A cage for bad dogs and little children. He'd made a sort of jail for their child. Wonderful. He rolled his eyes and kicked the heap, just a tap with his toe to see how stable it was. It wasn't. The wood creaked, and then the rectangle sank into a parallelogram with a wheezy sound.

"That doesn't look right," Meredith said, only to stop and bite her lip. She'd been stopping now and then to deal with a contraction, but this was... worse. Worse than the other ones. Her expression changed from frowning confusion at the parallelogram-crib into pinched discomfort. She supported her belly with one hand, her back with the other, and rocked from foot to foot like she was trying to escape pain. Her eyes brightened with suffering. "Ow. Okay, this is... ow." She kept swaying. "Ow."

He stepped over the pile of junk on the floor to grab her shoulders. He rubbed her back and whispered at her. "It's okay, Mere," he murmured. "Deep breaths. In through the nose. Out through the mouth. You're doing really great." Her choppy breathing evened out as she listened to him. "I'm right here."

Fifty seconds, and it was over, and she slumped against him. "Owwww," she moaned, her tone deep and low and wounded in a way that made his insides tight, and he hurt. He hurt watching her hurt. "They're getting worse," she said. "Like... way worse. That was like... a six."

His heart thumped in his chest, and the whine started again. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. But he shoved it away, and he hit the timer button on his watch. The numbers began to climb from zero. "Let's see where we're at," he said.

She rested against him, and he held her, and they waited. He rubbed her back with slow, reassuring strokes. She pushed into his touch like she was dying in a desert, and he was water, more so the lower his hands went. He found a spot between her hips, on either side of her spine, and pressed, and she moaned. He pressed harder, and she pressed back into him, until he had to lean into her to counterbalance.

"It hurts that bad already?" he said.

"Yeah," she said. "Don't stop. Please, don't stop."

"Okay," he said, and he pushed so hard his limbs shook, but if it helped her, he'd do it forever.

When the next contraction hit, he hit stop on the timer, but didn't look, yet. "It's okay," he said. "You're okay. The way she moaned made his mouth dry and his hands shake. "Deep, slow breaths." This reminded him of after the liver transplant surgery. She'd been miserable, and he'd ended up having to carry her from the bed to the bathroom to pee, because she hurt so bad she couldn't walk. She'd sat on the toilet and cried while he'd stood in the doorway with his back turned, trying futilely to give her some privacy. Fuck, that had been awful to watch and to hear. It made him feel so fucking helpless, and he hadn't even been sick back then. This was... worse. So much worse.
"I don't like these!" she said in a panicky voice, a knife to his heart that twisted and twisted and twisted.

"It's okay. It's okay. You're doing great. I'm here." A litany.

"Can you push some more?" she said. "Push my..."

He got the message. He leaned into her, like he'd been doing before, low on her back on either side of her spine. He jabbed her with his fists, leaning into it with all of his weight. One benefit of this, at least, was that she couldn't see that he was shaking, because he stood behind her. He kept murmuring in her ear, pushing into her until she relaxed and took a final long, slow breath. He relaxed and took a long, slow breath, too.

He looked at his watch. Nine minutes, thirty-eight seconds. Fuck.

"I really don't think this is Braxton-Hicks," she said.

A few seconds passed. "Okay, this is probably it, then," their OB replied. "Just keep watching that timer. Bring her into the hospital when you get close to five minutes apart. Congrats!"

He blinked at the text. Congrats. Jesus. This was really it. Congrats. Jesus, he...

"Derek?" Meredith said.

"Derek!" Meredith snapped, and he blinked and shook his head.

"Sorry," he said. He pulled his fingers through his hair, agitated. "Sorry, I..."

She kissed him. "It's okay. I'm okay. You're okay. We're okay. The ending is worth the scary crap in the middle, remember?"

"Yeah," he said.

He sent out a group text to his family and to Richard and to Meredith's friends. Meredith's definitely in labor, he typed. We're waiting to go to the hospital. Standby.

The frantic deluge of beeps as his phone received replies overwhelmed him. He put the phone in his pocket without looking at them. He couldn't handle his family right now when he barely had a handle on himself. They each packed duffle bags to take to the hospital when it was time to leave, and he took them out to the car and put them in the trunk. After that, though, it was a waiting game with Meredith's body dictating the pace. It'd taken her seven hours or so to get from seventeen minutes to ten minutes between contractions. He imagined they had a while, yet, before the trip to the hospital.

When he came back inside from the garage, he found her on the floor by the couch on all fours with a sofa cushion stuffed under her chest, neck, and head, rocking forward and backward. He dropped to the ground beside her and ran his hand along her spine. "Thank you," she said, muttering miserably into the pillow. And then the tension dripped out of her, and she relaxed. She turned to look at him. "Oh, my god, why did I sign up for this?"
"I'm sorry," he felt compelled to say. This was, after all, fifty percent his fault.

"Shut up," she told him. "I probably have like six more hours of this crap before the bad part starts." Then her eyes widened. "Derek, this isn't even the bad part."

He swallowed. That thought had not escaped him. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. "I know," he said. He brushed his fingers through her hair. He'd been there for Rachel the whole time when Cody had been born. Steve had been out of town on a business trip, and Rachel hadn't had anybody there with her. She'd called him, frantic, in the middle of the night, because he lived the closest to her, and so he'd gone over to help. He'd done this before. He had. It'd been a lot less stressful as a caring bystander, though. He scraped his brain for an idea. "You want to take a walk?" he said. "It might help a little."

She sniffed, and she nodded. "Yeah."

"Outside?" he said. "We could take Samantha down to the lake."

"Okay," she said.

He helped her move to the couch and went to find her shoes in their bedroom. He grabbed a hat for her, too. And one for him. He wasn't sure she'd want one, but he figured he'd offer. When he came back downstairs, Meredith was stroking Samantha, almost nose to nose with her. "The miracle of life is crap," Meredith said to the dog. "It's crap! I wish we had storks."

Derek couldn't help but snort.

Samantha licked Meredith's nose, and Meredith laughed. He helped her put on her shoes. She could barely reach her feet anymore, and that was with some serious stretching. He tied the laces for her, and then he handed her one of the baseball caps he'd grabbed. That was when the dog figured out what was going on and started galloping in circles.

"Go grab your ball!" he told her, and she looked at him manically, bouncing and leaping. "Go grab your ball!" he repeated, and she had an indecisive moment where she ran toward the front door, and then back to him, and then toward the door, and then she took off toward the kitchen. She came back with her favorite slobber-covered tennis ball and dropped it at his feet. He snatched it from the floor and then helped Meredith stand.

The day was perfect. Partially cloudy. From the damp grass, he could tell it had rained last night, but they were gifted with sunshine, now. Crepuscular rays burst through the puffy clouds, sending shafts of light into the ground like blades. A calm breeze billowed against his skin. The air was about sixty degrees, and he stopped to inhale the fresh, wet scent of grass and earth from the stoop. Miles of green and gray and blue spread out from the house in all directions. A cackling flock of water birds launched into the air from the east, the direction of the lake, and he watched them sail along the horizon and disappear out of sight behind the tree line. Meredith grinned at him when he looked back at her.

"What?" he said.

She shrugged. "You and your nature-y goodness and your space."

"I like it out here," he said. He sighed. "It's quiet."

"It suits you," she said. "I like it, too." She rested her head against his shoulder. "I'm glad we have a new house. I like our house."
"Me, too," he said, looking back at their two-story, brick home.

He swallowed. He was very much looking forward to making new memories here. A new life. He pressed his palm to Meredith's womb. A new family. For all the fear and panic in his life over this event, the endpoint of all of it hung in his mind's eye like the treasure at the end of a rainbow.

A family. With Meredith.

They were making one.

Right this moment.

She sucked in a breath and grabbed his arm, as if she'd heard his train of thought somehow. She used her other hand to support her belly. Her nails dug into his skin, and a sound of pain caught deep in the back of her throat as she exhaled, long and slow. "Shh, it's okay," he said, urging her down the steps as he rubbed her back. "You're doing great, Mere. See if walking it out helps. I'm right here."

She followed, steps a little shaky, and he slowed his pace. He wound up a good throw and sent Samantha's ball flying over the fence and into the distance. Samantha bounded after it, barking. The ball bounced and disappeared into the tall, wild grass beyond the manicured evenness of their lawn. Samantha ran through the open gate, kicking up dirt and grass bits behind her scrabbling paws, and then her stocky body disappeared into the brush. She was too short to show up over the tall stalks rustling in the wind, but he could see them mowing down in a line as she barreled through them in the direction the ball had flown.

"Tell me a story, Mere," he said, trying to distract her as they walked. The path to the lake started just beyond the fence.

"What?" she said, grimacing. She inhaled a long breath through her nose and blew it out through her mouth. "Like what?"

"Anything," he said. They reached the narrow footpath. He shut the gate behind them, closing the metal latch.

"I can't just come up with something on the spot!" she insisted, relaxing into as slump as the contraction passed. "Give me a topic?"

"Hmm," he said, thinking. A blue jay loosed an earsplitting jay jay jay from a low hanging branch nearby, and then spread its wings to drift down to the ground. It stuck its blue-crested head to the ground and came back up with something wriggling and frantic caught in its beak. "Never have I ever joined the mile high club."

She snorted. "That's no fair. You know I did that."

Samantha came back with the ball clutched between her teeth, a triumphant, happy look on her face. He took the ball from her and shifted it in his grip. Her slobber was sticky and cold against his fingertips. He threw the ball again for her, launching it back into the thick grass as far as he could send it, and brushed off his hand on his sweatpants, leaving a dirty smear behind.

"But you never told me the story," he said, watching Samantha chase her bounty.

She peered at him. "Does bad sex with a Frenchman really warrant a story?"

He grinned. "A Frenchman, huh?"
"Yes," she said. "And, seriously, plane sex is not all it's cracked up to be."

"Oh, it's not?" he said, raising his eyebrows.

"Remember our elevator sex?"

"How in the hell would I forget that?" he said. Samantha came back with the ball, and he threw it again.

She shrugged. "Imagine the elevator is ten times smaller, there's TP on the floor sticking to your shoes, and it smells like pee."

"That's...," he said, "an image."

"Yes," she said with a sigh. "And after the sex in a closet that smells like pee, you have to do the walk of shame down a narrow aisle with dozens of people staring at you, and they all know exactly what you just did."

"So, I shouldn't add it to my bucket list, then," he said.

"No." She shook her head. "Just no." And then she looked at him. "You'd have to bribe me with lots more than just sex for me to even consider that."

He nodded. Grinned. "Noted."

He tossed the ball for Samantha again. The scenery slowly changed. Grass became bracken and vines and tall, leafy bushes, and the trees condensed into a thick clot forest. With the onset of spring, the deciduous trees had begun to find their leaves again. Red alder. Big leaf maple. Beaked hazelnut. Paper birch. Mixed with those, evergreens towered, perennially covered in green, sticky needles. Cedars and Douglas firs and hemlocks. The footpath wove in and out of the towering conifers. Someone had a fire burning in the distance somewhere, and the pleasant scent of woodsmoke filled the air. A chorus of birdsongs coiled around them, and he found it hard to resist stopping to inhale the wet air again. He found it hard not to feel... more alive here. He loved it here. After living in Seattle for nearly four years, he had no idea how he'd ever survived in Manhattan.

"Never have I ever had sex on the beach," she said, pulling him from his musing.

"Trust me," he said, grimacing, "you don't want to."

"Really?" she said. "It seems so..."

"Chafes," she echoed.

He nodded. "Yes."

She laughed. "Poor Little Derek." He raised an eyebrow at her, and she rolled her eyes. "Poor Above-Average Derek."

He chuckled at her expression.

Samantha trotted back to them, panting, her little stump tail wagging. The forest closed over their heads, dimming the sun, and the dirt path became a crushed, trodden layer of pine needles, decaying leaves, and other compost. He threw the ball, and his dog sent a pair of deer leaping from the underbrush under a nearby birch tree as she chased after it. The deer pranced away into the distance, white tails flopping behind them, tiny cloven hooves flashing. They zipped into the brush. Samantha didn't seem to know whether to chase the ball or the deer. She barked, bounding after the deer, but doubled back after a few strides, and then she put her nose to the ground in search of her tennis ball.

Meredith stopped moving, biting her lip. She took a deep, slow breath and pushed it out, and then she kept moving. He rubbed her back, pushed with his fist at the spot she liked. Her shoulders were tense. Her back... tense. "The walking," she said, the words faint, "It does help a bit." Her last word trailed into an unhappy, tight moan.

"That's good," he said. "I'm glad." Their feet scuffed in the dirt and wet plant refuse. "You're doing really great, Mere."

She nodded. "Are you timing these?"

"No," he said. "Do you want me to?"

She sniffed and relaxed, and the pained pinch left her eyes. She stopped walking. Her eyes closed. "Yes," she said. "Yes, time them. I want to go as soon as..." She swallowed. "I want to go." She looked up at him. I'm scared, said her wide-eyed gaze, and I want this to be over, now. His heart squeezed. "I'm having a baby, Derek. Like right now. I'm giving birth."

He swallowed. "Yeah, you are. How are you doing?"

"I'm giving birth," she said. "I'm... it's a lot to wrap my mind around. It's... really freaking big." And then she laughed and wiped her eyes. "Crap, Derek, if you'd told me when you woke up on my floor naked with a hangover that this is where I'd be, now, I'd have laughed in your freaking face."

He snorted. "If you'd told me, when I woke up on your floor naked with a hangover, that you'd be my wife and the mother of my children, I think I'd have laughed, too."

She rose onto her tiptoes and kissed him. Her fingers squeezed the nape of his neck, ran through his hair. He sighed, sinking into her touch. "Here's to one night stands," she murmured.

"Hmm," he purred against her ear. "Cheers to that."

When he pulled away, he cupped her cheek, meeting her soft stare with his own. This close to her, above the woodsmoke, and above the wet earth, he could scent lavender, and he let it drift through his parted lips and brush the back of his throat. They shared a long moment, just looking. And then they kept walking. Samantha returned with the ball, and he launched it into the dark, wet forest.

"Never have I ever had sex with Sadie," he said as they trudged along.

She looked at him with an incredulous raise of her eyebrows, and she snorted. "You're just never going to let that go, are you?"

"Nope," he said, grinning. "Spill."

"Well, you struck out," she said, jabbing him with her elbow. "Hah! So, there."

He blinked. "Wow. Really?"
"Really, Derek," she said, rolling her eyes. "Never have I ever... TPed a house."

"I..." He sighed. "Yes."

"Ooh, got you!" she said, a pleased grin stretching across her face. "Derek the Lawful broke the law?"

"Mark made me help." He tossed Samantha's ball again.

"Whose house did you TP? Some hapless innocent?"

"Well, we were aiming for his football coach. This was back in high school. Some of the starters wanted to do it as a joke. I got dragged along and made into the lookout."

"Did you get caught?" she said.

"No," he said. "I was an excellent lookout if I do say so myself."

"Admit it," she said. "You wanted to throw up."

"I don't make a good rule breaker," he said, tone sheepish. He felt heat creep across his face when he thought of the drugs he'd abused. "At least, I didn't used to."

"What did the coach think of all this?"

He shrugged. Some sort of winged insect the size of a peanut buzzed as it zipped past his face, and an interested sparrow chirped overhead, hopping down a branch to get a closer look at its prey. "We'll never know," he said. "We got the wrong house. We drove by in the morning to survey our handiwork, and some poor elderly man none of us knew was on the stoop talking to the cops."

"Oh, my god," she said. "Really?"

"Yes," he said. He tossed Samantha's ball. "I felt awful. I wanted to confess, but then I would have had a whole football team trying to kill me, so I stayed quiet."

"Is that how they got you to go?" she said, the word go trailing into a groan. She leaned into him, her weight almost dead against him as her grip tightened and her teeth clenched and her body tensed.

He reached for his watch and started his timer, and then he wrapped his arms around her, listening to hear breath in and out and in and out, slow, but with a forceful, shaky edge that spoke of pain. "Doing great, Mere. You're doing great. How bad are these? I started the timer."

"Still sixes," she said tensely. "But... it's a lot of sixes in a row, and it... Mmm." Her fingers tightened, pulling up the skin on his forearm into her clutching fist. He clenched his jaw, but he said nothing about it. He let her ride it out, taking it out on him. If it helped... he was happy to. You can break both, as long as you explain it to my insurance company, he'd said when she'd asked him if she could break his hands during the birth.

"So, you wanted to fit in, and you let Mark drag you because of that?" she said, muscles loosening. She let go of his arm.

"Not one of my finer moments," he admitted. "Dad had died only a year before. I wasn't dealing with that very well."

"You were a kid," she said. "Kids do stupid stuff, even when they're not grieving."
"I suppose," he said.

She cradled her womb. "I imagine our kid will do stupid stuff, too."

"More stupid than we did?" Derek said.

Meredith snickered. "Bet you $100 that our child does something way more stupid. Baby has genes from both of us, after all, and I was essentially a juvenile delinquent."

He laughed. "I'll see that bet and raise you $50."

Trees and bracken turned into cattails and mud. The path dumped out onto the lake right near the rickety dock that had been there when he'd purchased the land. The water sloshed and slurped against the struts of the dock. Tiny waves unfurled and slapped into the mud at the edges of the lake. Pings of insects and fish hit the surface of the water from underneath. A heron glided low over the water and came to a rest in the reeds about fifty feet away. The scent of wet earth tickled his nose.

He threw Samantha's ball out onto the water, and the dog took a running leap and dove into the lake with a splash. She paddled out to where the tennis ball floated on the surface, grabbed it, and swum back to them. When she reached the edge of the water, she shook herself off, sending water droplets flying everywhere in a wet cloud. She brought the soaked ball back to him, and he palmed it.

