I suppose what I consider notable in my crewmate’s wardrobe, and what I dwell on, isn’t necessarily what they themselves consider notable- or even what they choose to wear. I also don’t tend to notice small details like hair color- especially considering what with the advances of modern chemistry, how someone chooses to wear their hair is increasingly a matter of personal choice. I assume the reason Fernanda’s hair was black was because it was safer for her to appear in a very public job with black hair; but a few days of easy access to hot running water and conditioner has stripped the black dye from her hair, leaving a blonde fall not unlike Sanji’s in color- almost identical, really.

“Hey, Raspberry- ready to go?”

“Sure Honeybee- um, it’s right near the shore where we’re going, and they keep it very cold for the sake of the fish...”

“Should I wear a shawl, then?”

“I’d recommend it, yeah.”

“Hm- and the girls?”

“Uh- they’re gonna need something more, yeah. Deb, I suggest you wear whatever you feel comfortable with; I’d give you my old coat, but Beatrix already grabbed it, and Luffy’s old one got eaten by ants...”

“Um- I can wear whatever Chef, it’s no big deal. -Oh, thanks Mab. Um... d’you have a pin so it stays on?”

“Sure- I’ve got fancy ones if you like, or you can just use a couple of safety pins?”

“Safety pins, please.”

“Here you are, darling- Bea, d’you want a scarf? Sanji’s old coat isn’t really fitted for you yet-”

“Uh- yeah, please. Oh wow! U-um, thank you for the pin, I like it.”

“You’re quite welcome; and Fernanda, are you coming with us?”

“Mm!”
“Have a jumper, then.”

“Thank you! -can I have a pin too? I want to feel included...”

“You can have a hair-pin, this sweater’s main appeal is it’s stitchwork...”

“Alright.”

And then, we’re off!

Fish markets have existed for as long as people have had the concept of money and fishermen (or women) have been catching more than they can eat or store. They often serve as public spaces where large numbers of people can gather and discuss current events and local politics, sometimes without being suspicious about it.

Since refrigeration and rapid transport have become more widely available in our modern era, fish markets can technically speaking be established at any place. However, because modern trade logistics in general are shifted away from marketplaces and towards retail, such as bodegas and specialized storefronts, most seafood is actually sold through restaurant trade or at the grocers, like most other foods.

Most major fish markets mainly deal- and dealt- with wholesale trade, and the one we’re going to, Tsukiji, is also a major tourist attraction... after nine am. Before nine am, it’s a regular fish market-hello, Deborah’s saying something.

“-Naw, Chef, the tuna auction is a really nasty tourist trap these days. I guess a lot of travel guides wrote about it? But, the demand to get in is really high, there’s a limited entry, and a hard time limit for how long they can auction- it’s better to buy in parcel for steak or catch’em yourself if you’re doin’ sushi. It wasn’t like this about two years ago, but a lot of things have changed- and honestly, it’ll probably get worse before it gets better.”

“Aa. Well, we’re not here for tuna anyway- we’re here for ikura.”

“Oh! Um... hm. I dunno, Chef- I mostly got sent here for big meat items and large amounts of shrimp... Beatrix, Fernanda, d’either of you...?”

“Uh- if it was white fish, seaweeds, sea urchin, or molluscs, sure. Otherwise... Fern?”

“Hm... I really only came here for breakfast, guys. I mean, I’ve had everything they’ve had on sale at least once; but where’s best to get ikura at this time of year... Oh! I know- this way!”

“.Uh, Fern? That’s the way to the, uh, the place where the fishermen who work for the market hang out before they go home or back to work-”

“I know, B! That’s where we’re going!”

Uh- huh. A dive bar isn’t exactly my first choice for pit-stops, but who knows who Fernanda knows…

As for where we’re going, exactly... the scent of the sea gets thicker and thicker, adding in a sharp twang of rotting meat and underlying notes of spilt alcohol. We walk through towering pillars and along narrow causeways between pallets of neatly stacked product - fish, crustaceans, seaweed in bales taller than Whitebeard sitting down…

And then, finally, we come to a shit-cheap dive bar, a place that shows up wherever enough working class people take a rest and some entrepreneurial spirit takes a risk. It’s a hollowed out tree, basically, with three nice shelves of cheap-to-middle range booze kept in clean order, and Daiso ‘sticky-back’ wall mirrors behind the bottles. Hunks of wood that have been sealed with wax are scattered haphazardly around the barrier, on which congregate a number of - oh, fishermen. Fishmen, Fishwomen, Merfolk, Lanfolk with ambition- all of them wearing the telltale color of the fisherman, a bright yellow… aha.

This place reminds me of Tiffany Harbour, which is where Mother had her Townhouse. Walking the streets of downtown Tiffany Harbour really made me see the sordid darkness beneath the clean, hardworking facade of that city. It might have been painted in carnival colors, but in truth... the colors that stayed were black, and white, and grime, and red. It was worn into the faces of the people; grime smeared into lines of stress and time and age and pain, stark-linking the people who were trying to become something better and the people who had given up… this place, too, stinks of hope and desperation. I can feel it starting to cling to us, that ragged whirling prayer- it sinks in under my thoughts like Sanji’s cigarette smoke into my skin during our after-breakfast mack-on. At night, this must be one of the most lonely places in the world; the neon signs proclaiming their sales-lies to the open air only shine on fallen fish-scales and broken dreams.

The hustle and bustle of this fishmarket only masks the cruelty of this life; and, somehow, Fernanda knows this place well enough to not only find it’s main watering hole in the wall, but be welcomed with joy and condolences by the patronage.

“Ey- you slobs, you wretches- it’s Li’l Albatross, come back again!”

“Heeheeehee; hey there, Benkei...”

“Bah, c’mere kiddo- I heard about your mama. You doin’ alright?”

“Eeh. I have good and bad moments, and it really hurts, but- it wasn’t a surprise, or anything.”

“Yeah, that’s about right- it’ll even out, and it’ll hurt less often, but it won’t really stop hurting.”

“I know, Benny. I know. -Saa, are the Brass still goin’ on about freshness or-?”

“Those sanctimonious pieces of shit! They just know how to sell the fish, not how to eat it- the only fuckin’ way my guys could get their fish in fresher is if they pulled them in live and floppin’ and that shit won’t fly with the tuna. Those pieces of dog-shit think that, what, freshness means it’s still bleeding when you eat it? No! Still wriggling octopus and squirming shrimp are nothing but novelties! Fresh is not just determined by when a fish came out of the water, godsdammit!”

“Yessir.”

“Those cocksucking bastards- they act like wild or farmed or pastoral doesn’t matter, and then the location doesn’t matter, how it’s killed doesn’t matter, the handling, storage, shipping-GRAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAGH! It’s enough to drive a man to drink, godsdammit.”
“Well; and it’s not like I can use the fish safely when it’s all-but raw. I have to freeze it first to kill off worms and parasites—” growls Sanji, in total agreement with the livid Benkei.

“-GODSDAMN RIGHT! Fucking swordfish worms! Holy fuck, never a-fucking-gain,” yowls Deborah.

“EXACTLY! And most importantly of all, just-been killed fresh is not ideal for all the really good shit! Bonito, tuna, turbot… if I want to highlight a texture from a fresh fish, the fresher the better; but flavor… if you want to know what you’re actually eating, waiting a goddamn day is the thing to fuckin’ do.”

The fish-connoisseurs of our party snarl and commiserate about the indignity of bowing to people with their heads up their asses and screaming into the wind. I fold myself down onto a bench-log, and let Beatrix lean into me. Eventually, I’m joined by Fernanda, who cuddles up to my other side; and then Deborah, who climbs into my lap—? Which is a little odd, but also… I’m really pleased and honored that she feels safe enough with me to do that, and doubly pleased that she feels safe enough here to do that.

Sanji, of course, has never met a fishmonger he won’t natter the hours away with; thus, I tuck my wings and my shawl around the four of us, tuck Deb’s head under my chin, and rest my eyes. He’ll let me know when it’s time for us to mosey on.

I feel very awake; not tired at all, which is strange because I’ve not eaten anything yet today… Hm, maybe the air here agrees with me?

---

I don’t know what exactly prompts me to look over. I guess making a new friend in Benkei, the Leader of the Fishermen’s Union, was distracting… but when the conversation lulled, I glanced over to Mab and the girls.

It’s funny- a year ago, the thought of having babies with Mab made cold chills run down my spine. Now, when I think about having babies with Mab… even just seeing her sitting there, curling around the girls so they can warm up and sleep safely… it brings the stupidest smile to my face, and I can’t bring myself to care who sees it.

“Oh. So that’s how it is.”

“Pardon?”

“Nothing of importance; anyway, what’re you an’ yours after, Chef?”

“Ikura; age doesn’t matter overmuch, but quantity does. We’re pickling them.”

“Aha. In that case… Ferg! C’mere!”

“Yassir?”

“You still have that bumper crop of ikura you can’t find a buyer for?”
“Yassir; don’t nobody want the winter-run ikura, which is a damn shame, they’re real nice this year...”

Mab actually gave me the budget; said I’d know the right price for fish, and that she trusted me with her money. We’re using her money because Nami would not let us buy fish, especially since she can’t stomach eating any large quantities of it; she barely let us buy new cereal, after Deborah’s astounding Food Luck revealed itself.

I buy up as much of Ferg the Fisherman’s Ikura stock as I can, which brings a grin of relief to his face. He gives me a ticket to a particular flat of crates, a receipt; I gave him the price we agreed on, and we shook hands on it.

I look back over at Mab.

It’s funny- she’ll say she’s not changed at all, not really. I say the person she is now, and the person she was two years ago only share a name. I’ve watched her, and learned about her; dreamed about her… I’ve memorized the exact cadence of her laugh, her real laugh- the one that comes from deep within her gut, that rings through the air like a clear, sweet bell- it’s so rare… and her full, genuine smile… each of those are so rare, even one is a treasure worth savoring.

I’m starting to become a kind of expert on Mab. I know how she thinks; more often than not, now, I know what she things. Sometimes, I’m wrong- but most of the time, I’m right. She’s not smiling any more than usual. She’s not laughing more, or harder- but…

So much of her emotional life is lived on a subconscious level- she trusts herself, and she trusts her heart, and she almost never dwells on either. So- I’ll catch her, out of the corner of my eye, when she’s noticed my attention on her isn’t asking for hers in return; a look in her eye. Guilt, then confusion, then joy- as if she’s sorting through… well, there are a few things I can think of.

Even though she doesn’t smile all that often, there’s a cute, curving satisfaction in her eyes, even on days when she’s down.

It’s happiness without a smile, because a smile isn’t necessary to be happy. Here and now, I see that expression again; pure, unwavering joy, with no smile needed for that joy to be seen- to be felt. I tug on Mab, just a little, and she opens her eyes.

She looks at me.

She smiles.

I, helplessly, smile back.

She tells the girls it’s time to go; they get up; we go. I carry the whole frozen salmon in their cold wooden crates back to the ship, set them out to thaw somewhere Luffy won’t get at them immediately.

Tomorrow, Imbolc begins. Second of February; all is well.
The strongest prophecy of the day always hits right after I finish flossing. I almost never know what they mean; and I almost never remember them later.

“When Icarus fell, burning wings and all; He Arose; Wishing for the world to burn with him. A simple death would not suffice. -Need help with your hair, Deb?”

“Mm, yeaaaaaugh! Yes, please; mm, thank you, fern.”

“Mm. mpghm.”

“No, Beatrix, if you try to go back to bed, you’ll just wake up groggy and be angry and confused for the rest of the day. It might be a few hours until proper Morning, but- just fight through it, okay?”

“eeehk.”

“No one likes being up this early; you just have to get used to it. I’m pretty sure there’s hot water for tea and coffee now, though, so- and wash your face, that always wakes you up.”

“Bleagh.”

“That’s the spirit! -All done, Deb. Good Morning~!”

“good morning, Fern...”

“Mrngpffle.”

So… over these past two or three weeks, I’ve figured out the actual Sleep Index of our crew. It goes like this, if you like.

Twelve or more hours: Hell fucking yes. Decadence has a name, and that name is ME ME ME I go to bed at Eight and I wake up at Eight. This has been my dream for years. When I was a little girl, I dreamt of marrying my bed and inviting all my siblings to the wedding. I’m starting to feel groggy and angry for the rest of the day when I actually do get up, though; I thought it would be Totally Worth It when I had to get up at five every day to get my park spot. Now that I hardly have to do anything, though… I’m kinda Done with the whole deal. Alternatively, if I slept twelve or more hours like Genny did after mom’s funeral… knowing what I know now, I’d have been deeply depressed and approximately three centimeters from sudden death at any given moment.

Eleven to ten hours: Ideal. I’m functioning at a perfected hundred percentum capacity; my body and mind are a well oiled machine. I’m ready to knock out all my errands, training, and chores in under an hour; work a full day; and then study that complicated magic I’m trying to learn. Genny usually has this schedule, but she took Mom’s death really hard. She worked so hard to keep Mom from feeling too much pain… Tcha, nothin’ doin’. Oh, Doctor Chopper, and Adelaide.
Nine hours: Good! I could have slept longer, but getting up was no great horrifying trauma either. Mostly Sancho has this schedule, even though he doesn’t really have a particular time he’s going to get up or go to sleep… Bryony says she sleeps like that during the summer, but Bryony gets her actually restless sleep during her naps.

Oh, incidentally- the optimum nap times, and what they’re good for, are as follows: a quick boost of alertness is best fostered with a ten to twenty minute power nap. It’ll let you go back to work in a pinch after a long, bad night. For cognitive memory processing, a sixty minute nap does more good. This is where slow-wave sleep happens, and it helps with remembering facts, places, and faces. However, you’ll be a bit groggy on waking.

Finally, the 90-minute nap will allow for a full cycle of sleep, which aids in creativity, emotional and procedural memory, and feeling like a human being. If you have the time, I highly recommend it.

The best nap positioning is as follows: sit or lay slightly upright, to avoid a deep sleep. An eye cover of some kind will help quiet your mind; some manner of sound dampening, even just a quiet room, also helps quiet your mind. If you find yourself dreaming during your nap, it’s a sign you’re sleep deprived.

Eight to seven hours: The “medically recommended amount” for adults, but in reality more like a “fine, if I have to, I guess” amount of sleep. Normal to mild levels of angst at having to get out of bed; hot-to-cold shower to start the day is HIGHLY recommended. Nami, Usopp, Sanji, Mab, Mark, Robin, Franky, Gurry, Zoro, Bea, Cece, and Deb all sleep like this. Zoro, Bea, Cece, and Deb all take naps, in addition- although Zoro’s naps even his sleeping out, rather than supplement it.

Six hours: Silent unceasing internal groaning for at least the first hour after waking. Don’t expect any coherency or quality in conversation for the first two or more hours. I’ve got a less than Medically Recommended Amount of the Sleep, that means I’m a martyr, Right??????? Oddly enough, no one on our crew actually sleeps this much-little.

Five hours: Fairly unpleasant. It feels Gross and Icky. Expect a moderate to severe crash during the late afternoon, depending on how good you are at napping. This is the first number that is considered worthy of entry in a sleep-dep contest on any college or work campus; although, if you try to enter with five measly hours, dead-eyed hordes of the grumpy and Tired will instantly materialize from the cold bright bushes and one up you with “Five hours?? HAHA SWEET SUMMER CHILD I HAVEN’T SLEPT IN THREE YEARS.” Captain and Brook sleep like this; Captain, because I think he thinks he’ll miss something if he sleeps more, and Brook because he can’t bear to be alone with his dreams for longer. Oh, and no one on our crew sleeps for less than five hours, so the following are just examples with no, uh, examples.

Four hours: A Very Poor Decision was Made, and you have to Live With It. You might think you’re going to die; you might want to die; you will not. Deep seated, incoherent rage upon waking will persist up to several hours afterwards; only slight reduction with application of ninety minute naps. Consume as much of your stimulant of choice that won’t result in organ failure; you’ll feel like a cave troll and have a temper to match. Expect a constant, cloying aftertaste of chemicals and regret.

Three hours: Half awake; half walking in an astral plane haunted by the wails of the newly-dead and profligate gamblers getting caught by their own mistakes. Children, animals, and the innocent of heart fear the emptiness in your vacant eyes. This is the kind of person that asks for the largest takeaway cup at the coffee house and makes the barista fill it with their strongest espresso and a packet of chemical stimulants that they are only allowed to serve one of to the customer, by law. They don’t care how long it takes; all the baristas are horrified at their presence. Although it’s a very respectable entry to any sleep-dep contest, you’ll still get beaten by the “two hour” and “all nighter” people. Everyone knows this is Bad, though.

Two hours: You can get up. You can, but only by rending your feeble soul from your physical body in a paroxysm of spiritual agony, since it will refuse to leave the bed. You can still feel pain; but you assign little to no meaning to it. You are now soulless and will feel absolutely Zero (0) emotions until sometime in the late afternoon or early evening. It is at this point that your soul returns to your body and ALL THE EMOTIONS HIT AT ONCE, leaving you alternately sobbing or laughing in terrible, self-sustaining hysteria.

One hour: Tes con. You imbecile, your hubris and fear and weakness has brought you to this point. They are coming. You cannot escape. Why didn’t you just go to bed? Why didn’t you just stay awake? The strength of your no-sleep headache threatens to stab through your skull like an ice pick. Your eyes feel like damp fruit snacks that you left in your pocket on the hottest summer’s day. All you can taste is blood. They are co-

Zero hours: THIS IS ACTUALLY FINE, THIS ISN’T BAD AT ALL, AHAHA. I’M NOT EVEN THAT TIRED! WATCH ME DRINK HALF MY WEIGHT IN COFFEE AND DEVOUR EVERY COOKIE AND SWEET IN THE HOUSE. I CAN FEEL MY HEART BEATING IN MY EARS AND FINGERTIPS ISN’T THAT WEIRD, GUYS, AHAHA. WHAT DO YOU MEAN MY EYES ARE BLOOD SHOOT AND I CAN’T FOCUS, I’M COMPLETELY NORMAL RIGHT NOW AHAHA. I CAN HEAR COLORS AND SEE SOUNDS. AHAHAHAHAHA.

So anyway, breakfast is Okayu with thin slices of shallot, pickled ikura, dried sardines, adzuki and natto beans, black sesame seeds… it’s a beautiful meal, and delicious, and it’s really seasonal too! Umeboshi, salmon sashimi, fruits and vegetables, tea and coffee.

We spend the morning cleaning- sweeping out every room, rearranging furniture so we have…

The dorms in the Thousand Sunny are actually exactly reversed of each other. Captain, Zoro, Nami, Usopp, Sanji, Mab, Chopper, Robin, Mark, Taffy, Bryony, Franky, Brook, Gurry; Adelaide, Beatrix, Cecelia, Deborah, Eleanor, Fernanda, Genevieve, Sancho. Two dorms; two small cabins; one large Captain’s cabin. However, we don’t each have individual bunks- technically speaking, we don’t each need individual bunks. Captain, Usopp, and Mark all share the Captain’s cabin; Zoro and Nami share a cabin; Sanji and Mab share a cabin. That’s seven.

In the men’s dorm, there’s Chopper, Franky, Brook, Gurry, and Sancho. Five.

In the women’s dorm, there’s Robin, Taffy, Bryony, A, B, C, D, E, F, and G. Ten.

Twenty-two on the crew; and that’s not even counting all the animals. We have three dogs; we have a flock of doves with their own dove cote, a flock of quail with their own run, angora possums, beehives, milking goats, a pig… and extensive gardens! It’s really like… like a farm, on a ship.

We’ve actually been cleaning and ordering everything for days preceding this one; Imbolc started yesterday, at sunset. Mab did a bunch of magic over us, and spoke a prayer, I think, and now we’re done cleaning everything and we’re going to the sento.

We’ve been cleaning so much… honestly, it only took about a half-hour to get everything clean and swept to Mab’s satisfaction.

Mab says that Imbolc is all about noticing that the days are finally getting longer again; that this is the time of year when it really becomes clear that winter is over.

Mab gave me Lady Shyarly’s dank-ass orbuculum, and said that as I was the only proper Seer on the crew, it was my responsibility. I’m… ambivalent that I’m really the best person to clean an orbuculum. That said, I’ve been spending the past two weeks taking up a new… passion? Hobby?

Woodworking.

After Mom’s funeral, I had to throw out all my old hair sticks… Let’s start at the start, I’m doing it out of order. There’s a deep and elemental satisfaction that comes from using your mind and your hands to solve a problem or make something, build something, and woodworking fits the bill for that perfectly. Building anything- a drainage ditch, a birdfeeder, a cat scratching post- is a passion that anyone can have, and anyone can be proud to have. I just couldn’t make a living at it, so I was a fortuneteller for mostly tourists, with a few local repeat customers- shopkeepers with gambling habits near the park, fishermen who wanted to know what to hunt for a season in advance at the market… pirates just passing through.

But… it’s not really satisfying, being a fortuneteller. There’s no way for me to know if my fortunes helped or not- I just say shit, and people take it as gospel or ignore it as they see fit. But woodworking? At the end, if you do it right- or wrong- you’ve got something real you can hold in your hands.

These are the few things I know for a fact about woodworking. All you need to get started is a ‘thing you want’, a plan to make that thing, materials, and tools. The thing you want could be as simple as a spoon or a hairstick, or as complicated as a canoe or a ship-to-shore box. Materials just need to be wood- preferably, wood that won’t kill you to work with, like rosewood- and you can get wood from demolished buildings, from old barns that are being torn down, from pallets and crates at the fishmarket… anywhere will do. Chunks of tree from the park where the storm knocked it down. As for tools? A chisel is just a knife; and any knife that’s nice in your hand and keeps it’s edge will do just fine. You’ll fuck up, and have to start over, many times- but it’s only wood, and your time.

It’s not something you’ll be good at overnight; but you can get good enough to be going on. When I started, I just needed to add a sort of… notch? To some disposable chopsticks, so I could pin my hair up. Then, as time went on, I got better and better at carving; to the point where… well, it doesn’t matter. What matters is, my old hairsticks are saturated in energy that’s… it’s too painful for me to keep, anymore. I can hardly bear to touch them, much less use them, and when Mab saw what I’d added to the ‘burn’ pile for Imbolc, she looked… understanding.

I’m not perfect, and I never will be- no one is, no one can be. No matter what I do, the only thing that will happen is I improve and become more efficient at a certain skill. I’ll screw up- I’ll have to start over. But… I can always start over. What I didn’t know about disposable chopsticks is that they’re made of a fairly soft wood, a type of bamboo. For anyone else, that’d have been fine- but I’m a very powerful Seer. There’s a reason orbuculums are made out of very hard stone; it’s so the energies we channel when we See don’t soak into the orb. Magical contamination is no joke.

There is no tool that will magically make you a master of whatever you’re trying to do. Practice and patience make you a master of whatever you do- and of course, by the time you get to that point, you realize what more you have to learn. The only thing a tool can do is make your job easier- and that’s only if you know what you’re doing with it. Would an electric saw, a router, a lathe, make my life easier? Sure. Do I know how to use them? No. Do I know how to use their hand-equivalents? Yeah.

The size of your workspace doesn’t define you, or what you can do. I was a very successful fortuneteller, and my office was a desk I built out of some milk crates and a park bench under an awning. The only thing a large workspace is really good for is storage; if you need to make something, you’ll find a way to make it, even if all you have is your kitchen table and a cup of dice.

Never, ever underestimate the importance of safety. I’m burning my old hair sticks because keeping Seer-tainted objects around is hazardous to my sanity. No amount of nostalgia, time, and effort, is truly worth my health. I have no excuse; I should have done this years ago. I’m lucky I didn’t get a Headache, honestly...

Finally, what I know for sure about woodworking- and fortunetelling, come to that- is that there’s always a way to do what you want to do. If you asked ten woodworkers how to do something, or ten fortunetellers how to do something, you’d get twenty different answers; and all of them are right. What matters is finding the methods of getting it done that work for you the best. I’m not good at arithmetic, and that’s okay. I don’t have to do simple arithmetic in my head; I can use scratch paper and a calculator. Honestly, my customers found it endearing whenever I flipped to a brand new page for them, and started working out their numbers with my abacus and scratch paper… one woman said to me that it reminded her of her Aunt, who used to calculate the exact best days to make hay in just the same way, except with the addition of a calendar. There’s a reason tools improve, glues get better, fasteners get stronger, and new methods of doing the same thing are introduced. A lot of the time the focus in woodworking and fortunetelling is on finding shortcuts to get the same, or even better results. You can throw runes for a fortune; you can also roll dice, to the same end. Don’t let traditionalist snobbery influence you unduly.

Let’s be real here- the only formal training I’ve ever gotten as it relates to woodworking or fortunetelling is a semester of Mystical Health and Safety at the community college when I was ten, and being taught how to whittle by Benkei on slow winter afternoons. I only paid enough attention in MHS to not get Curses, and to plan out the cheapest way to do fortunetelling as a job.

How does a fortuneteller go from an abacus to a chisel? I think it honestly started with having to sit out in all weather, with my hair steadily getting longer, hotter, itchier- I finally couldn’t take it. For a while I used hair ties and combs, and while they worked fine, it didn’t quite fit with the image I was trying to go for- bargain brand fortunetellers can use Daiso hair things, but… I needed a more rustic touch. I never woke up one morning and thought to myself ‘wouldn’t it be great to be a woodworker’, it was a gradual progression of “I need this thing; I have these things; I will make this thing I need” and “this thing is broken; I will fix it”.

The very beginning was my aforementioned hair sticks; business didn’t pick up, per say, after I started wearing them, but tourists were willing to accept my existence with a lot less giggling and smirks at “oh how cute” I was with all my Daiso hair things. I still have all my Daiso shit, come to think of it…

Anyway, my next few woodworking projects were all geared around fixing up things that had gotten worn down in our apartment. I couldn’t go out and work when it was too stormy, after all; so, I did a few things around the apartment that helped keep everyone’s spirits up. Living in a place where things are broken… I dunno, it wears out your heart, it blinds your eyes. I think it was the success and satisfaction of these simple projects that really sowed the seeds of “I can actually make something, do something, if I think about it and give it a fair go.”

The first thing I fixed was just replacing some rotted shelves in the kitchen cabinets, the ones near the sink. They hadn’t been sealed properly; really, the only woodworking there was cutting some boards to length and width with a saw, a hand plane, and sandpaper, and then finishing it so water wouldn’t get in. Dunk in varnish; boat wax; cure time; cabinet papers to preserve the finish. It was a genuinely simple project that built a lot of confidence in me; and it made cleaning the kitchen, having enough food storage, and so on, a genuine possibility.

The second thing I made was a Biltong dryer for my sister, Deb. I might actually repeat this project in Sanji’s smokehouse; Deb really likes drying meat, seaweed, and sausage in that careful way. It wasn’t fine joinery or anything, but it was a bit more involved than whittling hairsticks or cutting boards to size.

The third project was actually doing some genuine repair work—cosmetic damage from a termite colony on our patio door. The termites had found that the architrave and framing were nicer to eat, and ignored the studs, top plate, and lintel, so there was no structural issues to worry about—thank the gods. This project required a bit more carpentry than previous jobs, and I think I did a pretty good job. The landlady didn’t take us to task for it, after all—even though I had to completely remove the sliding door and all the half eaten timber, replace the framing and architrave, and then stain to match the rest of the architrave and door frames through my house. Mitring is annoying; and staining is also annoying.

By now, I had Seen that Mom was going to get a Terrible Fate, and so I decided to tear the carpet out of our apartment and replace it with floating floor. I knew from watching women down in the courtyard beat the dirt out of their carpets that wall to wall carpeting hid a multitude of sins; and I had Seen that Mom would have a chest-related death, and… I just. Wanted to make things less painful for her. This was fairly significant in my path to becoming a woodworker; I replaced all the carpet in the apartment, and tiled a hearth around the fireplace. The flooring and tiling were the first time I went to the local tradeschool for day classes—simple little things for people who were, like me, just doing a few home improvements that didn’t really need a full on education… or they were already in the trades and needed to learn a new skill, or just a refresher. The tile came out nice, especially when I still don’t quite understand how I got it all so cheaply; and the floors, once I finished sealing and waxing them, were a very pale color that really brightened up the carpets and rugs, and made the whole apartment brighter. I will say that I didn’t find the whole project as straightforward as the classes I’d taken had made it seem, but then all real projects are like that.

By this stage, I’d done all the repairs and renovations our apartment needed, and the satisfaction of the job well done… well, it’s about this time I decided to make my own portable table and chair, so I could attract better customers. The seed was sown.

However, before that, my sister Beatrix said that she’d seen “a home-blackboard in a magazine, and wouldn’t that be useful for all of us with our different schedules?” which is as good as being handed a signed work order, especially considering B came up with most of the money for actually doing the job. Not complicated joinery, but I’d acquired a real chisel by then and was able to use some more specialized hand-planes and a router at the trade school to round over the edges and make it all very nice to the hand.

Then I made my table; and then I worked for the next five years so our mother didn’t have to while she was sick and dying.

I think I’m taking up woodworking again because… part of it is, I’m tired of using my Sight as a method of making money when I could just… not. Part of it is, there’s a real, deep satisfaction I get from woodworking that I don’t get other ways; being able to do for myself without having to buy it built or get someone else to do it for me. It’s not about saving money in the short term- but… long term, yes.

There’s also the fact that now that I know how much the materials cost, the quality of what I get is… not good enough. I might not be able to make a three in one in time for Nami myself- but I can design a high-chair, rocking horse, and changing table-ette, and ask Franky to teach me to make one like it! Or make it for Nami, and teach me how to make one like it too… I want a new fortunetelling table, one that’s built to last! I want a box for my tarot cards, and a tray to roll my dice in, and… and a holder for my new orbuculum when I use it!

I just… Sometimes, things that are expensive are worse.

But for right now, I just need new hairsticks; I’m going to bless them on Beltane, so I started them just after Mom’s funeral.

It started with me going into the Shop for the first time, maybe the day after Mom’s funeral. Usopp’s side of the Shop is really more Genny’s bag; I was immediately struck by the… the superness of Franky’s side. More than anything, I wanted my own space in there- not a big space, but my space.

I’m honestly not sure why Franky did it- but when I asked him about it…

“Uh- Franky, can I have a space in the shop?”

“For what, kiddo?”

“I wanna make stuff too!”

“Hah. Bring me a bubble for a spirit level, fresh elbow grease, and a Left-handed Monkey Wrench, and we’ll talk.”

“...Okay.”

Contrary to popular belief, being a fortuneteller does not make one an airhead. Quite the opposite, really.

I go to the Sanitary, first.

“Hey, Nurse G, can I have an alkaseltzer tablet?”

“Uh- do you have heartburn, or-?”

“No, no, I- I need to get a bubble for a spirit level, and-”

“Oh. Uh- Oh! Oh, sure- here, an individual packet.”

“Thank you!”
A stop in the kitchen, next; I’ll be able to get everything else I need there.

“Hey Deb, got a few minutes?”

“Mais c’est chiant ca- two minutes, then I can talk!”

“Okay.”

I wait twenty minutes.

“Wassup, Fern?”

“I need a jar of cooking lard, like a sample size jar?”

“Uh- we’ve got a bunch of forty-five mils for when Chef comes up with a new honey-plus-something variation or has just a little bit of jam left over to jar… d’you want it labelled?”

“Yeah- label it ‘Elbow’, if you please.”

“...Prop comedy?”

“Some people don’t get the joke unless you really hammer it in.”

“Heh. Sure. Anything else?”

“A Left-Handed Monkey Wrench.”

“...Why do you need one an’a half ounces of light rum, three ounces of cranberry juice, and a dash of bitters?”

“Prop comedy.”

“...If you say so. Any particular serving instructions I should know?”

“It’s normally served in a pre-chilled glass as cold as Genny’s angriest stare, but if you don’t have time, on the rocks is fine.”

“No, I can mix a proper drink.”

“Merveilleux! -Oh, and I need a glass of water, and a way to take them all down to the Shop safely.”

“Hmmph. I’ll see if there’s a tray you can use.”

There was, indeed, a tray; and, for all her grumping, Deborah really loves nothing more than giving people what they ask her for, especially when it comes to food.
I took the tray back to Franky, and when I got to his work desk, I carefully unloaded it onto a flat surface and coughed to get his attention. He looked at me with a raised eyebrow, and I stared back blandly. Neither of us spoke.

Finally, he caved and asked me about what I’d brought him.

“Well, Chief, they only sell dehydrated spirit-level bubbles in multipacks, so I got that; and the elbow grease is clearly labelled, and I have it on good authority it’s fresh as of this morning; and I dunno why you wanted a mixed drink before noon, Chief, but we all go through some things sometimes.”

Franky looked over all the things I’d brought him, and then he eyed me up and down, and then he said, “You can’t wear your hair like that while you’re in the shop. Isn’t safe; and you’ll need to wear close fitting clothing, so you don’t get caught in anything. Closed toed shoes, every time; and always clean up your area when you’re done for the day.”

“My area, chief?”

“Over there, kiddo. You didn’t think I was just sitting around while you were gone, did you?”

“Wha- Oh! This is really nice!”

I grinned on seeing the makerspace Franky made for me, and then I ran off; came back in over-alls, a tshirt, and hair done up in a bun and a bunch of Daiso shit. Sneakers are close-toed, right?

I had the space; I had the drive. Once I asked about the scraps in the scrap shelves, I even had materials.

In all honesty, even though I had to make new hairsticks, what I wanted to make was a new broom handle for Genevieve. I designed it instead, while I worked the cramps out of my planin’ hand. I used to be really close to Genevieve; we’re the two youngest by a margin of five whole minutes, after all. Five minutes counts a lot when you’re one in a set of seven.

Anyway, I know enough about magic that I can’t… I can’t make Genny a whole broom. Chances are, I can’t even make her a broom haft. I’m… I’m not really sure why I’m doing what I’m doing. But… just because I can’t fly like my sister doesn’t mean I can’t fly at all.

There’s a strange statuette my Mom brought from her homeland; she called it a pie vent. Mom never used it to bake, and it creeps Deb out… so I kept it. I like the shape of it; the curve of the head and the chest, the way the mouth opens… even the tiny little eyes- I think they’re cute, really.

Shaving down the form of the pie vent onto paper into a collection of evocative lines is… not the most fun, but also not the least. Mostly, it’s wrapping my mind’s eye around a pole that doesn’t yet exist that gives me my first few conniptions. Then, I start considering… well, I need a wand. Genny’s use of a bat-shape is… really really inspired. Mimicry is a sincere form of flattery, and I can design the way I want the bat to swing easily enough- but… I don’t want to make a wand without asking Genny if it’s okay I use the same kind as her. Hm. Maybe a different kind of bat? Hurley sticks are more suited for flying… Cricket? Maybe cricket…
I’ll make hairsticks and mull it over.

Making hair sticks is actually pretty simple.

Start by choosing the wood; it can be aspen, chestnut, pine, cedar, cherry, sandalwood, paulownia, koa, ash, hickory- doesn’t matter, just has to be hard and water resistant. There is no wood that is magic resistant, and I’m not ready for Adam wood.

Then, cut the wood down to approximate width and double length with an axe or hatchet, paying attention to the wood grain. Roughly shape it with a plane, and then slice it in half with your axe or hatchet. You want long, straight grains down the entire length of the stick. Each resulting stock-pair should be slightly larger than a quarter inch thick.

Shape the sticks with a nine-inch plane; set the chamfer on one end of each stick. Finish shaping with a six-inch smoothing plane. It’ll get rid of any rough spots and make the sticks smooth. Round the ends and the tips with the smoothing plane.

The sticks I made came out at around ten inches long, which is fine for some of them; but some of them, I needed shorter. So, cut them to length, honestly, and then slightly chamfer the ends to finish the shaping.

Finish them with hair-safe stain or varnish; beeswax, boiled linseed oil, and so on. Let’em cure for at least a day, and then clean and polish after every use for a long life together. Oh, and consecrate at the holidays to prevent mystic buildup. I’ve been wearing my hair in a long braid, pinned to my head with a bunch of cheap hair combs from Daiso; but today, I’m going to consecrate my hairsticks, and pin my hair up the way I really want to.

The train ride to the Sento is long and kinda boring, if you’re me. The day before yesterday, all the dogs blew their winter coats, so we had to brush them out.

Mab Morgan is a part of the United Textile Worker’s Union, and about a year ago they all went on strike. Mab got herself an entirely deserved reputation for being a sucker who loves animals, so people all across the world would dump their pets and farm animals on her. When we had to rehome most of the piglets Mark got, the majority of them went to her palace- and yeah, that threw us all for a loop, that Mab has an actual palace - but it’s full of her Morgan cousins and all their family and the pets and the grounds are full of animals so like… There’s Pickle, the three-legged housecat, and Chatterbox the Tortoise, and Cushion the pet Pig, and Cushion’s twenty children who wander the orchard out back, Spooky Garbage Mule, Chiquita the Orb Weaver who lives in the Banana Palms.

I say all this for the context of how, exactly, we have a wolf as a ship pet.

Mab, Mark, Bryony, and Taffy all were hanging out with Franky, trying to convince him to go with them and be pirates because if they couldn’t, Captain wouldn’t take no for an answer anymore and my eyes kinda crossed after that but basically they stole the three dogs- Pearblossom, Bubbler, and Buttercream- because they were in a dog-fighting ring and bit a bunch of people. They were scared; it happens.

Dogs that bite aren’t good for family homes; but we live on a pirate ship, and we treat our dogs right, so… it’s kinda perfect? Four tons of angry dog will stop a lot of shit before it starts, seems to be the prevailing wisdom. Anyway, Mark, Taffy, and Bryony had never owned dogs in their life; Mark’s Momma had ‘Pretty Bird’, a parakeet, and his sister, Merry, had finches- but we all know birds are dinosaurs, not pets.

So anyway, Franky’s district of Water 7 is not a great place. Lots of drugs, lots of gangs, prostitution everywhere and terrible civic management. Franky was able to get a lot done- but it’s the work of seven lifetimes to turn that area of the city around, and Franky was just one man. Franky’s also told me that he learned to identify different types of gunfire while he was the yeoman of that district, whatever that means.

Like, not to say the dogs aren’t pretty- they are gorgeous . But, I mean, it became obvious within days that something was Amiss with Buttercream. Buttercream knows how to open doors; the lock on the fridge is for Luffy. The lock, bar, and complicated clamp on the Smokehouse and Dairy? That’s for Buttercream. Apparently, she once got into the Dairy and ate fifteen gallons of cottage cheese in a bit less than half an hour.

Most dogs bark at or chase News Coos. Buttercream stalked, live-captured, and presented one to Nami on the second week of her living with the crew. She then proceeded to lick the poor seagull over it’s entire body, and... well, apparently we’ve got one specific seagull that’s our News Coo, and all others keep a wide berth around our boat.

Buttercream knows all her commands, but clearly stops to consider the merit of the command giver before obeying; and she trained Usopp to hand over tidbits of his food within the second week.

She wanders off from the ship every day, be it at sea or ashore, but she always returns by dinnertime. She also brings tunnies, and other large fish, when she notices the ship is low on supplies.

As the months went on, and the crew gradually realized that Buttercream was in fact smarter than their own Captain, Mab and Chopper gave her a real checkup, which included a blood draw. Doctor Chopper came back from the testing, stared Mab dead in the eyes, and said “Where in the hell did you get an adult female Great White Wolf Shark?”

After a bit of hemming and hawing, and a very-angry Doctor Chopper being Disappointed at his friends, they determined that Buttercream had decided that the Crew was her new family-pack, and the ship was the den, and was probably going to be a lil’shit her entire life.

“Oh,” said Doctor Chopper, “I don’t like destroying animals; she’s not a problem on the crew, and I didn’t find any signs of mental instability when I had a talk with her. We can keep her, but! I want her away from small children because her Preydrive could kick in, and then we will have to kill her. I don’t want things to ever get to that point, understand?”

Two years later, Nami came back pregnant.

Buttercream noticed instantly, and reacted by digging a large hole in the lawn out by the Aquarium, which pissed Franky off but she kept re-digging it until finally he put sod over the dirt pile and washed his hands of it; and she started catching even more fish for Nami, because she needed the protein or something. That’s what you do when the Big-mom Wolf Shark is pregnant, right? Dig a birthing den and ply with food, right? Right? (Mab’s advice for Nami is to deliver somewhere that isn’t the ship, and send back something that has hers and the baby’s scent on it.)

That’s how she introduced us to Buttercream, actually- she made us all do jumping jacks until we started sweating, or just wiped her feverish forehead in Deb’s case, and then the next day we were introduced to Buttercream. Apparently, BC spent the whole night puzzling over the pile of hankies Mab left for her.

The next day, when we all came home, there was the sudden and instantaneous recognition of PUPPIES! PUUUUUUUUUUPIEEEEEEEEEEEEES! And Buttercream has been the most aggressively maternal being I’ve ever met since that doesn’t have thumbs- I’m talking about Mab, if you didn’t notice. She’s playful, sits under our table at mealtime, sleeps under our beds- it rotates each night but she’s especially careful with Genny; she lets us nap on her side and cry into her fur and brings us rocks for her to retrieve when we throw them.

I’m making living with a Great White Wolf Shark sound cool as hell, but it does have a few inevitable drawbacks. Firstly, Great White Wolvarks are native to Skua, not the rest of the World; thus, after a certain level of age and strength is achieved, they gain the ability to talk. Buttercream has a very raspy voice, and is willing to fight Anything, at Any Time. Just like Mab, actually. Buttercream has to be muzzled when it’s time for her shots and bi-yearly checkup, because she has Opinions about having needles stuck in her softmeats, and thermometers up her butt.

HAIR. When all the dogs blew their coats… well, Pearblossom’s came out with a vigorous brush and wash, and Bubbler’s had mostly fallen out in her daily swims so all we had to do was give her a brushing for the trouble spots. Buttercream needed three baths, two separate brushings, and a comb to get most of everything- and some of her fur won’t actually fall out until the sakura blossoms bloom, which isn’t for at least three weeks.

Her favorite way of waking someone up is hitting them in the face with half a dead animal. Luffy enjoys this; no one else does.

She is more than capable of opening the foodstorage and eating everything. I think the only reason she doesn’t do so with the dry goods is… “Bucky, why don’t you?”

‘I don’t like sweets.’

“Ah.”

‘I do like sudoku, however- pass me that travel magazine, would you?’

“Sure thing.”

Oh, did I not mention? Buttercream decided to be my Imbolc-buddy. Meaning she’s accompanying me for whatever I’m doing today.

I’m just going with it, really; I mean, I’m not going to tell a wolf the size of a Great White what to do, especially when she knows how to put together a cohesive argument and can back it up with row upon shining row of sharp, white teeth. Even if she does howl along with the fishmarket auction sirens at four in the godsdamn morning every fucking day.

Anyway, all this together means that I’m allowed to go through the Sento basically on my own, because I’ve got Buttercream with me. It’s no big deal for me to go to the… ambiguously moral Sento so long as I have Buttercream. I mean, even now on the train, I’ve got an entire seat to myself because people don’t really want to fuck with a girl that’s got a ton of Overprotective Wolvark looking after her. I mean, I’ve also realized that ‘bitch’ means teeth and the willingness to rip an asshole’s entire face all the way off for being rude, and I like that definition better than the one I had before. I also like the new version of the I-Own-This strut and Murder-Stare that Buttercream’s been teaching me; very effective. Cuts right through the bluster and goes direct to the hind-brain.

‘In most cultures, an event like a royal christening is not a private party; it’s the public social event of the year. To not invite any person of rank to such an event is a deadly insult.’

“Buttercream?”

“I assume you know the story of the Sleeping Beauty?”

“I do, yes.”

“Well. The Evil Fairy or Witch’s name was Vinsmoke Maleficent; and she was certainly not someone you’d want at a puppy-party. However, she was also someone powerful enough that only a fool would ever dare treat her with such blatant disrespect. The only way the King and Queen could have possibly gotten away with not inviting Maleficent was to not invite any of the fairies at all; inviting the other fairies and excluding her is explicitly taking sides in the conflict between the fairy factions.”

“Ah. That means… they made themselves her sworn enemies, and she responded by treating them as such from then on. If they had apologized for their disrespect, and invited her to the party, she would have given the Princess an awesome present. And, because she had, the rest of the fairies would have had to as well- right, sensei?”

“Just right.”

Buttercream has taken it upon herself to teach me the true and intricate lessons behind all the old fairy-tales; I’m not sure why, considering Beatrix is the one who loves those stories so much, but… then again, it’s fun to learn a new thing, right?

Oh, uh- Mab came down to the Shop right at sunset yesterday. She cleared off an anvil, and she struck a nail with a hammer until it turned red; then she lit the forge fire, which had been cleaned out days before and a new nest of wood set within.

She spoke words over four knives I’d never seen before, and Franky would not look upon at all; and she said- she said-

The blade is the most important part. Hilt and pommel and guard and handle all have their place, but it is the blade that holds the soul.

Her hammer came down again and again, until the blades were glowing in strange colors I’d never seen before and could not speak the names of. Again, again, again she struck, the bones on the anvil becoming more refined and more- Real, the realest of reals, around which other things merely echoed- until at last they began to gleam with a strange light of… of something?
Steel purified of evil by All the Powers shall be the vessel for this holy blessing. I, Mab, Queen of the Dreaming, give them the shape that will carry their purpose unto the end of all days and nights and halflight-gleamings. No might shall bend it nor shall the abyss of time shake it’s glory. This wonder I make here and now with my own two hands; I, Mab, Queen of Wrens, have made it.

I lost count of how many times Mab said that prayer over those three- one, and one, and two-as-one-blades. Again and again, until the light within the weapons matched the light within Mab, and then- and then- she consigned them to the fire. They were cooled in a bucket of water left in full sight of the wheeling sky above; moonlight and stars filtering down.

This morning, she gave the three weapons to Zoro, who presented them to Nami- and then they went off together, and came back a little sex-scruffled so… I guess it’s a good gift?

She also gave Beatrix a pair of Rending Shears to use while hers are being refurbished as actual weapons- they aren’t as nice as Beatrix’ normal scissor-swords, but they do work, and, being of much stronger materials than her own, are less likely to break in her hands.

Oh, we’re almost there- ah, Mab’s speaking.

“Now- I’ve made everyone a token for… well, if you need to find your crewmates in a hurry, or you need to call for help. Pay attention, girls and boy; I’m not keen on you learning this lesson the hard way. Telekinesis is magic, but it isn’t like other magic. Magic magic, spells and so on, are all thaumakinetic. They draw on the ambient magic all around, or stored in various objects- crystals, metals, water, thread, and so on- channel it in various ways, be it a wand, the ritual of creation, even a punch- and then direct it in a way that you desired. Ready, aim, fire.

“Telekinesis is psychokinetic; it is drawn from within. You need a fraction of a fraction of the amount of magic from the world to power telekinesis; and because it is psychokinetic, it depends on willpower, concentration, imagination, and creativity. These are your tokens; pray do not lose them. I have pendants, bracelets, pins, and hairclips- take one, and pass the basket please.”

I take a pendant. It’s heavy in my hand.

“I want you to close your eyes, and make a decision to find a member of your crew; it could be a sibling. It could be an officer, or even Captain Luffy. Fix it in your mind.”

I do.
“Focus on some way of finding them; a path your feet will follow, a sound that you know to be them, a series of actions to take.”

I focus.

“Now- open your eyes and see what’s become of your token.”

I open my eyes to find, quietly sitting where my pendant was before, a tiny gold and black frog.

“Your magic has shaped the Token into a form most suitable for you; one you can understand and follow without fear. Keep them with you; keep them safe. If I have to make new ones for any of you, I will not be pleased. Anyway- here’s money for each of you for the Sento, here’s your bath pass- Mark, hold on to Luffy and Usopp’s passes please- j’hallucine, I have a Devil Fruit power- sorry, Nami, I can’t actually go with you through the relaxation regimen we discussed. Zoro could, though…?”

“Sure.”

“Good. -hmm, sorry?”

“I said, so you’re free to do the kiausauna with me?”

“-the kiausauna?”

“The kiausauna. Yeah, the thing with the stove and- pieni huone tai rakennus, joka on suunniteltu paikka kokea kuivia tai märkiä lämpöistuntoja- quelle est cette merde appelée- Sauna. You’re free to do sauna with me?:”

“Oh! Um- sure, of course. Are we doing the thing with the birch branches?”

“...if you want to?”

“Good! -Now, Sanji and I will be doing traditional Demonic Sauna for Imbolc cleansing; Robin and Brook are having their bones realigned, as well as taking rejuvenating milk-baths and getting their hair polished. Nami and Zoro are going to the Tepidarium, to swim, get massaged, mud-masked, scrubbed, and have mani-pedi’s done. Usopp, Luffy, and Mark are getting professionally bathed, whatever that means, as well as massages; Taffy and Gurry are getting Romantic Couple’s Massages. Bryony and all the girls except for Deborah, Beatrix, and Fernanda have never been to a sento like this before; they’ll be mostly just soaking in the hot water, and taking extensive showers with fancy soaps. Chopper and Genny are getting their hair seen to; Franky, Beatrix, and Deborah are doing the most deluxurious and extensive relaxation package they have without making a reservation of some kind; Sancho, who is of age, is going to get a makeover-” “Aaaw-” groan all my sisters.

“None of that, should have asked earlier but it’s too late now! And Fernanda, accompanied by Buttercream, will be doing whatever she wants to do. ...what do you want to do, Fern?”

“Uh... quick stop at the makeup counter with Sancho, if that’s okay- I need to consecrate my hair sticks? Then, um, there’s a sex shop right?”

“Of course.”

“Yeah, so, we need more and better supplies, so I’m gonna hook us up–”

“Here’s my bank card, Fern- either get brazen about what you buy or don’t buy it at all, I’ll see every purchase anyway. There’s no spending limit on it, is the thing; if you're like me, you only want to go to the store once, aye?”

“Aye-aye! Um, then I’ve gotta clean the Orbuculum, say my prayers, get purified in the cold water spring, and, uh, probably eat a bunch of weird shit while I wait for you guys to get done? The future is murky today.”

All my siblings share ‘uh-oh’ looks with each other, but I pretend not to see them as I put Mab’s bank card away in my wallet. Mab just gives us cool shit- it literally just appears in our closets? So, uh. I have a crossbody purse now? It’s nice.

What’s nicer is the delicious squidberries inside it. Um- so there’s all these amazing crops in the Aquarium, beyond the fish, right? Fruits and vegetables we didn’t get to eat all that often because of expense- but we all picked them over the summer. Anyway, a Squidberry grows underwater on tangled vines; the first bloom of bright white flowers sometime in early January becomes sweet red berries right around Imbolc. Sanji and Deborah- really, mostly Deborah, once Sanji taught her how he wanted it done; on account of her gills, y’know- spent most of yesterday picking Squidberries for today. They’re traditional fare... y’know, I understand why Mab’s always interested in Sanji. Really, I get it. If I had a man like that... well, and they really love each other? So.

Anyway, today I’m wearing a sports bra, granny panties, a pair of overalls, and my oversized cardi; my hair’s blond again, and it’s braided up around my crown, pinned in place with about twenty or thirty black floral hair pins. Daiso shit. I’ve got my yellow backpack full of my various spells and enchantments, which need to be renewed- that’s easy enough to do, honestly.

My hair sticks are in... well, technically it’s for paint brushes, but Gurry said he didn’t use it, ever, so I got it from him? Works fine. I’ve got foldin’ money from Mab, Mab’s bank card, a wallet that’s otherwise empty excepting my business cards, a list of things I need to get done, and a wolf companion. I’ve got clean socks with no holes, in an unfortunately colorful style, but that won’t bother the ascetics I’m going to be visiting later… My clothing fits fine for meditation… no phones in Chihiro Sento, it’s a rule of the place… Oh, and the ascetics that live on campus accept donations of fruit, incidentals like socks, underwear, and hygiene supplies- you know, mensis sponges; and very occasionally, straight money. I’ve got fresh squidberries for them, first of the season. Smaller than I’m used to seeing, but they taste good so I suppose it doesn’t matter?

I’m going to get my laity over with before I do the thing I need to do- so, in order. Go with Sancho to the Makeup Corner, get my hair sticks consecrated and probably something special for myself; get the Orbuculum cleaning supplies from the Divination Counter, and go where they direct me to clean it; Meditate in the Room of Stars to align my new, clean- need a bag for the Orb, this wrap is okay but it won’t survive the day… hm.
“Mab, where should I go to get a real bag for the Orb?”

“Gift Shop.”

“Okay.”

So, in order: Makeup Corner, Hair Sticks, Gift Shop for Orbag, Clean the Orb, Meditate and Alignment; Cleansing of Magic, Renewal of Enchantments. Then, make my donations, and have a wonderful late lunch. After that… Sex Shop. End the day with… hm, I’ll find out, I guess?

Today is Murky.

For me, visiting a Sento isn’t really… relaxing. I don’t really relax around lots of people, or in liminal spaces like a public bath house. If I try, I’m more likely to open up my psychometry, and in a place like a bath house… there’s really a lot of things I’d just rather not know, y’know?

However, most local sento actually have the facilities to properly dispose of the wastes produced by cleansing a mystical object, so- that’s usually what I go to one for. You can’t just clean an orbuculum in your bathtub, you’ll fuck up the pipes!

Actually, I need to do this in a different order. I need to find out how to clean the orb first; then do everything else. That’ll be easiest.

We get to our stop, and walk up the cliff to the bridge to the bath house. Everyone scatters just about as soon as they get through the doors; Sancho stays with me.

“I actually need to do things in a different order than I thought- you can go ahead if you want, Sancho.”

“Nah, I’ll stick with you.”

“...Okay.”

I read the map on the wall. It’s a simple thing, clearly written- and then, I’m off! Around this corner, let the large burly pirates pass me by- oh, Whitebeard’s, cool- around another corner, down the hall, up the stairs, and, yep, the bath token main desk. Good place to ask for things.

“Hi, I need to cleanse an old Orbuculum-?”

“-relax and enjoy- Hmm? An orbuculum, you say? Mah- and I suppose you need to do a full cleanse of yourself and your crafts, as well?”

“That’d be ideal, yeah.”
“Hmmph. You need two bath tokens, then- this one for yourself, and this for your orb. The attendant will direct you to where you’ll need to wash it so we can dispose of the thaums properly... First time?”

“...Is it that obvious?”

“To me, sure. You’ll want to stop by the Makeup Corner anyway, we don’t have toiletries in the bathing areas- here’s a list.”

“Shampoo, conditioner, which stylist to... go to... ah. Right, forgot- okay, anything else? Sancho, you need anything?”

“-Could I have some bath tokens like my sister’s, please?”

“-Here. Pay up- yeah, thanks. Relax, and enjoy it- if you even can enjoy something like that...”

“Honestly, it’s about the same as shaving down the crusty bits on your feet at the end of a season. Gross, but very satisfying. It also clears out any lingering aches and pains, acne scars, and thinning spots in your hair.”

“Mhm. I’d have much worse acne scarring than I do if my sister hadn’t talked some sense into me.”

“-Aa, is that so? Might have to try it myself, then...”

“You should! I mean- I know it’s not expensive, but... sometimes, things that are expensive are worse, you know?”

“Heh. Don’t say that too loud, now.”

“Heeheehee. Sure, sure. Thank you for your help!”

“Of course!”

And we’re off again! This time, I take the long way around so we can get a glimpse of our... friends and family, our crewmates, relaxing and enjoying themselves.

We pass Mab and Sanji lightly smacking each other with birch branches before rolling around in a massive snow bank. Mab is squealing while she does so, which just makes Sanji laugh; then they go back into a room that I can see gouts of vapor escaping from.

We pass Usopp, Luffy, and Mark being scrubbed by wrinkled old men. The pile of dirty scrubbing cloths by Luffy, in particular, is starting to become staggering.

We don’t see Taffy and Gurry at all.

We do see Nami and Zoro swimming in a pool that only lightly vapors when a cool wind rushes across it. Bryony and most of my sisters are there too, relaxing in the warm water or swimming under a high-bottom fence and going towards what I’d guess are showers? But vanishing from my gaze all the same. Sancho and Cece wave to each other before we turn down a hallway and are gone.

Chopper and Genny we meet in the Makeup Corner, just after they’ve been cared for. Chopper’s mink fairly blazes with polish, and Genny’s fall of blonde hair is thick and honey-colored and wavy like a flag in a soft breeze. They’re talking about breast exams, of all things, and… seem to be considering the best way to instruct a man in how to check himself for breast cancer. I didn’t know men could get breast cancer, but I suppose all things are possible. Genny gestures animatedly, and–suddenly, I don’t have the heart to interrupt them. A small, copper coin dances in Genny’s fingers; she’s playing the finger knuckle game with it?

I haven’t seen her do that in years...

I have thick, ‘Merjin’ hair, but because of the color, most stylists assume that they can treat it like… I dunno. Lanjin hair? Basically, what I want is a wash, and a trim; I need the hairdresser to take off split ends, condition my hair, and brush it out. That’s it.

If I had the time, I wouldn’t use shampoo at all, I’d just continually brush and condition it all; but I don’t have that kind of time, or a hairbrush that can withstand the abuse. I go into the Makeup Corner and grab the shopping basket right beside the door. Firstly, I need my skin regimen- and no, not the piddly little tubs meant for traveling. You cannot use the same thing on every part of the body; different areas produce different thicknesses of skin.

Not all my sisters use the same regimen- for one thing, we have differing skin types; for another, we have different levels of effort we’re willing to put into our skincare. Genevieve, Deborah, and Beatrix have the most available energy to put into their skin care; Cece is average; Adelaide and Eleanor have the least. My skin care regimen has ten different parts of equal importance.

Step one is to remove makeup; and it’s very important to cleanse not once, but twice. The first cleaning removes all the makeup and dirt of the day; the second removes the leftovers from the first round. Contrary to popular belief, using an oil-based makeup remover gives better results, and here’s why: oil has more lubrication, so you’re not irritating or pulling at your skin when trying to remove long-lasting makeup or ground in stains. This is crucial for areas like the eyelids, where the skin is thinner and more fragile. Oil also helps remove sebum build-up inside the pores, so you’re actually getting a thorough cleanse. Into the basket it goes- a tub of solid cleansing oil.

Part two of step one- the second cleanse! The second round of cleansing focuses on removing any excess residue from the first round. I prefer using gentle cream or foam-based cleansers that won’t dry-out the skin. Drier skin forces your sebaceous glands to secrete more oil in order to protect itself. If you like that paper-dry or tight feeling after a cleanse, you may very well be over-cleansing. Into the basket; a tub of cleansing cream.

Step three is exfoliation. Exfoliating is a very important step in skincare, as it removes built-up dead skin and encourages renewal; it improves texture, tone, and can sometimes lessen the appearance of unfortunate scars. A popular practice of exfoliation is scrubbing off dead skin cells to encourage new cells to the surface; but there are other methods, if you don’t like using abrasives. My sister, Genny, doesn’t- she prefers using gentle chemical exfoliants, or peels. I personally prefer using a black sugar scrub, and a berry-based peel. I alternate them- one one week, the other the next. It’s not good to over-exfoliate, after all. Into the basket they go.

The first optional step (or step four, for those counting at home,) is one that not everyone needs. Detoxifying masks are best used when you’re experiencing extreme oiliness, over-active acne, or strange discoloration. However, clay based masks are very drying if used too often, so I like having two. The one I use most often is the rice-based one; the one I use less often is the pink clay one.

Step five: Toner. After cleansing, your skin is stripped of its protective barrier. Thus, your skin won’t be at it’s normal 5.5 pH level. 5.5 is slightly acidic because the skin actually has what is called an “acid mantle,” or a protective barrier comprised of fatty acids. If your skin tends to be dry and sensitive, this is a sign of weaker acid mantle, meaning your skin is too alkaline. A toner helps bring your skin’s pH levels back to normal and creates a balanced environment for the next step in your skincare regimen. I like the smell of the aloe one, so into the basket it goes, along with a bag of reusable makeup rounds.

Step six is tricky, because of inevitable price and the difference between day and night-time regimen. This is where a lot of people get confused. There’s essence, serum, and ampoules. We’ll get to ampoules shortly.

An essence is a lightweight, hydrating liquid, meant to help prepare the skin for your moisturizer, post cleansing. Think of it like a sponge; once you clean and dry a sponge, it takes a little bit of dampening before it can absorb a lot of moisture again. Essence is the dampening for your skin-as-sponge. Essence isn’t like a toner- they’re meant for different purposes and have different ingredients. Toner is used to remove the last traces of cleanser and is essentially water that’s been enhanced with essential oils and often alcohol for quick drying. A facial essence contains higher levels of active ingredients and is designed to actually soak into your skin. Ugh, think of it like… like you know how sometimes after you shower and you put on the body lotion, you rub it in, and you come back and find your skin’s still dry and crackly so you put on another coat of lotion? It’s like that, but for your face.

Depending on your type of skin and the time of day, you’ll have different needs: essences are the least concentrated and very watery, whereas serums tend to be thicker in consistency and more concentrated; and ampoules are basically skin-heroin. I would recommend essences for people with oilier, acne-prone skin, a serum for others who need hydration, and ampoules for people who tend to get trouble spots overnight. I actually need all three, as I have mixed-type skin and get night-zits. So. A hydrating essence; an even more hydrating serum; and an ampoule that’s mostly filtered snail-slime. Just you try and get me now, dry and flaky skin! -into the basket they go.

An optional step is for spot treatment of zits and pimples. Most real regimens are built around nutrition, not products- but, occasionally, you just can’t help but get an owie. I don’t actually need to buy anything, this time- I just use honey. Dab it on; leave for a while; wipe away gently with water. No big deal.

Sheet masks? Eeeh, the one I got from Daiso is fine; I do, however, need new stuff for the actual mask part… oat milk, green tea, tea tree oil, lavender oil, pollen, seaweed, rice paper, glycerin, rosewater, witch hazel, rosehip oil… and purified water. Into the basket.

Eyecream? Oho, didn’t know the snail-guys made an eyecream- I’ll take it.

Almost done here- step nine is the genuine moisturizing. For daytime, a lotion (or “emulsion,” as some of them are marketed as) is ideal since they are usually lighter in consistency. For those who have oilier skin, a gel would be optimal. Gel moisturizers tend to contain glycerin, a humectant that helps moisturize the skin without weighing it down. Creams are the nighttime alternative to lotion and gel. A thicker moisturizer helps to seal in all the product and prevent the skin from drying out as the hours pass. Some days, I need light moisturization; some days I need average; some days I need heavy. Gel, emulsion, and cream. Into the basket they go.

Now this is something I don’t need very often- but! A night-time mask is very useful for when you’ve asked your skin to go above and beyond. You went swimming and forgot to reapply sunscreen? Nightmask! You went dune-surfing? Nightmask! Got thrown up on at work! Wash that shit off and then NIGHTMAAAAAASK! Why a night-time mask, you ask? I’ll answer: sometimes your skin is in turmoil and you just know you need to do a little something extra to help it. When we sleep, our body works hard to regenerate and heal itself in every department, and your skin is no exception to that. Incorporating an extra step during your slumber can help boost your skin’s ability to repair itself. I like the smell of the pink one, so in it goes.

And Chopper makes the best damn sunscreen I’ve ever had the pleasure of using— not too heavy, not too light, easy to apply, hypoallergenic… It’s basically perfect. Oh, yeah- and sunscreen is step ten, if you didn’t realize already.

As for actual makeup? About as fancy as I ever get is curling my eyelashes with a spoon and going extra-extra on my cat eye with the sticky-khol. Maybe some lipgloss from the Daiso if they’re on sale. Maybe. Other than that- eyebrow brush, eyelash comb, spoolie. That’s it. Makeup Done.

As for hair- look, if you’re doing a ten-step to beautiful dance, you might as well double or nothing.

So, step one: scaler. The beginning of each hair starts at the follicle right at the scalp. By keeping the scalp clean, healthy and exfoliated, we can allow for healthier hair to grow in. Enter the scalp scaler! Scalers are salicylic acid-based pre-treatments that exfoliate the scalp to remove and debris, dead skin cells, and oil build-up. If you have a dandruff problem, this can really help keep things from building up to unmanageable levels.

I haven’t used the store bought versions very often, because usually I just ask Genny or Deb to make me a packet of salicylic acid (after gathering the willow-bark for them, of course) and dilute it with purified water in a squeeze bottle. Honestly, just that with maybe a little hint of rose water and a drop or two of glycerin works better than anything else; and it makes my hair smell fantastic.

I use it maybe once every other week? It goes on before shampoo, directly on my dry hair. The pointy tip of the squeeze bottle is helpful getting down to my scalp without going through the rest of my hair, and a grid pattern works best for total coverage. Rub it in and let it sit for fifteen minutes; rinse it off and we’re at step two.

Step two: shampoo. We all know that technically the first step to hair care is shampooing, just like we all know that technically a mermaid’s first dildo is her own scalp brush with a handful of lube. But! By adopting the scalp care principle, we need to cleanse the scalp thoroughly— thus, one’s fingers are not enough!

Integrating the use of a scalp brush during shampoo sessions gives a lot of benefits: it maximizes lather, promotes blood circulation and stimulation, and provides a thorough cleanse of all remaining dead skin cells and debris. I personally use a brush that came with a shampoo and conditioner set I won at a raffle, but any will do so long as it’s comfortable in your hands and doesn’t scratch your scalp.

I’m really not a fan of 2-in-1 shampoo and conditioner products because they’re drying and lead to tangles and split ends. If you’re currently using a conditioner and it isn’t working for you, try leaving it on longer. The point of a conditioner isn’t just to quickly detangle your hair, it’s to … condition it. Applying it like a shampoo and rinsing it out simply will not do. I definitely suggest pairing your conditioner with the same brand and formulation of your shampoo, because these manufacturers design their shampoos and conditioners to work together with similar ingredients.

Apply your conditioner and let it sit in your hair while you do other things like washing your face or shaving. This allows more time for the conditioner to work its magic. Avoid wetting your hair while the conditioner is in. I keep a hair clip in the shower and clip my hair up while conditioning. Avoid applying conditioner on the scalp. The scalp’s pH level is 5.5, whereas the hair shaft is 3.7. When using different products that have different pH levels, you can dry out one or the other.

As for what, exactly, I like to use? Tsubaki. Designed for people with hair specifically like mine. Into the basket goes the pair!

Step four: mask, or pack. Some people like to condition and then follow up with a hair mask afterward, but I prefer to use a hair mask in its place. Hair masks, or “packs” as they’re known by in Gobdark, are an ultra-dose of nutrition and powerful ingredients blended into one. Just like conditioning, I leave this on my hair while I shave and wash my face. Same rules apply as with the shampoo and conditioner; I really do recommend you buy in one brand if you can for what you put on your hair and scalp. Best not to over do this one; once a week is plenty. Preferably not within a day of doing the next step, though.

Step five: Once weekly vinegar rinse. With both hair and skin, it’s important to strive for the correct pH level. Normal pH levels on the scalp and skin are slightly acidic between 4.5 and 5.5. The skin has an “acid mantle,” which is a thin film of acid that helps seal out bacteria (aka sebum! Natural moisture!). Dry and itchy scalps often mean that your scalp’s pH is too alkaline and has a weak acid mantle – this can cause acne, eczema, and dandruff. If you have a dry and itchy scalp or suffer from dandruff, a vinegar rinse can help!

Apple cider vinegar has a pH level of about 3, which is on the acidic side. By diluting it with water you can bring it down to around 4, and use it as a rinse. (You can also use white vinegar, but it has a pH of around 2, so needs to be diluted even more.) By bringing down your hair’s acidity levels, your cuticles can seal properly instead of unevenly, resulting in split ends. Your itchy scalp will also thank you! Even if you don’t have dandruff, a routine vinegar rinse can help bring down the alkalinity of your hair and scalp that may have been caused by styling products. A single vinegar rinse will give noticeable results right out of the shower… I did one the day before yesterday, and my scalp and hair both still feel amazing. Although it can be tough to get the vinegar smell completely out of your hair, I recommend just grinning through it. You can do this step after shampooing and before conditioning. However, I strongly recommend doing a vinegar rinse last because water normally has a pH level of about 7-8. By rinsing it out, conditioning, and rinsing with water again, you’d be going backward.

Step six: Once weekly scalp pack. This is best done when you’re packing your hair, too. Peppermint, because this much hair is always hot and itchy, and there’s no getting around it. Basket!

Step seven: hair tonic. After washing your face with a cleanser, you should use a toner and then moisturize, right? With hair, a scalp tonic is the equivalent of a toner and a great way for you to prep your scalp for the next few steps. Get the same brand as your hair mask, actually. After your shower, dry hair with a towel, making sure not to rub your hair together as this encourages frizziness (squeeze and pat dry). Simply spray the tonic into the scalp and leave on. Basket!

Step eight: scalp essence or serum. Applying an essence or serum to the scalp is similar to an ingredient-packed serum for the face. Depending on your needs, a lightweight essence or leave-in fluid may help for oily scalps and a serum may be better for a dry scalp in need of hydration. Some who have normal scalps may choose not to use a scalp essence or serum and stick to a tonic. My scalp tends to get irritated, especially during the summer when sweat and product buildup can’t get thoroughly cleansed from my scalp. By the time my scalp is clean it’s then dry and irritated, but an essence helps re-hydrate it. Use it the same way you used the scaler- grid pattern, massage in. Essence; and a serum, when an essence isn’t enough. Usually happens in winter, if it’s gonna happen at all. Basket!

Step nine: hair essence or serum. There are different formulations for essences and serums meant for hair and scalp- because of the difference in pH levels between both, y’know. Just like skin serums, hair serums are designed to deliver a large amount of active ingredients to the hair, while an essence acts like a moisturizing agent that hydrates hair. Some may use both an essence and serum while others may only use one or the other – it simply depends on your needs. I use a serum to continuously treat my hair with nurturing ingredients and follow up with an essence to lock-in moisture. Which serum and essence? Tsubaki brand serum and essence of camellia.

Step ten: Miscellaneous hair shit.

At the very back of the Chihiro Sento Makeup Corner, there’s a large table sunken into a massive stone from which flows a merrily burbling fountain. This water is used to purify hair-accessories. Hand a bath token and the hair sticks over to an attendant; go shopping, pay for your purchases; come back, and it’s all done. Oh, and buy a five-n-go bunch of quilter’s cloths for rag-rolls later; they’re clean enough. A new boar bristle brush after the, um, the Pizza ate my old one- it’s best for dry brushing; and a new paddle brush for wet-brushing. Scrunchies in my favorite colors- yellow, black, and white. And- done!

“Can I get these delivered, d’you think Buttercream?”

“Mm. Probably best to not carry around your hunt like that all day if you don’t have to, yeah. Oh, there’s your brother- I can tell by the scent, his fur’s entirely different-”

“Eh? -EEEEH? Horizon! Your- your hair!”

“Haha… you like it?”

“It’s wonderful! -but, um. Are you done for the day?”

“Yeah. Spa’s aren’t really my thing, and that was the most cleansing I needed done- d’you want me to carry your shopping back?”

“Will you really?”

“Course.”

“Thank you, Sancho!”

“Hahahaha- alright, alright; see you later, then. I think I’m gonna take a nap- you know how I get in places that aren’t home…”

“Aa, yeah; later, brother!”

Sancho, like all predatory creatures of a certain kind, doesn’t relax outside of his own territory; thus, even though Sento Chihiro is relaxing to most people, to him, it’s really not. Thankfully, he’s of age; so, he’s going to go around and find everyone, and offer to carry back the shopping. In this Kingdom, Clowns are licensed to kill; only an idiot or a tourist would attack Sancho for the stuff he carries.

For those of us keeping score, the game is set at Makeup and Hair sticks; last purchase of the day? A bag for the Orb. To the Gift Shop! …blast and damnation! They only have a bag in the right size and shape in blue! Ach- well, it’s not so bad, they might not have had the proper bag at all. Welp. Too late now; I’ve only so much time in the day, after all, and it’s not like it’s a bad bag or anything. Just… not my color. I mean, even a way to add my color would be fine- a simple line the same color of leather as my regular bag would be just about perfect… maybe Mab can do that for me? I’ll ask her, when we meet back up.

Next stop: my orbuculum.

Let me just read this instructive pamphlet Ellie copied out for me from one of the books in the library on this handy bench here...

The proper method of cleaning an orbuculum, as I know now, is actually four distinct methods that can be used in lieu of each other- the Seer who wishes to use the orb just has to find some resonance with the ritual cleansing. Since this orb is a new one, and hasn’t been cleansed in a while anyway, I need to cleanse it.

The simplest way to cleanse it is to hold the orb in running water and focus on purging all the built up, stagnated energy from it. Crystals are radiant, pulsating stores of mystical power; they should never, ever feel like dead rocks in your hands. The other ways of cleansing- burying it in earth for a day, anointing it with holy oil, or passing it through incense smoke- all of those would work fine, but… I’m in a bath house, and washing it away is the most… right, to me.

The actual area to do this isn’t in any building; it’s a fountain under trailing vines, a path lit by… glowing stones in the darkness? I- I’ve been in a trance since I stopped reading the pamphlet. There’s a locker room of a sort before I get to the fountain proper; it’s made of stone, naturally. I’m in a sort of… cairn? Cave? It doesn’t matter; the only light is from the stones, and the water, and it is like… like I am in a sky of stars.

I carefully take off all my clothing, and fold it neatly, and put it on the dry shelf, along with my socks and my bath-house shoes. I empty my various enchanted objects into a sort of wooden dish with a slotted bottom, and take the unclean Orb in it’s frayed wrappings, and I walk, dazed and dreaming, through a room that isn’t actually empty.

There are others, here, but I can’t… See- them? I walk, and carefully step around onto stones and I climb and climb, until I am at a certain ledge that leads to a special fountain, kept separate from the bathing pool below by some arrangement of pipes and sewers.

Crystals grow out from where the water mists up again, and moss in strange green mats clings to the high pillars bounding the sacred fountain’s falls. I set my enchantments aside, in a small child-stream that flows and flows down into the pool the sacred waters collect in, before being purified again and falling lower. Then, I unwrap the rags around the orb, and begin walking closer to the falls. The ground is slippery and cool, and the water is cold, but not painfully so. There is an indentation in the stone, and a wall angling back behind it, where countless others have sat and cleansed themselves before me.

I sit in the lotus-style, and put the Orb in my lap; form my hands into the circle of supreme balance; and the water washes over me in a cold, pure wave.

The magic starts below, in the stones on which I sit. It rises up through my red vagina, through the orange base of my spine; it arcs and coils out through my guts before jolting in one thick yellow wave through my solar plexus, right where I’m holding the crystal orb. The magic rushes green through my heart, and thick-blue syrupy and hot in my throat; my brow is weighted with indigo force, and it rises higher and higher, until my head and my mind and the crown of my head is the rim of a chalice overflowing with violet light muladhar-svadhishtan-manipurak-anahat-vishudda-agya-sahasrara so- much- light-

Strange shapes in the trees circle a yellow thing with wings- a photo with a dark shadow in it’s grip- a coin, one of thirty, silver underneath it’s washed away blood- a phrase only the dangerous know-songs sung by the Righteous- Terrible Fates Approach.

I need to get out. I need to go, right this moment.

I stand, and Buttercream rises from the pure-pool, dark and dripping; I move quickly but carefully, grabbing my basket of enchanted objects now pure and- doesn’t matter. I go back to my clothing, pack my things away, redress, and all but run out the nearest exit to the Bath House because I have to go right now.

Most people on Imbolc move like they’re walking through foggy water. I move like an arrow.

I make it; I don’t know how I know that, but I do.

Buttercream huffs next to me.

“Was there a reason we ran out like that, cubby?”

“Yeah, but I don’t know what, exactly.”

“Hmph. Well, I won’t pretend to understand the mind of a Moon-eyed; what now?”

“More shopping, then back to the Ship.”

“Greeaaat.”

So, mermaids, mermen, fishmen, and fishwomen- they all have more or less the same thing in between their legs, and that’s a slit. Guys have bumpy slits, and gals have smooth slits; get a guy worked up, and his cock’ll pop out. Get a girl worked up, and her slit will puff up red.

Mermaids and Fishwomen can have sex with any man they like, and have a baby by him; but from what I understand, and from what I’ve explored… it’s not really very nice to go in further than your finger with a vibe until you’ve got real dugs to back your claims up with.

Lanjin call it a clit, or sometimes a pearl if they’re feeling fancy. On a merjin or gyojin, the clit goes all the way around the slit, and it’s what puffs up all red an’ excited when I have some me-time.

There are really only two things you actually need to have some quality alone time: you need a good understanding of what turns you on, and you need quality lube. The first keeps the wheel turning; the second makes sure nothing trips you up. It can also make some things last longer.
What all this boils down to is me buying three or four of everything, including unscented, unflavored pump-bottles of lube, having everything put in discreet brown bags, and riding back home without much care at all.

I then got a severe hint that I wouldn’t be seeing any of my siblings, barring Sancho, for the next three days at least.

Oh dear.

“So. In your own words, please introduce yourself for the Court Record and explain what you were doing between the hours of Ten After Midnight, and Four Previous Midnight.”

“Yes, officer. We were bathing-
My husband and I were washing
And trying to clean the year off.
We took it slow and steady and sweet-
And did our best to relax in Pools of hot and cold water and
A small room of wet heat, steaming;
We sat on benches of stone and Relaxed together like we Can’t do in our everyday lives.”

“You were no-where near the scene?”
“Right.”
“You’re quite sure you saw nothing?”
“Right.”

“-and you’d never met him before?”
“Of course not! I hadn’t had time to ever-”
“What?”

“Meet boys! I’m the oldest of my sisters- and I had to support them!”

“So you’re telling me that you had no idea something was wrong across the hall?”

“We get very loud together!”

“No, officer- when I take naps, I’m basically un-wakeable.”

“Well, Mab, you’ve gone and stepped deep in the shit now.”

“Daunelphe?”

“You’re under suspicion for murder- you, and every member of your crew that was in the Sento at the time of the crimes.”

“- crimes?”

“Mm. You’re going to need a lawyer to get out of this one.”

“We’re going to need one hell of a lawyer- and I think I know just the one…”

---

Dead my old fine hopes
And dry my dreaming but still...

Iris, blue each spring.

Chapter End Notes

Why did I make all the Court Cases /sung/ now I have to make them /rhyme/ shit shit
shit-
“ENOUGH! I see no reason to further entertain these flights of fancy- I said enough!” screams the Judge.

Yiu presses a hand to her covered eye and grits her teeth.

“This case’s evidence is extremely clear- the guilty party is Mince Coffyn! I’m through with your bluffs, your condescensions, and your disgusting attitude! They don’t call me ‘Magnificent’ because my eyes can’t see what’s clear-” snarls the Judge.

“It wasn’t me! I swear to all the gods, it wasn’t me!” babbles Mr. Coffyn.

“THAT’S ENOUGH! This Court sees no reason to further prolong this trial! The evidence and testimony that we’ve seen and heard are quite worthwhile! The victims were alone in their rooms, when they ate from the poisoned tart-” sneers the Judge.

“-no, you’re wrong, you’re all wrong! I made those tarts, and I would never- I would never!” wails Mr. Coffyn.

“-the only person in the room who had access, ability, and motive to kill was you-” growls the Judge.

“-no! No!-” whimpers Mr. Coffyn.

“-Mince Coffyn; it was you who killed your parents with a poisoned apple tart!” said the Judge, glaring with triumph.

“-No! No- I swear I didn’t kill my parents, or my unborn sibling! Someone else must have been there- someone must have wished them harm! That person is the one who killed my parents! Why won’t you believe me-?” gasped Mr. Coffyn Fuck it. I know a contradiction when I hear one.

“OBJECTION!”

---

February 4th

Tilly’s House and Office
At the end of a holiday, I’m always exhausted; this time, it was because I was finally old enough to participate in some of the more… adult elements of Imbolc. Frankly speaking, I’m going to give it a miss next year, unless something significant changes- I mean, sex with girls is okay, I guess, but… I’m not into it.

Blargh. Like licking a stab wound- slimy, hot, tasted like weak beer… I’m not into it. Interesting experience; but not one I’ll be repeating.

My siblings can usually handle their own shit, so it’s a real surprise to get a call from my oldest sister, Mab, needing help- particularly my help. She’s good at not getting caught out in anything incriminating; and she never, ever leaves evidence of her own involvement behind.

She’s been so much happier lately, too- but for her to call me directly… that’s never a good thing. My direct line is specifically my work phone, and my work… I’m a lawyer. I’m a defense attorney that specializes- kinda unwillingly, maybe?- in murder trials.

Getting a call on your work phone when you’re a defense attorney from your sister is never a good thing. Especially when that call comes in at too-fucking-dark at night, right when you were having a good fuckin’ sleep.

DAY 1 (72 HOURS REMAIN)

“Tilly? Tilly, I’m so glad I caught you- or, um, sorry to wake you up?” said Mab.

“M-aaaugh- mab, what is it? Wh-aaaugh- what’s wrong?” I said, between yawns.

“Tilly, I’m in Sento Chihiro; there’s been a murder. They’re accusing my crew of it, but mostly… Tilly, they’re trying to pin it on me.” she said, before hanging up.

Shit.

I hung up, got up, got dressed for work, and went to Sento Chihiro via the Swan Lake- after kicking Aster Mistburrow out of bed, of course. Can’t go investigate without my partner.

Legally, I can’t explain more than I just did- about how I got to Sento Chihiro when I live in Fairisle, which is on the other side of the planet and in the Sky. I can’t tell you how I got from Fairisle to Ryugu Mergyo in less than half a year- more like half an hour- other than that I did. The Law has it’s own powers and privileges, okay?

---

February 4th

[Chihiro Town Detention Center]; Cell Block A, Cell 7
Chihiro Town is what happens when you’ve got a place where damn rich people like to come and play; those rich people need services, and those services need people to make them happen, and those people need to live somewhere. Generally, somewhere that isn’t their place of business, too—and then those people need amenities as well—and so you get Chihiro Town, which is beautiful from every angle you’re likely to see it from if you’re filthy rich and lazy enough to let yourself be ferried and ushered around.

I may be filthy rich— but I’m not lazy.

The Chihiro Town Detention Center was built with two things in mind; first, that not every person cooling their blood in the Center would be necessarily built for land or sea or sky; and two, that Devil Fruit users needed to be restrained. Thus, the actual Cells are basically gigantic clear pipes that can be flooded or drained in a matter of seconds—of course, with seawater, as we’re in the ocean.

Ryugu Mergyo is not a country you want to be arrested in if you’re a Devil Fruit user. I’m just sayin’.

Anyway… there’s something deeply disturbing about seeing my sister in Chains. I was too downy to have been anywhere near her case five years ago—and yet… the way she’s slumped listlessly on her side, the way the harsh lights of the Chihiro Detention Center glare over her, turning her wings to so much glass and wire—it’s horrible.

Hell, she’s still in her holiday clothing… gods in heaven, she looks like Mother Morgan. I can never, ever tell her that— but she does. Mother Morgan was never known to wear glasses, of course—but… No, I can never say it aloud.

“Back again, Mab? This doesn’t seem like your usual hotel…” I said, trying for levity. My sister’s a jokester— but maybe this wasn’t the right time. Aster sighs and shakes his head in the corner of my eye.

“Hmhmhm. You’d know if I was here a’ purpose, Tilly. And honestly, the accommodations here are rather nice; I’ll be leaving a good review on my way out…” Mab said.

“Mab, did you do it? Did you murder someone again?” I said— because she has before, it’s why things went the way they went five years ago.

“No, I did not.” Mab said, “But if I don’t get some help, they’re going to say that I did anyway.”

“What happened?” I said.

“This whole awful business started at the fifteenth hour yesterday, and it happened right here, in Sento Chihiro,” Mab said.

“Sento Chihiro?” Aster said.

“Ah, right, most people don’t know, since they don’t actually advertise except by word of mouth—Sento Chihiro is the Best Bath House in the World. Really, it’s more of a vacationer’s resort, combining venues such as shopping and restaurants with a casino, a bath house, a hotel, and various halls and ballrooms,” Mab said.
“I see...” Aster said.

“As I recall, there was a family in the suite next to the one I had rented for Sanji and myself; I’d offered such to the rest of the crew, and some of them took me up on the offer...” Mab said.

“Do you remember who, exactly?” I said.

“Mhm, yes, I do. Sanji and I had a suite on the second floor, the second suite; Taffy and Gurry had a suite on the third floor, the third suite; and Zoro and Nami had a suite on the second floor, the sixth suite.” Mab said.

“Aa... What can you tell me of the murder?” I sang, softly.

“There was a family in suite three; a father, mother, and son. The parents were somehow poisoned; and now, of that family, there remains only one,” Mab sang back, soft as tears in rain.

“Hold on a sec- I’m just confused; and surely this is important news- but Mab, did you know the victims?” sang Aster.

“I knew them by correspondence sales only, I’m sad to say; they were customers of mine, and I don’t have so many that the loss of even two can be treated as blasé. Bad Bakers need clothing that can stand up to their mistakes; I’m working on being the Best Sewing Professional, and it takes what it takes,” sang Mab.

Definitely no motive to kill, then. Mab’s one of the premier experts in using metamaterials in clothing. She actively cultivates clients that will require strange things in their clothing- fireproofing, waterproofing, electric-proofing, breathability, toughness... She actually made my work clothes, or designed them, anyway, and I’ve never found anything I liked better. A sewing professional would never kill their customer- because then, how will they be paid in the future for their work?

“Did you see the killer at all?” I sang.

“There was no one suspicious that I recall,” Mab sang.

“Why did they arrest you alone?” I sang.

“Politics, I think- smaller crews can be accused in ways larger crews won’t,” Mab sang.

“If you didn’t see the murderer, and you didn’t do the crime- why were you arrested?” Aster sang.

“Because no one else was there to arrest,” Mab sighed.

“Eeh?” Aster said.

“I was the only living person near suite three that wasn’t the son when the police got there, and I have a record- I suppose they thought it was an open and shut case. No one else was there,” Mab said.

“But- how can that be possible? Even in a hotel, there’s always someone around...” I said, confused.

“I don’t know, Tilly. But no one, not one person other than me, was near suite three at the time of the crime. More to the point, the found something incriminating on my person...” Mab said.
“What?” Aster said.

“A poisoned spoon,” Mab said.

“EEH? Y-you had a poisoned spoon on you!?” Aster said.

“Well, I thought it was odd; it was a clear glass sugar spoon, and I thought someone had dropped it… I was going to take it to the lost and found, because it was obviously part of a set, and someone would surely miss it,” Mab said.

“What makes you say it was part of a set?” I said.

“Well, two things, really- firstly, it wasn’t a very sturdy object. Most people could break it with one hand. Secondly, it was quite small, making it easy to misplace- and it was labelled with a number, a two, I think? -Something like that, you have a number of them to prevent not having one when you need it, especially if you go to the trouble of numbering them…” Mab said.

“What can you tell me about the politics of the situation?” I said.

“Not much, I’m afraid,” Mab said, before sighing. “Listen, there are things I’m contractually bound to not reveal; however, I can say this. If they weren’t so well established and beloved in this country, the Whitebeard Pirates would have been implicated, and it would be Asher on this side of the barrier, not me.”

“…I see. Don’t worry, Mab; I’m here, now, and I’m going to figure this out,” I said.

“I certainly hope so, Tilly; I’d hate to lose my head over something I didn’t even do…” Mab sighed.

Aster and I left the Chihiro Detention Center after that. I go over what we know with Aster on the way to the Sento. Well, really I just put things together a bit in my mind out loud, Aster normally doesn’t wake up until after sunrise.

“At the fifteenth hour on the Third of February, or at about four p.m. Imbolc Day, two people were murdered; with what we must for now assume was poison. They were in the third suite, second floor; they are survived by their only son. Mab was the only living person on that floor near suite three when someone found the bodies and called the police. The police arrived, and arrested Mab after finding a poisoned spoon on her person. The victims were Mab’s customers, however; depriving her of motive.” I hummed to myself.

---

February 4th

Sento Chihiro

“Where do we start, Tilly?” said Aster, rubbing sleep from his eyes as we walked into the Sento proper just a bit after dawn.
“I think I’ll speak with the witnesses; there must be one or two,” I said, musingly.

I first met Aster Mistburrow when he was accused of murdering his elder brother, Quarrel. We later discovered that Quarrel was digging into secrets that people with power didn’t want him, an investigative journalist, to be reporting on- and by the time Quarrel had realized he’d dug himself into a grave-sized ditch, it was too late to climb back out. With that said, all the Mistburrow’s are Spirit Channellers to some degree; even with him gone, Aster still has a way to commune with Quarrel, and get his advice if necessary.

That case was also when I first met Inspector Heesis Noopwright. He’s an upstanding kind of guy, from a long line of law-dogs, and possesses sterling moral character. It’s too bad he can’t seem to hold on to more than a thousand dola at a time.

“Hey, pal! Terrible way to start the New Year, right?” said Inspector Noopwright.

“Inspector, New Year’s is at Yule -” growled Aster, because it’s one of his Things.

“I need information, please. What do you know of the double murder?” I sang.

“The married bakers ate a poisoned tart, pal. Talk about your irony!” said Inspector Noopwright.

“Got any trace of foul play?” I sang.

“The suite hasn’t been cleaned in months, not since that weirdo family came to stay- if there is, you’ll have to slog through all their crap anyway,” grumbled the Maid.

“What did you find inside of the bodies?” I sang.

“Here’s my preliminary autopsy report- now can I get back to work?” said the Coroner.

“Have you a bead on any leads? ’Cause I need ‘em today.” I sang.

“Actually, a witness is missing,” said Inspector Noopwright.

“Missing?” I said.

“Yeah! The victim’s son! A family of father, son, and mother-” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“-and the son is a witness...” I hummed.

“-oh, that poor boy-” hummed Aster.

“-he was the one who found them dead,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“So he’s our primary witness-” I hummed.

“Please take a flyer for the World’s Worst Baker’s Contest!” sang a pretty Huldra-boy -

“Hey- Mince Coffyn, you’re a witness in this case; stop running off for that baking contest when you’re needed here!” barked Inspector Noopwright.

“I need to draw attention to this subject; without my parents I’m surely doomed! But if I win the “Aster, please conduct an interview; you know best what he’s been through- I’d do it but I need to—” I sang, quietly.

“Get going,” sang Aster, before taking Mince Coffyn aside and beginning to speak quietly. My last sight of the both of them was Aster gently holding poor Mr. Coffyn as tears overflowed his pain-filled eyes.

“I’d best take a look around the Coffyn’s suite and see what truths arise… it will be the only way to see through the upcoming lies,” I sang to myself, before talking to the SSH Officer and getting geared up- and permission- to enter the scene of the crime.

Poison was used, after all; I need to be careful. The talisman and rune will negate all poisons until I decontaminate (which the Officer explained meant I needed to take a hot shower and scrub everything feasible, and to keep scrubbing until the water ran clear beneath my feet), at which point they- and any poisons stuck to me- will dissipate harmlessly. The evidence gathering kits are specially designed to be either disposable, or to keep me from touching anything in the scene.

---

February 4th

Sento Chihiro; Suite 3, Second Floor

Investigation Start!

The very first thing I notice when I get inside of Suite Three on the Second Floor of Sento Chihiro is the smell. It smells distinctly of almonds, with a faint hint of bitterness. I know I’ve smelled it, or something like it before, but I’m not sure where- only that this feels like an important detail to make note of, and so I do.

Added to Evidence: “The overpowering scent of bitter almonds in S3:2F.”

The second thing I notice is the layout of the room; it’s a typical ryokan style suite, fairly common for this part of the World. The tatami are neatly laid out, and the area where the bodies were has been carefully marked with black-and-yellow hazard tape and flags. The table is still set for whatever meal killed the Coffyns- it looks like tea-time, actually. I make a drawing of the suite’s layout just to have it on hand, and take a picture of the table from a few different angles.

Added to Evidence: S3 layout drawing ; murders marked with ‘X’.

Added to Evidence: Pictures of the Tatami-room Table, still set with food.
Huh? That’s odd- there’s a plate in the center of the setting here, but there’s nothing on it but a few crumbs. I’ll put a few in an evidence bag just in case…

Added to Evidence: Crumbs from Empty Plate.

There’s a tea set here too, and the teapot is made of silver. That’s funny- the spout on the teapot has a line of tarnish, like a drop of tea rolled down the spout-edge and turned all the silver black. I’ve never seen anything like it before; I take a picture, and- huh? There’s still tea in the pot, too. I take a sample of the tea.

Added to Evidence: Picture of Tarnished Silver Teapot.

Added to Evidence: Sample of Liquid Tea.

I check the bedroom, to find what the Maid had meant- the Coffyns were obviously preparing for the World’s Worst Baker’s Contest. The room is dominated by stacks of toasting-ovens, baking paraphernalia, and chemistry equipment. It all smells… actually, really bad? Like bread, but also poison… The contest is being held in Ryugu Mergyo this year if this flyer is any indication, and there’s a staple hole in the top, like there was a file or something at some point… and on the back, there’s a note that reads ‘Remember to take daily regimen!’ . Hm, I didn’t know that there’s a cash prize of… 112,833,000 beri? Do the conversions, and thats- woah, a million dola?! …Now that’s a motive if I’ve ever seen one…

Added to Evidence: Contest Flyer.

A contest held every year where if you win you get a million dola? That has to be a clue!

There’s also a folder full of registration information, but it’s not written for a contestant… a schedule, notes about speeches to give- oh, I see.

Added to Evidence: Judge Registration File.

The futons are pressed into the back corner of the room, where a crossbreeze draws air out towards the room, not to this corner. There’s a stack of receipts in a clear zip-pouch next to the neat bed; I take a picture, and then I take the pouch.

Added to Evidence: Picture of the Two futons.

Added to Evidence: Pouch of Receipts.

The bathroom door is locked; I can’t check it. I can smell the scent of diarrhea farts from here, though… The balcony, however, isn’t locked- and I find something very odd indeed. There’s a strange, slimy splatter-trail, with odd black and white feathers stuck into it; I take a sample, and a picture of the above balcony, where the slime trail originates.

Added to Evidence: Sample of ‘Weird Slime’.

Added to Evidence: Odd Black and White Feathers.

Added to Evidence: Picture of S3:F3 Balcony.
“Portgas, you’re intruding,” sang- Oh for th’god’s sake.

“Sue Yiu, w-w-what the hell?” I trilled.

“-I’m trying to have a bath-” sang Sue.

“-at the scene of a murder!?!?” I squeaked, indignant.

“Portgas, the baths here are all shared.” sighed Sue.

“Oh. Sorry-” I said.

“Either way, I’m still quite naked, so- GOODBYE OR FACE MY WRATH!!” shouted Sue.

“RIGHT! Sorry, sorry, I’m going- sorry!” I yelped, before running out of the crime scene.

Investigation End!

Shit, I wasn’t able to find much more than bits and pieces…

---

February 4th

Chihiro Town Detention Center; Cell Block A, Cell 7

Back to the Detention Center with a very serious Aster in tow; maybe Mab will have some ideas about what I’ve found?

“Hey, Tilly- back from the grind?” Mab said.

“Yep. I found a few things that I’d like your opinion on, if you don’t mind,” I said.

“Sure, anything to help,” Mab said.

Presented: “The overpowering scent of bitter almonds in S3:2F”

“Did you smell anything weird when you went by Suite Three?” I said.

“Mm, no, nothing I can think of really- although, I’m sure Sanji did,” Mab said.

“What makes you say that?” I said.

“Well, he sneezed; he only does that when he’s come across a particularly overwhelming scent. He’s a chef, y’know?” Mab said.

“Interesting; any idea where he is, right now?” I said.

“Um, knowing him? He’s either petitioning the guards here for a conjugal visit, or chain smoking downwind of the Sento,” Mab said with a soft smile in her eyes.

Presented: S3:F2 Layout Drawing

“Ah, that’s interesting- our suite was laid out the exact same,” Mab said.

“And you had access to the shared bathing pool?” I said.

“Oh, sure, everyone in the second floor wings does-” Mab said.

“Eeh, wings?” Aster said.

“Ah, yes- I suppose it’s really Wing Three, Suite Three, Second Floor?” Mab said.

“Hang on, if it’s the second floor, why can you enter without using a lift or taking the stairs? -and how many wings are there?” Aster said.

“Oh, that’s just the Sento- the first floor is actually the basement, with subfloors being a bit removed and below; the second floor is really the first floor,” Mab said.

“I see...” Aster said.

“And how many wings are there?” I said.

“Oh, just the three- Sanji and I were across from Wing Two, Suite Five, if that helps any,” Mab said.

“It very well might,” I said.

Presented: Picture of Tatami-room Table

“?!?” squawked Mab.

“What is it?” I said.

“...They ate it?” said Mab, wonderingly.

“Ate what?” I said.

“Whatever was on that empty plate with the crumbs- even bad bakers have tastebuds, after all. Whatever was on that plate, none of the family baked it; if they had, there’d be most of it leftover!” said Mab.

“I see...” I said.

Presented: Picture of Tarnished Silver Teapot
“Oh, now that’s interesting...” said Mab.

“What?” I said.

“Silver is reactive to sulfur on contact; if there’s any sulfur present in whatever the silver piece is touching, it tarnishes,” said Mab.

“...you know that how, exactly?” I said.

“Y’all forgot for a little minute Mom trained me as a silversmith,” said Mab, eyebrow raised over the frame of her glasses.

“-oh yeah, she did. Do you know why this tarnished, then?” I said.

“Did you smell sulfur? Or rotten eggs?” said Mab.

“Not really...” I said.

“Then I’ve got no idea- usually, it would tarnish like that because there’s sulfur in the tea-water or the tea. Some people think it has health benefits,” said Mab, shrugging.

Presented: Sample of Liquid Tea

“Hm. Looks like regular tea to me,” said Mab.

“It came from the tarnished teapot,” I said.

“Be careful with it, then- anything that tarnishes silver has sulfur in it, and sulfur often indicates the presence of arsenic,” said Mab.

“Hm...” I said.

Presented: Contest Flyer

“Oh yeah, I forgot that was here this year- I should mention it to Sanji, see if he thinks Deb should enter...” said Mab.

“Deb?” I said.

“Oh! Deborah is Sanji’s apprentice; she’s a bad baker too. Right now, Sanji’s trying to see if he can figure out how to help her, because she wants to bake-” said Mab, about to go on a tangent.

“So, no connection to your case?” I said before she could get going.

“None I can see, sorry,” said Mab, distracted from her tangent.

“It’s fine,” I said, smiling.

Presented: Judge Registration File

“Ah, so these are them- Aloo and Apple Coffyn?” said Mab.
“I think so- and… oh, there’s a regular contestant’s application here too, for a ‘Mince Coffyn’,” I said.

“Mm. That’s probably their son; I can’t tell you personal details beyond this, I’m afraid. Mince Coffyn can only bake with batters- meaning, pancakes, griddle cakes, drop cookies, and so on,” said Mab.

“Eh? I thought bad bakers couldn’t bake at all-” said Aster.

“No, check the flyer- there are categories of bad baking, see? If you look at Mr. Coffyn’s application again, you’ll see he’d signed up for everything excepting batters; while his parents, of course, were only judging batters to prevent accusations of nepotism,” said Mab.

“-Oh! So they have… interesting…” said Aster.

Presented: Picture of the Two Futons

“Ah, wao. So, one of those people was very different from the others- at a guess, I’d say the son,” said Mab.

“What makes you say that?” I said.

“Well, it’s two things, really- firstly, their son is about the same age as Deb, so… fourteen? -yeah, he’s about the right age for an apprenticeship, I’d say. There should be a notation about his age on the contestant application... Secondly, look at the beds themselves; one futon is almost haphazardly arranged, while the other is fairly neat and tidy by comparison,” said Mab.

“That matters?” I said.

“Listen, Tilly. I can’t tell you anything about the actual content of mine and the Coffyn’s correspondence, but I can make generalizations. The adult Coffyn’s weren’t terribly organized; that’s part of why they were such terrible bakers. Their son, whom they gushed about in every letter after the first formal few, was very organized as part of his teenage rebellion- and so, his baking reacted more… chaotically. The adult Coffyn’s merely made terrible food; their son makes dreadbread. Further, look at what’s right near the bed- the messy one has a glasses case, some hair curlers, a strip of condoms, and a bottle of lube. The neater one only has a box of tissues, an earplug case, a broken camera strap, and a bottle of lube- meaning, to my eye, that the messy bed had two people in it, while the neat bed only had one,” said Mab.

Wait, a camera strap? But we didn’t find a camera, whole or broken…

“…wait, are you saying the parents had sex next to their son, and the son masturbated with his parents right there?” said Aster.

“Honestly, it wouldn’t surprise me at all. The Coffyn family were expats from Fairisle living in Ryugu Mergyo for years before they had their son; they probably adopted a lot of the local culture to fit in, and ended up raising their son in the local fashion too. Space being at a premium for most of this country’s history, a deeply ingrained culture of politeness and face isn’t that surprising,” said Mab, shrugging.

“So… you’re saying that if the parents or the son did, neither would ever say anything about it?” said Aster, horribly confused and embarrassed.
“I am, yes,” said Mab, shamelessly.

Presented: Pouch of Receipts

“Ah, I’m not sure how much help I can be, here- hmm?” said Mab.

“What is it?” I said.

“Well, right there- a receipt for a tube of pictographer’s cyanide solution. It’s a common component of insta-print pictography cameras, and needs to be replaced every so often. And the other, it’s a receipt for Arsenic Acid, which is commonly used to treat certain nerve disorders. Either one could be the poison used on the Coffyn’s, I’m afraid- although, considering that all sales have to be registered in the store, it’d be fairly easy to find out who bought what,” said Mab.

“Do you know the symptoms of the poisons?” I said.

“Ah, sure- arsenic poisoning looks like food poisoning, or a particularly nasty round of cholera. It can go on for months before the final dosage is administered. Cyanide is much, much faster; a lethal dosage kills within the day,” said Mab.

“Should I be concerned?” I said.

“Well- Aster, can you smell any rotten eggs or bitter almonds on Tilly?” said Mab.

“-uh, no,” said Aster.

“Tilly, did you touch anything with your bare skin, or get anything on your clothing?” said Mab.

“Hell no, I used the standard decon procedure, same as always when poison is suspected,” I said.

“Then you should be fine; I’d recommend taking a thorough soak after you decontaminate, deep conditioning your hair, and changing clothing as soon as possible, though,” said Mab.

“Hm- Tilly, Court starts in the evening this case; we should have plenty of time to bathe, and I can pop back to your place and get your other work clothing...” mused Aster.

“-Yeah, that’s probably for the best, Aster. Thank you,” I sighed.

Presented: Sample of ‘Weird Slime’

“Uh- this used to be a slime?” I said.

“Oh. It’s male ejaculate, then,” said Mab.

“What,” I said.

“Mm! Male ejaculate- did it smell bleachy?” said Mab.

“Yeah, now that I think about it...” I said.

“Mhm. Male ejaculate comes out in an emulsion, but rapidly decays into a fluid; and because of its alkaline nature, smells like bleach. You’ll have to get it tested to see who's ejaculate that is, though,” said Mab.

“O-okay...” I squeaked.

“Although, I suppose it could be another kind of emulsion tainted with bleach, but it’s much simpler to consider it-” said Mab.

“I g-got it, thank you!” I squeaked.

Presented: Odd Black and White Feathers

“Oh, Taffy must have started molting-” said Mab.

“You know who these belong to?” I said.

“Sure; those are Dracule Taffeta’s molt feathers. She and Gurry were in Suite Three, on the Third Floor, as I recall,” said Mab.

“-Oh! So their suite is right above the Coffyn’s?” said Aster.

“Yup,” said Mab.

Hm. Not much new was learned; then again, maybe something was revealed anyway...

Mab knows Sanji better than anyone other than herself; if she says he sneezed at an overwhelming scent, I believe her.

All the rooms on the scene’s side are laid out the same, and I can make an inference that all the rooms in that wing are laid out the same, unless they have a specific name attached to them.

Whatever baked good was on the table at the time of the crime, the adult Coffyn’s ate all of it, and found it tasty enough to leave only crumbs behind.

The teapot tarnished because of silver’s reactivity to sulfur, which is often an indication of arsenic.

The World’s Worst Baker’s contest has a million dola prize, which is a motive for someone to kill; however, Mab lacks that particular motive as she can bake, and had the Coffyns as customers.

Mince Coffyn, the son, can only bake with batter; anything else goes wrong.

Mince Coffyn also kept the receipts for the family, as he was the most organized.

A camera is missing.

Arsenic is characterized by a smell of rotten eggs; cyanide is characterized by a smell of bitter almonds.

Dracule Taffeta and Gurry were in the suite above the scene, and… probably having sex on the balcony?

Taffy is molting, as well.
So what can I infer from these facts?

Sanji smelled something when he and Mab walked past Suite Three, something strong and distinct enough that he sneezed.

The only ways in and out of the suites on floor two of that wing are through the suite door, and through the bathing area.

No Coffyn baked whatever baked good was on the table at teatime; none of them would have been able to do it.

One of the Coffyns bought a Cyanide-solution tube for an insta-print camera; one of the Coffyns bought Arsenic Acid.

Although a tube of cyanide-solution for an insta-print camera was purchased, no camera was found at the scene; and I only have a picture of the camera strap.

The room stank of bitter almonds; was it cyanide?

The teapot had some kind of sulfurous substance inside it, as the silver on the spout tarnished.

Mab had no motive to kill the Coffyns, and if she had, would not have used poison or left behind bodies to find.

Dracule Taffeta and Gurry were in the suite above the scene; it’s possible they noticed something.

It’s definitely spring.

---

February 4th

Chihiro Town Train Stop, between the DC and the Sento

Urgh; I’m not going to learn anything else on an empty stomach. Check these receipts again- yeah, I thought so. The poisons were bought at Daiso; c’mon, Aster.

“Tilly?” said Aster.

“We need to go to Daiso. Not only do we need breakfast- we need to check up on who bought these poisons, too,” I said.

“We should shower first- and I actually need to bathe too, so: I called the guys while you were investigating. Ren’s going to get your suit from the cleaners, and he’s- ah, there he is; Sage’s going to be here within the hour, and he’s already started researching local laws and precedents for you, as well as bullying a case history out of the cops. Mr. Coffyn is in holding; he’s not currently under suspicion, but… Tilly, if you get your sister out of this within the day, he’s going to be next on the chopping block. You know how zealous the Court is for quick resolutions,” said Aster.
“If it comes to that, I’ll defend him too. Ren! Over here!” I said.

“Boss! Sorry to keep you waiting; I grabbed your suit from the cleaners, and your spares; I got underwear and brassieres from your drawers— they’re all in this case, along with your toiletries. Your pocket book is here; and Sancho’s weekend bag from your hall closet, as well as the spare vestments he keeps in your coat closet are all in this duffle, as his weekend bag was too small. Your house is locked up; I made sure the stove wasn’t on, your fridge was closed, and I notified your housekeeper that you’re out of the country on a case- ugh, you both stink like bitter almonds,” said Ren.

Ren Combag’again started out as my paralegal, but quickly became disillusioned with the whole world of Law and Order. He’s got almost no taste for Court proceedings— however, he didn’t want to leave me, or stop working for me. He’s my personal assistant, now; I ask him to do things, or rather, Aster asks him to do things for me, and he frequently goes above and beyond my expectations.

“Ren, you’re a godsblessed treasure; take my bank card and buy us all breakfast. Sancho and I are going to scrub down, get rooms for while we’re here, and change; you’re still legally a member of Law Enforcement, right?” I said.

“Yeah, Boss,” Ren said.

“Good. I’m putting the evidence in your care, then; be careful with all of it. Not just for the usual reasons; this case was a poisoning,” I said.

“Got it, Boss!” Ren said.

“Right; we’ll meet you at the Daiso nearby,” I said.

Then I carefully exchange our bag of evidence for my own things; and then Sancho and I are back to the Sento.

________________________

February 4th

Sento Chihiro

I- huh, it’s the Maid again. Let’s try getting her name, this time-

“Hello, miss-” I said.

“Oh no-! I answered all your questions already!” the Maid snapped.

“Sorry, sorry- I’ve got two more for you, actually,” I said.
“Uuuugh. Fine, what is it?” the Maid grumbled.

“Firstly- what’s your name? Secondly- how much is it for a bath and a room here? Cases always take three days max, and I’d rather not sleep in a hostel...” I said.

“Oh! Oh, um. My name is Kayumi Polleen; and baths at their cheapest are four hundred ten beri, and that’s for everything you’d get at a local sento- locker use, clean towels, basic toiletries, and clothing washes. Not to be morbid, but- why do a pair of lawyers need to use a sento?” said Kayumi.

“I see. There’s a fairly good chance both my partner and I have been exposed to very powerful poisons; is there a way to… actually, what I need is a pair of non-permeable garment bags. Would you need to charge for that, or...?” I said.

“Uh- let me check something… hm. It’s a small fee of a hundred beri per bag; and the four ten is the individual flat rate; is that okay?” said Kayumi.

“That’s fine, yes- and a room?” I said.

“Uh- the Third Wing is closed and the WWB contest is next week, so rooms are at a premium right now, even with so many leafing... I have a small single available in the First Wing, but, um, it’s meant for newlyweds? So, there’s only one bud available in it; I can get you a cotton, I suppose, but… I really- Lilac the authority to search for anything nicer, I’m afraid… It’s fifteen hundred beri for each night, so three nights is forty five thousand- is that alright?” said Kayumi.

“...Does it have a bed, a toilet, and locking doors?” I said, thinking it over.

“Yes,” said Kayumi.

“Can I actually rent it for the next three days?” I said.

“The next three daisies? Let me check… yes, that should be fine,” said Kayumi.

“In that case, we’ll take it,” I said.

“Um. Bouquet, I’ll just need your bank card or- ah, sure, cash is fine… and this is- right, your bath tokens. For another hundred beri, I can give you two for each day you’re staying with us?” said Kayumi, rapidly writing something in a ledger...

“Here,” I said.

“Thank you! I just need your names, please-” said Kayumi.

“My name is Portgas D. Tigerlily Orlaith,” I said.

“I’m Aster Mistburrow- no, burrow like a bunny, yeah, there ya go-” said Aster.

“And I have one more question for you after this,” I said

“You’re registered for today, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh; check out is at five of the clock, promptly- and, um… I guess I can answer that?” said Kayumi.

“Okay; thank you,” I said.

“Here’s your tokens, six for each of you; here’s your room keys- oh, and your room number and floral all on the key fob; relax, and enjoy your stay with us! And um… what’s your question, “exactly?” said Kayumi.

“...Thank you, we’ll see what happens. -my question is this: Are the Coffyn’s registration records available?” I said.

“Um… let me check- yeah, they are. I can’t let you take the ledger, though...” said Kayumi.

“That’s fine- can I take a picture?” I said.

“Um, sure? Yeah, that’s fine- here!” said Kayumi.

“Thank you,” I said, taking an insta-print picture.

Added to Evidence: Picture of Sento Logbook.

I look over at Aster, who shrugs. I look back at Kayumi Polleen, take the non-permeable garment bags, and then we walk off to take our baths.

I’m used to onsen, now that Gabby’s built her own house, finally- she built it to take advantage of her Devil’s Fate, really. Anyway, onsen and sento are basically the same thing, except onsen source their water from natural springs, and sento are just heated water from the tap, basically. Etiquette is about the same Worldwide, though.

First of all, there’s a genkan, or a traditional entrance hall in the local style- this one’s actually much larger, and is meant for you to put all your clothes away in a locker, not just your shoes. Enter the non-permeable garment bags; Ren and Mab were both concerned about gaseous agents. Well, really, Mab was concerned; and Ren, who hadn’t been exposed to the crime scene, said we both stank of bitter almonds.

That’s a clue if I’ve ever heard one.

Anyway; right inside the door to the bathing facilities, there’s an attendant whose only job is to take bath tokens. They’re silver in color, and they look like coins; and I see, when I go up to the desk to hand my token over, that there’s a whole array of shapes, presumably for different levels of bath. We get handed tickets for our lockers, and offered small complimentary bags of toiletries- which we both end up taking, because it’s free and I don’t think I repacked my toothbrush or toothpaste anyway...

After paying, Aster and I go to the changing area and take all our clothes off, and pack them away in the non-permeable garment bags. I take a moment to put the ‘EVIDENCE’ stickers over the seal on each garment bag, and then put them both in my locker, before locking it securely and putting the key around my wrist. Aster puts our bags in his locker, after fishing out our toiletry bags from both our luggages.

Although the entrances and washing areas of a sento and onsen are segregated, the actual bathing or, really, soaking area, kind of… isn’t? At least, not in Ryugu Mergyo, it’s fairly famous for it. The doors are always marked, either way; I go through to the women’s side, put my toiletries in a handy basket along with a wash towel, and pick one of the least desirable showers- in this case, right next to the wall.

Before I start, I wave the attendant over, and explain who I am and what I’m about to do- or is there somewhere they’d prefer I bathe?

As it turns out, there is. I walk behind a tiled corner I wouldn’t have noticed on my own, and- Aster!
Also being led by an attendant! They take us to- oh wow. It’s a whole decontamination area; and it’s not meant for public viewing at all, you can tell by the stark blandness of everything. The attendants turn the showers on, and hot steamy air blocks my view of Aster.

Aster and I set to scrubbing, and at first I don’t notice anything different; and then I see the water running down the drain is thick and ugly blackness, spotted with splodges of green and pink. I wash, and scrub, and scrub, and wash; I wash my hair and my face, and continue down until I’m rinsing my feet- and then I do it again, again, again, until the water is finally running clear underneath me. I condition my hair, trim my body hair, and brush my teeth before rinsing in cool water collected in a clean blue bucket just outside the spray.

Finally, I’m done. I don’t have time for a soak right now, and neither does Sancho- however, I am ready to face the day. I signal I’m done with the shower, and dry my hair before wiping everything down and walking back to the changing area.

I get there, wipe down again, and use a dryer for my hair. Then, I put it back up in the customary buns, and put on my clean suit; no wrinkles, no mess. No substitutions. I even put the hair bells at the base of each bun, for formalities sake. Last thing to go on is my badge, then my socks and shoes- and that’s it, I’m done.

Aster is as well; and he looks the same as he always does.

Off to the Daiso to meet up with Ren, get some more answers, and eat breakfast, finally- but first…

“Aster; I need you to take our things to our room,” I said.

“Sure, Tilly. Go on to the Daiso, and I’ll meet you there- and remember your key and our new evidence!” said Aster.

“Oh- shit, right, thank you,” I said.

Added to Evidence: Contaminated Clothing

I go out into the dawn’s light; my hair chimes softly with each assured step, and the light of spring is warm on my face. It’s going to be a beautiful day; shame I have to spend it on a murder.

The nearby Daiso is so old it’s got real wood and stone making it’s construction; it’s a real building, with actual interesting architecture. Ren waves me over from the entrance, and hands back the satchel of our evidence; I add the Contaminated Clothing to the bag, and then we both go and sit at one of the patio tables to eat breakfast.

I’m filling him in on the case when Aster arrives and bolts his breakfast down.

“-and that’s about the shape of things. Any thoughts before we move forwards?” I said, as Aster slurped his ramen.

“Several, actually. Firstly; if Missus Morgan knows her husband well enough to know why he’d sneeze, does the Mister know her the same way? I think it’s vital we find him, and get his take on things. Secondly; just how easy or not easy is it to pick, or otherwise spoof the outer and inner locks of the suite? Thirdly; what was the baked good on the table at the time of the crime? Where did it come from? Who made it? Fourthly; where is the camera that the cyanide-solution tube belongs to, and for that matter, the cyanide-solution tube? Fifthly; did any of the Coffyns have a nerve disorder? And if not, why did they have arsenic acid? Sixthly; we need to get empirical evidence that the smell in the room is from cyanide, or find whatever is off-gassing the smell. Seven; we need to get the tea sample tested for any toxins, poisons, and what have you. Eight; based on past evidence, Mab Morgan- when she murders- does not leave whole bodies behind, nor does she use poison. Further, she has no real motive for this crime- the Coffyns were her customers, and they liked each other well enough to keep a serious correspondence with each other. Nine; Dracule- and I got the list of people under suspicion for this case; Gurry is actually Marguerite Gloriosa Amaryllis Lefay. Dracule and Lefay might have seen or heard something; they need to be found, interviewed, and possibly called to the stand. Ten: the time of year may in fact be significant. Imbolc is the holiday by which old is thrown out, and new is ushered in; I think Aster needs to feel the vibe of the scene before it's further disturbed, and check for residual mystical energies. Eleventh, and finally: Why did the Coffyn’s decide to stay in a hotel for nine months instead of renting an apartment or purchasing a house?,” said Ren.

There’s a reason I kept him in my employ, beyond his genuine usefulness.

“Right; Aster, you’re checking out the suite’s security, along with checking for mystical energies. Ren, I need you to get in touch with Sage; tell him we need the Coffyn’s medical records, their financial records, and their travel log; I also need you to get some of the evidence tested. I will be checking these receipts, talking to Mister Sanji, and talking to Dracule and Lefay- as well as mulling over that final question. I’ve got one of those funny feelings in my fang-teeth; I think the answer to that one is going to be a doozy,” I said.

“Roger-roger, Boss Tilly,” said Aster, before he moseyed off, back to the Sento.

“Give me the evidence; oh, and here’s your phone, boss, I almost forgot-” said Ren, handing me my phone in exchange for the evidence I wanted him to check.

I left Ren as he began to rattle off what we needed to Sage- oh! Sage Nowage is my paralegal. He started out as my PA, but we both quickly realized that he is entirely the wrong kind of person to be doing that sort of thing. He’s not quite personable enough to be a full-on lawyer, and he just doesn’t have the ambition, either- but, in terms of being liked by librarians and finding information, no one can match him.

He knows to fax me all pertinent documents; and, my phone is rigged such that it wirelessly transmits the information to the micro-machine in my briefcase, which is on my back right now. Thank the gods for crossbody straps…

---

February 4th

Daiso ; Pharmacy Counter
“IRASSHAI! Welcome to Daiso; we’ve got shit you need for days, yo!” shouts a Demon boy dressed… not professionally.

“YOU DAMN BARTOK, GET OUT OF MY STORE-” bellows a much more formally dressed Demon man.

“HAHAHAHA-” cackles the Demon boy- Bartok?- who bursts past me right as I go to open the door to the Daiso.

Okay. So, that just happened- a Demon about my size and half my maturity just shouted a mangled version of the Daiso greeting before being run off by… I guess the franchise owner?

“Um, hello?” I said.

“Irasshai! Welcome to Daiso; we’ve got what you need, and our prices are low! How can I help you?” says the Demon man.

“My name is Portgas D. Tigerlily, but everyone calls me Tilly- and I’m a lawyer. I need to know-” I said before the Demon man cut me off.

“OH MY GOODNESS, YOU’RE A PORTGAS? COME IN, COME IN, A PORTGAS IN MY SHOP-” squealed the Demon man.

Godsdammit, Asher.

“Um, sir, I really-” I said.

“Please, tell me what you need- Goodness, you look like a kitten rejected by it’s own mother. You are fatigued, no? Ah, this is what you need- an aromatic tincture of lavender and honey, to be inhaled when under stress. Saa, if I’d known a new Portgas was coming I’d have had our best meats out front and center-” babbled the Demon man.

“That’s very kind of you, but- urgh-” I said, before the stench of ammonia kicked the thoughts out of my head.

“Yes, yes- only the finest smelling salts sold at our little chemistry counter! I Oh, I’ll never get back a first impression- that damn Bartok boy, always getting into trouble ’round here-” said the Demon man.

“Excuse me, but-” I said.

“Oh, such a wonderful day this has become, another Portgas has chosen to grace my shop-” said the Demon man.

“Excuse me. I’m very sorry to be so rude, but I need to verify these receipts. I am currently investigating a murder, and could really use your help, Mister-,” I said- not loudly, but there’s more to a conversational interrupt than just volume.

“O-oh- y-yes, yes of course, my apologies,” said the Demon man, “My name is Hearb Kurree. I have the records you need right here, in the log book for the pharmacy- and the copier, you can use free of charge!” said Kurree.

“Thank you, that’s very kind of you,” I said.

“Um- I can’t have herb you correctly… you’re investigating a murder, you said? Lentil you’d mentioned it, I hadn’t thought anything of it...” said Kurree.

“Thought anything of what?” I said, as I made copies of the relevant pages in the log book with the relevant receipts included in the copy.

“Well, I’m not one to gossip, but… well, the Bad Baker’s boy, he’s been in and out of my shop for months, now, close to a year,” said Kurree.

“Oh?”

“Yes, the poor boy; you know, it’s not right to push children so hard, I’ve always known that. And his parents wouldn’t even let him take a part time job here, it’s not like I’m an unreasonable man- we could have scheduled around his training time, but… his parents insisted on Mithridatism, and he was so sick all the time… it’s only recently that he’s even started looking beyond the tip of his own nose, you know? He even started his old hobby of photography a few months back, and it must have been going well for him, as he recently had to get a refill for his instaprint camera with his parents usual order of Arsenic Acid… well, I’m just… are you sure he didn’t commit suicide?” said Kurree.

“-oh my. Um. No, the- Huldra-boy, always looks a tad harrassed?” I said.

“That’s the one, yes,” said Kurree, “Is he not the one who died? He’s been looking unwell for months, but I suppose if your parents insist on poisoning you to build up your tolerance, there’s not much to be done about it...”

“No, um. It’s his parents that are dead, not him,” I said, carefully clipping the copies together with a paper clip and considering this new information. Unless I can get evidence to support it, it’s just hearsay- but! It does provide… quite a lot of doubt, actually. Hm.

Oh dear, Mr. Kurree looks so… stricken. Sad, confused… hmmm.

The pot thickens.

“Mr. Kurree, if I need to call you to court, would you come?” I said.

“...well, it would be a bit of a loss to my shop… but for a Portgas, I curdn’t do anything less than be there when they had need of me! Of course- If you need me, call upon me!” said Kurree.

“Thank you, Mr. Kurree. I still have investigation to do- but, rest assured: if I have need of you, I will call upon you,” I said, before being crushed in a not-unpleasant but very unexpected and inescapable bear hug.

“Of course, Miss Portgas- and if there’s anything I can do for that poor boy, you let me know. Naan of the people I can think of who hang around that family like a passel of leeches are in any way the kind of people you need around when you’re grieving...” said Kurree.
“I- um. I will. Oh! I almost forgot to ask- the Bartok boy?” I said.

“Oh, sure; not to cast aspersions on another man’s method of raising his child, but Judge Bartok really needs to keep a firmer hold on that boy- or perhaps a lighter touch is needed? Certainly, the way he’s doing it now isn’t right at all, and what with him so busy, it’s a wonder that poor boy hasn’t gotten into worse trouble...” said Kurree.

“Sorry, Judge Bartok?” I said.

“Oh, of course- Chihiro Town looks quite large, right? In truth, it’s got a permanent residency of just about five thousand people and is run more like a country in it’s own right; and so far there’s only one judge, Judge Bartok. Everyone who doesn’t have a home address in Chihiro Town is a seasonal worker, or in charge of an event being held here in Chihiro Town- like those poor Bad Bakers...” said Kurree.

“I see. I’m guessing you’re a permanent resident of Chihiro Town?” I said.

“Born and raised for fifteen generations!” said Kurree.

“Then you might know- I’m looking for somewhere downwind of the Sento, where a smoker would go. Any ideas?” I said.

“Oh! You must be looking for that dapper Demon with the yellow hair and fine suit who came in around dawn? He bought enough tobacco to last most men a month, the same in smoke papers, and had his lighter refilled- I remember because it was such a lovely smoking set he had-” said Kurree.

“Yeah, his name’s Sanji; where did he go?” I said.

“Well, he had the same question as you did, most tourists who smoke do- he went to the Downside, as I recommended, I think. There’s a smoker’s lounge there called the Smuggler’s Den that every smoker goes to eventually, as it’s the only one in town; I’ll write out some directions for you. Oh- and is there anything I can interest you in before you go?” said Kurree.

I bought four ten beri grab-bags of candy for the boys- one for Aster, one for Ren, two for Sage; and an assorted packet of ground-meat jerky. Mmmhm. Oh, yeah, and a bag of wasabi peas because I know Mab’s going to like them and want something to munch on while she watches the proceedings... and the only thing I really know about what Mister Sanji likes to snack on is what I know about his food preferences, and that’s that he really loves fish... so.

Before I got apprenticed, I was a firm believer that grades mattered most- they don’t, not really, they’re just indications of how well you can jump through hoops and schmooze your teacher- but I was one of the only kids who went to Saturday tutoring (me tutoring other students) instead of the park. I mostly did half days, either the morning or the evening; and it actually did help me master a lot of subjects I would have only been good enough in, so I don’t count it as a waste of time. Anyway, I managed to keep myself awake through those sometimes dreary hours by eating seafood snacks. Dried up squid and withered mystery fish that hang out on racks in the open sunlight down near the docks, or wrapped up in pretty paper packages on the Daiso shelves- maybe an acquired taste, but, well, I like them! They’re flavorful and stealthy; no loud crackle or crunch to disrupt my student or alert the study monitor. Even now, a whiff is enough to boost my energy.

Shit, I might as well grab some for myself...

Hmm. They’ve got a lot of flavors here, and I don’t want to just impulsively buy them and then force myself to eat the rest of something I don’t actually want… kimchi flavor dried scallop gills, salted fish slices, almond and dried fish mix… hmm…

Honestly, for me, it all boils down to two choices: shredded squid, and dried fish. I consider myself a bit of an afishianado of seafood snacks; and while squid jerky is nice, the scent is often too powerful to eat it anywhere other than the comfort of your own study or at the beach proper. No one can actually eat a single serving of Calbee Jagariko, the crossbreed of salty potato chips and pencil fries is too strong. Almond fish are for drinking; Katto Yochan Ika is a children’s snack; Big Katsu is basically sin in a bright orange package. Calbee Kappa Ebisen- no, I don’t like shrimp. I don’t want scallop gills today, and I’m not eating corn…

Aha! Jane-jane’s Hot Prepared Shredded Squid!

Dried squid has long been integral to the cuisines of the coast, where it’s a popular method of preservation and concentrated flavorful delivery. It wasn’t until the nine-seventies that shredded squid became a popular snack in Fiddler’s Green.

It should be beige, and shredded into thin strips- a bit like a tangle of white chewing gum or torn up mozzarella, but that’s where all resemblance ends. Good squid snacks are on the chewy side of chew, but softer than beef jerky; sweet, spicy, salty, and extremely fish forward with a somewhat creamy finish.

Some brands veer towards the overwhelmingly sweet, the uncomfortably spicy, or even the exhaustingly dry. For a mild, rich flavor accompanied by a tender, chewy texture, I can find no fault in Jane-jane’s offerings. I’ve been a fan for years, and considering it’s enduring appeal, I have no fear of my fave-flav being discontinued.

Unlike their betenacled brothers, dried fish snacks aren’t typically used in cooking. You find them in similar packaging though; chewy, wrinkled up straw-strips that taste like sweet smoked fish-of-choice. That said, they’re not simply dehydrated fish with a little salt to get the taste of abject poverty out of your mouth; the meat is typically blended with spices and taro root, baked into thin sheets, and then shredded and packaged. Eaten plain, they’ve got a similar odor to bonito flakes, but flavored varieties carry notes of spices and hot peppers.

North Blue Fish Snacks are unequivocally superior to all other brands; they’ve got a balanced flavor with just enough sweetness to stand up to the salt, with a hint of spice to keep you reaching back for more.

And a bag of Sunflower seeds, just in case.

Then, it’s off to find a dapper Demon man…

February 4th
Chihiro Town Downside; Smuggler’s Den

Chihiro Town’s Upside is meant for tourists and damn rich people; Chihiro Town Downside is meant for locals, pirates, and ne’er do well’s. It smells somewhere between cat piss and ocean; reminds me of Kiriko Village, actually, the day after it rains. The Smuggler’s Den, for all it proposes to be a simple smoker’s lounge, reminds me in all the worst ways of my old part time job, back when I...

Let me tell you a story- not a fantastical one, or a thrilling chiller, but a simple story of how a nice young paralegal got out of her depth in a completely abnormal club, pub, and diner. That nice paralegal is me, by the way- and the completely abnormal dive is Silver Straw, my sister Ezra’s establishment.

It all started when I moved to Kiriko Village, which is where the SOL Academy is located. I had to travel up into the Bushwilds, past Pumpkin Hill to study the Law, and the crazy student lifestyle of doing nothing and going nowhere became very expensive and boring, so I had to get a job. I looked around town and came across Silver Straw, my sister’s hybrid monstrosity. She was hiring; I needed money; within the week I had a trial shift. I worked there for the rest of my time in SOL Academy, until I got a job with my actual firm.

The reason I can’t seem to fix on a descriptor for Silver Straw is because Ezra couldn’t quite decide what theme or aesthetic or even kind of business she was trying to run- and I don’t mean a ‘best of all possible worlds’ situation, it’s more of a… an engineered abomination that shouldn’t exist for several ethical and moral reasons. It’s a pub for most of the week; during the day-time, it’s a diner. And when the clock strikes nine on a Foolsday, Saturday, and Sunday night, the tables are pushed to one side; the lights are dimmed low; a student musician that may or may not be any good comes in to be Master of Ceremonies. All glasses are replaced by wooden and tin counterparts by ten pm, and it’s a three dola entry between eleven and twelve thirty; and it’s final call at two am, and everyone has to get out by four am.

Silver Straw had three managers, each with very different styles of management, and who never ever seemed to speak to each other or Ezra, the actual owner. Baz spends most of his shift sitting upstairs on the balcony, getting high on skunkweed brownies, and only saunters downstairs when he fancies a glass of milk. Keith is consistently whiny, extremely patronising, and just generally unpleasant. Sam, of course, is an edge so straight you could use him to measure the curve of the horizon. It would be impossible for me to choose my least favorite; and that’s not getting into the customers!

The Gov’nor was the first customer I ever had the misfortune to serve. I still wake up with his image in my mind when I get the cold sweats after a nightmare. He walked into Silver Straw and immediately captured the attention of all that were present, like an unremarked fart in a small elevator; deadly silence and overly polite horror. The Guv’nor was not a large man, but what he lacked in height, he made up for in sheer presence. He was clad in a thick brown fur coat, dark silk scarf covering everything except his smoked glasses, and a tall brown ushanka that was obviously once a bear, as it was in fact a bear’s head and face made into an ushanka. He came in with an attractive young woman on each arm, which was incredibly perplexing given that he was half their size and pushing ninety years old.

Now, to be fair, he kept to himself for most of the night, not causing any trouble- that is, until one rowdy young cuss got a bit too big for his boots. Let’s call the cuss Jackson, never liked that name- and our Jackson was throwing some very disrespectful insults towards the Guv’nor, mainly aimed at his ridiculous hat. Jacky was relentless, just kept going and going- I can only assume he had a death wish. Eventually, enough was enough and the lovely ladies at the Guv’nor’s side took action. They left Jackson a bloody unconscious mess under his table, and escorted themselves out; and the Guv’nor waved me over instead of following them.

It was like meeting my hero, Daun Elphame, and being told off by Mom, all in one go. He drew me in, closer and closer. And then he pointed towards Jackson and shouted “TELL THAT FOOKIN’ LI’L PISSBABY THE GOV’NOR SEND ‘IS REGARDS, AND TO KINDLY FOOK OFF!”

This scared me to death, of course, because I was not expecting anything like the quality of Voice I got from such a withered old man. I was in such a state of shock, that when I gathered my wits enough to, not unreasonably, ask what the fuck was even happening right now- the Guv’nor was gone. Maybe he had a previous engagement with his lady friends. Maybe he was being mature enough to leave before he had to kill a man for insulting his hat.

Maybe, just maybe, he was never actually there- just a ghost of a lawyer past, come down for a pint of cider with his paralegals. No one knows for sure.

Then there was Old Nick, so called because he’s the elder of the two men called Nick who come in regularly, and was a man who made everyone there terribly, terribly uncomfortable. Me especially, actually, now that I think on it. He had just turned seventy at the time, and looked out at the world through thick jam-jar spectacles, and had slightly too much saliva on his lips at all times.

My interactions, though minimal, were exactly the wrong kind of memorable.

The first time I ever interacted with Old Nick, it was as the bartender, and he and a young Nokken were loudly debating the benefits of hitting children. Old Nick was on the side of ‘hitting children teaches the spry bastards some godsbedamned respect’. As this was fairly early on in my career as a bartender- as in, maybe my third week working there- I was still too shy to interject and tell them both what utter nonsense they were saying. Children learn a multitude of things from their parents, but how to be afraid ought not be one of them.

I also witnessed him get very upset that a man he calls “Dan the Man” had started calling him “Nick the Dick”. He obviously wasn’t appreciating his ‘friendly’ moniker giving being reciprocated.

The most memorable- horribly, horribly memorable- moment with Old Nick, however, came on a Saturday night. He was predominantly a patron during the week, however on this occasion he’d stayed past the Transition hour and was aimlessly walking around harshing people’s mellow.

He was on what must have been his tenth Black Tonic Original 07, and he had stopped by the bar because I assume walking had become too difficult. Suddenly there was a small commotion between him and a much younger man, so I went to investigate. The man explained to me that Old Nick had made an inappropriate remark about him, and when he turned away, Old Nick slapped his ass. So, I called the bouncers over; they took him away, I dusted my hands of a job well done, and carried on miserably serving drinks.

Roughly ten minutes later I saw Old Nick sitting in the corner of the bar with his head in his hands. I asked the bouncer why he hadn’t been thrown out for sexual harassment, and the bouncer explained to me that he is a regular, so he gave him a second chance- so long as he stayed on the other side of the room. I approached Old Nick and I could see that he was crying his eyes out.

At this point, I want you to stop and think about what you’d do in that situation. You’re in a pseudo-nightclub, music blaring, people between twenty five an’ forty years dancing and all but fucking around you, and you’re staring at a seventy year old man who’s been naught but a public asshole and nuisance for as long as you’ve known him, an’ he’s crying his eyes out after being reprimanded for an objectively inappropriate action. What do you do?

I couldn’t decide if he was crying out of regret, or crying because he got told off. In his mind- in the brains of Old Nick- did he honestly think that this young man would enjoy a butt touch so much that he would turn around and speak to him all night? Surely not? -so, Why do it?

All I could do was ask “Are you alright?” to which I got an answer I couldn’t hear or understand… so, I just left him to it. I told the bouncer to call him a cab if it got worse and went back to trying to ignore the fact he was there.

Finally, of the strangers that have true stories attached to them that I, perhaps unwillingly, learned- there’s One Punch Will.

As busy as the weekends got, the evenings during the week are stone dead. I would have more to do in the graveyard shifts than I ever would on a Monday night at Silver Straw. That time did allow me to get to know the very few locals that came in.

Will’s an interesting man. About five-foot eight, stocky like a Spangle-Batter, with a jarring baby face. Stylish, too, he has one of those nice cuts where it’s shaved all round the sides leaving only a careful souffle of hair balanced across the crown of his head. He’s also one of the only people I’ve ever seen that actually wears a rat-nibbled hoodie as a fashion statement, so he’s not without problems.

So I got chatting with Will, and he told me that he was in the middle of a big legal battle, because he had accidentally knocked his girlfriend out, whilst "defending himself.” This came as a big shock as he seemed simply too nice to be capable of something so despicable, but what came as a bigger shock was his attitude towards the whole thing. Will said he was facing up to six months in prison, but he could not care less. He told me that he has several mates in prison, and he’d be glad to see them, plus it would be more like twelve weeks with good behaviour.

The next shock came when he said that he is legally not allowed to see his girlfriend (now ex-girlfriend) anymore, but they have been arranging steamy hook-ups in hotels via snailphone, so she must’ve gotten over the whole knocking out thing fairly quickly. The most amusing part was that the girlfriend's housemate's boyfriend is also in prison, and Will seemed chuffed that they could carpool when they'd be coming to visit.

I’d go on, but I’ve just spotted Sanji.

I’ve seen Sanji in swim trunks- so I know he’s got more hair on his entire body than some men ever get on their heads. You’d never know that from just looking at him with clothes on; he said once at a family meal that all his knuckle hair got burnt of as a boy and simply never grew back, and it’s not like he doesn’t shave...

He’s a nice man, a good man; loves Mab, and she him, so his less savory habits can be brushed off as simple quirks.

He’s got two full ashtrays, and a cigarette in his mouth that’s steadily wisping to ash as he breathes in the noxious fumes. A samovar of hot black coffee is on the table too, and from the looks of things he’s been nursing the pot for hours.

I walk over to him, my steps just slightly louder than the silence of the lounge.

I sit across from him, and wait.

Sanji blinks, ashes his cigarette, and scrubs a hand against his eyes and brow before looking me dead in the eyes.

“Hello, Sanji,” I said.

“Fuck. Hello, tiny-asshole; fuck, Tilly, your name is Tilly. I fucking guess you’re the asshole who’s protecting Mab, right?” said Sanji.

“Yeah, I’m her defence lawyer. You mind if I ask a few questions?” I said.

“When I questioned Mab, she mentioned you sneezed in response to a powerful scent. Can you elaborate on that please?” I sang, softly.

“Sure, I can tell you why I sneezed,” sang Sanji, “I smelled an overpowering amount of bitter almond, if you can believe.”

“And that was where, exactly?” I said, carefully making note of his preliminary testimony on my Evidental Notepad.

Added to Evidence: Chef Sanji smelled an overwhelming scent of bitter almonds.

“Just outside the door of Suite Three on the Second Floor of Wing Three. I even remember the time- we were going out to get something to eat for Tea, because I sneezed so hard I bit my tongue and couldn’t really enjoy my oolong...” said Sanji.

“Ouch! -I’m probably going to have to call you to Court. Will you come?” I said.

“Sure, Tilly,” said Sanji.

“Hey- it’s going to be okay. I’m one of the best at what I do; and I’d never let them execute my sister for something she didn’t do,” I sang.

“I know you are, and I know to believe you- but I still can’t help but worry; I don’t know if that’s really true...” sang Sanji.

“Oh- and d’you have any idea where to find Taffy and Gurry?” I said.

“Uh... at this time of day? Check the Park, actually- you’ll want the area with the best light,” said Sanji, carefully lighting his next cigarette.

“Thanks- oh, and I got these for you,” I said, handing him about half the snacks I got at Daiso- including the semechki.

For the first time that day, I saw my brother-in-law smile. I smiled back, and nodded, and then I went off to find Taffy and Gurry.
February 4th

Chihiro Town Central Parkade

It started snowing while I was in the Den; and as I climb up from the Downside and enter the Central Parkade, I’m struck by a strange dichotomy. This town is… basically a microcosm of my own home island, Fiddler’s Green. There’s a city that’s old- or pretending hard enough it’s old that the truth doesn’t matter, but clean and serene seeming; and there’s a city that’s truly old, and grimy, it’s chaotic nature bare for all to see. And here, in the Park… the wildness that runs beneath it all, an alien order that from outside is only chaos- and from within, the most perfect of orders. The contrast between the Park and the City is… stunning.

To start with, almost no road or street in any Fairisle city looks straight from the ground. Further, due to certain mandates and laws, there is never, ever any stretch of unbroken buildings larger than half a block. This city is different; they built, and built, and overbuilt, until at last the road which stretches out straight and cruel before me is the only line between the city and the countryside. It’s strange, and jarring - and this is a manicured country I’m walking through, no wild in it to speak of. The snow is too white, next to the grimy slush in the gutters; the crystals too pristine.

For a moment, I’m struck breathless by the realization that I am in a Realm of Humans. Clear boundaries between what is Nature and what is Made; seeking to organize that which was already organized. Fae cities seem to bloom out of the land around them; buildings growing on trees like branches or leaves, stones piled into houses, trails and paths made by wild creatures only just beginning to be paved…

This place is strange- but it is… heartening, to find, even here so far from my home that the people have not forgotten that green is the color of all creation, and that from which it’s loveliness arises.

I walk through the snowy park, admiring the cold world I’ve found myself in- and then I come to find a Painter and his Muse sitting by a waterfall. He’s painting her in the full spring sun, and… hm.

I know a thing or two about painting, being Del’s sister and all. Painting that particular muse would be tricky as hell; she’s all dark shadows and sharp lines, highlighted with black and grey and silver. The only spot of color on her is the red of her mouth, and it’s a pale, pink sort of color- easily made too lavender. Her eyes are the sharp gold of a wild fox, and her hair is black as midnight. Her environment is all blue, which does and doesn’t help- the silver is cold-toned, the silver of her chemise, I mean- but…

“-no, Taff, I had a mania for drawing the shapes of things from the age of about four or so. When I was ten, I’d made a whole universe of designs- but really, everything I do before I’m seventy won’t really be worth bothering with. At seventy-five, gods willing, I’ll have managed to cram something of the pattern of nature- animals, plants, trees, birds, fish, insects, stones and stars- into th’ole dome-plate. When I’m eighty, I might even begin to make real progress. Ninety? I’ll have found maybe a sliver of the Truth of the World. I’ll be a hundred before I’m good; and a hundred and ten before I can truly create anything new. One day, I’ll be an old, old man- as crazy about drawing and painting as I’ve ever been,” said the Painter.

“If we both live that long, will you still paint me, Marguerite Lefay?” said the Muse.

“...Dracule Taffeta, I’ll be painting pictures of you on the day I die,” said Lefay.

“Hm. Is that right?” said Dracule.

“Oh yeah- that’s right,” said Lefay, salacious and sly.

“Heeheehee. I think it’s time for a break, Gurry. You’ve been painting for hours, now; and I’d like to warm up, just a bit...” said Dracule, a drab of sultry swagger in her voice.

“Hm- light’s almost gone anyway, might as well just pack up and go on back to th’- oh, hello? Can I help you?” said Lefay.

“Ah, sorry to eavesdrop; my name is Portgas D. Tigerlily, y’all can call me Tilly. I’m the Defence Lawyer for Mab Morgan?” I said.

“Ah!” said Lefay.

“Oh, yis, makes sense,” said Dracule.

“Would you mind terribly answering a few questions I have? I need to- um,” I said, before stopping and staring at the painting.

“Heh, yis, I have the same reaction,” said Dracule, laughter in her nasal voice.

“Uh- w-would you, ah, like to sit? I, um- oh, it’s not f-finished, I’m not v-very-” stuttered a blushing Lefay.

“You painted this?” I asked, wonderingly.

“Uh. Yeah, yeah, um- I, er,” mumbled Lefay.

“What were you doing yesterday?” I said, shaking myself back to the matter at hand.

“We went shopping, yis. Gurry bought a whole bunch of brushes-” said Dracule.

“Brushes,” said Lefay, “Yes, ‘twas then I took a sharp left away from Taffy and wandered deep into the aisles filled with all kinds of bristles, both the short-handled variety for fine work and the longer-handled type for blocking. My brush collection had always been made up of whatever I could make, buy on sale, or got gifted- which means I’ve always had an eclectic mish-mash of all kinds of brushes, which I tend to treat like they’re made of solid gold and infinitely more precious. Such a bounty of choice- I could not bear to leave without testing each as they came to my attention, and by the time I was finished, well…”

“He buy so much brushes an’ canvas an’ cases to put in, he not have enough for paint, so I use my allowance to buy the rest, yis!” cackled Dracule, grinning at her blushing beau.

“And, well, I, I can’t help by try to paint Taffy- I would paint her in every light, in every season, capture the very essence of her for but a moment in paint and varnish on linen stretched taut- but, well, I’m… I’m not very good yet, I’ve only just started to get her feathers approaching right, and I’ve not gotten her eyes right at all-” said Lefay, fidgeting.

“We are all works in progress, yis; is okay, Gurry-” reassured Dracule.
“-I’m, I’m not good with words, so how’m I supposed to-” sighed Lefay.

“Gurry, I already know. Is okay, yis? Yis, is okay,” said Dracule, gazing at Lefay with such… oh, I see.

“Um, I’m sorry- I meant yesterday at Tea? I need to know if you noticed anything out of the ordinary- a sound, a smell, anything at all,” I said.

“Hm, no- we was enjoying the springtime too much to notice things like that. Maybe Banana or Kusa-chan notice, but they only have enough courage and patience to answer at Court,” said Dracule, shrugging apologetically.

“Uhm. Spring is a bit- um, too much fun. As I understand it, there was a murder directly beneath our suite, correct?” said Lefay, scratching the back of his neck sheepishly.

“That’s right. Anything you noticed that was out of the ordinary that day would be of help,” I said.

“Hm. Marzipan was in the room that whole day; she might have seen something. However, it’s still much too cold for her, so- and isn’t it getting close to Court Time, Miss Tilly? Might be best to just ask your questions in Court, like with Banana and Kusa-chan,” said Lefay.

I paused, and realized something- not only have I not been wearing my watch-lace, but… Ren wouldn’t have known to reset it to Local Standard Time, he’s never been out of the country before. Oh my god, fuck fuck-

“Here, yis; deep breath, you are not late. Breathe, miss- yis, just like that. This is my watch; it have accurate time as of dawn yesterday. Use it to reset yours, alright?” said Dracule.

“I- y-yes, thank you Miss Dracule,” I squeak.

“Call me Taffy, please; I hear Dracule, I look for my brother,” said Taffy.

“Sure,” I said.

I took Taffy’s watch, and reset my own after fishing it out of my pocket book. Taffy’s watch is an aggressively simple, sleek thing- rated for the bottom of the ocean, with an adam-wood case and a leather thong to keep it tied to her belt-loops.

My watch is much more elaborate, with no less than eight different alarms that can be set and a much smaller face- still, it’s easy for me to set it, after all this time… and Lefay’s right. I’ve got little more than half an hour left. I need to get to the Courthouse.

“You’ll both be at Court, aye?” I said.

“Our whole crew be there, yis. Mab is our friend,” said Taffy.

“Yeah- if you need any one of us to testify: call upon us, and we will come. Even Captain, should it come to that,” said Lefay.
“Thank you; both of you,” I said.

And then, I turned, and bolted in the direction of the Courthouse.

February 4th

Chihiro Town Courthouse; Defense Lobby

I nearly killed myself on a patch of black ice, and so as I run into the defense lobby and have to hand everything off to Sage so I can bandage my hands. Going into Court with literal blood on my hands is a terrible omen of misfortune, and—every little bit helps, alright?

Mab, of course, is a calm, cool bastion of Unseelie grace in these times of turmoil; and it’s only here in the full light of the crystal chandeliers, softer than the harsh glare of the Detention Center, that I can see what I missed before. Mab “Queen” Morgan looks just like her Mother, Harriet “Harry” Morgan—except for where she doesn’t. The truth is, every woman of the Morgan Line and Name looks like Granuna, without exception. Even me.

Mab’s hair is shorter than Mother’s ever was—even loose as it is, it falls down near her ass, not all the way to the floor. Her lips are lavender, not blue; her nails are clear coated, not tipped with azure-staining poison. No pauldron rests over each shoulder; the only adornment on her arms is the tattoo that states emphatically and without question the nature of her relationship with Sanji—that being, they’re married. Her shoes are flat, not heeled; her eyes are tawny, not umber. Her weapon is a spear, not a sword; and, frankly speaking, you could scrub an entire city’s worth of filthy linen on those abs. She’s a big woman, built out of heavy stone bricks with two extra large for her ovaries and one split in half for her tits. If you hit her, you’re the one that’ll move.

I—can remember… a long time ago, Mab’s hair was long like that, and… she was doing my hair? It was for a festival… you know, it’s funny. I only wear my hair the way I do because Mab taught me how to put it up in the style I use: ‘twin buns, bells on for festivals, otherwise just use ribbons.

You’re a beautiful girl, Tilly, and a doughty fighter; letting your hair get in the way is just stupid, in the face of that.’

I wrap my hands tight, but not too tight, and double check that my feet are still ready for battle—and they are. I pin my Courtly bells into my buns, and take the stack of files Sage has collected for me with help from Ren and Aster. Ren’s quietly talking to the rest of the Straw Hat Pirates, explaining how the trial will go and where they’re to stay—preferably seated—while they’re not in court. He even takes a moment to explain why Mab doesn’t want to fight—“Oya, Straw Hat: you’d really make Queen Mab kill her cousins, just so she doesn’t have to deal with people’s suspicions? Because if she runs, they won’t stop chasing her unless she kills them, y’know.”

I quickly go through my files, to review the case. I’ve got the picture memory, same as everyone in my family- I only need to see something once to remember it forever. I go over the Local Rules for Court- Prosecution and Defence alternate calling witnesses and taking lead on who question them, Judge is not made cognizant of all portions of evidence until after the Trial is concluded, all Judgements are carried out after a three day period to allow for counseling and Final Requests…

And then, of course, my rival appears like a fart that won’t go away. I am using a lot of fart analogies today…

“Hello, Portgas,” said Suisan Yiu.

Suisan “Sue” Yiu is a Chief Prosecutor of the Prosecution Office in the SOL. During her first four years as a prosecutor, she had a perfect win record in trials owing to her willingness to do just about anything to get a guilty verdict for the defendant. Her defeat in Court at my hands was the beginning of a series of seismic shifts in her attitude concerning our profession.

Hell, she even quit twice- the first after the Case that lost her the eye, the second for… more personal reasons- only to return each time with a fresh outlook on how she conducted her life. By the time of this case, she’d become an internationally known prosecutor who’d prosecuted in five other countries at least, as well as being one of the top prosecutors back home.

Her goal as prosecutor is to seek the truth above all else, and to use the power of the Law to save people.

Her eye is… special. As far as I know, it’s technically a magatama, one that broke into a bunch of pieces during that Case where she lost her eye and gained a Broken one in return… A magatama is a sacred charm, imbued with strange and esoteric magical powers. Aster won’t tell me more than that- not how it’s made, not what it’s made of, nothing. According to him, the fact that Sue’s magatama broke during that Case was due to her own spiritual state, not any true fault in the gem. After the Break, Sue came back with her new eye, which she usually keeps under a wrap of some sort- be it an eyepatch, a bandanna, a lock of her own hair- doesn’t matter, she doesn’t like showing it out in the open except in certain circumstances. After all, it has the Broken Magatama making the bulk of its core; thus, her Broken Eye, which can only see where lays lie… whoops, lies lay, sorry.

A magatama properly charged with magical energy allows its possessor to see Psyche-Locks, which appear when someone is hiding information from themselves or the world. A Psyche-Lock is a psychomystic barrier that an individual, group, or genius locii possesses, which protects their secrets from others. Sue Yiu’s Broken Eye allows her to see these barriers manifested as chains surrounding whatever represents the secret-keeper best, sealed by red or black locks. Red locks are consciously kept secrets; black locks, on the other hand, are subconsciously kept secrets. Removing a red lock is as simple as poking logical holes into someone’s argument, and presenting evidence until the lock breaks down; removing a black lock by force is damaging to the keeper’s soul, their mind, and… well. It’s not something you do.

When Sue Yiu looks someone in the eyes with her Broken Eye, they are not compelled to tell the truth; but she will know if they lie, and will press relentlessly until the truth is revealed. How do I know all of this? Well, we go out for coffee pretty often, and Sue cannot hold her caffeine…

I don’t have any fancy magic stones, and my hair bells are just bells. I just use Logic to get through a “Oh. It’s Yiu,” I softly growled.

“Hahaha. You finally figured it out, Portgas?” sneered Yiu.

“Yeah- but, Yiu, dirty tricks like that won’t actually win a trial. You’ll need more than some misdirection to prosecute my defendant,” I said.

“Oh, that won’t be a problem, Tilly; after all, we’ve got a real Judge this time, not the old fool who usually ordains these things...” said Yiu.

“Is that right?” I said.

“Mmhm,” said Yiu, “And, wonder of wonders, he was the one to write out Mab Morgan’s Warrant of Arrest.”

I inhale, sharp and deep and suddenly furious.

Yiu glances at me, and nods once, her smile never wavering- and her one visible eye burning with rage.

“You know as well as I that Mab Morgan didn’t do this, Siusan,” I said, quietly.

“What I know, Tigerlily, is that unless you’ve got ironclad proof and extra silver in your tongue, Missus Morgan’s headed for a terminal date with the chopping block. -I also know that a preliminary autopsy report is worth less than the paper it’s printed on... Good luck,” murmured Yiu, before walking into the Court.

Shit.

Yiu wouldn’t give a warning like that unless it was genuinely warranted. Shit, fuck, and godsdamn it all to hell.

---

February 4th

Chihiro Town Courtroom

Quick tip, boys and girls- if your partner across the Court tells you, between the lines, that they’re suspicious of the Judge? Yeah, that’s a very bad sign. The Judge doesn’t look like someone to be wary of... then again, the fact that the Judge has a name of his own, and that name is Bartok… See, most Judges are content to simply go by their title in the Court Record; hell, it was only after Sue Yiu revealed a series of corrupt officials in the PO: SOL that Defense and Prosecution were required to name themselves…
We take our places; the gallery is filled with spectators- mostly Whitebeard Pirates, actually; the Defense Gallery has all my sister’s crewmates in it- except for two, I think.

Bang-bang-bang went the gavel.

“The Inquiry and Trial for the Murderer of Apple and Aloo Coffyn will now come to Order. Is the Prosecution ready?” said Judge Bartok.

“Ready, Your Honor,” said Yiu with a sharp grin on her face- crap, she’s not going to make this easy, she can’t...

“Is the Defense ready?” said Judge Bartok.

“Ready, Your Honor,” I said, chin tilted forwards and up in defiance.

“Prosecution! Call your first witness,” said the Judge.

“The prosecution calls Inspector Heesis Noopwright Detector to the stand,” said Yiu.

Inspector Noopwright’s Testimony:

“Calls came in around the fourteenth hour,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Fourteenth hour-” I hummed to myself.

“When their bodies were found on the scene,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Who were the bodies?” I sang.

“Tell us about the bodies please!” sang the Judge.

“They were Aloo and Apple Coffyn,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“It feels like I knew them...” hummed Aster.

“We won’t let Mab Morgan get away clean!” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“-is that how it’s gonna be? Fine, then, ready- OBJECTION! Where’s your proof Missus Morgan was there?” I sang.

“HOLD IT! She was loitering at the scene without a care!” growled Yiu.

“OBJECTION! Her suite was next door! By all accounts her marriage is a loving one too! If her husband had asked her to wait a moment outside-” “TAKE THAT! Inspector, update your testimony; we have evidence that won’t be denied!” sang Yiu.

Updated Testimony: Poison?

“Poison was used to kill Aloo and Apple-” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“What kind of poison?” I sang.

“Tell us about the poison, please!” sang the Judge.

“Cyanide is what’s to blame,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“-from bitter almonds?” said the Judge.

“-yeah, something’s surely bitter here...” I hummed.

“It was obvious from the position of the bodies,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Please explain that!” I sang.

“Besides the spoon pal? Aloo and Apple were stiff, upright, and foaming, at the mouth!”

“Can you add that to your testimony please?” I said.

“Add it to your testimony, Inspector.” said the Judge.

“Sure thing, pal. Poison was used to kill Aloo and Apple; Aloo and Apple were stiff, upright, and foaming at the mouth! Missus Morgan is to blame here-” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“I truly doubt that-” I hummed.

“-and of that there is no doubt!” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“-because the obvious contradiction is- OBJECTION! On arrest, was Missus Morgan armed?” I sang.

“Uh- no, no, she wasn’t,” said Inspector Noopwright.

“HOLD IT! Missus Morgan is a Fairy Queen; she doesn’t need weapons to kill anyone; ignoring that fact would be folly!” said Yiu.

“OBJECTION! Fairy Queen Morgan fights exclusively with a spear, and when exacting Vengeance uses her enemy’s own weapon! When committing a murder of any kind, she does not leave bodies!” I sang.

“Gyaagh!” yelps Yiu, as I just scored a direct hit and anyone familiar with the accused would know it; “W-well, we’ve still got more evidence to go through. Inspector, continue your testimony!”

Continued Testimony: What was in the Bathroom?
“Our killer was quite crafty,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Somehow, I know that’s true,” I hummed.

“She knew the elder Coffyn’s routine,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“...something is wrong here, I just have to wait for it-” I hummed.

“Mab Morgan snuck a poison into their fruit-tarts,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Oh no she didn’t-” I growled.

“She even had the nerve to leave the poison behind at the scene!” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“If that were true, there wouldn’t be a reason for me to- OBJECTION! Where was the poison found?” I sang.

“Oh, in the bathroom, pal,” said Inspector Noopwright.

“So, the killer left the poison in the couple’s bathroom, and killed them in their tatami room? Doesn’t something about that strike you as odd?” I said.

“Going somewhere with this, Portgas?” said Yiu.

“Take a closer look at those bottles of poison, Yiu. See it yet?” I said.

“...No, it can’t be true-” sang Yiu, wide eyed.

“Here’s what the bathroom poisons mean: Apple and Aloo were judges in this year’s World’s Worst Bakers contest!” I said, slamming a fist down on the defense bench.

“-my gods-” groaned the Judge, looking a bit green at the prospect.

“Knowing they would be exposed to some of the most dangerous cooking in the World, they had been preparing for months by practicing a serious regimen of mithridatism! There’s even a reminder on this flyer-” I said.

Presented: Contest Flyer.

“-which as you can see, has a note on the back, reminding someone to take something daily! If we check it against the registration forms in this folder-” I said.

Presented: Judge Registration Folder.

“-we’re sure to find a match in the handwriting! Those poisons belonged to the v-v-victims, I’d bet!” I trilled.

“Gyaaagh!” said Yiu.

“Damn, pal, that’s a great point- if it weren’t for one thing!” said Inspector Noopwright.

“What’s that, Inspector?” I said.

“Mince Coffyn saw Mab Morgan leave the hotel suite!” said Inspector Noopwright.
“I’m gonna need some testimony, there, Inspector.” I growled.

Continued Testimony: Motive?

“Every killer knows their victim,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“By and large, that’s true-” I hummed.

“Mab Morgan knew the Coffyns,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Well, she had better!” hummed Yiu.

“It’s not like she killed a man- oh, wait-” I grumbled.

“Not sure why Missus Morgan picked them,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Picked the victims?” said the Judge.

“As we fear it’s clear that she hated their guts!” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Pretty unlikely, because this story is really quite- OBJECTION! Wasn’t Missus Morgan in their employ?” I sang.

“Uh- yeah, pal, so what?” said Inspector Noopwright.

“Well, why would anyone bring harm to the source of a lucrative contract? Missus Morgan is a self-employed sewing professional; the majority of her international reputation comes from commissions and private contracts. She has no motive to kill the victims; they were her customers!” I said.

HOLD IT! Murder of Opportunity is hard to prove- but not impossible. Mab Morgan was found at the scene with a poisoned spoon- the poison in question matched the poison used to kill the victims! Pray tell, Portgas; how do you explain that?” said Yiu.

“Easily! The Killer dropped it when exiting the scene, or planted it to frame someone else!” I said, slamming my palm down on the barrier.

PORTGAS! YIU! PLEASE DO DESIST THIS DEBATE ABOUT LOGISTICS; WE’RE HERE TO FIND OUT WHO DID IT-” sang Judge Bartok.

“But Your Honor, how else are we supposed to-” I said.

“NO ‘TAKE THAT!’S, NO MORE RETORTS! NO SECOND CHANCES, NO LAST RESORTS; FINISH THIS UP OR I’LL FIND YOU BOTH IN CONTEMPT OF COURT-” sang Judge Bartok.

CORRECTION! My witness is not finished testifying. Detective, complete your testimony!” said Yiu.
“Sure thing, pal! When the victim’s son found their bodies—” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“That poor baby...” hummed Aster.

“He ran out from the scene—” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“That must have been- scary- strangely—” I hummed.

“-painfully- plainly—” Yiu hummed, scrubbing at her eyepatch.

“The bodies were brought to Dr. Vavoom,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“Dr. Vavoom?” I hummed.

“And Mab Morgan was arrested near the scene,” sang Inspector Noopwright.

“I’m really, really sorry but- OBJECTION! Apple and Aloo were poisoned? Where’s the proof?” I shouted, drawing the stare of the Judge.

“Other than the foam at their mouths, pal?” said Inspector Noopwright.

“TAKE THAT! There’s photos of their bodies, as well!” sang Yiu.

“HOLD IT! How do we know the defendant went into their suite? We need evidence or we can call this whole farce a goof—” I sang.

“OBJECTION! If you claim that your defendant’s being framed—” sang Yiu.

“-and if you argue she’s to blame then all the same I ask you—” I sang.

“WHERE’S THE PROOF?” we shouted at each other.

“OBJECTION!” shouted the Judge, to everyone’s gasps.

“-Did I do something wrong?” said Inspector Noopwright.

“I object to wasting my time going in circles like this! Verdicts are required in three days, and this sing-songy yammering has already cost us part of one!” said the Judge.

“Y-y-yammering?” I trilled, arms akimbo.

“I thought it was rather catchy...” grumbled Yiu, rubbing at her eyepatch again.

“You’d best both examine some evidence and try a bit harder going forward. I expect a far better performance from you!” said the Judge.

“Oh, you’ll get a performance...” I grumbled, gripping the bared skin of my upper arms so I don’t loose my temper.

“Defense; Call your Witness,” said the Judge.
I bit my lip for a moment, and then I called-

“The defense calls Mab Morgan to the stand!” I said.

Mab Morgan’s Testimony:

“It was just after tea time;” sang Mab.

“After tea time,” hummed Yiu.

“My husband and I were returning to our suite;” sang Mab.

“Who is your husband?” sang Yiu.

“The full name of your husband please!” said the Judge.

“Vinsmoke Sanji is his name, sir-” sang Mab.

“Add that to your testimony, please,” said Yiu.

“It was just after tea time; my husband, Vinsmoke Sanji, and I were returning to our suite; he went in first to prepare for after Suntide; I noticed a spoon on the ground, and thought it was neat!” sang Mab.

“Interesting story, but I really must know- OBJECTION! What drew your attention to the spoon?” said Yiu.

“Well, it’s small and made of glass; and it sparkled oddly in the light- and also, I think it made my husband sneeze-” mused Mab.

OBJECTION! Relevance, please?” I said. If Yiu doesn’t want an easy time of it, I’ll happily oblige…

“Dr. Vavoom states in the autopsy report that the poison on the spoon and the poison in the victims is one and the same. I’m simply following the chain of evidence, Portgas-” sneered Yiu.

HOLD IT! Are you implying that the spoon in question and Mab Morgan are connected beyond the bounds of chance? Anyone could have found that spoon, and anyone could have picked it up!” I said.

OBJECTION! I find it suspicious that Missus Morgan was the one to find the spoon! Why didn’t her husband notice it? He’s a professional chef- surely he would have noticed something like a spoon on the floor? An explanation, Missus Morgan!” said Yiu.

Mab Morgan’s Continued Testimony: We were getting hot and heavy!

“The Holidays aren’t just times of celebration,” sang Mab.
“Theologically, that’s true-” I hummed.

“They’re times when the Barriers between all Worlds thin,” sang Mab.

“Get to the point please,” sang Yiu.

“My patience is limited-” growled the Judge.

“For safety’s sake, sexual congress during the holidays ought experience a cessation,” sang Mab.

“...You can’t be serious-” said Yiu, visible eye showing white all around the edges.

“In an effort to keep restless spirits from finding a way in!” sang Mab.

“...I really really hate you, Portgas- OBJECTION! Are you trying to say that the reason Mister Vinsmoke didn’t notice the spoon was because…?” said Yiu.

“Because we were groping each other with intent to bone, yes,” said Mab.

ORDER! ORDER IN THIS COURT! -Missus Morgan, are you saying that the reason your husband didn’t notice the spoon on the ground was because he was too busy, erm-” said the Judge, twinned spots of lurid red high on his cheekbones.

“Fondling my funbags? Weighing the goods? Massaging my mammaries?” said Mab with a salacious eyebrow waggle.

“-Missus Morgan, do you have any shame whatsoever?” said a flabbergasted Yiu.

“Nope. Got that beaten out of me years ago, Prosecutor Yiu,” chirruped a sunny Mab.

“...So, to recap: Your husband, a professional chef, didn’t notice the spoon on the ground because he was playing with your breasts?” I interjected.

“Well, yes; and I was checkin’ to see if his ass was still finessin-” said Mab with a lascivious grin.

“Um- Missus Morgan, how often do you and your husband engage in sexual congress?” I said, head tilted to the side.

“Oh, about five times a day, why?” said Mab.

ORDER! I WILL HAVE ORDER IN THIS COURT! -Missus Morgan, don’t you get a bit... tired...?” said the Judge, entire face gone red.

“Well, no, I was the one to suggest the schedule we settled on, actually; we used to go at it almost constantly, but we both have full time jobs, so that just wasn’t feasible. Honestly, we didn’t really find our limit during our honeymoon, we kept passing out before we got tired of the sex, and then we had other things to do...” said Mab, mournfully reminiscent.

“Missus Morgan, you mentioned in your previous testimony that your husband sneezed- could you testify here about that?” said Yiu, Done with all of this.

“Oh, certainly,” said Mab.

Mab Morgan’s Final Testimony: A Strange Reaction
“My husband is a professional chef, and knows his business well,” sang Mab.

“Can you explain that, and add it to your testimony?” said Yiu.

“Oh, sure; my husband is a three star chef, with full accreditation- you need only check his Fugu License to be assured,” sang Mab.

“Holy shit, Mab,” I murmured.

“Holy fuckin’ shit, Mab,” mumbled Aster.

“Because of the quality of his skills and senses, he has trouble- hm, how to say it...” sang Mab.

“Best just say it,” hummed Yiu.

“Sanji has always had an adverse reaction to that which he is not inured,” sang Mab, shrugging.

“OBJECTION! What relevance does this have to the case at hand?” said Yiu.

“OBJECTION! The relevance to this case is obvious!” I said, “Mab Morgan just stated that her husband has powerful and very finely tuned senses that react adversely when presented with overwhelming amounts of new substances. It’s very well known among the Trades that chefs of any Star Ranking are progressively more degenerate and perverted as they gain higher levels of accreditation; it’s to do with how much time and effort they have to put towards their mastery of skill versus their regular life experience. It makes perfect logical sense that the only reaction Chef Vinsmoke would have to the spoon in question is a sneeze when the circumstances of his exposure are taken into account- no three star chef would notice a small detail like a spoon on the ground when they don’t work at the establishment and, coincidentally, have a live woman in their arms! With these facts taken into consideration, Mab Morgan must be struck from the suspect list!”

“HOLD IT! That’s a stretch, even for you, Portgas!” said Yiu.

“TAKE THAT! -check the Autopsy Report again, Yiu,” I said.

“What- gyaaaaaaaaaaaaaargh!” shrieked Yiu.

“That’s right! The poison used in this murder has a half life of five days! If exposed to a person’s skin, hair, clothing, or any other permeable surface- including nails- while not lethal, it will continue to be detectable for the duration. If Mab Morgan had killed the victims, she would have been exposed to the poison, and her husband would have noticed! If she had been wearing protective gear of any kind, he still would have noticed- it’s flatly impossible to remove all protective gear without contaminating oneself, which is why the standard blocking runes have been mandated! Further, if she had used those runes, he still would have known - they are not the kind of thing that can be hidden in any way, PARTICULARLY AT A PUBLIC BATHING HOUSE!” I roar.

I take a deeply calming breath, and stare my rival down across the tiled swan in the floor.

“If Mab Morgan had poisoned the victims, Vinsmoke Sanji wouldn’t have been able to approach her at all, much less grope her so thoroughly he missed an entire glass spoon on the floor,” I rumbled, slamming my fist onto the barrier with a resounding crack.

I can actually see Siu’s thoughts racing through her head, before a flash of- apprehension? Distaste?
Then a jolt of pure, focused determination- all these cross her uncovered eye, and then- oh no.

“Fair enough, Portgas. Your Honor, Prosecution requests permission to call final Witness for this Day,” said Yiu, with mocking lightness.

“Granted; Prosecution, call your Witness,” said the Judge.

“Prosecution calls Mince Coffyn to the stand!” said Yiu.

Oh hell.

Mince Coffyn’s Testimony:

“I could never have imagined finding my parent’s corpses,” sang Mr. Coffyn, exhausted.

“What were you doing earlier that day?” said Yiu.

“Tell us of your day, boy,” sneered the Judge.

“I went to get my insta-print camera restocked; I needed more philome, new printing cartridges, and more pictstock,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“I think she’s gonna do it,” hummed Aster.

“Yiu, don’t you fuckin’ do it,” I hummed, scowling.

“After my camera got stolen, I went back to the hotel and found out that I’m an orphan,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“We still need to find that camera- or his pictures…” I hummed.

“I think I’ve spent the past few days in shock!” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“I don’t like to do this, but I really have to know- OBJECTION! You said you needed more philome, printing supplies, and specialty paper; however, neither the Prosecution or the Defence was able to find any pictographs at the scene. Can you explain where they went?” I said.

“Uh, yeah, I think so…” said the increasingly tense Mr. Coffyn.

Mince Coffyn’s Continued Testimony: My Photo Collection

“My photos are mostly family pictures and recipes of foods I’ve made,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“That’s intriguing…” hummed Aster.

“I got more serious with my hobby after Mom started to show-” sang Mr. Coffyn, tears starting to run down from his painfully reddened eyes.

“Wait, he can’t mean-” gasped Aster.
“Oh no-” I hissed.

“She had a real craving for fruit tarts at the end there…” sang Mr. Coffyn, as his voice began to break.

“Oh my goodness-” said Yiu, the barest hint of tears in her visible eye.

“I don’t know why anyone would have wanted to take my picture albums, though…” sang Mr. Coffyn, almost caved into himself, abject misery in every line of his body.

“I cannot be hearing this- OBJECTION! -are you saying your mother was pregnant?” I said, horrified.

“Yes, about thirty-five weeks or so- the actual day of their d-deaths was her due date, but, well, she’d only dropped the day before, a-and the midwife said that due dates were really more like due guidelines… I was, ah, I was looking forwards to having a sibling anyway,” said Mr. Coffyn.

“OBJECTION! Are you saying your picture albums were stolen?” said Yiu.

“Oh, yeah- um, my whole bag was, actually- I’d run out of space in my picture albums, and my camera prints a weird size, so it’s easier to just… I needed new albums anyway, mine were falling apart…” said Mr. Coffyn.

“Did you get a good look at who stole your bag and camera?” said Yiu.

“Actually, yeah,” said Mr. Coffyn, perking up for the first time in probably days.

Mince Coffyn’s Continued Testimony: The Theft

“My bag was stolen in the Parkade; near the waterfall, where painters like the light,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“How do you know that?” I sang.

“Tell us how you know that, boy,” sneered the Judge.

“Dad was having the house remodeled and Mom couldn’t stand the noise or the smells-” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“Ah, I get it,” hummed Aster.

“-so, to keep mom happy, we moved to the hotel,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“Add that to your testimony, Mr. Coffyn,” I sang.

“Oh, sure. Our house was being remodeled; a new addition for the same; we moved to the hotel for the duration, and things really weren’t the same. When my bag was stolen, I was in the parkade, near the waterfall where painters like the light; I was taking my camera out to take a picture of the frozen landscape, because- aside from fruit tarts- I knew it was the kind of thing Mom really liked,”

“Get to the point boy,” growled Judge Bartok.

“Defence cannot recuse the Judge-” I hummed at the exact right pitch so that only Yiu could hear me.
“I was just putting my camera back in my bag; when the thief came around and snatched it out of sight,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“I’m at the very end of my tether here- OBJECTION! The thief took your bag, and your camera?” I said.

“Yeah- snapped my camera strap right off, I’ve got a bruise from it right here-”

“Show the Court for the Record, please,” I said.

“Sure, DA Portgas,” said Mr. Coffyn, before showing his bruised wrist to the Court.

It’s a thin line, probably from something thin, like the strap of a small camera.

“HOLD IT! Can you describe the thief?” said Yiu.

“Yeah, of course,” said Mr. Coffyn.

Mince Coffyn’s Final Testimony: The Thief

“The thief is a local demon, known for loitering around the nearby Daiso,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“HOLD IT! Can you be more specific?” I said.

“I mean the Daiso owned and run by Hearb Curree; and I mean the demon named Osvaldo-” said Mr. Coffyn.

“Please add that to your testimony, Mr. Coffyn,” I said.

“The thief is a local demon named Osvaldo, known for loitering near Hearb Curree’s Daiso,” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“HOLD IT! Please describe the demon named Osvaldo,” I said.

“He’s a boy about my age, with a sooty cast to his hair; he wears a pompadour and a black leather jacket-” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“Oh no-” I hummed.

“His eyes are the color of the inside of an avocado-” sang Mr. Coffyn.

“Oh no-” I hummed.

“And because of him, I’ve been having to carry my baking things in a shopping basket!” sang Mr. Coffyn, showing just a bit of temper.

As Judge Bartok reels back with a thunderous expression, his face a rictus of rage and vitriol, I consider what’s about to happen.
Who is Portgas D. Elphame? Mab doesn’t remember names very well, she never has- it’s why she gave all of us nicknames, and tends to use pet-names where possible. So.

Portgas D. Elphame, also known as The Honorable Daun Portgas D. Elphame, is the Queen of Swans. Mab Morgan is Queen of Wrens; Morrio’ghan Morgan is Queen of Crows; and Portgas D. Gable is Queen of Swifts. In theory, that means Mab Morgan is the Queen of All Witches; Morrio’ghan Morgan is Queen of the Dead; Portgas D. Gable is Queen of Lands; and Portgas D. Elphame is Queen of Hell. In practice, Mab Morgan is currently ensuring that those with magical power nearest to her are getting educations; Morrio’ghan Morgan is the Grana of the Theatre; Portgas D. Gable is Grana of Infrastructure; and Portgas D. Elphame is the Graun of Judgement.

The international Court system was established permanently around the forty-fifth year of the modern calendar by Portgas D. “Scratch” Elphame and her sworn liege, Queen Ariel “Grand Line” Morgan. Despite the best efforts of the World Nobles, religious fanatics, and the insidious spectres of piracy and chaos, the International Court of Law has survived and thrived, in it’s own blood-drenched and psychotic way.

Thus, the World Government unofficially washed its hands of the Courts many centuries ago, after Queen Ariel quite literally sailed across the horizon, never to be seen or heard from again, and never to return- but always present in the hearts of those who loved and feared her. The following six Swan Queens who commanded the Court of Law made only a token effort to enforce justice, mainly by vigorously enforcing executions and imprisonment for lawbreakers- mostly pirates, actually. They also re-posted the SEVEN LAWS signs, which in the finest traditions of safety signage everywhere, are stolen every end of semester by drunken students World-wide.

The Seventh Swan Queen, Honorable Daun Portgas D. Elphame, is a return to form- being a contemporary of Queen Ariel, and one of the founders of the system entire. They returned in a flash of white light and brimstone-smoke in the middle of the SOL Training Academy campus quadrangle, during a heated debate where both sides were not only illogical, but wrong. This might have caused problems, except most of the teachers were so grateful to finally have someone, anyone, who knew what they were doing when it came to the Law… Daun Portgas D. Elphame was made Swan Queen that very afternoon, and has remained such ever since.

Every internationally ranked lawyer is terrified of them.Basically, if Gol D. Roger had been an officer of the law and functionally immortal, he’d have been a young scamp at Daun Elphame’s knee.

The speech every lawyer, Defense or Prosecution, memorizes sometime in their first year- that Queen Scratch gave to a visiting dignitary, is thus:

“Come in, please, come in. I can’t entertain you shipboard as I once could, but there is tea and plenty of food, and I understand you’ve done well for yourself at the gambling tables down in Chihiro Sento. I suppose I can afford to lose a little now and then. My late first husband was a wealthy man and I magnified his wealth- well, you know how.

“I think there should be discipline in everything, you know, even lawlessness. When I ruled the sea and the Red Rag Fleet, no one disobeyed me- and I do mean that literally. After all, those who did were beheaded. But, on the other hand, I think my rule was mainly beneficent. Did you know I forbade those under my command to steal from villagers who supplied us? That only made sense, of course. Death was also the sentence for any assault on a female captive. One makes these laws when one grows up as I did.

“I also insisted that anything taken from town or ship was to be presented, registered, and given out amongst all- oh, the original taker got a percentage, and twenty percent is better than nothing, you know. That’s how you keep a sailor happy.

“My dear second husband, he also issued some laws, I suppose, but they weren’t written down or very well enforced. What were they? Who knows. What does it matter? My laws were what mattered.

“Eventually, of course, it became easier just to tax the local cities than to keep sacking them.

“Nicer for all concerned and not so much work for us. Bureaucracy will have its day, sooner or later, always.

“That is how I came to be here, you know; several years ago, after I defeated their entire Navy, the local government offered amnesty to pirates. Well they might; what other option did they have? But I was wealthy, so why should I continue to work when I was no longer a criminal? It was in thirty-eight that I left crime behind forever and opened this little house of respite. Here I am content, you know, and I think I will be for quite some time. Hopefully a long, long time!

“Oh, I am called many things. I was called Shi Xianggu, and I am called Cheng I Sao, sometimes, but mostly I am known now as Ching Shih- the Widow Ching, wife of two pirates, but a pirate empress myself. Of course, that’s only what my countrymen call me, these days- most would know me as Portgas D. Elphame, Old Scratch himself.”

If the Judge in your Trial is behaving badly- as in, not according to the Laws and Orders of the Court- then the Prosecution may, at any time, call for the Queen of Swans to take their rightful place as Queen of Judges. Defense may only Second the Call, not Initiate.

And everyone knows that Daun Elphame has no set gender to speak of…

I suppose, before we get much further, I should explain what the Chihiro Sento actually is. Chihiro Sento isn't just a bath house; it's a Temple, and a Hotel, and a Casino, and an Embassy too. Even more specifically, the Queen of Swans is the ultimate ruler of the Chihiro Sento, and all it's environs- and most people don't realize that the limits of the Sento are much larger than the limits of the town...

I mean. If you've ever been here and wondered why there are stylized swans literally every-gods-damned where... well, now you know.
Judge Bartok roars with fury; his bellow breaks through the silence of the Court like a bomb.

“ENOUGH! I see no reason to further entertain these flights of fancy- I said enough!” screams the Judge.

Yiu presses a hand to her covered eye and grits her teeth.

“This case’s evidence is extremely clear- the guilty party is Mince Coffyn! I’m through with your bluffs, your condescensions, and your disgusting attitude! They don’t call me ‘Magnificent’ because my eyes can’t see what’s clear-” snarls the Judge.

“It wasn’t me! I swear to all the gods, it wasn’t me!” babbles Mr. Coffyn.

“THAT’S ENOUGH! This Court sees no reason to further prolong this trial! The evidence and testimony that we’ve seen and heard are quite worthwhile! The victims were alone in their rooms, when they ate from the poisoned tart-” sneers the Judge.

“-no, you’re wrong, you’re all wrong! I made those tarts, and I would never- I would never!” wails Mr. Coffyn.

“-the only person in the room who had access, ability, and motive to kill was you-” growls the Judge.

“-no! No!” whimpers Mr. Coffyn.

“-Mince Coffyn; it was you who killed your parents with a poisoned apple tart!” said the Judge, glaring with triumph.

“-No! No- I swear I didn’t kill my parents, or my unborn sibling! Someone else must have been there- someone must have wished them harm! That person is the one who killed my parents! Why won’t you believe me-?” gasped Mr. Coffyn

Fuck it. I know a contradiction when I hear one.

“OBJECTION!” I roared, punctuating with both of my hands slamming into the Defense Barrier; the sound of my rage beat on the air with all the same crash and violence as a cannon firing next to your ear.

“Judge Bartok… how do you know what kind of tart Mr. Coffyn made for his parents? That information is not in any of the presented evidence, and the Bench is not privy to all the collected evidence of the Prosecution and Defense until after the conclusion of the Trial,” I rumbled into the shockingly silent Court, my voice the cruel grinding of metal on bone.

The Preliminary Autopsy Report was astonishingly thorough- it named the murder weapon as a poisoned apple tart, although I have my suspicions about that… and, considering what I know of Mince Coffyn’s skills, he could have made the tart in question. Except for one, very simple thing.
The Judge is frozen, his rage-red face starting to pale.

I continue, merciless.

“Judge Bartok… setting aside your acquisition of knowledge you are not privileged to have at this time… where would Mince Coffyn have gotten the apples for the alleged murder weapon?”

In a Courtroom this silent, you can hear every minor sound- the shuffle of the Bailiffs, the creak of Yiu’s eyepatch as she digs fingers into the leather… the soft, sobbing gasps of Mince Coffyn as my sister, Mab, wraps an arm around him. When she was struck from the suspect list, her cuffs were removed by a Bailiff- over the soft, fabric scream of my jinbaori, as my wings strain against it’s soft caress, I can hear her gentle, soothing hum.

In that strange silence, my fists slamming into the Defense Barrier booms.

“Judge Bartok… if Mince Coffyn had made the alleged weapon, he would have needed to prepare the apples, which we must assume was the delivery method of the poison used to kill both victims. Mince Coffyn is noted in his medical records to have a hypersensitivity to Cyanide, which as far as preliminary evidence can prove, is the poison used in this murder. Mince Coffyn could not have tainted the apples himself without causing his eyes to swell shut; and if the apples had been tampered before, making this a case of negligence, not Murder-Mince Coffyn would have smelled it immediately and discarded the apples in question! But, if you still will not concede that Mince Coffyn did not murder his parents with an apple tart, consider this- in this Hungry Month, where did Mince Coffyn get apples for a tart?”

The Judge chokes.

I can hear my jinbaori starting to tear.

I’m too enraged to stop now.

“I ask you again, Judge Bartok: how did Mince Coffyn get the apples to make that tart? It wasn’t from the Sento Kitchen; he’s registered for the World’s Worst Bakers contest, they banned him sight unseen- it’s right here in the Coffyn’s registration! Nor could the poisoned apples have come from somewhere in town; this kingdom prizes apples, so much so that only the wealthiest of Nobles can afford to purchase one, and only the growers themselves can afford to eat them whenever they’d like! MINCE COFFYN HAS BEEN SPENDING ALL OF HIS MONEY ON PICTOGRAPH ALBUMS AND PICTOGRAPHY SUPPLIES FOR THE PAST NINE MONTHS! WE HAVE HIS RECEIPTS, BECAUSE HE IS A FISCALLY RESPONSIBLE AND WELL ORGANIZED YOUNG MAN!” I said.

My jinbaori was made for me specifically as a graduation present from the SOL:A by my sister, Mab. In my rage here today, I’ve shredded it completely.

My wings stretch wide and stiff across my back. They’re thick enough to block out all the light, and shaped just like the wings of a bat; my shadow rises across the Court, heavy and black over the Judge.

My fists slam into the Defense Barrier a third, and ominous time; I can hear it creaking underneath my furious weight.
“Judge Bartok… The Defense demands an explanation for these discrepancies, or an immediate dismissal of this Trial!” I snarled across the Court.

In the resounding, roaring silence that followed my enraged declaration, Sue Yiu finally had enough. I could hear the sharp crack of her eyepatch tearing, and from the corner of my eye I could see the blazing purple of her Broken Eye.

I continued staring down Judge Bartok.

Sue Yiu slammed her own fists into the Prosecutor’s Barrier.

The sound was like a gunshot.

“Judge Bartok, the Prosecution demands an explanation for the discrepancies noted by the Defence, or an immediate dismissal of this Trial… with you as Judge,” said Yiu, her own black bat-like wings stretched wide and furious.

Judge Bartok sneers.

I look over to Sue Yiu, who looks back at me. There’s a hesitant wariness on her face- but at my simple nod, my hair-bells chiming, that wariness firms into the kind of determination that shatters mountains into the Sea.

“Prosecution calls The Right Honorable Daun Portgas D. Elphame to the Bench,” said Yiu.

“Defense seconds the Call,” I said.

You ever have a moment where you can feel the energy of a room, or maybe the mood, and that mood is… not good? Not bad, either- teetering.

It’s not like that, when the Queen comes.

It’s like that when Granuna visits- but then, Death brings out the most primal urges in people. She always has.

The first thing I notice is the pressure, an almost unbearable weight on my entire self- my body, my mind, my spirit. The pressure eases just enough that I can hear the gasp that rings out through the Gallery as the wet-sounding slap of bare feet on tile echoes.

Somehow, in the throes of rage, Judge Bartok manages to gasp out an accusatory “Who the hell are you!?” at Queen Scratch.
For perhaps the only time in living memory, Queen Scratch deigns to smile, and draw their- their-satsumata… and then, they tap the butt of the spear-fork onto the ground, once, twice, thrice-

At each tap, another Bailiff steps forwards, vanishes, and is replaced by one of the Executioners. The Executioners are the Elite of the Bailiffs, and in the Court Record- unless they sit the Bench or are called to testify- are always referred to by their weapon, which is mandated by Law for use in the apprehension, capture, and retrieval of those who are accused of and have committed crimes.

They appear in order, and rank; and all of them are kin to me, one way or another. First comes the Three Tools of Arresting: Satsumata (a forked spear meant for man-catching), or in this case, Queen Scratch, Judge Portgas D. Elphame; Sodegarami (a spear with the head of the angered Vajra, meant to tangle trailing sleeves and wings), a beautiful Fishwoman who is a bit older than myself, Cousin Misao; Tsukubō (a spiked push-pole meant to corral crowds), oh, hey, that’s Cousin Heloise- I usually see her at Sunday dinner with Mom and Auntie…

Then come the others- Kanamuchi (a riding crop style whip made out of flexible steel), oh, Cousin Siobhan; Kiriko no bo (a wand-like stave made of heavy wood or iron), Cousin Ragannie; Tetō (a pipe weighted and shaped like a sword with no cutting edge), Little Holly-go-Lightly, but I’d have to ask Mom how we’re related, it’s complicated and boring; Jutte (a club or truncheon made of iron or wood weighted with metal), Cousin Vivian; Metsubushi (blinding agents in powder or mist form), Cousin Sunshine, but she’s really named something else… I think it’s Susurrus, actually? But she punches people if they call her Susurrus, so we call her Sunshine which she likes much better; Te Yari (a spear meant for close quarters), ah, Mab’s favorite cousin, Cousin Slyphia; Mankiri (weighted chain weapon meant to capture and ensnare), and my favorite cousin, Griselau; and, finally, only really noticeable by dint of how the hell are we related- Hojojutsu (a method of securing the accused or the executee), or Despereaux. Despereaux just sort of… showed up one day at Sunday dinner, and just kept coming back? I’m not entirely sure we are related, except for the fact that she’s given me stern Sisterly advice before, and I’m fairly sure she’s fought for Mab’s honor at least once...

But nevermind that shit, Queen Scratch is speaking.

“I’m The Right Honorable Daun Portgas D. Elphame, Queen Scratch to those who don’t care about names. I’ve fought in two World-wide wars and countless smaller ones in no less than five separate Ages. I’ve led countless men and women into battle with everything from horses and stone weapons to artillery and explosives. I’ve seen the headwaters of the Great Sandora River, and treated with Tribes of Folk no other has ever seen before. I’ve won and lost a dozen fortunes, killed many men, and to this day love only one man with a passion a sniveling wretch like you could never begin to understand. That’s who I am. As for you, boy? YOU ARE IN. MY. WAY,” said Queen Scratch, their voice a biting, overwhelming, stomach wracking pressure on ever sense and surface.

Have you ever been walking along somewhere very narrow, and you think nothing of it until you look down to your side and see that there’s an entire mountain’s worth of space between where your feet are, and where you thought the ground was? Or how about… have you ever woken up because something with scratchy feet just ran across your arm? Or how about you saw something awful, heard a song that didn’t fit the mood at all, and now every time you close your eyes you can see it, you can hear it- that’s what being near Queen Scratch in a mood is like.
I don’t recommend ever putting yourself on the receiving end of Their Majesties ire; even being on the side, just as an observer, is fairly painful.

It occurs to me that I haven’t ever really looked at a Bailiff before; I see them so often, I never really take the time to look at them. Well, let’s start with the apprentices- each Office of the SOL has it’s own unique style of uniform, with the least codification being in the Prosecution and Defense. The Bailiffs are a more militarized version of the police; and so, their uniforms tend to be very military.

Ah, there they are- the Balibabies, I mean. The uniform doesn’t change, Winter to Summer- but the length of their hair does. The only real way to tell if the babe in question is male, female, both, neither, otherwise- is to ask. The uniforms are just that- uniform. The one with the very fancy hat and nearly sheer shirt is the Court Stenographer; their entire job is to record everything that happens in Court, every word, every presented piece of evidence…

That’s the Evidence Guard, and there are always three of those… ah, there’s the other two. Full Bailiffs are dressed in the Uniform, with the various differences representing their rank- the fanciest one is almost never at simple murder trials, unless they’re covering for someone else, of course. And that, of course, is Bailey, Queen Scratch’s personal Sniper-in-Waiting. Yes, really.

And then, of course, the Executioners- everyone involved in Court knows exactly who they are. They don’t have to wear uniforms; their weapons are their uniforms.

Queen Scratch has left Judge Bartok to the tender mercies of the Executioners- Kanamuchi takes a particular disliking to betrayers and oathbreakers, and so has laid the very tip of her iron crop to the fluttering pulse at Judge Bartok’s throat- and taken their rightful seat at the Bench.

They regard us with mild amusement, which feels just exactly like having a kitten dig their tiny needle claws into the flesh of your neck as they lovingly purr into your ear.

“I surely hope none of y’all girls are allergic to pickles, because you just dragged me about knee deep in one,” mused Judge Elphame, “Then again, I hardly ever get to act as Judge in Trials anymore- something about being overwhelming for the lawyers of today. Well, how are they s’posed to get any kind of spine if we coddle them? I do declare…”

“Now, girls, I hate to be a bother- but it’s the end of the day, and we just don’t have time for any more witnesses. I’m dismissing the accusation against Mince Coffyn, as it was made by Mister Bartok with evidence he could only have if he were involved in the crime himself-” said Judge Elphame, glancing over the Court Record that Bailey just handed off to them, “-and I expect we won’t be getting much further without clearing up a few things. Judge Lorenzo Bartok, you are the current Accused. You have stated, on Record, knowledge that you should not be cognizant of, excepting if you had been involved in a most nefarious and unseemly way in the Murder of Aloo and Apple Coffyn. Who stole Mince Coffyn’s pictograph collection, and why? What poison, exactly, killed the Coffyns, and what was the method of it’s delivery? Why were the Coffyns murdered, and by whom? Who else is involved here? And, most importantly of all- if no baby was found at the scene of the crime, yet a baby was supposed to be present within Apple Coffyn… where, in the name of the gods, is that baby?

“These questions require answers, if we’re to go forwards… Rain falls on the roofs of the just and the unjust, the saints and the sinners; those who know peace, and those who live in torment. Justice must be as the rain; uncaring of whom it falls upon, merely that it falls. Tomorrow begins at a dark hour; a dark story began this day, and in it’s twisting strands, perhaps a thread of Truth will be revealed. You two have the ends of this day to rest, consider evidence, and find more witnesses to this case. Court Adjourned,” said Judge Elphame.

CRACK! went Honorable Daun Elphame’s fingers as they snapped them.

End of DAY 1.

Added to the Court Record: Poisoned Glass Spoon
Added to the Court Record: Photo of Apple and Aloo Coffyn just after their murder
Added to the Court Record: Contest Flyer.
Added to the Court Record: Judge Registration Folder.
Added to the Court Record: Autopsy Report
Added to the Court Record: Mince Coffyn’s Bruised Wrist
Added to the Court Record: The Coffyn’s Registration at the Sento Hotel
Added to the Court Record: Mince Coffyn’s Receipts
“Unfortunately, neither of you have presented enough evidence to make a ruling in favor of murder for either Defendant, nor have you provided evidence or reasonable doubt in the ruling of a double suicide. Unless a witness appears who can lay serious and unassailable blame at the Accused’s foot, I’m sorry—” sighed Judge Scratch.

“Dammit—”

“-but I’ll simply have to—” said Judge Scratch.

“Gods dammit—”

“Dismiss this case against Lorenzo Bartok—” said Judge Scratch, her fingers raised high and ready to snap.

“GODS DAMMIT WAIT! Wait! I can provide witness to Lorenzo Bartok’s crimes! At the very least, I can prove he’s lying!”

“Shut up, boy!”

“Fuck you, old man! My accusation: Lorenzo Bartok killed my mother! He killed Isadora Bartok! He’s a liar, and a thief, and he killed those two people, too! He ain’t never stopped gambling—”

“-shut UP boy—”

“-which is in direct violation of his Pardon! An’ Miss Ashtraghi’s lyin’ too, if y’all ain’t asked her nothin’ yet! She lives at our house! Her room is under the backstairs!”

“Hmm. Bailey!” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!”

“Swear that Boy into the proceedings and get him on the stand. I want to hear what he has to say,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!”
I was so exhausted after yesterday’s Recusal, I barely had the strength to eat an unsatisfying dinner and put on my chemise. Aster actually had to put me in bed and tuck me in, I was so worn out—he even took the time to undo my buns, and braid my hair down like I would have for sleeping.

A lot of people think we’re romantically involved, simply because we know each other like a married couple would. If Aster has to go to the toilet while we’re ordering food at a new restaurant, I know what he’s going to want to eat; if I’m too tired to do my evening beauty routine, Aster can- and last night, did- do it for me.

Here are my beauty tips: go to bed with brushed and braided hair, if it’s long like mine, especially if you don’t have satin pillowcases. Always be sure to take off your make-up with an oil-based cleanser (cold cream is old-school for a reason, y’all), and wash your actual face with a water based cleanser- plain old water and baby soap will do just fine; never, ever, no matter what, go to sleep with your makeup on. Moisturize and wear sunscreen every day; don’t be afraid to add more conditioner, and brush brush brush. For hair like mine, which is fine, thick, and nearly bone straight, brushing every day is essential to getting the natural oils from my scalp all the way down the hair follicle and removing dead strands. I use a store bought conditioner on my ends, too, and spot check for splits when I’m on the toilet because what else can I really do while I’m on the toilet? Mm- other than the obvious, of course.

Go to sleep early enough to ensure you get at the very minimum, eight hours when you have to wake up- not because it’s the “minimum requirement”, though it is, but because you’ll look and feel like dog-shit without enough sleep.

Also! Fuck fad diets! The real secret to maintaining your weight is simply to Eat a Food when you’re hungry- not a snack, an actual food, like an egg or a sandwich- and stop eating when you’re full! Don’t eat because you’re bored or sad or angry! Be bored and sad and angry! It’s okay to be bored and sad and angry! Exercise! It’s better to walk somewhere- even just to the corner store- or even take the stairs when you can; you can even keep yourself healthy by doing about half an hour’s worth of physical labour in and around your house. Plant things; rake leaves; take out garbage; check the mail; laundry; dishes; sweep… Try not to get pickled- it’s okay to have one too many drinks if you want, but just be sure to drink as many glasses of water as you did glasses of coffee or booze.

There’s more I could think of, but… it’s about time to take off my eye mask and greet the day with something approaching a smile. A grimace? Is that the word? Bleh.

Oh holy hell, I didn’t notice until I turned on the lamp; our room’s a beginner-to-intermediate sex dungeon! Well, alright, it’s a fairly ostentatious hotel room at first glance… but there are one or two little things that make me think, no, this is a sex dungeon. A fairly vanilla sex dungeon, but a sex dungeon.

Firstly, I’m on one of the most comfortable waterproof sheets I think I’ve ever laid on; I can feel some of the terry cloth weave under the silk. It’s not my area of expertise, but I can tell that there are two fitted sheets, not one, because one layer has come loose near my feet, which happens when the sheets don’t quite fit the mattress, or when the waterproof sheets are new, and haven’t relaxed yet. And, of course, the advantage of using waterproof sheets over vinyl is that they last longer with hard use...

Secondly, literally everything in this room can be quickly wiped down or replaced for the purposes of cleaning. I’m out of bed, and- yes, the walls are covered with fabric, but the fabric is of the kind that can be quickly wiped clean with a damp sponge. The soft goods in the room—bedding, rugs, the cover on the couch, and so on—are all quickly replaceable, of course, as are the curtains which are covering… a very heavy pair of blackout curtains, and behind that, a window that’s been treated to be one way. A one-way mirror used as a window, I recognize the practice from love hotels and whorehouses—it’s a way to indulge in the fairly common fetish of exhibitionism without actually breaking any public decency laws. Oh, and there’s a micro-balcony because this window opens, nice; and I’d bet good money that the privacy hedge outside and the steep angle of the hill that leads to the walking path below, escorted as it is by tall flowers, makes it almost impossible to see into this balcony.

Thirdly, there are hard points scattered all over the room. There are loops of metal screwed into what must be the studs at nearly every possible height, set equidistant to each other in a way that could be considered artistic, if it weren’t for the fact that linen rope of the correct gauge to fit through the brassy hard points is in both side-table drawers. The cabinet below is full of bandages, bandage tape, two kinds of lube, spermicide gel and foam, dental dams, and condoms. There’s even a little basket that I’d bet fits right into an auto-sanitizer, like they use in hospitals and whorehouses for the various toys I’m quite certain can be rented from the front desk and delivered to this room. There’s a small phone-snail and a menu, and a little printer too for receipt tickets, even.

The reason this is a beginner to intermediate level sex dungeon is how they did soundproofing, in that they didn’t—they did noise absorption. Noise absorption is achieved by changing the characteristic of the noise. Stop it from echoing. Stop the reverberation. Stop the noise reflections. All this involves handling the noise that is within the room. It seldom involves noise from outside the room. You have likely heard of a room as being a “live” room or a “dead” room. For this type of noise reduction or soundproofing you will use carpets, upholstered furniture, acoustical ceiling tile, soundboard or interior walls.

What works for noise absorption does not ever work for noise reduction. Yeah, that’s right:
soundboard is useless at stopping noise. When put up with the sheetrock it is useless unless it is the outside layer. Making this an intermediate at most sex dungeon, as the participants within are still fairly concerned with surfaces to set the mood, rather than bringing the mood themselves.

You learn things when your mothers are Very Serious about teaching you The Sex, Sexuality, Romance, Gender, and Gender Identity Knowledge. Like, for example, knowing that the the ceiling is not decorated in an avant-garde manner, but actually festooned with hooks between the tiles.

Classy.

Ugh, I need to get ready for the day. Hair first, then makeup; brush, perfume, part, braid, pin, add the bells after. Makeup is never more than waterproof eyeliner and mascara; add lipgloss after. That’s everything I needed a mirror for, so out I go— and Aster is panicking about…

“Aster, it’s fine,” I said.

“-BUT WHY ARE THERE HANDCUFFS?” Aster screeched.

“Some people like being restrained. Bathroom’s free, by the way— meet down in the Cafe for breakfast at six-thirty sharp, aye?” I said.

“A-aye, I’ll just… get ready for the day…” Aster mumbled, shuffling into the bathroom. The door is fully shut when the shriek of horrified embarrassment comes- ah, he must have found the auto-sanitizer, with it’s helpful little cartoons...

I peel off my chemise, change underwear, and pull on my spare jumpsuit. Normally, I’d put on my jinbaori and be ready for the day, but there’s two problems with that- firstly, because Queen Scratch is in residence at the Chihiro Sento, more formal attire is required, and secondly, I shredded it yesterday. It’s… almost completely ruined.

Deep breaths, Tilly; we soldier on. Mab will be… not exactly happy to make me another one, but she will, if I ask her to… and pay her for the time. Oh, wow, okay, why did Ren pack one of my very best dresses…?

My jumpsuits are actually a set of five, for reasons I feel are obvious, as they were on sale and I’ve yet to outgrow them; pasties and a bandeau, to keep my dugs restrained, and body glue to keep the bandeau in place no matter what; and my jacket. It looks red in the soft mood lighting of this room, but in the sunlight from the window it blazes an intense, royal blue. It has cap sleeves, a small keyhole in the front, and a much larger keyhole in the back, as it was made for a full grown Demon woman, not a girl. I suppose I really did need a new jinbaori anyway, but I’d have certainly preferred not to tear the one my sister made for me to pieces...

I put on new clean socks, pull on my yellow shoes, tie them and wrap them so I don’t forget later; wrap my hands and wrists and put the my-flesh tone color gloves over those- I need to get my nails done soon, probably after the case- and finally… uh, perfume, check, no jewellery, check, pack my bag for the day.

Fur stole on; bag over shoulder and across my body; key for the room, final check… wallet, keys, phone, purse, hair bells off the side table and one on the back of each bun, check to make sure the ribbons are neat- check, okay, let’s go.

---

DAY 2

Chihiro Sento; First Wing, First Floor Hallway

I step out of the room and make sure to close the door behind me, hearing the click that denotes a successful lock. Oh, it’s Sue- oh wow, she’s gone more formal than I’ve seen her since graduation at SOL:A.

She’s wearing- holy crap, she’s wearing shoes! Floral pants like she always wears, but I can tell by the sheen that they’re a much finer cut of fabric, and- oh, I’ve seen her wear the summer version of those, which are shorter, but… yeah, the winter ones go all the way to just past her ankles, and I know she wraps her feet like I do, she’s a kickboxer like me… Her shirt is a crop top, and made entirely out of lace. Well, she hides it as best she can, but she’s a provocative shit-head, and don’t let anyone tell you otherwise.

Over the pants and under the shirt, there’s a stretchy haramaki in her favorite color of magenta that goes from her hips all the way over her dugs. Over the haramaki and the shirt is a sash belt in the local style, because Sue Yiu’s never met a layer she hasn’t liked; and if this was a regular day, it’d be tied in front, but it’s a Court day, so the bow is in the small of her back. Her vest is actually an ultra fine mesh that photographs solid, but looks see-through in person and over everything, there’s a cape. It’s a very fine cape, actually, I’ve only seen one other even remotely like it, and that was in a drawing- and, yes, there is a hood just like on my stole, but it’s currently off her head.

She’s changed her hair! There are thick gold ribbons woven around her braids, and fine golden chains woven in her braids, and they’ve been pinned on each side of her head, leaving her angle cut bangs to hang loose- and she’s smirking at me?

Shit, I was staring.

“A woman’s liable to get ideas when she’s examined like that, Portgas,” smirks Yiu.

“You hardly ever change your look; I wanted to be sure that you’re still you, underneath all that paint and gloss,” I sneer.

“Hmph. Yes, well- still me, underneath it all. And… I suppose you didn’t enjoy your Imbolc, considering you never, ah, you n-never called back...” said Yiu- no, Siusan.

“I- no. No, I didn’t really like, uhm, I didn’t like… I didn’t like licking you. I- I didn’t like the taste, or the texture, and… I should have just told you then I wasn’t having a good time,” I said.

“No, no, I- I should have been more attentive, to your needs. I- I’m sorry, I wasn’t… I wasn’t a good lover,” said Siusan.

“No-! I’m sorry, I shouldn’t… I should have called you back, I should have… fuck, we really ruined our friendship, huh?” I said, shaking my head.

“I mean, that’s usually what happens when friends decide to be lovers, even once. Even if things had worked out to be the very best possible, our friendship would have been different,” said Siusan, smiling sadly.

I sigh.

So does Suisan.

“Tigerlily, I- we could try again? It’s okay if you didn’t like something, and I would like to try again… if you’ll have me...” said Siusan, hopefully.

“I- sure? We- ah, we can try dating, maybe, or, um, just… being together. What, ah, what did you have in mind?” I said.

“I- hah, well, maybe we could take things slower? We don’t have to go right to the, uh, sex-stuff, we can just cuddle if you want… maybe go to the outdoor theater when it’s warmer?” said Siusan.

“I’d like that, Siusan,” I said.
So, Ren’s a meddler; I know why he packed that pretty dress. Hell, I think I saw a cute pair of flats and a spring-weight jacket in my luggage too, but of course I never manage to get around to unpacking until right about when I have to repack everything to go back home and need to fit everything back in my suitcase…

I shake my head, and my bells chime gently.

“Tilly…?” said Sue.

“So, did Freckle and Grump pack date-night clothing for you, too?” I said, smirking.

“…! Those meddling dogs!” said Sue.

“Hahahaha, yeah, Ren got me too. Think we should make ‘em sweat it out?” I said, grinning.

“Mm. Nah, they’ve been listening behind the doors of their rooms since we started talking- there wouldn’t be much point, I think. Although, we could probably get away with just going straight to breakfast and letting them squirm…” sniggered Sue.

“Awkward. I like it. Let’s go, then,” I said.

And then, we’re off. Behind us, I hear the sharp barking laughter of Franky and Gary, along with the high, fluttering laughter of Ren; and beyond them, the growling of Gunther, and the soft chittering of Hue Lin and Mue Lin, and the grumpy hoots of Sage. I’ve never really thought about it seriously, but I think the main reason Sue Yiu has a team of five people, and mine is only three, is because of how many more people she has to coordinate with to get her side of the job done.

Gunther Stonedge is very like Aster Mistburrow in the small details- he grew up in Mistvale, same as Aster, he has two older brothers, he’s a spirit channeler… but the devil is in those little details. For one thing, Gunther is a much less jolly person in general, what with all the black and red. For another, his main focus for the channeling of spirits isn’t a staff, but a small flock of crows he hand raises every few years. On formal occasions, like today and tomorrow, his normal cape of spotted woodpecker and grouse feathers is exchanged for a cape of spotted woodpecker, blackbird, and cuckoo feathers, which gives an ominous depth to his presence- no second chances, clarity, and being overlooked are a heady combination.

Franklin “Freckle” and Gary “Grump”, also known as the Wulf Brothers, are Sue’s personal assistants. One has the job of coordinating her general life details, while the other has the job of coordinating her work details- making sure her schedule for each case includes all the officials she needs to talk to, and so on. Lots of people think that there’s some cool reason they always wear scarves wrapped around their faces, but the truth is they just both have headgear toothbraces, and don’t want people to see. Most people think you can only get toothbraces as children; the truth is, you can only get toothbraces when you have enough money to pay for it out of pocket, as the NHS doesn’t pay for it unless your dentist says it’s a genuine health risk. Some people get dealt a bad hand in their tooth arrangements; Freckle and Gary were not dealt particularly bad hands, but they are just a little self-conscious about their teeth. Then again, they’ve got just enough Lanjin to dilute the Mink enough to have a mismatched teeth-pattern to actual tooth, and I’ve heard them bitching about caring for their hair and skin- apparently, they have patches that are more fur like that actually grow under their long-hair, all of which shed at different rates. Hard Luck.
Finally, there’s Hue and Mue Lin, Sue Yiu’s research paralegals. The reason we have teams of paralegals behind us is simply because even if they’re all good at parsing the law, each of them has a different specialty- Hue and Mue Lin are only really comfortable socially with Sage, and Sage is an awkward turtle of a man. Their wedding was nice, though, and the three of them are very happy, so far as the rest of us can tell. Hue and Mue are almost relentlessly happy, upbeat, and cheerful, so… I guess it’s a good balance-match to Sage’s near constant pessimism.

DAY 2 (48 HOURS REMAIN)

Even so, even with all the ephemeral details of our teams, and my relationship issues with Sue, and the weirdness of passing the actual rent-a-dungeon desk, which looks more like the entrance to a discrete spa- even then, I still can’t stop turning the information revealed in yesterday’s trial over and over in my mind. Something about this whole thing stinks, beyond the corruption in the Judge.

We need Judge Bartok’s personal records- his purchases, sure, but also we need to know if he’s married, who’s on his payroll, and so on. Something about Kayumi Polleen’s attitude yesterday strikes me as suspicious… she was awfully resistant to answering questions, and seemed especially convinced I was going to somehow inconvenience her. I need the results of our tested substances back- I need to know what in the tea I got from the Scene, exactly, caused that silver to oxidize; and I need to know what exactly killed the Coffyns.

As for Answers to the questions so far posed… Mister Vinsmoke does indeed know Missus Morgan better than anyone- considering how often they have sex, he would have to. There are only so many things you can try before it’s just not as fun anymore- the fact that they’re still going strong after three years of marriage means they must know each other very well indeed, otherwise that much sex would become a chore, not a privilege. We need his version of events, no doubt.

Aster will be able to tell me at breakfast about the locks, and if there was any mystic aura to detect.

What the hell was the baked good on the table, where did it come from, and who made it? We haven’t proven that Mince Coffyn did- he said he made tarts for his mother fairly often, but we don’t know for sure if he did the day of the murder, nor do we know what he normally makes tarts with. We don’t even know for sure that it’s a tart that killed the Coffyns, only that chunks of fruit tart were found in their stomachs. Got that off the preliminary autopsy report; I’ll need the updated one to make further inductions and conclusions.

Where is Mince Coffyn’s camera, his pictogalbums, and the various paraphernalia for pictography that would have been in his bag? Did Osvaldo Bartok really steal it; and if so, why?

None of the Coffyns had a nerve disorder; the parents were, however, avid mithridatists. Could they have been self-dosing with arsenic acid? If so, how?

Mab Morgan could not have committed this crime, as the modus operandi is entirely wrong for her, and the victims were her customers besides. Opportunity does not equal motive; just because a person can do something doesn’t mean they will.

Dracule and Lefay need to be interviewed and possibly called to the stand; not just to testify for themselves, but to produce the aforementioned “Banana”, “Kusa-chan”, and “Marzipan”. Any of those five might have seen or heard something that proves important to the case.
Is the time of year significant? I don’t know enough about this case to make a definitive “yes” or “no” determination.

Urrgh. I also need to go to Daiso for a Vape and a mixture of specific Essential Oils. I forgot my moon-phases again- but, well, February is fucking weird, okay?

February 5th

Chihiro Sento; Cafeteria

Properly speaking, breakfast in winter- and make no mistake, even if Imbolc was not more than two days past, it is still winter, February is the Starving Month- is almost always okayu, oatmeal, or congee, with a wide arrangement of condiments and additives so you get a bit of interest in your bowl.

Today’s breakfast is no different; a bowl of kashi with curls of candied lime peel, a small stack of lentil dosa, a small bowl of spicy kadala, a larger bowl of brisling in mustard sauce, bhar bhat, tonak, poha… and Kimchi over fluffy white rice, because it’s going to be a long-ass day and it’s very cold outside. No chest colds.

“Hey Tilly,” said Ace.

“Hey, Asher- g’morning!” I said.

“Morning! Ah- can you answer a few questions of mine, please?” said Ace.

“Uh, maybe? I’ll do my best, brother-” I said.

“Why was Mab arrested? I’m the one charged with protecting this area of Ryugu Mergyo, and I’ve got crew stationed here… so why did they arrest Mab?” said Ace, suspicious- as any Portgas would be.

“Politics, for one- not wanting to put Danelphe in a bad position, for another,” interjects Sue.

...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.

“...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.

“Politics, for one- not wanting to put Danelphe in a bad position, for another,” interjects Sue.

“Hah?” said Ace, eyebrows furrowing.

“Why was Mab arrested? I’m the one charged with protecting this area of Ryugu Mergyo, and I’ve got crew stationed here… so why did they arrest Mab?” said Ace, suspicious- as any Portgas would be.

“Politics, for one- not wanting to put Danelphe in a bad position, for another,” interjects Sue.

“Hah?” said Ace, eyebrows furrowing.

“Politics, for one- not wanting to put Danelphe in a bad position, for another,” interjects Sue.

“Hah?” said Ace, eyebrows furrowing.

“...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.

“...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.

“...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.

“...It’d be an act of War, or- there’d be someone, somewhere, who’d take it as such,” said Ace, scowling into his bowl of congee.
weight. It’s not so… volatile, her position in these things. Further, she’s got the temperament to be arrested with little more than a bit of resigned irritation and dark sarcasm. What do you suppose would have happened if someone had tried to arrest you, Asher?” I said, mild as milk.

Ace grimaced, but nodded with some chagrin, the rage-scars on his hands and wrists and forearms glinting silver in the light.

“As for Danelphe… you do know that the Courts are Unyielding, aye? Rigid, even- their Inquiries are invasive and overwhelming, and their Rulings are final. Asher- Ace, brother, if you had been arrested, and everything had gone as it has gone… Danelphe would have been left in the untenable position of deciding whether you would live, or die. They’ve made that decision before, for Mab-countless times, even, as it took countless tries for Mab to Earn Her Name, but on those occasions Danelphe was allowed the Mercy of their kinder nature. Court does not allow for such. Disregarding everything else- their love for your Father, their doting on you- yes, Asher, they dote and brag on you all the time, you’re just never in a position to hear it or see it… Asher, they let you wear their cape, they let you hug them, they… they do not Insist on making you wear a shirt. You are their very favorite child; their most beloved. And if you had been arrested, Danelphe would have been the one to Judge if you had committed a Crime under Skuan Law,” I said.

“Oh,” said Ace, wide eyed.

“Mm. Oh, indeed,” said Mab, in a fine white shirt and a curving ladies vest and a soft pair of honey-colored buckskin trousers- shit, knitted Kushy ankle boot covers, breeches and smooth boots- hell, I’ve only ever seen my sister this visibly angry once before, and that… shit, I can’t even remember why, just that she was. There’s jewelry, too, just to make the point sink in- her charnellements, of course, are dangling from her ears, and there’s the badge of her Office, hanging around her neck on a short, fine chain. Her hair is in thick, coiling braids, wrapped around her head like a serpentine crown- a fillet of hair.

And her eyes… underneath her bottom eyelid, there is a thick, black line, like the startling red of a Noh mask eye but black, and a second black line following the crease of her eyelids- because that’s what Fae warriors do when they’re going into battle…

My sister, for all her gentle manners, is a dangerous lady. Crossing her is crossing over your own grave- with no guarantee that something in those sepulchral depths won’t just reach out… and touch you.

Ace is a seasoned pirate, son of one of the Great Sea Lords- and yet, and yet… in a fight, I wouldn’t dare say which of the two would win… and which of the two would Fall.

“Tilly- it’s about time for one of your courses, aye?” said Mab.

“Aye,” I said.

“Here, then- I bought it for you before I knew why, yesterday,” said Mab, handing me a Soothie Blue Vape.

I grin, make sure the little bottle of oil and water is in correctly- safety first- and take a long, heady drag of the heavy blue-tinted mist. What comes out of my nose is pale white and cloudy; and the deep easing of pain in my guts is all the indication of veracity I need. After a moment, I dig through my purse and find my vape clip, and the little chain too- and into the smoking pocket of my stole it goes. My watchlace, I pull out and wind for the day- also adding the necessary alarms, one for lunch, one for Court, a third for Bedtime… and around my neck it goes. It will vibrate against my skin when the time comes; otherwise, it’s just a necklace that tells time. Nothing terribly special about that.

Ace is staring at my vape.

“Okay, I have to try it,” said Ace.

“Eh?” I said.

“Easy, Yuki, Jackie, Atty, Gabbie, Sisko, Fee, Del, and you, Tilly- even Mab and Spadey, sometimes, and Mommarav and Auntie all the time- all of you are puffing on those things, and they don’t smell like anything but mist and flowers if I’m close. So. I have to try one, if that’s alright-” said Ace.

“Oh, uh, sure. But- maybe not with a Blue? It’s really strong...” I said.

“Yeah, sure, whatever,” said Ace, before taking my Soothie Blue and inhaling deeply of it.

Mab’s eyebrows have gone straight up, behind her glasses. My own eyes are wide as saucers. Sue, the brat, is laughing so hard tears are starting to form in her eyes.

Ace is still holding his breath. He actually holds his breath long enough that Sue stops laughing and starts looking worried too; before finally letting loose a thick-rising cloud of fine white mist. Looks like a cumulus.

Oh, there it is- the CBD just hit, I can tell by how relaxed Ace just got. The goofy grin is also a bit of a giveaway, as is the staring at his arm and the giggling. Mab has very carefully tugged my Soothie Blue out of Ace’s hand, and given it back to me.

I clip it back into my smoke clip, and after taking another drag tuck the entire thing away in my stole.
I carefully catch the eye of Nadia, who is stifling a giggle into her toast and watching her Commander sway and grin to himself.

“Keep an eye on him, please. He is my older brother, after all,” I said.

“Of course!” said Nadia, who is not a morning person. I can tell because that’s the shortest sentence I’ve ever heard her say.

Aster chooses that moment to tap me on the shoulder. I turn, and look, and see that he’s got Ren and Sage at his back and a stack of files just begging for my perusal.

Right. Oh, there’s Gunther coming with Freckle and Gary and Hue and Mue Lin; time to get to work.
February 5th

Chihiro Town Detention Center Hallway

The actual exterior of the detention center was built to look like any other building—a particularly nice office building, even. It’s only slightly imposing, really; the overall vibe really is one of a fairly high-class hotel mixed with a bureaucracy steeped Office—half posh, one half it gets done in it’s own time, usually too late to be of any use to anyone.

The edifice is clean; the lobby is clean; the halls are clean. No unlit corners; no blind hallways. Because I’m looking for them, I can see the security snails watching everything with bland care; and because I’m listening for the echo, I can hear the hidden hallways that would allow an Officer of Detention to quickly get into any hall in this building without alerting any of the other detainees of their passage.

The Cell Blocks are separated from the actual Intake and Exeunt by a system of elevators and trolleys that lead deep into the bedrock of the island; although it’s technically only a detention center, it was designed as a prison. On the way to the cell holding Lorenzo Bartok, I reviewed what my team had found for me.

Judge Bartok’s personal records show a very clear and damning pattern— a steady withdrawal of funds nearly every day, in cash. Could be innocent— but for that much money, I doubt it. Patterns like that mean gambling, drugs, paying off a blackmailer… something.

He was married, to a woman named in the Marriage Certificate as Isadora Polleen; they have one child in the City Registry that we can pull records for, but there’s a note here that says they filed for more birth certificates… That child is named Osvaldo Bartok, and he’s got a record of petty misdemeanors that steadily gets thicker and more outrageous as he ages from the age of… six? Six years old. I’m… hm. That’s odd, is what that is.

Kayumi Polleen definitely has more information to share than she’s letting on. Sage is a thorough researcher, after all— and Kayumi is the only Polleen sister still unmarried; she would have known Isadora, being sisters, and— yes, here, a wedding photo… that’s been torn in half?

Added to Evidence: Half of a Wedding Photo

Let’s see, what else- Lorenzo Bartok has the regular bevy of bailiffs and paralegals under his employ, and Sage didn’t report any discrepancies in their behaviours, so we can strike them from the suspect list… and he’s got no personal employees, no maid, no cook, no housekeeper; he never has. That’s flatly impossible, there’s no actual way to get everything he needs done without more than himself and his underage son doing— so. He’s lying; and here we are, once a month quite a bit more than his daily withdrawal in cash, of course…

Added to Evidence: Lorenzo Bartok’s Withdrawal Records
There was Arsenic Acid in the tea as well as in the tarts, which caused the silver to oxidize due to the sulfur compounds; and the Coffyns were killed with lethal amounts of Cyanide, which… could not be found at the scene… Hmm. I need to know more about Mince Coffyn’s Camera. Mithridatism explains the Arsenic Acid, I’d wager. The murder weapon was not an apple tart- it was a lemon meringue tartlet, meaning Mince Coffyn couldn’t have made the tarts in question, as he is a Bad Baker in Batters. We have Mince Coffyn’s receipts- he’s noted for buying materials for mince pies fairly often, as well as yeast breads and shortcrust pastry, but no whole fruit, and no juices either.

Apple Coffyn was nerve-dead a the time her baby was correctly surgically removed from her body; and she was brain dead by the time the poison impregnated her emptied uterus, which would have killed the baby within. Small traces of placenta and endometrium were found on Apple Coffyn’s kimono and obi, with the rest being hidden under a false floorboard in the tatami room, along with an umbilical cord and tools for surgery. The placenta had no Cyanide in any amount, meaning- it’s very likely that the baby is still alive. The safe that was also in that hidden space, curiously, was empty, even though the Coffyns were registered as having requested the use it.

Added to Evidence: Surgery was Performed Correctly

Added to Evidence: Safe was Emptied

Added to Evidence: No Cyanide in Placenta

Mister Vinsmoke still needs to provide testimony…

According to Aster, the locks on the outer doors of the hotel rooms in Wing Three are not pickable with anything other than magic, and there being no mystic residue, no magic was used. The inner doors don’t actually lock at all.

The only person who can provide credible answers about the why of it are Osvaldo; for now, I must assume that he did steal Mister Coffyn’s bag, as it wouldn’t be the first time he did a bit of purse snatching.

Mab Morgan didn’t do this; Mince Coffyn didn’t do this. Looking again at the Judge Registration File, it appears the Coffyns weren’t merely judging the World’s Worst Bakers; they were in charge of protecting and distributing the Grand Prize.

If I’m reading this log of purchases correctly, Lorenzo Bartok almost certainly did murder them- he had means, he has motive… and if this is right, he had opportunity, too.

Added to Evidence: Picture of Lorenzo Bartok at the Baccarat Table

Dracule and Lefay were interviewed by Ren, actually- and they will be called to the stand, along with their compatriots.

Finally- the time of year is significant; Isadora Bartok died on the Third of February.
Lorenzo “Magnificent” Bartok would never have been able to become a Judge in Fiddler’s Green. He was a gunslinger; gunslingers aren’t the type of people given that kind of power under the Law.

A gunslinger is a kind of fighter who uses guns and gunplay; they are still considered one of the more vulgar kinds of fighters, much more likely to be of the populous than the gentry. If you have the talent for it, learning to use a gun “good enough” can be as simple as getting a book from the library and going to the shooting range for a few months.

You don’t need honor to be a gunslinger, not in the same way swordsmen so often do; guns are still young enough as a Conception that there’s no real gun spirit - and that’s not getting into the distinctions, either. Some guns- most guns, even- don’t work on most Sea Kings, simply because the amount of focus one needs to apply Haki to a bullet being fired is significantly higher than the amount of focus one needs to apply to a sword. Guns have doubt attached to them in ways swords and knives and spears and fists simply don’t.

In his youth, Lorenzo the Magnificent was a Drifter, not out to do much more than get enough money together he could pay off his most significant debts and have some left over to gamble with. He was a young man smack in the middle of the Great Western Migration, part of the fallout of the economic depression in Wes Blue about twenty years ago.

He was known for his incredibly quick draw, and his spectacular trick shots; his guns were named “Truth” and “Mercy”. All of his bullets were marked with palle, also known as balls, and he was known for shooting people in the mouth (the fastest way to the spine). After doing a series of services to the Royal Seat of Ryugu Mergyo, he was given a full Pardon for his crimes against the Kingdom, and- using some of the money he was given for previous services- went to Law School, becoming a Prosecutor and eventually Judge.

His trick shots included pinning an Ace of Diamonds to a tree, walking sixty paces away, then shooting the diamond right out of the center of the card; and fending off the only “Trillity Standoff” style ambush on him, personally, in this country’s history with a manual action revolver. He interviewed for his college place as a Prosecutor- which in those days was an arm of the Police, not the Court- by throwing a hundred beri coin in the air and shooting through its center and through the heart-area of the target on the range. The Dean waived his Secondary School Diploma requirement, and the rest is history. As a "special negotiator", brought in to deal with hostage situations and standoffs- with terminal consequences for the suspects who chose to try to out-shoot him- he became so well-known and so feared that law enforcement only had to call him to the scene and suspects would surrender without a fight.

He was wanted for Theft, Extortion, Gambling, Murder, and Indecent Exposure; his Royal Pardon absolved him of all crimes for services rendered to the crown. A man willing to steal, rob, kill, and indecent himself for the filthy habit of gambling doesn’t quite change; he might get better at controlling his urges, he might get his hands on a much larger sum of money and someone who holds onto it better than he ever could… but he never stops longing to gamble. Once you’ve gone a ways into hell, with a longing to return to a habit that drew you down into that perditious place before, going back- going further - is a prospect that gleams like fools gold and poker chips.

Added to Evidence: Wanted Poster for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok

Added to Evidence: Royal Pardon for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok

Here’s the thing; just looking at the evidence, there’s no way in hell Lorenzo Bartok is innocent of this crime. Aster said as much before we got in here.

To which, I reply: our duty as Defence is to Defend, no matter what.

No matter our opinion of our Defendants.

Lorenzo Bartok is an old man with blood and fire in his past; young enough to have fathered a teenage son, but old enough to be grown twenty years ago. He’s got a flat black hat in the Wes Blue style common twenty years ago, and he wears a chased bronze bolo-tie in the shape of a skull. The aglets on the leather of his tie are made of bullets. White shirt; black suit; old bloodstains that never quite washed all the way out. His pipe looses a draught of noxious fumes as he stares at me for a long moment.

I finish my perusal of his file; and then I look at him for a long moment.

Presented: Flyer for “World’s Worst Baker’s Contest”.

“Is this supposed to mean something to me?” sang Mister Bartok.

“Think hard, or you’ll never be free,” I sang.

“...I suppose the prize money is of some import,” grumbled Mister Bartok.

“Just think: if you’d only filled out the entry form, it could have been yours,” said Aster.

“Feh; try my son. I’m not much in terms of cooking, it’s true- but my son is… cursed, in the kitchen, especially when it comes to baking. I might have gotten to the second tier… Oz could have gone all the way,” said Mister Bartok, bitterness and raw greed turning his fairly nice mezzo-bass into a wretch in the gutter, begging for scraps.

“Hm. But did he want to?” I said.

“No, he didn’t. Useless boy...” sneered Mister Bartok.

Presented: Half of Wedding Photo

“I thought she burned all of them...” said Mister Bartok, wide eyed.
“Who?” I said.

“Kayumi- she never did like that I married her sister, and she refused to come to Oz’s Confirmation before the Gods- ah, that one wasn’t torn in half, it was folded,” said Mister Bartok.

“Oh- oh! Wow, you look so happy together,” said Aster.

“Heh. Yeah, we sure do look happy,” said Mister Bartok.

Added to Evidence: Whole Wedding Photo

Presented: Lorenzo Bartok’s Withdrawal Records

“Ah. That,” said Mister Bartok.

“Mm. Could you explain this, please?” I said.

“I- gamble. That’s not illegal,” said Mister Bartok, hunching into himself as if avoiding a blow to the head.

“No; it’s not illegal. But… it’s suspicious. What’s especially concerning is the amount of money you spend, at the same time, every day- just enough to be written off as a snack, but the same amount, every day, sir,” I said.

“…” said Mister Bartok.

“Then, here, it’s once a day at almost twice the amount- and now, well, you’ve dug yourself a fine ditch, haven’t you? Mister Bartok?” I said.

“…” repeated Mister Bartok.

Presented: Surgery was Performed Correctly

“What’s this matter to me?” said Mister Bartok.

“Well, I don’t know how much you’d know about it- but, for the first, what, six?” I said.

“Seven, usually-” said Aster.

“For the first seven months of a baby’s life, the mystical imprint of their mother is carried in their aura- the imprint entire, from the circumstances of their conception, to their birth. In this case, we’d certainly find a Permissible Echo of the mother’s murderer. Isn’t that neat?” I said.

“...Still, what does this have to do with me?” said Mister Bartok.

“Hm, well- it’s interesting, no? The baby in the deceased was removed surgically, and correctly- and isn’t it funny that the terms of your pardon reflect a certain surgical skill...” I said.

“…” said Mister Bartok.
“And, of course, most interesting of all… no baby has been found, living, dead, or otherwise. Almost like someone’s hiding the poor thing,” I said.

And Lorenzo Bartok blanches. -It’s hearsay; it won’t hold up in Court. But, if we can’t bag him, giving my observations to the Executioners ought to sort things out sharpish…

Presented: Safe was Emptied

“The money wasn’t there, you know,” I said, conversationally.

“...what?” said Mister Bartok.

“The Coffyns kept the prize money in their suite safe; and no one- not the coroner, not the police, not even their own son- no one has possession of the money. No one that we’ve found, anyway; and no one’s begun to spend it, either. A million dola- and the contest was to be in, what, two days?” I said.

“Mm-hm,” said Aster.

“Well. The Coffyns got the Dola exchanged to more than enough beri to cover over all a man’s sins the day before their murders- and it. Isn’t. There,” I said.

“What,” said Mister Bartok.

“Hm. So you don’t know anything about that? Such a shame...” I said, staring directly into Mister Bartok’s eyes.

Presented: No Cyanide in Placenta

“Not many people could have done that surgery in time, y’know,” I said.

“...” said Mister Bartok.

“We have the placenta- the baby’s egg sac? And wouldn’t you know it- no poison in th’sac, and it has to go through th’sac to get to the baby,” said Aster.

“It would have taken about… well, our Sage dug up the old record for it- someone who could draw a gun and shoot the center out of the Ace of Diamonds after throwing it out a window… someone who was pardoned for performing a cesarean section on Queen Otohime in less than five minutes...” I said.

“So what? Even if I could do something like that in five minutes-” sneered Mister Bartok.

“Mister Bartok…” I sighed, shaking my head in mock amusement.

Presented: Picture of Lorenzo Bartok at the Baccarat Table

“That’s you, right?” I said, pointing to the relevant area of the picture.
“Yeah, what of it?” said Mister Bartok, bored and hiding his fear.

“The thing about casinos, especially those owned by the Devil, Mister Bartok? They consider debtors to be only just above scum in the hierarchy of the World; and they watch scum closely, at all times. You owe the Teahouse Social Club - oouf, Aster, that number, it fair made my head spin, it did-” I said.

“A million five hundred thousand beri, Tilly,” said Aster.

“Wao. And the prize money from the World’s Worst Bakers… a million dola, well. That’s not just enough to cover a man’s sins, that’s enough to let him sin again, every day, until he dies- still a rich man, if a foolish one. Hell’s bells, for a hundred million beri, even men who’ve never entertained a thought to kill another would find themselves in a murderous mood- much less a man staring down an appointment with the… hmm, what’s the slang for them again?” I said.

“Legbreakers?” said Aster.

“Good enough for me, Aster,” I said.

“…” said Mister Bartok.

“Tch- a man in debt so deep it’s looking like a pair of broken legs and his own neck in a social loophole set to strangle at any moment is the only way out… a hundred million beri, exchanged from dola the very day before the Coffyns turn up dead… and the only man with motive, and the skills to make the crime scene as it was, well… he won’t account for his time the day of the murders,” I said.

“…” said Mister Bartok.

“Where were you, Mister Bartok? Maybe you did go to the restroom for your average seventeen minutes- but you were out of the casino for forty-five, and Mister Bartok… even allowing for irregularities and visitations, you’d have taken twenty eight minutes at most,” I said.

“A lollygagger you are not, sir,” said Aster.

“So- I just have to ask, Mister Bartok- for those, hm, extra seventeen minutes… what, exactly, where you doing?” I said.

“…” said Mister Bartok.

I smiled, and asked nothing further.

Presented: Wanted Poster for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok

“What’s that got to do with anything?” said Mister Bartok.

“This man is you twenty years ago, correct?” I said.

“Yes? What of it?” said Mister Bartok.

“Just being thorough, sir,” I said.

Presented: Royal Pardon for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok
“Mine as well. Thoroughness, I presume?” said Mister Bartok.

“Yes sir; all part of my job,” I said.

Presented: Crumbs from Empty Plate

“...Are those supposed to mean anything to me?” said Mister Bartok, shifting in his seat.

“Mmm. I suppose not, Mister Bartok,” I said, staring him down.

Presented: Six TSC Chips.

Mister Bartok takes one look at the evidence bag of chips, turns an alarming shade of puce, and lunges for the divider- which, of course, activates the electrical collar around his neck, dropping him into unconsciousness.

Gotcha.

The guards carry him out; and I share a glance with Aster before we both leave the Detention Center. Judge Lorenzo Bartok is guilty as hell, but we can’t not defend him. Damn it all to hell; just… blast, hellfire, and damnation.

---

February 5th

Sento Chihiro, Teahouse Social Club

Every resort I can think of that’s ever been built for rich people- damn rich people, even- to play in has a casino. The Gran Tesoro, which my brother Spadille took over maybe three years ago, was originally an orchid-lover’s floating hothouse; it became the massive casino-resort structure it is today through a series of events only Spadey really knows for sure, and he’s not telling anyone.

The Teahouse Social Club, which my Danelphe owns outright, was originally just that- a teahouse and social club, with a few games of mahjong, go, and cards here and there for entertainment. And the exotic dancers, of course. Most people don’t really look into the history of prostitution, but it has one- a long one, it’s the oldest profession for a reason, and yes, a prostitute is a professional. There is a reason this place, Chihiro Sento specifically, it’s entire campus- there’s a reason it’s considered part of the Skywards Coalition of Islands, both legally and socially.

Because, you see- in Skua? Whore-houses are temples of faith, too. The Teahouse Social Club is dedicated to the goddesses of deception, wisdom, experience, and age- Ame-no-Uzume, Mohini, Brigid, Beten- and Fortuna, because it’s also a casino. Every year on Mabon, this temple’s most sacred day, there’s a sacred orgy that happens.
Aster and I are actually staying in overflow rooms meant for Mabon’s inevitable crush of piety—explains why it’s more ‘sex dungeon’ than ‘hotel room’. Then again, due to the building and zoning laws of Ryugu Mergyo, love hotels are cheaper and more popular than any other kind…

The TSC doesn’t have slot machines- probably because Danelphe didn’t want to deal with patrons pissing and shitting themselves so they could stay on a particular machine, and they can’t stand the noise of a pachinko parlour- they own one, it’s on the other side of the hotel, and from what I understand, it’s run very nicely…

And there it is. The Coin Pit.

I know in house it’s probably got a name like the Check Exchange or something like that, but really? It’s where you throw money in and get scrip out- scrip that can be used in the casino freely, and is much easier to keep track of than a handful of money…

I might as well explain it; I thought long and hard about my Path before deciding, and running a casino was in my cards. Knowledge Earned, friends.

Chips are the currency of casinos and poker games around the world. Walk into any brick-and-mortar casino and you’ll see more than a few chips. Even the sound they make as they clink together is as timeless as the bright lights of the Vegas Strip.

There’s a lot of money in Vegas, but it all starts with those little round chips you see circulating the casino floor. So why do casinos use chips instead of cash? At first, you’d think it would be easier to deal with cold, hard cash. There would be no need to constantly cash in and cash out. The casino wouldn’t have to hire cashiers simply to exchange chips for cash. Things would run easier, wouldn’t they?