The lake on his property wasn't huge, probably a mile or two in circumference, and the path ran around it in a loose circle. He wasn't sure he wanted to risk getting stuck out on the other side of the lake with Meredith's labor suddenly shifting into high gear, so he turned an about face instead of continuing along the side. Meredith followed his lead without comment. He tossed the ball ahead, and Samantha darted back into the woods to chase after it.

"Never have I ever... kissed Sadie?" he said.

She rolled her eyes. "I swear, you're like a dog with a freakin' bone."

"I'm merely seizing an opportunity, though I do, on occasion, have a bone," he said with a wink.

She stared at him for a long moment, an unamused expression on her face.

"What?" he said, smirking. "You left that word hanging there, just waiting for me to make a joke, daring me to, even."

"Daring you," she said, incredulous.

"Yes," he said, nodding. "Yes, that was a dare. That's what I'm calling it."

She shook her head at him, and her upper body twitched, like she'd laughed, but not loud enough for him to hear. She crumpled against him moments later, though, a breathless sound of pain spilling from her lips. "Ow, ow, ow, ow," she whined.

He swallowed, levity gone like it had been a lightning strike. He hit the button on his timer and held her, running his hand up and down her back. "Slow breaths, Mere," he coached. "In through the nose. One. Two. Three. Out through the mouth. You're doing so great."

"Yes," she said, exhalation buffeting his shirt.
He frowned. "Yes?"

"Yes, I've kissed her," she said, her tone tight. She inhaled, one, two, three, and he stroked her hair. She scrunched her hands so hard against his shirt he could hear the stretchy cotton squeaking from the friction of her skin, and she came to rest with her fingers clutching his clavicle like it was a ledge, and she was falling. "Are you happy, now?" she said, exhaling, one, two, three.

He peered at her. "Did you kiss her with tongue?"

A bark of laughter skipped loose from her lips. "Yes, I experimented," she said, and her whole body relaxed like a tide had receded. She took another deep breath and blew it out. "Is that what you wanted to know?"

"Somehow, my victory feels hollow," he said. "And underwhelming."

"Well, we all live with crushing disappointments," she said airily.

"I suppose," he said. "9:35, by the way. Still the same."

"Crap, really?" she said.

He gave her an apologetic look. "I wouldn't joke about that, Mere. I know you're scared, and that it hurts." When he was sure she had her footing, he let her go, but she didn't move away. She rested against him, weight pressing into him.

Samantha came back with her ball and dropped it at their feet, stump tail wagging. When Derek didn't move to pick it up, she sat down in the leaves and pine needles and waited, panting. "Good girl," he said. He frowned at Meredith, who still hadn't moved. "Are you okay?"

"I'm just a little tired," she said, the words soft.

Which had to be an understatement. He rubbed her back. He glanced at his watch. It was past noon. She'd been having contractions for about eight hours already, and she'd been up... who knew how long?

"We'll rest when we get back to the house," he said. He kissed her. "Less than a mile. Can you make it that far?" He wasn't sure what he would do if she said no. This trail was too narrow to drive his SUV down safely without risk of scraping the paint off the sides. He'd carry her, probably. He was worn out from yesterday, but he could handle her weight long enough to get her home.

"Yes," she said, rescuing him from having to worry more about it. "Just give me a few minutes."

"Anything," he said.

They rode through another contraction before they started moving again. More concerned with Meredith, he let Samantha carry her own ball for a while, and he walked with his arm wrapped over Meredith's shoulder. The trees swayed in the breeze. A rustle of leaves filled the air. They walked in a verdant cavern.

"Never have I ever... fallen from a tree," Meredith said, her gaze directed at the treetops overhead. He shook his head. "Nope."

"Really? Huh."

"What makes you think I fell out of a tree?" he said.
She shrugged, reaching to give Samantha a stroke. The dog trotted happily beside them. "I have no idea," Meredith said.

"Never have I ever—"

"Something not sexy," she said with a tired tone. "Please."

He frowned. "Why not?"

"Because I'm trying very hard not to think about the exhausting, bowling-ball-sized consequences right now." She looked at him. "That's the whole point of this game, right?"

He snorted. "I'm that transparent, am I?"

"Yes, but I love you anyway."

He squeezed her shoulder. "Okay," he said. "Not sexy. Hmm."

She snorted.

"What?" he said, eyebrows raised.

"It figures you'd need a time bonus for this one," she said. "You're lucky I don't have a buzzer."

The walk back to the house took another thirty minutes or so at their slower pace. He left Meredith in the living room, relaxing on the couch with a box of saltines to munch on if she wanted, and a glass of water to drink. She closed her eyes and seemed content to sit there without talking. He sat down in his hulking chair across from Meredith and took care of his phone while she rested.

His call history had exploded with missed calls and texts while he'd been busy ignoring it. His first text, one from Rachel said, "Haha. April Fools?" And her second one twenty minutes later said, "APRIL FOOLS RIGHT?" And her third text ten minutes after that said, "OMFG NOT FUNNY YOU JERK." And then four minutes after that, "I'm in the market for a new brother. Know of any?"

He snorted, realizing what the date was. "No. Real deal," he responded. "Sorry, a little busy over here."

He didn't have to wait more than a minute for, "Really?! Hospital, yet?"

"OMG OMG keep me posted! :) :)"

He snorted, shaking his head. He answered a sedate, "How's it going over there?" from Mark with the same info he'd given Rachel.

Cristina had sent, "Can you tell her to hurry up?" about twenty minutes ago.

"I wouldn't hold your breath," Derek typed in response. "This doesn't seem like it's moving anywhere fast."

A few seconds passed. "Do I have time for an aortic aneurysm dissection?"

He blinked. He didn't know offhand how long those took, but he couldn't imagine Meredith giving birth anytime in the next eight hours, and that was a big enough window for most procedures. "Sure, why not?" he typed with a shrug.
"..." was her response.

"What?" he typed.

"You're lucky I'm obligated to tolerate you," she replied.

He frowned at that for a long moment, but decided to move on.

Next up was his mother. "I'm so happy for you, sweetheart!" she'd said. "How are you doing?"

"I'm okay," he responded.

She clearly didn't believe him, though, because she replied, "Just take a deep breath, and remember the little bundle of joy you two will get at the end of this."

He swallowed against the lump that formed in his throat. I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know. He wasn't sure what to say to that without shattering into a million pieces, so he just typed, "Thanks."

He frowned. Still fifty-seven unanswered texts. Jesus. He gave up trying to give everybody individual attention and ended up sending out another group text with a short update, only to receive another flood of cheering and congratulations and well-wishers wishing.

He set his phone down on the end table and took a deep breath and blew it out. He watched Meredith snap awake from a doze and put her hands on her belly. The look of misery on her face tore at him, and her moan made him feel like his stomach was dropping out of his body. He wasn't equipped for this, he decided. Seeing her in pain. He wasn't... The oh-god-am-I-ready, how-do-PTSD-and-fatherhood-mix, how-do-I-do-this, and I-don't-know-I-don't-know-I-don't-know banged in his skull. He tried to ignore it. He moved to her side as she drooped, and the contraction passed. He put his hand on her back.

"Do you need anything right now?" he said, a quiet murmur against her ear.

"Maybe, just sit here with me?" she said in a warbling, tiny voice.

He nodded. "Sure. Do you want to watch a movie? Or just sit?"

She rubbed her eyes. She put her head on his shoulder. "Just sit," she murmured, yawning. She fell into a doze in moments, her breaths soft and even against him, and so he stayed with her, coaching and comforting when she woke up, and offering quiet proximity when she slept.

Time crawled. She was still hovering at about 9:30 minutes for each contraction by 3:45 pm, seemingly stalled out. She'd recuperated enough energy from her dozing to not want to nap by then, so he did another random movie grab. Some documentary about the International Space Station he couldn't remember ever buying. Meredith made a face when she saw the title and looked at him with an apologetic expression.

"Can we watch the trilogy instead?" she said. "Please?"

She didn't need to specify which trilogy she meant. "The whole trilogy?" he said with a sigh.

She bit her lip. "It's just that... it's my happy place, and I'd really like to be there right now."

He kissed her temple. Hi, baby. It's Dad. He understood all about happy places. And he could live with Star Wars just this once if it meant giving her a mental break from stress like his did. "You're very lucky I love you so much," he said, and he rose from the couch to change the movie. "Which of your thirty-two million copies would you like to watch?"

"Oh, um," she said, frowning. "Letterbox VHS." She made a face. "No, DVD." Another face. "Wait, no, blu-ray! I haven't seen the blu-ray, yet."

"You bought it, but you never watched it?" Derek said.

She shrugged. "I was saving it for a rainy day. Today is pretty freaking rainy, metaphorically speaking or whatever."

"You're not going to recite the dialog line for line while we watch, are you?" Derek said. "You're not one of those people, right?"

She snorted. "No, I'm not one of those people."

"Oh, good."

She gave him a serious look. "You're sure this is okay? If it's too explode-y for you, we don't have to."

He hadn't watched any of these since... their first release in the movie theaters. He'd caught snippets here and there, seen a few minutes as he'd walked through the room while Meredith was watching, but he'd never joined her. She'd never asked him to before, a fact for which he'd been grateful. He knew there were explosions, though. Hell, the Death Star exploded at the end of the first and the third ones. For her, though, since she'd asked on today of all days, he was willing to give it a try.

"I'm not sure, but I'll let you know," he said, opting for honesty.

She frowned at him. "Don't flog yourself through it. If it's not okay, we'll stop."

He kissed her. "I'll let you know, Meredith. I swear."

With the volume low, they made it through Star Wars and The Empire Strikes Back without him having too much difficulty. Blasters didn't trigger him like guns did, and he could watch without getting too jittery. Lightsaber fights were so gimmicky and fantastical they didn't even trip his violence meter. And the space battles were okay when they were quiet, and with the volume turned down, they were. He could admit, though, when he said he hated Star Wars, that it wasn't the first two titles in the trilogy he thought of when he was saying that he hated it. It was the third. He loathed the third. Still, even with Return of the Jedi, he almost made it through. Almost.

In the last few minutes, something tripped in his brain. Just snapped. Luke was trying to escape the Death Star with a mortally wounded Darth Vader. Derek's chest tightened, and his lungs strained to give him air. Meredith snatched the remote and hit pause, looking at him with concern. He cleared his throat and gave her an apologetic look. There were only a couple minutes left. "You can watch the rest; I'll be back in a minute," he croaked before he fled into the kitchen to refill his drink and clear his head.

"Sorry I bailed," he said when he came back as the credits were rolling.

Meredith had her eyes shut, and she was straining through another contraction. She shook her head, blowing a breath out slowly through her lips. "It's okay," she said, words so faint he struggled to hear her. She inhaled, one, two, three. The sky outside the house had darkened in the course of their marathon. He flipped on the lamp and joined her on the couch. "It's... Derek." A deep, low, rattling moan that set his teeth on edge followed when she exhaled, one, two three. Her eyes watered. "This really hurts," she said, a bare, tortured whisper that cut his heart out.

Her contractions had been getting worse as time had gone on, the space between them shrinking from 9:30ish minutes to 8:00ish minutes or so. He glanced at his watch. They'd killed another seven hours or so. She was making progress. But it was glacial. At this rate, they wouldn't be headed to the hospital until tomorrow.

"You're doing great, Mere," he murmured. "You're doing so great. I'm right here."

When she finally relaxed, he couldn't help but sigh in relief. Jesus, he was not equipped for this. For watching this. And it made him hurt to his bone marrow knowing however bad this was to watch, it was far worse to be stuck in it, experiencing it. A helpless feeling crushed him in its vise.

"Why is this taking so long?" she said, words rasping and tired. "It shouldn't take so long."

He kissed her. "It can take a while, Mere. Especially for first time mothers. This is definitely on the long side, but it's not worrisome, yet."

"Something is wrong," she said. "It has to be."

"Shh," he said. "Nothing is wrong. I promise. And I know this is hard, this is so hard, but you're doing great, and I'm here, and you'll get through this."

She nodded mutely against him. "Okay," she said. "Okay."

"How bad was that last one?" he said.

"Seven or eight," she said. She looked at him. "I just want to be done. Please, Derek, I want to be done. I want to have Baby, and I want to be done."

"I know," he said. He pulled his fingers through her hair. "I know you do." He held her, letting the moments pass. She dozed beside him until another contraction had her squeezing his shoulder hard enough to leave bruises. When it left her, she rested against him, peering at nothing through half-lidded eyes. "It's after ten, Mere. Do you want to try lying down for a bit?" He'd been up for over eighteen hours, and his head was getting fuzzy. He couldn't imagine how she felt.

"I can't sleep like this," she said, the words hoarse. "It hurts, Derek."

"I know. I know it does. But lying down in the dark so you can rest a little between them might help."

She gave him a hopeless look that slew him. "Okay," she said.

He assisted her up the stairs and helped her change into her favorite soft pajamas. He stacked up all their pillows on her side of the bed, and he held her hand, giving her something to balance with as she settled gingerly onto their new mattress. She sank back into the pillows. He lay beside her on his side, scooting close, until his body pressed into hers. He pulled the covers over them. He rubbed her shoulder to elbow in soothing strokes.

"Is this a little better?" he said.

She grabbed his hand when he wandered to her belly, pulled it over the swell of her womb to her chest, and she held it there. "A little," she said in a tiny voice.
"Okay," he said. "Let me know if I can get you anything, okay?"

"Okay," she said.

Her grip on his hand tightened to the point of pain. His knuckles mashed together, and he was pretty sure she'd cut off all circulation beyond his wrist, but he clenched his teeth, and he said nothing, just letting her ride it out.

"We can try a warm shower in a bit," he suggested when her grip relaxed again. "That might help, too."

She was silent for a long time. "Okay," she said after too long.

"I'm here, Mere," he reiterated. "I'll be here the whole time. You will get through this. You're the strongest person I know, and you're going to be fine, and I love you."

She sniffed. "Okay."

He closed his eyes, letting his thoughts space a little. God, he was tired. This was just... exhausting. This whole thing. Trying to be there for her, unwavering, while struggling to keep his own head together. And he felt like a fucking hypocrite for even thinking about this when his wife was lying next to him, struggling through the eighteenth hour of labor.

"M'right here," he mumbled. "You can do this."

Another hour passed. Another. He coached her through contraction after contraction after contraction. He remembered seeing the red, blurry face of the clock hit midnight and keep chugging past that into the early morning.

Cristina held out a squalling bundle of blankets to him. "The baby's crying," she said.

"I know," he said, wincing at the loud shriek threatening to pierce his eardrums.

They stood facing each other in a dark, frothing mist. Cristina pushed the baby at him. "You should be taking care of this."

Another shriek. His heart pounded. "I know."

"Why aren't you taking care of this?" Cristina said.

Another shriek. His throat closed, and he choked. "I can't. I can't. It's just so noisy."

Cristina rolled her eyes. "It's a baby, you moron. Of course it's noisy. Deal with it!" She pushed forward an inch, into his space.

"I'm trying," he said. "I can't..."

She sighed. "You can't do anything right, can you?"

"Cristina, please, I... Please, I can't."

"You're pathetic."

"Just give me a second," he insisted, trying to breathe. "I just need a second."

"Babies don't give you a second!" Cristina said.
And then the scene changed. The crying stopped. Cristina disappeared. And he stood on the rickety old dock at his lake. Waves lapped at the shore. The water shimmered. A flock of ducks bobbed on the surface in the distance.

"Stop flagellating yourself," said a soft, familiar voice beside him. "You'll do fine."

Derek blinked at the scene of cut leather and cedar as it swept against the back of his throat. He turned and saw himself with a straight nose. A fuller face. But still the same crow's feet and the curly, raven-brown hair. They were equal in height, now, though the man Derek remembered had been so much taller. He swallowed. His eyes burned.

"I wish you were real," Derek said.

His father stared back at him, eyes twinkling. "Who says I'm not?"

"But... you died."

His father nodded. "I know. I'm so sorry about that. I never wanted you to grow up like that."

Derek turned to look at the lake. "I don't know how to do this."

His father stepped closer, the space between them closing to inches. A warm, sure hand cupped Derek's shoulder and squeezed. "I didn't know either, you know."

Derek wiped his eyes. "What were you going to say? When you died. You told me to listen, and that it was important."

A wide, devastating grin curled his father's lips. "You're already doing it, Derek. I'm so proud of you."

"Doing what?" Derek said.

"The advice I was going to give," his father said. "Live. Love. Pursue your dreams. Find the woman who completes you. It's always magic when you meet the right one, isn't it?"

A tear jagged down Derek's face. "God, I wish you were real."

His father chuckled. "Oh, come on, now. The son I raised believes in magic."

Derek peered back at him with a flat gaze. "I don't," he said. "Not anymore."

"That's a shame." His father watched the lake for a moment. "You should wake up, now."

Derek blinked. "What?"

"It's time, Derek." His father grinned. "Don't worry. You'll do fine."

"Derek!" Meredith snapped, and he blinked awake.

"Wha?" he said, squinting muzzily at her in the darkness. She'd rolled over to face him, or... she was standing over him... or... what? Had he fallen asleep?

"Derek," she said, a tense edge to her voice. "We need to go."

"Go?" he said dumbly while his neurons launched from a cold standstill into conscious thought. "What?" He sat up and scrubbed his face. She backed up to give him some room. The dog stood beside Meredith, whining, tail wagging.

"We need to go, Derek," Meredith said urgently, and then she seized up like an engine without oil. A horrible, pained moan that made his insides twist fell from her lips. Her eyes squeezed shut and her teeth clenched and her hands curled into tiny fists.

He snapped awake. Shit. Shit, shit, shit. 1:47 am, said the clock. When the fuck had he fallen asleep? "Meredith, Meredith. Meredith, how bad is it?"

But she couldn't even talk, not like she'd been doing before, and that was an answer by itself. She inhaled, one, two, three, and then exhaled with a rasping, pained sound, like her throat was made of razors. One, two, three.

He pushed back the covers and flipped on the lamp so he could see to find some clean clothes and his shoes. The light stabbed his eyes, and he sat there, blinking furiously, trying to get his irises to stop whining at him and behave. Meanwhile, his wife suffered.

"Hang on," he said, which felt like such a useless thing to say, but he needed to fill the silence with something.

"I'm at..." she began when she could talk again. "5:10. And these are nines."

"Okay," he said. "Um. Okay. Um." He shook his head, trying to clear it. "Okay, we're going right now. Let me just..."

As soon as his eyes managed to adjust, he scrambled to his dresser to pull out a fresh t-shirt and some jeans. His hopping, uncoordinated attempt to get himself dressed would have been funny on any other day at any other moment, but now, right this moment, he didn't think he could have mustered a laugh if someone had paid him a million dollars for one. Meredith was still in her pajamas. He raced to her bureau to grab some clothes for her, too – some gray maternity yoga pants and a red t-shirt he didn't take the time to look at beyond the color – and he helped her change into those.

He texted Dr. Charlton on the way down the steps. Meredith trudged behind him. He let Samantha out in the backyard to relieve herself, and then he counted the frustrating, long seconds he had to wait until the dog came back inside. He didn't have time to bother with a mass text, so he shot one off to Mark and then tossed his phone into the cup holder in his Cayenne. His phone lit up with a chorus of beeps as he was backing them out of the garage, but he didn't hear that so much as Meredith riding through her next contraction.

Shit, shit, shit. His brain wasn't working quite right, yet.

The next hour was a blur. When he peeled into the parking lot at Seattle Grace at 3:06 am, he barely had the engine off and the key out of the ignition before he was helping Meredith out of the car. He checked his phone. Dr. Charlton was going to meet them in OB. Okay. He mapped the route in his head. Meredith waddled behind him, struggling to keep up. He forced himself to slow down and take a breath.

Jesus. He liked to think he'd be a bit more together if he hadn't let himself fall asleep, but that was useless to worry about. He stepped into the elevator with Meredith, holding her hand. He jammed his thumb into the button for the fourth floor. The car began to rise. They passed the second floor.

Then everything stopped. The lights in the elevator snapped out. The emergency lights flickered on moments later. All was quiet for a pin drop of a moment.
Derek blinked.

"Are you freaking kidding me?" Meredith snapped into the silence.

In that moment, Derek sort of hoped god was kidding. But then Derek remembered April Fools' Day was yesterday. And all he could add to Meredith's assessment was, "Fuck."
Chapter 34

Chapter Summary

Hello, everybody! I'm back! Finally, we get MerDer out of the fricken elevator. I know the elevator is a rather horrible cliche, but I had a very good reason for doing it, which I'm hoping you'll be able to see as Derek's POV continues. I'm so sorry to have left this on a cliffhanger for so long. If I'd had any idea that Derek would die on the show a mere few days after I posted chapter 33, I would never have left things on such an ambiguous note. Anyway, I'm posting two chapters today. I still have an epilogue to post, so it's not quite done, yet, but at least this should give you some closure in the meantime :) I hope you guys enjoy, and thank you so much for being patient!

For a moment, they stood there in the quiet darkness, speechless. The air in the elevator car was tinged a deep crimson from the emergency lighting, and it gave the ambience a horror-movie quality. They shared a look. Meredith's eyes glistened. He could read the exhaustion, pain, and simmering panic in her expression as if he'd picked up the Journal of Neurosurgery to pass the time.

"I'm sure it's fine," he rushed to say.

He stepped forward and pressed the red alarm button to indicate there was an emergency. Silence. Nothing happened. He pressed it again. Again. The only sound to fill the elevator was the hollow, plastic-sounding click of the button being pressed.

"Shouldn't that ring when you press it?" Meredith said.

"Umm," Derek said. The stop button definitely rang, and it did seem logical for an alarm button to ring, too …. "I'm not sure," he hedged as dismay burgeoned. He pulled out the red stop button as a test. Another hollow click filled the elevator, but no familiar ring followed.

"The button not ring— ohhhhh," she said, grimacing. The sound of her pain shut down his perception of everything else. When moan her choked into silence because she was in so much agony she couldn't talk, his insides tightened with distress.

"Just breathe," he coached, squeezing her shoulders to offer support. "Breathe, Meredith. It's okay. You're doing great."

She inhaled. Exhaled. Inhaled. Exhaled. The seconds crawled like snails in molasses. When she relaxed, panting, he relaxed, too. God, he was not fucking equipped for this. He wasn't. His hands trembled as the adrenaline car that her moaning had revved up eased off its throttle.

"Derek, the button not ringing is bad," she said, continuing their conversation like it had never ceased.

"Maybe, the bell is busted, but the alarm works," he suggested. He pressed the call button, next. Nothing happened. He bent down and said, "Hello?" into the tiny speaker while holding down the button. "Hello? We're stuck in here." No response. Utter silence. A sinking feeling began to drag on his toes. He swallowed. "Mayday?"
"That's really bad, Derek," Meredith said, simmering panic creeping toward a violent boil.

"It's okay. It's okay," he countered, helplessness seeping into his tone. "Maybe, the speakers on our end are broken, but, surely, someone on the other end heard me."

Meredith glowered. "Oh. Surely. Right."

He yanked his phone out of his pocket. He had about 2.3 trillion unread text messages from everybody in his family. From all of Meredith's friends.

"I'll let Richard know we're stuck," he said.

"Great," Meredith grumbled, folding her arms over her chest. "You do that."

Except his phone didn't have reception. He tried dialing, anyway – Richard's number, Mark's number, Lexie's number – and not one of the calls connected. He swallowed as the sinking feeling expanded, and he felt like he was hollowing out. Nobody would know they were in here. Nobody would be trying to get them out. Nobody ….

"What's the problem?" Meredith said, her voice far away.

"Calls aren't going through," he said.

"What?" she snapped.

"It's okay," he said, forcing himself to speak slowly, and the room bounced back into focus like a rubber ball. "It's okay. We're still okay. Let me see your phone." She was on a different service provider. They hadn't synced things up into some sort of family plan, yet. He swallowed. They should do that, he thought manically. It seemed funny that they were married and about to be parents and didn't have some kind of family calling plan. "Maybe, yours gets reception."

"Derek, I don't have my phone," she said, the simmering panic in her tone starting to boil with violence.

He pulled his fingers through his hair. "Why don't you have your phone?"

"Because I'm having a freaking baby, and I forgot my purse in the car."

He blinked, giving her a good once over. She wore the gray maternity yoga pants and the red t-shirt he'd helped her into before they left, along with an unzipped, light coat. In this lighting, her t-shirt was the color of blood, and the pants looked pinkish. She was right, though. She did not have her purse strung over her shoulder. Fuck. Fuckity, fuck, fuck, fuck. He tried dialing again with his phone, but nothing went through. Fuck.

"Maybe, they heard us when I hit the alarm, even though it didn't make noise," he said. His heart was starting to pound.

"Or, maybe we're stuck here, alone, and nobody knows we're in here, and I'm having a freaking baby," Meredith said, echoing his spiraling thoughts.

He walked in a circle around the small space, trying to ignore the walls-are-closing-in feeling loitering in his chest and buzzing in his head. Trapped. He was trapped. He was trapped in a tiny box with his exhausted, hurting, not-quite-panicking-yet-but-dammed-close wife. His chest tightened like someone held a screwdriver to it, and his sternum was the screw.
Derek Shepherd wasn't claustrophobic. Nor was he nyctophobic. He'd never had a problem with small, dark spaces. But he did have Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder after being shot in the chest at close range. And he did have a problem with helplessness. A problem with no choices.

He did have a problem with feeling powerless.

And being stuck in a fucking elevator while his wife was in labor, in pain, and he couldn't do anything to fix any of it ….

Pretty fucking powerless.

"Ow," Meredith said, almost a gasp. "Ow, ow, ow, owwwww," she continued, words trailing into a long, curdling moan that made him feel like someone had clenched a fist around his heart and squeezed, and squeezed, and squeezed. The adrenaline car in his veins revved up again, and the surge made him feel sick in addition to everything else. Then her moan became a tortured croak. A hollow, rustling thud filled the quiet as she wilted against the wall of the elevator, overcome.

He should help. He should help her. He knew he should help her. But his throat constricted, and his chest hurt like he'd just had it cracked open to repair his bullet wound yesterday, and he couldn't fucking breathe. Run. Run, run, run, run, run, his body demanded. Get somewhere safe. He wasn't safe. He put a fist against his sternum and clawed at his shirt.

"Derek," he heard from somewhere far away. "Derek? Oh, no. No, no, no, no. Not now. Derek, please. Please, I need you right now. I need you to not do this!"

"I can't breathe," he hissed, barely able to make words.

He wound in tight, panicky circles around the elevator. There was nowhere to go. None. Where could he go? He had to get out.

"Derek, stop! There's nothing in here that's going to hurt you!" the far away voice said, but in that moment he was beyond hearing. Beyond comprehension.

Someone had to hop out of his way. There was nowhere to fucking go. He was going to die. He could feel it. He was going to die.

"I can't breathe." He banged into a wall, jarring his shoulder. There was nowhere to go, and he was dying. "Stop. Stop it." He coughed. "I can't breathe."

"Derek, please," the far voice begged. She was begging him.

He stopped in front of the elevator doors, pressed his fingers into the gap between them, and pawed at them, trying to get them to open. Maybe, they were caught in a place that could access the floor above or below, and they could still crawl out. Or he could crawl out, at least, and get help for Meredith. Maybe. Please. Please, please, please. The doors creaked and moaned, but wouldn't budge under his mindless assault. He scraped so hard he almost pried loose a fingernail, but the lightning bolt of pain snaking down his ring finger didn't stop him. He kept pawing. Clawing. He was going to die if he couldn't get out of this fucking coffin. His heart felt like it was going to explode. His vocal cords wouldn't work anymore. His body shook.

His vision went spotty.

"Stop," he croaked, desperate. "Stop. Please, stop."

"You're not really going to do this …," Mr. Clark said, taunting, derisive, a sneer in his tone.
"You're not seriously going to do this to Meredith, now, while she's in labor …"

Derek hadn't heard Mr. Clark in weeks, and the cold, haunting voice ground him to a startled halt like a terrified rabbit. No. No, this wasn't happening. Mr. Clark wasn't there. In the elevator. He couldn't be there. This wasn't Mr. Clark. This was just Derek with his fucking sunglasses.

"You can't be this fucking useless," Mr. Clark said with a derisive snort.

"No," Derek said. "No, no, no."

He forced himself to step back from the elevator doors, despite the fact that his body wanted him to keep clawing and fighting for survival. He closed his eyes. He couldn't help Meredith until he helped himself. Devolving into a pile of blubbering terror on the floor while she was busy having their baby was not a fucking option.

"There you go," Mr. Clark said, though the voice was shifting. Changing. From a tormenter to a cheerleader. "There you go! Use me the right way. Use me the right way, Derek. Stop —" panicking. Stop fucking panicking. Fucking stop it.

You're not really going to do this, Derek coached himself as the sunglasses fell off his face and shattered. You're not seriously going to do this to Meredith, now, while she's in labor. You can't be this fucking useless.

His body was screaming at him that something was wrong. He was scared, and he couldn't breathe, and he was going to die, and something was wrong, and run. Just run. Run, run, run.

Stop, he told himself. Fucking stop it. Stop panicking.

You can't be this fucking useless. Get a fucking hold of yourself, and stop fucking panicking.

Panicking was not an option.

Not. An option.

He inhaled for three. Exhaled for three. Inhaled for three. Exhaled for three. The vise around his chest lessened. He wasn't helpless in here. He still had choices. Fewer choices, yes, but choices, nonetheless. This wasn't the end of the world. This wasn't. And there was a perfectly reasonable chance they'd be out of this elevator in a matter of minutes, and years from now, they'd look back on this and laugh at the funny thing that happened on the way to OB.

Stop, he told himself. Stop, and replace the panic thought.

Stop, and replace—

The world fell away.

"Derek," she said, the word soft as she gripped his shoulder and shook him. "Derek, wake up."

"Hmm?" he grumbled. He blinked in the darkness. The clock on his nightstand read 3:22 a.m., and the covers were warm, and he didn't want to move. He wasn't a morning person anymore. Waking up before the sun was unconscionable. He pressed his face into his pillow. "Hmm, what is it, Mere?"

"I'm sorry to wake you," Meredith said.
He rolled onto his back and groaned. He scrubbed at his face. The skin of his palms rasped against stubble. He wasn't a morning person anymore, but Meredith was way more important. "What do you need?"

"I really want some pickles," she said.

He forced himself to sit up. He pulled his fingers through his hair. "What happened to the jar I bought you, yesterday?"

A long pause followed before she confessed in a guilty tone, "I ate those pickles. Will you buy me some more? Dill, please."

He rubbed his eyes. "Now?"

She swallowed. "Yes, now. Sorry. I really want some. Oh, and some olives. Kalamata olives. That'd be great."

"M'kay," he said, not fazed by the weird flavor combo, and he pushed back the blankets and rolled out of bed. "Anything else?"

She thought for a moment. "Maybe, some peach yogurt?"

And that was how he found himself climbing into his Cayenne at 3:34 a.m. dressed in sweat pants, a wrinkled t-shirt, and the fuzzy blue bathrobe Meredith had given him a few Christmases ago. In March, the air that early in the morning was frigid, and he flipped on the heater to full blast as soon as the car had warmed up enough. When he pulled into the parking lot at the twenty-four hour grocery store a few blocks from Meredith’s house, he sighed and rubbed his eyes again. He was going to go grocery shopping in his fucking slippers and pajamas. For dill pickles, kalamata olives, and peach yogurt.

Jesus, she had him wrapped around her finger.

But he couldn't help but smile, anyway. He was going to go grocery shopping in his fucking slippers and pajamas. or dill pickles, kalamata olives, and peach yogurt. For his pregnant wife. They would be parents, soon. In just a few weeks.

He ambled through the parking lot, underneath the snapping, buzzing fluorescent lights, slippers scraping against the wet concrete. He shuffled through the sliding doors. The warm-looking, rainbow-colored produce section greeted him. Faint music played from the speakers – some pop song he didn't recognize, but was probably top forty.

The store was an empty ghost town except for a blonde college student wearing flip flops, flannel boxers, and a purple University of Washington sweatshirt. She was picking out apples. "Granny Smith, or Golden Delicious?" she asked in a chipper tone as Derek grabbed a basket.

He shrugged. "I like Fuji."

"But those are red," she said. "I want green ones."

"Can't help, then," he said. "Sorry."

He wandered into the condiment aisle to grab the dill pickles and the kalamata olives, first, since that aisle was closest. He had a brief moment of indecision about whether to pick pitted kalamata olives or regular ones with the pits still in. In the end, he grabbed one of each, because, why not, and he didn't want to risk grabbing the wrong one and having to come back. Dill pickles … same thing. He grabbed spears, and slices, and rounds, and whole pickles, and he put the four bottles into his basket. In the dairy aisle, he grabbed fruit-on-the-bottom, pre-mixed, and Greek peach yogurt.

When he wandered to the checkout with his bounty, the tired old baggage clerk took one look at Derek's haul and attire, and grinned. "Having a little one?" she said in an earthy voice.

Derek grinned back at her despite his exhaustion. "Yes. It's that obvious?"

"Well, no," said the clerk. "But this is your replacement thought. I'm doing what you want me to do, and you seem to want to talk about it."

"Oh," Derek said. "Yes. We're having a baby soon."

"What names have you picked?" the clerk said.

"Daphne Anne for a girl," said Derek. "Adam Gabriel for a boy."

"Fine choices."

"I'm scared I'm going to fuck this up," he said. "I really don't want to fuck this up."

"You won't," the clerk assured him. "All first-time parents think that at least once or twice, you know." The cash register dinged, and the clerk smiled. "That'll be $34.37," she said.

Derek blinked and leaned closer to look at the receipt. Jesus, imported kalamata olives were expensive. Oh, well. He ran his credit card without comment and signed his name.

"Just remember to breathe," the clerk said. "Yes, you're stuck in an elevator, but that doesn't mean you're helpless."

Derek frowned and looked back at the clerk. "Huh?"

The grocery store melted away, and he presented the bag to Meredith beside a clock that read 3:47 a.m. She dove into the olives, first. The un-pitted ones. He was glad he'd gotten both, because if he'd chosen, pitted would have won.

"Feeling better, now?" he said.

Meredith happily munched on an olive and spat out the pit. "I don't know. Are you? I could ask for more stuff if you want me to."

Derek laughed. "More? How could you possibly want more?"

"Well," she said, grinning. "I tried to tell you I wanted some apples, too. Your mental symbolism button got broken, though. I don't know why you made my college-aged figment wear a U-Dub sweatshirt."

"You want me to go back to the grocery store?" He winked. "I'll go back. For you."

She gave him a long, discerning look. "Do you need to go back? You seemed pretty freaked out when the clerk reminded you about the elevator."

"Elevator?" he said.

Meredith nodded. "Yes. You're stuck in an elevator, and I'm giving birth. Remember?"
"Oh," he said. He stretched out on the bed beside her, watching her slip another olive into her math. Reality slammed against him like a linebacker, but he held it off for a moment. "No, I don't need anything else. I'm ... better." Not cured. Not perfect. But better. Better enough. And Meredith was waiting for him to get his head on semi-straight. "Thank you, Meredith."

She kissed him with salty, olive-tasting lips. "You're welcome."