Well, casinos use chips for a few reasons, and it’s not just tradition. Let’s see what I remember…

The main reason casinos use chips over cash is because of separation- you’re not gambling your hard earned money away, you’re playing a game with game tokens. Logically, you know that the chips represent actual money, but since it isn’t straight cash in your hands, you feel less inhibition towards taking on bigger and bigger risks. Is’a matter of psychology- think about it like this. If you wanted to place a fifty-thousand beri bet- five hundred dola- on’a hand of Grease and all you had was cash, you would have to sit there and count it all out. It might be five ten-thou’ beri notes, or a stately stack fresh, crisp, thousand beri bills. But it’s real, and it’s right there, and it’s accepted at your local Daiso for a couple bags of fish-snacks and a bottle of tea. Counting out all that dosh gives time for what’s happening to really sink in and fester- but if it’s a chip? Just a funny little coin thing, don’t weigh anything like a real one, silly little bits on, funny color? Throw a gold-ish one down on the table; it’s just the one, doesn’t look like much at all. Just a single lonely chip sitting there in the shadow of the green felt sea. One second, and the money’s gone.

Chips provide casinos with an extra layer of security. The casino issues and controls those chips, and it’s International Standard Practice (ISP) to have a number of tricks embedded into the chips, including a tracking mechanism. That’s what I’m here for, really- Mister Bartok had a few chips in his personal effects, confiscated on his arrest. I’ve got them with me, and I want to get them checked out.
The tracking mechanism, Snail-Frequency Identification (SFID), enables casinos worldwide to track and determine exactly where all of their chips are- and as the Teahouse Social Club is a part of the Chihiro Sento, the chip had to have been on the grounds of the Sento for the whole day yesterday, otherwise there would have been an alarum receipt with the local police- and there wasn’t one, Ren checked. Furthermore, if a chip is removed from the Sento campus, it cannot be cashed in. For a career gambler like Lorenzo Bartok, such a thing could never, ever be allowed to happen.

This, by the way, is the other reason casinos use chips- it’s much more convenient to have a small stack of multicolor-coded coins to gamble with, than a stack of fat cash that you have to count every time.

Inside the casino itself, I pause a moment to take the place in. The air is fresher, sharper; I feel more awake having stepped through the door. Part of that is the higher level of- hmm, oxygen? I watch a lovely waitress on rollerskates efficiently dole out free food and drinks to various patrons giving away all their money to the House; girls in helmets and less attractive clothing hustle empty dishes back to the kitchen. A psychedelic carpet in the most aggressively grotesque colors jolts my eyes back to the tables; the only clocks present is the one around my neck- and the one in the General Manager’s pocket.

Near the bar, there’s a jazz band, quietly playing classics and soft jazz songs in a way I can only describe as “fine dining mashed potatoes”; so smooth you hardly taste the butter at all. And baby, there’s at least half a pound of butter in every serving. From this vantage point, I can see row after row of tables- or ‘pits’, as in money pits, overseen by Alraune- fair enough, their comportment is legendary… as is their ability to subdue aggressors with intoxicating powders… All of these appear to be Royal Palm Alraune, from the same stand, I think- nothing else explains their physical similarity.

Oh, yes, and none of the pit bosses are wearing shirts- necklaces and torcs, sure; shirts? No. So far as I can tell without getting up close and personal, they appear to be wearing high waisted pants that come to about a hand’s span below the upper edge of their bark if they’re male, or a sheer linen dress of violet cinched tight with a white obi that knots in the back- if they’re female. Their breasts are on full display, which must be a distraction for the gamblers… It’s certainly a distraction for me, seeing so many perky, heavy green breasts with nipples taught from the cool rush of air, smooth planes interrupted by thorny patches of hair-

Ahem!

The place I need to go is actually right near the kitchen door; I make my way there through the bewildering flare of lights and the endless noise of chips and gamblers and dice, the thwap of shuffling cards and the surrussus of endless voices. The scent of unwashed bodies covered over with a thick, horrible layer of perfume, the squelch of surreptitious fucking in corners out of direct lines of sight- and ever present, overhead, the watchful stare of monitoring snailcams.

And now- I’m in the bland corridor that connects the kitchen to the floor. Multitudes of waitresses and the occasional waiter, busgirls and pit-bosses, and actual security personnel, all in a steady-frantic mob, each going in their own direction. I cut through them like a dagger through a lung. I even walk past a full portrait of Danelphe and Granuna, both in full battle-dress- from their time in the Sandora, which is where they gained their individual notoriety- and posed ready to strike. As I pass the images of my elders, some of the workers here who’ve been around long enough glance between me and the portraits and- they don’t quite gasp, but there’s a general tension to the air that wasn’t there before they noticed my presence.

Finally, I get to the General Manager’s Office- Diego “King” Dice.

I could have sworn there would have been a line- or he’d be in a meeting, but no. I’m greeted by the man himself, ushered into the office; I’m offered food, drink, cigars- no, thank you.

“Mister Dice, I’m here to investigate a murder,” I said.

“Anything I can do to help, DA Portgas- but please, do call me King, or Diego. No Portgas ever need call me ‘Mister’,” said Mister Dice.

“That’s very kind of you, Diego. I only have a few questions, and some requests, if you have time now-?” I said.

“Of course! Anything you need,” said Diego Dice.

Present: Six TSC Chips

“Ah, I can see by the bag that these are evidence- but why show them to me?” said Diego Dice.

“You’re the GM of my Danelphe’s casino, Diego. If you can’t tell me what they are, no one can,” I said.

“Hmm- well, let me put my glasses on- legally blind without them, y’know. Hrm- ah, these are chips from the casino; I’ll input them to the system to be sure... Ah, here we are; they’re coming up as a payout of a hundred sixty thousand beri- Are you quite sure these are all the chips?” said Diego Dice.

“Yes sir, very sure,” I said.

“Well,” said Diego Dice, taking off his glasses to clean them before tucking them back onto his nose, “These were paid out to Lorenzo Bartok the day before Yesterday, in the amount of a hundred sixty thousand; and he did not use any of our other gambling facilities after his payout, nor did he make use of our bar, restaurant, or Gentlemen’s Lounge.”

“So... the fact that there are only six black and whites means...?” I said.

“You’re missing either ten more of these, or you’re missing a copper chip, worth one hundred thousand beri,” said Diego Dice.

“Would that be a lot...?” I said, as if I can’t do conversions in my head.

“It’s about a thousand dola, DA Portgas,” said Diego Dice.
“Would you mind providing examples of every denomination of chip this casino uses?” I said.

“Not at all- would you like them in individual bags, or an envelope?” said Diego Dice.

“Both, if at all possible,” I said.

“Certainly. Ah, and… will you be taking the baby?” said Diego Dice.

“Yes, of course- do you have their baby things, or should I get some…?” I said, trying not to show my shock.

“Ah, no, I’ve got an entire bag of things for them, along with a nurse- It was certainly a shock to me, getting a call from my cousin, step-cousin, really- Kayumi Polleen? She works in the Bath House…?” said Diego Dice.

“We’ve met, briefly,” I said.

“Well, yesterday she called me and said she needed my help, and when I went over, she shoved a newborn into my arms and a bag of essentials over my shoulder. I understand why she couldn’t care for her friend’s child, of course, and I suppose… I suppose her wound is just too fresh,” said Diego Dice.

“Mm. Where is the baby?” I said.

“Oh, she’s with Nurse May; I hired a wet nurse to care for the little mite, and I suppose… I’ll just sign her contract over to you…?” said Diego Dice.

“Please do,” I said.

“Certainly- here it is, sign here and I’ll countersign- then I could call her here?” said Diego Dice.

“Mm, please do,” I said, “-and is there a secondary exit to the casino? I’d rather not take a newborn through the floor, if that’s alright…”

“Oh; where would you like to exit?” said Diego Dice.

“Hm… nearabouts to the Hotel Lobby, if possible,” I said.

“Certainly- ah, yes, and I sign… here… done! I’ll make that call, if there’s nothing else?” said Diego Dice.

“Ah, one more thing- you might get called to Court today, if that’s alright?” I said “Certainly! Have the Bailiffs call my office- here’s my card-” said Diego Dice.

Added to Evidence: Diego “King” Dice Business Card

Added to Evidence: Examples of All Denominations of Chips used in the Teahouse Social Club Casino

I take the card, and the envelope of chips.
“One more thing, sir- how hard would it be to track the movements of Lorenzo Bartok’s payout chips? I have reason to believe he never cashed them in,” I said.

“Hmm. Well, the earliest I can have the information to you is after noon today, DA Portgas,” said Diego Dice.

“That’s fine,” I said.

Meeting over, I exit the office and wait for the nurse and babe to appear. They soon do; a tall, fierce Automata woman, a swaddled newborn on her chest. They are escorted by an eel-mermaid in the Security suit-jacket- ah, electric eel, I see.

I peek in at the baby in the nurse’s arms, behind the swaddle-pouch that resolves into a bag over her shoulder; it’s been just long enough that the squashed newborn look has smoothed out. The soft colors around the babe are all the information I need to guess their gender- a girl.

She looks like her brother and parents- more importantly, she’s got a few little shoots of peas tufting from her head, as good a mark of paternity as any other. Mince Coffyn is a Troll; and in his blond locks grow tendrils of field peas. This baby girl is too young for classification; but I know pea shoots when I see them!

She’s also evidence, but I can’t confirm that without Aster; I text a message to him, telling him to meet me in the Hotel Lobby.

The eel-mermaid shows us out a nondescript door, and shuts it behind us. I escort Nurse May to a small alcove in the Lobby, and bid her sit on a small bench. I sit next to her, on the door side of the small space, and watch the crowd carefully.

“Nurse May?” I said.

“Yes’m?” said Nurse May.

“My name is Portgas D. Tigerlily, and I am a Defence attorney. I have reason to believe that the baby in your care is evidence in a murder investigation. My partner will be meeting us shortly; he’ll be able to tell if this is the babe in question. He’ll need to touch her- is that alright?” I said.

“...So long as he cleans his hands first with these here sanitizin’ wipes, that should be fine. Will I need to defend this baby, DA Portgas?” said Nurse May.

“I hope not; but if you do, don’t hesitate,” I said.

“Right-on, DA Portgas,” said Nurse May.

I cluck my tongue; Aster jerks, turns to me, and trots over. When he sees my company, he does not hide his shock very well; I nudge Nurse May to prompt her to get out the sanitation materials she wants Aster to use.

Aster wipes his hands, then very gently reaches in and touches the soft green fronds and the utterly soft skin. His eyes close, and his face relaxes; and his staff balances upright next to him because-

I dig around in my purse before pulling out an emesis bag and shoving it into his flailing hand. Aster flings himself away from the nurse and the babe, and vomits into the bag I gave him- just in time. He spits a few times, then twists the bag shut and accepts the wet-wipe Nurse May hands to him; he wipes his mouth, and throws the whole mess away in a trash can just outside the Lobby door. He comes back with sad eyes and stooped shoulders; and when he looks at me, I know what he’s going to say before he says it.

“She was there. Her aura is admissible,” said Aster.

“Right. Defence Paralegal Aster Mistburrow- Nurse Mendy May, although at this point she’s an Au Pair. Nurse May is contracted to care for this child for the next twenty four to thirty months. Regardless of what the Court decides to do with the child, Nurse May will still be her primary caregiver- I know that’s not what’s in your contract, Nurse May, but...” I said.

“She is an orphan; I knew that before I signed my part of the contract,” said Nurse May.

“We’re investigating and prosecuting because it was her parents that were murdered; and although she has a brother, he’s only just fifteen. As far as my partner can tell, this child was born at the same time her parents were being murdered,” I said.

“I- ah. Has there been anything about what is to happen to the elder child, or…?” said Nurse May.

Aster shakes his head.

Added to Evidence: Day Old Coffyn

“Until this trial is over, he’s considered a Person of Interest to the Court; Ren’s gone through the civil Courts for him as a Courtesy, so. He’s got assets- but… he’s not an adult,” said Aster.

“If he needs an adult to speak for him, I will,” said Nurse May.

“You’ll take responsibility for him?” I said.

“...Yes. I will- if, ah, if that’s alright with him?” said Nurse May.

“When he’s got a better hold on his particulars, DP Mistburrow will escort you to where Mister Coffyn is being held. Once there, the three of you can draw up whatever sort of contract seems most appropriate- it’s not my area of expertise, but I suppose a Contract of Guardianship, much like the one you’ve got for the care of the baby, wouldn’t go amiss?” I said.

Aster drank some water from his water bottle, and then nodded.

“A standard Guardianship paper should take care of everything Mister Coffyn needs from you, Nurse May; if there’s anything else it turns out you want or need from each other, you can work that out later. I’ll escort you to him, now- actually, considering the time… shit. Tilly, we all need to go to Court right now—” said Aster.

“Hmm—? Fuck! You’re right; okay, let’s go,” I said, as my watch vibrated between my breasts.

February 5th

Chihiro Town Courtroom

We make it with just enough time for Aster to square away the most basic of Guardianship Contracts for Nurse May and Mister Coffyn. We collate data; we get ready for the day.

And then Aster and I walk in to face down The Hon. Daun Elphame, and Prosecutor Sue Yiu.

It’s… something, certainly.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Court is now in session for the Trial of Lorenzo Bartok,” said Judge Scratch.

“The Prosecution is Ready, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“The Defence is Ready, Your Honor” I said.

“Because the Defendant is a member of the judiciary, this case is subject to the highest scrutiny; no evidence, pending or otherwise, will go unseen. No argument is too small to not discuss. I have full power of authority here; my ruling, when I give it, is final. This trial, as all others, must therefore be fair, but swift. Although you might have heard this before, perhaps in different trials, it is important enough to repeat here and now,” said Judge Scratch.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Prosecutor Yiu! Please make your opening statement,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. As we discovered yesterday, the Defendant is accused of being involved in the murder of Aloo and Apple Coffyn. What’s worse is that the Defendant tried to use his position as a member of the Judiciary Court to collar the murder victim’s own son, Mince Coffyn, with the murder. The Prosecution will prove that the guilty party in this matter is the Defendant!” said Yiu.

“Quite. Prosecution; call your first witness,” said Judge Scratch.
Sue Yiu smirked, then nods.

“Prosecution calls Kayumi Polleen!” said Yiu.

Kayumi Polleen walks out to the stand in her work clothing; fawn brown dress under a pale ivory apron, long brown hair back in a tight bun. I can see now that she’s in full view that her Alraune parts must be below the waist, making her a dryad, I suppose.

“Miss Polleen. For the Court Record, please state your relation to the Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“Uh-um. I’m- We’re in laws. The, um, the Defendant married my stepsister,” said Miss Polleen.

“I see. Your witness, Prosecution,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Witness! Please give the Court your testimony,” said Yiu.

“Um. Yes,” said Miss Polleen.

Kayumi Polleen’s Testimony: That Man’s No Good!

“Even though he got a pardon,” sang Miss Polleen, “Love is not enough to change a heart!”

“Where’s she going with this?” I hummed.

“My poor sisters were so stupid- giving their love to a man not worth a fart!” sang Miss Polleen.

I narrow my eyes.

Yiu blinks, and raises an eyebrow.

Judge Scratch rubs the bridge of their nose.

“Witness you seem to be confused about some of the central points of testimony-” sang Judge Scratch.

“I answered-” screeched Miss Polleen.

“Do not interrupt; the Prosecution or Defence is allowed to question you as they see fit, and you to answer them as you see fit. If they catch you in a lie, it is around your own neck you tied a loophole- and, regrettably, it is both of their jobs to pull it taught in pursuit of the truth. In your previous statement, no actual statement pertaining to the matters at hand was, well, stated. Please, try again,” said Judge Scratch.

“Um- um, right,” said Miss Polleen.
Kayumi Polleen’s Testimony (2nd Try): That Man’s Still No Good!

“In the murder of the victims,” sang Miss Polleen.

“Of the victims,” I hummed.

“There’s only one man who need be blamed!” sang Miss Polleen.

I narrow my eyes again.

“Janet Ashtraghi for this is blameless-” sang Miss Polleen.

“I don’t like this,” hummed Aster.

“The murderer: Lorenzo Bartok is his name!” sang Miss Polleen.

“I don’t like this either, so- OBJECTION! Where’s the proof of your claim?” I sang.

“Um, how about his past actions?” said Miss Polleen.

“OBJECTION! The Defendant was pardoned for all previous crimes-” I said.

“-forgiving a man of his sins does not remove the capacity or impetus for him to sin again!” roars Miss Polleen.

“Witness; please elaborate on your statement,” said Yiu.

Kayumi Polleen masters her great rage, nods, and sings again.

Kayumi Polleen’s Further Testimony: Love Did Not Make Him Change!

“Lorenzo Bartok was a scoundrel twenty years ago-” sang Miss Polleen.

“Sad to hear, but true,” I hum.

“Lorenzo Bartok is still a scoundrel now!” sang Miss Polleen.

“At least Janet never fell for him and she’s still living-” sang Miss Polleen.

“If she had, I’d be helping Isadora out-” sang Miss Polleen, before blanching.

Gotcha.

“OBJECTION! Witness is being unnecessarily cryptic!” I shout.

“I answered all your stupid questions already, Miss Defense Attorney! I don’t have to-” sneered Miss Polleen.

“CORRECTION! By entering this Court at my request, you agreed to answer all questions posed to you by the Prosecution and Defence-” snarled Yiu.

“ I. DID-!” growls Miss Polleen.
“OBJECTION! You have not!” I shout, slapping my fist onto the bench.

“Witness; you will answer the questions posed to you without mendacity, or I will free you of the burden of a tongue. In simpler terms: answer the question with full disclosure, or retract your testimony entirely,” said Judge Scratch.

Kayumi Polleen gulped, nodded, and sang again.

Kayumi Polleen’s Further Testimony (2nd Try): Love Cannot Change What Isn’t There!

“Lorenzo Bartok is a scoundrel,” sang Miss Polleen.

“We just got through that,” hummed Yiu.

“Lorenzo Bartok is undevout,” sang Miss Polleen.

“That’s not a word I hear often,” hummed Gunther.

“It doesn’t surprise me that he killed them,” sang Miss Polleen.

“Killed the victims…?” I hummed.

“Or that he’d drag both my sisters down,” sang Miss Polleen.

“I need some clarification, so- OBJECTION! When you say that the Defendant is undevout, what do you mean?” I said.

“I mean- I mean to him, oaths are just… words. They don’t bind at all,” said Miss Polleen.

“Could you add that to your testimony, please?” I said.

“Add that to your testimony, please,” said Judge Scratch.

“Lorenzo Bartok is a scoundrel,” sang Miss Polleen.

“I’ve yet to hear proof that’s true,” hummed Yiu.

“That man thinks oaths are weightless words to be thrown around!” sang Miss Polleen.

“Considering his conduct yesterday…” I hum.

“It doesn’t surprise me that he killed them,” sang Miss Polleen.

“That’s not right-” I gasp.

“Or that he’d drag both my sisters down,” sang Miss Polleen.

“She says it like there’s more than two- OBJECTION! To which victims do you refer?” I sang.

“I- um, I-” stuttered Miss Pollen.

“OBJECTION! What other victims are there, Portgas?” snarled Yiu.
“Considering Miss Polleen’s testimony, at least four!” I shout.

The crowd in the Gallery gasps.

 Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Order. DA Portgas, you’re stepping out onto some mighty thin ice. I sincerely hope you have evidence to back up your claim?” said Judge Scratch.

I look over at Aster, who firmed up his jaw before nodding grimly. I look at Judge Scratch again.

“I do, Your Honor,” I said, before locking my gaze on the recalcitrant and aggressively obscure Kayumi Polleen.

“Witness,” I say, my voice like the breaking of ice in the quiet of winter’s chill, “please answer my question. To which victims do you refer to in your testimony here?”

Kayumi Polleen gulps, then nods, and opens her mouth to sing once more.

Kayumi Polleen’s Further Testimony: The Heart of the Matter

“Our Mother never approved of the marriage,” sang Miss Polleen.

“No; why would she?” sighed Aster.

“And it didn’t matter whom to who;” sang Miss Polleen.

“I can see where this is going-” sighed Yiu, rubbing at her eyepatch.

“Lorenzo Bartok isn’t good enough for them,” sang Miss Polleen.

“No, he wouldn’t be-” hummed Gunther.

“And twenty years hasn’t changed that truth!” snarled Miss Polleen.

“If I can just get her to misstep I can- OBJECTION! Can you explain what you mean by ‘Whom’?” I sang.

“I mean Isadora Dice, Janet Ashtraghi and myself,” said Miss Polleen.

“Add that to your testimony, please,” I said.

“Witness, amend your testimony” said Judge Scratch.

“Our Mother never approved of the marriage,” sang Miss Polleen.
“Lorenzo Bartok to Isadora, Janet, or myself-” scowled Miss Polleen.

“Lorenzo Bartok, no matter how “Magnificent” just isn’t good enough,” shrugged Miss Polleen.

“It’s best to leave bad deals on their shelf!” sang Miss Polleen.

“No matter what I do or how I twist, she’ll still find a way to resist- I’ve got no choice, I must insist… OBJECTION!” I sang.

I slammed both my fists onto the bench.

“Kayumi Polleen, where did you get this baby?” I said.

Presented: Day Old Coffyn

“Wh-wh-wh-what?” shrieks Miss Polleen.

I am unmoved.

“You called your cousin, Diego “King” Dice, last night- and asked him to handle this baby. Why?” I said.

“I, um- I- I had a miscarriage about a month ago and I- I can’t, so, s-so I told Diego to handle her, and um, um, he did,” stutters Miss Polleen.

I narrow my eyes and stare her down. She flinches and shudders in the Witness box.

“Miss Polleen, who told you to “handle” the baby?” I said.

“N-no one, no one told me to-” said Miss Polleen.

“Miss Polleen, your entire testimony has been used to put yourself in direct conflict with Lorenzo Bartok. You implied that your sister, Isadora, is deceased; you stated that Lorenzo Bartok had somehow “dragged both of them down”. Further, you showed a deep and abiding respect for matters of faith, as shown by your contempt for considering ‘oaths’ as merely words. Miss Polleen; who told you to handle that baby? ” I said.

Kayumi Polleen collapsed onto the railing of the Witness box like a puppet with all its strings cut. Her hair fell out of its orderly bun, billowing down her shoulders. Delicate tendrils of ivy and briar-thorn unfurled and reached for the light and air. A long, strange keening wail comes from her huddled form. Her shoulders shake and twitch, and ugly, wet laughter echoes through the silent Court.

“you really couldn’t just… take my word for it, could you? you just haaaaaad to push . fine. I’ll tell you the ugly truth,” rasps Miss Polleen.
Kayumi Polleen’s Final Testimony: The Ugly Truth

“...there were two...” moaned Miss Polleen.

Aster’s crying again.

“...one born blue...” moaned Miss Polleen.

Yiu’s fingers are digging into her eyepatch.

“...sisters born and sister died...” moaned Miss Polleen.

I can feel my fingernails cutting through the skin of my palms.

“...i’m the only one who cried...” moaned Miss Polleen.

“Why is that, Miss Polleen?” said Yiu.

“...there were two babies cut from the cooling corpse of Apple Coffyn. The living one had the placenta removed, and was given into my ungentle hands; I gave that living babe to my step-cousin, Diego, and the fruit of that labor was presented here in Court today... If I had not done so, that living babe would have been smothered under my grief, and her body would have joined her sisters...” rasps Miss Polleen.

“Where is that, Miss Polleen?” said Yiu.

“...part of my daily tasks are the removal of lobby waste to the incinerator, deep within the secretive bowels of this glittering hell. At the end of my day, I took the bucket holding the gelatinous, rotting remains of the dead babe, and I put it into the incinerator, along with the rest of the day’s waste. The great fires below burned all to fine ash; none of her remains...” rasps Miss Polleen.

“...You are aware of the penalties for improperly laying the dead to rest in a Fae Realm, Miss Polleen?” said Judge Scratch.

“... I am. I had hoped to at least see my damned brother-fiend finally pay for his crimes; reap the foul harvest of his sins manifest... but, I suppose I must settle instead for a meal I will not enjoy and a fire I will not escape...” rasps Miss Polleen.

“Miss Polleen, who told you to handle the babies like that?” I said.

“...who else, DA Portgas? My sister, Janet Ashtraghi. I know not what foul spell Bartok has woven o’er her, nor what promise his forked tongue has dripped into her ear; only that she follows his will, and his will was the death of both babies. Lorenzo Bartok has woven no spell over me, alas for him- and so, though my sister implied it, and though it might have been his will she not survive, the Baby Coffyn yet lives. My vengeance upon him is begun...” rasps Miss Polleen.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.
“In light of the revelation here today, Janet Ashtraghi is now added to the Defendant docket; Bailey!” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey.

“See to it that Miss Ashtraghi is escorted into Court with all due haste; and that Miss Polleen is escorted to the Detention Center forthwith. Although her crime is heinous, her sentencing must, alas, wait until the conclusion of this trial,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey, before directing various Bailiffs and Executioners Kanamuchi and Metsubushi to the fulfillment of Judge Scratch’s orders. Kanamuchi and a squad of Bailiffs leave the Court at a trot, while Metsubushi calmly and gently binds Kayumi Polleen’s hands. Metsubushi escorts Miss Polleen from the Court.

“DA Portgas; Prosecutor Yiu. As it will be some time before Kanamuchi and the Bailiffs return with Miss Ashtraghi, a small recess is now in effect. I suggest you make use of your time wisely,” said Judge Scratch.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

I blink, roll my shoulders, and come to an immediate decision. It doesn’t happen often, but sometimes, my gut will roil just so, and I know exactly what to do.

“Aster- take these over to Gunther and have him tell Yiu that she needs to call Diego Dice to the Stand; he’ll have the evidence for the movement of Lorenzo Bartok’s final payout on the day of the Murder,” I said, quietly.

“You got it,” said Aster, before taking the evidence and trotting off.

I wait; in the Defendant box, Lorenzo Bartok stares straight ahead, like if he concentrates hard enough, we’ll all forget the accusations leveled at him.

Aster trots back, a different file in his hands.

“Okay, boss- quick summary? Dracule Taffeta and Marguerite Lefay were not witnesses to anything; Marzipan the Boomslang, Banana the Python, and Kusanagi the Sword, however, were. Unfortunately, the total of their evidence cannot be used to do more than confirm the presence of four people in the crime scene at the time of the murder. Oh, and- one of the Straw Hats- Genevieve the Green- found a hundred-thousand beri casino chip outside her senior’s room,” said Aster.

“Interesting. That’s plenty, Aster- leave the rest to me,” I said.
Traded: Six TSC Chips, Diego “King” Dice Business Card, Envelope of TSC Chips in All Denominations for Collection of Witness Statements, One TSC Chip valued at a Hundred-Thousand Beri

I’ve nearly figured it out; but who can I call to the stand to make it undeniable… what did Mab say yesterday, her husband sneezes when he’s faced with overwhelming amounts of something he’s not been acclimated to? If I’m right… if I’m right, I can use that to bust this thing wide open.

Vinsmoke Sanji is a big man. The top of his head can’t be more than one eighty cm off the ground, but that doesn’t account for his horns, which have grown another twenty cm, making him loom an intimidating two-hundred cm over most everyone else. He’s got thighs thicker than some trees, all muscle, and a broad chest best described as ‘tortilla-chip shaped’.

His hair is a shaggy, wavy mop of flax-straw tow honey, just longer than the squared off corner of his jaw at the shortest and to his shoulders at the longest. He has scruff and a chinstrap mustache-beard thing, with no real sideburns that I can see.

Then again, having actually gotten close enough to touch him, the real surprise isn’t how much hair you see- it’s how much hair you don’t. Up close and personal, you’ll discover that he’s actually fuzzy, like a particularly enlightened peach or a very large bee. In picts, his normal body hair catches an absurd amount of light, turning his skin the fairest of fair shades- point of fact, he’s actually about the color of French Rose Clay, after it’s oxidized- a pale, milky shade with more blue, green, and red underneath than most people expect. He’s not flat white, even though that’s how he usually pictographs- very, very few people are. Furthermore, his eyelashes and eyebrows are much darker, almost brown or black- probably so you can actually see the damn things.

Speaking personally? He’s a kind man, with a nice smile. He’s a Vinsmoke; mouflon-type horns, making him a Parisian Demon. Today, he’s wearing a pale champagne colored linen shirt and a thin black tie. Interestingly enough, his tail’s not grown large enough that it exceeds his clothing- I guess he’s just a late bloomer, or he’s just got a naturally short tail.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Court is resumed. Executioner Kanamuchi has returned with the accused: Miss Janet Ashtraghi. Miss Ashtragi, you are accused of Accessory to Murder, and Defilement of the Dead. How do you plead?” said Judge Scratch.

“Guilty, Your Honor,” said Miss Ashtraghi.

“I see. Unlike Judge Bartok, I do not accept Guilt as the end of the matter; there is still quite a bit of inquiry to go through. Thus, you are remanded to the Chihiro Town Detention Center, effective at the end of this day- that’s sunset, for reference- and are to be held until that time here, in Court, where us Law-abiding folk can keep a weather eye on you. Executioner Kanamuchi!” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Executioner Kanamuchi.
“Escort the Accused to the Defendants box- preferably into a different cell than the current Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Executioner Kanamuchi.

“No Bail-bond is set at this time; the Accused is deemed a flight risk, due to prior arrest records. Now then; Prosecutor Yiu, DA Portgas. Are you ready?” said Judge Scratch.

“Prosecution is Ready, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Defence is Ready, Your Honor,” I said.

“Defence, call your witness,” said Judge Scratch.

I nodded once, then looked over at the Straw Hats.

“Defence calls Chef Vinsmoke Sanji!” I said.

I almost never see men do it outside of, like, hunting for deer or something like that… but I swear to all th’Gods, Vinsmoke Sanji stalked to the Witness stand, and glowered at the Court, a plume of smoke rising from his thin cigarette.

The man’s got style.

“Chef Vinsmoke. For the Court Record, please state your place of study and level of accreditation in the Star Ranking,” said Judge Scratch.

“I studied at Le Baratie under Chef Zeff for six years, and gained a three-Star Ranking in that time,” said Chef Vinsmoke, after blowing out a thick cloud of smoke.

“So it doesn’t come up again- please explain the Star Ranking to the Court. I must confess, I don’t quite know what it means myself…” said Judge Scratch.

“Oh, sure. The Star Ranking system is a review system based entirely on the quality of food. Restaurants and chefs alike are awarded stars based on the quality of their food, mastery of technique shown, personality or adherence to style, and the consistency of the food. Think of it as… you can make a cake any way you’d like, but if you put, say, a beef tongue in the middle, it’s not a cake anymore. The stars in the Star Ranking system are coveted because the vast majority of restaurants and cooks receive none at all in their lifetime,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

“I see. And I suppose the individual stars have a specific meaning?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. One star indicates a very good chef or restaurant in its category, offering cuisine prepared to a consistently high standard. Two stars indicates excellent cuisine and skillfully and carefully crafted dishes of outstanding quality. Three stars indicates exceptional cuisine where diners eat extremely well, often superbly. Distinctive dishes are precisely executed, using superlative ingredients. A single star is a good meal; two stars is a very good meal; three stars is the best meal you’ve had in your life, even if you don’t like that food normally,” said Chef Vinsmoke.
“And you gained your third star…?,” said Judge Scratch.

“When I was eighteen, Your Honor,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

Crack! go Judge Scratch fingers.

“Order in the Court. Hmph. Defence, Your Witness,” said Judge Scratch, smirking to themself.

“Yes, Your Honor. Witness, please give your testimony,” I said.

Chef Vinsmoke heaved out another cloud of smoke.

“Sure thing, DA Portgas,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

Chef Vinsmoke Sanji’s Testimony: A Foul Smelling Deed!

“On Imbolc Day, I was with my wife, havin’ a good time,” sang Chef Vinsmoke.

“Now there’s a style,” hummed Aster.

“A smell of foul things, in a narrow hallway, was the only harsh note in a mood sublime,” sang Chef Vinsmoke.

Wink wonk.

“I smelled rotten eggs, faint but clear, and bitter almonds at the rear of my nose,” sang Chef Vinsmoke.

Now that’s interesting…

“I keep a clean kitchen, so those smells don’t ever appear in large quantities, or my master would know,” sang Chef Vinsmoke with a shudder.

I’ve had teachers like that.

“Naturally, I sneezed. If my credentials still don’t pass muster, we’ve just been wasting time,” sang Chef Vinsmoke.

“OBJECTION! You say you smelled rotten eggs faintly, and bitter almonds at the rear of your nose?” said Yiu.

“That’s correct,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

“For the sake of clarity, can you describe why these smells were so memorable to you?” said Yiu.

“Sure. Humans, no matter what their Tribe, are able to smell in about ten categories. Some people smell some things much more sensitively than others; and some Tribes have, er, bred specific tolerances and preferences into their noses,” said Chef Vinsmoke.
“So… you being a Demon-?” said Yiu.

“Specifically, a Parisian Demon, yeah. It does matter, in this instance. For historical reasons, it was of vital importance that every Demon in Paris was able to smell if their food had been poisoned or gone bad; so, even though it’s not such a big concern now, every French Demon has an acutely developed sense of taste and smell. Parisian Demons, in particular, have a very strong aversion to rotted and poisonous food-stuffs, which both smells fall under,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

“Oh, enough of this back and forth- TAKE THAT! Chef Vinsmoke, would you be willing to enter into the Court Record incontestable proof of your nose’s sensitivity and discernment?” I said, Done With This.

“Certainly, if you can devise of a method worth the Court’s valuable time,” sighed Chef Vinsmoke from beneath a cloud of smoke.

“Your Honor?” I said.

“Hmm. Considering the evidence used Yesterday, I suppose a small test is in order. Proceed, DA Portgas,” said Judge Scratch.

“Thank you, Your Honor. Bailiff!” I said.

“Sah!” said the Bailiff.

“Please retrieve the following evidence from the Court Record,” I said, before handing off a small list to the Bailiff.

“While that’s being set up, I do believe we have enough time for the next witness. Prosecution?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Call the next Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

I look at Yiu. She looks at me. She shakes her head- what do you mean it’s not enough-!?

“Prosecution calls Doctor Barbarella Vavoom,” said Yiu.

Shit. She told me that first day- initial autopsy reports aren’t worth the paper they’re printed on. Shit shit shit-

And then she walks out.

Fuck. Fuck, shit, and goddamn it all to hell.

Doctor Vavoom’s Testimony: The Bare Facts
“Witness, please state your name and occupation,” said Judge Scratch.

“Doctor Barbarella Vavoom, Coroner,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Thank you, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

I can already tell I’m going to hate every second of this.

“Doctor Vavoom, please go over your completed Autopsy Report for the Court Record,” said Yiu.

“Right. In Case Number 1-5-1-6-1-7-T, the Deceased- Aloo Coffyn and Apple Coffyn, age forty and forty five, male and female; blood registered toxicity well above international standard of health. When tested, contents of both deceased’s whole blood included Biomarked Cyanide, half-life of thirty-six hours; contents of both deceased’s urine contained Arsenic. Probable cause of death: Poison,” said Doctor Vavoom.

“Thank you, Doctor. No further questions-” said Yiu.

“OBJECTION!” I shout, slamming my fist into the bench.

Yiu blinks, then smirks.

“By all means, Portgas- do enlighten the rest of us. What burning question do you have for the good Doctor?” said Yiu.

I stare her down, then snort.

“Doctor, exactly how difficult is it to determine and clarify familial resonances?” I said.

Yiu slammed her fist into the bench.

“OBJECTION! Familial resonances are not permissible-” screeched Yiu.

“-except in exceptional circumstances, such as, Yiu, determination the orphaner of a day old baby! DO NOT PRESUME TO LECTURE ME ON THE LAW!” I roared.

My other fist joined my first, the bench creaking under my weighted rage. I take a deep breath, and flatten my fists into palms, hands, flat on the smooth wood of the bench.

“Doctor Vavoom. My question?” I said.

“...Not my area of expertise, but considering the age of the human, and the proposed separations… you say you want to clarify the resonance as well, not just reveal it?” said Doctor Vavoom.

“That’s correct,” I said.

“Even with best equipment, takes at least twelve hours to collate all data; will be ready soonest tomorrow,” said Doctor Vavoom.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.
“While we are under a deadline, I admit, I do despise leaving things unfinished. Bailey!” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey.

“Please escort Doctor Vavoom to her place of work, and ensure that the greatest and most efficient care is taken when the Familial Resonance is revealed and clarified. Please do this after DA Portgas and Prosecutor Yiu have finished their cross examinations- ah, where is my mind, DA, Prosecutor?” said Judge Scratch.

“Nothing further, Your Honor,” I said.

“No further questions, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Marvelous. Bailey, scratch that hold and escort Doctor Vavoom immediately. Also, do please return Chef Vinsmoke to the Witness stand, as his testimony is not yet finished. Faster begun, faster done,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey, directing bailiffs and Executioner Te Yari and Executioner Jutte to the completion of Judge Scratch’s orders.

“Ah! And it seems the Bailiff has returned with both the Evidence DA Portgas requested, and a new Autopsy Report- please enter the new report into the Court Record, would you? Lovely. DA Portgas; Your Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Thank you, Your Honor. Chef Vinsmoke, are you ready?” I said.

“Sure,” said Chef Vinsmoke in a cloud of smoke.

Chef Vinsmoke Sanji’s Further Testimony: A-CHOO!

“Chef Vinsmoke, please present your Fugu License to the Court,” I said.

“Sure,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

Presented: Vinsmoke Sanji’s Fugu License (3 Stars)

“Do any in the Court protest the veracity of this license?” I said.

No response.

I nod, and return the license to the chef.

“Chef Vinsmoke, please smell this,” I said.

Presented: Poisoned Glass Spoon

Chef Vinsmoke sneezes so violently, his cigarette stutters in his mouth.

“Uuugh. Rotten eggs and bitter almonds; just like before,” said Chef Vinsmoke.

“Thank you. I have here witness statements from your crew members stating clearly that there were four people present in the room at the time of the Coffyn Murders. As was stated earlier, even the most modern methods of personal environmental protection cannot protect someone completely from all levels of contamination.” I said.

“OBJECTION! The point being, Portgas?” said Yiu.

“TAKE THAT! The point being, Yiu, that if Chef Vinsmoke were to smell two of the defendants and sneeze, it would be undeniable proof that they had been exposed to both Cyanide and Arsenic within the past day and a half,” I said.

“And which two defendants shall Chef Vinsmoke smell?” said Yiu.

“Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtragi,” I said.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers. The Gallery continues to shriek and murmur until Judge Scratch takes a long, slow glance over the unquiet masses, their gaze all but boiling with the force of their rage.

“Order. DA Portgas. This is a highly irregular, invasive, and frankly speaking, stupid idea. If nothing comes of it, I will dismiss this case. Are you certain you want to proceed?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” I said.

“Very well. Proceed in your own time,” said Judge Scratch.

Chef Vinsmoke’s Final Testimony: The Nose Knows

“Chef Vinsmoke, please smell Miss Janet Ashtragi’s hair,” I said.

Chef Vinsmoke stepped down from the Witness stand, stalked over to the Defendants, and, after a gentle nudge from Executioner Metsubushi, sniffs Miss Janet Ashtragi’s hair. The effect is immediate; Chef Vinsmoke sneezes violently, almost doubled over from the force of it.

I nod.

“Chef Vinsmoke, please smell Mister Lorenzo Bartok’s fingertips on his left hand,” I said.

Chef Vinsmoke straightened, scrubbed his fingers against the bridge of his nose, and stalked over to Mister Lorenzo Bartok. A bailiff held out Mister Bartok’s limp hand; Sanji sniffed, and… no sneeze.

I nod again.

“Now the right, please,” I said.

Lorenzo Bartok’s jaw clenched under pallid skin. It’s almost like he’s sick, or something.
Chef Vinsmoke sniffed, and sneezed so hard his cigarette flew out of his mouth.

“Chef Vinsmoke; one more, and then I have no further questions. Please smell this Chip,” I said.

Presented: One TSC Chip valued at a Hundred-Thousand Beri

Chef Vinsmoke rubbed underneath his nose, before stomping out his cigarette and stalking over to the Witness stand. I carefully open the evidence bag, and hold it up to him. He sniffs-

I am covered in a man’s sneeze. There are flecks of finely aspirated blood all over my body right now, but especially concentrated over my face, right in the freckled cheeks. Blood and boogers, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew, ew-

“Here, Chef; for your nose,” said Aster.

I carefully close the evidence bag, and stalk back over to the Defence bench, Sue Yiu’s raucous laughter at my expense ringing through the Court.

I take a deep breath.

I hand the evidence back the the Bailiff, and accept a sanitizing wipe. I wipe my face, then my neck, then my hands. I’ll have to shower for the rest.

Crap, if I open my eyes at all for the rest of Court, it’ll just smear the blood around. I’ll just… I’ll just have to use my Knowing Haki to get through the rest.

“Well. As ringing an endorsement as any could ask for. I see before me empirical evidence that the poison in this case was either Cyanide or Arsenic; and I see incontestable evidence that both Miss Ashtraghi and Mister Bartok were, at the very least, exposed to the victims within the time limit imposed by one of the poison’s detectable half-life.

“Unfortunately, neither of you have presented enough evidence to make a ruling in favor of murder for either Defendant, nor have you provided evidence or reasonable doubt in the ruling of a double suicide. Unless a witness appears who can lay serious and unassailable blame at the Accused’s foot, I’m sorry.” sighed Judge Scratch.

“Dammit.” I hissed.

“-But I’ll simply have to-” said Judge Scratch.

“Gods dammit-” growled Yiu.

“Dismiss this case against Lorenzo Bartok-” said Judge Scratch, her fingers raised high and ready to snap.

“GODS DAMMIT WAIT!” screams… the demon from the Daiso? “Wait! I can provide witness to Lorenzo Bartok’s crimes! At the very least, I can prove he’s lying!”

“Shut up, boy!” snarls Bartok.
“Fuck you, old man! My accusation: Lorenzo Bartok killed my mother! He killed Isadora Bartok! He’s a liar, and a thief, and he killed those two people, too! He ain’t never stopped gambling—” gasps the Boy.

“-shut UP boy-” snarls an ever more desperate Bartok.

“-which is in direct violation of his Pardon! An’ Miss Ashtraghi’s lyin’ too, if y’all ain’t asked her nothin’ yet! She lives at our house! Her room is under the back stairs!” the Boy roars, ignoring his… Father?

“Hmm. Bailey!” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey.

“Swear that Boy into the proceedings and get him on the stand. I want to hear what he has to say,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Bailey.

I stare at Yiu- er, as best I can without using my eyes. She lifts her head off the bench long enough to meet my eyes and come to the stomach churning realization that yes, really, every single one of my cases is like this.

“Please state your name, age, and relation to this case,” said Judge Scratch.

“Osvaldo Bartok, fifteen, and… and that no good, lyin’ son of a-” said Mister Bartok.

“Ahem. Lorenzo Bartok,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Yer Honor,” said Mister Bartok.

“Your relation is…?” said Judge Scratch.

“He’s my sire, if it matters,” said Mister Bartok.

“…And your testimony?” said Judge Scratch.

Lorenzo Bartok’s Testimony: They’re Both Liars

“Yer Honor, that man an’ Miz Ashtraghi been steppin out with each other since my ma’ died,” said Mister Bartok.

“Order. Young man, do you have proof of your claims?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” said Mister Bartok.

“Well, produce it then,” said Judge Scratch.
Presented: Instaprint Pictographs of an Intimate and Delicate Nature

“I ain’t proud of spyin’ like a damn Peepin’ Tom, an’ I ain’t proud a what I did to get th’ camera what took these pict, but… but it’s incestuous, is what it is!” said Mister Bartok.

“Hm. Bailey, if you would- ah, yes, thank you. Let me see- goodness gracious! …and these are the time-stamped kind too, flatly impossible to fake without extensive research...” said Judge Scratch.

“Your Honor- Your Honor, please allow the Prosecution and Defence the chance to investigate further!” I said.

“Prosecution agrees; an entire new area of investigation has opened, a new witness has presented themselves, and there is evidence that simply will not be available until tomorrow-” said Yiu.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“One final question, and then I’ll make my decision,” said Judge Scratch.

I raised an eyebrow.

“Where did you get the camera that took these pictographs?” said Judge Scratch.

Osvaldo Bartok flinches, then sighs.

“I stole it off’a guy in the park, Yer Honor,” said Mister Bartok.

“...You do realize that the punishment for theft while underage is a bit…?” said Judge Scratch.

“I know, Yer Honor. But… even a day of freedom is worth that price,” said Mister Bartok.

“...I see. Well, unless the injured party has some reason for you to not be killed, I expect you know how the rest of this goes,” said Judge Scratch.

Mince Coffyn jerks upright, out of his chair, his tail-tuft puffed out like a cotton ball.

“Y-Your Honor, please wait! I, uh, I don’t- I don’t know my rights in this situation! Please, explain them to me?” said Mince Coffyn.

“Mister Coffyn…?” said Judge Scratch.

“I, uh, I only saw the thief for a moment or two, Y-your Honor, a-and- really, what exactly is an acceptable reason, for, um, for…?” said Mince Coffyn.

“...Mister Coffyn, you can’t just decide to circumvent the Law because you think someone’s cute,” said Judge Scratch.

“THAT IS NOT THE ONLY REASON!” shouts Mince Coffyn before turning redder than a vineapple. I’m in a play, I’m in a romantic dramedy, it’s the only explanation…

“...Go on,” said a suddenly very amused Judge Scratch.

“Uhm. W-well, um, I... I don’t want to be enemies! And, uh, the, um- the best way to destroy an enemy forever is to make them your friend! I think it would be very difficult to be friends with someone who’s died,” said Mince Coffyn.

Osvaldo Bartok just jolted on the stand. Fuck this, I need to see- argh, argh, blood, come on tear ducts- there we go!

“And you, Mister Bartok?” said Judge Scratch.

“...Hang on, were you the boy from the Ferris Wheel? ‘Bout two years ago?” said Osvaldo Bartok.
(I’ll mix him up with his sire if I keep calling him ‘Mister Bartok’, I just know it...)

“Um...” said a very blushing Mince Coffyn.

“...Show me your ears,” said Osvaldo Bartok.

Mince Coffyn, blushing even harder, pulled the hood of his mantle back, revealing curling tendrils of field peas and long, furry cow ears- also tinted red, because that’s how far his blush goes. The right one has a distinctive nick in it, like a notch.

“It is you!” said a- holy shit, full body blush, and that would explain the… dammit, Oz, you were so close, too...

“Hi, Oz,” said Mince Coffyn.

“Hi, Mince,” said Osvaldo Bartok.

“Y’know, I’d have accepted that explanation if you two didn’t already know each other,” said Judge Scratch.

The things I do for the sake of Justice.

“HOLD IT! Judge Scratch, surely another punishment could be affected here? Death need not be the answer to every problem,” I said.

“HOLD IT! Judge Scratch, surely another way can be found? Every mistake does not require the Sword of Justice to fix,” said Yiu.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.
“ORDER. Unfortunately, I just don’t see-” said Judge Scratch.

“HOLD IT! Elphie, what if someone agreed to take the boys on as apprentices? Then, it’d be an in-House matter and the Law need not get involved,” said Captain Whitebeard- when the hell did he get here!?!?

“...Eddy, that’d be just fine, except it can’t be you what does it on account of you an’ me bein’ lovers; and it certainly can’t be me, nor anyone called into Court, because we’d be involved in an unseemly manner. I will not be accused of nepotism, or misappropriatin’ the Law,” said Judge Scratch.

“...Neh, neh, I’ll take all four of ’em,” said- Captain Luffy? -to a chorus of groans and sighs from his crew, no less.

Does he do this sort of thing often?

“...Sorry; all four, you say?” said Judge Scratch.

“Well, yeah. Cuz, see, there’s Ozzy an’ Mince, an’ Mince’s baby sister, an’ th’ Nursie Lady who’s lookin’ after Mince’s baby sister. Ozzy’s a musician, an’ I want more of’em, an’ Mince can bake what Lil’ D cain’t yet, an’ baby’s just a baby an’ needs her brother to teach her about her parents, and Nursie’s lookin after Baby already, and we could use another nurse, too,” said Captain Luffy.

“...As good a reason as any other. Done; Bailey, mark down Mister Coffyn and the Younger Bartok, along with Nurse Mendy May and the as-of-yet unnamed baby-” said Judge Scratch.

“Her name’s Banoffee Buko Canelé Coffyn, Your Honor!” shouted Captain Luffy.

“...That’s a lot of name for a such a small baby,” said Judge Scratch, eyebrows high.

“It’s so she’s got options when she’s bigger!” said Captain Luffy with his arms crossed.

“Very well. Miss Banoffee Buko Canele Coffyn, as members of the Straw Hat Pirate Crew-”

“Canelé! There’s fancy on the last ‘e’!” shouted Captain Luffy.

“Yep,” said Captain Luffy.

“Merveilleux. Now then; in the course of this day, questions I had yesterday were answered. -Well, most of them. Mince Coffyn’s pictograph collection was secondary to the real aim of the theft- his camera. The thief, Osvaldo Bartok, needed Mister Coffyn’s camera to gain pictographical proof of his sire, Lorenzo Bartok, and his aunt, Janet Ashtraghi, engaged in incestuous congress.

“Two poisons were present in the corpses of the Coffyns in lethal amounts; Cyanide, and Arsenic. We have some evidence that the Coffyns were dosing themselves with Arsenic, leaving only the Cyanide to blame for their deaths. We have more evidence that two of the Defendants, Janet Ashtraghi and Lorenzo Bartok, were in the same room as the deceased at the time of their murder, if not involved.
“Most importantly of all, Miss Banoffee Buko Canelé Coffyn was delivered from danger to safety, and rests now in the gentle arms of Nurse Mendy May,” said Judge Scratch with their eyes closed.

“I am not satisfied. We do not know who killed the Coffyns, or why. We do not know where the prize money for the competition they were judging has gone. Though today I was counselled to find lenience, I can find none for murderers. You have the ends of this day to consider your evidence, finish your investigations, and figure this bullshit out. Tomorrow, the Truth is revealed; be it Just or Worthy,” said Judge Scratch.

CRACK! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

---

Added to the Court Record: Poisoned Glass Spoon
Added to the Court Record: Photo of Apple and Aloo Coffyn just after their murder
Added to the Court Record: Contest Flyer.
Added to the Court Record: Judge Registration Folder.
Added to the Court Record: Autopsy Report
Added to the Court Record: Mince Coffyn’s Bruised Wrist
Added to the Court Record: The Coffyn’s Registration at the Sento Hotel
Added to the Court Record: Mince Coffyn’s Receipts
Added to the Court Record: Day Old Coffyn
Added to the Court Record: Vinsmoke Sanji’s Fugu License (3 Stars)
Added to the Court Record: One TSC Chip valued at a Hundred-Thousand Beri Added to the Court Record: Instaprint Pictographs of an Intimate and Delicate Nature

---

DAY 1:
Added to the Court Evidence: “The overpowering scent of bitter almonds in S3:2F.”
Added to the Court Evidence: S3 layout drawing ; murders marked with ‘X’.
Added to the Court Evidence: Picture of the Tatami-room Table, still set with food.

Added to the Court Evidence: Crumbs from Empty Plate.

Added to the Court Evidence: Picture of Tarnished Silver Teapot.

Added to the Court Evidence: Flyer for ‘World’s Worst Baker’s Contest’; cryptic note on the back side.

Added to the Court Evidence: Picture of the Two futons.

Added to the Court Evidence: Pouch of Receipts.

Added to the Court Evidence: Sample of ‘Weird Slime’

Added to the Court Evidence: Odd Black and White Feathers.

Added to the Court Evidence: Picture of S3:F3 Balcony.

Added to the Court Evidence: Contaminated Clothing

Added to the Court Evidence: Sanji smelled an overwhelming scent of bitter almonds.

DAY 2:

Added to the Court Evidence: Half of Wedding Photo

Added to the Court Evidence: Whole Wedding Photo

Added to the Court Evidence: Lorenzo Bartok’s Bank Withdrawal Records

Added to the Court Evidence: Surgery was Performed Correctly

Added to the Court Evidence: Safe was Emptied

Added to the Court Evidence: No Cyanide in Placenta

Added to the Court Evidence: Picture of Lorenzo Bartok at the Baccarat Table

Added to the Court Evidence: Wanted Poster for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok

Added to the Court Evidence: Royal Pardon for Lorenzo “The Magnificent” Bartok

Added to the Court Evidence: Six Teahouse Social Club Chips

Added to the Court Evidence: Diego “King” Dice Business Card

Added to the Court Evidence: Envelope of TSC Chips in All Denominations

Added to the Court Evidence: Day Old Coffyn

Added to the Court Evidence: Collection of Witness Statements (Straw Hats)
Added to the Court Evidence: One TSC Chip Valued at a Hundred-Thousand Beri
“Words on a paper don’t mean a damn thing; and Laws mean even less. No one will care for a stupid thing like this. No one will come. Shut up; your words offend me,“

“Sir! The Law has meaning, Sir. People will care for even the slightest drip of change that the Law promises. And Sir, someone will come, “

“The Law has meaning, Sir, beyond this petty realm of mortal harms and emotional hurts. It is more than mere words on a page. The people will care for it, for reasons even they don’t understand. They’ll come up in ones and twos, sobbing with their children in local libraries and screaming in the cells, begging for something they can’t name. They arrive at your door, your desk, your side, cynical and jaded and full of hope, innocent as children, soft as rain- longing for you to make things right again.

“I believe you; I believe you still, and I will always fight for you ’, you’ll say to them. ‘It’s only two thousand beri per case.’ They give you the money without even thinking about it- because you’ve promised them that you would make things right again . For it is money they have, and peace they lack. And they will pay you, sir, they will pay you to have the faith they cannot bear to consider holding in their hearts again,“

“Just shut up,“

“And they have faith in you , Sir, every moment; every breath of you is suffused with unwavering faith- the belief that you, weak, fallible, mortal you, can somehow find the Truth of these matters, can somehow pour untroubled oil on violent waters hungry for their blood. They follow you into the Court, and sit or stand or rest, waiting in their chains, for you to free them- in warm summer rain, through the howling winds of autumn, on a perfect spring afternoon or a dreary winter’s day. They find their reserved seats, where once their heroes and gods sat as they were cheered on by the child that has grown and taken their place. And they will listen to you defend them, with everything you have, and several things you don’t, and it is as if they’d been lit within with sacred fires. The smoke of lies burning away, the stench of truth in the air- the very memories themselves, so thin as to be like gossamer of spiders, why, so thick in the air these things will be, they’ll have to wash their very souls out to be clean again,”

“You can’t prove a gods damned thing, so just- shut up,”

“People will care, Sir; and someone is coming,“

“Y-you’ll never be able to prove that I did a-anything wrong, and- and no fancy trick you use, no twist or truth will ever make me admit to doing something wrong! I’ve done nothing wrong at all! NO ONE IS COMING!”

“The one constant through all the years, all the ages, Sir, has been the Law. The World grew and shrank, heaved and tossed like a child gripped in nightmares; it has spun on like a pinwheel, has toiled on like an anthill, has rolled like barrels onto a barge. It’s been cleaned like a slate, rebuilt, torn down, rewritten, and erased again. But the Law, Sir! The Law has marked the time!
“This Court, my job- even your own denial of fault, your lies, your misdirections and cruelties- it’s all a story that’s been told and told again, all throughout the Ages, Sir. It’s been passed from generation to generation, tearing and tattering and being renewed with each and every telling; it serves to remind us of all that is Good in the Law, and could be so again,”

“Oh, people will care, Sir. For even a second of change, people will most definitely care; and someone isn’t coming. Someone is already here,”

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; First Wing, First Floor, Room 88

If there’s one thing I hate more than being unable to work out how to catch a liar in their own web, it’s the damn fraternization regulations during Court Sessions. Basically, if you’re on a case, you’re celibate- no sex, no kissing, don’t even masturbate if you can help it. I’ve heard a lot of different reasons why from laypersons and people in the system aren’t supposed to have any kind of sexual relations during Court Sessions- everything from “You’re making love to the Law, so don’t be a two-timer” to “Who in the hell has time for that”. Listen, if farmers, who work from before sunrise to quite a bit afterwards can find time for not one, not two, but twenty seven children- Aunt Zippy’s family is not small - then a humble lawyer or two can find time for a screw.

So I asked Danelphe about it, and after roaring with laughter for a while, they explained it to me.

“It’s my fault, actually,” they said, wheezing on giggles and snorts.

“What do you mean?” I said.

“Well, back in my Barrister days, I may have, ah, fucked every adult and willing man, woman, and otherwise in the area…?” they said.

“…!” I said, very loudly.

“Yeah, Queeny didn’t like that much. So… she kinda, might’ve… banned all barristers from havin’ sex while on a case? It was fuckin’ funny when she did it too, so, I s’pose that’s why it became so ingrained- people remember the punchline of a joke long after the setup doesn’t make sense no more,” they said.

“…I would have just gone with “it makes it easier to focus on the case”, myself,” I said.

“That might not be true, actually,” they said.

“…?” I said.

“I can remember being so goddamn horny I could barely think about anything other than getting a good fucking; honestly, Queeny was just tired of me flirting with literally everyone, all the time,” they said.
“...You stole their hunt, didn’t you,” I said, suddenly aware of why Queen Ariel would have been so annoyed.

“Look, I didn’t mean to except for once and that’s because he was an assassin-” they said.

“Mmm-hmm,” I said.

I left it there, but I’ve been thinking about it now.

When your main reason for going on dates is relaxing in each other’s company enough to go back to a love-hotel and finger each other, you don’t have much experience going on actual, y’know, dates. Like, courting. Romance.

Yeah, I got… a bit less than half a plan. Because, actually, Sue isn’t the only person I’ve ever dated- I go on random dates all the time, just for fun. The best, most memorable ones… honestly, they’re long walks through the city or countryside, along the boardwalk, through the park… Mostly, it’s just talking and learning more about each other on the way.

Now, I’ll never actually say this to her in person until after we’ve settled together some more, but… Suisan is dense as hell.

I mean, she didn’t realize the time I took her to Cafe Lulu, the Adopt-a-cat Cafe in Pumpkin Hill, got her her favorite cake, tea, and helped her adopt a cat- his name is Puddles and he’s, well, he’s alright, I guess? I prefer birds, honestly- anyway, Siusan didn’t realize the Adopt-a-cat Cafe was a date. I realized it about when I was paying for the cat; the cat figured it out before Sue decided to adopt him; hell, even the staff figured it out, but were too charmed to say anything.

Suisan still hasn’t figured it out. She’s… dense.

So.

We’re going on a walking date this evening, because one way or another, this case is going to end today. Well, I say walking date- what I mean is… honestly, it’s up to both of us? How we feel at the end of the day, how much extra time we can finangle away from our offices, whether or not we’re going to have, ahem, coffee or not…

Which reminds me!

I need to text Sue, and see if we’re coordinating our outfits to work day-date night spec, or if we’ll stop and change...

Hey, it’s me

It’s four in the morning

Like u were alseep lol *asleep

Whatever what do you want

We need to coordinate outfits again

It’s a full-formal trial rite
Y
U got your formal blacks?

Y
There you go then
Alright- oh date tonight
Doing what
Ice skating maybe?
Dinner after maybe? Cider or mulled wine before Cider- no, wait, we’re in RM, sake is cheapest here Fine, but dinner
...ramen?
Ur not poor or in school, tho?
I’m frugal! And I actually like ramen
Lol fine
...Tilly?
Love you, Suisan
Love you, too, Tigerlily

Before we leave for school, every Portgas learns to make ramen. Mostly so that we don’t earn the love and fear of the local ramen stall unless it’s really fucking good, and genuinely warranted.

Portgas D’s can eat.

Ramen, with it’s combination of “anything goes” and caloric density, is often the perfect food to sate the hunger pains without breaking the bank or working too hard. It’s also cheap enough to make for an entire dorm room- if everyone pitches in, at least- that you can make and keep a pot of stock and the various other ingredients on the stove for the entire semester.

Both Sue and I have eaten our fair share of ramen. Eating ramen doesn’t really tell you much about how to make it, however.

Thankfully, Missus Myrtle, the family cook, taught me- (and my sisters, and Mab, and even Spadey and Asher now that I think about it) how to make a go of a good bowl of ramen. Over seven years later for me, and I’m still learning new little tricks and quirks to make the best bowl- but now, it’s a matter of fine detail, not basics. My ability to access the wisdom of Missus Myrtle, as well as taking several classes on soups, noodles, and ramen at the local culinary school, has proven predictably invaluable.
I’ll break down the cuisine into its basic constituent elements for you- and don’t get it twisted, this ain’t no instant ramen shit.

It starts with soup stock- this is the core of the product, the soul of the soup. Making it involves boiling pork or chicken bones- though often both together, or fish depending on your local- for an extended period. This is to extract all the flavor and collagen from the bone. Different parts of various animals contribute different features to the stock. Blood, feet, gristly bits no one wants-believe it or not, these parts are of paramount importance here. Other savory-imparting ingredients- your mushrooms, your kombu, your dried fishes- also have important roles to play, especially if you seek the more complex flavors found in Seavolk cuisine.

Then, there’s Tare- literally, the sauce. Basically, it’s the shio, miso, or shoyu concoction that takes your soup stock and transforms it into shio, miso, or shoyu ramen. For children who’ve never had ramen before, I usually recommend this be left out; it results in a simpler, more delicate flavor, often sweeter and more tender, even more palatable, to a child’s palate. Harmony being what it is, this sweet flavor does not exist in the dish as any added element, but rather is called to the mouth by the presence of the other flavors and textures in the bowl.

Ramen isn’t quite right without noodles- specifically, alkaline wheat noodles. They have to be alkaline to stand up to the heft of the soup; and they have to be looooong, as they’re a Longarm invention, not a Merrow or Mervolk one. You can mix the flours- wheat, buckwheat, rye, rice- so long as they come out sturdy against the force of the soup and tasty overall, you’re good. You can make them yourself, or buy them from a grocer, or even buy them from the noodle maker themself if you have a high enough volume of soup or a Portgas to feed.

You can even stop here. It’s soup enough to eat, after there’s broth and noodles in a bowl- but you shouldn’t. Where’s your oil? Or really, a flavored fat that floats on the soup’s surface. You can use lard, clarified butter, tallow, suet, bacon-grease flavored with herbs and spices- all of it flavored with herbs often, and spices rarely. Res ipsa loquitur.

Finally, toppings. What elevates ramen from a fast food to a fast full meal is the toppings- chashu, soft-boiled eggs, seasonal vegetation. Anything you want, really.

I like soft-boiled eggs, beef brisket, squash, and toasted coconut in my ramen. Yiu prefers a more spring-like flavor profile, so it’s daikon, reconstituted sweet-corn, leeks, and spring chives. For our date tonight, Sue and I are going for ramen after an evening of hot drinks and ice-skating. There’s a local rink, in fact- I pulled down the privacy drape so I didn’t disturb Aster, and I’ve been sitting up in bed, texting Sue. It turns out that behind the room’s telesnail there’s a whole sheaf of tourism information, kept up to date by the hotel staff.

The rink I’m thinking we should go to is actually on a direct line from the hotel, to a temple to the local Inari Okami, to the rink I have in mind for our date, to the ramen stall that’ll have something we both like to eat with ramen. There’s even an open air market between the hotel and the temple, so we’ll be able to get offerings for the temple if we want…

Maybe a red scarf?

Well, considering what we did last night, maybe not…
My brother, Del, is the Blue Bomber; he’s a fantastic graffiti artist, and general painter besides. I have a lot of travel time in my job, and right at the outset, there’s just… there’s only so much work I can do without interviewing or being on the ground in the place I need to be. I needed a hobby I could focus on, something… reasonably portable and minimal.

I chose crochet.

So, um, I never meant to be a delinquent, but these things just happen sometimes- no one ever sets out to be a delinquent, I’m pretty sure, it just becomes this… mode you get into. Just like no one really sets out to fail at having a romantic relationship with someone they love, it’s just- love lives and fulltime jobs don’t mix. What do I do for fun? My job. What are my hobbies? Crochet and my job. Where are all my friends? My job.

I… I love my job, I do, I just… I have sincere doubts that giving so much love to something that will never love me back is really right. Sue does too, that’s why- that’s why for Imbolc, we ended up, er, together, and that’s why when things didn’t go so well, I guess… We try. We try our best to be together, to spend our time with each other- because, really, we don’t have all that much time at all.

It’s more than can be said for many.

---

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; Second Wing, Second Floor, Room 18

I’m too horny to sleep, but I’m too loud to masturbate in the same room as my sisters.

This vacation blows.

Think about something else, Eleanor…

When I was disguised on the train with Franky, I wasn’t lying. I really do have a strange and deep passion for graves. I can read- several languages, in fact, and quite a few dead ones, and write clearly in them too. I can do mathemagic, but it’s not my favorite; clean thieves live longer, and cooking for myself was so Deb didn’t have to after a hard day’s work. Ofnachigainaku senshin-tekina ugoki doesn’t exist, but I am good with a shield and sword- though, considering my actual skill-set, isn’t terribly useful outside of disguises. I am actually a druid, technically- it’s hard to live in Gobdark like we did without getting good at the Green magics. Really, though, my passion is for necromancy.

What I’m really, really best at is ninja-shit. Sneaking, sabotage, misdirection, disguise… I can do a lot with a simple bandana and a change of clothes, I can tell you that.

I didn’t quite… explain everything about my Dream, though. See, there’s this thing called the Thief’s Cave, a concordance of every great Thief Clan in the World (we call ourselves Clans because Gangs are robbers, not thieves)- it’s where the loot of a million lucrative heists is said to be portioned out among the clans, in order of prestige and blah blah blah.
The point is, it’s a very hush hush meeting, or it would be if every thief even the least bit interesting wasn’t a gossipy busybody, myself included. See, lots of people never know this—graveyards, especially the big, State, open-to-the-public cemeteries? They’re great places to leave secret messages, because you can leave an offering for a dead person and whatever you need to and no one says boo about it—well, how can they?

It’s not like you’re actually doing anything wrong, y’know.

So, so-so- My real Dream… my real Dream is to be acknowledged as a Master Thief, maybe even the Best in the World—suspected by many, but never ever proven. I’m not there yet, but soon.

I guess… I guess my plan for making that happen is pretty obvious. It’s probable that lots of thieves have tried, and died for their troubles, before me. But, I can’t help it… the loot of a million heists—I don’t need to take much of it, hell, a single handful of gemstones or a priceless object d’art would be enough. It’s… it’s the idea of me, having actually done it—because the security on that loot pile, hah, it’s some of the most intense and persnickety in the history of the World.

Haki-using guards, guard animals, random patrols, tripwires, sensors, magic—no one knows for sure what all is in there, keeping track of all that loot.

I’m going to steal it.

I’m going to steal it because I want the respect of my peers— I want to be a master thief, even though to my knowledge, there’s never been a female one. Hell, other thieves of my acquaintance still burst into laughter whenever I say I’m a proper thief—maybe I shouldn’t have taken on a pseudonym, but goddamnit, I didn’t… I didn’t want Work to follow me Home.

So. I’m just going to steal a reputation for myself, as myself—after revealing my identity as the Cat of the Cat and Mice Clan, and to hell with whoever tries to stop me.

Chihiro Town is one of the biggest Thief Towns in Ryugu Mergyo. Of course it is—this one is one of the major endpoints for dozens, hundreds of smuggler’s trails. This is where the things that fall off the back of carts really come from; and this is where I can start getting hard data on the things I need to look for in the graveyards to figure out where the next Thief’s Cave is. See, every Clan has their own iconographic form of code, and breaking those codes is, to thieves, just as much a part of a heist as anything else. It wouldn’t do to steal something out from another Clan, after all— not unless you’re trying to start some shit.

But there’s other stuff that gets talked about in code—gossip, of course. Always gossip. And in that gossip—hints and peeks at where the next Cave is going to be. The Cat and Mouse Clan is known for having some of the most impenetrable code in the World; something that never fails to make Darla puff up in pride, the little shit. I will say, however, that his invention of an entire language to effectively write out ideographic sentences is impressive. It took a long time to really ingrain the letter-sound combinations into my mind, but after five years of using it every day, several times a day, to make notations about what we’re doing, write down what’s been happening—well, some things become second nature.

Master Robin has been fascinated, learning how to read and write our Clanlang. When she asked Darla what made him come up with it, he said it was two things, really—he knew every one of his clan could use a compass to draw perfect-ish circles, and that he wanted it to be jarringly oblique to look at. The fact it also came out really nice was just a bonus. Master Robin… it’s strange, I don’t think she expected a whole class of apprentices, but it turns out each of us in the CM Clan have something we want to learn from her or something she wants to learn from us. It also helps that our Clanlang is easily disguised- it could be a random arrangement of stickers and circles in metallic pen. It’s not, of course- but to the untrained eye? It certainly could be.

Darla is fast on land- most people think he wouldn’t be, what with the tail and his smaller size, but he is. He can actually slither on his tail like a particularly enterprising snake, and he can use it to coil up and leap much, much higher than most people think he can. He went to a specialty salon near the fancy Daiso Mab took Beatrix-y, and what with all the “being detained by the police” thing, I expect he’s rendezvoused with the others and my sister and brother, and they’re all figuring out what to do from there. Honestly, unless Fern has a Sight of what they need to do, they’ll probably just wait for us on the ship…

I- I can’t believe it took so long for Darla to tell anyone he’s actually a man. I don’t hold it against him- he’s small, and cute, and… and without gettin’ real close an’ personal, I don’t doubt it might have been safer for him to be a tiny mermaid, not a tiny merman…

Lemme see now, what did the others say they were going to be doing…

Ah, right.

Jellybean said she was gonna get some upgrades- she’d been putting it off for years, and with us going into the Line proper, it was only right that she be at top operating efficiency ASAP. Apparently, there’s a massive new upgrade centralized in the Ryugu Mergyo Automata community, and it’s called… it’s called something hella fancy, but on the street it’s known as “Slime”. Jellybean was already in the transitional stage between the Orthodox “hardshell” Automata, and the Unconventional “slime”, something called, fittingly enough “jelly”. Apparently, the advantages of the slime-type body outweigh the potential issues; and even if she does have to relearn how to fight, it’s her body.

Maya needed a full makeover- she said that her old look was fine, but a new stage in her life demands a new look. Mostly, that amounts to a new haircut; she said that she’s getting closer to being over having lilac hair, that her parents opinion of her doesn’t matter anymore. I saw her new style just before I went in for a massage- and after that, things started to go really wrong- but, well. It’s a good look for her. It’s also nice to see her embracing her Pixie heritage, even if she can’t inherit some things.

Hildy actually went to visit the whore-houses that cater to people of her size. She said, and I quote, that it’d been entirely too long since she’d last gotten a proper dicking, and she wasn’t going to waste time on perfume and glitter when she could have meat and potatoes for her holiday. Honestly, I’m kind of jealous of her- I’ve been wanting alone time for ages, but with all my sisters so close by, and my brother Sancho out of school, I just. Bleh. Not the time or place for masturbation, y’know?

Arlinda Rader Haai is with Hildy; apparently, she wanted to see what all the fuss was about. Goddamnit, I really shoulda just gone with Hildy and ARH, I woulda had a great time. Fuck!

As for Quilaby, well. He’s in my pocket, actually; he mostly just wanted to nap where he felt safe, and he feels safe with me. So.
I sincerely hope this court-thing is over with soon—hell, if it ends quick enough, I can probably sneak out to a brothel and get a nice-lookin’ young man to plough my raging sea…

Is it sunrise yet—? Yep.

Thank god, time for a shower and breakfast; maybe food will help…?

---

DAY 3

24 HOURS REMAIN

---

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; First Wing, First Floor, Room 88

In relation to Chihiro Sento, the Chihiro Town Courthouse is about four blocks away from it diagonally, making it just far enough away to be out of sight of the tourists, but just close enough to be in mind of the locals who work at the sento. The Detention Center is another four blocks diagonally from the Courthouse in the opposite direction of the hotel and the angle of the courthouse to the hotel. The three buildings describe in themselves a triangle that the locals call Lawyer’s Row; there are clothing cleaning services, coffee shops, restaurants… everything the lawyer needs to keep working. There’s even a fairly nice park, for if you need to get some natural light during a Court Recess.

There’s a darkness, anywhere the absurdly rich decide to spend time playing. I have to figure out if there’s enough suspicion and unreasonable doubt surrounding Lorenzo Bartok to convict him for murder. Janet Ashtraghi is also under severe suspicion; if it comes down to it, both of them are going to go down.

I’m fairly certain that Osvaldo Bartok’s accusation of incest is completely factual; the way Lorenzo Bartok reacted was too… there’s a thing that happens when your eyes see something, but your mind misses it. That’s what a “gut-feeling” really is—your body recognizing something your mind doesn’t. I Know Lorenzo Bartok is Guilty, just like I Know Janet Ashtraghi is complicit in his guilt.

Mince Coffyn’s camera was stolen so that Osvaldo Bartok could take pictographs of his sire and his aunt during their incestuous congress. If they are friends- or more, even, but I think they’re just friends—then the pictograph collection that Mince Coffyn spent so much time making should still be fully intact. I have to wonder, though… receipts from the Daiso weren’t the only ones present in Mince Coffyn’s receipt pouch. I know where the money is—what I don’t know, is why Osvaldo Bartok didn’t say he had it.
“Aster, are you awake?” I said.

“...yes?” said Aster from behind the privacy curtain.

“We need to move quickly; there’s something we overlooked yesterday. I need you to find Osvaldo Bartok and give him a Resonance Cascade check, as soon as possible,” I said.

“Do I have time for breakfast?” said Aster, sitting bolt upright and already squirming out of bed.

“You do if you don’t bother chewing it-” I said.

“Smoothie, got it,” said Aster, before bolting for the bathroom.

As he showers, I consider the rest of the case.

Two poisons, but one was present due to mithridatism; Cyanide is too lethal for the practice, no sane mithridatist would attempt it, and if nothing else, the Coffyns were very, very sane. The two Defendants were in the room as the victims at the time of the murders.

What we need now… is this: How did the cyanide get into the victims?

And most importantly of all... why did Lorenzo Bartok let BBCC live?

Because, if I’m right about Osvaldo Bartok, I know exactly how Lorenzo Bartok did this.

Formal Blacks aren’t entirely black; it refers to the base color of the formal Barrister Coat each Lawyer is to wear upon the most important occasions- the swearing in of a new judge, appointment to a Royal Posting, and so on.

My most formal clothing starts with the basic blue jumpsuit with the yellow stripe- they’re my colors, I have to wear them, just as Sue’s colors are actually magenta and white. If we don’t wear those colors, we can’t be quickly identified as ourselves. It’s the same with my hair, and my bells- if I don’t wear them, I can’t be said to be me. My hair is another identifying feature, one that’s more a Royal thing than a me thing. There are... not necessarily specific styles, but the Royals of any country always set the standards of fashion.

For a long time, the style of hair expected from people in the Offices was… well, stupid. Bouffant styles more suited to a dandy or a poppin’ bird than someone who might, in the course of their Duties, need to straight up punch a motherfucker out. Lawyers are the last line of the Law that’s meant to interact directly with people, you see- and in many cases, it’s been a Lawyer who’s called to command the Forces in War. Basically, Lawyers are Generals for the Fae- or at the very least, powerful warriors.

Our formalest formal wear reflects that.

To start, concessions to the weather. I pull on a pair of navy blue sheer stockings, followed by a black long sleeve turtleneck leotard that buttons between my legs where no one will ever see. It’s meant for dancing, so my underwear- dammit! Off come the stockings and underwear, on go the stockings again, on goes the leotard- and there. Finally. Next come the socks- black, this time, and silk, and stopping just a bit below my ankle.

Aster steps out with wet-combed hair and a determined expression- I dart in, brush my teeth, fix my hair, and apply the makeup that turns me from a mortal woman to an unrelenting avatar of Justice. My skin gleams and sparkles like granite; my eyes are darker and blacker than they’ve ever been before; stark lines of red dusted over with silver turn my resting expression into a fearsome, inhuman visage- female, if it matters. Start at the eyes, and the sharp curve that stops just underneath the center of the bottom of each one; bright, bright red was used here, and a silver dust so fine and delicate, one could be forgiven for not seeing it at all. When the light catches on it, each mark blazes with light-crackling like sticks in a fire. Another line, following the crease of each eye- but the two marks, dusted with silver, do not join together.

I am no soldier.

Two dots to convey the Scales on each cheek; one that coats my top lip, bisects them both and continues down my chin, for the Sword. Red in the corners of my mouth, and across the narrow closing of it. Silver dusted over everywhere the red has touched. The bottom lip is bare but for the red line bisecting it- and a dot pulled to a point in the bow of my lips, up towards my nose. Silver, more silver- and then a sparkling shimmer of gold dust, over the sharp angle of my cheeks, a darker brown to the parts I want pushed back- and there. I am… inhuman, in my coloration. To finish it, I must do what I have not done quite so vigorously before- I must Mask myself.

Masking is something every Fae, from the lowest of the low to the highest of the high, can do. Being in Ryugu Mergyo, I suppose I could describe it as becoming a Noh player without the need of a mask- Kabuki makeup to describe the traits I want, and Noh movements to allow- or in my case, disallow- emotions and such to be imagined where none truly exist. Noh players turn themselves into living statuary with the use of masks and fanciful costumes; I turn myself into the Defensive Spirit of Justice in much the same way, even though my mask is made of makeup and a stalling of my own face.

Even my hairbells, left to ring on their own, will only chime now when I will it.

When I walk out, it’s to Aster fighting to get his diaphanous tabard with red mountain-style marks along it’s hem in the front from twisting around his face. I undo the small knot he forgot he put in to make it easier to pack away, and the whole thing slides down onto his shoulders in a delicate flutter. Considering he’s using a full sized staff today, not his regular cane-size, the total effect, when paired with his boots, is… impressive. Combined with his slightly loosened hair, he’s quite fetching, really.

“Leave your hair loose, Aster; you don’t really have time to fix it. I saw a Jungle Juice on the way to the DC- on that street with the liquor store-?” I said.

“Yeah, I saw it too- see you at Court?” said Aster.

“Aye,” I said.

“Aye,” said Aster.
And with that, he’s out the door.

I hum to myself as I pull on my shoes, wrap them with yellow bracing, and make sure my bright yellow laces are tucked away under the bright yellow wraps.

Finally, I pull the Black on. It’s a heavy pteruges-style skirt attached to a bodice of black feathers, overlaid with silver armor. Once I’ve pulled it on over my hips and tied the ties, I clip on the simple black pouch for my watch and clip its clip into my bodice so even if I miss the pouch I won’t drop my watch. The sunflower embossed into my pauldron, with the sword of justice in the center, is enough to identify me as a lawyer; the Royal chrysanthemums around my neck and on my hairbells and, today, even in my hair, are just symbols of my status as a member of the Houses Portgas and Morgan.

Hanging from my neck is a small cameo-sized bit of something that escapes me now- not quite velvet, it’s too… thick, tough, for that. It’s substantial enough for me to pin my badge to, frankly speaking, and it’s been set on a hinge so that I need merely turn it around to show off the face of my badge- otherwise, it’s just the pin-closure that’s showing.

Finally, I take a yellow rope threaded with gold and wrap my hands. In the old days, Lawyers would wrap their hands with strips of twisted hemp cloth or leather strips. Although it’s commonly thought that Lawyers would dip their wrapped hands in broken glass, that’s a myth… excepting in two fairly well documented cases. Most lawyers dip their hands in water to harden the rope.

Mostly, we use rope because it allows for greater traction in a clinch, more potency to our strikes and blocks, the rope itself is abrasive and able to cut, and of course you never know when you’re going to need to restrain someone. Today, these rope hand wraps are not only stylish, but traditional, and to those who’ve actually seen a DA or Prosecutor fight, fucking terrifying.

There are a few different ways to do it, but this is the way Mom taught me.

Tie four knots in the end of the rope, roughly the distance of your knuckles. The knots are to sit on top of your knuckles, and the end of the rope needs to have enough of a tail you can hold onto it. Grasping the tail, wrap it around the meat of your hand, the distance between the inner web of your thumb and the knife edge on the outside; this is just to lock the tail down for the rest of the wrapping. Then, wrap around the fingers, from the palm of your hand, around the back, and between each finger. Some people start from the pinky; I start from my index. It’s just a matter of personal preference and habit. Take the rope to the inside of your wrist, and wrap it round the back, then again through the notch where thumb and forefinger meet, more than three, less than five.

Depends on you.

Depends on the rope.

For this rope? I need seven.

Clench my hand into a fist to make sure I haven’t done it too tight or too loose or not enough not enough- Wrap the forearm, no tension on the line, around and around until I’m halfway up the bone and the meat is curving away; tuck the line into its own coil, and I’m done.

Final check; DA Tilly Portgas, slightly hot headed logician, isn’t here right now. DA Portgas, Royal of the Law, is.
Leave a message for Tilly, and she’ll get back to you as soon as she can.

When I step out, I see that Yiu is just as I am; armor and ropes and all. Only, she’s a prosecutor, so she has a different badge; and she’s Yiu, so she’s wearing magenta underthings, instead of my navy blue.

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; First Wing Hallway, First Floor

As I walk through the Sento, I become steadily more aware of a certain… susurrus, as the people, the local people who live and work and die here, every day- they pause in my passing, and they avert their eyes, or bow to me, or gasp and stutter and drop their things, their sheets and bedding and dishes, bobbling in their startled hands.

They bow.

A child darts out of their mother’s keeping and grasps my skirt. I stop and turn and stoop myself that I may hear them clearly.

“You’re an okami, aren’cha?” they said.

“Yes,” I said.

“What kind?” they said.

“Justice,” I said.

“Eh?” they said.

“The kind that defends from lies,” I said.

“...eh?” they said.

“A lawyer,” I said.

“Oh!” they said, “If I give you an offerin’, will you give me a blessing?”

“If you like,” I said.

“Mm! This is Mika. She protects me from nightmares. If I give her to you, will you tell me the secret to becoming like you? I wanna be a lawyer-person too!” they said.

“Sure,” I said, gently taking the little doll. I look the child over, consider my options.

And then, I speak.
“This is what you must do. You have to go to school, and do well, and tell your teacher of your ambition; you must study faithfully, and learn all that your teachers teach, and learn it well; you must gain martial skill as well as rhetorical; you must go to a school for law, and learn, and ask for help when you need it. And above all else: you must have faith in those you defend, if you choose to defend them. You must not lie about your intentions; and you must not allow others lies to cloud your vision. But no blessing for such things can I offer, as all of this is within your grasp, even now,” I said.

I handed the child their doll back, and I smiled, and laid a blessing on their head with my hand- not a big one, just a normal one, because every word I said was absolutely true.

And then I walk on.

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; Cafeteria

Word travels fast, among- among? I’m not bothered much after that, only just, when I pause a moment- no, it doesn’t matter.

My brother is at the table again, and this time when I sit across from him, and Yiu at my side, he takes a look at the both of us and… smiles? I don’t know.

I eat my fish.

Siusan Yiu, my girlfriend and rival, isn’t here either. Prosecutor Yiu, however, is.

“You cannot hope to defeat me this time,” said Yiu.

“What makes you think I am battling you?” I said.

“You always fight me,” said Yiu.

“No, I fight lies; and you do not lie,” I said.

“People need to lie,” said Yiu.

“I am no fool; people need lies to be people. To be the place where freedom, beauty, truth, and love can exist in some kind of balance,” I said.

“Mysteries, legends, fantasy-” said Yiu.
“Yes, I am no fool. They need these things as practice. One does not believe the big lies without believing the small ones,” I said.

“Freedom, beauty, truth, love- Justice and Mercy- these are not lies, DA,” said Yiu.

“No? Then where are they, Prosecutor? Grind the world to dust and sift it through; show me your Love, your Justice, your Mercy. They are but dreams in the heart, and die with the dreamer,” I said.

“Then why persist in this doomed search for a truth that does not matter?” said Yiu.

“Because- it is only by our believing in such things that they become. If such as you and I did not believe in Truth, in Justice, in Mercy and in Faith- then such things would cease to exist. Would you allow such a thing?” I said.

“...I would not,” said Yiu.

Ace, sitting across from Yiu and I, blinks carefully.

“I can’t tell if I’m still high or not,” said Ace, squint-staring at us both.

“Portgas, even if you win; a guilty man will go free,” said Yiu.

“There are worse things,” I said.

“He does not deserve freedom! He deserves to die,” said Yiu.

“Deserves it! I agree; he does. Many that live deserve death; and some that die deserve life. Can you give it to them all, Yiu?” I said.

“I am no Power Overwhelming,” said Yiu.

“Then do not be so eager to deal out death in judgement that is not yours to give. The Dead do not sleep, do not dream; they are as they ever were, and cannot change from their courses. Would you deny the prospect of a good man growing out of a bad one, merely for the chance of killing an innocent for a crime they did not commit?” I said.

“Would you allow the prospect of a bad man becoming only more so, merely for the chance of him becoming better than he was?” said Yiu.

“I think I’m still high,” said Ace, eyes darting between the two of us.

“To what end, then, do you battle onwards towards?” said Yiu.

“Truth, and Mercy, and Justice,” I said.

“You cannot have all three of such things!” said Yiu.
“No? Where is that written?” I said.

“It is a Law of the World, surely?!?” said Yiu.

“We are lawyers, Yiu! If it comes to such things, our oaths and duties compel us to overturn the law and build anew in its place!” I said.

“Truth is stranger than any fiction, unobliged as it is to remain within logical possibilities; it does not change according to our ability to stomach it’s horrors; and it does. Not. Exist. You, yourself, have made that quite clear- so, why, Portgas? Why fight for such a damned lie?” said Yiu.

“...For in the course of my duties, I will always seek the True Justice, but love only Mercy. For, to love Justice—” I said.

“-and hate Mercy is but the doorway to injustice, which I have sworn to destroy. For it is my Sacred Duty to Obey the just Laws of this World; to uphold and guide them, as the World changes, so must the Law-” said Yiu.

“-for I have sworn, and bound myself to the oath, that I will find dark things, and foul deeds, and drag them to the light; for the dark things fear the light, and it is only in the open that foul things lose their power. I will not allow those who perished in despair to be forgotten or ignored; I will not allow those who toiled do so in vain or without due compensation,” I said.

“I will respect my comrades; I will not defend the unjust, nor the undefendable; my means shall ever remain consistent with truth and honor. I will not lie to the Judge, nor my rival in the Court; my personal feelings and experiences will not change my work,” said Yiu.

“I will preserve the secrets of the one I am charged to defend, unless and only if that secret is necessary to their Defense. I will never reject, from any consideration personal to myself, the cause of the defenseless or oppressed, or delay unjustly the cause of any person. This was my solemn vow,” I said.

“I will discover the secrets of the one I am charged to prosecute, unless and only if that secret is irrelevant to their prosecution. I will never absolve, from any consideration personal to myself, the guilt of the wicked or unpunished, or delay unjustly the punishment of any person. This was my solemn vow,” Yiu said.

“This, we swore; before our teachers, and our families; the Gods; and the Powers,” we said.

Ace nodded, and said, “I’m still high as a kite- but I also want to see where this goes. I’ll see you both later,” and then he walked away, shrieking at the trashcan as he went. His crew members seemed resigned to their fate.

Yiu and I are silent for a moment as my brother leaves the table with his friends.

“Your brother is a little odd, Portgas,” said Yiu.

“Yes, but he is also my brother, so such oddities are merely charms to my eyes,” I said.

“Hm. I suppose. I’ve never seen a man make one drag of stinkweed oil last so long before, though,” said Yiu.
“He might just have a talent for it, it’s new to me as well,” I said.

---

February 6th

Chihiro Town Courthouse, Skuan Office of Law

I could go over what we found in the house - the money in Janet Astraghi’s mattress, matching up to the bills the receipt Mince Coffyn kept from the bank stated were issued to him; I could go over the carefully written ratio of cyanide-fluid to butter, strong enough to incapacitate but not kill, and small enough to dissipate within three days, in Lorenzo Bartok’s hand; I could even go over the crumpled pile of poisonous clothing, stuffed down a coal chute no longer in use, deep in the heart of the house.

Added to Evidence: Stolen Prize Money

Added to Evidence: Recipe for Poisoned Butter

Added to Evidence: Recipe for Apple Tarts

Added to Evidence: Poisonous Clothing from Coal Chute

I could.

But none of that is as important as the revelation my partner, Aster - and his opposition, Gunther - discovered during their check on Osvaldo Bartok.

Automata, according to all biological checks we know how to make, are just as human as the other Tribes. They are also the youngest of the tribes; they can trace their ancestry and history directly through the centuries, whereas the rest of us get muddled about seven or eight generations back. The only thing we all know for sure: there was a war, and much was lost forever.

But not for them - and the way they managed it was this. Each Automata has within them a physicalized center for the resonance - which, speaking plainly, is an echo of the soul. For some Automata, this physical resonator for the soul takes the form of a gemstone; for others, a card, or a cube, or a droplet of some fluid that is not water. As far as I understand, each enclave of Automata the World over has their own specific style of soul resonator.

An Automata can disguise themselves as a member of another Tribe - they call it “Passing”. And, most importantly of all - an Automata can carry more than one soul resonator. Done properly, it’s nothing more than something like an internal cyst; not painful, not damaging, merely something inside that the body has no use for and cannot interact with. In this way, the collected knowledge of generations can be held and kept in perpetual circulation. For the carrier of the soul stone, or Memoria… while the duty is fairly burdensome, it’s in a more… more social way, than any actual strain on the body, mind, soul, or magic.

Done improperly...

Osvaldo Bartok, on first glance, is a typical demon man. Horns, a tail, hairy skin and all the rest is details. Except, Osvaldo Bartok is only fourteen- he’s too young for horns that big, a tail that long, and skin that hairy. He’s too adult. He’s too… sexy. He doesn’t match his childhood pictographs - the local primary school was very helpful in providing evidence. Certainly, puberty can account for a great deal of change- but Osvaldo Bartok changed when he was eight years old.

He went early to his part time job, and stayed late; he developed an overtly sexual sense of humor, long before he would ever have the hormonal necessities for him to, as it were, get the joke; Hearb Curree even provided testimony, and pictures, of bruising behind Osvaldo Bartok’s ears. The only way to get bruising behind the ears is choking or blows to the head- and while one fall, singular, can account for some… multiple bruises? For weeks on end? And then, of course, the boy’s skin turned red, so that the bruises wouldn’t show…

Added to Evidence: Pictographs of Bruises Behind Osvaldo Bartok’s Ears

You’d have to be near him often to notice, like Hearb Curree was, but Osvaldo Bartok is afraid of innocuous things- belts, bootlaces, tennis balls and tube socks… oil. He stood behind the counter, after a while, even though before he’d always used the stool; he stopped speaking, stopped looking directly at people, stopped drinking his favorite yoghurt drinks that he’d loved since his mother brought him into the store for the first time as a toddler; he started lying, and stealing, and that’s why Hearb Curree had to fire him- it’s a part of his franchise agreement, if he hadn’t, he’d have lost his store.

Hearb Curree never once called the police, or even filed a report, on Osvaldo Bartok’s habit of petty theft. Mostly because, in the end, Osvaldo Bartok never stole a thing- everything that boy ever took either got returned, or paid for. Hearb Curree bought Osvaldo Bartok a book on maintaining and repairing Automatic Weapons; he remodeled a back room in his store into a sort of break room or dorm, totally illegal, but he did it, and he made sure that the window in that room was up to fire safety code and that the door locked from the inside only- put on a deadbolt, and a safety chain, and a big cross-door bolt, too. Gave the key to Osvaldo, and told him it was his to use if he ever needed it- or not. Never once looked in the room; gave Osvaldo tips on how to install curtain rods, or put colorful paper over the windows- not all of them, but enough to block the view. One way philome, even- they carry all those things at the Daiso.

For all his motormouthing, Hearb Curree is a smart, smart man. He knew that the only judge in town was Lorenzo Bartok; he knew that all the police in town, every train station attendant and check point keeper would be aware of Osvaldo Bartok, and would tell his father if he’d gone somewhere. He knew that all those cops owed their jobs to the Judge; he knew that whatever else was happening, he could not stand by and do nothing.

Reading over the witness testimony Ren got from him, and the way Mister Curee bit his tongue rather than speak on some things, I’m quite sure that my own suspicions and Mister Curee’s are one and the same.
If your wife suddenly died, and you had her soul resonance- listed in the records as a gemstone no bigger than an acorn… and you had a son you didn’t care for much beyond what use he could be put to… a technician, who learned in her school years how the Automatic Memoria works, and how it can be altered externally… and no virtue to speak of…

Why, one can just imagine the terrible things one could get up to.

Evidence- bodies, blood-spatters, the remodeling of bones… these things do not lie.

Added to Evidence: Systemic, Systematic Abuse of Osvaldo Bartok; Physical, Mental, Emotional, Mystic

I could go into detail of how this evidence was found. But it’s not relevant to the case; so I will not.

---

February 6th

Chihiro Town Court House

When I look at my sister, the friends that have become her second family… I say nothing. When my sister sees me, in all my otherworldly finery, she stops speaking.

I hear her husband ask her what’s wrong; I hear her reply.

But if I focus on anything but going over the logic, the evidence of this case, I will lose my temper and kill a man and a woman in cold blood. I need to not do that; so.

I marshall my fraying patience, and I take a deep, nourishing breath of cold air, my last before I face the end of all this.

We all enter together. I take my place at the Defense Bench.

I watch the members of the Straw Hats carefully take their place along the bench; Mab and Sanji have, sandwiched between them, all four of the new members of their crew, including a shocky looking Osvaldo Bartok. Osvaldo Bartok is actually seated between Nurse May and Mab, with Nurse May holding BBCC and Mab with a handful of knitting; and Mince Coffyn is sitting between Nurse May and Sanji.

Where before, Osvaldo looked like a stereotypical Demon man-child, it is clear now that he really… isn’t. It’s also much easier to see the familial resemblances- the shape of his face, the narrowness of his eyes, that’s all from his sire. The rest? Well.

Automata only die when they are killed. And Isadora Bartok? She might have died—but she was not killed.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Court is now in its Final Session for the Trial of Lorenzo Bartok,” said Judge Scratch.

“The Prosecution is Ready, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“The Defense is Ready, Your Honor,” I said.

“I see that both Balances are in their formal Black; as such, I shall take up my Sword. Please take note that all decisions I make today are absolutely final, and beyond contestation. We seek today the resolution of this dilemma; did Lorenzo Bartok, through action or inaction, cause the deaths of Aloo and Apple Coffyn? Was Janet Ashtraghi part, party, accessory, or unwitting patsy in the conduction of these crimes? This trial, as all others, has been both fair and swift; and these, the scales of Justice, have been true and honorable in their work. Inquiry has brought Evidence; and so Arguments shall be defended, pressed, and torn down, as they must be. We shall now finish this, as all things will end,” said Judge Scratch.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“DA Portgas, please make your opening statement,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. -In my first year of law school, everybody loved everybody else- we were all studying the law, and the law as a noble thing. We were young things, gripped with love. By my seventh year, it was a rare day indeed that someone, in the night, did not take a knife to their wrists and end things; or even, in some cases, that more throats weren’t slit. People stole exams, hid research materials from the library, and lied- LIED- to the professors. It was assumed that such was merely the nature of the profession,” I said.

“...Ah,” breathed Judge Scratch.

“Later, at my first job- for which I was never paid- I was sworn in by a fool and vouched for by a scoundrel, and at last- at last, I was a lawyer. I believe in the strangling notion that people are innocent until proven guilty. I believe in that notion because I choose, every day I go to work, to believe in the basic goodness of people. I choose to believe that not all crimes are committed by bad people; that desperation can make even the best of the good turn to very bad means for their ends. I know what’s legal; and, more often than not, I know what is right, and what is wrong. I am charged with defending a forest, Your Honor; for this World is planted thick with laws, coast to coast- the laws of men, not God’s! And if they are cut down, and we are the men and women to do it, could we really stand upright in the winds that would blow then?” I said.

“...In over your head, Tilly?” said Danelphe.
“Absolutely!” I said, “-but that doesn’t matter at all! I always am, don’t you see? Every case I take, there’s a hundred years at least of law experience sitting at the opposition bench. My staff has collectively failed the bar exam no less than thirty-seven times. And yet- and yet. Alone, outgunned, scared, stupid, inexperienced, and outmaneuvered- I am all of these things, and I’m right. It is not wrong to defend someone who cannot defend themselves; and I am not paid enough to care about them personally. And yet- and yet-”

“...Finish it, then,” said Judge Scratch, taking a long drag of their pipe.

“Every lawyer, at least once in every case, feels themselves crossing a line that they don’t really mean to cross. It just happens. If that line gets crossed enough times, it disappears forever- and then you don’t know the difference between right and wrong. One only knows what is legal; and has no care for what is right. Then, those lawyers become another lawyer joke- another shark in filthy water. ...No matter what happens, I can never allow myself to become that person. At the end of this case, regardless of outcome, I will be taking a full years sabbatical. It’s- it’s too much, Your Honor. I have found this case increasingly personally disquieting, and, considering the conclusion I have come to… it’s just too much ,” I said.

“I understand, DA Portgas; however, you’ve entirely neglected to actually give the Court said conclusion,” said Judge Scratch.

“My apologies, Your Honor. My conclusion is this; Lorenzo Bartok did kill the Coffyns. He, at the very least, is Guilty,” I said.

Crack! go Judge Scratch’s fingers.

“Order in this Court. DA Portgas... you are aware that you are a Defense Attorney, aren’t you?” said Judge Scratch.

“I am, Your Honor,” I said.

“...At the risk of sounding stupid, what the hell, girl?” said Judge Scratch.

“Your Honor, I have an explanation,” said Yiu.

“-fuck it, lay it on me Prosecutor Yiu,” said Judge Scratch.

“DA Portgas relies on logical theorems derived from careful examination of evidence discovered during inquiry, interrogation, and examination. Although her contract with the Defendant states that she will defend them in Court, the Oath she swore as a lawyer- the Oath that makes her a lawyer at all supersedes all written contracts. During the course of our investigation, both the DA and I found evidence that is, well... Permission to approach, Your Honor?” said Yiu.

“...Both of you, get up here right now,” said Judge Scratch, pinching the bridge of their nose tight between thumb and forefinger.

I calmly walk up to the Bench, standing shoulder to shoulder with Yiu. Bailey erects a silencing ward, and Judge Scratch is assured of it’s impenetrability.
“Girls, what in the nine hells is going on?” said Judge Scratch.

I looked at Yiu. Yiu looked at me.

Both of us are cringing, because we really wanted to be wrong about this- but it does explain why everything happened the way it did.

“Your Honor… neither the Prosecution or Defense considers the contents of this folder required evidence in the case,” we said.

“At best, it is a convoluted justification for a gambling habit,” I said.

“At worst, the man is a monster who doesn’t deserve to live,” Yiu said.

“At most, it’s another case entirely- and you, yourself, set precedent in Woodlouis V. Derring-do; so, regardless of the evidence present, neither of us can Prosecute or Defend using the content of that folder as a Basis of Accusation,” we said.

Presented: Evidence of Systemic, Systematic Abuse of Osvaldo Bartok; Physical, Mental, Emotional, Mystic (Unmarked Folder)

Judge Scratch reads the folder through. By the end of it, they look sharper and fiercer than they ever have before- except, perhaps, in paintings. Couldn’t quite capture the tooth-rattling terror, or the sheer unrelenting pain being near them in such an advanced state of rage in dirt and oil though.

“I see. I am to assume that the two of you can argue DA Portgas’ assertion without referring to the contents of this folder?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” I said.

“Yes, Your Honor,” Yiu said.

“Very well; return to your benches, and we will proceed with this trial,” said Judge Scratch.

Yiu and I return to our benches, not quite at a run but if it’d been decorus to bolt we’d have fucking bolted, holy shit Judge Scratch is terrifying. At a gesture from Judge Scratch, Bailey removes the ward and suddenly the entire Court feels the unrelenting, seething, furious pressure of an enraged Devil. The Court, which had been murmuring and whispering to itself while we talked to Judge Scratch goes dead silent. Some people, blessed as they are with weaker wills, faint clean away.

There is a sound like the onrushing of great and hideous wings. Judge Scratch resettles behind the bench, sword in one hand and a small cigarrillo in the other. A plume of blue-black smoke rises from their lips.

clink! goes Judge Scratch’s sword as she exposes the habaki. For those who don’t know, a sword-person drawing that much of their sword is the equivalent of a gunfighter cocking their gun. What noise was in the Court dies as quietly as possible, lest it attract the Devil’s eye.

“Defense! Please call your first Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Defense calls King Dice!” I said.

The casino GM stalks in, slicked back salt and pepper hair cut high, felt green eyes, and a purple suit with tails. White gloves, and a cigar. He looks like what he is- the manager of an expensive, slightly campy, casino. Look past the felt green, the pointy mustache, the silly coat- those eyes miss absolutely nothing.

“Mister Dice. For the Court Record, please state your relation to the Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sure thing, Boss. I’m kin to Janet Ashtraghi- her momma married my pa when we were young things; an’ I’m brother-in-law to Lorenzo Bartok,” said King Dice.

“I see. Defense! Your Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Witness, please provide your testimony,” I said.

“Fine with me, DA,” said King Dice.

King Dice’s Testimony: Blood, Sweat, and Tears

“Lorenzo likes to play games,” said King Dice.

“No matter what, we can’t dig into the other case to be made,” I said.

“He brings his money and leaves in shame,” said King Dice.

“If we do, Justice for Osvaldo Bartok will be delayed,” said Yiu.

“For how much he lost,” said King Dice.

“We must abstain,” I said.

“Once I tabulated his cost,” said King Dice.

“We must refrain,” said Yiu.

“His only option was leaving his son to take the pain,” said King Dice.

“We can only hope our inaction does not leave him afraid,” we said.
“He was over a million beri in debt, correct?” I said.

“Yes, that’s correct,” said King Dice.

“And there was no way to make a payment plan of some kind…?” I said.

“For that much, which he’d been negligent on paying back…? No. He’d been looking a pair of legbreakers in the eye for at least a week before the murders; and he’d been dodging making any kind of payment on his debts for years before that. The only way he could have gotten out of it was by skipping town, or selling his son into slavery,” said King Dice.

“I see! Court will note that Motive is hereby established for Lorenzo Bartok; a massive debt to the THSC Casino in Chihiro Town,” said Yiu.

“Noted,” said Judge Scratch.

“King Dice, can you explain why you had possession of Banoffee Buko Canelé Coffyn?” I said.

“Sure thing,” said King Dice.

King Dice’s Further Testimony: Love-Hate Relationships

“My sister’s in love with a scoundrel,” said King Dice.

“Considering the evidence, we know that’s true,” I hummed.

“For him, she turned my nephew into a mongrel,” said King Dice.

“That’s a bit harsh, don’t you think?” mumbles Aster.

“She fulfilled his every behest,” said King Dice.

“Oh dear,” said Gunther.

“She did his every implied request,” said King Dice.

“Oh, ew,” said Yiu.

“And if they live after this, they’ll both need legal counsel,” said King Dice.

“Damn right,” we all said.

“…So you’re saying that if Lorenzo Bartok had asked Janet Ashtraghi to kill a baby, she would have?” I said.

“I’m saying that, the day I came into possession of the Littlest Coffyn, my sister couldn’t kill another baby. To my knowledge- and Kayumi’s as well- my sister Janet has been impregnated by Lorenzo Bartok once every other year since the death of my step-sister, Isadora. One, two, three- and she couldn’t kill the fourth,” said King Dice with a black look and a half-shrug. His fists are closed so tightly, his forearms are shivering.

“So she- Janet Ashtraghi- brought her to you?” I said.
“Yeah,” said King Dice.

“OBJECTION! Did you at any point consider that foul play might have been involved in Janet Ashtraghi’s acquisition of a newborn?” said Yiu.

“Sure, but- there’s been a sort of… revolving door on the morgue connected to the police station. Everyone knows that Judge Bartok wants things his way, and if you get in his way, he arranges for you to be taken out of his way. I might have known in my gut that my sister had done something very wrong to get that baby, but who was I supposed to tell? The police in Judge Bartok’s pocket? - No. I’m not a fighter; my job is to run a casino, and that’s what I do,” said King Dice.

“Any thoughts as to why Janet Ashtraghi brought the baby to you, sir?” I said.

“...Well, for some reason, because I manage the Devil’s own Casino, most people think I’m a real hard-case. I’m not; I do my job, I fix any problems that come up at work, and then I go home. My sister brings me a baby and tells me to handle it? I know she might have meant for me to leave the little mite to die of exposure, but what I actually did was send an assistant down to the Job Office for a wet nurse and governess. I know jack and shit about caring for babies- I also know there are people who train for every kind of job under the heavens, and child care is a job so hard it’s only your own mother who’d maybe do it for free,” said King Dice.

“Any particular reason you picked Nurse Mendy May?” I said.

“I suppose it comes down to my own experience hiring people for jobs. I didn’t hire everyone in my casino personally, I can’t, there’s too many jobs that need doing and not enough hours in a lifetime. What I can do is hire people along my chain of command who will do the job the way I want it done, to the best possible standard of doing it. Considering the job was really ‘be this baby’s mother’, I needed someone tough enough to look after her no matter what, but also someone who... well, it’s soppy, but, someone who’d love the girl too. Someone who’d make sure she eats her veggies when she grows teeth, and learns to read all her letters, and so on. And, of course- as the old adage says, an Automata dies when they’re killed, and not before. S’why we all know Isadora was murdered- a tumble down the stairs wouldn’t have killed her,” said King Dice,

“I see. Last question; if you were left in charge of your nephew, Osvaldo Bartok, what would you do?” I said.

“Hm,” said King Dice.

King Dice’s Final Testimony: Do What You Can

“It sounds silly in this language but you can’t do what you can’t do,” said King Dice.

Hearb Kurree is staring at the Defendants.

“It’s an adage, but I’ve yet to find a moment when it isn’t true,” said King Dice.

Hearb Kurree won’t look away from them.

“My nephew needs help,” said King Dice.

Hearb Kurree looks so knowing.

“It’s something anyone who’s seen him grow up has felt,” said King Dice.
Hearb Kurree looks so angry.

“There’s a lot of things he needs help to unscrew,” said King Dice.

Lorenzo Bartok can’t look Hearb Kurree in the eye.

“So, you’d send him to school?” I said.

“I’d take him to a doctor, first- see what’s broken, if anything, then what we’d need to do to fix him up. I don’t know much about anything other than my job, DA, but I know he’s not the boy he should be. He’s not content. He should be- but he’s not. After that- well, he’s been in school most of a year now, and he’s got his own thing going, I’d say… but, if it all has to come out into the open, he might have to move. I just… I want what’s best for him, be that here with me or elsewhere,” said King Dice.

“I see. Prosecution?” I said.

“No, I’m good,” said Yiu.

“No further questions, Your Honor,” I said.

King Dice has unclenched his hands. There are spots of bright red at the very tips of his fingers, but not his thumb.

“Hmmph. Dice!” said Judge Scratch.

“Boss?” said King Dice.

“Where were the tokens on the day of the Murder?” said Judge Scratch.

“Our telemetry indicates that the chips were not outside the bounds of the Sento at any time on the day of the murder,” said King Dice.

“No further questions. Get back to work, Dice- and have someone see to your hands,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes Boss!” said King Dice.

And then he’s out the door again, calm and collected as he started. That man wouldn’t make a terribly bad parent; he readily admits that he doesn’t know the first thing about caring for children, and has already demonstrated that he seeks out experts for the rearing of them when child-care is thrust on him. And any man who gets so enraged at the thought of harm to a child he cuts his own hands from clenching his fists is probably worth entrusting the care of one to.

“Prosecution, call your Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Prosecution calls Hearb Curree,” said Yiu.
The steady clack of hooves; a demon man, dressed like a merchant because that’s what he is. Shaggy blonde hair and black nails; a small glowing orb that he drops and bounces back into his hand on a sinew string. He stared down the Defendants like if he but could, he’d put his fist through the sternums of their chests and pull out their innards, devour them whole with their pale faces watching. His every movement is so tightly controlled, so suffused with rage, that he’s developed a muscular grace that can only be compared to an antelope or gazelle.

“Please state your name, and association with the Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“My name is Hearb Kurree- ah, spelled with a K, please. I am the employer of the Defendant’s son,” said Mister Kurree.

“I see. We are currently ascertaining the guilt of Lorenzo Bartok in the case of a Murder, and nothing else. Please keep your testimony cognizant of this fact, Mister Kurree,” said Judge Scratch.

“Of course, Your Honor. No problem,” said Mister Kurree.

“Mm. Your Witness, Prosecutor,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Witness, please give your testimony about the changes you noticed in Osvaldo Bartok. Also, be aware- due to the nature of your involvement in another case, this will be your only testimony in Court today,” said Yiu.

“Certainly. I understand, Your Honor,” said Mister Kurree.

Hearb Kurree’s Only Testimony: Worse Than Anything

“I’ve known Osvaldo Bartok for his entire life. When he was about ten or so, he changed, and not for the better,” said Mister Kurree.

“Enjambment is a technique that’s fairly rare,” hums Aster.

“When his mother was still alive, he was a happy, bright boy. He was always bursting into song, dancing to music only he could hear. After his mother died, he wasn’t the same, of course- but after a good year or so, he started singing to himself again,” said Mister Kurree.

“It’s a technique that takes more care than the regular styles of Court Cant we hear,” I hummed.

“And then his music stopped, and it did not start again until I let him live in the back room of the shop. He would come into work, limping and red eyed and with two shadows flickering at his feet, and I knew, I knew that Lorenzo Bartok, Lorenzo the Fucking Magnificent, was up to his old tricks again,” said Mister Kurree.

“Aha. That’s why he had so many wanted posters, I had wondered...” hummed Aster.

“It’s only luck and a Joyless Meadows priest who could be paid off with a pint of milk and a Chocobar that Lorenzo Bartok wasn’t extradited to Ryugu Mergyo proper for crimes against the state. I should have taken action then, but… I’ve never been the kind of person to murder a man in cold blood, even if I could have gotten a Special Dispensation for it,” said Mister Kurree.

Gods. Joyless Meadows are perhaps the worst, most corrupt clergy in the World- a Death cult with enough money and power to grub at respectability, but no actual substance to make it stick. That explains how Isadora and Lorenzo got married, at least- a Joyless Meadows priest would only care that their fee was paid, and would tell a king to his face that a prince and a pauper were married, end of story… Hm. Maybe they are worthy of some respect- it’s not every priest or priestess who would tell the truth no matter what, and considering they worship a God(ess?) of Death, they have no fear of dying...

“But my bitter regrets and rage is not the point of this testimony. The point of this testimony is a timeline. Osvaldo Bartok lost his mother when he was eight, and his occasional part time job became an actual job when he was ten. He worked for me until about nine months ago,” said Mister Kurree.

Presented: Timeline of Events Previous to Crime

“If I could have ensured Oz’s safety, I would have accused his father long ago. But for the sake of this trial, I’ll keep quiet- but there’s one thing I can’t let go of. When Isadora Bartok was murdered in her home- and everyone who kept up with such things and knew the Dice Girls knew she’d have to be murdered by time or an enemy, and so she was- her sister, Kayumi Polleen Ashtraghi, tried to kill herself no less than fifteen times. It was only after her sister Janet had a talk with her that she stopped- she went to work for her brother, Diego King Dice. For a Dice to give up their course, some radical new piece of information must have been given. Nothing else would do the trick,” said Mister Kurree.

“OBJECTION! For what reason did Osvaldo cease being in your employ?” I said.

“The reason I wrote on his severance letter, or the actual reason?” said Mister Kurree.

“The truth, please,” I said.

“...Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtraghi scare Osvaldo Bartok, and I know this because they came in while he was working the register and he had a severe panic attack after they left. They didn’t do anything to him there- they didn’t speak to him, they didn’t look at him. For all his notice of them, they barely noticed my stocker. They bought their things, they paid in cash, they left. He couldn’t stop crying for five hours. I stuck a hat on him, and walked him to the L’ecole de Musique, and entered him into their intensive program for aspiring musicians. The next time I saw him, he was dressed like a musician and he acted like one too- the sweet child I remembered was hidden under a shape that wasn’t his, a grin that wasn’t his, a fever he couldn’t sweat out...” said Mister Kurree.

“The shape of him isn’t his shape...?” I said.

“Hell no! He looks like his mother, not... that!” said Mister Kurree.

“I see. For the Court Record, Hearb Kurree’s testimony is fairly extensive, and this is only a summary of what he said in Private Chambers. The timeline he mentioned is consistent with Lorenzo Bartok’s banking records, as well as Janet Ashtragi’s receipts,” said Yiu.
“No further questions, Your Honor,” we said.

“Mister Kurree,” said Judge Scratch, “This is the only testimony you are permitted to give during this Trial. If the Defendants of this Trial are acquitted, you will be called here again, do you understand?”

“Yes, Your Honor. I understand perfectly,” said Mister Kurree.

He steps down from the bench, stretches his feet and tail, and calmly walks back to his place on the Witness Bench. He resumes his steady staring-down of the Defendants. Lorenzo Bartok still can’t meet his eyes.

Hearb Kurree is the quietest, most angry man I think I’ve ever seen in my life.

“Defense, call your Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Defense calls Dr. Vavoom!” I said.

Dr. Vavoom has changed since yesterday: from her sexy clothing to something a bit more armored. She also looks by turns more exhausted and more invested than she did yesterday, and there are two bird creatures lurking on her shoulders.

“Witness, state your relation to the Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes. Doctor Barbarella Vavoom, Coroner. Judge Bartok is my direct superior; Isadora Bartok was my friend. Janet Ashtraghi was not my friend,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Doctor; the Defendants are accused of murdering Aloo and Apple Coffyn, and nothing else, at this time. Do you understand?” said Judge Scratch.

“Understood,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Defence, Your Witness,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor. Dr. Vavoom, please explain what a Familial Resonance is, and what it can be used to do,” I said.

“Yes,” said Dr. Vavoom.

Dr. Vavoom’s Testimony: The Old Song

“I didn’t understand the long answer, myself, until I was in grad school. The short answer, which is a very useful sort of lie, is that a Familial Resonance is the sound your Soul makes when you hit it so’s it rings. Families—used here, scientifically, to mean beings related to each other within one or two generations, example, a brother-sister pair, or a parent and child—have the same sorts of, of artifacts in their soul sounds. Certain musicians even mimic or stumble onto certain combinations of song-tones that resonate with the soul— it’s why certain people like certain music, they literally hear a part of themselves in the sound. Use of the Soul Sound is millennia old, but actually looking into how it does what it does is only a few hundred year's old. It’s… a very useful sort of untruth. Metaphor. That’s the word, for the music-thing,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“I see. So, in other words, it’s a sort of naturally occuring marker that everyone has?” said Yiu.

“Not just people. Plants, animals, weapons, even rocks and the contents of books. If it can be said that a thing is alive, then that thing has a soul that can resound- so long as you have the right tool to strike it, and the right ears to hear it,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Ah. So it could be used to, say, determine which of these fossils came from one specific creature when there’s a whole pile of them in the dirt and no other way to know for sure?” said Yiu.

“Exactly so,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Do Soul Sounds have other properties?” I said.

“Yes, they do. In beings under a year to five years old, the Soul Sound is very impressionable. There have been cases where, in adopted children, the resonance changes to match more closely with the adoptive parents. There have also been cases of resonances recording other resonances- like an echo, that’s a good lay-word for it- when the child in question has been exposed to an extreme trauma,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“OBJECTION! Are you saying that Miss Coffyn’s Soul Sound recorded the Soul Sounds of her parent’s murderers?” said Yiu with a slam of her fist on the bench, shocked.

“Yes. I am,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Thank you, Doctor. Now, please explain for the Court Record the results of your test on Banoffee Buko Canelé Coffyn’s Familial Resonance, or Soul Sound. Whose echoes are in Miss Coffyn’s soul?” I said.

“Right. The patient is of a good weight, with full lung function; soul sound matches to within ninety-nine percent of her still-living brother, and ninety percent of her deceased parents, which is well within parameters of family. Soul Sound contains echoes, which match to within a quarter-tone of two recorded; Judge Lorenzo Bartok, and—” said Dr. Vavoom.

SPANG! goes a bullet off a large orange shield. Whuuunnnng goes a strange blue… pitchfork? It only has two tines, so maybe? Either way, it’s pinning Lorenzo Bartok to the back of his chair, his throat caught between the two tines and his eyes rolling with a mixture of fury and fear.

Dr. Vavoom’s orange shield curls back into the shape of her bird-masked familiar.

clink! goes Judge Scratch’s habuki. No one dares to breathe until Judge Scratch daintily inclines their head in Dr. Vavoom’s general direction, before making a small gesture in a clear motion to continue.

Dr. Vavoom nods.
Dr. Vavoom’s Final Testimony: Suspicious Character

“As I was saying. The echoes in Miss Coffyn’s soul match two recorded Soul Sounds: Judge Lorenzo Bartok, and Site Safety and Health Officer Janet Ashtraghi. The only way for such echoes to be present within such a young resonance is by way of trauma. I cannot prove that Mister Bartok or Officer Ashtraghi killed the Coffyns. I can prove they were there at the time of the Coffyns deaths. Souls only take up echoes of other souls when their physical proximity- as denoted by bodily proximity- is within one meter. They were there; close enough to notice something was wrong. Close enough to help them, if they were in danger. Close enough that Mince Coffyn, their son, should not have been the one to find the bodies,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“OBJECTION! For what reason do you have two Battle-familiars in Court this day, Dr. Vavoom?” said Yiu.

“My lab was attacked last night. I’ve had thirty predecessors in the past six years, all of them dead in various nasty ways in Office. I can’t apologize for indecorous behavior if I’m dead of bullets. Bullets are the leading cause of death in the cases of my predecessors, you know. Oh- Sorry, Your Honor,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“It’s fine- in fact, you’ve got Special Dispensation to do it again, and with more vigor, should you have need. Bailey, give the Doctor a note- thank you,” said Judge Scratch.

“Neat. I’m having the part for display framed, I think. It’ll be nice next to my diploma,” said Dr. Vavoom.

“Nothing further, Your Honor,” I said.

“No further questions, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Dr. Vavoom, please retake your seat on the Witness Bench- but leave your bident if you please. I’ll have a Bailiff return it to you after Mister Bartok is secured,” said Judge Scratch, “Now, while the Bailiff takes care of that, we will have a short Recess. Take a stretch; take a piss. Refreshments can be purchased in the Lobby. When we return, we will discuss these revelations with the Defendants, and come to a resolution on these sordid details. Court Adjourned.”

click! goes Judge Scratch’s habuki as it slides back into the scabbard. The whole Court breathes a sigh of relief.

I need a piss and a snack, in that order. I look over at Aster, who is standing and stretching out a leg cramp. Perfect.

“I want a sandwich and some tea, please. Here’s my money- I’m going to the toilet,” I said to him.

“Sure thing, Boss,” said Aster.
And then I ran for it because my back teeth were fucking floating.

You know, there’s a good reason I became a Clown, of all things- specifically, a Fool with minors in Bardic Performance, and Mimicry (which is the academic word for Miming). Mostly, it’s because I have a thing, in my head? Right, well, it lays out a series of actions I can take, and at the end there’s laughter. I almost never know what the actions are until I take them, and I have to take all of them with proper timing and skill, or the laughter won’t come- which means I had to practice.

Eventually, that led to school- and, well, if I’d never been a Clown, I would have had a great line in Mystic Crafts. I’m not as good as Fern, but she makes straight up enchantments- you have to have a talent for that, it can’t be taught at the highest levels. What I do is the very basics of enchanting, and it’s really more of a hobby. But.

I understand what I’m doing when I do it, and for most of the things Fern makes? She doesn’t. Understanding the fundamentals will get you farther than just instinct alone- but, the things she can do when she does understand, well. The only word for that is magic, I’d say.

Still. When Fern gets one of her Visions, I know that whatever she needs done, she needs to avert a real catastrophe, a disaster, something that could result in the death or destruction of a friend, family member- and now that we’re pirates, crewmate.

Still, it’s a little weird- my sister has never asked me to make anything so complicated before. She brought me the materials for a dream catcher, and a list of dictations for the pattern of the web I was to weave inside the hoop.

The hoop itself is made of vine, three twisted together. It’s not fun to work with, but it’s not worse than, say, bone, or stone. Then I took red thread- silk embroidery floss, actually, and blow me down if Fern didn’t make notes about everything she’s taking from the Workshop and Studio- and I wove a sun into the net, as well as a series of charms that Fern dug out from her backpack. What resulted was something like a sunflower, with glistening beads shaped like fish caught in it’s rays- little golden fish with red faces and blue scaled bodies.

Then I had to make something like… eight extra small, eight small, eight medium small, eight medium, and then arrange them in steadily expanding circles, carefully binding each hoop to the other, eight, three, four, four, three- because all the hoops, bound together eight, three, four, four, four, two then into the largest hoop of all, like a hula hoop but jumbo sized, and bind each outer hoop to the final ring. Eight, three, four, four, four, three.

Lattice weave in murky blue and brown, and beads made of smaller beads, in a spiral arrangement- waterlilies- stitched down, eight, first ring. Second ring, eight again, swimming frogs in rippling waves of blue and brown and green, like light over water. By this point, I was heavily invested in finishing the damn thing, so- tiny golden dragonflies, flickering through bits of gold and brown and murky green, third ring. Fourth ring, turquoise turtles; darkest brown, green and blue, golden yellows. Finally, last ring; cranes, bright red on milk white glass, floating in a flickering sea of red grasses and brown earth and blue, blue sky.

The outer hoop got covered in bundles of feathers, quail and rooster tail and white down from gooseand then it’s done, and I’m almost blinded by what I’ve made. The last thing I have to add are eight glistening scales of rainbow black.

A mandala- my sister gave me the instructions to make a dreamcatcher mandala.

An eye of God is a votive object made by weaving a design out of yarn, thread, hair, on a wooden cross. Several colors are used, depending on the God being invoked. What most people don’t realize is that a God Eye and a Dream Catcher are two different directions for the same sort of thing.

Dreamcatchers came to Gobdark from the Fae- a hoop made of wood or metal, on which was woven a net or web. There were sacred items, too- feathers, beads. When they began to be made by merjin and gyojin mothers, grandmothers, the feathers got replaced by the scales of fish, and the beads changed from ivory to gold, stone, precious minerals. They’re called gyomō, fishing nets; they catch bad dreams, little monsters, and other evil things in their webbing.

Eventually, they became a common thing. When Mom got sick, I started selling the ones I made for extra pocket money, and, well… if I focus on it, I can make something like thirty in two days. That’s because I work in batches, but that’s not important.

I remember my first mother, my birth mother. She hated me- or, no, I don’t think she really did. I’m not sure she cared. Aki-san- Aquila- she cared. I made a godeye for her when she got pregnant, and when the girls were two years or so, I made them dreamcatchers. They’re gone, now, as so many things are- but I still did it.

That was when Mom became Mom; she gave me my earrings, told me that in her family, they were only given to the son of the daughter- the first son, the first daughter, repeating back through generations. That’s how I became the older brother to the girls; that’s how I became my mother’s son.

My First Mother left when I was ten, and the girls were six; and I never saw her again. She- my first mother- gave me the name Horizonté. Mom named me Herbert; Cece couldn’t say “Herbert” when she was six. She could say “sancho”, which I think she associated with my shoes, which, at the time, were printed with bamboo grasses. Sancho, of course, has a number of jokes attached to it… And most interesting of all, Cece didn’t know me when she came to the Gag, probably because she’d never seen my Face until then. I didn’t know her, either, but… I figured it out on the first day.

As for why I became a Clown, instead of a crafter like I thought I would be when I was ten, it’s really very simple. Unless you gain a very strong following, being a crafter isn’t a job you can make a lot of money in quickly- don’t get me wrong! You can make enough to live on, if you’re a crafter, enough to pay your share of rent, utilities, groceries… but not enough for everything you need to support a family, and your mother dying of white plague. That’s what Mom had; none of the girls can say it, it’s too terrifying, it’s too… close. So many of their friends, so many of the people they knew… so many of my friends, too… The White Plague took them all.

It took Mom.

A crafter works on commission; Clowns get salaries. Fools, who have cultivated talent for Bardic Performance and Mimicry, are employed by kings. Even interning for the local Lords and Ladies gained me enough resaleable swag that I could finance the majority of my mother’s medicine. Indeed, the only thing my paychecks couldn’t cover was the copay which went to the pharmacists-everything else, the insurance, the doctor visits, the prescriptions… all of that, I could cover. But I couldn’t actually pay for the medicine itself.

Not as a student Clown with a crafting hobby. I put down my thread and glue and pretty paints, and took up quill and brush and honeyed words, and it was only just enough to pay for Mother’s medicine. Not the rent; not my sister’s school supplies; not even food. Just medicine. On the one hand, I’m glad there are seven of them; since all of them worked, none of them starved.

On the other hand, it was my own inadequacy that resulted in my sisters being robbed of a childhood.

Anyway; all things considered, I think I did pretty well, following my sister’s instructions. It’s a nice dreamcatcher; dunno why she’s having me hang it on the ceiling of the men’s dorm, but I do know I’ve just fallen off the ladder. Didn’t break anything, thankfully, but there’s- huh. Well, none of the Mice are doctors, and Fern gets woozy at the sight of blood and internal bits, so.

We’ve got to get back to town now, for a number of reasons- on wolf back. I’ve never ridden wolf-back before; should be fun!

I return to the bench, and devour the roast beef sandwich Aster got for me. I drink my tea- some peach blend I don’t care for. I deposit the remains into the garbage can under the bench- Aster always forgets I don’t like raw onion.

...I don’t think Hearb Kurree or Dr. Vavoom have moved from their spots on the Witness Bench.
The way Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtraghi look, they certainly haven’t stopped staring at the Defendants.

Piety, Harmony, Dedication, Trustworthiness, Propriety, Sacrifice, Honor, and Shame- these are the tenets those who swear to protect and serve the Law are supposed to abide by. So far as this case is concerned, Lorenzo Bartok has managed to break every single one of them. Interestingly enough, every member of law enforcement- and every employee of Daiso, and every Doctor who trains in Ryugu Mergyo, which Dr. Vavoom did- has to swear to uphold those eight tenets I thought of. Piety, Harmony, Dedication, Trustworthiness, Propriety, Sacrifice, Honor, and Shame; these are the tenets of those who protect and serve.

clink! goes Judge Scratch’s habuki. What noise there was dies silently.

“Court Resumed. Have all Witnesses been called?” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” I said.

“Yes, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Then we shall proceed to the Calling of the Defendants. Prosecution; call your Defendant of Choice,” said Judge Scratch.
“Yes, Your Honor. Prosecution calls Janet Ashtraghi,” said Yiu.

In uniform, Janet Ashtraghi could be anyone. It completely covers her entire body, of course, but it’s opaque, too- and having a SH-SO as your partner in crime would cover a lot of sins… but she’s not in uniform. She’s wearing ordinary clothing- the police brought her in on an off shift. She must have grabbed a go-bag and changed into its contents, rather than laze around in her pajamas. I, personally, think she might have made a mix up in her laundry; she’s wearing a date-night outfit, not everyday clothing. Her skirt is has too much sheen; her cardigan is cashmere. The bow is offset just enough to bring attention to her tits.

Lorenzo Bartok, when he’s not staring straight ahead, is looking her up and down like she’s delectable. She’s returning the favor- so, to anyone with eyes, and the ability to see… it’s obvious, what they’ve been up to. And yet- and yet- when I look at the whole of the woman, her adoration of Lorenzo Bartok is… sickeningly obvious. Look at her parts…? Well.

“Guilty, Your Honor,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

clink! goes Judge Scratch’s habuki. The Court silences itself.

“Will you not even attempt to Defend yourself, girl?” said Judge Scratch.

“No, Your Honor. I’ve done Wrong; I will not deny it,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“...Very well, then. I have no other choice but to declare you Guilty. Do you understand what that means for you?” said Judge Scratch.

“yes, Your Honor. I do understand,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“...Bailey, have Miss Ashtraghi escorted to Holding while her sentence is processed,” said Judge Scratch.

Bailey bowed, and directed Bailiffs to execute Judge Scratch’s orders. Executioners Te Yari and Mankiri begin to step forwards to escort Miss Ashtraghi away- and right about then, I realize Lorenzo Bartok’s plan.

“OBJECTION!” I shouted, slamming both fists down onto the bench.

“...Don’t waste my time, DA Portgas,” sighed Judge Scratch.

“Your Honor; if either Defendant is taken to Holding, they cannot be compelled to give true testimony as to the other’s guilt. If Miss Ashtraghi is taken away, there will be no one to-” I
“No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! No! I did it! I did it! It was me! It was me!” screamed Janet Ashtraghi.

Thought so. I meet Judge Scratch’s terrifying eyes, and I wait. While Miss Ashtraghi has her screaming conniption, Judge Scratch raises an eyebrow to me, then inclines their head.

“Executioner Te Yari!” barked Judge Scratch. Their voice carried over Janet Ashtraghi’s screechings like seagull cries over waves on the shore.

“Sah!” saluted Te Yari.

“Separate the Defendants; I don’t want them seeing or hearing each other anymore. Make it so,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said Te Yari, before unfolding her massive wings and placing herself such that her own body blocked the sight lines between Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtraghi. Then, she unsheathed her spear and the sudden baffle between Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtraghi only serves to make her panicked wailings all the more visceral.

“Your Honor, if I may; I believe I have enough information now to reveal the Truth,” I said.

“Go for it, DA Portgas; maybe it’ll shut the Defendant up,” said Judge Scratch.

I nodded.

“Some will say the murders of Aloo and Apple Coffyn are the conclusion of events started when Osvaldo Bartok, age eight, observed his mother falling down the stairs after a vicious row with his father- see these Incident Reports, filed the day of Isadora Bartok’s death. Judge Bartok had Isadora Bartok’s death ruled accidental, though it was no such thing. Judge Lorenzo Bartok then invited Janet Ashtraghi to live with them; filling the void Isadora had left behind, as it were. Except Janet Ashtraghi is not Isadora Bartok, and never has been.

Presented to Court: Incident Reports

“In truth, the murders of the Coffyns are conclusions to events that happened four years before Isadora Bartok’s death. It was at this time that Lorenzo Bartok began his “gambling habit” again; when in reality, he was using his known gambling addiction as a cover for his incestuous affair with Janet Ashtraghi. Isadora Bartok discovered his lie, discovered her sister’s lie, and took them both to
And both Lorenzo Bartok and Janet Ashtraghi had a hand in Isadora Bartok’s death. Lorenzo Bartok pushed her down the stairs, it’s true- but it’s Janet Ashtraghi that ensured the coroner would pronounce the death accidental. What neither had taken into account was that Osvaldo would be witness to it all; and so, a second lie was schemed, to cover their sin.

“Janet Ashtraghi, being learned in the magic arts, decided to hide Osvaldo’s mother’s soul stone in the boy himself. Such a traumatic event would certainly lock, or erase, the memory of another; and putting the soul stone of another into one who is not prepared for the intrusion usually results in the death of both,” I said.

“SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP-” screamed Janet Ashtraghi.

“Fortunately for Osvaldo- unfortunately for Janet- the familial resonance was not taken into account. When Janet took Isadora’s soul stone, cut open her nephew, and shoved her sister- his mother- deep inside… they became overlaid, bound, reflected. From that moment onwards, everyone who saw Osvaldo would be able to say that they had seen his mother; because, of course, they had,” I said.

“SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP-!” screamed Janet Ashtraghi.

“No one would have ever known, were it not for the others not taken into account: Hearb Kurree, a Daiso-franchise owner and failed Soul Cutter, possessed of a good and honest heart. Upon meeting Osvaldo before and after the Procedure his aunt put him through, Mister Kurree was immediately aware of a difference- a wrongness in a child he had seen grow up. Diego “King” Dice, Casino GM, isn’t a cold-hearted bastard; he’s practical, above all else. It isn’t practical, selling your family into sexual slavery- you become known as the kind of person who does that to their family, you see, and it becomes very hard to trade favors for favors with the savory sort. Doctor Vavoom, current Coroner for the Chihiro Town OL, is not stupid, absorbed in her work, and does not consider doing her job worthy of bribery. Aster Mistburrow and Gunther Stonedge are accomplished Spirit Channelers, intimately familiar with all manner of soul and soul ailment. Prosecutor Yiu is angered beyond propriety and form when Evil is not properly punished, and will do something about it, gods dammit. And I, DA Portgas, am richer than you will ever dream of being. I’m so wealthy, I can order an entire Automatic corpse, fresh-made and no soul-stone present, in a matter of hours- and it will be done, and delivered, with a complimentary gift free of charge, because I’m richer than you will ever dream of being,” I said.

Janet Ashtraghi heaved and panted as I stared her down.

“Miss Ashtraghi, what’s the code to the safe in Lorenzo Bartok’s office?” I said.

“…I… I don’t know…?” gasped Janet Ashtraghi, confused. She glanced to Lorenzo Bartok, but only saw Executioner Te Yari.

“Miss Ashtraghi, what’s the override access code to every safe in the Chihiro Sento Hotel?” I said.

“Eh- one, eight, eight, eight, eight, three, four four four, three, one- and then you need the key,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“HOLD IT! Miss Ashtraghi, is this the key of which you speak?” said Yiu.
“Ah- y-yes, that’s it, um- wh-where, uh, where did you get that…?” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“Be it known to the Court that this key was used to open the safe in the Coffyn’s room,” said Yiu.

“Miss Ashtraghi, how do you make shortcrust pastry suitable for a pie or tart?” I said.

“...I don’t know,” wheezed Janet Ashtraghi, confused. Her rolling, darting eyes settled onto mine, flicking back from Yiu.

“Miss Ashtraghi, how do you crystalize potassium cyanide?” said Yiu.

“You dissolve hydrogen cyanide and potassium hydroxide in ethanol- erm, potassium ferrocyanide (free from potassium sulfate) is gently heated with stirring, until the crystallization water is completely expelled. 80 g of obtained anhydrous potassium ferrocyanide are triturated and mixed with 30 g of perfectly dry and powdered potassium carbonate. The mixture is fused in a covered iron crucible, until the mass appears clear and is in a faint glow. The reaction is complete when a sample from crucible, taken out with a heated glass or iron rod, looks perfectly white. The crucible is removed from a muffle oven and cooled a little until the evolution of gas has ceased. The fused potassium cyanide is poured into a preheated, crucible-shaped vessel made of iron or silver, with proper care, to prevent the running-out of any particles of iron which have separated in the process of fusion and have subsided to the bottom of the crucible. The mass is slowly cooled to room temperature and transferred to well-stoppered bottle. The potassium cyanide so prepared is pure for most purposes, although it contains potassium carbonate and potassium cyanate, which in the solution in transforms into ammonium carbonate and potassium carbonate,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“Miss Ashtraghi, what tea do you pair with apples?” I said.

“...I don’t know,” said Janet Ashtraghi, shaking her head, “I never knew. I- I never needed to know.”

I nodded.

“Let it be known to the Court: Aloo and Apple Coffyn were killed with Cyanide in the pastry portion of their Apple Tarts. Potassium Cyanide is visually identical to table sugar in every way in the macro; when used as a decorative element in a pastry, there is no discernable difference to normal senses. Neither Coffyn was a Chef of any star accreditation; they didn’t have a chance,” I said.

“Miss Ashtraghi, how much money does Lorenzo Bartok owe to the THS Casino?” said Yiu.

“One million five hundred thousand beri,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“Miss Ashtraghi, how do you make Apple Tarts?” I said.

“Stir together flour and salt; add butter, an egg yolk, and water. Stir to crumbs, and add water if they do not hold together when pressed. Form a ball of the dough, and set it to chill. Cream butter and sugar together until fluffy, add egg and egg yolk with discernment. Stir in apple brandy; mix flour with ground almonds and mix with batter. Roll dough out, fold into quarters, center in tart pan, unfold dough, press into bottom and up the sides. Dock, and flute the edges; return pastry to chill until firm. Heat the oven to medium temperature, hot but not painful; place a baking sheet inside the oven while it heats. Spoon fragipane into the chilled pastry and spread evenly; arrange apple slices into a spiral, overlapping each slice; from outside, in. Put the tart on top of the baking sheet in the oven; bake for fifteen minutes, or until browned. Reduce the oven heat to warm, and bake for ten more minutes. Sprinkle sugar over the top of the tart; continue baking in warm oven until sugar melts brown. Cool the tart on a wire rack; when well cooled, brush on apricot or peach jelly of good fluidity for an appealing shine,” said Janet Ashtraghi.

“Miss Ashtraghi, how did Lorenzo Bartok get the baby out of Apple Coffyn?” said Yiu.

“He didn’t. I- why can’t I stop myself talking? I- I- the baby moved on it’s own, it slid out of her dead flesh, and- I- he told me to handle it, s-so I took the baby and, and the placenta fell into the- the empty safe it fell in and- bad luck! I, I, I couldn’t- he would have been so angry. He would have been so angry,” said Janet Ashtraghi, tears rolling down her face and eyes dilated, black and huge and shining in the light.

“Miss Ashtraghi; was he angry before?” I said.

“...yes...” said Janet Ashtraghi, before coughing unrelentingly and- a gout of blood- from her mouth-

Fuck!

“-pa-ct-” gagged Janet Ashtraghi before choking and puking up more blood-

Bailiffs rush forwards, but it’s too late.

Janet Ashtraghi had enough Automata in her that breaking her Pact killed her. The scent of cola fills the air as the Balibabies wash away the blood; the body got carried out fast enough there’s no shit or piss on the stand. A bucket of water washes away the cola; and a mop takes care of the last of it.

Nothing left but the horrified Court and a grimly vindicated Prosecution.

I blink carefully, unwilling to let my teary eyes muss the makeup on my face. At this point, we have enough to disbar Lorenzo Bartok forever; but we do not have him dead to rights. For a case like this, we want him dead to rights.

Luckily, there is no Statute of Limitations on Murder. Theft, yes- murder? No.

So.
“DA Portgas. Call your Defendant,” growled Judge Scratch.

“Actually, Your Honor; there is one more Witness that can be called. I had hoped that we would not need to go to such lengths, but with the other Defendant now...” I said.

“Deceased, if I know my Oathbroken correctly,” sighed Judge Scratch, “And you’re sure this Witness has decisive and unassailable evidence to the Defendant’s Guilt or Innocence?”

“Your Honor, this Witness observed a convictable crime directly; we would be remiss not to hear what they have to say,” I said.

“You are aware that if I find their testimony anything less than correct, the current case against Lorenzo Bartok will be dismissed on grounds of insufficient evidence?” said Judge Scratch.

“I am, Your Honor,” I said.

“...Very well. I will allow it; call your Witness, Defense,” said Judge Scratch.

And finally, somehow, of all the things that could have done it; that little thing, that hint of a person Lorenzo Bartok missed... that drives Lorenzo Bartok over the edge. He can’t stop himself from speaking.

“Words on a paper don’t mean a damn thing; and Laws mean even less. No one will care for a stupid thing like this. No one will come. Shut up; your words offend me,” said Lorenzo Bartok.

“Sir! The Law has meaning, Sir. People will care for even the slightest drip of change that the Law promises. And Sir, someone will come,” said Yiu.

“The Law has meaning, Sir, beyond this petty realm of mortal harms and emotional hurts. It is more than mere words on a page. The people will care for it, for reasons even they don’t understand. They’ll come up in ones and twos, sobbing with their children in local libraries and screaming in the cells, begging for something they can’t name. They arrive at your door, your desk, your side, cynical and jaded and full of hope, innocent as children, soft as rain- longing for you to make things right again.

“I believe you; I believe you still, and I will always fight for you ’, you’ll say to them. ‘It’s only two thousand beri per case.’ They give you the money without even thinking about it- because you’ve promised them that you would make things right again . For it is money they have, and peace they lack. And they will pay you, sir, they will pay you to have the faith they cannot bear to consider holding in their hearts again,” I said.

“Just shut up,” said Mister Bartok.

“And they have faith in you , Sir, every moment; every breath of you is suffused with unwavering faith- the belief that you, weak, fallible, mortal you, can somehow find the Truth of these matters, can somehow pour untroubled oil on violent waters hungry for their blood. They follow you into the Court, and sit or stand or rest, waiting in their chains, for you to free them- in warm summer rain, through the howling winds of autumn, on a perfect spring afternoon or a dreary winter’s day. They find their reserved seats, where once their heroes and gods sat as they were cheered on by the child that has grown and taken their place. And they will listen to you defend them, with everything you have, and several things you don’t, and it is as if they’d been lit within with sacred fires. The smoke of lies burning away, the stench of truth in the air— the very memories themselves, so thin as to be like gossamer of spiders, why, so thick in the air these things will be, they’ll have to wash their very souls out to be clean again,” I said.

“You can’t prove a gods damned thing, so just- shut up,” said Mister Bartok.

“People will care, Sir; and someone is coming,” said Yiu.

“Y-you’ll never be able to prove that I did a-anything wrong, and- and no fancy trick you use, no twist or truth will ever make me admit to doing something wrong! I’ve done nothing wrong at all! NO ONE IS COMING!” shrieked Mister Bartok.

“The one constant through all the years, all the ages, Sir, has been the Law. The World grew and shrunk, heaved and tossed like a child gripped in nightmares; it has spun on like a pinwheel, has toiled on like an anthill, has rolled like barrels onto a barge. It’s been cleaned like a slate, rebuilt, torn down, rewritten, and erased again. But the Law, Sir! The Law has marked the time!

“This Court, my job— even your own denial of fault, your lies, your misdirections and cruelties— it’s all a story that’s been told and told again, all throughout the Ages, Sir. It’s been passed from generation to generation, tearing and tattering and being renewed with each and every telling; it serves to remind us of all that is Good in the Law, and could be so again,” I said.

“Oh, people will care, Sir. For even a second of change, people will most definitely care; and someone isn’t coming. Someone is already here,” said Yiu.

“DA Portgas,” said Judge Scratch.

“Your Honor,” I said.

“Finish him,” said Judge Scratch.

“Yes, Your Honor,” I said, “Defense calls Isadora Bartok!” I said.

I never have liked calling up Ghosts to the stand— legally, that’s what someone is when they’ve been murdered but not killed, they’re a Ghost. Mab Boudicca Morgan, my once older sister, is a Ghost; she died. But she was not killed.

Isadora Bartok died; but she was not killed.

Aster walks up to the Witness stand and opens a large bag we placed under it long before the start of the day’s Court session. From the bag comes a sealed jar, and Aster opens that jar— then, he returns to my side. The contents of the jar writhe and seethe, and then the jar itself begins to dissolve— it wasn’t really a jar, more like a membrane— and a thick, viscous puddle of effluvient slime wobbles behind the stand. It is red, thrombus, like raspberry jam in a blob on a white stone floor.

First, a pair of hands, followed by an arm— women’s hands, a woman’s arm, splattering into the ground with a wet, sickly flap; then, the other, and a short jolt, like when you sit up out of shallow water just enough to breathe in new air. The mass jolts and shudders as the woman pulls herself up, together, out-
Through the slime, a skull: the long snake black ripple of a spine; here, the curve of a breast; there, the curve of a jaw. The liquidinous slithering of hair slapping against skin, the dripping ooze as flesh folds over itself, slime dripping off fingertips clear as saliva, writhing like tongues- a sharp gasp of pain, and she hunches over on herself, paling from the enraged red to an ashen blue. She grits her teeth, and snarls, and clutches her head, and then she gathers herself and rises again. Hips emerge, and thighs, the long leg bones and the narrow ankles- each and every toe accounted for, perfect in shape and size. Her flesh wavers on her bones; she’s neither here, nor there.

There stands a woman, tall and skeletal and nude; her long black hair is dishevelled, and her one visible eye crackles with rage.

Her name is Isadora Bartok.

She has a story to tell; but we don’t need to hear it, right now.

“Witness, state your name and relation to the Defendant,” said Judge Scratch.

“My name is Isadora Ashtraghi Bartok. I was the murdered wife of Lorenzo Bartok; he made sure of that,” said Isadora Bartok.

“I see. Do you mean he had you murdered…?” said Judge Scratch.

“No. I mean he killed me himself, when he threw me down the stairs and broke my neck at the bottom when I was only concussed,” said Isadora Bartok.

“Ah. Unless the Prosecution or Defense has any further questions, I am prepared to make my Judgement,” said Judge Scratch.

“No, Your Honor,” said Yiu.

“Just one, Your Honor,” I said.

“Go on, then,” sighed Judge Scratch.

“Madame… what do you intend to do after this Trial?” I said.

“...I have every intention of joining the Monastery of the Sacred Chalice. I am not well, DA Portgas; I can barely hold myself together. I know I have a responsibility, to my beloved son- but part of loving someone is doing what is right for them, no matter your feelings about doing so. If the care of my son was given to me, I am sure that he would suffer for it; as would I. ...Captain Luffy,” said Isadora Bartok, turning and leveling her terrible gaze on the rubbery man in question.

“Yeah?” said Captain Luffy.

“Please take care of my son, while he is in your care,” said Isadora Bartok.

“Of course!” said Captain Luffy.

And then, Isadora Bartok did something I didn’t expect; she smiled. For a moment, just a moment, I can see the beauty Isadora Bartok was once famed for- and she was famed for it. No one has been so crass as to say it aloud, but… Isadora was the prettiest of the three sisters, no doubt about it.
Isadora finally turns and faces her son. She tilts her head to the side, and then seems to realize something- then nods decisively to herself. She stands fully upright, and stretches out her hand- and from the angle, I’d say she’s covering his heart with her hand. She presses a lance of Haki through the air, and threads it more delicately than thread of gold through a bone needle, and she grips- something- and she pulls. She pulls and she pulls, and- from the tips of his fingers, the tips of his horns, his very demon-ness begins to recede. An orb of ectoplasm begins to bubble out of his mouth, thick and smoky with touches of red and vermillion.

His skin pales; his hair changes texture, from the sleek brown-black of his father to a more dishevelled, purple affair, much more like his mother’s. The bones of his face shift; his shoulders broaden, his hair gets longer and longer. His claws vanish, replaced by simple fingers, delicately arched and articulated. Thick blue-black lines begin to crawl over his skin, like drawings… tattoos of simple black ink, and as I watch, astonished, they shift and crawl under his skin. Finally, all that’s left of what was before is the color of his eyes, as golden as before- but maybe a more rosy tone, instead of the hard brass they were.

The orb of ectoplasm shrinks and firms, shifting over itself like a particularly enraged ball of twine. A crook of the fingers draws the ugly orb through the air, down into Isadora’s hand. She regards it with disdain, resignation… and then she looks at her son, and I am struck nearly blind by the pure love on her face.

And then Isadora Bartok swallows the orb, and her body writhes. Clothing unfurls- a kimono that went through a shredder or a particularly hungry cloud of moths. What it is now…? Hardly anything, just moth-eaten fabric and colors worn away by time. But once… once, it really was quite something.

Somehow, her hair is even more dishevelled, and the back of her kimono drops nearly to the crack of her ass. Two massive wings, like crumpled umbrellas, are folded against the pale curve of her spine; and her obi is tied in front. Ah.

Yep. Isadora Ashtraghi was the prettiest of her sisters; and her son, Osvaldo?

That man is the prettiest I’ve seen in a good long while.

“Well now! Pretty as pictures, and twice as real. Witness, have you anything else to say?” said Judge Scratch.

“No, Your Honor; I’m quite finished with this. Should you have need of me again, I shall be at the Monastery of the Sacred Chalice,” said Isadora Ashtraghi Bartok, accept no substitutes.

“Certainly. Bailiff; please escort Madame Ashtraghi to the Monastery of her choice. Please ensure that no harm comes to her or others on her journey,” said Judge Scratch.

“Sah!” said the Bailiff.

“Finally, we have our decisive Evidence. While unnecessary in most cases, in a case like this, where the Defendant is so highly connected with the Court, the evidence supporting a verdict must be inviolate and substantial. De minimis non curat lex; Orbis mutat Lex mutat Orbis,” said Judge Scratch.

Lorenzo Bartok looks like a withered husk of a man; fear and rage have made a crumpled ruin of his sinisterly handsome face.

“Mince Coffyn is hereby awarded custody of his sister, Banoffee Buko Canelé Coffyn, as well as those properties, holdings, and assets that remained in his parent’s care at the time of their deaths. Bailiffs will coordinate with those Crewmembers in charge of the Coffyns to the fair distribution, investment, sale, or storage of aforementioned goods. Nurse Mendy May’s contract with the Coffyns is hereby rendered Null and Void due to their registry on the same Crew; Breach payments will be handled by the Court. Osvaldo Bartok is hereby absolved of all responsibility, fiscal and otherwise, to both Lorenzo Bartok and Isadora Ashtraghi Bartok,” said Judge Scratch.

Tying up loose ends; I can see Mab leaning past Zoro to speak quietly to Nami.

“And finally, my Judgement. Lorenzo Bartok is hereby found Guilty of Murder; Apple and Aloo Coffyn may yet live, were not for him. Isadora Bartok may yet have her own body, were it not for him. I sentence him… hm. Here, then, a choice: He may take his chances with the Trail of Wolves; or he may be remanded to the care of the Teahouse Social Club Casino, where they will extract equal recompense for the debts he has accrued,” said Judge Scratch.

Oouf! Death or a Hard Place… The Trail of Wolves leads to the Sea of Monsters, and is full of deadly dangers- and the currents are such that if you go, you won’t come back. And if he goes for the TSC option, he’ll become a prostitute for the rest of his natural life- it’s the only way I can think of that he’d manage to make back enough money.

“...Wolves, Your Honor,” rasped Mister Lorenzo Bartok.

“Done! ” chirruped Judge Scratch, “ Executioner Sodegarami! Take a squad and escort Mister Bartok to the appropriate area, then send him on his way. Do ensure that there will be no Retrial,” said Judge Scratch.

“Of course, Your Honor,” said Executioner Sodegarami, bowing gracefully.

Yeah, if he’s not dead or dying as soon as he gets to the gate of the Trail of Wolves, I’ll be very surprised.

“Court Adjourned, then,” said Judge Scratch, before fully sheathing their sword.
And that- anticlimactic or not, fun or not, was that.

CASE CLOSED; GUILTY VERDICT

February 6th

Chihiro Sento; First Wing, First Floor, Room 88

Honestly, a shower and a change of clothes can be more refreshing than a trip to a water park on a hot summer’s day. Brush my hair out, put it in a looser style; my hair bells convert back to the bell earrings I usually wear.

I wrote up my notes into a more formal style, and put them in with the Casefile; Sage and Ren are handling it, while Aster and Gunther check over Osvaldo Bartok and Isadora Ashtraghi for any lingering after effects of their forced combination. But me? My presence is neither wanted nor required for the rest of the day- so, I’m taking Sue on that date.

Start with the start; matched set underwear and white fleece leggings, because it’s cold outside. A front moved in during the afternoon, and although it isn’t snowing, it’s certainly much colder. Then, that dress Ren packed for me- white, with floral designs picked out in multiple colors of thread, ombre in density if not necessarily actual color. It’s really very beautiful; I’m glad to have it.

The base of my outfit is basically done- just have to add the socks … and then my scarf, soft yellow and nearly see-through, but warmer than anything. Wrap that over my shoulders, and loop twice around my neck; pin it with my sword and shield scarf pin. I’ll make a note to send Mab hers too, before I forget yet again…

First layer, a jumper; thick wool in cable knit, heavy weight, heavy wear. The hem drops down to just about the middle of my thigh, and the sleeves go past my fingers. A hat for my head; a coat for my back, but I’ll wait to actually put it on; and of course, the best, ugliest, most aggressive boots I have, because it’s much too cold for trainers and I need the grip. Black ice is evil!

That was a hell of a day. I’m glad we didn’t have to dredge up that information about Osvaldo Bartok to get a guilty verdict; some things are meant to stay secret.

Check the purse - wallet, keys, phone, ID, makeup bag, instaprint camera- huh, forgot to take that out since the Beach Date… A white cat purse with a golden crescent between it’s ears. I dunno, they came as a black and white set, and I gave the black one to Sue, and… I dunno, it’s sentimental. -As for my makeup look, a simple vampy black line on my eyes and some lip gloss; a touch of highlighter over my cheekbones, and that’s it.

Oh! Someone’s at the door…?
It’s not Aster, he’s been gone all afternoon- I check through the viewport-hole, and it’s Sue!

I open the door to let her in, and almost fall over with the hot armful of sexually frustrated girlfriend. I kick the door shut behind her, and stagger backwards to the bed.

“Mmmph!” I hummed into her mouth.

“Mhmhm,” hummed Sue.

I gasped as we broke apart, and stared at her. Black fleece-lined tights, a black dress with flowers splattered on like drops of paint; a pink tunic sweater that flops onto the floor, followed by my own sweater, my scarf and pin, my hat. My coat flops onto the ground, followed by hers, a red-velvet frock coat - nngah- with, hah, with black cord details and black lace c-cuffs, nnnghaah- her dress comes off, my dress comes off, my back flwumps into the pillows, a-and-

Wait, we’re still wearing our tights and socks- hers are red - and underwear, wh-what-“I thought about it, and I realized… you don’t like getting stuff on your hands. I also realized that I don’t mind that at all- but, um… Could we… If I got you off like this-” Sue said, pinning my throbbing plush muff with her own, then rolling her hips just so- aaah!

“If we do it like that, would that be okay?” said Sue.

I gasped and squirmed underneath her, and then I hooked a leg over hers and rolled.

“Only if you don’t mind a little… competition,” I said, grinding myself against her and watching her eyes cross.

When Sue could think again, I was met with a sharp grin and a wild light in her glitter-covered eyes- oh wow, she got that eye-glitter that you use instead of mascara or eyeliner- mmmph!

♥

♥♥

♥♥♥

♥♥♥♥

When I woke up, it was to the sight of Sue Yiu, resting and sweet in slumber at my side.

Last night… Last night, we didn’t go Ice Skating, and we didn’t get ramen, and uh, Aster had to stay with Gunther for the night. I realized I don’t like putting my mouth directly onto genitals- but, wouldn’t you know it, Sue was wearing nearly see-through underwear. And there’s the bra, hanging off the lampshade...

To hell with it, I’ll order room service and mail Mab her gifts. Sue’s awake again, and I’ve got enough money to just rent the room for as long as we want; we’re both due a damn vacation...
What's Left Undone

“Sancho, there’s an arrow in your ass,”

“Well, I’ll be motherfucked- so there is. I’d have never guessed that without you, Cece,” “Sanchoooo-”

“AH! DOCTOR DOCTOR, YOU NEED A DOCTOR-”

“DOCTOR CHOPPER IS A DOCTOR-!”

“AH! Right! Sorry; Nurse G, prep the patient for surgery; Nurse Taffy, prepare anesthetic-”

“Yiss!”

“This panic thing of yours really needs to change, Doctor...”

It warms the cockles of my heart to hear my crewmates being themselves again. This Trial really took a lot out of us all.

Now then. I need to have a word with Nami.

“Nami; we’ve got new crewmates, and we’ve got some things we need to handle for said crewmates. Think we can swing another few days here to settle everything?”

“Hm. Well, it’s still another five days to set the Log Pose according to Taffy, and we did budget for much higher fees for the holiday; if you want, we can stay another week.”

“Cool. In that case, I’m getting everyone all access passes to the resort; we might as well have an actual vacation, if possible. It’s also probably a good idea to make sure we’re actually stocked and in good repair,”

“Sounds good to me. Talk to the kids, you’ve got a certain rapport with them; I’ll handle Zoro, Luffy, and Sanji,”

“...So, everyone else you’re leaving to me, then?”

“Mm.”

“Okay, well, just making sure,”

I roll my neck, and pick my first target- Nurse Mendy May, currently breastfeeding BBCC and drinking a big bottle of fortified water. I think it has electrolytes and vitamins and minerals in it? Anyway- her first. I know a babysitter when I see one.
“Hello, Nurse Mendy,”

“Hmm? Oh, Missus Mab- nice to meet you? Er, I’d shake your hand, but—”

“No, no, don’t get up. I’ve had a talk with Nami, our Treasurer, and we came to the decision that, since it’s going to be just a bit longer before we can actually leave, we might as well enjoy an actual vacation and take some time to get things on the ship prepared for our new crewmates. Any requests, or thoughts about what to do on this resort?”

“Hmm. I, personally, would like a chaise or a daybed, and somewhere I can work on my technomancy. D’you have a forge?”

“We do; Franky overbuilt it, so I’m fairly certain there’s room for a workbench with your nameplate on it. As for the beds, we can certainly work something out, though… mostly, we sleep in hammock-bunk type beds, to accommodate the roll of the ship, ”

“Ah! Right, I had forgotten- um, then I suppose I really just want a dedicated changing area, and other baby supplies,”

“Nami, if you couldn’t tell, is expecting; we’ve actually got a bit of everything you could possibly need, excepting a crib,”

“Right- bad luck to fill a house with baby things and risk there being no baby,”

“Exactly.”

“Well, that’s me sorted; as for the resort… I suppose you’ll want me to keep an eye on the Littles, since I’m already engaged in the care of BBC here?”

“Well. Yes,”

“Hm. Sure; I’ll be a responsible adult,”

“Thank you; next up… Mince and Oz. Those two will need some minding, and no mistake...”

“Hm. Make sure to break up their sadness with wonderments, Missus Mab. No one can be sad all the time, it’s too hard,”

“I quite agree. Time to burp her?”

“And change; one in, one out, y’know,”

And I leave Nurse Mendy to it. We’re in a three family suite, more like a large house on one whole side of the hotel’s upper floor. It’s a beautiful room, all done in gold and soft surfaces. We’ve spread out over it like a particularly piratical swarm of locusts.

Nami, supported by a Zoro doing his very best to hover without seeming like he’s hovering (and failing miserably, the man worries like he practices his swordsmanship- with religious zeal and fanaticism), is expla-telling Captain, and Sanji, how things are going to have to go for the next few days. Franky and Robin are listening in- well, Robin’s listening while pretending to read a book, and Franky is going over specs and tolerances with Jellybean, who looks more like a particularly energized and excited slime person than the slightly squidgy robogirl I’ve come to… well, I won’t lie and say I know her very well, but she gets along with Bryony and Brook quite well.

Speaking of, they’re currently engaging Oz in conversation about music; coaxing him out of his trauma-shell, and also giving him something, anything, to hold on to. Mince, on the other hand, is sitting like an odd goose out while the Girls- minus Sancho, Genny, and Cece- play a pickup game of Grease. Gurry, Mark, and Usopp are asleep; and Buttercream is sleep-guarding Nurse Mendy and BBC.

Mince it is.

“Hey,”

“-oh, um. Hi.”

“How are you doing?”

“...I’ve been better. Um, mostly I’ve been going through my, um, my pictos and putting them in the albums I bought that day… I, uh, I’ve been labeling the new ones, and, I...”

I reach out, and put my hand on top of his. He pauses, and I see his face crumple; ah. I tug him up, into my lap, and he curls up on my chest, burying his face in my neck. I hold him close, and cuddle him through the tears and snot.

At some point between the shivers and the wheezing sobs, the Girls not engaged in Sancho-surgery have migrated to our couch, their game of Grease abandoned on the coffee table. There’s a moment of careful consideration, and then I- and the very upset boy in my arms- are gently draped in purring humans, each one finding some new niche to snuggle themselves into.

I… Oh no, Oz looks so left out- c’mere baby boy, c’mere- and now I’ve got him snuggled on the other half of my chest. The drapery of purring Girls purrs harder.

I’ve never been so sympathetically sad, yet so unrelentingly happy, in my entire life. I think I’m… emoting. With my face.

“-would you just- Look! Look at Mab!”

“Hnnngk!”

“Mab, look this way for a… second...”

I look over at Nami, Zoro, Luffy, and Sanji. Sanji is blushing, stricken, grinning and teary eyed. Happy-sad. I want to have kids; I don’t ever want to leave my kids feeling like this. But.. I will.

Zoro is making a high-pitched whining noise, akin to a small cat begging for a piece of chicken. Nami is also blushing, but also starting to cry.
Luffy looks like he just swallowed an entire bag of lemons and the sour is kicking in unmercifully. Gnnghk.

“Okay, Nami; we’ll stay a little longer. Just… can you make Mab stop doing that? I’m gonna cry,”

“S-sorry, Captain; that’s out of my h-hands,“

Franky, who has just caught sight of the cuddle pile on the couch, is now freely weeping into Robin’s shoulder. She’s gently patting him in the face- oh, huh, she was actually reading her book. There’s a general scurrying over my booted feet, and then the Mice- Darla, Maya, Hildy, Jellybean, Quilaby, and Arlinda Rader Haai- are curled up together in the valley of my tits.

If I get any happier, or warmer, I’m going to pass out.

And then Nurse Mendy prods a few of the Girls out of the way to lean against my side with the sleeping BBC, and everything goes a bit heat-hazy after that.

My wife is so goddamn cute. Like- of course, she’s gorgeous, the shape of her eyes, the curve of her mouth- but. Fuck.

Under a pile of kids, she’s fucking beyond gorgeous, she’s… approaching divinity. This is what the Goddess really looks like, in the eyes of man; snot covered, slightly sticky, and flushed with the heat of too many children pressed against her.

If we weren’t already married, I’d marry her again.

-and she’s passed out. I got an echo of her emotions, just before the blackout; too much at once, I think.

Merde!

Mab’s out cold, so I have to do what she would have done… which is compile the list of things to do to settle the estates of the Little Coffyns, and see to Oz. For the Coffyns, it should be fairly simple; I’m quite sure the Bailiffs didn’t let Nurse Mendy out the door without everything she’d need for BBC, but for Mince… we’ll have to go through his parent’s offices and paperwork to find his information.

Chopper will need their doctor’s records; Mab will want the boys’ scholastic records…

Pen with ink in it; bottle of ink I like because it has a dropper and a little well in the top for excess ink; a cheap notebook from the Daiso; let’s do this.

Zut! First things first, I do actually know how to settle an estate. I had to have learned something before the age of nine, after all… Anyway, settling an estate really has three distinct parts to it.

First, the initial tasks; then the specialized ones; then the cutting of loose ends. The Crew as a whole has been named the Executors of both the Coffyn and Bartok estates, which means I’ll delegate parts of each thing that needs doing to the most responsible adults in this crew: Nami, Zoro, me, Mab, Robin, Franky, Brook, Usopp, and surprisingly, Luffy- but he’s not to be given paperwork, he’s best with people. I’m intentionally leaving the Juniors out because we’ll need them to keep eyes on the actual children, but if we have need of them...

BBC’s the only one who really needed specialized care, which is why we have Nurse Mendy; we need to check for pets, gardens, adult dependants, and employees. We need certified copies of all Death Certificates (as well as the Birth Certificates, mem: Nurse Mendy has BBC, does she have MC or OB?)

We will need to look for a Will or Trust for all the deceased- if there’s a Will, Robin; if there’s a Trust, Nami. We need to collect the mail, which protects their privacy; it also provides clues to property and creditors. We’re going to need their banking information, so that we can pay off their bills without in any way assuming responsibility for their debts- Mab and Nami, I think; we need to secure or sell the residence, vehicles, and all tangible property- things like furniture, antiques, artwork, clothing, jewelry, and personal documents. I don’t know who all has keys to the houses, so we’ll need to change the locks; I don’t know if we’ll be able to secure the residences, so we might have to pack everything up and move it. Shit, I don’t even know if they have horses- but, considering how different Mince and Oz’s accents are, I’ll bet at least one of them does, or possibly did...

We need to notify Credit Card companies and Credit Reporting agencies of the deaths, to protect against fraud; Mab has the best Courtly Writing, better than mine, so she’ll be the one sending letters to Equitax, Excelsian, and Transferush, letting them know that the Coffyns and the Bartok's have died and instructing them in the particulars- no one is allowed use of their names or bank security numbers to apply for new credit.

We need to notify the employers of the Coffyns and the Bartok's; arrange for delivery of the final paychecks, and deposit the income checks into a bank account held in the name of the person’s living trust. Mem: ask the employer to identify the benefits provided by the employer to the person, such as health insurance coverage, life insurance, and retirement plans; free money; Nami.

We need to notify the Bank Security; if any of them were receiving BS checks, we need to notify the Bank Security Administration immediately- let me just start that now, Mab or I will finish it. If any of them were Veterans of War, we need to notify their Regiments- I’ll start that one too.

All of this together is mostly paperwork, and will have to be taken care of in the time we have left; we’ll fill everything out as best we can, and then have everything filed, moved, and so on. Looking over what needs to be done… Chopper, Nurse Mendy, and… Robin, I think, will coordinate getting the various records together- medical, birth, death, and otherwise.

Robin and Nami will be in charge of any Wills or Trusts we find.

Nami, Zoro, Mab, and Franky will be handling banking information, securing the residences, vehicles, and all tangible property of the deceased. Franky and (if he’ll allow it) Fern will change all the locks; Mab and (if she’ll allow it) Beatrix will secure the residences, or pack them up for storage. Usopp will have to handle any pets or horses that turn up; and if necessary, Mark will handle farm animals, and gardens.

I will write the necessary letters to Equitax, Excelsian, and Transferush; as well as the employers of the Coffyns and Bartoks, if any, with Mab rewriting them in Fancy Letters. If any benefits provided are to be awarded, Mab can route them to the appropriate bank account, I know she has one meant just for the crew… Nami will want to set something up so that the bank sends us regular statements, meaning… we’re going to need a dedicated Postal Officer. And a Banker.

Damn.

And Captain’s going to want them to come with us… well, the Banker can do their work anywhere there’s a secure snailphone, so that’s no problem, but the Postal Officer… that, I don’t know. The one who would know for sure is Mab, and she’s out cold.

Loose ends that need cutting: school and trades. So far as I’m aware, Mince Coffyn had no trademaster, and no school he was attending. I think his parents were grooming him to take over their position, but with them gone, well… I’ll test him out in my kitchen. He’s old enough to learn a trade, and cooking is one that’ll serve him well, if he does intend to go in his parent’s footsteps. Osvaldo Bartok was in school- however, I don’t know which one, nor under what name. We need to track down Hearb Kurree and find out, as well as visit the school for any of the things Oz left behind that he wants to keep… If it’s even so small as a notebook, he should have it. He deserves to have his own things.

For that matter, so does Nurse Mendy May. She has all the marks of an ascetic, but… I’m not sure what kind, nor why a nun would need to take a job. I’ll have Mab feel her out, she does shamelessly nosy far better than I ever have...

This list of notes and decisions is about all I can do for right now; Mab needs to wake up, and the-ah, the kids are asleep too. Well, it’s very nearly the end of a long day; tomorrow will be the first day we’ll be free to do as we please.

For now… I might as well work on one of the tests I need to give Deborah.

Being able to accurately identify and describe the various scents of something are paramount to being a chef, star accreditation or otherwise. Smell and taste are intricately intertwined; when one has a cold, the food tastes off. Smells can also tell you things about your food that taste alone cannot- the presence of certain things, like diseased fruits, dangerous chemicals, improper preparation… these things can be discerned by the properly prepared proboscis.

There are ten categories of scent, each with their own distinctive profiles. It is the job of a chef to know, and utilize, each scent as the product calls for.

Fragrant is florals, perfumes, and anything with a particularly powerful smell- jasmine, saffron, and so on. Fruity means all non-citrus fruits- apple, strawberry, melon, fig, and so on. Citrus means all citrus fruits- lemon, lime, orange, grapefruit, etc. Chemical means ammonia, bleach- anything with an over-the-counter, cleaning product scent profile. Sweet means chocolate, vanilla, caramel, sugar; it’s very easy to overdo, resulting in saccharine, which is no good. Minty is peppermint, spearmint, eucalyptus, and camphor- sharp, cold flavors that sting and tingle. Toasted is nutty, popcorn, peanut butter, almonds- it’s the smell of the fats after you clarify butter, although you usually don’t want to go so far as burnt (or properly speaking, pungent). Pungent is cheese, cigar smoke, char, anything burnt and edible. Finally, there’s Decayed- rotting meat, sour milk, kombucha and kimchi and shoyu before it’s ready. Some of the most delicious parts of food have to be really disgusting and inedible before they get cooked to be any good.

Ah! One other thing we need- All Access Passes to this resort! The resort was here before the city, and basically everything here can be charged to the resort if one has a pass- thus, every member of the crew should get one. Wait, does everyone even have proper bathing costumes? Franky doesn’t count, he’s always in high-cut bathing trunks… Mab almost certainly does, Nami does, Robin does, Bryony does, Taffy does, Mark does, Gurry does, but I don’t know about the rest…

I… hm. I might as well check with the Front Desk; just because two judges were brutally murdered, that doesn’t mean the World’s Worst Baker Contest has been actually called off, and the cut-off for tryouts isn’t until the weekend…

If it’s still on, I’ll enter Deborah for sure; and maybe Mince and Oz will want to try too? Mince is already entered, but there’s no penalty for backing out so long as you give notice, and Oz might like to do something to get his mind off things…

Alright, it’s been an hour and a half and we haven’t had dinner; naps are nice, but none of the Girls are chubby enough that I’ll accept them sleeping through dinner. Mab gets cranky if she goes off schedule; and BBC is starting to fuss because she needs to eat again.

I stand, crack my neck, and look over all the sleeping Kids, my wife, the Nurse, and the baby that’s getting more fussy and squirmy by the second- shit, she might be too warm too. I put my fingers to my lips and let loose the kind of whistle you’d expect from a kettle or a cab service, not a chef, but here we are.

Deb, bless her Shrimpy heart, bolts fully upright and at attention before my hand has dropped from my lips. Mince and Oz are quick to follow, with Oz blinking blearily and Mince’s hair sticking in every direction. Nurse Mendy is soon to follow, darting off to refill her water bottle and feed the baby again.

“Right. You three- in three days or so, if my calculations are correct, the World’s Worst Baker’s Contest will be held. I follow them with quite a bit of zeal; a double murder is not enough to get that contest cancelled. Mince- I know you’re already entered into the Contest. Do you still want to compete?”

“Ah… yes, sir, I would. I’ve taken the Champion Belt in Batters every year since I was six; I don’t want to give it up now,“

“Alright. Deb?”
“...My yeast-breads are things of horror, Chef. I think I could at least ribbon,”
“I quite agree. Oz?”
“...Um, do we have to serve what we make?”
“Nope,”
“I’m in; I can make a pie, probably without burning off my eyebrows again,” “Right- wait, again? Nevermind. I actually got triple copies of the intake forms for the Contest- in case you made any mistakes with pen and ink, fill them out with the pencil first, then use pen, yeesh-”
“Hmmph!”
“Shrimp, just because you can write neatly doesn’t mean you can spell,” “Hmmmmp!”
“...Actually, I might need the second one; Min-min’s got his done already, but I have terrible penmanship, so,’”
“Good. The forms are in the yellow folder on the desk; you three go on and fill them out. Tomorrow, we’ll get you started in the Tourney. -Mince, help them fill out their forms, would you?”
“Yes, Chef,”
“Good man, Cuttlefish. Keep Shrimp and Seaweed on the right track; I’ll check on all three of you after dinner. Maybe tomorrow morning, depending on how the night unfurls,” “Uh- sure, Chef,”

Finally. That’s the first time I’ve seen Oz actually smile; all his chroma turned into a brilliant sunburst pattern of scintillating sparks. I can see Mince looking confused, and Deb explaining my nickname for him while gesturing to his tendrils, and her own while wriggling a leg and flexing it between pink, yellow, red, and white; Oz soon joins them, and they all go over to the desk where I left the Contest forms.

Beatrix kicks herself off the couch, and lets out a particularly phlegmatic gargle of protest a full thirty seconds after she hits the ground. Beatrix, unlike Mab and myself and almost all of her other sisters, and even her brother, Sancho; is a heavy sleeper who does not wake immediately. She needs a bit of a run up to Unblink for the day; a long nap really doesn’t do her much good, but they were all just so tired… She’s sitting up now, eyes still firmly shut, but edging closer to full consciousness with every pernicious grumble.

Mab isn’t sitting up- mostly because there’s a small gang of Mice nested between her tits, and she doesn’t want to drop them. I grab one of the fancy fruit baskets- which we emptied of fruit days ago- and stick one of the velvety decorative cushions in it, and then a flannel hanky. Then, I carefully transfer each of the Mice into the squishy nest I’ve made for them, which allows my lovely wife to sit upright. Darla- or maybe Daryl, he hasn’t said yet- is a little clingy, but tucks in with the rest when Mab hands me a spindle from her pocket for him to grab onto.
Adelaide snuffles quietly, and then scrubs at her eyes while Cece unpeels herself from a leather pillow, leaving most of her Face behind. Sancho immediately jumps on an opportunity to tease his sister.

Ellie stretches her legs, and patterns and colors and shapes ripple and smear across the whole of her body, every part of exposed skin flashing. Then, she sits fully upright and sneezes, making the haystack she calls a hairstyle fluff out in every direction; a quick shake of the head has it settling down into… Oh! I think she needs a haircut - or at least some barrettes, or hairpins? Now there’s a thought, and I needed to pick up some things at the Daiso anyway, so- two birds, one stone…

Fern is brightening up, her painted eye mask beaming at everything and everyone as she glances around and grins. Genny, long finished with Sancho’s ass-arrow, wanders over to sit next to her sister. They immediately trade eyewear, and Fern bounces off to collect the deck of cards and consider the room-service menu.

I offer Mab a hand, and gently tug her up to her feet. She rises from the couch, tall and graceful and resplendent in her Courtly finery… although, I think… I swear I remember seeing a cold-weather version of what she’s wearing now…

“Hmm?”

“-Would you go to the Daiso with me? Ah, well, after a movie or something… Ice skating?”

“…Are you asking me on a date?”

“Yeah. We… we won’t really have time in the next few days, so. Carpe that jugulum,” “Hmhhmmhm. Sure- ah, I should put the warm-layers on, this is just for indoors-”

“I had wondered-”

“No, it’s just indoor gear. I’ll need ten minutes or so, and then we’ll go?”

“Sure,”

And I watch her walk away, because my gods that ass-

Gods my husband is such a pervert. I mean, I say that as a super pervert myself- my husband is a fucking pervert. It’s actually pretty damn great.

Clothing, Mab. Think of the clothing.

Lose cut white trews with a thick, wide waistband that actually rests well above my waist; the crotch is cut low to keep proportions correct. I tuck my pants into a pair of leather boots that have green designs tooled into them, to evoke feelings of joy and prosperity. I double check my makeup: soft dusky eyeshadow in a shade of purple just about the color of a ripe eggplant (a purple one, not a white one) for wealth, and dabs of gold in the usual places—along the crease of my eyelid, swooping victories under my eyes— for military prowess; delicate stain of bluish purple over my lips, for honor and sorrow. My nose is as long as ever, and my skin… maybe a quick swipe of sunscreen? Winter sun, while feeble, can still burn quite badly… I’ll put some on, and some moisturizer, too.

A tunic embroidered with my personal sygil, various protective symbols, and traceries of crystal beads in flower shapes and petals. It’s a bright white tunic that goes over the bikini-style top I’ve been wearing and rinsing every day. Thick black sari that I usually wear as a scarf, but today it’s a belt pinned with brooches and long sparkling pins of ruby; flipped long over my shoulder and draping soft over my hips, a shimmering saree in the Nivi style.

The nivi is the most popular sari style from Andhra Pradesh, one of the biggest city-states in Fairisle. The increased interaction with the Germa saw most women from royal families come out of purdah in the 900s. This necessitated a change of dress.

Maharani Indira Devi of Cooch Behar popularised the chiffon sari. She was widowed early in life and followed the convention of abandoning her richly woven Baroda shalus in favour of the unadorned mourning white as per tradition. Characteristically, she transformed her "mourning" clothes into high fashion. She had sarees woven in France—Paris, but also in Lodeve and Lyon—to her personal specifications, in white chiffon, and introduced the silk chiffon sari to the royal fashion repertoire.

The chiffon sari did what years of fashion interaction had not done in Fairisle: it homogenised fashion across the land. The chiffon sarees softness, lightness, beauty, elegance, and caressing drape was ideally suited to the Skuan climate.

Different courts of the time adopted their own styles of draping and indigenising the sari. In most of the courts the sari was embellished with stitching hand-woven borders in gold from Varanasi, delicate zardozi (literally gold work, embroidery in gold), gota (applique of zari ribbon), makaish (twisted gold threads to form a dot pattern) and tilla (ornamental embroidery in silver) that embellished the plain fabric, simultaneously satisfying both traditional demands and ingrained love for ornamentation. Some images of maharanis in the Deccan show the women wearing a sleeveless, richly embellished waistcoat over their blouses. The Begum of Savanur remembers how sumptuous the chiffon sari became at their gatherings.

At some courts it was worn with jaali, or net kurtas and embossed silk waist length sadris or jackets. Some of them were so rich that the entire ground was embroidered over with pearls and zardozi.

Nivi drape starts with one end of the sari tucked into the waistband of the petticoat, usually a plain skirt. The cloth is wrapped around the lower body once, then hand-gathered into even pleats below the navel. The pleats are tucked into the waistband of the petticoat.

They create a graceful, decorative effect which poets have likened to the petals of a flower. After one more turn around the waist, the loose end is draped over the shoulder. The loose end is called the pallu, pallaiv, seragu, or paita depending on the language. It is draped diagonally in front of the torso. It is worn across the right hip to over the left shoulder, partly baring the midriff. The navel can be revealed or concealed by the wearer by adjusting the pallu, depending on the social setting. The long end of the pallu hanging from the back of the shoulder is often intricately decorated. The pallu may be hanging freely, tucked in at the waist, used to cover the head, or used to cover the neck, by draping it across the right shoulder as well. Some nivi styles are worn with the pallu draped from the back towards the front, coming from the back over the right shoulder with one corner tucked by the left hip, covering the torso and waist. The nivi sari was popularised through the paintings of Raja Ravi Varma. In one of his paintings, the Skuan Coalition was shown as a mother wearing a flowing nivi sari. The ornaments generally accepted by the Hindu culture that can be worn in the midriff region are the waist chains. They are considered to be a part of bridal jewellery.

Sanji goes just a little crazy when I wear mine, and I’ve still got absolutely no idea why- not just the saree, but the waist chains, too. I flip the end of my pallu back over my left shoulder, and tuck the slack over my head like a dupatta. Then I put on my actual dupatta, more like a hijab or a veil, pinning it to my tunic with a brooch Sanji gave to me- it’s got honey bees and amber on it, one of my favorite things, ever- and wrapping it just so.

My bag ties onto my waist just so, and my spear rests against my back like a boney lover.

Everything’s ready to go.

I flick my maang tikka for luck, and then I step back out. Sanji’s changed his tie- as in, he’s put his tie back on- and abandoned his suit-jacket for a thick blue jumper with a deep V neck. He’s also added a heavy coat and a nice ushanka of dark brown-black fur, it’s flaps tied to the top of his head. He stops moving while putting his butter-yellow scarf around his neck, and stares at me with a grin.

I sigh, and calmly walk over to him. I tug the scarf from his unresisting fingers, and gently tuck it around his neck. This close, I can see the little violet specks in his eyes, and the dancing reflection of my own face in his pupils; I can feel the warm wetness of his breath, and smell the lingering stench of his cigarettes. Bleh- cloves, menthol, and a sharp hit of ginger. Violently fresh and aggressive. Bleeeeeh; give me a good skunkweed misty with cardamom and cinnamon any day.

Then again, he wouldn’t be Sanji without the stench of smoke…

We bid everyone goodbye; the Girls, huddled around a room-service menu and bickering, wave us off. Sancho, Chopper, Taffy, and Gurry chorus goodbye from their game of poker; Nami and Zoro, curled up together on a couch, smile. Usopp, Mark, and Luffy are… in one of the rooms; Franky and Robin are counting out money; the Mice are asleep in their basket nest; Nurse Mendy and BBC are in a rocking lounger, relaxing in the last of the afternoon sunlight.

A few blocks away from the hotel, my hand tucked away in Sanji’s, I finally remember what I’d agreed to do. I have some concerns.

“Um. I’ve, ah, I’ve never been ice-skating before- my skate club in school was all roller skates. Is it terribly difficult?”

“It’s certainly not easy; like any skill, you’re going to have a bit of a learning curve. About the only thing you’ll keep from roller skating is balancing while in motion; you used quad skates, right?”

“...Are there other kinds of roller skates?”

“Yes. There are inline skates, which are just like ice skates… D’you want me to go over some tips before we get there…?”
“Please,”

“Heh. Alright; well. Ice skates are basically leather boots with knives on the bottom, and they run a size smaller than your regular boots. They need to actually fit your feet- if they feel snug when you put them on, get a size up. There’s nothing worse than trying to skate in too-small skates. Um, you’ll want to tie them much tighter than you think, too- basically all the ankle support comes from how you tie your skates on,”

“And I need ankle support?”

“Very much so, yes,”

“Okay, what else?”

“You need to bend your knees, love; more than you think, really. Um, when you fall- and you’re going to fall- aim for your butt and your sides. Don’t try to catch yourself with your hands; ice has no give, so you’re much more likely to break your wrists or the ice. The rink we’re going to has buckets to help you balance, and you’ll want them to about your bellybutton- I suggest using your fingertips to balance, not your forearms,”

“Alright...”

“Ah, the rink is up ahead- I can give you actual instruction, if you want...?”

“Okay, sure,”

We walk into the ice rink; its... it’s cold, but a warm sort of cold? Thick carpeting; it’s a gym for a very specific set of sports... Sanji pays for our shoes at the desk, and I carefully try out two or three sets of skates until I find a pair that’s just right. Sanji comes back with his own pair of skates and a stack of buckets.

“Alright, so- the door to the rink is over there... are you going to walk in the skates to get a feel for them?”

“That was the plan, unless you-?”

“No, no, best to start now if you- MAB!”

I stood, and almost immediately fell over. Sanji caught me, and I caught the things he dropped, and-

“I’m okay, Sanji- I’ve got the stuff, too,”

“-we don’t have to go skating if you don’t want to, Mab,” “Sanji, you- I know this is something you’re really excited about, you’ve been reading up on local skating rinks for days now. I want to do this with you! I mean, I make no promises about being any good at it, but... I still want to try,”

“I- well… okay. Um, let me walk you over?”

“Of course! I was about to ask, actually-”

Sanji grins at me nervously, and I smile gently back. I can already tell I’m not going to be very good at this at first- no matter how I stand, I just can’t seem to find my balance, knees bent or not, weight forwards or middle or back; and if I can’t do it here on the carpet, gods only know how it’s going to be on the ice.

“Okay, so. I’m going to leave my jacket here; um, do you want to…?”

“I’m going to say: No. But, um, maybe my bag?”

“Sure! That’s what the lockers are for, they’re beside our seats on the wall-”

“Neat!”

“Mm; ah, let me just-”

Sanji helps me sit down on our booth’s seat, and grabs his skates out of the air from where they’ve been floating. I carefully hang his coat up, and put away our shoes in the little locker behind the table. I take a deep breath, and do my best to stand again. Woo-ooo-oo, okay, careful- it’s only slightly like roller skates, mostly it’s not like roller skates at all. Nnnnn! Okay, okay, I’m okay- waah!

\textit{Thump!}

Back onto the booth I flop. Sanji, who was watching me try to stand, blinks.

“Your skates aren’t tight enough- here, let me tie them this time, okay?”

“Sure,”

Sanji finishes tying his skates, stands with even more grace and power than usual, and calmly troumps over to me, before kneeling down and attending to my skates. I had thought I had tied them tightly, but apparently there were three whole handspans of laces hiding in the tongue of the skate. Sanji doesn’t do much to the vamp, but the way the shaft is clinging to my ankle now, I’m quite sure it wasn’t tight enough after all.

“Not too tight?”

“No, it feels snug-”

“That’s just a bit too tight, hang on-”
Sanji loosens the skate, and it goes from clingy to glove, just like that. He knots the laces, ties them in a bow, tucks the ends away so I won’t skate on them; strokes up my calves and over my knees, before looking up at me with a sort of… a calculating look.

“I think I’m going to get you some knee and elbow pads,”

“Oh?”

“Mm; you were wobbling hard enough, I think you’ll need them- and they have helmets, too, if you know how big your head is…?”

“Ah, do they clean them…?”

“Yeah, every use; so. Padding?”

“I do like being safe, where possible; five and a half punti, or fifty-eight centimeters, love,”

“Be right back, then,”

And I watch my husband’s ass as he tromps back to the desk. He’s adorable. I observe the gliding grace of the people out on the ice rink; it seems in the center of the rink, those people who really know how to skate are skating. There’s even a bit of a line in the very center where the “best” are doing tricks- mostly jumps and spins, very athletic. Out at the edges, the very young are carefully wobbling along under the watchful eyes of their elders- their parents, their grandparents, those who have enough control to go at the pace of those just learning. Most- scratch that, all, all of the couples, they’re all skating in the middle, or showing off for each other in the center.

Sanji tromps back with a net bag of limb padding and a bright pair of helmets. Mine, I think, is-

“Yeah, I got the ladybug one for you; and after thinking about it… it’s been a bit more than twelve years since I last went ice skating, and I always had a helmet then. So, I got the watermelon one for myself,“

“Mm. And… um, I guess this way we match...”

“Yep!”

I smile up at him, and then carefully undo the ponytail my hair is in. I think I’ll leave my dupatta here; just fold that up… loose braid, I think, so I don’t put too much pressure on my head. Mm, this is the right size- strap the buckle, and done! Re-wrap my pallu so it’s more like a scarf, with a little bit of cape down my shoulders, hair tucked underneath; then the edge of the pallu tucks under my helmet. I look over at Sanji, who is carefully tugging his bangs out of his eyes, and I smile. No real reason beyond I love him, and I love when he remembers my favorite things- even though he hates bugs, he remembers that I don’t.

I try standing again, hand on the table this time and holy shit it’s so much better- still a lot of wobble and uncertainty, but I’ve got significantly more control. Sanji, standing next to me, puts his gloved hand in mine—mittens! I forgot mittens!

“What’d you remember?”

“Mittens!”

“Like these?”

“You remembered!?”

“Yep. Hands out, love, I’ll pull them on for you—”

“Thank you!”

And then, my hand in Sanji’s, I go out onto the rink. I immediately slip and fall directly on my ass. This is a portent for the rest of our date.

I fall.

I fall on my ass.

I fall on my side.

I fall on my face.

I fall on Sanji.

I knock us both over.

I fall on small children, who are significantly better than me at skating.

I fall on old people, who are significantly better than me at skating.

I trip over my own self, who is terrible at skating.

I fall on my face again, and crunch blood out of my nose.

I’m fairly sure that some of the sniggering coming from the center of the rink are meant to be making fun of me, but, well, here’s a secret: it doesn’t matter how many times you fall. It matters how many times you get back up and try again.

I’m starting to lose count of how often I’ve fallen because I fall basically every five minutes— and not a little trip or wobble, this is a full on middle-of-body to ground experience. Every five minutes, Thump. It gets to the point that a small crowd of littles starts following me around and cheering when I get back up again.
“Hey, Mab?”

“Hmmm? Yipe!”

“Ooough! Yeah, um, let’s take a break,”

“But- I almost had it that time!”

“Let’s take a break, okay?”

“Okaaay...”

And we- well, I wobble back to the gate and fall flat on my face out of the rink, and Sanji moves like an exceptionally graceful wind over the ice. I crawl back to the booth; it seems safer. Sanji’s developed a quirk to his brow and a certain reddish tinge over the bridge of his nose- ah, he heard the sniggers. I, personally, don’t care- but he does. Hm.

I put in an order for a pair of hot chocolates, some black tea; and a croque madame each, with the egg and the bechamel on the side-

“Are you ordering food from the rink?”

“Mnhm,”

“...I make these so much better though?”

“Mmm, it’s really hard to screw these up, love,”

“Hmmph,”

“Also, I thought some cheese, some good sliced ham, some burnt butter on bread-”

“You mean caramelized?”

“I mean they burn it until it’s brown and tastier, yeah,”

“Pfft,”

“An egg and some bechamel-”

“Bay-sha-mel-”

“Beh-cha-mal-”

“Pfftffft-”

“Pffffffft-”

“Well, I thought some good food would help you calm down about the gigglers in the middle of the rink-”
“Uuuuugh-”

“...Do you need a hug, Razz?”

“...yeah...”

“Okay, hang on-”

This time, I tromp over to him.

“Budge up,”

And then I’ve wrapped my arms around him- clonk! Helmets! We didn’t take off our helmets! We draw apart and take the helmets off, hanging them on hooks that are on either side of the locker. Then I go back to hugging my husband.

I can feel his traps tremble under my palms.

Here’s a thing about my husband. He carries his stress in his shoulders and back- a lot of it squeezes deep into his spine, mostly in his trapezius muscles. When I can feel them shake and tremble, I know that he’s getting much closer to losing his temper than even he realizes- once those muscles lock up, he’s on a hair trigger.

I inhale deeply and let my cloth covered breasts squish and stroke against his chest. He shudders, and squeaks as I press in further and further; the soft press of my mouth against his neck, and the way he shudders and sighs as I nip my way closer to his ear. It’s when I’m pressing my forehead to his, the long bridge of my nose lined up to his and ready to kiss-

“M-mab, we’re, we’re in public,”

“Mm. Do you want me to stop?”

“Nn-no,”

“Too bad; food’s here, and I’m hungry,”

“Eeh!”

And then I’ve stolen a thorough kiss of my startled husband, to the amusement of our waiter, before darting back around- clomp clomp clomp- and retaking my seat. Sanji looks like he’s been smacked with a large fish and doused with rose-scented ice water.

I grin.
Here’s a thing about me, while we eat our delicious grilled cheese-and-meat sandwiches, French white sauce and fried eggs on the side; when I have to learn a new thing with my body, it takes me about an hour to learn the basics. Every time I fell in the past hour and a half, it was because I was physically figuring out the limitations of my actual ability- the potential.

I sop up the last of the yolk with my sandwich crusts, and give serious thought to sucking the grease off my fingers… but the way Sanji’s looking at me, that might be a step too far for his self control. I don’t know if I’m up for a round of ‘hide the sausage’ with Sanji in the unisex toilet; then again, we haven’t actually managed to have any sex at all for the past three days, and… I’ve got Itches only my husband can really scratch.

Then again again, if I just take my napkin… and wipe my fingers… a little more, hm, fastidiously than normal… Sanji licks his lips while watching me, and all I can do is smile and rub the top of my nails with the napkin.

Hm. I think I want the comfort of an entire bed, or even a couch.

“…Back to the rink, Razz,"

“Wha- o-oh, um, y’sure?”

“Mmmhhmm. I think the second round will be much better, honestly,"

“Because I would be very happy going home and just making out on the couch, I feel like we don’t get enough couch- time-”

“Skaaaaattiiiiiiiiiiiing~”

I said this as I was tromping back out to the rink, and waiting for him at the door. He sighed, put his hand over his eyes and shoved that libido down, and joined me. I followed Sanji out onto the rink, wobbling at first and then observing and copying what he did- and then we were gliding.

Sanji, no fool, glanced over his shoulder and then picked up speed. I matched him.

A gentle turn at the end of the rink; I matched him again.

Slow swizzle; footwork; and then I’m right beside him. We slowly sway around each other, carefully gliding around other skaters. Dancing- my husband has somehow managed to take me dancing, despite the lack of dance moves.

There’s an empty space that’s not quite the trick center, and not quite the racing lane, and nowhere near the edge… two, actually, and- ah, I see, it’s meant for couples. I glide into the space, wobble a little, and then sweep around and stop. Sanji, following behind me, blonde strands fluttering because we FORGOT THE HELMETS-

“Hey Mab?”

“Yes, Sanji,”
“Try to keep up,”
“—!”

And then my beautiful, sexy, competitive asshole of a husband takes off. I follow after him.

Did you know, at my school, clubs were mandatory for graduation? And you weren’t allowed to be in a club adjoining your elective classes, meaning you had to have an interest completely outside of your scholastics. My club was Figure Skating- of course, there aren’t any ice rinks in Fairisle, so we did everything on roller skates. My husband seems to have forgotten this- or rather, I didn’t really explain that all the tricks we did in my school club, we got them out of a textbook meant for ice skating.

Bunny hop to camel spin; crossover and lunge; spirals; chasse to chocktow to combination spins; and then, of course, we start doing the jumps. Here’s where the main difference comes in: Sanji trained for sport; I trained for show.

My jumps are a shitton cooler- and! And! I know how to do backflips!
Sanji does not know how to do backflips.

When I do a triple backflip, and I come back up giggling and grinning, and Sanji looks so- hm.

“Sanji, do you want me to teach you how to do-?”
“Yes!”

“Hmmhmhm, okay. C’mere- it’s not like doing it flat footed… hmm. How to explain… you ever run up a quarter pipe and do a flip?”

“Uh… inner hull of a ship count?”

“I’ll take it- so, on skates, it’s basically the same except you have to provide all the lift, flip, and land again. Mou, it’s sort of the same as a running flip at a wall, I suppose, but you have to let your body slip out to get it right- and it takes practice, you won’t be able to do it the first time, or even the second. For now, work on getting big air in a bunny hop-”

“A bunny hop? ”

“Mm. Spins are Z, which you don’t want- you want X and Y… er, you don’t want movement on your lateral, but on your vertical and horizontal, so,”

“Okay- like this?”

And then with a shove forwards and a bound, my husband is fully three meters in the air and gently landing like a feather. Whoo. Sometimes I forget how godsblessed powerful my husband is, and then he does something like that and reminds me.
Whoo.

I skate up next to him and grin.

“Exactly like that. Now, do you need me to walk you through anything else, or…?”

“When should I start the flip?”

“Ah, that. The one thing I can’t teach you- it’s a matter of timing, which is internal. Basically, you need to have your body doing the flip at the apex of your jump- that is, at the highest point of lift, right when you have no weight, you need to be flipping over. Hard to do.”

“Oh! I… I need to do some more jumps so I get a better sense of when that is, exactly, then,”

“Mm. I need to practice my Axels, I’ve gotten rusty…”

And for the next hour, that’s all we do- practice tricks. Eventually, I get comfortable enough for what we in the Skate Club called “There and Back Again”, which is any jump that pleases you, forwards (Left skate air left skate), and backwards (right skate air right skate), forwards in space and then backwards in space. We were twelve and immortal and crazy as a box of cats.

After a while, Sanji does a full backflip at a rate of about one every eight minutes. I watch him work out the most efficient way of doing it, which is not necessarily the most beautiful way of doing it.

Urp! I thought I wouldn’t get motion sick, I- oh, wait, I never ate during club because… ah, shit- Cross the rink, cross the rink, cross the rink, ururrp, no, no, no- through the door, to the trash can- Harrrrgh! Blargh!

Eeech!

Puh!

Hurk- gaaaah! Ech, ach, puh, puh, puh- bluh!

Maybe if I make myself burp…? Gurp! Hugh- bluh, acid burp!

Hi, Sanji.

“Hi, Sanji. I forgot that skating makes me motion sick- no, stop, it wasn’t the food, you ate it too and you’re fine- Sanji!”

“-- ----! ”

“No, you are not going to go yell at the poor cook, you’re going to sit down with me and rub my stomach,”

“But-!”
“No,”

“I- fine,”

“Thank you,”

The next half hour, instead of skating, I lean against Sanji and let him comfort me. Having my husband rub his very broad, warm hands over my roiling guts is actually very soothing, and fairly arousing- but, he’s shy, so I don’t act on it much. Mostly I just smile and gaze at him adoringly, which is more than enough to make him sigh and smile and gaze back.

Our rental of the booth runs out before my stomach settles, so… we end up sitting in the lobby for another fifteen minutes. Long enough for my stomach to settle down, thankfully.

“Ach, I messed up our date,”

“Nah. We still have to go to Daiso, remember?”

“Oh yeah- we’d have had to stop soon anyway, huh?”

“Mm,”

“What do you need from Daiso?”

“Well. All the Girls could use barrettes, but especially Ellie- mostly, I think Ellie needs barrettes so she can start showing her face more. However, she’s very shy and doesn’t accept gifts easily-”

“So if we get something for all the girls, she’s more likely to use it,”

“Mm. And there are probably things we can get for Mince and Oz, too…?”

“Mm, we should ask them first, get to know them better… although, Mince probably needs new scrunchies-”

“Scrunchies?”

“Mm, they’re soft and stretchy, so they won’t crush his tendrils,”

“Oh. Hmmm- does Oz need special sunscreen? Or the rest of the girls for that matter?”

“They shouldn’t, but a moisturizer wouldn’t be amiss...”

“Hm. Ah, and… it’s been a while since we’ve had time to ourselves, so, I was wondering...”

“Yeah…?”

“Um. They sell those, uh, do it yourself warding kits at the Daiso, right?”

“Mm. Oh! Oh, yes, that would work- I’d need to do some mathemagic to get everything, y’know, right, but… they do,”

“Well...”
“I think that’s a wonderful idea, Sanji,”

“I’m glad, Mab,”

After that, it’s a fairly nice walk in the twilight to the nearest Daiso large enough to have a good selection of what we’re wanting to get. Barrettes are five hundred beri for a bucket of a thousand; scrunchies come out at three hundred beri (in the rainbow assortment) for a strip of thirty.

Even the warding kit, which is cheaper as individual pieces and a nice tote bag, doesn’t run up more than two hundred beri tops.

A stick of magnesium carbonate chalk, wrapped like a sticky sweet; uncut owl-feather quill pens; standard set of candles (one black, one white, one blue); mini-cauldron with a dropper to stand in for a chalice; sample packs of both herbs and spices, each one about the size of a tin of breath mints; tiny knife that has a lovely pearl handle; I can use wands of alder, hawthorn, or hazel, but considering this isn’t meant to be a permanent working… Bamboo soaked in a tincture of willow fine and hazelnut should be enough. A bit of cloth, to work on; a bell to open and close; and a soother-censer, for the association to fog and mist.

Ah, before I forget why I need these things- wards are the field of magic that deals with the creation of magical barriers and protections. At its simplest and most intuitive, armament haki is warding magic. At higher levels, it can be used to create larger defended areas, as well as screen off areas with less visible and tangible barriers, meant to exclude intangible things- like ghosts, scrying, divination, or hostile uses of haki.

When you add things like runes and crystals into the spell, wards can also be used to create high end locks, mystic encryptions, and even traps. Some Towers treat warding as a part of invocation, while others treat warding as a part of abjuration. However, magic that repulses, expels, exorcises, and contains various summoned beings is, strictly speaking, more closely related to healing, not warding at all.

Mechanically, a magical barrier against incarnate things- beings, ideas, and so on- are much harder to achieve than barriers against insubstantial things- light, sound, and so on. Manifest entities, which have pseudo-real physical bodies, fall somewhere in between, with levels of pain and injury being the defining factor in their ability to overcome a given ward.

Any barrier which wards out Others (ghosts) can reasonably be expected to extend into the Otherworld; thus, it cannot be bypassed by a (relatively) simple shift of Plane. Barriers against the incarnate, though difficult to create, tend to not have such extensions; and, due to an over-reliance on fencing out a hostile intruder’s soul, soulless creatures such as- er, hang on… Okay, more complicated explanation to avoid being a tribist, even in my head.

Incarnate barriers rely on Resonance Theory to work as they do; a certain bandwidth of, hmm, “tones”, is designated allowed or not allowed as necessary. All beings with souls that fall under the “allowed” section pass through with ease; all beings with souls that fall under the “not allowed” section cannot pass. Automata, due to having incarnate souls, emit Resonance at frequencies most mages don’t consider for the soul-sound at all; understandable, considering most mages can’t even detect or feel those resonances without equipment that’s only been invented in the past twenty years. I know I couldn’t, before I ate my Devil Fate.
Destructive, or weaponized, wards—something like the old “Eye of the Basilisk” or “Medusa’s Mirror” wards—damage those who are exposed to them by use of active noise cancellation (ANR), set to the “tones” of the soul-sound registered as “not allowed”. Fairly common and easy to make, although a simple sound-baffle is enough to spoof them. Most mages learn some variant on 'baku' or 'explode', or even the unbalanced spellequations that result in that sort of thing; even jinxes, hexes, and curses have their roots in wards. If a jinx, hex, or curse is meant to lay quiet… if, in it’s mechanical equation, the spell is written in an {if-this, then-that} format, it is, technically speaking, a ward.

...I’ve just had an epiphany, I think. Science is a way of talking about the universe in words that bind it to a common reality. Magic is a method of talking to the universe in words that it cannot ignore. The two are rarely compatible; mathemagic gets around the problem by being both the description and the thing being described at the same time. It is both reality, and unreality; an image and a form. The code; the code in action!

That’s why I need so very little to get a spell to do what I need it to do, by the by; basically, I’m cheating outrageously.

Anyway. Last is a backpack I can already tell is destined for Beatrix, after I do some small repairs and spiff it up a bit; all the spell components fit in just fine, and that’s that. Last check: a stick of magnesium carbonate chalk, in a holder which is a better purchase at slightly higher price; uncut owl-feather quill pens; birthday cake candles which are cheaper and just as good, in black, white, and blue; mortar and pestle with a dropper meant for liquid medicine, much simpler to use and more versatile besides; sample packs of both herbs and spices, each one about the size of a tin of breath mints- coriander seeds, poppy seeds, dill, mint, and tarragon; then cumin, mustard, cayenne, turmeric, and black pepper; medium sized cruets container for mixtures that need to be sprinkled dry; a cup of pickling salt and powdered sugar in individual envelopes; a tiny knife that has a lovely pearl handle, and a leather thong to put it on; I can use wands of alder, hawthorn, or hazel, but considering this isn’t meant to be a permanent working… Bamboo soaked in a tincture of willowfine and dusted with hazelnut should be enough. I’ll have to check Beatrix’s affinities, but Willow’s a good bet...

A bit of cloth, to work on- it’s a tea towel, nothing fancy; a bell to open and close- it’s made of brass, I’ll probably turn it into one of those, uh, wind-bell things, meant for summertime; and a soother-censer, for the association to fog and mist… a notebook, because I need to write this one down for the girls, as well as explain how to adapt it to, say, a dreamcatcher or a pillowcase…

Oh my gods it’s a tiny vibrator that looks like a piece of sushi. It runs on… hearing aid batteries? No, regular batteries. Oh my gods it’s so cute; and it comes in packs of two! I need one! Yeaaaah!

I- hmmm. Cockrings. Hmmhmm. Why not? Sanji might like it- I’ve nothing bad to say about vibrators, but they aren’t for everyone. Some people are too rhythmically inclined to get the most out of a vibrator- they end up focusing on the beat of the vibe, rather than beating their meat. Others find it’s an overstimulation thing- too much at once, y’know. Oh, hey, buy one get one free- plain old ding-dong vibrator, vaguely penis shaped and one speed only- powerful, discrete, and completely waterproof. It even has a loop in the bottom to attach a string to, for retrieval...

Anyway. Purchase; and we out.
Getting back to the hotel—after a quick dinner—dinner of ramen—it’s nice. It’s nice to walk, glove in mittened hand, with the man I love. Making a spell for soundproofing in our room takes a bit less than ten minutes—mostly because the wand isn’t very good.

Sanji is shy; he doesn’t like everyone hearing him while he has sex. I don’t care; but he does.

“So—what did you buy, Honey?”

“Mm, some vibrators—why, what did you buy?”

“Uhm. Lube,”

“...?”

“I had... I kinda wanted to, um, try... T-try a-anal sex? U-uhm, you st-stimulating me, um, if th-that’s okay?”

“Oh! Of course! Ah- do you really want to do this? I don’t want you to force yourself to do something you’re uncomfortable with...”

“W-well, um. I- I really like it w-when you, ah, when you lick my a-asshole, and I... I want more butt stuff!”

“Hmmhmhm-alright! So, um... you’re too tense for me to feel comfortable doing this. To start, let’s get naked, okay?”

“I- u-um, yeah, sure,”

I carefully take off my dupatta and fold it neatly; then, my saree, which I fold and hang over the dupatta so the two don’t get separated. Then off comes my tunic, my heavy boots, my trousers; I unbind my hair so it falls, heavy and cool and red down my back. I sit at the desk and attend my makeup in the mirror, quietly watching Sanji get out of his head watching me.

I clean my makeup off with an oily cleanser, followed by a lemony skin wipe. Hmm. It’s nice to be just me again— the lips will be stained for a few days though, no getting around that. And, of course, my nails are painted the most supernatural blue and covered in pretty yellow star glitters, because Tilly gave me The Eyes and it was super effective, okay? Okay.

Sanji is behind me now, and his fingers are very delicate and gentle tugging out the many pins keeping various pieces of jewellery on the crown of my head. He tugs away the maang tikka, and the crown across my forehead, and sets them in their box just like I would; puts the pins in the little dish I know he saw me tap them out into.

I tug my hair to the side and arch into his hand when he strokes up my neck to find the clasp of my necklace— only- he undoes the clasp of my bikini top too? I clamp a hand to my chest to keep it from falling and tangling in my skirts as Sanji tugs my necklace off of me. He scrubs a scratchy kiss into the side of my neck, which at this point is just an excuse to hear me giggle like a child, and then puts my necklace in with the rest of my jewellery. Another kiss, this time with a wet lick, behind my ear.

Sanji’s hand’s are big and warm and very strong, and he kneads into my breasts delightedly, before tugging the bikini of beads and metal and precious little fabric away, hanging it on a hanger. I stretch up and out, my wings wriggling with the joy of movement and then CR AMP- FUCK-

S-sanji’s fingers knead the cramp away, noose tight pain turning into echoing waves of pleasure crashing against my back, my spine, my ass, my- aaaaaah- His knuckles dig into the velvet of my spine and scrub - aaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaah-aah-AAAAAAAAAAAHH-

I’m panting and sweating and loose limbed, and my husband is grinning into my hair. My nipples are nubbly and Sanji’s flicking and rubbing one of them with lazy glee. I sigh, and pull myself together, undoing the knot at my hip keeping my skirt on my hips. I’m not actually wearing panties; you’re not supposed to, in this outfit- and especially not in the next one.

My hip chains chime and clink; I see Sanji catch sight of them and flush with excitement. I take my hip chains off, because they’re ceremonial, and put them with the rest of the jewelry. Then, I reach for a jewelry set I know my husband has never seen before. I glance up at him and smirk, and he blinks back.

Then, I open up my special jewelry box.

Sanji squeaks.

No makeup; hair… twisted back in furrows, maybe? No, a chignon; pin in the wire loops, add the bead strings; heavy necklace of shells and silver, chains and flowers dripping down- ah, almost forgot the pasties- off Sanji!

Off!

Bead pauldrons, that attach to sleeves; and then… yup. I stand and flick and stretch, letting my various decorations settle onto my body, and push Sanji back and away because he wants to touch and he’s not allowed to do that yet. A trio of chains in belt form that go around my hips, and a tiny bell with hearts on it and Sanji is out and out jittering where he stands he’s so horny.

Thankfully, I’m fully dressed and ready to get to work in my finest body chains- because he really does like it when I wear jewelry, and he’s yet to say why. It might be like Nami’s thing about piles of money; it might just be he likes the contrast. Don’t know; don’t care, beyond that he does.

Now then.

“Lay down on the bed, Razz; on your back, please. You’ve been very tense all day, so I’m going to give you a massage,”

“Yes, okay, whatever you want,”

“I only hope you don’t come to regret saying that,”

“I’ll certainly come,”

I snicker, and then take out the body oil I got out of our bedside table. This is a very very high-end love hotel, after all; the body oil is both free and actually nice smelling. It smells like… argan, almond, and rose? Bleh, not on Sanji; oh, there’s an orange blossom scented one, much better. It’s sealed tight- I’ll leave it under the lamp to warm a bit.
Some general mood lighting and ambiance would not go amiss… our bedroom is warm, and I set out candles already. Lighting them is a bit of a thought- a matchstick is like a needle because of the sharpness of the flame- and the room is lit with the glow of about twenty small tea light candles, plain white and unscented. I thought about flowers, but about the only ones that don’t give Sanji headaches after a while are orange blossoms and honeysuckle, neither of which are in season- I could use dried blooms, or even oil, but, well… nah.

There’s more to a good massage than just mood lighting, warm oil, and determination; actual technique makes a big difference. A firm pressure that moves the muscles beneath the skin is better than making your partner squirm; taking the time to be gentle, and even; never pushing directly on joints, which includes the spine and the ribs. Tools, like a simple tennis ball or smooth cold-stones, are also helpful, but not exactly necessary.

And anyway, I actually do know what I’m doing; I’ve been planning this out in the back of my mind since Sanji first intimated that he wanted to do butt stuff, months ago.

I turn off the lamp, and the room dims; candles are our only light, now, aside from the fake-moon above.

I open the bottle, my painted fingers gaining a layer of glossy, cold-thick oil from the nubbly, scratchy pot of oil. I set it aside, and carefully rub my fingers together, roving my eyes over my husband. His blushing face, leaning up against the headboard, with his lust bitten lips and his blue eyes glowing with smoky want; his horns, which were covered by cold-weather covers- the cutest thing I’ve seen in a good long while- gleam with rippled blackness, sharp and deadly and very, very lovely; his long, muscular arms, rippled with muscle and dark fine hairs; his graceful hands, scratchy with calluses; his broad, hairy chest, his nipples so tight with desire I could put one of my smallest earrings around it clean, without pinching. The hair on his chest tapers down at his belly button and narrows into a line, thick and dark and wonderful, the way it bursts out into a thick, dense forest of hair that surrounds his cock. And his cock!

Heavy with blood in his arousal, pink at the tip and gleaming, the sweetly sensitive folds of his penis rolling around the very top of his shaft; long, longer than any other man I’ve ever been with, and thick around and not too veiny. His balls are nice too; furry with hair, hard and big and heavy, and the sounds he makes when I- well. The candle light just makes his whole body ripple and dance with spatters of golden warmth.

His thighs could be properly described as thews, and are hairy as all the rest of his body; his knees are oddly beautiful, perfectly formed and faintly wondrous; his calves are round and plentiful, his ankles are… ankles- and his feet, well. I massage them often enough, so I’ve come to appreciate their little quirks, but Sanji does not have pretty feet. He does have a pretty ass, and an adorable tail, and a ridgeback of dorsal velvet that makes his entire body blush and shake when I scratch along it. He still won’t let me really pet his tail, but I’m getting better about not longing to stroke it after a good thorough dicking.

Where to start, where to start… his hands, where else? Well, aside from his feet, but we’re working top down, so actually, I ought to start with his head. Traditionally, for male demons, one starts with the horns.

I start by taking the tip of one of his horns in my fingers, carefully smoothing oil into the rounded edge. I smooth into each ridge with the pads of my fingers, stroking along the long furrow and smearing the oil into the thick keratinized bone. Sanji has flushed bright red, and his breath comes out in heady snorts as I get closer and closer to his scalp, questing fingers nudging aside his thick hair. Right before I can get to the velvety edge of new growth, the most sensitive part of his horns and, indeed, the most erotic- I stop. I put more oil on my hands. I use a clean knuckle to move the jar closer, and then-

I flick my wings for lift, and carefully climb up to straddle my husband. With my legs spread wide, and my pussy open and just resting on his hot cock, I take hold of his other horn. Repeat the process from the start- tip to scalp, paying special attention to the long furrows of his horn and the way he sighs with pleasure as I rub my bejewelled body against his hairy self.

I indulge myself with his chest hair for a moment; I put more oil on my hands, and then press flat against his lower chest, running my palms up until my fingers are buried in his hair. I close my fingers and tug, gently, gently; Sanji’s hips buck and jerk when I get too enthusiastic. After a few teasing squirms, I’m very careful to only pull hard enough to make his dick throb- which, of course, I can feel. Mmmn, that’s nice.

I stroke my hands over his clavicles, circle around his neck, pretending all the while I have taken no notice of how deeply his fingers are beginning to dig into my ass. Finally, my fingers reach the back of his neck, and I start feeling and tugging again. Sanji lets out soft sighs of pleasure, his eyes blue-black and hazy with relaxation as I tug and rub more, more, more- scratch at the top of his head and then, hah, then take my time to bring him to stuttering release- but not ejaculation, just orgasm- by massaging the velvet at the base of his horns.

During his afterglow, I suspend his head in my hands, rubbing firm circles into the top of his skull in counterpoint to his breaths. Because he didn’t ejaculate, his throbbing cock presses up into my slippery pussy much sooner than I think he thought it would- a bit less than three minutes, I’d say. Not inside, where he wants to go- just up into it, so he can get a taste of the slippery delights in store for him.

I tug and wriggle until we’re both of us flat on the bed; and then with an arch of my hips that summons a deep groan of pleasure, I rise above him. His pleasure-aching cock is now nestling in the crack of my ass, and the soft whimpers of need coming from him are only making me wetter.

I attend to my husbands ears. It starts with just a revealing of them- stroking the hair away, turning his head so I have full view of their graceful curling; and then, the touching, caressing, the pads of my fingers finding every soft nook and cranny he’s hidden. The touch of my mouth makes him gasp and buck again, the soft pap of his cock on my ass a counterpoint to the steady nips and licks and kisses I give to his ear. When I blow across lick-wetted skin, I can feel his whole body shiver with delight.

The other ear reduces him to panting and chirrups, not unlike the sounds he makes when he’s deep inside of me; the sounds my husband makes when my pussy clamps around him, smothering the tip of his cock with little cervix-kisses are some of the sweetest and most adorable sounds he makes- sweeter and more adorable, to my ear, than the rumble of his purr when Deborah falls asleep on his chest. Then again, it’s a very different sound for very different contexts… They really rank about the same.

Face time. More oil, warm and, hm, this time I put cold smears of it under the tiny flab of my breasts, to have a stock ready for later- also, it titillates Sanji when I play with my own tits, especially when they’re adorned like this.

Ah, I can’t hold back anymore; I have to let my feelings show on my face. It’s a bit embarrassing, how much I’m enjoying making my husband relax and feel good- but, well, when Sanji opens his eyes and sees how much I’m enjoying his enjoyment… I almost forget myself right there, almost take his pretty mouth with mine and fuck him into the firm mattress beneath us- but I don’t. No, no-
Instead, I take the warmed oil from beneath my breasts and rub on the sides of Sanji’s face. Through his sideburns, up along the front of his scalp, and then- his third eye. I press there with my thumb for a full minute.

The deep sigh that comes out of my husband as tension releases inside of him… ah, I could listen to just that forever. I do it again because I can still feel the pressure of his tension in him; and while I do, I slowly rub warm circles into his temples. The soft sighs that come out… laden with the stress of days, months maybe, thick and hot and warm against my neck and chin and lips I want to kiss him-

But I want to be intimate more. I slowly lounge down across his body, just out of alignment enough that his helpless thrusting can’t quite reach the entrance of my pussy. And now- his face. I rest myself just so; enough that I can slowly trace the planes and angles of his face with my fingertips. The ridge of his brow, the smooth soft delight of his eyebrows; I trace the curl with a fingertip and let the bubbly adoration flow. There’s no shame, in loving someone; and it’s nothing to be ashamed of, either.

Sanji’s wrapped his arms around me this time, stroking knuckles along my velvety spine. I sigh, and smile, and he smiles back. I cup his warm, flushed face with my cold hands; feel the tension and release of muscles, the hardness of his cheekbones, trace soft skin under his eyes, and the long straight arch of his nose. I trace the line of his jaw, rub in the softness just behind his jaw, right in the top of his throat and below his tongue. Press the ghost of a kiss to his mouth and trace his nose with the tip of my own.

“You’re not going to kiss me?”

“Mm. Not yet; I want to take my time and savor you,”

“A-ah,”

He’s blushing again. I trace a finger over his lips and bite mine in wondrous longing- but if I give in, I’ll end up fucking him into the floorboards, and this isn’t about that right now. He’s still too tense to just go right for butt stuff, though- so.

I pull us both up, and then feel for the small hollows of Sanji’s neck. At my delicate touch, a shudder runs through him, centralized to his hips but vibrating up and down his spine. I lock eyes with him and slowly, slowly add pressure, ensuring his head is fully secure- and when his eyes flutter closed and deep sighs and soft, nearly silent moans start coming out of him, I know that he feels secure. Now to engage the ol’ Devil Fate- and with a soft, slightly different chime because my Dollperganger is wearing a different bell (it’s got little stars on it, if you were wondering), I get on the bed again.

I let myself fall backwards, taking Sanji with me so he’s fully laid out on top of me, and I carefully tug his legs out from underneath him. I wrap my legs around his waist as I straddle his back; I dig my elbows into the space between his shoulder bones. Sanji’s aaaaah comes from deep in his gut, even as I use my upper arms and elbows to keep him from propping himself up. I even go so far as to grab his hands with mine and stretch my arms over his head, all so I can really get at those knots taking up valuable Sanji-estate on his back. Elbows into those angel wings, lover-man; I even manage to de-knot his shoulder wells, which pick up stress like my bare callused feet pick up lint in the laundry room.

Underneath Sanji, I press tenderly with my thumbs and forefingers into the grooves below his collar bones. Sanji’s eyes shoot open and his breath comes out in a sharp whine as I turn around so that I’m straddling him and facing his ass. Four more of me appear, each with their own chime, and begin working on his legs. I dig my hands into his thighs, and use firm, even strokes from the back of his knee to the beginning of his ankle. Eventually, I’m focused on the tight knots of his outer thighs, and the warm moaning evoked by my tender ministrations to the backs of his knees.

I appear again, straddling his back with my back to myself- electric tingle of wings against wings means that all of me moan which makes Sanji shudder with lust so strong I can smell it; sandalwood and cigarette smoke, thick and hot in the air. I want him.

I want to make him feel good.

I’m still holding Sanji’s hands up over our heads; on his back, I start massaging under his arms, in his armpits a little, little tugs on the hair. He giggles and snickers, and lets out ragged sighs as I move along the lymph nodes and press into the valleys that separate deltoid from bicep and tricep. Particularly when I dig into his biceps and triceps- well, there’s such a buildup of stress in those that it’s right on the edge of painful for him, me massaging there.

I spread his legs with my own beneath, hooking ankle to ankle and pressing calves firm together so that-

Whoops, too fast, he went tense again. I roll off of his lower back, and I let go of his legs with my hands because they’re all massaged out, and I carefully move myself to lounge across his back, the ridge of his velvet scrubbing right between my tits- oh, right, I only have the one set of body chains, and I’m already wearing them, the bells are actually on choker necklaces, not belts…

And then-

I roll-

Us over-

So that the beaded I is on top, and the rest of me are gathering around, admiring a Sanji gone almost lobster red with perverted glee. I sit up again, even as I remain supine and breathing underneath the warm, wonderful weight of my husband; and I glide down so that his cock- angry red and throbbing with desire- is slid up against my ass and pussy again.

I stretch, and roll my hips, and Sanji moans.

I smile, watching his strange expression morph between embarrassment and wanton lust.

Ach, a man’s nipples are enigmatic things. No point to them- men don’t feed babies, after all- but gods, how my man whimpers when I suckle at them! Caress them lightly, and he sighs; gently pinch them, and he bucks; suckle them, and he becomes a panting mess, whimpering and sobbing with pleasure. I draw from him another orgasm, and in the afterglow I take up two things- first, I begin increasing the pressure on the Sea of Tranquility, right in the dimple of his breastbone; second, I start massaging his hands. He’s so protective of his hands, I hardly ever get to just… pamper them. He’s always using them, you see- but, one of me per hand, that seems just right, I think. It was one of me per nipple, after all…

And me holding his hands above his head is a good compromise, I think. We’ve decided that neither of us like being tied up at all.

“If this hurts at all, you must tell me, Sanji,”

“Nnngh,”

“And if you want me to do harder, or faster, or more; or softer, or slower, or less- you must tell me, okay?”

“Nnn. Nn-hmm,”

“Okay,”

Starting with the pinky, I pinch the tip firmly for a moment. Then I use firm, short strokes with my thumb, massaging up the finger towards the knuckle. Finally, I squeeze the finger all over. Each finger gets the same treatment, on both hands; ending with the thumb. I hold his hand in mine, palm down, and use my thumb to massage the back of the hand. The pad of my hand rolls between the pinky and ring finger; at medium pressure, my thumb slides along the finger bones towards the wrist. Again and again, repeated for each finger; and especial attention is given to the web of his hand, between thumb and forefinger.

I massage his wrist, small circular motions moving from the center out. I hold his hand palm down, interlacing our fingers to stretch his apart; grasp the whole hand in mine and gently push back to stretch the wrist. Tears of pleasure bead that the corner of my husband’s eyes as I slowly and carefully turn his wrists from right to left and then left to right. As I stroke slow and gentle from his wrist to the tips of his fingers, I can feel his cock throb with each stroke.

I fold myself down and kiss around Sanji’s belly button; my tongue dips in and his hips shudder and buck and his whole face snarls like he’s about to ejaculate, and violently, throw me on my back and pound-

I ooze forwards and press my breasts against his face just long enough for him to moan- and then I kneel on his shoulders, to keep him pressed down where I want him. Ow! Pinched myself with my jewellery, fuck- good, he didn’t notice.

I’m not sitting on his face. Not quite; he’s never given me permission to do that, and I don’t want to spring it on him, but… it’s almost impossible to do the broad, crisscrossing strokes on the torso that I’m doing if you’re also sitting on the torso. His tummy is protected by rock-hard abs, each one jerking and squirming under my gentle touch. My kisses to his belly button travel down that happy trail of hairs and along the sharp V his legs meeting his torso- again again again, as the slick of my body on his cock twitches and jerks.

And I just pinched myself- again- on my jewelry. Off it comes, I’m not going for a third-time-lemon. I roll off his shoulders and off the bed, thumping to the ground with a half-surprised yelp.

Sanji sits up in a daze, even as I press kisses and licks onto his hips without actually touching his penis - I can see it driving him crazier and crazier, even as he stares at me, stroking hands over my bechained body and leaving only bare sweaty skin behind. One of his hands is buried in my swiftly unfurling hair, long red strands bursting from between his clenching fingers - aahn, he’s tugging it like I like, too!

I stretch and luxuriate on the cool carpeted floor, and roll on my side to watch myself undo my beautiful husband. His shy cries become loud and lusty and demanding; I watch myself deny him his ejaculation, watch myself grip and tug on his balls at the moment of overwhelming sensation. I watch beads of precome drip and dribble from the hot red tip of his cock; I watch his muscles flex and become soothed and languid again by the thorough ministrations of my many selves. Eventually, I kneel at the side of the bed with a pillow from the closet under my knees.

The many me cajole and tug and maneuver my husband so that his bladder is just resting on the edge of the bed, and his ass is curved up and out to the air, and his legs, well, those I spread myself with the broad stretch of my shoulders.

A hand sneaks up and presses on his Gate of Origin; and his cock wags and flinches with the sensation.

“Ready?”

“Aah, Mab, p-please, please let me come-”

“Mou… no, you’ll come when I say you’re allowed to, Rasputin,” “Aaah♥!”

The penis I’ve been so cruelly neglecting is sensitive along the whole length, of course, but the root of it is especially so. I press deeply into the place where his balls connect to his perineum, tickling, rhythmically pressing, even kneading as more drops of precome ooze out of my Sanji’s cock. His every breath is coming out with a little cry, now; sharp little whimpers and wails of half-thwarted pleasure because I just won’t let him come all the way. I won’t let him come unglued.

I roll the skin of his scrotum between my oily fingers, checking the throbbing firmness of his balls and driving his lust higher and higher. He’s oozing and dripping so much precum now, it’s making my breasts slippery to the touch - the whole of my breasts, not just the valley between them. When I press a thumb to his perineum, I can actually feel him start to cry with lusty pleasure; this, after all, is usually the lead up to me rimming him.

“Sanji, do you still want me to finger you?”

“Aaah- m-m-Mab, ma belle, please, please don’t stop-”

“Sanji, do you want me to finger you or not?”

“Please please please please-”

“Alright,”
I open the bottle of lube, let it warm to my skin, and then press my finger into his asshole. I’m just getting him used to the sensation of being fingered at all; I felt his ass clench at my intrusion before relaxing as the stimulation became pleasurable, not painful. I’m looking for a walnut-shaped (or was it sized?) gland; I know it’s in here somewhere, but not exactly where... maybe if I crook my finger a bit?

The sudden splatter of precome all across my chest and the shrieking wail of an over-pleasured Sanji let me know I’ve got the right spot. I put in a second finger, scissoring them open and shut, stretching out the hole and making that ring of muscles relax, relax, relax. Sanji’s balls jiggle and twitch, and every time they make to jerk close to his body so the come can flow, I grab hold of them and refuse to allow it. Two fingers on his prostate, and a flood of precome coats my chest, my stomach, my hips and my thighs; thank goodness for my other hand, otherwise that would have been come.

Sanji is out and out sobbing with pleasure now; I am laid out so that I’m face to face with him, up on the bed, even as I thoroughly explore the depths and stretchy limits of his ass. My Dollpergangers, bereft of their jobs but unwilling to leave the show, have started masturbating each other, kissing with tongues and teeth, even out and out having sex with each other- some of them electing to rub pussy to pussy, others morphing into my male state and scrubbing against each other- even some hetero couplings furiously bleeding off my excess lust, their maddened thrusting and relieved yelps mere background noise to the provocative squelching of it all.

When Sanji manages to blink the tears away, his eyes rove over me, and me, and me again, enjoying myself with myself. The flush on his face, that perverted smile- tch, someone’s slacking off. I admit, I can put on quite a show; but this is about Sanji, not me.

His eyes lock with mine, what with us being nose to nose, and then they roll back in his head as I add a third finger and gleefully molest his prostate. Fingerfucking, that’s the word; I’m fingerfucking my husband. From the expression on his face, I’d say he’s enjoying every hot, slippery, absurd moment of it.

Saa, that’s a good expression on him; eyes rolled back and curved in a grin, mouth dropped open in overwhelming pleasure, tongue and drool flopping out of his mouth as it all becomes too much for him. I can see the sharpest of his teeth, gleaming clean and white in his mouth; I can hear the gurgles of his moans, from deep in his throat.

Eventually, my own overwhelming lust calms again, and my dollpergangers vanish, leaving me, and me, and Sanji in the bedroom- and, surprisingly, puddles of come and lubricity, where various myselves had various good times.

I sit up on the bed, and move my pussy forwards, even as I press a fourth finger into Sanji’s ass and dig a hand in to tug his hair- and the head attached to those silky golden strands- up, up, up, until his mouth and nose are dead level with my overflowing wet pussy. Sanji blinks away his tears, sucks back his snot, and after glancing up at me- and holding onto his composure by the very skin of his teeth, considering I’m still behind him- lowers his head to eat. I let him, and his tongue, aahn, it’s like pure magic.

I let myself come, biting into his ass to stifle the echoed scream of pleasure because that would certainly break the ward- and Sanji’s moan as I bite into him is not helping but oh, what a feeling to have! What a sweet sound to hear!
Finally, I think it’s time; if he’s not too tired out, I think he’s ready. Baby steps, after all- he’s not ready for a straight on male-on-male encounter, I’d say. But fucking his wife and getting fucked by his wife? He’s already done that; this would just be… slightly more literal.

“Are you okay with this?” I said, as I and I moved Sanji back up onto the bed, his painfully erect cock finding a warm and loving home in my pussy, just like it always wanted. “Because, Rasputin, you could just fuck me-”

“-while I play in your ass-”

“-and that would be just fine. But, if you want-”

“- only if you want-”

“-you could fuck me like you like to, and I could fuck you while you do it,”

“But only if you want to, Razz. ...Do you, want to?”

Sanji- Rasputin- My husband- panted and gasped from the relieving pleasure of finally resting his cock in my pussy. His arms crushed me to him, and his hips quivered with barely restrained lust.

“Mab, please, for the love of all the gods, please let me fuck you. Please fuck me. Please, please please please-”

“Okay. Razz, if it hurts-”

“- or if you don’t like it- ”

“-you have to tell me, so we can stop,”

“ Mabinera, please-! ”

And then, for the first time ever, I press my own hard dick into Sanji’s sweet red asshole, sliding and wet and warm the whole way through. At the same time, I roll my hips up and swallow every last centimeter of Sanji’s cock with my pussy. I dig my fingers into his scalp, even as he tightens his grip around my ribs; I press soft kisses to his mouth, even a few right below his lower lip; and I wrap my arms around his shoulders, press my belly to his spine, feel the bottle-brush fluff of his tail curling and uncurling in confusion and tentative lust against my V-lines.

He’s warm and big and tight and hot, long and supple, hairy and rough and hard in all the places that I want him to be; snarling and panting and crying with a confusing pleasure so alien to him it loops back around to familiar.

I press a kiss into the side of his head; I suckle on his adams apple, pressing kisses to his throat. I do my level best to purr, too, even though I really am crap at it.

Sanji doesn’t move, even as I stroke and cuddle and wait, patiently, for him to do something, say something, even if that something is “no, I don’t like this, stop” and if he does that we will-
And then he thrusts up into my dick and down into my pussy, and my anxiety is rendered quite moot.

Keeping pace in a threesome, even if two of you are actually just you... well, in this case, I let Sanji set the pace. My dick thrusts in countertime to his, ensuring that as he pulls up and out, I'm going down and in; my pussy works like I always work it, making sure that each of his thrusts- gnnngh- meets one of my own, and we draw apart together. Keeping these two rhythms going isn't the easiest thing I've ever done, but oh gods in heaven, aaah, please yes, aaaaah-yes, please, yes, don't stop, don't stop- aaah-

Eventually, the massaging and multiple orgasms force Sanji into lying on top of me, clinging and thrusting his hips- well, grinding, really- in a desperate attempt to get some relief from his burning, lust filled cock. Unfortunately for his poor libido, I know what I'm doing.

He won't be able to come with his cock alone, not tonight; I made sure of that. Poor love; he's trying so desperately too, it's adorable and sweet. I am reminded, once again, that I am not the nice twin. His hips shuddering against mine, his face a mess of snot and blubbering tears... it warms something in the depths of the darkest part of my heart.

"M-mab, ple-he-hease, please let me come-"

"Hmm. Alright,"

And then I fuck him into my pussy and the floor below.

I capture his mouth and his pleasure-born screams, fucking into the wet toothy cave with my tongue. I lock his legs with my own and spread them wide, wide open, so that every burning centimeter of his asshole gets rubbed with my own hot dick. I lock our fingers together, lock our legs together locked together we will never be apart-

I thrust deep and hard and with a distinct rhythm that is nothing like Sanji's own; his little yips and wails start to find a distinct rhythm, even as my hungry mouth swallows them down. I adjust my thrusting angle just a bit- bingo! Got him!

The surge of hot precome that spurts out of my pussy is followed by every last burning hot drop of his come; his shivering balls tight against his body, his thighs shaking with every pulse, my dick steadily grinding out more from him than he ever knew he could give... I want every last drop, you see. Every whimpering spurt, every creamy splatter- all of it belongs in my pussy, and I won't let him get away with keeping back even the smallest trickle of it.

Mine; my husband.

When it's over, we're lying in a puddle of wet sheets and bedding. Sanji is almost fully unconscious, purring relentlessly loud and nuzzling his scruffy cheek against my neck. The backwash of sensation from busting my nut knocked me out cold for long enough that he was able to regain consciousness. Damn.
Oh gods dammit, I forgot the vibrators-

“Pffft-hahahahahahaha-”

“What?”

“Th-thahahahat’s what you get upset about?”

“I wanted to see your reaction to a vibrator, Razz!”

“Pffft-ahahahahahaha-”

As I puff out my cheeks and frown, my husband laughs and giggles. After about three seconds, I can’t help laughing too.

After we changed the bedding with the rest of the extra in the closet, we slept the night through. Like, actually slept for the first time in days; very good, very relaxing. Pressed up against my husband, nuzzled in his arms and safe from every danger… nothing is so relaxing and peaceful, to my mind.

We actually slept in for once; and I finally got to wear clothing that isn’t Court Standard, praise the gods. Plain underwear the color of my skin; black floral lace tights, but no bows- I didn’t like the look of them, so I didn’t add them on; no-show socks and a pair of brown oxfords. Sanji, frankly speaking, covets. I don’t particularly understand it- they’re farmer shoes- but here we are… Sideswept faux bangs pinned with a bee bobby pin, in a working woman style- although, due to the length of my hair, I had to put in an absurd number of braids. Last bit is a tunic dress with buttons at the collar; fluttery and warm, in a slate-black color.

Nmmm, aaah-

“S-sanji, what-?”

“I want to rub one out for you, Mab,”

“E-eh? But- I’m, mmmmm, I’m wearing tights and a dress, a-and, and the ward-”

“C’mon, we can pretend to be teenagers catching a moment to ourselves, right?”

“Ffff-aaah! If you’re going to keep rubbing my wing like that, I don’t see why not- nnnngh-”

“Hmmm. Keep standing up, I’ll catch you if you fall,”

“Hnnnngh-”

“Mm, I always forget how soft and slippery you are here, Mab; your pussy really is a wonderful place,” “Aaah, your fingers-!”

“Haha, do you like it when I press inside of you?”

“Y-yes, aaah, yes I do-”

“Do you like it when I rub around like- this-?”

“AAAhaaaaaahaaaaahmmmmmmnnn-!”

“Mab, I can’t keep doing it if I don’t know you like it-”

“Aaahn, y-yes, yes please keep- aaah!”

My wings are shoved up against his back, and my pussy is gripped firmly in his hand, the tight grip of my clothing in startling, vibrating conflict with the slippery intimacy, I, I- need-

“S-sanji, Sanji please-”

“Hmm. Hands on the desk, please;”

“Fwuah, okay, nnnnn-”

As soon as I’m bent over, Sanji’s rucked up my tunic skirt and pulled my tights and underwear down around my ankles. When he starts pulling my leg up, I protest with-

“Sanji, no, I’ll stretch out my tights!”

“Hm? Okay, but… it’s going to be a lot more intense if I don’t. You sure?”

“Don’t stretch out my ti-I- aaaaaaaaaAAAAAAAH-!”

His cock is so big like this! Aaaah!

Ffffuck she’s tight like this. She’s hotter than normal, too, because of all the clothing; I can see sweat starting to darken her hairline, and her earrings are bouncing in time with her tits. Huh- that’s the vibrator she bought yesterday, the one shaped like a piece of tuna sushi… It’s got a little button on the back, and when I press it, the whole piece of silicone vibrates like nothing else.

Hrm.

Let me just- Aaagh!
Wow!

When I pressed the vibrator to the big slit on her back where her wing comes out- not even directly on the wing- she shoved her ass up and back and came so hard it felt like… like she was out and out milking my dick with her pussy.

Nnngh.

Love my wife; love fucking my wife. I especially love taking her from behind with a mirror in front, so I can see all the weird contortions her face goes through as she comes; and also I get to stroke her wings, which I know for a fact she finds to be deeply intimate and romantic. I…

I won’t lie and say I don’t occasionally find Mab’s wings a little bit icky- I do. The word for it is entomophobia, which is fear of bugs, and I’ve had it almost my entire life. I used to really like bugs, but- no, doesn’t matter. What matters is that those moments when I look at Mab’s wings and feel disgusted- those moments are coming less and less often.