He didn't know how long he existed in his own universe, staving off the threatening crush of panic, but when he came back to himself, Meredith was clutching his forearm in a tight, painful grip that was probably bruising his ulna. He'd shaved himself into the elevator corner like he'd somehow thought he could escape through the bend in the metal. Her croaking, desperate words exploded in his ears, a rush of panic that almost bowled him back into gibbering dissolution when he soaked it up like a sponge.

"Please, don't fall apart, Derek," she warbled. "Please, don't. Not now. I know I said it would be okay for you to fall apart, and everything would be fine, and I meant it at the time – honest, I did – but I was thinking someone else would be here to pick up the slack if you had issues, and we're alone right now, and I'm having a baby. Our baby. In an elevator. I don't want to have our baby in an elevator alone. Please. Please, don't panic. I need you. I need you to be here. I need-oohhhhhhh." She curled in on herself with a half-sob, half-whimper that stabbed his heart like serrated knives. Somewhere in the process of watching him flip out, she'd forgotten her Lamaze.

He pulled away from the wall and rushed to wrap his arms around her, but she slapped him away and gestured to her back. He leaned into his right leg with all his weight and pressed his fists against her lower back between her hips. His arms shook, he pressed so hard, but if it helped ....

"It's okay, Meredith," he said. "I'm fine. I'm not panicking. I'm here. Just breathe. Remember to breathe. In through the nose. Two. Three. Out through the mouth. Two. Three."

It took her a moment, but she shifted out of abject distress as she emulated the breathing he was demonstrating for her. The contraction ended a little more than a minute later. She slumped against him. He pulled his fingers through her hair, trying to soothe her. His heart pounded.

"I'm sorry," he said. "I'm so sorry. I'm good, now. I'm not panicking." He felt like he'd just fought a war with a garbage disposal and lost, though. Everything ached. Everything trembled. But he'd won. He'd won, damn it, and he wasn't panicking.

Panicking wasn't an option.

"What the hell are we going to do?" she said, voice faint.

What the hell were they going to do? He shook his head, shoving that panicky thought out of his brain as fast as it had arrived. He wasn't panicking. He wasn't. He glanced at his watch. Fifteen minutes. They'd been in the elevator for fifteen minutes. He'd only lost about five minutes on his trip to Stop Your Panic Attack with Pickles Land.

"I'm sure this is just a glitch," he tried to assure her – and, by extension, him – in a low, soothing tone. His hands wouldn't stop shaking.

She snorted. "A glitch. Right. Just like the bomb exploding was a glitch. Oh, and your secret wife. That was a great glitch. So was both of us nearly dying." She pushed off the wall and approached the button console to the right side of the door. She yanked and depressed the elevator's emergency stop button once, twice, again, over and over, in some futile attempt to get the elevator car to budge, until he stepped close, gently encircled her wrist with his trembling fingers, and pulled her "Another five minutes, and we'll be out of here," he said. "I'm sure. Mark got stuck yesterday. Surely, they fixed it, and this is just a hiccup."

Her gaze shifted from the button console to his face. Then back to the button console. Then back to his face. He knew the second he got a glimpse of her expression that he'd said a wrong thing. A very wrong thing. A very, very wrong thing that he would regret. Possibly forever.

Her response was a volcanic eruption the likes of which Mt. Rainier had never seen. "Didn't he GET STUCK FOR FOUR FREAKING HOURS?"

He swallowed, cringing. A pit formed in his stomach, and the run, run, run tried to rev into full swing again. "Well—"

"FIVE MINUTES IS NOT FOUR HOURS, DEREK."

"I really want some pickles," she said.

"Meredith—"

"DOES THIS ELEVATOR LOOK FIXED TO YOU, DEREK?"

Pickles, pickles, pickles, pickles.

"Meredith—"

"DOES THIS LOOK LIKE A HICCUP, DEREK?"

He was in the condiment aisle, looking for pickles. He grabbed spears, and slices, and rounds, and whole pickles, and he put the four bottles into his basket. Rewind.

"Meredith—"

"I'D REALLY LIKE TO KNOW YOUR DEFINITION OF A FIXED GLITCH, DEREK."

In such a small, claustrophobic space, her yelling at him was loud, and jarring, and awful, each syllable like a gunshot. Her agitation was making him shake even more, and his mouth felt dry all over again. His legs felt watery. He paced, what little the elevator would let him pace. The cliff before the leap into panic was only a tiny hop away again. He dug in his figurative heels.

He grabbed the pickles off the shelf again. Rewind.

"Meredith," he said in a soft, shivery voice. "Meredith—"

"WHAT, DEREK?!"

"Please, don't yell," he begged, back-and-forth pacing coming to a stop. "I know you're upset, and I know you're in pain, and I know this really fucking sucks, but please, don't yell at me in here. Please. I … can't." His voice cut off into a croak. "I … can't handle …."

Her lower lip quivered. Her eyes watered and spilled. "I'm sorry-ohhhhh!" she whined.

He collapsed against her by rote, pressing his fists against her spine. "In through the nose," he coached. "One, two, three. Out through the mouth."

"I'm sorry," she said faintly when the contraction ended.

"It's okay," he said. "I'm okay."

She shook her head at him. "I'm so sorry. I'm so tired. And I hurt. And I don't want to have our baby in an elevator."

She thudded against the back wall and slid into an awkward heap on the floor. He followed her down to the ground, shaking. "I know. I know you don't." He didn't, either. He so fucking didn't. He kissed her on the temple. "Please, try not to worry too much, yet. We've only been here a few minutes."

"And this could take hours," she said, tone dripping with the beginnings of another shrill shouting spree. "Right?"

He winced. "I didn't mean it like that."

"I don't want this to take hours!" she said. "I need to be done, now."

_He grabbed spears, and slices, and rounds, and whole pickles, and he put the four bottles into his basket. Rewind._

He was at a loss for what to say at this point. Nothing seemed like it would help. Everything seemed wrong. "I'm here, no matter what," he murmured.

"I didn't mean to make you have a panic attack," she said, a rough warble against his shirt.

"You didn't make me have a panic attack," he assured her. "And even if you had, I know it wouldn't have been on purpose."

"I'm sorry," she repeated in a small voice.

He tightened his embrace. "It's okay. But let's worry about you, okay? Would hitting me help? I can handle hitting. Just not screaming."

She snorted, and a brief smile graced her features. "I'd rather not, if it's all the sa—"

Her words choked into silence. She tensed against him. Her fingers closed over his shoulder and squeezed, and for all her desire not to hurt him, his whole arm felt like it had been caught by a boa constrictor. He clenched his jaw, though, and he bore it without complaint. Noise, he couldn't fucking handle, but anything else was fine, and if he had something she needed, he'd give it to her without hesitation. Hell, he'd even wrap whatever it was with a pretty bow. He just hoped he had enough to give for his offerings to make a difference.

"What are we going to do if I have to have the baby in the elevator?" she said when she relaxed out of the contraction.

"I've delivered babies before, Meredith. This isn't the end of the world. I promise."

"When?" she said.

He frowned. "When, what?"

"When have you delivered babies?"
His frown deepened. "Well, I mean, it's been a while," he confessed.

Her eyes narrowed. "Define a while," she said, putting the words "a" and "while" in air quotes.

He sighed. "It's been like fifteen years, Meredith, but—"

"So, what you're saying, is that the only worse case scenario would be if I were stuck in an elevator with a plumber."

For a moment, he was speechless, sputtering. "Well, I think if you were stuck in here alone, that would be worse than being stuck with a plumber," he said. "A drain clog is kind of like a baby in a birth canal, isn't it?"

She jabbed her elbow into his side, and he grunted, but she snorted with laughter, at least. "Remember that one time you, me, Rose, and Addison were all in this elevator, and Mark came in and laughed at us?"

He shook his head. "No, I don't."

"Really?"

"I must have blanked it from my memory."

"I wish I could blank it," she grumbled. "On a scale of one to awkward, that was mortifying."

He kissed her. "I think that wins for worst case scenario in an elevator."

They shared a collective sigh together. He wrapped his arm over her shoulder, and she leaned against him, and she rested. They both rested. He rubbed her belly in slow circles with his free hand. When the next contraction hit her, her whole body tensed. Her womb felt like a rock under his palm. She shifted in his arms, back and forth, like it could somehow vent the discomfort.

"Do you want to get up and walk?" he said. "It might help."

She shook her head, panting as her body relaxed. Sweat pearled on her brow. "No. No, I'm tired, Derek. I'm tired, and this hurts, and I want to be done."

He hugged her. "I know. I know it does. I'm here. Are you feeling like you need to push, yet?"

She shook her head again. "No," she said. "No, it just freaking hurts, Derek. These are like … beyond tens." She swallowed. "And the main part I hate about being here in the elevator is that the epidurals are in OB." She clutched at his shirt, yanking tents of it into her fists. "I want my epidural, Derek."

Definitely active labor, then.

"I know," he said. "I'm sorry. I wish I could give you one."

He hadn't been timing her contractions since they stepped into the elevator, but they felt faster than five minutes apart, at this point. He rubbed her arm, shoulder to elbow, soothing, slow. His own body felt wasted after his near brush with dissolution. He couldn't imagine how bad she felt, after twenty-four hours of contractions and even longer without any sleep. They rested. He let his eyelids drift to half-mast. Time felt like it was blurring.

"Stuck with a contaminated virologist who's been studying ebola," she said, out of the blue.
He blinked. "What?"

"Worst case scenario in an elevator," she said.

"Oh." He chuckled. "Okay, maybe that wins."

"I can always think of something worse," she said with a sigh. "And the crappy thing is that, usually, it happens."

"I'm pretty sure you won't ever get stuck in an elevator with a contaminated virologist who's been studying ebola, Mere," Derek said.

"I don't know. Given our track record, it's possi-ugh."

She didn't even moan this time. She just choked into silence as her whole body tensed, and her grip tightened, and her belly hardened like a rock again. Her breaths blustered against his neck. In through the nose, out through the mouth. In through the nose. Out through the mouth. He pulled his fingers through her hair.

"It's okay, Meredith," he murmured against her. "You're doing great. You're doing so great." She slumped against him, silent, limp, wasted. God, he felt so helpless. So helpless. Panic revved, but he forced himself to focus on her, instead. "That's good. Rest between them. It's okay. Just rest. Tell me if you start feeling like you need to push, okay?"

He hoped to fucking god that didn't happen anytime soon, though. Well, he did. For her sake. Because it meant this would be over soon. But he didn't. For his sake. Because it'd been fifteen fucking years since he'd delivered a baby, and his assurances to Meredith aside, he wasn't confident that delivering a baby was in any way like riding a bike. He thought it was pretty fucking possible to forget how to do it entirely. And it wasn't like he could call anyone to get a quick refresher course. Damn it.

He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf.

"Why does this keep happening to me?" she whispered.

He sighed, staring at the elevator ceiling.

"What?" she said.

He shrugged. "I know you see it all as bad, Meredith, but … it helped us get here, didn't it?"

"Stuck in an elevator while I'm in labor?"

"I think we could have been here without bombs exploding, ferryboats crashing, secret wives, or mad gunmen."

"You never know."

She shook her head. "I don't get it. I really don't."

"Don't get what?"

"How in the hell you can be so optimistic. I mean, after everything." She rested her head against his shoulder. "I love that about you. That your default state of being includes so many half-full glasses that you could fill a freaking swimming pool with them." She sighed, and she gave him a tired smile. "I'm glad you're better."

He grinned. "And I love your dark and twisty." He kissed her. "Very much."

A wheezy sound of discomfort pushed through her lips, and she tensed in his arms again. For a moment, she only rocked side to side, inhaling, exhaling, inhaling, exhaling in a slow, deliberate rhythm. Then she pushed away from him, shifting onto all fours, distended belly dipping toward the floor. She pushed forward and rocked back, pushed forward and rocked back, breathing.

"You're doing great, Meredith," he coached, feeling useless.

Absolutely fucking useless. They didn't even have pillows in here, for her. When she eased back onto her knees, tears were streaming down her face. He shrugged out of his coat and put it on the floor for her, so she'd have some padding next time she shifted forward to ride a contraction. He was so focused on her, he had no idea what made Meredith twitch with excitement, but something did.

"What was …?" Meredith said, panting. She paused to scrub at her wet eyes, like she couldn't see. She petted his coat, hands searching. His phone beeped, and she yanked it loose from his coat pocket. She swallowed. "Derek, you got a text from Mark. Just now. You got a text."

Derek snatched the phone from her hands. He tried to make a phone call. Nothing went through. "Still no reception," he said. "God, damn it."

"But you got a text! Just now," she said. "I watched it arrive." She frowned. "Don't texts require less signal to send or something?"

Shit, why hadn't he thought to try that?

"Where the hell are you guys? Are you stuck in traffic?" Mark had texted.

Derek's fingers flew over the phone's keys. "We're stuck. We're stuck in the elevator, the power is out, and the alarm button isn't working. My phone doesn't have enough reception to make calls. Help." He pressed send and held his breath. He watched the screen. Sending, the little note next to the message said. Sending. Sending. Sending. "It sent," he said.

Meredith slumped against the elevator wall. "Oh, thank god." And then she tensed. Her tears started to leak again. She shifted onto all fours. He rubbed her back.

"Maybe," she rasped as she relaxed, "even if they can't rescue us, they can send an epidural through the emergency hatch at the top of the elevator. Oh, and some water. And a bucket."

He frowned. "A bucket?"

"I kinda have to pee," she said, tone reluctant.

"Meredith, you should just go," he said. "Go, now, before you hit transition, and you can't."

"But ….."

His phone beeped, and he picked it up to look at it. "April Fools was yesterday, man," Mark said. Derek rolled his eyes. "Believe me, I fucking know," he replied and hit send.

There was hardly any delay this time when Mark replied. "Richard's on it, man. He's calling the Derek snorted. He wasn't even fucking sure how to respond to that. Too late? Already had a panic-palooza, complete with His and Her nervous breakdowns? He turned his attention back to Meredith, who was biting her lower lip, staring at him with tears streaking down her face. Fuck.

"Derek, I'm having our baby in an elevator, and I've been up for like forty-eight hours. This is already one of the worst experiences of my freaking life. And you want to me to pee in my pants?"

"Well, would you rather have a full bladder?" he said.

"No," she said, the word tiny. Upset. And then another contraction stole her words. She rocked back and forth.

He glanced at their inventory while he rubbed her back. His coat. Her coat. The clothes on their bodies. His phone. His wallet. His keys. That was it. He'd left the luggage in the car, intending to worry about it later, after Baby was born. His coat was the kind with a fleece liner and a water-resistant shell. It was big and bulky and wouldn't work—

He grabbed his keys. He kept a tiny pocket scalpel on his keychain. He unsheathed the knife. Meredith had leaned back onto her knees and wasn't on top of his coat, for now. He scooped it up and jammed the scalpel into the fuzzy lining.

"Derek, what are you doing?" Meredith said. "That's your favorite coat!"

He shook his head at her and sawed loose a square of fleecy fabric, separating it from the water-resistant shell. He crumpled up the fleece into a big ball and handed it to Meredith. "Use that," he said. "Stuff it in your pants and go on it." That way, she wouldn't have to live in wet pants for however long they were stuck in here, on top of the fact that they were fucking stuck.

She gave him an unreadable look. "Don't tell anyone I peed in the elevator," she said.

He gave her what he hoped was an encouraging smile. "I won't tell a soul, Meredith. Your secret's safe with me." And then he pantomimed a zipper closing over his lips.

She laughed and shifted awkwardly to the other side of the elevator, away from him. He turned to give her some privacy, what little he could. She was about to go through an experience that would expose her to a lot of people she didn't know that well, and a lot of people she did know well, but probably didn't want looking at her vagina while a baby came out of it, and after all he'd been through, he could understand the need for taking whatever dignity one could find in an undignified situation.

"The repair guy will be here in forty minutes," Mark texted.

Derek sighed. "Are you fucking kidding me? My wife is IN ACTIVE LABOR. I could be a father by then!"

"I know, man. I know. But the guy lives in the boonies like you guys do. He'll be here as fast as he can."

Derek ground his molars. "Murphy is conspiring."

"We'll get you out, man. Don't worry."

Meredith shifted beside him. He turned back to face her. The soiled scrap of his coat lay in a crumpled heap in the opposite corner of the elevator, and her yoga pants were back in place, unblemished with wetness. "They're not going to fix the elevator in time, are they?" she said.

"They'll fix it, Meredith," he said.

"No, they won't," she said, and she burst into unrestrained tears.

He wrapped his arms around her. "Shh," he soothed. "Shh, yes, they will. They'll fix it."

She stiffened, and her fingers tightened into tight, bruising fists that yanked on his shirt so hard, he thought he might lose his head in a sort of guillotine process. Death by collar constriction. He cleared his throat while he listened to her breathe. In through the nose for three. Out through the mouth for three. In through the nose for three. Out through the mouth for three. He rubbed her back and cheered her on, feeling like a useless lump while his wife did all the fucking work.

When she relaxed, he picked up his phone again. He glanced at the time. They'd been stuck in here almost fifty minutes, now. "Did you hear we're stuck in the elevator?" he typed, texting Dr. Charlton this time.

"Dr. Webber told me. I'm in the waiting room right outside OB. I'll be there the second you guys are out," Dr. Charlton replied.

"I need a quick summary on delivering a baby."

A somewhat longer pause follows. "You've delivered a baby before?"

"Years ago."

"Honestly, assuming there are no complications, the best thing you can do is let Meredith's body dictate the process, and prep your catcher's mitt."

Derek blinked. That was a bit more quick of a summary than he'd been hoping for. "I remember it being more involved than that ...."

"Yes," Dr. Charlton replied, "but before, you were a doctor, and right now, you're a dad."

"That's it, though? Catch it?" Seriously?

A very long pause this time. "Most of your work is after. Don't cut the umbilical cord. Run your fingers along the baby's nose to get the fluid out. Stimulate crying by rubbing the baby's back. Then rest the baby on Meredith's chest or belly. If the cord is long enough for the baby to reach Meredith's breasts, see if you can get it to nurse. Nursing will stimulate the uterus to contract, which will help deliver the placenta and reduce bleeding. If the cord's not long enough, don't stretch it. Cover mom and baby with your coat or your t-shirt to keep them warm. And then wait for help."

"What are you reading?" Meredith croaked.

Derek grinned at her. "Just chatting with Dr. Charlton." Which … wasn't a total lie. And there was no way in hell he was letting Meredith know he was receiving coaching on how to deliver. That would be a great way to incite her to panic, letting her know that he didn't feel like he knew what he was doing, and he really, really didn't. "She's waiting in OB for us."

Meredith tensed and rocked onto all fours again. God, he felt helpless. Catch the baby. That was seriously his fucking job. Just fucking catch it. The very idea of that made his chest constrict. No choices. None. He rubbed her back and did everything he could to tell Meredith she was going to rock this, and everything was fine, despite the nerves making his heart pound. His sternum ached, and his jaw hurt from clenching.

When Meredith relaxed, she sighed. "Stuck in the elevator with a hungry velociraptor while Mount Rainier is exploding, and strawberry ice cream was never invented."

Derek blinked. "What?"

Meredith wiped her eyes with the back of her hands. "That's the worst scenario I can think of so far."

He snorted. "You're still churning over that?"

"It's passing the freaking time," Meredith grumbled. She gave him a tired look, and then rested her head on his shoulder again. This seemed to be her preferred system. Resting in his arms between contractions. Shifting onto all fours and rocking back and forth during. "Isn't it?"

"I suppose so," he said.

"What's the worst one you can think of?" she said.

"Funny worst?" he said. "Like with velociraptors and no strawberry ice cream? Or genuine worst?"

"I'm not trying to be funny," she said. "Velociraptors are genuinely bad."

He kissed her temple. Sweat slicked her skin at this point. Her hair, which was tied into a ponytail, was a damp skullcap. "I think my worst case scenario would be me in Manhattan, having never moved after Addison cheated, because Richard never called. I'd have been drunk, vulnerable, and good-looking in the wrong bar, and I never would have met the girl who was like coming up for fresh air. I'd be alone and unhappy and miserable, oblivious to Meredith in Seattle, who'd be stuck giving birth alone in an elevator with a hungry velociraptor, no strawberry ice cream, and a nearby exploding volcano."

Meredith was quiet for a long time, and he worried for a moment, that he'd gone too far, name-dropping Addison in his worst case scenario. Truthfully, his worst case scenario involved Gary Clark, and not a velociraptor, but … some things were a bit too real. And Gary Clark didn't deserve to be there for the birth of Daphne Anne or Adam Gabriel.

"I can think of a worse one," Meredith whispered after a moment.

He grinned. "Oh?"

"Yeah," she said. "Your scenario. Plus, what if Finn was my husband, and he was too pre-occupied wrangling the hungry velociraptor with his veterinary wiles to help me?"

He burst out laughing. "You win again, I think."

Meredith gave him a tired smile. "I can always think of something worse."

"I love your dark and twisty," he said.

"You said that already," she replied, staring up at him.

His gaze creased with affection. "It bears repeating."
Meredith nodded. She rubbed leaking tears out of her eyes. "I'm glad you came to Seattle, and you were drunk, vulnerable, and good-looking in the right spot. That really would have sucked if you hadn't been."

"Hmm," he said. "I really do think it worked out well, in the end."

They shared another tired embrace. The minutes crawled, and they shifted into an exhausted rhythm. Trading horrible giving-birth scenarios back and forth between contractions, which got closer and closer together as time slogged forward. Derek coached Meredith while she fought to keep her breathing steady during each onslaught. They were on, "What if the velociraptor ate the OB-GYN and Finn?" when they heard something in the elevator shaft shifting overhead. A groan, like metal moving, which was fucking scary, and it made Derek's innards tighten and his teeth clench, and he only barely managed to vent his unrestrained holy-shit-what-was-that exclamation into a more modest but still startled grunt. He pulled his fingers through his hair as a sudden rush of nausea overtook him, and he yanked his phone back out of his pocket.

"What's going on?" Derek texted to Richard.

"Please don't tell me we have to add the elevator crashing down three floors to our hungry velociraptor scenario," Meredith said.

"The elevator guy is here," Mark texted before Richard could reply. "Some very technical-sounding important thing needs to be replaced. He told us don't worry about the noise."

Don't worry about the noise. Derek snorted. What a fucking joke.

Derek glanced at his watch. 6:13 a.m. They'd been in this fucking elevator for three hours. "He only just got here?" he replied to Mark, fingers shaking.

There was no response, and Derek rolled his eyes. God, damn it. God, damn it. God, damn it. Meredith was a ticking time bomb. She'd been in active labor for over five hours, now. She could go into transition at any time. She was exhausted. He was exhausted.

He stood up to stretch. And pace. What little he could pace.

"Derek, are you okay?" Meredith said, a quiet rasp.

She was dehydrated. And sweaty. And tired. And uncomfortable. And all they had between them for padding were one-and-a-half coats, because he'd gutted his already for the absorbent stuffing. Fuck. He pulled his fingers through his hair. Fuckity fuck.

He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf.

Another screeching, metal groan filled the space in the air over the cramped elevator car. The sound hit his eardrums like an ice pick, yanking him out of his attempts at replacement thoughts, and his body started to shiver with a new bath of adrenaline. The constant rushing in and receding of fight-or-flight hormones was wearing him out. He was thirsty, too. And cold with nerves as his body pulled heat out of his extremities to protect his core.

"Derek?" Meredith croaked.

"I don't like the noise," he whispered, unable to stop himself from sounding weak and scared and horrible. He inhaled thickly. "I don't .... I can't."
"Derek, don't listen to that crap," Meredith said. "Don't. Listen to me. Tell me … um. Oh."

Her words choked off into silence, and he watched her features crease with agony. He slumped back to the floor to try and help her. "You're doing great, Meredith," he managed to say, despite the fact that he felt like his intestines had been replaced with writhing snakes. He rubbed her back. "You're doing so great. Better than I ever could." As she rocked back and forth on her knees, she grabbed his hand and squeezed so hard he could hear his knuckles pop. The pain in his hand was enough to make him stop thinking about the awful noise, though.

When she relaxed into a tired, spent slump, her tiny, pained, "Ow," broke his heart.

God, they needed to get out of this fucking elevator.

Another metal screech made him cringe. He closed his eyes, imagining himself grabbing the pickles. He had to do this. He had to be here. He couldn't afford to fall apart right now.

"Are you using the replacement thingy with the pickles?" Meredith said.

He grunted. "Yes." He frowned at her. "I'm so sorry."

"For what? Buying imaginary pickles for me?"

"Whenever I do that, I'm not in this elevator. I feel like I'm abandoning you or something."

She snorted. "Derek, if leaving me to go to the grocery store for a few seconds helps you avoid having a panic attack and leaving me for the duration of my labor to be a gibbering wreck, I say go to the freaking grocery story already. Buy a gross of imaginary pickles, and—" Her eyes narrow. "What?"

He shrugged. "What what?"

"You're looking at me."

"Because you're beautiful, and I love you."

"But I'm sweaty, and gross, and I peed on your coat."

"Meredith," he murmured, inching closer. He kissed her brow. "If being sweaty and gross and peeing on my coat helps you have our baby, I say to hell with my coat." He squeezed her arm. "And you're beautiful to me always."

"Yeah, right," she grumbled.

He brushed his fingers against her sweaty scalp. "You are, Meredith."

Another metal shriek filled the air overhead. Meredith moaned, panting. "Breathe, Meredith," he coached. "In through the nose. Out through the mouth." Another shriek pierced his skull, and his heart squeezed. Fuck. "Meredith?"

But she was off in her own suffering world, not listening to a word he was saying, not achieving anything but pained gasping, and the contraction kept going and going and going. The eternity ended with an exclamation of pain that made his insides curdle. Giving birth was not at all like the movies made it look. For one, women didn't typically scream their heads off at any viable target. Oh, they made noise, just … Hollywood tended to amp things up. For two, birth was messy. Really messy. Meredith had been mostly stoic about this whole thing up until now. But the sound she just "Meredith, what's wrong?"

"Uhh," she half-groaned half-moaned when her body relaxed. Her hands were shaking when she grabbed at his shirt. Her panting blustered against him. "Derek," she rasped. Her face was soaked. "Derek." She looked ... like she didn't even know where the hell she was.

"I'm right here," he said. "Can you talk to me? How bad was that?"

But she only had about sixty seconds to catch her breath before she tensed up again, and there was nothing he could do but hold her and tell her he was there while the moments crawled. The rapid shift in pace and intensity was terrifying, given their cramped, dark locale. Given his current role in this delivery. He swallowed when he looked down, noticing for the first time in the darkness that her yoga pants were soiled through with bloody discharge and amniotic fluid at the crotch. Her water had broken at some point.

No. No, no, no, she could not be hitting transition. Not now. Not, yet.

"Oh, my god," she croaked when the contraction ended. "Oh, my god. Oh, my god." Her whole body trembled in his arms. "Oh, my god. Oh, my god."

Another metal shriek overhead.

She shook her head. "It's not fine," she said, breathless. "It's not fine. It's not fi-ugh."

She stiffened again, and time slowed to a crawl. Again. And all he could do was offer her assurance that he hadn't gone anywhere. He'd thought, until now, the most helpless he'd ever feel would be dying on the catwalk while Gary Clark pointed a gun.

He was wrong.

"I can't do this," she spluttered when the contraction passed. "Derek, I can't. I can't. It hurts. It hurts too much."

"Yes, you can do this," he replied, trying to keep himself sounding calm and soothing, despite the fact that he was not. Not at all. "Yes, you can. I'm right here."

"I can't," she said, crying in earnest. "I can't, I can't."

He had no idea what to do. No fucking idea. Her hitching sobs pinched into a long moan, and her hands clenched into white-knuckled fists. She gasped, and she spluttered.

"Breathe, Meredith," he said. "Meredith, you have to listen to me. If you breathe, it might hurt less."

But this birth seemed like a runaway freight train at this point that she had no hope of getting a handle on, not when she was so scared and upset. She was only getting like sixty seconds to rest between two minutes of unadulterated nightmare. He'd seen births before. He'd delivered more than one baby in the course of his maturation from a med student to a neurosurgeon. But he was pretty sure, now that he had a point of comparison, that he'd never seen a birth without an epidural before, and he'd never seen someone he loved suffer like this.
He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf.

"Do you feel like you need to push?" he said when she relaxed again, praying for a no.

She shook her head. "There's … pressure. P-p-pressure. Here." She touched her pelvis with a shaking hand. "But ….

She shifted forward onto all fours, and then grabbed at his shoulders for leverage. She stood. "Meredith? What are you doing?" She didn't reply. Her shoes squeaked on the wet floor. She shambled forward until she hit the wall. Her distress was a hot, burning fire. "Meredith?"

Her fingers flexed, and the pads of her hands squeaked along the elevator wall. "I need to get out of here. I can't do this. I can't-ohhhhh." One hand went to her belly. She slid to her knees.

He raced to catch her. To offer her support. Anything. "You can do this, Meredith," he said, right next to her ear. "You can do this. You're so strong. You're the strongest person I know, and you can do this. Do you hear me?"

When she got a reprieve, and she had her sixty seconds to relax, he guided her back to the meager pile of coats in the other corner. Her whole body trembled, and she had a thousand-yard-stare quality to her gaze that disconcerted him. She was there, but she wasn't there.

And then her whole body tensed again.

Her whimper raked down his spine like an icy knife. He swallowed back terror, reaching for her hips. He pulled down her pants and underwear while she strained. Lying flat on the cold floor in the dark was kind of a horrible position to give birth in, but they didn't have any options in here, not ones that would let him see what was going on and be safe for Baby.

They didn't have any choices.

No choices.

None.

No. No, no, no. Panicking was not an option. He bit back on his mindless fear with a willpower he wished he'd had when Mr. Clark had cornered him on the catwalk.

He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf. Rewind. He grabbed pickles off the shelf.

As soon as Meredith relaxed, panting, staring groggily into space, he helped her lie back onto the shredded remnants of his coat. Bloody discharge spread below her body. Fuck. Fuck, this was ….

"You're doing fine," he said. "You're doing so great, Meredith. Can you hear me? I'm here."

Anything to pierce her mental fog. Once he had her legs spread, so he had a good visual field, just in case, he leaned forward, grabbed her hand, and squeezed. He would play catcher if he had to, but there was every fucking chance they'd get rescued. Please, please, please, let them get rescued.

Another metal shriek in the air over the elevator. His heart pounded. He clamped down on an urge to bolt with all the fucking willpower he possessed.

Another contraction. He saw his hand being crushed more so than felt it, at this point.
"Meredith," he said. "Meredith, breathe." She'd arched back and her face was pointed toward the wall behind them. "Meredith, listen to me. Can you hear me?"

"Please," she croaked when the contraction passed. "Please, Derek. Make it stop. Please, make it stop."

He felt like his stomach was dropping out through his shoes. "I know it hurts," he replied, heart pounding. "I know it does. But you can do this. Do you hear me? Hang on. Just hang on. You can do it. I'm here. I'm right here with you. But you need to hang on a little longer."

The moan she squeezed out on the next contraction chilled his blood. Her whole body tensed like her skin had become stone. Tears squeezed loose from her clenched eyelids.

When she relaxed, she said, trembling, "I'm going to throw up."

"That's okay," he assured her. "That's okay if you feel sick. Be sick if you need to." But she didn't do anything except swallow repeatedly while she stared blankly at the ceiling. He squeezed her thigh to give her some reassurance. He wasn't sure how reassuring his freezing palm would be. "I'm right here."

"Derek ….

"I'm right here. I'm right here, Meredith. You're doing great." His eyes were watering. "You're doing really great, and I love you."

Time seemed to stretch, and he lost track of all of everything outside the bubble. Measurement of the passing seconds became contraction. Not contraction. Contraction. Not contraction. Meredith alternated between begging him deliriously to make it stop and not saying a fucking word, and both options nauseated him. He was sweaty, and shaking almost as badly as Meredith was. He had a wild, fleeting, crazy thought that somehow, Michael Shepherd had managed to get through this experience five times. Five fucking times. And his mother. His poor mother. Jesus Christ. Derek was not equipped for this. He just wasn't. But every time his throat threatened to close, every time a noise overhead in the elevator shaft hit him in the wrong way, every time he felt the urge to run and never stop, he'd make himself pause for a moment, and he'd buy himself some mental pickles for his mental Meredith, and he'd tell himself panicking wasn't an option. And that helped. That helped, and once he'd reassured himself, once he'd roped in his own terror, he could go back to helping Meredith.

And time crawled.

And crawled.

And crawled.

When the elevator lights snapped on, and the car began to hum as it lifted, he wilted. "Oh, thank fucking god."

"It's moving?" Meredith said, sounding … almost drunk.

"I think we're getting rescued," Derek said, too upset and overwhelmed to smile.

When the elevator doors trundled open, a team of nurses and Dr. Charlton swarmed into the elevator like ants, and their voices and bustle swept over him like a wave. He flopped against the metal wall, panting, as he watched them lift a straining Meredith onto a gurney. He felt dizzy, and he thought if he stood up, he might fucking faint, and so he sat there in a pile with the bloody coats. The floor of the elevator was a bloody, slippery mess. His wife's blood. All over the floor. All over him.

"Derek?" Mark said. There were so many people. And it was so loud. Derek held a hand out, warding away all the people in his space, crowding him. "Derek?" Mark repeated, but the word was far across a canyon the second time, deep and echoing and distant. "Hey, give him some fucking space!"

"We got stuck in an elevator," Derek said, shock lacing every word.

"Derek, man, come on," Mark said in a quiet, encouraging voice. "Come on, breathe. This isn't over yet, and you really don't want to miss this part."

"Where's Derek?" he heard Meredith say, the volume of her voice waning as they rolled the gurney away. "Please, where's Derek?" They were taking her away. They were taking her away, and he'd promised he'd be there. The whole time. He'd promised.

_Snap out of it_, he told himself. _Snap the fuck out of it. You can't be this fucking useless._

Derek stood, shoes slipping, but Mark caught him in a strong grip and helped him step forward, away from the mess in the elevator. Someone took his hand off the slow-mo button, and time snapped back into its regular march. "I'm … I'm okay," Derek said. He didn't sound okay. Even to his own ears. But fuck that. He could be okay until Meredith had their baby, at least.

Mark's grip tightened. "I've got you, man," he said.

The gurney was down the hall already. "I promised I wouldn't leave," Derek said. "I … promised."

Mark's pace picked up. Derek felt like they were in one of those silly potato sack races where partners had their legs tied together or some fucking nonsense, but Mark managed to catch them up in seconds. Derek grabbed Meredith's hand, and Mark and the world melted away. "I'm right here," he said. "You're doing great, Meredith." She looked at him through pain-clouded eyes and didn't speak. He grinned at her. "You're doing so, so great."

"Don't push, Meredith," Dr. Charlton was saying as they rushed down the hall. "Don't push. You're almost fully dilated. Everything feels fine. The head is down. Just a few minutes, and then you can go to town. I promise."

The entourage spilled into the delivery room like the crash of a wave, and for a moment, Derek got pushed out of the way. His hand separated from Meredith's. "Someone get Dad a smock," Dr. Charlton said.

It took Derek a minute to realize Dr. Charlton meant him. He was Dad. Holy fuck. He was Dad. He was Dad. How could he be Dad? He wasn't ready to be Dad! A nurse appeared out of nowhere with a plastic pull on. Mark eclipsed Derek's view for a moment. "Mark," Derek croaked. It was the only word he could think of other than Meredith.