We ended up missing the first half of breakfast, because it feels nice to have sex with my wife and I’m not going to rush a good thing. Mab changed her outfit; instead of lace tights, she’s wearing fleece lined tights in a shade of yellow that sends a curl of masculine pride through me every time I see it.

My wife is wearing my colors after I fucked her so hard she couldn’t walk! She babbled in Faesh and had to redo her makeup for the day because she was crying with pleasure! Yaaaaaaaaaaaah!

I ended up giving Mab my list of notes from yesterday; over an omelette, rice, and spicy cocksaucce, she peruses my notes and makes notes of her own.

From what I can read upside down:

BBC Coffyn is taken care of; the Court provided her information to Nurse Mendy once she was named as Guardian. Mince Coffyn was homeschooled; his parents paperwork should have his scholastic information, along with his medical records.

The real problem, as far as Mab can tell, will be getting a hold of everything Oz will need in the future. She’s going to set Robin on it; she’s got just the right mixture of implacable need for the truth, and unrelenting intimidation.

Luffy and the Juniors are going to have full run of the resort, along with all the Littles. Mab is deeply concerned with letting Luffy be the Responsible Adult, but I take out my own pen and quickly write down that Mark actually is a Responsible Adult, and so can presumably be left with the- no, no, Taffy, leave the money with Taffy.

“Good idea, Razz,”
Nurse Mendy does need wardrobe, but more as a welcoming thing, not as a… Anyway, she’s actually under Chopper in terms of Crew command structure. Pets, gardens- Mark would be best for that, but Usopp can actually handle it better than most would assume. Adult dependants and employees; Franky can handle that.

After that, she just goes through my notes- marking here and there- and then nods, once. I got everything?

“Really?”

“Mm. You’re a responsible adult, Razz; congratulations,”

“Pffit,”

Mab spends the rest of breakfast going over the letters I finished yesterday and quickly rewriting them on much finer paper, sealing them, and addressing them properly. She writes out what must be letters of introduction- one for the Bank, and one for the Post Office. The intro letters are given to Luffy, with the explanation of-

“Captain, if you give this letter with the gold stamp on it to someone in the Bank, they have to join our Crew,”

“Neh, why would that matter?”

“We need an accountant; Banks have accountants. If you see someone you like on your trip to the bank, give them this letter. Got it?”

“Yeah. -neh, do we need a post officer?”

“Hmm?”

“Well, there’s a lot of us now, and some of us like writing letters to people- I do, I mean, and we don’t always remember to get letter writing stuff or put it in the box...”

“Mm. Yes, actually- that’s what this black one is for. Same thing as the gold one, but you have to be absolutely sure about your choice, Captain; they get assignments for life. Also, if you pick someone underage, their teacher has to agree or come with; and if someone has students, they have to come too… and don’t worry about space, Franky actually overbuilt the Sunny; he can handle a much larger crew just fine”

“No problem!”

“Cool. I leave it to you,”

Then, Mab started handing out- files, dossiers, really? Damn- to various members of the Fully Adult portion of our Crew. Luffy gets handed a big ol’ sack of cash money, and a simple note- and when he looks over at Mab quizzically, Mab waits for a particularly noisy bit of chatter to lean close to Luffy and say something important to him.
“Their parents died, and we’re the only adults they have to care for them now. Doing what’s left undone for their parents… Captain Luffy, it is not their concern,”

“…so I’m taking all the kids on an adventure as a distraction?”

“Mm- mini-adventures, we’re going on Adventure-adventures soon enough. Well, and also, they need to gel as a group- even though most of them are siblings, they’ve spent the past five years apart. They love each other, in various ways, but… they aren’t exactly friends. I think some time doing stuff together with you would help,”

“Neh, I get it. I’ll do the recruiting with the kids, actually- so they don’t freak out about our new crewmates, too, right?”

“Sounds good to me, Captain,”

My wife really is kind and loving. I’m lucky to have her as mine.

After breakfast for the next few days, us responsible adults attend to the sad business of folding away the stuffs and parcels of someone’s life. Boxes of clothing with no one to wear- I keep a few certain pieces that buzz loudest to my Memoria- those are the things that have genuine emotion attached to them. A hat that actually belonged to every man in Oz’s family, passed from father to son; a cloak of blue feathers, sized to someone Sancho’s size; a pair of spurs that actually belonged to his mother and… need a refreshment on their enchantments, wow.

That’s it for the Bartoks, aside from some quilts I found in their storage under a very old, yet still strong enough to keep the moths away. They’re nice quilts, really- just need to have a backing, batting, and edge added. I can do that. Actually, this flowery one is in pieces, it’s… not finished. Oh, she had such hope - I can see the shape of her wish for a daughter, and she was so sure she’d be bringing one to the world by the time she finished this quilt...

Ach. It’s sad, that’s what it is.

The Coffyns aren’t much better- most of their shit from the hotel room is contaminated with Cyanide, and so not worth recovering. The only things that make it through are things that can be sanitized; a few kimono and yukata make it through, but the obis are beyond recovery. Jewelry- mostly things for the hair, you know- that makes it through too.

The house, for me at least, is… brutally painful. It’s a nice house, freshly renovations; it still has that new paint smell. The moving company the Coffyns hired had just finished putting all their shit- still boxed up- into the various houses. There was a brand new room, just down the hall from the master bedroom, all painted in white and coral and turquoise, with a crib and a changing station and…

Nami sent me to the Daiso for refreshments; and when I got back, the baby room was all packed up. Franky told me that they were keeping everything in it on Nami’s orders, to save on expenses, and I said that’d be fine- and then I burst into tears.

After Sanji comforted me and helped me calm down, I found another cloak, sized for, eh, a young man maybe? It’s entirely made of peacock feathers, which is only… for… oh dear.

Oh dear oh dear; someone’s up to something. The necklace of teeth- a farspeech focus if I’ve ever seen one, considering the knotwork and the gemstones in the molars- is also a sign… and there it is. Sparrow, sparrow: where do you nest?

Spadey is definitely up to something; the Freebirds and my old Office are intimately intertwined…

It wasn’t all sadness and gloom and the grim detritus of lives cut short, thank the gods- our three Kitchen Kiddoes entered the preliminary rounds of the World’s Worst Baking Contest!

Yeah, that’s still a thing!

Apparently, due to the grisly murder of two of the judges- in reality, taste testers- the contest organizers decided that this year they would implement a new style. They decided that they would use rounds of preliminaries on several different islands around the Line, and the actual contest is to be held on an island yet-to-be-announced. My money is on Germa Kingdom, though, they’ve got the best World-wide broadcasting system.

Picture it: the Alchemist’s Guild Hall had been scrubbed down, but nothing short of replacing every stone could get rid of all the stains. Banners and pennants, specially made for their durability and stain-resistance, turned the grim proto-laboratory into a fairly festive arena. Bleacher-stands had been erected along one side of the long hall, and a stage had been set up on the other, bedecked in small kitchen-stations, each with numbers… but you’ve seen a contest before, haven’t you?

I’ll move on, then.

Picture this, instead: Vinsmoke Deborah, her hair in her normal coiff and bound neatly under a lovely red silk scarf tied in a cute bow at her nape; a creme-white chef coat and a houndstooth skirt, thick with pleats and falling down to her ankles. The very shiny tips of her boots poked out from beneath her skirt; her titanium white apron made her torso long and strange. Deborah stood in a small kitchen-station, reading over a rulebook and carefully considering ingredients.

Mince Coffyn is a different cook and kaboodle. His hair is bound back in a quick, loose braid, fly-aways and dangling tendrils kept in check with a simple green bandana. His chef coat is a hand-me down from Sanji, as his own was ruined in his parent’s murder. It’s meant for a man nearly twice Mince’s height and weight, so doesn’t fit in the slightest; I had to fold it up quite a bit and actually baste-stitch the sleeves in their folds so they wouldn’t get too in the way. His pants were ruined too, so he’s also wearing a skirt- with Deborah’s permission, I turned it into a split skirt, a modernized gladiator affair of four panels. A kilt, perhaps? Mince was carefully examining his implements, and considering the recipe list for this part of the contest.

And finally, Osvaldo Bartok. Oz has pinned his bangs back with a pair of blue barrettes from the Daiso, and is wearing a hoodie and a black pair of jeans under his apron. It’s Osvaldo that opens with the first true astonishment of the preliminaries.
“State your name, please,”

“Osvaldo Bartok; better known to some as Oz, the Great and Terrible,”

“And what will you be baking today?”

“Today-” and his foot broke directly through the stage, sending poor Oz onto his face with a yelp. The crowd laughed; Sanji sat bolt upright with interested attention.

“Au! -I will be baking bread, fuck,”

The crowd laughed again. Sanji told me later that Oz’s choice was considered laughable because most people usually bake sweets. Bread, being so comparatively simple, is usually almost impossible to bake so badly that- ah, right. To be a true Baked Bad, the result of whatever the contestant tries to make must be completely inedible. If the taste tester can taste, chew, swallow, and keep down the contestant’s creation, they’re immediately disqualified. The farther the taste tester gets in their investigation of the Baked Bad, the lower the contestant’s score becomes.

The rules of the contest are fairly easy to understand, but the simplest way to say it is: bake, and do something amazing. Oh, and be sure your baked bad is completely uneatable.

I, personally, was sure that either Oz had a plan, or he was trusting his future to pure luck, which, on our crew, isn’t necessarily the craziest idea ever.

As one of the judges raised their stopwatch, another looked to Oz.

“Mister Bartok, are you ready?”

“I am,“

“Begin!”

Oz sauntered to the shelves of ingredients and began grabbing the things he would need- sugar, flour, salt, a mixing bowl, a measuring cup. He came back to the counter with the sink, not bothering to either rush or dawdle, and set his things out- not haphazardly, but not neatly either. He prepared a few tools- a spatula, a peel, a baking steel. He set his oven so it could reach temperature, the baking steel within. He measured out a handful or so of large-grind maize, presumably for the bottom of the loaf in the oven...

Then, he began to work with his ingredients. He poured water into the measuring cup without looking, added sugar straight from the bag, and then a whole handful of fresh yeast. As he washed his hands- well-

A fell wind blew through the guild hall. It only lasted a few seconds, but it was biting cold and filled with the crackling laughter of a man with a punctured lung and nothing left to lose. The audience, filled with gigglers and chatter, hushed to pure silence and anticipation. Sanji, at my side, tensed even Oz poured the flour into a bowl. The bowl suddenly lurched violently, the scrape it made as it lurched across the counter hitting the air like a gunshot. Oz watched the bowl slowly rock back and forth until it came to a stop, one eyebrow raised high. He measured a cup of milk, and carefully poured it to the flour- and again, the bowl lurched, moving a full handsanp down the counter.

Sanji is out and out wheezing with excitement; I’ve got no idea what’s going on.

Oz watched the bowl. The milk and the flour weren’t curdling, smoking, or doing anything absurd-everything from my vantage point looked the right color. As Oz cracked in eggs, the bowl just kept jumping, like it was trying to go somewhere- and then, a suspicion floated across Oz’s face. When he mixed spices in a small bowl, and dumped the whole thing in, the bowl lurched, screeched on the counter, and shuddered violently.

Oz knew; I could see it in the very set of his face, his eyes, his eyebrows, the curl of his mouth.

He took the measuring cup of unmeasured sugar, water, and yeast.

It had steadily bubbled and spat throughout the mixing bowl’s antics, and from the way Oz strained under it, it must have felt like it weighed nearly all the World. A faint whispering, ‘yakuuuuuuuult’, hissed out with each overly-loud pop of the strange brew. The bowl leaned towards the measuring cup, and Oz visibly began to sweat. Then, he poured it in and ducked beneath the counter.

Nothing happened.

After a moment, Oz rose above the counter and eyed the bowl, confused- and then, a realization!

Oz took the spatula, and began to stir the mixture. It became immediately apparent that stirring the mix was much harder than it should be, as if the dough forming unnaturally fast within didn’t want to move. After a few increasingly hard turns around the bowl, the spatula got stuck. When Oz tried to move it, all he managed was moving the bowl.

He let go and stared at the dough in frustration…

…and then the dough moved.

The dough expanded, the spatula wobbling; it moved and rippled in the dough’s grip until it gently booped Oz in the forehead- and then it reared back and thwacked him across the skull. Oz yelped and stepped backwards. The bowl hopped towards him and swung again. Oz dodged and glared at the dough, fingers twitching. The dough waggled it’s spatula in a clear ‘come at me’ manner.

“Is that right? Well, I’ll happily oblige...” growled Oz as he glanced around his cooking station, before laying hands on the only possible choice- the large wooden pizza peel. Holding it at the ready, Oz grinned a deadly smile, and said “Crumb to think of it, I doubt this will go well… for you ,”
The dough rose and glorped into an oozing approximation of an arm holding the spatula. The approxi-arm swung, and Oz met the attack with a respectable block, the corner of the pizza peel turning to catch an edge of the spatula- but no!

The spatula he chose has no edge to grab! In literally any other circumstance, it would be a fantastic multi-tool! (Hmm, I think it’s an Earlywood flat saute when it’s at home, make a note of that Missus Morgan…)

The clack of wood on wood rang out as Oz dueled his dough; the audience stared on in various kinds of silence. I, personally, was examining Oz’s form; he’s an axe fighter, no mistake about it, I recognized that disarming move he tried right at the start. A pizza peel approximates the shape of an axe well enough for him to not be too thrown off, although the weight distribution is very different...

Oz began to smile as he fought, and I understood why. Although the dough was not unskilled, Oz was simply better; the dough was confined to a bowl, and its weapon had a distinct reach disadvantage over Oz’s. Soon enough, Oz had the upper hand.

The dough swung wildly, hoping to catch him off guard; Oz responded by ducking and then lunging forwards, bringing his peel around in a fast arc. He struck at the base of the spatula, and with a flick, sent it flying into the air. The spatula clattered onto the stage and stuck at an odd angle, the dough on it not removed by mere blunt force.

Oz clacked the base of his peel to the floor and grinned.

“You fought valiantly, and well, but no mere dough can hope to defeat me; now, to the oven with you~”

The dough placed its approxi-arm on the counter and pushed itself over, landing upside down behind the counter with a splat; farside to Oz, nearside to us. Oz furrowed his brow and nearly looked for the bowl before setting his peel in a guard position and backing the hell up.

From behind the counter, the dough rose, expanding and bubbling. Limbs extruded and morphed, now nearly claw-like in consistency, now tangled tentacles oozing and undulating in a perverse mockery of flesh. An approxi-arm splurched onto the countertop and dug furrows into the food-safe surface as the monster rose up, up, up. The dough grew and grew until it stood at least five times the height of Oz.

No- that’s no mere dough!

The Yeast Beast reached up with a massive, rippling arm and removed the bowl from it’s churning head. It stared at the bowl for a second or two, then threw it away to clatter on the stage, staring down at Oz with hollow eyes. Here and there, speckles of crushed peppercorn and onion powder gave texture to the Yeast Beast’s smooth and slightly tacky hide.

I could see in Oz’s face a clear, (and quite frankly, sensible) amount of terror. I could almost hear his thoughts, even- ‘I just had to taunt a Yeast Beast ’- as his knuckles went momentarily white on the handle of his peel.

The Yeast Beast roared, and the crowd gasped.

Flecks of runny ooze and bits of phlegmy dough splattered onto Oz as the Yeast Beast’s mouth stretched wide and cavernous- trying to intimidate. Oz set his stance and relaxed, rather than run, and in that moment his fear became determination-

The Yeast Beast swung a massive approxi-arm down at Oz. Instincts took over and Oz dove-rolled out of the way, the stage where he was standing shattering behind him. Again the creature swung; again Oz dodged. Spotting what must have seemed to him an opening, Oz ran for it- but the beast was too quick!

It’s approximal arm lurched out and snatched Oz’s hood, glomming shut around the loose fabric and yanking Oz off his feet. Oz yelped as the Yeast Beast dragged him back and up, and it was only his flailing with the peel- smacking it into the beast’s head, making it momentarily stagger and relax it’s horrible arm- that allowed him to grab onto the fire extinguisher below the sink.

The Yeast Beast swung Oz high to slam him into the ground, but Oz- clever, clever boy- sprayed the oozing limb swinging him up, turning it to ice, and shattered it with a well timed crack of the body of the fire extinguisher!

Unfortunately, as Oz fell, the Yeast Beast’s tongue shot out, swallowing him whole.

For a moment, it felt like no one in the room breathed.

Had Oz the Great and Terrible just been murdered by his own creation?

Was it all over now?

Then, as the Yeast Beast’s massive body oozed and rippled triumphantly: a shudder. A sparkling frost appeared on it’s lips, and then grew and smeared over every centimeter of it’s horrific body, turning it’s eye-watering undulations into the stillness of marble as carved by a man hopped up on amphetamines and existential horror.

With a scintillating crash, nearly musical- I swear, I heard some kind of scale, maybe two- the frozen Yeast Beast shattered into pieces of indiscriminate size. Some were small as peas- others, larger than Oz’s head. Indeed, that particular piece landed on the counter. It was shaped, frankly speaking, like a very provocative and titillating scene from one of my, ahem, books about massage. Then it crumbled apart- but still, I know what I saw.

Oz himself fell to the ground, landing gracefully, the fire extinguisher held at the ready. With a roll of his shoulders, he stood, and carefully set the extinguisher to one side. He stooped, then, picked up his peel, and walked over to the hanging kitchen towels. Standing with his back to the kitchen, Oz calmly wiped the peel clean.

Behind him, as more and more of the dough in proximity to the oven melted from it’s frozen state, the Yeast Beast started to reform on the counter near the oven, angrier than before. Oz, paying no visible attention to the danger behind him, took a large bottle of olive oil and uncorked it, before leaning his peel upright onto the wall.

Then, moving at a brisk pace, Oz walked over to the not-quite formed Yeast Beast and doused it with the entire bottle of oil. Ducking a probing blow from the Beast, Oz darted back to the peel, set down the oil, and-
Turning as he does-
Peel at the ready-
He beat the dough down.

As the brutal smacking and tooth rattling roars subside, all that remains is a terrific mess, a very floured Oz, and an ominous loaf of dough, ready for the oven.

Oz takes a small sharp knife and cuts a simple ‘Oz’ into the surface of the loaf, then opens the oven.

A wave of heat, like the very fires of hell, briefly wafts over the audience.

Oz scatters his maize over the baking steel, then uses the peel to put the loaf into the oven. He sets a timer, and starts cleaning up his kitchen station; he’s actually fairly good at quickly cleaning, making it quite obvious that not only does this happen to him often, it’s happened often enough that he’s gotten good at dealing with the fallout.

Indeed, Oz has just finished fluffing the last of the flour out of his hair, and repinned the barretts, when the alarm goes off. He took the peel again, and took his loaf of bread out of the oven; and some feature of it alarmed me, though even now I know not what.

He set it out on a kitchen towel I realize now he must have laid out during his cleaning; and then, setting the peel aside, he carefully laid another atop the loaf. He turned the oven off; he wiped down the peel again and hung it up; he took the cooling baking steel out and dusted away the remaining maize-meal. As the oven cooled, a chorus of tortured moans and squeals erupted from it, punctuated by much louder- frenzied, even- chants of ‘yakuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuult!’

The baking steel, at that moment, could no longer withstand the strain of such a Baked Bad; it cracked into two equal pieces, and as Oz dropped them into the garbage, the baking steel broke further.

Oz shrugged.

Then, taking a serrated knife from the knife holder, Oz returned to his loaf, uncovered it, and sliced it into simple slices. With a careful look at the bread for anymore surprises- but no, it’s done. Oz turned to the judges, nodded once, and announced in a clear, ringing voice, “Finished!”

The sound that erupted from the stands was nearly indescribable- for, it was the sound of nearly ten thousand people shutting their jaws at more or less the same time. The next sound, of course, was thunderous cheering and applause, which startled Oz and made his chroma flicker in some of the cutest patterns of embarrassed pride I’ve ever seen.

Sanji and I discussed the round while the judges deliberated; unbeknownst to us, our voices and seats were situated just right enough to pitch to basically the entire hall.

“That was merveilleux! The written play-by-play is truly a paltry substitute for live observation- especially for turnovers like this! Oz the Great and Terrible-”
“He’s a first time competitor, Razz, we can’t expect perfect showmanship- I saw more than a few things happen that could have been simple mistakes… It makes me think he just wasn’t bready for a competition like this,”

“Of course, Honey, he might have no formal training to speak of; but in contests like this, that’s often an advantage. I will say, though, that his very measured pace might be a result of nerves, not lack of speed- and nerves can get the best of us in trouble. His subdoughal technique was excellent, however,”

“I agree, but his overall lack of formality… I’m not sure if that was intentional or not. The musical shattering of the Beast would not have gone quite the same were he not wearing a hoodie- then again, if he weren’t wearing a hoodie, the opportunity to shatter the Beast might not have come at all,”

“True. It depends on the judges, of course; he might get a mark down for that lack of formality… and then again, the judges might find his entire approach very refreshing. I noticed a distinctive Wesern traditional flair to his movements, did you?”

“Oh yes; that particular way he used his peel, right at the start of the dough-el; that’s a very practical move for an axe-fighter, which, as you should be aware, originated in West Blue,“

“Quite, quite. Although, I’m sure he’s going to lose points for how long it took him to subdough the Yeast Beast. Two rounds of kneading, Honey! It’s amateurish!”

“Consider the size of his batch, Razzberry! Even a good lone baker would need at least two rounds to get through all that; only a team could do it in one. This isn’t a team event, and downplaying the sheer amount of work involved in making loaves of that size is simply classist! I won’t stand for it; even zweiback when, it was still wrong! -Now, what do you make of the destruction and fouling of so many of his tools and implements?”

“Well, considering the overall simplicity of his recipe, I normally wouldn’t count them as a deciding factor- but! His spatula, his bowl, his measuring cup, his oven, and his baking steel were ruined in some way during the event. His spatula is actually splintered all the way through- as soon as that dough dissolves, it’s going to fall apart; the same with the bowl, which is shattered. His mixing cup… I’d lay good odds on it imbuing any yeast it’s exposed to with an insatiable bloodlust. You heard the oven, and you saw the steel- normally, it’s much more complicated recipes in this competition that cause such unrestrained damage,”

“Well, you are the expert, I suppose- then again, it’s not over until it’s over; we’ll only know for sure if he’s Baked a Bad when the Taste Tester gives their verdict, Razz,”

“Well, of course- and considering it’s worth half the total score… I just don’t know, Honey,”

“Wait, there they are now-“

The audience cheered as a nervous looking grad student alchemist stepped onto the stage. She looked at Oz, who had put a slice of “bread” onto a small plate with a pair of disposable chopsticks, never actually touching his creation with his bare skin. She walked up to the slice of bread and sniffed it; then, she picked it up and took a bite. Well, she tried; the wince and screech of pain as her teeth sunk into the bread was a good indication of how things were going to go. Eventually, clutching at her jaw, she shook her head and gave the slice a broad lick. Her hair puffed out to twice it’s normal volume, and her face went green and greener and greenest, until finally she turned and lunged for the garbage, vomiting with everything she had.

The crowd roared its approval.

A woozy voice echoed out from the depths of the trashcan; “iff immebibale”, followed by another splattering sound and a low groan.

“How! A numbotongue and a reversal! The bread is completely inedible!”

As Sanji’s joyous shout echoed, the crowd roared in approval again.

“And see- unless that woman regains feeling in her tongue soon, we’ve lost our first taste tester!”

“As I understand, Razz, it’s a crucial job in the contest, and so pays very well indeed—”

“Mm, they’re only allowed to do two testings consecutively, and they have all health and dental expenses paid. Considering what they’ll have to deal with, I am not surprised— ah! The Judges are giving their feelings on the matter— looks like a five, a five, a five, a five… and a four? Quoi?”

“I don’t know Razz; if that wasn’t a perfect score, I don’t want to know what could be. Still, twenty-four out of twenty-five is a very good score— especially right at the start! The only part left is the time score, but Oz will only be judged on that at the end of this competition,”

“Well— it stands to reason that you can’t judge the speed of a competitor without letting the rest compete. Speaking of, here comes the next one!”

The other competitors actually blur together in my memory; the only ones who stood out were my crewmates. Thus, the next one I remember was Deborah.

“Vinsmoke Deborah,” the judge said, “What will you make for us?”

I could actually see Deborah’s concentration break, and the sudden realization of—

“She’s choking,”

“She is. Oh, wait— there she goes—”

“Oh… I’ll, uh, I’ll make… pancakes?”
Deborah looked around the kitchen-station. No stove appeared; only ovens. Pancakes aren’t, technically speaking, baked goods.

“In the, uh, oven?”

Deborah grinned nervously. I sighed.

“Her confidence is a bit...”

“I’m working on it, I know;”

“Still, Razz, an interesting choice;”

“Mm. There’s no reason a pancake can’t be made in the oven- truly, a baked pancake can be quite nice. Still, they’re riddled with hidden pitfalls, and it’s a real test of skill and overall incompetence to get them just right- or in this case, wrong.”

I can see Deborah sweating profusely on stage, pure regret the only expression on her face. As I understand, her plan was actually to make brownies- most of her practice these past few days has been with making brownies. They were awful; I thought she would do quite well.

Then again... if I’m thinking of it right, oven-baked pancakes should just be pancakes baked in an oven, right?

“Miss Vinsmoke? Are you ready?”

She is not.

“I am;”

“Begin!”

Deborah closed her eyes and- peeking occasionally- began to fill a bowl with what could only possibly be pancake ingredients. There might have been flour, and eggs would naturally follow- perhaps some milk? A little sugar, some butter, a dash of nutmeg. In it went. She thinks it went in, anyway- who knows for sure?

Deborah started to enjoy herself; obviously just doing whatever felt right at that moment with her eyes slowly going half open. It was going well- too well, actually, which is why it was such a relief when her Food Luck Magic violently reacted to what she was doing.
With anything else, Deborah is fairly competent, and with some things- like wildflowers and unbutchered meat- she verges right on the edge of criminal genius. (It's a crime to be this good!)

With baking, however, about the best anyone can say is that she’s never actually killed anyone outright.

The batter in the bowl that Deborah had only just started to stir inflated like a balloon and swelled to nearly twice the size of her head. It lifted out of the bowl and began to float away.

It was sufficiently weird enough for Deborah to open her eyes all the way and watch. She set her mixing bowl aside to rest and did so, sighing with frustration as she watched her materiel float up, up, and away. Considering the penalty for starting over, I understood completely.

Then, Deborah noticed that not all of her batter had puffed up and flown the coop; there was still enough left in her bowl to be a pancake. Deborah began to reach for the bowl when she heard a splurt from above; and when she looked up a wad of batter smeared across her face, covering her eyes, ears, nose, and most of her mouth.

She immediately began to flail and scrape at her face, desperate for air, sight, and hearing. Deborah stumbled around the stage as she tried to remove the batter. It stuck to her like burnt eggs to a griddle. She bumped into the counter and knocked the butter to the floor- and then she stepped in it, slid, and fell flat on her back.

Her boots went flying, as did her socks. They landed with a clatter in the drying rack of the kitchen-station’s sink.

Deborah, after scraping the majority of the batter away, stood on eight wobbly legs. She panted after her near-brush with asphyxiation, and then leaned on the counter so she could better grip the batter that had landed there after the batter-bubble popped. She heaved on it furiously, but a line of it was stuck to her forehead and as she yanked, it all came up and smacked her in the head, before sproing-ing away and yanking her head into the counter. Down she went again, this time one of her many legs smacking into her bowl, sending it spinning across the countertop.

It bonked into the ingredient rack, and the jar of spoons above wobbled and tilted. One large spatula slid free, wedged itself between the rack and a sack of flour, and stuck out at a jaunty angle. The bowl kicked up another hitch of spin, and then vibrated against the rack- and the spoon slowly fell down onto the steadily rotating bowl’s rim. If I counted the revolutions right, at about $33 \frac{1}{3}$ rpm…

And then, quite clearly, as Deborah clamped a hand to the counter and dragged herself upright for a third time, there was the sound of a needle touching a record, followed by static.

The audience, which had been laughing at the basic slapstick, went silent. Deborah stopped struggling with the batter still stuck to her, and turned to stare at the spinning bowl. And then…

And then…

And then, her magnificently weird Food Luck showed it’s true nature.

The sound of music began to come from the spinning bowl; sweet music began to play, strings and a harp joined by flutes and then a full orchestra.

Deborah took a step back and slipped. She spun in ever tightening circles, the momentum eventually making it easy to stand on her many legs as she tried to peel her hands away from her battery body. As the music’s tempo increased, so too did Deborah’s oddly graceful spins; as the music rose, so to did the number of slips and slides as Deborah’s many suckers were overcome by the insidious grip of the butter on the floor.

The music crescendoed, and the batter stuck to her hands again- and she spun, and spun, and spun, the batter rising and falling, leaping out in long strings and then back to her, again again again. Beautiful and strange; and as the music finished, the batter poured from her upraised hands and into a completely different bowl.

At no point did she ever put it on the counter.

Deborah’s face was a picture of pure exasperation.

The music began again; a waltz, and now I recognize the music- that’s entirely the wrong order for that ballet! Deborah lowered her arms and stared at the singing bowl, then shook her head. She looked of a mind to stop the music or die trying- but when she tried to step forwards, one of her legs stuck in a puddle of batter. She pulled on her leg, and her whole body moved; her suckers left little scrape marks across the stage. Deborah turned and spun as the various patches of sticky, sticky dough directed how she could move.

The audience began to sway in time to the music and her improvised cooking-dance. Her sisters, who had started to cringe as soon as Deborah walked onstage, began to cheer her on; even as the tone of the music changed and various kitchen objects started to throw themselves at Deborah’s head, her sisters cheered her on.

Deborah skated backwards in circles on two of her left legs. Two of her right legs were attached by strings of batter to the stage; and as she came around again, Deborah tilted her body at a steep angle and pulled hard. She sailed through the air with a massive grin, spun in a complete circle a good four times, and then landed and slid onwards.

The audience cheered.

As the music quickened, Deborah set herself for the big finish.

She skated faster and faster, making her circles tighter and more elegant; she spun, switching from one side of her legs to the other, keeping the switches even as the tempo grew ever faster. Two legs; three legs; five legs; one as she hurdles a large stock pot and several knives. Deborah’s body raised and lowered as she spun in time with the music, here and there adding a flourish of fancy, slippery, footwork- er, legwork. Finally, the music came to it’s dramatic conclusion.

Deborah stood, braced with a large baking sheet, and orbs of batter pelted into where her face would have been. The batter was now covered in butter- don’t ask me how- and no longer sticking to any part of her. Then, in time with the last eight silent beats of the music, Deborah opened the oven, threw the pan inside, and shut the door.

Deborah set the timer, and took the moment of down time to put all her used dishes in the sink, pick up everything that threw itself at her, wipe down her legs, and put her boots back on. The timer chimed brightly; Deborah put on oven mitts, walked over, and took the pancake out.

After letting it rest a moment, she put it on a plate, set out a nice few pieces of flatware, and smiled.

“Done!” she said.
The audience cheered louder than ever; Deborah, flushed bright shrimp-pink, took a graceful bow. As the audience’s joyous roars died off, Sanji and I discussed matters.

“I sincerely doubt that Miss Vinsmoke knew how to make oven-baked pancakes, Honey,”

“Be that as it may, her performance was truly amazing. I, personally, am not sure how much more I can take, and we haven’t even finished the preliminaries yet,”

“Still… I am astonished and flabbergasted that she stumbled on an approximation of the proper method,”

“Seriously, Razz? That’s how you make them?”

“Oh yes- not all the dancing, and so on, but certainly the spinning. It’s the only way to really bring out the flavor; good, or bad, depending on how things go…”

“I’ll… take your word for it- although, we should probably take the taste tester’s word, because it looks like they’re coming round to see how it is…”

The taste tester is another grad student, this one in a significantly rattier… he looks, honestly, like he got his clothes after they were shot through a woodchipper and into a pile of glue, tar, feathers, sequins, and sellotape. He looks, in short, like a grad student in, perhaps, alchemical philosophy—those people wear whatever they can get onto their bodies. From the lost and found, no less- and at an alchemical guild, that’s whatever no one else wants. Alchemists melt their clothing off almost at the same rate they turn gold into much less gold.

He slices a piece of pancake, sniffs it, flinches, and sticks it in his mouth. He starts chewing, and… he’s chewing… and still chewing- I think he’s actually just trying to open his mouth to spit out the pancake, but it’s too sticky.

“And we’ve lost another one,”

“Correct you are, Honey. Now to see the scores- four, three, four, five, and three. Not bad overall-nineteen, and with a good time score, Miss Vinsmoke may be moving on to the first round,”

“Mm. Oho- and here comes the next one…”

And, finally, there was Mince Coffyn. What I didn’t realize until about two seconds after his round? Mince Coffyn is about as fast as I was when I was his age- which is fourteen. In simpler terms, at fourteen, I was as fast as Zoro is right now when he strikes with all his might.

As Mince Coffyn, regional champion- ah, there’s another thing I didn’t know! For the purposes of this contest, the World is divided into about twelve distinct regions- one for each Blue (four), one for each Calm Belt (four), one for each half of the Line (two), and I didn’t know that the Red Line (one) and the Sky (one) counted as their own regions too. The World’s Worst Bakers contest doesn’t actually run through the entire world but once every three years or so; in between the Grand Tourneys, as they’re called, there are smaller contests called Regionals.

Mince Coffyn has been the Regional Champion of Paradise since he was about six years old, which is when he was old enough to enter the contest.

Anyway- when Mince Coffyn took the stage, a full three quarters of the audience- and most of the taste testers- roared with approval.

I could see on Mince’s face a sort of breath-taking self confidence. His competition didn’t matter; his audience didn’t matter; his parent’s murder didn’t matter. All that mattered was him, the stage, and the show he was about to give.

Mince came to a halt in the middle of the kitchen arena, adjusted his bandana, and smiled cheerily at the judges. He flicked his hair, once, for dramatic effect and the audience roared with approval; and then his face settled into an expression of pure determination.

“Looks like someone’s ready to go, Razz,”

“He doesn’t act like it most of the time, but Mister Coffyn is actually extremely competitive, and very very good at what he chooses to compete in, Honey,”

I hummed.

“Mince Coffyn, what will you bake for us today?”

“Raspberry Caves,”

As Mince answered, his whole body lowered into a crouch. His hair bristled, and his tendrils curled completely under his bandana. Pure speed- like calls to like. This should be interesting.

“Mister Coffyn, are you ready?”

“Always,”

“Begin!”

Mince Coffyn leapt into action. The stage was a blur of green as he dashed around it faster than most eyes could follow. Dough splattered and crackled across the stage and sugar across the countertop, which promptly caramelized in a screaming rush of flame. A reddish filling flew into the air and fell back down; as it splattered into the caramelized sugar, the cackling of teenage boys echoed out.

The stage tilted to one side, then the other.

Suddenly, Mince was above the stage, doing a full handstand on his oven. Then he wobbled, tilted, and crashed down into the oven. The rest of the stage collapsed in a cloud of smoke, flour, sugar, and splatters of red sauce.

The oven let out something very like a tortured scream, and Mince lunged to his feet. He grabbed a pair of oven mitts, and as the oven’s scream leaped up into the tortured agony range, it spat out a sheet of cookies. Mince leapt up, caught the hot tray of cookies, and crashed back into the wreckage of the stage.

“Finished! Auuuugh,”

Mince woozily got to his feet again, tray of cookies in one hand and blood oozing from a cut in his eyebrow. He wobbled to the judges, sliding and staggering across the rubble, pausing only to fish out an unbroken plate. He put a cookie on the plate, flung the cookie sheet into the broken oven- which promptly exploded- and collapsed into full unconsciousness.

The audience roared its approval.

As medics picked their way across to rubble to the collapsed Mince Coffyn, Sanji and I discussed what we’d seen- well, in his case, hadn’t seen.

“Merde! He went so fast I couldn’t even tell what he was doing!”

“I could,”

“...Well, Honey, don’t leave me in suspense. Give me the play by play,“

“Hm? Alright- in the sixteen visible seconds of Mince Coffyn’s round in the preliminary of the WWBC- ah, yes, judges, his official time was…?”

The judge holding the stop-watch looks at it, looks at me, and nods, pale and shaking.

I nod back; I thought so.

“Quite; sixteen seconds!”

“Honey, that’s a new record! The old one’s been shattered into teeny tiny itty bitty pieces; it’ll take someone with a lot of time and patience-“
“-and the proper adhesive-”

“-to put it back together again. Sixteen seconds; mon dieu. But- Honey, tell me! What exactly did Mince Coffyn do?!”

“Saa, I’m glad you asked. In Mince Coffyn’s sixteen seconds of baking, these things happened in this order:

“Mince Coffyn leaped into the air. His limbs blurred, but curiously, his head was perfectly still, particularly his bandana. He turned on the sink, stopping the bottom, before ricocheting off the stage floor towards the counter. He flipped a bowl into the air and caught it on his elbow. Ingredients flew through the air as he grabbed onto them one by one and tossed them towards the bowl. His body and elbow moved quickly, catching each falling ingredient in the bowl, causing them to stack up- but not to mix. Mince then leapt into the air and tossed the bowl onto the countertop. The bowl landed and spun, dropping the ingredients onto the countertop around it. At that point, Mince Coffyn smiled; it seems he was confident in the way things were going.

“Mince quickly combined the ingredients into the bowl; he took a spoon and stuck it out in front of himself. Then, he flipped into the air and spun himself rapidly, mostly with abdominal strength. Electric mixers could only dream of spinning that fast; and that’s how the dough splattered everywhere on the stage. Soon, the spoon caught fire; Mince flung the flaming spoon into the sink, turning off the sink as he did so. The spoon landed in the pooled water with a fsssh of doused flame.

“Mince smacked a hand to the counter and shoved himself back towards the rest of his ingredients, leaving his dough to rest. As he rushed over the counter, upside down, he set out another bowl on the countertop. He opened a jar of what appeared to be raspberry jam and flipped it through the air and towards the bowl. The contents of the jar went into the bowl; the jar itself ended up in the sink, with a small assist from Mince’s tendrils. Mince then switched hands on the counter and prepared to arrest his motion; his freed hand reached out and grabbed a bag of powdered sugar. As his motion reversed, he dumped the bag of powdered sugar over the counter, quite a lot of it ending up in the alleged raspberry jam.

“The spoon that landed in the sink had become little more than a slimey husk; as Mince glanced into the sink, he winced. So much for reusing his tool. Instead, he turned his sideways motion into a backflip-ricochet, grabbed a spatula, and leapt back towards the bowl of filling. Beneath his feet, the stage began to crackle with fatigue.

“Once Mince was done stirring the filling, he scraped the spatula on the side of the bowl to try and clean it a little. He then threw the spatula into the sink with a musical crash,”

“Holy shit, Honey,”

“Ain’t nobody can catch these eyes a-creepin’, Razz. -Mince then paused, and took in the rapidly deteriorating condition of the stage, which at this point was heavily dusted with powdered sugar and crumbling bits of dough. Mince grinned, and began to move again.

“Mince grabbed a pinch of dough and smacked it into the baking sheet. He repeated this fifteen more times, pressing his thumb into the center of each ball of dough. He then reached for the bowl of jam, and it slipped out of his buttery fingers. He reached again, and the bowl began to spin on the counter as it slipped out of his fingers again. He reached with both hands, but to no avail- the bowl began to spin faster. Mince got frustrated, and was soon using his forearms, thankfully unbuttered, to grab the spinning bowl. This worked- he was able to grasp the bowl with his forearms. Unfortunately, he neglected to account for the inertia of the jam in the bowl, and it all went flying.
“Mince yelped, darted back then forwards, and grabbed his tray of pressed cookies. He positioned the tray under the falling filling. Raspberry jam fell like rain. Some of the filling landed directly on his tendrils, making him shudder from either the sensation or the flavor. He flicked his hair, sending some of the filling flying, and nearly slipped on the filling that landed on the floor. He then leapt backwards and lunged towards the oven, the stage floor shattering underneath his feet.

“In his dash towards the oven, one of the bolts holding the stage together vaporized under the strain. The stage tilted, first away from the area of largest damage- the assembly area- and then, as that area broke apart, away from the area of largest weight- the oven area, where Mince, the cookies, and the oven were. Mince bounded up the tilting stage, hair streaming behind him and skin blanching from the effects of the filling, before he managed to get to the oven.

“Another bolt vaporized, and the entire stage began to break apart; a chasm opened between Mince and the oven. He leapt and was able to grab hold of the oven, flipping up onto the oven-top and slid the door open. The tray was moved and flipped as Mince lowered his hand and tried to figure out how to place it in the oven from that angle without spilling or burning himself.

“The stage came together for one last gasp.

“Mince flipped up onto both hands as he stuck the cookies into the oven, set the timer, and placed both hands flat on the oven-top. He held perfectly still in a handstand for a good half second- which was just long enough for his sick stunt to very nearly rebalance the entire stage. Unfortunately, the filling on his tendrils had done its work too well, and he wobbled, sending the whole unstable card-castle crashing down.

“We all saw the rest- and there’s the taste tester!”

The taste tester is actually one of the TA’s for the Alchemist Guild. Gender? Indiscriminate. Age? Unknown.

“Well, I trust your eyes to see what happens- if that’s what happened, then that’s what happened. I must say, I’m equal parts amazed and confused that Mister Coffyn was able to do all of that in sixteen seconds, Honey,”

“Well, Razz, it’s really just a matter of proper nutrition and practice; I could do something very similar at his age, although it involved folding clothing, not baking cookies...”

“That surprises me, but shouldn’t. Zut! With the cookies done, it’s time for the taste test!”

“Quite!”

The taste tester slowly made their way over to the insensate Mince Coffyn. Mince was being checked over by a very focused Chopper, who was not seeing all the appreciative looks being thrown his way from the female medics he’d lunged in front of.

The taste tester lifted one of the cookies and bit into it. Their eyes opened wide, and they began to scream. They then lunged for the rubble and began to dig through it in an terrific frenzy, until at last they found the remains of a carton of milk. Without fanfare or explanation, they poured what remained into their mouth, fell over onto their back, and coughed once. A plume of smoke, pungent and chanting in a sibilant unintelligible accent, rose from their mouth and dissipated with a sound not unlike being laughed at by a laying hen.

“Inedible! But- Honey, what happened?”

“I thought so- I was suspicious of the raspberry jam from the start. It’s just a bit too early in the season for that berry, and more importantly for this case, the jam was entirely the wrong color. That wasn’t raspberry jam- that was pepper chutney!”

“Quoi?!?”

“Cínte! It was a Pumpkin Hill specialty, that sacred fire-sauce PeppOW Chutney! The nuns who make it practice Asura style kung fu, making them angry and extra dangerous by equal measure; and it’s said that all the powers of naughtiness and ferocity make each drop of that cruel sauce the hottest hot-sauce drop there ever was. That stuff’s made from near one hundred percent Assburn Hellpepper, which is normally used in Sea King repellent,”

“Holy fucking shit,”

“Mn. I tried it once; it tastes like regret and fear. Saa, the judges are scoring- five, four, four, five, and four! Twenty two, and a five in speed, I guarantee it- making that a total of twenty seven!”

“Mince Coffyn is moving on for sure- any word about if he’s permanently injured?”

“Considering he got basically Sea King repellent on his very sensitive tendrils, I’ll be very surprised if he wakes up within the next three days,”

One of the judges waved for silence.

“Thank you. I will now give the names of the top three competitors that will be moving on to the next round. In third place, with a combined score of twenty-five points, Miss Deborah Vinsmoke! In second place, with twenty-six points, Mister Osvaldo Bartok! And in first place, with a combined score of twenty-seven, Mince Coffyn! Let’s hear it for our competitors!”

The audience cheered in approval; the three winners of this round of competition bowed- er, well, Mince rallied long enough to flop upright and fire off a salute before immediately collapsing again, much to Chopper’s aggravation. Deborah, blushing bright red, bowed carefully. Oz took an elegant bow, before immediately wobbling as he sneezed flour out of his nose.

The judges and competitors left the broken remains of the stage, some of them on stretchers- Chopper just carried Mince, as he wasn’t actually injured, per say- and a cleanup crew of student Alchemists led by at least one full Alchemist each began working on safely bagging, tagging, and clearing away the ruin left behind. Some of the things created this day will be objects of further study, I know it…

“Well, Honey, that’s the preliminary round of the World’s Worst Baker’s Contest. I must say, I’ve had a marvelous time, and sincerely look forwards to the next round of thrills, chills, and wonderments,” “Mm. I’d be delighted to accompany you to the next round, Razz… although, I don’t know where that is…?”

“Ah! It says here on the program that the next round is in six months time, in Dressrosa,”

“I assume to let the competitors recover from their wounds, as well as familiarize themselves with whichever recipes are standard for the competition,” “Indeed, Honey. It’s always a surprise, too- not only what the contest organizers choose to give each competitor, but how those competitors will Bake their Bads,”

“I do enjoy a good surprise, Razz!”

“As do we all, Honey; as do we all,”

I said that, and immediately regretted it, because Captain got his Accountant and his Mail Officer and, uh. The Accountant wasn’t so bad- one mid-ranking junior banker, and his two assistants; one is his Computer- she’s fairly pleasant, actually-, the other is his Archivist- she works part time at a sweets shop, which pleased Sanji quite a bit, he’s been wanting more kitchen crew- and, as the archivist has a younger sister who is in her care, one tag-along. Fine, no problem. That’s four peoplewoo.

The Mail Officer was a squad leader for the Local Territory- meaning, they were in charge of basically the entire city’s mail? The city of about fifty-thousand people, I mean.

So there’s them, their support staff, their flyers, and their sorters. Oh, and their mascot.

That’s twenty-six people and a large emerald tree boa named Winston.

Captain took the entire Post Office because he wanted their Most Senior Post Officer on his crew, and the rest of the Office followed their Pointe.

And we had to leave the day after the contest, which was the day Luffy gave the Post Office group to decide their fate. You ever try to load enough supplies before going to a contest for possibly sixty or so people, without knowing if your going to have sixty or so people? Because I have. It fucking sucks.

Gods dammit Luffy.
“Mab, seriously, calm your tits-”

“Captain, my tits have never been calmer or more at peace. The left one is named Sitthartha Buddha and the right one is Vardhamana Mahavira and together, at this moment, they are lactating a veritable font of peace and understanding. It’s the rest of me that’s pissed- not because of any fault with our newly expanded crew, no, but because we could have delayed a little longer and given the new crewmates some safer practice in the actual business of sailing. This is unacceptable,”

I am glaring at my Captain over the sail in my hands. I am carefully feeling the structural integrity of the sail, which will determine if I patch, or salvage for other use.

Pressed up against the wall, with varying degrees of injury, are crewmates of mine- some new, some not. They are being attended by our new, erm, “Nurse”, Sawbones.

Nurse Bones “Sawbones” M’coy has mauve hair and milk-pale skin- from a lack of healthful sunshine, not actual paleness. Although it might be anemia… She’s sleepy eyed, and wears a pair of real dragonfly wings tucked into her hair as decoration. Plum skirt, white shirt, boots, and a ghost dogfish named Callie. Dark makeup and a necklace of bottle caps; and at her side, in its own carrying belt, a large jar full of squirming, writhing leeches.

(Callie the Ghostfish gets along great with Buttercream, Bubbler, and Pearblossom, which is a good thing. No dog left behind.)

She has been putting leeches on people’s injuries- no one can quite stop her, her movements are too erratic and her hands are too quick. Even Nami got a leech, which… okay, yes, giving blood forces the body to make new blood, which is easier on all the plumbing, but… I have a specially bred leech on my left shoulder. Why?

Well.

Nurse Sawbones believes, very firmly, in the healthful applications of a good leech. I know this because she hasn’t stopped talking about their healthful qualities and adorable features at all as she’s been applying them to the various bruises and some few breaks most of us have. Even Luffy has a leech suckling on the bridge of his nose, because Nami caught him with a straight jab and broke it but good.

Chopper taped it up; and then Nurse Sawbones got him with a leech.

“But- but Mab, it all worked out fine! We got out of harbor,”

“I tell you what, there’s nothing better and more wholesome than a good hungry leech for sickness-”

“Three of our new crewmates don’t know anything about sailing, Captain-”

“-these lil’ fellas are the closest thing to a cure-all you’ll ever find, y’know-”
“-our new Nurses believe in leeches and crystal healing and walking it off-”

“-small, easy to care for, and they don’t ask for nothing but love and a clean bit of water to swim in, y’see?”

Out of the corner of my eye, I watch an increasingly horrified Chopper and Genny and a deeply resigned Jun Kwan, as Sawbones sticks her hand fully into the roiling jar of slimy blackness at her hip. She pulls her hand out and starts pulling off leeches, holding them to the worst of the bruises on Zoro. The leeches attach.

Zoro, with an expression of deeply stoic resignation, sticks his bruised arm out for better access.

“Why, I use them every day and the last time I was even slightly ill was six years ago, and that’s a fact!”

“How are you not passing out from blood loss?”

“Y’know, lots’a people ask me that, Doctor Chopper, and I’ll tell ya- I dunno. I mean, I always thought it was silly, passing out from blood-loss due to leeches, but… I think that only happens with wild leeches, not my medical sweeties. I do know my bad cholesterol went down, and my blood-pressure’s never been better-”

“Really? Did you keep notes about your use of leeches, or…?”

“A’course I did, Doc! Proper documentation’s half the point of science!”

I carefully turn and stare at the disgusting display, ignoring the leech on Luffy’s face. It’s a good thing I haven’t had lunch yet, my stomach has nothing to lose. I’m even remembering to keep my eyes on Luffy’s, so I don’t have to watch the one on his face inflate.

“Okay, so the leech thing is weird-”

“No, really?”

“But your bruise is already smaller, Mab!”

“Mhm. Yep. Tiffany?”

“Yeah?”

“Alright?”

“Uuh- I’m running low on water, and the rope is starting to fray, but otherwise I’m good,”

“Great! Precious! Daily! Take rope and relieve Tiffany, so she can reaquate her broom,”

“On it!”
“Yes, right away!”

Theophania Strideways, Tiffany for short, is stunningly beautiful. The shape of her face, the ratio of her eyes to her nose to her mouth, and where they’re situated on her face—she’s stunning. I can also tell from her hands and neck that about the only places left on her skin that aren’t visibly tattooed are possibly her face, and her breasts. Pretty much everything else is covered in some pretty fresh art, I have to say. Considering it’s winter, and she’s a Post Officer, her outfits are a number of thick sweaters, jeans in various colors other than blue—mostly brown and black—and a thick, comfortable looking beanie.

She rides an artisanal broom I’m fairly certain she made herself; it’s got enough crystals and such strapped on, it’d have to be. Her broom has a thick braid of grass on either side, signifying it’s heavy-lifting capabilities. This is good, because today’s fracas broke the upright rigging of our foremast, which also fucked up the running rigging of our lateen sail.

Things got a little hairy for a second; thankfully, Bryony grabbed the mast with her lasso. This meant that, even though the upright rigging of our mast was gone, the mast itself was not unsupported. It did, however, shred the sails.

After quite a bit of shouting, Taffy got the ship to full stop, and we immediately began working on repairs. I’m in charge of getting the old sail off, the new sail on, and making sure the standing rigging is redone properly because, somehow, I’m one of the only people on our crew that’s ever, ever, done it properly.

I immediately put our flyers to work, each with lines, and their jobs were to quickly and carefully use their ropes to support the mast itself, and to lower the sails down on their spars so I can repair, or in this case, replace it.

“Sail’s no good; we need to replace it. Beatrix!”

“Boss!”

“Go get the spare foresails- all three of them!”

“Right!”

And Beatrix runs off.

As Jun “Precious” Takara-Goldstein and Dolores “Daily” Davenport Mackentry the Fourth kick off into the air, I ruminate on what’s going to have to happen next.

Jun “Precious” Takara-Goldstein is Tiffany’s best friend, occasional lover, and SiC from the Post Office. He has hair like blue flames and ashes, a green-sprouted broom, a teakettle full of sprout-like spell fetishes, a thick blue scarf with black shorts and a grey crop-top. He’s not quite dressed for the weather, but considering his hair occasionally moves like fire, I’d bet good money that he’s not worried about the cold.

He brought almost nothing with him - none of the Postal Workers did, really. I imagine it’s part of their doctrine - bring what you need, and nothing more - but... I have more than enough space to give them all full wardrobes, and Franky really did overbuild our ship. There are at least a hundred empty lockers that I know of in the dorms, hidden for now because they were not needed - there is a full hall in the bowels of our ship, ready to be partitioned and appointed. I don’t quite have enough bedding to furnish everything and also have changes for laundry duty - but I’m working on it. It’ll be ready by next laundry day.

Greensprout brooms are best at acceleration, though Precious’ lifting capacity is no small matter either; as he flies up, the coiled rope where his pot of spells would normally be, I can see all the muscles in his legs and back straining, keeping his broom from bolting off without him. Then, I can see the reason he’s second in command, or was - he and Tiffany move like two parts of the same whole thing. And, as Tiffany drops down to attend her broom, Precious accounts for Daily’s quirks; as expected, of Tiffany’s right hand.

Dolores “Daily” Davenport Mackentry the Fourth is about as far as you could get from the rest of us without actually becoming someone like me, and thus looping back around. Highly educated, driven, already achieved her goal, whatever it may be... She’s low nobility, a family that either lost all their money within the past three generations, or never had much to begin with - noble titles, and maybe a line that keeps producing heroes, or someone married well and the dividends kept dividing. She’s almost completely improperly dressed for sailing, or flying - I say almost because there are a lovely pair of shorts beneath her frilly skirt, which is something at least.

Her hair is long and brown and elegantly curled, and she wears a pale pink hat with silk flowers on the brim. Purple riding gloves, a sky blue flying dress, brown leather boots with three buckles up her calves, royal blue spell-belt with various spells and fetishes attached, a teal crossbody bag, metal bird earrings and a metal amulet shaped like a fish necklace. Her outfit is either carefully calculated, or she has a natural eye - no item is of particularly high or low quality save her boots, which are almost definitely heirlooms. It’s fairly simple to change the buckles on a boot, that it may keep up with current fashions; silk flowers can be changed out, because her hat is of finer make too. Her voice is... she has the same accent as I do, but not like she learned it at pain of a switch to the knuckles; she has her accent by virtue of it being the accent of her entire family.

Her broom is actually just like Genny’s was before she crashed it to splinters - one of the very nice Cloudskipper models, meant for relaxing flights and graceful landings. Take some of the safeties off, and you’ll soon realize there’s a jetstream bean in that broom, which is more than enough to handle the job at hand - that is, supporting the foremast until the rigging is reapplied.

I cannot use my wings to do this, I use too much air; I’ll... hm.

“Fern!”

“Yes!”

“You still wanna see what a mage enchanting an object is like?”

“Yes!”
“C’mere then- you’ll need your full attention,”

“Right away!”

And here she comes, neatly avoiding Mack (Nautilus “Mack” Mackery, Archivist; one of the ones who admitted to knowing blast-and-all about sailing, and has been assisting in the kitchen as a drudge and gofer since we set sail, bless him. Massive pink and red plaid scarf; blue long sleeve shirt; thick black hair in no real style; dishallible plum purple suit of crushed velvet that’s meant for either a shorter or younger man, because it fits his shoulders and not his legs and he’s got the look of a man about to hit a serious growth-spurt; spectator shoes and blue-black socks and freckles on his red brown skin like literal specks of gold,) who is carrying a large tray of blood-strengthening food to the Leeched individuals. Mack’s actually taking to sailing much better than the rest, and seems to derive a great deal of pleasure just watching the various antics of our crew.

Fern dances around Bang (Shirako “Bang” Bhangbhangdhuc, Mack’s assistant Archivist; he’s been taking inventory of the Library so we can actually organize and shelve the damn thing, it’s starting to be a real mess. Thick flannel scarf of such age and staining it’s turned entirely brown, and no scrap or speck of the original color remains; a massive backpack filled with… you know, no one will actually say? Except he only put it down once he was assured that no one would ever go through his locker unless he physically died… white safety boots, sheer grey tights, black pencil skirt, a brown bomber jacket over a red star tee; his hair is cropped very short, and his hat could be mistaken for a fedora because there’s a persistent and very deep crease in the crown. Also, there are enamel pins I know for a fact are from musical concerts- that’s Stabby Crabu, Jonah and the Magpies; Dead Fish Live; some of them are on his hat, and some of them are on his bag… Yumigami Unbound, Tres Fleur, The Bleed… and even more that I don’t know, but he’s made a fast friend of Bryony, so I won’t worry about it,) who is helping Mono and Jun hold down Zelda, who does not want any leeches, thank you.

Yulila “Mono” Dextro, Potioneer; he makes most of the active spells the various Postal Witches on our crew carry. Missing an eye, but the other one from Zoro- also, he’s fairly clumsy, and keeps the majority of his spell fetishes on his hat. I think because it’s easier to keep them there, rather than somewhere he could easily bleed on?

Red sneakers and grey socks; long legs covered over in sticky plasters of many colors; blue denim shorts folded over short-short; a black and white raglan but in the opposite orientation one would expect, a note of humor on a fairly dour man; a thick red cloak with a fine collar and deep pockets full of dried herb fetishes.

He has silver hair and sharp eyes, and one of the sternest resting murderfaces I’ve ever seen; and so far I’ve only seen him wearing the one eye-patch, though he might like more...

Jun Kunwan, Medic; very calm, very gentle, basically an Auxiliary because he has next to no actual medical training- he can follow directions, but that’s about it. Much better at distilling, frankly, which makes nearly no sense, but there we are. Also, he’s significantly stronger than he looks.

Black and white spectator shoes, black silk socks, high-waisted woolen trousers and a brown belt; red turtleneck jumper under a grey chiffon cardigan of loose fit and thigh length. Blue denim backpack with floral pattern and leather seams and straps; half-worn out rabbit plush, no judgement; an amulet of dangling crystals around his neck. Pink mimosa flowers woven into a pair of hair combs, stuck in on both sides of his head; round lens glasses on an oval face, thick browed and soft eyed, coral pink lips under a snubbed nose set wide.

That face is currently set in a fearsome grimace, because Zelda is strong as three men.

Zelda Habar; Mono’s assistant. You know how sometimes you make a friend and you have no idea how, or even why you’re still friends because you’ve got nothing in common and next to no mutual interests? Yeah, I have the distinct feeling that Zelda’s hiring was due to some mix-up in adverts, probably Mono’s ad ending up next to a “we’re hiring” ad for a bakery or a toy store.

She’s basically every maid-fantasy involving a Mink come to life. Glasses. Long, soft hair. Short skirts. Dainty feet. Giant bear paws. No? Might just be me.

Grey mary-jane shoes, pink striped socks, and kiss-pink pumpkin pants under a petal pink overall dress; thick grey turtleneck with straps gently clinging between her paw pads. Black eyes, pink flush on her raging cheeks, cute little ears that are pinned fully back to her skull and a pink cloche hat with a honey-yellow lining is on the deck. As Nurse Sawbones approaches with a bounty of leeches, Zelda’s very upset flailings become hysterical strength, and all three men are flung from her body.

She then bolts, Nurse Sawbones in hot pursuit. Bang, Mono, and Jun lay groaning where Zelda flung them.

Oh, Fern’s here.

“So, Fern; this is a basic rite that every branch of the magic-user’s tree figures out eventually. Witches trend towards wands; Wizards to staffs; Mages to whatever works for them. You’re following my path more closely than you think; I was fifteen before I got formal instruction in magic of any kind,”

“Ah! So I’m not super duper behind, then?”

“Nah; you’re doing great on the mathemagic primers, and as I understand you’ve started reading the Nine Primagicals?”

“Yeah; I can’t make heads or tails of the Illusion one, though,”

“I’m not surprised; every mage has to give up one of the schools to specialize in any of the others, and you’ve specialized in Divination for years now. You’ve seen me pull stuff out of my bag-”

“-things that absolutely couldn’t have fit normally? Yeah, I know it’s not technically magic, it doesn’t feel right-”

“-Yeah, that’s my Devil F-ruit? I think you’d say it?”

“Yeah,”

“Yeah; My magic, on the other wing, feels like this,”
And I breathe in and pulse my magic for a moment.

Fern stands bolt upright and is immediately much more alert and interested in what’s about to happen. Beatrix, who has returned with the sails in a careful stack, nearly drops them when she stops next to her sister. Above, the hovering Precious and Daily bobble on their brooms; Tiffany, filling her broom’s bottle from the hose, yelps in shock.

Bang, Jun, and Mono all sit bolt upright and stare at me; Nurse Sawbones, who has subdued Zelda and is carefully applying leeches to her horribly bruised back, shudders. Zelda, crying underneath her, pauses and stares my way- the shock of my power overcoming her instinctual horror.

Ailbe, Bura, Lucille, the Flight crew, and the Sorting crew all gather around, joining Beatrix and Fern who have decided to sit at my feet. And Captain, being Captain, is right there with them, eyes gleaming with excitement.

I blink placidly, and allow my power to settle down again; closer to the surface but softer, not so insistent.

Ailbe (pronounced Alvah) Tonn, Basecommand; she coordinates Flyers with Sorters, and ensures that everyone off-base is in tune with everyone on base. She’s also a fifth-dan practitioner of Fishman Karate, as evidenced by her billowing water-cloak.

Terracotta brown skin, brown ankle boots, white chiffon skirt with narrow pleats ironed in; soft red blouse in thick weight silk; and that billowing chiffon, called water-silk, draped on her like a cloak of living water. Curly blue hair, with white spray at the ends; square-curve glasses and in her hands, a steaming cup of… coffee? Adelaide is either in love with her or wants to be her; one of the two.

Bura Kada Bura, Basecom Assistant; if Ailbe is the Heavy, Bura is the Face. And really, at the end of the day, every method of communication relies on crystals resonating with each other; having a crystal witch at hand is probably a good plan.

Blonde hair dipped in blue to ombre; striped modernist swimsuit with a skirt so that in the air it could be a slippery dress; black strappy sandals like Nami used to wear; and a number of crystalline bracelets with various spells dug into their crystals. She’s a fishwoman- I think- but she can just about pass for lanjin, aside from her outright ignoring the temperature. We’re nearly outside the interdiction weather zone imposed by the island, and the temperature has gone from slightly frosty spring to the icicle teeth of deep winter. I’ve been getting all of our scarves, touks, arm-warmers, leg-warmers, socks, coats, jackets, and other warming apparel ready for when things go to sub-freezing. Bura has been dodging my attempts to get her measurements, I think because she thinks she can handle cold air. The thing is, she sleeps in the aquarium, with the horses; and she cannot handle the transition from the warm aquarium to the cold air, not as it gets colder.

Lucille Starbrite, PR Assistant; sweet kid, slightly more sensible at the expense of her fashionability. Soft blue boots, pink and black striped socks, soft blue smock dress under a high-cut kirtle of fluttering lavender; a teal surcoat with split tails and elbow-length sleeves, mandarin collar, and Long-Arm style toggle buttons in alternating hearts and stars. A thin blue belt holds it all close to her skin; thinner blue bangles adorn her wrists; big round glasses on a happy face, thick wavy brown hair braided back and tied with a blue ribbon at the end; and a lavender-blue hat with a jaunty brim and a curling crown.

Honestly, I think it’s just looking at Lucille next to Daily that makes her seem less fashionable- her fashionability is a matter of style, not actual fashion. Their styles are very different; Daily’s a fluffruffle, and Lucille’s a chajo. I will say though, that the heart-shaped amulet at the end of her hat is quite fetching; really ties her whole outfit together.

Hm. Wasn’t expecting quite that reaction, but… Welp.

“Magic is a funny thing, Beatrix, Fern; some people just say it’s haki and leave it at that. Those people aren’t mages; they might be witches or wizards exasperated by questioning, but they definitely aren’t mages. What a mage does is... Science is a way of talking about the universe in words that bind it to a common reality. Magic is a method of talking to the universe in words that it cannot ignore. The two are rarely compatible; mathemagic, the study of the mage, gets around the problem by being both the description and the thing being described at the same time. Thus, at the core, the mage both writes and abides by the Laws of the World,”

“Laws...?”

“Well, I’m sure you’ve discovered by now- Magic isn’t just magic; it’s a thing with rules to it, like anything else. You can’t throw a punch with your thumb inside your fingers; you can’t put a heat spell on a goblet that’s full of a liquid; death cannot be undone; food cannot be uneaten, and so on,”

“Ah,”

“...”

“...Heavy things do not float easily, and if they do, it means something else just got all the weight applied to it,”

“Mm. Collapse any buildings?”

“Once,”

“Mhm. Mine was explosions- they go out, not in; that poor woodshed never was quite the same… Anyway. I haven’t had a particular fetish set since my school days, simply because when I mastered spear fighting, I discovered it made a good enough focus for my purposes. However, since more than half of us are heavily injured, sick, and in various ways, incompetent at sailing, I have need of a much finer focus. Not the finest I can use- that’d be overkill in this case,”

“...What’s the finest you can use?”

“A lace fan, but that’s really for flesh-shaping, not for what I’m about to do here. Observe,”

And then, with a flick of my hand and a Shadow Pulse, the things I need appear; a telescopic stem of adam-wood, thin wooden spokes, heavy-wear double waxed thread, thread-fine wire in adamant-gold and verdant-copper; a strange silver ring, and a pretty piece of lace. Maybe a loop for easy carrying? No, that looks bad- but then again, I do have the space… One small loop of leather, neatly knotted. Then, another loop of leather, white with a snap keeping them together… The basic bitch ward kit I put together at the Daiso, brown bottles for spells, a star prism… and that should do it.

“Girls. You’re not to do this without proving, to me, that you can do the equations required- or without the supervision of one of our senior witch or wizard crewmates. This isn’t dangerous to you, per say- about the worst that can happen to you is a stonking headache and a distinctive lack of components- but it can be very, very explosive. What’s my rule about explosions?”

“Not on the ship unless we’re sparring!”

“Damn right. This spell can be found in the last chapter of the Universum Primagical; and though most people would start there, I found it’s best to start and finish with the Universum. Some insights only appear after a well of knowledge has been dug. -Oh, should I copy them, do you think?”

“…Uh. Dunno, Boss; I haven’t had any trouble so far, but I’m mostly reading geometry texts right now…”

“We’ve got rather a lot more witches and wizards and mages on the crew, now, and I’d rather nip fights in the bud, Stitchkid. What say you, Fern?”

“…Do the Universum first; then, do the others at need, don’t just do all of them. Some of the Primagicals will be very dangerous in the wrong hands, and it’s easy to misplace a book,”

“Alright. This is the spell circle I will be using- if you are within it, please remove yourself before I lay out the salt. Thank you.”

I said this as I used my Shadow to mark out the spell circle. The Girls darted out of the circle, and the other magicians carefully shuffled away; I waited until they were well clear.

Then I sighed.

“Luffy, I know you’re excited, but you can’t be in the circle while I do this, it won’t work,”

“But you hardly ever do your Mystery Thing!”

“I know,”

“…fine…”

“Thank you~”

I carefully turn in a circle as Luffy walked away, because checking is a safety precaution, and then- it’s time. Sugar-salt down; take a stance; pulse.

Deep breath in.
Incantus time.

-Every magic user has an incantus. Think of it like a trigger or a catchphrase that makes magic… not easier to use, but if it were thread, the thread would be less grabby when you’re trying to put it through the eye of the needle, if that makes sense. It makes it easier to thread your magic through the needle’s eye of a spell, I mean to say. Or really, I mean to say: it’s a focusing technique… and it’s a magical thing too, in and of itself.

Incanti get passed down from teacher to student, so you’ll get things like Bibbidi-bobbidi-boo and Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious. However, if you don’t specialize your magical school, you have to make one up. Like I did. And if you have to make one up… let’s just say that chanting in tongues is more common than most people think.

“Abracafuckyou alakashit,”

…I never said my Incantus was particularly, um, politically correct. The loud squawk of outrage from Daily and the bark of laughter from Precious make me think that I’m… probably not going to be able to pass my Incantus on to anyone except my student. Ah well.

At least I have an umbrella now. Might be a parasol- but no, it’d be a parasol if I’d made a lace fan, it’s an umbrella. Sturdy, frilly, three whole sizes to it just like I wanted- and more than enough to be getting on with things.

“Alakashit!”

The ship shivers as ropes untangle themselves; the foresails that Beatrix brought leap for their spars, and are soon raised up high; the standing rigging for the mast lashes itself properly, loop after loop of rope tightening properly in rings of brass.

I, having snapped my umbrella open during the working of my magic, give the entire thing a jaunty spin. Then I close it, spinning it around my wrist before tossing it’s massive length up- and catching the pocket version, which will fit easily alongside or even in most cross-body purses. Nice.

“SO COOL!” scream Luffy, Fern, Beatrix, the Flyers, and the Sorters- and Neo’s little sister? Damn, when did she get here…?

Neopolitan’s little sister, Bastani Havij, is about… twelve or so, I’d say. Pink winter boots, crisp white jeans with stars on the knee and a high tight waist; yellow pastel striped sleeveless shirt and a pink letterman jacket. Star earrings, pigtails up high, and skin just a little paler than her sister’s. She’s a good kid, but also… not sheltered, exactly. She’s an oddball, certainly- not super athletic, but not driven towards any one thing, either. And her hands have marks of someone who makes things- I’m not sure what, yet, but I know she makes something. She had a large trunk with “FRAGILE” and “THIS WAY UP” stickers all over it, and it clinked a little when she put it in the hold.

Hmm.

Well, anyway; Bastani “Neopolitan” Sonnati … I actually ended up asking her about her nickname. Apparently, she’s from an old ice cream making family, and everyone in her family is named after some kind of ice-cream treat- her little sister’s name is a kind of ice-cream float. She gave herself the nickname of Neopolitan, or Neo for short, when she got asked if she had one at a fantasy-adventure summer camp.

Apparently, she’d been teased for her vitiligo patches by some bullies in school, and decided to head it off at the start at her camp- and then a lot of the kids she went to camp with ended up in her new school, in her class even, and the nickname stuck. Neo’s a smart woman.

As for what she looks like; she’s a little more intense than her sister, more vibrant; they obviously have the same taste in pastels, but Neo’s skin is darker, and her hair is almost indefinably paler. She has a large white spot on her left eye, with some smaller blotches circling the biggun; red stained lips and coral pink half-moon glasses. Er, spectacles. Shaggy heian-style bangs up front and a long fall down the back- like, absurdly long, mostly because she never remembers to get it cut. White turtle-neck crop top, three-quarter sleeve; under a pastel pink technoloquick blazer. Acid wash mom jeans that got patched with muslin underneath and embroidered patches on top, not more denim- except the ones she wore to move in are just torn up. I think she spent most of her paycheck on rent, utilities, food, and her sister in that order. I say that because the newest thing she has for herself is her shoes, and those weren’t new when she bought them- and I know that because the laces don’t match the shoes, she replaced them.

Neo’s an archivist like Mack and Bang, but she worked with a significantly larger and more kudzu-like filing system. So, while Bang’s been inventorying our Library, Neo’s been devising a way to actually organize everything. That’s what those two have been doing for the past… two days, I think? Yeah, two days- Bang and Neo have been organizing the library.

Tiffany, Precious, Genny, Ellie, Fern, and the Flyers have been doing flight maneuvers- apparently, Genny is Legendary among the street racing set, which is all our flyers, mostly because Genny is unbeaten except on accounts of out-right assassination attempts. None of which worked, mind.

Uh, let me see- the Flyers are Brandford, Bobert, Maurice, Pascal, Coco, Sofia, Lynn, and Orville.

Bradford’s … not terribly observant, unless he’s in the air. Blond, pasty, always forgetting his glasses on top of his head. Blue striped white shirts under purple vest, a mini-Log tucked onto a watch chain in his pocket; slate grey pants in tall brown boots. He’s also walked into the side post of the galley door no less than fifteen times in the past two days- several times, he wasn’t even going in through the door, he was just walking past, then, thump.

Bobert is a fancy man in a color-blocked suit and hat set. Honestly not that interesting to me, though his cat, Muffin, is very sweet and he totally dotes on her, making him reasonably good people to my mind. Hasn’t done anything particularly odd yet, although with the way everyone else is watching him, I have a feeling his particular brand of oddity is going to come out sooner or later. No man wears a glow in the dark suit and has an asymmetrical broom and dotes on a cat he named Muffin without being some manner of fucking weird. Also, his name is Bobert, which is a weird-ass name-like, he’s got all the markers for being a weirdo, I just haven’t seen empirical evidence of it yet.

Maurice is not a full Mink; one of his parents was, but he isn’t. He actually explained that he needs to have clothing a full size up from what his measurements would say, to avoid crushing his mink. When I inquired as to what his Mink actually was, he said Melanistic Serval Cat, and then hissed like a snake as the washing machine went on.

“HSSSSSSSG!”

“Maurice, it’s the washing machine; that’s the sound of clean clothing wanting to be put into the dryer, or onto the lines… come and see?”

“Grrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgr- ffffuck, fine. Grrgrgrgrgrgrgrgrgr-”

“It’s okay, I’m not great with people touching my wings- we’ve all got our quirks. Although, I can change out the alarm if it bothers you that much-?”

“Grrgrgrgrgrgrgrgr- no, no, it just startled me is all. Wow- and, this is where all the laundry gets done?”

“Mm. Bedding, clothing; any repairs or new items get made down here too, and I keep crafting supplies- beads and things- over here as well,”

“This is really convenient!”

“Hmmhmm, I’m glad you think so; I think so too,”

Maurice is alright, really- not well socialized, but nice enough. I mean, I know the top of the dryer is a good nappin’ spot for the cats because I keep finding and disturbing them when I change out the lint catcher- eventually I just made a nice pillow for them and left it there on top of the dryer, which they liked. And then I found Maurice in with the cats on top of the dryer.

So, um, I’m making him a pillow? And a pillowcase with his name on it so there’s no mistaking it for anything else. Maybe a nice blanket too? I don’t want him to toss and turn and fall off the dryer…

Pascal just pisses me off; he wears socks with his sandals!

Let me start by saying that there’s nothing wrong with having your own sense of style. Socks with sandals are not a style. It doesn’t even make sense! Would you wear a swimsuit with mittens and a scarf? No, because it’s fucking stupid!

Yet, every gods damned spring I see these fucking assholes wearing socks with their sandals! Even Luffy doesn’t do that and his entire wardrobe is variations of primary colors! Fuck! Why? Why do they do this to me? Spring is just around the corner, and like a lurking evil from a hundred years of suffering, this accursed charis’n’ma returns. When will this horror end? High end, name-brand designers like Lurkberry and Tinbalad have tried to make it seem cool, but it’s not cool, okay, and nothing will make it okay. It’s not even- if your feet are nasty, get a damn pedicure! If your feet get cold, wear shoes! If your feet get sweaty, lose the fucking socks!

We have slippers for inside and sandals for outside for a reason, and that reason is animal shit! Fucking gods in heaven, why?!!

So anyway, Pascal pisses me off- nice guy, good with the animals, but I just cannot look at his feet without feeling irrational murderous rage. So, uh. I try not to look at his feet.

Coco is a stitch-witch; so, I offered her space in the Studio. She was very interested- turns out she’s been doing thing with a pocket sewing kit and craft needles. That’s not good enough- but she also has never actually seen a studio purpose built for sewing like mine. She’s got lots of good ideas, too, she showed me her sketchbook. Unfortunately, she doesn’t have all the skill she needs to make her ideas real just yet… so she’s on the same schedule as Beatrix, learning all the same skills. She comes from a family of shoemakers, and she actually made her own shoes. She already knows how to sew, she just… doesn’t know how to sew clothing, she knows how to make shoes.

Incidentally, Beatrix is getting, well, a confidence boost from having someone who wants to learn from her. It’s also a better test than anything I could have come up with- if you can teach someone how to do something, then you’ve mastered the skill. I saw them yesterday, and Beatrix was talking Coco through a minor meltdown about how to start her pile of assignments…

She also asked me to critique her outfit, which she’d also made herself… so I did.

“Coco, are you sure you want my critique? I don’t hold back, and I don’t coddle; you’ll get the whole truth, as I see it,“

“Yes, Missus Mab- please, please tell me!”

“Alright. Your shoes are lovely; you used a beautiful piece of leather for them, and the purple tint to the black is really exquisite. Do people offer to buy them from you?”

“All the time,”

“Mhm. Your color use is also lovely; a bright crossing of bold yellow and cyan made gentler with red and a purple-black fabric of wool. The ribbons, the bows, it’s all very carefully designed and very delicately stitched. Not terribly durable, is it?”

“No, I have to do repairs almost every day,“

“Mm. And your use of large needles as punctuation, while effective as weapons and accent alike, is a mark of amateurism. There are better ways to convey your status and ability, ways that don’t come off as childish, amateurish, or even poorly crafted. Your overall visual cohesion is quite good, but your craftsmanship is not; your shoes are of very fine quality, as is your hat, and your individual ribbons, particularly the ones in your socks and skirt- the one on the side?”

“…I didn’t make those; a friend of mine did for maybe five hundred beri…?”

“That’s fine; I still can’t do button holes to my satisfaction. I’m guessing they only do small ribbons?”

“Yeah,”
“Yeah- the color matching is perfect, you did a remarkable job. However, it seems while you were stitching, you ran out of the same color thread, and as you ought to know by now-”

“-cohesion in the garment set is paramount, and fine details are a mark of superior craftsmanship,”

“Quite; still, I imagine you’ll be able to learn just as much as Beatrix, so I’ll set up another table for you… we’ll have to pick up a sewing machine for you at the next island, though- no, Coco, yours is meant for domestic sewing… it’ll get the job done to a point, but you really need an industrial straight-stitcher to get a professional standard product, the domestic machines just don’t have the weight.”

“Ah. What about-”

Coco’s fun; lots of questions, doesn’t take offence easily, and has a marvelous eye for color. I look forwards to seeing where she goes with her ideas.

Sophie and Mark became fast friends- mostly because Sophie brought her rabbits. Mark and Usopp built a hutch run for them, and now we have rabbit on the menu because all but one of her herd of rabbits are female, and we cannot keep all of them. Sophie and Mark started talking about supplements, and things just sort of developed from there…”

Sanji actually got excited because it’s not often he gets to cook game meat, like rabbit; even sea turtles are rare, because Chopper has them Baby-sweet Peepers that none of us can bear to disappoint… I should explain.

The original Skuan- that is to say, Four Kingdoms of Fae and all it’s protectorates- wild rabbits developed around four thousand years before the modern calendar, in the blue hills of Hyliarobes. Visiting Gastromian (aka the Purple People, aka those people who invented tyrian-the-dye-color out of snails) merchants referred to part of Hyliarobe as ‘De-laphan-rossa’, meaning ‘blue rabbit skirt’. This was translated as ‘Bestroba’ or as we know it today- Dressrosa.

The scientific name for wild rabbits is ‘oryctolagus cuniculus’ which sounds much naughtier than it actually is, as it means ‘a hare-like digger of underground passages’. Meanwhile, the scientific name for domesticated rabbits is ‘laphan fecundus’, sounds much neater than it is, as it means, basically, ‘rabbits that like to fuck’. Boy howdy, do our new rabbits like to fuck; it’s spring, so not unexpected, but Gods in heaven they fuck more than Sanji and me. They fuck while eating, while pissing, while shitting, while sleeping- as soon as one of the females stops for long enough, the male’s on her with a big, rabbity grin.

Life was peaceful for rabbits until the Roamin’s arrived in Dressrosa during the Second Pubic war in the second century. Much to the rabbits dismay, the Roamin’s figured out how to farm them for meat and pelts, a practice called cuniculture. Initially, they were kept in fenced off scrublands, but, well… the humble rabbit is known in some circles as the king with a thousand enemies. These circles are mostly academic, as most farmers call rabbits “those bastards” or “dinner”...

Increased trade around the World, and various wars with conquering armies and miles of camp-followers, introduced rabbits to every human-settled Island in the World. Just like rats and roaches- if humans live somewhere long enough, there’s going to be yardbirds and rabbits, too. As I mentioned earlier- they are fecund, bearing litters of six to ten yearly (feed permitting), and have a nearly perfect feed ratio of one to two. They need variable amounts of water- some breeds require nearly the same amount as a cow (fur breeds, really), while others require the water from their natural feed, (meat breeds, mostly from Sandy Island).

As for why rabbits became so common around the World… basically, it’s religion. Specifically, during the Holy Days of the year, a sacrifice to the gods is usually performed. In the old days, that sacrifice was of a human, picked in various ways- but, during the Reformation, in the Third Age, the Laws of Sacrifice were amended to include any animal that had been raised in accordance with the Gods (making it halal) and could reliably scream. Thus, goats, pigs, and rabbits, among others, were added to the roulette wheel of sacrifice.

A pair of rabbits can produce up to ninety kilograms of meat in a year; a flock, like ours, can produce far more. I actually saw tears of relief in Sanji’s eyes when Sofie told him that her flock was for meat, ot pets- none of them have names, they’re all numbered, and Sofie refuses to have more than five adult members at a time. Males, apparently, get culled first; she watches the females for behaviours she wants or tasty mutations, and then makes the cut.

Most yearly rabbits make the cut, as it turns out- and Sophie has more recipes for rabbit than anyone really should.

She dresses in the Dressrosa style, which, unlike the rest of her compatriots- with their mixture of classic business-functional and horror, those fucking sANDALS- really invigorates my styling eye.
Her hat is black and curled, with flowers and a ribbon wrapped round and hearts stamped on the brim; plain black and white blouse with puffed sleeves and a cute peter pan collar; and a red pencil skirt that fits her not quite correctly, to allow for all the movement she does during the day. A practical touch I wasn’t expecting…

When it comes to fashion, particularly women’s fashion- particularly haute couture- the Grand Line sets the bar, and Dressrosa is no exception. It seems that every woman on the Line for longer than a week develops their own unique style, and their own distinctive fashion sense… as well as the ability to walk for hours in heels on uneven ground without falling once, weapons or drinks or treasure or cigarettes in one hand and a map in the other.

People on the Line are careful about how they dress, even the most confident and powerful; always making sure to look nice, as well as being careful about how other people look. This can have unfortunate effects- I get a lot of side-eye for wearing military style boots on more heavily inhabited islands, but the ankle support is too good. No one wants to be stared at- and people stare at me a lot, I’ve got Classical Fae features which just aren’t that common anywhere except Sky Blue. Having people stare even more because I didn’t feel like doing a complicated hairstyle or wearing my cute glasses- uuugh. Then again, usually when I do that it’s because I’m coming off a battle or just too busy with what’s going on to notice…

Generally speaking for the Line, if you couldn’t or wouldn’t wear it back in your home Blue, or back home if you’re from the Line, you can wear it pretty much as you like out in the World. The trick is, you have to wear your clothing with confidence; women should exude confidence.

Lynn is a Pink Lily Pad Lotus Alraune; when she learned that we only have a salt-water aquarium, she was fairly disappointed. After thinking about it for a bit, I understood- she can breathe saltwater, but not for long enough to sleep- apparently, she can do it just long enough to run errands every day, about five or six hours if she’s moving at an easy pace and less if she’s got some hustle on her hips.
She gets dehydrated if she doesn’t immerse herself in water for eight hours a day, every day. The best time for that would be at night, when she sleeps- but we don’t have a space she can safely do that. Franky and Fern are building an addition- a pond with a cover, I think, one that rolls over during the day and we can all walk across, and then slides open at night.

Until then, Lynn’s been sleeping outside on the grassy deck. Alraune are an unrecognized Tribe-Plantae, or the Plant People. They have floral features- shoots and vines, green skin, leaves and flowers that grow off their body; Mince and BBC Coffyn are, technically, Alraune. They would identify themselves as Trolls, almost definitely- Corsica has a long history of trade with Fiddler’s Green, even before the various wars, so intermarriage of Fae and Demonic lines on that Island is very common.

Alraune tend to become obsessive, which no one- including them- has discovered the reason for. They also have the widest variance of dietary, health, and environmental needs; everything from extreme vitality to almost hospital-worthy delicacy. Lynn is somewhere between the two- according to her, if given a full night’s rest, she can bounce back from deadly injuries; however, she’s very sensitive to cold weather. I only knew she was a Lotus Alraune because she told me outright- on first glance, I’d have thought she was a chestnut. It’s because of her winter helmet-hat, the coolest of all possible pointy hats.

Once we sailed out of the warm Island waters and into the dark cold depths of the Sea, Lynn dug herself into the compost heap- not the fresh stuff, the middle where it’s warm. After a bit of a tizzy when we couldn’t find her- well, we did find her, and Chopper, Mark, and I pooled our knowledge- along with Genny, Sawbones, Taffy, Gurry, and Jun. We all decided to leave her be- feed her, keep the compost going, and cover it with straw to keep the frost off. Water regularly- actually, after the first time Lynn walked in through the ship to the showers to start the day, Sanji and I both decided that Lynn needed a wash station outside so she could get the grime off before walking through the Galley, hallway, and bathroom- nothing against dirt, but compost pile slurry is not normal dirt.

Franky and Fern built a heated shower for her that very afternoon because I really got on them about it and then had the toiletries and bath-linens ready and waiting in an appropriate spot… there’s a spigot and a hose on a concrete pad on that side of the kitchen yard, and now there’s a small shower with hot water on demand and a nice shelf with linens ready to go; even some hooks, for used ones. Lynn likes it a lot.

She’s also indicated that she just needs enough water to lay down in- a kiddie pool would be good enough, she doesn’t need or want a full on pond. This was a great relief to Franky, because it would be a huge safety issue to have an open-ish body of water just on the deck of our ship.

Orville- Ori- is another scout; the first scout I’ve ever met who has actually said outright that they’re a scout. I said I was a seamstress before I said I was a scout, and that’s never been not true. Her lookout was the New World, though- so it makes sense. Her job was to go ahead of the other flyers in her cotiere, discover the best routes to and from destinations in the New World, and report back her findings. She’s been inducted into Nami and Taffy’s Navigator’s Club, and I have no doubt she’s being grilled for information, even now.

When she’s not being grilled for those deets, she’s in the Crows Nest, watching the horizon- not that there’s anything to actually see just yet, but I think she’s just building up a habit. Ah, and also, she really loves to garden- when she’s not talking with Nami and Taffy, she’s out enjoying the kitchen garden, or the hospital garden, or the swing…

Ori has short cut hair in no particular style; yellow-green skin, a darker green bodysuit, a pair of leafy green shorts, brown tactical straps, and a green cape so splottedched and mangled with color it would vanish in the forest. Gloves and shoes with puffy edges; no real luggage to speak of, aside from a small bag on her back with her essentials.
The day after the Sailing Incident, we’re back in motion; soon to approach the Undersea Passage, one of the Eight Wonders of the World.

The Undersea Passage, or Canal Rex, is an artificial seventy seven kilometer waterway under the Red Line that connects Paradise to the New World. Canal locks at each end lift ships up to Gatun Sea; an artificial sea created in the pre-existing caves to reduce the amount of excavation work required for the canal; and then lower ships into the New World. The ships then rise near the island of Capture, the twin of Twin Capes back in Paradise. S’got its own lighthouse and everything—apparently Taffy got information and a new log-pose back on Fishman Island? Lots of things happened that I just wasn’t aware of, honestly.

There are three lanes of locks in the canal; a small lane meant for fishermen and day-boats, which basically everyone who works at Tsukiji fish market has used at least once—Fern said that it’s actually fairly nice, so long as you breathe water. The second lane is for medium to large ships; everything from ships Going Merry’s size, to ships the size of Whitebeard’s own Moby Dick. The third lane is for military use only, so we’re not taking that one—we’re taking the second lane.

Germa began work on the Canal in the Second Age, but stopped due to engineering problems and a high worker mortality rate. Dressrosa took over the project soon after and opened the canal in the Third Age. It was, and remains, the largest and most difficult engineering projects to ever be undertaken and completed. This passage greatly reduces the time for ships needing to travel between Paradise and the New World; and, unlike the Sea of Monsters, the Drake Passage, or the Straits of Magellan, it’s much safer. About the only dangerous thing in the canal is other ships, and our own boredom.

It takes six to eight weeks to pass through the Undersea Canal; four, if your crew knows their business very well indeed. It’ll probably take us six.

---

I got into building ships in bottles a little before our parents died. Neo’s always looking ahead to the next new thing, but I’m… I’m a little more old fashioned, I guess. Also, it’s a good hobby for when you don’t have a lot of space to spread out—well, that, and whittling, which I’m fairly good at too. I mean, I made Neo’s scrimshaw, and she loves it—says I have a real talent.

I mean, I guess?

But really, I like building ships in bottles. It’s fun! And… it makes me feel closer to Dad, who taught me how to do it.

I actually work out of Mom’s old tool chest; Neo couldn’t bear to even touch it, after—anyway. Dad was a regular sailor with the Royal Navy; Mom was a Machinist in the boiler room of their boat. Neo ended up spending a lot of time with Dad’s CO, just watching how he did things when she wasn’t doing her own thing; I spent a lot of time down in the workshops and boiler room, doing just the same thing. To me, it wasn’t weird at all that Neo got Dad’s mace, Crush; and I got Mom’s sword and shield, Hammer and Tongs. Actually, I spent yesterday painting our crew standard onto my buckler; crew pride, yo.

Anyway— the difference between a machinist’s tool chest and a normal tool chest, beyond appearance, is this. Quality. The drawers in my tool chest, when operated, feel very, very different from other tool chests- and the overall quality of construction is very high, almost absurdly so.

The drawers of my tool chest are sized to precision measuring tools that I don’t want knocking about with larger tools or piled on top of each other. There are two more drawers in the top center; the larger one is specifically sized for a particular book, which is in there- Machinery’s Handbook, the holy book of a machinist’s trade. There’s also a security panel that covers all the drawers and locks them; I’m the only person with the key. All the drawers are also lined with felt, so the tools aren’t abused by the drawers themselves.

I’m actually very lucky that Mom owned all her tools outright, and her toolbox, and passed them on to me- the cost of the tools that go into a machinists tool box quickly dwarf the cost of the box itself. As the job of the box is to keep those very expensive tools safe, having a good one is really important.

Mom used to say that her tool chest was an example of the quality she needed to provide every day, and that she expected to receive in turn. Her very career depended on the quality and condition of her tools in a way that almost no other trade does; as such, the quality of the tool chest she used had to reflect that quality.

Anyway. Building a ship in a bottle is a very old maritime artform. Sailors of the past would often create things in their free time- everything from knots and cloth goods, to scrimshaws, to ships in bottles. They didn’t have room for big hobbies, and they didn’t have money for expensive ones- thus, a ship in a bottle, being made of scraps and what would otherwise be garbage, is fairly simple and cheap as hobbies go.

I’m actually finishing one, right now- I’ve set up, with my box and my bottle, in the Galley because I don’t think there’s a table in the shop? And also, more importantly, the Galley has better light.

I started with a bottle; and as with all ships in bottles, the shape of the bottle is what determines the type of ship to be built. I’ve got binders full of research- pictures, crew anecdotes, even the occasional copy of a shipwright’s plans, all for ships I can’t build yet because I don’t have the right bottle. Color is important too; a clear glass bottle is best, although if the glass is pale blue or green, it can be accounted for as well. Amber and cobalt glass, while beautiful, are almost never appropriate- although, there is a new trend in the hobby to put ghost ships in these bottles. I haven’t tried it yet… maybe my next project?

This bottle is borosilicate glass that I actually had made especially for this; it’s nearly as long as my arm, and about as tall as my shoulder to elbow. I’ve treated it to be smear resistant, so it can be handled; and I got it enchanted to be lightweight, so I can move it around by myself. It’s important to fill the bottle just enough with the right kind of ship- not just any ship will do for any bottle, you’ve got to know your tubs and the space they want to fit into as well.

I’ve never used a kit- can you imagine? A kit for something like this? I mostly just use blank piece of wood available at craft stores, and sometimes scraps from the lumber yard. Once I have a piece of a size, I begin by drawing a ship in the size and shape that I want to build.

I drill holes through the wood that will form the upper and lower parts of the hull; then, I use toothpicks, skewers, even disposable chopsticks depending on the size of the hole, all to keep the wood pieces properly aligned during the rest of the construction. Following that, I draw a rough outline on the stacked wood pieces.
Of course, I’ve already done all that- I’m just going over each step of the process to make certain I haven’t forgotten anything.

Once you’ve drawn the outline on the pieces, you need to sand away anything that doesn’t look like the boat. I’m not trying to be silly when I say it; but I don’t have any better way to explain what I do. I generally start with a large fine-grain file, around eighty grit, and move to higher and higher fineness as I go forwards. Don’t be afraid to go back with the big grit and smooth it all down again- there’s nothing worse than trying to get rid of a lump with too fine a grit. Also, don’t be afraid to replace your sandpaper when it wears out! It only costs a bit less than ten beri a sheet; no excuses!

I’ve been checking my finished and assembled- but not fully assembled- boat next to the bottle. It needs to be done at just about every stage of construction, to ensure that the finished piece will actually, you know, fit in the bottle.

Even at the very beginning stages, the hull is already larger than the opening of the bottle. That’s why it’s not made of one solid piece of wood.

Next, the keel and rudder are added to the bottom of the hull. Really thin pieces of wood are easiest to find at craft stores, or very specific hobby shops- think dollhouses, toy stores, and so on. Using a piece of wood that’s already been planed to the proper width saves a lot of time. I used a one-sixteenth by one-sixteenth strip for the keel, and for the rail on the top of the deck.

I find that painting the pieces all in one go, each with their own color, to be easier and better looking than trying to paint several colors on a single piece of wood once the hull is finished. After all, the individual pieces of this ship are comparable to a ten beri coin.

Now, as every maker knows, adhesives are creations of the Devil. They either don’t work, or they work entirely too well. Except for three- tempera, which is made of eggs, paper to paper glue, and wood glue. And of those two, wood glue always does exactly what it says it’s going to do on the bottle- so long as it’s usage directions are followed, of course.

I used wood glue to fix the two top and the two bottom pieces together, forming the upper and lower halves of the hull.

After that, I laid out the mast and booms on the drawing of the boat I wanted to make, keeping in mind how very limited my space actually was. The masts are made of disposable chopsticks I sanded very smooth and straight; the booms are made of disposable skewers and toothpicks. Some of them I sanded down to be even narrower; all of them I sanded to be smooth.

I added a bowsprit to the hull. The bowsprit consists of two parts- the bottom stick, which is inserted into a hole drilled into the hull, and a top stick which is glued to the bottom stick and made more secure and more pretty with lengths of thread, which also get glued down.

Check against the bottle again- this was before Neo joined the crew. Then while we were moving, I did more work.

I glued lengths of thread to the backs of the booms, which will act as hinges. I looped a piece of wire through a very small hole drilled into the bottom of the mast; another hinge. I attach the booms to the masts by the threads I glued onto them. I then drilled holes into the hull- again, very small drill bits, this time only slightly larger than a needle.

In the end, there are five holes behind the location of each mast. The shroud lines and upright rigging will go into these holes. The wire hinge on the bottom of the mast goes into two holes on the hull; it’s twisted into place underneath, and the excess is trimmed away.
I’ve spent this morning doing the rigging. One long piece of thread goes through the five holes in the hull and through the mast, forming the shrouds. Then comes the actual basic rigging; I’ve got a multi-function stand in the third largest drawer that I used to secure the top of the ship during rigging and detail work. The entire thing was held in place by a small vice clamp, because I don’t want to damage the table- and also, we’ve never owned the furniture in our apartments? So it’s not like I could without costing my sister money… Anyway. The lines that will be used to raise the mast are held tight by wrapping them around nails at the front of the stand.

Each mast has two lines going forward to the bowsprit. One line goes from the hull, to the booms, to the top of the mast and then forward. The other line goes from the top of the shrouds directly through the bowsprit, necessitating more drilling. Drilling and threading the very tiny holes in the bowsprit takes a steady hand- and, possibly, a very thin needle.

The anchor, I made just before lunch. I made it by bending a piece of thin wire into the proper shape and dipping it into paint. Additional detail was added by dipping the tip of a toothpick into paint and dabbing it onto the hull and mast. Then, it was lunch time- so, I carefully moved everything into it’s carrying stand, and set it on the couch. I ate lunch and stabbed Captain when he tried to grab some of my bacon rolls, I don’t think so Captain!

Mou, and then lunch was over; after I helped the Kitchen clean up, I set my things back up on the table, and got back to work.

I decided during lunch that the hull will rest in the bottle on top of two wooden stands. These will be made from popsicle sticks and attached to the toothpicks that hold the pieces of the hull in place. Nothing is permanently glued into the bottle yet, so all the pieces can rotate and will fit through the opening of the bottle while attached to the bottom of the hull.

Another test fit; I found I had a quarter inch of room inside of the bottle to spare. I’ve always tried to make the ship fill as much of the bottle as I could- thankfully, I’d already anticipated the need for a more robust stand. I had pre-cut, sanded, and stained two additional blocks of wood to put under the ship in the bottom of the bottle; this raised the bottom of the hull from the glass, and gave the entire ship a more balanced look.

And then it was tea time, so I had to put everything away again.

Even so, today… today, I’m actually finishing everything.

Tea was nice; a red tea I’ve never had before, cheesy bread, sweet cookies… nice. I mostly sat and thought about the work order of my ship in a bottle; and Fernanda, er, Fern? She sat and watched me- so did Mister Franky. I only realized this after Tea, though- mostly, I was thinking very hard about my ship in a bottle.

I helped the Kitchen clear the Galley again; and I set up again, this time for gluing and completion of the ship. Fern and Franky sat at the other end of the table, quietly observing, but I paid them no attention.

Shit, I even finished the sails- I did that yesterday. Missus Mab was super nice, too- said that I was welcome to any of the crafting supplies in the studio, so long as I marked out what I took on the sheet she showed me.

Once I start gluing, I’m committed to finishing this project; there’s no going back from this. Any mistake I make, I make forever.

Deep breath; check the ventilation.

Let’s begin.

I glued the wooden bases into the bottle, using a piece of sticky tack on the outside bottom to mark where the glue would go to secure the first piece of wood. A drop of glue is used to secure the original stand to the bottom of the hull; then the stand is rotated parallel to the hull in order to fit into the bottle opening.

I use long rods after this point- a piece of wire bent to shape, and a medical probe from a yard sale. I spun the base planks until they were even with each other and then glued them down onto the base.

I secured the sails to the mast or booms; flags, pendants standing in for other bits of rigging; deckhouses are placed. I put glue on the top of the bottom hull, and commit to finishing this thing. I loosen the rigging control lines, lower the masts, and carefully roll the sails around the hull. Then, I slowly feed the top half of the ship into the bottle. Once it’s in, I pull on the control threads and partially raise the mast. I just want them out of the way so I can- just- got it! Just needed to rejoin the two halves of the hull. The glue is fairly fast drying, for wood glue- I secure the rigging, make sure the ship halves are aligned correctly, and let them sit to cure. I stretch.

I set a small egg timer I got just for this, clean up the tools I won’t be needing, make sure I’ve put everything away correctly… and that’s time. Let’s finish this.

I slowly raise the masts, occasionally reaching in with the medical probe to untangle some threads… just take the time to do it right, is what I say. With a little slack in each mast, I guide each deckhouse to it’s position and install it. Then, I tighten the masts back up until only a little, small bit of slack remains in the rigging. A drop of glue on the place where each line passes through the tiny bowsprit; then I pull the lines taught and secure them to the bottom of the bottle with a bit of sticky tack.

While the rigging dries, I secure each sail with a small dab of glue. It’s a tight fit in there, but I make it work. Then, I needed to wait again; set the timer, clean my tools, put things away I don’t need anymore. A small, sharp razor blade on a thin stick; the timer rings, and I cut the control threads from the bottom of the bowsprit. Add a cork; wipe the outside of the bottle; throw away my garbage bits, and… that’s it. Done.

I built a ship in a bottle.

“...Do you want a table down in the shop, kid?”

“Um. Y-yeah, if it’s, um, if there’s room,”

“'Course there is. Fern, show her around?”

“Right-o, Franky-bro! Come with me, Havij, I’ll show you where you can put your things-”
“Ah, just one more thing I have to do- one sec-”

I carefully put the ship in it’s stand, gluing it down with something I can only hope will bond glass-to-wood. I peel the protective cover off the nameplate; and now it really is done.

_Thus kindly I scatter; the gems drop away. In Memoria-_ and there, my parent’s names, and their dates, in warm throated brass. I look it over; yep, done.

“Mister Franky-bro, when my sister sees this, she’s gonna cry real hard. Don’t let her be alone when she does, okay?”

“...sure, Kiddo,”

And then I went off with Fern.

Down in the shop, Fern shows me her work bench, and points out where there’s room for my own- but on her work bench…

“So, um, you make ships in bottles too?”

“Ah, not- quite? I only just got a pair of bottles I like, and one of them is so much bigger than the other… I’ve been stuck on shrinking down the shipwright drawings for days, actually,”

“Mou- if you want, I can help? I mean, I also saw the way you looked at my tool box- if you want, I can help you build one of your own,”

“Wah! Really?!?”

“Y-yeah, sure, um; if, ah, if you want?”

“Oh my goodness, yes!”

“So, these are one of the most important parts of my Studio- these are damage and request forms. Fill one of these out correctly and attach it to your damaged clothing, and I’ll see it’s repaired; fill that one out correctly, and I’ll make whatever you ask for. I’m already in the process of creating a basic wardrobe for all of you- see up there? Each crewmate gets their own rack, and each rack has several seasons worth of clothing in it, waiting to be switched out. I do the switching according to the World Calendar, local weather, and personal preferences that I notice. I notice almost everything physical about everyone- so don’t be surprised if new clothing just appears in your locker; if it’s there, it’s meant for you, and yes, I meant it for you specifically. If you don’t know what something is, just ask,”

“...!”

“Do you repair things that aren’t clothing?”

“That depends on if it’s made of fabric, leather, or lace- in that case, yes, I will. Similarly, I will do cloaks, belts, harnesses… anything meant to be worn on the body, really. Except for shoes- I don’t do shoes. Coco does, though-”

“-Yep, sure do-”

“But again; you need to fill out the form. It’s not pointless bureaucracy, either; this is how I organize my worker’s work flow. I don’t want to give them too much to do; similarly, I don’t want to give them something they can’t do. This is also how I streamline ship repairs- because I’m in charge of keeping all the sails and rigging-”

“Eeeeh!?"

“-Well, yes, my main job- beyond making sure none of you are naked or in danger of death by exposure- is keeping the sails and rigging in honor. Which brings us here- these are the sail and rigging damage forms. We do sail and rigging checks at every island, and whenever Nami, the Head Navigator, says. That’s what Gurry, Taffy, Mark, and Bryony were doing before we left- with the clipboards, y’know?”

“Ah, I had wondered-”

“Right. Now- if you are used to throwing all your clothing into a basket, we have baskets right here- they hang right on the wall, to save valuable floor space. Also, over here- sock pins, clothing labels, and delicates bags. I’ll make this clear right here and now- I cannot guarantee the safe return of your pair of socks unless they’re pinned together. I cannot guarantee the return of your clothing unless it is labelled with your symbol- I have an entire system of drawers devoted to identifying patches, don’t worry about finding something you like. I cannot guarantee the cleanliness of your underwear, brassieres, binders, and other garments, unless it’s in the delicate garment bag when it goes down the chute. We, in the Laundry, will handle all labelling for the purposes of washing, if your clothing isn’t labelled already,”

“Holy shit that’s a lot of labels- hey, wait, can you make embroidered patches?”

“Of course; iron ons too,”

“Hot damn!”

“-chute?”

“Over here- see these wheeled carts? These are where all the crew’s laundry ends up. Here comes some now- ah, I see, Robin’s making her bed again-”

“Um. Can we have individualized sheets? I mean, it’s fine sharing with Cath, but… we’re different people,”

“Sure- these are the safety pins, take an extra patch, and pin it to your sheets when you change them out. After that, I’ll know that every sheet set going to your bed needs that patch on it. -oh, and girls?”
“Yes, Missus Mab?”

“Yes, Missus Mab?”

Once you pick your identifying patch, that’s it; no changing, no take backs. If the both of you want the same one, work it out.”

“Once you pick your identifying patch, that’s it; no changing, no take backs. If the both of you want the same one, work it out,”

“Yes, Missus Mab!”

“Yes, Missus Mab!”

The Feverbane Twins aren’t flyers- they’re sorters. Stacey and Cathey Feverbane are Axolotl Women, which means one of their parents was a Fishman with exposed gills, and the other was something else- my money is on Mink or Long-arm, they’re too hairy for a Lanfolk. Caustic, loyal; they have the look of people who haven’t settled on what they want to be when they grow up.

Stacey, the elder, wears her brown hair down, big hoop earrings, white shirt with flowers printed on, black spaghetti-strap dress, fashion backpack, white silk socks with chunky, strappy heels.

Cathey, the younger, wears her brown hair half-up, no earrings, pink turtleneck sweater with a big scoop out of the front, high waisted denim skirt with a thick black belt, woven grass shopping bag instead of a purse, same shoes as her sister.

Both girls wear glasses; both girls have exposed gills that start at their temples and frill up to about the crown of their heads.

While they’ve been in here, they’ve absentmindedly organized and neatened my shelves- I have a fairly organized studio, but now it’s like… magazine worthy. Hm.

“You two like sorting things out?”

“Yes!”

“Have you considered helping out in the Library? Someone always needs to put books back; and Franky has the same damage and request forms I do, so if you want, say, a book cart…”

“Oooh-!”

And another pair of people get shooed off; patches picked and opportunities on the ship, found.

This is about when Parsley, Mila, Sohei, and Winston wander in. Winston, his green and brown scales a-ripplin’, makes a bee-line for the warm-spot Maurice has curled up in. He must do this often, because Maurice wriggles over and curls up with Winston.

D’aww.

Parsley is a Mink, about two years older than the Suntide Girls- so, sixteen? Seventeen, maybe- the fur knocks off about a year, lookswise. He’s a grey Rabbit Mink, with rough-cut black hair, a purple infinity scarf, grey-jumpsuit, black boots, and a purple haramaki belted with a black belt. Ah, a grey-on-grey striped puffy-sleeve shirt, so it’s actually overalls.
Very intuitive, Parsley- totally willing to poke and prod, and he’s already picked out which patches he wants…

Sohei - his name is actually Sohei Speak-Ye-Not-In-Vain (the-name-of-the-Gods is silent) - is over with Parsley. Sohei has used a system like this before, I can tell- he grabs a patch he likes, and starts reading through the various forms. Another Mink- this one, a Big Cat of some kind, very fast because he can’t retract his claws at all; has a bit of an anxiety issue, maybe? Grey pants, blue sleeveless shirt; red foot and hand wraps.

Mila, on the other wing, takes issue with basically the entire premise of filling out a form to get her clothing taken care of, picking out identifying patches for her clothing, the whole thing. She accepted the sails and rigging forms… hm.

I don’t think she understands what I really am, although I haven’t actually said… Undyed pants and shirt, blue-grey sash, bright yellow dupatta; blue-black skin, big brown eyes, hair cropped short and gleaming.

And that’s quite enough.

“Mila, I’m the Quartermaster of this ship. Do you know what that means?”

“No,”

“Hm. Two things, really- firstly, my job is the quarters of this ship. Clothing, bedding, other supplies- my job is to make sure that each member of the crew has everything they need to get ready for the next day. Clothing, a place to sleep, soap to wash with, brushes and combs. Secondly, my job as Senior Helmsman is to steer the ship. If Taffy, Bryony, or Mark can’t do it- and sometimes they won’t be able to- it’s my job to do so. If, say, you ask me to do something like fix a button, and our ship is attacked, and I have to steer the ship- I probably won’t remember to get your button. I’ll try- but having a form filled out means that I don’t have to remember something like that. Instead, I get to remember things like your favorite colors, what you like your clothing to smell like, if you’re allergic to a detergent, and so on,”

Mila is still looking fairly mutinous. Well, no time like the present to introduce a new crewmate to my own particular brand of oddity.

“Attend!

“I am Quartermaster

“My story is enfolded in the history of this World.

“Sustainer of Armies; Protector of Men.

“My forges burned in the Dragon’s Teeth.

“Down frozen, rutted roads my oxen hauled
“the meager foods a bankrupt fool sent me.
“Scant rations for my cold and starving crew, “Gunpowder, salt, and lead.

“In Ages past we sailed to war in ships my boatwrights built.
“I fought beside you in the deserts of our great South, and West.
“My pack mules perished seeking water holes,
“And I went on with camels.
“I made flags to serve; I repaired them after every battle.
“The patches and crests you wear are my design.

“Since the beginning of all things, I have sought our fallen “from powdermonkey to captain.
“In war or peace I bring them home
“And lay them gently down in honor.

“Provisioner, transporter.
“In another Age I took you to lands made bitter with strife.
“I brought you tents, your cloth for uniforms.
“When yellow fever struck, I brought the mattresses you lay upon.

“In another Age... like you.
“The Wars of Hell, too. Mine was the first blood spilled that day.
“I jumped into darkness in Raime; Apocalypse: Cancelled.
“Baterilla, Germa, Zou. I was there.
“The sails that filled the gray horizon were mine;
“I lead the endless trains across the beach in endless Ages.

“By air and sea I supported the crossing of the Line.
“Through the deadly jungles I carried my supplies; and yours.

“I crossed the desert again; and when our supplies ran out, I carried on “Found more and gave them with gladness.

“I am Quartermaster.

“I can shape the course of combat,

“Change the outcome of battle.

“Look to me: Sustainer of Armies; Protector of Men.

“The digger of the last ditch; and the defender of it, too.

“I am the Straw Hat Pirates Quartermaster. -and Mila, if you ever want something for your bunk, all you need to do is write it down on the form, and I’ll get it for you. Among other things, it’s an accounting thing- Nami doesn’t like spending unnecessarily, and Sohei’s going to have an easier time of it if I keep track of what I spend. Get it?”

“...it’s not about me, or you,”

“No. It’s about all of us- incidentally, I saw you like the Ocarina, over there?”

“Oh, um-”

“You can have it, if you want- but I can’t replace it,”

“Eh?”

“Oh! I can answer this one!”

“!...Parsley, you have to stop sneaking up on me like that,”

“I would if I could, Mila! But I know why Missus Mab can’t get you another ocarina like that one if you break it?”

“Why?”

I hand Mila the ocarina.

“It’s because the sea snail this ocarina is made out of is super-duper endangered as a specie!”

“hey, kid, you wanna learn some cool facts about animals? I think you dooowww. C’mon back here into this completely unsuspicious alley for some absolutely legal dealings~”

“Mila, the Conch is a large marine sea snail found throughout the Line. The shell is the most recognizable part- found in every beach-themed restaurant and store in the World. The actual animal is a thirty-three centimeter snail with a habit of peeking out at the World a bit like that guy who kept trying to sell us the full set of counterfeit ginsu knives in his trenchcoat, you remember him?”

“Oh yeah! Lemme Hold a Beri man!”

“Exactly!”

“-available cheap, this week only!”

“Unfortunately for the snail, their shifty ways and general gross snail-ness are no match for the fact that they are completely fucking delicious.”

“-wait, what-”

“Prized across the Line for it’s lustrous shell and delicious delicious meats, the Conch is now threatened in most of its natural range,”

“-look buddy, are you gonna buy these watches or what?”

“Some protections are now in place for nature’s scalpers; and it’s hoped that they’ll continue to hawk dubious goods at humanity for decades to come. Of course, that only works if everyone abides by it- and Missus Mab really likes Conchs, so she won’t support the poaching trade,”

“That’s true. Also, quick question- can Winston speak?”

“Yes!”

“Unfortunately…”

“Uh, wait, what?”

“Ah! That will be a great relief for Taffy and Gurry; Banana and Marzipan have started speaking to everyone, not just them, and apparently their conversational skill is a bit… well, lacking. A rival will straighten them out, I think-”

And then Havij bursts in, darting past all of us. She climbs up the wall, disturbing nothing on the various shelves, and then burrows under the hanging clothing. The sounds of sobbing faintly echo down.

What the actual fuck- oh no, I- I can’t just leave her alone- I-

Hm.

I step, and one of me goes to comfort Havij; and one of me goes back the way she came; and one of me stays where I am.

I, where I am, let out a full-throated growl that ends in a sigh as I forcibly shove my irritation away- I’m doing something about it, but I still need to finish this.

“So. I have a Devil Fate; mine is Shadow. I can do a lot of things with it, but to me, the most useful of all the things I can do is be in more than one place at a time. Do any of you know why Havij is crying?”

Mila and Parsley shake their heads; Winston slithers down from the dryer nappin’ spot and up the wall, intent on comforting the crying girl from his murmur.

Hang on kid, I’m comin’ for ya~!

Sohei just looks tired.

“It’s Neopolitan; I’m fairly certain of it,”

“...I think we should sit down. Come on- I’ve got a tea set down here. The tea’s not as good as what Sanji makes, but I’m passable at it. Mila, Parsley?”

“Um- it’s not really our business...”

“Yes it is, Parsley- we’re crewmates now, Par, it’s our business by definition,”

“Oh. Um- sure, then?”

“Come on,”

I lead them over to a small break area, next to the sink- a kitchen nowhere near the size that would be needed to feed the whole crew. I don’t keep food in the upright fridge, either; it’s all dye stuff that needs to be kept cold. Thankfully, the cabinet fridge - which is an entirely different color- I do keep food in, mostly non-perishables I like cold.

There’s a kettle; I fill it with water, set it on the hob and start snapping fingers. Various drawers and canisters pop out, and their contents empty out in specific measured amounts- I don’t keep sugar, flour, or salt in their pre-designated bins because we’re on a boat, but that is where I keep spices and certain extracts and essential oils, too.

The oven gets called into service rarely- but often enough, because Sanji has to bake large volumes of bread and I want like, a few slices of one thing or another and- Hello, Beatrix.

“Hello, Beatrix,”

“Is tea down here today?”

“It can be, but, well, Sanji makes tea for everyone- this tea is really for a hard conversation-”

“Because Fern’s trying to get up to where Havij is and Deborah smelled the cheese and came running, as did the rest of the Kitchen Crew so, uh-”

“Hello, Mab; what are you cooking?”

“...Well, Razz, I was going to make sandwiches but if you want to make something-”
“No, no-”

“Because I don’t have any cakes, I was about to go up and ask you-”

“Oh, well, in that case, I can-”

“Or I could make croissants…”

“Uh,”

“...What did you think the batch roller was for, Razz?”

“Well, now I feel silly; of course you’d use a sheeter,”

“Is that what they call it in kitchen-land? Because I just thought it was a batch roller with a canvas conveyor belt,”

And Sanji grins.

“Yes, Mab; a batch roller with a canvas conveyor belt is also known as a sheeter when it’s used for making sheets of laminated pastry,”

“But I make baker’s croissants, not pastry croissants-”

“Shush; make your magic,”

“Well, fine- but, what kind of cakes are you making?”

“Are you using chocolate?”

“I didn’t plan to, no-”

“And it’s still squidberry season, right?”

“Mm,”

“How about a chocolate and squidberry cake?”

“Oh, that sounds nice- and the other?”

“I dunno, lemon meringue? We always have the ingredients, and it’s not terribly hard to make…”

“Sounds good to me, love,”

I smile at my husband, and take out the small loaves I’ve been baking since the morning; white sandwich bread, focaccia, pumpernickel, black rye - all the things Sanji doesn’t make because of how long it takes to do it right… also, I’m fairly sure I’m the only person other than him that really craves black rye bread. The black rye is for butterbrod, not tea though- so, slice, and onto the cooling rack for later. Like, tomorrow-later

Oh yes, and a few baguettes and brioches, too, because- BAD!
“Don’t snitch my sandwich fillings, Sanji!”

“Sorry, sorry- what the hell do you put in the olives to make them so good, though?”

“Generosity, kindness, love, joy- *fingers out of the- rrrrrgh, -do you want some olives, Sanji?”

“...y’s,”

“Okay,”

And I hand my husband a bowl of olives, which he starts devouring and- wait a second-

“...You didn’t eat lunch, did you?”

“...whoops,” “Hmmmmmpff,”

Silly man.

All my bread loaves are cooled; scones and biscuits in, then. Sanji, finished with the olives and hands washed, is making his cakes. I’m putting together the sandwiches.

Cress and butter sandwiches- softened butter, grated lemon zest, fresh chopped herbs; spread on white bread and topped with watercress and another thin slice of bread; trim the crust on two sides and cut so that each triangle piece only has one crusty edge.

Olive and focaccia; chopped olives, chopped parsley, drizzle the inside of a split loaf of focaccia with olive oil; fill with the olive mixture and slices of provolone; cut into dainty, tasty squares.

Anchovy and lemon butter; softened butter with grated lemon zest; spread on white bread and sandwich with oil-preserved anchovies carefully patted down for their excess, sliced sundried tomato reconstituted with vegetable broth and also patted down, and butter-leaf lettuce that’s just started to grow vigorously. Trim the crusts and save for the pigs or goats; cut into triangles.

Salmon, cucumber, and dill; mix minced dill with softened cream cheese; spread cream cheese mixture on white bread. Sandwich with smoked salmon and sliced cucumber; trim crusts and cut into rectangles.

Liverwurst and onion; Dijon mustard on- Deborah?

“Can I help you, Deborah?”

“...lemme taste that mustard?”

“...sure?”
“Shrimp, are you- Shrimp? Why are you tasting the mustard?”

“Because I have better mustard in my pocket right now; Missus Mab, use this instead.”

“Uh- sure? Let me taste it… oh my goodness gracious! Sanji, come try this!”

“I- sure, hang on- okay, what-”

“Taste this!”

“Mmmph! Mmmmmmm! Wow!”

“Deborah, where did you get this mustard?”

“I make it. Normal store mustard isn’t good enough,”

“I see!”

So good! Liverwurst and onion; Deborah’s special mustard spread on pumpernickel; sandwich with liverwurst and sliced red onion. Slice in halves; these are too good for small bites.

Prosciutto and fig; softened butter and fig jam spread on the inside of a split baguette. Fill with prosciutto, sliced pears and butter-leaf lettuce; season with salt and pepper. Cut into medium-thin pieces.

Camembert and fig; toasted brioche slices cut into fours, spread with camembert cheese and topped with sliced fresh figs and candied walnuts. Give Sanji a light tongue-fucking and spin him back towards his cakes when he tries to snatch one; pick Deborah, Mince, and Oz up bodily and put them back near Sanji when they try the same. Give one to Beatrix when she asks politely. Give one to Sohei for being patient with me and my antics. He seems to like it.

Cheddar and pickled vegetables- in this case, cucumbers that have been lacto-fermented and patted dry; sliced shingle-style and even-odd layered with aged cheddar. Pickle-cheddar-pickle-cheddar; paint the top with a very thin wash of Deborah’s mustard and sprinkle with a little dill; trim the crusts, cut into triangles, press the edges in chopped parsley.

Pate- hm.

“Sanji, for the pate- goose or duck?”

“Both is good,”

“Hmmm.Alright, if you’re sure-”

So. Since I’m using two different pates, it behooves me to use two different sour cherry preserves. First, the goose; spread montmorency cherry preserves on sliced brioche. Being the traditional sour cherry of choice, the preserves are a bright, lurid red. Sandwich with goose liver pate; trim the crusts, and cut in squares. Second, the duck; spread morello cherry preserves on sliced brioche. An heirloom varietal, the sour cherry preserves are a dark, almost wine-colored red. Sandwich with duck liver pate; trim the crusts, and cut in squares.
Radish and anchovy; softened butter mixed with minced anchovies; spread on white bread and sandwich with wafer-thin sliced radishes. Trim the crusts and cut into triangles.

And finally, because I have a feeling Havij will like them- Pimento cheese! Softened cream cheese, equal amounts of shredded cheddar and shredded jack cheese, mayonnaise to make it spreadable, and salt’n’ pepper to taste. Stir in chopped pimentos; sandwich on white bread; trim the crusts and cut into squares.

Hm. Sanji hasn’t told the Cooking Kids about Pickles and cheese yet.

“Shall I tell them, Razz?”

“I was hoping you would, love,”

“Right, well-”

As my wife begins explaining pickles and cheese and the proper way to set out a tea service to the kids, I consider the same.

Pickles and cheese share a basic origin: the need to preserve the harvest. As such, for thousands of years, the production of both was the domain of women. Before refrigeration, fermented milk and meat preserved essential calories- proteins, fats, and so on; while fermented produce made vitamins available year-round. It’s no great surprise, then, that these stinging, stinking, spicy, and succulent subsistence foods pair quite naturally.

We, on the ship, actually fight scurvy during the winter with various pickles; and it was only when I had close exposure to Mab and her Dairy that I gained any sort of real interest in pickling. It’s a very old-fashioned kind of thing- there are pickles that my Grandmere would have eaten that are just the same as they are now. Even so… Mab’s developing new and innovative ways to combine vegetables and fruits with acid and sugar; vivid colors and intense flavors, combining into marvelous delights for the winter- well, year round, really. Pickles and cheese have a unique position; halfway between cooked and raw, dressed and nude- they’ve been the darlings of chefs for generations.

There are two broad varieties among the brined.

Salt- lacto-fermented- pickles are made through direct fermentation. Vegetables are immersed in brine, where salt-loving lactic acid bacteria convert sugars in the vegetables to acid and alcohol preserving them from the inside out. The resulting pickles tend to have a mellow flavor- though not always, as their beneficial bacterial cultures tend to remain active.

Vinegar pickles- pickles brined in vinegar- make use of secondhand fermentation. Wine or another alcohol is fermented into acetic acid, which is poured onto the vegetables, creating an inhospitable environment for bacteria. Mab uses the dregs of various bottles we go through- lots of honey wine, sake, tinctures and cordials, grain alcohols- she mixes them together, and then pours them over basically every bumper crop of nearly too-ripe vegetable we have. I didn’t realize it, but you can pickle damn near everything- peas, flowers, potatoes. The potatoes are actually quite fun- they’re the blank canvas of vegetables, and sidle up to every flavor profile you can put in a brine. The only thing is they can’t be pickled raw- a light cooking is required to make them delicious.

Vinegar pickles tend to have a deeper vinegar sting, but can also be very sweet when sugar or honey is added to the brine. They lack active bacterial cultures. There are as many approaches to preserving a vegetable as there are vegetables in total- and for every variety of that one vegetable, all the possible preservation methods can be applied. Sweetness and sourness vary greatly between years, recipes, and processes- so experimentation is truly key.

“The ploughman’s lunch, a meal of cheese, bread, and pickle, was an invention of the post-Flight Skuan government, a successful attempt to get the Fae to eat more cheese after the end of a good century or so’s worth of rationing. The combination became classic during the Winter Wars, as the various diaspora Fae traveled around the World, bringing the young tradition to new places- new pickles met new cheeses, and new people were exposed to the idea of eating them together with some sort of grain. Miso, pickles, and rice, anyone? -The Winter Wars were round-about the Second Age, kids; it was a long, long time ago,"

“Mm- in Germa, the combination of savory cheddar and sweet-and-salty pickle became a staple after refugees from Winter’s Teeth in the Kush came through Raimes; before then, we mostly combined pickles with liverwurst. Not a bad combination; but not the same as milk-cheese, either,"

“Mm- different cheeses go best with different pickles, too. Pickled okra with smoked paprika-smokra- for example, goes best with creamy blue cheese. Pickled beets and an aged crottin; smokra and cambozola, bijou and heirloom red beets…"

“Takuan and chèvre; Limburger and kabees el lift, sauerkraut with melted Jack cheese- hm, mixed-milk triple crème with pickled butternut squash puree… the squash would pull the sweetness of the milk to the forefront, I think,"

“Now, if you were watching me make the sandwiches with pickles, you saw me dabbing them dry. This is because pickle brine will overwhelm any cheese, and most foods too; a soggy sarnie is no fun at all, and wet wedges suck the fun right out of tasting. If you ever set up a cheese plate with pickles, you ought to let them drain for a quick bit- a minute or two if you must be posh, or just dab them off and go if it’s family and friends; and don’t be afraid to take a slice or a dab, rather than an entire pickle to eat with cheese, in order to keep all of the flavors in balance,”

“Ah- but don’t throw out the pickle brine when the pickles are gone! It’s main culinary use is in making more pickles; but you can also use it in sauces, as a replacement for vinegar, in a marinade, to boost the flavor of potatoes, as a part of your bread- or you will when one of you figures out how to control your food luck-”

“Ice-pops, hangover cures… honestly, anything you would use a pickle for, you can use the brine for too. Shoot, I might start making mozzarella and putting them in pickle brines-”

“Oho!”

“Mnhm, I’ll do that. Deb, Beat, you two will be learning with- ah, Fern, you want to learn too?”

“Yes, I quite like cheese- but mostly, I need a plate of all the tea sandwiches, two slices of cake, a thermos of tea, some cups, and a small umbrella,"

“Havij’s not ready to come back out?"
“...Neo really hurt her, Mab. I don’t think she meant to do it; I honestly think she tripped, and Chopper’s got her doing RICE on her ankle, but... it’s not good. I don’t think anyone’s at fault- but I also don’t think it’s the kind of thing that can be taken back,”

“Ah. Well; go deeper back into the closet, to where I keep the shoes. There should be a bench in there; much easier than using an umbrella to keep the clothing clear. As for the food; would you rather have a bento?"

“Bentos are available?"

“Mm- let me see now… this is the thermos you’ll want, it’s got two cups; and a nice honey-lemon-chamomile, to calm down and cut the heavy, sweet, and fatty flavors. Does she want chocolate or lemon for the cake?”

“Two chocolate, please,”

“Right- Sanji; ah, thank you; and into the boxes they go. Now, I’ll send you up with the tea sandwiches, and tea cakes, and biscuits too- Havij won’t be coming down for dinner, will she?”

“...Probably not,”

“Right; more cheeses, cured meats, and pickles, too. Bottom tier is cheese, meat, and pickles; middle tier is tea cakes, biscuits, clotted cream, butter, preserves, and salted nuts; top tier is sandwiches, individually wrapped. Rinse it out and leave it in the sink, or wash it and leave it to dry before you go to bed, Fern- wait, would you rather have a basket?"

“Um… yeah, actually, and some cutlery? Napkins?"

“Right- spoons, picks, napkins, picnic blanket, plates, shawl for Havij, shawl for you-”

“Ah, it’s cold up there, I forgot-”

“A text-enabled phone, if you need help; and the pack it all goes in, which you can keep if you’d like, I think it would work a bit better going forwards- oh, and i’ve got a honey-brown one if you’d- ah, I guess not,”

“Wow! This is perfect!”

“Mm. Off with you, then; Sanji, shall I put the excess up in the main?”

“Please do; we’ll leave you to your conversation,”

“Mm. Send in a round to the Sanitary; I feel that Neo will need some homely comfort just as much as Havij will,”

“Will do, Mab,”

Ah, my wife is so considerate and kind!
By heavens, that was odd; still, with a flutter and a blink, the food is set out on the main galley table, and the majority of the people who came in trickle back out- Deborah only sticks around long enough to give Fern a boost back up into the Wardrobe, where Havij is still hiding.

I set out my tiered cake stand, arrange slices of cake and tart, scones and biscuits, and the many sandwiches as well; platters of cured meat, fresh cheeses, plain black tea, sugar, honey, lemon, cream…

And then I bid Mila, Parsley, and Sohei to take a seat, sit myself down, and pour.

It’s all very quiet for a long moment, and then I speak.

“Our crew operates much more like a family, or a dorm; we each have our own interests, and we support each other in our various dreams and escapades… but at the end of the day, we each do genuinely care about each other, and want each other to be happy. Sohei, please- tell me why Neopolitan made her sister cry,”

“...It’s. It’s hard for me to talk about. Bastani Azmi and Munire were good friends of mine, a-and it was on that friendship that I hired Neo in the first place; I kept her because she’s good at her job, but I hired her because of her parents. Neo… she was on her way to becoming a very successful session musician when her parents died, and Havij was all of eight at the time. Neo couldn’t keep the hours of a session musician anymore, with her parents gone… and, of course, Havij… I’m fairly certain Havij was there, the day the Mutsu sank. Both of her parents worked on it, of course-”

“Gods in heaven! Their parents were Royal Marines?”

“Aye, Sirrah Parsley; their mother was an engineer, and her father was a seaman. Good people; very brave, and very kind. The reason I think Havij saw the ship sink… it’s her reaction to thunderstorms, and as you know…”

“The Mutsu sank due to internal explosion,”

“Quite right. Neopolitan and Havij were orphaned all at once, that day; Neo had to give up her dream job, and take one that was well within her abilities, but in no way engaging for her. And little Havij… she’s never been quite right again,”

“Well, if she saw her parents die, if she saw an entire ship-”

“Battleship,”

“Ouff! An entire battleship sinking due to internal explosion, all witnessed by a child of eight years; yes, even a grown soul would come out strange from something like that. I witnessed a murder when I was five; certainly, I was never the same again,”

“Mm. As for why Neo made Havij cry… frankly speaking, they just don’t gel as people. It doesn’t help that Neo’s fairly clumsy when she’s not got that hammer of hers in hand; today was just a case of Neo being her clumsy self, and Havij trying to work through her grief,”

“Did Havij make something particularly breakable?”

“Missus Mab, Havij’s only hobby is making ships in bottles,”

“Oh shit,”
“Oh yes; and, I’m quite sure that she remade her parent’s battleship… and that Neo broke it, when she tripped over her own feet, as she does nearly once a fortnight.”

“No _wonder_ the poor girl ran in cryin’; Parsley, can’t we fix it or-?”

“Mila… it’s a one of a kind, made to order Art-object. The bottle is completely broken, Sohei?”

“The way Havij was crying, I’m fairly certain of it,”

“Then there’s nothing to be done; the ship was built with the bottle in mind, and without the bottle, the ship is of no use,”

“Ach, it’s a shame- Havij was so excited about working on it, you know? She was overjoyed when I told her she could use any of the crafting supplies she liked- chattered on about her project, what she was going to do, how pretty it would be when it was done…”

“The real shame is that her ship was beautiful even when it was broken; it must have been stunning when it was all together. It doesn’t surprise me that Doctor Chopper had to sedate Neo to get to her ankle; I’ve only seen her that upset on the anniversary of her parents death… and a bit after her parents died. Even when Doctor did sedate Neo, she was still inconsolable,”

“…Well, that’s a hell of a thing. No one’s fault, I think- and if it was… if Neo did mean to break Havij’s sculpture, she has to live with the result of her actions for the rest of her life. Havij is going to remember this forever; and, whether her sister meant it or not, only time will tell if Havij ever forgives her sister or herself for what happened today,”

“Halloo-!”

“Ah, Chairete! Come in, come in-”

“Ah, hello; Sohei, Neo’s turned her ankle, and I’ve come to find Havij and bring her round to check on her sister. She’s a reet canny one, our Havij; no reason to keep her away while Neo’s out. Er- oh, I’ve interrupted, I’m sorry, ever so-”

“Actually, Tellicherry, you’re just in time. Excuse me, everyone; it sits wrong with me to leave Neopolitan alone, and Havij is at the age where dragging her out of a snit before she’s ready will just make her snitting worse than before. Ta, for now;”

“Uh- sure, Sohei,”

“Of course! Our condolences for Neo’s ankle,”

“Here, Cherry- take my seat, and have a nice cuppa,”

“…well, if you insist, Sohei,”

And _Tellicherry_ takes Sohei’s place at the table. She sets a small fruit crate filled with something broken that clinks down next to her on the floor; I can see down into it over the table. It’s full of large pieces of broken glass, the most broken of which are glued to the bottom of a beautiful ship.

That must be Havij’s ship in a bottle.
Tellicherry is a Fairy, like me- unlike me, she’s not a particularly strong flyer, and has no real reason to become stronger. She dresses like an ascetic or a bride- long black braid down her back, bright red clothing… Oh. Nose ring; she’s a devotee of Pyth, specifically. But… she also has marks that… I think she follows all the Fae Gods?

I’ve mentioned before that, although I took Divinity, I very nearly failed out of it. I don’t know much, theologically speaking, about the Gods, or the Faesh pantheon.

Tellicherry does; in fact, I’m fairly sure we’ve picked up a Priestess- or a Zealot- not just another accountant.

I started growing my hair out when I was three years old. At ten, I was bade to devote myself to a god or goddess; I chose Pyth because… well, nevermind why.

My nose was pierced as a mark of my devotion, and for five years after that, I was taught the Mysteries of Pyth the Bull. Katas, dances, songs and secrets- all these things I learned. I also learned double-entry bookkeeping as a matter of devotion; Pyth is the God of Commotion and Order, after all.

I was also picked to become the Mother Superior of our monastery, and so I began to learn the whole of the Pantheon; Acobi, Garmuth, Hense, Lemaign, Micia, Olak, Jevel, Pyth, Roathus, Yudrig, Zul, and Caelya. These are the Gods of the Fae.

I worship all the Gods, as they rise and fall with the turning of the Wheel; but the one I praise above all others is Pyth. I’m only just starting to understand the truth of His Mysteries; the God of Commotion and Order is no child’s toy, and the meaning of Strength is not something a child would know.

(Acobi, the Chastened Maid; the Goddess of Oath and Abandon. No one bound Her save herself; it was the Chastened Maid Herself that designed Her shackles. By Her will are Oaths made binding; and by your own are Oaths bound.

Garmuth, the Crippled Duke; the God of Purpose and Folly. Despite His lack of senses, the Crippled Duke gives counsel to the humble and the Wise. His is the voice which tells you which way to turn, even when no way appears; He is the still, quiet voice, which always speaks the truth.

Hense, the Veiled Widow; the Goddess of Pain and Pleasure. It is said that the Veiled Widow is smiling beneath Her black shrouds, Her body all scratches and scars. The body is Her domain; in all it’s joys and sorrows.

Lemaign, the Mason King; the God of Hope and Despair. Before each battle, soldiers pray that the Mason King grant them high morale, and blight the morale of their enemies. For some reason, he’s also the patron of all Architects.

Micia, the Lorn Mother; the Goddess of Loss and Longing. The Mother who gives birth to all, and waits to greet the dead. The Lorn Mother gave away Her heart, and bears the Stars of the Sky in its stead.

Olak, the Carefree Son; the God of Chance and Whim. He is worshipped by gamblers, risk takers, and those seeking good luck. Alive forever in a single moment, the Carefree Son plays beyond the reach of time.

Jevel, the Tower Keeper; the God of Health and Atrophy. He gives His worshippers longer lives, though He sometimes strikes them down with atrophy and disease. Half the Tower Keeper’s face is that of a youth in His prime, and the other, an old man.

My God is Pyth, the Wakeful Bull; the God of Commotion and Order. He grants greater strength to his followers; his worshippers are warriors, soldiers, archers and architects and blacksmiths, too. The Wakeful Bull, patient and temperamental, treads both road and furrow with the same great strength to His stride.

Roathus, the Gorging Host; the God of Thirst and Plenty. The Gorging Host grows ever larger yet remains insatiable, His eyes awash in tears. There are some who call him The Hunger; but that’s a cult-name, not his True Name.

Yudrig, the Morning Stallion; the God of Impulse and Bravery. The Morning Stallion affects the wishes of all people upon the break of each new day. In older times, he was the God of the Sun.

Zul, the Silent Singer; the Goddess of Truth and Secrets. Her lips drip with blood from keeping secrets and truths locked in Her mouth or resting on her tongue, but never spoken. She keeps the ones that aren’t to be mentioned; the ones that can’t be said, even though She wishes to; and the ones that She hopes someone will ask about, even though She hides them. It is said she sang the World into being, and will sing it’s ending, in time. Zulwood trees are sacred to her.

Caelya, the Boundless Infinite; the Goddess of Story and Song. There is magic in a bard’s song, and it’s called Inspiration. It’s what tells you you’re to fight; and that you’re going to win. She made the words that the Singer sang, so long ago; and it is from her that all Inspiration comes. Acobi is her twin.)

Even now, full grown and out on my own, I still recite the Pantheopaly to myself, just to remember…

“Ach, Havij and Neo have a terrible relationship. They don’t talk to each other; they don’t share.

Is it not said that one good deed begets another? And so I shall help them; I’ve left it alone for much too long.

“I’m not a hero, I must emphasize- even if I’m butting in where I don’t belong, I’m no kind of hero. I just can’t stand to see two sisters fight like this. There’s so little time, in life- none of it guaranteed- and to see them waste it like this… I can’t stand it!”

“What do you mean, Miss Tellicherry?”

“Well, Missus Mab, I mean… I know it wasn’t always like this. Sohei told me a story about how he took the two of them- the Bastani girls- to the beach once. They both collected seashells except Havij was too young to realize what seashells actually looked like, so she only collected rocks. When they got home- ah, I should mention, Sohei used to live with the Bastani’s as a sort of housekeeper? Or rather, he was the children’s governor- governess being the female form- and it was only after their parents deaths that he became wholly responsible for them both.
I think the real reason Neo became an accountant is well, twofold. For one, no one else was willing to hire Sohei after the Bastani’s had; there are many in Ryugu Mergyo who do not consider Mink to be, well, people. -anyway, once the girls and Sohei got home, they compared their finds and that’s when Havij realized she fucked up. She demanded Neo give her some of her seashells, but Neo refused; apparently, she got so much saltwater in her eyes trying to find her collection, it looked like she’d had a crying fit at the beach.

Havij fought Neo for the shells and bit Neo’s back so hard she has a scar by her shoulder blade. Their relationship, such as it is, was colored by that day forever more; I doubt Havij remembers it aside from the story we tell her of it, but Neo almost certainly does, and as that was the summer before their parents took commision on the battleship Musu…”

“I see. That is a conundrum… as is what to do with that poor broken memory you’ve got in the box. Pop it up on the table, and we’ll have a look?”

“Alright- I was thinking of kintoki, for what to do with it; although, I certainly don’t quite have the skill for it.”

“I do- and I think that will work just fine; you can help me, if you’d like?”

“I’d be delighted,”

And I smile at Queen Mab. She’s actually very kind, behind that stern exterior. There beats the heart of one blessed by the Pantheon, under that humming breast. …I wonder if she’d mind teaching me to fly better? I was raised by nuns, so, I didn’t have anyone who could teach me the proper ways…

That was one of the reasons I left, really; Pyth came to me in prayer, and told me that I could not find the right way to use my whole body by chaotically flailing on my own. He said unto me, that I must go and seek a teacher; and when the right one came, they would see me as their student, and teach me what I needed to know.

...Maybe there’ll be something I can teach Queen Mab? I hope so; it would be nice, to be able to help a Queen of my people. Imagine, the Queen of the Fae being helped by a fairy-woman who doesn’t even know how to fly!

I wonder if Tellicherry will tutor me in Divinity? She might- and I’d like, at the very least, someone go over my forms with me.

Parsley and Mila left some time during Tea; they ate, and they drank, they listened quietly- then they shared a telling look, and then they took a tea tray of things up to the Sanitary to “keep Miss Neopolitan Sonnato company in this trying time.”

I took it to mean they were going to go get some more information. I waved them on, and consolidated the Tea service.
“...Do you have anything else to do today, Tellicherry, or were you wanting...?”

“No, not really,"

“Ah, good. You know, I’ve been meaning to speak with Franky about expanding our Altar; it’s not really big enough for everyone to use, and there are things we ought to put on it that we just don’t have room for,”

“Mm- I noticed the ofrenda; I assume our joining of the crew wouldn’t have strained it’s space too much, but getting an entire company of Postals, that’s a bit different,”

“I think it’s a votive offering, not just a regular ship in a bottle- forgive me for being so blunt, but I was never a good follower of any of the Gods, especially Zul,”

“No, no- I think you’re a devotee of the deeper Mysteries, and have been since you were very young; even learning Divinity in college-level classes doesn’t really touch on the deeper levels, you’d need to go to Seminary for that. I’d be happy to talk with you about it, if you’d like?”

“I would- I was going to ask for just that, actually. -ah, she’s calmed down; see, here they both come now,”

“...but Fern, it’s not tea-time anymore, I- isn’t it nearly dinner?”

“Yeah, but Missus Mab has a whole fridge full of things we can eat, and Chef Sanji already knows you won’t want to go up to dinner- did I not mention I have the Sight? Because I do, I mean- I don’t wear this eye mask just because,”

“Oh, I see; your True Eyes overpower your physical eyes when you meta-literally open them. By keeping them shut, you keep control over what you See,”

“Exactly!”

“Hm. Have you looked into contoured masks at all?”

“I have, but I haven’t been ready to commit to that level of self-control; there’s enough space behind some of them that I’d be able to open my eyes behind the mask...”

“Well, so don’t make it an issue, then- have a mask for work, and mask for sleeping, and maybe one for everything else- like, um, camera obscura? That’s not the word for it, um...”

“...ka?”

“Well, um, what I’m trying to say is- an artist’s technique where a mirror gets half-silvered, so you can see through the glass to what you’re drawing, and see your drawing at the same time. I think a pair of glasses, maybe like Sancho’s- the ones with the lens in the middle and the frame with the spaces?”

“Oh yeah, the ones that make him look like an owl-”

“Well, what if you had a pair of, um, of bifocals- not actual lenses, but half-silvered and only half-there in your frames? Then, you could look out- ”

“And look in at the same time! Interesting; I have absolutely no idea what would happen, but I want to find out!”

“Cool! Um, have you considered using other kinds of glass for seeing through? Not everything has
I reach up and roll my wrist; the charm bracelet I’ve only just started wearing chimes and clinks against itself, and my shadow darts down, smaller and smaller until it’s no bigger than a honeyjacket, smaller still until it’s the size of a poppy seed, and then finally it darts into the Hive, where I keep all of my Shadow Selves when they aren’t being used.

“Is that new, Mab?”

“Mm, it is, Fern; I do best with mnemonic devices, so I was looking at charm bracelets anyway. This one was in the Hotel gift shop, and I suppose Sanji saw me looking at it- they were asking a frankly absurd price for it, but, well… I liked it, and that’s rather rare as far as jewellry goes,”

“He bought it for you?”

“Mm. I think the day we checked out; he only gave it to me this morning, and I haven’t taken it off since,”

“Um… I- I think it really, um, brings a spark of whimsy and fun to your outfit,” “Hmhm. I was feeling simple, today; sweater dress, tights, and the shoes seemed like enough to me,”

“It’s a very winter outfit, innit? The only real color you’ve got on is the gold of y’bracelet an’ the brown of y’dress, Mab; you certainly do look warm, though,”

“Oh, goodness, I didn’t even ask- are either of you cold? Have I gone over how to use this room yet?”

“Um, no,”

“Goodness gracious- well, sit down, Havij, I’ll explain to you and Tellicherry how things work,”
And then I do. I explain how it works- requisitions, standard wardrobes, the whole lot.

“Cor, that’s bloody useful, innit?”

“Language, Miss Tellicherry!”

I said it with a broad, obvious wink; Tellicherry, who I think is at least a starter-friend now, shortles with laughter.

“Um… so, I’m wondering now if I shouldn’t have a work table or a workshelf or something of the like up here, Fern,”

“How- ah, right. You’re a machinist, not a woodworker or a wright… I dunno, I mean- Missus Mab?”

“Hm. Depends on how small you’re willing to work; some things, I just buy rather than go through the hassle of getting anyone to fabricate for me, simply because the tolerances involved are so monotonous and finicky, I’d rather farm them out than make you or Franky or even Havij, now, lose their blessed minds,”

“Ah. Kind of like how I only learned the bare basics of astrology back ho- erm, back in Ryugu Mergyo, what with the distinctive lack of actual night sky?”

“A bit, yeah. Havij- if you want to learn to fix up the sewing machines, I’ve no problem it. I’d be happy to teach you to sew, as well, if you’d like,”

“...I think I’d, um, I’d like that. Ah… I’m, I’m not angry at my sister, not really; I’m angry that my ship got broken, and really sad, too, because I worked so hard on it, and… and I’m upset because my sister hurt herself. But, I’m not angry at her; there’s nothing for me to forgive, I don’t think,”

“...Alright, Havij; do you want help doing kintoki on your ship, or would you rather leave it to Mab and me?”

“Um… I think I can help without being too sad; but… I want to do something nice for my sister, too. The ship is for me; my next big project is for her,”

“What do you want to do?”

“I want to restore a saxophone I got from the junkyard; I think I got every piece I could from the yard, and the rest I got for cheap from a consignment shop. Mostly bits and pieces, and chunks of other sax’s that were broken down; I think I’ve got enough pieces and parts and examples to make one good horn, plus all the bits to put it together,”

“Oh my. Well; I quite like your ambition! And… I am to assume that you’re keeping this from Neo, Havij?”

“I am, Missus Mab; not that she’d be shocked, or anything, I just want to surprise her… and there’s no reason for her not to play, now, there can’t be that much accounting work to do,”
“Well- no, not after the first week or so, and we’ll be well finished by the time we get to the first island in the New World.”

“See, Miss Cherry! S-so, um, I think… I think my sister will be dreadfully bored if all she does is, um, train and haunt the library,”

“I quite agree; nothing good comes of boredom,”

And I stare into the beaming face of a chronically nervous Havij, and I think- my goodness, she’s just like me but shy. This will be interesting to watch play out…

Another cold day under the Sea.

Everyone seems to be settling in more or less easily; and after a few small mishaps, the newcrew has adjusted to using the Laundry system, and everyone has settled into their various routines.

Havij has been hard at work, carefully refurbishing the franken-phone for her sister; oddly enough, getting the monstrous dents out of the instrument was the least difficult. So far, she’s been taking the most time on the tooling of the designs on the Sax; unifying I think three or four different designs, and adding her own little flourishes- without overwhelming the surface of the instrument. It’s tough, because she only has one chance to get the tooling right. She’s been tracing out curves and arcs on the soft brass of the instrument for days and days- it’s only today she’s actually started using the chisel.

Fern, meanwhile, has been carefully taking apart something… old. It’s very old, and missing more than half its parts- which, I suppose, explains why it’s got only half the potency I’d expect from something so old. It still works, is the thing- but just from what Fern’s been taking apart, I can tell it had a significant number of functions that just aren’t there anymore. It’s a Tarot Device; something like what a Computer does, except instead of a person who does complicated mathematics, it’s a machine Haki-built for something like the same job… except, where a Computer mostly works in physics and accounting (that’s what Tellicherry and Neo actually do, they just hold Assistant titles because the pay was better), a Tarot Device works in very immediate Sensing and Probability. I’ve seen a historical example; Bylgja had what’s commonly known now as a Combined Computer Device, a visor, tablet, and vocal relay device set that allowed her to claim tactical expertise over any battlefield.

Fern has parts of each thing- part of a visor, part of a tablet, and part of a vocal relay device. No one thing is whole and entire; the closest is the tablet portion, and it’s missing at least half of it’s vital components. Even so, I’ve allowed her access to the schematics of my Battle Crown; it’s an altered version of Bylgja’s tablet, after all. It’s also a lot easier to add functions, rather than subtract them, I think- or, no, other way around. Thankfully, my schematics also include the schema for Bylgja’s visor and vocal relay (vox).

The Tablet requires Fern learn Runes, which is simple enough; and to use the Faesh Tarot, which is not so simple. Unlike in the other Blues, there is only one spread for Tarot in Sky Blue. That spread is the Four Royal Advisors. (Technically, she could use a regular deck of Grease playing cards; but that’s actually fairly advanced- it’s much easier to learn Tarot than it is to forcibly remember each value for Grease. Of course, she’ll need both to really make full use of her Device, but- baby steps, love.)
Younger people read Tarot as a fortune-telling system; a deck of cards with enough story beats inside to tell any tale that needs telling. This isn’t untrue, mind; a good Seer and the right deck of cards can see far beyond the veil. It can be used as simple entertainment, and to earn a bit of cash. On a deeper level, however, Tarot is also a meditation tool—there are some who say that’s the proper use for it, but it’s just a tool. It’s a particularly multifaceted tool; so long as you put it to work, it will work as it works.

This spread was invented as a meditation tool, a meditation on life— the influences on it, the subtleties, and the paths through it. The cards can tell the future; they can also berate you for ignoring your own advice, or answer an entirely different question.

Using the Four Royal Advisors spread for the first time is a long process. I’m fairly practiced at it, so it only takes me about forty-five minutes to lay it out; and another twenty for a very shallow, surface-level reading. Fern took two hours to lay it out, and another hour and a half for the shallow reading; and that was with lunch in the middle. Deep readings take much, much longer.

“The Royal Advisors were once the kings of each Kingdom of Fae; they were paid handsomely and ate well. These are the coins I use to bind the space before I lay out the cards; and this is the string I keep them on. I use one-beri coins because there’s hardly anything you can buy with them except at festivals; and that’s where I spend them, mostly on games of chance, or handed out to small children, or as offerings to local gods,”

“Okay; ah, was it right that I set some of my lunch aside for the spread?”

“It was; ah, if you only have a drink, be sure to pour four for the Advisors. It’s polite. This spread can also be used for inspiration, when you’re trying to create a story or something of the kind; legend says that the Four Royal Advisors was created by a storyteller,“

The dining table, being the largest in the ship, is clear. Well, it should be, it’s well between services and I got a piece of flexi-glass to keep the spread from being disturbed by luncheon antics…

Anyway. We’re using my deck for this, as Fern hasn’t found a deck amongst the many I have that really speaks to her. I think I know which one she’ll like, though— I’ll offer it amongst a few others I think would suit.

“This is the story of the Four Royal Advisors. After a great war, four kingdoms were united into one. The ruler, both powerful and wise, had long ago learned that no single person could be right, or even choose correctly, every time. Thus, this ruler called upon the four defeated kings, who each had a special talent, to provide her counsel.

“These defeated kings became the Four Royal Advisors; and when the Great Queen needed advice, to make a decision or in the steering of the ship of state, she would call upon them. The five would then debate the issue amongst themselves until an answer became clear. They didn’t always like each other- or agree- but they, all five of them, were bound together in service to their people, the crown, and in the patient study of all Worlds: physical, spiritual, mythical, mental, and mystical. This ritual, in and of itself, is mystical- so do not look within it for a mystic reading. The whole thing is the mystic portion. You, as the interpreter, hold the mental aspect- there can be no ritual without someone to actually do the ritualized bits, after all, and getting an answer to your question does no good if you don’t think it over, too.

“I shall explain the spread as it expands from you, the reader; firstly, I shall explain the Eye Within the Wheel.

“The First Advisor to the Queen was a physician and a learned expert in all matters of the person; winged with feathers and learned in many things. It is said that the eye is a window to the soul; but it is also an eye. This Advisor could soothe a fever or heal a cough, and could speak to the condition of the Queen, to where the mind stood and how the body influenced it. The First Advisor, the Learned Physician, sees things as they truly are- but only within a very narrow realm.

“The first card, the Iris, represents the self, around which the Physical World revolves as it moves forward. The self moves and the Wheel turns around it; but the World of the single person, your World, remains steady.

“The cards laid above the Iris-self, from two to seven, represent a known and visible life; your current story of existence, the immediate and accessible place in which the self exists. You should recognize these cards and know their story as the Physician knows the workings of the body. As you move forwards from the second to the seventh card, look from the present to the immediate future, to see what is obvious to be seen.

“The cards laid below the Iris-self, from eight to thirteen, are the unseen life; your Mysteries and the forces which drive the events and people surrounding the self. These cards are representatives of the subtext of your story, the true meaning and secret catalysts of the visible life. Learn these, too; understand them if you can. Do not discount them out of turn- just because you cannot see the subtext of something does not mean it isn’t there. There is always something underneath; look behind you from the eight card and understand where your present situation comes from; look ahead to the thirteenth card to see what may influence where you go from where you are. Questions?”

“Let me see if I’ve got this right- two to seven is what I can see; eight to thirteen is what I can’t. Each card corresponds, like, two-eight, three-nine, and so on; what I see has something underneath it, a hidden reason for being. The card in the middle of the eye-shape- the Iris in the Eye- is the best representation of me. Right?”

“...The Iris represents you, right now. Do the spread again in a week, and you might have changed- the cards will reflect it. Then again, there’s more than one interpretation of each card- that’s why you’ve got a small booklet of tarot card definitions, and a very thick dictionary,”

“Hm… is the tablet from my Device just a storage method for the information in my books? So I don’t have to keep it in my head?”

“Hmhm. Yes, so far as I know; and yes, I can give you the schema for how to make something that would do that. You’d have to take a Faerie Oath, because the knowledge is technically Secret; but I am allowed to teach you.”

“...Hm. Can you give me the first principles, and let me figure it out from there?”

“-Yes, I suppose. It’d take much longer, though,”

“I think that’s the way to go; it’s not getting there, it’s always the swim that’s most interesting. I’ll figure it out, Missus Mab, it doesn’t matter how long it takes,”
“Hm? Hmhmhmhm- I see what you mean. Well, shall we move on to the next part of the spread?”

“I think so, yes,”

“Right. The Wheel of Storms is the second part of the card spread. The Second Advisor to the Queen was a Scholar and a knower of all things from books and reports; a discerner of moral and immoral, of ethical and unethical, of rules and guidelines; a noble one, a philosopher, but rooted deeply in the world. This Scholar could put the longest name to the smallest beetle, but was tied to the joys and sorrows and lusts and gifts and wonders and horrors of this World. This is no bad thing; the Scholar lives a present and energetic life, and looks outwards as much as inwards. The Queen depended greatly on the Scholar to bring news of the wide World into the narrow considerations of the crown. Even so, a scholar cannot solve every problem,

“The cards descending from above the eye from fourteen to seventeen are the first of the Pillar of Virtues. These are gifts and passions to be proud of; know the four virtues you are shown, that you may be proud of them. Descending from below the eye from eighteen to twenty-one are likewise four cards in the pillar of virtues to know well; you should nourish them, as they are at present only seeds of virtues that may someday exist. Consider how these virtues might grow in your heart, and whether some should grow more than others. Questions?”

“Um- this line of cards, top to bottom in the Storm, is the Pillar of Virtues. Above the Eye, the Pillar is Strongest; below, only just begun. Um… are they stronger nearest to the Eye?”

“In the first half of the pillar, they aren’t. Below the eye, it’s reversed- strongest to weakest again, but strongest is closest to the eye.”

“I see. I think… this pen and diary you gave me, they’re for me to make notes with the Tarot?”

“Aye, if you like-”

“I do. I’ve put each card on the spread in order of draw, and it’s orientation. I’ll try reading it at the end, I think,”

“Alright; that’s your choice. The cards that trail behind the eye, moving towards, through, and away from it on the flat plain from twenty-two to twenty-nine are the pillar of vices; consider what lies in your past, and how it may make trouble for you in the future. Resolve to avoid these vices; or if you can’t avoid them, embrace and understand them. Not all vices are inherently bad for you; some can be useful tools, others useful weapons, and some few can be turned into virtues with a bit of work. Remember them as much as, if not more than, your virtues. Never let them guide you,”

“…”

“The cards which begin to the west and circle with the sun from thirty to forty-nine are the cycle of your life- as it appears now, for who you are now. It is here that you may see the future most clearly, if that is your desire: read the dawn, the day, the dusk, and the night of your life-to-come in the circle. Keep clarity of mind and maintain your Virtues; do not fear what lies before you. All of us travel this path, one way or another,”

“…”

“The Winds closest to the center of the Storm blow the hardest; the spokes closest to the axle move fastest. Sometimes, they both seem to travel opposite of their direction. The cards from fifty to fifty-three represent close personal influences on your life; events or people who shaped your existence, or soon will. These influences may not always be good; mark them and judge for yourself what action, if any, you should take. If you wish to remove something or someone from this close sphere of influence, set that card aside when you are ready, and act in the coming year to ‘set it aside’ in your life. Do be sure you know exactly what you’re setting aside- suffering, while terrible, is often the only possible way to grow. -there are seeds from certain trees and plants that can only sprout and grow if they’ve been, well, baked first. They’re covered in a kind of crystallized wax, and the wax is too thick for the baby plant to break through. Forest fires are terrifying, and horrible to live through- and if they did not come, there are trees and flowers that would never be seen again,“

“...”

“Mm. The outer spokes from fifty-four to fifty-seven are not yours to control; they represent worldly influences. These cannot be removed or prevented, except by luck or effort; they are the way of the World, and can only be watched for and compromised with. If you wish to change the World-that-is, look to these cards, and prepare for a great work ahead of you,”

“...”

“The Third part of the spread is the Wall; and the Wall has two natures- the Inner Wall, and the Outer Wall. The Third Advisor to the Queen was a constant naysayer: a Cynic, a pessimist, and a faithful curmudgeon. Many people, eae sometimes the other Advisors, asked the Queen, ‘Why bother? Why listen to someone who can never say yes?’ To which the Queen replied, ‘Because at the very least I know one person who is unafraid to say no.’ The Cynic may not always see things as they are, or may see the world through a murk of despair- but at least a pessimist can be pleasantly surprised. It is better to know the obstacles you face than to pretend there are no obstacles at all.

“The cards from fifty-eight to sixty-four are obstacles to, perhaps, overcome; they prevent the self and the Wheel of Storms from achieving pleasure and enlightenment. You may know some of them; some may be old friends. Some may be inside you- Inner Walls; some may be outside you- Outer Walls. Not all are surmountable, and few can be conquered alone.

“Then again, some may be new. Many may be linked to the vices, virtues, and influences of the Wheel. Consider how this dividing wall might be scaled, disassembled, tunneled under, or run through- and consider the costs of overcoming such a thing. ‘No’ exists for a reason; focus on the achievable,”

“...”

Fern scratches notes into her book furiously- I think she’s been… yes, she’s been writing down my instruction of her verbatim. That’s not all I’m doing, but; of all the Suntides, Vinsmoke Fernanda has the most aptitude for Knowing Transference. I think it’s because she’s a seer. Think of it like… copying over a book that can access several libraries worth of information, if you think about what you need to know hard enough.

Writing down the spoken words of my lecture only gets the barest outline of it; I’m also giving her the knowledge of how a Tarot Device works, because I used to use one all the time back when I was an Office Lady. I’m giving her the knowledge of the Suits, the Tarot, and an entire grimoire’s worth of spells that can only be used in tandem with a Tarot Device. Of course, it’ll be up to her to actually learn to use any of what I’ve taught her- but the Knowing I’ve given over to her, based as it is on my own Knowing, my own experience… well, there’s a reason Fae are so particular about blood, and I’ll leave it at that.
“The fourth, and final part of the spread is the Tree. The Fourth Advisor to the Queen was a Dreamer, a do-nothing, know-nothing jester who was always changing their opinions and never kept to plans. Their only skills were in making light and making laughter; which is not to say they did not understand seriousness, and solemnity. Where the other advisors made careful studies, the Dreamer acted and spoke on instinct. What many missed on first glance was that the Dreamer did not repeat themselves often; and they did not repeat their mistakes. After all, if there was no laughter, no joy or pleasure in it, could it possibly be the right decision to make? And the point of going the wrong way is to get closer to the right way of doing something. The Dreamer climbed trees, Fern- and often fell out of them; but they said the importance was in ascension, and in falling, and in climbing again.

“The first cards of the Tree are the Branches. They are paired up the Tree from sixty-five to seventy-four, and represent the steps to joy; they are situations, people, events, or learnings yet to come that can lead the self to enlightenment and peace. You may have climbed a few of them, or gone up and fallen back down. Learn each Branch, and consider what tasks are before you to achieve what you seek; not to mention what exactly you do seek, and whether this path will lead you there.

“The final four cards of the spread are the Crown, representing the actual ascent: your journey from the Eye, through the Storm, past the Wall, and up the Tree towards your goal. They are actions to take, decisions you must make, and things you are learning or have yet to learn. Be patient with what these cards reveal to you; only you can say where on the journey you currently stand, and how far you still have to climb. You’ve written down initial words and observations from the cards, as well as their placement?”

“Yes, Mab,”

“Then that’s it for the day; clear up, take a stretch somewhere, and get ready for dinner. We’ll go through your spread tomorrow,”

“Okay, Mab,”

Mm. Transfer-shock. So much of her mind is now bound up in organizing and distributing the information I just gave her, the little little bit of consciousness left is only barely up to the task of getting her through the evening. A less practiced tutor would let her go to bed immediately, but that’s not the best idea; enforcing good habits for her body will allow more of her mind to focus on the information she’s acquired, rather than on what her body still needs.

At this point, we’re actually through the Undersea Passage; time sure does fly when you’re learning new crewmates and weathering emotional upheavals. Anyway; I make sure that Fern eats a hearty dinner, and washes up thoroughly, and goes straight to bed. I let Franky know not to expect her bright and early tomorrow; and then Sanji and I retire for the night.

The morning actually dawns; we’re still underwater, but there’s light now. Ah, this is exciting; I’ve never actually been to the New World before!
“You will fail all of the bank robberies you don’t commit,”

I slide out of bed with a thump, stretch, and remove my sleeping mask. It’s new; I actually keep them in the dorm mini-fridge. Mostly, it’s full of soda-pop, beer, spring water, and pads on chill because some of my sisters like the cooling sensation.

“Don’t let numbers tell you what to do. You are blood and earth, not numbers and chalk. Not anymore,”

I stretch, and after a satisfying pop in my back, open my eyes. Ignoring the scintillating whirl of the infinite cosmos-

“We will be breaching the surface of the Sea at approximately fourteen hundred hours, or two after the noon; it will be sunny, but not particularly warm. Light chance of frogs, with mist predicted closer to the evening hours. Cry baby cry, make your mama sigh,”

Hm. What am I going to wear today? I won’t have time to change any of my clothing for a good week and a half after this, so it has to be versatile enough to last, or I have to layer up. Hm. Maybe a bag? No, I need to maximise space for provisions, I’ll be separated from my crewmates for basically the entirety of that time- so not the skirt; I’ll wear that after the Thing this week. Okay.

Overalls, Tights, Body Suit, Wrist Warmers, Socks and Bra I can wear for days on end with minimal washing if any; no panties- scratch that, yes panties; and Shoes that won’t quit on me. That’s clothing sorted- what am I going to need?

I’m going to need my Tarot Device- what, all of it? That would be preferable- how? Gems, pick a deck, Faesh playing cards, a bottle of pickle juice, scrap metal, magic.

Okay. Supplies?

Merjin Canteen; Lockpicks; Ball Bearings or Caltrops; Safety Candle; Matches or Lighter; Component Pouch; Holy Symbol (who-? Tellicherry,); Mess Kit; Rations for at least two weeks; Therma Whistle; Small Crystal Orb (who-? Mab or Franky); Trap Kit. Optional adventuring gear.

Hnn. Okay- shower, wash everything, and then a braid which is not my favorite thing but it will keep everything neat-ish for the duration- scarf? Yes.

Scarf.

I move at a respectable clip after making my decisions; my clothing comes out of my locker and gets tossed into my shower basket; my pajamas are nice, I like them; it is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be covered in flies; get dressed, start packing.

New Backpack? Won’t make it.

Old backpack? Too worn out.

Mab? Mab.

“Good Morning, Mab-”

“-! Good morning, Fern, you’re chipper today-”

“-yeah, I’m going to be separated from the crew for about a week starting after two in the afternoon today and I’ve got to get everything together so I need a Mail Messenger bag, please, and a bag for spell components, and-”

“-write it down, I’ll have everything on your list ready after breakfast,”

“Thank you. Okay, um- Sanji, I need rations, a mess kit, and a merjin canteen-”

“-yeah, after breakfast,”

“Okay, thank you. Is Miss Tellicherry awake?”

“Crow’s Nest- anything you can tell about why you’re going to be separated from us?”

“Cry baby cry, make your mama sigh,”

“...pft. That’s not cryptic or anything,”

“Sorry; I’m just a messenger,”

“It’s fine, sweetie. Go catch Franky before he gets out of the Shop-”

“Right! Thank you!”

And then I’m off again.

“Franky franky franky-”

“Wh- waaaaah, woah there kiddo, it’s too early to be so-”

“No time to explain! I need scrap metal, ball bearings, a therma-whistle, and a Trap Kit. Right now,”

“Uh- okay, scrap metal’s where it always is, I’ll give you the standard pound of ball bearings, therma-whistle- uh, aaah, check my left desk drawer, it’s bright orange; and a Trap Kit- here,”

“Thank you, thank you- um. Hm. Lockpicks?”

“Next to the therma-whistle, if you lose one I’ll make you make me a new one,”
“Gotcha- um, um, mmmatches?”

“Long box, second drawer- take a new box,”

“Kay- where are the Safety Candles?”

“Third shelf, far wall from the Forge,”

“Right- okay, um… what would you take on an adventure that is extremely dangerous? Er, going to be extremely dangerous?”

“…Weapons, rope, a Writing Kit, and… waaaaaaaagh, a mirror,”

“A mirror?”

“Some things can’t be defeated any other way, kid,”

“Okay- okay. Need to write this down- see you at breakfast, Franky,” “Sure, kid,”

WRITTEN LIST:

Items for Tarot Device:
Corundum Gems, quantity no less than five of Good Quality
Deck of Tarot Cards - pick from Mab’s supply
Deck of Faesh Playing Cards - new preferred to old
A Bottle of Pickle Juice
A Large Quantity of Scrap Metal
Primagical Transfigura

Items for Fern Adventure Kit:
Merjin Canteen, quantity two Mess Kit
Rations, quantity sufficient for two weeks
Small Crystal Orb, suitable for focus Component Pouch with full complement of fourth level components
Mab’s Choice
Okay. Okay okay okay- um, um, take the legal pad and the fountain pen and run for the crows nest, cutting it close here- Tellicherry!

“Miss Tellicherry, is there a holy symbol that works whether the maker has faith or not?”

“Yep! It’s called the Tree of Life. In simple terms, it’s a trunk with seven branches; you can fancy it up more from there depending on faith, but the basic symbol works even without it,”

“Thank you- um, like this?”

“Exactly!”

“Thank you so much- Breakfast!”

“I know-”

I’m already gone. I slide around Captain to sit next to Gally, which is not at all my normal seat but these are desperate times. I tear out the List and hand it off to a passing Mab, and then I start cramming as much food as I can into my body without over-eating or making myself sick.

Weapons? Probably a good idea, yeah.

Shit.

Um, um-

“The regretful frog must quarrel with the skeptical rooster; they shall go together to the Place of Suffering, and they shall drive with the sleeping summoner of death below the frozen ground in the afternoon of the sixth day at the coming of intoxication. ”

“What the actual fuck,”

“Sorry, Gally; I can’t actually control my prophetic effusions-”

“Shit, you’re actually a Seer?”

“I am, yes,”

“I never saw you at any of Madame Shyarly’s Seer Seminars…?”

“I’m a working Seer; I didn’t really have time for that,”

“Aah. So you don’t know how to really use a tarot deck,”

“No, I don’t– I did straight prophecy and bone-rolls,”

“Interesting. Have you found a deck yet?”

“No, I haven’t– I need to do it by today, actually. Oh, um- I sometimes get premonitions that pertain to… not exactly myself, but close enough for it to not matter either way,”
“And you need a Tarot deck?”

“Yeah- I just haven’t found one that clicks,“

“Hm. Clicking is overrated- you just need one which you like the look of, and you can read. I know- here, this is my deck; I’ve got a spare, so don’t worry about giving it back,”

“Oh! Um- the box too?”

“Yep; always keep your cards in a box, or a bag of some kind. If you’re carrying them on you, like your belt or pocket, keep them in a box; if it’s on your desk or vanity or bag, they go in a bag of their own,”

“...are you sure you want to give these to me? I’m... I’m rebuilding a Tarot device, so I don’t… these are really beautiful, I don’t think I can just-”

“If you want to keep that deck for yourself, that’s just fine- but, you still need a deck for your Device, so use this one, it’s another spare of mine,”

“-this is... oh! The old faithful! ”

“Ha, yeah;”

When I touch the decks, the only thought running through the back of my mind is “please fucking help me”; all the decks say back is “you are a whole goddamn dumbass bitch, aren’t you”, to which I say “no!”. The Old Faithful just shuffles disbelievingly, but the Maryel snorts and shouts back “BITCH WHAT THE FUCK I JUST SAY” and I said back, in tears “you are so right. I am so sorry,”

“-sorry?”

“They click, don’t they,”

“Yes, they do,”

“...You do realize that Tarot cards were playing cards before they were divination foci?”

“Yeah, but- if I use them as playing cards, I still need a Tarot deck; but if I use one, I only need a deck of Faesh playing cards- oh, here Mab comes with- uh-”

“Right, this is everything- finished your breakfast?”

“Yes, Mab- you packed my bag and everything?”

“Of course; unpack and repack so you know where it all is, and I’ve added a bedroll and some pitons because you’ll need to sleep. Oh, yes, and a flask of strong spirits- some of my personal reserve of bourbon, and a few of my sister’s finer potions in their own smaller vials,”

“Uh-”

“I also have a few tarot decks- you’re quite welcome to have a whole collection, quite aside from the one you put in your device; oh, a Maryel and Old Faithful, lovely choices. I’ve got these for you as well- Motherpeace, one of the first round decks; the Collective, my first deck that I’m giving to you; Dark Extract, a very abstracted deck, no human figures to speak of in this one; Wild Unknown, a less abstracted, but still quite abstract deck; Ukiyo-e, more for the symbolism, which I think you’ll understand intuitively; Shadowscapes, for something very Faesh because I just couldn’t resist; and the Dreaming Way, because it made me think of you,”

“Th-these are all really gorgeous, Mab!”

“Hmhmhmhm, thank you for saying so; now, here is a new deck of playing cards, it’s got eight distinct suits, as it’s a Faesh deck. As for the Primagicals—”

“Uh—”

“I’ve made copies of all of them, including the Universalis and the Illuse- don’t fuss, you need the information to at least know if an Illusion is there. Here’s your crystal orb; it’s rose quartz, it’s all I have extra of; and it goes in your component pouch, which I’ve taken the liberty of filling with the eight basic components, excepting illusion- lalala, that’s where I put your orb, in the pouch marked with the Illusion magic symbol. Necromancy has a lovely frog skull; Divination is empty for your Device Tablet; Transmutation has a bracelet; Evocation has a brass-tipped wand; for Abjuration, a pair of enamel pins, a shield and a sword; Conjuration, an empty wooden cup; Enchantment, aside from your other bag right here, a brush pen. Gemstones are here in this matchbox, and I’ve a half-gallon of pickle juice in this bottle here. I’ve set up your work bench, and- ah, good, you’ve had a look through your pack. Sanji will come ‘round in a moment with your canteen, mess kit, and rations- do try to reassure him, he worries about you, you know,”

“Thank you, Mab; I will,”

“Good! Love you, Fern; Good morning, Gally!”

“Good morning, Missus Mab,”

“Love you too, Mab,”

And then she’s gone in a flurry of tasseled shawls. I blink owlishly, and glance at Gally, who is, to borrow a whiteman expression, flabbergasted.

“Yes, she’s always like that. It’s not you, or me, or the day- she’s just like that, Flesh of the sinner shall be renewed in blood. ”

“Okay, that’s fair- but why do none of your sisters really react to your prophecies? Some of them are fucking ominous, Fern,”

I pause a moment. I turn, and take in Gally fully.

Egalatine, “ Gally ”, is a woman with hair the color of ink, nearly plum black, bound up in a bun with a prism-crystal set in a wand. Gauges in her ears, and spots on her cheeks; piercings in her nose and next to her eyes, enormous eyes and a too-wide smile; pointy boots, loose lilac pants, and a thick winter-weight tank top under her many necklaces.
“Prophecy is what you make of it, Gally; people don’t have story arcs. Also, I’ve been prophesying since I was, like, six? So, it’s just not that big a deal, really,”

“...If you say so, Fern,”

I smile up at Gally- and then I accept the things Sanji got out for me, and I give him a firm hug around the ribs. He stiffens for a moment in my arms, and then hug me back very carefully, like he’s scared I’ll break. He lets go a little after I do; and I smile up at my cousin, and I say-

“I’ll be okay, Sanji- No matter what happens, Mab loves you; and you love her, too. Even if neither of you remember, that doesn’t make it not true. Love is not so easily forgotten,”

Once we breached the New World, we were hit with interminable squalls of pottery and butterflies; the Sea churned with lacy underwear. Eventually, the Sea calmed down enough for us to get out of Charybdis’ vomit-backflow, and we were on our way again.

So uh. I didn’t expect to get put on ship-watching duty? I mean, I kinda did- I’m a Fool, not stupid, I know Clowns are absurdly good at small area defence, I just… I dunno. It’s not all bad; with all the new people, and the crew being something like fifty, sixty people now, there are distinctive shifts. Each shift shakes out so that everyone gets at least a few days of off time, and no one does the same job every time- I think as a way to get everyone experienced in working all over the ship, and with each other.

What I do know is that this is the first time in years I haven’t been basically attached at the hip to Cece.

This is also the first time I can remember since… gods, childhood, maybe when I was six or so, that I’ve got… well, friends.

The one who’s starting to become my best friend is Phillips. Phillips is a nervous guy, just about the same size as me but lankier, all narrow features and pointed edges. His bottom eyelashes are thicker than most of his eyebrow; his lips are pale and pink like a seashell, and thin. His nose is long and narrow, with thin nostril flaps and a twitchy point at the end. There’s a softened ovular roundness to his face, and a dancing sort of life in his eyes.

His hair is black, and glistens with rainbows in the sunlight; his shoulders are broad, muscular. His waist is narrow, and his legs are long.

I want to hold his hand, sometimes.
I also want to know what the fuck is going on with Cece- it’s not my fault I can’t spend so much time with her anymore! We don’t have the same work or study schedules, that doesn’t mean I don’t like spending time with her, or that I don’t want to be around her anymore. She’s my sister!

I just… I’ve never seen her bite her tongue so much, or be so guilty about something. I don’t know what her problem with Phil even is- he’s not a bad guy, and he gives her some really good compliments, and she tries to return them… maybe she just hasn’t had much practice really genuinely complimenting people? School was fractious, most of the time…

“-that’s totally something you would wear, Phillip,”

“Thank you, Cecelia!”

I watch out of the corner of my eye as my sister smiles, and fumes behind her smile, and bubbles with guilt and self disgust; and then she smiles again but wider, and busses her lunch dishes, and stalks off.

“Phillip, what the hell is going on with you and Cece?”

“…You can’t tell she’s jealous?”

“What,”

“Sancho… you and her spent most every day together, right?”

“Yeah,”

“Well. Now you’re spending most of your every day with me; so, she’s jealous of you, and your attention, and the time we spend together. I think she just misses you, and the way things were; and she knows she’s doing wrong, treating me the way she is. I’ll confront her about it if she doesn’t get over herself in a few weeks, but… for now, I’m just going to let it be,”

“…but she’s my sister! I mean no offence, truly- you are a lovely friend-”

“Thank you-”

“-but Cecelia is my sister!”

“She might know that in her head, but… it can be really hard to understand that sort of thing in your heart, even when you’re more than half-grown. It’s not all that strange that she’s having such a hard time- she’s only fourteen, after all,”

“Aoife? I thought you were on night-shift?”

“I was, and then Zoro saw my sword and shield.; Annie’s much happier now, so I guess things worked out, but… I’m not looking forwards to afternoon drills with Zoro and Taffy,” “Zoro does seem to be a bit…”

“Heh. Zoro wants to be the Greatest; his teaching of you is part of his way of mastering his own skill. Trust me, Aoife; as hard as Zoro pushes you, he pushes himself even harder. And Taffy just wants to be sure you’ll come back from fighting at all.”

Aoife - pronounced Eefa- is one of the smallest people I’ve ever seen swing a sword. There’s also a round shield she uses, and the two together are obviously a matched set, but she deflects any questions about her sword, and herself, almost without thought.

Annie is the last of our new crewmates, and not someone I’ve spent all that much time with; she’s shy, bookish, and best at research. Also, apparently, she doesn’t really like being up during the day.

Really, most of my training as a Fool was in social studies. With that in mind, I think it’s best I explain a few things- like why it doesn’t bother me that our crew is more than half female.

Most people dramatically underestimate the economic importance of women and their level of agency. Part of the problem is that when most people think of women, they’re imagining the upper end of nobility and the very rich and famous, not the rest of society.

The average low end farming family could not survive without women’s labor. There is a gendered separation of labor, and yes, men tend to do the bulk of grain farming outside of peak times like planting and harvest- but understand this. Unless they’re very wealthy indeed- read, slave-owners- a family, clan, whatever, cannot live on that.

The women of our crew have primary responsibility for the quail, geese, and doves we own, and thus the eggs, feathers, and meat. Egg money is nothing to sneeze at, and our birds more often than not are the main source of protein, alongside fish and eggs which don’t really count. Further, the women of our crew are in charge of our fruit and vegetable production- and Mab in particular… if she’s not actively doing something with her hands, she’s spinning thread. Now, Mab’s a weaver, but in most cases the majority of the thread she spins would be for sale to the people who make cloth as most men don’t spin.

Ah! And considering our flock of Angora Possums, she’s also responsible for them, and all the shearing and carding of their wool. And she’s in charge of the goats, too- or rather, the goats are her responsibility, no matter if Mark is the one who feeds and tends them. Wool producing animals are important, regardless of their other uses, and there are plenty of court cases where women have stolen loose wool or even sheared other people’s sheep.

Every time we land on an island, according to the Ship’s Log, Mab spends extensive amounts of time gathering information on what can be found in a certain place- wood, nuts, fruit, medical supplies, you name it.

Nami is the one who owns and tends to the tangerine grove on the ship, and she’s the one who okays the harvesting time, and how much to harvest, and what can be made of the fruit- and Sanji obeys her. Mab keeps several different bee hives- sorry, Honeyjacket hives, and a few other hives of things that certainly aren’t bees or even bee-like.

I know for a fact that Sohei, Miss Tellicherry, and Miss Neopolitan are going through the various account books to understand just how much and how often Mab sells off our excess of cheese and butter and honey and eggs and and and-Mab also makes all the ale, cider, and perry we drink- and we drink a lot.

All the things I’ve gone over just now? That’s all just in the country- and it’s very similar in the towns and cities. A man might be a craftsman or merchant, but I guarantee that is wife is too and that hse has the right to carry on the trade after his death.

Unless there’s a lot of money, goods, lands, or even titles involved, people get a say in who they marry. Really. The average age of first marriage for a yeoman is late teens or early twenties, but the average age of the working poor is more like twenty-seven or twenty-nine. The average age of death for men in both those categories is thirty-five; but with women, if they survive their first few childbirths, they’ll live to see grandchildren.

(Skua is matrilineal because, well, how could it not be?)

Odds are if your father was a small farmer, he’s been dead for some time before you gather enough goods to be marrying a man. For sure, your mother and grandmother and even stepfather if you have one likely have opinions, but you can have a valid marriage by havin’ sex after saying yes to a proposal or exchanging vows in the present- the old ‘I thee wed’, unless you live in Dressrosa, where you probably need a notary. No clergy required for any of this, by the by- the Gods have no say in Free Will, after all. For sure, it’s better if you publish banns three Sunsdays running in case someone remembers you’re too closely related, but it’s not a legal requirement. The only thing you do need is a mark in the family registry, and that’s as simple as a form-letter with someone you trust- and in the meantime, who exactly can stop you if you’re both determined?

So. The less money, goods, lands, and power your family has, the more likely you are to be choosing your partner. There is an exception, in that unfree folk can be required to remarry, but they are given time and plenty of warning before a partner would be picked for them. It’s less common than you’d think.

If you were born free and have enough money to hire help as needed whether for farm or shop or other business, there’s no requirement of remarriage at all. You could pick a partner or choose to stay single. Do the math again on death rates- it’s pretty common to marry more than once. Maybe the first wife died in childbirth. The widower needs the work and income a wife brings in and that’s double if the baby survives. Maybe the second wife has wide hips, but he dies from a work related injury when she’s still young. She could sure use a man’s labour around the farm or shop. Let’s say he dies in a fight or drowns in a ditch. She’s been doing well. Her children are old enough to help with the farm or shop; she picks a pretty youth for his looks instead of his economic value. You get marriages for love and lust as well as economics and politics, and May-December cuts both ways.

A lot of our popular ideas about how people live tends to get viewed through an academic or pop-culture lens, but that tends to be particularly extreme, pedantic, or over-simplified to the point of stupidity.

Real life is infinitely more complicated than what can be told in a story.

It’s somewhere in our second or third week in the New World that people start dropping with the flu.
Neither Tellicherry nor I were particularly worried- and then I reminded us both that Influenza is a big fuckin’ deal in the Lower Blues, and we got very worried very quickly.

Influenza is a viral infection, with mild to severe symptoms of high fever, runny nose, sore throat, muscle pains, headache, coughing, and feeling tired. Fae, at most, feel tired from getting the flu, maybe some fever and sore throat.

Everyone else is not so lucky.

About two days after we got to the surface of the New World, one of the Mice- Hildy, I think- started coughing. Influenza is one of the few well known airborne diseases that can potentially affect any tribe; even though Hildegard, a Tontatta, was the first to get sick, she was able to spread her sickness over almost the entire ship.

The other Mice- Maya, Darla, Jellybean, Quilaby, and Arlinda Rader Haai- soon followed Hildy down with coughs and burning fevers of their own. I was the one who actually moved them to Chopper’s Iso Ward, Franky-built to their size. Well, there was an extra large bed for Arlinda Rader Haai, but…

The Sanitary Ward is not the same room as the one just off the Galley; that’s the Emergency Room, located next to the Galley for perhaps obvious reasons. The Sanitary Ward is on the same deck as the Stillroom, and is kept to the same cleanliness levels. The tontatta have a shelf, built into the wall; it’s got beds, view screens… and me. I’m stationed as their nurse because, well… I didn’t know this before. Hah, learn something new, every day- I didn’t know how very dangerous Influenza is to Tontatta.

They’re so very small… even a slight internal temperature variation can have massive complications. Flu in people younger than twenty almost invariably leads to extremely high fever. I’m keeping their temperatures down with judicious application of cold water baths, which also helps raise their white-blood; but it’s not a permanent solution. Chopper’s hard at work, developing a fever-reducer that can be diluted enough that a Tontatta can safely take it, without diluting all the helpful medicinal properties as well.

Genny dragged some of her sisters in next; first Ellie, then Fern. Fern was let out again, as she wasn’t actually sick, Genny was just overprotective; Adelaide dragged in Beatrix, and checked herself in too; and Sancho carried Cece in, panicked, because she’d collapsed. Her fever was so high… I’ve never seen Chopper so commanding. He decided that the only thing for it was to drain, cool, and return her blood, before she cooked her internal organs with her fever-heat.

It was at this point that Genny took over simplifying and synthesizing the fever reduction medicines, and I took Further Actions. I recruited Tellicherry, Bryony, Mark, and Taffy to my cause- all of us are adult Fae, and so will be affected by the flu the least. Even if we end up catching it, we won’t spread it.

Fae don’t get sick of the flu; at most, we’ll get a little bit tired.

I stopped by the Galley with my cleaning gang, but it turned out we weren’t needed; as soon as the first of our crewmates got sick, Sanji Took Steps of his own. He, and the Kitchen Kids, are wearing hairnets and face masks, and have double examination-gloved their hands.
There’s been a steady stream of okayu, broth, hot and cold teas, and fruit juices- I suppose this is why. Still, I go over the measures Sanji’s already taken, and have my Cleaning Crew disinfect everything with bleach-water. Surely not everything, I hear some future-person cry?

No, motherfucker.

Ev-er-y-thing.

Sanji adds bleach to the wash water, and ensures that everyone knows to take dry dishes only, and if I catch even one of you taking a wet dish off the rack it will go very hard for you, the last thing we GODDAMN NEED IS A FUCKING CHOLERA OUTBREAK-

Sanji is taking this very seriously.

We end up wiping down every hard surface, the leather, the floor, the sconces, special attention to the doorknobs- every. Thing.

The only reason we didn’t mop is that Sanji was having the Kitchen Kids do that later.

We then moved on to the rest of the ship- everything possible to disinfect, we disinfected. Bath House; Lynn’s outdoor shower; bedrooms; Shop; everything. Everything.

It took hours of work.

It also got my mind off the image of- of massive needles in Cecelia’s shoulders, one going in and the other out, and her hot blood coursing out of her with every beat of her heart and dropping down into a chilling vat before being pumped back into her body through a one way valve kept air-tight with saline and it was- it was, there was so much blood, she’s just a girl, she’s just a little girl with lavender tones to her blond hair, and she was so still. So still, and so small in the bed; Chopper sedated Sancho after he picked a hole through his own hand, for the worry over her.

Genny was like stone; Chopper would tell her to do something, and she’d move and do it, no questions or hesitations. Her green dress had a few spots of her sisters blood on it- but she moved like it didn’t matter.

Once the ship was disinfected, Taffy went to work on the Reduced Size Fever Medicine; after giving Nami a very cold bath. Nami didn’t like it, but Zoro was right there with her, shivering in the cold; and neither of them are sick, so I suppose it worked. They’re both wearing facemasks, though; I haven’t seen Nami’s face for about a week, now.

Mark started checking on each member of the crew when he got up in the morning. Bryony is spending almost absurd amounts of time with Brook, Neo, the Feverbanes, and Bang.

I’ve been praying with Tellicherry.

We all face our fear in different ways; Mark, by directly checking on his friends. Taffy, by working to help those in danger. Bryony, by avoiding it as best she can; and me, with stunning amounts of liturgical sparring.
Here’s something I didn’t understand, back when I took Divinity in school. There, it’s taught as a series of dances with lectures about the significance of each movement and step. That didn’t work for me for a number of reasons, chiefly because, according to Tellicherry and, oddly enough, my Mom, no one ever had to explain to me the meaning of the Gods.

For me, there was no need to explain that Pyth is both Order and Chaos, but overall he represents power. Pyth represents strength, and vitality- in all its forms. I understood that the first time I saw an effigy of him; it was in Ultima Thule, in the Hall of Gods.

Pyth isn’t just a bull- he’s every bull, and far more than a bull.

For the Fae, worship- really, any sort of celebration- is built on two things: music, and dance. We call things that aren’t music, music, to make them… normal. We call things that aren’t dance, dance, to imply they can be learned, perfected.

The liturgical dances of the fae- er, hang on. Liturgical dance is a type of dance movement sometimes incorporated into liturgies or worship services as an expression of worship of the divine. Some liturgical dances are more common than others- harvest dances and may pole dances are much more common than, say, ashwinding or driving demons out of fields.

Faesh liturgical dancing is lively, masked (be it with solid masks or with masking makeup) and often heavily costumed. It’s present at every major holiday, and lots of minor ones too. There’s a special dance that opens the Aonach Contae; and there’s a dance that only the Gravediggers learn, for when they close up a tomb for the last time.

The one thing that’s true for all Faesh liturgical dancing- the only thing I ever learned in Divinity, aside from some philosophy and how to research in a very large, very old library (make friends with a librarian), is this: Faesh liturgical dancing offers moral instruction, relating to compassion, faith, and honor for and to all sentient beings. Faesh liturgical dancing brings merit to all things that perceive it.

Apparently, that’s not quite right.

“Well, Mab, you’re not wrong-”

“- hah-”

“- su - the dances are definitely how most Fae worship. What you’re missing is that the dances are a form of meditation, not just an offering to the Gods. You’re bringing yourself into a state where it’s easier to commune, not just giving of your time, effort, mind, and spirit,”

“Ach, no wonder I couldn’t make heads or tails of Divinity- I was mastering the spear at the time,”

“That’d do it, for sure- susususu-”

“-hahahahaha hahahahahaha-”

“-The thing that gets me is, you’ve already gotten about halfway there on your own. As much as I’m a devotee to Pyth, yet marked by Acobi; you are devoted to Zul, yet marked by Micia. Your heart is glowing, Mab,”

“And how am I devoted to Zul, Tellicherry?”

“Your laughing barking cry, Mab; ‘Ha’ is the holy cry of Zul; just like ‘Su’ is the holy cry of Pyth,”
That made me pause- and I paid for my inattention with a nasty kick to the ribs. Tellicherry, devotee of Pyth, is actually stronger than Bryony- Bryony has the strength, but most of her technique went into controlling that strength, not amplifying it. Tellicherry… her strength grew gradually, with her own maturity, and her forms are all built around putting more and more strength behind her blows.

This is just a spar, technically; so my ribs aren’t broken. However, I wouldn’t say no to a leech- oh gods, I just thought that to myself, Sawbones is getting to me… ah, shit, I did grab her leg as she kicked me-

“Woo, and if your battle song isn’t enough proof, my leg is! Au, that’s a lot of blood-”

“Tellicherry for pity’s sake, don’t put weight on it! Hang on- au! - I’ll help you to the Emergency, alright? Put your arm around my neck- on this side, lovey, you’ve bruised the other to near mincemeat,”

“Su, that’s some of the best sparring I’ve had in a good long while- I remember why I wasn’t allowed to pray with Zul’s initiates, bloody hellfire-”

“Hah-”

“Su!”

“Well, consider this; you’ll get a cool scar out of it, something to praise, um, Hense- cor, nearly called her Widow Thorn for a mo’-”

“I dunno, I feel like if Hense were to appear in mortal flesh, ‘Widow Thorn’ is as good a name as any. The Gods are only subtle if that’s their domain, ye ken?”

By then, we’d staggered back into the Galley, to the stammering and horrified shrieking of, well, everyone, seeing as it was dinner- but of course, I was engrossed in my discussion of theology.

“So- Pyth told you I’d be teaching you? Have I got that right?”

“Eeeh, sort of, not really- Chopper, you are a doctor; this needs a nurse at most, Mab missed my arteries, veins, and tendons, and I know that because I can still straighten the leg, and I’ve not passed out either-”

“Oh, yes- those are all surface scratches, it should be like treating a particularly nasty cat scratch. Um, might require a stitch or two, Cherry got me good- which reminds me! Nurse Sawbones, I need the services of one of your fine leeches-”

“Happy to help, just let me get a good selection-”

“NOT AT THE DAMN TABLE, DO THAT ON THE COUCH-”

“Of course, Razz, no need to get stroppy,”
I limp over to the couch, and carefully sit down on it. My late winter tunic comes off with a bit of a wince, and I undo the ties on my boots because my feet are really starting to ache- winter boots aren’t meant for prolonged use, really. I wasn’t wearing pants, either- so, I’m left with a pair of gym socks I swiped from Sanji on accident, my garters and garter belt, my underwear, and my glasses. Ah-

“Well, if you didn’t snap it, you certainly bruised it, Cherry-”

“Ouf, sorry ‘bout that,”

“Ta- ah, here we are, hallo Sawbones-”

“Hello- Oh my goodness, that’s a lovely spread on your ribs, Mab,”

“Mm. Ah, thank you- and do you have some sort of liquid bandage for Tellicherry? I didn’t cut her that deeply, it’s just a lot…”

“Um… yeah, hang on- here we are, new skin-”

“Oh, is… is that from the Daiso?”

“Mm. You can also get it at the greengrocers, the butchers, anywhere you can buy gum, really- pants off, I need to clean your wounds,”

“R-right, um…”

“None of the Gods ask modesty of us, Tellicherry; that’s the dogma of men,”

“…Woo. How in the hell did you fail Divinity, again?”

“I wouldn’t dance on stage when they told me to; the Gods are not for entertainment,”

“Yeah, that would do it… you’d have been better served by a Seminary. One sec- ah, you didn’t cut up my pants, nice…”

Tellicherry slides out of her pants, unzips her vest, peels off her shredded coral arm warmers- and hands them off to me, when I make a grab for them. Down to the Laundry with them- and I’ll get new clothing for when Nurse Sawbones is done.

Ugh, her socks are filthy- her underwear is nice, though.

“New socks?”

“Au! Sorry, what-?”

“Your socks are filthy from our prayer- would you like new ones while those are in the wash?”

“Oh! Uh, sure?”

“Here- no, no, just keep them, I make things like that when I’m bored which happens more often than it doesn’t,” “Wow! Uh-”

“Clean your feet with these- ah, the leech fell off, Bones,“

“No worries- have some new skin!”

“Au! The sting!”

“Mmhm! That’s the disinfectant- can’t be too careful, y’know,“

“Neh- Mab?”

“Mmyes, Captain?”

“What were you an’ Tellicherry doin’ out there?”

“Praying, Captain,”

“...?”

“Fae prayer can be like dancing- or it can be like sparring. The two are not terribly separated; dancing is the exaltation of the form, while martial arts is the exaltation of force, ”

“...So your entire fighting style is also a prayer? How does that work?”

“Uh… Tellicherry, how does that work?”

“It’s pretty simple- each of the Gods embodies a particular thing entirely. The God I devoted myself to, Pyth, is the god of Order and Commotion; there’s a lot of this and that which can be said about Him, but at his very core, Pyth represents Strength,”

Luffy, clearing off his plate, stands from his seat and puts his plate in the dirty-dish bin Sanji and the Kitchen Kids have started setting up for services. Then, he turns around, and calmly marches back towards us. He sits at our feet, and takes his hat off and sets it at his side.

“Tell me of the Gods, Mab, Tellicherry; I know them not even enough to seek them out to learn more,”

I blink.

I look at Tellicherry, who’s gone very wide eyed indeed.

I look back at Luffy, who’s wearing a nervous and yet earnest expression. Well- it’s not like you ever get told of a real challenge before you meet it…

“This is what I know, Captain; Tellicherry can give you more detail, or perhaps even better instruction. What I know of the Gods is what I know of their Martial Traditions. Each God and Goddess of the Fae was a warrior, renowned for their strength and skill; each member of the Faesh Pantheon represents a specific style of fighting, among other things.

“Acobi, the Chastened Maid; the Goddess of Oath and Abandon. Her style is called ‘soft’ nowadays; it involves locking joints, pressure points, soft-tissue strikes, and grapples. In our crew, Bryony practices the style of Acobi, but she has not devoted herself to it fully.

“Garmuth, the Crippled Duke; the God of Purpose and Folly. The devoted of Garmuth don’t fight with weapons or fists; they fight with their words. His style is soft, too; in that a soft word to the right ear can be more devastating than a thousand fists. Bryony practices the style of Garmuth, too- which is why she can’t devote herself fully to either,”

“-?”

“These are fully realized martial arts, Captain, much like any named style you could think of- devoting yourself to one isn’t like with Magic, where you pick a path at the expense of another, but do not loose out on all the rest. Faesh Martial Artists must devote themselves fully to their craft at some point, because in a very literal way, their martial arts are a gift to and from the gods,”

“How many gods of the Fae are there, then?”

“...twelve?”

“Twelve; you got it right, Mab. Do go on, I’ve never heard this from a lay-person before,”

“Well, now you’re makin’ me nervous, Cherry-”

“Go on, Mab!”

“Fine, fine. Hense, the Veiled Widow; the Goddess of Pain and Pleasure. Her martial art has to do with sex; and the people who practice it are very good at what they do. That’s all I’ll say about it.

“Lemaign, the Mason King; the God of Hope and Despair. His style is that of the builder- hammers, mattocks, and other tools of trades are his main remit, and the style itself is one of teaching a person how to use their tools as weapons. A pitchfork at speed has just as much stopping power as a spear; and a tool box full of tools has a nasty heft to it, not to mention the sharp corners. The Fogbank Farming styles were born of His Art- and each of those styles, of course, has its own merits and detractions…”

“Oh, sure- South Maggot Scythe, Gentle Feather, Apisary Backfist- as many jobs on a farm, any farm, there’s a fighting style for it too. It’s how Mark fights when he’s not using his guns,”

“Ah,”

“Micia, the Lorn Mother; the Goddess of Loss and Longing. Doctors and nurses and those who care for the weak and infirm- children and babies, the elderly, people with mental illness or instability- they follow Micia before all others. I learned to fight… well, I’ll get to that in a moment. Chopper fights in Her ideal; Taffy and Gurry fight in her actual; Mendy May is the person on our crew fully devoted to Micia. Mendy May is also the most dangerous person on our crew, because her whole responsibility is to BBC, and there are no lengths to which she won’t go to protect that baby girl, “Olak, the Carefree Son; the God of Chance and Whim. His is the style of the sniper; because, after a certain distance, all shots are a matter of luck,” “Usopp,”

“Mm. Jevel, the Tower Keeper; the God of Health and Atrophy. His style has to do with poison, and powerful potions- Taffy, Gurry, perhaps some of our newer crewmates. My sister, Easy- you’ve had her potions before,”

“Eh?”

“Snake Juice,”

“Ah!”

“Mhm. Pyth, the Wakeful Bull; the God of Commotion and Order. Every Fae currently living knows something of His Art. Pyth is the god of strength; and all Fae are strong. Tellicherry is His Devotee; and Bryony was given His blessing at birth. So was Ace. His is the first style any Fae learns, and learns to teach- and for that reason, not many stick with him,”

“...In many ways, Pyth is seen as sort of… a beginner’s god, something easy to understand. Strength, I’ve found, is not so simple,”

“Mm. Roathus, the Gorging Host; the God of Thirst and Plenty. His Art is that of the Battle Mage, and any other magic user who seeks glory. Not an easy path to walk; most practitioners find themselves consumed by their own desires.

“Yudrig, the Morning Stallion; the God of Impulse and Bravery. A God of Brawlers, and those who make shit up as they go along,”

“So... people like me?”

“Yes, Luffy. People like you- but that’s no bad thing. It’s a strange kind of person who feels nothing at all ere the Dawn of a New Day,”

“Shishishishishi!”

“Hmhmhmhm! -Mah, then there’s Zul, the Silent Singer; the Goddess of Truth and Secrets. Patient, dedicated, resilient-”

“-absurdly hard to stop, nearly infinite reserves of energy, vicious, and the fucking claws -”

“-I’m not that bad, am I?”

Tellicherry looks at me, and then arches back so she can look at her own stomach where my claws raked across her brown skin. There are shiny lines over cuts and scratches across her arms and shoulders, and it turns out she actually did need stitches in her leg, which Sawbones is attending to even now.

“-Pro Tip, Captain: Unless you absolutely have to, never ever spar seriously with a Devotee of Zul. Mab does a lot of things, but she does not fuck around while training, or hold back much at all,”

“...Yeah, she’s scary in a fight. She taught me how to do the claw thing-”

“-by giving you minimal instruction, then walking you through the technique a few times, then throwing you into a situation where if you didn’t use it, you’d die?"

“HOW DID YOU KNOW? ”

“Because that’s what devotees of Zul do - they don’t mean you harm by it, it’s just how they do,”

“...was it really that bad...?”

I’m staring at Luffy and Tellicherry, my eyes darting back and forth because I- I didn’t go too hard did I? I don’t- I don’t think I did but- maybe?

“Mab- Mab, you’re my friend! I’m not scared of you! You also take sparring very seriously, and never treat it like a game- that’s really good! I’m glad you’re the way you are,”

“You wouldn’t be a follower of Zul if you were not so driven and forthright,”

“...Thank you. -Right, lastly, there’s Caelya, the Boundless Infinite; the Goddess of Story and Song.
Only people with Charisma can learn Her Art; I can’t, I don’t have the stuff. You do, Captain- and you already know. Ace too, and Shanks,”

“Ah!”

“Mm,”

I misjudged my trip.

My neck went stiff the day Hildy went down; my vision clouded with headache the next day; and I got the heat rash the day after that.

I don’t remember passing out. Gally tells me later that I just sort of crumpled at dinner- I’d been eating and turning green, and then I just... slumped. She told me that my skin was so hot, she was almost afraid to touch me; that Sanji had to carry me to the Sanitary, and Genny had to hook me up to an IV because Chopper couldn’t touch my skin without injury.

I don’t remember any of that.

It started with a feeling on my skin like crawling crabs, or little shrimps nipping. Then, a strange clicking sound, like dolphins hunting, that specific squealing warbling click-like, like a bad connection on a snail, staticky and half-present. I remember looking up from my plate, and standing and walking to the porthole which did not have glass and beyond was a forest-

A sea-

Of reeds-

I was walking through the reeds. Black mud sucked my boots down; the reeds grew taller and taller, slashing at my legs and my arms and then my face as they grew higher and higher. On my belt was a canteen, and my bag of spell components, and a strange holster for my Tarot Device Tablet. My ears ached from the newness of their piercings and everything was tinted a yellowish blue color through the visor.

I followed a sparking trail of thaums, wandering through the murky reedy bog until at last I stood upon flat dirt ground-

Trees-

Forest-

I was walking through the forest. My dusty boots set quietly on dirt and leaf and stone; all around, the sound of birds roosting for the night, buzzing insects, wind through the branches. The breeze suddenly changed, and I smelled the smoke of a fire, cooking food, I heard the sound of quiet conversation. I turned to face the smell, and walked-

Grass-

Light-

I was walking through the glade. My dew-wet boots softly crumpled night-drunk grass and pushed round skipping stones deep into black earth. Ahead of me, there was a ring of stones ringing a pit, and a fire, and a small group- four people, adults I think- I think-

I was walking towards the group. My pack was heavy on my back and my feet ached and everything felt- strange-

“Hallo the camp!”

“.Hoy!”

“Can I come over?”

“Sure,”

I-
Sat down on a stone. It was white, and cool under my travel-hot legs.

The man across from me has horns like Sanji’s, and he’s red and scruffy with eyes like embers. His hair is black, and red tattoos crawl across his red skin too red two red-

To my left, a man and his son sit, both in- in- braids-

Blue eyed, dressed for silty waters.

To my right, a man with long black hair. He has bangles of gold across his upper arms, his forearms and wrists, and he looks- he looks like- Mab?

“What?”

“I said, what’re you doin’ out here, so far away from everywhere?”

“I, uh. I went for a walk and I guess my feet led me here- sorry if I’m intruding, I can leave-”

“No, no- it’s fine you’re here, I’m just… I’m not sure if you can get back, is all,”

“Sir?”

“We four have been here a long time, child, and none of us have found a way back to whence we came,”

“Hm. I can get back to where I came from though- that’s what the fancy face thing is for, y’know?”

“Mm. Sol, Muck, Zaffy- what say you?”

“I say if the boy can find where he came from, good on him,”

“I say we shouldn’t just let him go- who knows what fell thing could fall upon him?”

“I say I’m fucking hungry-”

“I have food! I brought some with me, I can share if you’d like-”

I’m eating a bowl of stew; I recognize my sister, and Sanji, and my own hand in making it. I’m not as good as either of them, few are- but it’s hot, and simple, and filling, and spiced well, and the ingredients are of good quality; and there are no burned bits floating around, either.

The men seem to like it, so I suppose it doesn’t matter that I’m not a particularly great cook.

“You don’t have to eat that fast, mister- you can have a second helping if you want-”

“Kid, are you sure you can share food like this?”
“Of course I am! -otherwise I wouldn’t have shared at all, see,"

“Smart; where’d you say you’re from, again? I’ve never had a stew quite like this before...”

“Don’t think I did, mister- I came from thataway, if that helps any,”

I hook my thumb in the direction of Home, and I know it’s the right way because I can See it through the screen.

The men look at each other. Demon Guy has curling eyebrows, and a strange black faceguard that spikes in the front between his horns. Father and Son ate their stew as fast as they could without being rude- and Father gave Son another portion before taking for himself. A large white snake is wrapped around Son’s arm and shoulder- not a python like Banana, something else.

Long-hair blinks his golden eyes, and carefully chews on a piece of reconstituted meat.

I finish my stew, and use a piece of flatbread to wipe my bowl out before using a handful of snow to do it again. The snow is thick on the ground, cold and white but there are no stars or moon to light the banks of rolling whiteness, only fire.

“It’s time for me to go back now. You could all come with me, if you’d like,”

Three men look to the fourth, with his strange black crown and his curling eyebrows and his ram’s horns, and he looks back at them for a long moment- and then he says- He says-

“I think that’d be best,”

I was walking through a glade. Behind me walked four men, each with a pack on their backs.

I was walking through a forest. Behind me walked four men, each with a pack on their backs.

I was walking through a bog. Behind me walked four men, each with a pack on their backs.

I was walking across the deck of the Sunny; Hekate-chan and the Littles were nibbling on syrup. Lynn was rocking a sobbing Mince, and Deborah and Oz were curled up together, backs pressed against the wall. I walked through a side door, into the Emergency; I walked past Sanji, smoking a thick blue cloud, arm wrapped around a shaking Mab and teeth snarling; I walked past a shaking Mab, eyes welling brightly with tears.

I walked to a bed in the Emergency Room.
Gally was standing to one side, holding my backpack and component bag. My completed Tarot Device was flexed wide open, shining and shimmering and glowing over my head.

Genny was taking my pulse.

Chopper was doing chest compressions.

I stared down at my own bloodless lips; Chopper switched out with Genny, to keep my chest pumping.

I leaned down and pressed a breath of air against my own blue lips-

-and breathed out-

-and then breathed in again, my heart roared in my ears and I coughed out a wad of phlegm and my eyes rolled and I gasped out-

Out-

“Don’t hurt them; they’re friends-”

-and then all was darkness. I know nothing more.

It’s not the most obvious thing, what with my love of leeches, but I’m a researcher, not exactly a medical doctor, or even a nurse. I list myself as a nurse because it’s easier; I’ve been burned too many times to just blindly trust that my research will remain mine, and that others will respect my work.

As near as I can figure, there are two kinds of flu- aside from all the various strains, I mean to say that there are two distinct mega-strains of the virus. The cold-resistant version is more common than the heat-resistant version, because there are (so far as I can tell) more dehydrated cool areas in the world than there are hot-wet areas.

As for why there’s a flu season… that’s a bit trickier. Usually, it comes up right around Samhain; and if you didn’t, people give you dirty looks. It always seemed odd to me that a virus that propagates in a host with a dependable incubation temperature of thirty-seven Celsius, cares if it’s freezing and snowy or warm and sunny- because flu comes in winter, not summer. That oddity bothered me for years- and finally, I just did a study on it.
The flu, also called Influenza or the Two Week Affliction, or sometimes confused for a Common Cold, is a viral respiratory illness. A virus is a microscopic infectious agent that invades the cells of the body and makes a being sick; unlike bacteria, viruses are not, strictly speaking, alive.

The Common Cold has over two hundred variations, mostly rhinoviruses, and shares all the minor symptoms of the flu- cough, sore throat, and stuffy nose. However, flu symptoms are more severe, and quickly incorporate high fever, cold sweats, full body aches, headaches, exhaustion, and even flux of the anus and throat- that is to say, diarrhea and vomiting.

The flu is highly contagious. Adults are able to spread the virus one day prior to the appearance of symptoms and up to seven days after symptoms begin. Influenza is typically spread via the coughs and sneezes of an infected person. Around 200,000 people in Ryugu Mergyo are hospitalized each year because of the flu, and of these people, about 36,000 die. The flu is most serious for the elderly, the very young, or people who have a weakened immune system. Pregnant women are at particular risk; Nami’s been kept at thorough distance from the afflicted for her own safety, and her baby’s as well. Mendy May too, because if BBC gets a cold, or the flu, we’ll all be miserable.

Until I joined up with the Post Office Service, I’d never really worked with children or youths in my age-range; a huge, weird shock, after years in environments where a ‘young’ patient was forty years old. My impressions are as follows.

From birth, until probably a year old; essentially, the human is a small adorable breakable but quick-healing animal. Handle accordingly; gently, with affection, but rely heavily on the caregivers with no real expectation of cooperation or competency. Nervous mothers cannot give their babies shots. Don’t ask them to.

From the first to second year; essentially, the human hates you. They hate you so goddamn much. Smile, coo, soothe all you like; they hate you anyway, because you’re a stranger and you smell wrong and you’re scary and worst of all possible things, you’re touching them. There’s no winning this, so just get it over with as quickly and non-traumatically as possible.

From the third to the fifth year; the human is becoming human. Thus, they are nervous around medical things, but possible to soothe. Easily upset, true- easily distracted from what upset them. Telling appropriate jokes, accurate reading of interests, and offering stickers are key management techniques. Simple symbols, glitters, and metallics are hot sells.

From the sixth to the tenth year; the human is becoming interesting, even so far as really genuinely cool. I didn’t realize that this was the age humans gained their distinctive interests and general opinions. Around this age, a human is fairly outgoing, extremely curious and eager to learn. Absolutely no babytalk; instead, flatter them with how grown-up they are, teach them some Fun Gross Medical Facts, and introduce potentially frightening experiences with “hey, you wanna see something really cool?”

From the eleventh to the fourteenth year; the human varies in maturity and predictability. They can be very childish, or very mature- or rapidly switch from one mode to the other. At this point, they’re basically fully human and mostly adult… just a really sensitive and unpredictable adult. Do not offer stickers- but they might grab one anyway. Just let them.

From the fifteenth year onwards; the human is an adult with varying levels of life experience. Treat the human as an adult who needs extra education with their care- so, basically like a regular adult who hasn’t gone to the doctor very often. Keep parents out of the room as much as possible, unless they patient wants them there. At this point, you can offer stickers again- they’ll probably think it’s funny. Also, they’ll want one; because, deep down, everyone wants a sticker.

I didn’t know that extremely high fevers in children is anything over thirty-eight degrees; and I didn’t know that at thirty-nine, they start having seizures.

I am not a nurse meant for… this. I was no help; even with my leeches and my knowledge. So… I went outside.

I heard what Fern mumbled- “don’t hurt them; they’re friends”. I didn’t understand until I saw the four men- strangers, being very carefully regarded by an extremely thorny Lynn and a very frightened Kitchen Trio- but…

Well, the leader of the group, the one the other men are deferring to has huge horns. He’s talking to… golly, but he sure looks like Mab… are they murmuring in… Ratian?

“Ubi sumus?”

“Nescio,”

Yeah, that’s Vulgar Ratian, from… I think the Mauilic area.

I know Ratian- the Modern form, of course, and also the Ecclesial form… but the only spoken Ratian I know is from Byblios, where the old Beetle Scholars used to dwell…

Nothing for it, just have to- well, I’m not great at talking to people, but, well, Lynn is getting thornier and thornier and… now’s not a good time for fighting.

“Hi!”

“-hm? Oh, hello! Sorry to intrude- do you know where we are?”

“Yes, I do- you’re on our ship, in the New World on the Line- Lynn, it’s fine, they’re friends of Fern’s-”

“They appeared out of nowhere and I don’t trust them, Bones, so-”

“-Ah, sorry to appear so suddenly. Um- there was a boy; we were somewhere strange, and a boy with long taw hair came and led us out. Pray, have you seen him?”

“...Did he look kinda like a frog?”

“...Yeah, a little bit. Mostly the tongue,”

“Um- yeah, I think you all need to come inside. Come, come; Lynn, Kids, y’all come on inside where it’s warm. I know none of you finished your dinners- and it’s getting dark, so we can’t stay out here. I’ll send Miss Robin out to sit watch; come on, now,”
And, with a bit more shooing and cajoling, I manage to get the Kitchen Trio and Lynn off the frosting ground and back into the Galley. The four men tromp in after them, scraping and knocking dust and muck off their boots as they go through the door. Lynn, waiting for the men to go through before going herself, scrapes her bare feet clean of clumps of mud and dirt.

So that’s what the metal thing next to the door is for; not sure about the beetle though, but I’m sure it’ll become clear eventually.

In the Galley, the Kitchen Trio is quickly clearing and consolidating dishes under the watchful smog of Chef Sanji. The Red Horned man is carefully looking all around, and—hm. Chef Sanji and the Red Horned man look really similar too.

Well, Mab’s… not here, so… I’ll do it? I guess?

“So, um, I, uh… please, sit, have some food, we have, ah, we have drinks- clean water, soft beers, stronger…?”

“Ah, sure- where should we put our packs?”

“Um- I.”

“Your packs can go on the leather couch for now; please, take your ease at our table,”

I didn’t know Chef Sanji could speak Ratian- Maulic Ratian, but Ratian all the same.

Hm, four packs, all leather- the smallest comes from the Faery Man, then from the younger of the dread-heads, then the older dread-head, then the Demon Man. Freed of their packs and seated at the table; Deborah comes into the Galley laden with cheese, pickles, and delightful alcohols.

She sets them out on the table, and I watch each of the strange men see her face, blink, and look at each other.

Beatrix and Mab come in, and I watch each strange man blink in curiosity and confusion again.

Hmm.

I got Fern a warm blanket from storage; and I picked up Beatrix from where she was shivering on top of the dryer with the cats. Does no good to hide out, in the dark, shaking with fear; Deborah’s just as scared as you are

I was gone for less than five minutes.
How in the hell did (a very confused and absurdly polite) Udoroth of the Smoking Vine, General Portgas D. Solitaire (enjoying my fucking pickled fish eggs), and the White Snake Winds (THEY ACTUALLY EXISTED? I THOUGHT DANELPHE WAS JUST MAKING SHIT UP) get in our Galley!??

FUCKING GRAND LINE BULLSHIT!
Really Really

It’s not something that gets considered often, but setting up thirty four new beds at basically the drop of a hat is not particularly easy. It’s doable - especially if you’ve already got all the dorm spaces, beds, and bedding (nearly) to set it up- but it’s not easy.

Adding four more people doesn’t really help matters.

With that said, it’s my job, and I wouldn’t be good at my job if I didn’t, you know, enjoy my work.

Before sending everyone to bed, I gave our Four (Young) Old Men knowing of the Modern Vernacular, and the Modern Languages. They took it well- except for Solitaire, who nearly headbutted me when I gave him the knowing, fucking jackass.

To start with, the actual layout of the Thousand Sunny. I might have gone over it before, but I find it’s helpful to go over these things repeatedly so that nothing gets forgotten over time. Also, I don’t often go into all parts of the ship- most of my time is spent in the Dairy, the Studio and Laundry, the Galley, the Grass Deck, and my bed.

The Thousand Sunny is a two-masted three sailed brig sloop, a fairly large ship that relies on the skills of Nami and Taffy to move at her fullest speed. She has six decks, three of which ride above the waterline; the rest are below.

Starting from the top: the Crow’s Nest Observatory is the highest room on this ship. It is a round room, outfitted with a circular bench, under-seat shelving for books and quiet hobbies, a number of spyglasses, a snail named Loudspeaker, an actual loudspeaker, and the base of our flagpole. It is the duty of whoever is on Crow’s duty to check that our flag is in good repair, and to keep watch on the horizon for other ships, interesting and important phenomena, and islands (or, it must be said, things that might as well be islands).

One floor down from the Crow’s Nest Observatory- well, if it was a house, it’d be a one story with a finished attic. The ‘attic’ is the actual Crow’s Nest; the rest of that building is the Gym. That’s Zoro’s domain, actually- he’s really very good at figuring out weaknesses and old injuries in a person, and devising a work-out schedule that will build up a person’s physical strength without injuring them unduly. He’s actually very serious about it, and has several books about massage, physical therapy, and exercising- and he’ll even tell Sanji that a certain person needs this, this, and that in their diet to compensate for whatever he’s having them do.

The next highest room on this ship is actually the Library- Franky’s original plan was to put the Main Head and Bath House on the upper part of that area, but I reminded him that any burst pipes would flood the library. Robin overheard this conversation, and smiled in that special way of hers, and Franky blanched whiter than some yogurts; then he changed the layout. It turned out that simplifying the piping for that area meant we could have a bigger and more comprehensive Aquarium, which I’ll get to momentarily. Also, we were able to have more than one toilet area- which, while annoying to clean, does mean we don’t have to go above deck every time we want to take a piss or a shit.

The Library is Robin’s room; she has full and total responsibility for every book in it, and it’s upkeep. She’s the one who decides when we need to get rid of periodicals, which books we can sell off for new ones, and… ah, she also comes and finds you if you’ve taken a book without signing it out or returning it when you said you would. Scary lady. Chilling smile. But, she’s happy doing it, so… what can I do, but return my books on time?

Under the Library is the Main Head and Bath House. The Main Head is one of the first areas where several Taffy-nooks and crannies are, as well as a laundry chute. It’s a large toilet area, with a pedestal sink, mirror, shelf for morning toiletries, and a rack for clean towels and clean clothing. There are baskets that can go into the Bath House, as well as soaps, combs, brushes, washcloths, scrubbies, and bath toys. Because I care, and Sanji likes little rubber duckies, and I can’t actually take a long soak with him without risking my life.

The Bath House is a bath house- bathing showers, soaking tubs, everything one needs for a bit of good clean fun. There are also little stools, because people get tired standing and squatting, I suppose.

Just across, I suppose, from the Bath House is the upper entrance to the Aquarium. There’s a lower entrance down in the Soldier Dock system, and a side entrance that opens out into the Sea- for the dogfish and the seahorses, you see. Adjacent- port-stern side- to the upper Aquarium entrance is a Fish Cleaning Station; Deborah does a lot of work there. It’s tiled, has its own hose and cool-box, and it’s also where our main ice-making machine is. For obvious reasons, the cats also hang out around the area. It’s also graded to drain off the back of the ship, in an effort to keep fish filth from, you know, stinking the rest of the ship up. It… mostly works, actually.

Downstairs, upper deck, starboard side stern, is the main kitchen garden; herbs, small veggies, and some berries are grown here. This is also where part of our aquarium is; mostly, this is where hydroponic growth is done, as the air-valve system didn’t take up too much space and Sanji can hold his breath for a very long time. Deborah also does most of the gathering, because she can breathe underwater- however, Mince and Oz seem to be getting better at it as well. This is where the outer side-door to the Kitchen is, as well as the compost. There is also an outdoor shower, as well as Lynn’s winter bed, which are new.

Downstairs, upper deck, port side stern, is the rest of the garden; poisonous and medicinal herbs, pop greens, the possum shed, the pig pen, and the goat pen are all back here. This is also where the outer doors to the Dairy and Stillroom are.

Then there’s the Grass Deck, or Grazing area; mostly, the goats hang out here during the day. They’re getting very fat- it’s going to be lambing time soon, and then kids. And then, kid dishes! Mark works out in the Barn, which is out on the Grass Deck, along with some of our new additions- Adelaide, especially, has fallen in love with the horses.

Ach, I’ve become bored- here, then, a quick bit of shorthand. Our ship is basically a floating, self-sufficiency possible, castle. With all that implies- grounds, hidden passages, a supporting farm and smithy, horses, the whole thing.
Mah, I’ve lost the thread- ah, that’s right. Dorms. There’s one deck devoted to habitation; the deck below it is devoted to crafting, and the one below that is storage and medicine.

Deck two, the Hab Deck, is all dorms that have been cleverly sealed off until needed; men on port, women on starboard, unless you’re a guest or married, in which case you get a stateroom.

As I said before, preparing thirty four beds- well, thirty eight- isn’t terribly easy. It’s doable- considering I did it- but it’s not easy.

The first problem is one of volume- quantity has a quality of it’s own, mainly that of overwhelming. As soon as Captain told me how many people he’d invited to join, I was opening up the closed off rooms in the Hab Deck and airing them out. I was getting sheets and mattresses and pillows out of flat-pack storage, and fluffing them up; I was making sure I had enough ‘boring’ bedding to cover each bed. Then, I was putting each mattress on the beds, checking the bedlines for soundness, sheeting, blanketing, pillowing- one pillow per bed, if you want more fill out the appropriate part of the requisition form-

And then, of course, the amenities. Making new people feel welcome and comfortable in, let’s be honest, your home, is a skill all it’s own. Lots of people think my job is easy; it isn’t. Lots of people think my job is unnecessary; it isn’t. The things I do have worth; they are important. Sorry, I- Solitaire is… dismissive.

Anyway, a proper room for a new person- before they’ve settled in enough to start changing things, at least- is just a very nice hotel room, like a five-diamond hotel room. The bed-area of a shared dorm room ought to be clean, well organized, and quiet enough to facilitate sleep.

We have the best bed frames Franky can make within the parameters of a dorm room- sturdy without being stiff, hard wearing without being ugly or institutional, simple without being cold. He does good work.

The mattresses on each bed- even the older ones, with crewmates who’ve been here longer- are not old, lumpy, scratchy, or saggy. However, they might be too soft for some people, which I can’t really remedy until we get to another island… I routinely pull mattresses out of general use and refill them with feathers, patch them, and make sure they’re still in good overall shape. In our guest rooms, we actually have air mattresses, not feather beds- probably because we can also turn them into gaol-rooms at a trice. Nice gaol-rooms; clean, well appointed, impossible to escape...

Beyond clean bedding, fine bed linens- and comfort items such as soft or firm mattress toppers, a selection of pillows, cozy down comforters, extra blankets, and snappy flat ironed pillowcases can make a nice bed into a very fine experience.

I was aware from the start how many potential berths Sunny could sleep; and so, I made sheet sets, and at least one spare sheet set for each berth. Thus, our new crewmates all have clean sheets for a week; and then they can change their own beds, and I can wash their old sheets, and so on. The Mice, even, have their own berths and clean sheet sets- but I actually use a miniature portable washing machine and dryer for their clothing, because their fabric goods are just so small. I don’t want to lose anything in the bigger machines- so, I got a smaller one and use that. Well, I already had it, I just use it more now.

Each bed actually has a number on it; one is Luffy, two is Mark, three is Usopp, and so on; and I mark each sheet set, and preferred bedding, with their bed numbers. Down in the laundry, there are smaller baskets with the number system marked on; I fold clean linens into the appropriate baskets, and replace them in the linen closet that each dorm room and state room has. The linen closets have numbered shelves in them; thus, it all becomes a game of matchy-matchy in the end.

Each dorm has a long row of hooks, all rated to hold a frankly astounding amount of weight- a full pack or a grown man is no problem. There’s also a bench underneath this row of hooks for pulling on shoes, sitting, and other things. There are lockers- no more than six to a room, meaning there’s no more than six people per dorm room; and each locker is sacrosanct.

The lockers are also- until now- totally empty of all defining marks. Which is not to say they can’t be defined; in fact they have a slot for a removable plate. Well, that’s where I put their patch-symbol, once they’ve picked it.

Every crewmate has their own symbol, including me; and it makes it easier to find and file things if I already know who has what, and how many. And yes, it’s all written down in a book; I try to make sure each crewmate has a basic selection of various things, but… some things are easier than others… I also try to make sure that things that are no good get quietly replaced.

Ah, hell, might as well explain it- my policy is that I will do my very best to get my crewmates their clothing back from the laundry… excepting socks, which, unless they’re clipped together with that person’s specific sock clip, are in the hands of the Gods. This goes for bedding, linens, and other things- so long as it’s labelled with basically your name or symbol, I’ll make sure it gets back to you. Unlabelled things vanish.

Every article of clothing that goes through the Laundry gets tagged- and the patches and tags are for laundry purposes, really. The patches tell me where I need to put clean clothing; the tags tell me how to, and how not to, wash a certain something. There are these constant piles of dirty clothing that gets sorted according to wash instructions and filth level; and I want all my friends clothing to last them a good long time, so… part of that is making sure to wash it correctly.

In order :

Luffy has a monkey patch on all of his clothing, right by the tag. This is also what tags all his linens, his bedding, and- aside from the number- is how I tell his clothing from, say, Usopp’s. His sock clips also all have that particular monkey- and he’s the best one out of all of them to clip his socks together correctly. I think it’s because he doesn’t actually wear socks all that often- it’s such an occasional thing, he just incorporated clipping them together into basic sock procedure.

Zoro has a tiger patch on all of his clothing, right by the tag. This tag is special because it’s not iron-on, it’s embroidered in; one of his very few but very vital specific requests. It turns out the reason he only wears the one haramaki is that all the ones I made for him have iron-on patches, which make him irrationally uncomfortable. He clips all his socks together fairly regularly, but his socks are also easy to tell from everyone else's. No one else wears knitted thigh-highs but Zoro.

Nami has an orange patch on all of her clothing, right by the tag—except on her baby-bump swaddles, which have the patch in the middle of the top rail. The only thing she absolutely insisted on was that the orange had to have a leaf and actually be orange; otherwise, size, texture, and so on didn’t matter to her. She used to clip her socks together religiously, but as it’s gotten harder and harder for her to reach her feet, she has to rely on Zoro doing it for her.

They do get clipped together fairly regularly, it’s just… I know Zoro gets distracted by his fiancee, and I wish them every happiness, I just… clip your socks together before you get hot and heavy, dammit!

Usopp has a small lizard patch on all of his clothing, right by the tag. He actually picked his patch out the fastest, after he saw the pitiful selection of reptiles and amphibians I had a the time.

Sanji has a sea turtle patch on all of his clothing, right by the tag. Interestingly, so do his suits—however, his suits are almost never washed in the washing machine. I have to “dry clean” them, which isn’t actually dry at all, but it’s not like the washing machine either.

I have a honeybee patch on all of my clothing, right by the tag. Even my leather pants have this patch on them, once I found the right glue…

Chopper has a cherry blossom patch on all of his clothing, right by the tag. He actually almost picked the four-leaf clovers, but started tearing up. I hugged him for a little while, and when he was able to stop crying, he picked the cherry blossoms instead. I’m… not sure why, but… I mean. I guess clovers have significant memories attached to them…

Let’s speed things up.

Robin is roses. She likes flowers.

Mark is anchors. He mourns his sister still.

Taffy is fangs. She has no illusions about herself.
Bryony is lips. She’s developing in an interesting way.

Franky is blue stars. Of course it is; the man is bursting with civic pride.

Brook is treble clef. What else could it be?

Gurry is starfish. His favorite animal, apparently.

Deborah is ruby. She likes the shape.

Eleanor is cat. Subtle.

Fernanda is eye. Subtle.

Genevieve is checkered flags. Actually, quite subtle.

Adelaide is her Fishman Kenpo school’s symbol- the Coral Palm. It’s actually a palm tree, but… the Coral Palm is that important to her. I’ll talk more about Adelaide later.

Beatrix is rabbit. I wasn’t expecting it of her, but it’s a very interesting symbol- I saw her drawing it over and over in her sketchbook, so I made up a project for her. When she gave me her logo, I knew it was her symbol- and I do hope she doesn’t resent my presumption...

Cecelia is smiley face - a very particular smiley face, that shows it’s teeth, but not it’s eyes. She’s a clown, and no mistake.

Horizón- Sancho- is owl. Three clowns on this crew, Gods in heaven preserve us...

Ah- because the Mice are so small, their patches are actually non-water soluble stamps. They each have their first name initial in a circle, stamped somewhere unobtrusive- Darla, Maya, Hildy, Jellybean, Quillaby, Arlinda Rader Haai- D M H J Q ARH. Smaller things, like their shoes and other articles of clothing, are just numbered; and, because they’re so small, I can actually give them each their own individual clothing chutes.
Speed this up again.

Mince; pure speed and beauty. BBC; she’s just a baby. Mendy May has hidden depths. Oz is not terribly serious and stoic; don’t let his appearance fool you. Sohei; a gentle soul. Tellicherry; a simple soul. Neopolitan; self-confident, perhaps proud. Havij; wants to be like what she thinks her sister is, but knows who she is better. Bones; surprisingly dutiful. Tiffany; mysterious. Precious; into dinosaurs. Daily; she liked the shape. Mack;... he likes the Grateful Dead, which is a subtle mark against him, but is otherwise fine. Bang; he took about eight hours to narrow down his choices from fifty to five, and then another day to pick one of those five. Mono; a declarative soul. Jun; a comrade. Zelda; very subtle, dearie. Ailbe; perhaps it’s a matter of a lack of self-actualization, not subtlety. Bura Kada Bura; my case in point. Lucille; she liked the ‘by hand’ look. Bradford; he needs all the help he can get- I’ve resolved to sew every marker in the ‘upright’ position, just so he has something in his favor. Robert; he may be misgendering himself. Maurice; cute, but self-deprecating. Pascal; this man is odd. Coco; hahahaha- but also, hm. Sophie; oh, she’s part of the Knot Guild, interesting. Lynn; this woman is aggressive as hell. Orville; oh my god she’s adorable. Stacey; a horny twin virgin on the same ship as a White Snake, lovely. Cathey; no, no, why would a pair of sexually frustrated young women in the same confined area as two of the most legendary lotharios in the history of the World be a concern, that’s just silly. Parsley; surprising depths. Mila; a mage of some sort, but not anywhere near her mastery. Philip; he’s going to break Sancho’s heart, and Sancho will break his, and I must bite my tongue. Aoife; a defender. Annie; shy, but very observant.

I have a board; each person, once they’ve chosen their patch, gets an example-sample of their symbol glued to a magnet and stuck onto the board, with their name and number written alongside. Every person also has a list of every single item of clothing that they owned before they met me, and that list includes items that I think they might want or need in the future- a good winter coat, for example.

And yes, one of the main things I have Coco and Beatrix doing is ironing and stitching on each patch to the clothing of the person in question. Why stitch if it irons on? Well- adhesives tend to ruin the flexibility of an article of clothing, the literal flexibility of the fabric. My patches have a water soluble adhesive; the stitches give the Stitch Kids practice using the sewing machines, practice color matching, and practice craftsmanship.

And… if the Old (Young) Men stay for long, which, knowing our Captain, they will, I might as well offer them their pick of patches as well. Ugh.

I’m thinking about all of this in order to not think about what I’m doing right now. Right now, I’m standing in the middle of the Galley, in my pajamas, making Shitwhack Honey Tea because I’m starting to get a sore throat and I just Cannot.

Nope.
Flu Season hasn’t quite left yet, and the recipe for Tea To Fix What Ails You was taught to me by my sister, Easy, and while I could call it Breathe Easy Tea, I actually remember the recipe by calling it Shitwhack Honey Tea. Like everything Easy brews up, it has miraculous properties— even though it, technically speaking, contains no actual tea.

This tea is as caffeine-free as anything can be, but always check provenance and ingredients, just in case. It won’t knock me out— hell, it won’t knock anyone out.

But it will make you feel better.

Equipment:

A Bigass Pot, which is why I’m in the Main Galley, not the Small Galley; a working stovetop; those lil’ cloth sachets we use for wassail; a stir stick of some kind. I’m using a long-handle honey wand.

Recipe:

About a pint of clean sweet-water; a large cup of cider, apple or birch; half a lemon’s juice; a whole shitwhack of honey, as local as possible— our bees provided a good strong flavor last year, thank you Mark; three dry tablespoons of chamomile; three dry tablespoons of rooibos; a teaspoon of crushed cloves; a teaspoon of cinnamon, or one small cinnamon stick in shreds; a double pinch of nutmeg; and a dash of cayenne pepper, or white pepper.

Bring the water to a simmer and add chamomile, rooibos, and spices to steep. It’s done in about five minutes, and steep it longer to get that tea-ish tar which, if you have the flu or any kind of nasal effluvium, is really all you can taste anyway. Once the tea is fully steeped, add the cider, lemon juice, and honey until completely dissolved. Drink all of it over an hour; continue making new pots until you have no need for them, or you pass out.

It’s maximum effective if you gargle warm salt water first, then drink— and I would, if it wasn’t Quiet Hours.

Hmm—? Oh. Beatrix, and— ugh, Solitaire. Well, no matter. Deborah, too— Adelaide… Genny— hm. All the girls that aren’t sick, I think.

“Hey girls; want some tea? Solitaire?”

I receive a general round of nods; I pour out tea, and we all settle, in our pajamas, around the Galley table.

I slurp my very hot tea, and let the soothing magic work on my throat. The girls slurp their tea, and perk up in various ways.
Solitaire slurps his tea, blinks at it, and swallows, smilingly.

“Can’t sleep?”

Deborah nods for all her sisters; Beatrix has laid her head down on the table, but her eyes are wide open.

Solitaire just shrugs.

“It’s too quiet for me to sleep easy, dear delicate sister,”

“Hmm. ...Would you like to hear some family stories, then?”

“I would, yes,”

“Alright… do you want to hear The Yule Pheasant Fiasco, The Half-brained Dog, or The Passenger?”

“...Why do they all sound like Tenpenny Dreadfuls?”

“Because our family is weird, Solitaire,” “Hmmph. I can hear all of them, yes?”

“Sure,”

“Haaa- The Half-brained Dog, then,“

“Right-o. The dumbest dog I ever met was a secret genius.

“When I was five or so, Aunt Medjool called Ultima Thule and told me that since I was the strongest of that particular generation’s Fae kin, I got the honor of naming her new puppy. Unfortunately, she called at about dark-and-cold in the morning, long before breakfast. I was in the grip of a mighty growth spurt, and all I could really focus on was the concept of breakfast; so, when Aunt Medjool asked for a name for her puppy, I said ‘Porridge’. Aunt Medjool, bless her, named that Lab puppy Porridge,”

“Question- what’s a Lab?”

“Ah- let me see now… it’s a cross between a cocker spaniel and a hound. Basically, the happiest, stupidest, most friendly and ever so slightly useless hunting dog you ever did met. They developed webbed feet in about the third generation, so they’re dedicated water retrievers now; not completely useless, but better as a companion than a working dog. Which is to say, they’re better for the soldier returning from war than the boy joining the thundering horde. Good dogs; good friends,”

“...are they cute?”

“I’ve yet to see a really ugly one, so- yes, quite handsome as dogs go. Porridge was a lovely golden color, about this big.-”
And I gesture with my hands, tea steaming on the table.

“-and for the first few weeks, he was a regular idiot puppy, clumsy in his quick-growing limbs and doing his best to be a good dog. Then he sort of… just kept doing that? And getting weird, too. Porridge would run up stairs just fine, but refused outright to go back down; he’d trot up to people diagonally. His smoothest gait was at a forty-five degree angle- like this—”

I make an L shape with my hand and point down the forty five- and Solitaire nods, understandingly.

“-and his feet, after a half-year period of tripping, crossed over each other like a line-dancer’s.

“Porridge was not a smart dog. If his dishes were moved, he wouldn’t be able to find them again until he was walked to the new location several times. He had a long-standing feud with the stop sign at the end of the drive, lunging and snapping at it every time he had to pass it for walkies. And, of course, he’d walk off Aunt Medjool’s back verandah which leads directly into their koi pond every summer, for two weeks, without fail.

“It wasn’t all bad, though; Porridge enjoyed his life. Aunt Medjool’s husband, my Uncle Nicolas, likes to play the accordion after his third round of drinks at family occasions. Every previous dog has either hidden under the porch, or in one case, growled menacingly until he stopped. Porridge loved the accordion, and would howl along with it, tail wagging happily. Aunt Medjool breeds the Morgan horses, and while they mostly hate all dogs and tried to murder any of the other dogs that came around, Porridge could walk right up to them, lick their noses, and even approach foals.

“Uncle Nicolas joked that Porridge only had half a brain.

“At around eight years old- not a puppy anymore, but not old, either- Aunt Medjool noticed that Porridge was walking into corners and furniture, mostly on his right side. She took him to the veterinarian, which is a dedicated and trained animal doctor; and they realized that Porridge was actually blind in his right eye. There’d never been any damage to it, mind- it was a well formed eye, it just… didn’t work. So, they took a scan- ah, a kind of drawing made of light and sound- of his brain, wondering if there was internal damage, invisible from the outside.