Mark grinned like he'd won the lottery. "This is it!" he said, and he helped Derek pull on the smock, and then gripped Derek's shoulders and pushed him toward the bed. "Don't worry, Meredith. I promise, I'm not looking." From the space-y look on Meredith's sweaty face, though, Mark was the last thought in her head, if he resided in any of her thoughts at all.

Dr. Charlton looked up from her stool. Her eyes creased as she smiled behind her surgical mask.
"Why don't you sit by Meredith's head?" she suggested to Derek.

"I'm here!" Cristina said, gasping as she crashed into the room. "I'm here, I'm here!"

"Cristina …," Derek heard Meredith say, again in that drunk-y tone that told him Meredith was having her own bout with shock.

"Alex and Lexie and Richard are pacing in the waiting room," Cristina said. "Well, Lexie and Richard are pacing. Alex is chill."

"… Okay," Meredith said.

Cristina gave Meredith a dispassionate gaze. "Do you want me out in the waiting room with them, or in here with you?"

Meredith swallowed. It took her a long, long time to formulate any kind of answer. "You don't have to watch the … ick," she said, words slurring.

"Oh, good," Cristina said. She looked at Derek and gave him a thumbs up. "You'll be much better at this part than me, anyway. Assuming you don't freak out. Are you freaking out? Do I need to be here, so you can freak out?"

Holy fuck, yes. "I'm okay," he said, tone wavering.

"Great!" Cristina said in a faux-chipper tone.

"Seriously?" he said.

She shrugged, and he gaped at her as she traipsed back out of the room. He just didn't get it. Clearly, her and Meredith's friendship was a deep, abiding thing. But hell if he would ever figure out why.

"Do you need me?" Mark said in a quiet, gentle tone.

Derek looked up at him. He swallowed. "I … I don't know." He was having as much trouble as Meredith with finding words. His whole body felt like jelly.

Without another word or protest, Mark pulled up a stool behind Derek's. Derek felt a big, warm hand squeeze his shoulder. A silent show of solidarity.

Meredith tensed and moaned. And then Dr. Charlton's gaze shifted. "Hang in there, Mom. I can give you a spinal block injection if you'd like one, but you're almost out of transition, which is the hard part, and painkillers will make pushing last longer. It's up to you."

Meredith stared at the ceiling, shaking. Sweat slicked her skin. Droplets pearled at her forehead. "Please, I want to be done, now. P-please."

Derek collapsed into the chair and gave her the brightest grin he could manage. The chair creaked as his weight distributed, but he barely heard it. "Hey, I'm here," he told her. He reached and grabbed her hand and squeezed. Nurses bustled back and forth. "You're doing so great."

She tipped her gaze toward him, but she didn't speak. He brushed her face with the back of his hand, pressing his skin to hers. She leaned into the touch.

"Meredith?" Dr. Charlton called from the foot of the bed. "Do you want a spinal block injection?"
When Meredith didn't answer, Derek leaned forward and pushed his fingers through Meredith's hair. "Meredith," he murmured. "Meredith, do you want painkillers, now? Dr. Charlton says you can have some if you want them, but she doesn't recommend it." If it were up to him, he'd be doing the injection himself, and it'd be done already, and fuck recommendation. But ….

"No," Meredith said.

He raised his eyebrows. "No? I thought you wanted an epidural."

"I want to be done," she snapped.

He held up his hands in surrender. "Okay. Okay, whatever you want."

"You're fully dilated," Dr. Charlton said. "As soon as your body tells you to start pushing, go ahead. Okay?"

"It's not telling me anything but ow," Meredith replied.

Dr. Charlton nodded. "You'll know it when you feel it. Just go with the flow."

Meredith tensed and moaned. Her grip around his hand quintupled, and he grimaced, but didn't complain. This contraction didn't have the urgency of before. Or an onslaught feel to it, at least not from Derek's perspective.

Meredith swallowed when she relaxed. She wasn't trembling anymore. "That … f-felt. Less."

"You're in the final stage," Dr. Charlton said, smiling. "Baby's getting positioned. Once your body gets everything lined up, you'll feel a pretty overruling urge to bear down. Go for it when you feel it."

"Oh," Meredith said. Her eyelids dipped, and she rested. Derek stroked her arm and glanced at his watch. 7:32 a.m. She'd been in active labor since a little after 1 a.m. Six and a half hours. And they'd been stuck in a fucking elevator for over half of it.

Dr. Charlton looked at Derek. "How are you doing, Dad?"

Except he didn't have a chance to answer. Meredith moaned, and tensed, and leaned forward, straining. Leaking tears renewed, pulsing out of her eyes, but this part didn't seem to be as bad for her. She squeezed his hand, clenched her teeth, and pushed. She flopped back onto the bed after about sixty seconds, panting.

"There you go," Dr. Charlton said. "You're doing great, Mom. Push when you feel that urge. Don't when you don't. Don't do more work than you have to."

"Okay," Meredith said in a tiny voice.

Derek brushed her forehead with his fingers, and she stared at him. "I'm right here. Let me know if I can do anything."

"Can you have … the next one?" she said. "This sucks."

He snorted, and he gave her a watery, shaky smile. "I love you. Very much."

"Please, don't take this the wrong way," Meredith said, "but right this moment, I kind of hate your guts."
He kissed her. "I think, given the circumstances, you're allowed."

"Oh," she said. "Good." And then she tensed up with a moan and pushed some more.
Chapter 35

Chapter Summary

This was originally intended to be part of 34, but I felt it less jarring if I just split it off into its own chapter. And don't forget, there's still an epilogue after this!

It'll really, really hurt, Derek.

I know, but it will be worth it.

Easy for you to say. You don't have to shove a bowling ball out your hoo-hoo.

It's not easy for me to say. I know giving birth isn't the same at all, but ... I understand what it's like to feel pain that you think might break you. And I don't think lightly about the idea of you hurting like that.

Oh.

I know it's scary. I do. We both want this, though. And it's not a platitude when I say it will be worth it. I mean it, Meredith. It will be worth it.

[Her]

Giving birth was a mind-and-body consuming process, and Meredith had long since lost track of the world around her. She'd pushed, and then she'd rested, and then she'd pushed, and then she'd rested. Her cheerleaders, both Derek and Mark, had long since melted into the background of her awareness, a steady murmur of, "You can do it! You're almost done!" that had stopped making sense beyond the sentiment, because she was tired, and she was hungry, and hurting, and just wanted to be done. Anything to be done. And then the cheerleading grew in a big crescendo, and she heard words like, "Crowning!" and, "One more! Just one more!" The horrible, heavy weight in her pelvis disappeared, the intense burning sensation between her legs quieted from conflagration to lit match, and a sharp cry pierced the room as Meredith collapsed against the pillow, shaking, panting, spent.

"Is it okay ...?" Meredith said, speech slurring as she caught her breath.

And then Derek was there, back solidly in the small bubble of her awareness, and she realized, at some point, he'd climbed into bed with her, his front to her back. Her pillow was Derek. He'd been there the whole freaking time, just like he'd promised.

He stroked her hair and hugged her and said, "She's perfect, Meredith. You did perfect."

"Congratulations, Mom and Dad!" Dr. Charlton said from somewhere in the fog. "It's a girl!"

The world stopped when a tiny, wet, wrinkled bundle covered in greasy white vernix was placed in Meredith's arms, only moments later. Derek's arms tightened around her as he leaned forward and peered over her shoulder at their daughter. The baby squinted, revealing bright, dazed, crossed blue eyes that looked more than a little mystified by this new, dry environment.

"She's so tiny," Meredith croaked. "She felt bigger coming out."

Derek kissed her temple, but said nothing. He seemed … mesmerized. Meredith couldn't blame him. She laughed. She felt her lower body contract as it attempted to expel the last remnants of placenta, but it was a distant thing. An inconsequential thing. The discomfort barely registered as nurses bustled around them.

"Welcome to the world, Mini Grey," Mark said from somewhere to the right, a deep smile quivering in his tone.

"What name did you two decide on?" Dr. Charlton said.

"Daphne," Derek said, the word thick and warble-y and full of emotion. "Daphne Anne Shepherd-Grey."

Meredith nodded. "Yeah," she said. "What he said." And all of it fell away. The fact that she was tired, and thirsty, and hungry, and spent.

All of it disappeared behind a euphoric wall.

All of it had been worth it.

[Him]

There were moments. Moments where, in a split second, Derek's life had changed forever. These moments didn't happen often. But when they hit, to Derek, they felt a little like getting struck by a bolt of lightning.

This was one of those moments.

Hell, he could swear he felt a real bolt of electricity zapping in the space between his ears, and his awareness of the room seemed to waver. Only for a moment. And then he was back in the room, wrapped around Meredith, mere seconds into fatherhood.

Medical staff were everywhere, bustling through the room, but they were a distant thing, like a television running in the other room. "Derek, look at her," Meredith said, eyes wet with what Derek could only classify as unbridled joy. Something Meredith hardly ever felt. She touched Daphne's tiny, tiny nose with her index finger. "Derek, look."

"I see," he rasped.

He glanced at Mark, a dumbstruck grin stuck on his face. Mark gave him a thumbs up. "So, how's it feel to be a dad?" Mark said.

Derek looked back at Daphne. A lump formed in his throat as he peered over Meredith's shoulder, enthralled. He swallowed. He had no idea what to say. None. He had no names for any of the things he felt right now.

Daphne had raven-colored, wispy hair. She was red-faced and wrinkled, and her head was a little bit cone-shaped after being squished through the birth canal, but she was perfect. Perfect, and so, so new. Untouched by all the shitty, endless wrong in the world, like madmen with guns.
"We did this, Derek," Meredith said, a rasp. Daphne fussed and wriggled.

He shook his head. "You did it, Meredith. You did so great. I'm ..." He found himself wordless again.

Meredith turned her head to meet his eyes. Exhaustion hugged her features, but he couldn't recall a moment he'd ever seen her happier. Meredith's arms tightened around the bundle. Her mouth opened, and closed. And opened, and closed. After a moment of struggling to find words, she gave up, and she settled on tipping her forehead against his cheek.

It seemed Meredith was speechless, too.

Daphne Anne Shepherd-Grey, 18.66 inches, 5.78 pounds, had been born at 8:29 a.m., after seven and a half hours of active labor, and about twenty-eight and a half long, torturous hours since the first contraction.

It was about 11:45 a.m., now. Derek had been a dad for a bit more than three hours. He'd gotten some yogurt and some orange juice for Meredith from the cafeteria as soon as things had settled down. He'd helped her take a shower once she'd subdued starvation, because she was so tired, she'd had trouble doing it on her own. They'd dealt with Lexie, and Richard, and Alex, and Cristina all visiting in what felt like glacial succession. He'd called his mother and all his sisters to let them know that they had a new granddaughter and niece, respectively. And then Meredith had collapsed into much-needed sleep – her first real sleep in almost two days.

"Derek, are you okay, man?" Mark said from somewhere behind Derek, but he sounded a bit like he was shouting underwater or something.

Derek leaned against the wall outside Meredith's room, shaking as spots formed in his vision. He blinked. He looked at Mark. He swallowed. He'd been stressed to the point of panic attack and had pulled himself back from it. Over and over and over. He'd had to deal with a constant stream of people. Socializing. Talking. Loud noise. Activity. He hadn't slept in ... probably almost as long as Meredith hadn't eaten, by the time he'd handed her the yogurt.

And, now, his life had been irrevocably changed.

"Derek?" Mark repeated, a frown on his face as he moved closer.

Time slowed like cold molasses. Derek had a chance to say, "Oh, I'm ... I'm ... I'm f-fine," before the spots in his vision became oil slicks covering everything. "I'm a dad, now." A zap of what felt like electricity lanced through his head.

And down he went into the blackness like a sack of bricks.

A solid block of ice was pressed against his back, and someone was peeling back his eyelid with an index finger when he regained his awareness. He flinched and made a sound of distress, and the hand pulled away immediately. He pulled his knees to his chest and curled into a ball that protected his soft parts.

"Sorry!" said a soft, tense voice. "I'm sorry, Derek."

Someone sighed. "I told you, he freaks out when he wakes up with someone in his grill."

"Well, how am I supposed to figure out what's wrong with him if-"
"Little Grey, he has PTSD, and he got rammed unwillingly through a stress gauntlet today. That's what's wrong."

"But-"

Air buffeted the skin on Derek's arms, and Derek felt a presence. Looming. "Derek, man. It's just me. It's Mark."

Derek squinted at the noise. A blurry, flesh-colored shape hovered in front of him. His head was pounding, and his muscles ached, and he felt nauseated. He swallowed. "Mark?" he croaked.

The blur wouldn't resolve. "Yeah, man. I need to put my arms under your shoulders to lift you. Okay?"

The strangest sensation filled his skull. Like his brain was an overladen washrag, and somebody was squeezing out all the water. No … not quite like that. Like … he'd stuck his brain in a light socket and gotten zapped. It was disorienting, and nauseating, and awful, and this was not PTSD doing this. He swallowed. "My head …," he said, the words a bare rasp.

"I know. You're dehydrated. We'll get you hooked up to a banana bag as soon as we can. I'm going to lift you, okay?"

No, this wasn't dehydration. But he couldn't get himself to arrive at the kind of coherence needed to explain the problem. Arms hooked under his shoulders, and the ice at his back gave way to air. Derek was vaguely aware of being settled in a wheelchair. Small hands lifted his feet and put them on the foot rests. A bigger hand splayed against his chest to keep him upright in the chair, despite him being less than a stone's throw from dissolving back into a dead faint.

Another brain squish disoriented him, and the next time he had the presence of mind to peer through his eyelashes, he saw floor tiles rolling at a lackadaisical pace underneath his shoes. "Mark?" he said, before he let a wave of fear bowl him over.

"Yeah. It's just me and Lexie. We're moving you. Nothing to be scared of."

Derek swallowed. "Kay," he said. He was too tired, and worn out, and achey, and awful to do much more than stare and be passive as he was transferred. Every thirty seconds or so, the fist would close around his brain, and he'd get another squish feeling.

Silence stretched.

"Do you want kids?" Mark said, breaching the quiet.

"What?" Lexie bleated like a startled lamb.

"Do you think you're ever going to want kids?" Mark said.

A long pause followed. Lexie coughed. "Do you want kids?"

"Mini Grey is … really fucking cute. I could see a Mini Sloan."

Another long pause. "Mark … I'm really not ready for kids. I mean, I'm only halfway through my residency, and we just got back together, and that's really, really fast, and- Really?" Lexie replied, bewilderment dripping from her tone. "You want kids? You?

Another pause. "Yeah, Little Grey," he said, the words warm. "With you? Really. Why is that so "hard to believe?"

"Because … because … because you have the emotional maturity of … like … me. And I'm very immature and in no way ready for a baby!"

"Maybe, I'm growing up," he suggested.

"Maybe," she said, though she didn't sound convinced. "Can we talk about this, later? Like … when I make attending?"

"You think there'll be that much of a later?" Mark said.

"Of course, I do," Lexie said. "I love you. Sometimes, I don't freaking know why, but I do."

"Okay," Mark said.

The wheelchair stopped, and the world blotted out as another fist squeezed inside Derek's skull. When he came back to himself, he heard a distinctive sound happening right behind his head.

"Please, get me a room first," Derek rasped. He swallowed. "My head is pounding. I feel … Weird. Awful. He couldn't describe it. "My head …"

"I know, man," Mark said. "You'll feel better when we get you hydrated."

Except that wasn't it, damn it. That wasn't the problem.

[Her]

She woke to darkness and ache and that burning feeling. Her lower body was a solid block of unhappiness. Why not, of course? She'd just pushed a bowling ball through her hoo-hoo. She was still tired, and would have drifted back to sleep, were it not for the fact that Derek wasn't in the chair beside her bed that he'd been in when she'd fallen asleep.

"Derek?" she rasped. The covers rustled as she shifted in her hospital bed.

"Derek's sleeping on the couch in Mark's office," Cristina said, and Meredith's gaze snapped to the left.

"I didn't see you," Meredith said.

Cristina shrugged.

Meredith frowned. "Why didn't he just have them bring him a cot?"

"He needed the quiet, Mere," Cristina replied with a pointed look.

"Oh," Meredith said. And then as realization sunk in, she added a weightier, "Oh." Crap. He'd been so great when she'd needed him – it'd been easy to forget he had a mental illness. A mostly healed one, yes, but she imagined he would always have bad days now and then.

She pushed back the covers and winced as she slid out of bed. The pads of her socked feet pressed against the cold tile floor as she stood. Gravity seemed more … more. She felt heavy. And tired. And slow.

For the first time, she took in the sight of her hospital room. One of the VIP single-occupant rooms. There was a small love seat and a reading chair and a dresser and a lamp. The blinds were drawn, blocking out the sun.

She moved to open them. The late afternoon sunlight slashed into the room like a sword, and she squinted on reflex. Her pasty reflection stared back at her from the glass. Her hair had dried kinked, she had huge bags under her eyes, every muscle ached, and her bladder whined at her for some relief.

"Do I look horrid?" she said.

"Yes," Cristina said. She grabbed Meredith's red bathrobe off the hook by the door and brought it to her. "Here," Cristina said. "It's cold in here."

"Thanks," Meredith said. She pulled it over her body, and warmth replaced chill. She bit her lip as she pressed her palm against her lower body. She petted the soft terrycloth. She wasn't as big as she'd been before Daphne had decided to come out, but … she definitely had no figure back, yet. Also … she felt … empty. That was weird. After carrying around a tiny person for so long – hell, she felt like it had been years – it was weird to be alone in her own skin again. "Cristina, I just had a baby."

"Yep," Cristina said. "You really did. Thanks."

Meredith frowned. "Thanks?"