“As a matter of fact, Uncle Nicolas was right.

“Porridge’s right hemisphere- the side of his brain that controls the left side of the body- was normally developed. The left hemisphere, which controls the right side, was literally about the size of a walnut. He literally had only half a brain to work with as an adult dog.

“The veterinarian said that it was an absolute miracle that he was alive at all, but he didn’t seem to be in any pain. Animals are like that; so long as the injury doesn’t kill them outright, they take the view of life having sent them a blow… and then they move on, and enjoy life.

“Aunt Medjool commissioned my Mom, and she made him a padded right-side face mask because if he couldn’t see out of that side anyway, they ought to protect it.

“Porridge lived to be an astounding twelve and a half, half-blind, half-brained, and friend to all-particularly the horses.

“That’s The Half-brained Dog,”

I take a long sip of my tea. The girls, now wide awake, seem to remember they even have tea. Solitaire blinks at me for a long moment, and then takes another sip of his tea.

“The dog literally only had half a brain?”

“Mhm,”

“...That’s possible?”

“Not only is it possible, it’s something he learned to live with,”

“Damn, that’s weird,”

“Mhm,”

“Alright- uh, tell me… The Passenger,”

“Sure,”

I take another long drink of tea. I get up, refill my mug, and return- and then turn right back around with the girls mugs, and then again with Solitaire’s.

Mmm. Piping hot tea.

“A good while back, I had to ride up to Pumpkin Hill instead of taking the train about four times a year. This meant a three hour journey by train morphed into a three day ride- a day and a half to get there, and the rest to return.

“One time, on the way back home, I saw something very strange- I had stopped to camp just off the road; it was a rest stop, with two waystations directly across from each other on opposite sides of the road, and nothing else but forest and empty road for kilometers- miles- in either direction. It was about the witching hour, and the place was deserted. The waystation I chose, and it’s outdoor campsite- it was the middle of the summer, I didn’t really want to be indoors- it gave off your regular stranger’s house in the middle of the night vibes.

“The one across the road however… did not. It was a Shell-Peace station, and the whole thing looked abandoned. The paved walkways were badly cracked and had grass and weeds growing through; vines and branches overhung the roof. Some of the hitching posts were ripped out and lying on their sides, and the entire waystation had a disturbing slant to it’s roof.

“Also, all of the lights inside were on- even though most of the windows were boarded, the inside looked well stocked. Like the cashier had just gone into the back for a second and would return at any time.
“That was my first indication that my return trip would be a bit stranger than normal,”

I pause. I slurp my piping hot tea.

“I don’t think I fell through to the Otherworld. I have been there before; but I hadn’t fallen yet then, not ever, and so I don’t think I did. I rode on the next day, and passed Double Death Tree, where a local lich had finally met the Unmaker; and I forded the River of the Dead, what comes down from Lake Hylia. It’s a cold, dreary river that’s claimed more people than most wars.

“The Dead River Crossing also has my very favorite way station, perhaps ever. It’s horrifying appearance belies a wonderfully stocked specialty pickle store, and some of the nicest crows I’ve ever had the pleasure of giving scritches to. So long as one minds their manners, doesn’t go under the structurally compromised parts of the overhang, and brings along a piece of wrought iron if you want to explore around the area, it’s safe as houses.

“I use this, for preference; this is actually a bottle opener my cousin Saoirse made- she’s one of Aunt Medjool’s daughters, if that matters,”

“-that opens bottles?”

“Mm. So long as they’re capped, sure- ah, you’ve never seen one. Hang on- Beatrix, could you go get a bottle of mead from the Small Galley? Thank you, lovey- no, I’ll finish the story when you get back, shoo, shoo,”

And off Beatrix trots. Good girl, that’un.

I yawn, hand over my mouth. Solitaire finishes his tea, and stretches. I finish my tea and roll my neck. Beatrix returns with a bottle of mead.

“Thank you- you’re chilled, have a blanket,”

“Thank you, Mab,”

“Mm- right, and this is how it works-”

“Blimey! -ah, smells like mead,”

“It should, my sister made it- have a bit?”

“Ta,”

“Right- mmph, forgot how good this year was… -The Dead River Crossing waystation had some of the finest pickled sheep eyes I’ve ever had the pleasure of eating. Every time I passed through, I’d buy a good handful and toss my loose change into the tip jar, to avoid the curse. I had to do that trip every quarter or so for about seven years, so I got very friendly with the cashier; and his answer to ‘what’s new with you’ was always fuckin’ incredible. In the back of that waystation, there’s a shambling shave-ice store that I never did see open, but Garrick- the cashier- he told me that his sister, Nina, made her own syrups. The flavors were very interesting too, more medicinal than herbaceous- horehound, hyssop, valerian, plantain- but then again, I suppose she must have done a brisk business, to keep such odd hours.

“I always stopped at the Dead River Crossing waystation, y’see; it was the last safe waystation until you got back to the foothills of the Dueling Peaks, before you make that eastern push towards Tiffany Harbour. Garrick always remembered me because I’d show up at nearly the same time each year on the same days; and I remember making a point of being friendly. Nice man, Garrick; recommended quite a few books about beekeeping and gave me the recipe for his pickled eyes, which was very kind.

“I wandered around the back a few times too. There was something that lived under the dumpster; it had eyes that glowed in the daytime, and ate corks and bits of tumbleweed. It had an aura of immense chaos and power- and loneliness. I usually fed it a bit, and kept quiet company with if for a few hours before I had to move along. I only fed the crows, mind- and they’d follow me, escort me, really, to the Old Stable at Dueling Peaks; which is where the character of the roads changed. There was also a large black stoat that lived under the back verandah of the Dead River Crossing waystation; he was always sunning on the weather-grey boards, every time I was there for seven years. His muzzle was fully white, and he had arthritic joints, and a fairly cheery disposition- he’d very gently take a raw sheep eye from my palm a little slower each time, but otherwise showed no signs of aging at all.

“It’s a nice waystation, Dead River Crossing; however, the Old Stable at Dueling Peaks is the only place I would ever pick up a rider if I needed one. Most people who have to ride cross-country often will tell you to put something on the back of your saddle to keep anything from climbing on with you- a box, or a plant, but never a toy or a doll as those are ripe for inhabitation. Most of the time, that advice is perfectly sound- things Unseen like to sit in unoccupied seats, but most of them don’t actually want to leave their places, and get very upset if you accidentally ‘kidnap’ them. The ones that climb into your saddle while you’re in motion are rude and wicked pranksters, at best.

“Sometimes, however, you’ll find one who needs to get out of town. On certain roads, you want to have something, anything, else with you on the horse- as a horse is basically just a large hairy couch on stilts with anxiety-”

“Hahaha- yeah-”

“Well, it can be helpful to have something other than you and an anxious stilt couch on the worst roads. The road between the Old Dueling Peaks Stable and Tiffany Harbor is some of the worst Gods-damned road in Fiddler’s Green. I’ve ridden over most of it- and it’d be one thing if it were just potholes, a distinct lack of proper waystations, and poorly marked turnings. It’s not just that- it’s also dangerously exposed. I suppose it happened around your time… you know that Queen Ariel ruled the Sky, yes?”

“Yes- ah, I suppose the oddness of the Sky Islands just became… home?”

“Well, yes… and no. There are some things you expect, on a skisland; the ground is never quite steady, there’s a faint rocking motion, proportions become guidelines- and the Wind is ever-present. The Queen’s Road- Lacuda, the area’s known on older maps; between Dueling Peaks and Tiffany Harbor is dangerous because no one cares about it. There’s been no cumuloforming to shift the wind a bit; and no one’s bothered to maintain it. No one goes out there to live; and nothing good comes from it. Every time I’ve had to use that road, there’s been a white-out blizzard or hurricane-force windstorms down every accursed inch of it. The only real indication of where the road actually is are little glowy-eyed statues shaped like cats, because that’s how old the fucking road is,"

“Ah! The Demon Road!”

“The very same. The pace of that road is about fifteen miles per hour because the wind is ready and willing to flip you, your horse, and all your pride into the thorn bushes that line it on one side and the ditch on the other, because fuck you that’s why.

“Most of the time, I could find a convoy or a large merchant’s cart to stick close to and ride in the half second of exposed road in their wake. That year, I was on my way back to Tiffany Harbor, and it was shaping up to be another nasty whiteout ride with nary a cart in sight. I didn’t have money to stay at the Dueling Peak Stables, and it was getting quite late- I didn’t want to be stranded if they closed the road, and I definitely didn’t want to pay the fine if I got caught sleeping in the stables with my horse.

“I sure as hell didn’t want to ride down that fucking road alone.

“I stopped in the Dueling Peaks Stable, an old place that’s survived by sheer dint of forgetting to roll over and die. It’s a silent and lonely place at the best of times; unfriendly people, deeply encrusted filth, and an aura of misery so pervasive that it fair chokes the smile from your heart. Just after sunset in the ass-end of Winter, twenty-three degrees below freezing, is a world overwritten with despair. I swung off my horse and was immediately filled with the compulsion to be literally Anywhere Else.

“The thing about the Dueling Peak Stables is it’s got some of the only hot springs for miles; and that water is some of the only potable water for miles as well. I started watering my horse, checking her hooves- I prefer mares because they don’t become damn fools around stallions, quite the opposite- and then I took the coiled blanket off the back of the saddle, freeing up the pillion seat.

Alright, here’s the deal’ I announced, leaning against a hitching post and staring out at the whirling snow and dust, towers of cloud-white stone bristling against the blue-gray sky. Dark shapes moved in the corners of my eyes; and strange eyes glistened in the darkness; and I looked far into the distance, considerably away from the horse, which was grazing on oat-fodder. ‘You don’t want to be here, and I don’t want to ride this next bit alone. I can take you as far as Tiffany Harbor if you get me through this. It’s a nice port town; they have trees, an’ a Inexplicably Good Tofu place that does nice takeaway. I’ll let you ride with me, but you have to get off there. Deal?’

“I waited, staring at the darkness and Nothing Else, listening to the horse chew and swallow until there was a soft scuff, and the jingling creak of something getting up on the saddle.

“Riding at night is no picnic of course, but this was a goggles on and brace sort of ride, seeing pitched small because wide-range would have only confused me. I couldn’t yet differentiate between the stuff in the wind, the wind, and the ground- not at a distance, anyway. The wind barreled into us in random gusts, occasionally shoving me, the Passenger, and the horse into the thorns or the ditch almost before I could correct our balance. My heart throbbed like a rabbit’s right before you break it’s neck; my chest ached from the cold air; my throat was thick with bile and fear.

“I never looked at the Passenger, out of courtesy. Things Unseen remain so for a reason, after all. I got the impression of something tall, and light, and very warm; their face was long, and their chin dug into my shoulder on the worst of the gusts. Their arms wrapped fully twice around my waist, like a Long-Arm; and their legs were scratchy against mine. They smelled of roasted pumpkin, and they were just as terrified as I was- but hot DAMN if the horse didn’t stay on the road, in spite of the ice; there was no oncoming traffic, all down that road; and we even made good time in some places.

“We rode into the Inexplicably Good Tofu place at the edge of Tiffany Harbor, and I got off the horse, hitched her, and slid down the hitching post. I put my head on my knees and cried for a good long minute.

“Ta,’ I eventually managed, gasping on the bitterly cold air. ‘You were very helpful. I’m gonna get takeaway, d’you want a Mapo Owfu to celebrate?’

“That would be nice,’ it said. I don’t know how to describe it’s voice, other than slightly crispy.

‘Lovely, I’ll leave it on the stump there for you’ I said, rising to my feet.

“I came back with the takeaway, left them it’s spicy tofu, and after a crispy ‘Ta, lovey’, we parted ways. I switched horses at the Portgas Stable, and was back at school the next afternoon,”

I take a long drink of my mead. It’s a nice vintage; very good honey that year. The girls are wide-wide-wide eyed, and each of them have completely forgotten their tea.

“Mm. Girls, drink your tea,”

They blink, and nod, and drink their lukewarm tea.

Solitaire takes the mead and pulls straight from the bottle.

I nod.

“D’you still want to hear about the Pheasant Fiasco, or is that enough for tonight?”

“Tell me the pheasant story, Mab,”

“Right-o. So, this story takes place around Yule. Normally, I tell this story then, but this year was weird. So, one Yule yonks ago, my Great Grandma on Aunt Zippy’s side was reminiscing about Yule in Floria, and how they used to have pheasant for Yule. However, things being how they are, what with the Florian Succession, they’d never be able to just purchase a pheasant for Yule feast.

“Well, shit ‘Gail,’ goes my Great Grandpa, ‘them woods over yon hill are full of pheasants, I’ll get you one.’ So, Great Grandpa, Grandpappy, and a dubious relation called ‘Uncle Popeye’, went out with their bows to get Great Grandma Abigail a pheasant for Yule.

“They’re gone for much longer than it takes to hunt a single pheasant. According to Aunt Zippy, they were basically expecting great-grandpa, grandpappy, and uncle to be gone for a few hours and come back with a store-bought roasting chicken and apologies. Instead, they came back eight full hours later, covered in mud and frozen ice- and surprise! They have a pheasant. Great-grandma gives them a lecture about staying out so long and worryin’, but agreed to dress the bird for tomorrow’s Yule feast. Thus, the traditional Florian Roasted Pheasant was secured.

“Great-grandpa and Uncle Popeye retire to the living room, to drink, talk, and warm up from the cold- when suddenly, Great-grandma screams from the kitchen.

“TOM!” she bellowed as literally every male over majority leapt to their feet, because literally all of them were named some variation on ‘Thomas’ for three generations by that point- ‘THERE IS NO ARROW HOLE IN THIS BIRD! WHICH ONE OF YOU IS TAKIN’ THE PISS?’

“They both looked horrendously sheepish and eventually admitted that they hadn’t had much luck finding pheasants in the woods and were about to go to the store to get her a chicken, when they… tripped over the pheasant.

“Then what were you three idiots doing in the woods for eight hours?” said Great-grandma.

“We weren’t out there for that long-’ Uncle Popeye started before Great-Grandpa decked him. Great-Grandma and Grandmammy had to menace Grandpappy with wooden spoons, but eventually, taking pity on the increasingly mortified Grandpappy, the brawling Uncle Popeye and Great-Grandpa stopped and took off their oversized hiking boots to reveal bandages.

“As it turns out, they’d only been hunting for two hours before literally tripping over one, and they both reflexively aimed at the ground and… shot each other in the foot. That was not the pheasant they’d brought Great-Grandma; that Yule pheasant came from the Hospital grounds, where Grandpappy had tripped over it after carrying both Great-Grandpa and Uncle Popeye in to get their feet seen to,”

Solitaire blinks.

“Alright, so- how are you related to Popeye?”

“Ah, well- Uncle Popeye is my Great Great Grandmother’s First Husband’s cousin’s son,”

“... First Husband,”

“The First Husband is the whole reason my Aunt Zippy’s family immigrated from Floria in the first place. So… about two hundred years ago, he decided he didn’t want to be the father to nine girls anymore, so he went out for a pint one night and fucked off to Pumpkin Hill without actually divorcing Great-Great-Grandmother, or even telling her. For a few years, she thought he’d been killed and dumped in the Tems, which I guess happened in Fiorelle in those days, and shortly remarried. Second Husband fathered two more daughters with her, including Great-Grandma.

“About six year’s after he’d fucked off to Pumpkin Hill, First Husband wrote to Great Great Grandmother for money. This was a problem because despite fucking off to another Blue, they were still married; Great Great Grandmother was committing bigamy. Despite pleading her case before the courts that, ‘Really, y’all gave me his death certificate when he didn’t turn up after a month six years ago’, they fined her an outrageous amount of money and only commuted her prison sentence because ‘her brood would place undue strain on the orphanage’- yes, really.

“Second Husband, who was a halfway decent man that only beat her sometimes, died suddenly of stabbing in a Pub fight. Great Great Grandmother was left up shit creek, no paddle, ten girls, and nobody willing to hire a bigamist maid.

“It was at this point that Great Great Grandmother tried to woo First Husband back to Floria. She even went so far as to pay a painter to make Erotic Nudes of her to remind him of what he left. That was an exciting Spring Cleaning, going through an old box and finding those,”
“-uh-”

“Despite Great Great Grandmother’s heartfelt efforts and bountiful curves, First Husband remained in Fairisle, enjoying his new life of running credit scams, bootlegging, and racketeering. After another four years of this nonsense, Great Great Grandmother got the money to ferry herself and her brood across the Blues to Sky Blue, where they weren’t so uptight about the sex lives of domestic workers and she could probably get a job.

“They almost came on the Titan, a ship said to be unsinkable-”

“-Oh gods-”

“Yeah, that fucker sank; anyway, we found the tickets for passage on the Titan next to the nudes; but at the last moment, Great Aunt Jessie caught Measles, forcing everyone into quarantine and saving them all from a dusty, locust-infested death. They instead came on the next boat, and had to pick up some of the survivors- but anyway, the most important thing was that everyone got lice and had to be shaved before entering Fairisle waters,”

“Harsh,”

“Quite. Once in Fairisle, Great Great Grandmother found out ‘First Husband has actually, legit died, for reals, please come identify his corpse and also he owes the Court like Đ500 in fees so-’ to which Great Great Grandmother goes ‘fuck you’ and moves to the Inner Sky with her daughters and her new Muscovy husband. She started a farm, ran her own feed store, and was fairly happy until her death at the age of forty-eight,”

“...Wait, so how… how did your Great Grandmother know of your Uncle Popeye at all?”

“Hell if I know,”

“Boss, why was your Double-G Grandmother’s sexy nudes just tossed into a box? Like, what?”

“Oh, no, it was a box of family albums and unsorted pictographs; the sexy nudes were in a plain brown wrapper tucked in with the Yule Pet Photos- yeah, it was a tradition for a while to dress up our pets in Yule decorations. The Sexy Nudes were right between Grandma’s pictures of The Alleged Dog, Spooky, wearing like seven Yule streamers and a bunch of glitter. She had this ability to vanish even if you were looking directly at her, and she made noises like a child being murdered every Spring without fail. I’m pretty sure she was actually a fox, but Aunt Zippy insists she was actually a cat- oh, and on the other side, it was all pictures of Grandpappy getting smashed on Great Aunt Jessie’s Coffeeballs,”

“Hang about- the Tems isn’t in Fiorelle! It’s clear across the country, what-”

“Whoops, sorry Solitaire. Um… so I learned this story when I was about eight, and I distinctly recalled that particular phrase as ‘Great Great Grandmother was certain he’d been thrown into the Tems’. The actual phrase is ‘Great Great Grandmother was certain he had been thrown into the Tems like his brother, who ran afoul of several criminal organizations while running cons in Londinium and while we are not sure who actually did him in, it was still a big affair to travel down from Fiorelle to Londinium when they fished his body out with the eels,’; thus making ‘thrown in the Tems’ a family phrase for ‘murdered due to gambling debts and quite possibly being an asshole’. When I asked why Great Great Grandmother even married First Husband, I was informed that the deaths of both her parents set her up with a rather thriving bit of domestic service, so she picked First Husband for his mustache,” “Mab, this is very important to me: how do you make Great Aunt Jessie’s Coffeeballs?”

“You’re not going to like it, Deb,”

“I must know, answer,”

“Okay, take note- you’ll need a whole package of vanilla wafers or shortbread cookies, smashed into a fine powder with either a rolling pin or by repeatedly slamming the taffin on the counter whilst darkly airing small grievances; half a bag of ground walnuts, or pecans, smashed whilst grimly airing Really Big grievances; three cups powdered sugar, maybe more; a couple of teaspoons of cocoa powder; a glass of coffee for balls, a glass for you- you can also substitute Rum, if you feel like it; a cuppa honey, probably like a teacup? I’ve only ever made these after watching Great Aunt Jessie do it, don’t give me that look- and water,”

“How much water?”

“Enough,”

“…”

“Ouf, that face- you look just like Sanji when I explained some family recipes to him. I’ll show you, if you’d like?”

“…Now?”

“Maybe for tea; anyway, sift ye dry ingredients whilst drinking, stir in the wet whilst yelling; shape into, like, ping-pong balls and roll ‘em in powdered sugar or cocoa powder or a mix of both, it’s your life. Hand ‘em out to friends, family, and neighbors until they forgive your mistreatments in writing,”

“…Are they really that good?”

“Mm. Are you girls going back to sleep? It’s five; I can cover for you, if you’d like…?”

“No, Missus Mab- it’s best I go kick the boys awake and start the day. I’ll take a nap this afternoon; I’ve only got two services today,”

“I just get irritable when I try that, Boss; I’ll start warming up the irons,”

“Right-o; Adelaide, are you going out to the horses?”

“I expect so; doesn’t matter what I did, they’ll be expecting me at the same time as always,”

“Genny?”

“Back to bed, I think; oh, good morning, Mark,”

“Mornin’, all- bit early for some of you, innit?”

“Mmmph,”

I’m treated to the sight of a sleepy Mark, scrubbing sleep from his eyes and getting a bowl for oatmeal-“Solitaire? The Galley is the most busy place on the ship; if it was too quiet, you could have a kip on the couch, there?”

“...is that really alright?”

“-Yeah, Mister Solitaire; so long as you stay out of the way, it’s fine. Chef won’t kick you out, and I’ll keep the boys from pranking on you,”

“...Thank you, that’d be nice,”

I’ll ask for his patches after breakfast- no, tommorrow, I’ll ask tomorrow.

I start getting dressed by coiling my hair up; Sanji didn’t sleep well either, and neither of us were really in the mood for more than a quick bit of kissing this morning. Pins and- done. No makeup today, just sunscreen; charnellements and my Charm Bracelet are all the adornment I need.

Perfume; honeysuckle. Smokey stockings, and low-profile garter belt to hold them up; thick sweater dress with a deep V neck; lace blue toms shoes; and a lace shawl.

Back to decorating dorms; if you don’t know intimately who you’re dressing a room for, less is more. More space; more comfort; more welcome- thus, resist the urge to fill the lockers with loose objects, or cover shelves with stuffed toys. Keep only the most useful items, like an up to date calendar, a mini-fridge, and a quiet clock.

Lots of people don’t feel comfortable sitting on beds; and there are lots of crewmates who just… can’t. Robin is one of those- she cannot sit on a bed unless she’s getting in or out of it. Luffy is much the same. Thus, both the mens and womens dorms have seating areas- and as the Dorms increase in size, so do the seating areas. At this point, actually, I’m considering making a dedicated lounge room for each side of the dorms… I’ll talk to Franky about it.

Lighting is important for several reasons- chiefly, without adequate light sources, humans go crazy. There’ve been extensive studies done- first we get sick, then we get crazy, then we die. Secondly, it’s important to have a light to read or do daily tasks by- some people don’t like getting dressed in the liminal between the Bath House and the Head, and some people have little habits that don’t fit anywhere but their Dorm. The seating areas have over-shoulder lights for reading or stitchwork, small night lights in unobtrusive areas just dim enough that closing your eyes blocks out the light but bright enough to not trip and die, and each vanity- one per dorm room, work it out- has a patch of magnifying make-up and blemish mirrors, with their own lighting. Because I care, and Franky could.

The lockers serve as more than just hanging and folded clothing storage, a place to put things you’d normally have on you but not right now- they’re… basically the most private space on the ship. I only put things into the marked lockers- I don’t take things out, and the only time I actually looked at the interior is when they were being built. Devil Fate Bullshit. With that said, there’s also a long row of- I’ve said this before.
Each dorm is also outfitted with paper, pens, pencils, scissors, tape, hankies, and a hair dryer. Each dorm has a phone and a notebook for the phone, just in case. The dorms only have skylights, so privacy isn’t an issue beyond normal roommate things- which I expect them to work out, and if they can’t, then they talk to me about it.

On this ship, there’s only three rooms Luffy is absolutely, on pain of a slow and vicious death, Not Allowed Into, I Mean It Luffy.

Number One is the Pantry, which is kept secure by a security code, a key, and a secret key that only Sanji and Deborah know the exact specifics of. I think it’s like a switch? Basically, even if you have the key and the code, if the switch isn’t in the right position- or possibly sequence of positions- you’re not getting in. I think Robin and Nami also have access? And I mean, there’s not a door yet invented that could keep me out- I’d logic through the switch part fairly quickly.

Number Two is the Dairy, which is kept secure by a door, a small clean room, and another door which leads to the workroom- and a whole bunch of specialized runes. Technically speaking, if Luffy did all the right things in the right order, he could go into the Dairy. He wouldn’t be able to do more than taste a few things before getting the boot- and his comprehension and obedience to complicated subjects goes about as far as ‘thumb on outside of fist’ and ‘be aware around trains’.

Number Three is the Smokehouse, which Luffy tries to break into once a week. This is usually when Sanji lets Deborah cook or plan a meal, as he’s reminding his Captain why stealing food is a bad plan. She’s gotten much better at it; and she’s really starting to integrate her basics, which is always fun to see.

Emergency Evacuation procedures, on order of Zoro, actually, get practiced about once a week; the closer Nami gets to dropping that Barrelchest of hers, the more nervous he gets. With that said, it has made Franky really think about how to indicate exits for the crew, without allowing an enemy the same insight. Havij, apparently, has more than a few ideas, as does Fern- they’ve been debating it incessantly, and I’m quite interested in seeing the two of them settle on something, so I don’t have to hear the same argument in it’s seven-bajillionth mutation.

I miss the girls; I miss them being around. I miss Cece’s terrible jokes, and her seething envy of Philip; I miss Fern’s dire predictions that have nothing to do with us; I miss them, and I’m very worried about them. Cece has the flu, of course; but Chopper’s not sure what Fern has, exactly, the tests aren’t yet concluded...

The first thing to do today, of course, is make sure everyone got the tour- and take the Four on a tour as well. Perhaps Captain will make a ruling on just what they are to the crew, but either way I can show them some things- common areas are common for a reason, after all.

I’ll ask Robin to pick a few books she thinks they’ll each like, sometime this afternoon- I know she has an idea of it.

I’ll show them which instruments are currently without Owners; certain things I can just give away, while others will need Nami-wrangling.

Honesty, the worst thing about refurbishing the dorms was cleaning them- we haven’t actually opened up the empty rooms since Sunny was built, aside from my cursory dusting two years ago. Not good.

It’s actually easiest if I start with my legs. I have eight, and they all have minds of their own; pulling on control top pantyhose and then a wide-strap camisole does a lot to make my form more… humanoid. Wrangling my legs into the pantyhose is always a chore, though; still, it works, and it doesn’t put too much pressure in weird spots, so… it’s better. The camisole is there to make sure I don’t overheat too easily- oh, I grabbed the strawberry one, cute.

Then, I pull on my boots - the dry pair, anyway, my other two are airing out still. Slide those down the rack… and pick a shirt for after lunch … and done. Skirt goes on without a hitch, and this one has pockets; and my jacket is in the Galley.

Last is my hair- no makeup other than sunscreen and no jewelry, either. Simple style today, I’m not feeling my usual. My headwraps are in the Galley too- time to collect the boys.

I don’t actually need to get them out of bed; they’re self sufficient in that regard. It does help, however, if I poke my head in their room on the way to the Galley, to make sure they’re not getting distracted.

We actually all wear the same kind of shoes- steel toed, well fitted, absurdly ventilated… grippy; houndstooth trews for the boys and a full length skirt for me, cut so it moves; undershirts, wide strapped camisoles for me and plain old tank-tops for the boys in a variety of colors and patterns; those two… Oz is going to wear a band tee again, because I don’t think he has any actual sense of self yet, so he’s relying on others to assume a self for him. Mince, on the other hand, has a very boring sense of style - he himself isn’t boring, but his style is very… basic.

Of course, we each have our weapons.

Oz’s weapon is a battle axe he can play like a guitar; he showed it to me in it’s Battle Forme, and it’s very red . In Alternate Forme, it’s a guitar pick ; he can use it to cast spells and ‘augment external Love usage’ whatever the fuck that means. When he’s working, he wears it as a pair of barrettes , the so-called Civil Forme. They go on one side of his head, clipping his floppy fringe out of the way.

Mince has tattoos ; one around each upper arm, and one around each ankle. Apparently, they help him focus his Demon powers into ludicrous speed. I’m… skeptical. Firstly, I doubt that’s all they do; secondly, I don’t think it’s his limb tattoos that give him his speed; thirdly, there’s a tattoo on the small of his back that he didn’t know he had? So uh, I think someone’s told him a bunch of lies, probably. The design itself is odd- a blue circle , kind of like a rainbow? And a symbol for the sun , and an apple tree . And there’s a space, in the middle- like there’s a big part of it that’s just… missing. Mince has been drawing out our crew symbol- the one on our flag? I think he’s going to finish it with that, or have Mab do it for him, she did say she’d give anyone who wanted a tattoo…

As for me, I’ve got a variety of quality leather bandoliers in which my throwing knives reside when I’m working; around my waist they go, under my coat- reachable by clever slits in the fabric- and that’s the end of it.

Good, the boys are awake- Chef Sanji said that we’re to start work as soon as we get to the Galley, no matter if he’s there or not. The Month menu is written out on the fridge, on the other side of the big list of what’s actually in the fridge, and how much of it. At the end of every service, we have to count and update the content list. I’m okay at it, nothing I haven’t done before; but Mince is a beast at it. Alls he has to do is look in the pantry for about half a minute, and he knows everything about what’s in it. It’s really something else.

The Month menu has a special magnet attached to it; well, two, actually. The first one gets moved down each week, signifying where we are in the month. The second one pins the next-day’s menu to the door- special recipes we might not know, specific instructions, and so on.

Wait- shit! Today is Sancho’s birthday! I know he won’t say anything about it- but I also know his actual favorites, not what he says they are. He says his favorite breakfast is miso with rice, but that’s Cece’s favorite; he actually likes chocolate chip pancakes with banana filling in the stack.

Hm… It’s Sous’ Pick today for one Service, which means… Right!

“Oh, Mince; I need to know if we can make pancakes for breakfast today,”

“Oh- sure, lemme look-”

“Oz, please set out the dishware for the Early Bird Special; Mark will be back in from the barn at any moment, and he’ll be hungry,”

“Roger dodger-”

“…Um, Mister Solitaire, do you want me to wake you up when it’s breakfast time?”

“…please,”

“Okay, I will,”

“-don’t touch me to wake me up. Just call my name, okay?”

“Yessir, no problem,”

“Deb, we’ve got enough pancake fixings for breakfast- and what’s with-?”

“Mister Solitaire gets the Anxiety when he tries to sleep somewhere too quiet; he’s sleeping here for now because-”

“Gotcha. I’ll start measuring out the pancake mix; do you want me to grill them too? It’s about the only bread-like thing I can cook with skill,”

“Please do. I’ll handle the bacon and the sausages; Oz, you’re on egg duty, and you’re to set out the fish, cheese, veggies, and fruit,”

“On it,”
And then the world goes a bit… well, blurry.

If there’s one thing I can say about making bacon for a crowd, it’s that having a large oven and a cookie sheet works wonders. It’s even better if you’ve got one of those roasting pans with the holes in the bottom so’s you can let the bacon grease drip into a catch-sheet below while the bacon crisps up, but it’s not strictly necessary.

Ovens are best for very large batches of bacon. Firstly, cover your cookie sheet or catch sheet with alumina-foil, so as to improve cleaning; then, arrange your bacon strips in a single, non-overlapping layer. Put them in a hot oven until golden brown and crispy. If you want them extra crispy, put them on a rack before baking. Thick cut bacon tends to take longer to crisp, and burns at the edges easier.

Let the grease cool a tick, then pour through fine muslin or cheesecloth and strain out the crunchy bits; this grease is what Oz is going to use for scrambling eggs. I have a very different method of making scrambled eggs, but Chef’s never asked me to make them, so…

There are five main components to a Galley- well, a restaurant, but we work in a Galley. Cleaning and Washing; Storage; Food Preparation; Cooking; and Service.

The Cleaning and Washing area is between the Storage and the entrance; it has appliances, the laundry chute, the compost bin, and the garbage. There is a three-compartment sink, a warewashing machine, and several movable drying racks. During Service, it’s one of our jobs- ah, Oz’s today, nice- to keep pace with the dishes that pile up. We only have so many, after all; and no one should not eat because we don’t have something for them to eat off of.

The storage area is actually two or three places- non-food storage, cold storage, and dry storage. Non-food storage is disposables, like alumina-foil, plasti-wrap, waxed parchment paper, unwaxed parchment paper, cheesecloth, and so on; cleaning supplies; and clean dishes. The cleaning and sanitation chemicals are stored in the lower cabinets, generally below the sink, so as to not contaminate the food, food equipment, utensils, dishes, or disposables.

Cold storage is where we keep anything that needs to be refrigerated or frozen. Luffy’s not allowed into the cold storage room, the smoke house, or the dairy; and I’m pretty sure the only reason I’m allowed in all three is because I’m the Sous Chef. Technically, I guess the smoke house is part of dry storage; it includes all nonperishable foods and other consumables that aren’t needed daily. There’s actually a trap door in the ceiling that opens onto the deck; making it simple enough to put new stock into its place before we use it.

The food prep area has access to the sink for washing produce, cutting areas, and mixing areas- really it’s a long counter that gets split more or less evenly, depending on the meal. We section it off into processing raw foods- breaking down whole animals into cuts of meat, cleaning and preparing veggies for cooking prep, and so on- and a section for sorting foods into batches- chopping meat and veggies, mixing salad dressings, mixing spice mixes, preparing things for pickling, everything you can think of. It’s on the side nearer to the non-perishable storage, the cabinets and things, which makes it easier to grab fresh dishes, prepare plates and platters, and move them to service or cooking efficiently.

The cooking area is along the back wall of the kitchen; a range, a salamander oven, a rotating convection oven- I think- the fish ovens, the grill, the fryers, dehydrator, and I think a griddle? I’m not allowed to use it yet, Chef says I’m too short still. It’s basically the throbbing cone- HEART, ahem, the throbbing heart of the kitchen. This is where main dishes get finished if they need cooking, so the large equipment- ranges, ovens, fryers, the grill and griddle- are all over there. The cooking area can be broken down into discrete areas just like meal prep. I know something about the workflow of the kitchen doesn’t sit right with Chef- he’s been bouncing ideas off of me on how to reorder the kitchen- to work better now that he has a larger number of underlings and minions to boss. He wants the meal cooking area nearer to the front of the kitchen, where the service area is- basically, he needs to have a serious conversation with Franky, because the Sunny’s galley is really built for domestic needs, not professional ones.

With that said, I’d take Mab’s tiny domestic kitchen over the professional one any day of the week- yeah, it’s cramped as hell, but… I don’t have to stoop for anything I need often, ever. The big fridge doesn’t have food in it- everything cold comes from the cabinet fridge, which I didn’t even know were a thing. Chef really likes them- he’s not sure they make locking versions, though. I’m pretty sure Havij and Fern and Franky can build us one, if he wants… Hm.

The service area is the final section of any kitchen, but especially a commercial kitchen. It’s located in the very front of the kitchen, technically right on the pass-through; when we do buffet-style, it’s where we display food for self-serve. It’s also where we stack up used dishes during a service, because we only have the one sink. I’ve been looking through the mail order catalogues, and there’s a really cool new thing- something called a sanitary dishwashing machine? The one I’ve got an eye on is one meant for medium to high use; it has a very high rating for water conservation, and it comes bundled with a sprayer attachment for the sink, one of those overhead high pressure models I used to use. I think it might help with our metal dishes; we have a lot.

Our galley has a zone-style layout. It’s set up in blocks, with major equipment located along the walls. The sections should follow the order for increased flow, but I think Franky got confused about a few things, or Sanji never expected to have kitchen minions to boss around. Silly- of course he would, with a crew this big! I will say, it’s nice to work in a kitchen where the center is completely open; it means there’s always a little bit of space to get through, and Chef can keep a good eye on everything happening.

The one thing I don’t like isn’t anyone’s fault, really, just more of that shortsightedness- this kitchen was really designed for Sanji to work in, no one else. It’s all built so that he doesn’t have to stoop much, and barely has to move to get everything done. For the rest of us, it’s not so simple- part of my issue is that I’m short. I’m short, and my legs aren’t as strong as his; so, I have trouble lifting roasts into the oven without straining my back or burning my arms. I’m not scared of a few little burns- but they aren’t a few, and they aren’t little. I haven’t said anything because I don’t want to be a bother, and I know what’s going on, and I’ve put in a requisition form for overarm fine-handling oven mittens already- so, really, it’s no big deal. I haven’t burned my coat at all, or my skin, but I can feel the burns underneath- I soak them in cool water for hours when I train, and I know how to treat burns, so it’s fine. I will say though, I’ll be very happy when my overarm sleeves are ready; working with the ovens as it is is not a fun time.

Oh, yes, and every day at the end of the day, we have to clean the kitchen until it’s spotless. We’ve all started getting into the habit of spot-cleaning, just so there’s less work to do.

Take the bacon out- ow, dammit- put it on a serving dish, in goes the second round-
“Good morning, Chef!”

“Shrimp, are you ever not in a good mood?”

“Yes, but not right now,”

“Of course. Seaweed and Cuttlefish?”

“Oz is on eggs; Mince is on pancakes; and I’m handling bacon. I was going to do the pickles and the fruit for the oatmeal, but—”

“No, I’ll handle that and the pastries, keep working with the bacon; while it’s baking, go ahead and set the tables for service. Also, the guy on the couch—”

“Mister Solitaire gets the Anxiety when it’s too quiet and he’s trying to sleep. He’s not in the way, and I’ve promised to wake him for breakfast, so—”

“Fine. Your oath, your follow through; Oz, scrape after every batch, clean utensil, no exceptions; Mince, let them go a little longer before flipping, we want a nice, even brown—”

“Yes Chef!”

“Deb, that’s enough bacon for now; switch to sausages—”

“Yes Chef!”

Mister Solitaire doesn’t relax when he sleeps. Most people do— even my Cece and Sancho did, when they came back from school during break times. When people sleep, everything they are fades away into dark nighttime, and their faces go slack and sweet like children.

Mister Solitaire isn’t really asleep; I can tell these sorts of things. He is, however, tired— it’s like all the life got lived right out of him, like he’s afraid to sleep for fear of going too deep and dying.

He’s like I was, after everyone but me and Miki got taken by slavers during that school trip— still going forwards, After, but… not right.

I was just learning to cook simple breads in Home Econ when it happened, and we had all plumped for a trip to the Tukda Museum, a notable market group for rice. We’d all decided as a class to start with something dead simple— pancakes— before moving on to something a little hardier, rice. I’d mastered the flipping and the mixing of the batter, and Miki was my study partner— she promised to teach me how to do inclusions in the cakes. After that trip—

—hiding in the rafters be quiet, Miki, or they’ll find us; a bottle of poison on a string around my neck, and following the slavers back to their ship in the quiet dark, the two of us not even eyes in the darkness, vengeance burning in our hearts; Ellie’s the better sneak, but I’m no lazybones about it; a single drop of what I’ve got is enough to kill a Sea King, much less a man; they were stolen and scattered long before I figured out who took them; records memorized and burned, and—

After that, I did two things. Firstly, I made a vow, an Oath with my sister-friend, Miki; Death Before Chains. The other… I would find them. I would find every last one of my friends, my classmates-Kaylee-Carol (The Twins), Ava, Zoe, Bad-Luck Ahn, Stellie, Vivian; Miki, and me. There were nine of us in Home Econ, and our teacher, Miss Shermer.

I only found Miss Shermer on accident; she was why I kept working for Missus Seedle at all. I needed an alibi, an opportunity- after all, people go into anaphylactic shock all the time. Peanut oil is tricky; and although she had no proof, that was the day I got moved from waitstaff to kitchen drudge.

No one liked Mister M------; boorish, braying jackal of a man, and poor Miss Shermer had to sit there and pretend she was desperately in love with him. Bastard.

I… couldn’t look her in the eye. I couldn’t let on that I was doing something about it- not while he was still alive. Still, I planned it out very well- got Fern to pick the most auspicious day, got Ellie to make a distraction nearby to tie up the hospital’s response team… and after I made my move, and Mister M------ was choking on his own throat, I looked right at Miss Shermer and gave her a tiny, tiny smirk- of the kind I used to give in her class, right before a small prank sent Ava to screeching.

And Miss Shermer… she smiled. She screamed and carried on when her ‘husband’ died, as was proper; and then, she took a set of keys from his lapel, and saw him carted from the restaurant, and she left.

She runs a school, now, for ‘proper young ladies’; and she came by to visit my mother, before she died. Mother gave her the notes and books that allowed her to be a successful courtesan; and, after that… well, I never did see Miss Shermer again, not under that name.

Missus Seedle was a lot of things- but if there was one thing she was very good at, it was social politics. She knew what Mister M------ was doing to Miss Shermer, just as she knew that I had done something about it, because I held Miss Shermer in the greatest of respects- but she couldn’t prove it. And, she knew that Miss Shermer was kindly disposed to the restaurant; and would perhaps become more kindly disposed to her in particular if my station was elevated.

All my classmates except for Stellie and Vivian were with Miss Shermer- we had a quiet evening in the back of the kitchen after hours, once. We caught up on things- I told them of Miki’s death, and my own vengeance for it.

According to them, Stellie and Vivian weren’t gone- just sold on, to a man in Dressrosa. Gods alone know if they made it, or were still there- but it’s a start. None of the girls were in a position to see the man who bought Stellie and Vivian; but they did notice some things.

Kaylee and Carol are tigershark fishwomen; and they noticed the man who bought Stellie and Vivian smelled like sea turtles and money, sweat and shit- and now that I’ve been to a hotel with a casino in it, I know that that particular combination means casino. The sea turtle smell is an artifact from when they wash the money.

Ava is a half mermaid, a selkie like me (even though I’m really not)- and she noticed that the man was wearing some sort of uniform, livery almost. Like he was important, or went on behalf of someone important. He carried a set of seals, and something stamped red, and the ink on the letter he showed Mister M------ to buy Stellie and Vivian, it was… gold. Not yellow in color- it was actual, literal gold.

Zoe noticed something else- the man wasn’t really all there. He was there enough to do his job; but his eyes were glossy, glassy, like… she said he smiled, and smiled, and there was nothing behind it, not even emptiness. Like it was just painted on, a shell- and it frightened her to see even that.

Ahn’s got the worst luck of anyone I’ve ever seen; but this time, her misfortune was my gain. She tripped him accidentally as he was leaving, and in punishment, he seared marks into her skin- said to Mister M----- that if ever he fell behind on his payments to the Boss, Ahn would be collateral.

That mark is a smiley that’s been crossed out. And next to it, another- one I still can’t really figure out the meaning of. What does G, T, and a Star have to do with anything? Still- I wrote down all their observations. For Ahn, I cut a portion of skin away, and replaced it with skin cut from one of my thighs, where it’d grow back the quickest; and that skin I cut from Ahn, I leathered, and tucked away in my journal. Morbid, maybe- but now I know exactly what I’m looking for.

The only thing I don’t know is what exactly I’m going to do to them that took my friends, or if they’re even still alive.

Ah, breakfast time-

“Mister Solitaire! Mister Solitaire, it’s time to eat-”

“-Thanks, boyo; I’ll be right up,”

I don’t think the Out of Timers know the Girls are, well, girls. To be fair, they don’t have womanly figures yet, and they do have very strong, almost masculine features. However.

I can see it starting to rankle. Beatrix, in particular, is losing her sleepy patience and starting to get what I can only describe as coldly furious- it’s not just the misgendering, it’s the disregard for what she does.

Hm. ‘Bought time I taught her the magic, then. I might as well initiate her into my particular brand of faith as well- there’s no time or place sacred to Zul, because all times and all places are sacred. There is no special ceremony; and it’s no secret how it happens. A conversation; a choice; a clasping of hands. Anything else that happens is up to you- these are the only things Zul requires.

From the corner of my eye, I see Tellicherry jerk straight up in her seat and then settle down for a good show. She acts like she’s never seen an Initiation Unto Zul before...

“Beatrix, no sewing today- we’re doing combat training, and it’s about time for your initiation,”

“Yes, Boss. -really, you think I’m ready?”

“Your shears; and I wouldn’t have said if you weren’t,“

“-!!!!”

“Hmhmhm, you didn’t think I’d keep working on them forever, did you? Don’t worry about the color- so far as I can tell, they were actually always like that, just too worn out for it to be visible. The quality of the metal itself has been raised to weapon-standard, and I had to talk to Mom about how to get the spellwork onto the new blades without breaking them- metal or spell- which is what took so long,”

“...they feel so light!”

“Hmhmhm, a properly balanced blade does feel quite different; so. Training? Initiation?”

“Yes please!”

“I thought so- mmm, drills, I think, then some sparring, and then I’ll teach you a thing or two. But first, we might as well start with the boring bits-”

“Training can be boring? How?”

“Oh dear. -Yes, Beatrix; training, in fact, can be dreadfully boring, especially when it’s foundational. Exercises in patience and craftsmanship, for example-”

“Oi!”

“Am I wrong, though?”

“...no...”

“Mhm. I do believe you understand the foundations of our Art well enough, which means we can move forwards to the basic aspects of the Martial part of it,”

“-Wait, what? Since when do sewers have a martial art?”

“Well, Solitaire, since when has sewing been Sacred to Zul?”

“Uh-”

“-Beatrix, remember this. The true basics of building strength and ability have nothing to do with a named attack, and everything to do with simple skills and knowledge. The way you stand, the way you eat, the way you breathe; and other things that aren’t so easy to see, like your true limitations and your full strength. These are that which all things are built upon; the base. Basics. Get it?”

“Sort of...”

“Think of them as life lessons- things your parents would have, should have taught you, if they’d been able,”

“oh,”

“Mm. At the beginning, I distinctly remember you asking what the point of learning to hand sew, clean fabric, and so on even was- what do you think the point of it was now?”

“...Don’t dismiss the menial things. Before one is enlightened, they must boil water for rice; after enlightenment, they must boil water for rice. The laws and rules don’t change just because you did. Also, the skills that make you good at a menial task are the same skills that can save your life; clean clothing doesn’t carry scent, or wear out so fast when it’s mended, and making sure everything is neat and organized makes it easier to get the things you need faster- medicine, books, weapons, anything,”
“Mm. What else?”

“...Food is important. Even if you have the best teacher, and the best guide to train, if you’re not eating the right things you won’t get anywhere. The body runs off food like a fire runs off fuel- be it wood, coal, or grass, whatever; no fuel, no fire. The body needs all different kinds of food to function properly, especially when it’s under stress. Eating the same kind of food all the time will sicken, weaken, and exhaust the body; leading to sickness, weakness, and disease. -Do I have to learn how to cook for myself?”

“Yes,”

“Uuugh-”

“Steady on, I had to do it too,”

“Fiiiiine,”

“Hmhmhm. Right- I shall be lecturing you about Magic, this morning. You will also, incidentally, be learning something very important about the goddess, Zul, whom you have indicated a resonance with and a willingness to follow. First, tell me everything you know about magic,”

“Um... well, I know there’s magic in words- that’s all a spell is, really, it’s words written special so’s the World can’t ignore them. All words are magic words, if you mean it hard enough. Some people have, like, allergies to certain kinds of magic? Like, I’ve noticed that no Seafolk is ever entirely comfortable around fire, and fire’s about the simplest spell there is. And there are five types of magic, and some people are suited to ‘em more than others,”

“Huh?”

“Fire is Magic, so don’t doubt your senses- but fire is not a spell,”

“...What is it, then?”

“In the basic sense, it’s Evocation; just with flint and steel, rather than a fingersnap and funny word,”

“Oh. Do people not have affinities, then?”

“Not quite; people have places they’re more comfortable drawing their magic from. It does not mean, by any stretch, that they only have one kind of magic. For example, Sanji and Deborah. What can you tell me about their magic?”

“...Sanji draws a lot of his magic from fire, but not everything. Deborah’s mostly water, with a lot of lightning. She never pulls on lightning except when she’s fighting or trying to make a meal out of nothing, though,”

“Mm. I think you’d be served well by starting at the beginning- finish your bacon, first,”

“Kay,”

I finish off my tea, and put my dish on the stack being passed around. Beatrix does the same.
Solitaire settles in, because he’s a jerk; but I ignore him, because it irritates him to be ignored. Petty? Me? No, I’d never do a thing like that.

I pluck a single hair from my head. It’s long, and bright, bright red in my fingers; and then I shift it in the light, and it turns jet black, like ink-filament does that. I wind it around a small stick of wheat-straw, until it’s wrapped well round and no longer dangling. I hang the wound-straw in the air by it’s shadow, and then I wait for Beatrix to focus back on me. Luffy has appeared at her side, eyes wide and eager to learn more about the Mystery Power.

“Magic, in its most basic form is the energy generated by existence; in other words, the Will to Be. Haki is what it’s most often called, by those coming to it from a strictly martial perspective; they’ll also tell you there’s only three kinds. Rubbish. Haki- Magic- is in everything. Grass, stones, the air you breathe, the food you eat, the water you drink. Most things do not produce enough magic to even sense, but powerful things like mountains, storms, and certain islands are, and do. Every living thing produces enough magic to sense- even if some things, like viruses or fungi, are so damn tiny you’d need to train a lifetime to sense them, or near enough.”

I pulse my magic, and the stick dissolves into pure white light. I flick my fingers, and it settles between us, gently radiating that pure white light.

“As I speak, the orb of magic between us releases seven orbs, two of which immediately start thinning into toruses of living vine and metal, respectively. As I continue my explanation, I gesture to each orb, which obligingly flares or flickers in it's own way. Greenish grey like a mossy stone; cobalt blue and black in the middle, like two inks mixing; a bright ember of a sphere, flickering and fluttering with it's own rhythm; twisting and moving, ever coiling over itself, white and green and empty of color but for the dust it stirs; and a crackling ball of shifting flashes, dancing lights...

“Each of these magic types has a place in the body they like to rest in,”

“Wait, wait- what do you mean, rest in?”

I huff in amusement. Seems he couldn’t hold back his interest long enough, our Solitaire.

“Each of the elements that balance nature also balance living beings. They saturate and hold dominion over certain systems in the body. The magic in these systems remains dormant, for the most part, until a living being attempts to consciously draw on their magic for the first time,”

“...Neh, so everyone has five kinds of haki? Why did I only train three?”

“No, you trained all five- you’d mastered one already, I accidentally helped you with that, and I began you on the last of them,”

“-?”

“Most people are born with one of the paths already open, or find one kind of magic easier to use than all the others. Mine was Lightning- or the Claws, as I taught you, Luffy-”

“-Oh! Wait, but lightning- the claws- is really dangerous! I cut myself with them if I’m not careful!”

“Well, yeah. Hang on, I’ll explain that in a moment- but the reason I taught you at all, Luffy, is that using only one kind of magic, following only one path throughout your life causes the others to atrophy- decay, degrade, wither,”

“Eep! That sounds really bad, Boss!”

“That’s why I’m going to teach you how to find and draw on all five of your internal magics before even starting you on arithmancy and mathemagic. Keep in mind,”

I look over the rim of my glasses, so that they blaze white in the light cast from the mystic orbs. I can feel Beatrix’ full attention on me, even though I can’t actually see it.

“Training all five of your internal magics in one go means that it’ll take five times longer for you to learn, and five times the effort to master; not to mention all the other training you’ll be doing, and the Art. Are you sure you want to get into this now? There’s no rush,”

“...I’m sure. It’ll only make me better to learn, so I want to learn,”

“Alright. I’m going to warn you now, so you don’t complain later- this will exhaust you in ways you didn’t realize you could be. You’ll be worried and tested, every step of the way; traps and tricks will spring out of nothing to fright you. You’ll be tired and hard worn six days out of seven, and you’ll constantly feel like there aren’t enough hours in those seven days. You’ll hate me; you’ll hate yourself; and you’ll grow, painfully and by centimeters. For a good long while, training will be your whole life; and once I have taught you, once you’ve begun this path, you can’t unlearn it. It’s yours, forever,”

I pause, and Beatrix looks at me, through all the strange lights of the magic between us.

“It will make you stronger in ways you’ve never dreamed of. At the end of it, it may well be that you can’t relate to your sisters in quite the same way as before. Are you really prepared for that, Beatrix?”

“I am, Mab,”
The look I give my apprentice is heavy with pride. A smirk dances over my lips, before I master myself again and nod, sharply.

“Let’s get started. You know the mental aspect of this already; it’s the same state of mind as when you spin thread, or put in a straight seam,” Beatrix nods carefully.

“Do that now, but instead of reaching for needle or thread, reach into yourself. I’m going to show you the kind of thing you’re looking for and where it comes from; if you need help, I will provide it. All you have to do is find it in yourself and draw it forward; wake it up, and let it settle in you, lively. Are you ready?”

“It seems complicated, but I can try,”

“We start when you’re ready,”

“Understood,”

I watch as Beatrix shifts in place, losing the tension in her shoulders and slowing her breath. Her eyes whirl with feeling- and then those feelings drain away too, as she finds and steadies herself in that cool quiet place where thread is spun and fabric is made and mended.

Solitaire and Luffy have both shuffled away, giving Beatrix all the space she needs.

I wait until Beatrix nods, a good moment longer.

I gesture the earth sphere forward. There’s a sound like the grinding of stone on stone, the clack of dice and the snapping of bones. My voice echoes.

“Earth magic is the seat of strength, and is defined by its endurance and stability. Earth is the solid thing on which you rest; the blackest black of a mine in the deep; the gentle swell of fields and the rasping crush of sand; the crushing weight and fire of the meteor; the dizzying height of a cliff; the ravine full of gems and the quiet grave. Earth is the floor the house is built on; earth is the bone that does not break. Solidity, pressure, stillness; look in your bones, and find it there,”

I press the ball of magic into Beatrix. It touches her lightly, just a bare drop of my power that rolls slowly out across her ribs, her arms, her legs, every bone of her body- lighting her gritted teeth with witchfire.
I watch as Beatrix furrows her brow and looks within, trying to find the energy I told her of.

Her eyes snap open and her shoulders- arms- she braces herself on the table and wheezes. She’s not dropped out of her trance, but she’s not- right.

“Think of your battles, Beatrix; when you almost lost,”

Beatrix’s eyebrows furrow, and her shoulders roll back, defiant.

This time, I can feel her reaching, and so reach for mine as well, matching her pace.

There’s nothing at first, just the quietude of my own soul; then… something. An echo of my footstep against a wall of stone, the potential of something more. We reach for that echo, try to draw it out- but that is not the way. Patience- Beatrix thinks it through.

Magic is alive, in it’s own way. I basically said as much; so, the magic wants things done a certain way. If you want to draw on an element, you have to work with it, not against it.

“Strength. Mab said strength, and the battles I almost lost; how to do it? Sparring with my sisters, pulling up energy I didn’t have because I couldn’t lose, not again- clawing down, digging deep-”

We dive, and come at it from underneath; pull on it with all our might the way we would if there was nothing left but we needed more anyway.

I’ve already done this, so for me it’s just an echo; like hearing a rock crunch, like seeing where the cracks popped open to let it come out.

There’s a rumble I don’t hear or feel with my physical body as something inside of Beatrix roars awake. Vibrations echo through the Galley- the Ship- like an earthquake, which is flatly impossible at Sea but Magic-

It pushes out and rolls, grinding like stone on stone.

Beatrix gasps, and snaps her eyes open wide. There’s a certainty to her eyes, a sureness even to her sitting posture that wasn’t there before.

“How do you feel?”

“Sturdy; like all the force in the World couldn’t move me now, with mountain granite for bones,” “Mm. You got it on the first try, Beat; I needed three,"

“...”

“Hmmm?”

“It felt weird; not painful or nothin’, just kinda weird. Was that all there is to it? I thought something more would happen,“

“Hmhnhmhnhnmmm! Without any prior training in magic, you woke your earth magic- and you did it as soon as you knew how, where it takes most mages years to figure it out,“

“Wha-?”

“Prodigy. The word to describe what just happened- I found a prodigy,”

“Um. M-maybe, or maybe I just have a, a knack for... this... S-so, um, so this... this steadiness, this footing that won’t shift underneath me, a strength I can be sure of... that’s really mine?”

“Oh yes; and no one can take it from you,”

If I ever find the fucking asshole who taught my apprentice to doubt herself, I’ll kill them where they stand.

“What’s next- water magic, right?”

“Yes; and where’s all this energy at the start of the day, hmm?”

Beatrix sends me a teasing glare for my friendly dig, and then melts back into her light meditation. I gather my thoughts, and begin.

“Water magic is the seat of understanding, and is defined by its adaptability and flow. Cold and dark, falling into water and sinking forever; endless flowing currents, the roaring of a river as it wears away stone, a mirror that reflects only the truth; the womb and the wave. Wet; Cold; Flowing; water magic rests in the blood,”

This power is heavy like earth, but quicker; liquid, moving, hard to grasp. It is not earth. Focus on the blood; not your heart as it beats, but the pulse of it’s beating, the rush of energy flowing into and out of it. As I recall, the magic hides between beats, and slips through your grasp when you reach for it.

“Understanding, but what kind- of water? Of magic? Of myself- of myself, who am I- no, what… what do I understand? Swords, though I’m not great with them. Hunting and gathering; it kept me and my family alive. I understand Boss, because Boss is like me- but I never tried to understand those things, I just do … let it come to me.

It starts as a trickle I could barely feel, then a torrent, a bursting flood; the crashing of waves so fierce, I can feel Nami and Zoro snapping awake because- but no, the Sea is calm. That’s just Beatrix. The magic crashes through her like a flash flood, pinning her self against herself until the pressure is so high she’s holding back screams. It smells of ocean air, petrichor and mold; I can see chicken skin all over Beatrix as she shivers.

Another gasp- this one wetter.

“Alright?”

“I feel so- clean! Like, like all the things I don’t need have been stripped away and will not return, I feel- there’s more to this, I can feel it, there’s so much more to this. Boss, what’s the next one? -wait, no, the order of this… what’s the reason for the order of this?”

“Clever girl. Yes; the reason for this order is stability. Magic has rules, same as anything else; and earth is the most stable, the best foundation, which is why I started you there. It’d be different if you’d managed to consciously wake any of your other magic- and no, Fishman Karate isn’t quite the kind of magic I mean,”

“Mm. Earth doesn’t want to move; and like bone, it supports and is good at supporting everything else. Water then… stabilizes? Buffers? It keeps balance, makes sure one element doesn’t overrun the others; water can stop fire or lightning or wind in its tracks, where earth would be scorched or broken or worn away. Earth and water like working together, too; and although it can’t stop earth, it doesn’t need to, right? Water rests on top of earth without being confined. Um, I think- right? Did I get that right?”

“Exactly right; water bends where earth breaks- earth stands firm where water bends. Water smothered fire; earth contains it. Earth grounds lightning; water defines it’s spread. Water moves with wind; earth moves against. Have more confidence in yourself, Beatrix,”

“R-right!”

“Hm- Water magic is the arbiter, the same as earth magic is the foundation. It protects the more volatile elements from each other and ensures that all five work harmoniously together. Water is in constant contact with the other four, the same as blood touches every system of the body. Now, you tell me- what’s next?”

“Fire,”

“Yosha-”

I flick my fingers around to bring the fire orb to the fore; Beatrix melts into her meditation.

“Fire magic is the seat of will, and is defined by its passion and intensity. Warm and bright; sunlight’s harsh-gentle gaze, the call that all the World heeds come Winter’s end; the heat of the hearth and the inferno of the crucible, the flare of two eyes meeting and the agony of a kiss; the wild thing eating it’s own ashes, the seed from which life grows again. Burning, hot, dancing; it rests in the gut and throat, ”

When I let the fire magic go through Beatrix, she shudders and then- chirrups.

“What is- what? Warm, but empty without- missing something, missing-? Willpower. Fire needs fuel, a spark; what feeds will, I don’t… what does it want- oh. What do I want-?”

The will to overcome shall urge us on; to face the World beyond the break of song; the favored of the Gods arrive at dawn- we shall rise again…

“Pull it all together; every desire I have- and feed the fire-”

The energy always sparks in the stomach, like a pilot light in a furnace when you throw fuel in. I feel it flare to life in her, roaring up through her throat and- her skin turns red like Sanji’s- aw hell-

“You two, back the hell up right now-”

“Woah!”

“Fff-au-”

Beatrix’ fire expands like a bomb, pushing heat into and through every cell. A corona of flickering flames, now blue, now purple, now settling somewhere between, cloaks her shoulders. The flames and the shuddering eventually cease; and slowly, slowly, the red fades from her skin, leaving behind only a thick red stripe across her nose. It’s different from Sanji’s; not as clean and tidy, more like… hundreds of tiny dots only making a streak across her face by dint of being so close together.

She comes out of her meditation- but the mark doesn’t fade. Like… freckles, almost, but mystic. Magic freckles.

Cute.

“I feel like I could swim for miles, like I should, like any obstacle I face next would be worth it. I feel like I could fight the World and win - but, um. Brr,” “Hot stuff, huh; and when it leaves, you’re colder for it. It takes experience to draw on just enough, I will admit…"

“The hottest- and that… that makes sense, I suppose. Also, my face feels… odd,”

“Yeah, you’ve got a Mark; it’s nice looking, if a bit, well… here, have a look,”

“-? I thought only Mom had that…”

“Mmm, no, I think it’s a Vinsmoke thing, not an individual thing; and it doesn’t surprise me that waking up your fire magic woke that part of you too,”

“Eeh?”

“It’s like a generator, or a motivator- Fire magic is the amplifier. It’s responsible for pushing magic outwards and increasing the energy that lies dormant within. It’s no surprise to me that waking your fire magic woke your Mark; it amplified something that was always there, after all,”

“Is that why it’s in the middle?”

“Yes,”

“Cool beans. Wind next, right?”

“Right,”

Beatrix nods, melting away. I smile.

“Wind magic is the seat of change, and is defined by its swiftness and unpredictability. The gale which crushes the World down; the storm that shakes the heavens; a tempest of feeling, a breeze that cuts to the quick; the gentle teasing tug of a kitestring in your hand; the grinding of mountain to dust, the cooling of sweat, the breath of life. Intangible, ease, movement; it rests in the lungs and the diaphragm,”

Beatrix… giggles, as the power courses through her and fades. And then, she hums-

“As Beatrix bursts into peals of laughter, the magic whirls through her body and out, into the room. It twirls in giggling spirals, and a song emanates from it. I had no idea this much frivolity and, well, joy lurked in the heart of Beatrix- or Deborah, whose giggles are echoing from the kitchen as Beatrix’ magic nuzzles against her. Good, I had no idea how to teach her to have fun… then again, I might have to as there are some things I just won’t be able to teach her unless she can enjoy a game.
Change is movement, and the unexpected- and sometimes pain- and I did not expect Beatrix’ magic to manifest as a fun, joyful, nostalgic song about her relationship with her sisters and brother.

I can see it settle inside her- the urge to jump when others might stand, to leap before she thinks; to dive into the unknown just to see what’s there. The air briefly smells of summer and storms, before dissolving back into Beatrix’ laughter, sweet and precious and ringing like windchimes. If she chokes on it a little, here and there, how could she not?

Surety, clarity, and incentive combined with impulse is a heady concoction; a sensation of being able to fly where others would fall, the taste of storms on your tongue and the feeling of thunder over every tingling hair…

“Well, I’m less surprised than I thought I’d be,”

“Boss?”

“Deep breaths, Beat, take your time,”

Beatrix heaves, and her eyes light a shade of vermilion I’ve only ever seen in gemstones.

“Well, it makes stuff move; it pushes, it… it wants to go and never, ever stop. Right Boss?”

“Again with the questions when you’ve already gotten it right- but yes. Wind magic is the dynamo. It shifts everything into motion, helps magic flow the way it’s supposed to,”

“Why was it so much easier than the other three?”

“There’s two things I can think of, B; wind itself wants to move, it wants to be used. And, you might just have a knack for it- certainly, it would explain some of your self-made sword-drills…”

“Those are really just some of Mom’s dance moves strung together, I don’t think they’re for fighting at all…”

“Don’t be so quick to judge- shashka sword forms are deceptively elegant,”

“Hmph. Lightning now, right? And then I can learn to use magic,”

“Lightning; and you will not be using lightning magic for a good long while,”

“What?”

“Lightning magic isn’t like the others- look at the orb,”

“…It seems angry and lost, directionless, trying desperately to get free of what confines it- but also like letting it go would be the very last thing you’d ever do…?”

“Mm. Lightning magic is the pinnacle- it’s what Armament turns into when you think about it long enough. It’s the hardest of all magics to master because it possesses the most dangerous properties of all the other magic types, as well as a few nasty properties of its own. People who claim to have mastered lightning really only know how to build it up and let it loose in a defined way; channeling it properly… of our crew, Nami’s the closest to it, and she’s a full Master Weather Mage. Lightning is as unpredictable as wind, as damaging as fire, as adaptable as water, and as indomitable as earth. Further, it is the very essence of life— it is by lightning’s touch that life is begun... and ended,”

Beatrix’ eyes glimmer in the arcs of light sparked off the orb of Lightning between us.

“So it’s the strongest?”

“No one magic is strongest,”

“It’s… the most dangerous?”

“No, all magic is dangerous. Lightning is the least forgiving. If you make a mistake with earth, you’ll be jittery and maybe need to drink a lot of milk; water, you’ll be dehydrated, fatter than normal; fire, you’ll be depressed, listless; wind, you’ll lose your breath, your imagination for a time. All of these things can be recovered from, in time— if you work at it. If you fuck up with lightning magic, about the most merciful thing that can happen is you get some minor nerve damage that heals in a year or so; most people just die,”

“....Definitely the most dangerous,”

“Hmmm. That’s why I’m giving you a less dangerous form to start with. You’ll have to decide for yourself if you’re really ready to die for this; as your teacher, it’s my solemn honor to keep you alive. Lightning doesn’t give second chances, Beatrix; if you take one misstep, make one wrong turn, your own body’s electrical currents will be knocked out of alignment. Electricity is what sets the pace of your heart, and keeps your brain and spine and nerves working; it sets the pace for every cell in your body,”

“Neh…?”

“Think of it like irrigation ditches in a field, Luffy. Every living person has a big network of them, and water— electricity— moves through the ditches in very specific ways, as that person lives. Learning lightning magic wrong is like being struck by lightning— or, in this analogy, terrible flooding. If the field is alright is one thing— but Luffy… what happened to the ditches?”

Luffy looks… scared. For Beatrix.

“So. You’re not touching this one in its fullness for a good long while. You’re going to learn static electricity, which while startling, is much less... less. It’s a lesser form. Build it up enough, and you could still put someone in a world of hurt— but it probably won’t be you. Observe my fingers—”

And with a wriggle, I dismiss the orb of Lightning, drawing it into a thin fine thread and earthing it deep within myself. Another day; another lesson. Not today— she is not ready. As the burning white thread of lightning flows back inside of me, thin wispy cracklin’s of energy dart and flicker over my palms, my knuckles, dancing across my fingertips.
I’ve mastered this—oh, about a year, year and a half ago. My clawtips are sharp and invisible and only where I need them to be; but step it back...

It starts transparent, little lightnings dancing over sharp edges and scales. I step it back, and my fingers blacken, tip to knuckle, drifting black like ink. Step back again, and crackling jewels appear on my second finger bones, held in place with fine traceries of filamental black. Step it back again, and filigree of black wraps around my fingertips and wrist, lacy chains of lightning arcing back and forth. Again, more filament; again, a pair of gauntlets, this is where I was at the end of school; again, the knucklebones, middle of school; and finally… clawtips again.

Go around the world, and end where you began.

“Give me your hands, Beatrix,“

“Okay, Mab,”

I lace our fingers together, press palm to palm.

“Lightning magic is the seat of power, and is defined by duality-“

“Is that what makes it so tricky?”

“Yes; it is easy to understand one, or the other— but both takes a bit of doing. Without peace, magic cannot be controlled; without chaos, magic cannot exist. Without wrath, you do not move; without serenity, you do not rest. You need both to be whole; and the point of greatest power lies between two states. Positive-negative; yang, and yin. Do you truly understand?”

Beatrix’ left hand tightens around mine; anger is easy. Rage— at circumstance, at prejudice, at the cruelties of illness— oh yes, there is a whole world of things to be enraged at. She knows this.

Beatrix’ right hand softens in mine; peace comes too, often right in the middle of great rage. The crisp crunch of cooked sausage; the sight of frost before a snowfall; the color of the turning leaves; the smile of your sister; the little things that make life worth living. She knows this too.

“I see. Teach me, Master,”

“Lightning magic is the seat of power, and is defined by duality and potential. Oppositional forces in balance; the twitch of muscles firing in sequence, the bolt which flies true towards its aim; the strike, relentless; the destructor; the creator; the line of connection across eons, if need be; the web of thought which leads from music to wandering amongst the stars; the decision made before the mind can make it. There are some things that don’t exist without lightning; there are some things that can’t exist without lightning. Sharp, dry, shifting; it rests in the spine,”
I curl my fingers over, press the tips of my claws into the soft space between each finger palm to palm; and then I lift my palms away, and draw my hands away, and between my fingers and the empty space between forefinger and thumb, Beatrix’ own basic clawtips emerge. They’re different from mine in one immediate way— mine are meant for slashing, poking holes, digging and climbing. Beatrix’ claws are for gripping, cutting, tearing, grasping— curved where mine are straight, and wickedly hooked. Mine are meant for action;

“This magic is the catalyst,”

“Does it… is it meant for pain?”

Beatrix stares at her claws, their blackness reflected in her bright red eyes.

“No. A claw is meant for many things— a tool is for what you use it for, nothing more or less. A needle can sew, or heal, or torment— it all depends on you, and what you decide to use it for. And pain is not the true meaning of strength—”

“What is, then?”

“.Hm. I have every confidence you’ll figure it out by the time we’re done training together,”

“It’s going to hurt, right?”

“Of course, it’s training,”

“So pain makes us stronger,”

“…No, but it’s what made you stronger,”

Beatrix frowns.

“But, Master Mab– I’m not strong. Not yet,”

“That is not the kind of strength I was talking about, Beatrix,”

“…you said there were seven magics that govern humans, but we only did five?”

“Animate beings are balanced by another two, yes. Metal and wood; they’re active in your body whether you like it or not, so no need to go looking. They flow through your entire body, your entire magical core and channels, and are the types of magic most martial arts rely on— including Fishman Karate,”

“So- what do they do? What are they like?”
“Fundamentally, they’re very different for all they’re in the same place. Wood is the seat of the spirit, and is defined by emotion. Metal is the seat of the body, and is defined by reality,”

Beatrix just looks at me.

I smirk, and then nod.

“Wood magic is the seat of growth, and is defined by adaptation and discovery. A curious strength in the root of a tree; a memory of the sun; patience in all the turnings of the Wheel, resilience in the face of destruction; self-healing, eternal life; vitality and virtue; the seed, the wish, the promise; a love that does not vanish, only unfolds larger and larger still. Changing, forming, fertile; it rests in the body,”

Beatrix nods; I continue.

“Metal magic is the seat of inspiration, and is defined by endurance and transformation. Solid, liquid, gaseous, plasmatic; hard, shiny, malleable, fusible, ductile; conductive vitality; of death, life; of night day, glory from sorrow; of grief, joy; of dust, gold; of the storm, strength for the morrow; of ferocity, subtlety; of rage, calm; comfort forsaken for truth; the wound is where the light shines through you; a coin to trade, a blade to fight, a kiss to remember, a drop of blood to swear by. Changeable, formed, vital; it rests in the mind,”

“...really?”

“Really,”
Dear Dream Journal,

I had the nightmare I can’t remember again- not the one that’s loud and bright, the memory-dream, but the one that means Others.

I’m a machinist, and my weapons are a sword and a shield. Even though my skills lay more in the making of such things, I am no stripling with them- Mom and Dad wouldn’t allow that. That said, here’s a thing I don’t know how I know: named, physical weapons cannot be carried in dreams. You can carry a seeming of the weapon; you can even carry a memory of it so powerful it’s next to nearly the same damn thing- but they are not the same thing. The only exception is starmetal, which comes from Beyond, which is further than the Otherside.

Hammer and Tongs are physical weapons; and anything with its own Name has its own Will to Be. They are not, however, starmetal weapons- simple steel and yronwood, which while sturdy in their way, are useless to me in a dreaming-pinch...

I’ve written this out of order- sorry, Journal.

Here’s what I know: my skill is called Dreamwalking. I got it from my Dad’s side of the family. He gave me a journal that’d been passed down for generations, with observations and notes from every Dreamer in our family, and a lot of information about the Others. You don’t need an active teacher for Dreamwalking if you’re a Dreamer- in fact, having a teacher just makes things harder. It’s a personal skill, with personal interpretation being more valid than what any outer force can tell you. Then again, I’ve found a basic grounding in Psychology and Ethics to be very helpful navigating some of the weirder dreams I’ve been through...

Dreamwalking is a powerful art held under Divination as far as magic goes- but unlike Seers, who are more like computers (like Neo and Miss Tellicherry) in that they use powerful predictive algorithms and huge data sets to make their predictions, Dreamers use intuition and interpretation, and their predictions often have nothing to do with the future. Seers see the future, the present, and the past as it happens in the physical world most of all; Dreamers see the future, present, and past as it happens in the spiritual and emotional worlds.

I cannot use the same tools as my friend, Fern, to do my thing. They will not work for me as they do for her. This is because Fern makes her predictions based on hard, solid datum- facts, observed phenomena, even if she herself didn’t make the observations.

I don’t.

My skill is all about dreams- well, really it’s about minds. Everyone is connected to something I’ve started calling the Sea of Shadows, or the Black Sea, a force or a place where every dream goes when there’s no one to dream it anymore or just yet. Missus Mab is the Ruler of Shadows; that’s what her Devil Fruit, the Kage Kage, means. That’s what it does- meaning Mab has dominion over a much wider range of things than just shadows. I think she knows it- and I think there are some lines in the sand she won’t cross. Once you start raising the dead, it all goes downhill...

On the other side of the Black Sea, there’s what’s known as the Otherside. The Otherside is the place where everyone (so far as I know) goes when they die. It’s where the Others were imprisoned during the War of Creation. Time does not exist in the Otherside; nor does Death; nor does Law. It is wholly beyond the reach of the Gods— who themselves are more than half dream.

The Four Old Men that Fern rescued… they’ve been trapped on the Otherside for a long, long time.

Perhaps my thoughts will come to greater order and clarity if I write out what I know about dreams, Journal.

There are two kinds of dreams that can be discussed: Dreams, which are defined here as ambitions, or Directed Wills; and oneroia, which are the “regular” dreams a being has as it sleeps. Anything that possesses the Will to Be can dream, because if you have the Will, you are, in essence, alive— and all living things have a period of rest, or dormancy. No being can be wakeful through their entire life, it’s not possible. However, it is entirely possible to keep a being asleep for far longer than they would naturally remain so— but if this process goes on too long, the being in suspense eventually self terminates. -Note: Refer to ‘The Structure and Interpretation of Dreams, Fraud’ for more in depth detail.

Oneroia, forthwith referred to as diminutive-d dreams, are a succession of images, ideas, emotions, and sensations that usually occur involuntarily in the mind during certain stages of sleep. Due to their very nature, dreams have a strange magic of their own, and are connected to various realms of power- the Otherside being only one, with merely the most recorded instances of such.

No one is entirely sure of the physical purpose of dreams; the best explanation, the best scientific hypothesis I can consider is that dreams serve as a sort of organizational purpose, a pressure valve, even a re-organization system. -Nerves and fat- that’s all a brain is. Nerves are like wires in a house— they’re rated for a specific amount of voltage, a certain amount of use before they need to be replaced. Dreams might, perhaps, be the body’s way of checking the nerves of the brain for stress and soundness. It may be that dreams help the mind organize the previous day’s proceedings, even store them properly— or dispose of them, should duplication occur. The mind abhors chaos, spontaneity, even newness; thus, it fits every day into a pattern, and resists changing that pattern except by increments.

Dreamwalking isn’t interpretation- that’s work for a Shrink or a Journal like you, not someone like me. I don’t draw deeper meanings from the dreams I experience. I must, due to the very nature of what I do, draw literal and literary meanings from what I experience.

Dreams have a curious logic of their own; surreal circumstances, illogical proceedings— it all seems perfectly normal, even obvious.

Unless you are a Dreamer— unless you, in a very literal way, can enter into the dreams of others and change them as you will, unless you can return to the physical world with tangible, workable items that have no other explanation for existing— then you cannot take your dreams as anything more than fart noises and dust in sunbeams. Amusing, beautiful; but not particularly weighty.
As a final thought before I relate my latest dreamwalk to you, Journal, I will say this: dreams can have varying natures. They can be frightening, exciting, magical, melancholic, adventurous, lustful, sexual, disorienting, even cruel- but one thing is always certain. The events in dreams, unless the one dreaming is a Dreamer, are outside the control of the dreamer. Lucid dreaming is only sometimes possible for the average layperson.

Dreamers can only dream lucidly- which is not to say that I remember every part of my dreams, far from it! I only mean I am self-aware, whether I remember the circumstances of my dream or not. I do not dream without knowing I am dreaming; I cannot be coerced into making deals or bargains; I cannot be lied to; I cannot be stolen; I cannot be imprisoned.

It’s a funny thing, dreaming- inspiration, desire, creativity; confusion, revulsion, rigidity. There is no yang without yin; there is no yin without yang. I am the axis on which both spin; and no Other has any power over me.

Is it any wonder, then, that my friend Fern- who is a Seer, not a Dreamer- got her soul trapped in the Otherside when she used magic she didn’t understand to free four men from a horrible fate?

Journal, as you well know, my friend Fernanda is terribly ill; however, what I might not have made clear before is that her illness was made increasingly worse in increments, and that her collapse the other day was actually a result of her body being separated from her mind, her soul the only thing connecting the two. It is a tenuous bond, and as the days go on, it grows weaker.

Something must be done; and I, as the only Dreamer with a mocodium of knowledge in this situation, must be the one to do it.

During the early days of Fern’s sickness (which was more than just a single day, that’s just when she was sick enough to collapse- she was sick for a few days before that), I would fall asleep, dark-dreaming every night underneath my sister Neo’s steady log-sawing, and I would… well, wander.

I’ve been able to do it for a long time; it was easier, or maybe I was used to the dreams, back in our old apartment building… I get a lot of interference here, and it’s hard to get all the details straight.

I remember a marsh land, a sea of reeds with thick black mud, empty of all living things- for even the reeds were dead and yellow, and the mud was only dirt and water, no living humus to give it stench. I remember a forest of white birches shattered from the chill of winter, their mighty trunks broken from within and their withered branches grasping at a grey and blackening sky. I remember a clearing in that forest, and in its center a cruel ring of jagged stones softened only by snow and ice, and the burned out ashes of a fire in the center, bones it’s only fuel.

Beyond the clearing was a path; beyond the path, a gate of bone; and further still, crouched on the hill like a vampire frog on it’s branch, windows glistening with malice, was a manor house.

I say again, nothing in that foul place lived.

Except for something… Else. There was a Courtly one who came and spat insults at me- and then spat something else at me, some-thing that could not keep it’s shape and only repeated words… we fought, and I injured it gravely. I was woken by my sister’s feet hitting the floor of our Dorm, and so I did not know then what had become of the creature.

Dearest Journal, I thank you- you have allowed me to put a name to the creature that I fought near the Dead Manse. I will now create an entire article for the subject, created from various notes and details scattered throughout.

Aberrations are beings with bizarre anatomy, strange abilities, and alien mindsets- more so than can be accounted for by differences in tribe, culture, faith, or gender. They are the descendants of those poor souls taken as Changelings so long ago. Even mild exposure to the Otherside has strange effects; a lifetime of exposure to a place where the only enforcement of the self is the self leads to… well. So far as I can figure, Aberrations have no real Form, from which their self-Image daren’t deviate; they can take on any shape and act in any way. Unaffiliated, they tend to be mischievous pranksters; treated with kindness and care, they become wondrous allies; kept with cruelty and fear, they become deadly tools.

The creature I fought, I do believe to be an immature Hagunemnon; hagu being the ancient word for formless, and nemnon meaning no center. A formless being, without a center; normally, I would be wary of such a creature being loose in a dream I must return to. However, I grievously wounded it, and it’s master, an Other, left it for dead- I remember that clearly. Perhaps there is an opportunity, here… But what can bandage a being with no set shape?

I read the schematics for the Tarot Device on a whim- and lucky that I did! Fern drew out the schematics for the new and revised Tarot Device; and there it was, crystal clear. Fern neglected to include a Sound Gem, nor a Compiler. Nothing in her device would protect the autonomy and sanctity of her mind, or her soul- thus, as her friend, it behooved me to go and retrieve her from whatever trouble she’d managed to land herself in.

On closer inspection, it was not her soul stretched so taut, but her mind, a revelation that significantly shortened the amount of time I had to prepare. Minds are fragile, more so than spirits- a broken spirit can be repaired with time, while a broken mind… that is not so simple as time and support from friends and family.

It is enough to know that Fern had returned her body and mind to the physical world when she returned with the Four Old Men from the Otherside. They were trapped in, I suppose, an eddy- a still place in the river of time. Their imprisonment alone would have left marks; but they were tortured, too, quite severely.

I have boring hobbies, not boring books.

The Four Old Men… they don’t believe this world is real. They can’t- they’ve spent too long on the Otherside, been tricked too many times. There are cracks, of course- the longer we all act as ourselves, with moments of pure stupidity and gracelessness, the easier it will be for them to believe that this is real, that we are real, and not ghosts or strange things come to fright them.
That’s when the real problems are going to start, I think- and yet, what else can we do?

I, like Fern, make lists when I don’t know exactly what to do.

Fern’s Soul is currently in some manner of Distress; it is being kept from her body against her will.

The longer her soul is outside her body, the less likely she is to recover from her illness; it has been one full day so far that she has been Without.

If I take too long to retrieve her, Fern’s mind is at terrible risk of damage.

I need more than a night’s sleep (defined as twelve hours) to get to where she is being kept; I can only sleep twelve hours unaided.

The safest draught I can make will make me sleep for eighteen hours, a very long time indeed.

I will need supplies for her Rescue; and I will not be able to take my sword or shield.

I took the day after Fern’s collapse to do research in the Library; Necromancy, hexes and cantrips, the Universum Primagical- I think that’s what it’s called, I just went by color- and… her familiars.

There’s no familiar I know that would allow their Person to come to harm; and so I spoke with Buttercream and the Sweartoads. All four agreed to help me on my Quest; the toads gave me their toadstones, which they had been growing all their lives. I set them in a plain armlet, and clapsed it around my upper left arm. Buttercream gave me a lesson on how to be unwavering- taught me a secret I will not share, even now, as it is between her and I. She gave me a gift; told me that it could not be taken back, or worn out- that I would always, in my time of need, have the power and strength and savagery and innate wildness of an adult female Great White Wolvark at my disposal.

As for my other, less fanciful supplies: a large mug of warm milk and honey to be consumed before bedtime; a small phial of powerful sleeping tincture, filched from the stillroom; a warm hug from my sister, because I love her; and a conversation with the Four Old Men. Well, more of a promise, really.

“She didn’t build it right,”

“What-? How did you get into this room-”

“All the dorms are connected on the inside, the outer doors are for peace of mind. And Fern- that’s her name, Fernanda- she didn’t build her Device correctly. She accidentally left out the Soundstone, and the Compiler. She’s trapped,”

The men looked to each other with pure horror in their weathered faces.

“I won’t ask any of you to come with me; it’s scary, on the Otherside, and you were trapped there a long long time. I will ask that you watch my body; make sure I’m kept safe as I sleep, and am not awoken from outside. I need to wake myself up, understand? Otherwise, Fern could be lost forever,” “Boy, you don’t- you’re too-”

“I’m going. Tell me now, Mister Udoroth- why was the whole of that land dead? The marsh, the forest, the glade, the path back to the manse- all of it dead. No living thing, not even a bug or the stench of the earth- why?”

“...A mill, boy. That manse- you saw it? Down in it’s basement, there is a mill. It’s a terrible thing; mud in, bricks out, fide - we did not know, ‘ow could we?”

And Udoroth begins to cry.

“We tried everything to destroy it; our weapons broke, our fists broke, and always it loomed and laughed-”

“Enough, Udoroth!”

Solitaire is… pressing his fist to Udoroth’s forehead? And Udoroth is calming, he was becoming frenzied.

“Boy, I’ll tell you the horror of the mill, and spare Udo from it- if you put a living creature into the damned thing, you can get nearly anything of value back. But you cannot get back the life you traded away- for what? For gems? For gold?”

So that’s what it is. Something for Nothing; one of the Otherworld’s foulest bargains at work. My weapons on the Otherside are just memories and metaphors- and they won’t be strong enough to face down the thing that is keeping my friend captive, that hurt these four men. Only a real, tangible thing could do it- only something literal, an unbreakable resolve, could destroy something the Others wrought.

Only something real could break such an agreement.

The original terms for the Others were the Seelie and the Unseelie. The Seelie reigned in Spring and Summer, and were neutral at best, and terrifyingly good; and the Unseelie reigned in Fall and Winter, were neutral at best, and horrifically evil at worst. In those days, the Fae were the Aos Sí, the People of the Mounds; and the Fae, the Fae Kingdoms, they were beholden to the higher courts of the Seelie and Unseelie.

In those dark days, before the first age, at the bidding of the Courts, the Fae were the enforcers of terrible bargains and contracts- the terrible reputations that the Fae still have even now is in direct consequence of their serfdom under the Courtly Ones. They stole farm animals, soured milk before it could be used for cheese or butter, murdered families, and swapped people for changelings- particularly children. The habit of the Orcs, of referring to their women and children as entirely female, and weak, was truly an effort to stop the Fae from stealing their children for the Courtly Armies.

We know now that some things considered terrible, terrible ideas have nothing to do with the Courtly Ones; Fae mounds are burial tombs, of course it’s a terrible idea to build on that land or take that gold. Going alone into a marsh is a stupid idea for physical reasons, not just mystic ones- crazy shit lives in liminal places like that.

It’s the Others who like to play with time; the Fae consider time to be one of the most sacred gifts of their creation goddesses, and would never impede it if they could help it. A Fae will never, ever trap you in time- to them, it is anathema, an abomination unto the Gods and the World. The Others, on the other hand… even if you gained egress from their dominion, you would invariably find that centuries have passed- and likely crumble into dust at the cruelest moment… or, even crueler, live out the natural span of your life bereft of everything and everyone you ever knew or loved.

Most importantly of all, the Others cannot make anything themselves- not art, not science, not children; nothing. The Fae are absurdly fecund, often producing upwards of five children per pregnancy- some Lines are known for throwing less, or significantly more- and have a love for art, and the creation of it, bordering on obsession. If there is an art, it can be guaranteed that there’s a Fae somewhere who has dedicated their entire life towards the mastery, or production, or exploration, or preservation, of that art. The only things a Fae truly fears are these- milk, breaking oaths or contracts, and being trapped.

The Others are different- the cannot make their own children, that’s why they forced the Fae to steal children, or steal them themselves. They cannot love in a way we understand- or rather, they cannot love in a nourishing way, as it’s wrong to say that the Others do not love. They love; but as an owner to a slave, or a miser to their wealth.

Elves, Giants, Automata, Alraune- Trolls, Nokken, Dullahans, Tiklik, even Geisterdamen- all of these tribes, these nations, are things that came after the Others. They have no real connection to Them, other than occupying the same sort of societal niche.

The Others are monstrous because they are, fundamentally and undeniably, inhuman. The kindest of them are neutral to humanity; and the worst hate and despise us with everything they have. Entire families have been wiped out for daring to walk across an Other’s road; and making bargains with them is a terrible, terrible idea.

There are a variety of superstitions that developed to keep Them away, or to pacify Them. The ones that work are fairly simple- women, women’s vaginas, menstrual blood, and milk are anathema. They can’t bear even the sight of such things, they’re so powerfully anti-Them; which is why they made the Fae spoil milk so long ago… Again, They can’t create. They can only twist and pervert what’s already there- the average Fae has a fairly strong mein for mischief and humor, but also knows when a joke isn’t funny . Mischief, not malice; Fae, not Other.

Salt, salt water, iron, cold iron, and bells will mortally wound Them, for a slightly different reason; magical ones I’ve never really managed to get a straight answer on.

Old as anything, long forgotten; and horrifying. Don’t be fooled by their presentation- amazing, beautiful, graceful, magical- but underneath something hungry and wrong and utterly inhuman. For Them, empathy as a concept is as alien as the idea of blue as a number- which, if you’re measuring light, it of course empirically is . They hate Order, reality, truth; their sense is literal nonsense, the stuff of dreams and nightmares.
Fae are sometimes called the Fair Folk; this is because that is what they are. If you make a deal with a Fae, they will uphold the letter of your agreement- and they will negotiate with you what a fair exchange is. They do not lie, they do not cheat, and they don’t tend to be particularly interesting individuals. Missus Mab is an extremely typical example of her Tribe, and Mister Solitaire probably is too, under all the trauma.

They are called the Courtly Folk; this is because it’s the only translation of their original name that made any kind of sense, back when we went under the control of the Tenryuubito. That’s not what they are; that’s not what they do. But, the caprice, the careless malice, the cruelty and stupidity and evil- all of that is quite obvious, if you only take a moment to think on the name They demand Themselves be called.

As for the mill? Or perhaps The Mill? No, just the mill-

Anything They do ‘for’ a mortal or that a mortal takes from Them must be returned in kind, and by their standard. This is often fatal, or worse. It could be their hospitality, food, or aid- and They are always the ones who determine the exchange rate. They will do their best to trick and trap mortals into unfair bargains; and the words ‘thank you’ are insulting and alien to Them. Words and feelings are not equal to actions; and few can recognize good intentions, much less choose to act on them.

The mill has to be the work of the Others. What else- who else would be so pointlessly, extravagantly evil?

I took a deep breath, and turned to Udoroth. He shrank away from my wolfish stare, and tears bubbled anew at his eyes.

“Did you ever try cold iron?”

For a long moment, Udoroth was silent- he started to answer, and then stopped himself, confusion warring with hope.

“What’s cold iron, boy?”

I grimaced- as I thought. Cold Iron was rare, a thousand years ago- gold is easy to work with your hands and a stick, silver and salt go hand in hand, copper and tin together make bronze- but good cold iron, starsteel, that’s a different kettle of fish.

“Cold iron is from Beyond the Otherside, and worked by Smiths and Machinists and Sewers-” I say, arms akimbo, “and it is mortal, permanent death to any being from the Other Side, any being with no mortal form of it’s own, at least. Did you try to destroy the mill with that?”
Udoroth slowly shook his head. I nodded. There’s one more thing I need, then—needles, nails, and my good tack hammer. Maybe my alarm clock for bells? No—I won’t have space for the bandages. I’ve decided—honey, cobwebs, or mud; as I’m using the honey with the milk, and it’s too cold for mud, I’ll be using cobwebs… which means I need to make a stop at the Studio. I looked at the men—the thought of going through the ship, safe as it is, by myself… considering where I was going next, the whole thing made me deeply uneasy.

“Will one of you walk with me? I need to get some things from the rest of the ship, and I don’t want to go alone,”

“It is safe here, boy,”

“Not for me, Mister Mukhtar; not this night,”

The men looked at each other; they looked scared. And then Udoroth snorted like a bull, and said—

“Are we men or not?”

And then he stood, and rolled his neck, and said—

“After you, boy,”

“My name is Havij, and I’ll thank you to use it Mister Udoroth,”

“-hm? Aye, if you say so,”

I just sighed, and started for the Shop; that’s where my tool box is, after all. The men followed me down; and they all let out quiet exclamations of shock and awe when the saw where all our things get built.

“Boy, are you sure you can take that hammer? ‘Tis a very fine box—surely it will be missed?”

“Considering it was my mother’s before it became mine, I’m sure there will be no problem with it; and we don’t really count the nails, either,”

My tack hammer is an heirloom; not very pure, but pure enough to hold lesser iron to it, and to be covered over in square markings. The nails are basically shite; steel enough to glimmer and be heavy in the hand. I take five.
Mister Solitaire blinks, and cocks his head.

“I’ll say again, Mister Solitaire- my name is Havij, and I’ll thank you to use it,”

“Aye, of course;”

And finally, the Studio; the entire room is an Oath to Order and Truth, a mysterious wonder beyond my grasp- except for some things. The men stop dead at the threshold and don’t dare step further.

“Boy- Boy, what are you doing? That’s women’s business, come back-”

“For pity’s sake, Mister Zaffir, I’m a girl- girls turn into women when they grow up, you know! And you can all come in, just don’t touch anything but the floor-”

“Hang about, you’re… a baby woman? Is that what a girl is?”

I pause, one of the larger plain hat pins in my fingers, and stare at all of the men who, until this very moment, didn’t know what girls are.

“...Are you telling me that the reason you’ve all been calling everyone younger than you ‘boy’ is because you didn’t know that immature women are called girls? Is that what you’re saying?”

Solitaire looks particularly awkward.

“You have to understand, we only know of women at all because of our mothers, and the, ah-”

“Whores and washerwomen and cooks who follow armies, obviously, what of it?”

“Well, they’re all adult women, not, um, unblossomed-”

“Oh. So you’ve never met an unblooded woman, I see,”

“Sorry, what?”

“The difference between a boy and a man is often internal change; the way he sees the world, the way he carries himself. The difference between a girl and a woman is much simpler; it’s blood.”

“...What?”

“Her moon blood? Her first bloom? …menstruation…?”
“...?”

I blink, staring at the four men who have no blessed idea what I’m talking about. I could just not tell them, but also I don’t really want to… I do like explaining things. Stalling? You betcha.

“Well, better come in all the way- yes, in, all of you. What if you have a daughter, hmm, and need to explain what’s happening to her? No, in, come along, yes, all of you- grab a stool, they’re for sitting- thank you,”

After setting the spidersilk extruder to extrude the kind of silk I need, I’ve gathered a pair of cotton balls, a bit of red string, a small sachet with a drawstring closure, and two lengths of pink string. Then, I carefully roll over a mannequin, er, dress form? Lock it so it doesn’t move, and pin everything on in more or less the right place.

“So, I’m going to assume you all know absolutely nothing. Men and women each have a half, and when those halves are put together, they make one whole baby- or possibly more, but we’ll start with one. Men keep their half in their testicles- their balls-”

“Ah-” “Okay-” “-Oh-” “Huh-”

“And women, who also have to, erm, put the baby together in a bed so it can survive out in the world, have their half here, in these. On me, they’re here-” and I point to the middle of my hips from the front- “-but generally speaking, a woman’s ovaries- yes, eggs- are here. A woman has many many more eggs than she can ever put to use; she often becomes too old, before she can use them all,”

“But what about the blood?”

“Right, sorry- the pouch, here, it’s where women keep babies before they’re born. Before that, however, it has to be prepared with a special bedding- and that takes about a moon’s turning, or a month. If there’s no baby-seed to use the bed, however, it has to be thrown out,”

“...Really?”

“Yes,”

“Girls become women based on their ability to provide beds for babies inside their bodies?”

“Legally, yes,”

“...Are you a woman, then?”

“I will be, quite soon,”

All the men are frowning.
“You’re much too young for women’s business, Havij.”

“You’re much too young for those shadows in your eyes, Mister Solitaire; but we are as we are,”

I take the hat pin in hand again, and sigh.

I really, really don’t want to fight a ghost, or Other. But, it has my dear friend in it’s loathsome clutches- and so, I must free her. And there’s not enough time now to get my alarm clock, damn it all.

As for that fucking mill- the thought of even being in the same room as it makes me feel uneasy.

“Are you all absolutely sure one of you won’t come with me? I- I’m scared. I don’t want to go alone,”

The men look at each other; Solitaire and Udoroth argue fiercely but silently, as Zaffir rolls his eyes and shrugs away Mukhtar’s restraining hand.

“I have no idea how you’ll be getting there, but- if you’ll have me, I’ll go,”

“Zaffir-”

“Father, it is wrong to send a girl- a woman- off where a man fears tread! If I go with her, perhaps she will return,”

“It will kill you-”

“It’s killing Fern now, Mister Mukhtar. That might not matter to you; but it matters to me! -Zaffir, if you go, I cannot say if you will return again,”

“I understand; I’ll go,”

“We’re all going, Zaf,”

“Ser?”

“Muck, I well remember the horrors you faced last time, in that place; so, you will stay behind and guard us all. Solitaire, Zaffire, and myself shall go with young Havij. Aye,”

“Aye, ser,”

“Havij; have you enough supplies to ensure our safe passage?”

“Aye,” “Right; lead on, then,”

I blink, then nod. I gather the things I needed from this room- the hat pin, the bandaging in a small fliptop jar, a plushie bag that looks like a squidberry- oh, it’s meant for a mermaid, the inside’s waterproof; and then all five of us, after making a quick stop by the milk fridge for a half-pint each of plain whole milk, and the little pipettes of honey- and even though Mukhtar isn’t going with us, he can still have milk and honey. Mab’s started putting little carry-along sacks so that there’s less chance of broken glass and milk on the floor come morning. Anyway, after that, we all end up back in their dorm room; it’s not gotten that homely feeling yet, although it does have that homely smell of man-stank and feet…

I suppose I should mention, although it’s only now that I’ve noticed at all- all of the men are wearing nightshirts, and my nightgown is actually also a nightshirt of slightly finer quality. I’m also wearing house shoes and a bathrobe. I don’t think the men really got the extent of their amenities… I’ll tell them before we go, so they know when we come back.

“Okay- um, first we need to double up the beds-”

“Sorry-?”

“Well, we’re not going anywhere awake; and you’ll need to be touching me to go where I go-”

“Uh-”

“And these were really meant for one or two occupants, not four- although they can hold four up, of course, it’d just be a very tight squeeze-”

“How do we double up the beds, then?”

“Ah, there’s clasps- like this-”

And then I’ve done it very quickly and they’re staring at me again.

“I helped put these together from storage, so- what?”

“…”

“Right, well- behind this wall there’s larger mattresses-”

“…”

“Unless you’d rather tie the two smaller ones together…?”

“Larger mattress?”

“Thicker mattress toppers, firmer mattresses, thinner bedding, more pillows in a variety of styles… you did listen when Missus Mab told you all what was in your room and where everything could be found, yes?”
“Um,”

“She’s the quartermaster! Always listen to the quartermaster! Gods preserve me from the stupidity of men-!”

As I go to the dorm closet, pop it open, and pull out a veritable stack of pillows for ammunition, I hear the men behind me squeak and yelp in shock. Then, as I turn and begin pelting them with pillows- to their further yelps- I let loose my tirade about their arrogance and stupidity contributing to their own obvious discomfort; I could smuggle an entire regiment in the bags under their eyes for goodness sake; how dare you assume that the words of a quartermaster, whose entire job is to see to the rooms and clothing of every person on this ship and several other things aren’t important, what is wrong with you- and then I’ve run out of pillows. I’m heaving with emotion, my sleeping cap quite askew, and- oh, huh, the men took cover. I keep breathing loudly, but throw my voice so they can’t hear me walk forwards and pick up four more pillows.

I let my breathing calm, but keep waiting patiently- when they finally peek back out I bean each of them with a nice goosedown.

“You are stupid! Stupid men! You were bad and you should feel bad!”

“...Sorry, Miss Havij,” “Yeah, sorry Miss Havij,” “Sorry, Miss,”

“Won’t happen again, Miss!”

I nod, once, sharply.

“Udoroth, pick up the pillows we’re to sleep with, unless you’d prefer- oh, right, horns, would you rather have a nice headrest? -right, you’ll have to size it for yourself; Zaffire, come pick a good mattress for the bigger bed, and some bedding too; Solitaire, please hold the milk while I help Zaffire with the mattress- thank you, no, don’t drink it yet-”

The bed is prepared quite quickly after that - a very firm mattress, with a conforma-foam topper; the nice, slippery silk sheets- very cool to the touch; a half-thick pillow for me, I don’t like feeling smothered.

The dorm closets don’t just have extra bedding, of course- they’ve got extra toiletries, and various other sundries a person might need and not want to go all the way to Mab to get. I show Solitaire the sleeping caps; and I show Udoroth the headrests. I also pull out one of the quieter white noise makers, because I cannot stand to sleep in a silent room, I’m too used to Neo’s snoring.

I prepare the milk and hand it out, and carefully climb into the bed with the lid on so I don’t spill-
“The draught is quick; I find it best to be in the bed ready to sleep before imbibing, just for safety. Ready?”

“I am, yes- just drink it and lay down?”

“Be sure you’re touching some part of me as well, but yes, that’s all,”

“...right, and the reason for the milk is…?”

“I like milk,”

“Not everything is a plot, Sol,”

“Yeah, yeah-”

I drank the milk and honey draught, and laid down. I remember being wrapped up in two pairs of very large and firm arms, and someone’s legs entangling with mine, and then I was truly asleep.

When next I was aware, I knew these things: Solitaire had enacted a great personal sacrifice to get us all through the gate; all three of my toadstones had given of their essences to keep us alive; we four together became an army which routed the occupying forces which fell dead to our might; and I was deeply uneasy at the thought of using the Other’s mill at all, much less again in the cases of Udoroth and Zaffire- Solitaire had refused to use the mill, more power to him. The strawberry bag was heavy with something that occasionally squirmed; it rested lightly on my back, the being within having been abandoned and cared for- perhaps for the first time in its life, abandonment had lead to care, and kindness.

I was also sure that nothing would ever compare to heaving dead and rotting corpses into the mill-nothing, not even the strange texture of the Aberration’s skin or the expression Solitaire made when he looked back at his locks, black and shining in the dusty path where the Other came to fright us and found itself frighted instead... I came to, again, just in the middle of a tirade about throwing the stack of corpses into the mill; how the greedy fucker had best not spit out my prize just yet…

Solitaire flatly refused to help haul the bodies; he had already given his pride, I could not ask more of him. He stood by the door and watched with a carefully emotionless expression, blank in shoulder and stance as the trail of blood and rot next to him grew thicker and thicker.

Finally, I was finished dragging, my back and shoulders and arms burning with exertion. That’s half the job done; then, Zaffire and Udoroth helped ferry the bodies up to me; and I threw them down into the cruel depths.

All I can do is hope that it works; either it will spit out cold iron, or explode after being asked to create a fatal object within itself. Either would work; and even if the cold iron doesn’t break the mill outright, it will deal it a mortal blow- and besides, cold iron is valuable in itself.

I took the first corpse from Udroth, and heaved it into the intake funnel. I jerked my eyes away before I could see it greedily sucked down, a number of obscenities becoming a litany as I settled into the rhythm of take and throw, again again.

The mill seemed to listen to my furious prayer; it stood silent but for the eerily smooth way it swallowed up the bodies I threw in, sucking them down into nothingness. I couldn’t see down into the intake funnel, and I didn’t want to; instead, I focused on what I knew cold iron to be. The spiraling squares; the iridescent sheen; the coldness, the weight, it’s honor and faith…

Suddenly, I was done, smeared with blood and filth and wheezing for breath. The toadstones burned against my upper left arm. I called up the last of Buttercream’s gift, and snarled at the mill, a deep basso rumble from deep within my chest lending my words a gravitas, a weight- a realness to them that nothing, not even the misty qualities of the Otherside could transcend.

“Cold iron. Now,”

Even as I growled the words I couldn’t help but consider the possibilities of a chunk of cold iron, unworked by mortal hands. It didn’t have to be such, after all; it could be a pendant, a piece of armor, a sword, a hammer- I could see it then, the head perfectly flat on the striking side, the lozenge shape, the handle long and perfectly balanced and wrapped with sharkskin and secured with fine silver pins, the spiralling square dancing up and down the head-

For just a moment, I was caught fully in the teeth of that fantasy, wielding that hammer, using it to build wondrous things- and then I blinked, and my eyes fell to the tack hammer in the loop of my overalls. I already have a hammer, a good one, faithful and true- my mother’s before me, and her’s before her, and back and back- I built my toolbox with that hammer! Mom built my crib with that hammer! No star metal hammer from any other place could ever match that pedigree!

I forced the vision from my mind.

I focused stubbornly on an unadorned ingot- I imagined the solidity of it, how cold and heavy it would be in my hand, how certain the destruction of the mill would be once it was realized. I will not be swayed!

I began to approach the mill, my every movement becoming slow and labored- like walking directly against the current. My jaw clenched; I could hear my teeth squeak against each other with the pressure of maintaining my thought. I slowly lifted a hand and struck forwards, cracking a clenched fist against the cold, pitted flank of the machine.

My eyes fell shut; my mind was filled to bursting with the thought of what I would have from this foul thing. My skin split across my knuckles. My nails dug into the meat of my palm.
Hot blood trickled out across my fingers and down the side of the mill. It sighed, and the pressure on me stuttered.

I could hear, faint and higher than the background noises of the forge and the men breathing- a sort of humming, high and buzzing like a mosquito- no, lower now, discordant. Like something deep inside this monster has gone terribly askew.

A hand pressed against my shoulder- I glanced over, to find Solitaire, eyes rounded with terror and shaking, pressing against me in, in- support, I think. Another came to rest against the small of my back- Zaffire, and then on the other shoulder- Udoroth. All the men were shaking, stiff bodied with fear and determined to support me-

I ground my fist harder against the mill, pressing almost to the point of pain, and then beyond it, knuckling into the cold side of the mill and drawing my lips well back- I closed my eyes. Forced the image of the ingot to greater and greater clarity. I imagined the texture and the full shape, the dimensions, the heft and weight.

It felt almost like I was pushing against something alive, like a cold sluggish throat was beneath my fist and I was slowly squeezing the life from it; like my mind was stretching outwards to encounter- something- but no! No!

In my mind, the ingot dropped into my hands and I almost dropped it from the sheer weight of the thing; pure star metal is equal in density to gold, though it is not gold. Such a little thing, and yet so very heavy; cold as if it had just come in from beyond the stars. I could feel the imperfections of the untempered, unworked metal, the jagged edges poking into my flesh.

The mill shuddered beneath my hand; groaned; squealed like a wounded beast. For a moment my concentration shuddered too; the ingot took on a crimson cast, fabric, blood, white linens going wet and warm and sticky-black with blood and mucus-

I bore down further, tightened my fist and pushed harder still. The sting drove splinters through my mind; I imagined them as silvery and iridescent and spiraling squares, a heavy little ingot of metal from beyond the sky; clenched my hand around the ingot and knew it was as solid and cold and dry as ever. I knew it to be the only real thing, manifesting within the depths of the machine; the king of all metals, cold iron!

Deep within the mill I heard a peculiar knocking noise, and then a grinding squeal. A howl of mechanical agony and the scraping rattle of bearings crumbling and seizing. Something went ping; something else spanged; and several things went pop all at once. I felt the boundaries of the mill, of my mind, flex and shudder alarmingly.

The men wrapped full arms around me, their shaking fear becoming entwined with their resolve, respect for me; faith in my power, young and untested- and ignorance can do what experience cannot.

The mill and I and the men and the bodies were never strictly physical; but now there was no illusion that they ever were. My thoughts bled together with what the mill was doing; the metal under my knuckles acquired jagged edges for a split second, wild animal patterns rippled across the funnel before vanishing, blood trickling from the spout below before turning to dust as it fell-
The mill howled. It screamed. It writhed and thrashed but could not escape the inexorable forwards momentum of it’s own design and my unwavering desire.

And the mill howled. It howled like a wounded beast from an alien place, an Other place; lost from its pack and its life and everything it had once known. I pushed my fist forward and saw that the mill was shivering- open eyed now, I could see right through it, into its dizzying heart.

And there, within, a light.

It was bright; searing, almost, but colored wrongly. I have seen Fernanda’s soul; I have seen the souls of every member of my crew. That is not Fernanda. My eyes cannot be fooled.

I forced myself to stare and push forward, feeling a sort of stretching within myself as I did, a lengthening of my metaphysical presence, fist pushed out and blood dripping into the space around me, suspended as fat red marbles in the middle of a bizarre silvery space.

The light flickered like a strobe; jagged and panicky and shrieking, my ears vibrating and aching from the noise, from the deep sort of ugliness I could feel around, squeezing and scrabbling against my very soul, emanations of terror and malice and evil.

I gritted my teeth so hard I thought they might shatter. I imagined the ingot in my hand, fingers tight around it because it is a large chunk of metal, too large and almost too heavy for my one arm to support it; cold metal cutting into my fingers, the weight- the potential.

I picked my hand up.

The light screamed.

I smashed my fist down again with every fiber of willpower and love and goodness I could muster.

Have you ever missed a step going down a set of stairs and nearly tripped? It was like that, but over my entire body, my whole soul, the full expanse of my mind- the bright and silver and cruel clear shrieking vibrating noise and unrelenting evil pressure all vanished at once, leaving only a dim basement and three men holding me up and gasping for breath.

My right hand, the hand I used to hit- because of course, I’m left handed, that’s the hand I use to hammer- but my right hand is bleeding. The skin on my knuckles is flayed down almost to the bone, and the blood oozing from the split is dark red and shining. My fingers are outstretched, held just at the tip of a large brick of patterned metal. I can feel its imperfections digging into the bruised flesh of my palms; the coldness creeping into my bones.

That might be blood loss, actually-

I blinked from the cold iron in my hand, to a greasy dark stain on the stone, to a vaporous mist rising faintly from where the mill once stood- and to two glass orbs perhaps the size of sheeps eyes. One was covered over with cracks and threads of silver that hurt my eye, burnt black and crumbling. The other, almost lazily golden, shot through with shimmering sparks of light; bound with barbed silver threads, and singing faint but clear.

I know that sound; I’d recognize Fernanda anywhere.

As I bring my hand holding the heavy brick of cold iron closer, the uneasy light in the cracked orb flickers, and shudders away from me; Fern’s soul sings louder. Quick as a snake, my hand darts out and crushes the black orb.

As I pull my hand away, the room is utterly silent but for the dreamy tones of Fern’s soul.

It’s as if the whole of life rushes back from where it was hidden under the snow and ice- a great onrushing of sound and feeling, plants growing and dying; the manse around us falls to ruin, and the basement becomes a low place in the ground, festooned with thick soft sweet smelling grasses and blooming flowers.

Fern’s soul sits on a bare stone- perfectly centered in a place where nothing grows, though a few hardy mushrooms have begun to circle and a brave attempt by some moss is being made to correct that. I carefully wriggle just a little bit, and reach out with my unmarred left hand.

I dip three fingers in my own blood, from where it’s dropped across the starmetal.

And then, as I speak, I tap my bloody fingertips to the golden orb bound with silver thorn-webs.

“Fernanda; you have my protection in this place; there are no conditions for such, as we are friends; go home,”

With each touch, Fern’s soul glows brighter and brighter, the song of it growing louder and more exuberant- and then, finally, it vanishes from the prison, glass and web no match for the sheer unctuous ooze of her. My blood is iron, and cold iron, and salt, and water- and one is enough to wound mortally a thing of the Otherside. All four together can break even the strongest of enchantments, the most deadly of traps; bound together in love, they can even break a curse of the blood.

And then I crush the trap under my brick of starmetal- in the very far distance, I heard the sound of a scream of thwarted malice- and then it was all very, very bright.

When I woke, it was because of several things together. My sister, calling for me in increasingly panicked tones; a deep ache in my right hand; a strange loosening feeling in my hips, along with an unfamiliar sticky wetness- but most of all, Solitaire’s cowlicky hair jamming itself up my nose, I’m going to- sneeze-

“ACHU! CHU CHU CHU!”
Gods and Goddesses, but I hate sneezing. Ugh- and what the hell is on my thighs? I- Uh. Hm. I see.

Well, it’s a good thing I’m sitting up already- yes, hello- the strawberry bag is full and the one within is sleeping- needs a bath, though, we both do—

“Good, um, morning? Is it morning?”

“It is, Miss Havij; and how- you’re bleeding-”

“Well, yes, I’m a woman now-”

“-my h-hair-”

“-ugh what- blood-?”

“Morning, all! Lovely slee- is that blood?”

“Right, bathroom time- yes, up, no use sitting around, up up up-”

“Uh- wasn’t that bag empty last night?”

“You do realize if you get dunked on in a dream, you get dunked on for real, right? I mean, how else are you going to explain Solitaire’s hair-”

“My haaaaaaaair-”

And with some prayers to the minor Gods of Annoyance, Gogginess, Pester, and Shouting- I’ve chivvied the four men into the head with clean togs and enough blistering swear words to make my sister roar with laughter.

I give each of them their own basket for toiletries, and then fill those baskets with clearly labelled this and that- shampoo, conditioner, soap, washing rags with the scrubby side and the softer side, lotion, combs and brushes and for the White Snakes, tubs of beeswax- although-

“So do you want help with your hair? Because I’m very sure help can be provided...”

“Um. Actually- if you can get us help, that’d be fantastic,”

“Right- make sure it’s well washed and lightly conditioned-”

“-my haaaair-”

“Chin up, Solitaire, it will grow back; Udoroth, please keep an eye on him, he’s taking it very hard,”

“Right, Miss Havij; ah, and get that hand on ice before it swells up!”

“Of course!”
After a thorough shower, hair scrub, condition, and lotion- and a warm and gentle bath for Bubby, a much better name all around, I’ll use it as short for Soap Bubbles. It makes a cute little bubbling sound when I give it cuddles and stroking affection; and it likes to play with the bubbles on the soap bar, so. A name.

Lotion, oil, check the wounds and put in some ointment, new bandages; the bag’s dry now, wipe off the inside and back in where it’s safe. Abby’s probably hungry- I’ve no idea what it eats, but I’m going to find out today at breakfast. It was looking oddly at my ruined boxers- like it wanted the blood and bits. There’s a tally for the ‘not an Other’ column; Others consider period blood to be deadly poison.

As for me- pads. Hm. Sanitary supplies are- here-

“Hi..?”
“What are those for?”
“So, you know how a woman’s body throws the bedding out when there’s no baby?”
“Yeah...”
“Yeah, that’s the blood,”
“Ah. So- those catch it?”

“Mm- it’s a very powerful magical reagent, and can be used to put nasty curses on people. Keeping it all contained in these pads- which Missus Mab neutralizes and cleans herself- is best. Also, I’m too young for a cup, so- pads,”

“They’re kinda pretty,”

“Yeah, they come in all kinds of styles- Missus Mab makes them in all sizes for all the women here, as well as these kinds I know my sister likes- ah, but they’re of no real use to men, sorry,”

“Nah, it’s fine- oh, Solitaire, your hair looks much better-”

“It’s still short, Udo, and- huh, fancy rags?”

“They’re reusable and hygenic,”

“Fair enough- ah, what do we do with-”

“Laundry chute- there, that handle-”

“Gotcha,”

“Breakfast time, I think,”

All the men perk up at my declaration. I lead them all to breakfast, and am only mildly annoyed by their banter; and apparently I’m one of them now? Doesn’t matter- I’ve got some idea of what I’m going to do with a small piece of this starmetal, but the rest... I dunno.
I’ll think of something.

Dearest Journal;

Bubby likes to eat, in no particular order: cheese, milk, honey, rice, oatmeal, blood sausage, creamed spinach, oysters in oil, olives, mold, grease, burnt things, salty water, sunlight, dirt, eggshells, blood (dried, fresh, and congealed), pumpkin seeds, cat food, dog food, rabbit food, possum food, dove shit, nails, washers, pencil shavings, lint, dust, poppy seeds, crumbs, onion skin, the nasty water at the bottom of the trash can, soap, rags, furniture polish, and outside dirt. Abby really loves outside dirt, and can be entertained for hours with a dirty bootscraper.

I think he’s a Trash Goblin; that’s what his diet is starting to make me believe, anyway. On the one hand, that’s good- I know how to discipline and nurture him, and he actually has a gender and a reproductive cycle- he’s definitely a baby, by the way.

On the other hand, he’ll eat anything. Teaching him to not eat certain things is going to be a challenge- but it’s not impossible. I’ll start with lemon juice and warm soapy water, and see how he responds- the more irascible and stubborn he is, the higher the vibration level I’ll have to go. Hopefully, it won’t come to Rose Oil and hot soapy water, but one never knows...

Chopper figured out vaccinations during the night; and he administered them with Nurse Genny’s help this morning. Everyone who could get one got one- so, now, he’s hard at work ensuring that the people in the Sanitary recover.

Taffy finished the improved fever reducing medication, and began administering it this morning with my help; although the Mice’s fevers didn’t rise to absurd peaks last night, giving them a little help is only for the best.

Nurse Bones discovered that Fern had two maladies, not just one- her soul was missing, and she had fungal meningitis, which would account for her earlier symptoms. However, if I’m understanding Fern’s current stats correctly, her soul just returned to her.

I’ve absolutely no idea how; I haven’t had a chance to scour the Otherside for it.

“Jun- your shift?”

“Yes, Missus Mab- Stats?”

“Thirty nine degrees steady; seventy five bpm, much closer to where we want it, and it was not an abrupt shift; fifteen breaths per minute, much better; one fifteen over seventy five; glucose levels steady at eighty mg/dl.”

“Urine output?”

“Fifteen thousand milliliters, increased at the same time as her heartbeat; I adjusted her intakes wider to account for her increased activity-”
“-mmmnnngh-”
“-ah, I need to reapply her vaseline, the cannula is very drying-” “-mmmmaaab?”

“Fern? Fern! Fernanda, you’re in the Sanitary Ward; you’ve been unconscious for-”
“-the men, the men I found, are they okay?”

“Yes, they’re fine- you have fungal meningitis, Chopper’s already eradicated it from your body but you still have to recover from your fever-”

“-don’t be too hard on Havij, I would have been lost without her. Also, go make her ice her hand, she’s going to ignore it and it’ll just make things worse-”

“-Fern-”

“Tell my sisters I’m going to be okay, because I am; and leave Nurse Jun to care for me! Go have breakfast and take a nap, you look dead on your feet! Shoo, shoo!”

I throw up my hands, hand Fern’s chart to Nurse Jun, and walk away- after double checking on the mice, who are all recovering fairly well, thanks to Taffy’s fever reducing medicine, yes, Fern, I’m going, for pity’s sake-

I shower, hand a short list off to Beatrix, and dress for the day. A color blocked striped sweater dress - the last one before the season change, and not a moment too soon- my charm bracelet, charnellemonts need a polish soon, hair in plaits and pinned up out of the way, smoky tights, kung fu shoes, and a touch of royal blue on my lips. Lovely.

I stop in the Emergency just off the Galley before breakfast, and get together the things I’ll need for the RICE- rest, ice, compression, elevation- a compression bandage, and a sling. Ice can be gotten in the Galley, and she’ll be resting her hand anyway, Havij is left handed-

And there she is now. Her hair’s not in her normal hightails- she must be in severe pain, though her fascination with that lump of unworked starmetal is perhaps a reasonable distraction. I was the same with moonsilk, as I recall…

Right, ice.

“Morning, Sanji-”

“Morning, Mab- mwah-”

“Mmm- I need a kitchen towel in the bottom of one of those buffet pans, with ice and water; Havij has bruised her hand rather badly, and I want to reduce the damage before we have to get Sawbones involved-”
“Say no more- OZ!”

In a twinkling, a pan of ice water with a thick towel on the bottom has been delivered to Havij’s right side. I calmly step back over to her, ruck up her sleeve, gently take her right hand in my own, and put it- carefully- into the ice water.

Brr. Cold.

“-thank you, Missus Mab,”

“Quite alright; and I am here to tell you that after breakfast, I shall be wrapping that hand and putting it in a sling, to remind you to leave it be and rest. Ah, shall I also do your hair?”

“Um- well… actually, would you? I was going to ask Neo, but she’s never been good with hair, and Miss Tellicherry hates touching other people’s hair, gives her the willies-”

“Right; ah, I see. Fern left instructions?”

“Yes she did; oh, Missus, can you arrange help for the White Snake’s hair? And Solitaire needs a trim, or maybe some shaping; and I think Uddoroth needs a straight razor, he’s just confused by the safety razors-”

“Of course; you’ll be helping them with the reintegration?”

“While Fern’s banged up in the San, I rather have to, don’t you think?”

“Hmhmhm. Nice outfit- do come by this afternoon, I’ll give you a care package,”

“…”

“For the monthly visit dear?”

“Oh! Thank you, Missus!”

“Mm. You lot, help her with her breakfast, alright?”

“Yes Missus, no problem,”

Bodysuit of petal pink, cropped blue jacket with wide bell sleeves and a front zipper, short overalls with black bats in asymmetric print with a black choker, ombre tights of blue to lilac, and work boots with lace accents.

Havij is cute- and now, wearing clothing that fits her more closely, I can see she’s just short, not actually all that young. She’s maybe fifteen or sixteen, not twelve like I was thinking before- a late bloomer, I’d say.

And that’s a Trash Goblin in her strawberry backpack- a very young one, maybe a day old. I’m not going to ask where it came from- there are some things it’s better to not know. Considering how very gentle Havij is with the tiny thing, I’m confident it’s got a proper caregiver.
As for how to style her hair… taking into account all the time drift… buns have always been a particularly practical style, with men usually having only the one, and women having as many as can be fit on their head. Space buns, then.

Mm, pancakes!

---

I’ve been working out the flight schedule for the crew for days, now.

I can’t just use the one I made back at the Office, it has several severe conflicts with everyone else’s schedules. Nor can I simply allow my Flight to make their own training regimes- some of them, like Mack and Bang, will end up undertraining because they’ll be distracted by just being in a new place, exploring new interests, and making new friends. Some, like Precious and Daily, my right and left wings, will end up overtraining because they won’t consider certain aspects of their new employ- they both consider themselves very good fliers, and they are, but Precious is an excellent gardner, and Daily loves keeping track of things like fashion trends and personal styles. If I leave them to themselves, they’ll ignore their other talents and interests in favor of training things they think aren’t good enough. Some of Daily’s best memories, I have no doubt, involve developing the sartorial selections of my Lead staffers… and of course, some of my Flight just don’t know how to train at all, like Aoife, Phillip, and the Feverbane Twins.

We hadn’t actually been deployed yet, you see- and though I had gained some notoriety as ‘Tiffany of the Ashen Plain’, I had only just formalized the Left and Right positions with Precious and Daily. I haven’t really had a chance to iron out everyone’s bad habits, or even gel my Flight into a cohesive unit. That might be a blessing in disguise, though- with so many more personalities, there’s more opportunities for socialization and skill transferral.

It honestly all comes down to condition and psychology. Muscle doesn’t keep without active training; and broomstick flight requires serious muscle. Some of my Flight can train together just fine; and some of them can’t even practice maneuvers together without supervision.

Me, Daily, and Precious can all train alone or together (disregarding my earlier points, this is pure scheduling), or be the trainer, of anyone in the Flight. Daily has first choice in training Lucille, as they are a Pair; Mack and Bang can’t train with any of the unwinged because they have a multitude of bad habits that don’t harm them, but will harm anyone they try to teach.

Mono, Zelda, Jun, and Sawbones are actually some of our toughest flighters; if they weren’t, they wouldn’t be able to do their jobs as effectively. They’re so strong, in fact, they really only get the most out of teaching, training against myself and my wings, or with each other.

Ailbe and BKB have completely different fighting styles; Ailbe actually has arranged her own training with Adelaide, while BKB is training with Bryony. As for flight, neither of them will ever move much past the pleasure stage- they can do tricks, they can do all the things I’d expect from the average flyer, and that’s about it. To be fair, they don’t need to do more than that- and neither has expressed a desire to do more than that.

Bradford, Bobert, and Maurice are trouble when they’re all three together- just two of them is alright, but some foul alchemy of their personalities together means that they cannot train together effectively. Too much bickering, not enough work.

Pascal is still severely depressed- his grief is no longer debilitating, but it’s still quite present.

Coco found a teacher for her real passion, fashion; and possibly a teacher for her Martial Art, Needlepoint. I’ll let Mab know about her martial art, that seems like good synergy to me…

Sophie, thank the Gods, has settled in quite cleanly. She’s working with Mark on the various Farm chores, and seems quite happy. I wish I could say the same for Lynn; Winter always hits her hardest, and the fluctuation of light Up Top is not helping her at all.

Ori’s going to go stir crazy soon, I can feel it- there’s only so much I can do about it, unfortunately. She’s also starting to eye one of the Oldmen, Mukhtar I think; so long as she keeps her energy confined to sex and not pranks, I’ll say nothing about it.

The Feverbanes have shown a remarkable talent and interest in the Library- and just being around more than each other every day has started to sharpen their differences and pull them out of each other, which is a blessing.

Parsley’s depression is receding more every day- soon, he might not have to fake his exuberance, which will be a relief for Mila. Mila, of course, has to be turfed out of the Library every mealtime- she’s never had access to so many magical books and resources, and it’s a little like… she hasn’t internalized that they aren’t going anywhere.

Gally has started to tend the garden- I saw her taking soil samples this morning. Good; I’m very glad to see her start extending personal boundaries and taking on responsibility.

Phillip is going to break Sancho’s heart, and there’s not a damn thing I can do about it other than give him a pamphlet on the code of conduct for Fools, which I know he won’t read. Sancho cannot make permanent romantic bonds without breaking his Oath to Jocularity; and no matter if Phillip does or doesn’t have the necessary plumbing for baby production, Sancho is forbidden from reproducing intentionally. Sancho cannot be what I know Phillip wants; and from what I can see, Sancho’s never felt the way he feels about Phillip before. They don’t know; and even if I tell them, they won’t listen. What the hell can I do?

I suppose I’m really most worried about Aoife and Annie; Aoife because she still hasn’t really shown us in a meaningful way who she is or what she wants. Annie because she’s so socially anxious she switched schedules with Aoife, in an effort to get away from people.

Mm, these are good pancakes.

I must say, however, that the addition of an entire Garage specifically for the use of us with brooms is a marvelous thing- I had thought that we’d have to build our brooms en plein air, but no, we have a dedicated workspace.

Flight brooms aren’t as simple as a smooth stick with a water bottle and a bundle of curated straw. To fly one, that might be all you need to know; to break it’s limits, maybe a little more. Building one is much more intense. You need to know herbalism- not just for your homeland, but all across the World. Every bespoke broom maker- hell, even the off the rack broom makers- have what’s called an illustrated color herbal. There are regional, national, and international conventions— which I’ve been preparing myself for months, now— where generations of broom makers come together to share hand-made copies of their color herbals.

Oh-

“Hi?”

“What’s that?”

“Uh- oh, right, I forgot you’re a nurse- this is an herbal meant for broom makers,”

“What’s an herbal?”

“It’s a book that’s basically an encyclopedia of herbs; mine is illustrated, which I did myself—”

“...Can I buy one?”

“No, you have to make it yourself; that’s part of the Method. -I was going to go to the Dressrosa Herbalism Convention- you could come with me if you’d like...?”

“...It might turn into an ‘all the medicals’ kind of trip. Are you sure?”

“Yeah! Herbcon Dressy is always a hoot- the more the merrier!”

Steps to make a broom: purpose of broom, choosing materials, infusion of decoction of magic for basic functions (handle and bristles), introduction of elixirs for intermediate functions (handle, bristles, bottle), salves for complex functions (handle, bottle, seat), varnish of sirip and tincture and wax (all parts), extraction of extraneous magic (all parts), final check and rebalance (all parts), final sealant (all parts); dry fit, wet fit, curing, first flight test, tweaks; finishing.

Sugar Rush- Genevieve- she maybe knows how to do half of that, and all the best racers make their own brooms. It’s astounding to me that she got as good as she did on, so far as I can tell, her mother’s broom.

I never thought I’d ever actually meet Sugar Rush- frankly, I thought the rumors of a kid in a frilly dress thrashing the Alley Cat Circuit were just rumors. Genevieve “Sugar Rush” Vinsmoke is an unholy terror on the streets; give her a broom and a time to beat, and she’ll do it just for the satisfaction of it. I also never thought she’d have such an interest in making her own broom- the one thing everyone agreed on was that Sugar Rush flys a rackracer- a broom that came off the rack some twenty-on years back and was almost purpose built for street racing.

Genevieve also has OPINIONS about the various flyers in my Flight- and Mab, which doesn’t surprise me, Missus Mab is one of the most technically proficient and beautiful flighters I’ve ever seen. In the sunlight Up Top, Missus Mab’s brown battle gear turns orange and yellow, with hints of black and violent red- and every time she goes up, Solitaire gets a little twitchier and more... longing? Interested?

Fuck it, I need a list- Mab, Usopp, Taffy, Gurry, Bryony, Mark, Deborah, Fernanda, Genevieve, Beatrix, Hildy, Quilaby, Tiffany, Precious, Daily, Lucille, Mack, Bang, Mono, Zelda, Jun, Sawbones, Ailbe, BKB, Bradford, Bobert, Maurice, Pascal, Coco, Sophie, Lynn, Ori, Feverbane Twins, Parsley, Mila, Gally, Philip, Aoife, Annie, Solitaire. These are all the names of all the people I know for certain can fly, with varying levels of skill.

Sorting out this list… Mab, Usopp, Taffy, Genevieve, Hildy, Daily, Precious, and myself are the best flyers on the crew. Not all of us can teach, however- Mab can, I can, but I know Daily can’t, and while Precious technically can she’s a very specific kind of teacher which not everyone responds well to. Hildy and Usopp really ride more than fly- and while they can teach their skills… well, Hildy’s just about the size of my thumb, and Hekate-sama has OPINIONS about who is allowed to take lead on her. Taffy is special- I only knew about Fairies, as far as Fae go, but apparently there are four different… nations? I think? And each nation has their own specific way of flying. Taffy has legitimate wings- like, bird wings. So far as I know, she’s the only person on the crew who does- and while she can explain an absurd number of technical details, she can’t actually fly with a broom. She has promised to teach anyone who wants to learn how to fly our Sailwavers (that’s what they’re called formally, apparently), which I know I’m interested in...

The good flyers- not the best, but usually good enough- are Gurry, Lucille, Mack, Bang, Mono, Zelda, Jun, Sawbones, and Ori. Gurry doesn’t have wings, but apparently he got a cloak made special so he could? Which. Okay, let’s get real- it’s basically Goals to have a boyfriend who would do that. Also also, he’s sorta… scared shitless of heights? So. Goals. Lucille is the only person I know of who has ever reacted positively to Daily’s teaching style, so I’ve left it to her. Mack, Bang, and Mono all actually went through Flight Camp together, so they all have the same habits- thankfully, they’re good habits. Zelda was a courier; her flight speed is YES, and her overall skills are very undorned, free of the superfluous. Jun was training to be an EMT- his flight skills are absurd, but he forgets that he doesn’t have the lights or siren, so he gets himself in a little trouble sometimes. Sawbones is used to transporting research materials, which are often delicate; she’s a very graceful, smooth flyer, no hard stops or quick twists. Not someone you’d expect to be good at flighting, frankly- and yet, I’ve never, ever been able to tag her. Ori is best at distance flight- and her salves for saddle sores are second to none.

The Average flyers are Bryony, Deborah, Fernanda, Beatrix, Quilaby, Bradford, Bober, Maurice, Pascal, Coco, Sophie, and Lynn. Bryony is a Syrene, another of the nations of the Fae; and where Taffy and Mab have physical wings, Bryony and Mark (I’ll get to him) have metaphysical, or magic, wings. Bryony’s wings are like Gurry’s, except Bryony has no motivation to get that astonishingly athletic with her wings. Deborah worked delivery for a restaurant- she’s fast, careful on her turns, and absurdly good at smooth stops. That’s about all she can do, though. Fernanda cheats outrageously with her Seer powers. Beatrix used her flying as another tool for hunting down thaumaturgic reagents, so basically she flies like an owl or a bird of prey. Quilaby is different- according to Eleanor, he can actually blow massive mucus bubbles with a mixture of lighter-than-air gases and use them to float around. Actual steering is something he’s still working on- she has high hopes for some sort of fan-fin system, but figuring out the right materials to use has been tricky. Bradford, Bober, and Maurice were in the same Flight Camp, a different batch than Mack, Bang, and Mono- and where Mack and them had a quality teacher, Bradford and them did not. Thus, the Chav Trio have all the same shit habits, and just reinforce each other in them. Pascal is so quiet and bland, I hardly have anything to say about him- that goes double for his flying. Coco’s previous job involved cross-city and cross-country flights; she’s best at those, not the more acrobatic maneuvers required by an Active Post Flyer. Sophie worked as a veterinarian for the RMSPCA- Ryugu Mergyo Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals- and she’s genuinely skilled. Lynn is the worst of the Average flyers, and it’s only her rigid adherence to proper forms and habits- keeping your broom in good repair, getting it serviced every ten-thousand leagues, always checking your water level before each flight, and so on- that keeps her out of the Mehs.

The Mehs are Mark, Ailbe, BKB, Feverbane Twins, Parsley, and Gally. They use their flight in less interesting ways, and can’t get serious air all that often. Mark is a Djinn, the fourth nation of the Fae, and that means he can’t actually fly unaided in some way—he’s better at running so fast he looks like he’s flying, or swimming in the same way. He can, however, jump and just sort of… hang. Weirdest thing I’ve ever seen in my life, I’ll tell ya… Ailbe and BKB are heavy, and slow, too. They don’t like going fast, and they’ve never had to, so I suppose it doesn’t matter. The Feverbanes actually use their gills to fly in air; it’s this really cute little fluttering around their heads, and then they hover off the ground for short amounts of time. Parsley used to be one of the best fliers in my group, but after a severe crash he got a nasty series of injuries and a paralyzing fear of the kind of complicated maneuvers that caused the crash. This lead to his depression, which is only just starting to get better due to Mila; I actually brought Mila in specifically for Parsley—she’s very good at rehabilitation and support, which is what he needed, even if he didn’t want it. Gally can’t keep her concentration levels up properly if she’s too far away from a solid flat plane, and that’s a critical skill if you’re trying to fly. She’d be good at steeplechase though, so it’s not all bad.

Mila, Philip, Aoife, and Annie have next to no flight skills at all, making them Poor flyers. Mila…it’s tricky. I got her from the job board down at the Employment Office, and she’s never failed in what I’ve needed her to do—but I’m not sure if she can move past her initial training to learn all the tricks and things that make a Postal Flighter really sing in the air. Philip and Annie have minimal air time, though they’ve passed their book-based testing; they know how to theoretically care for a broom, can name all it’s parts and so on… and Aoife hasn’t. Aoife doesn’t know how to care for a broom, and she certainly doesn’t know how to fly—but I think that’s because she’s one of those people who never quite adapt to a broom. Which means, of course, she probably needs wheels, not a broom at all…

As for Solitaire… him I can’t get a read on at all. I know he has wings—or at the least, the same kind of wingslits, I know what a Fairy’s back looks like when they’ve retracted their wings. He’s got the same overall build as Missus Mab—huge chest, long limbs, big eyes, big nose, wide mouth, the whole thing. He has an arrangement of four wingslits, with the same long furrow of fuzzy black hair down his spine. His is thicker, and rather than the green-iridescent sheen of Mab’s spine fuzz, his shimmers an absurdly bright and almost obnoxious shade of blue.

Hnn-

“Morning, Bryony!”

“Mmrph. Morning,”

“Headed for bed?”

“After eating, yeah,”

“Nice,”

Bryony’s sleep schedule is a roulette wheel of inconvenience; she’s awake when we’re asleep, and she’s groggiest when we’re all waking up. She’s also my bunkmate—I have the bunk just over her, actually.

There are five major rules to being a good roommate, and it took me several rounds of housing situations to internalize them.

Firstly, be humble. However special you felt back home, in group housing you’re an equal player. Go in with an attitude of ‘same same’; your peers will get turned off immediately if you come in like you’re so much better than them. I have no goddamn idea about any of the intrapersonal details about the senior members of the crew- but Bryony wrote me out a cheat sheet, so long as I return the favor for the daylight hours.

Secondly, generosity is not just a virtue for temple. If one of your roommates needs something- your help, a chore switch, advice, whatever- do it. Share and give of yourself; and be assured there will be a time when you need them. Bryony kicks off the bedcovers in her sleep, and when she’s uncovered for too long she has terrible nightmares; it’s easy for me to take a quick detour back and cover her up again, and also I’m always forgetting some damn thing on the vanity, like a hair pin or a periodical I was reading before bed.

Thirdly, participate in group activities. Bryony has something she calls Late Night Jams; I’ve gone once, and holy hell her voice is spectacular. Brook, Sancho, Cece before she got sick, Arlinda Rader Haai, Oz, Neo, Mack, and Bang all together make up one of the most interesting and diverse music making and appreciating groups I’ve ever hung out with. Just the immense energy they bring each other- Lindy, because Arlinda Rader Haai is way too much to say each time and she seemed really… excited? To have a nickname? Anyway- Brook loves what are known now as the Standards- back in his day, when he still had flesh, the standards were just popular songs. He’s also a massive resource for music I didn’t even realize existed- and he can play songs that have been lost to time. Sancho’s a musical genius- he’s got these cards with musical tones on them, and he shuffles them, and then he just… writes a song. Or a symphony. Or a tango, or an opera, or- just, genius. Cece helps Sancho refine his work- and she’s no slouch about writing either. They play a game with the note cards, where they lay them out in a random row and make wildly different songs, then play them at the same time to see what sticks. It’s the craziest shit I’ve ever heard, seen, lived through… Lindy loves opera; Oz loves alternative rock; Mack loves Grateful Dead, which is a bit… and Bang loves everything that’s happening right now, he loves… basically all music everywhere? All the time?

Study groups are your friends. As we settle into roles and spaces on the ship, it becomes clearer and clearer that each and every one of us has a unique skill that we excel at above all others. Luffy is absurdly good at understanding motivations; Zoro knows how to be a swordsman, and all that means; Usopp can shoot and ride and hunt and gather; Nami knows the weather and maps; Sanji can cook and kick and has impeccable manners; Mab can sew and use a spear and fly and knows how to do all the things that make polite society deeply uncomfortable; Chopper knows medicine; Robin knows books and research and how best to rob a grave or kill a man quietly; Mark knows guns and animal handling- how to train them, how to feed them, how to keep them happy- and how to be self confident; Taffy knows stealth, and very subtle humor, and how to use a sword (which is not the same as being a swordsman or woman); Bryony knows restraint and communication and singing; Franky knows how to build and how to move past an addiction safely and how to find a limit without breaking; Brook knows music and moving past trauma and faith; Gurry knows the quality of light and mercy and forgiveness, strength in adversity.

All the Suntides have their own skills- Deborah knows how to be creative; Eleanor knows persistence; Fernanda knows discretion; Genevieve knows resilience; Adelaide knows defiance; Beatrix knows ferocity; Cecelia knows compassion; Sancho knows honor.

The Mice have skills too- Darla is gregarious; Maya is discerning; Hildy is meticulous; Jellybean is definite; Quilaby is strength; Lindy is choice.

Mice Coffyn is Generosity and Honesty; BBC is potential, innocence and Joy; Mendy May is Kindness and Loyalty; Oz is Friendship and Hope.

Sohei is responsibility; Tellicherry is faith and fortitude; Neo is care; Havij is determination…

But for me and my Flight, the best I can do is less metaphoric skills. I can teach anyone who wants to know how to be organized, how to build a broom, how to keep wildly conflicting personalities in check and on point.

Precious knows how to take his time; he enjoys his life, and the little wonders in it- the smell of rain, fresh fallen snow crunching underfoot, the taste of the first ripe apple of fall, light through the trees, the sound of windchimes in summer… the warmth of a cat’s purr under your hand… the way it feels to smile after crying.

Daily loves fashion- she loves color, and being pretty, and making other people feel pretty.

Lucille, she loves finding new fashions in old places- lace patterns made large, colors revived, buttons becoming the focal point and not the detail.

Mack likes to organize; Bang likes to curate; Mono likes solitude; Zelda likes noise.

Jun likes gardening; Sawbones likes… ugh, leeches.

Ailbe and BKB like to train- dancing, karate, spicy foods… they love to compete, I think, more than train.

Bradford has determination; Bobert has no shame about who he is; Maurice is much stronger than he looks (and his fur is so soft ); Pascal is absurdly gentle for a man with such potent resting bitchface; Coco loves making something out of nothing- she loves to repurpose things that others would throw away, she loves… she loves to recycle, reuse.

Sophie loves rabbits- keeping them, cooking them, making things out of their pelts…

Lynn actually loves to dance- she hardly ever has a place she can dance safely, but it’s one of her favorite things.

Ori is gutsy; the Feverbanes are organized; Parsley (the more he recovers) is becoming more genuinely exuberant by the day; Mila is protective. Gally is calm; Philip is gentle; Aoife is loving; Annie is trusting.

I haven’t seen enough of the Old Men to make more than surface distinctions- Solitaire is fairly vain, taking a great deal of care in his appearance; and he hasn’t entirely come back from whatever War he fought in. Udoroth is triggered by condescension and cruelty- and the more time he spends around people, the better he becomes. Mukhtar is come back from the War, only to find his son nearly full grown and him at loose ends. And Zaffire? Zaffire, rather desperately, wants to be something, anything, other than what he is.

My point is, each person on this ship has something they can teach you, if you take the time to learn.
Oh, yes- and fifth. Do your damn chores, and do them with your assigned group. It doesn’t matter if you made the mess, or if you’re used to a different schedule- coordinate and collaborate.

I know it seems like I did a lot of work- and truthfully, I did. I just didn’t do it all at once until the very end, when I didn’t exactly have a choice; I’ve been gathering the materials for years, now. Which reminds me-

“Do you think it’s a good idea to have everyone keep their toiletries and bathroom things in a box in their dorm, or is that too much?”

“...Bathroom? Y’mean the Head, Missus Mab?”

“...Sanji...”

“...”

“Sanji, have you been letting me call the ship’s head a bathroom this whole time? ”

“...I thought it was cute...?”

“UUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUGH- ”

“pFFFFFFFFT.”

“YOU’RE THE WOooooOOOOOOOOoooooooOoOODosophist.”

“FFFFFFFFFFFFFT-AHAHAHAHAHAHA-”

As I pout and scowl, Sanji bubbles with laughter. It takes a moment to shrug off the embarrassment, but when I do I find I’m giggling with him. That is pretty funny- and I’m also kind of relieved that the things I’ve not remembered are still so small.

Havij’s done with her breakfast- best do her hair before I forget.

“Havij- do you want an updo or a downdo?”

“Up, please.”

“Okay- mm, and when’s a good time to corner your sister into a trim?”

“Lunch, I’d say- she always takes an hour for it, but only needs fifteen minutes to actually eat-”

“Nice. Okay, tell me if I pull too hard-”
Space buns are actually fairly simple, you just need discreet hairpins and possibly some same-color hairties. I have both.

Comb it all out fine and snag free; part down the middle; hightails; spin the tail end around the base, close to the scalp, until there’s a bun. Pins to secure- lots of pins, her hair is feathery. Repeat on other side. Comb her bangs and baby hairs, and wrap her hand which is less bruised but still quite sore-yes, you need the sling, hush.

“All done- hm, that’s what I’ll do today. Bryony, before you go I need a shipwide broadcast please-”

“Roger, Ro-aaaaguh- R-roger,”

“If I could have everyone’s attention, please; today and tomorrow, I will be giving haircuts, piercings, and tattoos. If you want one of those, or even all of those, please come to the Galley, Grass Deck, or Studio. First Come, First Serve; Absolutely No Complaints, please- okay, Bry, that’s it-”

“Gotcha,”

I blink and then- one, two, twist, four, duCK AND TURN, five, step step halfstep pull - seven. Got him.

I press Solitaire’s face into the fine wood grain of the table, keeping my fairly nasty submission hold tight and cruel.

“Sanji, do you want yours now or at Tea time?”

“Now’s fine, Mab,”

I step back from Solitaire, and reach behind myself and pull out a clean roll of hair cutting tools- scissors, combs, and so on- while keeping a firm, unyielding hold on Solitaire, to the shock and yelps of… pretty much everyone who hasn’t seen me do this before, like, thirty eight people, woof. No, thirty seven, Solitaire’s closed his eyes and he’s growling- no you don’t-

“Now, you four; I’ve noticed that your old clothes aren’t in good repair, or even particularly clean. I can fix that for you, but not without knowing what kind of patches you want to be identified with- here, I’ve brought a selection I think will suit-”

I lay out a tray full of choices as Solitaire hooks an ankle around mine and drags us both to the floor; I roll, twist like a snake and dig my fingers into the short spikes of his hair, twist and slam him into the floor-
I calmly sit and wait for the three Old Men at the table to look away from the scrap on the floor. I actually clear my throat a little, to speed things up.

Udoroth recovers first, and looks over the selection before picking out a small black bowknot, good choice; Mukhtar picks a white sparrow on orange ground; and Zaffire picks chubby bears. I quietly hmm, as Solitaire starts making a sort of chittering noise which means he’s getting frustrated, I can feel it- ah, this one, he’d like this one. A black diamond; perfect, for the Black King.

“Now, I know each of you is having an issue getting into the rhythm of semi-ordinary life, so I’ve decided to give each of you a posting on the chore board. I do expect your chores to be completed by the end of each day, and I sincerely hope-”

“What do we get for doing our chores?”

“I’m glad you asked, Udoroth. Complete your chores faithfully, and you’ll not only get an excellent sticker of your choice-”

And I fan out the stickers, making sure to haul Solitaire up long enough he gets a look too before suplexing him backwards- the men who are sitting are also quietly perking up, because my stickers are fucking choice -

“-you’ll also get to read my fuckhuge collection of pornography to see which ones are reasonably accurate, fun, and relatively stirring; and which ones I need to let go of, or possibly burn,”

“SOLD!” shout all four men- well, Solitaire sort of groans it, because I tagged his crotch and I’m not letting him out of this Shrimp Hold until he taps-

Udoroth is beaming; Mukhtar and Zaffire glance at each other and grin. OW FUCK- SOLITAIRE YOU LITTLE SHITWAFFLE-

“So. Udoroth- your chores today are over on the chore board, but to start, why don’t you go ahead and ask Deborah how best to play with Goblynn and the kittens?”

“Uh- Sure!”

“Mukhtar, Zaffire; you’ll be working in the Library today- Robin’s in charge,”

“Gotcha,”

“I’ll handle Solitaire- which reminds me. Beatrix!”

“Boss?”

“You’re sparring with me and Solitaire today! Pay attention to how he fights; he’s much better with broadswords than I am-”
“Yes Boss!”

“Right, off you trot- no, don’t worry-”

I smile at the three men as I lock my knees around a lunging Solitaire’s neck, twisting in mid air and slamming him into the floor again.

“Me an’ him are just bonding, is all; it’s a Portgas-Morgan thing.”

I dunno why, but people here always do a double take when they see me and the Cook, Sanji, near each other. We don’t dress nearly the same- he’s always in fine linen or wool or silk trews and matching waistcoat and short overcoat, a colorful button up shirt and a fancy silk ribbon ‘round his throat, one of those smoke-paper rolls lit and glowing from between his lips and his blond hair is surely longer and silkier than mine has ever been…

I’m wearing a black linen tunic in the Orcish fashion, of finer and more beautiful make than any I’ve worn before- more fit for a king than me, but that seems to be common in this time- as does it’s length, being well above my knees, above my crotch, even. The tunic is soft to the touch, and drapes elegantly, and the red embroidery is so vibrant I would almost swear it to be flames caught in fabric, not simple linen threads at all. My trews are supple red leather, butter smooth and finely stitched; my socks are the finest wool, not even slightly itchy; and my boots are still my boots, but the Miss called Coco, I think, has been eyeing them and my feet quite aggressively.

My hair is much longer- I had no idea so much length had gotten tangled in my sanitary sootgrease, and washing it out- at Solitaire’s urging, the man is a vanity-fiend- has left me with shoulder-length hanks of soft, flaxen waves. That stuff- conditioner?- in tandem with the soap, shampoo, works wonders- and the combs and brushes! Truly, this is an age of wealth and miracles.

“Miss Deborah? May I have a moment of your time?”

“Meurs bâtard, meurs- ah, sure? One moment, let me just- DÉBUTEZ LA SALOPE PAN- ”

I can feel my eyebrows rising as the young woman hisses fouler and fouler curses at something burnt onto the griddle she’s cleaning; honestly, it reminds me of my battalion, really a nostalgic sound- and then she’s finished cleaning, and walking off into a small closet…?

And now she’s come out, and she’s not dressed like an undercook, she’s dressed like… I’ve no idea. A light red woolen tunic, quite a bit larger on her than I’d thought she would wear, but still quite short as everyone seems to wear these days; and a wide… dress? But no, it only goes to her hips-skirt, it’s a skirt, the distaff of trews is skirt. Interesting.

She’s also carrying some sort of Lisk- a scaly beast with vile feelings towards anyone who isn’t the young woman currently holding her. Following Miss Deborah’s careful steps are five of the cutest kittens I’ve seen—obviously the Lisk’s, considering the size of their ears, and the authoritative ‘come here’ cries the dam is making. Around one of Miss Deborah’s arms is a strange basket— it’s got some sort of hinge in the middle, and a lid. I’ve no idea what that’s for.

“This is about your chores, right?”

“Etiam, Miss Deborah; what am I to do?”

“Well, it’s like this— this is my catfish, Goblynn.”

“Well met, fair Goblynn,” Goblynn glances at me, then dismisses me as unworthy and cuddles up under Miss Deborah’s chin. I can see now what I took for a thick tail is really a tail with long finned legs— a Cat-fish, as she said, and not really a lisk at all.

“I’m going to tell you this now— she doesn’t like being touched by anyone except me and sometimes my brother, Sancho. She doesn’t like to play with anyone except for me, my sisters, and Sancho. If she curls up next to you, don’t touch her; if she looks like she wants to play, don’t invite her to. She lies, and she is cruel; and her very favorite treat is the blood of innocent cat-loving people, who just wanted to enjoy her company.”

“Um,”

“Your job is to take the box of cat toys I’ve gotten ready, prepare them according to the directions I’ll give you, and then hide them all over the ship— stick them behind and under furniture, in nooks and crannies, anywhere you can’t reach easily. That’s for Goblynn— if she doesn’t get enough enrichment in her environment, she starts making her own. If our ship had rats, I’d let her— but it doesn’t, so I don’t.”

“...how will I hide them without her knowing where I’ve put them?”

“I’m taking her in for her yearly veterinarian visit with Mark and them today, so she’ll be kept inside all day; you’ve got all day to hide the toys. As for her kittens— enough, Goblynn— it’s time to start separating them from their mother. They’re all weaned— she’s just got separation issues,”

“Ah,”

“There’s a basket with a lid; you’re to put the kittens in the basket, and keep the lid shut while I take Goblynn to the Vet. When I come back, I’ll help you scatter the toys, and help you teach the kittens about the new toys too,”

I nod, and then take the basket she hands me. It’s got a one way trap door, and a hinged lid that locks from the outside; inside, I can smell fresh catnip and see a thick pad of bedding in the bottom.
“So, go ahead and set the basket down wherever it’s stable- good, now pick up a kitten,”

“So, that’s Boo; he’s got a hiss like a snake and absolutely huge paws, so I’m pretty sure he’s going to be both massive and terrifying, hence the name-”

“Hehehehe-”

“That’s Princess; she was born with partial laryngeal paralysis, making her mewls sort of-”

“MWAOU -”

“Well,”

“Yeah, she’s got way too deep a voice for a fluffball her size, but what can you do? - and that, for obvious reasons, is Mustache-”

“Pffft-tahahahahahahaha-”

“He’s got a very lovely mustache!”

“-hahahahahahaha-”

Deborah is grinning at me as I carefully push Mustache, with his very fine white mustache, pfffffttt, into the basket with his siblings.

“That’s Grr, she prefers growling and purring to other forms of vocalization with humans-”

“She’s softer than Boo,”

“Yeah, and I can’t figure out why other than maybe Boo growing webbed feet later?”

“...This is a kitten?”

“Paws and tail in proportion to the body; look at the ears and face-”

“Holy shit, why is- she- so big?”

“Sometimes, like people, kittens just come out in size: fuckhuge. Anyway, her name is Pickle -”

“Ha,”

“Shush; and it’s probably best if you just hold her, she’s very docile,”

“I can see that,”

I like Pickle, even if she is about the size and weight of a small ballista rock. Deborah nods once to me, and I nod back- and then I sit down with Pickle the kitten to wait. A short while later, Pickle, who has been laying in my arms and purring, looks up to me and pats my chin with her paw. I look down at her, and she lets out a tiny mew.
I say “Yeah?”

And then she lets out the longest, squeakiest, most adorable mew I’ve ever heard a cat make.

And then she lets out a little squeaky mew and that’s it, I have to have this cat, I love her.

I think I’m crying a little. Gods, this cat is fucking adorable.

“So, would your roommates hurt her?”

“Wh-what? Sorry, um- could you repeat that, Deborah?”

“Sure. The guys you’re rooming with- would they hurt Pickle?”

“No, never,”

“Okay. Three roommates, right?”

“Yeah,”

“Have you ever had a pet or companion animal before?”

“A small sea turtle, and a few lizards, yes,”

I can see the Cook, Sanji, twitch from where Missus Mab is cutting his hair. I glance at him, and he looks- odd. Confused? Perturbed?

“Do you have any pets now?”

“No- not since I was a child,”

“If she takes ill, what will you do?”

“Uh- well, if it’s something like a small scratch or grumpiness, I’d wait and see; if she’s sneezing or throwing up or her shits smell particularly foul, I’d take her to see Mark,”

“How active are you? Like, will you have time to play with her every day? Will you teach her fighting skills?”

“Uh- I should be able to play with her at the beginning and end of each day; and I don’t see why not, she’s going to be massive,”

“If it turns out she has no heart for battle, what will you do?”

“Accept her choice and love her anyway,”

“What do you expect from her?”

“...to be a cat? I- what’s this about?”

“I’m deciding if you’ll be an ethical pet owner- so far, all signs point to yes. You still have to ask her mother, and decide if you’re keeping her name, but otherwise… I think she likes you,”

Pickle, the cat in discussion, has climbed my chest and wrapped herself around my neck and shoulders like a particularly warm and fluffy scarf. I fucking adore her.

“So, since you’ve never had a cat before, I’ll tell you about the toys- pass the kitten basket, we’re going to the Aqua Lounge,”

“The Aqua Lounge… that’s the room with the terrifying water wall, right?”

“I find it very soothing, myself- and you should take a better look at the sill, the glass is thicker than your arm is long.”

“I know that in my head, but my heart still stutters every time I see a live fish longer than I am tall swimming past...”

I follow Miss Deborah into the terrifying, yet oddly soothing room. Seeing all the fish moving beyond the impossibly clear glass, watching seahorses in the distance grazing, seeing little schools of squidberry plants gently sculling past- it really is astounding. Terrible, yes- and good, too, because sometimes there are young mermaid women in the window too, which is always nice.

The room is a huge, vaulted thing, the wide post of the mast dead center; the floor is tiled in black and white, jointed wood I think- very beautiful, actually, next to the deep red leather of the long round bench seat just under the terrifying window of blue ocean. Under the seats are what appear to be uneven siding, in a fine dark wood with rippling grain; Deborah puts the basket on the bench seat, crouches, and- ah, sliding doors, they’re storage.

A box full of things that rattle, click, and jingle- she shuts the storage with her booted foot and opens up the basket of kittens, who all bound out after a moment of hesitation.

Deborah takes a seat with a sigh, and pats the space next to her, not occupied by the box of toys or the basket of kittens. I sit next to her, Pickle asleep on my shoulders.

“Pickle’s asleep?”

“Yeah,”

“Mm. Cats spend a lot of their day sleeping, but playing- or, for working cats, hunting, is important too. It’s more than just a way for a cat to pass time; they use it for exercise, developing and maintaining skills, mental challenges, and satisfying their hunting instinct when they’re a companion. Your Pickle is going to need a lot of play time; she’s a big girl, and she could really hurt someone if she’s bored, even now;”

“Is that what the box is for?”

“Yep. This box is full of cat toys, which keep cats from thinking your hands or just any old thing is worth hunting and play-killing; and not every toy will do,”

“How much playtime does Pickle need?”

“That depends on quite a few things- for one, her metabolism - er, how fast her body uses the energy from the food she eats, how much she needs to sleep; what kind of toys she likes; how well she gets along with her siblings, all kinds of things. What’s important to remember is that all cats need to play, and if they don’t they develop two big problems; either they become overweight, which causes a whole host of medical problems- or they become destructive, because they’re bored. A cat with behaviour problems is usually a cat with enrichment issues- hence why I need your help hiding all the toys for Goblynn to sniff out. -as an aside, enrichment is why I think all those old stories of werewolves have them being slavering monsters-”

“Um-”

“I mean, have you met Buttercream, Bubbler, and Pearblossom? They’re not good boys-”

“Well-”

“-Because they’re good girls!”

“Pffft- actually, you’re probably right. I’ve seen some of the toys for the lovely Wolvarks; I have no doubt that proper use of them could alleviate some of the suffering of those pitiable souls afflicted with the Curse of Lycian,”

“Hm. So, don’t be fooled by the number of toys in this box- there’s really only seven different types of cat toy. Catnip toys; feather toys; wand toys; puzzle toys; swat, chew, and claw toys; mechanical toys, which move on their own; and cooldown toys, which aren’t really toys at all but get sold in the same areas. All the stripy mice are catnip toys- they’re very firm, and stuffed with catnip. Goblynn loves catnip; her litter so far has been too young to react to the herb, so I don’t know if they’ll like it or not. Some cats don’t,”

“Does the age of the herb matter?”

“Good question- I’ve never been able to keep a cat away from a catnip plant long enough to tell, so, probably,”

“Pffft,”

“Right. -um, you can also use catnip oil if you want, it’s easier to put into solution and spray somewhere you want the cat to be… Ah, feather toys are things like this,- it looks kinda like a mouse, although there are lizardy ones too, and mechanized ones- they’re all built to move like wounded birds. They’re made of a ball that bounces very well, something inside that rattles, and a bunch of feathers,”

“Okay,”

“You can also make things like fishing lures without hooks, to use as wand toys. Goblynn doesn’t care so much about these, there aren’t many birds native to Ryugu Mergyo, and the ones that are could give her a hell of a fight even injured- that said, I’ve got no idea who the sire of her litter is, so I don’t know if Pickle or the rest will or what,”

“Okay- should I hide some of the feather ones anyway?”

“Like, five or so- she doesn’t care to play with them, but she likes finding them, so I try to make it be a little treat for her,

“Got it,”

“Cool beans. As for the kittens, they like to bat them around- so go ahead and throw one for them if you feel like it. These are wand toys - it’s a stick, a string, and something to hunt and kill at the end. All cats love these at least a little bit; and if you want someone to play with your cat, like a child or someone you don’t know, this is the toy to use. The distance between your body and the cat’s business ends allows for full force play without scratches,”

“I see; ah, and the toy itself invites chasing and pouncing, does it not?”

“It does, yeah. Now, puzzle toys- they come in two distinct varieties. The first is the mystery box type- see, it’s this box one with all the things in it?”

“Oh! Ah, I see- the cat can put their paws in, but not their face- I assume these are best used in tandem with some sort of reward?”

“Mm. You can use food-treats or catnip depending on what interests your cat. This kind of toy is very useful for keeping your cat interested and engaged, even when you’re not there; it also gives them something to think about. Now, this one-”

“That’s not a sculpture?”

“Nope! This is actually a kind of feeder. I noticed it in Goblynn, Boo, and Grr- Mustache and Princess don’t do it, but Pickle might… Um, what I mean to say is, our cats have predispositions to eat too quickly. This leads to bloating and vomiting, if we don’t limit their eating speed-”

“Ah, that’s what all the spikes are for!”

“Exactly! These are also useful for older cats; it helps to engage their brains and keep them from getting complacent.”

“I see- sort of like how people who always learn something end up staying young longer?”

“Exactly like, actually. Okay, so, these are swat, chew, and claw toys- these crinkle balls are some of Goblynn’s very favorite swat toys; go ahead and crunch it.”

“Wow, that’s… really satisfying, and aaaaaaaau, Pickle-”

“She likes those! Go ahead and throw it for her-”

I do. Pickle bounds off of my shoulder and lunges for the crackly ball paw first- and the ball, so light, ah! I get it!

“It’s so light, the slightest touch from the cat sends it flying!”

“Yep! Now this, and some of the other large stuffies in the storage here are chew toys- and these are really dog toys but Pickle likes them for cooldown- see, here she comes, these trout are her favorite-”

“Good to know-”
“Mm. I’ve also seen her playing with the squid one, but she mostly sleeps on it. Claw toys we don’t have to put out, but we do have to check to see if they need changing— you know how the lower part of the mast in the Galley, the part under the Altar and the countertop is covered in cork?”

“Yeah,”

“That’s because it’s a scratch toy; it’s large enough that each cat can reach all the way up and pull down, which is how they keep their claws from getting overgrown or dull,”

“Ah; so we check to make sure we keep ahead of needing to replace the cork?”

“Mm. Mechanical toys move on their own, and can be anything from something like this bracket, which attaches to the wall, to this ball which rolls on its own and changes direction randomly. Goblynn likes some of them, but they don’t really hold her attention— Boo and Grr, however, adore them,”

“I see,”

“So, look up high— see all the shelves with little egg things and tiny armchairs and couches on them?”

“...Actually, yeah; what are those?”

“Those are cool down toys. Cats are introverted; they don’t like extended social interaction the way dogs do. That’s fine; but they also don’t want to be left out or excluded. The toys up high give the cats somewhere to retreat to without actually leaving the room, and are designed to soothe them, rather than excite them. They’re also in socially significant areas— places where we gather up in groups, or where people spend lots of time,”

“I see; should I put some of these up high for Pickle?”

“You’re going to need to talk to Franky about suitably reinforcing a shelf in your dorm room; like you said, she’s going to be huge,”

“I thought you said that,”

“Oh! Uh… maybe? Whoever said it, it’s still true— Pickle’s going to be a big girl,”

“...A big pickle?”

“Oh my Gods, no,”

“A Big Pickle!”

“Nooooooo—”

As fast as Cece was down with illness, she’s up again, and well— Chopper actually discharged her, she’s so healthy and recovered. The ports in her shoulders were removed the day after Sancho’s birthday, and that was nearly a month ago; and though she’s a little creaky after so long abed, she joined everyone for chores without much of a hitch. She also seems to have settled back into her skin— whatever issue she was having with Philip and Sancho, she’s let it go now, or resolved it, or something.
Mah, Solitaire on the other wing, is still not quite... he’s not well. If it wouldn’t shock him worse, I’d send him home to Mom and Auntie, but... He’s strong, for one; he’s smart, for two; he’s afraid, for three; and he doesn’t trust me, for four.

One of those would be enough, but all four means I’m the only person on this ship who can stop him if he has a flashback, and I’m the only person on this ship he won’t ask for help. Beatrix is not pleased, but it’s not her job to make people trust me- it’s mine. And trust isn’t something you’re given, not in a lasting relationship- it’s something you earn.

As all the snails on our ship start sobbing like babies, setting off BBC and sending all the officers into the Galley at a panic- Bryony’s in her pyjamas, it’s the middle of the night for her, nearly tea time for us- I consider if the distress signal we’re receiving is really worth our trust.

"-Bryony, can you- thank you, that was really annoying-"

"Neh, why were all th’snails crying like babies-?"

“It’s a distress signal; merchant ships use them when they’re in trouble, and morganeers use them to attract merchants to prey on,"

“So… either way it’s an adventure?"

“Hang on, Captain- we can’t all go,”

“Eh?”

“The Mice and Fern are still quite ill; the Four Old Men haven’t been invited to our crew; and correct me if I’m wrong, Nami, Taffy, Robin- but are there any islands rumored to be nearby?”

“No, Mab, there aren’t- the island rumored to be closest to this side of the canal is a place called Tuckleigh, a trading post of sorts,”

“Tiffany; can you send someone up and out? I want an eyes on view, I’m getting conflicting information from my sensory web-”

“No problem, Mab, I’ll put Ori on it-”

“Luffy, you make the final decision: are we answering the call?”

“Yes, Captain’s orders,”

“Okay, Nami, Taffy-”

“Already on it; Taffy, were there coordinates-?”

“Yis, I am calculating course adjustment as we speak-”

“Second question; who’s staying behind?”

“Hm... we need to leave the sick people here with doctors who can care for ‘em, and we need people who can protect the ship, too. I haven’t sparred with everyone, but- Zoro, Nami’s gettin’ real annoyed with your hoverin’, so you’re goin’ and she’s not. Gurry will go; Mark and Bry will stay, Mark to protect the ship, and Bry’s too sleepy durin’ the day—"

“thank you captain, aaaugh—”

“I’m goin’... me, zoro, Nami stays, Usopp stays, Sanji, you’re not going; Mab, you’re going; Chopper stays; Robin goes; Mark stays; Taffy stays; Bryony stays, Franky goes; Brook?”

“I’d prefer to go, Captain; the worry would wither the flesh from my bones- if I still had any! Yohohohohoho, skull joke!”

“Shishishi, okay- Gurry’s going- can the Cook Trio go, Sanji?”

“Yes,”

“Then they’re going; Ellie goes; Fern stays; Genny needs a broom before she goes—”

“I’ll handle that, Captain,”

“Thank you, Tiffany; um... Beatrix goes, Cece an’ Sancho stay, Adelaide goes, the Mice stay, Mendy May and BBC stay, Sohei stays; Miss Cherry and Neo go; Havij stays; Tiffany, Precious, Daily, Lucille, Mack, Bang all stay; Mono goes; Zelda goes; Jun stays; Sawbones goes; Ailbe and BKB have’ta stay because Bry won’t be awake until sundown; Lynn, Ori, Cather, Aoihe, Annie, Solitaire and Udoroth all go- everyone else stays. Neh- you guys are on my crew, right?”

“...Yeah? I mean, we would’a asked to leave if we wanted, Captain,”

“-! Udoroth, when did you get here?”

“I’ve been here since breakfast, Deborah; Pickle fell asleep, and I didn’t want to wake her...”

“Fair enough- do you need a weapon?”

“That would be quite nice; Solitaire too,”

“Um...”

“Mono and Zelda will handle disposables; Mab, where’s the armory?”

“I’m glad you asked...”
Dear- Lovely- Dearest Journal,

I suppose I should begin by stating clearly at the start that I am no pony, as the Sisters would call their subjects- a pony is rigorously defined in literal fashion as anypony who is fourteen hooves or below; I am, at my withers, very nearly nineteen hooves. Thus, I am more properly defined as a horse- note the lack of prevailing 'w'!

Particularly, I am (really, my entire clan is,) what is called a Coldblood, or Draft. This means that, well aside from my stature, I am- despite being a mare, and quite beautiful I might add- known for a number of things. Firstly, and perhaps most importantly for any descendants reading this journal, Coldbloods tend to steady any line we’re introduced to- indeed, Saddle Arabians in particular have been known to seek out a prospective mate from the colder north, my homeland, when their bloodlines- which they keep rigorous track of- become too crossed and fractious. A coldblood can be any of the three tribes- unicorn, pegasus, or earth pony; what is true of all coldbloods is that we are generally large, much larger than the average pony. We tend to be heavily muscular- not in a grotesque or ugly way, merely that we tend to be strong in our bodies. Our hooves are large; our patience is long.

My name, Journal, is Meadow Surprise. I am a bay, with a harsh red sheen to my mane and tail. I do not currently wear shoes of any kind, and though I had some misgivings at the beginning of the journey, I must say that not needing any of the files or clippers to keep my hooves in proper order is a great relief, and a great savings on weight in my cart.

I have left my home of Trottingham some six weeks past, and have been steadily making my way south. I have in my possession a cart, which I have been using as a base for a lean-to as I travel; it holds my entire business, as well as my personal possessions, and my beehives. One cannot, of course, keep bees as pets- then again, they are not entirely wild creatures either, not so long as I’ve had them.

I suppose it started with my cutie mark- I had been watching a swarm of bees turn the hollow trunk of a tree in the overgrown back of our yard into their hive, and it was fascinating. Each day I would spend a good hour or longer observing- and it seemed to me that each hexagonal cell of beeswax was marked in a this-or-that fashion. Slowly, slowly, I gained a sense of the purpose of the bees- how each cell was marked out for a specific use, and how each level of the hive had its own purpose. I was also learning to knit, at the time- and then one day, almost as if in a dream, I turned my head and found my mark.

My cutie mark is two balls of black and yellow self-stripping yarn, one larger than the other; in the smaller ball, there are two knitting needles stuck in a bit like antenna; and on either side of the pair of yarn balls, a single hexagon of bright yellow. It looks rather like a honey bee, though one made of knitting supplies and abstract shapes…

Well. On that day, I discovered two things- firstly, that I had several small, seemingly disparate knacks for a few things, that being: making soft goods, such as knitwear, lace, or cuddle buddies; making cheese; making pickles; and keeping bees. There are some things made easier by the horn upon my head; and there are some things that simply must be done by hoof, not because there’s not a spell to do the job- or even because I can’t do the spell, I certainly can- but rather… there is a quality to an object that cannot be replicated by spell. There are instructions a spell is simply not smart enough to interpret; and…

Here, let me explain.

Knitting instructions and spell matrixes are basically the same thing. A knitting instruction, after all, is the written instructions of how one goes about making a certain piece. There is usually a picture or description of what kind of thing should be left behind, provided all the instructions are followed correctly, and all the necessary basic properties of a good knitted object are present. Similarly, a spell matrix is the written- or physicalized- instruction of how a spell is to be cast. Most spells come with a description or warning about it’s use, thus allowing the forward thinker to divine the purpose and method of the spell in question- intention, is the word I was looking for.

Knitting something, and casting a spell are both matters of intent. It need not be a powerful intent-keeping warm in the cold, a light in the darkness… I find that the simpler solution is often better. I could cast a heating spell to keep warm- or I could take the time to knit myself a fine set of legwarmers, and a heavy shawl, and a scarf, and a hat that I can tie around my throat. I could cast a mage light; or I could light a candle.

Then again, I suppose the devil is truly in the details- there are times when clothing is not practical, but a spell is; times when a flame is a terrible, irresponsible danger- but a tiny firefly of mage-light is not.

Ah, I suppose I should explain the actual- right. Well. I have been banished from my clan lands in Trottingham; and I am now making my way to Equestria, in hope of a better life for myself and the one(s?) soon to be in my care. To start with, I aim to get to the Griffonstone Bridge, where, if all goes well, I will cross and enter the very edge of Equestrian territory. If I have enough money left over, I shall get a ticket to the farthest interior of that pleasant country I can- but I doubt it will be so easy.

The light is fading; and my quill is less than sharp. I shall write again when I am in more stable accommodations.

Best Love, MS

Crossed the River, First Day of Spring; Bebotherance and Condemnation to Greedy Griffons!

Well, Journal, my worry was well founded- crossing the Griffonstone Bridge from the Griffon side was an exercise in politic and frustration. I suppose it’s really my fault- I did not expect such high tolls for crossing a bridge, nor the need for bribes. Even so, I only now have enough bits to go to the Crystal Empire or Vanhoover without crunching into my savings and fresh-start monies.

Bah! Enough of this pity party!

I am currently resting in a very fine traveler’s stable, with my cart as is proper. Across the walk, there seems to be some sort of altercation- I am quite pleased and sure of the runic protections laid into the bones of the stable, so feel no worry leaving my cart be and sticking my nose in where it isn’t wanted.

Ah, Journal, I am glad I had a look! I never could stand for anyone being mistreated for something they’ve no control over- one cannot control their tribe, nor their coloration, nor even if they be a zebra or otherwise.

Taffeta Dracule - though she prefers Taffy- is a zebra, one of the Travelers I do believe, though I would need to put my glasses on and double check the stitching on her saddlebags to be sure. She stands at the average fourteen hooves, and has a curious dun tinge to her stripes. There is something distinctly wiggly or snake-like concerning her cute stamp- like a snake with wings, wrapped around a stick, I think. Odd, but no more than my own cutie mark- as for the mare herself, once well away from her tormentors- who I will not describe more than boorish, cowardly, and entirely too sure of their strength when with their fellows (a sure sign of a coward)- she is proving to be a kind and gregarious soul.

She has not been off-put by my taciturn nature, nor my resting expression (which has often been compared to a scowl). Indeed, after enjoying a fine dinner of oats, sorghum, barley stalks and dandelion leaves, (with a sprinkle of my own necessary supplements), we have decided to be traveling partners for as long as our roads intersect. We have also decided, after I voiced my lack of bits and general concerns, to go to Vanhoover, not the Crystal Empire- and, as it turns out, Taffy is a doctor. Specifically, she is a midwife, learning how other cultures and other bodies go about the business of birth.

Quite frankly, I am put greatly at ease having her along.

It’s getting late, Journal; I’ll write again soon.

Best love; MS

Twenty First of March; Pegacast for Slightly Cloudy, no scheduled rain

Dearest Journal; Taffy is a Traveler! What fantastic luck! Further, she has several coupons for our journey ahead- and has agreed to pool her bit’s with mine, that we may make them stretch farther. (Just a note, Journal- Travelers are Zebras who leave Zebrica to explore the world, broadening their knowledge and mastery of a particular subject, art, or science. They have flowers, vines, and medicinal herbs embroidered into the carrying straps of their saddlebags as a good luck charm; Taffy’s are fern, ivy, dandelion, and willow, with flowers of pea, rose, and lily.)

Our itinerary is as follows; we will board the Mail and Freight leaving Griffonstone Station at Three-thirty AM for the Crystal Empire, where we will have approximately twelve hours of layover; then, we will board the Sparkling Continental from the Empire to Cloudsdale Station, where we will connect with the Vanhoover Limited (Canterlot to Vanhoover round-trip daily), thus getting us to Vanhoover.

Apparently, Taffy’s older brother, Hawkeye, works in the Vanhoover General Hospital as a surgeon, quite necessary occupation for the seaweed farmers I’m informed.

Taffy says that Hawkeye is much kinder than he appears, and will let us stay with him for a good three months- at which time, with luck, we both will have had a chance to make some good money, and will be able to continue into Equestria.

-I’ll continue my musings later, Journal, I’ve got to help the porters load my cart onto the train-

It’s Still March; Ugh

Journal, Railcars do not agree with me. Taffy is very concerned- she says that she can find a remedy for me in the Crystal Empire, but if it doesn’t work, we’ll be walking to Vanhoover. Apparently, being absolutely sick to one’s stomach is no fair exchange for convenience- and I seem to have made a fast friend in Taffy, as she absolutely stomped my queasy objections flat. I at least managed to talk her into going as far as Cloudsdale- walking from the Empire to Vanhoover would surely be a deadly enterprise.

I’ve been resting in the nice sunlight, on the blessedly firm and unmoving ground; Taffy saw to my cart’s resettling on a different freight car, and scolded the porters into helping me off the train car and into this park where I’m resting now. She’s gone to get me something to settle my stomach, and has decided to spend our layover making a remedy for my motion sickness- and here she is now.

Goodness, but what a difference a hot infusion of herbs and spices can make in one’s lookout! I’ve left my saddlebags with Taffy; she was quite insistent that I do my best to stick to my original itinerary, and that she did not need my presence to make a proper cure. Fair enough- on to the wonders of the Crystal Capital!

Hearthstone City is a wondrous place, a shining beacon of warmth and light for all. The Crystal Ponies are glimmering and wonderful- even my duller colors seem mysterious and grand in the gleam of the crystal wash. I have seen innumerable wonderments, and am filled with delight- aha!

My first stop on this layover, a dye and knitting shop- I walk away, saddlebags heavy with dry dyes of fantastic color and vibrancy, new skeins of wool, and a fine selection of buttons. Some are simple colors; others, magical in nature, adding a touch of crystalline sheen to this or that. Some are additives; beads, notions, clasps, books and instructional scrolls… and now, for the souvenirs.

I have had it as a habit since my very smallest youth, that any place I go- excepting, of course, the great outdoors- I will take some small things as souvenirs. A number of things catch my eye, the first being a delightful garden of crystal succulents- and, after some inquiry, I walk away with a small portable garden that will keep its beautiful crystalline shape and coloration well outside the Empire, provided I feed it the appropriate mixture of gem shards (a small pouch of which I bought, and the ratio of mixture and feeding schedule is included as well).

I have already begun collecting jewelry for my child- my clan, the Surprise clan, has a bit of a habit of collecting rocks, but my particular branch collects adornments. I, personally, have a collection of over a thousand unique hair pins- and for my child, I have decided to collect combs, as I want the pins too much to share- and so, I will get my child something of their own, and for myself, pins!

I bought a hair pick, and I’m not sure why- it’s a lovely piece, made of wood and soft on my lips, but… Well, perhaps Taffy will like it? Her mane is long, and I’ve noticed her irritation when it gets in her eyes… And if I buy a small grab bag of blank crystal shards, and I use my graver’s tools, I can put a small spell into the pick- nothing fancy, mind, just a simple set of nested spells to clean, style, and bind her hair up into… well, considering the pick itself, I can get away with four styles total. I’ll have to discuss which styles with Taffy, but that shouldn’t be too bothersome, and I see no reason why it shouldn’t work… so that’s sorted, then.

I bought a mane comb, but… I’ve no idea who for. Perhaps a friend I haven’t met, yet- it is a fierce looking thing, yet stark and plain. I understand why no one bought it before me; there’s a certain harsh quality to it that some ponies would find off putting. I, personally, found it rather refreshing- like the first bath of spring in the stream after a long, mucky winter… Ah, I’ve made myself sad.

For my foal, a silver and crystal mane comb with pink and white daisies adorning it. Cute; unisex; and sturdy enough to be a foal’s mane comb for generations.

For myself, a set of twenty crystal and pearl mane pins, obviously meant for someone’s wedding- but at that price, the wedding must not have come to be. A shame for them that ordered them; a bargain for me that bought them! The salesmare was so pleased to move the stock, she threw in a pair of shawl pins for good fortune.

And finally, for us both- a crystal suncatcher with a series of nested spells meant to create a formless sort of music. I think we both(?) could benefit from such a thing; and the spells make slightly different music each time, so it shouldn’t ever get boring… and in the sun, it scatters a multitude of rainbows and glimmers, so even if the music doesn’t help, it will be nice to look at.

I must say, a walk through the capital of the Crystal Kingdom did me a wondrous good. Taffy’s remedy served to settle my stomach further- and, after a fine repast, we boarded the train for Cloudsdale in high spirits.

I shall inform you of the efficacy of the remedy soon enough, Journal.

Best Love; MS

I hated her, you know? I hated Missus Mab for a good long while- not for any real reason, more’s the shame of it, but because I wanted her to be Una, and she was not.
Una was outgoing, talkative, and energetic- but Mab is reserved, stoic, and fairly phlegmatic. I suppose Una and I got on so well because we were the same kind of person- we fed off of each other’s enthusiasm, we could talk together for hours without ever becoming bored, we’d bicker and fight but all in good fun, and we always made friends in whichever camp we were assigned. I never have more fun than at a good party, or with a group of friends… and for a long time, my very worst fear was being alone.

I think I knew the first day that Mab wasn’t Una- for one thing, her face hardly ever moves. I have to remind myself continually that she’s not Una in a temper- she’s Mab, and that’s just her face. She spends a lot of each day alone, does our Mab; she doesn’t like being the center of attention, she doesn’t like putting on a show. Her regard is shown through her actions- making tea for me that night I couldn’t sleep, even though I’d been treating her so dismissively…

And then, of course, she gave me a proper thrashing when I was out and out disrespectful- and Una never took me to task that way, probably because I never gave her reason to. I think the seed of my kinder regard towards Missus Mab was planted the night she made tea for me; and it began to grow when she gave me a proper and rightful thrashing.

There are five things I look for in a teacher- and, so that I don’t make any mistakes later, I’ll say so now. Mab is a good teacher- not the best, not perfect, but good.

She likes her students, for one thing; she likes to teach Beatrix, and she likes teaching me. She’s filled with enthusiasm and infectious joy for what she does, what she has to share; and that passion, that unrelenting wonder, the… she’s never so happy, that I’ve seen, than when she’s been teaching me or Beatrix something and we get it right.

Mab has been teaching me how to fly with my wings; and she’s been taking Beatrix through the basics of martial arts and magic. For both of us, that means how to fall, muscle conditioning, how to eat, how to breathe, how to care for our equipment (wings, in my case, and a more embarrassing moment I’ve yet to live through), things to watch out for, anecdotes…

Mab knows exactly what she’s talking about- she knows magic in ways I didn’t know it could be known. I didn’t know that each of the Haki powers was outright magic- and that each Haki power corresponds to some part of the self. Armament is of the body- and while it can be applied to non-physical things, it’s a power of the physical world and will always be strongest there. Observation is of the mind; and the King’s Disposition is of the spirit. Each Haki can be applied in each realm of being, but they are strongest in their original area. Totally new information for me- and makes several things that made no sense to me before make total sense now.

Mab also knows mathematics- or mathemagic, as it’s called now. She’s a master of math, actually- and according to her, the role of a math teacher is to look over a student’s work, find the holes in their logic, and teach them how to not make those same mistakes anymore. I already understand the basics, called arithmagic- one is one, one and one is two, one less one is none, one set of one is one. She said, hah, she said that mathemagic exists at all because once, long ago, some bastard wanted to write down how many of whatever they had- and numbers, thus invented, have been causing nothing but trouble for everyone ever since.

...I like her. I like that she cares- about me, about the quality of my learning, about my work, about me flying… And I especially like that she takes the time to make sure that each of her students- me, and Beatrix- get an equal amount of time with her, even if that means she can’t get to things she wanted to do for herself. She spent four hours with me one day, just helping me understand a complicated sequence of wing-turns- we went well into lunch, and… I just.
Everyone thought I wouldn’t be able to fly, you see. My cousins, my brothers, my mum- all of them thought that, with my anxiety, I’d never get the wing strength or the knowing of the wind in my wings to fly at all.

Mab said “Bullshit. Solitaire- do you want to fly?”

And I said “W-well-”

“I’m not asking if you think you can; I’m asking if you want to fly. The answer is yes, or no,”

“...Yes. Yes, I want to fly,”

“Then I will teach you; and if it takes a day or a lifetime, I will make sure you learn how to fly, Little Brother,”

...I never had a sister- a big sister, who has absolute faith in me… It’s funny. I never expected to get a teacher for flying at all, much less one who trains me honestly, and truly, and will not stop- not until I do it right, but until I cannot do it wrong, which is an entirely different beast.

The worst sorts of teachers are the ones who don’t do these things. They don’t like their students; they’re bored by their subjects; they don’t know what they’re talking about; they only teach some students and not all of them; and they give up.

Mab’s not like that.

And by her example, neither am I.

Mab doesn’t know enough about broadswords to teach anyone more than the very basics of using them. She’s been teaching Beatrix the anatomy of her swords; how to properly care for them, how to hear their voices- but me?

I’m teaching her more practical things.

“Again. You’re so fucking slow it’s actually painful for me to watch,”

I scowled as Beatrix pushed hard for me again, eyes narrowed in focused concentration and hair tied back in a bun and sweat being caught by a scrunch headband of indigo. She’d been trying to get past my defence for a good hour by then- and at least her base of strength was nothing to sneeze at. She’s only getting stronger and more steady, with longer strikes and more graceful movements- yet, even now in the second week of our training, she still has too much hesitation in each of her movements.

I block each blow of her two broadswords with my one, easily and without strain. No, this won’t do at all.

I can’t help wincing as Beatrix trips over a knot in the grass, for the third time this session, resulting in an ass-over-head roll in the muddy earth and a nasty thump against the mainmast.
I sigh and rest my blade against my shoulder as I wait for Beatrix to right herself again. The only real improvements so far have been increases in stamina and refinement of form- Beatrix can last a full forty-five minutes against me going half-speed, which is leaps better than two weeks ago; her reflexes are becoming more naturalized and unthinking, and her general strength is much higher.

I say general because her actual martial strength is not just her physical strength alone- and it’s only occasionally that one of her peace-bound blades lands more than a sting against my skin. It’s not just me, thankfully (and yet, not); if it was me she was having trouble fighting, I’d have to give her a gentle let down and I’m terrible at those- but no. Even against her sisters, or other members of the crew, sparring… I cannot say that I am pleased with the way she’s being overpowered, especially by Aoife and Coco.

It’s not like Beatrix lacks the skill to push those two back- they’re weaker than her- it’s that, well, she always subconsciously holds back in spars. The others, well… Zoro’s a sink or swim teacher, and Taffy doesn’t know enough about teaching to catch Aoife and Coco’s bullying… but it’s not quite bullying either, it’s exclusionary in nature… At best, Taffy catches and corrects Beatrix’ form, but… it’s a very good thing that I’m teaching her.

Normally, I wouldn’t have gotten involved. Arrogance is always present in every population; if I try to stop every case I ever see, I’ll never get anything else done. Aoife and Coco are in for a rude awakening anyway- Zoro might not be a particularly affectionate teacher, but he does not approve of unfounded arrogance. Aoife’s casual and cruel condescension and Coco’s posturing to try and stay in whatever group she perceives as being well regarded… That won’t help them for much longer, I’d say.

This time is different, though- for one, I’m crewmates with Beatrix. For another, she’s my student now, not just Mab’s- and so, any slur against her is an affront against me, especially when she continues to loose so abysmally against people I know for a fact she could defeat.

“Let’s take a break.” I groan into the air before tromping across the grassy main to a long bench by the door.

Beatrix rolls herself to her feet and follows after me, muddy faced and miserable. We sit together on the wooden bench; I put my thoughts in order as Beatrix washes and dries her swords, and then her face- her clothing is so mucky, I can hardly see the pretty flowers on her stockings, or the color of her strange tunic-pants combination… Her indigo headband is alright, as is her cowl, but her arm warmers are soaked through with mud, as is her tunic-thing, and her pretty black socks with the yellow chamomile flowers on; even her shoes, waxy and water-proof as they are, haven’t managed to escape the mud.

“What do you think the problem is, Beatrix?” I enquire once we’re both settled, clean enough, cool in the shade and sipping from mugs of cool switchel.

Beatrix fidgeted in place, fingers tight around the mug in her hands. She’d firmed up a little over the past two weeks, but she still finds it difficult to meet anyone’s gaze straight on- especially mine.
“...problem?” She mumbled, sounding uncertain yet resigned- and more than a little surprised to be spoken to at all. I couldn’t blame her; this was the first time I’d actively sat her down during one of our daily training sessions and talked to her.

“With you,” I clarified bluntly. One thing Mab and I share- we say what we really mean, what we really think, and to hell with the consequences. “You’re improving; everyone’s noticed, especially with how fast it’s been. But you’re still getting your ass kicked in group spar, and I know you can at least thrash Aoife an’ Coco as you are right now- so. What’s the problem?”

Beatrix didn’t exactly flinch, but she did crumple, folding in on herself at my frank assessment and hunching low and small, shoulders tight to her ears and arm over her stomach. That’s quite enough of that- I reach out and whack her upside her pretty head, only just hard enough to startle the gloom out of her.

“None of that-” I snapped. “I agreed to teach you, which means I won’t be quitting you until you’re at least at my level, maybe more- and I’m equal to Taffy. Anything less than that is an embarrassment to both of us. So, thrice I ask- why can’t you do the same things you’re doing here with those two kicking you about in group spar?”

Beatrix grumbled a little, shifting nervously before finally looking nearer to my face and blurting out- well- “I get angry, okay!? I spent most of my life up ‘till now fighting with everything I had, and… and they call me- they say things to me and I just- I get so angry- I don’t want to kill them, not really, and people die real easily, and… they make me so mad, I just- I forget the things I’ve been learning with you,” she stuttered out, ending with her eyes locked on mine.

I stared her down, and then narrowed my eyes- curled my hand into a fist and swung for her. I moved slow enough for her to see but fast enough she wouldn’t be able to do anything but use the reflexes I’d been beating into her bones- and low and behold, react she did. The smack that rang out as Beatrix blocked my fist was even more satisfying than I thought it would be.

The wide-eyed look of astonishment on her face as she realized what she’d done? That’s gravy on the steak.

“Forget my perky ass,” I snorted derisively as I lowered my hand and uncurled my fist. “You didn’t use those instincts of your’n for a good month and a half, so they got rusty and flabby. Now you’re trimming up again, learning new reflexes, and you won’t forget those, not the way Mab an’ me teach ‘em; they stay with you for the rest of your life once you’ve learned ‘em. You best come up with a better excuse than that, Beatrix.”
Beatrix stared at me for a second longer before her gaze shifted to her own hand as if she couldn’t believe what it had done.

“I guess… I guess I just… can’t…” Beatrix mumbled at last, brow quirked in what I knew to be self-directed frustration.

I waited a moment.

“Why not?” I prompted, when she made no move to speak further.

Beatrix tugged and itched at the dirt dried onto one wet arm warmer, looking so deeply conflicted and miserable- like a soggy turnip, honestly… well, even I felt a bit guilty for a moment, for tripping her into the mud so many times these past two weeks. Then I shook the guilt off; if anything, I was going easy on her. The bath rooms have very hot water, and Mab makes good soap- so it’s not like she stays filthy for all that long after training; and, of course, I always call a stop to our training sessions when it looks like she’s hit her limit.

My teachers had done no such thing for me; they pushed me above and beyond, with deceptively mild insistence. Wartime was a perpetual winter, all year round thanks to enemy weathermages; we’d all considered ourselves lucky if it hadn’t rained or snowed. The soap was either a handful of grit or some lye-water to get rid of a persistent stench, and the water ran from slightly warmer than tepid to breaking up the floating chunks of ice- if we got a chance to bathe at all, that is.

“They always say things,” Beatrix confessed at last, voice ragged with exhaustion. “Not just about me, and my skills, or even my studies; they say things about Missus Mab, too, how she’d be… she’d be better off without- without some whore’s brat tainting her reputation…”

Beatrix looked utterly miserable by the time she finished. I studied her for a long, quiet moment- listening to doves coo, and to the rustle of grass in the cross-deck breeze- before asking offhand, “Do you agree with them, then?”

Beatrix’s head jerked like I’d struck her- her eyes blazed vermillion then a sort of unbelievable red I’ve only seen oozing out of a man’s slit throat before. “They- They said-”

“Beatrix,” I snapped, “I’m not asking what they think; I don’t give a good gods-be-damned about what they think. I asked what you think. Do you agree with them or not?”

Her hands clenched, tight enough that her knuckles turned white; her shoulders shook with tiny tremors, the kind you get when you’re only just holding yourself back from movement. Her eyes blazed like coals in a fire- and still, she could seem to find any words.
Holding back won’t help her now; press, and see what comes out. “Because, see, if you do, then I gotta say, there’s no point in me teaching you at all, and there’s no point in you being Mab’s apprentice. You’re more ignorant than your average person, and the daughter of a whore to boot-right? Right.”

I ignored the hurt and the distress that surfaced on Beatrix’s face, focusing instead on the undercurrent of deep, unrelenting fury that I could scarcely sense behind all the uncertainty and fear.

“People will always look down on you for something you can’t change,” I mocked viciously, “And since you agree with them, you’re fate’s practically set in stone. Either you’ll get a one way ticket back to whatever whorehouse your mother died in, or you’ll die of something everyone knew was a danger, ignorant and unwelcome, just like they said you are. Self-deficient, basically; only good for other people’s use. Isn’t that what you are? Scrawny, weak, nervous to the point where you can’t even look anyone in the eye for more than a few seconds- how in hell do you expect to be respected when you act like a fucking mouse all the time? You’re scared of your own shadow, aren’t you? No good for anything but errands and making money in your sleep; useless for anything else, isn’t that right? I mean, I guess Coco and Aoife are right- you should just go back to you’re ma’s whorehouse, maybe the madam will take pity and-”

I very nearly smiled when Beatrix’s tolerance audibly snapped; her whole body caught aflame, and she literally launched herself at me, open handed and full of bile as tears of rage flooded her eyes and a snarl turned her fearsome.

“THAT’S A DAMN LIE-” she roared, not seeming to care that her blows were glancing at best- and then, the true nature of her power made itself known. The reason I have to teach Beatrix- the real one, beyond our shared weapon choice- is this: if Beatrix went for Mab like she’s going for me, Mab would crush her instantly. But she wouldn’t be able to do it cleanly- Beatrix would take one of Mab’s eyes, at least. Neither of them want that- but I was training with Una when she was Mab’s age; I’ve forgotten more about dodging wild claws than the both of them have learned about making them.

“THAT’S A LIE! I CHOSE TO BECOME A THAUMATURGIST, AND MAB CHOSE ME TO BE HER APPRENTICE! I STAYED BECAUSE I WANTED TO! I’M GOING TO LEARN WHAT SHE HAS TO TEACH ME, AND I’M GOING TO BE THE BEST, AND ANYONE WHO SAYS OTHERWISE CAN DIE MAD ABOUT IT!”

I bat aside her flailing claws, taking care to not let her cut me too deep; I stare her right in her blazing red eyes as I challenge her again; “Your words don’t match your actions, Beatrix, so who are you trying to convince? Me? If I didn’t already see the potential in you, I wouldn’t have agreed to train you no matter what Mab said or did to me. You tryin’ to prove your tormentors wrong? Why would they care? And why should you waste your valuable time right now caring about what they think?”
I lean back, shift my weight forwards, snag one of her delicate wrists and turn-lock-lift-pull-release her into a very soppy puddle of mud. She lands with a very wet sort of whumpf feeling, flat on her back and breathless. Mud splatters everywhere, landing in little droplets on her tearstained, rage-reddened and frustrated face.

“The only one you have to convince, Beatrix- the only one you have to convince, is yourself. The only thing holding you back from doing that is your own fear. Fear of failure- fear of letting your family down, fear of disappointing your teacher, fear of realizing that you really are as worthless and weak as they say you are.”

Beatrix had managed to sit up, but was taking a moment to catch her breath- good, the lesson on choosing your moment finally sunk in past the layer of mud and self-sabotage. I roll my throwin’ shoulder, stalk over to her sitting in the mud, and flick her in the forehead; I glare fiercely at her tearstained face.

“Get rid of that fear. It won’t help you get strong like you want. Right now, whether you’re on offense or defense, I can still sense the hesitation in your blade, your feet, your stance. You don’t have any real desire to actually hit what you’re aiming at when you attack; you second guess whether or not you should move your fucking feet; and when you defend yourself, you’re so afraid of getting cut that you trip yourself on knots in the grass that don’t actually exist. How is any of that going to help you?”

I pause, watching my student digest my harsh lesson with a strange expression on her face; part confusion, part ebbing rage, part curiosity.

“You lack conviction,” I said at last, and for a moment, I heard the echo of Una and my own swordmaster, thrashing us to the very edge of death to help us find our own strengths. “You lack resolve, and maybe that’s just you, or maybe it’s years of letting the petty cruelties of life grind you down. Either way, I don’t care. If you want to get strong- really, truly, limitlessly strong- you need another mindset. Get rid of the one you have now; it’s full of too much fear and not enough reality. When you attack, you should think ‘I’ll cut them’; when you move your foot, you should move your foot; and when you defend, you should think ‘I won’t let them hit me.’ No in-betweens, no take-backs, no thinking ‘my sword won’t be able to cut them’ or ‘I’m scared of getting hit’, no wishy-washy moves. That shit just holds you back.”

I scowl down at her as I lean over her, and she stares up at me, wide eyed.

“I can help you with your reflexes and your speed, improve your stamina and your accuracy, help you refine your sword style and practice special techniques- I can even teach you the true meaning of strength,” I said, straightening my back and softening my face and voice into something slightly less… abrasive. “Everything else? Your determination, your Will to Overcome, your strength- to find your own strength as a swordswoman, all the truly important things that make or break the kind of person you’ll become… those are things only you can decide, only you can teach yourself. No one else,"

The only sounds are the continued cooing of the doves, some soft goatly bleatings- no, wait, that’s Franky sobbing about something being, and I quote, suuuuuuuuuupaaaaaaaaah-!; the crossbreeze is a little warmer than it was before.

I am silent; so is Beatrix.

I don’t mind silence, is the weirdest difference between me and Mab; if I’m in a room with a group of people, I’ve no problem with keeping my mouth shut. Mab, on the other wing, seems entirely incapable of being silent for longer than ten minutes- unless she’s working, of course.

I work my jaw for a moment- it’s a little sore, actually. I’d just said more in the past two, maybe three minutes than I had since I was about ten years old, especially all in one go. The only people I really talk to nowadays are Havij and Mab- Havij is content with grunts and questioning glances, and Mab accepts one word replies and carries the entire conversation on herself. (This holds even while she’s teaching, because she finds six or seven examples of the same concept and just keeps giving me new ones, or new twists on them, until I start implementing them myself. Really, just- astonishingly good at teaching.) Usually, it’s not talking I’m doing with Havij; Mab talks enough for five whole people; and I’m usually barking orders at Beatrix… as for the rest of the crew- Hell’s belles!

Those fucking meddlers! They’re all hiding around, watching us train even though they know Beatrix hates being watched like a show- goddammit! I can’t even be sure of how long those assholes have been eavesdropping on me and my student, either- could have been the whole session, could have been just seconds- Gah!

I make a sound a bit like when Udoroth steps on one of the dog’s squeaky toys at three hours after midnight because he needs to piss; a squeak, and a muffled curse. Why do I make that noise? Well, a pair of cold, muddy arms are wrapped around my waist and a hot little face is pressed hard to my chest- aaagh, water’s soaking through my vest…

Wait, this is- Beatrix, she’s… hugging me?

I freeze, still shuddering because I fuckin’ hate dirt- but- what the actual flying fucklet?

“Hoooooi!” I yelp, alarmed, trying to get her to let go of me without actually touching her. Where’d the shy girl who couldn’t even look at me go? “Geroff! What am I, a cuddle buddy?”

“The cuddliest buddy to ever bud,”

“Uuuugh,”

“You walked right into that one, my man.”

She’s not going to let go anytime soon- aw, hell, she’s crying. She’s not letting go any time soon.

I pat her back gently, panicking because- uuuugh, snot, snot on my chest, ew ew ew-“Beatrix, either let go or tell me why in hell you’re getting sNOT on my chest-” ew ew ey ew ew fucking Gods make it quick- oh thank the Gods. Beatrix let go of me, praise be to all that is good, but while she seemed embarrassed as she argh argh argh blew snot and blood out of her nose directly onto the ground with just her fingers, she stayed huddled by my side. She looks so much more relaxed now- more relaxed in my presence than she has been at any other time over the past two weeks.

“...Do you think I can?” Beatrix finally said, staring directly at me, blood dripping down over her lips and her bright red Mark like Uدورoth’s somehow still visible under a liberal coating of drying dirt and muddy chunks. Her red eyes weren’t frustrated or coal-like intense, they were hopeful; her messy muddy hair flopped pathetically over her indigo headband, and I only know it’s indigo because the mud didn’t get into the folds.

Look at Beatrix’s eyes- so hopeful.

I roll my eyes and glare at her. “Did my words go straight through the empty space where your mind should be, just- in one ear and out the other? Does it really fuckin’ matter what I think?”

“Yes. It does,” said Beatrix, point blank and so honest it made my teeth sting. For this one moment, I could see the potential Mab must have seen; for just a split second, I can see Uدورoth, standing where Beatrix is. The resemblance is gone as quick as it came; Beatrix blinks and averts her eyes from mine- then her eyes come right back to me, and her nervous expression firms. “Your opinion is important to me. Do you think I can? If I find my resolve- do you think I can be… something?”

I snort. “Like I fuckin’ said already, I can see your potential. If I thought you weren’t worth training, I wouldn’t waste three hours a day training you. Since that’s exactly what I’m fuckin’ doing, you’re not going to - you will. Got it?”

For the first time since I met her, Beatrix smiled. It’s small, and more crooked than I would expect from someone her height and age. It lights up her face and makes her fierce muddy self suddenly, inexplicably beautiful; and it’s obvious from how open and genuine it is, well, Beatrix doesn’t smile unless she means it.

I snort again, and shove her shoulder gently- back towards the bench, where she left her swords.

“If we’re quite finished with this feelings jamboree, get back to work. I expect you to kick some ass in the next group spar, so you’d best start telling your anger and self-doubt to fuck off. You’re getting better every day; there’s no reason to hold yourself back, understand?”

Beatrix scratched a chunk of dirt off her neck, then nodded vigorously; she picked up her swords, and then yelped and got into a proper stance, fucking finally- I’ll keep frightening her until she can’t do anything else when faced with an enemy, that’s the whole point of learning to do it right until you can’t do it wrong-
“Start your fucking running kata drills!” I growl at her. “Your stamina is so fuckin’ weak it makes me wanna pitch myself inta th’open jaws of a damn Sea King. If you don’t finish all thirty in the next ten minutes, I’m making you do wind sprints.”

I wait for her horrified yelp to turn into sweat effort; and then, I turned my gaze.

“Keep going,” I barked when Beatrix glanced over. As she continued her work, I casually mosey over to the mainmast. I halt about a half step away, consider my next move, and then my more impulsive side wins.

Dracule Taffeta is getting a piece of my damn mind.

In one aggressive burst, I leap and crack my wings down in a rush of air, coming level with Taffy where she’s lurking, wide eyed, on a nook of the mast, and bring my foot directly into the soft meat of her gut.

She pitches over, and crashes onto the deck. Beatrix yelps.

I roll over, and land light as a feather on the ground. Taffy shoves herself up and pukes everything out of her stomach.

I crack my neck.

“There are a few things I just can’t stand,” I said with deceptive mildness. “Liars, thieves, murderers—often, a reasonable justification can be found for those things. Spies and peepers, on the other hand...”

Taffy locks wide yellow eyes with me, little dribbles of saliva and puke still running down her chin. I look her dead in the eye and smirk viciously. “I can’t stand them most of all.”

On the Train to Cloudsdale Station, Five Days in One Entry

Dearest Journal,

Taffy’s remedy worked a treat, and we’ve been on the train to Cloudsdale for a good twelve hours or so— the whole night, praise Luna, though I will say that the bed was both lumpy and small.

It will be quite a while until our first stop, in the Unicorn Mountains— it gives everyone a chance to stretch their legs, as well as repair anything needful of repairing. I, myself, am repairing something—really, considering it’s state, I’m actually making an entirely new one.

My Aunt Ravel and her special marefriend, Zipper, are the ones who helped me leave Trottingham after the- This pattern is my Aunt Ravel’s, and I’m making a new one as a comfort for myself. Aunt Ravel and Auntie Zipper gave me a plaque for my studio, wherever I end up settling down- it’s a simple bit of cross-stitching on a wooden frame, meant for hanging on the wall.

It says:

If I can stop one heart from breaking,
I shall not live in vain.
If I can ease one life the aching,
Or cool one pain,
Or help one fainting robin,
Unto his nest again,
I shall not live in vain.

My Aunts wish me, and my foal-to-come, a better life than could be found for us in Trottingham. My Aunts have not lived their lives in vain- and so, I can only hope that I won’t either.

The original shawl was pony sized, at seven hooves long by sixteen and a half wide; that is, pony hooves. My hooves are several times bigger than that- but the proportions of the shawl will be correct if I use the same numbers.

The exact gauge of the yarn used is not critical, but it works best with a one-hoof, or ten centimeter, gauge. The finished fabric ought to be light and airy; use a mohair yarn, or any of the pegasus yarns, to give it a cloudy, light, and fluttery frog. This is a fairly easy pattern, requiring one skein of appropriate yarn, measuring to a length of (three hoofs a leg; three legs a yard) two hundred eighteen yards at one hundred grams per skein- or, in my case, as my hooves are three times the size of an average pony, you must triple the amount of yarn, and expand the pattern.

I will be using three skeins of self ombreing seventy percent mohair, twenty six percent wool, and four percent silk, or six hundred fifty four yards of one color yarn in that distribution of fibers, at one hundred grams per skein.

I am using size fifteen circular needles, at least two hooves long- and yes, they are sized lengthwise to my hooves, the size chart of needles refers to it’s gauge, or width around.

I will write out the instructions as I have them written, and then elaborate on their meaning.
CO 7 sts.

Garter:

Row 1: K2, yo, ktend (8sts)

Mark RS with pin.

Repeat until half yarn used; end after working a WS row.

Eyelets:

Row 1(RS): K2, yo, k1, (yo, k2tog) to last 3 sts, k3.

Do not worry about extra plain stitches at end of row before last 3sts; just knit.

Rows 2, 3, and 4: K2, yo, knit to end of row.

Repeat 1 - 4 until twelve yards of yarn remain. End after plain row.

(If preferred, switch to plain garter stitch in center after working five or six eyelet rows for solid border at top edge of shawl.)

BO loosely; weave in ends.

Shawl does not need to be blocked; wash and lay flat to dry if needful.

In elaboration:

Cast on seven stitches.

For the garter portion of the piece:

Knit two, yarn over, knit to end (it should be eight stitches).

Mark the right side with a pin.

Repeat the first two steps until half your yarn is used; end after working a wrong side row.

For the eyelet portion of the piece:

For the first row, knit two, yarn over, knit one, yarn over, knit two together to last three stitches, knit three. This pattern is fairly forgiving; extra stitches at this point will not matter in the completed piece. Simply knit two together, or knit until you come to the last three stitches, and follow instructions from there

For rows two, three, and four, knit two, yarn over, knit to end of row.

Repeat the four rows in order until about twelve yards of yarn remain. End this section on a plain row of stitching.

Bind off loosely; weave in ends with appropriate crochet hook or needle.

Blocking not necessary for this piece; wash and lay flat to dry if needful.

Blocking is the process of stretching a knitted or crochet piece, allowing it to take its actual shape and revealing the stitch pattern. I chose to make this piece on the train because it doesn’t require blocking; there’s no room for it on the train anyway.

As for the fact that the above pattern is sized for a pony, not a horse, that’s where resizing comes in.

Firstly, one must swatch the pattern with their yarn of choice to see how the fabric will behave once made. It’s a very important step in any knitting project; any time you start a new pattern, use a new yarn, or break in new equipment, it’s always best to do a swatch. Arithmetic can only take you so far; actually having something knitted in your hooves will tell you more about what can and can’t be done with your knitting or crochet pattern than anything else. It will tell you if you need to wash and block; it will tell you if you need to adjust your gauge, or even if your skills aren’t there yet.

I recommend swatching at least a hoof’s worth of fabric for an accurate measurement. Once you are satisfied with your swatch’s feel on your frog, you need to figure the number of stitches per row you will need. You do this by counting how many stitches per row you have in your one hoof swatch.

I cannot, for the life of me, write this out- I’ve never been able to. I can explain it in pony; I can demonstrate it. I can even walk somepony else through it, if need be- but I cannot, for the life of me, write it in words.

Frankly speaking, knitting and crochet aren’t things to learn from books- you have to do them to understand what’s happening.

However, I have managed to finish my new shawl, and just in time- we’ve stopped in the Unicorn Mountains for an engine switch, and the weather without is brisk! My new shawl pins and shawl prove their muster immediately, in the sharp gusts of wind. Taffy, poor mare, shudders with every gust, until I placed my hefty self between her and the prevailing- this seemed to work quite well. A purchase of hot apple cider for both of us kept us in high spirits while the engines were switched; and I was able to purchase a new almanac for the year, with broad weather forecasts for the wide country of Equestria, and the climate notes for each major city- oouf!

If I’m reading the almanac correctly, the weather is going to be worse in Cloudsdale Station- I’ve been before, and it’s always foggy and cold there, excepting around the Summer Sun. Hm. And it’s going to be worse still in Vanhoover- it sleets there nearly every day, when it’s not foggy or windy. Oh, yes, I bought a tourist guide for Vanhoover for Taffy- she seemed curious, and then very apprehensive as she read more of it on our next few days of travel. I, myself, purchased a Cloudsdale Station guide for myself- we traded them after reading, thus avoiding buying two of the same book.

One of the many perks of having friends.
I busied myself thusly, during our ride south: I took measurements of her legs, from knee to pastern, measured her barrel and chest... I even got Taffy to pick out a manestyle she likes from my stylebook, so I could start on her manepick.

As for her other measurements, after deciding on a pale undyed wool, I began work on a set of warming garments for her- an infinity cowl, a shawl much like mine, and a set of four leg warmers that button up the side to obviously separate them from the lingerie styles of socks, which cover the hoof and go up to the elbow and stifle, front and back... Perhaps she’d like a hat as well? A chullo, I think; and I’ll make another cowl for her brother, and a hat as well.

According to Taffy, her brother Hawkeye is a good two hooves taller than her; that’s enough for me to make a judgement about how to resize the pattern. Taffy actually has a set of pins for a shawl and scarf or collar- a gift from her brother last Hearthwarming; she’s just been putting off getting things to actually put those pins on, as she didn’t need them.

Silly mare; still, it’s always nice to have another project to work on while I’m waiting.

I don’t mind setting certain things to stitch with a spell; cowls and leg warmers are basically rectangles, and those can be woven by spell just fine. It’s just telling a mage hoof to repeat a certain series of actions a set number of times- nothing I can’t do by hoof, but I need to begin working on the manepick.

Nested spell manepicks used to be commonplace during the Three Tribes era, but after the Unification, they fell out of favor as Unicorns began adopting Earth Pony and Pegasi methods of mane care.

There are three basic spells that go into a mane pick; a spell to clean and condition the mane, a spell to detangle and section the mane, and a spell to style it. I’m etching the spell matrix for each spell into a discrete set of gem shards, and carefully inlaying them in the smooth wood of the manepick.

First, the cleaning and conditioning spell in shards of turquoise, as both stone and spell fall under the school of health; second, the detangling and sectioning spell in shards of carnelian which isn’t as good as amethyst but the look of the manepick has just as much importance as it’s effectiveness- and further, zebra manes tend to self section along the stripes. Both stone and spell fall under the school of peace, by the by...

As for the third, the styling spell itself in a combination of citrine, aventurine, and moonstone- the first two for just her mane, the last for the mind underneath it. Combined, stone and spell fall under the school of wonder.

Tie off the loose ends of every spell you cast; never, ever, leave them open.

I presented Taffy her new set of garments, as well as her manepick, at breakfast today. She was overjoyed to receive them; apparently, she budgeted for traveling, food, accommodations, and medical supplies- all of which are totally necessary for a mare traveling alone. Me giving her warmer garments was a huge relief to her- she hadn’t been able to save enough money to commission or purchase a set and keep up with her itinerary.
I do enjoy doing things for others, especially when it’s needful; ah, Journal, we’re pulling in to Cloudsdale station for a two-day layover.

Best Love; Meadow Surprise

Cloudsdale Station, Early Spring; Day Trip to the Ruins of Delphi

Dearest Journal,

Taffy and I took accommodations in Cloudsdale Station when our train from the Crystal Empire finally arrived, well after sunset. We had agreed during the ride down that we would take the opportunity to go on a day trip to the famous Ruins of Delphi, where the pegasus poet Delphinus Wake used to perform plays and poems that are still performed today.

Cloudsdale is often considered to be the oldest of all pegasi cities, chiefly because while it’s skybound portion is still in full use, it’s land based districts are all given over to farmland, woods, and ruins. It’s mostly tourists like myself and Taffy who go and explore them- as most pegasi, sorry to repeat a stereotype- but most pegasi have little lasting interest in affairs on the ground. Why should they? They’ve wings, and all pegasi can manipulate the weather… saa, I’ve gotten off track.

Day tours through the Ruins of Delphi cost about eighty bits a pony; the high price is due to two things. Firstly, the tour provides trail shoes, which are not cheap to replace and someone will always either lose or ruin one, even if they’re my size; and secondly, they provide a full meal for something like thirty ponies, which doesn’t include the tour guides. I’m not so far along that I can’t go on the walking trail, and Taffy is very excited to see a Tourist Attraction.

However, before we went on the Ruin trail-tour, we went to the museum.

The Archaeological Museum and Library of Delphi shelters an extensive collection of artifacts- scrolls under careful preservation spells, ancient pegasi weapons, and astonishing objects, from urns to votives. All the items in the museum and library were unearthed during excavations at the Delphi Ruins, it’s vicinity, or were donated by local families seeking to preserve and share their legacy with others. It’s located on the Station side of Cloud’s Hillock, adjacent to the archaeological site, on the modern side of the little train-stop town.

The ‘Equestria Must See’ guidebook my Aunt Zipper gave me lists it as one of the top must-see museums in Equestria, mainly because of the breadth and quality of artifacts it includes. The permanent exhibition alone covers over a thousand years of art and upheaval, from the ancient Musteri Era to the Hurricane Renaissance.

Taffy and I spent a good three hours on our feet, wandering through the museum while it was open, admiring the ancient artwork of the pegasus tribe. Then, we went to the gift shop, for souvenirs! Well, the shop had the usual items- totes, quills, ink pots, posters; but, having read Aunt Zipper’s margin notes on the Ruins of Delphi, I plumbed for a pair of mare’s sun hats- a cute one for Taffy, and a very broad one for myself; the touristy part about them was, of course, the styling, which was in ancient pegasus tribe fashion… or sweetgrass country fashion, as there are only so many shapes that fit well on a pony’s head and shade their face from Celestia’s sun. I also bought us both over the neck water bottle holders, and the medium size bottle of water which are, according to Aunt Zipper, large enough to be worth carrying but not so large as to make carrying them a nuisance.

Aunt Ravel’s margin notes were about the most iconic Delphi souvenirs- our sun hats, for one; blue eye protective jewelry, believed by pegasi since ancient times to ward off windigos; a string of komboloi, more commonly known as worry-beads- Aunt Ravel wrote that nothing else held a chill-spell better for a teething foal, and that the strings only break when the one who wears them daily dies. Grim, but good to know; the last two items are actually three items- a Build Your Own Weather kit, and there’s a child’s version and an adult’s version; and a free catalogue for getting refills and other Weather Factory products, and I bought an adult’s version and the catalogue because it’s free- and finally, Pegasi folk art reproductions, and reproductions of famous objects d’art.

I bought, in order, our sun hats; a blue eye suncatcher for myself and a cuff bracelet for Taffy; a set of turquoise worry beads; a Weather Factory approved Build Your Own Weather Kit for adults; and a big yarn bowl with it’s own lid.

After our quick exploration of the Delphi Museum, which keeps the strangest hours I’ve ever had the misfortune of reading, Taffy and I joined our tour group and enjoyed a long, leg-stretching walk through the Ruins of Delphi.

It’s best to pace yourself, visiting a place like Cloudy Hill. It’s the site of an ancient city, ruined, true- but, if you give yourself time to really take in the scale of the ruins, if you let yourself absorb the wonders around you… well, once I got Taffy to slow down and just look, to see, her eyes went wide and her jaw dropped- because she could see it too.

The shadow of the ancient city of Delphi, rising above the quiet hills and valleys in the sunny lee of Cloudsdale; the echo of poetry and plays in an amphitheater, sunk into the good earth and o’ergrown with weeds; the ringing majesty of the winding vistas where wildflowers grew over bloody fields…

As it happens, Taffy has a camera- it’s one of her only just for fun expenses, getting film and having it developed whenever she stays in one place long enough. She and I took a series of beaming photographs of every beautiful site we saw; ruined columns, echoing hills and valleys, glad-hearted forests and winding trails up towering hillsides.

We lunched on alfalfa sprouts, wildflower blossoms, soaked beet pulp, rice bran, and garlic blossoms. Hearty fare, and good for sensitive stomachs; and then we had a long wander back to the station, Taffy and I, enjoying the cool yet bright day.

We slept again at the station, quite well worked from our lovely excursion; and then we boarded the train again for Vanhoover.

Best Love, Meadow Surprise

Vanhoover; Are you sure it’s still spring? It doesn’t feel like spring,

Dearest Journal,
Not much of note happened on the ride to Vanhoover, aside from a steady increase in dreary skies and stoicism in our passengers. Taffy took to wearing her legwarmers as soon as we get back across the Unicorn Mountains, and added her cowl when it began raining; by the time we actually got to Vanhoover, she’d added the shawl, and the hat I’d finished knitting for her.

I myself was well pleased with my shawl and not much else; and, once I retrieved my cart from the porters, I followed Taffy who herself was following a carefully marked map of the city.

Vanhoover sits on the west coast of Equestria. It’s the largest city in the county and, as a result of it’s coastal location, is a very important port. It’s climate is incredibly unpredictable by Equestrian standards; dreary weather is always on the verge of returning, and the wind here likes to play tricks.

It’s a popular city to live in because of it’s very mild winters- something about proximity to the oceans and the Unicorn Mountain Range blocking cold fronts from the city… Snow only falls on average, eleven days in Vanhoover; it rains and fogs much more often, so much so that the Weather Crews here put out percentage warnings rather than hard weather options. They always make an effort to keep the summers dry, sunny, and reasonably warm- especially as the Summer Sun approaches. It’s also usually warm enough for any sort of costume come Nightmare Night. Historically an Earth Pony city, Vanhoover is still mostly earth ponies- that’s usually what you’ll see on the street, alongside innumerable immigrants- camels, sphinxes, zebras, cows, sheep, goats, boars, yaks, and so on. There’s always work here for someone of strong disposition; so, this is a popular city for immigrants from Saddle Arabia, Yakistan, and even Minoa- all of which have native populations of equines, alongside their more foreign natives.

I’d happily stay here if it didn’t remind me so strongly of Trottingham.

Ah, Taffy soon took us through a side street into one of the many villages that Vanhoover swallowed as it grew; until, at last, we came to a fine townhouse. Taffy went up and met her brother- and then, the two of them helped me secure my cart in the carriage house built into the side of the townhouse.

Hawkeye Dracule is a zebra of different stripe than his sister, Taffeta- and I do mean that literally, no Zebra has the same stripe pattern as another. I also mean that metaphorically, as it takes a very particular kind of pony to be a surgeon- not a magisurgeon, a surgeon, as many of the unicorn magic based spells work as advertised on ponies but not other equines, even, much less those such as camels, yaks, and so on.

His job is to cut somepony open, fix whatever’s gone wrong, and then close them back up again. His specialty is tummies- he knows more about the digestive system of any creature on four legs (or two) you care to name than he knows about current events.

Point of fact, the only thing he knows anything like his trade is music- apparently, the doctors and nurses and surgeons in the operating room play records while they work.

He liked the cowl and hat I made him; apparently, it’s always in danger of being dreary in Vanhoover, and having a nice warm cowl-and-hat set at the ready is very good. He said he hasn’t had time, what with his working hours, to go get a set for himself- so me giving him a set as a gift…

It’s getting late, Journal; I’ll write more tomorrow.
Vanhoover; Oh, it's actually very nice out right now

Dearest Journal,

Vanhoover is far too expensive for my taste. It’s a large metropolitan city, the most welcoming of all Equestria’s cities- but... the downtown core is large, and offers an affluent arts scene, diverse foods, and innumerable sporting events.

It’s bounded by ocean and mountains that result in a moderate climate, allowing outdoor recreation year round.

The housing market in Vanhoover is the fastest paced in the country, and crime rates are higher than nearly anywhere else.

Hawkeye owns his house outright- and the only reason he can do that, Journal, is he’s a very busy, very good surgeon who works two hundred and sixty five out of three hundred sixty five days in the year. He doesn’t take vacations except the mandatory ones; he doesn’t get sick; and, were it not for his best friend, Longshanks Rojomane, and his marefriend, Heron Vondergeist, he would spend every off hour he has either sleeping or puttering around in his house.

According to him, the city has grown twice, noticeably, since he’s lived in it- and he’s lived here for fifteen years. -Oh, yes, this year he told us that Winter Wrap Up was late, something about a Weather Team strike… and if what we entered the city in under, a wet miserable sky and gloomy light… if that’s every winter…

I can’t stand it.

All the positives you can think of for living somewhere don’t matter if you don’t like it- if the rhythm of the place, it’s mood, do not agree with yours, then nothing- not even the presence of your family or a job or a school or an opportunity, can make you happy if you stay. I’ve spent far too much of my life grey and miserable to live somewhere grey and miserable, not permanently at least.

Enough of that- let’s see, I have not yet written about my cart yet. It isn’t a particularly good one- and it’s one of the things I actually set aside a significant portion of my savings to upgrade. Vanhoover, aside from being a metropolis, is one of the few cities where one can get nearly anything built to spec. I came to Equestria with what is, frankly speaking, a covered wagon- good enough for Trottingham, but as I will be spending a great deal of time on the road soon, I need something better.

I actually really like Hawkeye’s vardo, a stately and well cared for bowtop vanwain with crisp purple and magenta paisley designs painted on its sides, and cheery minty-green flowers around the door. Hawkeye let me borrow one of his books from Zebrica- it’s a book all about Traveler’s vanwains, and I’m truly grateful for his generosity.

The Zebrish vardo has evolved into one of the most advanced forms of travelling wagons; they’re prized for their practicality as well as their aesthetic design and beauty. There is no more iconic or recognizable Zebrish symbol than a highly decorated vardo—excepting perhaps their masks, or the habit of their shamans to speak in rhyming couplets.

A vardo is typically commissioned by families in lieu of a cutiecinera, by a newly risen master of a craft, or by a newlywed couple, from specialist coach builders. Building a vardo properly takes about three to six months, using a variety of woods— including oak, ash, elm, cedar, and pine. Vardos are prized by all equine travelers for their overall design and beauty, as well as their practicality. The general design of all vardos evolved over time and were named after the home’s owners, for their traditional style (Ledge), for the town of its construction (Reading), or for the name of the builder.

There are six design types. They are known by various names, but are perhaps best called the Reading, the Ledge, the Bowtop, the Brush, the Burton, and the Open-lot.

Bowtop vanwains are typically pulled by Zebrish Travelers, or by anypony lucky enough to be given the van upon the Zebra’s decision to put down roots; they’re the most iconic, and I’m least interested in them. There’s the Brush, which is nearly extinct now— often used by brush, broom, rush, and wickerwork makers; the Burton, which is often seen in circastics or with travelling showponies; and, the most modern of them, the Open-lot.

Being individually built by vanwrights, no matter their origin, no two vans are exactly alike. They vary according to use intended, customer requirements, available funds, materials used, skill and location of builder, and the time period— even the time of year the van is built plays a role. With that said, all vardos have certain exterior features in common, and with few exceptions the interiors conform to a set plan or layout. Thus, though there are many kinds of vans, the Zebrish vardo is always one-roomed on four high wheels, with a doorway (possibly with a door in it) and moveable steps in front (the Brush-style vardo being the only exception), sash windows, a rack called the cratch, and a pan-box at the rear. Only minor variations in design occurred after the Unification, with the exception of the Open-lot which was built in response to a general lessening of pegasi-xenophobia and a rise in inter-tribal marriages. Homemade vanwains, literal ‘peg-knife wagons’ tend to be along the same lines as the professionally built wagons, because the general design of the average vardo is just so perfect for what generally gets asked of it.

It’s also not uncommon for a traveler using the vardo to add or remove features of an old wagon, remount a body on underworks other than its own, or replace unsound wheels by ones that differ in weight, size, or structure from the original, thus altering the proportions.

Hawkeye actually had to go back to work about our second week into staying with him—apparently, he’s a bit of a workaholic. To be fair, most doctors—good ones, I’d say—are. Therefore, Taffy was the one to show me the interior of her brother’s vardo.

It actually belonged to their parents, who were lost at sea; they died right around the big shift in Zebrican culture that allowed orphans the option of keeping some of their parents larger possessions, rather than burning them all up as was custom.

Before I go into specifics, I must mention that neither Taffy nor her brother Hawkeye are particularly special, as zebras go; their parents were humble pots-and-pans sales and repair ponies, and their vardo was a pot-cart before Taffy went off to school. The only repair Hawkeye’s had done on it, according to Taffy, is fixing a few broken pieces of decorative filigree and getting new gargoyles.

The interior of the wagon has an atmosphere of snug homeliness, and the Dracule van is of very fine quality, giving it all a regal splendor. Almost everything a pony would need is to hoof. Even in winter, Taffy was never cold; the fire in the stove, if built up with the windows closed for half an hour (counted by candle-flame, no less!) will so heat the rails near the roof that they will be too hot to hold. Taffy has fond memories of baking cakes and cookies on the roof-rails in tins, and her brother getting them down for her once they came in from the cold.

Inside the vardo, the cabinet work may be either dark red polished mahogany or stained pine, and the walls are grained or scumbled in light golden brown. The Dracule van has had a long, adventurous life, and so most of the original wood finish has been painted over- but Taffy showed me the patch under the walk rug where the original finish has been protected these many years.

The internal layout, which varies only in the proportions from van to van, has not changed for a thousand years. The basic needs of the resident, after all, are still the same- and in such confined space, there are only so many sensible ways to meet those needs.

The entrance of the Dracule vardo is frontal and half-doored, to allow cool summer air into the van. Through the door on one’s immediate left, you will find a tall, narrow wardrobe and beneath it a small cupboard, generally used for hoof-picks, coat brushes, and wing-combs (along with a variety of hoof oils and conditioners). The stove stands next, and is always on the left as you enter- for on that side the chimney pipe is in less danger from roadside trees.

From a point about six hooves above the top of the stove, the fireplace is boxed in to form an airing and proofing cupboard. On the front of this cupboard and above the fireplace is a brass-railed shelf; and next to the stove is the offside seat, large and plush enough for a guest to sleep on, a useful feature- as I understand it, Longshanks Rojomane was travelling with the two off and on for years before Taffy gained her apprenticeship and Hawkeye went to medical school, at which point the vardo was in ‘Shanks care.

When Taffy looked into the storage beneath the offside seat, she discovered all her family’s photo albums, neatly tucked away- and she sighed. I spent a good half-hour helping her move the small shoebox full of unsorted photographs, as well as the several albums, into the kitchen. I then helped her sort through the photographs, making sure to take notes about the average- and not so average- measurements of them. We made a plan to go get actual albums the next day; and, when Hawkeye didn’t come home that night, well…

Taffy loves her brother, I know she does. Taffy also has no patience for his emotional constipation, and refuses to allow him to forget their shared past. I understand both sides of the argument, and refuse to involve myself beyond helping as a friend would- supporting her in buying new albums for the ones that are falling to pieces, and helping her make sense of the shoebox full of photographs, ranging from her and her brother’s foalhood, to her great-great-great grandparents wedding photographs.

As it turned out, I was able to help put the various photos into order, not by person to person- but by their clothing. I even managed to separate some of them out by year, and labelled them with approximate dates- with Taffy’s permission and some special archival ink from the Crystal Empire.

Even Heron Vondergeist, Hawkeye’s marefriend, helped out- she had been moving in with him when we came to stay for a while, and once she noticed our little project, she immediately started helping. She cleared off a shelf in the living room to put all the finished albums on, bought new albums as more and more pictures were curated and labelled, even helped put each photo into an album… and, of course, when Hawkeye finally came home with his friend, ‘Shanks, she talked him through the meltdown he had at seeing his parents again.

Taffy was barely out of diapers when her parents died; she doesn’t really remember them. Hawkeye, on the other hoof, had just gotten his Cute Stamp, and dearly loved his parents. He’s got a lot of trauma associated with these pictures—apparently, it was tradition in his family, before his parents passed, to go through the collection and tell stories about those pictured.

It was several days before Hawkeye calmed down enough to talk about the pictures; and longer still before he began sharing stories with Heron and Taffy about the people in the pictures. I listened in and dutifully wrote down the names and important details about each pony pictured.

That’s been the evening’s occupation for the past month or so, Journal. Ah, let me finish the description of the interior of the vardo before my candle burns too low-

To the right, as you enter, there is a bow-fronted corner cupboard; the top part, usually having glass or mesh doors, is used for storing perishable food and in the finer vardos, enchanted with cooling or stay-fresh spells. The cupboard below is for non perishables, utensils, and dishes, usually metal or wood.

Opposite the stove there is another locker seat, usually containing those cooking things that do not see often use or are too unwieldy or fragile to have out every day. Of a cold winter’s day it is good to sit at this seat, lean back, and rest your frozen hooves on the brass guard rail on the front of the stove; it’s also a nice place to dry out after a hard rain. Next to the seat, further in, there is a bow-fronted chest of drawers- this is where clothing, writing supplies, and other sundry goods are kept when not in use.

Filling in the back of the vardo is a two-bunked bed; the top bunk just below the rear window, and beneath are two sliding doors. These in the daytime shut away a second, less open bed-place in which foals sleep. Light is supplied at night from a bracket lamp above the chest of drawers, the surface of which is used as a table. More light may come from candles, or spelled gemstones.

After helping Taffy reconcile with Hawkeye, and their shared memories, the both of them decided to help me procure my own vardo— theirs being entirely too small, I could just about fit my head and shoulders through the door, but no more than that. As it happens, Hawkeye’s best friend, Longshanks Rojomane- Shanks, as he prefers- knows where a very high quality van could be procured, provided I have the funds. I do, as it happens- which is how I ended up meeting one of my cousins, Ace Spade- Ace, for short.

I also made a new friend, Mark Merryweather.

I’ll write more tomorrow, Journal; my eyes are starting to sting from the smoke, these are not good candles.

Best Love, Meadow

Galley and Van Builder’s Company, No.7, Garage 1; Purchasing A Vardo Today, Hooray!

Dearest Journal,

I mentioned yesterday that I made a new friend and met a cousin of mine. The two events are not
Ace works as a mercenary, in the employ of the Whitebeard Company; they’re known for their honor, their just dealings, their strength, and their commitment to the stallion they call ‘Pops’, Rich “Whitebeard” Guard of Newgate- apparently he began going grey in the whiskers as a foal, and the nickname stuck.

I suppose I ought to say it now- I’m a Master-level Spellweaver, which is not like other forms of magery available to a unicorn. A spellweaver literally weaves spells into fabric- a dying art, to be sure, but… well, I can’t help but brag on it a bit. In this day and age, spells usually get put into crystals or wood, or merely cast, and that’s fine- but if the crystal breaks, if the wood burns, if the caster looses their concentration, the spell falls apart, sometimes quite disastrously. A woven spell, on the other hand… well, think of it like this. Even if you put a great big hole through the center of a piece of fabric, it’s still a piece of fabric- depending on how quickly and carefully you patch or repair the hole, it can still be used for its intended purpose. After all, a scarf will still keep you warm, even if there’s a big hole at the end of it.

Similarly, even if there’s a big hole in the physical structure of a woven garment with a spell woven in, the spell will still work- not as well, and not for as long, but it will still work. Guardspony cloaks, most every saddlebag, yokes, baby things- all of these are bread and butter for the spellweaver.

Anyway, after helping my cousin in a way I know he’d be mortified to learn I wrote down- ask me in pony, if you want to know- I gained an invitation to meet his Pops, and get a contract with the Whitebeard Mercenary company as a contracted Spellweaver- they go through saddlebags and gun holsters like you would not believe, according to Ace. For a spellweaver such as myself, this represents an opportunity for steady, easy work- and as there will soon come a time where I will be unable to do much at all on my hooves or off, I need to secure such things as I can, as they come, now.

I explained the bare bones of my circumstances to Ace, and after talking him out of going after- well, I talked him out of it, as that really would be much too far to go for something like this. I did accept his offer of being the foal-to-be’s godfather, so that’s one thing settled- I know if anything happens to me, Ace will care for the one to come.

As for Mark- he’s the clerk who helped me get through all the paperwork needed for the purchase of my new home.

To start with, he helped me narrow down what I’d like my home to look like- warm colors, like my shawl and coat, with a sharper blue color to make the other colors pop and laugh lively. I needed something large enough for me, in a design that would resist tipping even on very uneven roads and terrains; something I could pull at my full speed, which is a comfortable run for most ponies. After a long discussion about what I’d need- somewhere to store my supplies, somewhere to sleep, somewhere for my foal-to-be to sleep, a table, all the necessary- a model began to take shape under Mark’s clever hooves, made of heavy cardstock and colorful paper and glue. For me, heavy decoration is not so important as strong, sturdy construction; leaving the decorations rather plain will allow me to set a variety of spells and enchantments into the wagon myself- I’m a unicorn, and a master spellweaver at that, what else would I do?

As for my secondary goal of keeping the price within reasonable limits, without sacrificing sturdiness or comfort- well, that meant the local pine, oak, and elm would see heaviest use, and the finer woods of mahogany, ash, and teak would have to be gone without.

Most of the actual work in making a wagon for somepony my size has been done already- while the Galley and Van don’t make such large vans often, they’ve done it enough to have all the jigs and things necessary for it already- as I understand, that’s half the work right there.

Then, the actual undercarriage was built- the wheels, the yoke, the stairs, the breaks- and there, the first enchantment I made! I linked a pair of shoes to a crystal which I set in the breakwheel, and I left myself a way to change the alignment of the spell from shoe set to shoe set- thus, when I do a specific pattern with my hooves, the spell engages the break, and the entire van slows down to a halt. I also, after some research and conversation with the fine stallions of Galley and Van, added a way to put my vardo into parking position without bending over or even getting out of harness, if need be.

The foreman for my van, Frank Starbuck, is very interested in the sheer number of spells I can learn, even more so in the set of books I found in the local library- a set of dusty tomes meant for the itinerant unicorn traveler, to lighten and ease their way. The majority of them are meant to be cast on vans and vardos after they’ve been built- but basic spell theory is a spell is more powerful if it’s put into an object at the time of its creation.

Anyway, I’ve gotten a lovely set of crystal lamps put onto the back porch, with double spells of dimlight, foglamp, and bugs-b-gone on them; and, as soon as it’s finished drying, another pair will go in front.

I was quite liberal with my use of cushioning and steadying spells in the base of the van; so much so that taking it on a preliminary run ‘round the yard with Franky on left him faintly nauseated-apparently, I went too far. I toned them down until he could tell he was moving, but only just- even when I pulled flat out, as hard as I could, he still barely felt a thing. The brakes also work a treat, and my new roadshoes are getting nicely worn in.

The walls are of box construction, insulated quite well with cloudy cotton batting, and I put spells in for insulation- a simple cantrip usually used for lunchboxes, but it scales remarkably well, hence it’s inclusion in the old unicorn wanderer’s guide. Without the spells, leaving the box out in the sun made the air within quite stuffy, even with the lack of window panes and solid doors; with them, even Taffy, who is still shaggy with her winter coat, felt quite at ease.

When the subflooring went in, so too did the first sound dampening spells; I don’t particularly like the sound of creaking wood as it travels over roads, and even Taffy seemed quite delighted by the change. Apparently, there’s nothing worse than a particularly heavy groan from the axles in winter waking one up when they’ve no reason for it. The bed structure, when it went in, got positively inundated with softening, quieting, and insulating spells- so much so that one of the apprentices, Fern something-something, fell asleep and couldn’t be found for a good four hours one day.

Cute filly; I didn’t know a fern and a hammer could be someone’s cutie mark, but who am I to judge?