"What very few, minuscule, microscopic doubts I had left, you set me straight," Cristina said. "I never, ever want to do that. Ever."

Meredith snorted. "Glad I could help you out."

After Meredith stopped in the bathroom to relieve herself, change her maxi pad, and clean up a little, they hobbled out of the room together into the bright hallway, and distant bustle became the in-your-face go-go-go of any major hospital. Well, Meredith hobbled. Cristina walked. A team with a panting, moaning woman sprawled on a gurney trundled past. Another birth in progress. The world had continued in Meredith's oblivious, dreaming absence.

"Hey, Meredith?" Cristina said as they turned right and began the long stroll toward Mark's office.

Meredith winced as the ache in her body settled into a dull throb that waxed in time with her heartbeat. "What?" she said.

Cristina gave her a small smile. "Congratulations."

Meredith matched her smile with one of her own. "Thank you."

Cristina gave her a curt nod, and they kept moving down the hall.

Meredith found Derek sacked on his stomach on Mark's couch in the darkness. A banana bag had been hooked up via IV to the back of his hand. She flipped on Mark's desk lamp instead of the overhead light, so the light wouldn't be eye-piercing. Shadows stretched along the walls, illuminating stacks of paperwork. She crouched by the couch, ignoring the way her muscles pulled to marvel over the fact that she could crouch, again.

"Derek?" she said, the word soft. Unobtrusive.

"M'wake," he mumbled without opening his eyes.
She brushed her fingers through his hair. "How are you doing? Can you sit up?"

"No," he said.

She frowned. "No?"

"My head …"

She bit her lip. "What's wrong with your head?"

He opened his eyes enough to squint at her. And then he winced, and his focus spaced for a moment. "My brain feels like a lightning rod." He cringed and rolled his face back into the pillow. He muttered something against the soft leather. All she heard was, "Flu," and, "Sorry."

She made him roll over and felt at his forehead. He shook like he felt cold. Except … this didn't look like the flu to her. Not everything … matched. The flu didn't make a brain feel like a lightning rod. Hmm. Lightning rod. Lightning. Electricity. … Brain zaps? She remembered hearing about brain zaps before, and she was pretty sure she hadn't heard it from Derek. But … what had been the context? She wracked her brain.

She swallowed when realization hit. He might have been too out of sorts to connect the clues together, but she could connect them in seconds once they were laid out for her. Crap. She'd kind of stolen his undivided attention for the last two days or so. "Derek, when was the last time you took your Paxil?"

It took him a long time to answer, but when he did, he said in an ominous tone, "Dunno."

[Hi]

He leaned forward on the couch in the dark, sipping orange juice. He rubbed his temples. The brain squishes he'd been feeling had slowed and then stopped within an hour of Cristina coming back from his office with the spare bottle of Paxil pills he kept in his desk for overnight emergencies.

"You really think my panic attack in the elevator was from withdrawal, not PTSD?" Derek said.

Meredith hugged him after he set the cup of juice down on the side table. "I think it's very possible," she said. "I think you should try to taper off, Derek. Let's see what happens."

"But …"

"I know it's scary to you," she replied in a measured tone. "I know you don't want to go back to how you were before Dr. Wyatt stabilized you. And clearly, cold turkey is not the way to go, but I think, if I'm right about this, you really don't need it anymore." She kissed him through his shirt. "I mean … you handled everything so well."

He frowned. "I don't know if I'd call that well."

"I would," Meredith said. "I mean, you had some issues, yes, but you were able to overcome them, and now we know, not only did you not have Paxil helping you, you might have even had its sudden absence hindering you. Tapering is worth a try, Derek. I really think it is."

He looked at her. His wife in her rumpled red bathrobe. She'd just had a baby. Their baby. They were parents. Yet, there she was, being his cheerleader like nothing momentous had happened
"Forget about me for a second. How are you?" he said, eyes narrowing. "Are you feeling better?"

"I'm a little achey," she admitted, an unreadable expression on her face. "A little tired. But ... I'm a mom. And you're a dad. We're parents."

"We are," he said.

"How did that happen?" she said, gazing up at him, wonder in her eyes.

He frowned. Normally, he'd crack a joke about her shoddy sex ed. But .... We're adults, he remembered her saying, years ago. How did that happen? And how do we make it stop? "You don't regret this, do you?"

"Nope," she said, the word cautious. She bit her lip. "Why? Do you?"

He shook his head. "No." They shared a long look in the dim light. Her gaze held affection, and warmth, and said all sorts of things to him like devotion. This woman completed him. He pulled her into his arms and kissed her. "You're the love of my life. I don't think I'm capable of regretting it."

Her gaze softened. "Always here. Saying things." She brushed her hand against his face. "I love you, too."

They rested, sharing space together.

Meredith grinned beside him. They stood in front of a large plexiglass window in the maternity wing of the hospital. A chorus of cries filtered through the window, distant, muted.

"This always makes me feel better," Meredith said.

Derek looked up at her. "You come here a lot?"

"To look at babies?" Meredith said.

He nodded.

She grinned and looked through the plexiglass. "I used to come here with George all the time." Her grin widened. "This is the first time I've done this and been able to watch my baby, though." She leaned against Derek's side. He wrapped his arm over her shoulder and held her close. "I wish George was here to see this." She sighed. "Are you feeling better, now?"

He snorted. "Meredith, I'm not the one who just had a baby this morning. I should be asking you that."

"Honestly?" she said. She leaned into his embrace, staring down at Daphne through the glass. "I'm sure I'll be panicking tomorrow about what a horrible mother I'll be, and oh, my god, how will we do this, and crap, crap, crap, what the hell have we done? But right this moment?" She snaked her arm around Derek's waist and squeezed. "I feel perfect, and not a freaking thing in the world is wrong."

Derek swallowed, squeezing her shoulder as he leaned closer to the glass to stare. "Yeah. Me, too," he said, smiling at the revelation.
Daphne wriggled in the leftmost isolette in the front row. She wasn't crying. Just squinting at the world with a disgruntled expression like … Gee. What is all this? I liked the warm, wet, dark place, better.

"I think she has your eyes," Meredith said.

Derek grinned. "White newborns always have blue eyes."

"I know, but hers are …" Meredith glanced at him, gaze creasing with affection. "I think they're your blue. And I think she's got your hair, too."

"It looks more like yours to me," Derek said, peering at the wisps. Meredith's natural hair color was pretty dark. Not as dark as his, but … dark.

"Well, I hope you're wrong," Meredith said. "Your hair is way nicer than mine."

"It's a pain in the ass," he said. "I wouldn't wish it on anybody."

Meredith sighed. "It'd be a great opportunity for father-daughter bonding over haircare lessons."

"I can just imagine it, now," Derek said. "Our first family spa day for keratin treatments."

Meredith laughed.

A nurse Derek vaguely recognized came up to the window and waved at them. Tamika Adeboye, said her name tag. She was a dark-skinned woman with a kind face. She grinned and made a gesture. Come around, he thought she was indicating. That's what Meredith saw, apparently, because she stepped over to the doorway to the right of the viewing window.

Tamika poked her head through the doorway and said, "Do you want to hold her for a little?"

"Yes," Meredith said, and Tamika led them into the little side room next to the babies. There were a few rocking chairs. Mostly for nurses, but occasionally they let parents in, if a baby was too sick to be taken to its mother for long periods, or if, say, the parents were staff members.

"Wait here," Tamika said, and she slipped back into the room where the babies were kept. She came back in moments with a snuffling, wriggling, tiny bundle wrapped in a pink thermal blanket. She stepped toward Meredith.

"Derek, you sit," Meredith said.

"It's okay; I can wait until you're done," he said.

She shook her head. "You haven't had a chance, yet. I was hogging."

He snorted. "You weren't hogging, Meredith. I think you're allowed to hold and nurse the baby you just gave birth to for a little bit."

"And I love you for being so accommodating. Really, I do," she said. She gestured at the chair. "But shut up, and sit."

He rolled his eyes. "Bossy."

She grinned at him. "I know. It keeps you in line."

"Sit, Dr. Shepherd," Tamika commanded, though her smile took the weight away from her words.
Derek shook his head. "I can see when I'm outnumbered." And so he sank into the rocking chair with a sigh. Tamika leaned over him and he was given the tiny, blanket-wrapped bundle. When Tamika stepped away, and Daphne's full weight sank into his arms, he blinked. Daphne was ... barely anything. Her skull was smaller than his palm. Wispy, dark, downy hair plowed flat underneath his hand as he ran his hand over her scalp. "Oh, my god, she's so tiny," he said, cradling Daphne to his chest.

"Told you so," Meredith said, grinning.

"I believed you," Derek replied. "I ...." He put his index finger to one of the wriggling limbs in his arms. Teeny tiny fingers wrapped around his. Though he couldn't even come close to calling it eye contact, Daphne squinted in his vague direction. His chest tightened. "Oh, my god," he repeated. Words with meaning had been stripped from him.

He stared at the tiny new life that he and Meredith had made. Daphne was him. And her. Both of them. An amazing, magical combination.

Meredith sat next to him and pulled as close as their dueling rocking chairs would allow. She rested her head on his shoulder and seemed content just to watch as he got to know their creation. A replacement thought come to brilliant, overwhelming life in his arms.

Hi, Baby. It's Dad.

He'd been saying those words for so long in his head, for so many months, the idea that he had the opportunity to say them for real, now, bowled him over.

"Hi, Daphne," he said, a choked whisper. His vision blurred as he looked down at the newest member of his family. "It's Dad."

In this moment, the best four words in the world.
Epilogue

Hello all. It's been a long while, hasn't it? I was digging around on my hard drive, yesterday, and discovered that I had most of the work for this epilogue done already, so I dug in and finished it. In my blinding drive to complete this story and have it done, this epilogue hasn't been beta-ed by anyone except me, so any mistakes are my own. Thanks to everybody for your encouragement and kind words. Thanks for your patience. Thanks to the many beta readers I've had over the years. And thanks for coming along on this ride with me. I'm happy to finally give this story the ending I had planned from day 1. Cheers!

Between the dog, the baby, and both Meredith and Derek getting ready at the same time, the house was organized chaos. Meredith stood at her vanity with her brush, swiping it through her hair, while she watched Daphne out of the corner of her eye. Daphne was playing with some blocks in the space between the edge of the bed and the wall. She hummed various nonsensical syllables, looking engrossed as she shoved the blocks this way and that.

Meredith reached for her hair clip, only to frown when her fingers didn't find it in its usual place. She glanced across the countertop, frown deepening. "Derek, have you seen my hair thingy?"

The whir of his electric razor silenced for a moment. "The black one?" he said.

Meredith shook her head. "No, the green one."

A pause followed, and then he said, "You have a green one?"

She sighed. Typical. "Never mind."

His razor turned on again. She tried to think if she'd used the green clip recently, but couldn't recall. Whatever. She grabbed a hairband instead, not willing to spend time searching for a needle in a five-bed-room-house-sized stack.

The phone rang just as Meredith set down her brush. She glanced at the caller I.D. and picked up the receiver.

"So, we're thinking September," Lexie said without preamble when Meredith answered. "Does September work for you? For the wedding, I mean."

Meredith eyeballed Daphne, who was still playing, off in her own little toddler world, so Meredith sat on the bed in her bathrobe. The mattress squeaked as her weight settled.

"Like … this September, September, or September as in next year?" Meredith asked.

A brief pause followed. "… This September?"

"W—"

"Or next?" Lexie babbled before Meredith could even finish her sentence. "Would next be better?
Is this September too fast? Do you think we're moving too fast? I'm—“ "Lexie," Meredith snapped, silencing the babble storm.

"Yes?"

"Breathe."

Meredith heard a deep, gulping breath on the other end of the line.

"Sorry," Lexie said. "Sorry, I'm just …"

Meredith grinned. "Freaking out?"

"Hell, yeah, am I freaking out," Lexie said. "I think I actually passed freaking out a few exits ago."

"Why are you asking me?" Meredith said, shifting the phone to her other ear. "I'm not the one getting married. Isn't Mark the one whose schedule you should be concerned with?"

A pause followed, like Lexie wasn't quite sure what to say. "Well, yes, but …"

Meredith frowned. "But what?"

"Would-you-be-my-matron-of-honor?" Lexie said in a rush.

Meredith's jaw dropped a fraction of an inch, and a brief stutter of sound caught in her throat. Not an um, really, just an utterance that meant nothing.

"You don't want to?" Lexie said.

"No, no, you just surprised me," Meredith said, shaking her head. "Really, you want me to do it?"

"Well, who else would I pick?"

"I don't know," Meredith said with a shrug. "Molly?"

Meredith could practically hear the dismissive hand wave Lexie swiped the air with. "Molly and I aren't as close as you and I are," Lexie said. "And … well, I thought it would be nice. I'm positive Mark's going to ask Derek to be his best man, if he hasn't already."

Meredith blinked. "You want me to be your matron of honor because you thought it would be nice," she parroted.

"Yes," said Lexie.

A lump formed in Meredith's throat. "Sure," she said. "I'd love to."

And that's when she heard her daughter giggle in an entirely-too-mischievous way.

"Daphne!" Meredith snapped.

Daphne looked up with her big blue eyes and dropped the tube of lipstick like it'd burned her. "Uh oh?" she said in her soft, cherubic voice.

"Lexie, I gotta go," Meredith said into the phone. "I'll call you back."

"But—," Lexie had a chance to say before the call ended.
Meredith glared and stalked forward. "Um, yeah, Daphne, that's an uh oh." She bent over and snatched the lipstick up from the floor to examine it. Her favorite Nars Antique Rose. And all that was left was a caked, broken stump. It was definitely ruined. She sighed and slumped to the floor to gather up all her stuff. Compacts. Tubes. Wands. And hardly any of it was still in one piece.

Two seconds. She'd turned around for two freaking seconds while she'd been on the phone. How did Daphne do this much damage in two freaking seconds? Meredith would have to go makeup shopping again. She hated makeup shopping! She only wore it once every blue moon, when she had a work function, or when she and Derek went out someplace special.

"Damn it, Daph . . .," she said, unable to stop the tidal wave of why me? that had crashed against her.

"That curse jar we made for the preservation of our child's innocence is going to get rich quick," Derek called from the bathroom.

Meredith cringed and bit her lip. "No, it's not! You didn't hear that." She glances at Daphne and amends in a whisper, "You didn't hear it, either."

"Yes, I did," Derek said.

Meredith glared at the open doorway. "Did not."

Derek stood in profile by the mirror. His electric razor whirred as he polished off a day's growth of stubble. "Did, too."

"Did not."

"Too!"

"Not," she said. "And don't flip this around on me! You're the one with the dirty sailor mouth. Haven't you put in like $10, already?" A buck per word quickly created a money tree, apparently. They'd only started last week, when they'd discovered Daphne saying, "Cap!" over and over and over. And she didn't mean cap as in hat. Their daughter knew like ten freaking words, and one of them was already a curse. "If she picks up something really bad, it'll be from you."

"Who, me?" Derek said. "She won't pick up anything from me. I'm angelic. Never said a naughty thing in my life."

Meredith snorted. With the way he dropped f-bombs sometimes, she was just waiting for daycare to tell her Daphne had committed the word fuck to her growing lexicon. "Yeah, right," she grumbled. "No one would ever guess you'd had prior practice at staying g-rated for young ears."

"I heard that."

"Don't care."

"And I'll have you know living with impressionable ears 24/7 is way different than babysitting sisters and nieces and nephews."

"So, you admit to being the cause of our swear jar's trust fund?"

"I admit nothing," Derek said.

The whirring stopped as he turned off his razor and set it down beside the sink. The sharp scent of an open bottle of aftershave tickled her nose as he patted his face. He turned and gave her a devastating smile, but the smile melted away when he stepped out of the master bathroom and finally got a look at the garish spectacle spread before him. His eyes widened.

"Da!" Daphne chirped.

"What—?" he had a chance to say, and then he choked like he could barely curtail his laughter. The smile was back on his face. This time, though, she kind of wanted to smack it off of him.

"Look what your daughter did to my makeup case," Meredith said.

"Look what your makeup case did to my daughter!" he countered.

She bit her lip. Given that Daphne had used lipstick like foundation and mascara like a marker, and currently looked more fiendish than the Joker, she couldn't argue much with that.

Derek raised his eyebrows. "And why is she my daughter when she makes a mess?"

"Well, she was my daughter when she painted our kitchen floor with dog food. You specifically said!"

"So, she changes ownership depending on whose stuff she destroyed?"

"I guess so!" Meredith said.

"So, how on earth did she get into that?" he said, gesturing to the makeup mess as he bent down to grab Daphne. "I thought we had a child lock on that drawer." He sat her on the vanity next to the sink and wet a washcloth under the faucet.

"Da!" Daphne repeated.

He nodded. "I know." He snickered. "Very pretty."

"Da!"

He nodded again. "I know. I think we might need to go over the 'less is more' approach before we let you fly solo with this shi—" He cleared his throat, reddening. "Stuff."

Meredith folded her arms. "Swear jar."

"I didn't swear!"

"You really wanted to," she said.

"But I didn't," he said, scrubbing Daphne's face while their daughter giggled. "It doesn't count."

"Does, too."

"Does not."

"Too."

"Not. Seriously, how did she get into this?"

"I was going to wear some today."

He paused to look at her. "Oh?"
She bit her lip. "Well, it's a special occasion, isn't it?"

His gaze softened. "I guess so. But—"

"Two seconds, Derek," Meredith said before he could ask. She dumped all the junk back into the makeup case. She'd sort it out later, when she had time. So much for special occasions. She'd have to go with her usual foundation-only approach. "I was on the phone for two seconds."

"At least she didn't put it on the wall, I guess," Derek said. He dabbed the washcloth against Daphne's nose. "Skin's a little easier to scrub." He frowned when hardly anything came off. "Or, maybe not. Do you have makeup remover?"