The roof got soaked in anti-smoke and dust spells, because those rafters are where I’m going to be storing most of my unworked skeins. The purlins have little rows of outstretched hooks, shaped quite like antlers; I like them rather a lot.

The window and door jambs got the first half of the windcease spell put into them; and then, when the doors and windows were added- three windows, one on each side and one above the bed; one split-level door- the second half of the spell was added. The wash pan was included free of charge, since I’m doing so much of the enchanting and heavy horsepower jobs myself. As each new piece of furnishing was added- the drawers, the stove, the cabinetry- I added various spells that were of use. Soft-close spells, firebreak spells- as soon as the first layers of varnish went on, so too did the firebreak, the waterproofing (for the wood), protection from wood rot, fungus, and woodworm; each successive layer got it’s own bevy of spells, all quite the same. The roof got it’s own treatment of powerful anti fungal and waterproofing spells, right alongside the shingles, caulking, and so on.
Next came the fanciful designs, which I did not ask for- but apparently, when you help tear out loathed stumps, haul massive carts of wood, clean and mend all the curtains, and are gently encouraging to the young apprentices when they have meltdowns, you gain the adoration and respect of the stallions working on your vardo. Every time I look at my home again, one of those silly stallions has added another intricate piece of something, somewhere- Starbuck’s the worst, as is his apprentice, Fern, always finding little places to add yet more delicate carvings.

I think Starbuck’s been snitching from my personal design book, as well as taking cues from my cutie mark- why else would I find sunflowers where the lightest yellow’s going to go, and goldenrods where the darkest biting yellow is going; cosmos and coriander winding around the doors and windows, that’s Taffy’s influence; mint along the red parts, and even a small planter box, full of… well, mint is nearly unkillable, so… and coneflowers! All across the roofline! Hexagons and winding sinuous shapes- someone’s seen my drawings of bee dancing, and all of the dances are versions of ‘welcome home’- these stallions are so silly, so very silly-

Sorry for getting tears on you, Journal. Ah, they’ve also put in iconography of Vanhoover- frogs, hawks, hard edged curves and swerves… It’s all very beautiful, and it’s being painted beautifully, which means I can finally add the last few touches- a spell for health, a spell for love in the home, a spell for safe travels… and then, today, it’s done.

The nights are still cold enough to need a warm blanket; and down nearer the coast, the winter hasn’t actually ended, as they’re on a slightly different schedule due to the water. Thus, for the purposes of field testing, I’m to take my mostly finished vardo to the seaside for a vacation. I’ve a list of things to do, and a list of things to look out for that can be changed; and, for the sake of checking the ride of the interior, I have to take friends with me.

I, personally, think that everyone just wants Hawkeye to take his bucking vacation already; Taffy came with me to most of my vardo building appointments, because she’s very interested in this part of her culture. She also began to complain, at great length, about her brother not taking his vacation time seriously.

We all got tired of it about the third day in, and it lasted the entire five weeks it took to build my vardo, even with all the added fancy woodwork. So. I’ve made a plan.

First, I talk to Heron and Shanks, to get Hawkeye packed and to get supplies for my vardo; then, I talked to Taffy, to make sure he wouldn’t have a bad reaction to my plan; and then I talked to his superior at the hospital, who was also quite exasperated by Hawkeye’s resistance to actually taking a break.

Then, today, I kidnapped him. He’s actually on my back as I write this, and is sulking quite adorably. I’ve invited Heron, Shanks, Taffy, Frank Starbuck, and Mark Merryweather to come along on our beach trip- Starbuck agreed so long as young Fern and his other apprentice, Carrot Sundae, could come along. I agreed, of course- it’s always fun to have young ponies along on a beach trip, they seem to get more out of it.

Ah, time to go get Taffy, and purchase a stove- a relatively quick errand, but, well, Hawkeye’s vardo needs a new stove and neither of the zebra siblings know how to purchase one. I do- and I don’t mind teaching them, as I buy my stove and insert for my vardo.
The type of stove you need depends on what you’re doing- if you’re going about with a vardo, you need a stove; if you’re just by yourself with saddlebags, you need a saddle stove. The two are only interchangeable in basic applications. Which type you need is determined by the space available, weight restrictions, and what you’re willing to cook. Stoves are large, heavy, and require a lot of wood or charcoal to burn steady- but, they can do everything a home stove and oven can do, accommodate standard kitchen cookware, and are very durable.

Saddlebag stoves are designed to be efficient. This could mean they’re efficient for their size and weight, or just use fuel extremely efficiently. Some saddlebagging models are designed solely to boil water, while others can simmer and cook food. Most saddlebag stoves are not that stable even flat, and tip over easily. The saddlebag stove is a useful tool regardless- perfect for boiling water quickly, or creating a small amount of heat as needed.

I have three pots (a two quart saucepan, a two and a half hoof saute pan, and an eight quart stock pot), a low skillet, a large metal bowl with a hole-y lid, various utensils, and a number of baking things- sheet pans, muffin tins, and so on. Thus, I need a stove.

There are six key features to consider when purchasing a new stove: weight, the stove door, fit and finish, positioning, safety, and fuel needs. Each thing has some bearing on the safety of the stove, it’s fuel costs, or the amount of heat it can give out.

Weight is determined by the weight of material that stove is made, as well as from the size of the stove. For some ponies, shopping for a stove by weight is a reasonable way to choose, especially if you’re saddlebagging or hauling a smaller wagon. However, for long term use, weight is not the best method of selection. Lighter weight stoves are lighter because they are either smaller in terms of dimension, made from thinner gauge materials, made from lighter materials, or some combination of all three.

Some ponies use thinner gauge materials to make their steel stoves lighter; this can be very dangerous, as when the material making anything is too thin, you run a higher risk of failure. For stoves, this means warping, and failure to perform in severe conditions. Finally, a lighter stove may produce less heat than you need to keep warm in cold weather; and in worst cases, can be the cause of a fire or smoke inhalation injuries.

My first piece of advice to the zebra siblings, then- do your best to choose a heavy stove, one that has thick walls and suits your purpose- be it saddlebagging or vardo living, or even for home use- the same list of things still applies. The most important thing is to have the right stove for your uses, and build a fire in it properly.

The second thing to consider is the stove door. It’s important to look carefully at the door of any new stove you’re considering, since the design and fit of the stove door can make or break your stove. The door must be high quality, with a tight seal- airtight is best, as it give the most control over your fire, adds years of use to your stove by preventing overheating and reducing warping, and keeps the quality of flame high. A cheap, poorly made door allows air to leak into the stove, which makes controlling the fire within almost impossible.

A proper stove door will help your fuel burn cleaner, as the process of turning dry wood to charcoal is much faster with a well-fitting door. A proper door will also create enough turbulence for the fire to draw properly, and recombust the hot gases released by the wood as it burns.

My second piece of advice- a heavy, well fitted door is safer than a thin flimsy one. The door to the stove does more than keep the fire in; it helps direct airflow, keeps smoke from filling the area, and keeps the stove from warping.
The fit and finish of any potential new stove is important to see first-hoof, before you buy it. You must be able to trust the stove with your life; did the craftspony take care with their work? Did they use all the safety features they ought have? The door must have a high temperature gasket, to truly be airtight; there must be a baffle, to spread the flame across the top of your stove evenly and keep it from going directly up the stove pipe; you must be able to damper your stove to a low flame without smoke coming from the seams; and least important but not unimportant, you must like the look of your stove. You’ll be living with it a good long while- you must like it, like standing in front of it, like what you purchase.

My third piece of advice- be conscious of the crafting that went into the stove. It’s more than just aesthetic and personal preference- it must be a well made piece of equipment.

The position of the stove is important too. It must have proper clearance from combustibles- at minimum, six hooves all the way around, on all sides, or if it’s against a wall, there must be a fireproof insert behind and below it. If you have a storage box for kindling or charcoal, it must either be far enough away from the stove so as not to spontaneously catch flame, or be enchanted to keep the contents within from taking on too much heat- I, personally, am going to be going with the second option, as I’ve already put a cold-spell on my perishables cupboard. If you’re using your stove in a tent or a camp, put it in the center.

Fourth piece of advice- fire safety is important no matter what!

Fifth piece of advice- FIRE SAFETY IS IMPORTANT NO MATTER WHAT!

The andiron is a horizontal bar that is used to support the logs that get fed into the flames. Very important to keeping a fire going all night long; the andiron allows for air flow through the burning logs. The stoker is used to hook, rake, or push burning materials in your fireplace. Not every stick burns up cleanly; that’s what a tool is for. The bellows allow you to deliver controlled gusts of air to specific parts of your fire; increasing the flames without you losing your breath or getting your face too close to the flame. The shovel allows you to move piles of burning material, or piles of ash, in your fireplace. Tongs, like the stoker, help you move burning logs in your fireplace or stove. Finally, the broom is for sweeping bits of ash and soot back into the fire, and sweeping ash out when everything’s burnt out.

As for actually building a fire, it is best to keep a supply of tools available at the site of the stove. Highly flammable things, such as dried grass or oilpaper; wood shavings; kindling, like twigs and small sticks; small pieces of cordwood; and a way of striking a flame, such as matches, spark-stones, or a candle-lighting cantrip. Keep these things in a box, well away from the open flame when a fire is struck; and replace them after each new fire started.

To make a fire, separate a full hoofull or two of dried grass or full sheet of oilpaper. Bunch and compress them, and lay them on the bed of the fire box just in front of the door. Lay a few half-hoof strips of wood shavings on top of the flammables, and place several pieces of small kindling wood or dry bark on top of the shavings. Finally, a piece or two of cordwood split to about a half hoof diameter on topmost. Open the vent as far as they’ll go, and light the fire.

After the cordwood ignites and burns for several minutes, add one or two larger pieces of wood. Be sure to flip and bunch the burning debris together before adding the larger pieces. Keep the air vents open for several minutes or until the larger pieces are well ignited; then, adjust the vents according to the desired heat output of the stove.

At night, when it’s time for bed, banking the fire is a must especially when the following morning promises to be bitter cold. To do so, one must let the logs in the wood stove burn down to the coals; fully open the flue, and use a fireplace shovel or similar tool to rake the coals to the center of the stove; place one or two small logs on top of the coals; completely cover the logs and coals with ashes from your ash pail. The wood stove should be dark once you’ve finished; then, turn the flue down so it’s mostly closed - you’ll want a little air to get through, but not too much. In the morning, open the flue, and scoop as much of the ash as you can back into the ash bucket. The wood you had placed on the coals will now probably be gone, and in its place should be lots of glowing coals. Rake the coals forward, and place two or three logs behind the coals. The coals will relight the fire; and thus, a successful banking is performed.

Sixth piece of advice - learn to build a fire properly! There are six tools you’ll need - an andiron, a stoker, bellows, hot coal shovel, tongs, and broom. A fire is not just a pile of sticks set ablaze; building one and keeping it banked at night requires practice.

By the end of my purchase, I’d picked up Shanks and Heron, the both of them laden with heavy saddlebags. Shanks had all the food and toiletries I’d asked him to buy for me - I gave him money and a list with little ticky boxes next to each item, and he showed up about halfway through my calm explanation of how to purchase a good stove, eyebrows high under red bangs. Heron joined us after I’d purchased the stove, reapplied the stickyback charm and firmly stuck Hawkeye to my withers, and returned to the building yard for my vardo.

Ah, Ace added himself to our outing - apparently, he wants to keep an eye on me. Sweet, silly stallion…

Installing the stove, and the charcoal box underneath, and the ash pail with it’s own lid, and all the stove tools, takes a bit less than half an hour - the door wasn’t hung quite yet, you see, and wouldn’t be until all the final tweaks had been attended.

My seat cushions and mattress are all clouds - literal clouds, actually. The perks of being a spellweaver - weaving a cloudwalking spell into three seat cushion covers and a mattress cover is simple enough, and with the spell, store bought seat covers and bedding is just fine - or, in my case, using what I brought from home - for my bed, at least.

Proportionally, each seat is fully large enough to comfortably sleep an average pony; and my bed could sleep a group of six, with plenty of room to spare. I’ve got a few projects, and the majority of my things - but I won’t completely move in and settle until my vardo’s finished.

As for what I actually asked everyone to pack - well, Journal, that depends on the type of trip you take as well as how far to your destination, and what you’ll be doing when you get there. Before departing, one must of course check the weather schedules for where you are, where you’re going, and the route you’re taking - should be fine weather, but there’s a chance of cold fog as we near the coast. Even if the forecast is perfect, one ought be prepared for sudden storms and unexpected winds.

Once we arrive, I expect I’ll be setting camp securely before I even consider leisurely activities like exploring tide pools or making sandcastles. We won’t be camping directly on the beach, but rather at a campground a half hour or so away from the beach, clear of the stony shore.

For food, though we all have dreams of beetroot tartare and herb salads on the beach, those aren’t practical options when living in a vardo by the shore - sand gets into absolutely everything, after all. One-pot meals of tubers and beans, chilis, pasta dishes - these, fruit, small cheeses, pickles… things that can be prepared in a covered pot or not at all are best.
Sand will still get into absolutely everything, however.

First on my list, a tarpaulin that can attach securely to my vardo, along with stakes to securely anchor it into the ground, and another tarpaulin for groundcover- I almost asked for stakes, but two tarps and some rope should be just fine. I also asked for sleeping mats, and an extra blanket.

Lamp crystals, flashlights, bug repellent- incense, and stuff we rub into our coats- as well as sunscreen are always a must at the beach. If you’re staying past sunset, that’s when all the bugs come out- and beaches are always much darker than they seem. I purchased some folding chairs myself, ones meant to fold down very very small indeed, as well as a beach umbrella with sand anchors. Sturdy trash bags, a small broom to sweep sand out of the vardo… nothing I’m bringing can’t be brought out.

I’ve unloaded my kettle, and my tea pot; my set of wooden bowls and plates; my four cooking knives, a chef’s knife, a small paring knife, a long serrated bread knife, and a carving knife. Nothing goes through giant radish roast better, after all. Then there are my baking tools- mixing bowls, measuring spoons and cups, mixing utensils, spatulas, baking pans and trays, parchment paper, piping supplies, pastry brushes, little bowls… a cake stand, and a small box of toothpicks. Then of course there’s my multi tool, complete with knife, can opener, basic pliers, and corkscrew. We’ll be gathering driftwood once we’re there, but we’ll need to take along firewood and charcoal for the journey there and back…

As for food and water- my water jack, which saw me through Trottingham, is still in nearly new condition, and still enchanted to weigh nearly nothing and hold far more than it should. I’ve made pickled lemons, for a pickled lemonade one of my penpals from Golia taught me, very good for hydration; Shanks got the food for a variety of one pot meals, as well as a multitude of fresh fruit, loaves of bread, veggies good for sandwiches, fruit, milk, eggs, butter, flour, sugar, spices, vanilla extract, yogurt, tea, salt… I, myself, got refills of my particular mixture of supplements, to keep healthy.

Everyone is to bring a swimsuit, broad brimmed hat or flat hat that covers the neck, a lightweight rain or wind jacket, quick drying towels, your warm winter articles just in case of a sudden storm off the sea, sunglasses, toothbrush and toothpaste, sea-safe soap, sunscreen, bug repellent, and whatever medicines are needed.

Oh, yes- as for toys… frisbees, balls, snorkeling gear if they’d like, life jackets if they can’t swim well… and a camera if anyone wants to record precious memories.

Ah, yes- and I told the bees of our upcoming beach trip. They seemed quite exuberant- I assume to taste the lovely new beach flower flavors.

Ah, Journal, everyone’s finally finished packing and running off to get one last thing- I’ve only to put Hawkeye to bed in the vardo as he’s fallen asleep on my withers, and then we can be off. I’ll write again once we’ve either stopped for the night or have arrived.

Best Love, Meadow
crewmate onto a ship too small to fit all of us that need to go is a new one on me.

“-Do we really have to do this, Fern?”

“It’s this or let Stacey try it on her own- she won’t make it back if she goes alone, Havij. You’ve got what you need?”

“Yeah- I finished the Starmetal Weapons a few days ago; I’ve got my weapons; and we’re all wearing battle gear.”

Mab makes things for us long before we ever indicate a need- and apparently she makes battle costumes first. Havij is in a purple raglan with three-quarter sleeves, black modesty shorts with roses on them, purple suspender skirt that’s got weird… it’s sturdier than it should be, to move the way it does. White knee socks and purple jelly shoes finish her clothing- she’s a sword-and-shield fighter, she needs to be lightweight more than anything.

I’m wearing… well, I started with my black tuxedo striped green tights, followed by a dark green v-neck romper; thick black socks and a pair of hightops I’ve been wearing every day anyway; as for my Tarot Device, well… the finished Device, in it’s dormant state, looks like a pair of hair pins, a simple pair of stud earrings, a thin cloth choker necklace, and a strange little green booklet. What goes on my body goes on my body, the hair pins keeping my hair smoothly back from my face…

I’ve been spending the past month uploading everything in the Primagicals into my Device- and I finished it all up last week. I’ve got a portable basic mystical library on my hip, and I’ve already got most of the other spells I wanted loaded in…

I’ve still got everything I needed back when I was rescuing the Old Four- I’ve got my component pouch, which got redesigned to be less whimsical and more functional. I’ve got my crystal orb in my Illusion pocket, the frog skull is in Necromancy, my Device tablet has its own dedicated pocket on my hip, leaving the Divination pocket open for incense and a small number of six-sided dice; I traded Havij my unused transmutation bracelet for her Toadstone Armlet, which we both were quite pleased with; it turns out my Evocation wand is special- hopefully I won’t have to use it’s battle form, but one never knows; I traded the enamel pins I never used for Abjuration to Havij so she could make a small form for her weapons- I actually made a collection of charms for Abjuration myself, which resonate with me much more than the pins ever did; I carved myself a new cup for Conjuration after breaking the old one- same style, just new; I have brush pens, chalk, and waxy crayons for Enchantment- the bag gets left at home; two gourd-shaped bottles on either side of the spell bag, with… special things in them...

There’s Gally. I really hate it when this shit happens-

“Okay, what the hell- what the actual fucking hell is going on, here? Because Captain told us that we were to stay and protect the ship-”

“It’s more than they can handle, Gally- if we don’t go now-”

“You can’t know that, Fern-”
“Yes, I can-”

“Fern-”

“Gally, they’ve been gone five days now! Five! They haven’t called, they haven’t sent anyone back- something is wrong. Stacey had a twin thing this morning; I’m getting nasty omens; and Havij is sleepy. She’s a Dreamer, Gally-”

“Shit. Shit, shit shit- okay, okay. I don’t have any fancy clothing like the rest of you, but I can’t let you go without going-”

“You totally do have a battle costume, though- Coco, you here?”

“Yes,”

“HOLY FUCK-”

“Show Gally her battle costume, help her get ready- would you, please?”

“No problem; oh, and I found Bryony’s too, much lighter than you’d think-”

“Nice. Did you get her lasoo?”

“You’re going to have to do that one, companero- I can’t even look at it without starting to sweat, and that’s across a room,”

“Shit-”

“Oh, the rope? I can get that-”

“Eh?” “Really?”

“Sure, I have to move it all the time anyway, it falls during the night and I always have to pee-”

“That’s you then- explain the plan to her, would you, Coco?”

“Sure thing; c’mon, Gally, let’s get you set-”

Coco’s managed to transform from stitch witch to rag ninja - with a giant needle and thread sword, ready to stitch her enemies into bloody pieces. The Needle Sword, Nuibari, is the first Starmetal weapon Havij made- more a proof of concept than an actual anything, she mostly made it to see if she could make a sturdy piece of starmetal with a mortal-sharp point.

She can.

Stacey, in bike shorts, a tank top, and an island-print button up worn like a jacket, puts another flurry of kicks and punches into the air; the metal on her hands and feet gleams with cruel promise. The Grip and Climbers, Paws and Claws, are the second Starmetal weapons Havij made; really, they’re meant for navigating the Otherside’s weirder expanses, not necessarily fighting, but when the roll of Starmetal weapons came out, well, that’s what Stacey picked. Her gold tipped head-gill wing things slice through the air- I think she can fight with them, too, even though they seem so delicate…

Havij remade her sword and shield next, after Neo broke them sparring; Hammer is still Hammer, but with a harder edge and some indefinable difference in balance I have to accept on faith. Tongs, on the other hand, became Anvil- the shield is much heavier, and it’s round where before it was more… kite shaped? I think? I don’t know much about shields- I do know, however, that she can throw it like a discus and it comes back to her like a boomerang. It’s all very cool.

Holy gods and beasts of heaven, Gally! I- I need to take it in pieces before attempting to process it all in one go.

Start with the hair- it’s a quiff, higher and more aggressive than any I’ve seen with long tresses left to trail down her back, festooned with gently clinking lengths of crystal and chain. Then it’s body chains intermingling with some sort of crystal bikini top, a belt with long tassel-chains dripping over her thighs, chains and crystals that cling to her thighs, crystal shin guards that flicker and spark with their own inner light, white crystal shoes that are flat and dainty; crystal armbands, crystal gloves, over a tiny blue bikini, a crystal bikini what the fuck; and… a strange sort of wand? It looks more like an arrow...

She looks like… I don’t even know, a crystal elf warrior? Extremely sexy?

Double check we have everyone- there’s me, who’s feeling increasingly underdressed for this event; Stacey, who looks like she’s about to crawl out of her own skin, or possibly go to a fight-club themed barbeque; Gally, who took sparkling crystals as the main part of her battle attire and not the embellishment; Coco, the literal scrap ninja with a needle for a sword; Havij, who is wearing those enamel pins like collar pins, and will draw her sword and shield as needed; and Bryony, who is being changed into one of her many, many battle costumes holy shit that’s how big her tits are what the FUCK - and that’s, uh, h-h-hello-

“H-hey, Usopp-”

“…”

“We’re doing a rescue mission, if you’re not here they’ll hurt Nami and her babies-”

“…”

“...Do you really want to go on the island where the wasp women are coming from?”

“...Wasp women?”

“Yep,”

“Like, they eat sugar-”

“And lay their larva in living hosts. Wasp. Women.”

“Ah; yeah, I’ve got I-need-to-protect-Nami-disease- wait, wait, why won’t she be able to protect herself?”

“...there’s a new world coming, just around the bend; there’s a new world coming, this one’s coming to an end; there’s a new voice calling, you can hear it if you try-”

“Okay, that’s enough- and I assume Mark will be helpful too?”

“Very, so long as he’s in the water- they won’t follow below the water,” “Got it. Go get ‘em, kid,”

“Thank you,”

And then I’ve darted forwards and wrapped arms around Usopp’s middle. He huffs out a breath, then wraps arms around me, hugging back. He’s warm, and he smells like gunpowder and burnt things. I get a vision, as we embrace.

This is what I see.

It’s the humming that gets to you-

The color of the sky is orange and red as the sun sets across a strange city built of mud and stinking of blood and fluids and rotting meat it stinks and stinks in the burning heat of the ash-fall and the stink fades only under the snow-

The sound of the sea fades to the cracking of fire caught sticks of breaking trees in the winter of bones crunching underfoot what is this place-

It’s the humming that gets to you-

A white city grown like brain-eating fungus from the skull of the cold brown dirt-

Sweat and sugar-water and honey mixed with bile drip down fountains that run with blood and shit and sewage waters, pooling in a deep hole a pit of hate in the earth where no good thing grows down down in that dark shape there are- there are-

Humming that gets to you-

Mouths stretched wide and screaming drops of red blood painting wet clean trails across their lips their chins their throats their sagging breasts their bulging stomachs squirming and wriggling as they desperately claw and dig at the crumbling sides of that hateful pit so deep so foul it’s always in darkness but unbearably warm the stench so rank and vile-

Shapeless faceless women with- not penises those aren’t- they stab into living creatures and thrust their eggs inside food and board provided-

They stand on each other the wretched ones stand on each other because below are the ones- who-changed-

Humming-

Chewing chewing all day long-

The crunch of something crisp and firm in teeth warm and heavy steady steady moaning agony from those below and- they’re too tired to scream the wretched are too tired and desperate to scream they can only just see the light and smell the clean air above but they can’t reach it-

They chew and chew and melt skin and skin keeps nerves bundled together and they scream and they scream and their voices break so they only moan or reach desperately for-
Let me out--

Let me out--

Let me out let me out let me out--

A chorus of hums in the unlight and the stink--

A foul curse on the wind, the Court is having it’s fun at what cost at what cost- we were made of clay at their whim, and their first broken oath to us a crime and rage and burning we took the ash and put it in a fruit and buried the fruit beneath the waters and swore our vengeance forever more--

Crawling in their skin and bursting out squirming shapes lost to the sludge of despair below their warped and bubbling bodies crushed under too many- things- a stone sunk the fruit into the sea and this stone is our bones and those bones fall to dust under the jaws of the- things- anger and buzzing rasps of a thousand thousand susurrating wings wearing away the limestone bones of people fated to- become--

Aren’t they pretty with their humming laughter and their joyful songs no--

Their hair falls out in clumps, fell out as muscles dissolved and melted and twisted in her body, their brains are- crystals- only human looking now, only people at the very edge; at center, they are not human at all--

No no no no no--

Workers to reproduce; queens to rule. They will allow only one queen per hive; and they care for--

For--

A monster--

Mother--

They’ve run out of incubators; they hunt, now, a great blackening swarm rising into the sky as the moon rises- the raw burning ache of a body betraying itself and bones boiling and moving to without creatures pushing from flesh and hungry for the whole of the world armed and grown and sprung upon the unknowing world whole and wholly furious- cessation the one you are is no more you are not yourself you’re someone else who--

Who--

Who--

Who are you- now--

Are you a person? Or a monster after all?

Twisting cracking gurgles and the screams shut tight in throats that have no cords to vibrate--

The moon rises- and in it’s light… something awful.

Below the fluttering horde, the discarded remains of hundreds- thousands- people torn open, their bodies gone flat under the lack, their faces screaming screaming as the Queen commands her spear black and foul and her hair gold as honey-

The queen is not human her every movement is subtly wrong her arms and legs are not moving the way the joints and segments say they should be her torso is too long her neck is too short her eyes are too big and her she is not enough of any one thing and far to much of everything else she’s only pretending not a woman only pretending and she- hunners-

They are coming they are coming they are coming they are coming they are coming they are coming they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
they are coming
Fernanda, stop wasting time. They are coming. They are coming.

I’m crying. I push back from Usopp, and stare him in the eyes.

“You have to protect Nami. Five days is too long to have no contact at all, and Sanji’s not well- it has to be you, Usopp. They’ll come at night- don’t let them take her, don’t let them touch her. Once we get Bryony into position, we’ll be able to kill all of them- but don’t let them get close before then, don’t… you have to protect them, Usopp. They are coming ,”

“…I will. Go, Fern; I’ve got this,”

I nod, dry my eyes- I turn and take in my team, Team Rescuers. Stacey’s wearing an asymmetrical piece of crystal armor now; it must not hinder her fighting style too much. Everyone else is either unaware of the danger, like Gally, or ready to throw down, like Havij and Stacey, or out cold, like Bryony.

I walk over to Shearwing and let Gally put a crystal pendant over my neck. It matches ones everyone but Gally is wearing; I can feel the strange buzz of an Illusion, oil slick and grating to my senses, draping over me.

I look at Gally; she smiles, taps a stone on her chest, and nods.

Ah.

“Last check- do we have everything?”

“I’ve got my sword and shield-”

“Arrow and armor-”

“Stealth and needle-”

“Paws, claws, and a bad attitude-”

“-and I’ve got my spells; we’ll get Bry where she needs to be before she wakes up. Okay; Team Rescuers?!”

“Ready!”

“Let’s Go!”

Early Spring, a bit wet honestly; Whitecliff has so many tidepools
Dearest Journal,

Whitecliff Park is located near West Vanhoover’s Horseshoe Bay Neighbourhood; perhaps half a day’s steady trot. It’s a Marine Protected Area of about fifteen or sixteen hectares, and is currently home to more than two hundred marine animal species. It’s a place known for it’s extensive trail of tidepools, and for the sea lions that sunbath on the beach during the summer.

We arrived about a week after leaving Vanhoover proper, set up camp, and slept the night away to the soft rushing of the shore. Hawkeye settled- begrudgingly- into enjoying his vacation after we well and truly left city limits. Apparently, there’s a law that makes it so that any doctor entering city limits for any reason that wishes to practice must be cleared of all diseases, infections, and lingering magics for two full weeks before they can legally attend any medical affair- Vanhoover’s a city of immigrants, so it does make some sense. There are some truly nasty diseases in Saddle Arabia, much less Phynx; no one wants La Gripp!

I’ve finally settled on an appropriate hobby- and previous Journals well know how easy it is to let my work become my life. Take note, future reader! Do not let work become everything you are, and everything you do! Take the time to make the time for a hobby- even if it’s something very dull, like stamp collecting or growing extremely large vegetables, you must have a pastime that pleases you for no other reason than: it pleases you.

My hobby is watercolor sketching- particularly of the natural world. I will first detail my kit; then, the wonderful times I’ve had painting what’s around me.

To start with, the paper- do not begin with the cheapest watercolor paper! Even mixed media paper would be better than cheap watercolor paper… Use the most expensive watercolor paper that your budget can afford. Your paper is one of the most critical deciding factors in the quality of your finished product. Get a journal of watercolor paper- one from a company known for fine products, like Mole’s. Get a big sheet of very fine watercolor paper and cut it down to the size you need, or fold it up into a book. But this is not somewhere to save your money.

Secondly, the brush- for sketch work, a brush pen is truly essential. It holds a reservoir of water or ink inside it, and is absolutely perfect for traveling. Your final product depends less heavily on the quality of your brush; the quality of your skill can make up for the lack of quality in a brush, but only to a point. It’s okay if you don’t have the ‘perfect’ brushes right now- good brushes are expensive, and are easiest to collect over time.

Thirdly, the paints- and here, I am torn. For some things, I prefer liquid watercolors; for others, paint pans. Different approaches for different things- but the one thing I won’t skimp on is vibrancy. You can always water down a paint, Journal- but you cannot build it up forever, as there comes a point where your paper quite literally spits your efforts out at you. Concentrated liquid pigments also require a palette to use correctly- pay attention!

As for actual kit, in order- a zippered pouch from the hardware or feed store, large enough to hold your journal or paper and board; an eraser of good quality, a bit better than school quality but would not be out of place there; a fountain pen that won’t leak, and probably a refill for the pen; a pencil and a sharpener, or a mechanical pencil; refillable brush pens, sometimes called water brushes; paper napkins, paper towels, or a small cloth- and moist towelettes or wet wipes, as the pigment always stains if not cleaned promptly; a journal or sketchbook with the appropriate paper; and the paints, which can be a watercolor pan, or a full on set.
The first week into our group vacation, the fillies- Carrot Sundae and Fern- were already quite bored. By the second week, they were annoying each of the group in turn by following somepony around and spying on what they were doing- Heron and Hawkeye on their dates, Starbuck and Mark on their hiking trips, Taffy during her dance practice...

So, before they could get to me, I decided to teach them how to paint and draw- more so than their drafting courses would have made them.

In this case, since I don’t ever venture farther than a half-hour’s walk, I felt it prudent to make actual painting satchels for the girls, as well as put my own in order. Firstly, their saddlebags- one day, after Mark and Taffy lost their tempers and chased them up and down the beach for several hours, the girls were well asleep long before their normal time. I took the liberty of emptying their saddlebags, taking proper measurements of their backs and flanks, and pulling out my bolt of ripstop canvas, and my bolt of plain white canvas (ripstop color changes with a minor spell and setting wash) and sewing machine. I put quieting spells on my machine when I went to college; I needed to be able to sew at any time, without disturbing my roommates.

All sewing projects start with a pattern- the girls are big enough for standard saddlebags, ones meant for adult ponies, which saves me the trouble of drawing a new one. A simple do this, then that spell has the fabric ironed flat and cut cleanly, notched and pinned for sewing; then, the actual stitching of the satchel-style saddlebags, which went quietly ignored by the slightly disgruntled members of the group. The girls had passed out underneath my bed, where I was calmly longueing as I put together their new saddlebags.

Carrot’s saddlebag is a cream color, to play against the orange of her coat; with a lovely bit of applique over the magnetic closures in the shape of a beautiful orange float, the same as her cutie mark. Fern’s applique of a fern branch and hammers is no less beautiful, particularly on a pale mint ground.

The little beds under my bed have tiny shelves on either end- I carefully set the girls things from their old saddlebags away on these shelves, and then put their new, finished saddlebags on the little hooks where their old one’s hung. Then, I pack their old ones away in my mending box; I’ll fix them up, and give them back if they ask- but I don’t think they will.

Carrot and Fern are city girls- they’ve never really been on a vacation before, and they’ve never really had nothing to do, either. Carrot, at least, has a few novels in her bag- but Fern has nothing so diverting.

Thus, I feel no shame in giving both girls a full watercolor kit- journals with their names in my neatest calligraphy on the inside covers, empty palettes I fill with twenty four colors and let dry before packing; pencil cases, each with a fountain pen and pen refill, mechanical pencils, regular pencils, a pencil sharpener, brush pens, small cloths, and moist towelettes; and a note from me, informing them that they’d be spending the next few days with me as punishment for their misbehavior these past two weeks.

I also made sure to impress on the group how very miserable the girls would be with me- as neither of them had shown any real interest in exploring tidepools, and flatly refused when I offered to teach them to sew or knit. After much griping, and some protests from Starbuck, the group agreed to leave the punishing of the girls to me.

A proper punishment isn’t fun, and it isn’t something anyone wants to experience. Thus, painting was never the actual punishment- no. My punishment was this- the girls had to, by the end of the day, apologize to everyone they’d hurt these past two weeks, and they had to mean it.

I announced their punishment at breakfast, to the horror of the girls; and I explained to them that their actions had hurt everyone, and that the only thing they could do to be forgiven was apologize- and that, as it sometimes happens, an apology might not be enough. A pony should do their best to do right; and if they do wrong, that is their choice, but they might not be forgiven for it.

Then I took them off and taught them how to paint with watercolors- just the basics, of course. I doubt much of the lesson sunk in, but that was the point. I packed lunch for all three of us- and so, that day, it was like this: Me, the Girls, and their own remorse, observing the antics of those strange creatures that dwell in tidepools.

At dinner, they both apologized to each person, individually, and were so heart-weary they could not even enjoy my strawberry-rhubarb crumble. They ate their sproutburgers and hayfries; and then they went to bed, miserable and contrite.

As an aside, all the others seem a bit… in awe of me? Somehow? I suppose they thought that I’m a soft touch. I’m not; I’m responsible, is what I am, and I don’t expect adult behavior from children, for another.

Ah, Journal- I might never understand it.

Best Love, Meadow
Mid Spring, Warm and Sunny; Whitecliff perks up the warmer it gets

Dearest Journal,

It’s been quite a while since we last had time together, hasn’t it? Well, in the time we’ve been apart, only a few things of note have happened: I’ve expanded my portfolio of watercolor paintings to include sunrises and sunsets and seals basking on the stony shore, and I’ve discovered a love for teaching, and I’ve painted my first two students painting their own paintings.

Neither of them want to learn how to make any sort of fabric good, and that’s alright- I’m just glad I got to teach them how to do something I know how to do.

Fern Woodsmoke and Carrot Float have distinctly different eyes. Fern has a very photographic eye, an eye that sees the world exactly as it is, no more, no less. She got bored of painting about the second day in; and so, Taffy took her under wing and taught her to use a camera.

Carrot is all about abstraction- she’ll lift her wings and gather up a nice cloud, and then paint up there. The best of her work came with the first really nice spring day, when the water was finally warm enough to swim in; a beautiful painting of splotches and streaks, resolving into dancing waves and laughing ponies enjoying the beach.

Tristan Vinsmoke is a Prench national, who joined the EQ Royal Militia’s Foreign Legion to get Equestrian citizenship, as he couldn’t buy it nor prove relation to a Equestrian native in good standing. We knew each other for five years before- We were friends, best friends. And then he had to leave.

The only things I could think to give him at the time were my Magazine Illustré de Science Biologique posters, the one that was rejected, not the one that was accepted - well, I gave him a copy of that one too. I gave him a lot of things, come to think of it… and he gave me everything he could, and be a part of the EQRHM. I gave him… almost everything. Not my heart- I was never quite brave enough for that, but… I gave him everything else.

He gave me… everything I wanted, everything I needed. A reason to smile, every day; someone to tell my day to, someone who wanted to hear every stupid detail, and listened to everything I ever said. He gave me his company and his time; his thoughts and his feelings, everything he could say about his day without breaking the law of the Army- His wing over my back; his shoulder against mine; the smoky smile of him...

We met because he wanted to speak prench with someone, and I needed a partner to practice my prench with. Tristan was the pony who answered my advert in the paper; and for five years, he and I were best friends. He’s from the prench city of Maresille- the only place in Prance that feels like Curacao, not Prance. He speaks curacan almost better than prench, does Tristan...

Five years- that’s how long a pony needs to join the EQRHM Foreign Legion to become a citizen. Tristan only had four years left, but he took another year of duty to get bonus money- so he said, at least. I think he really did it so he’d have more time with me, and money to get to somewhere in Equestria- somewhere called Canterlot Village.

He even gave me a forwarding address…
Journal, am I being a coward for not writing him? How would I even word that letter? ‘Dearest Tristan, sorry to spring this on you, but remember that Hearthwarming where we warmed each other up all night? Haha, turns out my Estrus was the week after that-’ no, that’s terrible. ‘Surprise, it’s a foal?’

‘Tristan, I need you, please-’

I wish he was here. I wish we were together. I wish, I wish- well, wishing won’t get me anywhere, but a letter might. -Should I even attempt it at all? There’s every chance he’s moved on- that he’s found someone else, someone prettier than me, someone… Someone more Harmonious. Not like me.

Not like me.

-You know what? I will write him a letter. I just need a permanent address first, so he can actually send me a reply- and possibly, I need to be an actual citizen of Equestria, to avoid deportment. At the very least, he deserves to know that I- that we, that the Little Bobbin exists, and I am caring for them.

There’s nothing wrong with enjoying looking at the surface of the ocean, of course, except that when you finally see what goes on underwater, you realize you’ve been missing the ocean party the whole time. Staying on the surface of anything is like going to the circus and staring at the outside of the tent.

I really don’t know how to explain my connection to the sea, except I think it’s because in addition to the fact that the sea changes and the light changes and ships change and what’s in the tidepools changes and the smell is different every day- I think, I think it’s because we all came from the sea. It is an interesting biological fact that all of us quadrupeds and bipeds have in our veins the exact same percentage of salt in our blood that exists in the ocean, and, therefore, we have salt in our blood and our sweat and our tears. We’re tied to the ocean; and when we go back to the sea, whether it is to sail or to watch it, we are going back from whence we came.

In a very literal way, we are going home.

I- arrgh. I want fish! I want… I want… I want Moules Marinières!

A quick head count, and possibly an explanation. Hawkeye and Taffy are Zebras, who eat meat more often than any other equine; Heron Vondergeist, Longshanks Rojomane, and Carrot Float are pegasi, and have cultural acceptance of eating fish; Fern Woodsmoke, Frank Starbuck, Mark Merryweather, and Ace Spade are earth ponies, and while there’s no stigma to eating fish, there’s no real tradition of it either; and there’s me, Meadow Surprise. Unicorns don’t eat fish, or any meat- unless they’re from Trottingham, where often the only options during the winter are fish and seaweed.

In the two years since I’ve been introduced to the world of meat-eating, I’ve eaten a rather astonishing amount of flesh. Gamebirds, pig, kine, and ostle; even some very odd things, like duck and quail.

However, I’ve not quite embraced les fruit de la mer and this constantly mocks me on my epicurean adventures. (There is one cousin of mine, and she will eat anything except honey. Just the one thing-and it’s honey! I keep bees! Why would you keep that detail to yourself for years, Maud? Fuck!

My issue with seafood isn’t an aversion, or a dislike of the flavor; it’s a reaction to Tristan’s leaving and my falling pregnant. It’s a vaguely nonsensical thing, to freak out at the taste of fish because that’s the last meal I had with Tristan before we- before-

It’s a strong, abrupt, illogical reaction. I actually saw a hypnotist for it in Vanhoover; because I want to eat fish, indeed, if my suspicion about the tribe of the foal I’m carrying is correct, I need to eat fish. I got a professional to trick me into eating fish without becoming frightened or disgusted. Seeing a doctor- or something like it, for when you’ve an ailment is only sensible.

The only seafood dish Tristan ever taught me successfully is a mussel dish. It’s a gateway fish, as mussels are some of the only fish I- and most other ponies barring those with allergies or religious or moral objections- can stand to eat in anything like large amounts. The batch I cooked in Trottingham suffered from a poor state of mind while I was eating them- as I know I cooked them correctly, or I’d have never been able to leave at all…

The batch I made at Whitecliff was one of the tastiest I’ve ever cooked. There was an hundred-percent success rate with the local mussels; not a single one came home popped, or refused to open after cooking- they were unbelievably savory-sweet and respondent to July Chili’s marinier broth.

For those who were a bit nervous of eating moules, the traditional side is frites; I made waffle-cut versions and deep fried them in a heavy cast iron pan Taffy and Hawkeye gave me as a vardo-warming gift, along with a crusty sourdough bread, and a dry honey wine I’d made at ho- in Trottingham about eight years ago. Every bite was wine, shallot, and butter-drenched; with every morsel past my lips, my quiet melancholy over not being with Tristan, not knowing if he was alive or dead or if he would ever want to speak with me again, see me again… it all faded from my mind for that evening, and with them came a promise that one day, maybe even soon, I would have some kind of closure.

Moules à la Marinière

Fresh Mussels Steamed open in Wine and Flavorings

Recipe from July Chili’s Mastering the Art of French Cooking

A stock pot with cover, though it works alright in other pots

2 cups light dry white wine, or 1 cup dry white vermouth

½ cups minced shallots, or green onions, or very finely minced white onions (sweet yellow onions are too sweet, and red onions overwhelm the flavor of the mussels- but if it’s all you have, please use them)

8 parsley sprigs

½ bay leaf

¼ teaspoon thyme

⅛ teaspoon pepper
6 tablespoons butter

6 quarts scrubbed, soaked mussels (by this I mean give them a few hours in fresh water to get the sand and dirt out of them- they’re filter feeders, and the sweet, delicate flavor is elevated when cleared of the seas silty flavor; that said, I’ve noticed earth ponies prefer a slightly siltier taste to their food. Keep in mind who you’re cooking for, I say)

½ cup roughly chopped parsley

Bring all but the last two ingredients to a boil in the pot. Boil for two to three minutes to evaporate most of it’s alcohol and to slightly reduce it’s volume.

Add the mussels to the kettle. Cover tightly and boil quickly over high heat. Frequently grasp the pot, clamping the cover down, and toss the mussels in the pot in an up and down herky-jerky motion so the mussels change levels and cook evenly. In about five minutes, the shells will open and the mussels are done.

With a big skimmer (Tristan called it a spider for some reason), dish the mussels into wide soup plates. Allow the cooking liquid to settle while preparing the rest of the dinner service; then ladle the clarified liquid over the mussels, sprinkle with parsley and serve immediately.

If making in the traditional French style, use whichever Frites recipe suits your taste- baked, bought, waffle, curly. That said, for a lighter dish, or if you’re serving somepony who isn’t familiar with la mer, hay fries are fine.

The dessert was clafouti, one of the few baked goods I didn’t know the recipe of by heart before I met Tristan. It’s his very favorite, any time of year- but really, it’s a spring dish of red fruit, egg heavy and filling. It’s made by pouring an eggy batter over fresh fruit or rhubarb; this then is baked into a sweet, vanilla-scented custard that is firm enough to serve in slices, but soft enough to eat with a spoon- or directly off the plate, I don’t mind.

Traditionally, it’s a cherry dish; but as I get further into Apple-country, the price of cherries gets from merely fair to exorbitant to not worth the bits, as the quality inevitably goes down as the price goes up. So far as I can tell, cherries only get good around Dodge Junction in the Appleoosa region, anyway.

When roasted in the oven with just a few spoonfuls of sugar, the rhubarb becomes soft and slightly caramelized while retaining it’s signature tart flavor. The pieces retain their shape during roasting and baking for a pretty presentation, and then melt like warm jam as soon as you take a bite. Rhubarb is also good for stretching a small amount of strawberries, or increasing the pectin output when strawberries aren’t available. Strawberry-rhubarb pie is a particular favorite of my cousin Pinkie- she always loved the color, of course.

I always remember wondering why ponies think her favorite food is cupcakes- or even rock candy. In some ways, those are her favorite foods- but really, her favoritest foods are what ponies who love her make for her, with their own hooves. Bonus points if it’s actually good.
One of the best things about clafouti is eating the leftovers for breakfast the next day. The custard firms up as it chills, becoming ever-so-slightly chewy. I usually save a few slices in the fridge because I only made it for myself- but this time, if I hadn’t made four with the express purpose of breakfast tomorrow, there’d be none left at all.

A short note about heating ovens:

A low oven is warm enough to nap on in the winter, or hold my hoof quite near the coals for seven to nine seconds- or until dinner, if I’ve nothing better to do, or a bit of a chill. Honestly, the only reason I pulled my hoof away from the coals at this stage was because I was bored. I entertained myself for the first few seconds by thinking about bee dances, or rolling on sandy beaches, but that loses appeal after a short little while. I gave up after fifteen seconds or so, because I’m a busy mare and I can’t afford to hold my hoof over hot coals all day. I guess if the oven is warm, it’ll cook something eventually- which is the whole point of low-slow cooking, anyway. Whatever.

A medium oven is actually, y’know, hot. This is about where young fillies and colts start getting told to not go near the oven for their own safety, though with a mit or grabber I feel it’s probably fine. I can hold my hoof to the coals for about five seconds, at which point it definitely feels hot on my frog, though I think I could hang on longer if I have someone to impress. At this point, the heat isn’t so much ‘painful’ as it is ‘annoying’. Like a little rock in your shoe, or a burr under your saddlebag- definitely ‘there’, but not a stop everything and fix this situation. My hoof does feel hot at this point, though- and heat’s what we’re using to cook with, right?

A high oven is very hot. This is where fillies and colts are not to use the oven, at all; and some of my less responsible acquaintances are also not allowed. As I extended my hoof to the coals, images of sizzling eggs and popping kernels of grain dance across my wincing eyes. The words ‘high’ and ‘heat’ in big, angry, cartoonish letters also entered my mind, just before I instinctively withdrew my hoof from the coals. This is, without a doubt, a hot oven- just the thing to get a good crust on a loaf of bread or quickly crack open a stonehull pumpkin. Now we’re cooking with charcoal! But seriously, two seconds on the hoof is more than enough.

If there’s one thing I know for sure, it’s that doubling a recipe is much simpler than modifying a knitting pattern. The original recipe for Clafouti, as learned at Tristan’s side, serves four to six, and I will write it here.

Clafouti

A French dessert of red fruit (cherries; strawberries; rhubarb) and egg custard

This recipe serves four to six ponies.

For the rhubarb:

2 cups (8 ½ ounces, or three long stalks) of diced rhubarb
2 tablespoons of granulated sugar
½ teaspoon of cinnamon

For the clafouti:

½ cup (2 ½ ounces) of granulated sugar

3 large eggs (chicken; refer to the egg conversion chart in The Joy of Cooking if chicken eggs are not available)
1 teaspoon vanilla extract
1 cup (8 ounces) whole milk
½ cup (2 ½ ounces) all-purpose flour
1 teaspoon lemon zest

A pinch of salt (sweet things only taste amazing when you add salt! Do not skip this step!)

Set a medium-low oven.

Combine the rhubarb with the sugar and cinnamon in a small bowl and set aside to dissolve the sugar and begin extracting rhubarb juices.

Spread the rhubarb in the bottom of a two by two hoof baking dish or a two and quarter hoof pie pan. Roast uncovered for fifteen to twenty minutes, until the rhubarb is soft and the juices are bubbling. Allow to cool until the rhubarb is just warm to the touch. (Leave it in the pan it was cooked in!)

Whisk together the eggs, sugar, and vanilla. Whisk in the milk. Whisk in the flour, lemon zest, and salt. (Always sift the flour, otherwise you get clumpies!) This batter can be prepared up to half an hour ahead of time.

Pour the batter over the roasted rhubarb and bake for half an hour to forty minutes—still in that medium-low oven, please. When it’s done, the clafouti should be puffed around the edges and a toothpick or skewer stuck in the middle should come out cleanly. It’s perfect if the middle is still jiggly, and the edges will collapse once the clafouti starts to cool.

The longer it cools, the more set the clafouti becomes. For a loose pudding-like dessert, serve while still warm from the oven. For a firmer custard, allow to cool to room temperature or serve chilled. For fancy occasions, sift a little confectioner’s sugar over the top just before serving.

Leftovers will keep if refrigerated for up to a week. Don’t freeze custard.

Dinner, and the breakfast that followed, was a wonderful affair—the friendship I felt that night was truly magical. It lead the the most clearheaded weeks of that leg of our journey together, the most lighthearted I had been in a good long while; and so what I will end my entry with, Journal, is thoughts about the sea.
It is so colorful- silver and black at dawn, green and burnished orange at noon, darkest blue in the evening, black at night. Sometimes it looks almost red, like fire or a blood orange’s fruit split open and oozing. Sometimes the sea will turn the color of bits lost in the field, uncovered by the tender frog of a foal one summer and spent in a day on trinket-treasure. Right now, Journal, the shadows of clouds are dragging across the sea-water, dark dapple patches of grey, and patches of sunlight are touching down everywhere. White strings of gulls drag over velvety waves like beads.

In this time, in this moment- it is the very finest of all the things I have ever seen. Sometimes I catch myself staring at it and forget my duties- to myself, my craft, the foal inside me and the stallion who helped me make it, to the world and my companions… It seems wholly big enough to contain everything anypony could ever need to feel.

Best Love, Meadow

---

Mid Spring, lightly raining; On we trot to Old Vanhoo-ver-ay, hurrah- hurrah-

Dearest Journal,

Ah, a warm rain- there’s something deeply revitalizing about it, Journal. It damps down the dust of the road, and cleanses the air and the spirit of all things that may foul it. The breeze that comes after is cool and refreshing.

Heron and Hawkeye don’t actually want to spend the whole of their shared vacation time at the beach- so back to the city we all go.

Well, we’ve left the beach well behind us- and, as it’s been six weeks or so of Hawkeye’s fourteen off, and the seals were getting boisterous and preposterous and, to be honest, a bit rape-y, we decided to return to the city. -Carrot and Fern laughed it off, but I’m quite sure that nearly getting molested by amorous seals is nopony’s idea of a good time. If they start having nightmares, I’m certain, of course, that Princess Luna will advise them the way they need to be- I can only hope that they take that advice, if they need it, and that, whoever they share with takes their concerns seriously. There is no such thing as a minor trauma- if it hurt you, it hurt you, and let no one say it did not.

Coming to a decision, I decided I would not buy the runner needed for my vardo’s walk; I would make it, and lay it after a thorough cleaning. As the finishing would be a full month, as well as making all the final renovations and letting the vardo settle after it’s first trip, I would have just enough time to get it done.

Unicorn rugs, whether made in the tribal style or the city style, are all hoof-and-spell knotted. The weaver (or spellweaver) ties the material (be it wool or silk) around the warps of the foundation using one of several different knots. Each rug is made to a design; some designs are copied from intricate plates several thousand years old, repeated faithfully as their carrying surfaces wore out- others are from the weaver, inspired by their surroundings and way of life. To best show this design, a variety of colors are used to form the necessary patterns. After each row of knots is complete, a weft strand is tightly packed between the newly completed row and the one which is about to begin, keeping each knot firmly in place.

Depending on the skill of the weaver, one rug can take between about four weeks at the fastest, to ten years at the most intricate; either way, the eventual owner will gain a unique work of art which is not only practical, but extremely durable and beautiful besides.

The tools and knots used in the weaving of Unicorn rugs are as follows:

Warp and Weft: The warp refers to the vertical strands running up and down a rug. These are vital to the structure of the rug, as the knots are tied to them. The wefts are also placed between them in order to keep the knots in place. The fringe of a rug is the tied loose ends of its warp. The weft is used in order to keep the knots in place. Before and after each row of knots the weft strand is passed through the warp and combed and beaten down, compacting the row of knots and creating a tight structure.

Cotton is used for both warp and weft in most rugs; however, some use wool, and intricate silk rugs often use silk as both foundation and pile.

Pile refers to the material or fiber used in weaving the rug. The main materials of Unicorn rugs are wool, silk, and cotton. Sometimes camel, rabbit, or goat wool is used as well, but this is getting rarer as the art of spellweaving dies out.

Wool is the most common material in weaving Unicorn rugs, mainly because it’s soft, durable, and cheap. Camel and goat wool are undesirable for colorful patterns, as they do not take dye well. The wool shaven from only the shoulders and underbelly of a lamb on it’s first cut is highly prized; this is when wool is at it’s finest, and is often used in conjunction with silk. Wool is best used for all kinds of rugs, be they wall hangings, floor coverings, or bedding.

There are two kinds of natural silk, and one synthetic. Silkworm cocoons are cheapest near mulberry plantations, which are very rare in Equestria, but are fairly common in Neighpon, Golia, and China. Spider silk is a protected thestral artisanal product, and can be very expensive in large amounts. Synthetic silk, made with amber and an adapted pegasus spell, is easiest for the Unicorn weaver to get their hooves on, but can be very finicky. Of all the natural fibers, silk is both very fine and extremely strong. However, as it’s not as thick as wool, it isn’t quite so durable; and, because of it’s fine gauge, it’s often used in the weaving of intricately detailed work. Silk is best as a wall hanging, or the topmost part of a rug-stack bed.

Cotton is generally used in the foundation of rugs. However, spellweavers use it to introduce white details, set spells, and create a contrasting color and texture. Mercerized cotton is particularly good for barriers and blessings.

The material used in making the rug- wool, silk, but never cotton- is treated and dyed prior to the knotting process. There are conflicting views about rug dyes: tradition says to only use vegetable dyes, while alchemical dyes only fade when the magic does, which is almost never.

Both dyes have their merits, and both are best at a certain look. Natural dyes provide a more natural palette; alchemic dyes are brighter, more vivid, and all around more lively than natural counterparts. However- some natural dyes are more vivid than alchemical dyes; some alchemic dyes are more color-fast than natural dyes.

And there are some colors that only come in one type- natural or alchemic, there’s only the one kind that can make a certain color.

Before the actual process of making a rug can commence, the rug must be designed by hoof by a skilled artist. City- or, now that I think about it, Tower might be more appropriate- style rugs are produced from detailed design plates or cartoons: a life-sized paint by numbers showing which color of material to use for each knot. Tribal, or Family, rugs may use this method to create standard designs- indeed, various bloodlines have specific, secret patterns used only by them. There’s even some historical evidence of familial marks, that is, heraldry, finding it’s origin in the family rugs- anyway, although Family rugs can have standard designs, many of them are created from the imagination of the weaver. For this reason, family rugs have more ‘errors’ than their tower counterparts; then again, for some ponies, ‘errors’ are really ‘features’, and among collectors, highly prized.

Most Unicorn rugs are pile-woven, the knots tied by hoof and spell to the warp strings. Two factors are important when discussing knots- knot density, and knot type.

Knot density is the main factor that determines the overall frog of a rug- the way it feels. KPSQ is the measurement of it: the number of knots per square quarter-hoof. This is done by counting the number of knots in a quarter-hoof down the warp and across the weft, then multiplying these figures together.

KPSQ doesn’t really figure into the true value of a rug in Family style; it does in Tower style. In Family style, because it relies on the weaver’s memory and is mostly done by the still nomadic tribes of the Unicorn Mountains… hm, how to say this… Family items are valuable because you made them for your loved ones, because you made it from memory, because you made the dyes with the plants you could find and what you had, because the love and care you wanted to show your family got caught in the threads and wool and is there warm and lovely forevermore. Rugs with high KPSQ take longer to make, and since the Family style came from nomadic origins, it’s more important to finish the work within a season- usually summer, or winter, depending on if the rug is a gift or for the home- than it is to make it, well, intricate or particularly dense.

Tower rugs don’t have the same history. They started as ways of shoring up the cracked walls of the very first Unicorn Towers; thus, being thick and dense was not only desirable, but required. As architecture improved, the density of a Tower rug became a feature- and they eventually moved from being wall hangings to floor coverings. Originating in the old region of Maregolia, which became simply Golia during the Unification, the Tower rug migrated south and west along the old Spidersilk Road, to Equestria. Once there, the intricate silk wall hangings became the preferred floor coverings of stallion mages hoping to attract a mare, or mares getting ready to foal. A good, thick, silk Unicorn rug was, is, and remains, one of the most comfortable beds available to a unicorn- for several reasons, actually.

Mainly, it’s the horn- when we moved away from headrests during our Tribal days, we relearned the reason why we keep our horns from touching the ground too often. It’s all to do with magic, and quite too much to put in a Journal entry this long- suffice to say, Pegasi have magic of the Sky and the Weather; Earth Ponies have magic of the Land and the Growth deep inside it; and Unicorns have magic of Sea and Void. And, of course, Communion keeps them together- we feel it as Harmony. The six innate pony magics only barely get along with each other, and that only due to the prevailing force of Communion.

Some of the classical Elements get along with each other without Harmony- the Sky, the Land, the Sea, even the great Commotion before the Coming of the Two wasn’t enough to separate them.
However, Weather, Growth, and Void were absent until the Ascendance of Harmony- ponies literally could not grasp these innate qualities until the levels of communion were high enough.

The types or styles of knots are bloodline specific, favored by one family or another and used in particular ways depending on preference. Different areas- and the two main styles- use slightly different techniques.

The Snaffle, or Asymmetrical knot is used by the Ire, Spice, Torque, Camellia, and Crock families extensively in their rugs. To form this knot, yarn is wrapped around one warp strand and then passed under the neighbouring warp strand and brought back to the surface. With this type of knot, a finer weave can be created.

The Grade, or Symmetrical knot is used by the Torque, the Surprise, and the northern Ires. It’s also very common to find in rugs from Saddle Arabia, Yakistan, the Griffon Empire, and Zebrica. To form this knot, yarn is passed over two neighboring warp strands. Each end of the yarn is then wrapped behind one warp and brought back to the surface in the middle of the two warps.

The Jog knot can be seen in the rugs of Coral-Sand, a branch clan of the Ire. This knot can be either symmetrical or asymmetrical and is usually tied over four warps, making the weaving process faster.

After the rug knotting process is complete, the pile is very long and uneven. The pattern is only vaguely visible from the front side of the rug- from the back, however, it is still fully visible. This is when the rug is checked against the design or cartoon, to ensure accuracy. Different weavers have different standards for the level of ‘mistakes’ they’ll allow to go into their rugs. I actually allow quite a few- so long as they don’t compromise the effect of the spell I’ve woven in, all the mistakes I inevitably make are really features.

Once the weaver is satisfied with their product, the pile is carefully clipped and shaved to the correct height. This shows the design to best effect, and creates the desired texture. The rug is then washed, to ensure coherency in the spell, no color runs later in life, and the removal of excessive dye and debris. Some rugs are so thick or intricate- or filthy, things happen- the process of washing is repeated several times.

Finally, the rug is blocked to ensure no shrinkage has occurred during the wash, and to align all the knots correctly. Once finished, the rug can be used for any number of things.

The tools for a Unicorn Rug are divided into Spells and Hoof Tools. Every Hoof Tool has a Spell counterpart; every Spell, a Hoof Tool. Some things are easier with a Hoof Tool; others, with a Spell.

The first spell every spellweaver has to learn (and here I’m using the definition ‘a series of actions performed correctly’, which is the original definition) is the Count Set spell; this spell keeps track of ever knot tied to the warp in a row, to be checked against what is called a Set List. This list is usually on the plate of a rug- ah, right. The main design, the fully colored and life-sized version, is for actual design work- checking colors, checking fit, layout, and so on. The work design, or plate, is a much smaller document or object, maybe one to four hooves square- and it’s purpose is to keep track of which knots to use, in which colors, in what amount… They look like knitting instructions, with a small palette of colors. They also look something like kitchen floor tiles.
The Count Set spell counts each set of knot-color against the Set List- and you don’t actually need a Count Set spell, just a magnifying glass and patience.

Anyway.

Comb - this tool/spell is used to slide and beat down the weft between rows of knots. This is necessary to secure the knots into place, before a new row can be started.

Hook - this tool/spell is used for two things- separating the warp strands while tying a knot, and then pulling the yarn through the warp strands. The spell can also be used to cut the yarn after each knot is tied.

Spindle - a spell/tool for spinning prepared fiber into thread, then yarn, then rope.

Scissors - a spell/tool used to cut many things- in this case, it’s used to cut the long or uneven pile as the rug is woven.

Plate - used as a reference when weaving, the plate show the weaver what colors to use, and the pattern. Different from the cartoon or full design, as it’s meant to be used directly by the weaver, not as a planning guide.

The Loom - a spell/tool meant for weaving. This is the spell that takes the longest to learn, or the machine that can be most intimidating for new weavers- it’s really very simple. Horizontal Loom is the simplest version of the spell, and the simplest machine. In machine form, they’re mostly used by nomads because they can be dismantled at the time of migration. In spell form, they’re used as the Mastery test for a few specific reasons- firstly, once you start a Loom spell, it can only be completed by finishing the weaving; secondly, the more complicated and large your rug is, the more magical energy you must have to complete the work. I’m a master not just because I can design, and create a beautiful rug- I’m a master because I can weave a fairly complicated series of spells into a rug meant to hang as a tapestry down a hallway.

Most unicorns- even ones with cutie marks related to magic- can’t do that.

Rugs made horizontally are generally small, either because it’s the master’s first try or because it needs to be finished within a season, which is when migration begins for the nomadic ponies. It’s also fairly difficult to weave large rugs on this kind of Loom, as it relies on a bar-system to structure it; in practice, it’s very similar to a frame. The distance between the parallel side bars defines the width of the rug to be woven on the loom, and the distance between the parallel top and bottom bars determines the length.

Weavers tend to lay on, or roll across, their rugs as they’re being woven- especially when using a horizontal loom. This is because of tradition- and also, it’s fun.

Vertical looms are meant for tower-style rugs, and their assembly is more complicated than horizontal looms. There are three kinds- fixed looms, which cannot be moved about a room or from a location; bunyan looms, which require a pony and an assistant to use properly; and the roller beam loom, which is used to make extremely long rugs.

Ah, Journal, sorry for being so pedantic- I’m practicing writing out explanations, so I can see if I’d actually be good at teaching. I think I might have a knack for it, but, well- having a Special Talent doesn’t mean you just get to slack off and not practice it. I might be good at writing out, creating, instructions- that doesn’t mean I’m actually good at teaching someone else how to follow them. You’d think one would follow the other… but, well. That’s generally not the case.

I actually had a talk just to that effect with the girls on our way back to Vanhoover- really, a discussion of what cutie marks even mean.

I told them how I got my cutie mark- and then I told them that, because I had a special talent for writing instructions, I found it very hard to actually get a job anywhere. I didn’t have very many friends- because I got my special talent quite early on, and became very bossy- especially when it wasn’t warranted.

And I told them that my talent only became useful when I’d learned enough to understand the point of instructions- they’re meant to be helpful. Instructions exist so that, when somepony isn’t there to help you directly, you are not left without any help at all.

-Your talent is what you pursue. Your talent is not who you are. You can change your talent, if you really want to. If your talent doesn’t satisfy you, do something else!

I truly wish somepony had told me those words when I was younger.

Fern’s special talent actually has nothing to do with building- it’s to do with design. She got her cutie mark when she realized, all at once, that a bridge was going to collapse within the week- something about the way it rattled when a cart went across it, about how it felt beneath her hooves… She was evasive on the subject of what she did after her revelation, but she told us that only two ponies were killed. And then she was very quiet, and could not look at Carrot at all until Carrot reached out and hugged her.

Fern’s cutie mark is a fern frond between two crossed hammers- but I wonder if it isn’t more like a laurel? I wonder if her special talent is actually noticing the most stable and enduring parts of a design, their form, their function- and how they can fail anyway. Just because something has always been done a certain way doesn’t mean it’s the right way- or even the best way. I wonder if she might not have secondary talents, subservient to her main.

I, for example, am exceedingly good at writing instructions. It’s my main talent. My secondary talents are for following directions, testing directions, filing (so I can find the directions again), creating systems of logic (which is all a spell is, once you add the magic in)... And as it turns out, Fern is good at more than just Best Design- she’s good at picking proper materials for a use, at finding areas where trouble will brew, at… streamlining. When I asked her if she’d ever built a boat, she said no- and then looked very contemplative, before diving for her sketchbook and scribbling furiously.

Carrot’s special talent also has nothing to do with building- and it’s not really about cooking, either. When I got a good look at her cutie mark, it wasn’t really a food- not really a carrot-juice float, like I thought. It was really an ice cream cup full of little things- nails, screws, tiny gears- in an orange fluid I know to be rust remover, all with a balled up cloth on top and a pair of tweezers standing in for a straw.
Carrot’s special talent is a bit complicated, but once she explained it, it makes perfect sense that there would be many ponies of a similar stripe to her. Basically, she makes things so that other things can be made, or fixed. She’s not necessarily the one who makes a nail or a screw, though she will if it’s of a strange size or not available anymore; she’s the one who makes the tool to make a nail or a screw. She’s the pony you need when you need a new handle on your favorite tool, a new gear for your pocket watch, a piece of artisanal glass that’s meant to be a pair… her actual job title is Machinist, and what she actually does is make and repair machinery. Machinists fix trains. They make sure lights work, and that stoves fire, and that wheels turn. They make the tools that those who make need to do their work- she serviced my sewing machine because, and I quote, it was making a weird clicking noise that sounded like trouble to her. Apparently, it threw a gear.

As for how she got her special talent- oddly enough, it had nothing to do with making a machine at all. Her story is this: after her parents died, her sister, Saffron Sundae, and her could not be in the same room together without fighting- physically or verbally. It got so bad that Foal Protective Services (FPS) was seriously considering separating them.

As Carrot explains it, the real root of their conflict was a silly fight they’d had before their parents had to leave and do whatever it was they did- a fight so silly they’d both forgotten what was being fought about, only that they’d done it… and the last memory either filly had of their parents was of being punished, and resenting them. Carrot remembers saying ‘Love you; see you later’ as was her custom; and she remembers her older sister, Saffron, not doing so, out of foalish pettiness. Or maybe she just forgot.

And then their parents didn’t come back.

Saffron couldn’t forgive herself for it- not until Carrot fixed… and here she used a word that I’d never heard, ofrenda, but I understood the meaning quick enough. An altar, where those who’ve passed can be remembered and cared for- something like that exists in every culture, I think. Some way of remembering those who’ve gone.

Carrot rebuilt her family’s ofrenda after her sister, Saffron broke it; and she told her sister to forgive herself for being so mad at their parents. That the whole point of being a family is that even when you’re angry- even when you hate each other, you still love each other.

‘The only thing that can’t be fixed is death,’ she said. ‘Fern was not at fault for the bridge collapse; she did everything she could, including blocking the bridge with her own body- but they didn’t listen to her, even though her cutie mark was all but screaming. It’s no one’s fault except maybe the bridge builder’s and the ponies who were supposed to keep it repaired that it collapsed and killed my parents- and.’

And then she choked on her words and shook. Fern was the one to hug Carrot that time.

I think I know what happened, but I can’t be sure unless she says it aloud- and if I’m right, well… it can only do her good to say it plain, like putting a hole in your hoof to let an abscess fester out faster.

I said to both of them- ‘You have to face it. Whatever makes you run from yourself- fear of failure, agony, whatever it is- you have to face up to it. If you don’t, you’ll never know a moment’s rest again- it will keep chasing you, until you fall. And you will fall. It might be frightening; you might not want to feel the way you do, but- it’s okay to think about it. It’s okay to talk about it. Indeed, you have to; you have to face it to let it go.’

Carrot heard me- she didn’t show it then, she was too caught in her remembered terror, but my words reached her.
As it turns out, Journal, Carrot saw her parents die when the bridge collapsed; and she still can’t tell her sister about it. So far as Fern could say, when Carrot began sobbing after saying what she saw in my vardo, that was the only time Carrot had ever cried about it.

When somepony leaves your life, those exits are not made equal. Some are beautiful and poetic and satisfying- acceptable, as much as such a thing can be. Others are abrupt, unforseen, and totally unfair. But mostly? Mostly they’re just unremarkable, unintentional, clumsy- and normal.

A silly fight between sisters; parents laying down the law of the house; a habitual goodbye, and a petty refusal to do it- and a disaster. A broken shelf; a broken heart… and a revelation: it’s not over unless I’ve given up. A broken thing is still a thing- a broken heart can still feel, a broken shelf can be repaired, a mistake can be forgiven.

We didn’t really do anything after Carrot’s tears that day- other than me keeping to the schedule of the trip back to Vanhoover.

Carrot ended up wedged into a warm pile of her best friend, Fern, her teaching-Master, Frank Starbuck, Taffy, Heron, and Hawkeye- on my bed. Ace and Mark took over doing the other necessary things- making lunch, telling me to stop for lunch and have a rest, making dinner… Mark actually baked a carrot-cake for Carrot, and it actually got a laugh out of her, which relieved all of us. When she started to apologize to us for throwing all her problems on us, I gave her what-for.

‘An abscess in your feelings is just as painful and dangerous as an abscess in your hoof. Opening up, letting the nasty part out, and getting the care you need afterwards- those are the steps you need to take, for the sake of your health. Don’t apologize for being injured, Carrot; and you’re not the one who gets to decide if your friends care about you when you are, or even how much. Now shush, and eat your cake; you’ve had a long day, and I’d rather you go to bed than stay up when you’re tired,’ I said, staring at her.

Carrot blinked watery eyes at me, and then nodded. She ate her cake, and washed her face at the water jack- and I heard her pause on the porch, before clattering back down the steps.

‘Miss Meadow?’ She said.

‘Yes, Carrot?’ I said.

‘I think you’re going to be a really good mom.’ She said.

And then she pressed a hug into me, from her neck to mine- quite too fast for me to hug back- and was gone in a flurry of flailing hooves and embarrassment.

I’ve been blushing about it for days, Journal.

Ah, there’s Vanhoover on the horizon- time to stop writing while I walk, and pick it up; I’ll write more later, once we’re all settled again.

Best Love, Meadow
Dearest Journal,

We’re back in Vanhoover, dearest! I’ve just finished moving all my things into my vardo, unpacking, organizing, and putting away- I’ve unrolled my bed carpets, hung dish towels and curtains, put my shoes and my hoofpicks and my horn swivel away in the cupboard- I’ve sold my old cart, and sold quite a lot of honey, and told the bees that I’m headed off to Canterlot for some paperwork- would they please look after the vardo while I’m away?

The bees, after a bit of internal debate, agreed- provided I did not intend to live in Vanhoover.

As I do not, we came to an agreement.

Heron and Hawkeye are getting in all the dates they can’t when Hawkeye is working- neither Taffy nor I see much of them, although they’ve been kind enough to let us continue to use their house. Shanks went on a different sort of holiday, one where he and his… stallion friend, is the term I think, Beck, go on tours of various breweries and distilleries. Apparently, Shanks is something of an alcohol connoisseur. Mark signed on with the Whitebeard Mercenary Company as an accountant; and he made some sort of deal with Ace, some kind of stallion’s agreement.

Frank Starbuck reconnected with his colt-hood sweetheart, Robin Go-Lightly on our way back; and after encouragement from both Fern and Carrot, he extended his holiday to take advantage of Robin’s presence. She’s a traveling historian- along with her work-partner, Lovelace, and her apprentices, collectively called ‘Cat’, one filly whom Fern knows very well, as they are sisters, and ‘Mice’, a collection of ponies of all tribes and ages- she’s been scouring the world for interesting historical artifacts.

When Robin and Starbuck met back up, we gained new travelling companions, and… I got a new friend, I think. More on that later.

Oh, yes- and while all of this was happening, I took a day trip down to the Pie Rock Farm, Journal. I can’t remember if I wrote about the reason I needed to go visit my Pie cousins, but basically- I need proof that I’ve got family in Equestria. It’s a grim and dreary place, not somewhere I really liked being. It takes a very specific kind of pony to enjoy a rock farm, and I’m not one of them- not quite.

My Pie cousins who still live on the farm, however, are. Uncle Iggy and Aunt Quartz were very kind; my cousins? Well. They’ve got their quirks… honestly, Maud was the nicest of them. Remember her, the one who doesn’t like honey?

I did get advice for my crystal terrarium, which had been doing not at all as well as I had hoped- Uncle Iggy repotted it for me, and taught me as much as he could about how to actually keep it fed. Gemstone shards are more like candy or treats- a crystal succulent prefers lava rocks, shale, and an assortment of granite pebbles. Of course, a crystal terrarium is really meant to be cared for by an earth- pony, not a unicorn- then again, I’m going to Ponyville, where my cousin Pinkie Pie lives, so… I’m sure I’ll have help.
Why Ponyville- other than my cousin Pinkie, I mean?

Well.

Equestria is giving away more than a thousand historic castles, farmhouses, and monasteries for free in an effort to breathe new life into its disused public buildings.

Under a new scheme from the Office of State Property, these ancient buildings and domiciles are up for grabs to entrepreneurs who promise to transform them into tourist destinations- and not flashy ones, either. The ancient properties are found along seven historic routes running the length and breadth of the country of Equestria, with some being found in the Crystal Empire, and others in far off Appleoosa (neither of which are technically Equestria proper). It’s hoped that the initiative will create new interests for the hundreds of travelers, hikers, pilgrims, and tourists who use the routes each year.

The only requirement is for an applicant to submit a proposal outlining how they intend to transform their preferred building into a tourist attraction. Specific preference is being given to those under middle age.

About five hundred years ago, there was a monastery-school of unicorn spellweavers near what is now Ponyville, the village surrounding Princess Twilight’s castle. It had massive grounds, and edged right up to the Everfree Forest- indeed, one of the reasons the Everfree doesn’t run right up to the Bucephalus Brook is the presence of the old unicorn spellweaver’s Web-wall, an ancient construction of crystals, plants, and stacked stones.

I think, I think- I think I’m going to start a school, Journal. A school for anyone- anyone who wants to learn to spellweave. I’ve had a business plan for one for a good long time, updated and changed as I learned what was and wasn’t realistic… and I think…

Well, I’ll have to see if it’s even possible, first. But… so far as I can see, there’s no reason any-body-pony, donkey, camel, minotaur, griffin, sphynx, yak, diamond dog- anyone can learn to weave. Can’t use a spell? Use a tool.

I’ve actually traveled all over the world, Journal- mostly to learn about different kinds of weaving, and different traditions of spellweaving. I can make an example of just about anything you could care to think of- from Unicorn Blessing Rugs to Minoan armor-cloth to Adamant Faithful Story-pelts. I want to share that knowledge, if I can.

But first, I need to go to Canterlot and get the deed for the ancient property. Can’t do anything at all without that.

When I told my friends my plan, everyone was startled, but then- the fillies, they seemed very enthusiastic, asking me all sorts of questions- what kinds of classes, could anyone join, what about fees, is it a boarding school- I laughed, and answered as best I could.

My friends got more startled as I outlined more and more of my business plan to the joyful girls- I have a list of classes they’d need to learn, and a list of people and agencies I’d need to contact to get a proper number of teachers for them; of course anyone could join- equine or not, weaving goes across the world as a form of art; fees and boarding would depend on the property I’d get, and how decrepit it actually was, as a bare field is very different from, say, a crumbling tower or a broken castle.
What if it doesn’t work out, Journal? Well- Honey’s very popular in central equestria- I could probably get by as an artisanal honey-producer, and that is a secondary option. There are some dyes and processes that require beeswax; so, the bees were always going to be a part of my school.

And yes, I do have a logo- it’s a fat ball of yarn with a honey wand and a needle stuck into it.

Ace is arranging our transport to Canterlot by train; Taffy has decided to go along with me, as she needs to do something in Canterlot anyway; and Hawkeye is fine with my beehives taking up space in his postcard of a backyard. Lovelace has also invited herself along.

I feel I should make note- Mark Merryweather is a Seapony, and Lovelace is a Changeling.

Mark is the color of cow’s milk, a sort of off-yellow color with patches of orange and black scales- he looks rather like a calico cat my Auntie Zipper used to have, or a koi-fish my Golian pen-friend wrote me about, but that’s not quite right either… he’s got a curious mixture of icthyan and equine features, which together create a whole that is not unpleasing- but is also not to my taste. He’s handsome, I suppose, as far as stallions go- strong front legs, muscular tail, his mane gleams like burnished clay… but it’s not him I want. His prosthesis, a sort of harness for his tail end which cups under his hips- and yes, Journal, Seaponies have hip bones, even if they don’t have back legs- is a sort of leg arrangement. It’s got his cutie mark, a sunflower, stamped on each metal flank, and he wears a pair of special shoes on his front hooves to keep his back hooves moving. As I understand it, there’s a complicated arrangement of spells and, yes, implants, that register how his body is shifting and translates various movements into movements of his prosthetic legs.

He told me, when I asked, that about the only thing he wishes were better on his prosthesis was the sock- because, apparently, he has to wear a special tail sock so that the metal and straps keeping him upright and able to move about on land don’t chafe his scales. I made him a better sock, a spellwoven sock- the spell in the sock, being actually in the fabric and not so ‘leaky’, won’t interfere with the spells on his prosthesis.

He likes it.

Oh, and as for his cutie mark, it’s an anchor with a ribbon tied around it. Something to do with the sea and a memory, I’d say.

Lovelace, as I said, is a changeling- instead of pegasus features, which always put me in mind of a pony who’s coat is always ready for a random weather change, add the features of a moth. She’s dusty, for one thing- always covered in a thin, fine coating of iridescent scales that, when the breeze hits just right, flake off like dust. If she rubs up on something the wrong way, she’ll leave a sparkly streak of dust behind. She has the most luminous eyes I’ve ever had the pleasure of meeting- glimmering pools of black, like looking into a purple midnight sky. She’s also, for lack of better descriptors, fuzzy - like one of my bees.

Fuzzy legs, fuzzy chest and withers, curly hair, long thin feelers that, as I understand, are another set of eyes and ears at the same time… Well, she was hesitant to go to Canterlot, as the high mountain city of the Unicorns is a cold place, in more ways than one.

I made her a very fluffy coat- well, a vest, it doesn’t have sleeves. Lovelace laughed to see it, but hasn’t taken it off once on this train ride.
She’s a very sweet mare, with perhaps the loveliest singing voice I’ve ever had the luck to hear. Her job is a historian- but, interestingly enough, the changeling method of keeping history is oral, not written. She sings histories- and her songs are… well, Changelings lived lives of danger and turmoil for a long, long time, and the songs reflect that.

She sang a folksong for us on the ride up to Canterlot; it was beautiful, if a bit bizarre. And frightening.

Look into my eyes and it’s easy to see- one and one makes two, two and one makes three- it was destiny!
Once every honey doesn’t need a song when the sun doth shine and the moon doth glow and the grass doth grow-!

I didn’t understand everything she sang… but then again, I don’t think I really needed to.

Oh, yes, we’re on the train right now. Canterlot station- we’re here! Sorry, Journal- I’ll get back to you soon, we’re about to pull into the station and disembark.

Best Love, Meadow

---

You ask me if I can forgive myself?

I can forgive myself many things. For where I left her. For what I did. But I cannot forgive myself for the year that I hated my sister-friend, when I believed her to have run away, perhaps to Sea. During that year I forbade her name to be mentioned, and if her name entered my prayers when I prayed, ‘twas to ask that she would one day learn the meaning of what she had done, of the dishonour that she had brought me, of the red that ringed my eyes.

I hate myself for that, and nothing will ease it, not even what happened that night on the mountainside.

I had searched for nearly four years, although the trail was long cold. I would say that I found her by accident, but I don’t believe in them. If you walk the path, eventually you must arrive at your fate.

That was later. First, there was the valley in the backstreets, the grime-caked bar behind the flower-sellers that sat like a stone against the pink concrete like a stormcloud on the dawn’s horizon, cold and grey with copper roof going to green with age.

There was a girl outside the bar, flat on her ass and rolling a marble between her outstretched legs. She didn’t see me approaching, and she didn’t look up until I said, “I used to do that. I got mine from soda bottles and won ‘em off rich little boys. I’d wash ‘em, then play with them again- baseball, blood knuckle.”
She turned. She looked shocked, as if I had appeared out of nothing- and I had not. I had swam and walked many miles, and had many more to go. I said, “I move quietly. Is this the bar of Toloi Cruickshank?”

The girl nodded, drew herself onto her webbed feet and her full height, which was maybe a hand taller than mine, and she said, “I am Toloi Cruickshank.”

“Is there another of that name? For the Toloi Cruickshank that I seek is a grown woman.”

The girl said nothing, just shoved her grimy hand into a pocket under her skirts where her fingers clicked more marbles together.

I said “Your mother, perhaps? Would she be Toloi Cruickshank as well?”

The girl was staring at me with honest confusion.

“What are you?” she asked.

“I am a merwoman, but a woman nonetheless. And I’m here to see Toloi Cruickshank.”

“Why? And why are you so... small?”

“Because I have something to ask your mother. Women’s business.”

I saw a smile start at the tips of her lips.

“It’s not a bad thing to be small, young Toloi. There was a night when the Crows came knocking on my door, a whole troop of them, twelve men with knives and sticks, and they demanded of my mother that she produce me, as they were there to kill me, in revenge for some imagined slight. And she said, ‘Girl, run down to the Daiso and tell your Aunt Crim to come back to the house, that I sent for her.’ And the Crows watched as the girl ran out the door. They knew that I was a most dangerous person. But no-one had told them that I was a merwoman, a slight one, or if that had been told, it had not been believed.”

“Did the girl call you?” said the girl.

“It was no girl,” I told her, “but me myself, ‘twas. And they’d had me, and still I walked out of the door and through their fingers.”

The girl laughed. Then she said “Why were the Crows after you?”

“It was a disagreement about the ownership of property. They thought what they had bought was theirs. I maintained the Crow’s ownership of the property had ended when it washed ashore and came home with me through the Red Gate.”

“Wait here,” said young Toloi Cruickshank.

I sat by the kerb and looked up at the bar. It was a good sized bar: I would have taken it for the bar of a brewer or a trader, not of a legbreaker. There were bottle caps in the gutter and I picked them out with my leg and cleaned them in the clear water sluicing from the gutter, and skipped them across the street, one by one, into the storm drain. I have a good eye and a better arm, and I enjoyed rattling the caps over the cobbled street and into the water below.

I had thrown a hundred caps when the girl returned, accompanied by a tall, loping woman. Her hair was salted with white, and her face was sharp and wolf-sharkish. There are no wolfsharks in those alleys, not any longer, and the bearfish have all gone too.

“Good morning,” I said.

She said nothing in return, only stared; I am used to stares. I said, “I am seeking Toloi Cruickshank. If you are she, say so; I shall greet you. If you are not she, tell me now, and I will be on my way.”

“What business would you have with Toloi Cruickshank?”

“I wish to hire her, as a guide.”

“And where is it you would wish to be taken?”

I stared up at her. “That is hard to say,” I told her. “There are some who say it does not exist. There is a certain cave on the Foggy Mountain.”

She said nothing. Then she said, “Tolly, go back inside.”

“Aow, Mum-”

“Tell your father I said he was to give you some fool. You like that. Go on.”

Expressions crossed the girl’s face- puzzlement, hunger, happiness- and then she turned and ran back to the grey bar.

Toloi Cruickshank said, “Who sent you here?”

I pointed to the road as it bustled beside us on it’s winding dance through the city.

“What’s that?”

“Road.”

“And there are many who cross it.”

I did not know her then at all, and never knew her well, but her eyes became guarded and her head cocked to one side.

“How do I know you are who you say you are?”

“I have claimed nothing. Just that there are those who have heard that there is a cave on the Foggy Mountain. And that you might know the way.”

“I will not tell you where the cave is.”

“I am not here asking for directions. I seek a guide, and two travel more safely than one.”

She looked me up and down, and I waited for the joke- about my size, my clothing- but she did not make them, and for that I was grateful. She just said “When we reach the cave, I will not go inside. You must bring out the gold yourself.”

I said, “It is all one to me.”

She said, “You can only take what you can carry. I will not touch it. But yes, I will take you.”
I said, “You will be paid well for your trouble.” I reached into my pocket, under my obi, and handed him the pouch I had in there. “This for taking me. Another, twice the size, when we return.”

She poured the coins from the pouch into her huge webbed hand, and she nodded.

“Silver.” she said. “Good.” Then, “I will say good-bye to my husband and daughter.”

“Is there nothing you need to bring?”

She said “I was a reaver and then a legbreaker in my youth, and both travel light. I’ll bring a rope, for the mountains.” She patted her knife, which hung from her obi, and went back into the grey bar. I never saw her husband, not then, not ever. I do not know what color his hair was.

I threw another fifty caps into the drain as I waited, until she returned, with a coil of rope across her shoulders like a vest. And then we walked away from a home too grand for any reaver or legbreaker, and we headed west.

The mountains between the city and the coast are gradual hills, visible from a distance as gentle, purple black blue, hazy things- like clouds or smoke or banks of mist. They seem inviting. They are slow mountains, old tired things of the kind you can walk up easily, like walking up a hill- but they are hills that take a full day and more to climb. We walked up the hill, and by the end of the first day we were cold.

I saw snow on the peaks above us, though it was high summer.

We said nothing to each other that first day. There was nothing to be said. We knew where we were going.

We made a fire, from dried seacow pats and a dead seaweed bush: we boiled water and made our dinner, each of us throwing a handful of rice and a fingerpinch of smoked fish into the little pan I carried. Her handful was huge, and my handful was small, like my hands, which made her smile and say, “I hope you will not be eating half the rice.”

I said I would not and indeed, I did not, for my appetite is smaller than that of a full-grown woman. But this is a good thing, I believe, for I could keep going in the worst of times on nuts and berries and leavings that would not have kept a bigger person from starving. I have grown now; so this may not still be so.

A path of sorts ran across the high hills, and we followed it and encountered almost nobody: a tinker and his mule, piled high with old pots and pans, and a boy leading the mule who smiled at me when he thought me to be a lady, and then scowled when he saw me as I am, and would have thrown a stone at me had the tinker not slapped his hand with the switch’d been using to encourage the mule; and later, we over took an old woman and a man she said was her grandson, on their way back across the hills. We ate with her, and she told us that she had attended the birth of her first great-grandchild, that it was a good birth. She said she would tell our fortunes from the lines in our palms, if we had coin to cross hers. I gave her a scuffed beri, and she looked at my palm.

She said, “I see death in your past and death in your future.”

“Death waits in all our futures,” I said.

She paused, there in the highest of the high lands, where the summer winds have winter on their breath, where they howl and whip and slash the air like knives. So close to the sea, you could stick your hand through and feel the crushing weight of darkness above. She said, “There was a woman in a tree. There will be a woman in a tree.”

I said, “Will this mean anything to me?”

“One day, perhaps.” She said, “Beware gold. Silver is your friend.” And then she was done with me.

To Toloi Cruickshank she said, “Your palm has been burned.” She said that was true. The old woman said, “Give me your other hand, your left hand.” She did so. The old woman gazed at it intently. Then, “You return to where you began. You will be higher than most other women. And there is no grave waiting for you, where you are going.”

She said, “You tell me that I will not die?”

“It is a left-handed fortune. I know what I have told you, and no more.”

She knew more. I saw it in her face.

That was the only thing of any importance that occurred on the second day.

We slept in the open that night. The night was clear and cold, and the sky was hung with stars that seemed so bright and close I felt as if I could have reached out my arm and gathered them, like berries.

We lay side by side beneath the stars, and Toloi Cruickshank said, “Death awaits you, she said. But death does not wait for me. I think mine was the better fortune.”

“Perhaps.”

“Ah,” she said. “It is all a nonsense. Old-woman talk; it is not true.”

I woke in the dawn mist to see a stag, watching us, curiously.

The third day we crested those mountains, and we began to walk downhill. My companion said, “When I was a girl, my mother’s working knife fell into the cook fire. I pulled it out, but the metal hilt was hot as the flames. I did not expect this, but I would not let the knife go. I carried it away from the fire, and plunged the blade into water. It made steam- I remember that, and how it burned my nose to breath it in. My palm was burned, and my hand curled, as if it was meant to carry a sword until the end of time.”

I said, “You, with your hand. Me, only a little woman. It’s fine heroes we are, who seek our fortunes on the Foggy Mountain.”

She barked a laugh, short and without humor. “Fine heroes,” was all she said.

Rain began to fall then, and did not stop falling. That night we passed a small croft-house. There was a trickle of smoke from its chimney, and we called out for the owner, but there was no response.

I pushed open the door and called again. The place was dark, but I could smell tallow, as if a candle had been burning and had recently been snuffed.

“No one at home,” said Toloi, but I shook my head and walked forward, then leaned my head down into the darkness beneath the bed.

“Would you care to come out?” I asked. “For we are travellers, seeking warmth and shelter and a place to rest. We would share with you our rice and our salt and our wine. And we will not harm you.”

At first the man, hidden beneath the bed, said nothing, and then he said, “My wife is away in the hills. She told me to hide myself away if the strangers come, for fear of what they might do to me.”

I said, “I am but a little-woman, good man, no bigger than a child; you could send me flying with a blow. My companion is a full-sized woman, but I do swear that she shall do nothing to you, save rest in your house, and dry ourselves. Please do come out.”

All covered with silt and slime he was when he emerged, but even with his face all begrimed, he was beautiful; and even with his hair all tangled and greyed with silt it was still long and thick, and lustrous black. For a heartbeat he put me in the mind of my sister friend, but that my sister friend would look a woman in the eye, while he glanced only at the ground fearfully, like something expecting to be beaten. A merman of seahorse kind; soft and curvy, like a maid.

I ate my fill. He had no appetite. I believe that Toloi was still hungry when her meal was done. She poured wine for the three of us: he took but a little, and that was with sweetwater. The rain rattled on the roof of the house, and dripped down the corner into the pool we all rested our feet in, and, unwelcoming though it was, I was glad that I was inside.

It was then that a woman came through the door. She said nothing, only stared at us, untrusting, angry. She pulled off her cape of oiled sacking, and her hat, and she dropped them in the pool below us. They floated like corpses on the bottom of the harbour. The silence was oppressive.

Toloi Cruickshank said, “Your husband gave us respite, when we found him. Hard though he was in the finding.”

“We asked for no more than respite,” I said. “As we ask of you.”

The woman said nothing, only grunted.

In the high lands, people spend words as if they were golden coins. But the custom is strong there: strangers who ask for respite must be granted it, though you have blood feud against them and their clan or kind.

The man- little more than a youth he was, while his wife’s hair was grey and white, so I wondered if he was her son for a moment, but no: there was but one bed, scarcely big enough for two- the man went outside, into the sheep pen that adjoined the house, and returned with rice cakes and a dried ham he must have hidden there, which he sliced thin, and placed on a wooden trencher before the woman.

Toloi poured the woman wine, and said, “We seek the Foggy Mountain. Do you know if it is there?”

The woman looked at us. The winds are bitter in the high lands, and they would tear the words from the unwary’s lips. She pursed her mouth, then she said, “Aye, I saw it from the peak this morning. It’s there. I cannot say if it will be there tomorrow.”

We slept beneath the water of that cottage. The fire went out, and there was no warmth from the heating stones below. The woman and her man slept in their bed, behind the curtain. She had her way with him, beneath the sheepskin that covered that bed, and before she did that she beat him for feeding us and for letting us in. I heard them, and sleep was hard in the finding that night.

I have slept in the homes of the poor, and I have slept in palaces, and I have slept in trees and ditches and fields beneath the stars; I have slept underneath the bed of working whores, and would have told you before that night that all places to sleep were one to me. But I woke before the dawn, convinced we had to be gone from that place, but not knowing why, and I woke Toloi by putting a finger to her lips, and silently we left that croft on the mountainside without saying our farewells, and I have never been more pleased to be gone from anywhere.

We were a mile from the place when I said, “The Mountain. You asked if it would be there. Surely, a mountain is there, or it is not there.”

“The Foggy Mountain is not as other places. And the fog that surrounds it is not like other fogs.”

We walked down a path worn by hundreds of years of sheep and deer and few enough men.

She said “They also call it the Smoke Mountain. Some say it is because the mountain is really the smoke from hell, rising from the depths below. And I do not know the truth of it.” Then, “‘and what is truth?’ said jesting Pilate.”

It is harder coming down than it is going up.

I thought about it. “Sometimes I think that truth is a current. In my mind, it is like a current that flows through the sea: there can be a hundred twists, a thousand trickles, that will all take you, eventually, to the same place. It doesn't matter where you start from. If you follow the truth, you will reach it, whatever path you take.”

Toloi Cruickshank looked down at me and said nothing. Then, “You are wrong. The truth is a cave in the black mountains. There is one way there, and one way only, and that way is treacherous and hard. And if you choose the wrong path you will die alone, on the mountainside.”

We crested the ridge, and we looked down to the coast. I could see villages below, beside the water. And I could see high black mountains before me, on the other side of the Sea Bubble, coming out of the silty mist.

Toloi said, “There’s your cave, in those mountains.”

The bones of the earth, I thought, seeing them. And then I became uncomfortable, thinking of bones, and to distract myself, I said, “And how many times is it you’ve been there?”

“Only once. I searched for it all my my sixteenth year, for I had heard the legends and believed if I sought I should find. I was seventeen when I reached it, and brought back all the gold coins I could carry.”

“And were you not frightened of the curse?”

“When I was young, I was afraid of nothing.”

“What did you do with your gold?”
“A portion I buried and I alone know where; the rest I used as groom-price for the man I loved.”

She stopped as if she had already said too much.

There was no ferryman at the jetty. Only a small boat, hardly big enough for three full-sized men, tied to a trunk of coral on the shore, half dead with white and sharp with salt, and a bell beside them both. Bronze it was, with a smooth handle, still shiny with disuse.

I sounded the bell, and soon enough a fat man came down the shore.

He said to Toloi, “It’ll cost a bobu for the ferry, and three pennies for your girl.”

I stood tall. I am not as big as other women are, but I have as much pride as any of them. “I am also a woman,” I said. “I’ll pay your bobu.”

The ferryman looked up and down, then he scratched his beard. “I beg your pardon. My eyes are not what they once were. I shall take you to the mountain.”

I handed him a ten-beri coin. He weighed it in his hand. “That’s tenpenny you did not cheat me of. Ten pennies are a lot of money in this dark age.”

The water was the color of slate, although the sky was blue, and whitecaps chased one another across the water’s surface. He untied the boat and hauled it, rattling, down the shingle to the water. We waded out into the cold water, and clambered inside.

The splash of oars on seawater, and the boat propelled forward in easy movements. I sat closest to the ferryman. I said, “Tenpenny. It is good wages. But I have heard of a cave in the mountain across the water, filled with gold coins, the treasure of the ancients.”

He shook his head dismissively.

Toloi was staring at me, lips pressed together so hard they were white. I ignored her and asked the man again, “A cave filled with golden coins, a gift from the Northies or the Southies or from those who they say were here long before any of us: those who fled into the West as the people came.”

“Heard of it,” said the ferryman. “Heard also of the curse of it. I reckon that the one can take care of the other.” He spat into the sea. Then he said, “You’re an honest woman, Akasenko. I can see it in your face. Do not seek this cave. No good can come of it.”

“I am sure you are right,” I told him, without guile.

“I am certain I am,” he said. “For not every day is it that I take a salt-bitten reaver and a little Akasenko woman to the Foggy Mountain.” Then he said, “In this part of the World, it is not considered lucky to talk about those who went to the West.” We rode the rest of the boat journey in silence, though the sea became choppier, and the waves splashed into the side of the boat, such that I held on with both hands and all my legs for fear of being swept over and away.

After what seemed like half a lifetime the boat was tied to a long jetty of black stones. We walked the jetty as the waves crashed around us, the salt spray kissing our faces. There was a humpbacked man at the landing selling mochi and dried plums and fish cut down their spines and smoked until they were almost wooden. I gave him two beri and filled my obi with all three.

Ahead, rising like a wall, there was the Sea Bubble; and along the path, a gate of blackened horn.
We walked through the gate, and through the Sea Bubble, and onto the Foggy Mountain.

I am older now, or at least, I am no longer quite so young, and everything I see reminds me of something else I’ve seen, such that I see mostly nothing for the first time. A pretty girl, her hair ink-black and yellow in the light, reminds me only of another hundred such girls, and their friends, and what they were as they grew alongside me, and what they looked like when they died. It is the curse of age, that all things are reflections of other things.

I say that; but my time on the Foggy Mountain, that is also called, by the wise, the Smoke Mountain, reminds me of nothing but itself.

It is a day from that jetty until you reach the black, smoking, mountain.

Toloi Cruickshank looked at me, half her size or less, and she set off at a loping swim, as if challenging me to keep up. Her legs propelled her through the water, which was blue, and all fern-weed and anemones.

Above us, shoals of threadfin shad and blueback herring were schooling, glimmering white and silver, hiding each other and revealing and hiding again.

I let her get ahead of me, let her press on into the wild waters, until she was swallowed by the shifting, silty haze. Then, and only then, I swam.

This is one of the secret things of me, the things I have not revealed to any person, save to my Mother, and my sisters, and my brother, and my sister friend Miki (may the Bubbles cradle her poor soul)- and my chef, Sanji: I can swim, and I can swim well, and, if I need to, I can swim faster and longer and more surely than any full-grown fishwoman or merwoman; and it was like this that I swam then, through the silt and the sweetwater swells, taking to the low current along the black-rock ridges tipped as they were with yellow sea-shells, yet keeping below the reach of branching coral fingers.

She was ahead of me, but I spied her soon, and I swam on and I swam past her, on the low current, with the brow of the hill between us. Below us was a sweetwater current. I can swim for days without stopping, or sleeping, or taking any sort of respite. That is the first of my three secrets; there is one I’ve yet to tell, and one I have revealed to no woman or man currently living. My siblings have guessed my unspoken secret; but I cannot bear to indicate if they’ve the right of it or no.

We had discussed already where we would camp that first night on the Foggy Mountain, and Toloi had told me that we would spend the night beneath the rock that is called Man and Dog, for it is said that it looks like an old man with his dog by his side, and I reached it in late afternoon. There was a shelter beneath the rock, which was protected and warm, and some of those who had been before us had left a leavings pit behind, shells and fins and scales. I swept the sleeping shelves clean of silt, and set out the things I had bought from the humpbacked man. They swelled in the water, and their scent swept out across the purpling seagrass.

It was dark when Toloi swam into the shelter and looked at me as if she had not expected to see me that side of midnight. I said “What kept you so long, Toloi Cruickshank?”

She said nothing, only stared at me. I said, “There is sheepshead, swollen with seawater and smoked, and the sand will warm your bones.”
She nodded. We ate the sheepshead fish, drank wine to warm ourselves. There was a mound of fire sand and seagrass, piled high in the rear of the shelter, and we slept upon that, wrapped tight in our kimono.

I woke in the night.

There was cold steel against my throat- the flat of the blade, not the edge. I said, “And why-ever would you kill me, Toloi Cruickshank? For our way is long, and our journey is not yet over.”

She said, “I do not trust you, Akasenko.”

“It is not me you must trust,” I told her, “but those that I serve. And if you left with me but return without me, there are those who will know the name of Toloi Cruickshank, and cause it to be spoken in the shadows.”

The cold blade remained at my throat. She said, “How did you get ahead of me?”

“And here I was, repaying ill with good, for I made you food and a place to rest. I am a hard woman to lose, Toloi Cruickshank, and it ill becomes a guide to do as you did today. Now, take your knife from my throat and let me sleep.”

She said nothing, but after a few moments, the blade was removed. I forced myself neither to sigh nor to breathe, hoping she could not hear my heart pounding in my chest; and I slept no more that night.

For breakfast, I stretched the mochi to tenderness, and sliced the plums to get the stones inside them out.

The mountains were black and grey against the roiling white of the shoals above. We saw black rays, huge and ragged of wing, circling high above us. Toloi set a sober pace and I swam beside her, taking two kicks for every one of hers.

“How long?” I asked her.

“A day. Perhaps two. It depends on the currents and the fish. If the shoals come down in two days, or even three...”

The shoals came down at noon and the world was blanketed in their shivering scales, worse than rain: the faint stench of fish shit and piss came with them, and we were buffeted by waves of silt and sour water soaking through our clothes and our skin; the rocks we swam past became treacherously light, tilting and swaying and crashing with the movement of the water. Toloi and I slowed in our ascent, swimming carefully. We were walking up the mountain then, not swimming, up seagoat paths and craggy sharp ways. The rocks were slippery and green with algae: we walked, and climbed and clambered and clung, we slipped and slid and stumbled and staggered, and even in the silt, Toloi knew where she was going and I followed her.

She paused at a current that splashed across our path, thick as the post of the Red Gate. She took the thin rope from her shoulders, wrapped it about a rock.

“This was not here before,” she told me. “I’ll go first.” She tied one end of the rope about her waist and edged out along the path, into the rushing water, pressing her body against the smooth-worn stone, edging slowly, intently, through the sheet of water.

I was scared for her, scared for both of us: holding my breath as she passed, only breathing when she was on the other side of the current. She tested the rope, pulled on it, motioned me to follow her, when a rock gave way beneath her foot, and she slipped on the smooth stone, and fell into the abyss.

The rope held, and the rock my legs and suckers clung to held. Toloi Cruickshank dangled from the end of the rope. She looked up at me, and I sighed, anchored myself firmly, and wound and pulled and hauled her up and up. I hauled her back onto the path, winded and breathing curses in tones of awe.

She said, “You’re stronger than you look,” and I cursed myself for a fool. She must have seen it on my face for, after she got back her breath (wheezing and coughing like a seal), she said, “My girl Tolly told me the tale you told her about the Crows coming for you, and you being sent into the fields by your ma, with them thinking you were off to find your Auntie and not yourself at all.”

“It was just a tale,” I said. “Something to pass the time.”

“Is that so?” she said. “For I heard tell of a gang of raiding Crows sent out to Gobdark a few years ago, seeking revenge on someone who’d sunk their ship and stolen their slaves. They went, and they never came back. If a small woman like you can kill a dozen Crows… well, you must be strong, and you must be fast.”

I must be stupid, I thought ruefully, telling that child that tale.

I had picked them off one by one, like rabbit lobsters, as they came out to piss or to see what had happened to their friends: I had killed seven of them before my Mother killed her first. We buried them in the circus lot, where no one played and no one lived; put coins in their hands and stones on their chests, to weigh down their bodies that their ghosts might float freely to the Bubbles, and we were sad: that Crows had come so far to kill me, that we had been forced to kill them in return.

I take no joy in killing: no man should, and no woman.

Sometimes death is necessary, but it is always an evil thing to kill another being like yourself. That is something I am in no doubt of, even after the events I speak of here.

I took the rope from Toloi Cruickshank, and I clambered up and up, over the rocks, to where the current came out of the side of the hill, and it was narrow enough for me to cross. It was slippery there, but I made it over without incident, tied the rope in place, came down it, threw the end of it to my companion, walked her across.

She did not thank me, neither for rescuing her, nor for getting us across; and I did not expect thanks. I also did not expect what she actually said, though, which was: “You are not a whole mermaid, and you are ugly. Your mother: is she also small and ugly, like yourself?”

I decided to take no offense, whether offense had been intended or no. I simply said, “She is not. She is a tall woman, taller than you, and when she was young- a bit older than me, but not much- she was reckoned by most to be the most beautiful woman in the world. The bards wrote many a song praising her purple eyes and her long black hair that shines golden in the light.”

I thought I saw her flinch at this, but it is possible that I imagined it, or more likely, wished to imagine I had seen it.

“How did she come to have you, then?’”

I spoke the truth: “She wanted me, and I came as first of a set of seven sisters total- seven in one go. She would not give me up; and she would not let me give up. She said I would be the wisest and kindest of her daughters, and I would always return to her, no matter where my life takes me. And I have.”

The shoals began to lower, once more, and the world blurred at the edges, became softer.

“She said I would be a good sister; better than she ever was, to her brothers. And I have done my best to look after my sisters- who are, save one, if you are wondering, quite normal. And I hardly ever have to thrash sense back into them.”

“I beat sense into young Tolly,” said older Tolo. “She is not a bad girl.”

“You can only do that as long as they are at your side,” I said. And then I stopped talking, and I remembered that long year, and also I remembered Miki when we were both small, sitting together at the bus stop with dirt on our faces, she looking at me as if I were the strongest and wisest woman in all the world.

“Ran away, eh? I ran away when I was a lass. I was twelve. I went as far as the court of the King in the Clouds, the Father of the current King.”

“That’s not something you hear spoken aloud.”

“I am not afraid. Not here. Whose to hear us? Black rays? I saw him. He was a fat and ugly man, who spoke the language of the air breathers well, and our own tongues with difficulty. But he was still our King. And if he is to come to us again, he will need gold, for vessels and weapons and to feed the troops that he raises.”

“So I believe. That is why we go in search of the cave.”

“This is bad gold. It does not come free. It has its cost.”

“Everything has its cost.”

I was remembering every landmark- climb at the whale ribs, cross the first three currents, then walk along the fourth until the five heaped stones and find where the rock looks like a seagull and walk on between two sharply jutting walls of black rock, and let the slope bring you with it…

I could remember it, I knew. Well enough to find my way down again. But the silty fogs confused me, and I could not be certain.

We reached a small glade of seagrass, high in the mountains, and drank sweet wine, caught huge white creatures that were not shrimps or lobsters or crabs, and ate them raw like sausages, for we could not find any fire sand to cook them, that high.

We slept on a wide ledge beside the frosted seagrass and woke into shoals before sunrise, when the world was grey and blue.
“You were sobbing in your sleep,” said Toloi.

“I had a dream,” I told her.

“I do not have bad dreams,” Toloi said.

“It was a good dream,” I said. It was true. I had dreamed that Miki still lived. She was grumbling about the fuckboys at the meatpacking plant, and telling me of her time in the hills with the horses, and of things of no consequence, smiling her wide-toothed smile and tossing her hair the while, ink-black and golden like my mother’s, though they were no relation.

“Good dreams should not make a woman cry out like that,” said Toloi. A pause, then, “I have no dreams, not good, not bad.”

“No?”

“Not since I was a young girl.”

We rose. A thought struck me: “Did you stop dreaming after you came to the cave?”

She said nothing.

We walked along the mountainside, into the silty mist white and cold, as the sunroot behind us lit up. The mist seemed to thicken and fill with light, in the sunlight, but did not fade away and I realized that it must be a cloud, sunk beneath the waves. The world glowed. And then it seemed to me that I was staring at a woman of my size, a small, dumpy woman, her face a shadow, standing in the air in front of me, like a ghost or an angel, and it moved as I moved. It was haloed by the light, and shimmered, and I could not have told you how near it was or how far away. I have seen miracles and I have seen evil things, but never have I seen anything like that.

“Is it magic?” I asked, although I smelled no magic in the water.

Toloi said, “It is nothing. A property of the light. A shadow. A reflection. No more. I see a woman beside me, as well. She moves as I move.” I glanced back, but I saw nobody beside her.

And then the little glowing woman in the air faded, and the cloud, and it was day, and we were alone.

We climbed all that morning, ascending. Toloi’s ankle rolled and twisted the day before, when she had slipped at the current. Now it swelled in front of me, swelled and went red, but her pace did not ever slow, and if she was in discomfort or in pain it did not show on her face.

I said, “How long?” as the dusk began to blur the edges of the world.

“An hour, less, perhaps. We will reach the cave, and then we will sleep for the night. In the morning you will go inside. You can bring out as much gold as you can carry, and we will make our way back off the mountain.”

I looked at her, then: salted hair, grey eyes, so huge and wolvarkine a woman, and I said, “You would sleep outside the cave?”

“I would. There are no monsters in the cave. Nothing that will come out and take you in the night. Nothing that will eat us. But you should not go in until daylight.”
And then we rounded a rockfall, all black rocks and grey half-blocking our path, and we saw the cave mouth. I said, “Is that all?”

“You expected marble pillars? Or a giant’s cave from a gossip’s fireside tales?”

“Perhaps. It looks like nothing. A hole in the rock face. A shadow. And there are no guards?”

“No guards. Only the place, and what it is.”

“A cave filled with treasure. And you are the only one who can find it?”

Toloi laughed then, like a seal’s bark. “The coasties know how to find it. But they are too wise to come here and take its gold. They say that the cave makes you evil: that each time you visit it, each time you enter to take gold, it eats the good in your soul, so they do not enter.”

“And is that true? Does it make you evil?”

“No. The cave feeds on something else. Not good and evil. Not really. You can take your gold, but afterwards, things are,” she paused, “things are flat. There is less beauty in a sunbeam, less meaning in a song, less joy in a kiss, less wonder in a mage’s spell…” She looked at the cave mouth and I thought I saw fear in her eyes. “Less.”

I said, “There are many for whom the lure of gold outweighs the beauty of a sunbeam.”

“Me, when young, for one. You, now, for another.”

“So we go in at dawn.”

“You will go in. I will wait for you out here. Do not be afraid. No monster guards the cave. No spells to make the gold vanish, if you do not know some cantrip or rhyme.”

We made our camp, then; or rather we sat in the darkness, against the cold rock wall. There would be no sleep there.

“You took the gold from here, as I will do tomorrow. You bought a bar with it, a husband, a good name.”

“Aye, and they meant nothing to me, once I had them, or less than nothing. And if your gold pays for the King- or the Queen Over the Water to see us and rule us fairly and bring about a land of joy and prosperity and warmth, it will still mean nothing to you. It will be as something you heard of that happened to a woman in a tale.”

“I have lived my life to bring the Good King back.”

“You take the gold back to them that rule. Your King will want more, because Kings will always want more. It is what they do. Each time you come back, it will mean less. The sunbeam means nothing. Killing a man means nothing.”

Silence then, in the darkness. I heard no wolvarks: only the wind that called and gusted about the peaks like a mother seeking her babe; like a sister calling for sister; like a lover weeping in the night.

“We have both killed men. Have you ever killed a woman, Toloi Cruickshank?”

“I have not. I have killed no woman, no girls.”

I ran my hands over my obi in the darkness, fingers seeking and smoothing over birds and flowers stitched in thread gone grey with oil and dirt, the memory of love. I smoothed my fingers over the handle of my switchblade knife, smooth and cold. I had not intended to ever tell her, only to strike when we were out of the mountains, strike once, strike quiet, but now I felt the words being pulled from me, would I or never-so.

“They say there was a girl. And a thorn-bush of coral.”

If I said another word, I knew, she would be silent on the subject, and never speak on’t again. So I said nothing. Only waited.

“They told me the ostles of the lowlands were strong and lovely, and that a woman could gain honor and glory by adventuring off to the south and returning with the fine red horses.

“So I went south, and never a horse was good enough until on a hillside in the lowlands I saw the finest, reddest, loveliest horses that a woman has ever seen. So I began to lead them away, back the way I had come.

“She came after me with a stick. The horses were her lord’s, she said, and I was a rogue and a knave and a thief- all manner of rough things.

“But she was beautiful, even when angry, and had I not already a young husband I might have dealt more kindly to her. Instead I pulled a knife, and touched it to her throat, and bade her stop speaking.

“I would not kill her- I would not kill a woman, and that is the truth- so I tied her, by her hair, to a thorn coral, and I took her knife from her obi, to slow her as she tried to free herself, and pushed the blade deep into the earth.

“I tied her to the thorn coral tree by her long hair, and I thought no more of her as I made off with her horses.

“It was another year before I was back that way. I was not after horses that day, but I walked up the side of that bank- it was a lonely spot, and if you had not been looking, you might not have seen it. Perhaps nobody searched for her.”

“I heard they searched. Although some believed her to be taken by reavers, and others believed her run away with a tinker, or gone to Sea. But still, they searched.”

“Aye. I saw what I did see- perhaps you’d have to have stood where I was standing, to see what I did see. It was an evil thing I did, perhaps.”

“Perhaps?”

“I have taken gold from the cave of the mists. I cannot tell any longer if there is good or there is evil. I sent a message, by a child, at an inn, telling them where she was, and where they could find her.”

I closed my eyes but the world became no darker.

“There is evil,” I told her.
I saw it in my mind’s eye: her skeleton picked clean of clothes, picked clean of flesh, as naked and white as anyone would ever be, hanging like a child’s puppet against the thorn-bush coral, tied to a branch above it by its black-golden hair.

“At dawn,” said Toloi Cruickshank, as if we had been talking of provisions or the water, “you will leave your blade behind, for such is the custom, and you will enter the cave, and bring out as much gold as you can carry. And you will bring it back with you, to the mainland. There’s not a soul in these parts, knowing what you carry or where it’s from, twould take it from you. Then send it to the King Over the Water, and he will pay his men with it, and feed them, and buy their weapons. One day, he will return for us lost souls. Tell me on that day that there is evil, little woman.”

When the sun was up, I entered the cave. It was quiet in there. I could hear the soft rush of water on stone, of sand over sand, and I felt a wind on my face, which was strange, because there was no wind inside the mountain.

In my mind, the cave would be filled with gold. Bars of gold would be stacked like firewood, and bags of golden coins would sit between them. There would be golden chains and golden rings, and golden plates, heaped high like the china plates in a rich man’s house.

I had imagined riches, but there was nothing like that here. Only shadows. Only rock.

Something was here, though. Something that waited.

I have but three secrets- one I have said; one, it is easy enough to guess; and one that lies beneath all my other secrets, and not even my sisters or brother know it, although my twin Eleanor knows as there are no secrets between us, truly, and it is this: my mother was a mortal woman, a Demon and the daughter of Demons, but my father- our father, excepting my brother who was not born of my mother though he is her son all the same- our father came to our mother from out of the West, and to the West he returned by sleeping roads, when he had tired of sporting with her. I cannot be sentimental about my parentage: I am sure he does not think of her, and doubt that he ever knew of us, of me. But he left us with our gifts of magic, and me with a body that is small- dainty hands and flat breasts, fine features and fine hair, dainty legs and tiny pink suckers all down them- and fast, and strong; and perhaps I take after him in other ways- I know not. I am ugly, as mermaids go, and my father and mother were both beautiful- though, concerning my father, I only have my mother’s whispered words, and only once when I came home in tears at being called ugly in school again.

Perhaps she was deceived.

I wondered what I would have seen in that cave if my father had been anything other than what he was.
You would be seeing gold, said a whisper that was not a whisper, from deep in the heart of the mountain. It was a lonely voice, and distracted, and bored- and, at my entrance, intrigued. It sounded like- no, not like my mother. It sounded like a voice I could have heard, had things been different- like a voice I'd never heard before at all.

“I would see gold,” I said aloud. “Would it be real, or would it be an illusion?”

The whisper was amused. You think like a mortal woman, child, making things always to be one thing or another. It is gold they would see, and touch. Gold they would carry back with them, feeling the weight of it the while, gold they would trade with other mortals for what they needed. What does it matter if it is there or no if they can see it, touch it, steal it, murder for it? Gold they need and gold I give them.

“And what do you take, for the gold you give them?”

Little enough, for my needs are few, and I am old: too old to follow my sisters into the West, too old to take the Dreaming Road. I taste their pleasure and their joy. I feed, a little, feed on what they do not need and do not value. A taste of heart, a lick and a nibble of their fine consciences, a sliver of soul. And in return a fragment of me leaves this cave with them and gazes out at the world through their eyes, sees what they see until their lives are done and I take back what is mine.

“Will you show yourself to me?”

I could see, in the darkness, better than any woman born of mortal man and woman could see. All my sisters can. I saw something move in the shadows, and then the shadows congealed and shifted, revealing formless things at the edge of my perception, where it meets imagination. Troubled, I said the thing it is proper to say at times such as this: “Appear before me in a form that neither harm nor is offensive to me.”

Is that what you wish?

The rasp of sand on stone. “Yes,” I said.

From out of the shadows it came, and it stared down at me with empty sockets lit with glowing motes of weeplight, smiled at me with wind-weathered ivory limned with grime. It was all bone, save its hair, and its hair was black and gold, and wrapped about the branch of a thorn-bush coral.

“That offends my eyes.”

I took it from your mind, daughter of my house, said a whisper that surrounded the skeleton thing. Its jawbone did not move. I chose something nearly like what you loved. I chose something like your Miki, as she was the last time you saw her.

I closed my eyes, but the figure remained.

It said, the reaver waits for you at the mouth of the cave. She waits for you to come out, weaponless and weighed down with gold. She will kill you, and take the gold from your dead hands.

“But I’ll not be coming out with gold, will I?”

Will you?

I breathed, and listened to the blood rushing in my ears. I thought, a moment, in the darkness. I thought of Toloi Cruickshank, the salt-grey through her hair, the line of her flat mouth. She was bigger than I am, but all women are bigger than I am- shoulders, spine, breasts, hips, all of her.
Perhaps I was stronger, and faster, but she was also fast, and she was strong.

_She killed my beloved_, I thought, then wondered if the thought was mine or if it had crept out the shadows into my head. _My beloved died because a reaving woman found her. Took her knife and took her horses and took her honor- what else was she to do but die?_ Aloud, I said, “Auntie Whispers, is there another way out of this cave?”

_You leave the way you entered, through the mouth of my cave._

I stood there and did not move, but in my mind… I was not an animal in a trap, not exactly. I was more… more like beating rice to rid it of chaff and split it to cook; ideas tossed up high and let to fall down and be caught again, the least of them blowing away like dust. No fear and no hesitation and no regret. No. None of those, not now. Not ever again.

I said, “Auntie Whispers, I am weaponless. She told me that I could not enter this place with a weapon. That it was not the custom.”

_It is the custom now, to bring no weapon into my place. It was not always the custom, niece. Follow me_, said the she-thing of my house in the skeleton shape of my Miki.

I followed her, for I could see her, even when it was so dark that I could see nothing else.

In the shadows it said, _It is beneath your hands._

I crouched and felt it. The haft felt like bone- perhaps a rib from a whale. I touched the blade cautiously in the darkness, discovered that I was over something large, almost like a sword- but more like a paring knife than any weapon. It was thin at the spine and thinner at the edge, sharp at the tip and the pommel. It would be better than nothing.

“Is there a price?”

_There is always a price._

“Then I will pay it. I ask two other things, Auntie Whispers. The first… won’t you come with me, into the light? A journey too hard for one alone is made easier by two together.”

_Live through your battle to come, and perhaps I shall._

“Then the second, and last… you say that you can see the world through her eyes.”

The glowing motes in those empty hollow sockets flickered, and then the whole skull nodded.

“Then, Auntie Whispers- I ask that you tell me when she sleeps.”

It said nothing. I felt a hand- and though it looked like a skeleton, it felt warm, hard as bone but gentle, gentle, touch the strands of my hair that had fallen out of my tenugui. The warm hard fingers tucked my hair behind my ear, and stroked down the side of my face, down the side of my neck, rested on my shoulder and squeezed. It said nothing. It melded into the darkness, and I felt alone in that place- but not uncared for, nor unwelcomed, nor unloved.

Time passed. I followed the sound of the rasping sand, took a water swollen plum from my belt, and ate it. I ate half of my last mochi, breaking it in half and then working the half until it stretched and squished and then chewing it in small bites until it dissolved into nothing at all but a sweet-sour taste and a sticky film on my teeth. I slept and woke and slept again, and dreamed of my mother waiting for me as the day turned to night and the seasons changed, as I grew and she withered away; waiting for me just as I had waited for Miki, waiting in the painful space of not knowing - waiting for me forever.

Something, a finger, touched my hand: it was not bony and hard. It was soft, and humanlike, but ever so just too cold and too light. She sleeps.

I left the cave in the blue light, before dawn. She slept across the cave, catfishlike, I knew, such that the slightest touch would have woken her. I kept my weapon in front of me, a bone handle and a beak-like blade of blackened silver star-steel, and I reached out and took what I was after, without waking him.

Then I stepped closer, and her hand grasped for my ankle and her eyes opened.

“Where is the gold?”

“I have none.”

The wind blew cold on the mountainside. I had danced back, out of her reach, when she had grabbed at me. She stayed on the ground, pushed herself up onto one elbow.

Then she said, “Where is my knife?”

“I took it,” I told her. “While you slept.”

She looked at me, sleepily. “And whyever would you do that? If I was going to kill you I would have done it on the way here. I could have killed you a dozen times.”

“But I did not have gold then, did I?”

She said nothing.

I said, “If you think you could have got me to bring the gold from the cave, and that not bringing it out would have saved your miserable soul, then you are a fool.”

She no longer looked sleepy. “A fool, am I?”

She was ready to fight. It is good to make people who are ready to fight angry.

“Not a fool. No. For I have met fools and idiots, and they are happy in their idiocy, even with straw in their hair. You are too wise for foolishness. You seek only misery and you bring misery with you and you call down misery on all you touch.”

She rose then, holding a rock in her hand like an axe, and she came at me. I am small, and she could not strike me as she would have struck a woman of her own size. She leaned over to strike. It was a mistake.

I held the bone haft tightly, and stabbed upward, striking fast with the pointy beak of the paring knife, like an eel. I knew the place I was aiming for, and I knew what it would do.

She dropped her rock, clutched at her right shoulder. “My arm,” she said. “I cannot feel my arm.”

She swore then, fouling the air with threats and curses. The dawn light on the mountaintop made everything so beautiful and blue. In that light, even the blood that had begun to billow and soak into her garments was purple. She took a step back, so she was between me and the cave. I felt exposed, the rising sun at my back.

“Why do you not have gold?” she asked me. Her arm hung limply at her side.

“There was no gold there for such as I,” I said.

She threw herself forward, then, ran at me and kicked at me.

I ducked and dropped the too large paring knife from my hands. I threw my arms around her leg, and I held on to her as together we tumbled off the mountainside into the current.

Her head was above me, and I saw triumph in it, and then I saw black water, and then the valley floor was above me and I was rising to meet it and then it was below me and I was being dragged to my death.

A jar and a bump, and now we were turning over and over on the side of the mountain, the world a dizzying whirligig of rock and pain and sky and curses, and I knew I was a dead woman falling, but still I clung to the leg of Toloi Cruickshank.

I saw a leopard spotted ray in flight, but below me or above me I could no longer say. It was there, in the dawn light piercing through the silt and gloom of the deep sea, in the shattered fragments of time and perception, there in the pain. I was not afraid: there was no time and no space to be afraid in, no space in my mind and no space in my heart. I was being dragged with the current, holding tightly to the leg of a woman who was trying to kill me; we were crashing into rocks, scraping and bruising and then…

...we stopped. Stopped with a force enough that I felt myself jarred, and was almost thrown off Toloi Cruickshank and to my death beneath. The side of the mountain had crumbled under the force of rushing water there, long ago, sheared off and scrubbed smooth, leaving a sheet of blank rock, as smooth and as featureless as glass. But that was below us. Where we were, there was a ledge, and on the ledge there was a miracle: stunted and twisted, high above the kelpline, where no kelp has any right to grow, was a twisted yronwood kelp, not much larger than a bush, although it was old. It’s roots grew into the side of the mountain, and it was this yronwood kelp that had caught us in it’s grey-green arms.

I let go of the leg, clambered off Toloi Cruickshank’s body, and onto the side of the mountain. I stood on the narrow ledge and looked down at the sheer drop. There was no way down from here. No way down at all.

I looked up. It might be possible, I thought, climbing slowly, with fortune on my side, to make it up that mountain. If it did not crumble beneath my fingers. If the current was not too hungry. And what choice did I have? The only alternative was death.

A voice: “So. Will you leave me here to die, bangtail?”

I said nothing. I had nothing to say.

Her eyes were open. She said, “I cannot move my right arm, since you stabbed it. I think I broke a leg in the fall. I cannot climb with you.”

I said, “I may succeed, or I may fail.”

“You’ll make it. I’ve seen you climb. After you rescued me, crossing that waterfall. You went up those rocks like only a bangtail like you could’ve, with your legs and your suckers.”

I did not have her confidence in my climbing abilities.

She said, “Swear to me by all you hold holy. Swear by your king, who waits over the Sea as he has since we drove his subjects from this land. Swear by the things you creatures hold dear—swear by dreams and smoke, by shadows and shark skin, by dice and silence. Swear that you will come back for me.”

“You know what I am?”

“I know nothing. Only that I want to live.”

“I swear by these things… by dreams and smoke, by shadows and shark skin, by dice and by silence and sunbeams through silt. I swear by green hills of seagrass and standing gates of stone. I will come back.”

“I would have killed you. I had planned to kill you, and take the gold back as my own.”

“I know.”

Her hair framed her face like a salt-greyed halo. There was red blood on her cheek where she had scraped it in the fall.

“You could come back with ropes. My rope is still up there by the cave-mouth, but you’d need more than that.”

“Yes, I will come back with ropes.”

“When?”

I looked up at the rock above us, examined it as best I could.

Sometimes good eyes mean the difference between life and death, if you are a climber. I saw where I would need to be as I went, the shape of my journey up the face of the mountain. I would have to climb up pressed flat against the stone as the current bore down. I thought I could see the ledge outside the cave, from which we had fallen as we fought. I would head for there. Yes.

I blew on my hands, to warm them and clear the dust from them before I began to climb. “I will come back for you,” I said. “With ropes. I have sworn.”

“When?” she asked, and she closed her eyes.

“In a year. I will come here in a year.”

I began to climb. The woman’s cries followed me as I stepped up and crawled and stuck and clung and hauled myself up the side of that mountain, mingling with the cries of the rays, closing in on the stink of blood; and they followed me back from the Foggy Mountain, with nothing to show for my pains and my time but a knife I cannot use for cooking nor fighting and an Auntie who has gone home now, and I will hear her screaming, at the edge of my mind, as I fall asleep or in the moments before I wake, until I die.
It did not crumble, and the current pulled and pressed at me but it did not throw me down. I climbed, and I climbed in safety.

When I reached the ledge, the cave entrance seemed like a darker shadow in the noonday sun. I stepped to it, and entered.

“ Auntie Whispers, are you here?”

_I am, my niece._

“I have done one part of what I set out to do.”

_You have, and your first battle is won. She that fell was the last to carry a piece of me; and she will be dead soon._

“Will you come with me?”

_I will come with you, niece._

I took my Auntie Whispers cold, thin hand, and drew her into the light. She was not a skeleton at all, merely thin and weary and old, her hair nearly white and her eyes a filmy blue from cataracts. We turned from the little hole in the mountain, turned my back on the mountain, and from the shadows that were already gathering in the cracks and the crevices and deep inside my skull, and I began to lead my Auntie home, away from the Foggy Mountain. I left the Smoking Mountain behind, to return in a year.

There are a hundred roads and a thousand currents that would take us back home beyond the Red Gate, far to the West, where my mother and brother and sisters and home would be waiting. On my red legs, and my Auntie’s see-through fins, we swam for it.

I returned as I said I would to the Mountain; but I never could find that cave again.

Canterlot Village, at the Base of Canterlot Mountain; It’s much nicer than I thought it would be, I shouldn’t have skipped visiting so many times…

Dearest Journal,

Canterlot Village is the quintessential small town outside a big city- just far enough to not be worth making a suburb of the city itself, but not so far that ponies who work in the city but can’t afford to live there can’t make the commute. It’s a village of rolling foothills and pretty rowhouses.

A place of blue saddlebags and heavy collars. I can understand why I skipped visiting before; it’s too much like Trottingham.
Trottingham is a small village of maybe eighteen hundred head, and that means… well, consider this. Growing up, green through bridle grade school had an overall enrollment of about one hundred ponies. I have almost no interests in common with the ponies I grew up with- the only thing I really paid attention to was the weather, because it changes what the bees do- and everyone on Trottingham pays attention to the weather. We have to, it’s an island in an uncolonized area- it’s rare to ever see pegasi in Trottingham.

That’s probably why I kept flirting with him, looking back- I like pegasi, I like their wings and the way their eyes are just a little bit bigger than most other ponies. I like that their coats and manes are just slightly greasy to the touch; I like the smell of their feathers, the length of their whiskers, the weird suction-y feeling of their hooves on my sweaty flanks…

There are almost no pegasi on Trottingham. What few there are mostly concern themselves with Militia business, Griffins, fishing, and sports. I like science, and art, history and mathematics; I read poetry and I work very hard every day. For me, growing up… I didn’t really make genuine friends.

I was under the impression that I was just weird, and not really part of the herd- right up until I started correspondence school with my Aunt Ravel’s encouragement. She and Auntie Zipper put me in contact with a number of ponies- I signed myself up for penpals all across the world in an effort to learn different languages, I got several jobs for magazines and printing companies, and once I’d saved up enough, I went off to see the world.

The world is big, and beautiful- more full of wonders than I can describe here but briefly. Did you know, Journal, that Golia is called the Cradle of Equinity? I can believe it- something about that sea of grass, caught between two rivers and so near the sea… I felt quite as if I could see forever, as if I could run forever. My Golian penfriend, Moda, let me stay with her for a month. I’d never felt more welcomed anywhere- not even at my home in Trottingham, which, supposedly, was meant to be the most welcoming place I could be.

Home is where your heart is- but my heart hasn’t been in Trottingham for a good long time, more so after I met Tristan than before.

I’ve got it on my list- before I’m finished, I’m going to go to Mareseille, and I’m going to see all the beautiful things Tristan told me about in our conversations.

I swear I will.

But- truly, I did think I wasn’t particularly likeable until I started making penfriends.

There are pros and cons to living in a large village. Crime is almost never something to worry about, and you can forget to lock your door- or even leave the keys in the lock on the outside for hours on end. It’s safe for foals to wander around on their own, and everypony looks out for each other. The school is small, and classes are usually about twenty or so, meaning any foal will get a lot of attention. The area tends to be fairly rural; one only needs to walk for a ten or twenty minutes to be surrounded by fields and woodland park.

And if you move to a large village, you’ll always be an incomer to most ponies. I wasn’t actually born in Trottingham; I’m not, as so many took such pains to remind me, actually from Trottingham. I didn’t make any real deep friendships there- well, except for Lami, but she doesn’t exactly count as she’s also marked ‘outsider’. I had to go to Griffinstone Pleasant to do my shopping, which wasn’t much bigger than Trottingham but so much friendlier- and if I wanted decent selection in the shops, I had to go much further west.
Large villages, in some ways, are perfect for what I want- a safe place to raise a foal- but I truly doubt my foal will want to stay in a village. As soon as they become an adult… what will there be for them? Who will be their friend?

...Who will be mine? It’s not enough to have a cousin- I need friends of my own, too. Maybe I should move to Vanhoover, even if it’s so expensive and the weather reminds me of all the worst parts of Trottingham…

Guilds have existed since Roamin’ times, and possibly even earlier- the Roaming Herds were the first surviving instance of a culture of ponies that had a written language; they were preceded by numerous cultures around the world. Linguists have traced folktale, colt and filly stories, myths, legends, and even certain nursing rhymes back much further, back to when ponies had more than one toe-bone in our hooves- that’s several thousand years. The Great Clamour only eradicated about a hundred years or so of history; and there was quite a lot it simply couldn’t touch. Chaos and Order are matters of perspective.

A guild is an association of craftsmen, artisans, or skilled labourers who share a common skill or profession. The guilds that emerged out of Unified Ponyland helped shape the feudal system that was in place at the time by creating a skilled working class which consisted of free ponies with expertise in specialized trades. It’s not easy to do a number of things lots of ponies take for granted- cooking, baking, making candles, rugs, charcoal, parchment, quills and sofas… all of these things and quite a few more require extensive training to make a pony who can even attempt their production. To make a pony who’s good at making these things, you need a pony who’s been well trained to train them- often for five or six generations. (If you want a good archer, you start with the grandsire.)

The guilds, and the unions that grew out of them, give commoners enough clout to thrive in a society where knights, dames, and the nobility hold most of the power. The farmer, the baker, and the candlestick maker of that famous nursing rhyme were undoubtedly all guild members.

A very significant aspect of guilds is the apprenticeship system. A master craftspony- like Frank Starbuck, as an example- agrees to take on a filly or a colt as an apprentice, usually after they’ve gotten their cutie mark. The yearling would live with the master, and the yearling’s parents are expected to pay for their training- not their room and board, but the master’s time, and supplies for the yearling, are supposed to be paid for by the parents. Things have changed quite a bit in recent years- for one, the government now matches parental fees, or even exceeds them in certain circumstances. For another, the master craftspony has to go through foster parent certification, to ensure that they’ll provide proper care and housing to their prospective students. A yearling and a fully grown pony are not the same at all- and though Carrot and Fern were stunningly mature in a lot of ways, they were both still children in a lot more. Finally, and most importantly, the apprentice owns what they produce, and are to be credited for what they work on- meaning, if they win a prize for something they make, they keep the prize money; if they work on a production piece, they are to be paid like any other working pony; and if they make an innovative design, they get most of the royalties for their work.

These funds are kept and managed by the master craftspony, and part of their job is to teach their apprentice how to care for their money. As the apprenticeship lasts for ten years or more, this allows for deep personal bonds to form; and it allows the yearling time and space to grow up, make mistakes, and change in a relatively safe environment that isn’t with their parents.

Once an apprenticeship is over, the apprentice becomes a Journeypony and can now work for a direct wage. That journeypony will then save up their wages to buy or set up a shop of their own, and work to complete their guild’s requirements to become a master craftspony.

I belong to the International Guild of Spellweavers and Clothiers, Journal- they’re combined because so many of the woven spells can be translated into embroidered stitches in clothing, and are useful either way. Oh, yes- international guilds.

Membership in a guild is required in order for a pony to do business in a region- the guild will handle your licensing and various fees, and as they set prices and standards for their member’s products, the quality of a guild-verified producer is guaranteed. Guilds also protect any secrets of their particular trade- in my case, where to get some of the things I use for my creations, certain color mixes, certain spells… Guilds also take on civic duties, such as caring for widows, orphans, and sick members. Guilds became unions during the Rise of the Commons; both guilds and unions will advocate for wage earners and service providers as well as craftsponies and artisans.

After all, you cannot demand a labor or service or product or art from somepony and then degrade them for providing you with it.

A guild will always have an enormous impact on the economy of the territory it covers. Whether that impact is beneficial is a topic of heated debate, even now. Still- it cannot be denied that guilds provide skilled workers in a variety of specialized fields, keep an economy healthy, and allow the working class to prosper.

These organizations can offer experience and resources to anypony willing to meet the requirements to join- and they can be an ally, a training ground, a proving field, a client; a competitor, an adversary, even the ultimate destructor. If the Guild of Fishers hadn’t based themselves in Griffonstone, Trottingham would have an atmosphere that’s friendly to pegasi. But they did; and Trottingham doesn’t.

In my cousin Ace Spade’s case, the Whitebeard Mercenary Company belongs to the Guild of Adventurers; neither bad nor good, and surprisingly in demand.

There’s a few things a guild needs to function properly.

Firstly, it needs a charter- the list of rules and values outlining the guild’s purpose and scope. The local government keeps track of all the guilds so as to keep taxes appropriate and ensure that their constituents are provided for in all needful areas- thus, every guild is required to have a charter on file with the various local, state, national, and international legal scribe files.

There are about eight key elements that must be present with any well-written guild charter- and if you’re say, starting a school that teaches a trade, like, oh, spellweaving, taking a look at the necessary properties of a well-written guild charter is probably a good idea.

First, the name of the guild (school) must be listed. There aren’t many requirements for the name, and in most places it can be as creative as the guild would like it to be- but it can’t be anything illegal. No Thieves Guild (though such a thing has, historically, existed); if you put such a name on the charter and send it in, it almost certainly won’t be approved, and you’ll probably end up in jail.

Second, the main location of the guild (school) must be listed. This should be specific down to the city or village level; for example, it’s not good enough to say that your guild is located in the Barony of Blueblood, but it would be acceptable to say that your guild is located in the village of Canterlot (which is not the city of Canterlot), in the Barony of Blueblood. You can probably move your guild (school) later on if you need or want to, but such changes usually have to be approved before they can be actioned.

Third, the purpose of the guild should be listed. This requirement follows the same restrictions the
A guild name does nothing illegal allowed. Essentially, when you’re forming a purpose for a guild or a school, you need to think about why you decided to start in the first place. Do you want to help others with your skills? Do you want to go adventuring? Did you want to provide a service? Any of these things can be a legitimate purpose for a guild; and teaching others how to do these things is a legitimate purpose for a school.

Fourth, the guild should have its own set of bylaws. These bylaws conform to the laws of the land in which the guild is chartered. Bylaws specify what requirements there are for membership, as well as what is required to remain in the guild. They may also specify any relevant items specific to the guild—ex. In Ace’s guild, there’s a bylaw about how spoils, treasures, and acquisitions are to be divided among the party.

Fifth, the guild should have provisions for the choosing and removal of guild officers. Guild officers are those below the guildmaster that help in the administration of the guild. Guild officers include assistant guildmasters— a pegasus named Marco Polo (he’s got a winged pineapple as a cutie mark, and there’s something distinctively… peacock-y about his wing-feathers); communication regulators—an earth pony called Ricecake Winterfield; cooks— a unicorn called Thatch, of all things; as well as guild scribes, outfitters (Icy Iron, a beautiful… unicorn. I know they’re a unicorn, and that’s about it), and so on. In most guilds, the officers are chosen either by the guildmaster (he really does have the largest, whitest mustache I’ve ever seen), or by a vote of the members of the guild. Guild officers are removed in much the same way, though of course each guild is free to create its own policy.

My cousin Ace is actually an Officer in his guild/mercenary company… or maybe I’ve completely misunderstood the equish I heard that day, it is not at all like trosh and I have to remember that—Ace Spade is the Second Division Commander of the Whitebeard Guild; and, so far as I’m aware, the Second Division is the Accountant’s Division. Ace is in charge of receipts and money— and, actually, just about every member of the Surprise clan is good with numbers. Yes, even Pinkie Pie, now that I consider it practically— she wouldn’t be able to throw as many parties as she does, and have them be as good as they always are, if she wasn’t so good at accounting.

I noticed on our ride up to Canterlot that Ace has a very long mane for a stallion, almost as long as a mares; and that he really has no idea what to do with it. When I was at the wainwrights, getting my vardo, I bought a set of eight two-pronged hair combs off one of the junior apprentices. They’re beechwood, sealed with a mane-safe oil I have in my vardo and carefully inset with the Gems of Harmony: Agate for Honesty; Pink Opal for Kindness; Pietersite for Joy; Red Ruby for Generosity; Sapphire (Blue Ruby) for Loyalty; Yellow Turquoise for Friendship; and Lepidolite for Hope.

They’re quite possibly the plainest spelled mane items I’ve ever made— but Ace has a very odd sense of style, and he wouldn’t wear anything fancy in his hair. I know this because I asked him. I also know that the real beauty is in the gems I chose— each one is special in some way, be it cut, clarity, or some other feature I can’t remember the name of.

I also asked him what kind of style he wanted, and he replied ‘buns’. So. I gave him a stacked bun style— I think it will really show off the various highlights in his hair. Ah- so, as near as I can figure, every member of my clan has the same basic coloration— we’re all bays. I’m the most ‘classical’ in appearance— my cousin Pinkie is one of the most ‘exotic’. The basic formula is that our manes and tails are always the same color, and always a color darker in tone than our coats. Ace is no exception.

He’s a unicorn— have I written this down? No, I haven’t— right, he’s a unicorn like me, he was actually born in Canterlot— ah, my guild bylaws prevent me from getting letters of recommendation from any family member who’s also in a guild (farmers aren’t in guilds; they’re in unions— lovely loophole). His mane is extremely bushy, because I think he doesn’t know how to condition it properly— it must collect static like nothing else. I also don’t think he’s gotten a mane cut in a long while— it’s got that ragged edge to it.

Hm. When I asked him, he said that he rarely has the time for an involved mane care regimen— at most, he’s got the time for a wash-condition and brushing. I nodded— and asked if he could add an oil to his combing or brushing.

He hummed, and then said ‘Probably, but- I’d need a mane cut first, I’ve been putting it off because I didn’t want to go to a stranger for it-’

‘That’s reasonable; when are you getting it done?’

‘Ah- probably this afternoon before I report back to my guild. You could come with me?’

‘Mm, I’d like that- I’ll even have your mane pins ready.’

‘Cool beans!’

Ace’s mane is dark red-brown, brighter where the sun has bleached it or where it grows lighter naturally; it’s shiny and wavy, underneath the overgrowth and road-dust. His coat is a dusty sort of terracotta, and his cutie mark is a fireball. Or possibly a comet, I’ve not gotten quite close enough to make a clear distinction.

Hell, it might even be a firework.

You know, I haven’t actually had a mane cut in three years- I’ve always kept it a bit long, to keep my pin collection in circulation, but… I don’t know. Maybe I feel like a little change. Mmn- nope, no change, just a wash and a trim, same as always.

I also let the hooficurist oil my hooves, which gave them a lovely lustre.

Ace looks much better- and the spelled pins do their job very well, he looks like a totally different stallion with them in. I saw at least three mares and a stallion trip over themselves when he walked past. I think he looks quite nice, myself.

Especially with his new glasses! Oh, Journal, when I learned he wasn’t even wearing contact lenses- ooh, the scolding I gave him! Breaking your glasses in a fight is no excuse- that just means you need to get better glasses, and better at dodging! Silly stallion, with a silly stallion’s pride...

\textit{Sumus plus quam unum sumus seorsum - We are stronger together than we are apart}

Those are the words painted onto the lintel of the Whitebeard Adventurers Guild (or is it a mercenary company? It’s unclear, and I feel really awkward about asking… I’ll just listen and see if someone- but they have a motto?)

As I followed Ace into the guild hall, a hush- wait, hold on. Taffy and Lovelace went sightseeing in Canterlot City; Mark is with me and Ace, because he’s finalizing his Guild contract- okay. As I followed Ace and Mark into the guild hall, a hush fell over the ponies within. It got quiet enough that I could hear Ace and Mark quietly talking-

‘-and this is the hall. Mostly everyone comes through here eventually, and it’s open all hours. The fire pits on either side are always stoked- oh, right, um… there’s a water-garden out back, I’ll make sure you get a key for the back door.’

‘Nice!’
‘Haha, yeah- Namur will probably challenge you to a race, so- heads up, I guess. Ah- I’d need to double check how many Divisions there are, but the ones based in the hall itself indefinitely are First, Second, Fourth, Sixteenth, and Twelfth. That’s Administration, Accounting, Feed, Quartermaster, and Communications. I’m the Commander for the Second- that’s why I hired you, by the way-’

‘I was wondering, but it makes sense now that you’ve told me-’

Meanwhile, across the hall:

‘Is that…?’

‘Can’t be, he never wears glasses just around, says they make him feel like an egghead-’

‘If it’s Ace, I never knew his hair had so much color- ’

‘It’s him alright; I’d know that cutie mark anywhere-’

‘So- I’ll be stationed with Miss Meadow?’

‘That was my plan. Knowing her plan, it’ll take at least six months to get everything she wants done; not to mention collect all the files she’ll need to get started, set up various permissions, and so on-’

‘Sure, sure. So- I’m helping her run her business too?’

‘You can if you want to- your job from our side will be keeping track of expenses and products gained, so, if you have enough time to help her out, go for it.’

‘Cool!’

I let them outpace me and walk into the Second Division office by themselves. I’m not joining the guild- I can’t, not and also become a master craftspony- guild bylaw. Ugh.

Journal, I’m tired- there’s a nice couch right in a sunbeam, and I feel like a nap. I’ll write any new developments, don’t worry.

Best love, Meadow

Dearest Journal,

I fell asleep on Tristan Woodsmoke at the Whitebeard Guild of Adventurers and now he knows I’m pregnant and- it’s all a bit- shouty. At the moment.

I’m hiding behind Whitebeard’s desk. Well, under it. It’s a very large desk, very roomy. M-more like a picnic table. The scarf I put around Tristan’s neck- I made it for him, to protect him, and only he can remove it.

So, um. Ace and Mark probably won’t be able to kill him.
I- Oh dear.

I have to go stop Mark from drowning Tristan in the pond out back, have to go-

-Meadow

I’m really glad I’m close enough to Udoroth to press close to him like this. He really is just like Sanji- as soon as he realized I’m afraid, he started hugging me.

I just wanted to have an adventure. I spent so long grinding myself away, trying to keep up with my sensei’s demands and the dojo’s requirements and my fees and my dues and getting just a little bit more, scrimping a little bit more- so I could pay the charcoal bill on time this month, please, gods, let me have enough-

I was happy, at first. When we got the message from somewhere, someone out on the sea calling for help- I was really happy, because when Captain said we’d answer the call, it meant- well, it meant I might get to go on an adventure.

The plan the bigjobs worked out over the month it took to get here was simple- the people Captain said would be going to help out whatever we’d find were split up on teams, and each team was set so that the people on it could work really well together in everyday matters and in a fight.

The first team to get worked out was Ori and Genny, as TEAM: Overwatch. Their job is to stay way high up in the sky, and watch for approaching ships, dangerous animals and terrain, and keep us all connected together. Ori has really powerful Observation Haki- she can observe down to fleas underneath leaves in a forest, all the way to oncoming storm fronts two islands away. Ori is also really good at using a snailboard. Genny, meanwhile, is big and strong enough to do all the trick flying that might be needful to keep them both safe- and Ori, herself, isn’t without power in the air.

As the first TEAM, they were the first ones to actually see this place- it’s an island that’s been cut in half, and one half is still a little bit on fire, and the other half is frozen. There’s a big tower in the middle of the split, and that tower had a bunch of letters and numbers I don’t remember except that they looked like ‘Punk Hazard’ all together.

Their report back about what this island looked like determined the setup of the rest of the TEAMS- Sneaky Bitches: Robin, Mab, Annie, and Cathey- they’d find all the secrets; Adventure Times: Captain Luffy, Adelaide (that’s me!), Udoroth, and Sawbones- we’d have a good time with Captain; Scrawny: Solitaire, Lynn, Gurry, and Ellie- they’d steal all the things; Brawny: Tellicherry, Neo, Mono, and Zelda- they’d break what needs breaking; Sword and Sworcery: Zoro, Beatrix, Brook, and Aoife- they’d pick fights; and finally, Service and Sacrifice: Franky, Mince, Oz, and Deborah. They’d be preparing relief, if relief could be prepared at all.

The plan was, we’d split off in our teams, explore the island, meet up at the tower in the center, and help out whoever needed help.

We lost contact with TEAM: Sneaky first; there was lots of shouting, and something falling a long way down, and then nothing at all. Then Sword and Sworcery snuck into some weird cult meeting, and we lost them, too- Scrawny and Brawny scattered like silverfish in the light, and I don’t… I don’t know what happened to Service and Sacrifice. I don’t know where my sisters are, or if they’re okay; I don’t know where my friends are, or if they’re even still… alive.
The message we got was an encoded cry for help- ‘Help! Help, they’re killing us!’ How were we to know that the one who sent it… the one who sent it was the Queen of Wasps?

There’s a lot more than straight punching that gets taught in a real Karate Dojo- and my style, the coral palm, was developed in direct response to incursion from the Otherside during the War of Separation, during the First Age.

The hits I make, the forms I can one day use- they’re meant to strike Others back into their world, forcefully remind them that this world is not theirs.

There’s twelve things to notice about a person, to tell if they are Other; twelve things to notice, to see if you have been trapped by an Other. They are much like dreams, when you sleep- and learning to be aware in a dream is the first step towards being able to directly battle an Other.

The first is simple- check their reality. Their hair should not move unless they move; their image should not differ from their form. If they have lived long, time should have an impact on them; if you cut them, they should bleed.

The second is continuity. We might blank out the parts of our life that don’t matter- the time we spend doing work, wiping our asses and brushing our teeth- these moments don’t necessarily matter - but. We remember doing them. I remember getting up to brush my teeth after a late night snack yesterday; I remember adjusting my quality waraji before pulling on my nice new aijiro tabi and tying them on.

I remember making sure my mizusagai embroidered hakama lay correctly over my kokushoku-shironeri striped kimono, tucking a blessed rosary into my mizuiro obi stamped and painted with fish and waves for luck; the shelf where I keep my geta and my socks and my other shoes, the way to fold and unfold my hakama so they don’t wrinkle, the shelves where my kimono sleep- I remember the way I did my hair.

April is the last month of spring; the style of kanzashi is trailing soft pink sakura mixed with butterflies and bonbori lanterns, signaling the approach of summer. Cherry blossom viewing at this time of year is a big thing in Ryugu Mergyo- everyone gets at least a full day off to do it. Kanzashi consisting of a single silver (or sometimes gold) cho made of mizuhiki cord are also common- since I had the most public job, my sisters always made sure I had the prettiest kanzashi. But for them… I always made sure their cho kanzashi were new, not old.

My kimono is all in appropriate weight, in colors I wanted to wear- but my hair is all about the month of spring, and sakura viewing. It’s a stacked bun style- the only one I can do without help. No bira-bira, shidare, or Ogi, because they annoy me. I don’t quite have enough hair for kogai, so that stayed home; but I have enough for the sukashibori keeping my hair in it’s style, and for a green tama; at the crown of my head towards the back, a sakura branch comb.

Here’s a secret about my sisters: we’re actually three sets of twins, and an odd girl out. The pairs are Deborah and Eleanor; Fernanda and Cecelia; Beatrix and Genevieve- and me, Adelaide, is the odd girl out.

How do I know this for sure? It’s simple, really- I’m the only one of my sisters with two-tone hair. In dim light, it looks blond; but in full sunlight, it’s ink black. Deb couldn’t look me full in the face for a good week, when we first Surfaced.
I keep my kanzashi, and the precious picture of mom before she got sick, and a very old picture of her with her brothers, in the box of keepsakes next to my bed- I remember it all, and all the steps it takes to get from waking up to dressed to here, watching the Queen of Wasp- Mother, they call her, or M- gloat over- over-

The third catch for an Other is environment. Other’s main battle tactic is to never, ever come at something head on until whatever they’re coming for can’t escape- to that end, they manipulate the environment, distorting it such that one would trip on flat ground.

The fourth is the people around. If you’re talking to someone who’s been dead for years- without the indication of a genuine Seer that you’ll be speaking with that person, that’s a sure sign of Others.

The fifth is your self image. You know what your body looks like- if it’s looking indefinably wrong, you’ve got Others.

Sixth is your strength and abilities. Are you suddenly super weak, or able to speak languages you’ve never heard? Others.

Seventh is everyday habits. If you need to twist a key in a lock three times instead of once, as is normal, then- Others. Or, possibly, shitty lock- but usually Others.

Eighth is being able to read. Others hate the written word- they get trapped in written contracts more easily than anything else. If you suddenly can’t read, Others are around.

Ninth is a sound compared to grinding, ringing, or mosquitoes buzzing. If it’s accompanied by a creeping sense of paranoia or unease, it’s Others- not an actual, you know, sound.

Tenth is a smell- something like the smell of burnt things, or rot without growth, the taste of soured milk and the color of bruising… Others.

Eleventh is the presence of deals that are too good to be true. Others love them a good used boat to sell.

Twelfth is hard to quantify, but… there’s a gut feeling, a sort of danger-sense you get when you train long enough. In the strongest of warriors, it’ll go off for any danger to the self, no matter the source. It’s not foolproof- but it can alert you to something being undeniably wrong. There are lots of curses floating around the world, left over from the last great incursion of the Others into this world- some people are extremely sensitive to them.

The Wasp Queen has the seeming of a woman with brown skin and gem-red eyes; her hair is short and yellow like pollen. Her body is covered in stripes like battle paint, and her limbs are armored in strange liquidinous black not-armor, because it moves too easily. She’s otherwise nude- and if it weren’t for- for- the Wasp Queen isn’t really a woman, and she didn’t really give birth to all her daughter-soldiers, and they aren’t really women either.

Other’s rely on perception to form their physical natures in this world- and the current perception is that Bees and Wasp are female creatures. The awful, awkward, things fluttering around this enormous room, keeping Captain’s head above water and the rest of him in a tank I can smell the brine of from here- the things that held Missus Mab down while the Queen took a trident and- they are Other.
They are too thin, and they do not have mouths- they cannot eat, or clean themselves, or anything at all like a real, living creature.

The Wasp Queen stabbed Missus Mab with a trident and she’s been pinned through her chest to the floor and bleeding but now she’s not even bleeding she’s not breathing and I’m-

I’m scared-

I’m so scared-

I’m so scared I’m crying, even as Udoroth holds me to his side and the man in the leopard seal hat takes my offered hand because he’s scared too-

But. Even as the Wasp Queen gloats, even as a giant screen on the wall begins showing some kind of advertisement and then cuts to my sister Beatrix being dragged into some kind of- of- closet?

Even though I’m scared like I’ve never been before…

My style of karate was built and tested and perfected specifically to kill Others. I proved my mettle against the entire class at my old Dojo; my teacher made me her personal successor, nevermind my birth status.

I’m scared and this is scary- but when the Wasp Queen, who tricked us and hurt my family and possibly killed Missus Mab says “Who would dare face us now?”

All I can do is say “I will.”

And when she stops and stares at me, all I can say is- “I’ll fight all of you,” before I stand, shrugging off the restraining hands of the men at my side, and step forth.

I don’t know how long I can fight; I don’t know if I’ll survive. But I have to do this. Honor isn’t about making the right choices; it’s about dealing with the consequences of the choices you made. I chose to learn a style of martial arts meant for fighting Others; I chose to master it to the level I have; I am the only one here who has a real chance of threatening them, because Missus Mab is indisposed and Captain Luffy is trapped and Udoroth has too much trauma and Seal Hat Guy is attached by a chain around his neck to the wall.

And Sawbones threw herself down a trash chute.

I can see Robin, crying on the other side of the room- she’s got a chain around her neck too, just like Seal Hat Guy’s. Annie’s unconscious- there’s blood on her hands and blood on her mouth and a big drying mat of bloody hair on her head, and her glasses are gone, too.

It’s only me left who can fight; so, it has to be me that fights.
"I THINK IT’S TIME FOR M TO CHANGE HER LIFE! GET READY EVERYONE: THE SHOW’S ABOUT TO START!"

Ow! No no no no-

“Stop it- I don’t want to change how I look, I like myself the way I am-”

“SHUT YOUR WHORE MOUTH YOU LITTLE PIECE OF SHIT- I don’t know what the Mother could have possibly seen in you, you little freak, but you’d best be grateful for this opportunity- Fucking- Let me go-!”

“YOU FIRST!”

I finally break away from the woman, shoving myself back away from her as far as I can, right as a door of some kind, glowing with that unnatural, jittery blue light, slams shut. Fuck. Now we’re both trapped in here.

I squeeze farther away from her, her stomping hooves, her massive haunches- I don’t want to get kicked by her, and I don’t want her to turn on me in here, I’d hate to have to kill her- Ugh, but her shouting is getting really annoying. I wish literally anyone else on my TEAM was good at this kind of thing- I’m barely passing as a follower of the mysterious ‘M’ as it is, but Brook’s a skeleton, Zoro’s terrible at lying, and Aoife flat out refused- said she’d spent too long pretending, she wasn’t going to start again now, which. Fine.

So that leaves me- and Captain said to figure out who was calling for help, so…

Shit, she’s stopped yelling-

“I don’t think anyone can hear me! UUUUGH! I’ll have to power down the Gate; I’ll get demoted for sure,” she says, lower body shifting and bunching with extreme agitation.

She whirls around, staring me down with fanatic outrage and spittle-flecked fury. I don’t hide my reaction, a flinch, and use it to mask the fact that my cower back into the walls isn’t a cower at all. Her ears are flexed with so much aggression, and her eyes are so narrowed with rage, I don’t doubt she can’t read my face at all, nevermind that I’ve shaken my bangs in front to act as a screen. My face is the one thing I’ve never really practiced at controlling- I was always out working in the middle of the forest, so it didn’t matter.

Because I’m Mab’s faithful student, I catalogue her clothing with my eyes, even as I listen to everything she says and implies with my ears-
“You must be SO FUCKING PROUD of yourself you little shit.”

Black halter top, likely from a bikini or swimsuit, not fitted well to her but not off the rack; inherited, old deodorant stains in wear pattern not congruent with the size and pitch of her armpits-

“The presentation is ruined,”

Long brown hair, sleek and shiny, features that would be on the elfish or dreamy side of beautiful if she weren’t screaming. Her ears are dropped down in line with the curve of her head and the stretch of her neck; her face is lowered towards mine, and she’s even backing up so she can lean and stare even more; I keep my gaze lowered, and do my best to cower away from her aggressive stance, but we’re trapped - if she rears, I’ll have to gut her.

Does don’t bluff, or fight mock battles; and those hooves are wicked weapons.

“I’m so sick of dealing with the trash-shit followers of Mother-”

She has hazel eyes, and a small snubby nose; her lips look soft and pink. High cheekbones, graceful features; slim fingers, almond shaped nails. Hard black hooves on long legs, rippling muscle bunching under soft, luxuriously gleaming brown fur- the tan of her belly is the tan of her skin.

“I’ve dedicated years of my life working towards a position under the Elite - only to watch them waste every opportunity on ugly failures like you!”

She’s leaning so close I can smell her breath, her hands digging into her hips leaving scratch marks and bruising behind. Her breath smells of peppermint, green-leaf crushed, eggs, bacon, a little bit of blood- normal deer smell, with a hint of toothpaste. I could count her eyelashes, if I wanted- they’re thick, and brown as her hair, and her eyebrows are perfectly shaped for her face. Her lips really do look very soft; no cracks, no peelies, they even glitter faintly with some sort of sheen-dust.

She’s wearing a necklace - oh, it’s meant as a name tag. It’s made of wood, stamped with a name across the center front bib- P-R-U-D-I-T-H is the spelling, I can’t pronounce that without help- and in her ears dangle a pair of wooden earrings that must go with the necklace. There are marks, rank insignia and awards I think, closer to her neck- nothing but her name on the center bib, but on either side…

On the left, three chevrons, a star, a diamond; on the right, a flower, a bird, and… something? No, f-Mab told me this, they’re called… feat- hers? Fe-tsu-eru- feather. Her earrings are different- they’re key cards, I’m almost certain of it, even if they are made of wood.
“But at the end of the day, it’s alright. You wanna know why?”

I shiver as she leans back up to look down on me with total superiority. I stare up at her through my bangs, and watch her reassert that haughty demeanour that dragged me away from Zoro, Aoife, and Brook who was behind the tapestry- the unyielding grip of her hand on my arm and the sharp crack of her hooves on the tiled floor-

“When we get outta here, you’ll go back to living your worthless life. You’ll stray from the path Mother so kindly set out for us and end up in- in some heathen place, whatever you pathetic worthless shits dream up in your freak cabals,”

I’ve been pressing back as hard as I can against the wall; her standing back up, sufficiently appeased by my cowering, let me rise a little too. My arm shifted, and struck something behind me- I only saw this side of the room for a moment, but it looked like pictures, glowing pictures with rocker switches beneath each one, and- I picked a switch, I think.

I heard it click.

“An’ you know where I’m gonna end up? Can your pathetic little shit-mind even fucking guess where I’m going to go?”

I take a moment to swallow, and swallow my rage down- and then I speak.

“P-paradise?”

“That’s right; good job! Maybe one day, you’ll actually have something intelligent to say- but I doubt it. After all, I’ll be looking down on pitiful worthless freaks and miserable failures like you from Paradise- ”

She jerked to a stop, and I could smell- medicine, bitter and syrupy. The expression on her face twitched between rage and shock, before becoming… torpor? A drugged stupor, nodding- thin trails of something blue dripped down her sides, curved around her front and plip-plip-plipped onto the floor between her front legs. She held perfectly still; hardly even breathing.

What-

From somewhere, music began to play.
There were strange arms with little- little clippers at their tips bending forwards and back like spiderbird legs, pinching and snapping things off of her body, her clothing and her jewelry, her hair - a long snake like a vacuum came and sucked them all away, spat out her jewelry which fell between my feet- I could almost hear the words of the song, but I was too busy picking up the fallen key cards and keeping myself out of the way to pay attention.

Different arms with, with, cutters, bright blue lines of light piercing through her flesh and bone, cutting her into an organized shape, a pattern, neatly bisected and clipped along lines I don’t- I don’t understand-

Her right eye wells with tears that fall down her face, even as the rest of her proves incapable of movement. The place where my blood was taken, my left forefinger, stings. I’ve shoved myself as far away from her as I can, truly cowering now- crouched back against the wall of this horrible place, key cards clamped tight in one hand and mouth clamped shut by the other, don’t puke I always close my eyes when I puke and-

I need-to see-this-

Her skin falls away first, followed by layers of fat and muscle. Her brain and nerves and eyes and oh Gods, no- no, don’t vomit- oh Gods they didn’t get her back half, the cutters just sliced away the parts of her that didn’t fit- my form, they’re cutting according to my form, everything else is deemed ‘extra’ so they’re just cutting it away-

With a soft chime I can barely hear over my panicked breathing, barely notice over my shaking vision and hand clamped tight to my mouth, oh god don’t throw up- the floor opens, and all the pieces of her all the things ‘Mother’ decided didn’t fit- they’re abruptly funneled into a, a, a meat grinder with some sort of incinerator at the bottom, and I can smell v-venison and something like pork being pasteurized, flash cooked, and I can hear a belt running, the churning thump of- of- meat- being carried away-

No-

The p-pattern- I understand now, the pattern was for her nerves and eyes and brain it, ‘Mother’, it didn’t want anything else so it cut it all away nerves shaped like a stick figure with spheres for eyes oh Gods-

Her pupils are huge and there’s a spike a needle SOMETHING IS IN HER BRAIN-the thing in her brain is holding her up-ew-

ew-
The music is different.

I- don’t think I care.

oh this is so gross-

A ring of buzzing blue light drops down from the ceiling and spiderwebs of something like silk but not it smells wrong it’s wrapping her wrapping around her nerves like her skin used to myelin sheaths but they’re gone now being replaced by something- something that’s supposed to be better the whole point of this ‘Heaven’s Gate’ bullshit was that the people who go in come out better that’s what all the cultists said but I-

I can see bones and pseudo-blood vessels because oxygen bonds to iron and that does not smell like blood and her head- is- cracking-

No-

A skeleton but she’s too big she’s- no no no no-

Down and up goes the ring weaving on fake muscles over the fake bones fake fingers fake toes no webbing no fins no cartilage ribs fake fake fake rising up fake fake fake what

What

What

What the hell is this- she has my face as the ring comes down again it lays out that fake fake fake blank white skin like bleached paper like plastic fake fake fake why does she have my face that’s not my jawline what the hell is this-

I can see her brain crushing up against the top of her skull and blood is starting to ooze down her eyes are going dim and starting to roll back in her head the cutters come back again and shoot pinpoint holes through the side of her head and scoop away chunks in little cone shapes their points facing towards her brain and smaller, specialized rings come and- and spin and tug out and repeat the movement of their bigger selves until ears animal ears like- like a mouse - grow out of the sides of her head and-

I’m crying and pressing myself as far back as I can into the side of the room and-

What the hell is this bullshit-

Lenses go into her eyes and with her head tilted back like that I can tell she’s got no voice box no way to speak unless they give her one no wonder no one who’s done this speaks of what happens- spider arms stretch her pliant mouth open and show all of her teeth as not-blood and chunkier somethings start to drip further down her face they took away her pupils why would they do that
It doesn’t come off it doesn’t come off they put something in her mouth and down her throat and over her nose and it doesn’t come off it looks like like the teeth of a mouse what the hell is this- oh Gods there’s blood everywhere- this is- thIS IS-

THIS IS FUCKING BULLSHIT.

I LEARNED THIS TRAINING WITH SOLITAIRE: WHEN I’M REALLY AND TRULY ANGRY, I SMILE. I LEARNED TO USE MY SHEARS BETTER; I LEARNED TO FIGHT FOR REAL. I EVEN LEARNED A SPECIAL MOVE FOR EACH OF MY SWORDS- THEY’RE DIFFERENT, LEFT IS DIFFERENT FROM RIGHT-

FUCK-

AS THE COURTLY MACHINE APPLIES FINISHING TOUCHES TO MY BRAINCRUSHED DOUBLE, I STAND AND SWALLOW DOWN THE LAST OF MY BILE. I PUT THE KEY CARDS INTO MY ZIPPERED POCKET AND CLOSE IT TIGHT; I’LL BE USING BOTH HANDS FOR THIS.

I REACH FOR MY SHEARS WITH MY OTHER HAND, TAKE A HANDLE IN EACH PALM AND CLICK THEM APART. I DON’T SPIN THEM- NO NEED FOR FLOURISHES THIS TIME.

I’M FAR TOO ANGRY FOR THAT.

SHE HAD A NAME AND A DREAM AND FRIENDS AND THEY MADE HER BELIEVE THAT HER DREAM WAS WORTHLESS UNLESS SHE FOLLOWED A MOTHER THAT DID NOT LOVE HER AS A REAL MOTHER WOULD HAVE; AND THEY MADE HER BELIEVE HER BODY WAS UGLY WHEN IT OBJECTIVELY WAS NOT; AND THEY MADE HER BELIEVE THE EXPERIENCES AND VALUES OF OTHER PEOPLE DIDN’T MATTER AT ALL, WHEN THEY’RE THE ONLY THING THAT PROVES YOU’RE NOT THE ONLY BEING IN THE WORLD.

THEY TOOK MY BLOOD AND SHOVED ME IN A BOX TO DIE.

THEY HAD THE AUDACITY TO BROADCAST THIS ATROCITY TO THE WHOLE WORLD AND EVERYONE IN THIS WRETCHED PLACE.

I CAN FEEL MY SISTER ADELAIDE CRYING; I CAN FEEL HER RESOLVE; I CAN FEEL HER TERROR.

I WON’T FORGIVE THEM!

I WON’T FORGIVE THEM FOR KILLING P-R-U-D-I-T-H’S SOUL BEFORE KILLING HER BODY; I WON’T FORGIVE THEM FOR STEALING OF MY BODY AND TRYING TO MURDER ME; I WON’T FORGIVE THEM FOR SHOWING THE WHOLE WORLD THEIR INHUMAN UGLINESS RATHER THAN CURLING UP IN A HOLE AND DYING LIKE ANY CREATURE WITH COMMON DECENCY WOULD HAVE...

AND ABOVE ALL ELSE...

ABOVE ALL ELSE...

“I WILL NEVER FORGIVE ANY OF YOU FOR MAKING MY SISTER CRY!”
Dearest Journal,

So, there are a few things that every spellweaver gets good at over time. The first is, simply speaking, lifting immense amounts of weight. Every rug has to be washed, stretched, washed again, and washed—well, as many times as it takes for the dye process used to stop expelling excess in the wash. Or to take in the appropriate amount of dye.

Wet fabric is about, eh, six times it’s dry weight—doesn’t matter much when it’s something like a cape or a hanky, but a whole unicorn rug, even rolled up for transport, weighs the same as a fully grown unicorn—often the same as the unicorn that wove it. Or, in whatever case, the same weight as the weaver.

I can work eight wet rugs at the same time.

Lifting three adult stallions who are fighting each other in a pond—along with quite a bit of pond water—then separating them out, gently letting go of the water without letting go of the stallion, and resisting the urge to shake, twist, or otherwise do any of the things I would normally do with a rug.

It’s only past the first trimere that a mare begins to feel the cravings associated with pregnancy. My mother craved blackstrap molasses, orange-blossom honey, sour cherries, pickled limes, eggshell meal, and barley when she was pregnant with me, my sister Spangle Surprise, and my brothers—my older brother, Spadille Surprise, and my younger brother, Solitaire Surprise. I had my first real craving a while ago—moules marinières, after all, is not something a unicorn wants to eat unless they’ve grown up in a mixed family.

Right now, I want onion soup. There’s a misconception most ponies have with onion soup—that the flavor comes from the onions alone. The sweetness, the caramelization, the softness as it hits the tongue—that, indeed, comes from onions. The complexity of flavor, however, comes from the stock. Mostly, it comes from mushrooms. Lots of mushrooms are slimy to the touch, soggy, and a bit lonely—all they need is the thick, creamy soup of joy to become tasty.

I completely ignore the audience I’ve gathered, and I carefully set each stallion equidistant apart, well out of my way as I step in the kitchen, and firmly in the air—and then I set to work. To start with, a roasting pan—and in them, I set out full size potbelly mushrooms, along with…well, basically every kind of mushroom they have in this kitchen that is edible and won’t clash with each other terribly…plus all the ones I like. Add in some kombu, walnuts, ripe tomatoes, malted barley, stale bread rinds, stale cheese rinds…Cut everything into small pieces to increase the surface area, which means more browning and more flavor.

Then, cover everything with a healthy dash of soy sauce; crush some dried mushrooms I like the taste of into powder, and just- yeah, a nice semi-wet slurry of flavor right there.

One whole head of peeled crushed garlic- just a little, to really amp up that surface area; a small bushel of onions, fine diced; carrots; celery; fennel; leek; season with salt and pepper- then bake it in a medium oven for about an hour.

Once the grilling is done, everything in the pan needs to simmer for a good four hours- or, if you have a pressure cooker, like this kitchen does, two hours. Don’t use a pressure cooker if you don’t know how!

Scrape all the roasted goodness into the pressure cooker, and then add three liters of water in the roasting pan and then into the pot to get all the little stragglers- oh, and add a trussed bundle of herbs, bay leaves and thyme (and rosemary, it felt right), to boost the flavor. Oh, and a little bit of mustard, for some kick. Just a little salt- correct it after the cooking, if you please…

Bring the pressure cooker up to it’s highest setting, then lower it to nearly the lowest and let it go for two hours.

Then, menace the very startled members of the Whitebeard Adventurer’s Guild into giving you, your friend, and your, um, Tristan, some privacy for a private conversation. I do so love my hairpin collection.

So, Journal, apparently none of my Equestrian cousins know how to properly wrangle their manes. This has lead to some alarming misconceptions, the most pertinent of which is that if a Surprise clan member’s mane is sleek and well behaved, they are in dire emotional distress. This is not true.

Firstly, our manes are always extremely curly- Ace is actually semi-constantly either in or on the edge of an emotional disaster, which is why his mane is wavy while also being so short. I haven’t gotten a mane cut in… let me count it properly… goodness, fifteen years. I thought it was less than that, but that was my tail, not my mane.

I have what’s called Heteronomia, a strange magical disorder where my mane and my tail have completely different curl patterns due to external damage to my internal ley lines. My mane is as curly as any other member of the Surprise clan; my tail is pin straight, and always has been. I actually carry a picture of me as a foal for situations just like this, as new schools, new teachers, and government officials always need more than just my word that yes, my mane and tail are supposed to be like that, really.

As for how my ley lines were hurt… Aunt Zipper says my mother was in a very bad accident, and it broke something in her mind; she was sane just long enough to give me the first of her milk, and then she tried to hurt herself very badly, and had to go live in the hospital. I visited her twice a week, every week- right up until she died of heartache, the medical term for what happens when a pony physically, mentally, or emotionally can’t fulfill their special talent.

My mother, Pineapple Surprise, during her moments of clarity, taught me how to care for my mane properly, gave me recipes to bake, taught me songs she would have sung to me as a filly… all sorts of things. Her cutie mark was a boomerang; and the only reason I know how she got it was because, after her death, my Aunt Zipper (Zipper Ripstop, nee Surprise) was finally free to tell me.

As far as I could make out, through my Aunt’s garbled telling (she was so sad, after my mother died), Mother got her cutie mark by creating an entirely new form of logical progression. Circular reasoning is when you begin with where you should have ended, and work around until you come back to your initial conclusion, ignoring everything that doesn’t fit. Mother’s new form of logic is called Spiraluar Reasoning- whereby you come to a new conclusion by starting with a conclusion you want.

It’s actually very useful for bringing disparate pieces of research together, or understanding trends in history. Mother’s in the books as the philosopher who invented this particular method of research. She’s also in the books as the philosopher who went mad after tampering with forces far beyond her control- while heavily pregnant with me. So far as I could ever figure, from reading her confiscated notes, looking over her experiment logs, and the injuries she got immediately after that final, disastrous experiment, Mother was trying to predict Chaos.

Journal, I don’t know what she was thinking, or why that was her answer to whatever was plaguing her- but I do know that her experiment broke her mind. It was that break that made her heartache so profound; and it’s not like my cousin Pinkie’s bipolar disorder either, that’s managed with diet and magi-medication…

I don’t know, Journal. I suppose, for the sake of simplicity, it’s easiest to say it plain- I am always of two minds about everything, everything there ever is. Part of me wishes to react with spontaneity; and part of me wishes to react with routine. For most ponies, that’s normal; for a Surprise, it’s always one, or the other.

But not me.

Ace didn’t know any of that; Tristan did; and Mark is mortified to learn it, mostly because it’s a Seapony thing to not know so many intimate details about another pony without being intimately involved with them.

Ace also didn’t know that the length of a Surprise mane dictates so much of it’s curl- the sheer weight of the hair stretches the curl out, and I haven’t had a serious mane cut in fifteen years, and I actually sleep with curlers in my tail- yes, really. Tristan posits that I’d be adorable no matter what my mane and tail looked like- I rebut with the simple fact that I absolutely hate being stared at like an exhibit at the science museum, and, inevitably, that’s what happens when I have a shortcut mane and tail.

‘You’d still be cute, though.’
‘...hmph.’

To finish the broth, vent the steam from the pressure cooker- either using your magic, or wearing heat-safe mitts- before sieving the broth of all the solid pieces, first through a fine metal mesh strainer, then again through a fine cheesecloth.

Then you need to set aside the broth, and prepare the onions. How much diced onion do you need? It’s like making creamed spinach- if you look at it and think to yourself, ‘fuck, that’s way too much’, you’ve got just about enough for a small group. As for actual amount… eh, five or six kilos should do it. Using the same pot I made the broth in, I caramelized the onions, right until translucence and a bit of browning; sprinkled in a bit of salt to get even more moisture out, and then pressure cooked on low for twenty to thirty minutes. Once it’s done, maybe a little sugar and baking soda- like, a teaspoon each- to speed up the caramelization. Stir and cook until it looks deep brown, like a particularly chunky-onion caramel- like the candy, that’s why it’s called caramelization. Then, deglaze the pan with white wine and brandy- one for brightness, the other for deep, intense flavor. Four spice mix (pepper, cloves, nutmeg, ginger), and they only have fresh of each so use much less, fresh spices are strong . A pinch of flour to thicken it- any would work, I’m partial to rice; and then, add the stock.

Pressure cook it for fifteen to thirty minutes.

To finish- dish it out in a large ramekin, top with slices of a nice baguette, and then cover the bread with grated cheese- any good melt-n-crisper will do, but I’m using white cheddar because there’s lots of it. Put it in the oven- any temperature is fine, so long as it’s not cold- until it’s nicely charred.

While that’s going, set out bowls and spoons for the guys and myself, because I can’t actually eat all the soup I just made- oh, yes, and actually set them down, Ace is turning a bit pasty, whoops…

Serve with a careful admonishment to not eat too quickly, you’ll burn your tongue.

The tables in this part of the kitchen are metal, and polished to a mirror finish- and I find I have some sort of internal distortion of time, looking into the metal mirror, reflecting back my own face and the darkness of the ceiling above me… because, well, when I look at myself in the mirror below me, what I see is my own breath misting across the surface, and then--pool of blood, the panicked shouting of my friends-

Here’s a bit of theology for you, while I bob and weave and SERIOUS PUNCH through this crowd of screaming Others: the followers of the Gods, they fall under certain… I dunno, types?

Acobians are always restrained in some way- physical, spiritual, mental, they’re either virgins too afraid to explore, hidebound traditionalists, or deeply analytical.

Garmuts are always gossipy, and their actions are easily emptied of meaning.

Hense (and her husband, Pan), created the Maenads and the Maena.

Lemmings are anxiety ridden disasters, inflicting profound suffering on themselves at every turn.

Micians can’t let anything go- they hoard physical objects, and secrets, and grudges- bringing them up like they happened just yesterday.
Ola’s are not responsible- you can let a child play with them… but never entrust a child to their sole care. They try- heaven knows they try, they just… can’t. Their primary god, their own nature-children need structure, and Ola’s cannot provide it.

Jevellrys are indecisive.

Piths are reckless, and often bring pain to those around them.

Roats are awash with greed, lust, desire- and they are never satisfied with what they have.

Yudrig’s have terrible self control.

Zul’s are gullible.

Caelya’s talk too much, drink too much, can never make a home in one place...

I threw myself into this fight without once questioning if I could win; and at my back, Neo and Franky roar their own defiance. Fighting Others is tricky, and depending on which god you follow, you can have an unbeatable offence- or a terrible weakness.

I don’t know where the Kooky Kids are, and I’m very- I need to focus, but I can’t help but worry that I’ve either hurt them in my fighting, or that they’ve been separated from us and- I can’t be taken in my the lies of the Others; I move too forthrightly, my god moves too forthrightly.

I don’t know if it’s the same for cooks. I don’t know the Small Gods as well as I do the Pantheopaly; and for those who serve, the Small Gods often become more important than the big ones.

I don’t know the small gods of the kitchen.

I don’t know if Havij is okay- she’s a Dreamer, I know that now, she’d never stay out of a fight like this...

I do know I’ll be okay. Mab, on the other hand… she’s in just the right position to either be caught in the Other’s trap… or break free, break the Others, break them- forever. Or at least as long as this Age lasts.

Pyth says that the Others bring unwholesome Chaos to this world- that they find our Order and our acts of Creation to be Chaos and Destruction, and that we are, forever, indelibly opposed. He says that his followers must make a choice- not every one of his followers is strong enough to fight the Others, but all of his followers are strong enough to face them. Some sutra say that the Others cannot be truly defeated; others say that they are only defeated in death.

Pyth says that the Others can only be defeated if they are faced.

-I see my mother’s face, reflected back at me; a strange, young, bright version of her, unmarred by life’s pains and disappointments.
This isn’t real. I am not my mother- and whatever dream life the Others could give me...

Others… the only thing they’re good at is twisting the truth, lying. The only power they have is the power you give them; the only advantage they have is the one you don’t take.

An Other’s ability to lie is so powerful, they can ambush someone like me- stab me in the chest with a trident- and I’ll believe it. But it’s not true, and I follow Zul.

What does that mean? I don’t know, exactly- I certainly can’t teach anyone else to follow Her.

Just because something isn’t a lie doesn’t mean that it’s not a deception. A liar knows that they are a liar; but one who speaks mere portions of truth in order to deceive is a crafter of destruction. It’s easy to tear down a fantasy with portions of truth- and humans need fantasy to be human at all. It’s not like some kind of pink pill to make life bearable- no; humans need fantasy because without it, we become animals, we become… less.

Children need little lies to internalize big truths; a doll is not really alive, but it can teach you how to love something else, how to be loved by something else. No human is born knowing it is loved; it must be practiced. We have to learn to believe the little lies, so we can believe the big ones.

There is no grain of justice, or mercy, or duty, or anything of that sort in this world- it does not grow in any field, it cannot be harvested, and yet: are there not shortages and gluts? Do the people not come to cry out for these things when they are absent? Do these things not sprout in the strangest of places, at the awkwardest of times, in clear defiance of all reason and sense?

Grind everything down to the finest pieces and sift through it all- you’ll never find a single mote of mercy, a speck of justice. And yet, even the worst of humanity goes around pretending it exists. We act as if there is an ideal order to the world, as if there is some… rightness, by which all are eventually judged. Zul says there is not- but, she also says that it is only by our belief in that rightness, our faith that the world isn’t… this, that we cannot let it be this… it is only by believing that such things can become.

Faith will not move a mountain; it will make someone who can. It will make a person who, in a room where a conspiracy of silence is maintained unanimously, speaks a word of truth like gunfire. Someone who says what they think, and is not ashamed to say it.

Children and half-wits point out that the emperor has no clothes- but a half-wit remains a half-wit, and the emperor remains an emperor- and, to the Other’s horror, children grow. They become more than they were to start. Other’s can’t do that- or if they can, it is akin to unmaking who they were. They are as they are- they don’t grow, they don’t change, they don’t layer on the years and the year’s changes like skin on an onion- and changing, for them, is just another kind of death.

Zul says the truth is always something that is told, not something that is known. Fae are told they can fly- before then, we do not know. If there were no speaking or writing or sharing of Knowledge, there would be no truth about anything. There would only be what is.

Zul says, things break easily when they’re held together with lies; truth is eternal, adamant, unbreakable and divine.

Zul says, above all, don’t lie to yourself. They who lies to themselves and listen to their own lies come to a point that they cannot distinguish the truth within, or around, and so lose all respect for themself and for others. Without respect, they will cease to love.

I say: Whatever dream life the Others could give me is only something I could give myself.

It’s time to wake up. Dreams are nice- but I won’t settle for anything less than the real thing. True life only; accept no substitutes.

Echo theory goes like this: If something exists, it exists in every possible way there is for it to exist. Every action rings out; takes itself, goes out into every world that can support that action being taken.

There is a world- there are many worlds. In all worlds that have the right two people, they always fall in love- and no, time and place and living or dead and war and strife and wealth and gender and and and- if they exist in the same universe, they will learn of each other first, and then begin speaking with each other, and then they will fall-

Hard and fast, soft and quiet, moments or lifetimes or seconds or a brief, grieving silence-

In love.

My master is a very good teacher- she did her best to teach me enough, to prepare me for learning the basic-most parts of her Art. Even now, covered in blood and shattered crystal slivers, heaving with sweat and my swords burning hot and icy cold in my hands- even now, I can’t help but think:

In every world where such an atrocity as what has been done here exists, and I, too, exist, I would always bring ruination and death to the fount of it.

I will always destroy the evil work of the Other. It is a part of who I am.

I will not abide such horrors in this world; I will not allow it.

I roll my shoulders and carefully walk through the carnage my fury wrought- here, a man torn in two, his guts a cruel mockery of ribbon on the floor, his blood all turned to ice in his veins and his skin black with frost; there, a woman dismembered and strewn against a wall, soot and burnt and ashes disfiguring all but a hand, tipped with pink lacer and sparkling bangles. Another; another; another.

Counting myself and my friends- Zoro, Brook, and Li-pho (EE-faa, spelled A-O-I-F-E)- there were one hundred and fifty people in this room before. Now, there’s only four.

When we were brought in here, they closed the doors behind us. High above, I can see video-snails shivering in terror, their eyes wide and fixed on what I have done. In the cold, strange silence, I can hear a deep, echoing thrumming- and I can see, through a crack in the door, an army of black and yellow shapes advancing with fury.

“They’re coming. Y’all best be ready for round two,” is all I can say.

And then, they’re through the door- and my swords find flesh again.

When I open my eyes for real, it’s to see Adelaide getting the shit kicked out of her.

I could pause and fix my chest; I could make myself neat and pretty. I could do a lot of things.

What I actually do is pretty simple.

I stand, leaving the lie on the floor where it belongs. I take two steps and then move. I shove my fingers in the Wasp Queen’s left eye, and tear it out. And then- and then, while she’s screaming bloody murder, I toss the eye in my mouth and chew.

She stares at me in horror as I chew- and that horror turns to rage when I spit the mangled mush of her eye out onto the floor.

She lunges for me, one working eye streaming with tears. I bend under her blow before catching a flailing leg and cutting her foot off at the ankle. I put her foot in my mouth and chew.

Her blood splatters, pink and smelling faintly of manganese.

Another blow- another piece of her torn away, this time part of her hip. I spit, and chew again.

A hand.

Spit.
Chew.

An elbow.
Spit.
Chew.

Two wings.
Spit.
Chew.

The other foot.
Spit.
Chew.

The other hand.
Spit.
Chew.

Her left breast.
Spit.
Chew.

Her right breast.
Spit.
Chew.

The whole right arm.
Spit.
Chew.
Part of her thigh.
Spit.
Chew.

Her knee and shin.
Spit.
Chew.

Her liver.
Spit.
Chew.

Her lung.
Spit.
Chew.

Her other eye.
Spit.
Chew.

Finally, she’s a head on a ruined torso, one arm left to her and screaming curses at me- the distraction of my brutality afforded Adelaide a second wind, which was half the reason I did it at all. Best to end things decisively.

I spit. Juices that taste of dust and rotten milk and burnt hair and the color of agony ooze down my chin.

I stretch my open hand to her. I close it into a fist. I twist my fist and pull it sharply to my waist. She screams.
I open my hand to reveal the fluttering, pulsing heart of her within.

“KALIMAA,” is what I say as I crush the Wasp Queen’s heart to bloody pulp.

I feel it, as the Other known in this World as the Wasp Queen dies forever- a snap, like the closing of a door or the breaking of a string under immense tension. She’s truly dead, now. I stretch, rolling my shoulders up and out, the three holes through my body filling with chittering shadows and thick black honey before sealing- flesh and bone once more.

Ugh.

My hand’s all bloody now. I shake some of the pulpy flesh off, but- no, I’ll have to wash it. Urgh.

“...M-missus Mab?”

“Yes, Adelaide?”

“...Do you have any lock picks?”

“Certainly. Here you are- I’ll get Captain out, why don’t you help Robin and Captain Trafalgar,”

“Y-yes, Missus, right away,”

I toss Adelaide the roll of picks, and I saunter over to Captain without much more than a glance at his captors.

“You three have about seven seconds to haul him out before I loose my temper again,”

They ignore me. Well, I tried.

You know, it’s funny- Others and Humans, physically speaking, are about equal. The difference, scientifically speaking, is our plane of origin. I just think it’s a neat little tidbit- it makes no difference for how easily I tear their wings from their backs and their limbs from their bodies and use one’s head to disorient another while tearing the heart out of the third.

All three die by my hands.

I haul Captain out of the tank of salt water with his head and neck and shoulders and waist, until he can climb out himself. Then I wash their pink-strange blood off of me in the salt water. It dissolves like it never was.
Left hand; right hand; mouth; feet. Done.

I stretch again, roll my neck, and sigh.

Much better. I’ve no idea what happened to my jacket- it was a nice jacket, brown leather and shorter than I’d expected I’d need to wear… as for what I’m actually wearing- kung fu shoes and socks and wraps; old fashioned Muscovy pants; an acid washed denim button down crop top, quite backless; and my belt, with it’s lotus blossom buckle. My hair is in a high ponytail, and I have the most nostalgic feelings (my own or perhaps inherited) with it all loose and pulled back like this.

Concerning those in the room with me- Robin is wearing black hiking boots, floral colorblocked leggings, a bright yellow bodysuit (which is marvelous against her skin, and will only look better in the summer, when her tan improves), and a hooded cowl with the nose and mouth coverings (as well as hood) currently lowered.

Adelaide is in a wonderful kimono and hakama, very pretty- the most modern touch being her hair, which is in a stacked bun style. She reminds me very much of a striped eel catfish.

Annie, I’m worried about- not her clothing, her mod-weave shawl, neutral bodysuit, knee high socks, and black oxford heels are all just fine, and her glasses aren’t broken- but her skull might be. I’m too keyed up to check. Fuck.

Udoroth looks like a Muscovy trader from the edgelands. Furry leather hat, long yellow coat over a dark blue tunic, black pants and tall wrappings over tall boots… the works.

Trafalgar Law has changed his hat; otherwise, he looks the same as he ever did, just with a veneer of maturity scraped over that burning trash fire of a personality. Some of the things his sister has told me… eugh.

Oh- oh no, Captain-

“You’re soaked, Captain- it’s much too cold for that. Do you want the red one or the black one?”

“Uh-”

“Shirts-?”

“Oh! Red one,”

“And do you want khaki or denim?”

“...can’t I wear a skirt? Mark wears skirts an’ you don’t say nothin’!”

“Mark doesn’t use kicks in his fighting all that much, and he’s always wearing something underneath. There are perverts everywhere, Captain- do you really want anyone other than someone you gave permission seeing all your bits?”

“...noooo...”

“Khaki or denim?”
“...Can I have hakama?”

“I have denim hakama, yes,”

“Yes!”

“Pockets?”

“...Pockets?”

“Lucy Locket lost her pocket; Penny Pincher found it; not a beri was there in it; only ribbon ‘round it— ...You’ve never heard that?”

“Nope,”

“Okay, well- this is a pocket, Adelaide’s got one on her I think- A! What do you keep in your pocket?”

“Mostly full-size bags of dried salty-spicy shredded squid, Missus Mab; uh, a small coin purse, a sewing kit, an’ a comb… why?”

“Captain didn’t know tie on pockets were a thing- So, Luffy, you want a pair?”

“Hell yeah!”

“Allright- I can fill them with snacks if you- yeah, okay, I’ll fill them with snacks for you...”

“...Can I have socks? My toes are cold, Mab,”

“Sure thing- d’you want tabi so you can wear your sandals?”

“Yes,”

“Okay- here-”

“Sakura...?”

“It is April, Captain,”

“Oh yeah! -My coat’s too wet, isn’t it?”

“Afraid so,”

“Uuugh-”

“There there; scarves aren’t so bad-”

“Uuuuugh-”

Captain is a big silly bag of beans and he always makes me smile when I’m feeling low. He does it intentionally, I’m nearly certain of it.

Hmm-?
“Sorry, what was that?”

“I said I really want to find the rest of our crewmates, Missus Mab! I’m worried about them, and my sisters, too,”

“Hm. I, personally, am quite worried about Sawbones- she took a dive down that garbage chute, and I’m very concerned that her soft-body LCD ruptured-”

“- don’t even joke about stuff like that!”

“Who said I’m joking?”

“Nooooooo-”

“Mm. She was breeding extra large ones in anticipation of this trip, too-”

“Noooooooonooooo-”

“Wait, wait- Bones has bigger leeches now?!”

“She surely does, Captain,”

“... How is she not dead from blood loss already? ”

“Mystery. Bones has Mystery Blood,”

“...I guess, but you shouldn’t just say it like that...”

“Well, how else am I supposed to say it-? Oh, hello, there’s a control panel- let’s see if I can make it work or not...”

I can. As it turns out, I should have probably turned the broadcasting parts off first, but we can only move forwards with our lives through time, not backwards.

Every cook has their weird little quirks. Chef will not begin his work without first folding his towels a very specific way, and stacking them six high and three wide, no more, no less. Every service, he does this- and if he’s not used them all during service, he checks them for splatter and refolds and restocks them.

Chef also enforces Tape Rules; I made it easier on myself and my juniors by commissioning Fern and Havij to make a combo tape-dispenser and sharpie-holder that we can move around as needed. We all carry sharpies and little knives to write on and cut the white, one inch wide tape; and we all have to re-label the shelves on occasion, too. There’s a protocol for cleaning the cambros and the deli cups, and it’s my least favorite job. Oz loves organizing and labelling shit. Every time we get a cool new bottle of something from the daiso, he’ll wash it out and use it elsewhere...

I won’t go in for work without my cooking chopsticks, my pocket knife, a small offset spatula, and a bench scraper.
“Deb, what you’ve made is one of the most insanely horrific baked baps I’ve ever had the misfortune of seeing with my own two eyes. At no point in your rambling, incoherent creative process were you even close to anything that could be considered a ration. Everyone in this room is now worse for having been exposed to it,”

“A simple yes would have done me fine, Mince,”

“I dunno, Min- it’s pretty impressive that she put so many ingredients into a dish and it came out tasting like nothing.”

“Oz, I’m not so soft you can’t tell me the truth- it’s garbage, and not at all what we were going for,”

“Deb, I’m going to say this one more time and then we’re catching hands- for pure, vacillating awfulness, for superior incompetence, for ignorance and bad judgement- in short, for a true, genius talent for unmitigated catastrophe, you stand alone. Mince and I abide in the halls of mediocrity, but you reach further to the realm of disaster. Only you can make a poultrygeist by accident, and bake it off into a ruinous bread bowl that spits live explosive hazelnut bombs; and only you could have scared off a slavering horde of Others with the sheer awfulness of your hideous creation. It can’t have been easy- you started with good ingredients, a well-tested recipe, excellent equipment, an organized mis, and repeated opportunities to save the situation, I think. But you, Deb, with that ruinous touch of true malefic genius, swept aside those obstacles with unerring precision, and out of gleaming order wrought pure and unending chaos. DOWN!”

Tape rules go like this; everything that happens in a professional kitchen grows out of the fertile soil of tape. Tearing tape in our kitchen is grounds for serious punishment duty- deboning quail, cleaning grease traps, sanitizing sinks, the works. Chef will stop service entirely if he discovers the Tape Rule hasn’t been followed correctly.

The tape has to get cut with a pair of scissors or a knife in a straight line, with a small tab folded over for ease of removal. On this label should be written the product name, the current date (including year!), and the initials of the person who packed the container. The label, once properly made, must be affixed one inch from the top of the container, always perpendicular to the open edge of the container. Bottles get the same treatment, except their labels are to be vertical. The shelves of the pantry are to be labelled in the same manner, with general product category instead of specific product- excepting staples, such as rice. Tape is to be no larger than one inch wide, no exceptions; painter’s tape is preferred to masking tape. The color of our kitchen tape is white. It’s cheapest, but it makes Oz flinchy if he looks at it too long, so I’m going to suggest we switch to blue- we don’t cook much blue food, after all.

Laid out like that, it sounds crazy- but, like my sister learned being apprenticed to Missus Mab, good organization is critical in all endeavours. Missus Mab is not a cook; and she doesn’t use tape in her Dairy. She says it’s because the adhesives release a noxious fume that can- and has, in her experience- ruined the taste of a cheese. All of her labels are paper with quick-glue, or wooden tags, or government-style sliding slats in their own holders. This is because everything in a Dairy has to be sanitary- and for that to happen, everything in a Dairy has to be sanitizable.

Which means everything- including the labels- can be removed, cleaned, and used again.

The big takeaway? Hard complicated work requires mental clarity. If your mind is cluttered with teetering piles of garbage, dirty work areas, and other such junk, you won’t get very far at all.
For Chef, the way we treat the tape is an indication of our quality control. Each prep station has a bus bin for dirty containers; if the labels in the bins haven’t been removed, it’s because one of us is rushing or nervous- and it’s something Chef always looks for. Chef says that paying attention to how we treat our tape is practice for paying attention to the quality of our food, including the final presentation.

I roll through the open space between two heavy counters, barely escaping the cruel shrapnel of a hazelnut bomb. Shards of shell and nut-meat smoke in the open space- but I’ve made it to the pantry.

“DEB, THE BREAD-BEAST IS ANGRY!”

“Three ingredients and a pre-prep-filling, how did you cause all of this with three ingredients-?!”

“I told the both of you not to let me bake first!”

“Don’t look at me, Mister Hangover was distracting me!”

“Oh gods please let my death be swift- ah, the color of the dish is a bit off. Also, I think it’s lethally poisonous to most forms of organic and inorganic life, and will provoke allergic reactions in Germa Poisonfeather Birds, ”

“-You could have interjected at any time, Mister!”

“I did, I told you to tell her not to put in that much- urgh- salt- hrrrrKKK- ”

“EEEEw- shit! DEB, THE VIOL-AU-VENT GREW TEETH AND IT’S HEADED RIGHT FOR YOU-”

“I CAN SEE THAT, THANK YOU CAPTAIN OZBIOUS-”

There’s a fairly direct difference between a failure and a fiasco. A failure is simply the non-presence of success. Any fool can not succeed. A fiasco, on the other hand, is a disaster of mythic proportions. A fiasco is a folk tale told to others that makes them feel more alive because it didn’t happen to them. I’ve done a little bit of damage to the kitchen- I tried really hard not to! It just… sort of… happened. Just me trying to bake increases the flammability of concrete; the non-reactive countertops stood no chance at all.

“Deb, when you bake it’s not just bad, it’s supernatural. When you step to bake, shit goes so wrong- it’s like you turn off the magic and turn on the wrong,”

“Bad rhyme, Oz, try again,”

“Dammit!”

“Baked Chicken, Deb- how did you manage to turn baked chicken into this? You’d better hope this doesn’t happen on the Sunny-”

“Shut up, Mince! I thought it only happened to breads and pastries! And the recipe was clearly labeled as Chicken Vol-au-vent,”

“Baked is in the fucking description! Flames burst from the oven like tears from a salamander! The baking dish was melting! And the portal the fumes were forming gave me a bad feeling-”

“It was a tiny portal, and the chanting wasn’t that ominous-”

“Dammit all to shit, Deb- baking bad is not supposed to break the world like this!”

“Lucky for us all, I’ve done this often enough that I have an SOP for just such an occasion-”

“Oh no-” “Oh no-” “Oh no-”

“Oh Yes! Just look at that blackened crust- there’s only one thing for it. I’m going to make a big mess of wow-wow and douse that fucker in it!”

Wow-wow sauce is a fairly simple construction of matured suicider, pickled cucumbers, capers, my specialty mustard, dead-ripe mangoes, puree of fig, grated Wahoonie (which is a type of durian that’s been packed in chili powder, sugar, and salt), anchovy essence (though smelt or sprat will do in extremis), asafetida, a healthy portion of sulfur and saltpeter, squidberry juice (unfermented if you please), and very large amounts of smoked paprika, Mangala Red Python Chili (which has to be hunted via harpoon), and Vampire Frog Venom, for body.

When these ingredients, plus of course salt and fresh-cracked black pepper, and a quantity of water to ensure proper mixing, are combined in a clean glass bowl, it results in a fairly safe if pyroclastic sauce to be used on anything you’d like- provided it doesn’t contain any charcoal, or burnt-black parts. Wow-wow sauce contains most of the ingredients for gunpowder, save the charcoal, after all.

Oh, yes, and it’s best to never eat it straight- it’s a terrible journey to Flavortown. On a scale of one to ten, ten being the most revolting and one being almost edible- you know, if the alternative is starvation- wow-wow sauce rates the use of exponents. Food does not absolutely need to taste good to keep someone alive; but to keep someone from committing suicide, it does need to taste better than wow-wow sauce. Thus, wow-wow sauce is to be used only in extreme flavor emergencies, or when a baked bad gets out of hand. For safety purposes, it can only be stored in cold-rooms; and it is only fit for consumption while condensation still runs down the side of the bottle.

This is a very oddly stocked pantry- I’ve got all the critical ingredients, and a bowl to mix it in… and of course, I never leave the ship without a healthy supply of mustard.

As Mince, Oz, and Mister Hangover do their best to distract the Chicken Violauvent from peppering me with ballistic hazelnuts, I mix the horrific concoction. Baked bads are funny- they can only be destroyed in three ways: they can decay, like going moldy; they can be eaten; and they can be rendered inert. We don’t have time for the Violauvent to go moldy; we don’t have a Trash Goblin or a sacrificial diner to eat it; so, Wow-wow sauce. It’s the only thing I’ve ever found that renders a baked bad inert.

I’m going to save my friends- by mixture, by maceration. By the seat of my skirts, and the pockets beneath.

Eventually, my horrific concoction comes together into… something . What that something is defies all description. It doesn’t rest in the bowl so much as hunch malevolently, hating all that would be eating and being hated by all with working noses…
I take a wooden spoon and portion out the sauce into little paper service cups—like you put ketchup in? And then the Chicken Violauvent notices me, and screeches through the air on its hideously blackened puff-pastry wings.

“Hey chicken-shit! Eat this!”

And then I pelt it with as many servings of wow-wow sauce as it takes for the natural disintegration properties to take real effect. A bit after the Chicken Violauvent splatters into the garbage with a weak cry of vomitous fury, I realize that this is the first time either of my boys have ever seen me use my battle skills in an actual battle.

No time to tease them about it, though—we’ve got Others incoming. I pull out a brace of Vorpal Blades from my vambraces, dunk them in wow-wow and throw them true. Others melt from existence like beef fat on a griddle.

I adjust my ponytail, tug my skirt down and make sure my shirt hasn’t come unbuttoned; re-tie my ribbon, and throw one more knife—gotcha!

Mince looks like what he is—a jock that forgot to cut his hair and stole a scrunchie off my sister and is wearing his father’s peacock feather cloak without considering the fact that it’s longer than he can really comfortably wear. He’s thrown his cloak over a chair in the corner while we fought the Viol Au Vent, presumably to save it from stains—leaving his green ivy tattoos open to the frigid air.

Oz looks like a glam rocker that got the spirit of going incognito, but not the actual reality of going incognito. He’s hung his jacket on a hook, as well as his hat—leaving his sparkly hair pins, and his Destiny Pick, open for all to see. His chroma are fairly writhing with nervous energy—black lines curl and twist as colors dance and spark between and through and over the lines. With his sleeves shoved up like that, his arms are a scintillating explosion of color, ever shifting with his emotions. Oz doesn’t really like showing much skin—yep, there he goes, pulling his sleeves down again.

As for Mister Hangover—he’s tall, gangly, pale as milk with blue traceries visible in his skin—veins, I’d guess. He’s got the tone of skin that would burn in the sun, burn and blister and peel away, only to burn again—I don’t think he freckles. A fluffy bowl cut that’s grown out and been cut back with haphazard hands, thick and black and wild at the edges; purple lips in a pointy face, wide yellow eyes that gleam faintly green when the—wow, I’m much too close to him, excuse me.

“Sorry,"

“I—it’s fine. Um. Did you find, ah, find what you’re looking for?”

“...You have green eyes,”

“U-um,”

As the blush chases the milk-pale tone of his cheeks away, I’m suddenly struck by the horrifying Realization my friends from school tried to tell me so long ago.

Shit.

He’s wearing a tiger striped jumpsuit, a black sleeveless parka, and shiny black boots. There’s something silver, around his neck- it smells like the ocean and gods in heaven I’m much too close again-

“Sorry,”

“Um,”

“What Devil Fruit did you eat?”

“Ah… you can tell so easily?”

“I can smell your necklace- the ocean is pungent,”

“Oh! Oh, I see- um, well…”

“We sure cooked the hell out of this kitchen-”

“No, doesn’t track; maybe something with heat?”

“Eh, feels derivative. So… she likes him?”

“You have to ask?”

“You can’t control it?”

“I can, just… not while I’m unconscious. I was coming to the kitchen for a late night snack, when, well…”

“Ah. So… these are your pajamas?”

“N-not, ah. No. I fell asleep at my desk,”

“What’s your name, anyway? We can’t keep calling you Mister Hangover, not knowing you’ve been accidentally poisoning yourself.”

“Oh. Um. I’m- I’m Linus. Linus Clown,”

“Eh? But- Missus, isn’t the Venom Venom in Impel Down somewhere? I would have thought that after all the riots, and it going dark...”

“Ah- Linus Clown didn’t eat the Venom Venom, Adelaide,”

“Eeh?”
“Hm… If there’s a paramecia of a certain kind of thing, there’s also a logia of that thing: if there is a fruit that can bestow the properties of a substance, can emit a substance, control a certain thing- there also exists a fruit that turns someone into that very substance. Luffy, our Captain, isn’t actually made of rubber- his fruit is a paramecia, not a logia. Thus, while his body has all the properties of rubber- literally, literally, metaphorically, and mystically- it’s not actually actual rubber. If you cut him, he bleeds blood, not rubber-tree sap- which is what rubber is, in it’s basic-most state. My fruit, the Shadow Shadow, isn’t classified as a logia, paramecia, or zoan- it’s much older than those classifications, and it doesn’t really follow the rules accepted as standard. Am I a mortal woman with the properties of a shadow? Am I an actual shadow? Do I control the shadows? The answer to all those questions is yes,”

“But did you start with those powers, or…?”

“Dunno,”

“Eeh!?”

“It’s not really important- what does matter is this. Languages are not the same across the world, no matter what the World Government likes to say. Doku Doku- that literally translates as poison poison, or venom venom, and in my own native language, neither of those things are the same. Venom is: if I bite you, die; poison is: if you bite me, die. That’s different. More importantly, young Mister Clown didn’t eat a fruit that does either of those options- he ate what I’d call the Toxic Toxic, which is… hrm… I am the death of all things; none shall escape me. Very different,”

“Um,”

“Interesting that he can’t control it unconsciously- speaks to a deep seated insecurity of some sort,”

“UM,”

“Hmm?”

“Ellie is fighting a harpy,“

“Ah?”

“Right there!”

“Oh my goodness gracious-”

---

Here’s something that most people don’t realize about demons. All of them, every last man, woman, and child, has the potential for limitless, unceasing rage- the kind of rage that allows Sanji to set himself on fire without being burned.

I’ve never been really, truly angry- at least, not that I remember. I must have done, as a young child… but as I grew, I found fewer and fewer things to really get my irritated attention focused, and after a certain point, even the effort of irritation was just… too much. I didn’t get angry when my mother was refused access to a doctor; I didn’t get angry when they refused to prescribe the treatment necessary to, if not save her, make her remaining life worth living; I didn’t even get angry when they kicked me and Genny out of medical school for thefts we didn’t do.
No.

I got even.

Doctor’s won’t see your mom? Genny became good-as, and saw to our mother. Doctors won’t give you the medicine your mother needs? Beatrix found the things those medicines are refined from; Deborah refined them; Genny administered them. School kicks you out for stealing shit everyone knows was stolen by World Nobles? Steal the shit from the World Nobles yourself.

Can’t find an outfit that works with your natural chroma? Ask for help- and Mab made me a battle suit of my very own.

The style I use to fight- and what informs the rest of my life, as it’s really a lifestyle choice- came from the Fae, originally. No other tribe has ever approached war with such an attitude of ruthlessness; it’s a knife fighting style meant, quite specifically, to kill people quick and quiet. It focuses on angles of attack, not weapons- the theory being, no matter what weapon you use (a knife, a sword, a spear, your fist,), there are only so many weak spots on a human body to exploit. Learning to defend those points along certain angles of attack is more effective than learning whole separate forms for certain things. New weapons get built all the time- but human bodies haven’t really changed in the general form in millions of years.

I’m wearing soft black shoes that make no noise when I step; long, thigh high socks held up with a garter belt because I cannot wear tights, the chafing is too much; a black sports bra; a navy blue jumpsuit; navy blue arm sleeves; and fingertip-less gloves.

My cold weather gear is a heavy hooded cowl of fur- it used to be an animal’s pelt, their head, in fact, and then Mab cut it to fit and lined it for me; a face mask of bright orange that doesn’t catch light indoors- it only reacts to sunlight, and even then there’s a rune stitched in that lets me turn that off if I need it- and reverses to white if necessary; and my Thief’s Mask, something I finally had the time to make.

Thieves don’t show their faces; we’re known by our Thief Names, and our masks. I did a lot of weird ass shit to be recognized as ‘Orange Cat’- I only lacked a good… hm. Debut? Anyway- a Thief’s Mask is bound to the thief, and cannot be used by anyone else- there’s a whole ritual for passing them on to successors, you can’t just take on a name. Well, you can- but you won’t get the benefit of the mask. What that benefit is?

It makes your face unvisible. That’s it. It doesn’t sound like much- but, even if someone watching you knows for a fact who you are, without being able to see your face, there’s no direct proof that it’s you. And good thieves never get caught.

My mask, in it’s resting forme, looks like cheap Daiso rhinestone body stickers- the kind Decorator girls wear in excess. I wear a descending line of them, smaller and smaller, along the traditional cat eye shape right beside my eye. Putting my mask on is as simple as a thought.

“Where are you, little fish-girl? Is the ‘Catch of the Day’ hiding in the snow?”
Snow falls thicker, whiter, begins to blanket the room in unyielding cold. I stay behind the pillar, and watch as the harpy floats on her green wings. Each flap produces another stiff breeze laden with heavy snowfall; the floor is already shin deep in the noisy whiteness.

The insults being thrown at me, while terrible, aren’t… I don’t care about her opinion, so they have as much meaning as farting noises do.

A fighting style isn’t how a person actually fights- there’s more than that. To become as I am is no simple thing; many skills were learned and mastered before I was anything like as capable as I am. Some skills, I just don’t have- I’m nowhere near finished learning, after all. There are eighteen skills; the first, and paradoxically, easiest to start but hardest to master, is spiritual refinement.

Seven elements, to spiritual refinement- knowing yourself, knowing the world, understanding fate, harmony, empathy, clear eyes, and love. Some people never manage even one of these things- and they aren’t even on my path. Some parts are easier than others. Some, I’ve barely started on- I’d never left Ryugyu Mergyo before I joined up with the Straw Hats- what do I know of the world?

The second is unarmed combat- fighting with no weapons, sometimes conflated with social combat, but really that’s it’s own thing. My mother taught me the latter- and scrapping with my sisters, and later, alongside Deb and Addie, taught me the former. The three forms- strike-blocks, holds, and movements- are what makes up unarmed combat. I’m best at holds and movements; if I don’t want to be held, I will not be. If I don’t want to make a sound, I won’t.

I don’t know much about swords except how to break them.

I don’t know much about staffs except how to use them as anything other than fighting weapons.

I don’t throw my knives like Deborah does- she’s got the fancy magic knives that return when you throw them, I’ve got something else.

The closest I come to spear (or sword) fighting is with Spit (to get the point across); not a sword, not a spear, something in the middle. Spit’s at home- I was worried about weight.

Don’t use naginata.

Don’t use kusarigama.

I do use fire and explosives- Usopp taught me a lot so I could adapt what I’d been using under water for the open air. Air and water are not the same- and an ink bomb in water is a very different thing to an ink bomb- or rather, ink bullet- in air. In air, I have to use gunpowder and explosives. There are defensive and offensive forms of my bomb and bullet tools- some are meant for hurting and injuring a foe, while others are just distractions.

There are about seven disguises that can be used at any time, in pretty much any place- a monk, a soldier, a merchant, a crafter, a farmer, a performer, or just a passerby. I’ve mastered all of them for my age range- I can do younger easily, and a little older passably- and my gender, and my opposite gender, which is fairly easy while I’m still unblooded. This wasn’t a spying or recon mission, so I didn’t pack any costumes.

Stealth and entering methods are my best skill, and I say that without overwhelming pride or hubris. I am the best that I’ve ever met at getting into places I’m not meant to be. This, above all else, is synonymous with the way I fit into the world, the title I bear beyond the slightly legal fiction of private adventurer or archaeologist-thief, for those who care to know.

There are five methods to use for stealth and entering. More than five- but the other ways are derivative. Timing and the correct moment to move. Analyzing a defence and locating a weak point. Finding the weakest part of that weak point in the defence, and the best method of putting pressure on it. Using an object to distract attention from the weak point. Concealing all sound from your position that would give you away- including the absence of sound, which can be it’s own giveaway.

For example, the easiest way to move across a snowy field is to not move across the surface at all, but below it; Slink Like The Eel beneath the chest high crust of falling snow, using your Water Techniques to change the snow into water, to make it into ocean water, and quietly swim through it-silent, serene. She’s very quick with her limbs, but not at all quick in defending her own body- Logia who aren’t used to being hit by people who can hit them, and I’m one of those people because I cheat outrageously, generally don’t defend their bodies. They defend in such a way as to make attacking, countering, easier. Get inside their guard, and prove you can hit them, and they don’t know what to do.

The best moment for this attack is when she’s still, hovering over the snow-fallen thickness of the field. My knives- Tooth and Fang- are what I’ll use to put pressure where it’s needed. Move Like The Eel. Under snow, icy tunnels- in those tunnels, seawater and me.

I slide silent, serene. Wait for it-

Horseback riding is actually quite fun; learning to shoot stuff on horseback, less so. Caring for horses? No worse than caring for a dog- even down to washing and feeding, because I’ve had many jobs. Used to work at the race track, where dogs would race- and the owners of those animals are particular about what supplements to use, and what gets fed to whom.

Water skills- what do you think Move Like The Eel is?

Mother taught me strategy- how to fight one on one, defeating many, defeating bigger and stronger enemies, destroying economies, using current events to my advantage, political scheming… everything.

Conning- not so great at the Confidence game, but I’m better than most.

Escape and Concealment- the best I’ve ever seen.

Meteorology and Geography are the last pieces to my puzzle- being able to navigate a place on my own is vitally important.

“- sleep forever in my snowy kingdom! ”

There is a faith, for those like me. I don’t follow the twelve gods of the Fae; I don’t follow the Small Gods of Hearth and Homestead; my gods are not nameless, their works not Automatic; there is no roof to dance upon, no green peaceful place, no cessation. When I die, I will be transformed, a shadow in a sea of darkness.

The Gods of the Demons are all Gods and Goddesses of Death; the many-fingered cults of the Death God are all Demonic in nature. Demonic, as a language, has about thirty or forty different words for ‘death’- which, when explained, means that the death of something animate and inanimate is different, and the manner of it’s death is important; when it dies, both in it’s own life-span, and in a more general span of time (usually the year) matters too. For comparison, Faesh has about the same number of words for “you’re welcome”, everything from 'come and lie with me (sexually)' to 'you’re not welcome at all (go away)' to ‘I owe you my very life (do with it as thou wilt’). Fae and Honor go hand in hand.

The Demonic Pantheopaly has Twelve Gods.

Bhaal, the Vengeful Murderer. His brother was killed by a rival; and killed so thoroughly that Bhaal tore his own name in half and gave it to his brother to hold on to, and swore that the one who slew his kin would die by his hand. Upholding his promise dyed the sunrise red, and brought poor Neftis to tears. Deborah follows Him.

Set, the Half-Rotted Brewer. His brother swore vengeance in His broken name; and holding half His brother’s name was not enough to let Him survive. He made the best of it, as was His nature, but His very thoughts can sour milk and rot sugars in water. He is the God of Brewers and Cheesemakers, which is the source of unending frustration to sommelier's and cheesemongers alike.

Kelemvor, Judge of Souls. They are robed in every color and masked in mirror-white; and their duty is to weigh the Soul of the Dead, against the Heart of the Living, against the Duty as laid down by the King of Hell. Though impartial, They are not unkind- always, They offer some method of exoneration for those whose Soul could not measure equal to the Heart and the Duty. It is the burden of every Demon to know that the Heart and the Duty are only balanced by the efforts of the Soul. They are blind, and often wield a Sword- the Faesh version of Them depicts them as a sword alone, with scales balanced atop. Neither version quite captures the heart of the Judge- Justice is neither a person, nor a sword.

Loviatar, the Furious Lover. She loves the cold sweat that breaks out across her face when she bites into a piece of fruit. Her vagina spasms with pain when Her Husband enters her. All of Her children have died within the year of Her birthing them; She has a new child every year. She is allergic to fruit. There is a strange, visceral satisfaction to poking a bruise or stretching out a cramp or taking a piss after much too long or fucking a cock (or cock-like substitute, silicone and rubber are gifts from Miss Lovin’ and don’t let anyone tell you otherwise) too big for you. Some things can’t be explained with words, only felt. Spanking doesn’t sound like fun, and then you actually do it and holy shit no, not the time for fetishes.

Myrkul, the Reaper. A kind God, He is the one who ushers a Soul from it’s body and Onwards. He is not the cause of Death- merely the One Who Reaps. HE TALKS LIKE THIS IN ALL TEXTS WHERE HIS WORDS ARE RECORDED. He is fond of Faesh Food; His completely normal horse, Buckeye; His household and worldly servants; His many apprentices, and tricking them into doing his job so he can go out dancing, or drinking, or having wild orgies; Marriages that are the result of or result in Love-Matches; Life, without which He would have nothing at all to do; and Small Cats, which are wonderful any way you approach them. The Great God of the Germa Kingdom; the Protector of France. Does not enjoy parties or general revelry Himself- though has never stated a preference for His followers to follow on the subject of partying.

Anubri, the Herder. The Night Howler; the Runner, the Chaser of Night. Her Divine relationship with Myrkuil is complicated; He ushers a Soul from it’s body and Onwards. She guides a Soul from Onwards to Beyond. Their personal relationship is much simpler: they are married, and happily so. She talks like this in all texts where Her words are recorded. She is fond of Faesh Food; Her completely normal horse, Walleye; Her household and worldly servants; Her many apprentices, and sending them to spy on the world of the Living, as she’s significantly more organized than her Lord Husband; Marriages that have good, equally binding and rewarding contracts on both sides; Life, without which she would have no purpose; and Large Cats, which are majestic and magnificent, especially when they act like Small Cats.

Shar, the Measurer. She is the one who gathers up the memories of the living of the Dead; She is the one who measures the empty space left in the wake of someone’s passage. Her tears are crystal gems of impossible strength and beauty; she is long past weeping tears of sorrow.

Neftis, the Mortician. She is the one who poured the Sky apart from the Sea; it was her tears that made the Sky so cold, and the Sea so salty. She taught humanity how to have funerals, to put those whose souls escape the care and guidance of Myrkul and Anubri if not at rest, at least at peace.

Talona, the Witch. She is the one who usually ends up killing people, if not outright, then via complications. Poison, Disease, and Autoimmune Disorders are all under her domain, as are Baked Bads.

Arawn, the Farmer. He harvests all the food, and all other things that are to be harvested, at this or any other time. He is also the God of the Battlefield Dead.

Ploutorex, King of Hell. He made the Soul of every Demon that there ever is to be; and He wrote their Purpose in his great Infernus Biblica, in marks of living fire. Kelemvor makes the initial judgement; He makes the final judgement.

Hael, Queen of Hell. Her hills are where we go when we die. Her charges are women, children, and the dishonorable dead; no one is below Her care. Her garden is said to have every medicine that ever existed growing within- and every poison too.

Here’s some theology I came up with myself. We people exist because the Gods ran into problems that they could not surpass. The Gods exist because we people ran into problems we could not surpass. The Gods gave us our souls and our meaning, in this bitch of a life- with the surety and faith that, whatever they could not do, we could. And vis-a-vis.

Faith doesn’t move mountains- it makes people who can. Be that person mortal or divine- it still made a person who can do what you could not.

“You’ll never defeat me!”

I’m in position, and so is she.

There are nine cuts that center someone like me, so we can do what needs to be done. I’m not like my sister, the Crimson Wave; I’m the Orange Cat, we’re different.

I’m ready.

I take my knives in my hands. I coat their sharp edges in seawater, harden it to be cold and sharp as the knife it covers. I coil up like a spring and kick against the floor with my eight legs. The world blurs white.

I rise up like a shark after a seal, and my eyes meet the harpy’s. They’re big, and yellow, and wide-wide-wide with shock.

My hands move.

When I jump like this, I’ve got air-time of about three seconds- one second rise, one second hang, one second fall. In the moment between my hang and my fall, I’ve cut the harpy twelve times- in spars, I usually only go for ten because I’m not trying to kill anyone.

That’s not the case this time.

I fall, and glance up, and see bright red blood spurt from all her soft places- her throat, her armpits, her inner thighs- and then I’m headfirst into the whiteness, molten wet in my headlong rush and down in my seawater tunnels.

She crashes into the snow, choking on her own blood. I watch as the snow turns pink, then red, and then- and then- I rise, and shake away the frost coating my clothing.

Rin, hyo, toh, sha, kai, jin, retsu, zai, zen. Power, energy, harmony, healing, intuition, awareness, dimension, creation, absolution. Rin, hyo, toh, sha, kai, jin, retsu, zai, zen.

I crunch through the snow in my leather shoes, finally coming to where the harpy woman is laying, blood oozing from her in slowing streams. I cut her with seawater, so her wounds couldn’t heal- no power is unbeatable, no matter what, or who, has it.

She’s dying, now- my karambits were sharp enough, and I swung hard enough, that- her guts, her guts are out. I watch her whimper and shiver, try to get away from me but she’s lost too much blood. She suffers.

I flick my hand and draw out a sharp blade of water, twist and freeze it cold and sharp and stinking of the sea.

I end it.

My left hand receives; my right hand emits. Link them together and make the hand sign for each mudra- rin, hyo, toh, sha, kai, jin, retsu, zai, zen.
Rei, shin, chi, ko, tei, gi, jin, chu.

Say a prayer for the dead, and consider what each mudra means.

Rei. Honor calls for careful moderation when dealing with others. If we lose this sense, we rush headlong into chaos. Honor isn’t about making all the right choices; it’s about dealing with the consequences of your choices.

Shin. Faith flows from an open heart and is exchanged between friends and enemies alike. It is the root of our convictions and guides us to our goals. Faith is what makes people able to move mountains.

Chi. Knowledge is useless without deep reflection. This reflection is essential in the pursuit of understanding. When you understand something, it can be said that you truly know it- but to know is to never cease to learn.

Ko. True wisdom is passed on from one’s parents and grandparents and elders. Rely on those who came before to show you the way. Wisdom is knowledge that is hard won, coming after enlightenment and tribulation.

Tei. The affection between brothers is what breeds their understanding of each other. That understanding allows us to be ourselves, and accept our fate. Some of us Suntides- that name really does fit, somehow- some of us are meant for quiet lives of peace and duty, like Adelaide. And some of us- Deborah, Beatrix… me… aren’t.

Gi. Duty… to remain firm in one’s responsibilities, in each and every aspect of life is a great burden, and a terrifying prospect. Bravery and responsibility go hand in hand; bravery shows one what is right, while responsibility gives one something to fight for. The courage born from a sense of duty is unbreakable.

Jin. Justice is a kind of compassion, to both the living and the dead; to care enough to give one’s own life in service; to sacrifice for their sake…

Chu. Loyalty is what keeps you coming back. To give one’s whole self for the good of another; to focus on a goal with all of one’s concentration.

My hair came loose from it’s tie, and I take a moment to lower my hood, take off my mask, and bind my hair back again. I put the hood back on, orient myself, and move on.

I’ll talk to Miss Tellicherry, and Missus Mab, and even Mister Zoro- and Miss Robin, too. I can’t- I can’t stop thinking about her eyes. Before now, I’ve always killed people with garottes, or poisons, or not at all if I could outrun them… I never… she was so scared-

“-Has she always been that fast?”
“Ellie? Yes. Strong, too- see how the harpy lady’s guts all came out?”
“Oh my goodness,”
“Yeah. She won’t leave her to die like that, though—she’ll end it like you and Mister Brook did during the Battle for Mermaid Cafe,”

“-I can see that, yes. And the hand signs?”

“Ellie’s really private about her religion—it’s something different from normal worship, I know that. Taffy probably can talk to you about it, or Gurry-san?”

“Hm. I think I will ask, thank you,”

“You’ll probably have to talk to her— it’s hard to notice if you didn’t grow up with her, but she was deeply conflicted about killing her foe. She’s not like Deborah—Deb doesn’t really… forgive,”

“...I understand. Oh my, is that Genny?”

“Holy shit, it is!”

The Enemy is Up.

The sky is orange sherbert as the sun considers poking over the horizon. Streaky wisps pretend to be clouds above as billowing veils of mist wreath the shore below. As I push myself and my broom faster, harder, more elegantly, the abrupt shifts of blistering heat and bone-crushing cold fall away to so much noise.

I pop and spark and flurries of golden chitin-scales fall Below. My broom pops and sparks between my legs as flurries of powdery magic stream behind me. Bullets pop and spark as shots fly through the air. Sweat pops and sparks as it drips into a cut on my cheek. My muscles burn.

The Enemy is Up.

I twist through the air and drop dizzy fast as the droning of wings darkens the air around me. I kick and twist and slide through the air faster—dash through spaces only just large enough for me. Shards of ice in the air become daggers at my passage; veils of mist become walls. My hunters cut and shatter against my efforts.

The wind claws at me. It cannot get a grip on my jumpsuit or my boots or my facemask or my scarf or my helmet. I don’t have time to bind my hair more than my helmet is doing; the wind is unmerciful in tearing at it. It’s going to be so tangled when this is over.

The Enemy is Up.

I don’t have any weapons except what I can make out of circumstance and surroundings. No potions; no spells; no tools. Ori has the ones I brought—darted into the frozen forest when this all started at sunset, and I only get glimpses of massive conflagurations, writhing green plants, the occasional shriek. I have to trust that Ori’s okay; and she has to trust that I can handle myself. We both know that if we don’t meet up on the beach we came onto this island on at dawn, the other ain’t coming.

I whirl through cliffs of ice and jagged stone. My hunters shatter around me—I am unharmed. I dart quicksilver through frozen trees and drifts of snow. My hunters gut themselves on branches, drown in open air. I dance through the roiling troughs of the sea-surface. My hunters drown in the cold sea depths.

The Enemy is Up.

I fly down, and build up speed in the open sky. Clouds whip past and around me in streams of color-orange, red, yellow, purple- as the dawn moves ever closer. My hunters are fewer, now- merely thirty, where once were three thousand. I dart out to sea again, through the great cross cut in the island. The wind blows at right angles to itself and a pillar of snarling mist and wind and water and fire devours fifteen of the thirty hunting me and I am not harmed. I fly faster and faster and below me the howling of wolvarks echoes. I dive down to their hurtling snarl in the waves, and my hunters meet their mouths- one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten.

There’s the beach- and there’s Ori. I fly down and fast to her and she reaches into my bag and pulls out- shit-

The Enemy is Up and behind me and I dive through the opening Ori gives me and I hear the screams behind me and there’s no one chasing me at all. I slide to a stop on a pillow soft dune. The ocean is quiet. The sun rises.

I used to be able to fly all night long- but, well, I’ve not needed to for months, now. Everything is a skill- and without practice, I’ve lost the ability.

I fall. I’m asleep before I hit the ground.

(I became a doctor for my mother. But… really, I was born to race. I would die to win.)

Holy shit, I had no idea Bryony was this strong. I’ve basically been making sure the hundreds of lost souls following our progress- children, preteens, weird amalgamations of plants and animals- don’t get hurt by falling debris as Bryony takes the “what wall?” approach to dungeoneering. Gally, cackling sexual iconoclast that she is, has been singing her arrow through the Others that come to kill us.

I’ve been aiming Bryony by calling out “left”, “right”, and “forwards”; not much for me to do, really, until we get to the waterway and build the flotilla.

Flotilla?

Owfuck-
Everything that happens next blurs together in my head into one long, exhausting, painful memory. A memory of pain. Gally told me later that a chunk of wall cracked me a good one in my head—totally chance, one of the few things I can’t See is a twist of Luck.

I don’t remember when we found the Feverbanes, or the Wano Kids, or the Wano Samurai Man, or even Sawbones and her Leech Friends. I don’t remember sailing back to our ships, or the Island exploding with fire—a volcano—or it suddenly stopping with a hiss as thousands—literally thousands—of plants and animals burst into being. I don’t remember passing a city of mud filled with screaming Others, burning alive in my sister Genny’s potion fumes. Gally told me all about it, but I don’t actually remember any of it.

The only thing I remember is the song that Bryony sang while everything the Others wrought in that place came to ruin.

I also remember someone going shuro-ro-ro-ro, but they stopped because Bryony got very angry and knocked them out cold with a punch to the jaw.
Do you need to get off an island that’s aggressively sinking into the sea? It’s best to understand the mechanics of what’s happening.

Normally, islands that are natural or, properly speaking, Land-forme, don’t sink without severe damage being done to their underlying plate. Islands that are purpose built, like PU-NK-H4Z42D (or Impel Down, the so called “Rings of Hell”; or Floria, the “Sinking Sea City”; or even Marineford, the “Hall of Justice”), the calling code of this secret government island we’re all trying to escape as best we can, are a bit different. Firstly, purpose built islands don’t have magnetic fields of their own, making navigating to them a pain in the ass. Secondly, everything on a purpose built island is there by design— from the ecology, to the geography, to the architecture and the people who live there, and how they live there, everything has been planned out to the very edge of reason. Thirdly, and most importantly for our purposes, purpose built islands are meant to be sunken if certain built-in conditions are met.

There are a lot of ancient prophecies floating around that are really bits and pieces of mislabelled instructions on how to sink the island someone built— sometimes you need to sink an island. Some islands are built to be raised and sunken, even…

While mainly for the sake of curiosity, the science of sinking can help you understand what the hell is going on if you’re ever on something that’s sinking— a ship, a raft, an entire fucking island— woo, that claxon sure is loud.

Every built island will react to taking on water and sinking differently depending on the shape of it’s hull, it’s anchoring system, it’s center of gravity, and the cause of the casualty. No one set of rules works on all types.

Water often enters the lowest point of the island first, the bilge area. The bilges are pits in the lowest part of the engineering section; it’s quite normal for built islands, and ships as well, to have water leaking into the bilges. It comes in through sea chests, shaft bearings, even valve seals; and properly built bilges have bilge pumps that are set to remove the water once it reaches a certain level. Protocol for sinking a built island starts with disabling the bilge pumps; after a certain point, there is no way for the pumps to help, there being simply too much water for them to discharge.

A small government research island will react very differently to a— that’s right, floating, floating island is the proper terminology for it. A small floating island like this one will react differently than bigger islands, such as Floria or Marineford. A small floating island is normally built, as much as possible, of buoyant materials; it’s far more likely for a small floating island to capsise, rather than outright sink. Low transoms, missing drain plugs, cooling system leaks, incorrectly closed openings or even broken doors are what tends to sink these smaller floating islands. A smaller island is comparable to a mega-cruise liner in size and scope— however, all floating islands have certain standard features that come built in with every… not quite a kit, but quite like a kit for building islands.

To start with, as soon as sensors within the engineering area register the presence of both a certain amount of water and the lack of action by the bilge pumps, a mayday signal is sent out— that’s part of what we got on our ship a full month ago, as floating islands only sink quickly right when it’s entirely too late to stop them sinking. Hell, as soon as I killed the Queen of Wasps, the evacuation signal started sounding.
Education across the Blues is odd—some things are universal, like evacuation signals and written languages, even how to tie certain knots; other things, like history, mathemagics… some schools have religious rituals and practices in their curriculums, if you can believe that. Anyway, we all knew what it meant that seven short horn blasts followed by one long started resounding through the cold sterile halls of the laboratory we’d found ourselves in— the time for adventuring was well over, as the whole place was in active, catastrophic danger. None of us except perhaps me (and only in the back of my mind,) knew what that danger was— it could have been anything, from a loose experiment, to a dread storm, to an erupting volcano— anything goes.

IOSHA is the International Occupational Health and Safety Administration. Their job is to ensure that dangerous workplaces are safe for the workers. Violating an IOSHA regulation is not only illegal, it’s extremely dangerous, not to mention— expensive. I forget exactly how it stacks up, but if you’re found in violation of a regulation multiple times, not only do you have to pay a fine— you have to pay a fine for every day prior to the re-discovery that you were in violation. That gets extremely expensive extremely quickly.

I’ve seen at least three so far.

The first one is easy enough to miss unless you’ve got an eye for spatial relations, like I do— frankly, I wouldn’t have noticed it if I hadn’t been using the Observation Room Console like I was. The Console was too low— the top level of it, I mean. Someone built it in response to the height of the ceilings, not what the actual standard height for such things is. IOSHA regulation states that ‘all work surfaces are not to fall below three feet, seven inches in height as measured from the topmost surface of the floor undergirding the work surface’.

Secondly— stairs. Minimum width is twenty two inches; the pitch of the stairs here is off, and the landings are too small. It’s important for fire safety.

Thirdly? The Health and Safety supply closets aren’t correctly labelled. I can still tell where they are— even as I’m running, I’m packing everything in the HS closet into my purse.

I’ve been trying to get my hands on unopened, unused Blue Goo for years— in Skua, we use any number of Spirits and herbal remedies. Blue Goo… it’s something no one in Skua has had any luck synthesizing, and so far it’s been determined our lack of success has been due to contaminated samples. I have my doubts— nothing that works so well on the human body, while also being so violently gained, can come of anything good. Oh, hey, floaties! And emergency supplies— fuck it, I’m taking everything not nailed down. Health potions, mana potions, haste potion, stamina, Clover’s Love Potion No. 9— wait, what? Fuck it, no time— potions. All the potions. Including what has to be a bottle of Liquid Luck, which doesn’t actually make you genuinely, permanently lucky without the proper sequence of runes. Six different catalogues for all kinds of interesting things that I’ll peruse later; a large box of yet-to-be opened interesting things and a list of what those things are… wait, that can’t be— I keep packing, even as I burst through a hole Zoro cut through the wall and charge for the beach, and I go across the tilted hall to check the other HS closet… holy fuck, it is! The closet I’ve been emptying is the only fully stocked closet in this whole island!

Violation four!

Portable Swamp, Fen, or Watermeadow; Extra-Sparky Fireworks; Flynce Instant Fog Tablets, those are rare as hell but I can probably figure out the recipe… wait, don’t I have a bunch of… hm. Idea.

Holy- Tiffany Harbor Instant Darkness Powder! I haven’t seen this in years! Skiving snackboxes, moon belts, flying matchbox boats, what I recognize as bruise paste (guaranteed arnica gel, very potent), chameleon combs, bug boxes, stankballs, whizbangers (for all celebratory occasions!), remote chatterboxes, fanged frisbees, miracle mustache mixtures (grows in fifteen seconds flat!), out to lunch hair-growth salve (gloves included), a variety of charmed quills (color changing, spell-checking, smart-assed, and lying), screaming yo-yos, sticky boots, scattering shriekers, curse-off swipe-wipes, half-hour daydreams… it’s like they stocked it with the contents of a joke shop! Why are there so many fireworks? And schoolbooks! I’ve seen some of these—never took some of these classes, but… let’s see, The Standard Spell Grimoire; Housekeepery and Kitchencraft; Mathematical Theory; Transmorgify! by Dr. Calvin and Mr. Hobbes; Walls and Shields; What’s in the Box?; Roll Those Dice; Crack-a-Thoom: an Enchanter’s Guide by Tim the Enchanter; To Whom It May Concern; Hm-what?; Skulking and Drudgery; Equivalent Exchange: an Alchemist’s Guide by Messrs Elric and Elric… Fantastic Beasts and Where to Find Them; The Monster Book of Monsters; How to Care for Your Familiar: The Exhaustive Omnibus Edition; several mail order catalogues I’ve been meaning to get copies of, they’re for magical supplies; Numerology and Grammatica; Sybil’s Syllabary (Volume One and Two; One is for Divination, Two is for Runes, Ancient and Modern); Confronting the Faceless, and Other Dangers; Flesh-eating Trees of the World; and what looks like the entire printed history of The Quibble and Quirk, a periodical I used to read religiously—It’s either deeply satirical or entirely honest, and I love it either way.

But really, why are there so many fireworks?

Oh—hah, there was a mixup at the post office, they actually got the month’s order meant for a joke shop, as well as supplies for someone’s homeschooling that’d been donated… interesting.

Aha-ha-ha, those were the pylons that just broke, time to go—and I’m on the beach. Everyone’s on the boats? Yes? Good, time to go—and we set sail.

It always takes me a moment to remember how to tack across a bay, but it’s sped up quite a lot by the knowledge that we have to get away from the sinking—and then Trafalgar Law stands upright and unsheathes his massive cursed sword and swings it and the mountain that suddenly rose to block our way is split in half vertically and we escape to safety. Woo, there’s the Sunny—and there’s a floatilla of rafts lashed together with zipties, and… uh.

I didn’t realize the battle costume I made for Gally, at her specific request and instruction, would be quite so… uh. Uh. Uh—Anyway, we’re just about to load everyone onto the ship and I’m quite ready to be done with this whole dreadful business—hang about, why’s Gally here, she said she’d—wait, why’s Fern on her back and unconscious, we just got her healthy again—

AAAAAAAAAAAAaaaAAaaAAAAAAaaAAAh!
Aaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaah!

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAH/

No. No no no.

Nope.

I’m leaving.

Oh hey, there was a… hm. Oho! The Spangle World Cup Finals for last year; I missed that one. I always forget the real name of the game is Bountyball, but it is and I must accept that.
11th July 2014

ALA v TIF

ALABASTA VERSUS TIFFANY HARBOUR

Transcript of the Live Coverage from the Scrimshaw Slider’s Bountyball (Sixth Degree, Champton Slippers, Baseball, Foot-the-Ball) Correspondent Jimjam “Meadhall” Rackham and the Dusty Trove’s Society Correspondent Pterry Desjarnine.

Alabasta 745 - Tiffany Harbour 747

JIMJAM RACKHAM

The Marble White Stadium is full and the noise is deafening. We’re here, due to the wheel-throw at the Goa v Lvnl semifinals, in lovely Alabasta. I am joined in the Reporter’s Enclosure by my many colleagues, including Pterry Desjarnine, who is a member of our sister publication, the Dusty Trove. We await the arrival of both team’s mascots, who will put on pre-match shows as is tradition, to invoke the power of the gods on this field of proxy-battle.

The Alabastans, of course, bring their internationally celebrated dance troupe, the Sidewinders; their many recitals and candid pictograph books constitute a major reason for the Alabastan team’s enduring popularity, beyond their prowess on the field. Tiffany Harbor’s Screaming Eels have already caused a great deal of mischief so far this tournament with their usual japes and trickery-hat theft, stealing unwatched concessions, coughing globs of extra-sticky slimy mucus onto pretty women’s hairdos- as usual, their popularity is firmly with children and certain childish individuals.

Security stand by at all points around the perimeter of the field to prevent dangerous out-of-bounds incidents, interference from the spectators, and more-than-usual horrific injury.

While we wait for the opening performances, let’s remind ourselves of the facts of the day, consider what these teams look like, and compare some key statistics.

PERTINENT NOTATIONS

The game at play is Sixth Degree; the balls are provided by the local toy shop, Jackrabbit Japery, and have been inspected by both Skuan and Line officials for tampering. Pig is in the Pink; Slams are slippery as ever; and the Fox is Eager to Run.

Odds are 23-54 Alabasta High; Payouts are set at four million Beri per winning betting ticket; ticket-holders may be reimbursed for a maximum of five tickets. As with all games falling under the Bountyball umbrella, adherence to the legal betting laws is strictly enforced.

OFFICIAL COLORS

ALABASTA

Life Green - Sand White

TIFFANY HARBOUR

Brick Red - Mark Black

TENDERS

ALABASTA

Sebastian Manigold

After a slow start in the tournament, Alabastan Manigold was a star of the lengthy semifinal against Fiddler’s Green and is a major reason for his team’s presence in the final. However, many felt his opposite number on the Lyneel side out-performed him in Alabasta’s first match and he sustained a nasty head injury in the contentious quarter-final against Pumpkin Hill.

TIFFANY HARBOUR

Georges Jacko

Jacko let in seventeen goals against Germa in the first round and no fewer than forty six against Ryugyu Mergyo in the semi-final. Tiffy fans are rightly nervous about Jacko’s abilities facing an Alabastan Slider trio of proven ability.

SLIDERS
ALABASTA

Achmed Andres

Fernando Diaz

Gongon Pompompom

The Alabastan trio have been a joy in flight during the tourney, exciting to watch and responsible for sixty eight goals so far in the season. Gongon Pompompom has emerged as one of the players to watch, celebrated for Penning the Pig no less than twice per game- a tricky maneuver to set up even in practice games. Her fellow sliders, Andres and Diaz, continue Alabasta’s tradition of extra slippery sliders- as the saying goes, the only time Alabasta Slide’s still, they’re scoring.

TIFFANY HARBOUR

Priyanka Chopra

Tesla Corroil

Sweetiedrops Vioreguard

Less flashy in style, vicious in nature; the Tiffany Harbour Sliders have scored seventy four goals so far this tourney and have- to the surprise of fans and commentators- outperformed their Alabastan counterparts. Alabasta turns out a consistently aggressive and quick-moving trio, year after year- but this year, Tiffany Harbour has them beat.

BATTERS

ALABASTA

Daz Bones

Toya Bawanami

Although they’ve been plagued with a particularly nasty series of curses, hexes, and jinxes, the Alabasta Batters have attended their duty in spectacular style. They flung off the last grasping tendrils of their tourney-long cursing during the semi-final (F-Green v ALA), when their efforts prevented Hunter Morgan from catching the Fox.

TIFFANY HARBOUR

Penrose Morgan
Morag Morgan

The Bloody Twins are a terrifying force, only to be underestimated at your own peril. Morgan and Morgan have displayed characteristic physical courage and astounding tactical genius all season. There are several outstanding moments of their characteristic synchronicity, each marking a spectacular moment of danger, culminating in the TIFF v RM semi-final when M. Morgan was knocked unconscious protecting the TIFF Hunter- resulting in P. Morgan’s racking up in fouls, culminating in a record-breaking number for a single player. The Council has informed all Bountyball correspondents that a numeration and list of the fouls committed by P. Morgan is strictly prohibited for publication.

HUNTERS

ALABASTA

Anthony Silva

Silva has only made two captures during the tourney due to Sabaody’s disqualification in the first round. Once he spots the Fox, he is fast and accurate, but questions must be asked about his ability to locate that quicksilver ball. His average capture time this season has been six hours forty four minutes.

Tiffany Harbour

Eloise Cloudchaser

Eloise Cloudchaser needs no introduction. The oldest combatant in this tourney, she has been a world-class Sixth Degree player since her late teens. Though before this World Cup many critics had written her off, she is largely responsible for Tiffany Harbour’s place in the final. Average capture time this tournament: five hours fifty six minutes.

PTERRY DESJARDINE

The VIP boxes are now full. Her Royal Highness, Princess of Alabasta, Nefertari Vivi, gleefully chatters with the Queen of Ravens, Principal of the Sandy Island Tower of Magic; but all eyes are not on the Royal Box, where they are seated, but on Box Two.

Box Two is where Chief of Marines Tsururao Kohinoor, Admiral Kizaru, and Admiral Kuzan are seated under close guard, to prevent incidents perpetrated by an overexcited crowd. The Admiralty, invited by special request by the Tiffany Harbour Royal, Princess Portgas D. Gable, have been given prime places in the front row. Chief Kohinoor is wearing the brick red and pottery-marker black of Tiffany Harbour, while her subordinates are wearing Alabasta’s living water green and sand white.

This will undoubtedly send the gossips and chinwags into overdrive- what message is being sent by the visual division in the Marines? A division, lest we forget, predicated by the Double Wash and Hang-dry of two years ago, when Mister Sengoku and Mister Garp retired simultaneously. Are we witnessing a very public, very ugly display of division between senior and junior Marine management? My colleague, Jimjam “Meadhall” Rackham, who is sitting close enough to read everything my quill is writing, informs me that Chief Kohinoor is a die-hard Tiffy fan- particularly of Tiffany Harbour Slider Priyanka Chopra, and that Faesh publications rarely get to the general public beyond academia, handily explaining her subordinates support of Alabasta. Alabasta is, after all, a good, respectable team with genuine prospects across the board- however. Considering the other things going on these past few years, it would not surprise me if there were hidden machinations in motion.

RACKHAM

The crowd roars as the gates open and the mascot troupes assemble on the field. First, the Alabastan Sidewinders, dressed in diaphanous gowns and dancing to the haunting refrain of duduk, oud, drum, tambourine, and finger cymbals. Several jaws have dropped here in the journalists’ enclosure and, judging by the number of dropped pens, notebooks, and standing spectators, many also appear to have lost sensation in their brains.

DESJARDINE

Up in VIP Box Two, Admiral Kizaru appears to have become catatonic. Did I just see coworker Admiral Kuzan smack him over the back of the head?
And here come the Screaming Eels with their lightning-blue scales and feathery fins. Tumbling through the air, stealing hats from men and ribbons from women, spitting gobs of slime at squealing children and screeching folk tunes; their general mayhem a pure gleaming counterpoint to the grace and restraint of the Sidewinders. Gaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaah-

It is always enchanting to observe people enjoying the culture of other nations. Unfortunately, Her Highness Vivi and Queen Raven appear to be far more interested in the brawl directly below them- Admiral Kizaru has torn the shirt off of Admiral Kizaru, exposing quite a lot of bare chest and tasty muscles. Say what you will about politics, but the Marine policy of training their troops up to a certain level of fitness pays its own dues, my gods the definition on that man’s back could wash an entire armada’s worth of dirty sheets- ahem. In what some may see as a somewhat belated show of authority, Chief Kohinoor has broken up the fight and wedged herself firmly between the two brawling men, forcefully directing their attention to the pitch.

It would indeed be a terrible waste to not enjoy the wondrous spectacle now unfolding, with the colorful sky-fish and the dancing and what-all.

Chief Kohinoor is grinning.

The opening ceremony concludes with an interesting dancer/sky-eel dance routine. It’s sinuous and slimy and scaly and wicked. I sincerely hope someone’s making a recording of this- and, if several featherfins have found themselves in the Sidewinder’s eyes, the latter have resisted the temptation to transform into the terrifying Medusae form that all Sidewinders are blessed with by the Gods and Goddesses of the Great Sandora. Great luck, as that prevents the instance of many children- myself included- gaining nightmares of their snaky forms after their display back in ’94.

And here come the two teams- Alabasta in live-waters teal and sugarsand white jerseys, Tiffany Harbour in brick red and mark black, same. They are in the traditional armor and brooms of their respective countries- Alabasta is flying Khamsin Hotwings; Tiffany Harbour is on Jetstream Steelwings.

All of the Alabasta Royal Family are supporting Alabasta. Certainly nobody can have expected HRM Nefertari to cheer for his main competitor in the trade of spices and sundries. HRH Nefertari, who has inherited her mother’s complexion and her father’s coloring, is wearing a beautiful green and white ensemble of a blue-green romper, long lace skirt, and royal blue and gold thwab. Her jewelry is beadwork, necklace and earrings both; and her dupatta is of finest lace and trimmed in silvery-green pearls. Her parasol is an Alabastan Sunshader, made of hawk feathers and seagull feathers; the bunting is of fine linen, and the pole is paper-cane; as representation of Alubarn, the Capitol City and seat of the Royal Family, the Sunshader is used as both prop and necessary respite from the glaring sun on all occasions where HRH Vivi is to be seated out-of-doors.

Queen Raven is in a black dress with embellishments of feathers and jet beads, a black lace half-mask, and a black derby hat with black ostrich feathers and trimmed with white flowers and pearls; her hair is worn in long waves; her lips are painted black; and she wears only a set of silver bangles and black lace gloves as embellishment. Her staff is unchanged, still bedecked in the badges of the Alabasta Tower. Of note is her eyes, which appear to be painted with a graphic shade of red.

Does the Raven Queen secretly hope to see Tiffany Harbour take the trophy? Or is this the kind of diplomatic neutrality one might expect of a ruthless careerist whose long-term ambition is undoubtedly to usurp the Queen of Wrens’ Mage’s Council seat?

RACKHAM

00.00HRS

And they’re off! Fourteen players rise into the air for the four hundred twenty seventh Sixth Degree World Cup final!

DESJARDINE

00.01HRS

Chief Kohinoor is already on her feet cheering, even though nothing has really happened yet. Is she drunk?

RACKHAM

00.05HRS

The Pig is in Alabasta’s possession but slick defence from Morgan and Morgan has so far prevented them from scoring. Andres, Diaz, and Pompompom are relentless, ducking and weaving as they try to find a way past the Tiffy Batters.
DESJARDINE

00.18HRS

Queen Raven appears to be passing out some kind of snack to the people in VIP Box One. Some might hesitate to accept baked goods from Queen Raven, as she is known for her mastery of Potions, Alchemy, and Transmorgification; and, I am reliably informed her school-girl habit of pranking her friends with unwanted random body modification has never really stopped.

RACKHAM

00.32HRS

An excellent intercept by Tiffany Harbour Slider Corroil and Tiffany Harbour is streaking towards the goal- thrown to Voireguard- ye-ouch! Even the Alabastans groaned in sympathy there as a Slam hit Corroil hard in the throat. He drops the Pig, which is caught by Andres. Alabasta is back in possession!

DESJARDINE

00.33HRS

Admiral Kizaru is laughing hard at something Admiral Kuzan has sighed. What is so amusing- and is Admiral Kizaru aware that Admiral Kuzan does not appreciate the joke? What division lays between them that forces such violent conflict to flare up between them in full view of the public? Surely both Admirals are aware that everybody in the stadium can see them? Woo, there goes Kizaru’s shirt, and my goodness he’s just as ripped as Kuzan-

RACKHAM

00.37HRS

And it’s first blood to Alabasta with a spectacular goal from Andres!

DESJARDINE

00.37HRS

HRH Vivi has almost toppled out of the VIP box cheering her national team. Her father has seized the back of her thwab and saved her from what would surely have been a death of international significance, spawning news stories across the world. Guard Captain Kohza is laughing heartily. Queen Raven appears completely serene, merely handing the Palace Chief of Staff one of her tasty treats.

RACKHAM

00.42HRS

Morgan and Morgan are successfully disrupting the Alabastan Sliders, preventing the formidable trio from scoring a second goal. Tiffany Harbour had relied far too much on the Bloody Twins earlier in the season, and is a very defense-heavy team besides; their last touch of the Pig resulted in a fumble by Pompompom and possession by Chopra. No sign of the Fox so far.

DESJARDINE

00.54HRS

Queen Raven is cheering every well-hit Tiffy Slam, whereas HRH Vivi is gnashing her teeth in chagrin. Captain Chaka is yawning.

RACKHAM

00.59HRS

Sweetiedrops Voireguard breaks through the Alabasta defence and equalises! Ten all!

DESJARDINE

01.10HRS

Head of the Department of International Agriculture Sean Jawson is frowning as he follows the match. Greying and wrinkly, he shows an age far beyond his nominal twenty-seven year's of age. Unkind political opponents may call him a ‘nit-picking old man’ but others go so far as to say that ‘he’s outright pedantic, and more than a little behind the times’. Renowned nature photographer Portgas D. Ciconia has repeatedly given her public support of Department Head Jawson’s forestry policies, stating that ‘the natural world is not for the use of humanity alone, and should have rights beyond merely existing.’

RACKHAM

01.23HRS

A sudden burst of quick-fire Pig passes has resulted in a brace of goals for Alabasta, whose Sliders continue to slip across the rails and through Tiffy defences. Gongon Pompompom has scored twice more and Chopra once, taking the score to 30-20, Alabasta leading. The Bloody Twins are starting to look particularly reckless and are only just being reigned in by Captain-Hunter Cloudchaser. Alabasta’s team remains steady in their approach- not unusual for this stage of the game, but dangerous as we progress.

DESJARDINE

01.34HRS

The King of Shrikes is a thin man wrapped in sand-colored robes and bandages, due to his work with the Sandora Djinn. Like his predecessor, The King of Storks, he really only comes to sporting events like these as a way of keeping an eye on the emotional status of Queen Raven, who shows her feelings in the level of adornment and the overall complexity of her dress, to some obscure code that only the most observant of pedants and those who are in the Tower hierarchy are fully aware. He is paying little attention to the match, preferring what seems a most interesting conversation with the Sidewinder Troupe Leader, Madama “Serpentia” Angia. The difficulty of joining the Sidewinders is only speculative- they do not hold open trials, and no inquiry from any reporter has ever been answered.

Nobody who witnessed it will ever forget the shock on King Shrike’s face when Madama Serpentia asked him to the Yule Ball held at Nefertari Palace, Alubarna; nor the smile that came across his face when he saw Madama Serpentia’s dress. (I refer you to the Yuetime Issue of Dusty Trove for further discussion of the event.) The two together were voted ‘Most Beautiful Couple’, by readers of my regular column. While King Shrike and Madama Serpentia appear to be holding hands in VIP Box One, this might well be because King Shrike is trying to prevent Madama Serpentia from putting on one of her famous Special Event Hats- or from tearing off her thoub and screaming, as HRH Vivi has done.

RACKHAM

01.43HRS

THE FOX IS ON THE RUN! With the score standing at 40-40 (following goals mere minutes apart from Voireguard, Diaz, and Andres) a flash of silver near the Alabastan hoops leads Cloudchaser and Silva into a breakneck chase- Batters and Sliders scatter- Cloudchaser is ahead but narrowly misses the capture- as the Fox soars upwards, both Hunters appear to be dazzled by the brilliant Alabastan sun- the Fox has disappeared again.

DESJARDINE

01.58HRS

Igaram and Terracotta, the Heads of Household Staff at Alubarna Palace, have only one child. This lack of fecundity has not stopped them from being something like parental influences on HRH Vivi, after the untimely death of her mother, HRM Vidhalia. The small family is sitting together, and by all appearances, is enjoying the game. Captain Chaka has taken the opportunity to turn into his Jackal form and take a nap under HRH Vivi’s stadium seat; Captain Pell has relieved him of duty, and is perching on the back of HRM Nefertari’s seat.
Moments after Diaz lengthens Alabasta’s lead- 50-40- Batter Bones hits Eloise Cloudchaser hard over the head with his bat. The referee is examining Gastropodal footage to determine whether a foul has been committed. The game has been paused.

A great groan has issued from the crowd. HRH Vivi is purchasing a lemonade and fanning herself with a palm frond. My colleague, Jimjam Rackham, has informed me that one of the players has sustained an injury.

No foul! Germa referee Dagmar Bittenbinder concludes that Daz Bones did not mean to hit Eloise Cloudchaser around the back of the skull with his Battery bat. Cloudchaser signals that she is fit to continue; and play resumes!

Queen Raven has come out of her serene pose to scream like the hooligan she once was. The same cannot be said for King Shrike or Madama Serpentia, who have started trying to steal each other’s tongues with their own tongues. A disgusting display of public affection? Or a calculated snub? HRH Vivi is spiritedly describing the exact manner in which Cloudchaser sustained her nosebleed for the benefit of Captain Pell, who is allowing a very handsome smile to cross his face in response to HRH Vivi’s brilliant excitement.

Mere seconds after play resumes, Cloudchaser and Silva are rocketing suddenly upwards- five hundred thousand eyes follow the pair into the dazzling Sandisle sun-
02.39HRS

Chief Kohinoor is on her feet, screaming.

RACKHAM

02.40HRS

Cloudchaser and Silva are in a breakneck dash for the Fox, which Silva sighted first- he is four feet ahead of Cloudchaser as both rise almost vertically-

DESJARDINE

02.41HRS

Everyone is on their feet, including the denizens of the Reporter’s Enclosure; Jimjam Rackham is speedwriting, keeping his eyes on the sky, and screaming swearwords directly into my left ear. Dear readers, did you know I’ve gone partially deaf in one ear? Hopefully it’s not permanent.

RACKHAM

02.42HRS

Cloudchaser is gaining on Silva but will it be enough… ?

DESJARDINE

02.43HRS

Admiral Kizaru and Admiral Kuzan have taken the opportunity to restart their earlier brawl.

RACKHAM

02.43HRS

Cloudchaser and Silva neck and neck-

DESJARDINE

02.44HRS

King Shrike appears to have snuck both hands up the front of Madama Serpentia’s dress.
RACKHAM

02.45HRS

CLOUDCHASER’S GOT THE FOX! TIFFANY HARBOUR HAVE WON!

DESJARDINE

02.45HRS

It’s over? Good, I can go now, this was my day off- oh, yes, it was- sure, we can get coffee-

RACKHAM

The crowds are going crazy- after two and three-quarter hours in the blazing Alabastan sun, Tiffany Harbour has won the World Cup and Cloudchaser has achieved her life’s ambition (as stated in one of her only personality-focused interviews) on her third attempt- it looks like she might fall off her broom- tears are streaming down her face- a hugely popular win here at the edge of the Great Sandora Desert- but hearty commiserations to Alabasta- they led almost all the way, and in the end, it was Cloudchaser the Hunter who defeated them. A stunning display of sportsmanship here, as Silva and Cloudchaser embrace-

DESJARDINE

I have to say, I don’t particularly enjoy sporting events. Seeing people with their guard down is not quite enough compensation for sitting out in all weather, watching a sport I generally don’t care for and can’t play, often next to Jimjam Rackham, who is doing stunning work in the field of deafening others. I don’t- oh, Chief Kohinoor is jumping on Admiral Kizaru and Admiral Kuzan as she cheers.

Oh, thank you-

RACKHAM

After giving my friend Pterry Desjardine a big cold glass of lemonade, and drinking a glass myself, I’m prepared to give my final thoughts on today’s game. As celebrations continue here in the Sandoran Desert, we at the Scrimshaw Slider are even more determined to accurately record and commentate the games of the season. My sincerest hopes that you have enjoyed our Sixth Degree World Cup coverage from Alabasta. Next week, the National Baseball League at Lvneel!

Oh this is the issue with the SP of ‘Fox on the Run!’; they’ve really done wonders with product placement, it used to be much more obvious. Oh hey, it’s still in the back of the magazine- let’s just play it, heyooo-
My fingers are blistered. I haven’t had that happen in years.

Every Bard- which both my sister and I am, even though she takes more pleasure in writing, and I in playing- learns music on the pianoforte. At least, at our school they did. In some places, it’s recorder; others, guitar; still more, it’s choral; and in some places, it’s steel drums.

How hard is it to learn an instrument? If you have a solid foundation in musical theory- you know your genres, your history, can appreciate it and understand how to read it- it takes about a year, practicing every day. For a first-timer, it’s about two year’s. Really, you’re learning a whole new language- two hundred hours if you’ve learned a new language before, one you don’t already speak, four hundred if you haven’t.

This is for proficiency- at our school, unless you were on Bardic track or had a club, that was as far as it went. Third year, you got to pick your own instrument- be it one the school had for rent-to-own, or one you found for yourself in the city. Cece found a metal viola; Havij put starmetal in it on request. I found an accordion.

I think how fast I learned was really down to two things- how fast I learn music, and how I practice. I didn’t practice study or performance pieces often- maybe once or twice outside of class. Most of what I did was scales, trying to play songs I’d heard that day, more scales, songs I came up with that day, and even more scales. Lots of different scales, too- harmonic, minor, major, pentatonic, all the scales. When I explained it to my teachers, they were very impressed with me.

Accordions come in many sizes and shapes. Some have buttons, and some have keys like a piano. Depending on when and who made them, the reeds might be different, the keys might have a different numeration, and even what they’re made of can be different. The design and sounds vary from one instrument to another as a result; some vintage instruments are extremely beautiful, while more contemporary instruments show technological advancements.

Actually, I have two accordions- the one I learned to play on, and the one I’m playing now. Both came from the pawn shop, but the one I learned on I got as soon as I got into Bardic; the one I’m playing I got in third year. I’d been playing accordion for two years by then- and speaking frankly, the hard part about my instrument was never learning to play, it was repairing it after I bought it from the pawnshop. My “show” accordion is the twin of my “practice” accordion in every way save one- my show accordion is prettier.

The Gag has an entire platoon of sheds dedicated to servicing and repairing clowning gear- be it juggling clubs, magic trick rings, or, in my case… well, no one really had the exact tools needed for repairing an accordion, but I made do in the Fine Arts shed. To start with, I went over everything that was broken- from big things, like the leak in the bellows and the sticky keys and the mangled sound of the reeds, to much smaller things, like missing rhinestones and cracking paint.

I labelled and taped each button, numerically, so that my notations would make sense- it’s hard to know what someone’s talking about when the notes aren’t particularly clear. The first thing I did was remove the axle on the treble side- what a clattering of keys that was. Had to use a vise to get the damn thing out, my arms weren’t strong enough then.

After that, I set all the keys aside in a taffin leftover from Yule cookies, and cleaned out the… I don’t know the name for it, but it’s where all the keys go. Full of dust and grime it was- had to use the shop vacuum, and a brush to get it all out. Then, I used a very fine grit of sandpaper to lightly sand the stains away- and smooth out the minor warps that happen as fine wood ages. Another vacuum, and onwards.

I ended up disassembling the treble side further, and repairing cracks in the frame with a kind of epoxy putty meant for woodworking. I repaired the fine surface further with two-ply crafter’s wood, a very flexible material with a pretty grain, before staining and sealing. I painted detail-work back onto the side…

Hell, I learned to lathe brass, which is no picnic. Protip: No matter what your financial straits, always use more cooling fluid. It’s much cheaper to get a bottle of cooling fluid than it is to replace a bit you’ve burnt out or hire someone to repair the lathe itself. It also makes it less likely that the piece you’re working on is going to catch and fling itself across the shed, directly through a window in some cases.

There are a lot of clowns that got their material from my antics- to the point where anytime my name was on the signup sheet for shed time, an entire crowd of spectators would show up to take notes.
Also, if you’re lathing something, wear proper face protection. A sliver of summat in your eye is no laughing matter… after it happens to you, I mean.

After making sure the keys were clean and in good working order, I put the whole thing back together, hammered in the brass axle with a wooden hammer. Nothing funny happened except me dropping the hammer on my foot, and by then I was wearing steel toe boots so it wasn’t as bad as it could’ve been. I did ham it up for my audience, because I’m actually a very good clown- and the long pause between the hammer hitting my foot and me reacting to it was what really made them laugh, not my reaction to it.

Next was the grille and the paint. The grille was clothed with an unsuitable green felt; I replaced it with a much more sensible open weave fabric that I left undyed, as my colors are black and white.

I did all the fine, fancy making it look nice work before I did the reeds because I was still trying to find new reeds. I eventually found a set I could have- for free, just to free up the space- in the Gag’s prop closet on Stage Six. No one knew what they were- and I know for sure now that they’re starmetal or close enough. I knew then they were steel, at least, possibly stainless steel- and more than enough for my purposes. The only thing I actually had to buy myself, beyond the accordionwhich was quite cheap, being inoperable at the time- was beeswax. One-hundred percent beeswax candles turned out to be the cheapest option, gotten from a store in the Boneyard district- and I got a better deal because the box was crunched on.

Anyway- redoing the reeds was something I did at very strange hours, when most people were in class because I didn’t want an audience- there are some things a man ought to be able to do by himself.
The songs you think I sung sound too nice
All the bad things you do
You really think my disapproval made you think twice?
And I don’t care about with whom you sleep-Surprise!
I don’t use my holy powers
To be a giant fucking creep

You shouldn’t abstain from sin because you think I want you to-Abstain because you think it’s right to do.
Free will, assholes.
Didn’t think I had to spell that out for you.

There are many stories about me
Nearly every one of them is true
You say you don’t believe in me?
Consider: I don’t have to believe in you-
Fuck, you make my life a living hell
I didn’t ask to be your goddess
But you made me and that’s all I can tell

Here’s how it is: I exist because of you
A man walked up a black mountain
And with his blood he drew my shape
And with his mind he set a fire
And with his fire he forged me
I am the goddess you men forged
I walked down into the black valley
And I gathered up the black soil
And with it
I made the shape of a monstrous black wolvark
And once finished
I walked into its open mouth
And I wore the wolvark’s shape as though it were a cloak
And I never again removed it

There are many stories about me
Nearly every one of them is true
You say you don’t believe in me?
Have you considered that I don’t believe in you?
You’re not coming with me- sing a thousand prayers, buy the mercy of men
You’re not coming with me- I do not want you, you can’t change my mind

My sister thinks that we don’t know
Her vengeance drives her to bitter ends
An endless rage that will not cease and will not quiet
She thinks that we don’t know
She fell in love before she was ten
To a girl murdered before her time
Long black hair tied to a coral tree
Bones and silence in the grass
She thinks that we don’t know
That we won’t love her as much if she says
A single word about what makes her weep at night
But we will
But we will
But we will
There are many stories about me

Nearly every one of them is true

You say you don’t believe in me?

Did you know that I don’t believe in you?

You will never be funny- tell your stupid jokes, get out of my house

No, you will never be funny- you have no timing, and your wordplay is shit

You try so hard to be funny, but you’ve missed the point, you missed the basic conceit

You can’t care if you’re funny- you can’t care what other people think…

A shitty life, a shitty job, fucked up family and married to a slob

Parents hate you, inlaws too- yes, everything in your life is a problem

Most especially you

There are many stories about me

Nearly every one of them is true

You say you can’t believe in me?

My faith is worth nothing to the faithless like you.

You shouldn’t tell jokes because people want you to; that’s the way the joke just becomes you.

Cece has had experiences that she can’t talk about in any other way than song; and I don’t know what they are, they’re… internal. The length and breadth of her world is inside her head, but made small and soft and see through.

I’m so fucking tired.

Is it over? Oh god please let it be over.

Nami… isn’t screaming anymore. Maybe it’s over? No- wait, that’s a baby.

Others fear musicians because of the Piper. My fingers are burning and my wrist is aching and I know this story inside out. Finally wrote a damn song about it, so- my turn, I guess.

Fuck it, time to tango.

Oh god so tired.
I’m awake. But. I’m really wishing I wasn’t.

Oh wait, that’s Bryony.

“...miss bryony, are you really there?”
“Yeah- wait, have you been playing all night long?”
“in shifts with cece, yes”
“Oh my goodness gracious. Here, let me- hook up this microphone- I will lift mine eyes up to the hills- ”

I can’t tell if I’m just sleep drunk or if there’s an actual chorus behind Bryony’s song. I can’t tell if everyone hates me or if I just need to go to bed. I can’t tell if my limbs are actually made out of stone, or if I’m just tired and acknowledging it. I can’t tell if it’s hot, or if I’m finally relaxed enough- safe enough- to sleep.

Is she singing with a chorus, or is she singing alone? I don’t know. I don’t know.
I’m too tired to know.

The world spins and goes dark and that’s all I know- I dreamed I heard a baby crying, and I dreamed I heard Nami crying, but I don’t know which is true.

Dreams are weird.

Bryony’s song echoes through the ship. I don’t think any of the Suntides really realize they’re singing along to the hymns- everyone who stayed and everyone who went, we’re all tired.

Me most of all.

I really need a senior midwife here, but I’m all I’ve got. So. The next task, before I sleep this night- day?- night?- is to fill out the paperwork. Four birth registers; one death report. It’s of the utmost importance I fulfill my duties as soon as I can- and I am not yet too exhausted to hold a fountain pen.
For documents that are to be copied, I must use black archival ink. For documents that are not to be copied except by hand or mimeograph, I use blue archival ink.

First, turn the light on. The Galley is never really quiet- even after Sanji got that migraine, the rest of us stepped up as best we could. What’s the point of having cookbooks and written instructions for things if they don’t get used, you know? Mack and Bang are actually pretty good at stew, and I made a few cakes!

I-

Oh gods, please- n-no, no, deep breath, just.

Lay out the paperwork in order of difficulty- do the death report first, then the others.

This one was born dead- fill in Nami’s particulars, highlight where she needs to signify, mark where Chopper’s going to fill in the rest after autopsy, sign, seal and seal again, done.

Three girls and a boy, that lived. All of them have orange and green striped hair, and that square-shaped forehead of Zoro’s. And they all lived. The fifth one was born with nut-brown hair, and it- I think it, she, died in transit, in the canal. Her heart stopped, and would not be started steady again, and… I don’t know.

I don’t know.

I don’t know why things like this happen.

You don’t have to be a cleric or a midwife to lay a blessing on a baby. All you need is oil, or ash, or soot, or water, or salt- something pure, sacred. You make a mark over the soft spot on the baby’s head, and bless them- surely goodness and mercy shall follow thee all the days of thy life, and thou shalt dwell in peace forever more- and different people have different- different blessings.

Sometimes it’s I have called you by your name; when you pass through the waters, I will be with you; and when you go through the winds, they will not overwhelm you. When you walk through the fire, you will not be scorched, and the flames will not set you ablaze; when you delve into the earth, you will not be crushed. Darkness will hold no power over you; Light will never blind you. You are mine; I have called you by your name.

Sometimes it’s And all shall be well and all manner of thing shall be well when the tongues of flames are in-folded into the crowned knot of fire and the fire and the rose are one.

Sometimes it’s For it is together that we can overcome all things; and by my hand, protect thee.

The one I used for the one that died, it was sleep now, little darling; do not cry. I will stay, until no longer can thee- and then she breathed her last.

Roronoa Silas; Stormborn Vivian; Roronoa Guinevere; Stormborn Lucille. Welcome to the World.

Roronoa Stormborn Brenda; we will meet again, in a better place than this.
Taffy is crying, and she’s doing it silently. I am going to make tea.

The process of making tea to drink is fairly simple. To start with, one requires the appropriate tea-loose leaf or loose dried herbs or fresh herbs, of good quality. For herbs, homegrown is best, as one can ensure proper quality. I prefer to not use a tea bag with my brewing, but rather a strainer as I pour. Loose leaf tea (or loose herb tea) requires a lot of space to move around in to brew properly.

Different teas require different brewing temperatures. Black tea needs ninety six degrees celsius; green tea needs seventy degrees celsius; herbal teas are a bit more esoteric, in that certain temperatures can ruin the natural chemistry and medicinal properties of the herbs being used.

Always use a proper kettle to boil your water, and only ever boil it once; then, brew your tea in a teapot, generally dedicated for tea alone. We have four- one for black, one for green, one for white, and one made of glass for herbal varieties.

I am making chai masala, as I can recall feeling- well, nevermind. Cold. That is enough.

To make Chai Masala, one will need:

The cheapest, strongest black loose leaf tea you can get your hands on. I’m not kidding. The orange pekoe that they sell at the Daiso in the brown paper bags with yellow and red lettering on it for a bit less than four hundred beri a pack? Perfect. A good black tea is not what you want, in this case- it needs to be strong enough to withstand the powerful flavor forces you’re about to unleash, without being so expensive as to make you feel guilty for throwing down a challenge to the flavor knights… which they are soon to answer. I keep a massive store of the stuff in metal taffins that I clearly anodized with the appropriate label so that Sanji wouldn’t get mad.

Sanji is a tea snob.

As for the spice bomb of flavor, you will need a garam masala. There are between five and eight total spices required- missing one is fine I suppose, but you need to have at least five of the following to make it taste… familiar, I suppose.

The essential spice is green cardamom. Chai masala will not taste right, will not smell right, without it. You can essentially leave everything else out- but not this. It is an intensely fragrant seed pod, with sharp vegetal notes of green, spiciness, and pepper. They are harvested at an earlier time than black cardamom. Green cardamom is in very nearly every chai masala recipe you could ever be exposed to. Lightly crack the seed pods before use; otherwise, store whole, somewhere dark and cool.

Next comes cinnamon stick, for sweetness and warmth. Store whole and crush to splinters or grind down only when ready to brew or use. Fennel seed- offers a licorice or faintly medicinal note, can be used instead of star anise, which is the same flavor but darker and stronger. Fresh ginger, freshens and sharpens the whole pot with spice notes, warms the blood, and tempers the taste of milk. Black peppercorns are what gives the masala the back-of-the-throat bite, which is what most people remember about Faesh Chai Masala. Whole cloves give it a musky, sharp flavor. Coriander seeds make it sweeter, with notes of citrus.

The only real advice I have about how much of what spice to put in? As much or as little as you’d like, depending on what you want.

As for brewing, well… The flavors that make spices taste delicious are all aromatic compounds. Aromatic compounds are made of molecules that contain a structure known as a benzene ring, meaning they dissolve best in alcohols or fats. Therefore, for the preparation of Faesh Chai Masala, you need to get the fattiest milk you can get your hands on. Sea Cow milk from the springtime is actually almost perfect- and I wasn’t just fighting Wspsy back on the Sunken Science Island, I was scouting out all their shit that I wanted for myself. That island had fully working farms in various states of abandonment- including a small herd of mini-Sea Cows. I milked them, before I sent them home to our Aquarium- they seemed, frankly, overjoyed to be cared for again. Are they a little odd looking? Aren’t we all? Besides, amphibians are always the oddest looking, of all the animals.

Tea is properly served in porcelain. I’ll be using the mismatched set, as we have service for eighty and it doesn’t match anyway- if pieces get broken, who can tell?

Gurry is sitting with Taffy, and Taffy is sobbing into his shoulder- good, good. Well, a baby is- nng.

Chai Masala is prepared in milk, not water; it’s not, technically speaking, a drink. It’s more like a liquid, flavorful meal- thus, no food need ever be served with Chai Masala. As the aromatic compounds begin their dissolution, a uniquely homely aroma starts to flood the kitchen.

Hello, Sanji.

“Hello, Mab. Chai Masala?”

“It’s been a hell of a day, Sanji. Longer, if I’m reading the stars right- and, with the Island we were docked at now gracefully sunken beneath the waves, Nami and Taffy in no fit state to take their posts, and quite a few guests… well. One problem at a time- I think everyone could do with a nice cuppa,”

“I quite agree, love. I’ll start service, then?”

“If you like- see if the Cookids can help out as well, we’ve rather a lot of people aboard and some of them won’t be put at ease by an adult man, Demon or no,”

“Will do,”

I leave the tea in the capable hands of my husband. I step forwards to comfort my student. I step out to comfort my friend. And, most importantly, an entire squad of me goes to sail the ship—somewhere else, please. We’ve got an Eternal Pose to Tuckleigh; Tuckleigh, Ho!

I’ll be tired and sad after we’re well away from the multitudes of wolvarks circling the drowning island, thank you.
I spy with my fanficcer's eye, a crossover! Well, it could happen...

DON DON DON DON DON.

“Attention. Your attention, please: due to the number of people bitten, I have been asked to remind all persons on this ship that Goblynn the Fishcat is tolerant of petting from Deborah, our Sous Chef, alone. Please don’t pet Goblynn the Fishcat if you are not Deborah; Goblynn has bitten through battleship plating before.

“A reminder from the Galley that Breakfast services are from five hours after Midnight to Ten in the Morning; Luncheon begins at Noon, ending a half hour later; Tea is currently two hours before sunset, moving towards three; Dinner is an hour after sunset; and Supper is whatever’s leftover or packed in the Milk Fridge, whenever you get to it. The Milk Fridge is never locked- and, so long as there is still milk in the fridge, anyone is welcome to drink it. Please return all used bottles and glass containers from the Milk Fridge to the bottle-return located next to the fridge. Pudding, cheese, yoghurt, and other dairy items are on an ‘as you find them’ basis; there are no reservations, only requests.

“I will also take this moment to remind everyone that influenza is really definitely trying to kill us all, and to please report to the Sanitary or Infirmary for your vaccinations- they need not be needle-based, I hear good things about tablets these days…

“-oh, wait, I think I’ve done this completely wrong. Ahem. Coming to you live from the Thousand Sunny, A Fine Greeting to you All; it is now time to start the Straw Hat Broadcasting Service. I am your host, Mab Morgan, currently substituting for Mister Jeremiah Cross as he startled me and I punched him in the throat, then the stomach, then kicked him square and sure in the ghoulies. He’s stopped vomiting, at least, but he’s in no fit state to comment on any of the ongoings here. As for what’s going on here, please do not panic, gentle listeners; We, the Straw Hat Pirates, are currently sailing through the Rainbow Mist; I repeat, we are sailing through the Rainbow Mist.

“I do not recommend or encourage any who follow us as fans to do as we have done; you should make your own mistakes, and go your own direction, not follow ours! With that said, I neither know, nor care, what exactly the Rainbow Mist is; merely that, as current acting Senior Helmsman, I am sailing us through it. Nami is in seclusion for the next six weeks; Taffy is still recovering from her duties as Acting Midwife; and neither of them will let me use the Log Pose.

“We’re sailing blind, folks- is what I would say in other circumstances. We’re actually sailing with the help of an Eternal Pose, and I will not say where to, as that would be stupid.

“Special Announcement to the Crew: YOU DO NOT COME IN TWOS. DO NOT KILL YOUR DOUBLE. YOU ARE THE ONLY YOU. THEY ARE THE ONLY THEM. DO NOT KILL YOUR DOUBLE. ESPECIALLY YOU, ZORO. -That man would fight the very concepts of reality if he could.

“I can now report that Cross is fully upright, still quite pale, and his snail friend is no longer sobbing with laughter at his injurious predicament. I have gone to fetch him a slice of one of our sponsor’s products, and shall now commence with reading the ad copy in a humorous fashion.

“A-hem. Your ex-girlfriend has just called. It was a painful breakup- a painful relationship- full of miscommunication and overwhelming dramatics. You’d like to move on- you swore you’d move on.

“You did not move on.

“You know it’s her that’s calling you- she’s got one of those novelty outgoing rings, so instead of the normal ‘puru-puru’ sound, your den-den’s making an unholy racket akin to a boy-band in a blender.
You know that if you answer, it’s going to be an awkward five minutes of lengthening silences intercut with stilted conversation- ‘How have you been?’ ‘Fine, fine. Yourself?’ ‘Fine, just fine.’

“Neither of you is ‘fine’.

“You shouldn’t have answered the call and you shouldn’t talk to her anymore and when she suggests- like she always does- that the two of you go out for drinks at your favorite bar from back when you two were still together… You know it’s never just drinks.

“Neither of you have managed to let go far enough to get to the point in your relationship where you two can be ‘just friends’. Even now, you’re not sure you two were ever ‘just friends’; you’re certainly not ‘just friends’ now. ‘Just Friends’ don’t do things like this to each other. They don’t stay over when they shouldn’t anymore; and they don’t leave in a futile attempt to escape the consequences.

“The next morning you wake and she’s long gone, the stench of her perfume- which only just faded from your sheets- horribly, intoxicatingly, maddeningly smeared and sunk into everything.
Everything you own; everything she touched.

“All you feel is empty and grey and disgusted; you swore you’d stop doing this, you swore you’d move on and stop- doing- this-“Eventually, you leave your bed, rise, shower, and regard your refrigerator. It’s not empty; but she was the one to buy the groceries, and without her you fell back into the habit of subsisting on takeaway and jars. Perhaps there’s something better than three day old anchovy-pumpkin pot pie or half a sour pickled onion in the freezer?

“Bebop-a-rebop Frozen Rhubarb Pie and Frozen Rhubarb Pie Filling; wouldn’t this be a good time for a piece of rhubarb pie? Yes, one little thing can revive a guy, and that is a piece of rhubarb pie-serve it up nice and hot, maybe things aren’t as bad as you thought.

“They are, of course- but at least you have a nice slice of rhubarb pie. That sour-sweet flavour gets the taste of humiliation out of your mouth every time- yes, that good old Bebop-a-rebop Frozen Rhubarb Pie and Frozen Rhubarb Pie Filling. Lots of things are very bad- make them better with a slice of pie,”

“Mmm hmmmMm mm!”

“I can see the snail is enjoying it, at least- ah, and now for your listening pleasure- nope, sorry, can’t play it for copyright infringement reasons. Balls. Well, let’s see- I shall instead tell you stories of my youth,”
I pause and look over at the blond man carefully chewing on his slice of rhubarb pie. He’s got metal gauntlets, a snail on one shoulder, a dazed expression, and a snazzy hat. He gives me a jaunty, if wavery, thumbs up.

I turn back to the microphone transponder and continue.

“Have I ever told you about the time I almost died in a student theatre production of The Faesh Play? I’m sure I’ve told my sisters, but- well, an old classic never really dies, just revives as a ghost to haunt and torment the living once more…

“In news that will surprise no one currently listening, I was a boarding school child. Our school had several voluntold activities for the, shall we say, miscreant hooligan youth. I didn’t like to perform, but I did enjoy writing grammatically correct latin across school walls, flushing cherry bombs down the toilet, and shooting apples off my friends tits with a crossbow; thus, my inclusion in the school’s yearly production of one of the classic plays.

“It was my fifth year of school, and that year in Literacy and Composition, we were assigned a group project of retelling a Billy Shakespeare play in six minutes or less. I rewrote the entirety of The Faesh Play in a series of rhyming couplets, which by happy coincidence, played perfectly to the tune of ‘You’re So Vain’. How did it go- youooooooou’re so vain, I betcha think this throne is bound to you, don’t you, don’t you…

“This song is what our group sung it as, while my favorite LitComp teacher sat with his head in his hands, occasionally making noises like he was crying. Or perhaps being stabbed, it’s been a long time…

“As an aside, those notes were lost to the fire my brother set in my first dormitory in a failed attempt to murder me. The line I sang is the only line I remember, now. That’s not what this story is about, of course, merely where it started- I won an award for that hot mess, and found myself propelled into the actual Theatrics and Dramatics class in sixth year because of it. That’s when shit gets weird.

“The first thing to know about The Faesh Play is that it is always referred to as The Faesh Play due to the well established and deeply embedded curse. I’ll explain that bit eventually- but for now, it’s enough to know that as we were all under the gimlet gaze of Skuan Nuns, and some of us actually devout, that’s what we did. We were, after all, good little Skuan school kids, even though, of course, by being included in the year’s play at all we actually weren’t. Still- we called it “The Faesh Play” and never spoke any of the lines unless we were rehearsing because that’s what one does.

“-Listen, when your school is built in the center of a triangle consisting of an Age-Of-Heroes era battlefield where battlefield sounds still ring out most nights, the Old Hanging Tree where hanged men still hang in the mornings only to burn away with the night’s lingering mist in the full light of dawn, and a derelict Fairy Mound that is rumored to have an Otherbuilt Dungeon somewhere deep within; and the school itself is built atop what used to be the old laird’s house what mysteriously died of unnatural causes and whose house burned to naught but ash and stone and has been haunted by the ghosts of those trapped within it’s walls- when your boarding school, which you’ve been going to since you were nine, is like that, ye dinnae fook ‘round with fate. Tain’t smart.

“Unless, of course, your name was Mister Beverly Fujishima, and you were, firstly, freshly arrived from Ryugu Mergyo, and secondly, didn’t believe in Faesh superstition or Faesh magic, and thirdly, took every possible opportunity to spit in the face of the Gods and call it M-A-C-B-E-T-H like you had nothing left to lose.

“Mister Fujishima was a hip young thing, or at least he hoped he was. He would show up every day, regardless of the weather, wearing geta under his dress trou, and try to hang out with us like we were his friends and not his students. In hindsight, two things become violently clear about that poor man- the first being, he must have been desperately homesick, as the school culture of Fiddler’s Green is not at all like Ryugu Mergyo, and the aquatic people's of the Fae have very little commonality with those of Fishman Island, beyond of course the ‘breathing underwater’ thing; and he was the exact sort of smiling liar, the kind of friendly lech who thought Woodrow Allenform was the pinnacle of philom genius and was likely writing a novella about a teacher who has a love affair with one of his students. Perhaps he hoped it would be semi-autobiographical.

“Mister Fujishima hated superstition, and magic, and the Gods. He hated them… well, zealously. His faith, it could be argued, was in the hating of such things, in aggressively denying their power- and above all, he hated that we corrected him whenever he called The Faesh Play by written, and accursed, name, while in the theatre room. This hatred caused him no end of grief, as he could not resist yelling the name of The Faesh Play thrice while standing on the stage we were to perform it on. He followed this idiocy with these words, and I quote direct, ‘There, see, nothing bad happened! I mean, what could possibly go wrong?’

“The curse was subtle at first, like half the supporting cast coming down with mononucleosis the first month into rehearsals. Not an unusual thing of itself for a bunch of hormone riddled boarding school kids in close contact at all times. It was after the Month of Mono, that things became progressively weirder and wilder. There are some who might argue that a kind of mass hysteria took effect, merely the actions of a group of minds united in terror wreaking havoc on the surrounding world.

“Consider this. One day, in the middle of rehearsing her ‘Out damned spot!’ soliloquy, our Lady MaccaBee almost got taken out for a nap in the dirt by a falling stage light. It plummeted out of the darkness like the hopes and dreams of anyone who’s ever flirted with Boa Hancock, smashed through the floor, and shattered in the Belows. It looked, in retrospect, like a scene from the ‘Cat and Mouse’ funnies in the newspaper- and as everyone knows, comedy is brutal, aggressive violence, spectacular and terrifying to behold- but, while jokes have the assurance of cutting without drawing blood, falling stage lights have none such to their name.

“The sound of the crash was so loud several teachers came running to our auditorium; it was thought that there had been a bomb, or a tree had exploded again- that winter was frightfully cold, after all. What they found was our Lady MaccaBee standing frozen in the center of the stage covered in dust, staring at her upraised hand where she’d felt the falling metal and heat whistle ever so just past her fingertips, and all the rest of us staring at her- realizing that we’d almost watched our friend get crushed to death by falling stage apparatus. The school had to call in a second student counselor after that.

“Under such circumstances, we can be forgiven for being, as some might say, hysterical.

“One would think, after two such dire consequences, the school would think better of hosting this end of year play. One would think- alas, no. The room was inspected, and repaired; the falling light was deemed a freak accident; and we went right back to rehearsal. We persevered through random fire suppression system mishaps- soaked right through costuming, scenery, and electrics, and made the stage slipperier than a hot cock; the Lord MaccaBee getting thrown against a window in a fight and falling out of it when it shattered, a height of four stories; and several other small mishaps which by themselves wouldn’t have mattered, except… well, people totally unconnected to the production except for their relation to those in it started getting ill.
“A woman had a severe miscarriage, and ultimately died of septicemia.

“A man walked off a cliff to his death, stopping only to remove his shoes.

“A child was carried off by a swarm of flying eels, in full view of the town and the gods and everybody.

“A calf was born dead, with two heads on it’s body.

“A man vomited live snakes for six hours straight.

“A woman gave birth to a full sized durian.

“A teenage girl married a ghost.

“A gang of cats knocked over the fish market, making off with several thousand dola worth of fish, eating snails, and crustaceans.

“There were stranger things too, but for the sake of the innocent still listening to this broadcast, and my own peace of mind, I will refrain from stating them aloud- suffice to say, compile enough misfortune into one stressed out group, and a series of small mishaps become overwhelming enough that people just… leave.

“The cast dropped like flies, their final grades be damned. Others who needed to complete the class for their chosen electives the following year stuck through it out of desperation. Still more could not get out of the class due to apprenticeships. Then there were the ones like me, just there for the shitshow and to see who would be left standing at the end of it all. It was at this point that I began researching the origins of the curse, and using my dispensation to comb through the entirety of our school system’s libraries to find some kind of talisman that would protect what remained of our cast and crew.

“We would huddle together in the Dramatics room on the second floor after rehearsals, survivors of this mutual wreck of a monument to our teacher’s hubris and ego, carrying salt and prayer beads and strips of blessed paper writ long and powerful with runes and throwing them over our left shoulders and chanting and burning our spells that they may come to pass- and, of course, discussing the play, even though we never said it’s name. We knew, at that point, that it was far too late to dispel the curse- but perhaps, with enough faith, we could lessen it’s cruel reach to merely the one who mocked it so foolishly. We prayed and we prayed and we never said the Play’s accursed name.

“Mister Fujishima did, though. All the time; repeatedly, loudly, especially when we begged him not to. Because, you see, this was Mister Fujishima’s vision and nothing small like fifteen people coming down with mono in the same week, having near death experiences, or a whole town’s worth of Weird Shit was going to stop him.

“I got moved from helping rewrite lines of the Modern adaptation- which was shaping up like Trainspotting meeting Willy Wonka meeting down a dark alley and getting into a knife fight- to stage managing, which gave me access to the entire drama department’s archives, which is important for later- to being on the raised podium off to the side of stage left, wearing a pointy hat and holding a staff. The irony of having an actual mage play a stage mage was not lost on me, or any of my classmates- but then again, it’s supposed to be good luck to have a real mage acting as a mage, and the thought was that I might be able to save us all.

“I could save no one.

“Perhaps you’re thinking at this point, ‘But Mab, what did your parents have to say about any of this, didn’t they do something about it?’

“Firstly- none of my mothers ever took a course in Drama, or Music. They Don’t Know. Secondly- have you ever tried telling an adult that Doesn’t Know, ‘our drama teacher cursed us all by saying the name of the play instead of it’s nickname and now we’re all Doomed’- I know you haven’t, but I have. My mothers- all three of them; said, in order, ‘no you’re not, dearest’ and went back to her Art journal; ‘that’s nice, sweetie’ and went on with her smithing; and ‘finish what you start’ before going back to her office work. This was not uncommon, back then- there’d been a prevailing front of thought that all children were meant to be seen, not heard. Or perhaps they attributed our very real, very warranted fear to childish high spirits and general shenanigans.

“Right about until opening night, that is, when curtains lifted and the Lord MaccaBee is stood upstage with his shredded arm in a sling- and I have pictures of this, check the photo albums with the album art covers, it’s in one of those- one of the cool ones. Well, they’re all cool, so- just. Look?

“Opening night. Curtains up. I’m in asymmetrical bleach-scribed tights, a black puff sleeve leotard, a dainty tulle and lace capelet of cream-pink, like when your goat is new to milking at all and their kid’s gone and bitten them so now all the milk they give has a good jigger of blood in it- and it’s not like I drank it straight, I used it to bake with, calm down- a leather bustier with steel boning all the way up and down, turned ankle boots with shiny brass buckles, and a staff blessed by the Three-Who-Are-One. I’m telling you all of these details so you can understand one, important, vital facet of the events that were to follow that fateful curtain rise: I, and my outfit for that evening, were the most put together and well thought out portion of the entire play.

“Our Lord MaccaBee is standing there with his shredded arm in a sling, our Lady MaccaBee keeps looking up at the ceiling like she has a nervous tick, and everyone else is just plainly, visibly, horrifically fucking miserable and more than a little bit wild around the eyes.

“We got through it; we got through. Nothing else bad happened during the play; no one nearly died. Until the very end, that is, when Mister Fujishima gets up on the stage to address our horrified looking parents to thank them for coming, says ‘everyone, thank you for coming to our performance of Macb-’ and then he slips and breaks his entire neck, dying not a minute after.

“Thus ended the first and last and only official performance of The Faesh Play. My personal involvement ended when I gave a full accounting of the Curse to the Council of Theatrics, who wanted to know why their bright young thing had met such a dismal end.

“The Faesh Curse was started by a group of actors during the very first run of the play; some strange alchemy of discontent, plague, and mismanagement resulted in that merry troupe not being paid for their services. Those were the days gangs of wild Clowns and the Cult of Thespians still roamed through the small villages, battling each other with vicious mockery and rotten fruit missiles for limited audiences. Thus, their powers over the darkest of magical arts was truly well practiced, in ways perhaps not so well known today. Being a curse attached to a play, with activation only coming upon those who do not respect the actors staging the play, disrespecting the text itself- although there is leeway for parody- and ignoring the concerns of the actors… well. There was a clear case of negligence to be made, not to mention the implications raised by the rousing of a curse at all. Inquiries were made- and that’s all I, personally, can say about that, due to the non-disclosure agreements,”

“Oi, Morgan!”

“Hello, Doctor Trafalgar Law,”

“Yeah, hi- why aren’t you a doctor, Missus Morgan?”
“I- didn’t finish that portion of my schooling?”

“Hm. Your school offers mail-in courses, correct? And you have special dispensation, as royalty, to mail in coursework?”

“..yes?”

“How many years is your research good for?”

“Um, considering I used census data and various records, indefinitely? I mean, five to seven years, but-”

“So. You’ve done your research; you’ve written your dissertation; you’ve defended your dissertation. Your dissertation is published- very interesting, by the way-”

“Oh, thank you-”

“-but you haven’t got a doctorate in medicine- actually, three, consisting of general practice, psychology, and psychiatry, to add to your shelf of doctorates because…?”

“...I have to write up three hours of practicum and I haven’t felt like it?”

“...Mab,”

“Yes?”

“WRITE YOUR FUCKING NOTES AND SEND THEM SO YOU CAN GET YOUR GODSDAMN DOCTORATE!”

“EEP!”

“NOW!”

“EEEEEeeeeeeeee-”

I scowl as I watch Missus Morgan scurry off to finish her notes and mail them. The extradimensional Straw Hat, currently making inroads on a new slice of Rhubarb Pie that Deborah-

“I don’t eat bread- that includes crust, and pastry-”

“It’s crustless. Are you celiac or gluten intolerant? Or is there a traumatic association?”

“Um- mm- I’m not sure what celiac or gluten- what is gluten? Some kind of… food glue?”

“Well. Celiac disease is a serious Linear Malady where ingestion of gluten leads to minor damage to the small intestine. Over time, this can lead to all sorts of other problems, even death. As for food glue, you’re not wrong- but it’s more like rubber bands, or even springs under tension,”

“Mmph- go on,”
Gluten, meaning at its most basic level, glue; a composite of storage proteins termed prolamins and glutelins, stored together with starch in the endosperm of a variety of cereal grass grains. It’s found in wheat, barley, rye, and oats; as well as related species and hybrids, such as spelt, khorasan, emmer, einkorn, triticale, kamut, and so on; and in products of these cereal grass grains, such as malt. Glutens, most especially Triticeae glutens, are appreciated for their viscoelastic properties. When water is added to gluten, it becomes stretchy; thus, gluten gives elasticity to dough, helping it rise and keep its shape. It’s usually what makes a finished bread product chewy; or something similar to gluten, anyway."

“Okay...”

“So, in a small part of the general population, gluten can trigger coeliac disease- celiac, as I asked-”

“Right, minor damage to small intestine-”

“Mm. Some people are just sensitive to it; some people get gluten ataxia; and some unlucky few get dermatitis herpetiformis. There have been reports of people with gluten sensitivity or allergy being exposed to oats and activating their misfortune- this has to do with the oat cultivar consumed, because the immunoreactivities of toxic prolamins are different in various cultivars of oats. Similar to the vigilance required of someone with a peanut allergy, someone with a gluten allergy must be aware of cross-contamination,”

“Mm,”

“True gluten is limited to cereal grass grains, and their hybrids- talk to your supplier or your farmer for more information about what you’re eating. Before the age of seven, most Fae can’t digest gluten at all; which is not why their main grain is maize, but is why it isn’t wheat. So- allergy or trauma?”

“Um... hm. Well, it might be both? I can remember not particularly liking the taste of bread as a child, it always tasted, well, bad -”

“-that’s usually an early indicator of an allergy, by the by-”

“-Oh?”

“Yeah! If I try to eat with silver-plated anything, it tastes like I’m licking a battery!"

“Yeah, that’s an allergy; for me it... hn. I know a crewmate of mine who’s lactose intolerant says that the milk always smells rotten, even when it’s straight from the cow; for me, bread always tasted bitter, and I never liked it,”

“Even pastries?”

“Even then- no matter how sweet, there was always a nasty bitter aftertaste that I just couldn’t get past,”

“That sounds like an allergy to me- did you have stomach problems too, or...?”

“Gassy? Bloating, I remember that- once after a birthday party, I was almost feverish for a few days?”

“Yep,”

“Then I guess what happened later just made it worse...”
"I’m sorry?"

"I’m from Flvnce, kid."

"Uh… Oh! Jeeze, wasn’t… hang on, Amber Lead Disease isn’t a thing, Dr. Trafalgar Lamie wrote her dissertation proving that- her theory about the people of Flvnce, about lead poisoning… oh my gods,"

"So. Have you read her dissertation?"

"No, um, it was a bit over my head- not all of it, mostly the parts about Amber Lead Syndrome, I mean; I was more interested in the ‘Lead is a Neurotoxin’ part,"

"Mhm?"

"Well- okay, so, lead poisoning, sometimes known as Amber Lead Disease or Painter’s Colic, is a type of metal poisoning caused by lead in the body. The brain is most sensitive to lead poisoning; but symptoms may include abdominal pain, constipation, headaches, irritability, memory problems, sterility, and nerve damage in the hands and feet. It’s responsible for ten percent of intellectual disability of otherwise unknown cause and some behavioral problems. Some effects are permanent, with lead poisoning- your vitiligo, for example, Doctor Trafalgar, is a permanent change to the melanin production of your skin, as a result of your Amber Lead Syndrome,"

"Mm. Exposure?"

"Contamination of air, water, dust, food, or other consumer products- paint, houses, you name it. Children are at greater risk, as they absorb a greater proportion of lead. Work exposure is common in certain professions. Diagnosis is typically by measurement of the blood lead level; the ICDC has set the upper limit for blood lead for adults at 10 µg/dl (10 µg/100 g) and for children at 5 µg/dl. It’s also detectable by changed in red blood cells or dense lines in the bones of children as seen on X-ray,"

"Treatment,"

"In this case, the best treatment for lead poisoning is avoiding lead entirely. Individuals should remove lead-containing items from the home; workplaces should improve ventilation and monitoring of their workers for unacceptable amounts of lead accumulation; and nations should have policies that ban lead in products such as paint and gasoline, reduce allowable levels in water or soil, and make provision for the cleaning and safeguarding of contaminated areas. Second best treatment for lead poisoning is the removal of the source of lead; and the use of medications that bind lead so it can be eliminated from the body, known as chelation therapy," "Oh, that’s new- tell me about chelation therapy for lead poisoning, I didn’t know that was possible now,"

"Oh, um- Chelation therapy is the standard Sky Blue response to unacceptable exposure to toxic metals. It’s long been used in clinical toxicology, and remains in use for things like metal poisoning- of which lead is one, er, arsenic is a metalloid I think-"

"Topic-"

"-Sorry; treatment, um, chelation therapy tailored for lead specifically, um, uM-"

"Calm down, think; what does lead do?"

"It- it tricks the body into thinking it’s a valuable mineral or metal, but it’s really not, it can’t do what the body needs it to do- oh! You’d need to get the lead out, and replace it with what the body is actually missing- iron, calcium, and zinc, for the most part. Chelation therapy lowers blood lead levels- in cases of long exposure, lead can be leached into the blood from the bones, so the therapy is often repeated multiple times,”

“...Why are you a cook?”

“Hah?”

“You’re really knowledgeable about medicine, and very enthusiastic- why are you a cook?”

“...I’m not a cook,”

“Um,”

“Yeah, there are seven of us? We’re sisters. I’m the head nurse- my sister, D, she’s our sous-chef,”

“Oh. Whoops- wait, why did you bring me a slice of no-crust rhubarb pie?”

“You skipped tea, and it won’t be dinner for hours- that’s why your piece had whipped cream and chocolate sauce, and Mister Cross’ didn’t-”

“oiOiOi!”

“The Snail is getting his own salad? I saw six kinds of leafy veggies, two different grains, and lots of soft veggies and fruits. They don’t want to overfeed ‘em, though, considering ‘e snarfed most of the pie-”

“Com plaiINt retrACTED!”

“Goddammit, Soundbite!”

“HA hahahA HAHA HAhaHA haha!”

Lick the stamp, put it on the envelope- double check the address, yes, good; put it into the ‘Outgoing Mail’ box- done. I foresee no real problems with my notes- that’s one of the few things I never had to be tutored in, which was both rare and a bit disappointing, I never could figure out where to get all the cute stickers and gel pens everyone else had…

I glance through the Galley, and take a good long look at what’s being cooked for dinner. My Husband, his Double, and a few others- all of them blond, in dark suits, with curly eyebrows- are all cooking around and with each other, while Deborah and the Cool Kids- Cook Kids, no, Cool Kids is better- watch in fascination. The smell is heavenly.

I have no idea what they’re cooking, though.

Back to the Widecast, I suppose.

“Attention. Your attention, please: We are reaching maximum capacity of Cooks in our Galley-
Repeat, we are reaching maximum capacity of Cooks in our Galley. Er. Kitchen? No, no, Galley, we’re on a ship- ahem. Although the smell from the Galley is promising, if even one more Straw Hat Cook enters, disaster of a culinary nature may very well ensue. This would be heartbreaking for every Sanji involved. Also: I have no idea what’s being cooked for dinner. It smells heavenly- but what it actually is? I doubt even the Sanji’s know, and they’re the ones cooking!

“Hello, Mab Morgan returning to continue our broadcast. The current conditions are foggy, with strange shards of rainbow light dancing over bits and pieces of the ship; the wind feels like it’s still, but we’re sailing, so it isn’t actually still. We have been sailing for what seems to be less than an hour, and yet must be more- certainly, the story I told takes more than an hour to tell, and yet, our clocks show no such advancement to their faces.

“More on this situation, as it develops.

“The current conditions are foggy, with strange shards of rainbow light dancing over bits and pieces of the ship; the wind feels like it’s still, but we’re sailing, so it isn’t actually still. We have been sailing for what seems to be less than an hour, and yet must be more- certainly, the stories you are about to hear will take more than a single hour to tell, and yet, our clocks will show no such advancement to their faces.

“Nami tells me, during moments of lucidity between harrowing storms of grief, that we are sailing in spirals- that the Rainbow Mist is acting very much like the Sky Sea we sailed through once, and that we, inside it, are not quite sailing in circles. Spiraling through the Rainbow Mist, our time and space have somehow drifted- split- from our original ones, thus leading to the strange meeting of our many similar selves.

“I… it’s odd, but I have no double to meet. Or rather, if you know my name- the titles attached to me through deed and error and malice and ignorance, it is perhaps not so strange that I have no double self- no similar being to meet.

“You see, a few years ago, I killed my double. The circumstances are as they are- and I was punished for it. And now- I have no double to meet.”

“Mab? Mab, is that you?”

“Just a second, Titi- I need to finish up here, and then we can talk, alright?

“It is April, and something has changed. It is April, and trees that will never bear fruit once again weep their petals; tears of pink become a blizzard in warm sunshine, the scent of nostalgia thick in the air. It is April; our spring cleaning revealed what we had hoped the long Winter would have hidden forever more. It is April; thus, it is now time for the April Monologues- but first, a word from our Business Correspondent, Bryony Lovelace, with A Special Guest Speaker. -Titania, you look so-”

“Thank you, Mab. Bryony Lovelace, Business Correspondent here, with the latest Holy Day Edition of Consumption. Our topic today is unsafe toys for children. For instance, this claymore.

‘Fully sharpened, ready for action’ is the tagline, and the set includes one claymore, a sheathe for the sword, and a carrying belt. Speaking on behalf of other extremely dangerous toys, General Portgas
D. Solitaire, recently returned from the Great War of Creation, current purveyor of Incredibly Unsafe Toys. General, you produced the following so-called playthings: Ear Piercing Needle and Ear-Ring Kit; Skin Abrasion and Skin Graft Kit; Snake Charmer’s Flute with Actual Snake Inside; The Book of Secret Confessions, Guaranteed to Not Leave Visible Bruising; Throwin’ Rocks; Genuine Stab-Tag Knives; and instructions on how to properly induce ‘Dead Leg’. And what about these ‘innocent’ dolls, which you named ‘Davey Grabass’ and ‘Johnny Switchblade?’ Press little Johnny too hard, and two sharp knives spring out of his arms- press, Davey, well… I haven’t quite had the nerve.

“General, these aren’t even fun toys. What do you have to say for yourself?’”

“Okay, Miss Lovelace, I’mma correct you, alright? The full names of the last two products you’ve taken issue with, as I introduced them to the youngin’s on this Crew, is ‘Davey Grabass: Legendary Lothario’ and ‘Johnny Switchblade: Adrenaline Junkie’. I mean, nothing goes wrong if you say the whole thing- the youngin’s don’t know what the names mean, well, I can write and we’ve got a whole damn library, go fetch your answers for fuck’s sake. They play around, they make up their stories, no one gets hurt. I mean, so their baby takes a shiv, or an animal stuffy gets buggered. No harm in that, as far as I can see, you know?”

“Fine. Fine. Well, what about this- you’re actually selling this, I remind you, for one hundred ninety eight beri each, and it’s- it’s called Bag O’ Glass. General Solitaire, this is fuckin’ bag of jagged glass bits you found, washed, and put in a paper bag.”

“Hell yes it is. Sells like fuckin’ candy, y’know- and it’s just broken glass, no broken sugar glass or any of that crap in my bags, just plain broken glass, got it?!?”

“Fern and Mack have already cut themselves on this shit! What the hell, man?”

“Listen- the youngin’s, they’d like, y’know, they’d be down in the hold, breaking useless bottles with baseball bats, picking up broken glass just- fuckin’ anywhere. The beach, the street, garbage cans, vacant lots, all over the place on every island you can think of- including deserted ones. I’m just packaging what the kids already want- fuck, I even wash that shit because those crazy bastards put it in their mouths! I mean, it’s a fuckin’ creative toy- if you hold it right, you get nice colors, and some pieces are genuine sea glass, right, and- and prisms, and shit. Light refraction. Texture- you know what I mean?”

“So, you don’t think this toy is dangerous?”

“Fucksake- look, on every bag there’s a label that says ‘Broken Glass Inside’; I don’t know what the fuck anyone who opens it and pulls out a handful of broken glass, like what, it’s fuckin’ grapes? What did you expect to happen, exactly? Shit, I got all kinds of things I can put in bags- Bag O’ Glass, Bag O’ Nails, Bag O’ Bugs, Bag O’ Snake- Winston, he’s a real sweet boy, he’ll hang out just anywhere you plop him down-”

“- what have you done with Winston, Solitaire-”

“It’s a fuckin’ decent toy, alright?”

“Why, exactly, can you not make dolls that don’t do anything but be, and- seriously, Solitaire, if you hurt Winston-”

“Winston’s fine, Bry; and Religion. There’s no such thing as a safe childhood- only safer. Getting a young’n used to thinking about, acknowledging, the dangers inherent in an object… s’why I called the Bag O’ Glass a toy,“

“It’s a bag of broken glass!”

“It’s Educational!”

“They could cut themselves on it!”

“Valuable Lesson!”

“Uuuugh- and that’s all the time we have for today, on Consumption. I am your host, Bryony Lovelace. We now move to the April Monologues,” “Yis, is my turn for the tale-telling. There are many Brer and Sis’ stories, but my favorite, of all the ones my mother told me, was thus.

“One winter, many years ago- so many that those old enough to remember died, and their children died, and they died and died and only the story lives on- so long- but one winter, the dawn froze solid. The sun got caught between the trunks of two frozen birches, yis, and the land iced up so’s that it couldn’t turn.

“Many an’ old-un hollered that’was only the winter digging in, that the dawn had not frozen- but then it was breakfast, and the dawn had not come; and then it was luncheon, and the dawn had not come; and then it was dinner, and the dawn had not come. By suppertime, many an old-un’s wife had given him a sound bite to the ear, as the Dawn was quite clearly frozen, and if’n they’d admitted that earlier, something could’a been done about it by now- how’d you break it this time?

“The first rays of sunlight had frozen halfway over the mountain tops- a glacier of shimmering gold, eerie and hot, but hot without heat. Shards of frozen sunlight pierced through the forest- and there, near’bout lunch-time, in the darkest depths, in a hidden glenn, Brer Fox woke from his day’s sleep, and climbed up out of his house.

“Brer Fox had been havin’ hisself a good, gentle winter- no harsh storms in his glenn, no collapses in his den- but this Dawn that froze, well, it set all manner of critter out of sorts. Brer Fox found a whole nest of partridge eggs, unguarded; and a brace of baby rabbits; and nearly his whole weight in nuts and seeds Sis Squirrel and Sis Mouse had hidden away for later. That was good as a starter, but Brer Fox knew he’d need somethin’ more substantial- and wouldn’t you know it, when the Dawn froze up so solid, a shard of frozen sunlight had bounced off’a frozen pond, directly into Brer Bear’s sleepin’ eyes.

“Now, unlike his cold-weather cousins, Brer Bear meant to sleep all through the long winter; he’d spent all of Autumn rootin’ and huntin’ and making a nuisance of hisself, taking every fish he could find, snappin’ up every root and bug and berry he could get his paws on. Brer Fox was cheated out of more than one meal by Brer Bear, and held a mighty grudge year after year- because, in ordinary circumstances, Brer Fox could never take Brer Bear in a fight, and the both of them knew it.

“But the day the Dawn froze, things weren’t ordinary at’all. I was always too young to know the exact circumstances of their fight- too young to know how Brer Fox hunted and killed Brer Bear that Winter. But he did- and dragging his prize home near about supper time, Brer Fox finally realized that the Dawn had frozen solid.

“Being quite clever, he knew he had to do something quick or the world was done for. Brer Fox had a freshly killed Bear on his back, so he gripped it tight in his teeth, raced up one of those frozen rays of sunlight, and began beating the hot carcass against the frozen trunks of the birches what had caught the sun. Soon enough a gush of hot oil burst through the skin and onto the icy sun and trees, thawing them out.

“Brer Fox gave the sun a good hard bite to get it going again, burning his nose and mouth- that’s why all Fox noses and mouths are black, don’tcha know, barrin’ special circumstances- and the sun, after a burst of speed, started moseying across the sky like nothing had ever happened. Me, freeze up? No sir, not me!

“Brer Fox lit his pipe on the piece of sun he’d bit out, shouldered the bear, an’ slid himself down the rays before they melted. There’s some that say he took a chunk of sunrise home with him in his pocket, which is why sunrises are always a little paltry in the valley of high mountains- who can say for sure? It was so long ago…

“Oh, yis- is now time for more sponsorship,”

“Fuck you, Sabaody!”

“If you’re dumb enough to buy a new boat this weekend, you’re a big enough schmuck to go to Big Bill Hell’s Boats.”

“Bad Deals!”

“Boats that Sink!!”

“Thieves!!!”

“If you think that you’re gonna find a bargain at Big Bill’s, you can bend over and kiss my ass! It’s our belief that you’re such a stupid motherfucker, you’ll fall for this bullshit! Guaranteed!”

“If you find a better deal, SHOVE IT UP YOUR UGLY ASS!! You heard me right, SHOVE IT UP YOUR UGLY ASS!! You dense ugly motherfucker!”

“Bring your trade, bring your title, bring your wife! We’ll fuck her!”

“That’s Right! We’ll fuck your wife! Because-”

“At Big Bill Hell’s, you’re fucked six ways to Sundays!”

“Take a hike to Big Bill Hell’s! Home of Challenge Pissing!”

“That’s right; CHALLENGE PISSING!!!”

“How does it work? If you can piss six feet in the air straight up and not get wet, you get no payment down. Don’t wait, don’t delay!”

“Don’t fuck with us, or we’ll rip your nuts off!”
“Only at Big Bill Hell’s:”
“The only dealer that tells you to fuck right off!”

“Hurry Up, Asshole!”

“This event ends the minute after you write us a fucking check, and it better not bounce or you’re a dead motherfucker.”

“Fucking dead motherfucker.”

“Go to hell!”

“You tell’em who sent you!”

“Big Bill Hell’s Boats: Sabaody filthiest and exclusive home of the meanest sons of bitches—”

“—and the best godsdamn motherfucking boats—”

“—on any fucking side of the motherfucking Grand Line! Guaranteed!”

“Fuck you, Sabaody! FUCK!! YOU!!”

---

“Hi there. I’ve been trying to unclog a toilet for seven fucking hours. That’s longer than it took for me to be born. I could’ve been born twice in the amount of time it’s taken me to fail at unclogging this fucking toilet. -oh, it works now, but… well, I’ll tell you the story.

“M’name’s Mark, if you didn’t know. Shit’s weird.

“So, we’ve got three heads total- yeah, there’s one in the San, one by the Galley, and one dedicated Head and Bathing area. So the toilet clogged, right? You can use your imagination- it’s like the hero’s origin story. We know how it started, show me what happens next.

“So what happened next was, I started to plunge. And plunge. And plunge. And usually, once I’m using the right plunger, I’m pretty good at plunging. I mean, it’s simple, right? It should be one of those simple machines you learn about in school- pulley, crank, lever? Right? And Plunger is like their weird cousin on their dad’s side. Anyway.

“The plunger wasn’t working and I started to ask myself, ‘maybe I’m doing it all wrong. Maybe all those other times were flukes and I have no idea how to use a plunger. Maybe I’m a fraud-’ so, living with an entire shush of librarians must come with some perks, right? Lo and behold, an entire collection of home improvement magazines, articles, and books- so, I searched through them, ‘How to Use a Plunger’. I had to leave the bathroom to do this because, and you might find this hard to believe, I’ve never in my life ever read a book in the bathroom.

“I just stare straight ahead when I’m in there like a crazy person, I guess. I don’t think our books even know what bathrooms are, like how your cat doesn’t know what laundry baskets are actually for, or how our captain doesn’t know what vegetables are, or how I don’t know what the ocean is, I just swim in it.
“So anyway, I was searching for how to use a plunger and I found the right book for that but it was ad-locked and our shush hadn’t gotten the proprietary runes off yet, so’s I had to sit through like, an advertisement first. And this is the wonder that is targeted advertising at work, because before I could read a paragraph about plungers and using them, I had to read a two hundred and twenty word long advertisement for steak. Just like- steak in general; steak as concept.

“Hey, you freak, trapped in the bathroom like a loser. Why aren’t you buying steaks like, right now?’

“Steaks can’t help me. Nothing can,’ I thought, as one does when they’ve been plunging a toilet for three hours straight with no movement. Then the book filled with words and I was able to read the information I wanted. Boy oh boy do I know jackshit about plungers- really? Hell no, I know everything you could ever want to know about plungers, and quite a bit more that you fucking would not.

“For instance- standardized plumbing has been found as early as three thousand BA- that’s three thousand years before the Ages, which is when calendars were invented. If you have a leaky faucet that drips only twice a minute, you’ll waste over a gallon of water in a week. Manhole covers are circular because if they’re turned sideways, they can’t fall through their own holes. Toilet plungers narrow at the bottom to fit into the toilet- you need a good seal to make a plunger work. Shower and sink plungers are flat on the bottom.

“I think a lot of people don’t realize how a plunger is meant to be used. You’re not forcing air down towards a clog. Air is lighter than water, and it won’t break up a waterborne clog, not to mention it’ll cause messy splashing. You’re meant to use a plunger to clear the frog in the bog by creating water pressure.

“Meaning, the most important thing when clearing a toilet clog is to first fill the plunger with water. Not in the sink- I mean you stick the plunger into the toilet and tilt it at an angle, so that you hear air bubbles coming out of the inside of the plunger as it fills with water. Fittingly, this is easiest to do when the toilet is filled to the brim, like when it’s clogged and you try to flush anyway. Don’t do that.

“Still- once you’ve filled the plunger with water, you form a seal at the bottom of the basin with the tapered plunger, and give it maybe a half-dozen short pumps. When you do this correctly, there is no splashing and the clog clears almost immediately.

“I’d been plunging for three hours- nothing. The gist of the supremely unhelpful article I sat through two hundred twenty words about steak was: ‘there’s the stick, there’s the other part, you add the plunge, and it’s a plunger. Can you believe steak bought ad space on this bullshit?’

“Three hours, no movement; some very painful blisters on my hands; the deep seated sense that I’ve forgotten something important. I gave up- or at least, I wanted to. I kind of did for an hour or two. Like, you know how sometimes you can clog a toilet but doesn’t look clogged?

“And you’re like, ‘It looks fine! It looks fine, but I’m its prisoner- let me go, porcelain fiend! I pass the curse on to the next schmuck who unknowingly uses you.’ I walked out into the hallway, and then farther, through the rooms and such until I was in the Studio where Missus Mab was working on some of her mail. Just to get a feel for what the real world used to be like, y’know? And, and I was so done with the toilet, I was in super-denial about the future of all toilet use on the ship.

“We’ll burn that barn when we come to it,’ I thought; gods only know when that’ll be. But also, I felt bad, so I asked Missus Mab her opinion. I didn’t lead with the toilet, even though Missus Mab has no shame and doesn’t get squeamish- I was all like, ‘Hey, sup; so anyway I clogged the Galley toilet and I’ve been trying to fix it for three hours and I’m tired so I’m just going to leave it for the next person to discover isn’t that great and moral and okay for me to do so anyways how are you doing?” She didn’t think it was great.

“She told me to eat more fiber- as in, veggies, even though that’s how we got into this mess, and she told me that since I clogged the toilet it’s my responsibility to fix it- which is what I was going to do anyway, I just didn’t fucking want to. So I got my head right and walked to the supply room and the whole time, alls I could think of was like ‘I can’t get murdered by my double, even if she’s a pint sized annoyance and a half, I can’t let a clogged toilet be the butterfly effect inciting incident catalyst event that ends up with me shot dead in my own big brother-’ and since you’re hearing this now, clearly and obviously I made it. I’ll save dying over a toilet for some other time.

“I got to the supply closet and found what I needed- liquid, um, gel, drainer, whatever- the stuff where on the bottle the clog looks like some golden honey shit like is’ ambrosia, food of the gods, and not literal actual shit. So I got a bottle of that, and a push-pop because it’ll be too hot for ‘em soon and eat’em while you’ve got em, right?

“So I’ve got the stuff and I’m running back to the toilet in a super panicked rush because one, I didn’t leave a note, like, ‘Don’t use this even though it looks fine, please read the toilet’s aura first,’ and two, because the push-pop was melting, those tasty orange bastards melt at a stern glance. So there’s this fucking weird hallway and it never fails to catch someone, there’s like a railing that’s there for safety that always catches someone right in the dick, and a door that’s only just big enough to go sideways through because we have some characters on our crew, alright, and I was in such a blind rush to get through I fucking- I’m blushing with shame, holy fuck, I fucking followed my Double too closely and got caught in the door with her. Like, literally trapped in a space too narrow for my shoulders to clear, and it’s not like either of us was willing to go backwards either- feels unnatural for the both of us.

“She couldn’t even turn around to be like, ‘The fuck!?!?’ and alls I could do was keep going ‘I’m sorry! I’m sorry!’ as we shoved through in a weird, torture-y too close for comfort formation.

“So I got out and fucking ran to avoid the confrontation and I go back to the out of commision head and as I was bursting into the room with the toilet I heard, guess, guess what I heard. Did you guess one of my crewmates flushing the toilet as I was opening the door? Because that’s what it was.

“I’ve spoken to Lynn maybe twice. I said hi, when she joined up about a- jeeze, more than a month ago- and I explained, today, through heavy labored breaths and my own shame, how I clogged the toilet and got drain cleaner to try and fix it before anyone else tried to use it. I literally burst through the bathroom door as she was ankle deep in toilet water and held up the bottle of drain stuff like it was a bottle of expensive wine I had just pulled out of a paper bag.

“She screamed, and fell over. I told her everything as she was lying there, in the shit-water, babbling like an idiot, holding the bottle of drain cleaner up like ‘Let’s celebrate today! What do you mean you’re going to take a shower outside?’

“So, yeah, I was back in the ring with the toilet but now I had a piece of broken glass hidden in my glove. I started to read the instructions on the back of the bottle of drain stuff and it said something like, ‘in case of ingestion, do not induce vomiting, drink a glass of water or milk ’- which, I mean, I’m sure makes sense. Milk is like, basic or acidic or neutral or something like that, but it just sounds so… culinary. ‘For a creamier poison control, use warm milk instead of water,’ like, is that what you use to neutralize poison when you’ve done something stupid on a dare? Really? Treat yo’self, I guess.

“So, hour five, lunch, steak sandwich- I had a craving I guess- ice cream is eaten and the toilet is still clogged. Lynn’s still taking her epic shower- like, three hours minimum- and there’s a special recycling system that she can turn on so she doesn’t waste water. The drain stuff hasn’t worked. The tank just keeps filling up and I only turned off the water when I realized I’d need to use… more aggressive measures.

“I got the snake. I don’t know if you’ve ever seen a serious plumbing snake, but the big ones are a sight to behold. This isn’t a little hand-crank auger, it’s a full on engine-powered snake with three hundred-sixty degrees of thrash-action an’ a little grabbin’ claw at the end. We have one in the supply closet- because, um, there are a lot of us and the toilets… Anyway, I fire that puppy up and send the long metal coils down into the pipes with the claw closed, figuring that I’d just bump the clog a bit and push it down the pipes until it clears- but that didn’t happen.

“I was fuckin’ done, y’all- so done, so furious, so frustrated- I twisted the control to open the mechanical claw at the end of the coil, closed it on something, and threw the motor in reverse to pull it back up.

“At this point, Deb, our sous-chef, Mince, the grill-guy, Oz, the sauce guy, and Linus, the dishwasher, are all watching me work on the toilet. Large machinery draws kids like shit does flies- and we’re all trying to figure out what the hell got flushed down the toilet that this giant machine couldn’t remove. My shits are big, but not that big.

“The motor was really straining- so loud I was actually a bit worried, because we could’a been attacked by Marines or whatever, and I wouldn’t’a heard it. The whole machine was shaking to pull whatever it’d got back up through the pipes and into the room. Finally, after an extended wait, the object is slowly dragged- sopping wet and crumpled- out of the toilet bowl.

“It was a shower curtain.

“Specifically, it was a shower curtain covered in brightly colored fish. I’d seen it before. I walked past the damn thing every godsdamn day.

“It was, quite specifically, Lynn’s shower curtain.

“We are all, of course, dumbfounded. We- me especially- are trying to figure out how this could have happened. It would be weird enough if someone had taken Lynn’s shower curtain and flushed it, but so far as I knew Lynn’s shower curtain was still there- Lynn, herself, was making use of it currently, in one of her epic showers. Seriously, they can be three hours long.

“It would be even weirder if someone had gone to the Studio, gotten the spare, and flushed that- but no, I’d seen the spare on it’s shelf, neatly labeled, when I went down to talk with Mab. Did- did someone try to steal the shower curtain, actually steal it, then feel guilty and come back only to find that the curtain had already been replaced, and flush the stolen curtain in a futile attempt to hide the evidence of their misdeed?

“Actually, the truth is stupider, and much stranger. While the Cool Kids were debating with each other, Lynn burst in, buck naked and hysterical and dripping wet, into the galley. After Deb got her a towel, and the boys put the various Sanji’s that burst a vessel into the recovery position, we all took a turn at calming her down enough to figure out the problem.

“The snake missed the clog entirely. Rather than spiraling down into the plumbing as was intended, it wound its way up into the central line, and then up again through the pipes into the outdoor shower. It spiraled its way up, out the shower drain, and then started flailing wildly around the shower like a deep-sea horror made of steel, knocking things off of shelves and clattering furiously across the title.
“Then, while Lynn, naked and soapy from her shower, watched in horror, a metal claw opened on the end of the snake, snagged her shower curtain, ripped it off the bar ring-by-ring, spun it around until it was tightly coiled around the cable, and dragged it back down into the drain.

“The toilet works, now, by the way. I don’t know what the clog was.

“Anyway, that’s what I did today. Here’s another sponsor,”

“Life got you down?

“Things are pretty tough, aren’t they?

“Well, don’t just sit there! Buy Stuff!

“Millions of people World wide struggle with depression. Studies say that shopping can help fill that big, empty hole inside of you; lifting you out of your own, personal darkness for just a little bit longer. And what better way than by Buying Stuff?!?

“Remember to buy from brands that you trust, and be sure to fill your life with lots and lots of Stuff!

“But- what if Stuff’s not enough? You’ve tried it before, gods know you have- but nothing seems to really fill that empty hole inside you, just makes it bigger and deeper and your house is full of stuff you will never, ever need and-

“Take a deep breath. I’ve got just the thing for you- if you feel tired, are often upset; occasionally suffer from chronic confusion, you should try new and improved Catharsis!

“Catharsis works directly on the root of your problems, providing a clean, painful, healing break from what ails you.

“For instant relief from intolerable situations: Catharsis. Now in liquid form! Ask your homebrew pharmacist about Liquid Catharsis.

“And if all that doesn’t work- there’s always good old fashioned blood letting! Not that unhygienic crapola, with the knives and the tourniquets- no sir! Only the finest medicinal leeches ought be used in blood letting! I, myself, have a healthy supply of them- and a cuter suckle of leeches there has never been, I tell you what-“Leeches! Reduce bruises and swelling! Lower bad cholesterol and raise overall blood cell count! The benefits of good, fresh blood in your veins is not to be underestimated- use the finest Medicinal Leeches to get new blood in you!

“Out with the old- in with the new! Leeches, that’s the cure for you! -provided, of course, buying Stuff and using Catharsis don’t work.

“I’m sure we’ll find a way to fix you right up.”
“I wandered, lost in all ways a man can be lost and yet remain alive, for many years upon the death of my first wife. I have Mink blood in my line, and so I have the striping of a tiger on my skin; though my clothing covers these markings now, in the years following my first wife’s death, grief made a monster of me. I was not a man; nor was I a Mink; I was… less. The loss of love, love that I had neither looked for nor earned, made a monster of me.

“I fled our home that had once held so much joy- such love- and hid away in the mountains. In those mountains I came upon a cave, clean and dry and worth protecting- and so I did. That cave was my home for many years.

“Below my cave there was a path, leading down into a peaceful valley. A great forest bracketed it, and there came to be a young woodcutter who would climb the path every day. He would cut firewood to sell, I suppose, and in the late afternoon he would gather what he had cut and tied into bundles, and every morning, well after dawn, he would return again. He was a poor man, but his face was kind, and he smiled and sang, a little, as he worked; I think, that, more than anything else… that happiness of his, the joy he found in life, though he was so poor, and his work so hard… I hated him for it.

“I hated him, and I was content to hate him from afar- but eventually, he ventured too close to me, my madness… I killed that young man, and I do not know why, other than my own hate, my grief-madness… I killed him, and let his body be eaten by wild creatures, his bones scattered, his clothing torn. The worst of it all, of course, is that I was not made happy by his death- for, truly, in those days, nothing could please me at all.

“That day, that I killed that young man- Junpei, his name was- the evening stretched long and my rage, my hate, my self disgust… I do not know what I did during that time, and I am glad, and yet afraid, that I cannot recall it to my mind.

“I heard, echoing up from the valley, a wavering cry of ‘Brother! Brother!’ It rang out long into the night, and only ceased upon the rising of the moon. That same day, a sheep herder came, and found the scattered bones, the spilled blood, the torn clothing and- just a glimpse, but- he found me, too. Or, then- what was left of me. Frightened- I frightened him. The shepherd returned to the valley below, taking with him a few scraps of clothing that were embroidered with white and black thread, the fineness of the stitching marred by blood.

“The next, I speak from my wife’s perspective; as she was the one to bring these events to pass, it is only right I speak of her involvement with them. My wife was attacked by a rooster as a young girl, and though her face was of a great beauty, the limp that rooster gave her ruined all prospects for a suitable marriage-match. She could not stand, or sit, for long; her walking was slow, and great pain would wrack her body should her lamed leg be overworked- for days and days, she would be in agony. The woodcutter, Junpei, that I had killed for the great ‘crime’ of being happy with his life where I could do nothing but hate- he was her younger brother, and he had been caring for her all their lives, since their older sister’s mother-in-law had thrown them both out for being… well.

“No one is without worth. It is not always easy to see a person’s merits- but they do exist, no matter where they have risen, or to what depths they have fallen. Mei’s strengths are not of the body; but, like so many others before her, when her body failed her, her mind set her free. Junpei was the one who brought a little money to their household, every day- but Mei was the one who helped women from other households double check their finances, to ensure they were not being cheated, and Mei was the one who kept track of every marriage, birth, and death in their small village, and Mei was the one who knew every use of every tea, spice, bitter herb, and animal part one could name.

“And, of the two- Mei is the one who saved me.
When her brother did not return from cutting wood, Mei knew that something was wrong. She called for him, all that long night the first day, until her voice gave out and she could taste blood on the back of her tongue. Fitfully, she slept; and when morning came, she dressed herself in what few clothes she had that were suitable for hard use, and gathered her ill-fitting crutch- as her brother was only a wood-cutter, not a wood-carver- and limped, painfully and slow, to the house of her landlord. Perhaps, she thought then, if she told them of her trouble, her fear, they could be persuaded to go and look for her brother.

“They could not, alas, be persuaded. However, a passing shepherd- the very one that had found the poor remains left by my madness- he told Mei what he had seen, and she, recognizing scraps of clothing she herself had embroidered, that the shepherd had brought down the mountain with him- a kind of madness overtook her for a time, and she could not move, could not think, could not speak. The shepherd was a kind man, and that day he had of his sons with him- he sent his sons ahead with the flock, and escorted Mei back to her home, and he stayed with her until she spoke again, ere the sun was highest in the sky.

“What killed my brother? Do you know?’ she said.

“The shephard was a kind man; but his life left no room for pretty lies or unneeded kindnesses. He told her what he knew.

“There are many wild beasts in the mountains,’ he said, solemnly, quietly, ‘And your brother was killed by one. It was a horror to find, miss; when I had walked half-way up the slope to the mountain, I come to a sad thing; a little pile of torn clothing and scattered bones, all splattered with blood. The axe of a wood-cutter was lying by the side of the path; and his carrying pole, and some rope, and bundles of cut wood. There could be no mistake- your ill-fated brother was killed by a tiger, or, as I suspect, a tiger shaped like a man.

“I gathered up what I could of the torn garments, and as I was doing so, I saw, unmistakably, the eyes of a man staring down at me from between the trees. There is a cave, higher up the slope; perhaps some lost soul has made a home there. Though I know not what quarrel the tiger found with your brother, it is obvious your brother fared the poorer for it; I gathered what scraps of his clothing remained, his pole and his rope and his axe, and took them home with me. My wife washed what blood she could from them all- but the clothing is as it is, and the axe…’

“I will have need of my brother’s axe, sir. Will you fetch it for me?’ she said.

“For what will you use it for, miss?’ he said.

“My brother was murdered, sir; I must go to the city at the river’s mouth, and beg a magistrate there to arrest the tiger who killed my brother. It is dangerous to travel alone, without any sort of weapon- thus, my brother’s axe.’ she said.

“The shepherd could not convince her of any other path- and so, reluctantly, he fetched the axe from his house, and when his wife heard the reason why, a few other things too. He returned to Mei laden with more than just her brother’s axe; but with a horse, and cart, and the cart was laden with many things. Mei and her brother were not wealthy- but the shepherd, and his wife and sons, were; and so, though Mei protested, she was forced to accept the gift of horse and cart, and provisions for her many-week long journey, a new crutch- both well made and well fitting; a map, and a bit of money, and clothing that would make her look more a youth than a maid, no matter how fair her face.

“The following day, Mei closed up her little house, and ended the contract with her landlord- and, thus freed of all responsibilities to her village, she set out, cart and horse and provision and all, for the city at the river mouth. It was pitiful to see her, so feeble, so frail, so alone- she could not sit in the cart for longer than two hours at a time, at first, and could not lead the horse and cart faster than her limp would allow- and so, it took two long weeks for the both of them to get beyond the villages sight.

“It was eight long months, at a painful limp, to get from her village to the city at the river’s mouth- and yet, Mei did make that journey. She eventually made it to the city- and I doubt she realized it, but her beauty had only been refined during the journey. Her long hours of strain had strengthened her body; her back was straight and long, her hair dark as ink, her eyes bright and sharp and sparrow-brown. Color had found her at last- for, when her brother still lived, she was pale as paper, twice as thin; but now, ah, life had sunken teeth into her, would not let her go.

“Her bad leg troubled her as it always had- but less so, now, than ever before. It seemed that in strengthening the whole of her body, the ferocity of the injury done to her weaker leg faded and lessened- but it would never truly leave her. The axe, once used to cut down wood for a small family’s survival, had become a protector- used to cut down bandits who would take what was not theirs to take, and to cut down animals that refused to keep the peace of the road. Two heads, does that axe bear; one, for rough work, and the other, for fine. Her mind, once concerned only with numbers and facts and keeping her small family alive- it had been exposed to a small portion of the world, and now thirsted for more, and yet, and yet- the tiger! Her brother!

“And so she went into the city, and asked her way to the public hall where crimes were reported, and justice- one would hope- could be found. Alas, the guards of that place saw her, her limp, her axe, her cart and horse and weariness- and overlooked the grief-madness in her eyes and the beauty of her face- and would not let her in.

“She collapsed, there on the stone steps leading into the Hall of Justice- and wept she, moaning of her long journey and grieving her poor murdered brother and the ill-fortune that she should come all this way, lame as she was, and be denied so close to her goal. It so happened that a magistrate was walking into his work; and, hearing poor Mei bemoaning her ill-fortune, he demanded she be brought before him, that her case may be heard and tried.

“Mei, hearing the magistrate’s declaration, calmed herself as best she could, and stood again. Hobbling with her axe on her back and her beautiful face made a ruin with grief and her well-fitted crutch thumping into the beautifully tiled floor, she entered the great Hall of Trials.

“What is the matter, young woman? Why do you raise such an uproar in front of this great hall? Speak quickly, and tell me of your trouble.’ said the magistrate.

“I am young and ignorant of the world,’ she began; ‘Lame I am, and only just strong enough to defend myself against robbers and wild beasts of the road. I have no money, and no way of earning money but those options which all women have, though stain my honor it surely would. I have not one relative now in all the world, nor a kindly friend, who would take me in. I depended on my only brother for daily living; for, though I took in some work- mending, washing, healing, financial advice- our village is small, and such work comes rarely. Every day, my brother would climb the mountain, for he was a woodcutter; and every evening he came home again, carrying enough wood to sell before the dawn would come. It was his work alone that kept us in enough money for food every day; the money I earned was spent on our rent, our clothing, and medicines should we take ill. Alas, eight months ago, he went to the mountain and did not return. A mountain tiger bearing the shape of a man killed him, and perhaps ate him; and now, alas, there is no hope- for the horse and cart were given to me, and by the custom of our land I must make a gift of them, to assure my own happiness in the lands beyond.’

“She did not speak, overcome then by horror and grief, mingling as they so often do- but then, she spoke again. It is said, of her, that never was she more beautiful; well, perhaps more so upon her wedding day, and again with the birth of her son, but as those had yet to come to pass, this was the moment of her greatest beauty.
“I shall die of hunger,’ she said, her voice the ringing of a funeral bell, ‘but before I die, I shall see justice done. I have come into this great hall today, to beg, your honor; I beg that the slayer of my brother is punished. Is it not so, that none may shed the blood of another without giving their own blood in payment?’

“Woman, have you taken leave of your senses?’ cried the magistrate, weeping, ‘A tiger in the shape of a man- how can such a thing exist? How can a tiger be brought to justice- how can a man become a tiger? There is nothing I can do.’

“The magistrate’s tears were of no use. Mei, weeping and beautiful and crippled with grief, kept up her clamour. She had come all this way to see justice done; she would not be turned away now, not without seeing her purpose realized. The hall echoed with the noise of her. The magistrate, overcome with compassion, could deny her no longer. ‘Hold! Miss,’ he begged, ‘cease your weeping. I will do what you have asked. My assistant shall show you to a teacher, learned in medicine and other arts; a friend of mine. This letter, bearing my seal, shall ensure my friend takes you on as an apprentice. Thus, even should I perish in the attempt at your justice, you need not starve. I shall summon you to court once the slayer of your brother is caught and ready for punishment; until that time, wait, and fill yourself with life again.’

“The magistrate was, of course, only trying to appease the grief-maddened Mei, thinking that if she were only engaged in some useful trade, he could give orders not to let her into the hall again. And, in giving her some useful trade, she would perhaps forget what had driven her across the land on a bad leg, with only her brother’s woodcutting axe to guard her and only the river itself to guide her. The magistrate was not a bad man, it must be said; he was not a bad man. Merely an ignorant one- he had not loved another in the way that I, or Mei, had loved; and, though he had lost the ones he loved before, he was not so old that the loss had grown huge and horrible. When people leave our lives, their exits are not equal; but the depth and breadth of what we long to share with those who leave us… that, I am sorry to say, only grows larger and more painful with time.

“Mei was too sharp, even in her grief, for the magistrate’s trickery. She saw through his plan, kind though it was, and became more stubborn and adamant than ever.

“Your kindness is great, sir; but I cannot accept it until I have seen you sign the order for the Tiger in Man’s Shape to be caught and brought into this judgement hall,’ she said.

“Reluctantly- as the magistrate was not really a bad man- but eventually, he humored Mei’s plea for justice. Then and there, he wrote the order, and signed it, and sealed it with his own seal; and turning to the assistance in the courtroom, he asked of them who would be willing to go and make the arrest.

“One of these, a man named Jet- known for his symbol, the Mouse- had been leaning against the wall, half asleep. He had won for one of the only times in his life at the turtle races the day before, and drunk so heavily in his joy that, until that very moment, he was still sleeping off the effects of the alcohol. He had not heard what had been going on in the court that day; and he would not have agreed to do it otherwise.

“Just as the magistrate turned and asked for volunteers to make the impossible arrest, one of his friends, a woman named Li- known for her symbol, the Snake- gave him a poke in the ribs. Thinking the magistrate had called him by name, he stepped forwards and bowed, saying, ‘I, Jet the Mouse, shall go and do the will of Your Honor.’

“Very well; you will do for this purpose,’ answered the judge. ‘Here is your order; go forth, and do your duty.’ So saying, the magistrate handed the warrant for my arrest to Jet the mouse. Mei, seeing all of this, was satisfied; she sat quietly as the magistrate wrote a letter of introduction to his friend, a doctor- and when he called Li the Snake forwards, to escort Mei to the doctor and see that she and letter both were greeted and taken in with all hospitality, Mei and Li and letter all left that hall, quietly.

“When Jet the Mouse went outside the courtroom, his other friends crowded around him. ‘Drunken fool!’ they laughed; ‘Do you know what you’ve done?’

‘Jet shook his head. ‘Just a little business for the magistrate, isn’t it? Quite easy.’

‘Call it easy, do you? Fool of a drunkard- arrest a tiger, a man eating tiger and bring him to the city?! Ha! Better go and say goodbye to your father and mother; they will never see you again. Best settle what debts you have; you will not return.’

‘Jet the Mouse was still drunk at this time, and so he slept again; but, when he woke and read the order the magistrate had given him, he saw that his friends were right. He had been very foolish- but surely the magistrate did not mean for him to arrest a tiger, man’s shape or no! It was surely a joke; certainly, no such order had ever been written before. It was plain that the magistrate had hit on this plan simply to get rid of the wailing woman; and had not his friend Li the Snake taken her to a doctor for teaching?

‘Jet the Mouse took the warrant back to the judgement hall and told the magistrate that the tiger could not be found.

‘The magistrate was unmoved. ‘Cannot be found? Why say you this? You agreed to arrest this tiger; why should you try to escape your promise now? I can by no means permit this; I have given my word, as have you- see there, both our seals. You will satisfy the woman’s cry for justice; you will satisfy my order.’

‘Jet bowed low, and beat his head upon the floor. ‘I was drunk, Your Honor,’ he cried, ‘when I game my promise. I can catch a man, but not a tiger; I know nothing of such matters. Still, if it is your order, I will go into the hills where the river is born into this world and hire what hunters I can find to help me.’

‘Very well; it makes no difference how you catch him, so long as you bring him into this court alive. If you fail in your duty, there is nothing left but to beat you until you succeed. Mai-! Draw up a will and testament for Jet, and see that it is filed properly. Should he perish in his duties, his parents deserve that much. Jet the Mouse; I, the Honorable Magistrate of this Hall, give you five years to see your duty done.’

‘Yes, Your Honor,’ cried Mai, known as the Monkey; ‘It will be done at once!’

‘Yes, Your Honor,’ cried Jet the Mouse; ‘It will be done at once!’

“And so there was no help for it; Jet the Mouse filed his paperwork, gathered supplies for the journey, and set off for where the river was born. Mei, instigator of Jet’s coming road of trials, took eight long months to travel down the river; Jet took a mere four.

“Upon his arrival at the small village of which Mei had spoken of, he was shown to Mei’s old house- for the village was so small, it was easier to simply give the magistrate’s assistant a house than try to find him accommodations in another’s abode. Mei’s old landlord enlisted his wife to cook and clean for Jet; and, once his business was made plain, the landlord himself escorted Jet to the shepard’s house.

“The shepard explained all that he knew to Jet; and soon, Jet was filled with a kind of relief, because he had not been sent to catch a tiger after all, but a tiger in man’s shape- and magic being what it is, if it bears the shape of a man, it is, more than likely, a man. Jet the Mouse was good at catching men; he had become a magistrate’s assistant for just such a reason.

“During the next four years, Jet left no stone unturned in trying to find the guilty tiger—me, you understand. The best hunters in the land were employed. Night and day they searched the hills, hiding in mountain caves and in tall trees and atop great stones, watching and waiting and finding—nothing.

“I had left that area on one of my few useful tasks; though I lived a life alone, I had not forgotten myself so far as to forget the needful things of life. One such thing was salt; and so, I had crossed to the other side of the mountains, and through the grassy plains there, and made my way to the great sea. It was a year’s journey there and back; and I spent two years engaged in boiling away seawater, creating a vast amount of salt. Even a tiger-man needs money, I suppose; my clothing was nearly worn through, my only comb had broken… I had need, and so I worked, and was paid for my work.

“By the fifth year, Jet the Mouse had all but given in to despair; and I had returned to my high mountain cave. At this time, all the hunters had given up their search in disgust and gone back to their homes in the valley. Thus, Jet’s lament— for even with the help of the hunters, he could not catch the tiger; without them, he had no hope at all. So came the end of winter; and as the new year approached, Jet faced down the spectre of his own failure, and with it, his death.

“The magistrate was not a bad man; but he was heavy handed. Many an assistant had, in their failure to complete their orders, been beaten to death by the magistrate. And so, Jet entered a mountain temple to pray; tears rained down his cheeks as he knelt before the fierce deity. ‘Alas! I am a fool and a dead man!’ he moaned to the deity, ‘A dead man, for now there is no hope at all. Alas! That I had ever gambled; would that I had never touched a drop of wine!’

“Just then, he heard a slight rustling; just then, I was passing by on my way to the river’s birth, and heard a person weeping. I stood at the gate of the temple and looked within; and Jet looked up and out and saw a huge tiger-man standing there.

“Jet was no longer afraid of tigers. He knew there was only one way to save himself. ‘Ah,’ he said, looking me straight in the eye, ‘you have come to kill me, perhaps eat me, have you? Well, I fear you would find my flesh quite tough, since I have been hunting you for almost five years. You are the same fellow that killed that woodman five years ago, aren’t you? This woodman was an only brother, the sole support to his sister. Now that poor woman has reported you to the magistrate, who, in turn, has had a warrant drawn up for your arrest. I have been sent out to find you and lead you to trial. For some reason or other you have acted the coward, and remained in hiding. This has been the cause of my despair. Now, I shall suffer no longer as result of your murder; you shall come with me to the city at the mouth of the river, and answer the charge of killing the woodman.’

“All the time Jet was speaking, I listened closely. Though I had not meant to allow it, my time by the Sea, working an honest man’s trade—poor though it is—had smoothed rough things in me, cooled my great temper, and eased the grief that sought to choke all the good from me. When Jet the Mouse fell silent, I made no effort to escape; I nodded, and spoke.

“I, Kin’emon the Tiger, have done the crime of which you speak; and so, I, Kin’emon, shall be taken to the city at the river’s mouth to face judgement.’ I said these words; I meant them; I would not take them back, even now.

“I bent my head forwards and let Jet slip a strong chain over it; and then I followed the magistrate’s assistant quietly down the mountain.

“A boat had been readied a few villages away, in preparation for my capture; and now, I dutifully followed the man to that village, and onto that boat. We arrived in the city within a week’s time, as the river grows faster the farther one gets from the mountain.

“I followed Jet through the crowded streets of the city, into the court room. All along the way there was great excitement; ‘The man killing Tiger has been caught,’ shouted person after person. ‘He is being led to trial by Jet the Mouse!’

“The crowd followed us into the hall of justice. When the magistrate walked in, every one of them became as quiet as the grave. All were filled with wonder, I suppose, at the strange sight of a tiger being called before a judge.

“I took great pains to appear unafraid of those who were watching so curiously- the magistrate, his assistants, the crowd… Mei. I sat myself down in front of the magistrate, for all the world like an ordinary man. The magistrate rapped on the table as a signal that all was ready for the trial.

“Mei, in the five years of her study, had blossomed further- from a fragile bud, to a hesitant blossom, to a full bloom. Her patients reported only the best of her; her medicines and advice was always well received. She had become a notary, and a taxidermist also; she had learned to read and write even more, learned calligraphy and of the sword, could sing and play the flute and a thousand other things women learn to do, in time. She had even gained a name of her own- Mei, the Sparrow; and so, when Jet sailed into the city with me in chains, the magistrate called her to the hall at once. So it was that I beheld, for the first time, the one who I had so wronged.

“She was beautiful, Momosonosuke. Your mother was the most beautiful woman I had ever seen.

“Tiger,’ said the Magistrate, staring down at me, ‘Did you eat the woodman with whom you are charged with murdering?’

“I did not eat him, though I did kill the man of which you speak.’ I said.

“Mei sat quietly, staring at me with an expression I could not read- was it pity? Was it rage? I did not know.

“A life for a life is the law of the land,’ continued the magistrate, paying no attention to the forlorn woman, but looking me directly in the eye. ‘Did you know it?’

“I shook my head; I had not known that.

“You robbed a helpless woman of her only brother; the only one who would support her.’ said the magistrate, eyes sad and resolute. ‘She had no one else. She wept in these halls five years ago; begged me for justice, before she starved. She has not starved; nor will she, for I am not a cruel man, and I did not leave her to die. You must be punished for your crime; the law must be enforced… and yet, I see by your bearing, your hair and clothing, that you have suffered a grief as great as hers. It was grief that sent her to me; it was grief that made you slay her brother. It is a kind of madness that overtook you; and, though the law demands a life for a life, madmen are given more mercy than most. Do you understand?’

“I nodded, then, though I did not really understand.

“The law is the law; and you were a madman then. Tell me, Tiger: do you regret your actions, that day? Would you give your life, in place of the man whose life you stole in your madness?’ said the magistrate, staring down at me.

“I, Kin’emon the Tiger, would do so. I was not myself, then; and for no reason did I kill her brother, other than he was happy, and I was not.’ I said, bowed low.
“Very well,’ said the judge. ‘If you, Kin’emon the Tiger, can promise to take the place of Mei the Sparrow’s brother and support her all her life as her brother would have done, I am quite willing to spare you from a disgraceful death. What say you, will you accept my offer?’

“I stared up at the magistrate. I’m quite sure my confusion and thoughts were on my face- but I could not help it. ‘I have but two objections, Your Honor, though it pains me to say it.’ I said.

“Speak them, Tiger- though know that my offer will remain as it is.’ said the magistrate.

“Your Honor- it is unseemly for a man unrelated to a woman to live with her as you have asked of me, and he is not her husband.’ I said.

“I know this quite well, Tiger; thus, you shall be married to Mei the Sparrow immediately.’ said the magistrate.

“Your Honor- though surely marriage would end what unseemly business could lay between us, is it really right to ask a woman whose brother I murdered to marry me? Should not she have a say in whom her husband is to be? She is a doctor, a learned woman- surely, there are better men for her to be wed to than one such as I.’ I said.

“Marriage was her idea, Kin’emon the Tiger. Do not think that the five years spent on your capture were idle ones; many a wheel has turned in the time between Jet the Mouse’s setting out for your capture, and your presence here in this hall. If you refuse to marry her, you will be put to a disgraceful death; if you marry her, perhaps you will come to live an honorable life. The choice is yours alone, now.’ said the magistrate.

“I stared at the magistrate; and then, almost beyond my will, my eyes sought out the woman I had so wronged. Mei the Sparrow was, and remains, the most beautiful woman I have ever had the pleasure of keeping company with. Her eyes, that day, shone with compassion and tears.

“Though I do not deserve this mercy,’ I said, quietly in the grave silent hall, ‘I accept Your Honor’s offer. I, Kin’emon the Tiger, will marry Mei the Sparrow.’

“The crowd, who had gaped wider and wider as the proceedings proceeded, gasped at my answer.

“Very well, then; guards, free him. Li, Mai, and Jet shall draw up the marriage contract, and see it signed and filed; once they have done so, you and your new wife are both free to return to your home in the mountains, or make your home in the city here- only, of course, you must abide by the laws and rules such that all married couples must abide by.

“The chains were taken from my neck, and I was led silently out of the hall, through a small door to one side, where I was met by the two assistant magistrates the head magistrate had named, and Mei. We were married within the hour- in all ways such- and led from the hall with no more or less haste than such things demand.

“I was deeply confused; but, no longer alone. And so, I asked my wife, Mei, what we should do.

“Whatever do you mean?’ she said.

“Are we to live in the mountains, or the country, or here in the city? For- though we are now wed, we must return home, and on no account appear before the magistrate again, save for those happy occasions when all married couples appear before magistrates.’ I said.

“Ah.’ she said. She hummed a moment, and then she turned to me and smiled.
“We shall stay here, for a time; it is a long journey to the mountains, and my leg is not good. We will need money, and other sundries, before we can make the journey; I have work here, well paying, and perhaps the company of others will do you good. I shall work, and save what money I can; you shall recover further from your madness. And then, yes, I think- I think we shall go home again.’ she said.

“This city is not your home?’ I said.

“No; it is not.’ she said.

“And nothing more of it was said between us, though we spoke more. Six years passed, and we settled into our new shapes- husband, and wife. For me, it was a shape I had worried I had grown too twisted to fit; for her, it was a shape entirely new. And yet, for six years, we settled, and meshed, and became what the magistrate had known, somehow, we would- a pair.

“There were many who assumed that I would kill Mei, or she me- or certainly, we would beg to be separated again. But we did not; they were mistaken. I became a medicine gatherer, for I knew where and when to find the best of the things your mother used to ply her trade; and meat, and skins, and spices I brought back to her too. We became very wealthy, in time; and we spoke more and more of returning to our home in the mountains.

“City life didn’t really agree with either of us, you see- the noise, the stench, the press of so many people around us both. We both knew we would not be so happy in our homely mountain village- hers, really- but perhaps a smaller town, along the river?

“In time, we both saw that, though the marriage was Mei’s idea, the magistrate’s choice to enforce it was truly wise. Mei stopped grieving her dead brother, as much as she could, and began to love the handsome man that had come to take his place so willingly. I let go of my first wife, and the memory of her love allowed me to love again- this one was saved from hating by love. Never forget the power of love.

“Then, one day, quite out of the blue, your mother grew round with you. The pregnancy itself was like any other; but your birth… something went very wrong, and you took a part of Mei’s womb with you, when you entered this world. Thus, she can no longer bear children at all- you, Momonosuke, are your mother’s only child, the only child of her womb.

“Nearing the sixth year of your life, my son, we decided to move as we had intended; the city on the river’s mouth had grown more dangerous over time, and we did not want you to grow up in such a fearful place. We had packed our things, and were readying ourselves for passage on a boat that would take us up river, when those strangers came.

“They took you; and when your mother told me of what had come to pass, I swore that I would retrieve you or die trying. I am not dead; nor are you, though we feared it. Two years, it has been; you are eight years old, taller than I could have dreamed you being, but my son you yet remain.

“Will you not speak? Have they taken even the scorn of my son from me?’

“No- Father, Father, no! I am only- I had forgotten. I forgot my name, and my face, and my home- near a park of maple trees it was, and in the autumn it would light with leaves of fire… Father, Father- Dad!”

There’s a sound like someone being hit in the chest. Silence; the softest sounds of sobbing. A low voice murmurs soothingly.

“My son, my son- Momonosuke, my son-!”

“Father-!”

This babble continues for quite some time, until all is quiet. The only sound seems to be the soft rustling of grass, and the wet slap of waves on the hull of a ship. The sound of a grown man sobbing and shouting 'suuuuupaaaaaaaaah!' as other people, also sobbing, do their best to shush him, echoes in the distance.

“Father… do you suppose mother would let my brother and sisters stay? I know they are not kin to me by blood, of course, but… in bond, they are my kin, and I would see them cared for.”

“Name them, and they shall be my children as you are my son.”

“Um… there’s Chocho, Kameyo, Tsururu - she’s the one with the fluffy coat.”

“I see her, yes.”

“Then there’s Gameyo, Ayame, Maneki’emon - he’s the only boy other than me.”

“You did say one brother and the rest are sisters…”

“Right, well… Ai and Jun are twins; Orihime had wings from the start; and Kaguya’s really nice.”

“…Even though she only scowls?”

“She reminded me of you- and I was right to make the connection! The two of you are exactly alike!”

“Hmph. Well, I, Kin’emon, can say with surety, my son- though I left your mother in search of one child, I have found a total of ten. She will be positively overjoyed at the bounty, I am sure; I certainly am.”

“Even though you do not smile?”

“Even though.”

“Hello, listeners; I told you I would return. This is Mab Morgan. I come to you now with a final update on our weather conditions.

“The current conditions are foggy, with strange shards of rainbow light dancing over bits and pieces of the ship; the wind feels like it’s still, but we’re sailing, so it isn’t actually still. We have been sailing for what seems to be less than an hour, and yet must be more- certainly, the stories you heard took more than a single hour to tell, and yet, our clocks still show no such advancement to their faces.

“Nami told me, during moments of lucidity between harrowing storms of grief, that we are sailing in spirals- that the Rainbow Mist is acting very much like the Sky Sea we sailed through once, and that we, inside it, are not quite sailing in circles. Spiraling through the Rainbow Mist, our time and space have somehow drifted- split- from our original ones, thus leading to the strange meeting of our many similar selves.

“I… it's odd, but I have no double to meet. Or rather, if you know my name- the titles attached to me through deed and error and malice and ignorance, it is perhaps not so strange that I have no double self- no similar being to meet. You see, a few years ago, I killed my double. The circumstances are as they are- and I was punished for it. And now- I have no double to meet.

“Except, of course, I didn't meet my double; I met the double of the one I killed. His name is Tatiana; he has long red hair, and a nose like the prow of a ship, and his lipstain is blue-green- turquoise, I suppose is the proper name of the color.

“We are the same height, weight, and age; indeed, the only visual differences between us are as follows: he wears round rimmed glasses, while mine are square; and he uses a labrys, while I use a spear.

“We met just before the speaking of the April Monologues; I saw him at the edge of my vision, faded and misty, half-colored; like a wash of pigment over ink in too-bright light, could hardly see him at all. The mist was thick and we were moving fast through it, but it does not sting the skin; hardly feels of anything at all, can barely tell you're moving but by the sensation in your gut of speed, ever more speed- when the mist touched my skin, I could hardly feel it.

“I could hardly feel a thing; the past was a fiction I'd made in my head and all consequences were choices made long ago.

“I saw colors and shapes instead of the familiar trappings of my home; a bright confirmation of life wrenched itself out of my lungs towards the mist-veiled sun before I fell to my knees, gasping and screaming, 'No! Not you! Not you!' in unison with my double-double.

“We stood, then, and beheld each other- and in an instant, I knew who he was, and he, I. It was my brother- the double of my brother, as I had not seen him for at least a decade.

“We talked, awkwardly- neither of us really knowing what to feel, how to express it, what do you even say to the cracked black mirror of someone you killed in cold blood-”

“My double-double is married! Can you even imagine how bizarre that is? She looked past her own fury long enough to grow- she grew! The sister I knew was a hedonist, a woman who demanded the finest things in life and reveled in them.

“Her cruelty and brutality were only matched by her genius; the Scourge of the Sky, they called her, and rightfully so. And yet, here and now, her double is… happy! And I’m… not! Hahaha, isn’t that just, like, the best?

“I got so fed up with her bullshit- her schemes, her wheels within wheels, her long long grips… I killed her. I admit it; I killed my sister in cold blood. The inciting incident that lead to that decision… well, it’s in the newspapers, if you want to look it up. I’d rather put it behind me- as much as such a thing can be put, hahaha. It’s only now, meeting her double, that I can understand why I got so fed up with her shit. I was really just fed up with my own shit.

“How wonderful it was, to have my own horrendous personality reflected from every facet of my dear sister, all the time, every day, reminding me what it must have been like for other people to be around me, to talk to me… Or constantly having all the consequences and fuckups resulting from my own batshit thought processes amplified because there’s another version of me running around, dangerously overzealous, with money to burn and a point to prove; believing all the while, just as mistakenly as my own broken self, that they are operating in their own best interests. So what if I helped you? I helped myself, too: twice!

“Hahahaha! I’m not sure I can really convey how fucking sick I was of myself. I completely wore out my patience where my own identity was concerned; I all but drowned in my own dismal persona. I felt totally surrounded by it, inside and out; I couldn’t escape from myself.

“Even killing Mab as I did didn’t cause an end to me; indeed, there is no end to me. Hahahaha! Isn’t that wonderful? Like, whenever my mind falters or threatens to retreat into the void in any way, whenever my mind refuses to see the world anymore, merely shapes- here I come again, ready to pick up the pieces and get back on my bullshit, ensuring there’ll always be more of myself than I could ever know what to do with.

“And here and now, I can only remind myself of that, and throw it all in my face again. Hahahaha! I mean, shit, that was one hell of a mystery I didn’t actually consider a mystery and it didn’t even really need solving but hot damn if it didn’t just get solved so nice work, me! Really, just, just-fucking great!

“There’s no memory I have of my interaction with my sister- my treatment of her, the way I took her actions, everything- that doesn’t fill me with shame. Even now, I’m starting to dig up new things to be ashamed of, and my sister’s double isn’t even my sister.

“Hahahaha!”

“As it turns out, you don’t actually have to be alive to make yourself relevant. And you don’t have to be a good person to be a hero. You merely must know who you are and stay true to that truth. Do so, and you will understand reality while everyone else is running around confused and angry and upset because they think reality is something happening to them, rather than something they themselves are making happen.

“My brother was my hero; that’s why his betrayal hurt so much. Or at least- at the time, I thought he was. You know how you think you know these things about yourself, like all these personal attributes about you, you know them- you know they’re true. As if they are written, and thus, true.

“We need heroes because the define the limits of our aspirations; they are the weathervane of our dreams. We define our ideals by the heroes we choose, and in turn our ideals- courage, strength, honor, duty, and so on- define us. Heroes become the symbol of the qualities we want to have, and the ambitions we want to satisfy.

“These things I believed, I hoped that just believing in them would make them true; but that’s not actually how it works. I spent so long believing those things and taking their truth for granted that I forgot to make them true with my words and deeds. We made our own luck, our own fate; and I forgot to make mine until it was too late.
“How could I have ever truly loved my brother, thought him a hero, when I never even knew who he was? I still don’t; I cut down the whole of him long before the truth of his nature could reveal itself. And so, I never shall; and that, truly, is a pitiful thing.”

“It’s like this, okay? Imagine that over the course of someone’s life, they are truly capable of every conceivable action at any moment, and did indeed take each of those actions in different branching realities. A scenario like that deadens a person’s agency just as much as one where their fate is decidedly etched into stone as a single path of unavoidable decisions. There is no such person who can and does and would and will take all conceivable actions, other than someone perfectly generic, who only appeared to have unique predilections and motives when the arbitrary path they happen to occupy is examined.

“I went back a ways and taught my younger self how to sharpen my axe, which I knew because my younger self, after being taught how to sharpen my axe, grew up to become me, and was, therefore, capable of teaching me.

“The Rainbow Mist is one thing to call this place; but on my map, it’s called Paradoxia. Consider this: if the world came to an end every time there was some uncertainty about what had just happened in it, it would never have gotten beyond the first picosecond. Many, of course, don’t. It’s like a human body, see- a few cuts and bruises here and there don’t hurt it. Not even major surgery, if it’s done properly. Paradoxes are just scar tissue, speaking worldly. Time and space will heal right up around a paradox, and the people who go through them?

“Well.

“We tend to remember a version of events which makes as much sense as we require them to make. I haven’t really met my sister’s double; she hasn’t really met her brother’s double. We, the both of us- are nothing like our fallen twins. And yet, it is enough to know, now- that somewhere, out there, there is a version of me that was killed before I could become… this. And there is a version of my sister that became… that.

“If that is not enough; it must be enough. There isn’t anything more, after all.”

“Mab Morgan here; my brother is gone again, vanished into the mist. His axe; his voice; the relief of his presence… gone. All gone. Luck doesn’t actually matter. You, listener, matter. I- I’m sorry. I… here, have a forecast for the weather, I need- a-a moment- I’ll be right back.”

“I, the Oracle of Depthiest Deeps, your one, your only- F! Will now take this chance to inflict a number of horoscopes on your ungrateful and unworthy selves. Are they true prophecies? Hell if I know, apparently on this ship one is Not Allowed to slam dunk an open glass container of keifer and cottage cheese curds onto the floor and make an augury for truth of broken glass and spilled milk and clotted milkfat, it’s a cut hazard and waste of perfectly good food, don’t be so wasteful, F, gods.

“I shall now relay the stars’ messages for you ungrateful souls. Don’t blame me if you don’t like your fortune; it’s the stars that made these, I’m just a messenger. Please have notation apparatus ready—be it paper and pen, or chalk and slate. I shall now pause to allow time for you to retrieve your writing materials.

“These are the Horoscopes for the month. Prepare yourself.

“Aries: Cooking skills are useless if you have nobody to cook for. We are defined by the people we inflict our artistry on. Not to say that you can’t cook for yourself; but stewing in our own creative juices only leads to disaster. Branch out!

“Taurus: This week is auspicious for experimentation. Push the boundaries of your flesh; go beyond what it means to be mortal. Invent new genders. Make words where no words once stood. The power is in your hands!

“Gemini: Practice painting and surfing at the same time for double the learning.

“Cancer: Make some extra food for when your house is flooded with death god acolytes that need a place to stay while their temple training school is undergoing fumigation. They will reward your hospitality with household chores, helping you with the errands, and probably dealing with your persistent hauntings. Win-Win-Win!

“Leo: Be prepared to reap the consequences of your excitement when you run full speed into a wall.

“Virgo: Sometimes we get the reaction we expect, but at a magnitude we didn’t, and that’s just the way the cookie annihilates on this bitch of an earth.

“Libra: Prepare to learn more than you have ever wanted to know about leopards. There is definitely a leopard there.

“Scorpio: Finish what you started! Improvise! Fail! Evade capture from the police! Hide in the brothel! Use protection so you don’t get an infection!

“Ophiuchus: Yeaaaah, sky-lube isn’t a thing. It’s regular lube, my friendo. You’ve been fooled.

“Sagittarius: You’ll be waiting for something; a train, a bus, a call. You will notice the horse skull by the side of the road. Once you see it, you will feel like it’s watching you. Do nothing. Say nothing. Do not interact.

“Capricorn: Your habit of ignoring the crows and magpies as a child has paid off. No swooping for you, my friend!

“Aquarius: Some people actually are just two lesbians in a trench coat, and you should respect their decision.

“Pisces: Gnome time approaches. You know what must be done.

“These are the Horoscopes for the month. Deal with it.

“I, the Oracle F, wish to remind everyone listening that the general forecasts for the next year, two years, five years, and ten years, can be found in the new edition of the Old Farmer’s Almanac, sold in every Daiso World-wide. Costs, like, a thousand beri. Is that an investment for some? Sure. Does the Almanac give you auspicious days for literally everything? Yes.

“Do not use a Book of Auspicious days without an Almanac to double check the dates and moon-phases; misprints, while rare, do happen. Remember: it is another human being at the other end of the printing process. We are imperfect beings.

“Do not take the advice of a Daily Horoscope, as printed in the news papers or as I have just imparted to you, as gospel without having your Birth Chart at hand. The more exact you can be with regards to your date and time of birth, the more accurate your Birth Chart becomes.

“These are the Questions, Answered:

“Who invented the Snugly, which many people use to carry babies? Some would say the Togo clan of the Longarm are responsible for the idea. Ann Moore, a pediatric nurse working with the Togo in the early six-hundreds, saw men and women there using slings to carry their babies while they went about their lives- working, playing, resting, and so on. The babies were comfortable, easily accessed, and secure; and the people who carried them had both hands free. Moore, and her mother Lucy Greatauk, a fashion designer, used the idea to design their own adjustable, pouchlike infant carrier. Once their design was patented, it was sold to a commercial producer, and is now available worldwide.

“What is the best way to clean wicker furniture, meant for outdoor or indoor use? For everyday care, be sure to wipe up spills quickly, before they have a chance to seep into the crevices. Dust regularly with a soft cloth or, better yet, use the small brush attachment standard with most vacuum cleaners to pull away dirt and grime. If you need to do a major cleaning, best practice is to keep the wicker wet for the shortest possible time. Choose a hot, dry day with a good breeze, or set up a fan. Take the piece outdoors for a quick hose-down with a pressure nozzle. For more stubborn dirt, use a solution of mild soap, water, and salt- heavy on the salt, please. A small brush will help reach into crevices. Rinse well and dry completely. For a finish shine, wipe with an oiled flannel. Please remember to bring your outdoor wicker furniture into a protected area during inclement weather.

“What is the origin of the saying ‘Until the last dog is hung’? This usually refers to someone sticking it out until the end. It was first used in printed media in eight hundred sixty three, although undesired members of society have been called ‘dogs’ since the fourteenth year of the modern calendar. The phrase may well have originated in the Wild West Blue, where rustlers, thieves, and other ne’er-do-wells were regularly strung up for crimes against men, women, and cattle.

“What is a dinger in baseball? A dinger is a home run.

“Which sports are legal to gamble on? The internationally legal sports for gamblers are: Sixth Degree or Bountyball; Champton Slippers, or Polo- both water and horseback versions; Baseball; Foot-the-ball; and all animal races involving quadrupeds, only quadrupeds- where bipeds are involved, they have to be riding the quadruped. Dog Sled races are still in contention due to the nature of the sled in question. Nationally legal sports for gamblers are subject to local government enforcement; check with your bookie.

“Has anyone ever sued someone else because lightning struck his barn? Strangely, yes. During a long drought in the mid-eight hundred eighties, a priest in Mariejois called a prayer meeting so that all the residents could pray for rain. One farmer apparently thought prayer was unnecessary, so he did not show up for the meeting. Three hours after the meeting ended, thunderstorms rumbled through the area, bringing the much-needed rain. The thunderstorms also brought lightning, which struck the undevout farmer’s barn and burned it to the ground. The farmer sued the priest, whose lawyer pointed out that the priest and the people at the prayer meeting had prayed for rain, not a thunderstorm. Therefore, the priest could not be held accountable for the lightning strike. The farmer’s case was thrown out of court.

“Who coined the phrase ‘under the wire’? The phrase wasn’t actually coined by one specific person. It’s a permutation of the saying ‘down to the wire’, which comes from horse racing. The original phrase describes two or more horses running neck and neck at the end of a race; the ‘wire’ was attached to an apparatus that set a camera in action, thus allowing for photo-finishes.

“Who was the youngest person ever to graduate with a doctorate? The youngest recipient of a doctoral degree is Trafalgar Law, a boy from Flvnce, who received a medical doctorate in thoracic surgery from the Universidad de Plata at the age of ten.

“This is the General Advice, for those who already know what they’re about, but need a day’s direction.

“Now the state of the ground is known.

“To de-ice a roof, mix a solution of sand and salt in equal parts, and scatter across the shingles by the handful. When the ice begins to melt in patches, the sand will allow you to walk around, carefully, and break up the ice.

“A man is not a man until he takes responsibility for his actions.

“To season a wok, one must cook in it; and not use soap, but only water in it’s cleaning.

“Use lavender, fennel, or chamomile soaks for tired, swollen feet.

“One must be grateful for turnips a while yet.

“Do not despair; the darkness will yield to light, in it’s time.

“When another person makes you suffer, it is because he is suffering deeply within himself. It may not be within your power to help them; but it is within your power to pity him.

“These are the Words; we use them, but know them not. I will now correct that, as much as I can.

“Catfishing: the phenomenon of dial-up predators that fabricate identities and entire social circles purely to trick people into emotional, romantic, and financial relationships over a long period of time. The motivations for such are possibly revenge, loneliness, curiosity, and boredom.

“Hornswoggle: trickery, similar in scope to bamboozle.

“Expert: a person with a very specific specialty in a very specific field. Anyone can be an expert at anything; though not all things should be mastered to such an extent.

“Port: a place where ships can come in, generally to trade. From the ancient Portgas.

“Dog Days: the hottest and most unhealthy days of the year. Also known as the Canicular Days, the name derives from the Dog Star, Sirius. The traditional timing of Dog Days is the forty days beginning the Third of July and ending the Eleventh of August, coinciding with the heliacal rising of Sirius.
“November: from the ancient word novem, meaning nine, because this was the ninth month of the calendar. There used to be fewer months overall.

“Chowder: from the French chaudiere, a kettle or a pot. A dish made of fresh fish or clams, biscuit, onions, and so on, stewed together.

“Civvies: civilian, as opposed to military. Usually used in conjunction with clothing, it’s beginning to see more use in describing groups of people outright.

“And now, from our sponsor, Powdermilk Biscuit Digestives. Heavens, they’re tasty!

“The taste of a good wholesome Powdermilk Biscuit Digestive can drop blood pressure, entice wild horses to accept the saddle, and encourage family dogs that have been hanging on at the end of chronic illnesses to close their eyes and drift away. Made from whole wheat raised in the rich bottomlands of the Lake Wobegon river valley by Germa bachelor farmers; so you know they’re not only good for you, but good looking… mostly. Buy them ready-made in the big blue box with the picture of the biscuit on the cover, or in the brown paper bag with the dark stains indicating freshness. Whole wheat digestives that give shy persons the strength to get up and do what needs to be done, even if that’s just sitting back down and shutting up.

“Heavens; Powdermilk Biscuit Digestives. They’re tasty; and expeditious!

“... Mister Cross, have you been eating them this whole time? Mister- um, bathroom’s right inside the Galley, the San’s the red door, bathroom is green- oh golly, I’ve never seen a man’s face blanch like that.”

“I have. Haha hAHAAHAAhAHAHahaha-!”

“Thank you, from the Gastropod Gallery. Finally, for my contribution to this broadcast; today’s Proverb.

“A bar walks into a bar. The bartender is a snake eating its own tail. The windows look out only onto the face of the one who looks. What goes in and what goes out taste just the same. Find a better bar.

“I, The Oracle F, return you to your broadcast host; Mab Morgan!”

“Hello, everyone. I told you I would be back. It took longer than I thought, but I have returned from whatever horrible place I went. Whole? Probably not, actually. But I am returned. Mister Jeremiah Cross, looking pale as milk and a bit wrung out, is starting to fade at the edges, turning back into mist; and so I shall make brief my sentiment.

“I saw a foul devil of a man, and I slew him. I saw that man again- but I remembered. I remembered what it did to me the first time I killed him; and this time, I let him live. I let that woeful, wicked beast live. I am sure he is not without his wounds and bruises, and I pity that he must return to the awful place from whence he came.

“And yet, despite everything, I am happy that some version of him is alive. I am happy that I am alive; that you are alive; that we are all, listening to this broadcast or creating it, even now, are alive.

“Around us, spears of light, blindingly golden, are piercing through the veil of rainbow mist; the wind smells of seaweed and woodsmoke, and it sweeps away our pains. I am sure there is blood staining your hands, listener; the shape of your sin, the final record of what you did, and who you hurt to do it.

“The bodies of some replaced by others who were—were—all the same, to begin with. Time puts its mark on us all. We heal, slowly; those of us, whomever we are, that survived; and those others of us, whomever we are, that conquered; and still yet more, who even now cry out in fear and rage to be born into this word—whomever you are now, you are home.

“We are all of us home. I and my family are together; and you, with yours. My mouth, to your ears—we have each other.

“That will have to be enough. What meanings we can make of the world are all there is; there isn’t any more.

“And so we end this Straw Hat Broadcasting Service with these reminders: You are not alone. Your existence is not a crime. You do deserve to exist.

“I’ll talk to you later, World. Or perhaps not—Cross is fading fast, and I rather doubt we will ever meet again. Until next time; there won’t be a next time. This was the only time there was.”

I put the microphone back onto the transponder rig, and carefully place it in Cross’ lap. A sudden gust of wind—and he, his snail friend Soundbite, and the rest of our doubles, are gone again. The strange silence we were surrounded by, save for the slapping of waves on our hull, is gone—broken by the wailings of a newborn babe.

A newborn in the— in the birthing room—

“TAFFY—!” screams Nami.

The migraine is sudden, vicious, and nearly takes my feet from under me. The sun is setting; Bryony, up earlier than usual, sees my clutching my head and the agony I’m trying desperately not to scream over—’I’ve got this, Mab, I’ve got this’—

I blink, and I’m sitting in the middle of the stairs, sliding down on my ass, thump and a wince with each jarring motion I feel—dizzy—

I blink again and I’m lolling on the grass, vomit, my mouth tastes of vomit—

I—

I can’t—
Remember-
I did not sleep; though my eyes were closed, and I could not be roused - that was not true sleep. I am too tired now for that to have been true sleep. I felt like I was sleeping, for a little bit - but when I would briefly surface from the blank blackness, I knew I was not sleeping.

I am Fae; and all Fae are bound, indelibly, to Time. Time cannot be halted without consequence; time cannot be killed without injuring eternity.

In the Before, there was no duality. All was one; one accord. When Pandora- Paradoxia, in the older tongues - broke the egg, she opened her mind to the insight of duality. The past is never dead; it’s not even past. We are everything we’ve ever been - everything we failed to be, everything we succeeded. Every accident and mistake and stroke of luck and triumph - all these things, we are.

We are also everything we could be; and everything we could never be.

There exists no version of myself that could ever bring harm to a child. There exists no version of myself that would ever forgive my brother for raping me, not even once. There exists no version of myself that could ever do less than feel pity and compassion for the wounded, the sick, and the chronically ill; the shut in, the forgotten… I am who I am, beyond the structures of what circumstance has made me.

I dreamed I was pouring sand and shells into a bottle to take back to the sea, but every time I would get the bottle half filled, the bottle would break open and the glass would turn to sand and the shells would swim away and I was drowning drowning-

I dreamed I opened a drawer in the galley and it was full of bloody teeth and in my hand there was a pair of bloody pliers and in my mouth was the bloody gaps where all my teeth had been but I had no memory of pulling them and then I was drowning drowning-

I woke in a field of blank white snow, and between my legs red crocuses pushed up through the crust of ice. I could not move my legs at all, but I could raise my head and see trailing off through the whiteness six other patches of bright red, blooming in the snow.

I stretched my leaves towards the sun, and on my boughs heavy cherries ripened from stone hardness to sweet fullness. Crows came, and ate all the fruit of seven of my branches; but the eighth branch stood in the gaze of a cat, and the crows would not go near it. On that branch there grew one yellow apple, swelling sweetly in the brightening sun. I feared for the fruit; perhaps my branch would be too weak or a wind would come and knock it from me before harvest time or a crow would grow unafraid of the cat and take my fruit from me please please let it live-
I opened my eyes to see statues of burlap and chicken wire, shaped something like my crewmates but the vitality of them was gone-

I fell to the earth of our home and I fell higher leaving my body behind- for, though it seemed no more than a moment in a day had passed to us, in the Rainbow Mist… Once we had escaped it, all that time we hadn’t spent sailing through it, it hit me all at once. Taffy collapsed in the middle of a conversation with Nami- that’s why Nami screamed so loud I could hear her on the deck. Mark looked like he fell asleep on the couch; it was only when Luffy and Usopp couldn’t wake him that they knew something was wrong. Bryony was definitely affected- she’s apparently had insomnia since the three of us other Fae fell. Tellicherry collapsed much like I did- splitting pain in her head, disorientation and clumsiness in her body, and then unconsciousness without a word.

The difference, of course, between Tellicherry and myself, is that Tellicherry was awake again within the day- and I was not. Tellicherry isn’t a Queen; she can recover from certain things better than I. It has been said by some that time will heal all wounds; this is not so. The wounds remain, eternally. In time, the mind, protecting it’s sanity, will cover them- akin to scarring- so that the pain may lessen. But no wound done is ever undone; the effects, the damage done from a curse remain long after such a thing is broken.

When we sailed from poor sunken Punk Hazard, I sailed us almost directly into the Rainbow Mist; I didn’t mean to, of course, but I did. From Tuckleigh to Punk Hazard is about a month. When we sailed out of the Rainbow Mist, we were within regular sighting distance of Tuckleigh- a distance of maybe a few hours time, rather than four weeks.

I did not die; and I did not sleep. Not for a whole month’s worth of time, even if I didn’t feel it.

There are repercussions for such a thing. The best way to explain it, I think, is like this: a kind of madness overtakes you when they you’re put to extremes. When rising from the darkest depths of madness to the calm surface of sanity- or as close as you can get, considering everything- regular stops at different depths are needed to prevent decompression sickness. Trying to come back from the place we went too quickly… it has the full potential to kill, if given free reign.

Luckily, we have two of the World’s best doctors on this ship- Trafalgar Law, youngest to ever gain a medical doctorate and he started with general practice before moving to surgery; and Tony Tony Chopper, one of the finest pharmacologists and trauma experts in the known world. Together, they were able to stabilize all us Fae that fell- and, though Dr. Trafalgar was baffled by my condition in particular (as I showed signs of starvation, torture, and exhaustion), Dr. Chopper was able to quickly and efficiently teach what needed to be learned.

My brother took hempen rope and bound me to the stone and said the prayer and laid over me and devoted us to the Earth Goddess and I screamed- three hundred eyes in the jar another thousand to count- my teeth crumbled to sand in my mouth and I could not speak for the dryness of it- my fingers stretched into twigs and my limbs are branches but I do not live I am only a broken thing caked in salt-

I woke but did not wake in a vast web sparkling with dew and in every drop there was reflected every other drop it was like stars in the blackness of night but they were not stars they were lives reflected endlessly across the heavens. For a time I shook and thrashed trying desperately to free myself but I could not the thin silk threads only pulled tighter and cut into my skin and my flesh and my bones and my blood turned all the white silk red and my hair tangled into the silk and I could not be freed and Eventually my thrashing gained the attentions of a great spider with whom I spoke in the glimmering white with blue light behind it in the darkness beyond the edge of Time at my back there was Her Grace Hylia but she would not see me.

Only the Spider would see me.

“Seconds ago little creatures are coming and they are asking if I am of the Gods and I am asking what the Gods are and they are telling me and I am not these Gods. These Gods are nowhere,” said the spider.

“That’s where Faith comes in,” I said.

“Little creatures are explaining Faith and moments ago it is Begun and I am here and I am here Now and soon it will End and there is nowhere for Gods to be hiding, and there is nothing Faith alone can do,” said the spider.

“So then, what? Why am I here!?!?” I said, thrashing again- just for a moment but the pain made me stop it hurts it hurts it hurts-

“Monstrous Existence. Little creature is bound with Faith so tight it can’t help but cut itself apart; a great beast is creeping through the webs and the threads are bending under it’s weight and it is climbing the place where the web holds taught and into the waters and now it is making a tear and now it is dived through and gone and now you are here. Little creatures are walking through the waters and they are dragging in places and echoes of lives and they are asking me about Gods. I am going to tell you something, little creature. You have swum out to sea and dived deeper and deeper and deeper until your chest is breaking under the strain of the water and beyond your reach there are things blind and terrible and hungry and you know them by their lack of names. I am showing you, now,” said the spider.

I screamed-

“They are blind and they are hungry and they are toying with their prey before killing and eating. They are blind, but they are seeing you. And you are coming to them; and you are coming to kill them. After this, you are not returning here; I am climbing into the sea and closing the waters. Do not return to this place again,” said the spider.

She turned to me, and I saw that she had fingers for lips and mismatched eyes and eyes like pustules on her face and she reminded my of my kin and she looked like me but she was not me and she was so ugly and she was beautiful and I hated her and I wanted to be just like her once and She grew closer and closer to me until I was face to face with her and she laid a gentle claw over my stomach and stroked it over the softening muscles that cover my womb and she stroked the sweat from my brow with her lip fingers and she was weeping Her breath smelled of rotted things meat mostly and of flowers and herbs of earth and of fire the soot of a chimney and her hair dripped with water and drifted in the air and she was pale as paper twice as thin her skin was full of so many spiders Her lip-fingers gently grasped my chin and she turned my head so I was looking her in the eye and I couldn’t stop crying-

“There is a hole at the center of all things, and it is always growing. Between the stars, I am seeing it; it is coming and you are not escaping and all things shall forget you and all things will be forgotten and there is nothing to remember any of it, not even the things beyond.” said the spider.
I wept; the spider’s finger-lips brushed away my tears, stroked my cheeks and below my eyes.

“Now there is only the hole, and the nameless things beyond, and you, and me, and the one who would not pick a side and picked a side in unpicking… you are just your stuff, and your stuff is not caring if you are existing. You are monstrous existence,” said the spider, drawing closer still—until the bridge of it’s nose was perhaps a centimeter away from mine.

“Little creature, you are not chosen. There is nothing to choose you; I cannot choose you. This is going nowhere; there is nowhere for it to go. The universe is forgetting you and I am remembering you; not because I am caring. The beginning Begun moments ago, and the End is moments away. There is no time to forget before all is forgotten.” said the spider.

Then she leaned forwards and pressed a kiss to my mouth and it was soft and warm and her hand was so gentle on the softening muscles over my womb and she kissed by the book and a sharp bite on my lower lip stung me into dizzy sleep. Numbness and heat and tingling spread from her bite, and the world grew dimmer and dimmer until all was black— and then all was the red black of my own closed eyes.

The dream- nightmare? The spider had my voice. It was as if I was telling myself those true things; but it is said that when Zul deigns to speak, she uses your own voice to do so...

I could hear someone breathing, someone that wasn’t me; I could feel a weight on my arm, a stiffness in it that wasn’t normal, some binding on it I had no memory of putting there. There were fingers interlaced with my hand, rough and calloused and Sanji.

Sanji is here and he is holding my hand. It must be safe to do so, otherwise he would not.

It felt, honest to gods, like waking up after a very long nap at a very good spa— but I knew it couldn’t be, because I could hear and smell the Sanitary Ward around me. I could also smell the clove-tobacco stench of my husband at his most worried… and so, because I was suddenly worried about him, I opened my eyes.

The light was blinding; but I must have made a face, because I heard Sanji say my name, and that made me open my eyes again.

Ever since I broke Mom’s broom, I haven’t been able to fly. None of the rack-brooms work for me, and whenever I try to go and make a broom, it always ends up bursting into flames.

Tiffany says that my brooms keep ashing themselves because of irreconcilable faults in the spellwork; in short, the mistakes I make when I layer spells on material pile up so high that the various safety features of each spell decide that the only way to resolve the issue is to destroy the broom, and make me start over. I’ve been wanting to talk to Missus Mab about what to do for a while, but… She’s not been well at all.

I’m… I’m really worried. I’m the head nurse, so I know everything that’s going on— but that doesn’t mean I know what to do about it, or how to fix it. I’ve been massaging her, with my plain hands and the little lightnings both, so her muscles don’t atrophy… but that doesn’t mean I know when she’ll wake up.

What would Mab say for a problem like this? Hm. Well, her first recommendation was to talk to Tiffany about making a new broom. I’ve talked to Tiffany about why my brooms keep ashing themselves- her thoughts aren’t… aren’t that great, really.

According to Tiffany, all Flight Brooms are layered with a specific confluence of magical elements-elements being what magic is called when it’s worked into a spell without being in one of the Primagicas, and has it’s own unique resonance with a mundane element of the world. Different spells do different things in a broom, of course; but at the basic level, every Flight Broom has three different kinds of spells on it.

There’s the Energy type spells; these are what keeps the broom in the air. Some work by magnesis; others, air; still more, aether. Then, there’s the Movement type spells; these are what lets the broom be fly-able, and can become very intricate depending on what the flyer wants from their broom.
Adding them onto off-rack brooms and taking them off of the same is one of the first things most flyboys and flygirls involved in racing learn to do.

Finally, and most importantly, there’s the Comfort spells. I doubt it’s really news, but brooms aren’t actually comfortable to sit on by themselves. You need to add various comfort spells, be they stitched into fabric you add on as a bristle cover, an enchanted bike seat, or even special underwear-thankfully, mine are still intact. I thought, since I’ve got the undies, I didn’t really need anything but the most basic of comfort spells- the underwear are just for Cushioning, they don’t do Grip- so…

But maybe not.

Or, maybe- maybe I’ve been piling on too many Movement spells? I remember, Mom’s broom wasn’t like most race brooms- Mom's broom was a challenge to fly. Most racing brooms, they go where you point them; Mom's broom had to be pointed well ahead of where you wanted to go, and the difference between those two points was a complex variable, and if you needed to get there at speed you had to store energy in the bristles on the downswings and turns well in advance of needing it, and you needed to know you'd need it well in advance of knowing because that speed would leak right out if you didn't use it promptly...

And I could do all of that without thinking about it.

I could only make it accelerate at about a steady walk in normal circumstances; adding on the Birdthrottle Cap popped that up to maybe a brisk trot by a geriatric dog. For power, Mom had her broom enhanced to haul freight and carry... well, us. Seven babies isn't really heavy, per say, but it is more than one person can easily carry.

Handling wasn't great either- it was alright at slow and high speeds, but in the mid range I was more likely to crash into the ground or flip myself off the broom entirely- because, of course, it would stop on a thought. Full stop, no less.

Comfort, on the other hand, was unmatched. Mom's broom was reliable, time after time, in every condition- it was self-righting, and had a sink-trap for small dropped items, like change for the toll-winds and so on. It even had a parking brake; just the perfect thing for an impromptu hammock or a seat where no seat exists.

When I went in to see to Mab, she was awake; Sanji was weeping, and she had her hand pressed to his face, her thumb stroking away his tears.

I stepped out to let the doctors know that Mab was awake, finally; and then it was all a flurry of tests and checks. Mab’s just fine, actually- still a little fatigued, but nothing a few days of rest won’t fix. She’s not allowed to train or work heavily or be around powerful magic, and she’s not allowed to drink alcohol or have sex or sew for the next week; but other than that, she’s fine.

After the first few days, things calmed down enough that I could talk to her myself.

“So, your brooms keep bursting into ash?”

“Yeah; something about the spells I’m using keep making everything unstable. I don’t know what I’m doing wrong, exactly- I thought making a broom that was basically the opposite of my mom’s broom wouldn’t be so hard...”

“Hm. Well; since I can’t go and watch what you’re doing... hand me that notepad, would you? Take one for yourself, too. I want you to list out every material you’ve used, and every spell as well. I know Tiffany made you keep a notation on such- so just copy that, please. Hmm... Now- oh, hello, Mack, could you do an errand for me?”

“Uh- sure thing, Missus Mab. What’d’ya need?”

“This is a list of books- If you can’t find the one I want, ask Robin or Mark to pull it for you, one of these is a magic book. I need them for reference. Also, in my studio, there is a medium sized bag on the shelf I wrote- over to the left from the door, then down, that’s how to read the notation. Please bring them to me, alright?”

“Ah- sure thing!”

“...um?”

“I have a hypothesis about what’s going wrong; but I can’t be sure without looking at some reference materials and making calculations. Let’s move to the table, alright?”

“Um- sure, I guess it’s not meal time any time soon...”

“Mmhm. Sanji- eep! Sanji- I can walk, you know,”

“I know; I just like holding you,”

“Hmmph. Alright; but please put me down soon, okay?”

“Mnhnh. Here you go, Honey,”

“Hmm. Okay; don’t you have to train the Cool Kids?”

“Yeah, I do- alright, bye. Bye, Genny,”

“Bye, Sanji- ugh, really? Whatever-”
He always scruffs up my hair, even though he knows I hate that shit. Uuugh. Oh, and he always kisses Missus Mab before he leaves her company now- he didn’t used to do that, but now it’s like he can’t stop.

Anyway; in the time it takes me to copy out my notes about my materials and spells, Mack returns with a medium-sized basket full of books, and the bag Mab wanted. When I hand off the list, Mab reads it over. I watch her eyebrows furrow, then rise- and then she reaches for one- no, two of the books. I can’t read the covers at all- the only thing I can tell is the green one is leafy, and well thumbed; while the red one is metallic, and… glowy? Yeah, glowy.

Then she pulls out the third book- and that third book is why she didn’t go get them herself. It’s huge! Bigger than my chest, hips to ribcage; it’s thicker than my thigh, and obviously heavy because Mack was straining to carry it. When she puts it on the table, it doesn’t creak- but it’s definitely heavy. As soon as she does, all three books start opening and flipping pages.

Mab reads my list, makes notes on her notepad, and reads pages and passages from the books; as she goes further and further, the confusion on her face brews into a storm, and then a realization.

“It’s not what I thought- you’re not using outright incompatible spells. It’s a much more complex issue, one I haven’t seen show up too often. It’s much more common during a Mage’s training, and Tiffany isn’t a mage- she’s much closer to a Wizard, actually,”

“What do you think the problem is?”

“Ah- well, as I said, it’s quite rare, but the issue is one of Resonance. The materials you’ve been using and the spells you’ve been layering on top of each other should, in theory, work as you’ve designed; the problem is, nothing is ever so simple in practice. It’s an issue of Resonance, I think- I need to do some final calculations, but I’m pretty sure that’s what it is,”

“Resonance?”

“Hm. Imagine each part of a spell as a sonic tone- like a note from a bell, or a chime. A complete spell is like a chord, which is why an individual spell is so versatile; when you stack them together, they become more like a song, which is what blessings and curses become, over time. Enchantments aren’t songs- they’re more akin to symphonies. How to explain this… what do you know about destructive interference?”

“I didn’t even know what resonance is? So, um- nothing,”

“Right. Well. Interference is a phenomenon in which two waves superpose to form a resultant wave of greater, lower, or the same amplitude. Which in other words means- hm. Sound’s shape is a wave; and when two waves meet, like when you throw two stones in still water in different places and the waves made block each other out in a certain spot; and in another spot, the waves are bigger than they would have been alone; and in still one more, they don’t change each other at all. Interference can be observed in all types of waves- water, light, sound, and in this case, mana,”

“What’s mana?”

“Oh! Hm, I’ve never explained this, have I- well, it’s like this. Haki, or magic, can actually be broken down into two distinct parts- encompassing all the magic a person can ever possess, from the magic of their mind and body, to the magic of the elements locked within every person- Fire, Water, Earth, Air, Lightning, Wood, and Metal. Each piece has a yin and yang aspect; the prana, and the od.
Prana is energy specific to the physical body, and must be replenished by physical means; od is energy specific to the non-physical body, and must be replenished by non-physical means. When they’re mixed together, they become mana- which is the mage term for non-specific magic,"

“Are there spells or materials that require one over the other?”

“Yes- but you’re not old enough for either of them. Prana spells tend to have to do with injury, fertility, and age; while od spells deal with trauma, creativity, and memory. They require an exactness and a level of knowledge to perform correctly that, well… Prana spells, for example, are probably something your mother was very skilled at. Most women with her reputation, in her field, become experts at sex and fertility magic- which is almost exclusively fueled by prana- as a matter of course. Od, on the other hand, is something that for the most part self corrects- it takes a fraction of a fraction of od to affect a change in a person’s magic, whereas prana usually requires much more. Conversely, it takes a fraction of a fraction of prana to change a person’s haki; while od requires more than most people can bear to give. The entire practice of tantric sex, for example, is really about prana, and changing the way it moves through the body; while various mood altering drugs I was taught to administer ethically and responsibly in school was all about correcting dangerous od misalignments. Dangerous, complicated stuff; you’re neither old nor learned enough for either,"

“Hm.”

“Haki and magic aren’t actually interchangeable terms; haki means, literally, wearing- you wear armor, you wear observation, you wear the might of a king… magic is everything else that you do with the same sort of power haki is, but you’re not using it for armor or observation or kingliness, you’re using it to bless a child or preserve a life. I use haki and magic like they’re interchangeable sometimes- they aren’t. Someone who only knows haki could never ready a ship for sailing and then sail it with little more than a word and a song; someone who only knows magic could never defeat a powerful enemy in an all-or-nothing fight,”

“I see- what’s this got to do with why my brooms keep ashing, though?”

“Honestly, I’m not sure- but I was trying to explain what interference was. Do you know what resonance is? -can’t remember if I asked that,”

“You did; and I still don’t, really,"

“Ah! Well. Okay- resonance is a phenomenon in which a vibration causes another thing to shake, often harder or softer, depending on the frequency of the vibration. The shake-responses amplitude-how much it shakes have relative maximums, and these are called resonant- or resonance-frequencies. So; Magic is stored in the soul, and we know this because Automata have physical souls. The soul of an Automata can be many shapes and sizes- but it’s most common form is something like a gemstone or pearl. The ethical studies are what we draw our knowledge in this subject from- Free Automata donated their bodies to magimedical science, for the study of doctors and magic practitioners alike, to better understand their circumstances, and their relation to the rest of humanity. It was eventually theorized that Automata are human as anyone else- they’re recognized as human, fully human, in all Faesh lands, after all. As for their souls… due to the nature of the Automatic Power, Love, an Automaton’s Soul becomes crystalline in form- and I’ve lost you,”

“Sorry- it’s interesting, but… I don’t have the science education to really follow what you’re saying. I mean, I guess… what you’re saying is that magic is stored in the soul, but it’s the rest of your body that makes it, right?”

“Yes,”
“And this is known because Automatic bodies, ethically sourced for scientific study, were dissected- and their soul stones were found? Right?”

“Yes,”

“And… the soul stones had magic in them?”

“They did, yes; when living Automata were asked about the stones, the answer was something like, ‘they are all that is eternal of them’- and, as you know, the only eternal thing in a person is their soul,”

“So… are people the only beings with souls?”

“Theoretically, no. We haven’t proven that, of course- but there’s enough evidence to suggest that animals, at the very least, have souls. It’s to do with music, really- being able to appreciate music. Dogs like reggaeton music- whoo, off topic again, I am still tired, wow,,”

“Tell me more about interference, and why it’s ashing my brooms, please,”

“Sure. In principle, superposition of waves states that when two or more propagating waves of the same type- in this case, magic- are incident on the same point- a place in space or time, arbitrary except that we’re observing it; the resultant amplitude- a measure of how much wave there is on the up-and-down-swings- at that point is equal to the vector sum of the amplitudes of the individual waves. If a wave’s crest meets the crest of another wave of the same frequency, at the same point, then their total amplitude is the sum of the individual amplitudes- one and one is two; and this goes the same for troughs. If a crest of one wave meets a trough of another wave, then the amplitude is equal to the difference in the individual amplitudes- one less one is none. One and one is constructive interference- it’s why breaking glass with your voice is still a trick; one less one is destructive interference- and, once I’ve done the figuring, I think it’ll answer why your brooms keep burning themselves to ash,”

“How are you going to measure that?”

“Well- firstly, every material and spell used in magic has it’s own frequency, and what you could call a breaking point, or safety- the point at which it will no longer be useable, I suppose. The vast majority of such things are either written in one of these two books-” and here, Mab tapped the red and green books- “-or are measurable using the methods in this book,” and here, Mab indicated the massive tome. “This big book also has the formulae for measuring various interferences, and material strengths. Every material has a resonance frequency- and, no material is actually perfect. There’s always an imperfection to it, somewhere- starmetal, mythical as it is, tends to be very heavy. Moonsilk doesn’t insulate; sunsilk stains just with the oils on someone’s hands; glitterglass is extremely brittle, and on, and on, and on,”

“Gemfish only form their gems after seven years of undisturbed life,”

“Exactly. All magic has a vibration to it- a frequency. Resonance is what happens when those frequencies interact. Sometimes, two kinds of magic come together to make something bigger than one alone; and sometimes, two together equals nothing at all. Almost… done… there. Now, to solve it-”

Mab opened her bag, at some point- it’s mostly just a large collection of highlighters and map pencils, but there’s also a soroban in there. That’s what she used to solve her strange equation that I couldn’t really read at all- I barely understood that the colors she’d used to mark each material and spell I’d used, which I’d put into groups (the same groups of failed brooms, actually) correspond to distinct formulae, each with sometimes drastically different shapes to them.

As Mab went through, her realization became a storm, and then confusion, and then an even greater realization- and one set, she circled her answer and set it aside.

I’ve tried twelve different methods to make a broom- each one failed a little differently, though ash was always the end result.

“So… they didn’t all fail the same way. Some of these, certainly, it was a destructive resonance cascade… others, though- hm. One through eleven were simple cascade failures- your spells, layered on as they were, had normal imperfections- nothing insurmountable, just, every spell has a few.
Those imperfections, however, skewed the frequency of each spell just enough that they started joining together- cascading, one to the next, building in amplitude in two distinct areas. I’m going to guess and say that the majority of your brooms turned to ash end to center?”

“-You can tell all that from just the mathemagic?”

“I can; not everyone could, though. I do have a doctorate in this, after all. Now, your twelfth broom is different- it wasn’t anything to do with your spells or materials, it was, well, you . Your magical resonance was destructive to the base materials of your twelfth broom- and so, even though your spells worked just fine, without the material to work with, the whole thing failed. Basically poofed into ash all in one go, right?”

“Yeah...”

“So. Your first eleven attempts were simply an aggregate of mistakes resulting in destruction-practice your calligraphy, so you can write the spells more effectively. I’ll get you a notebook and a practice book- there might be a calligraphic font or style more suited to your taste, which does matter.
As for the twelfth failure- you will never be able to successfully enchant a willow-based broom. None of your sisters can do it; and Sanji can’t do it either, though he’d get closest. Hickory, Oak, or Ash-wood are all much better options- Mahogany too, though I doubt Tiffany will let you use a mahogany stave until your second success at least. For you specifically… hm. Walnut, maybe; birch was almost certainly what your mother’s used, but you said it never felt quite right in your hands...”

“Hm. Fruit and nut trees?”

“Fine furniture trees, too- Olive-wood would definitely work, but I can’t think of where to get a stave that’s both long and straight enough… I used cherry, and I can get as much cherry as you’d like- if, if you’d like?”

“Maybe… or, um, what about red maple? There were red maple trees at the very edge of the field across from our apartment building- during the fall, they were some of the only really beautiful things in our part of town,”

“Did you have a connection with those trees specifically?”

“Mm, I wouldn’t say that exactly- more like… our school year actually started just after those trees would change their leaves, because of how hot it got in Gobdark during the summer- so, I always ended up finishing my summer homework in the privacy of their canopy. Mom’s broom had a parking brake on it, y’know- and with a lap desk and a hook I got permission from the tree to put on, I could do my homework outside, without worrying about being interrupted to go on ‘a little errand’ for everyone in our building all the damn day- ah. I can’t believe I forgot about that…”

“Well- these things come in threes, when magic is involved. Firstly, you have to improve your calligraphy; a spell, once written, is only as good as it’s wordsmith makes it. Secondly, you need to use the correct materials; a hardwood, from a tree you share some sort of kinship with, will give the best results. And thirdly- it has to be balanced. Flight Brooms- all enchanted objects, really, but brooms especially, need to be balanced correctly between need and want.”

“What you need, and what you want, are not actually the same thing.”

“Exactly so. The soul of a child is not like that of an adult- a lot of what makes a child an adult is set during their childhood. You learned to fly on your mother’s broom; and race; and do all the things you can do on a broom. I certainly never quite mastered the trick of studying and paperwork on broomstick-”

“I could sleep on mom’s broom, too, it was so comfortable… and the sink trap was nice, but-”

“You see? So- even though you’ve calculated enough spells to make a fine racing broom here… well, wouldn’t you like to have a broom like your mother’s again? Not the same, of course- you don’t have to follow her that closely. You’d have to have absolutely perfect calligraphy to avoid the resonance cascade failure, and that would take a decade of practice-”

“Does it have to be with a quill?”

“-Hm?”

“Well, I’m almost fifteen; we, my sisters and Sancho and I, we learned to write at about the same time we learned to talk, which was… three or so, I think. But, we learned with brushes, not quills- so, do I have to write my spells with a quill?”

“…You know, that’s a question for Tiffany. I don’t see why not- as I understand, the texture and viscosity of magic ink is more about the tool you’re using to inscribe with, not the spell; and certainly, I see no reason a magic ink meant for use with a brush rather than a quill could not be devised.”

“So- I’ll still take the blank journal, but I have a practice textbook about the kind of calligraphy a brush uses. Hm. You know, I checked- we don’t have any maple staves. That’s what I really want to use, I think… and for the last… you know, I tried to balance just with the Movement spells, but if I add more Comfort spells, it’ll add redundancy, won’t it? So even if my calligraphy isn’t perfect, there’ll be a better chance of- um, well,”

“Comfort spells tend to interrupt or stop cascade failures right in their tracks; so yes, it would. Now, I’m not allowed to help right now- but! I am aware that we’re in harbour at Tuckleigh, which is famous for it’s maple syrup. It may well be that a red maple tree like the ones you grew up with, and sheltered you so graciously, is somewhere on the island- and is willing, and able, to give you a limb or two for a stave. As for my thought- you’ll need more than fancy underwear to fly a broom you’ve made for yourself, with your own power. I’ll start thinking up a design now- it seems to me you’ll need something like a Raid Suit- but not actually a raid suit, those are proprietary and I’m not about to get arrested,”

“Um-?”
“Hmhmhm. Find your maple tree; make your new ink, and get a good brush to write with; and talk to your sister, Fern. She knows more about the practicalities of enchantment than anyone else on this crew, even Tiffany- if you ask her, she’d probably be willing to make a broom with you. I know she wants one of her own...”

“...Yeah! We hardly spend time together, anymore- it’ll be fun to do together!”

There’s an idea! I used to do homework with Fern all the time; as much as I got interrupted to do one more goddamn favor, Fernie got taken aside for ‘one more question, Miss Oracle, please-’ Uuugh! Awful! No wonder we both got so adamant about being paid- the only ones I’ll maybe do a favor for is my sisters, and that’s because I know for a fact that they’ll try everything they possibly can to not have to ask me.

As for finding her- well, if she’s not napping on deck, she’s at that tea room she likes...

I’d wondered why I took such an instant liking to Tuckleigh- but, now that I’ve remembered my red-leaf friends, it’s totally obvious. Tuckleigh is a place where maple trees are not only beloved- the symbol of this island is the maple leaf- but they’re everywhere!

I asked someone about it- one of the people who live here, I think. Apparently, the name of this island is actually Maple Island, because every kind of maple tree grows here- along with a few other hardwood species, mostly birch and ash trees. The most common maple here is actually the sugar maple, which I’d only ever heard of as the rock maple. It’s native to this island, actually- and it’s what brings in most of Tuckleigh’s foreign economy.

Maple Island is actually a Winter Island; there’s huge drifts of snow everywhere, even though flowers are bursting through the white, and it snowed a bit yesterday. Still- this island is covered in lakes and streams, with enormous wetland forests scattered between. Apparently, we got here just before the best months of the year are about to start- during winter, Maple Island’s average daily temperature is -18 C; and in summer, it’s almost 27 C!

Anyway- this island is almost always overcast, which is why it’s mostly maples here- specifically, sugar maples. They’re some of the most shade tolerant, of the large deciduous trees. Sugar maples grow comfortably in any type of soil excepting sand- which I guess is why I didn’t really see them too often in Gobdark.

Because of the way sugar maples prepare for spring, they’re one of the most important trees here- because, along with the black maple, they’re the major source of sap for making maple syrup. Which isn’t to say other maples can’t be used for maple syrup making- but some have lower sugar contents, or produce a cloudier syrup, or both. The best quality of syrup is crystal clear, and sugary-sweet- and sugar maples produce the very best sap for syrup making.

Tuckleigh actually produces seventy-seven percent of the entire World’s supply of maple syrup- Sakura Kingdom, a more famous winter island, is actually too cold and dark for maple trees to grow.

Maple sap to maple syrup is a forty to one ratio- forty litres of sap make one litre of syrup. That’s why pure maple syrup costs so much- and it’s why I’ve only ever had maple molasses, which is the very lowest grade of syrup there is.
I’m more interested in the wood- which doesn’t come up to market as often, but often enough for my purposes. We’re here for another two months at least; there’s bound to be at least a log I can get my hands on. Sapwood is used more than heartwood; it can be white, and smaller logs tend to have a higher proportion of desirable wood. Bowling alleys and bowling pins are both usually made of rock maple, and Tuckleigh- the name of this country- is actually pretty famous for it’s bowling leagues. I never got interested in bowling, mostly because there just aren’t that many in Ryugu Mergyo. I’d have had to go way into the interior- it was easier to go sledding or ice skating, honestly. Maple is also the wood used for indoor basketball courts, and it’s popular for light-weight baseball bats, along with white ash. Fern has to use a hickory bat because she’s the only one of us- besides Sancho and Cece- to have a full measure of Gyojin strength. Hickory’s the only hardwood that can stand up to their strength, and is also allowed as a material for baseball bats internationally. Oh! And it’s used pretty often in parts of musical instruments, sporting goods, gunstocks, and flooring.

Hm- I don’t think I need curly, quilted, or birdseye maple, which is good because they’re especially valuable. Rock maple is prized for pool cues, especially the shafts… maybe rough staves meant for a pool cue maker? Might be a pool cue maker willing to sell to me… Sugar marks and other cosmetic issues can be compensated for with carefully placed enchantments, so I might be able to snag a pallet of wood meant for production line pool-cues…

Even so, the very best wood for the broom stave will have a very consistent grain, fine and tight, no marks or discoloration. Sugar marks won’t really affect the way the broom eventually flies- but it won’t be as high a quality with, than without.

Rock Maple would be ideal for a broom… except that’s not quite what I want. I want a really, really exquisite piece of Red Maple. Acer rubrum; Native to the New World and the Sabaody Confluence. It averages twenty to thirty meters tall, two-thirds to a full meter round, and has a dried weight of six hundred ten kilograms meter cubed. Specific gravity- point six one at twelve percent MC; Hardness-four thousand two hundred thirty N; Rupture- ninety two point four MPa; Elasticity- eleven point thirty one GPa; Crush strength- forty five point one MPa; Shrinkage- Radial: four percent; Tangential: eight point two percent; Volumetric: twelve point six percent; Tangential to Radial ratio-two to one.

In appearance, unlike most other hardwoods, the sapwood of all maple lumber is most commonly used rather than its heartwood. The color can range from almost white, to a light golden or reddish brown, while the heartwood is a darker reddish brown. Red Maple can also have a curly or guilted grain pattern.

The grain is generally straight, but it can be wavy. It has a fine, even texture. The growth rings of the wood tend to be lighter and less distinct in Red Maple- it’s a soft maple, while Rock Maple is a hard maple.

It’s not terribly durable, so far as decay is concerned- but that’s what magic, and proper varnishing, is for, really.

As for working it- all soft maple tends to be fairly easy to work with both hand and machine tools; maple does have a tendency to burn when machined with high speed cutters, like a router. It turns, glues, and finishes well, though blotches can occur when staining; a pre-conditioner, gel stain, or toner may be necessary to get an even color when staining.

It has no characteristic odor. However, Red Maple, being in the Acer genus, has been reported to cause skin irritation, runny nose, and asthma-like respiratory effects. A respirator is key when working with dry Red Maple, as is properly washing after working with wet Red Maple.

If I have to purchase it, it should be in the moderate range- it’s a very common wood, frankly, though a figured piece (with a curly or quilted grain) is going to be much more expensive.

It’s not a threatened species- thus, it’s use as veneer, paper, boxes, crates, pallets, musical instruments, turned objects, and other small specialty wood items.

Red Maple earns it’s name- it’s flowers, twigs, seeds, and yearly falling leaves are all red of various brightnesses. It’s a common tree, in Ryugu Mergyo, especially Gobdark; and it’s actually fairly easy to find pure stands of it on Maple Island, just... not near the coast. Red Maple wood tends to be slightly heavier, stronger, and harder than other soft maples; though it’ll never be as strong as hard maple without magical intervention.

Fern’s not on the grass deck, napping in the spring sunlight- but the babies are! Hello, babies- aw, they’re asleep. I daren’t get too close- when we came out of the Rainbow Mist, little Brenda was alive, somehow, and... well. I think Nami knows she’s probably not quite the Brenda what dropped from her loins, but... she’s Brenda enough? Well, her middle name is Brenda- her actual first name is something else, Takara-I-think? I was very busy, and she hasn’t stopped crying, and I’m going to find my sister Fern at her favorite tea before she wakes up and starts crying again.

Sancho and Cece haven’t actually slept on the boat in a week and a half- I mean, I see them at meal times, but... They’re either somewhere ashore, or they’re nowhere near Nami and Zoro and the Babies’ rooms. Oh- it’s Beatrix, I haven’t talked to her for awhile...

“Beatrix?”

“Hm?”

“Fern went to that tea room again?”

“Bookstore first, then a gaming shop- apparently they make the best dice,”

“Hm. Tea Room?”

“Tea Room. I’m headed to the Daiso, then a yarn shop that’s on the way; walk with me?”

“Sure!”

Beatrix... it’s funny, but of all my sisters, I know her the least. We’re twins, so, it should be that no other is closer- but, well, we aren’t close. We haven’t had any weird Twin Things happen to us, yet; but... maybe it’s in the subtleties.

She hardly ever gets angry, I know that; her temper is as foul as the rest of ours, but she hardly ever gets worked up enough to let it loose. She’s not shy, like Ellie is; and she’s not shamelessly bold, like Fern. She’s… not quite normal, either, Adelaide is actually the closest to that.

Beatrix is a person, I think, who desperately wants to be normal; she wants to be ordinary. Except, of course, I doubt she has any idea of what she’d do if she were- well, not herself, really. She always hated being the child of a prostitute- not because she looked down on prostitution, but because of how it always made everyone look at her differently. Her scissors… she’s never quite explained how she got hold of them, but Ellie always looks a bit shifty when it comes up in company. She’s always running into weird shitty things, too- like, that thing on Punk Hazard she only just started talking about, when she asked how to pronounce ‘Prudith’ and made a needlepoint portrait of her for the Altar…

That’s like, not exactly normal for her- but she doesn’t really tell us everything about her adventures anymore. Neither do I, of course; but the main difference is that Beatrix can’t say her adventures are anything other than they are; while I never mention them outside the context of work. We all tuned each other’s work problems out- so, while I’m sure I’ve told my sisters about my races, and killing people, and all sorts of things I’ve done- I’m not so sure they actually listened to what I said.

When she’s not training at whatever Mab’s set her on- sewing, still life and figure drawing, reading, writing reports about art and science, Beatrix likes to dance, and read terrible romance novels, and press flowers. Some of these things, she always liked- she always liked pressing flowers- but some of them are new. Hm- she likes talking about music with the Musicians, and she likes taking naps on the grass, and…

As for what she believes in, what her dream is? I don’t know. I don’t think she does, either.

Character? I don’t really know that either- determined, certainly. Compassionate, calculating… observant.

In a sentence: Beatrix is a young woman determined to be the very best at whatever she chooses to be, without losing her own identity in the effort, and with full knowledge that she may very well change what she’s pursuing at some point.

Most of her decisions are influenced by supporting us, actually- how she went about it was her identity showing, but what she did was her… duty? Responsibility? I don’t know.

The only weakness she has- a true weakness, one she has to overcome herself (though not without help, of course,) is self doubt. When she doubts herself, her way forwards, she fails.

She doesn’t like being crowded, or going around in big groups; she’ll use one word where another would use five. She’s not afraid of men; not of what they can do, not of what they’re allowed to do. Deborah, too- but where Deb is fully willing, able to, and has stabbed a man for taking liberties, I’m not sure what Beatrix would do. I don’t think it’s ever come up.

Oh, we’re at the Daiso. This city is laid out oddly, though I guess I’ve only ever been to one real city before- Captain says that Punk Hazard doesn’t count. I guess it makes sense for there to be a sort of, of floating path across the harbor, which leads around a bunch of cliffs, to the ‘front’ of the island. We are Pirates; so weighing anchor in a hidden harbor only makes sense.

The Daiso is of the kind I’d see most often in a small village. I worked as an on-call nurse for the Corallia Postal Office, but that didn’t mean I didn’t have mail duties- I did, of course. But, because I could haul so much with my broom, and breath underwater, I got the jobs that would’ve taken a regular mail courier several weeks. I mean, my slowest trip was the one that took two weeks total-and that was because I got lost, not because I was slow.

Anyway- the Daiso is in a tiny little shack, the kind of store you get way out in the country. A roof of tin on joists that were sealed to the open sea air; thick curtains to keep the wind out, and shutters that roll up and down for heavier things. The track up to it starts as plain dirt, before becoming paved with boards- a boardwalk- and there it is, resting on piers in the water.

There’s a tall shelf towards the sea, full of dry goods and things that don’t mind temperature changes; and there’s another shelf at corner to it, full of house goods. There are cold cases full of vegetables, and fruits, and beer; there’s makeup and cheap Daiso jewelry under the glass counter, where Miss Ikari works the register.

I- oh! This is a neighborhood Daiso; the way the franchising works, there’s international stuff every one of them can sell if they want, but there’s also enough space to sell other things. Beatrix just bought a pair of knitting needles; rock maple, I’ve no doubt, with a sort of red-blonde color to the softly blazing wood. In the light, the needles flicker like flames…

I’m not good with two complex tasks in each hand; so, while Beatrix searched through the needles, I looked at the crochet hooks. None of them really felt right until I found one of the smallest ones there; a tiny little thing meant for lace, I think. It felt right in my hand, and it was just the same color as my sisters needles; same grain, same everything. I’d bet good money they came from the same tree.

We pay for our cheap knitting tools, and then we continue through to the city. This city we’re docked in isn’t the capital; it’s called Ontria, and it’s the most… hm, I’m not sure of the word to use, really. The buildings squat and perch between stands of green, like quail in the rushes; each building perched on another, larger fellow, and made of a pale yellow-toned white stone. The people wander through it, all unaware of the vastness of their home, the color of it- green, so green, green and white and golden in the mid-morning sunlight, mountains made by men of cut stone and planted trees.

It didn’t look like this as much as a week ago; all was cold and black and bare as bones, but now, it’s all burst alive again- even with the scaly sky, which Nami says is a sure sign of rain or snow, there’s something cheerful and energetic about this place.

Walking through snow isn’t fun; it was for the first five minutes, then it got old, and now I have to wear boots everytime I go outside. I’m not a fan; it didn’t snow hard in Corallia, and certainly never in Gobdark.

I’ve never actually been to this part of town; I usually end up more around the trades area, where woodworkers, well, work. The smell of the wood is comforting and enticing, after literal months of being secluded in the broom shed, working on something that never quite works out.

Something I can make work out, however, is crochet. During the winter, when New Year’s would loom and all the social expectations with it- the expectation was, we’d be getting new clothing for the New Year. As time went on, it became more and more clear to us that if we wanted new clothing, we’d have to devise ways of getting it ourselves- Mom certainly wouldn’t be able to.
In Gobdark, most women- people, really, but especially women- don’t actually wear Gyojin kimono unless they’ve business with gyojin. Merrow wear clothing that has more in common with nets, I guess? Beatrix had to write a full research paper about it, and she ended up picking my brain because… well, I’m good at crochet. How good?

Good enough I seriously considered doing crochet for commission- in truth, I did make a few pieces on commission. A wedding dress; a baby blanket; and some lace. I think I discovered medicine, a passion for medicine I mean, when Mom got sick and the doctors wouldn’t do anything about it. Before then, I wanted nothing more than to crochet and race- those were my passions, when I wasn’t contemplating my own death.

I’m actually extremely proud of the wedding dress I made. It photographed white, but in person it was actually a very delicate shade of pink; and the bride was so happy to get married, the dress was just… gilding, really. I think she’d have been as beautiful in a flour sack dress, but no. No, her dress was of thin silken thread, stitched double for speed and beautifully intricate.

As for me, well- I want a hat. A muffler? I’ll have to do some drawing…

My boots are brown and furry, just like my sisters; and we’re both wearing fleecy jeans, though mine are a bit clingier, around the thighs; and while I am content with a simple yellow sweater I borrowed from Mab (and it’s oversized proportions, thank goodness for scarves), Beatrix is more comfortable in a winter-weight band t-shirt she got off of Bang for something involving Cricket Tunes (I didn’t ask), and a fleece lined denim jacket that used to be Sancho’s. It’s got flour-sack cloth patches here and there, reinforced with band patches from events Sancho got swag for, but never actually attended.

The project I’m going to make today is a two-pattern project meant for knitting, not crochet, which means I’m going to have to do some calculations. Thank goodness I’ve got my bag with me; I’ve got my pencil case, the patterns, and a soroban. Everything I need, really- aside from the yarn, of course. Should I have done the patterning before hand?

Sure.

Are there tables for doing pattern shit at the store we’re going to next?

Absolutely.

Inside a Knitting Store is always a good memory for me; the quietness, the order, the soft things it’s okay to touch… it’s a place full of good memories.

Converting a pattern isn’t quite as good a memory, but- here’s what needs to be done. Using the knit gauge for the pattern I’ve chosen (sts per inch and rows per inch - it should be stated in the pattern), convert the numbers to inches or centimetres. You should then be able to come up with a rough sketch (if none is provided) of the size and shape of the garment piece. So long as you use the measurements or stitch count for the same size garment all the way through, you should be fine.

This project is two patterns- the first, a textured beanie I made several times as a beginner. When finished, it looks quite a bit like a knitted hat. It’s worked flat, then seamed and bunched at the top. I’ll need worsted weight yarn, approximately a hundred ten meters; a size eight hook; and as for color… hm, yellow worsted weight angora blend, I suppose. Thin dowels or- no, disposable chopsticks, because I’m making an urchin hat. Making a hat is making a hat; no need to convert anything, I know just what to do.

As for the spines, I need a three and a quarter millimeter hook, ‘enough’ DK or worsted weight yarn to make the spines, the chopsticks, and a darning needle. I get self-ombreing yellow-to-white angora blend DK, the same amount as the yellow. Oh, yes- and stitch counters, I don’t quite know what happened to mine...

I have to say, this is a lovely store- I’ve never been in one without being followed by the staff or proprietor before. It’s… odd. Not bad- it’s nice being… I don’t know, trusted to act like a regular law-abiding member of society; but it’s… different. I kind of feel… guilty? Maybe? Because. I’m not a law-abiding member of society anymore. I’m a pirate. Kind of. In the definition.

“I need to go to Daiso again- meet up at the Tea Room?”

“Uh- sure. Making a hat?”

“Yeah; an urchin hat,”

“Oh! Well- wait, why not get batting instead? Like, they sell roving here; get plenty of that, and you won’t have to use chopsticks,”

“Oh; and it’d be soft, too. Sure, thank you,”

The cheapest roving they have isn’t the undyed, but the bleached white- it’s a little strange, but… I don’t really question it.

Fern’s favorite Tea Room is a place called Teariffic: it’s a popular place for all sorts of artists and intellectuals, students from the local Mage’s Tower, witches and wizards and martial artists. Fern’s been talking with the Mistress of the House, to see if she can rent a table or booth and do her fortune telling and prophesying there; so far, she’s getting a good response. Right now, it’s just about her lunch break- a good time to stop by and see if she… well, Mab said to ask her my questions, and see what she thinks about broom making, involve her in my process.

The building Teariffic is in nestles between the end of a bridge and the unmarked half of a churchyard, and it’s old because it didn’t ever get crushed under ice or catch fire; the floor is made of uneven stones and mud, and the walls are plastered and delicately painted with all sorts of frescoes. Beatrix and I have to cross the bridge, and go inside the bottom half of the building- the Tea Room restricts its access to an indoor stairwell, which is… actually pretty smart.

It’s certainly safer for her than a public park, even a nice one. Fern being able to work in a place you have to go through somewhere else to get to- have to be vetted to go into, just a little… for me, it’s relieving. The place you have to go through is an apothecary, one styled more like a department store than a chemist’s. For the purposes of the Tea Room… well, you buy your tea, and your first pot of boiling water, and you rent your tea set and table at the apothecary level; then, you go upstairs and you sit at your table (you’re given a number); and then, after a moment to settle, one of the waitstaff brings you your tea set, and your tea leaves, and whatever accoutrements deemed appropriate for the tea in question, be it sugar and milk and lemon wedges, or nothing at all. It’s a Longarm place- it was founded by Longarms, and Longarms are mostly the regulars in the Tea Room.
That doesn’t bother me, or Fern I expect- I just thought it was interesting. I think I’ve always thought of Longarms as very... sophisticated, culturally, but that might be a generalization. There are many distinct nations within the Longarm Tribe, and each nation has its own distinctive style and comportment. I don’t know enough about the intricacies of Longarm society to say which nation of Longarm had a particularly extended hand in the aesthetics of Teariffic- but, because of the way you purchase space, time, and tea in that Tea Room, I can say for sure that a Longarm was behind it.

Longarms are passionate, and mercenary. The only real difference from a Longarm and a Lanjin- in theory- is their extra elbow. Everything else- their feud with the Longleg Tribe, their worth as slaves to the former Nobility, even their martial arts practices- shares a lot with Gyojin.

Gyojin weren’t native to Ryugu Mergyo, did you know that? Back then, they were called Kappa; it means ‘Fish Men’, or so I was told. I have my doubts. The whole island of Ryugu Mergyo used to be coral; but when the Kappa came, they cut down the Bone Forests, and they scattered the humble peoples who lived within them. Kappa used to live cheek to cheek with the Longarm; and when the Longlegs kicked the Longarm’s down hard enough, all the Longarms could do was push the Kappa away. History always gets written by whoever can afford to take the time to sit down with a brush and ink and paper- but even so, the people of Gobdark remember. We remember, because the Kappa could not get into the kingdom that stood where Gobdark now stands; and they could not cut down it’s Red Bone Forest, and they could not hold it under their power without the Merrow’s full approval, which they did not have.

So, I guess what I mean to say is, I have conflicting feelings about Longarms. On the one fin, they’re people, same as anyone else; on the other, their actions are directly responsible for much of the suffering of people who look like my sisters, my friends, the people I grew up with and watched die. In one webbed hand, it is not their fault- they weren’t even born yet, how could they bear responsibility for the actions of their ancestors? In the other: they bear the names of those ancestors that so ruined the lives of my own. If they would proudly bear the standard of those who wronged my kin, then they must accept responsibility for all things that standard has been party to- good, and ill.

My mother was a Demon; but my sisters and I had a sire, too, and he- for it was no secret to us who he was- could track his Line back to the very beginning of the written record of all things that had happened to the people of Coral Island- for it is not an island that belongs to Fishmen alone. My sisters and I, one and all, are Merrow; and, in the countless generations since our kingdoms, our pride, our honor was stolen from us, the blood of our tribe has grown thinner and weaker with each generation. The last Prince of the Merrow was a man called Ashitaka; when he died, so too did the spirit of our united people.

For all that, it’s a nice place. Open, without being airy; friendly, without being cloying. If I was anyone else, I’d probably quite like it. But I am not; and I do not, save that my sister Fern plys her trade here. Looking more closely, it has clear Demonic influences as well- the preying-bird over the fireplace, the poster on the wall, the ship and the lanterns…

People forget that France was settled by people of the North Blue; and that Germa, though famous, isn’t actually the central location of the Demonic soul. France is; Germa, the Wandering Country, is not.

Beatrix and I sit down at Fern’s table, in the back corner; Fern, reading her book and finishing off a sandwich, flashes a quick smile our way. I pour myself a cup of tea to warm my fingers up; and it’s… black tea. Explains the sugar, milk, and lemon.

I couldn’t learn Astrology on Ryugu Mergyo. For one thing, it just was not popular- I had exactly one customer ask me to interpret their birth chart. I did it in this way- I made a copy of their chart, and then I went to the library and looked up how one goes about reading an astrology birth chart, and what each sign means; and then, when my customer returned, I helped them go through each portion of their chart as best I could.

This is the only time I was ever asked to do anything pertaining to astrology in five years. I kept the notes- but it’s different up here. For one thing, a lot of what the regulars in this Tea Room want are birth charts, and… well.

I’m an oracle; my job is interpreting meaning from what others may see as meaningless. I’m not, technically speaking, psychic- I can’t read minds, and I can’t see the future anything like clearly. As far as I can tell, if an astrologer says they’re psychic, you must distrust them immediately, because it means they don’t want to do the math, they just want your money.

Longarms- which frequent this Tea Room at a ratio of twenty to five for everyone else- put an almost inordinate amount of faith in their astrological birth charts. The roots of my understanding of astrology lie in the two pages of notes I made to try and interpret the birth chart my customer begged my help with. So, as follows:

People are influenced by their nature, and the method of their nurturing, and by the state of the heavens at the moment of their birth. The planets and constellations are basic forces, tools which we live by and the basis of our very matter. These forces take on different forms, depending on their position within the zodiac and on the way they relate to one another. A general understanding of a person and their potential can be formed by carefully noting, analyzing, and concluding a person’s natal chart. A person is not the stars alone; do not discount personal experience.

It took maybe a half-day for me to realize I wasn’t being given much attention because I wasn’t advertising astrology. I bought the Ephemeris then, and I haven’t looked back. Here’s the thing about astrology: many believers combine interest with ignorance- they can tell you the traits of people born under Taurus, but couldn’t pick it out of a lineup if it beat them over the head with a brick and stole their wallet. This is the definition of blind faith; and I don’t believe in coddling those who put give their faith blindly. Faith is not a noun; it’s a verb.

Performing a reading begins with the basics: figuring out your sign- well, really, making your birth chart. There are thirteen signs, which correspond to thirteen constellations, and they are not chosen randomly.

The constellations are at a twenty-three degree angle to the planet; they wrap around it like a belt, a very ornate and star-studded belt. The ecliptic is the apparent path of the sun over the course of a year; the zodiac, whichever version one uses, only deals with constellations inside this orbit. It takes about a lunar month- twenty eight days or so- for the sun to go through each constellation, and there are thirteen months to every year. The zodiac only deals with constellations inside this orbit, which is why no one is a Souten Cross or an Orion.

When people wink at you and say ‘hey, babe, what’s your sign?’ they’re asking about your sun sign; literally the sign the sun was in on the date of your birth, and since it takes a month for that to change… but it’s just one of your signs.

For a natal astrological chart, you need to know when and where you were born- down to the minute, and the latitude and longitude, if possible. Then, you can get the most accurate read on what your chart actually is- because, you see, the stars change through the day.

In simple terms, then: your sun sign is your outward persona; your rising is the characteristics you use to cope with life. To get a good prediction from a general horoscope, as seen in most newspapers, you need to read both signs and mesh their advice together as best you can.

The exact time of birth is necessary for fairness- proper astrologists convert every birthdate to Sabaody Mean Time, Paradise; it’s only fair, after all. This information allows an astrologer to reconstruct the exact position of the stars, moons, and planets at the very moment of a person’s birth; recreating the belt our planet was wearing at the moment a person was born.

The Ephemeris is the tool that every astrologist ever has used since about five thousand years before the modern calendar. Mine is a paperback omnibus reprint I got at the resold book store; clean pages, has both covers, very nice diagrams and tables, good black ink on the printed pages still.

It’s a book full up with page after page of tables: numbers and dates and esoteric symbols that represent very real things. This is how I recreate the belt. In down time between customers- that’s anywhere between half an hour to three hours- I’ve been copying and reorganizing the book into a binder I brought from home, carefully making sense of the massive store of information at my fingertips. For one thing, the book isn’t that great for flipping through at speed; for another, my Device can handle all the calculations, provided I input the data correctly.

Locating the stars is only the beginning; mostly, astrology is based on the position of the planets and constellations in relation to your sign. It’s nearly impossible to keep it all straight in your head, so astrologers make charts: circles that are divided into twelve because it’s easy, but I do thirteen because it’s right. Each house corresponds to a portion of the ecliptic, and a number, and an associated sign, and it’s own character. The stars move every moment; and so, every moment is unique.

The reason it takes me a month to do the monthly horoscopes? I still have to look up each planet and constellation and star, and plot it’s coordinates by hand. I chart a month’s worth of points and assess what they mean as a whole, as well as what the progression over time means. My Device just makes things faster - if I want it to be accurate, I still have to know what I’m actually asking it to do.

There’s more- there’s always more. But that’s all I really need to worry about; the Longarms I make charts for know more about reading their charts than I do.

In case it isn’t obvious, I’m not an astrologer. I’m a fortune teller. That’s why I was so happy to have my sisters come by and ask me for help.

“You need me to tell you a fortune? Really??”

“...Yes. I have money-?”
“Oh thank goodness- okay, what do you need?”

“Well, you know I’ve been trying to make a broom for several weeks, now. I finally got a chance to talk to Missus Mab about it, and she says that I need to do a few things- but what I need help with is finding a Red Maple tree willing and able to give me a proper stave for a broom like Mom’s, on this island or within this island’s waters, if possible,”

“So… you want a full work up? Auspicious days and times and weather, markings on a map for where you can find what you want and when, what to bring with you, what to leave behind...”

“And anything else you can think of, yeah,”

“Half-payment first, and then I’ll get started- have you had lunch yet?”

“Nah- and I’ve got a crochet project to work on too, so, don’t worry about time,”

“Yessssssss-”

“Pffftahahahaha-”

As my sisters- Beatrix was there too, and she almost never needs fortunes told but when she does they’re doozies- sunk their teeth into lunch, and then projects they’d brought along to spend the time, I sunk my teeth into my actual trade. It was… indescribably wonderful.

I heard, vaguely, quite a bit of gasping and murmuring while I was cheerfully going about my work- I mean, that was the first time I’d actually smiled while working, so that might have been it?

I’m not great at astrology, I have to say- I’m slow, and it’s not intuitive for me the way literally every other method of divination- even the ones I don’t do or haven’t really practiced, I still have some idea about how to go about doing them. Astrology is just mathemagic, and not super complicated mathemagic either. I mean, yeah, I have to do logarithms and I’m… ugh.

Mab taught me to do it like this, seeing as I have no calculator that can do the job for me.

This method uses only multiplication and subtraction. The procedure produces digit by digit, so I can stop whenever I have enough digits to be getting on with.

For example, Log 2 + 0.30103…

If we take the 10th power:

Log \(2^{10}\) = 10 * 0.30103… = 3.0103

Then the digits in the logarithm have all shifted 1 place to the left.

But also: \(2^{10} = 1024\)

Thus, the log of 1024 must be 3 point something something, because 1024 is slightly over 1000. If I can find the 10th power on a normal calculator, we know the first digit of the logarithm by looking at the number before the decimal point:

0 - 9 = >0
10 - 99 = >1
100 - 999 = >2
1000 - 9999 = >3

And so on. Knowing this, we also know that log 1024 has to be 3.------; because we can see that the log of anything between 1000 and 9999 must be 3. Something.

Knowing this, we know that log 1024 is 3.------. We’ve retrieved the first digit of log 2.
Subtract 3 from this number, and do the previous procedure again, and we get the next number.

The 10th power is easily calculated on paper by multiplying a number by itself 3 times:

2 X 2 =4
4 X 4 = 16
16 X 16 = 256

And the multiplying 256 with the result of the first calculation: 4

256 X 4 = 1024

So 4 multiplications in total.

I divide 1024 by 1000 to get 1.024

Doing the same procedure I get:

1.2676506
So the next digit is 0.
And then taking 1.2676506 through this procedure I get:

10.715806

So the next digit is 1.

I divide 10.715806 by 10 to get 1.0715806

And then taking 1.0715806 through this procedure I get:

1.995063

So the next digit is 0.

And then taking 1.995063 through this procedure I get:

999.00506

So the next digit is 2.

However since it is so close to 1000 we can round the digit to 3.

Now we have

3.0103

I hate logarithms. I hate the repetition, I hate the simplicity, I hate going through the same table each time… It’s awful. I don’t like doing it. Fortune telling is much more fun- I get to tell a story about all the data I can gather and all the information I have access to.

For example- all I need for this is a tourist map of the island, and not even a very good one, and a tourists guiding pamphlet.

Where the best sugar maple stands and plantations are- plus where the furniture makers keep their main offices; add in what I know about Red Maples… full sun exposure for size, soil composition, migration patterns for the past three hundred years… got it!

“Do you have a good map of the island?”

“Yeah- I got one from the board of tourism, better than the free one,”

“Nice! Hand it over- you need to check here, here, and here within the next month. Try to go between midnight and two in the afternoon; you’ll need at least one hatchet, a candle, a blanket, a small pouch, and probably some rope. Hmm- you’ll need a cross between snow boots and climbing boots, and you need to be ready to do some mild mountain climbing. The branch you seek bears three brooms within, but they shall be as one; seek the toad everlasting, and build a blaze of leaves and branches; take the stone, and hold it safe within your keeping; with stone in hand, the pooka will poison you not; seek the tree of your life in the rising of the sun,”

“Thank you, Fern. Here’s the rest I owe- Beatrix, you coming with, or you good?”

“I’m good, thanks,”

“Sure. Fern- tonight, I have something else I want to talk to you about, so, remind me okay?”

“Sure thing!”

Fern doesn’t look like a fortune teller or an astrologer. Honestly, she looks like a teenage girl studying for an exam- a weird one. I mean, she’s wearing the Green Monster, and a pair of fleece-lined jeans and snow boots like the rest of us- it’s a sweater the same way Mom was a whore; both are actually factually correct, but severe understatements anyway.

I had no idea she kept the damn thing; it’s one of the first things Beatrix ever knit with purpose, and while it’s not, like, perfect, it’s still better than anything I could have made, or that Fern could have made for herself.

Fern has long, bright hair, smooth and straight and faintly gleaming, and her Device looks like flowers made of metal resting on her head like a laurel. On the table she’s rented out by the week, not the hour, there’s a stack of paper, a calligraphy set (not a super nice one, but serviceable), a soroban, dice and a book called the Ephemeris. Fern herself is wearing a pair of glasses that make her look like she has stars in her eyes- Havij helped to make them, and apparently they do a lot to keep her Visions from overwhelming her. Her bag is bright yellow with black checks on it; and it’s from that bag she pulled the tools she needed for my fortune.

While I waited, I listened to what everyone around me was talking about- it’s a poor woman who can’t do something with her hands and listen to something else at the same time.

So.

Most pertinent to my quest is this: the Grave of Winifred Foster.

Once, long ago, a girl named Winnie lived in the forest that would become this city, which used to be a tiny town called Treegap. Though she and a small wandering family called the Tuckleighs were the only ones to know it then, a small spring that burbled up near her house had a secret- it could give anyone who drank from it, not quite immortality, but definitely extreme longevity and health.
The spring dried up— but for many years, Winnie kept a store of the spring water, using only a drip here and a drop there, before finally… well, word got around about the water, and rather than bring destruction and misery to her people, she poured all the water out into an old frog pond— excepting one solitary bottle, which she gave to her favorite Rock Maple tree.

Over the many, many centuries since that time, Treegap changed a great deal. The woods that used to surround the tiny village had changed from mostly birch to mostly maple; and all those people who had come hunting for the spring had ended up staying due to the way the harbour iced up in winter. One thing lead to another, and soon a thriving little city grew where once only farmhouses stood.

From then until now, no one has ever managed to find the frog pond, the maple tree, or the grave of Winifred Foster— called Winnie, while she lived— since. My sister has marked three places on my map, and described a triangle of space with those points; and within, she has written in her quiet way, ‘grave, then toad, then tree; do in this order, three’.

Cryptic? Maybe.

Do I have an idea of what to do anyway? Yes.

I go to the nearest Daiso, and purchase three plates, single pieces of cultery— a fork, a knife— some butter, the smallest jar of real maple syrup they have, a pancake batter dispenser— nothing like one of these for making batches of thirty, or doing pancake art— a squeezy bottle, and some of the little novelty toad shaped candles, on sale for sixty beri a piece. I buy four of them; it’s a good deal, and I know Fern will want one. I also buy a little offering candle in it’s own little glass cup, ready to go.

It’s too late to go questing today; but I’m not going today, I need to prepare.

Sanji’s kitchen is massive, scary, and usually occupied by someone; I’m not ashamed to admit that I don’t go in there without good reason. This, even beyond my ultimate goal, is a good reason; and there’s Cece, she’d be interested in this.

“Hey Cece— do you want to come to a graveyard with me tomorrow?”

“Wa-hey-hey— Hell yes! Uh— what’s with the nervous look?”

“I’m trying to prepare a pancake mix for tomorrow, but I don’t want to go into Sanji’s kitchen alone, and I’m trying to suck it up but it’s scary in there and—”

“Shush, I’ll go with. Come on, come, come,”

Much better. When it comes down to it, we’re all just trying to find the best way to get along. This isn’t something I can actually let anyone else do for me— the offering loses strength that way. I can’t gather the ingredients together myself, but I can mix them together, and cook them— gods bless her, but Deborah can’t really do that for me, I’d have to do one or the other myself.
So, to start with- there’s a big recipe book that all the Cool Kids, and even Mister Sanji sometimes, refer to- and it’s in this cabinet… here! This is the one! It looks like a book all about half naked women, and while it’s definitely full of those, it’s actually a cookbook. A very well loved and note covered cookbook.

Mab’s asleep on the couch again, and Sanji’s sitting with her, scribbling in a notebook- he looked up when we came in, but-

“So, pancakes- or waffles, the basic recipe is very similar… would that be in bread, pastry, or breakfast?”

“Is there an index-?”

“No, but- hm, breakfast is kinda small… no pancakes here; it’s not in pastry, the recipes are grouped by method; and it’s not in bread either, but that was really a longshot, it’s more of a short bread or a griddle bread…”

“You really learned a lot in Home Clown Economics, huh?”

“Haha, yeah- I had a lot of fun, but… it’s not really my thing. Hm, it’s such a basic recipe- it might not be in the book at all. Let me see if it’s in desserts- no, that’s waffles, and… no, that’d make a very nice thin waffle, but that’s not what we’re after. Hm. Okay, well- I know a recipe for pancakes that’ll work just fine,”

“Okay- what tools should I get?”

“Hm- we’re going to need a mixing bowl, a sifter, and somewhere to put it all afterwards, a container- and I guess the tape carrell to label it?”

“Wash your hands first!” calls Sanji, mildly, from across the room.

“Mm! Uh-” I say, as I wash my hands, and then rummage through the cabinets for the tools, and then bring them over to the counter where Cece is setting out ingredients, “Cece, how much will this make?”

“Oh, uh, enough for about four batches of pancakes or waffles- so that’s between forty eight and sixty pancakes, and thirty two and forty waffles. So… like, not quite enough for everyone to have a waffle, but enough for everyone to have one pancake. So… I guess if you wanted to make it a day in advance for regular breakfast, you’d double the recipe,”

“Okay- do we need measuring cups and spoons?”

“Yeah, but I have them, and a butter knife- you remember how to measure flour?”

“Yup!”

“Okay, measure eight cups into the sifter,”

“Sure- and that’s half a cup of sugar, right?”

“Yup; then it’s two tablespoons of baking powder, two teaspoons of baking soda, and one and a half teaspoons of salt; okay, and-”

“Two more cups of flour, hang on-”
“When you’re done measuring it out, sift it all together,”

“Okay!”

After I sift everything together, I carefully pour it all into a storage container, and put the lid on; Cece wrote out ‘Pancake/Waffle Dry Mix’ onto a piece of blue tape, and after carefully cutting it and folding over the edge for a pull tab, she put it on the side of the container. When Deborah studies something, everyone around her learns it too; and Cece and I sleep in the same room she does.

“So, how much per batch?”

“Two cups- oh, should I put that on there too?”

“I mean- we didn’t have it, so it couldn’t hurt, I guess?”

“I’d prefer if you did, thank you,” calls Sanji again.

“Welp,”

On goes the label.

“So- the dry mix is literally just the dry ingredients for pancakes or waffles, right?”

“Yeah,”

“So… what are the wet ingredients?”

“Eggs, milk, butter, and vanilla extract; cinnamon, sometimes, or whatever else you want to include. For pancakes, you want two large eggs, two cups of milk, six tablespoons of cooled melted butter, and a teaspoon of vanilla extract; for waffles, you want the same amount of eggs, one and three fourth cups of milk, four tablespoons of cooled melted butter, and a teaspoon of vanilla extract,”

“Any tips for pancakes?”

“Mm- oh, one more thing to add to the mix- you should shake it before you use it, then measure out how much you need. Combine the wet ingredients before adding to the dry, and add them together slowly. Stir about ten times, less if it’s humid, and let it sit for a good ten or fifteen minutes. The more you stir, the more gluten gets created- you want just a little bit, not a whole lot,”

“What about cooking them?”

“Um, let me see… you’ll want to use a griddle or a large nonstick pan, over medium heat. Once the cook surface is to temperature, coat it with butter or oil, once before you start and then after every finished pancake. Pour about a fourth of a cup of batter onto the hot surface; space them out a little. When large bubbles begin to form and pop on the whole surface, not just the edge- takes like, two or three minutes- flip them and cook another minute or so. You’ll never get both sides evenly brown, so, don’t overcook trying to,” “Gotcha. Any tips for pancake art?”

“Um… use a squeeze bottle and practice?”

“That’s all-?”

“There’s really not much else to it, Genny; sorry to disappoint,”

“So… this whole time, your sakura pancakes were the product of a squeeze bottle?”

“Nothing but a squeeze bottle and a dried fruit grinder for the cherries, yeah; oh, well, and some food coloring.”

“Wow,”

“Can’t get pink pancakes without food coloring,”

“Oh my god,”

“Well, I had to do something to make the powdered milk taste better, leaving it for a day only does so much-”

“True-”

“And pancakes… you’re supposed to put like, powdered sugar or syrup or preserved fruit on top, so, yeah,”

“Hang about, you can make powdered milk taste… more like milk?” asks a very sleepy looking Mab, Sanji right at her side. They’re sitting at the bar, both of them very interested.

I actually know about this, as it was my job.

“It’s not the easiest thing, but it’s definitely possible. So, to start with, you need to pick the right powdered milk. Instant milk is cheapest; regular dry milk tastes the worst and lasts longest; and powdered whole milk tends to taste the best, but it’s got a much more limited shelf life. Then, you have to reconstitute it properly- everything but regular dry milk tastes better with cold water,”

“Regular dry milk is legit the worst,”

“Fo’real. Um, once you’ve reconstituted it, if you have to drink it that day, it’s best to get a small amount of real liquid milk and combine them; otherwise, wait a day, with the milk either in a cold box, or if it’s safe to have unchilled, out on the counter. The longer you can let it reconstitute, the better,”

“Of course, if you need it to be like whole milk- like you’re baking-”

“Ah, right- if you need to add fat, then you have to add egg powder first. It acts as an emulsifier, and makes things bind together that otherwise wouldn’t. Um, you could also use straight sea-cow milk, but again, you have to add egg powder; the fats are too… fatty, otherwise, I guess. I know it doesn’t work without the egg powder,”

“And I suppose adding things, like sugar or syrup, makes it better as well?” said Sanji.

“Honestly, eating it with a sugary cereal, like Cinnabunbun Toasties, is best; the sweet taste of the cinnamon sugar covers the awful taste of dessicated milk,"

I hummed, and then looked at Cece.

“Your should teach Sanji your sakura pancake recipe; you always make them at the end of sakura season, but with so many people… it might be easier if you had help, you know? Sakura season’s over, like, the day after tomorrow- even the hardiest of trees have stopped blooming by now,”

“Mmhmm; she’s right, actually. Even the orchards back home have all started working on fruit now; the first cherry harvests have already started by now,”

“Ah, yes- I’d forgotten, but your home is by the sea, and when you had to do something about desertification, you planted cherry trees… can we get some of the harvest?”

“If we pay for it, certainly; let me think, there’s the fruit of course, but there’s also candied cherry blossoms, cherry preserves, cherry liqueur, cherry mead… cherry soda, well, syrup, we’d have to provide our own soda- it’s a popular summer flavor,”

“Hm. I like cherries,”

“Mhm. I’ll put an order in; you can take a look at the catalogue, if you’d like?”

Eugh. Lovey-dovey stuff.

I pull out my edc notebook, and start sketching out the design I’m going to make on the pancake; not too complicated, but obvious…

Honestly, this is like designing a flag.

Vexillology, the study of flags, has five principles. I learned this from a radio series about design; and it was a series about all kinds of things, buildings and toothbrushes and mascots and wayfinding and fonts. The mission of the series was to get people- like me- to engage with the design that we care about, like… you don’t realize you have hard, serious opinions about fonts until you realize that, say, Arial is purpose built for people with dyslexia to be able to read. By listening to this show, I began to pay attention to all forms of design; and I used to listen to it with Beatrix.

Bea, obviously, got inspired by it in a different way than I did.

I like flags. People don’t expect that of me, but I do- and people also don’t expect that they care about flags, but they do. One hundred out of one hundred people care about flags, even if they can’t say why.

What I, personally, love most about flags, is that once you understand the design of a good flag, you can understand the design of almost anything.

There are five basic principles of flag design. Number one, keep it simple. A flag should be so simple that a young child could draw it from memory.

I learned to draw the Germa’s Six-sixty when I was a young girl; it’s a circle with two curved rays coming off of it, vertical for peacetime, horizontal for war. It’s a bright yellow mark, on a blue ground. Very simple. You use both the vertical and horizontal sixty to represent the entire country; clockwise rotation is proper.

Until I was about, oh, six or so, I didn’t know Gobdark, too, had a flag. It’s a plain red circle, on a black ground. Also very simple. Corallia’s is two pink branch things, easily recognized as coral, on a black ground with white bars at top and bottom. Simple. Dunshilly is a curve representing a hill, thick and black, on a green and yellow ground, slashed diagonally bottom left-top right. Less simple, but still recognizable.

Number two, use meaningful symbolism. The flag’s images, colors, or patterns should relate to what it symbolizes.

For the Germa flag, the blue ground represents the ocean, as the Germa Kingdom is sea-faring; the yellow represents their traditional occupation as army for hire; and the shape of the symbol, the six-sixty, represents their sixty-six day long empire. Gobdark- a city walled on all sides by red coral that grows nowhere else, so deep that the light of Eve only just reaches the tallest buildings. Corallia—known for it’s pink coral, the black makes the pink pop and gives it a connection to Gobdark (as the upwards swimming people of Gobdark tend to move to Corallia), and the white marks it as a safe harbor and neutral party to intra-city politics. Dunshilly- the curve is the hills, so famous in that place, the green and yellow- farming and wealth.

Number three, use two to three basic colors. Unless the color has specific significance, use the standard color set- red, yellow, blue, green, orange, black, and white.

When Mom knew she was going to die, she told us all that she was to be buried, or shrouded, or burnt, wrapped in the Germa flag. When people held funerals in Gobdark, it was always under the Gobdark flag. Miss Shyarly had a Corallia flag hanging in her office. Almost every working-class house in Dunshilly flew their flag; and most mansions did too, though it was under the national flag of RM.

The flag we fly is pretty great, actually- a little bit busy, but very nice all the same. Tuckeleigh’s flag, on the other hand… not so much.

The main component of the Tuckeleigh flag is the amphibian that could be a toad or a frog; which everyone from here knows symbolizes the mythic pond in which both lived, where Winnie poured away all that magic water. This is a big change from the flag immediately put into use after the expansion of Treegap- a girl pouring an amphora of water, which became an amphora pouring water. I, personally, think it ought to be a Maple leaf- a non-descript maple leaf, meant to be identified immediately as a maple leaf but not, perhaps, as a specific kind of maple leaf.

Number four, no lettering or seals. Never use writing of any kind, especially if it’s meant to be seen from a distance. You cannot, and should not have to, read a flag that’s functionally the size of an index card.

The flag of the Marines is almost good- except more often than not, they stamp a big ol’ MARINES on it in navy blue, which. No. Tuckeleigh also has lettering on it- and I just… if anything, you’d want a T, not a W, for the flag meant to represent this place. If you have to write the name of what you’re representing on your flag, the symbolism has failed. Design it again.
You know, national flags tend to behave— they have to. The stakes of a nation’s flag are high; they are on an international stage, after all. City, state, and regional flags? Not so much. There is a scourge of terrible flags in this world, and they must be stopped. That’s the truth and the dare in one; and the first step is to recognize that there is a problem at all.

Number five, be distinctive. You need to be different from your neighbors. Those are the five rules.

Design wise, if you can understand and follow those five rules— simplicity, deep meaning, mindful color usage, no writing your user can’t read, and uniqueness— you can apply them to designing almost anything. Anything.

Good design rules aren’t followed in all that many cities across the world, certainly not for their flags— it’s considered less important, than, say, finding money to fund education or repairing the roads. The capital city of Germa, Paris— look, the island the country of Germa is on is called France, and it used to be in North Blue, and I don’t get why it’s still a winter island even though it travels and I shouldn’t have to— but the flag of Paris is a blue and red vertically divided field on which sits a pure white fleur-de-lis. According to Mom, in Paris, you can find that flag everywhere— tattooed on people’s bodies, flapping from every municipal building, on stickers and graffiti and worn as fashion items. Everywhere.

When city leaders say they don’t have time or money to redesign their city flag, that it isn’t important, what they’re missing is that the flag of a place is a symbol around which a community can rally.

Anyway. Understanding flag design helps me understand offering design. The shelf— the altar, or as Havij and Neo call it, the offrenda, has to be wide enough for all our offerings to sit without touching each other; it has to be varnished, and there are actually three shelves, now, reaching up higher and higher. Mom’s offering is a kokeshi with her name on a piece of paper, written in my best calligraphy, inside.

Names are powerful, everyone knows that— and the more beautifully the name is written, the more beloved the person it belongs to. As for the kokeshi, it was something she picked for herself, which meant we had to use it.

For Winnie… well, pancakes are so popular, and so old… everyone has a way of doing them. That story I overheard— she poured the water on her favorite maple tree. And I know from Fern, frogs will eat anything they can fit in their mouths. Pancakes aren’t all that big.

So.

I guess what I mean to say is that, figuring out what to offer someone you’ve no connection to, someone who’s died… it’s really just an extension of that quest for immortality. I think the fear, the longing for immortality, is really two things— being afraid to die; and wanting to know.

Ellie’s like that second one— she always wants to know, everything, about everything. Me too, really. Beatrix hasn’t said much about it, but her goddess, Zul— well, Tellicherry explained something to me in the Barn, once.
“Roathus says that knowledge, all knowledge, is holy. It is the holiest thing there is, and the hunger for it is His blessing and His curse,"

Once you begin to learn anything, once you begin to seek knowledge out for its own sake, that hunger will never be slaked. At the same time, the gaining of new knowledge will become a pleasure like nothing else. Ecstasy and plague; Roathus-

Tellicherry says that there are aspects of all the other Pantheopaly in each individual God or Goddess- that Pyth, Order and Commotion, is in all things. If that is true, then Zul, Truth and Secrets, is in all things too. Tellicherry said the true Mystery of Pyth is Power; Mab said the true Mystery of Zul is Faith.

Roathus, the Gorging Host; the God of Thirst and Plenty. The Gorging Host grows ever larger yet remains insatiable, His eyes awash in tears. There are some who call him The Hunger; but that’s a cult-name, not his True Name. I think his Mystery is Knowledge; for what else could make a man hunger so, and never be satisfied?

Knowing how the world works- how everything works, from the history of dried fruit to the behaviour of weather to the nature and construction of the very stars- it’s a transcendent thing. It foments change in the learner; it forces change on the ignorant. Knowledge links us to the past, and propels us into the future.

At the same time, knowing too much will bring you face to face with all that is rotting in the world, every dark corner and fractured psyche, and it will bring you pain. No one ever said the knowledge you find would be to your benefit.

Even so, you cannot stop- once that door is opened, it can never again be shut. However painful the knowledge gained is, you will not wish to be without it- because now you know. Roathus.

I don’t really have a weapon. For a long time, my weapon was the city- on a broom, no one could catch me, no one could touch me. Now, without it… about the best I can do is run, and no one can run forever. So, I need something- something I can stand and fight with. The next day, we have pancakes- they have little cherry blossoms on them. Chopper is deeply confused, until I explain it to him; then he can’t stop talking about how wonderful our traditions are.

Eventually, the conversation twists and turns enough for me to ask him my real question.

“How did you develop your fighting style?”

“Ah? Well, it started with my chemistry studies, actually. I learned so much about chemical reactions, it was really easy for me to develop bombs and other chemical compounds- and my teacher, Kureha, she taught me how to throw knives by example, and then actual teaching. I learned to throw my bombs, and then… well, as I learned more about the body, I started developing ways to use my hooves as punching mediums. Then it sort of snowballed, and during our separation- you’ve read the logbook, right?”

“Yup,”
“Right, well, I learned actual kung fu while I was away. Once you’ve figured out the basics of your style, you can search out a teacher to refine what you’ve got- or, well, that’s what I did,”

“Hm...”

“Trying to work on your style?”

“Ha, yeah- I realized when I broke my old broom, I don’t really know how to fight- like, not directly? I don’t fight directly if I can help it- I use the surroundings, and I try to keep at least one hand free, because I need to be able to fly my broom-”

“Water balloons,”

“Hah?”

“You make potions, right? You had to learn harming potions alongside healing ones, otherwise-”

“Neither would have power… and a syringe with the right nozzle could be devised for a water balloon delivery system,”

“Exactly. Then, you carry them in a big bag- Mab can probably make you one that will hold everything you need, and not have too large a profile for flight. But what about when you’re on the ground?”

“Well… about the only things I’m good at off the broom are aiming and hand speed- I’m actually very fast, you know,”

“So, you- don’t really have a weapon, do you?”

“No, I don’t.”

“Hmm. Hey, Mab?”

“Yes, Chopper?”

“You’re still not allowed to train or work or fuck; but you could show Genny the Arsenal. She doesn’t have a weapon, and without a broom-”

“Ah! That’s right- forgive me for my irresponsibility, Genevieve,”

“Oh, um- sure, forgiven,”

“Right- finish eating, and we’ll see what fits your hands best; ah, wait, have we… I don’t think so, right- Bryony, I need to make an announcement, ship wide please, indoors only- Beatrix!”

“Yes, Mab?”

“I need you to relay the message I’m about to give to everyone out of doors; Attention, everyone. Your attention, please: be aware that the Arsenal, our storage room for all weapons not currently laid claim to, is now organized and ready for use. If you need a weapon, please go to the Storage room directly below the Dairy, on the same hallway as the Stillroom, Distillery, and The San; if you are underage, you will have to sign your chosen weapons out. Please speak to me for any holsters, ammo bags, or other accoutrements. Thank you,”

“Tell everyone outside where the Arsenal is, and if they’re underage they have to sign a weapon out-why, exactly?”
“Responsibility: I’m the person who actually owns all of those weapons in the Arsenal, it’s part of the stuff I take care of as Quartermaster- basically, every time we defeat an enemy crew, I take all their cool shit. Most of it gets sold or given away as charity- but you can’t just give away a pile of guns, so, I’ve been, well… tinkering. I trained as a silversmith, but in Skua, silversmiths are gunsmiths- because the people who use guns are generally rich enough to fancy their guns up, and the only metal to do that with in Skua is silver,”

“Neat! I’ll tell everyone,”

“Thank you, Beatrix. Genny, are you done?”

“Yes, Mab!”

“Good- come along,“

So… below decks there’s all the workshops- the Workshop, which is where Franky, Havij, and Fern work; and Usopp Factory, where Usopp and Mark work; and the Studio, where Mab, Coco, and Beatrix work; and then there’s the rooms I tend to work most in, the Stillroom, Distillery, and Sanitary Ward. When people aren’t injured terribly, they can rest in their own bed; for minor injuries, they end up in the Emergency Ward, which I actually spend most of my work hours in, treating cuts and burns from the Cool Kids. There are two hallways- down one, you go even lower into the belly of the ship, and that’s where all the making things workshops are; but the second one is where the Stillroom, Distillery, and now, Arsenal, are.

So- the Stillroom and the Distillery are actually the same kind of room- the same room entirely, excepting for a small door, but the stillroom is for non-edibles, and the distillery is for food. They’re both on the same side as the Sanitary Ward, which takes up the most space.

On the other side of that hallway, there’s a room as big as all three rooms together- the entire other side of the level, I think. The door to it has always been locked, so I put it out of my mind- but, following Mab down, I notice that she’s actually got a ring of keys on a string at her waist. They don’t jingle, so I guess that’s why I never noticed them before- but, when she draws up a key and opens the Arsenal’s door, that’s where she gets the key from.

As soon as I step inside, I’m all but blinded by the voices of- what? Mab and I are the only people here, what am I- whispers, I’m hearing so many whispers…

One of them is coming from… over here- I know Mab was about to say something, but, where the hell is that whispering coming from- over here! I’m over here, come here, this way- this way, don’t be afraid, I won’t hurt you if you don’t act a fool, come on- It’s… coming from the, the bucket? A stand, like for umbrellas, but it’s full of- spears? Javelins? It’s over in a corner of the room, underneath a crystal lamp.

I reach out a hand to grab- not me, that’s not me either, I’ve a maple haft girlie, come here, yes! Me! Pick me up! Yes! - a very chatty… it’s very tall. A spear?

I am a pike!

A fish?

Obviously not!
“Mab, what is this?”

“...That’s a Brusher’s Pike, Genny; one of the few weapons in this room that would deign to be ridden like a broom. You could even stick bristles over the head and it wouldn’t mind much; you’d have to use reeds, not straw, and it’ll need bleeding now and again, but... it’s a very good choice for you. Unfortunately, I won’t be able to start teaching you how to use it for a long while yet- for one, I’m still on reduced duties and strict rest; for another, you’re not in good enough condition to begin. I’ll write up an exercise plan- or, no, I’ll dictate one to Chopper and he’ll make sure I’m not overdoing it. But for now... see if anything else catches your eye,”

“Um- this one caught my ear, really,”

“Ah?”

“Well- maybe... does this pike have a name?”

My name is Queen Anne’s Revenge, miss! Oh- and over there, hanging off the wall, I think- see the shooty-shooty fast things? Try those!

“Oh, it’s calling itself Queen Anne’s Revenge, and it recommends... shooty-shooty fast things? Guns?”

“Oh- Dueling Pistols, these are named along their barrels, see?”

“Th... Th-eh-ru-mah- Thelma?”

“Mhm,”

“And- R-Ru-ii-shu-ze- Louise;”

“Mhmhmhm,”

“Thelma and Louise, the Dueling Pistols,”

“They run on mana, not bullets; there should be a pair of rings in the stock, the handles- yes, there they are. Put those over either your fingers or your toes, they’ll self-size to fit; then, they’ll pull from your available mana to fire. No one else will be able to shoot them properly, the guns use... here we are- this ammo pouch is full of crystals and Dial shells, each of which have their own magic and elemental properties. Keep hold of it, and make sure you have Mark or Usopp run you through using them properly,”

“Yes Mab,”

“Hm- you want a shield, a helmet?”

“A shield... aren’t those really heavy?”

“Nope- or, well, they could be, but only if you’re not trained right. Zoro’s swords, individually, weigh about two pounds each; my spear weighs maybe ten? A shield averages between eight and fifteen pounds. This one is a Lunkhead Shield; weighs... eh, maybe nine pounds? And your pike is eleven pounds, I’d say; and your pistols, together, are about six,“

“Oh. Well… that’s not so bad at all!”

“Exactly; now, let’s get you some carrying belts… you’ll need a holster for your pistols, big enough for your ammo bag to slide under… and a carrying strap for your pike that’s adjustable, so you can use it for your broom as well- do you have a knife?”

“Um, no,”

“Pocket knife- here, number seven standard pocket knife, Sanji and Deb have ones just like it-”

“Oh! Uhm- thank you? Thank you- oh, Mom had one like this, but she gave it to Deb when she started working… oh!”

“Hm… Well, let’s see now… I heard part of your conversation with Chopper- I don’t have anything like water balloons, but… Ah! Chopper should have Ear Syringes somewhere- ask him for one, I think that would be most useful in tandem with… this!”

“A pipe?”

“A bubble pipe! There’s two kinds of bubble solution- this one is meant for bubbles you blow directly, and this other is meant for pre-prepared bubbles. The tassel- see how it has a little wire-like slot for something like a bullet?”

“Oh! Does it work with the Pistol’s, um, cartridges…?”

“Yes, it does- the pipe is actually a peripheral for the Dueling Pistols. Here you go- got it?”

“Y-yeah, um, I- I got it,”

“Let me see- you’ll have to talk to Usopp about workspace, and Mark for training with your pistols- don’t carry them around with you until he clears you, please- and… I think that’s all, really,”

“Um- actually, who should I talk to, so I can learn to do that thing you do where you’re in two places at once?”

“The way I do it is with a Devil Fate- you need to talk to Taffy,” “Oh. So- Usopp, Mark, and Taffy; for training?”

“Yes, that sounds right; oh, sign those out, they should have numbers on the hooks or stands-?”

“Ah- yeah! Sorry, I’ll do that- go sit down again, you look tired-”

“I- ugh. I hate being ill; but you’re right. I’ll see you later, Genny darling,”

“Bye, Mab,”

I sign out the weapons- because I’m only almost sixteen, which is still fifteen, which is still underage no matter how you slice it. I pass by Doctor Trafalgar Law and Fern and Havij on my way back up; Doctor Law looks at me very oddly when he sees what’s in my hands, as do Fern and Havij.
“Um. Hi?”

“So, this is much more interesting than a tour- Nurse Genny, what in hell’s name are you doing?”

“I’m, um, I’m expanding my battle repertoire? I don’t, uh, don’t really have any other way to fight, other than running away, so um, I… got some weapons,”

“I thought you fought like Ellie, though?”

“No… um. No. Ellie is much more ruthless than I could ever be. And I don’t have the same… stuff, that Bea does,”

“Her and Deb, man- their knives are…”

“Yeah, kinda hard to use a sword on broomstick; or a knife,”

“I see- so, guns are easier?”

“Guns are easy to use; that’s why people use them,”

“Hm. And the other thing? What is that?”

“It’s a bubble pipe-”

“Ooh! Esoteric weapon!”

“…Yes, Havij, it’s esoteric if you’re, say, under the age of twelve- oh, wait, whoops, sorry-”

“Forgot I’m not actually a fishwoman or a mermaid, hm?”

“Yeah- sorry,”

“So. Bubble pipe?”

“It’s a tuna herder’s tool- they use it to protect the school from sharks, and also to keep the herd together come harvest time. Bea had one for a long time, but… the get less useful outside of certain areas. This one is meant for all terrain, hence the bottles of bubble fluid-”

“Oh, I see, that’s what those are. So you’re…?”

“I’m, uh- I’m going to go test out the bubble pipe on the deck, and you could all join me if you’d like…?”

“Yes please,”

“Sure, sis!”

“Of course, miss,”

“R-right, um- this way, then, follow me,”

I lead my party of interested… sister, sister’s friend, and some guy we picked up last island, up to the grass deck, well clear of the Barn and the animals and the Garden. Then I take a seat on the stairs, and carefully put my guns away in the holsters on the gunbelt, and then… how do these ammunition cartridges work- oh! I get it!
Okay, so… let’s see… Force, Spark, Mist, Haze, Dust, Smoke, Frost, Glister, and Sunflare; then there’s. Let’s try… let’s ask.

“I’m willing to try Spark, Dust, Frost, Glister, and Sunflare; which would you like to see?”

“Hmmm- it’s been snowing almost every day, so hold off on Frost-”

“Okay Havij; Fern?”

“Mmm… No Dust; it sounds like something that could make you sneeze. And is Glister just fancy for glitter?”

“Glister is magic glitter, it fades away on it’s own,”

“Pass,”

“Fern-”

“Hard pass,”

“Fiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiine. What about you, Doctor?”

“Hmm… I wouldn’t mind seeing the Sunflare or Spark; I’d prefer the Sunflare one though, it’s very cold and wintry still… then again, that might confuse the plants, so… Spark,”

“Alright!”

Spark cartridge goes in like this; immediate use bubble fluid goes in… here… take a deep breath and-

Gwloooowowm! Paop!

It wobbles through the air, before rounding out into a sphere, like no bubble I’ve ever seen. I feel a sort of a… connection, to the bubble. There’s a shrinking window of time I can give it… Direction?

Up! Over there!

And then it pops with a spatter of fat, golden orange sparks. I blow one, two- and I can make them move… in patterns? And I can set their popping order, I can make one pop after the other, or I can make them all pop at once. So, while I blow two more bubbles, I make the old two pop, one, then two- and then two more float up and pop all at once.

I don’t quite know what happened between figuring out the limits of a bubble pipe, and putting on a tiny fireworks show- sparkworks show? And then, of course, Mark ended up sitting next to me.

“Nice bubble pipe. Which guns are you using with it?”
“Um- Dueling Pistols,“
“...Where are your Sling Rings?“
“Um. Still in the guns-?“
“For the love of th’gods- hands or feet?“
“U-um- for the, uh, um, um, feet,“
“Take your boots off and put them on,” “N-now?“
“Right now, yes; you should have put them on in the Arsenal, but now is better than later,“
“Uhm- oh, um, okay- brr, my fingers are cold,”
“Hm,“
“Guh- that’s a weird feeling, it just- eep!”
“Yeah, that’s always a little weird; now. Bubble pipes can be used for party tricks like you were doing, but they’re really for your guns. There should be two more rings-“
“These?“
“Yeah- the mouthpiece on the pipe unscrews, so- do that, and then put the big rings on; they’ll shrink to fit too,” “Um- yeah!“
“Okay. Now, show me your carts- hmmm. Force, Spark, Mist, Haze, Dust, Smoke, Frost, Gliister, and Sunflare; that’s nine, so you need three more. Hm. All the carts you have now are good for area and creating distractions, but you’ll need actual power at some point… hmmm… Ah! Here; three of mine; and one for your pipe, too. For your guns: Peck, Rattle, and Anklegator. These are crystals, mostly, imbued with pieces of very dangerous Skuan animals- Peck is from the Pecker Bird, which shoot deadly and slightly poisonous spines from their beaks; Rattle comes from the Rattletail, which is something like a bird and something like a rat, and they either throw rocks or summon actual meteors; and Anklegator is the horn of an Anklegator that’s been shaped to fit your gun with a bit of crystal here and there where there wasn’t horn anymore. I have no use of these; so, I gift them to you,” “...aren’t Anklegator’s extremely dangerous though? Like, the other two will just kill you, but the Anklegator will stalk you for a month straight if you set foot in their grass-“
“Yeah; they will. That was not a fun month. Anyway- the gun you put that cart into will always be a little more touchy than the one you don’t; Peckers and Rattletails are actually pretty mellow,“ “Are anklegators… tomboyish, or…?“
“It… let me see- oh. Thelma,”
“Really?“
“Yep. You’d think, considering the book, it’d be Louise-“

“Yeah? Oh, have you only seen the play-?”

“No, there’s a movie now too- there’s a book?”

“Remind me to grab it from the Library for you; but yes, her guns are named Thelma and Louise, so- put the Anklegator in Thelma, and then sort the rest of your carts accordingly,”

“Uh-”

“Pull the trigger all the way back twice, and turn the gun sideways; carts go in pointy side first,”

“Uh- oh! Okay- and what about my pipe?” I said, loading my pistols with the cartridges.

“This is a special cart called Sound; it’s not all that useful in a gun, as it makes the firing sound louder, basically. In a bubble pipe, however, it makes it something like a trumpet- which can be useful. You can also draw on any or all of your gun-carts- try it, go on,”

“Uh- sure-”

Spark and Sound, wait! Double check the fluid levels- fine, okay, deep breath and-

Gwloooowowm! Paop!

A bubble that’s… different, somehow, from the ones I blew before. Sturdier, easier to control- more vibrant in it’s surface colors. Same sort of time-window; over there! Up! Burst!

Shin-PAO! PLINGINGING!

Woah!

“There are all kinds of combinations- I’d guess Spark and Sound for that one. Try adding Smoke,”

I do it. The bubble pops even more like a firework- the sound, the sharp flicker of fat golden orange sparks on the grey sky, the smell of spent gunpowder… cool!

“So. Your first task, from me- make a combination table, for pairs, trios, and quartets; you’re not ready to fire fivers, or hexes, but make those tables anyway; and you won’t be ready to go beyond hexes until you’re about twenty. Try standing up,”
“Um- uuugh-”

“So. First lesson: magic is not free. Firing your guns is not free. Using your bubble pipe is not free. A little fireworks show did this to you. Something more… martial, in nature, will do more. Until you reach a certain level of overall fitness and stamina, I highly recommend you not use your magic weapons. Two hours theory, two hours practical, for ten days- that’ll just about get you to pairs level. Then, you’ll need a resting and settling period of about two months; and then we’ll train again. For now, remove all the carts from your weapons, clean them with the polishing rag in your ammo bag, and go get a blank trapper keeper that’ll fit in it, and a pencil too; and get to work on those tables. You might also consider taking a nap after lunch,”

“I- uagh- I was gonna set up workspace with Usopp, after lunch,”

“You can do that tomorrow,”

“O-oh. O-aaaaaaaugh- okay,”

I’ve never been so exhausted, yet so profoundly awake in my life. It feels like I just did twelve hours of hard physical labour, and yet my mind is fresh as daisies. The rest of the day was kind of blurry- I remember getting a math and diagramming notebook from one of the Workshops, and that I ate lunch, but not what; and then I took my nap and woke the next morning.

Magic is certainly not free. It’s not even slightly fair in it’s payments.

The next ten days are taken up by training. In the morning, I work out names of attacks, or names of types of attacks- twelve squared is one hundred and forty four. Force, Spark, Mist, Haze, Dust, Smoke, Frost, Glisters, Sunflare, Peck, Rattle, and Anklegator; those are just for my guns. I know, now, that the Animal carts are for heavy firepower; and the lightest one is Haze. I know that some of them can’t be combined at all- Mist and Spark cancel each other out; so does Frost and Sunflare. Some of them combine to make other carts- Mist and Smoke makes Dust, while Smoke and Frost makes Glisters.

My first assignment was figuring out all the possible pairs; my second assignment is figuring out which of those pairs is worth using. Mist and Smoke makes a cheaper, less effective dust; Smoke and Frost makes a more expensive, less useful Glisters. I can’t put all three Anima Carts in the same gun- it’s too heavy, and it makes me prefer one hand over the other.

I shouldn’t have the cancelling pairs in the same gun, to save on confusion. I don’t have any duplicate carts. Each gun can fire an unformed Mana bullet, as fast as I can pull the trigger. If I just want something shot real good, I don’t need to use the carts- but I run down my available mana much quicker that way.

Dueling Pistols are a hit and run sort of weapon.

So. Louise has Peck, Spark, Sunflare, Rattle, Haze, and Glisters. Her Anima attacks are Double Team, Comet Comedown, Starfall, Birdirage, Fancy Chicken, Firebird, Sunbird, Bombirage, and Glitterbomb.

Double Team uses both anima, and causes a swarm of see-through Peckers to appear, each of them puking at most three meteors before vanishing. Comet Comedown makes a fall of flaming meteors. Starfall makes a fall of bright meteors- they almost hurt to look at straight on. Birdirage makes see-through Peckers appear- and then they disappear, but keep spitting spines at the target. Fancy Chicken makes glittering Peckers appear- still see through, still spitting spines. Just, um. Glittery? They can’t all be winners. Firebird makes a see-through Pecker with flaming wings and flaming spines appear. Sunbird makes a glowing Pecker appear. Comirage makes illusory meteors fall. And Glitterbomb is currently on permanent ban by Fern- she heard what it did and swore a great and terrible vengeance upon me if I ever, but ever used it. I don’t know what she has against glitter, honestly.