She sighed. "I did."

His frown deepened as he stopped scrubbing to look at her. "Past tense?"

"Smell the acetone?"

"Oh, is that what that is?"

Meredith nodded. "Yes. And it's in our carpet."

He blinked. His jaw dropped for a moment before he picked it up. "How did she do all this in two seconds?" he said slowly.

"I don't know," Meredith said, throwing up her hands. "Maybe, our child is evil."

Derek snorted. "Meredith, I hate to break it to you, but this is par for the course, and it only gets worse before it gets better."

"No, it doesn't," she said.

He gave her an apologetic look. "It does. Terrible twos are less than a year away."

"No, you're wrong."

He leaned forward and kissed her. "I'm sorry, but this? This, I do have plenty of experience with."

"Well, crap," Meredith said. And then she sighed. "I mean crud. I mean ….

"Cap!" said Daphne. "Cap, cap, cap!"

Meredith and Derek shared a sigh, silent for a moment. Crap, indeed. Kid ears were like freaking sponges. And it wasn't fair. "I'd like to pick, 'Resetting my baby's horrible vocabulary for $800,' Alex," Meredith said.

Derek snorted with amusement. But she didn't really feel like she was joking.

"Derek," she said in a soft voice.

He looked up at her. "Hmm?"

"Am I a terrible mom?"

His scrubbing motions stilled, and he peered at her for a long, long moment while Daphne babbled by his hip. From the flash of worry that crossed his face, she'd just smashed a nerve with a hammer. Did he think she was a terrible mom and simply hadn't said anything? A lump formed in her throat. "It's just ... our fifteen-month-old daughter swears. And she escapes to paint with dog food and expensive lipstick. And ... I don't think I'm any good at this. I keep screwing up."

He looked at his hands.

"You do, don't you?" she said. "You think I'm a terrible mom."

He swallowed. "No, I don't. I think you're perfect."

"Yeah," she grumbled. "Your expression totally says, 'Meredith, you're perfect.'"

He sighed. "Meredith, I'm not worried about you. I'm worried about me."

She gaped. "But you're like ... made to be a dad or something. It's totally your jive or whatever."

"I still have ...." He paused, looking for all the world like he was trying to find a word, and all the words had taken a vacation in Timbuktu. Daphne's nonsensical babbling filled the ensuing silence. "I still have ... problems."

She frowned. "You don't have problems."

"Meredith, I do have problems."

"Once in a blue moon!" she countered.

He sighed. "I worry I'll snap at her. Or .... Once in a blue moon is all it takes."

She wrapped her arms around him. His muscles relaxed. "Derek, I understand why you're worried, but ... please, don't. You're wonderful with her."

He still had his volatile moments. He probably always would. And every once in a while, she'd find herself single-momming it for the night, because he said he couldn't handle the noise. But that was seriously only once in a while, and he'd never once allowed it to leak into his time with Daphne.

If he wasn't feeling right, he told Meredith, and he took some space — or if Meredith wasn't available, Lexie and Mark were a phone call away, or Richard, or Cristina and Owen — and life went on. And it's not like this was a one-sided thing.

She'd gotten sick with a nasty head cold a few months back, and he'd held things up on his own for over a week. He took, yes, but he gave. He gave lots.

"If everybody had to be perfect to be a parent, the human race would have gone extinct from lack of procreation eons ago," she said. "You do the best you can, and your best is plenty good enough for me."

"What?" she said.

He shrugged. "My mother told me something similar."

"Well, your mother is like the poster child for good mothers, so, clearly, this discussion is moot."

This time he laughed for real. "Only if you admit it applies to you, too."
"But—"

He raised his eyebrows. "Your best is perfect, Meredith," he said. He leaned closer and kissed her on the cheek. "The worst that will happen is she'll grow up to be just like you, which ...." He shrugged. "That's not a bad thing in my book."

She swallowed as the lump in her throat expanded. "Thanks," she said.

His gaze twinkled. "You're welcome."

"Ma!" Daphne said. "Ma, ma!"

"Now, let's see if we can get the rest of this off you before I have to leave," Derek said. He glanced at his watch, and then at Meredith, before focusing on Daphne. "Are you going to follow in the Jeep or something?"

Meredith glanced down at herself. She still wore her scarlet bathrobe. She'd been hoping to ride into work with him, but ... she didn't see any way that was going to happen, at this point. She wasn't dressed, Daphne was covered in an endless pink smear, and he had to leave in twenty minutes.

"I don't see that I have much of a choice, at this point," she said.

He frowned at that, but didn't argue. "Okay," is all he said. "But you'll be there." He sounded ... worried.

Meredith smiled, watching him scrub fruitlessly for a moment before she reached out to squeeze his shoulder. "I'll be there, Derek," she assured him. "I wouldn't miss it."

He clenched his jaw. His temples danced.

"Are you nervous?" she said.

He barked a wry laugh as if to say, Understatement of the fucking century, Meredith.

"Da!" Daphne babbled in solidarity.

All Derek said aloud, though, was, "I don't want to add to the swear jar."

"Oh, sure, now you find restraint," Meredith quipped.

If he thought her remark humorous, he didn't show it. She watched him for a few more moments, but opted not to push. She'd learned, with lots of trial and error, when he needed to be pushed, and when he needed to be left alone, and this was definitely a don't-poke-the-bear-with-a-stick moment.

"Let me get some olive oil," she said. "That should help with the makeup, I think."

"Thanks," he said. "I swear, this stuff is cement in disguise."

Way too long after Derek, Meredith stepped through the sliding doors of the hospital, pushing Daphne forward in her stroller. The bright, open space of the entryway was sunny and warm, and reception was quick to greet her with a smile. Things had changed so rapidly over the past few months.

A ream of papers slapped onto the desk in front of her, and she snapped awake. She may have muttered something like, "Whaghmmph?" But she couldn't be sure. She blinked, and the fuzz that was Derek's office came into focus, and with it, the distant bustle of the hospital beyond the walls.

Derek peered down at her with a concerned frown. "I'm sorry," he said. "I didn't mean to wake you. I thought you were just resting your eyes."

"I was resting my eyes!" Meredith said. She glanced at the thousand-page medical volume onto which she'd face-planted. In terms of pillow choices, she'd made a crappy decision. She worked at the crick in her neck. "I mean … well, okay, maybe, I wasn't. Exactly."

Daphne had only recently started to sleep through the night, and Meredith was still catching up after months of no rest. Derek was, too. She didn't think he knew how often she'd caught him dozing in random places, all over their house. Given how hard his body had been working to heal him, both physically and mentally, over the year prior to Daphne's arrival, he'd been working from a considerably larger fitness deficit than she had. She'd even caught him on the steps of their porch, leaning against the railing, hand outstretched across his knee, out cold, with Samantha peering up at him woefully, the Frisbee he'd thrown moments before, clutched between her teeth. Meredith couldn't throw stones, though. Hell, she couldn't even laugh at him, because she was too exhausted to bother. The fact that she was a resident making up a leave deficit a mile deep meant she wasn't much better off than he was.

She bit her lip and looked up at him.

"Will we ever not be tired?" she said.

He scrubbed at his eyes with the backs of his knuckles. "I hope so," he said. "I remember what getting enough sleep felt like. I sorely miss it." He gave her a tired smile. "Worth it, though, don't you think?"

She shared a grin with him. "Understatement. You're picking her up from daycare, right?"

"Yes, I've got her. And you're—"

"Picking her up tomorrow when my shift from hell finally ends? Yep."

He looked at her makeshift pillow and skimmed the page. She was reading up for a percutaneous cordotomy. Dr. Weller was due to perform it tomorrow for a young woman with stage four leukemia, and she'd nabbed the resident slot.

"Something I can help you with?" Derek said.

Meredith shook her head. "Nah," she said. "I've done this before. I was just brushing up." She reached for the ream of papers he'd dropped onto his desk. On the first page was a huge table full of numbers. There were dollar signs. But the content was, for the most part, gibberish to her. She was not a math-y person. "What's this?"

"The quarterly financial statement," he said. "We're in the black. Finally."

"In the black," she echoed. In the black. In the black. And then it sunk in. "Wait, really?"

Derek nodded. "Seattle Grace Mercy West is officially no longer a sinking ship, just … slightly capsized."

She leapt to her feet. "Does this mean—?"
He shook his head, and she sighed. "Not, yet, Meredith. I want to make sure this sticks."

"It'll stick," she said. "You do a good commercial. You're catnip for the injured." Mr. Pruitt had picked Derek and Callie to be the "faces" of Seattle Grace. Now, they were plastered on posters all over the city. Meredith couldn't even buy groceries without seeing her husband flashing his sexy grin at her.

"We put the heart back in healthcare," was the hospital's new slogan.

She thought it was rather catchy.

He snorted and wrapped his arms around her. He kissed her. "We'll see," he said.

She pulled her fingers through his hair. "How long until you're convinced?"

"Dr. Bailey to OR 8. Dr. Bailey to OR 8, please," said a nasal voice over the PA, yanking her back to the present. She shook her head and licked her lips. She had to stop daydreaming, or she'd miss Derek's moment.

"Have you seen Derek anywhere?" Meredith said as Mark trotted toward her across the bustling waiting room.

"Nope, not since this morning," Mark said. He grinned at Daphne. "Hey, Mini Grey!"

"Ma!" Daphne said.

Meredith had a diaper bag slung over her shoulder. Between lugging that and pushing the hulking stroller, she felt like a freaking pack mule. She glanced at her watch. 8:47 a.m. She'd been planning to meet up with Derek in his office, but it was too late now. Luckily, she knew exactly where he'd be at 9 a.m. "So, how did he seem?" she said.

"It's Mark," Mark said, looking at Daphne with consternation. "Say Mark."

"Ma!"

"Mark."

"Ma!"

Meredith rolled her eyes. "Mark," she said.

Mark sighed and finally shifted his attention. "What?"

"Derek," Meredith said slowly. "How. Did. He. Seem?"

"Oh."

Meredith frowned. That didn't sound good. "Oh? What does 'oh' mean?"

He rolled his eyes. "Oh as in, 'Oh, I heard you this time.'"

"Okay. Well?" she prodded.

"Well, what?"

"For crap's sake, Mark, how did he seem?"
Mark looked up at the ceiling, pondering that for a moment. "A bit like someone told him the operating room is actually a gun, and it's pointed at him."

"That bad?" she said, heart sinking.

Mark shrugged. "He's just being dramatic. He'll be fine once he gets going."

"Mark—"

"Trust me," he assured her. "You know he's a self-absorbed drama queen, sometimes."

She rolled her eyes. "Understatement." But there was a huge difference between foot-stomping drama for drama's sake and drama ejected from the horrible roller coaster of emotions constituent of a panic attack. "But, Mark, you're sure he's not having a bad day?" Derek hadn't had a bad day in months.

"It's not a bad day," Mark said. "It's not even a medium-wrong day. I promise. He's fine."

She frowned. "So, you don't think he's—"

"I don't think so," Mark said before she could finish. "Look, don't worry. I've got this. I even gave him a pep talk."

"A pep talk," Meredith parroted, tone flat.

Mark grinned and made a face. "Yep. A pep talk. And don't tell me I'm not good at pep talks. I was a quarterback, you know." Daphne giggled, and his attention shifted to her. "What, you don't believe me?"

"Ma!"

Mark rolled his eyes. "You sure you can't teach Mini Grey some Rs?"

Meredith snorted. "That's one of the last letters they learn, Mark. You'll be Ma for a while. Or maybe Mack."

"I can deal with Mack," he said. "Hey, kid, can you say Mack?"

"Ma!"

Mark sighed. "So, how is she, anyway?" He peered at Daphne, frown wrinkling his face. "She looks a bit ….

Meredith raised her eyebrows and shifted, trying to alleviate the strain on her shoulders. "Pink?"

"… Yeah," Mark said, tone cautious. He held out his hands. "I'll take her."

Meredith gratefully passed the stroller to him. "Thanks. She got into my makeup this morning. We got it off, but all that scrubbing irritated her skin a bit. She's fine." She glanced at her watch. She only had a few minutes before the procedure was scheduled to start. "Will you drop her off at daycare for me?" Meredith said. "I'm going to miss it, if I don't hurry, and—"

"Sure," Mark said, gesturing for the diaper bag. She handed that off to him, too. "Hey did Lexie give you a call about …?"

Meredith grinned. "Yes. Congratulations."
"Good," Mark said. "Just checking." And then he shoed her away. "Go!"

So, she went.

"Chief!" a resident Meredith didn't recognize called as she dashed behind a crash team. "Chief!"

Meredith followed the words, expecting to find Derek, until the moment she saw Richard standing by the OR board, looking in the direction of the call. Which meant Chief Shepherd had already morphed back into Dr. Shepherd, mild-mannered neurosurgeon. He wasn't even Head of Neurosurgery anymore. Since Dr. Weller had stepped into Derek's job when Derek had been promoted, that meant Derek had demoted himself all the way down the ladder again.

\textit{You're sure you'll be okay not being in charge anymore?} she'd asked him.

But all he'd done was shrug and smile, like the weight of the world had just melted off his shoulders. \textit{Honestly, I can't think of anything I'd like more.} He'd winked. \textit{Professionally speaking, I mean.} And then he'd kissed her and said in that soft, lilting tone of his — the one that made her melt — \textit{I'll be fine. I promise.}

She believed him, too. At least some good things had come from the shooting. It'd helped him clarify what he wanted out of his life. And that was no small thing.

"Chief?" repeated the resident as she skidded to a halt behind Richard, yanking Meredith from her musing.

"I'll be with you in a second, Dr. Summers," Richard replied while the resident caught her breath. Richard's marker squeaked on the whiteboard as he made an entry for OR 9.

Meredith's gaze made a reflexive skip to the listing for OR 7, though, where she saw SHEPHERD already penned in for 9 a.m. No intern slot was offered. She'd thought about offering to take the resident slot, but … she hadn't been able to decide if having her there would bolster him or make him freak out more easily, and she didn't want to add to the pressure, either real or imagined.

\textit{He would be fine, she told herself. Just fine. He's done this hundreds of times.}

Yeah, her id chimed in. Hundreds. Just … not in the past two years.

"Dr. Webber," Meredith said, trying to shut up her inner babble.

"Dr. Grey," Richard replied, glancing away from the board to nod at her and smile.

"I guess I missed the handoff," Meredith said, unable to stop fidgeting as nervous energy sought ways to escape. Derek hadn't said when he was going to make the announcement about him quitting as chief, just that it would happen today, sometime. Before the surgery made sense, though. That had to be a weight off.

Richard shrugged. "You didn't miss much."

"Yeah," the resident piped in with a snort. Dr. Summers. She was young. Enough to be fresh out of med school. "It was essentially, 'Hi. Here's your new boss. Thanks for sticking with me — it's been a pleasure. Bye.'” She chuckled. "His desire to flee was palpable."

Meredith frowned. "Like … he was nervous?"

Dr. Summers shook her head. "Oh, no, no, nothing like that. He had that thousand watt smile of his going full blast. It's just pretty obvious his passion isn't in administration."

Tension flowed out of her, and Meredith slumped. She bit her lip. Okay, so … not visibly power freaking. That was good, right? That was good?

Of course, it was good.

Yeah right, her id said.

Crap.

---

The gallery was full of spectators, and the only reason Meredith found a seat was because Cristina had saved her one dead center in the front row. Meredith pushed past a crowded row of knees and legs and other obstructions to get to the center. Cristina sat crosslegged, a book cradled between her knee and her opposite thigh. It was a big, fat volume. Meredith couldn't identify the title from here, but on the left page there was a huge-color diagram of a bisected heart.

"Prepping?" Meredith said.

Cristina nodded, but didn't look up, as she dragged an orange highlighter across a line of text. Meredith peered over Cristina's shoulder, but before she could read a word, Cristina sighed, shut her textbook, and said, "You're not here to watch me. You're here to watch him."

"I know, but—"

"He'll be fine," Cristina said.

Meredith snorted. "That's why you're here? To spectate when he's 'fine'?"

"Yes," Cristina said. And then she sighed. "I said he grows on you."

"Like idiot mold. I remember."

Meredith dared a peek down into the OR. Derek wasn't there, yet, but the nurses were prepping the area. Orderlies wheeled in the patient on a gurney — a middle-aged woman named Shameeka Jones. They lined up the gurney with the table and helped the woman shift between the two.

"He's going to faint," someone whispered. "Is he a fainter?"

"No," someone else interjected. "He'll panic. He panics."

"Ten bucks says he doesn't make it past the first—"

"Fifty says he pulls the whole thing off," Meredith snapped, turning around to see who'd spoken. Three interns she didn't recognize. They recognized her, though. Right. Away.

"Dr. Grey," said the little one on the left, cowering. He had wispy brown hair and a beak nose that reminded her of a toucan. He looked like he was barely a day out of college. "We're sorry."

"Yeah, it was all in good fun," said the one on the right. "We didn't mean anything by it."

"Oh, here he comes," said a fourth spectator, before Meredith could conjure up some sort of coherent, scolding reply.

She watched as Derek entered the OR. He wore his navy blue scrubs, and his lucky ferryboat scrub cap. His eyes crinkled as he smiled behind his surgical mask at the nurses, and then he talked while everybody set up. He didn't look nervous at all.

He glanced up at the gallery, eyes twinkling, and Meredith smiled back at him and waved.

I love you, he said but didn't say.

And Meredith did her best to beam the same sentiment back to him. His first solo surgery since the shooting. Just resecting a tumor. But to Ms. Jones, that meant the world.

You can do this, Meredith wanted to scream.

And Derek winked like he'd heard her.

"All right, folks," he said as he turned to face the operating table. "It's a beautiful day to save lives. Let's have some fun."

He picked up his scalpel and went to work, smiling the whole way through.

~finis~

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!