The other four available shots are Heatwave, Mirage, Explosion, and Signal. They’re exactly what they sound like, really-useful in their way, but I’m not great with Mirage. Not yet- Taffy’s promised to teach me how best to use it.

Thelma has Anklegator, Mist, Force, Dust, Smoke, and Frost. Her Anima attacks are Death Below, Death Unknown, Chunky Salsa, Sneaky Death, and Death Served Cold. Thelma’s Anima attacks have no real way of being anything other than lethal, and aiming for somewhere other than center mass doesn’t help. Anklegators are really dangerous.

Death Below calls a spectral Anklegator near the target; the spectral Anklegator then attacks the target from below. Death Unknown is the same, but with a cloud of mist around the target, making it harder to see the horn before it’s too late. Chunky Salsa gives the Anklegator explosive bite power. Sneaky Death makes it impossible to see the Anklegator below. Death Served Cold freezes the target before the fatal chomp. If I never in my life meet an anklegator, I will be overjoyed.

The other available shots are Mud Spray, Eyewater, Sandstorm, Snowstorm, Wet Fog, Dry Fog, Freezing Fog, Fog Wall, and Vent.

Mud Spray is exactly what it sounds like; but it’s particularly easy to aim for small targets with, and tends to make the target slower. Eyewater blinds the target for anything between five whole seconds to an hour. Sandstorm, Snowstorm, all the Fog variants, and Vent are forbidden for me right now- I need eye and mouth protection, and a way to navigate without sight.

Sanji’s been teaching me how to use Observation Haki; and Usopp’s been designing me specialized headgear.

According to Mab, who’s recovered about five days into my intensive training, my regular flight clothes are a good starting point for a specialized battle costume; tight, with enough give that I can move anyway I please. The jacket-dress, in particular, she’s extra pleased with- she only has to make it in a different fabric and add the right enchantments, she said, and it’d be absolutely perfect. She based the rest on my uniform; easily cleaned fabric, shoes with a lot of sole so if I need to do an Emergency Drop I won’t fuck up my feet, gloves with overmittens so my fingers don’t freeze… It’s a cool outfit.

So. According to Fern’s map, I need to go to the Grave, then the Pond, then the Tree. Fern herself told me that I’d need a hatchet, a candle, a blanket, a small pouch, and some rope. Mab’s taken care of my gear situation; I climbed mountains in my regular nurse shoes, and my flight suit boots are better.

I’ve already practiced making maple leaf pancakes; I’m pretty good at it by now, I’d say. I’ve got a candle, and Ellie is going with me to the graveyard because I don’t like going to those sorts of places alone, and Ellie loves going to graveyards for some goatforsaken reason. Once I start, I need to have everything done within a week; so, I still need to prepare provisions, finalize my grave offering, and get good with my weapons.

Day six into my training, I broke the shaft of my Pike. The blade was unharmed; but with the shaft broken, it fell to my Dueling Pistols- Dualies? It fell to them, to be my main method of ground-bound defence.

So, there’s not really any way to build up your magical… your magic reserves? I guess? Other than expending all your ‘free’ magic, and letting it build up overnight before expending it all again- for two days straight, mind- and then doing no magic at all for a day, and then repeating. For ten days total.

To be fair, Mab warned me extensively; she told me outright that while training my magic to use the Dueling Pistols correctly was something that could be done in ten days, becoming an expert with them would take a bit more work. By the tenth day, I can fire any of my bullets, and use any cartridge with my bubble pipe.

“Genevieve, I’m going to tell you what I told Beatrix; if you really want me to train you, I will. But I will train you as best I can, with everything I know to do. It will exhaust your body, and your mind, and your spirit; I will test you every step of the way, and you’ll test yourself, too. You’ll hate me, and your weapons, and yourself; and you’ll change, no matter how hard you try not to. Training will be your life, for a time; and you won’t be able to unlearn what I teach you,”

Mab told me this our first day together. I was warned, pretty explicitly, that training with Mab would not be a cakewalk.

Did I listen? No.

Did I break my pike by not listening? Yes.

Have I made maple leaf pancakes at just before midnight in a fit of ‘I hate my life’? Yes.

Did I pack those pancakes, a small fleece blanket, a hatchet from the Arsenal- properly signed out- my one remaining toad-shaped candle (Fern loves them), the votive candle, the plate, cutlery, a small pouch from the stillroom, and some rope from the hold in a backpack that slings on over my new flight suit, a lighter from Sanji’s drawer of lighters and matches, my pocket knife, and my guns and ammo and notebook and a first aid kit onto my person, sneak off the ship onto the very quiet docks because even criminals need to sleep, and then make for the graveyard- incidentally picking up Ellie on the way?

Yes.

Did I make us double back for a bottle of maple syrup?

Yes.

So. Ellie likes to think that she’s the sneakiest of us squid-sisters, but the truth is, I am. I have to be; I’m the one who actually stole all the medicines and knowledge needed to treat Mom for five years straight. Sneaking past orderlies in mental hospitals- which is where the largest, least missed stores of the medicine she needed were- is very difficult, particularly when they’ve got to deal with other patients doing the exact same thing.

The real truth is that Sancho is the sneakiest of us all. I’ve literally never caught him doing anything, and I know he’s done stuff because I’ve had to fix him up before.

We get to the graveyard just passing twilight; and it’s Ellie who leads me to the right grave, as she knows more than anyone else about how these sorts of places work.

The grave of Winifred Foster is in a stand of birch trees. It’s also smack in the middle of a frog village. Ellie and I get there right in the middle of one of their festivals.

Yeah, that’s not what I was expecting either.

The gravestone is itself on some sort of bier, which is in the middle of what must be a kind of fountain. In the fountain, masses of water-greenery I know not the name of gently wave over tiny houses and burrows. Their open doors and windows are bedecked with water flowers and seashells, and I can hear music echoing up from below the clear waters.

On the surface of the water, thick mats of lily pads and duckweed dance; and on the largest of the lily pads, the frog village has set up their above water celebration.

“Hallo, up there!”

“Um- Oh! Hello, down there!”

I crouch down to have an easier conversation with the frogly gentleman I’m speaking with; I can tell it’s a gentleman, because lady frogs have higher voices. Right? I think that’s right.

He’s wearing a white shirt, a silver vest- made of actual silver turned into cloth, I don’t know of anything else that shines like that- a black coat with two long tails, they practically drag on the ground, and… a top hat? Oh, and he has a little cane, I think it’s a hatpin that got ground down.

“G’morning, large girl!”

“Good morning, sir; um, may I ask what’s being celebrated today?”

“Why, today’s the birthday of the Great Old Toad Sage of the Bier, young’n; we celebrate like this every year,”

“How lovely!”

We talk a while after that, me and Gentleman Frog, about the festival that’s been going as long as the island has had humans. He tells me about The First Girl, who played here a long time ago, when this pond was just a spring in a stand of trees, and the only amphibian who lived here was the Old Toad Sage. The First Girl was the one who started the tradition of throwing parties for the Toad Sage, and every year since her death, the village of Fountaineart throws a festival in his honor. It also coincides with their annual New Years celebration, where everyone celebrates wakes up from the winter and comes back out of the mud.

That does explain why everyone at the festival is partying so hard; that frog there is drinking a beer and it’s not even dawn yet!

“Ah, I see- I actually need to speak with the Great Toad Sage; can I swim across?”

“Ach, well- during the early Spring season, humans are strictly prohibited from swimming in this fountain, and with all the lily pads either out of commission due to frost, or taken up with festival things- how urgent is your conversation, young miss?”

“Um- I’ve got a pretty strict timetable of midnight to two hours after high noon; then, I’ll have to try again sometime else;”

“Oh dear- that’s not good miss! You’ll only be able to speak with the Sage today; tomorrow, he’s going on a ten year retreat to contemplate the necessity of cranes!”

“Ah! Wh-what should I do?”

“Stay calm, miss- your friend there, can she play an instrument; and can you sing at’all?”

“Um… Ellie?”

“Well, I’ve got a mouth-harp, and I can play a simple song on a guitar or ukulele,;”

“Um- I know a few songs from Mom’s old records, and a few sea shanties, I guess- do baby rhymes and lullabies count too?”

“I din’t ask if you knew a few songs- I asked if you could sing, miss,”

“Oh! Oh, um, yes, I can sing well enough,”

“I certainly hope so; you won’t have a chance otherwise;”

I follow the little gentleman frog around the built up stones of the fountain, and soon come to a little amphitheater where a variety of frogs and toads are all croaking and chirping together. One young froggett is carrying a large basket full of tadpoles, each one with it’s own little baby beanie, obviously doing an errand for his mom; another froggett is cheerily dancing with a froggelle, the both of them cheerfully trading off who leads and who follows. A knab of toads is playing a game of foot-the-ball with a ping pong ball filled with a bit of sand; a knot of frogs is playing cheerful music, while a mixed knab and knot of both are riding around on salamanders and waving fans and flags- obviously priests and priestesses.

Fern would absolutely adore this.

“Mayor Tibbs - Mayor Tibbs, sir, a moment-”
“Hwha- You! Pollash, you reprobate, what’ve you done now-”

“Nothing, honest! Only, I’ve just met a nice young girl, and she needs to speak with the Great Sage what lives on the Bier-”

“-Now you know that access to the Sage en’t up to me, it’s the provision of the Priesthood, an’ with them engaged in the Spring Celebration Ceremony-”

“-Mother Mayhay could give permission!”

“Mother Mayhay is- fine! Fine! On your head be it, Pollash; and if she doesn’t like the song, that’s tough luck and I’ll hear no more of it,”

“It’ll work out, you’ll see- come along, Miss and Miss; Mother Mayhay is right over here! Come on!”

I follow the suddenly bouncing frog, carefully dodging around knots and knabs as they drift together and apart; eventually I come to an old fence post with a fallen rail still clinging onto a rusted out nail, and in the triangle formed between post, rail, and earth, there is a massive animal skull, like… like a goat, but bigger. Atop the skull there’s a sort of blanket made of woven weeds, tiny little reeds in acorn caps burning with sweet smelling smoke, mushrooms like tables covered with pearls and tiny shells and tiny little bottles full of things that glow in the last bits of twilight.

Mother Mayhay is a big orange toad, the biggest I’ve ever seen- maybe a full fifteen centimeters. The animal skull comes up to my waist, maybe higher, and the toad comes up to my chin. She’s wearing beaded bracelets of yellow, pink, and blue; and a beaded necklace of pink and blue, and a soft little cap of spiderweb lace, and a little crown of seashells and seeds. She’s attended by simple garden snails, and on their backs are glowing orbs of water- or is it jelly? Dunno.

Mister Pollash bounces up onto a brick, before standing quite tall and straight and making an elegant bow. Then, he speaks to her in a strange, creaky language I don’t understand; she replies, and her voice is resonant but high, resonant enough to make my chest rattle but high enough to almost hurt my ears. They talk just long enough for me to hope they stop; and then, mercifully, they do. Ellie, behind me, has been driven to a crouch, her teeth sharp in a grimace and her hands clamped over her ears. She’s got much more sensitive hearing than I do, so- it makes sense.

“Sorry about that, Miss- but I’ve explained things to Mother Mayhay. She’ll allow only one of you access at a time; but first, you’ve got to impress her with a song, see?”

“Um-”

“It’s one song for each of you, and you can’t repeat them neither! It’s a different song for each of you, them’s the rules!”

“Oh, well- a-alright, well, um… do we need to sing here?”

“Ac-tu-all-ee, we shall go to the Bandstand down on the Green; I am not the only one you’ll need to sing for, after all. Help me down, Pollash, there’s a lovey,.”

“Yes, Mum-“
Mister Pollash holds himself up tall and straight, and Mother Mayhay puts one massive orange hand down on his shoulder; and then, as he strains against her weight, the rest of her carefully moves down onto the ground. Mister Pollash crouches down and gasps from the effort, and then straightens again while Mother Mayhay arranges her beads and a fluffy white coat I didn’t notice earlier.

I follow behind the surprisingly fast Mother Mayhay and Mister Pollash, back to the edge of the fountain and- oh! It’s- a mushroom? No, this must be the bandstand... It’s plenty big for someone Mother Mayhay’s size, but Ellie and I are far too large.

Mother Mayhay lets out a soft cheep, and then says something in her very high voice to Mister Pollash, who nods before running off. He comes back, dragging… a small red twig with a round… a round stone stuck onto the end of it. The stone has a hole in the center of it, and the branch is living, it’s got tiny red buds on it; and the stone is deep blue-green, and then Mister Pollash has leapt up high, high and-

Ow!

Wha- Waaaah! I’m a fingerling! No bigger than a sardine, if that!

“There now; oh, you’re a cute one, aren’t you? Just a little polliwog, I reckon; here now Pollash, get the other one, there’s a lad-”

“Yes Mum-!”

There’s a huge sound, and then with a thump, my sister Ellie is the same size as me. She clutches at her head, and then rolls to her feet and looks around. Then she gasps and- starts crying? Huh? Oh! Right- all her friends are this size. She’s dreamt about being able to hug them for ages and ages… being shown that it’s possible, even for a little bit, must be overwhelming for her.

“Oh no- what’s happened, I didn’t hit her that hard-”

“No, no, Mister Pollash- all her closest friends are Tontatta- Dwarves?”

“Oh! Oh, I see- this must be the first time she’s ever been able to see things from our perspective, en’t it?”

“Yes sir, I think so; um… is… the, the hammer you used...”

“Oh, this- no, no, this is mine, en’t it? Can’t give it up, wouldn’t be able to go into town; no one in town would, either, they’ve their own hammers of course... Ah- but for your sister there… I suppose she could ask the Great Sage how to make one for herself- I know that humans like you and her need different materials than just us frogs an’ toads,” “Mmm- well, I can help her now, I think. Miss- orange Miss, come here please!”

Ellie, after wiping her eyes and composing herself, walks over to Mother Mayhay, now much taller than us both. Mother Mayhay’s eyes close, and with a delicate cough, out comes the largest stone with a hole in it I’ve ever seen- my sense of scale is shot to hell, but it’s big; and green! Green jade. I think, and softly ringing with some sort of sound- when I glance through the hole at it’s center, I can suddenly see human faces where I only saw frogs before.

It might be more proper to say that this is a village of Tontatta, not frogs and toads.

Ellie is crying again.

“Now- I know a Rogue when I see one, so I’ll save you the trouble of a trip- there are no thieves signs on the grave of Our Girl, nor will there ever be; and I ask that you take this seeing stone instead, which is half of what you’ll need to make a proper Poncle Mallet. You’ll need a wood for the stem, of course- talk to a mage about that; as for your sister...”

“She still needs to sing for you, Mother Mayhay,” “Hmm-? Hmph! Quite right; come on, girls, let’s see what you’ve got,“

“Can I borrow a guitar?”

“...I suppose; Tibbs! Give the girl a guitar to use, would you?”

“Yes, Mum!”

Ellie makes sure the guitar is ready with a few practice strums; and then I start singing.

...The wind here is clinging to winter,

It seems to make everything blue,

So send me, send me- one little peach;

Just a sweet sunny piece of you!

There’s a huge gasp from outside the bandstand, but I ignore it to see the response I got from Mother Mayhay and… I guess the Fountainheart Village Council? Mother Mayhay wipes away a few glimmering tears; and the council croaks and cheeps amongst itself before unanimously giving me a thumbs up. Mother Mayhay nods decisively.

“It’s decided; you’re allowed to walk across the Lilypad Road to speak with the Great Toad Sage.
But first… I think you ought to talk with the rest of your family. They seem quite worried, dear,” Huh-? Oh. Oh no.

I forgot to leave a note!
Tuck Everlasting: Magical Mystery Toad

There are some things I’d really like to never wake up to again. The realization that I’ve had another miscarriage? Hard pass. My husband isn’t at my side because we were forcibly separated? Harder pass. One of my students, a young woman I am personally responsible for, vanishes in the night? Hardest pass.

Was I too hard on her? I- I don’t know; I don’t know how to be anything else, when it comes to training. She said she wanted me to teach her, and she said she wanted to learn, I don’t… is this my fault?

She didn’t leave a note, but there’s no money unaccounted for; just one of the island-exploration bags from the Broomshed, and a few of the packed lunches from the fridge, a few bottles of milk… oh, maybe she, she just… went for a walkabout? But she didn’t leave a note- aaaaugh!

Fuck!

Spitstone!

So, kidney stones are pretty terrible, but I’ve never had one; Momma Rouge did, but… anyway. I’ve gotten spitstones since I was a kid; they’re actually not terribly uncommon. It’s a calcified structure that forms inside the salivary gland or duct, and in me, they usually block the flow of saliva into the mouth.

The majority of all spitstones affect the submandibular glands located at the floor of the mouth. It’s much less common in the parotid glands (inside the cheeks), or the sublingual glands, which are under the tongue. If you have one spitstone, you probably have another in your future.

Spitstones are formed when chemicals in the saliva accumulate in the duct or gland. It’s mostly calcium; and the exact inciting cause isn’t known. Most agree, however, that major factors are those that cause lower saliva production- dehydration, poor eating (as in you don’t eat enough), and use of certain medications such as antihistamines, blood pressure drugs, psychiatric drugs, and bladder control drugs. Trauma to the salivary glands might also be a factor, but there’s not been investigation into that.

I used to get one every time I got pregnant, but I’ve also been taking psychiatric drugs since about a year ago; nothing bad, just something to help regulate my sleeping patterns. Trying a new thing for narcolepsy; so far, it’s worked really great, but if this is the side effect, I don’t know…

Spitstones don’t cause problems as they form; but once they’re of a size that blocks the duct, saliva will back up into the gland, causing pain and swelling. It’s not bad now, but I know it’ll get progressively worse as the swelling increases and I eat more meals. Ah fuck, and my spit tastes all salty now- I fucking hate spit stones, holy fuck.

Aargh, and the whole duct is swollen too, I can’t stop licking it with my tongue-

“Chopper?”

“Mab- ah, you’ve got a swelling, where does it hurt?”
“Under my tongue, I’ve a spitstone-”

“Spitstone- salivary calculus, owie; I’ll get you some sugar free lemon-drops, just a moment- keep eating meals like regular, and if it’s still there in three or four days, I’ll run some tests,”

“Thanks- aaaaugh-”

“Mab?!? What’s wrong- what, where are you hurt-”

“Sanji, breathe- it’s a spitstone, I’m not actually injured-”

“Spitstone? Uh- Oh! Oh, ow, I’m sorry- let me get you a lime-”

“Thank you; aaaaugh- ah, hello Bry. Any luck?”

“No- I know one of them took a snail, but I’m having serious issues with the signal right now- it’s like it just… gone. It’s not dead- I’d be able to find it, if it were dead. It’s… gone,”

“Hm. That is odd- and you’re sure you didn’t see them leave?”

“I was as surprised as their sisters were, Mab- I’ve no idea how they did it. It’d be more impressive if I wasn’t so pissed,”

“Truth,”

Y’know, I never thought I’d say this, but I’m glad Mab kicked my ass as often as she did during our Training Years. Otherwise, I’d never be able to do what I’m about to do.

“Okay; everyone, finish breakfast. Tiffany, pick out a squad to do a fly-over of the island; see if you can find them by air. I know it’s covered over with trees, but… Sanji, pack up bentos for everyone who’s going; you, Mab, Mark, Robin, Brook, Bryony, and Mice- you’re going with me. I’m the Captain- I Know where my crewmates are; we’re going to find them together,”

“Yes, Captain,” choruses the room.

After all that, finding Ellie and Genny is as simple as Listening real good and letting my feet follow- this way, then they went- over here?

And then I hear music and a party and a high, piping voice, singing cheerily- and I don’t need to search anymore, because there they are.

About six seconds after I realize I forgot to leave a note, Ellie is bowled over by her mouse-sized friends. Daryl- Darla- He’s coiled his tail around Ellie’s waist, and is sobbing onto her shoulder. Maya has taken off her hat, and is pressing it to her mouth as tears and sobs work their way out of her, hitching and straining against her sense of propriety. Hildy is laughing from a deep, soulful place, her face gone red and smiling; while Quil and Lindy run gentle hands over Ellie’s… not everywhere, but her hair, her hands, and their faces are soft with joy, which is not something you expect from the world’s spiniest punchkin and a tiny sharkwoman. Jellybean is babbling ‘How did this happen?’ with such joy, the strain of it is making her flesh bubble and jiggle as the crystals and metal inside of her shifts and buzzes in excitement; her fins, which usually look like particularly pointed ears, are splayed wide with shock, but the colors- blue, orange, white, turquoise, little flecks of pink- betray the roil of emotions inside of her.

Then an enormous shadow falls over me, and I know I’m in for it.

I look up, and see Missus Mab and Mister Sanji, the both of them very worried; Missus Mab has her hair up in a simple ponytail, which means she rushed out here without even taking her morning shower, that’s what she sleeps in; and she’s wearing mismatched socks under her snowboots, and those are the pants she had on yesterday, and that’s one of Mister Sanji’s sweaters, she doesn’t usually wear blue. And she’s not wearing glasses, her eyes are rimmed with a thick black line; no scarf, no gloves, no hat. The lingering chunks of frosty ground have melted where she stepped, and I can see it melting where she stands.

Mister Sanji is wearing his regular suit, plus snow boots, and a jacket I’ve never seen before, and a thick scarf I think Missus Mab made for him, and a watch cap, and mittens. He’s not as angry as Missus Mab is; nothing has melted at his feet. Snowflakes are landing on his curling horns, and they aren’t sticking, but they usually don’t. His breath is hot and white rising in a gush of mist.

When Missus Mab does- my eyes water, and then she’s standing in front of me, and then Mister Sanji lets out a little cough and suddenly he’s there too, and then I’ve been grabbed by the shoulders roughly and now-Missus Mab takes a good long look at me, and there are tears in her eyes, and then she hugs me and- and- purrs-

I start crying, and I can’t stop. I don’t know why I’m so upset, and I can’t- she’s not my- I can’t- I can’t I can’t-Mab thinks she can’t purr- the truth is, she can purr just fine if it’s to comfort someone else. As soon as she tries to make herself purr, she does that whimpery thing that’s halfway between cute and cringey.

---

Genny is crying- sobbing- into Mab’s chest, and Mab, bless her, is stroking Gen’s hair while she purrs, all in an effort to… There’s a lot of reasons I love my wife. I’ve said them to myself before, many times, I’m sure.

This time? I don’t think I’ve ever said this before, but… I love my wife because she’s kind, and gentle, especially with children. I love her because she’s going to be a wonderful mother, she is a wonderful mother, and I want to have children with her.

I love her because she never, not even once, suggested to any of the girls that they could call her ‘mother’ or some variation of it; but by her very actions, her care for them and the steady love in her bearing, they have come to more-than half think of her as such. She brushed their hair, and asked if they had need of any little thing, and listened and was there.

I was less so; but then, I suppose… I’m her husband; and she need not stand alone.

I take off my scarf- more a shawl, really- and wrap it around Mab and Genny, who’s crying into Mab’s chest. Then, I wrap my own arms around them both, and join my purr with my wife’s. I’ve never experienced it myself, but Mab has; and, somehow in the joining of our lives and souls and minds and flesh, under the watchful eyes of the gods, I have access to her memories too.

Being small and scared, and then held safe between two big purrings, two big purrings that love you and care for you and would protect you from anything… it’s at once deeply satisfying and overwhelming. To be safe, warm and loved… People need that, no matter their age.

Mab might not be able to purr on her own command; and she might consider herself somehow lacking in those qualities that make a mother… perhaps she’s right, in that. I do not know. I do know this: supporting her sometimes means that I do things that she thinks she cannot.

Like, say, bracketing a young woman in our care with purring and warm arms.

At some point, Genny collapsed between us, sobbing like I’m not sure she could ere the death of her mother. I pick the both of them up, and set us on the squishy bench just outside of the bandstand gazebo. Mab keeps Genny pressed between us as she shifts and settles herself more comfortably. Her chin tucks over Genny’s skull; my arm wraps over the girl between us, and my other back around my wife’s back. I tuck my own head over Mab’s, and let the purring rumble fill out my chest and echo out into the world.

We make between us a bower of limbs, and Genny rests between them, still weeping softly but slowly resolving herself into something approaching composure. Her eyes are puffy and red, and her nose has been running like an oozy faucet- I’ve got a handkerchief in my pocket, hang on.

I pull out a white handkerchief with soft yellow wheat stalks embroidered on the edges, and I wipe Genny’s face, and bid her clear her nose. Her whole fit has taken no longer than a quick fifteen minutes, but these things always feel so much longer…

I listen to her exhausted babble; and I don’t say anything. Mab does; but I… hm.

“I know you’re worried about your sister, but she needs to have time on her own,”

“I don’t know about that- she’s had a lot of time on her own, and...”

“It’s not good to push someone like that into sociability. Ellie- besides… now that you’re our size… I remember you saying once that the only people you’d ever trust enough take pleasure with was us. Is that still true?”

“...Daryl, you know it is,”
“Well. Quil took a walk around to check this place out, and there’s an abandoned house not far from the Fountain- looks like a little sugar shack, but it’s long past the season for that here- and, well, you know Maya doesn’t leave the ship without bringing along a blanket… and, um, you’re really cute Eleanor,”

“...I’d like that, Daryl- um. Is this just the two of us, or-?”

“...Do you want everyone to be involved?”

“I-if that’s okay, yes. I, um, I like everyone? A-and I don’t want anyone feeling left out if they don’t want to be, and, um, I, I don’t think I could choose, um, I-”

“Hey, hey- it’s okay, breathe. We can do together, it’s okay; but we need to set ground rules together. First- supplies. Everyone needs to bring their own supply of condoms, lube, dental dams, and snacks- we’ve had sex parties before, so those are the ground rules, remember?”

“Ah- Oh! Yeah, I remember- and, I guess since I’ll be the same size, I’ll need more supplies...”

“Yeah. Um- you know everyone’s safe words already, and yours is still ‘chumbawumba’, right?”

“Yeah. Er… it strikes me that it’d probably be easier to do this on the ship, where we have supplies already- I don’t like using abandoned places for stuff like this,”

“We used our hideout though?”

“Our hideout wasn’t abandoned,”

“...Okay; I saw a Daiso a way’s back, and-”

“Excuse me, but… are you… do you have a seestone, youngster?”

We both pause, and carefully turn to acknowledge the little old frog lady that’s creaked up to both of us. Another, taller, old frog lady splats up behind her and starts scolding her- gently, the way two lovers grown old and squashy like pumpkins in the fall or a spot on the sofa (our sofa, actually, it was made by a sofa-maker’s apprentice in miniature, and I was fine with a joint chair)- and they’re both carrying… huh? Two old ladies carrying very fine seestones- not what I was expecting in this tiny townlet.

“Dearie, you’ve got to explain your reasoning before just asking a youngster a question like that, you can’t just spring it on ‘em- Pleasant, come he-are!”

“Yes, Auntie!”

A pretty woman, maybe a few years older than us, bounds up; her soft yellow poncho flutters around her black clothing. She’s- very pretty.

“Now. Elderberry, Marple, and me’self- I’m Pithiea, pleasure- between the three of us old birds, only Young Pleasant came down off our tree, ye’ken? An, time being it’s killing self, we’ve got two seestones with no takers; Elderberry gave hers to Pleasant before she died, and Marple and me’self, well, we’d like to see our seestones passed on. We aren’t anything like young, and we’re both much too set in our little ways to want to go Bigjob and carouse,”

I blink. Daryl also blinks.

“Um- that’s very kind of the both of you, but… it wouldn’t be right to accept a seestone knowing there wouldn’t be enough for my friends to have, too-”

“Oh? How many are there of you, lovey?”

“Marple, don’t go promising the boy other people’s things-”

“You know as well as I do that reprobate is never going to give his hammer up except if he’s caught out by the police, Pithiee; and as many oldsters with no leaves to their name in this village, I might as well see good stones passed on to those what can use them, innit?”

“Uh- well, there’s seven of us, counting me and Ellie; even with both of yours, that’s three left out,”

“Um… Mister Scrump ain’t married, an’ he don’t have no kinfolk that I knows of; Tsung-sung, who runs the co-op, his apprentice had a seestone of her owns, and he’s gettin’ real old; and Mister Fairfax, his son’s gay- and he still has his wife’s seestone, it never… I don’t think it’ll ever see much use, his son ain’t sentimentals like that; and… well, Shrinking Violet doesn’t have long left in this world, innit,”

“There we are, then, Pithiee- young man, how about it?”

“Um… is that... is that really okay?”

“Of course it is, dearie; the only reason I know of to not give a fine youngster a seestone of their own is they can’t be trusted with it, and you all obviously can- it shows in the care you’ve given your friend, and your friend is of very good character, seeing as she came here with her sister; obviously, you’ve need of them, otherwise you’d not had such overwhelming feelings when greeting each other,”

“Um. I’m glad you think so highly of us, but, um, ma’am, we’re actual genuine thieves-”

“Well of course you are, lovey.”

“Um,”

“A proclivity for kleptomancy has no bearing on the content of your character, lovey! Now; gather up your friends, and we’ll get things sorted,”

I smile a bit helplessly at Daryl, who sighs, and grins. We agree; we gather; and we follow the two old ladies through town, eventually gathering three old men well into the very last days of their lives.

I’ve never gotten a straight answer about what makes a stone with a hole through it a seestone; mostly, I get sort of… circumnavigational explanations.

Tontatta, or Dwarves, aren’t very big; on average, they fit somewhere between two and a half centimeters, and twenty centimeters. Mostly, they’re the size of Island Rats, just under twelve centimeters or so; Lindy is huge, being a full thirty centimeters tall.

They have big eyes, small mouths, and tend towards pointieness; pointy noses, pointy ears, pointy little tails- ah, yes, and a so called ‘Digger’ Tontatta has a tail. It’s usually pretty big and bushy, and those Tontatta that have them are quite proud of them. It’s not quite to the level of Gyojin Pride, and Merjin Pride, but it’s going to get there in a few lifetimes if something doesn’t change.

As for Seestones, I still don’t quite understand what they really are, or how they work, or why any stone with a hole in it won’t do; but they are, and they work, and no ordinary stone quite cuts the throat. A Tontatta with a Seestone can pop up to Bigjob size, or shrink back down to regular, no Devil Fruit needed- though, they do have to have possession of their stone the whole time, and only very special stones can do it to other people. I also understand it takes stamina to actually shrink or grow- once you’re in either state, it’s done, but getting there requires genuine effort, and staying there needs the stone.

My sister talks with Mab and Sanji for a good long hour; and in that time, me and the Mice go through the village and- with ample help from the Old Croakies- each of my friends gets their own seestone.

From Mister Tsung-sung, Daryl gets a tiny pearl earring. It looks like a tiny chip of mother-of-pearl in his ear, and Mister Tsung-sung told him that it’d be a small seed pearl on a post setting through his ear when Bigjobbed. Daryl doesn’t have pierced ears, so- after a bit of bickering- I decided that Genny would do it, as I’m not actually that great with blood on an ally. Everyone else was very jealous of Daryl’s seestone- apparently, pearls that work as seestones are very rare and very powerful.

Mister Scrump took a curmudgeonly liking to Maya, and bestowed upon her his seestone- which, in his younger years, he’d added a long chain to, as it made him appear rather dashing. It’s a hematite on a long chain of something that isn’t metal- or it is, just not magnetic, because the hematite is definitely magnetic. From the quiet conversation he had with Maya, and her quiet contemplation of the seestone after, I got the feeling there’s more to it than just magnetizm; what, I don’t actually know.

Hildy got Mrs. Fairfax’ seestone- a ruby polished so it doesn’t shine, set in with a number of other rubies so’s it’s shaped like a raspberry. She started wearing it as a purse; and apparently, Bigjob, the raspberry doesn’t change size- but the chain it’s on does.

Shrinking Violet was different; we all went to see her, but Jellybean was the only one of us who had the guts to approach. I’m… I’m not good, with dying people, especially if it’s slow and the dying is a woman, I- can’t. Maybe not ever.

Sometimes people can hang on until their loved ones arrive for a final goodbye. Genny says this occurs more with a slowly progressing disease like congestive heart failure or dementia. Strength of will; deciding to fight… that can buy someone a bit more time.
Mom’s disease was slow, right up until the last few months, when she just didn’t have any fight left in her- and then, of course, it wasn’t slow at all. It took her, and we weren’t there, and she wasn’t ready to go.

Mom told us, when we went to Bonchon’s the second time after her funeral- that’s what we decided on, instead of a diner- that dying the way she did is like falling asleep when you’re sick, or injured. You fight it for a while because of the pain; and you fight it for longer because you aren’t ready, or you’ve got too much to do, still. It always catches up eventually, though; the mortality rate has been holding steady at a hundred percent for a long time now.

For Mom, her days were a mixed bag. Some days, she didn’t want to wake up at all, see what being so ill was doing to us- and some days, she said, she was so happy to be so loved by us, and so immensely guilty that we had to care for her, and not the other way around… Mom’s lungs filled with poison-air, and then holes, and then she couldn’t breathe at all- and when it spread to her gills… that was it. I stole the materials for the medical-grade Wards that protected us from her illness, and Genny set them; and I’ve never regretted that for a moment.

Mom said that the hardest thing about being sick- about knowing you’re not going to get better, that your illness is going to kill you- for her, at least, it was realizing that there was nothing she should have been doing, only things she could do. She thought she should have been doing a lot of things, at first- cooking for us, making sure we went to school, a thousand and one things- but what she could do? Be there; listen; teach us of her homeland, of her brothers, her mother and father and the world she left behind for the sake of her family.

Mom actually wrote a pamphlet for publication; and she had Genny re-write it. It’s called ‘so, you’re going to die. sorry.’ and my favorite part goes like this:

‘when i was told that i was dying and that it would only be a few years i took my children and packed our things and we went on a holiday. i moved us to a better apartment building, in a safer neighborhood, and used the last of my social favors to make sure that i’d get to keep it, so long as i lived. i sold off what i had meant to sell; i sat with each of my children and got a portrait with them; i wrote them letters for those events i knew i’d never be there to see. weddings; birthdays; childbirths; all of them. i wrote a book, and found a passion for writing romance novels; i wrote this pamphlet, because although the charities and doctors like to tell you to always keep your hopes up, there comes a time when all you can do is accept the inevitable- there is no hope, there is nothing they can do except comfort you, and yes: you’re going to die. sorry.

‘the hard part about knowing your death is imminent is realizing that, even though there’s so much you still want to do, think you still need to do- still mean to do- write your will, write letters to your brothers and phone your mother and burn everything that you don’t ever want the world to find and return what you borrowed and give away what you’d prefer not to be allocated by impersonal lawyers, mail drops, banks, and wills- catch up with that uncle, see the sky again, and- but the truth is, you don’t need to do any of that. really, you don’t. it’s your time- the last you’ll ever have- and it might take a lot of dying to take that deep breath and let go of the stress of living, but i promise you- i swear it- sometimes the only thing to be done is sit yourself up in bed, put on the radio, and pop open a nice cold beer while you yell at the damnfools wrecking this season’s game.

‘there is nothing to be ashamed of; no reason for guilt. it’s easy to feel like you absolutely need to make every moment count; but if you are content in that moment, it counted as much as it needed to. i don’t want to give the impression that all i do is drink and listen to the radio, even if all my food is smoothie-flavor now and i lack the strength to do more than hobble to the bathroom. i listen to audiobooks, too, and symphonies, and operas; i get wheeled into philoms, and through beautiful parks; i get propped up in my chair and i people watch; i get taken to wild band concerts, which takes down the mood for everyone else. Good; able-bodied fuckers deserve a little emotional discomfort now and then, my physical discomfort is only going to kill me in, oh, a year or so.
probably less, actually.

‘it took me a few tries to decide that it was okay to “waste” some time with a beer and a radio; or at the park; or at the movies; or in a nightclub; and not feel guilty about it. i try not to make long term goals or set too high expectations for myself. i found a hobby that lets me escape- my head, my body, my fury, my pain, my sorrow. i listen to a lot of books, and i mull things over, and i try my best to enjoy the little things.

‘you don’t have to keep thinking about what can’t be fixed, and what isn’t going to change. there is no winning against an enemy that refuses the very concept of the struggle. we are all dying; every second, every day, is another second and day closer. today, tomorrow, yesterday, forever; all of those moments are valuable. how much would you pay for another minute? young and healthy, you would have put a tangible price on it; now, when you can see that your minutes are running out, there’s almost nothing you wouldn’t pay- and if it hurts (and it always hurts, and it’s always ugly and undignified and awful, every time, for every person), you’d pay anything at all. because, in that next minute, some bright spark might find a way to heal you.

‘i am forty-eight at the time of this writing. i will not live to see my daughters come of age- i might not even live to see them gain apprenticeships. i won’t see them move out, go to trade school or med school or college, fall in love, get married, have children of their own, any of that. i won’t be there to comfort their hurts; nor crow their triumphs; lament their despairs; to support, to defend, to care, to watch over, to cherish- i will be gone.

‘there are no placating words that are quite big and heavy enough. nothing to say; nothing to do. some days, it’s like i’m already dead; my children can’t help but weep for me, and i for them. i can’t tell them everything is going to be okay; because i’m dying as i write this, and by the time you read it, i will be dead. they know it; i know it; there is no easy way out.

‘but there is one way out. Make the best of it. i’m not blowing money left, right, and center- because i want to leave it behind for whatever debts remain, i want them to have… something. anything-even though it’s a paltry substitute for, well, me. quit smoking; quit having sex for money i don’t even need. i got everything together for them, for when i’m gone- my son, my oldest… it’ll be hard on him, the end. The End.

‘most of what i put together is all stuff they don’t even remember; lots of pictures i took of them all when they were just guppies, just littles, just mine and no one else’s; stuff they won’t remember and i won’t be there to tell them. who will tell them how they were potty trained? who will tell them they’ve never liked lima beans and that it’s okay if they never do? early moments of wonder- first words, exact times of birth, the day they all went to preschool and came back without nappies… i want my children to have these memories.’

I couldn’t read on, after that. It was… too much. Jellybean’s seestone is small; a tiny ruby inside a cage of physalis-shaped amber. The amber is the seestone, not the ruby; and Jellybean swallowed the whole thing, rather than find some way to carry it around.

The Croakies are large- Pithiea is large, even though age has shrunken her and made her body crumble on itself, and so it doesn’t surprise me that Lindy is the one to get her seestone. It’s a pair of raw opal earrings, meant for a Bigjob child; and Lindy herself is so big, she can actually wear them as intended. The posts are a little thick for anyone else, but it turns out Lindy used to wear gauges. This was a surprise to all of us except Quil; as was Quil’s seestone, except to Lindy.

Apparently, he’s started changing up his style- Quil says that always keeping to one way of thinking is just a recipe for stagnation, and he’s always wanted to wear things like this. There are weirder things to base your style off of than a beautiful black lace choker, with teardrops of black stone falling from the empty cameo at the center.

And then, of course, I was informed that contrary to what I might have wanted to do today, I wouldn’t be accompanying my sister in her quest- not by Missus Mab, mind. No; that were Mister Sanji what told me so.

Well.

Missus Mab… she’s real hard about some things, but really, she’s a soft touch, and rather pathetic when it comes to punishment. Sanji… isn’t.

“I don’t mind you going off to do your own thing; and I- I’m sorry for pushing you so hard, I just… I got scared, I was scared you’d be trapped with no way to protect yourself. I’m sorry; I should have said so, rather than pushing you so hard you ran away-”

“No, no- that’s not why I ran, I’m sorry; I just… everyone treats me like I’m made of glass, and I’m not! I hate it! I thought- I thought, if I go on an adventure of my own, maybe… this is just made it worse!”

“You’re not glass! I- oh, botheration. I don’t have the words; but you’re not glass. I think you can do what you set out to do, truly; I just… I want you to take your sister and her Mouseketeers with you,”

“…okay,”

“It’s not because I think you can’t handle it- I think you can, actually. But… you’re safer in a group, is all. You notice how none of us, not even Captain, go around on our own? Fern is always with Robin- you might not have seen her, but she saw you, at that Tea Room Fern likes,”

“-Really?”

“Oh yes; seers, real seers, with as prodigious a talent as your sister, are prime bait for those who would take slaves. And you, darling; you’re very nearly a full on doctor, young and compassionate and terribly effective; the moment someone thinks they could steal you away, they’ll try it. Thankfully, you’ve a sister who’s rather good at stealing things back,”

“Oh. Well- that was my instinct also; also, are, um, am I very much in trouble?”

“I’ll skip the first part, and go to the rest- Beds empty! No note! Provisions and weapons and the lot of you- gone! Could have died! Been stolen! Been eaten! Out of my mind with worry; did you even think, you foolish girl? Never, as long as I’ve lived, have I felt such terror- and here you are, fine and dandy and- Genevieve, please, for my sake- Don’t you ever do that again! Never was this much trouble as a kid, I swear to th’gods-”

And I suddenly realise that it’s not snowmelt in my hair- it’s Mister- it’s Sanji’s tears. His voice is deep and growly and he sounds so angry, but he’s crying and his arm around me is shaking, and- I need to-

I wriggle around and wrap my arms around Sanji’s chest. He wraps his arm around me and squeezes- not so tight it hurts, but he was scared. I scared him; and I’m sorry, aw, please- please don’t cry, Mister Sanji, I won’t do it again-

“Um, actually Miss Pleasant, we have a Code,”

“What, really?”

“Sure- us being professional thieves, and pirates, it’s more correct to say we have two. Um- Ellie knows the Thieve’s Code inside out, she helped define, codify, and record most of t’damn thing; as for the Pirate Code… Hm. Well- we’re just junior pirates, so we get taught parts of the Code as it comes up. Mab says that our copy of the Piratica Codex should be right next to the Logbook, but I’ve never seen it,”

“Um. So- what is it though?”

“So far as I can tell, it’s supposed to be the rules and regulations of pirates and piracy; it’s really more like, um, guidelines?”

“Daryl, you’re just confusing her- let me do it.”

“Sorry Boss; go right ahead,“

“So. The Code of the Pirate Brethren, also known as the Code, is a code of conduct used among pirates. It’s a revered collection of rules and laws, chronicled in the original Pirata Codex, which is kept safe by the Sirens of Shipwreck Island. The Code was written during the second Brethren Court, a governing council of the great Pirate Lords- the Shichibukai were originally the enforcers of the Pirate King, I think? But there used to be Nine, not Seven, and… I dunno, I zoned out during that part. Anyway, the original Code didn’t have Davey Back Fights or Captain’s Orders in it; and it was set down by the pirates Morgan and Bartholomew. In practice, only the keepers of the Code- the Sirens, and by extension, the Fae- keep the Code as Law; everyone else uses it more like guidelines for conduct between pirates on the high seas,”

“Okay- so, it’s a set of rules you’re supposed to follows if you have to, I guess; and it was Two of the Old Pirate Lords, Morgan and Bartholomew, who figured it out and wrote it down, and that’s what alls pirates have lived by ever since,”

“Yeah. The current Keeper of the Code is Dracule Perona, Queen of the Sirens; and one of the actual well-known requirements to become Pirate King is to swear by the Code. Like, there’s an actual Oath and everything. Some pirates flaunt the Code; and some keep to it like it was set down by Gods, not men; but the truth is..."

“‘It’s just guidelines, innit; and it’s what’s in your heart. If you can do it, you’ll do it; and if you can’t, you can’t. Obvious, like,”

“‘Yeah, s’right. Sometimes, you’ve got to accept you’re a pirate, hang the Code, shoot the rules, and get on with it. As for the actual rules - as we know of them? Firstly: make friends, but wisely. All pirates have the Right to Parlay; Whoever spots a treasure-laden ship can choose the best of the crew-share weapons for themselves; every crewmember is to have an equal share in any treasure found; the crew accountant is to keep track of all expenses and treasure; spoils are shared on seniority- captain has first pick, followed by first mate, second, and so on,"

“Mm. Then there’s- any man who falls behind is left behind; an act of War can only be declared by the Pirate King, who would then have the power to parley with shared adversaries; the King can only be elected by popular vote by all Nine Pirate Lords-”

“Wait, but there are only seven?”

“Exactly; um- The Pirate King must swear the King’s Oath on the genuine Pirata Codex; any person who refuses to serve aboard a pirate ship must die; trading for products fair and square means the seller can do as they like, including reselling at profit or freeing them as they like-”

“Ah! So that’s why there’s a clear distinction between slavers and pirates- ors an unclear distinction, I should says,”

“Yeah; it really is a matter of what’s in a man’s heart. Last bits I know of, then Ellie can tell you the Thieve’s Code, which is much less highfalutin’; Pirates are to respect their fellows on the account. Knowingly targeting and sinking other pirate ships is strictly forbidden; and killing a surrendered enemy is not allowed. There’s also regulations on what color your eyepatch can be, and what size of peg leg you can have, but no one really enforces those unless it’s a doctor;”

“There’s a rule about not snitching out other pirates, Miss-”

“Doctor Trafalgar! Sorry, is there?”

“Yes; unless they have proved themselves so heinous as to destroy all faith in their piratical prowess, no pirate may turn another pirate in to the authorities. Am I to understand that there is a Code of conduct for thieves?”

“Ah- yes, sir. Did... you not know that I and my fellows were thieves?”

“I’m… still having issues with discerning which Suntide is which- excepting Sancho. He’s rather obvious,”

“Quite. Well, yes; Thieves have their own Code of conduct, as well as a generalized code. Do you want to hear about it, along with Miss Pleasant?”

“If it wouldn’t be an imposition,”

“Certainly. Um- so, throughout the world there is a code among thieves especially, but also including forgers, fences, chimney sweeps, conmen, and so on; there is a code of conduct for those who would set themselves aside from society. Unlawful we may be; but we do have standards, and a way of governing our own behavior. These are generally understood; but the actual Code is written in Thieves Runes, as put down by Gin Rummy, Roulette, Le Chat Orange, The Mouseketeers, and Doctor Danger, in the Thievius Codicies-as each Thief listed contributed a distinctive… volume, I guess you could call it, of the Thievius. These are all general guidelines, with each volume being more a collection of stories in which the various rules were obeyed, or broken- and why,"

“Interesting- so, unlike the Pirate’s Code, it’s understood from the start that there is no real rule or law; these are just a collection of manners that marks one as being more or less ‘proper’ in the society of thieves. And, by having each volume of the Thievius written by a different thief, with the examples being stories… why, each thief that reads the full Thievius must come to their own conclusion about what is and isn’t allowed among thieves,”

“Er- yes, Master Robin; that’s exactly so. Mostly, the leader of the gang is concerned with the Thievius; it’s their responsibility to ensure propriety amongst their followers, after all. The specific rules and guides vary from organization to organization; but what’s true in all proper gangs is that those who uphold the Thieves Code are Men of Honor, or Women of Esteem,”

“Ah- I had wondered where that particular phrase came from among pirates- tell me, Miss Eleanor, is it particularly common for thieves to become pirates?”

“Eh- more common in earlier eras than now, Doctor Trafalgar. Piracy used to be the only way for lawbreakers to make a fine fortune; nowadays, there are other methods to acquire money you didn’t earn yourself,”

“I see. So- what are the actual rules, then?”

“Well- a Thief should have nothing to do with the authorities; be it participating in politics,”

“-which means voting, running for an official office, backing a political party-”

“-nor should they join in a government or religious organization-”

“-though that’s not to say one may not have a belief in the gods, only that one must not serve the interests of temple or state,”

“A Thief should not serve in the military or accept any offers from the government or prison authority-”

“-which is not to say you can’t help or hinder the military, or do for or unto the government or prison authority,”

“A Thief should not cooperate with authorities when detained or if another thief is under investigation or arrest; nor should they testify against them-”

“-with the understanding that this is only in relation to theft; one need not keep silence about rape, murder, abuse, and so on,”

“A Thief should keep secret the information about the whereabouts of accomplices, such as dens, districts, hideouts, safe houses, aliases, information centers, fences, distributors, and so on-”

“-without exception, actually,”

“A Thief should make good on promises given to other thieves,”

“Common sense, really,”

“A Thief should help other thieves in need, both by emotional and material support,” “-Eeeh. This one requires discretion; but- yeah, only decent,”

“A Thief must not lose their reasoning abilities when drunk or high. Intoxication of any kind is not an excuse for breaking any of the codes.”

“Word,”

“A Thief should never gamble without being able to cover losses,”

“-Unless, of course, those losses were to those who do not uphold the Thieves Code; funnin’ with your mates is one thing, losing to a right bastard is quite another-”

“-It is acceptable, proper, and quite expected to cheat,”

“-But getting caught cheating is just bad form, innit?”

“A Thief should never, under any circumstances, have a ‘legitimate’ job-”

“-Unless, of course, it’s to provide cover or information for a Job job,”

“One should live only on money obtained through gambling or theft, which in this usage refers to any respectable criminal activity, and relying on other thieves. Being a sellsword is only legitimate if one does not accept payment from, nor work for, authorities,”

“-Um, well, actually, it’s easier to have a proper alibi if you’ve got a job of some kind- means there’s a witness to say that you were somewhere at certain times, even when you weren’t-”

“-And not all Jobs actually pay that well- Anyway. A Thief should cut ties with their family: parents, siblings, cousin, kin. I don’t do that,”

“But the Mouseketeers do,”

“A Thief should never have a family of their own: No marriage. No children; No reason to ever have their True Name written down in any official record,”

“-That don’t mean you can’t have as many lovers as you’d like; and most career Thieves find that it’s easier to have a family and just never mention it, rather than try to avoid it entirely. This rule is the least enforced of them all,”

“A Thief should teach the criminal way of life to youth with potential,”

“Yep,”

“A Thief should act within the underworld to protect the basic needs and rights of criminals and prisoners according to the extents and priorities set by the community- be it a gang, guild, residents in a given prison system, or neighborhood,”

“Yep,”

“A Thief should demand an inquiry and judgement by peers to resolve disputes in the event of a conflict between oneself and other thieves, or between thieves whenever possible,”

“This can become very complicated, depending on the dispute- or actual crime- in question; a lot of the Mouseketeers volume of the Thievius is actually about peer-dispute resolution, because the Mouseketeers are known to be extremely fair and morally sound; the Mice have called the cops on thieves before, and for good reason- thieves are not abusers, nor murderers, nor rapists, and we will not shelter them that are,"

“A Thief should, if necessary, participate in peer-dispute inquiries if called upon. Le Chat Orange has proposed to the Thieves Council a sort of… well, internal affairs commission, because—"

“-because of the third rule in the Judgement Triad of the Thieves Code; A Thief should, in bringing a dispute to their peers for judgement, elect a neutral third party to present their side,"

“Yeah. Le Chat Orange has stated, multiple times, that for certain disputes there is no neutral party to present even one side, much less two; thus, their recommendation that there be a designated branch of thieves who- aside from being thieves- are neutral when these matters come up,”

“So far, it’s mostly been an issue of there being no single Thief-line or group of Thieves with the political clout, the sterling reputation for fairness and moral judgement, and the sheer numbers needed to do that Job right; the Mouseketeers could barely handle the strain of one Territory,”

“Finally, there are the Penalties- A Thief should punish any offending thief who breaks the Code as decided by the judgement of the community; be that a gang, guild, residents, or cellmates. Further, they must not resist carrying out the decision of punishing the offending thief who is found guilty of violating the Code,”

“Le Chat Orange is actually blacklisted from the major Thief events, because they—”

“Leave it, Daryl,”

“But—”

“Leave. It. Especially considerin’ no one can prove it was Le Chat Orange that did- well, you know,”

“Fine, alright; anyway, that’s the entirety of the Thieves Code we can say to outsiders; there’s more to it, of course, but the only thing you can know about those parts of the Code is that they exist, and we can’t tell you or show them to you because you aren’t thieves,”

I sigh at the expressions on Doctor Trafalgar and Master Robin’s faces; then again, they are pirates.

“In all honesty, the only rules that really matter are the same as with Pirates: what you’re willing to do, and what you aren’t. For instance, Le Chat Orange could have accepted that a wetworks team was dispatched to kill Bittergreen due to her unconscionable crime of killing the man who raped her and throwing his head into a massive fountain before screaming to the heavens that no man would ever again besmirch her honor- Le Chat Orange could have accepted that. Instead, Le Chat Orange stole Bittergreen away, and they still haven’t found her, and they still can’t prove that Le Chat did anything at all- except, of course, for the fact that Le Chat Orange said they’d do something about it,”

“Either you accept that for the most part, criminals are criminals and normal people- or you don’t, you can’t. But it’s true all the same, and it’ll all have to be put to rights one day. Erm- Miss Eleanor, aren’t you going to go with your sister to speaks with the Great Sage?”

“No; I rather got the impression from Mother Mayhay that I’m politely banned from approaching the grave,”
Ah,

Lily pads lay on the surface of the dark, cold water; they aren’t the green I expect, more a dark purple-blue. When I rest my foot on one, it feels cold and slimy.

“Don’t stand on ‘em for longer than you have to, Miss; and best keep your questions for the Sage short, and to the point,”

“Aye; thank you for restoring my natural size, Mister Pollash,”

“Aw, t’wern’t nothin’; go on, off with you,”

“Thank you, again,”

And then, I quickly walk across the lily pad stepping bridge, leaving my crewmates far behind. The fountain is much larger than it seems; some trick of architecture and landscaping hiding it’s true size from the eyes.

When you look at a normal frog or toad, one that’s of a size small enough to fit fully in the palm of your hand, it’s easy to forget that the docile-ish amphibian resting in the soft grass, or hiding in the rushes, or nestled in the leaves of a tree- that’s an ambush predator who’s secretly a cross between a ninja, a grappling hook, and a black hole. Humans aren’t the only animals that grow to giant proportions; all the animals of this world do, on occasion.

Our logbook mentions a Marine Toad named Yokozuna; he was about the size of the couch in the Galley. The Great Toad Sage is larger than our largest horse, Steady Walker- and Steady was meant for carriages.

Anything can be dangerous. The Great Toad Sage is particularly dangerous, however, because he’s not an ordinary toad; he’s a Giant Vampire Toad.

The Giant Vampire Toad is a particularly noxious amphibian which grows to weights of up to thirty pounds. It’s warty brown and yellow body is covered with sedative mucous, and two translucent membranes of slimy tissue connect it’s fore and rear limbs, enabling it to glide from treetop perches, much like a sugar glider. It’s forelimbs are fingered with small claws which enable the vampire frog to climb and to hold prey, and it possesses two rows of teeth on each jaw, each up to three centimeters long, sharp as razors, and secreting a powerful anticoagulant.

How do I know all of this? Fern loves amphibians.

How does it matter? It doesn’t, really, except that the Great Toad Sage is a Giant Vampire Toad the size of the Mini-Merry, and the only thing I can think of that he’d eat is… well. Me. Except, of course-
“Ah. A Merrow- you’ve no warmth in your veins, child; I’ve no taste for the blood of your kind,”

“That is a relief, Mister Great Toad Sage-”

“My name is Emerson, young lady- and I suppose you’re here to learn about that accursed sap, and those poer fools who haunt the Great Maple to this very day- well, I’ll tell you what I’ve told everyone else-”

“Um- I hardly believe in curses and ghosts that are tied to the very life’s blood of a living part of nature; so far as I know, trees can’t have those, excepting hanging trees,”

“Aye- hanging trees aren’t cursed, they’ve taken up special duties in service to the… hmph. I thought the same, when I first learned of the cursed sap. A maple grown tall in the hills, guarded by a river spirit where no river flows; it cannot be found except by those who already know where it is. And yet- find it, men did. And there be the tree; and within it’s mighty limbs, the sap. They took it, missin’ buckets and tubes and vats and tankers, they took it all; boiled that cursed sap into syrup, traded it, frittered it all away- for drink and food and pleasures of the flesh. But the more they gave away what was not theirs to give, the more they came to find- the drink would not cease their thirst, the food turned to ash in their mouths; all the flesh in the world could not slake their lusts. It is a curse that lives in the sap of that tree, Miss; Winnie Foster, gods rest her soul, set it in that tree when she poured out the Waters of Life,”

“Um-”

“Those Waters compelled all who knew of them with greed; and by their greed, they were consumed. Seek the tree not, Miss; you will find no joy in the sap it gives, nor in the taking of it-”

“Sage Emerson, I don’t want the sap!”

“...Hah?”

“I don’t want the sap! I’m searching out the tree for a branch, or perhaps directions to a sapling of it’s line- it’s a Red Maple, and… I’m making a flight broom, see, and-”

“Oh! Well. Ahurm. That shouldn’t be a problem, miss; it’s the sap that’s cursed, the wood ought to be fine- and I’ve heard the Old Man complain a time or two about branches grown too large and heavy for his trunk, so there shouldn’t be any problem with you taking a few off him,”

I grin up at the massive Toad Sage, who chortles happily- a jolt of cold lightning trickles down my spine- I hold very still and silent for a long moment.

“My- aherm! My apologies, Miss; I have not yet broken my Winter’s fasting. A moment, please,”

Then the Sage started to wheeze and cough up rocks. Big, brown rocks- one or two were the size of boulders, veined with rich seams of many different kinds of gemstone. But some were merely pebbles, or cobbles like I can barely see at the bottom of the fountain.
“Fill your pockets with as many stones as you can bear; then take you this ring- it bears my magic within, and will mark you out to the Pucca as a friend of mine. This leaf will be as your carriage- and my son, my own child, shall take you to the place where the waters of this fountain become the waters of the river in which the Pucca holds dominion,”

“Um- wait, what about my sister?”

The Sage grumbles, before turning to me with big, yellow eyes- “Would you truly deny her the opportunity to find what she’s been missing?”- and then, with barely a ripple in the water, he’s in and gone from my sight. An echo reaches me from below the waves-

“Don’t worry about trying to return my stones- particularly that ring! I make them as a hobby, I’m swimming in the damn things-”

And then, truly, he is gone.

I look back the way I have come, and see my sister Ellie talking with Daryl, and… it’s the first time they’ve been of a size with each other, and large enough for me to see their faces together.

I have everything Fern told me to bring- and with the Great Sage gone into the waters, there’s probably enough time for me to- right.

I set out the still-warm pancake on a plate, with it’s own cutlery, drizzle it with maple syrup- and set the whole arrangement in the tiny cave where Winnie Foster’s Grave is set. Then, I leave behind my worries, double check that my hatchet, candle, blanket, small pouch- which I put the toadstone ring in- and rope are settled, and lay securely. My guns and my pipe are ready, as well.

I fill my pockets with toadstones, and when the lily pad leaf rises from the black depths, I set down on it without fear.

I’m a Merrow, after all- I can breathe underwater.

The drop is cold and black and the light fades faster than I thought any light could; below, I can see a massive toad pulling a chain connected to the lily pad leaf, which is actually ceramic. We go down, and down, and down, and leave the World above far behind; I can’t hear the chirruping of birds, nor my sister’s laughter, nor anything other than the rushing of waves, all around.
So. The Mice have their own miniature house- it’s basically a regular house, just… dollsized? It’s actually built for someone Lindy’s size, which means everything is just large enough for a child to consider a toy, but small enough for Lindy to consider regular. I think the doll brand, Barbarella? It’s the right size for this dollhouse, the actual dollies, I mean; everything in this house, too.

There are buckets of rooms in this house; Mab designed it so that each of the Mouseketeers got their own distinct room, plus a room adjacent specifically for wardrobe or whatever. It’s a beautiful set up- and the only reason I can’t move in is because there’s no way to keep hold of a seestone while sleeping. It’s a shame; it’s really a beautiful house. The floors are all walnut, and the ceilings have hand-plastered embossing. Like, I’m pretty sure this house- tiny though it is- is better than the mansions I’ve robbed.

The first thing we have to do to set up for an orgy is set out mattresses; they look like quilts, sort of. Then, we have to put waterproof sheet-covers over each mattress, followed by regular fitted sheets. All of this happens in the great room, which usually only has a couch and a miniature fire-Dial in the world’s dinkiest cast iron stove; but right now, there’s a miniature silk rug, and the mattresses with their sheets, and a bucket full of single-serve lube packets, and another full of condoms that Pleasant is diligently tearing into individual pieces.

Through the passthrough to the kitchen, I can hear Daryl and Hildy puttering around; Maya and Jellybean went off for drinks at the Daiso earlier, and Quil is helping Lindy and me with the ‘play’ area by setting up a big screen divider. On the other side is the other couch, moved in from the screened porch; and that’s where the coolers of drinks are going, once Maya and Jellybean get back. In the play space, we’ve also got tables of sex toys, soap, erotic manuals- you know, just… stuff.

Eventually, Daryl and Hildy are done- a platter of fruit and cheese, some roast beast sandwiches, and a few other finger foods, salted nuts and so on- and they’ve set their offerings out onto a low table. Jellybean and Maya soon come walking in with their offerings- coolers full of water bottles and ice, dental dams, coconut oil (which we’re all safe to eat), and… um, whatever else Maya wants to bring out from her room. She set the kettle to boil before she and Jelly left, and it’s starting to whistle now; she comes back with a… hahaha, a large selection of silicone sex toys, which go into a big stock pot followed by the kettle of boiling water. She fills the stockpot with more water, and sets the whole thing to boil- sanitize, really.

“Okay; so, my name is Daryl, and I’ll be leading our praise to the Goddess Hense today. We will give the pain of our pre-proceedings; we will give the pleasure of each others company. Praise be!”

“Praise!”

“Now; again, my name is Daryl, my safe word is ‘Hungerpang’, and I don’t like being restrained or bound in any way. I don’t do anal play of any kind. I like being stuffed, and kissing, and cuddling the best; and I prefer pet names and dirty talk of a positive nature- I don’t like shame or humiliation,”

“My name is Eleanor, and my safe word is ‘Chumbawumba’. I don’t like pain-play, and I’m not very vocal. I’m most familiar with most vanilla forms of sex, but I’m not opposed to doing kinkier things; you’ll have to talk me through things like bondage or, um… bondage is the kinkiest thing I know of, so. Um. Yeah- um. I don’t… nevermind, it’s fine;”

“Hello! My name is Maya, and my safe word is ‘Courgette’. I don’t like penetrative sex- I will use my mouth, but nothing below my waist. I like using strapons, and other dildoes,” “Hey, m'name’s Hildegarde- Hildy, please. My safe word is ‘Aluminium’; and I don’t like being on top. I’ll do it if we’re both bottoms, or if you’ve never done the sex act before, but I’d prefer to be on bottom, or receiving. Uh- no real objections to anything otherwise, I’m down for whatever,”

“My greetings; I am Jellybean. My safe word is ‘Nivea’; and I don’t do ‘Master/Servant’ play at all. I’m versatile, meaning I’m a top or bottom- er, giver or receiver- and I have something of an oral fixation,”

“So, uh, I’m Quilaby. My safe word is ‘doubledouble’, and I don’t like using my mouth- um, kissing other people, I, uh, I have sensitive teeth? I had a lot of cavities, so, um, I- I don’t like anything in my mouth. Like, at all. I’ll try anything else, and I really like pain-play, but, um, I’ll do anything, really,”

“I am Arlinda Rader Haai; my safe word is ‘carnivore’. I don’t like pain-play, and I don’t like being bound. I have a tendency to bite quite hard during orgasm, so if that’s not something you’re interested in, let me know- sex is not all about an orgasm, after all,”

“Oh, um- h-hello, my name is Pleasant. My safe word is, uh, ‘blueberry’. I, uh, I’ve never had sex befores, um, ever? Like, at all- about the farthest I’ve ever gottens is heavy cuddling and some kissing, so, um, please be carefuls with me?”

“Okay; now, this is standard for every orgy presided over by Hense, so- we will now go over the use of the Safety Tools. This is the penile condom- it goes on the penis or dildo to be inserted into someone’s ass, puss, or mouth; like so. Make sure there are no air bubbles or air pockets between the condom and the surface of the phallus; use the pinch and roll method- like so- to ensure a good fit. This is the vaginal condom- it goes only in the puss, or in the penile pocket if necessary. Being very careful not to rip the condom, or scratch the interior surface of yourself or your partner; close the ring at the bottom, and press the bottom of the condom into the puss or pocket until you reach the base. The condom is plenty long enough to reach all the way to the outside,”

“Um,”

“Yes, Pleasant?”

“I’m allergic to latex,”

“Ah- just a moment; this is refresher for everyone here,”

“Okay,”

“So. This is a dental dam; use it as a barrier between your mouth and any of the lower orifices. This is lube; use it during anal play, and whenever you feel things need to move a little more smoothly. Please try and keep the packaging contained to the trash can. Now- I know a few of us are allergic to latex or silicone- so! If you cannot use a condom, dental dam, or provided lube, please clean the area with either a baby wipe, or with coconut oil; then, do as you’d like,”

“What are we doing with our clothes, Daryl?”

“Well- shoot, forgot the basket. Um- Ellie, could you lead everyone in disrobing?”

“Sure thing; okay. I’ll start by taking off my shirt, and then we’ll go from there- okay? Ah- and everyone, if you want to partner up with someone, or join someone else’s fun, you need to ask and get clear verbal consent first,”
I get a general assent; and, as I skim out of my soft sweater, my friends all take off their clothing too. I take the time to shake my bra out of my sweater, and my panty-band out of my jeggings, and my socks out of my boots. My legs writhe and twist over each other, pulsing with blood now they’re free of the restraints of my boots.

Daryl comes back with a slithery rasp against the hardwood. His clothing is last to migrate to the pile growing in the basket; I mosey around and gather up everyone’s shoes, to put them on the shoe rack. I double check and make sure the doors and windows are locked, the curtains drawn, and everything lays well- and it does. Then, I grab a music player and a few ‘sexy’ albums, and go right back.

Everyone is naked now.

Daryl has very wide hips, for a man, and his tail is very long and comes to a fine point. He has two broad fins just behind his hips, bracketing the small of his back. His slit is bumpy, and a little spiny; and it’s oozing a thin trail of white, and I can smell it and it smells like… saltwater. He has a very sharp hourglass figure, and a full broad chest. Little specks of green and brown dot his skin like freckles, and without his bright frilly clothing, all I can see is his masculinity- the very maleness of him.

Maya’s breasts are very large, and very pale- her nipples are slightly brown, pinkening under our attention, and her veins are very blue through her skin. The cupercals along her ribcage are pinker still, and that flush travels down the middle of her body and down between her legs and all along the open thighs and over the smooth puffy slit nestled like a prayer in her crotch. Without her clothing, the muscle tone of her body is visible too- the sharp planes of her belly and the hard angles of her shoulders, the ripples and bulges of her thighs, her calves…

Hildy has thick brown hair, and it’s actually very soft- her whole body is covered in fine, light hair, except between her legs where it’s a dark, thick black. Her breasts are soft, too; warm and soft and they smell very faintly of cherries. I’ve licked between her legs before, when she was Small and I was Big; and it felt like licking the surface of a peach, or sometimes a nectarine. Her tail is only fluffy on the very tip- I don’t know if she clips the rest, or if that’s the only spot where it grows long.

Jellybean is curvy and soft and changing from transparent to translucent- especially her slit, which has puffed almost comically large, and is turning a dark, blushing red. Her head-frills have flapped wide, and become spotted and covered with dainty trails of color. Her breasts are almost peach-pink, and her nipples a darker cherry; her lips are like plums. Her skin is absurdly soft, and smooth, and she really does like using her mouth and having a mouth used on her.

Quil is surprisingly shy; his spiny slit is very dark red, and his legs are almost closed. The rest of his body is following suit, and he can barely look at anyone straight on; he’s very cute, with excellent muscle definition and very soft looking skin.

Lindy isn’t shy at all; her slit has a natural blue cast to it, and her hair is thick and blue, down around her shoulders. Her breasts are small, and her nipples are dark blue-brown, hard as little stones. She’s wrapped her webbed hand around Quil’s, and he’s slowly starting to relax.

Pleasant is thin- thin limbs, thin, narrow breasts, short hips and small shoulders- she’s small, is the thing, and definitely the least comfortable of us all, right after Quil. She can barely sit still, and she can’t look at anyone at all- she’s flushed so red, it’s almost erotic. Her nipples are hard and brown, and a large fluffy tail wrapped and tucked in front of her blocks me from seeing her puss- I don’t know if she has a pussy, or a slit, or what.
I want to help her relax, a little- but… Daryl…

Daryl lands a firm pinch on my ass, and strokes gentle fingers through my wavy blond hair. I jolt, and my tits bounce with my movement- they’re very bouncy, to my bemusement. Daryl smirks, and holds up- oh, a hair comb, and a tail brush. Hmmm…

Tail.

I take the tail brush, and calmly weave my way over to Pleasant; Daryl slinks around the other side of the table and couch, and we both sit on either side of her, my many thighs to her one, and Daryl’s tail to her other.

“Hi,”

“Hey there,”

“U-uhm. Um. H-hello, um-”

“Woah, hey, it’s okay- you don’t have to do anything you don’t want to, and you’re- what’s wrong, Pleasant?”

“Everyone else is so… muscular, but I’m just sticks, I’m- I’m not pretty-”

“Hm. I know you don’t want to hear platitudes like ‘you’re so beautiful’, or ‘you’re gorgeous’- but how about ‘maybe you’re in good company?’”

“Or- maybe we like that you aren’t muscular like everyone else?”

“…S-so, it’s really okay, um, that, that I’m not… well built?”

“Of course, Pleasant!”

“Mm- I like the way you look, yeah,”

“A-alright. Um; do y-yous, ah, you want to brush my tail and hairs?”

“Yeah, if that’s alright with you?”

“Mm, yes please,”

“Um. Sure; please take care of me,”

I tug Pleasant’s tail out from around her hips and belly, revealing a thick tuft of caramel stippled with black guardhairs, all wrapped around a thick, meaty tail. It’s not prehensile, but it is quite sensitive to touch- that’s why brushing or caring for one is so intimate in Tontatta society.

I begin at the tip, and carefully scruff through the fur, making sure there are no big pieces in the hair; then again, with a tighter focus, checking for medium sized pieces; and then, at last, the brush. Daryl, on the other side, has already started combing Pleasant’s hair.

As my hands stroke over her soft tail, I can see the anxiety draining out of her; the soft coo that comes out of her is certainly adorable, as is the little squeak she makes when she hears herself make it. Praise be, she is cute- and, when she is soft and loose and dripping-ready, Daryl and I lead her from Rest to Play.

Daryl’s tail is long and thick and very sturdy; using it as a brace or a grip is… par for the course, really. You know, I’ve never actually licked someone’s crotch before, when the crotch in question was the right size? I mean- when we were all of a size… I mean- I mean-

It’s… not bad. It’s kinda sour, like keifer that’s been let age for too long, and kinda sweet, and it smells like sweat- I have to push hair out of the way with my hands, and Daryl holds Pleasant’s legs up so she doesn’t accidentally strangle me… I don’t know.

I had fun doing it- and Pleasant had fun too… but. I guess I thought there’d be more to it than just… this? Maybe I don’t like this- there’s more to sex than-

Hm.

I- need to think.

I distangle my legs from Pleasant and Daryl, and quietly watch as Daryl strokes up Pleasant’s stomach, between her legs, along her thighs and the backs of her knees and the base of her tail, coiling himself around her like a snake taking a nap and drawing her up, up, up the long ruffled ridge of his anterior and the way her face turns red and shuddery-

Until he sets her over the blooming flush of his crotch and thrusts himself inside her, the sharp gasp and moan and the way Pleasant’s hair is thrown back her long neck a pale column of flushing and the aching want in every centimeter of her-

Her legs lock around his waist, and her tail thrashes- left, right, left right- as Daryl gives her the ride of her life, white cum foaming and dripping between them and down his tail and into the sheets. Her cries reach a feverous chant of ‘yes yes yes-’ before with a hiss and a splatter, clean waters gush from between them and her cries become moans and she writhes in Daryls arms and cleaves to him tight tight her arms locked around his chest and her face gasping and weeping with pleasure.

Daryl slows his pace just enough to let Pleasant come back from that wonderfeeling, and then with a lurch she’s on her back and he atop her-

His hips find another slapping rhythm, this one designed to dig in deep and scrub every twitching nerve and sinew left untouched before. Pleasant all but comes unglued, her thin clawed fingers scrabbling desperately for something- anything-

I give her one of my legs, and slowly slither up underneath her, pillowing her straining head and neck in my empty lap. I glance up at Daryl, who only grins at me with excitement; then, my legs act on their own. One slips down between them, a sucker latching onto her clit and she all but loses her mind; another finds her left breast, another her right, and her nipples and she squeals -

I glance around the room, and see-
Maya thrusting her strapon cock between Jellybean’s closed thighs, her whole body curved around cupping cradling protective soft sweet-

Lindy biting Quil everywhere she can reach, pleasure made a fool of his face-

And Hildy, watching… me.

I revel in it- the pleasure screams of Pleasant beneath me, the thick ooze dripping from her well-worried puss, the sharp gasp and collapse of Daryl atop her and the little yelp she gives in return; the way both of them sigh as I caress them-

And then I leave them, and turn my attention to Hildegarde- Hildy. She’s pretty, with her hair down-pretty all the time, but with her hair loose there’s a relaxation that comes over her… I slink over to her, and ask-

“Can we?”

“Of course,"

I start by just… touching. Her hair, her skin, kisses on her smiling face and my tongue her tongue and all the world is- mine-

I am not- I am not afraid-

-cold and dark and bare as bones-

-sleep forever in my embrace-
I’m sorry- I’m sorry-

I’m sorry- I’m sorry- I don’t-
Please stop touching me I can’t-

I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry-
Chu-

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba

cumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
chumbawumba
Please please don’t leave me alone-
When I come to, I’m in the center of a pile of steadily breathing- I’m cuddled together with all my friends, naked and warm and soft together. I feel strange.

I know, in my mind, that I’m safe- but my heart won’t stop racing. I feel cold, and I can’t- I can’t stop shaking, but I’m- cold it’s cold it’s cold-

I have to pee-

So, I have cyclic anxiety attacks now. I- need to do. Something. About that.

It’s usually a fun time, being Ellie’s Second. We met- well, way at the beginning of the Second Golden Age, about six years ago maybe?

Doesn’t matter- we just… clicked. She’s ambitious, is Ellie- doesn’t show it much, but she wants, she Wants, and she is only satisfied a little when she gets it. She’s also thoughtful, and generous- for her… I don’t think stealing for things was ever her real passion. Ellie steals to steal- it’s the rush of it she likes, the complicated mess of figuring out how to get past this and that, appraising what she’s stolen and selling it for a fine price…

Time’s like this, I remember the great honor of being Ellie’s Second. She trusts me- she trusts me to protect her, keep her secrets, keep her safe - hold her while she shakes with fear and terror and all the things she doesn’t let herself feel when there’s work needs doing.

I have to say, there’s a silver piece in this bag of dross- I’m finally of a size to wrap her up in my coils, and hold her tight while the nightmares chew at her.

Hildy and Pleasant and Lindy and Quil got the house squared away, our food stored, our sheets and things put to laundering; Jelly an’ me, we got Ellie in her jimmies and up to her full size, and us too-all of us. I’m in my sarong; Maya in her plushie tracksuit; Hildy in her tank top and lacy short-shorts; Jellybean in her favorite see-through cape thing, like seriously, it’s barely still long enough and it’s missing sections of lace; Quil in his lacy underwear, and how we missed his style for so long when all of his underwear is like that is beyond me; Lindy, in her silk shorts and her cotton haori and that’s it; Pleasant, in her grey onesie that puts her tits up and out and full and fffffuck, I’m still so horny—And, lastly, Ellie, in her tiger-print one piece with the side cuts because she hates having cloth tight to her gills.

We’re all settled on the couch in the Galley, Lindy and Quil and Maya rummaging for snacks in the Milk Fridge; and I, I am wrapped around my best friend. I’m not sure what set her off— I didn’t see anything different about this time, we’ve used ice cubes before to play with… Hildy likes using frozen dildoes, and so far as I know, Ellie’s never had an issue with cold…

Except—

Shit—

Aaaugh—

Wait no, it’s Genny. She’s covered in something clear and glossy, which means it was sticky when it was wet, and on her back rests three massively long trunks of red maple wood; her hair is tangled like a briar patch, and festooned with red twigs and tiny red leaves and pieces of barkwood. Her left eye is blacked, and her entire right side is encrusted with dried mud and tiny stones and river-muck cracked hard and crumbled away where her body has moved too vigorously for it to cling.

Dried blood bisects her face further, so it is only now I can see the pride in her bearing; triumph and joy light her every fiber, and though her hands are crusty with blood, and some nails are falling away, and some teeth are missing, and she shuffles like an old old thing— she was victorious, in whatever venture she set for herself. It’s not even sunset yet- dunno what she’s been doing, but she’s certainly been doing it! Pale as milk she is, and swaying as she stands- and so, bless them, I don’t even have to ask.

Hands grasp me, and lead me gently to the table where I have broken my fast before; the hands place my own in a pool of warm waters, and cleanse my face and stroke my hair to smooth lengths, and press a cup of tea to my lips, which I drink.

I let the three branches I got from Marple rest against the table, and let myself relax into my seat- it’s over, it’s done, I’m home.

I fall on a sandwich and devour it whole. A cup of tea and a small plate of spinach puffs, which bring me from the depths of deprivation back to mere everyday teenage hunger- mmm! Spinach and artichoke dip with bits of—“Excuse me, are these bacon bits?”

“Oh- yes, in the spinach puffs,”

“They’re really good! I like them!”

“Good! Um, Genny…”

“Yeah Mister Sanji?”

“Why are you covered in treesap?”

I let out a deep, deep sigh, and consider how to answer. Two more spinach puffs die for my thinking efforts, before I- huh?

“Sorry, Fern, say again?”

“I need either one entire murderer’s skull, or a number of solid chunks of amber, and I don’t need any questions about why,”

I carefully blink at my sister, before clarifying- “Is this an either, or, situation, or is this a both, both is good, situation?”

“…Both is good,”

“Okay, so, you also can’t ask why,”

“Um…”

I nod, and with a clatter and some of the softest, most passionate swearing I’ve ever heard from the kitchen kids and Mister Sanji at once, I spread out my collection of murderer’s skulls and solid maple-wrought stones of solid amber.

Havij and Trafalgar Law, who were following Fern in to tea, have stopped dead and are asking questions, which I specifically said not to do- but then again, they weren’t in the room at the time.

Fern, for her part, is perusing my fine wears and items with a twitchy witchy eye, before picking out the ones she wants.

I can see the intense curiosity- that intense need to know- bubbling inside of her; and then she nods, cheerfully, and walks off with the skulls and amber she wanted. Trafalgar Law has been whispering ‘what the fuck?’ over and over, and when I turn my bruised face towards him and smirk, his whispering gets louder and more confused before abruptly stopping. He shakes his head, and sits at the table, and starts eating a delicious fruit parfait-

“We have fruit parfaits!?!?”
“Yeah, sis- cheesecake, too, today’s a sweets day- but seriously though, what the hell? You’re usually so much better at not getting the shit kicked out of you,"

“Ah, yeah- and usually I don’t have to fight off a horde of Drownies on Pucca-back, but life has it’s little ways-”

“What?!?!”

“Ah. Well, so, it went like this-”
Tuck Everlasting: You- Giggled All Night Long!

I’m halfway through my parfait before I realize I haven’t actually said anything.

“Right. There are stories with snakes that bite and say ‘you knew me that I am when you picked me from the waters’; and there are stories of abandoned children who walk into the wild places where hissing things writhe amongst the stones and tell them scaled things ‘we be of one blood you and I’; but the Drownies aren’t those stories.

“They were called Lorn Flukes, once; and they were kin to the Amazons, too. There was a reef, it’s said, that guarded that island; and they who lived there were kin to the serpents that live and spawn, and die, in the roiling waves. Their home was destroyed; their kinfolk scattered; and the Drownies swim with the ships, now. In their song is the taste of salt and tears, the hundred colors of the water, the coil of the currents and the snap of the wind. Come home, they sing; come home to us.

“In appearance, they look like people who have drowned. Practically, they’re as human as anyone else; warm to the touch, soft or hard as is their nature- they shiver, they complain, they try to drag you down to their level and make you like them. They aren’t sirens; and they aren’t madmen. When sailors fear the Sea, Drownies draw closer, as moths to the flames; their song is deathly to most, as it urges upon hearing to leap to their side and join their revelry.

“The Fountain around Winnie Foster’s Grave is dark and deep, and I was brought to it’s deepest depths by the effort of a mighty Vampire Toad. At the bottom, there’s a field of waving watergrass, thick and soft and only just covering the mud and sand below.

“And, of course; at the bottom of the Fountain, there’s the local Village of Drownies. They look perpetually startled; foolish, with their pale bulging eyes and purpled lips. They aren’t,”

My sister, Deborah, is sitting across from me, pale and fearful.

“Did you treat with the Fathomking, then?”

“I did; and his palace’s uppermost portion is the underpinning of Winifred Foster’s gravesite. The Hold isn’t visible to the naked eye; not a separate realm, but not wholly seen. Only a tiny portion is there day to day- the rest waits, below, for when it is called to use again.

“The strong Vampire Toad, son of the Toad Sage- his name is Marple. And it was Marple that introduced me to the Pucca.

“Pucca Fathomking is and isn’t a Drownie, just as the river he guards is and isn’t a river. He is a man; he is not a man; he is a horse; he is not a horse. He’s a pucca, which explains everything relevant- ah, right. Beatrix knows what that means- y’all don’t. So. Menacifent, beneficent, capricious and cruel and kindly and comforting; notions respecting the pucca’s true nature are endlessly vague. There were always more than there used to be now, wicked minded black looking bad things that would come in the form of wild colts from the stony hills where everyone would winter their sheep, with chains hanging off their withers and blood on their heaving sides. Tis said that they did much to harm unwary travellers, leading them astray and befouling the berries of the summer.

“Or maybe they were helpful souls, good and true friends to the farmer and the herder. It’s said that once, a farmer’s son noticed the gleaming eyes of a pucca beyond their fence, and called out to him-offered a coat. The pucca appeared then in the guise of a horse, and told the boy to come to the old mill at night. From that day onward, the pucca would come secretly to the old mill, only at night, and perform all the work of milling the sacks of grain into flour. The boy fell asleep the first time; and the second, hid himself and watched them work their powerful magic; and the third, made a gift of a fine silken suit of clothing. This second gift caused the puccas to go off and see a mite of the world; ceasing all their work at the mill. Of course, by then the pucca’s work had made the farmer very wealthy indeed, which allowed the man to send his boy off to get an education. Later still, when that farmer’s boy became a man and married, the pucca left a gift of a cup filled with the waters of life-or so I have heard it said.

“Here’s what is- pucca’s don’t have set shapes, or set personalities. They aren’t Wrong, like Others- and they aren’t Right, like Gods. They just are.

“Pucca Fathomking was a pale man, drowned in his likeness; with thick black hair and the ears of a donkey. His eyes were cut like a goats, golden and luminous in the deep gloom below the Bier, and his face rested in a sneer.

“I am bound to keep the secret conversation held between the Fathomking and myself just that: secret. I will, instead, relate an entirely different story in the hopes of, hm, circumnavigating, what actually happened. I can’t tell you how I got my branches, or where the Sacred Maple- named Big Red- actually is. I can’t tell you why Marple is now the Fathomking, or what happened to the Pucca that came before him; I can’t even tell you their name. Asking me to break the solemn Oaths I gave, why- that’s like licking a tree and hoping for maple syrup, and knowing full well that it’s an oak tree to boot.

“But of the Pucca Fathomking, finally, I will say this: I have seen many horrors. A child beaten to death by their parents. A nest of bloodflies in the eyes of a woman who sold her teeth for drinking money. My sister’s blood-soaked hands in a bowl of salt-water.

“I learned, long ago, not to grow fond of anyone in our part of town. Death is very cheap, and it’s very easy for people to die. Gobdark… the ones who walk that place without fear are all things. Cradle songs of comfort and bones gnawed by teeth.

“The Pucca had lived a long, long time, and the moment I came to treat with him- well, that was the moment he’d been waiting for.

“I see everything; I see forever. Fern’s the one who can look forwards; I’m the one who can look back. Then and there, I saw a man walking a tightrope over a sea of blood and filth and curses foul; his sister dead and the black tide rising. Marple and I- we had hurried as quick as we could, and we still were only just able to save him from the rope he’d made for himself.

“As for Marple- an honest man? No. But his heart is not as black as some. It’s a funny thing, Ambition; it’ll take you to sublime heights or harrowing depths, and sometimes they’re one and the same. The Wheel turned high and dragged a man with it, choking on his own blood; the Wheel fell low, and tore a man down, snapping his neck beneath the treads. And ever and on turned the Wheel and I must still my mouth on these things, now, as my Oath demands of me.

“Deborah- I think, honestly, things would have been different for you, if your friend had survived all those years ago,”
“Lots of things would have been different if Miki had lived, Genny,” “Heh. You know, for having such a bleak outlook on pirates for so long, you- and the rest of us, but you especially, Deb- you’re well on your way to becoming a very fine one. Stole valuable cargo; murdered men in cold blood for the sake of vengeance; sailing with a deadly crew; and you’re completely obsessed with treasure,”

“Now, don’t leave yourself out, Gen-ney- if the scraggly hair, matted from too much sun exposure and greasy with lack of washing wasn’t a big clue, your ability to belt lewd sea shanties while yarding in line by the age of two was an obvious indication that you were born for this as much as I- not to mention your love of gambling-”

“Pfft!”

“Thbbbt!”

And then we’re both laughing like we haven’t since Before. Before Mom; Before Miki; Before.

Genny looks terrible. She’s bruised and bloody and terribly pale under layers of grime. Her entire body is slumped in place; and I’m quite sure it’s only pure exhaustion and the fatalistic rush of Winning that’s keeping her conscious at all, half-closed eyes and lolling head be damned. She looks half dead and everyone but her seems to know it; I have no doubt that by tomorrow at the latest, she’ll certainly feel it.

Genevieve, honestly, looks like Death has picked her up, shaken her like a rag doll, chewed on her with murderous intent, and then decided that it didn’t want to deal with her quite yet. So, Death spat her out onto a cliffside, where she promptly fell, hitting every root and branch of the pain-tree on the way down. Say whose child thou art, who in Fafnir’s blood thy bright blade reddened; and I can question her not, for she swore an Oath not to say!

She’s- better, though, I will say that. There’s a spark in her eyes that’s been gone for a long while, and her face is softer, her mouth tilts easily to smiling- ah! Some portion of her great Sadness has torn free, I think.

Now, if only mine would do the same…

I’m fast and accurate, so long as I can use both my hands. It’s how I used to get through my homework so quickly; I can actually write with both hands at the same time, so long as I’ve got a weight on the paper. Once I was done, I had a whole hour, usually, to just… be. With the trees, I mean.

When Mark taught me to fire with the guns, there was a moment where he started to lecture me on developing specialties, in hands? And I explained to him that I’m just as good with either, and it didn’t make sense to him until I wrote my name with either hand.

Ambidexterity is rare, and highly prized, in Slingers of all kinds. The old ‘I am not left-handed’ thing, you know? I can catch with either hand, and I learned to juggle alongside Sancho and Cece. I don’t really do strength or dexterity with a specific hand- it’s either or.

This has been an issue with learning to use a Pike with Mab. To me, my hands are interchangeable; to pretty much every weapon style except guns, they aren’t.

Mab’s very… I don’t know how to describe it. ‘Unforgettable’ makes me sound like Sanji; annoying has too many connotations to be correct. Something.

Among the weapons of the staff-type: quarter staffs, spits, spears, pikes, and so on- of them all, the pike is the most plain, the most honorable, and the noblest. The weapon that called to me- the Brusher’s Pike- is highly esteemed among the Fae because it is void of deceit.

I can hear Kaladanda, Mab’s spear; and She, because Spears are mostly Female, and Swords are mostly Male, that is a thing - she doesn’t lie. Ever. Queen Anne’s Revenge, my pike- She also doesn’t lie.

Wood-based weapons rank among the oldest weapon form excepting those made of stone; and I’m actually more familiar with bone-and-stone weapons. Spears aren’t super popular under Sea; unless they’re harpoons, and it costs money to upkeep them, on account of there not really being any sort of material that can withstand the hard use that the line of a harpoon requires.

Even so, wood weapons are inexpensive and simple to produce- on par with stone weapons, really. With that said, simple doesn’t define versatility, or lethality. As a child, Mab used deadwood found in the forest and switches of woven grass to trash dangerous animals- and annoying younger siblings and cousins. Sticks can be thrown, thrust, and used as clubs or other force-multipliers.

There’s very few places inhabited by people in this world that don’t have some sort of tree- we called it tree-coral, for gods sake. Handy weapons, if you need something not necessarily deadly; or all you have is a pair of guns and no magic left.

No one actually knows when adding pointy bits to the ends of poles started; or even when genuine martial traditions popped up.

It’s the very end of the Sap Moon, and the beginning of the Egg Moon; Mab says that maple sugar season is over. Every day, before I do training with Mab, she has me warm up by helping her in the garden, or by helping Mark and Sophie in the rest of the Farm areas.

The quail and the doves have started laying again, and Mark’s slaughtered all the kids we aren’t keeping for the Interstate Fair, so the nannies are giving particularly good milk from the spring pastures. Cheese and honey, sprouts and pollen, herbs and dried beans- these things, I’ve become more familiar with. I’ve also had to help with the tsukemono- pickles; and, well. I didn’t know so very many things could be pickled.

So many.

Like, you can pickle butter, if you’ve a need to- most butter meant for long storage is heavily salted, but there is a brined variety. It’s skuan, and actually kind of gross- slimy, in texture… but also really comforting? I don’t know how to explain it.

This is also the time of year that harvesting massive amounts of wild crops happens- fiddlehead ferns, ramps, sorrel, nettles, green garlic, watercress, wild herbs, morel mushrooms… And then there’s all sorts of things I didn’t realize grew on the ship, like asparagus, microgreens- which is actually regular salad greens, right when they sprout; there’s sunchokes, spring onions, radishes, rhubarb, spring peas and pea greens, spinach, lettuces, chard, something called rapini- it’s like broccoli, which I’ve had at a Longarm takeaway before- and, of course, strawberries.

While I work in the garden or on farming, Mab gives me… stories? Lectures? Something mostly involving words- training is different.

So, the spear has been carried into almost every battle of recorded history. It’s used as a primary weapon by all sorts of people, both for throwing and thrusting; there are some styles that use it more as an extra-long sword, even. A spear is long- longer than a sword, longer than a man’s arm, and it’s easy to poke with- that’s the whole point of a spear, no pun meant.

The quarterstaff, like the spear, is cheap to make, versatile, and lethal even in the hands of a child. Have you ever been smacked with a baseball bat? That’s a short staff- and my sisters and my brother and I, well, we all played baseball in the summer. In Gobdark, knives were the sidearm of choice, much moreso than guns- cheap, always available in pawnshops and certain Daiso locations, and really easy to kill with. A short staff, made of nice hickory or ash, is often more than enough to smack a bitch down… although you will get mistaken for a punkfish carrying a bat around on the bus.

The staff is also a symbol of the Law; from ancient times, all the way to now, in schools and courtrooms. Bailiffs carry staffs; so do cops. It’s the perfect weapon to separate toughs with sharp swords or knives who’d gotten rowdy or wouldn’t stop fighting. A person with a staff can beat two people with swords, if skilled enough, as the sword fighters must always enter the danger-zone of the staff in order to attack.

It’s actually illegal for certain people- read: people of merrow descent- to carry bladed weapons over a certain length. Knives are popular in Gobdark because swords are illegal- and expensive. Staffs- or bats, and so on, are still legal. Shakujo are definitely legal- so long as you’re either in school, or a monk at the local monastery.

I- the reason I could even hear the Pike at all… the reason, I think, I could hear Queen Anne’s Revenge, was that I was in the staff-fighting club at school. School had three kinds of clubs- arts clubs, science clubs, and athletics clubs. You had to join one of each kind- so, in an effort to, I don’t know, distance ourselves from each other, because we never liked being mistaken for each other… We each joined a different club.

I was in Gardening Club, Broomstick Club, and Staff-Fighting Club. Gardening ended up disbanding, and I went to Study Hall instead; Broomstick Club is what got me into Alleycat Racing; and for Staff-Fighting Club… People always forget that real flight brooms are between one and a half and two meters long, same as a short staff. And when Mom got sick, the first thing she couldn’t do anymore was fly- so, I took over the family flight broom.

It’s interesting- go as far as Corallia, and learning how to fight with potentially deadly weapons isn’t something for schoolchildren to learn. In Gobdark, there’s nothing more proper and honorable than learning to fight and defend with a simple weapon; in Corallia, fighting with deadly weapons is bad, overly aggressive- something to be stopped so you don’t freak the tourists. Merish domestication is fascinating and excruciating and horrifying all at once.

Apparently, during Staff-Fighting Club I learned standard techniques. According to Mab, the staff and spear are twin weapons, held and used exactly the same way, shield or no; the only real difference is whether or not the ends have a point.

The two weapons are the same shape, often the same or similar length, and can be used to thrust, throw, or strike; and how many hands you have free is how you wield it. Antique fighting styles don’t survive; but the human body has changed very little, and the staff or spear not at all.

This is why, Mab says, there are only superficial differences in world-wide spear-and-staff styles; differences in names, in stylistic flourishes… but the muscle-and-bone mechanics of spear fighting are much the same world-wide.

Truthfully, the biggest difference in styles is really how they’re meant to be used- as a sport, as a game, as a dance, or as a combat style. A staff is much more civilian, while the spear is decidedly military- but even today, there are some who will hunt the wild boar with a spear, blessings on them. Mab explained that a Boar is like one of our pigs, but bigger, with tusks, and angry.

Pole-arms are like spears and staffs, but they’re heavier- slower than spears, but much better at stopping someone cold. Polearms are what I have to watch out for on my broom- Demons and Longarms, in particular, are known for preferring them.

A short staff is between two and three meters; while a long staff is four meters, and my pike is five meters long. Let me say that again- my pike is five meters long. Or- it was, before it broke. Now, it’s closer to four meters, because after cleaning up the maple branches I got from the Old Man, the longest one was just under four meters. The bottom is shod with rings of metal, four in total, each with points of metal around each ring; and there’s a cap of heavy metal at the butt.

Quarterstaff got it’s name like this- you grip it at the quarter-points, and the center; with one hand at the center, palm up, and the other at the lower quarterpoint, palm down. Thus, you’ve got a meter point end, and a very useful butt end. You change grips by releasing one hand, and swinging the staff to catch it appropriately for the next technique or strike.

Actually- it’s funny, but I’ve never had a staff fitted to me before. Er, spear. The way it’s measured was- Mab stood the staff that would become my pike upright, and made me reach up as far as I could along the staff. After this measurement, she added on additional length for me to comfortably hold the staff in the quarterstaff style. On average, that’s eight or nine feet long; but the real measure of a staff or spear for anyone is how you handle it.

In the Club, we all had two meter poles; it’s taking me a bit of a think and chew to get used to the extra meters. Then again, I’m twice the size I was when I learned, and it does feel a hell of a lot better- less like I’m crunching in on myself, you know?

There are three guards: a high guard, where the butt of the pole is held over the head and the point angled to the ground; a low guard, where the butt is held low to the side and the point is angled up; and a near vertical guard where the butt is embedded in the earth and used as a deflective shield, sometimes with another secondary weapon in the other hand. The first guard I got drilled on was this third one- because, Mab explained, being able to use my gun and my staff at the same time would be invaluable. Then she started using her two-at-once thing to attack me from across the ship at the same time as right up in front of me.

The concept of half-staff guards was new; but it’s also pretty simple, so long as I equate them to the bat styles. Other guards are available; and some of them are meant for one thing or another.

My first real lesson from Mab? We are not all created equally, and we cannot- should not, must not fight just the same way. I am not interchangeable with my sisters; and I do not think like any of them, or my brother. Since everyone thinks differently from everyone else, everyone behaves differently in combat.

In Faesh tradition, the hand and leg should agree- meaning, whichever leg is forward, the same hand should be forward on the staff. Furthermore, you should have the same leg and hand combination forward as your enemy, in order to keep the fight on your inside and not towards your back or open side. The inside- my front, between my arms- is easier to defend by moving the forward arm across the body to block, which is more natural and has a greater range of potential motion than movement backwards. Mab also keeps my knees bent, and my weight on my toes, so I can fucking move, godsdammit all.

Like a punch or a good sturdy sweater, guards have a time and a place for best use. Not all of them will be successful in every situation; some require more space, while others are deeply situational. In training, the wrong answer is getting hit; and Mab is always telling me to fight to her openings, not to her steps. It’s not a dance.

Eventually, she taught me a Secret Skill, what her Dollperganger is based on- Sneaky Decoy. It’s somewhere between stealth and subterfuge; a thing that could be me, and being unseen until I strike- these are valuable, in and of themselves. There’s another Secret Skill called Counter Blow, meant for my shield- but I’m not physically strong enough through my entire body to learn it yet.

As for my guns… they’re deadly weapons, meant to kill with; if I don’t mean it dead, I don’t point my gun at it, end of story. If I need to stop someone, I warn them and take aim; and if they haven’t stopped, I shoot to kill. Aim, always, for the center- chest, or gut. Even an unworked mana bullet will kill what it hits; I don’t fire my guns unless I’m under direct supervision of Mark or Usopp.

I’d say, now, that going from complete novice to ‘decent’ beginner with a handgun takes about forty hours and fifteen hundred rounds- that’s what a bullet fired from a gun is called, a round. Up that to Dualies, and you need to add about five more hours and five hundred more rounds. There’s also a lot of dry fire practice, with no bullets at all, and a bit of lecture included- not to mention the homework of spell tables and so on.

I use these numbers because that’s how long it took me, and how many I fired- Mark made me keep a record of everything. I didn’t turn into a crack shot after two weeks, but I did get a good solid foundation and what I guess is a ‘decent’ level of skill. I’m not ready for a real fight- but then, if I’m really fighting, things are already in the shit. I’m not a crack shot by any means- my accuracy is eight out of ten, which no one- not me, not Mark, and not Usopp either- are happy with; but I do have good, solid foundations. All I can do now is make those foundations a part of my body, so I couldn’t do it wrong if I tried.

It’s not a group setting by any means- there aren’t enough dedicated gunners on our crew that I have to wait for my turn at a drill or course. Two hours of my four hour sessions are dedicated to gun safety, maintenance, and chemistry; the rest is shooting. Shooting still targets; shooting moving targets; shooting still targets while moving; shooting moving targets while moving. My accuracy in each of these arenas varies wildly. I’m eight for ten with still targets; ten for ten with moving targets; eight for ten while moving; and ten for ten while everything is in motion. None of us can figure out why my standing still accuracy and my moving accuracy are so different—two whole shots is a lot of difference, it’s twenty percent. I got nothing.

Hmm…

Mab’s birthday is soon—although Fern has said that it isn’t actually her birthday, it’s just when she chooses to celebrate—so, should I get something for her? Or make something, maybe?

I don’t know what to do!

It’s odd— I think the first time I ever learned about knitting as a craft was with Momarav, when she taught me to knit with wire. Knitting with wire isn’t like knitting with wool or even cotton— for one, wire isn’t as fluid as wool. It seems like an obvious assumption to make, but what it really means is that when worked into a woven object, like a cowl or a pelerine, the stitches you make will look pretty much exactly how you’ve formed them—unless you’re working with a specialized material, like moon-silver or sun-gold— or, for that matter, twilight-bismuth (tricky stuff, but very pretty), or the drape of your weave is particularly forgiving. Unless you block your metal fabric, to reshape what you’ve made, what you stitch is what you stitch.

Getting perfect uniformity won’t happen with wire until you’ve gotten used to using wire— or good at knitting, whichever comes first. Practice perfect, and all that tosh.

Now, for actually knitting with wire, you need wire. It comes in many gauges; the larger the number, the thinner the wire. For knitting, stick between twenty-four and thirty— that’s the gauge for fabric and other woven objects. Go bigger, and you need something other than knitting needles; go smaller, and the wire snaps when the fabric is used.

I like twenty-six gauge because it’s easiest to work with for me; but experiment to find what you like.
Mommarav taught me on whatever scrap craft wire she had in her forge; as I got better and better, she invested in wire of silver, then gold— and then I learned to spin moon-silver, sun-gold, and so on threads for myself. I learned on bone needles, and I… hm. I don’t know what happened to them, actually— I’ll ask Mom about it, and in the meantime, I guess I’ll make my own. Hm. I need a tusk or a femur, and some pearls perhaps— or mother of pearl… I also like to have a pair of wire cutters and a pair of jewelry pliers, but that’s just me. I don’t need new ones, I think.

When I work with the esoteric metals, bone is the best because it’s familiar to me; and it carries my magic best. Trying it for yourself, well, try different needles— maybe wood or metal would suit.

Most knit jewelry worked with wire also has beads incorporated into it. Any kind of beads are appropriate, so long as they fit on the wire you use. To knit with beads, string them onto the wire before you cast on.

Protip: don’t stress the wire by twisting it into strange positions; thus, use the wrap cast on rather than the long tail cast on.
You can make basically any stitch that you could with yarn using wire, but I like plain knits and purls. Increases and decreases work the same as well- but, plain-jane yarn-over and knit-two-together work the best. Add beads wherever by pushing a bead up to the end of your working thread and holding it between two stitches. Pull and stretch your work every few rows to block it to the shape you want. For finishing, normal bind-off is fine, or you can clip a tail and weave it in. This is perfect if you need to add a clasp.

Wire is much less forgiving on the hands as compared to literally any other string. Progress is slower, muscles tire, bruises pile up, and repetitive stress issues appear much quicker than usual.

Why, then, am I knitting my husband a cape with a pelerine out of moon-silver and sun-gold? Or planning to, I mean? Politics, and love, really.

Sanji is a Prince; well, a King, really, as I’m a Queen. There will be times when he needs to wear raiment befitting his status- and, as I’m the only sewist on this ship with the knowledge and the skill to make what he needs, I am the one who will. For another thing, I’ve already gotten him a bottle opener ring, and put on little fish; there’s not much else I can really do for his birthday, which is coming up.

Spinning moonlight into moonsilver requires… hm. Clarity. Any gemstone will do, but I prefer sapphires; a large one, and the color doesn’t matter so much as the shape. A ten-dollar per carat is what I use- it’d be for a carver, in Tiffy or Fid.

Set up your spindle; hold the gem in your off hand, put the moons over your shoulder and spin. If you’ve focused the moonlight correctly, you’ll be left with a silvery thread of miraculous properties- not warm, but cool, slippery like silk and slightly sharp.

Sunlight to sungold is much the same- but during the day, not at night. Of course, the main problem is keeping your family from running off with your thread. Or keeping your apprentice out of your light. Or throwing the cats out of your basket of finished skeins of moonsilver and sungold.

Life, man. What can you do?

As for the shawl itself- three full skeins of sungold, and three of moonsilver. My size seven bone needles, and my good stitch counters; a simply enormous amount of mother of pearl beads shaped like fish, and yellow seed beads- cream, Faesh corn, ivory, gold, cognac, caramel, saffron, and amber; and yellow, gold, beads of other sea creatures.

When Sanji saw me knitting his cloak, he smiled- and then… he asked me to spin him skeins of sungold and nightjet, so he could weave something for me in return. Uedoroth has different ideas about what constitutes ‘mans’ or ‘womans’ work- basically, it’s the presence of water or fire. As sewing, spinning, and weaving, for the most part, has neither… well. Sanji learned nalbinding- and he’s gotten very good.

For me, he made a Day and Night cloak; in Day form, it is a structured short cloak of gold in the Demonic style, longer than a capelet or pelerine, with a high collar and vest-like closures in the front, as is proper for a woman, festooned with flowers embroidered with black, and bright yellow bee beads dancing across, honeydrop colored beads dancing here and there; in Night form, it is a diaphanous full length cloak of black studded with stars all the way down, it’s collar restrained in height and bedecked with feathers stitched in gold.

For him, a King’s cloak of sunrise red, or bloodmoon red, depending on the ambient lighting. I beaded a paisley design, all across the back of the collar and his shoulders, wrapping around to the front; but all the rest is very plain on the outside; all the beads and oceanic imagery is on the inner portion of the cloak.

During the weeks of our stay in Maple Harbour- Tuckleigh doesn’t own the harbour, it’s whatever-everyone picked up a hobby they’d put down, or familiarized themselves with hobbies that had changed over their thousand year absence from the wider world. Udoroth actually really likes the new-fangled spinning wheel- says it makes a thread faster, which is true. He also really likes knitting; says it didn’t exist in his day. Zapphire has fallen in with Mack and Bang- they have more arguments and conversations about music and musicians than I knew could be had, and they’ve been going to local concerts all the time we’ve been here. Muhktar, oddly enough, has gotten really into bottle cap collecting- like, weirdly into. I have no idea why.

As for Solitaire… I don’t know what he does with his spare time. He and Bryony are becoming good friends- but he still doesn’t really like being around me. I think I remind him of Granuna too much.

All of the Suntides are doing their own things- Deborah and the Cool Kids are rambling around the city most days, trying local foods and expanding their palates. Ellie and the Mice are… actually, I think they’ve been mostly having sex with their new friend Pleasant, I really haven’t seen much of them at all. Fern is taking a master course in astrology at the school of hard knocks- also known as a tea room frequented by the local longarm population. Genevieve has been recovering from her meeting with the Fathomking, and working on her new broomstick.

Adelaide and Ailbe have been training- Ailbe is strong enough that Adelaide can go nearly all out without causing severe harm, and the both of them are hard at work, every day, mastering Fishman Karate. Adelaide’s variant is meant for fighting Others, I think, while Ailbe’s is best against Devil Fate holders. Beatrix has been learning to knit with wire, and reading all the potion manuals we have, including the ones in the Galley- I think it’s her Concentration.

Cecelia and Horizonte… I haven’t really seen them. Then again, what with Takara…

Ah. Right. Brenda died either in the birth canal or shortly after birth; and Nami isn’t really… she does care for Takara, certainly. But… hn. I have examined that girl a few times, and she’s been floppy, and cold- dehydrated. Zoro won’t leave her all night to cry in her own mess; but Nami… I don’t know if she’s done it a-purpose, she had Silas, Viv, Gwen, Lucy and poor Brenda- five babies? Five babies. She’s dealing with the death of Brenda… but. She has four other babies to care for, and Brenda’s loss to live through, and…

I think I need to talk to Captain Luffy about this. He’s on his special seat- I can see him, I’ve just come from a nap in the Garden, it’s finally nice enough to sleep in the open air again…

The figurehead of the Thousand Sunny is much, hm, broader than Going Merry was- the spines of the sunflower-like mane are broad, and numerous. They come together just right to form little nooks where Captain likes to sit when the day is just right- not usually when we’re in harbor, but… when Genny came back so beat up, he had to have a sit and think on the figurehead for a good long while after dinner.

Genny was so trashed that day, I’m not surprised she doesn’t remember, but Luffy was uncharacteristically silent that mealtime; angry that one of his juniors had been beaten… tortured, really- and beyond that, sworn to silence on who did the beating, and why she submitted to it. Luffy was furious - everyone who understood what had happened, what Genny had allowed to happen- or rather, the surface of what had happened to her, well. They were furious too.

I wasn’t; but then, I remember my own Initiation into the Mysteries. Hm. Can I break my silence, now? Zul does not forbid it; it is only my sisters in Faith who would.

I’ll explain it to him, then. I stopped being scared of my sisters a long time ago.

“Captain- are you still angry about what Genny did the other day?”

“Yeah- mostly, I’m angry that she won’t talk about it,”

“Hm. The Pantheopaly of the Fae is not kind, Captain- the gods and goddesses ask of their followers… I always referred to it as a Trial. It’s something like a Challenge, presented to you by the gods and goddesses; and it’s something like a rite of passage; and it’s something like an initiation; and it’s something like a medicine, to make you well and strong again.

“Acobi, the Faithful- Her Trial comes with no warning, and is fought within. Everyone has what we in the Mystery-biz call a crisis of faith at least once, Luffy- how you deal with it is how you deal with the challenge presented by the Trial. Sometimes it’s ‘do I really have the right to do this thing?’, and sometimes it’s ‘should I follow him still?’ Mark had one of these, while he was away from us during our Separation- it started way back in Water 7. Obviously, he worked through it to our advantage- otherwise, he wouldn’t be here- but… that doesn’t always happen.

“Garmuth, the Driven- His Trial is known by all, though not as what it is. Most people know Garmuth’s Trials as Dreams or Ambitions, Captain- and the size of someone’s Trial is often a direct reflection of who someone really is. Depending on what you want, you yourself define when the Trial is over- or, of course, it might be a thing that can never end, can never be gained.

“Hense, the Sensual- Her Trial does not begin, and once begun, does not end. Pain and Pleasure are complicated things, Captain. Lust and Vitriol; kisses and punches- what you like, and what you don’t like… so long as you can be said to exist, your sensuality exists as well. It started before you were born; and it doesn’t actually end. You can remove yourself from the Trial- Zoro’s working on that- but it doesn’t actually end.

“Lemaign, the Builder- His Trial does not end, and once ended, begins again. A legacy is when you plant a tree whose shade you, personally, will never enjoy. How many legacies you leave behind is a personal choice- and also a reflection of what you do with your life. Bryony, for example, has the legacy of a pirate; but also the legacy of a singer, a songwriter, a dancer, a warrior, a holy woman… who you become, in the eyes of history… The hardest part about His Trial is that you will never know what will become of your legacy, not really. Not even Udoroth really knows- even here and now, because his legacy isn’t… it’s not done, it’s not over.

“Micia, the Desirer- all who live and die face Her Trial, in the end. It’s said in some places that the Otherside, where people go when they die, is so wonderful- well… some people do such terrible things, lie to themselves so completely, the Mother can’t take them back into her bosom. They are returned again, bade live- again- so that they may become better than they were, or at the very least, learn something of what they were meant to.

“Olak, the Lucky- His Trial is for all who would begin again. The Otherside is so wonderful and beautiful and fun, there are lots of souls who are content to stay there forever more. Some, however, become so enamored with life, and living, that they do everything in their power to return to this world. Luck is what says what you’re reborn as- a bird, a beast, a fish, a tree or flower, a bug- or a human, and if so, what kind and in what circumstances.

“Jevel, the Cursed; Jevel, the Blessed- His Trial must happen twice, for a blessing is also a curse. Sometimes, your health and long life are a blessing; sometimes, they are a curse. Sometimes, your illness and short life is a blessing; sometimes, they are a curse. You must experience both sides of both states to fulfill the Double Trial of Jevel.

“Pyth, the Powerful- His Trial is one of the body. Tellicherry told me about this one, actually- it’s a combination of scholarship, martial arts, and spiritualism that does it. Not everyone can actually do Pyth’s trial, it’s so damn hard.

“Roathus, the Knowing- His Trial is one of the mind. This is what Genny went through the other day.

“Yudrig, the Being- His Trial is of the spirit. This is what Genny has been going through her entire life. On Yudrig’s mighty back rides the small Goddess of Magic, Hekate- the Three-Who-Are-One. She says this: ‘Some people must live lives that are cursed- in bodies that are marked with curses- with minds that are ruined with curses- with weakened spirits and worn out ambitions.’ There is no magic that can free Genevieve from her Depression; nor medicine, nor treatment, nor religion. There is no magic that can free me from my Amnesia; no medicine, no treatment, no religion. We can only manage our afflictions, Luffy- bear up under the endless weight of our curses; and keep trying.

“Zul, the Wise- Her Trial is one of silence, and blood, and songs- always the songs. I undertook the Trial of Zul, Captain- but before I tell you about it, I’ll tell you the last one.

“Caelya, the Inspirer- Her Trial is of the breath. More than that, I cannot say,”

“Neh- how come you can talk about yours, but Genny can’t talk about hers!?”

“How come you could talk about Ace, but not Sabo?”

“...”

“The answer to your question is as simple as ‘we pray to different gods’; the answer to mine is ‘they’re different brothers’. The truth of course, is that nothing is so simple as that. Zul... for Zul, all things and all places are sacred. Ugly- horrible- cruel- evil- Zul doesn’t make distinctions like that. For her, the question isn’t one of worth- to Zul, all are worthy. In some ways, She’s the easiest of the gods to follow. Prayers to Zul aren’t spoken aloud; they’re done. Every time I sew, every time I mend, every time I clean or fight or love- or hate, refuse to fight, make a mess, break, cut... all things done by a follower of Zul are in Her name. Sometimes, I can dedicate part of what I do to another god or goddess- but even now, this conversation with you, my choice to nap outside in the sunlight... my choice to kill my brother... Captain, Zul is in all things. To Pray to Her; to Praise Her- I must choose, and do, and I can’t take anything back. Not ever. Zul isn’t the Goddess that Genny chose to follow, though; she wouldn’t have said anything at all about what she did, if She was,”

“Mm. Who is?”

“Roathus, the Knowing. Roathus Himself doesn’t demand silence from His followers- and his followers don’t demand it of each other. The things you learn, in pursuit of Roathus’ Trial, are often so horrible- so spectacular- that words... fail. From what I know, it’s not that Genny wouldn’t tell us what happened to her, or swore she wouldn’t- from what I know, she shares every adventure she has. From how she does, and doesn’t talk about it- I’d say, Genny can’t talk about what happened. She doesn’t have the words for what happened. Zul keeps silent because that’s who She is; Roathus keeps silent because what He knows is too much for words to express."

“Mm. So… when she’s grown into herself some more, she might be able to talk about it?”

“Maybe; and maybe she never talks about it, ever,”

“I still don’t like it- but… I guess I understand. Is that all you wanted to talk about?”

“…No, Captain. I’m really worried about Nami; she hasn’t bonded with Takara, and she’s still grieving Brenda, and while it’s admirable that she took Takara in…”

“She still has Silas, Vivian, Guinevere, and Lucille to look after. Hnn. Can… can Nami even make enough milk for all five of them?”

“She thinks she can; but subconsciously, she knows she can’t. That’s why she’s been neglectful of Takara,” “Neglectful?”

“Nothing a new parent wouldn’t do anyway- but… not more than once, either. I’m concerned,”

“…Hmm. Where’s Nurse May?”

“Um- there she is right now, with BBC. Why?”

“We obviously need more wet nurses and child-carers; if, for no other reason, than because we have six babies on the ship, with more probably incoming. Nurse Mendy May would know how to get more people like her- she’s really strong, right?”

“Oh- yeah,"

“So- we need another strong wet nurse, and someone extremely strong who can look after the Babies when everyone else is busy,”

“Mm. That’s what I was thinking, Captain; um. But maybe don’t get nurses and child-carers without talking to Nami, first. They’re her kids, after all,”

“Mm. Come on; you’re good at calming Nami down,”

“I- oh, okay, sure;”

I follow Captain down onto the cool grassy deck, and over to where Mendy May is playing with BBC. Captain settles down next to Mendy May, and starts having a conversation; I take it upon myself to play with BBC. She’s gotten so big; she’s already wobbling around on her own two feet, and her screeching and giggles at all hours are slowly, slowly becoming more like words. Mendy May and Captain- wait, when did Zoro and… all his kids, including Takara… welp.

I look at Mendy May, who looks at Captain, who looks at us, and Zoro- before nodding once. I split myself and take BBC over to Zoro, and start cycling the legs of poor little Takara, who’s gassy and letting everyone know it; and I take myself along with Captain and Mendy May.

We find Nami flat on her stomach in her and Zoro’s bed, face pressed into a pillow, fingers tangled thick in her hair and wheezing. Captain sits himself down next to her, lets his legs stretch out next to her torso as his back flattens against their headboard. I sit down on her other side, lay a hand on her shoulder; Mendy May lays across the end of the bed, and waits. Eventually, Nami flips herself over, and struggles up to be sandwiched between Luffy’s shoulder and mine. I carefully weave my fingers into hers; Luffy does the same on her other side. Mendy May has rolled onto her legs, kneeling and then sitting at the end of the bed, quietly waiting.

Nami takes a few shuddery breaths before barely moving herself to speak.

“I’m not okay, and I need help. I can’t… I can’t feed all of them and… I know it’s wrong, I know it is, but- I can’t stop myself from leaving Takara out, and I don’t… I don’t know why,”

“It’s because your body knows it can’t support five babies at once without destroying itself; your absolute maximum is four, and you’re straining yourself at three. It’s too much, Nami,”

“Mab- I’m supposed to be able to, to care for my babies, I’m supposed to be a good- I’m supposed to be their mom, and I can’t -”

“Nami, it’s okay. It’s okay. We didn’t ask Mince to raise BBC at all; what makes you think you need to raise your five- or four- alone?”

“-Or four?”

“Mm. Mendy May-?”

“Right. So… I was hired to care for BBC by a casino’s General Manager. I, personally, can provide enough milk for one baby. Some women can’t make milk; or have severe trauma connected to their breasts; or can’t make enough milk. There are also people who don’t know how to care for their children; or don’t have the time. My entire job exists because of these things; I exist as I am because, all over the world, right now, there are people with enough money or influence going through exactly what you are. Even if you were a hundred-percent perfect mother- what do you know about teaching young children? Training them in basic martial arts? What if they have no skill or passion for swords, or the weather? This conversation would have happened, no matter what- that it’s happening now is because we care about you!”

“You’re my Navigator, Nami- how you’re supposed to be concentrated on your job when you’re all worried about your kids, if you even love one of them the way you love your other ones… neh, didn’t you have a talk about this with Zoro, Mab?”

“Oh, yeah- Nami, if it weren’t for inbuilt reactions to the way babies are, humans wouldn’t have survived at all. Human babies are annoying, and super helpless, and extremely needy, all the time. The most important thing to remember, as a new parent, are these two things: you will need to ask for help, and you will need to take breaks. In this case, you’re not exactly asking for help, but who does when a barn needs raising- and in the other… sending Zoro off with all the babies so you can feel safe enough to cry is a very good example of taking a break. You made sure the babies would be safe; and then you had your moment, away from them. You’re a human being; it’s okay,”

“…really?”

“Really,”

“…so, what’s the, um. The plan?”
“Well- my first thought was getting at least one more wet nurse?”

“Actually… we need at least two or three. I’d go with three, myself; there are three people I can think of, right now, who would be willing to sail on with this crew. I can give them a call- one of them’s in Dressrosa, which is where we’re going anyway- the other two are actually on this island, if you want…?”

“Yeah; call your friends, Mendy May. What’re their names?”

“Bronwen Flare, and Justice Peace Logan- we just call her Logan,”

“And the other one, in Dressrosa?”

“Millefeui. She’s a Mink, if that matters-”

“It doesn’t- Mink milk’s no different from anyone else’s, right Mab?”

“No, not really. It’s how much long fur they have compared to everyone else, really-”

“Now’s not the best time for a tangent, Mab; I’d like to know later, though,”

“Okay Nami,”

“Right. Mendy- call your friends here, have them meet up with me at that Tea Room Fern likes; I’ll see if they’re right. Mab; see if you can find some teachers or, uh, babysitters? Which would be better?”

“Teachers- or rather… yeah, teachers. Hm. Both, actually. I have friends in the Maple Tower right now; and I’ve been looking for an excuse to go, anyway. I’ll take care of it, Captain,”

Every country in the world has a population of magic users- mages, wizards, witches, and magicians. Thus, every country has their own Tower. They aren’t quite schools, although they do teach students there; think of them more like… hm. Social clubs, I guess. Like every well established social club, every Tower has a dress-code and conduct code. Thus, I need to change my clothes, and actually style my hair.

To start with, my hair- an upside-down french braid, and coil the ends up into a bun. Pin it then with bobby pins, and move forwards. Yellow thigh high socks and shiny black shoes; a functional garter belt, and a bralette, which I don’t usually wear. My dress is a two-piece affair; a mini-dress of black beneath a sheer dress of middle length, dotted with lily-flowers. Over the dress, the cape that Sanji made for me; on my head, the only pointy hat I’ve ever owned, as well as two white hat pins to keep it firmly attached to my head.

Today’s bag is the Purse of Misfortunes, with my normal purse accoutrement, plus a small wand, and a lace fan for fine work. Oh yes- and I renewed my subscription to Quibble and Quirk, because I’ve got a reputation and standards at once; thus, I’m taking along my new issue of the most recent monthly publication of QQ, for a bit of light reading, alongside Numerology and Grammatica, one of the very few mathemagical texts I’ve only heard of, never read.

Fern meets me in the hallway. She’s wearing a blue dress covered in stars, knee high yellow socks, yellow running shoes, a necklace of eyes, a headband of frogs with her long hair unbound but for the knot at its end, a pair of mail-order spectrespecs that have had their lenses replaced with her own custom requirements, bright yellow lipstick, and a yellow pineapple crossbody bag. I pause a moment to look her up and down; during this moment, she also pauses, allowing me to see her bag of spell components, her miniature staff— which has definitely been refurbished somehow—as well as Housekeepery and Kitchencraft, and both volumes of Sybil’s Syllabary, and even her paperback copy of Ephemeris.

“You’re going to the Tea Room like that, Fern?”

“No— I’m going to the Maple Tower today— for some forsaken reason, it’s not like fortunetellers really get along with magic-users normally… although, if I get my Enchanter’s License, I can start selling them publicly instead of, um, not selling them.”

“Mmhm. No Havij?”

“She’s already got her license; and she’s covering for me at the Tea Room, said she’d take a crack at the maths once she found her own copy of the Ephemeris and read it through,”

“Hm. Beatrix and Genny?”

“Well— here they come now, actually,”

Lo and behold, she’s exactly right.

Beatrix comes swaggering in, wearing a pair of rolled up blue jean overalls and an indigo bodysuit with a pair of white leather shoes and plain white ankle socks. Her hair is loose and messy, and it’s obvious to me that she’s been struggling for hours with it. Her lipstick is indigo, and her Rending Shears are in a sheath on her belt.

Genny, of course, is in her revised flight suit, jacket dress fully closed and soft green, boots black and laced high and tight. No lipstick; but her goggles are green lensed, and cover her ears fully. On her back, rests her broom; on each hip sits a Duelling Pistol.

As the girls and I continue through the ship, we pick up more magic users— Gally, the Illusionist, bedecked with her powerful jewels under thick robes of broadcloth; Precious, the Growing Flame, his tea kettle full of mystical plants hanging off the broom over his shoulder; Bang, the Band Geek, his hair just a little bit fluffier and his backpack positively coated with pins and patches from the bands and musicians he’s seen in person; Mono, the Potioneer, his eyepatch extra clean and nice, and very few bandaids at all— right until he scrapes himself on… on nothing? And now he’s bleeding, um, how— nevermind; Zelda, the Honey Bear, a massive jar of honey tied over her shoulder, and a honey-wand with tiny topazes inset around it’s base; and finally, Bura Kada Bura, pockets full of crystals and a song on her pursed, whistling lips. When the group of us swagger into the Galley, Sanji, my beloved husband (and a Master Potioneer in his own right (cooking at his level is intense)) lurches off from where he was leaning against the wall and calmly falls into step with me, the stink of smoke swirling from his only cigarette today.

Apparently, I’m leading an expedition.

Which Tower is suitable for you depends on a few things— politics, money, what the Tower itself is best at teaching… for example, the Coral Tower in Ryugu Mergyo is known for producing warlocks and alchemists, not enchanters, and definitely not thaumaturgists- the first, warlocks, is due to simple excellence of teaching programs and internal support. Alchemists are produced at the Coral Tower due to money- specifically, the Royal Permit system, and the Royals of Ryugu Mergyo always wanting alchemists for various purposes. Enchanters and Thaumaturgists have to do with money- it costs a lot of money to build a safe Workshop or Menagerie for student Enchanters and Thaumaturgists to learn in- nevermind the greenhouses, gemstones, precious metals, and so on, for all their secondary skills and classes.

There are Nine types of Tower.

Black, for Transmutation (also called Transmorgification), changing energy and matter into different forms; Red, for Necromancy- but they usually get conflated with medical schools; Blue, for Illusion- Gally’s robes are actually blue, even if her crystal armor isn’t; White, for Abjuration; Orange, for Conjuration and Summoning- mathemagically, they’re the same thing; Purple, for Divination, which technically Fern’s overqualified for; Gold, for Enchantment- which is tricky to define. Sometimes, it means entrancing and beguiling people or creatures, which is helpful for thaumaturgists and bankers alike; sometimes, it means creating various magical objects which can have any effect the maker decides to include, or is paid to include. It’s tricky. It also, handily, explains why Fern wants a License for Enchantment- due to the Astrology Consortium, no Seer needs a License of any kind to practice. Most ‘Seers’ are actually Astrologers with an Ephemeris and an abacus- a competent Trig-student can get the job done, and the book, depending on it’s quality, provides full explanations on which formulae to use, and how.

Fern’s actual passion is for Enchanting, not Divination- she’s very, very good at designing and creating sturdy, cheap, and effective magical items.

Finally, there’s Green, for Evocation- harnessing the power of the elements. Nami, being a Weather Mage, uses Evocation. I think Genny does too, actually.

When you’re a student at a Tower, it’s basically like going to a private school. There’s a strict dress code to be followed; not for the sake of student unity, per say, but for the sake of student safety. For example, my uniform was designed to withstand the mercurial weather conditions of- well, I can’t tell you exactly where the Tower of the Fair is. Or what it looks like.

As for what my student uniform actually was, when I still studied in the Tower of the Fair (three times a week, four hours per- mathemagic is a generalist’s position, but I’m best at Necromancy, actually), well. Footwear for me was a pair of sturdy, well fitted boots, made of fine leather; the spells were actually in a pair of four-strand boot chains that I and my Mommarav bedecked with various charms and such. Because the charms were on a removable chain, and were removable themselves, my boots never wore out in seven years of schooling- I still have those boots, and the boot chains, too. The Tower of the Fair did require hats during the Sleet and Snow seasons; for student safety, if nothing else. I had so many; and some of them I don’t even remember buying or making, they just… appeared. I’m wearing the nicest one I still have right now.

Belts were two things- firstly, a regular belt to hold up your pants; and then the buckle, to show your affiliation with various groups and Tower-clubs. Usually, a belt would also have some sort of enchantment on it, to protect the wearer in case of danger or failed experiment; and some way to carry a wand or holster, and probably a pouch for spell components. I just carried a satchel, because I had too much shit and was way too busy for that- just. No. At most, my belt had a resistance charm and a Midwifery buckle when I got through that class in second year.
Wands and staves are tricky- I used a lace fan and an umbrella because of my rank, and because they were more effective than anything else I could have used. The only thing more effective would be my spear, and actual weapons aren’t usually allowed in the Tower unless you’re a warlock or a battle mage, and mathemagicians are neither - research and development is where I learned to excel.

There’s usually a selection of four to six magical items that gets recommended to students on their supply lists- but their effects can often be duplicated with much cheaper or more durable items, magic only sometimes required. The Tower of the Fair required six; they were duplicated or substituted by me as follows.

Goggles of minute seeing, for viewing extremely small things that aren’t actually microscopic, can be duplicated with a good quality inspection lens, loupe, or even a crystal if it’s cut correctly. The Tower of the Fair had portal lockers assigned to each student over the summer; you used a key to access your locker, and inside was all the things you put inside. It’s what I based my own Bag of Tricks on. Thus, I had no need of a Haversack of Holding.

I used a Moon Belt, a slow-fall vest with a hood, and a grappling hook with reel and line in my first year, while my wing healed from it’s break. Phoenix cloaks aren’t actually expensive, merely delicate. The reason I didn’t use one is twofold- the first being, flight magic around injured wings is bad- fouls the nerves. The second? Status. At the time, I was a Princess, and not favored in the Winter Court- thus, any phoenix cloak would be suspect, especially because I couldn’t just buy one without sending the wrong sort of message. A Moon Belt and grapple, on the other hand, when paired with a slow-fall vest, can be much more effective- especially if you need to keep your back protected, or just like exploring. Towers tend to be very vertical.

A Ring of Brightstar is useful… if you aren’t also going to a military academy that specializes in, hm, quiet time. So. The Eye, Ear, and Nose set is what I used; ears and nose was a curious collection of asymmetrical earrings and nose rings connected by a chain, and they enhanced my scenting and hearing abilities… a little. Mostly, it was my glasses that did the work of giving me good darkvision. Well, that and years of practice.

A Crystal Terrarium can be subbed for just about any assortment of household herbs in the kitchen garden- except for mint and rosemary, and basil. Mint and Rosemary will take over your plantings; while Basil prefers a dedicated pot. You’ll need either a box of sea-salt or a selection of unworked quartz crystals to make up for that ‘just about any’ qualifier I threw down earlier- but otherwise, yeah, just use regular kitchen herbs.

Finally, a familiar. Most Towers don’t require familiars- the Tower of the Fair does for the simple reason of tradition. I got special dispensation for my familiar, because it was actually a hive of bees; the whole hive was eventually counted as one singular organism because I raised such a stink about it. By my third year, new students were bringing ant colonies and swarms of butterflies- and by graduation, an entire branch of the familiars’ appreciation club had formed, dedicated to, you guessed it, entomology. Bugs are, and always will be, cool as shit.

The Tower of the Fair is one of four All-Color Towers- it’s why I was able to learn Mathemagic at all. Being able to take the basic classes of every style of magic is what allows a mage to learn the basics of Mathemagic- being able to compare, contrast, and analyze everything is the bread and butter of the mathemagician’s world.

The friends I have here aren’t, technically speaking, students of the Maple Tower; they aren’t teachers or professors either. Tethry, Marsha, and Haron were groupmates for my doctorate projects-the ones that lived, I mean. Magic is dangerous, and hard; death is almost certain, in every color.

Tethry’s focus was wards- shields, rules, filters, locks, keys, even certain enchanted weapons. So long as they could block certain things out or keep other things in, he wanted to know about it. There’s a lot of mathematic magic in wards- defining what your ward does, what it allows, what it doesn’t… A lot of the research for warding involves finding the correct frequency for whatever you’re trying to… the phrase is ‘bind’, you find the frequency, and you write in a rule that binds what you want the way you want it. Difficult, dangerous, finicky stuff.

Marsha was focused on leylines- a wooly subject at any time. There’s not a lot of hard evidence supporting or denying they exist; just mountains of hearsay. Most of what Marsha did for her study was collating the various accounts in conjunction with historically accurate maps of the areas where the accounts were set or came from, combined with maps of those areas in the current day- all in an attempt to find or quantify what the hell those people were talking about. Sometimes, it was ergot; or mushrooms; or a particularly sheddy flock of poisonfeather birds. And sometimes, it wasn’t. Almost all of her research was done in the library- except when the library didn’t have the resources she needed. Then she went out to get her information.

And finally- Haron. Haron was interested in souls- specifically, their interaction with music. It’s his work that formed the basis of modern Resonance theory. I paid the least attention to his research because it had almost nothing to do with mine.

I was interested in two things- astrology, and metamaterials. They do go together, in an odd way… Learning what all the old mage traps are made of, you learn how to make them and how to break them.

There’s a lot of things I know for absolutely no good reason. For example, the worst prison in the World is not Impel Down; Impel Down is just the most famous. The very very worst prison, in all the World, is the French-Germa prison, La Bastille. People who go into that place as prisoners… their memories are taken from them by force, and they forget they were ever anything other than prisoners.

I figured out how to escape from La Bastille when I was fourteen years old.

I also figured out that the most lucrative property to steal would be maple syrup, seeing as there’s a very good market for it and almost no way of verifying where it’s from once you’ve got it out of Tuckleigh jurisdiction.

Why am I thinking about all of this? Pretty simple- I wasn’t very nice when I was a teenager, and I’m super ashamed of that. I was… awful. I’m still pretty fucking awful, but I like to think I’ve gone from being a solid ninety percent terrible person to like, an eighty-seven percent terrible person. That’s a little bit better than I was before, right?

Anyway.

We’re here.
Germa focuses on the wrong borders, and the wrong countries. It’s not their seaward borders that matter most; and it’s not the various support states within, either. It’s Tuckleigh, with it’s Mounties, and comedy writers who move among us but we know them not, betrayed only by their occasional mispronunciation of ‘about’; that threatens us all.

I don’t think Tuckleigh was founded on the free flow of syrup- but it probably should have been. I can tell you, now that we have so many kids on our crew, the price of syrup is stable and high; it’s more expensive than oil. Was it Sandora sheikhs who did this, or Muscovy oligarchs? No. It’s Tuckers, who, organized into an ironfisted cartel of syrupy madness, established a stranglehold on the sweet elixir.

The Federation of Tuckleigh Maple Syrup Producers- FTAP- is OPEC. Formed in 1566, the federation tasked themselves with taking a business in which few could make a decent living- the price went north to south with the quality of the yield, which went north to south with the quality of the spring- and turning it into a respectable trade. This was accomplished in the classic way: quotas, and rules.

Control the supply, and you control the price; limit supply, raise the price. And humans always have a demand for delicious sweets.

Tuckleigh makes seventy-eight percent of the world’s maple syrup. They always have; and so, they’ve always been able to set the price. So far as I know, the commodity is valued at nearly ₣150000 a barrel, twenty-five times more expensive than crude oil; fifty more than ambergris.

How do I know this for sure, well. Deborah, my sous chef, returned to me from her jaunt off to the market in a bit of a tizzy- ‘genuine maple’ is a distinct legal definition, and a bottle of syrupy goodness with that legally defining label on it costs… ₣1500!

This shocked everyone- Chopper, who loves maple syrup; Nami, who funds this expensive habit; and Deborah, who’s never actually had genuine maple syrup before.

Now, to be fair, it tastes absolutely nothing like Aunt Jenny’s Sirup of Maple; and it doesn’t taste like Mab’s homemade Cherry Sirup or Birch Sirup either. Maple syrup has a distinctive spark to it, a crunchy note not unlike the smell of fallen leaves in the autumn, when you hold them up and crumble them in your hands, or woodsmoke some three hills distant from your place on the porch some autumnal evening, when the cold snap threatens to hit and frost will soon trace spiraling fern fronds across the glass panes. In texture, it is akin to a simple sirup one would use in any number of mixed beverages; in color, it can range from pale amber to molasses-dark.

Aunt Jenny’s Sirup of Maple comes in a number of sizes; a family-sized gallon jug runs about ₣400. This is because it’s not real syrup- it’s not even really sirup, it’s… effluvium. A disgusting brown goo, with a flavor of overbearing sweetness and a touch of liquid smoke.

When Deborah asked me why a bottle of genuine maple syrup cost so much, I told her the truth; Tuckleigh maple syrup is an international legally registered commodity; ‘real’, in a legal sense. In a world covered in genuine snake oil and sailing straight to hell, there’s nothing more honest than good old tree sap.
Tuckers will tell you that the frog trappers got it from the native Maple People, who got it from their ancestors, who got it from the gods. It’s the life, death, and rebirth of the forest turned into wine. I know that because of FTAP, which turned Tuckleigh into a brand. But, there are side effects to all this- the federation, with it’s quotas and iron control, has reaped it’s own sticky harvests.

I’m referring, of course, to the high prices- and the inevitable black market that springs up around such things. By making syrup production seem like good business instead of an eccentric survivalist hobby, production has increased- much of it in Skua. With oil, it’s deep deposits reached only by fracking; with syrup, it’s forests in Ultima Thule, which Tuckers tell you with a shudder, has three times as many maple trees as all of Maple Island’s archipelago. Tuckleigh- the province encompassing the main island- produces seventy two of the seventy eight percent of the world supply- but if Skua ever makes the push to self-sufficiency, these pancake loving assholes are cooked.

The most troubling of unintended consequences is the black market, a subterranean world of contraband sap where wildcatters move unmarked barrels through deep woods; the seedy-sweet history behind your stack of crêpes. The pirates of the syrup nation are attracted by the peak prices; they skulk through warehouses, waiting for the watchman to doze off over his Gambler’s Digest , as the getaway cart idles.

Aunt Jenny is a fake. There was never an Aunt Jenny. The original character was borrowed from a minstrel show that was touring South Blue at the end of the ninth century. The original Jenny was a land-man in scale face, possibly a Germa; this is why the current day Aunt Jenny is a caricature of the mermaid brushing her hair on the shore, her shawl of lace fallen low about her hips and her breasts uncovered- the stereotyped mermaid, though no real merrow I’ve ever met has ever fit that misbegotten mould, nor any other woman for that matter. Women wear tops to swim, because if they don’t their breasts flail around and get in the way. Fat floats; that’s how it is. And just about the worst thing you can do to your hair is brush it right after getting out of salty water- at the very least, you want to rinse it with fresh, and then put on a layer of oil before you get to business with a comb.

The character of Aunt Jenny was re-purposed about six centuries later by a Southie mill owner who sold pancake mix with an Aunt Jenny who, though smiling beneath her umbrella, looks nothing like the Aunt Jenny of my memories… Oncle Vaughn’s wife is named Jennifer, that’s right. And more importantly, the Aunt Jenny on the Sirup Bottle’s label has never hauled a net or line in her entire gods-be-damned life. I sincerely doubt she can even swim, which is a terrible thing to say about a merrow.

The Aunt Jenny of today is a composite, a dream of merrow subjugation and domesticity, the bosom of warmth on a Sunday in Paris, where mermaids fair beautify themselves on the banks of the Seine. Why does this idea persist? Probably because it’s a lovely lie no one has yet been able to tear the throat out of. Also, merrow women really are stunningly beautiful to the Germa sensibilities- pale, glittery, extremely strong, tails, cool to the touch… these things are what Courtly Love was made of.

All of this is what I’m thinking about as we walk through the city of Tuckleigh, en route to perhaps the holiest place in syrup. Skua has it’s Strategic Saffron Reserve; in case of embargo, disaster, higher birth and survival rates. Tuckleigh has the Strategic Maple Syrup Reserve; in case of crêpes, Aunt Jenny... tourists.

Aunt Jenny stands for everything Tuckers distrust about this World and the syrup much of it consumes. It’s one of the things FTAP was organized to battle; phony maple syrup and it’s delicious lies, fake backstories cooked up for Aunt Jenny and her gal pal, Mrs. Buttersworth.

Caroline Cyr, head mage of the Maple Tower, and a spokesperson for the federation- with a name like that, what else could she be?- is known for being especially irritated by varieties of what is essentially high-fructose sirup of cane sugar, products that often decorate their labels with maple leaves and log cabins, implying a connection to the forest that simply doesn’t exist.

FTAP fights with advertising and fancy recipes and funding towards the Maple Tower; Crustless Vegetable Quiche with Maple Syrup, Crépes with Kale and Maple Syrup, Maple-Almond Truffles, Genuine Maple Syrup, the Maple Tower Spell Review, being one of the hosting places for the semi annual World’s Worst Bakers Competition- but mostly, they fight by controlling the quality and quantity of the product.

Hence the Reserve; and the Tower.

Here’s how it works: there are thirteen thousand five hundred maple-syrup producers in Tuckleigh. Each is permitted to send a fixed amount to FTAP for sale that year, a quota that was established six years ago, even as Skuan production exploded- up twenty-seven percent from their previous zero. Members of the federation- which bulk producers in the Maple archipelago are required to join- give their harvest over to FTAP, which inspect, tastes, and grades the syrup. Some of it is sold immediately, usually from first time producers; the rest is stored in the Reserve. Producers are paid twice- once when their syrup goes into the Reserve, at a flat rate, and again when the syrup is sold, which is recalculated year to year and can itself take years. FTAP keeps B5400 for each barrel, a kind of tax that pays for the advertising, the testing of the recipes, the upkeep of the Reserve, the Maple Tower grant, and so on. In this way, the federation steadies supply, filling the coffers in banner years and satisfying demand in fallow; the price of syrup is always stabilized, benefitting even their Skuan competitors.

Laurierville is a town at the very heart of Tuckleigh Province, maybe a five minute walk from the coast. Towering steeples, frost coated roads, tree covered hills and teenagers in touks eating croissants at Bonchon’s Chicken. It’s reached via a spotless skyway- basically a bridge between two buildings, with a roof and windows- where no one’s pissed on the walls and there’s no graffiti and absolutely no sweartoads to speak of. Bizarre, but not bad, per say.

It’s just the polite blue-grey of concrete in the skyway to Laurierville, a state of existence that is indelibly connected to how most syrup producers have been content to abandon the free market for the safety of the syrup cartel. It’s a better life, with less ugliness and disease and foul sweartoad curses, but also a life devoid of color, excitement- windfall and spree and wildness.

A banner on the first bulletin board inside the Maple Tower proclaimed, in bright red letters on stark white ground, ‘ NEARLY 2,044,122 LITERS OF SYRUP WAS STOLEN; 12.5 PERCENT OF THE RESERVE; WITH A STREET VALUE OF B1,340,000,000. IF YOU HAVE ANY INFORMATION ABOUT THIS THEFT, PLEASE COME FORWARD AS SOON AS POSSIBLE. ’

Mab and the Mages left myself and my cooks at the door; I took my youngsters along with me to meet Caroline Cyr, and go on a tour of the Reserve. As I said, it’s the holy of holies; where oceans of syrup, the accumulated wealth of the maple forest, hibernates- sometimes for years. I had a clear mental picture of the Reserve: huge vats, surface crusted and covered with flies; tanks reached by tottering ziggurats; visitors in perpetual danger of falling in and doing the slowest, stickiest, sweetest dead man’s float of all time.
In truth, the Reserve, which holds somewhere around 2839058800 liters on a typical day, is a warehouse filled with barrels—white drums stacked from floor to ceiling, nearly two-hundred feet high. There was a Charles Sheeler-like quality to the interior of the Reserve, an industrial awe; the barrels in their near-endless rows, the implied weight of them, the pipes and ladders gleaming under harsh blue-white light; persnickety and precise in a way that’s especially Germa. It’s almost like the life anyone could know…but not quite. So close; yet so different.

The Reserve is a treasure trove, with inventory, at any time, worth perhaps B2063360500. The syrup is tested when it comes in; then sent through a William Wonka-style conveyor system, where it’s pasteurized and sealed in a barrel, labeled, lifted, and stacked. Each barrel’s label has its grade (Extra Light, Light, Medium, Amber, and Dark), along with percentage clearly visible.

When maple sap exits the tree, it’s two to four percent sugar. As it’s boiled, the sugar concentrates. To be syrup, it must be sixty-six percent sugar. Below that, it’s not a shelf stable product. Above that, it begins to crystalize—first as butter, then as harder and harder forms of candy.

There were two or three workers doing maintenance on one of the cranes, all in clean white jumpsuits and hairnets and face masks.

“We’re finished for the season;” Cyr told me, “we still haven’t really recovered from the theft, that’s why this place is so empty.”

Being in syrup is like being a tax accountant; three or four weeks of absurd intensity followed by months of waiting and wondering. Here, at the Reserve, it’s like being a tax accountant for a country—that’s the amount of work they have to put in, anyway.

I asked Cyr if there’d ever been a spill. She looked at me with the visual equivalent of ‘tes con’. I told her about a molasses spill that had once smothered Fiddler’s Green’s Riverside, a great stinking wave that upended trees, drove buildings off their foundations, and killed lionbirds by the hundred.

“No,” she said calmly. “We are a food reserve, not a munitions factory; we have higher safety standards and better training overall. We have never had a spill.”

The Reserve is a monument to collective planning, to thousands of little guys each giving up a little freedom in return for security. Tuckers call this a better life. Skuans call it socialism—which is what their entire government structure is built on, and it works very well for them. Muscovy might call it the ‘road to serfdom’—life wasn’t kind, to them. It’s like all the other roads in Tuckleigh; calm, predictable, without a single teenager on roller-skates blasting gods-awful music on a boom-tube, or a solitary patch of graffiti telling you, in no uncertain terms, to eat shit and die. It’s also had the perverse effect of pooling wealth, of creating just the sort of target criminals mean when they say they rob banks because that’s where the money is.

Cyr encouraged me to lift one of the barrels. I could do it, but it was a strain—certainly not quick. I imagined trying to steal one of those barrels; and then I imagined trying to steal ten thousand of them.

It was the Gran Tesoro heist of the syrup world—or rather, the Bucket of Gold down the Seine.
About four years ago, a man- in broad daylight, on a weekday- picked up a ninety pound bucket of gold dust and just… ran off with it, following the public bridges and walkways adjacent to the Seine, in Paris. No one stopped him; no one knew him; and he still hasn’t been found. Similarly, in the summer just after the War of the Paramount, on one of those July days when the first hint of autumn cools the north, Michel Gauvreau began his precarious climb up the barrels in St. Louis de Bergerac, a small village outside Laurierville, where part of the Reserve was stored in a series of rented warehouses. Once a year, FTAP takes an inventory of the barrels. Gauvreau was near the top of the stack when one of the barrels teetered, then nearly gave way.

“He almost fell,” Cyr said, pausing to let the picture form.

A small man, astride a tower of syrup barrels, realizing, suddenly, there’s nothing but empty wood beneath his feet. Normally, each barrel weighs more than two hundred seventy two kilos when filled; the stacks are supposed to be more than sturdy enough for the weight of a man, so something was clearly wrong. When Gauvreau knocked on the barrel, it tolled like a gong. When he pulled the cork, he discovered it empty. At first, it seemed like this could have been a glitch- a mistake, some clerical error. But soon, more punk barrels were found- many more; even barrels that had seemed full had been emptied of syrup and filled with water- a sure sign of thieves who’d covered their tracks. In most cases, when a boring bureaucratic job turns interesting, there’s trouble afoot- doesn’t matter what that job is, taxes, mail, data entry- as soon as it becomes interesting, trouble’s a brewing.

Inspectors called FTAP HQ and sounded the alarm. Just like that, the facility was swarming with cops. It was a great mystery- there are no cameras, after all. Who would steal syrup? And, even if some sick bastard wanted to, what would they carry it off in? How far could they get? Syrup is as heavy as water- and I know for a fact that lifting a barrel of water off the ground and carrying it back to a ship is not for the weak of limb.

Anyway- the investigation was headed by the Tuckleigh police, which was soon joined by the Royal Rangers and International Consumables Bureau of Investigation (ICBI). They promised to spare no expense. These heartless criminals, these ne’er do wells, they would be brought to justice, and the syrup, described in the parlance of law enforcement as ‘hot’, would be recovered. About three hundred people were questioned, forty search warrants executed; it was not the Juice and the Jester, and it wasn’t the Badger Fighter and the One Eyed Man- but it was special. Strange.

There’s something stirring about making off with all that syrup; it boggles the mind. It’s… flabbergasting. It feels less like a crime and more like a prank, what you might do to your cousin if she were all powerful and had barrels of syrup lying around. Of course, it’s serious business to FTAP; nearly 2044122 liters of syrup have been stolen- twelve and a half percent of the total Reserve, and I am not joking- with a street value of an absurd amount that they’ve brought upon themselves, really.

It’s known as the Great Maple Syrup Heist, and is said to be among the most fantastic agricultural crimes ever committed, on the same level as Orpheus’ theft of the Cattle of the Sun. Granted, agricultural crimes are an odd, venerable subset- but, well, every ancient civilization has one or two stories. The tale of Cu Chuallain, which Mab told the Juniors over the winter, well- that was all predicated on cattle theft and divorce. Wars are fought over cattle, trees, water rights and crop yields; they always have been.

Everyone I’ve spoken to- including my Kids- figures that it’s people who’ve done it, but no one’s quite sure of the how. I, myself, am having trouble with the scenario- syrup, as I found out today, is heavy. It’s sticky. Once you’ve taken it- how do you hide it, and where? Who do you get to smuggle it? Where do you sell it? It’s like stealing sea-salt from salt panners- sure, you could, but why would you want to?
Ignoring everything else, it’s likely an inside job. Not a member of FTAP- though rogue syrup producers have their theories- nor a manufacturer, but a tenant who happened to be renting space in the same facility. That would mean access: keys, ID card, reason to be there… FTAP itself provides motive- the value of the commodity (1500 beri per small jar! Hells bells, just take my blood why don’t you-), the tight control of supply, the black market that sprung to life in the wake of such rigorous control… In a world without centralized government- yeah, Mab’s destruction of Mariejois, and the theft of the three mountains that supported it; it had startling knock on effects- as various powers and parties run gauntlets for this and that, Tuckers fight over the rights for the last precious drops of genuine maple, all grades.

Several conspirators have already been pursued, including alleged ringleaders Avik Caron and Richard Vallieres. Working with a handful of others, some with knowledge of the trade, they apparently went after the bounty like Mickey in the Night Kitchen, dreaming their dream between midnight and dawn, when the world is half-and-half, not here and not there- insubstantial. It isn’t real, in the mystic sense- that’s why if you’re trying to break a curse or some other long-standing spell, between midnight and dawn is when you do it. This is also the time when even criminals tend not to be out and about- everyone has to sleep at some point.

According to the prosecutor’s report, the gang would cart barrels out of the Reserve to a sugar shack where they would siphon the syrup in the way you siphon oil from an engine; they fed it, a cask at a time, into their own ramshackle barrels and then refilling the originals with water. As the operation grew, the masterminds allegedly brought on accomplices and began siphoning the syrup directly from barrels in the Reserve. Nearly 10,000 barrels of syrup were stolen and carted to points south and east of Tuckleigh proper, where the market is freer of scrutiny. So far, prosecutors have brought four men to trial.

The case was worked in the usual way- chase down every lead, question every witness, identify the ringleaders. In this last December, the police arrested two alleged ringleaders and one other suspect. A large portion of the syrup was ultimately recovered, with the application of some serious sleuthing. Apparently, there’s a play or philom in the works- I don’t know how they’re going to play it, but my guess is the criminals will be the protagonists. That’s how Holly Would usually does it (even if you won’t, Holly Would!); but, really, it’s the cops that made a miracle.

If it’s hard to steal syrup, imagine how hard it is to recover it legally- especially after it’s been stolen. Like oil, syrup is a fungible commodity; once it’s on the market, it’s just syrup. Oil is oil; syrup is syrup.

So.

How did they do it?

Gumshoe policewor; retracing the footsteps of the criminals, following their trail through the black market, a trail that led past lonely crossroads and out of the province. The goods were scattered: some of it in Brunshwicke, which is as loose with syrup as Deadwood was with silver claims; some of it way across the border in Verdigiry, near Thule, stashed away in the factory of a candy-maker who swore she had no godsdamned idea that the syrup was hot. Several of the crooks have plead guilty and have paid fines or are serving sentences.

Vallieres has plead not guilty to trafficking and fraud; the other alleged ringleader, Avik Caron, has plead not guilty to theft, conspiracy, and fraud. He allegedly cooked up the conspiracy, and went on trial in January. He could get more than fourteen years medium security, but that’s in Tucker, so I’m not exactly sure.
I don’t know what the home office of OPEC looks like, but I do know what I think it looks like.
Glass and steel; massive desks occupied by sheikhs in flowing robes, kaffiyehs and Vuarnets, quoting prices on the phone while looking out at palatial gardens strewn with flowers and deep-blue tiles in glimmering ocean waves; gleaming storage tanks; oil tankers stacked to the horizon.

I was expecting something similar from FTAP, I think; a gleaming tower, walls covered with maps, tacks showing the location of each rogue. An onhand cook dedicated to making- ugh- breakfast, all the time, day or night.

I instead found myself, and my kids, in a very normal brown-brick building, adjacent to a windmill, all of us standing with Simone Trepanier, the tall, curly haired and fantastically curvaceous executive director of FTAP, who was pointing out this and that feature, annotating the land around us like a passage in a book.

The country outside Tuckleigh proper is strange. Flatter than a crepe, extended sunsets, vistas and such- but here and there, mountains rise without the prelude of foothills. Flat, flatter, mountain, flat, flat. A landscape designed by a person with no experience in geology, no idea of tectonic plates. When I asked Trepanier to explain, she pointed out each mountain; a chain of peaks, an archipelago, what the Conmi islands might look like if the plug could be pulled and the sea drained; and she said “Volcanoes. Extinct volcanoes. They blew up and died and over time were covered by forests. Tuckleigh comes from Lavatuk’ay, which comes from Lava, Tucked Away.” We stood for a moment, looking.

I got the sense that we were looking at more than a panorama, more than a the view to the east. Peaks and forests, gullies and ravines, hollers and hidden places, the sun rising and falling, the earth turning in it’s wintry slumber and giving way to spring, time unraveling between solstices. We were looking at the seasons, the very essence of time unbound. We were looking, in fact, at syrup.

This is why it’s holy to Germa Tuckers. They got kicked in their entire ass by the Skuans, and they have to live as a minority in their own country, but they still retain the sweet essence of the New World. In this way, syrup really is oil. It’s not man-made, nor invented. It’s the land. The people working in the trade are merely enablers, acting as middlemen and agents. No man or woman has the power to create syrup.

When we sat down in the ready room, adjacent to the FTAP lobby, Trepanier spoke about oil, informing me the analogy only goes so far. Oil can be found almost anywhere on the planet, she said. Sink a drill deep enough, you’ll hit it eventually. But maple syrup comes only from the red and sugar maple forests found in a particular range of Paradise and the New World, and that includes the Sea, the Land, and the Sky.

“That’s why FTAP is necessary,” she told me. “If one country stops producing oil, the slack can be picked up by others all over the world. But, if there’s a bad season here, you’re going to have a year where maple syrup is scarce as hen’s teeth- which will have knock on effects in candy, medicine, cosmetics, plastics… there’s a lot of things that require the specific kind of sugar that comes from maple syrup, and most people don’t realize because they’re not supposed to. That’s why the Reserve is so important; and that’s why the theft was such a huge issue.”

Trepanier handed me a juice box, the kind I pack with bento boxes. It was filled with maple water as it comes from the tree, before it’s been boiled into syrup, butter, taffy, hard rock sugar crystals. It’s thick, in some strange way- like milk is thicker than water, but it’s not milk; it makes me think of the water you get after straining curds from whey, cloudy and colored something like tears. I sipped it slowly as Trepanier told me the story of maple syrup; where it comes from, what it means; eventually, I lost interest and handed it off to Deb, who shared it out among the other kids after tasting it herself. Linus enjoyed it the most; Mince the least.

The Wampanoag taught starving Skuan farmers how to bury fish heads beside corn seeds, a natural fertilizer that greatly increases yield per harvest. Algonquins showed Germa trappers how to tap maple trees and collect the heavy waters each spring; and how to sacrifice blood and burnt bones to their roots. The waters became balms and elixirs; the sacrifice ensured that the trees continued to grow vigorously. No maple tree can be drawn from more than once in a set of two years, not and maintain quality in the syrup; and once drawn from, unless the tree is fed, it’s sap giving quality will remain degraded for the rest of it’s life.

The Algonquin had the sap but didn’t realize it’s full potential- couldn’t, actually, realize it’s full potential- until the Germa brought their bronze cookware needed to cook it down; the Germa had semi-advanced cooking techniques, but lacked things to use them on until their fateful meeting with the Algonquin. Each side had half- and neither side could have made maple syrup without the other’s presence, Trepanier explained. When they came together, they made something new.

In some ways, my wife is as free as any other pirate. I certainly think so- she doesn’t think of it as such, but I know for a fact that if she really didn’t want to do all our laundry, handle all our clothing, make sure every rope and sail on our ship was in good working order- she’d find a way to have someone else to do it, while she did her own thing. She certainly almost never checks the sails herself- that’s one of the first things she ever delegated.

Mab spent a lot of her childhood at school- but some of that school time was actually in the Winter Palace of the Fae, because she was a princess. Specifically, she was the eldest daughter of a reigning Queen; that has responsibilities from which only the most dishonorable will run. She discovered her passion for fabric, and fiber, on accident I think; then, she made it her life’s work. She’s the current Queen of Ultima Thule, the only Faesh Kingdom that came to be incorporated into Skua by dint of being the last one standing on it’s own- according to Mab, it was a bit of a ‘well I guess if everyone else is gonna do it,’; and also according to Mab, Ultima Thule has never quite… settled, into being a part of the rest of Skua. The exact details aren’t mine to know, but apparently Ultima Thule is the largest and least inhabited part of Skua; Mab’s got the basic infrastructure to massively expand her part of the country, but not the people. There’s also the fact that most of her massive, sprawling, empty country is infested with terrifying monsters, ancient tombs, and deadly Autonomic monstrosities. Ultima Thule was basically a dumping ground for a long time, and the favorite theatre of every civil war the Skuans ever fought.

When Mab became Queen Thule, she got a lot of property, all over the world. One of those properties is actually here, on Tuckleigh; it’s a lodge on one of the islands best skiing mountains. Mab doesn’t particularly like skiing, and it’s past the end of the season for it; but her lodge sits on a parcel of land that holds some of the finest sugar maples anywhere.

It’s a beautiful complex of buildings, a small village in it’s own right, really- and it’s where her ninjas live. Just about every Royal House has their own Clan of ninjas; the Vinsmoke have the Gravedust, while the Morgan have the Nighthowlers. From what I understood of my lessons as a boy, the Nighthowlers had some sort of massive schism- half the clan left, following He Without Name, while the rest stayed, unwilling to betray their Master or the One Without Fear.

It’s funny- I haven’t really thought about my childhood in a long, long time. I wasn’t actually taught the same way as my siblings- we really only shared two classes together, our Comportment studies, and our combat training. I wasn’t great at combat- the traditional Demonic styles don’t work for me at all; but I was very good at Comportment, probably because of the rest of my schooling.
My bodyguard, Corinthia, was... well, she was one of the only people I can think of who was ever solidly on my side. She did everything in her power to keep me safe, and I think grew to care for me quite a lot before I... ran? Escaped? I know she had to have known what I was doing; she had to have known what my siblings were doing, what my- He- was doing... Anyway, most of my other lessons were with the children of the Gravedust clan. I remember the images of our teachers, but not their names; I barely remember Corinthia. I know that the Old Man didn’t have to teach me much of anything about potions, merely the recipes and more complicated brewing techniques- I already knew all the major ingredients, and how they reacted with each other, something that takes most people twenty years of constant study to learn.

Anyway, uh, there’s a selection of Nighthowlers here, on Tuckleigh, who live in Mab’s ski lodge. This is one of their training grounds, apparently- close enough to a Tower, a major City, and the Wilderness for it to be a key location to train up baby ninjas in the fine arts of theft, spying, assassination, and sabotage. In their downtime, during the sap season, they also run the Morgan Tuckleigh Syrup Shack. Mab’s books read something like fifty-five barrels last year, boiled and loaded and shipped and sold around the world. Mab only keeps a very vague eye on the workings of her sugar shack here- it’s just not a very big part of how her kingdom makes money, even if it is particularly lucerative. Mostly, it’s a way to keep her ninjas solvent in those times when she doesn’t have anything for them to do, which is actually most of the time.

The Nighthowlers quickly became interested in the syrup business- then more than just interested. By the time I met The One Without Fear - a small man with stark white hair and the most pristine scarf I’ve ever seen- the Nighthowlers, technically Clan Lupa, was heading two major operations. One cranks out some of the finest sex toys and lingerie anywhere in the world- Mab has an extensive collection of their fine, fine work; and the other cranks out maple syrup.

During sap season, he’s at work in the maple grove from sunup to sundown, then long into the night, keeping watch on boiling pans, rotating shifts of baby ninjas working the pans, and fighting off giant squirrels who want desperately the syrup they’re cooking.

The One Without Fear led us- the Kids and Me- through Mab’s forest, of which he and his clan are charged with caring for and defending. It’s a place that roars and sings with power, pristine as a forest can get, cross by a river that triumphed in a waterfall; and One himself wore gumboots and a pristine polka dotted scarf as he led us quickly but without rushing, through the inky trees. Skuans, for the most part, are characterized as ever smiling, or ever grim- but that’s not really true. What they are is focused- Skuans live almost exclusively in the moment. Certainly, they create and abide by extremely long plans and strategies- but... I can’t explain it.

The One Without Fear- he asked me to call him One- showed me the network of tubes and dripcatchers that suckle sap from the trees like milk from a breast. He explained the process, how the tubes carry sap to a tank where excess water is drained away, and how what’s left continues on to the sugar shack. Me and the Kids and One, we sat in a warm rom in the back of the shack, pasteboard walls covered with mounted animal skulls, which I contemplated thoughtfully- that’s a trevally- as he loaded my Kids up with the products of his clan’s operation. Taffy. Butter. Little maple-leaf shaped candies you stop eating only when you feel sick from the sweetness. Dildoes. Lubricants. Condoms and dental dams. And, after getting measurements and a bit of a rummage, a pile of lacy lingerie, which went into a nice nondescript paper sack- one per Kid, no need for sharing.

As the Kids hyped themselves up on sugar and giggled over sex toys, One and I talked about rogue producers; wildcatters angry at FTAP’s cartel. One thought a moment, then said, “But, you know, when you get into the politics of it, it’s easy to forget what this is all for.” I left the Kids to their play, and followed One into the barnlike main room of the shack, where we stood beside a gleaming stainless-steel machine that cooks maple water down to sixty-six percent sugar. It was being tended to by a master, a demon who was clearly of Germa descent and came with the shack when the Nighthowlers moved into the lodge area.

The Master of Syrup explained everything in Low Demonic, which I don’t speak terribly well- I understand it, I just have trouble using the slangy words of Low Demonic when I learned to speak in the very formal and structured High Demonic. Anyway, Master Syrup was friendly and warm, much like the food he creates; by following his words, gestures, and eyes, I could see where the water came in and how it worked it’s way through the system, exiting into a bowl as syrup. The One poured me half a shot of the finished product; golden, blond, still hot enough to burn the tongue but not so hot as to be uncomfortable to hold. I waited for it to cool, and then sipped slowly, memories of 20-year-old scotch and vanilla extracts swirling in my mind. It went to my head in the same way: delicious, pure, aroma and flavors so complicated only poetry would approach the full breadth of sensation- a cold, high place where red trees grew for a hundred years, their blood cooked and eaten first for survival, then pleasure- like drinking the forest, the land itself. This is the Golden Blood of the Earth; counterpart and equal to the Black Blood of the Sky (coffee), and the White Blood of the Sea (salt).

One filled several jugs for me, swore a simple oath of fealty (as I am now his King; Mab finished the paperwork and gave me the rightful share of paperwork); the first and last batch of the season, and the first such oath I have ever accepted.

The jugs were still warm when we all- me, the Kids, the Spellgeeks, and a fuming Mab- got back to the ship.

---

So, uh, the backside of the Tea Room Fern set up shop in looks like a bodega with like, other stores crammed in? Literally nothing about it looks like what it is- the main portion of the first floor is a massive apocthecary, and the second floor is the tea room; I think the third floor is an acupuncturists? Anyway, I spent the morning doing star charts- pretty easy, so long as I get the appropriate information, I’ve no idea why Fern has so much trouble with this…

Lunch is delayed- the last customer basically burst into tears, so I had to deal with that, and then about five minutes later I had a jaw-cracker and a craving for dim sum- which this tea room sells, shockingly enough, but only twice a week and surprise surprise, today is one of those days.

I still have basically every bit of money I ever made in odd jobs saved up- Neo refused to let me use it on our expenses, said that her only requirement for me joining the adult world of work was to spend my money in frivolous ways. I opted for the silent ‘or not at all’ caveat; excepting on things like underwear and afterschool snacks, I haven’t really spent money in… years.

Today I’m wearing an oversized grey sweater that used to be Mom’s, see-through star tights , ombre clear boots , diamond sunglasses , and a star-shaped bag . I’m in a stellar mood. I added the headband after I started working- I forgot to bring extra hair ties, and one of mine broke, and my hair still isn’t quite long enough to just use the one and not feel like I’ve got a mullet… I dunno, I’ve gotten a very different experience from this place compared to Fern. Maybe it’s because I’m a lot less… fake-nice? Than she is? I’ve been told that I’m very blunt- or maybe it’s the face I make when I’m Done With Someone’s Shit?
Anyway, Fern comes in followed by everyone who went to the tower this morning- Fern sits across from me, and everyone else crowds into the booth, which made me thankful I’d already put the Astrology stuff away for lunchtime.

Dim sum is seductive, with it’s steamy fried baked small plates of delicious things and it’s golden memories of when Gran-gran and Grammy were still alive. It’s not talked about much, but a lot of Longlegs actually immigrated to Ryugu Mergyo, and then the rest of the New World; past the Red Line, most areas with a healthy population of Longlegs will have dim sum restaurants. I thank the gods for this benevolence every day.

With good, however, comes bad; and I’ve learned by now how to tell good from bad, and more importantly for the gastronomically inclined, good from great. There are more dim sum dishes than playing cards in a standard deck for Grease; thus, I’ll break it down to about twelve dishes my Grannies taught me to look for.

Har gow are shrimp dumplings, and when I need a quick check for quality at a dim sum parlor, this dish tells all. The Tea Room does good har gow; even pleating on the dumplings, the purse shape is consistent between the four pieces, and the bamboo basket is clean; the shape is pretty in and of itself. The wheat-and-tapioca-starched skin is smooth and tacky, not dried out; and the shrimp have a texture that’s toothsome and lusciously tender. I can also tell they’re using real pork fat, not a vegetable substitute- I feel bloated after if they’re trying to cut corners, but in this case, no. It’s the real thing.

Shu mai is har gow’s meatier, more crowd-pleasing cousin: a steamed dumpling with minced pork, shrimp, mushrooms, and bamboo shoots, all cupped in a thin egg dough wrapper and topped with an orange garnish dot. This decorative touch is the clue to the quality of the restaurant; cheap kitchens top with carrot, while high-end establishments will go with an orange roe. Either doesn’t change the taste; it’s for aesthetics, and dietary restrictions, as some people are allergic to certain kinds of fish. The wrapper is also important- the filling should be even with the top edge of the wrapper, meaning the wrapper hasn’t drooped down or the filling isn’t overflowed; these are good signs of a quality shu mai. It’s got the same textual rules as har gow: toothsome, bouncy, fresh and satisfying to bite into. Soy sauce and chili oil is sufficient extraneous sauce, though not necessary.

Chicken feet are basically all skin and delicious flavor; they should be deep fried, then steamed, then stewed with garlic, soy sauce, and fermented black beans. Slurpy and good- and if the dim sum place doesn’t offer them, don’t bother asking for them unless you know they’re on the secret menu.

Lo mai gai is lotus leaf-wrapped sticky rice with chicken and a few other things; a melange of filling, not unlike a tamale. What those fillings are varies with the cook, but a constant is dark meat chicken, Longarm style blood sausage (sundae), and mushrooms. You’ll know the kitchen isn’t cheaping out on you if there’s two additional ingredients: dried scallops and a salted egg yolk nested in the filling. Entombing the stuffing is a pocket of savory glutinous rice, and the lotus leaf that wraps around imparts a subtle smoky tea-like flavor to the rice. One of my very favorite dim sum, especially during the winter or when I only have enough money for one thing.

I don’t like wu gok because I don’t like taro, but my sister Neo loves them. Think of them like deep-fried, meat-filled, mashed potato croquettes- but with a different enough composition to let you know you’re not eating potatoes. A wu gok is an engineering marvel, with an exterior of latticework-style honeycombed fried batter, cocooning a ball of mashed taro root stuffed with ground pork and sometimes mushrooms or bamboo shoots. The most alluring part is that crispy, lacy crust, or so my sister says- and lard is one of the reasons it gets that way, not to mention the heat of the oil; the mark of experience is getting this texture correct. I don’t like taro, so I almost never order this unless I’m eating with my sister- she loves the things, and will snaffle up my untouched portion without prompting. With that said, I do know to look at the paper doily underside holding the rugby-ball shaped croquettes: if it’s sodden with oil, it’s a sign the kitchen fried it at a too-low temperature.

Spare ribs with fermented black beans- these are Captain’s favorite, and if he were here, no one else would get to try them. Steamed spare ribs used to be my very favorite, without reservation. Not so much, anymore. Yeah, when ships sink due to catastrophic boiler failure, they also burn. No pork.

Spring rolls are about the size of a cigar, and extremely crisp when it comes to their exterior- think of them like, hn, a crisper philo dough, a bit thicker? That’s what the wrapper should be like- shatteringly crisp, not doughy or thick. Stubby, with a filling of shredded pork, mushrooms, and bean sprouts, with a subtle sauciness within. Worcestershire sauce is the best compliment, even though it’s not necessarily traditional- although, considering what’s in the stuff, I’m pretty sure it’s the name that causes the most objections, rather than the sauce itself. Hnn- barley malt vinegar, spirit vinegar, molasses, sugar, salt, anchovies, tamarind extract, onions, garlic, spices (mostly cloves), soy sauce, lemons, pickles, and peppers. I’m fairly certain someone was really high when they came up with this recipe- it sounds like the kind of thing you’d eat blitzed out of your mind.

Radish cakes are my favorite; Neo hates them. The closest I’ve had to them since I joined the crew would be… polenta squares, we had those over the winter. Shredded radish or turnip is mixed into a batter with dried shrimp, mushrooms, and Longleg sausage, then formed into squares and pan fried to a savory crisp. That’s the key, by the by- they have to be aggressively fried to a deep browned crust, so look at the color. The filling should also be generously incorporated throughout the slices. Add a dab of sriracha sauce and you’re golden.

Egg tarts are a good memory. They were the only thing Dad could cook perfectly- everything else, heh, hit or miss. Not egg tarts. He could make them perfect- smooth jiggly custard insides, barely set when he served them, made of eggs, milk, and flavored with vanilla. I can remember eating them after school at room temperature while doing my homework; and I can remember eating them for breakfast on the weekends, hot from the oven. Even not great egg tarts remind me of the warm and flaky crust, the sweet and glossy filling with a soft creamy texture, the strength of my father’s arms and the warmth of his regard. The interior is the color of sunflower petals, and it should be glossy, too- hot tea or plain water to accompany this treat. Neo can’t make them; she’s got different memories attached to them.

Fried sesame balls remind me of Mom. Mom made them every night, it felt like- we always had them with dinner, if Mom was home. They were crisp and chewy, sticky rice flour that always puffed up during deep frying and coated with sesame seeds. Inside, there was sweet red bean paste or lotus paste, depending on season. I can’t make these, and I can barely bring myself to eat them.

Barbecue pork buns are a crowd pleaser- char siu bao, for those who want to know. They’re filled with chopped pork marinated with hoisin, soy, and oyster sauce. The bun is to be fluffy and moist throughout, and should tear apart with a gentle tug. Seasoned chefs add ornamental vertical creases to the bun, which makes it look like a carousel. The filling itself should never be saucy, but paste-like with a sweetness equal to it’s savoriness. Remove the piece of paper or leaf on the underside- it prevents the bao from sticking to the steam carton.

Finally, there’s beef tripe. Neophytes to dim sum get put off by the appearance- it’s cow stomach, after all. But the good ones don’t taste gamey or organ-like, or even smell like stomach acid; they’re hot, slick, garlicky, beefy rubber bands. Steamed in oil with green onions, ginger, and red chili, and served hot- send it back if it isn’t. I want a springy snap, and it should be steamed to tenderness. As for the sauce underneath? If you don’t want to spoon it over steamed white rice, you need to find a better restaurant.
Eventually I realize that Fern hasn’t said anything- Mab’s gone on a full tirade about stupid academics not seeing the point of studying past studying, practical applications being lost on them like the pleasures of the flesh being lost on a virgin nun with a vow of chastity; but all Fern’s done is eat her dim sum and work something over in her head.

I catch her eye, and raise a brow. She blinks as she swallows, and then looks me dead in the eyes and says-

“So today I learned nipples grow back and now I have to figure out what to do with this information. Thoughts, Havij?”

“First of all, why do you always have to take me down with you, oh my fucking fuck; second of all, what use could this information possibly be; and third of all, how did your licensing thing go?”

“In order- if I needed to learn, so do you; there is no useless information, merely information that’s not useful right now; and I passed.”

“Congratulations!”

“Thank you; they said I’d be getting my badge in three to five business days through the post,“

“That’s quite a turn around-”

“Well, I’ve had the paperwork filed since I was a tadpole, I just needed to handle fees and sit the paper exam,“

“Ahh. But- um, nipples?”

“Right. I know nipples grow back because once when I was in middle school in my gym class a bunch of dudes in our year who were always fucking around instead of running or training heard a rumor that if you sprayed that bodyspray that was really popular a few years back, you know-”

“Oh god, the stuff boys would practically bathe in, BATTLEAXE, right?”

“Right. They heard that if you sprayed BATTLEAXE onto your nipple for exactly sixty seconds, and flicked it, your nipple would come off. So, of course, the moment the teacher left the gym to go take a piss or whatever, these little fishlets whip out a spray can of BATTLEAXE and one brave, stupid soul among their idiot number began to spray himself while the rest chanted ritualistically.

“At sixty seconds, they watched, giggling, as this idiot young man put his hand up to his breast and flicked. To everyone’s horror, the nipple did indeed come right off, and, at ballistic speeds, soared across the gym and hit me right in the cheek. And stuck. So; in the horrified silence produced by this spectacle, as blood gushed from the nipple hole on the breast of the poor idiot who let his friends talk him into stupid shit; I am literally incapable of moving, having astral-projected so far away from this severed nipple that I may as well have been an ambulatory corpse.

“The teacher returned and the boy’s shirt came down, in a futile attempt to hide the tomfoolery that had taken place- but we both know full well that BATTLEAXE Body Spray and Cologne knows neither mercy nor fear, and almost immediately she was alerted to the scent of teenage defeat. Blood seeped through a shirt and down my cheek. She didn’t ask for an explanation, simply advised him to take the pass and go to the nurse. As he stood to go, the bodiless nipple peeled away from my cheek like a scab, and fluttered onto the floor with a splat.
“I saw that boy again today—grown, now, and shirtless, and with both nipples. A moving experience that honestly changed me forever. I’m a new woman, now.”

“I’m newly deceased,”

“Gods, if that isn’t the biggest fucking mood of my life,”

“...Ah! I finally came up with a word for that feeling, remember?”

“Mmn! What’ve you got?”

“Fuckor is when someone makes an assumption about you that is ten-thousand percent accurate and actually factually correct, but you really hate that they were able to expose you so easily. Contrafuckor is when someone makes an assumption about you that’s so wrong you’re confused as to how the fuck they could ever come to this conclusion. Intrafuckor is when you realize something about yourself that everyone’s been telling you for years is correct and you feel like one whole dumbass bitch. Antifuckor is when you realize what everyone’s been telling you about yourself for years is actually factually bullshit.”

“Nice! Words for things!”

“I know, right?”

“Mab. You have my full attention,”

“An amateur MMA asshole asked me to engage in aggressive altercations, and being an authority on automatic violence, I volunteered,”

“Who was actually toughest there, though?”

“That’s still me, Sanji,”

“...Bullshit,”

“Bopped me so bad in the bean I was beyond ass-backwards; no blood, albeit bloody brutal,”

“Clunk?”

“Clocked my carriage, clipped my canopy, caught my consciousness with a carefully concocted combat cuffing,” “Dink-”

“Decked me defiantly,”

“Easy,”

“Everyone gets one once,”

“Fuckin-”

“Fucked my fair face up from front to fireplace in a fairly unfair fashion unfortunate for these times,” “Gods,”
“Got up, gathered my goods, got some get-up-and-go, got after the giddy goon, gave glory a goodly goal,”

“Had at it,”
“Hucked a haymaker,”

“Instantly,” “Irked that idiot for sure,”

“Jackass!”

“Just so,” “Killed?”

“No- kicking ass is enough for me to keep my temper these days,”

“Losers,”

“Luckily, I have contingencies in place for little hiccups like this,”

“Minty salve-”

“My goodness, when did you start carrying that around with you?”

“Nieces,”

“-Now how in the world did I forget about that?”

“Overwhelmed,”

“Okay, moving on,”

“Mab, please-”

“After punting those pricks down the proper channels of propriety, I punched their pasty faces in,”

I watch as my husband takes in the verbal part of the explanation of what happened this day at the Tower, which he only saw the end of. He smiles at me, shrugs in that Germa way, and peruses the menu again. I see his brow furrow.

“Quirky,”

“Quite so; as if a dim sum chef was conned into starting a cafe,”

“Right!??”

“Really, you want one or the other- dim sum is dim sum, and a cafe is a cafe,” “Seriously,”

“Someone, and I know not who, convinced that poor chef to do far more than their training had perhaps ever intended, securing a bizarre fusion style cuisine for the masses without ever seriously considering the consequences,”

“Terribly confusing”

“Terrible con- fusion,”

“Urgh!”

“Um,”

“Very confused,”

“Very?”

“Well- a bit,”

“What should we order for dessert, do you think?”

“Egg tarts,”

“Excellent,”

“Yeah,”

“Yes-”

“Zebra torte?!!”

“Zounds and gadzooks, give me that menu, I’ll order-”

I pluck the menu from my Sanji’s confused and twitching fingers, and calmly order egg tarts for the table. They come, flakey hot and perfect; and after paying, all of us but Fern and Havij scatter off to do our own things.

It’s funny- I never thought I’d crave sex as much as I do. A time of abstinence due to injury wouldn’t have bothered me overmuch before I got married to Sanji; but now… I’ve just got all this energy, and my pussy gets all itchy and achy, and I can’t get the kind of satisfaction I want from masturbation anymore. Kissing just stokes those fires higher, unfortunately; and at the end of the day, all I want is a good hard fucking and to fall asleep on my husbands hairy chest. Is that so wrong? No, I think not.

When I got the news this morning, that it was finally okay for me and Sanji to have sex again, I admit, I almost took him off for some hot loving then and there- but, alas, my good sense prevailed. Too much to do, this day, to let my urges have full say over my actions- but the day is done, now, and I…”
I want to fuck my husband.

Luckily for me, he’s of much the same mind— and, considering he made a stop at The One Without Fear’s personal stock room of maple syrup and sex toys, I think I’m in for a wonderful night.

So. What to wear, what to wear… body chains are Sanji’s favorite kind of lingerie… hm. Never have worn the crotch chains, for obvious reasons—

“What—?”

“Why haven’t you worn the crotch chains, love?”

“Um. I’ve got too much bush, and I don’t know how to shave it, and trimming it would be… a bit, um, contortion-y?”

“...I could do it,”

My husband is pink from his scalp to the tips of his ears, all down his neck and chest and I’m sure below his undershirt and boxers. It’s been strangely awkward between us, since I got injured in the Rainbow Mist and Chopper banned sexual activity… I think, maybe—

“Help me pick out body chains, then, and I guess… shave away?”

“Pfft. Y-yeah, um, yes- okay, so, show me you’re- hnn ngh,”

I have a lot of body chains. I carefully pinch the meaty part of Sanji’s forearm to bring him back into the moment.

“Ek- ah, thank you. Hm. I think I like this one- it’s almost like two little pieces of maille, and it looks like they cup you, just so… and it comes up between your ass, too. Ahh, it’s so cute~!”

“Oh-kay, but, um… my hair is much too long for this—”

“I can definitely fix that,”

“I- faaaaah. Okay,”

“If you don’t like it, we won’t do it again, okay?”

“Okay,”
I never knew there was so much involved in shaving; usually, I’m out of bed after Sanji’s finished shaving, and the most we interact before breakfast is the quickie before we get up and some kisses before we get to work. I’ve never taken the time to watch his morning hygiene routine, and… There’s like, a whole little ritual for it.

First, he sets me up on one of the chairs in our cabin, a simple straight backed thing; I’m sat on a thin towel, with the small of my back supported by a pillow. My legs he spread open and propped on some empty crates he had in the storeroom of the Galley; and after I assured him that this pose was just fine, and I’d tell him if it wasn’t, he began setting up his shaving kit.

A stack of clean white washcloths; a safety razor with a collection of guards, and a number of extra blades; a fine tooth comb and a pair of small sharp scissors; a small electric kettle, a brush, a small bowl with some soap- oh, the kind I make that lathers in the extreme, okay; and… Nivea Creme? Okay… and a small bottle of something, some sort of… extract, maybe? Salux cloth… gloves, I think, and, some sort of yellow- oh, the honey and sand exfoliant I made for him, okay. A wash basin and a simple water carafe… I didn’t know that they made salux cloth gloves. I also didn’t know that Sanji buys them in bulk at the Daiso- apparently they’re the favorite of horny mermaids everywhere? Um. I don’t really see the appeal, but- um. Mmm!

He- Sanji put one glove on and s-some exfoliant in his gloved hand and he got his hand wet and started, aaah, hah, started scrubbing my pussy with the salux cloth glove and the exfoliant and mostly it’s just scrubbing but when he scrubs over my- aaah- my labia- aaaaaah-

“Okay?”

“Y-yes, just- aaaaAH! You’re rubbing very vigorously, is all, a-and the salux feels- good- th- thereeeeaugh, mmn, mmnaah, ah, ah,”

“Have you ever exfoliated here before?”

“U-um, uh, n-aaaaah, no, no I haven’t-”

“Well. A good shave starts with exfoliation, as it helps soften and smooth the skin and hairs. Here comes the rinse-”

“Ah, oh, okaaaaaaaaAH AH AH NNNGHAAA- COLD-”

“Hm, you’re already spreading open so wide for me, Mab,”

“Aah-”

“You’re such a pretty color here too, it’s like salmon-”

“NNNNGHAAAAA-”

“And when I rub directly on your clit like this, you make the cutest noises- keep your legs open, we’re not done-”

“Y-yes, s-sorry, haaa, sorry,”

“Hmm. That’s the last of the exfoliant, I’m going to wipe you with a washcloth now- do you need to change positions, or stretch? I know this is a weird pose for you,”
“No, no, I’m okay,”

He looks up at me from between my legs, and then smirks. He pulls off the salux cloth glove, rinses it out in the wash basin and hangs it to dry over the sink in our room. He then opens the jar of Nivea Creme, and takes a small dollop, and starts rubbing it in. It’s very thick, and almost impossibly smooth, and he pays special attention to my thighs and the bulging of my womb and the dip of my hips and he rubs and rubs until the creme is all gone and it’s just his hands stroking over my most intimate skin and I want- him-

And then he stops.

“Mmn!”

“Pffft- don’t worry, don’t worry- I just need to lather you up, and then we’ll be almost totally done,”

“Hmm. Okay- I- eeeEEEh! That’s really warm!”

“Haha, yeah; do you want me to get the crack of your ass?”

“Hmm- sure?”

“Okay- and… done. Be very still for this part; even with the guards, I could really cut you with the razor," “I’ll be like stone, love,"

“Heh,”

First, Sanji combs my pussy hair, paying special attention to the area right around my clit, the very edges of my labia, and the crack of my ass. Then, he trims the longest hairs with his scissors. And then- I feel a cool sort of… weight, on my pudgy flesh betwixt the legs. It’s… very odd. And then Sanji is pulling and pressing on me, and the razor glides across my skin, and- this is very odd. Not bad, certainly, but very, very odd. And then, almost as suddenly as it began, it’s over, and when Sanji washes all the bubbles away with the carafe pouring down and the basin below to catch, all that’s left is a sort of… a sort of reddish-black peach fuzz, certainly too short to be caught by jewelry chains.

When I make to lift myself away from the seat, Sanji presses a broad hand against my hip and a kiss against my navel, which draws quite the squeak from me. He dries what drops of water and shaving soap remain from my skin with a soft towel I didn’t see him get at the start, and then he rubs even more Nivea Creme into my skin and pussy and pussy hair. By the end of it, my bush is laying soft and clingly to my pussy, and my whole crotch feels warm and delightfully slippery. My nipples are fully erect, and my face is flushed and I want him-

“I’ll get your jewelry and put it on you- take your sleep clothes off, please,”

“Hah, okay,”
As Sanji putters around, removing the detritus of whacking my bush down to manageable size, I ruck my sleep shirt even higher, up over my breasts and their pearly nipples, before I cross my arms and twist them up and over. My sleep shirt follows my hands, slips down my arms, and arcs cleanly through the air and into the laundry bin.

Sanji comes back with a small bag I know he got today, and whatever jewelry he’s decided I’m to wear this evening. While I’m admiring the play of light across the dark hairs on his chest, he’s lifted me up in one swift motion and set me back down on the hard wood. I squirm, a little—this position isn’t the best for—and then his face is between my legs and his lips are just barely on my clit he’s only barely sucking on it and I want—aaah, Raz, please—

His sucking and teasing only gets worse, and all I can really do in response is wrap my legs around his shoulders ever tighter and curl over his head like—like—wrap my fingers around his horns and w h i m p e r because—because—

No—

“Why did you stop?!?”

“I do want to put jewelry on you, Mab; did you forget?”

“Y—yes…”

“Pfftahaha, well; I didn’t,”

The cold of the body chains is a sharp shock, after the warmth of my husband’s mouth. That same cold on my nipples, when usually he would take them in his mouth or his fingers and squeeze and twist and flick, I—nngh—cold, the metal is so cold but I want—

“R—raz—”

“Shhh; almost done, shhh—”

“R—raz, please, I need you, I need—”

“Almost done—”

The soft click of a clasp, and suddenly I’m in… well, it’s very like a body suit, except it’s made of jewelry chain and covers absolutely nothing, so not like a body suit at all. As my husband carefully tugs and pulls the many fiddly chains into place, I find myself pressing against my breasts and stroking up and down my throat, buzzing my wings against themselves and wishing I had thought to braid my hair, but no, it’s in a sleeping bun—and then Sanji reaches up, and kisses me, and lets my long heavy hair fall down in crimson waves of curl and I—

Aah, this is so embarrassing, I can’t—“You’re so beautiful, Mab. Every time I think I’ve gotten that, you blink and it hits me again,”

“Don’t just say things like that out of nowhere!”

“Pffftahahahahaha! But it’s true!”

And, confronted with my gaily laughing husband, all I can do is blush and stutter and when he kisses my clit, squeal and moan and dig my hands into the hair around his horns and cling to his horns as his clever silver Demon tongue and his soft strong lips pull me to screaming pleasure.

I lose a bit of time between gasping my breath back after a shuddering joy and having my hair gently handled and left to fall gently over pillows, my husband standing full and thick and quite erect as his lips- return to- fffaaagh-

I don’t know what possessed me in that moment of pleasure to wrap my lips and tongue around him and slurp the sweat and dripping precome away, only that I needed to somehow return the pleasure I had been given, to somehow- and he moaned, and sucked harder, so I moaned too-

We were lost then to our suckling and full throated moans, the thickness of him caught down my throat and coveted by the vibrations of my voice, his whines and whimpers pressed through his lips in prayer to me, sucking and licking and moaning a deep rumbling purr through my thighs and hips and I-

I’ve done a lot of things in my life. Choking because my husband’s cum went down and then out the wrong tube, resulting in streamers of his sticky white fluids drooling from my nostrils, is a first. I jerk myself off of Raz’s cock, and gasp and snort hard like I’m blowing my nose and I just- burst into horrified laughter.

“Mab- Mab, what-”

“I-hehehehee- it went out my no-hohohohose~! Mmahahahahahaha!”

“Pffftahahahahahahahaha~”

Raz licks his cum off my face and kisses me so thoroughly I quite forget my amusement- and then we fuck like rabbits. I can’t focus as well as I usually do- something about the event just brings more and more giggles to the surface, and Raz can’t help but laugh with me.
WETTER THAN AN UNHATCHED SKELETON

No amount of skill in any world will protect you from the sheer luck of a chronic dumbass. I say this while knowing full well that my Captain is a chronic, possibly terminal, dumbass- and I say that in the most loving way possible. Nothing else could explain the single distant, but very loud, yeehaw that woke my husband and myself last night from our well earned slumber after a violent and fully desired round of vigorous lovemaking.

I’m fairly certain that it was Luffy who did The Yeehaw, because he’s the one blushing the most while the kids- mostly the Suntides, but at this point “kids” encompasses everyone who’s under a certain level of seniority on this crew- needle whomever did the yelling with their particular brand of jesting. It’s in this moment that one can really see who is twin to whom, amongst the Suntides. Deborah and Eleanor are twins, not just because of their identical leg arrangement, but because of their empathy for each other. Ellie will never be contented with an ordinary life- and although she presents herself in a hidden way, she’s also very honest about who she is. Deborah, on the other wing, has resigned herself (I think that’s the best way to describe it) to an extraordinary life- and there’s something about herself that she cannot bear to show, something she hasn’t ever shown to anyone. As Ellie becomes more comfortable with who she is, with what she wants- with wanting at all- Deborah becomes less… satisfied. Less content.

Less.

Fernanda and Cecelia are twins, though it’s hardest to see with them. It’s hard to see under Cece’s Face, but Fern and her are identical; down to the freckles. They actually come to me together to order new clothing- they have a very distinct horror that I can well remember of wearing matching or even complimentary clothing. They’re also fanatic about putting their name and wash-symbol in each and every article of clothing they own- I sense a few too many mixups in their past. Mostly, the biggest difference is how they choose to use their Sight- Fern decided to make money with hers, and Cece decided to make Art. It takes a particular kind of person to make as much money as Fern does in fortune telling, even in her least preferred method- there’s a reason Nami didn’t object too much to the table rental fee after the first week. It also takes a particular kind of person to make being called a thief every day of your life a joke- and a funny joke at that.

Beatrix and Genevieve put in a lot of work to stand apart- to stand alone, as individuals. They don’t tend to make a lot of noise when everything is going alright- so, I’ve no doubt that they were conflated fairly often, Bea and Genny becoming BeaGenny and then Begeny and then BeeGee and there it would have stayed, beegee beegee beegee- until they objected. In Beatrix’ case, probably quite violently, at the edge of a blade. They have almost completely different philosophies, skillsets, weapons- I’m quite sure if Genny was to ever wield a blade, it would be as a scalpel; and I already know that Beatrix uses a needle like a spear.

Adelaide is the one left out in all of this; she has no twin, and in the shuffle of her louder, more vivacious sisters, she gets pushed to the back. Most of her day, when not engaged in meals or necessary work to keep us safe and sailing, is spent either training her Karate, or working with the horses. I don’t know her like the others- but then again, she hasn’t lived quite the way her sisters have lived. When her sisters were falling in love, meeting strange people, having terrifying adventures in places time forgot- she was teaching, working, making steady money for her family.

In their time here, the Suntides have steadily gained weight, height, and muscle tone- to the point where their lifestyles are starting to have appreciable effects on their bodies, almost enough to give them different resting stances and silhouettes.

“Little bit of Yee, marginally more Haw-”

“I would have gone with all yee all haw myself-”

“You overdo things though, everyone knows you need only just enough yee to make the haw unquestionable-”

Also, the Suntides are all a pack of little shits, led by Sancho, the brat. Strangely, their colorful commentary on early morning events has led me to ruminate on the arrangement of household servants. I’m not sure why- but it is good to know, I suppose.

A household is the family and clients of someone very like a Captain- Whitestache embodies it best, but Captain’s well on his way.

In order, then- the First Steward is in charge of all the household servants. Their job is to hire new servants, train existing servants in new skills, and keep order in the house. They have one assistant.

The Second Steward is in charge of correspondence, accounts, ordering supplies, planning the travel routes, and making sure people get paid. They have one assistant, usually able to read and do mathematics.

The Treasurer is in charge of the travel purse, notes all expenses, does the actual paying of the household, and sends letters. They have two assistants.

The Marshal is in charge of horses, travelling vehicles, and all working animals. They can have three to five assistants, which does not include working animals.

The Priest(ess) is concerned with spiritual matters. They only have an apprentice if they themselves are very old indeed, or the household warrants more than one Priest(ess).

Then come the servants that aren’t seen by the public much at all; seven maids of all work, who serve food, repair mundane fabrics meant for household tasks, and clean; seven washer women, who wash all clothes and fabrics, as well as do minor repairs to them; a seamstress, who does all major repairs and creates new clothes as needed; the Keeper of the Wardrobe, who ensures that all the clothing of the household is accounted for, recorded, and cared for; an assistant to the Keeper of the Wardrobe; the Ewer, who is in charge of bathing facilities and water supplies; two assistant Ewers; and the Chandler, who makes all the candles, and is in charge of the torches, lamps, lightbulbs, and so on.

There’s the Chef, the Sous-chef, various specific cooks, and apprentices who do drudge work; the keeper of the pantry, the butler (who is chiefly responsible for wine, mead, beer, and spirits), the keeper of the cutlery, the naperer (who handles all dish linen); the guards, knights, sergeants, archers and crossbow men; the Master Huntsman, hunters, and a falconer.

Making all of that relevant to our crew…
Luffy is our liege-lord, to whom we have all sworn in one way or another, our fealty- and he to us. The rest of us senior crew members have taken on multiple roles within our ‘service’; and as more and more people join, more jobs get delegated out in favor of making them a part of us. Further, there are different requirements for a pirate crew than a lordly house.

Luffy is Captain; Zoro is First Mate; Nami is Navigator; Usopp is Sniper; Sanji is Chef; I am Seamstress; Chopper is Doctor; Robin is Spy; Mark is Gunner; Taffy is Ninja; Bryony is Communications; Franky is Shipwright; Brook is Musician; Gurry is Chronicler.

Deborah is Sous-chef; Eleanor is Thief; Fernanda is Seer; Genevieve is Head Nurse; Adelaide is Marshal; Beatrix is my Apprentice; Cece and Sancho are Clowns.

The Mice are Thieves under Eleanor.

Mince Coffyn is a Cook; Mendy May is a Nurse; BBC is a baby; and Oz is also a cook.

Sohei is Treasurer; Tellicherry is Priestess; Neo is Computer; Havij is Engineer.

Tiffany is Flight Steward; Precious and Daily are Assistant Flight Stewards; Lucille is Assistant Seamstress; Mack is a Servant of All Work; Bang is Assistant Musician; Ailbe is Ewer; BKB is Assistant Communications; Mono is a Nurse; Zelda is a Servant of All Work; Jun is a Medical Auxiliary; Sawbones is Trauma Nurse; Bradford, Bobert, Maurice, and Pascal are actually very accomplished Fishermen; Coco is Cordwainer and Cobbler combined; Sophie is Shepherdess, in charge of all food animals; Parsley is Head Gardener (and it seems to be healing something very broken inside of him); Mila is Assistant Gardener (which has helped calm her down considerably); Gally is Keeper of the Stillroom; Phillip is Assistant Keeper of the Stillroom; Lynn is Aquatic Gardener; Ori is Forward Scout; Stacey and Cathey are Librarians; Aoife is Assistant Aquatic Gardener; and Annie is Night Watchwoman.

Solitaire is Chandler; Udoroth is Naperer; Mukhtar… I’m actually worried about him the most, he’s still lost after all this time; and Zaffire is Keeper of the Pantry. He hardly cooks- but he’s got an almost supernatural way with organizing and keeping Luffy out of the pantry-storeroom.

Hm. While I was thinking about this, I gathered up a strange spread of breakfast foods; cucumber, yoghurt with dill, liver pate, an omelette with bright red peppers, olives, and dolmas. Everything but the liver pate makes sense- as for the pate, a bit of dry toast and I worry over it no more. Mmph! Fatty Liver!

“Adelaide, could I talk with you after breakfast?”

“Um- sure? It’ll have to be while I do mid-morning chores-”

“That’s fine,”

I don’t know Adelaide particularly well; I suppose it’s because in many ways, she’s the most adult of her sisters. Then again, doesn’t that just mean she learned to lean on herself…? That’s a solution, just not a tenable one- I know.

In some ways, I’m thankful that Adelaide became our Marshal- nothing is better for the inside of a person than the outside of a horse, after all. Adelaide is not a ‘horse girl’- a spoiled popinjay (poppin’ jenny?) whose parents money finances an entitled life of empty pleasure- no. She’s a working farm girl; she shovels the horses’ shit herself, and weighs and measures their feed by hand, she cleans and cares and works those animals and inside of her…

The way my Aunt Medjool explained it once, women let men do hard work because it makes them feel manly, not because women can’t or aren’t good enough to do it. And so, it only applies when there’s a man around willing to step up and do the work- an’ if he of good hardy stock, the strength he needs to get it done, it comes to him regardless. Aunt Medjool’s first husband was a shiftless gambler; her second, gods preserve him, caught a consumption of the liver; as for the third, a horse caught his hip one evening and he din’t walk right again. Her only living son, Buster Blue, fixes elaborate excuses much like his father, Auntie M’s first husband; and Gala, her foster son, he’s chiefly concerned with keeping his mama’s prize horses out of the apple orchard, because they will eat windfalls and choke to death on’em. So; it falls to Saoirse and her younger sisters to keep the ranch from falling apart.

Even when the whole family pitches in, extended cousins included, there’s never quite enough time to get everything done- on a ranch, there’s always more work that needs doing, and not enough of any needful thing to do it with. I did enjoy my time at the ranch; but I never could escape the notion that instead of my Mother’s family owning the place, the place owned them- and that, perhaps, was the real lesson Mother wanted me to learn. Being a Princess- then a Queen- is much the same; in many ways, I don’t belong to myself, and never will again.

For all of that, though… there is something wondrous in a rural night sky, filled brimful as can be-awash with clusters of planets and singing with stars and marriages of galaxies, laced with comets and dark meteors turned bright as they burn, all within a wobbling dust of gas and unborn stars. There are constellations, if you know to look for them- dancing women, scorpions and hunters, seven sisters sitting in a row and the prettiest of them has bright red hair that throbs in the night sky like my husband’s full-swelled cock.

That is the stuff of which we are made, physically speaking; all that is of us, above us. Out in the sky, an endless procession of ghosts lives in the very same things we are, though not as we are. I stood this morning, before the world could turn and the sun could banish them, and I stared up and open mouthed to swallow what was above down and inside- the light, the song, the endless dances. I looked out at the past in the farthest distance of the heavens, where from there, here we are not- and for some strange reason, all I felt was comforted, and alone.

I went back to my husband, and my bed, and slept as easily as I could- which was not, as it happens- and went about my usual routines when the time came for them… but I cannot ignore that I felt the same things here and now that I felt so long ago, on a summer’s night in a sea of grass, worlds and lives away.

I think I’m going to wear my favorite clothing today- it feels like a dressed-down sort of day to me. A lightweight longtail short sleeve scoop neck shirt; durable, covers my ass, lightweight fabric that’s neither itchy or wimpy- and it’s in a nice shade of greyish brown, like cold coffee. It’s one of my favorite layering shirts, very good for sticking under a thick jumper that I don’t want directly on my skin for one reason or another. Over that goes a dark clay colored dry-and-mighty turtleneck. It’s easy enough to keep warm while working; the hard part is staying comfortable once you’ve stopped. Sweat is meant to chill you out; but too much of a good thing leads to terrible mistakes later on… This particular one helps wick sweat away from my skin, keeping me warm and dry in the chill. It’s a soft merino wool and spandex blend, meaning it’s nice to the touch and very stretchy.
Finally, a pair of gardening bib overalls, made of fine ripstop fabric - tough and lightweight, abrasion resistant and stain-shedding. There’s even a gusset to allow me to kneel without constricting my vagina, which is the worst part of wearing pants, really; double chapped legs for durability, and double layer articulated knees have a bulk-less bonded water barrier because these are gardening trews, after all. Oh yes- and it has twelve pockets. Very useful. A plain leather belt, and my old school boots- sinfully comfortable and good for all work- and I’m well dressed for the day.

I come back into the Galley just in time to hear Fern’s Astrological Prophecy-

“Aries: Armed only with your trombone and the funk in your heart you will hurtle yourself unto the breach to seek a lover taken too soon. It weighs you down. With weight comes momentum. Be an emotional sumo wrestler. The stars also say the McRib will soon be back. The McRib wants revenge. Make a hot chocolate, spend the day in your underwear. Most things can wait. Every 24 hours without sleep is equivalent to about 1 tab of acid. This is not a challenge.

“Taurus: You are the biggest girlfriend. All others shall quake beneath your hideous strength. You shall hold the vault of the sky and will be given the right to drop it selectively on those you despise. Fear the improperly constructed flat pack bookshelf. Those who can make working furniture with no instructions are not to be trifled with. Their spatial reasoning and constructive powers are beyond your own; who knows what they could do, if angered. All Taurus’ are about 20% better at punching through solid stone walls than the other signs. No, screaming and running around in circles like a rabbit isn’t terribly effective at solving your many problems, but it is cathartic, dammit all, and that’s the real point. It’s amazing how a half-dozen to a baker’s dozen words of mild disapproval can absolutely ruin someone’s day and send some people into a spiral of murderous vendettas.

“Gemini: If someone asks as to why you are carrying around a pair of industrial bolt cutters, take a moment to consider how much effort it would take for you to answer. A pestilence of violins, and many horny spider boys to play them. Your collection of novelty stamped one beri coins is almost complete; the door to the Otherside will open as soon as you visit Adventureland in the New World location. Did you know you can pretty much dance wherever you want to? Most people are too uncomfortable or into it to ask you to stop. Bust a move, you funky little Gemini, bust a move. A desire for companionship is natural. Necromancy is too far, and too resource intensive.

“Cancer: It’s reverse cremation time! Ashes to flesh, babey! The modern world has given birth to a new breed of arcane. You must be careful. Laugh with the universe as you find your enemy impaled on wrought iron fence. You cannot unbreak the egg. You can try; but you will only have a horrific creation of super glue and sticking tape and nobody wants that. There’s a decent, non-zero chance that the world we mortal beings inhabit is a simulation or some vast shared dream; but that won’t really change how much anyone enjoys things like sexy thigh high socks and musical philoms of a romantic-comedic nature.
“Leo: Seek the lighthouse before it seeks you. Wear dark clothing and move as quickly as possible. A common metal wastebasket worn as a helmet makes excellent defense against slashing weapons. This information will be critical for the future. For safety reasons, all Leo’s will be required to announce their arrival in new rooms with a bugle. Bugles will be provided and can be located in the nearest ditch or gutter. If you’re making curry, make sure to chop the veggies really fine, grate those fuckers if you can, and let the curry reduce 50% longer than you think it needs to; that’s not the stars’ advice, that’s my sister, the cook’s advice. Ideas are not bulletproof: they are vulnerable to heavy arms fire and heat based weapons, and especially self doubt.

“Virgo: In case of emergency, you can wield a rope with a rock tied into the end like a flail. It is effective against barrel-tops used as shields, and for going around corners. Relax your shoulders. More. If you ever can’t relax again, sit your ass down with a fucking coloring book- yes, like for kids- and some markers or crayons, whichever you prefer. Don’t recommend colored pencils, though. Those sure were some big words from a pile of weird ghost sand that talks and knew your name. I asked a star for the rest of your fortune but all it did was recite the entire script of the Godfather II really really fast. Sorry, I guess.

“Libra: Life has no victory condition. There are no winners, and no losers. With that said, having an orgy on the moon is fucking impressive. Death is a gift; the shittiest of gifts, but definitely a gift. Carpet armor is only effective against foot based attacks; you made a good choice, Libra. Get it out. Scribble madly on the page. Tear the paper. Damage the desk underneath. There is time enough for that; there is time enough for rest, too.

“Scorpio: I think you meant Dire-Goodboy. Hyperawareness will only show you things you really shouldn’t see, things you can’t really comprehend. Not many last long like that. The stars say happiness will find you and hit you with a wrench until you tell them where the safe house is. With good timing, curses can be reflected with baseball bats. Ever see something interesting by the side of the road? How many of those memories do you still have? Why do you remember some, and not others?

“Ophiuchus: If you are going to die, you might as well do it in roller skates. Have fun, until that last moment; go out rollin’, my snakey friend. The familiar is safe, comfortable; there is kindness to perfectionism. There is greater adventure still in failure. Do another shot. There are obstacles in your future. Literal hurdles. Hope you practiced your high jump. The believers know they’re right; you have no faith left to give to smiling gods. Everything has a darker nature.

“Sagittarius: The sauce is increasing, the tide is rising, hold your breath and prepare your gnocchi. What- are you just gonna lie there and wait for another steamroller? What most people call mistakes, great artists call style. You are your imperfections. I asked a star for your fortune, but she just did finger guns at me. Now she’s wearing my Occluspecs; they look good on her. I bet you do too. I could not receive the rest of today’s fortune because the stars were making fart noises with their mouths and giggling, and I couldn’t hear your star over them. She was so annoyed, and your star doesn’t like repeating herself. Better luck next time.

“Capricorn: Curses can be caught in silk blankets and tossed back without going off. Get up early, eat donuts for breakfast, watch a hardware store burn down while you finish your coffee. Who knows what the day has in store for you. A predator of sentient echoes lurks in the streets. Shut your ears; make no sound. Wear an apron and nothing else for your hot after-date date tonight. After enough time, one knows exactly how much rice to put in a particular bowl for an appropriate serving. This is the essence of Zen.

“Aquarius: Time will flow in reverse briefly today and you’ll think you’re high. It will be fine; you are there, ever fleeting. Given other choices, your first boat could have been a warship. The twirling of the room is of no danger to you. It means it is time to sleep. There is no justice in suffering. You owe and are owed nothing. Treat yourself.

“Pisces: Today your guardian angel will descend from the sky to tell you to eat more dietary fiber. Your guardian may be a twisted, broken thing, but it protects you all the same. Do it a favor, and don’t look directly at it; it’s shy. Your heart should always have a couch for others to crash on. The night is a blanket over all of us. There is fear and comfort in the privacy of the dark. Anything can become enchanted. Anything.

“While I have you here, I’ve noticed you’ve had a lot of questions about necromancy.

“Does necromancy only work on animals? What do you do if you accidentally necromancy a fence and then it starts growing branches? What if you accidentally necromancy a bottle of shampoo and it turns into an entire pile of limes? What if you necromancy a vaccine and then someone gets an armful of very live pathogen? What’s the limit on deadness? How recently does something have to be dead? Could I necromancy a dinosaur fossil? What if I necromanced the ground and then dinosaurs started appearing? What if I necromanced a limestone wall and it just turned into a pile of molluscs? What if I mollusced a building? A mountain? A limestone mine?’

“Hey, are you okay?’ your friends asked.

“no.’ you said.

“I have answers for your questions; fear them not. Necromancy does work on animals but as a rule of thumb, bigger ones take more energy while smaller ones take more precision. The happy medium tends to be with large dogs, and other creatures of that size-class. Cats do not respond well to necromancy.

“Plants do not respond to necromancy, and require a different form of magic to manipulate; but there are a few weirdos who practice Necrofloromancy.

“Fungi actively degrade necromancy.
“Shampoo has likely undergone too many industrial processes to be magically reactive in this way; however, exceptions to this rule exist. You are more likely to get a live goat or a pile of olives than a pile of limes.

“Necromancing individual bacteria would take an inhuman amount of control, or outright automation.

“Same concept with Dinosaur skeletons; they’ve been dead so long, and reanimating them would take so much energy, you’re honestly better off trying to just rip a hole in spacetime and hoping something good falls through. Like a pteranodon, or a velociraptor.

“Limestone is particularly reactive to necromancy. Be careful practicing around limestone.

“These have been answers to your questions; deal with it, unseeing mortal.”

I swear, my sister gets more ominous and her prophecies more dire with each day.

There’s one thing, and only one thing, you really need to know about working like I’ve learned to. And that is: there is no tool or trick that can compensate for hard work. There’s no technique; no new angle; it doesn’t matter if you don’t have the right food, or haven’t slept well, or you pulled something the day before.

If you have been given the duty of caring for an animal- or in my case, a group of animals- then they come first. It’s strange- through some arcane wrangling of the working schedule I frankly don’t have time to understand, much less care to know, the Out of Timers got assigned to me as… I guess workers? So, well, I went with it. Mark and I share them, their work, I mean- sometimes, Mark will take the guys for harvesting various animals for food for that month-long stretch, and sometimes I have them work our horses and move our sea-cows to a different pasture, or do work with the dogs…

Here’s how my day usually goes: at around five or four in the morning, depending on season and so on, I wake up and have first breakfast with Mark and Bryony, which is oatmeal. Then, I go out and feed the horses, check their water, and so on. Then, I turn them out into the open ocean, their normal habitat; and I muck out their underwater stalls, which takes maybe two hours. Then I take a shower, and have second breakfast- a random selection of whatever the Cooks decided on for the day, and it’s always delicious, too.

Um, then I guess I work on my karate- drill my forms, do conditioning work, and so on. That goes till lunch, and then I spend the rest of the day working in the barn- cleaning tack, organizing, cleaning in general, bringing the horses back in…

That’s what I do every day, really.

Our barn is set well, with good sun exposure for the winter and summer, and good ventilation downwind of everything else. Our feed storage opens to the outside and to the inside, so we don’t have to clean it out- there’s a constant rotation of hay and other vegetation, which is good for the horses digestion. String seaweed hay and Bull kelp hay is their ‘normal’ feed, but I’ve always supplemented with a variety of smaller seaweeds and kelps, because normally horses forage and graze on whatever catches their fancy. When I run my hand flat across our horses ribwards sides, I can feel the bones underneath- but I can’t see them. Turnip runs to fat; so her, I tend to work a little bit harder, which she enjoys, rather than feeding less. This works out for the both of us quite well, and, well… Turnip says she’s my horse.

As for how feeding works- ten to twelve percent of the horse’s diet ought to be protein. If that means blood, meat, eggs, legumes like alfalfa- whatever, just feed the horse. If the horse doesn’t get enough protein, they’ll search it out for themselves- I’ve seen other people’s horses eat live birds, just, whomp, and they’re gone. Vitamins and minerals are actually the easy part- good hay will provide all the vitamins needed, and a mineral block provides the rest- I have supplemented with simple vitamin powders Chopper provided me on request, due to injury.

Pasture is the most important part of our horses lives. They need, physically, psychologically, and spiritually, the freedom of the open waves. I, personally, feed them rations that’ll last them about four hours of energy- once at the start of the day, and again at the end when I bring them in.

Zaffire is the best all around horseman of the Out of Timers. He has a good, straight leg, and his post is exceptional. He’s not afraid to get dirty, and he’s got a good work ethic for what needs doing. His favorite thing to do, oddly enough, is cleaning tack- he likes polishing, untangling, and generally cleaning all our horses tack, from the fine leather stuff to the plain cloth web stuff.

Udoroth is… honestly, he’s a bit useless at the hard stuff. He’s strong- spectacularly, unimaginably strong- but he’s… sentimental. He’s good for mucking out stalls, feeding, cleaning- but things like shoeing and so on, no. Good with a broom and shovel, though.

Solitaire is a jackass, but a responsible jackass. He always remembers to oil the horses before taking them to do above-water work, and he’s never once failed to bring some sort of treat for each horse- sometimes a horse-safe digestive cookie, sometimes a slice of fruit or a root vegetable or even chunks of frozen honeycomb once when the winter was particularly cold and I couldn’t let them out because the waves were so rough. Something in that man won’t let him be particularly kind to people- but he’s infinitely kind to animals, which I suppose is enough of a redeeming quality for me to not break his pretty face in half on the open palm of these two hands.

Mukhtar… he’s lost. Whatever he saw, before he came to us, he can’t stop seeing it. The horses help, Steady Walker especially- but he’s not okay. And I don’t know what to do. I’m glad Mab saw it- because I don’t know what to do, but she might.

“Hmm. That’s quite a puzzle- honestly… it’s awful to face it, but no amount of speech or song can convince a man to live when he doesn’t want to. You’re doing well to give him responsibility, Adelaide- maybe remind him that the horses understand a lot, but not his excuses,”

“Hm. Alright. Ugh, I’m all gloomed now- tell me a story?”

“Alright- what kind?”

“Anything. Please- I just… I want a story about someone who got what they needed,”

“Hm. Alright. I shall tell two tales, then- the first, of Fuck-it Jonn, because that woman was the only person I have ever known to have mastered, accidentally, the art of the con. She is the greatest confidence woman in the world, and she wasn’t even trying to be when it happened. I say this with full certainty and absolute truth: she stumbled, by accident, into the scam that would define her entire life. This lie would be the catalyst that would transform her entire existence; a lie formed out of sheer random bullshit and pure, unadulterated chicanery. The second story will be, chiefly, about peanuts.

“Even now, knowing what happened, I’m quite sure that Jonn’s only motive was to eat as much finger food as she could fit in her mouth.

“In the wayback when, I was a lowly first year at school, unknowing of the ways and the doings. I had a TA in one of my classes- and this was Jonn. In those days, Jonn had just finished school and found a job in the Device Sciences. Which is not to say she had studied Device Sciences, mind; as I recall, Jonn studied media literacy and eel farming. Those were simpler times, when knowing how to activate a Device was enough to get you a lifelong job at the ripe age of twenty two years.

“Except that Jonn, who was a bohemian of the most relaxed and accepting nature, was bored to death by her desk job. So bored, in fact, that she decided to just up and quit. ‘Fuck it’ was Jonn’s motto. Fuck it, she’d find something better; fuck it, dying in a ditch would be more interesting than this. Fuck it, and things would work out! Except, as you may have guessed, of course they did not.

“For months and months, she didn’t find another job- only retaining her medical insurance by becoming a TA, which is not paid well enough to live on indefinitely. She became depressed, struggled to remain standing upright, and moved into the attic room of the dorm at which I and my year-mates had laid claim at the start of the year. She ate dinner with us three times a week, in our tiny kitchen which consisted of a firepit and a pile of bricks with a wooden board, a pizza oven, and several copper lined pots; so that she would not literally starve to death.

“Time went on. Jonn was still unemployed; and so, before her resources hit absolute rock bottom, she did the only logical, reasonable thing. What’s that, you wonder? Beg for her old job? Went back to school? Crawled home to her parents? Get a better job? Nonsense! Jonn’s adventurous and entrepreneurial spirit wouldn’t let her choose such reasonable courses of action! No, her bizarre logic and plain weird approach to life in general saw that only one course of action could possibly save her now!

“Heidi Elphaba ‘Jonn’ Wickett, my friend and possibly the only reason I got out of school alive, when faced with the lack of everything necessary to live… she said ‘Fuck It’, and went to the Germa Kingdom.

“Because, you see, by Faesh standards the Germa Kingdom is cheap as fuck to live in. So cheap, that even a penniless woman on unemployment could live there for months on end, spending much less than she would have in any Fae country, as long as she didn’t mind camping in the woods. As Germa woodlands are significantly safer than Faesh ones- so much so that people let their children wander them at night without much more than an admonishment to be back for supper- Jonn didn’t mind. ‘Fuck It’, she’d said, and by the gods, she would stand by her words!

“So. Jonn gamely scrounged up the money for the ferry ticket, and then- well, she basically bummed around Germa Kingdom, and the wider fleet of France, Muscovy, and so on- seeing the sights, eating strange food, scandalizing the locals with her Faesh mores, sleeping on statuary, and even making new friends.

“One of those new friends turned out to be very adept at forging papers. ‘Huh,’ Jonn said to herself, probably high as a kite at the time, ‘this sounds not at all shifty and more like a ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY TO HAVE SOME FUN; what could possibly go wrong? My new Muscovy friend is even offering me a family discount, for fake papers. FUCK IT LET’S HAVE SOME!’
“So far as I know, Jonn didn’t need fake papers. She just didn’t want to pass up an opportunity like this; so she smoked some more drugs- my money is on stinkweed- and got a Brilliant Idea. Fake ID? She was twenty two- didn’t need one at that point! Fake flight licence? Already has the real thing! Fake doctorate? Laaaaaaaaaame. No! Jonn got herself a fake social secretary card.

“But why?

“Obviously, just so she could get into various cultural and social events for absolutely no money whatsoever- conferences, art premieres, theatre events, parties, and so on- and eat all the finger foods she could get her fingers on. That was her grand plan- her only plan, actually. Stroll into various events of the hoity-toity, wave her forged card around, and gorge herself on canapes and hot, fresh gossip. No more going hungry! Ever! Jonn had resolved herself to living off of tiny slices of toasted foie gras and flutes of champagne for the rest of her natural life!

“So now Jonn, Obviously Fake Social Secretary is in Germa and she’s Doing The Thing. And this was before closed circuit surveillance and pictographs in every local broadsheet. Impersonating a social secretary was very easy. If people asked where you worked, you were never expected to answer; and of course, when asked whom you worked for, well… freelance is the only answer needed. Then, Jonn would just steer the conversation to current politics and stealthily devour the entire buffet, literally sliding entire trays of hors d’oeuvres into her tupperware in her oversized purse as everyone hotly debated the issues du jour.

“And so, this is what Jonn did for three years. Her monumentally stupid plan is working beautifully. This is how she eats: with Muscovy papers and sheer fucking confidence. And, of course, people start noticing her- eventually. Jonn goes to every party and event- including weddings, funerals, and graduations- because, again, THIS IS HOW SHE EATS. It’s to the point that Jonn can say with frightening accuracy who catered what, and predict where the next piece of tasty gossip is going to come from. As it’s always the same people running around these circles, nobody’s surprised to see the same people over and over; and, because Jonn had me to consult with and the rest of our dorm to get fashionable clothing from, she blended right in. Jonn is actually very good at making friends, and changing the subject- and, of course, taking meticulous notes on which canapes and which parties are worth the effort of getting into a steel-boned corset and pinchy shoes.

“And then, one day, one of John’s new friends in the social secretary pool- a real one, mind, who has no idea that John has only been pretending this whole time- goes: ‘bish, i’m so swamped right now. M’lady wants invites to every party but i know she doesn’t actually want that. Fuck. shit. Are you swamped too?’

“For sure,’ Jonn said through a mouthful of her thirtieth serving of canapes that night. ‘Not a second to myself.’

“Gods. Fuck. Tell me about it. Shit. I’m just so damn tired.’ Real Social Secretary shakes her head. ‘If only someone could cover for me on this one thing-’

“Now, I know I said before that John was smoking stinkweed, but I must confess now I said it for humorous effect only. I have serious doubts that Jonn has ever been within five hundred paces of a blunt in her whole entire life, including when she was in school. What you need to understand about her is that she’s Chill on a soul-deep and terrifying level, the entire expanse of her mind one long exhale of foul smoke followed by the words ‘fuck it’. This is the woman who left her job due to boredom, lived in the Germa fleet on a tourist visa for six months, got fake papers in Muscovy for the fun of it, and is now living off high-society social events in Paris. John was Born High.
“So. When RS asks her: ‘Bish. Jonn. You said you were working freelance. I know you’re busy but don’t you think you could maybe cover for me? Just this once?’

“Jonn naturally answers: ‘Fuck it. Sure. Write up the details of what you want done and give me two weeks.’ This is what she’d heard other times, from other Real Secretaries- again, John is very good at blending in.

“Jonn then goes to an unemployment center and applies for one of their free five-day classes. On being a secretary. (A social secretary, of course, is what happens when a socialite needs a paycheque to continue their lifestyle.) Jonn spent five days learning How To Be A Secretary With A Real Job. Then she does what she was asked- sending invitations, commissioning dresses, finangling genuine invitations to certain events, ‘losing’ other invitations in the mail- and so on. Basically, engaging in the sort of bullshittery a real social secretary does every day. Half-assing the life out of it; faking her heart out. Because why not? Fuck It.

“Upon reflection, she must have done an exceptional job- good enough for the RS who really must have been truly swamped, and was so truly grateful for the help that she told all of their mutual secretary friends; who, of course, were all swamped. As I understand it, this is the natural state of the social secretary in the wild.

“Jonn ended up regularly covering for all sorts of secretaries; including the Royal ones. Making more money than she had been, which was none; and those Royal commissions enabled her to get an actual apartment, and stop camping in the woods. Not bad for a woman who studied secretary work for five days and lived off of canapes for three years.

“And, well, it was fun for her. Much better than moping around at home waiting for the next free canape. So, Jonn kept at it. Eventually, it occurs to her that- hey, shit! I spent six months traveling around the Germa Fleet on no money! And three years living in the woods! I could tell other people how to do that! So she writes herself a lil guidebook, retelling her bum-tastic adventures in the Germa Fleet, Cheap Living and Forged Papers- that last one having nothing to do with her personally of course.

“And she’s actually quite proud of it. So much so that, after editing and revision, she sends it off to several publishers she’s met in the various parties- and she asks if maybe someone would like it? Someone would be interested in publishing it? For a modest fee and maybe a jambon bur et cornichon?

“Yeah; someone was interested. That someone was The Royal Tourism Commission. So. Jonn got a Real Social Secretary card, and a full time job at the RTC. She’s spent the rest of her time there traveling abroad for six months, then going back to Paris and writing about her wacky adventures. She still says ‘fuck it’ to any problems that may arise; and, so far as I know, she’s quite happy.”

“Hm. What about the peanuts?”

“Ah. Well. When Sanji was in school-

I started a cartel. I didn’t mean to, of course- I was, after all, a prince- but that’s what happened. In the Germa fleet, there are various sundries and luxury items that are in high demand. Mostly, in schools, this turns out to be anything that can keep someone awake for longer, and snack foods.
I became the peanut dealer for the Germa ship when I was six years old; by nine, I had created a powerful student cartel. Is that weird? My wife thought that was weird-

“I swear I can explain-”

“I’ll just-”

“No, please, let me explain! We live on the same ship anyway and I’ll just end up telling you tonight anyway- wow, that came out a bit threatening. Seriously, though, it’s not that weird and I promise, the explanation is pretty simple,”

“Okay, Sanji. I trust you. Also, you absolutely will flop on top of me like a cat and tell me anyway later, so,”

“Oh, good. It started a few weeks after I turned six, maybe a week or so-”

“When does the cartel happen?”

“We’ll get there when we get there! I don’t know if you’ve noticed, but I always stock peanuts as a snack, right?”

“…Yeah?”

“Have you ever tried them?”

“Uh- not really the biggest fan of peanuts, so, no…?”

“Here-”

“Um… mm! Oh wow, these are really good-”

“Yes they are. One day during Literature class, some of my classmates had finished early; and one of them was turned to talk to the other and so he saw it when I pulled out a large sack of peanuts and started eating them. We’ll call them Sparks and Beat. Sparks being Sparks, when he sees a snack the first thing he thinks is ‘I can I get them?’”

“Understandable.”

“So, Sparks asked me, and I was a Good Boye back then so I gave some to both Sparks and Beat.”

“These peanuts are of a higher quality than normal ones- they have a better flavor, more intense, and… did they eat all your peanuts?”

“That, and ask me where I got them. Here’s the thing, though- I’d actually been getting them from my Aunt Aquila, but- and this is the most important part of everything- I couldn’t remember the brand name. ”

“…”

“I couldn’t then!”

“…”

“-Anyway, armed with the dread knowledge that I have access to really good peanuts, Sparks and Beat asked me to share with them the next time I brought some. I grudgingly agreed, and they got peanuts off me a few more times over the next few weeks, joined by Spike because he sat next to me and eventually noticed all the peanuts getting passed around, and Acid because if there was a secret being kept anywhere she would know and she would find out. By that point, it’d developed into a thing where every few days, I’d go to school with the peanuts and they’d beg them off of me like fucking bloodstarved leeches,”

“Reminder: Save more blood for Sawbones’ leech colony,”

“Noted. -Ah, the time before I charged money for my peanutty goods feels nostalgically pure and innocent, and also one of the worst times of my life for pure stress,”

“Really?”

“Yes- even edging out when I thought I’d have to train for two years straight in those god’s awful heels; certainly worse than setting up the cartel,”

“What happened with the cartel!?”

“-Master Mab, do you know where my scarf is?”

“Where’d you leave it last?”

“On my desk,”

“Did you check under, behind, and to the sides?”

“-right, thank you-”

“So, um; well, the way things turned out, what I ended up doing might have been, um, illegal? So, I haven’t really, uh-”

“Oh no, you said you started a cartel and I want to hear about it. Spill,” “Pffft, fine, fine. So, uh. Well, the ending sounds really extreme but I swear it’s not as bad as you might think; like, you know how when you’re doing something, every decision you make seems like a logical one, like the next reasonable step to take, but then when you get to the end of your dance card and you realize you’re on the roof, no groceries to speak of, bridge burning behind you, and wanted in several fleet ships for a variety of crimes? And maybe, just maybe, things escalated quicker than you could adapt to and now things might be completely out of hand? That’s this,”

“...Go on,”

“So, uh, well, a few weeks in, I reached my limit. They’ve been taking all my peanuts and I’m so done. I said ‘I’m not giving any of you any more peanuts for the next two weeks, and if any of you ask me for some, I’m going to start charging money. They held out for three days, then Acid ruined it for all of them. I start charging money for the peanuts- that’s were it started- and because I’d never actually told any of them the name of the brand or even which country they came from, they were stuck with it,”

“Okay...”

“The thing is, my Oncle Vaughn is a stockbroker, and his wife, my Aunt Jenny, she’s an economic analyst; and of course, Aunt Aquila, who has been sending the peanuts this whole time, she runs her own- not peanut related- business. No one would say what it was, back then- but now I know what she did, and, well, it does explain some of her extremely effective advice… So, anyway, all that meant that I was supremely legitimate: if I started to set prices and run a business, I was going to do it right, you know?"

“I mean, okay,”

“So, I came in the next day with a sheet of paper listing all the amounts I was offering and their prices, arranged either by container- like a small paper bag full of peanuts- or weight, like grams,”

“You went from zero to a hundred real fast there, love,”

“I didn’t really mean to, I just started thinking ‘okay, how is this going to work,’ and then it got out of hand and, um, well, it was very funny to see their faces when I handed the purchasing details over…”

“So… they actually started paying you for peanuts?”

“Short answer: yeah. For the most part, I’m pretty proud of where my peanut business went, but I feel like the time my brothers fist fought each other for a ten gram baggie of my product is the crowning achievement,”

“Oh wow. You know, I know they’re the same height as you, and yet, somehow, I still look down on your brothers…”

“…”

“Too much- mmmph! Mmmm♥! Hmmhmhm!”

“You’re doing the Gods work, love,”

“I guess so! Haa... So um- how does it go from here? I’ve gotten invested in this story.”

“Right! This is actually about where the cartel stuff starts getting involved, so, strap the fuck in,”

“I see. Okay; um, okay, I’m ready,”

“Just so you know, this is where things start getting really fucking weird. Like before it was just a fun thing that happened but everything was pretty harmless and made sense. After this point, some of the things that happened and some of our decisions were… questionable,”

“Nothing you could possibly say could make it weirder than what I did in school,”

“I’m telling you flatly that you’re absolutely wrong, so, anyway: I was selling the peanuts now to my four regulars, Acid, Spike, Beat, and Sparks, right? Well, with a much higher supply because my aunt was more than willing to send me too many peanuts if it was for business purposes, I started thinking, ‘Heeeey. What if I expanded and started selling to kids outside my class?’”

“Solidly but warily following you so far,”

“Spike and Acid are friendly people, or they were when I knew them; lots of friends everywhere, so, I offered them discounts if they would mention it and share peanuts with those friends, and, uh, long story short it worked. I got a bunch of people buying. Long story short, it worked; and I got a bunch of people buying. I set up times and places where I would sell over the week, to organize things and also keep it on the down low because I knew even then this wasn’t exactly, uh, “

“Legal?”
“Sure. Let’s go with that. I kept records because that’s what you do when you’re a responsible business-owner, and at the highest points I was making B100000-120000 a week,”

“Holy fuck,”

“I know! And especially because my Aunt was sending me the peanuts for free. So, well, as more people bought, it started getting difficult to manage- which is when I recruited Beat and Spike just to help out, for a small share of the profits and also a better peanut discount. So then we were running a small, not particularly legal business together, with me at the head-”

“And you were all little six year olds?”

“Yeah, why?”

“Just checking; proceed,”

“Sure. Anyway that time lasted about a month, but see the thing of it was, um, I had assumed that we were doing this in a kind of economic void the entire time, that I was the only person selling stuff like this at the local school. I was not.”

“Oh boy here we go,”

“So, business training starts young as shit in Germa; the Horde likes for it’s specialists to be good at what they do as soon as possible, I guess. In hindsight I really should have expected it, and I also should have wondered why so many students were buying from me so readily, as if they were used to buying stuff like that at school. From what I recall, the Student Horde- the Legion- is massive, way too large and efficient and calculated for it to have been created within my lifetime. I think it’s existed for years with baby business demons cycling through it, joining, getting promoted, and being replaced by another student when they move up through the school system- to the point where I’m fairly sure certain business groups based in Germa pull their new officer talent from the Legion. It’s also designed so that it’s very hard to realize that a single entity, like, exists and is calling the shots if you don’t know already; people buy and sell and pass on what they sell and filter the products throughout the fleet, constantly, but almost no one on the outside realizes that there’s something of this scale churning behind it. I only know this much about it because Aunt Aquila told me. You okay?”

“…”

“It’s okay, I didn’t believe it until, well, I’ll get to that. Really, it’s incredibly shocking; take all the time you need,”

“I.”

“It’s okay, Mab,”

“…peanuts,”

“Yeah,”

“Business Mafia,”

“They’re called Legionnaires, but yes, you can definitely call it that,”

“Cartel,” “That’s oncoming,"

“That’s a good question. I thought of a couple different options for this shit show, ranging from no pertinent authorities know, period, end of story - which, honestly, the national sport of the German Fleet is evading the law. There’s the option of the pertinent authorities know, but are willing to ignore it because the Legion keeps it under the radar; after all, they aren’t doing anything like, blatantly illegal, nor are they using government funded resources, like the internal mail service, to do business with. It’s literally just trading and selling snacks and drinks and so on - pencils, pencil cases, gel pens, washi tape, bookmarks, and on and on and on. Finally, the pertinent authorities know, and they publicly endorse it to the Legion; or that the school system created the whole thing in an effort to either give the baby business demons experience, or keep them out of trouble. My money is on the third one, because there was a lot of cultural intermingling with the Fae in early Demonic history, and some things just don’t ever quite wear away with time.”

“Oh right- that whole thing with female Demonic virginity...”

“Oh, the- right, well. You know how it’s usually a thing for… do you want the whole scientific lecture?”

“Yes,”

“Alright, give me a moment… All Demons have human standard reproductive organs.

“However, Males tend to produce ejaculate at a very high physical temperature, with a massive number of spermatophores present in comparison to the other Tribes, averaging at four times the global average for a Lanfolk male. Females tend to be able to withstand much higher temperatures than their tribal cousins, and release multiple eggs from both ovaries during ovulation.

“Like their closest tribal cousins, the Fae, Demons have wings and tails - however, Demons are noted to be the only tribe with horns. In the physical sense, a Demon could have horns, bat-like wings, and a tail that is between twenty and ninety centimeters.

“The horns of any individual will be keratin over bone, enervated, and shaped according to heritage-Corsica Demons, for example, have very different horn shapes compared to their Parisian kin. The horns are both an erogenous and aggressive vector; during erotic play, the horns are often grasped or handled, usually by the partner, in an effort to increase sexual aggression and domination.

“The wings of any individual will be structurally similar to an elongated hand, with the arm - particularly the shoulder - forming the connection between the finger-ribs of the wing and the greater mass of the body. Demons tend to have lighter bones, lighter builds, or pneumatized skeletons and muscles. It varies individually; what does not, however, is the erotic nature, both physically and culturally, of a Demon’s wings. They are heavily innervated, similar in scope to someone’s hands, or lips, and can pick up minor fluctuations in air pressure from something as simple as a house pet walking by or a leaf falling off a tree. Touching, stroking, and other forms of sensation play with regard to wings are very common and popular in Demonic society. For many, seeing a female in flight is often the most erotic sight one could think of; which, naturally, makes seeing a female Demon in flight somewhat rare. Female Demons are excellent flyers - outmatched only by specifically trained Fae.
“The tail consists of between nineteen and twenty three sutural bones, formed much like a cat’s. Demons use them mainly for balance and scent marking. During erotic play, the Demon’s tail becomes an erogenous and submissive vector; when grasped or handled, usually by the partner, sexual submissiveness tends to increase.

“Female Demons have human standard internal reproductive organs; however, half of the population is marsupial-typed, with a brood pouch covering anywhere from six to twenty four distinct nipples, each with their own group of dedicated milk ducts, usually on the abdomen above the womb and going to just below the breasts.

“The womb itself is lined with a special collagen-based webbing, or mesh. During intercourse, multiple orgasms are required to ‘prime’ this mesh, pumping it full of blood and internal fluids, readying it for implantation of fertilized eggs. When the male ejaculates, the heat of his ejaculate is what softens the mesh enough that fertilized eggs can implant on it.

“The clitoris is longer and wider than the world average, looking much more similar to the glans of a penis than to a Lanfolk woman’s clitoris; there is the tip, and then portions within the vagina, and encircling the entrance. It engorges when stimulated directly, when the Demon who has it is experiencing ovulation, and when certain environmental and physical factors are present. Clitoral sensitivity varies with age; younger Demons experience massive, overwhelming sensitivity, while adults report a much more nuanced variation. On average, the clitoris in Demonic females is between two and four centimeters wide and one to five centimeters high, with the most sensitive tissues located around the entrance of the vaginal canal and deep within, close to the cervix. Heavy pressure is almost always preferred as stimulation. The ‘g-spot’ in female Demons is usually located in the anus, not the vagina, and can be stimulated with tail massage or anal fingering.

“Demon vaginas are significantly muscular, with variations in ability to control the spasms and fluctuations in movement from individual to individual. Some Demons can insert and pulp apples; others can open pop-top soda bottles; and still others can break fingers. A Demon can also consciously control how much their vagina relaxes or contracts, thereby creating a wide variety of sensations when penetrated. Demonic females experience multizygosis, where both ovaries release at minimum two mature eggs per ovulation; non-identical twins and other groupings of multiple births are common.

“During certain times of year, or when exposed to certain external factors, female Demons will excrete an extremely slippery mucus from their vaginal canals. This mucus acts as a powerful aphrodisiac: in the mechanical sense, by creating a friction vector around the clitoris that is not normally present; and with scent, as the mucus produces a powerful odor likened to cheese or fermented fish, which male Demons have described as ‘extremely enticing’. This mucus also protects the vaginal canal from heat damage that could be experienced during the male ejaculation, as well as general friction damage.

“Male Demons have human standard penises, testicles, and so on; but, their prostate glands produce seminal fluid with a temperature between thirty two and thirty seven degrees celsius. The penis is often the same length or longer than the vaginal canal, with an erect width much wider than the vaginal canals standard relaxed width. When compared to other human males in the World average, Demonic males tend to be of greater length and girth, without exception.

The only texture on a Demonic penis is that provided by the natural exposure of the glans by the foreskin; the skin is very smooth overall, and generates low amounts of friction even under high speed. Demonic males find rhythmic squeezing the most stimulating when applied directly to the entire penis.

“The glans of a Demon is a very conductive vector for heat; while the penis itself is a surprisingly effective insulator. The ejaculate of a Demon male is not only hot, but exits the body with considerable force; empirical testing has shown that a young healthy male can ejaculate with sufficient force to break heat-safe glass.

“A male Demon, both physically and culturally, does not like ejaculating anywhere other than inside a living orifice; and, he cannot do so without express permission. However, if given enough time, and kept in an aroused state, a male Demon’s penis will heat a female’s vaginal musculature to exhaustion, causing them to relax enough that the male can physically ejaculate within her, permission or no. It is also for this reason that male Demons do not, as a whole, rape underaged individuals; physically immature individuals cannot create enough negative pressure inside themselves to allow the male Demon to ejaculate, which is considered the most relevant form of male power in Demonic society.

“Physical jostling, heat, and pressure are all required to relax the internal collagen mesh inside a female Demon womb. Sexual pleasure is required to relax the vaginal musculature enough for male ejaculation to take place. Male Demons have an instinctual knowledge of how best to please a receptive female partner, be they of their tribe or no.

“Anal play is heavily gendered in Demonic society, considered the meim of females only. However, males have fully working and surprisingly sensitive prostate glands; thus, anal stimulation is a popular, if occasionally fetishized, or illegal, practice. Wing play is less gendered, and almost normalized. While touching a female’s wings without permission is grounds for a duel, merely observing them has been heavily commoditized. Tail play is extremely intimate, and varies by individual preference.

“Breast fetishization originated with Demons, as their main method of nursing- ie, in the marsupial style- almost never requires the use of breasts directly. Thus, breasts came to be seen as an external sign of female reproductive maturity; and then, became sexual objects in and of themselves. Some individuals with breasts report enjoyment of erotic play involving them; others do not enjoy such erotic play, but will participate for the sake of a partner; while still others cannot participate at all, finding it acutely painful.

“Some Demons experience an overproduction of mucus or seminal fluid, which leads to hypersexualized lives- these Demons, sometimes called succubi or incubi, often turn to prostitution or multiple partners to sate their extreme sexual hunger,”

“...That explains a few things from my childhood,”

“Oh?”

“Mm. Like why my mother was hospitalized, for one thing… if there’s a tribe specifically suited for, um, high heat, there must be a tribe that’s extremely unsuited for it, aye?”

“Mink. Ah. Um. You were saying about how the adults either know and endorse the Legion, or no one’s said anything for decades…?”
“I mean- I don’t know. Maybe? The Germa 66 is weird, and the Fleet is even weirder; it wouldn’t surprise me. Certainly back then, for one reason or another, no adult that knew was doing anything about it.”

“Hm. Alright; so far, I understand. What the hell’s with the cartel, though?”

“So, I’d been running the peanut business for more than a year, and going at full capacity for maybe half of that year after a few false starts and the work it needed to really get going. The second year was expansion, first into the upper year schools in the area; then, into the full school district. In that time, I believe the Legion noticed me, but considered my efforts to be, well, small time; and then I coordinated with you,”

“Me?!? Wait, that time you- I remember this! The peanut selling thing!”

“Haha, yeah- when I started going international, because every school in the district had a sister school somewhere outside the fleet, and the people I had selling had friends in that sister school, well. It was about then that the Legion realized that not only was I cutting into their own profits for certain snacks, I had cut an entire unconsidered market out from under them. They scouted me out; and they formed a plan of action,“

“…”

“Pffft, okay, so they sent a group of students who sold a couple different types of crackers and chips and things, to make it seem like there was only that group and their organization wasn’t any larger than that, to corner me one day and tell me flat out to knock it off.

“They were pretty smart about it too, as I recall; they only tried to intimidate me in terms of business, because back then I had a bodyguard and everyone knew she wasn’t afraid to shed other people’s blood for my sake. Instead, they pointed out that I was new to this, that they were the ones learning this in class and that they knew what they were doing a lot more than me, that I should be focusing on my Royal studies instead, stuff like that, you know?”

“Uh huh,”

“And maybe it was true- I could have been focusing on my studies more but the business was going well, and I was making a lot of money, and I had a huge international market, and I was already doing well in class- not the top of the class, that was Ichiji, but he had to be top of the class so I didn’t let it bother me too much; and in training, well, nothing was going to fix that but time, so. I wasn’t going to drop it, just like that- I didn’t say that though.

“No, see, first they offered to buy my business from me; they’d pay some amount I’ve forgotten, and I could keep and do what I wanted with that in exchange for telling them where I got the peanuts and agreeing to let them have the ‘rights’ to sell them at this school, and I would just stop and not have anything to do with it again.

“I, politely, declined. It’s not like I could impolitely decline, of course, considering I couldn’t even land a solid hit on Yonji, the weakest of my older brothers at that time,”

“Hmm,”

“It’s over now, and I am better than I ever was before; and honestly? I don’t know how much money was on offer. For all I know, it could have been exorbitant in real life, not just to a seven year old boy. But… this thing I was doing, I was proud of it; it was one of the only things I had in my life I could be unequivocally proud of, even when we went back to the palace. Even then, it still went well- and so, I couldn’t just... back down, let it go, act like I’d never... I said no.

“I could tell they were unhappy with my choice as I was leaving, but I didn’t really think on it; not until their leader stopped me at the last moment. He started talking, and he said, well, ‘That’s your decision now, but really, we can’t have competition on this, especially not from you. We’re going to get your agreement eventually; nothing personal, just... well. Business. No one’s fault, really.’

“And then he paused, and smirked, and said ‘What was it they said? Don’t worry about it, right? Yeah, that’s it- don’t you worry ‘bout a thing, my Prince.’ -And then they all turned and walked away,”

“Holy fuck that actually happened!? I thought it was just a weird dream I had in my childhood,”

“No, it happened, and I wrote you a letter about it,”

“Gods be double damned,”

“Yeah, that was my reaction then, too, only all I had to curse with was lil’ baby demon swears- burn in hell like the testicles of the undevout, breaktail, and that sort of thing,”

“Hmhmhmhmph!”

“Hush. Anyway, that was just... so disarming. I had no idea how to react; and they just... walked away. And as weird as it was for you, imagine how weird it was for Beat, Sparks, and Spike, who were there in school with me.

“So. The Legion declared a quiet, passive aggressive war on me, and I had to act like nothing of the sort- like nothing at all, in fact- had just happened. As far as timelines go, this was right before I started experimenting with recipes you sent my way and I sent back my record of the various mishaps that came of flying too close to the Faesh sun,”

“ That’s when all this happened?”

“Yep,”

“Well- alright, what did you do in response to all that?”

“Well, the important thing you have to know is that my three older brothers, and my older sister, they were all in Frontline Combat track during our shared schooling years. I, personally, wanted the Trade track of Cooking, but my- He- refused to put me into the Trades, so I settled for, hm, Ambassadorial Combat track, which is fancy for ninjas and spies. So,”

“...Wait, wait, your sire expected you to match the physical skills of frontliners when you weren’t a frontliner yourself?”

“Yes,”

“Fucker,”

“Yes. Anyway, the first thing we did was stop selling immediately- had to figure out a plan of action, y’know. I mean, we knew there were other people selling things, but we didn’t have any evidence; and if the Legion knew what we were selling, they probably knew where we sold it, and when. If we kept going, they could easily report us to a teacher while we were selling, and then it was all over. The next day, Beat had me point out everyone I remembered as part of the group that confronted me to her as we were walking around the Caf at lunch.

“Beat was in Embassy Track because of her hearing. She’s a bit like Bryony, but her main attribute was range measured in point to point distance, not clarity and musicality. As I recall, she was either a Mink or a Troll- she had those big ears like Mince does? Anyway- once she had samples of sound to listen for, she could pinpoint those voices over a distance of something like three kilometers square, with descending clarity as her range from the target increased. Importantly, having something covering her ears didn’t degrade or improve her ability in any way.

“I showed her where they were sitting; and she could always hear their voices after that. They didn’t talk about it at the lunch table or anything, but she did manage to get their names- and then, while she kept an ear on them, the rest of us would do as much research as we could,”

“It’s amazing what you can find in public records,”

“It really is. So, that went on for a few days; the Legion didn’t talk to me, look at me, or do anything out of the ordinary- I remember us Embassy being impressed with their facade. It was like dropping a pan of hot oil and knowing it’s about to burn the shit out of your legs but it’s not splattered yet; and, what little we could find on them didn’t help. There were no rumors about them, and Beat didn’t report anything suspicious in their conversations- until, of course, the day it all changed,”

“...Well don’t leave it there,”

“Sorry, sorry- it’s just, Mab, if I had made different friends, if my- He- sire, had been more involved, if my brothers and sister had been closer, if Grandmere hadn’t… things almost didn’t turn out like they did, and it’s only sheer dumb luck that they did. So, one day, Beat went to a library a few blocks away from our school- she wasn’t following the Legionnaires I’d identified for her, she was actually there to return some music she’d borrowed. She was walking up to the library, headphones on but symphony ended, when she heard the voices of the Legionnaires, very faintly.

“Without missing a step or changing her gait, she continued, and the voices clarified- going from the barest edge of her range to well within it; and, as Beat returned her music and browsed for more, she counted. Twenty voices, she heard; all of them discussing me, and what to do about my interference-and one voice, the voice of the Leader said my name, reporting it to someone else,”

“Holy shit,”

“Beat gathered up new music, and continued browsing through the library- and when she went to the audiobook section, the conversation she was listening in on- changed. Like a switch flipping, the group seamlessly transitioned into talking about homework assignments and study plans. Beat didn’t miss a step or change her face- she continued into the audiobook section, got one on cricket, which was a well known hobby of hers, and checked her materials out.

“My theory about what happened is this: the Legion is almost absurdly cautious, more so than an Embassy-student run illicit organization could ever be- we were, after all, expected to fight when necessary. Instead of waiting for suspicion, like an Embassy student would, Legionnaires are preemptively careful to make sure that never happens. Tactically, they must have had one or several people set as, as lookouts, some sort of watcher, set around that library- whereby, if they saw any of their classmates, any of their teachers, even, even the maintenance and janitorial staff, they would be alerted and so could switch to an unsuspicious line of conversation quickly,”

“Should we be concerned about-”
“Nah. Really, it’s insane how lucky we actually got. There was such a specific chain of events that let us find out what we did, and with nearly anything else we wouldn’t have. The fact I was confronted; the fact that Beat had such good hearing and wasn’t listening to music and recognized their voices and wasn’t spotted until after she’d heard too much. If any of that had changed, she’d have never known anything; and if she’d let on she’d known at any point, we’d have been in trouble.

“If Beat had made any indication she could hear them, they’d have put two and two together- they knew we were friends after all. I… don’t actually know what they would have done, but it was undoubtedly good that Beat was able to recover the information she did,”

“…So this is becoming a novel,”

“Yeah?”

“Mm- I’ve been considering writing another one, after that one a few years ago…”

“Mm. Fine with me- I won’t tell you the real names though,”

“Fair. So- how’d you find out more after that?”

“Grandmere. By the time Beat relayed the information to the rest of us, we had maybe two months of school left. Obviously Beat redoubled her efforts in eavesdropping on the Legionnaires, but she didn’t find anything- until, that is, my Grandmere’s 78th birthday party. It’s always been her tradition to open the Seaward Palace to the public, and have all her family around her; and she always wanted her family to bring their friends and loved ones too. That year, I brought Beat, Spike, and Sparks with me to my Grandmere’s party.

“It’s always easy for people to forget that the Demonic Royal Line is one of service- most of the Line chooses to serve in the military, but all kinds of service are acceptable. Grandmere’s service was in business- specifically, before her rule, she dealt with a massive famine and economic bust by securing various work contracts- farming, mostly, which counted as her Service,”

“Mm. I see,”

“It’s a pretty even split in service- between the Trades, Business, and Military, I mean,”

“No Arts?”

“…Not in a few hundred years,”

“No interest?”

“No one made the cut,”

“Ah. Proceed,”

“Right. Well, my whole extended family comes for Grandmere’s parties- she’s the oldest still living relation, and the King Mother. But all of that isn’t important to our story- what matters is, hey, what if we asked Grandmere for answers on the off chance that this whole ‘Legion’ has been a thing for a while and she knows something about it?

“Well, Sparks suggested it, which was strange considering that he was basically born stoned. He did come up with it fair and square, it’s just- we were literally pretending to do our study group but actually arguing and trying to figure it out, and on the couch there he lounged and he just randomly blinked out of his normal stupor and said ‘why don’t you just ask your relatives when they come over for your Grandmere’s birthday.’ We all stopped and stared at him, because this was one of the most coherent sentences he’d said in weeks.”

“This is definitely becoming my next novel. What happened then?”

“When the time came, I invited them as my friends and very pointedly made sure to introduce them as school friends, so we could bring it up in conversation.

“Spike is alarmingly good at charming old people- specifically old ladies? Like, I have no idea how he learned the skill, or why he needed it, but he was chattering to my Grandmere- who, I must admit, was well in her cups, which was almost certainly part of it- and he lied, I think, because he said that when he was younger he had done a lot of entrepreneurial stuff at his pre-school and managed to sell a ton of things but of course it faded because, and I quote, ‘I must focus more on my Ambassadorial studies’- and had she ever done anything like that, maybe?

“And my Grandmere paused, and drained her cup dry, and leaned forwards and said, ‘I can’t tell you this, and if you say I told you, I will say that I didn’t and I will not be lying. But if, if, I were to have done something like that-‘ and then she told us everything. Later during that party, I got two other people to vaguely reference it; Oncle Vaughn and Aunt Jenny said there was a ‘group activity’ that a lot of the kids in the Business track ‘did together’, and that most of them had been doing it while they were there.

“Spike, though, hit the motherlode. Grandmere explained a general outline of the structure of the Legion as she knew it- and considering how well that structure worked, there was probably only the most minor shifting in the years since- and how they sold everything, how they made sure it went undetected; which, actually, I was wondering about because none of us had ever heard of stuff being sold at schools before, despite the fact that people were obviously buying. The answer is that they pay off people in other courses in other schools to casually sell stuff under the pretension of being a regular person looking to make a quick buck, and switch people around periodically so no one notices a pattern. Sometimes, they do it themselves, under a pretense of doing market simulations and research for an assignment.

“So, it ends up that people buy things, but no one ever realizes there’s any kind of organization. Of course, the entire Legion is extremely organized; with different branches for each snack or item they’re selling, and different people within the branch in charge of recruitment to sell, sales, stock, money, payments, pricing, marketing- everything. Most importantly- the majority of the sales weren’t even snacks. The Legion has distinct markets- M1, my market, was dominated by stickers and temporary tattoos and marbles, but everyone knew the best item was actually glitter. M2 was the middle schools- and for them, it’s perfume. M3 is the high schools- instant coffee.. M4, college, instant coffee. M5, grad school, instant coffee. M6, trade school, instant coffee. The biggest markets, therefore, were the high school, collegiate, grad school, and trade schools; as, a solid fifty percent of the total market, not to mention the more lucrative half, was just coffee or instant coffee,”

“Not totally unexpected for a school,”

“No. What was unexpected was that they also had a group of… they aren’t CEOs. Grandmere called them ‘Branch Commanders’; and it was actually a meeting of theirs that Beat first overheard- it had to be, nothing else would have given us the same information.

“So, Armed with this information, it fell to me- the only one among us passing Tactics and Strategy above a Pass/Fail- to Make A Plan. The First thing I decided, naturally, was to ensure that they could not report us to authorities without ensuring their own destruction. Beat had never heard anything from the conference room in the library again; so it fell to myself, Beat, Sparks, Spike, Acid, and Shimmer, who we recruited for this specifically, to wander the fleet and report to each other if we saw any of the Legionnaires Beat knew or thought were part of the Conspiracy. Once reported, Shimmer, Acid, and Beat did—audio-stalk, magic-stalk, and normal stalk the individual indicated.

“We did this with all the confidence and panache of people who’ve gotten way too invested in a preposterous situation. We got disguises and tracking spells and everything. It took three months to find another meeting, but we kept at it and found one; Beat, who by then was top ranked for Stealth, Evasion, and Tracking, managed to duck in close enough to record about five minutes of damning material while Shimmer kept watch and Acid caused enough of a distraction to their lookouts to make our operation all but guaranteed.

“Nothing they said that day was anything like ‘We are secretly running a buying, trading, and selling empire and make enough money off of selling things at school to fund a small war’ but it was certainly enough… well, everything they said that day would be deeply, deeply suspicious to anyone who heard it. What we had secured, together, was a very easy way to rat them all out if we needed to, and we also figured we could get more later—just in case, though, Shimmer somehow went and got a lot of blackmail, some pieces dating back several generations, for all the people at the topmost positions. I was, and remain, a little bit terrified of her;”

“Okay. Okay, actually, that’s pretty amazing— you conducted a full intelligence operation over the course of three months with six people or so. You weren’t even beginning to be taught about anything close to that in school, because you would have written me about it—”

“Absolutely,”

“And you still pulled it off really well. That’s impressive! What happened then?”

“We sent them a passive aggressive letter saying not to start any shit because we had all their numbers, and we started selling again,”

“Oh-kay,”

“Speeding things up from here: they were supremely enraged, because clearly no one had ever compromised their operations before, and they couldn’t figure out how we did it either. It was here I realized and informed my team that the teachers at least didn’t explicitly endorse what they were doing, based on how seriously they took our threat. If they had official support, they would have laughed the threat off; but they did not.

“For the next six months, the Legion and my group of upstarts, which they called the Feywild,”

“Oh my goodness gracious,”

“Yeah. So, from then on— I was insulted on your behalf, love, and, well, I was just… extremely passive aggressive about it for about the next two months of the semester. We glared at each other in passing, they demanded our stock lists, we laughed and declined to share, we said pointed things when the other was in earshot, they made offers, we rejected them, Sparks went straight up to one of the Legion and innocently asked if they wanted to buy some peanuts, a top-ranked Business student flipped all of us off… It was a wild time.

“We’d also decided to expand our market, and started selling a few other snacks— I made sure they were all weird or rare or extremely old fashioned snacks to make novelty Our Thing. And it’s not like we actually put the Legion out of business or anything, because they were still making money hand over fist—but, they were also used to being the only fish in the pond and we wouldn’t be removed, they could not be rid of us, and we both of us knew it. They seethed over that for ages.
“That’s how things stood for those two months; it was a golden time. I’m fairly certain they expanded as well, trying to dominate the market, but we made solid profits- we had a solid customer base by then, and they just could not dislodge us. Aunt Aquila was in stitches over the whole thing-apparently they’d tried the same thing with her, back in the day. And then the semester ended and I had to move back to Paris- lost my team, lost my lack of oversight, lost… nearly everything.

“Sorry for ruining the mood, but- honestly, nothing really changed. After I joined the bowling team-”

“Hmhmhmhm-”

“Hush. What actually happened because of my relocation was anarchy. Pure, glorious anarchy. See, the difference between where I was going and the school I went to in Paris was, and is-”

“Dorms. You went to a boarding school like me- the selling market is completely different, the market cycle is much more attuned to the school’s schedule, not the week-”

“Exactly. With the ability to hoard food, and the convenience of having a safe place for your stash- the market actually exploded. Demand skyrocketed because of the sheer convenience of being able to by stuff inside the school, and when demand increases so does supply- because everyone, after all, has some use for money.

“In the span of a few days into the new semester, people were buying food, giving it to their friends, charging money or favors, setting stuff up, jumping on the bandwagon- and flooding the market. See, the Legion was class locked, for the most part- and when I came in, selling my novelty snacks, suddenly everyone in my new posh school had to do the same. It was happening- a free market, there and then- and absolutely no one could stop it.

“Of course, neither the Feywild or the Legion liked this; it felt weird to be on the other side, actually- to be the established group that didn’t like the new people coming in… just. Mab, there were so many people; the market became unpredictable. At first, our sales went up- and then they went down- and then they were swinging like a drunk in a barfight, here, there, everywhere-

“People still bought from us- I got a new team at my new school, which was a whole other story I’ll tell you later-”

“Of course-”

“But the thing was, and I cannot express this enough- it was absolutely impossible to predict what was going to happen in the market next. Market Oracles went down with severe migraines every day- and… a lot of the new people were fucking incompetent fools. At the very least I had a system and people working with me; I had regulated prices and was careful to make sure our sales went smoothly, but these newbies… massive amounts of people just jumped in with no preparation, plan, idea of what to actually sell, nothing.

“People just casually selling or giving to their friends weren’t a problem- but so many other people looked at the Feywild and decided to copy our business model without actually understanding anything about it. And they were so bad at it- just, so very bad. I saw a guy just half-yelling advertising for his thing in broad daylight, in the hallway, when a teacher was right around the corner. A friend of mine had to basically tackle him so the teacher wouldn’t hear, and that’s when it really dawned on me that ‘oh my fucking fuck, these people are going to get us ALL caught. So, most of the first three months of our semester, when not doing school, was just wildly running around trying to keep things under control, secret, and- honestly? Maybe trying to kick and intimidate people out. See, the Legion had to have a veneer of civility, because they were business track and had to hold to certain ethical standards. Embassy track has no such restrictions; we literally were allowed to do just about anything to each other and other students. Most of us didn’t because the internal policing of Embassy students is extremely effective, but- well. Oh my gods, they’re going to get everyone caught, this chaos must be ended by these mighty fists.

“I had trouble just keeping my basic system of selling intact just because there were so many people around, and we were just so jittery that literally anyone could blow the whole thing at any minute. That’s how it was for the first three months of school. You follow, Mab?”

“I really wish I didn’t,”

“Well, good, because it gets worse,”

“Oh gods and goddesses, how?”

“Well. The Legion is facing the same problems as the Feywild; but the Legion wants to be rid of us all, and they realize that all the new people are copying us. So… the Legion redoubled their efforts to be rid of us. The former tense but stable peace had absolutely collapsed. Everything from before was still in place; we still had our paydirt, but the Legionnaires didn’t care. We were all making wild, snap decisions. ‘You can report us? Who cares, this’ whole operation might crumble at any minute! - Stop giggling, stoppit, this was serious business- well, anyway, they went straight for us,”

“Hmhmhmhmhmhm!”

“They didn’t try to report us because of vast aforementioned reasons, mostly a loss of face, but instead they threw everything they had at running us off. They recruited vast swathes of the newbies and made them work for the Legion; they got a huge chunk of the general population, Gen Ed, and then… they started buying our products and reselling them. At this point, the Feywild was a coalition across the entire fleet, all of us in careful contact with each other. In that moment, the Legion dealt us all a mighty, terrible blow,”

“Oh?”

“They resold our shit at cheaper prices, and to a much wider market-”

“Oh!”

“So sales exploded again briefly, and none of the Feywild were suspicious until a few days in, but by then the Legion had gotten all they needed. Feywild sales tanked. Most people weren’t aware that the Legion existed the way it did and does, and of course those fuckers lied and said they were just a group of people fed up with our mean, mean business policies. And, as the Feywild was totally public about selling stuff to students as an organization, and because we had tried to push some people out, it was easy for the Legion to paint us as the villains,”

“Damn,”

“Yeah. If we had been adults, in real business, there would have been political cartoons and way more fires. Anyway- the Legion started reselling Feywild products, and our sales tanked. We couldn’t figure out who their supplier was- who was buying from us and giving it to them, or even reselling to them, and we couldn’t block everyone or stop selling entirely because that’s what they wanted. So… stalemate,”

“What did you do?”

“Before I answer that, I need you to completely understand the situation and my resources. We- I had been in this rivalry with the Legion for a good two years, and they wanted my business destroyed, and they were close to doing it. We hadn’t been making any sort of real profit for a month because of the chaos the new people caused, and we were constantly on edge waiting for the other shoe to drop and for one of the Newbies to get us all caught. The Legion had convinced everyone else in the know in the school system both that they didn’t exist and that the Feywild were the bad guys. Our products were being stolen and used to force us out of business.

“Mab, I was- and am- a prince. If I want something you could get at a Daiso, I literally just had to ask a servant to make it happen, and it would happen.

“I absolutely fucking snapped.

“So. First, I got a typewriter and a mimeograph machine, to make copies; and then, I wrote some instructions and copied them out. Then, of course, I asked one of the servants to procure for me an ungodly amount of instant coffee as soon as possible, a number of shipping boxes, and the necessary outbound mail materiel. When my friends at school asked me, the next day during our study session, what we were going to do- at three pm on a throughsday- I just looked at them and said ‘Do you have any idea how much instant coffee I can get on short notice?’

“And they all blinked. So, I showed them- wall to wall, floor to ceiling, my garage, which had been empty because Fa- He- refused to gift me any sort of vehicle, so. My garage was full of instant coffee packets in their stock boxes.

“I explained the main source of the Legion’s profits- and by then, the Feywild were in every level of the school system. And then I asked my friends how much of the lower level things they could get on short notice- stickers, glitter, small toys, and so on- and one of them, who had a lot of money saved up for no good reason, said ‘A lot’. And I said ‘Good’.

“And one of my friends said ‘I can get all this into the fleet mail system without rousing suspicion,’ and I said ‘Good.’

“And one of my friends who wasn’t particularly good at putting things together said ‘What’re we going to do?’ and I said ‘Instant coffee is their biggest seller market-wide. We’re going to flood their market at prices they can’t beat,’

“Like I said: I fucking snapped. It was a long time coming, though,”

“This book is going to fucking slap, I swear it,”

“Things happened quickly after that; we spent many a good afternoon, after finishing our homework, packing instant coffee with my instructions and mailing it off. We poured blood, sweat, and hours of paper cuts into the effort; it was now or never, our last ditch effort to throw a handful of sand into the eyes of the Legion.

“There was one stumbling block. My plan, after all, wasn’t to sell the coffee- because that would become another Sales War. No, we had to push the coffee on the good students of the Fleet, for free or close enough, overload the paying public with it- until no one, absolutely no one, would ever dream of buying it when they had so much already. To spread coffee that thoroughly, the Feywild would need help. So- whomst did I get?

“The Trades, of course- known as the Squints and the Drovers. The Legion already had the help of Gen Ed; so, the Feywild allied with Support and Logistics to balance the scales of fate,” “Symbolic. Though, I can’t help but hear the implication that the Legion was a pack of-”

“No time for that shit, lunch is in, like, half an hour; I went to the leader of the Squints and the Drovers, explained the whole situation, and negotiated for their help. I wanted them for two reasons, really- just to have more people distributing the coffee and more creative ways of distributing it, and because we had a two-pronged approach. Mab, tell me- what’s the one thing students want more than food?

“...Effective cheating methods?”

“No... SHRIMP!”

“-no no no- shit! Chef?”

“Deborah, what’s the one thing students want more than food?”

“Cool shit that makes it easier to live your best life,”

“Exactly. Many of the people in the Squints were fully capable of making the good shit- mechanized pencil cases, extensive organizers, fancy fountain pen ink, snail cases that protected better, snail rigs that reached farther across the fleet, higher quality shellbum-players, shellbum cases, and headphones with and without microphones. They’d already made most of it for their own use, and could definitely make more- and a repair service? They could do that in class for extra credit.

“While the Squints helped us spread the coffee, they’d make the cool shit. We’d get distribution rights, as well as a small cut of the profit for giving them the idea. In exchange for their time and used materials, we’d also help them test or develop some of their more... esoteric items. My coup de grace, my crowning glory- that was what I did with the Drovers. See, this entire thing relied on discretion- if the Legion knew what was being sent, they’d come up with some way of stopping us. But if the Drovers took over the in-school mail duties... they’d also earn extra credit, and they’d get discounts on cool shit. And the Legion wouldn’t know what the Feywild had done until it was far, far too late.

“The plan was to destroy the Legion’s main seller, while at the same time debuting another unique series of products, the source of which we had a monopoly on, and the distribution of which we controlled. We were ready,”

“...How’d that go?”

“Mab, it was beautiful. We started in my school, stocked the upper year dorm kitchens with it. And then we stocked the actual official offices with it too, as a ‘gesture of kindness’. The Vice Principal called bullshit because she always did; the Nurse was deeply touched. We started handing it out on the College and Tower quads. We left a stack of packets by the breakfast and lunch lines at Trade Schools. In a meeting with the Squints, the Drovers, and myself, an idea for something called ‘Instant Coffee Day’, wherein people gave instant coffee to their friends, was hatched.

“We made flyers for it- well, after asking The Marshal, leader of the Gravedust, permission to do that. He gave us a smile and, I swear, he most definitely knew all the shit us students were up to- I don’t know about any of the other teachers, but he knew. Anyway, on the day in question, we gave coffee to all the teachers- that includes the nurse and the VP, and even the Marshal- and everyone else we knew who actually would drink instant coffee.

“My- He called bullshit, but He always called bullshit. Oncle Vaughn and Aunt Jenny were deeply touched.

“We just kept giving out the coffee, virtually shoving it down people’s throats, leaving piles of it on random tables in cafeterias in graduate schools. My joy for business died- but my plan worked so fucking well. It played out perfectly. For five weeks, no one bought instant coffee at all- I actually had people in various branches of the Feywild check all through the fleet, no one was buying any coffee for any reason in five whole weeks. The Legion was panicking.

“Then we started selling the cool shit. That went great too; and we only had to wait about five days before the Legion- Head Active Legionnaire of the Germa Fleet, Commander Ten, came to me, Flight Leader of the Feywild, Holly Golightly-”

“Hah!”

“Shush. Never let it be said that the Legion doesn’t know how to cover it’s own ass, or adapt to a changing market- they offered to form a cartel with us,”

“You know, I’d actually forgotten about that,”

“I knew I had them dead to rights- but Commander Ten spun their argument well. A cartel is basically when multiple companies come together and agree to set the same prices so they can act as a monopoly, and, you know, adjust those prices as much as they want. Since the start of all of this, the thing the Legion wanted most is to get rid of their competitor organizations and have their monopoly again. Since the start, what I’d wanted most was just to have a good saleable product, to be left alone to sell my aunt’s peanuts and novelties in peace. Commander Ten suggested forming a cartel to fix that for both of us.

“We both of us knew, of course, that this was just a tactic to save their asses because the Feywild had backed them into a corner, but never let it be said that the Legion doesn’t look after it’s own interests. They value profit over pride, and we’d fucked up enough of their profit that it became easier to join us, rather than fight us. Then, after we formed the cartel we destroyed the majority of the other groups who were selling in the Fleet districts to maintain our power,”

“Gotta have a monopoly for the cartel to work,”

“Quite. When I left, there were five groups- the Feywild, the Legion, Artist Collective, Gamblingerers, and LogSupport, which separated and formed their own group after paying the Feywild a big severance fee. That’s what happened, really- so far as I know, at least,”

“...Why weren’t there more magical items on sale?”

“Lack of product and worker placement,”

“I see. What’s for lunch today?”

“Soup, salad, and fresh bread- it’s a bit cold, still, so I was thinking bean soup?”

“I like the sound of that,”

“Maaaaaaab-”

“Yes, Captain?”

“How come you tell everyone else stories but never me?!”
“You never ask or hold still long enough to listen,”

“Oh. Tell me a story, Mab,” “Allright. This is the story of the time my Aunt Medjool Menaced a Cherry Tree with a Baseball Bat So Hard It Bore Fruit Out of Season; there’s also a side of Aunt Medjool menacing cityfolk relations with giant corn, because it’s that kind of story. Remind me to tell you the one about the fireworks and bison.

“For the Full Context, understand how my Aunt Medjool- actually a cousin to my mother- and her side of my family got to Fairisle in the first place. Prior to 917, that branch was all farmers of limited success that migrated from county to county, trying not to starve or run afoul of the county-King, until a covey of the Morgans heard that they could be shoveling shit in Pumpkin Hill, then quite a Wild stretch of land. It had the added bonus of being very far away from the people they owed money to, as well as being too dangerous for the Bank’s Repomen to follow you into.

“Thus, that whole branch of Morgans fucked off to Pumpkin Hill, and made a fortune in the horse-raising business in the middle of nowhere during the Great Depression of the First Eon. Despite their newfound comfort in the upper-class, they never actually gave up farming, and having a pair of glowing green thumbs was and still is a point of pride in my family. So, when Aunt Medjool moved out to the Nokken Reaches, specifically to the Thule River Valley, which is where an absurd percentage of the finest cherry trees in the world are grown because it’s full of probably the world’s most perfectly fed-and-graded soil for cherry tree cultivation, Aunt Medjool had to continue the tradition and set up a garden out back of her house.

“She planted various crops and flowers in January because fuck you, Ultima Thule’s seasons are on a year-to-year system, not actually seasonal; and she invited my mother, Harry, and her growing brood of children, out to visit.

“We went out in July, to escape the city humidity and the fetishization of butter for a time, when the corn is typically getting to be around knee-height if things are going well. Aunt Medjool spent a long time asking how things were back on the farm, plying them with ice tea and her lethal Devil’s Kiss cookies, before politely inviting Mother and I out back to see how her patch was doing- oh, it’s not much really, just a bit of a laugh for me and the boys-

“I stared in fascinated aw at the nine-foot corn which was already showing fruit in it’s blades because it’d been going since New Year’s. At the watermelon plant that had taken over the side yard and had unripe fruits hard as stone the size of my chest; at enormous cucumbers and vibrantly green lettuces and a trellis of roses with scents so overwhelmingly powerful, my eyes still water just thinking about them. There were a few moments of awed silence from myself, my brothers, and Mother.

“Fuck you, Medjool.’ Mother said eventually, before bursting into raucous laughter. The rest of the visit was a pleasant diversion, and Auntie M even taught me how to make her Devil’s Kiss cookies- I’ll tell you after the story, Love,”

“Thank you,”

“The following spring, Aunt Medjool received a package from Ultima Thule, specifically a small cherry tree with a note saying, ‘With Love, Harry.’

“I knew better than to engage in such jackassery, because this is Faesh agrarian passive aggressive Bullshit at it’s absolute finest. ‘Sure, you can do corn; any asshole with good exposure can do corn. Try this fussy cherry varietal instead, fucko,’ is a more accurate and honest translation of what my Mother had sent my Aunt.
“Aunt Medjool, not about to be intimidated by a mere tree, planted that bastard in the front yard and proceeded to pamper the little shit—bloody bones, roasted bones, bone meal and blood fertilizers, a brand-new irrigation system, the works. Hell, she would go out sometimes and talk to it. The tree, of course, thrived, and flowered, and she borrowed one of my beehives to make absolutely Certain that it got pollinated, because she was going to mail cherry preserves to Harry for Yule, that absolute shithead.

“That autumnal season, Aunt Medjool received a letter from Harry, asking after a couple of paragraphs of circumnavigating, how that tree she sent was doing?”

And here, I pause, to sigh and make the exact face I know my Aunt made that day. How do I know this? I was there when she made it.

“Aunt Medjool got up, made herself a Daiquiri and drank it, picked up my baseball bat from where it was leaned against the wall, and walked out to the front yard to have a Discussion with the Cherry Tree.

‘I’ve just received a letter,’ she explained, waving a rage crumpled paper at the tree. ‘Asking me when you’re going to fruit, like. I think I’ve held up my end of the bargain involved in being your caregiver, so it’s time to provide. D’you understand? This spring, if you do not start fruiting, I will take personally take this stick-’ she said, waggling my baseball bat in the air, ‘to your vital regions and reduce you and them and all of it to kindling.’ She then stepped quite close to the tree, sticking her face near the trunk as though whispering—hissing—into it’s hypothetical face, for it’s ears alone to hear.

“Do not test me, you shitty twig.’

“The next week, and every year after, that tree bloomed out of season— and by February, it had set an obscene amount of fruit, which Aunt Medjool kept the best of as seed stock, turning the rest into preserves which were sent off with me to school and mailed back to Fiddler’s Green. Those preserves were some of the most delicious, most sweet, most cherry-flavored preserves I have ever had the pleasure of making myself sick on when the homesickness became too much for me. They tasted of summer days, and blistering heat— the cool spring waters on my Aunt’s ranch and the smell of clean, dry hay. Nothing, and I do mean nothing, could ever compare— excepting, perhaps, the Cherry Cider that she made the next year,”

I pause, to take in my audience— general interest, most of which is coming from Solitaire. I scrunch my face, and I glance at the Suntides, because this is going to tickle them the most—

“The tree my mother, Harry, sent my Aunt Medjool was a Merrow Cherry. Primarily used as shade and ornamental trees since antiquity, the Merrow Cherry tends to produce fruit that is too sour and small to be palatable to the human tongue, or worth human cultivation— birds tend to like them, though. The specific cultivar my Mother sent my Aunt was one of the extremely ornamental ones— it was supposed to flower profusely, but never fruit.
“They’re mostly planted in residential areas, or business areas that require a very lively sort of atmosphere- extremely high class brothels in Ryugu Mergyo tend to use Merrow Cherry trees as a sort of, hm, mascot. Merrow babies are weaned, traditionally, by use of the Merrow Cherry juice- as I said, it’s very sour, but crucially will do no true harm to a babe.

“They tend to be small, bright pink cherries with little orange, yellow, or white speckling near the stems. I say again- Merrow Cherry trees are meant for shade and ornamentation. They do not tend to produce fruit that is in any way edible, and the baby tree my mother sent my Aunt was never supposed to bear fruit.”

The Suntides have expressions of pure shock and awe on their faces- they understand what I’m trying to say.

“My mother intended to tell my Aunt Medjool this fact on her deathbed, or more likely in a letter sent long after her death, as this was her idea of a funny joke. She became so enraged when Aunt Medjool mailed the cherry preserves that she very nearly started a Feud- as she wrote, in an actual letter, accusations of chicanery and falsity-and, of course, she said that my Auntie M’s corn was skinny, sour, and probably fake as well. Aunt Medjool was furious and sent back pictographs of the tree and the corn to show that SHE WAS NOT FAKING IT, THANK YOU VERY MUCH HARRIET, and Mother accused her of gluing store bought cherries to the tree, and on, and on, and on. This went on for several years and got increasingly bitter and nonsensical, until, at last, the entire family was gathered at my Aunt Medjool’s ranch.

“And there it was- haloed in moonlight at three in the gods be damned morning, all of us fresh of the train and my Mother in a high, fuming dudgeon- and the tree itself? Flourishing, with a number of smaller children arrayed around, and festooned with thousands of fruit. Come morning, when the fruit did not fade as Illusions do, my Aunt Medjool- in clear view of my Great Aunts and Granuna and Nanelpe, for the sake of veracity- showed my Mother the godsdamned tree, with the real fruit it was actually growing, THANK YOU VERY MUCH HARRIET.

“My Mother very nearly argued with Harriet about it, but Granuna threw a forty of rum at her head and said ‘If I hear one more godsdamned word about this fucking tree, I will check and make sure that you really are my daughter.’ It’s funny what can be a death threat, at the ass-end of the morning when no one wants to be awake but there’s too much work to be done to crawl back into bed…

“This was the last time my Mother was particularly sane- she never was entirely sane, but this was the last time she was in any way reasonable. I have a good relationship with that side of my family, even now- and it was my Aunt’s gift of cherry pie as consolation for my Mother’s death that made me laugh again, ere her passing. Oh, and of course- we had to move that orchard after some trouble with the IRS, and wouldn’t you know it? That tree is still fruiting, same as always,”

“...You don’t have anything lighter, Mab?”

“Not today, Captain,”

“Really?”

“Sorry, Luffy. I honestly thought it’d be funnier,” Here’s something interesting most people don’t know: the ability to pick up and put out signals into the atmosphere, commonly used by Transponder Snails or Den Den Mushi (same thing, TS is more common in Wes and Nort Blue, while DDM is more common in Est and Sout,) is an ability mimicked by Interference Snails (White DDM), Refraction Snails (Black DDM), Skybourne Eels, Crystal Crabs, and- interestingly for my purposes- trash you can get out of a midden in a small village. Or you can be born with it, if your mother was exposed to enough iron during her pregnancy and you have a shocking number of iron and semi-precious crystals in your skull, like me...

The major difference for all of these methods is range, and signal quality. It’s like an echo- bounce the signal too many times, it starts to degrade.

An adult Transponder Snail is able to receive and give signals to an entire Island, which on average is about 731 square km; a baby TS can do an entire city; Interference TS’ can block signals for about an hour on average, while Refraction Snails can only pick up one signal at a time; Skybourne Eels require a large number to handle the load of a single conversation; Crystal Crabs have the superior speaking ability, but almost no range worth mentioning; and as for the trash…

Let’s talk about usage, for a moment. Most people have at least seen a Transponder Snail, if not used one- there are TS’ booths meant for public usage in most major cities, and it’s a very small village indeed that doesn’t have at least one person with a TS in their keeping. Transponder Snails don’t actually require a rig of any kind to speak snail to snail- however, without the rig, the snail in question is usually limited to it’s own egg group, that is to say, it’s direct family- descendants, antecedants, hatch mates, and so on. The Transponder Rig is built to work around the snail’s natural signal encryption- which is a very weak, yet very effective, method.

Most consumer goods meant for office work use Transponder Snails as a base- fax machines, for example, are used World-wide to send documents that must be secure.

Skybourne Eels, on the other hand, is more my area of expertise- I got into music, and the Revolution, and of course, Crystal Crabs, on a whim- but the Eels… they chose me, really.

To start with, it’s important to know that in most sufficiently ‘advanced’ societies, there are things called Mechanical Calculators. They’re more complicated than abacuses, and they can do more complicated mathematics; I’m considering getting Fern one for her birthday because I know there exists one that does logarithms. Let me see- where’s the article…

Right, so. Fast and complicated calculations are what happens when you’ve got lots of fiddly bits of data moving very quickly- markets, a high level star-chart, navigation at high speed- you need a machine that isn’t fallible like the human mind is, that can also, you know, do the thing you need done, and quickly.

It is someone’s entire job to correctly calculate and operate using one of these machines. Once you’ve gotten that squared away, well- it’s only natural that you might want to share information, between secure locations, of course. You’ve got computers, and their adding machines- but it sure would be useful if those computers in their secure locations could talk to each other without the possibility of interception…
Thus begins the history of the InterNet. Initial concepts of a wide area networking system originated in several computer science laboratories in the Faesh Unified Coalition, Ryugyu Mergyo, and the Germa Fleet—specifically France. The Faesh Department of Offence awarded contracts as early as the 960’s, including for the development of the ARPANET project. The first message was sent over the ARPANET in 969 from computer science Professor Leo Cleanrock’s lab at FaME to the second network node at Ohara Research Institute (ORI).

Packet switching is a method of grouping data that is transmitted over an Eel network into packets. Packets are made of a header and a payload; think of it like… like mailing a letter. The information on the outside of the envelope tells the mail carrier where the payload— the letter— needs to be sent, and where it’s from. That information also tells the receiver at the destination who—or what—is supposed to extract the payload and use the information within. Networks for packet switching are the basis of the modern Postal Service; and the development of internetworking, in which multiple separate networks are joined into a network of networks, is the basic principle by which all modern Devices work.

Technically speaking, I’m one of the Administrators for the Network that governs magic as a system; there are things set in place that regulate the massive natural flow of magic, and I’m one of the people in the World, currently living, who can change the parameters of those regulators. The Eels chose me, I think, because I was… open? To the sound.

Eels are this planet’s weirdest, most mysterious creatures—moreso than Sea Kings and Sky Queens, those are extraterrestrials; no one’s entirely sure what eels are.

The first time I spoke to an eel, more than twenty years ago, I wasn’t expecting it. It swam down out of the mist around Floria during one of the few Bright days, when I was still just a little feather-brat and hadn’t—well. I was sat on a friendly Cherumb’s grave, which I had gotten into the habit of lingering near because the Automata guarding it knew me, and knew that I just wanted to sit somewhere quiet for a good long while, what with the orphanage being so loud.

It’s funny— one of the few things Mab can’t talk about, I can. Being born of a Fairy Egg means that you remember what you were, and what you weren’t—and what you would have been, too, had you been born with a soft shell inside a mother. I remember growing up in Floria, the orphanage, the guards who were kind and the shopkeepers who weren’t; how and why I ended up in Water 7, in the company of Mark and Taffy, as well. I also remember being a simple Smackclaw crab, wandering the shore, delighting in each new find of seaweed and kelp; and I remember being a simple Transponder Snail, unworried about the meaning of the signals I heard, repeating them all the same.

Mark remembers growing up in a vast City of Brass; the cutthroat politics of the Djinn and his eventual choice to leave his home, leave his kin—leave everything he knew—to try and find some measure of peace, some place where he only ever had to be himself… Mark remembers being a boat too weak to sail across the sea her beloved crew pointed her towards.

Taffy remembers being the youngest of three; of surviving the fever that took her parents and her sister, of having her older brother—nearly a man, then—being unable to look her in her face, she took after them so. She remembers going to a school for opera, and ending up a clown; she remembers finding her sword in the desert, after a ghost had finally been laid to rest. Taffy also remembers being a centipede, her days no more than the eat, sleep, fuck, repeat repeat repeat of that kind; she remembers being a cloud fox, loyal unto death should she have a mate and protective of whatever kits may come, and wholly concerned with her own survival otherwise.
But how, one might ask, can all those pasts be true? I reply: those pasts are as true as they need to be, for me to make sense of myself- or my friends to make sense of themselves.

So. I met the first eel, Spicy, in Floria, as a child; on a day like any other, in a place where destiny, to be frank, usually took a nap before deciding that finding it’s Fated Champion was quite a lot of work, honestly, and giving up. I, being an orphan, was relieved of the burden of choice- I had no family to support, no Dream to follow, no Ambition that would be squandered by Fate coming to find me.

In addition to many strange adventures on the way to Water 7 that had nothing at all to do with any sort of prophecy, preordained fate, or Mysterious Destiny; I was the one to lay a ship of ghosts to rest, and I was the one to rout a Kraken from a harbour, and I was the one who found a woman’s child, and eventually- before I had even left Floria at all- I met Spicy, the eel. It is no exaggeration to say that the choosing of a Gamayun Mossa- the Wandering Leaders of the Syreene- is a Mysterious Mystery. I don’t know what the criteria are, or how the eels know which child is Worthy and which is not- only that they do, and they are, and the children that put themselves forward as choices without being Worthy pay the penalty with their lives.

Before that moment, eels- and their Mysteries- were slimy, mysterious, dangerous creatures; not snakes, not birds, not amphibians nor good red herring. And further- what would an Eel, harbringer of Fate, Destiny, Mystery- what would they want with an orphan birdlette, unwanted because of her untamable strength and impossible hearing? Certainly no Syreene did; and, at that time, I truly looked like an ordinary child of the Sea Bird people.

The Syreene name for Skyborne Eels is Unagi; they’re as long as a tall man’s arm, and maybe double thick as a man’s cock. The legends of Syreene’s engaging in carnal relations with eels is a fetishized mess- while there is a ritual involving insertion of a live eel into someone’s vagina or anus, it’s not for sexual pleasure. Quite the opposite, in fact- Sirins are bound against having children or any carnal relation until after their service has been completed, and the eel, once introduced, remembers the Sirin in question. Once a Sirin swears their Oath, they are bound to keep it- and should they falter, even once, (though only of their own accord,) the eel will keep their Oath (and offending body part) for them. The Sirin in question usually doesn’t live through that part.

Fae live through lives marked with blood, Oaths, honor, and magic; yet somehow, every person I’ve ever met, every story I’ve read, it’s always the Oaths and honor and magic they want to talk about. The Blood’s the most important thing. Maybe they’re just squeamish? Eels aren’t squeamish; and, being inducted to their Mysteries, neither am I.

There’s never more than a hundred thousand total Sirins in Floria at the same time- even now, with a proper Island underfoot, the old law still stands. There’s just not enough room for all that aggression in one country- get too many Sirins together in a Floria summer, well, blood flies and heads roll.

Being Chosen of the Eel has perks- for one thing, after my body got used to the Boon, I never once got a pimple, and I recover from sunburns and windblisters much faster than anyone else. Chopper said that my skin is particularly oily, rich in vitamins A and E; I’ve got a nose for omega-3 fatty acids, as well as certain fruit-based antioxidants. And no one- absolutely no one, not even Mab though she comes close, can beat me for stamina during our landfalls on Summer Islands.
Syreenes- Sea Birds- actually come from the Kappa, not the Merrow. When the Kappa fled from their original homeland, now contested in ownership by the Long-Arms and the Long-Legs, there was a serious internal schism. About half the original nation went on to conquer Coral Island, which became Ryugyu Mergyo; the other half stuck to their wandering flotilla, with the half-thought idea to one day ‘reclaim the mother-land’ or something like that. Eventually, enough generations were born in the flotilla, then the fleet, that reconquering some nebulous homeland no one had ever even seen, much less could find anymore- well.

We picked the Florian Triangle for a number of reasons- mostly, we picked it because no one else wanted it. A coral reef known for wrecking ships, thick banks of mist and fog, and doldrums wasn’t by any means prime real estate- thus, if we took it, and made it our own, not only would no one bother taking it from us, if they did, they certainly wouldn’t be able to keep it.

Technically, physically, I’m a Seafolk- Fishwoman. Sort of. Basically, there were three main family lines that broke off from the other five, with another that followed a while after- Rostrata, Anguilla, and Jamonica, with Aeoboria following our alliance with the great Queen, Ariel. Over the thousands of years, those four lines have intertwined enough that the basic Syreene build is very, very different from the basic Fishperson build, even if at a distance you could say that we’re both Fishpeople. Technically, we are- but truthfully? We aren’t.

Fishpeople tend to be very large- and I know Taffy knows the particulars of our genitalia, but that doesn’t matter so much as this: Fishpeople don’t lay eggs. Syreenes, unless impregnated, do. There’s some other stuff, about a major size and shape difference- Fishpeople tend to be a full head higher in either gender, but with much more lithe figures comparatively- but honestly? Syreenes lay eggs- all the Bird people of the Fae lay eggs, instead of menstruate. Yes, really.

How do I know it’s not just me?

Taffy lays three to eight large, bright turquoise-green eggs, about four times a year. It happens every three months or so, and she’s dedicated to tracking this particular cycle of her body.

Preparations for this are actually not terribly much- a basket to catch them, a towel so they don’t break on impact, something for her to crouch over or against while she works… and an enema, because the gyrations her womb undergoes are powerful and there’s nothing a Fae person hates more than uncontrolled body waste.

The enema she handles the days leading up to what I think of as the main event; and then, I start working with her. It starts with fifteen straight minutes of me rubbing her clit, and then (with her enthusiastic permission) I get to hold her legs open and watch as the green eggs push out of her peony-colored depths and the thick black hair that hides such sweet secrets damps down with sweat, watch her face grit with determination and her eyes roll back in her head as the mixture of pain and aching pleasure overwhelm her senses. Her wings push and thrust and wrap around me and her whole body arches with each egg that passes through some deeper place I’ve never seen- a doorway, I read it described, to the womb.
Sometimes, when she’s tired and she’s pushed out a very large clutch, all I can do is rock her a bit and kiss her sweaty brow and blush smilingly as she weakly broadly smiles back and digs her fingers sharp as claws into my hair and drags me down to kiss.

This time- and it’s only happened once before, it’s very very rare- this time, one of her eggs is too big, or maybe turned wrong. I can see the great lump of it pushing up against the skin of her womb, the sudden jerk of her hips can feel the sharp twitch and quiver of her thighs watch as her lips and her face and her eyes redden and overflow with maddening sensation.

“Ffuah, Gurry- Gurry it’s stuck-”

“Don’t worry, I’ll help you-”

“NnnnnNNNNNNNNNNNNNNNNNAAAAAHH AH AH-”

Taffy is not particularly quiet during her time of the month, and Gurry is Into It. As for Mark and Mab: Mark could at any time end up laying eggs instead of menstruating. I think it’d mortify him, but it’s still something that could happen. Mab… no. Not without a conscious decision.

As for me, I’ve got a strong enough pelvic floor that the problem isn’t getting them out, it’s getting them out intact. At least mine are softshell- but there’s nothing worse than a yolk-stain to get out of a pair of panties, the fats bind right to the cloth and only a good scrubbing with soap before it’s set in will really get it all out…

Anyway, in recent decades, the population of Syreenes has been… heavily controlled, due to the lack of viable- common parlance would have me call it nesting grounds. Basically, every Syreen wants a specific sort of area to nest, or settle down and have kids, in. As far as Tribes go, if the Syreen in question is of the gregarious, convivial, or social clan, they’re uniquely suited for city life. The more powerful the Syreen, the less suited they are for inclusion in a society-like structure- the powerful, solitary Sea Witch of folklore is very common for a certain sort of Syreen, simply because more than half of all Syreenes are powerfully introverted.

I’m different, in that I’m a Goose-type; meaning, I need some sort of family group to truly be content, I am very physically powerful, I am a water bird, and I take the defense and protection of my dependants very seriously.

It also means I’m particularly skilled at Hearth Magic, which is a bit embarrassing seeing as I don’t actually know any spells or rituals meant to keep a house. I do, however, have a notebook- nothing fancy, it came from a five pack of spiral bound notebooks meant for note-taking and not much else- and in that notebook I’ve been writing, well…

They aren’t really spells, I think. Mostly they’re ideas- little things to make life just a bit nicer. A potion to make tangled hair easier to brush out; a spell to keep mugs at the right temperature longer; a spell that dries out socks, even while you’re wearing them- even though I don’t wear them…

I actually know a lot of mathemagic. I have to- there’s actually a lot of mathemagic involved in Communing, even if it’s all encoded. More importantly… well, all Syreenes get inducted to the Weather Corps. It’s a national law; I, personally, wasn’t quite one of the best, and I never had the heart for it, but I did keep up my Fog License just in case… And of course, I kept my sleeping schedule.

Because Floria wasn’t a natural Island, it didn’t have its own weather systems; we, the Syreene of the Floating Island, had to make it ourselves.

“Excuse me, Doctor Trafalgar- I heard you the other day, when you asked Chopper about my sleeping habits. I can explain them, if you’d like?”

“Oh… sure, Bryony-ya,”

“Well. The first thing you need to know is that for the last several thousand years, the Syreenes haven’t actually had an Island to call home. We had a Floatilla- a Floating Island- instead. Floating Islands can be many things, but there are a few key faults they always have. First, and most important to my people- Floating Islands don’t have magnetic fields,"

“Uh,”

“…Consider Punk Hazard. Mechanically, it wasn’t attached to the ground- and by that I mean, after a certain point, it did not fully touch the Sea Floor. If it had, it would have developed a magnetic field of some sort. It didn’t.”

“Oh. So… what does that have to do with your sleeping habits?”

“…Well. The first thing you really need to know and understand- and I do mean that seriously- is that Haki and Magic are the same thing, and all things that are Real have one or the other, or usually both. Floating Islands aren’t quite Real enough to have the same kind of Haki or Magic as an actual Island- that’s why their particulars are often so forgettable. Tell me; before it’s destruction, what was Punk Hazard like?”

“Uh-”

“Did it have a particular smell? A sound? A color or texture? A Voice?”

“…”

“Flvnc did. I know it did, because you still echo with it- a poison in your bones and a scream locked in your throat, fire and broken cities in your eyes. A white city, and a shallow sea that went for five kilometers out; you could walk the whole thing in between high tides, if you had the nerve for it; the silver city, all in black and blue and white, ever the white, and it’s harbor so shallow a man of your height could wade it’s entirety with his head well above water. In that city that shone with all the lights, all through the world, there was a college, and the finest doctors in the world were trained there; you were trained there-”

“Enough. That’s- enough,”

“… Floria, too, has a Voice. A city made of graveyards and brooding houses, leaning on each other. Art in every corner, wrapped around every post and pole; skulls and hearts and birds, so many birds, flowers too, all of them watching through the mist. A mist that distorted everything- every sound, every color, every breath cloying in your throat. Punk Hazard, though?"

“A jungle. Then- fire, and ice. Nothing more than that,”

“Floating Islands aren’t true Islands; and, unless carefully managed, they cannot produce their own weather conditions. Did it ever storm on Punk Hazard? A real one- thunder, lightning, trees made to bow to the Wind?”

“...No. At most, it just… rained,” “Syreenes are connected to the weather- and on Floria, then and now, we make our own. Weather is something that never stops needing attention, never stops needing to be monitored. Most people, no matter where they are, want the bad weather- rain, in particular- to happen while they’re asleep, and don’t care. This means that storms- which are necessary, and complicated, and very difficult to manage- are often scheduled for the night. And yes, Doctor- in Floria, the Weather Schedule is just that, a Schedule, often dictated by the votes of the constituents and the needs of the hand-built land below.”

“Oh,”

“Before I came of age and left Floria, I was a Weather Captain. It was my job to manage the Weather Corps Division, and our Territory. Which was half the country,”

“Oh,”

“My jobs were, in order- schedule shifts, payroll, supply management, demand management, public relations, and on call duties, in addition to my skill and power in forming, locating, and placing the various weather systems the Syrene Weather Corps was in charge of. Thus, I would be needed to work at all times, around the clock, especially at night- but often, not for extended periods. During the worst portions of this period of my life, I didn’t sleep eight uninterrupted hours for two years straight,”

“Oh holy fuck,”

“Not to mention, the Licensing Tests- for every form of weather you can think of, there is a test that requires you to give the scientific name for that weather condition, the circumstances in which it occurs, and how to replicate it as a Weather Corps member. Fog is easy; certain forms of Lightning are nearly impossible,”

“...”

“As for my sleeping schedule… things are better, now that I can get eight uninterrupted hours nearly every day. Would I prefer if that happened during the night, and not the day? Perhaps. Do I enjoy the time I am fully awake? Yes, actually- and no, Doctor, I am not fully awake now,”

“-Gah, now I’m yawning-”

“Hmm. Perhaps I shall see you again at dinner? Then again, probably not- this is, after all, a midnight snack for me...”

“Perhaps- ah, you wouldn’t happen to know any places that are good for napping, would you?”

“Hmm… You won’t get much out of them, what with all that shit still in your bones and blood- talk to Mab about it, her medical Doctorate was focused on the sort of regenerative therapy you need; however, for you, Nami’s Grove would be best. There’s a nice bench there that gets just the right amount of sunlight this time of day, without heating up overmuch...

“-Guaaah- can she really do anything about… all this?”

“At the very least, she can fix your jaw- that dentist botched those nerves, and no mistake,”

“Heh. I’ll talk to her about it,”

I’ve just come from the most interesting conversation. Trafalgar Law- you know, the surgeon- just inquired as to whether or not I could do regenerative therapies. When I, of course, informed him that I certainly could, he asked- begged, though a bit too nervously proud to beg outright, really- for my help. It seems that Trafalgar Law has had to live with a Curse of the Body- and unlike some things, this particular Curse is one that can be broken.

I’ll need to prepare, of course- after all, I never do a job halfway. Liquid Catharsis, powdered bonemeal, milk, proteins, vegetables, sugars for energy, and quite a lot of salt; hm, and a silent dark room I can fill with a liquid he won’t sink in. Difficult, but doable.

Let’s get started!

Mmm. Naps are good.

It’s hard to Champion the humble eel. They’re slimy, and phallic, and they have very sharp teeth. They don’t really look like the fish they are- they don’t have pelvic fins, most don’t have pectoral fins, and their dorsal, anal, and caudal fins fuse into one long fin-ribbon framing the entire length of their wiggly bodies. Despite having fins and scales, eels aren’t what the Demons call saf because their scales cannot be removed cleanly. Their bodies are covered in mucosal slime which means you can’t catch them by hand, either- making them what the Mink and Longarm call effroth. When the Fishers up on deck catch an eel, they throw it back or kill it for bait- Sanji almost never serves eel as food, and I think I might be the only person on this crew who considers Jellied Eels a delicacy.

Eels are cool! They’re nocturnal, like me, and they can absorb oxygen through their skin, which means they can slither across land and over barriers. Skuan Eels can live as long as eighty years wild; in captivity, over a hundred and fifty. Eels are catadromous- they always spawn, and die, in the Sea, but otherwise spend their lives in freshwater or sweet-water clouds.

Their blood is toxic to all humans- research into why led to the discovery of anaphylaxis, the scientific term for an allergic reaction. This is also why eels must be served cooked, no exceptions. If you’re eating raw eel, you aren’t actually eating eel- or you’ve got no other choice.

Eels have weak jaws, and small but sharp teeth that tend to curve in like hooks; in order to break apart their food they spin like maelstroms. They can also swim- or fly- backwards.
Most interestingly of all, every Eel in the world is born in the same place in the Southern Calm Belt; where, at the end of their lives they return, reproduce, and die: the Sargasso Sea.

The Sargasso Sea is a whirl in the Southern Calm Belt, bounded by clockwise… technically there are no currents in a Calm Belt. In reality, there are no currents in the water of the Calm Belt; the air currents are very high up, too high to be of use to ships of the sail. Anyway- the Sargasso is named for sargassum, a type of seaweed found in abundance in those waters, which are exceptionally blue. The warm, salty, calm conditions of the Sargasso would make it ideal for Sea Kings- if there wasn’t one other interesting thing about that particular sea: it’s shallow.

How shallow? At it’s shallowest, you’d only get your ankles wet; at it’s deepest, your hips. At the center of the Sargasso Sea there is the Blue Lagoon Sea, an incredibly blue lagoon of saltwater and uncharted lava vents, where massive forests of bull kelp mark the bounds of the final feature of the Sargasso Sea- the Ember Islands, and Barrika Reef. The main, and Royal, Island of the Sargasso is Hearth; but of interest to me is Anguilla, which is shaped like an eel and smack in the middle of the largest eel hatchery in the world.

Baby eels don’t look like eels. They don’t look like eels at all- and for centuries, eons, no one knew that baby eels were even eels. No one knew if eels even had sex at all; certainly, even now, no one has ever seen an adult eel spawn in the wild. Immature eels look enough like eels to be mistaken for full grown- but when dissected, they don’t have any sexual organs. It took twenty years of finding smaller and smaller larvae in the Sea to figure out that they were going somewhere to spawn; and it took longer still to realize that certain species of fish were actually immature eels.

Every year, after hatching- they are still fish, after all- the tiny larval eels of the Sargasso Sea swim off towards land. Skuan Eels find massive waterspouts to fling themselves up into the troposphere and higher, making it Up There from January through April, every single year. It’s hypothesized that a form of Voice Memory tells the delicate larvae where to swim- that each one is born with a species memory of the Voice of their Home Waters, which can be interpreted as a Response Signal. Thus, we come full circle- eels use the tiny crystals of iron in their skulls to home in on various signals, particularly the one produced by their Home Waters.

Glass eels are what happens when larval eels start looking like eels; elvers is for when they gain pigment from their food and migrate upstream in their thousands, blackening the cold winter-melt waters with their slimy selves. Elves and Eels have a powerful connection as well, but that’s really all I know about it...

Glass eels and elvers are valuable. You can eat them straight from the water- fried in oil with garlic and red pepper are a Basque delicacy called angulas. More likely, they’re captured to be farm-raised in tanks. Remember- no one’s ever seen an eel have sex. We don’t know how they lay eggs, or get them fertilized. Thus, we can’t breed them in captivity on a commercial scale- though there has been success in smaller, more naturalistic, processes.

Unagi is popular- but the local eel population of RM has dwindled, and it’ll take a long time for it to recover. The cheapest, fastest way to grow eels is in heated water- they eat more, after all- and so, the most common ‘proper’ work for a Merrow in Gobdark is actually Eel herding. You can’t use a bubble pipe to herd Eels, they don’t respond to it; it’s too dark. Gobdark is also where most eels eaten as unagi are slaughtered, cleaned, skewered, and grilled; massive warehouses converted to kitchen lines, the finished food packed into crates and shipped- everywhere.
There’s been a rush on glass eels too—especially in Floria, where the rivers are exceptionally clean. Fairisle banned export of their eels due to overfishing about ten years ago, and there was an earthquake in RM not two years ago that wiped out the depleted stocks of most of the Merrow eel farms. On Floria, you can only commercially fish for eelers in two places legally—the Main Shore, and Caroler’s Hill. In Floria, the price of glass eels, caught live, increased tenfold in the past three years. At its peak, you could buy a pound of glass eels for B 260000; and during that season, there was rampant poaching, night time standoffs between entrepreneurial Syreene and environmentally protective Nokken, even heavily armed fishermen.

I called my cousin Patrice the other day; she’s a fisher on the Main Shore, almost always out on the water as things come into season. When I asked her what eels were going for this year, she laughed a bit, and said—‘what are they actually worth, or what are we selling them for, d’you mean?’

See, when I was a fledgling, glass eels went for about B 1000 a pound. Two weeks before I talked to my cousin, she was being paid B 205000 per pound by buyers sent from farms on Coral Island. During the height of the season, eel is the third-largest import to the Tsukiji fish market. In Floria, there’s almost no demand for older eels, so there aren’t many licensed adult-eel fishermen around—I’m one of the few, for reasons that should be obvious.

Eels spend about ten or twenty years in freshwater before going back out to sea; no one knows what kind of signal it is, but we do know that once they get it, before they go, their bodies change to adjust for the deeper, darker, colder waters that they’ll encounter in the ocean. They get longer and fatter; their heads compress and their eyes enlarge. Gradually, the river garb of olive brown is changed for a sleek black coat that glistens in the light with an underpart of cool silver. This is the dress worn only by those eels about to undertake the far journey to the Sargasso—they’re also the formal colors of my ceremonial dress, even though I’ve not yet needed one. Black coat; silver dress.

I want to see the eels return to the Sargasso, one day—it’s said to be one of the most spectacular sights in the world, a great confluence of slithering black snake-like fish in waters shallow enough to wade in...

“-hahaha! Hey, hey Deb-“

“-Ah? Yeah?”

“If you don’t get a date soon, you’ll end up cursed!”

“...I am already cursed,”

Linus blanches, and turns all the way to stare at me and all I can do is stare down at the pepper I’m supposed to be deveining and all I can see is darkness and the pale white of her skull and the black strands tied to that damn coral-tree and-
“Are you okay?”

“I’m fine— I just. I need— out,”

And then I’ve put my knife down and I’ve walked out of the Galley and I’ve dived into the cold harbour waters and I don’t know what set me off I just- one moment, I’m listening to Mince and Oz giggle and set up a fun date for the two of them and then- Linus teased me about- I didn’t want Miki as a friend. I- she was so beautiful, with sunbaked hair and a chipped tooth smile. I should have- held her hand? Kissed her? I- just one more night with her at my side, one more night over at her house, one more sleepover… staying up too late talking about nothing I just…

I found her body. I found her, and I held her in my arms, and I- I-

I don’t know how I’m supposed to live in this world without her.

My hair comes undone in my frantic push downwards; my hand darts out and snatches my mothers- my- hair clip before it’s gone forever. I kick off my boots and tear off my jacket and swim down and thrash out of my skirt and stockings and my legs burn with all the things I can’t bear to say, colors and lights flaring across them like they haven’t since-

Since-

The bottom of this harbor is actually pretty nice. There’s gouges from all the anchors, of course, but there’s also a fairly nice sandbar, and it’s full of little sand-beri. I watch the flat urchins wriggle back under the sand at my approach, and then I just- can’t swim any more. I collapse, crumpled over in the sandbar and clutch my head and scream-

I can’t remember Miki’s voice. I’m watching sand move with my ragged breaths, and I’m watching my hair drift around my head and I’m watching a thread of blood drift up from where I gripped my hairclip so tightly it-

I can’t. I can’t remember her voice, or her face; I don’t remember what she liked to eat, I can’t remember her favorite books or what she did after school every day or why she only ever used pink hair ties and I can remember that there was a reason but not what that reason was I can’t-

It hurts to be without her. It hurts to breathe and know that she’s not somewhere, breathing too- every new thing I see, every new thing I taste, every new friend I make I want to share with her and she isn’t here and she never will be and I can’t- I can’t-

My sisters can’t help and my mom’s dead and I have no father and I-
When I got into a bad place, Miki pulled me out; when I got too serious about everything, Miki made me laugh. I was a whole person with her; and when we were apart, as we had to be, I was still a whole person. Now, without her, I’m not. I don’t remember her voice and I can’t go home and- I want-

I want a reason to live without her. I want a reason- anything, any reason, I was finding All Blue for her, that was her dream and I just- if I can’t share it with her, is there a point at all? I can’t- I don’t have a reason, I don’t have a dream, I don’t have her- I don’t have… anything.

All I can do now is lay on the sand bar and breathe through the pain.

I think I fell asleep or maybe passed out because when I come to I’m being hugged to someone- Sancho? No, too warm- Sanji? And I’ve been dried off, and I’m wearing pajamas and my hand is bandaged and I can see my hairclip on the sidetable and- I’m under a sheet, a damp sheet, and then a rubber sheet on top, and Sanji is… stretched out along my back and holding on to me, like I’m… precious, or something.

I- I don’t-

Gah! Oh, no, it’s only Buttercream- but- this- isn’t my bedroom, and when I shift around I realize I’m not laying with my back against Sanji, I’m on my side between Sanji and Missus Mab, who’s taken on the form of the prettiest Tuna Mermaid I’ve ever seen, and she’s under the sheets with me and I-

I’m crying again.

Fuck today.

“Have your cooks ever had really good bread that you know of?”

“Uh… well. I’m a fair baker- but I see your point; they won’t get to the finals of the WWBs without some actual baking foundation… why do you ask?”

“Well, I know you don’t want them baking in your kitchen- and since we’ve got a good month left, I thought I’d teach them out at my lodge,”

“…”

“You’d be there too, of course,”

“Well-”

“I was going to go over the history of bread? -of all things, I think bread is the easiest to learn, but the hardest to master,”
“Now that, we can agree on. -I do like hearing your lectures and seeing you teach,"

“Do you?”

“I do,”

“...I’m glad you found her,”

“Yeah. Me too. I didn’t know it was getting this bad, though- otherwise… Her health and her sanity come first,”

“I know. I just wish she knew that too,”

“...Yeah,”

Interestingly enough, One has run into this problem before- or rather, this particular quirk of magic. It’s all to do with magic.

“The reason none of you can bake, save Linus, is magical in nature. The nature of that magic is this- Fire and Air are diametric to Water and Earth. The three of you have very powerful ties to Water and Earth, and very weak ties to Fire and Air- with all of you having nearly no true ties to Air, and Deborah having the strongest ties to Fire,”

“...Huh?”

Oh dear.

“Mince, Oz, and Deborah- all three of you grew up under Water, in cities made of stone that was formed under water. Contagion is a funny thing, in Magic; taken in it’s most literal sense, contagion is literally ‘to touch together with’. In this case, I think all of you are operating under a fundamental misunderstanding of how Magic and Cooking are intertwined- and they are,”

“Missus Mab, shouldn’t Chef be-?”

“Sanji agreed to let me give you this instruction, Deb; he cares too much about your feelings, your pride as cooks, to give you a true accounting of the bloody details. I do not have such reservations. The truth is, barring a distinctive Magical event called a Transformation or a truly terrifying set of circumstances, none of you will ever make a truly good baked good. At best, on a perfect day, in perfect circumstances, once all of you know and understand what I have to teach, you all will be able to make an edible baked good, circumstances permitting. It will never be easy, or second nature to make an edible baked good; but it will be within your power.

“That is all I can promise you- and the reason it is important for all of you to know this is that the World’s Worst Baker’s competition is looming close, and though you passed the Regionals, you will not be able to earn distinction enough to get into the true Finals for the Worlds without solid foundational studies. Raw talent will only take you so far,”
“I see. What do we need to know, Missus?”

“To start, a revision on Magical Theory. Sanji assures me that all of you understand the foundations of your Art and Craft; what you need reminding of is Magic, which is integral to the higher levels of all Arts and Crafts. The true basics of building strength and ability have nothing to do with fancy theatrics or special moves. They have everything to do with simple skills and knowledge: what to wear, how to stand, the way you eat, how to keep your tools; and other things that are not so easy to teach, like strength of character and genuine hospitality. At the highest levels of your Art and Craft, when you are not genuinely happy to serve someone what you have cooked, your feelings will contaminate- the active form of contagion- the food. You cannot hate and cook; your bitter heart will poison what you cook. Your true limitations; your full strength; your weaknesses; a true accounting of your ability, as you are now: these things are what you build your power, your Art and Craft, upon. They are the base; that is why they are the basics. Am I understood?”

“Uh…” “Sort of?” “No, Missus, not really,”

“These are the life lessons your parents should have taught you, had they been willing or able; that they did not is no fault of your own. However, you must learn these things- what is the point of learning to sharpen knives, wash dishes, budget a month’s meals against food costs and nutritive needs?”

“Your tools are your only way of cooking safely and effectively, in a timely manner. Though they need not be the best, they must be fit for use… take care of what you have. What you have might not be the best, but replacing it because of negligence on your part is no good,“

“…Clean dishes- pots and pans and serving dishes, cooking tools and eating tools and all the rest- make and hold clean food. If the food isn’t clean, people could get sick and die. -We’re responsible for people’s safety; every time they choose to sit in our house and eat our food, we hold their lives in our hands. Be responsible with other people’s lives,”

“I- No One Leaves Our House Hungry. There is enough for everyone; and I suppose, at the higher levels, we’re not feeding a physical hunger, but a psychological one. An ounce of meat and some flower petals and leaves isn’t enough to fill anyone’s stomach- but at that level, you’re not feeding the stomach, you’re feeding the soul. At our level, I think the best we can do is make sure that people feel welcomed, a-and, uh, that they have enough to eat at every meal we serve them. Generosity and Kindness are the virtues we bestow on the world,”

“Exactly so. This is of the Faesh Culture- and yes, the Fae do have a distinctive shared culture. One of our most powerful social calling cards is that Nobody Leaves Hungry. If I were cooking our daily meals, there would be a greater variety of garnishes and sides, and far fewer main dishes- can you think why?”

“…Ease of cooking?”

“Not quite, Deborah,”

“F-familiarity?”

“Better, but no- keep thinking, Oz,”

“…Portions?”

“Keep going, Mince- think about how my cooking is different from Sanji’s,” “Sanji and you… Chef makes enough food for everyone to eat seconds, but we hardly ever have more than that, even if we want more- and we always do, unless we genuinely don’t like the taste of a certain ingredient. You always make enough for everyone to eat fourths, even when it’s only average- Oh! Plenty! The main philosophy of Faesh cooking is Plenty!”

“Exactly so. The main philosophy of Demonic Cooking is Quality; Minkfolk want Scent; Lonfolk want Texture; Seafolk want Harmony; Talfolk want Specificity; Faefolk want Plenty; and Lanfolk, of which Demons are most definitely a part, want Quality. Ah- and Automafolk want Reliability. The reason this matters? Your natural inclinations define who you are at a very deep and primal level; they define what you consider food at all; when you consider that food to be food- is it ready after you burn it to taste? Is it ready after it’s fermented? During a certain year? A certain season? When is food, food?

“It defines where you know food to come from- does it come from the grocery store? The field, the forest, the waters deep, the wide sky? Is it bloodless? Do you gather it with your own two hands when possible- or do you need it then and there, no fussing about who got it to you or where it came from?

“It defines why you eat some things, and not others. Some things cannot be eaten excepting certain ways because they are toxic. Some things must be eaten by certain people to live. Some things are always taboo- others change their nature with circumstance.

“And, least of all- it defines how you cook. The method of cooking is easy to teach and share; is meant to be taught and shared. The more defining features- Why you eat the food you eat, Where the food comes from, When the food is ready for consumption, What is the food… who eats what; who gets to eat what… These are broadly defined by your Tribe, whether you know it or not.

“There’s lots of overlap, of course- Lanfolk’s desire for Quality is shared by every other Tribe; while the Faefolk’s desire for Plenty is perfectly understood by anyone who has gone hungry because there wasn’t enough to share. In truth, the philosophies of all the tribes, when taken together, can create marvelous things- but understanding why those philosophies are the way they are...”

“Missus Mab?”

“...What do you know about the history of the Fae? Do you know why we live in the Sky?”

“...No, Missus,” “U-uh-” “Can’t say I do,"

“Right. We tell ourselves, in our main history books, that we left because the Giants invaded our homeland and destroyed our sacred tombs- and they did, that’s not untrue. But that’s not all that is true. We left our homeland because we were starving; and although there was no guarantee of food in the Sky, there was a certainty in the lack of it on the Land. We, the Fae, left for the Sky during a period of World-wide ecological disaster- a massive Volcanic eruption, along with a terrible earthquake and a drought. Plenty is the Philosophy of the Fae because we know what it is to live Without- and we know that if one lives Without for long enough, they will surely die.

“Quality? The Lanfolk were enslaved- not to the Nobles of the Old World, but to the Others. The Others are not human, and they do not care for human needs- and so, the Lanfolk were made to subsist on the unwanted garbage of the Others tables, and what they could find, beg, steal, and scrape together. Even though the Others used Lanfolk as chattel, they saw humans as vermin; you can put the rest together yourself, I think.

“Mink lived in the True Wild, where the only assurance came from your own knowledge- hard earned or passed on through grim experience- and your own senses, and for the Mink? Scent is the most powerful of all... when it comes to food, at least.
“Lonfolk lived lives of austerity. Texture became their only outlet for expression and creativity for eons; and so when their Austere way of life was no longer needed, their love of Texture remained.

“Seafolk are strongest when they work together with each other and the World around them. Harmony, for them, is a natural expression of this strength- and, as the Seafolk have spent most of recorded history being kicked out of their homes or living through cruel twists of fate, being able to find strength with each other and the world around them- in Harmony… Discord is what the Seafolk had to live through. Discord is what Seafolk have to live through now. Harmony, then, is what they crave.

“Talfolk often have to make due with what they can find. Every single Giant in this World, however, wants. Famously, Giants like Big Mom want candy; but some want a fight, or a lover’s caress, or a beautiful coat. Very often, a Giant will not be able to get what they want- ingredients for the candy Big Mom wants aren’t available; there is no fight to be had; no lover worth the vulnerability; no sewist up to the task. But the Giant still Wants. There are tales of Giants devouring naughty children- because there were Giants so driven by their Wants that they ate children. There are tales of Giants destroying cities because Giants destroyed cities for wanting. Wanting something specific is, I think, their way of providing themselves… a drive, I suppose. Wanting all the world and expecting to get it is flatly impossible- the World itself will foul your efforts. Wanting a certain kind of candy, or a gentle kiss goodnight? Those things, specifically, are possible.

“Automafolk want Reliability. I don’t know why- but then, I suppose I do. Automa had very few assurances through history- and what assurances they had were of the worst sort. That they would be seen as inhuman- lesser, inferior, better, superior, it doesn’t matter, really- either way, they were not particularly welcome. That they would be seen as tools, and not people; objects without souls. That their Goddess, Galatea, died before she could create a place for them to go when they die- and so, there is nowhere for them to go when they die, and they will not see their lost ones ever again… In many ways, the history of the Automafolk is one long, terrible tragedy- disaster after calamity after catastrophe after tragedy- is it odd, then, that the most comforting thing to an Automafolk would be the assurance that tomorrow would be much like today, down to the meal?”

“Oh,” “…yeah,” “…i thought it was just me…”

“In review- Magic, when it comes to cooking, has the same foundations as all other forms of magic- which is to say, if you can’t cook, you can’t use cooking magic. That’s just how it is. The things you need to know now are thus- All words are magic words if they are truly meant; a spell is a word or series of words that the World cannot ignore; and some people, no matter what they do, will never be able to use, understand, or safely interact with certain kinds of magic. For the three of you, it’s Baking; for me, it’s Dreams; for Sanji…”

“Warspells- I can’t throw firebolts, and never will be able to, even though it’s the basis for literally every warspell in the Demonic tradition,”

“Now for the lesson: People draw their magic from two places. There is a personal reserve, which is built on experience, environment, and familial traits- and there is an ambient reserve, which is native to the environment. Sanji’s main forms of magic are Air, Fire, and Lightning- he is a Firestorm, like the majority of Demons in the world, to use the slang term for it- and I will explain why he can’t throw firebolts even though all datums say he can. My main forms of magic are Lightning, Water, and Air; a Thunderhead. I have no skill with weather manipulation; and I will explain why, shortly.

“Magic exists because we exist- and our magic exists inside of us the way it does because of where we come from, that is to say, our physical location and how we were raised. I was born in the Sky, in a grove of sacred cherry trees. I was taught to be a kind of steward, a caregiver- and it grated on me because, according to my magic, such things are not within my normal nature. I do not hesitate, and I do not forgive, and I do not forget. These are not bad or good traits- but the tasks I was suited to were few and far between.”

I pulse, and the air suddenly feels heavy and thick, like a thunderstorm about to break open the air, like lightning waiting to strike- but there is no… oppression. That isn’t who I am. In front of me, Deborah, Oz, and Mince all go rigid with terror then relax.

I reach out and place my finger in the air, and at the end there grows a ball of lightning that crackles and sparks and quietens to a ball of vigorous light. I release the orb of magic and it splits into seven; two begin circling each other like fish in a small pond, one of living vine and the other of metal, gleaming and rusted and crystal and tarnished. As for the other five- I point to all and give my warning; then each in turn, for the sake of clarity as I speak.

“The five internal magics are not toys. They are an integral part of every human being. Learning to cook with the five magics is not easy. It will exhaust you; it will confuse you; it will frighten and stress you, find faults in you that you did not know you had. You will be tired, and you will wonder if you’ll ever see the sun again, and you will hate me, and Sanji, and each other, and yourself; and you will never be as you were before. You do not have to learn this to be successful; there is no glory in learning this, and no shame in choosing not to. But you cannot choose to unlearn; and the longer you wait, the less time in your life is available to form a true understanding of this magic. Will you continue, knowing this?”

The seven Magics blaze with my power; and I make sure to meet each Cook with my eyes, and impress upon them that I am not kidding; and they look back at me, and at each other, and at the strange light of the magic between us. And they do not leave.

“At the end of this, you may well never be able to cook as you did before. Are you really prepared for that?”

“Yes; I was prepared the day I asked Sanji to teach me to Cook,”

“Yes; I am,”

“Teach me; please,”

I do so love my juniors. Their spirits are truly remarkable.

“Very well. The preparation for this is simple: find the state of mind as when you clarify stock, or peel eggs, or wash dishes. Instead of preparing the task in your mind, reaching for a tool- reach inside yourself. I will show you what you need to find, and where to look; I will guide you. You will be the one to pull it up and out, and you will be the one to wake it, and you will be the one to let it settle inside of you, awakened forever. We will start when all of you are ready,”
I watch, calmly, as the three Cooks shift where they stand; Deborah adjusts her apron, Oz double checks his sleeves, Mince makes sure his shoes are set right on his feet... and then, they nod, ready to begin.

“Fire cooked first. When I said ‘is food ready when it’s burnt to taste’, I was not making a joke; fire is what makes food edible. Fire is the friend of man; it is the seat of will, and defined by passion and intensity. A candle; a campfire; a forest fire; a volcanic vent. Fire destroys; fire is what makes life possible. Burning; Heat; Dancing. It comes from the gut and the throat; and what you want.

“Water cooked second. You cannot cook with water if you have no vessel; and you cannot make a vessel without mastery of fire. Water is what allows man’s comfort; water is the seat of understanding, and defined by adaptability and flow. A teardrop; a raindrop; a river; a wave; a flood; a Sea. Water takes action; water is what makes life livable. Wet; Cold; Flowing. It comes from your blood, and the actions you are willing to take.

“Earth cooked third. You cannot cook with time if you have no mastery of comfort; the best things to eat exist on no schedule but their own. Earth is the toil of man; earth is the seat of strength, and defined by endurance and stability. A stone; a mountain; a field; a mine; a quarry; a landslide; an earthquake. Earth endures; earth is what life turns to when all others fail. Solidity; Pressure; Stillness. It comes from your bones, and finds a way when there is no way.

“Wind cooked last. You cannot cook with transformation if you have not mastered time; some moments cannot be recreated or recaptured, and no magic can change that. Wind is the freedom of man; wind is the seat of change, and defined by speed and unpredictability. A breath; the shiver of water on a still lake; mist; fog; clouds; tornadoes; tempests. Wind changes; wind is what makes life change when stagnation becomes death. Shapeless; Careless; Ever-changing. It comes from the lungs and the diaphragm, and is a tangible form of faith,”

The four magics go through the Cooks like shit through geese. Deborah has a bright red streak across her face, like warpaint; Oz is flickering with stark black lines, roiling and jolting like an Art Deco oil-slick; and Mince... has horns, curled like a Corsican cow. Magic is one hell of a drug- all of them are soaked with sex-sweat, eyes blown orgasm wide and hooded with exhaustion; shaking with energy that they're too exhausted to use, and all of them too energized to sleep.

“The order of your awakening is not trivial. Martial magic requires stability; hearth magic, which is what you are learning now, also requires stability. The difference is where that stability is; for the martial artist, stability in the body begets stability of the mind; for the hearth keeper, stability in the mind begets stability of the body. You want; you comfort; you endure; you change. And, most importantly-“Lightning doesn’t cook; because lightning thinks. The other magics can be used in jest; lightning cannot. Lightning is unpredictable, adaptable, indomitable, and wants with everything it has to exist. Lightning cannot afford to forgive, or forget. If you fuck up how you think about food, people die. If you ever forget where food really comes from, and the work that goes into making it, people die. If you make food only to feed the body, people die. If you ever forget that food has to taste good, people die.

“If you cannot find enough food, people die. This is most important of all.

“Lightning innovates; Lightning is the seat of power, defined by duality and potential. A poison becomes a medicine becomes a food becomes a poison becomes a medicine becomes a food. All foods are medicines; all medicines are poisons; all poisons are foods. A spark; a thought; an idea; a bolt of fire that destroys and creates with every moment it exists. Sharp, Dry, Shifting. It is your spine, and it is what bids you live- even if you must eat poison and garbage, live,”

Deborah sobs, and she does not run- she can’t, her legs are barely holding her upright, even with stockings and boots to support herself with.

“It hurts; oh gods, it hurts so much,”

“Live, Deborah ,”

“I- I don’t know how-!”

As she wails, Sanji’s calm command undoing the last dregs of her composure, Mince and Oz- and Linus, who crept into the room and stood with Sanji- quietly wrap themselves around Deborah, and hold her up even as she screams her grief.

“We will show you- ah, the three of us, together. If you’ll let us, I- I mean,”

“We will not leave you,”

“You are not alone,”
And of course, their quiet, firm kindness is what really crumbles the last piece of her. Deborah collapses, but this time bracketed by friends- not family, not superiors, people her own age who care about her as herself.

“Magic isn’t meant for pain; and pain is not the end, though it can feel like it,”

Sanji’s taken over now- he was so quiet, so… proud. Of them- of me. But this, I think, he needs to say.

“Living through pain doesn’t make you stronger; it’s the living that makes you stronger, not the pain of it. You might think you’re not strong enough, that you don’t know what to do- you do. You have an astonishing strength. All you have to do is reach out- just a little bit, push a single brick out of your wall- and we’ll all be there for you,”

“I know things seem bad, like they’ll always be bad- but they aren’t, they won’t, and they never were. You will feel better, I swear it; you just have to live,”

Eventually, we’re all adjourned from the kitchen in the small cabin adjacent to my ski… really, it’s more like a mansion? Anyway, we’re all in the living room; Sanji and I are settled together on a couch large enough for both of us, while the Cool Kids are in a cuddle puddle on the sheepskin rug in front of the hearth.

Deborah has been going through rounds of weeping and exhausted staring- and, bless them, but the three boys, Linus, Mince, and Oz, they haven’t left her for a moment longer than it takes to go to the bathroom. One of them is pressed up against her at all times; thigh to thigh, back to back, an arm slung over her shoulders or a pair wrapped around her back as she sobs into a broad chest…

Deborah looks up from where she’s been curled up between Linus and Mince, one of her legs curled around Oz’s calf, and she says-

“There were seven,”

“Hmm?”

“When you were teaching us about magic- there were seven, but we learned five. What are the other two?”

“Ah. In regards to Hearth magic- the other two are Metal, and Wood. Active in you whether you like it or not, so no need to look- becoming aware of them is no bad thing, but not strictly necessary like the other five. They were present from before you were ever born, being portions of your sire and dam’s own magic; and they will return to the great Wheel, upon your passing from this mortal world. Martial artists rely on them more heavily than you will- however, that doesn’t mean there aren’t certain things that require their usage...”
“So… Um, well, what are they, exactly?”

“In you? Wood is spirit- your emotions; Metal is body- everything you know to be real- oh, sorry, magic, right. Hmm.

“Wood is what gives food flavor. Cooking with spirit is infinitely better than cooking to survive; there’s more to life than survival. Wood is the growth of child to adult; wood is the seat of growth, and defined by adaptation and discovery. A seed; a sprout; a brave green leaf; a memory of sunlight; the patient, curious strength that cannot be denied or delayed; the wish, the promise; a love that never dies or fades or is forgotten. Wood grows; wood is what makes the changes wind brings Real. Changing; Forming; Fertile. It rests in the body, and is unbowed by Time.

“Metal is what gives you an idea of how to cook. The method and the knowledge that cooking must be done is not enough; those things and the supplies to do them with is not enough; you must know how such things are to be done, and resolve yourself to doing them. The solidity of bone; the fluid warmth of blood; the scent of piss and bile; hard and sharp as a knife; soft and sticky as honey; the beauty of a marigold and the putrid filth of cheese. From death comes life; and to death life must return. From night, day arises; glory from sorrow. In the darkest depths of despair- laughter. In crumbling dust- gold. The eye of the storm and the strength to carry on. Ferocity, subtlety; rage, calm. A coin to trade, a blade to fight, a kiss to remember; a promise to never forget. Changeable; Formed; Vital. It rests in the mind, and gives all actions direction and meaning.”

I hum, and pull with my shadow. Eight baby ninjas- an entire sneak of ninjas, really- shudder as the longing in their hearts suddenly has somewhere to go. As I continue to quietly lecture the Cool Kids, now shuffled into a warm pile lounging at my feet, the other couch steadily fills with ninja. Although I never look at them directly, and Sanji is very good at keeping a straight face… Well, a sneak of eight ninja isn’t actually all that unobtrusive, not when they’re all genin. Shit, student wizards are sneakier than genin, and student wizards categorically can’t stop talking about their work- which is why, in social settings, it’s easier to ignore them, and not, say, the gaggle of young women being suspiciously quiet and holding very still on the other couch in the room that you’re directly in front of and have a very clear view of.

Am I cheating? Absolutely. Can anyone stop me? Not that I know of.

“So. Ovens were first developed for baking bread, and bread alone. Pottery actually came after breadmaking- because you don’t need crockery of any kind to make a good loaf of bread. You don’t even need knives, really; what you need is an oven, water, flour, and a little bit of salt. If you want a puffy bread, you still don’t really need crockery- you need a box or basket, and fine-weave cloth, and the very open air.

“Here’s how it works- every technology begets the technologies that come after. If you want optical glass, such as the kind that’s in my glasses right now, you need to be able to produce good soap first.
Good soap, of course, is the kind that lathers nicely, and doesn’t leave any weird smells or residues on your skin when you wash with it- and if you really want that glass to be clear, and colorless, and without fault? You need to know how to make laundry detergent. From scratch.

“I apologize- earlier, I said that none of you would ever be able to make more than an average, edible loaf of bread. That’s still true- but I feel as if I’ve allowed you to think that a loaf of bread is the only kind of bread there is. It is not. What I should have said was: None of you- not Deborah, not Mince, not Oz- will ever be able to make bread- that is, a bread loaf - in an oven. Ovens are meant to do one thing: they are meant to shape fire and heat in such a way as to provide the correct magical reactions, for the production of bread; and only bread. That an oven can be used to cook an extensive list of other foods is a happy accident; and that the three of you can use an oven to cook foods other than bread is also, a happy accident.

“I say this now- all cooked food is produced in one of four ways. The first, most ancient, and most profoundly human is by exposure to fire. Every Tribe has some tradition of barbeque- Deborah, merrow cook certain kinds of fish by exposing them to volcanic vents, don’t they? And of course, I saw a number of yaki stands in Chihiro Town, not to mention the entire yaki restaurant in Sento Chihiro… Second, of course, is by exposure to water, or a chemical cooking- salad dressing actually wilts the greens and roughage in the salad, or it’s supposed to-

‘-which improves the texture and the nutrition available for digestion-’

‘-Quite so. Third is exposure- or rather, internment- in earth. Shoyu, champagne- they wouldn’t exist without a long, quiet rest in the earth’s embrace. Finally, fourthly- air. There are drifting strains of silt, an invisible mixture of animals and plants, and when they, in careful husbandry, are exposed to food… pure magic is the result.

“This brings us back to bread, and ovens. Everything that wasn’t bread was cooked on, in, or in front of a fire. Domestically- which we, as pirates, simply don’t have the space for, nor can do safely- this is still the case. Commercially, ranges with integral ovens have been in existence for at least… four hundred?”

“Four-fifty,”

“Four hundred and fifty years- give or take the fifty it took for the practice to be standard across all commercial kitchens. Not to mention the holdouts, and the historians- and of course, some food simply can’t be cooked properly in a standard commercial kitchen,”

The Cool Kids baulk, at that. I sigh.

“Is it deer or humans?”

“Uh-”

“I know it’s one or the other; which one?”

“...Deer, Missus Mab- they’re messengers of the gods! You can’t just… just-

“Be thankful for it’s sacrifice and use every part of it’s mortal flesh I can?”

“...”
“I made my first school backpack out of deer skins my mother had hunted, about a year or so after I was born, just for that purpose. The style was as close as I could get to a Tsuchiya Kaban without actually having handled one before; I had pictures of the back from all six sides, as well as pictures of the interior and a list of dimensions and features. Mother had managed to gather a collection of intriguing buckles and closures- none of them the Tsuchiya Kaban brand, but all of them totally worthy in their own way.

“Three whole deerskins to work with, and my mother told me all about them. It took a full month to stalk the first; and a week for the second; and half a year for the third, which was albino and nearly blind, and so had Haki far in excess for normal deer. I knew the deer long before I knew my bag- I knew that one liked fresh pea shoots, and another would shove it’s head and whole body through small holes in hedges for the joy of it, and I knew that the white one had a deep and abiding hatred of rubber ducks. I knew that one had a small herd, and one was alone, and one was shunned. And above all else- I knew that the meat we ate every night for dinner that year was their meat, and that the skins I was using to make my backpack was their skin, and that without their sacrifice- without their service- without their generosity and kindness-

“If those deer, my deer-relatives, had not taken pity on my mother, we would not have lived through the winter. Ultima Thule, the place I grew up in, has nearly an entire year’s worth of winter- spring, summer, and fall are all squashed into a bare three months. I call them deer because that’s what you’re most familiar with- but in reality, they were caribou. They were caribou, and my mother hunted them in the skin of a wolf, with her wolf-family around her; and if she had not, we would have starved to death.

“The deer’s blood became soup stock, and fertilizer for the greenhouse; it’s bones became toys, and tools; it’s skull and it’s teeth, in particular, were coveted for their powerful magic. There’s more of course, but in truth? We of Ultima Thule- which is both Sanji and myself- eat deer because there are times of year when the alternative is starvation. You know very well that such a thing cannot become,”

I pause, and take a deep breath. Sanji weaves his fingers into mine. I regard the Cool Kids- particularly Deborah, who still looks horrified at the mere thought of eating venison- with quiet fondness. And then I snap my fingers and point at the oldest of the genin on the couch behind them, the one I’ve got a feeling is going to be up for chunin promotion this time next year- she’s also the only one dressed in comfortable flats that are meant for someone her visible age, which shows a certain level of sensibility that her fellows lack.

“Would you please call for a number of refreshments in the Winter style of the Thule court, for this lounge, please?”

“Yes ma’am,”

“And send for extra blankets as well, I saw you lot shivering,”

“Y-yes sir,”

I am very careful to keep my amusement, concerning the reactions of the Cool Kids to the sneak of ninjas right behind them, between myself and my husband. Amusement becomes somewhat more bubbly when the Sneak and the Cool Kids realize they’ve all met before- though probably only Sanji really knows where that might have been.

I barely manage to keep from smirking or bursting into giggles of pure anticipation- good gods be great, I’m turning into Mommarav and Aunt Zippy- as the Sneak, all eight of them, and the Cool Kids, carefully arrange themselves into a very snuggly cuddle puddle. When the refreshments and blankets arrive, I move before anyone else can; I take the entire trolley, move it to Sanji’s side, and take the extra blankets from the bottom. I throw them over the cuddle puddle just the right way so that my ass- anyway, when the cuddle puddle of kids starts giggling and laughing, Sanji gives me a very welcome pinch somewhere quite personal.

I settle in his lap, and calmly lounge. His rumbling laughter against my back sends wet fire through my whole crotch and my ass and my thighs annnnd- I still have a lecture to complete, fuck. Sanji wraps a strong arm around my waist and buries a smile into my shoulder- still pressing his rumbling laugh against my back, particularly my shoulders, because he knows what that does to me. My tail hasn’t popped just yet- won’t be ready until the last frost of the year, which isn’t for another week, more’s the pity, or I’d be using it to give him a taste of these sweet delights…

“Hmhmhm. Right. Ranges with integral ovens are very new, domestically speaking- I didn’t learn to cook on one, to give you some idea of what that time frame we’re working with, and also an idea of why you’ve only ever encountered them professionally before, if at all. Integral ovens aren’t popular in Skua for a number of reasons, mostly because of weight- they’re heavy, is the thing. In other places, roasting before the open flame is becoming unfavorable, though still going strong in those places where barbecue is king.

“The general-purpose integral oven is not well suited for breadmaking; there are specialized ovens purpose built for breadmaking, and even they do not quite suit all applications. The heat produced is too fragile; hot air and hot metal and not much else. A good loaf of bread is formed in the deep heat of the structure itself- stone and clay and brick come together and keep the heat, radiating it outwards into the surface of the bread, particularly it’s bottom. There are a number of tricks and ways to fool bread into behaving inside the most modern of ovens; however, there is no substitute for a proper oven. Breadmaking often develops into a larger programme of equipment, construction, and rethinking of the kitchen’s economy. It just grabs you by the short hairs and doesn’t let go,”

I sigh, and relax back on Sanji, who’s stopped laughing thank goodness. Oof, he’s gotten quite big-down!

“There are big and small ovens; and they can be indoors, or outdoors. At the Worlds, they will be indoors; for now, while you all must learn, outdoors is safest.

“In short, then: ovens work on the principle that you build a fire inside the oven itself until the structure has absorbed sufficient heat to cook a loaf of bread. At that point, the fire is raked out, the oven is washed or cleaned in some way, and the baking begins. A pizza oven works on the same lines but hotter; the fire is not removed but kept burning during the cooking process, so that it can be revived at short notice to get heat up again for another baking. Pizza is fast food, after all; when all ingredients are at the ready, cooking one in a proper oven takes less than three minutes.

“For you three, driving and tending an oven will be much more important, and much more difficult, for possibly your entire lives. You all have lived your lives separate from true flames; and there is a fascination in watching the flames curl over the brick dome and listening to the roar at the mouth as the heat gets up to maximum. There’s also the pure delight in using a baker’s peel to put a loaf in; or it’s attendant disasters as hesitation and fear make a mockery of your hopes.

“Speed, too, is a marvel of the true oven; at its full potential, an oven will cook bread at twice the speed of a standard cooker; and, as it settles onto the gentle declining slope after breadmaking is done, you can do all the things you’ve learned to do with ovens that isn’t bread- stews, finishing, cakes, biscuits and cookies and meringues and so on all profit from the free heat.

“Hmm, I had a point to this lecture- ah, yes. Tomorrow, this sneak of ninja will teach you all they can about working with a real oven; as the Qualifier rounds of the WWB are in a bit less than three weeks, and its best not to tempt fate overmuch, I find.”

“Uh- wait, didn’t we compete in semifinals already?”

“Yeah- those were to get you a spot in the finals. These determine what that spot actually is; remember, the Finals are about showmanship. Having a good spot will ensure that you get a good crowd, ready to see what you can do,”

“ Yes chef! ”

“Pffft. No need to be so serious; take today to enjoy each other’s company. Tomorrow, we’ll begin,”

I suppose I should explain why I want to build a completely mechanical radio when my own senses and a good snail do so well. The issue is throttling, and control- I can reliably do one or the other, not both. And of course, there’s the problem of power- mine is finite, and so is a snail’s. No living creature can be fully aware at all times; neither myself nor a snail can listen to everything all the time.

Machines don’t get tired the way living things do. When something in a machine tires, it really wears out- and it is much, much simpler to replace part of a machine, as opposed to letting an injury heal. Machines can be modified- not necessarily with ease, but more-so than a body can be, without complication. You can always throw a machine out and start over, too; but I’ve only got one body.

And I’m not a bloodmage.

A crystal radio is what I’m building; pretty punk, as far as radios go. It doesn’t need a power source, since all the power it needs is picked up from the antenna. As a result, most simple sets are pretty low volume, but it works- and with my hearing, and the way I’m going to be building it, I don’t need it to be loud.

For the sake of operational security, however, I do need it to be secret. What that really means is I need a new hairstyle. A bouffant is the height of fashion back home, of course- but I never really got into teasing my hair, and the scent of hairspray has always been a migraine trigger for me…

“Miss Robin?”
“Oh! Bryony- you’re up quite early,”

“Ah, yes- I was wondering if we have a copy of Godey’s Lady’s Book? I know that there’s at least one recipe for fixatures in that book, so—”

“Godey’s Lady’s Book… hmmm- not in the manuals, not in the cosmetics- aha! Here we are!”

“Thank you,”

“Of course. This is our only copy, so please don’t take it from the library- just put it on a book cart when you’re done, if you’d be so kind,”

“Absolutely, Robin. Anything exciting happen today, or same-same as always?”

“Hmm… A sneak of ninja have taken residence in one of our unused crew berths, and so far Captain- though informed- has elected not to have them thrown into the Sea,”

“Interesting- aha! Bandoline!”

“Hm?”

“Bandoline’s the precursor to modern hair gel, and quite simple to make- and I’m considering new hairstyles that won’t give me migraines,”

“Ah, of course. Hairspray,”

“The scent truly is intolerable…”

A woman can change her style as many times as she likes, for fashions change with the seasons; but her scent is for life. Mab’s scent is always floral in tone, even if the specific flower shifts between honeysuckle, vanilla, and lavender.

I need a pomade and a bandoline; of fruit and flowers, I think. Firstly, the perfume on which the scent profiles of both shall be based- with attention to what I like and what we have in the Stillroom, I’ll make a citrus-based fruit perfume; and I might as well do up perfumes for the rest of the Ladies of this ship, while I’m at it. Taffy’s perfume bottle was a gift from her brother, apparently- it belonged to their mother. Nami has an antique from her mother- they look like orange slices in an orange peel, it’s the most darling thing. Mab’s is made of silver- and I don’t know how, or I’d be more precise. Robin only wears perfume when she goes to temple- some Automa tradition I’m not privy to, I think, or perhaps a memory of her mother… There’s a set of seven empty phials that comes to mind which would be perfect for the Suntides- they’re just of the age when young women begin wearing perfume; I think I’ll make a point of making perfume with each of them, so that they can choose their own tassels. Curiously, Mark keeps his favorite cologne in an ancient Djinn-style perfume bottle- gorgeous, I think the gold inlay is actual gold.

As for myself, I have a far humbler bottle in mind; neither ornate nor plain, I think. Hm- before I get too far ahead of myself, I should make my own perfume. And before I can do that- I need coffee beans.

I guess I’ll go over my toilette? I feel like I should… Toothbrush, toothpaste that Mab makes- as I understand, it’s just baking soda, coconut oil, and peppermint oil. It tastes like minty-fresh dirt, but it does get the job done… Nivea Creme on my feet, because I don’t wear shoes or even socks unless it’s near-freezing or below; deodorant I get from a jar, not from a stick- I use only as much as needed, then. I only brush my hair now, after braiding it for the day’s sleep; I’ll have to change that…

Shampoo, conditioner, detangler, brush, comb, and that’s it. Adding an extra brush out, teasing, and bandoline treatment- not to mention the pomade… that should be fine, right? Ha, and of course, the bandoline. I’m sure there’s a bottle somewhere in the Studio appropriate for the stuff…

It takes me fifteen minutes to find the recipes I want and copy them out. Then, it’s down to the still room to begin actual production, with a short stop in the Galley for unground coffee beans from one of the Cool Kids still cleaning up- and apparently they want deodorants, for their boots. I think I have something in mind...

The Stillroom on our ship has a constant temperature of just about sixty degrees fahrenheit, and it’s the one room on this ship where Chopper, not Mab, and not the Captain, has full control. Chopper’s the one who allows or dis-allows people into the room; and Chopper is the one who controls who is allowed in when. Taffy and Genny usually work in the Stillroom during the early mornings; Gurry and Chopper have the room most of the day; and Robin and Ellie actually have it for the early evening. Free hours are from sundown to midnight; this allows Mab, usually, the time she needs to work with her soaps and salts. Tonight, she will be joined by me, because I need to make a perfume base before I can make pomade or bandoline for myself.

A base of lemon essential oil, to start, ten drops or so; then tangerine and orange oil drops, as Nami actually grows both. Tangerines add sweetness, while oranges provide earthiness- slowly increase both until I like the balance, against the lemon. Frankincense in ten drops, neroli- perhaps five, and myrrh… no more than two, I should think- the spices are for depth. Then, it’s all down to fine tuning- personally, I want something sweet, but not too sweet, and to really let the citrus shine. Once satisfied with the oil mixture, and the scent it produces, I’ll add a goodly amount of vodka- enough to dilute its texture without diluting the smell. Once mixed and tested, I’ll have to put it into a container of some sort… This one, I think. Date; mixture; person who made it…

Now then. A pomade is a greasy- in my case, waxy- substance used to style hair. It generally gives a shiny and slick appearance to the hair, and lasts far longer than most products. It usually takes about four washes for me to completely remove pomade from my hair. The recipe I’m using calls for one-fourth pounds of honey, one-half ounce of beeswax, which I will increase to three-quarters ounces because my hair is unruly; and three-quarters drams of a blend of lemon, tangerine, and orange; a blend of frankincense, neroli, and myrrh; and vitamin e, for nourishment.

After simmering together the honey and beeswax for some time, until all is dissolved I suppose, I strained it, added the oils, and stirred the mixture until it cooled enough I could transfer it to a deep tin for storage. Label; clean up; done.

Finally, my bandoline; an ounce of tragacanth powder, normally used by Usopp or Franky or Fern, and a pint of rosewater; they go together into a large jar, and I shall be shaking them together for the next three or four days, before straining with gentle pressure through fine linen. I will then add a sufficient amount of my perfume base; the rest of which will be going in my humble perfume bottle, as I made more than enough for my purposes here.

For some reason, I thought that would be harder.
I’m able to start wearing my new hair style at the beginning of the next week; it took the rest of the last and the week-end to make the bandoline, and I wasn’t about to put so much teasing into my hair with pomade. I’d never get the teases back out if they went in with pomade.

I’m tired of skirts; not that there’s anything wrong with skirts, I just don’t want to wear them anymore. So; I go to my Wardrobe, and I… put my old clothing away. There’s an entire section of clothing Mab made just for me that I’ve never felt… pretty enough? Brave enough? Not enough- to wear.

This is just the first cheongsam I picked; in the Syreene style, not the Long-arm. It’s a deep-sea blue, with cats playing across the surface and rolling around with balls of string. My feathers are worn something like Gran Una wears hers; abbreviated in number, and hanging gracefully at my side.

As for my hair… I’ve never actually curled the ends in this way before, and I must say that it adds a rather becoming feature to my face. A little more spider-leg with my eyelashes; a little more feline with my eye-liners… and I’ve got a Look. I know it’s a good Look for me when not just Deborah, but Mince, Oz, and Linus all start stuttering and flushing when they speak to me at… dinner.

It’s easy to forget, what with Brook, that I am famous for my musical skills. Brook is, after all, a genuine rockstar. I’m much more like a country or folk singer, when it’s just me and my sidemen on the album; I’ve been in many other genres because of my voice, I think.

But I do have Presence; and I am beautiful. These sweet horny teenagers are tripping over themselves to serve my humble requests. Then again, a cheongsam, even in the Syreene style which is much looser and less stiff than the traditional Long-arm style, is quite possibly the most suggestive of all possible dresses.

I’m covered from the base of my throat to mid calf; and yet, when I take a deep breath and smile down at my meal of steak, and sides- I can hear those four biting their lips. I can feel their admiration. I’m not even wearing lipstick.

Mark, in his red paisley qipao, with his hair all braided up and his guns tucked at the small of his back- he starts a new round of stuttering and blushing. Now this, I understand; I’ve no attraction to him, but even I can tell that Mark’s a stone cold fox. I’d bark up that tree all night if it wouldn’t get me shot.

Taffy, in her new ensemble, just about makes poor Deborah lose the entirety of her blood through her nose. The wider leg and less severe coloration really suits her, as does the sharp sharp cat eye-liner. I can actually see the moment Adelaide decides on a new style; the sparkling of her eyes really gives her away.

Then Mab walks in, in her sailor pants, school-team tee, and high-tail ponytail, and I have to catch my breath a moment.

Oh, huh. I like jocks.

Interesting.
I’m going to have to stagger Trafalgar Law’s treatments; remediation in a living body has challenges, especially when analgesics aren’t effective. To start with, I’ll need to train him in deep relaxation- a sensory deprivation tank, along with some liquid catharsis, should do the trick.

Liquid Catharsis- commonly known as the Acid of Truth, is a powerful hallucinogenic drug. It alters thoughts and feelings, and changes the awareness of one’s surroundings. You will see things you have not seen before, and go to places you might never go again.

As for physical effects- dilated pupils, increased blood pressure, and increased body temperature are typical. The effects of the Acid I will be using will last for twelve hours, and will begin effect in half an hour once ingested.

It’s not addictive, and I will be taking steps to reduce the occurrence of flashbacks.

Basically, I’m going to turn Trafalgar Law- in as controlled a way as I can- briefly schizophrenic, so that I can remove the built up lead in his system and replace it with actual useful things; and also repair the damage to his nerves and muscles, his bones and so on- he’s actually still in the growth window, I think he can achieve his full natural height. Then, once my work is done, I will be putting his schizophrenia in remission.

I could, of course, do this with yoga and meditation. I don’t think I have the time or the patience.

Yoga, after all, is also intentional schizophrenia; the intent is to break away from the world, plunging inward, and the ranges of vision experienced are the very same as those of a psychosis. The main difference between Acid and Yoga, so far as I can tell- well, the plunge is all into the same deep inward sea, of that there is no doubt. The symbolic figures encountered are in many instances identical; the sharp difference, then, is that yoga masters can swim, and Acid takers cannot.

Yoga finds those who already have a talent for this sort of thing- or are willing to be taught, to have a little dust brushed from their eyes, or ready to open their eyes (this is an entirely different discussion, but a good metaphor)- and teaches them, step by careful step, and following the guidance of those who came before and the knowledge of a master, enters the deep inner sea and finds they can swim. Acid throws you into the water whether you can swim or not.

For this treatment- and I treat the whole person, body, mind, and spirit- I’m the lifeguard.

As for the sensory deprivation tank, well- the thing about Devil Fruits isn’t that they make you sink. A person who has eaten a Devil Fruit doesn’t weigh more or less than before; and they are no more or less dense.

Eating a Devil Fruit makes the person who has done so unable to swim.

If the water has physical properties that make it impossible for you to sink, you won’t. Period. You won’t necessarily be able to get out of the water yourself without serious mental preparation or a helper, but that’s another thing entirely. You might not even be able to stand up, or stay standing- but if the water, physically, will not allow you to sink, you will not sink. Physics don’t stop working just because Devil Fruits start.

It all comes down to salt, really.
A crystal earpiece is a type of piezoelectric earphone, which produces sound by using a piezoelectric crystal- which changes it’s shape when electricity is applied. In the end, everything really comes down to vibrations- to signals. I don’t need a lot of the supporting technology to use a piezoelectric crystal to hear my radio, loud and clear- which opens up the option of using something prettier for my one required earpiece, instead of the hearing-aid like standard.

I spent a while designing what I was going to make- and even though it’s never going to be seen by anyone if I have anything to do with it, I still want it to look nice. I think I did well, all things considered.

Crystal radios can be any shape and size- you’re only limited by your materials. Most radios end up box-shaped because people know what to do with fragile boxes; and they fit nicely on shelves. A radio doesn’t have to be a box; it doesn’t even have to look like a radio at all. Mine doesn’t; it looks like a long pair of earrings, a giant eel skull that I took the crystals out of to put them in something more comfortable on my head, and an eel jaw I’ve been carefully filing the teeth on- redesigning, really, so I’m in less danger of cutting my own throat with the bottom jaw of an eel’s head from a fishmarket in Sabaody. Yes, stylistically, the whole thing is genuinely cool as shit, but goddamnit I’m not quite willing to sacrifice comfort for fashion.

So- earrings, a veil, and a necklace made out of an eel’s jaw. I should probably paint my nails or something...

Anyway. Crystal radios are punk. They don’t need a power source, since all the power needed is picked up from the antenna; as a result, most sets are pretty low volume. It works, so… With a crystal set, all you need is the right parts, and there are only four- this is a Skysea invention, after all. The truly great sets have antenna; they aren’t strictly necessary, as the coil can function as a sort of ad-hoc antenna, but for the best results, one needs a dedicated antenna. The more antenna you have, the more power your set receives, and the louder it can broadcast.

That’s because radio waves are wireless power. I haven’t quite needed to draw on their power yet, but one day- I might. Having a simple radio will make that easier.

Nikola Tesla experimented with wireless power, among other things. Power means a lot of different things, after all- Tesla, however, was concerned with electricity. Most lay-people think of electricity in the same way as they think of water- in reality, it has its own rules and characteristics that govern it’s entirety.

Radio waves are electricity; radio waves are just that, wave-form fluctuations in the electromagnetic fields that surround everything at all times. The electromagnetic field defines life on this ocean- a field of force that consists of both electrical and magnetic components, resulting from the motion of an electric charge and containing a definite amount of electromagnetic energy. The reason the Skysea doesn’t have a particular reliance on Log Poses is because we use radio signals, which can be tuned for- every island in the world, every true island, has a radio signal of it’s very own, unique in all the world. I don’t need a compass to find an island; no Syreene really does. I don’t know about Cherumib, like Taffy; and I don’t know about Djinn, like Mark; and I don’t know about Fairies, like Mab. But I do know that a Syreene can always find their way home; no Syreene is truly lost, merely… wandering.
Copper wire- saffron string, as it’s called, sometimes- can see the waves because it’s a conductor of electricity. Most radios are made with copper wire… I suppose I should explain. The Four Kingdoms of Syreene, Cherumib, Djinn, and Fae each have a certain metal and a certain element they… resonate, is a good enough word for it, as I can’t translate the Syreene word for it. Fae, silver, and wind; Cherumib, gold, and water; Djinn, brass, and fire; and Syreenes, with aluminum (more often tin, aluminum is quite rare), and earth. Silver resonates most purely with Haki and Magic both; gold doesn’t tarnish; brass doesn’t melt easily; and aluminum is a fairly common superconductor.

Essentially, a radio wave is a vibration. When it hits a conductor, they make the conductor vibrate. The main problem is that the vibration loses more energy due to resistance- think of it as friction, okay? Aluminum is precious to the Syreene because it’s a superconductor, which means at the right temperature (or with the right runes to control it’s temperature) aluminum has exactly zero electrical resistance. Which means a lossless signal.

When a wave hits a conductor, it makes the conductor vibrate; and in this case, the vibrations are so small that they’re almost impossible to hear. A crystal (or diode) can help adjust the signal, and a very, very sensitive earpiece to hear it. When using a powered radio, it adds that power to the circuit, amplifying the vibrations until they become loud enough to easily hear. That’s what the battery, or plug, does. No matter the kind of radio one has, it’s always picking up radio waves- signals- even when the power is off. I sleep during the day because the background noise of everyone else creates a curtain of sound behind which I can rest; at night, the signals are so loud, I can’t sleep at all.

I’d probably be nocturnal even if I hadn’t been a weather captain.

The wire is the skeleton of the radio. It serves two purposes: it catches the radio waves, and it allows one to tune the radio. The wave catcher- or antenna, if you’re being proper, and the tuner- well, coil; have many configurations. As simply as possible though- insulated wire and magnet wire are the same thing. It doesn’t matter which you use, though I used magnet wire because I liked how it looks. As for gauge- 16 to 20 gauge is best in my opinion.

As for the crystal, save yourself some trouble and use a damn diode. They look… kind of like catfish whiskers. Honestly, they’re fixed-whisker radios- that is, it’s a cat’s whisker radio, but fixed so it can’t move and sealed so dust can’t fuck it up. Crystals are filters- they transfer a signal in one direction, but not the other.

When you have a circuit, the signal will flow anywhere it can, even backwards; if your signal is flowing both directions, unshielded, you’re going to get a giant mishmash of signals if you try to listen to it. There is a reason I grew my hair out, and a reason I always used a snail to broadcast, no matter that I technically didn’t need one. Unfiltered signals cancel themselves out, contaminate each other- it’s aural fog, it’s like… like… nothing I can describe, really. It’s loud and whining and there are voices and buzzing and- and when I was a child, I heard voices. Some would speak and some would sing and some would scream but that was always- always just- me-

The point is, it’s unlistenable. To fix that problem, you use a diode to filter your signal on the circuit. That way, you only receive one version of the signal at your earpiece.

Think of it like a pool of water. The water is everywhere in the pool at once- like electricity in a circuit. If you throw a stone in the pool, waves will travel out from where the stone hit the water; and if you measure the waves at the edge of the pool, you’ll get an unimpeded signal from the waves you made. If you throw two stones, however, the waves will meet eventually, canceling each other out and destroying the purity of either signal. The normal state of a circuit is the two-stone pool; adding a diode turns it to a one-stone pool, allowing a pure signal to be measured at the end.
The earpiece is where the signal ends, once it’s been collected and filtered. In order to actually hear the signal, I need a specialized earphone; modern ones are built to use more power than can be had with a reasonably sized antenna. Building your own is better than purchasing, because only one company makes the ones you need and they are shit. I also recommend buying an antique- you want magnetic headphones, in that case.

I built my own, remember.

Finally, resistors. Resistors are gates, managing how much power goes through a circuit; if your antenna exceeds a certain length, you’ll blow your diodes. Don’t do that; use resistors. I used a 47k resistor, which is complicated to explain without a lot of technical jargon. Basically, the number refers to how much pressure of electricity the resistor gives the circuit- how wide the gate is. The longer the antenna, the more resistor you need.

As for making a radio, it’s pretty simple- take a nonconductive cylinder- toilet roll, dowel, anything that doesn’t hold a charge- and wrap wire around it. Leave the insulation on, which in my case means the enamel; and make sure the coil is tight, not loose. You want to make something that’s between four and sixteen centimeters in diameter, and hollow down the middle. The less material there is between the wires, the stronger the magnetic field they generate will be. Wrap your wire around your coil form. Every third turn, make a tap- a little loop of wire that sticks out. You need to do a total of about forty turns, and you should end up with 13 taps.

This makes our coil into an effective homemade variable resistor. Variable resistors- potentiometersare devices in all sorts of things like volume knobs, dimmer switches, and so on. Anything that needs a variable amount of power has a potentiometer. In a radio, the variable resistor tunes the signal by artificially lengthening and shortening the magnetic field. I have to sand off the enamel on the taps with sandpaper- or really, emery boards. I also make sure to leave slack at the beginning and the end, because I’ll need to connect those ends to other things. Once that’s done, the rest of the radio is just a matter of connecting the coil to my other parts.

The top of the coil connects to my antenna; soldered to a special copper-rune, because I’m crap at taping, really. The sister-rune is in each stud of my earrings; and the bottom of the coil connects to the ground, which is very important for getting a good signal. A ground is how the circuit dissipates excess electricity. Ground is exactly what it sounds like- ground. Ideally, what I’d do is pound a metal rod a few feet into bare dirt, and then connect the bottom of my coil to it. I don’t have that- so, I did the next best thing. I put a different copper-rune at the bottom, and put it’s sister in the ear that doesn’t have the headphone. Syreenes are of the earth, after all.

Strictly speaking, a ground isn’t necessary. Neither is an antenna; the coil can function as an antenna in it’s own right. However, without an antenna and a ground, the signal is extremely faint.

Once everything is wired up, I just move the diode-wire around on the taps of my coil until I hear something; and then, I carefully by way of runes put everything into a particularly cool mask and put the whole assemblage away.

After all, I only made it so I wouldn’t get too nervous about the World’s Worst Bakers event the Cool Kids are about to participate in. Frankly speaking, I was too chickenshit to view Mince or Oz compete; Mince I heard screaming foul imprecations even here, and Oz caused a massive explosion, and I know it was him because I recognized the laughter- but Deborah would be heartbroken if all of us didn’t support her, I know she would.
So.

Off I go.

For those herbalists who tend to others and themselves from the carefully accrued bounties of the earth, such medicines are just a scrupulously crafted. As such, there is a long held conviction; any tincture, no matter how diluted, will always work. Even should it be stretched to it’s snapping, the potency is no less dulled, to the point of impossible circumstances.

I have drunken three drops of Black Tonic in a liter of water and I feel more awake than I had ever thought possible. The coffee has succeeded in finding my weariness, dragging it into an alley, and gutting it. Up coffee! I’ve never drunk coffee before I always thought it made people too dependant on its effects what a fool I have been I feel like I could do anything why am I standing in this line I should be running or fucking or swimming or doing long division or drinking more coffee or-

Focus focus focus the line is shorter now and the sun has moved ‘tis passing strange I feel wonderful my mind is thinking faster than I ever have before I wish I had drunk that coffee last night then when the Heartbreak had reared up again I could have thought up some solution that was better than cry into my pillow until exhaustion took me away at two in the morning then I wouldn’t have woken up so wearied today and cutting myself by peeling-

Wait what how did I even cut myself peeling an apple with a knife bad luck bad luck what is with this line it keeps jumping around and what was Mab saying? “Ar eyoua Llright?” What kind of made up language was that wait isn’t all language made up-

I regained consciousness, unfortunately, right before my turn on stage. My head hurt, the sun was too bright, and the world was much too loud. I shall never drink coffee again so long as I live; somehow, I’ve sleep-waited in line. I’m next.

Miki; Miki, I’m so sorry.

“Miss? Miss Vinsmoke? Are you competing?” one of the judges asked.

I snapped back to reality.

“Miss?!”

“Yes! Yes, sorry; I am competing,” I said as I walked up to the table and the impatient judges.

A Nokken man and a Demon woman are seated across the table from me; both wear a badge that designates them as official judges of the WWB. An alchemist holding a smoking black flask was the obvious taste-tester; and from the annoyed looks on all three faces, they had likely rolled snake-eyes on running this preliminary, though the Nokken is at least pretending to be friendly.

“Please present your signed acceptance form and be quick about it. We already have more competitors than we were supposed to,” said the Demon woman before turning to the Nokken man. “Honestly, the semifinal tryouts were far too generous this run.”

“Well, that is why we’re out here. Reduce the number to a manageable level,” the Nokken said, barely looking at me. “You’ve already turned away nearly half the applicants; now we have less than the expected hundred.”

“Just makes our job easier in the next round of cuts.”

“As you say- I say, miss!”

I’ve taken my knit hat off and put it on the table.

The Demon glares daggers. “I said present your acceptance form, not your hat. What’s wrong with your hair?”

“I had my form wrapped into my hair so that I couldn’t easily lose it.”

The Demon sneered as she took my chin in a surprisingly delicate grip and examined my hair. “Your acceptance form is illegible. Thank you for wasting my- our- time. Please try again next run.”

“Bullshit. You didn’t have to take this job; and your bad attitude will not stop me from competing. Just because you don’t want to be here doesn’t mean I don’t,” I said, because I’ve been expecting something like this and I am more than ready to die.

The Demon scowled at the Nokken. “If it was up to you, all of the fucking World would be competing. Our job is to narrow it down to the top ten, and that means some people go the fuck home. This form is so covered in hair gel and sweat that I can barely stand the fucking smell of it, much less fucking read it, fuck. The spots on her face are clearly from where ink has rubbed off. If a person can’t even correctly fill out a form, then they don’t deserve to fucking compete. It has to be unanimous between us to allow her in, and I say Fuck No.”

“And I say, Let Her Bake,” a new voice said.

The Demon turned her anger on the new Demon, then blanched at the look she got back.

“S-ser Vinsmoke, I didn’t-”
I looked at Ser Vinsmoke. He’s a big Demon man, with a face identical to Chef’s but the suit is charcoal grey with deep black pinstriping and a bright red silk scarf over his shoulders but not wrapped around his neck- silk, maybe. His tie is a full windsor knot, and his shoes had an aggressively white saddle- with just a peep of a black sock with some kind of berry on it. Not quite a squidberry, it’s plumper than that… Plain white pocket square- I think his suit is of the same kind as Chef’s, just… different styling, maybe? Three pieces? His eyes were a clear blue-green, set in a face that is truly identical to Chef’s, but the facial hair is different, and the hair is a bit curlier. His eyebrows swirl the same way mine do, and his shirt isn’t so starkly white- there’s a red stripe to it, and his vest is a glossy black with a red tint. His hair’s a paler blonde than Chef’s, with a soft red tint to it; another difference. Curly hair, long in front; not like Chef’s at all, that’s how I know he’s not Chef… Mostly, the way he holds his head high- that tight smile; that’s what projects his authority, better than clothes and words.

“N-no,” the Demon woman squeaked. “It’s just… with the chairholder meeting about to start-”

“Pff, please, like I’d want to be stuck in a room with those fuckers for longer than I fuckin have to, hell’s blood. Most of them only care about maximizing profits or keeping the ‘wrong sort’ out, which is not what this competition is fuckin’ for,” Ser Vinsmoke said, before turning to me. “You’ve a strange aura about you; I’m curious to see you bake, fuck.”

I nod, and pull my application out of my hair and hand it in and put my hat back on. The two judges rapidly set up the station for testing. This is it. It’s time to see if my Bad Baking is enough to take me into the top ten of the WWB.

I look at the table in front of me. A bowl of flour with a spoon, a cup of milk, a cup of sugar, an egg, and a stick of butter are laid out. I look up at the judges.

“Combine the ingredients in whatever order you wish, coz, fuck,” Ser Vinsmoke said, giving me a surprisingly friendly, and so far as I can tell, genuine smile. “Whenever you’re fuckin’ ready.”

I’m not ready. I’m not sure I could ever be ready for this. Not after what happened at the semi-finals. I really hope nothing tries to kill me this time.

I lift my hand, taking a deep breath; and, caffeine still coursing through my body, reach out and touch the spoon with shaking fingers.

The effect is immediate.
The gentle cold breeze that had been flinging stinging bits of snow into people's faces moments before stopped dead. The background noise of a crowded fairground faded away. Birds took to the air, squirrels vanished into the trees, a gaggle of geese that had been harrassing a toddler decided now was the time to cuddle it and safeguard it from danger. The sunlight brightened as if a dirty window had been cleaned in the sky, then all but vanished as if someone threw a wet blanket over the sun. The world was silent but for my breathing and the beating of my heart.

The judges shot out of their chairs and retreated a full three paces. Their eyes had widened as they fought against their primal instincts telling them to run. Ser Vinsmoke seemed interested and unafraid.

I took a hard breath, and began. I would finish what I had started. I took my trembling hand off the spoon, grabbed the cup of milk, and then poured it into the flour. The milk curdled midpour, blackening in the bowl. It began to bubble and emit thin wisps of foul smelling smoke. I ignore the smell as best I can as I take the spoon again and stir the horrifying mixture. My eyes burn from the acrid smoke and tears begin to drip into the bowl. Finally, I can take no more and step away from the bowl to attend the remaining ingredients.

I coughed as thick black clouds of smoke rose from the bowl. The clouds pooled and spread in the sky above, turning the already darkened world to twilight and fearful shade. Red lights crackle within the clouds above as they rumble ominously. The winds howled their return, no longer the gentle prankster's breeze from before but wolves baying for blood. The mixture stopped smoking. It was ready for the next ingredient.

I coughed as thick black clouds of smoke rose from the bowl. The clouds pooled and spread in the sky above, turning the already darkened world to twilight and fearful shade. Red lights crackle within the clouds above as they rumble ominously. The winds howled their return, no longer the gentle prankster's breeze from before but wolves baying for blood. The mixture stopped smoking. It was ready for the next ingredient.

I coughed as thick black clouds of smoke rose from the bowl. The clouds pooled and spread in the sky above, turning the already darkened world to twilight and fearful shade. Red lights crackle within the clouds above as they rumble ominously. The winds howled their return, no longer the gentle prankster's breeze from before but wolves baying for blood. The mixture stopped smoking. It was ready for the next ingredient.

I coughed as thick black clouds of smoke rose from the bowl. The clouds pooled and spread in the sky above, turning the already darkened world to twilight and fearful shade. Red lights crackle within the clouds above as they rumble ominously. The winds howled their return, no longer the gentle prankster's breeze from before but wolves baying for blood. The mixture stopped smoking. It was ready for the next ingredient.

The cup of sugar shook in my hand as I poured it into the bowl. I set the cup down and was about to reach for the spoon when I felt my skin prickle, my very slime quivering. A cackling bolt of red lightning streaked down through the sky and struck the mixture. I shut my eyes and clamped my hands over my ears, curling and rolling with the impact. The flash of light had torn my vision in two, and when I staggered back to a standing daze, it was to see the shattered bowl and the sugar bubbling with red crackles and turning brown then black and the egg a smear of yolk and yuck and powdered shell and the butter molten and burning before me.

The clouds woke and in their fury poured more red lightning into the field around us. The winds howled and screamed, savaging banners and flags and hats. I pulled the ties on my hat out from inside it, and tied it down to my head.

“What you done, fuck?” asked the Demon woman next to me but she sounded so far away. The Demon woman stared at me, eyes wide with fear. “This can’t be real!” she shouted over the wind. “Please tell me this isn’t real!”

“Don’t be a fool!” I shouted back. “This is real as fuckin’ hell and twice as dangerous!”

The forces of the Enemy were too much, and the table collapsed in on itself. The wood splintered and shattered, reducing the table into so much sawdust. The dark mixture seeped into the newly thawed earth. Grass and flowers just sprouted from betwixt Winter’s death-cold fingers died as the circle of corruption spread. The judges backed further away, afraid of what would happen if they touched the black dirt. Ser Vinsmoke smiled.
The circle stopped growing after a few feet, and then the ground began to rumble. Thick black vines burst from the ruined earth. The vines twisted around the circle as sharp thorns and blood-colored sap grew and oozed from them. The wind stopped. The clouds broke open to reveal a single beam of blazing sunlight.

We all stare at the thorn patch. In the center, in the dark green heart of the deadly tangle, there grows a single red rose, from bud to blossom before our very eyes. My breath catches as I look into the rose, and tears run down my face again. I hadn’t known that much beauty could exist all at once.

After only a few moments of life, the rose wilted, dropping it’s petals to the ground and leaving a single rosehip behind. The vines wilted too, thorns crumbling to dust and sturdy tangle withering to crackling brush. I reached out and plucked the rosehip as sound returned to the world, but the judges and the alchemist and Ser Vinsmoke were all silent.

I put the rosehip on the only surviving plate, and presented it to the taste tester. The Alchemist took it, took a small lick, and bolted to the nearby ditch. I turned away as he began puking. The judges were entirely silent, as was I; our silence was broken by Ser Vinsmokes quiet “Well fucking done, cousin.”

He turned to me and spoke loud and clear. “I’ve seen people- men, mostly- with your particular condition enter this competition before. I’m pleased to say that you are the first that has not only my interest, but my full attention. Don’t consider my regard as a measure of ease, moving forwards; put this many bad bakers together in one place, and strange happenings become the norm. I do think that with determination and luck, you will be quite a sight to see- after all, this competition is a stage, and you are the star of your show. It’s not about winning; it’s about making something… memorable,” said Ser Vinsmoke, with a strange smile playing around his mouth.

“Enter her into the finals,” he said to the judges. “She’s proven herself capable. I’m off to lunch-Brother, shall you join me?”

“I’d be fuckin’ delighted, shithead,” said Chef with only the slightest gritting of teeth.

“You too, coz; we hardly know each other, after all,” said Ser Vinsmoke with a smile.

“Ser, I must protest!” said the Demon woman. “It takes a unanimous vote of the judges panel to let an entrant skip the preliminary rounds, and there are only two of us here-”

“Then find the other judges and tell them that I told you to make the vote unanimous for the young woman,” said Ser Vinsmoke without breaking eye contact with Chef… Vinsmoke.

Oh.

Oh dear.

I locked eyes with the Demon and then the Nokken, who could feel the tension ratcheting higher and higher into the air. On the bright side, I’m in the finals; good thing too, as I’m probably never going to be able to do that again in my life. I’ll have to try and pace myself in Germa Kingdom; making it through the quarter-finals only to have nothing left for the semifinals, let alone the final round, would be disastrous.
The Nokken said something.

“Your pardon- could you repeat that, please?” I asked.

“What’s your name, miss?” said the Nokken with a surprisingly hungry look on his narrow face.

“Me?” I scoffed. “I’m Vinsmoke Deborah, the Crimson Tide. Fuckin’ problem with that?”
Fuckin' Degens

I know I’m supposed to be paying attention to the subtext or fuck even the text of the conversation Chef is having with Ser but the caffeine is still playing merry hell with my body and mind and part of the after action processing in the semi-semi finals what the fuck level even is this I don’t understand anything that’s going on right now but a crow just knocked a decorative vase over and it broke my typewriter and ruined my after-action report and I can’t- I don’t-

Beatrix?

“I’m going to fix this,”

“...How?”

“Trust me,”

So as I cry I start to smell a chemical reek and my sister Beatrix is crushing some sort of pill in a mortar and a percolator is perking and I can see a big bottle of Black Tonic Water and she just pours the Tonic into a pot and she adds the powder and she adds the coffee and she adds gunpowder tea and she adds faesh coffee ground fine as dust and she starts stirring and chanting and stirring and the pot steams and she adds an entire one pound bag of sugar and she stirs some more and then she ladled me out a cupful and I drank it and before I drank it I said “nobody lives forever” and she points me at a new typewriter and then I am signing my name to the bottom of a stack of pages and I am walking at a fast clip down the street.

My teeth hurt from chattering and my nose hurts from the cold and my head hurts from the coffee and I want I want something to eat I want something to chew on and I am so very AWAKE I may never sleep again this is problematic and also my very limited precience is starting to kick at me because every daughter of Vinsmoke Aquila was born with some measure of Sight and Fernanda got the most of it and Beatrix has the least so I think she couldn’t possibly know what her actions well meant and very helpful would wrought would wring excuse me upon this earth I’ve got a small scoupon a small teaspoon of Sight and I can usually see what’s edible and what’s only edible once and have you ever had to sit at the same table as two people trying to not start a fight but every twist of phrase and turn and gesture just digs a knife deeper into some conversation you’re not a part of and I’m asking for myself because that is what I’m barely sitting through right now I get up and leave the table and Chef and Ser both stand with me and then I’m quick stepping out the door and pacing up and down the street.

I walk too and fro and too and fro I can’t feel my face and I just want to rest bad baking takes a lot out of a person and I just want a nap but that’s not happening and hello Adelaide “Beatrix told me what she did so I’m spending the rest of the day with you” that’s very kind of you didn’t you have other things to do today “nothing so important it can’t be done later and maybe you can help me too” oh how can I help you “I need a new style” I see what’s wrong with the one you have now “it’s plain and ugly and boring and I want a change” do you have any direction to go in or “or” okay how about cheerleaders because you need to be able to move right and you always like wearing clothing that shows off the flowing movements of your Art I remember “I don’t want to look like a schoolgirl I want to look like a woman” okay how about a swing dress I saw one the other day and thought of you instantly so maybe that would work “lets go check it out oh hey Sanji, someone I don’t know” but I didn’t stay and relisten to introductions I was moving down the street towards the dress I had seen that reminded me of Adelaide.

I had not remembered the train I took to get there until after I got to the station and then Ser Vinsmoke was there and he said “My bodyguard will throw an absolute fuckin’ shit fit if I take regular public transportation, but it takes like half a-fuckin’ hour to change cars on a train so I guess we’re taking public transportation” and then I had a ticket because Chef was the only one of us who actually brought cash money except Adelaide has my savings and her savings but no she shouldn’t open those in public those are our actual life savings because banks weren’t trustworthy where we lived and riding the bus across town with my pay to a bank would be a terrible plan and Adelaide doesn’t even carry a wallet or pocketbook much less a purse and maybe that should be part of her new look I mean I like having money on me when I want it and having money floating around my bag or my skirts is terrible that’s why I always have a coin purse or wallet but the Enemy doesn’t like money so I left it at home.

There’s a store on this train like a store for people who forgot things they needed at home or planned to buy what they wanted on this trip and I can see a coin purse wallet that would be perfect for Adelaide she doesn’t actually like wearing blue all day every day and CLEAVER.

“You can’t just buy every knife you like, Deb,”

“Fuckin’ watch me, Adel,”

“Hmm. How much is it, and dos you haves ones you likes more betters?”

“Uh- says 1400Ƀ, and I don’t have a cleaver that size at all, I always used my Giant Carver which is not meant for going through bone like that is, it’s a slicing carving knife-”

“Okay, so long as you’re sure,”

“Yes!”

CLEAVER CLEAVER CLEAVER I don’t know why I like knives the way I do but I do I am to use a whiteman expression flabbergasted because there’s a whole fucking bank in this train like what the fuck I no this was here I just didn’t care-

“Yes Deborah?”

“Should I have a bank account, Chef?”

“Um. Yes, you should- do you not already?”
“No, we don’t- which bank do the Vinsmokes even use-”

“This one on the train is a branch of the bank the Vinsmokes use, but you should probably be sober when you open your account, coz,”

“Oh. Adelaide?”

“Yeah, fine,”

I blink, and my head hurts, and Chef and Ser are both looking at me strangely and- oh, right, they don’t know.

“Cece’s the oldest; I’m youngest,”

Now they’re flabbergasted, stupid fucking whitemen. No understanding of spectra at all.

I need a drink- not coffee, if I see another cuppa I might actually puke; I want… herbal tea, maybe. Something to get this taste out of my mouth and rehydrate. Ugh, my head...

So here’s the thing about Adelaide that’s kinda hard to realize when you don’t know her as your sister. Adelaide isn’t good at academics- which is not to say that she’s not good at learning, or even not smart; she’s not good at book learning. Her whole life is lived very much in her body- and Mom seemed to understand that very early on.

Adelaide got a choice: Sports, Dance, or Martial Arts. She had to pick two, as she just- she used to go everywhere at a dead run, okay? Like. Sports, Dance, or Martial Arts. Adelaide tried all three, but she fell in love with Martial Arts- she’s an excellent soccer player, and she can probably still waltz if she has to, but she’s a journeyman master in Coral Palm Fishman Karate, and you don’t get that good without love and discipline driving you on. More importantly, she’s not using any kind of magic, and there’s no trick to what she does.

I can do what she does, at a much reduced level- anyone could, really.

Adelaide just straight up beats punk ass bitches down.

“Catch these hands” is the only name she’s ever needed for an attack, and honestly? I can respect that. Unfortunately, that also means her standard response to confusion and uncertainty is punching. Punching, while useful- and she’s very good at it too, no question there- is not always the answer.

I know why she’s here, with me, instead of Beatrix. Beatrix may have made the potion for me but Adelaide is the only one of my sisters who can stop me cold every time without killing me outright, or even severely injuring me. It’s because of Drownies- it always comes back to them.

Here’s the thing- Drownies aren’t Kappa and they aren’t Merrow, and not because of anything physical but because there are some things that get you… thrown away, thrown out, outcast; but when those things are magical in nature, not the breaking of social mores…
Women’s work isn’t supposed to be done by a girl; but there was no one else to do it. And I can’t drown. I swam with the ships that held my stolen brethren; in my song was the taste of metal, the hundred colors of darkness, the loving kiss of death. Come here, I said; come here to me.

Kappa say that Drownies are those who fall to the blood-waters, to the thick promise of vengeance, and when they rise again they are not friends to any living thing. Forever cold and forever lost to the darkness, dragging those around them down, down, down to make you ugly like they are. The unquiet dead; singing songs in the darkness below the sea, killing all who would sail it’s waters.

Merrow don’t say much of anything about Drownies.

I say- something had to be done. They stole five full classes of schoolchildren, and no one cared. The truth is, when a ship’s crew fears the sea, that fear makes them easy to slaughter. To hear a Drowniesong then is a death sentence, because men who have not… sinned, against the sea; they do not fear her. Most men jump in when they hear the song and then their blood turns the waves crimson-red. The worst of them have a strong will, and resist the urge to jump ship.

In that case, a woman’s business becomes… my appellalion, in the language of my mother, is something like “Righteous Evildoer”. That’s what Crimson Tide means, metaphorically- well, there are, mmph, connotations of vengeance and score-settling; of inevitable slaughter and terrible, just, death…

Now that’s something that only Merrow really… conceptualize? Consider? The logic is as follows- those gods that require blood sacrifice are not, technically speaking, alive. Only the living bleed; and the Faesh Gods require blood because they aren’t alive at all, they’re… so far as I can tell, and this isn’t my area of expertise, but so far as I can tell the Faesh gods are… above. More than.

The Gods of the Merrow- even the Daemonic Gods- are Less. So. If something can bleed, it can die; and the gods of the Merrow can bleed; and the gods of the Demons can bleed; and so they can die. There are some stipulations, however. For the Merrow, it’s very simple- a god dies heroically, or as a matter of justice. As for how those terms are defined- heroic, or just- broad, mysterious, and on a case by case basis is the least of it. You can kill a demon god by being a champion of good; a god can die a martyr against the forces of evil. Just; Heroic.

So far as I can tell, Demons have five kinds of death- Heroic, Just, Merciful, Senseless, and Cruel. Each pantheon of the Daes portains to a certain kind of death… and that’s about all I know.

Drownies exist because the Merrow don’t have any gods of the Sea anymore- we cast her out, and we do not pray to her, and we do not speak her name; she is forever diminished in our sight. She was the one who told the pirates how to find our homeland; she was the one who brought the Kappa to our forests and turned them bone white. The closest we’ve got to a deity of the Sea nowadays is the Fathomking, and there’s one of those for every body of water evil was done in. It is said, in the course of duty, a Drownie looks like a waterlogged corpse; and it is said that Drownies sometimes commune with the living world peacefully when negotiating or in the Hold of the Fathomking.

The truth is… I can’t say what the truth is.

It’s never so simple as a story.

So… the closest analogue for Tea was an after school snack- half a sandwich and some milk, an apple and a pear and a slice of watermelon, leftover short ribs and a half-pot of black tea. I’d never really had tiny dainties meant for eating with a variety of teas before, and I’m not sure I like it now.

“Sorry to interrupt your thoughts, Coz, but- back at the competition, you called yourself the Crimson Tide. A name like that- you can’t just take it,”

“You want the story of my Name, Elder Cousin?”

“If you don’t mind, of course,”

“Oh course,”

And so, as Chef orders a gravlax pizza and a big pot of black tea, I explain my name. First came my unforgivness; then, my sinking of the slavers; and lastly, What I Did to That Woman that Hurt My Friend.

When Ellie tells the story, she says something like “she who was raped cut the head of her rapist off and flung it into the fountain at their village’s square and proclaimed that no man would ever again besmirch her honor.” That’s a fancy, sweet-hearted lie, though- the truth is that Miki killed himself, and the horror of his choice- trying to figure out why he chose to cut his wrists and not his hair, why, why did he do that-

That choice that my friend made without me, well. It left it’s mark on more than just him alone. And I have more than enough blood and vinegary and rage for all my sisters and my sister’s friends and Miki, Miki I’m so sorry.

I’m sure there are those of a ghoulish persuasion that want to know what it’s like to cut off a man’s head and throw it in a fountain; they want to know perhaps the metal smell of blood and the color of bone when that blood runs dry, they want to know the weight of it which is about ten to eleven pounds, flesh and bone and all- or maybe they want to remember the arc of it through the air, the smell of piss and shit as the bowels voided the last bits of life from a worthless sinner.

Fun isn’t something one considers when taking up a duty, but that last, which earned for me my name- that did put a smile on my face.

Finally, I explain what a red tide is, and why my color is crimson.

A red tide is an algae bloom that gets out of hand. Algae, drifting through the ocean…

“What are al-gee?”

“Uh- I guess you can’t see down that small. They’re plants, essentially- tiny, tiny plants. Some of them look like, um, snowflakes and seashells all at once; and others can sort of swim. They’re the essential backbone of the oceanic food web, providing tiny little fish the nutrients and getting rid of big-fishes waste. However, when algae are supplied with too much nutrient, they multiply uncontrollably, and become a red tide which smothers nearby ocean life.

“It’s usually runoff from farms and slaughterhouses that does it- that’s why the zoning laws are so strict, you know? And because they’re plants, basically, they produce high amounts of oxygen, which makes the bacteria and little animals that eat them multiply too, and then there’s no oxygen at all- the water goes dead. For about two weeks after that, everything in that area dies too- fish, everything that eats those fish, turtles, and birds. The algae that turns the water red also produces toxins- usually neurotoxin, if that matters.

“It outright kills manatees and dolphins- the water, and the air for a good meter above the water, all of it is poisoned. Us Sea-people are a little tougher- even then, if you swim the wrong way through a dead zone...”

“You can breathe the poisoned waters?”

“I can’t, actually. What I can do is switch to anaerobic metabolysis, which will save me for a time- but the longer I do that, the worse it is. I have to breathe all that shit out eventually- and it smells nasty. Everything that lives through a red tide is poisoned too; shellfish, especially. I… the best poison I can compare it to, on the surface, is strychnine, and that’s rat poison,”

“So you’re called Crimson Tide because-”

“Because of my orangey-red legs, and because of my habit of leaving ship wreckage and corpses floating in the harbor all through the heavy slaving season, yeah,”

“Orangey-red legs…?”

I blink at my cousin Ichiji, and drink some water. It’s warm enough- and Adelaide just came back with a pair of clear ankle boots with pink lacing and pink soles, and they’re my size… I hike my skirt and unlatch my garter clips from my socks, and then I peel them away. My legs wriggle happily. One curls around and helps me slip out of the entire garter belt- I really don’t like them, but they do keep my socks looking nice… maybe tights?

Then I put on a pair of see-through socks, and my new boots, and I realize that Ichiji has turned a bright lobster red and is staring very pointedly at the ceiling of the train. Chef is trying so hard not to laugh I almost thought he was choking.

“Something wrong, Cousin?”

“Nnooo, I just… it’s. Improper? To look at a lady’s legs without permission.”

“You can look at my legs. I have eight of them,”

“Wait wha-?”

And then, for the first time in my life, I strike a man speechless without using a knife.
After a long drawn out quiet, I wriggle my legs in the cool air of the train compartment and pull on my see-through socks; and then I pour my legs into my nice new boots.

I suppose I oughta describe the compartment. It’s a small room with two long benches facing each other; there’s a little table at the end under the window and a small door leading to a corridor. When the tea arrives, while Ichiji mulls over the sudden realization of innumerable legs (I only have eight, though), Sanji pulls a leaf out from somewhere and the table is suddenly large enough for all four of us, and the tea service.

I’m working on my third slice of pizza when Ichiji pulls himself together.

“Apologies for my silence, fuck. Er- Miss Adelaide, how did your treating with the bank go?”

“Well, uh. I didn’t know starting a bank account was as simple as saying “I’d like to start a bank account” and having some money to deposit. Uh. I have a checkbook, a balance book, a charge card, and petty cash now? You do too, sis, I opened one in your name-”

“Uh. Thank you?”

“Mm. That’s where most of your savings are, natch,”

“Oh! Thank you! Wait fuck-”

“Yeah, we need pocketbooks now; coin purses, too,”

“Nooooough-”

“Yeah, you’ve gots alls thats money shits, plus your throwings knives, plus thats cleaver, plus whathevers herbs and spices you come across you wants to eat later, plus your emergency stashes of herbs and spices, plus-”

“Okay, okay, fuck. Pretty ones are so expensive though!”

“I knows; still, it’s a necessaries expense,”

“Uuuugh. And it’s not like we can just get black ones, Mom forbid funerary colors and there’s no one else we know who’s dead-”

“Yeah, peoples who wears black when no ones personally deads are total drags to bes arounds, fuck,”

“I don’t wear black all the time!” yelps Sanji.

“It’s a religious thing- wait, you don’t?” said Ichiji.

“Oh, right, you were sick- yeah, I got myself kicked out of Temple School right before I ran off, and I had been having doubts in the Faith before that for obvious reasons, and I just… don’t wear black all the time,”
“...What the hell did you do to get kicked out of Temple School, Snooj? Because if inviting the entire Forest Court to Cousin Hilda’s blessing ceremony didn’t do it—”

“Heretical Victorious Play, with the added bonus of I actually wrote it,”

“...Go on,”

“Alright, so, firstly, you remember how I was always hiding in the library?”

“Looking back, it was an excellent strategy- particularly because our brand of stupidity was absolutely Not Allowed anywhere near all those books,”

“Right, so, uh- this is how our Daemonic Temple had me, a nice Fae boy, rewrite their Victorious Play and inadvertently got the province hooked on 3rd era Agnonostic heresies,” “You’re Fae? Since when?”

“Since I got married- by Her laws and ours, we are one flesh under the gods, and the Faetheon outrank the Daemonia by about… four thousand years of recorded history? Anyway- our youth group leader had decided that the Victory Week play they did yearly was stale, and needed a little spicing up. I had just done a production of- uh, something...”

“The Four Kings of Hell and The Queen Who Ruled Them—”

“Ah, yes. My second try. Anyway, I had helped do staging and rewrites for Four King Hell Queen, you know, making the sex merely suggestive when it’s right there in the text so’s we didn’t get arrested by the Moral Authority Officers, figuring out how to have a man turn into a flock of poison-feather birds without getting anyone killed, normal stage stuff… so the nicest nun ever, Sister Olga of the Radiant Blade, she asked me to do this thing for the Temple, please Prince Sanji,”

“Oh fuck,”

“Mistake number one. Relevant backstory for you two young ladies- the five of us, Ichijun, Nooj, myself, Yargle, and the lovely—”

“-and ever furious—”

“Ghostface Killer-dilla, were enrolled in Theologics almost before we could reasonably speak, in the vain hope that we’d turn out devout Demons. Ichi was kicked out for asking too many complicated and very logical questions; Nooj...”

“He straight up became a heretic and joined the Joculators, before running away to the Circus,”

“Really? Good for him. I was increasingly outrageous- as for Yarg and Ghostface...”

“Yarg became a Maena; and Ghostilla is... so far as we can tell, she’s become an actual philosopher. She lives in a large clay pot somewhere in the Germa Fleet, and has so far evaded all attempts at arrest,”

“Anyway. Apparently, everyone had forgotten that I was the one to personally and correctly write and address the multitude of invitations that got the Forest Court to attend my Cousin Hilda’s blessing ceremony, in blatant and direct violation of several thousand years of tradition. I was the one who wanted to give employment and education and health services to the poor, not merely alms; I was the one who had serious inquiries to the nature of the Gods divinity, and was ten-thousand percent willing to backup my questions with a blade; yes, YES, t’was I that set the blaze! Ahem,” “Snooj you dramatic shithead,"

“I was told to write a series of monologues from the perspective of different characters present for the Great Victory of Udoroth: Kostcheki the Deathless, The Queen Morgan, Scratch the beloved Page, Calypso the Bearer of Waters, Cu Chulainn, The Prince with a Thousand Enemies, The Bereaved Crows, and Jellicent the Betrayer. This was also about the same time I heard the entirety of ‘The Lesser Key of Hell’ and whoo, did I have some thoughts. I was also voraciously reading Agononostic Gospels, Daemonic archaeology and archaeo-sociologic texts and reports, all kinds of stuff. This is not exactly going to produce a good, proscribed, super legal Demonic script. So, not wanting to get anyone arrested or even worse- killed- I ask the nice nun if there’s any guidelines I should adhere to maybe?”

“Read: How far can I go with this before someone calls the Morau?”

“She told me, ‘Just write something really engaging, mi’lord. Make them feel like understandable people. You’re a good writer; I’m sure you’ll think of something.’ That was the second mistake,”

“Yes she did. Anyway, I was stoked high and burning hot, all of nine years old and ready to get to work. I went to the library; read all kinds of sources and gospels that didn’t make it into the canon. I read all kinds of things, did actual studies in modern psychology and, uh-”

“Why Does He Do That?”

“Yeah, that was one hell of a find, I tell you what. Anyway- I did my research, made my notes. And then I started writing.

“Koschei the Deathless was an abusive, controlling monster; and when his foster son fought the Leviathan, all that was needed was a single moment of aid. Kostecki refused- because his rebellious son represented a threat to him, because his authority had to be absolute in order to repress the zealots trying to revolt against the Emperor of the Others at the time, Condemnation.

“The Queen Morgan was co-suffering with her husband, vicariously experiencing the agony of Demonic Victory only without the stasis of Abduction. She was a living martyr, an unending reminder of the necessary evil required to free the world of the suffering of tyranny; and she redeemed the world created by suffering in it, and with it, and not leaving it behind.

“Scratch was in love with Udoroth. Full-out romantically in love with Udoroth. Wanted to kiss his wounds and let the spirit transcend the flesh that had betrayed them all; took up Udoroth’s mantel instead, and helped slay Kostecki when the time came, tricking the Demons into their unending faith.

“Calypso the Bearer of Waters was a converted priestess of the Sea; she was the sacred vessel carrying the faith in Udoroth’s return, unwilling to flee from the war or the reconstruction. She was the embodiment of the Femme Divine, unafraid of death or toil.

“Cu Chulainn, peer to Udoroth; he was one of the few people who really understood Him, and was His genuine friend, and was said to mourn Him forever after. A bro, really; and one hell of a wingman, according to some of the heresies I was absolutely not old enough to be reading.

“The Prince with a Thousand Enemies, peer to Udoroth, was a sobbing, miserable coward- brilliant as the sun. He made the Compass that would find Kostecki’s palace, hidden Between the World and the Would; he had foreseen the war that would take his friend, and that only a betrayal of that friend would create the circumstances that would allow the death of the Deathless,”
“The heart inside a crystal inside an egg inside a bird inside a chest inside a tree guarded by a dragon in a garden of a magical palace no one could find, excepting on certain impossible occasions,”

“Just so. The Bereaved Crows- or Memorial Mob, I can’t remember-”

“Memorial Mob sounds more like you, Snooj,”

“Well. Udoroth did not achieve his great and terrible Victory alone; he took the generals Solitaire, Muktar, and Zaffire with him. Solitaire, of course, is a heavily debated figure in his own right- and I almost wrote a passage for him, but, hah, I couldn’t find enough credible sources for him. As for Muktar and Zaffire, they led what would become our family shinobi, back when they were just wild ninjas. The records of the Gravedust go back a long, long way- and they actually did have something to say about it. Basically, it amounted to ‘They followed our lord into battle, and fell. We mourn them forever; and we move on.’ Because of that, I made their part a dance sequence to some truly excellent lo-fi jazz ,” “Yeah- until you said that, I didn’t realize that crazy fever dream I had was one hundred-thousand percent real. You know they still have dance parties to lo-fi jazz and hip-hop?”

“Really?”

“Ninjas of all ages like dancing,”

“And then there was Jellicent . I had to make the greatest traitor in Demonic literary canon, up there with Noland the Liar , Stealth Black , and Honey Bee , into someone human; relatable, understandable. That’s what the nice nun wanted of me,”

“Mistake number three;”

“I wrote Jellicent chosen by Udoroth to betray Udoroth as part of the great Victory. That Jellicent, like Morgan, was an outstretching of His great power. Udoroth knew what Victory would cost- because, of course, the Thousand Prince told him at the start of the war. And Jellicent was chosen to betray his Lord, because someone had to; without his betrayal, the War would not be won. Jellicent created victory with a scream.

“I admit, I took a bit from the Second Key to Hell; it ended with Jellicent being unable to cope with what his Lord had asked of him, thus killing himself and trusting that his Lord- when he returned- would understand, and forgive him of doing the terrible thing asked of him. I inadvertently wrote a Victory Play that fulfilled the promise of Glory with the death of Jellicent; making the creation of the Sword of Victory possible through sacred betrayal, and unending sacrifice,”

“...People who commit suicide don’t go to the Halls of Valor, nor the Valley of Rest,”

“No. They don’t. I’d read something about this somewhere in my research, y’know? It stuck with me. What I’d read was a 3rd Age Heresy that saw Jellicent as a savior of the Demons in his own right, destined to make Udoroth’s great Victory against the Leviathan possible. No one noticed.

“The nice nun was delighted- she’d never read a Victory Play more engaging. We went straight to rehearsals, and no one informed any of the monks. The guy who played Jellicent was amazing; holy madness and unending despair live onstage. We orchestrated it so well, too- we had lighting, and live accompaniment, and we even dug up some of the really old liturgical music. You know- ‘It Ain’t Fair,’ and so on,”

“Where in the hell did you find that tuba player? Had iron lungs on ‘im, fuck,”
“The brass section was all clowns, Iji,”

“Not.”

“For true. So… there were three performances. One on the Saturday before War Week, one on Bone Friday, and one on Saturday the March the Battle. They were very nearly standing room only. People were raving about it; nobody had ever seen such a good Victory Play. People from other temples showed up; people who weren’t even Demons showed up. Another temple asked me to write a Victory play for them, just a little less Daemonic, please? And no one mentioned the Agonostic heresy of Jellicent being the ultimate Victorious by offering his own future salvation as guarantee for every other Demon there was and ever would be.

“I actually got very good at writing plays of all kinds, not just Victory plays. For example- were you aware that Mosh, when called by the Elders to become a prophet and lead the People from their chains, very nearly turned himself into a goat in defiance? He didn’t think he was enough for the job asked of him. Deborah—killed a general in his tent with a tent spike and her own two hands. Our cousin is named for her, I think.”

“...Coz, are you named for the-”

“Yes,”

“...Ah,”

“Anyway; by this point, I had spread Agonistic heresies across the entire fleet because no one had stopped me, and no one had taken any real notice,”

“Until they did,”

“Until they did, yes. The nice nun who’d asked me to write that first play got a letter from the archfiend asking why she was allowing the youth group to perform heresies for the entire district of the upper Hell, and did she know another district wanted to do it? So. Our Sire, and the district priest, and the Marshal, and the nun who started it all called me into the Hall of Judgement and asked me to explain how I’d written this play. In other words: Did I know I was spreading heresies?

“So I said: I just wanted to make it make sense why someone would betray someone they love and think is a God. If a God has to die to save the People, and that death had to be the Victory, and the Victory and the Death that would produce it was all foretold by another God, then why wasn’t obeying the strictures of fate a holy act- Sister said to make it understandable to anyone!

“And so, I did.

“This was when I was told very firmly by both Himself, and the priest— the sister and the Marshall were both quite silent on the matter— that my Victory Play needed to be rewritten for next year. The Marshall even had a letter from the archfiend- a list of heresies I’d need to excise from all future versions of the Victory play.

“Now, girls, understand- I am an evil-minded shithead on the nicest of occasions; in this moment, I knew exactly how to get myself kicked right out of Temple School for good. They said to excise all the heresies on the list? Fine. I had a whole sheaf of notes of heresy and hearsay that was just as plausible, just as engaging— but for reasons of fame, I’d gone with those now barred. What followed was a full year of revision, and then my Victory play was put on again— this time with every fitting heresy except those listed by the archfiend, as requested. I made sure to tell the temple goers this as well, in the introduction to the play. I certainly removed those heresies the archfiend was so kind as to inform me of; and they would not appear in the play to come, of course.”

“Hells Bells, Snooj,”

“They certainly couldn’t keep me in the Temple after that; certainly not after I asked so very many questions and in such prose. I don’t know what happened after that; I was asked firmly to leave and not come back. And the next year.”

“The Victory Play was a goddamn disgrace!”

“Yeah, apparently people kept calling about the Good Victory Play from Last Year, and the Really Good One from The Year Before; and lots of districters went to the Mortis Cult Grounds or the Faesh Songhouses to see them. The pri-fiend, shit, sorry, the title is fiend; the fiend had to send out a strongly worded letter telling districters not to go to any of my Victory Plays because they were heresy and would endanger their immortal souls and their entrance into all the Hells. That was when Grandmere stopped hoping I’d become Daemonic, and contented herself with me being merely a Demon. Honestly…”

“She yet lives,”

“Do you suppose she’ll be relieved that I’ve converted to Faesh Songstering? I can’t infect any more districts with my artistically compelling Agnostic heresy.”

“I… Snooj. Sanji… I think a bit more Agnostic heresy would do the People some good,”

“Ichiji?”

“…I know you and He don’t get on, b-but- lupus!”

“…”

“Lupus can present as schizophrenia; in Demons, early indication of schizophrenia is characterized by abuse of family and friends. We started rolling lupus screenings a few years ago, and we of Vinsmoke got the vaccines as, as examples… and it was like night and day, Snooj. Like night and day. He’s not the same man,”

“…”

“Don’t the Fae say a man is always worthy of forgiveness should he do wrong?”

“Yes. But it is not required that he be forgiven. Let the past go, yes yes; let him be a part of my life yes, sure- that would be very noble, very… kind.

“I am not that man.

“If you wish to remain something like a friend, do not speak to me of this again,”

I’ve never heard Chef talk like that before. There was a kind of rumbling finality in his voice; an authority I could not disobey. Ichiji’s jaw bulged with clenching muscles and his lips turned bright white from being pressed together and I could see clearer than ever that they are brothers and then he breathed out and then he breathed

In

and visibly, painfully, begrudgingly, dropped the subject and picked another.

“...He is getting married again, soon. I’ve an invitation for you- your wife, your girls and boys, your whole crew. He would quite like to see you there, you know?”

“I’m sure he would,”

“And, um- she’s very nice, that He’s marrying. I’m to be coronated half a year after- so, ah,”

“Congratulations,”

“Thank you,”

“...Is our stepmother... cute?”

“Ah- well, she’s... actually, she might be smarter than Him?”

“...”

Goddamnit and it was going so well, too. Fuck. I don’t know what the hell keeps setting Chef off but... maybe he doesn’t either? Huh. I’m not the friendliest person, and I know it; neither is Adelaide, really, which makes it doubly ironic that we both have to work so closely with people in our professions. Mmph.

And here we are-

“Okay, mission two, finding that dress for you Adelaide,”

“Wait, what the fuck was missions one?”

“Fucking getting here, Del, fuck,”

I stagger to my feet and out of the train and out of the station and walk at a brisk pace and stumble up a set of stairs and cross the bridge and here we are. Thrift Store, Bay-be.

There, underneath the marquee, because once it was a theatre, where once stood a ticket seller and a popcorn seller and a cigarette stand there now stands a legend in words writ in gold.

FOR LACHRIMOSE KALENDA, WHO DREAMED SINCE SHE WAS A CHILD OF USING A BALLOON TO FLY; WHO IN 982 SPENT FOUR THOUSAND PENNIES OF HER CART-DROWING MILK DELIVERY SALARIIUM TO BUY SUPPLIES FOR SUCH A THING, INCLUDING ONE LAWN DECK CHAIR, FORTY TWO SILK BALL GOWNS, AND A FRIGHTENINGLY LARGE AMOUNT OF HELIUM GAS, WHICH SHE USED-AFTER STITCHING THE SILKIEST SILK PORTIONS OF THE BALLGOWNS INTO A LARGE BALLOON- TO INFLATE IT AND LIFT IT THUSLY, ARRANGING IT IN SUCH A RING AND WEB OF NETTING AROUND THE LAWN DECK CHAIR, A STURDY ALUMINIUM TYPE FROM THE PORTGAS MAIL-AWAY CATALOGUE, IN WHICH SHE LAUNCHED HERSELF ALONG WITH HER PELLET GUN AND WATER JUGS, A BALLAST OF SOME FOUR HUNDRED POUNDS, A THOUSAND FEET A MINUTE INTO THE BLUE FIRMAMENT WITH THE GOAL OF CLEARING THE MAPLE-LINE AND ASCENDING TO THE PEAK OF THE MOUNTAIN WHAT STANDS GUARD OVER OUR TOWN; WHO, AGAINST ALL ODDS AND NAYSAYERS FLEW, FROM THE ROOF OF AN OUTHOUSE IN THIS NEIGHBORHOOD IN OUR TUCKLEIGH EVERLASTING TO THE STONY SHORE OF MAPLE SWEET HARBOUR, AN IMPERFECT WOMAN ON AN IMPERFECT FLIGHT PATH WHO BROUGHT HER CAMERA AND TOOK BUT ONE PICTURE OF HER DAUGHTER SCREAMING IN JOY AT HER MOTHERS SKY-BOUND TRIUMPH, AND ANOTHER OF THE SUNRISE AT SEA, AND YET A THIRD OF HERSELF AND HER ARRESTING OFFICER WHOM SHE LATER MARRIED; WHO, UPON HER ARREST BY THE HARBOUR AUTHORITY (AND LATER, BELOVED HUSBAND,) WAS QUOTED THEN AND THERE AND HERE AND NOW AS SAYING:

‘A WOMAN CAN’T JUST SIT AROUND…’

The logo of the shop is a hot air balloon with a lawn chair instead of a basket. They sell pop guns and dresses and possibly sweater dresses with places for pop guns. And their selection of frilly nonsense dresses is exactly the kind of thing Adelaide always tries to talk herself out of but not today, not today, Hells Blood.

One of us better walk out of here happy or I may have to actually knife someone.

Shit, the last time Deb looked like that, she actually stabbed me. I guess I have to actually buy something now.

These dresses are absolutely the kind of thing I want to wear. Although… I don’t like tight sleeves, but this nearly see-through one is absolutely fantastic, it’s going home to my closet even if I never wear it. This lace one is the wrong nude, or I’d take it- ugh, no, I don’t like the lace pattern, nuts. Sometimes simple is better - this one would be good for wandering the harbor town. I don’t like the sleeves on this one, which is a pity- the embroidery on the sheer tulle is really nice.

Ah! I thought the crystals were just polka dots! Well, but there might be a wedding reception or some such I need to go to- an evening event? Dammit, the sleeves- the whole thing, really, is much too tight; I really do like the embroidery, though. Oh gods, oh fuck me, I need it. Fuck.

Oh my god it’s perfect. This is it, this is the dress; I get tired of wearing kimono, and this is so simple in comparison, and it hangs so loosely. It’s perfect.

Now I just need a pair of shoes I can wear anywhere and still fight in, and I’m done for the next five years. Hell yeah! Wait fuck now I need a pocket book; I ahve a bank account and money and none of these dresses have pockets worth a damn and you can’t always add pockets because it ruins the line of the dress and-

Deep breath. Release. There, on a coat rack, hanging artfully- a pocketbook maybe a half-tone darker than my new favorite dress, sized just right for my money and my spending money and maybe a novel, possibly also a small sandwich.

White shoes; demon women wear white as accent color, men wear black. The spectra denote personal birth order, and they are very strict about that, for some reason. I think we actually just picked the colors we liked best, and ignored the Rules about them- so, when I grab a pair of white shoes with bright blue flowers on, I ignore Ichiji’s raised eyebrow. One patch of black shouldn’t be that big a deal, I think.

I go and change into my new clothing; and I seriously think about selling off some of my old wardrobe, but… I should talk to Missus Mab about that first. My boots and jumpsuit get folded up into a paper bag, which Mister Sanji immediately takes from me so I don’t have to carry it. Weird flex, but okay.

Oh! Hey shit, we have money- and there’s an arcade right across from that hair salon! I know exactly what we should do next!

HOLY FUCK THEY HAVE TAIKO NO TATSUJIN HOLY FUCK THIS IS NOT A JOKE THIS IS NOT A FUCKING JOKE-

We can’t spend all our spending money on video games, Del, we have to get haircuts first! Yes, really! I know, we haven’t played it in ages but- no! Haircuts first!

Of all the arcade games in the world, there are only two that I’m good at. One of them is pinball- not pachinko, pinball- and the other is Taiko no Tatsujin. Adelaide likes Taiko no Tatsujin and DDR; I never got into dancing games, sadly.

I don’t know why I’ve kept my hair long for so long; I guess I was… trying to prove myself, somehow. I got a sweater to change into after my haircut- I hate the feeling of cut hair on my skin.

After our haircuts- Del’s is short, but mine is shorter. - I changed into my new sweater dress and we went over to play at the Arcade and Sanji had to stick near the skee-ball and the hoops, you know the carnival games and so on. Ichiji convinced Sanji to play some sort of shooting game with him, which Sanji isn’t bad at, but… Ichiji is better.
Hm. Okay. I think I see the shape of the problem. Well- a problem.

“Ne- is there a two player versus mode on Taiko no Tatsujin, or-”

“If there isn’t, there’s always Buck Hunter-”

“Fair,”

Now, how to wrangle two grown ass men into a challenge against us at a game of our choosing… aha! Chirping! I catch Adelaide’s eye, nod over at Sanji and Ichiji, and then smirk. And then I start in on them both.

“You know, I think they’ll make some future paleontologist very famous when they discover their solid-bone skulls,”

“Pfft. I mean, really, dense doesn’t begins to covers it; people who gets close to eithers of ‘em gets trapped in their Event Horizons,”

“I won’t deny they have hidden depths but they’re less like the leviathan filled Sea and more like the lost sock compartment of the clothes drying machine,”

“I’m fairly sure that if I shouts directly into Ichiji’s ears canals, he’ds echoes,”

“I’m fairly sure that when Sanji describes his ancestry it sounds like a charcuterie board but in person he’s velveeta, grape jelly, and spam,”

“Some things ferments and improves with age, sis- wine, cheese, other things worth havings; all these twos did was decompose,”

“Who can blame them, really? Some people- gossips, not like us-”

“Of course-”

“-say that Ichiji slept his way to the top,”

“That’s bullshits!”

“I know, Ichiji is nowhere near the top,”

“Well, you know, some peoples say that whens Sanji left the Vinsmokes to bes a Morgans, he raised the average IQ of both families,”

“Goodness knows I won’t be going to Ichiji’s coronation; I’ve scheduled a root canal that day specifically so I won’t have to,”

“Golly- and I thought I’d at least sees Ichiji’s pieces actually wins at somethings today,”

“Pieces?”

“Ichiji, his frilly ascot, and the ha’walnut rattling rounds his skulls that he uses for a brains,” “Maybe Sanji is better- after all, his inner machinations are a rotating pie display, not half of anything.”

Both men have turned away from the shooting game- something to do with ducks- and are now staring at myself and my sister. They are not amused.

“I loves what they’ve dones with their hairs- getting it to comes outs of the nostrils like that must takes ages, ”

“The tartness of their faces sours ripe grapes,”

“I means, they starteds at the bottoms and beens going downhills ever since,”

“If stupidity was painful, they’d be in agony,”

“Somedays they’ll finds themselves; and they’lls be sos disappointed…”

“I mean, really, any fool can shoot a gun-”

“1, 2- hey, look whats we’ve got two of, sis-”

“But neither of them ever had the skill to beat a drum, more’s the pity,”

“Such a pitys,”

“Sad that they can’t handle being chirped at either, but what else can you expect from a pair a fuckin’ dial tones?”

Ichiji looks over at Sanji, who closed his eyes around ‘sours ripe grapes’, and says “We have to introduce them to Cousin Boris,” and Sanji opens his eyes and both his eyebrows go up and he says “Blast and damnation, not without a camera to catch the looks on their faces. Alright, girls- what’s the game?”

And Adelaide says “Taiko no Tatsujin; women versus men,”

And I say “Who’s Cousin Boris? Nevermind- let’s go,”

Enchanting and code have more in common than most people would think from the outside looking in. Video games are a branch of enchanting, after all; so is fiber art. There’s a reason Havij is my best friend, and it’s not just because she understands my little wierdies on a deep and intrinsic level. It takes a special kind of person to understand what you mean when you say “banana banana banana” in response to Miss Nami asking for the shopping list for your group, or yelling ‘bugfoot’ when you accidentally dial the Whitebeards on your Baby Den-Den which shouldn’t be possible and yet...; someone who giggles when you describe what you’re doing as ‘duck duck goose’ for when Franky is reviewing your projects and you really do know what you’re doing, actually, so you put in some little wrongsies in the first two so he’ll leave the third one alone; and on and on and on. It’s a terribly dangerous business, enchanting- about the most benign thing that can go wrong results in a fairly violent explosion.

Finding someone to be your friend through that… it’s hard.

What I’m trying to say is I’ve been developing a rhythm game for several years now, and Havij has started helping me play-test it. Rhythm games are tricky to make.

There are two issues; the most important one is how to make sure you interpret the player’s input correctly, so that they feel like they’re being rewarded accurately, and the slightly less important one is making sure that your graphics match the music, so that it looks like the notes/actions are happening in sync with the music. The music itself is inconsequential- anything will work, honestly.

Because I’m an enchanter, I start with the second one: making sure the actions/graphics are matching the music. My game is similar to Sitar Hero, or Devil Dancer Revolver: as the music plays, notes come falling down the screen towards a "strum bar", and when they reach the bar, you're supposed to press a key. Easy, right?

I could just use a function like this:

```javascript renderNoteFallingDownScreen(id:int) {
    note[id].y = strumBar.y - (mySong.position - note[id].strumTime);
}
```

but everything rendered is wrong. The notes are jittery- stuttery- and when they do finally manage to stutter their way down, it looks like they're hitting the bar about half a second behind the song, especially during framerate dips. So what gives?

First of all, in almost all environments where you're playing back an audio file (or at least the environments I've worked in: AS3, javascript, C#), it's very difficult to get a precise playhead position for an audio file that updates at a reasonable rate (~60FPS). In a perfect world, if you traced out the playhead/position of an audio file every frame, you would see something like this:

0, 17, 33, 50, 67, 83, 100, 117, 133…

But in the real world, the results are going to look something like this:

0,0,0,83,83,133,133,133,133,133,200,200...
Instead of giving you a smooth, consistent output, the playhead updates in steps. What you need to do is interpolate between those steps, which is exactly like interpolation in a multiplayer game.

The easiest way to do this is to keep track of the playhead position with your own variable, and automatically add time to that variable every frame.

There are bad ways to do it:

```javascript everyFrame() {
    songTime += 1000/60; // 1000ms in a second, 60 frames per second
}
```

And slightly better ways to do it:

```javascript songStarted() {
    previousFrameTime = getTimer();
}

everyFrame() {
    songTime += getTimer() - previousFrameTime;
    previousFrameTime = getTimer();
}
```

// OR:

```javascript songStarted() {
    startTime = getTimer();
}

everyFrame() {
```
songTime = getTimer() - startTime;
}

However, all three of these methods are imperfect. Or, to be more precise, your audio playback method is likely to be imperfect. Either way, it means that eventually, your little songTime variable is going to get out of sync with the actual audio playhead. This is especially likely to happen if you're in an environment where the audio is likely to skip, buffer, or crash - like a slime game or a game that streams its music instead of playing from a file. It's also likely to start off with a slight delay because most audio playback routines hiccup at the very start of playback - especially if you're using MP3 files that have encoding data baked in, if you're reading the audio file from a slow hard drive, or if your gamer is using Chromeshell's built-in "flashpaper" plugin, which is a piece of shit.

So in order to take our songTime and keep it consistent with the actual playhead position of the audio file, I like to use a basic easing algorithm to apply corrections every time I get a fresh playhead position, like this:

songStarted() {
    previousFrameTime = getTimer();
    lastReportedPlayheadPosition = 0;
    mySong.play();
}

everyFrame() {
    songTime += getTimer() - previousFrameTime;
    previousFrameTime = getTimer();
    if(mySong.position != lastReportedPlayheadPosition) {
        songTime = (songTime + mySong.position)/2;
        lastReportedPlayheadPosition = mySong.position;
    }
}

This function will automatically take the songTime variable that I'm tracking manually and average it with the actual reported playhead position every time a new playhead position is reported. I only do it when I've just received a fresh report, because if we keep easing it towards the "stepped" valuable in between fresh reports, we're gonna get stuttery playback again. Instead, I'll continue to advance the songTime manually until I receive another fresh report.

But the fun's not quite over yet! You see, all rendering pipelines have delays of their own: the time it takes to actually render the scene, plus a small delay for the scene to make it to the user's monitor (and if they're playing on a TV this delay will be much bigger). On top of the delay it takes for your graphics to make it to the monitor, there is also a delay that happens between the user hitting a key and the keystroke making it back to your program. In most games, this delay is completely negligible, but when you're dealing with rhythm games, you need absolutely perfect accuracy, which means you need to account for that small round-trip delay.

Unfortunately, every person's monitor and input devices are different, which means there is no universal constant we can add to our playhead. Instead, we need the user to run a visual delay test, like the one rock band / guitar hero uses. They use two tests, and we'll get to the other one later, but the one we're talking about right now is this one.

There are lots of ways to do this test. You can flash the screen, or you can show a visual indicator like a metronome, and ask the user to tap along with the indicator. There should be no audio playing during this test: you are trying to calibrate their video lag, not their audio lag. Each time your test flashes the screen (or makes the metronome tick), record that time. Then, when you receive a keystroke back from the user, you just measure the time again. Subtract the time you sent out the visual flash (ping) from the time you received the keystroke (pong), and that's your visual latency.

In theory, it's not possible to have a negative visual latency, because visual latency = rendering lag + input lag. However, the user might be the kind of person who consistently plays their notes a little bit earlier than they think they need to. If they are, and if their monitor and input devices are both very low-latency, it's not impossible to have a negative visual latency, so your system needs to be equipped to deal with that.

Also important: you're going to need to run this test for 15-30 seconds to get reliable results. A single round-trip ping test is not going to be reliable: there are too many variables that can cause inconsistencies, both in the rendering/input process and in the user's ability to keep a consistent beat with your test. Each time your test ticks and you calculate the lag for that tick, add it to an array, then use the average value of that array to set the video latency.

Once you've got the stable measurement of the song's position and a fairly good video latency, it's easy to display graphics and animations in sync with the music, using a formula like this:

```cpp
renderNoteFallingDownScreen(id:int) {
    note[id].y = strumBar.y - (songTime - note[id].strumTime) + visualLatencySetting;
}
```
And there you have it. The visual side of things is taken care of! Now we need to deal with the music itself.

Just like visual lag, there's a lag between when an audio file is processed and when the user actually hears it. Again, there are a ton of variables in this equation, including their audio hardware, their reaction time, and even their distance from the speakers. And to make things even more fun, this audio lag is usually totally different from the video lag, which means we can't just use the same adjustment variable for both of them.

Fortunately, we can account for this audio lag exactly like we account for the video lag, with a test like this. This particular video is using a method where the guitar actually listens and plays the note automatically, but for your game, the user is probably going to have to tap a key along to the beat, which means we're also taking input lag into account here, too.

Because this could result in double-compensating for input lag, you either need to fudge the numbers a tiny bit to compensate, or you need to do the audio test first and apply the result before starting the video test. In other words, every time you get the 'pong' response during the video test, you adjust it based on the results of the audio test.

There are two reasons you want to apply the results of the audio test to the video test, rather than vice versa. The first reason is that audio latency is much more important than video latency. In rhythm games, your eyes guide you to the correct note, but your ears tell you when to play it, so they get top priority. Another reason why it's safer to do the audio test before the video test is because audio latency is usually much, much lower than video latency, which means more of the latency is coming from input delays rather than output delays. Say, for instance, that I run the audio test and get an audio latency of 25ms. If I had to guess, about 20ms of that is coming from the user's reaction time and input lag, not lag between your game and the audio hardware.

This also means that the user is more likely to have a negative audio latency. Again, this is not terribly uncommon, especially with inexperienced players/musicians who will try to overcompensate and end up playing notes a little too fast. It's important to note, though, that a user might get uncomfortable and overcompensate during a latency test, but then once they get into the game, they start mellowing out and hitting notes at the right time - but since they adjusted the latency settings based on early note hits, their timing will be off again.

To solve this problem, your audio calibration test needs to be as close to real gameplay as you can get. The user needs to feel relaxed and in the groove. Listening to a metronome ticking with no background noise is stressful and difficult. In between every tick, there's a lot of dead silence, and during that silence, a lot of people are going to get antsy and lose track of the beat, because very few gamers (and even musicians) are accustomed to following a metronome without accompaniment. To see what I mean, listen to this and try to tap along to the beat, then skip to about 1:15 in this song and tap along to the beat. The second one is way easier, right? I've never understood why Jazz Band uses a metronome tick instead of a simple song with a consistent beat, and I think it's very dumb that they're still doing it after all these years.

Anyway, assuming you applied the audio latency to the video test, that means there might now be a tiny, insignificant discrepancy between the video and the audio, because not 100% of the audio latency comes from user input. These discrepancies can come from hardware delays, the user's reaction time (although this should be minimal; rhythm games are about anticipation, not reaction), and even the time it takes for sound waves to travel from their speakers to their ears - roughly 1ms per foot between the speakers and the user.

Because we tested for audio latency first, the player should always be able to close their eyes and play by ear without any problems, even if the video is a little bit off; but for hardcore gamers, it's nice to allow them to fine-tune things. For that, I like to have a manual adjustment window where I show a metronome or a flash (adjusted by the video latency setting) while music is playing, and let the user manually tweak their video latency setting up and down 1ms at a time until the metronome tick is perfectly in sync with the audio.

Sorry, I know I'm rambling at this point, and I kind of get the feeling that I went way more technical than you were expecting. Just one more thing I wanted to mention. In most environments, you will get a much more accurate reading of a user's input if you take the input reading inside of a listener, rather than checking key states in your main game loop. For example, this:

```java keyPressedListener() { keyDownTime = getTimer();
}
```

...is much more accurate than this:

```java everyFrame() {
    if(keyIsDown) {
        keyDownTime = getTimer();
    }
}
```

Again, this is probably environment-specific, but in the environments I've worked in, event listeners fire near-instantly, compared to frame loops which only process at around 60FPS or so.

Ah, sorry journal- um. For future reference-
Programming is what enchanting is called before activation. Programs are organized lists of instructions that, when executed by activating the magic held within the enchanted object, cause that magic or enchanted object to behave in a predetermined manner. An enchanted object is useless without a program.

A program is like a recipe. It contains a list of ingredients (called variables) and a list of directions (called statements) that tell the computer what to do with the variables. The variables can represent numeric data, text, graphical images; the variables can also represent increasingly esoteric forms of magic, both malicious and benign.

There are many programming languages -- C, C++, Pascal, BASIC, FORTRAN, COBOL, and LISP are just a few. These are all high-level languages. One can also write programs in low-level languages called assembly languages, although this is more difficult. Low-level languages are closer to the language used by a computer (which is integral to the formation of any enchanted object), while high-level languages are closer to human languages. Runes are the highest level of high-level programming languages; binary code is the lowest of the low-level languages. All programming languages can be used to cast normal spells; however, spell-building with them becomes increasingly difficult the closer one is to the higher level languages.

A routine is a section of a program that performs a particular task. Programs consist of modules, each of which contains one or more routines. The term routine is synonymous with procedure, function, and subroutine.

A function has two definitions in programming. One, it’s a named section of a program that performs a specific task. In this sense, a function is a type of procedure or routine. Some programming languages make a distinction between a function, which returns a value, and a procedure, which performs some operation but does not return a value.

Most programming languages come with a prewritten set of functions that are kept in a library. You can also write your own functions to perform specialized tasks.

Two, the term function is also used synonymously with operation and command. For example, you execute the delete function to erase a character.

Anyway. Today, I’m wearing a pair of yellow overalls and a plain white t-shirt, with a headband made out of eye shaped rhinestone pieces; Havij, my faithful companion, and bestie for life, is wearing galaxy tights and winged shoes, with a black skater dress and a surprisingly majestic ponyhawk.

As for why, exactly, I’ve wandered into this side of town, so far from the harbor and the teahouse I’ve been taking care of business… I don’t know. Felt right, I guess.

Havij is carrying the soapbox for me- it’s an old crate I swiped from the kerb. And then, in the sudden lull produced by two young women walking in from the out of doors who aren’t obviously there for video games, Havij sets the soapbox down and I make a quick hop up onto it.

I take the megaphone off my belt and pull it to my mouth. It’s covered in eye stickers and googly eyes and even a few drawn on eyes with a paint-pen. And then, I speak the unrelenting truth.

“Aries: You’re holding on pretty damn hard, there, bucko. Look- you’re bleeding. Let someone else take that for a while, just a little short while.

“Gemini: Decay flies a banner of black and green on a pole made of the bones of the dead.

“Cancer: Loneliness doesn’t make a good story. We all spend too much time alone; even escape needs compatriots.

“Leo: Dizziness is not normal. Take a break; we’ll trade stories.

“Virgo: We twist things into better memories, into better shapes. Given enough time and effort, everything can become art. For better; for worse. What will you forget?

“Libra: Pieces of this, pieces of that. What do you think you are? Nothing but a ramshackle like the rest of us.

“Scorpio: Paranoia marks you like a brand on the side of the sacred calf. You have to trust something.

“Ophiuchus: Holding off the chaos is easier done with a friend, you know.

“Sagittarius: That could be you in a few years. Keep your feet on the ground, and steady underneath you.

“Capricorn: So many threads, so many roots; you are just the trunk. You are the Spine of the World.

“Aquarius: The bees alight on your shoulders. They share very small things with you.

“Pisces: It won’t take long.

“The day shall come when the sky turns to ice, a promise marking a Brutal Age. Once more, rivers shall run dry, and a woman of grey will raise a faith of fog from the depths. The day shall come, yea, and the dogs will sing in chorus and the birds will flee their nests, and a broken man shall mark the fall of a false god and the return of a vicious war. O’ horrors, o’ wonders, the air shall turn white and grey, a challenger will usher forth a Brutal Age of Misfortune, and the return of monsters thought gone. O torment, or something like that, fuck, I don’t care.”

And then I step off the soapbox, and speak again.

“If you have any questions about the prophecies spoken in this place on this day, I, the Seer, will be wandering the woods just outside town, searching for holes in the weft of the World. Thank you,

As I click off the megaphone, Deborah and Adelaide appear before me, smirking. Deborah says to me, “I’m high as a kite,” and Adelaide says “I can punch ghosts,” and the two men who once shared a relationship much like my sisters’ say “We have nothing better to do,” and I say “Onwards, then,” and then we walk into the woods and find nothing except the normal things one finds in the woods.

Mostly trees and plants and so on.

We also find the Best Tattoo Artist in the World.

Deborah asks the Artist Tzipporah for a tattoo, and Tzipporah agrees but only if Deborah can forgive herself, and then-

And then-

And then Deborah tells the Artist a story.

You ask me if I can forgive myself?

I can forgive myself many things. For where I left her; for what I did. But I cannot forgive myself for the year that I hated my best friend, when I believed they’d run away, perhaps to Sea. During that year of hatred, I forbade their name to be mentioned, and their name entered my prayers when I prayed at all, t’was to ask that they would one day learn the meaning of what they’d done- of the fear and pain and shame that they’d brought me, of the red that ringed my eyes and the despair that haunted my every hour.

I hate myself for that, and nothing will ease it, not even what happened that night on the mountainside. Not now- not ever.

I had searched for nearly four years, although the trail was long cold. I would say that I found her by accident, but I don’t believe in them. If you walk the path, eventually you must arrive at your fate.

That was later. First, there was the valley in the backstreets, the grimey bar behind the flower sellers that sat low and toad-warted against the pink coral like a stormcloud on the dawn, cold and grey with a copper roof going to green with age.

There was a girl outside the bar, rolling a marble between her outstretched legs. She didn’t see me draw near, and she didn’t look up until I said, “I used to do that. I got mine from soda bottles and won ‘em off rich little girls and fished them up from the muck at the bottom of sewer grates. I’d wash ‘em clean, then play with them again and again- baseball, blood knuckle, you know.”

She turned. She looked shocked, as if I had appeared out of nothing- and I had not. I had swam and walked many miles, and had many more to go. I said “I move quietly. Is this the bar of Tolly Crookshank?”
The girl nodded, drew herself up onto her webbed feet and her full height, which was maybe a hand taller than mine, and she said, “I am Tolly Crookshank.”

“Is there another of that name? For the Tolly Crookshank that I seek is a woman grown.”

The girl said nothing, just shoved her dusty webbed hand into a pocket under her skirts where her fingers clicked more marbles together.

I said “Your mother, perhaps? Would she be Tolly Crookshank as well?”

The girl was staring at me with honest confusion.

“What are you?” she asked.

“A cecelia; a woman, same as you. And I’m here to see Tolly Crookshank.”

“Why? And why are you so… ugly?”

“Because I have something to ask your mother. Women’s business.”

I saw a smile start at the tips of her lips.

“It’s not a bad thing to be ugly, young Toloi. There was a night when the Crows came knocking on my door, a whole troop of them, twelve men with knives and sticks, and they demanded of my mother that she produce me, as they were there to kill me, in revenge for some imagined slight. And she said, ‘Girl, run down to the Daiso and tell your Aunt Crim to come back to the house, that I sent for her.’ And the Crows watched as the girl ran out the door. They knew that I was a most dangerous person. But no-one had told them that I was a cecelia, a slight one, or if that had been told, it had not been believed.”

“Did the girl call you?” said the girl.

“It was no girl,” I told her, “but me myself, ‘twas. And they’d had me, and still I walked out of the door and through their fingers.”

The girl laughed. Then she said ‘Why were the Crows after you?’

“It was a disagreement about the ownership of property. They thought what they had bought was theirs. I maintained the Crow’s ownership of the property had ended when it washed ashore and came home with me through the Red Gate.”

“Wait here,” said young Tolly Crookshank.

I sat by the kerb and looked up at the bar. It was a good sized bar: I would have taken it for the bar of a brewer or a trader, not of a legbreaker. There were bottle caps in the gutter and I picked them out with my leg and cleaned them in the clear water sluicing from the drainpipe some meters away, and skipped them across the street, one by one, into the storm drain. I have a good eye and a better arm, and I enjoyed rattling the caps over the cobbled street and into the water below.

I had thrown a hundred caps when the girl returned, accompanied by a tall, loping woman. Her hair was salted with white, and her face was sharp and sharkish. There are no wolfsharks in those alleys, not any longer, and the bearfish have all gone too...
“Good morning,” I said.

She said nothing in return, only stared; I am used to stares. I said, “I am seeking Tolly Crookshank. If you are she, say so; I shall greet you. If you are not she, tell me now, and I will be on my way.”

“What business would you have with Tolly Crookshank?”

“I wish to hire her, as a guide.”

“And where is it you would wish to be taken?”

I stared up at her. “That is hard to say,” I told her. “There are some who say it does not exist. There is a certain cave on the Foggy Mountain.”

She said nothing. Then she said, “Tolly, go back inside.”

“Aow, Mum-”

“Tell your father I said he was to give you a gingersnap. You like that. Go on.”

Expressions crossed the girl’s face—puzzlement, hunger, happiness—and then she turned and ran back to the grey bar.

Tolly Crookshank said, “Who sent you here?”

I pointed to the road as it bustled beside us on it’s winding dance through the city.

“What’s that?”

“Road.”

“And there are many who cross it.”

I did not know her then at all, and never knew her well, but her eyes became guarded and her head cocked to one side.

“How do I know you are who you say you are?”

“I have claimed nothing. Just that there are those who have heard that there is a cave on the Foggy Mountain. And that you might know the way.”

“I will not tell you where the cave is.”

“I am not here asking for directions. I seek a guide, and two travel more safely than one.”

She looked me up and down, and I waited for the joke—about my legs, my clothing—but she did not make them, and for that I was grateful. She just said “When we reach the cave, I will not go inside. You must bring out the gold yourself.”

I said, “It is all one to me.”
She said, “You can only take what you can carry. I will not touch it. But yes, I will take you.”

I said, “You will be paid well for your trouble.” I reached into my pocket, under my obi, and handed her the pouch I had hidden there. “This for taking me. Another, twice the size, when we return.”

She poured the coins from the pouch into her huge webbed hand, and she nodded.

“Silver.” she said. “Good.”

Then, “I will say good-bye to my husband and daughter.”

“Is there nothing you need to bring?”

She said “I was a reaver and then a legbreaker in my youth, and both travel light. I’ll bring a rope, for the mountains.” She patted her knife, which hung from her obi, and went back into the grey bar. I never saw her husband, not then, not ever. I do not know what color his hair was, or if he had webbed hands and feet, or a tail, or legs like my own.

I threw another fifty caps into the drain as I waited, until she returned, with a coil of rope across her shoulders like a vest. And then we walked away from a home too grand for any reaver or legbreaker, and we headed west.

The mountains between the city and the coast are gradual hills, visible from a distance as gentle, purple black blue, hazy things- like clouds or smoke or banks of mist. They seem inviting. They are slow mountains, old tired things of the kind you can walk up easily, like walking up a hill- but they are hills that take a full day and more to climb. We walked up the hill, and by the end of the first day we were cold.

I saw snow on the peaks above us, though it was high summer.

We said nothing to each other that first day. There was nothing to be said. We knew where we were going.

We made a fire, from dried seacow pats and a dead seaweed bush: we boiled water and made our dinner, each of us throwing a handful of rice and a fingerpinch of smoked fish into the little pan I carried. Her handful was huge, and my handful was small, like my hands, which made her smile and say, “I hope you will not be eating half the rice.”

I said I would not and indeed, I did not, for my appetite is smaller than that of a full-grown woman. But this is a good thing, I believe, for I could keep going in the worst of times on nuts and berries and leavings that would not have kept a bigger person from starving. I have grown now; so this may not still be so.

A path of sorts ran across the high hills, and we followed it and encountered almost nobody: a tinker and his mule, piled high with old pots and pans, and a boy leading the mule who smiled at me when he thought me to be a lady, and then scowled when he saw me as I am, and would have thrown a stone at me had the tinker not slapped his hand with the switch he'd been using to encourage the mule; and later, we overtook an old woman and a man she said was her grandson, on their way back across the hills. We ate with her, and she told us that she had attended the birth of her first great-grandchild, that it was a good birth. She said she would tell our fortunes from the lines in our palms, if we had coin to cross hers. I gave her a scuffed beri, and she looked at my palm.

She said, “I see death in your past and death in your future.”

“Death waits in all our futures,” I said.

She paused, there in the highest of the high lands, where the summer winds have winter on their breath, where they howl and whip and slash the air like knives. So close to the sea, you could stick your hand through and feel the crushing weight of darkness above. She said, “There was a woman in a tree. There will be a woman in a tree.”

I said, “Will this mean anything to me?”

“One day, perhaps.” She said, “Beware gold. Silver is your friend.” And then she was done with me.

To Tolly Crookshank she said, “Your palm has been burned.” She said that was true. The old woman said, “Give me your other hand, your left hand.” She did so. The old woman gazed at it intently. Then, “You return to where you began. You will be higher than most other women. And there is no grave waiting for you, where you are going.”

She said, “You tell me that I will not die?”

“It is a left-handed fortune. I know what I have told you, and no more.”

She knew more. I saw it in her face.

That was the only thing of any importance that occurred on the second day.

We slept in the open that night. The night was clear and cold, and the sky was hung with stars that seemed so bright and close I felt as if I could have reached out my arm and gathered them, like berries from a bush or a drunk man’s pocket.

We lay side by side beneath the stars, and Tolly Crookshank said, “Death awaits you, she said. But death does not wait for me. I think mine was the better fortune.”

“Perhaps.”

“Ah,” she said. “It is all a nonsense. Old-woman talk; it is not true.”

I woke in the dawn mist to see a stag, watching us, curiously.

The third day we crested those mountains, and we began to walk downhill. My companion said, “When I was a girl, my mother’s working knife fell into the cook fire. I pulled it out, but the metal hilt was hot as the flames. I did not expect this, but I would not let the knife go. I carried it away from the fire, and plunged the blade into water. It made steam- I remember that, and how it burned my nose to breath it in. My palm was burned, and my hand curled, as if it was meant to carry a sword until the end of time.”

I said, “You, with your hand. Me, only an ugly little woman. It’s fine heroes we are, who seek our fortunes on the Foggy Mountain.”
She barked a laugh, short and without humor. “Fine heroes,” was all she said.

Rain began to fall then, and did not stop falling. That night we passed a small croft-house. There was a trickle of smoke from its chimney, and we called out for the owner, but there was no response.

I pushed open the door and called again. The place was dark, but I could smell tallow, as if a candle had been burning and had recently been snuffed.

“No one at home,” said Tolly, but I shook my head and walked forward, then leaned my head down into the darkness beneath the bed.

“Would you care to come out?” I asked. “For we are travellers, seeking warmth and shelter and a place to rest. We would share with you our rice and our salt and our wine. And we will not harm you.”

At first the man, hidden beneath the bed, said nothing, and then he said, “My wife is away in the hills. She told me to hide myself away if the strangers come, for fear of what they might do to me.”

I said, “I am but a little-woman, good man, no bigger than a child; you could send me flying with a blow. My companion is a full-sized woman, but I do swear that she shall do nothing to you, save rest in your house, and dry ourselves. Please do come out.”

All covered with silt and slime he was when he emerged, but even with his face all begrimed, he was beautiful; and even with his hair all tangled and greyed with silt it was still long and thick, and lustrous black. For a heartbeat he put me in the mind of my best friend, but that my best friend would look a woman in the eye, while he glanced only at the ground fearfully, like something expecting to be beaten. A merman of seahorse kind; soft and curvy, like a maid.

I ate my fill. He had no appetite. I believe that Toloi was still hungry when her meal was done. She poured wine for the three of us: he took but a little, and that was with sweetwater. The rain rattled on the roof of the house, and dripped down the corner into the pool we all rested our feet in, and, unwelcoming though it was, I was glad that I was inside.

It was then that a woman came through the door. She said nothing, only stared at us, untrusting, angry. She pulled off her cape of oiled sacking, and her hat, and she dropped them in the pool below us. They floated like corpses on the bottom of the harbour. The silence was oppressive.

Tolly Crookshank said, “Your husband gave us respite, when we found him. Hard though he was in the finding.”

“We asked for no more than respite,” I said. “As we ask of you.”

The woman said nothing, only grunted.

In the high lands, people spend words as if they were golden coins. But the custom is strong there: strangers who ask for respite must be granted it, though you have blood feud against them and their clan or kind.
The man—little more than a youth he was, while his wife’s hair was grey and white, so I wondered if he was her son for a moment, but no: there was but one bed, scarcely big enough for two— the man went outside, into the sheep pen that adjoined the house, and returned with rice cakes and a dried ham he must have hidden there, which he sliced thin, and placed on a wooden trencher before the woman.

Tolly poured the woman wine, and said, “We seek the Foggy Mountain. Do you know if it is there?”

The woman looked at us. The winds are bitter in the high lands, and they would tear the words from the unwary’s lips. She pursed her mouth, then she said, “Aye, I saw it from the peak this morning. It’s there. I cannot say if it will be there tomorrow.”

We slept beneath the water of that cottage. The fire went out, and there was no warmth from the heating stones below. The woman and her man slept in their bed, behind the curtain. She had her way with him, beneath the sheepskin that covered that bed, and before she did that she beat him for feeding us and for letting us in. I heard them, and sleep was hard in the finding that night.

I have slept in the homes of the poor, and I have slept in palaces, and I have slept in trees and ditches and fields beneath the stars; I have slept underneath the bed of working whores, and would have told you before that night that all places to sleep were one to me. But I woke before the dawn, convinced we had to be gone from that place, but not knowing why, and I woke Toli by putting a finger to her lips, and silently we left that croft on the mountainside without saying our farewells, and I have never been more pleased to be gone from anywhere.

We were a mile from the place when I said, “The Mountain. You asked if it would be there. Surely, a mountain is there, or it is not there.”

“The Foggy Mountain is not as other places. And the fog that surrounds it is not like other fogs.”

We walked down a path worn by hundreds of years of sheep and deer and few enough men.

She said “They also call it the Smoke Mountain. Some say it is because the mountain is really the smoke from hell, rising from the depths below. And I do not know the truth of it.” Then, “‘and what is truth?’ said jesting Pilate.”

It is harder coming down than it is going up.

I thought about it. “Sometimes I think that truth is a current. In my mind, it is like a current that flows through the sea: there can be a hundred twists, a thousand trickles, that will all take you, eventually, to the same place. It doesn’t matter where you start from. If you follow the truth, you will reach it, whatever path you take.”
Tolly Crookshank looked down at me and said nothing. Then, “You are wrong. The truth is a cave in the black mountains. There is one way there, and one way only, and that way is treacherous and hard. And if you choose the wrong path you will die alone, on the mountainside.”

We crested the ridge, and we looked down to the coast. I could see villages below, beside the water. And I could see high black mountains before me, on the other side of the Sea Bubble, coming out of the silty mist.

Tolly said, “There’s your cave, in those mountains.”

The bones of the earth, I thought, seeing them. And then I became uncomfortable, thinking of bones, and to distract myself, I said, “And how many times is it you’ve been there?”

“Only once. I searched for it all my my sixteenth year, for I had heard the legends and believed if I sought I should find. I was seventeen when I reached it, and brought back all the gold coins I could carry.”

“And were you not frightened of the curse?”

“When I was young, I was afraid of nothing.”

“What did you do with your gold?”

“A portion I buried and I alone know where; the rest I used as groom-price for the man I loved.”

She stopped as if she had already said too much.

There was no ferryman at the jetty. Only a small boat, hardly big enough for three full-sized men, tied to a trunk of coral on the shore, half dead with white and sharp with salt, and a bell beside them both. Bronze it was, with a smooth handle, the wood still shiny with disuse.

I sounded the bell, and soon enough a fat man came down the shore.

He said to Toloi, “It’ll cost a bobu for the ferry, and three pennies for your girl.”

I stood tall. I am not as big as other women are, but I have as much pride as any of them. “I am also a woman,” I said. “I’ll pay your bobu.”

The ferryman looked up and down, then he scratched his beard. “I beg your pardon. My eyes are not what they once were. I shall take you to the mountain.”

I handed him a ten-beri coin. He weighed it in his hand. “That’s tenpenny you did not cheat me of. Ten pennies are a lot of money in this dark age.”

The water was the color of slate, although the sky was blue, and whitecaps chased one another across the water’s surface. He untied the boat and hauled it, rattling, down the shingle to the water. We waded out into the cold water, and clambered inside.
The splash of oars on seawater, and the boat propelled forward in easy movements. I sat closest to the ferryman. I said, “Tenpenny. It is good wages. But I have heard of a cave in the mountain across the water, filled with gold coins, the treasure of the ancients.”

He shook his head dismissively.

Tolly was staring at me, lips pressed together so hard they were white. I ignored her and asked the man again, “A cave filled with golden coins, a gift from the Northies or the Southies or from those who they say were here long before any of us: those who fled into the West as the people came.”

“Heard of it,” said the ferryman. “Heard also of the curse of it. I reckon that the one can take care of the other.” He spat into the sea. Then he said, “You’re an honest woman, Goblin. I can see it in your face. Do not seek this cave. No good can come of it.”

“I am sure you are right,” I told him, without guile.

“I am certain I am,” he said. “For not every day is it that I take a salt-bitten reaver and a little Goblin woman to the Foggy Mountain.” Then he said, “In this part of the World, it is not considered lucky to talk about those who went to the West.” We rode the rest of the boat journey in silence, though the sea became choppier, and the waves splashed into the side of the boat, such that I held on with both hands and all my legs for fear of being swept over and away.

After what seemed like half a lifetime the boat was tied to a long jetty of black stones. We walked the jetty as the waves crashed around us, the salt spray kissing our faces. There was a humpbacked man at the landing selling mochi and dried plums and fish cut down their spines and smoked until they were almost wooden. I gave him two beri and filled my obi with all three.

Ahead, rising like a wall, there was the Sea Bubble; and along the path, a gate of blackened horn. We walked through the gate, and through the Sea Bubble, and onto the Foggy Mountain.

I am older now, or at least, I am no longer quite so young, and everything I see reminds me of something else I’ve seen, such that I see mostly nothing for the first time. A pretty girl, her hair ink-black and yellow in the light, reminds me only of another hundred such girls, and their friends, and what they were as they grew alongside me, and what they looked like when they died. It is the curse of age, that all things are reflections of other things.

I say that; but my time on the Foggy Mountain, that is also called, by the wise, the Smoke Mountain, reminds me of nothing but itself.

It is a day from that jetty until you reach the black, smoking, mountain.

Tolly Crookshank looked at me, half her size or less, and she set off at a loping swim, as if challenging me to keep up. Her legs propelled her through the water, which was blue, and all fern-weed and anemones.

Above us, shoals of threadfin shad and blueback herring were schooling, glimmering white and silver, hiding each other and revealing flashes of brilliant white sky-waters and hiding again.

I let her get ahead of me, let her press on into the wild waters, until she was swallowed by the shifting, silty haze. Then, and only then, I swam.
This is one of the secret things of me, the things I have not revealed to any person, save to my Mother, and my sisters, and my brother, and my best friend Miki (may the Bubbles cradle their poor soul)- and my chef, Sanji: I can swim, and I can swim well, and, if I need to, I can swim faster and longer and more surely than any full-grown fishwoman or merwoman; and it was like this that I swam then, through the silt and the sweetwater swells, taking to the low current along the black-rock ridges tipped as they were with yellow sea-shells, yet keeping below the reach of branching coral fingers.

She was ahead of me, but I spied her soon, and I swam on and I swam past her, on the low current, with the brow of the hill between us. Below us was a sweetwater current. I can swim for days without stopping, or sleeping, or taking any sort of respite. That is the first of my three secrets; there is one I’ve yet to tell, and one I have revealed to no woman or man currently living. My siblings have guessed my unspoken secret; but I cannot bear to indicate if they’ve the right of it or no.

We had discussed already where we would camp that first night on the Foggy Mountain, and Toloi had told me that we would spend the night beneath the rock that is called Man and Dog, for it is said that it looks like an old man with his dog by his side, and I reached it in late afternoon. There was a shelter beneath the rock, which was protected and warm, and some of those who had been before us had left a leavings pit behind, shells and fins and scales. I swept the sleeping shelves clean of silt, and set out the things I had bought from the humpbacked man. They swelled in the water, and their scent swept out across the purpling seagrass.

It was dark when Tolly swam into the shelter and looked at me as if she had not expected to see me that side of midnight. I said “What kept you so long, Tolly Crookshank?”

She said nothing, only stared at me. I said, “There is sheepshead, swollen with seawater and smoked, and the sand will warm your bones.”

She nodded. We ate the sheepshead fish, drank wine to warm ourselves. There was a mound of fire sand and seagrass, piled high in the rear of the shelter, and we slept upon that, wrapped tight in our kimono.

I woke in the night.

There was cold steel against my throat- the flat of the blade, not the edge. I said, “And why-ever would you kill me, Tolly Crookshank? For our way is long, and our journey is not yet over.”

She said, “I do not trust you, Goblin.”

“It is not me you must trust,” I told her, “but those that I serve. And if you left with me but return without me, there are those who will know the name of Tolly Crookshank, and cause it to be spoken in the shadows.”

The cold blade remained at my throat. She said, “How did you get ahead of me?”

“And here I was, repaying ill with good, for I made you food and a place to rest. I am a hard woman to lose, Tolly Crookshank, and it ill becomes a guide to do as you did today. Now, take your knife from my throat and let me sleep.”

She said nothing, but after a few moments, the blade was removed. I forced myself neither to sigh nor to breathe, hoping she could not hear my heart pounding in my chest; and I slept no more that night.
For breakfast, I stretched the mochi to tenderness, and sliced the plums to get the stones inside them out.

The mountains were black and grey against the roiling white of the shoals above. We saw black rays, huge and ragged of wing, circling high above us. Tolly set a sober pace and I swam beside her, taking two kicks for every one of hers.

“How long?” I asked her.

“A day. Perhaps two. It depends on the currents and the fish. If the shoals come down in two days, or even three...”

The shoals came down at noon and the world was blanketed in their shivering scales, worse than rain: the faint stench of fish shit and piss came with them, and we were buffeted by waves of silt and sour water soaking through our clothes and our skin; the rocks we swam past became treacherously light, tilting and swaying and crashing with the movement of the water. Tolly and I slowed in our ascent, swimming carefully. We were walking up the mountain then, not swimming, up seagoat paths and craggy sharp ways. The rocks were slippery and green with algae: we walked, and climbed and clambered and clung, we slipped and slid and stumbled and staggered, and even in the silt, Tolly knew where she was going and I followed her.

She paused at a current that splashed across our path, thick as the post of the Red Gate. She took the thin rope from her shoulders, wrapped it about a rock.

“This was not here before,” she told me. “I’ll go first.” She tied one end of the rope about her waist and edged out along the path, into the rushing water, pressing her body against the smooth-worn stone, edging slowly, intently, through the sheet of water.

I was scared for her, scared for both of us: holding my breath as she passed, only breathing when she was on the other side of the current. She tested the rope, pulled on it, motioned me to follow her, when a rock gave way beneath her foot, and she slipped on the smooth stone, and fell into the abyss.

The rope held, and the rock my legs and suckers clung to held. Tolly Crookshank dangled from the end of the rope. She looked up at me, and I sighed, anchored myself firmly, and wound and pulled and hauled her up and up. I hauled her back onto the path, winded and breathing curses in tones of awe.

She said, “You’re stronger than you look,” and I cursed myself for a fool. She must have seen it on my face for, after she got back her breath (wheezing and coughing like a seal), she said, “My girl Tolly told me the tale you told her about the Crows coming for you, and you being sent out by your ma, with them thinking you were off to find your Auntie and not yourself at all.”

“It was just a tale,” I said. “Something to pass the time.”

“Is that so?” she said. “For I heard tell of a gang of raiding Crows sent out to Gobdark a few years ago, seeking revenge on someone who’d sunk their ship and stolen their slaves. They went, and they never came back. If a small woman like you can kill a dozen Crows... well, you must be strong, and you must be fast.”
I must be stupid, I thought ruefully, telling that child that tale.

I had picked them off one by one, like rabbit lobsters, as they came out to piss or to see what had happened to their friends: I had killed seven of them before my Mother killed her first. We buried them in the circus lot, where no one played and no one lived; put coins in their hands and stones on their chests, to weigh down their bodies that their ghosts might float freely to the Bubbles, and we were sad: that Crows had come so far to kill me, that we had been forced to kill them in return.

I take no joy in killing: no man should, and no woman.

Sometimes death is necessary, but it is always an evil thing to kill another being like yourself. That is something I am in no doubt of, even after the events I speak of here.

I took the rope from Toloi Cruickshank, and I clambered up and up, over the rocks, to where the current came out of the side of the hill, and it was narrow enough for me to cross. It was slippery there, but I made it over without incident, tied the rope in place, came down it, threw the end of it to my companion, walked her across.

She did not thank me, neither for rescuing her, nor for getting us across; and I did not expect thanks. I also did not expect what she actually said, though, which was: “You are not a true mermaid, and you are ugly. Your mother: is she also strange and ugly, like yourself?”

I decided to take no offense, whether offense had been intended or no. I simply said, “She is not. She is a tall woman, taller than you, and when she was young- a bit older than me, but not much- she was reckoned by most to be the most beautiful woman in the world. The bards wrote many a song praising her purple eyes and her long black hair that shines golden in the light.”

I thought I saw her flinch at this, but it is possible that I imagined it, or more likely, wished to imagine I had seen it.

“How did she come to have you, then?”

I spoke the truth: “She wanted me, and I came as first of a set of seven sisters total- seven in one go. She would not give me up; and she would not let me give up. She said I would be the wisest and kindest of her daughters, and I would always return to her, no matter where my life takes me. And I have.”

The shoals began to lower, once more, and the world blurred at the edges, became softer.

“She said I would be a good sister; better than she ever was, to her brothers. And I have done my best to look after my sisters- who are, save one, if you are wondering, quite normal. And I hardly ever have to thrash sense back into them.”

“I beat sense into young Tolly,” said older Tolly. “She is not a bad girl.”

“You can only do that as long as they are at your side,” I said. And then I stopped talking, and I remembered that long year, and also I remembered Miki when we were both small, sitting together at the bus stop with dirt on our faces, he looking at me as if I were the strongest and wisest in all the world.

“Ran away, eh? I ran away when I was a lass. I was twelve. I went as far as the court of the King in the Clouds, the Father of the current King.”

“That’s not something you hear spoken aloud.”

“I am not afraid. Not here. Who’s to hear us? Black rays? I saw him. He was a fat and ugly man, who spoke the language of the air breathers well, and our own tongues with difficulty. But he was still our King. And if he is to come to us again, he will need gold, for vessels and weapons and to feed the troops that he raises.”

“So I believe. That is why we go in search of the cave.”

“This is bad gold. It does not come free. It has its cost.”

“Everything has its cost.”

I was remembering every landmark—climb at the whale ribs, cross the first three currents, then walk along the fourth until the five heaped stones and find where the rock looks like a seagull and walk on between two sharply jutting walls of black rock, and let the slope bring you with it…

I could remember it, I knew. Well enough to find my way down again. But the silty fogs confused me, and I could not be certain.

We reached a small glade of seagrass, high in the mountains, and drank sweet wine, caught huge white creatures that were not shrimps or lobsters or crabs, and ate them raw like sausages, for we could not find any fire sand to cook them, that high.

We slept on a wide ledge beside the frosted seagrass and woke into shoals before sunrise, when the world was grey and blue.

“You were sobbing in your sleep,” said Tolly.

“I had a dream,” I told her.

“I do not have bad dreams,” Tolly said.

“It was a good dream,” I said. It was true. I had dreamed that Miki still lived. He was grumbling about the fuckboys at the meatpacking plant, and telling me of his time in the hills with the horses, and of things of no consequence, smiling his wide-toothed smile and tossing his hair all the while, ink-black and golden like my mother’s, though they were no relation.

“Good dreams should not make a woman cry out like that,” said Tolly. A pause, then, “I have no dreams, not good, not bad.”

“No?”

“Not since I was a young girl.”

We rose. A thought struck me: “Did you stop dreaming after you came to the cave?”

She said nothing.

We walked along the mountainside, into the silty mist white and cold, as the sunroot behind us lit up.
The mist seemed to thicken and fill with light, in the sunlight, but did not fade away and I realized that it must be a cloud, sunk beneath the waves. The world glowed. And then it seemed to me that I was staring at a woman of my size, a small, dumpy woman, her face a shadow, standing in the air in front of me, like a ghost or an angel, and it moved as I moved. It was haloed by the light, and shimmered, and I could not have told you how near it was or how far away. I have seen miracles and I have seen evil things, but never have I seen anything like that.

“Is it magic?” I asked, although I smelled no magic in the water.

Tolly said, “It is nothing. A property of the light. A shadow. A reflection. No more. I see a woman beside me, as well. She moves as I move.” I glanced back, but I saw nobody beside her.

And then the little glowing woman in the air faded, and the cloud, and it was day, and we were alone.

We climbed all that morning, ascending. Tolly’s ankle rolled and twisted the day before, when she had slipped at the current. Now it swelled in front of me, swelled and went red, but her pace did not ever slow, and if she was in discomfort or in pain it did not show on her face.

I said, “How long?” as the dusk began to blur the edges of the world.

“An hour, less, perhaps. We will reach the cave, and then we will sleep for the night. In the morning you will go inside. You can bring out as much gold as you can carry, and we will make our way back off the mountain.”

I looked at her, then: salted hair, grey eyes, so huge and wolvarkine a woman, and I said, “You would sleep outside the cave?”

“I would. There are no monsters in the cave. Nothing that will come out and take you in the night. Nothing that will eat us. But you should not go in until daylight.”

And then we rounded a rockfall, all black rocks and grey half-blocking our path, and we saw the cave mouth. I said, “Is that all?”

“You expected marble pillars? Or a giant’s cave from a gossip’s fireside tales?”

“Perhaps. It looks like nothing. A hole in the rock face. A shadow. And there are no guards?”

“No guards. Only the place, and what it is.”

“A cave filled with treasure. And you are the only one who can find it?”

Tolly laughed then, like a seal’s bark. “The coasties know how to find it. But they are too wise to come here and take its gold. They say that the cave makes you evil: that each time you visit it, each time you enter to take gold, it eats the good in your soul, so they do not enter.”

“And is that true? Does it make you evil?”

“...No. The cave feeds on something else. Not good and evil. Not really. You can take your gold, but afterwards, things are,” she paused, “things are flat. There is less beauty in a sunbeam, less meaning in a song, less joy in a kiss, less wonder in a mage’s spell...” She looked at the cave mouth and I thought I saw fear in her eyes. “Less.”

I said, “There are many for whom the lure of gold outweighs the beauty of a sunbeam.”
“Me, when young, for one. You, now, for another.”

“So we go in at dawn.”

“You will go in. I will wait for you out here. Do not be afraid. No monster guards the cave. No spells to make the gold vanish, if you do not know some cantrip or rhyme.”

We made our camp, then; or rather we sat in the darkness, against the cold rock wall. There would be no sleep there.

“You took the gold from here, as I will do tomorrow. You bought a bar with it, a husband, a good name.”

“Aye, and they meant nothing to me, once I had them, or less than nothing. And if your gold pays for the King- or the Queen Over the Water to see us and rule us fairly and bring about a land of joy and prosperity and warmth, it will still mean nothing to you. It will be as something you heard of that happened to a woman in a tale.”

“I have lived my life to bring the Good King back.”

“You take the gold back to them that rule. Your King will want more, because Kings will always want more. It is what they do. Each time you come back, it will mean less. The sunbeam means nothing. Killing a woman means nothing.”

Silence then, in the darkness. I heard no wolvarks: only the wind that called and gusted about the peaks like a mother seeking her babe; like a friend calling for a friend; like a lover weeping in the night.

“We have both killed women. Have you ever killed a man, Tolly Crookshank?”

“I have not. I have killed no men, no boys.”

I ran my hands over my obi in the darkness, fingers seeking and smoothing over birds and flowers stitched in thread gone grey with oil and dirt, the memory of love. I smoothed my fingers over the handle of my switchblade knife, smooth and cold. I had not intended to ever tell her, only to strike when we were out of the mountains, strike once, strike quiet, but now I felt the words being pulled from me, would I or never-so.

“They say there was a boy. And a thorn-tree of coral.”

If I said another word, I knew, she would be silent on the subject, and never speak on’t again. So I said nothing. Only waited.

“They told me the ostles of the lowlands were strong and lovely, and that a woman could gain honor and glory by adventuring off to the south and returning with the fine red horses.

“So I went south, and never a horse was good enough until on a hillside in the lowlands I saw the finest, reddest, loveliest horses that a woman has ever seen. So I began to lead them away, back the way I had come.
“He came after me with a stick. The horses were his lord’s, he said, and I was a rogue and a knave and a thief- all manner of rough things.

“But he was beautiful, even when angry, and had I not already a young husband I might have dealt more kindly to him. Instead I pulled a knife, and touched it to his throat, and bade him stop speaking.

“I would not kill him- I would not kill a man, and that is the truth- so I tied him, by his hair, to a thorn coral, and I took his knife from his obi, to slow him as he tried to free himself, and pushed the blade deep into the earth.

“I tied him to the thorn coral tree by his long hair, and I thought no more of him as I made off with his horses.

“It was another year before I was back that way. I was not after horses that day, but I walked up the side of that bank- it was a lonely spot, and if you had not been looking, you might not have seen it. Perhaps nobody searched for him.”

“I heard they searched. Although some believed him to be taken by reavers, and others believed him run away with a tinker, or gone to Sea. But still, they searched.”

“Aye. I saw what I did see- perhaps you’d have to have stood where I was standing, to see what I did see. It was an evil thing I did, perhaps.”

“Perhaps?”

“I have taken gold from the cave of the mists. I cannot tell any longer if there is good or there is evil. I sent a message, by a child, at an inn, telling them where he was, and where they could find him.”

I closed my eyes but the world became no darker.

“There is evil,” I told her.

I saw it in my mind’s eye: his skeleton picked clean of clothes, picked clean of flesh, as naked and white as anyone would ever be, hanging like a child’s puppet against the thorn-bush coral, tied to a branch above it by his black-golden hair.

“At dawn,” said Tolly Crookshank, as if we had been talking of provisions or the water, “you will leave your blade behind, for such is the custom, and you will enter the cave, and bring out as much gold as you can carry. And you will bring it back with you, to the mainland. There’s not a soul in these parts, knowing what you carry or where it’s from, twould take it from you. Then send it to the King Over the Water, and he will pay his men with it, and feed them, and buy their weapons. One day, he will return for us lost souls. Tell me on that day that there is evil, little woman.”

When the sun was up, I entered the cave. It was quiet in there. I could hear the soft rush of water on stone, of sand over sand, and I felt a wind on my face, which was strange, because there was no wind inside the mountain.

In my mind, the cave would be filled with gold. Bars of gold would be stacked like firewood, and bags of golden coins would sit between them. There would be golden chains and golden rings, and golden plates, heaped high like the china plates in a rich man’s house.

I had imagined riches, but there was nothing like that here. Only shadows. Only rock.
Something was here, though. Something that waited.

I have but three secrets- one I have said; one, it is easy enough to guess; and one that lies beneath all my other secrets, and not even my sisters or brother know it, although my twin Eleanor knows as there are no secrets between us, truly, and it is this: my mother was a mortal woman, a Demon and the daughter of Demons, but my father- our father, excepting my brother who was not born of my mother though he is her son all the same- our father came to our mother from out of the West, and to the West he returned by sleeping roads, when he had tired of sporting with her. I cannot be sentimental about my parentage: I am sure he does not think of her, and doubt that he ever knew of us, of me. But he left us with our gifts of magic, and me with a body that is small- dainty hands and flat breasts, fine features and fine hair, dainty legs and tiny pink suckers all down them- and fast, and strong; and perhaps I take after him in other ways- I know not. I am ugly, as mermaids go, for I am a cecelia, and my father and mother were both beautiful- though, concerning my father, I only have my mother’s whispered words, and only once when I came home in tears at being called ugly in school again.

Perhaps she was deceived.

I wondered what I would have seen in that cave if my father had been anything other than what he was.

You would be seeing gold, said a whisper that was not a whisper, from deep in the heart of the mountain. It was a lonely voice, and distracted, and bored- and, at my entrance, intrigued. It sounded like- no, not like my mother. It sounded like a voice I could have heard, had things been different- like a voice I'd never heard before at all.

“I would see gold,” I said aloud. “Would it be real, or would it be an illusion?”

The whisper was amused. You think like a mortal woman, child, making things always to be one thing or another. It is gold they would see, and touch. Gold they would carry back with them, feeling the weight of it the while, gold they would trade with other mortals for what they needed. What does it matter if it is there or no if they can see it, touch it, steal it, murder for it? Gold they need and gold I give them.

“And what do you take, for the gold you give them?”

Little enough, for my needs are few, and I am old: too old to follow my sisters into the West, too old to take the Dreaming Road. I taste their pleasure and their joy. I feed, a little, feed on what they do not need and do not value. A taste of heart, a lick and a nibble of their fine consciences, a sliver of soul. And in return a fragment of me leaves this cave with them and gazes out at the world through their eyes, sees what they see until their lives are done and I take back what is mine.

“Will you show yourself to me?”

I could see, in the darkness, better than any woman born of mortal man and woman could see. All my sisters can. I saw something move in the shadows, and then the shadows congealed and shifted, revealing formless things at the edge of my perception, where it meets imagination. Troubled, I said the thing it is proper to say at times such as this: “Appear before me in a form that neither harm nor is offensive to me.”

Is that what you wish?
The rasp of sand on stone. “Yes,” I said.

From out of the shadows it came, and it stared down at me with empty sockets lit with glowing motes of weeplight, smiled at me with wind-weathered ivory limned with grime. It was all bone, save its hair, and its hair was black and gold, and wrapped about the branch of a thorn-bush coral.

“That offends my eyes.”

I took it from your mind, daughter of my house, said a whisper that surrounded the skeleton thing. Its jawbone did not move. I chose something nearly like what you loved. I chose something like your Miki, as he was the last time you saw him.

I closed my eyes, but the figure remained.

It said, the reaver waits for you at the mouth of the cave. She waits for you to come out, weaponless and weighed down with gold. She will kill you, and take the gold from your dead hands.

“But I’ll not be coming out with gold, will I?”

Will you?

I breathed, and listened to the blood rushing in my ears. I thought, a moment, in the darkness. I thought of Tolly Crookshank, the salt-grey through her hair, the line of her flat mouth. She was bigger than I am, but all women are bigger than I am- shoulders, spine, breasts, hips, all of her. Perhaps I was stronger, and faster, but she was also fast, and she was strong.

She killed my beloved, I thought, then wondered if the thought was mine or if it had crept out the shadows into my head. My beloved died because a reaving woman found him. Took his knife and took his horses and took his honor too- what else was he to do but die? Aloud, I said, “Auntie Whispers, is there another way out of this cave?”

You leave the way you entered, through the mouth of my cave.

I stood there and did not move, but in my mind… I was not an animal in a trap, not exactly. I was more… more like beating rice to rid it of chaff and split it to cook; ideas tossed up high and let to fall down and be caught again, the least of them blowing away like dust. No fear and no hesitation and no regret. No. None of those, not now. Not ever again.

I said, “Auntie Whispers, I am weaponless. She told me that I could not enter this place with a weapon. That it was not the custom.”

It is the custom now, to bring no weapon into my place. It was not always the custom, niece. Follow me, said the she-thing of my house in the skeleton shape of my Miki.

I followed her, for I could see her, even when it was so dark that I could see nothing else.

In the shadows it said, It is beneath your hands.

I crouched and felt it. The haft felt like bone- perhaps a rib from a whale. I touched the blade cautiously in the darkness, discovered that I was over something large, almost like a sword- but more like a paring knife than any weapon. It was thin at the spine and thinner at the edge, sharp at the tip and the pommel. It would be better than nothing.

“Is there a price?”
There is always a price.

“Then I will pay it. I ask two other things, Auntie Whispers. The first… won’t you come with me, into the light? A journey too hard for one alone is made easier by two together.”

Live through your battle to come, and perhaps I shall.

“Then the second, and last… you say that you can see the world through her eyes.”

The glowing motes in those empty hollow sockets flickered, and then the whole skull nodded.

“Then, Auntie Whispers- I ask that you tell me when she sleeps.”

It said nothing. I felt a hand- and though it looked like a skeleton, it felt warm, hard as bone but gentle, gentle, touch the strands of my hair that had fallen out of my tenugui. The warm hard fingers tucked my hair behind my ear, and stroked down the side of my face, down the side of my neck, rested on my shoulder and squeezed.

It said nothing.

It melded into the darkness, and I felt alone in that place- but not uncared for, nor unwelcomed, nor unloved.

Time passed. I followed the sound of the rasping sand, took a water swollen plum from my belt, and ate it. I ate half of my last mochi, breaking it in half and then working the half until it stretched and squished and then chewing it in small bites until it dissolved into nothing at all but a sweet-sour taste and a sticky film on my teeth. I slept and woke and slept again, and dreamed of my mother waiting for me as the day turned to night and the seasons changed, as I grew and she withered away; waiting for me just as I had waited for Miki, waiting in the painful space of not knowing - waiting for me forever.

Something, a finger, touched my hand: it was not bony and hard. It was soft, and humanlike, but ever so just too cold and too light.

She sleeps.

I left the cave in the blue light, before dawn. She slept across the cave, catfishlike, I knew, such that the slightest touch would have woken her. I kept my weapon in front of me, a bone handle and a beak-like blade of blackened silver star-steel, and I reached out and took what I was after, without waking her.

Then I stepped closer, and her hand grasped for my ankle and her eyes opened.

“Where is the gold?”

“I have none.”

The wind blew cold on the mountainside. I had danced back, out of her reach, when she had grabbed at me. She stayed on the ground, pushed herself up onto one elbow.

Then she said, “Where is my knife?”
“I took it,” I told her. “While you slept.”

She looked at me, sleepily. “And whysower would you do that? If I was going to kill you I would have done it on the way here. I could have killed you a dozen times.”

“But I did not have gold then, did I?”

She said nothing.

I said, “If you think you could have got me to bring the gold from the cave, and that not bringing it out would have saved your miserable soul, then you are a fool.”

She no longer looked sleepy. “A fool, am I?”

She was ready to fight. It is good to make people who are ready to fight angry.

“Not a fool. No. For I have met fools and idiots, and they are happy in their idiocy, even with straw in their hair. You are too wise for foolishness. You seek only misery and you bring misery with you and you call down misery on all you touch.”

She rose then, holding a rock in her hand like an axe, and she came at me. I am small, and she could not strike me as she would have struck a woman of her own size. She leaned over to strike. It was a mistake.

I held the bone haft tightly, and stabbed upward, striking fast with the pointy beak of the paring knife, like an eel. I knew the place I was aiming for, and I knew what it would do.

She dropped her rock, clutched at her right shoulder. “My arm,” she said. “I cannot feel my arm.”

She swore then, fouling the air with threats and curses. The dawn light on the mountaintop made everything so beautiful and blue. In that light, even the blood that had begun to billow and soak into her garments was purple. She took a step back, so she was between me and the cave. I felt exposed, the rising sun at my back.

“Why do you not have gold?” she asked me. Her arm hung limply at her side.

“There was no gold there for such as I,” I said.

She threw herself forward, then, ran at me and kicked at me.

I ducked and dropped the too large paring knife from my hands. I threw my arms around her leg, and I held on to her as together we tumbled off the mountainside into the current.

Her head was above me, and I saw triumph in it, and then I saw black water, and then the valley floor was above me and I was rising to meet it and then it was below me and I was being dragged to my death.

A jar and a bump, and now we were turning over and over on the side of the mountain, the world a dizzying whirligig of rock and pain and sky and curses, and I knew I was a dead woman falling, but still I clung to the leg of Tolly Crookshank.

I saw a leopard spotted ray in flight, but below me or above me I could no longer say. It was there, in the dawn light piercing through the silt and gloom of the deep sea, in the shattered fragments of time and perception, there in the pain. I was not afraid: there was no time and no space to be afraid in, no space in my mind and no space in my heart. I was being dragged with the current, holding tightly to the leg of a woman who was trying to kill me; we were crashing into rocks, scraping and bruising and then…

...we stopped. Stopped with a force enough that I felt myself jarred, and was almost thrown off Toloi Cruickshank and to my death beneath. The side of the mountain had crumbled under the force of rushing water there, long ago, sheared off and scrubbed smooth, leaving a sheet of blank rock, as smooth and as featureless as glass. But that was below us. Where we were, there was a ledge, and on the ledge there was a miracle: stunted and twisted, high above the kelpline, where no kelp has any right to grow, was a twisted yronwood kelp, not much larger than a bush, although it was old. It’s roots grew into the side of the mountain, and it was this yronwood kelp that had caught us in it’s grey-green arms.

I let go of the leg, clambered off Toloi Cruickshank’s body, and onto the side of the mountain. I stood on the narrow ledge and looked down at the sheer drop. There was no way down from here. No way down at all.

I looked up. It might be possible, I thought, climbing slowly, with fortune on my side, to make it up that mountain. If it did not crumble beneath my fingers. If the current was not too hungry. And what choice did I have? The only alternative was death.

A voice: “So. Will you leave me here to die, bangtail?”

I said nothing. I had nothing to say.

Her eyes were open. She said, “I cannot move my right arm, since you stabbed it. I think I broke a leg in the fall. I cannot climb with you.”

I said, “I may succeed, or I may fail.”

“You’ll make it. I’ve seen you climb. After you rescued me, crossing that waterfall. You went up those rocks like only a bangtail like you could’ve, with your legs and your suckers.”

I did not have her confidence in my climbing abilities.

She said, “Swear to me by all you hold holy. Swear by your king, who waits over the Sea as he has since we drove his subjects from this land. Swear by the things you Goblin creatures hold dear- swear by dreams and smoke, by shadows and shark skin, by dice and silence. Swear that you will come back for me.”

“You know what I am?”

“I know nothing. Only that I want to live.”

“I swear by these things… by dreams and smoke, by shadows and shark skin, by dice and by silence and sunbeams through silt. I swear by green hills of seagrass and standing gates of stone. I will come back.”

“I would have killed you. I had planned to kill you, and take the gold back as my own.”

“I know.”
Her hair framed her face like a salt-greyed halo. There was red blood on her cheek where she had scraped it in the fall.

“You could come back with ropes. My rope is still up there by the cave-mouth, but you’d need more than that.”

“Yes, I will come back with ropes.”

“When?”

I looked up at the rock above us, examined it as best I could.

Sometimes good eyes mean the difference between life and death, if you are a climber. I saw where I would need to be as I went, the shape of my journey up the face of the mountain. I would have to climb up pressed flat against the stone as the current bore down. I thought I could see the ledge outside the cave, from which we had fallen as we fought. I would head for there. Yes.

I blew on my hands, to warm them and clear the dust from them before I began to climb. “I will come back for you,” I said. “With ropes. I have sworn.”

“When?” she asked, and she closed her eyes.

“In a year. I will come here in a year.”

I began to climb. The woman’s cries followed me as I stepped up and crawled and stuck and clung and hauled myself up the side of that mountain, mingling with the cries of the rays, closing in on the stink of blood; and they followed me back from the Foggy Mountain, with nothing to show for my pains and my time but a knife I cannot use for cooking nor fighting and an Auntie who has gone home now, and I will hear her screaming, at the edge of my mind, as I fall asleep or in the moments before I wake, until I die.

It did not crumble, and the current pulled and pressed at me but it did not throw me down. I climbed, and I climbed in safety.

When I reached the ledge, the cave entrance seemed like a darker shadow in the noonday sun. I stepped to it, and entered.

“Auntie Whispers, are you here?”

I am, my niece.

“I have done one part of what I set out to do.”

You have, and your first battle is won. She that fell was the last to carry a piece of me; and she will be dead soon.

“Will you come with me?”

I will.
I took my Auntie Whispers’ cold, thin hand, and drew her into the light. She was not a skeleton at all, merely thin and weary and old, her hair nearly white and her eyes a filmy blue from cataracts. We turned from the little hole in the mountain, turned my back on the mountain, and from the shadows that were already gathering in the cracks and the crevices and deep inside my skull, and I began to lead my Auntie home, away from the Foggy Mountain. I left the Smoking Mountain behind, to return in a year.

There are a hundred roads and a thousand currents that would take us back home beyond the Red Gate, far to the West, where my mother and brother and sisters and home would be waiting. On my red legs, and my Auntie’s see-through fins, we swam for it.

I returned as I said I would to the Mountain; but I never could find that cave again.

The interesting thing about all the stories I tell is not only are they true, they actually happened as well. Fine, but important, distinction, that.

I’ve never actually said all of that out loud. I feel… less. Less twisted up, less… furious. Less. For having done so.

The tattoo I get is a combination of the flowers I wanted and the traditional tattoos every sailor gets. I get my peonies and red spider lilies, a sweet pea vine winding around an anchor labeled ‘Mom’; anemones and blue asters and bluebells curling around the shark over my spleen-scar, camellias and jasmine and lavender curling around my ribs and under each pitiful breast where the skin won’t stretch; a swallow on my shoulder, ‘hold fast’ on my knuckles, a rooster on my right hip and a pig on my left, a harpoon crossed with a cleaver and a cutting fork on my right forearm and my crew’s jolly roger on my left… and under my ear, on the side I sleep, a northern star.

So I don’t get lost again.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!